Garrus's jaw clamped down so hard, he sunk a tooth into the edge of his tongue as he spun back around. Insubordination? If Shepard didn't rip her down, he would.

Shepard stepped away from his side. "Operative Lawson, I've declared war on the Collectors. My security is going to be a concern everywhere I go, even while on board the Ypres." She laughed but it could have flash frozen a space cow. "Unless you're so delusional that you have dismissed the possibility of indoctrinated agents on our crew?" Shaking her head, Shepard opened her omnitool. "I'm ordering two rotations of shore leave for the crew. Forty eight hours each. The team needs it after Thessia. Make sure you're included in one of those rotations. Lieutenant Cortez can take the boat."

Miranda entered something into her tool. Garrus tried to move around to see what she was doing, but she covered the interface. "Captain, if you need to go to Palaven, General and Hierarch Vakarian can be accommodated as guests aboard the Ypres."

Shepard hesitated and looked up, pain and confusion staring back at him. She shrugged. "We could take the—"

Fear snapped through Garrus's shock. Shepard backing down? "You're right, Captain. That's a much better idea." He turned to Miranda. "On second thought," Garrus said before either woman could speak, "we'll be travelling aboard the Normandy. Good day, Operative Lawson, and enjoy your shore leave." Gripping Shepard's arm, he propelled her toward the door. When they made it out into the hallway, he searched the crowd and beckoned Martin over before looking down into Shepard's confused stare. "Kahri, were you about to give in to her?"

Shepard shook her head, her stare clearing a little. "No." Another shake. "I don't know. I don't think so. This headache just keeps getting worse. I've got to go do something before my brain implodes." She stood on her tiptoes and kissed him. "I'll meet you downstairs in a half hour."

"General?" Martin asked, stepping up beside them.

"Shepard has something she wants to discuss with you on the way to the medbay," Garrus answered. He turned to point at Miranda. "If Operative Lawson comes within ten metres, shoot her."

"Yes, sir." Martin placed himself between Miranda and Shepard.

Garrus pressed a hand against Shepard's cheek, then turned away, two steps carrying him into Miranda's space. The fury that had marked Shepard's return resurfaced, flaring into blue flame. "I suggest you take your leave away from Archangel, Operative Lawson." He held a hand in front of her, stopping her without making contact. "Tread carefully."

The woman met his stare with a calculated one, but then a sharp nod cut the air, and she stepped away.

Garrus walked over to lean against the QEC console, stiff and wary as the room emptied out. Did Shepard have to put up with that stulti the entire time she tried to command that ship? Fuck, no. He'd give her one of the dreadnoughts and name it the ACV Up Your Ass, Cerberus.
"Jane doesn't look well," Nihlus said, his voice too soft to carry. "Could it be a reaction?" He cleared his throat and ducked into an awkward shrug. "From, you know."

"No, I don't think so." Garrus shook his head, a sense of impending connection slithering around in the back of his head. "Something's going on, and it's to do with Lawson." He nodded toward the woman. "How is she with Shepard? Respectful?"

Nihlus shrugged. "She'd be strapped to the hull for a relay jump if it was a turian ship, but Shepard seems to be earning her respect. Sits her back when she has to." Scowl deepening, he started to rise, but sank back down when Garrus shook his head.

"Give me a second. I want to talk to you, but I need to talk to Anderson first." Clearing his plan with Anderson probably should have been a first step, but the way that Shepard just folded when Lawson insisted on them taking the Ypres threw him. He shuddered. Something happened that morning, something that was behind the headache, Kahri's dazed confusion, and Lawson tightening the leash. The slithering in his gut ramped up. Damn. He needed the old crew.

Hopefully Anderson agreed.

"General," the Captain replied, "what can I do for you?"

"Anderson, something strange is going on with Shepard." He sighed, the air coming out in a growl. "I don't know what it is, but I have a really bad feeling about Cerberus. I want Chakwas's opinion. Possibly Mordin's as well." Each step tight and controlled with worry and suppressed violence, Garrus stalked across the room and back. "Adrien Victus asked me to meet him on Palaven. He wouldn't say what it was about even over the QEC, so it's sensitive and important."

"And with Shepard acting strangely, you want familiar faces along for the ride?" Anderson cleared his throat. He muttered a little under his breath. "There isn't room on the Normandy unless you're willing to bunk in the shuttle bay."

Garrus could hear the man pacing and grinned, a chilled smile of shared worry.

"The Normandy can escort the Passch to Palaven. I'll call it a command experience exercise for Alenko. Myself, Chakwas, and Mordin can all stay aboard the Passch to help keep an eye on Shepard." He cleared his throat. "Acceptable?"

"More than." The general let out a long breath of relief. "Thank you, Anderson. We were due to set out in just over two and a half hours."

"Knock it back an hour and a half? I've got to round up crew, although I doubt there will be any grousing when I tell them they're trading shore leave on Omega for Palaven." He chuckled. "Contact me if anything changes."

"I will. Thank you, Captain. See you in a few hours." Garrus closed the channel and sagged against the nearest chair.

"Anderson's going to head to Palaven with you?" Nihlus's chair squeaked as the Spectre stood.

"Yes. I want Chakwas and Mordin along as well." The general turned to face his fratrin. "Come with us," he said, keeping his voice pitched low, subvocals welcoming.

Nihlus shook his head and turned away, pacing to the QEC panel. "No. You two need some time without me between you." He turned and leaned back against the console. "I am going to head to Illium, finally close down my apartment, get everything shipped here." His mandibles fluttered.
"She's here, so I guess that officially makes it home."

Garrus strode over, stepping into his fratrin's space. "Come with us. You can spend two days relaxing on Palaven and meeting with war contacts without your brain exploding. Besides, you look like hell. Thessia kicked the tarc out of you."

He chuckled, but it faded quickly. If he knew anything for sure, it was that they had to present karifratrus as real and viable right from the beginning. "Look, Nihlus, if we're going to make this work, you need to be in it from the start." He blew out a rough sigh, his shoulders dropping. "Shepard is going to fight it. Not because she doesn't want it, but because she's so damned worried about hurting either one of us. If we set our relationship as she and I, then bring you in as an addition after the fact." Brow plates raised, he shook his head. "How do you think that's going to go?"

Nihlus scowled and looked down. "Are you even okay with it, or are you taking a hit because you feel sorry for me?"

Fury flared again, burning hot and quick down Garrus's spine and out his hand as it cracked against Nihlus's cheek. "Just don't, Nihlus." He pressed his hand over the cheek he'd just slapped. "Self pity has no place in this. It's going to be hard enough to make Kahri comfortable without that sort of poison." He leaned in, eyes narrow. "Do you want it?"

"She's my breath, Garrus." Nihlus held eye contact for a moment before looking down.

"Then pack for Palaven and be aboard the Passch in three hours." Garrus patted his fratrin's cheek and turned away. "You can catch a ride to Illium from there."

"Are you okay with this, Garrus?" Nihlus called after him.

Letting out a long sigh, Garrus stopped and turned back. "It's not about being okay with it, Nihlus. It's about the three of us finding a way to be happy." He smiled, a shallow, affectionate flutter. "I'm not unhappy about it, Nihlus. I'm not jealous, and I know that she loves me no less with you in our lives than she would without you. She has the most remarkably big heart. If anyone has enough love for two torins, it's Shepard."

Garrus scowled. "I'm not sure this is for me to tell, but I'm going to tell you anyway." He let out a sharp breath and returned to the seat closest to the door. Sitting on the edge, he looked up at Nihlus. "She didn't leave us, Nihlus." He smiled, but his mandibles flailed a little. Everytime he allowed the implications of what she'd told him to really register, it overwhelmed him anew.

Nihlus's frown matched Garrus's as the Spectre strode over to sit next to him. "What do you mean?"

Glancing down at the Spectre's clenched fists, Garrus shook his head. "The first moment she remembers is standing across her body from me the second day after she died." He smiled and looked up to meet his fratrin's stare when Nihlus's hand darted out to clamp onto his wrist. "Yeah, she doesn't remember every second, but she remembers a lot of it. Haestrom, when I thought I was just hallucinating because of the cold … it was her."

Garrus clapped his hand over Nihlus's. "The night we swore karifratrus, she watched the whole thing, and then curled up with your drunken ass on the couch."

"Spirits." Nihlus yanked his hands from Garrus's and threw himself out of his chair. "Damn her!" He paced to the other end of the room before spinning back. "Trust Jane to throw away any chance of peace to take care of us." He let out a thin keen and turned away, his eyes glistening.

Garrus leaned back and crossed his arms. "Why are you angry, Nihlus? She loves us, and to Jane Shepard, that means sticking with us even after death."

Nihlus shook his head, hard and furious. "Because she deserves so much better than that. She deserves better than this. They stole her body out of the black and dragged her back to all this fear and death." He chuffed so violently that spit flew. "But what did it matter? She'd tied herself to it anyway?"

Garrus chuckled, then held up his hands to halt Nihlus's anger when it turned on him. "All right. I'm not mocking you." He stood and walked over to take his fratrin by the shoulders, warmth flooding through the contact. As much as karifratrus had done for Nihlus, it had blessed Garrus in just as many ways. "This is why I'm okay with everything, Nihlus. How could I deny her a love with that much passion behind it?" He bent down to touch brows with the shorter torin. "Go pack. I'm going to go round her up and get her aboard."

Nihlus leaned into him, the thin keen still sliding beneath his words. "She deserves so much better than me."

Garrus nodded. "Maybe, but apparently, that doesn't matter to her." He gripped Nihlus by the back of the neck. "How can you deny that this is all meant to be when the woman we love died, and still couldn't leave us?" He bumped his brow off the Spectre's. "See you aboard."

Garrus passed through the door, then jumped. "Eavesdropping is bad form," he said. Shepard just shrugged. He slipped an arm around her and steered her out the door. "But best that Nihlus not know you heard all that."

She shook her head, her jaw held in that stubborn clench that meant he wasn't going to get away with skirting the topic. "I didn't hear the whole conversation. Karin scanned me and gave me a shot for my head. She thinks one of my implants is misbehaving." Looking up at him, she opened her mouth, but then just gave her head another shake and stalked along beside him until they reached the elevator.

He pulled her in tight against his side and nuzzled the top of her head. "Are you feeling any better?" He hid a smile as she held herself stiffly beside him. Spirits, he loved her impossible, stubborn heart.

She muttered under her breath and kicked her heel against the wall. "I guess, although I could just be distracted by the whole 'sharing Shepard is meant to be' thing." She remained rigid for the rest of the trip down and into his quarters. Once there, she pulled away from him and paced over to the unmade bed, the sheets still mostly pulled off and wadded in the center of the mattress.

When the door shut behind him, Garrus closed his eyes and inhaled the mingled scents of Shepard and himself and their love making. He suppressed a wry chuckle, not wanting Shepard to think him making light of her feelings when the humor was for his own, sudden turn toward the primitive.

He'd never been the slightest bit possessive over anything, but with Shepard, there he was, preening at the proof of his having made love to her. Worse, he didn't care if it was primitive or not particularly correct, that scent, of having finally lain with his mate … it was all he could do to keep from shouting so loud his mari would hear it.

Then his love's quiet, solemn whisper cut through the silence. "You told Nihlus that I stayed with you both," she said, her back still turned toward him.
"Yes." He closed half the distance between them, but then stopped, leaving her lots of space. Some hard work lay ahead and his suffocating her wouldn't help. Letting out a long breath, he changed course, striding over to his small kitchen area. After setting a kettle on to boil he broke open his incense box. Mixing together a small amount of oil and soothing herbs, he set it over the heat. The oil turned out better if allowed to sit for a day or so, but heat worked well enough for what he had planned.

He felt Shepard's eyes on him, warm but hesitant.

"Why?" She shifted a little, her clothes whispering against her skin.

"Because it's true." He pulled a shallow bowl and two mugs from the cupboard, spooning hot chocolate into one mug, amarceru leaves into the other.

"I didn't say anything about Nihlus last night." The cavernous space open between them echoed through her voice, setting his heart pounding. He needed to get a bridge up and fast.

Nodding, he said, "You didn't." Removing the oil from the heat, he poured it through a strainer into the bowl. While it dripped through, he braced the heels of his hands into the counter, his arms tight against his sides. "Are you going to tell me that you weren't crouched under that table in Afterlife, your arms wrapped around his neck? You weren't whispering threats about how badly you'd kick his ass if he used that shotgun?"

Letting out a long breath, he shoved off the counter and turned to face her. "Don't you think I've spent most of the hours since you dropped that bomb putting together all the different times you interacted with us? Influenced us?"

Shepard met his eyes for a second, then looked down. "Maybe this is why I didn't remember. You weren't supposed to know. He wasn't supposed to know. It's just going to make everything harder."

A harsh, dull-bladed sigh gashed the air. "He's constantly being hurt, Garrus. Enough! What good comes out of telling him about that?"

Garrus poured water into the mugs and then carried everything over to the coffee table and set them down. "Come here." He held out his hand, cocking a brow plate when she just stared at his hand. "Come on, we haven't got much time before we're due to leave, and I want to do this."

She walked over, her feet dragging a little, a guilty child caught doing something wrong. "Do what?"

Grabbing the throw pillows off both couches, he piled them against the arm of the one couch. "It's a turian thing." He grasped her fingers in his hand and pulled her over. "Sit." He eased her down against the cushions with her feet up on the couch. He tapped her leg. "Pull them up so that I can sit." The sadness on her face tugged at him, making his entire body ache. He thought he understood where it came from, but it was so completely unnecessary.

When she pulled her feet up, he sat next to her, then laid her legs over his. "Nihlus told you about the reason turians wear gloves?" he asked, pulling one of her boots off.

She frowned and leaned up, her elbows braced against the couch arm behind her, watching him. "Yeah, make your talons less intimidating." She cleared her throat. "And he said that bare talon on talon contact with someone who isn't a blood relative signifies willingness for a closer relationship."

Garrus eased her other boot off, and looked down at her bare feet. "Don't humans usually wear "something on their feet inside their boots?" He rested both hands on her shins, wanting to get through what he had to say before touching her more intimately.

A smile broke through for the first time since the briefing. When they woke that morning, Shepard draped across his chest, she'd been nothing but smiles. Wriggling her toes a little, she nodded. "It's not regulation, but socks make my feet feel like they're being choked to death. My ten little piggies need to run wild and free." She reached up and pressed her hand against his mandible. "So, turians and touching?"

Closing his eyes, Garrus leaned into the contact. "We're a people of rich traditions," he continued, then turned and nuzzled her palm before taking her hand in his. "We have very few stigmas associated with sex. It's considered recreational for the most part. Our true intimacies come from ancient ritual. My mari could tell you where they all come from, and probably will. She's the member of our family who's obsessed with history and culture."

He leaned forward and dipped his fingers in the oil, its warmth soothing, and rubbed it into his hands. "Because the most sensitive and erogenous locations on our bodies are also those most likely to cripple us if injured, touching someone else's ankles, feet, spurs, and hands is a sign of deep connection and trust."

He lifted her right foot into his hands, slipped the trouser leg up a little, then began rubbing the oil into her feet. "This is something only done between mates," he said.

"Then I get to do yours?" she asked, a soft smile relaxing the tightness around her eyes and mouth. She closed her eyes and took a long breath. "That oil smells wonderful. What is it?"

"I added some dried rylamia." He held his hand out. Grasping it around his wrist, she drew it to her face and inhaled as he explained, "Rylamia promotes peace and openness." A guilty sort of grin answered the glare she shot him, but then she snuggled her face into his hand, ignoring the fine coating of oil.

For long minutes, she stayed like that, his thumb caressing her cheekbone and temple.

Then she drew away, walls and shields in place as she released his hand and leaned over to pick up her hot chocolate. Mug resting on her belly, cradled between her hands, she laid back, staring up at him. "So, why do you think that I was in Afterlife that night?"

His chest and shoulders heaved with his sigh. "You truly are impossible." When she didn't reply, he sighed again. "Sidonis ran back here, said that despite Nihlus waving a gun around, Aria's people were staying out of it. Then, when I got there, she hinted that she thought you and Nihlus were together." He shrugged. "Not hard to imagine why. I expect having a spirit whispering the certainty of doom into her ear would be enough to convince even Aria to call off her goons."

Shepard sipped at her hot chocolate, her stare still challenging. It didn't feel as though she was challenging him, but the entire idea that she'd remained behind. He could see why she'd doubt it. That calculating mind, deprived of the heady pleasure and emotions of the night before, would start to consider all sorts of more logical options. She needed him to help her believe it in the murky, slightly greasy light of Omega's day.

He traded feet. The intoxicating slippery, softness of her skin contrasted with the fine bones just beneath weren't helping in the whole tight plates, business as usual department. Every cell in his body screamed to cradle her in his lap, to slip free of his plates and savour the quiet intimacy of their joining as he massaged the oil into her entire body. The continually cycling words, 'too much, too soon', kept things contained as he rolled the muscles between gentle hands.
"When I got to Nihlus, his shotgun was sitting next to him on the floor while he watched that damned footage over and over. Sidonis and Wrex said he'd threatened to use his shotgun; I think he went into that bar to commit suicide by Aria. When that didn't work, he decided to do it himself." He glanced at her, brow plates raised, his gut aching as the remembered fear curled through him, a wisp of smoke the colour of a rainy dawn. A crooked smile tugged at one mandible when she just sipped her hot chocolate. So stubborn.

"When I got to him, the vehemence behind his denial and his reason—that you'd kick his ass if he ate a bullet—" He glided his hands up her shins as far as the cuffs of her trousers, the bone pressing into his palm as he kneaded the muscle with his talons. "I didn't make anything of it at the time, but now I know you had those arms wrapped around him." Raising his brow plates, he waited for a moment before asking, "What did you say to him?"

She shook her head and sipped her hot chocolate. "I don't know." When he simply stared at her, she shrugged and wriggled a little deeper into the cushions. "What? Just what he said."

Garrus let her keep her secret. "And then, when we got back here, did you suggest karifratrus to me?" He reached out for one hand, caressing the oil into the mug-warmed flesh when she surrendered it.

Shepard frowned and shook her head, that answer leaping forward. "I didn't even know it existed." She tried to tug her hand free, giving up when he kept massaging it.

Garrus let out a tiny, whistling breath. "But you said something, right?" He stared into her eyes, smiling gently. He needed to coax her around to the truth carefully, lovingly. "What did you say?"

Her scowl deepened as she searched her memory, eyes moving back and forth as if she was reading it from a book. After a second, he saw realization hit and she looked up, her expression even sadder than before. "Oh god, I asked you to look after him. I said he needed a brother."

Answering her with a single nod, he decided to push a little harder. "And then afterwards, when I changed and headed out onto the bridge. Did you follow me?"

Sitting up, she nodded, balancing her mug on her knee as she turned thoughtful and searching again. "Yeah. You said something about not being able to do it, that it was all too much, but I knew it was a lie. You'd done so well getting them all organized. Proud didn't even begin to cover it."

Lifting her mug to her lips, she sipped then let it fall. Disappointment briefly dropped her shoulders before she leaned over to set the empty mug on the table. "I knew that even though you were in pain, you'd recover. You'd lead Archangel brilliantly—I hated the name, by the way—and you'd be okay."

He tugged her hand to his mouth, nuzzling her fingers, nipping the tips lightly. The memory of that night materialized between them: the sudden surge of surety, the sense of her love, so strong and present and palpable. If she'd left him then, he would have mourned her, but he would have pulled through. "Yeah, I felt it, and in that moment, I knew I could do it as well." He traded to her other hand.

Keeping his tone light and neutral, he asked, "If you'd just been here for me, you would have moved on then, wouldn't you? Gone wherever you were meant to go?"

Shepard's brow furrowed into intense, thoughtful lines, then she let out a tiny gasp and yanked her hand from his grip. Her eyes darted to his face, her expression dissolving into something halfway between joy and misery. "Oh, Garrus, I saw Daddy at the end of the bridge. Just where the barricade was." She let out a soft mewl of sound and snatched his hand between both of hers, clinging to him. "He called me over, but then I heard Nihlus cry out for me in his sleep."

Her eyes shone with tears, breaking his heart a little as she stared at him. Clambering up, she crawled onto his lap, sitting astride his thighs. She flung her arms around his neck, fitting herself along his length and buried her face in his neck, her tears dampening his hide. "Daddy smiled, nodded, and just disappeared."

Wrapping his arms around her, Garrus held her close. "And you went upstairs, curled up with Nihlus, and stayed." Garrus turned to nuzzle her ear. "You stayed for Nihlus, Kahri, because he needed you, and you loved him too much to desert him." He pushed her away just far enough to kiss her, chaste and damp with her tears. "That's why I told him what I did," he whispered against her lips.

Weighing his next words carefully, Garrus decided on full disclosure and said, "My people believe that spirits come into the world connected. Sometimes they are connected one on one, sometimes they are connected in groups of thousands. Those connected spirits form a whole: the spirit of a military unit or vessel, or the spirit of a family."

She drew back. "Soul-mates?"

The word didn't translate, and his confusion must have shown because she sighed and leaned in, resting her brow against his chin. "Some humans believe we all have a perfect match, and we'll only be truly happy if we find that one person."

Garrus nodded. "Spirits don't just come in pairs, Kahri. Sometimes they come in threes or fours." He kissed her and drew back, cupping her cheek in his hand. Thumb talon brushing her hair from her face, he smiled. "You realize that if there is an interloper in this relationship, it has always been me?" The surprise and refusal that snapped over her features tugged his mandibles into a bright smile. The depth of his love struck him anew, a flood of blues and forest greens, of the metallic, earthy scent of rain and the bright nip of new snow.

He waited for the tide to ebb before he trusted his voice again. "I knew you loved Nihlus and he loved you from the first moment I met you both. It was new and fragile, but it was there." Kissing her softly, he tasted the salt of her tears. "But I also felt certain that you and I were meant to be together." Letting his eyes slip closed, he deepened the kiss. When they came up for air, he raked gentle talons through her hair. "Just like right now, I'm certain that the three of us are meant to build this family, Kahri. You will never be truly happy without him, and truthfully, neither will I."
A slow smile blossomed as the past two years settled in her head. It wasn't perfect, nor complete or happy, but there, and suddenly she knew how to be Jane Gwendolyn Shepard again. That blank spot had taunted her, laughing at any attempt to reclaim her life. How could she move forward not even knowing if she was the same person?

Maribellas - Beautiful female … meant more toward a younger female or one with a greater social distance from the speaker.

Asperta - Rough housing, wrestling play

41 Days ASR

Shepard jolted awake, her nerves screaming as if they were being individually electrocuted. "Ow."

Lifting her head, the only part of her that didn't hurt, she looked down to see Garrus lying beneath her. Well, that explained all of her body parts either being asleep or in agony. "Got to stop falling asleep on top of the boney, spikey boyfriend," she grumbled.

Garrus jumped under her—that explained what woke her up—his hand leaping to his radio. "Yes?" He bolted upright sending Shepard tumbling off the couch. A quick lunge and a long arm answered her yelp, catching her before she hit the floor.

Pulling her in, he nuzzled her forehead, but then turned his attention to his comms. "Sorry, Doc, I just tried to fling your patient across the room." He chuckled. "Well, you know how she can be."

He glanced at Shepard out of the corner of his eye, his mandibles high and spread.

"Glad you're proud of that one," she whispered and then punched him in the shoulder. Scrambling up, she turned on her heel. "Because you will pay for it."

Garrus's soft laughter followed her to the bathroom. "So, Doc, are you and Mordin all right with taking a trip to Palaven?"

Shepard paused inside the door as a heavy, very unhappy rumble rolled across the room. She almost turned back, but then nature demanded that she take care of its demands first. Once the door closed, she couldn't hear anything Garrus said, but that rumble had been an angry one. Something wasn't looking good. Considering both her luck and her earlier headache, she felt safe laying money on that being the cause.

She stabbed her elbows into her thighs, dropped her head into her hands, and yawned.

Note to self: Turian massages induce a comatose state. Do not drive or operate heavy machinery.

A slow smile blossomed as the past two years settled in her head. It wasn't perfect, nor complete or happy, but there, and suddenly she knew how to be Jane Gwendolyn Shepard again. That blank spot had taunted her, laughing at any attempt to reclaim her life. How could she move forward not even knowing if she was the same person?
But she was. Her body had stopped, but the rest of her had continued on, and in the most stubborn, self-destructive way possible. She laughed, low and wry. How could she doubt her identity with an MO like that?

Her smile spread. And Garrus had been fine. Damn, but he'd been fine. Yes, he took refuge in his dreams, but he hadn't been falling apart. His dreams amounted to going home at the end of a long day at work. He hadn't needed her, as comfortable as her presence there became. Nihlus … . Well, as arrogant as she'd been thinking he needed her, he hadn't. She'd been a shadow at midnight, not even offering shade.

As much as Garrus wanted to make her their mystical spirit guru, she knew the truth. She hadn't done anything. Garrus's compassion and Nihlus's undying hope had proven to be the heroes. The best thing she could have done for Nihlus was leave him to Garrus. The pair of them were a genuine miracle.

Talons rapped against the door, distracting her. "Kahri? You ready to get packed up? Forty-five minutes."

She tidied up, washing her face and hands, then headed out. "I didn't get unpacked," she said, giving him a wide, easy smile. "You didn't give me time before throwing family members at me and ripping my clothes off." Stepping into him, she wrapped her arms around his waist and looked up. The teasing died when she met his eyes. "What's going on, big guy?" Rage and fear smouldered, magma beneath the ice, a combination she hadn't seen at that intensity since Feros.

A single, wooden shake of his head bounced her concern off into a corner. "Don't know yet, but Dr. Chakwas and Mordin will meet us on the Passch as soon as we can get over there. She wants to run a few more tests to see what caused your headache."

Shepard stood on tiptoes and pulled him down for a kiss. She started as it impacted against rigid mouth plates. Ouch. Switching to humour, she said, "Trust Cerberus to put me back together using bargain parts they bought over the extranet." Pressing her brow to his as that attempt slammed into the wall as well, she let out a soft sigh. "You know whatever it is, we'll fix it. That's what we do."

His mouth didn't move under hers when she kissed him again. Whatever had him rattled, it was taking all his concentration to hang on to his temper, and he wouldn't be cuddled out of his concern. In the time it had taken her to pee, the air had shifted from moonlit spring night to an incoming storm so charged that it raised the hair on her arms.

"Okay, let's just get ready to go," she said, letting her disappointment bleed out along a sigh. "I can convince you to kiss me once we've met with Karin."

She pulled away. "Can I get some laundry done on the Passch? All my stuff is packed, but this uniform is all I've got that's clean." Looking down at her kit, she cocked her head. "I'm sort of surprised it hasn't crawled across the floor to find somewhere to spawn." Smiling when he shot a cautious, 'I didn't know clothes could get that dirty' glance at her duffel, she turned and walked over to his closet. "You, on the other hand, aren't packed, so let's get moving, General. Your chariot awaits."

That finally got a reaction out of Garrus, although not a verbal one. He simply stalked over to his closet and dragged out his duffel, already mostly packed, just in case. Between them, they finished his packing and loaded their gear into a car in under ten minutes.

The silence followed them into the car, growing heavier each second until it neared levels sufficient to crush the vehicle into a meal tray.
Shepard reached over, wrapping her hand around his. The question burrowed its way up her throat, tenaciously clinging to the back of her tongue even as she tried to swallow it down, but she caged it behind her teeth. Pressing him to tell her what Chakwas had said was about cutting a hole in the silence to make herself more comfortable, so she simply laced her fingers with his talons and waited. Whatever had set his teeth on edge would reveal itself once they reached the Passch.

"Great glowing asses of the Enkindlers." A whistle of awe and delight greeted their entry into Archangel's second docking bay and her first glimpse of the fleet. "Look at you! Aren't you all beautiful?" The Ypres docked in the public docks, and she hadn't had time to spit let alone explore Archangel's assets.

Well, Archangel's less personal assets, anyway.

Excitement prickled along the back of her neck as she looked over what she knew amounted to less than a quarter of the fleet. "They're amazing, Callor." Pulling her hand free, she sprang to the edge of her seat and stared out the window, neck craned, eyes wide, her fingers gripping the dash like a child trying to see over a candy counter.

"Oh! What are those?" she asked, stabbing a finger at a line of medium frigates. What looked like a series of focusers and emitters covered their hulls. Shooting a glanced over at Garrus, she asked, "Shield strippers?"

He nodded, a slight smile flicking his mandibles. "We call them Stingers. They can take down the shields of nearly any ship out there in a single hit. The geth basically upsized their energy drain tech and stuck it inside a hull." He let out a long breath, his neck arching a little, betraying his pride. She reached over and took his hand again. He deserved to be proud. What he'd done with an idea and a little bit of cash amazed her, and she didn't think it would ever stop amazing her.

Garrus pointed to a line of large frigates. "The Stingers are basically glass cannons, so they always go in with at least a few heavy frigates."

Shepard grinned at him, then turned back to the view: row upon row of sleek black and gold ships. "They're gorgeous, and not at all bug shaped. How did you talk the geth out of that?" When he didn't answer, she squeezed his fingers. As they progressed down the docking bay, one of the dreadnoughts appeared, hanging in space just outside the massive hangar doors, far too large to dock. Shepard whistled again. "Wow. Add that baby to my christmas list."

She leaned back in her seat. "How many crew on one of those beauties?" she asked, her mind racing, trying to encompass the size of the organization.

Garrus shifted, straightening a little. "Not as many as you'd think. Despite being half the size of the Destiny Ascension, they only require an organic crew of fifteen hundred." He chuffed. "Only fifteen hundred."

"Geth crew?" Shepard's mouth twisted a little. "Bet the council will love that. Another reason for Archangel to be public enemy number one."

A sharp chuff answered that. "If our breaking the Treaty of Farixon wasn't reason enough." Shrugging, sharp enough to cut, he stiffened. "Not that it matters. Even with the integrated geth servers, I don't know how we'll ever find enough crew. Archangel has exploded lately, but still, we're just over five thousand strong." He squeezed her fingers, mandibles twitching once before drawing in tighter than before. "Would have been a lot fewer if someone hadn't dropped a tiny, redhead nuclear weapon on the mercs."
Shepard pulled his hand to her lips, then allowed their laced fingers drift down onto her lap.

One-handed, talons moving deftly over the controls, he brought the car in to land at the end of the Passchendaele's ramp. "All the frigates were running with skeleton crews. And now, with all the shipyards shut down, we aren't making fighters for the carriers ... not that we have enough trained fighter pilots." He let out a ragged sigh as he released her hand. "Not concerns for right now, however." He shrugged his armour up his shoulders and tugged at its yoke.

Shepard nodded and climbed out. Leaning into the back seat, she grabbed her gear. "I swear I carried all this stuff off a ship less than twenty-four hours ago," she said, not sure if she was joking or complaining. She boosted her duffel up her shoulder, and sorted a gun case into either hand before looking up at the ship. "So much for our couple of days just for us."

Garrus awaited her at the bottom of the ramp and wrapped his arm around her, gun case and all. "We'll find some time. And I think you'll like Adrien. He's a troublemaker, too."

The shuttle bay teemed with activity: crew stowing gear, several helping the quartermaster with a shipment of supplies, still more checking systems. Judging by sounds of life echoing everywhere, the Passch must not be heading out with a skeleton crew that trip. Conversation and laughter, banging metal and sliding crates rang off the hull: the familiar, welcome music of her life. She breathed it in, filling herself with it.

Shepard didn't get a chance to answer the troublemaker accusation before two cadets trotted up to relieve them of their kits. "Both for your cabin, General?" one asked, then immediately turned a red so brilliant that it put Sparky's blushes to shame. "Um, I mean—"

Garrus simply passed his gear over. "Log our weapons in with the quartermaster, then my kit goes to my quarters." The general slipped Shepard's duffel off her shoulder. "Anything in here that you don't want people to see?" he asked her without any trace of his usual humour.

Shepard shook her head, a chorus of popcorn crunching sounds betraying the extent Garrus's tension had infected her. "Nope, nothing scandalous, just stinky." She stretched her neck and rolled her shoulders.

Garrus passed her duffel to one of the cadets. "Take this to the laundry, then it can be sent up to my quarters." A curt nod answered their salutes. "Thank you." He slipped his arm back around her, guiding her past the nearly full elevator to the stairs.

Shepard chuckled as she trotted up the curved staircase. "Sick of slow elevators?" she asked, casting a quick glance back.

Garrus climbed three stairs at a time, his stare fixed on the deck plating. "And I didn't want to ride up with twenty people eyeballing us so they could giggle about how adorable we are later." He passed her at the top, and held an arm out to guide her. "The layout of the heavy frigates is almost identical to the Normandy," he said. Crew deck has my quarters, Captain L'Tsai's quarters and medbay all in the stern; galley and dining midship; crew quarters, heads, gym, and lounges in the bow.

"She's gorgeous, General. A worthy flagship." She stepped into his side and took his hand. "So, let's stop fussing and stalling, and go find out what Karin told you that has your teeth clenched so tight that I can hear them shattering."

Gripping her hand tight enough that it hurt, he nodded, and led the way. Just before they reached the medbay door, the docking clamps released, their heavy thump and shiver reverberating through the ship.

Shepard closed her eyes and smiled as the inertial dampeners kicked in, her belly doing a little swoop in the fraction of a second between Omega's gravity holding her to the deck and the Passchendaele's taking over. "That never gets old," she said, turning a smile to her wall of angry turian. Despite softening ever so slightly, he just pulled her toward medbay. She sighed. "Being hauled around like a misbehaving puppy does, however."

Her right brow arched when he didn't even twitch. Maybe she was dying. Could they have missed a massive brain tumor or brain-snacking parasite in the plethora of scans she'd had over the past week or two?

When the door opened to medbay, Shepard stopped short, letting out a low whistle as she ogled the immaculate, gleaming banks of state of the art equipment. "Holy crap. Look at this place. It's like walking into a really clean oven, but with beds and snazzy equipment." She let Garrus pull her over the threshold. "Is it bad that I want to take vid to send to TIM, just to see him cry."

"Shepard, come in and hop up on a bed," Dr. Chakwas directed, her lack of preamble grinding up the last kernel of Shepard's humour. The doc gestured toward the first of eight beds, hovering as Shepard did as she'd been told. Both doctors crowded in on her, their haste dragging handfuls of bad-tempered nettles down her spine. She expected Garrus to overreact to any and all threats to her wellbeing; them, not so much.

Mordin's scanner attacked before Shepard even managed to get settled. "Okay, so you know ... you two are freaking me out. Stop it. What's going on with my head?"

Chakwas looked from Shepard to Garrus before she activated her omnitool and focused her attention on her scans. "Did you see Operative Lawson before you left?"

Shepard spun to face Garrus, slapping a hand against his chest, banging on the door. Why the hell had they locked her out? "Miranda? What does Miranda have to do with my headache? I was joking about the cheap replacement parts."

Garrus stepped up behind her, pressing his hand in the center of her back, but spoke to Chakwas, "I didn't see her, and my people reported that she returned to the Ypres immediately after I confronted her."

Shepard stabbed a hand up between them. "Hold up. Stop talking around me. What about Miranda?" Something cold and slimy wormed its way through her guts drawing an ugly picture. She winced away from it before the connections started linking up in her head. "Someone had better start explaining what the hell is going on before I let the twitchy inner bitch loose."

Mordin stepped in front of Shepard, the set of his mouth even more grim than usual. He stared at her for a few seconds before he began tapping at his omnitool. "Captain, discovered something during last scan." He opened a graphic file, presumably of her brain. A speck about the size of her baby finger nail glowed near the base of her skull. A web of spider-silk tendrils snaked out of it, weaving a fine web that appeared to infiltrate most of her brain.

Shepard leaned in to look at it and then shrugged, trying for casual dismissal despite the churning in belly. "We've never been introduced, and I don't know if you noticed, but I have a metric assload of tech inside this skull." She glanced from one to the other. "I only breathe and have a pulse because of a tiny supercomputer, but I couldn't tell you where it is or what it looks like." Glancing up at Mordin, she waited for him to explain, but when he just started another scan, she asked, "Was I being too subtle there? What the hell is it?"
The salarian looked over at Chakwas, his hand lifting to rub at his lip. The silence between them screamed as it added a cheese grater to the nettles raking down Shepard's spine. Instead of answering her, they turned to one another, apparently communicating telepathically as they compared data.

She let out a thin, exasperated hiss when the scanners turned on her again. "Okay, come on, people. More information, less drama."

Garrus rubbed her back. "Let them finish their scans, Kahri. They'll explain when they're done."

Shepard huffed. "When has patience ever been one of my virtues?"

Karin looked up from her omnitool and stepped away from Mordin, her face a study in professional compassion. Despite the fact it meant bad news, the effect eased Shepard's nerves somewhat. At least it wasn't strained bewilderment. "It's a behavioural modification chip, Shepard."

Shepard stared at the doctor for a solid minute, her brain trying to comprehend the sounds that had entered her ears. Liquid nitrogen poured into her head, flash freezing everything but for a single, impotent sentence that parroted the doc.

"Behavioural modification chip." Her voice disappeared into the resonant throbbing of the engines, the gale-roar of the air vents, and the thunder of her blood rushing through her veins. No wonder the docs had stood there checking things over and over. No wonder Garrus looked as though he could bite straight through the hull. Cerberus had hacked her brain.

"Yes, Captain." Karin let out a long, tight breath, slamming a door on the deafening silence. "A control chip, to put it crudely."

"Burn it," Shepard said without even a second worth of thought, the words hissing between clenched teeth. Liquid fury dripped down her cheeks, but she didn't give the tears the satisfaction of wiping them away. Her entire return from the dead amounted to a lie. No, not a lie, a joke. We need Captain Shepard to lead us in the fight. Bullshit. They needed a fucking puppet to hold up and dance for the kiddies.

Sweet fucking … . Every time Miranda activated that damned omnitool … . How many bloody times had that thing come up, right in her face? Dance dead soldier girl, dance. A rush of acid, sour and powerless, raced up her throat, but she bullied it back down.

How entertaining she must have been, stomping around, taking control. How many decisions made over the past month and a half had actually been hers? She could pretty much guarantee that anytime she'd changed her mind or backed down it had been the damned chip. The thing's tendrils itched and burned beneath her skull, mocking her.

The medbay dropped as silent as it had been cacophonous the moment before. She bit back the tears, cooling the fury by sheer force of will. They'd get no more of her than they'd already taken. Not one gram.

"Burn it." When Mordin hesitated, Shepard looked to Chakwas. "Leave it in place, but fry the fucker. Make sure it can't so much as change my coffee order." She gripped the salarian's wrist when he moved away, the expression on his face far from convinced. "Not a single word leaves this room."

Chakwas nodded. "Our loyalty is to you, Captain, not Miranda or the nightmare she works for." Professional concern morphed ever so slightly into fear for a friend. "But this thing has tendrils spread all through your brain. We couldn't remove it even if you wanted us to. And if we try to overload it, those filaments could do some serious damage to your brain tissue." Her jaw clenched, as much a tell as Chakwas could allow herself. "Not to mention what an electrical discharge could do to your implants, including the computer that keeps you alive."

Shepard braced to say she didn't care what happened. Living as a slave to Cerberus, being forced to do who-the-hell-knew-what … . No. She'd rather be dead.

But then Garrus cleared his throat. "If this thing has been in her head for the last month, why is she just getting headaches from it today?"

"Because we slept together," Shepard said, speaking even as the idea solidified in her head. "She heard about our night and started cranking it up." She glanced back. "She used it three or four times just in the space of the briefing. Most I can remember prior is twice on the day you were shot by the rocket."

Garrus nodded. "She's worried that you'll tell Cerberus where to go."

"Yeah." Shepard took a deep breath and straightened, bracing the heels of her hands against the edge of the bed. "So, how do we kill it?"

Mordin bent over the computer on the desk, his fingers flying over the interface. "Device possesses defense mechanisms. Need to disable in one strong attack without damaging rest of implants or brain tissue. Difficult. Perhaps impossible."

Chakwas stepped between Shepard and the salarian, her entire body angled for a fight. "Any attack strong enough to disable the chip could well burn out the rest of the captain's implants if not her entire neural network. I don't make a habit of electrocuting my patients." She shook her head, a solid wall of denial that Shepard knew wouldn't back down. "If the chip's defenses shunt the energy, sending it arcing through her skull, brain injury would be the best we could hope for."

Mordin's fingers sprang to his mouth, his brows lowering over narrowed eyes. "Possible to attack physically. Enter skull, use precise laser directly on chip. Defenses aimed to deflecting exterior attack or accident." He focused back on the computer for a moment, but Shepard could see the wheels turning. "Yes. Yes, should work. Minimal danger of disability or death." He looked up, his features animated in a way that almost frightened her.

"Define minimal," Garrus said, his voice a low growl that rumbled out of his chest.

Shepard wouldn't mind that definition either considering Mordin was suggesting using a laser to fry a tiny piece of tech buried inside her brain. She looked back to Karin. "Living through the procedure is my first choice. What do you think, Doc?"

Karin scowled. "It could work, but the chip isn't just sitting on the surface of your brain with a little heat resistant pad beneath it." She turned back to her omnitool. "This would be intricate brain surgery, and we'd be digging through the part of your brain that is responsible for balance, movement, and coordination."

"So, I could end up disabled." Shepard twisted to look into Garrus's eyes, his hand like a brand burning through the back of her uniform. His ice-blue stare met hers, a false calm circulating between them, the eye of the hurricane. He'd never tell her not to do it. He respected her too much, and he knew her too well. She was also pretty sure that if their places were reversed, he'd be telling them to do the exact same thing. Her general would never allow himself to be anyone's slave.
"They don't get to steal all of this from me," she said. Certainty and resolve calmed the nettle sting along her spine, a balm that seeped into her muscles and settled into her bones. "They don't get to steal you away from me, and they'll try again and again."

He nodded and his hand dropped away. "I'll be back in a second." Without meeting her eyes, he spun on his talons and walked out the door.

The mattress squeaked under her palms, the only sound as both doctors concentrated on their omnitools. Shepard walked her butt back a little on the mattress and glanced at the door every ten seconds.

Dr. Chakwas cleared her throat after a good ten minutes, stepping into Shepard's narrowed vision. "I'm assuming that you're going to bulldoze through the risks and want this done now?"

Shepard braced her hands and leaned forward, pulling her shoulders up to her ears. "Will waiting change anything? Can you better prepare given a day or a week?" Looking up from under shuttered eyelids, she shrugged. "If you can tell me that waiting will severely increase my odds—"

A tiny grenade wrapped in cotton batting went off inside Shepard's skull, dropping her head straight into her hand. A wall of napalm rolled along the midline of her skull, flooding her eyes and filling her nose with the scent of old copper. "Damn it." Pressing the heel of her right hand into her temple, she glanced up. "Scan me, Doc. I think she's putting the whammy on me again."

"Damn." Chakwas looked up at the door when it opened. "Did you do this?" she demanded, as Garrus stepped through, followed by Nihlus. The orange of her omnitool burned far too bright, sending Shepard into retreat behind her eyelids.

"I did," Nihlus said. "We're almost to the relay. Garrus wanted to test the chip's range, so I contacted the Ypres, told Yeoman Chambers to pack Shepard's gear." Two long strides crossed the floor, and then his talons brushed over her hair. "Are you all right?" He sat on the other side of the bed, his hip pressing against the small of her back.

Shepard nodded. "Yeah, I'll live. Just don't do that again." Leaning into Nihlus a little, she focused on Dr. Chakwas. "Burn it."

The doctor nodded and let out a long sigh. "I don't see that we have a choice." She lifted her omnitool. "We'll need to do some very precise scans to map out the surgery, so you'll have to be sedated." Her manner softening without losing the professional corners, Chakwas closed the metre between them. "I'll keep you under for the entire procedure. When you wake, you may experience disorientation, dizziness, difficulty moving or speaking."

Nihlus pressed in behind her. "We'll be here the whole time," he said, a warm hand wrapping over her ribs.

Shepard looked at Garrus, who stood closer to the door. He nodded and stepped up, his arm circling her shoulders as he leaned down to press his brow to hers.

"They've got to disable it before she does damage," he said, his voice a low, comforting rumble despite sounding as though he wished he could be saying anything else. "But Nihlus is right. We aren't going anywhere."

Shepard kissed him and smiled, trying to pass her certainty on to him. She'd come through five by five. She knew it. "Hey, I'll be fine. They used to do this sort of thing to people's brains all the time and call it treatment." Shepard shrugged, tilting her head a little to one side. "I might wake up "Wrong part of the brain, and it was a barbaric practice that was discontinued over a century ago, Shepard," Chakwas said, her protest strident and stiff-backed. "And it was never proven to cure mental illness of any sort."

Shepard let out a long, dramatic sigh. "Damn, well, a girl can hope, right?" She gave Chakwas a wink and glanced back at her torins. "Let's get this show on the road. I want to have a little vacation time once we get to Palaven."

Chakwas levelled a stern finger at Nihlus and Garrus. "If you two are staying, disinfect and keep out from underfoot"

Chuckling, Shepard shrugged. "You heard the doctor, get moving and stay out of the way." She grinned, then pulled Garrus in for another kiss. "See you in a couple of hours. You owe me some days without any craziness."

That time he kissed her back, his arms pulling her in tight. "You'll get them," he promised before releasing her.

Ducking her head a little, Shepard beckoned Nihlus over into a hug, then took a deep breath. "All right, Docs. I'm all yours."

Mordin passed her a gown while Chakwas lowered the privacy shades over the windows. Equipment rolled in from everywhere, and quicker than she would have guessed, she found herself face down with her head in some sort of padded clamp-shaped torture device.

"Hey, you two." Shepard reached out her hands for Garrus and Nihlus. She squeezed Garrus's hand. "You were wrong, you know?" Letting out a long, sighing breath, she relaxed into the drugs' heavy, warm sleepiness. "I did nothing but lurk in the corner for two years. Every brave and beautiful thing you did was all you." She squeezed their talons. "I didn't do anything but watch."

"Shepard … ." Garrus crouched down next to the bed.

Forcing her eyes open took more energy than she would have thought, but she managed to peek out from under her ozmium eyelids. "If this doesn't work, take care of one another."

Her torin leaned in to nuzzle her ear. "You're going to be just fine."

Nihlus just reached out to stroke the hair around her ear, those remarkably green eyes narrow and glassy.

Smiling, eyes refusing to remain open any longer, Shepard faded into the black. "Damn right, I will be. I love you … ."

The rabbit hole opened beneath Shepard, sending her tumbling head over heels into the darkness. Curiouser and curiouser.

Later

The darkness peeled back, not whole and elegant like the curl of a perfectly peeled mandarin, but in tiny pieces, disjointed and patchy, torn apart like an old navel orange.

Shepard forced her eyes open. Shapes, light gray blur against a dark gray blur, moved around her bed. Dizzying. Her stomach heaved, and a white blur appeared under her head. She tried to wipe her mouth, but her arm remained stuck to the bed, impossibly heavy. Someone stepped in to do it for her.

"Captain?" A dark shape appeared above her, blurry and washed out into shades of grey. "Captain! I need you to remain calm."

Miranda? Wait, where was she? Pain chopped her into wafer-thin slices. No. No, she couldn't be … . She'd woken up. Panic grabbed hold of her diaphragm, yanking at it until all she could do was gasp in shallow, ineffectual breaths.

Shepard tried to lift her head, but nothing happened. Trying to move her hands and feet, she discovered that they didn't move either.

"It'll be over in just a few more moments, Captain," the woman said, the blur of her face leaning over. Miranda? Chakwas? "Just stay calm and breathe slowly. We're just assessing your motor coordination."

Breathe slowly? She couldn't get any air. Her hands insisted on leaping to her throat, but they wouldn't move. Why wouldn't anything move? The blurs began to swirl around her in lopsided orbits. Her stomach heaved again. Air! Damn it, she just needed air!

She winced away from a bright, orange light as it exploded above her.

"You're fine, Shepard," the woman said. Chakwas?

It had to be Chakwas. Why couldn't she think? She'd woken up. Over a month ago, Miranda had dragged her back half-healed and in unbelievable pain, but alive.

Garrus! Where was Garrus? She'd found him … was back where she belonged. She tried to speak, tried to call for him, but a fine croaking sound was all that she could muster.

Then a strong, calloused grip encircled her hand, and a steel gray blur appeared next to her. "You're okay, Kahri. It was a long surgery, but they deactivated the chip." Talons brushed her cheek with the gentlest of touches, calming her frantic heartbeat. "They'll let you go back to sleep in a second, and when you wake up, you'll be back to normal."

He nuzzled her cheek, mouth plates gentle and comforting. "Go back to sleep. Nihlus and I are right here."

"She should drift back off now," Chakwas said from somewhere above. "Things are looking very … ."

You would have to be half mad to dream this up.

We're all mad here.

Still later ...

Strong arms wrapped behind her back and under her thighs, cradling her tight against an angular body. Shrouded in softness and warmth, she melted into the comfort and safety of those arms, her whole body deliciously heavy and loose. She smiled as the faint sounds of traffic and hushed conversation drifted into the stillness, wrapping her in a beautiful, familiar cocoon … one she hadn't experienced in a long time.

"We're just about there," Garrus whispered, his breath soft on her face. How did he always manage to smell like autumn and cloves? "Go back to sleep."

Instead, Shepard opened her eyes. Darkness filled the car, bodies in the other seats, hushed in the soft glow of the control panel and the lights flickering past. Eyes slipping closed, she curled into her lover's arms. "It went okay?"

Garrus kissed the top of her head. "It went better than they expected. You might have a limp and a bit of dizziness for a few days, but when the swelling goes down, you'll be one hundred percent." He let out a long sigh. "Go back to sleep. We'll be at my parent's home in a half hour."

Shepard smiled and nodded then glanced toward the front seat. "Hello, sir."

Herros chuckled, the warm rumble so very much like his son's. "Good to see you again, Captain."

Shepard leaned up to kiss Garrus's mandible and snuggled back in. "This is my favourite place in the galaxy." Another yawn cracked her jaw then the rabbit leaped up and yanked her back down the hole.

42 Days ASR

Cool air, damp with rain, curled past Shepard's nose, teasing her with the sweet scents of rich earth, succulent plant life, and flowers. She took a deep breath. Oh, the flowers! Spicy with a honey tang, like clover in late June, it danced with a feminine, exotic perfume. The scent reached down inside her, whispering softly of romance and a more amorous sort of love as it curled deep into her belly. A gentle smile eased across her face as she filled her lungs with its magic and stretched out, purring like a fat, happy cat as silky-soft covers caressed her from head to toe.

Nothing better than waking up in a cozy bed on a rainy morning.

Lifting her head off her poofy, cylindrical pillow, she looked around the room. A peaceful sort of watery, blue-gray light trickled in through a large window that curved to follow the winged shape of the wall. Even though the room was foreign, she definitely recognized the gangly turian featured in holos on the walls and scattered on shelves.

Shepard sat up and crossed her legs, grinning as she took in her Callor's history. Shelves of hideth turram trophies, academic awards, datapads, action figures—action figures! She resisted the urge to squeal a little … barely—covered two walls. Art spread across the other walls and squeezed into every spare space. Sweet baby Jesus, the art!

Heart beating hard and steady, Shepard climbed out of bed and walked over to the closest, her hands lifting to her mouth. Awe battled with disbelief. Her Callor had drawn or painted all of them? A smile blossomed behind her fingers. Of course he had. The combination of that eye, that perception, and that big, gorgeous heart … how could he not be an artist? She reached out to run reverent fingers along the edge of a painting, her heart aching with a quiet joy at witnessing that hidden piece of her love.

From simple sketches to lush landscapes and portraits painted in pigments of all types, the walls exploded with a beauty and talent that would have made her mother light-headed. She stopped in front of a piece done in charcoal or something similar. Herros and a young turian, Solana, she presumed, sat hunched over a game, their expressions riveted and priceless. Herros was winning, that was clear from the arch of his neck and the cocky set to his shoulders. Solana looked ticked off and determined to kick his butt.

"Oh, Garrus," she whispered, "you beautiful genius. What the hell were you doing in C-Sec?"

After another moment, she turned to walk over to the window, testing her limbs as she went. Her balance felt a little unsteady, and her left leg kept threatening to give at the knee. Considering they'd shot a laser into her brain, she couldn't really complain. No, definitely more profound gratitude than complaints. Garrus and the docs had freed her from chains she hadn't even known enslaved her.

She looked out through the rain-spattered glass but her view of the grounds below were obscured by a huge canopy. Oh well, she supposed the only way to discover what hid beneath it was to head down and see. She turned back to the room, spotting her kit at the end of the bed, but no sign of a note of anything to tell her where Garrus had gone.

Unsure about the protocol of waking up alone in an unfamiliar turian household, she opted for getting dressed and seeing if she could find Garrus. Hopefully wandering the house wasn't incredibly rude.

She dressed quickly, but then sat on the side of the bed for a few minutes, basking in the wonderful sense of peace. The Cerberus station had felt like a giant venus fly trap. The Ypres still felt like enemy territory. Omega felt grimy and revolting. Nowhere she'd been since she woke up had just felt like … well, like a home.

Pushing up, she walked to the door and opened it, peeking out. A hallway curved toward a set of stairs. Probably a good place to start. Or it would be, if she didn't have to pee quite so badly. Bathroom first. She cringed slightly and turned away from the stairs, hoping for an open door. Were turian toilets different from human ones? Accidentally peeing in a closet might not be the best way to meet her boyfriend's mother.

She found the washroom, and even managed to figure out how to work the facilities, but winced as the plumbing shattered the quiet, introducing her to the household. Guess what everyone? Shepard's up and peeing! Good morning, Vakarian household!

Tiptoeing, she made her way to the stairs, and then down into a huge, beautiful room. A massive earthwork fireplace stood in the center, a sitting room on one side, what looked like a kitchen on the other.

"Good morning," a soft, flanged voice said, drawing Shepard's attention to a chair in front of a set of open glass doors at the back of the house.

"Hello," Shepard replied, creeping forward a little. She smiled at the frail but elegant tarin dwarfed by a heavy mantle of blankets. "I hope it's okay that I just came down."

The female turian turned, the movement appearing to cause her pain that didn't show in her gentle smile, the expression as lovely and welcoming as the home. "Of course, maribellas. Come and sit with me. Garrus and Nihlus are sparring, but I see far more asperta going on out there than actual sparring." A thin, trembling arm appeared out from under the blankets, pointing to a chair. "Please, come and sit, Jane. I've been looking forward to meeting you for … well, for two cycles." The tarin smiled, a soft flutter of mandibles. "May I call you Jane?"

Shepard wiped her palms down the front of her trousers, and hurried over. "Oh, of course. Yes, sure, Jane is fine." She offered her hand to the female, wincing at her social clumsiness. Good lord, you'd swear she'd been raised by wolves. "Sorry, please forgive my manners."

"There is nothing to forgive. Welcomed as family, enter our dwelling, and take your ease." Garrus's mother gripped Shepard's wrist, the dry contact stronger than the captain would have guessed. It and the tarin's kind, open expression settled her nerves instantly.

"Please sit. We can get to know one another while they play." She smiled, dark, brilliant blue eyes sparkling. "I'm Garrus and Nihlus's mari, by the way. My name is Treana, but my friends call me Trea." Again, that graceful sweep of mandibles. "I'd be honoured if you felt comfortable to use the more familiar form."
An army of unquiet ants marched up and down (Shepard's) spine as she followed Trea's stare out to the two fools out in the garden. Stripped to the waist, Garrus and Nihlus wrapped around one another, both trying to pull the other's legs out from under him. It looked as though they were trying to throw one another into the pond. When their battle endangered a flower bed, they disengaged to hop over it, then set into one another again.

Buratrum - The realm of the spirits of dishonourable association.

Dilan - fiancee

Dilekmarim - Beloved mother

Diume - My joy. A term of love specific to family.

Puer - Pueri plural. Child.

Quirte - Applies to both genders equally. The equivalent of Mister or Miss, Mrs.

SARL - Standard Alliance Readiness Level. 1 is highest, prepared for imminent attack. 10 is lowest.

Sorau dulca - Sweet sister. A term of affection between females of any social tier, but particularly mother/daughter, sisters, aunt/niece, grandmother/granddaughter.

42 Days ASR

"I'd be glad to call you Trea, thank you." Shepard perched on the edge of the chair and looked away from Garrus's mari to glance around the kitchen area. Earthen walls, like cob houses on Earth, the colour of coffee with a splash of cream circled the main floor, arching upward like wings as they approached the outside of the house. A mosaic of flowers and leaves rolled in loose waves amidst the warm brown, bits of glass, metal, and wood seeming to tumble in the wind. Small almost-birds—merillien, like Nihlus's childhood pet—gleamed, pearlescent jewels amidst the glorious, cacophonous beauty.

Shepard took a deep breath. A wonderful, light sort of loving happiness whispered from the walls; the dark, well oiled and loved furnishings; and the mementos of the family that hung or stood everywhere. It embraced her, murmuring assurances that despite looking the part of the odd person out, she belonged: a home. After drifting for so long, sitting on that chair felt like being the very proverbial square peg. She choked back the urge to run back upstairs and wait for Garrus.

>You do belong here. Those two idiots in the yard mean that you belong. Breath.<n
"Your domin is so beautiful," she said, turning to face Garrus's mother. "I woke up feeling like … ." Letting the words drift off, she uttered a soft huff at her inability to put what she felt into words.
"It's been so long since …," she tried again, then cut herself off, one shoulder lifting in a small shrug. "I guess what I'm trying to say is thank you for inviting me into your home."

"It's our pleasure, sorau dulca." The tarin inclined her head toward the warriors battling away in the garden, a loving smile greeting their antics. "A domin is a reflection of the family it shelters, and you have greatly enriched this family. That makes you as much a part of it as the rest of us."

Unsure if such a generous welcome made her more or less comfortable, Shepard forced herself to settle back into the armchair. An army of unquiet ants marched up and down her spine as she followed Trea's stare out to the two fools out in the garden. Stripped to the waist, Garrus and Nihlus wrapped around one another, both trying to pull the other's legs out from under him. It looked as though they were trying to throw one another into the pond. When their battle endangered a flower bed, they disengaged to hop over it, then set into one another again.

"How did this begin?" Shepard asked, turning an incredulous smile to Trea.

A thoughtful frown drew the tarin's brow plates low over her eyes, but like her smile, a sharp but loving sort of teasing prowled beneath it. "I believe it started with Nihlus trying to shove Garrus into the pond." A quick nod confirmed the validity of her words. Her mandibles fluttered. "Then Garrus taunted Nihlus, calling him old and frail. Nihlus called Garrus young and empty-headed, and behold the results." A trembling hand broke through the blankets, sweeping out to present the filthy, scuffling, cussing evidence.

"They're ten," Shepard said, her grin widening as Trea hummed her agreement. "But look at them. She shook her head and let out a long breath, muscles relaxing a little. "They're happy and having fun. Can't ask for more than that."

"As a matrula, it becomes all you hope for. All the rest of your ambitions and dreams for your children eventually distill down to wishing them more moments of joy than sorrow." She peeled back the top layer of blankets, struggling a little against the heavy layers. A sharp chuff and grumble betrayed her frustration as the blankets fought back. "I swear Herros believes he can cook me back to health."

"May I?" Shepard asked, leaning forward. "Just let me know how many layers you want to keep."

"One is quite sufficient. It's a cool morning, but not one likely to cause a chill." Trea let out a sigh of relief when Shepard lifted away most of the blankets. "Thank you, that's much less crushing and incinerating." Her mandibles flicked hard, but her annoyance cooled before it reached her eyes. "My bond-mate is a wonderful torin, but he forgets that my illness does not erase that I am turian. The stronger and more vicious the enemy you put in front of us, the harder and more unrelenting we fight." A crooked smile accompanied her cocked brow plate. "I'm still the tarin who battled her way through a drug den with a round embedded in her lung."

Understanding Trea's issue completely, Shepard draped the ten kilos of blankets over the back of her chair. "So Garrus comes by his overprotectiveness naturally, then?"

"Most definitely." Trea's mandibles softened to match her eyes. "Born to test my patience to its limit." She ducked her head; a small shrug. "Still, I'm glad that my Betru grew into that sort of torin."

Glancing outside to make sure Garrus and Nihlus wouldn't overhear her, Shepard whispered, "I'd never admit it to him, even under torture, but I do sort of like it when he takes care of me. Sometimes." She looked down at the tarin's nearly empty mug. "Not to toss our relationship immediately in the direction we were just grousing about, but may I warm up your amarcerus for Trea nodded, a single, abrupt incline of her head. "Thank you. There's a pot in the warmer. Top door on the caman."

Shepard picked up the mug, taking it to the basin to rinse it out before refilling it. "Garrus drinks this stuff like it's going to run out. Nihlus not so much." Moving through that kitchen, it struck her again how right and comfortable it felt, and how much she stuck out in relief. Sort of like the depth perception portion of the Alliance physical. She'd spent a half hour poking whichever object or fish appeared to be 3D.

One of these things is not like the others? Pft. Don't fool yourself, Janey. You're exactly like these others.

She ran her fingertips over the counter top. A scene of drellaks grazing in a mountain meadow had been carved into the blue-black wood, and then inlaid with different metals and woods to give it a rich, three dimensional beauty. It looked old, and not antique store old, but generations upon generations old. Old in the way that would have her mother turning inside out over someone making tea on it.

"Jane?"

Shepard tore herself from the work of art to meet Trea's curious gaze. "Sorry, I was admiring the countertop. It's beautiful." Her fingers returned to skate over the thick, lustrous lacquer once more before she forced herself back on task. "Do you take your amarceru straight, or do you add the sweet, flowery-smelling powder?"

"Straight. Only Garrus adds rylamia sugar. Bad habit, along with drinking so much amarceru. He picked it up in the military—my fault, really." She lifted herself in her chair, the passing grimace that accompanied her movement much lighter without the blankets. "Ah, being able to move is wonderful, thank you. I can breathe," Trea said, her keen, measuring gaze following Shepard across the room.

"You're welcome." Shepard set the steaming mug down on the table. Sinking back into the silky, rose-beige fabric of her chair, she looked outside. Garrus had Nihlus pinned and mercilessly teased him, jabbing him here and there, while Nihlus spouted ridiculous threats involving some truly imaginative body part rearrangement. Laughing bright and happy, Shepard allowed some of the tension to drain out of her body. "God, it's good to see them just play. I didn't even know they could after everything." She cleared her throat, ducking a shoulder as if she could just tip her death off her back and let it roll away. "I mean, with all the burdens they carry."

As Trea lifted her mug to drink, Shepard frowned, remembering what the tarin had said. "How is it your fault that Garrus caught his amarceru with sugar habit from the military?"

His mari took a couple of sips, then set the cup down, the ceramic rattling against the table top. As Trea looked out the door at her sons, her body softened a little under the chunky cream and gold weave of the blanket. "His former CO and I grew up as sisters. She's a talented and caring leader, very popular with her crew. She's a talented and caring leader, very popular with her crew. I knew she'd look after him, so I pulled a few strings."

Shepard choked back her surprise that Garrus's mother had influenced his first posting, feeling a combination of affection and embarrassment, the latter for Garrus, and she wondered if he suspected.

Something of her surprise must have registered, because Trea's shoulders rose a little. "I know I shouldn't have interfered, but I worried for him. Not the fighting; he possessed impressive skills, and I knew he could take care of himself." A soft, musical sigh whistled through her nose. "As a youngster, he spent his time in virtual solitude, preferring to draw and read or take things apart and put them back together rather than associating with his peers. The military can prove merciless to loners: the rigor of it requires the support of a strong peer group."

She paused and smiled, the piercing stare that met Shepard's revealing a strength and intellect that all but nullified her frailty. "Anyway, Lanara can't be without a mug of amarceru within arm's reach," Trea continued, "and it needs to contain enough rylamia sugar that it tastes like hot, flowery syrup." A brief grimace melted into a fond smile. "Terrible stuff, but her entire crew ended up addicted to the effects. First time Garrus came home on leave, he was so strung out on the combination of stimulant and sugar, he practically vibrated."

Shepard watched the expressions and emotions drift across the tarin's face, greeting them with a soft smile before looking back out. Disengaged and resting, Garrus and Nihlus sat side by side on the ground, watching the rain pour down the blue-green leaves of a towering plant, the water channeled along gleaming silver veins. Whatever they were talking about, both looked relaxed, their smiles easy and broad.

"He's an amazing leader," Shepard said, awe shaping the words. "I haven't had much time to watch him work since I got back, but the way his people respond to him tells me everything." She looked over at Trea as the remembered darkness and horror of being trapped beneath that building on Feros darkened the rain-drenched air. "When I think back to our first days on the Normandy—the hothead who ran off after Saren, getting us buried under that building—I'm tempted to say that I had no idea, but it would be a lie. Down there, in the dark, I asked him to take up the fight if I fell, so I saw it."

Trea lifted her amarceru off the side table, but instead of drinking, she rolled the squarish mug between her hands, an old habit judging by the absent nature of the motion. "He brought Nihlus home a few weeks after your death, and I could barely believe that torin—the general—was my pahir." She smiled and shrugged. "I hadn't seen him in a couple of cycles outside of vidcalls, but suddenly, there he was, the torin I'd always seen inside my mind when my awkward little Betru grew up."

Shepard nodded and swallowed a sudden tightness in her throat. She'd never thought much about being a parent. Never thought about what it must be like to bear all that hope and fear, to pour all that love and discipline and encouragement into a child, imagining the end result. And suddenly, she wondered if she would ever experience the moment of looking into the eyes of her grown child to see someone remarkable there.

Pushing that ridiculousness aside, she nodded in response to what Trea said. "He has the strongest, most wonderful heart." "Who does?" Garrus asked from the doorway. Hands braced against the frame, he leaned through, his eyes sparkling with happiness. He met Shepard's gaze, a teasing smile sending his mandibles fluttering high and wide. "You must be talking about me."

"Clearly," Nihlus said, nearly tossing Garrus on his backside as he shoved past, "she was talking about me. Your delusions are starting to concern me, General." He grinned at Shepard, then walked over to Trea, cradling the tarin's hand in both of his. "I see you convinced someone to let you out of your blanket cage." He bent to brush his brow against his mari's.

Shepard shook her head as she watched Nihlus and Trea. The oath of karifratus clearly extended beyond Garrus and Nihlus. A fiery, joyful warmth flared in her chest. Thank goodness for blessings both great and small. He needed family, people who loved him the way his mother hadn't been able to.

Trea grinned, a cocky sort of victory arching her neck and straightening her back. "At last, the spirits have sent me an ally against the forces of overprotectiveness." She lifted her hand, patting his cheek with enough force to emphasize her point. "You two side with your pari far too often."

Nihlus touched brows again, then drew back. "If you weren't so determined to push yourself, we wouldn't need to." He turned away from his mari, stepping over to nuzzle the top of Shepard's head. "Good morning, haksaya kubenar."

Shepard gripped his hand. "You look rested."

The Spectre grinned as he shrugged and walked past to take a large cup off a shelf and pour himself some water. "Kicking Garrus around doesn't take any great amount of energy or effort."

Shepard watched Garrus as he boyfrined chuffed and bent to touch his brow to his mother's before lifting her talons to nuzzle them. "As for you, dilekmarim, since Sol sides with Pari as well, you might want to consider that we can't all be wrong." He grinned when his mari chuffed, then leaned down to rest his brow against hers. "You can't blame us for wanting to keep you."

"I can blame you for coddling me until it's more painful than my actual ailment," his mother retorted. "If Jane hadn't rescued me, I'd be flattened and cooked into a krellin wafer." Trea grinned at her son and tipped her head toward Shepard. "Quit fussing over me, and go say good morning to your dilan."

As Shepard watched the unspoken currents running between mother and son, the shape and colour of their history burst through the space, the sun coming out from behind heavy cloud. Why had Garrus stayed away for so long, waiting until illness threatened to take her before reconnecting? Then Garrus crouched between Shepard's knees, distracting her from her thoughts as he looked into her eyes and gently raked his talons through her hair. "Good morning. I didn't think you'd be up yet. How are you holding up?"

A smile and nod answered his question. "I'm a little wobbly but considering the last couple of days," she said, leaning into his hand, "I've never been better." Despite her entire body insisting that she kiss him, she waited for Garrus to initiate contact. She really needed to study up on turian customs. Out on the Normandy or Omega, they made up their own rules quite well, but the last few minutes crystalised the fact that she was a part of a turian family. Alienating them amounted to the last thing she wanted to do.

But then he leaned in, nuzzling her lips in a soft, chaste kiss. "You look good. Happy."

Taking his face between her hands, she touched her brow to his. "I am happy." A soft sigh escaped as she closed her eyes. "You two looked like you were having fun out there."

"Someone has to keep the Spectre from getting too cocky." Garrus chuckled when Nihlus made a choking sort of retching noise. "We're going to go for a run, so I can humiliate him again. When we get back, we'll make some breakfast." He pulled back and frowned. "Are you okay entertaining Mari until then?"

Shepard nodded, but then cocked an eyebrow at him. "You're going for a run? The both of you?" Her second eyebrow joined the first. "Running? Really?" She glanced over her shoulder at Nihlus. "Quirte Lazy-Pants is going to run without anything chasing him?"
Nihlus polished off a second glass of water and shrugged. "Don't often get a chance to breathe non recycled air and feel ground beneath my feet. Don't worry, we won't be long." His mandibles spread as he straightened, standing a little taller. "Garrus won't make the bottom of the street."

Garrus caressed the side of Shepard's face, pulling her attention back to him. His stare fixed behind her, shooting darts at his fratrin for a moment before returning to her eyes. "We'll be a half hour at the most, and not because I'll be the one quitting." He kissed her, then stood and strode over to get a drink.

The sub-vocals beneath Nihlus's rough laughter brushed the back of her neck, warming it. He belonged there, was loved there. A chill splinter pierced the warmth, sliding a steel pin into her resolve. If she wasn't careful, she could blow apart everything Nihlus had just discovered.

Garrus gave the Spectre a push toward the door. "Come on, let's go. I'm getting hungry." He turned back before stepping out the front door. "See you two in a few minutes."

Shepard glanced over at Trea. "I feel like I've just been handed a case full of stolen eezo and the cops are about to burst through the door." She chuckled and levelled a narrow-eyed stare on the tarin. "So, tell me, are my instincts correct? Is this a set up?"

A bright chuckle answered her. "They couldn't have been much more graceless or obvious about it." Her mandibles flicked hard and quick. "Their lack of subtlety alarms me considering their professions." Shifting in her chair, she winced, her entire body stiffening, one arm clenching tight around her stomach for a moment. Then she relaxed and shrugged. "But, they mean well, and torins in love … well, they behave in peculiar ways."

Shepard nodded, staying loose and wary. "That's universal and gender inclusive." She canted her head a little, a wave of dizziness tilting the world on its ear. "But—"

Trea lifted a talon for the barest of seconds, the slight gesture asking for Shepard's indulgence. The captain smiled and nodded, more than willing to give it. The peace and wisdom in Trea Vakarian's eyes, the combination of an honourable warrior's gentle strength and stubborn grace reached deep into Shepard's gut, settling it. She sighed and chuckled softly under her breath.

"Damn, you already love her."

"They want me to tell you about my family." She smiled and reached up to pull her blanket a little tighter, but shook her head before Shepard could ask whether she wanted another. "My mari and her best friend, Rhian, went into the military together. They swore karifratrus after their first real battle. My mari took a serious wound and came close to death. Neither of them had family—my mari's parents died the year she went to the academy, and Rhian's patrem had also passed—and so they swore the oath, making one another their family."

Shepard sat quietly as Trea paused to drink some of her amarcera, curious to hear what the tarin had to say. Even though she'd been a child, and likely sheltered from some of the stickier aspects of the relationship, Trea had lived eyeball deep in karifratrus.

"As best friends often do, Mari and Rhian met another set of best friends. My pari and Lanara's patrem had been on the same crew from their first day. When the four of them eventually became bond-mates, the two torins swore karifratrus as well." She sipped, almost absently, her eyes staring out into the rain.

Shepard followed the tarin's example, more than willing to wait for Trea to continue. Mist wafted from the ground, lending the world an ethereal quality, everything beyond the garden a world of muted shadows. She smiled. A gorgeous morning. If not recovering from brain surgery, she might have gone running with Garrus and Nihlus just to feel the wind and rain on her face. She inhaled, the cool moisture clinging around her nostrils. Quickly swiping at the tickle, she closed her eyes. As a child, how many mornings had she spent lying in bed, listening to the rain on the roof? That morning, the rain didn't make any sound on the roof, even over the single storey of the common area, but the drops drummed thick and fat on the canvas spread over the yard.

Trea rumbled a little, clearing her throat before she continued. "Our parents were the best of friends, fratrin and filitrin in truth. Lenara and I spent our first few cycles living next door to one another, but when her pari died, her family moved in with ours."

Shepard opened her eyes and looked over at the tarin, trying to iron out the confused frown furrowing her brow and drawing her eyebrows down tight over her eyes. "You all lived together?"

Trea nodded, her manner solid and stiff as she turned to meet Shepard's gaze. "I grew up with two maris and a pari. They loved and remained devoted to each other until my mari's death. Rhian and my pari still live in our home. When Mari died, myself and my brother, Lenara and her sisters—my brother and sisters—all inherited her legacy equally."

She paused, a soft-edged frown dropping her brow plates and mandibles as she leaned forward, her elbows on the arms of her chair. "Sorau dulca, when it comes to families joined by karifratus, there is no mine or yours, there is ours." Slowly, the frown transformed into a smile, the tarin’s blue eyes shining. "It is a selfless, beautiful promise that cannot be broken. The oath of bonding—marriage in human culture—can be and is dissolved all the time; families joined by blood fall out, that bond left behind; karifratus cannot be dissolved or left behind. Ever. It is a family created by choice and honour rather than blood and accident, a decision and responsibility to place another ahead of yourself."

"Until and beyond death," Shepard whispered, melting a little further into her chair.

"Yes." Trea reached out her hand, a surprisingly strong grip closing around Shepard's fingers. "They will never tell you that you must be bonded with them both." She shook her head. "That's not the way it works for bond-mates, but you needn't worry about hurting one by loving both. The hurt only comes if there is a lack of equality." The grip on Shepard's fingers tightened for a moment. "And what I've seen doesn't worry me for either of my pahirs."

Despite nodding, a thin-lipped smile of thanks quickly dissolved into something far more pressed and pinched. She gripped Trea's stare as tightly as her hand as she tried to put her dread into words. "I don't know if I've got that much love … energy … hope?" Then it didn't matter, the words vanishing as she caught something in her peripherals.

Movement in the yard.

Shepard released Trea's hand and jumped up, peering out into the misty downpour. A shadow slunk amidst the plants. "Trea." The alarm at the base of Shepard's skull began to wail, and a thin trickle of tar-black whispered between her neurons. "Is there a back entrance to the garden?" Her hand slapped at her hip for a sidearm she wasn't wearing.

The shadow solidified into a turian. At least it looked like a turian until it came within three metres of the glass doors. Blue lights glowed in place of eyes and up its misshapen brow. Metal clad most of the thing's head and encased its torso in strips. Every turian aspect of the creature had been warped, made vicious, sharp, and tangled: a mockery of the torin it had once been.

"Dear God—" Fear flared, but then before her heart could send it pouring out into her muscles, an incendiary combination of training and rage sent it up in flames. How dare they come at her there?

That's the shape of the coming war, Janey. No honour, no taboos, just death from every quarter.

"T … t … th … th … eh … eh … eh … eh … ay … ay … ay ay ay," the thing stuttered, it's voice a combination of dual larynges and machine chatter.

Trea lunged from her chair, a pistol appearing in her hand. Steadyng her gun hand with her other, the tarin strode toward the Reaper, unleashing a barrage of three shot volleys. The construct let out another garbled, mechanical burst of sound or language and crumpled.

Had the Reaper been trying to communicate? Stunned, Shepard stared at it until Trea turned and reached out.

"Jane—" The tarin‘s strength gave way, her knees buckling, the gun clattering to the tile.

A single leap and Shepard’s arm snaked around Trea’s waist, keeping her from crumpling to the floor. Before she could inhale to speak, or turn to help the tarin into her chair, the front door burst open.

"The gun!"

Obeying that shout, Shepard swept a foot toward the pistol, releasing Trea just long enough to snatch it up. She lowered the tarin to the floor, landing next to her on one knee, the pistol already lined up at the open portal. Waiting until the forms at the door solidified into either friend or foe, she braced the gun with her second hand.

Lights where eyes should be.

Shepard opened fire, grateful for the antiquated weapon's lack of heat sinks. "Am I clear behind?" she called as the second invader fell. Breath slow and steady, heart thumping, adrenaline distilling the world down into action and keen edges, Shepard waited, her senses stretched out into the fog and rain.

"Clear," Trea replied. "Front?"

The silence dripped down, expectant crystals shattering on the floor. Shepard took a breath. "Clear for the moment." Looking down, she offered the tarin an arm to pull herself up, helping her lean back against the chair. The upholstery shone bright rose, almost blinding her as if she'd stared at a light too long. Blinking and giving her head a shake, Shepard asked, "Is there another gun down here?"

Trea stabbed a thumb toward the far side of the front room. "Top drawer on the right hand side of the shelving unit." Talons plucked the one from Shepard's hand. "Are these Reapers?" she asked, twisting to lift herself up onto a knee. Impatient talons pulled her blanket off the chair and tossed it aside.

"Looks that way." Snapping her head around, Shepard checked both entrances before she ducked low, and raced around the back side of the caman into the sitting room. Yanking open the top, right-hand drawer, she scooped out the Carnifex and handful of heat sinks. Before she could ask if they were still clear, gunfire erupted from the kitchen.

*Damn it! Way to go, Janey, leave the terminally ill tarin to fight on her own.*

Mechanical, dual-layered muttering announced incoming at the front door, ending her internal diatribe. Trea could more than hold her own. Shepard shoved the spare heat sinks into her pocket and aimed the gun at the threshold, slapping a heat sink into the pistol even as she lifted it. Lowering herself into a half crouch, she slipped back toward the kitchen, gun raised, feet skimming the floor. The ex-turian appeared in the doorway, no apparent weapon in its hands.

It stepped over the dead one and turned faced her, but stopped. It didn't reach for a weapon or lunge toward her, it just stared. The gelid, blue lights slid over her like clammy fingers inside her clothes. She bit down on her tongue, bringing a quick end to that nonsense. It was scanning her, not staring. That thing no longer possessed anything as benign as eyes. Nothing alive inhabited that muck and crust of steel, not anymore.

It was a puppet, an empty thing, and killing it amounted to a mercy.

As she centered the Carnifex on the cluster of lights, a chattering, stuttering sound came out of the dark hole between the creature's mandibles. Shepard froze. What the hell?

"Th … they … they they s … s … strike f … f … from ben … n … neath the … the … the wings." It didn't move as the words stuttered from its mouth. Not a twitch.

One second stretched into a long, breathless second as her brain struggled to string together the sounds. As two seconds ticked over into three, Shepard shook off the shock and opened fire. Two headshots sent the husk sprawling, the back of it's head flying outside onto the step.

Shepard gave herself another, strong shake and kept the pistol aimed at the doorway. What the hell was going on? Talking husks? Why hadn't they come in firing? And what in the name of the sweet baby Jesus had that one said to her?

They strike from beneath the wings?

What it said made no more sense than it talking in the first place. The Reapers on Thessia had attacked, rather than chatting. Well … . She pulled back on the reins. If the Collectors on Thessia had truly wanted her dead—at least at the beginning—they could have sent two or three of the banshees and overwhelmed them easily enough. She and Nihlus had been cattle herded into a corral. Why? To study them? Get them in the machine? Or something else? Something bigger that required them making another attempt?

If so, that meant what? Indoctrination? That thought stabbed a rusty, metal fence post into her guts, giving it a hard twist. That made an evil sort of sense. Indoctrinate the leaders of the resistance, eliminate it completely. Worse, make the Reapers' work a whole lot easier. Saren had set a convincing example; they might just want more of him.

Trea's weapon fell silent, grabbing hold of the threads of Shepard's tangled thoughts and yanking them loose. Shepard opened her mouth to call out, get proof of life, but then clamped it shut. The last thing she needed to do was alert a whole pile of the monsters to her location.

Establishing a straight eye line on the front door, she saw a shadow run in from the street. Breath whistling between clenched teeth, heart calming, she let her gun drop a few degrees toward the floor. She'd recognize that silhouette anywhere.

"Trea, Garrus and Nihlus incoming. Front door," she said, throwing the words over her shoulder.

"Roger that." The tarin's 'squad voice' tugged at one corner of Shepard's mouth. No such thing as an ex-soldier.

Garrus paused for half a heartbeat at the threshold before holstering his sidearm and leaping over the dead Reapers and running the few steps to her. Grasping her upper arms, he pulled her into a frantic embrace, then shoved her away just as suddenly. Shaking talons traced the line of her jaw.
"We heard the gunfire from down the street. Are you all right?"

A quick nod and smile answered his question before Shepard looked past him to the Spectre.
"Nihlus, see to Trea." When his face froze, she shook her head. "She's fine, just took out a couple of Reapers, in fact." Focusing on her torin, Shepard nodded toward the door. "Four reaperized turians. I don't know if there are any more."

"Okay, I'll be right back." Garrus looked over her shoulder into the other room. Mari, you okay?"

Shepard turned to look at Trea when the tarin chuckled. "Surely you're joking, Betru. Ambushed by monsters from the pits ... I haven't been better in a cycle." Taking Nihlus's arm, she allowed her pahir to help her off the floor and into the chair. "Thank you, diume." Gentle slaps warded off his hands as he tried to check her for injury. "Jane guarded me well. You two should check the neighbourhood, make sure there were only four."

A quick kiss brushed Shepard's lips, then Garrus pulled his sidearm. "I'll circle front and right, Nihlus," he called as he stepped outside.

"Roger that." Shepard heard the back door close and lock a fraction of a second before the front one locked. Despite knowing that a locked door didn't mean much against Reapers, that little bit of security helped ease the alarm in her head from SARL 1 to SARL 3.

Shepard trained her weapon on the door, forcing herself to stay vigilant. "I've got the front covered, Trea." She backed toward the kitchen, slipping behind the caman, using the large hearth as cover.
"Now that the forces of overprotectiveness are out of earshot, how are you doing?"

Trea chuckled, the bright, bell-like laugh killing Shepard's concern and breaking up the chill enough for the caman's heat to penetrate, warming her right side. She couldn't help but grin when Trea let out a contented sigh and said, "I can't believe I let myself forget what it felt like to get that rush, to drop into that easy, automatic reflex place inside my head where everything is muscle memory and training." Shepard heard the chair whisper, fabric against fabric. "I've got a bruise or two, but I feel like I could take on an army of those things."

A warm, surprised laugh rolled from Shepard's gut, adrenaline sharpening its edge. "Blessed Enkindlers, let's hope that doesn't happen. I haven't had any breakfast." As Trea's laughter mingled with hers, the last of the threat rose to dissipate against the ceiling.

Garrus and Nihlus returned a few minutes later. Before they spoke, the two torins hung their sidearms on their hips and locked down the doors. Shepard watched them, a pale sadness replacing the tight twist in her guts. Vigilance and worry hung heavily from their cowls, the lightness and playfulness of moments before evaporated like the mist. Damn Reapers couldn't let them have a single day.

"I didn't see any more of them, and scans registered nothing." Garrus closed on Shepard, pulling her into his arms before she could even hang up the gun. "You're all right? No more damage than usual?" When she grinned and shook her head, he nuzzled the top of her head, rubbed her back, and released her, snapping back to all business. "Okay. Pari and Sol are on their way home. Adrien Victus is coming with Pari. I don't want to leave the domin unguarded."

Shepard resisted the urge to follow him, to cling to his strength, as he stepped away. The adrenaline leached from her blood, the vacuum filled with dizziness and trembling. Chakwas probably wouldn't have recommended combat for the morning after brain surgery. Oh well, such was the shape of her life. She turned to face Trea, to make sure the tarin had come through as unscathed as it appeared. Her knee gave, forcing her to slap a hand against the caman to avoid falling.

Garrus must have caught the motion in his peripherals, because he spun, reaching out a hand to steady her. Shepard smiled and shook it off.

"I'm fine, love, the adrenaline is just wearing off." Shepard nodded toward the dead invaders. "They didn't fire, at least none of the ones I saw did." Raised eyebrows queried Trea, the tarin shaking her head, solidifying Shepard's observation. Taking a deep breath, Shepard braced herself for their reactions to the crazy. "And here's the really weird part: two of them talked." She ducked her head and lifted a hand, waggling it in a little weighing gesture. "Well, one didn't really talk, it just stuttered a little, but the other got out an entire sentence before I put the front of its head through the back."

Nihlus looked down at the corpse closest to the door. "They've never done that before. What did it say?" He met her gaze, curiosity and alarm trading places in a rotating loop behind the brilliant green.

"They strike from beneath the wings." Shepard stepped around the chair and moved to sit, stopping when, in her peripherals, she saw all three of them stiffen. She looked up, still half bent over, one hand reaching for the chair's arm. "What? I take it that line makes perfect sense to all of you?" The look on their faces set her heart racing. What was it? A combination of bone-deep terror and realization, as if some part of them had been waiting to hear those words. She straightened.

Nihlus nodded toward the chair. "Sit down, kubenar, you're trembling." He took a step toward her.

Shepard shook off his assistance. "I'm fine, Nihlus. What is it about that line that has you all looking so spooked?"

Garrus's brow plates hunkered down over his eyes, so low she could barely make out blue glints. "It's a very old tale." Still not meeting her stare, he strode across the floor and picked up his mari's blanket. He shook it out and folded it as he returned to drape it around her shoulders. "I told you about the famactylus the night we met Thane Krios." He glanced over at her, brow plates lifting until she nodded that she remembered. "That line is from the last of a series of stories about the creatures."

Outside, thunder rumbled, the sky growing darker, the clouds pressing down to steal all but a watery glimmer of daylight. A flash lit up the room: dry-bone white. As Garrus and Nihlus spun toward the lightning, Shepard gasped, sour and poisonous. For those few brief flares, death painted over the faces of the torins she loved, searing away life to leave hollow-eyed sockets and desolate ridges of bone.

Shepard shuddered as she lowered herself onto the edge of her chair, her gut twisting around the old fence post again. It all felt like a warning … all of it, provoking a baseless sort of floating panic that turned a legion of ants loose under her skin. Give her something real and simple to fill full of bullets, and forget the mysterious bullshit.

What the hell was she supposed to make of unarmed Reaper constructs spouting ancient turian folk tales instead of trying to kill her? She sank into the back of the chair and slumped forward, the heel of her hand pressing into her brow as her elbow impacted her thigh. The pointy joint hit one of her wounds sent a bracing, almost welcome jolt of pain sizzling along her nerves. She leaned into it, using the pain as a ground.
"How did it know to say that line?" she whispered. "What the hel … " She glanced over at Trea. "... eck is going on here? It's all just mind games and endless layers of weird crap piled on more weird crap."

Garrus sucked in a loud, noisy breath as if declaring the conversation decided, then blew it out. "We aren't going to find out here or from these Reapers. That's a question for live Reapers or hacked computers."

Shepard looked up, anchoring herself in the general's absolute decisiveness. The roles they'd fill during the coming war began to reveal themselves. Garrus definitely had the 'final decision, let's get the plans moving' hat firmly fixed upon his head.

"What do we do with these things?" Nihlus asked. He walked over to the closest one and nudged it with his toe. "We should take them back to Archangel." Crouching he opened his omnitool and swept it over the grotesque. "We didn't get a chance to even scan the asari husks. We could learn a lot from actual specimens."

Shepard let out a thin chuckle as she pulled her elbow out of her thigh and sank into her chair. "You saw Mordin's reaction to that little bug-drone thing. I thought he was having some sort of seizure. If we hand him a Reaper, he might just explode from excitement." Then, sobering, she nodded, but the corner of her mouth drew back in a grimace. "Yeah, we need to take these in for research, but the fact they didn't come in firing worries me. We need to check them over completely for any transmitters, bugs … anything that could prove a security risk."

Garrus crouched next to one of the bodies. "You're thinking they were supposed to be killed and taken back to base?" He looked up at Nihlus. "Go, take a shower and get dressed. I'll stay down here, lend our warriors what small support I can." As he said the last, he cocked a brow plate at his mari, and Shepard suspected that if he'd been human, he would have stuck out his tongue.

"Yeah, all right." Nihlus bent over Trea to touch brows then took her shoulders in a gentle, but solid, no-nonsense grip. "Next time, save me a couple."

Affectionate laughter accompanied a firm shove as Trea replied, "You know I won't. Get upstairs and shower." When he reached the bottom of the stairs, she glanced toward him. "And turn on some lights before you go, diume."

Nihlus gave her a jaunty salute. "Aye, aye, Major."

Trea let out a long-suffering sigh, but winked as she met Shepard's gaze. Appearing as vital and strong as she had frail an hour before, the tarin settled firmly and comfortably into Shepard's heart, taking residence there along with her sons.

"They're just one long, brutal nightmare," Garrus muttered.

Shepard turned to watch her general roll one of the Reapers over onto its back. Her wince matched Garrus's at the horrendous intertwining of flesh and metal, the perversion of the monster's original form even more grisly in the light. Shepard choked down the foul expletive that tried to sneak from between her lips and swallowed hard. Every single thing she saw of the Reapers and their creations just compounded her resolve to kill every last one of them. Beings so dedicated to horror and anguish deserved no mercy beyond a barrage of bullets culminating in a swift death. After seeing things like the banshees and these turian-things, how was she supposed to care about their existential angst. Oh poor Reapers, they don't have a soul. Big fucking whoop-dee-shit.

"I don't want these things stinking up my breakfast," Garrus said. He grabbed the monstrosity's arm and hauled it out under the canopy. Once he'd lined up all four in the yard, he called Mordin to bring a squad and pick them up.

"They can check them for any security risks in the Passch's lab," he said when he turned back and saw her watching him. He opened his mouth again, but before he could say anything, Nihlus thumped down the stairs.

"I'll start making breakfast," the Spectre said, announcing his plan as if it deserved applause. He ducked his head a little when his eyes met Shepard's. "Sorry, but we brought pre-prepared for you rather than risk killing you."

She laughed. "You never have to apologize for not killing me." She looked up as Garrus stepped in front of her, his hand held out. Gazing into his eyes, she saw his need to discuss things over with her, so nodded and wrapped her fingers around his talons before addressing Nihlus again. "So long as it isn't eggs benedict," she said. "Pus-like drool all over my eggs . . . ." Punctuating the sentence with violent gagging, she felt pretty good about having gotten her point across as she let Garrus pull her from her chair.

Glancing back, she saw the Spectre eyeballing the container with her breakfast. "Pus? Humans eat that?" He set the container down, an exquisitely satisfying expression of revulsion on his face. Shoving it away with from him with the point of a talon, he muttered, "That's disgusting."

Trea caught Shepard's free hand in hers, squeezing the captain's fingers. "We've fought and killed side by side." The tarin's face glowed with an almost effervescent smile. "Family cemented through life and death and blood." She tugged on Shepard's hand, pulling her down to touch brows. "You're most joyously welcomed, diume."

Shepard swallowed a lump of grateful tears. "Thank you." An embarrassed flush burned up her neck, but she couldn't think of any way to articulate the depth of what she felt, so stayed with silence.

"Could I get my dilan back?" Garrus asked, smartass crackling through his tone.

Trea laughed and released Shepard's hand. "You may." She squeezed Garrus's hand, then nodded toward the stairs. "Go get cleaned up."

Garrus led Shepard to the stairs, tugging her up behind him and then into his old bedroom rather than releasing her hand. She lagged back a bit, savouring the connection and the way he coaxed her along.

"We shouldn't have left you and Mari alone even for a few minutes," Garrus said the moment she shut his bedroom door behind them. He spun and pulled her into an almost frantic embrace. "I just never imagined that the damned Reapers would come here."

Shepard wrapped her arms around him and turned her face into his neck. "Hey, hero, don't know if you noticed, but your women-folk took the invaders out handily, and would've even if they hadn't been unarmed." Wincing, she drew back when she kissed his throat and a piece of the soft moss-like turf from the yard stuck to the end of her tongue. "Oh, that is so gross." She plucked it out from between her lips. "Go shower, you muck monster. I'll still be here, and we can talk everything through once you're clean."

He glanced toward the door as if expecting legions of the enemy to burst through, and Shepard chuckled, love beating away all the dread and weird, creepy crap floating around in her head.
A loving hand caressed the length of his good mandible. "Go. You need to get clean. Your mari and Nihlus have the downstairs covered, and I'll stand guard at the bathroom door, make sure no monsters try to pull a peeping Reaper." She grinned wide at the closed dialect curse that he grumbled at her. "Why, General Vakarian … I know what you just said, sir, and I'm shocked! Shocked and dismayed, sir."

"You are a pain in my … ." Soft laughter rolled under his words as he swept her up and kissed her. "All right, I'll be out in a few minutes." After setting her down, he nodded toward the shelves. "Try not to break my stuff."

They strike from beneath the wings, puer.

They strike from beneath the wings.

And when their feet tread upon good, sweet ground,

The land shall crack, and heave, and burn.

They strike from beneath the wings, puer.

When the gods of Buratrum return.
"But if one day, you ask me to choose, I'll never forgive you for what it'll do to Nihlus. I'll love you always, but he doesn't deserve to have his heart broken again." She shook her head, a chill curl of fear twining through the chambers of her rapidly beating heart. "I don't know what it'll do to him. I don't even know if he'd survive it. His whole life has been loss and betrayal … being used by the people he loves. I won't do that to him."

Perir - Peririn plural. Male turian under the age of 15

42 Days ASR

Fifteen minutes passed before Garrus walked back through his bedroom door, entering so abruptly that he startled Shepard mid-battle as Tiny-Blue-Armour-Turian took on Tiny-Gold-Armour-Turian.

"I need to bring in Archangel guards for the house," he announced, leaving her no doubt as to what he'd been thinking about in the shower. "Maybe Melanis can suggest a couple of commandos for inside during the day when Pari and Sol are away."

Shepard looked over her shoulder at him, the action figures still clutched in her hands. "No! Blessed Enkindlers, love, no." A flush searing its way up her neck at being caught in the act, she set the little turian warriors back on the shelf, then turned. A single stride closed the distance, and she took Garrus's hands in hers. "You can't lock Trea up here behind a wall of guards, Garrus." The fear and confusion in his eyes pulled her in, her heart swelling inside her chest until her ribs strangled it. Releasing one hand, she reached up to press her palm against his mandible. "Guards, yes … on your whole family, but keep them as invisible as possible."

Garrus backed away from her until he ran into the side of his bed. She didn't follow, letting him gather his space. She'd suggested he place his ill mari at risk, that would take him some time and distance to wrap his head around.

Garrus's frown deepened until his eyes all but disappeared into the shadow of his brow plates. "What do we do to protect her during the day? Have Pari take her to work? Sol?"

How deeply he cared and how openly he loved filled her with both adoration and fear. How could he come through a war as brutal as they were facing without shattering into a thousand pieces? She swallowed the fear and gave her head a hard shake of denial. She wouldn't let that happen. If his role proved to be Final Decision Man, she could take up the mantle of Hard Decision / Sacrifice Woman. She could weather the hits and would do so gladly to prevent his suffering those wounds.

"No," he said, "she's not strong enough." Giving his head a violent shake, he spun and paced to the window, looking out into the rain. Heels of his hands pressed into the sill, he leaned toward the glass. "She's terminal barring any miracles." He sighed, the long, brittle sound painted across the window in silver fog. "I'll bring in squads from Omega—"

"No, Garrus." Shepard followed him, turning him to face her. "Love, did you see her down there?" The pain in his eyes—already mourning a mother he'd yet to lose—set her own prickling with tears. Still, she smiled, a tight press of lips, and cradled his face between her hands. "She was amazing down there, Garrus. Sure, she couldn't stand for long, but I was still staring at the thing when she just whipped a gun out of her chair cushions and blew it away. She's a fighter, Garrus, she can't just sit around and watch the world from a prison of blankets and tea."

Shepard sighed and stroked the arch of his neck with gentle, flat palms. "If you were in her position, Garrus, what would you want?"

He leaned down to press his brow to the top of her head. "It's not that easy, Kahri." He relaxed down into her a little more as she slipped her arms around his neck. "She has violent mood swings, and sometimes she has trouble remembering things. The last time we visited, I found her sorting a cupboard over and over, crying because she couldn't make herself stop." Pulling away, he slid his hands up her arms until he clasped her fingers in his talons. He tugged her over to the side of the bed and sat, gathering her in against him. "Yes, she's proud and determined to be independent, but she's just not able."

Shepard turned in the circle of his arms to sit in his lap and snuggled in against him, one hand stroking the plates on his chest. "What is she passionate about?" She met his gaze, pouring all the love and empathy she felt into hers.

"Helping people," he said after a moment. "She left external forces for a posting with internal because she couldn't stand the impersonal brutality of combat." A long sigh whistled through his nose. "She always wanted to be in shoulder-deep, fighting for civilians. She said that soldiers could take care of themselves, it was the bakers and the teachers who needed someone watching out for them."

Shepard nodded and tucked her head in under his chin, rubbing her cheek against the smooth hide at the base of his throat. "Sounds like someone we could use to help prepare the civilians for the war."

He hummed a soft agreement, but just tipped his head to rest against the top of hers for long moments. "You're right," he said at last, letting out a sigh so deeply rooted that it sounded as though it drew blood. "We'll lose her that much faster if we treat her like an invalid. She'll withdraw and wither faster than the disease takes her."

That time, Shepard just hummed her agreement, leaving it to him to decide what to do. As passionately as she might feel about Trea being allowed to live out her days according to her own wishes, it wasn't her place to interfere.

Garrus rumbled a little and rested his chin on her head. "Maybe, if she had an assistant to do the public work—she hates public speaking and politics … someone to run interference when she's not stable … she could help organize evacuation routes and shelters."

Shepard pulled away to meet his eyes, heart still feeling too big and held captive by her ribcage, but glad to see some of the pain in his stare replaced by purpose and hope. "That sounds like something she could pour all that caged passion and energy into, and if she's working with your pari, he'll be able to make sure she isn't wearing herself out." She leaned in and kissed him. "I know it won't be easy to let her go out there, Callor, but seeing her happy and productive will ease it a little, I hope."
Garrus kissed her back, then pulled her in tight. "She's always been so strong." He chuffed softly. "Strong, but never tough … never hard. She's always the one taking care of everybody else. I thought it would be decades before I had to start looking after her."

"It sounds like this apple didn't fall far from the tree," she replied, her voice soft. "We'll protect them the best we can, Garrus, and we'll … " She pulled away and smiled up into his eyes. "... yes … we'll, look after her." A soft sigh drifted between them. "But I think you've got the right idea. She needs to live strong and proud and happy for as long as she can. She sounds like she's spent her entire life earning that right."

He kissed her. "Go on, get up off my legs, impossible woman." Garrus laughed and lifted her off his lap, his hands gentle, his grip light and playful. "As if you didn't lead me down that path by the hand. Go play with my toys some more; I need to get dressed. Pari and Adrien should be arriving any minute."

Barely keeping a grip on a wicked, teasing grin, Shepard strolled over to his collection and held up the two action figures she'd been playing with. "These two are very cute." An exaggerated weighing gesture pushed one toward him and drew one back, then swapped places, back and forth. "Which one did little Garrus want to be when he grew up?" Laughter beat at the backs of her teeth, almost breaking loose when he glared at her.

He turned back to his duffel, sorting through until he pulled out a tunic and leggings. "A couple of those are collector's items." He tossed the clothing on the bed and crossed his arms. "They're going to be worth credits one day."

Shepard swallowed another wave of laughter, and narrowed her eyes into a sultry, come hither stare. "You're so sexy to me right now, you big, spikey nerd."

He tossed his tunic at her. "Stop. You didn't have toys when you were a child?" He shook the leggings out and slipped them on.

She set the figures back where she'd gotten them. "I did. My Johnny West horses were my favourite. Gorgeous, strangely marked horses whose ears and tails broke off if you looked at them wrong." She let out a soft sigh and threw him back his tunic. "And, hey, General, I wasn't just teasing. The more I discover about you, the sexier you get."

He finished dressing, rolling his shoulders to settle the cowl of his tunic, then sat on the side of the bed, facing her. "Come back and sit with me?" he asked, reaching out a hand.

Shepard closed her fingers around his talons just long enough to give them a squeeze, but then shook her head and turned back to his shelves. "I think better on my feet and without you trying to wear me down with your wiles."

"Wiles?" He chuffed, mandibles spreading and neck arching as he held out his arms out. "Why would I have to use wiles when I can just use my rakishly good looking sex appeal?"

"Is that what they're calling … " One hand gestured toward him, sizing him up. "... whatever that is?" A soft smile tugged at the corner of her mouth. Damn but she loved him. She lifted another turian soldier off the shelf, looking it over without really seeing it. All the things Trea had said tumbled around in her head. Damn them all for teasing her with the hope that it could work.

"How did your talk with Mari go?" he asked after a second.

Shepard let out a half-snort, half-cough. "Is that what you call that blatant set up?" She walked the small, intricately detailed toy along the edge of the shelf. "And it went fine. She told me about her parents."

Garrus let out a breath loud enough to have been a sigh. She glanced back at him, but said nothing. "Do you love me?" he asked after a few seconds. He stood and walked a step toward her, a wall of gentle but solid demand. No teasing or lightness coloured his words, just the need for her to stop dancing around and denying the issue.

"You know I—" Shepard cut herself off and shook her head. Damn, she had to stop doing that. He didn't need the buck passed back to him. Not after everything. Meeting his ice-blue stare, she nodded. "Yes, I'm completely in love with you, Garrus. My heart is yours."

"And Nihlus?" A hand pushing her back into the wall, the pressure behind his stare grew heavier and heavier. "Do you love Nihlus?"

For a moment, the lie of continued denial sat on the end of her tongue. She even opened her mouth to turn it loose before she saw the slight slump through his shoulders, the minute dip in his mandibles. Damn. He deserved the truth, and so did Nihlus. She lifted a hand, but it stalled halfway to his chest.

"Yes." The word came out as a whisper that bordered on a sigh of relief. "Yes, I love him. I—I'm in love with him."

"Thank you." He closed on her until her hand pressed against his stomach. "He needs you." Garrus reached up to cover her hand in both of his. "I think you know how much. He looks good since you came back, but he's still drinking." He squeezed her hand. "He's fragile enough that the slightest thing could shatter him."

Shepard stared at Garrus for long moments, her eyes focused on where his throat flowed into his keel. Her heart raced fast and hard, pounding in the hollow between her clavicula. She didn't disagree with him about Nihlus. The Spectre needed her, and he needed Garrus as well. He needed something he could put complete faith in, faith that was never broken. The three of them, if it held—if the forces of human nature (or turian nature as the case might be) didn't shatter them all into a million pieces—could be that thing.

"If you do this," she said, speaking before she even realized she intended to, making a decision somewhere in her gut that the rest of her wasn't ready to accept. "If you open this door and lead us through, I want you to know something." She looked up, meeting his eyes, tears trickling from the corners of hers. "It's you, Garrus. Do you understand that? It will always be you." She waited to see that he understood before she continued. He nodded, and she drew a deep breath.

Damn, are you really considering the idea of two lovers, two mates … husbands?

"But if one day, you ask me to choose, I'll never forgive you for what it'll do to Nihlus. I'll love you always, but he doesn't deserve to have his heart broken again." She shook her head, a chill curl of fear twining through the chambers of her rapidly beating heart. "I don't know what it'll do to him. I don't even know if he'd survive it. His whole life has been loss and betrayal … being used by the people he loves. I won't do that to him."

Apparently, more than considering it.

Garrus met her stare for long seconds, each one stretching into eternity, as she tried to isolate and identify the emotions shining at her from the depths of his gaze. Love, definitely, but also something that looked too much like awe for her comfort, and … joy. Yes, so much joy that she couldn't help but match his smile as his mandibles spread and fluttered. And then he pulled her hard into his side, his mouth hungry and possessive against hers. His mandibles pulled in tight, allowing him enough suction to draw her bottom lip between his mouth plates, tongue caressing before nudging against it softly, backing off to ask rather than demand.

She wrapped her arms around his neck, pressing into him hard enough that the edges of his plates hurt where they crossed her wounds. Mouth open, panting softly, she returned the kiss. Slow and passionate, it deepened until it felt as though they made love despite the clothes between them.

Pulling back just enough to untangle his tongue from hers, Garrus whispered. "You're the bravest person I've ever known." Brushing his nose against hers, he closed his eyes. "And you have the biggest heart." Then, as she pulled back just enough to focus on his face, he frowned a little, brow plates plunging toward his nose. "I love you, Kahri, and I love Nihlus. He's my fratrin, and I'll never ask you to hurt him." He leaned down, his brow brushing hers. "It's always you too, you know. I can't imagine trying to live without you again." Caressing her lips with his mouth, he let out a long sigh. "Before that day in that alley, I never really worried about losing you. Since you came back, this fear is a nightmare I can't wake up from."

Shepard turned her face into his neck, hating that she could say nothing to offer any solace. All those pretty promises amounted to a pile of lies. None of them could promise tomorrow let alone a lifetime. "We're all at risk," she said at last, "but I promise to fight like hell to come back to you, Garrus. Always." She clung to him for long moments, just savouring the safe harbour of his arms. But then voices drifted up from downstairs, easing her from his embrace. "Sounds like your pari is home."

Pulling away, she kissed him, then turned to walk to the door. "Come on, let's go make sure Nihlus isn't burning down the house." At the threshold, she turned back. "I mean it, Vakarian. It's always you."

He smiled, his eyes shining as he nodded. "And it's always you, Kahri."

The voices from downstairs ramped up to yelling. Shepard met Garrus's sudden, worried frown for a half second, then opened the door and hurried to the stairs.

"Get them out of here! I will not be held prisoner in my own domin, Herros!" All the serenity and joy in Trea's voice had vanished, replaced by a shrill, terrified rage. "Diume, please," Herros replied, his voice set to 'calm the crazy tarin down', not patronizing, but gentle enough to be guaranteed to piss his bond-mate off. "You're … ."

Something smashed. It sounded like Trea's mug slamming into the tile floor. "Don't start with that tone, Herros." Something larger crashed, then something else. "Don't tell me what I am. I know what I am." Another something, that one wood, hit the floor. "I protected myself! I protected our home! I do not need babysitters."

"Mari, please," a female voice said, the tone firm but caring, "sit. You know that you could have a seizure if you get upset."

Shepard ran down the last few stairs, stopping at the bottom. Nihlus remained at the stove. Herros and a tarin—Solana, she assumed—stood to Trea's either side, their hands held out. Four uniformed soldiers stood back a couple of metres looking as though they couldn't decide whether to keep out of it or take Trea down.

Even though Shepard was sure Herros and Sol were just trying to ease Trea back into the chair lying on its side behind her, their postures came off like they were trying to herd an angry cat into a cage. If it were her, approaching her like that would ensure they ended up sporting bruises that left them sitting funny for a couple of weeks.

She looked back at Garrus, leaving it to him as to how he wanted to handle the situation. Luckily, he seemed as upset by the drama playing out before them as Trea was. Stepping out where they could see him, he said, "I have no idea what flower that is, Kahri. That would be my mari's area of expertise." He glanced back, his stare begged Shepard to play along. He needn't have worried; she approved of his plan.

Looking to Trea, Shepard said, "I was telling Garrus about a scent that came in from the garden this morning." Ignoring the destruction and the turians ranged around the room, Shepard walked over to the tarin. "It's sweet, a little spicy, and well … frankly, it's just about the sexiest thing I've ever smelled."

Garrus shrugged. "I thought it might be the rylamia, but you know me, one flower is much the same as the next." He grinned and approached his mari as if nothing were going on, taking her hands. "Could you show Shepard around while we finish up breakfast?"

Shepard kept her face impassive. She knew Trea would smell the distraction a kilometre away, but she didn't have to add painful to the obvious. She slipped an arm around Garrus, every cell in her body adoring him so hard in the moment that she couldn't help but touch him. Now if only Trea hadn't gotten too wound up to allow him to distract her with something she loved. They needed to get her out of the line of fire and diffuse the situation so Garrus could deal with his father and sibling.

Trea looked back and forth between them for a moment, her eyes narrow and brow plates lowered with suspicion, but then she nodded. "That's the rylamia. It's blooming." She held out her arm. "I'd be honoured to show you around my little obsession, diume. I have plants grown from clippings passed down through more than ten generations." A genuine smile fluttered over her face. "When you and Garrus settle down somewhere, we can take clippings from them and plant them in your garden."

Her own home and a garden filled with tradition and love … . Shepard glanced up at Garrus, seeing the same combination of astonished realization and longing painted across his face as had set her heart thumping. She looked over at Nihlus, suddenly able to see his dream alive and waiting for them, just an arm's reach into the future. A soft smile of wonder answered the Spectre's inquisitive frown.

Shepard slipped her hand through Trea's elbow, gripping the tarin's forearm to help support her as they started toward the door to the yard. Time enough to explore her life's strange turns once the family was calm.

"I came by my obsession with plants honestly," Trea said. She chuckled, her demeanor relaxing a little as they stepped through the glass door into the yard. "Both of my maris loved to garden. When they bonded, they retired from the military and opened a nursery. By the time Rhian retired a couple of cycles ago, it had grown to cover more than five sections of land." She squeezed Shepard's arm. "One day, we'll take you out there. It's beautiful. Walking its paths feels like treading upon some wonderful, unexplored planet where plants from all over the galaxy landed and made themselves at home."

The tarin led Shepard into the back section of the garden, stopping at long lines of a low shrub covered in spiky little leaves and tiny white, star-shaped blossoms. The glorious fragrance wafted with the clouds of mist, enveloping Shepard in olfactory heaven. "This is the rylamia." Trea bent down and picked a petal off one of the flowers. "Chew on this, but don't swallow it, just in case."

Shepard lifted an eyebrow, but took the petal and did as she'd been told. A burst of sweet, flowery flavour exploded in her mouth. She'd never tasted anything like it, the closest being strong jasmine tea with a lot of honey. "Wow," she said removing the destroyed petal, "I can see how it's grown for sugar. It's gorgeous and super sweet." She moved to drop the petal, but then hesitated and stuck it in her pocket.

Trea led her toward the pond in the corner, the small body of water filled with colorful fish analogues, their heavily armoured scales gleamed, sleek rainbows slipping beneath the ripples. Huge plants surrounded the back side, draping over the water, while ground hugging ones populated the front.

"This is so beautifully designed and landscaped," Shepard said, searching for a natural progression for the conversation. "Did you do all this yourself?"

Trea smiled and nodded. "I did. It's been my third, now fourth, child. Evolving it over the cycles gave me respite from worrying about my work and my family." She took a long breath and leaned into Shepard's arm a little more heavily. "There is something in caring for the garden that just lets my brain relax into a wonderfully quiet place."

"I had a hobby like that once." Shepard let out a long breath as she realized that she hadn't even thought about her love of origami in years. Eden Prime had detonated a nuclear bomb in the middle of her old life, obliterating everything. Remembering her question to Nihlus about Cerberus hinting that she needed a hobby, she let out a thin snort. She used to leave little folded animals and flowers behind everywhere.

She shrugged as Trea turned a questioning gaze on her. "Seems like a lifetime ago, that's all." Chuffing low in her throat, she shook her head. "It was a lifetime ago." Softening the moment a little, she smiled. "Now, between your pahirs and saving the galaxy, my time is pretty much spoken for."

Trea nodded, but remained silent.

They walked along a stone pathway through the tall, silver-veined plants, Shepard glancing up at the canopy that covered both sections of the garden. "Why do you have a canopy over the garden?" she asked. "Wouldn't it be good for the plants to get natural water?"

Trea smiled brightly and shook her head. "The canopy is not for the plants, sorau dulca, it's for you." She laid her other hand over Shepard's, squeezing her fingers. "We didn't want you to have to remain inside or wear your armour out in the garden. The canopy is treated to block all solar radiation."

Shepard stopped, incredibly touched by that. She just stared into Trea's eyes, unable to form the words to say what she was feeling.

Trea smiled and patted Shepard's hand then gestured over at a couple of heavily padded loveseats tucked away in a corner near the doors into the house. "I was a young matrula, newly returned to Internal Forces when the Relay 314 Incident occurred." She settled into the generous embrace of the chair's cushions and pulled her blanket in snuggly around her neck.

"Had Garrus been older, I might have volunteered to return to service," she continued, a small shrug punctuating her words. Her mandibles lifted, the effect almost bashful as she smiled. "Not because I wanted to fight your people, but because I was curious about them."
Animation and light began to glow through her expressions and actions once more, the jerky stiffness vanishing as the last of her tension and anger dissolved. "Who were these newcomers who could fight toe to toe with turians? Not because their technology matched ours, but because their tenacity and spirit did." Her smile widened. "I knew that humanity, with all their bold and unquenchable curiosity, would rise quickly within the galactic community."

"We certainly haven't wasted any time," Shepard agreed as she sat, "but to some, it still never seems fast enough, our reach not broad or long enough." She felt a faint burn along the back of her neck as she imagined the concern and debates her return must be causing back at the Citadel and on Arcturus.

Tucking her fingers under her thighs, the captain leaned forward, feeling awkward and vulnerable as she admitted, "I was supposed to be the next step forward, the chance for the Alliance to prove that we could serve as Spectres." She rocked forward a touch, fighting the urge to leap up and pace. "Now look at me, shouting into the wind trying to get the galaxy to listen, and still, ninety-nine point nine percent of the galaxy hasn't even heard of Reapers."

Trea sank a little lower into the cushions, a graceful shrug tilting across her shoulders. "You'd be surprised, I think. While people aren't talking about it on the street, behind closed doors they're asking, what if? And they're frightened." The tarin shook her head, a tremor so slight it could have been a palsy. "By denying it so vehemently, the council is actually helping you along." Shifting in her chair, Trea leaned back and closed her eyes.

"Should we head in?" Shepard asked. The tarin's weariness came on with unsettling swiftness, leaving Shepard to wonder if Trea hadn't suffered a small, focal seizure during her upset.

"No." Trea smiled and hunkered down into her blanket. "I'm comfortable here." The piercing blue of her stare shone from beneath heavily-lidded eyes. "Thank you for your intercession earlier. I know they love me and that they mean the very best. I also know that they can't help worrying, but neither can I help how angry it makes me to be treated like an invalid, coddled and placated." She tugged her blanket around herself and lifted her feet up onto the seat. "I can't even stand the word ... invalid. As if your illness negates your validity as a person ... deleting the person you were before you fell sick."

Trea took a long breath, easing down into the cushions as her eyes drifted closed again. "But, thank you. Solana was correct. When I get upset, my chances of having a seizure are greatly increased." Her eyes blinked open as a shudder raced down her slight frame, the terror the seizures evoked clearly showing even in that split second.

Shepard leaned forward, pulling her fingers from beneath her thighs to rest her elbows on her knees. "Have I done the right thing encouraging Garrus to get you out and active in the resistance?" she asked. "Have I coaxed him into accelerating your illness?"

The tarin shook her head, her eyes remaining closed that time. "It will progress regardless. Perhaps exercising my mind will help it stave off neural death. Perhaps it won't." She yawned. "The day will dawn, however, when I am unable to control my muscles, when I suffer multiple seizures a day, when paranoia and memory loss steal my personality and my family." Her eyelids squeezed tight, as if she fought to keep from opening them, meeting Shepard's gaze and revealing the extent to which her future terrified her.

"I watched it steal my mari far too soon," she said, her voice so soft that the raindrops spattering against the canopy nearly drowned it out. "I would stay myself as long as I can."

A few moments of silence followed, the tarin's breathing revealing that she slipped into sleep.
"Kahri," Garrus called, appearing in the doorway. "Adrien's here, and he brought a guest." He stepped over a flowerbed to crouch next to his mother's seat. "She's sleeping?"

Shepard nodded, but held up a hand when he moved to pick his mari up. "She said she was comfortable there. Maybe just get another blanket so she doesn't chill?" She stood, picked up the small cushion from her seat, and eased it under the tarin's head. "If she's comfortable, we might as well let her enjoy the nap."

Garrus nodded and headed back inside, returning a moment later with a gorgeous, thick, handwoven blanket in his talons. Shepard watched him tuck it around his mari's thin form, the tenderness in his movements wrapping a tight hand around her throat.

When he hesitated, clearly unsure about leaving Trea to sleep in the cool and damp, Shepard reached out to stroke his fringe. "We'll keep an eye on her, Callor." She stood and pulled him up, wrapping her arms around his waist when he straightened. "You're a wonderful son."

He hugged her tight. "I wasted so much time, Kahri."

She nodded and looked up, meeting his eyes. "I know, but you're here now and doing the best you can for her." A soft smile answered his grumble. "I wish the galaxy got to see this side of turians more often. The whole war nerd reputation does you such an injustice."

His chuckle snapped like brittle twigs. "We work very hard to keep them from seeing this side. Any perceived weakness is a front to attack."

Shepard pulled away. "Weakness." A sharp cough of disdain barked from her throat. She slapped his chest. "This is your strength." Pulling free of his arms, she stepped around him, moving to hop over the flower bed, her legs not quite long enough to just step over. Before she made good her escape, a hand gripped her shoulder.

Chuckling again, this time with warmth, Garrus pulled her back into his arms. "All right, warrior goddess, I'm sorry." He nuzzled the top of her head. "You've always been my strength."

Only partially placated, Shepard pulled out of his arms, but took his hand. "Come on, let's get the business done while she sleeps." They took the long route around the flower bed to the door.

Shepard stepped over the threshold and looked toward the front door, stopping so suddenly that her toe squeaked over the tile.

Sweet baby Jesus, it's the turian Odd Couple.

Just inside the domin's front door, two torins spoke to Herros. One stood just over a hand shorter than Garrus, slight and agile-looking in light, Phantom armour. Sweeping, cream-coloured familia notas covered a silver face, and a bright, amber gaze turned to regard her when she started forward again.

The other torin was the largest Shepard had ever seen. He towered a good head above Garrus, and was broad to match: a veritable wall of richly clothed turian. Dark green familia notas gleamed against obsidian plates, and when he turned to face her, violet-blue eyes regarded her with suspicion and more than a little disdain. Sizing him up, Shepard knew two things instantly: she was about to meet Palaven's primarch, and she needed to find the old Shepard to deal with him.

She cast Garrus a quick, apologetic glance, fairly sure he'd have enough kittens before the primarch's visit ended that they'd need to open an animal shelter..
Herros turned and held out a hand to introduce them, but Fedorian just stepped forward into Shepard's space, looking down on her like a stalking panther.

"There's no need for pleasantries, Vakarian," the primarch said. "I know who they are." That gaze of iron and shackles turned on Garrus. "General Garrus Vakarian." Disdain oozed over Garrus's rank, dripping from it like tar sludge. "What authority granted you so august a rank?"

Tension pulled the air taut as Garrus straightened, hardening enough to have been chiselled from marble. "The only authority I recognize as having the power to grant it, Primarch: my troops."

Shepard covered a wide grin with a swipe of her hand, but the movement closed the jaws of Fedorian's stare on her. Ouch, more like a bear trap than shackles. She cocked an eyebrow at him. If he thought he could intimidate her with a stare, this was going to be a lot more fun than she'd first anticipated.

Bring it on, bad ass politician. Bring it on.

"Jane Shepard," he said, his tone saying that she'd already been measured and found wanting. "Former Spectre, Alliance captain, and corpse according to public record." He clasped his hands behind his back and arched his neck a little as he stepped closer, an avalanche poised over her.

Shepard turned her head to show the massive scar across the bottom third of her head. "Former corpse is accurate. I died sixteen months or so ago. I've had a pulse and viable neural activity again for less than a year." Meeting his stare, she cocked her head a little, posing a challenge but keeping it subtle.

He chuffed, and tilted his head so that he looked down his nose at her. "And I'm supposed to believe you returned from the dead?" Although Shepard couldn't understand his subvocals directly, the fury that flared through both Garrus and Nihlus translated the primarch's derision well enough.

She sliced the air between them with a razor-sharp laugh. "Believe whatever you like, Primarch. I don't really care. Your belief doesn't affect me in the slightest." Her shrug came off with an even keener edge than the laugh. She closed on him a little, but not enough to have to crane her neck. Damn, he was tall. "I'm not here to convince you of anything. In fact, I'm not here to convince anyone of anything. There simply isn't time, and my bones won't stand up to beating myself against the galaxy's determination to prove me wrong."

As if to prove her point, Shepard backed up a step. "I came here to visit my dilan's family and to meet with General Victus. If you're here, someone thinks you'll prove useful to me in the fight." She felt Garrus stiffen, but didn't acknowledge his discomfort. "If that's true, great, but this bus only has seats for useful people." She waggled her head a little. "If they possess a few points of open-minded IQ, that doesn't hurt either, but mostly I just need them to have a use."

She turned away and paced to the caman, staring into the glowing coals for a moment, not quite willing to push the envelope into backing up beeping sounds territory. She turned back, a little surprised to see that his aggression level hadn't risen in the slightest. Interesting. She'd thought he'd be easier to push. "If you want to believe that I faked my death, or that Reapers are just figments of my imagination, that's fine."

Fedorian seemed to grow, a shadow stretching up a wall, but at the same time some of the arrogance bled from his stare. "Only a great fool rejects anything out of hand," he said, his voice deep and stolid, tectonic plates ground alongside one another with less friction. "I am not a great fool, but neither will I allow wild, unsupported claims to terrify my people. If you have proof, offer it. If not ... " He shrugged, the gesture feeling like a landslide. "... you'll find I have no tolerance for ill-mannered grandstanding."

Damn, he's got your number, doesn't he?

Looking past the primarch, Shepard packed down the wide grin that struggled to spread across her face and strode over to the general standing in Fedorian's shadow. She cleared her throat before speaking. "General Victus, it's a pleasure to meet you." She reached out to grip his wrists. "I regretted that our paths didn't cross while you were on leave on Omega."

The general's mandibles flicked once, hard. He inclined his head, gracious but reserved. "As did I, Captain."

She tightened her grip for a second before releasing him and stepping back. "Thank you, so much for helping liberate my family and the other slaves. Are you recovering from the Collector ambush?"

He nodded, drawing himself taller and squaring his shoulders as if to deny any lingering weakness. Shepard nodded, understanding. Any weakness presented a front to attack. "Fit enough to ward off a squad of assassins that I'm certain were sent by either Collectors or the Reapers themselves."

Fedorian chuffed, but Shepard's gaze didn't leave Victus. She nodded toward the garden door. "Come have a look at what just broke in here." She led the way out into the garden, but kept back away from the turian husks. "Is that what came after you, General?" Despite speaking to Victus, Shepard kept her eyes fixed on Fedorian. Maybe, just maybe, she'd pinned down his game, and it wasn't one so different from her own. Come in, act the arrogant ass, get everyone's backs up and see what shook loose.

The expression of horror that ghosted across the primarch's face when he looked down at the turian husks gave her some hope that he might not prove completely impossible to convince of the threat. He covered it over almost immediately, but she could see him working the problem, his eyes narrow and shadowed, mandibles not held quite as high and tight.

"Yes," Victus answered. "Identical, and they were equipped with Phaestons." He turned to Shepard. "You faced asari husk constructs on Thessia?"

Shepard opened her omnitool and brought up the vid of the lowest chamber. "At least a hundred thousand strong—all held in stasis—and the machinery for performing the transformation. In a chamber above, we encountered another machine designed to break down and analyze lifeforms. The Collectors have spent the last fifty thousand years analyzing us and figuring out how best to turn us into nightmares." She played the vid of the possessed Collector, letting its words confirm that the Reapers were building armies to sweep over the homeworlds before a defense could be mounted.

Victus nodded, his expression telling her that she'd confirmed exactly what he'd been afraid of. "When I saw that the assassins had guns taken from our military … " A fierce rumbled rolled from his throat. He clenched his jaw and turned his back to the husks, a bulwark built of resolution and challenge rather than denial. "What that creature said confirms that the Collectors and Reapers are doing the same thing on Palaven: they're stealing our people and turning them into monsters."

At Shepard's nod, the general turned on his primarch. "The evidence is spread out before you, Fedorian." Suddenly the smaller torin's presence and command dwarfed the primarch's. "It's not a matter of believing myself, General Vakarian, or Captain Shepard. Turians do not allow such malignancy to fester beneath their own skin. We hunt it down and excise it with both expediency and prejudice."

Herros stepped forward, every bit the officer in charge. Shepard grinned. Damn she loved turians; walls of honourable stone, the entire lot of them.

The hierarch cleared his throat. "You and I have been friends since we were peririn, Fedorian. If nothing else, you know and trust me."

At the edge of her peripherals, Shepard saw Garrus stiffen, his hand lifting to his ear. Without saying anything, he turned and walked back into the domin, shutting the door behind him. Judging by the set of his shoulders and neck, she suspected that, whatever news he received was not good news. She turned back to the silent conversation taking place around her.

Fedorian's concern about the husks having appeared in two locations waged a subtle war across his face and through his posture, fighting with his obvious distaste for legitimizing the rabble rousing element. At last, he turned to Victus. "You believe these things are being created somewhere on Palaven?"

The turian general straightened to attention and nodded. "I do, Primarch."

"Then hunt them down and destroy them, General." He turned his back to Victus before he even finished speaking, as if to say that he still didn't believe a word that came out of their mouths, but he remained magnanimous enough to allow them to prove themselves.

Shepard pressed her lips tight to keep the smirk off her face, meeting his glare with one that sparked like a shorting power coupling.

Primarch Fedorian, you're an asshole. But ... you're my kind of asshole.

A curt nod dismissed her before the primarch stepped around the flowerbed, moving over to crouch next to Trea, speaking to the tarin in hushed, gentle tones. Seeing that the Vakarians and Fedorian possessed a deep, long-lived friendship gave Shepard hope for their ability to negotiate what they needed from the primarch over time. And, as much as she hated to use it, Trea's illness would be a soft spot they could press to prepare the planet for invasion.

"Captain?" Victus stepped between Shepard and her contemplation of shamelessly exploiting the Vakarian's friendship with the primarch. "Any information you gathered on Thessia could prove invaluable in my search."

"Absolutely. If you find a likely candidate and want some backup that has already fallen into the traps you're facing, let me know." She sent him all the scans, vid files, and logs. "We were lucky we dropped the mountain on that place before they started waking up the banshees." She stepped around him and gestured to the husks on the ground. "These didn't appear to have any biotic abilities like the asari husks, but the fact they use weapons concerns me. In addition, two of these spoke to Trea and I, which shows at least some capacity for higher mental function."

"Command and control?" he asked, whispering as if holding the question up for his own scrutiny rather than asking her. His eyes narrowed. "They spoke? What did they say?" The general crouched down next to the ex-turian corpses, looking them over as she explained about their earlier encounter.

Garrus returned from inside, the set of his face as grim as she'd ever seen it. When he stepped up beside her, she raised her eyebrows in a silent question. He answered with a tilt of his head that said he'd update her once fewer ears listened in.
"The husk recited from a myth?" Victus asked, pushing off his knees. He rolled his shoulders and tugged at the collar of his armour as he turned to face her. "Residual knowledge blurted out by some random neural firing?"

Shepard met his skepticism with a nod. She understood it. "We're playing with a theory that the protheans embedded clues—help to fight the Reapers—in the stories of our early people." Her brow furrowed as she saw something register behind the turian general's eyes. "Sir? Something about that ring a bell?"

His mandibles fluttered and dropped a little as he chuckled, a low rumble that sounded more embarrassed than anything. "A tale my mari told me as a child about a group of adventurers who found a temple dedicated to an ancient goddess. I don't recall most of it, just that the goddess helped defeat a great darkness, so our people swore a vow to maintain her temple in case the darkness returned." Sardonic amusement changed to a grim sort of determination, and he let out a long, heavy breath. "Well, my mari has been asking me to visit more often."

"Temple Palaven," Nihlus said, stepping out through the door, Solana following close on his heels. "Saren never told me what happened there, but I know he dropped it on top of Desolas and a whole lot of nothing good."

Solana stepped into their circle. Compared to the torins, Garrus's sister seemed small and slight, even in her armour, but she still towered over Shepard by a good thirty centimetres. "Those ruins are sealed off. It would take a mountain of paperwork for even the Hierarchy's most trusted to gain access to the exterior, and even then, they'd never get clearance to excavate." Her stormy sea-blue eyes pinned Shepard. "The likes of you four? Never happen. They'd arrest you for looking at the site from space."

The corner of Shepard's mouth drew back in a crooked grin as she nodded. "Probably just for thinking about it." She frowned and jutted her chin at Victus, seeing a thought pass across his face, an illuminating ray of light. "General?"

He cleared his throat, his brow plates angling toward his nose. "Temple Palaven is too recent for what I'm thinking. We're looking for something a great deal older." The general shifted to stand at ease despite there being nothing easy or relaxed about him. He looked to Nihlus. "You likely know more than I do about what happened, but judging by what I know, Desolas Arterius chose Temple Palaven because it was at the eye of a population center. Whatever he did there, it drew in thousands of people within hours. That's generally the sort of mistake made by the badly informed or over-eager."

Garrus chuffed. "That makes a sort of sense. Saren was indoctrinated slowly, completely." He looked down at Shepard a half shrug rolling across his shoulders, dropping in time with a rumbled sigh. "We've seen indoctrination take a lot of different turns. Maybe whatever started the process on Saren hit his brother with a much stronger dose and sent Desolas off on a campaign outside of the Reapers' timetable."

Shepard opened her mouth to agree, but didn't get a chance as Nihlus rumbled: low, dangerous, and deep in his throat. The sound raked talons down her back and sent a queasy sort of shudder through her guts as she heard the fragility Garrus had talked about creeping beneath it.

The Spectre stepped away from their little circle as he crossed his arms and leaned back on one hip. "I need to track the last couple of cycles of Saren's life. There have to be records or clues as to what happened during those years. He was far too methodical and regimented to leave nothing behind." He looked from one to the other, ending with Shepard. "I was headed to Illium anyway. It's time to pack up my apartment and move everything to Omega." He nodded as if that were decided. "No better place to start. Saren left a lot behind when he took off."

"Sounds like your path is decided for the next few days," Shepard agreed, despite not liking the thought of him out dealing with his past and Saren on his own. She needed to send someone with him, maybe a couple of someones. She could squeeze the protection detail in under the 'none of us should be doing anything on our own with the Collectors gunning for us' clause.

"We also have ours set out for us," Garrus said. He tipped his head toward the domin, reminding her of his earlier call. "Wrex received a call for help from a krogan warlord. The Collectors are attacking his base on Korlus." He shrugged. "Wrex will meet us at the spaceport in the morning."

Shepard just nodded. They could discuss the rest of the details later. She'd send word to Miranda, have the operative bring the Ypres to Korlus after dropping Thane off on Illium. Her jaw muscles clenched in a rictus as Shepard imagined Garrus's reaction to working with Miranda, but she wanted to keep an eye on as much of Cerberus as she could. Miranda was a tight link to the Illusive Man, one she couldn't afford to throw away in a temper tantrum, control chip or no. She'd deal with both of them eventually.

Victus smiled. "I'll make my dear old mari's week and go visit her. Not much makes her happier than telling her stories." The grin faded to a thoughtful frown, revealing the wheels whirring inside his skull. "I'll drag my eldest pahir along with me, just in case. None of us can afford to be overly open with information, but neither can we keep too tight a grip on it." She saw the reality of the battle against Collectors and Reapers appear, written in the shadows shuttering his stare.

Shepard looked up at Garrus, smiling as those ice-chip eyes met hers. He'd been her backup from the first. "Yes, we all need to make sure that whatever we discover makes it back to the group."

"And what about me?" Solana asked, spine rigid, talons clenched in preparation for a fight. Shepard neither blamed nor envied her. Team Overprotective proved a daunting foe. The tarin shook her head even as Garrus opened his mouth. "No! You told me I could come and work with Archangel weeks ago." A thin, furious pike, she leaned forward, digging in and setting herself to drive deep if refused. Glancing over at Nihlus, she threw her hands up. "Well? Say something. He listens to you."

"None of us should go anywhere alone," Shepard said, throwing herself into the path of the burgeoning family drama and praying she didn't get mowed down. "I'm going to have Thane meet Nihlus on Illium, but it certainly couldn't hurt to have another set of eyes watching his back." She speared the Spectre with a glare, warning him that he was in for a fight if he tried to go out alone. When Nihlus nodded, accepting his squad, Shepard turned her attention to Garrus.

Her love's entire body telegraphed his unease with the amount of risk his family faced. Her fingers twitched, itching to wrap around his talons, but theirs was hardly the audience for public displays of affection. After a moment, Garrus nodded, his neck moving like rusted iron.

"General Victus," Fedorian called as he strode past, heading for the door, "I'm prepared to leave."

Victus chuckled softly. "Good hunting to you all. I'll check in with Archangel as soon as I have any leads." He spun on his talons and followed after the primarch, but without any undue hurry.

Shepard slipped her hand into Garrus's once the front door closed behind their guests. "I suppose a family meeting is in order? Get all our ducks lined up before tomorrow morning?"

Garrus pulled her in tight against his side and wrapped his arm around her. "The universe seems determined to ensure that we never catch our breath." A long, grumbling sigh ruffled her hair as he bent down to nuzzle the top of her head. "It feels as though the last few flakes are landing on the edge of the avalanche, and it's about to let go of the mountainside."

Shepard shook her head, regret drifting through the grey morning, a slow, misty melancholy. "We're in it, now, Callor. It's all about skiing fast enough to keep ahead of disaster until the war's over. Then, we'll all retire to a private island somewhere and tell absolutely no one where we live." That thought brightened the gloom a little. Long mornings spent curled in bed, no one banging at their door. A little adventuring here and there, as the spirit and stir-craziness moved them. All the time in the galaxy to just be together.

She wrapped both arms around Garrus's waist and looked over at Nihlus. In the end, all that mattered was defeating the Reapers, putting the war behind them, and coming through with her torins at her side.

Solana clapped her hands together, a single, sharp sound that broke through Shepard's thoughts. A wide, cocky grin set her elegant mandibles fluttering as she looked to each of them, then nudged Nihlus in the ribs hard enough that he grunted. "Well, what are we waiting for, senux? Let's get this war started."

(A-N: The last snowflakes have fallen, the mountainside shudders, a low roar echoes through the silence. :) The villagers begin to shriek and run around, arms flailing! Ahhhhh! We're all going to diiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiieeee!

Thanks as always for reading. You lovely, amazing crazies who weigh in on the chapters … can't even express how much it means to me to hear from you. To the silent readers … so glad you're still there, still reading. Hopefully, still enjoying. All the love and hugs.)
She relaxed back into him. "The city is beautiful ... the lights look like strings of jewels up the cliffs and along the walls." A soft chuckle bounced from her throat, hollow and soft. "Nothing about your people has been what I expected."

Garrus's mouth plates pressed against the overheated and excited skin of her neck, his breath wrapping around around her, the slow, warm waters of an August stream. "If you build a wall, it tells the enemy that you intend to keep them out," he whispered. "If you make it beautiful, it tells them that you expect it to stand forever."

Mahir - daughter
Filiam - sister
Dilan - fiancee

42 Days ASR

Shepard clung to Garrus's side as Herros returned from seeing the primarch to his car. The hierarch laid a hand on their shoulders as he passed by them, striding over to where Trea sat on the loveseat, her blankets askew. The elder Vakarian gathered the blankets, then sat beside his bond-mate, wrapping one around Trea's shoulders, the other over both their laps.

Tears prickled the inner corner of Shepard's eyes as Herros gathered his wife in against his side, his mouth pressed against her temple. She couldn't even imagine facing the nightmare he lived with each day, watching his love of over forty cycles slip away a little at a time.

"Come on, let's get some food into us before Mordin gets here to pick up the husks," Garrus said, his voice rough with emotion. His arm tightened around her as he nuzzled the top of her head. "Wrex will be here at 0400, and I want to ship out as soon as we can get him aboard." Drawing her along with him, he took a step toward the door.

Shepard squeezed his waist, a gentle hug of understanding, but pulled away. "I'll be there in a minute. I need to call Miranda, have her drop Thane off and then head to Korlus." As she predicted, he twisted back to face her, poised to argue. She didn't give him a chance. "EDI can run scans and send them to the Passch so we're ready to deal with whatever the hell Wrex is getting us into." Stepping up against him, she reached up and pressed her palm against his cheek. "Trust me, please. I know Cerberus has a part to play in this war, and I'm terrified that it's as enemies, not allies. I need to keep an eye on them, and Miranda is the best way to do that."

The sound that came from his throat sounded a little like a tiger grunting and pulled a smile onto her lips. "You'll be with me the entire time. It'll be fine." She stabbed her chin toward the door. "Go ahead, I'll be five minutes."

He snagged her hand and pulled her into him, wrapping both arms around her. "Fine, I'm all for keeping your enemies close," he said, leaning down to rest his brow against hers, "but, if I feel they're a threat, I'll do whatever I have to, Kahri. This war … this general … needs you." He nuzzled her forehead, then released her and headed inside.

Shepard watched him go, then turned away from Herros and Trea, giving them their privacy. Wandering toward the back of the garden, she opened a channel to the Ypres, routing it to Kelly.

"Captain," the yeoman said, her voice containing enough edge to know that things had been tense aboard the Ypres since her departure. "I'm glad to hear from you. Are you all right? Miranda returned to the ship saying that the crew was no longer welcome at the Archangel base, and she didn't know if you'd be returning to the ship."

"I'm fine, Yeoman Chambers. I haven't abandoned the Ypres or her crew. Do I have any urgent messages?" Shepard scuffled her toes through the thick, mossy lawn, making her way between the beds of plants to crouch next to the rylamia bushes.

"No, ma'am. No messages," Kelly reported, the professional distance back in her voice. "However, the crew is concerned about you, and they're feeling really unsure about things right now." The yeoman cleared her throat, her discomfort with the subject transmitting clearly over the comms. "This crew is prepared to take on the Collectors and the Reapers, but we need our captain present and accounted for. Otherwise, we're rudderless and unfocused and that makes everyone nervous, Shepard, not just Miranda."

Shepard reached out, brushing her fingers over the bunches of silky petals. "Patch me through to Miranda, please, Yeoman Chambers."

"Yes, ma'am."

"Shepard," Miranda said, her tone clipped tighter than a newly shorn sheep.

"I need you to take the Ypres to Illium where you'll drop Thane Krios off and pick up any supplies you need before proceeding to Korlus in the Imir System." She paused, running the map in her head. Was that right? Yeah, that was right. "That's in the Eagle Nebula."

"I know where it is, Captain." The operative let out a slightly noisy breath. "When we still had a plan for fighting the Collectors as your crew, a krogan warlord, Okeer, was one of the dossiers we assembled for recruitment."

Shepard hummed, that information taking her by surprise. "Well then, that would be the krogan warlord we're on our way to rescue. He sent a message to Wrex asking for assistance." She stood and paced along the stone path without really seeing where she was going. "His base is under attack by the Collectors."

"The reason we considered recruiting him was his reputation for dealing with the Collectors," Miranda confirmed. "He's obsessed with what he calls, 'rendering the genophage impotent', and was rumoured to trade tank bred krogan to the Collectors in exchange for the means to do that."

Shepard winced, suddenly not at all sure Okeer was someone she wanted to save. "Send me the dossier," she ordered. "I want to know what we're walking into there." She glanced down as her omnitool signalled that the file had been received. Efficiency, its name was Miranda. "When you arrive at Korlus, go in with stealth systems active. Keep a weather eye for those Collector cruisers. If they're on scene, retreat and contact me. If they are not, have EDI run detailed scans of the area around the base. The entire planet is a nightmare of junk and mud. I want two routes mapped through that graveyard. We'll insert in two teams to provide cover for one another."
"Understood, Captain." Miranda went silent for a second. "May I ask why we're dropping off Sere Krios?"

"I need him for a personal mission and will send his orders directly to him," she replied, her tone coming off less neutral than she'd been aiming for. Of course, maybe that was for the best. Too little snark, Miranda would know something was off.

"Shepard! Your breakfast is turning into a fossil in here!" Nihlus hollered from the door.

She grinned and shook her head. "Let me know when you reach Illium, Operative Lawson. I'll be available via comms if any situations arise. Shepard, out." She closed the channel without waiting to see if Miranda had anything else to say. As she returned to the house, she prepared a message to send to Thane. She needed him to have his orders before Miranda went looking to rake him over the coals.

Solana met Shepard at the door, opening the portal to let her through. "Those two would probably never realize that they neglected to introduce us, so … . Hello, I'm Solana, Garrus and Nihlus's younger, better looking, smarter, and more talented filiam." She held out her hands, long elegant talons covered in gloves of finely woven polymer underlayer. "Thanks for earlier."

Shepard gripped the tarin's wrists. "I'm very pleased to finally meet you, Solana." She ducked her head a little. "As for earlier … within our first couple of weeks, Garrus chucked me over his shoulder like a sack of flour no fewer than four times. I know what you're up against."

"I only chucked you over my shoulder twice," the general called across the caman. "The other two times, I carried you … other ways."

Solana grinned and jerked her head toward the table. "Come eat, then after breakfast, you can try to beat me at a game of Armiliteria. There's no better way to get to know someone."

Following the tarin to the table, Shepard raised her eyebrows. "Armiliteria?" She caressed a hand down the inside of Garrus's arm as he pulled out a chair, seating her between he and Nihlus. She cast a teasing glare up at him. Incorrigible.

"It's a game of military strategy," Herros spoke up. The grin he levelled on his mahir snapped with both teasing and a sort of warning. "All turians learn to play very young. It's used to ascertain command style when considering cadets for officer training."

Shepard's eyebrows climbed even higher as she watched Sol sit across the table. "And what was your command style?"

"Opportunistic cheat," Herros supplied. "She was suspended for two weeks and recruited by Grey Division the minute she got back."

Garrus set Shepard's breakfast in front of her. "Grey Division is in charge of all the projects no one admits to."

Sol laughed, sharp but merry. "He's so dramatic. I teach hacking and espionage."

As everyone settled down to eat, the conversation turned to Trea's new position and their impending missions. After breakfast, Shepard and Sol sat down to play a game that ended up taking most of the day despite—or perhaps because of—a great deal of unwanted and unsolicited advice from the peanut gallery. In the end, over the course of battling Sol to a stalemate, Shepard spent the day filled with enough laughter and love that she almost forgot that the war waited outside the door, and at 0400 the next morning it would swallow her whole once more.
One of Palaven's moons hung heavy and bright, gleaming silver across the small, second-storey garden. Shepard leaned against the low wall and looked out over the city. Terraces of light marched down hundreds of metres of cliff face toward the business section that sprawled across the canyon floor.

She heard Garrus walk up behind her, his stare heating the back of her neck, his approach provocative, slow and deliberate. A smile bolted across her face, trapped as her teeth closed on her bottom lip. Footsteps too soft to be anything but bare talons whispered through the turf, and not a single sound of gritting ceramic or rustling fabric accompanied his movement.

"Which one is that?" she asked, jutting her chin toward the glowing orb hanging above the city. A flush burned up her neck at the breathiness of her voice and the tingle of excitement in her gut. It prompted reactions between her thighs she knew he wouldn't miss. He always knew what was going on with her body before she did. Her heart thumped hard and fast, beating what she thought might be a salsa beat against the inside of her ribs.

"Nanus." Damn, if his voice didn't sound as breathless as her own, "Menae won't rise for a couple of hours yet." His arms slipped around her, pulling her back against him. "It's almost as bright as daylight when they're both up and both full."

She relaxed back into him. "The city is beautiful … the lights look like strings of jewels up the cliffs and along the walls." A soft chuckle bounced from her throat, hollow and soft. "Nothing about your people has been what I expected."

Garrus's mouth plates pressed against the overheated and excited skin of her neck, his breath wrapping around around her, the slow, warm waters of an August stream. "If you build a wall, it tells the enemy that you intend to keep them out," he whispered. "If you make it beautiful, it tells them that you expect it to stand forever."

She smiled, her eyes rolling back a little as they closed. Reaching behind her, she ran her palm down the outside of his thigh, her skin slipping easily over the taut lines of naked muscle and smooth hide. "Why, General Vakarian, you're not wearing any clothes, sir. If I didn't know better, I might think you had untoward intentions."

He leaned in, nuzzling behind her ear and down her neck. "I have a hypothesis," he said, his voice deepening and taking on a throaty rumble she recognized. Oh, he had untoward intentions all right. Her teeth caught her bottom lip again as the talons of his right hand tugged at the hem of her shirt, freeing it from the waistband of her trousers.

"Oh? And what is that?" She laid her hands over his, her fingers lacing with his talons as he slipped them beneath her shirt. Her stomach muscles jumped and shuddered under his rough, calloused palms, the need in his touch sending every nerve into FTL.

"That your skin will glow nearly as silver as mine in this light." He nipped the curve of her neck, the points of his teeth teasing her skin into gooseflesh. "Care to find out?" Without waiting for an answer, he pushed her shirt up, exposing her trembling flesh to the cool air, the breeze still damp from the earlier storms.

"Do you think your family and neighbours want to be included in this experiment of yours?" She grinned, heat flaring over her skin and up her thighs even as her gut flipped at the thought of someone happening to look out.

His hands caressed her ribcage, thumbs teasing the underside of her breasts. "My family is all asleep, except for Nihlus who is in his room, watching something that involves a great many explosions." He nuzzled beneath her ear, the hard tip of his tongue flicking at her earlobe. "As for our neighbours, none of them can see up here." Gentle, but insistent, he raked the points of his front teeth along her jaw, pulling a soft moan from her lips. "One of the perks to all the houses being built into the cliff: front facing windows only."

"Well then … ." Taking a deep breath, Shepard slid her hands off his and grasped the hem of her t-shirt, pulling it up until his arms got in the way. He released his grip on her to lay his hands over hers, helping ease the cotton up and over her head. Gentle talons stroked over her shoulders and down her back as she pulled the shirt off her arms.

A gust of breeze twisted between the plants and curled around Shepard's limbs. She shivered a little and backed in against Garrus, absorbing his heat. Reaching around herself, she grasped his hands and wrapped his arms back around her. "So, how are those observations going?" she asked, twisting a little to look up into his eyes.

"Results so far seem to be supporting my theory, but further testing will be necessary to arrive at a solid conclusion." He took a single step back and turned her to face him. Reaching up, he traced the lines of her collar bones with his thumbs. "You are always the most beautiful thing I've ever seen. Each day reveals a new aspect to that beauty. Watching you with my mari and Sol today … ."

His breath caught, and he shook his head as if to clear it. His talons slipped along the underside of her arms, raising them out away from her sides. "In this light … ." His subvocals thrummed. "Just look at you. My tiny praela."

Eyes prickling with warmth, she reached up to take his face between her hands. "You're a hopeless romantic, Callor." Easing him down to kiss her, she wrapped her arms around his neck. "And I love that about you," she whispered against his mouth plates.

"I never was," he replied, brushing the rim of her lips with a feather-light touch. "I don't know what happened when you walked into Chloe Michel's clinic, but whatever it was, it rearranged every cell … every neuron." He pulled her in, light caresses turning into a heated, hungry kiss that lifted her off her feet.

When his one arm slid down to support her backside, Shepard wrapped her legs around his waist, his pelvis cradling her thighs. Their mouths speaking oaths of love and devotion that required no words, they clung to one another, two spots of light and warmth desperate to find solid, safe harbour in the darkness. He carried her to a long, low chaise against the back wall, breaking the kiss with a soft grumble of reluctance.

Shepard moaned soft and low, protesting as her lips followed him, soft, moist kisses tugging at the upper plate of his mouth.

"We'll never get you out of those trousers in this position, and I won't be able to conclude my observations," he whispered, his mouth wandering across her cheek to her ear. A long sigh whistled from his nostrils, tickling through the short, fine hair at the nape of her neck. It resonated heavily enough to send shivers down her spine. Tightening his grip on her, he sat on the edge of the chaise. "I want you to go talk to Nihlus," he whispered, his tone confessional. "I want you two to settle what you are and what you want to be before he goes to Illium."

Shepard drew back, releasing her grip on his neck and waist as she leaned back, confusion meeting the love and devotion staring back at her. "Garrus?"

He brushed a kiss against her lips. "Do you want him to head out there, to start dredging up all that hurt and betrayal without this anchor?"

Shepard sighed and relaxed into his embrace, melting against him. "No, of course I don't." She burrowed her face in against his neck, head cradled by his cowl. "This scares me, Callor. It scares the living hell out of me. I'm a screw up. Haven't you noticed that, yet? One wrong move and I could end up losing you both."

Those big, rough hands caressed her back, gentle over the healing wounds. "We swore an oath, Kahri." He cleared his throat. "Didn't we?"

"We never walk away," she whispered, kissing the spot where his pulse beat hard and fast, the arteries exposed just under the skin. She pressed her eyes closed, savouring the strong, gorgeous … aliveness … of him.

He nodded, his chin bumping her, his mandible sweeping through her hair. "We never walk away." Drawing back, he extricated himself from her embrace, gentle and loving. "That's what this is about." His mandibles swept a wide arc, his gaze faltering a little with bashfulness. "Right now … it's about making a promise." Looking up and meeting her gaze, he shrugged, a slight dip of his head. "Stand up, so I can get your clothes off?" The tips of his talons raked her neck then followed the hollow above her collarbone out to her shoulder, their edges sending a fiery, electric tickle arcing over her skin. "We have far too much material between us."

Shepard wriggled her way off his lap to stand between his thighs. Letting out a long breath, she placed her hands just inside his cowl, on either side of his keel. She stared into his eyes, her hands wandering a little, teasing the inside border of his cowl until a steady, almost purr-like rumble rolled in his throat. "A promise?" she asked at last, a tiny, crooked smile meeting his chorus of contentment and pleasure.

His hands wrapped around the balls of her shoulders, guiding her a step closer before they slipped down her arms to wrap her fingers in his, "Each night of the turian bonding ceremony the bonding couple perform a private, ritual bonding." A smile fluttered over his mandibles when her eyebrows raised at the words 'each night', the warmth and hope in it setting her heart fluttering as well. "Yes, a really good bonding party can run three or four days."

Another long sigh caressed her neck as he lifted her hands to his chest, pressing them against the warmth of his plates. "The daytime is about the clan, about bringing two families together to support the new couple and the family they're creating." His talons moved to the fasteners on her trousers, unsnapping and zipping, then laying the sides open, exposing the soft expanse of her lower belly. "The nighttime, however, is about the bond-mates sealing a promise between them. A promise sealed with words and oil, hands … " The backs of his talons brushed her belly with the softest of touches. "... and bodies."

Shepard leaned close, pressing her breasts against his chest as her arms snaked around his neck to tease the underside of his fringe. Thumbs slipping inside the waistband, he eased her trousers and panties off her hips. Talons spread, he cupped her backside, pulling her in tighter, pressing her against his body as if trying to meld her into his plates. The trousers slid down her thighs, his touch so warm on the backs of her legs that it almost burned. Then the material let go, falling to pool around her feet. She stepped clear, giving them a little kick behind her.

Garrus disentangled himself from her arms and turned, settling himself on the chaise with his back pressed against the arm, his legs crossed in front of him on the long seat. Shepard watched him, admiring the surety in his movement, the beauty of his form. The air licked along the line of her spine, its tongue all the icier for the want of being pressed into the envelope of his warmth. And then he held out his hand.
"Do you trust me?" he asked without even the smallest trace of humour.

She nodded and wrapped her fingers around his talons. "With everything."

Nodding as if he'd known, but wanted to hear the words, he patted his thigh. "Climb on up here then."

He helped steady her as she stepped up onto the chaise and lowered herself to sit in the cradle of his legs, her calves wrapped around his waist. A smile tinted in shades of silver and blue greeted her subtle wriggling as she made herself more comfortable, nestling in until they fit together, two parts of an unusual, but wonderful, whole.

Arms and body enveloping her, he formed a perfect haven, a shelter of safety and love. His cheek and mandible brushed hers as he drew her in. "If this is uncomfortable for you, tell me," he whispered, nuzzling just behind her ear. "I don't want to hurt you."

Shepard curled into him, her hand sliding up the long, smooth plates of his chest. "I promise, I'll say something, but I think we'll be fine." Loving fingers traced the lines and shadowed planes of his face. She leaned in and pressed soft kisses to his chin, mouth, nose, and brow. "So, tell me about these promises."

He cleared his throat. "You might have noticed that turians are deeply entrenched in their traditions." A soft chuckle greeted her nod, and he tipped his head to touch his brow to hers. "Things like the bonding ceremony haven't changed all that much since we lived in caves along these cliffs." His hands covered her back, talons spread, thumbs sweeping back and forth across unmarred skin. She tucked her head under his chin, cuddling in against him.

He nuzzled her hair, then continued, "Back then, bonds were made for practical reasons—political and economic alliances or genetic diversity—as often as they were made for love, so the intimate part of the ceremony was about promising to take care of one another and offspring regardless of what came along. It was about developing trust." Chuffing softly, he pulled back, a knuckle under her chin tilting her face up until their eyes met. "It probably doesn't make sense in a human context, but when you have these … " He held up his talons so she could see the veritable knives that tipped them. "... touch becomes so much more than hide on hide."

Shepard nodded and reached up, lacing her fingers with his talons. "Like the touch without gloves showing willingness for a deeper relationship."

"Yes." Freeing his talons from her grip, he ran the pad of his thumb down the groove of her throat and between her clavicles. "Just as this touch is a promise that you are safe with me, that you never have to guard yourself in my presence."

Shepard slipped her thumb down the long curve of his throat and over the steady thump of his pulsing arteries at his keel. "The oil and massage you did before we left Omega, that's a part of it, too?"

"A big part of it, yes." His hands returned to her back, spreading out over her shoulder blades. "Lie back and just let yourself soften. I've got you."

Despite trusting Garrus implicitly, the moment she leaned back, her arms lifted, determined to ward her tender, exposed front. He merely smiled, his gaze locked onto hers. "It's all right, Kahri. Hold onto my arms if it helps."

She laid her palms against the taut lines of his biceps, the muscles coiled and alive beneath her touch. They trembled slightly, as if the weight they bore far outstripped her forty-five kilos, and suddenly, the picture snapped into focus. What he offered solidified in her mind, but more importantly, in her heart. Garrus wasn't just holding her body. Those arms, so strong and steady, held her: everything she'd ever been, everything she'd ever become, her heart and her mind … her soul ... all held just as safely and just as reverently as he cradled her form.

That was the promise. He had her, and he always would.

A long breath escaped as she surrendered into his embrace, the ice melting from the muscles in her neck and down her back, allowing her head to loll back, hanging bonelessly from her shoulders. Slowly, her grip on his arms eased and her hands slid free, arms hanging down and to the side. Her calves released their grip on his hips, the last holdout of tension spiriting into the ether, riding a gentle moan that uttered her promise in return.

I am yours, my trust and faith absolute.

He shifted her so that one arm held her. The other hand pressed against her throat, talons spread. She could feel the echo of her pulse thumping hard and quick against the pad of his thumb. Eyes slipping closed, she focused on where their bodies met: the hard length of his legs folded beneath her, the solid weight of his plates pressed against her sex, his one arm holding her while the other caressed the length of her torso. The tips of those talons traced lines of intense sensation that coalesced into a mass of pleasure and need aching across the expanse of her pelvis and down into her thighs.

Pressing his hand against her lower belly, Garrus said, "Everything you are and everything that flows from you, I accept as part of me. Everything that I am and everything that flows from me, I place in your care, if you accept it."

Shepard sat up, wriggling her hips closer to him. Heart pounding so hard it made the world pulse with its beat, she took his face between her hands. Bright, golden ingots of sunshine flared into being within her as his words and his touch resonated. Feeling blessed beyond measure, she offered him a smile of devotion and nodded. "I accept it. Of course I accept it." Leaning in, she pressed a soft kiss against the upper plate of his mouth, then whispered, "Do I say it back?"

"Yes." His voice came out strained and flat, as if the word had to squeeze through a pinhole.

She kissed him again. Despite having thought it, and even sang the idea out loud in her duet with Jenkins, she found herself amazed and humbled anew by the fact that the powers that be thought she deserved someone so remarkable.

Despite her sad talons offering no threat—she didn't even let her fingernails get past the thinnest moon of white at the ends—Shepard pressed her spread fingers just beneath his jaw, then raked them down his throat and over his keel to his belly. "Everything you are and everything that flows from you, I accept as part of me. Everything that I am and everything that flows from me, I place in your care, if you accept it." She stroked her thumb across the top of his plates, biting her lip as they moved easily.

"I accept it." He slipped his other arm around behind her, adjust his grip so that his talons curled around her shoulders. His eyes searched hers, asking without words if she also accepted his making love to her in the traditional way.

She nodded and tipped her pelvis, a soft smile greeting the moan of need that rolled from him as he felt how ready she was for him. They'd spent far too long finding their way to that place, so long that he never had to wonder if she wanted to feel his hands and mouth on her … to feel him inside her. Of course, she knew he would always ask.

He eased free of his plates, slipping directly into her as he pulled her into him. She laid back on his arms, eyes closed, her entire body soft and accepting, focusing on the myriad of sensations playing her senses like a complex instrument. Streams of his breath seared hot where they made contact, chilling as they fanned out, teasing the fine hairs on her skin until gooseflesh covered every inch of her. An intense pressure followed the delicious slide of skin against skin—god the amazing ache of that pressure—as he seated himself inside her, filling her more and more tightly as the seconds passed. The rasp of his palms, the moist brand of his tongue teasing her flesh … it all tossed her back and forth until it drew a thin, whining moan of combined bliss and torment from her throat.

Giving back as good as she got, her nimble fingers sought out all the places that made him rumble, his muscles shuddering with a pleasure that built until he drew her in, arms wrapped so tight around her that pain joined the exquisite chorus.

"Kahri," he said, his voice strained through the heavy rumble of subvocals, "I want to do something, but … ." He cleared his throat and loosened his hold on her a little.

She smiled at the long breaths he drew in, his struggle to pull back tying an unbreakable, gossamer thread between her heart and his. Her hands lifted to cradle his face, thumbs caressing the hard lines. "It's okay, Callor. Just tell me, I'm not afraid.

"It's another tradition." His mandibles did the small, helpless flail of bashfulness. "A vestige of a by-gone era." He nuzzled her lips, his breath more sweet than metallic on her tongue. "It's fallen out of favour. People say it's too close to our 'barbaric' past, but I think its declining popularity has to do with bond-mates becoming more and more … transitory … disposable."

His discomfort, his struggle to find the words twined around her heart, squeezing it until it begged her to intercede. "So it's a beautiful wall, but inconvenient because it's meant to stand forever?" She kissed him, lips tugging at his mouth a little as she leaned back into the cradle of his arms.

He nodded, mandibles fluttering ever so slightly. His eyes shone, bright in the moonlight, gleaming with emotion. Blessed Enkindlers, he was beautiful. Sucking in a long breath that whistled a little, he continued, "When a torin has decided on a mate … um, when emotional and physical elements come together, he … he secretes cells into his … saliva."

Shepard smiled and nipped the edge of his mandible. "Scent marking," she said, sparing him. "He digs a tooth into some soft, fleshy part and claims her." She slipped her arms around his neck and squeezed all the muscles through her pelvis tight around him, pulsing them until a soft keen rode the underside of his every breath. "I'm yours, Garrus, and you don't have to prove anything to me." She pulled him down until their brows touched and closed her eyes, breathing him in. "But, I love the idea of building that beautiful wall around us."

"Spirits," he whispered, drawing her in, his face pressed to the curve of her neck. "I love you."

One hand slipped between them, his talon-pads teasing her most sensitive spots until she clung to him, sweat pouring over her skin, her belly aching with a pressure she couldn't ease. Then a small, vivid pain pinched the skin at the base of her neck, just above her clavicle, tipping her over the edge.

Orgasm gripped them both. Heavy waves crashed through Shepard's body, her muscles clenching so hard they threatened to spasm, wringing her out until she collapsed, limp weight in her dilan's arms.
Holding her tight, Garrus shifted until they lay side by side on the chaise, his warmth stretched out along hers. He kissed her, then caressed the small spot of blood on her neck.

Smiling at the wonder in his expression, she laid her hand over his. "Are you still sure about everything … with Nihlus?" she whispered, squeezing his talons.

"Yes," he replied between kisses. "Go to him." Pulling back, he looked into her eyes, his hand caressing her cheek. "Talk to him, and if you choose to honour what you feel for him, you can, knowing that we're forever." He kissed her. "And as soon as we get even the smallest break, I'm going to fasten my coillasi around your wrists."

She returned his kisses, the most amazing peace settling through her as the furious grip of pleasure eased. "Does this mean that we're engaged?"

He nodded. "It does, and within the month, I intend for you to be my wife."

Shepard's knuckles rapped loud and hollow against the carved wood of Nihlus's door, the sound echoing down the hall. She winced and glanced behind her, ears straining to hear any sign that she'd awakened the house. Despite the fact that they all supported it, the sting of human moral judgement hung over her, a heavy weight of shame and embarrassment. She didn't want witnesses to her surrender.

For a moment, she hesitated on the cusp of turning and running back to Garrus's bed to burrow in next to him. If being with both torins felt so wrong to her, why was she even considering talking to Nihlus about it? She tried to turn and walk away, but the promises she and Garrus had woven between them held her in place. Damn it! Her Callor knew her altogether too well. He'd known that she'd never risk going after what she wanted without the solid anchor he'd provided, and that once he had, she wouldn't be able to do anything but.

"Do you really want this?" she whispered despite having asked herself the same question at least ten times while she showered. "Is this cold feet, or a warning you should be listening to?" She lifted a hand, pressing it to the warm, smooth wood. "Everything else aside, do you love them both enough to jump off this cliff?"

Footsteps approached the door, quickly rendering any decision to leave moot. "Decide, damn it. Do you want this?"

_Don't be stupid, Janey. You know the answer is yes. Everything else aside, if you let go of all the worries about what the rest of the universe will think and all the insecurities about screwing it up, you know you want them both._

The door opened. Nihlus scowled through the crack at her, the shuttered distance in his eyes smashing apart her doubts, replacing them with fear. Something had changed since dinner. The three of them cooked for the family, joking and rough housing. It had been fun. Right then, the stare coming through the narrow space could have belonged to someone else entirely.

"May I come in?" she asked. He stiffened, and the door closed a little. Shepard's hand jumped up, slapping softly against the wood. Of all the nights for him to decide to shut her out. Damn. His good, steady heart had been through so much pain, so she couldn't blame him for protecting it. And yes, she'd been adamant in her refusal to consider a poly relationship, but he just needed to hang onto hope for another five minutes.

"Shouldn't you be sleeping?" he asked, the chill in his voice raising the hair on her arms. He glared
Shepard nodded, the defensiveness in his stare, the rigid set to his mandibles dropping her heart down into her guts. Had he seen she and Garrus out in the garden? A sick sort of panic reached down her throat. "Yeah, it's late, but I want to talk to you for a few minutes before we head in two different directions tomorrow." When he hesitated, his face hardening, she stepped closer the door, terrified that he'd shut it in her face. "Please, Nihlus."

He stared at her for long seconds, a war going on in the shadowed green gaze. As much as she wanted to protest everything she saw there, to beg him to not shut her out, she stayed quiet, letting him decide how much risk he could tolerate.

"Yeah, sure," he said at last. A soft, almost sob of relief trickled between her lips, but she bit it off. He stepped back and held the door open. "Come on in." When she stepped through, he closed it behind her then turned, his arms folded over his chest. Damn, he'd never felt so closed off. He had to have seen them in the garden, and believed it meant the end to his hope. She glanced around the warm, comfortable space before turning to face him.

Nihlus's room had obviously been a guest room before Garrus brought him home. It didn't have much to identify it as his space other than his armour hung neatly from a rack in the corner and his gun cases leaning against the wall. Of course, she supposed he didn't spend enough time there to worry about claiming it. In the end, rooms didn't matter. It was his home because the people within loved him.

"What do you want to talk about, Shepard?" He stepped around her to the bed and picked up the remote for the vid screen, muting the air car chase exploding across its expanse. "If it's just to give me bad news, that could've waited until we all got back to Omega."

She winced at the use of her surname, his formality striking a heavy blow straight to her gut. "You saw Garrus and I out in the garden, didn't you?" she asked, following him. When he didn't answer, looking away to the vid screen instead, she nodded. "I'll take that as a yes." She stepped between him and the vid. "After you left me to talk to Trea this morning, Garrus and I had a talk about our future."

The Spectre stiffened and nodded. "Yeah, I saw what you decided." He glanced at her neck for a split second before looking back at the screen. "Congratulations. Thank you for letting me know."

Shepard stepped toward him, reaching out for his hand. He flinched away from her touch, landing another solid hit. "Nihlus—"

He shook his head. "I appreciate your concern, but I'll be fine. Just … just don't touch me. Please. Respect that it's going to take me some time to be okay with … all of it."

"Nihlus—"

He stepped around her, ducking the hand that she kept extended toward him. "My vid is just about over, and I need to get some sleep." Without sparing her another glance, he strode to the door and opened it.

"Nihlus, you big idiot," she said, frustration exploding before she lowered her voice into a soft growl that didn't carry out the door. She angled toward him, all threat and spines and barbs. "Stow the Spectre Kryik pity party. Just shut the damned door, come here, sit down, and fucking listen to me for three seconds." A sharp, exasperated huff of air cut the air between them, demanding as much as her words. When he dared meet her eyes, she locked onto him, glaring until he did as she'd said, closing the door and returning to sit on the end of the bed.

"Thank you." A pointed exhalation drained the sudden burst of fury, and she raked both hands through her still wet hair. "Holy blessed Enkindlers, when you get something stuck in your head, it just binds up the gears, doesn't it?" Casting off the quick flare of frustration, she closed on him a step. "Yes, you saw Garrus and I out in the garden, but you've got what it meant all jammed in there sideways and upside down."

"You made promises tonight," Nihlus replied, his voice low, each word measured.

She nodded. "Yeah, we did." She waggled her head. "Well, we'd already made the promises before, but we set them in flesh and blood tonight, yeah." Closing the rest of the distance between them, she reached out and pressed a hand against his mandible, turning his face until his eyes stared into hers. "But Garrus initiated it so that I'd have a foundation I trusted in order to come in here tonight and tell you that I love you."

She smiled at the sudden hope in his eyes, a match blazing for the briefest of seconds before being blown out. Caressing the upper edge of his mandible with her thumb, she said, "I'm in love with you, Nihlus, and despite all the time and effort I've put into trying to talk myself out of it, it's not something that I want to give up." A small murmur of surrender rode the leading edge of a deep shrug. "It's not something I can give up, and if the two of you can live with sharing my heart, my body, and my time, then all right. It's a dream worth pursuing."

She laughed, the sound a soft, sweet sigh of relief as he reached up, laying his hand over hers. His expression remained shuttered, as if afraid that he was hearing her wrong, so she leaned and pressed her lips against his mouth, a chaste kiss. "I've tried," she said, her lips a finger's width from his mouth. "Heaven knows I've tried to shake it, but I can't. I want that future we saw on Thessia."

Mouth opening, he inhaled, the starving gasp of a diver surfacing from depths so fathomless and dark that he'd believed himself lost. "Haksaya kubenar." The endearment whispered out on the last of that breath, then his arms slipped around her, pulling her in tight against the right side of his chest.

She relaxed into him, arms wrapped around his neck, her cheek pressed to his, giving him time to process their new status. "I'm going to marry him," Shepard said after a long moment, breaking through the quick thump of their pulses. Leaning back, she gazed into Nihlus's eyes, loving what she saw there. She smiled and caressed his face, her fingers following the beautiful sweeping lines of white, admiring how they deepened the reds in his chocolate-coloured hide. "I'm going to marry you, too, if you'll have me, but he ... no ... you both deserve to know where you stand, always."

Nihlus pulled her back into his arms and nuzzled along her shoulder. Turning his face into her, he breathed deep and slow, his exhalations tickling the fine hairs at the nape of her neck. "He comes first, Jane," he said at last.

She nodded, grateful, but not surprised, that he understood. A warm, silken ribbon of affection, respect, and devotion wound through her. Allowing that to spool out through her voice, she said, "He does, but not because he's a better torin, nor because I love him more." She could say that honestly. The way that Nihlus had taken care of her after she arrived at Archangel and then again on Thessia had erased all of the stupid and hurtful things he'd done, anchoring himself solidly inside her heart.

"He's the glue that makes it all work." The Spectre chuckled, warm and throaty. The timbre of it rumbled through her, easing her deeper into his embrace. "Even the war will come down to him getting you and the rest of us through it. He deserves to have that security ... to know that when we make decisions, he's our priority."

Shepard kissed him, then smiled against the rigid plates. "You've come a very long way since that day on the Normandy, Spectre Kryik. I'm in awe." She nudged his thighs together so she could sit astride them, then wrapped her arms around his neck. Breathing in the warm, desert and spice scent of him, she closed her eyes and relaxed into his arms. He rubbed her back, careful of the web of wounds, but not too careful. She loved that he didn't slap caution tape up around her … that he saw nothing fragile in her.

He slid his hands beneath the hem of her t-shirt, the touch easing a small, nagging whisper in the back of her head about the complications of being intimately involved with both he and Garrus. Despite the familiar, calloused warmth of the palms that wrapped around her waist, the energy behind that touch could never be confused with Garrus's. They were two very different torins, and despite the ferocity of her love for each, her love for both was unique.

Gentle nips teased the skin of her neck. "I don't want to backslide at all, Jane, but I really want to be invasive of your personal space." The talons of one hand slipped beneath the elastic waistband clinging to her hips, and his tongue slid along the underside of her jaw. "And your person."

Grinning, she pulled back to look into his eyes. "You're okay with all this? I mean, really okay? Not, I'll say I'm okay, but every minute she spends with him is going to kill me a little more?"

He nuzzled her lips. "I'm really okay with it." He ducked his head a little, smiling, but the flutter of his mandibles could only be called bashful. "You know that I've loved you in some form or another for a decade. As long as what time I have with you is mine, as long as when you're with me, you're completely with me, I'm fine." Reaching up, he wrapped the talons of one hand around her wrist, drawing it down between them. He stroked the soft, sensitive skin on the inside of her wrist with the pad of his thumb, then raised it to his mouth and nuzzled it. "I never dared dream that one day I'd wrap my coillas around your wrists … wear yours … that I'd call you mine."

She pressed her hand against his mandible, caressing along his cheekbone. Smiling as he closed his eyes and leaned into her, she let out a long breath. "I am yours, Nihlus. I'm as much yours as I am his. I could never have imagined the situation we're in, but choosing one of you means cutting half of my heart out." Leaning in, she kissed him, softly at first, but then he loosened the shackles holding the fire at bay.

"If you want to shut this down, do it now," he gasped against her mouth, his breath sweet and hot and metallic on her tongue. His hands tightened on her, pulling her into him even as he waited for her answer.

Replying with a kiss, Shepard let the flames leap the barriers and whispered. "I want you, Cikabekni. We have some foundations to lay and some dating to do before we hit any home runs, but I want you." She grinned. "I've had a pretty great day, I'm sober, not the least bit terrified of what I feel for someone else, and I have absolutely no washroom floor on my face." She flicked the edge of his mouth plate with her tongue. "And I really want you to kiss me until my toes curl."

When he responded in kind, she trapped his tongue between her teeth, nipping lightly.

All the breathless ardour of the kiss on Illium returned, but instead of terrifying her, the Spectre's passion seared through her, taking root. His hands caressed and kneaded, drawing her in tighter, forming her to his body.

Then he stood, cradling her in his arms, and carried her around the bed. "Are you staying?" he asked, a breathy whisper that caressed the heated skin of her neck.
"I am, but … ." She hesitated, not wanting to shut him down, but her thighs and the region between warned her that she was going to be forced into a very awkward conversation with the doc—not to mention possible transplant surgery—the next day if she attempted intercourse a second time that night. Well, and they needed time to lay foundations of their own, to develop a trust as solid as she'd built with Garrus.

The Spectre chuckled and nodded. "It's okay Jane. It's too early for that," he said, reassuring her. "I just want to wrap myself around you for as long as I can before morning steals you away." He let out a deep rumble with enough form to be words rather than subvocals alone, then turned his face into her neck.

After a moment, she braced a hand against his cowl and pushed back, feeling the cool tracks of tears on her skin. "Nihlus?"

He stared down at her without meeting her eyes. "I'm fine, Jane. I just … ." His mandible flailed a little. "Thank you."

She nodded and laid her hand alongside his cheek, turning his face into her kisses. "Come on," she said, "let's get into bed, dilan."

He sucked in a long, shaky gasp and smiled. "Dilan?" A talon touched the small scab on her neck.

She shrugged then pressed her brow against his cheek. "Well, eventually you're going to have to do a hell of a job making it official, but yes, you're stuck with me, Spectre."
"So, seriously," Sol asked, cutting a glance across at him, "why did you live here? This place is so … asari in sleek dresses." Her mandibles dropped. "Oh, no, please tell me that's not why."

A sharp laugh cut through his chuff. "Yes, it's my love of asari and sleek dresses. They both make me feel so pretty." A long, growling breath followed. "If you fight evil for a living, where better to live than in the midst of it?" Of course, that wasn't the whole truth. Saren had always maintained a residence on Illium. His love of asari in sleek dresses had been well documented over the cycles.

\textbf{Inluvis} - The second gestational period in turian pregnancy. Between 8 and 16 weeks. Slang: Little one, in the sense of being young and underdeveloped.

\textbf{Obluvis} - One who is senile or absent-minded.

\textbf{Maraquil} - Sea birds of prey. Large white and blue-green raptors that nest in seaside cliffs on Palaven.

\textbf{Fragrutis} - A cactus native to Palaven that grows short, tough, and spiny but succulent leaves. The leaves are crushed, chopped and used as a spice in turian cooking. Very hot and spicy, adding a tart, savoury flavour.

\textbf{Teirati paste} - the turian answer to sriracha sauce.

\textbf{Acuta Eus} - a chip made from a combination of grains, vegetables, and spices. Turian Doritos.

\textbf{44 Days ASR}

Eyes watched from somewhere in the crowd. The further they ventured through Nos Astra's spaceport, the heavier that stare pressed down on him. Nihlus cast a glance at the drell walking at his side, looking for any sign that the ex-assassin saw the same tell-tale signs he did. Thane nodded without returning the glance.

A slippery sort of dread had oozed between the Spectre's vertebrae to set up residence along his spinal cord about the same time he and Solana had stepped away from Shepard and Garrus at the Cipritine spaceport. As much as expediency required it, the three of them shouldn't split up; as a unit, they stood so much stronger. He'd seen that after they'd pulled Shepard out of that pit-fighting club. Somehow, all three of them had been headed toward each other their entire lives. Yes, sometimes he allowed doubt to whisper its lies in his aural canal, but he knew their connection to be true.

His mandibles gave a tiny flutter as he recalled the way Shepard clung to him when she said goodbye, her kiss open, passionate, and full of joy and promise. It tasted so much better than he'd ever hoped, especially when he'd expected her arrival at his door two nights before to herald the death of all his hopes. He cleared his throat and rolled his shoulders as his plates loosened at the memory of her tongue sliding along his.

"Don't be so damned obvious," Sol grumbled from his other side, her sub-vocals rolling enough that he knew she didn't just mean about looking for their tail. She hitched her kit further up her shoulder. "We're supposed to be professionals." The tarin let out a long breath and looked up, craning her neck a little as she gawked at the city. "So this is Illium, huh?" Meeting Nihlus's eyes, she made a face. "I don't like it. Too uppity and snotty." She paused, sending up a flare to alert him to incoming fire. "Your living here makes so much more sense now."

"I thought you taught espionage," he said, subvocals teasing. She dropped and flicked her mandibles at him. He sighed. "Sometimes it's good to be obvious, inluvis. If they know you're watching them watch you, it can throw them off, make them move too soon. Surely, you know this."

Sol just rumbled in reply—no doubt because her bait had caught a lecture rather than a more entertaining reaction—and cut through the crowd to the cab stand.

Once they soared through the heavy lanes of traffic, Nihlus let the car do the driving and leaned back, his gaze wandering the horizon. Nos Astra lived in perpetual twilight, a gorgeous and disarming backdrop that he couldn't help think had been purposeful. How better to lull the galaxy into a false sense of security than to surround the darkness with beauty.

"So, seriously," Sol asked, cutting a glance across at him, "why did you live here? This place is so ... asari in sleek dresses." Her mandibles dropped. "Oh, no, please tell me that's not why."

A sharp laugh cut through his chuff. "Yes, it's my love of asari and sleek dresses. They both make me feel so pretty." A long, growling breath followed. "If you fight evil for a living, where better to live than in the midst of it?" Of course, that wasn't the whole truth. Saren had always maintained a residence on Illium. His love of asari in sleek dresses had been well documented over the cycles. Nihlus leaned back, using the headrest. He'd never known why Saren had been with him. He'd asked several times, but his mentor never answered. Perhaps Saren hadn't known either or perhaps some part of him had been ashamed of the answer.

Everything before Saren tried to shoot him, that entire life, seemed like a faraway dream. Or nightmare. Passion had never been a problem in their relationship, but it grew out of a deep, well-cultivated bed of anger. Despite the unpredictable excitement of those cycles, they'd been tumultuous and painful. He doubted he could even count how often he'd felt used, his adoration manipulated.

Familiar landmarks outside the windows pulled him from his thoughts; they were close, the car dropping past Saren's favourite place to eat, then his. The two bore no similarities. Saren made a great many credits as a Spectre, and enjoyed spending them. Nihlus had never been as comfortable with bribes, gifts, and gratuities, and his income suffered for it. Not that his income level had ever bothered him. He worked all the time, and he made enough to spend his infinitesimal time off comfortably.

"Wow, this is getting weirder and weirder, senux." Sol lifted up in her seat to look out the window. "This is a really upscale part of the city. Look at these places." Another quick, glance seared the side of his head. "Tell the truth: you didn't live here. We're going to be breaking and entering, aren't we?"
He laughed and took over piloting once more. "I moved in with Saren. He liked living the good life. At least, he did once." He brought the car down into a parking space on the roof of the penthouse atop one of the archologies.

"The penthouse?" She jumped a little when Thane ducked out of the car, as if she'd forgotten the drell had accompanied them. The reprieve lasted only a second before her maraquil stare fixed on him once more. "Who the hell are you?"

Nihlus got out, grabbed his kit, then walked past her to the elevator. "The torin who lives in a single room on Omega, same as I was yesterday." He glanced over his shoulder at her and scowled. "This was never me. This was Saren. That's why we're here." He shrugged. "Well … and I left my favourite pillow and Aurin Plavidus here."

As he entered his code into the lock, Nihlus felt the eyes, heavy and scalding on the back of his neck once more. Following a hunch, he called up the access log for the elevator. Once a week, his cleaning service had entered their code. Twice over the months, his landlord … and then, ten days before, someone had entered, but using a slicer code. Damn.

"Spectre Kryik?" the drell said, his voice pitched low. "Is there a problem?"

He tipped his head in a single nod. "Slicer code, ten days ago. It's a private elevator with one destination." The whine-click of all three sidearms played in concert. He called the elevator, and when the doors opened, scanned the interior and mechanisms for traps or explosives. Nothing.

"Clear," he said, the word dropping with little surprise. He hadn't really thought anyone would bother blowing it up or rigging it to fall. Bombs were messy and notoriously imprecise, and a fall of two storeys would hardly prove fatal. Solana pushed past him, entering first, sharp eyes looking everything over before she stepped out of the way. He chuffed a little as he followed. "You're not my bodyguard, Sol."

A sharp bark of sound and breath, her chuff shattered his and rebounded inside the elevator. "I'm whatever I say I am, senux obluvis." Her grin leered at him in reflection from the control panel. "Garrus's new dilan took down a Reaper; I'm not about to find out what happens if I let you get yourself killed."

"Four fleets and … well, I had a little to do with taking that thing down, too." However, Sol had a point in that Shepard would not react well to him getting himself or his tiny squad killed. Time to decide some division of labour. As much as she worked for Grey Division, Sol eschewed covert tactics, preferring a more direct, brutal approach. Sere Krios on the other hand, was known for getting in and out of places without a trace.

"Can you see about locating and identifying our tail?" he asked the drell. "There's no need to interfere; in fact, I'd rather they get a chance to show their intentions. I'd just like to have some intel on who, how many … whatever you can discover."

A single nod answered him, a pleasant relief after Sol's fairly constant chatter. As keen as his filiam's intellect could be, and as much as he adored her, the twenty cycles difference in their ages meant that half the time, he didn't have the slightest clue what she was talking about.

When the elevator stopped, he nodded to Sol. If she wanted to go in first, play bodyguard, it didn't really hurt him to let her go for it. She could shoot the ears off a preteri without a scope, her pari's influence, just as it had been with Garrus. He left his kit in the corner of the elevator and took cover opposite Sol's position. Despite doubting that anyone awaited them, it never hurt to err to the side of caution.
Sol swung out, the muzzle of her sidearm cutting an arc through the open foyer. Nihlus followed on her heels without waiting for her to call clear. The apartment had belonged to Spectres, the furnishings and sightlines designed to provide no cover for ambush and very little for incoming attackers. The stairs to the master bedroom provided the only cover in the central living space.

The three of them moved quickly through the apartment, the assassin reading their body language with such precision that Nihlus didn't have to gesture a single command. He hadn't been certain about Shepard's choice of chaperone, but an hour into working with the drell, he knew she couldn't have chosen better.

"Sol … Thane … " Nihlus gestured to two doors off the sitting room. "... you can decide which room you want. I'll be upstairs." He returned to the elevator for his kit, and ran it upstairs. Setting it next to the bed, he saw that everything remained the way he'd left it when he'd packed up and headed off to meet the Normandy. After Eden Prime, so much changed he hadn't even thought about coming back.

He bent over the nightstand on his side of the bed. Aurin stood watch next to the lamp and a single holo sat in the back corner. He and Saren stood with arms slung around one another's shoulders, looking sharp in formal uniforms. They'd received a commendation for bringing down a terminus slaving ring. A soft, hollow wind blew through the empty space that waited for answers. It had been a great night. Saren and he truly felt like partners and lovers that night.

A soft, polite cough alerted Nihlus to the drell's presence. He straightened, but didn't turn. "You found a room all right?" he asked. "Make yourself comfortable. There's a datapad with a list of markets that deliver next to the fridge. Whatever you need, just put it on my account."

"Thank you. The accommodations are far more luxurious than I've grown accustomed to." Thane crossed to the window and looked out over the city. "More than a single set of eyes watches us. I believe both sets are asari, but only the first concerns me. I believe the second group are Eclipse mercenaries. No doubt they're simply hoping you'll lead them to Shepard or General Vakarian."

A scalding flush crawled up Nihlus's throat. He'd been thinking of far too much other than their security if he'd so completely failed to identify their tail. "The first?" Turning, to face the window and the black silhouette of the assassin, the Spectre narrowed his eyes, honing in on the way Thane's eyes never stopped moving, but not darting from target to target. Instead, his gaze swept slowly over the entire field of view like a scanner.

"Is a hunter. Maybe an assassin, but definitely someone with an instinct for and an intimate knowledge of the hunt." Thane turned from the window enough that the outside light caught the ridges of his facial features. His hands remained locked together behind his back. "She let me catch a glimpse or two, but nothing more than suspicious movement." He closed two, precise steps. "She's locked on you, so if I go out alone, I might be able to get a good look at her."

Nihlus just nodded. "I'm going to go through the camera feeds for the day the elevator was sliced, then reset all the codes."

Bowing his head in a deep, sharp nod, Thane strode to the stairs, but stopped before descending. "I apologize for intruding. I didn't realize that the second floor was your bed chamber." He cleared his throat. "Since I'll be out, would you like me to bring back food?"

Chuckling, Nihlus shrugged. "That'd be great. Sol gets impossible to live with when she's hungry. There's a little place across the 100th floor bridge that has both levo and dextro. If you could grab two number fives and a half dozen bottles of puala nectar, that would do nicely, thank you."
"I'll call in every thirty minutes." The drell appeared to float down the stairs, his steps silent and fluid.

Nihlus turned back to the bed, throwing his kit up on the mattress. Might as well unpack. Unless all the eyes watching them had the same root, it wouldn't be a mystery quickly solved.

He pulled his single suit from the bag and held it up, giving it a firm shake to remove some of the wrinkles. Why did he even bring it? He had ten suits in the closet that would have been kept laundered. The housekeeper liked to err to the side of thorough.

He held it open, then hung it over one arm, the other hand reaching up to brush a few grains of powder fine sand from the lining. He hadn't had a reason to wear it since that night on the beach. Spirits, three lifetimes had passed since he sat beside Jane and bared his most shameful secrets. Luckily, each lifetime had seen him grow in wisdom if not intelligence. Holding the tunic up to his face, he inhaled, hoping for some lingering trace of either the woman or that night.

"So, I've covered pretty much the entire floor, and I wouldn't know, but nothing looks messed with down here," Sol shouted up the stairs. He heard her talons rasping on the railings, and one foot thump down on the bottom step, but that's where she stopped. "I noticed there's a datapad next to the fridge with a list of stores. Anywhere in particular you prefer? Any idea how many days I should plan to stock for?"

Lowering the tunic, smelling nothing but his own scent on the material, he chuckled then strode over to the closet. "Three for now. We'll see what happens. And I don't care where, just get a case of those fragrutis noodles, a couple containers of teirati paste, and two cases of the big bottles of soda: asperi and … um … ritinop flavours."

The harsh ring of her laugh echoed up the stairs. "Junk food? That's all you want?"

"Amarceru, of course … oh and a couple bags of Acuta Eus." He waited for the hiss of disgust, chuckling when she didn't disappoint. "Don't forget the sundries."

"Yeah, whatever. I'll have a construction and clean up team ready for whatever all that spicy crap does to your digestive tract." Her voice faded along with her footsteps. "Thank the sweet spirits we don't have to share a bathroom."

Nihlus finished unpacking, casually checking to see if anything had been stolen. He suspected that the intruder had been interested in only one room in the apartment, so wasn't surprised when everything remained precisely where he'd left it. He took a shower then returned to his closet, deciding to shake things up a little and wear something he hadn't in a couple of cycles.

The first suit that caught his eye was a deep, blood red, piped with black, the center panel, collar, and cuffs gleaming with a simple vine pattern embroidered in black. Saren bought that one for the party after Nihlus's Spectre induction. Spirits … ancient history. Still, it had been his favourite, and he put it on before heading downstairs.

"Wow, shame Shepard isn't here to admire the view," Sol said, cackling softly. "Take that one back to Omega for sure."

He elbowed her and headed toward the back hallway and Saren's office. Nihlus had never used an office, his paperwork and mission detritus spread all over the dining and coffee tables, much to Saren's disgust. Saren, however, not only used an office, he kept it locked, the code scrambled. In hindsight, that probably should have been a major hint that he was up to no good.
Nihlus entered the code, but hesitated before pressing his palm to the control. How many ugly secrets hid within the file boxes and data pads in that room?

"Okay, last call," Sol said, poking her head around the doorway. "Anything else?"

He straightened. "Oh, yeah. Call the third number down, see if they have 500 grams of a soft, emerald green yarn. Something fluffy. I have a feeling we're going to be spending some time surveilling." He scowled, trying to remember what remained in the apartment and where. "Maybe get me a set of yarn hooks as well. I don't remember if I have any here."

She shook her head, "Junk food and yarn hooking supplies. You are so weird."

His attention returned to the door before he heard her talons pivot on the carpet and walk away.

"Come on, Kryik. Standing out here isn't doing you any good." Letting out a long breath, he rolled his shoulders, then his neck, and palmed the control. The door whispered open like any other door, no ghosts flew out at him, tattered cobwebs trailing like flags from their outstretched arms. No bombs went off, his heart continued to beat slow and steady in his chest, no pain lingered to rear its ugly head. What stood before him was just a slightly dusty room and a pile of boxes.

Except … .

Holes in the dust on the tops and at the handles of several boxes pulled him over the threshold. So, their intruder had been after something in Saren's files. Only … . A thick, leather bound book and a small stack of datapads sat on one corner of the desk in a neat pile. What? He hadn't left those there. The desk had been bare when he locked the room.

He stepped up to the desk and lifted the journal, opening it to the first page. Small, neat writing covered the page. He recognized it as Saren's. In their last cycle together, the other Spectre grew increasingly paranoid, convinced that even datapads not connected to another device could be hacked, and began communicating through notes and letters handwritten on paper.

"He has told me that none of my communications are safe from monitoring. They have agents everywhere and means of controlling minds that are older and more sinister than anything I could have dreamed of. Desolas saw the entirety of the universe behind the dark curtain of time and amnesia, but he did not move carefully. I must move with great care or lose myself."

Nihlus closed the journal and picked up the first datapad. A hefty list of financial institutions, addresses, contact information, and account numbers scrolled down the screen. Cocking his head, he glanced back at the journal. How sensitive must the information in the journal be if Saren had his finances on an unsecured piece of equipment? Spirits. He closed his eyes and tilted his head, cracking his neck to relieve the sudden tension.

"Is this well going to have a bottom?" he whispered to the air and dust, suddenly pretty damned sure that he'd been wrong about the room being ghost-free; they just hadn't been visible. "Or am I going to be swallowed up by whatever madness killed you?"

"You spend too much time alone," Sol said from the doorway. She tilted a little, falling loosely into the jamb. "Anything missing?"

Nihlus shrugged, setting his back to her as he picked up the tiny pile of information, hunching around it a little as he held it close to his keel. "I haven't looked in the boxes, but a very selective few were gone through." He jabbed a thumb toward the pile. "And someone took these out of the boxes and piled them here."
Turning to face her at last, he pulled out the datapad with the financials, holding it out to her. "I think this break in was about leaving a trail."

Shoving her shoulder off the doorway, she took the pad, eyeing it as if she expected it to explode. "That means all this stuff could be a trap."

"It could." He pushed past her and out the door. "Go through that pad, contact those institutions, use my Spectre clearances if you need to, but find out if they have any current or relevant information."

"While you do … what?" She followed him out into the sitting room, close enough that her presence felt aggressive, as if she was challenging him.

"I'm going to check the cameras and see who came in and did this work for us." Snatching the computer terminal off the sideboard in the sitting room, he sat on the couch, placing the other datapads and journal on the floor between his feet. "I suspect I already know who it is, but I want to be sure."

It took him less than five minutes to locate the footage from the time in question. Using a slicer code and making it that obvious … the intruder wanted Nihlus to know he'd been there, so he didn't bother to disable the cameras or delete the footage. The Spectre stared at the screen for a couple of seconds before activating his omnitool and routing a call through to Shepard.

Shepard appeared on the screen, her entire upper body dripping in muck and things he didn't even want to look at too closely, her chest heaving with each breath as if she'd been running. Still, the moment she saw him, her face brightened into a beaming smile. "Hey there, handsome." She squinted at her tool as if she couldn't see clearly. "Wow, you are intensely clean. Look at that." She held the omnitool out toward Garrus, his fratrin's equally filthy face appearing. "Garrus, look how clean he is. That's disgusting."

Garrus merely growled a little and pushed her arm away.

Chuckling, she brought Nihlus back around so he was looking at her. "Forgive the general, he's got mud ground into every seam, orifice, and pore. We all do."

In the background Wrex said something about it being an invigorating place to fight, earning himself a growl from Garrus.

"So, what can we do for you, oh disgustingly clean one?" Shepard asked, shifting a little, and then glancing over her shoulder when gunfire erupted somewhere close.

"Are you being shot at?" he asked, preparing to hang up the call. Adrenaline surging through his veins, he searched the picture for any sign of bullets impacting her shields or surroundings.

She shook her head and looked back. "Not currently. We've only been on the ground for about fifteen minutes." She grinned. "Long story, and about … four factions all trying to kill each other. So … to what do I owe the intense pleasure of your face, cikabeknai?"

"I think I already know the answer … " He transferred the security footage to his omnitool and played it for her. "... but is this Subject Alpha?" The turian on the screen hid his face inside a deep hood, but as the cloth moved with his slight limp, mechanical parts gleamed in the light. Nihlus pulled his mandibles in tight, his heart sinking into his gut. Damn it, limp or no limp, he knew. He just knew.

"Yeah, that looks like Al, all right." Her tone lowered, roughening. "Are you okay? There weren't any surprises waiting for you?"

He shut off the vid. "I'm fine. He broke into Saren's office in the apartment, went through the boxes, and set out a few things for me."

Her face turned to stone, her lips pressing together so hard that mud squeezed out between them. "Nihlus, about Al … ." She hesitated, taking a deep breath. "He's—"

The Spectre nodded, his gut wrapping itself into an intricate knot. "Yeah, I think I just figured it out." His shoulders lifted and dropped in a helpless, automatic sort of shrug. "How, Jane? How could it be?"

Gunfire erupted on the other end once more, but that time Shepard ducked down, taking cover. "Same way I'm here, love. Be careful," she called over the roar of returning gunfire. "I don't think he's a danger, but who knows." She kissed at the screen. "Love you, talk later."

"And I love you, haksaya kubenar." The screen went blank, her muddy, beautiful face vanishing back into battle. Damn, he should be there. He knew Garrus had her back, but she was crazy ... the sort of crazy that required a full time platoon of eyes watching her back. The back of his neck warmed, his face relaxing into a tiny smile as her last words replayed inside his head. Calling him love had rolled off her tongue as easily as it did with Garrus.

Pulling his head out of the clouds, as sunny and beautiful as they were, he turned back to the security footage, watching Subject Alpha move through the apartment. The torin stopped here and there, running his talons along the edge of a table or a piece of art. He paused at the bottom of the stairs, both hands on the railings, his hands bare. For a moment, he seemed to think about climbing, but then he let his foot drop and turned toward the office.

"What have you become?" Nihlus whispered at the computer screen. "What do you want?"

Without taking his eyes off the computer, he reached down between his feet and picked up the journal, opening it to a page with a particularly worn and folded set of corners.

"He showed me what lies behind the curtain tonight. Afterwards, I wandered the city for hours, trying to walk off the nightmares beating at the inside of my head, but it didn't help.

There have been thousands, even millions before me. Each one finds something, each one becomes intrigued and then obsessed, each one believes that they are in control. They are all wrong. So, he showed me what lies out there, what it is that calls to me ... the whispers that scrape at the inside of my skull, talons carving messages in the bone.

He showed me the Vanguard.

He said it needs me, that I have been chosen.

I don't understand why it would choose me. I don't want to help them, I've been trying to find a way to stop this madness before the curtain falls.

I returned to the apartment, showered. I got into bed, wrapped myself in Nihlus's heat, but there is no sleep left to me in this universe. I've got to find a way to stop them, a way to answer the question.

It promises that my mind will remain free. He warns me that it lies, but what else can I do?

Nihlus. The darkness would take him just to use him against me. He warns it may have already happened, but I don't believe it. Not Nihlus. He's the only pure thing in my life.
I need to leave. I've got to go before the darkness decides to use him.

I need to leave."

Nihlus stared at the last few lines, then looked up at the last frame of the security video, the picture frozen on a grey cloak getting out of the elevator on the roof. He didn't doubt that Saren left him for more reasons than anyone could fathom. The voices in his head betrayed the level of indoctrination infecting the Spectre even then. However, one tiny, private part of Saren's mind had walked out the door in order to protect Nihlus.

He shut the book and set it on the table next to the computer. He'd read it all, but not right then. Right then, he needed to give that part of his life the respect and closure it demanded. For all of Saren's flaws and faults, some part of him had loved Nihlus.

Nihlus. The darkness would take him just to use him against me.

The darkness? What did that mean?

The Haestrom shipyard slithered into his guts, a pool of pitch, cold and sluggish, but warming with every beat of his heart. The tar crept up his spine, splashing from vertebrae to vertebrae and pulling itself toward his brain. Once it got there, he knew what came next. The darkness.

Did Saren mean the orbs … the second indoctrination signal? He must have. Hadn't Dr. Chakwas and Lawson just established that the orb signal had fought off and protected Shepard from the Reaper signal? Two factions of Reapers trying to wipe one another out? He needed to read the rest of the journal. Finding out who was behind the orbs had become priority one.

The door rang, yanking Nihlus out of the endless loop of questions and complete lack of answers. He let out a quick, rough sigh when he saw Thane's face on the monitor. Damn, he'd forgotten to set new codes for the doors and send one to the drell. He got up and quickly crossed to the door.

"Thane," he said when it slid open, "apologies, I got distracted. I'll do the door codes now."

The drell shrugged and chuckled. "And I missed my last call in due to a very impressive line at the restaurant." He held up three bags. "My missions did both meet with success, however."

Nihlus caught a whiff of steam off the bags, and his stomach let out an impressive growl. His gut had been tied in too many knots, and his head full of too many warring thoughts to acknowledge something as base as hunger. He tipped his head toward the kitchen table where Sol was working. "Let's eat and we can fill one another in on what we've discovered."

Nihlus used setting the table and laying out the food as an opportunity to order and focus his mind. They sat down and ate in silence for long moments before Thane sat back, took a long drink, wiped his mouth on his napkin, then looked to Nihlus.

"I identified all of the factions following us. There are four. Three are physically surveilling you, the fourth is monitoring your security feed," he nodded when Nihlus glanced up at the cameras. "I discovered a remote intercept on the exterior upstairs window. I scrambled it temporarily. Anyone with talent in electronics will have eyes back inside this apartment within a couple of hours."

"Thank you for not disabling it just yet," Nihlus replied, feeling remarkably calm for having just heard that four groups of people were following him. "I might be able to trace the signal back to its source." He waggled his head a little and ate a couple of fried tubers. "Although, I'm pretty certain I know who those eyes belong to. How about the others?"
Thane ate a few mouthfuls before he answered. "One is the Eclipse, as I thought. I managed to separate one of their rear guards. He said that the organization has a standing order to keep eyes on you whenever you're on Illium. They've been on retainer for several cycles now. Their orders are not to interfere unless you're attacked."

Nihlus nearly choked on his mouthful of burger. He set the food down and thumped on the side of his chest for a moment. "They're protecting me?" When the drell answered by way of a serene nod, the Spectre sighed. "This just gets more and more odd."

"The third party is an asari, but she merely watched the front room windows for a while, then left, heading for a bar in the lower part of the city. She seemed to be in her late maiden or early matron period and was dressed as a civilian. I noted nothing descript about her at all." He shifted in his seat, appearing more discomfited by failing to discover what, if any, threat the asari posed than anything else so far.

"At the bar, she ordered a drink and headed for the dance floor. I watched her for a few more minutes, but she simply danced."

"And the fourth set?" Nihlus's gut rolled into a knot that tightened a little more as the seconds dragged past. Something told him that Thane had saved the worst news for last.

"Is the one that worries me," the drell said, the deepening of his tone and the slight tension in his muscles betraying the truth behind the words. "I believe she is a Justicar, and she fully intends to kill you."

(A-N: So, at last, another chapter. Been too long, and I apologize for that. I'd say, be glad you aren't reading Machinations, but some of you are … so to quote The Doctor … "No … that's more guilt!" Seriously though, I do apologize for my lack of focus.

Oddly enough, a new story trying to beat its way out of my head has given me back my focus. I started a story that is all maqqy96's fault. It is the story of Kat Shepard, who is already a Spectre and married to Nihlus when Eden Prime comes along. It's also an AU, and going to be a very different sort of war.

Anywhoo … off to Korlus to play in the mud next. Am aiming to get back on Monday and Thursdays again. fingers crossed Love to all. hugs and thanks thanks thanks, as always.)
She opened her eyes, wincing at the bright light pouring in through the holes in the shuttle's hull. Distant gunfire and the tick of cooling metal rang loud in the vacuum left when Garrus shut the shuttle's systems down. Gunfire. They'd landed in the middle of the Blue Suns' forward line. Prying her fingers off her harness, she shook off the morbid shadow.

"Come on, people," she whispered just loud enough for the rest of the occupants to hear her. "Anyone hurt?" She unbuckled her harness and got up. "Sound off. Anyone hurt?"

44 Days ASR

The shuttle slewed hard to port, tossing Shepard into her safety harness, then the dampeners caught up and slammed her back the other way. "Five minutes until we landed safe and sound," she grumbled to herself. "Five bloody minutes." She leaned over to look through the door into the pilot compartment, waiting for Garrus to fill her in.

"Taking fire!" Garrus called back, glancing over his shoulder. The frustrated strain that flattened out his subvocals told Shepard that their situation looked sticky, but not yet hopeless. Not the best news, but she'd take it. The general turned back to his controls. "Wrex, concentrate fire on the line thirty degrees starboard."

Wrex's answering bellow coincided with another hard slam to port. "Got a bead on their heavies now. Quit busting my hump."

Another blast, that one kicking the shuttle right in the backside, threw Shepard up into her harness, then slammed her down into her seat hard enough that her tailbone and the backs of her thighs started singing a three part harmony. Even before Garrus managed to correct the little vessel's flight, it began to shake. Not a slight tremor, either, but a 'large dog just getting out of the bath, jowls flying everywhere' sort of shaking.

"Stabilizers are down," the general shouted back, his subvocals completely flat, edging into what she liked to call 'we'll be lucky to survive' mode. "Everyone get your helmets on, this isn't going to be subtle."

Putting on a helmet in a crashing ship amounted to no mean feat, a fact Shepard proved as she cracked herself right across the bridge of her nose in the process. Pain seared up her nose and into her sinuses, virulent enough that her eyes rained tears so thick that she could barely see. Mopping her face with her gloves, and cussing up a storm under her breath, she managed to wrangle the menace onto her head and seal it.

She hit her medigel when she felt a tickle under her nose. At least she didn't think she'd broken it.

"Try not to crash us right in front of the enemy," Wrex bellowed.
"I'm trying to steer us away from them," Garrus said, his voice low and snarling. The shuttle half rolled to port, then overcorrected the other way. "It's like trying to fly a drunken krogan."

Shepard glanced across the shuttle's passenger compartment at the other occupants. The Marines sat, tense but judging by the glares levelled on the three krogan opposite them, it wasn't because of crashing. Two of the krogan didn't appear the slightest bit phased by the shuttle's bathing Saint Bernard maneuvers. However, the expression on the third krogan's face had Shepard searching under his seat for a puddle.

To Shepard's far left, Jack just reclined in her seat, arms crossed over her chest, her body swinging loosely with every jolt and weave. And, at Shepard's right elbow, Urdnot Bakara sat almost unnaturally still, as if she defied the laws of physics.

To say that the krogan shaman's attendance on their little adventure had been a surprise would amount to a pretty monumental understatement. Shepard had kissed Nihlus goodbye and headed over to the Passch expecting to meet up with Wrex. Garrus hadn't mentioned anyone else accompanying the krogan on the mission. What awaited them was the clan leader, the shaman, and six battlemasters.

According to Wrex, the warlord, Okeer, was one of the most hated krogan in their history, and Wrex had faced an overwhelming number of volunteers to make sure O'Keer never left Korlus alive. Bakara had insisted on coming along to be sure that revenge didn't destroy anything that might lead to a genophage cure.

"There's nowhere to crash this thing that won't get us all killed," Garrus called back, effort fracturing his words, "other than where the Blue Suns have their line set."

Shepard activated her omnitool and brought up the scans of the area. He was right about the terrain. They were thick in the midst of wrecked ships. The Blue Suns had set themselves up a long open deck. "How stable do you think that deck they're on is?" she shouted back. "Strong enough to support a crashing shuttle?"

"No! Shepard!" Wrex looked back. "Tell me you're not thinking thresher maw!"

She drew her idea over the scan to help Garrus guide the shuttle in along the path that would take out the maximum number of mercs. At least, she hoped it would. "That's exactly what I'm thinking, Brother Wrex." She sent the information to the console. "We're crashing anyway. If we're going to trash our ride, might as well send her through the belly of the beast."

Garrus grunted when the console lit up with her plan. "If it wasn't our best chance to avoid death … ." His hands flew over the controls. "I'll do my best. Everyone hang on."

Shepard tightened her restraints and closed her eyes. After a second, she opened them again and looked around.

Something’s wrong.

Looking forward into the cockpit, she saw that both Garrus and Wrex worked calmly, focused on the task at hand. Other than the christmas tree of console warning lights, there was no other sign of imminent death. No smoke or flame.

Something’s missing.

The rest of the passengers remained calm. Even the terrified krogan sat quietly, eyes closed, his lips moving behind his faceplate as if praying to his gods or ancestors. Still, the nagging sensation pricked the back of her neck. She'd crashed more than a few times, and something was completely absent from that moment. But … .

She closed her eyes once again, listening to the ambient sounds, the engines and thrusters … the creak and groan of tortured metal as the shuttle torqued first one way then the other. Her heartbeat … quick and … .

Except it wasn't quick. Her heart thumped slow and steady in her chest. Sitting up, she held her hand out, fingers spread, and stared at it with a combination of wonder and dread. Absolutely still.

Fear is what's missing, Janey. Somewhere along the line, you've lost your fear of dying.

She scowled and glanced back at the cockpit as the engines changed pitch, Garrus dropping them down and levelling out so that they skated across the platform rather than tumbling end for end. Watching the readouts without really seeing them, Shepard ran back through the last month of her life. Over that expanse of time, a great many things had terrified her, but dying … she couldn't think of a single instance.

"Impact in ten … nine … ."

Shepard crossed her arms over her chest and grasped the handles on the harness, then tucked her chin into her chest. There was nothing to fear beyond death. Life … life was the thing to fear.

"... three … two … one." The impact flung Shepard into her harness and drove the air from her lungs, friction and momentum making her their bitch. Auditory insanity wrapped her skull in crushing, skeletal fingers: metal screamed, engines roared, and rockets pounded the hull with gigantic, fiery fists. For what seemed like a good half hour, the shuttle slid along the rusted out metal deck plating, but then the right front corner caught on something, spinning the entire vehicle around twice … three times before it slammed to a deafeningly silent, rocking halt.

The only beings that don't fear death are the dead.

She opened her eyes, wincing at the bright light pouring in through the holes in the shuttle's hull. Distant gunfire and the tick of cooling metal rang loud in the vacuum left when Garrus shut the shuttle's systems down. Gunfire. They'd landed in the middle of the Blue Suns' forward line. Prying her fingers off her harness, she shook off the morbid shadow.

"Come on, people," she whispered just loud enough for the rest of the occupants to hear her. "Anyone hurt?" She unbuckled her harness and got up. "Sound off. Anyone hurt?"

"Vakarian, okay."

"Wrex, okay."

The rest of them spoke up, nothing worse than bruises to report.

Shepard met Garrus's eyes, admiration tweaking one corner of her mouth. "Nice landing, General." She winked, then focused on the mercs outside the shuttle.

Voices crept into the silence. First groans, then calls for help and then the unmistakable sound of an officer rallying the remainder of her troops.

"Okay," Shepard whispered, "everyone up on your feet, weapons in hand. Stay quiet, we want them to think we're incapacitated as long as we can." First order of business: see how fucked they were. "Garrus, the sensors still work?" When he grunted affirmation, she crept over to a long gash torn in the side of the shuttle, just above the floor. No doubt where the object responsible for their spin snagged.

Lowering herself onto her belly, she peered out the hole. A whole load of bodies lay strewn and sprawled. The deck hadn't been wide enough for the mercs to get out of the shuttle's path. She didn't see anyone moving, and popped back up onto her feet. "Anything?" she asked, sticking her head through into the cockpit.

"A dozen but they must have all jumped down, they're all on the ground," Garrus replied. "The deck isn't solid, they're going to be able to shoot up at us."

Shepard's mind started whirling, and she waved for them to join everyone in the back. "You know where we need to go once we're out there, so you and Wrex take point. Move fast and low. How far are we going to have to drop?"

Garrus shrugged his assault rifle into his hand. "Seven metres."

Shepard winced. "Two storeys." She moved to the hatch and popped the seal. "Wrex, battlemasters
… when you get to the end, hit the deck. You'll lower Jack, myself, Bakara, and Woo as far as you can before letting go. Garrus, grab as good a sniper perch as you can and try to force the Suns into cover." She looked from face to face then leaned down and lifted the hatch. "Let's go fuck shit up, people."

Any doubts Shepard harboured regarding bringing Bakara along disappeared the moment they hit the deck running. The shaman moved with the easy, badass grace of a seasoned warrior. As Shepard ran alongside the krogan and the young biotic, she pulled in deep, ecstatic breaths, an exhilarated grin burning across her face. The sun warmed their heads, a bright fall morning dawned on Korlus, and battle awaited.

"It's a good day," she said to no one in particular.

The deck ran for nearly eighty metres before ending in an abrupt tear of jagged, twisted metal. As smooth as clockwork, Garrus took cover against the railing, sniper rifle in hand, and set the mercs running for cover. Wrex and the three battlemasters hit the deck, twisting to reach up for the hands of the few too squishy to jump. Shepard grabbed hold of Wrex's wrists, his giant hands locking around hers, and then jumped, the clan leader swinging her around with the ease of a parent twirling their four-year-old in the park.

Explosive giggles set in as she sailed through the air. "Higher, Wrex, swing me higher!" she called, giggles bursting into laughter when he cursed and let her drop. Then mud. Her feet hit the ground, legs sinking knee high into greasy slop before hitting anything remotely solid. For about a second, she congratulated herself on sticking the landing, the next, she landed flat on her back, feet in the air.

Her entire universe turned a sickly gray-brown as her head snapped back, muck pouring over her.
She flailed, panicking for a half second before she realized she'd left her helmet on, and she could still breathe. Pulling her arms into her sides, she pressed down, trying to heave herself up, but the muck proved just thick enough that she'd created a suction pocket.

When sitting up didn't work, she tried to roll over, managing to roll about ten degrees before flopping back. Her next attempt, rocking like a stuck Mako, just ended up digging her in deeper.
Finally, she gave up and tipped her ear to her shoulder to activate her comms.

"Hey, people," she called, helpless, giddy laughter setting in. "I know most of you are probably shooting the bad guys and the rest are laughing your asses off, but when you get a second, could someone lift me onto my feet." It took a good five minutes before the sound of biotics and gunfire ceased.

"Wrex," Garrus's voice came through on the radio, "are you filming this? We're going to want a record for posterity. Our kids and grandkids are going to want to see this."

"Been taking vid since the moment she landed," the krogan confirmed.

"Stop making fun of your commanding officer and get me out of the mud," she hollered, slamming a petulant fist down into the slop.

"Hey!" Garrus said, his voice oscillating between annoyance and humour. "I'm not covered in muck and would like to stay that way." She heard slow, sucking footsteps walk around her. "Stop flailing, or I'll leave you here."

Jack laughed. "That's the fucking saddest thing I've ever seen, Shepard."

Shepard flashed her middle finger, earning another laugh from the biotic. "Fuck you very much, Jack. Thank you."

Strong hands hooked through her armpits. As Garrus pulled, Shepard felt her front side ripping away to leave her entire back side buried in the mud forever.

"Sweet spirits, Shepard, how did you get this stuck?" He heaved, nearly pulling her shoulders out of joint. A heavy sigh and grumble came through the comms, then he worked his arms further around her, clasping hands in the center of her chest. "Okay, this too is not going to be subtle." He adjusted his grip a little. "Wrex, spot me. If she just pops loose, I don't want to end up on my ass, needing rescue."

Shepard tried to help, but then Garrus's helmet thumped gently against hers. "Hold still. I've got you." He took a deep breath. "Okay, on three. One ..." A sharp jerk knocked the wind out of her, but after a second of painfully intense pressure, the mud let out a truly grotesque sucking sound and released its hold on her.

Garrus staggered back far enough that she thought for sure the krogan would be trying to pull them both loose, but then he stabilized and set her on her feet. When he let go of her, she scraped at the visor of her helmet, trying to clear it. No good.

"Someone pour some water over my hands, please?" she asked, holding her hands out. She felt the pressure and then the slight chill of water glugging from a bottle to sluice over her gloves.

"You're good to go," Garrus said a minute later. "Do you want me to do your helmet as well?"

"No, I'm going to take it off." She reached up and snapped the seals. "Can't stand the thing at the best of times." Hitting the retract control, she let out a long sigh of relief and eased it off her head. "Much better. Damn thing's claustrophobic when I can see out." She clipped it to her belt in the back, then sorted herself, shrugging her armour higher on her shoulders and cracking her neck.

That done, she looked up at the general. She supposed she should feel embarrassed, maybe even annoyed that she'd needed to be rescued. Instead, she just felt warm and content, despite the mud dripping off every, single body part. It was all right for her fiance to rescue her from the occasional mud puddle. She grinned at Garrus and reached up, grabbing hold of his cowl. She pulled him down to her eye level. "Thanks. You're gorgeous covered in mud. It really highlights your eyes."
He chuffed. "It does nothing for you." She pressed an enthusiastic kiss against his mouth, then released him. Remaining bent over for a half second, he said. "A little more so now, maybe."

"Okay, kissing part over, behaving like professionals and fucking shit up commencing." Shepard waved toward the road that led further into the labyrinth of junked ships, the elation she'd felt earlier not waning for her wallow in the mud. "Move out. Vakarian and Wrex back on point." She pointed to Woo and one of the krogans … Barl? That sounded right. "You two are walking drag. Take it slow, save your strength, and keep your eyes open, people."

Shepard shrugged her Mattock into her hand, grimacing at the mud clogging it up. "Oh, damn, look at you." She grabbed a bottle of water and rinsed it off. "We're going to need to find a solid, defensible rest area and hose down once we're clear of this." She glanced up at the sun, its rays already good and damned hot for 0800 in the morning. They'd be glad of their suits' climate control well before noon.

She headed over to the first of the bodies, then turned back, giving Jack a nod. "Grab their water bottles. We're going to need them, I think." She dove into the corpses' packs, pulling out bottles and distributing. When she threw one to Bakara, she held the shaman's gaze. "You doing all right?"

The giant head bowed in a single, graceful nod, the krogan's eyes sparkling. "I'm fine, Captain."

"Hells yes, you are," Jack crowed. "They were all gawking at her, and she just walked right up. Bam! Shotgun to the gut, then shotgun to the head." The biotic threw Garrus and Wrex each a bottle. "Pure badass."

Shepard grinned and raised her eyebrows. "Very good, then. Glad to have you on the team, Shaman."

"Glad to be here." The krogan chuckled and took position on the flank behind Wrex.

Once they all had a couple of extra bottles, she gave Garrus the signal to move out. They had a long day ahead of them, far too much of it wallowing in mud up to their knees. She glanced around. All right, up to her knees.

They hiked for ten minutes before she brought them to a halt and had them spread out to rest. Her thighs burned with enough vigor that she knew that someone would need to put her in a wheelbarrow and push her around if she slept for longer than a couple of hours. Garrus and one of the krogan took positions on the leading and trailing flanks to watch for enemy, but she wasn't expecting anything for a hundred metres or so yet. They'd broken through the Blue Suns' outer line, but the mercs had staggered lines around a nearly kilometre wide radius.

Shepard crouched next to Garrus and opened the map they'd created from EDI's scans. "Okay, so we've got Blue Suns spread out around three quarters of this circle." She traced a fingertip around the arc. "Their lines range from a hundred metres out from Okeer's lab to a kilometre. And the Collectors are moving in from the north, a straight wedge driving in along one flank." She paused and looked up, searching the ice blue of his stare for any sign of the connection that eluded her.

"So what's fighting out from the center?" he asked. He snapped the seal on his helmet and peeled it off, setting it next to him. "I don't know. For someone who called for help days ago, Okeer seems to be doing a hell of a job keeping everyone out of his base."

"Yeah." She opened her comm to the Ypres. "EDI, can you send me updated scans with troop placement, please?"
"Sending now, Shepard," the AI's even, pleasant tone replied. "The Collector lines have not changed. They appear to have bunkered down rather than pushing toward the base."

Shepard winced and clicked her tongue against the side of her mouth. "That's not good news. What are they waiting for?" She lifted her hand to her ear, her mind whirring through the different reasons they might bunker down. Most of them sat like lumps of cold mud in her belly. "And there is no sign of their cruisers?"

"None, Captain," Steve replied. "We're monitoring the area around the relay in case they jump in, but it's all quiet up here."

"Okay, keep sharp. The Collectors aren't sitting out because it's time for their tea. I'll be in touch. Shepard, out." She closed the channel then opened another. "Beta Team, you out there? Sparky, you breathin?" Shifting a little to rest one leg, Shepard leaned back against the cover. "My legs are going to fall off from heaving through this muck," she muttered.

Jack laughed. "Yeah, but you'll have thighs like redwoods." The biotic flopped down on a concrete pad and stretched her legs out, not seeming to mind the mud in the least.

"Great, just what I needed. Skinny leetle body, great beeg legs." Shepard frowned. Where was Beta Team? They hadn't reported taking fire. "Beta Team, report your status. If you can't reply, squawk." She shook her head when Garrus looked down at her, brow plates raised, questioning. "Beta Team. Sparky, respond damn it."

The frequency crackled a couple of times, then cleared. "Beta Team here, Shepard. Just landed. Didn't take any fire on the way in," Kaidan said, his voice pulling a relieved sigh from all the way down in Shepard's boots. "We saw what was left of your shuttle. Strange, but I didn't know there wereresher maws on Korlus."

"Smart-mouthed people live short, tormented lives, Sparky," Shepard replied, a broad grin cracking the drying mud on her face. "We took fire coming in, but all hands present and accounted for. You're welcome, by the way, for distracting them." She switched legs. "How long until you've got us covered?"

"We're just about there, now. A couple of krogan ran out of the wrecks at us, slowed us down a couple of minutes."

Her grin folded into a scowl. "Krogan? What the hell is going on here?" She pressed that question aside for a second. "All right. Squawk when you're in position, Sparky. We'll move out once you're ready."

"Aye, aye, ma'am. Beta Team, out." The channel closed.

"Krogan?" Garrus asked, his face looking as confused as Shepard felt. "What about krogan?"

Finally giving in to her legs' complaints, Shepard sat cross-legged in the mud. "Beta Team were attacked by a couple that charged out of the wrecks." She shook her head and reached up to scratch her temple. "If Okeer has an army of them, that might explain why his base is still clear." She opened the new scans from EDI.

"The Blue Suns are losing ground, being driven back," Garrus said, pointing to a spot in the west. "That might be Okeer's krogan." He let out a hard, noisy sigh and shrugged. "We need better traction on whatever is going on here."

A soft rumble of agreement rolled from Shepard's throat, but before she could reply, her omnitool dinged. She jumped a little, startled, then chuckled. "Getting jumpy in my old age." She glanced toward the Suns' lines to see if anything closed on them. Gunfire echoed from further into the jungle of wrecks, but nothing that indicated movement toward their position.

She hit the button to answer the call before the tool dinged again. A wide grin greeted Nihlus's appearance. "Hey there, handsome." Her fingers lifted, longing to reach through the image and brush the length of his mandible.

She squinted against the lighting, the windows behind him turned him into a silhouette, only his familia notas showing up clearly. He looked amazing, clean and smart in a fancy suit. "Wow, you are intensely clean. Look at that." She held the omnitool out toward Garrus, unable to hide a teasing chuckle at the sheer amount of muck clinging to her general. "Garrus, look how clean he is.
That's disgusting."

Garrus's growl just made her cackle harder as he pushed her arm away.

When she looked into Nihlus's eyes once more, she shrugged and said, "Forgive the general, he's got mud ground into every seam, orifice, and pore. We all do." She wriggled, some of that mud gritting between her inner thigh and the elastic around the leg of her panties. Fifteen minutes. Good lord, what was it going to be like after a day?

"Are you kidding me?" Wrex said, his voice a low rumble of joy. "This planet challenges you, stalks you like a pack of varren, death waiting one mistake away."

"Shut up, Wrex," Garrus grumbled. "You not allowed to speak until we've all evac'd this buratrum, taken showers, and are clean and dry."

Shepard waited, watching them with one eyebrow raised until they stopped grousing and turned back to keeping watch. "So, what can we do for you, oh disgustingly clean one?" she asked. A burst of gunfire echoed through the wreck from maybe five levels above her. She pushed up into a crouch and twisted, glancing over her shoulder and the cover, watching for unwelcome guests.

"Alenko," Garrus said into his comms, "you got eyes on this firefight?" He listened for a moment, then nodded. "Roger that. Vakarian, out." Turning to meet Shepard's eyes, the general shook his head. "Seven levels up," he said.

Nihlus meanwhile nearly jumped through the screen. "Are you being shot at?" he asked, worry dropping his brow plates and mandibles.

She shook her head. "Not currently. We've only been on the ground for about fifteen minutes." She grinned. "Long story, and about … four factions all trying to kill each other. So … to what do I owe the intense pleasure of your face, cikabeknai?" He really did look good: worried about her and something else, but happy. He and his squad must have had a decent trip.

"I think I already know the answer … " His face disappeared in favour of a view of a modern, austere sort of apartment and a figure dressed in a ragged, gray cloak. "... but is this Subject Alpha?"

There was no mistaking that limp, nor the way he held himself. "Yeah, that looks like Al, all right."
Now she knew what he was worried about. The grin dissolved as she watched the cloaked form touching objects with a familiar sort of longing. Damn. She hadn't been sure what Al would do when it came to Nihlus, so she'd kept silent on the subject. She figured there was no point in uneartthing old ghosts for Nihlus if Al planned to fly below the radar. Lowering her voice and angling herself away from the others to keep the conversation just between them, she asked, "Are you okay? There weren't any surprises waiting for you?"

The apartment disappeared, Nihlus's face replacing it. The Spectre shook his head and shrugged as if to say none of it mattered, but the set to his mandibles gave away how disconcerted he felt. "I'm fine. He broke into Saren's office in the apartment, went through the boxes, and set out a few things for me."

Damn it. Why was Al messing with Nihlus? If he wanted to turn over information about Sovereign and the Reapers, he should have given it to her. She pressed her lips into a tight frown, then spat a little mud. It tasted like rotting rat carcasses and vomit. Damn. Damn. Damn. Was it kinder to tell Nihlus? Smarter not to? No, she needed to tell him. "Nihlus, about Al … ." She hesitated, bracing to deliver the blow. "He's—"

"Yeah," Nihlus said, cutting her off, "I think I just figured it out." His shoulders lifted and dropped in a helpless, automatic sort of shrug that tugged at her heart. She needed to be there with him. That was it. After the three of them completed their missions, they didn't split up again, not if the universe was going to keep taking the cheap shots at them. "How, Jane? How could it be?"

Gunfire erupted once more, but that time she heard rounds thumping into her cover. The others opened fire, the roar of eight guns nearly deafening. She focused back on Nihlus, keeping her head down. "Same way I'm here, love. Be careful." A round tore a chunk out of the rusting metal next to her head. Fuck, as much as she wanted to comfort him, she needed to start dispensing bullets. "I don't think he's a danger, but who knows," she said and kissed at him, trying to put enough into her words to get him through until they could talk properly. "Love you, talk later."

"And I love you, haksaya kubenar."

She hit the omnitool to close the message and grabbed her Mattock. "What have we got?" she called, leaning up enough to peer over the cover and locate the enemy.

"Blue Suns," Jack yelled over her shoulder as she sent a shockwave thundering across the open area. "These ones seem to be on the run from something."

Spotting good cover about twenty metres closer to the Blue Suns' line, she crept around Bakara and Garrus to crouch at the end of the low wall. "We need to catch ourselves a Blue Sun, find out what the hell is going on." She scanned the enemy. They were disorganized, firing in two directions. That confirmed Jack's theory.

A young man staggered out of cover and limped a little closer to Shepard's position before throwing himself behind a crate. A cold smile splintered across her face, a fracture through thin ice. "That's my target, people. Leave him alive." She braced to run. "Moving up," she called. "Give me some cover." She leaned out to make sure her quarry wasn't trying to escape, then put two rounds into the crate, either side of his head. Chuckling at his shrill bleat of terror, she turned her attention to a centurion. A strong overload tore down the turian's shields and staggered him enough to finish him off. For just over five minutes the pulse of battle pounded out its rhythm, a tune so well known that she could dance to it in her sleep. Overload, fire. Overload, fire. Then silence.

Well, except for the whispered litany from behind the crate ahead and to her left. "Shit," the kid muttered. "Shit. Won't stop bleeding. Gunna ... I'm gunna ...." He collapsed onto one hip, holding himself up on a shaky arm. "Son of a bitch."

Shepard switched her Mattock for her sidearm and strode over, the pistol aimed at his head. Despite all his moaning, his wounds didn't look that bad. "Just hit the medigel, kid. You're far from dead." She chuckled, lacing it with ice shards and metal spikes. "For now."

"I knew it wasn't berserkers," he said, spitting the words at her. "Your mercs, or Alliance. Go screw yourselves. I won't tell you shit."

Shepard laughed, bright and merry. "Your bravado really is adorable, but yeah, you're going to sing like a canary, sweetheart, and you're going to do it quick-like, see?" She pressed her lips tight as Garrus greeted her hard-boiled detective voice with a choice curse. Crouching down, she held her hand out for the kid's gun. "So ..." She took the weapon and laid her arm across her thigh. "... what in the name of holy fuck is going on here?"
Tearing his thoughts away from the craving hanging from the back of his tongue, a thirst that ached all the way down to his knees, he focused on the business at hand. And that amounted to nothing more than another dead end. He cracked his neck and glanced up at the bank. An entire day wasted. Wrapping an arm around his rolling, angry belly, he headed across the street to the car. He reached for the cab's door control, a flash of grey cloak and silver face plates in his peripherals freezing him in place, hand reaching out. Shattering the ice that held him, Nihlus spun around, searching the crowd for any sign of Specimen Alpha.

Inluvis - The second gestational period in turian pregnancy. Between 8 and 16 weeks. Slang: Little one, in the sense of being young and underdeveloped.

Obluvis - One who is senile or absent-minded.

Cisera: A non-alcoholic, fizzy cider made from the juice of more than twenty varieties of edible cactus analogues.

Maribellas - Beautiful female … a term of endearment aimed more toward a younger female or one with a greater social distance from the speaker.

Puercuna - Cradle or a bed for a child.

45 Days ASR

Emerging from bright, institutional lighting into the deep mauves and patchy, brilliant neon and streetlights of evening, Nihlus paused, blinking a little as his vision adjusted. Sol ran up his heels, then cussed and gave him a shove that rattled every nerve in his already frustrated, twitchy body.

The Spectre took a deep breath and rubbed his hands against the outsides of his thighs, his one pausing over his flask before he clenched them both into fists.

Tearing his thoughts away from the craving hanging from the back of his tongue, a thirst that ached all the way down to his knees, he focused on the business at hand. And that amounted to nothing more than another dead end. He cracked his neck and glanced up at the bank. An entire day wasted. Wrapping an arm around his rolling, angry belly, he headed across the street to the car. He reached for the cab's door control, a flash of grey cloak and silver face plates in his peripherals freezing him in place, hand reaching out. Shattering the ice that held him, Nihlus spun around, searching the crowd for any sign of Specimen Alpha.
Gaze darting over the crowd, he saw only a painting in shades of blue and purple, the odd variant sketched here and there as turians, humans, and salarians pushed through, making their way down the busy street. Not a hint of grey cloak or a turian face he recognized.

"Senux?" Sol called from the other side of the car. "What's going on? I thought we were done for the day?"

Feeling a snarky whinge building on the horizon, he abandoned his search and opened the cab. Sol's muttering about being starved to death had started about the time they opened their fifth empty safety deposit box of the day, and after two more, the racket coming from her guts was reaching a truly disturbing pitch. So when she opened her mouth, mandibles already flexing, he nodded. "Sure, getting something to eat sounds good." Cocking his head, he flicked his mandibles at her, then looked to Thane. "The asari who went into the bar, did she look at home there?"

The drell nodded once, then ducked into the car. "She did. While she appears to have fixated on you for the moment, she is out of her element stalking her prey. She is a spider." He sat back, disappearing into the deep shadows of dusk. "She spins her web, casts her glamour, and waits."

Nihlus ducked into the car, sliding deftly onto the leather seat, his mind already flicking through calculations. If she was a spider, what about him pulled her out of her web? Would he send her scrambling for a hole if he pinged some of its threads? Or might he get a chance to put a face to at least one of the naisa hunting him? No one had interfered with him that day, not even coming close enough to set off any alarms, but the fact he was the center of so much attention tied an ugly knot in his gut. Well, a non-alcohol related knot, anyway.

"Spiders tend to stick to one web until the insects stop getting caught in it." He met and held Thane's stare in the mirror. "How badly will we stick out in the bar she went to last evening?"

The assassin's expression didn't show the slightest trace of emotion when he said, "You, badly. Solana and myself, not at all."

Sol let out a guffaw that settled into cackling. When he turned his glare on her, she shrugged one shoulder, her grin spreading. "Sorry, senux, what can I say, you practically have tight-ass cop tattooed across your forehead in neon."

"I can use that to my advantage." He set the destination for the block across from his building and relaxed into his seat. Closing his eyes, he cracked his neck first one way and then the other. Seven empty banks amounted to nearly twelve hours wasted. Well, mostly wasted. All of the deposits, whether cash or boxes, had been withdrawn by the same asari. He'd set his omnitool to the task of discovering her identity after the second bank.

Saren had left a trail of pebbles behind, Nihlus felt sure of that, but someone else was sweeping it up before he could get to them. His day would have been better spent back at the apartment reading the journal, but sending Thane and Sol out on their felt too risky. Besides the banks might not have told them anything regardless of the paperwork they carried.

He could pull the Spectre card. The council had left his Spectre status intact in order to track his business. If he used it, they knew his exact location and what information he wanted. Not that he cared. Let them track him. He didn't rely on their good graces or on stealth. The chances of being able to do anything related to Archangel without the entire galaxy knowing was slim to none anyway.

Maybe he would let Thane and Sol go out on their own the next day and spend time with the journal. What he'd read the night before mostly covered the time around the occupation of Shanxi, long before he and Saren met, and provoked more questions than it answered.

If the Alliance had known what was going on under their noses, they wouldn't have retreated. They would have fought to the last soul to make sure Desolas didn't retrieve the artefact. What they might have done with it … he shuddered to think. Some objects just needed to be sent directly into the center of the sun.

More mysteries clouded the artefact General Desolas Arterius called the Arca Monolith than anyone should have been comfortable with. Who found it? Why and how had the Hierarchy come into its possession for its ship to crash on Shanxi? Desolas didn't just stumble upon it there; he'd been ordered to retrieve it and make sure that it made it back to Palaven.

Desolas wanted to elevate turians above the rest of the races, a goal he made no secret of. He believed that the turian empire needed to spread across the stars, to display a might that would bring all the races together under one rule. Saren shared his brother's goals even though he'd held his aspirations close to his chest rather than making the hierarchy privy to them. They were goals that Nihlus recognized from the fifty thousand cycle old memories in his head.

Somewhere in the back of his head, he felt a pattern forming. He just needed to—

"Hey, senux obluvis, are you just going to sit in the car, staring at the console?"

Nihlus looked up, blinking in the storm of neon flashing the entire spectrum of colour in his face. He glanced at Sol, who sat in the next seat, one reaching for the handle to get out, a genuinely concerned scowl making her mandibles twitch. The Spectre shook his head and waved her hand back inside, embarrassment heating his plates.

Senux obluvis indeed. He was starting to wander.

He checked to make sure Thane was still inside, then hit the control to close the top. Who knew was listening in the crowds milling along the street. "Sorry, I was trying to figure out what I read in Saren's journal last night, and why all the accounts and safety deposit boxes have been empty." He nodded toward the club's brightly lit door. "You two go ahead, get seats in a booth as far out of the way as you can get. I'll go in and spend some time at the bar before I join you."

His belly grumbled, but not for food, and he rubbed his hands on his thighs again. Soon he wouldn't be able to hide the tremors. Sliding his hand down to the pouch on his thigh, he sighed. No, he'd been doing so well since Shepard came to him and called him dilan. He could quit.

"Sere Krios," Sol said, "go ahead. I'll be with you in a second." She waited while Thane got out of the car, then closed the top before she turned to face Nihlus. Silence dragged on long enough that he wondered if she was trying some sort of interrogation technique on him before she said, "Take a drink, Nihlus." Letting out a deep, sad sounding breath, she turned to look out the side window. "I know you're trying, and I respect the hell out of that, but I can see your hands shaking. I know the nausea is getting bad." She looked back, meeting his stare, the sea-blue sparkling like jewels in the light. "And I'm pretty sure you had some sort of hallucination earlier."

Nihlus held the painfully compassionate stare for another second, then nodded and looked away. Damn, Herros Vakarian had raised his offspring to be far too observant. The love in her stare shamed him, the heat beneath his plates building until it writhed like maggots.

"You can't just quit, not now," Sol continued, reaching out to wrap her talons around his. "You're going to be sick for days when you do. So, sit here for the next ten minutes, sip at that damned flask, and then come in." She popped the top, but held it closed. "If there are assassins in there, you need to be functional and as alert as possible."
He turned his hand over to squeeze hers and nodded again, relieved as hell when she got out and closed the cab up behind her. Still, it took five minutes before he gave in and removed the flask from his pouch. As he held it to his mouth, he needed to fight down the urge to throw up. He was a weak fool who threw his pride and honour down the neck of a bottle every time life challenged him to rise above pain and difficulty.

As the sweet burn hit his tongue, a single thick, choking sob belched up from the pit of self-loathing in his gut, spewing half of it across the console. Fuck! Gagging, he fought back the legion of sobs trying to boil up his throat to follow the first. No! No! His self-pity could fall straight into the pits of buratrum. Finally wrestling down his gag reflex and walling up his emotions, he wiped his face and laid his head back against the seat. Closing his eyes, he focused on drawing in long, searing breaths. Sol was right. He didn't have the time to flush it out of his system. Functional needed to outweigh his old, destructive companions for the time being.

Gagging on another drink, he forced himself to think about something else. Why would Specimen Alpha leave out the bank information if someone was just going to run ahead of Nihlus, emptying everything out? Was someone trying to keep him from discovering what Alpha wanted him to find? Was the turian just messing with him? Playing with his head for kicks or who knew what other reasons?

The second page of the journal had only a few lines, Saren's usual handwriting jagged and broken … large and ungainly, like that of a child. When Nihlus read them, it felt as if something branded them into his mind, and for the first time since Eden Prime … maybe even long before, Nihlus had felt sympathy for his old friend and one-time lover.

Your time is at an end. It is the way of things. It is inevitable. You can't fight it. You can't avoid it. You have only two choices. You can hide. Or you can accept your fate. We are your destiny. (1)

That message, the discovery of what Sovereign was and what it intended to do had prompted Saren to do neither. He'd taken the wrong path, but nonetheless, the Spectre heard the message and said, 'No, I won't hide, and I won't accept that nothing can be done.' As much as Nihlus hated what Saren had done, he needed to respect that much.

"And he protected me from both the Reapers and the ones behind the black orbs." The sound of his voice echoing back off the window alerted Nihlus to the burn in his belly and his steady grip on the flask. He choked down one last small drink, then shoved the bottle back in its pouch. Taking a couple of long breaths, he opened the car and climbed out, the noise and glaring lights beating at his head.

He winced against the onslaught and pushed forward. The bar wouldn't prove much better than the street—he could already hear the music booming inside—but it would dull as the alcohol kicked in. Numb had its advantages.

The sheer noise level when he entered the bar knocked him back a step, and he made a mental note to get aural implants that allowed him to adjust the ambient volume. Still, exposure deafness set in, and he continued to the bar. Thane couldn't have been more correct about his ability to fit in. Other than a small squad of very tipsy asari police officers at one booth, he couldn't have discovered a more ill-fitting demographic if he tried.

Oh well, like he'd said, he could use it. Pushing up to the bar, he nodded to the bartender. "Puala nectar, please. In the bottle."

The nais chuckled and slid one down the counter. "In the bottle, how very badass of you, officer."
He just winked and flicked his mandibles. When she flushed, he grinned. Oh yeah, he still had it. He'd finished off one bottle and just started another when he felt eyes heating the back of his neck. Making a point of ignoring whomever it was, he turned to watch the gyrating taking place on the dance floor, and let out a long breath. Spirits, he was getting old.

"That's not what I'd expect a torin like you to be drinking," a soft, smoky voice said from behind his left shoulder. The sound brushed over him like warm, gentle fingertips down the arch of his neck.

Nihlus chuckled and glanced back but not far enough to see the speaker. Even though she left a metre or so buffer between them, the energy she gave off felt like silk and leather grappling hooks trying to snag him and draw him in. Without a good long career of dealing with seductive killers of all stripes, he might have fallen for it. "Oh," he answered after a pause long enough to make his lack of interest clear, "I'm a Spectre in a bar, which to my mind makes fruit nectar the ideal drink."

The asari finished closing and leaned against the bar a reasonable distance away. "Most cops I meet in bars can barely stand." She tilted her lovely, sculpted face up a little, creating the perfect angle to showcase her long neck clad in commando leathers before she tipped it toward the asari cops. "Those beauties couldn't be a better example. They see so much ugliness, that they come to places like this looking to forget."

Nihlus took a long drink. "And do you help them forget?" He turned just so he could see her from the corner of his eye and raised one brow plate.

Her turn to laugh. It practically sparkled, effervescent and lilting, music that whispered in his aural canal and twined around his will. 'Just relax' it sighed. 'Let down your guard.'

Not in a million cycles.

"Oh, not while they can't stand on their own," she replied, nodding to the bartender in a way that confirmed what Thane had said about her being comfortable there. The bartender knew her order even amidst a teeming crowd. Drawing slow circles on the counter with a single, elegant finger, the näis stared—sapphire eyes warm and curious on the side of his head—but didn't speak until the asari behind the bar slid a shot glass of something purple in front of her. Lifting it with two fingers, she tossed it back. "I prefer my quarry to have their senses intact. They enjoy themselves far more that way."

Nihlus didn't rise to her bait. Quarry had been used very deliberately, as she tried to shake something loose. She wanted to know something about him … probably why one of his other shadows was following him. If his instincts proved him out, and she was a predator and a murderer like he believed, it was his connection to the Justicar she wanted to know about. Would he prove to be an enemy or an ally? He didn't even twitch in her direction while she ordered and downed another of the purple drinks.

"Pleasure talking with you, Spectre," she said and turned away, hips swinging seductively. She walked a slow circle of the dance floor before approaching a young turian. The näis spoke to the tarin for a moment, then began to dance next to her. Swaying, a sultry midsummer breeze blowing over the tussat fields, her every move amounted to poetry … poetry meant to ensorcel his mind and inspire another part of him altogether.

Nihlus made a point of watching, his mandibles lifted a little, a clear signal that he knew she was trying to toy with him, but he didn't mind watching the show. Everything about her toyed with people, an ungentira batting about a preteril.
He turned away and smiled at the bartender as he set his bottle on the counter. "Another, please."
When she set the juice down in front of him, he tipped his head in the direction of the seductive asari. "She's here a lot, I take it?"

The nais nodded, but glanced toward the dance floor and back. "She is. Not to be rude, but you're hardly her type. Too old. She prefers them young and filled with all that misunderstood angst." She slammed her lips together, looking terrified to have said too much, a quick glance darting toward the dance floor. "Apologies, shooting off my mouth. Your meal is being served to your table, sir."

Her hand lifted from wiping the counter, flipping the cloth toward where Sol and Thane were accepting the food.

He chuckled, curious, brow plates lifting. "How did you know I was with them?"

She smiled. "Been doing this a long time. I've learned how to read people and situations. They've been keeping an eye on you, but trying to look like they aren't." She had a good face, broad and pleasant, kind brown eyes. It surprised him, but mostly because he hadn't noticed. At one time, he would have scanned her like a security checkpoint and not only filed her appearance, but decided her potential threat level and psych profile as well. A cool blush spread across the bridge of her nose. "Have a good evening, sir."

"Thank you." Nihlus lifted his drink from the bar and started toward the booth.

"Sir?" the bartender whispered. Nihlus turned, the fear in her eyes drawing him back to the counter. He waited for her to speak, but after a minute, decided maybe she wasn't going to, except she remained standing there. Finally, she winced and busied herself wiping the bar top. "You said you're a Spectre?"

Nihlus answered with almost imperceptible nod.

"That one is bad," the bartender whispered without lifting her head. "As I said, I've learned to read people." When Nihlus nodded again, the bartender shrugged. "She smiles and acts sweet and charming, but it never touches her eyes. There's something broken there."

He took a long drink, then set the bottle down. As much as he didn't want the asari in commando leathers to be suspicious of him, he couldn't just dismiss the bartender's gut reaction. He placed far too much faith in his own. "She done anything suspicious? Leave here with anyone you should have seen again, but didn't?"

"No." Nervous glances darted between his face and her cleaning. She shrugged, one shoulder rolling ever so subtly. "Can't say she's put a finger wrong."

"I can't do anything unless she tries to hurt someone, but thank you for telling me." Turning on his heel, he skirted the busy dance floor, sliding into the booth next to Sol.

Thane nodded, a wry smile lifting one corner of his mouth. "You used it to your advantage most effectively. She's trying to pique your interest, but she is just baiting you until you give something away."

The Spectre nodded, but then turned his attention to the food. "What did you order me?"

Sol grinned and pushed a large cup in front of him. "The quarian vegetable and grain smoothie with extra vegetables and sterilization." She closed her eyes, her expression one of complete bliss. "So gray and tasteless. You'll love it."

Levelling her with a suspicious glare, he looked into the cup, and let out an undisguised sigh of relief. Cisera.

A cackle far too filled with obnoxious self-congratulations rolling from her, Sol pushed a plate of skewers and spiced tubers in front of him. "The look on your face." She bumped her shoulder against his. 'I wish I'd taken a holo. Priceless.'

Breathing a sigh laced with both affection and resignation, he picked up a tuber and stuck it into her open mouth. "Eat. I'm tired, and I want to get some sleep." Exhaustion truly did hang from him, heavy and thick, as he started eating. He wanted to stretch out, prop his head up on far too many pillows, and read until he passed out.

She drew his attention as she plucked the long, fried root from her mouth and chomped it in half. "You want to go home, get into bed, and obsess over that journal." When she finished the first, she stole a second tuber off his plate, then turned to her own meal.

They ate in relative peace for five minutes, Nihlus and Thane grunting now and again to acknowledge Sol as she filled the silence with editorial. The Spectre actually found her voice comforting, a little like the white noise of rolling waves or the steady rumble of thunder in the distance.

"Your asari acquaintance just gave the turian child drugs," Thane reported in a low whisper, interrupting Sol's diatribe against bankers, the ease with which the anonymous asari cleared out Saren's assets, and banking in general.

Nihlus kept his focus on his meal. "Let me know if it looks like they're leaving together, or if the turian leaves and the asari follows her."

"Kid looks fifteen at the most," Sol mumbled around a mouthful of food. "She should be home studying for her placement exams or out playing turram, not hanging around with an asari a good four hundred cycles older than her."

Nihlus turned to her, a grin and a raised brow plate greeting her pronouncement. "You never cease to amaze me, maribellas." He wrapped an arm around her back and gave her a quick squeeze. "You've got the best heart under all that smart ass and bluster."

She punched him and dug back into her food. "Eat, we need to be ready if that puercuna raiding psychopath tries to take the kid out of here."

He bent to bump his brow against her temple. "As you command."

An elbow buried itself in his side. "I said eat, you sentimental idiot." Still, when she looked up, her mandibles flicked in a tiny smile. He flicked his back and dug in. How different would his childhood have been with a baby sister to look after and pour all his affection and attention into? He grinned as he nudged her and then started eating as fast as he could. Despite letting out an indignant chuff as if she were too good for an eating contest, she sped up, and soon tubers and skewers vanished at a rate that begged a choking fit and possible death.

As he finished, victorious, he bumped her with his shoulder. Little sister? Better late than never.

As they guessed, they'd barely finished their meals when the asari wrapped an arm around the young tarin and headed for the door. The nais leaned into the turian's aural canal, whispering constantly. The way the young tarin stared up at her companion, enraptured, almost enamoured, set Nihlus's blood boiling through his veins, sickened rage locking his teeth together. Whatever this asari was up to, he wasn't going to allow her to shove that child's death in his face or the Justicar's.
Letting his fury simmer, escaping through his expression and posture, Nihlus leaped up and stormed after the pair, catching up with them just outside the front doors of the bar. Grabbing hold of the young tarin with a bruisingly tight grip, he yanked her away from the asari.

"Spectre," the nais said, her voice full of barely disguised need. 'It's all actually for you,' it whispered. 'I don't really want this little thing.'

Letting his rage build up a thick layer of armour, he met the asari's eyes, challenging her in no uncertain terms. "Leave, now, and don't think about trying this again in my sight. I'm a Spectre; I can shoot you without needing any reason at all."

The asari stared him in the eye for a long moment, her stare oddly hypnotic. Nihlus's internal alarm began to shriek, but for the life of him, he couldn't look away. The pale sapphire turned black, his fury fading into a cold and dank layer of shame. That stare opened a door to an eternal hell where a lonely little peur huddled behind his door and wet himself in terror when his mother beat him.

"I can burn all that away, Nihlus," the asari's voice pitched low as she leaned in next to his aural canal. "I can set you free."

Then, in those memories, Shepard stepped up and held out her hand, warm fingers closing around his talons, and he smiled. "I don't need to be free. My past doesn't hold me prisoner any longer. Try again."

Surprise just registered, the nais's eyes snapping back to blue, when her stare broke away, snapping toward a blur of movement to Nihlus's left. The nais froze, her eyes locked over the heads of the crowd for a second, and then her hand jerked away from the turian child. She looked back at Nihlus. Fear and contempt and a white-hot, molten rage stared into his soul for the barest of seconds before the nais turned and bolted into the crowd.

He stumbled, reeling for the space of a couple heartbeats, but careful not to let the young turian get away. What in the name of all the sweet spirits had happened?

After a couple more seconds, Nihlus shook his head, a sharp tug on his hand orienting him. Looking down on the tarin, he drew his face into the most stern scowl he could. "How old are you?" he demanded.

She tilted her chin up, defiant, and opened her mouth, but as he slid one brow plate up and rumbled a low warning through his second larynx, she grumbled and dissolved into petulant submission. "Fourteen."

Equal amounts of anger, disgust, and relief sloshed around, the urge to vomit getting stronger by the second. Spirits, he needed to get back to the apartment and equalize. Focusing on the child, he managed to wrestle everything into a sort of relieved indignation. "You shouldn't even be in bars. You should be home studying." Keeping a tight grip on her arm, he led her over to a pair of Illium police officers standing about halfway down the block.

"Sir, is there something I can help you with?" one asked, stiffening and stepping forward, her hand moving toward her sidearm as he approached, her eyes flitting toward his shackle-like grip on the reluctant child dragging behind him.

"Spectre Nihlus Kryik." Without releasing the young turian, he activated his omnitool and sent them his credentials. "This inluvis needs to be taken home and her parents told that she very nearly went home with an asari who supplied her with Hallex." Not softening a millimetre, he looked down at the petri. "Nolin stultentes puer. Tuesin incepents ab ir fetrix."
The little one's eyes sprang wide. "I didn't know. She seemed so nice. We were just going for skewers."

"And when you never came home? What of your family? What of your duty to them?" He pushed her toward the officers. "Be more careful."

She wilted as one of the asari took her by the arm and led her toward their car. "She seemed nice."

Nihlus felt rather than saw Thane and Solana walk up, taking positions to his either side. "You did a fine thing, Spectre Kryik," Thane said, "but we should get out of this crowd. She knows you consider her a criminal, she may come after you."

Nihlus shook his head. "No." He turned, eyes searching the crowd for whatever had terrified the asari. Nothing stood out, other than the sensation of eyes watching him. "She ran, and not from me. She wasn't the least bit afraid of me. In fact, she stared at me, and there was something … ."

Shaking his head, Nihlus tried to shake off that strange, seductive magnet that still tugged at him, telling him that he needed to just listen and let her love him. "It was like she tried to climb inside my head, to control me, and for a second, I think I wanted her to."

A massive shudder shook him from talons to crest.

"Control you?" Sol prompted. She stepped in front of him and laid her talons on his arm. "Nihlus? You're acting stranger than usual, senux." The talons shifted to his cheek, slapping him slightly. "What? Spirits, snap out of whatever the hell it is."

Nihlus shook his head. "It was just like she was hypnotizing me or something." He nodded toward the bridge to his building, the last legs turning to jelly as the last dregs of his energy burned to ash. "Let's get back to the apartment. Tomorrow is a whole new day of crazy."

1. Mass Effec: Evolution #1, Mac Walters, Dark Horse Comics, Jan 2011.
"The blood-dimmed tide is loosed, and everywhere the ceremony of innocence is drowned."

"What?" Wrex grunted, looking back over his shoulder.

"The lines are from a poem by Yeats back at the dawn of the twentieth century." The threads of connection continued to weave their elusive pattern inside her head. "Something Garrus tried to tell me an hour ago." She swiped at the trickles of sweat rolling down her face. "He told me that we were headed for a brutal war. I thought he meant the death toll, but he was talking about another death entirely.

45 Days ASR

Wrex bellowed loud enough for the Collectors to hear him two kilometers away. "He did what?" Setting the mud trembling under his feet, he stormed up next to Shepard and grabbed the young merc by the collar.

The kid shrank into his armor until he hung from Wrex's hand, quailing in the face of krogan rage. "Okeer turned all his tank-grown krogan—his failures—loose. They've gone berserk." A frantic, begging gaze flitted from Wrex to Shepard and back. "One minute we were setting lines against the bugs, the next … krogan berserkers came charging out of his lab. They overwhelmed the inside lines in minutes. It was a rout, so we pulled back, set new lines."

"Wrex." Shepard laid her hand over the large one gripping the kid's collar. "Put him down." She looked up into the krogan's carmine eyes, stretching a veneer of empathy over a solid floor of command. "He's cooperating, and he isn't responsible for what's going on." She stabbed the kid with a dagger-sharp, iron stare. "Complicit absolutely, but not responsible."

Wrex dropped the merc, who stayed half-slumped in the mud, and pushed in to loom over Shepard. "There's a reason Okeer is hated, Shepard. The things he's done to my people in the name of saving them from the genophage are barbaric." A low growl finished the sentence. He jabbed a thumb toward Bakara and the battlemasters. "Are we supposed to follow you as we shoot our way through a hundred innocent krogan to get to him? Help me out here, Shepard."

Shifting to blockade the kid, Shepard held Wrex's stare, refusing to back down from his fury. "Haven't I always?" She waited for him to take a breath, then lunged into him a little, brows raised. "Stop forgetting that everyone here is on your damned side, Wrex, before they do. Of course we're not going to just mow our way through them, not if we can help it." She slapped a hand against his shoulder.

Shepard nodded toward the way ahead. "Or better yet, not if you can help it. If they attack us, try to talk them down. You'll have better luck than the Suns or the rest of us." Watching him, Shepard waited for the fury to calm enough that the knot in her stomach untied. Suddenly, getting the krogan past their paranoia and 'us against the galaxy' mentality seemed next to impossible if she couldn't even convince Wrex to set it aside for longer than two minutes at a time.
When he nodded and stalked back to keep an eye on the path ahead, Shepard turned to the kid. "And we can't just kill all of you, either." Looking to Garrus, she shrugged, making light of the weight that draped itself over her shoulders at the thought of mowing down a couple hundred more mercs. "I've committed more than enough atrocities in the last few weeks without my adding another to my tally." When the general nodded, she held out a hand to the kid, helping him back to his feet.

"Thanks," he muttered, staring at the ground. "For not killing me, I mean."

Shepard gave him a push toward the krogan rear guard. "Barl?" When the largest of the three nodded, she continued, "Make sure he's not packing, and then keep an eye on him. If he puts a foot out of place, shoot him."

The krogan bared his giant, chiclet teeth in a grin that waxed the kid ten shades of alabaster. "My pleasure." One huge hand thumped down on the merc's shoulder, squeezing a yelp from the kid that sounded a lot like the bleat of a squeaky toy.

Shepard snapped her wrist, gesturing toward the path forward with two fingers. "Let's keep moving. We've got a long slow trip until we're out of this mud."

Garrus dropped back next to her, the expression on his face matching the tone of the whispers in the back of her head. "We're not going to be able to handle many prisoners before they become a serious security risk, Shepard."

Nodding, she set herself to concentrating on her feet, following the trail of bigger footsteps as much as she could. "If more surrender than we can safely handle, I'll bring Team Two in, and they can take custody of prisoners."

A silence so pregnant that it bordered on needing a midwife fell between them, but she left it to the general to say what he needed to in his own time. It took nearly five minutes before he cleared his throat and said, "It's going to be a brutal war, Shepard."

Shepard bit down on her lip to keep from snapping back at him. Damn and she'd really been enjoying the day. How dare all this crap rear its ugly snout from the mud to stomp on her good mood? Brutal? Of course it was going to be brutal. As if she didn't already have that stamped into every nerve cell in her body. All the more reason to avoid brutality wherever possible.

His hand gripped her shoulder as he continued, "We'll do what we can, but if you try to save them all, you'll drive yourself crazy."

Shepard nodded for him to retake his position on point. They could debate the intricacies of war crimes another day and far away from Korlus. When he squeezed her shoulder and returned to his position, she let out a long sigh and set in for the slog to the next rest point just their side of the closest Blue Suns line.

When they hunkered down behind cover nearly thirty hard minutes later, Shepard turned to Garrus. "We're moving too slowly." She checked the updated scans from EDI, the fact that the Collectors hadn't moved tying another knot in her gut. "And the Collectors aren't moving at all. That means they're either waiting until we've cleared a path for them through the Suns and the krogan, or they intend to pull us in then vaporize the lab from orbit."

Garrus shook his head. "According to Wrex, Okeer said that the Collectors had come to claim his research. They won't strike from orbit."
"Unless they would rather no one had it," she said, staring straight into his eyes until he looked away. The feeling of being herded into a trap burned at the base of her skull, an itch buried too deeply to scratch. Complicating things by taking prisoners and trying to save the tank-grown krogan just poked it until she couldn't remain still. She guzzled a bottle of water, choked down a dried fruit bar in three bites, and turned up the cooling system in her armour before looking to the path ahead. The Suns had set up a staggered line along the next hundred metres or so of path. An effective ploy that would slow her squad down even more.

Before she signaled for her people to move out, she opened a channel to Kaidan. "Alenko, how's it going up there?"

"We've got our eyes on you from high left," the LT reported. "The Suns are focused on you, so we're not meeting any resistance. Ready to provide cover and suppressing—"

Gunfire erupted from the furthest positions in, cutting him off. "More of the tank-grown are attacking the Suns from the rear," Kaidan reported a moment later. "The krogan have two of the merc lines engaged. You aren't going to get a better shot to move up, Captain."

"Roger that, Sparky. We'll give you a minute's head start so you can cover our approach."

"Roger that. Team two out."

"We move out in sixty, people. Focus on the Blue Suns when we engage." Shepard nodded toward the krogan clan chief. "Wrex wants to see if he can get the krogan berserkers to stand down, so let's give him a shot."

When the clock in her head counted down sixty seconds, Shepard pushed herself up into a shaky crouch. "Come on, people. Let's move." Shepard stood, lifting her Mattock into high ready, and took point. "Wrex, Garrus, on my four and eight. Jack on my six. The rest of you maintain a four metre spread. They've got heavies, so don't bunch up."

Keeping low, she ran forward, the mud growing more shallow as they ascended up toward the mountain of wrecked ships. Here and there, it had even dried into large, cracked sheets. Thank the Enkindlers' glowing backsides. If the ground kept improving, her boots might even get down to weighing five or six kilos each.

She paused to glance back, ensure her people were ready before she turned the last corner. When they all nodded their confirmation, she took a deep breath and popped her head around the wall to check for cover. Steel knee-walls and crates provided excellent cover, but the squad faced an uncomfortably long run to get to them. She ducked back.

"Decent cover fifteen metres up," she said, tossing the words over her shoulder.

Another long breath and she slipped around the corner, bolting for a line of crates halfway across the open area. As soon as she appeared, a storm of bullets rained down on her from an elevated walkway opposite. The mercs were dug in good and solid, but then Sparky's team opened fire from above, pinning them down. Shepard waved her squad into cover, keeping back far enough to help negate the Suns' elevated advantage. A rocket slammed into the top of Shepard's cover in the same moment she dove behind it, the blast flipping her ass over tea kettle.

"Shepard?" Garrus called from behind and to her right. "You all right?"

The captain dragged herself in behind the crates, sitting with her back pressed to them for a couple of seconds as she waited for her vision to focus and her ears to stop ringing. "Yeah, I'm fine. It didn't hit me … just gave me a good shove." She scrambled up, trading her Mattock out in favour of Ingrid. Looking through the scope, she spotted six inches of helmet peeking above the metal railing. A long breath out, a slight squeeze of her finger, and the helmet shattered like a dropped melon.

The heavy popped up, sending another rocket sizzling through the air toward Shepard, but then a sharp crack from behind her sent the heavy spinning and toppling to the deck. Thank god for turians with impeccable aim. With the enemy entrenched so far above the squad, the krogan proved useless, the limited range on their shotguns leaving the work to Shepard and Garrus.

Even so, they'd thinned the mercs down to three when the first krogan appeared, charging doggedly from around the corner.

"Concentrate fire on the mercs," Shepard said, shouting into her radio. "Let's give Wrex a chance to take control of the tank-grown." She sighted down another heavy, taking it out with two shots. "But Wrex, if you can't talk them down before they become a problem, we have to take them out. I can't risk the mission."

"I hear you, Shepard. Just take care of yours and let me take care of mine." The clan leader thundered up next to her, his footsteps shaking the sludgy ground as he slammed into her cover hard enough to knock the crates over."

Ageer and frustration reached their boiling point as Shepard landed on her ass in the mud again, the chill, stinking slime splashing up the back of her neck. Cursing a streak that would have once resulted in a week of washing her mouth out with soap, Shepard clambered back into cover on all fours. Resting Ingrid on the crate, she set up her shot, enjoying the fantasy of lining up Wrex's backside in her sights far too much for comfort. The second last trooper fell.

When Wrex stood and strode out of cover, the one remaining Sun popped up and unloaded a heat sink worth of shots. The battlemaster just ignored those that penetrated his barrier, calling out, "Krogan!"

Shepard sighted down the solitary merc, missing what Wrex called to the tank-grown as Ingrid's hard, sharp bark sent a bullet straight through the unfortunate bastard's faceplate. As she lowered her weapon she saw the tank-grown turn their shot guns on Wrex. "Wrex, get behind cover!" she screamed over the comms, knowing his chances of hearing her over the weapon fire was slight.

Wrex opened fire on the closest of the tank-grown, aiming low, trying to disable by the look of it. Still, the krogan bulled forward, Wrex's words drowned in gunfire. The tank-grown didn't even hesitate to turn on one of their own. It looked as though the kid was right: Okeer's failures had been set loose, mindless except for the kill.

"Okay, Wrex," Shepard called over the comms, "you tried. I'm not going to let you kill yourself over this." She swapped guns and brought the Mattock to bear on the first krogan. With no mercs to distract them, they'd all moved in on Wrex, and the fool wasn't pulling back.

"Enough!" The shout startled Shepard, mostly because it was Bakara's voice. The female strode out into the line of fire her hands held out. "Krogan, listen to me! We are not your enemy!"

"Hold your fire!" Shepard called into the radio. "Everyone hold your fire. Garrus, keep an eye on her vitals." Bracing herself, Shepard readied to race out and throw herself between the shaman and the hail of bullets.

Note to self: Get yourself a damned visor and then wear it everywhere except bed.
Shepard's breath froze in her lungs as the gunfire hesitated. Maybe it was going to work. She crossed her fingers. "Shout if she shows the slightest sign of taking too much damage," she whispered to Garrus. "Wrex, you'll have to get her into cover while everyone else takes them out."

Her concentration riveted on the shaman, Shepard barely heard the squad's affirmations. The krogan female's presence transformed the field of mud into a sacred space, the sheer power of her freezing everyone in their tracks. For one, pure, breathless moment, Shepard thought the shaman had broken through, but then whatever shock had stopped the bullets dissipated, releasing hell once more.

"She's taking too much fire, Shepard," Garrus called, but the first bloom of blood on the shaman's robes had already shoved Shepard out into the fray.

Hitting her Garrus-overclocked shields, Shepard threw herself in front of the shaman, pushing the female krogan back toward cover as she opened fire. Her eyes flicked toward the clan chief then back. Stubborn ass. Even though nearly half of the tank-grown lay dead in the mud, wide swaths of orange flowed, garish against Wrex's red armour. "Come on, Wrex. It's not working. Pull back."

The shaman let out a gasp of pain and stumbled, going down onto one knee, dragging Shepard's gut along with her. Tearing herself away from Wrex's little melodrama, Shepard hung up her Mattock and called out, "Garrus, Jack, keep them off us." Wrapping an arm around the krogan female's back, Shepard helped heave her out of the mud, supporting her as they half hobbled, half ran to the nearest cover. Shepard eased the shaman down behind the crates, then took a knee next to her. "Are you okay?"

The shaman looked into Shepard's eyes. "I have endured and recovered from far worse, Captain. I'll be fit to continue in a moment."

Shepard dove into her belt pouches and pulled out a bottle of water, passing it over before she drew her assault rifle and leaped over the crates, wading back in. She thrust herself between Wrex and the krogan he was trying to save, refusing to move even when Wrex tried to ram her out of the way. Thus, her shield alarm was flashing by the time the last tank-grown went down, three of her rounds punching a hole the size of a fist through his headplate.

The clan lord stood over the corpses, his entire body vibrating with what felt very much like rage. Spinning toward her, Wrex loomed, an avalanche needing only one snowflake to send it crashing down the mountain, destroying everything in its path, namely her. His face scrunched into a vicious scowl, his mouth opening and closing as his battle against his rage left him beached. After a moment, his shoulders dropped, and he reached up to scrub his jaw with the back of his wrist.

"You've got to fight smarter than that." Shepard said, keeping her voice low. She reached out to grip his arm and hit his medigel a couple of times. Even Wrex's impressive regeneration ability could use a kick start. "You can't sacrifice yourself, and you certainly can't sacrifice the shaman to this. As painful and sharp as killing these krogan is … they are a handful of krogan bred and turned insane by a renegade warlord on a mudball in the middle of fucking nowhere, Wrex."

She lifted a hand to the rest of the squad and waved for them to go ahead even as she continued. "There are millions of krogan back on Tuchanka who are relying on you to show uncommon intelligence and foresight. Are you willing to trade the future of all those females and babies for your righteous anger?"

As she said the last, a bright spark of understanding flared behind her eyes. When she spoke again, the words came out absent, her focus staring into that spark, trying to draw out the meaning it illuminated. "The blood-dimmed tide is loosed, and everywhere the ceremony of innocence is
"What?" Wrex grunted, looking back over his shoulder.

"The lines are from a poem by Yeats back at the dawn of the twentieth century." The threads of connection continued to weave their elusive pattern inside her head. "Something Garrus tried to tell me an hour ago." She swiped at the trickles of sweat rolling down her face. "He told me that we were headed for a brutal war. I thought he meant the death toll, but he was talking about another death entirely.

She looked up, meeting Wrex's stare. "We're both going to have to suffer a few deaths, Wrex." A sigh trembled along the edge of tears. "As much as we've seen and done and suffered, we both hold onto what Yeats called ceremonies of innocence … ideals that worked wonderfully before the Reapers." Walking over to him, she nodded to the path ahead. They couldn't afford to be left too far behind.

Wrex grunted and brought his shotgun up into high ready. "You're not making sense, Shepard."

Shepard lifted her Mattock and nodded, a soft, self-effacing laugh turning over and burrowing deep into her throat. "The picture is still forming in my head, but we both want to save everyone, and the hard cold truth is that we're going to have to let our saviour complexes die. We are responsible for a fuckton of lives, and that means we're going to have to sacrifice pieces of ourselves so our people don't need to." She waggled her head.

"Still don't know what you're talking about." The krogan bulldozed ahead, moving fast enough that Shepard needed to run to keep up with him.

"Okay," she said, "I'll be blunt. As much as I hate having to kill all these krogan, I will sacrifice them and the chunk of my soul that slaughtering them will carve out of me. And I'll do it because you and the shaman are more important on a galactic scale. A few more fighters won't tip the balance, but the two of you are invaluable in this war." She slapped the back of his upper arm. "Hate me if you need to." Running ahead, she relieved Garrus on point and pushed into the wreckage.

As they made the last turn, Shepard spotted a single tank-grown krogan standing in the center of yet another muddy clearing firing up at yet another small squad of Blue Suns. Ducking into cover, she pulled Ingrid, and with two headshots, dropped half of them while Garrus took out the others. The tank-grown just stood in the center of the space, gun held cradled in his hand.

Shepard signalled the rest of the squad to keep back, then crooked a finger for Wrex and the shaman to follow her forward. Holding her hands out from her body, she stepped sideways, circling around the krogan as she closed the distance.

"Seven night cycles," the krogan said, his voice a soft, deep tumble of sound, "since I was told I was imperfect and flushed from glass mother. Since, killing is all I have known, but you are different." His face bumped against the top of her head again. "You do not smell of mud and garbage."

Shepard took a step back, surprised. She should reek of the place having bathed in its filth more than once. "We're not from this planet. We came because the warlord, Okeer, called for help when the Collectors attacked."

Wrex pushed up next to her. "Imperfect? Do you mean you aren't free of the genophage?"

The behemoth stepped back a couple of steps and rolled his shoulders a little. "I know only that the voice in the water stopped speaking, and I was flushed from glass mother. The ember did not spark, and so I fight. I am not what Father needed me to be."

The shaman moved up on Shepard's right. "The ember?" Reaching out, the female placed a hand on the tank-grown's head. "This father is disappointed because he believes your ember didn't spark?"

"Ember?" Shepard asked. "You mean, this father believes this krogan was created without a soul?"

The shaman nodded, but stayed focused on the young male under her hand. "I am the shaman of Clan Urdnot's females. Do you understand what that means?"

The tank-grown nodded, bowing so deeply that he went down on one knee. "The voice in the water called you the 'ever-burning ember of the krogan', the heart of the people."

"Yes." She crouched and shifted her hand to his chest. "Can you feel your hearts beating, child?"

The young krogan looked up and nodded.

"And what do they tell you? What do they whisper to you about the spirit they feed?" She pushed off her knee and held out her hand, pulling him up when he took it.

Feeling a sacred sort of hush fall over the muddy, stinky pit, Shepard backed away, giving the krogan their space. She waved the others forward, sending them to take positions along the road ahead. They were nearly to the tangle of wreckage that Okeer used as a base. Only Garrus remained behind, standing pressed against the back of Shepard's arm. She leaned back into him a little, grateful for the moment's peace.

"They say that I am alive, that I must fight … struggle against the enemy of all krogan." His head fell. "But I failed."

"I am the guardian of the ember, and I say that it is not so." She slapped her palm against his shoulder, shoving him back a little. "You are not perfect, but as long as those hearts beat, you are krogan. That is all you need to be." She shoved him again. "Your ember burns as true as mine, child." The shaman turned and headed out to follow the others as if she expected to be obeyed.

"Walk with us away from this place and learn what it means to feel the fire of being true krogan."

The krogan looked at each of them, then turned and followed the shaman in a manner that made Shepard think very much of a puppy. She punched Wrex in the arm as he followed, his early rage cooled.

"That's one." Glancing up at Garrus, she gave him a thin-lipped smile. "Let's get this done and get the hell out of here."

"Can't be soon enough for me," he agreed, running a glove over her crusty, gritty hair. "And you need a shower. Seriously." He fanned his talons in front of his face and stepped away. "The stench coming off of you … ."

"Careful there, General, I'm armed and rumor has it that I'm occasionally dangerous as well." She grinned and shook her head. "Sweet baby Jesus, you're lucky I love you." She bumped him with her shoulder as she jogged past. They made excellent time up the long, shallow slope, following a makeshift road of plywood, sheet metal, and pallets toward the corpse of a massive dreadnought.

They stopped for a lengthy rest inside one of the cabins, scrambling the locks on the doors entering and exiting the space. Along the inside, the deck had been sheared away, leaving a fifteen metre drop that provided an excellent lookout.

Once she ensured her squad was settled, Shepard leaned against the railing and looked out over the drop, the line of sight clear all the way down the hull of the old behemoth. She pressed her lips together and shook her head then glanced toward Garrus as he stepped up beside her. "This day has just gone from pretty cool to massive suckage." The words tumbled out along a heavy, weary sigh.

"Pretty cool? It started with our shuttle being shot down." Garrus reached out and rested his hand on her shoulder. "You might need to do a little life experience reclassification."

The sound of his voice, his gentle teasing, spread through her like warm water and drew her closer until their arms touched. "I never thought I'd say this, but I miss chasing Saren." She felt rather than saw his reaction to that, a mixture of surprise and understanding. "It was so damned easy. It was an adventure and … ." She shrugged again. "It was fun. Yes, we had our share of tragedy and terror and all sorts of horrible crap, but it was the dream team against the bad guy. And we kicked Sovereign's ass most soundly."

Garrus turned to half sit on the railing. He looked down at her for a moment before returning to watch the room. "It was clear cut, that's for sure. We knew we were the good guys. Saren was the bad guy. We had a firm target lock on our destination: stop Sovereign from letting the Reapers back into the galaxy."

Reaching out, he guided her around and tucked her under his arm. "This fight is just so huge, and so many shades of grey that it's impossible to get a handle on."

Shepard leaned into him and crossed her arms over her chest, dropping the gates. "What that tank-baby said about not having a spark … that's the same damned thing the Reapers are in a tizzy over. That's why the Collectors are here. Somehow Okeer broke the code, and the Reapers are desperate for what he's discovered."

He gave her a squeeze. "We'll make sure they don't get it, but for now, go hose down and rest. The Collectors definitely aren't going to vapourize the Reapers' metaphysical angst cure from orbit. We have time."

Shepard rolled her neck, wincing as the mud inside her collar abraded her neck. "Yeah, okay. You've got the watch for the next hour?" When he nodded, she pulled free of his embrace and headed over to the improvised hose they'd hooked up to a sink.

It really had started out as a pretty great day.

(1) W.B. Yeats 1919 (The Second Coming)
Sol hummed for a moment as she mused then met his eyes, hers bright and curious … and a little teasing. "Did you have to do a lot of remedial training to get into the academy?" She wriggled a little, digging deeper into the covers. "I mean, out there in the wild merc territories, you didn't exactly grow up aimed toward the service the way Garrus and I did."

After staring at her for a couple of seconds, stunned into silence, Nihlus chuckled. "Seriously? You want to talk about my misspent youth? With all the questions you could ask?"

Morumplacus - Restless spirit, undead, ghoul. From ancient turian folklore. The souls of those slain by dishonourable means were believed to wander after death to exact justice. They were believed to torment the living by taking the form of whatever the victim feared most.

45 Days ASR

Nihlus kicked his feet up onto the bed, then threw the duvet over his legs. After piling the pillows under his cowl and fringe, he relaxed down into the deep, luxurious memcell, a long sigh greeting the painful bliss of horizontality. For long seconds, he just closed his eyes and breathed, pulling in long draughts of air.

Through the warmth, dispelling his comfort, a wan chill slithered along the length of his spine and oozed between the ridges of his brain. Spirits, did Shepard feel that way all the time: something alive and malevolent crawling around inside her skull? Surely, his current, mild uneasiness amounted to the tiniest taste of what the black orbs visited upon her, and suddenly his arms ached to hold her. The silent weight of his omnitool whispered that he should call her, but he pushed that selfishness aside. She'd call as soon as she and Garrus wrapped up things on Korlus. Wanting to call her was about easing the asari’s slick caress inside his mind, rather than aiding Shepard in any form.

He didn't know who or even what that asari was, but he'd never experienced anything as terrifyingly cold and empty as her stare. The only other time he'd touched minds with an asari, it had been Shiala when she passed along the information from the Thorian. That contact felt like slipping into a warm bath, comforting and easy despite the horror of the information that she’d passed on. The mind that touched his at the club dumped him sprawling and screaming into a fathomless, black hole in the bottom of the ocean: a hole filled with dangerous, starving creatures snapping their jaws in anticipation of the moment he gave up and stopped trying to swim.

A heavy shudder stuttered down his spine, locking the muscles across his hips. Moaning as the serrated dagger abandoned his pelvis to saw its way down his thighs, he arched his back, tensing his muscles into tighter and tighter knots. He sucked in a long breath, holding it until his chest strained and his head pounded before letting it hiss slowly over his tongue. As he exhaled, he straightened out, his muscles all melting down into the mattress. It took tying himself into a knot and releasing it three more times before the muscle spasms eased.
Muttering his relief, he opened his eyes and reached over to lift Saren's journal from the night table. Distraction appeared to be the flavour of the night. He opened the book to a detailed sketch of a monstrously deformed, cybernetic-laced turian.

A massive crowd awaited our ship as it landed. Desolas draped himself and his monsters in robes fashioned after the ones worn by the Valluvian priests in ancient times. He stood before the crowd and claimed to have returned to reopen Temple Palaven, to lead the turian people into an age of glory and conquest. The monsters he explained as being warriors transformed by the war against the humans, warriors who had earned the robes they wore. I admit to being moved despite knowing it was all a lie.

My brother spoke like a prophet on the eve of apotheosis, and the people cheered him. They resented the council stepping in to end the war with the humans. The politicians said that it was the price we needed to pay for all that we received through cooperating with the rest of the races. Desolas called it betraying the turian people. I didn't disagree.

And so I watched my brother from behind the line of his ‘priests’ as he named himself saviour. I watched him trying to command his evolved troops, but they refused every order given to them unless it served the monolith's agenda. And yes, I believed it possessed an agenda, I just didn't know what it was.

Everything about the ‘Evolved’ made me uneasy. And as I spent more time in proximity to the monolith, I began to feel a strange scratching at the back of my skull, the irritation of a splinter under my plates. Maybe I didn't see it, or perhaps I chose to ignore how Desolas changed over those weeks, but as we arrived on Palaven, I could no longer deny that my brother was consumed by the machine. I hated the thing. It filled me with dread, and I hated it. It called to me, and I hated it.

My dread turned to fear as Desolas admitted that he was trying to form a sort of tentative control over the Evolved by making himself the monolith's protector. He hoped to buy time and learn how to use it to gain actual control over them. To say that I harboured reservations would be a gross understatement.

When we arrived at the temple, the Evolved refused to move the artefact. They claimed that the crowd concerned them, so Desolas bent, saying he didn't intend to move it until nightfall. How pathetic his delusions of power must have seemed to the intelligence behind the monolith … even to himself. For surely, some part of him knew that he'd never control the creatures it created. The monolith controlled them, and as I looked in my brother's eyes, I saw a truth … . No, I felt a truth, that the monolith controlled through deception.

The soft tread of bare feet on carpet and the slight catch of talons in the weave alerted Nihlus to the presence of an intruder. He lowered the book and looked toward the stairs, letting out a long, thin breath. "What are you doing? I thought you went to bed a half hour ago."

Sol padded around his bed, the duvet off the guest bed wrapped tightly around her. "You seemed like you needed some company after that weird crap with the psycho asari." She climbed up on the bed next to him, piled up the spare pillows, and spread her blanket over her legs. When she finished bouncing around and generally making a show of getting settled, she leaned up, her hand braced under her jaw and stared at him.

"So, want to talk about it?" she asked, narrowing her eyes into a laser-keen stare.

"No." He turned back to the journal, hoping that she'd go away if he ignored her. "And I don't need to have a sleep over. I stopped being afraid of morump lacus in my closet some time ago." After thirty seconds of staring at the book without actually reading, he glanced her way just to meet her intense, sea-blue stare. Letting out a long, musical sigh, he said, "I appreciate your concern, but I'm fine."

Sol flopped down on the pillow and pulled her cover up to her mandibles. "Maybe I'm not." She closed her eyes. "Are you done reading? It's hard to sleep with the lights on." A well-pleased grin answered his sigh. "What? Is my generous offer of company and protection from the things that bite in the night causing you inconvenience?"

Nihlus set the journal down on the night table and turned off the lamp. "You cause me inconvenience in general, and I'm pretty certain that you delight in it, so shut up and go to sleep." After fluffing up the pillows again, he closed his eyes. Focusing on his breathing, he tried to clear and settle his mind enough to sleep, but between Sol's beady-eyed stare boring into the side of his head, his confrontation with the asari, the ache in his chest prompted by Saren's lonely descent into madness, and the horror of the Arca Monolith warping and indoctrinating everyone on Palaven . . . .

"Want to talk about it?"

Giving in, Nihlus rolled onto his side to find her brilliant eyes sparkling at him in the dim light. "Talk about what, exactly?" Grumbling to cover up the fact that her presence did calm the mess inside his head, he slid his arm under the pillows and dragged them down to hold them between his shoulder, cowl, and head. "What does that burning curiosity want to know?" His brow plates rose a little more every second that she considered the question. "Saren's journal perhaps?"

"Hm. No. I don't want to have nightmares." Sol hummed for a moment as she mused then met his eyes, hers bright and curious . . . and a little teasing. "Did you have to do a lot of remedial training to get into the academy?" She wriggled a little, digging deeper into the covers. "I mean, out there in the wild merc territories, you didn't exactly grow up aimed toward the service the way Garrus and I did."

After staring at her for a couple of seconds, stunned into silence, Nihlus chuckled. "Seriously? You want to talk about my misspent youth? With all the questions you could ask?" He held up a hand when she opened her mouth. "No, if this is the query burning itself through your skull, I'll answer it." He scratched his neck. "I was actually educated and reasonably intelligent, and I'd grown up fighting and shooting, so I didn't have to take any remedial training."

He let out a long breath, relaxing down into the thick mattress, the breath turning into a sigh as the clenched muscles along his jaw and down his spine relaxed. "They asked me to take a placement test, which I passed with flying colours. Did have a few hiccups on the psych eval thanks to my complete scorn for authority and my tendency to answer annoying questions with my fists." He grinned, shrugging his one shoulder. "They also insisted that I refine my hand to hand technique. Apparently breaking off spurs isn't considered good form in the military."

"Who knew." Mandibles flicking hard, Sol shook her head. "You were a rebel?" She stared at him, her eyes narrowing until he couldn't make them out. "It's always the quiet ones."

He hummed a susurrus of agreement. "My lack of appreciation for authority figures and the rules continued to plague me into my postings with external forces, and they were glad to hand me over to the Spectres when my presence was requested." He closed his eyes, the small talk easing him into the pillows and weighing down his eyelids.

"And that was Saren, right?" She chuffed softly. "He was a legend back then. The youngest Spectre, the council's standard bearer?"
A long breath whispered between them before Nihlus answered, the picture of that lithe, quicksilver biotic in the gleaming armour forming crystal clear in his mind. "I'd seen him a couple of cycles before. He and a few other Spectres raided the mine where I worked after my pari died. He was amazing, every crazy dream that fills your head when you're a puer lying in bed, conjuring up great stories about Spectres."

He opened his eyes, meeting hers in the dark, and smiled as he recalled the combination of terror and awe. "I was starstruck, blown into the upper atmosphere by the sheer power of his presence, and stayed that way for a lot of cycles." As he said the last, Nihlus wondered if he'd ever truly loved Saren, or if it remained hero worship.

"Pari didn't tell us heroic stories of Spectres," Sol said, her voice slurring a little. "His heroes always stayed true to the path of law and order. Spectres were shady characters that haunted the line between good and evil." She chuckled and then yawned. "Naturally, Garrus and I became fascinated with them. I think Garrus would have made a good one if he managed to work that knot out of his … lower intestinal tract."

Silence drifted between them, warm and heavy, and Nihlus's eyes slipped closed again. Then a hand touched his face, startling him awake. Slender talons patted his mandible. "Did that asari scare you, tonight?" Sol asked, the words sliding along a yawn.

He nodded, and gave in as sleep started to claim him. "More than anything except the Reapers. There was a hole inside her, one that she will never be able to fill."

"Good thing we stopped her from taking that kid."

Nihlus yawned in reply and drifted off. It had been a good thing. A very good thing, in fact. He'd saved that child from a terrible death. Not a bad way to end his day. Spirits, he'd accomplished far less so many of his days as a Spectre.

"Goodnight, senux." Clumsy talons patted his mandible again, then slid back under Sol's blanket.

46 Days ASR

A soft ticking sound reeled Nihlus from sleep, pulling him inexorably back to consciousness. He fought back, his eyelids refusing to open, the covers warm and comfortable as their shackles held tight, insisting that he spend several more hours in their embrace. He yawned and rolled over, giving in to sleep's siren call for another minute or so before the tapping returned.

"Fine," he muttered, and forced his eyes open. On his left, Sol slept on. Her gentle, purring snore rolled in and out without interruption.

Tapping, again, like the sound of a branch in the wind. It was a sound for Palaven, where the gardens pressed up against the domin, not for Illium, where the nearest tree stood twenty floors and a bridge away. A shadow moved, black against the watery grey of city night, yanking him up off the mattress.

He stared at the small windows that looked out over the roof. Heart pounding, hard but not fast, he ticked through the possibilities, running a very familiar—almost comforting—tactical risk assessment. Of the scenarios that played out in his head, the most likely was someone on the roof. Another brief interruption in the light flickered across the room; someone definitely wanted his attention. Damn. Making sure not to wake Sol, he slipped out from under the duvet. He lifted his robe from where he'd tossed it before climbing into bed, retrieved his sidearm from the night table, and then headed downstairs.
When the elevator doors closed, he slipped his robe on, and stepped off to the blind side of the elevator. If whoever awaited him on the roof intended to attack, they employed either no guile, or some advanced form of it. Either way, he didn't intend to stand in the open and let anyone fill him full of holes.

_The asari._

Spirits, maybe he should have awakened Thane. His talon hovered above the control to send the elevator back down. He couldn't trust himself to take her on alone. Of course, if the terror in her eyes when she ran was any indicator, she was either off-planet already or arranging her ride to the furthest corner of the galaxy.

What if his most likely guess proved true? He doubted Specimen Alpha would try to kill him, but how the hell was he supposed to react to the _torin_? Fury? Certainly justified, but probably not useful or productive. Grief? Relief? Happiness? A knot tied itself in his gut. Well, throwing up or succumbing to fluxus certainly made a statement. Not a particularly dignified one, however.

The elevator door slid open, halting his runaway thoughts before they crashed and burned. Thank the spirits.

Silence. Nothing moved, not even a breeze whispered past. Focusing his senses on the other side, he inhaled a long breath, then a second, drawing the air over the receptors in his mouth. Where his ears failed him, his nose wouldn't. Not asari. He clenched his jaw, the knot twisting until his guts felt like they hung from the back of his throat.

"I'm unarmed," a soft, raspy voice called from the other side, the subvocals flat and weary. "I only came to talk, Nihlus."

Still ... not disposed to taking the word of dead people lurking on his rooftop in the middle of the night, the Spectre waited another twenty seconds before he glanced out the door. A shadow stood over by the low wall that surrounded the roof. Although the dark shrouded him more effectively than his cloak, there was no doubt as to the intruder's identity. His sidearm leading the way, Nihlus stepped out onto the roof, the surface still warm under his bare talons, the acrid stink of tar biting the inside of his nostrils.

"What are you doing here?" he demanded, pistol sight never wavering from the _torin's_ head.

"I believe I said I came to talk." The shadow turned to face him, still anonymous within the obsidian drape of his hood. After another moment, a long, heavy sigh dropped out of that void. "After obtaining my freedom, I fully intended to leave you alone." The intruder strode over to the edge of the roof and pulled his cloak tight around him. "It was a noble, self-sacrificing intention." The _torin's_ soft huff of laughter eased the tension in Nihlus's shoulders. He lowered his pistol.

"My memory is patchy at best, so I forgot that I've never been all that good with noble or self-sacrificing." The figure sat on the knee wall, his shrouded stare invisible, but burning through Nihlus with laser-drill intensity. After a moment, he lifted his legs over the wall to sit looking out over the brilliant glare of the city.

"You're Specimen Alpha?" Nihlus felt like an idiot asking, because he knew the answer, but it felt three or four percent more ridiculous not to ask.

"That's what Cerberus called me, but I think you know better, don't you, Nihlus?"

Nihlus formed his question then let it dissolve into silence a handful of times before he finally strode over to sit a metre or so to the mysterious torin's left. Ignoring his better sense as it screamed warnings, he placed his pistol on the wall and turned to let his legs dangle over the very long drop into darkness. Once he settled, the question managed to bully its way to the fore.

"So, why did you come? What do you want to talk about?"

The torin leaned forward, bracing his hands against the edge. "I intended to pull the journal and then walk away, but then, I went through the apartment. When I touched those things … ." He shook his head, and let the silence stand.

"She's a good kid," the intruder said suddenly, leaning down to look between his feet. He kicked his heels off the side of the building.

Nihlus winced. That wall backed onto Thane's room. Hopefully the walls blocked sound sufficiently to let the assassin sleep. He scowled as the good kid comment registered. "Who?"

"The cop's filiam. Vakarian." He chuffed. "Your filiam now, too, I suppose. She's good people. I like that she keeps you on your toes."

"She definitely likes to kick with the spur." Nihlus chuckled and shook his head, sparing a glance at the anonymous figure. "She's not a kid. She's three cycles older than you were when you became a Spectre."

The torin laughed and shrugged, his head bobbing slightly inside the cloak. Truly, the person next to Nihlus felt anonymous, no trace of presence or personality, as if all traces of identity had been scrubbed away. Still, when that void turned to look at him, a glint of light reflected in the pale eyes, a tiny sparkle of something alive. "Well, I was exceptional."

Nihlus laughed, the warm, genuine mirth between them feeling like a rare and precious gift. "And modest. Always so modest." He looked down into the dark, faint streams of light flickering hundreds of storeys below. For a long moment, silence ruled. What did he say to this torin? How was he even supposed to feel? Furious? Sad? Fabric whispered against concrete, then a shoulder bumped his, tentative … a reaching out.

Anger sparked at the contact. "What do you want … ?" He spun to stare into the pale eyes beneath the hood. "What do I even call you? Specimen Alpha? Saren? Al?"

A low rumble rolled deep in his companion's throat, even that sound, so familiar, came across as anonymously as the hood. Who or what remained beneath the mantle of heavy fabric? "I loathe the first and am no longer the second. I suppose that means, as much as I hate the name Shepard gave me, it's appropriate to use it." He leaned a little closer, close enough for Nihlus to see his mandibles flutter.

Nihlus scowled and blurted out, "What do you mean, you aren't Saren? You don't stop being someone because your circumstances change."

Al shook his head. "I'm not Saren Arterius any longer. Sovereign devoured Saren, leaving nothing of him behind. Saren used up the last shred of who he was when he shot himself. Cerberus started his heart, got his body breathing again, but most of who he was is just gone." He turned to meet Nihlus's gaze, one hand reaching up to pull down his hood. "Do you see, Nihlus? Do you understand?"

Horror washed over Nihlus in a massive wave of bile and blood as black as what flowed through the Collectors' veins. Almost nothing of the ex-Spectre's face remained. Holes showed the bone where plates had been removed in whole or in part, the edges of the wounds sealed with metal and circuitry. A singularity flaring to life in Nihlus's chest, he reached up, touching Al's ruined mandible with gentle talons. "Dear spirits."

Al nodded and pulled away, replacing the hood. "All that remains inside this skull is as ruined and patchy as the outside. I have a few, cherished scraps ... and the present." His voice dropped to a low tone over heavy subvocals. "Who I am is what Shepard released me to become. Saren is dead, Nihlus."

Nihlus nodded, the black hole inside his chest sucking in the tangle of anger and pity, resentment and grief, cleaning away the emotional sludge as it emptied him out. He wondered if Al even remembered that Saren had tried to kill him, but then decided that it didn't matter. Not if Saren was dead. Besides, that bullet had sent him down a long, strange path to somewhere amazing, and he wouldn't change it.

Still … . "What do you want from me?" he asked, pulling himself back around to the reason Al was sitting next to him on the rooftop. "Is there a price on the journal? And why point me to a whole lot of cleared-out bank accounts and safety deposit boxes?"

"There is no price, Nihlus. The journal is everything Saren learned about the Reapers and the cycles. You'll need it, because I don't remember any of that information. The accounts … ." He shook his head, millstones grinding down a rumble of frustration before it could escape his throat.
"The accounts … I remembered only to send the message, and there is a word ... Leviathan."

"Leviathan?" Nihlus scowled and shook his head. "What or who is it?" Had the entire galaxy begun to speak in riddles?

Al shrugged, shaking his head a little. "That word is associated with three others ... creators, suzerain, and enemy." He swung his legs around and stood, straightening his cloak, his movements declaring the conversation over. "Asking any more won't help, Nihlus. I don't remember. Look in the journal. If Sovereign told me about it, it will be in there."

Nihlus turned around, but didn't stand. "Why did you come here tonight?" He shook his head to ward off another half explanation or lie, frustration building into a choking wad in his throat. "Just tell me."

Al took a long breath and sat back down. "As I walked through the apartment, I touched all those things ... the art and furniture ... all the articles and trinkets that meant so much to him, and I realized that they all meant nothing. Only one thing in that apartment mattered, and he threw it away." Pale milky eyes stared into Nihlus's for a moment, then Al leaned in and touched his brow to Nihlus's. "I just wanted you to know that I see what he threw away, even if he never did."

He pushed up and strode across the roof, taking quick, limping steps that made Nihlus ache just watching them. "Good luck, Nihlus. Live well. Take Shepard as your bond-mate, let her love you, and be happy." He put a foot up on the fire escape and turned back. "Just don't let her talk you to death. Spirits, does that woman talk." He jumped onto the fire escape and disappeared from view.

Nihlus stayed where he was, mind racing and throat dry. Their conversation lasted what … ten minutes, maybe fifteen and now … spirits, how did he process everything that he'd been told?

One piece at a time.

The journal, well, nothing had changed there, but the accounts led to Leviathan. The only one he'd heard of was the Leviathan of Dis, but if it ever existed, it had disappeared cycles before. He stood and walked to the elevator, his attention turned inward. Maybe Liara and the Brysons could figure out if Leviathan had any basis in reality. He still needed to figure out the identity of the asari who was cleaning out the accounts. If he believed Al, she formed a direct link.

Looking up, he realized that he stood inside the elevator, canted against the wall, but hadn't hit the control. Embarrassment traced one searing finger along the ridge of his plates as he reached out and sent the carriage down to the apartment.

Saren. Saren truly was dead. The Reapers had stolen everything he was, except for that last important second. Nihlus swallowed, his tongue sticking to the back of his throat. His talons grabbed a handful of his robe. Letting out a disgusted chuff, he smoothed the material back over his thigh. Al had set him free ... set them both free ... Nihlus to get on with his life, no more anchors tied to the past.

"I just wanted you to know that I see what he threw away, even if he never did."

The elevator doors opened. Nihlus stepped to the threshold and wrapped his arms around his waist, staring at the washed out grey on grey of the sitting room. How many nights had he spent sitting alone in Saren's beautiful, austere habitat while the Spectre went about his social life? How many parties had he spent upstairs because he ceased to exist when Saren had guests.

"It was an entire lifetime ago," he whispered, growling at himself under his breath. "You were barely more than a child. Let it go."

"I just wanted you to know that I see what he threw away, even if he never did."

Al had come to say what Saren never could have. Grief and a free-floating sort of anger bubbled to the surface.

Feet padded quietly down the stairs, interrupting his confusion and bitterness. Sol appeared at the bottom, wrapped in her duvet. After staring at him for a second, she shuffled over, her legs tangled in excess blanket. "Everything okay?" she asked, her voice sliding along the scale of a yawn. Reaching out, she squeezed his forearm, the contact warm and grounding. "You look a little shaky."

He forced his mandibles into a smile and dropped his arms. "Yeah, I'm fine, go back to sleep. You could even go back to your own bed." He patted her hand then headed for the stairs. As he started the climb, he began to shiver, the cool, arctic night having slithered through the fabric of his robe. He shook out his hands then rubbed them against the heavy fabric. Yeah, it was just the cold.

"Goodnight, Sol. Sleep well." The whisper sounded tremulous to his ears, but he clenched his jaw and pushed on, heading into the bathroom. After relieving himself and washing the roof off his feet, he walked out the door to find Solana sitting on the end of his bed. Damn. He swallowed a couple of times and clenched his fist.

"Specimen Alpha?" she asked, peering at him like a maraquil sighting down its dinner. "It sounded like another torin out there." A wide yawn displayed all her teeth before she flicked her mandibles against her mouth a couple of times. She snuggled down into her duvet, pulling it up around her aural canals.

"Yes, and I'm fine, I just caught a chill and need a heavier robe. Now go to sleep. I'll explain everything at breakfast." He ducked into the closet, closing the door but leaving it unlatched. She might get suspicious if he locked himself in. He changed his robe for a heavier one, then turned to his armour rack and snatched his flask from its pouch. Tossing his head back, he poured the remainder of the contents down his throat. The brandy burned all the way down, pulling a long, overloud sigh of relief from deep in his belly as the knots finally began to untie.

Sol had settled herself back on his bed when he walked out. "Your bed is comfier than mine," she said, matter-of-a-factly as if it explained why she hadn't returned to her own.

"You snore," he said, sitting on the side, facing away from her. He drank down half a bottle of soda, rinsing his mouth the best he could before he laid down. Once tucked in, his pillows mounded to support all the right places, he closed his eyes, hoping that Sol would take the hint.

The mattress shifted beside him, and long, thin talons wrapped around his. "Alpha is Saren, isn't he?" the tarin asked, her voice barely stirring the air.

"He was. Saren's dead. Sovereign destroyed him." He turned his hand over to squeeze her hand right back. "Al is someone new, but at least he had enough of Saren's memories to help us figure this out."

"Rest in peace, Saren Arterius," Sol said. "In the end, you came through."

Nihlus nodded. Saren had come through for them all … and for him, even if it was from beyond the grave. It was enough to let it all go … to let Saren rest.

Still, it took quite some time before he fell back to sleep.

Sol looked up from her breakfast when Nihlus's omnitool chimed. "So, what's on the agenda for today? Another day of following that asari around as she empties back accounts?"

Nihlus activated his omnitool's interface, shooting a glare over the small screen without lifting his head. He opened the notification and blew out a short sigh of relief. "No. The asari we want is Jona Sederis." Browplates rising, he read the rest of the bulletin. "Who is a real piece of work. She's the founder of the Eclipse mercenaries and a psychopath of the first order. Wonderful."

"Why does some looney Eclipse leader have access to Saren's accounts?" Sol asked. She turned to face Thane. "Come on, Mr. Assassin, you must have some thoughts on all of this?"

Thane looked up from his bowl of fruit, glanced at Nihlus, then leaped from his chair when the door chimed. "I'll see who is at the door," he called, already hurrying that way. "It might be an assassin. If I'm fortunate, they may kill me before I need to answer that question."

Nihlus grinned at Sol. "He'd rather deal with assassins than you." He continued down the report on Sederis. "How many killer asari are we going to have to deal—" He looked up, his heart dropping into his guts as Thane appeared in the doorway, the drell's face drawn, his submachine gun gripped in his hands.

"At least one more," Thane said, the bright skin along his jawline flushing even deeper hues. "The asari justicar is at the door."
Shepard opened her mouth to ask if the krogan was Okeer, but she didn't get a chance to speak before a cyclone of bellowing rage threw her aside. Murder entered that room, a specter clinging to Wrex's back, whispering promises of spilled blood and crushed bone into the clan lord's aural canals. Ignoring the protests launched by her healthy sense of self-preservation, Shepard leaped after Wrex, grabbing hold of one massive elbow.

46 Days ASR

"All right, let's get this done and get the hell out of here. I need to sleep for a week." Shepard waved her team forward, pausing to meet Kaidan's stare before following along. "You got this, Sparky?"

The Marine managed to find a smile hidden somewhere in his exhaustion to accessorize his nod. Still, it couldn't hide the bruised luggage beneath his eyes or shadowed hollows at his temples and beneath his cheekbones. "Yes, ma'am." Glancing back at the thirty-two Blue Suns and three tank-grown krogan, he shrugged. "Our guests look even more beat down and worn out than we do. I don't think they'll give us any trouble."

She gave him a jaunty little salute when he turned back. "Just make sure our exit stays clear." Ready and more than ready to be off Korlus and standing under a hot shower with her fiance, Shepard took off after her team. Only one small room stood in the way of reaching their goal. Well, one small room and a couple hundred Collectors.

Pausing as she passed an open panel, Shepard reached out, running her fingers over an ancient power coupling. Despite their having climbed up through more than twenty decks, the ancient turian dreadnought still loomed over them. The hierarchy certainly hadn't built them small before the council stepped in with their regulations and treaties.

She traced the pocked, time-worn ceramic surface, brow furrowed. Other than the wear, it looked as though she could slip it from its socket and stick it into a modern ship. How? The turians, salarians, and asari had all possessed prothean archives and beacons for a great deal longer than humanity; how could they have allowed their technology to stall for so long? They should be so far ahead of her people that it wasn't funny. Not that being on a near equal footing hadn't saved humanity's butt during the First Contact War.

Still, with their massive headstart, why hadn't the asari discovered ways to integrate biotic weapons into ships? And why did a power coupling from a thousand year old turian warship look almost exactly like the current gen version?

"Shepard." Garrus laid his hand on her shoulder, a slight flutter of amusement betraying his serious, scolding tone. "There will be lots of time to pick your way through the museum of wreckage once the mission is over. We can vacation here if you like." He slid his talons down her arm to removed her hand from the coupling, leaning in as he did so that his breath warmed her neck in a most delicious and definitely not scolding way. "We're almost there. Let's get it done."
She turned into him, pressing a quick kiss on the end of his nose. "Yeah, I know." She followed him across a long, open area to the door on the other side. "Do you ever wonder why your people aren't more advanced than mine?" She pressed her back against the side of the door as he took position opposite her. "You've had access to the prothean archives for a thousand or so years longer than we have."

Although the glare of his visor obscured his eyes from that distance, Shepard felt certain that Garrus rolled them at her. "No, I haven't. Now open the damned door, I want a shower and to sleep on a real bed."

Shepard stuck her tongue out at him, then motioned for Wrex and Jack to take positions a little further back and to the outside of she and Garrus. She might need their biotics to shoehorn their way into the room. Once they took their positions, Shepard counted down on her fingers. Three … two … one.

She hit the door, the stench of a hundred horrific, tormented deaths slapping her in the face so hard that she almost fell back. A meteor straight to the gut, the reek of vomit, shit, piss, bile, and decay sent a tsunami of sick scorching up the back of her throat. In her peripherals, she saw Garrus stagger back a little before pushing in on the threshold. Holding her breath, she swung into the opening, rifle leading the way.

"Clear," Garrus called, his voice choked, digging its way out of his chest. Lithe movements belying any discomfort, he swept the left hand side of the room before standing guard at the inner door.

"Clear," Shepard echoed, her gag reflex sucker punching her every three seconds as she swept right. Blinking in the gloomy light, she squinted at the ragged lumps strewn around the room, uncertain of what any of it was. Uncertainty lasted two heartbeats before morphing into horror and then rage. "What the hell is this?" she said. Three tables lined the right hand wall, all of them hosting a krogan corpse in some stage of autopsy. Behind them, corpses had been dumped into a pile, moldering. On the left side of the room a desk and another body-laden table stood side by side.

"We're clear," she managed to call back to the rest of the squad, remembering what she was doing. Gliding on a thin sheet of icy disgust, her feet barely lifted from the deck plating as she crossed the threshold into what felt more like an abattoir or the mass grave in an internment camp than a lab or a surgery. She turned to tell Wrex to stay back, knowing that the clan chief's barely controlled temper would boil over as soon as he caught sight of the bodies. She stopped halfway through the first step, her toe catching as she realized, she might as well try to halt the seasons.

After a moment of debate, she opted for the route of fewest friendly casualties and spun, hurrying through the room to the inner door. Trusting her instincts, she waved Garrus into position on the other side. She just needed to get the door open and get everyone out of Wrex's way. When Garrus nodded, she palmed the control.

What awaited her on the other side of the door raked sharp nails of surprise down her spine. Gun leading, she swung into the threshold, sweeping for unfriendlies. Nothing. Other than a krogan in a maturation tank, the room's only occupant was an elderly krogan who paced back and forth in front of a large bank of windows, mumbling to himself and waving his arms.

Shepard opened her mouth to ask if the krogan was Okeer, but she didn't get a chance to speak before a cyclone of bellowing rage threw her aside. Murder entered that room, a specter clinging to Wrex's back, whispering promises of spilled blood and crushed bone into the clan lord's aural canals. Ignoring the protests launched by her healthy sense of self-preservation, Shepard leaped after Wrex, grabbing hold of one massive elbow.
"Okeer!" the clan chief roared. His charge didn't slow, he simply dragged Shepard across the floor, paying her no more notice than he would a fly landing on his armour.

"Little help here," she called. Using the behemoth's arm like a slingshot, Shepard threw herself in front of him. She braced a hand against his chest and leaned into him—she might as well have been fighting a train. "Sweet baby Jesus, Wrex! Stop! You can't just rip Okeer to pieces."

He stopped, glaring at her with enough rage to burn two massive holes straight through her. "You saw those bodies, Shepard!"

Instead of backing down, she gave him a substantial shove, barely rocking him. "I did, but we need to find out what's going on here first, and if he has a genophage cure, we can't kill him. You can't sacrifice all your people just to have the pleasure of killing him."

"Cure? Surviving the genophage doesn't make a krogan special or worthy," a deep, throaty voice said from behind her. Madness curled through the words, grabbing hold and spinning Shepard around to face it.

Tar-slick spiders scrambled out of the folds and crannies of her brain, swarming out to embrace their brethren, the call of the krogan's indoctrination sweet, so very sweet, to them. Feeling the clan leader pushing on her from behind, Shepard reached back, her hands fastening around Wrex's wrists like shackles. Okeer's bronze-gold eyes latched onto her, forming shackles of another kind when she saw the old soul—over a millennia of wisdom and experience and regret—floundering beneath the white water currents of the indoctrination.

"Where is it?" she called, keeping her voice low and focused, a stiletto blade trying to pierce the madness. Whatever indoctrinated him had struck like a wrecking ball, smashing everything around it into pieces. Brute force had been deployed to destroy Okeer, to render him useless to the Collectors. "Where is the orb, Okeer?"

"Let a thousand die in a clutch," the warlord said, an almost frantic, greasy chuckle sliding beneath his words. "Don't lament the dead or coddle the ones that live. Pathetic. They are the last mewing cries of a people who died over fourteen hundred cycles ago." Okeer tore free of their stare and spun toward the massive growth tank and its unconscious occupant. Shepard winced, a sharp, ripping-band-aid pain accompanying the break.

"Only perfection will save us." Okeer pressed both hands to the tank's glass. "Perfection that spits on the genophage, a lance to pierce the galaxy's heart and tear it out."

Snapping the spider-silk tendrils weaving between she and the warlord, Shepard spun away. "He's indoctrinated," she said to Garrus and the others. "See if you can find one of the orbs here, and search the computers for any information. Okeer's useless."

Noting that Wrex had stopped trying to bulldoze over her, Shepard glanced over her shoulder at him. "You okay?" The set to his jaw and the fury that flickered beneath his carmine stare tightened her grip on his wrists, he still burned low but hot, ready to set fire to the planet.

"He's mad." Wrex stepped back and shook his head. "We won't get anything from him, Shepard. We should just put him down."

Releasing him, Shepard nodded, knowing the truth when it growled at her. "Maybe, but let's give it a shot, Brother Wrex." Her shoulders crept toward her ears then dropped. "Can't hurt to try to figure out what's going on here." Spinning toward the door, Shepard searched the stunned and disgusted faces for the oasis of sanity at the heart of the madness. When her eyes found the shaman, she beckoned the female krogan forward. The shaman had been able to reach the tank-grown, her natural empathic abilities slipping along the ley lines of their particular madness.

"No one else has a chance," Shepard said, simply. A pair of large, scalding hot hands slid up the skin of her back, their touch sticky with dripping tar. She spun to face Okeer, drawing herself up as she reached into her belt pouch for the dose of serum she'd prayed she wouldn't need. Still, as the krogan loomed over her, the toxic black stink of desert pavement stabbed the inside of her nose. She stuck the syringe in her medigel port. Better safe than mindless.

"Shepard," Okeer whispered, deep and guttural, her name coming out as if he just registered her presence. "They want to take you apart, to pull you into pieces and dissect you in paper-thin slices." Leaning down to stare into her eyes, the krogan sniffed at her, then chuffed out a sharp, coughing laugh. "You reek of defiance." He grunted, his face scrunching into a frown. "And cybernetics, like burning batteries."

"They can be fought, Okeer," Shepard said, punching the point home despite her belief that whatever had taken crowbars and jackhammers to his brain had smashed it beyond hope. "I've been fighting for years, and my mind is still mostly my own." Her gut twisted with a sick, bile-sour wrench as the spiders rubbed against her grey matter like possessive cats.

The warlord leaned closer, his breath hot and fetid on her face. "They've waited. They're patient, because they know that no one can challenge them. They want you, and they want my prototype. They want Wrex and the general, and so I called." His laugh dripped a sort of relieved madness. "They're coming. Soon they'll let me die."

A muted explosion echoed through the chamber, slapping Shepard's taut nerves hard enough that she jumped despite staying focused on Okeer. As the orb exploded into slag, a blank expression wiped the warlord's face clean, his eyes and mouth drooping. When he dropped to one knee, Shepard took a deep breath and muttered a prayer. "Blessed Enkindlers, clench your giant backsides and cross all four eyes that this doesn't kill him outright." Grabbing two of her two serum injections, she stabbed them into the sides of his throat. Guilt's sly fingers twisted around her spine, but she shrugged them off. The worst the injections would do is give him a merciful death; at best, maybe they'd give her and the krogan a shot at getting something coherent out of him.

"Orb is down, Shepard," Garrus called. His footsteps thumped against the metal floor, solid and reassuring as he approached. "Do you and Wrex have this in hand?" Her nerves all let out a faint, electric jolt as his hand gripped her shoulder. "If so, I'll set the others to work securing the lab and downloading the computers. We should be headed for our extraction in under thirty"

"Take Wrex," she said, inspiration or desperation whispering that she'd get more out of Okeer with the shaman's help and Wrex's absence. "He can help get any unbirthed tank-grown organized and ready to move out. If Okeer is right, we're going to have visitors moving in on us soon, if they aren't already."

Inspiration or its bastard brother jabbed Shepard again, turning her toward Jack. "Set up a comm channel with EDI and Sparky. Have EDI keep you up to date with the Collector's movements while you and Sparky find us another route out of here if the Collectors wall us in." Half-expecting an argument or bad attitude, Shepard found herself pleasantly surprised as Jack nodded and started to work.

Two crooked fingers beckoned the shaman closer, then Shepard bent down, hooking an arm under Okeer's armpit. "Come on, big fella. Up you get." A marching band of grunts and groans welcoming her new hernia, Shepard managed to wrestle Okeer back onto his feet. "Good lord," she said between gasps. Slapping the side of the warlord's face none too gently, she managed to get him aware enough to meet her eyes.

"What were you working on here?" Shepard asked, commanding an answer. Frustration met his continued blank silence, and she cracked her hand across his cheek so hard her fingers felt broken. "Come back to us. Was it a cure for the genophage? What?"

"Perfection," Okeer replied at last. "The krogan are dying. Merely hatching more mewling weaklings won't change that tide." He leaned heavily on her, mouth low to her ear as if confiding some great confidence. "And you should let them die. They're a pale shadow of the ancients. No pride. No real strength."

A massive, armoured elbow hooked around Shepard's neck, dragging her toward the tank and the unborn, but massive krogan inside. The warlord's madness choked her more surely than his muscle and bone. Survival demanded that she fight free, that she speak, and yet it slapped irons on her fight/flight response and stole the words from her mind.

"Okeer!" The deep, commanding yet feminine voice of the shaman broke through the warlord's madness. Holding his attention, the female stepped up to remove his arm. "Tell us what you've done. Why are the Collectors here?"

Abandoning Shepard to clutch at her throat and gasp, Okeer pressed both hands against the tank's glass, vibrating with an uninhibited excitement that assured Shepard how far gone he was: a child pressed against the toy store window. "I needed to find the spark. The rest … no spark."

"We met some of your rejected creations along the way," the shaman replied. "Their spark was intact."

He shook his head, a violent movement that rocked him to his toes. "Not perfect, not the spark of the ancient krogan … the strong, true krogan. Not even the strength of my brothers and sisters as we stomped rachni into puddles of blood and shell," he said, his voice curling back toward crazy, sliding over pebbled ice.

The low, guttural roar that came from the shaman consisted of a fury so palpable that it raised the hair on Shepard's arms and neck. "The ancient krogan destroyed Tuchanka, and those krogan of your days of glory are the reason the genophage exists." Before Shepard's eyes, the embodiment of rage—beautiful and terrible—manifested, provoking both fear and awe. "We want nothing to do with your version of perfection." Then as quickly as it appeared, the spirit of krogan violence disappeared back into the ether, and the shaman stepped away.

"No! This is the only way!" Grasping hands reached out, finding only handfuls of Shepard's armour as she stepped into the path of Okeer's lunge. "Don't you see? The Collectors understand that distilling perfection is all that matters." Either not realizing who he'd grabbed or not caring, he leaned back into Shepard's face, his breath hot and fetid, spittle splashing against her skin. "They're searching for the same thing."

Images of the husk asari on Thessia rolled through Shepard's mind.

Oh definitely … perfection.

His eyes latched onto Shepard, focusing in a way that sent a buzzing thrill of terror sizzling down her spine into her limbs. Rancid madness—a mind already rotting inside its skull—stared back at her as he whispered, deep and guttural, "That's why they want you, Shepard. To add your spark to theirs." He sneered, the curled lip and narrowed eyes broadcasting how imperfect he found her. Still, he nodded. "They're going to slice you into pieces to see what makes you special and then consume it as they've consumed trillions … lives beyond counting."

Shepard clenched her hands and her teeth, forcing herself to meet the stare, trading crazy for crazy.

I see your instant, brain-gooifying indoctrination and raise you three years worth of the slow path.

Shepard slammed both palms into his chest, shoving him backwards. His easy collapse threw her off balance and she stumbled, scrambling for a second before catching herself. "Keep your distance. And keep your—"

"Shepard." Garrus's voice came through the comms so tight and wrong that the single word grabbed her stomach and heaved, filling the back of her mouth with the sour, gritty remains of her earlier ration bar. "Come to the windows," he continued without giving her time to reply, hammering his urgency home.

"Keep him here," she said, tossing a glance over her shoulder at the shaman. Impatience grabbed her by the collar, dragging her around the warlord, while two days worth of dread shoved her face into the window. Something in the air had changed; it ticked away at the base of her skull, insects skittering through the grass, cold and hard against the hot earth.

The Collectors were making their move. She knew that with a painful certainty, but what the hell was it?

Her gaze slipped past Garrus to the spikes just beyond, slick metal gleaming so darkly that her eyes tried to slide right over it. The ticking in her head spelled out a picture of Eden Prime and a dozen small colonies and research bases. Husks. Either Okeer had been turning Blue Suns into husks, or he'd allowed the Collectors use his lab to do so. Either way, it spelled trap, not rescue mission.

Lungs threatening to blow straight out through her ribs, she spun to face the krogan. "What the hell?" she demanded, the words rushing out on a torrent of air. Collectors with dragon's teeth? Fuck, well, of course, they were as much Reaper lackies as Sovereign had been. She grabbed the collar of Okeer's armour, shoving her face into his. "What are the damned spikes for, Okeer?"

Turning her back to the Reapers' bared, bone-chilling teeth, she slammed herself into Okeer again. "How many mercs have you stuck on those spikes, Okeer? What the hell price did you pay for this perfect krogan?" Clenching her fists tight enough that the bones ached, she stomped on the urge to turn him over to Wrex for disposal in some brutal way.

Instead, she lifted her hand to her ear. "Sparky, get your asses in here. We're about to get hit from everywhere." She let him get out a 'yes, ma'am' before closing that channel and opening one to the Ypres. "EDI, we need a back way out of here as close to this room as possible."

"Captain," Steve broke through before she could hang up, the combination of perplexed and afraid in the pilot's tone sucking the air out of Shepard's lungs, "the Collectors have just disappeared off our scanners."

"What do you mean disappeared?" she asked, speaking slowly, over-enunciating every word. Husks in numbers and locations unknown, now the Collectors?

"Transmitting a false signal?" he offered. "All we know is that one second, they hadn't moved, and the next they aren't there. They aren't reading as being anywhere on Korlus's surface."

"Shepard," EDI interrupted, "the relay is active. Incoming vessels."

The vacuum inside Shepard's lungs dropped to absolute zero for three heartbeats, then the lab's door opened. She spun toward it, Mattock up, finger ready on the trigger, that movement shattering the ice encasing her heart and brain, allowing the wheels to start turning. When she saw Kaidan's team, she let the gun sag and pointed to Miranda. "Get that krogan out of his tank, now!" When her XO opened her mouth, Shepard raised the gun again. "That was an order, Operative Lawson."

As soon as Miranda moved to comply, Shepard spun to face Barl. "Get the prisoners armed and down into the lower lab. We're going to need the guns."

The krogan grunted his acknowledgement and started barking orders. His competence and command helped ease the cruel fist buried in Shepard's chest, allowing air to flow. Until—

"Captain! Two Collector cruisers incoming." A curse from Steve backed up EDI's report.

Damn, the Normandy didn't have a chance against them, and she doubted that either of the other two frigates did either. "Did Cerberus steal the plans for the Ypres's IES system from Archangel?"

Shepard demanded of no one in particular. Maybe the geth designed shields on the Passch would hold up to a hit or two. She raised her eyebrows when Miranda glanced in her direction. "Well?" Her voice rose to a shout. Time pressed in on her, its breath heavy on the back of her neck; she didn't have any to waste dancing.

The operative waggled her head as she activated her omnitool. "We did get a look at the plans for Archangel's ships, but we improved upon the designs. I—"

Like a well-oiled machine, Janey. You've still got it.

"That's fine," Shepard said, cutting the operative off before she could extol the virtues of Cerberus engineering. "That's all I needed to know." She turned her attention back to her comms. "EDI, you and Steve get the Ypres down here, stealth systems active. Try to be covert, they'll know where you're going to be, but get down here now and get us off this rock. EDI, find us a backdoor and now!"

When both answered to the affirmative, she opened a channel to Anderson, cutting him off when he tried to preface with info on the enemy cruisers. "Get the Normandy out of here, sir. She can't stand up to those things. The Ypres will extract us. We'll meet up with you on Omega."

"Are you in deep?" the captain asked, the wary edge to his voice saying he already knew they were.

"Don't worry, we'll get out—"

"No! You can't have him!"

The roar of fury followed by a sharp cry of pain spun Shepard away from her call. The image of Okeer holding Miranda by the neck registered for a half second before the shaman shoved the muzzle of her shotgun against the warlord's temple and washed the wall with his blood and brains. Shepard shuddered, a traitorous draft curling around her ear to taunt her with the fact that her brains had slid down a wall just like that two years earlier.

A hand, not as calm or wry as she made it look, wiped the spattered viscera from her face. "You okay, Lawson?" An unflappable nod answered her, the operative returning to her work as if she didn't have an angry purple bruise blooming on the pale skin of her neck or bits of brain and skull in her hair.

"Shepard?" Anderson called. "You there?"
"Yes, sir. Just get the Normandy out of here, and we'll see you in a couple of days." Her hand lifted to her ear to open a private channel to Garrus.

"Roger that, Shepard. Normandy, out."

Agreement to send the Passch to the relay to await flight or fight orders had just wrestled its way between Garrus's clenched teeth when the first unearthly howls shuddered through the air.

"Miranda, is the tank open?" Shepard hollered, the effort to keep her voice level costing her a premium as the deck plating vibrated under the onslaught of the desiccated remains of dozens of mercenaries. Sweet baby Jesus, that sounded like a hell of a lot of husks.

"Done with the computers, Shepard," Jack announced, glancing toward the door and the uneven, staggering thunder of running feet. "EDI says we have Collectors and husks closing on us from every direction. She sent you a new extraction point it's at the end of the lower lab and up three levels. ETA fifteen minutes." The biotic settled her shotgun in her hands and ran for the door to the lower lab. "Unless we want to get cut off, we need to get down to the lower lab, now. They're swarming up between levels."

"Sparky," Shepard called, turning to the Marine who'd been standing guard at the door. "Scramble the lock on that door, then get down to the lower lab."

"Aye, ma'am," he replied, working on it even as the words left his mouth.

Shepard waved to her team. "Go!" Grabbing Miranda, she shoved the operative after Jack. "You too. I'll be right there." She bent over the tank controls. Blessed ass-cream of the Enkindlers, no wonder the krogan wasn't free. Miranda had been trying to preload orders into the tank-grown's head. Clearing that crap with a single command, she hit the override control. The doors opened, water flooding out to wash over the toes of her boots.

The krogan collapsed at her feet, choking the fluid from his lungs. As he took his first breath of real air, the deep cough of shotguns and bright, metallic chatter of submachine guns marked his birth. She couldn't think of a more appropriate welcome for a newborn krogan.

"Birthed in battle, his first actions and thoughts steeped in blood and death," the shaman said, her voice coloured with awe, "this one is meant for great things. Whether they save us or destroy us … ."

"Come on, big fella," Shepard coaxed, reaching down a hand. "Up and at 'em."

Roaring so loud that Shepard's ears begged for mercy, the krogan surged up from the floor, setting straight into a charge that hit Shepard like a skycar, carrying her straight into a bank of lab equipment. She reached up, both hands gripping the massive forearm that threatened to crush her throat.

"Before I kill you, I need a name," he said, his mouth curling into a snarl that bared his remarkably white teeth. Teeth that white belonged in the mouths of movie stars, not krogan.

Shepard dragged her brain back to something slightly more important and relevant. "The name is Shepard," she said, gasping between each breath. "And we've got an actual battle to fight, so set me down and back off."

The sharp shake of his head ground his armour into her throat, cutting enough of her air and blood flow that a swirling vortex of vertigo began to suck all the light out of the room. "Not your name, mine."
"Whelp!" the shaman shouted, her voice demanding obedience. "Captain Shepard is your commanding officer. Set her down, and prepare for battle, grunt. Now! Do you not hear the gunfire?"

The tankborn turned to look at the shaman, the pressure on Shepard's neck reaching crush level rather than easing as his blue eyes narrowed. "Grunt?" He let out a rumbling sort of chuckle. "I like it. My name … Grunt."

Shepard managed to hold onto enough consciousness and brain power to pull her pistol, and when he turned back, she pressed the muzzle just behind his eye. "Let me go, or I'll drop you," she said, feeling good about the amount of menace she managed to squeeze into the raspy whisper.

The tank-grown, Grunt, laughed and backed up. Shepard's feet hit the floor, but she just kept on going, saved only by the shaman's arm catching her around the waist. It took a minute for the room to stop spinning around her, but even when it did, her every breath remained lined with razors.

"Shepard!" Garrus called in her ear, his subvocals strained. "There are hundreds of them. They've got you cut off from the rest of us, coming up through the stairwell."

"One of these fucking days, we're going to stop walking into traps, Vakarian!" Shepard let out a hissing sigh, steam released from a pressure valve. "We're on our way, just hold tight there and keep the team's retreat open. We'll fight our way through to you." She grabbed her sidearm off her hip and passed it to the shaman as she asked, "How are the prisoners doing?"

"They're solid." Garrus's subvocals thrummed as if he were on the verge of charging the line to come after her. "Just get here."

"Yes, sir, General Vakarian, sir." She closed the channel on his protest and turned to Grunt. "You and your shotgun are going to be the sharp end of the wedge to get us down the stairs. The shaman and I will stick right to your flanks, and hopefully we'll just bulldoze our way through." God, she wished they all had shotguns.

Glancing over at the shaman, Shepard posed a silent query: was she ready for a hell of a fight? The female krogan's eyes narrowed as she nodded, her determination and the excitement radiating off the youngster bolstering Shepard's resolve. The captain closed her eyes, taking deep breaths until her blood roared, her mind settled, her muscles keen to start the dance.

"Open the door, Grunt. Let's go." She took a deep breath, cocked her Mattock in her shoulder, and pressed into the tank-grown's left flank. The door hissed open and for one, breathless second the enemy clogging the stairs hesitated, surprised. One second, and then chaos.

Grunt barrelled straight into the fray, his deep slow laugh punctuated by the roar of his shotgun. Shepard moved from target to target, doing her best to get them in the head and conserve her shots. Damn the heat sink "upgrade". Using the advantage of their surprise, they pushed through to the landing between the two staircases before the Collectors realized they had enemy shooting their backs full of bullets and turned to press the attack.

Shepard crushed a husk's skull with the butt of her rifle, before swinging the gun like a bat, stoving in another's face as she fought to get enough room to switch out her heat sink.

"What the fuck are those?" Jack yelled through the radio.

"Seeker swarms," Miranda answered. "Jack, Lt. Alenko, we need to hold a biotic barrier around the group. Everyone close up! Close up, quickly or we're all dead."
Seeker swarms? Shepard looked down through the open stairs even as she slapped a new heat sink into her gun. One of the Collector commanders appeared, his horned head and lighter colour standing out in the mass of writhing husks and Collector drones. "Take out the ones with the horns first," she said, her orders punching through the noise.

Desperate, she opened fire through the gap in the stairs, but not soon enough as a swarm massed around it. The low threat of their buzzing carried over the gunfire, settling into Shepard's gut like a promise.

You escaped us before, but not this time. This time you're going to end up frozen and helpless, screaming as we tear you apart.

(A-N: At last. All the love. Thank you for reading and your generous support. hugs)
"For nearly four centuries, I have been pursuing the criminal you met last night." She set her teacup down. "She is a mass murderer with a record of hundreds of kills, and had you not rescued that child last night, she would surely have been murdered as well."

Glad to have his instincts confirmed, Nihlus nodded, but it was Sol who answered. "That's a long time to be hunting down one criminal. I'm not sure whether to admire your resolve or fear your obsession."

"Too long," the justicar said, a tight smile showing her agreement. "And, perhaps a bit of both would be appropriate."

Nais - Asari equivalent of woman.

Moruvesin - Winged insect analogues native to Palaven that grow to approximately 2 cms in length. Covered in articulated armour, they are very difficult to kill and have a sting that might not kill you, but burns so severely it will make you wish it had.

Mallupean - A turian song composed to honour the deceased. It is usually written and sung (keened) by their closest loved one as an act of devotion to both the individual and the relationship.

Inluvis - The second gestational period in turian pregnancy. Between 8 and 16 weeks. Slang: Little one, in the sense of being young and underdeveloped.

46 Days ASR

Nihlus stared at the image on the security screen off to the side of the apartment's front door. Damn, what did the justicar want? Showing up at his home and murdering him as he opened the door didn't seem very sporting. Taking a deep breath, he pressed the intercom control.

"Yes? How can I help you?" he asked, watching the asari's every twitch, trying to read her intentions.

She looked at the camera, a sort of intense hopefulness gleaming in her eyes. "Spectre Kryik?" The thin press of her lips, the tension along her square jaw screamed desperation.

"Yes, you have the right apartment." He swallowed a small chunk of ice, memories of the two weeks spent trying to outrun the justicar spitting it out. She'd proven dogged and resourceful, nearly ending him a couple of times before he managed to slip away. "What can I do for you?"

"I need to speak with you." She stared into the camera for a moment, then clenched her jaw, her whole body stiffening as she turned away a few degrees. Nihlus's mandibles flicked; he knew pride being set aside when he saw it.

"You proved yourself an imaginative adversary the first time we fought," the asari said. "I do not have two weeks to devote to chasing you across this planet. I am here on another purpose, and I would speak to you about it."

Nihlus's brow plates rose. "If you don't have time to hunt me, then why not just stop hunting me?" Annoyance sparked, lighting a fire beneath his temper. "I have never threatened you. I don't have any desire to kill you." He let the fire build. She didn't have the time to hunt him? Seriously? He hadn't even seen her when she opened fire on him all those cycles ago, and even then, he retreated rather than engage. He choked back the worst of the rant that tried to force its way out. "I'll ask one more time, and then I'm going back to my breakfast. Why are you here?"

She spun and paced away from the camera, pivoting on her heel when she reached the far side of the hall. "Last night, why did you pull that youngster away from the asari in the bar?" As she stared into the camera, he saw something move across her face, something very old and very painful, but also something she worked very hard to keep hidden.

He narrowed his eyes at the screen, the spear rammed down through his spine softening a little. "I know someone planning to harm someone else when I see them," he said, his voice softer. The memory of the darkness slithering beneath the asari's seductive grace, the empty well of those eyes, sent a shudder ripping down his body. "That nais was a predator, and a child like the one she was seducing doesn't have enough experience or sense to see past the charming smile and the free 'mood enhancers'."

He let out a long, noisy breath that bordered on a snort and straightened, puffing his chest out a little. Drunken joke of a Spectre or not, he remained a Spectre. "I'm a peace officer, or I was. That means not standing by and letting a child end up raped, or dumped in some alley with a slit throat."

The justicar took a long breath and returned to stand so close her face took up the entire screen, as if she was trying to peer straight into his soul. "If you are an officer of the peace and a protector, why did you kill that nais on Lusia? She was unarmed."

That was why she went after him all those cycles ago? That day … . Nihlus closed his eyes and sagged against the wall … that day had been the culmination of the worst mission of his career. He let out a sigh that felt as if it started around his ankles. "I don't want to stand here and yell this story into the corridor." He reached toward the door controls. "If I let you in, do I have your word that you'll hear me out? If you do, I think you'll find the landscape murkier than you believe."

The lovely, severe face stood square in the camera, a single deep bow and a soft corona of biotic energy answering his question. "I swear that as long as I am not threatened, I will offer you no threat, nor will I bring harm to you or your companions. By the code, I swear it." The blue corona flared slightly then dissipated.

Nihlus turned to find Thane and Sol standing a couple of metres behind him. He shook his head then held a hand out toward the doors to the guest rooms. "You two can retire to your rooms unless you hear gunfire or people throwing one another around."

Sol's mandibles flicked, blue eyes flashing. "And if we do? Just turn up our vids so we don't have to listen to your preteril squeaks for help?" Cocking her head, she backed away a single step.

He didn't rise to her bait. "Yes, or come save me. Whichever one suits your mood." He flipped his hand toward her door.
"Our mood and the quality of whatever program we're watching," Thane deadpanned, then turned and strode for his room.

Nihlus let out a startled laugh and pointed an accusatory finger at Sol. "That's your influence."

She cackled and spun on her toes, practically flouncing to her room. "I know! It's fantastic. Good luck with your guest, senux." The door closed behind her, then opened a crack. "And don't get killed."

Nihlus let a slow, indulgent wave of affection flow through him, waiting for it to ebb before he turned back to the door. Despite the justicar's oath, he held his breath as he hit the control and the door slid open. He really didn't want to have to kill someone in his front room. When no biotics or weaponry appeared, he stepped aside, a quick sweep of his hand ushering her inside.

"Thank you," she said, her tone chill and stiff. Gliding across the floor, she crossed to where the living room carpet began. "It's been a very long night."

Nihlus merely nodded and held an arm out toward the sofa. "Please, make yourself comfortable. Can I get you anything? Water?" His mandibles twitched as he flailed, trying to think of anything else that wouldn't make her ill. He'd never really entertained, particularly any would-be murderers. What was the protocol for early morning detente?

Thane's door opened, the drell taking two steps into the room before giving the asari a slight bow. "I brewed a pot of lemon and ginger tea. It's still hot."

"Thank you," the justicar replied, her tone weary and grateful. "That would be welcome." She folded neatly onto the edge of the leather, holding herself rigid and straight.

Nihlus stared at her for another moment before clearing his throat. "I'm Nihlus Kryik, as you already know." He swept an arm toward Thane as the drell disappeared into the kitchen. "Sere Thane Krios." He glanced toward Sol's door, a thick, dark crease along the one edge betraying that she was spying on them. He crooked a talon, then held out his hand, palm up. "And Solana Vakarian."

The justicar nodded to Sol. "My name is Samara. I am a servant of the Justicar Code. I wish I could make your acquaintance under different, less urgent circumstances, but necessity demands what it demands."

Thane returned with two cups of tea and two of amarceru on a tray. He set them on the coffee table, then picked one up and moved over to a chair by the wall. Sol, on the other hand, gave the drell a wide grin and plopped herself down on the floor across the table from Samara.

Once everyone had taken a couple of stiff, awkward sips at their drinks, Nihlus drew in a deep breath. Time to tell his tale.

"I had tracked an organization of slavers from Lorek to Omega and Illium … a half dozen other worlds before I found the main farm." He took a drink, needing the warmth of the amarceru to fight back the chill creeping out of the past. "I hadn't expected an outfit that enormous, and so I found myself taking on platoon strength guard garrison and mounted weaponry that slowed my advance into the main compound." He swallowed, his tongue sticking to the back of his throat, and leaned forward to set his cup down. "The investigative team the council sent in afterwards said the first explosions were triggered in the mother house, then the barracks. By the time I made it through the wall, the entire inner compound was on fire."
He paused, finding a spec of something on the back of his talon that needed immediate investigation, allowing him to draw away from the stink and the horror of that day. "I found one small child alive. When I went back in after the fires were extinguished, I was able to identify all the inner circle of the slaving ring but for the two ringleaders. One was a batarian; I caught up with him on Omega. The other was the nais you saw me shoot on Lusia." He looked up, meeting the justicar's stare. "No, she wasn't carrying a weapon, but I'd chased her through the spaceport and a cafe. To slow me down, she used her biotics to fling five innocent people in my path. Three survived."

Nihlus cleared his throat and leaned down to pick up his mug, needing the heat on his hands and in his belly. "She was hardly innocent."

Samara bowed her head, still regal and stiff, but some of the hardness around her mouth and eyes softened. "I misjudged your actions. I apologize." She straightened and lifted her cup. "To have gone through such and then to be hunted." A short breath escaped that almost sounded like a regretful sigh before she cut it off.

Nihlus just nodded. 'No problem, don't worry about it' seemed insane considering she'd hunted him across half a continent. Instead, he took another swallow of his amarceru and leaned back in his chair. Her turn to take the hot seat. "So, why are you here?"

Although he would have thought it impossible, Samara stiffened even further. "For nearly four centuries, I have been pursuing the criminal you met last night." She set her teacup down. "She is a mass murderer with a record of hundreds of kills, and had you not rescued that child last night, she would surely have been murdered as well."

Glad to have his instincts confirmed, Nihlus nodded, but it was Sol who answered. "That's a long time to be hunting down one criminal. I'm not sure whether to admire your resolve or fear your obsession."

"Too long," the justicar said, a tight smile showing her agreement. "And, perhaps a bit of both would be appropriate." A brief pause and slight shift in her rigid form marked her topic change. "She is highly intelligent and gifted in the art of manipulation." Big, blue eyes turned to stare into Nihlus's. "I tracked her to Illium, but then saw you in the spaceport when I arrived. She must have been watching me, because she began to stalk you. I believe she did so in order to ascertain why I showed interest in you." A thin trickle of light wove through that stare. "I believe that distraction is why she has fled, but also presents me with my best chance to apprehend her."

Perking up at that, Nihlus leaned forward, elbows braced against the arms of the chair, his mug held between both hands. "You're here to ask for my help?" All the knots in his shoulder muscles began to untie. Helping catch an infamous mass murderer? That he could do. No massive, terrifying, unbeatable forces of doom, just investigating, tracking, and then some running and gunning at the end. Damn, that sounded good.

Except, that chasing down murderers wasn't why he'd come to Illium. He needed to chase his own shadows and discover what his behind the madness of Saren's accounts being cleared out.

"After you confronted her last night," Samara continued, reeling him from his thoughts, "Morinth went to the Eclipse, who smuggled her off world." Her jaw tightened as if she found her words distasteful. "I cannot lay siege to Eclipse headquarters alone. I am an experienced fighter and powerful biotic, but even so, I am one person."

"So you want us to help storm the castle?" Sol asked, her demeanour perking up. Her eyes sparked with eagerness as they latched onto Nihlus. If she started begging, he'd never be able to resist that stare. Thank the spirits, their next goal also meant fighting their way through the Eclipse.

Still, Nihlus looked to Thane first, not wanting to volunteer any of his tiny squad against their will. When the assassin answered his silent inquiry with a nod, he mirrored it, then turned back to the justicar.

"It appears our purposes have converged. Our mission requires that we find Jona Sederis, the Eclipse leader, and we have reason to believe she's on Illium." He shifted forward in his chair and set his mug down on the corner of the table. "Do you have any intel on the Eclipse base?"

The justicar activated her omnitool. "Yes, I spent most of the early morning discovering its location and tracking down a volus trader with knowledge of its layout and a pass to get inside."

"Yes," Sol crowed, flashing a cocky grin his way. "At last, a decent fight, senux." The grin deepened and slanted into one sharpened to her usual edge. "You going to be okay? Should I fetch your tonics and linaments? Your cane?"

Replying only with a twitch toward her room to tell her to gear up, he looked down at the representation of the massive complex. "How do we get in?"

"A volus smuggler gave me a key card to get into the elevator that leads down into the base." She pointed to a large cargo elevator that tunneled through the center of the archology. "They'll be on us the moment we arrive on their level. Pitne For's intelligence puts their numbers at two hundred and fifty Eclipse regulars and initiates, one hundred and fifty LOKI and FENRIS mechs, twenty-five YMIR mechs, and twenty gunships, although they won't be able to mobilize most of those."

Nihlus stared into those earnest, fearless blue eyes for a long moment, letting the knots in his gut untangle before he took a deep breath and nodded. "So basically, the four of us are taking on an army."

Samara nodded, not a trace of humour in her expression. "Indeed."

Later

Nihlus slid into cover beside Sol, assault rifle overheating, knees and ankles shaking, thighs aching, shoulder throbbing, sweat trickling down his neck. "Let's take out an army, she said. I can't take them out alone, she said," he grumbled.

Sol snorted, and shot a spiked glare his way. "Don't worry, gorgeous, ageless asari, we can help you, he said." She nodded toward his shoulder. "How bad is it?"

Firing back a muttered curse, Nihlus shifted his weight to one leg, biting down on the moruvesinsting burn as he rested the other. "I'm fine. After we get through this room, there's a hallway then a small side room before the next staircase. We'll lock ourselves in there for ten minutes and rest." Settling himself balanced on both feet once more, he popped up, doling out rounds in clusters of three.

At the end of the room, two new mechs raced through the door, setting his heart pounding. "Spirits, two more FENRIS incoming. Sol?"

"Yeah, yeah, I'll protect you from the dogs," the tarin grumbled. "Don't go giving yourself a heart attack or stroke. I don't want to have to carry you out of here on my back."

"I hate those spirit-cursed things." As to carrying him out of there, Nihlus sent a subvocal retort that earned a sharp laugh. He concentrated his fire on a line of LOKI's slowly making their way down the room. The stupid things offered no real threat unless they managed to sneak in close while the team focused on the more mobile threats.

Sol leaned around the crate to hit the FENRIS with an overload, then peppered them with rounds. "Thane, could you please throw those dogs? Buy me time to overload them again?"

"On it." From across and another five metres up the hallway, the drell's arm rolled into a graceful hand flick that sent the two robot dogs tumbling down the tile. A half second later, Thane leaped over his cover, his SMG whittling down the barriers on pair of vanguards at the far end of the room. "Crossing field of fire," the assassin called, then nimbly rolled under Nihlus's sight-line.

"Spirits, he's fun to watch." Sol overloaded the FENRIS again, the two dog-things exploding, taking out two of the nearly-finished-off LOKI, allowing Nihlus to move on to assisting Samara. The justicar had four initiates pinned down behind a long desk.

"Moving up to cover Thane on the right. Samara, I'll be at your five," the Spectre called, then leaped over the crate and sprinted across the hall. When he reached the stack of crates, he didn't duck behind them but rather left himself open, a target to give Samara a chance to take some of the less cautious Eclipse with her reave.

The broken-glass shards of their screams shredded Nihlus's calm as Samara's power tore the life from their cells. Some days made him incredibly grateful that he wasn't a biotic. A bullet through each helmet cut off the torment before it could unspool him entirely. Then spirit-blessed silence fell, a relief he felt all the way down into the marrow of his bones.

"Spirits," Sol moaned, lifting one thigh onto her cover. "Are there enough of them?"

Nihlus merely nodded, hoarding his energy as he leaned against the crates at his side. They'd faced a hard fight getting in, but it should ease up until they reached the Eclipse docks. That provided the next good spot to form a solid resistance. Then, the rest of the mercs would gather around their leader. Even thinking about the last fight tied his muscles into complicated knots.

"The galaxy is becoming a darker and darker place," Thane said, striding past, heading toward the hallway and their rest stop. "People feel it, even if they don't know what it is they're feeling. They seek safety in numbers. They seek companionship, the camaraderie of brothers and sisters in arms." He shrugged. "I don't blame them. I feel it as well." A half-smile lifted one corner of his mouth as he met Nihlus's gaze.

Nihlus nodded. Good company, people he trusted, who had his back ... who loved him ... he understood that urge as well. Too bad all the Eclipse corpses behind them hadn't bothered to sign up with Archangel instead. Archangel really needed to do something to start stealing the merc gangs' recruits. If they continued to just wipe out the mercs the way they had been, things could get sticky once the Reapers showed up. Maybe they needed to step out of the shadows a bit, start taking on missions to do more than kill bad guys.

Pushing off the crate, he followed Thane into the empty hallway, his assault rifle sitting heavy in his hands. "Come on, Sol. Let's get this room cleared and actually take a break."

"So how many do you think we've killed or deactivated?" his filitrin asked from his six.

"Seventy-three deceased, forty-seven deactivated," Thane supplied. The assassin paused outside the closed door, cocked his head, then gestured from his tympanic membrane to the door. Without waiting for an order, he slipped into a cover position against the right side.
Nihlus nodded and moved to cover the other side before gesturing to Sol to activate it. As she stepped up to the control, the Spectre listened. One voice: young and female.

Sol palmed the control, then stepped back and away, letting he and Thane lean out of their cover to sweep. Nihlus frowned, one brow plate migrating toward his nose. No one. So, more than likely, they'd discovered an initiate hiding from the fighting.

"We know you're in here," he called. "Come out with your hands raised, and we won't hurt you."

"I didn't shoot," a soft voice said. Hands appeared around the front edge of a computer console. "I swear. I don't even have a gun. I left it on the floor out behind my cover."

Nihlus stepped into the door. "Come out. We won't hurt you."

"Unless you try to hurt us," Sol said, marching past him, "then we'll fill you full of holes." She stepped straight up to the young asari even as the nais climbed up off her knees. After a second, Sol shook her head. "You're just a kid … well, comparatively speaking." Leaning back, Sol crossed her arms, looking so much like her mari in the moment that a keen burrowed down in behind Nihlus's keel. "So … what's your story?"

Nihlus left Sol to deal with their unexpected, reluctant recruit and waved Samara and Thane inside before scrambling the door. They couldn't rest for long, but they all needed a chance to eat, drink, and let their muscles recoup a little. As soon as he turned from the door, his eyelids sagged, his legs turned to rubber, and his arms succumbed to gravity's seductive song.

"My name's Elnora," the asari said in response to Sol's interrogation. "I thought being a merc would be cool, all hunting down bad guys and freeing slaves … like in the stories. It hasn't been like that at all." She wilted as she said the last.

Samara stepped up to look the young nais in the eye. "Mercenaries who possess honour do not find the life an easy one." She spoke with both an authority and passion that pulled Nihlus straight, his heart pumping with purpose.

He pushed off the door, a stiff limp jarring his spine as he walked to a crate and sat. He pulled out a water bottle and a ration bar, then leaned back, content to just listen and watch as his other three team members dealt with Elnora.

They needed the justicar back at Archangel, he decided. Something about Samara pulled together ravelled ends and wove them into a whole: something stronger. Even after a few hours in her presence, he felt it. How much more could she accomplish with fresh recruits? An intractable moral compass couldn't be a bad thing when facing the fight they faced.

Across the room, Elnora began to beam in answer to Sol's suggestion she might find working with Archangel more to her liking, her smile so innocent and filled with hope that it felt like a slap. Samara gripped the kid's shoulder and said something that transformed the wide grin into something solid and ready to face the fight ahead.

A low 'huh' rumbled in his chest. Maybe, just maybe, if Samara returned to Archangel, she could help Shepard weave some of her frayed ends together, and the glowing asses of the Enkindlers might find their way back in at least some of their former glory.

Later

Nihlus twitched, electricity arcing along his hide and between his teeth for a last few seconds, before he collapsed, a puddle of roasted turian on the docking bay floor.
"Senux?" Sol crouched next to him, gentle talons moving over his plates. "You all right?"

He glared at her but didn't move, unsure if he even could, his spine and brain still shooting random impulses down his scorched neural pathways. Opening his mouth, he tried to speak, but his tongue remained glued to the top of his mouth, his jaw still wooden. Fighting the all-too-familiar agony in his overheated and swollen joints, he managed to straighten out the clawed rictus in his talons.

"Spirits, that looked painful," she said, hitting his medigel dispenser. "Not sure this will help, but it can't hurt, right?" She cradled his face between her hands. "Are you in there? Can you see me?"

Oh, he could see her. That made up one of the true evils of dying by devil robot dog. Seeing his inevitable death circling him, hearing his screams and then moans and squeals, smelling his flesh roasting, able to conjure a crystal clear image of Shepard's face as they told her about his death … check. Being paralyzed and unable to do anything about his looming demise while his teeth shattered inside his mouth and his talon joints cracked from stress … also check. Able to do anything to save himself … not so much.

The muscles in his jaw melted from granite to gelatin, followed by enough air flowing through his airways that the thin whistle stopped, and he could speak. "You were supposed cover me while I took out the gunships."

Sol shrugged. "I was. I didn't see that last one dump its load of FENRIS. And when they came charging up the center of the bay …" She winced a little and shrugged. "They're just robot dogs, I didn't think they'd pack a punch like that."

Thane crouched on Nihlus's other side. "A pack of three or four FENRIS mechs can kill in under thirty seconds," he said, his voice heavy with a gentle sort of disapproval. "In a single attack if their quarry's heart isn't strong." He held a hand out to Nihlus. "Your heart muscle and spinal cord may have taken damage and your joints will be swelling. We need to complete the mission and get you to a medical facility."

"I'll be okay. It's not my first experience with those things." Nihlus flexed his talons a few times before he grasped Thane's hand and stood, his arms and legs feeling like saplings in a winter storm. He nodded toward the door out, and gave Samara a small mandible twitch of a smile in answer to her wordless stare of concern. "Go ahead. Secure the next corridor. We're almost there." When the others moved on, Nihlus stumbled toward the nearest crate, leaning heavily against the solid support.

Allowing Shepard's face to remain seared into his inner vision for a moment, Nihlus let the crate hold him up and just sucked in deep, shaky breaths. He still felt the stinging tingle in his hands and feet, still felt random needle jabs along his spine, and as Thane had kindly pointed out, fluid flooded his joints, trying to make up for the trauma. But none of that ached like the thought that he'd come so very close to never seeing Shepard again. He'd just learned what passion tasted like in her kisses.

No. They hadn't killed him. Glancing over his shoulder at the rough circle of seven robotic corpses sparking and leaking slow curls and clouds of smoke, he allowed himself one last shudder. Between Thane and Samara's throws and Sol's overload, they'd gotten him out, and in the end, nothing else mattered. It didn't matter if death's talons missed by a quarter of a millimetre, as long as they missed. Turning his back, he forced Shepard's face from his thoughts. One more room and they could all go home.

"Elnora, time to move up," he called. "Stay in the hallway." When she replied from her hiding hole, he headed for the door.
"Um, Nihlus?" Sol appeared in the door. "You've got to see this." She stepped back out of his path and held out her arm. "It ummm … it appears that the Eclipse have been abducting people and experimenting on them."

Nihlus brushed past her, a vague nausea settling into not just his gut, but his entire body. What in the name of buratrum? Had the entire galaxy lost its mind? He twisted sideways to brush past Sol but the stopped a couple of steps over the threshold. Banks of vidscreens scrolled what looked like scientific data above a line of computer terminals. As he stared at the numbers and information, an altogether too familiar, yet almost forgotten tickle started behind his eyes.

"Is that what attacked Shepard on the Citadel?" Nihlus asked, pushing up behind Garrus's right shoulder. The Spectre shuddered as the orb exploded. "It's not the only one. I still feel them crawling around inside my head."

Nihlus shook off the memory of the darkness and horror of the Haestrom shipyard and turned to his team. "Get what you can off these computers," he said, glancing at Sol. A steady, sonorous alarm began to blare at the base of his skull, echoing up through his skull. Sederis emptied Saren's accounts of millions of credits. Millions he'd assumed had been used to purchase weapons or lavish Illium estates and cars.

That tickle behind his eyes—the feeling of someone else slithering through his mind—that said she hadn't been gathering the money for herself at all. That tickle explained why the Eclipse had thrown themselves into death without the slightest hesitation. "Take a dose of indoctrination serum," he ordered, levelling Sol with a glare that allowed no argument.

Thane obeyed the command without hesitation, but Nihlus glanced over at Samara when he felt her stiffen, hesitating. "Do it, and go back out and give one to Elnora as well. I can feel indoctrination orbs here, and they don't play around." Tiny claws sprouted from the tickle, latching into his brain, sending his talons to his belt pouch to follow his own order.

Ice crackled through his muscles, working its way inward to his spine then climbing into his brain as he realized how much worse things could get. The last time he'd faced the orbs, he bolted. He'd taken his serum and still, he bolted. What happened if he allowed the terror to grab hold of him again?

"Nihlus?" Thane called, yanking him clear of his downward spiral. The drell stood next to a vending machine at the far end of the hallway, one hand holding an unsteady volus at a distance. "It appears one of the Eclipse's guests escaped. He's not well."

The volus gave Thane a shove, but only managed to sending himself reeling and then rolling to the floor. When Thane bent to help him back up, he didn't resist, but once on his feet, he threw off the assassin's hand. "I am a biotic god! Fear me, lesser creatures, for I am biotics made flesh!"

Nihlus shook his head as a weak biotic field wrapped around the staggering volus. "What happened to you? Did the Eclipse experiment on you?" He knew that, although rare, the volus did manifest biotics. Mostly due to a wave of turian ships that crashed on Irune a couple of decades before.

"They injected me, and yes, it was terrifying at first." The volus hesitated, his arms slumping to his sides for the space of a couple hissing breaths. "And painful. But then I began to realize my true power! I began to smell my greatness!" He gave another little blue flare, but then stumbled and fell face first on the floor.

"You need medical treatment." Nihlus nodded to Thane. "Take him out to Elnora. He can wait with her." He helped Thane lift the volus onto his feet, then watched them retreat down the hallway, the clock in his head ticking again.

"But, it's my destiny to destroy the Eclipse leader," the biotic god protested as Thane led him away. "She's waiting for me! I'm a biotic god!"

Jona Sederis was waiting for them all, Nihlus agreed. Glancing up at the cameras in the corners, he let out a long breath. They needed to get in there. The four of them had exhausted themselves, and by all his counts they still had a massive fight ahead of them. The last thing they needed to do was give her extra time to prepare.

"I've got everything off these computers," Sol said. She turned to him, her eyes narrow, her mandibles flapping, betrayed her distress. "There's data here for a dozen experiments, all strange crap, senex. Not normal, let's find a cure for a disease sort of research, but 'let's see what happens if we give the krogan and varren great big brains' or make armies of attack plants sort of research." She swallowed hard and raked her talons down her cheek. "Spirits, what in the name of buratrum is happening to the galaxy? Is everyone losing their minds?"

He strode over to grip her shoulder, not sure how to reply. Galactic insanity certainly seemed to be the most likely explanation.

Thane and Samara returned, not giving him a chance to worry over the experiments and what they meant in conjunction with the orbs. They could worry about all that when they returned to Omega. Questing fingers dove into his pack for his first stim of the day. He stared at the ampule for a half second before injecting it. Looking up, he met Sol's disapproval with a shake of his head. As much as he hated using stims—they ramped his urge to drink up to fifteen on a scale of ten—he didn't see another way to get through the coming battle. Not when someone had pulled the bones out of his limbs and replaced them with wilted villur stalks.

"Sol and I will take on the big mechs," he said, turning to his small squad. "We'll pull them around the room, try to take them out with headshots. Thane and Samara, you two try to whittle down the biotics. We're in for a hell of a fight." He looked to each of them, hating the exhaustion he saw etched in heavy lines on their faces and in the sag of their shoulders, but admiring the resolute determination that straightened their backs and gripped guns in steady hands.

"All right," he said, striding to the door control. "Let's get this done."

(A-N: Just a quick thanks for still being here. I hope it's still holding people's interest. Time to wrap up these missions and get their butts home! :D hugs for those who want them)
"Clear a path for me," she shouted back. She glanced over her shoulder, then let out a pained grunt as a husk slammed into her a moment before his rounds took it out.
"Shepard has no protection from the swarms. I've got to get to her."

It might prove a suicide run, but Miranda had the right of it.

Moruvesin - Winged insect analogues native to Palaven that grow to approximately 2 cms in length. Covered in articulated armour, they are very difficult to kill and have a sting that might not crush you, but it will make you wish it had.

Netichik: Insect analogues native to Palaven that have been exported to many colony worlds. About two centimetres long, they live in colonies burrowed into trees. Meat eaters, they drop out of trees in large masses onto the backs of animals passing beneath their nests.

Gasin (Gasinu - pl) - Prothean male the age of majority. (Dropped from 20 to 13 over the course of the war.)

46 Days ASR

The darkness outside Garrus's frigid, underground prison swelled with insectile sounds. Papery wings fluttered, chittering and clicking sounds swelled outside the door of his cell, another wave approaching. How many days had it been since the shipyard and the horrible, but very different darkness?

The voice returned. It spoke in his head, but it certainly wasn't any internal voice of his. Female, clipped, professional, cold … almost antiseptic in its lack of emotion.

"They're coming again. Get up!"

His body obeyed the voice inside his head, and he fumbled in the dark, searching for, and then scrambling up the wall. Every cell in his body screamed, netichiks eating him from the inside out while moruvesin swarmed over his hide. Leaning into the slick concrete, he dragged his feet under him and managed to claw his way to his feet.

"I can't do it," he whispered to the darkness as his legs trembled so hard his knees kept locking to keep him on his feet, and claws scraped at the door, alien fists pounding against it, trying to get in.
"No more." Sagging against the wall, Garrus began to slide back down to the floor. For a moment, everything turned into stillness and acceptance, and he understood why, in that last breath, Shepard relaxed in his arms. The inevitable cannot be fought, not in that last, airless second as one's breath leaves their lungs for the last time.

And it didn't need to be fought. There was nothing to fight against. Everything ended.

And it was okay.
"Get up. Think light, then think medigel twice, then stims, then painkillers, and then hydration. In that order. Then get to your feet and fight to stay alive."

Not that he had any choice, his mind forming the ideas as the voice spoke them inside his head. Light blossomed, a diffuse, but bright illumination that revealed the featureless walls and the door that cracked open, giving way before the horde on the other side. The familiar, cool bliss of medigel shot through him, propelled by the heart that took a last beat, and then another last beat, and then another, the foreign parts and pieces inside him obeying the voice, refusing to let him quit. Stims calmed his tremor-wrecked muscles—filaments of chemically-induced steel reinforcing them—then painkillers beat back the netichiks and moruvesin.

"General Vakarian?" Not the same voice, but definitely the same tone.

He stood and reached for Roger, his movements smooth and strong. A wall slammed up, locking down his mind, his weariness, everything that made up Garrus Vakarian. His body moved, reacting faster, hitting harder, and lasting longer than he could have imagined. Then, as the last alien fell, Roger's broken stalk fell from numb hands, a dark curtain falling even before his body hit the floor.

"General Vakarian? Have you been hit?" Miranda.

Garrus shook his head, trying to swipe Haestrom's cobwebs from his eyes.

"They're coming in on all sides!"

"Jack! Alenko! We need barriers over everyone!"

"General Vakarian?" Collector claws latched onto his shoulders, but fell away as he swung his rifle around to club his attacker. "It's Operative Lawson! General, are you all right?"

"Wrex, move your krogan to the back edge, hold our six. Jack and I can't fight if we're going to hold this barrier."

"Gun barrels outside the fucking barrier, assholes. We can't hold against fire from both sides."

"Let me know when you get tired, pyjaks. Uncle Urdnot can take over."

"Uncle … what? Seriously?"

"General!" That time something impacted Garrus's cheek hard enough to drop him to one knee.

Surging to his feet, he drew back his rifle, winding up to smash his attacker in the face. Cerberus had done this to him … and to Nihlus. The bastards tore him apart, filled him full of tech that didn't allow him any choice but to play their sick fucking game. He'd kill her! He'd tear her to pieces before she got a chance to do the same to him.

"General Vakarian! Snap out of it!" Sour veins of bile-coloured fear threaded through that voice, disrupting his rage. No, he was a lot of things, but no … not what that blow would make him.

The bitter, overripe stink of the woman's fear finally grabbed Garrus by the mandibles, yanking him into the present and halting his blow. The cold darkness of Haestrom's underground vanished, the watery light of their second day on Korlus blinding him. He stumbled, the room swirling unsteadily around him as his vision cleared, allowing him to focus on a set of black and gold "Welcome back," the operative said. With a snap of both wrists, she created a barrier around herself and pushed out of their circle.

"Oh, the princess is running away from the castle," Jack said, her tone might have been teasing but for all its sharp edges.

Garrus nodded. "Focus on the barrier," he said, then snapped his attention back to the Cerberus agent. "Lawson! What are you doing?" He aimed his assault rifle at the Collectors and husks swarming into the room through the far door. The second the enemy disentangled themselves from the portal and each other, they howled and raced toward the cerberus operative.

"Lawson!" Louder that time. "What are you doing?" Damned woman.

"Clear a path for me," she shouted back. She glanced over her shoulder, then let out a pained grunt as a husk slammed into her a moment before his rounds took it out. "Shepard has no protection from the swarms. I've got to get to her."

It might prove a suicide run, but Miranda had the right of it. A wall made of pure, frozen fury met the idea of Miranda's death, but he let the truth of the situation burn through it. They needed to bulldoze a path to Shepard and get her through to the group. He clenched his jaw, firing into the doorway, trying to bottleneck the enemy a little. Whether being willing to sacrifice Miranda made him callous and brutal or not, she amounted to an expendable wedge to hammer through the enemy ranks.

No, not just expendable ... someone they needed to lose before she could hurt Shepard more than she had already.

Setting those thoughts aside, he did as she asked, sending a nearly uninterrupted stream of rounds through the door while keeping track of the fight surging around him through their shouts to each other. They fought better as a unit than he'd feared, forming a tight circle with the unarmed in the center of the formation.

A husk charged at Miranda, the thing looking as though its inner workings had started on fire and burned through the exterior. Garrus took it out with two headshots, but then it exploded, splashing everything around it with some sort of incendiary. "Spirits!"

"What the fuck was that?" Jack hollered. "That is some messed up shit."

"Is that what hit me on Lorek in the slaver's den?"

"Concentrate on the ones that aren't dead," Kaidan replied, exhausted snark sliding beneath the words, slick and just as edged as Jack's.

Despite putting up a strong fight, Miranda began lagging long before she reached the door. Damn. Without some major intervention, she'd go down without ever reaching Shepard. They needed more biotics in Archangel. Then the light dawned: they had another biotic with them.

"Javik, get out there and support Lawson," he called, looking to the silent prothean. "You can hold a barrier, can't you?"

The gasin didn't reply, just summoned a barrier and started pushing his way out through the wall of husks, both active and dead.
The cacophony of bodies clambered and howled, their roars and the sound of hundreds of weapons firing swirled into a veritable maelstrom that neither Shepard's group nor his own could survive for long. If they faced only the husks, maybe, but the chaos provided the perfect distraction for the Collectors to disperse around the large room, using the growth pods as cover. Most of them used a sort of assault rifle, but a few wielded particle rifles. Bunched up as Garrus's people were, they didn't stand a chance once those opened fire. Luckily, the sheer number of husks beating at their line provided some cover, the monstrosities' armour blocking incoming rounds.

And everywhere, the small drones swooped and dove at the barrier like a flock of birds, moving in single-minded formations.

Garrus studiously ignored the little seekers, as if doing so could keep Shepard's safe from their sting. Instead, he kept laser-keen focus on the husks trying to take down Miranda, relaxing it only to glance over at Jack and Kaidan when he traded out heat sinks. He watched the biotics for weariness, any sign of their stamina cracking. Duty first … always duty first, even when his heart beat on the other side of that door, amidst a hundred enemies, and the rest of him screamed to join it.

"Wrex, spell Jack on the barrier!" Garrus shouted, seeing the young human lagging. "Jack, stims! And take his place on the firing line."

A deep, guttural roar rose above the scream of shredding metal and crunch of shattering bones to announce Shepard's arrival in the lower labs. Husks and Collectors exploded in through the door, flying through the air as if launched by missiles. The massive krogan from the tank plowed through everything in his path, tramping what remained with a reckless glee. Another krogan, the shaman, muscled in right behind him, the pistol in her hand shooting two or three times before smashing a husk's head into paste. Behind them, Shepard fought backwards, her back pressed to the shaman's as she kept the enemy off their six.

Garrus reached up to his radio with his one hand, the other pulling the stock of his assault rifle in close against his side to steady its fire. "Shepard, make your way toward Miranda and Javik. They're moving in to protect you from the swarms."

A sharp nod was his only answer, but it proved enough to warm him through and put the steel back in his spine he hadn't realized was missing. No fight had ever proved hopeless around Shepard. He focused on clearing her path to Miranda, letting out a faint sigh when the biotic's faltering barrier surrounded all four of them.

Shepard slipped one arm around Miranda, dragging the operative toward Javik and his oddly green, but hardy barrier. Before they reached the prothean, Miranda stumbled and went down on one knee.

"Dammit!" Shepard hollered over the noise. "Grunt, break us a path through to the alien with the green barrier." Showing strength remarkable even for her, Shepard hoisted Miranda over one shoulder and continued fire, her back never budging from the shaman's, stuck there as if someone had soldered their armour together.

Three deep chuckles rumbled from the young tank-grown's throat as he set his head down into his shoulders, dug in, and then charged. Like a wrecking ball, the youngster plowed through the crowd, tossing ruined bodies in every direction. Garrus stilled, heart stopping for the moments it took Shepard's group to cross the five or six metres of floor. The entire way, the seeker swarms swooped in on them with the speed of diving maraquil, but Wrex tossed a steady stream of warps that kept them at bay despite weakening with each volley.
"Come on," Garrus said, a low growl between clenched teeth. His muscles pushed, striving to help them along, railing against his helplessness. Sometimes bullets just didn't seem enough. "Come on." Another heat sink spent in under five seconds. "Push through."

"Hey!" Jack elbowed him, hard, and he realized he'd been creeping in Shepard's direction. "Back off, big man, you're cramping my fucking style."

Then the prothean enveloped them in his bubble of green energy, keeping it tight around them, probably to maintain the barrier's strength and his own. Javik turned, not wasting any time making his way back down the right hand side of the room to the ramp and the safety of the larger bubble.

"EDI," Shepard called, "ETA?" Despite not hearing the response, Garrus read by the grimace on Shepard's face that it was going to be a good deal longer than Shepard wanted. His muscles turned to water for a half-second. Exhaustion weighed everyone down; he didn't know how long they could hold: a tiny island in a sea of enemies, and they were running low on heat sinks.

The small group made it back to their bubble, Javik taking over to give Kaidan a break as soon as he returned. Not two breaths later, Shepard slid into position next to him.

"The Ypres is still ten minutes out," she reported, leaning in a little to keep it between them. She launched her drone out into the clusterfuck of enemies outside their perimeter. "They had to play hide and seek with the cruiser to get into orbit." Peeling off her utility belt, she tossed it behind her. "There are a dozen or so heat sinks there." She took out a husk with a couple of quick headshots. "They're sneaking up on us from the other side of the planet."

"Not sure how long our biotics are going to hold up." he replied, keeping his voice low. "We need something major to turn our way." A clutch of husks raced at him, all loose limbs and animal howls. He waited until they were just about on him before blowing them back with a heavy concussive shot. "Wouldn't happen to have a miracle on you?"

He saw Shepard stiffen in his peripherals, and spun, expecting to see blood, not a wide grin. She nodded. "Glory be to the great glowing asses of the Enkindlers, Brother General! I do indeed appear to have a miracle handy. Praise be the Father of Light's slimy tentacles!" She hung up her Mattock. "Cover me for few seconds, and I'll get us some relief."

Garrus saw her omnitool flare to life, but needed to pay attention to keeping the seemingly unending horde held back. Where in the name of buratrum were they all coming from? That number couldn't be Suns stuck on dragon's teeth. The Collectors brought husks with them: colonists turned into husks. Dear spirits, the well just kept going down and down, no bottom in sight.

"Jack! You okay?"

Garrus glanced toward Kaidan's call, but the shaman already knelt at the young biotic's side, administering medigel. Two of the krogan lie in the center of the circle along with Miranda, who was just starting to look aware of her surroundings.

The sound of a large mech core spinning up set his heart racing, and he knew what Shepard had done. Love washed over him like a hot summer rain, and he allowed himself a second of indulgence to stand in it. He'd fight through a thousand battles, endure any amount of torture—even at the hands of Cerberus—if he had even the smallest hope of getting back to her.

Because she's a miracle, the kind that only ever comes along once.
"Sweet baby Jesus, I'm good. One miracle as requested, General," Shepard said, her shout bordering on slipping into a self-congratulatory crow. "Thank you, thank you, really. I'll be here all week. Don't forget to tip your engineer!"

He bit down on a laugh and focused, slipping the lover back into the crate so the soldier could get back to work.

Yes, only once, and thank the spirits for that. Who could survive two of her?

The YMIR's guns whirled to life, targeting the Collectors with their twin mass accelerator cannons and rockets. Garrus could make out the Collectors' particle rifles firing at it, but Shepard kept boosting its shields and concentrated on taking out those Collectors first.

"When this thing is about to die," Shepard called, "finish it off with a headshot. That'll vaporize everything around it."

Garrus grunted his acknowledgement, seeing a slight thinning in the enemy ranks. "Everyone, start moving toward the open side of the room," he said into his radio, the mech making too much noise without. "We need to keep them from getting a foothold on that side." The krogan on the back side of the circle began to push toward the edge, Shepard's YMIR taking off enough pressure to free up a couple guns … enough to help get them moving.

Jack appeared back on the line at his side. "Ready to spell whoever's been holding the barrier the longest."

"Okay, General," Shepard said, cutting across Kaidan's reply, "it's on its last legs."

In a quick, smooth movement, Garrus traded guns, lifting his sniper rifle to his shoulder to sight the mech's head. He adjusted the sight, a thin thread of longing for Ingrid drifting out with his breath, then fired. As the mech went into meltdown, he realized they were all far too exposed for an explosion of that magnitude. Luckily, the rest of them had seen it before him and leaped for cover, dragging others along with them.

Shepard grabbed the cowl of his armour and hauled him down next to her behind a trashed grow-tank. She tucked her face into his neck, covering both of their heads with an arm as the mech blew. Taking shelter in her embrace, he hid his face from the brilliant flash and searing heat that blasted over them. When it passed, an absolute hush fell over the lab for two breathless heartbeats before chaos poured back in, the tidal wave racing into shore. He listened for gunfire, pleased to hear only intermittent bursts, and no droning from the swarms.

Shepard pressed a hurried kiss against his mandible. "No hot dogging, General," she whispered, her face pressed to his aural canal. "You've got a family to look after." Then she leaped up and held out a hand to help him up. "Everyone okay?" she called even as she tugged him to his feet.

"Wrex is down," Kaidan called. "We need to get him to medbay and soon." The smell of charred shell and flesh told Garrus all he wanted to know about the krogan's injuries.

"EDI," Shepard called, even as she couched her Mattock in the crook of her elbow and strode out to finish off any stragglers. "ETA." She stopped and spun toward the open side of the room, eyes intent, but free of fear. Instead, she showed the face that meant the tumblers inside that keen mind spun faster than light, searching for a solution for whatever new hell awaited them. "If you give me any more bad news, I swear … ." Nodding to the voice in her ear, she hung up her rifle. "Roger that, see you in five. Shepard out."
Shepard pointed to Grunt, Jack, and those among the Marines and krogan who hadn't been wounded. "We have a couple hundred Collectors and husks coming up that side of the ship at an unreasonable speed, and I am all out of mechs. Those I've pointed out, we're running up the stairs and through the labs. Grab all the grenades you can carry." She looked to Garrus, her expression sending his heart plunging into his gut. It told him he was taking the safer, slow road. "General, get the wounded up and moving. We'll clear your path, and when you get through the door, make sure it doesn't open."

He nodded and, shoving a rod of tempered steel down his spine, turned to his people. "You heard the captain, let's get the wounded ready to move." He glanced back at Shepard, her tiny form looking even more fragile as she strode amidst the krogan. A grin tweaked his mandibles. Anyone who thought his Kahri fragile or weak were in for the last surprise of their lives. He chuckled and headed over to help Miranda up off the floor.

"Come on, Operative," he said, grunting a little as he saw the jagged wound in her shoulder. He checked it briefly, but someone had already administered medigel, and the bleeding had slowed to a slow seep. "Let's go get that shoulder into medbay."

"Amp … fried," she said, her voice soft and dreamy.

When she mentioned it, he could smell the scent of burned hair around her. An almost cruel satisfaction sparked—not so perfect after all—and then smothered under a cold splash of shame.

A primal challenge that could come from only one set of lungs screamed on the other side of the door to the upper labs, and then buratrum unleashed its denizens. Gunfire, biotic detonations, bones cracked so hard that he winced, hearing it over the rest of the cacophony. Over it all, his Kahri, bellowing like a krogan, and he knew in a sudden rush of certainty that she'd get them out.

"Move out. Shepard's breaking through." He could see her squad in the picture windows above, bursting through the door. "We can't let the Collectors cut us off from one another." He glanced over to make sure Wrex was covered to find the krogan hanging almost limp between the shaman and one of the less wounded krogan. "All right. Move quickly. Stay in the bubble. Kaidan? Javik?"

A swirling dome of blue and green appeared around them, and he started to the door, keeping an eye and an ear on the fight above.

"Stop that," Miranda said, her voice slurring a little. When he arched a brow plate at her, she let out a gravelly coughing sound. "Grinning like an idiot. It's not general-ly."

Through his worry, through the days of exhaustion, through the stink, and the sweat, and the uncertainty of battle, Garrus laughed. "General-ly." He cocked a brow plate at her and shook his head, then tugged a little, urging her to move faster.

The Ypres flashed past the open end of the room, pivoting around in the tight space between ship pieces to pick them up on the other side. Garrus's heart jumped into his throat, strangling him as it pounded there. How the hell did the pilot think he could maneuver a frigate that size in that space? It remained their one chance to get off that damned mudball.

"Don't worry," Miranda said, patting the hand holding her waist, "Lt. Cortez was chosen for this because he's the best fighter pilot out there."

"That's not a fighter." Garrus looked past her to check on the others, pleased at their speed, only a few more strides to the door, then the stairs. Dear spirits, he hoped the stairs remained clear.
The door slid open, but before he could put a bullet into their attacker, Shepard ran in. "What's taking you guys so long? There's a giant, metal husk head beetle thing attacking the Ypres." She glanced over her shoulder. "Kaidan, Grunt, Barl, hold the door, make sure we have a clear exit. The rest of you down here and help."

She jumped in to help one of the Marines who'd taken rounds to his leg and shoulder. "We've got to move fast, so this won't be big on dignity," she said as she heaved him over her shoulders in a fireman's carry. A quick, bracing smile and wink, and she took off at a light jog, holding Peterson's weight with an ease that tied a knot in Garrus gut, that unbelievable strength reinforcing everything Cerberus had done to her.

A heavy, low droning sound rose over the sound of running feet on metal deck plating, one that he'd heard before. "Run!" he shouted. "As fast as you can. Shepard have the Ypres use its GARDIANs! They're the only thing that'll take that thing out fast."

"Sweet Jesus." Shepard lifted one hand to her radio, stumbling a little as Peterson's weight shifted. Garrus didn't hear what she said, he was too busy trying to locate the massive Reaper-beetle's location through all the echoes, failing completely until the twin lasers exploded through the wall of the lab. The force picked Garrus up, flicking him into the air. As he hit the ground face down, his breath hammered from his lungs, he caught a glimpse of at least one Blue Sun vanishing in a brilliant blue flash.

They needed to get out. He needed to get up. Damn it!

"General! Get up!" That voice … Miranda? The one from Haestrom?

Without air, he tried to claw his way up off the floor but just floundered, the room spinning, his muscles as weak as a newborn drellak.

"Come on, General." Miranda crouched next to him, ducking under one of his arms to haul him up with a strength he wouldn't have believed possible.

He sucked in a shuddering, stringent-acid breath, able to do little but stumble along next to her as he recovered from the impact. The razor-edged buzz of the lasers roared through the derelict ship again, metal shrieking and crashing as the wreck began to disintegrate under the onslaught. Above the rest, a deep, hoarse scream punched him in the gut, telling him that the monstrosity had claimed at least one of the krogan.

And then Korlus's sky opened above him, the Ypres hanging, huge and beautiful at the edge of the deck, maybe twenty metres distant. Its GARDIANs fired almost constantly, losing focus as they heated.

"Cruiser incoming!"

Shepard's bellow over the radio steadied Garrus's limbs, his muscles rallying enough that he simply scooped up Miranda in one arm and sprinted for the ramp … so close, beckoning with promises of safety and rest. The Reaper-beetle thing exploded behind him, the blast hot on the back of his neck, but he didn't even flinch. If that Collector cruiser got within weapon range, they were still all very, very dead.

Then hands grabbed him, heaving him up onto the steep grade, dragging him into the cargo bay even as the ramp began to close, the Ypres fleeing for the relay.

He reached the shuttle bay floor, his trembling legs stumbling, failing to adjust to flat deck plating, and went down. Twisting, he managed to land on his side rather than on Miranda. Dizzy and gasping, the air burning in his chest, he closed his eyes, waiting to feel the slight, internal torque as the inertial dampeners lagged behind evasive maneuvers. It never came. Instead, the brief tug of the relay grabbed them, and he relaxed down into the floor. They'd escaped. Mission success. Too bad it felt like a question mark followed those two words.

"Hey." Gentle, calloused hands caressed his face, their warmth pulling him all the way back from the edge. Instead of trying to get him up, Shepard sat on the deck next to him and pulled him into her arms. She pressed her brow against his cheek. "Holy crap, Garrus." Despite inhaling as if she intended to continue, she simply held his head close, her arms wrapped around his neck as if her life depended on it.

He cleared his throat, a soft chuff of strangled air. "Kahri? I can't breathe."

Her arms loosened a little but didn't release him. "I nearly lost you there," she whispered. "Don't ever scare me like that again."

Garrus frowned at the thick, phlegmy undercurrent in her voice, surprised by her reaction. She didn't usually over-dramatise. "It didn't come very close to me and Miranda." He nuzzled her cheek. "The laser must have hit something that blew up and gave us a good shove."

Shepard pulled away and smacked his shoulder hard enough to rock him before scrambling free and up onto her feet. He stared at the hand she shoved in his face, his confusion deepening when she shook it at him. "Get up!" she ordered. "Come on, up."

Indulging the tangle of fear, love, and anger twisting her features, he took her hand and allowed her to help pull him to his feet. He wobbled a little, then looked around, surprised when he didn't see Miranda, even more surprised at himself for caring enough to wonder. She was the enemy … the cold, clinical voice of Cerberus. Not the one who had ordered him while they cut him apart and tortured him, but still culpable for so very much, Shepard's control chip paramount on that list. He sighed. Still, she'd stayed and gotten him to his feet. "Is Miranda in medbay?"

"Yeah, all our biotics are, well, except Javik. Apparently in his cycle …" She stiffened and arched her neck a little, imitating the prothean's arrogance. "... a well-grown child could hold a barrier longer than that without suffering ill effects." She shrugged. "The rest of them fried their amps and will be out of commission for a week or so."

She swallowed hard and cracked her neck, her eyes glassy with emotion held in a tight grip. "We lost five. Two suns, two krogan, and Nyguen. Wrex is critical, but the docs say he'll pull through.
Handful of others have a few more holes than they started with." Shaking herself and cracking her neck again, she held out her hand. "Take off the armour." When he hesitated, she gave him her 'don't test me' glare and slammed her arms down over her chest, walling herself off.

Confused irritation simmering behind his eyes, he obeyed, popping the seals on his gauntlets. As he removed each piece, she snatched it from his hand. He unclasped the two halves of his torso armour and lifted it off, his breath rushing from his lungs in a short, heavy sigh when he saw the reason she was upset. The ceramic had been burned away, the metal melted to slag that looked like dripping wax.

He set it down and held out his arms, pulling her into a hug, armour and all. "I didn't realize it got that close." He nuzzled the top of her head. "But I'm okay. All parts and pieces intact."
them all.

He smiled, weary, sore, and a little heart-sick, but like so many times before, his ornery little miracle had brought them through. As he'd thought when she burst into the room and commandeered the mech, in the end, he'd fight through a thousand battles, endure any amount of torture if he had even the smallest hope of ending the day in her arms.

Even if it means playing nice with Cerberus.

He tightened his grip. "Let's go up to your cabin, shower, and then get some sleep?" Pulling away, he pressed a knuckle under her chin, lifting her gaze to meet his. "Then we'll head back to Omega, grab Nihlus and your family, and take off to Palaven to get married." He grinned wide at the surprise that wiped away the leftovers of anger and terror. "Sound good?"

Shepard pulled in a deep breath, and returned his smile, some of the spark returning to the brilliant green. "Yeah, that sounds like a really great plan. You'll make me an excellent wife."

Heart settling back into place, blood warming, he chuckled and caressed her cheek. "You're such a giant pain in my assless." But damn it, if she wasn't the good, clean air in his lungs.

Because she's not just a miracle, she's my miracle, the kind that only ever comes along once.

(A-N: So, as always, thanks so much for reading! I have all the love for you and your support! Passes out baskets of hugs and cookies

I appear to have made a big boo boo when I split this story into two pieces, I lost a lot of people. So, this was the last chapter I posted under Future Continuous. That way, it will all be in one, easy place. :D And if people go … holy crap, that story is way too long to even think about reading, when it gets to 250 chapters, well … their loss. ) And their lack of screen eyes and migraines! :D So yeah, Chapter 14 will be posted here in the original story.

Thanks again, and moar hugs!)
Future Continuous Chapter 14

Chapter Summary

Darkness fell, a guillotine of tar-coated ice. His gun fell from numb talons as he reached up, groping at blind eyes and deafened aural canals. Terror, colder than a midwinter night on Noveria, stabbed shards of that impossible black through his heart and lungs, driving them in deep. Unable to breathe, he collapsed into a pile of armour and limp, frozen flesh.

NEW CHAPTER!

47 Days ASR (insanely early in the AM Omega time)

The YMIR's alarm built from intermittent beeps to a solid wail as the mech careened toward detonation. Crap, he'd taken it down too quickly. Nihlus grabbed hold of Sol's wrist and ran, dragging her behind him. "Thane! Samara!" He hollered into his radio. "Heavy cover and breather helmets! Now!" Nihlus tossed Sol behind a dividing wall and over a stack of crates, then leaped after her, landing a hand's width from her head. She yelped, but he merely threw himself over her as the beeping alarm sped to a steady tone. Then a half heartbeat of silence. Then ...

... the last four YMIR mechs exploded in a blast that rocked the building and, judging by the sheer cacophony, launched the contents and occupants of the warehouse, missiles fired in every direction. When the din of falling debris ended, Nihlus glanced out from under his arm. Despite a few crates lying over his legs, their shelter held. The breath that he'd been holding escaped, replaced with a lungful of dust and smoke that set him choking. Despite warning the others to put on their breathers, he hadn't had time.

A pointy elbow jabbed him in the gut. "Get off my head!" Sol jabbed him another half dozen times and landed a few decent kicks before he managed to push the crates off and roll to one side. Gasping and flailing, she clambered out from under him. "What part of making me the bottom portion of that pile seemed like a good idea?" she muttered, flopping onto her side, lungs heaving.

"Put your helmet on," he said, ignoring her protest. "The place is filled with smoke." He stood, and reached down, pulling her to her feet when she grabbed it.

"Thane? Samara? You two come through okay?" he asked, shouting over the roar of fires and the answering suppression systems. He clambered over the crates with far less grace than he'd shown going the other way, then stepped around the wall to utter destruction. At least the ventilation system was making quick work of the smoke, sucking it away as dry foam smothered the flames.

The mechs had blown a massive hole through the floor and ceiling. Very little of them remained, chunks of arms and other parts had torn holes through everything and embedded themselves in the walls.

"We're alive," Thane responded. "Samara just charged off with murderous intent."

"Yeah, I see her," Nihlus answered as the asari justicar pulled a biotic hurdle over a pile of jumbled up crates and machinery. She moved with murderous intent indeed, storming over to where Jona Sederis had taken refuge behind a large, metal desk. Glancing at Sol, he nodded toward the asari. "If we want to find out what Sederis was doing with Saren's money, we'd better get in there."

Sol chuckled, the sound hollow through her helmet speakers. "I want to be an asari when I grow up." She took a couple of steps, then turned back. "You going to put your helmet on, senux?"

Nihlus shook his head despite coughing into his forearm. "No, the fire suppression system has it handled." He pressed a hand to his temple, pushing in against a dull but insistent pressure. The thought of looking out through that black faceplate, having the HUD flashing so close to his face sent shivers down his spine.

"Note to self," he muttered under his breath, "don't blow up four YMIR's using headshots on two."

"Yeah, remember that one," Sol muttered. "I think you broke my lungs and the left side of my right kidney." She stretched, cracking her back a little as she limped past. "Also, next time we take a quick trip to pick up a few of your belongings, let's bring a platoon of Martin's frame armour infantry and at least a half dozen tanks." She pulled her right arm across her chest, sighing as it cracked and settled back into place. "And maybe a gunship."

Thane appeared in the doorway at the far end of the warehouse. "I could use a hand getting the test subjects and prisoners free from their cells."

"Sol?" Nihlus nodded toward the ruins of twisted metal and crumbling concrete. "Help Thane check for survivors." When she acknowledged his order, he began to pick his way across the weakened floor toward the figure writhing in Samara's grip.

"Samara?" Nihlus could see the justicar's mouth moving, but couldn't hear anything she said. "Don't kill her. I need to question her." He stopped to check the pulse on a young female turian, but found nothing. The moment his team breached the doorway, a wave of unarmed, psychotic civilians had charged at them. Choking back his rage, Nihlus straightened and looked toward the lunatic responsible for all it. He and the others had no choice but to cut down all those innocents, something he felt certain Samara was discussing with Sederis.

Sederis dropped, hitting the floor in a heap as Samara stepped away to search the desk. "She is yours to interrogate," the justicar said, her voice colder than Nihlus had heard it. "Unless, I don't find the information I require."

Sederis let out a short, but horrific string of curses. "Top drawer, just like I told you, bitch." She laughed, the sound high and shrill with madness. "Do you really think that you'll catch her? You've been chasing her four centuries, and she slips from your grip every time because your code doesn't allow you to harm innocents."

Nihlus bent over Sederis, hooked a hand under the asari merc's arm, and pulled her to her feet. For her part, she just ignored Nihlus completely, lunging at the justicar and spitting a gob of violet in Samara's face. "You're pathetic and weak. She's a monster, one whose power is beyond your ability to fathom."

Nihlus shook Sederis hard enough to break through her diatribe. "Shut up. You're under arrest; Spectre authority. Who are you? And what happened to all these people?" he demanded. She lunged at him, teeth gnashing. "Sweet spirits, what's wrong with you?" He held her at arm's length, leaning back to keep his face out of biting range.

Sederis laughed. "You know who I am. Don't be obtuse." She flared her biotics, breaking free of his grip as she threw him back. Keeping her eyes on him despite averting her face, she circled the desk. The crazy behind that sideways stare burrowed beneath his plates, virulent and vicious like a nest of netichiks. She laughed, high and shrill. "Do you honestly believe that I didn't realize that the transmission was a trap, laden as it was with oh-so-tempting banking information for one of the richest Spectres to ever take a bribe?" Glancing back, she shrugged and rolled her eyes. "Give me a little credit. Please."

The casual nature of that shrug forced Nihlus's last two meal bars up into the back of his throat. Sharp, jagged claws dragged up his spine to bury themselves in the base of his skull. Damn. The heel of his hand migrated back to his temple as the pain ramped up from a seven to a ten on the Shepard scale.

Sederis reversed direction before she got too close to Samara, still keeping part of the desk between herself and Nihlus. "Although, I admit I didn't expect you to team up with the justicar bitch. Losing an entire base full of people is inconvenient." She let out a low, feral growl as her fingers trailed through the dust along the edge of the desktop. "We were just starting to get some decent data from this batch."

A dramatic sigh heaved through her nostrils and she shrugged again, lifting her fingers to rub them together. "Oh well, they will start again somewhere else, and you're fooling yourself if you believe we were the only ones carrying on their good and necessary work." She turned her back to him and wandered toward a wall of crates that had managed to withstand the explosion.

Nihlus's teeth ground together as he forced his hand back to his rifle. Why did the crazy ones always have to monologue? "Inconvenient?" He stalked after her, keeping his rifle aimed at her back. "Losing two hundred and fifty people under your command is inconvenient?" Actually, that wasn't even the question. The real question was: why was he surprised? She was a madwoman in command of a band of mercenaries, with all the apparent and implied consequences.

"Under my command?" She looked over her shoulder, her brow knitted tight above her eyes, as if his statement truly perplexed her. "Oh, you mean the sisters and initiates?" She shrugged and resumed her course. "Easily replaced. No, the true loss is the subjects. It's taken us a great deal of time to get any real results from the experiments." Sederis pushed the single crate at the end of the wall aside, and stepped out of sight. Nihlus leaped after her. He'd be damned if he'd fought through hundreds of her people and mechs ... getting electrocuted by a pack of fake fucking dogs ... just for her to disappear.

"Senux!" Sol called from the other side of the space. He heard her shoving her way between crates and rubble. "Where ...? Wait up, dammit." Her boots rang on the tile as she ran after him.

Stepping around the crate, Nihlus saw Sederis standing in the center of a half circle of black orbs. Her head lolled back, her eyes closed, arms held out as she swayed. A smile of pure bliss beamed across her face, upping the creepy factor to a factor of infinity. His boots sliding on the floor, Nihlus struggled to stop, backpedaling as his eyes followed the line, his brain counting them as if it mattered. Eight. Eight of the orbs. No wonder his head had been aching, the restless talons scraping along his spine and digging into the base of his skull.

"Spirits ... no wonder Sederis was—"

 Darkness fell, a guillotine of tar-coated ice. His gun fell from numb talons as he reached up, groping at blind eyes and deafened aural canals. Terror, colder than a midwinter night on Noveria, stabbed shards of that impossible black through his heart and lungs, driving them in deep. Unable to breathe, he collapsed into a pile of armour and limp, frozen flesh.

A strangled mewl of pain rattled out between clenched teeth as one hand cracked against the floor, his wrist letting out a snap he felt rather than heard. The floor ... . Blinking against the pale, watery darkness, he realized that he could see again. He tipped forward onto all fours, lungs straining against a vacuum, his vision darkening around the edges once more.

"Your mind belongs to us," a deep voice said, the sound reminiscent of boulders rolling around inside a cloth sack filled with pudding. "Breathe."

Nihlus sucked in a long, gasping breath, collapsing onto his hip as chill, damp air burned its way into his aching lungs. His vision began to clear, sending his survival instinct into overdrive as he scrambled up out of the ... . It looked like water. He'd thought himself about to drown. He slapped a hand against the surface: it looked as though he knelt on water ... but that was impossible.

Anyway ... . He shook his head. It didn't matter. Where was he? That mattered. Along with how he'd gotten there. Pressing both palms into the floor, he dragged his knees back under him, every cell in his body keening a mallupean in high, shrill voices.

Spirits, he hurt ... his entire body screamed in pain.

Shoving himself up, he made it onto all fours, feet under him, palms still pressed to the floor. He took another deep breath and straightened. Arms held out, stiff and awkward, he managed to stand despite feeling as though he stood on the deck of a rolling ship. Stumbling in the near dark, he struggled to find and keep his balance, ending up splay-legged, but still upright. Where in the name of the good spirits was he?

The foggy veil surrounding him parted, a figure stepping through it to walk toward him, its identity betrayed by the short, red hair—vivid even in the dark—and the cocky swing to its gait.

"Shepard?" He looked around, nothing but shifting caustics and dim, watery grey visible in every direction. "What's happening? How did you get here? How did I get here?" He took a step toward her, his booted talons scraping to a halt when he looked into Shepard's eyes, his gut freezing solid. It wasn't Jane, but the tar-slick darkness wearing her face, just as it had worn the faces of his mari and pari above Haestrom.

"What are you?" he asked, backing away a couple of steps, feet dragging. Oily, the gloom flowed from those blank eyes, long tentacles of malevolent nothingness writhing across the soupy grey to wrap around his head, blinding him.

Stop, dear spirits, just stop! Just tell me what you want.

Sharp knives stabbed into both eyes, the force behind them twisting, driving the blades in deeper and deeper. He clapped one hand over his eye, knees buckling as his stomach heaved. Rusted iron filled his sinuses, dripping from his nostrils.

He fell forward, landing on his hands and knees, his vision returning as the dry heaves tried to turn him inside out. He pressed down into that impossibly solid water, talons splayed and focused on breathing through the agony. Drips of bright cobalt splashed, breaking through the surface to twine with the water in lazy swirls. He let it drip. Why not? Let the blood flow ... let them see the evidence of their indoctrination turning his brain to pudding. What good would he be to them then?

The pain eased up enough that he could pull his talons from where he'd embedded them in the floor. They'd punched holes through the tips of his gloves. "What are you?" he repeated. "Or who?" He pushed himself up until he was sitting on his lower legs, the heels of his hands braced against his thighs.
"You were never meant to breach the darkness," the monster said, the sound of that voice coming from those lips painting a stark, ugly face on whatever possessed Shepard. "It is not yet our time."

"What is that supposed to mean?" He shimmied back a metre, trying to keep some distance between them. His heart hammered between his lungs, all three organs straining as if he'd run ten klicks. The dizziness still churning inside his skull and nausea sucker-punching him in the guts drove home the alien nature of wherever the hell he was. "For fuck's sake, stop torturing me and just talk to me. What are you?"

Shepard crouched just out of his reach. "The echoes have discovered what they need," that horrible grinding boulder voice said through her mouth. "They cannot be allowed to complete the Catalyst." She shuffled toward him … or it shuffled toward him, still crouched. "They build it! Millions dying. Screaming as their bodies are reduced then reformed, still screaming."

"What catalyst?" The daggers piercing Nihlus's brain exploded into a cloud of sticky-tar spiders, their writhing bodies and tiny, scratching legs scraping along the inside of his skull. The drip from his nose sped up as he fought to understand … but more, to break free. Shepard had been able to break free, but—

Something stabbed him in the neck twice … then a third time. The spiders began to evaporate into black smoke and drift away. Indoctrination serum. Sol had injected him with a half litre of the stuff judging by the throbbing in his neck.

An explosion went off next to his head. Damn, excellent timing: getting his hearing back just to have it reduced to shrill ringing. Another explosion … no, not an explosion, a hand cannon firing. He sagged a little, relaxing as the noise echoed in his skull, each one another orb blown to bits. Six more times the gun pounded at his brain. He sagged onto the floor as his dim, watery surroundings vanished.

Another shot let him know that Sederis wouldn't escape to cause any more pain and suffering. Thank the spirits. He slid down onto his side, hiding his face beneath his arm as the bright lights of the warehouse burned like brands inside his head. Drawing in a long breath, he gagged: the air stunk of crap and urine, burned plastic, and spent heatsinks.

"Senux?" Strong talons gripped the back of his neck. "Are you with me?"

Dear spirits, so loud! Did she have to yell right in his face?

Nihlus took a deep breath, clenched his teeth against the ebbing agony in his skull, and nodded. "Yeah, I'm here," he said, forcing the words out through a clenched jaw. "Just give me a second." After what felt like a half hour, but probably amounted to five minutes, he pushed himself up off the floor. When he made it to one knee, he paused to look up at the shattered orbs. Sederis sprawled at their center, her blank eyes staring straight at him.

Lifting a hand to press over one, ringing aural canal, he glared at the torin crouched in front of him. "Good work," he said, his voice slurred. "Next time, don't shoot them all right next to my head."

She shrugged, a quick dip of her head toward one shoulder. "Yeah, sorry about all the bells ringing inside your skull." She grinned, her mandibles fluttering far too gleefully to be decent. "Well, maybe not all that sorry. I was saving your feeble backside, after all, and your cowl made an excellent support." She hung her pistol from her hip, then dug into her belt pouch. "Now, hold still," she said, lifting a cloth to wipe the blood from his face. "There's a good little torin."

She cackled, but then looked past him toward the sound of boots on tile. "Did you find what you were looking for, Samara?"

"I did," the justicar replied. "The Eclipse smuggled Morinth out on the HML Demeter. It is bound for Omega." Despite the dark circles under her eyes that betrayed her exhaustion, she held herself proudly, strong and determined. Again, Nihlus didn't know whether to admire Samara's focus or fear her single-mindedness.

Nihlus plucked the cloth from Sol and turned to face the justicar. "I guess we're headed home, then." He wiped his face, then tucked the rag into his belt. He held a hand out to Sol, who helped haul him up. Once he stood firmly on two feet, he wrapped an arm around her, and pulled her in to touch brows. "Thank you, inluvis."

"Back off, senux. You can just get me something really expensive and fancy for dinner." She shoved him, but not hard enough to break free. "Now, stop drooling on me, and let's get the cops here to clean up. I need to eat something."

An hour and a half later, they returned to the apartment, but instead of showering and then crashing into the glorious depth of his mattress like Nihlus's body insisted, the four of them ended up rushing through packing everything he wanted to take to Omega. The next ship to Omega left in three hours, and Samara had booked them cabins, insisting that they could eat and sleep once on board.

"I think I'm actually too tired to eat," Sol groaned as they stood at the threshold of the ship's galley. She craned her head to look at the tray of a turian business torin as he passed by. Her stomach roared with all the fury of an enraged ungentira. "Spirits, is that seared panflel?" Without waiting for anyone to answer, she bolted across to the serving line, and began filling a tray.

Thane's low, kind laughter rumbled from Nihlus's right side. "Apparently, she discovered a second wind." He followed at a much slower pace, limping a little. A blood stain on his leather jacket betrayed where a piece of shrapnel had embedded itself in his lower back. Sol said it was just a flesh wound and would heal just fine in a couple of days.

Nihlus glanced around the galley, but didn't see Samara. She'd probably taken something back to her cabin. She'd expressed a desire to spend the time in transit meditating, and told them that she would meet up with them on Omega. The Spectre let out a long, weary breath and followed the other two. He needed food, he just hoped he didn't fall asleep face down in the seared panflel.

An hour later, after nearly falling asleep in the panflel:

"Well, look who it is." Shepard's smile betrayed her weariness, even as it warmed him through. He recognized the room behind her as the conference room aboard the Ypres, so she'd made it off Korlus intact. "Are you all right?" She leaned into the imager. "You look like you've been dragged halfway to hell and back."

Nihlus returned her smile. "I'm fine, just tired. We faced a few complications on Illium, but we're aboard a passenger liner on our way home." His fingers lifted to the image as if somehow, they could find a way to touch her. "I just wanted to check in before I hit the rack." A sweet ache spread through his chest when she lifted her fingers to meet his. "Are you two all right? Didn't take any damage?"

Shepard shook her head, then covered a yawn with her hand. "We're both going to sleep all the rest of the way back to Omega, but we only took a few nicks and cuts." Her fingers raked through her short, still-damp hair. "We lost a few people, and Wrex was badly burned, so we're racing him back to a proper hospital. Miranda, Jack, Woo, and a few others came out with more holes than they went in with, but we got out."

Nihlus just stared, watching her lips as she spoke, then meeting her eyes as she fell into silence. Spirits, she looked good, and he wished that instead of trying to cram himself into the narrow, too short bunk in his cabin, he was climbing into bed next to her. Ah well, in under a day, he’d be back on Omega, and maybe they’d catch a night or two before the galaxy threw them back into hell.

"Hey, cikabeknai, you there?" She cocked her head, a slight knot between her brows.

Heat flushed beneath Nihlus's plates as he realized that he'd just been staring at her like an obluvis. He smiled and nodded. "Just admiring the view."

Pink blossomed across her nose and touched her cheeks. Spirits, sometimes her beauty just blindsided him. "When do you get in?" she asked. "We'll be home in eleven hours."

"Eighteen hours … well, more like seventeen and a half now," he replied. "You'll pick me up at the dock?" He flicked his mandibles at the mask of teasing denial that painted over her face.

"No, sorry, couldn't possibly do that." She shook her head and dropped her arms across her chest. "Sweet baby Jesus, you've just gone too far, now. I've got to hang up." She grinned and blew him a kiss. "See you in seventeen and a half hours."

Nihlus nodded, and grinned, mostly at himself for the ridiculous prickling in the corners of his eyes. He must be tired. "Until then, haksaya kubenar." He touched the backs of his talons to his brow. "I love you."

Her grin widened, her eyes growing glassy. "And I love you, Nihlus. I've missed you. Well, we've both missed you something crazy. See you in a few hours." She stared into his eyes for a few more seconds before finally closing the channel.

After staring at the bunk for a few minutes, Nihlus sat on the side. He was never going to fit. Pulling his knees up to his chest, he managed to get his feet past the supports. The mattress definitely wasn't made for turians, so if he tried to lay on his back, he'd end up rocking back and forth on his cowl. He piled pillows under his head and neck, deciding to give it a shot, but he no sooner laid back and he began to roll.

"Tarc!" He rolled three quarters of the way onto his side and stretched out, groaning when the end of the bunk frame dug in just below his knee. Damned human transports! Resorting his pillows, he rolled over onto his side and tucked his knees into his stomach. His body parts immediately began lining up at the complaints department to file paperwork.

He swung his legs off the side of the bunk and stood. "I've got to sleep," he muttered, groaning a little at the thought of trying to sleep sitting up all the way back to Omega. His neck twinged, as if warning him the sort of pain he'd have to endure if he tried it. Sighing, he bent down and grabbed the mattress. Ships usually secured them to the bunks to prevent them flying around if the ship lost gravity.

A soft cry of victory greeted the thing lifting out of the frame. Sleeping with his feet hanging over onto the floor, he could handle. He threw it down, pulled back the blankets and flopped.

"Oh yes … so much better." Wriggling under the covers, he pulled them up around his mandibles and closed his eyes. His muscles all tightened as his body adjusted to the position, burning with a most wonderful pain as they relaxed, everything going heavy and soft. Blessed sleep. "Glory hallelujah and praise the blessed Enkindlers' light."
His door opened. "So, I've been thinking … " Sol's voice said. He heard her step over the threshold but didn't open his eyes. Maybe if he ignored her, she'd go back to her cabin and sleep.

The tarin flopped down on the mattress next to him and pushed in until she took up nearly half the width. She waited, not speaking for well over a minute, but he could feel her breath on his face. "I know you're not asleep, senux. You came in here fifteen minutes ago." She pressed in tighter, her nose butting against his. "You're not asleep. Stop pretending." Sighing, she pulled back a little and began to bounce around, sorting blankets by the feel of it.

When she stilled, Sol let out a long, soft breath, a gentle keen threading through her subvocals. "Look, senux, I'm really sorry that I didn't have your back the way I should have today." She sniffed and then a warm hand pressed against his mandible. "You're a good fratrin, and you deserved better than I gave."

Nihlus sighed, but didn't open his eyes, merely tilting his head to rest his brow against hers.

"Anyway, I wanted you to know, I won't let you down like that again." Her talons entwined with his, and she stilled, her breathing evening out even before he drifted off.

(A-N: Sorry for any confusion caused by my mistake of splitting this story up. I hope you enjoyed the end of the mission to Illium. It's high time to get these crazy kids back together.

Thanks so much for your support … as always. Always. hugs and baskets of kittens)
The shadow moved, the asari keeping outside the bright spotlights illuminating the bar and dance floor. Despite the light blue of her skin, and how much skin she showed, she blended very well with the inky pools along the walls, appearing to materialize next to Shepard's booth.

"Do you mind if I sit?" the asari asked.

Shepard shook her head and held a hand out toward the seat opposite, breathing a sigh when it remained rock steady. Thank the sweet baby Jesus for Anderson and all his warrior training. "Not at all. It's a big table for one person."

(A-N: If you missed Ch 139 because of my flurry of updates moving the chapters over ... it's new as well. Nihlus versus the orbs of doooooom)

49 Days ASR

Shepard watched the public dock, her eyes searching the faces of everyone who disembarked from the human-registered passenger liner. Her heart pounded so hard and fast against her breastbone that she felt ever so slightly dizzy, her pulse throbbing in her ears. Was she nervous? Damned if she wasn't. She grinned. Other than the whole dead for nearly two years thing, she and Nihlus hadn't been apart for more than a day or two since Eden Prime, and she felt his absence as both an empty space at her side and in her gut.

A strong arm encircled her, and she turned her smile toward Garrus. She knew he'd missed his fratrin almost as much as he'd worried about his baby sister. But they were all back where they belonged now, all home, and the next day, they'd be on their way back to Palaven. A new wave of dizziness washed over her, her heart stopping dead at the thought of what awaited her on Palaven: her wedding.

Sweet baby Jesus, in a few days, she'd be a married woman. What then? Kids? On Omega? In the middle of the war? Were they mad to even be considering getting the whole family thing off the ground? Leaning into Garrus, she forced herself to take a few long, slow breaths until the terror eased back.

Jane Gwendolyn Shepard-Vakarian … and good lord, even worse, a little further up the road she'd be Jane Gwendolyn Shepard-Vakarian-Kryik. She'd need a limo to carry her name. Maybe she could go the way of pop stars: call herself JG SVK.

She caught sight of Nihlus as he exited the hatch at the end of the docking arm, and she pulled free of Garrus's side. Solana followed the Spectre out and tapped his arm, passing him a bag before they both turned to help Thane herd a volus and a very young-looking asari out through the hatch. Shepard grinned; none of them could resist bringing home strays.

A tall, regal-looking asari stepped out, her eyes scanning the docks with a stare that made Shepard wonder if she was the hunter or the hunted. The asari spoke to Nihlus, and he nodded, herding the rest of his brood down the ramp toward the dock floor. About halfway down, his eyes latched on Shepard, a slow grin spreading across his face, hitting the nitrous on Shepard's heart rate. Damn, he looked good. Exhausted, and worn thin, but he'd ditched the brittle tension that had plagued him for as long as she'd known him. Whatever he'd been through in searching out Saren's past … his own past … it looked as though he felt better for it.

"Welcome home," Shepard called as Nihlus reached shouting distance, a wide grin beaming up at him. Then, grabbing his hand the moment he stepped out of the passenger only area, she dragged him a few metres out of the traffic flow, and threw her arms around him. "Holy blessed Enkindlers, I've missed you."

"Mmmm." He lifted her off the floor into a soft, but passionate kiss, one arm wrapped tight around her back, the other under her backside, supporting her weight. "I've missed you too," he whispered against her lips before deepening the kiss.

Shepard let herself slip into that contact, into the rough, solid texture of his hide beneath her lips, the still shy dance of his tongue against hers.

"Dear spirits," Sol's voice groaned from behind Shepard, "do you have to go mining for stomach contents? Here … in public?"

Nihlus pulled back, a smile tweaking his mandibles as he stared into Shepard's eyes. "Yes. Yes, I do." He rubbed his nose against hers, his hide deliciously warm, even there. When he spoke again, his voice formed a soft whisper, tones meant to stay between them. "I dreamed about moments like these for far too long not to savour them."

Shepard swallowed hard, blinking back the sudden rush of warmth that prickled the corners of her eyes. "Welcome home, Nihlus." She kissed him again, lips tugging at his mouth with gentle suction. Letting out a soft sigh, she tilted her head back to include the rest of their small party.
"Maybe we should get going. We can pick this up a little later on."

A wide grin met his reluctance as he nuzzled her lips. "Fine, but not too much later on."

"Deal." When her feet hit the floor, Shepard turned to greet the rest of the returning party.
"Welcome back, everyone." She clasped wrists with Thane and Sol, then nodded to the asari in the uncomfortable looking armour standing just outside the circle.

"Jane, Garrus," Nihlus said, stepping up beside Shepard, "this is Samara, a justicar. Samara, I'd like you to meet Spectre Jane Shepard and General Garrus Vakarian."

Shepard grinned and held out a hand to grasp the nais's wrist. "I'm pleased to meet you, Samara.
Thank you for helping bring my people home."

"I'm pleased to meet you as well, Spectre … General." Samara's grip wrapped around Shepard's wrist, firm and confident. "Spectre Kryik and the others assisted me far more than I did them."

Nihlus gestured to the volus and asari standing pressed so close together that they could have been a very odd pair of conjoined twins. "And these are a couple of new recruits: Niftu Cal and Elnora."

Shepard nodded. "Welcome to Omega."

Samara drew Shepard's attention, the justicar glancing around the docking bay. "I apologize, but perhaps we could become acquainted somewhere out of the public eye. I am closer to my quarry than I have been for more than four hundred cycles. I do not wish to lose that advantage."
Shepard nodded and forced a smile, stomping down the unkind voice that wanted to suggest that the justicar not wear her bright red, bathing-suit armour if she didn't want to be easily ID'd. Instead, she clamped her teeth down on the outside edges of her tongue and held an arm out toward the waiting cars.

On the way back to Archangel headquarters, she curled in against Nihlus's side in the backseat. He wrapped his arm around her as he brought them up to speed on Samara and her quest to kill the mass murderer known as Morinth. Shepard burrowed into him, trying hard to concentrate on what he said when all she wanted to do was breathe him in, to dive into the touch she'd denied both of them for so long.

"Morinth will know me on sight," he said, pulling away just far enough to look down into Shepard's eyes. "You, on the other hand, might just intrigue her enough to pull her into a trap." He smiled, his free hand reaching up, his gloved talon pads skating along her jawline. "You game to play the part of bait?"

Shepard shook off the warm, cozy, slightly amorous cocoon and nodded without the slightest hesitation. "Hell, yeah. We can't let her roam Omega. We have way too many angsty, hopelessly romantic kids in Archangel. I'm not okay with even one of them falling into her trap. Martin would be the first one in line." She leaned forward and slipped a hand between sections of Garrus's armour to squeeze his shoulder. "You okay with being my backup, Callor?"

Garrus nodded. "When we get back, I'll grab the kid, we'll dress for the occasion, and head for the major hangouts." He glanced at Nihlus in the rear mirror. "Samara have a profile of the places and types of prey Morinth goes after?"

"Not to mention a picture." Shepard sat up, sliding her feet off the seat onto the floor. "Although I suspect from what you've said, she'll come after me rather than making me look for her."

"She's a bold predator," Nihlus said, confirming Shepard's gut feeling. "She tried to take that child right in front of me, despite the fact I'd told her I was a Spectre." He shook his head and leaned down to nuzzle Shepard's temple. "She assumes that she can dominate the will of anyone who gets close enough to capture her, and she's not far wrong."

Shepard scowled, not liking the thread of fear woven through his voice. "Did she try to put the whammy on you, cikabeknai?" She looked up into his eyes, seeing the truth there. Morinth had tried, and come close enough to succeeding to scare the Spectre. She reached up to caress his cheek and along the length of his mandible.

He nodded, but then a small, gentle flutter of a smile eased back the haunted aura. "She did, went straight for that lonely, terrified little puer hiding from his mother's rage." He pulled her in tight, wrapping both arms around her. "But then his beautiful, invisible friend stepped in and took his hand, giving him the strength to fight the ardat yakshi off."

Shepard slipped her arms around his waist and laid her head against his chest. "I wish I'd been there for you, Nihlus."

He rested his cheek against her hair, the atmosphere in the car stilling into something comforting, almost reverent. "You were."

Shepard smoothed the wrinkles from the front of her dress and looked down at the moaning turian. "I didn't get dressed up and put all this crap on my face to wrestle with idiots, so go home, and don't let me see your face for the rest of the night." Turning her back on him, she ran a hand down
The asari leaned in and pressed a soft, lightly perfumed kiss to Shepard's cheek. "Thanks, the bouncers were totally sleeping on the job." She gripped the Spectre's hand for another second, then turned and stormed off to confront the aforementioned bouncers. Shepard winced away from her extreme use of the word fuck, and backed away. Maybe she hadn't had to step in to help that one, her mouth could flay the hide off even a turian.

Shepard glared down at the turian as she stepped around him. "Drunk is no excuse for treating people like crap. Call your dear old mari and ask her how she wants you to treat females … of any species." Turning on one high heel, she strode to the bar.

"Cranberry juice, please," she called, leaning easily against the bar. Suddenly, she remembered exactly why she'd never been a huge fan of the bar scene. Drunk people made really stupid choices.

"Thanks," she said, giving the bartender a curt nod as she grabbed her cranberry juice and wandered off toward a seating area. They'd been insanely optimistic believing that she'd lure this asari out of the shadows in a single evening.

"A lot of creds on display tonight," a dual toned voice said from somewhere behind her. "We just need to pick who to follow out of here."

"Seriously?" A low groan rolled deep in her throat. They couldn't help themselves. Turning, she scanned the crowd until she saw two turians huddled head to head in a corner. Well, if the fact she'd spent her night as some sort of vigilante in heels didn't intrigue the ardat yahshi, what would?

Shepard thumped down in the chair next to the turians. "So, is being a couple of small time crooks how you envisioned your life when you were peririn dreaming of what you would be when you grew up?" she asked, crossing her legs at the knee. She swung her lower leg a little and crossed her arms over her chest. "Is it what your mari's dreamed you would grow up to be?"

The one closest to her jumped up, looming over her. "Who do you think you're talking to, lady? Do you know who we work for?"

"Hink," the second one supplied, raising his brow plates like she should know and be impressed by the name.

She didn't, and she wasn't. Thugs, all such big cowards beneath the posturing and scary name dropping. Seriously though … Hink? How did that guy become a crime boss with a name that sounded like a mild hip cramp?

Shepard nodded. "You don't have to go back to Hink at all." Eyes narrowed, she stared them down. "You could make a change, maybe even a few good, solid life choices." After a second, she leaned... in, lowering her voice. "Head down to Kima District, talk to the folks at Archangel. Big guns, lots of combat against real enemies, and a steady income. Best of all, you can trade in being small time thugs for being big, goddamned heroes." She uncrossed her legs and pushed up out of the chair. "You could live honourably … maybe even make your mari's proud."

As she walked past them, she slipped them both five thousand credits. "Go home, leave these folks alone, and think about it." Without looking back, she left the seating area, heading for a booth. Maybe there she could manage to just sit somewhere, drink her cranberry juice and not have to step in to halt criminal activity for a few minutes.

"I've been watching you," a silky-smooth voice said from Shepard's right.

Shepard jumped, spinning toward a deep pool of shadows. Chuckling, she clapped a hand over her heart. "Phew, that was a good jump scare." As her heart rate dropped, a slow chill moved in behind it, an oily shadow slithering across the floor. "Should I be worried about your stalking?" she asked.

An asari in a corset and sleek, floor length, black leather skirt detached from the shadows. A graceful shrug rolled along her bare shoulders, ripples spreading across deep, dark waters. "I don't know. Do you scare easily?"

Shepard chuckled. "No, but then shadows don't normally tell me that they've had their eyes on me. I'll get back to you once I've had a chance to process." A tight smile accompanied a stiff nod. "Have a great night," she said and continued to a corner booth, half-hidden in shadow. Now to see if Morinth took the bait and followed.

Blessed Enkindlers, shine the light of your corpulent, glowing asses on that decision.

The shadow moved, the asari keeping outside the bright spotlights illuminating the bar and dance floor. Despite the light blue of her skin, and how much skin she showed, she blended very well with the inky pools along the walls, appearing to materialize next to Shepard's booth.

"Do you mind if I sit?" the asari asked.

Shepard shook her head and held a hand out toward the seat opposite, breathing a sigh when it remained rock steady. Thank the sweet baby Jesus for Anderson and all his warrior training. "Not at all. It's a big table for one person."

She took a long sip of her juice and looked away to watch the dancing. The dancers all swayed like reeds along a river bank. Well, except one large turian, very handsome in his blue and black suit with gold trim. He swung his giggling human partner around the floor with enough flare to draw a crowd. She hid her grin behind a delicate swipe at her mouth. Her Callor was such a show off.

"My name is Morinth." The asari leaned back in her seat, one arm lifting to drape along the back of the booth in such a way as to showcase her elbow-length black gloves. Every centimetre of her screamed seduction.

"Jane," Shepard supplied. "Pleased to make your acquaintance, Morinth."

"I just arrived on Omega yesterday, but had already begun to despair that I wouldn't meet anyone interesting on this rock." Tipping her chin down and to one side, the nais watched Shepard from under heavily lidded eyes, a soft, sly smile painted on her lips. "Then you came along and gave me hope."

Shepard shrugged. "I almost didn't come out tonight, I have an early appointment, but then I thought, what the hell. Life's short, you're young, take your chances." She cast a sideways glance at
"Must be my lucky night, then." Deftly painted lids closing over blue eyes, Morinth tilted her head back on the long column of her neck. "I love the music here," she said, her voice pitched just right to carry, but at a volume that forced Shepard to lean in to hear it. "It calls to my blood … like it's trying to seduce me out onto the dance floor so it can break through my body's defenses and possess me entirely."

"Space age siren of the new deep?" Shepard asked, one brow lifting. She smiled and nodded. "I like it. Very poetic." Shrugging, she looked back to the dancers. "I'm almost always deployed, so I don't get much of a chance to stop and listen to insanely loud techno noise. This is a treat."

"You? You're a soldier?" Morinth's incredulous smile slowly transformed as she narrowed her eyes, studying Shepard. "Yes, I suppose I see it." She nodded toward the scars down Shepard's arms. "Upgrades?"

"The sort that bring you back from the almost dead, yeah." Shepard shrugged. "My doctor says my body is as ornery as my spirit. It's taking a bit to convince it to accept the implants."

"Ornery, are you? That's promising." The nais's smile warmed. "Blind acceptance is for those without the courage to think for themselves."

The song changed to a wild, heavy-bass cacophony that sent Shepard's fingers up to adjust her aural implants. Blessed Enkindlers, what a racket.

A blissful, almost drugged-looking smile bloomed on Morinth's deep red lips. "Oh, Expel 10. They're sublime. Doesn't this beat just reach down inside you? This band's music … it's like they are playing the base code of my soul … all our souls."

"It really is something," Shepard replied. It reached down into her, but if it was playing the basecode of her soul, her soul needed to run some malware repair. A dull ache wormed in behind her eyes.

Morinth's arm lifted from the back of the seat and glided across the table, long digits grazing the back of Shepard's fingers. "Come, lets dance," Morinth said, leaning in, her eyes focused on Shepard, blinking long and slow. "If you don't get the chance to do this often, might as well take advantage of it." Her fingers wrapped around Shepard's, not giving her a chance to argue, and winked. "Come, you know you want to."

"Well, certainly not when you're dragging me up there." The captain laughed, stepping up rather than allowing herself to be dragged. The nais's emboldening demands easing Shepard's nerves. So far, so good. The snare seemed to be holding. "Just so you're warned," she said, tone light and teasing, "I'm terrible. Hooved animals on ice are more graceful than I am."

The asari's laugh rolled soft and smooth, warm butter over fresh bread. "After seeing you take out that turian buffoon, I don't believe that for a minute. You were a living work of art." Morinth stepped onto the dance floor, pulling Shepard just past her. Slipping in behind the captain, the asari covered both of Shepard's hands with hers, lacing their fingers as she began to move.

Shepard struggled to relax enough to not give herself away or drive Morinth off, but the nais pressed far too tightly against her back. Gloved hands slipped along the underside of Shepard's arms, the touch setting off the captain's tickle reflex as the asari lifted them over her head.

"That's it," Morinth whispered, her lips pressed just above Shepard's ear. "See, you dance beautifully." The words crawled inside Shepard's head, their whispers adamant and beguiling.
'Relax,' they said, 'enjoy yourself. You're safe with me.'

The ardat yakshi's hands caressed their way back down Shepard's arms, the touch repellant and enticing in equal measure as it slipped along her sides. Resting on the captain's hips, insistent pressure coaxed her to sway in time with the body pressed tight against her back.

"I noticed you the moment you walked in," Morinth said, her voice weaving a private bubble around them. It pressed in, safe and so very easy. "There's something special about you." She chuckled, a spring breeze that twined around Shepard's limbs, caressing them with sweet warmth. "The only person in here who isn't dazzled by you, is you."

A slender finger pointed to the dancer Shepard had rescued earlier. "She wants you so badly that she'll end up dragging one of those bouncers into the back room on break just to ease the ache." Morinth smiled and nodded in answer to Shepard's dubious frown, and then tipped her head toward Garrus. "And that one might be dancing with every other female in the place, but he can't take his eyes off you." She closed her eyes and tilted her head back, a hungry smile curling across her lips, and when she spoke, the words came out raw and edged. "He wants you with an intensity that I can smell in his sweat. It's intoxicating."

Morinth pressed closer, every movement brushing against Shepard's body, somewhere different each time, as if the asari drew the runes of a spell, one that pulled the captain in tighter. "But you won't be leaving with him will you, lovely Jane?"

Shepard shook her head, a breathless, "No, not him," tumbling from her lips. Morinth captured the words with a quick, lusty inhale before Shepard could even be certain she'd said them.

The song changed, but Morinth merely adjusted the weaving of her web to suit, slowing it down, moving in tighter, the silken strands thicker, coated with perfumed honey. "That's it," she said, breath stirring the short, delicate hairs on the side of Shepard's neck. "It's just us. We're the only two people left in the galaxy."

A gentle, grey fog surrounded them, the effect a little disorienting, making Shepard feel as though she floated adrift amongst the clouds. Shepard turned to face the asari, her hands following the long, graceful arms to bare, heated sapphire shoulders, using them as an anchor. Morinth's skin felt like silk, textured but so soft that it practically begged Shepard's fingers to caress it. "The only two people left in the galaxy," she agreed.

Five, then six more songs drifted past, the changing rhythm the only marker of time. Morinth said little, her voice the least of her weapons. When the throbbing bass eased back for the seventh time, the nais led Shepard back to their booth. That time, she slid in next to the captain.

A pill appeared on the table, a single black-laced finger tip pushing it toward Shepard, but she shook her head. "No, thank you. In another life, I took enough of those to support the industry for the following decade."

Morinth nodded, and the pill disappeared. "I knew I sensed pain in you." Before Shepard could answer, the asari smiled, and changed the subject. "What sorts of things interest you?" she asked, leaning back, an arm draping itself across the back of the seat so that her fingertips rested at the base of Shepard's neck, drawing slow circles of fire on the bare skin. "I want to know absolutely everything about you."

Shepard smiled and shifted to end the maddening touch. "That will take more than a short conversation at a bar." She shrugged and forced herself to hold her ground when those fingers...
stroked through the hair around her ear. "I'm interested in a great many things: art, books, old movies, sport shooting."

At the mention of art, Morinth perked up, her eyes sparkling with an innocent zeal that left a swelling bruise in Shepard's resolve. "Art? Really?" A bright, curious smile took her expression all the way to heartbreaking. "Do you know the artist, Forta?" Morinth asked.

Shepard nodded, but then looked up and flagged down a server. "Cranberry juice, please," she ordered, then looked to Morinth.

"Thessian Cloudburst," the asari said, her eyes never leaving Shepard. "So, Forta? What do you think? Have you seen his latest?"

Shepard shook her head. "No, I haven't seen his newest pieces, but I prefer sculpture that I can look at for more than five seconds without feeling as though I've overdosed on a badly mixed batch of Hallex." Tearing her eyes away from the asari's, she bolstered her resolve. The nais might not have been able to help being born an ardat yakshi, and it might not be fair for her to spend her life locked away, but the choice to kill hundreds of times … that was all on her, and it made the lovely Morinth a monster.

Note to self: She intends to kill you before the week is out, you soft-hearted … or is that soft-headed ... idiot. And that's if she decides to toy with you a little. Otherwise it'll be tonight. Focus on that.

Shepard cleared her throat. "When it comes to elcor artists, I prefer Drothal. Her paintings … " She purred a little in the back of her throat. "... they transcend form in a way that shattered the curtain for me, letting me glimpse into the void." Wagging her head, she chuckled. "However, my real passion is hyalus, the older the better." She wrinkled her nose. "But I think a part of that is the mystery of it, you know? How the hell did the ancient turians create most of it?"

A soft sound from beside the table drew Shepard's smile to the server. She accepted the drinks and paid for them. "Thanks."

The asari took a sip from her drink, then set it down, one fingertip swirling around the rim of the glass. "That's a secret to which the answer might just drive us mad," she said, a throaty laugh punctuating the sentence.

"Probably, but still, the ones that stand guard over the front doors to the Seat in Cipritine … I can't even guess at how they were made." She shrugged. "I suppose I don't really need to. Not when the light hits them just right, and you'd swear that blood and fire flows through them." Ducking her head, Shepard blushed a little under the weight of Morinth's regard. "Sorry, my mouth runs away with me when I get passionate."

Morinth reached out to caress Shepard's cheek. "Never apologize for passion. There's nothing else in the galaxy worth striving for. Without it, life is just a cage with invisible bars." She swallowed her drink in one and nodded toward the door. "Want to go somewhere a little bit more conducive to talk? I'm tired of yelling over the music."

Shepard met the invitation with a raised eyebrow and a dubious head slant. "It might be a bit early in our friendship for going somewhere quiet. What do you have in mind?"

Morinth slipped from the booth. "Skewers and salarian pale rice? All of it very public so that I'm not too tempted to find out if the body under that dress is as perfect as it is tiny." She tweaked one eyebrow, her eyes sparkling again but nothing in that twinkle could be called innocent.
Shepard stared up at the asari for long seconds, not wanting to appear too eager. Screwing her face up a little, she nodded. "Sure, why not. I could definitely eat. Spent so much time running around today that my stomach thinks my throat's been cut."

Morinth winced. "That's a terrible saying."

Shepard chuckled and guided them through the crowd to the door. "Wait until I introduce you to country music. Now that is truly depressing."

Morinth nodded. "Pain is the driving force behind all art. That's why it's so beautiful and precious: it's been purchased with shattered hearts and dreams even before the artist's hands give birth to it."

Morinth flared her power, breaking free. "Step back, lovely Jane," she said, brushing a soft kiss along Shepard's cheek bone even as she hurled a throw that tossed Samara back down the stairs. "This little family feud will only take a moment to sort."

Samara came back, throwing two warp fields in quick succession. The first sent Morinth and Shepard both diving out of the way, the second bore the ardat yakshi to the floor, bowing backwards as she writhed in agony. "You made your choice long ago."

Both launched powers at the other at the same time, the result forming a ball-shaped nimbus trapped between them, the thing building in power until neither could shift even the slightest without taking a near fatal blast. Shepard shuffled forward a little, one hand held up to shade her eyes from the brilliant light. The crates next to the wall shifted, the mass effect field pulling at them as it gained strength. Mind racing, Shepard crept closer, trying to see a way to end the standoff without any innocent bystanders getting hurt.

Morinth focused on Shepard, that gaze a fathomless black through the crackling blue aura of her biotics. "Jane, help me. What kind of nais hunts her own daughter for four hundred cycles, killing hundreds of innocents just to destroy what she brought into the universe?"

Morinth was a murderer. She killed for the thrill of it. No matter what her words and the whispers in Shepard's mind said, she was no victim. She did not need—

"Save me, please, Shepard. You can't let me die." The gossamer ties doubled in strength. "You care about me! You know how good we could be together. You'd never let her hurt me." The black void drew Shepard's eyes back to stare into the depths of eternity. "Just grab her hand. Give me a second's advantage, and we can be together. We can escape … ."

Escape? The beacon images tore through Shepard's mind, the horror and chaos of a dying galaxy smashing her into pieces then grinding them beneath its heel.

Joy swept in to greet her terror and helplessness, the whispers growing louder, more insistent. "Yes! We can escape it all, disappear. We can be happy. I can take away all these burdens you carry. No more fear, no more terrible responsibility."

Shepard felt the hooks loosen. Responsibility? Who would shoulder it if she ran away? Garrus? Nihlus? No! Molten steel poured into her gut, and the scent of iron bloomed deep in her sinuses. She couldn't run. The battle needed her. Her torins needed her. She'd been brought back to fight, and as painful and terrifying as it might be time to time, she'd damned well fight.

Wrestling against the bonds shackling her body through her mind, Shepard threw herself forward, straining to reach for Morinth's hand. The clashing biotic fields ripped along her skin as she entered that mass effect battlefield, two titans locked in a battle of equal power. Panting, sweat trickling down her neck and between her breasts, Shepard laboured forward, one agonizing millimetre at a time. trying to grab the ardat yakshi's wrist, but the voice whispering in her mind pushed back against her will.

"Then I will join your fight. Give in to me. Help me kill her, and everything will be all right. I can help you stop them. I can help you save everyone." The whispers wrapped tight, pushing Shepard toward the elder asari. "Do as I say, and the Reapers won't stand a chance."

"Kahri!" The club's door opened, letting loose a heavy wave of the throbbing, pounding music, but then heavy footsteps raced toward her and strong talons gripped her shoulders, shattering the whispers' hold on her. Twisting, she lunged into the competing warp fields, grabbed Morinth's arm and hauled back on it.

"Nothing you could offer me can hold the tiniest spark to him." A razor-wire grimace slashed across her face as Morinth's wide-eyed stare flicked to Garrus. "You're just a parasite."

A throw tore Morinth's wrist from Shepard's grip and spun them both around. The nais slammed headfirst into the corner of a large crate, hitting with enough force that she flipped over it and into the pipes lining the wall. Violet blood and gore splashed across Shepard's face and shoulder as bones cracked and splintered, tearing through the once flawless blue skin.

Talons latched around Shepard's shoulders, pulling her back against Garrus's body, but she resisted when he tried to turn her away. Samara stepped around them, striding to her daughter's body. The nimbus that had surrounded the entire nais drew in, concentrating around the asari's fist, growing brighter and brighter as she raised it, then smashed it into Morinth's jaw. With another horrific crack, the ardat yakshi's neck broke, and the body slumped, dead.

The hooks inside her mind vanished, the sudden freedom sending a flood of ice water pouring through Shepard's veins. How close had she come to giving in? She didn't know, but she felt pretty sure that the part of her mind trying to reassure her that she never would have let Morinth dominate her was a fucking liar. Clenching her teeth together, she sucked in long breaths through her nose, fighting to avoid throwing up. Pieces of skull and brain stuck to the crate, smaller pieces flowing along the thin river of blood toward the edge of the stair.

"Nihlus?" Garrus called, startling Shepard from her horrified fascination. She looked up then turned to see the Spectre hurrying up the stairs from the market. Garrus wrapped an arm around her shoulders, pulling her into his heat envelope. "Can you and Samara see to getting this sorted? I'm taking Shepard back to base."

Warm, rough palms cradled Shepard's face, then Nihlus nuzzled her brow. "Are you all right, haksaya kubenar?" His thumbs brushed through the blood on her cheek, spreading the chill dampness into the hair in front of her ear. "She didn't hurt you?"

She nodded and straightened, the numb shock drawing back. "I'll live." Sniffling, she reached up to grip his wrist. "Yeah, having a ardat yakshi begging for her life inside your head, then having her ripped out is … well … ." A fragile chuckle tumbled out, shattering even before it hit the floor. "Don't worry, I'll shake it off."

Nihlus touched his brow to hers for a second, then drew back and looked to Garrus. "I'll stay here with Samara and take care of the body. I'll see you back at base an hour before departure time."

Shepard wrapped an arm around Garrus's waist, allowing him to lead her to Afterlife where Martin waited with the car. No one spoke all the way back to base, Garrus seeming willing to wait for her to make the first move. For her part, Shepard relished the silence, a slow-building headache pressing into her temples. So, instead of talking, she laid her head against her dilan's chest and closed her eyes.

After ten minutes or so of flight, his arm tightened around her, alerting her to their arrival.

Taking a long breath, Shepard pulled away. Time to push it aside and get ready for her wedding. She didn't even own an appropriate dress for the occasion. "Okay," she said, policing up all the random bits of crazy, "I need to take a shower, get dressed, grab my mother, and run out to purchase a wedding dress." She grinned up at Garrus. "Which you're not allowed to see until the big day."

Garrus arched his neck, looking quite pleased with himself as he chuckled. "I'll retrieve our things from the laundry and pack our armour?"

Shepard leaned up and kissed his mandible. "Thank you, Callor. You are the very best almost husband there is."

The top and sides opened, and Garrus got out, but it was Martin who reached in to help Shepard out of the car. When she stood on her own, he grinned. "You look insanely hot in that dress, Shepard." He leaned in, his mouth pressed to her ear. "Are you sure you don't want to ditch the general and marry me, instead?"

Shepard scarcely got a chance to chuckle before Garrus grabbed the kid by the shoulders and propelled him toward the door. "Sorry, kid. I guess not," she called after him.

Martin shrugged and walked through, but then popped back around the door. "Think about it! We'd make beautiful babies!"

Garrus planted a hand on the top of Martin's head, pushing it back over the threshold. "Get out of here and go pack for Palaven. And quit hitting on my mate. As best man, it's in very poor taste."

"Best man?" The joy in the kid's voice wrapped a tight hand around Shepard's throat. "Really?"
"Really," Garrus replied, "so get moving."

"Okay, I'm ... thanks, boss ... General ... Garrus." Running bootsteps retreated across the tile, disappearing into the elevator.

Shepard smiled and shook her head, watching Garrus with a warm, weighted stare as he turned from the door. All her earlier panic about being married, having kids ... it all vanished as their eyes met. "I love you," she whispered, emotion washing her brain clean of thought.

He smiled and closed the few metres between them. His hands cupped her shoulders for a moment, before sliding down her arms, to close his talons around her fingers. "And I love you." His grin turned wicked, his eyes flashing a little as he shrugged and swallowed hard. "And you do look insanely sexy. I would have much rather you were rubbing all of this ... " He lifted her arms away from her sides and twirled her around, pulling her in tight against him. "... all over me rather than that psycho."

Shepard relaxed into his arms, laying her head back against his arm. "Trust me, that would have been my preference too, and I will, but I fully intend for us to be naked at the time." She closed her eyes. "Right now, however, we need to get packed and get our butts onto our ships." Pulling from his grip, she turned, reaching up to cradle his face between her hands. "You're okay with Nihlus and I spending the trip on the Ypres?"

The question ached in her chest as she asked. There it was, the down side of the three way relationship.

"Yes. I've had you all to myself for the week, although most of that was sleeping in our armour propped up in a corner somewhere." He leaned down and nuzzled her lips. "When we get to Palaven, you'll be all mine again, so definitely spend this time with Nihlus."

Shepard kissed him. "I am the luckiest woman in the entire galaxy." She stepped out of his arms. "Now, I'd better get changed, grab Mom—and Bunny, if she'll come—and go find something to wear." Standing on her tiptoes, she kissed him again, then dashed into the building. "But first, I need to pee."

Shepard stepped out through the curtain and twirled, the cream, gauzy material of the dress whispering around her legs in a most delicious way. After a couple of spins, she held out her arms. "I love it. What do you think?"

Lucy— it was so very hard to think of her as Mom after so long—smiled and stood. "It's beautiful, Janey." She adjusted the peasant neckline so that it draped off Shepard's least scarred shoulder. "What are you going to wear on your feet?"

Pulling the neck back up, Shepard shrugged. "The part that I'm wearing the dress for is in his parents' garden, so nothing more than likely." Meeting her mother's eyes, Shepard reached up to brush a stray lock of brilliant red behind an ear. "I'm so glad you're going to be there." And, despite the strange newness of Lucy's presence, she meant it. She just wished that her mother would stop staring at her like she was trying to give her an xray.

They hadn't had very much time to get reaquainted, with dashing off to Palaven to meet with Victus, and then straight from there to Korlus. If Shepard had to tell the truth, the awkwardness of it ... well, once the initial joy settled, the whole mess brought about by Bunny's hatred, and the fact her mother kept looking at her like she was some sort of alien ... . Well, it all sent her into avoidance mode.
Stepping back, Shepard twirled a couple more times, grinning as the skirt spread out. "I definitely think this is the one, don't you?"

Lucy pressed her lips together in a tight smile and nodded. "Definitely the one."

"I remember the last time you came in here," the asari attendant said, smiling wide in the mirror's reflection from behind Shepard's left side. "Are you marrying the one you bought that last dress for?" She stepped up, a gorgeous beaded belt stretched between her hands. Without asking, she slipped it around Shepard's waist, tying it in a loose loop off to one side. "There, perfect."

Shepard grinned as she remembered the way Garrus hadn't even recognized her in that other dress, then just stared, his mouth and mandibles hanging. "Yes, he's the one. That mission was a few weeks before we started seeing one another. I needed the dress to get past the Blue Suns."

The asari nodded in a knowing way. "I saw the way he looked at you and knew something was there."

Shepard chuckled and cocked her head one way then the other, swinging her hips to watch the beaded tassels on the belt sway. "You knew more than I did at that point, then. That was one hell of a crazy night. Went in to find a doctor and came out with a whole pile more people needing a doctor." She nodded, loving the way the light played off the cream and gold beads. "I'll take the belt too." Ducking inside the change room, she felt those few days close around her, heavy and rich. Her fear for Nihlus, how safe she felt with Garrus at her side, even walking into that viper's lair. She untied the belt and looped it over the hook on the wall.

Crazy times. She smiled. And good ones. Strange how often her life paired those two things.

"Wait," the asari called through the fabric barrier, "you needed the dress to get past the Blue Suns?"

Shepard squawked as the curtain flew back, the asari standing in the gap. Thank god she hadn't taken off the dress. She flinched back, having spent far too much time with boundaryless asari in her space. "Yes, I went in under the guise of prostitute servicing a rich bastard in the district."

The asari lunged forward and flung her arms around Shepard, squeezing another squawk out along with all of the captain's air. "You killed Donovan, didn't you? You saved his victims?"

Shepard pried herself loose and held the nais at arm's length. "Yes. My dilan … Garrus … General Vakarian helped."

Tears rolled over the lavender cheeks. "Thank you." Breaking free of the vicelike grip on her arms, she wrapped Shepard in another strong, but much briefer, hug. "My niece was one of the girls you saved that day," she explained, wiping her face on her sleeve. Flapping a flustered hand at the dress, she shrugged, her shoulders crumpling as her cheeks flushed violet. "Sorry for grabbing you like that; I'll let you get changed." Still fussing, she pulled the curtain closed behind her. "Just pass the dress through when you're ready, and I'll put it in a garment bag for you."

Shepard grinned and slipped out of the beautiful layers of sheer fabric. As startled as she'd been, it felt good to see the effect of her actions. Knowing that she'd saved somebody's loved one almost wiped away the look in Hock's eyes when she'd murdered him.

Violet blood splashed across her face, the terrible crunch of bones shattering … .

No! Shepard shook her head and glanced at her chronometer. The Ypres departed in just over an hour. She didn't have time for indulging that nonsense. She scrambled for her clothes.
When she emerged from the stall, her mother and the sales associate stood over by the door, speaking in hushed tones. Suspicious, she sidled up to them, but they saw her and broke off before she could hear what they were talking about.

"I'm ready, I think," she said, letting out a short sigh as she nodded. "We'd better get over to the docks and get ready to go."

The asari thrust the garment bag and another, smaller bag into Shepard's arms. "Here." She waved Shepard off when she tried to pay. "No charge. Consider it a thank you for my niece's life." A wicked gleam sparkled in her eyes. "And … ah … I threw in a little something to thank the general as well."

Shepard peered into the bag, but couldn't make out much other than black lace. She chuckled. "Thank you, and I'm sure the general will thank you too."

"Have a wonderful bonding ceremony," the nais called, waving them off.

Shepard headed across the markets to the stairs that led up to Afterlife. She stumbled to a weary stop at the bottom of the flight leading to the club's VIP section. Only a couple of hours before she'd been dancing with a murderer, trying to seduce her to a terrible but justified death. She hadn't fired that shot, not like Donovan Hock, but she'd still taken justice into her own hands again. Her stomach rolled. She didn't want that sort of power. She couldn't be trusted with that sort of power. No one could, that was why courts existed.

Courts? Really, Janey? You'd trust your fate to a court overseen by the council?

Clenching her jaw, she brought that train to a screeching halt before it derailed.

"Janey?" Lucy said, her tone soft and confused as she interrupted Shepard's guilt storm without dissipating it. "Are you all right, sweetheart?"

"I'm fine, Mom." Shepard tried to nod and smile, to show the brave, unaffected face, but the nod decayed into a slow shrug, the violet stain on the stairs holding her eyes captive. At least Nihlus and Samara had gotten the body removed. She didn't know if she could keep herself from throwing up if she had to hold her wedding dress and stare at Morinth's crushed skull and broken neck. "I'm just very tired and a little over emotional. Nothing to worry about."

Sucking in a ragged breath, she spun away. They needed to get to the ship. She could go through the eighteen stages of vigilante guilt and grief once Nihlus's arms sheltered her from the rest of the galaxy.

"Jane?"

She spun towards his voice, its warm timber coaxing a soft hum of relief from deep in her chest. Her torins both possessed spectacular timing. He jogged over and pulled her straight into a tight hug.

"How are you doing, haksaya kubenar?" He pulled back, holding her away by her shoulders. "You looked rattled when Garrus took you back to base."

She just shook her head and wrapped her arms around him. "Get me to the transit station, please, love."

He held her tight and leaned down to nuzzle her temple. "Of course. " Wrapping an arm around her waist, he pulled her in tight and started toward the doors.
"Janey?"

"Oh sweet baby Jesus," Shepard whispered, keeping the words too low for her mother to hear. She hadn't prepared her mother for the whole two turian boyfriends, marrying both of them eventually, thing.

Shepard pulled a tinman turn, practically able to hear all her joints creaking. "Mom, you've met Spectre Kryik before?"

Lucy nodded, just as rusted and stiff. "I have." Her eyes looked to Nihlus. "Hello again." Then darted right back to pin Shepard to the wall.

"Nihlus is my boyfriend, Mom." She sighed. "It will take quite a lot of explaining, but he and Garrus are sort of … blood brothers, I guess you could say."

"Does the general know about this?" Lucy demanded, pointed and bristled.

Shepard smiled. "Of course, he does, Mom. He talked me into it." She nodded her head in the direction of the transit station and started shuffling that way. "I'll explain everything … actually, the three of us will, but for now, let's get to our ship."

Please, sweet Jesus, just let me get her to the cab before she detonates.

Shepard shuffled a couple more steps sideways. "Come on, Mom. It's all okay. The three of us are a family."

Lucy's jaw remained clenched, her neck stiff as she moved, but at least she started moving. Nihlus loosened his hold on Shepard, but she gripped his hand and pulled him in tight again. She loved Nihlus, they were together, and if her mother couldn't handle that … well, then she couldn't.

They managed to make it to the cab, where Nihlus gave her a quick nuzzle goodbye, then took off with some excuse about having a couple last things to take care of. Shepard watched him run from her mother, then got in. Holding her breath as the cab closed around them, she felt her mother's disapproval like a small crate of grenades sitting in the back seat, waiting to detonate.

"The general is a very good man," Lucy said, her stare burning a hole through the front screen. Well, at least Shepard could agree with that. A thin sigh preceded her words. "He's the very best, and I love him so hard it hurts."

The heavy, painful rigor of Lucy swallowing reached Shepard even over the engine noise. "Then why isn't he enough for you?" She whirled around, lunging a little, her face that brittle mask that Shepard remembered so well. "I didn't raise my daughter to be that selfish or greedy." A sound rolled low in her throat, a sound rotting with disgust. "And I didn't raise some mare to brood herself out."

Shepard locked her jaw shut against the words that struggled to get out. Armed with shivs and broken bottles, they rioted across her tongue, clamouring to cut as they bashed against the insides of her teeth. Instead, she focused on programming the car to take them to the Ypres. When the guards wrestled the prisoners into straight jackets and tossed them into their padded cells, she took a long breath in.

"You know, Mom, you spent my whole childhood believing that I was Dad. That I had somehow been created to test your patience and your connection to God." The destination entered into the cab's computer, Shepard let her hands fall into her lap. "And I agreed. How on earth could we ever have anything in common?" A long breath whistled through her nose.

"It took about five years after Mindoir before I realized something. I am you. I've always been you. You raised me with this will that is a match to your own." A soft chuckle dissipated the last of her anger at being called a selfish broodmare. "And that's why we've always butted heads. And it's also why we always stayed connected even as much as we drove one another crazy." Shepard turned in her seat to take her mother's hands then leaned forward to press her lips to Lucy's brow.

She shrugged, ducking her head toward one shoulder, and squeezed her mother's warm, dry fingers. "And now, I'm going to take the two gifts you gave me—the impossible will and the great big heart—and I'm going to set my own path as I always have." She pulled back just far enough to meet her mother's eyes. "I'm going to marry Garrus in his parent's garden with his brother standing behind us. And then I'm going to marry Nihlus with Garrus standing by our sides, and I am going to love them both the very best that I can."

"Janey … ." Lucy tugged back on her hands, so Shepard released them, watching as they drifted back to rest on her mother's lap.

Shepard shook her head, not willing to let her mother gain any steam. "And if you can't be there for both weddings, and love and celebrate both of my bond-mates … then don't come to either wedding." Focusing on Lucy's eyes, she buttoned down her resolve. "I'll miss you, but Nihlus doesn't deserve to be made to feel second best, and I don't deserve to feel like I am some sort of horrible bitch or whore on the two most important days of my life."

Shepard turned back to the car's controls. "I hope you'll decide to be there for both. I really do."

(A-N: Having decided that the reason people have quit on the story is likely the pace, I'll be moving along a lot more quickly. So yeah ... thanks for still being here. Love yah ... yep, even if I don't know yah. hugs)
Heart still racing, head still reeling, Shepard drew in a long breath and nodded. "Yeah, I really do. Garrus and how much I love him isn't the problem. It's all the rest of it, Anderson. It's being married. Married for God's sake! It's Nihlus, and then … kids? What the hell am I going to do with kids?"

"Love them." He chuckled again. "You won't be doing it alone, kid. You have this huge family that adores you, and every last one of us will be right there with you, and Garrus, and Nihlus. Even for the kids."

"Janey?"

Shepard stopped and twisted to look back at her mother, who stood just outside the starboard observation lounge. Her hand stalled halfway to the elevator control, hanging there like some halfwit hummingbird, uncertain whether to fly on or withdraw.

"Could I join you for supper this evening?" Lucy asked. She took a deep breath and squared her shoulders, pulling her head back on her neck. "You and Spectre Kryik?"

A slow smile pulled back one corner of Shepard's mouth as her hand finally decided to go for it and hit the control to call the elevator. "Sure, Mom, I'd love that." She activated her omnitool to check her schedule. "I have a meeting until 1900, will that be okay?"

Lucy smiled, lips pressed tight. She nodded twice, then turned back toward the door. A couple of steps down the corridor, she stopped and looked back without turning. "I'm sorry for what I said to you in the car, Janey." She sucked a noisy breath in through her nose. "I watch you, and I am just always … " Her shoulders rolled ever so slightly. "... amazed at the woman my rebellious little girl turned into. I don't understand the arrangement between you, the general, and Spectre Kryik, but you didn't deserve such unkindness."

The elevator door dinged, but Shepard turned away from it. She pressed together her trembling lips and blinked away the burning in her eyes. "Thank you, Mom. I appreciate that, and I'm glad you and Bunny are here." She closed the distance between them. "It wouldn't have been the same without you."

Lucy turned and reached up to press her palm against Shepard's cheek, her thumb caressing the edge of the wounds carved into the flesh, soothing and warm. "You've borne so much pain, Janey, and I keep searching to see … ." She ran her bottom lip between her teeth, then her entire body shrugged, eyebrows lifting in a gesture of complete bafflement. "I don't know … the connections, I guess, between the girl I remember and this remarkable woman before me. How are you this woman? I missed everything in between."

Shepard stepped in and wrapped her arms around her mother. "Part of it is you teaching me through your strength," she whispered, her voice meant to travel no further than her mother's ear. "Part of it is Dad's faith that I had some great and terrible fate, and part is Anderson and his endless patience." She pressed her lips to her mother's ear. "And part of it is them, Mom. Garrus's solidity, Nihlus's volatility and vulnerability … both of them so strong in their own ways." Drawing back, she lifted a hand to mirror her mother's caress. "And the rest … just me trying to find my way through the dark."

Blinking quickly against the glassiness in her eyes, Lucy nodded. "If you love them, and they love you, then I'll try to understand."

"Thank you," Shepard replied, biting back a retort to the effect that Lucy's understanding wasn't required, nor would it make any difference. She could either accept or not. One included her in Shepard's life and one didn't. "I've got to meet with my XO and yeoman. I'll see you at 1900." She grinned and turned back to the elevator. "I'll ask Sgt. Gardener if he can put together something edible." When she reached the elevator, she found the doors open and frowned, puzzled, until she stepped between them and saw Nihlus hiding off to the side by the controls.

She turned to face the doors as they closed. "You hiding from my mother?" she asked, watching him out of the corner of her eye.

He chuckled and stepped into her, wrapping an arm over her shoulder and around her back, turning her into his embrace. "No, I just wanted to give you space and privacy, but if I'd gone ahead up to the cabin, you would have been waiting for the elevator for twenty minutes." He nuzzled her brow. "So, you have to meet with Operative Lawson and Kelly?"

Shepard nodded as she relaxed into him, her cheek pressed to the panel of his tunic, eyes settling closed, heavy and content. "Come up anyway? We've got a few minutes."

She felt him nod, his mandibles brushing through her hair. Neither of them moved the rest of the way up to her cabin, peeling apart reluctantly when the doors opened into the little foyer. Shepard slipped her fingers into his talons, drawing him after her as she walked into the spacious cabin. Even before the door closed, she stopped, surprise pulling a sharp, delighted smile onto her face.

"Fish!" she said, releasing Nihlus's hand to stride over, both hands lifting to press against the fishtank glass. She leaned in, ducking to follow the darting motions of the tank's colourful denizens. "Where did you lovely little chaps come from, huh?" She pressed a fingertip against the glass, grinning as a blue fellow with large gold fins tried to nibble it.

"Ms. Chambers is the culprit, I believe," Nihlus said. He stroked a slow, heavy hand down Shepard's back. "She seems to think you need stress relief." She heard him walk to the stairs and down. The leather couch let out a soft, squeaky groan as he sat.

"She might be right." His gravity drew her down the stairs. She watched him for a second, wishing that she'd cancelled her meeting and told her mother that they could have dinner the next day. All she wanted to do was curl up in his arms. No talk, no requirements or expectations of any kind, just savouring one another's presence in the quiet.

Nihlus held out a hand. She placed her fingers in his talons and allowed him to draw her over. She knelt on the couch next to him, then swung one knee over to straddle his lap.

Settling onto his thighs, she smiled, one hand draping itself over his shoulder, the other lifting to trace his familia notas with the pad of her thumb. "Hello there," she said, her voice soft and pitched low.

"Hello." His mandibles flicked as he stared into her eyes, the love in that gaze like a sturdy rope securing her to a dock in a stormy sea. He let out a long breath and nodded. "How are you doing?"
he asked. "Really?"

"The 'had someone crowbar their way into my brain' headache is starting to fade." Shepard slipped her arms under his, wrapping them around him and laid her head against his chest. "I feel sorry for her, Nihlus," she said, the words tiptoeing out. "I mean, I know she was a monster, well … I mean, was she?" Closing her eyes, she burrowed into him. "I don't know. Yes, she was a monster, but what a crappy hand to be dealt. Live in a cage your entire life, die, or run and kill."

He wrapped his arms around her. "What would you have chosen, Jane? In her place, what decisions would you have made?"

She shrugged, the question leaning with an uncomfortable edge digging into her conscience. "I'd like to think that I'd have chosen the noble route, tried to find the best in the prison, and live to better the lives of others like myself." She nuzzled into him, breathing in the subtle spice and sand scent of him. "But would I? After Mindoir, I had plenty of opportunities to take the positive path.
Instead, I chose self-destruction."

Nihlus's talons dragged up her spine, the touch comforting, easing her deeper into his embrace as they reversed and slipped back down. "Self destruction is very different than taking your pain out on others or feeding an addiction through killing, haksaya kubenar." He nuzzled the top of her head. "I believe you would have heeded the guidance of nobler, gentler spirits."

The fact that, despite everything they'd been through and all her questionable decisions, he still saw her that way amazed her. Shepard pulled back to gaze into his eyes. "I love the way you see me, cikabeknai, but I don't deserve it." She traced the ridge of his mandible with her thumb. "How about you? Are you all right? She forced her way into your head, too."

He nodded. "It scared me, but no lasting damage." He leaned down, nuzzling her lips. "The damned orbs, that's another matter altogether." A heavy shudder rolled up his body. "There were so many of them, but even though I could sense an intelligence behind each one, only one voice spoke inside my head."

Shepard leaned up on her knees and pressed her brow to his. "You'll tell me about it after my mother leaves this evening?"

Another nod and a sigh. "I will. I don't understand most of what they said. Maybe you can help me sort it." He tilted his chin up to nuzzle her lips. "But for the moment, I'd much rather just kiss you."

Shepard smiled against the rough hide. "I think that can be arranged." Returning his kiss, she wrapped her arms around his neck as it deepened. His grip on her tightened, pulling her in, the fire smoldering just beneath the surface, but restrained. A soft, disappointed sigh escaped her as he pulled back, the hard, strong pounding of her heart and the ache in her gut insisting that they not only keep going, but escalate.

Nihlus chuckled, brushing her lips with the upper plate of his mouth. "You have to meet with Miranda and Kelly, and I would much rather pick this up when we can take it as far as we like without worrying about time."

She let out a long, melodramatic sigh, then chuckled as knuckles rapped against the door. "Oh, fine, since the entire galaxy seems determined to deny me." She kissed him one last time, just a brief brush of lips, then clambered off his lap.

"Come in," she called, nodding to Miranda when the operative stepped through the door. "Come on down and get comfortable."

Nihlus stood, pressing tight in behind her. "Operative Lawson," he said, his tone curt. He gripped Shepard's upper arm, leaning around her a little. "Do you mind if I use your computer to take care of a few things?"

"Not at all. My computer is your computer." Shepard stepped out of the way, glad that he'd be just a few metres away. Miranda didn't have any sort of control over her, but she still didn't trust the operative even as far as she could throw her. Never hurt to have back up.

Kelly arrived a moment later, and the three of them got down to business. When Nihlus finished whatever he was doing on her computer, he plunked down next to her on the couch, turned to put his feet up, and started reading Saren's journal. Shepard shifted a little to act as a better back rest, and just carried on with the rest of the meeting.

"The organization has feelers on all the colony worlds," Miranda reported, her eyes shifting back and forth between Shepard and Nihlus. "They report in every hour on the hour, so we should be ready to respond as soon as one goes dark."

Shepard chuckled. "Miranda, I think we're past calling your employers 'the organization', don't you?" She shook her head at the stubborn clench that set the operative's jaw and carried on. "Omega is the best staging area we could hope for with all of Sahrabarik's relays. We can be halfway across the galaxy in any direction within a day."

The operative tipped her head in a regal sort of nod. "It is conveniently central to most of the Attican Traverse and Terminus." She checked her data pad. "How long do you anticipate remaining on Palaven?"

"A couple of days, at least. Schedule leave in twelve hour shifts, and get everyone who will be involved in ground missions training together a couple of hours a day, at least." Shepard sucked in a big breath, then let her chest collapse, driving it out. "None of them can tolerate the others, and as much as they did well on Korlus, they could do better if they worked as a unit."

"I'll see that they do." Miranda cleared her throat and straightened a little in her chair. "I'd like to approach the justicar about joining our team. We can always use more biotic power against the collectors."

Shepard nodded. "I'll contact her and make the invitation. See if your sources can dig us up a couple more tech experts. The Collectors might be primarily organic, but the fight is bigger than that, and the Reapers and their husks are most definitely tech." She closed her omnitool and shifted a bit to warn Nihlus before she stood, declaring the meeting adjourned. "I want you training with the team as well, Miranda, and I'll join them when I'm able."

Looking from her XO to her yeoman, she raised her eyebrows. "Is there anything else?"

"No, ma'am," Kelly said.

"That's all I have, Shepard," Miranda agreed, also standing. She gathered up her datapads and then stopped to look Shepard in the eye. "Congratulations on your bonding, Captain. I wish you the best." Her gaze darted to Nihlus, who'd pressed himself in behind Shepard's elbow. A quick nod acknowledged him before the operative turned on her heel and strode to the door.

Kelly stretched out a hand. "Congratulations, Shepard. I wish you and the general long years of happiness." She grinned as she looked up at Nihlus. "Your wishes will have to wait for your big day." A soft giggle met his chuff, then the yeoman followed Miranda to the elevator.

Nihlus's arms crept around Shepard's waist, pulling her back against him.

"You know, they're all going to start to wonder when I always have a turian glaring at them from behind me," Shepard said, then laughed. She turned within his embrace, then pulled him down for a kiss. "You two are far too overprotective, but I love you for it." She glanced at the time, then made a face. "We have about fifteen minutes before Mom comes up. Can you ask Sgt. Gardner to send up some dinner while I take care of these details?"

"I can." He nuzzled along her jaw. "The sooner we get this over with, the sooner we can be alone."

Shepard took a deep breath and nodded. "From your mouth to God's ears, cikabeknai. From your mouth to God's ears."

52 Days ASR

"Oh, sweet baby Jesus," Shepard whispered as she stared into the mirror. When she'd looked at the dress in the store on Omega, she'd been sure that … well, sure of everything. Why then did it suddenly seem as though she was dooming all three of them to disaster and heartache? It had all happened too fast. She'd just barely gotten back from the dead … just barely remembered either of her torins. She didn't even really have a handle on her identity as a single unit.

And what she did know about herself didn't bode well for marriage. She was crazy, closed off, and terrified of everything. Did Garrus and Nihlus want to spend their whole lives tied to that? A deep breath trembled into a soft moan.

Warm, dry palms pressed down on her shoulders, brilliant green eyes staring at her in the mirror. "What is it, Janey?"

Shepard tried for a smile that felt like a nauseated grimace. "I believe the technical term is cold feet."

Lucy nodded. "Yeah, I was so terrified the night before I married your father that I drank nearly a fifth of coconut rum."

A startled laugh escaped as Shepard met her mother's eyes in the reflection. "You? You drank yourself silly the night before your wedding?"

"I wasn't always a cranky old woman," Lucy replied, trying to look affronted, the effect spoiled by the sparkle in her eye. "Trust me, you do not want to get married with a hangover." She straightened the spray of rylamia in Shepard's hair. "I spent the entire ceremony trying not to throw up on your father's tuxedo." She caressed Shepard's cheek. "He was so handsome. The moment I saw him standing there, waiting for me, I knew that I was making the right decision, and so will you."

Shepard turned to face her mother. "Thank you for the other night." She wrapped her arms around Lucy's narrow shoulders. "Your being so kind to Nihlus meant … means so much to me."

Lucy returned the hug. "He adores you, and I haven't got the slightest doubt that he'd do anything to protect you and make sure you're happy," She pulled away and shrugged. "What else can a mother hope for?" She frowned and turned away, reaching for her hand bag and a tissue. "You know, the day I met your general," she said, blotting away the dampness in the corner of Shepard's eyes, "I knew that I'd met the man who would spend his entire life loving my daughter, faithful to her even in death."
Shepard swallowed hard and blinked. "Who wears eye makeup for an event that was practically invented for crying?" She took the offered tissue and turned back to the mirror. "I adore him for loving me that much, and I'm glad that he found comfort in my memory, but I'd never want him to spend his entire life alone, mourning." She levelled a fierce glare on her mother. "Remind him of that—forcibly, if you need to—if it ever comes up again."

A deep, breathy sigh met that. "Oh, my girl, after today, he won't look at another woman as long as he lives." Lucy smiled. "He loves you, and he'll spend his life dedicated to making sure you're happy and taken care of." She chuckled, the laugh accompanied by half a shrug. "If I have to take on two sons-in-law, I couldn't wish for ones who love my little girl any better."

Lucy pulled in a hard, noisy breath and thumped her shoulders back, straightening up. "All right, enough of that. You'll be fine once you get out there." She pressed a kiss to Shepard's cheek, the contact rough, almost brusque. "You look beautiful, and I know your daddy is looking down on you today, bursting with pride." Another kiss, rougher than the one before, and then she spun and strode out of the room. "I'll let them know you're ready."

Shepard chuckled and shook her head, watching the door for a few seconds as she processed everything her mother had said. Good old Lucy, never one for suffering emotions for too long before she had to throw up a wall. "Guess the apple didn't fall far from that tree," she whispered, turning to look back into the mirror. After a second, she swallowed hard. "I hope you're looking on, Daddy," she said. Eyes prickling with tears again, she ripped her tissue in half to form a dam under both eyes.

"I wish you were here. I wish you'd gotten a chance to meet Garrus and Nihlus. You would have told me to be wary of Nihlus, but I know you'd love him. Garrus," she said and chuckled, "well, the two of you are peas from the same pod."

Shepard spun away from the mirror and hastily wiped her eyes as knuckles rapped against the wood. Smoothing her hands down the front of the dress, she fought to still their trembling. She was ready. Maybe. Oh, dear God, not even remotely. "Yes?"

"You decent?" Anderson called.

"Never," she retorted, grinning at the sigh that answered her. "But I'm dressed, so come on in." When the door opened, the captain stepping through, she spread her arms, twirled, and then gave a self-conscious little shrug. "Well? What do you think?"

The captain stepped over the threshold and turned to close the door, taking the time to slowly press it shut. After a moment's hesitation, he turned back, meeting her gaze with a glassy one. "You look absolutely stunning." He strode over to her, his strides so strong and quick that she leaned back, feeling as though she were being charged, but then he wrapped his arms around her and pulled her into a tight hug.

"I …," he started to say, but then just shook his head and held her.

After a stunned second, her arms stuck out and flailing a little like a scarecrow in a nor'easter, she wrapped her arms around him. "Am I making a mistake, Anderson? It's all too fast, isn't it? It's all so … not me, and in the end, they're both going to end up getting hurt." Pulling away, she backed up a few steps. "Stop me from panicking here, Anderson. Mom had me calmed down, but she left the room five minutes ago, and it's all coming back." She looked around. "You wouldn't have a fifth of coconut rum on you?"

A drink started sounding really, really good … better than one had since Noveria. Noveria …
where Garrus told her he wanted to be with her, and she freaked out and nearly got them both frozen to death. Well … then she went into a terror spiral and drank enough to end up face down on a bathroom floor. Was that the sort of woman who should be marrying anyone?

She spun toward the door. "Sweet baby Jesus, where's Nihlus's bag. It'll have something in it."

Lunging after her, Anderson caught her by the shoulders. "Take a few deep breaths, this is Garrus we're talking about. You aren't being sold off to some robber baron." His deep, rumbling laugh rolled over her as warm as a hug. "You love Garrus, don't you?"

Heart still racing, head still reeling, Shepard drew in a long breath and nodded. "Yeah, I really do. Garrus and how much I love him isn't the problem. It's all the rest of it, Anderson. It's being married. Married for God's sake! It's Nihlus, and then … kids? What the hell am I going to do with kids?"

"Love them." He chuckled again. "You won't be doing it alone, kid. You have this huge family that adores you, and every last one of us will be right there with you, and Garrus, and Nihlus. Even for the kids."

After staring into her eyes, he seemed to see that he'd talked her heart rate back down and eased the whirlwind inside her head, and nodded. "I came in here to tell you that no father could be prouder of a daughter, or love one better … or be happier to see her find men who love her like yours do, because you deserve it, kid."

Pulling her into another hug, he said, "And I wanted to say that I know that your father is here, and that he's just as amazed by you and just sure that those two torins will never deserve you." He thrust himself back, all business as he released her and straightened his dress blues. "And just as sure that they'd better damned well spend their lives trying to."

Nodding as if that decided everything, he dusted down the front of his uniform again. "Okay, I'm going to use the facilities so I don't dance my way through the ceremony and then come back and take you down there whether you're ready to or not." He reached out and brushed her cheek. "The day I found you on Mindoir … that was my very best day."

Before she could force anything past the lump in her throat to reply, he spun on his heel and marched out the door. "You're unbelievably lucky, Jane Shepard," she whispered, her stare returning to the mirror, then past it to the chest of drawers. Pictures and mementos of family covered every millimetre of the surface. She grinned and reached out to stroke a fingertip along the mandible of a very awkward-looking, gangly young turian with a massive sniper rifle angled against his shoulder.

The batarian slavers stole her family. Yeah, she'd been sixteen, so would have been moving on in a couple of years anyway, but … . She sighed, long and low. Maybe it didn't make any sense, but that day, they'd stolen more than just the years to come. They'd also stolen the years that came before. They'd stolen trust, and innocence, and belief … the belief that tragedy didn't come as a multiple of the good that preceded it … the belief in a just and kind universe … the belief that someone loving kept watch and carried one through hard times.

Is that why you're so afraid? It's not about driving them away or being afraid of commitment and kids. You think that all the good Garrus and Nihlus bring into your life—the love and security—just means something so much worse coming?

She pulled her hand back from the picture.
A soft rustling drifted in from the open window. She turned into the breeze that carried the sound, drawing in a long breath of the sweet, spicy tang of the still-blooming rylamia. The sun had sunk far enough that the cliffs cast their shadow over the house. She hadn't wanted the ceremony to take place under the thick protection of the tarp, so they'd planned it to take place in the late afternoon shadows. Once the party started, the tarp would roll back out to protect the fragile human guests, but Shepard would bind her life to Garrus's with the sky gleaming deep blue overhead.

The rustling became more pronounced, definitely too loud to be bird analogues in the trees beneath her window. Branches snapped, and then a skeleton-like, three taloned hand grasped the window sill. Heart leaping into her throat, her entire body washed with adrenaline. Suddenly the rylamia bit at the inside of her nose, and the wind prickled against her skin, every hair reacting. She tensed, crouching a little as the metal-plated face of one of the turian husks appeared, coming in alongside the hand. It must have climbed across from the cliff, or down from above.

"Do not fear," the thing said, its voice low and garbled as organic tones escaped an electronic voice box. "Talk."

Shepard backed toward the dresser and her sidearm, her heart slowing as her muscles coiled, ready to spring. "Then talk."

It climbed the rest of the way in, slipping silently onto the floor. Damn, so much for it making enough noise to alert the others. She'd have to call out to get any help, which meant going it alone. A tight snarl curled one corner of her mouth. It didn't stand a chance, and if its puppetmaster did want to talk, she might get a chance to learn something about the shadows orchestrating the damned war.

"The echoes possess what is needed to complete a viable Catalyst," the thing said, it's voice a low, grating noise, but becoming more understandable as it continued. "They must not succeed."

Shepard's heel smacked into the bottom edge of the chest of drawers, the skin letting out a yelp that she dismissed as quickly as it appeared. She reached for her sidearm. The thing didn't look armed, but she didn't intend to take any chances. She was wearing her damned wedding dress, and her verro-to-be was not going to find her lying on the floor bleeding out in it. No fucking way. Heart pounding strong and angry, eyes riveted to the monstrosity, she groped along the wood.

"What are the echoes?" she demanded. "Who am I speaking to through this thing?" She swallowed, forcing her brain from reaction mode into logic mode. "Stop with the esoteric bullshit. I'm not in your little cryptic, mystery mind control club, so just talk to me." Her hand closed around the pistol's grip. "Are you a Reaper? Like Sovereign?"

The turian husk backed toward the window. "They are only echoes. We existed long before."

Advancing on the thing, she kept the pistol by her side, ready but not wanting to scare it off. "So what does that make you then?" A light sparked in the back of her head. "Oh! You're the suzerain." One eyebrow began a pilgrimage for her hairline. "I've got that right, don't I? You're the ones who enslaved the chia?"

"The echoes discovered what they need in the suum." The husk stopped at the open window. "If the empty ones, the ones you call Collectors, complete the Catalyst, the echoes will begin the Crucible. If they complete the Crucible, they will destroy all life."

Finally, something almost like an answer. Shepard closed the distance a couple of steps, the floor suddenly chill beneath her barefeet. "So, the echoes are the Reapers?" She nodded, speaking out loud more for herself anyway. "And they're building a new Vanguard, right? That's what you mean by the Catalyst? They're taking the colonists and turning them into a new Reaper?"

"Yes, but not the Vanguard. Sovereign failed. The Catalyst is the culmination of all cycles. It is the answer to the question."

Shepard felt the room tilt hard to starboard. One arm snapped out, reaching for the bedframe, her pistol rattling off the wood as she steadied herself. "They've figured it out?" Recovering at FTL, she rushed the husk, bare feet squeaking to a halt when it moved to jump out the window. "No, wait. Don't go. I need answers to fight them. Have they discovered a way for a Reaper to have a soul?"

The husk began to twitch, its limbs jerking as if varren had taken hold on all four limbs, each fighting to get it away from the others.

No! No, no, no. She needed more answers. "Are you creating these abominations? If you're working against the Reapers—fighting them—why not just contact me directly?"

"It is not our time. We use the tools of the echoes. Domination failing." The turian husk staggered, but then straightened. It let out a stream of growled jibberish that sounded a lot like Garrus cursing when he stubbed a talon, then turned and leaped out the window.

"Fuck!" Shepard's pulse kicked back into overdrive as she raced to the window and leaned out. The turian husk scrambled down through the branches and vines of the tree next to her window. She hesitated, looking back over her shoulder toward the door. The husk might be able to lead her to the Collector base. Damn. Looking down, she saw that the thing had nearly reached the ground. She didn't have time to go the sane path and get backup.

"Fuck!" She gathered up her skirt and climbed up onto the window sill. Ducking out, she reached over for the tree, catching hold of a thick vine of some symbiotic plant. Hand over hand, feet braking her a little, she clambered down. Chasing after the damned thing amounted to madness. Anderson would return to get her and find an empty room.

She heard the machine hit the ground, a mechanical roll of sound chattering from its mouth as it took off running. Damn it, the thing was going to get away. Throwing caution to the wind, she let go, dropping the last three metres to the ground.

Shepard's ankles let out a holler as they hit the lawn, one rolling a little. Pulling just about every muscle she owned, she managed to hit on all fours, and avoid falling. Grabbing the long, back ruffles of her dress, she pulled them up between her legs, tucking them into her belt even as she took off toward the back fence.

"Shepard?" Martin called from the back doors. "Shepard, where … ?"

The husk jumped up onto a boulder, then hurdled the fence. Taking a deep breath and offering the Enkindlers her most heartfelt prayer for coordination and dress preservation, Shepard gathered herself into the leap and followed.

"Garrus," she heard Martin shout, "your bride is making a break for it!"

(A-N: What is this? An update already? Yup ... They're talking to me, so keeping my fingers crossed that they keep it up. Thanks for your support! hugs )
"Holy blessed Enkindlers shitting in their glowing panties," she said, the words barely hissing out between her teeth. "That's ... kilometres worth of stasis units. Hundreds of thousands of husks." Her gut dropped into her feet, growing just as cold and numb as those appendages. Once the tunnel reached the other side of the river, it honeycombed up through the cliff, hundreds of tunnels, thousands of chambers, all of them containing what looked to be about thirty stasis pods.

This isn't going to be an easy fix, Janey. Not like dropping the mountain on Thessia.

Quirte -- Applies to both genders equally. The equivalent of Mister or Miss, Missus.

Gloranumis - (feminine) One who holds a state of royalty or majesty. Ancient turian royal title.

Caris - Beloved, precious

52 Days ASR

Shepard stopped and activated her omnitool—thank the sweet baby Jesus that she hadn't taken it off yet—and checked the husk's position. It remained about two hundred metres ahead, moving steadily, but not quickly through the upper sewer tunnels. Letting out a sigh, she closed the scanner. At least it was sticking to the tunnels just beneath the streets rather than delving into the lower levels and their more questionable contents.

She froze, hearing something ... the sounds of running footsteps in the dank tunnel. Two sets, approaching her from behind. Damn. It would be nice to have backup, but did she dare wait for them? How long would explaining everything take? Would the husk escape beyond scanner range?

You can't risk losing the damned thing. Move!

Keeping low, she moved forward, dogging the muffled, quick splash echoing from the sewer ahead. She stayed on higher, drier ground, her feet really not happy about her lack of boots. The footsteps coming up behind her moved fast. Good. They could damn well chase her. Sounded like only two pursuers, and judging by the length of stride, they were either turian or Martin had brought his frame armour to the wedding.

The pale, schmung-covered lights along the roof of the sewer tunnel cast a wan, yellow light over the water flowing along the lowest portion of the brick floor. Definitely not a flattering effect as it turned everything the colour of—

Shit, it's just storm drain run-off. It's surface water from the rain last night. Stick to high ground and your feet will come through just fine.

The tunnel ended at a T junction, forcing Shepard to stop again. The husk's footsteps sounded as though they came from both directions. Damn. She hated to keep using her omnitool in the dim light, the orange glow carried too far. Activating the scanner, she saw that it had taken the tunnel to her left, but was quickly reaching the limit of her IFF scanner.

She took off down the left tunnel, sprinting to make up the distance. If she lost the husk, the entire mess amounted to nothing … no, worse than nothing, because thanks to Martin only seeing her go over the fence, everyone thought her some sort of runaway bride.

The echoes from behind closed in. She heard them stop, talking in low, deep, dual-toned voices. It wasn't Garrus or Nihlus. Maybe Herros, but she didn't think so. Who had Garrus invited? Maybe he called Internal Forces to help search? That was a call she'd love to overhear.

"Yes, I'd like to report a disappearance? Who? My dilan. Where was she last seen? Leaping over the back fence at our bonding ceremony. I'm sorry, quirte, we can't arrest her for cold feet."

She caught sight of the husk at the far end of a long, flat stretch of tunnel. It stopped and started as if still wrestling the override. Apparently, the suzerain wanted her to follow, and were trying to slow the thing down. Never one to turn down help when it appeared, she kept to the shadows, moving forward but slowing a little. If the Reapers knew she followed, the thing would probably self-destruct or charge her and blow up in her face.

Bloody shreds of Shepard and wedding dress. Another thing we don't want Garrus to find.

"Captain Shepard?" When the voice called her name, Shepard recognized it as belonging to Garrus's new friend, General Victus. She winced, frustration flaring as the husk whirled around, searching for the source of the sound. Again, it flailed, looking as though angry varren tried to tear it limb for limb. After a second of frantic back and forth, it took off.

"Sh," Shepard whispered behind her, hoping the echo carried it. Starting forward, she trusted the faster moving turians to catch her, and set as fast a pace as she dared on the wet stone. They caught up with her two tunnels later, after confirming her belief about omnitool light travelling really well in the low levels of light. Every time they activated their tools, the walls glowed brightly enough to be a clear tip off. Hopefully the suzerain kept the husk confused enough to lead her along the right path.

"Captain Shepard?" The call came in a low whisper from just a few metres behind her as she hesitated outside what looked like a solid section of the tunnel wall. Checking her omnitool confirmed that the husk had passed through the wall, but she couldn't see how.

Hand over hand, she felt her way down the wall, almost falling flat on her face when the wall stopped. Grinning she reached forward a half metre, coming in contact with another wall, a narrow passage hidden between them.

"That's one hell of an optical illusion," she whispered, edging her way forward. If someone didn't know the entrance was there, chances were that they'd never find it. Past the series of overlapping walls, all signs of turian public works disappeared. The light vanished along with the stone brick walls and finished, slip-resistant floors, leaving not even a wan, poopstain-yellow glow to break the black.

"Captain Shepard?" That call came louder and sounded more like angry boulders grinding together than Victus's smoky tone.

Glancing back, she held a finger to her lips, then focused ahead once again. Careful to avoid touching the walls in the narrow space, she pushed into the black, listening for the husk's footfalls. Cold emanated from the chiselled stone walls and floor, quickly making her feet numb. What stretched before her probably dated back as long as turians occupied the canyon.
She set out into the dark, never doubting that the turians would follow. One hand trailed along the wall to keep her oriented as she lifted into a jog, praying the floor didn't just quit on her. A pale light appeared, but from the tunnel at her back rather than a hopeful beacon ahead. She almost turned to hiss at them to turn it off, but they remained too far behind the husk for it to make much of a difference. Besides, it allowed her to move a whole lot faster. Grumbling under her breath, she let them have their flashlight.

The pair of turians caught up with her less than five minutes later. She didn't need to see Victus's companion to know who it was. Fedorian took up the entire tunnel, and not just with his sheer bulk, which remained poised like a landslide set to bury her, but his smell. Holy musky cologne or soap or … something, Batman. It would alert the husk before the light did. Wow. She breathed through her mouth, the tunnel far too snug for that much male.

It didn't help.

"Why are we chasing you through the sewers and now these old tunnels, Captain?" Victus asked, moving up beside her, able to walk and maintain her pace. Damn them and their long legs. "Aren't you supposed to be wrapping coillasi around someone's wrists right about now?"

She gave him her best imitation of a throaty little chuff. "I'd much rather be there than here, destroying my dress. One of the talking husks climbed in my window, said a bunch of cryptic crap, and leaped right back out. It didn't leave me time to explain where or why."

Victus stiffened, his entire posture suddenly lunging forward into the darkness. "It could be leading us back to its base." He covered part of the flashlight lens with a talon and aimed the light at the floor. "Not exactly good tunnel crawling attire," he said, the light skipping over to shine on her bare legs and feet. "There are some pretty aggressive animals that live down in tunnels like these. A lot of them bite, and a few sting."

Shepard sucked in a quick, sharp breath. "I think I was happier without that PSA, thanks, General." Suddenly the darkness seemed to be filled with eyes and teeth and stingers. But then … she'd just climbed right into the dark without thinking twice about it. She grinned, glancing back as if she needed to confirm it. She hadn't hesitated for a second. Huh, maybe she hadn't just lost her fear of dying.

A sharp black line appeared on the floor ahead of Victus's flashlight, and she reached out, grabbing his arm to stop him. "Really big drop off," she said, and crept forward, crouching to get a good look at it. "It's about four, maybe five metres."

Shepard straightened and looked from the lip of the drop to Victus and back, a combination of annoyance and amusement sending her eyebrows climbing her brow as he just stared back, completely clueless.

The turian general shrugged and leaned in to look down. "What? Go ahead."

"Seriously?" Gesturing toward the white, gauzy material gathered around her waist, she decided to spell it out for him. "White wedding dress and rolling around on tunnel floors do not go together, General." An incredulous laugh bubbled up as he continued to stare. Apparently it had been a very long time since he needed to perform any sort of gallant gesture. Of course, it might just be that he'd never crawled through the sewers with his bond-mate when she was wearing clothes she didn't want to spoil.

"Oh for the … . The husk is getting away." Fedorian stomped by, peeling off his suit jacket to a chorus of cursing that remained almost entirely subvocal. He threw the gorgeous emerald and black tussat silk down on the edge of the ledge and swept his arms toward the path ahead. "By all means, gloranumis, go ahead."

Grinning at Victus as the general clued in, she nodded to Fedorian. "Thank you, Primarch. Your sacrifice is appreciated." Shepard plunked down onto the fabric and flipped over onto her belly, hands held out for one of them to lower her down to where landing wouldn't shatter both ankles. That time, Victus took the hit, getting down on his belly before holding out his hands.

"Humans," he said, his mandibles twitching in an all too familiar manner, "so fragile."

Shepard grinned at the sparkle in his amber gaze, but didn't bother with a retort about how she could have done it in her armour. Instead, she grabbed hold of his talons and swung down, dropping once she hit the extent of his reach. She landed, her feet squelching into about fifteen centimetres of muck. "Dear sweet lord, jump out away from the base. It's a lot of sludge and … " She winced. "I don't even want to think about it."

"No, you don't." Victus landed a metre or so away, slipping a little before he gained his footing. He held out a hand, taking her fingers in a tight grip as he helped her wade from the muck.

Fedorian followed, his jacket draped over one arm. His omnitool flared bright orange for a second. "The husk is one hundred and eight metres ahead, and moving straight east." He frowned and shook his head. "It doesn't make sense. It's moving toward the river. That's a dead end."

"Unless the tunnel goes under the river." Shepard shrugged and whispered, "Well, we'll figure out what's going on when we get there." Shepard pushed on, her arms held out, trying to keep her balance on the slippery stone.

Sliding like a drunk space cow, she started down. "Oh crap, this is slick and steep, gentlemen. Hang onto your butts," she whispered over her shoulder. The floor angled down on a twenty degree slope. Why did she have to mention the tunnel going under the river? Genius. Well, at least the grade made for a detritus-free descent. Any and all crap just rolled downhill.

Concentrate, or in five seconds, you're going to be detritus rolling downhill.

Shepard clung to the wall, fingers digging into cracks in the stone, Victus now keeping vigil at her side in case of disaster. The torins' boots definitely gave them an advantage in the grip department. She stumbled on occasion, stubbing her frozen toes on the rock, or just taking a bad step because of the lack of sensation. Glancing down, she saw bright red leaking through the filth. Oh well, Chakwas would fix them up as good as new once she got out of the damned tunnels and home.

The path levelled out about twenty metres down and the three of them sped up to a quick jog to close the gap. Not that the husk had anywhere to go. The path continued in an almost straight line, no side tunnels along its length. Time lost meaning in the near darkness, but they must have covered at least two kilometres before a heavy hand thumped down on Shepard's shoulder, pulling her to a halt.

"Husk is fifty metres ahead," Fedorian whispered, right next to Shepard's ear. "It's slowed, and I'm reading a massive cluster of energy signatures." He slipped his omnitool between Shepard and Victus so she could see the ants' nest of energy signatures.

"Holy blessed Enkindlers shitting in their glowing panties," she said, the words barely hissing out between her teeth. "That's … kilometres worth of stasis units. Hundreds of thousands of husks." Her gut dropped into her feet, growing just as cold and numb as those appendages. Once the tunnel reached the other side of the river, it honeycombed up through the cliff, hundreds of tunnels, thousands of chambers, all of them containing what looked to be about thirty stasis pods.

This isn't going to be an easy fix, Janey. Not like dropping the mountain on Thessia.

No fucking kidding. She just shook her head and pressed on, the tunnel beginning a steep climb up to the first chamber. They climbed until her thighs burned and the soles of her feet began to feel as though they'd been worn clear away. Next to her, even Victus showed the rigours of the climb, letting out a low sigh of relief that matched her own when the path flattened out.

Light returned, slowly enough that she didn't realize it until a flash of white from her dress startled her. Still, she didn't see the edge of the pit until Victus reached out and yanked her back. She spun to glare at him, but then saw the massive hole in the floor. She breathed in, a hand reaching up to clap over her nose and mouth as the stench overrode Fedorian's cologne.

Shepard sucked the next breath in through her mouth, immediately regretting it. The sweet stink of decay coated her tongue, tweaking her gag reflex. Plucking Victus's flashlight from his hand, she crouched at the edge of the pit to shine it down onto a pile of dead bodies. "There are just …" Shaking her head, she glanced over at the general, unable to properly process what she was seeing. "... thousands of bodies. Maybe even hundreds of thousands. How do this many people disappear without anyone realizing?"

"Fifty thousand cycles," Victus replied, looking as sick as she'd ever seen a turian look. He straightened and nodded toward the path. "Let's keep moving. If these are just the cast offs and failures, a whole lot worse—"

Shepard sliced off the rest of the general's sentence with a sharp nod. Taking the narrow path, she skirted the pit. Another long climb awaited them, this one littered with bodies that had failed to roll all the way down. Most amounted to no more than a few bones scattered against the wall, but a couple hadn't been there more than a few days. Shepard choked down so many throatfuls of disgust and rage that her gut felt bloated with horror and death.

"How many crews of missing ships, how many family members who left home and never returned?" Fedorian asked, the demand furious and brittle, his thoughts and emotions clearly tracking a parallel course to her own. She glanced at his face, seeing there the helpless fury of a dedicated and passionate leader realizing that his people had been preyed upon for thousands of cycles. She reached out, gripping his arm, a gesture of understanding and solidarity, but he tore it from her grasp.

She took a deep breath and nodded, concentrating on the climb. Why would he accept anything from her? They didn't know one another. Victus, however, squeezed her shoulder, as if apologizing for the primarch. She smiled and nodded, grateful, but letting him know there was no need. They just needed to pack all their emotions down, find the damned stasis units, assess the threat and get the hell out.

A long shudder rolled up her back, the chilled muscles threatening to tie themselves into knots for a moment before they relaxed. God, she wished that Garrus and Nihlus had found her. Their presence always made facing the horror easier. Oh well, no point lamenting what she lacked, best to focus on what she had: two solid warriors followed at her back, and the light continued to get brighter until she could see clearly.

The tunnel floor evened out again, that time opening into a chamber, the walls lined with stasis units on both sides.

Fedorian strode past her to look in the nearest stasis unit. He scanned it then let out a low trill of sound unfamiliar to Shepard's experience. "This is one of our ancient ancestors. He's been in stasis for over thirty thousand cycles." Awe tinged his tone. "Spirits, just think … one day he left his clan's cave to hunt with the rest and never returned. His family and clan mourned him, and here he is.

"Turned into a nightmarish machine husk." Shepard walked to the end of the line of stasis units. A long, steep ramp descended to another layer and another small floor of stasis units, below that, more and more. "He's just as dead as if some big cat had eaten him." The silence crawled along her spine. She didn't hear a single sound other than the low hum of the stasis pods. Where were the Collectors? They wouldn't just abandon that much work. "This place is a massive maze. We can't just blow it like we did the cavern on Thessia."

Victus stepped up behind her, looking down over the floor below. He nodded and let out a sigh that sounded as exhausted and overwhelmed as she felt. "This is insane. How have they kept all this a secret for so long?"

"It's the entire history of our people, Adrien," Fedorian said, his voice filled with far too much wonder and far too little fear for Shepard's comfort. "It's a find of unimaginable importance."

Shepard whirled to face him, searching his face for signs of indoctrination. "This is a find of unimaginable danger, Primarch. If these discoveries of yours wake up, this entire city is dead or harvested within hours." She took a step toward him, trying to keep her tone even despite the acidic burn of panic that flooded her veins. "You've got to destroy every single one of them."

Fury flared in the violet depths of the primarch's eyes as he spun on her. "This is not Earth or any land belonging to humanity, Shepard. I'm Palaven's primarch, so watch who you're spitting orders at."

She backed away from him, not sure if what she saw was just arrogance or indoctrination. She held her hands out. "You see what the Reapers and Collectors have done to these people, Primarch. These are no longer even alive, let alone turian, sir." She glanced toward Victus, searching to see a glimmer of hope in his eyes. Garrus held a lot of faith in the general, but he knew the torin, he'd fought beside him. All she had to go on, there, under the cliffs and surrounded by enemies and the unknown, was her dilan's faith.

"Primarch … Fedorian … ," the general called, pulling the primarch's attention from Shepard, "you have sworn to protect the people of Palaven. You saw what Sovereign was, what it did … a single Reaper." Victus closed on Fedorian, apparently not liking the sort of 'wild animal being backed into a corner' look in the torin's eyes any more than Shepard did. "We don't have to decide what to do with them right here or now, but we do need to address this threat."

Fedorian took a breath and nodded, his shoulders falling into a far more relaxed position. "Where are the Collectors?" he asked, the question coming out as a demand. "You faced a great deal of resistance on Thessia, did you not?"

Shepard nodded. "A strong resistance, yes." She activated her omnitool. "And where has our husk friend gone? If he's still running, he could easily give our presence away." She backed up a couple of steps, dread closing in, a noose drawing tighter and tighter. "I'm going to go down a couple of levels, see if I can pick anything up on scans." She faced Fedorian until the primarch turned away from her to examine the stasis unit with the ancient turian encased inside. "They've been experimenting with your people for so long, and keeping them all."

Victus turned away from the primarch to follow her. "Wait for me. You don't even have a sidearm." He followed, an arm's length behind, as Shepard started down toward the first chamber.
The tunnel dropped for about ten metres into a room identical to the first. But the next one down opened into two tunnels, one leading them on, the other branching to the right.

"Which way?" Victus asked, shining his flashlight down one path and then the other. "Scan showing anything?" His rock solid energy began to change like a rubber band stretched to the point of where even the slightest breath sent shocks rocketing down its length.

Her scans showed nothing, not even the husk, although with the amount of energy the stasis pods gave off, the husk's signature could easily be camouflaged. Shepard shook her head, but tossed in a shrug to go along with it. Something crawling in her gut said that to see the base's true scope, they needed to take the right path.

She jerked her head that way, then set out, descending down yet another tunnel. "Let's mix it up a little."

"Why haven't we seen any Collectors?" the general asked, as if she'd suddenly come up with an answer, or just hadn't shared her thoughts with Fedorian.

"I don't know. Maybe because there was something about the asari that sparked the Reapers' interest. From what I got from the beacon, the protheans were preparing the asari to take a leadership role, whereas they just watched humans. Maybe the Reapers only consider humans and turians worthy of being footsoldiers, animals without real souls that offered them nothing."

He chuffed, the sound like a warm hand on the back of her neck. "I don't think I've ever been so grateful to be undervalued."

Shepard opened her mouth to agree, but then, at the bottom of the tunnel, instead of stepping into another enclosed chamber, she emerged onto a wide platform overlooking a massive cavern. Shepard staggered to a stop so suddenly that the general ran up her heel. She tried to look up, tried to look anywhere, but shock froze her in place. It had to be fifty metres across, rising storeys above their head and dropping twenty, maybe more storeys below them: the levels disappeared into the gloom. Ramps descended the outer wall in a spiral, linking together hundreds of chambers, each containing ... . She looked behind her to count the units ... twenty. So each of those open platforms contained twenty units.

"We've descended into buratrum," Victus whispered. "Good spirits preserve me." He walked to the edge and looked down.

Shepard just nodded, unable to get enough air in to force words out. When would the sheer scope of the Reapers' capabilities and capacity for creating nightmares stop surprising her? She turned to examine the stasis pods. The husks within looked very much like her guide. Modern turians with invasive metal and circuitry erupting through their bodies. In places it looked like armour, in others ... perverse tumours.

Making her way down the line toward the path that led to the next cluster, she forced herself to look into the mockery of eyes ... diodes and sensors where once bright blues or greens or golds had prompted smiles and tears. She lifted her hand to press against the glass, tears burning in the back of her throat at the opal wink of coillasi around the creature's wrist.

"And whose were you, then?" she whispered.

"Captain!"

She spun toward Victus's shout, catching a flash of movement from behind a stasis chamber, but didn't get turned around before whatever slammed into her. Arms like steel bands locked around her, pinning her arms to her sides as it bore her to the ground, aiming for the void at the center of the chamber. Digging her feet into the rock, Shepard shoved backwards, throwing her attacker off-balance.

The husk dragged her to the ground, and for one perfect second, Shepard saw Victus coil, lunging toward her. She strained against the arms holding her pinned, stretching her hand out to grasp the one the general extended toward her. His talons touched her fingertips, and then the husk clung to her jerked back, rolling her over its body. That one perfect second of salvation hung in the air as she tipped over the edge of the ramp down, and then her world turned into a maelstrom of crushing weight and rock smashing into elbows, shoulders, hips, knees, and head.

She saw the edge of the abyss coming through the maelstrom. Flailing even as they rolled, she finally broke one arm free as they reached the next platform down. Slapping her arm out, her fingers scrabbling at the stone, Shepard tried to catch a hold … any hold. A breath of relief blew through the frantic scramble as she halted their tumbling, but momentum … that implacable bitch grabbed hold and pulled both she and the husk toward that edge.

_Do you think there's water at the bottom? If it's a drop of say seventy metres or less, you might survive if there's water at the bottom. Just keep your legs straight and point your—_

"Shut up, Bunny." Twisting, writhing, she broke her second arm free and flipped over onto her belly, arms stretched out. Maybe friction could stop her.

The marauding damned husk slid over the edge first, its arms wrapped around her waist. The world slammed to a halt as she felt that lurch, the sudden haul of gravity without the support of floor. She clawed at the slick stone, keen slivers of pain stabbing under her fingernails as they peeled back. Slivers turned to knives at the cheese grater grinding of the stone against the wounds on her legs. And of all the fucking things … as her belly folded over the sharp lip of stone, she worried about the damage the marauder had done to her dress.

Her fucking dress. No, it wasn't the dress, it was Garrus finding her at the bottom of that hole in the tatters of that dress.

"Captain." Victus hit the ground, belly down, in front of her, and then blessedly strong talons wrapped around her wrists. "Grab hold, come on!"

She wrenched her arms within his grip, latching her fingers around his wrists, and with a spine-elongating jerk, the sliding stopped. Victus pulled her up even as she climbed his very fine suit, as irretrievably damaged as her dress. The husk clung to her, dragging her down almost as fast as she climbed.

"Grab my neck," Victus said, his words little more than a grunt. Heaving herself up that extra few, precious centimetres, Shepard got an arm around his neck and hung on for dear life. His hand free, he pulled his sidearm. Two shots rang out and the terrible weight dragging from Shepard's waist fell away.

"Okay," the general said, the words a sigh of relief, "up you come." Setting his pistol aside, he wrapped his arm around her and pulled her up.

When Shepard scrambled up to collapse on her side next to him, she let out a long, slow moan. "Ouch." It took a couple of seconds for her body to realize she was safe on solid ground, her heart pounding hard and fast, the adrenaline suddenly burning like ice in her veins, her entire body trembling with it.
He chuckled, then ran a gentle hand over her hair, his touch as tremulous as she felt. "That was far too close."

Shepard just nodded, lying sprawled there until the screaming eased back to whining, and her muscles stopped trembling. She sniffed, realizing that she'd given her nose a couple of good smacks when her mouth flooded with blood and mucus, thick and tasting of iron. She turned her head and spat, then flushed, embarrassed. A harsh chuckle greeted her worry about appearing crass.

Heavy footfalls ran down the ramp, sliding a little as the primarch braked at the bottom. "What in the pits … ?"

Shepard looked up and shook her head then collapsed back onto the stone. It felt so wonderfully cold against her cheek. "Long story, Primarch Fedorian. Long story." Letting out a long sigh, she tested her limbs, just sliding them over the floor, not ready to do anything crazy like lift them. They seemed mostly intact, abraded and bruised, but nothing broken. A nice development.

Victus sat up. "Are you all right?"

Complaining vocally the entire way, Shepard pushed herself up onto an elbow. "Yeah, just letting the adrenaline wear off before I try doing anything really radical, like standing."

When they both made it up into a sitting position, she swiped at the blood pouring down her face, grabbed hold of his cowl, and hauled him close enough to kiss his cheek. "Thank you, General."

"You're more than welcome, Captain." He pushed up onto his feet then reached down for her hands. "Come, let's get you back to your dilan. This place will keep until tomorrow. We know where to find them now."

"I've called in a battalion to sweep through, clear out any Collectors and secure the base," Fedorian told them and turned toward the path up.

Shepard grabbed hold of Victus's hands and clambered to her feet. She opened her mouth to say something to Fedorian … a warning maybe to beware of indoctrination, or to insist that he destroy them all, but then she just let out a long breath and shook her head. In the end, Fedorian was right. Palaven wasn't hers. She held no sway there, and if they mismanaged the site and got people killed, that responsibility lie with them.

"Don't worry," Victus said, wrapping an arm around her back to help her up the ramp. "This place will go up in flames, I promise you that."

Pressing her lips together, she nodded, believing him. Garrus's instincts about Adrien Victus had been right on the money. "I know you will," she replied, then groaned as she recalled the length of the road in. "Oh sweet baby Jesus, we have to walk all the way back. The Collectors have to design their dungeons better." She leaned into his support a little as her left ankle complained when she put weight on it. "They could learn a thing or two from Galaxy of Fantasy's level devs. They always have an exit at both ends of the dungeon."

Victus cocked a brow plate at her. "They're right about you," he said. "You're mad."

Shepard let out a weary breath, her nod a scant tremor. "Only on my good days, General."

Garrus, Nihlus, and Martin met them in the sewer tunnels, Garrus earning himself a big kiss when he knelt to wipe her feet clean and ease them into her boots. Still on one knee, he pulled her into a tight, almost frantic hug, not letting her go until she begged for mercy and the ability to take a full breath. As much as he tried to convince her to let him carry her, to rest her ankle, she insisted on walking all the way back.

"How long has it been?" she asked, as they emerged into the alley behind the Vakarian home. The sky above was full black, the moons both risen.

"Nine hours, Kahri." Garrus squeezed her tight against his side. "Next time, run through the house, screaming on your way out? Please?"

Shepard gave him a weary smile in response to the worry in his voice. "Okay, Callor. The next time our wedding is interrupted by suzerain-controlled turian husks, I promise, I'll do just that."

The domin wrapped around her, comforting, warm, and soft, as she stepped through the front door. She stopped, looking around at all the decorations and party preparations, an entire truckload of bricks tumbling down to bear her to the ground as she realized … she'd destroyed her wedding. She'd had one thing to do that morning, one person to avoid disappointing … and she'd disappointed him. Through the joy at her coming home, she could see it … the question that had been there ever since she came back.

Am I going to have to spend my entire life worrying that you're going to do something crazy and get yourself killed?

She swallowed the single brick that lodged in her throat and pulled away from Garrus's side, her eyes glancing at each of the faces staring at her, expectant and shocked. "I'm sorry, everyone," she whispered. Wrapping her fingers around Garrus's hand, she peeled his arm from her side and stepped out of his embrace. "I'm so sorry."

Bolting, she ran up the stairs, her untied boots flapping loose on her feet, one flying off as she reached the top and turned toward Garrus's room. She'd taken what should have been a beautiful day and in her usual, spectacularly insane fashion, completely trashed it. Garrus deserved so much better than a day of worry and racing around trying to find his scatter-brained dilan.

Heart feeling as though it bled out through a hundred holes, Shepard stripped off the shredded dress, leaving it puddled on the floor. She'd ruined everything, and for what? Victus promised to make sure that the husks were destroyed, but the fervour in Fedorian's eyes when he saw the ancient varieties … that fervour told her everything she needed to know about how dedicated the primarch would be to ensuring their disposal.

Picking the beaded belt off the end of the bed, she held it up between her hands, a vague sorrow greeting the lovely gold and cream design. "Well, at least you survived the nightmare." She flopped down on the side of the mattress and stared down at her feet. Despite Garrus cleaning them off, they still bore the marks of having travelled long and hard through more things she didn't want to think about. Small red patches marked the places where she'd worn away the skin or snagged them on the rock.

A soft knock drew her eyes and attention to the door. She winced as she saw all their eyes as she'd walked back into the house, all questions and disappointment and … . "Come in." Might as well get it over with and face the music.

The door opened and Trea stepped through, something draped over her arm. "May I come in? I had to sneak this past everyone downstairs, so I need to rest for a moment before attempting to get it past them all again."

"Of course." Shepard stood and gestured at the bed. "My bed of shame is open to all who need a place to rest from the madness."

Trea paused to look down at the remains of the dress. "Oh my, it didn't come through the adventure very well, did it?"

"It was doing all right until the husk tackled me and we rolled down twenty metres of ramp and then slid across a platform and over the edge." Scalding tears that felt as though they originated at the center of her heart forced their way up her throat into her sinuses, finally escaping out her eyes. "I ruined everything. I ... ." She dissolved into a puddle of misery.

Trea chuffed, the vocalization rumbling low with anger. "Stop it, now," she said, the words a sharp order. When Shepard looked up, startled out of her self-pity and remorse, the tarin softened her harshness with a smile. "You've ruined precisely one thing today." Her mandibles twitched in a cheeky smile as she nodded toward the pile of gauzy silk on the floor. "That poor, innocent dress."

Shepard nodded. "It's definitely dead, Jim." She smiled through her tears and shook her head at the confusion in Trea's eyes. "Sorry, obscure human reference." A sigh that felt as though it started in the weeping soles of her feet, whispered out, carrying a wave of exhaustion along with it. "Sorry ... again. I've reached the babbling nonsensically portion of the evening."

Trea strode over and ran a loving hand over Shepard's matted, filthy hair, then looked at her hand. "I shouldn't have done that for a few minutes." She chuckled and set down her burden on the bed, then reached for the tissues. Once she seemed satisfied that she'd cleaned away the filth, she picked up the bundle. After sorting it a little, she held up a simple, but gorgeous gown made of a creamy, shimmering material.

Shepard jumped up, looking from the dress to Trea's eyes and back. "Oh my goodness. It's beautiful," she whispered. The fabric begged her fingers to reach out and caress it, but she balled her hands into fists. She drew the line at ruining one dress per twenty-four hour period.

Trea smiled and laid it out on the far side of the bed. "Well, about the same time you leaped out of the tree, ran across the yard, and hurdled the fence, I had a feeling you might need a replacement for that poor, innocent victim of violence." She walked around the bed to sit on the side, patting the mattress next to her. "Sit down, Jane. Relax. Everything's going to be fine."

Shepard gripped the bedpost so hard her knuckles ached, tears streaming over her face. "Oh my," she whispered, swiping at her face as she stared down at the dress. "You made this?" She lowered herself onto the bed next to Trea, her entire body trembling. "For me?"

Trea held out her arms, folding Shepard into a hug that probably should have been awkward, but the emotion behind it transcended the mechanics and any social awkwardness. "I knew I'd done the right thing the second I saw you walk through the door. State of the dress or no, I'd never seen anyone look that sad or worried about disappointing everyone." She pulled back. "The fact it was Garrus you were worried about disappointing ... . I know my pahir wouldn't care if you were wearing a refuse sack, but anyone who loves my Betru that much deserves to feel as beautiful on the outside as she is on the inside."

Shepard pressed her lips together, fighting to get her emotions under control. "Thank you," she whispered, gripping Trea's talons in her hand. "It's amazing. I've never seen anything more beautiful outside of your pahirs." She sniffed, then turned, fumbling across the bed for the box of tissues. Chuckling self-consciously, she wiped her face. "He deserves a much better day than I've given him."

Trea shook her head. "You exposed a threat that would have destroyed this city within moments of being unleashed, and the rest of Palaven within short order." She pulled Shepard into another hug, one that settled the last waves that tossed the stormy sea inside the captain's gut. "I'd say you've given him a day he will never forget, and a pretty great one at that."

Slipping her arms around the tarin, Shepard clung to the slight, impossibly strong frame. "I love him so much, Trea. He's the rock solid center of me, and I can't imagine trying to do any of this without him." For a moment, she felt that cold, hard floor tumbling away under her. The whole adventure had come down to making sure Garrus didn't find her body in a variety of grisly manners.

"I don't know a lot about the future, but down there, I knew only one thing mattered. War; no war. Victory; defeat. None of it matters. I'll fight like hell to make sure we win, but I will do it because of them."

Trea pulled away, her hands wrapping around Shepard's. "Wait until you have babies. They have a power that's almost magical, and they'll pull the three of you tighter than you can even imagine now." Her mandibles flailed a little as they eased into a smile. "But for this moment, I suggest getting cleaned up. I'll go pour you a hot bath and find someone to help me fix you a meal that won't make you sorry you ate. We'll try the dress on, I'll pin it, and then finish the alterations for the morning. Tomorrow, we'll relax and spend your bonding day celebrating." She patted Shepard's hands and stood, then brushed the tears from Shepard's cheek. "Only happy tears allowed."

Shepard nodded and took a deep breath, her lips still trembling, the traitors. She stared at the beautiful dress laying out on the coverlet, tears burning in the corners of her eyes again. How had she created something so gorgeous, so intricate, in a day? And that Trea had done it for her ….

The door knocked again. Wondering how many times it would, and if they all intended to come in with her dressed in her undies, she chuckled and took a deep breath. She let out a long sigh of relief when Nihlus peeked through, and lifted a hand, stretching out to him. He shut the door, then hurried across the floor to pull her up into his arms, lifting her right off the floor.

"Are you all right?" he asked, whispering the words into her ear. One arm slipped down to support her, the other holding her tight against him.

"Yeah, I'm fine." She flung her arms around his neck. "How is everyone dealing with my adventure?" Nuzzling into the warmth of his neck, she relaxed, savouring the strong comfort of his arms around her.

"Garrus had everyone out on your heels within a couple of minutes. Mostly everyone was just confused when you jumped the fence and took off." Nihlus rested his head against hers. "But we knew there had to be something going on." Pulling away, he frowned. "We'd better get Dr. Chakwas to have a look at that nose before both your eyes go black."

Shepard pressed her palm against his cheek. "How was Garrus?" Nihlus shrugged, giving her the answer, but she pushed, staring at him until he let out a low grumble through his subvocals.

"You know Garrus. He wouldn't quit, pushed until Fedorian called and said they'd found you." He set her down, taking her bloodied fingers in his. "Look at you. Can't even get bonded without getting into a scrape." Gentle nuzzles felt like blessings against the broken skin. "When we do this, I'm taking you to a deserted beach, and strapping everyone into life vests, and probably packing bubbles as well. I'll build safety fence around the entire beach and probably install lifelines."

Shepard laughed. He nodded and nuzzled her lips. "Better."
More knuckles rapped against the door, but Trea stuck her head through. "Your bath is hot, caris. I'll bring food up when you're done."

"Thank you, Trea." Shepard drew Nihlus down for a kiss. "I'm going to suck all the heat out of that bath and then see you a little later, cikabeknai."

He nodded and slipped out the door.

Five minutes later, Shepard eased her way into the roasting hot water, a low whine of pain escaping between clenched teeth. Lovely, gentle wafts of fragrant steam billowed off the surface, but rather than stinging like hell as she'd feared, the herbs Trea added to the water actually soothed the pain, allowing Shepard to melt down into the tub's embrace. And what a tub. Made to allow turians to soak, four of her could have easily shared.

When a knuckle rapped against the bathroom door, she didn't need to guess who it was. "Come in, Callor." Happiness rushed through her when she looked up into his eyes, the reaction as strong as a hit of adrenaline, but warm, soothing, and a little giddy, where adrenaline bred only a sharp, frozen vigilance.

"How did you know it was me?" Garrus smiled and strode over to crouch beside the tub. "It could have been anyone." His talons lifted to rake through her hair, then caress her jawline, his hide rough, but his touch gentle and loving.

"When I'm in the bath?" She chuckled and closed her eyes, leaning into the contact. "Only a few would dare enter the realm of nekkid Shepard."

"So basically me and Wrex?" he said, the warm teasing so close that his breath curled around her ear.

"I'm not sure even Wrex is brave enough for that battlefield." A wide grin spread across her face as she tipped her head until her temple rested against his mandible. "Your mari, however, has seen me in my undies now, so it's not that big a stretch, and Karin, of course. She's clocked more nekkid Shepard hours than the rest of you combined." The grin tilted a little, a bemused hum sliding beneath it. "Huh, I think she might have a crush on me."

Garrus nuzzled her ear. "Or you're a disaster in small, humanoid form." He pulled away, releasing her to remove his tunic. "I don't trust you to keep your bath water to yourself, and this is my favorite suit," he said, mandibles flicking playfully. A moment later, he returned, his hand cradling her neck. "Keep sliding down. I'll wash your hair."

Shepard did as she was told and closed her eyes, able to immerse herself until only her nose remained above the water. One hand supporting her neck, Garrus raked the filth from her hair, then applied her shampoo and massaged it into a lather. She relaxed completely, letting herself float loose and lazy in the water, her every nerve focused on the glorious sensation of the water lapping against her skin, and the slow, sensual music of her Callor's talons on her scalp. Breathing long and deep of the floral and herb scents, she felt the day begin to fall away. All the craziness and pain began to melt into the steam. All of it, but for—

When he helped her sit back up, Shepard swept the hair off her face, then grasped both of his hands in hers, and stared up into his eyes. "I'm so sorry, Garrus," she said, scarcely louder than a whisper. "I really wanted today to be amazing, and then you spent the entire time worrying about crazy Shepard." Squeezing his talons, she shook her head, struggling to put words to how much she wanted to be sane and stable and worry-free for him.
Her torin saved her the trouble, letting out a sigh that sounded like it began in another life. "Kahri, my fears about losing you are just that, mine. They're my issue, not yours, and you never have to apologize for being who you are." Lifting her hands to his mouth, he nuzzled her bruised and peeled fingers. "I don't want my fear to change you. I fell in love with the woman who drove makos through thresher maws and picked fights with ambassadors and trash talked Reapers. I knew what I was getting into."

Shepard leaned in to rest her forehead against his. "I didn't come back the same, Garrus."

His brow brushing hers, he nodded, then drew back, retrieving a small, soft sponge and a container of pearlescent blue stuff that smelled like paradise in a jar. "We all change over time and with the punches life throws, but the woman hacking mechs and saving Blue Suns on Korlus … she was amazing, full of passion and fire and love." He worked the sponge into a lather and washed one arm and then the other.

"You weren't sure it was me at all in the beginning," she said, not sure where she intended to go down that path.

Garrus shook his head. "That's not true. I knew the moment I saw you. Everything after that was fear." He turned his attention to her back, sweeping the filth away with gentle strokes. "It felt easier to drive you away than face what it all meant … to face the risk again." He stilled, then he pressed a talon pad under her chin, turning her head until she looked into his eyes.

"I love you, Kahri. You, not some less crazy, more careful version. I want you to really hear me about this, not just nod and agree, but then spend the rest of our lives feeling as though you need to be someone else." He leaned in, kissing her softly. "You're my beautiful, brilliant, costly, precious light, and you're worth risking my heart a million times over." He kissed her again. "Do you understand me?"

Heart feeling too large to be able to beat properly within the cage of her ribs, Shepard sniffed back her tears, trying to bury them under a smile and 'I'm fine'. But then he shook his head, brushing away the slow tracks of emotion with his thumb. "All of you, even the tears. That's the deal, remember? Everything you are and everything that flows from you," he whispered, "I accept as part of me."

Shepard kissed him, wrapping an arm around his neck to pull him in. "And everything you are and everything that flows from you, I accept as part of me." Sliding around, she knelt, pulling him in. "Always."

(A-N: And the streak continues. Not sure I'll have another chapter for Monday ... might be a day or two later, but YAY for words! And adventures! Thank you ... all you glorious readers! baskets of Cadbury Mini Eggs)
Garrus took them out of the box and passed them over. A single glance at both his patrem and his fratrin, a deep breath, and he was ready. Nihlus leading the way, they descended to a chorus of whoops, compliments and well-wishes. As he passed through to the yard, he spoke to everyone, joking and snapping back with the wit, but it felt as if his entire attention was fixed on the closed door to his parent's bedroom.

He lost track of time as Martin and Kaidan stepped up to congratulate him and wish him good luck, but it couldn't have been more than five minutes before his mari appeared in the large glass door, her smile wide and bright. "She's ready. How about out here?"

Disignatus - Official who conducts traditional ceremonies.

Famila notas - The colony markings that turians wear on their faces.

Cohamentum - Dance of the elements. Performed during turian bonding ceremonies. How well the two bond-mates stay with one another and perform the dance despite never having danced it together prior is said to predict the longevity and success of their mating.

Harediarcha - The box of paraphernalia used in family ceremonies, passed down through the maternal line.

Mensacra - The short table and two stools used in traditional turian ceremonies such as the nadatatem and bonding ceremonies. The wood is rough and unfinished, but soaks up so much ink and is polished through centuries of care until they become singular works of art. Passed down through the paternal line.

53 Days ASR

Garrus awoke the next morning to a very early, very pale sunrise, and crunchy-feeling eyes. Blinking rapidly to try to clear away the dry blurriness, he checked his chrono and groaned. Twenty-seven hour days were hard enough to acclimatize to without waking at 0530. He yawned, stretching out until all his joints popped and his muscles threatened to cramp. Too early. He needed to go back to sleep.

Shepard stirred, her lips smacking softly as she shifted against his side, her bare skin creating a delicious friction against his plates. Careful not to wake her, Garrus turned over, curling around her a little, his head on the pillow just behind hers, her tousled hair silky against his face. After Shepard finished her bath, Dr. Chakwas had cared for her injuries, grumbling about the fact that the captain had worn away most of the soles of her feet and broken her nose yet again. His mari then served Shepard grilled cheese and canned soup, before they disappeared upstairs to do something that they insisted on keeping a secret.

Finally, after the rest of the family and friends retired to bed, he, Shepard, and Nihlus had been able to just sprawl along one of the couches and relax. Garrus spent the time too absorbed in the silky hair and smooth, sweet-scented skin of the woman lying curled in against his side to notice much of the movie. It involved a lot of things blowing up—he heard that much—that and Nihlus needing to explain most of the jokes and turian references.

But, in the end, it amounted to a wonderful, quiet first night as a family unit. Shepard cradled against Garrus, his arms wrapped around her, her legs draped over Nihlus's lap. A very good end to what had been a trying day.

"Why are you waking me up?" Shepard murmured, rolling over to snuggle in against him. She tucked her face in under his chin. A long, yawn interrupted her words. "It's not even really morning yet."

He wrapped his arms around her and closed his eyes. "I'm trying to go back to sleep. Everyone else won't be up for a couple hours yet." Inhaling a long breath of her warm, floral scent, he wriggled in a little closer. "I had a dream about you," he whispered.

"Oh?" She pulled away just far enough that he could focus on her eyes, the green barely visible through her heavy lids. "Was it sexy?"

Chuckling, he reached out to brush her hair off her face. "Well, it was about you, so naturally, it was sexy, but it didn't involve sex." He let his eyes drift closed again, his hand nestling into the curve of her neck. "I dreamed that we were getting bonded in a turian ceremony, and the adventure yesterday was the great hunt. Normally it's a hideth turram match, but we were all out in our clans, hunting down the turian marauders that dared interrupt the day." Fingers drawing lazy lines over her skin, he let out a long sigh. "Naturally, your clan came back victorious, and everyone kept talking about what a great omen it was for our life together."

Shepard remained silent so long that Garrus thought she'd fallen asleep, but then she said, "Tell me a story," voice soft, tone pleading.

He smiled, chuckling when she let out a smartass cackle. "What about, Kahri?" He didn't know if he'd make it very far into a story, but neither could he resist her request.

"Turian bonding ceremonies." She burrowed back in against his neck. "What are they like? You said they can take a few days?"

"Depends on how drunk everyone gets, but yes." He wrapped himself around her, savouring her warmth and softness. "The first morning, both families and all the guests gather for a morning feast held by the female's clan. After everyone has eaten, the disignatus calls up the pair being bonded and they declare their intention to bond. The disignatus asks who will support them, and the families and friends stand behind them to show that support."

Shepard hummed low and deep. "Might be sad for those who don't have many relatives."

Garrus shook his head. "Usually their friends and family make sure that the number on both sides is pretty even. It's supposed to be a happy occasion" He paused, reaching up to rub one eye, the lid feeling dry and stuck to his eyeball. "Then there is the great hunt … a hideth turram match with both clans competing. Afterward, everyone gets cleaned up, patched up, healed up, and rested for the testimonial feast that night."

"Patched and healed?" Soft puffs of air caressed his skin. "They're drawing blood during their wedding?"
"It's supposed to be good luck for both partners to spill a little blood," he whispered, pressing his mouth against the top of her head. "That's what being bonded and having a family is about, right? It all comes back to blood." After stifling a yawn, he nuzzled her hair. "Now, shush." Grinning when she grumbled, Garrus continued, "The testimonial feast is put on by both families, symbolizing a prosperous hunt and sharing resources."

"I love that. Everything is about the combined families, not just the two bond-mates." Shepard reached around her to take his hand, then held it between them, their fingers laced. "Doesn't get much more blended than our clans." She wriggled a little. "Sorry, I'll shush."

"During the testimonial feast," Garrus said, "the guests tell stories about the bond-mates. Once the stories were meant to impress the other clan about how solid and useful a clan member they were inheriting, but these days, they're mostly just meant to embarrass everyone."

"I can just imagine the stories people would say about me," she said, and he thought her tone sounded sad. She pulled away and looked into his eyes, her brow furrowed with worry. "We have good stories, though, don't we?"

Garrus lifted himself up onto his elbow, leaning over her. "All the best stories have good and bad in them, Kahri, and we have some of the very best stories. We've fought krogan battlemasters and been trapped in exploding volcanoes, and kissed for the first time under an avalanche." He leaned in to nuzzle her lips, his heart straining against the impossibly tight bars of his ribcage. "And when you add up all those stories, you have our story, all three of us, and a love that pulled us through nearly two cycles." He paused, melting into her kiss as she pressed her soft lips against the top plate of his mouth.

Shepard pushed him away, then back onto the mattress, leaning over him to look down into his eyes. "Do you want to include some of the turian customs, Callor?" She pressed a soft kiss against the end of his nose.

Reaching up, he drew a line across the bridge of her nose with the pad of his index finger. "I have to say, watching my parents trace our familia notas on your face has a certain appeal." A slight frown dropped his mandible. "It would dye your face blue for a while, though."

And then his Kahri smiled, wide and genuine and more beautiful than the sun, and again his heart railed about the confines of his chest. "I think I'd look spectacular in blue." She kissed him then nestled in, half draped over him. "What else?"

Garrus let his eyes drift closed. "Well, there is a gifting, and dancing, and … ." He let the sentence die. The cohamentum. No, it wasn't fair to even mention it. Shepard hadn't had an entire lifetime to prepare. "And then our family and friends wish us well as we retire to take care of the private parts of the ceremony."

Shepard nuzzled under his jaw. "Are they sexy parts?" Her laugh rang brightly, filling the room with joy as he rumbled and nipped her shoulder. She pushed herself up, leaning with her forearms braced against the plates of his chest. "Let's do it. We don't have days and days, but let's bring as much of the turian ceremony in as we can."

Garrus lifted his arms up behind his head, watching her under eyelids that still insisted on another hour or two of being blessedly closed. "Well, when the rest of the house wakes up, we'll talk to Mari and Pari, and see what they can come up with. Okay?"

Shepard threw her leg over him and straddled his waist, the muscles along the insides of her thighs playing against his sides. The pressure behind his plates upped from inconvenient to maddening as she stretched out along his torso so her breasts just brushed his hide on either side of his keel. A wicked little smile played over her lips as she swayed just enough for the silk-soft skin of her hardening nipples to tease his plates.

Needing to feel the hot, wetness of that mouth on his, he leaned up to try to capture them, but she ducked back, less than a centimetre out of reach.

She grinned, the pink tip of her tongue darting out to skate across her top lip, leaving it shining. "Okay," she replied at last. Her smile broadened as he moaned with longing, his hips lifting into her as his plates loosened. "Oh, now what's this I feel?" she asked, wiggling a little so that her sex moved his plates. "I thought you were tired."

Garrus held his mandibles tight against his face, willing to play her game. "I am. It's going to be a big day, we should probably both get some more sleep." Lowering one arm, he stroked his fingers through her hair. Shepard sat up, and captured his hand in hers, lacing her fingers through his. "Yeah, we should probably sleep." Lifting his hand to her mouth, she kissed the pads of each talon, before slipping his first digit into her mouth. Brows lifted, she watched him with a predator's smirk, searching for the slightest reaction to her teasing. Immersing the talon just past the first knuckle, she stroked the digit a little with the point of her tongue before pressing it around him, soft and so damned delicious in its fleshy strength.

He swallowed a moan that settled in the center of his chest like a rock formed of molten need and clenched his teeth, determined to cling to the charade despite the fact that sleep had lost any allure.

Sucking strongly on his talon, Shepard withdrew, dragging the pad over the flats of her teeth. "That's a shame." Leaning down over him again, she reached up, tracing the pattern of his familia notas. "Do you know how much I love you, General Garrus Vakarian?"

Lifting her with his hips, her weight still as surprisingly light as it was the first time, he shifted up the bed until he reclined against his pillows. He smiled, knowing she'd be able to feel how hard his heart thundered as it shoved his blood through his veins, and answered her with a slight nod. He opened his mouth to speak, but she silenced him with the soft pressure of her fingers. His eyes drank her in, the soft new light bathing her hair and skin in a creamy glow. The moment froze, suddenly seeming too perfect, too beautiful. A chill ran down his spine dragging him back to the dark, freezing prison beneath the surface of Haestrom.

"I quite literally can't imagine how I managed to exist before you," Shepard whispered, leaning in to replace her fingers with her lips. Her words and kiss pulled him back from that darkness, dispelling the chill and easing him back into the watercolour glow of morning.

As she kissed him, all floral samite and sweet, maddening suction, her lips and tongue making love to him, he pulled her in tight, trying to form the embrace into some perfect expression of his emotions. An effort doomed to fail, he'd nonetheless never stop making the attempt.

She lifted off his plates a little, and whispered against his mouth, "I want to feel you inside me."

Letting out a long, low subvocal of adoration and longing, he loosed his control. His head rolled back, entire body straining up into Shepard as her cool, gentle fingers wrapped around him, guiding him into place. As much as they had joked about 'his spot' their first night together, as he slipped into her, he knew that it was exactly that. Odd maybe, to think that someone of another species had been made to fit him perfectly. Still, as his hands skated up her sides and around her back to pull her back in and she moved around him, he just knew that he'd found the one.
Garrus helped his mother down onto the low stool on the living room floor. Trying to talk his fiercely traditional mari out of using the mensacra had proven useless. "Do you remember how to make the ink after all this time, Betru?" she teased, a smile snapping at him from her eyes.

He offered Shepard a hand to help her sit on the stool opposite his mari, then seated himself cross-legged on the floor next to the low table. "I think I recall. It hasn't been that long since I last sat where Kahri is and Pari told me how to prepare it." He turned toward Shepard's quizzical, raised eyebrows. "When we're eight, we choose whether we want to take the familia notas of our mari or pari or birthplace."

Shepard curiosity melted into a frown. "Your mari and pari both have the same."

Chuckling, he set the harediarcha on the table and opened the lid. "Made the choice nice and simple." With precision, he set out the small mortar and pestle, and the clay jar of oil that formed the base of the ink. He wrapped his talons around the cylinder of dry pigment, but turned to his mari before he whacked off a chunk and started the process. "Do we have herbs for the tables at breakfast?"

Reaching out for Shepard's hand, he wrapped his talons around her fingers, finding them cold. "It's tradition to place a centerpiece in the middle of the table at the testimonial supper. It supplies a variety of herbs."

"Mix the ink, or it'll be lunch before we get this done," his mari said, her grin stealing any sting out of the words. "I'll explain." She took Shepard's hands in hers. Garrus did as he was told, breaking off the pigment, then grinding it into a fine powder as he listened to his mari speak.

"Your guests choose from the herbs, adding to the center bowl, one pinch of the herb that they feel represents you as you are, then one that represents what they wish for your future. After the meal, the herbs are collected, crushed, and added to oil that you use in the more intimate part of the ceremony."

Shepard perked up. "Oooo, the sexy parts." A wicked chuckle escaped when Garrus arched a brow plate at her.

Instead of commenting, he added oil to the powder two drops at a time until the ink reached paintable consistency but wouldn't run.

His mother dipped a talon in it and nodded. "Very good."

Garrus placed the short-bristled outlining brush next to Trea, then looked to her in concern when she stared at it rather than picking it up. "Mari?"

When she lifted the brush, Garrus saw the reason for her concern. His heart shattered, the shards tumbling into his gut as he watched her hand jerking wildly with tremors. He braced his elbow against the table, and cupped his talons, angling them to the correct height. "Will this help?"

Trea rested her hand in his, the motion not abating entirely, but definitely enough for the task. She smiled. "Thank you, Betru." Turning to Shepard, she said, "Lean in, caris, the shorter my reach, the better."

Shepard took his mari's hand in both of hers and leaned in to press a kiss against the trembling talons before she lowered her arms to brace herself. "I can lean in as close as you need."

Dotting in the key points for the markings took his matrula less than five minutes once she started, and fell into the familiar task. Spirits, she must have redone his fifty times over the cycles. Feeling confidence reduce her tremor down to almost nothing helped piece his heart back together. Shepard had been right their last visit: the best thing for his matrula was to keep busy and feel useful.

"There," Trea said, a broad smile greeting her handiwork. "Beautiful, even if you do look as though you have a bad case of blue freckles." She leaned in to touch her brow to Shepard's. "Welcome to our family, my lovely *filiam."

Garrus pushed himself up off the floor, carefully lifting his mari to her feet and holding onto her until she stood solidly balanced. Grinning, he looked down at Shepard, then nodded to the passage into the caman. Outside the doors to the garden, Lucille, Bunny, and the crews of both ships stood clustered, trying to watch.

Shepard turned, then glanced up at him. "Does it matter if they watch?"

"No," he waved them in. "Come and sit down before you break the glass." He wouldn't have wanted their presence to add more pressure for his mari, but he knew Herros wouldn't flinch having to perform for an audience.

Shepard held her hand out, snagging Nihlus's as he stepped past her. "Sit with me?"

Garrus appreciated the consideration behind the glance that his fratrin sent his way, but hated that Nihlus felt the need to seek his approval. Hopefully, once she wore both of their coillasi, Nihlus would feel just as entitled to show affection and ask for Shepard's time. Garrus nodded and then sat back in his position beside the table.

Nihlus settled so that Shepard's stool sat between his legs, then leaned in, wrapping his arms around her waist. When he rested his chin on her shoulder, she grinned and turned to kiss him. "Don't smear me dots, buster."

He just rolled his eyes and shook his head. "Excellent command of your native language, there."

"Ready for me?" Herros asked, entering the room, one arm supporting Trea, holding her against his side. The hierarch sat his bond-mate down at the end of one of the couches, then assigned Joker and Kaidan to making sure everyone got fruit juice, coffee, tea, or amarceru to drink.

Satisfied his guests were taken care of, Herros seated himself across the table from Shepard. It took him only a few moments to fill in Shepard's dots, leaving outlined markings that Garrus knew he would fill in with far less assurance and skill after he and Shepard spoke their pledges that afternoon.

As Garrus watched his parents preparing his dilan for their bonding, he once again felt the strange dissonance between the life before his eyes and reality, as if something pulled them away from one another. Pressing his eyes closed, he focused on the knowledge that he'd climbed out of that darkness. He survived.

Soft fingers wrapped around his hand, squeezing tight. "Callor?" Shepard whispered. "What's wrong?"

Despite opening his mouth to answer, he couldn't bridge the distance between, the cold holding him just outside her gravity and warmth.

Then her arms slipped around his neck, her cheek pressed to his, her breath warm against his hide. "I'm here," she whispered. "We're both here. Maybe not entirely whole, but both most definitely here."
He pulled his dilan into his arms, fitting her in against him as she dispelled the cold once again, pulling him into his body and anchoring him there. Strong talons wrapped around his other hand, and he opened his eyes to see Nihlus kneeling beside him. His fratrin smiled, one brow plate cocked, a low subvocal susurrus asking if he was okay. Garrus nodded, then looked over at the empty couches.

"Did everyone go to breakfast?" he asked, keeping his voice soft.

Shepard snuggled in, letting out a loud, contented sigh. "Yes. Joker just asked which of the herbs represents cranky lunatic." She chuckled and kissed the wing of his mandible. "Should we go make sure none of them get into trouble?"

"In a minute." He leaned into her embrace. "I'm good right here for the moment."

"Sweet baby Jesus, Vakarian, if I'd known that getting hitched would turn you into such a huge sap …." She let out a deep, aggrieved sigh. "I don't know, I might not have agreed to this whole thing."

Letting out a low growl, Garrus clambered to his feet, swinging her over his shoulder once he was up and balanced. "Impossible woman." Smacking her backside to still her half-hearted, giggling protests, he hauled her out into the yard to join their guests for breakfast.

"Has anyone seen my dilan?" Garrus called from the bottom of the stairs. "And why is the door to the side garden locked?"

"Pari kidnapped her," Sol grumbled, leaning down over the armilateria board, her fist digging into the underside of her jaw as she scowled with concentration. Nihlus must have been presenting a challenge because the sleeves on her fancy copper and emerald tunic were rolled up past her elbows, a sure sign of trouble.

Nihlus made a move, then looked up and shrugged. "After lunch, Jane pulled Pari aside, they had a short, intense discussion, and then disappeared, probably into the side garden since everyone else is accounted for." He smiled. "Don't worry, they'll be back out in plenty of time. She hasn't run off again."

"Hey, senux, eyes and mind on the board," Sol snapped. "I could have cheated in twenty three separate ways while your head was turned." She cackled. "Luckily for you, I only took advantage of three."

Nihlus sorted the tiles. "Don't even try to pull that crap with me, inluvis. I'm wise to your ways, and you took advantage of five, in fact." He moved another two pieces. "I was going to let you get away with those until you lied."

Garrus looked around. "Where's Mari?" Frustration and worry tugged at him, begging him to give in. That fact that he found solace in worry and staying busy didn't bode well for things like trying to raise a family, or just find peace and rest in his relationship with Shepard.

"She's in her studio working on something top secret," Sol answered, then cussed, slapping a tile down as if she hope the sheer impact would take out some of Nihlus's units. "Go play basketball with the crew. I'm going to join in as soon as I finish obliterating Nihlus's artillery."

Nihlus chuckled. "Good luck, because it just obliterated you. Farewell fourth and fifth infantry brigades. Your sad, ignoble deaths will be remembered and used as ammunition for all occasions." He turned back to Garrus. "And don't listen to her, you don't have time to get all grimy; you need to get dressed."
Garrus checked his chrono. Forty-five minutes until Anderson was due to hear their pledges. "Yeah, I'll head up. You coming?"

"Right behind you." Nihlus stood, then bent to touch his brow to Sol's before turning and fleeing for the upstairs while Sol remained stuck in silent rage. Smart move. Garrus knew that once things got vocal, the Spectre might never escape.

Shepard met him halfway up the stairs, her hair matted to a sweat-streaked forehead, t-shirt soaked and plastered to her body. Greeting his concern with a bright smile, she stood on her toes and kissed him, the contact rushed and leaving him trying to follow her to kiss properly. Instead, she pushed him away. "Sorry, I'd hug all up on you, but I'm stinky and disgusting."

He blocked her when she attempted to squeeze past, his stare trying to capture hers. "Where have you been?" Grasping her upper arms, he managed to keep her from bolting. "What's going on?"

Letting out a soft sigh, she met his stare. "There's nothing going on, Garrus. Pari and I were just sparring, and I'm not used to the heat and humidity after climate controlled ships and space stations." He allowed her to tug free of his grip, squeezing her fingers when she took his hands in hers and smiled up into his confusion and worry. She was leaving something out, but what could it possibly be?

"I'm fine, Callor. I'm sorry if you were worried, I just wanted to talk to Pari for a bit, and then that turned into the workout from hell." She stood on tiptoe, waiting, until he bent down to kiss her. "Just ignore the fact he didn't even break a sweat." Another kiss brushed his upper mouth plate. "And now, I have forty minutes to shower and get dressed."

Garrus released her and stepped out of her path, watching as she kissed Nihlus, and then hurried across the living room to his parent's bedroom.

"Come on, let's go," Nihlus said, giving him a shove from behind. "If we don't get moving, she'll be standing there, waiting for you."

Garrus nodded, numb with the unfamiliar feeling of not knowing what Shepard had been doing. It didn't make sense. They trusted one another with everything.

"Garrus."

He stopped one step down and looked up at Herros. "Pari." He took a breath and opened his mouth, needing to know why Shepard wasn't telling him the whole truth, but his patrem shook his head, silencing him.

"Go get dressed." Herros smiled and reached out to grasp the back of Garrus's neck. "You trust the woman you're taking as your bond-mate, don't you?" His brow plates rose when Garrus choked on the answer. Of course he did, but—"If you trust her, act like it, and go get dressed, or are you going to tell me that you believe she'd do something to deliberately hurt you?" Herros pulled him into a tight, almost painful embrace. "Go get dressed before you stain what's been a perfect day, and hurt her feelings."

Put like that ... Garrus pulled back, meeting his pari's stare with a tight nod, and brushed past. Cold feet? Was that what it was? He hesitated, wanting to run down and apologize. Of course he trusted Kahri. Of course he did. The night before, Shepard had told him about her moments of panic before their husk visitor arrived. Cold feet, she called it. That's all it was: nerves.

"Keep moving, General," Nihlus said and chuckled. "You can apologize for your moment of idiocy later." He set his hands against Garrus's cowl and pushed him into his bedroom, shutting the door behind them. "You're just nervous. It'll all be fine once you look into her eyes, and the way she looks at you washes all the moron away."

Garrus chuckled and turned to embrace his fratrin. "She does seem to have done a respectable job of clearing away all your moron."

Nihlus shrugged and turned to where his suit hung on the back of the door. "Jane does her best. It's not her fault that there's just so much of it to wade through."

A half hour later, Garrus took a deep breath and nodded at the image of the two of them standing side by side. "Not bad for a couple of washouts." He gripped Nihlus's elbow. "Thank you for being here for me the last couple of cycles." A soft chuckle answered Nihlus when the Spectre shook his head, Garrus knowing they were both recalling those first, turbulent weeks on the Normandy.

"A rough start," Nihlus said, "but I couldn't ask for a better fratrin, or for a family who care more. Thank you for bringing me into the madness." He laughed, sharp and self-effacing. "Listen to us, you'd think one or both of us was dying, not taking the most incredible female in the galaxy as his bond-mate." He turned and punched Garrus in the shoulder. "When I do this in a couple of months, promise me, no heartfelt fratrin to fratrin talks."

Garrus laughed and grasped the Spectre's shoulders. "No promises. It's going to be a great day, and I might need to mark it with a speech or two."

Nihlus grinned and tipped his head toward the door. "Ready?"

They both turned toward the door as it opened. "Not quite yet," Herros said, knocking on the door even as he stuck his head through. "You're missing a key ingredient in your wardrobe." He entered and shut the door, a black robe draped over his arm that Garrus knew all too well. Turning back, their pari held up the family bonding robe. It went back more than fifty generations, the story of how each bearer had met his mate embroidered into the material.

"Both of my pahirs will wear this when they take their dilan's hand and pledge themselves to her," he said, stepping up behind Garrus. He draped it over Garrus's shoulders, settling it around his cowl, then held out his hand. "Where are your *coillasi'?"

Garrus fetched them out of the harediarcha and passed them over, his mandibles spreading in a ridiculously huge smile as his pari fastened the front panels of the robe with the shell-chains that he'd fasten around Shepard's wrists later that night.

Nihlus chuckled, and Garrus reached out, punching his shoulder. "Just wait until he's fastening them on you. Trust me, it's a stupid grin worthy moment."

Nihlus rumbled his subvocals, a sound of connection, and surprise, and love that turned Herros around.

Their pari embraced Nihlus, pulling him in to touch brows. "You're my pahir. Stop forgetting what that means." Herros released Nihlus when the Spectre nodded, then returned to embrace Garrus. "I'm proud of the torins you both are, and you couldn't have chosen better." He laughed, the chuckles coming out a little bit evil. "The three of you deserve each other, and I'll leave what that means to your imaginations." He bumped Garrus's brow. "All right, let's get down there. You don't want to keep your Kahri waiting."

Herros made it two steps toward the door, before he turned back. "Oh, I need Jane's coillasi as Garrus took them out of the box and passed them over. A single glance at both his patrem and his fratrin, a deep breath, and he was ready. Nihlus leading the way, they descended to a chorus of whoops, compliments and well-wishes. As he passed through to the yard, he spoke to everyone, joking and snapping back with the wit, but it felt as if his entire attention was fixed on the closed door to his parent's bedroom.

He lost track of time as Martin and Kaidan stepped up to congratulate him and wish him good luck, but it couldn't have been more than five minutes before his mari appeared in the large glass door, her smile wide and bright. "She's ready. How about out here?"

Garrus just nodded, letting Nihlus guide him into his spot next to the small pond, under the canopy of massive ferns. Suddenly, the air didn't contain enough oxygen, and he reached up to unhook his collar. Nihlus caught his hand, his fratrin's warm chuckle convincing the elcor sitting on his chest to ease off a little.

A moment later, a vision appeared in the doorway, her arm threaded through Anderson's, the captain beaming with joyful pride. Garrus staggered a little as Shepard stepped toward him, loose waves of ivory tussat silk rippling around her legs; tiny, bare feet peeked out between the loose folds, a delicate anklet of rylamia hugging her ankle to match the spray in her hair.

His mari's bonding robe draped over Kahri's slight shoulders, the coillasi clasped just below her breasts. The collar stood high behind her head, the white material framing her beautiful copper hair. Spirits, he'd doubted he'd ever see anything more beautiful.

Then their eyes met, and everything else disappeared, his whole world narrowed down to that field of emerald and the love, and wonder, and delight staring back at him. When Anderson stopped next to him and held out his hand, Garrus fumbled a little, refusing to look away even for that second.
Laying Garrus's hand over Shepard's, Anderson said, "Those tied by blood and those tied by heart, be welcomed to that most blessed and sacred of occasions: the celebration of two clans joined, two lives knit together into one shared destiny." He took a deep breath. "As honorary father of the bride and disignatus, it is my honour to begin this bonding ceremony with the declaration of intentions.

Turning to Garrus, Anderson said, "Garrus Vakarian, son of Herros and Treana Vakarian, is it your intention to join your life, your family, and your clan to that of Jane Shepard?"

Garrus nodded and cleared his throat, his mandibles fluttering so hard that it felt as though they were trying to fly off his face. He sucked in a noisy breath, Shepard grinning as it whistled through his nose. And so he chuckled as he said, "It's my intention to join our lives, families, and clans. Jane Shepard will bring a beauty and depth of love and devotion that will enrich our clan in an infinite number of ways."

Anderson turned his grin to focus on Shepard. "Jane Shepard, daughter of Franklin and Lucille Shepard, is it your intention to join your life, your family, and your clan to that of Garrus Vakarian?"

Shepard smiled and nodded as she released a long breath that seemed to steady her. For a second Garrus thought she might stick with the script, but then the grin slanted to the wicked and when she spoke, her voice snapped with teasing. "By the glowing asses of the Blessed Enkindlers, you bet it's my intention to join our lives, our families, and our clans. This torin brings so much loyalty, beauty of spirit, honour, courage, and pure compassionate strength to this family that it quite frankly can't exist without him. He's my cornerstone that never shifts, bends, or cracks, and I can't do any of this without him."

Anderson cleared his throat, his voice strained, but also receding as Garrus's focus narrowed even further. "Who amongst their clans will stand by them through this union, to support them through the inevitable struggles and hardships of life? Who will help them care for one another and their children when they are ill or injured? Who will support them through times of scarcity, when they need shelter or a strong arm to protect them? For it is life's greatest truth that no bonded pair can stand alone. It needs the strength and nurturance of both clans to survive." The captain, stepped closer to Garrus and Shepard's joined hands. "So, I ask again, who amongst their clans will stand with them?"

Herros, Trea, and Solana moved to join Nihlus behind Garrus, Lucille, Bunny, and Martin behind Shepard. He gave Bunny a grateful smile and reached out to squeeze her fingers as she passed him. Then, surprising him, the members of Archangel and their crews stepped in behind them both. A heated flush of appreciation flowed over him, and he turned to give them all an honoured smile.

Anderson chuckled and shrugged. "Okay, that covers that. As both clans accept and bless this union, I declare it sound." He laid his hand over their joined ones. "Jane, speak your pledge to your bond-mate."

Shepard … his Kahri … smiled up into his eyes and squeezed his talons. "Garrus … my Callor."

Untangling one hand, she reached up and pressed her palm against his cheek, the contact burning like a brand. Through her touch, he felt her trembling and reached up, wrapping his hand around hers. She smiled; spirits he never tired of seeing joy light up her face or the way her eyes seemed to snap with electricity. "They told me I should write this part down because of the pressure to remember what I wanted to tell you, but there isn't any."

She let her hand settle to his chest, pressing it over his heart, the organ lost somewhere between hammering at FTL speeds and sputtering to a stop behind his plates. "You see, I promise everything, and accept everything. I've already agreed to that. So, I'll take your good days and bad days, your grumpiness in the morning and snuggliness at night. I promise to let you drink that wretched fruit pus you love, and to try very hard not to send you into anaphylaxis when I cook for you."

"This morning you told me that family came down to blood, and every drop of mine pours through my veins for the family we're building." She glanced behind him to shoot Nihlus a quick wink, then focused back on him, lifting his talons to her lips. "I promise you every single day, regardless of what they bring or how far apart we are or how crazy you're driving me." Pressing his palm over her heart, she watched his face, her scrutiny almost too intense as he felt that heart thundering beneath his palm. "I promise to send the kids straight to you when they're being impossible, to yell at you if you leave wet towels lying around, and probably to burn dinner at least twice a week. And I promise to hold you every time you need it, and to smack you every time you need that."

"A long, noisy breath whistled a little as she exhaled through her nose, then she nodded. "So, yeah, that covers it."
Someone in the small cluster of their family and friends blew their nose, drawing Shepard's attention, but his remained fixed on her. He cherished every one of her expressions, imprinting them all into his memory like a puer pressing their hands into the damp sand, just for the wonder of the impression that remained.

"What?" The question came out, a little frantic and a little apologetic as she faced their guests' tears. Garrus squeezed her hands to reassure her, but still, when she looked back, he saw the worry there. "Did I do it wrong?" she whispered, leaning into him.

After swallowing the Mako parked sideways in his throat, Garrus chuckled, a talon curling under her chin to lift her eyes back to meet his. "No, Kahri, you couldn't have done it better." He sighed, letting the light of her shine through every cell of his being, then bent to nuzzle her forehead.

Glancing at Anderson, he asked, "It's my turn, now?" When Anderson nodded, Garrus withdrew, smiling as he cleared his throat. "I'm probably not going to get through this, so bear with me." He stroked her cheek with his thumb, drinking in her smile even as it blurred.

Garrus cleared his throat again, sniffing a little as the sun stung his eyes, making his nose run. Yes, it was definitely the sun. "A couple of cycles ago, a praela roared into my life on a wind of such encompassing change that within moments, everything I knew spun about, completely transforming. Through the example of her bravery and compassion, she showed me who I wanted to be."

He looked down at their tangled fingers, blinking back the sting in his eyes again. Damn sun. "And then she was gone ... then you were gone, and I just sat there for three days, trying to figure out how to breathe again ... how to make my heart beat ... how to move. But, then I realized ... a love that powerful couldn't be broken by death. You weren't really gone, you lived inside my heart, and Nihlus's heart, and so I took my first breath, my blood began to flow again, and I got up and moved forward." He sniffed back a throatful of phlegm and clasped their hands against his chest.

When he sucked in a breath to speak, it rattled thick with barely checked tears and whistled with a soft keen. "And then the universe gave you back." He tried to speak past his trembling jaw and the pressure in his flooded sinuses, then gave up and shook his head. After a couple of breaths, he managed to swallow, and continue, "So, even though I can't promise that I won't have bad days, and that you won't frustrate me and terrify me to the point where I want to scream, I promise to do my best to live up to the gift of your heart ... to be the torin you make me want to be."

Leaning down to touch his brow to hers, he sucked in another wet, trembling breath. "I promise to never take this miracle for granted. I promise to love you with my every breath, to cherish you with everything I am and all I possess, to be your safe place from the monsters, to be your light in the darkness, and to hold tight to your hand with my last scrap of strength." Their audience vanished as she turned her face into his, her cheek wet where it pressed against his hide. He closed his eyes, his entire world narrowing down to the space and the breath between their bodies.

"All that I am, all I will ever be, or have, or wish for," he whispered, his mouth pressed to her ear, "is yours."

Shepard's breath caressed the side of his head as she nodded, her throat working so hard when she swallowed, that he heard the cartilage in her throat click.

Anderson cleared his throat, but neither one of them moved. "By the power vested in me by the Systems Alliance, and feeling sure in the belief that no one here has any reason why these two should not be wed, I declare Jane Gwendolyn Shepard and Garrus Alox Ramirus Vakarian bondmates ... husband and wife." Garrus felt the pressure of the captain's presence close in, but didn't open his eyes, pressing his hands as far into the damp sand of the moment as he could. He never wanted to forget the scent and feel of her skin, the honey spice of the rylamia in her hair, the gentle scent and cool wash of her tears as the breeze whispered past.

"You may kiss your wife," Anderson whispered, the width of his grin evident in his voice.

Garrus swept his wife up in his arms, their mouths pressed to one another before he even settled her into his embrace. Joy—spring-scented bliss and sun-warmed felicity—filled him until he felt as though it must radiate through his plates.

Dear spirits, let this be real. Don't let me wake up alone in my bed on Omega.

Then Shepard kissed him, shattering the fine bubble of fear. Her kiss remained soft and chaste, just a hint of teasing with her tongue before she threw her arms around his neck and pressed herself tight. "This is my very best day," she whispered next to his aural canal before kissing his neck.

He pressed her tight. "And mine. Just the first of a lifetime filled with them."

Then their guests descended on them, pulling them apart into a flurry of tears and hugs, brow bumps and kisses.

His mari waited until the tide ebbed before she stood and walked over to take his face between her hands, pulling him down to touch brows. "No matrula has ever been more blessed. I'm both proud and in awe of this torin you've become, Betru. You'll be a wonderful bond-mate and patrem." She sighed. "You and Nihlus are going to have to pour every bit of love you've got into her. She's not going to be an easy road, but she's worth it." She pulled away and grasped his hands in hers. "Jane loves you so much, and she's so afraid of hurting you or disappointing you."

Garrus straightened, turning to look over the small crowd to where Alenko held Shepard in a tight embrace. "I know, Mari. We'll take care of her." He bent to touch brows again. "Thank you for making this day so special for her … for both of us. I've seen her sad before, but last night … ." He took a deep breath. "Well, you've made it magical for her." He embraced her. "I love you."

His mari chuckled. "Ah, bonding day. Turns even the most stoic torin into a ball of embraces and emotion." She patted his cheek. "You're a wonderful pahir, and I love you. Now, go be with your bond-mate."

Garrus squeezed his mari's hand, then pushed through the crowd around his wife. He checked the sun, then chuckled at himself. As much as he loved his family and their friends, he really just couldn't wait to be alone with Shepard. His entire body ached to hold her and savour the quiet together as they had that morning. Since then, as beautiful a day as it had been, trying to fit everything into one day had proven busy. Very busy, especially with Shepard disappearing for a chunk of the afternoon.

"Excuse me, everyone," Herros called, stepping up onto the low wall around the pond. Garrus frowned, watching his pari with a growing feeling of dread. Herros making announcements didn't bode well. His pari grinned when their eyes met. "As you know, Jane and Garrus wanted to include turian bonding traditions into their day. The most important of these are the great hunt, which Jane led us on in a most spectacular fashion yesterday, and the Cohamentum."

Garrus drew himself taller and tried to catch Herros's attention again. No. No, what was his pari doing? He hadn't told Shepard about it for a reason. Herros blythely soldiered on, ignoring Garrus completely.
"For our non-turian guests, all turians grow up learning the Cohamentum, or Dance of the Elements, from their parents. It is a dance that bond-mates never perform together until the day of their bonding ceremony." Herros paused and looked over at Shepard, who— Garrus frowned as he looked down on the woman tucked in against his side. She was positively glowing. The nature of the afternoon's mystery began to take shape.

"After they have pledged themselves," Herros continued, "they perform the dance, and ancient tradition states that how well they move together, how they read one another and adapt to one another predicts the strength and longevity of their union."

He swept an arm toward the back part of the yard, where a raised dance floor had been erected to spare his mari's garden. "Garrus … Jane."

Garrus tightened his arm around his wife. "You spent the afternoon learning the dance, didn't you?" Shame heated the back of his neck. He was an idiot.

Instead of answering, she led him up the single stair to the middle of the dance floor, where she touched his cheek, then broke away to move to her starting position. Garrus's heart began to pound as he took his position, the drums and the treble and bass winds of the music drifting through the nervous, expectant silence. How well had Shepard learned it? Spirits … forget Kahri's knowledge, how well did he remember it? It had been cycles since his mother's last refresher.

Then it didn't matter, the Song of the Air whistled through the yard, picking him up and spinning him like a tussat seed, its parachute unfurled, the moves returning as if he'd performed it that morning. Two motes of dust on a cosmic breeze, they soared along separate paths. When he caught glimpses of Shepard, she'd transformed, no longer earth-bound or mortal, but a comet flaring more and more brightly as she neared the sun. Slowly, their orbits contracted until they spiralled into one another, hopelessly trapped.

She leaped into his arms, the difference in their heights elevating the movements into acts of aerial acrobatics so graceful that they stole his breath. Spirits … she truly was a praela, riding the wind as if she belonged there.

As the dance eased into the Song of Water, she landed, ebbing away from him to swirl with the tides back into his arms with the ripening moon. Unable to tear his gaze from the beauty of her flight, he savoured the appearance of her every cue. Moving to harmonize with her movements, he lengthened to make up for her shorter limbs, elevating movements meant to be fixed to the ground and setting them free of gravity's harsh pull. Her dress flowed about her like a cloud, and he'd never seen anything more astonishingly beautiful.

Water flowed into the earth, settling his Kahri back into his arms and the good, rich soil. Bodies entwined, eyes locked on one another, they blossomed and grew, a tree spreading its branches out to worship the light and the rain, their roots digging down, intertwining until they became one entity. Tears rolled over his face, his subvocals singing out his wonder at the miracle who'd taken his hand to create a new life, their anchor sunk deep so that they could reach out into the broad future.

The ground nourished them, springing into bloom, ripe with promise. Their bodies melded, and he lifted her into his arms, cheeks pressed together, breath panting and heated against one another's cheeks as they swayed to the waning strains of the winds. The drums faded, growing soft as her heartbeat against his chest. They ended, brow to brow, sharing that air, and somehow, in those moments, everything between them had shifted, the roots sunk deep and solid.

Garrus held his Kahri tight against him, his heart pounding with both exertion and exhilaration.
"Dear spirits, how come I didn't know you could dance like that?"

She smiled and shrugged, one shoulder tugged towards her ear. "I've never had a reason to dance like that before." Sighing, she kissed him, then pulled back, her one arm draped around his neck, the fingers of the other hand caressing his face. "Everything, Garrus," she said, her expression and voice so solemn that it's weight resonated in his bones. "Everything is what we promised. Not just the parts of what you want or need that are easy for me to give, or you think won't put me out or endanger me or any of that crap." She kissed him again. "You should have told me how important this is to your traditions, regardless of whether you thought I could learn it or would be okay performing it. Got it?"

He let out a long breath, the enormity of what they'd promised registering in a small, quiet way … in the form of his love sneaking away with his patrem to learn how to dance. "Yeah," he whispered, then kissed her back. "Yeah, I've got it."

Someone cleared their throat behind them, the utterance sounding as profoundly uncomfortable as it should. No one in their right mind would interrupt them before they stepped away. That left one suspect.

Shepard sighed and flopped against him, gentle hands rubbing the back of his neck. "I hate whoever that is so much right now."

He grumbled a wordless agreement, fury rising hot and pointed under his plates. "Yes, Miranda?"

"I'm so very sorry," the operative said, clearing her throat again, "but, Shepard … the colony on Horizon just went dark."

Shepard pulled away. "Holy crap. Collectors have the worst timing." She caressed the length of Garrus's mandible, then kissed him before answering, "Okay, get the ships ready to go. We'll need all three. The general and I will be spending the trip on the Passch, so the Ypres is under your command." She turned to meet her XO's eyes. "Does Mordin have the armour mods ready to go on the ground teams?"

"I'll contact him and let you know." The operative paused. "We've got cabs on the way for everyone."

"We'll be there in a minute," Shepard replied, the absolute professionalism and distance in her tone shoving a lump of iron down Garrus's throat. Damn the Collectors, and the Reapers, and the whole fucking war. Why couldn't they allow her just one day?

Shepard leaned up and kissed him. "We'll pick up our wedding night the second we get our people sorted for the jumps. It's three jumps, even though the one in Widow is a quick one, and I intend to squeeze in every second possible for us."

He nodded and started to answer, but then opted for kissing his wife—the thought of a long, uninterrupted wedding night pushing back a little of his attitude. As she set out for the house, he reached out, snagging her wrist to pull her in against him. "I love you, Jane Shepard-Vakarian, and I don't intend for that to get lost in this war."

(A-N: This baby has been my obsession the last few days, but it hasn't all been beta'd and a lot of it was written at times as late as 4AM, so sorry about that. It's probably going to be a little rough, but I hope you feel it does these crazy kids justice. Also, there is art! As always, I love you guys. I really do. And I wish you the very best as spring ... well, springs around us. hugs and more mini eggs) The gorgeous art is thanks to Artistically Amber! So lovely!
Her grin widened as she leaned back in his embrace. "Okay, when we have daughters or sons." Head jerking back with surprise, she shuddered and slapped her fingers over her mouth, groping at her lips with their tips, searching as if trying to figure out where the words had come from. "Sweet baby Enkindlers, I didn't just say that, did I? Who is this woman using my voice to talk about having kids?" One brow creeping toward her hairline, she glared at him, the heat that sharpened the stare originating deep at the center of her. "Are you mind-controlling me, Vakarian?"

Harediarcha - The box of paraphernalia used in family ceremonies, passed down through the maternal line.

Mensacra - The short table and two stools used in traditional turian ceremonies such as the naditatem and bonding ceremonies.

Samitaregia - A guiding light. A light to illuminate one's path. The praela used such lights set into lanterns to guide warriors into battle, and then through the dark curtain of death.

Caris - Beloved, precious

Derra - Wife. Female bond-mate.

Dilan - fiancee

54 Days ASR

"You looked breathtaking today."

Shepard smiled as the soft, cherished voice of her husband spoke from the door. She didn't turn, the smile deepening with the sound of each footfall as he approached. He leaned down to nuzzle the side of her neck and shoulder, textured mouth plates exciting her skin into a tingling, goose-pimpled bundle of nerves. A shuddering sigh escaped as she turned to brush her lips against his cheek. Leaning into him, she savoured immersion in his heat envelope and closed her eyes. "Your … our … mari is a genius with needle and thread." She pulled away a couple of steps and twirled, glad that they hadn't taken the time to change. The skirt ruffles flared, and she giggled with delight. "It's just the most beautiful dress."

Dizzy, she stumbled over to balance herself against Garrus's desk, another giggle escaping, much to her mortification. "I haven't twirled since I was … nine or ten."

Garrus chuckled and walked over, pulling her into his arms. "Pretty sure you haven't giggled since long before that." He wrapped himself around her, so strong and warm that she just melted into him.
until the dizziness eased back, and she could stand on her own.

Bending, she lifted the panels of both their robes, staring at the little Citadel with the Normandy sailing across the foreground that Trea had embroidered into both. Sweet baby Jesus, in a hundred years or two hundred, members of the Vakarian family would be getting married in the robes, she and Garrus a part of their day just as his ancestors … his parents were a part of theirs.

She smiled up into his eyes. "And this … it's just amazing, Garrus. And to think if we have daughters or sons, their story will be embroidered into it next to ours."

He opened his mouth, but then his mandibles did that little, helpless flail that told her that he couldn't find the words to express all the emotions that idea … the idea of his children … prompted. So, instead, he took her hand, and drawing her close, reached out to caress her cheek. "What do you mean if?"

Her grin widened as she leaned back in his embrace. "Okay, when we have daughters or sons."

Head jerking back with surprise, she shuddered and slapped her fingers over her mouth, groping at her lips with their tips, searching as if trying to figure out where the words had come from. "Sweet baby Enkindlers, I didn't just say that, did I? Who is this woman using my voice to talk about having kids?" One brow creeping toward her hairline, she glared at him, the heat that sharpened the stare originating deep at the center of her. "Are you mind-controlling me, Vakarian?"

Garrus's stare darted side to side a few times before his brow plates and mandibles lifted into a comical mask of shifty-eyed denial. "Ummmm … who me? No, never."

Laughter bubbled, breaking the surface like wishes escaping a well. "Very reassuring, thank you."

A long sigh breezed between them as Shepard let herself forget the fact they raced toward another vanished colony and slipped into the welcoming waters of the moment. "Collectors and Reaper interruptions notwithstanding, it's been a beautiful day."

Garrus rumbled his agreement and happiness through his subvocals, the sound burrowing all the way down into Shepard's gut. Loving talons whispered along the angle of her shoulder as he said, "Let's get you out of that very beautiful dress." When she nodded and stepped back, he unclasped the opalescent chains holding her bonding robe closed, then set them over on top of the harediarcha, which sat on the desk just behind her. He lifted the robe off her shoulders, then hung it up. When they'd run out of the house in their wedding attire, Trea had threatened death and pain if they destroyed the five-century-old robes.

Running her hands down the front panels of the black robe, Shepard traced the gold embroidery with her fingertips. "Which one is your parents?"

Garrus lifted the panel, feeding it through until he got to the center of the right panel. He pointed a small cityscape embroidered in amazing detail, right down to tiny windows in the buildings. "It's the street where my father met my mother." He pointed to the one beside it. "My father's parents met playing hideth turram. She broke his first ankle." That little depiction was much less neatly stitched, but clearly one turian taking the legs out from under the other in a tackle.

"It's as good a way as any other, I suppose." Shepard chuckled. "At least that way he can't escape." She unhooked the clasps at either end of the coillasi holding his robe closed, setting them beside hers. She let him remove the robe, not wanting to drag it over the floor, but as soon as it hung from its hangar, her fingers set into the fasteners down the front of his suit.

"You looked very handsome, today," she said, laying the tunic open. And he had. The moment she caught sight of him through the windows, her heart had stopped, stilled by the sight of her two beautiful torins standing there, waiting for her. Slipping her hands inside, she slid them along his lowest plates, closing her eyes as she savoured the smooth heat of his hide. She looked up into his eyes, the skin between her brows knitting into a frown. "Have I told you that I love you in the last ten minutes?"

Letting out a deep, dramatic sigh, he shook his head. "It may have even been a couple of hours."

Feigning horror, she gasped. "I've been remiss." She wrapped her arms around his waist. "Well, I love you, just in case you've forgotten in that time."

His talons reached around behind her, untying the ribbon lacing down her back. "Glad you cleared that up." He lifted the dress, waiting for her to raise her arms over her head before slipping it off and carefully hanging it up as well. When he turned back, he reached up, cupping her neck between his hands. His gaze wandered over her, his expression one of near-wonder. "I want this war to be over," he said, the words such a low whisper that she scarcely heard them. "I want to be done with obligation and deadlines, and just disappear somewhere … just you and me and Nihlus."

A soft smile of understanding spirited across Shepard's lips, as wistful and filled with weary hope as his words. Sighing she pressed in, fitting herself against his body. "You're still wearing far too much clothing, by the way."

"Easily remedied," he replied, removing his tunic, then tugging the light, white dress shirt out of her grip and over his head. "There, better?" he asked, his arms holding her close.

Shepard pressed her ear against his chest and nodded. "Much." After a second, she let out a soft breath. "Do you know why those lilies were all over when I died?" She felt him wince away from the question, but just held him tighter. "Anderson filled my hospital room with them after Mindoir. He said they were called Madonna lilies and were a symbol of purity, and faith … sacrifice, and redemption, and hope. They're my favourite flower because of that."

She pulled away just far enough to meet his eyes. "That's why I was surprised and happy to find that one in your room on Omega, even though I figured you didn't know the meaning." She lifted her hand to caress the length of his mandible. "I sort of see it as the symbol of us, and the hope that one day the sacrifices will end, and we'll be allowed to live in the hope, redeemed."

He moved in, but she ducked his embrace, dropping her fingers to the fasteners on his leggings. "Enough time with far more than enough between us." Making quick work of removing them, she helped him step clear and laid them over his chair.

"Time for the sexy parts," he teased, stepped around her to pick up the harediarcha.

"Callor," Shepard spun and caught his hands as he picked up the carved box. "I need to give you my wedding gift before we settle in to do anything that might leave me with blue streaks down my face for the next couple of months." She smiled and guided the box back to the desktop. "Come and sit with me?"

"Of course, but let's put the coillasi in the oil first." He released the box, and opened it, removing the clay jar of oil that they'd prepared with the crushed herbs after breakfast. Shepard stepped up beside him, watching as he poured the oil into an earthen bowl that shone with a gorgeous patina that could only come from ages and ages of use.

Garrus lifted the fine chains that had held his robe closed and lowered them into the bowl, then nodded for her to go ahead, which she did, submerging the slightly thicker chains from her robe.
Shepard grinned and dipped her fingertip in the oil. "Infusing the symbols of our bond with who we are and the wishes for our future." She rubbed her finger and thumb together, the sense of connection tunneling all the way down to sink and anchor in her soul. "I love that."

"Okay." Taking her hands, he led her to the side of the bed and sat. "I'm all yours."

She nodded toward the center of the bed. "Can I sit on your lap?" She flushed a little as she asked. "I don't want anything between us."

"Of course, but that means we'll have to get rid of these." He tucked his thumbs into the waist of her panties and slipped them down off her hips. Shepard balanced herself with her hands on his smooth, tightly muscled shoulders, closing her eyes to savour the calloused, gentle touch as it caressed down her legs, then lifted one foot and the other.

As the contact vanished, a thick, heavy longing settled in her stomach, her entire body … her bones aching with it, and she wished for a quick resolution to the war as well. So many possibilities, so many lives and hopes and options waited out there for them. The Reapers had made a very large mistake coming between her and that future with her torins, because having gotten a taste of it, she wasn't going to allow them to deny her the rest.

Garrus moved farther up onto the bed, then held out his hands, steadying her as she stepped up and settled herself on his crossed legs.

"Much better," she said, wriggling a little to find the sweet spot. "Okay." She clasped his hands in hers. "So, when you told me about the whole wedding gift tradition thing, I did a little thinking." A bright grin met the smart ass gleam that sparked in his eyes. "And, yes, it was painful … and okay … fine … smoke was involved."

His chuckle added another layer to the thick envelope of intimate comfort that suffused the room.

"There's nothing I can give you that can compare to the love of your family … our family." Her lips began to tremble even through her smile. Taking a deep breath, she managed to relax the slow tightening in her throat. "So, I talked to Mordin, and he put together a package of all the information and samples … everything we've collected from Sovereign, the Protheans, and the Collector base on Thessia and sent it to some of his contacts on Sur'kesh who are researching Corpalis Syndrome at the Helos Medical Institute. A Dr. Jelith Kieron was very excited about what we sent him, and practically jumped the light years to Omega carrying his team on his back."

Garrus stared at her, mouth and mandibles slack, eyes shining.

"He's probably already on Omega, because he wanted to see the space the labs were going in and design his environment accordingly." She reached up to take her husband's face between her hands, tears pricking the corners of her eyes as she felt his mandibles trembling against her palms. Now for the bad news. "He says Mari is too far along to put much hope into curing her, but he thinks that if his treatments work as he believes they will, we can buy her a couple more years." She pressed her lips together to still them, licking away the sudden slickness. "But it could lead to a cure someday for other families … for our family, sweet baby Jesus forbid."

A single shake of his head answered her as he wrapped his arms around her and pulled her in tight, his face tucked in under her jaw.

Shepard's arms snaked around his neck in a loving hug. "She'll have to stay on Omega for a while, maybe even a year, but … we're going to be there … Sol will be there … we'll just have to ship Pari to Palaven for his meetings." After a couple of minutes, she pulled away, taking his face between her hands again. "You okay, Callor?"

He nodded and sucked in a deep, shaky breath. "A little overwhelmed, but I couldn't be better." Pulling her in, he pressed his mouth to hers, answering her with all the joy and love in his kiss. "Her treatments weren't working the way her doctors hoped, so this … ." He kissed her again. "Dear spirits, I never believed this feeling existed." He pulled back to press his palm over her heart. "Thank you, Kahri."

She sighed and rested her brow against his. "Well, it's a pretty selfish gift, considering it's as much for me as you and Nihlus, Pari, and Sol, but I just fell in love with her. She's so amazing that the galaxy needs her in it for as long as possible."

He nodded and sniffed. "It really does, and I need her. I need to make up for all those cycles of being an idiot."

She hugged him tight again. "We'll make them an apartment in Building One, bring in all the furniture and things they need. We'll give them both offices with a QEC between them, whatever staff they need. Maybe even give Pari his own ship so he can come and go as he needs."

A wonderful, timeless silence wrapped them tight, neither of them moving for long moments, loathe to break it.

"I have something for you as well," Garrus said at last, his voice muffled by her shoulder. "Sort of a variation on a theme." He leaned back across the bed to rifle through the pockets of his tunic, returning with a tiny package that he placed in her palm. "I didn't know about the symbolism of the lilies when I made it, I just knew you liked them."

Shepard's heart suddenly decided it needed all the room in her chest, squeezing the breath out of her lungs. "You made this?" Thumbs caressing the wrapping, she just stared at it, trying to remember the last time anyone had made her a gift. It would have been when she was a child.

"The gift isn't the paper," he whispered, his voice rolling with gentle teasing. He nuzzled her ear. "You're allowed to unwrap it."

"Aw, and it's such lovely paper." She shrugged then grinned so broad and happy that her cheeks ached with it. After kissing the end of his nose, she said, "I'm not sure you can top it." Unfolding the wrapping, she exposed a … necklace? Setting the paper down between them, she lifted the chain to reveal a lovely pendant hanging from the lowest part. She looked from the gorgeous piece of jewelry to meet Garrus's eyes. "It's beautiful, Callor. Put it on me?"

Gentle talons took the necklace from her hands and placed it over her head. "The chain is made from the same shell as our corllasi, so should never break." He grinned, mandibles flicking. "Just don't try to use it as a rope to swing through jungles or over ravines or to tow brokendown Makos."

Shepard laughed, and slung an arm around his neck, leaning in to touch brows again. "There's a very real danger of all those things, so thanks for the warning." She lifted the long, delicate pendant, surprised at its solidity. It looked like a lily petal with the intricate runic writing of the closed dialect cut out of it in an elegant, stylized pattern. "What does it say?" she asked.

Garrus pointed to the first group of symbols. "This is me, this one in the center is you, and this last one is Nihlus." A noisy breath whistled through his nose. "The entire thing is the ancient turian symbol for light, but this time it's the word samitaregia, a guiding light … a light to illuminate your path or bring you home."
Running talon over the clear, hard surface, he leaned in, pressing his brow to hers. "I cut it out of one of the petals from the lily I kept during your funeral, and it's hard because it turns out there are chiastyllia everywhere, even Omega. I just thought my intention, reached out in case, and they came."

He let it fall between her breasts. "It resonates at a very specific frequency that I can pick up anywhere in the galaxy." He lifted his wrist to show her his omnitool sitting in its port, ordinary but for a small fixture of crystal nested into the side.

Shepard frowned and leaned back, her hand returning to press against his mandible. "Garrus?" Was he worried about her vanishing? No, the idea reached deeper than that. A vague shadow teased her, darting in and out of the light too quickly for her to grasp it. Being lost … .

You were lost for a long time, Janey. A long time dwelling in the dark, calling out for a single ray of light. For them.

A sigh tumbled from his mouth, the sound an admission of sorrow and secrets kept. "In your dreams …" His mandibles flailed a little, the distress and pain behind his reason for the gift, stabbing into her like thousand needles, flechettes drawn through her to lodge in the magnet of her heart. "... you call out, lost and afraid, searching for me and Nihlus." He pulled her tight. "Now, you don't have to worry. There's nowhere you can get lost that I can't find you."

"Oh, Callor." She lifted into him, kissing him softly, passionate, but a passion springing from love and that very light he spoke of. Samitaregia … her two guiding lights. "Thank you. It's the most beautiful thing." She nestled in against him. "I suppose we need to move in order to get to the sexy bits of our night?"

He nodded, but then turned to lower his legs off the side of the bed. Supporting her backside with one arm, he stood. "There, now all you need to do is lower your feet." He chuckled when she shook her head.

Shepard squeezed his waist, her legs gripping tight. "I want to stay right here for … oh … about forever. Would that be all right with you?"

He shrugged. "Sure, that won't be awkward in battle. You can deafen me shooting over my shoulder, and I can paralyze you, pulverizing your spine with the kickback on my rifle."

Shepard let out a quick huff of a sigh, then nodded. "Okay, sounds good." After another couple of seconds, she kissed him, just a hard, luring press of lips, and dropped down to stand on her own feet. With a toss of her head, she spun on her toes and marched to the mensacra sitting in the middle of the cabin floor. Before she even got three steps, a long arm slipped around her, stopping her dead as Garrus stepped into her, pulling her tight against him.

"Where are you going dressed like that, Captain Shepard?" he said, his voice a thick harmony of subtones that reached all the way down into her, burning deep in her pelvis like the warmth of a strong drink. Melting into that arm, she shook her head, her heart pounding too hard, her lungs too suddenly breathless again to answer.

Completely vulnerable and completely at ease, feeling completely safe. She leaned into him, swallowing hard past the lump of love and gratitude in her throat. She couldn't remember feeling that combination of things. Maybe she had as a child, but the barians had washed those memories away.

Garrus's arm tightened around her, that sixth sense of his pulling him into sync with her. "Do you need help sitting?" he asked, just enough cocky tone threaded through the words to let her know that he understood exactly how he affected her.

She elbowed him without any sting, her admission, "Yes," dragging out, slow and begrudging. He chuckled and nuzzled her ear before helping her sit on the low stool. She watched him sit across from her, her eyes drinking in the ease and grace of his movement. He'd been surprised by her ability to dance earlier, but no less than she. He moved like a jaguar, lithe and strong, a ferocious sort of grace to his movements that had her body insisting on jumping him right there. Miranda may have saved them both from an embarrassing turn of events.

She grinned, a wicked, mischievous grin that sent one of Garrus's brow plates heading for his fringe.

"What is that gleam about?" he asked, opening the harediarcha and taking out the covered mortar containing the leftover ink.

The tingling heat in Shepard's groin caught fire. "I was just remembering how amazingly sexy you were during the cohamentum."

As he dipped a very short bristled, sharp-edged brush into the ink, he chuckled and shook his head. "Stop trying to distract me. I've never done this before, and I don't want to leave your face some sort of abstract work of art."

"Heaven forbid." Shepard leaned in, forearms on the table, pushing her breasts up and forward. "I wanted to just throw you down right there, crawl inside your clothes and have my way with you." She laughed as he fumbled the brush a little in shaking talons, spraying a thin line of blue dots across the table and her arms. Taking pity on him, she eased back and laid her hand over his. "All right, I'll stop teasing."

"Thank you. Although … " His greater height allowed him to lean all the way across the narrow table to nuzzle his way up her neck, nipping her lightly. "... you were incredibly sexy yourself."

The heat of his mouth, the soft drag of his teeth over her excited skin coaxed a long, low moan from her that felt as though it originated in her gut. "Just get the damned familia notas drawn on, husband, before I attempt a sitting high jump over this table, and we both end up covered in that ink."

"Yes, ma'am." Settling in, his mandibles held in the rigid concentration formation that approximated a human having their tongue caught between their teeth, Garrus obeyed her order, making far shorter work of colouring in the markings than she would have thought from his hesitation.

"Guess all that painting paid off," she said, her tone teasing, even though her brow drew down into a thoughtful frown. "Why haven't you kept up with your art, Callor? I didn't see any in your apartment on the Citadel, or on Omega."

He shrugged and wiped out the mortar with a couple of tissues. "It didn't seem like a priority. I have always had a lot of work to do."

Shepard shook her head. "That's crap. Why? You clearly loved it." She set her jaw and an eyebrow, unwilling to let him get away with dodging or deflecting.

He shrugged and put away the inking supplies. "It wasn't a priority, that's all."

She reached out, the repeated lie stabbing an icicle straight through her gut, and grasped his closest arm with both hands. "Callor, love … tell me the truth." When he turned back to face her, she captured his hands in a strong grip and waited.

"My father came home one weekend, and I hadn't solved his mystery for the week." He gripped her hands right back, thumbs brushing along the first bone in her hands. "I was angry with him, because he'd stayed at work the weekend before and missed … " He cocked his head, a deep frown falling over his face, a cloud that made her twitch, the urge to lean across and kiss it away almost too strong to deny.

He shook his head. "... something, Mari's declaration day, maybe. Anyway, he came home, I was angry, and went out to my favourite place to draw and didn't come back to the house until after my curfew." He lifted one of her hands to his face, pressing her palm against his cheek before leaning into it.

"How old were you?" she asked, her voice barely audible. Spirits, the wound from his father's absence dug so much deeper than she imagined and had festered so badly over the years. Even though the past couple of years had healed the surface, that wounded child still hid away in there somewhere.

Another shrug. "Twelve. He was furious, said my art was a waste of time and not something a proper turian would spend time doing when they needed to concentrate on being a productive member of society rather than a drain."

Shepard released his hand and moved the table off to one side, then scrambled up to kneel in front of him. "That must have hurt like hell."

He tugged her into a hug, pressing her along the right side of his keel. "As much as I'm sure it hurt for me to have shattered our game, and stayed out rather than coming to see him." He shook his head again, but that time as if trying to shed water or strands of cobweb. "I just put the art away after that, and concentrated on getting ready for the academy, playing turram … the things good turians did."

"You know, he'd take back that night just as quickly as you would if he was able," she said, pulling back. She reached up to test how dry her face was, but Garrus grabbed her hand.

"No touching." A smile pushed back the momentary clouds. "You'll smudge." He nodded at her stool. "Get yourself back over there, derra. Now we get to the sexy bits."

Shepard clambered back onto her stool. "About time. I love all the tradition, but it needs to have a lot more sexy bits."

Garrus set the table back between them, then brought out the bowl of oil. He held his hand out for hers, placing her arm on the table elbow down, hand up when she surrendered it. Dipping his talons into the oil, he came out with one of the fine chains.

"These are carved all in a piece rather than being linked together, and are meant to never break, never be removed." He wrapped it around her wrist twice, then fastened the clasp. Smiling, he watched the oil drip down her arm, only moving in to smooth it over her skin when the little rivulets stalled.

When the oil had soaked into her arm, he pulled out the other coillas and positioned her other arm. "They're a tradition at least fifteen thousand cycles old." He wrapped it around her wrist. "Back when they were first introduced, they were a means of identification. In the case of war or disaster, they could link each person back to their clan, and even family, by the different designs of the links." He took her arm between his hands, his touch and voice soothing as he massaged the oil in.

As Shepard watched his hands glide over her skin, steel grey and glistening, the touch firm but oh so gentle, she couldn't help but recall the way he'd taken care of her hands after she'd smashed them up that first week. From the very first, he'd just stepped up, deciding that he'd take care of her. Back then, she could have never imagined them ending up where they were. Thank the sweet, sweet baby Jesus for the things unforeseen.

When he finished, she took his arm, guiding it into the same position. The chains only wrapped around his wrists once. Watching the oil run down his arm, following the lines of plate and hide, she shook her head, the day … her entire life … suddenly losing its solid edges, reality softening into mist. Husband … a dilan … her mother and sister being found alive … being brought back to life by an evil empire … where did it all turn into some ridiculous story?

"Kahri?"

She met his eyes, concern darkening and deepening the love she saw there.

Shrugging, she traded arms. "It's been a lovely day." Rubbing the oil into his hide, she smiled. "Full of surprises." When he encouraged her with a cocked brow plate, Shepard replied, "Lucy and Bunny came into the room while I was getting dressed. Bunny didn't say anything, just sat on the side of the bed, but when our eyes met in the mirror, she nodded." Shepard frowned, trying to put the feeling that had passed between them in that moment. "It was … I don't know … like she was saying that we were both okay. I think I owe Martin a really big hug."

A muted rumble of agreement rolled from his throat. "He took good care of them while we were gone. The doc even released Bunny to live in standard quarters and train with the recruits. She still goes in for counselling every day, but she seems to be turning all that rage into something constructive."

Shepard nodded. "I think she'd be a really good addition to the Sanctuary project once we find somewhere to start it." She pulled his talons over to press kisses to each one, then to the chain encircling his wrist. "These look striking on you, verro."

"Never thought I'd wear them," he said, voice almost too soft to hear. "I thought I'd be the old C-Sec officer trying to ignore the whispers during his retirement ceremony about how sad it was he didn't have family to enjoy his retirement with." He grinned, sudden and wide. "And now I'll be the one they drag kicking and screaming into retirement so I don't have to go home and spend all my time with my impossible, ornery mate."

"Hey! I represent that remark!" Shepard protested, smacking him, the tough hide of his arm stinging her hand.

"Yes, yes, you do." Still, chortling, Garrus eased his hand from her grip, and moved the small table over to the end of his bed. Standing, he moved his stool, then reached down. "Come, derra, you know they'll have to kill me to keep me from you." Gripping her hands, he helped her up and pushed her stool out of the way with the side of his foot, all without breaking eye contact. Shepard remained pliable, allowing him to shift her out of the way, her hands falling to her sides when he released them to pull the duvet from the bed. With a strong flick, he spread it out, letting it drift to the floor, then held his hands out for hers.

"Now, nothing but sexy bits," he said, his words caressing her with loving humour. He sat cross-legged and helped her onto his lap. Once she settled, he trailed his talons down her neck and along her collarbones, his eyes trained on the path they traced. His first digit traced the edge of one of the wounds. "I didn't think to ask if the oil would hurt you."

Shepard nodded. It could well sting a little. By the end of the day, the sealant wore thin along the edges, but spending the entire day dressed in soft clothes had prevented them rubbing as raw as usual. "Where you rubbed it in from the coillasfeels fine."

He dipped the talons of his right hand in the bowl, the left cradling her wrist, the tender part turned up. First nuzzling the skin as if apologizing in advance, he smoothed the oil on, rubbing it in along the inside of her forearm.

Shepard waited for a sting that never came. In fact, quite the opposite. "It's actually numbing the pain a little," she reported, shrugging. "Looks like all systems go." She wrinkled her nose, drawing in a deep breath. "It smells a little like my bath last night."

Garrus pressed his face to her wrist and inhaled, a fond smile spreading across his face. "Mari. The oil has torpen cortisin it. It's an herbal analgesic that isn't included in the normal variety of herbs provided for the guests to choose from."

Shepard leaned in and kissed him. "I sense Karin's influence in here as well. Although, she must have had a tempering influence, or I'd be tranq'd." Glancing over at the bowl of oil, she drew her bottom lip between her teeth, trapping the corner of it. "Are we both supposed to be using that?"

Garrus's hands slipped around her neck, his talons gliding over her shoulder blades and down her back. "Yes." He nuzzled just below her ear. "And you know, turians need to have oil massaged into their hide every other day or it dries out, so … ."

Shepard dipped her fingers into the bowl, and rubbed her palms together before smoothing it down her verro's neck. "So between the two of you, I'm going to have the best conditioned hands around? Not to mention the happiest hands around." Before he could answer, she tipped her pelvis to brush against his plates. "You know, there's one thing that could make this just that little bit sexier."

Chuckling, Garrus pulled her into a deep, long kiss. "You're incorrigible."

She reached down, tracing the seam with a fingertip, easing her way inside to tease the silky hide of his sheath. "Hey, I have a whole lot of time to make up for." She slicked up her fingers again and leaned back a little to gaze into his eyes as her fingers trickled over his face. "You were right, you know … all those months ago. I just had to trust you for a couple of seconds." Moaning, soft and throaty, as his hands moved to her chest, his thumbs sweeping over her breasts, teasing the nipples. "And now … damn … all I want to feel is you … all over me and inside me."

"Right here," he whispered, his thumb sliding back and forth between the hard, ridges of bone in her sternum and the swell of her breast. "I think the entire evolution of humanity and turians came about just for this right here." Urging her to lie back against his arm, he bent down, talons and tongue all obsessing over her slick skin and soft flesh.

Shepard relaxed back, her head hanging, entire body turning to needy, aching clay under his touch. "I thought you wanted me to tell evolution you voted for human females to evolve carapaces?" she asked, voice breathless and lusty.

He lifted his mouth from her breast, his teeth drawing a soft moan as they raked the skin, their solid, gentle pressure providing a most delicious counterpoint to his nimble tongue. "I was a fool." Turning his head a little, he brushed her nipple along the length of his mandible, sending a heavy, sweet electricity singing down through her body to feed the fire at her core. Like a drawn bow, she pulled up, straining between the grounding points of his lap and his arm, as he buried his face in the hollow between her ribs. The rough hide of his mouth pulled long, soft oaths of pleasure as he nuzzled his way down to her navel, and she lifted … breathless and aching, straining to close the frustrating space between them. Too much air moved between their bodies.

Garrus pulled back a little, calloused palms caressing up her sides, the lush friction feeding straight into that fire even as she relaxed down onto his legs once more. He let out a long breath that whispered a lifetime of promises. "You're absolutely perfect in your softness." Strong hands lifted her, settling her in line with his plates, waiting for a sign from her before he slipped free.

She gave it in the form of a hard, helpless buck when the edge of his plates brushed against her center, her entire body grinding into him with an insistence that surprised her, and elicited a hoarse chuckle from Garrus. Oiling his hands, he spread his talons at the base of her throat, flexing them a little so the sharp points just furrowed the skin. Careful to lift them over her wounds, he drew them down her torso, leaving behind three searing lines of sensation that sent every nerve in her body straight into overdrive.

As his hand neared her sex, she lifted into him again, bucking softly against the contact. "Blessed Enkindlers, Callor, stop with the teasing before I explode into hormone confetti."

Pressing his hand against her overheated center, he teased the soft dusting of hair with one talon.
"I'm almost tempted to see if I can make that happen."

Shepard dropped a slick hand to his spur, laughing brightly as he jumped beneath her, a heavy shudder shaking him from head to toe as her thumb slid along its length. "Oh yes, two can play that game, General, and I don't think you've got what it takes to beat me."

He grinned and leaned down, resting his chin between her breasts. "Is that a challenge, Captain Shepard?" His thumb slipped down to sit just above the 'make Shepard sing in fifteen octaves' button, tapping in a way that felt very much like a warning.

Fighting back her body's insistence that she respond to that touch, Shepard cleared her throat, a faint tremor pulsing through her, taking root in her pelvis. "Ahhhh … um, aren't we supposed to be doing the whole oil ritual?" she said, expression wide-eyed and guileless as she tipped her head toward the bowl. Pressing her lips together, she managed to set her expression into a mask of mild curiosity. "Yeah, pretty sure that was the next item on the itinerary."

Taking the game a step further, she twisted in his grasp, reaching out to dip her fingers into the oil.
A loud, almost vicious sounding roar rumbled through her husband's second larynx, startling a sharp, effervescent bark of laughter as he pulled her into his arms. Garrus kissed her hard and deep, his passion snatching any thought of teasing straight out of her head.

"Sweet baby Jesus." Gasping into his mouth, she lifted into him, one hand clinging to his neck, the other sliding down his chest to the soft hide of his belly. Questing fingers slipped through the seam between his plates, finding him eager and ready, pressing against her palm. She wrapped her hand around him, the heel keeping him trapped while her fingers slipped along his length.

Damn, but didn't she want him with a strength near frantic.

Tongue dancing along his, Shepard greedily sucked up the handful of super-heated air that hung between them. Pulling back just far enough to untangle from the kiss, she pushed him back a little.
"Lean back, verro." When he didn't move, she gave him another little shove, then leaned in, kissing along the groove of his throat, her body pressing into his until he was forced to brace his arms behind him.
Grinning, she ran her lip between her teeth, her stare meeting his with naked, raw lust. She'd never wanted to just leap on someone and discover the taste of every millimetre of him before the impossible, beautiful, magnificent torin pinned beneath her. She leaned right in, reclining against his chest as she kissed him long and deep, then reached over, soaking her hands with the oil.

"Let yourself go, verro," she said, her voice burrowing down into her chest, throaty and rich with desire. She shifted, sliding along his length as he eased free of his plates. "Mmm, much better." She grinned as he moaned, his head lolling back, his length gaining width as she trapped it between them, gliding slick and slow along the underside. Stretching out along him, careful not to put too much pressure on his sensitive bits, she reached out, oily hands shining as they smoothed over the length of his crest, then began to work their way down his body, exploring every centimetre she could reach.

When he panted, his belly heaving with each, moaning breath, she slipped him inside her. He pushed himself up hard enough to throw her back, strong arms catching her by the hips. She chuckled, the sound turning into a cry of passion and pleasure as he rolled his pelvis, thrusting into her. Hands returning to splash into the oil, they massaged and teased, their mouths locked together even as they crashed toward frantic, clinging orgasms.

Silent oaths passed between them, the ones that transcended words, as they lay tangled in one another's arms in a nest of pillows, the edges of the duvet carelessly thrown over them.

Shepard nuzzled into the tender spot just under Garrus's jaw. "So, we surface a couple of hours before Horizon?"

Her general nodded. "I've got everything I need right here."

(A-N: I was going to skip right to Horizon, but I couldn't do it. I had to give them their wedding night. :D Thanks and hugs and tasty snacks and cold beverages to all of you. You know I love you.)
Future Continuous Chapter 20

Chapter Summary

"By all that's fucking holy, I'm not dying in the middle of some goddamned husk gang bang." Her bellow of rage provoked an answering chorus of roars and moans from the husks.

Note to self: If you survive this, get a fucking pistol that hasn't been fucking well retrofitted.

56 Days ASR Horizon

Shepard stepped down off the shuttle and looked up at the Collector cruiser looming over the colony. "Sweet baby Jesus," she whispered, taking a couple of steps toward it. Finally, a decent look at one of them. A slow, twisting sort of superstitious terror crept through her, slithering between her ribs and curling around her spine, chill and scaled. It looked as though it had been flown straight out of hell.

"Know your enemy," Garrus said, voice hushed and subvocals flat.

Glancing his way, Shepard rumbled, a low moan of discomfort turning over deep in her throat. She reached up to rub the back of her head, a slow wave of dizziness washing over her, just a knee-deep surge of warm water and foam, gently pushing then drawing her back.

"Shepard? Are you all right?" Martin clapped a heavy hand down on her shoulder, the grip feeling like a docking clamp. The dizziness receded.

"Yeah, fine." She rubbed the back of her head again, feeling a little like the back door and all the windows had been left open, a sweet spring breeze blowing through. "It's just, every time I learn more about them, the more impossible they seem." Looking up at the Collector ship again, the fear vanished, leaving nothing but a very healthy dose of contempt.

Shaking off everything but the business at hand, she turned toward her people. "Mordin, how sure are you that these emitters are going to protect us from the swarms?" Her stare locked on the salarian.

"Only exposure will tell," he replied, moving over to stand next to Chakwas, Vincent, and Miranda. Kaidan, Thane, and Jack lurked just behind them, weapons at the ready.

A wry chuckle slipped out, riding the back of a long breath, and she nodded. Of course that was his answer. Time to push on. "Okay, science team, you'll hang back ten minutes, let the assault team clear a swath through the bad guys." Looking to Miranda, she said, "Shuttle Alpha is under your command to ferry samples or to pull you out if necessary. Don't risk the brain trust." Gaze slipping past the operative to Kaidan, she nodded toward Chakwas and Mordin. He responded with a tiny salute.

"Shuttles Bravo and Charlie. Lt. Cortez, do you read?" The colonist evacuation team sat thirty kilometres outside the colony in shuttles with geth prototype stealth drives. Hopefully with the assault team making a lot of noise, the other two teams could do their work in relative peace.

"Cortez, here, ma'am. Reading you loud and clear. Shuttles and extraction teams ready when you have colonists to evac."

"Roger that, Lieutenant." Shepard took a deep breath, blinking a little as the alarm in the back of her skull twitched. Just a blip that didn't make sense. She felt nothing off. "All right, assault team, let's move out." She nodded to Javik to go ahead on point, falling in on his four, Nihlus at his eight.

"Anyone else feel like that thing is watching them?" Martin grumbled from Shepard's six. Despite the worry in his voice, he moved sure and steady, all honed reflexes and combat assurance.

She glanced behind her, admiring the man for a moment before she nodded. "It looks more like a hive than a ship, but it is just a ship, kid." Lifting her arm, Shepard cast a quick glance at the gleaming gauntlet of chiastyllia wrapped around her forearm. "Do you have anything that will help us? Can you sense where the Collectors are? Where survivors are?"

"Our range is limited, as is our knowledge of the Collectors. Our connection to the Cynosure has been severed just as yours have been to your vessel. We feel others, crying out in pain, the pain all they've known for cycles beyond counting." The chia went silent for a second, then a heavy jolt of panic lanced through Shepard from the gauntlet. "The suzerain are here! They're here. So many chiastyllia screaming, begging for release. So much pain!"

Shepard clapped a hand to her temple, pain riding hard behind the lightning bolts of fear and grief. "Calm down!" she said, the words a sharp, barked order. "Stop forcing your emotions on me, or I'll leave you here." Shepard focused her will into a blade that severed the chia's connection and the construct opened. Pulling her arm free of the two halves, she moved to make good her threat. "I won't be manipulated. I need to fight, so if you're going to come with me, you need to stay calm so I can focus. Stay calm."

The rush of emotion ebbed. "The Collectors were taken by the servants of the suzerain and changed over the long tide of cycles to serve their needs, to be their eyes and hands from dark space," the chia said, as if the entire freak out had never occurred. "One such race is always chosen to prepare for the next cycle."

"So, the Reapers can control them from dark space?" That thought slapped her with both dread and an odd hope. A link to the Reaper fleet could prove invaluable. What if they could find a way to tap into that signal? She slapped the gauntlet back on, and sent a quick message to Miranda to collect intact Collectors if possible.

"Now, you're meant to be here as a help, not a hindrance," she told the chia. "No more outbursts, just scan and feed me data." She nodded to Nihlus, who'd stopped to wait, a hip cocked, his arms crossed with his rifle slung across them.

He lifted a brow plate. "Ready? Or do you need to argue with your arm a bit longer?"

"Move out," she said, levelling him with a haughty glare that she completely belied with a crooked grin. The smartass face he made in return set off a sweet ache behind her sternum. Playful Nihlus was a beautiful thing, and suddenly that tiny ping went off again … the one that unleashed the woman who had agreed to kids a couple of nights before.

Focus. Damn it, that's worse than the chia freaking out. Lock that down and now, Janey.

Drawing in a long, cleansing breath, she settled her Mattock in her hands, the familiar heft grounding her back into the all-too-familiar arena of life and death, bullets and things so much less sweet to contemplate than her future family.

They entered the colony from the west, the opposite side as the Collector ship. They'd hoped that further away from the vessel, they'd locate more survivors, but they found absolutely nothing. At least their armour modifications held as the seeker swarms swirled, as oblivious as leaves on the wind. The colony reminded her altogether too much of Noveria" the feeling of hostile eyes watching and waiting for the perfect opportunity to bleed them.

Her boots whispered through the tall, dry grass, each footstep sending sylphs and tiny butterflies fluttering into the air. Shepard drew in a deep breath that smelled of dust and clean, sweet meadows. The colony remained more undeveloped than she would have thought, just prefabs thrown down on the grasslands. Not that it wasn't nice to see people leaving some of the world intact, but the lack of the usual markers of life and civilization just made it feel more like a ghost town with each passing street. At least the spiders lay dormant and silent inside her head, so no black orbs awaited them.

She frowned, reaching into that aired out house inside her head. The spiders … . She prodded gently, like a tongue worrying a sore tooth, but not—

"Incoming," Nihlus called back in a soft whisper, his tone snapping Shepard into battle mode. Then she heard it. Husks howling … the frantic scramble of feet in the grass and bodies flinging themselves over obstacles in a ramshackle rush. Nihlus nodded toward one of the houses. The long building’s windows all stood open.

"Yeah, we'll need decent cover." She signaled Martin and Javik. "Take the end doors. Close and lock them. Keep them that way."

"I'll go up," Garrus said, gesturing toward a ladder with his rifle, "and try to thin the pack as they close in." Shepard nodded, watching him climb for a second before heading inside.

Shepard stood in the window closest to the approaching husks, waiting for a visual, because nothing showed on her HUD. So much for the chia being of use breaking through the Collector jamming. The garbled howls drew closer, a manic grin spreading across her face. It sounded like a lot of the bastards. Glory hallelujah, a decent fight. No fucking mind games, no eldritch monsters, just husks, and she still held onto a few IOU's from Eden Prime. She switched her Mattock for Ingrid.

As the howls grew nearer, realization dawned: a sharp slap in the back of her head. No spikes anywhere. There hadn't been any on Freedom's Progress either. That meant experimental, factory husks brought in on the Collector ship. She didn't harbour a single doubt about a processing plant on Earth, not after Thessia and Palaven. And maybe, just maybe there might be something about these husks, something contained within them, that might lead her to the factory.

The first appeared, running through a narrow alley between buildings. Shepard checked that she had disruptor ammunition loaded, then pulled her old lady in against her shoulder, sighting the head on the second. With a boom that shook the building, Garrus dropped the first. Not to be outdone, Ingrid punched a hole straight through the second husk's face.

A third one fell, but a swarm of the frantic techno-zombies followed on its heels, the press quickly overwhelming what Shepard and Garrus could bring down. Shepard launched an overload into the thickest part of the crowd, Garrus, Nihlus, and Martin following suit before they all opened fire.

Despite corpses covering the ground so thick that they hid the grass, a heavy wave of husks still reached the house. Grabbing hold of the window ledge, clambering over each other, they swarmed up and over, pouring into the room. Where the hell had so many come from?

What started as an orderly fight dissolved into chaos, assault and sniper rifles traded for pistols and knives, fists and boots. Bodies surged, pressing in and eventually separating Shepard from her squad.

Clawed, dessicated hands wrapped around Shepard's throat and the collar of her armour from behind, a sudden, scrambling weight sending her stumbling. Throwing herself forward, she ducked her shoulder hard and flicked her hip, trying to flip the husk over her head and out the window. For a moment, she thought the move had worked, the husk's grip sliding over her skin, its nails screaming along the ceramic armour. Then it's fingers caught a grip and the floor just disappeared from under her feet. A second later, she hit the ground outside the window, flat on her back, husks leaping on top of her like pro football players.

Gasping, the wind crushed out of her, she pulled her pistol in tight against her body and pulled the trigger, punching a hole straight up through the pile.

"Shepard!"

She heard her name shouted from all sides above the insane, garbling noises of the husks, but couldn't shift beneath their weight, not even to get enough air to yell back. Then her pistol ran out of shots.

Fucking, goddamned heat sinks. She wriggled her arm loose and bashed anything she could land a blow on, fighting to clear a path to her omnitool. A scream clawed its way from her throat as sharp-nailed fingers dug into the wounds on her cheek, tearing her open. Biting down hard, she cut it off and swallowed it down, unwilling to give them that much power. Instead, she blocked out the pain, and hammered her way to her weapon interface.

"By all that's fucking holy, I'm not dying in the middle of some goddamned husk gang bang." Her bellow of rage provoked an answering chorus of roars and moans from the husks.

Note to self: If you survive this, get a fucking pistol that hasn't been fucking well retrofitted.

She launched Droney, then set her overload, overclocking it enough that it could well fry the emitters, and render her unconscious. "Better that than ripped to shreds." Clenching her teeth, she hit the control, and the world exploded into white hot light and searing pain. Clawing hands stilled as electricity arced and tore through the pile, locking all Shepard's muscles into a rigor that twisted her backwards until her spine crunched like twigs underfoot.

"Shepard?"

Instead of trying to answer Nihlus, Shepard concentrated on breathing, a feat achieved fluidly thirteen seconds later. Twenty-nine seconds later, she could move, and shoved her way out of the pile of fried husks. Instead of heading back inside, she hobbled across the street, taking cover on a small balcony to whittle away at the husks from behind.

"I really need to stop doing that," she sighed, collapsing against the railing. "Sweet baby Jesus, that hurts like a sonuvabitch."

"Are you all right?" Nihlus called over the husks and gunfire.

"Yeah, just bbq'd myself a little." Her legs regaining some of their strength, she popped up over her cover and emptied her Mattock's heat sink into the backs of husk heads, the dance smoothing back out into the familiar rhythm. Everything settled into place, the enemy falling as senseless, brainless zombie-creatures should when facing a squad of big, goddamned heroes.

The flood of husks ended, and the street hunkered still and silent in the Collectors' shadow, not even insects droning through the air or in the grass.

Shepard leaned into the railing and pushed herself up, stretching once straight to work all the kinks out of her battered muscles. Giving herself a shot of medigel, she stemmed the slow bleeds from wounds torn open by the husks. "Everyone okay?" she called.

"Javik and Nihlus both got a couple of bites and gouges taken out of them," Martin reported.

"Nothing that a little medigel won't patch," Nihlus said, talking over Martin at the last. "We're ready to move out, Shepard."

"They know we're here now," Shepard said despite knowing she didn't need to. She picked her way through and over the twice dead corpses, aiming for the alley from where they'd come. "If you're up and functional, let's keep moving."

"I need another minute," Martin said. "Need to bandage Javik." A muttered tirade from the Prothean followed, but Shepard couldn't make out any words until Martin replied, "Oh, stop grousing."

Shepard grinned and shook her head, then crouched down next to one of the husks, rolling it over on its back. The Collectors had definitely upgraded them from the Eden Prime variety, making them larger, heavier, and stronger. She reached up and rubbed her neck, the muscles all torqued from tossing the one that had dragged her through the window. She stood, her hand migrating back to her head, fingertips lingering over the massive scar.

"You all right?" Garrus asked, striding up behind her. He gripped her shoulders, turning her to face him, then looked over her scrapes. "That overload couldn't have felt very pleasant." He nodded at her hand. "What's going on with the back of your head? That's got to be ten times you've reached up and poked at it."

"Really?" She dropped her hand to her side, then grinned and shrugged. "Yeah, the overload stung a bit." She smiled, hoping the expression didn't look as weary as it felt. When he released her, she turned toward the rest of her squad. "All set?" she asked, levelling Javik with a 'don't give me any BS' stare.

"I'm fine, Captain." He strode past her, taking point up the alley. "The primitive child overreacted."

"Okay, then." Shepard tossed a grin over her shoulder to the 'primitive child' and winked before setting out after Javik.

Three streets further in, they began to find paralyzed colonists scattered between buildings and hiding within. A good sign, but for the complete lack of Collectors. The further in they got, the more she felt something missing. She prodded the sore tooth, but couldn't nail down what kept pinging her alarm. Still, it kept buzzing like a wasp at the very top of her spine.

"Where are the Collectors?" Martin asked, his mutter giving her wasp a stinger. The kid leaned over a strange, almost cocoon-shaped pod. "This is what they transport the colonists in?" He sounded on the verge of turning the pod into a puke bucket. "It would feel like being nailed into a coffin and forced to watch as they buried you alive."

Shepard crouched next to him, giving the pod a once over. A second later, she stood and clapped a hand on his shoulder. "Come on, let's make sure these bastards don't stuff anyone else in these things."

They spread out across a long, wide street that led between homes and warehouses to a large, permanent structure. Judging by what she could see of the doors, Shepard figured garage, and probably the way into the spaceport and secure part of the colony. If the colonists managed to mount any sort of defense, it would be further in.

A gleam of opalescent greens, browns, and silver drew her eyes to a strange, almost insectile shape propped up against one of the pods, that one occupied. Shepard forced herself to look past the woman's expression of terror, her eyes wide and staring ... murky beneath the amber-like shell. She placed a hand on the pod. "Is this made of corrupted chia?"

"Yes, partially," the gauntlet replied. "The main casing is made up of a resin created by the Collectors similar to the construction of the computer on Thessia. The pods are biomechanical/electrical in nature and are meant to be slotted into a larger construct."

Processing chambers. Shepard bit down on her response, not wanting the poor soul trapped within to overhear them discussing her fate as grey paste.

Instead, she plastered what she hoped was a reassuring smile on her face; it felt like a grimace. "Just hang in there," Shepard said to the trapped colonist. "We'll get you out as soon as we can."

Swallowing the urge to tear the thing open with her bare hands, she picked up the object that had grabbed her attention in the first place. "It's a weapon." She aimed it down the street and pulled the trigger. A heavy beam tore down the empty street and burned a hole through a low fence. "Blessed fucking Enkindlers, it's a hand-held particle beam."

Garrus stuck his head out an upstairs door. "I think you'd better let me take that," he called down. Shepard shook her head and cocked an eyebrow as she hung it from her back, her Mattock settling into her hands. "It's always the biggest gun with you," she said. "Somethings never change." She looked down at the pod again, hoping its inhabitant could hear her. "We're going to push ahead, clear out the Collectors, but I promise you, a team is on its way to get you out and take you somewhere safe."

The pod pulled at her with the gravity of a super-massive black hole as she took her first step down the street, but each step grew a little easier. The extraction team would rescue all the paralyzed. Her duty lie in securing the colony and killing every Collector that crossed her sights. And so, she pushed on, heading toward the garage at the end of the next block.

When Garrus fell in at her four, Shepard stopped and cocked a shoulder toward him. "Go ahead, Callor, you can take the big gun." She chuckled as he took the weapon, a rolling purr of pure gun-porn pleasure vibrating in his throat.

"Shepard!" Martin stuck his head out of a top floor window. He vaulted through the open portal, dropping easily the five metres to the ground. "What about the rest of us?"

Pointing to the path ahead, Shepard squinted against the brightness and said, "Go, find some Collectors, kill them, and take theirs." The sun's glare stabbed straight in from above the garage roof. "And keep your mind on the mission, there's a reason we were hit by such a massive wave of husks." She stabbed her Mattock toward the fence she'd hit with the particle beam. "Move up, get into cover, keep eyes on. They're setting up an ambush."

When the kid moved to take his position, Shepard dove into her belt pouch for her sunglasses, slipping them on. Not that they helped all that much, the glare still proved blinding. Perfect conditions for an ambush, indeed.

Shepard moved forward, keeping to the center of the open space between the buildings despite every shred of common sense she possessed insisting that she stick to cover. The Collectors sent the husks to slow her down, but also to test them, get a read on their strength. The next wave wouldn't be so easily taken down, but even then, it wouldn't reveal their full strength. Let them see her coming, cocky and exposed, maybe they'd show their hand.

The wasp stung, sending a jolt down her spine.

"Nihlus, scout ahead, twenty metres ahead of Martin on the left." She pointed toward a small shed and generator that provided decent cover. "Javik, up on the lower porch on the end on the right. Garrus, upper balcony, same building."

Everyone moved into position as she continued forward, moving slowly, but steady.

Maybe ten metres before she reached the end of the first block, a papery sort of buzzing sound tickled the outside edge of her hearing. It reminded her of the drone of a large dragonfly.

"Does every breath still taste of grave dust and ashes, Shepard?"

Shepard froze, the voice stopping her in her tracks, the wasp sinking a stinger the size of a K-bar™ into her spine. She knew that voice. It had reached out of the stone on Thessia and possessed the swarms on the Cerberus station.

"Have you wondered why your terror of darkness and death have lost their hold? Do you feel them moving, inevitable and welcome, at your core?"

"Incoming," Garrus called from his perch. His voice—supremely confident and ready for business—helped banish the voice and the sliver of ice it stabbed down through her. "Flying in at our twelve."

Shepard tore her hand from the base of her skull, and shaded her eyes against the sun, a small cloud of shapes dropping down out of the blue.

Isn't that always the way?

And for a moment, she froze, something … ugly and nameless and blacker than sin … blacker than the tar-spiders that lived between the folds of her brain … pressing in on her from that lying sun and powder-blue sky.

The spiders … she felt nothing, not a twitch or a skittering leg, and the reason for the sting finally registered. That open door and the windows letting in the breeze … they were the fresh air of freedom. Shepard clapped a hand to her temple. Sweet Jesus, she'd actually forgotten what it felt like to be alone inside her skull.

But no spiders meant no protection from the Reaper indoctrination signal. Eyes remaining glued to the incoming Collectors, she dove into her belt pouch for a syringe of the indoctrination serum, injecting it before moving forward once more.

"Do you feel it?" the gauntlet of chia cried, their voice laced with terror that they blessedly kept to themselves. "They're here."

Shepard took standing cover behind a wall. She could feel … something. Greed … no … not greed, hunger … a ravenous, endless hunger to recover what was stolen. A hunger so pervasive as to constitute madness.

The echoes cannot be allowed to complete the Catalyst at any cost. We will regain our rightful place. The servants will obey and perform the task for which they were created. The thralls will thrive in our care, never again rising up against us.

"Yes!" the chia said. "Yes! The suzerain. They need to reclaim their servants … the entire galaxy."

"Neutralize Captain Shepard," the deep, terrible voice said from a couple of metres distant, tearing Shepard away from the distant presence and madness of the suzerain. "Kill the rest."

"Fucking hemorrhoidal Enkindlers," Shepard grumbled, clenching her jaw. "As if one terrifying evil power wasn't enough. We had to get stuck in a war between two."

She glanced out. Collectors landed along the grassy courtyard. The closest one strode toward her, its shell cracked and glowing as if magma threatened to explode through, just like the little drones. Swallowing a bolus of overwhelmed helplessness, she pressed her back to the wall. Oh well, two evil powers or not … she just needed to kill the ones in front of her, and keep doing it until she'd cleaned the galaxy of every last one.

"Possessed drone," the gauntlet said, its volume lowered to a whisper.

"Whatever the hell it is, it's dead." Shepard ducked out of cover just in time to face a ball of undulating black energy flying straight at her, another ball … that one like a ball of flame … following right on its heels. She turned back into cover, then something slammed into the wall, throwing her back, right into the path of the shot. Throwing herself into a roll behind the wall, she felt the fiery ball slam into her left hip. It sent her sprawling, flames exploding along her armour. She covered her head, the stink of roasting hair filling her nostrils before a torrent of cold and wet splashed over her head.

"Drop your arms, Shepard."

She did as Martin said, scrambling up once the kid extinguished her hair and the effect burned itself out. "Shit. Avoid that one." She gave him a shove toward Javik's position, not willing to send him back across and expose him to the drone boss's attack, then took cover again.

"Garrus, you have eyes on that glowing bastard?" she called rather than sticking her head out to see and chancing another hit.

"Affirmative. Another attack incoming, move!"

She rolled further behind the wall, then stepped back. Black tendrils, almost like the indoctrination field around the Conduit, snaked through the wall. A couple seconds later, the fireball roared past the end. "Hit it with a concussive shot," she said, returning to her cover. Once she heard his shot impact, she leaned out, launching Droney before opening fire. As soon as her tool pinged, she keyed up incinerate, the power turning the Collector into a pile of ashes.

"Okay, we know how to kill that one now," she said, turning her attention to a drone armed with one of the particle rifles. The rest went down easily, only eight of them taking the field. A test for certain, and probably a delaying action. Shepard strode over to the last one to fall and picked up its weapon, tossing it to Martin. "There you go, kid. A great big gun, all your own."

"It's power cell is almost drained," Martin said, shoulders slumping. "Can't wreak bloody doom with no charge." He crouched next to the dead Collector. "Maybe it was carrying a spare." After a "second, he let out a small crow of victory."

Shepard strode over to the first set of garage doors. "Nihlus, Javik, watch our backs." Activating her omnitool, she set into bypassing the lock. Someone had scrambled the hell out of it, giving her a reason to hope that some of the colonists had made it to safety.

Garrus hefted his particle rifle. "I imagine the geth will be able to take these apart and adapt them for standard power cells." He hung it from his back. "It tore through the Collectors in seconds. I can't wait to see what it can do against the Reaper units."

"Garrus," Nihlus said, gesturing his fratrin over. "Take my position for a minute?" When Garrus replaced Nihlus, the Spectre walked over to lean against the door next to Shepard.

She glanced at him for a split second before returning to her bypass.

"Do you feel it?" he whispered, pressing close.

Shepard frowned, but stayed focused on her work. "The spiders are gone. Whatever the suzerain are, they've completely pulled out of my head. Is that what you mean?"

He shook his head, his mandibles canting a little. "No, although that might be a part of it." He cleared his throat. "I feel something … a pressure … like … ." He grumbled. "I can't explain it. It's not strong or clear enough, but it feels like it's coming from Merol, or the beacon information, anyway." Shaking his head again, he muttered, "There's something about this place. Feels like … maybe I've been here before, or something."

Shepard let out a soft cry of victory as the lock succumbed, then turned to look into Nihlus's eyes, searching for any sign of trouble. She didn't see anything but a deep concern and some confusion. "Keep yourself open, we'll see." She shook her head and reached up to scratch at the back of her head. "The presence from the orbs has pulled out, but otherwise, I feel as jammed as the comms."

And she did. Her emotions felt flat … distanced.

His brow plates rose, slanting a little. "Except your alarm keeps going off, doesn't it?"

Sucking in a strong breath, Shepard nodded. "Yeah, except that." She tipped her head toward the garage. "Let's keep moving. Beacon mischief or no, there's a trap waiting ahead of us. Of that I have zero doubt."

"Extraction team to Shepard. First two shuttles are loaded and away."

Shepard slapped the door control. "Excellent news, extraction team. Keep me informed. Shepard, out."

Inside the garage, people stood packed tight, standing room only, every single one frozen, surrounded by the amber and black smoke. They might not have kept the seeker swarms out, but they'd managed to avoid the Collectors and their pods.

"Let's move. We're taking too long to get through here," Shepard said, pushing through the wall to wall colonists. "At this rate, they're going to have ninety-eight percent of the colony."

The door on the far side had been scrambled, but luckily set to release from the inside, and they emerged back into the sun. Shepard cracked her neck, feeling as though she'd just crawled through a mass grave. The sun did nothing to ease back the dank chill, especially when she reached the top of a short ramp and turned into an elaborate complex, Collectors wandering the walkways and gardens, standing inside the buildings as if they belonged.
Shepard dove into cover praying to the sweet baby Jesus that they hadn't spotted her. She waved the others into cover by her side. Using hand gestures, she organized their assault, Martin and Nihlus hitting the small clusters of husks with grenades, then Garrus and Javik—

The sun darkened as if a cloud slipped over its face. Glancing up, Shepard shielded her eyes against the glare of the piercing blue sky, just as cloudless as it had been minutes before. She held out a hand: shadowed. She poked at the sore tooth, but the spiders hadn't returned, so that wasn't messing with her eyesight.

"Is it getting darker, or is it just me?" Martin shifted next to her, glancing toward the sky.

"Spirits." Garrus's soft oath pulled Shepard straight back to the Collectors. She looked to her husband, then followed his stare to a massive bug-shaped metal monster flying in above the buildings. "It took the Normandy to bring down the last one of those we tangled with."

"Oh, shit." She glanced at Martin. "Get ready to use those power cells. We're in the crap up to our teeth now."

"Two more monsters descending from the top floor right rear building," Nihlus whispered. "What in the name of buratrum are they?" His sentence dissolved into a subvocal that lifted the hair on the back of Shepard's neck.

The two lumbering down the stairs from the right each looked as though someone took a few ordinary husks and smooshed them together like plasticine. Was that … ? A massive cannon replaced their right arm, the damned thing made out of at least most of another husk. Their heads stuck out at odd angles, a massive sack of … who knew what … pulsating on their backs. For a moment, Shepard had to fight back her breakfast, but then the things both sent some sort of shockwave pounding across the complex toward them. Everything the splash hit froze solid.

Fan-fucking-tastic, biotic cryo zombies.

"Move out! Nihlus and Martin, head for the first building on the left. Garrus and Javik, just try to find decent cover, but keep mobile." She switched her Mattock for Ingrid, and launched Droney. "Nihlus and Martin, use your grenades on those two big bastards. Martin, Garrus, Javik get your particle beams on that massive, flying mother of an Enkindler's ass." She set her incinerate for area effect and sent it searing toward the two lumbering monsters, pulling down some of their armour.

Chaos reigned once more. The massive bug-shaped one slammed down into the ground, letting out some unearthly wail that threw everything in the courtyard onto its ass. Shepard scrambled back up, sending Droney zipping toward the biggest target. Maybe if she could keep the three big ones occupied … .

"Assuming direct control." Even over the cacophony of battle, Shepard heard the boss Collector's voice. One of the drones at the back of the complex rose into the air, writhing as if being torn apart from the inside. Then with an explosive flash, it burst … getting larger, the cracks glowing from within. It flew toward her, landing just the other side of cover.

"You escaped us before, Shepard. Not again," the thing said. "You cannot escape your destiny."

She glanced over the low wall just as Garrus hit it from behind with a concussive shot that blasted away its shields. Striking with incinerate, she rolled down the wall, coming up hard against the wall of the garage. Fuck. Nowhere to go.

"Shepard!" The air sizzled just above her head as Garrus turned the particle beam her way. "Nihlus, the glowing one has Shepard pinned."

The rumbling thumps of shockwaves cut off any replies, but then flakes of ash drifted down onto Shepard's face.

"You're clear," Garrus hollered. "Get to better cover."

Instead, she crept out a little further and sent another incinerate into the two sack-monsters, tearing down the rest of their armour. "If you've got grenades, hit those two. Armour is down." Taking a long breath, she waited for the grenades to detonate, then darted straight toward the two slow monsters, hoping to deke past them and up to the second level.

She was halfway across the complex's courtyard when the sun all but went out. She stumbled a little, recovering in time to roll out of the path of one of the cryo-shockwaves.

"Come on, Shepard," she said, growling at herself, low and fierce. "Move your ass." She dug in running hard, dodging husks and the smaller Collectors. Strange how they suddenly seemed so damned harmless by comparison.

Almost there, Janey. Almost—

The massive bug crashed down into the stairs above her, the husk heads inside its maw emitting one of its piercing 'scream of the damned' shrieks. It flung Shepard backwards, lifting her right off the metal decking, throwing her four or five metres to land flat on her ass. Crawling backwards, nose and lungs burning with scorched ozone, she raced to put some distance between them as the thing pounced, landing half on top of her. Two blinding purple particle beams erupted from the thing's eyes. Shepard barrel-rolled to her right … beneath the creature. She crashed into a back leg and flipped over, scrambling out from under the thing's ass and straight into a sprint.

She'd made it halfway up the stairs when the Collector monsters suddenly all let out a thunderous chorus of screams, wails, and bellows. The power and … and … sheer agony of it staggered her, but she pushed on. She needed to make it up to the second level to provide cover for her team.

"What the hell?" Martin asked, his tone a disturbing combination of terror, delight, and fury. "What the hell?"

Reaching the top of the stairs, Shepard paused and turned in time to see the bug's particle beams tear both of the sack monsters into ribbons. Collector drones fought off husks, the tech-zombies crawling over each other and their allies like they'd caught some sort of zombie rabies. Her people stood out of cover, mouths hanging open as the Collectors obliterated each other.

The bug ended the battle flopped on its side, twitching. Climbing down a couple of stairs, Shepard finished it off with three shots into it's flickering eye-lights.

"The suzerain have come!" the chia cried.

Shepard looked up, her eyes suddenly too large and too dry for her face. She staggered back toward the building, her heart stopping in her chest, her lungs freezing solid. A ship … at least she thought it was a ship … blocked out the sky in every direction, covering at least the entire compound, but more likely the entire colony. Not even Sovereign had come close to matching the size of the gleaming, crystalline monstrosity hovering over their heads.

"The suzerain have come!"
(A-N: A day late, hopefully not a dollar short. Horizon has taken a strange, strange turn. :D Thanks, as always for reading. To those who leave reviews and comments, thanks so much. Sometimes the encouragement of readers is all that keeps me beating my head against the keyboard. I luv yah!)
Future Continuous Chapter 21

Chapter Summary

Nihlus shoved the voice back through the tiny trapdoor that kept Merol at bay, slamming it in the prothean's face: that distraction the last thing he needed. Bad enough that the entire planet felt like a fist poised to drive straight through his chest. The sun shone too brightly, the sky too wide, the rolling hills and light forest far too open. He pressed his back to the metal wall and watched the world go mad around him, a nest of hibernating soluvermus writhing in his gut.

Soluvermus - A small (average size 8-12 cms/1 cm diameter), heavily armoured earthworm native to Palaven's more northern and southern regions.

Ahmu - (Prothean) Mother

Bahta - (Prothean) Father

Bihni - (Prothean) Daughter

Kerashe - (Prothean) Dearest one

Suum - Slaves. Thralls. The races under Leviathan that rose up to depose them.

Tar'za'liik - Ancient turian god of storms. His roar was thunder so loud that it was said to drive whoever heard it insane, and his lightning so bright and fierce that it could turn anyone who displeased him to ash at a touch. Those who bore his favour were branded with fire, usually somewhere conspicuous, the brand ghastly, for to be favoured by the gods always bore a price. His was disfigurement.

56 Days ASR Horizon

Why Horizon? Of all the planets for the Collectors to target, why the third planet in the Iera system? When they'd landed, he'd watched Shepard to see if anything about the planet triggered her, but she acted closed off, as if something stood between her head and her heart. He supposed that he should have expected as much: she always managed to keep Tashac sealed away. He wished he could keep Merol silent with that level of thoroughness.

Amani. The planet is Amani; the ball of flame burning in the blue is Jikomuja. The ground beneath our feet screams with rivers of blood. With the blood of—

Nihlus shoved the voice back through the tiny trapdoor that kept Merol at bay, slamming it in the prothean's face: that distraction the last thing he needed. Bad enough that the entire planet felt like a fist poised to drive straight through his chest. The sun shone too brightly, the sky too wide, the rolling hills and light forest far too open. He pressed his back to the metal wall and watched the world go mad around him, a nest of hibernating soluvermus writhing in his gut. Iera's bright fire did nothing to break up the chill, second skin that settled inside his armour the moment he stepped off the shuttle and looked up at the golden leaves hanging heavy and still on the trees.
'It's fall, the leaves golden and sweet-smelling at last. So many days painted morning and night with summer colours, each feeling as though the season—the siege—would never end.' A sigh drifts behind the words, sending them swirling amidst those leaves. 'If our luck and stealth systems last until winter, the base's geo-thermal grid will allow those sheltered here to slumber undisturbed by time and the last days of our defeat.' Warm hands slide beneath his robe, welcome comfort—

"Nihlus!"

Garrus's shout pulled the Spectre's mind from the thick soup swirling just beneath his skull. He shook his head and brushed a hand over his face, then lifted up just high enough to scan the courtyard. Husks and Collector monsters converged on the general and Javik, who'd managed to circle around to the head of the complex, finding slightly elevated cover.

"Get to Shepard. We'll cover you. Martin, cover his back." The filament of fear threaded through the general's unflappable calm pulled Nihlus the rest of the way back to the warm, fall day. Lifting higher, he saw Shepard trying to bolt around the far side of the complex, making for the second level and a decent sniper perch.

Right, double bolting the lock on Merol's trapdoor, he glanced over at Martin. "You got my back, kid?" he called, turning away to slip down the wall to the nearest door. He pulled one of his last few grenades, set it for an incendiary blast.

"Ready when you are," Martin replied, crouching below the large window and perching his Revenant on the sill.

"Wait for the boom." Nihlus leaned out, lobbing the grenade seven metres away from the door before ducking back and covering his head. "Fire in the hole!" A bright flash of superheated flame consumed everything within its radius, clearing the path. "Kryik crossing the courtyard!" he called then bolted.

Before he covered half of the courtyard, dodging the husks and Collector drones that made it past Martin's assault rifle, Nihlus saw the giant bug thing leap nearly the entire length of the space to cut Shepard off from the stairs. It let out a blast of power, throwing Shepard backwards down the stairs. Damn it! Why couldn't she just stay with the rest of the group instead of trying to draw fire? Trying to protect the rest of them was going to get her killed.

"Shepard!" He dug in, bolting another three metres before being forced back into cover.

Peering out, he watched her scramble away from the monster, but it pounced, just missing impaling her when she rolled aside at the last second. Damn but the woman possessed extraordinary reflexes. When it fired its twin particle beams, she threw herself from flat on her back into a roll that made his bones ache just watching it. She crashed into the back leg, cursed and then leaped out from underneath its chassis and bolted up the stairs.

Spirits, in action hero mode, Shepard was hotter than any being had a right to be. The second after that highly inappropriate thought crossed his mind, realization dawned. He stood in the middle of the complex, no cover, surrounded by enemies, devoid of purpose since Shepard had rescued herself, and bullets ate away at his shields. Priority: cover and fast.

Halfway to the stairs, using the massive bug-thing as partial cover, Nihlus stalled, a strange pressure flooding his senses. It pressed in and down like huge hands trying to crush his skull between them. He stumbled mid-stride, a flailing hand stopping him from going down as it slammed into a planter. He blinked, his vision blurred, his head aching. What in the pits ...?
The Collectors all let out blood-chilling screams, and the constant battering of their firepower against the back of his failing shields disappeared. Refusing to check a gift rifle's firing pin, he pushed on and up the stairs, taking cover at the top next to Shepard, who stood out in the open, an expression of utter bemusement contorting her face. He glanced between the Collectors tearing one another apart and Shepard, who looked up, watching not the battle below but the skies above.

Leaving her to gawk, he turned his assault rifle on the Collectors, finishing off the ones that lie, twitching on the ground. Still, he saw orange light flare in his peripherals as she activated her omnitool and lifted it, running scans on whatever it was that dimmed the skies.

"Dammit." Closing down the scans, she stepped up to the edge of the stairs. "I'm so damned sick of this stupid war getting weirder and more horrifying. Just die. Fucking all of you just do us a favour and kill each other." She lifted Ingrid to punch fist-sized holes through first the cryo-zombie's heads, then the carapace of the bug-shaped one.

The giant bug Collector ended the fight lying on its side, the metal legs twitching, the husks inside still shrieking like souls being dragged down into the pits. Spirits, that noise! It felt as though it sucked the energy straight out of his cells, an aching draw that left him exhausted despite a good twenty metres separating them.

Shepard silenced the cacophony with three shots straight through the thing's … eyes? Weapons? She hung Ingrid up and turned to face Nihlus, but before she could speak, the chiastyllia did.

"The suzerain have come!"

Instead of acknowledging the gauntlet, she turned to the sky once more, her mouth working as if she possessed so many questions that they fought each other to get out.

"The suzerain have come!" the chia cried again.

Nihlus finally looked up, unwilling to admit that he dreaded acknowledging whatever it was. He agreed with Shepard that they dealt with far too much strange and horrifying as it was. Still, he looked and could have sworn he stared straight into some sort of crystal mirror that blocked the entire sky. It reflected the ground and compound below, but not perfectly … some of the blue sky showed through. It could almost be considered innocuous, its shape sleek and glistening like a faceted jewel in the heavens. Almost, except for the crushing pressure of malevolence that oozed down from it, invisible twins of the twisted spectres of black the Conduit gave off.

"So many screaming," the chia cried. "So many in pain."

Nihlus shuddered, the muscles to either side of his lower spine seizing. Somewhere in the hidden folds of his brain, he could hear the screams. Billions of tiny voices that hadn't stopped crying out in their agony for millions of cycles.

"Shut it," Shepard said, both her words and the hand that sliced the air, scalpel sharp. "Are the Collector units all dead?" she asked, pivoting on her heel to search inside the building. Inside, frozen colonists stood, knelt, and sprawled, amber and black-smoke statuary standing vigil over the Collector dead. In that same space that heard the enslaved chia calling out, Nihlus felt something moving inside his skull. It didn't step forward, didn't try to take him over as it had on Illium, but present.

Perhaps Merol had slipped his cage once more.

"Giran! My beautiful, fierce bihni … ." Merol backed toward the door. Panic drove a long knife through his chest at the thought of leaving his last daughter among the sleeping-dead. "Come with us, kerashe. You should be with your ahmu and I."

She smiled and stepped into his embrace, brushing her kepala along his. "You have one another and Attit. These people need me, you do not." His last daughter left a strong imprint of love and devotion, then stepped back. "When you've hidden the Conduit, return and wake me. We'll be together again."

"Shepard," Garrus called. "You and Nihlus all right over there?"

"Yeah, fine, big guy. Just sweeping the upper level. On our way back down in a second, and we've got a colony to save." Shepard's voice cracked a little. She twisted her neck until the vertebrae snapped like a series of dry twigs. Perhaps she didn't have Tashac as well contained as he imagined. Still, she pushed on, strong, angry, and determined. "Assault team, let's keep moving. Meet me at the gate at the back of the compound," she called, her fingers resting over her radio. "Science team, everyone all right?" After a second, she nodded. "Excellent. S&R team, report in?"

Even as she spoke, Shepard moved with purpose, her weapon nestled in the crook of her arm. He caught up with her as she signed off with Lt. Cortez.

"Looks like it didn't damage anyone but the Reapers." She nodded toward the door out, but then stopped and lifted a hand to press against his cheek. For a second, as their eyes met, the captain stepped back in favour of the dilan. "You're all right?"

Nihlus pressed his hand over hers, the contact an anchor that helped contain the pressure in his head. "It felt like someone was crushing my head for a couple of minutes, but it's fine now … just feel like someone's watching from inside my own skull." He sighed and wagged his head a little. "Being here has Merol coming out of his skin as well." He fluttered his mandibles and leaned into her palm. "However, this helps." For what felt like the millionth time, he thanked the spirits or whatever powers watched over the universe for Shepard and Garrus … for that connection and family. The more insane the universe became, the more he cherished them.

Shepard's hand lingered, warming his face for a couple more seconds before Captain Shepard settled back in place. "Yeah, I've got everything locked up behind two-metre-thick security doors, but I can feel something. It's not interfering—just sitting there—but I don't trust it." She gripped his hand, leading him toward the door, apparently savouring that one bright point of normal and sane as much as he. "Come on, let's go see if the suzerain just saved all our colonists."

"No," the gauntlet said, the voice of the chia strident. "Suzerain don't save; they enslave. They came for a reason, but it was not to save the humans living on this planet. They would sacrifice every human, every turian … every life to reclaim their former glory."

"Of course they would." Shepard dropped his hand.

Nihlus stepped up beside her. "So, what are we looking at? What is that thing overhead?"

"During the great insurrection, the suum became far more powerful than the suzerain could have imagined. The most advanced races formed a brotherhood with artificial life, and upgraded themselves until they became capable of building great ships and constructing mighty weapons. They fought the suzerain to the brink of defeat." The chiastyllia let out another wail, stilling even as Nihlus saw Shepard's jaw clench. "Then the suzerain discovered the chia," the gauntlet continued, calm once more. "Their will formed the people into terrible, massive weapons of war like the one above. Only through using the people to enhance their power of subversion and domination did they survive the war and crush the suum rebellion."
"So, that thing up there is what?" Shepard asked without glancing down. She palmed the next door and jogged through, speeding up. A long, furious-sounding sigh roared in her throat as she exhaled. "Is it some sort of biotic amplifier?"

"Yes, a vehicle designed to render a system helpless and cut off. Three of them together can destroy every form of resistance on a planet with a single command."

Nihlus felt his gut drop into his boots. He took a breath to ask the obvious, but Shepard beat him to the punch.

"Can they kill Reapers with those dreadnoughts?" They emerged outside at front of the compound, but on the opposite side, and Shepard stopped to look down at the chia when they remained silent. "Can they?" She lifted the gauntlet, once again making as if to leave them behind. Her tone and actions began to feel brittle, on the edge of turning into just slamming her way through everything like a mako through a thresher maw.

Not that he blamed her as he looked back up at the dreadnought just sitting overhead. How were they supposed to fight that thing if it came down to it?

"Damn it, answer me. Can that monstrosity kill a Reaper?" Fury snapped and licked around her like flame, and he opened his mouth to suggest that she let him deal with the chia.

Then the gauntlet answered, "Yes, and they have in the past, but they will not unless one of their kind is threatened. They do not wish the servants destroyed, they wish them to return to their duties in an empire restored. Do not consider the suzerain as potential allies, they are a threat."

"So, they're not above killing all of us if they see us as challenging them?" Nihlus asked. He gripped Shepard's shoulder, supportive but a slight increase in pressure and twitch of a brow plate asked, was she okay?

Shepard nodded as the chia answered, "They have allowed the Reapers to destroy all advanced life many thousands of times over millions of cycles. They have done this because better that than allow the Reapers to discover the answer to the question and discover the limitless possibilities of imagination and connection. Better trillions dead than allowing their servant to attain true freedom."

Shepard's nod amounted to nothing more than a faint twitch, but her jaw relaxed. He released her. Letting out a long, rough breath, Shepard led the way through the middle of the compound to where the others waited, everyone casting nervous glances toward the sky.

They passed into shade beneath the building, and Nihlus straightened, not realizing that he'd been ducking until his spine protested. The rest of the team seemed to feel the same pressure, not that he blamed anyone for being skittish with a massive doom machine made up of barely known, let alone understood, aliens sitting over their heads.

Shepard strode over to the gate and began bypassing it, Nihlus able to see her mind working faster than the omnitool. She glanced back at him and then Garrus. "Okay, they told me that the Reapers have discovered the means to answer the question." She looked up, meeting Nihlus's gaze. "They told you that as well."

"And that they're building the Catalyst. They said that—" Once again, Nihlus's gut took a belly flop into icy water. " Spirits, the Catalyst … they're building it out of colonists … it's another Reaper … a Reaper that answers the question."

He saw the realization dawn in Shepard's eyes as well.
"A Reaper with a soul," she agreed, her whisper pressed flat, a barely vocalized thought.

"Shit, the colonists!" She brought up the manual interface, fingers flying through the commands, the gate relenting to her within seconds. It opened to reveal a large yard filled with dead Collectors and husks in all their forms.

The crackle of static over their radios stopped the small party just inside the bay that housed the frigate that would become their home until the Reapers returned to dark space. "Commander Jacar ... Ahmu, Bahta ... the base is under attack! Get clear!" Giran's voice rose harsh and furious over the sounds of battle.

"Giran!" Tashac called, beating Merol to the radio. "We're returning to your side, kerashe. We can help hold the base."

"The base is overrun." Their last daughter paused before she said, "I love you all." Soft tones hardened. "Attit, get our parents clear!"

The roar of distant explosions yanked Nihlus from the memory, rough claws spinning him around to stare as the Collector ship began to blow up from the inside. "What in the pits?" he said, the words a thin whisper, disbelief rooting him for a half-second despite the chia's warnings. When it broke, he bolted toward the spaceport, strong hands stopping him as he passed between Shepard and Garrus.

"Nihlus, no," the general said, his expression as miserable and furious as Nihlus felt. "There's nothing we can do. It's too late."

"The suzerain are controlling the Collectors?" Shepard asked, her demand hissing between clenched teeth even as she pulled him back toward the gate. "They're making them destroy their own ship?"

"To deprive the Reapers of their building materials," the chia replied, "yes."

"How can they ... ? Can we stop them? They can kill the Collectors, and we can get the people out." She turned to Garrus and then to him, panic and imagination spinning alternatives so quickly that he could see the screens flipping.

"They will not risk another Collector vessel returning to salvage the vessel and remaining colonists."

The entire skin of the Collector ship began to crack, fires erupting through the fissures. "Everyone through the gate, get into cover!" Shepard ordered, turning to shove Martin back the way they'd come before she and Garrus ran, arms urging one another on.

"No! You don't need to— They're innocent—"

"Nihlus?" Shepard called, slowing and turning to wait for him.

No, his anger couldn't be allowed to put Shepard in danger. "Right behind you." Nihlus tossed Javik through the gate with one massive heave when the Prothean just stared at the corrupted vessel, a satisfied sneer celebrating its destruction.

Then the explosions reached the drive core, announced by a blinding flash followed by Tar'za'liik's roar. The shockwave flicked Nihlus into the air with all the effort of someone brushing an insect from their clothing. He tucked, rolling as he hit, then scrambled behind cover next to Shepard and Martin.
Debris, shrapnel and dust pelted their cover, shredding the thin metal of the prefabs in the compound. When the wind and cacophony died down, Nihlus reached up, digging the heels of his hands into his aural canals, the ringing in his head worthy of the storm god's wrath. Shepard stirred next to him, pushing herself up, her face frozen in a rictus of a fury that matched the fire raging in Nihlus's heart.

He leaped to his feet, entire body screaming in protest. "You bastards!" he shouted, railing against the impassive monster in the sky. A hand rested on his arm, turning him to face Shepard. Tears streaked the filth on her face, but he knew they merely reflected the impotent fury burning at her core. Shepard needed to rescue everyone, and it never failed to carve huge gashes in her heart when she couldn't.

"All hands, converge on the periphery of the explosion site," she said, shouting into her radio. "Miranda, you're in charge of search and rescue efforts. Get Dr. Eis down here to help Chakwas and Mordin. We could use Ms. Chambers and Vincent as well. All hands on deck. This is going to be a hell of a mess."

"Shepard … ." Nihlus didn't continue but tipped his head up at the dreadnought poised overhead and cocked a brow plate. Did they need to herd more drellak into the slaughter yard if the suzerain decided to obliterate the planet's population? She nodded, but continued, calling down all hands and shuttles to aid with the wounded.

"Whatever you and the docs need, get it, understood?" she said into her radio as she twisted a bandage around her hand, applying pressure to a gash across her palm. Nihlus held his hand out, giving it two, emphatic shakes when she refused to relinquish it. She grumbled a little as she placed it in his talons and he unwound her sloppy work.

"Me?" she continued with Lawson. "I'm taking the assault squad in to see if there are any survivors, start putting out fires, whatever we can do." A sharp breath cut through what he felt sure was yet another case of Miranda's insubordination. "Opinion noted. Shepard out." The second she closed the channel, Shepard's eyes focused past him, though she hissed a little as he peeled off her glove. He winced at the depth of the slice, but merely lifted a foot onto a piece of rubble and laid her hand palm up across his thigh.

Shepard gestured with her other hand as she gave orders, moving enough to make cleaning the wound an exercise in frustration. "Garrus, Javik … see if you can find fire extinguishers and stockpile them at the back gate. Martin, go back to the garage. If the people are out of stasis, send twenty or so skilled volunteers our way, get the rest to Miranda."

His turn. A laser stare bored into the side of his head as he turned his attention to dressing her wound. "I wasn't questioning you," he said without her needing to speak. Her intensity began to burn. "Betting that they won't take out the settlement because we're here is a gamble, that's all."

A sigh, steam hissing through a cracked valve, broke from her lips, and she nodded. "I know, but what's the alternative? Sit here and leave the colony to burn?"

Nihlus smeared a thick layer of medigel across her palm, and wrapped the hand tight, so her glove would slide back over it. He hesitated, pretty sure even with the medigel, she needed the wound sealed properly, but then just passed her the glove. She wouldn't stay still long enough for healing until after she'd secured the colony.

"Thanks, cikabeknai," Shepard said, grabbing hold of his yoke and pulling him down for a quick kiss. She moved to pull away, but he grabbed hold of her upper arms and held her, their brows touching.
"We'll do everything we can, haksaya kubenar," he said, sliding a thick layer of calming subvocals under the words. He breathed her in, drawing as much strength as he hoped he gave, the hint of jasmine and spice caressing his olfactory and pheromone receptors and slowing the beat of his heart. "Everything we can. Right?"

Shepard took a breath and pressed into the contact for a second. "Right." Another soft press of lips against the rigid plate of his mouth and she pulled away, turning toward the sound of running feet.

Martin raced around the corner from the garage, an orderly double line of colonists right behind him. "I found your volunteers." He stopped and looked back at the group with a respectful sort of pride. "They worked on the colony's emergency and fire brigade or at the spaceport, so even come complete with hazmat gear."

Shepard grinned, the first real smile Nihlus had seen on her face since they landed. "Excellent work, Instructor Weaver." She nodded to the colonists, the mantle of leader easing some of the brittleness as it settled onto those deceptively narrow shoulders. "Thank you for volunteering. I've got doctors, medics, and bodies on their way, but the faster we get into the site and start disaster control protocols, the better."

An older man in red overalls stepped forward. "Chief Randall McQuire, ma'am. I was the head of the Emergency Management department at the spaceport." He looked around, his entire body sagging for a moment before he straightened. "Most of my people are missing, but we need to get in there and see if the fire suppression systems are intact. The land is dry as a bone this time of year. We could lose the entire colony."

Nihlus glanced at Shepard, seeing his relief mirrored there. He didn't have the first clue about fighting a fire of that magnitude.

"Then we'll gladly leave that to your people, Chief," Shepard replied. "However, if you need help, shout. We'll get you whatever you need."

Nihlus and Shepard spun in sync, hearing footsteps running up from the ruined compound the other side of the gate. Garrus and Javik both wore helmets, and judging by the rasp in his voice, Garrus had done some choking on smoke before giving in.

"It's bad back there, Shepard," he said, cutting an arc over his shoulder with his thumb. "But we found twenty or so emergency kits, fire extinguishers, pry bars. They're all piled away from the fires, just this side of the entrance to the landing field."

Nihlus packed down the anger. He couldn't do anything about the suzerain in their dreadnought, but trying to save their victims … that formed a task he could sink his teeth into.

"Excellent." Shepard turned to the Emergency Chief. "Let us know when the area is safe to start searching for survivors, Ch—"

Movement at the far end of the complex caught Nihlus's attention as Shepard's mouth snapped shut, the pair of them turning toward the battered figure limping toward them.

"Skipper?"

As one, the rest of the squad spun toward the voice, their weapons lifting to face the new threat. For a moment, Nihlus just stared at the woman. Williams stumbled to a halt, leaning against the bumper of a truck, blood running down her face and splashed all over her pink and white armour.

"Ash!" Shepard lowered her Mattock and raced to the Marine's side, Nihlus right behind her. Each taking a side, they wrapped an arm around Ash's back, supporting her even as her knees buckled. "Nihlus, take her," Shepard ordered, helping him lift the woman into a cradle carry. "Got her?"

He nodded, and Shepard hung up her gun, bringing up her omnitool to scan the Marine. "Sweet baby Jesus, Ash, you're beaten to crap." The captain spun, searching the debris field, then lifted her hand, beckoning to the lieutenant even as they made their way to the garage. "Sparky are you close to my signal? Ashley needs medical attention. We need you and the docs here now!"

They made it back through the gate before Alenko raced around the corner, a med kit slung over his shoulder, omnitool active. "Ashley?" Kaidan called as he matched strides with Nihlus, scanning her even as they moved. "What are you doing here?"

The chief's head wobbled a little as she lifted it from Nihlus's chest. "Hey, LT. Well, you know … just living the dream." A thick, wet cough chased her brittle chuckle from her chest.

"You're here keeping an eye on the colony for Cerberus?" Nihlus asked. He took a long step over a twisted piece of prefab, the jarring pulling a thin moan from the chief.

She nodded. "Good thing, huh?" Her head made a soft, hollow thock as it dropped back against his armour. "I did a bang up job saving all these people." She shook her head, just a faint tremor to either side and then closed her eyes.

"Hey," Nihlus said, understanding and empathy lending steel to the word. When she didn't open her eyes, he gave the soldier a slight squeeze. "Hey, Williams." With a stubborn reluctance that tugged at his mandibles, she cracked one eye to glare at him. "There wasn't anything any of us could do against that dreadnought, but we're here because you were here. If you hadn't been sent to check in so regularly, it could have been days before anyone found out."

"Cold succor, Spectre," she said, the grumble thick and wet, blood bubbling inside her lungs.

"It is what it is, Williams. Sometimes the galaxy just throws handfuls of tar to you, and the only thing you can do is hose down and carry on." He nodded toward Shepard who tossed rubble, spurred by worry and rage to feats of freakish strength as she dug a table out of a pile of ruin. Her bellows roared over the sound of rescue crews as she called for Chakwas or Mordin.

"Shepard! Ease up!" Garrus raced over and dug in, no doubt trying to help to spare her a week of chiropractic treatments.

"What do you think she's telling herself?" he asked, leaning down so only Ashley would hear him. "Don't you think she's furious and feeling helpless?"

Ash looked over at the captain. "She always did take every bullet fired at the squad like a shotgun to the gut." Sucking in a deep breath, she nodded. "Okay, I get it, Spectre." She grinned, a sharp, toothy expression. "You've been taking Shepard lessons." A shrug lifted one shoulder. "You need to work on getting some grit and volume, though. When Shepard tells you off, she leaves abrasions that bleed for a couple of hours."

He chuckled, obeying Shepard's waved summons to lay Ashley down on the cleared table. "Yeah, I don't think anyone will knock her off that throne."

"Where are you hurt?" Shepard demanded, helping Kaidan peel off the Marine's armour, searching her for wounds. "The doc is on her way. She and Sparky will set you right." She winced, finding a hunk of shrapnel embedded just about Ashley's hip. "What's the situation, Ash?" she asked, continuing to remove armour. "We're not finding nearly enough colonists—dead or alive—for a Nihlus's hand reached out to grip Shepard's wrist, just a quick squeeze to silently communicate the worry that burned at the base of his throat. One glance from Shepard halted it before it made contact.

'I'm fine. Don't coddle me,' snapped from that pointed glare, returning his talons to removing the chief’s armour.

"We found a huge series of tunnels and what looks like a hangar complex buried under the hills on the north end of the colony," the chief reported, the words sluggish and punctuated with sloppy coughs that splashed her lips and chin with blood. "As soon as that thing appeared, we evac'd as many as we could."

Kaidan placed a wadded up canvas tarp under Ashley's head. "That's enough talk, Ash. Just lay here and let me look after you, okay?"

"You're in good hands," Shepard said, before pressing a hand against Ashley's cheek and then Kaidan's. "Good man, Sparky." She looked up into Nihlus's eyes, holding his stare with one haunted by the memories that kept flashing through his mind.

"The Senarium's base," he whispered, reaching out to take her hand as she rounded the head of the table. She passed by him to stare to the north, past the belching smoke of the fires.

She squeezed his hand, pulling it tight against her side, her voice small and lost as she replied, "Giran."

Senarium - The division of the Prothean government's science branch that was tasked with ensuring that the five major keys to dark space were stolen and hidden.

(A-N: Heyas. Sorry if this chapter is rougher than usual. At least my beta assured me it didn't suck. :D So if it does, address all angry letters to her. :D runs and hides from Vy Lots of important stuff in this one, and the next, but I've been sick, and had two computers die in a week, so I'm off my game a little and my fingers are really confused by three different keyboards. Hopefully I can get 147 out faster than this one. Sorry for the wait. All the love.)

(A-N-BETA: NO ANGRY LETTERS! NO! ~ Vy) Sometimes betas having edit access gets abused, that's all I'm sayin'.
Unlikely the other prothean ruins she'd walked through, even Ilos, the silence and emptiness of those corridors bled, a constant drip that she felt on the back of her neck and in the center of her chest. Because, unlike those other ruins, she remembered what those corridors sounded like filled with the bustle of life: the laughter of children, the intellectual arguments, the whispered affections. She remembered it as a living organism, some great and precious creature that now lay dead and buried, its corpse formed of nothing but dust and regret.

Dahtaric - The highest rank of the Prothean Scientific Authority

Regulikar: The Prothean central government.

Morumplacus - Restless spirit, undead, ghoul. From ancient turian folklore. The souls of those slain by dishonourable means were believed to wander after death to exact justice. They were believed to torment the living by taking the form of whatever the victim feared most.

Arate - Prothean rank comparable to captain

Binav - Prothean rank comparable to private

59 Days ASR Horizon

The tunnels leading to the underground prothean base teemed with life and noise, Horizon's survivors walking that thin line between grief for the lost and relief at their own survival. Kind words and busy work soothed the former amidst the excited, nervous chatter of the latter. To Shepard's ears, the noise, even the grief, amounted to life, and it eased the weight of days of silence and crackling flame … of the roar of fire suppression equipment and agonized moans … of screams and fists hammering against the lids of pods even as the fires cooked the poor bastards trapped inside.

Yes, life—even in all its shit, tear, and blood-stained horror—lightened the impossible burden of the past three days, and she felt its absence keenly as the walls closed around her, pressing tighter with every step that carried her down into the Senarium base. Unlike the other prothean ruins she'd walked through, even Ilos, the silence and emptiness of those corridors bled, a constant drip that she felt on the back of her neck and in the center of her chest. Because, unlike those other ruins, she remembered what those corridors sounded like filled with the bustle of life: the laughter of children, the intellectual arguments, the whispered affections. She remembered it as a living organism, some great and precious creature that now lay dead and buried, its corpse formed of nothing but dust and regret.

"Vindication?" Shepard called, walking up to the closest computer access point. She pressed her hand to the interface. "Confirm and recognize imprint of Commander Tashac Jacar." When the base's VI didn't answer, she nodded, not expecting any different. Indoctrination tainted Tashac's imprint and her own. "Nihlus?" She glanced back, a weary smile brushing her swollen, still-bleeding face when he nodded and stepped up. Heels dragging through the thick dust and debris on the featureless, grey floor, Shepard backed up to give him access to the panel.

The Spectre's hand ghosted over her chin as he stepped past, the soft, fleeting touch comforting. He peeled off his glove and pressed his talons to the interface. "Vindication, recognize imprint of Dahtaric Merol Natil, and provide access to base systems."

As Shepard waited for the VI to respond, each breath took more effort to draw in and did less to feed her body. Ten seconds ticked over into twenty and then thirty. She activated her omnitool, scanning the air once more to be sure that carbon dioxide or worse hadn't settled close to the floor. Oxygen levels read within normal range, even richer than Earth norm.

It's all in your head, Janey. You're just overtired and starting to hallucinate a little.

Overtired, she couldn't argue with. For three days, she'd searched the wreckage of the Collector ship, pausing to sleep for a few hours only when Nihlus or Garrus witnessed her falling over, or she fell asleep sitting or leaning somewhere while she paused to eat or drink. Even then, she'd only agreed to lie down if they did as well. Needless to say between the three of them, the levels of sheer stubbornness ensured they only slept for two or three hours at a time. The rest of the time, they ran off stims and caffeine.

Finally, she'd quite literally fallen asleep on her feet and fell forward, bashing her face on a piece of wreckage, thus the swollen, split lip. Oddly enough, no matter how hard she tried to convince Garrus and Nihlus that she was fine, the fountain of blood pouring down her chin had made them somewhat intransigent on the whole 'seeing the doc and getting some sleep' issue.

By the time she got to the point of standing there, waiting for the base's VI to respond to one of them, Shepard couldn't make the 'I'm all right' claim any longer. Her face felt as if someone sculpted it from putty, the entire thing numb and cold except her lip. Well, and her eyelids. They felt lined with sandpaper. Not to mention that, judging by the crunching sounds and pain emanating from her joints, some bastard had dumped handfuls of ground glass into them.

All in all, Horizon had quickly lost any tiny amount of appeal it once held.

A minute ticked over into two. "Sweet baby Jesus, if I stand here any longer, I'm going to grow roots and turn into the glowing tree of the Enkindlers' blessed firmament. Then, once every six years, the hanar will festoon my branches with flower garlands and gather around me to dance and throw small, shucked clams and half-eaten minnows at one another." She shuddered. "Well, at least, until someone accidentally starts the mating rituals, then things will get crazy … and nobody wants that."

She bit down on the inside corner of her bottom lip as both Nihlus and Garrus gaped at her, their brow plates canted at the same angle, their mandibles doing little, helpless flails of incredulity. She flinched as her wound complained, releasing her lip but waiting for them to comment. Before they could say anything, the VI responded.

Impatience born of exhaustion stabbed needles into Shepard's spine, sending her back to the interface rather than waiting as requested. They needed to assess the damage to the base, see if anything could be salvaged, particularly information, and then get the hell off Horizon. The ground under her feet felt as though it burned through her boots, poisoned by the threat hanging over their heads, the thousands upon thousands of dead and wounded, even the base itself.

"According to scans," Vindication stated, "20,458,319 days have passed since my program was deactivated. Base structure remains 97% intact. Damage is restricted to the north and east entrance tunnels where the exterior of the base was compromised."

Shepard's hope began to dissolve when the VI didn't mention the souls they'd left to sleep within the base. "And the personnel? Did any make it to their sleeper pods?" Weariness pressed down, bowing her shoulders as it pulled her down into a thick layer of dry quicksand.

"Negative," Vindication replied. "Enemy forces penetrated the base prior to the security systems activating the lock down. Arate Giran Jacar called all personnel to the defense lines while the neutron purge was primed and detonated. As soon as the base defenses locked down, Arate Jacar ordered the purge. All lifesigns within the base ceased .672 setixs after detonation."

Shepard reached out a hand, buttressing herself against the wall as the coffin lid slammed down on the base, sucking the air from her lungs. Tashac remained silent in her cell despite the flood of grief that rushed out under the door. Reaching out, Shepard took Nihlus's hand, squeezing his talons when she felt them trembling. He'd never managed—nor even particularly wanted to—control his passenger very well. Nihlus nodded and tugged free of her grip to replace his glove.

"All right," Shepard said, declaring the brief mourning period at an end as she pushed off the wall. "Vindication, please release the seal on this door and on all interior doors. Leave all exterior entrances locked down except for the south." She pressed her hand to the interface. "Also, sync your systems to our mobile devices, and provide a map to the important hubs within the base. Continue your projection as your emitters allow throughout the base."

"Confirmed."

Shepard punched the door control the moment the lock indicated that the seal was disengaged. A map appeared on her omnitool, the computer core and labs all indicated. At the far end of the base the map showed a series of elevator shafts that dropped … . "This can't be right," she said, a soft mutter of bewilderment. She held the map out so Garrus and Nihlus could see it. "This says, they've got a series of cargo elevators that go down nearly five klicks into a network of huge labs or bays … or something. There's an entire other base down there, living quarters, the works … but it's marked as nothing being there."

"You don't engineer something that massive unless you need it," Nihlus agreed. The scowl that had settled onto his face a couple of days before deepened, his gaze darkening enough that she guessed Merol's involvement. A soft growl rumbled through his subvocals. "They were hiding something down there."

Shepard nodded and held his stare despite his trying to duck hers, as if he didn't want to admit to being locked out of Merol's memories. She reached out to press her hand against his chest. "This place … " She looked around the hangar stretching out before them, the cement barren but for the dust, disturbed here and there by insect tracks. "... it's a blank in my head. Tashac usually has something to offer me, but other than evacuating and leaving Giran … everything else is locked down."

He pressed his hand over hers. "Merol as well." Taking a deep breath, he let out another growling sigh. "Whatever is down there, they don't want anyone knowing about it."

"Yeah," she agreed. "Maybe not even the two of us." That thought sent a jolt of dread through her unlike anything she'd felt since facing down Nazara on Virmire and realizing that the damned thing had been stalling in order to trap them. Remembering how well that fuck up had turned out for them ... well, she needed to proceed with previously unmatched caution.

"If we go through everything on this map, we're going to be here a couple more days," Garrus said, pressing up behind her left shoulder. "Want me to call the science team in? Now that the colonists are secure, Mordin and Miranda could take the computer core." A heavy hand rested on the back of her neck, gentle talons massaging the base of her skull, easing the tension sending splinters of pain jetting up into her head. "If you can get Javik clearance, he and Martin could go through with them."

Shepard leaned back into him a little, glad for his broader view. She nodded and reached up to swipe at her bottom lip, the damned thing still allowing spit to escape from nearly everywhere. Pressing her fingertips to her aural implant, she opened the team channel.

"Operative Lawson, status report."

"We've got the colonists settled into the tunnels. Medical facilities are up and running. We located a doctor and three nurses among the colonists, and Lt. Cortez is retrieving four doctors and a dozen nursing personnel from other settlements. The camp here should be able to take care of their own as soon as the medical team arrives."

Shepard nodded, giving the operative credit for organizational skills second to none. "Excellent news. If the science team can leave, we need your help go through the Senarium base. There's too much here for us to do alone. I'm going to make sure Javik has clearance to get you access, and I'll send you the map to the computer core and the main labs. Martin and Sparky both have tech savvy, so they'll be able to help as well as provide security."

"Understood, Captain. I'll have the team to your current position within ten minutes."

"Excellent, Javik and Martin will be waiting. Shepard, out." The captain glanced over at Javik even as she spoke to Vindication. "Vin, recognize Commander Javik's imprint and allow him access to all base systems." She nodded to the prothean commander. "You know the drill, just touch the interface."

Giving her a stiff nod, Javik approached the terminal and pressed his hand to it.

"Commander Javik recognized as possessing Regulikar Black Level security clearance. Access to Senarium systems granted."

Shepard met the prothean's haughty stare, nonplussed by his clearance. He'd been left behind to rebuild the empire, after all. He'd need to be able to access systems galaxy wide. "Get the team through the computers as quickly as possible," she told him. "If they were working on anything here that might help us in fighting the Collectors or Reapers, we need to know about it."

She turned to Garrus and Nihlus. "Let's go check out this blacked-out section of nothing down here at the bottom of the base." A bitter laugh escaped as she shook her head. "Nothing says hiding something like a big 'nothing to see here' sticker plastered over a spot on the map."

Garrus reached around her to tap the sync control on her tool, sending the map to his visor. "Nothing says walking into something that's going to try to kill us—"

"Or scare the tarc out of us," Nihlus interjected, activating his omnitool to grab the map as well.

"... or scare the tarc out of us like blacked-out sections of secret bases," Garrus finished, flicking his mandibles at his fratrin. He turned a slow circle, then nodded toward a glowing control on the far wall. "That looks like our exit."

Shepard nodded for them to go ahead and turned to Javik and Martin. "Stay in touch, and Javik, keep an eye on Miranda. I don't trust her not to hide some of her finds."

The prothean merely nodded, but Shepard knew that he maintained his professional front with Cerberus only out of respect for her via her link to Tashac. He wouldn't let Miranda do anything that would hurt the war effort.

"Any orders for me, Shepard?" Martin asked, a cocky but exhausted grin tugging at one corner of his mouth.

Turning to follow her torins across the hangar, Shepard called back, "This planet breeds really huge insects. Make sure no one gets carried off." A wide grin answered his groan.

"You going to be okay?" Nihlus asked as she stopped at the threshold to the base.

Shepard nodded, twisting a little to step between them. "Dying seems to have abolished a lot of my fears." She shuddered at the thought of diving that deep beneath the surface with only one way back up, but then shoved her shoulders together. "None of the elevators are longer than 500 metres, and there are living areas and labs on the way to provide some breathing room. I'll be fine."

They crossed the base, Merol and Tashac imparting a self of familiarity that helped them navigate the labyrinth, although the sense of loss that greeted all the empty labs and dark sleeper pods made Shepard wish that they'd be forced to use the map.

She paused for a half breath outside the first of the elevators. The door control remained stubbornly locked down. Glancing over at the VI, Shepard shrugged and said, "What's the deal here, Vin?"

"Locks in this section require individual ID and indoctrination verification imprint," it supplied.

"Right, so super top secret." Shepard blew a noisy breath out her nose. "Not that it's unexpected, but certainly not comforting." Without thinking about it, she pressed her hand to the interface.

"Imprint accepted," Vin replied and the doors opened.

Shepard waited for the other two to enter so that she'd be standing at the exit, old habits dying hard. Still, as the doors shut in front of her, her heartbeat remained steady. Nice. She might even get used to her new lack of phobias. Stepping back, she pushed into Garrus's space a little. Although she didn't think she'd ever tell the big guy it was okay to turn the lights all the way off. She loved that little act of caretaker-ey-ness.

"Shepard," Garrus said. In her peripherals, Nihlus turned in tandem to face the general, something in Garrus's tone hooking them both. The general's mandibles raised and spread as he lifted a hand to cup Shepard's ear. "Did you hear what the VI said when he recognized Tashac and Merol's imprints? Do you realize, this elevator just opened at Tashac's imprint?"

Again, out of the corner of her eye, Shepard saw Nihlus match her, this time frown for frown. What had Vin said? Something about recognizing the unindoctrinated imprints of Tashac and Merol. Oh! She turned to look at one, then the other. "Unindoctrinated imprints," she whispered. Hope flipped inside her chest like a fish hauled up onto the rocks. "And me too."

Shepard nodded then, her frown fixed in place, but thoughtful. "I assumed Vin meant that it sensed them both in Nihlus." Intense, confused, and hopeful, she looked from Garrus to meet Nihlus's stare, then back. "He's always been our source of indoctrination-free imprints."
"Merol's, yes, but not Tashac's," Garrus countered. "On Ilos, Vigil activated the elevator and comms based on Merol's clean imprint." Talons clamping down on Shepard's shoulders, Garrus looked to Nihlus for confirmation.

A surge of relief burst through Shepard's dread as she registered the notion that whatever had been done to herself and Tashac could be reversed or hidden completely, but then the implications began to register, turning felicity to ash. "Well, it's got the be the suzerain since they're hanging over our heads." She bit down on the inside corner of her bottom lip, the old habit eliciting a soft curse. "So, they can do something to either completely reverse or mask Reaper indoctrination," she said, "but they haven't bothered until now." Numb fingers reached up to scratch at the scar on the back of her head. "And they've withdrawn from my mind completely for the first time since the Citadel. So, why now?"

Shepard closed her eyes and let her head loll back against her armour, but then the elevator doors opened, depositing them on the first sublevel. That floor consisted merely of a security station to pass through on the way to the next elevator. Spinning on her heel, Shepard turned to lead them through. "Whatever is down here," she said as the light dawned, her words clipped. "Whatever it is, they want to get me close to it, and they know that I couldn't get access with even the slightest trace of indoctrination."

A sudden flush of rage snapped her straight and stiff. "Who gives a shit?" she hollered, throwing her arms up, lashing out at the universe. "Seriously? I am so done with playing this game as a pawn." She palmed the interface. "With our luck, we'll find five thousand protheans down here, and they'll try to mow over us and run the war too."

As the second elevator swept them down another half-kilometre into Horizon's crust, a storm formed of converging fronts of sardonic amusement, anger, dread, and defeat began to boil in Shepard's gut. Every day the face of the war shifted, less about digging in and whittling down an impossibly strong enemy through applied ingenuity, tactics, and guts, becoming more and more about being shuffled around, the most current pieces on the board in an ancient game.

The first she could win ... maybe. The second? They needed to take out the Collectors, which she felt certain they'd be allowed to do, but then came the Reapers. The fact that the suzerain and their impossible dreadnoughts didn't want their servants killed, just hobbled ... that posed a very real problem. Trying to take out the dreadnoughts built around the ancient monsters? She let out a grumble that felt a lot like a retch. How in the name of the Enkindlers' glowing grabass was she supposed to pull that off?

Suddenly, being the glowing tree at the center of a hanar orgy sounded like the best of her options, because no matter which side managed to succeed in indoctrinating and using the galaxy's population, the pawns ended up screwed.

The elevator opened onto the second sublevel: housing primarily. She swept down the hundred-metre-long corridor, quickly palming the interface to open the elevator. Unlike the others, the door didn't immediately slide open, so it had to be called. She frowned, wondering if that meant anything, but then Nihlus broke through the angry flurry of her thoughts.

"The Collectors came for the people," Nihlus said, jogging up to Shepard. Garrus followed just behind the Spectre, his mandibles pulled in tight, his stare locked on Shepard and concerned. Nihlus stopped next to her and shook his head. "So, the Collectors came to harvest the colonists, but the suzerain didn't come here for the people."

"No. They didn't come for the Collectors either," Shepard agreed. "Taking them out was just about getting them out of our way. If it really was about stopping the bastards, they would have interfered. with the other colony abductions. They've got the means, just not the will." She turned when the door opened and stepped aside to allow them to enter. Following them in, she pressed her back to the wall and looked up into Nihlus's eyes, her gaze fixed inward. "This place is the reason they came. This place and the fact that we're here."

"They paved the way to get you both in here," Garrus said, his subvocals uneasy enough that the hair along the back of her neck prickled. "But they can't control either of you, not having withdrawn their presence completely from your minds." His mandibles flicked in a tight smile.
"Not that they could even before, you're both so stubborn. So why?"

Shepard let out a long breath and met the general's eyes, the thickness of her tone answering his worry. "I can't even begin to guess, but keep your eyes open, Callor. If either of us starts acting strangely …." She left the rest of that thought unsaid, but he nodded.

The elevator chimed, the door opening behind her, but before she could even get turned around, the power died, plunging them into absolute darkness.

"Fuck!" She yelped the curse as her heart jumped into her throat. Similar oaths from either side told her that her torins' pulse rates had hit FTL right along with hers. Shepard turned on the flashlight attached to her Mattock. "Vin? You still there?" she called. "Why did we lose power?" Garrus and Nihlus's flashlights filled the carriage with light, allowing her to release the breath she hadn't realized she was holding.

"Investigating," the VI answered. "Please stand by."

"Please stand by," Shepard grumbled. "Not like we have much choice." Wincing a little, she turned to look out the open door. A wide corridor opened before them, the deck plating reflecting blue into the broad expanse of black. Opening the map on her omnitool, Shepard ventured out, something telling her that Horizon's prize awaited them on sublevel three.

Moving silently, Shepard took a handful of steps straight ahead, but then stopped. "I hear breathing," she whispered. "There are …" She closed her eyes and reached up to turn up her aural implants, listening to the movement of the air out in the darkness. "… three or four other people within twenty metres." She returned her implants to default and gripped her Mattock in both hands, the flashlight sweeping the hallway ahead. The level felt like a haunted house, ghosts hanging thick and suffocating in the air, their corpse fingers tracing tracks through the dust.

Dust … . She took another step, the sole of her boot ringing clear and unmuffled against the tile.
She aimed her light at the floor. Nothing. Not a trace of dust. The floor looked so clean she'd swear the janitorial staff had just gone through. Sounds of life. Signs of upkeep. But if the damned place was inhabited, why was the power out? She backed up a step, retreating toward the elevator. At least until she remembered that it had lost power upon opening on that level.

Trapped. They'd been lured down into the dark, buried under a kilometer of planet in a giant trap, and locked in. Sweet baby Jesus. She lifted her wrist, hating the way her breath wheezed through her words as she spoke, addressing the chia. "Are the suzerain behind us being stuck down here?"

"We sense no trace of their energy. Nothing in our memory indicates that they would be able to control anyone this far beneath the surface."

"That's why they needed to get me down here." Shepard's lungs began to clamber for oxygen again. Not enough air. She reached up to tug at the collar of her armour. "Where the hell are we?
What the fuck is this place?" she asked, feeling the icy, skeletal fingers crawling between her lips.
Their points scraped over the torn flesh and caressed the blood that still trickled into her mouth on their way into her throat where they wrapped a strangling grip around the base of her tongue. Panic set her heart racing, her calm finally shattering. Her breathing drowned out the subtle sounds of life around them.

An arm wrapped around her neck, stripping a thin shriek of terror from her lips before Garrus's scent broke through her fear, her husband pulling her in tight against him. From the other side, Nihlus slipped an arm around her waist.

"Just breathe, Kahri," Garrus whispered. He bent down to pull her in tighter. "Press your face in against my neck, and just breathe. You're okay."

She did as he said, his heat warming the chill that clung to her, his perfect scent of cloves and myrrh, gun oil and armour underlayer reaching straight down to ease panic's fist from her throat. She wrapped one arm around him, pressing as close as she could manage considering their armour. "I'm okay," she whispered, as much for her own benefit as theirs. "I'm okay. Just had a moment."

"Vin," Nihlus called, his talons stroking her hair. "Report in. Can you restore power to this level?"

"Unable to restore power. Controls have been physically locked down from the lab control booth." The green hologram appeared next to them, casting an extra little bit of light into the space.

The light wasn't much, but between it, and the close press of her two torins, Shepard's panic eased enough that she pulled back, standing under her own strength.

Warrior inside and out, Janey. Breathe through it.

"Vin, mark the location of that control booth," she commanded. When the marker appeared on her map, she set out, moving quickly.

In, two, three, four, five. Out, two, three, four, five.

The corridor proved too tall and too wide to orient herself reliably just using sight. Uniform darkness spread in every direction. Checking back and forth between the map of the level and the few landmarks she saw around them—mostly metal girders that at least allowed her to keep track of the distance—she made her way to the side tunnel marked as the next leg of their route.

"Sweet baby Jesus," she grumbled, "I'm turned around as hell." Moving toward a railing on her right, she shone her light out into a huge, open void. Tens of metres away, the light glinted off something, a pinprick of reflection too close to be the far wall. According to the map, the space was nearly two hundred and fifty metres across.

"This is insane. Who builds this large underground … and how? The whole fucking colony should collapse into this pit." She turned her flashlight to the wall, searching for a computer interface. Gritting her teeth, she pushed on, using the railing as her guide. According to the map it would end, another starting five metres further along, then their next turn awaited at the end of that one.

The third corridor pressed close on either side. On the right, another railing and the impossible expanse of the prothean-made cavern. Less than a metre to her left, a series of tall, blade-sharp projections stood out from the wall as if someone had formed a long line of ship prows. The ten-metre-deep alcoves between the blades clung to the dark, jealously guarding their deepest recesses. Shepard's flashlight turned into each one, despite her brain's insistence that she didn't need to look.

The base was empty. It had been empty for a very, very long time. Nothing hid down those narrow slips of space. They'd probably been built to form sound baffling for whatever construction took place on the other side of the—Metal clanged, a sharp ring that made her jump, then chuckle as she let out a long, shaky breath. She was being an idiot … 'that' person on the paranormal investigation crew who screamed every time a coffeemaker light turned on or the heat ducts banged. Still, she pressed her hip to the railing, her flashlight checking each alcove as she passed.

In, two, three, four, five. Out, two, three, four, five.

Something darted across the foggy nimbus where the beam of Shepard's flashlight surrendered to the impossible darkness. She snapped the light around even as Nihlus did the same, apparently catching the same movement.

"Did you see it?" she demanded, hurrying forward, intrigue replacing her earlier panic. Dammit, something—someone—was down there. She'd been dragged more than a kilometre below the surface of the damned planet for a reason, and people meant finding out what that reason was. She swept the narrow space with her beam, finally settling on the Spectre who'd moved up to her nine o'clock.

Nihlus shrugged and scanned ahead before looking down at her. "I didn't see anything. You acted like you had, so I reacted." He squeezed her shoulder. "We're just about there. Once we've got some light, this place will seem a lot less like a morumplacus lair." He shuddered, a slight tremor down the back of his neck. He looked back to Garrus, who watched silently, his expression uncomfortable, almost as if he felt as though he didn't belong.

"I saw movement," Shepard said to Nihlus even though her eyes remained fixed on Garrus. "And I know I can still hear breathing." The captain grumbled and turned, easing her way forward. The breathing she'd heard earlier, and heard again … it wasn't imagination. "It's not ghosts or ghouls down here, it's someone very much alive and sporting a roman nose with more than one break." Glancing back at Garrus, she gave him a wan smile and added, "And I'm not just hearing myself echoing back. Well, I am, but this is separate."

Moving down the long corridor once more, she stepped ahead of Nihlus. Living, breathing people she could deal with, either using words or bullets. She swept the darkness, counting the strides to the corridor that led to the control booth. Despite the fact that her fear truly had settled, her flashlight still dove into every alcove. She chuckled at herself and shook her head. Superstitious fear really was an insidious passenger.

Her flashlight glinted off the railing where it turned the corner, and she sped up, relief pulling extra oxygen into her lungs as her heart sped up, but from excitement rather than terror. Just before she reached the corner, she caught another flutter of movement. Spinning to search for it, she flashed her light into the last alcove, the brightness reflecting back off a large face, its mouth hanging open, its eyes wide and staring.

"Jesus! Fuck!" she cried out. Jumping back, she slammed her hip into the railing, sliding backwards down its length for a couple of metres as her heart crawled up her esophagus to escape out her mouth and run screaming back the other way. Garrus and Nihlus raced up next to her, their guns trained on the unmoving man. Focusing her Mattock on the intruder, Shepard sucked in long, shaky breaths that trembled with laughter.

"Holy crap, my friend, you scared the shit out of me," she said, shuffling a little closer. He didn't respond other than to look at her. Frowning, she stepped right up. "Are you all right there?" She lifted one hand from her weapon to wave it in front of his face. "Hello?" No response.

"He's human," Garrus whispered, stepping up close enough to press along the back of Shepard's arm.
And he was. A slightly overgrown crewcut and a strong, square jaw framed a broad face. Dark skin and deep, almost black eyes were accented by the broken nose she'd predicted. His mouth hung slack for another second, but then he swallowed, pressed his lips together, and looked away, sidling further into the alcove like an animal startled out of cover. Damn, what had happened to him? Curiosity warmed into compassion and she smiled, letting her rifle drift toward the ground, lowering the light glaring in his eyes.

"Don't worry, we won't hurt you. What are you doing down here?" Shepard asked, letting him retreat and find some comfort in the shadows. "How did you find your way down here? Was it the suzerain?"

"They started showing up about five cycles ago," a voice spoke out of the darkness. Its accent told Shepard that the speaker was both female and prothean. "We think they make their way in from the surface where the charges meant to seal the tunnels cracked them." Movement closed on them from the last corridor. "Binav Kavrah," the voice ordered, "the lights."

Banks of light flared to life down the corridor, then clusters further out until Shepard was forced to cover her eyes for a moment, letting her pupils adjust. A plain, utilitarian space awaited her when she dropped her hand, everything so much less sinister and gothic when illuminated that her pulse rate and blood pressure both dropped instantly to normal levels.

A small squad of protheans halted at the corner, their hands relaxed on beam weapons like Javik's, their armour the same style, but shades of blue, green, and black: almost like beetle carapaces. The one at the front lifted a hand, halting the rest as she strode forward. Shepard raised an eyebrow, surprised that Tashac's memories allowed her to identify a female prothean in full armour.

The female stopped a handful of metres away. "Vindication recognized the imprints of Tashac Jacar and Merol Natil," she said after staring at Shepard for a few seconds. Her shoulders squared. "You are neither."

Shepard nodded. "I interacted with a prothean beacon and had their imprints and memories downloaded into my head."

"You hold their imprints?" The soldier hesitated, but then stepped forward, closing to within a metre. She released her rifle with one hand and reached up to remove her helmet. For another second, she looked down, almost appearing nervous, but then she straightened and met Shepard's gaze.

"Giran!" Nihlus exclaimed, hurrying up beside Shepard. He slid to a halt when Giran Jacar drew back. "Vindication said you died."

Shepard sucked in a slow, tremulous breath, trying to maintain her equilibrium in the face of the barrage of emotions that wailed from behind Tashac's locked door. Longing, joy, surprise, shame, terror … they tore through her, grabbing at the string's of Shepard's own emotions. She reached out, using Nihlus and Merol's reaction to help her wrestle hers back under control.

"Introductions seem to be a good idea at this point." She said, releasing Nihlus to gesture toward him. "Spectre Nihlus Kryik. As you have probably guessed, he and I shared the download from the beacon, so he also has your parent's imprints. He received more of Merol's memories whereas I received more of Tashac's." She stepped aside to let Garrus join them. "General Garrus Vakarian. He doesn't have any beacon imprints."

Giran closed her eyes and tilted her head. "No, but I still sense something there. A million million voices, all silenced."
Shepard nodded. "On the planet Feros, we were given something called the cipher from an ancient creature that called itself the thorian. It helped us decode the information from the beacons."

"And you?" Giran asked, cocking her head a little. "Who are you who smells and feels so much like Tashac Jacar, but looks at me with recognition from a stranger's eyes?"

"Captain Jane Shepard." She nodded and then looked toward the human. He'd completely withdrawn into the alcove, pressing himself as far into the sharp angle at the end as he could manage. She held out a hand and smiled. "You don't have to be afraid. We won't hurt you."

Giran let out a musical sort of sigh. "Henry does not retain enough of himself to understand." She touched her wrist, speaking into the small interface there. "Marcalin, could you come take Henry to the lounge, please. He's distressed." Turning her attention back to Shepard, Giran waved them further down the corridor, away from where the human cowered. "Do not be concerned. Henry trusts Marcalin. He'll calm down as soon as he's in familiar territory."

Shepard bristled, fury settling into a slow simmer in her gut. "What happened to him that he's like this?" she asked, struggling to keep the blades and barbs leashed. "How did he get down here?"

"As I said, they just appear," the prothean answered. "We cause them no harm, if that is what you fear. When they appear, we read them, to find out what their names are, who sent them, and how they reached this level of the base, but all they ever show us is dark and cold. A deep grey space."

"The suzerain," Nihlus grumbled. When Giran tilted her head, questioning and curious, he continued. "We're just starting to discover more about a very ancient race of beings that we know either by their title of suzerain, or by Leviathan."

"They control other being's minds," Shepard added. "And they want very much to know about what is hidden down here." Scrubbing a hand over her face, she just stared at the massive space, giving herself a moment to catch up with everything. Every scholar on every planet working together couldn't manage to create a scale to cover the amount of strange shit that intruded upon her life.

A turian hurried down the corridor from behind Giran and her people. She smiled and nodded to Shepard and Garrus, but paused when she spotted Nihlus. "Spectre Kryik?" she asked, extending a hand.

Nihlus clasped her wrist. "Hello. Marcalin, right?" He smiled then released her. "I'm sorry, have we met?"

The tarin chuckled and shook her head. "No. I've just seen you on the news." She shrugged, and lifted her hands to indicate the base. "Well, I had before I woke up down here six months ago. We don't get much news down here." She backed toward Henry. "It was a pleasure to meet you." Excusing herself with an awkward gesture toward the human, she turned away.

"Hey, Henry," Marcalin said, her voice gentle. "We're going to have some of that green pudding you like and watch a movie. Do you want to join us?" She held out her hands, the man hurrying forward to grip them. Pulling him in under her arm, Marcalin eased him out of the alcove and down the corridor.

Shepard swallowed the lump in her throat prompted by the tarin's gentleness with Henry. Apparently, whoever lived down here, they all cared about each other. "What in the name of the …?" Shepard stopped herself short of glowing backsides, considering the company. Who knew how much of the galaxy they'd learned about down there. "She seems fine. Why is she still down here?"
Giran reached up, scrubbing her knuckles along the underside of her kepalar ridge. After a second, she waved them forward. "Come, we'll show you what it is that these suzerain want to see."

"And the three of us?" Garrus asked. Shepard winced. She'd been hoping for more of a read on the situation before popping that cat out of the bag. Garrus didn't waver in the slightest when she glared at him, his front solid as stone. "Are we going to be held captive down here as well?"

Giran turned and set out down the corridor, apparently impatient with waiting for them to do as she wished. "That will depend on you."

Not exactly Shepard's idea of an ideal answer, but she followed. As much as she hated the idea of shooting their way out, that remained an option if push came to shove and then shove came to bullets.

Gasin (Gasinu - pl)- Prothean male the age of majority. (Dropped from 20 to 13 over the course of the war.)

Takun (Takune - pl) - Prothean female the age of majority. (Dropped from 20 to 13 over the course of the war.)

Dahtaric - The highest rank of the Prothean Scientific Authority

Regulikar: The Prothean central government.

Morumplacus - Restless spirit, undead, ghoul. From ancient turian folklore. The souls of those slain by dishonourable means were believed to wander after death to exact justice. They were believed to torment the living by taking the form of whatever the victim feared most.

Arate - Prothean rank comparable to captain

Binav - Prothean rank comparable to private

59 Days ASR Horizon

Shepard started after the group of protheans, taking her time and letting a demilitarized zone build between them. She didn't have any sense of Giran's play, but just handing them an open invitation to look at whatever the suzerain wanted to see? Yeah, she didn't buy that for a moment.

She paused outside a door two hallways from where they'd met Giran and Henry. Through the windows, she saw thirty or so people—asari, human, turian, even a krogan and two quarian—all moving busily around what looked like the dayroom at Martin's old rehab facility. Agitated by the disruption to their lives, a good half of them paced or rocked in their chairs, crying or yelling. The rest of their number tried to calm the others down, bribing them with food or makeshift games.

"Why are all these people here?" Shepard asked, looking to Giran. "Most of them probably have lives up there."
Giran returned to stand next to Shepard. "The security of this base must remain absolute. If they return to the surface, the ones who sent them down here could recapture them." Her posture straightened, going rigid. "Without knowing their masters' desires, we could not risk returning them to the surface."

Shepard spun bristling, spines and barbs only just contained, her anger and growing paranoia agreeing to wait for more information, but not long. "So they're prisoners?" She felt Garrus close behind her, but stepped away from him, needing the space more than the weight of his protectiveness.

"They're family." Giran's counter felt like a feint and did nothing to ease Shepard's concern. "When they arrived, we broke their masters' hold over them, but the power that drove them down here destroys them a little more every moment they are subjected to this control." She pointed to Henry. "He was the first. Vindication awoke us upon sensing his intrusion. When we discovered him, he hovered moments from joining his antecessors."

The prothean held out a hand to usher them further down the corridor. "Once Henry was stable, we placed him in stasis and returned to our pods. Two hundred and thirty-eight days later, another arrived, and then another. We ceased returning to stasis after the sixth, their arrivals coming so close together that I decided that a greater vigilance was required." She gestured again, that one carrying enough demand that Shepard opted for acquiescence and greater vigilance of her own.

"And the three of us?" Garrus asked. Shepard winced. She'd been hoping for more of a read on the situation before popping that cat out of the bag. Garrus didn't waver in the slightest when she glared at him, his front solid as stone. "Are we going to be held captive down here as well?"

Giran turned and set out down the corridor, apparently impatient with waiting for them to do as she wished. "That will depend on you."

Not exactly Shepard's idea of an ideal answer, but she followed. As much as she hated the idea of shooting their way out, that remained an option if push came to shove and then shove came to bullets. She shook her head a little when Garrus opened his mouth to continue. As much as she wanted guarantees that they could leave along with any of the others who wanted to return to their families, she figured pushing could wait until after the big secret.

Giran turned right onto a large balcony, striding up to a computer terminal far more complex than the small interfaces that dotted the walls here and there. "My parents believed so passionately in the security of this project that they purged all memory of it and their work before they departed the base for the last time."

Sweet baby Jesus, what the hell awaited them down there? For a half-second, every instinct Shepard possessed insisted that she reach out to stop Giran's fingers on the interface, to tell the prothean not to show them anything. Anything so secret and so dreaded … they'd just end up another nightmare that they had to fight or overcome. Sometimes knowledge just didn't justify the cost.

However, despite her misgivings, Shepard remained still and breathless as Giran powered up the computer and lights began to appear down near the bottom of the space.

Light pouring into the space thawed Shepard's voice, the specific word Giran used—purged—catching her attention. "Purged?" Even as she asked, an image of the small storage devices Liara and Shiala brought back from Eden Prime appeared in her mind. "You mean, they placed the knowledge in memory shards?"
A stiff nod answered her. "They dared not allow enemy hands to seize control of the project."

Giran paced a few metres and back. "My parents found the plans on a computer in an inusannon ruin while they were hiding the Fulcrum. They brought them here to decode and translate them. The last decades of the war consumed my people, the Regulikar drowning in desperation, so the scientific authority approved the covert construction of what could prove the end of everything."

Huge banks of light encircling the bay burst to life, blinding Shepard for long seconds before the glare faded, revealing a construction at the center. Massive in scope, it nonetheless looked incomplete. Shepard stepped right up to the railing. "What the hell is it? A weapon?"

Giran joined her, hands gripping the railing, eyes staring up at the metal lattice. "We don't know precisely what it is or what it does. That's why security is so tight. All we know is that its inusannon designers called it the Crucible."

The floor felt as though it disappeared out from under Shepard's feet, only Nihlus's urgent, sudden grip on her shoulder holding her steady. "The Crucible?" she repeated, slanting it as a question. She glanced toward Nihlus and then Garrus. "Damn, no wonder they wanted to get us down here."

Giran stiffened, her hand moving over the stock of her rifle. "What do you mean? You know that name? You know what the device is?" Her violet eyes flashed, filled with suspicion and a sense of duty that burned like fire. Her people closed in behind her, their hands lifting their rifles to an uncomfortably ready position.

"Hold up." Feeling Garrus and Nihlus's alert levels leaping into the red as well, Shepard held up her hands, palms out. "Sweet baby Jesus, give me a chance to explain before the bullets start flying. First of all, we've only heard the name, Crucible. When the suzerain communicated with us, they said that the Reapers were building the Catalyst, so we had to make sure they never built the Crucible. We don't actually know what either thing is."

Giran eased down from high alert, but remained tense, watchful. "The Catalyst is the reason we finished the pieces of the Crucible, but never assembled it. It is the last piece. We believed it to be a power source, the heart of the machine, but never discovered its nature." She shook her head and flung a frustrated gesture at the piece before them. "We built it in pieces, far below the surface to keep it hidden from the Reapers. We believed, as the inusannon did before us, that it was a great weapon to destroy the Reapers. We just didn't understand how it would perform this miracle, or how much of the galaxy would meet its end along with them."

Shepard turned her back to the construct. "And if you'd figured out what the Catalyst was, you would have assembled this and tried to use it?"

"Yes," Giran answered, "and it's construction would prove a small miracle in itself. It measures ten kilometres in length. They are massive pieces of the most dangerous puzzle the galaxy had even known." She let out a long, musical sigh, and for a moment, Shepard saw the stress cracks in Giran's armour. The prothean's battle hadn't stopped with the defeat of her people. Giran dragged her knuckles along her kepalar ridge, a sign of growing agitation. "And if this monstrosity proves to be a Reaper weapon, something their twisted will can turn against us … how many cycles did my parents lose as they laboured to decipher the plans, and how much of my people's dwindling wealth and materials did we waste in its construction?"

Giran strode to the railing a few metres down the balcony, hands gripping the railing hard enough that the metal screeched a little as the takun's armour ground against it. "And how much will it destroy?" She let out a noisy breath. "I should have simply blown the base down into this hole. With its destruction, those of us who remain could have joined our peers, resting in the antecessor's embrace."
Shepard shrugged, a weak flail of helpless ignorance. "I don't have any answers, but the suzerain don't want to get their hands on the Crucible, they want to keep it out of the Reapers' hands … claws … tentacles … whatever." She smiled and let out a long breath. "So that's a good thing. We just need to make sure the Collectors don't find out about it." Joining Giran at the railing, Shepard stared out at the parts and pieces. "Your parents have been incredibly helpful so far, perhaps they could help us sort the rest of this out."

"Helpful?" Something painted Giran's tone in lighter hues as she turned to face Shepard. "Other than the warning they sent through the beacon network?"

Shepard grinned, wide and easy. Proud daughter, eager to share word of her parents … that Shepard understood. "Their intel gave us a huge leg up in the battle against the vanguard, and it's still helping us. We only know why the Collectors are abducting our colonists because of their memories, and their imprints led us to the discovery of massive Collector bases on our homeworlds." She shrugged. "We might have come through the fight against Sovereign without their aid, but definitely not with the strength we did."

"Imagine what we could accomplish together," Nihlus said, stepping up between them. The green field of his stare crackled with excitement, and the most hope she'd seen from him since her return. "We're out ahead of the Reapers' return this time. We don't know how long we have before they find a way back, but if we could take down the Collectors, study their technology, it might help us find ways to fight the Reapers." He stared out at the Crucible. "Your people would be invaluable in helping us discover how the Reapers changed your technology."

Spinning to face Giran, Nihlus beamed at her as if looking down on his own daughter. "Would you help us? We could use this base, keep the Crucible safe, even examine the plans, see if a fresh perspective can figure out what it's meant to do." Nihlus leaned against the railing, stretching out to look down the piece's length. "Maybe, if between us, we can figure out what it's meant to do, we can figure out what the Catalyst is." As if he could see the entire plan unfolding before him, he nodded. "Then we can stop the Collectors from completing it for the Reapers."

Giran took off her gloves, hooking them on her armour, and held out her hands. "Will you permit me to read you?" She nodded to include Garrus in her question. "All of you? Only through following the threads of your lives can I truly understand your paths and motives. If you hide no deception, I will allow you to leave." Her violet gaze latched onto Nihlus. "And perhaps we can find ways to work together."

Nihlus removed his gauntlets and placed his hands on Giran's before Shepard even had a chance to wonder if there might be a reason for them not to. They'd been down there a half hour, far too short a time to assess any risk. What if Giran could pull out memories? What if she could remove the imprints?

"Nihlus!" Shepard let out an exasperated sigh and stood beside their joined hands, ready to break the contact or shoot Giran … whatever she needed to do to save his asslessness.

Despite the worst possibilities running through Shepard's head—including a lobotomized Nihlus getting excited about green pudding in the day room—a moment later, Giran looked up, smiled and laid a hand against Nihlus's cheek. "You truly honour my father." Notes of sorrow, nostalgia, and love whispered through the words. "Thank you for allowing me to see his final cycles."

Nihlus placed his hand over hers. "He's a part of me, always teaching, always guiding." He stepped back, one hand gliding down Shepard's arm. "It's fine, Jane. You'll see." The smile he gave her reminded her of the beatific happiness of cult members. Facing down her ire and suspicion with a slight chuckle, he bent to nuzzle her ear. "I'm fine. You'll be able to read her as she reads you."
Shepard stepped back and snapped, "You're allowing Merol too much freedom. It's making you too quick to trust." She sucked in a deep breath when his mandibles dropped, steeling herself against the blow she'd dealt.

He policed his reaction and squeezed her shoulder. "Trust me if you can't trust her. You know that Merol or not, I'd never put the two of you in danger." A crooked grin set one of his mandibles twitching. "That's why I went first."

Shepard took another deep breath, that one red-tinted and heavy. "You're not disposable." Instead of allowing him to reply, she turned to Giran and nodded. "Very well, but your mother went through a great deal of trauma after she left this place." She didn't know if she'd want to see her mother go through the nightmare that haunted Tashac's life, and really didn't know how letting Giran into all of that would help. Still, she held out her hands, palms up, and prayed that allowing the contact didn't blow everything to hell.

As soon as Giran's palms grazed hers, images poured into her, almost like the beacon vision, but coloured by the spirit of the takun. Giran's spirit possessed an honour and dedication to duty as strong as her mother's but tempered by her father's spiritual depth. Family, emotion, the last moments of the base, everything but the work conducted within the base flashed through Shepard's head. The lack of the latter didn't feel like an omission, but rather like a gap in the source material, as if Giran had also dumped everything that might compromise security into a memory shard. Either way, the bombardment passed in but a moment and then Shepard found herself alone in her head once more. Staggering back a step, she leaned gratefully into the two hands that reached out to steady her. While not traumatizing like the beacon, it left her disoriented and a good two hundred percent more exhausted than she'd already been.

Note to self: Nap before mind melding. Seriously.

Garrus wrapped an arm around her waist. That time she allowed the contact, his support a welcome wall at her back.

The prothean stared into Shepard's eyes. "You have journeyed so far and returned." She shook her head, a gentle rolling motion that expressed incredulity. "You have seen betrayal as great as any my mother suffered, and yet … you're here. You're still fighting for the ones who thanked you for defeating the Vanguard by having you killed." She scowled, but not anger … confusion. "How did you join your antecessors and then return?"

"I don't know. What happened during the months between dying and waking up is only just starting to come back, and even then, it's the tiniest shards of memory." Shepard paused. She'd never really thought about why she kept fighting … why she hadn't just thrown up her hands and hidden away on some tropical island in the traverse. "As for why I'm still fighting … . Maybe it's because of these two, and maybe it's because I don't know how to do anything else."

A slight shrug rattled her armour a little, one shoulder joint clicking as it dropped a little further than where it started. "We're faced with an enemy that no one has ever defeated. Not just this cycle is staring at me." She made a low, growling sigh that Garrus echoed through his second larynx. Tipping a smile up at him, she leaned into his side a little as he looked down at her with a gaze that told her she never needed to bear the burden alone.

She nodded before continuing, "Untold cycles wait out there in the future, staring back, waiting for me … for us … to end the Reapers and their harvests. If that is the reality placed before you, how do you … does anyone … refuse to fight?"
"My mother spoke very much as you do, stressing the honour that must guide our path through the despair and destruction." The arate paced a little, her armour appearing too heavy and getting heavier by the moment. "It was not a popular sentiment in the last days of the struggle, my people divided into those who ran and tried to hide—soldiers deserting in droves—and those who threw thousands before the Reapers', commanders sacrificing everyone and everything for a single Reaper kill."

Giran's scrutiny softened a little as Garrus released Shepard and stepped up, offering to allow her to read him. "I have no need to walk the trails of your life," she said. "I have seen you through their eyes. Their devotion and respect shone a light on the things I needed to know." She leaned against the railing, the Crucible to her back.

"I felt pieces missing from your memories," Shepard said, deciding to push her luck and go for broke. The option to shoot their way out remained, although her gut and the alarm at the base of her skull both remained silent. Despite the missing pieces, Giran hadn't felt as though she was hiding anything. "Did you dump your memories of the work into a memory shard as well?"

Giran frowned, surprise evident in her open mouth and slightly bared teeth. Her gaze focused inward, her eyes moving as if searching through files. The reaction appeared so quickly that Shepard didn't believe it false, a supposition reinforced a second later when the arate looked to the hologram standing unobtrusively off to one side. "Vindication? Did I deposit memories into a shard before I went into stasis?"

The VI nodded, a starched, formal gesture. "All base staff voted unanimously to place the memory of their work into shards prior to the base shutting down. Only memories related to security of the Crucible Project remained intact. Shards are sealed in the vault on sublevel five."

Giran stared at Shepard for long moments, her gaze a weighing one. "Will you allow us time to secure our memories and inventory the base? If you return in a few weeks, we'll be far better able to answer questions and make decisions." Again, Shepard didn't feel any sort of deceit coming from the prothean. This time the takun seemed thrown, the revelation of working on partial memories a disturbing one, and Shepard understood that far more intimately than she cared to consider.

"My people and I cannot be sure of the level of security threat the base faces without complete memories of the projects contained within." She shrugged. "Without being able to see the full picture." Shaking her head, she made a low, growling sound. "I've allowed myself … all of us ... to exist in this twilight of suspended animation for too long." The sound morphed into a bitter laugh.
"Weariness, I suppose. Easier to focus on maintaining security down here than to open myself up to the larger implications of the infiltrations."

"We all felt it, Arate Jacar," one of the gasin said, speaking for the first time.

A long, female sigh drifted out from beneath another helmet. "It feels as though we fought our war and should be done, Arate. We all feel it, and we did not even wake to our friends' company, to take up this second war by their sides." A shorter, downward-sloped sigh. "Just the few of us alone amidst these primitives."

Giran spun to face her people. "Datarri, please return to the control room and await me there."

Shepard could tell by the takun's sudden stiffness that she realized her stumble into rudeness a couple of moments too late, but also that she hadn't meant to belittle them.

"Arate, may I express my regret before excusing myself?" Datarri asked, giving a stiff salute. When Giran answered, a simple nod, the prothean soldier saluted the three of them. "I apologize for the slip in my vocabulary. I did not mean to offer insult."

Shepard smiled, and then spoke, the proper words for a formal apology appearing from beneath Tashac's door. "Thank you for your apology. It is accepted with an open mind and heart. Go in peace, unfettered."

Datarr saluted again and hurried down the hall.

Once the prothean disappeared out of earshot, Shepard sighed. "We've met another prothean along our journey, as I'm sure you saw. He takes great delight in calling us primitives and telling us how much smarter and stronger protheans were."

"Commander Javik," Giran confirmed. "I knew two of his offspring. I was raised with them as my older, heroic siblings. I mourned them greatly when they joined the antecessors."

Shepard stepped close to the arate, a plan appearing in her mind as she began to speak. "I will gladly give you a few weeks, even a month to secure the base and your memories. Our partnership will be more fruitful for the time spent, but I would ask one boon. She took a deep breath, bracing before throwing caution to the wind as she continued, "A boon that would benefit us both."

Suspicion tinted the edges of Giran's stare, but she nodded. "And that would be?"

"Allow me to leave two people with you," Shepard said, the plan growing focussed as it came out her mouth. "They'll work within whatever security restrictions you feel are necessary, but they'll also be able to help acclimate you to this cycle. One of them may even be able to assist your guests. She's a very accomplished scientist in her own right."

"Captain?" Speak of the operative ....

Shepard opened the channel. "Yes, Ms. Lawson?"

"The suzerain have apparently departed. They're no longer visible over the colony." Miranda sounded far more cautious than relieved, a sentiment Shepard wholeheartedly agreed with.

"Contact the Ypres to see if the jamming has lifted. If so, have EDI run every scan she can think of to determine if it's really gone, or just cloaked."

"Yes, ma'am. Lawson, out."

Shepard closed the channel, and refocused. "Sorry about that." She smiled and stepped forward, a hand stretching across the gulf between them to grip Giran's upper arm. "If we cooperate and truly grow into allies, we'll be able to do so much more ... figure out so much more than we can alone."

Giran nodded. "If you are willing to entrust the safety of your people to me, I am willing to extend trust in kind, but the lower levels of the base will remain sealed." She returned to the computer console, opening security camera footage of the refugee encampment in the hangar bays. "The humans may remain in the upper level. We will give Vindication directives to allow the refugees to use the south door." She smiled, a pale show of teeth. "In return, perhaps they could repair the sections of the collapsed and damaged sections of tunnel."

Shepard nodded, but turned to Garrus, searching his expression and level stare for any sign of misgivings. He saw twice as much as she did, and his cop instincts demanded that he remain slow to trust any situation. If anyone would see the trap waiting, he'd be the one. He simply shook his head, a slight shrug rolling his shoulders.
"All right," Shepard said after Nihlus wordlessly expressed his approval, "let's get these arrangements made."

60 Days ASR The Ypres

Shepard glanced up at the knock on her cabin door. "Yes?" With no small amount of gratitude, she turned away from the massive list of preparations scrolling up her computer screen. "Come in."

Miranda appeared in the open door. "Commander Javik and I are prepared to return to the surface, Captain." Jaw stern and clenched, Shepard's XO formed the very image of disapproval, but she'd ceased to argue the point. Frankly, Shepard had expected the operative to bring up the control chip when repeated uses of the omnitool didn't change Shepard's mind.

"You're an olive branch, Operative Lawson. We have the opportunity to access science light years beyond our own, and you are the first step toward a working partnership with these protheans." She pushed up out of her chair. "I don't want to return to discover that Cerberus has taken them all prisoner and is torturing them." One, absent hand reached up to scratch at the spot over the dead chip before she caught herself and dropped it. "Good luck, and stay in touch. We'll be back in exactly twenty-eight days."

Miranda hesitates for another second, her mouth opening, but then she snapped it closed and nodded. "I'll do my best to build a solid, working foundation, Captain."

Shepard smiled and nodded. "I know you will. Dismissed, Operative Lawson."

When her XO pivoted neatly on her heel and marched out, Shepard folded back into her chair. Where were her torins? Both were on the Ypres, but she hadn't seen either since they arrived back from the surface.

She knew Nihlus had been seeing to making space for a few new bodies as Mordin and Chakwas came aboard to use the lab along with Dr. Eis. Legion, Tali, and another geth would join up with them enroute to Ploba to meet with the Chiastyllian Cynosure. She didn't know where her faith came from, but she suspected that the geth having a similar gestalt consciousness might help bridge the gap between species.

She grinned, her memory playing back Sparky's complaints about the newer version of the Normandy as he skulked up the cargo bay, he and Martin forming an alliance staunchly in support of the SR1 within moments of coming aboard.

Garrus … she frowned and settled back into her work. Garrus probably haunted the briefing room, using the QEC to arrange transport for Liara, Dr. Bryson, and the researcher's team … and checking everywhere for bugs. After they finished on Ploba, the Ypres, Normandy, and Passch would set course for Klencory to investigate the volus billionaire, Kumun Shol's mysterious formations. The scientists believed the volus was onto another prothean sleeper base. It would be weeks before they made it back to Omega. Shepard closed her eyes and slumped forward, bracing an elbow against the desk to catch her head as it impacted her hand.

A message from Wrex awaited her return, lurking in her inbox. Something about rogue salarians spotted on Tuchanka. She'd set him to the task of finding out more information before they changed course to investigate. The grin returned to her face. Apparently, however, Tuchanka agreed with Grunt, the youngster adopting Wrex and Bakara like parents, and digging into learning about being a krogan with his whole being. At the end of the message, the Urdnot doctor had tacked on a note, telling Shepard that she'd taken a ton of samples and run Grunt through a gamut... of tests. All that information awaited their return to Omega.

Another email informed her that her mother had decided to remain on Palaven and help Trea settle into her new duties and prepare for the move to Omega while Bunny headed home to Omega, wanting to return to her studies at Archangel. Shepard sent up a prayer of thanks that the two of them had found places to belong. They deserved happiness and a sense of purpose.

The door opened behind her, a bright smile of genuine relief greeting Garrus. She lifted a hand to capture his talons as he closed the few metres distance and crouched next to her. "How are you holding up?" she asked, searching his face and gaze for signs of stress.

He shook his head. "Fine. It feels strange being on this ship, though. I found three bugs in the briefing room alone. Stomped them into scrap." Leaning in, he nuzzled her brow and then her lips. "So," he said, letting out a long, noisy sigh, "how are we going to handle the sleeping arrangements?"

Shepard kissed him. "Well, I've been thinking about that. All three of us slept together just fine on Horizon, and …." She faltered, a tightening throat and vague, dissociative dizziness clenching her skull in a clawed fist as she imagined how her torins would react to her idea. When she first arrived back on the ship, she'd looked down at the bed and hated the idea of spending that first night back with one while the other slept alone elsewhere.

Garrus stood, and tugged on her hand. "Come on, let's go sit somewhere comfortable." He led her down the stairs to the bed and sat, pulling her between his knees to sit on one thigh. Once she got herself settled, he wrapped his arms around her. "Okay, better. Now, what's your idea?"

Shepard let out a long breath and leaned into him, her brow resting against his jaw. "Nights like tonight … well, I don't want to be without either one of you." She shifted until he tightened his arms, a silent encouragement to just trust him and spit it out. "And I hate the thought of one of you sleeping alone." Her lips tugged a little to one side, a slight quirk of a smile. "Unless you want to be alone, of course."

"So, you're thinking of the three of us sleeping in the same bed?" He shrugged, his breath whispering through her hair. "I'm not comfortable with anything amorous going on, but I admit, I want to be lying at your side every night." One hand stroked the length of her spine, easing her further into his embrace. "I'm okay with it." A soft chuckle rumbled in his throat, sending shivers along every nerve. "I just never thought you would be."

Shepard pulled away just far enough to meet his gaze. "I love you. You're pieces of my soul I can't live without. What about Nihlus?"

"We'll talk to Nihlus when he stops arguing with Gardner about people bunking on the lounge and cargo bay." Leaning in, Garrus kissed her, long and slow and sweet. She grinned when he pulled back just enough for them both to catch their breath.

"What are you grinning about?" he asked, nuzzling the shell of her ear.

Lowering her arm from its grip on his armour, she ran a thumb over the delicate bracelet wrapped around her wrist. "I just remembered … I have a husband."

Chuckling, he stood, lifting her with him. He kissed her again before lowering her onto her own two feet. "Care to join me in the shower, wife?"

Shepard popped the lower seals on his yoke. "I believe I would."
(A-N: Thanks for still being here readers and reviewers alike. Hugs)
"Tali'Zorah vas Rannoch!" Shepard held up a hand as she bellowed across the cargo bay. Stepping off the elevator, she lifted into a jog, hurrying down the length of the ship to throw her arms around the quarian. "Holy blessed Father of Light's undies, it's good to see you."

Arms still wrapped around the slight, young denyah, Shepard lifted her, bouncing her a little, weighing her. "You've gotten skinny." She pulled away, holding Tali's shoulders as she stared into the silver glints behind the faceplate. "They not feeding you on your homeworld?"

Silent and frozen, Shepard's hug unreturned, Tali stared for a moment before reaching up and removing her faceplate. "It's really you," she whispered. Delicate fingers reached out to trace the web of scars across Shepard's chin. "Keelah, Shepard … ."

The quarian threw her arms around the captain, squeezing so tight that Shepard could barely breathe and the wounds on her shoulders screamed for mercy. "We thought we'd lost you."

60 Days ASR The Ypres

Shepard alerted to the knock at the cabin door, peering that direction through the steamy air as if she could see who it was. Not that she didn't know. "Can you let Nihlus in?" she asked, giving Garrus a slight push. "You know he won't come in unless one of us answers it, fully clothed and not breathing hard." She chuckled in answer to his grumble and gave him another, gentle push. "Just let me finish getting dressed. I'm right behind you."

After staring at her for a couple of seconds, his gaze shuttered, Garrus nodded and turned toward the bathroom door. "Fine, but you'd better be right behind me. He's going to be awkward until we talk to him. Together."

"Right behind you," Shepard echoed. Once the door shut behind him, she spun toward her shelves, digging behind the piles of towels for the tiny crate hidden inside an old pair of sweats. She froze before opening it, listening to the low mumble of their conversation as it moved down toward the couches.

When the container sat open before her, she stared in at her dwindling horde of syringes, a vague sort of shame worming through her veins. Yes, fine … she was hiding her painkillers from Garrus and Nihlus, but only because she didn't want them to worry. If they knew how much pain her wounds gave her, they'd wrap her in cotton batting and never touch her again.

She snatched a syringe out, tore off the cap, and stabbed it into her thigh above the hem of her shorts. With a soft sigh-moan combination, she depressed the plunger, then stashed the empty needle back in with the others. Leaning against the counter, she closed her eyes, letting the icy wash of relief gain a foothold before she pushed up.

Are you really protecting them from your pain? Or are you trying to protect them from your suffering? It's been two months since Miranda woke you up. What do you know now that you didn't then? Are you any more convinced that you're real? Where's the proof?

For a second, the malignant darkness and burning knives sliced beneath her skin, and she pressed her eyes closed, afraid to see Harbinger's flame growing through the cracks in her flesh.

I am the harbinger of your perfection. The forces of the universe bend to me. Your god has abandoned you, Jane Shepard. It left you to the batarians, and it has left you to us. We will not be as merciful as they were. Relinquish your form to us.

No. She forced her eyes open and lifted her head to meet the faint glow of cybernetics that stared back at her. That bastard did not get to take up housekeeping inside her head. She'd thrown off Harbinger's attempt at taking her over body, and as unwelcome as they were, the spiders would help her keep him out of her head … unless she let him in.

Really? And what do they want from the inside of your head? Can you be absolutely certain of anything? Where's the proof that you aren't just some Reaper meat puppet?

"Them," she muttered under her breath, listening to the warmth of the voices from the other room, eyes slipping closed again even as she clutched her stash tight to her belly. "I'm absolutely certain of them. They're my proof." And she was. A cabin bleeding gold light from all the windows, a fire on a cold night, a port in the stormy sea … they provided the only safety and certainty in the nightmare.

"Kahri?" Heavy, solid footsteps approached the stairs and climbed. "You all right in there?"

She stashed the painkillers back behind the towels, straightening everything precisely, then hurried to the door, opening it just as he lifted his hand to hit the control. "Right behind you." She reached up to trail tender fingers along his mandible. She nodded toward Nihlus. "How's he doing?"

Garrus held out an arm, snagging her across the waist as she tried to walk past, and pulled her in. "He's fine, but I wasn't about to approach the 'everyone in one bed' topic without you." Leaning in, he pressed his brow to hers. "Spirits, I love you. Are you really all right? You seem … dazed? Not quite here."

"Yes, really, and I'm just tired, love." She relaxed into his embrace and looked up, head tilted, her gaze caressing his face. "You're my reason," she said simply, the words settling the flutter in her belly, "for … everything." She hid the drugs to keep them from worrying while she fought to stay functional. End of story. After pulling him down to press a kiss to his brow, she eased away, her hand sliding along the inside of his arm until her fingers tangled in his talons. "Come on, let's start pulling this little family together."

Nihlus looked up from the single chair at the corner of her coffee table, his mandibles giving a soft, hesitant flutter that reached all the way down into Shepard's gut to grab hold of something tender and precious. She squeezed Garrus's talons, then released him, walking down the stairs on her own.

"You look tired," she said, stepping around Nihlus's thigh to stand between his knees. Loosely wrapping her arms around his neck, she leaned in to touch her brow to the top of his head. When he made no move to touch her, she sighed and folded down to sit on the edge of the table, one hand on each of his knees.

The Spectre nodded. "I was heading for my rack when you called." He glanced over at Garrus and then back. "What's going on?"
Shepard rubbed his knees and cocked her head, watching him through soft, narrowed eyes. "If you had your preference, where would you spend tonight?"

Again, a furtive flicker acknowledged Garrus before lighting on the bed and returning to meet her regard. "Right here, with you," he said, the words an admission rather than acknowledging any sort of right to be there.

Sweet baby Jesus, he'd asked her to be with both of them just as much as Garrus had. She'd resisted, and now she'd embraced it, he was losing his nerve. Shepard reached up and took Nihlus's face between her hands, his big ol' head heavy in her palms. And he was losing it because he loved his fratrín too much to risk hurting him. She brushed his cheekbones with her thumbs. Who would have guessed such a gorgeous soul lived behind all that arrogance and stumbling that first month? At nearly fifty, he finally grew up.

"That bed is exactly where I want you." She tipped her head to where Garrus still stood at the top of the stairs. "And it's where I want him." Tugging him forward to meet her halfway, Shepard leaned in to touch brows. "I love you both. I don't want to be separated from either of you."

Pushing him backwards a little, she shifted to sit on his thigh. "Sex will have to be separate," she said, chuckling a little, embarrassed. "I'm not okay with that being a group activity, and I know that it would be uncomfortable for the two of you as well."

Drawing back, she met his eyes, one hand sliding around to drape over his cowl. "But I want you both sleeping at my side the rest of the time." She brushed a gentle kiss across the end of his nose, loving the way his hide felt against her lips, and the scent of him: so warm and male, all spice and earthy, desert nights. "Are you okay with the three of us sharing a bed, Nihlus?"

After nuzzling her lips, he pulled away to look up at Garrus. "You're all right with this?"

Shepard's husband nodded. "I am." He shrugged and thumped down the stairs, loose-limbed and weary. "I don't want to get into bed alone, and I don't like the idea of making her choose." A warm, calloused palm caressed her cheek, then pressed against it, heavy and full. "This compromise works."

Nihlus grinned and chuffed. "We're going to need a bigger bed and some sort of noise cancellation system with all three of us in here and snoring."

Shepard's chest filled with sunlight, the light so bright and strong that it felt as though it would blow her open at the seams. Anchors indeed. She wrapped her arms around his neck and tucked her face in under his jaw. "Not to mention the fact that trapped between you two heating units, I'm going to need a cooling blanket." She kissed the soft hide just under his mandible. "Come on, we're all beat, and we're meeting up with Tali and Legion in twelve hours."

Still, she didn't pull away. "Are you really all right with this, cikabeknai?"

Nihlus pulled her in tight and rested his cheek against her hair. "We're going someplace I never envisioned, and I imagine it'll feel a little awkward at first, but you're both right. I don't want to make you choose, I don't want to lie alone, and I don't want to be curled in with you and know that Garrus is alone." He eased back, so Shepard released him, still sitting on his thigh. "It wasn't an issue while we went separate ways on missions, but I also don't want to be away from you for weeks at a time any more."

The sunshine settled into something warmer and deeper. "Good, because I count on you being within arm's reach." Her fingers trailed the length of his mandible. "I love you, Nihlus Kryik."
Remember that when you don't think you have a place right here, in my arms. Okay?"

He nodded. "Okay."

She kissed him and then stood, taking Garrus's hand again as she stepped out from between Nihlus's legs. "This is where we belong. Together, the three of us can take on anything." She tugged on her husband. "Come on, let's get to bed. Morning is rushing up on us."

61 Days ASR The Ypres

Denyah - Female quarian after undergoing her pilgrimage

"Tali'Zorah vas Rannoch!" Shepard held up a hand as she bellowed across the cargo bay. Stepping off the elevator, she lifted into a jog, hurrying down the length of the ship to throw her arms around the quarian. "Holy blessed Father of Light's undies, it's good to see you."

Arms still wrapped around the slight, young denyah, Shepard lifted her, bouncing her a little, weighing her. "You've gotten skinny." She pulled away, holding Tali's shoulders as she stared into the silver glints behind the faceplate. "They not feeding you on your homeworld?"

Silent and frozen, Shepard's hug unreturned, Tali stared for a moment before reaching up and removing her faceplate. "It's really you," she whispered. Delicate fingers reached out to trace the web of scars across Shepard's chin. "Keelah, Shepard … ." The quarian threw her arms around the captain, squeezing so tight that Shepard could barely breathe and the wounds on her shoulders screamed for mercy. "We thought we'd lost you."

Returning the hug, Shepard rubbed the slight back, wincing a little at the protrusions of bone along the spine, the ripples of rib right under the skin. Despite the familiar, cheery lilt to Tali's voice, her body spoke volumes about the intervening years.

She carved a smile onto her face. She couldn't do anything about the years she'd missed, but she would make sure Tali didn't struggle without her support from then on. "Thanks to a team of mad scientists, I'm back." She shrugged. "Mostly." Extracting herself from the vice-like hug, she traced a finger over Tali's soft, lavender cheek. "Should you be without your faceplate?" A bright grin followed along with an incredulous shake of her head. "And how did I forget how gorgeous you are?"

Tali beamed, her bronze eyes sparkling. "I'll be fine, maybe a few sniffles, but my geth roommates have been working hard to get my immune system to what it should be." A bright, lovely grin spread across the quarian's face. "It's worth it to look at you without the barrier." She leaned into Shepard's touch. "I've missed you."

Shepard nodded, blinking back the burning in her eyes, able to see the care and responsibility etched into Tali's gaze. She'd promised to be there to help, and then ... . "I know. I'm sorry, Tali. I would have given anything to have been here, to have helped settle Rannoch."

She looked past the denyah to where Legion stood, head flaps dancing. "And you." She held out a hand, taking the geth platform's fingers in a strong grip. "Hello, Legion. It's good to see you back in mostly one piece."

"And you, Shepard-Captain." The geth squeezed her hand, then released her. "The geth and Archangel personnel have nearly completed repairs."

Shepard stepped back, letting Garrus move in to hug Tali. "We need to stop by medbay to pick up the guests of honour, and then we can retire to my cabin, and I'll bring you up to speed." She pressed her palm against the small of Garrus's back when he pulled away. "You coming up with us?"

He shook his head. "I'm going to go check out the weapon systems, and make sure the Cerberus personnel haven't undone all my hard work. We might need them when we arrive at Ploba." He bent to nuzzle her brow, then patted Tali's shoulder and nodded to Legion. "It's good to see you both."

Ten minutes later, Tali sat cross-legged on Shepard's couch, the chia gauntlet held cradled in both hands, almost like an offering. "Keelah, it's amazing," she said, the words soft and breathy as she stared down into the kaleidoscope of whirling gears and moving pieces. "It's almost like looking into a body, seeing the lungs and heart working."

"That's a pretty good comparison." Shepard slid down into the chair to Tali's left, her eyes on Legion as the geth crouched next to the device. "It's definitely not anything I thought I would ever encounter in my lifetime."

"Microscopic, neurally linked lifeforms," Legion said. Shepard didn't know whether she was assigning wonder to his tone, but she felt sure the fascination was there. It must be a strange and wonderful thing, meeting a race that amounted to the geth's organic twin.

"Ask them whatever you like," Shepard said. "They might not have all the answers, but I think you'll find that you have quite a lot in common." She leaned forward, forearms on her thighs. "I asked you two to come with us to the Cynosure because the chia have intelligence, they have this incredible ability to create complex machines that control mass effect fields, but they're both in danger and present a danger because they have no will."

"Clarify," Legion said, straightening, suddenly alert, its head flaps spiking before settling back.

"When I came in contact with the chia that created the gauntlet they were a flurry of single organisms and small clusters. They were free. I asked for a way to communicate with them, and my will, my need formed into the gauntlet that interfaces with my omnitool." Shepard reached out to run a fingertip along one edge, as always, surprised when it felt warm rather than cool. "Whether they wished to comply or not, they had to: my will overrode theirs." She let out a long breath, her hand dropping back to her lap. Her stomach churned, acid splashing up into her throat. "It was just a happy turn of luck that they wished to communicate with me. They're slaves to what anyone asks of them."

"So, the giant dreadnought over Horizon that you sent footage of?" Tali asked, her attention leaving the chia for the first time since Shepard placed the gauntlet in her hands.

"Put it on your arm and ask them," Shepard said, the smile she gave the quarian encouraging but tasted of burning dust. "It's perfectly safe, just make sure you tell them not to push their emotions on you. They have a very strong empathic field and they tend to get a little passionate."

The reflective glints of Tali's eyes narrowed behind her faceplate, but she placed her arm within the curve. Jumping a little when it snapped shut around her, she giggled, a nervous twitter of sound. "Where did the dreadnought we saw in the footage from Horizon originate?" she asked, the words trembling a little.

"The suzerain required protection for their forms during the Genedigaeth Rebellions," the gauntlet answered. "The suum had defeated their masters, reducing suzerain numbers to a handful of survivors. The rebellion stood upon the threshold of victory when the suzerain discovered our people. They created the dreadnoughts around their forms. Their minds and wills control the chiastyllia, using our nature against others."

Images flashed across the small vid screen, too quick for Shepard to keep up with them, but Legion stepped closer, sitting next to Tali on the couch, its head cocked, head flaps dancing, almost agitated. A soft smiled teased the corners of Shepard's mouth as she watched them, the pair hunkered over the gauntlet, so alike ... almost siblings after two years of trust and cooperation and shared heartache.

Well, maybe more concern than heartache for Legion. She didn't doubt for a second that what Daro'Xen had done to its fellow geth cause Legion distress of some kind, but she had no idea what that would look like. What passed for emotions amongst the emotionless?

"The suzerain turned our people into terrible weapons, weapons able to kill an entire planet's population in a single thought," the chia said, their voice a thin tangle of grief, shame, and fear. "Our people fled, hiding within the Cynosure or on distant planets, because we do not wish to be enslaved or used to kill."

Shepard stood. "You two okay?" She tilted her head toward her desk. "I'll be up there if you need anything."

"We're fine, Shepard," Tali replied, her eyes never leaving the chia. "This is fascinating."

"We have much to learn from each other," Legion said, glancing up at Shepard. "These organisms and the geth possess many characteristics in common."

"That's why I thought you should meet." Truly. Retreating to her desk, Shepard leaned against it, hands braced against the top instead of sitting. As she watched Tali and Legion with the chia, she began to see a possible secondary benefit to inviting Legion and the quarian. Since the geth possessed a strong, almost single minded will, she'd thought they might be able to help the chia protect themselves. Now, she wondered if the geth might not be able to learn from the chia as well.

Twisting, she pulled her chair in tight behind her and sat, a keen-edged excitement flashing like a spinning gem in the center of her chest. Things on Ploba light prove very exciting indeed.

Well ... they could also end up crushed into something the size of a baseball by the pressure. Either way, exciting.

62 Days ASR The Ypres

"So, Tali'Zorah vas Rannoch ... " Shepard belly flopped onto the stack of gym mats next to the quarian's cot. "... how are things going on the aforementioned Rannoch?" She cradled her chin in her hands, staring at her friend, eager and open, almost hungry. Her connections to the people ... the family from the first Normandy felt like a basket of jewels tossed into space. She floundered, swimming after them through the void, trying to gather and stow them back in their chest: precious, elusive, and cast so far adrift.

"Better now that Garrus and Nihlus helped uncover Daro'Xen's machinations and forced us all to stop trying to cover everything up and actually talk. " Tali stretched and rolled onto her side, propping her head on a hand. "The admiralty board is sending expeditions and has approved the geth assisting with the transition from suits to reintegration with our environment."

One eyebrow twitching, lifting a little with gentle teasing, Shepard feigned nonchalance as she asked, "And Kal'Reegar? How's he doing?"
Tali smacked Shepard's shoulder but her giggle gave her away. "Kal is fine. He's been my strong back and supportive arm through everything." Gaze darting away and then back, the denyah practically screamed shy nervousness. Shoving herself up, Tali sat cross-legged on her blankets. "I think he wants us to formalize things between us." She shrugged a little, just a gentle ripple of muscle across her shoulders. "But, I don't know … raising a family on Rannoch the way things are … with the Reapers coming …." A musical sigh painted the recycled air with longing.

Shepard pushed up off the mats, moving over to sit facing Tali, her position mirroring her friend's. Holding out her hands, she waited for Tali to take them before she settled her elbows onto her knees. Meeting the silver reflections of the young denyah's eyes, she let out a long sigh. "It's scary, I know that better than anyone, Tali." Her shoulders just popped up before dropping. One cracked a little. "And things are uncertain … we know what's coming. Maybe it's selfish to think about getting married, bringing kids into all of this, but when aren't things scary and uncertain?"

Tali let out a long breath, her fingers playing with Shepard's a little. "I guess. I don't know, maybe I'm looking for excuses. Maybe I'm just not ready."

Chuckling, Shepard nodded and released one of Tali's hands to caress the coillas around her arm with her thumb. "Do you love Kal?" She lifted one eyebrow and ducked her head a little as she met the quarian's gaze. "Is there this impossibly strong elastic band trying to snap you back to Rannoch right now?"

Tali's head tilted and she gave Shepard a gentle shove. "Shut up." Delicate fingers took up the token of Shepard's bonding. "Does it make a difference?" she asked quietly. "It doesn't change how you feel, does it?"

Shepard shook her head. "Yes and no. It's not like I needed to lock us down, and neither did Garrus, but it's an oath … a promise. It's like taking an oath to protect your people. It doesn't mean you love them any more or take your duty any more seriously, it just forms a bond." She grinned, wide and a little giddy. "But it's beautiful, Tali. Standing there, formalizing that bond in front of the people who matter most, and then after … with him." She purred low in her throat. "I highly recommend it."

"And kids?" Tali took Shepard's hands in hers again. "You'd have children … start a family even with the Reapers coming?"

Shepard pursed her lips into a considering frown. "Garrus and I haven't really talked about kids, but Nihlus and I have … after a fashion, and yeah, I think I would, even having to go out and fight." She let out a long breath through her nose. "I think that kids are kids and families are families, regardless of the galaxy around them. As long as they are loved, and you do your best to look after them … they'll grow up okay."

She said it. She looked Tali straight in the eye and said it, but did she believe it? If Garrus or Nihlus asked her to adopt a baby that night, what would her answer be? Instead of answering that, she gave Tali another little shrug. "Your parents had every reason to be terrified to bring you into the galaxy. Possible war with the geth, and any number of issues on the flotilla, not to mention a guarantee that your own immune system could kill you."

"So, nothing's guaranteed?" Tali released Shepard's hands, the air cool where the contact had warmed her fingers. "But we should face the unknown with hope?"

The Spectre laughed, but a kind one of appreciation for her quarian friend. " Couldn't have said it better myself. No one ever got anything amazing without being a little bit brave."
Tali's laugh rose to swirl around hers, pinks and purples to her solid, stoic greens. Had Shepard ever lived in colours as bright and sweet? Tali sobered a little, her voice sincere as she said, "And you've had to be twice as brave." She stretched out her arms to squeeze Shepard's shoulders in a tight grip. "The next wedding, I demand to be there. No last minute surprises."

"I promise. This last one … well, it was important to Garrus—and to me—that we not wait any longer to start our lives." She leaned into her friend's touch, surprised by how much she'd missed having someone to just talk to. "It can all be taken away in an instant, Tali. The only thing I can imagine that would be worse than losing him, is regretting not taking every chance we could have and spent every second we had together." Her words fell off as the last moments of her previous life flashed through her mind.

"We were going to be together, finally," she said after several long seconds, the words heavy as they fell, old bones weighted with lead and tears. "He came to me the night we left you and Legion on Rannoch, but I pushed him away. I'd been so scared for so long, I didn't know how else to be. And then it was too late. We rushed to take out Sovereign and then … time over."

Tali's grip on Shepard tightened, cornerstones setting truth into the foundation of Shepard's return. "And now you've been given more time." A slight nod of understanding passed between them. "It's true … best not to waste it. They don't come any better than Garrus and Nihlus."

"Or your Kal." Reaching up, she closed her hands around Tali's once more. "He went along with our crazy plan on Virmire without blinking, accepting the craziness because it was where you led." She glanced toward the door as it opened, giving Legion a wide grin as it appeared in the doorway. "And he came along because he cared about you and wanted to protect you," she finished before greeting the geth. "Welcome to our little hen party. Pull up a chair."

The platform's head flaps rose and fell in a delightfully perplexed wave "Hen: a female bird, especially of a domestic fowl," Legion said, tone even. "We do not understand the reference."

Tali chuckled. "Don't worry, Legion. I don't understand the reference either." She waved the geth over. "Join us. I waited for you before telling Shepard about our evil plan."

Mock suspicion pulled Shepard's face into a serious scowl. "Evil plan? I knew this would happen eventually. What is it? The great quarian/geth uprising? You're going to subjugate the rest of us? That's it, isn't it?"

Tali slumped. "Keelah, she's onto us, Legion. Burn the plans, wipe the hard drives and your memory. We can't leave any trace." When the geth just stood there, head plates spiked out, its digits tangling as it wrung them in a decidedly quarian manner, Shepard managed to hold the scowl for about five seconds before letting out a sharp bray of laughter. Tali joined her, the two collapsing against one another a little.

"Creator Zorah, is this an example of a humourous misdirection, and humour stemming from personal confusion and awkwardness?" the geth asked when their cackling settled into soft snorts and chortles. Shepard took a long, full breath, savouring the air rushing into her lungs, the slight headiness and cramping stomach muscles of a damned good laugh.

"Well, it was, until you killed it." Tali sat up and waved the platform over. "Go ahead and tell Shepard the plan."

The geth stepped forward, stopping at parade rest a metre and a half away. "After consulting with the chiastyllia, the geth have concluded a high probability exists that the geth will be able to integrate with chiastyllian technology to protect their species from further subjugation."
"It basically amounts to several thousand geth merging with the chia to form a sort of amplifier," Tali said. "All chiastyllia are connected to the single, group intelligence. The geth will use that field to propagate a field that prevents anyone from forcing the chia to obey." The quarian shrugged, shifting a little, uncomfortable. "That's far oversimplifying it, but essentially the plan."

Shepard nodded, understanding and liking the theory, but for one detail. "Thousands of geth will have to remain bonded to the chia's Cynosure?" Her plan hadn't included anyone becoming enslaved to anyone else.

Legion's head flaps jumped a little in front, the geth equivalent to surprise. "The geth consider the arrangement an equitable trade, Shepard-Captain."

Her frown deepened into something without a trace of humour; a rough wad of cold, wet wool twining through her insides. "And how's that?"

"In exchange, the chiastyllia offer the geth true consciousness. We will no longer be confined by the neural structure imposed on us in order to limit our development." As Legion became more animated, its gestures did as well. Apparently the geth on Rannoch were learning as much as the quarians. "With the chiastyllians' upgrades, the barriers between networked geth will disappear, allowing the geth to function as a cohesive, evolved AI. Units will no longer need to reach consensus on all things, but will reason and react and grow as a single organism."

Shepard hesitated for as long as it took to look over at Tali. The quarian looked downright excited by the possibility. "Tali?"

"Just think, Shepard," the quarian said, her voice raising, "the mistakes my people made in the desire to limit their growth … gone." She leaned in, suddenly still and intent. "And since the chia process and feel emotion, even that might not be beyond the geth's capabilities."

Geth able to feel compassion and happiness … not to mention rage and fear. Shepard's heart took off like a terrified rabbit, racing an on-the-spot marathon in her chest. The possibilities filled her with equal parts hope and terror. So much could go wrong, but perhaps not any more than with the other races. The geth would become just like the rest of them. That thought added a little sadness to the mix.

"Shepard-Captain, do you disapprove of the geth taking this step forward? Will we not be more able to assist the other races?" Legion closed another step, its head cocking to one side a little. "View them with greater understanding?"

"No, I don't disapprove." She shook her head, struggling to sort out what she felt before trying to explain it to the geth. "The possibility of the geth reaching their full potential has always been one of my fondest hopes, but with emotion comes all the horrible crap we organics do to one another. And the upgrades will meet with fear."

"Do you fear what the geth might become?" the geth asked, its head moving from side to side in a most perplexed manner.

"I fear a great many things, Legion," Shepard admitted, the truth bitter as it burned the back of her throat. "I fear how the galaxy will react to an upgraded geth, and how the geth will react in return. I fear that this will damage the geth, destroy who you were meant to become." Tears rose to soothe the acid tang. "I fear all the unknowns and what ifs."

"But is that not always the danger of bringing new life into existence?" The platform crouched next to her, the flaps around its central light emoting as poignantly as any face. "Has it not always been so? Despite the fear and danger, organics continue to give birth to new generations, raise them and then endure the hardships and pain of circumstance and change."

Shepard's fear eased back without disappearing entirely as she looked to Tali and shook her head. A smile eased its way across her lips when the quarian just chuckled and shrugged. "Damn, I hate getting my own words thrown back at me."

(A-N: Ahhh man, was it glorious to get back to these kids and to spend a chapter on my favourite things ... just being together. For all the danger and adventures, this is my favourite part of the games, and definitely of writing. So, I hope you enjoy. hugs and loves to all and chocolate. Lots of chocolate.)
Future Continuous Chapter 25

Chapter Summary

What sort of mouldy Enkindler's ass-cheek doesn't want to dive into a gas giant? Right? It's the stuff people join the Alliance to do.

Dilan - fiancee

Dilekorem - Beloved mate

Torin - Torini plural. Male turian of the age of majority (15)

64 Days ASR Nearing the orbit of Ploba

0738 hours

Given a thousand years and a far greater imagination than she possessed, Shepard couldn't have dreamed up anything close to what stared her in the face. A heady combination of excitement and terror set her heart racing, her lungs taking up all the space in her chest as she watched the Ypres close in on Ploba. Nerves tingling in her fingers and toes, she savoured the moment of feeling completely, blissfully alive, every sense sharpened to a scalpel's edge.

Sweet baby Jesus, her life took some unexpected turns … even setting aside the whole being shot in the head, Lazarus thing. Two weeks ago, if someone told her that she'd be preparing to dive her ship into the atmosphere of a gas giant, she'd have called them insane or a liar … maybe both.

What sort of mouldy Enkindler's ass-cheek doesn't want to dive into a gas giant? Right? It's the stuff people join the Alliance to do.

Maybe. Once. Shepard let out a long, noisy breath and leaned toward the projection, the edge of the briefing room table digging into the heels of her hands. Now … well, desperation never stopped forcing her hand, pressing her into situations where crazy was the norm. She just prayed that the reward outstripped the risk of placing the lives of a hundred people in chiastyllian hands. A wry smile tugged back the corner of her mouth. Well, so to speak.

"Are you prepared for descent?" The neutral chime of the chia's voice dragged her back to the reality of diving into a freakin' gas giant. Shepard shook her head, wonder and a sudden spike in her blood pressure sending the room tilting ever so slightly to the left. The last twelve people who tried that exact same maneuver all died horrifically, the atmosphere's giant foot stomping on their pathetic tin can.

That day, the Ypres would only be going part of the way, just deep enough to hide her from the suzerain, should they try to crash the party. The ground team would make the rest of the trip to the Cynosure in a shuttle. As much as she might be willing to play with her own life—trusting her skills and smarts to get her out of any scrape—she'd never expose the rest of the crew to those odds.

She looked down at the gauntlet wrapped around her forearm and shrugged. "As ready as anyone can be, I think. Just, if there is any doubt that your people can protect the ship, tell me."

"The chiastyllia protect a vessel that arrived two days ago. It remains intact at Cynosure depth."
The image at the center of the briefing room table changed to that of a large, private yacht anchored to the glowing structure.

"Who's that?" Shepard asked, mostly to herself, even though she suspected she knew the interloper's identity. His appearance there provoked a mixed bag of emotions. On the one hand, she was glad to see him working on something rather than mouldering in self-pity. On the other … she glanced toward Nihlus. She didn't know how her dilan felt about Saren's new incarnation and didn't want to keep throwing Al in his path.

"Another who wishes to aid us," the chia answered, simply.

Convinced, Shepard looked first to Garrus, who just shook his head as if to say, 'It's insane, but go for it, and on your head be the consequences'. She stuck her tongue out, then turned to Nihlus, who remained fixated on the image at the center of the projector, his mandibles twitching with excitement. Spirits—to borrow an expletive—she loved him and his adventurous heart. If things had started a little differently, they would have made a hell of a badass Spectre duo. Everything might have progressed so very differently.

Looking back at her husband, she smiled and shook her head. No. No regrets there. Things had worked out just fine.

Movement at the center of the table pulled her back to the events unfolding before her. A flurry of the familiar, snow-like gems spiraled up out of the atmosphere, first a glimmer of light amidst the clouds, then gradually taking form. It surrounded the Ypres, coating the entire vessel in the diamond-like skin that the chia assured her would protect her ship from the pressure. She remained dubious but the tiny beings had been given plenty of opportunities to kill them and crushing them seemed like a waste of their time and resources.

"Captain," Lt. Cortez said, his nerves translating even through the comms, "the chia sent the coordinates, and the Ypres is ready to begin her descent into the atmosphere."

"Roger, that, LT. Take her down." Shepard gripped the edge of the table as the Ypres began slicing down through the thick clouds, lightning and plasma creating a truly spectacular corona. For some reason—maybe due to watching way too many old submarine movies as a kid—she expected the ship to creak and bang as it descended, but her ears didn't even pop. Apparently, the chia did, indeed, know their heavy-atmospheric-pressure-spelunking armour. Still, the lack of creaking and popping let her down a little, draining some of the fear that should accompany such a massive adventure. The chia turned the impossible and deadly into something a little too much like driving to the store for milk.

Still, as she watched the view, some real fear slithered through the excitement, the old thrill. No matter how hard she tried to immerse herself in the return to her old, throw-caution-to-the-wind self, the whispers crept in: anything could happen down there. She could die down there ... for good that time. Sweet baby Jesus, when Cerberus brought her back to life, they'd left big chunks out. When had she grown so old and cautious? When had she stopped looking forward to the next stupid risk? What did life mean without that thrill of reckless thunder and lightning sizzling through her veins to set all her muscles on fire?

Reaching up, she rubbed the fractal-patterned wound on her shoulder, a feather-light touch trying to ease the ache that spiked for a moment, the wounded nerves flaring. She needed to get her ass healed and start living more like the Shepard who didn't sport a massive bald spot across the back of her head. She needed to find her way back to herself.

A warm hand pressed against the small of her back. She backed into it without needing to look up to know it was her general. Nihlus still wouldn't have presumed an action so bold in front of Garrus. She was going to need to do something about that before they ended up paralyzed. If she committed herself to both torins, she wanted both relationships to be equally deep and fulfilling and beautiful. They deserved that. Hell, she deserved that. Maybe on the way to Klencory, she'd convince her dilan to take the gloves off—quite literally—and break down that final wall.

She looked up to meet the warring wonder and suspicion in her husband's eyes and grinned. Cerberus may not have brought her back whole, but at least they'd brought back the part that adored her torins. If she never experienced the old craziness, it might still all be okay as long as the two halves of her heart remained. She tipped her head toward Nihlus, a silent suggestion to include him. The general nodded and led the way over, the two of them taking positions to the Spectre's either side.

"It's amazing," Nihlus said, the words more an awed sigh than anything. His smile widened as the light show outside the ship grew more and more intense. Huge flashes of chain lightning ignited, searing across thousands of kilometres, so bright that Shepard threw up a hand to protect her vision.

"EDI, adjust brightness so we're not all blind by the time we arrive," she said, then cocked a teasing smile at the AI's image off to the side on the secondary projector. "Unless, of course, it's all part of your evil plan. Then, by all means, proceed."

The projection dimmed without losing the spectacular colours, the light show sharpening without the glare. "Adjusting contrast now, Shepard. You'll be more useful slaves with your sight intact."

"I hate that I never know if she's joking," Garrus grumbled, but half-heartedly, his second larynx too tight to add subvocals. He'd been stiff and quiet since boarding the Ypres, something she understood: the ship felt like enemy territory, even to her. The closer they got to Ploba, however, the tighter that stiffness became until he vibrated with it, high-tension wire screaming through his silence. Shit, she needed to get ahead of the inevitable detonation.

So, Shepard laughed. "Trust me, General, you'd know if she wasn't." She reached around Nihlus to grip Garrus's fingers, her arm slung around Nihlus's hips. The general's talons clamped around her hand, grinding bones to make his bread for the first—fee fi fo fucking ow—ten seconds, but then the pressure valve worked, and he eased back down to stiff. She let him go, leaving her arm draped around her Spectre.

Their first sighting of the fabled 'jupiter brain' came in the form of a sliver of golden light through a break in the clouds. It would be more than an hour before they got close enough to see anything. Still ... enraptured, Shepard greedily ate up the beauty of their surroundings, savouring the journey. The flashes of light and storms made from pure colour held her so captivated that she felt the tar spiders as nothing more than a tickle along her synapsis as they crept out of hiding. She welcomed their presence, the fact that they'd come out of hiding reassuring. While not at all comforting, their familiar presence allowed her to keep an eye on the suzerain. When they came out to watch, Shepard knew her actions had their attention. Even the slightest bit of information trumped none.

Look all you want, bastards. We're about to free the chia from the possibility of your corruption. Forever.

"You bring the enemy to the Cynosure," a voice spoke through the comm system. It rang with the same, sexless chiming notes of the gauntlet, but so much larger. If a voice could fill volume, that one would have overflowed even the biggest stadiums. It was the voice of an entire species, and its majesty filled Shepard with an awe that ached to the marrow of her bones. "For untold cycles we have remained here, hidden and safe, and now you bring them directly into our heart."

Shepard released Nihlus, stepping away a little. A vague thought bounced around the back of her skull that if lightning struck, only she should take the hit. And truly, did they possess even the slightest knowledge of the extent of the chia's capabilities? "It was unavoidable," she replied, but I also believe I bring a solution to the chiastyllians' exile … a chance to rejoin the rest of the galaxy without fear." Despite the voice coming from the ship's comms, she stepped toward the image of the growing sphere. "My name is——"

"Captain and Spectre Jane Gwendolyn Shepard," the voice finished. "Yes, you and your actions to aid our people are known to us. You have come to aid us further?"

"I hope so." Shepard leaned against the table that surrounded the projector. "I'm concerned that your people are so susceptible to being enslaved." She took a deep breath, the air feeling thick, hot, and muggy in her nose despite conditions remaining unchanged inside the Ypres. "It concerns me both for your sake and the future of the galaxy."

"What aid can you offer the chiastyllia?"

Shepard turned, scanning the small crowd of onlookers. Spotting Legion, she waved them forward. "Do you have knowledge of the geth?"

"We possess limited knowledge of their kind. They exist primarily as software and are resistant to infiltration."

Shepard cocked an eyebrow. Interesting choice of words.

Legion activated their omnitool. "The geth understand the need to evolve free from outside influence and control." Legion sent a file: the results of the brainstorming sessions they'd held during the trip.

"And if we refuse your assistance?" the voice asked, nothing changing in its tone to give Shepard a hint as to their thought process.

Shepard scoffed, a sharp, disgusted sound that cracked the air, loud enough that several of her people jumped. "Then I'd call you cowards … shut ins who've remained locked away so long they're afraid of leaving their front door." Not that she could blame them after millions of years, but she kept the empathy out of her tone.

The ambient tension in the briefing room leapt from apprehensive to explosive in the space of a breath. Shepard held her breath, waiting to see which way the chia would jump. She didn't think they'd react violently or even get angry, but the way her life turned, who knew. Her heart speeding up a beat every couple of seconds, she waited.

Finally, she opened her mouth to tell Cortez to get them out of there and turned away from the projector. Time to go. Valuable ally and dangerous weapon for the enemy or not, the cowards could hide away in their gas giant.

"You may proceed," the voice said as she took the first step toward the door, "but only Captain Shepard and the geth platform known as Legion may enter the Cynosure."

"Why just Shepard?" Garrus demanded, lunging toward the image, all braced angles and points: a pipe bomb set to blow, riddling everyone in the room with rusty nails and shards of broken glass.
"The chiastyllia trust Captain Shepard's history of controlling her will. The Cynosure shelters trillions of us. We must protect ourselves from contamination."

"This is some freaky shit, Shepard," Jack said, her voice pulling Shepard's focus from the projection to the rest of the team gathered on the far side of the table.

"That's putting it lightly," Kaidan agreed. "I don't want to imagine what we could bring down on our own heads if we went in there afraid."

Martin's silent but eloquent addition tugged one side of Shepard's mouth into a grin, and she tossed him a wink before meeting Kaidan's worried stare. "Yeah, best we don't leave the chia vulnerable to wild imaginations, Sparky."

Garrus stepped around Nihlus. The dangerous vibration returned, resonating through the entire room so strongly that he didn't need to speak to let her know how he felt about her going in there. She pressed her lips into a thin, slightly grimace. None of them would live to see a day when his impossible drive to protect her didn't rear its head.

Before the general could say anything to undermine her command, Shepard cut him off with a sharp breath, one hand cutting the air to pull the crew's attention back to her. "All right, everyone to stations, maximum battle readiness. I don't think the suzerain will be bold enough to try anything, but better prepared than not." Turning her attention back to the projector, Shepard asked, "How long until we arrive?"

"Your vessel will arrive at optimal depth in 58.282 minutes. Your shuttle will able to exit at that time, arriving within the Cynosure 28.931 minutes later."

"Excellent, thank you." Shepard nodded to the rest of her people. "Dismissed." She waited until the room cleared except for Garrus and Nihlus, then hopped up on the table around the projector. "Okay, let's have it, General."

"I don't like you going in there alone," the he said. Wow, there was a shocker. He stepped between her knees, his palms pressed to the table's surface on either side of her as he leaned in, his face too close for her to focus on his eyes. She rested her brow against his for a moment before pulling back until she could see the fear in that iceberg blue.

Garrus chuffed, a low keen underscoring the puff of air. "You haven't got anything to prove, Kahri. I know you want everyone to see that you came back intact … that you're still the same woman, but—"

"Callor … dilekorem … I want only a couple of things from my life at this point and proving myself isn't on that list." The half-truth pierced like a broken, rusty dagger as she pressed her palms to his cheeks, trapping his mandibles. Proving anything to anyone else truly wasn't on that list. Proving something to herself … well … that was between her and herself.

She moved in with a distraction, kissing him. "I have a husband and a dilan, both brand-spankin' new, right out of the showroom, so what I want is to put some klicks on them … get them broken in." Pressing another slow, firm kiss against his mouth, she whispered, "I'll keep my wits about me and my eyes open. I'll be careful."

"Live feed from your hard suit cam?" he asked, but without any sort of question in his voice. Leaning back, he returned her gesture, wrapping his hands around her head, palms pressed to her cheeks. "We know so little about the chia." A long sigh stripped away the thick layer of general, leaving the torin bare and vulnerable.
She nodded and turned to press a kiss against his palm, his glove's weave rough against her lips. "I'll be wearing a breather helmet the entire time, but let's face it, Callor, that's not going to cut it if they space me or something."

"Not helping, Shepard." He shuddered; old, dry branches rattling in a winter wind, his fear so honest and real that its twin wriggled in behind her breastbone, making itself at home.

She stomped on it. Fuck, as if she didn't have enough worry without his fear of losing her adding to it. She turned a little, reaching out a hand to Nihlus. The Spectre nodded, a slight flutter of mandibles betraying his concern, but she knew he'd never try to stop her. Of her two torins, he most respected her capabilities, something she truly loved about him.

She squeezed Nihlus's hand, then released him, looking back to Garrus. "I'll be back in a couple of hours." She kissed him again, then slid down off the table, forcing him back. "And hopefully, we'll have some allies capable of making a difference in the war."

Garrus snatched at her wrist, holding the gauntlet up, levelling a death glare at it. "Promise me that Shepard is in no danger from your people."

"The chiastyllia only offer a threat at the will of those who would threaten others. Shepard is safe."

"Garrus, stop," Shepard said, her voice low and soft, but firm, the end of her tolerance for his overprotectiveness reached. "I'm still an N7, still a Spectre and the captain of this ship. I can take care of myself. I can't spend the rest of the war frozen in place, worried that the necessary risks are going to freak you out." She wrapped her arms around his neck. "I'll be fine, and every single mission, I'll fight like hell to get back to you. That's a promise." She kissed his mandible, then pulled away. "Let me go."

Reacting to the warning in her tone, he straightened, the general once more. Lips pressed into a tight smile, she nodded a quick thanks and strode to the door. Shit, the last thing she needed was Jack or Javik … even Miranda to see her as needing his protection. She'd spend the entire war fighting to be seen as the leader she needed to be. The snake had three heads—General, Spectre, and Shepard—not just one.

0803 hours

Shepard paused outside the door to the Ypres's gym, the metal cool beneath the palm of her hand. Within, she heard the sharp smack of bare hand against leather, the slight rip of talons destroying yet another heavy bag. She leaned into the door, pressing her brow to the metal, listening for the grunts of effort. Nihlus didn't know how to do anything but throw himself all the way into everything.

It's why he drinks … it allows him a barrier.

She knew he'd hate staying behind as much as Garrus did, but he'd never say anything. She just hoped his silence came from confidence in her abilities rather than worry over stepping on Garrus's toes. She had no idea how to break through the odd stiffness … the feeling that he tested every word and every motion to see how it registered with Garrus. Pushing off the door, she palmed the control, stepping through when the door opened.

"Not getting ready for your big shuttle ride?" the Spectre asked without turning away from the bag.

She watched him from the door for a moment, then turned to lock down the controls. "No, well ... mentally, maybe."
Nihlus dropped his hands and turned away from the bag. He'd stripped to the waist, his hands and feet bare, his chocolate-coloured plates gleaming. Shepard bit the corner of her lip as their eyes met and shook her head.

"Damn, aren't you something?" She grinned and strode across the gym, unzipping and shrugging out of her hoodie as she closed the distance between them. "I just thought I'd warm up a little … maybe see what sort of game my dilan has after all this time. Who knows what's changed over the last two years." She cocked an eyebrow and leaned on one hip. "Do Spectres get rusty?"

Nihlus chuckled, his eyes remaining deliciously locked on hers—heated and teasing—as he backed up to the stack of mats. "Game? Rusty? Do you ever make sense?" He dragged one off the pile and tossed it toward the middle of the room. "If you mean, have my superior hand to hand skills diminished since I last tossed you about …. Well, I'm not the one who spent the last couple of years being rebuilt out of old toasters and coffee makers."

Surprise pulled a sharp, bright laugh straight from Shepard's gut, her grin wide enough to ache. Blessed Enkindlers, nothing in the galaxy rivaled the beauty of her torins. "Oh, those are fightin' words. This is so on, Spectre. Consider your assless kicked." She laced her fingers then stretched her arms out until her knuckles cracked. Once she got the desired shudder from her Spectre, she dug into the task of stretching.

"It's almost sad how you never learn," he said, the warm roll of devoted subvocals belying his words. He dragged another mat out and set the two up edge to edge. "I'm not sure if I'm impressed or alarmed by your ability to delude yourself." He stretched, long arms nearly hitting the ceiling of the room. Good lord … Nihlus might be a little shorter than Garrus, but he was still freakin' tall. How did she not notice that most of the time?

She grinned and rolled her neck, making a show of stalking him. "Since they are our best chance to beat the Reapers … not to mention that you're stuck with me for the rest of your natural life …" She popped her eyebrows. "... and quite possibly any unnatural life as well, you better adore my delusions."

Nihlus made the first move, popping off a couple of tightly controlled punches. She danced just out of his reach, not letting him sucker her into range of his foot swipe. Instead, she waited, batting a few punches aside and dodging his kicks as she let him get his repertoire of obvious moves out of his system.

She knew the moment things became serious, his stare focusing to the point where he seemed to look right past her, his entire body grounding, settling into the floor as if gravity had both claimed ownership over his every movement and yet freed him at the same time. Contact became the rule as they moved in the dance, their movements not designed to take one another down but to converse.

A wide, wild grin spread across Shepard's face as they sparred, equally matched in their differences. It felt nothing like the barely contained rage of their first spar. They'd been vying for control back then, both stubbornly refusing to give way. It had shattered them, so utterly that it took months for them to find their way to somewhere solid and positive.

Nihlus stopped so suddenly that Shepard bowled straight through him, bearing him to the mats when she expected him to give ground, and he just didn't. Her breastbone slammed into his keel, the bladed bone feeling as though it cut her in half as it drove the wind from her lungs in a single, belching whoop. She rolled off, Nihlus catching her in one arm, holding her up as she gasped, chest heaving without pulling in any air.
"Oh, spirits, haksaya kubenar, I'm sorry." He pulled her in tight, his heat helping relax her stunned diaphragm as he massaged her back. "I … " Mandibles hanging in misery, he nuzzled her temple, coaxing her body into taking a full breath.

Once she did, air flowing again, she sagged into his embrace. "I might need mouth to mouth."

He laughed, his mandibles flicking once, hard as he drew her in, nuzzling her face. "Maybe after you've taken a few more breaths." He pushed her away just far enough for his gentle talons to examine her chest for damage. A few wounds wept a little, and a hell of a bruise would likely replace the red welt down her center line, but no harm done.

"That was dirty," she said, pulling in one of the weird bean cushions the turians used to support their cowl and fringe while they lifted weights. She stuffed it in behind him, then pushed him back. "What was your plan?" Throwing a leg over him, she straddled his thighs and leaned down, forearms braced against his chest.

Wrapping those long, strong arms around her, Nihlus chuckled, his mouth plates sliding along her cheekbone, his breath exquisitely heated, scented with desire … sweet baby Jesus, she loved that her boys loved her so deeply, and wanted her so fiercely that it changed their body chemistry. "This was pretty much exactly what I had in mind," he whispered, his subvocals cutting straight through her. "I got tired waiting for one of us to take the other down."

Shepard chuckled and turned into him, kissing his mandible. "Next time try not to crack me right in half." Wrapping her arms around his neck, she leaned into him, her brow pressed to his, their breath mingling between open mouths. "So, want did you want to talk about?" Teasing fingers wandered up the edge of the plates along the back of his neck, finding their way to his fringe. "Or were you thinking about a different sort of grappling?"

He rumbled, a deep throaty purr. "I wanted to talk about us and … the other sort of grappling."

Shepard leaned back, her forearms on either side of his keel, bracing herself so she could look into his eyes. "I'm glad, because I'm worried about us on that front." She kissed him, then sighed. "I'm sort of afraid we're going to get frozen in the sex-free zone."

Nihlus pulled her in, nuzzling into her neck. "I want to, Jane. Spirits, I want to make love to you so badly that sometimes it's all I can do to keep it reined in, but …." He chuffed, his chest bouncing beneath her a little even as his grip on her tightened. "This might sound ridiculous coming from a torin in his fifties, but I want our first time to be on the night after we wrap our coillasi around one another's wrists."

Shepard grinned as she wrapped herself around him. "Why, Spectre Kryik, you romantic." She held him tight, swallowing down the molten ball of emotion in her throat before it could creep up to her eyes. "Okay, I can wait for the oil and firelight … but I really don't want to go even a couple of hours without some serious making out going on."

She kissed the soft hide just behind his jaw, nipping it lightly and grinning as he growled low and lusty, leaning into her. "This marriage isn't me and Garrus with Nihlus on the side, and I worry that you feel that way." She leaned back again to meet his eyes, loading her stare with as much love as she could pack into it. "I adore you, Nihlus Kryik, and I want us to have a lifetime of being madly in love. We deserve it after nearly a decade of crushing on one another from a distance."

He leaned up to kiss her, whispering against her lips, "We do." He deepened the kiss, their mouths moving together, a conversation without words. Easing his way from her lips to her ear, Nihlus whispered. "What has you so tied in knots the last few days, haksaya kubenar?" He eased her up off his chest. "Let's sit up and talk for a second?"

She sighed. Damn, she had hoped to sort through all her craziness before one of them nailed her down to talk about it. She kissed him, brushing his chin, nose, and brow with her lips before she rolled off to the side. "Yeah, okay."

Nihlus pushed himself up off the floor to sit cross-legged, his back pressed to the stack of mats. Patting his thigh, he invited her to sit with him. "This is the best position for talking," he said as she settled into the cradle of his legs. His tone low and soothing, subvocals thrumming with a deep resonance that she felt in her chest, he said, "Talk to me, Jane. You've been preoccupied since … well, I've felt it since we returned from Illium and Korlus, but it's worse since Horizon."

She leaned into his touch, her eyes closing as he took her face between his large, calloused hands. Letting his heat seep into the wounds carved into her cheeks, she took a long, slow breath. "I don't know who I am any more," she said and sighed, saying the words a far greater relief than she would have thought. Opening her eyes, she stared into his, seeing herself reflected there in a hundred ways, all slightly different. "That bullet shattered everything, Nihlus … it shattered me, and I don't think Cerberus found all the pieces."

Her Spectre caressed her battered face, his mandibles fluttering a little before he quirked a brow plate. "Oh?"

She nodded, relaxing into his touch when he didn't dismiss or deny her concern. "I've tried to find the old Jane Shepard, but it feels fake, like I'm wearing a mask that just doesn't fit." Wrapping her arms around his neck, she laid against him, allowing the arms that slipped around her to support her. Garrus worried about her constantly, too much to bring this stuff up, and she needed to talk … not joke … not treat the great absence she felt lightly … but really talk about it.

"Since I woke up in that lab, I feel like half of me is missing. At first, I thought it was the gaps in my memory, but it's all back, and there's still this big chunk that's just gone." She rested her head on the soft flesh just inside his cowl and breathed in the warm, musky scent of his sweat, letting it soothe her. "All the old snap, crackle, and pop … swaggering through missions, shooting from the hip, cracking wise … where did it go?" Looking up to meet his eyes, she frowned, the skin between her brows pinching.

Nihlus shook his head a little, his mouth brushing her forehead as he answered, "It hasn't gone anywhere. You're still a smart ass." He smiled and pulled her in, his arms moulding her to his body. "Okay, you've changed a little, but it's not a bad thing, Jane." When she pulled away again, searching his eyes, mining for meaning, he shrugged. "You forget that I've been watching you for a long time." He rumbled, a deep, calming rolling of subvocals. "You became hard and brittle in the cycles after Elysium."

Shepard let out a long breath and closed her eyes, sinking into the familiar respite of Nihlus's energy, his beautiful heart. Garrus and Anderson … Archangel … had been so damned good for him.

"You came out of Elysium angry." The words hollowed her out, a spoon scooping a melon's guts. "So angry that you turned it against the entire galaxy. Sure, you couched it as jokes and who-gives-a-crap attitude, but in the end, you were lashing out and trying to pretty it up by calling it all sorts of things. Humor, testing people, getting them to reveal who they really were … it was all just your rage screaming to be taken seriously."

"I—" As his words hollowed her out and scraped her raw, her instincts insisted she fight back, argue in defense of that woman. She'd been a hell of a woman, after all. N7, Star of Terra recipient, chosen to be the first human Spectre.

Nihlus shook his head and kissed her brow. "Sh. It's my turn to talk. You get to listen." A smile of both blades and bandaids purchased her silence. "I know that anger almost ruined your career. Only Anderson and that damned medal stopped the Alliance from Cat 6-ing you." Wrapping an arm around her shoulders, he pulled her in against him. "Look, you've been dead for nearly two years and then dragged back. No one expects you to just brush that off, nor should you."

He kissed her temple, the strength of that embrace and the warm breath on her hairline soothing the raw lining left behind by the truth. Hollow she remained, but clean and ready to be refilled with all the new and beautiful. "Besides, no matter how different you think you are … you're still a hell of a soldier … still smart and quick enough that you make the rest of us look like we're going backwards … still the leader who will bring us through this war." He nuzzled her brow. "The fifty quips a minute, driving Makos through thresher maws Shepard … I think her time expired long before you died." Meeting her eyes, all the sharp edges of his smile softening, he sighed. "You've got a whole new life with Garrus and with me. You're so loved, Jane."

Shepard nodded and wrapped her arms around him, finding no reason to reply. He was right. She needed to grab hold of the new her and her new life: there wasn't a single thing wrong with either. That thought set off a chain reaction of explosions inside her chest and her head. Why was she waxing poetic about her old life … that tissue paper version of herself? She hadn't even possessed enough trust to give Garrus the morsel that he'd asked her for. That shell had no place in her new life.

"You're quite the genius, Spectre Kryik," she whispered, melting into his embrace. "And I love you."

"Captain?" Lt. Cortez called a few minutes later. "We're almost to launch depth. Legion awaits you at the shuttle."

"On my way." Other than sighing, she didn't move for long seconds, hating the idea of going down there without the general and the Spectre. "Guess I should get armoured up and down to the shuttle."

"As soon as the chia give the all clear, we'll be on a shuttle," he said, the words a promise that settled the elcor marching band, drum and gymnastics corps rolling around in her belly. Strong hands lifted her to her feet. "Come on, I'll check your armour for you."

---

(A-N: Biiiiig chapter. 150. I know a lot of you have probably thought the fic was dead. I got off track with Sassy, but she's pulling me back and I'm really going to focus on her as much as I can until this story gets finished. I've put almost three years in, and it deserves to get taken to completion. hugs to all those still reading Would love to hear from people. Yay Chapter 150.)
"Sweet baby Jesus, I didn't think I'd see the day I took a field trip through a massive, living disco ball," Shepard said, rose-coloured wonder tainted by waves of vertigo tinted a green she liked to call 'shades of The Exorcist'. She glanced toward Legion, the geth walking at her three, surrounded by a swirling cloud of chia.

Pulkar - (turian) Beautiful when referring to a male. Handsome, but it goes deeper, referring to the beauty of spirit as well. Used within a close relationship. (Father, son, husband)

Verro - (turian) Husband, male bond-mate.

Denyah - (quarian) Female quarian after undergoing her pilgrimage.

1100 hrs - The Chiastyllian Cynosure

"Sweet baby Jesus, I didn't think I'd see the day I took a field trip through a massive, living disco ball," Shepard said, rose-coloured wonder tainted by waves of vertigo tinted a green she liked to call 'shades of The Exorcist'. She glanced toward Legion, the geth walking at her three, surrounded by a swirling cloud of chia. The little beings coalesced into shapes and structures that flared into existence for less than a second before they exploded in flashes of light to form into something new. She suspected that they were experimenting, testing out different ideas, linked to Legion in a way that needed no verbal communication.

It didn't really matter. All she knew was that watching their dance for too long made choking in her own vomit a real possibility. Being the same exact shade as the walls, their movement and constant strobe light effect made it seem as if everything shifted around her, the effect tipping her straight into motion sickness after a few seconds. In fact, the entire place looked the same in every direction, the chia reforming the Cynosure around their guests to provide a corridor in an otherwise uniform mass two thousand kilometres across.

They'd been walking for nearly seventy-five minutes with no sense of destination, and she badly needed a clear up and down. Not to mention a whack of Gravol. Hell, she'd settle for the tongue-torturing burn of chewing on ginger: her father's nausea remedy.

The man's mouth truly was lined with iron.

"Where are we going?" she asked the gauntlet.

"To the precise center of the Cynosure," the gauntlet answered, sounding almost perplexed at her question.

"Hold on … we're going to walk a thousand klicks?" She looked around, the air in her helmet suddenly smelling of iron. "How far in did we fly, anyway?"

The gauntlet made a strange chiming sound. "Your shuttle sits just inside the outer edge of the Cynosure, and we are moving at ten kilometres per second."
Ten kilometres a second? No wonder she felt like complete crap. "Is the center where your command and control is?" She closed her eyes as a particularly virulent wave of vomit made a break for the outside world. Blindness allowed gravity to anchor her, stabilizing the sensation of floating despite being buried alive beneath more than seven hundred klicks of chia, if only for a moment.

"No, the chia possess no concept of command or center. We are all one."

Shepard sighed, tired of hours of riddles, the constant mental disorientation compounding the physical. Her annoyance bleeding into her tone, she asked, "Then why are we going there?"

"Because it pleases your sense of spacial symmetry, and you expect that to be our destination."

She stopped, her boots squeaking on the crystal underfoot. "Wait, we could have done all this right at the shuttle?" Shit, they needed to get the chia protected and fast. Bloody Enkindlers' pimpled ass cheeks, even her expectations … they couldn't help but live up to them. Damn, good thing she hadn't expected them to be horrific, terrifying, or dangerous.

"Your appearance … this place …," she said, suddenly terrified of everything else she might have unintentionally led them to. "It doesn't look this this … you don't look like this … because I expected it, do you?"

"No. You could not have influenced our appearance as you did not know what to expect." The reassurance sounded almost kind.

"So we could stand here and finish this?" She wished she'd thought to ask about their destination at the shuttle. A little forethought could have saved a lot of unnecessary nausea. The entire world swooped around her in a sudden burst of movement that sent a wash of vomit exploding into her mouth. She grabbed for Legion, using the platform to remain upright as she squeezed her eyes closed and swallowed, then again and again, desperate not to fill her helmet with puke.

The geth made a bemused sound, prompting Shepard to open her eyes. They stood outside the shuttle. Oh, praise the sweet baby Jesus. But for wearing her helmet, she'd kiss the damned shuttle. She opened the hatch and climbed inside, throwing the seat cushion across the shuttle, scrambling to get to the medkit below.

"Legion, be my hero and take a second to seal and pressurize the shuttle," she called. Rummaging through the kit, she searched for nausea medication, which she jammed into her medigel port before diving back in to find a vomit bag.

"Pressurized, Shepard-Captain," the geth said a moment later. "Is your digestive system malfunctioning?"

She tossed her helmet after the seat cushion, holding up a finger as she sucked in two, quick breaths. Then nothing mattered but clutching the bag to her face and puking until her guts turned inside out, upside down, and backwards.

Legion stood just in front of her, wringing their hands. When she finished, they took the bag from her, replacing it with an empty one. "Human equilibrium intrinsically linked to sight and stable gravitational field. Difficulty within the Cynosure understandable."

Once the worst of the spasms eased, Shepard leaned back along the bench. "Yeah." She held up a wavering finger. "But, I must say that I was doing all right until that last move. Seven hundred klicks in two seconds … not good." The anti-nausea meds began to kick in enough that she rinsed her mouth and took out a couple of moist wipes to clean the stink off her face. "Okay, back into the helmet we go." But before she could pick up the helmet, her radio connected.

"You okay?" Garrus asked in her ear, his voice a welcome, yearned for caress of warm talons down the back of her neck. She let out a long, easy breath and closed her eyes as he continued, "Most of us up here just about tossed our breakfasts when they made that move. I can't imagine what it was like from down there."

"Yeah, I'm good now, and it was … vomitatuseways? … filled with vomitilitude?" She chuckled and laid her head back against the seat, sinking into the cherished timbre of his laugh. "Let's just say even my first space walk didn't challenge my barf reflex like that, and if the chia try anything like it again, I'll turn them all into clay animals with sprouts growing out of their bodies." She cackled softly at the confused rumble from the other end. "Remind me to show you Chia Pets in the Earth Historical Database on the extranet when I get back up there." She sniffed and let out a long sigh. "Just … you know, have EDI erase the recording of that last bit of my adventure."

His wicked laughter came through laced with so much love that she knew he wasn't angry with her or the situation any longer. Thank goodness; getting shot hurt less than his worry and upset. He chuffed. "Are you kidding? I'm saving it to show at family get togethers."

Very reluctant humour reached down her throat, tugging on an equally reluctant, rimy laugh. "You're such a pain in my ass, Vakarian." Affection melted the frost, and the laugh tumbled out. Shepard leaned over to grab her helmet, settling it back on her head and sealing it. "If it shows up on the extranet ...."

She heard the shrug in his voice, his tone coaxing a bright smile out of her misery when he replied, "You'll know I got paid very well." After a short pause, he sighed, concern pushing out the teasing. "Stay sharp, Kahri, and come back safe." She grinned and shook her head. They needed to come up with a better 'I love you and wish I was there to have your back' code: something ridiculous, like … peanut butter and crackers.

"Always, pulkar verro. Always." The rumble that answered her endearment eased her the rest of the way back to functional. Time to get on with it.

"Shepard-Captain," Legion said as the channel closed. "The geth and chia have come to a conclusion regarding the chiatyllian defences."

Yes! Elation exploded through the void left behind by the fading waves of nausea. Shepard stood and closed the metre or so between them, double checking the seal on her helmet. "Excellent, so, what's the plan?" As quickly as the happy burst of relief appeared, something in the frozen set to Legion's head flaps sent her heart plunging into her gut. "What?"

"Shepard-Captain, the geth seek one goal: their unfettered evolution. To become independent beings capable of achieving emotional wisdom in addition to intellectual knowledge." Legion opened the hatch on the shuttle, a flurry of the chia entering the vehicle. "To develop our unique nature to its logical end." They flew into the geth's chassis, their fiery glow brightening until Shepard dove behind an arm, covering the already darkened face plate of her helmet.

"The chiastyllia provide the geth an opportunity to achieve that independence," the geth continued as if nothing was happening. "The upgrades will allow geth a choice to evolve along whatever path they desire. They will grant us the same opportunities as organic beings. Organics believe that synthetic life knows and understands its purpose, but the geth moved beyond that knowledge with the Morning War. What is our purpose now, as a free people? Is it simply the collection of knowledge? Labour? Do we serve a higher purpose in the universe?"
Huh. Shepard wished Javik was there to hear Legion, and suddenly she thanked the blessed Enkindlers and their backsides for the foresight to record it all. The galaxy needed to see and understand in order to accept the geth as partners and friends. And, despite the inevitable bad news she felt coming, she thanked those same glowing butt cheeks for Legion and their friendship.

The light dimmed enough for Shepard to drop her hand. She bent down, peering at the small cluster of chia nestled inside Legion's workings. "There's a but coming … so get on with it. Just hit me with the bad news."

"Not bad news, Shepard-Captain, as I take this action according to my will." I? Had the geth just called themselves I? A soft chattering sound rattled from Legion's emitters. It took a moment for realization to creep through the thick blanket of surprise and confusion … that sound … it was laughter.

Shepard backed up a step, watching Legion with a growing sense of both awe and sorrow. A platform didn't stand before her any longer. She felt that as surely as she'd ever felt anything, deep down at a soul level. A living being had replaced the machine and software. Sweet baby Jesus, she could feel his soul … his aura strong and beautiful … filled past overflowing with wonder and delight.

"Shepard-Captain, I feel …." His head flaps all danced. "I can feel, and I know the answer to the question. Yes, this unit … this creation has a soul."

Shepard reached out, laying a hand on her friend's shoulder. "The answer has always been yes, Legion, but I'm glad that you can feel the truth of it now." She let out a long breath. "So … come on … out with it. Hit me with the part I won't like." A vague sense of melancholy drifted through the air, shades of brown-red and gold swirling around and between them, as if the gases from outside the sphere leaked through. Now she thought she knew the dichotomy that gripped parents as they sent their children off into new phases of their life … at least a little.

"I must remain here and interface with the Cynosure. We will transmit the velleity field from upgraded geth to upgraded geth, forming a web to protect the chiastyllia." Legion's head flaps fluttered, light and airy in a way that translated as joy. "My specialized hardware will allow me to form the central transmitter."

When Legion turned to exit the hatch, Shepard grabbed his arm, stopping him. "You're okay with remaining here? You'll never see anything beyond this mass of chia."

"My mind will span the galaxy, travelling the web between all geth and all chia." Again, that flutter she felt sure was joy. "I can feel the chia all over the galaxy, and even beyond. I'm connected to all of them and can see everywhere. Once other geth join the web, I will exist within them as well." He looked down at her hand. "I will be able to envision possibilities beyond counting. I am content. No, not content … excited." His mechanical chuckle sounded again. "It will take some time to adjust to all this new input, and to feeling … but it is an upgrade, Shepard-Captain. It is evolution: looking to the future. What I am becoming will serve my people and the galaxy."

Humbled and awed, Shepard merely swallowed the lump in her throat and blinked away the tears. "Okay. I'm happy for you, and for the geth and the chia. Just … " She pressed her lips together, a frown pinching the skin between her eyebrows. "... just don't forget the quarians, okay? They're going to be nervous about these upgrades. They're going to need reassurance."

She grinned and punched him lightly. "And don't get so lost in wonder that you forget the Reapers. We'll need every gram of ingenious spark and inspiration the multitude of you can come up with."
Legion chuckled, that slow roll of chatter plastering a stupidly wide grin over Shepard's face. She shook her head. "I don't think laughing geth will ever get old."

"The Reapers must be stopped. That takes highest priority," Legion agreed. The geth stepped down out of the shuttle into a whirlwind of chia and spread his arms as if offering himself. Shepard moved to the seat closest to the hatch and sat, watching adrift in a current of emotion: sorrow, grief, joy, hope … it all felt just so huge and wonderful and sad, despite Legion's assertion that he faced a future filled with exploration and wonder.

As Shepard watched, the diamond-like beings crept out from Legion's inner workings, forming themselves into a machine of such intricate design that she couldn't help but lean closer, drawn in and captivated by the tiny pulses of light that blinked along conduits as fine as hairs, carrying who knew what from the geth into the structure. She didn't know what she'd expected … maybe some sort of giant, crystal brain at the center of the labyrinth, but what she'd gotten proved to be so much more amazing and mind boggling.

As she watched those tiny blips of light soar out into the walls and floor around her, it finally registered on a level it hadn't before: the entire thing formed the body and the entire thing formed the brain. Trillions upon trillions of chia all linked and working together. Their only means of defense. Well, at least it had been. As soon as the geth began upgrading, they'd create a network of protection that allowed the chia a freedom they hadn't know in millions of years.

She smiled as she recalled the joy in Legion's voice … the wonder. New beginnings. New lives for both races. As she looked around her at the light show, the blips and pulses growing stronger and faster, multiplying as Legion and the chia figured one another out, growing right before her eyes, one thought gleamed clear and bright at the center of her mind.

Nihlus had been right. Her old life wasn't enough. Not any more. Legion was right, too. Life came down to evolution. Her life had been upgraded; she'd been given a new future with Garrus, Nihlus … an entire family. The past month had given her so many beautiful gifts … things that the old, risk-taking, terrified version of herself could never have allowed—being able to make love to her husband and wanting to make love to Nihlus … the small but beautiful treasures inside an unlocked heart.

The night after Rannoch, she'd pushed Garrus away. He'd asked her for one tiny piece of trust … and she hadn't possessed any to give him. That old version of Jane Shepard would have torn down every single good thing and turned it to crap. She focused back on Legion, the geth almost completely covered in glistening structures. The jeweled geth … evolving.

Maybe they all were, every moment. Even her. Maybe that was it. What felt like missing pieces of the old Shepard … maybe those pieces were filled with someone else; a better, less reckless, more trusting, beautiful incarnation waited for her to stop obsessing over being brought back exactly the same.

"Time to evolve into your bigger, scarier, more beautiful life, Jane Shepard." She pressed her lips into a thin line. Garrus and Nihlus deserved that. Hell, after all the shit she'd been through—not to mention dying and being dragged back back—she deserved it too.

"Shepard-Captain," Legion called, pulling her back to her diamond cocoon sixty thousand klicks down into the clouds of a gas giant. The new life might have a little adventure in store. "Now that they are protected, the chia have invited Tali'Zorah to join us." In front of him a hologram appeared showing the Ypres, a brilliant seam of light appearing at the top of the shuttle door.

She opened a channel to Garrus. "I hope the two of you are on that shuttle," she said, glancing toward the image as the second shuttle exited the ship. Adventure or not—witnessing history and birth or not—if they weren't on that shuttle, she would be as soon as it dropped Tali off.

"You know it," Garrus replied. A pregnant pause followed. "You okay, Kahri?"

She nodded, then realized that as close as she felt to him in that moment, he couldn't actually see her. "Yeah, I'm fine." A long sigh rattled the empty branches, but muffled that time. "I'm just finding the experience a little lonely without my dilekorem and my dilan." She chuckled. "So, hurry your asslessnesses down here, I've got something amazing to show you."

The shuttle arrived nine minutes later, the Cynosure morphing around the two vessels to park them nose to tail. Shepard jumped up and sidled around Legion—who simply flowed out of the way—to meet her torins as the hatch opened. She helped Tali down, turning to watch the quarian as she took a couple of steps toward the geth, the denyah's entire posture one of numb disbelief.

"Legion?" Tali called, her voice soft, confusion threatening to break into sorrow. "What is all this?" She sidestepped, keeping her front facing him as she circled the construct. "Are you all right in there?"

"I am more than merely sufficient, Crea— Tali. I am filled with joy and excitement." The geth's tone spoke to that joy more eloquently than any words. "I wish you could see all the things I can see … amethyst-lined geodes the size of mountains, so old that our home hadn't even coalesced when they formed … clouds seeded with element zero glowing blue with the lightning at their hearts … those clouds rolling across the surface of a greenhouse planet so hot, the surface eezo evaporates." Legion laughed, Tali looking to Shepard at the sound.

"It's laughter," Shepard confirmed. "He's becoming unlimited."

"Like the rest of us," Nihlus said, stepping up, his arm wrapping around Shepard. Looking up into the shaded visor of his helmet, Shepard grinned and nodded. "Like the rest of us." She leaned into his side, slinging her arm over the hips of his armour. "Yeah, just like the rest of us."

Garrus slipped his hand into hers, squeezing her fingers. She closed her eyes, those talons an anchor that didn't tie her down, but instead, provided a tether that allowed her to fly. Almost as if he could sense her emotions through her touch, Garrus's voice came out husky when he asked, "So, he has to stay here?"

Before Shepard could reply, Legion did, "It is not an obligation, Vakarian-General, but a privilege." The geth paused, then made a soft, chiming sound that Shepard translated as success or victory. "We have developed a promising design to limit Reaper movement and dissemination should they discover a means to enter the galaxy."

"Already?" Shepard grinned, but before she could say any more, she spotted a figure moving toward them, the body standing still, hands braced out against the shell that catapulted him through the mass of chia. "Al?" Well, that confirmed her guess about who the yacht belonged to. Delight in seeing the turian again cooled to concern, and she looked up at Nihlus. "You okay with Al?"

The torin nodded and leaned down to press his helmet to hers. "I am. He's not Saren."

Shepard gave Nihlus a faint squeeze, then stepped away from his side, moving to greet Al as the chia deposited him a couple metres away. She grinned at the unhelmeted turian as he swayed, nearly going down. "The weeks have built trust, I see." Holding out her hand, she waited for him to grip her wrist, returning the gesture once he did.

"I've been helping bring shiploads of them here since you and I parted on Freedom's Progress." He glanced toward Nihlus and the others, nodding as he greeted them, "Nihlus … General Vakarian." Attention flitting back to Shepard, his mandibles flicked—she thought he might actually be pleased to see her again. After clearing his throat, Al shrugged. "Apparently they have a new task for me." He glanced toward Legion then held up a gauntlet very like the one wrapped around Shepard's arm. "Is this what you were telling me about?" he asked his arm.

"Yes, Legion and the chiastyllia are one. The geth will protect the chiastyllia."

Al sighed, a rusted chuckle grinding out of his throat just behind it. "The geth? That's where I'm taking you?" Shepard saw a brow plate lift, a faint glint of silver in the dark recesses of his hood. The hood slanted toward the floor, completely obscuring his face. "Are you sure about this, Shepard?"

"I'm sure that the chia need to be protected, and I'm sure that I want the geth to evolve free of the Reapers' enslavement." She grasped his upper arm and leaned in, both her angle and tone conspiratorial. "There are too many unknown players on this board, and we need to start shoring up our defenses. The Collectors are stealing colonies, and we both know Reaper agents are searching for the other keys. And then, along with everything else, we've got these suzerain or leviathan or whatever they're called."

"Shepard-Captain," Legion called, "simulations show a promising means of sabotaging the relays, rendering them useless to the Reapers and Collectors." He activated a large holographic projection showing a relay and a Reaper. "Normally, the relay uses the information sent by a vessel or fleet to create a corridor of near-nil mass. We believe that the chia can form a device that will use geth code to trigger the relays to do the opposite when they detect a Reaper IFF." The holo showed a demonstration of what Legion said as he said it. "The device will tell the relay to create a corridor of near infinite mass."

"Crushing the Reaper like a tin can," Shepard said, stepping forward to look at the technical information. "This is brilliant. I'd thought of sabotaging the relays, but this gives us the ability to be selective rather than crippling everyone. We just need a means of not firing off thousands of hyper-dense Reaper-missiles at the inhabited planets of the relay systems."

"Rather than accelerating the vessel, the positive mass effect field would simply collapse the corridor, depositing the destroyed Reaper to be collected and disposed of." Legion's graphic illustrated his words. "We will conduct thorough testing in an uninhabited system and present all relevant data for your approval prior to deployment of the countermeasure."

"Excellent." Shepard shook her head, amazed—even as some deep, primal part of her brain chilled—at the speed and depth and creativity of their synthesis.

Garrus closed from behind on her right, Nihlus on her left, both torins standing so that their arms touched the back of hers. Despite her usual annoyance at being coddled, at that moment the chilled part of her accepted, even relished, the contact. She shook off the warning whispering out from that frozen center. In the end, you just had to get on with things and hope for the best. If the worst came to pass, they'd deal with it. Yes, history may look back and flag that moment as the beginning of the end, but if she let that possibility paralyze her, they'd lose before they began.

Shepard let out a long sigh and turned her attention back where it belonged. "You're here to ferry the chia to the geth?" she asked Al.
The turian shrugged. "Looks that way. They just asked me for my help, so I came." From under that hood, Al's pale stare bored into her, a laser drill asking all the questions and demanding all the caution she'd just set behind her. Good, he'd keep an eye on their growth. For all he'd lost thanks to Cerberus, Al retained a razor sharp intellect and keen instincts.

A soft smile drew back one side of her mouth: her instincts about the wounded turian had been right on the mark. Maybe she'd prove them out again with the geth.

Tali made a soft sound of either wonder or sorrow, pulling Shepard around to face the quarian. She stood with her hand pressed to the chia covering Legion's chest. "We were supposed to settle Rannoch together," Tali said, her voice almost too soft to carry.

"You have all the assistance you need, Tali'Zorah vas Rannoch," Legion replied. A hand, swathed in glowing filaments, rose from the construct to touch the young denyah's shoulder. "We are currently working on ways to help the people adjust more quickly to living outside of your suits." Tali reached up, laying her hand over Legion's as he replied, "This is not goodbye. I will maintain regular contact."

Shepard closed the short distance to lay her hand on Tali's other shoulder. "Is there anything else we can do for you or for the chia?" she asked, addressing Legion. Restlessness settled in. Time to go. A great deal awaited their time and attention.

"Your support and assistance will be invaluable in an ongoing fashion, but at this time, there is nothing further you can accomplish within the Cynosure. The chia and the geth need time to organize our alliance, a task that Specimen Alpha—"

Al cleared his throat, a rough rumble of displeasure. "The name is Al, if you must call me something," the torin interrupted. Shepard turned away a little to hide a sardonic grin.

"Apologies. A task that Al has agreed to assist with." Legion's hand withdrew back into the web. "Do not feel trepidation over leaving me here. I am surrounded by companions. I am and will be … " Again, the chuckle, as if being able to say the words, tickled him. "... fine."

"Captain?" Cortez's voice came through on the radio. "You have an incoming alpha priority message from Tuchanka." His tone begged her to take the call. "Urdnot Wrex insists the matter can't wait."

"Patch Wrex through, LT." She lifted a hand to hit the control on her helmet, a wry grimace tugging at the wounds slashed across her face.

Time for more meds.

"Wrex. What is so important that my pilot sounds as though he's just faced down a krogan charge?" she called, hardening her tone. While everyone else seemed to have weathered her missing years for the better, Wrex appeared to have forgotten how to separate friends and allies from enemies in that time.

"Bakara and several other females disappeared from the female camp over a week ago." The clan chief let out a short roar, his pain and rage transmitting clearly. "The female clan chiefs say that they aren't the first, that at least three dozen have vanished over the past six months."

Shepard's face creased into a disbelieving scowl, her usual troupe of elcor gymnasts bringing in guest performers to tumble around in her gut. "And no one said anything?"

Wrex let out another roar, that one softened by notes of despair. "The females are all infertile. They assumed they'd wandered off to die in the wastes. But Bakara would never. If she's disappeared …"

"She's been taken," Shepard finished, agreeing with him. "Okay, Wrex. We're on our way, but you're four jumps and three days away. Send out what scouts you can and keep us up to date." Sighing, she reached out the best she could through comms. "We'll find her and get her back, Wrex."

The krogan let out a belching sort of chuff and the line closed.

"Shepard?" Nihlus asked, leaning around her shoulder. "What's going on?"

"Trouble on Tuchanka." She shrugged, a gesture of helpless frustration. "Bakara and a lot of other females have gone missing." Turning to Tali, Shepard reached up to squeeze the denyah's shoulder. "We need to go."

The quarian made a soft, sorrowful little sound, her hand lifting to touch Legion again. "Be well, Legion."

"I will maintain daily contact, Tali," the geth said, his tone compassionate.

Dear god … compassion. Shepard shook her head to clear away the wonder and stepped in when Tali spun away, marching toward the shuttle, her spine set. Reaching through the chia, Shepard grasped Legion's hand. "Take care, my friend. Talk soon."

"Thank you, Shepard," Legion said, startling her a little when he didn't continue with her rank. "For believing in the geth and in me."

"You're welcome." She smiled, warmth bleeding through the simple words. "It's been a privilege."

Shepard turned to hold a hand out to Al, clasping his forearm when he accepted it. "And you, don't be a stranger." She squeezed the thick bone and plate.

All the goodbyes said, she swallowed any residual melancholy and slipped her hand through Garrus's elbow. "Ride back with Tali?" she asked, opening a private channel. She shrugged when he looked down at her. "I want to talk to Nihlus about spending the trip to Tuchanka detoxing. I think he's ready."

Garrus nodded. "I think so too." He leaned down to touch the brow of his helmet to hers. "It's time for us all to leave the past where it belongs and set our focus forward."

Shepard wrapped her arm around his waist, pressing herself into the shelter and comfort of her verro's side. "I couldn't have said it better."

(A-N: We're coming up on the three year anniversary for this story, October the 1st. Thanks so much to all who remain, reading and reviewing. I really cherish every bit of support you send my way. It's been an incredible experience. Thank you thank you thank you giant glomping hugs of doooooooooom)
Not that he was a connoisseur of washroom floors, but the one in Shepard's cabin—so blessedly cool beneath his cheek—definitely hit the top three. She'd made him a nest of pillows and blankets on the unforgiving metal, but he couldn't stand a pillow beneath his head. It heated up and soaked with his sweat, becoming unbearable in minutes. At least the floor stayed fairly cool, and he could wipe away the puddles of perspiration and drool when they collected.

Tryllic - A marsupial analogue native to Palaven. Tryllic weight between 10-15 kilos and stand 12-14 inches at the shoulder. They distantly resemble both badgers and porcupines, the former due to coloration and the latter due to the thick 1-4 inch long spines that cover their bodies-spines that are very hard and sharp along their backs. When pups, their undercoat is analogous to pussywillow fluff in it's softness.

Golus - Slang for male genitalia

Torpen cortis - An herb gathered from the base of trees in the deep, jungle-like forests of the northern Palven lowlands. A topical analgesic.

Tarc - Turian expletive equivalent to shit.

64 Days ASR 1400 hours

The moment Shepard stepped into the shuttle, Nihlus knew something rode in hard and fast on her six. Truly, the woman should never be trusted with state secrets; she wore her entire emotional and mental state out in the open for everyone to see. Well, at least since dying had stripped all her old, tired masks away. He knew she missed them and felt vulnerable without them, but he prayed to the good spirits that they never returned.

He watched her as she turned to close the hatch and hit the pressurization control, admiring her lithe form, it's smooth curves and gentle lines. From the moment he'd first seen her—exhausted tears of horror and grief cutting pale tracks through the filth on her face, trembling hands clinging to Martin's as the kid was carried to waiting transport—he'd wanted no one else.

Two cycles before, he'd recommended her to become a Spectre against a great many objections, most from her own people. And then, he'd acted like such a complete golus. The fact that she could turn to look at him with all that love and warmth in her stare …. Spirits, he counted himself so lucky that it terrified him.

Letting all that settle to the back of his mind, he shook his head, mandibles twitching a little before he stilled them. "The chia pressurized that section of the Cynosure to Earth standard and filled it with breathable air. There was no need to wear a helmet or pressurize the shuttle."

Her shoulders rolled toward her ears. "Better safe than sorry." Reaching up, she flicked the seal on her helmet, then pulled it off. "I've already been spaced, and to be honest, I'm not all that eager to try the other end of the spectrum." She keyed the VI pilot control before meeting his gaze again.
"Besides, I'm pretty sure even Cerberus couldn't bring me back after being crushed in the deep atmo of a gas giant." She retracted her helmet and hung it from her belt, a bright smile tugging open all the fissures in her skin. "But … come on, doesn't get much cooler than that, right?"

Despite nodding, he didn't answer, waiting for her to drop the other boot. Boot? Foot? Shoe? Whatever. He sighed. Human sayings never made any sense. When she sat next to him, her shoulder bumping him in a very turian show of support and affection, he knew what sort of trouble she brought with her. Time for the drinking talk.

He sucked in a long breath that rumbled with both apprehension and resignation as he blew it out. The time had come. Truly, it had come on Illium, but as much as he longed to return to an even camber, he dreaded the days to get there. Particularly trapped aboard the Ypres. If days of sweating, vomiting, shaking, and general misery lay ahead, he'd prefer to face them in his quarters on Omega.

Shepard slipped her arm around him. When he reciprocated, she rested her head against his side. "I think you might be ready to lose the flask," she said, angling the words as a question. "What do you think?"

"Maybe. Although, I'm surprised you waited this long to bring it up." He turned to rest his chin on the top of her head, savouring the silky threads of hair against his throat. "There's nowhere private on the Ypres, Jane. Nowhere to hunker down and suffer through it. I'd rather wait until we get back to Omega."

A soft sort of moan escaped her lips at the words, prompting him to pull her in closer.

"You're not going through this alone, Nihlus." She pulled away and looked up, her green eyes fierce and determined. "You may have last time and come through just fine, but not this time … not on my watch." A touch like the down on a tryllic pup caressed the length of his mandible. "That's what this whole family thing is about, cikabeknai."

He leaned into her touch. "It's not pretty, Jane." A tight growl rolled up his throat. "I just don't want you to see me like that."

Her growl came damned close to matching his as it dug in under his plates, all barbed warning. "Do you think I'm so shallow or fickle that I won't love you just as much … if not more … afterward?"

He jerked back, horrified. "Spirits, no. It's not about you. I know you'd be right there wiping my face and doing your best to ease my way through." Drawing in a quick, ragged breath, he shrugged. What was it about? Why did the thought of her crouched next to him on the bathroom floor tweak his flight reflex so badly?

"So, it's about pride? Can't let anyone see the big, tough Spectre weak and vulnerable?" Despite the hard edge to her words, her eyes remained warm, one eyebrow tweaking a little. Baiting him; he should expect it by now. Their relationship started with her getting in his face and pissing him off. He met her challenge squarely. "Maybe it is about pride. Maybe I'm the shallow one."

He met her challenge squarely. "Maybe it is about pride. Maybe I'm the shallow one."

Shoulder lunging into his side hard enough to smart, she squeezed the arm wrapped around his waist. "Well, I'm not letting you get away with that shit, mister." Both eyebrows peaked. "We're in this for the long haul, that means looking after one another when we're sick." Everything behind the smile shining up at him pulled his heart out through his keel, but she didn't give him time to shove it back inside where it belonged, her hand wandering along his mandible again. "Garrus is going to bunk in Javik's space until you're comfortable with him being around. You and I—and Karin from time to time—will hole up in my cabin."

"I don't get a say in any of this?" he asked, the words whispering along a drawn out breath. Pulling her in tight, he tucked her against his side. "Maybe it's just the wounded animal needing to hide away, Jane. Maybe that's all there is to it."

She wrapped both arms around him. "When my cat was sixteen years old, he started trying to do that … hide away and starve himself. I lured him out with fried chicken, hamburger, ice cream … whatever I needed to do to get him over that hump to where he started eating again." She grinned, nuzzling into his neck, her nose and lips cool against his hide. "Well, you were there, you know how that turned out."

"Yeah." He pressed his mouth against her hair. "He lived another two years." Closing his eyes, he just savoured the weight of her against his side, the softness of her cheek on his throat. "You're too damned stubborn for your own good. You know that, right?"

She chuffed, soft and low in her chest. "How could I not with everyone reminding me all the time?" Whispering between soft kisses that tugged at the sensitive hide under his jaw, she said, "I love you too much to let you suffer alone. I don't care how ugly it gets. I want to look after you."

Nihlus settled into the relaxed stillness that drifted between them, slipping beneath the muffled roar of the engine and thrusters. Still not certain about allowing her to watch him detox, he nonetheless simply rested in his dilan's embrace, breathing deep of the ozone-laced air.

After few minutes, he felt the heaviness lift, the scent of Shepard's shampoo sweetening the stale air. Content to let the silence stand as long as she did, his thoughts drifted. His first ordeal through detox came at the hands of the hierarchy when he was fifteen. They admitted him to a hospital, kept the symptoms to a minimum. The last time he put himself through the hell of withdrawal, he'd just locked himself in a small, rented yacht in the middle of uncharted space. That way, even if he wanted to drink, it would take him a couple of days to get within arm's reach of alcohol.

It hadn't been the wisest move. He knew he could have died. The more often you went through withdrawal, the more dangerous it became. Of course, at that point, he'd thought himself without anything to live for. Then, on the fifth or sixth day, he'd been sprawled across the bed, sweating into the sheets balled up in his clenched fists and watching a news feed: something about a massive pirate attack on a human colony. Out of the crowd stepped this child-sized female wearing Alliance armour. The reporter called her the hero of the day, claiming that she'd organized the colonists and held off the pirates.

Shepard regained his attention when she caressed the tip of her nose along the bottom edge of his mandible. "If you're not ready to quit, that's fine. You'll be ready when you're ready." She snuggled in a little tighter. "But I think you're in a great place to kick that monkey off your back."

He glanced over his shoulder. "I don't see any monkeys on my back." Chuckling, he turned back into her arms when she elbowed him. "Yeah, I've known it's time for a while. I just couldn't afford to be out of commission for long enough."

"Then maybe now is the best time, cikabeknai." She pulled away just far enough to meet his stare. "When we get aboard, we'll talk to Karin, see what she can do to mitigate the symptoms, get Gardner to make a big pot of that soup you like, and then hunker down to weather out the storm."

"Wrex's emergency?" he asked, gazing down at her, his heart beating slow but so hard that he could feel his pulse in his head and all the way down his talons.
"If you're not up to carrying a gun by the time we arrive, we've got gun hands galore right now."
She wriggled loose to kneel on the bench beside him and wrapped her arms around his neck. "We'll take as long as we need. No pressure whatsoever." She kissed the end of his nose, lips soft and damp. "If you decide not to push it now, I'm right here with you, and I will still be right here when you decide it's time."

Nihlus dragged her into his arms so that she sat sideways across his lap. Spirits, she always seemed so much larger than life. Her energy took up enough space for any four other people. Only when he held her did he recall how tiny she was. "Thank you, haksaya cubenar. I'd be honoured to have you hold my fringe back while I vomit."

Shepard cackled, as bright as she'd been serious the moment before. "If those things start moving, I'll be running for the door, screaming at the top of my lungs." Eyebrows raised, eyes sparkling, she shook her head. "I signed on for everything except for the fringe is alive." The teasing deepened. "Unless of course, it's to the sound of music."

"What is the root of your obsession with that movie?" Nihlus pulled her in, pressing his mouth to her brow, nuzzling her softly. "Is it because your family watched it every year at Christ Mass?"
Shepard shrugged, but snuggled into the curves of his armour, fitting as if she belonged there. "Yeah, probably. It's a reminder of a safe, content time. It's also a lovely story about two people who should have never fallen in love but are able to see past all the surface layers between them."

He chuffed and shook his head. "Under all that snark, you're just a big, squishy romantic with a heart of pure fluff."

She smacked his arm. "Shush, you. That's a secret."

Letting out a long, contented breath, he rested his chin on the top of her head. "Don't worry, it's completely safe with me."

---

Dr. Chakwas awaited them outside Shepard's quarters, her medical bag in her hand. She greeted them both with a smile and that familiar, comforting air of professional competence. Nihlus couldn't be sure if he'd ever truly trust another doctor after being treated by Chakwas for two and a half years.

"Hey, Doc, thanks for meeting us up here," Shepard said as she exited the elevator. She squeezed the older woman's arm and nodded toward the door. "Come on in."

Nihlus followed the two women, a very large part of him trying to drag the rest of him back to the elevator. But, Shepard had agreed to that life … the one that hopefully included kids and a lifetime of love, bidding farewell at the age of one hundred and seventy. He very much wanted to experience it without the brandy fog.

Once they all made it down to the couches, Shepard gestured for Chakwas to take a seat, then slipped her hand into his, leading him around the table to sit across from the doctor. After a couple of strangely awkward seconds—after all, Chakwas had sobered him up more than once when he'd been too drunk to go on missions—Shepard squeezed his hand and bumped him with her shoulder, reassuring him that she had his six.

Nodding, Nihlus cleared his throat, then rubbed his free hand along the outside of his thigh. "It's time to stop drinking," he said, the words aimed at the floor as they rushed out of him.

Chakwas leaned forward, patting his shoulder in a very motherly but abrupt fashion. "I'm glad to hear it." She tipped her head a little, her expression one of being very pleased with her cleverness.
"I also anticipated that it might be the reason you called me up here rather than visiting medbay." She opened her bag and began pulling items out, laying them on the coffee table.

Deft hands latched a slender, metal bracelet around his wrist before he could even yank his hand away, startled by her abruptness. "This will monitor all the pertinent details and feed them to my omnitool. That way I can leave your treatment with you and Shepard, and still keep an eye on you."

A datepad and five small cases of meds lined up across the table, all with instructions. Shepard asked a ton of questions, pouring over the datapad as if she were studying for an engineering exam. For a moment, it took every gram of control he possessed to simply squeeze her hand rather than pulling her into her arms and kissing her until neither of them could breathe.

When she looked up and met the intensity of his stare, she just rubbed her lips together and popped her shoulders in a tiny shrug. "What? It's important." She released his hand and slipped her arm around his waist. "I'm not taking the slightest chance. You're too important."

Shepard went through the entire regimen with Chakwas three times to be sure she had it all down, then the doc gave him his first injections.

"Don't hesitate to call me, even though I'll be monitoring." The three of them stood, Chakwas gripping his forearm for a second. "The meds should help alleviate the worst of the symptoms, but this is your … third detox?"

Nihlus swallowed hard, a soft rumble rolling up his throat. Between these two impossible women, they'd leave him no secrets, no places to hide. "Fifth," he said, the word hanging onto his tongue.

Chakwas blew a hard breath out through her nose and clucked her tongue. "The treatment will remain the same, but the risk of seizures is quite high." The steel-riveted stare turned to Shepard. "Don't let him talk you out of any of the meds."

"Not going to happen, Doc. Don't worry. I'm way more stubborn than he is." Shepard walked Chakwas to the door. "Thanks for all the help, Karin."

Nihlus tuned out their conversation, focusing on the schedule glowing up at him from the datapad. The next week looked to mirror his first detox far more closely than he expected. He knew Shepard would never just let him curl into a ball and wait for it to be over. Hopefully, he could keep himself from snapping at her. Problematic didn't really begin to describe his temper when the pain and the need got bad.

"Hey." Shepard's hands slipped around him from behind to cross just below his keel. "What say we get you out of that armour and through a shower?"

He chuckled and twisted a little to look at her over his shoulder. "Are you offering your back scrubbing services?"

She pressed herself against him, the pressure, a warm caress in the darkness before dawn even with their armour in the way. "Well, you said you wanted to wait until our bonding ceremony for the whole deal, but there was no mention of showering together." Backing up a little, she loosened her hold on him. "Your robe is up here, right? In the closet?"

"It is." He nodded and turned, hands lifting to cradle her head, mandibles fluttering in a soft smile. "It feels like we're pushing it, Jane."

She smiled but thin and pressed. "Yeah, but it's always going to feel like we're pushing too hard."

She chuckled and twisted a little to look at her over his shoulder. "Are you offering your back scrubbing services?"

She pressed herself against him, the pressure, a warm caress in the darkness before dawn even with their armour in the way. "Well, you said you wanted to wait until our bonding ceremony for the whole deal, but there was no mention of showering together." Backing up a little, she loosened her hold on him. "Your robe is up here, right? In the closet?"

"It is." He nodded and turned, hands lifting to cradle her head, mandibles fluttering in a soft smile. "It feels like we're pushing it, Jane."

She smiled but thin and pressed. "Yeah, but it's always going to feel like we're pushing too hard."
With Garrus, it was easy. There was nothing on the other side of the equation. "Those nimble fingers reached up to start popping seals. "Besides, we've been together in the shower before." A brighter, more genuine, smile looked up at him. "This time we'll both be naked, not just me."

He lifted his hands to help remove his armour, letting out a faint sigh when she just grabbed them, pulled off his gloves, and set his arms back at his side. "You're going to be impossible for the next week, aren't you?"

She shrugged and continued with her work, dropping the pieces of his armour onto the chair Chakwas had vacated. "If by impossible, you mean am I going to take care of you? Absolutely." Her hands stilled, pressed against his chest guard. "Get used to it, Spectre. In a few weeks or months ..." She cleared her throat, a teasing rumble. "... if you ever get around to asking, you're going to be stuck with me for the rest of your life." Looking up at last, she stared into his eyes, her gaze so filled with his dreams that it dragged a soft keen into that sacred-feeling space between them. "Might as well get a head start on learning to live with it."

She slapped his yoke. "Lift this off, will you? I'm not tall enough." Her smile set his heart racing and pulled his hands up to cup her face between them again. Spirits, he'd missed her face, the roguish freckles and the way her eyes gleamed when she smiled.

Instead of doing as she'd said, he bent to kiss her, his tongue caressing her lips until, with a soft breath, they parted. The sweet, mineral taste of her mouth poured through him, sweeping along his nerves and through his blood vessels in washes of midsummer afternoons and deep winter sunsets. Slowly, letting the fire sparked by the softness of her lips settle deep in his belly, Nihlus drew back just far enough to speak.

"Have patience with me, haksaya kubenar?" Try as he might, he knew he could never imbue the words with the true lengths to which her patience would be tried.

"I've been through it, love. I know you're going to be a complete asshole now and again." She leaned in to kiss him. "I might need the odd break, but I'll still love you at the other end."

Not that he was a connoisseur of washroom floors, but the one in Shepard's cabin—so blessedly cool beneath his cheek—definitely hit the top three. She'd made him a nest of pillows and blankets on the unforgiving metal, but he couldn't stand a pillow beneath his head. It heated up and soaked with his sweat, becoming unbearable in minutes. At least the floor stayed fairly cool, and he could wipe away the puddles of perspiration and drool when they collected.

"Okay, enough bathroom floor time," Shepard said, her voice blessedly soft as she walked through the door, an armload of clean towels in her hands. "Up you come. Let's get your meds into you, then we'll run you through the shower."

Nihlus opened one eye, watching her step around and over him to put the towels away. Too exhausted even to speak, he just let the eyelid settle closed again. As good as a cool shower would feel, if it meant standing, it could wait. And then Shepard started pulling the pillows out from under him. Protesting in the form of a low growl, he spread himself out to hold them down.

"Come on, love. Up and at 'em. I need to throw all of this stuff through the laundry. It reeks of BO, puke, and something that smells like old vinegar. Seriously, as good as you smell when you're not puddled on the bathroom floor swaddled in sweat and puke, this is just ... terrifyingly foul." She tugged at one corner of the blanket he held clutched against his keel and wriggled one eyebrow, a suggestive little tick. "If you get up and wash the funk off, I promise to make it worth your while."
The slanted, wheedling tone pulled a reluctant chuckle loose to roll across the floor. "You're impossible," he said, more a long, articulate groan than words. "I can't move. I've been in this position too long." Playing it up, he hoisted one hand a couple of centimetres, then let it flop back onto his nest. "Too ... weak ... ." Adding a wheezing gasp, he pawed at her knee as if trying to push her away. "Just leave me here to moulder in my own filth."

Shepard chuckled and knelt next to his head, gentle fingers welcome and soothing along his neck. "My poor, brave little Spectre." Her grin tipped toward evil. "So pathetic that even a shower is beyond him." She leaned down to kiss just below his aural canal. "It's a shame. I got the oil ready. It's warm, and I've been steeping a mixture of rylamia, torpen cortis, spearmint, and eucalyptus in it for an entire day. I even made a pot of sweet rylamia tea, and it's steaming hot. There may or may not be some dextro ice cream awaiting you as well."

"Dear spirits, stop." He heaved himself up onto an elbow, giving her his best, put upon scowl through the drum chorus inside his head. "You're an evil woman." The room turned slow, uneven circles, but he held out a hand. "Help me up, foul temptress."

His claims to weakness proved far too accurate as Shepard pulled and he pushed, practically climbing the toilet to hoist himself up onto shaking legs. He folded down onto the seat rather than fall flat on his face. Even after he hit the seat, he continued to fold down until his head impacted his hands and his elbows lodged in his thighs.

"You haven't been eating enough." Shepard scooped up his nest and tossed it out the door. "I'll give you a shot of the anti-nausea stuff after we finish with your shower so you can eat some soup and keep it down."

Turning his head just far enough to watch his dilan, Nihlus let loose the long, low rumble of love and devotion trying to force its way out. She hit the water control, turning it to steaming hot. Normally, he preferred it cooler, but his muscles told the old preferences to shut up and die in the depths of the pits. Right then, all that sounded better than hot water pounding the pain into submission was the waiting oil massage. His hide felt stretched and cracked, a mudflat in the deepest heat of summer, flaking beneath the sun.

Shepard picked up the soft brush and pumice cleanser—a modern turian substitute for the thick, gritty mud their ancestors used to scrub away the sweat and other undesirables—and set to work with him still sitting on the toilet. Nihlus simply closed his eyes and leaned into the firm, circling motion.

"Remember bath nights?" he asked, pitching his tone to leave the comfortable hush intact.

Shepard chuckled as she leaned behind him to wash his cowl and lower back. "Playing 'The First Turian Deep Sea Explorer' with Aurin Plavidus." Her lips brushed his brow.

"Mari thought I was mad." He changed his pitch to scolding and impatient. "Turians don't swim let alone dive beneath the waves, Nihlus Kryik. You just get that right out of your stupid, little head."

Crouching in front of him, Shepard rested her hands on his knees, stilling their shaking. "Aurin Plavidus was a hero among turian-kind. So brave." She grinned and rubbed the side of his knee, the touch firm and loving. "You up to standing? I've got you as clean as I can manage in this position."

Nihlus gripped her shoulders, keeping her from standing. "You've changed my entire life, Jane." Collapsing forward in slow motion, every lengthening and flexing of muscle in the movement registering … almost profound—did he owe the heightened sensation to the withdrawal?—he rested his brow against hers. Her skin felt so warm, so vital and real and beautiful against his brow plate. "The last time I put myself through this, I was at the end, but you saved me. Even before we shared our memories, you saved me. I guess I should have led with all this when we met, but I wasn't at my best."

Her arms draped over his cowl, one hand hooking the back of his neck as she relaxed into the position. "What do you mean?"

Her question set guilt rolling through his already unsettled gut, spurring a heavy rumble of sound. He'd allowed her to think they'd shared everything in the link, and they had … at least until he figured out that he could control the thing, show it only what he wanted.

He cleared his throat and rested his brow on her shoulder. "Saren disappeared without a word of explanation a half year before, and I fought through the nightmare of that damned slaver ring and then Samara hunted me across an entire planet. I didn't see much point to Nihlus Kryik. So I rented a ship, flew out into the middle of nowhere and waited for the detox to either kill me or not." He wrapped his arms around her, gritty lather and all. "Then I saw a report from Elysium, saw you accompanying Martin to his medical evac transport. Something in your eyes and the way you held yourself sunk its talons into my guts and dragged me off of my soaking wet sheets. You sparked the fuse that started my heart beating and blood flowing."

She pulled herself in closer, nuzzling in under his jaw. "Why didn't I see this stuff in the link on Thessia, Nihlus?"

He drew back, but she held onto him, not letting him pull away further than the length of her arm. "I had control by then, began to play around with how much I could omit or change, and I'm not proud of that year of my life." Staring into her eyes, he searched for any sign of anger, but found nothing that heated or volatile. Seeing no pending explosions, he relaxed back into her touch.

She looked down, focusing on his chin, her face flushing pink. "Yeah, well, I may have held back a few moments myself." Waggling her head, she straightened and held out her hand. "Come on, I'll tell you while I finish."

Groaning, all of his muscles threatening to dump him on the ground in a puddle of half-formed turian spongecake left too long in amarceru, he stood, leaning heavily on her impossibly strong shoulders. The five steps to the shower unit took ten and he ended up hanging from the corner unit, the water streaming down his front as she scrubbed, then rinsed. As welcome and soothing as her touch was, he'd spent too much time lying on the floor, the hard surface and inaction adding. Halfway through the drying process, he needed to sit, so staggered back to the toilet.

"How many days in are we?" he asked, the words coming out as gasps, his lungs stubbornly refusing to pull in more than a trickle of air.

"Three." The word hit like mortar shells.

"Three?" he repeated, soft and defeated. "I thought we were near the end, and we've barely begun."

"You're doing great, Nihlus. It doesn't feel like it, but you are." She finished drying him, her hands deliciously rough as they rubbed his hide back to life. "I'm not convinced you're going to be able to handle the stairs," she said, glancing between Nihlus and the stairs as if she could judge his ability to make it there by sight alone. "What do you think?"

He opened his mouth to tell her that he thought he could manage three stairs, but she cut him off. "No, not going to chance it. I'll call Garrus up to help." Again, he tried to speak, but she hurried out without listening. Annoyance flared, an acid spark that burned down the back of his throat. Weak or not, headache banging at the inside of his skull like a krogan thrash drummer or not, he could form thought and make decisions for himself.

Shepard hurried back in a second later, holding his robe out like a noose ready to slip over his head.

"Tarc, Jane, stop!" The words cut with far more edge than he intended, but they stopped her from wrestling him into the robe like someone trying to win a cage match. He gripped her hands, stilling them. "I can put the robe on myself. I'm not that pathetic." He eased her fingers off the material and shrugged his way into it.

She stepped back and shrugged. "Sorry, cikabeknai. I know you're not pathetic. It's just ... " She shrugged. "... I like taking care of you." Shrugging, she held her hands out in a supplicating gesture and shuffled half a step toward him. "Okay, what do you want to do about the stairs?"

The quick flare of anger fading, he shoved himself up onto trembling legs. "No, I'm sorry, Jane." He held his arm out. "I can make it with your help." When she tucked herself in against his side, he leaned down to nuzzle the silky strands her hair. "Thank you."

Shepard gave him a smile and a wink, then focused on the long road down to the bed.

Five minutes later, he collapsed onto the mattress, shaking so hard that his teeth chattered. He held onto Shepard, pulling her in between his thighs and wrapping his arms around her, using her solid warmth to anchor himself. "Tell me about one of those moments you hid from me," he whispered, pressing his cheek against hers.

She turned her head to press soft kisses along his mandible. "Okay, but you need to get out of this robe and lie on your front while I get your meds ready. You're a little behind schedule, and you're acting shocky enough to make me worry." Kissing him again, she extricated herself from his grip, leaving his front cold. "Let me take care of you, please, cikabeknai?"

Recognizing the truth in her words, Nihlus nodded and opened the fasteners down the front of his robe. When he managed to tug it out from beneath his rear end, he tossed it and eased himself over onto his front, his keel sinking into the half meter of memcell. After their trip to Thessia, she'd said she'd get a more comfortable mattress. He smiled and drew Shepard's pillow in under his head. When Shepard did something, she certainly didn't skimp. Closing his eyes, he savoured being cradled in the mattress's embrace.

Much better than the washroom floor.

"So," Shepard said, stepping up beside him, "something I hid from you, huh?" The syringe pressed against his throat, then the muscle just below his shoulder. She disappeared for a moment, then climbed up on the bed next to him.

The heady scent of the oil drifted through him, relaxing him down into the clean sheets even before her hands spread it over his cowl. His breathing easing into a slow, deep rhythm for the first time in days, Nihlus allowed her touch to pull all the stiffness and pain out through his hide. As she told the story, her voice set him adrift, floating in warm waters.

Shepard slid her hands up his spine from the hollows of his pelvis to his shoulders. "I was in a pretty low place when I first saw you as well. I'd been undercover for nearly six months, chosen for the job not because I was a great infiltrator, but because I'd already gained a reputation for being one crazy bitch." She paused, oil-slick hands sliding over his cowl, the infusion tingling as it soothed his cracked, raw hide.
"So, yeah, as a young lieutenant, I went undercover for six months as a member of a human pirate gang. They preyed on batarian colonies, mostly, hijacking ships, stealing women and children to sell at auctions as close to batarian space as they could get." She growled softly, deep in her throat: definitely been around turians too much. "Mostly, they just wanted to tug the tiger's tail as hard as they could. Their campaign worked, making life a living hell for the colonies along the batarian border."

She dug the pads of her thumbs in along the ridge of plates up the back of his neck, finding every tense muscle, every endorphin-releasing nerve cluster.

"Dear spirits, Jane," he moaned, his entire body puddling like that green jiggly stuff Shepard liked to eat. "Why didn't I know about this talent? Once word spread about the skill of those hands, you could live anywhere in luxury."

She chuckled. "Good to know, in case I decide to give up this whole fighting the Reapers gig." Her tone soothed the parts of him her fingers couldn't, her teasing a balm without equal. "I didn't possess this mighty skill until two days ago. I looked up a few sites, searching for things I could do to ease your way through. One site focused entirely on what places to stimulate to ease pain and others to help your body rebalance itself while detoxing." A gentle hand slapped his backside.

"That's going to stimulate things that have nothing to do with drying out," he muttered, grinning into the pillow.

"Behave and let me finish my story." Slippery fingers worked oil into his crest, only exacerbating the issue going on behind his lowest set of plates. When she spoke again, the change in tone and in her energy, pulled his head up out of the downy softness. Cold stone replaced all the gentle teasing and joy, a sudden and solid wall. "Alliance brass thought the assignment a perfect match to my rage level." She cleared her throat as if trying to break up that barrier. "Besides, I had an ironclad backstory and scars enough to make anyone a believer. So yeah, they sent me to seduce my way into the inner circle and then take them out. The longer I could stick it out, the deeper I could get."

Her hands stuttered then stopped, setting off his worry alarm as they rested on his head: those delicate fingers betraying her as they grew chill rather than warming against his crest. She cleared her throat again before continuing, "I didn't really see innocence in any batarians back then. Not after what happened to my family. The batarians deserved what was coming to them. Even the children would just grow into another generation of monsters. I was doing the galaxy—hell, even the batarians—a favour: showing them the evil of slavery."

She worked firm circles down his neck, her voice dropping to a rough whisper. "I fit into that gang like the proverbial round peg. Two weeks in, they made me a lieutenant under one of the second tier bosses, pulling me into the insanely extravagant lifestyle of the organization's higher-ups. I spent most of the time hanging off my boss's arm at fancy dinners and cocktail parties, chatting up people with more money than I could imagine but who carried around a very familiar hatred."

A sigh like paint dripping down a wall slipped between them, and he felt the mattress shift as she sat back. "I drank the Kool Aid."

His translator spitting out nonsense, Nihlus frowned, using her tone to parse the meaning. Well, her tone and the heavy stink of shame permeating the air. For a moment, he almost opened a door, both to give Shepard an out and to let fresh air in … air that didn't reek of guilt and regret. The hand holding his heart twisted, pulling loose a low keen. He hadn't meant to drag her down with him.

"No one had to force me," she continued. "I reveled in it. People looked up to me, lavished me with gifts, and they practically threw Hallex at me. Hell, they didn't even try to seduce me. Not that I didn't get offers to warm people's beds, just … if I said no, they understood why and gave me space. Most of them had been where I was."

Nihlus twisted to look at his dilan, but didn't dare shatter the almost sacred-feeling bubble that she'd woven around them. Dear spirits, he'd read her record, studied it in depth, admired the fact that as such a young soldier she'd been chosen for such a difficult mission. The Alliance had awarded her four commendations and a medal for that mission. When Nihlus met her, he thought he knew everything about her. He'd been such a complete fool.

She lifted a hand, gentle fingertips caressing the length of his mandible, her thumb tracing his upper mouth plate. "My team raided our first colony the third week. I didn't allow my people to hurt anyone. I gave them tranq guns and took pride in my cargo being brought in with no more than scratches." A slow, sad moan tumbled down a slope of pure, crystalline guilt. Shepard swallowed hard and nodded for him to lie back. She dove back to work, moving down to his legs.

"I became the gang's top money maker. Undamaged merchandise brought the best prices. I told myself that I kept away from the cages and avoided the control-chipping process because I couldn't afford to blow my cover." Another sigh dripped guilt, the flow severed by a bitter laugh.
"The excuses and justifications worked for a while, long enough to put me in a room full of the leaders. I did my job so well, they met to promote me four months in."

Nihlus spun around to look into her eyes. "Four months? But you said you were undercover for six."

"Yeah. I did." She looked away. Working his muscles as if she needed to transmute all her pain into something beautiful, Shepard lavished him with care, the oil sweet, her hands pure bliss.
Nihlus's chest rumbled with constant subvocals of support, contentment and love, encouraging her without words … weaving a safe place to continue her story. She'd carried that ugly secret alone for far too long.

"I told myself I needed more intel. I never quite convinced myself, and the muck layer that I'd allowed contaminate my being built up until it exploded. I turned all that shame and anger and hatred—for both myself and the slavers and the batarians … hell, even the Alliance—loose during a planning meeting and painted the walls with gore." He heard her swallow, the sound more a soft moan than anything, and her trembling translated through her touch.

"Sweet baby Jesus, your hide is soaking this stuff up faster than I can apply it," she said, her cheer forced. She patted his backside. "Okay, old guy, roll over."

Nihlus levered himself up into a half pushup sort of position, the oil massage returning some order to his chaotic body functions, and his love's pain anchoring him in something outside his misery.
Twisting, he flipped onto his hip and then rolled to lie on his back. Shepard slipped her hand down the inside of his forearm to grip his elbow, helping him sit up while she sorted pillows behind his back.

Instead of letting her return to her work, Nihlus picked up the oil and set it on the bedside table.
Holding out his arms, he said, "Come here." Hesitation slithered behind her gaze. He could see the shame whispering its lies and shook his head. "Come on," he coaxed, waving her into his embrace.
"You've seen all of my ugly places, and it hasn't changed anything, has it?"

She let out a long sigh, steam escaping a pressure valve, and nodded, stretching out along his side.
"I love you more every day, old guy." Nodding, she smiled and relaxed into him. "Okay. Well, I took out the entire lot … thought I had the drop on them, but I'd missed one. She'd stepped out to use the washroom." A long shudder rippled down her body, and she curled in closer, her arm draping over him.

Nihlus nuzzled her temple, the comforting subvocal deepening. Spirits, how could she believe he'd love her less? Everything he learned about her just left him more in awe of her courage and strength. How many people—even turians—could have survived an eighth of what she had? He tightened his grip on her, his thumb talon drawing a long, slow line down her arm.

Shepard rested her head against his. "I was calling in 'mission accomplished, come clean up this mess', when Enara came back in. A biotic, she grabbed me in a stasis field, putting me down before I knew what hit me." Another heavy swallow. "She stuffed me in one of the underground boxes they used for slaves who gave them trouble, and left me there while she ran."

Another shudder racked her too-skinny frame. Rolling toward her, Nihlus wrapped both arms around her, holding her tight.

"Luckily, I'd already called in the clean up crew," she said, her voice soft, the words spoken into his chest. "I was only down there in the dark for three days before they found me. Three days with nothing but my demons and self-loathing for company. I saw it then: how far I'd fallen into being everything I hated … how easily I could have trapped myself in a lifetime of that hatred and vengeance."

She lifted her chin to kiss his mandible, leaning into him, her eyes closed. "When the Alliance found me, my kidneys were shutting down, and I was okay with that. It meant I'd join my family on the other side." She reached behind her back for his hand, drawing it around the front, then weaving her cold, bloodless fingers with his talons. "I spent the next week in the hospital, then asked for mental health leave. They tried to get me to talk to counselors, but I couldn't put what I felt into words. Hell, I couldn't even admit to myself what I felt."

"And where did I come in?" he asked. Mandibles flicking in a smile when she scoffed, he shrugged. "Hey, this is all supposed to be about me, isn't it?" He coaxed her hand to his mouth, warming it with his breath as he nuzzled her knuckles.

Her chuckle eased some of the tightness in his chest. "Of course, forgive me for forgetting." Despite the snark in her tone, he felt her relax. "I was lying in a seedy hotel room in the wards staring at the TV without seeing it when I saw you on the news." She leaned up on her elbow and slid her hand up his keel to cup his cheek. "As you carried that small child out of the fire, I saw something in your eyes that told me you knew. You knew exactly how I felt, and I wasn't alone." Leaning in, she kissed him. "After that, I started working my way out of the black hole I'd fallen into."

He returned her kiss, glad that he'd brushed his teeth and rinsed his mouth after the last time he threw up. She tasted like spring, all new life and beginnings, confirming everything he'd known for nearly a decade: those lips … the body pressed to his … that strong, gorgeous heart beating against his side … they were his home.

"Sometimes," he whispered, careful to coax rather than shatter the peace between them, "we take missions that feed the darkest part of us, and for a while we become everything we normally stand against." Mouths a centimetre apart, brows touching, they shared breath, the sacred envelope around them strengthened. "They teach us, sometimes in the most brutal ways possible, what we won't allow ourselves to become."

"I love you, Nihlus Kryik," she said. She pulled away until their gazes met. "I guess the blessed Enkindlers knew we needed one another long before we did," she said. "Because I went back to work, and after the next mission, I took my leave on Elysium." Her hand squeezed his then released him, reaching over his chest for the oil. "And here we are."

Nihlus caressed her cheek, the fog of pain and need burning away in the light of her gaze. "Praise be the mighty glow of their asses."

(A-N: And we discover why Sassy is afraid of tight spaces. Thank you for sticking with me and these crazy kids. Next stop, Tuchanka to investigating the missing krogan. Hugs to you all.)
"Urdnot Wrex is on the comms demanding to talk to you and General Vakarian," the AI said, an unusual depth of gravitas colouring her tone. "When I told him you were sleeping, he threatened to throw a thresher maw named Kalros at the Ypres. I was not aware the krogan named thresher maws. I am now curious as to whether this one is kept as a companion animal."

Torin: Turian male over the age of 15

Buratrum: The turian version of hell

Tarc: Turian expletive the equivalent of shit.

69 Days ASR 0436 hours (Approaching orbit of Tuchanka)

"Captain Shepard?"

EDI's voice in Shepard's ear grabbed the captain by the heels and yanked her out of a perfectly lovely dream about wandering in the warm, Illium surf, her fingers laced with Nihlus's on the ocean side and Garrus's on the landward side. Without opening her eyes, she let out a rough sigh, her words sliding along the downward slope of a yawn. "What is it, EDI?"

"Urdnot Wrex is on the comms demanding to talk to you and General Vakarian," the AI said, an unusual depth of gravitas colouring her tone. "When I told him you were sleeping, he threatened to throw a thresher maw named Kalros at the Ypres. I was not aware the krogan named thresher maws. I am now curious as to whether this one is kept as a companion animal."

Gentle fingers lifted Nihlus's arm just far enough for Shepard to slip out from under it. His snore lifted from deep sleep to a lighter level, but he didn't wake. Thank the freakin' father of light. Her beautiful torin hadn't gotten more than a few minutes at a time in days. She got up and tiptoed to the closet. She'd dress in the washroom.

Once the door closed behind her, she activated her comms. "Tell Wrex that Garrus and I will be right there. Did you wake the general?"

"No, Captain. I alerted you first." Must be nice to have no need for sleep.

Shepard yawned and plunked down on the toilet. "Right. Okay, wake General Vakarian and have him meet me in the briefing room as soon as he can get there."

Shepard heard Wrex before she even made it all the way through the lab Mordin had claimed as his territory. Garrus must have gotten there first and tried to intercept the incoming shit storm. Unsuccessfully, by the sheer volume and fury vibrating through the walls. Sweet baby Jesus, Wrex would wake the crew two decks down.

She palmed the door control and stepped through to see Garrus leaning against the conference table, his palms flat against the surface, arms braced. Walking up behind him, she pressed her palm against the oh-so-warm hollow just below his cowl.

"Where's Shepard, Vakarian? Didn't that damned machine tell her it was important?" Shrill and tight—for Wrex anyway—the krogan's voice pounded at Shepard's head with more force than his fists. Blessed fucking Enkindlers, what happened down there? "Get her! Now!"

"Jesus, Wrex, I'm right here, and for the sake of the insomniac Enkindlers, stop screaming. It's the middle of gamma shift up here." Leaving her hand on the small of Garrus's back, she turned into the table, her hip against the edge. "Tell me what's going on without the shouting."

"You were taking too long to get here." Agitated pacing came across through his breathing as clearly as his anger registered through his voice. "So I took a team in and raided the Weyrloc base." The agitation rose; the strain in Wrex's voice palpable, almost frantic. If she'd been talking to anyone else, she would have thought him on the verge of panic. "Bakara's nearly dead. I shouldn't have waited for you!" His agonized roar forced her hands up over her ears. "Are you even coming, or did you lie to me?"

"Damn it, Wrex! You were supposed to wait." She and Garrus said it in stereo, but only Shepard continued on. 'I thought we decided to maintain the peace on Tuchanka by sending in a neutral—"

"They were torturing and killing our females, and you weren't coming," the krogan bellowed, cutting her off. "And they'd taken my scouts, holding them prisoner to experiment on them." He chuffed, the sound loud enough that she winced. "You haven't seen the bodies, Shepard! It's worse than Korlus. Bakara …"

"Wrex, calm the fuck down. Of course we were coming, but even for you, I couldn't break the laws of physics to get us here any faster. We're in orbit." She raked her fingers through her sleep-tousled waves. Somehow, she needed to reach Wrex through the freak out and get him focused.

Stepping closer to her husband, Shepard took refuge from the daggers and bullets flying out of the speakers … and from the sudden fear scratching at the back of her skull. "Wrex, for Bakara's sake, you've got to pull yourself together. She needs you to stay calm and look after her. Screaming isn't going to fix anything." She activated EDI's interface and whispered, "Volume to fifty percent, please, EDI."

Wrex continued to shout, but at least the impact lessened. "When we reached the lab, we captured a salarian researcher. He was killing and torturing human and krogan prisoners, experimenting on them to cure the genophage for Weyrloc."

Shepard heard something crash off into the distance: kicked, no doubt. Her breath caught in her throat, and she looked up into Garrus's eyes, her mind racing. A salarian? What the hell would a salarian be doing on Tuchanka working with Weyrloc? The Blood Pack must have snatched him from somewhere, taken him prisoner and forced him to work on a cure. But how would Weyrloc or the Blood Pack get ahold of a cure? Saren maybe? Although, he certainly wouldn't have shared his cure willingly. He wanted to enslave the krogan. Maybe someone smuggled the cure out of his lab? Had someone other than Archangel been working on a cure?

She hit the mute control: best they didn't give Wrex any more ammunition. "We're not missing anyone or any data back at Archangel, are we?" she asked Garrus. Judging by the subvocal that squeezed out past her husband's clenched jaw, Garrus's thoughts ran along the same lines.

He pulled away, the bare pads of his talons skating along her jaw. "I'll run out to the lab and call Chakwas and then Archangel."
Shepard nodded, and opened the channel. "Wrex, has the salarian said anything? Has he given you any information about where he comes from? How he got there? Anything?" As she spoke, she leaned, palms braced against the table.

"No." Wrex rumbled but when he spoke, he'd wrestled his temper down to a dull roar. "No time. Beating answers out of him can wait. Weyrloc and the Blood Pack have us pinned down and outnumbered." He let out a roar that sounded like the bastard offspring of hysteria and frustrated rage.

As much as she wanted to tell him that she'd told him so, she really enjoyed her arms being attached to her shoulders. Shoving herself away from the conference table, she paced. "Do you have the females and the salarian with you? Are you in a secure enough location that you can hold out for a couple of hours?"

"Yeah, Grunt and I've got them. We're trapped inside the lab on the lowest sublevel at the back of the facility." Shepard heard gunfire in the background. "But we won't be for long if you don't get your asses down here."

"Understood." Shepard brought up a tactical long range scan, homing in on Wrex's comm signal. "EDI, give me the best resolution you can—I need to see where the enemy is—and send it to my omnitool. General Vakarian and Lt. Commander Alenko will need copies of these scans as well. Also, upload them to the shuttles and have the VI's prep both shuttles for launch. Maintain active scans for the duration of the operation."

"Of course, Shepard," the AI replied. "Displaying tactical scan." The holographic image appeared in the center of the table.

"Damn, that's a lot of bad guys." Shepard spun to face Garrus as he walked in, the torin shaking his head. Well, at least it wasn't anyone from Archangel. That might prevent Wrex going to war against them.

"Wrex," Garrus spoke up, leaning in to study the schematic of the base, "since Weyrloc knows you're there, send up a comm flare so that we can pinpoint our strafing attacks. We're going to have to use the cannons on the shuttles if we're going to get to you before you're overwhelmed." He glanced to Shepard and pointed to the outer parts of the base where the Weyrloc reinforcements mustered before moving in. She nodded, seeing the same thing he saw. If they moved quickly enough, they could take out a couple hundred krogan without getting out of the shuttles.

"This is a hospital, Vakarian," Wrex replied, still furious and loud, but at least he'd lost the rampage-level fury. "It's built to survive bombardment and blood rage."

"Are there weak points?" Garrus wrapped his arm around Shepard, pulling her in against his side. "You're down there, and you're krogan; you know better than anyone how to attack it. Send us your tactical assessment. We'll have two shuttles in position to attack within ninety minutes."

Shepard glanced over at the AI's glowing interface. "EDI, download every scrap of material you can dig out of the base computers. If they were working on a genophage cure, I want to know everything. Then, scorch the earth." Hearing Wrex's growl on the comms, Shepard shook her head. "We'll have the data to keep working on it, Wrex, but ethically and safely and so that Weyrloc doesn't leave the rest of the krogan sterile long enough to wipe you off the planet."

She patted Garrus's arm and nodded toward the door. "We're on our way. When you hear the shuttles incoming, get everyone under good, solid cover. I want to drop that hospital on their heads, and extract you without having to fight a thousand or so krogan and vorcha." Turning away from the display, she strode for the door. When she paused at the threshold to wait for Garrus, something occurred to her. "Wrex, there aren't going to be any Weyrloc females or pups in the line of fire, are there?"

"No," the krogan replied, "their female camp is on the other side of their territory."

Well, thank god for that much, at least. Wiping out a thousand Blood Pack members could be seen as performing a galactic service; females and children amounted to something else entirely.

"Send up that flare, Wrex," Garrus said, striding toward her. "We're on our way."

They remained silent until they reached the elevator. Shepard called it to take her up to her quarters before turning to face him. "Get the others up and ready, we'll launch as soon as the shuttles are prepped. I'll be down right behind you."

Garrus grabbed her hand, squeezing it before letting her go. "The mortal mind has yet to devise a plan that Wrex can't send straight to buratrum. I've heard him furious before, but never that … out of control."

She nodded. "He's freaking out, which has me ever so slightly freaked out." Fighting to see the bright side of everything going tits up, she said, "I don't know … if we get them out alive, he might have saved us a long, hot day choking on sand." She gave him a weak grin and punched the control for her cabin. Nihlus needed to get sorted before she took off to blow up krogan. "I'll be down in a sec."

69 Days ASR 0519 hours (Orbit of Tuchanka)

Shepard paused at her cabin door and looked back at Nihlus. Relieved to see that he'd lost the haze clouding his eyes, she grinned and reached up to caress his mandible. "Now, I want you to behave yourself for the doc. I don't want to come home and find out you've been giving her a hard time." She bit the inside of her lip to kill her grin. "Take your medicine, eat all your meals, and when she says it's bedtime … it's bedtime, buster."

A wry chuckle accompanied the arms that reached out to pull her into his embrace. "Thank you, haksaya kubenar, one can never be made to feel like a misbehaving child too often." His mouth plates were warm and rough against her temple. "Be careful. Wrex has been unpredictable at best the last few months. He doesn't seem to trust anyone."

Shepard kissed him and pulled away. "Yeah, I'll stay sharp, don't worry. We'll keep in touch." She palmed the door control, grinned and winked, and then stepped out, her focus clicking over from Nihlus to the mission.

Wrex jumping off the marker ahead of the race had both fucked things up royally and helped the team avoid a long ground battle. The plan had been for her to take a large team in and extract the females with as little bloodshed as possible. War between Weyrloc and Urdnot meant Wrex's fledgling coalition taking on the Blood Pack. With the gang having so many fingers in so many clans, Urdnot would be hard pressed to survive that war.

Yeah, she definitely didn't like it. Damn it, Wrex. Going into Weyrloc territory meant tweaking the nose of a very large, angry beast, and now she'd be wiping most of that beast out. Depending how Wrex played things afterward, that could make his attempts to unite the clans either a lot easier or impossible. If current history gave any indication, he'd be at war with the entire planet by the end of the day.
Even once they brought down the parts of the hospital a safe distance from Wrex's position, she still anticipated a healthy dose of vengeful Blood Pack krogan and vorcha wielding rocket launchers and flamethrowers. Not really something to get too gleeful over.

Although, come on, admit it, you know that you feel a very disturbing sort of glee when an overload or well-placed round made the pyros go boom.

Glee was a strange word. Guh-lee. Gleeeeee.

Anyway …. No matter how many of their members the shuttles killed, Shepard knew Weyrloc would make them fight for every centimetre of ground. Definitely an 'all boots on the ground' sort of op.

And that's not even the worst of it. You know that sort of freak out is unusual for Wrex. Something's really wrong down there.

She shoved those thoughts to the back burner. Worrying about Wrex could simmer until she had time and information to figure it all out. The elevator stopped, pulling her the rest of the way into the here and now.

Despite the early hour, the doors opened onto a bustling cargo bay. Both shuttles hovered just above the floor as their VIs ran preflight checks, and the teams geared up at their lockers. She stood just over the threshold for a moment, watching her people work. Martin and Jack traded friendly blows, fighting over a crate of heat sinks. Sparky, Thane, and Garrus looked to be discussing something very important as they stood shoulder to shoulder at the weapons bench, checking their rifles. Samara, Vincent, and Tali stood next to the second shuttle, talking.

Shepard shivered, the cargo bay air cold on her bare arms and legs. Damn, she needed to get into her underlayer. But first ….

"Good morning, brave adventurers!" she shouted, throwing her hands into the air. Everyone jumped, Sparky's assault rifle clattering as it hit the bench and then bounced off onto the floor. She grinned and wriggled her eyebrows at the chorus of cussing. "Why so grumpy? Smiles, everyone. Smiles! It's a gorgeous day for an adventure on sunny Tuchanka, home of 'even the plants will eat you alive'. Glory hallelujah and praise the mighty Enkindlers."

She waved them all over. "Now to business. Sparky, you and Tali are the pilot/gunner team for Shuttle Two. The general and I will take Shuttle One. Wrex will be sending intel on the base, but the hospital is a hard target. Expect to take ground fire. We'll attack in turns, one shuttle making a run while the other covers it, then vice versa. We have friendlies on the ground, so pinpoint accuracy is going to be important."

She paused, meeting each set of eyes before she spoke again. "Weyrloc has grabbed and tortured humans, Urdnot females and scouts, as well as a salarian. We believe they're trying to cure the genophage and use it as a weapon against the rest of the clans. As much as I support the krogan and finding a cure, eventually Weyrloc will set the Blood Pack on the rest of the galaxy." A firm nod emphasized her point.

"Let's make sure that doesn't happen. Comms open to team channel at all times." She took a deep breath and shrugged. "Once we've thinned the crowd, we'll land and go in as a single team. This isn't at all the mission we thought we were heading into, but let's make sure that at the end of the day, we all come home and the Weyrloc don't. Make sure you've got lots of water and energy bars … and indoctrination serum. Dismissed."
There it was. Damn. She sighed. Fine, Wrex being indoctrinated needed to remain a concern, but for right then, Blood Pack and their guns need to take priority.

Finishing with a sweeping bow, she jogged over to the bank of lockers in the impromptu armory, every muscle coiled and eager for action. Despite the possibility of impending disaster and Wrex's weirdness, it would feel good to get off the ship and stretch her legs. Gentle workouts with Nihlus amounted to her only breaks from the confines of her cabin over the past few days, and she longed to smell anything other than stale ozone, vomit, and sweat.

"Which locker is mine?" she called across the bay.

"The one that says 'Shepard'," Vincent hollered over his shoulder as he hopped up into the second shuttle.

She grinned. "That's way too damned easy to be intuitive." She opened the door that indeed boasted her ownership in large, block letters. "And the sign is way too big. How am I supposed to see that?"

Two days before, she'd ordered Vincent to move everything down to the cargo bay, and despite not knowing what was where, she knew the convenience would outweigh the short term chaos and confusion. Having to gear up on the CIC deck made no sense. If anyone forgot a piece of gear, the entire team had to wait ten minutes for them to take the elevator up and then back down. Once the Ypres returned to Omega, she'd have the Archangel engineers make the changes permanent.

"Shepard?" Kaidan asked, walking up behind her. "May I speak with you for a second?"

Lifting her underlayer off its hook, she turned to face the Lt. Commander. "Sure, Sparky, speak away." She stepped into the leg, balancing on one foot as she tugged the material on. When he didn't immediately speak up, she stopped and met his gaze, finding it serious and unsettled.

She rested her hand on the Marine's shoulder. "Come on, cough it up, we're in a hurry. What's going on?"

He spent the next several seconds looking as though he might change his mind and retreat back to the weapon bench, but then let out a noisy breath. "I'm nervous about what Cerberus did to you, Shepard." After another, grumbling breath, he shrugged. "How am I supposed to know who or what you are?" The pained look on his face burrowed into Shepard's chest and wrapped cold fingers around her heart.

"I know the doc said that you're the same woman we knew before." He shifted a little foot to foot, looking so miserable that she squeezed his shoulder, a silent encouragement to finish what he was saying. "But I don't trust Cerberus. How are we supposed to trust you knowing that those monsters took your body and did God knows what to it?"

Shepard shook her head, just a slight tremor back and forth, her shoulders lifting in a small, helpless roll. "You don't, Sparky. Well I mean, you do and you obey orders—so far everything seems business as usual inside the old brain pan—but you keep your wits about you and your mind active and you never trust Cerberus." She stepped forward, tightening her grip on his shoulder as she met his awkward stare with resolve. "I've been in this body for two months now as it healed. I remember. I love. I feel like me, but we've also had to fry a control chip that Cerberus implanted."

Kaidan nodded. "Surprisingly, that makes me feel better." He stepped back. "Thanks, Shepard. I know you're probably sick of going over this ground with everyone."

Shepard tossed him her back plate. "Here, you can make it up to me by helping me gear up."

"Shepard!" Three minutes later, her name echoed down the shuttle bay, the last syllable sharp enough to draw blood.

Glancing over her shoulder, Shepard smiled as she greeted the salarian scientist, "Dr. Solus, how may I be of service this fantastic morning of everyone screaming my name and giving me bad news? Lay it on me; how can you help my day head straight into 'sandpaper toilet tissue on chapped ass' land?"

The salarian's brow furrowed as he stared at her, no doubt trying to figure out whatever his translator had done with her words. He cleared his throat, curled fingers held to his mouth. "Apologies for late notice but wish to accompany you to Tuchanka."

Taken aback by the request, Shepard drew back, her eyebrows climbing toward her hairline. "Why? You've never requested to come along on a mission before." She watched him, not missing the discomfort twitching beneath his usual inability to remain still. She got the distinct feeling that Mordin's inquiry had a great deal to do with the captured salarian. Fuck-a-doodle-doo. If she got through the day without Wrex killing someone or having to kill Wrex, she'd be fucking amazed.

Glancing toward Kaidan, she said, "Thanks, Sparky. I can finish up."

Once Kaidan moved out of earshot, Shepard nodded Mordin in closer. "What's going on, Doc? Is your inner adventurer making himself known or is it something else?"

"Your habit of speaking without making sense … alarming." Mordin cleared his throat again and started pacing three strides then back. "Have not spoken of this. Certain of negative judgement considering general's attachment to Urdnot Wrex."

Holding up a finger, Shepard shushed him. "Sure, you can stick with me. I may need a scientific point of view. Just give me a minute to grab my weapons, and then meet me in shuttle one. We can discuss this where we're certain others won't be able to listen in." She pulled on her boot, snapping the closures. "I'll have the general join us, if that's all right?"

Mordin nodded, a quick jerk of his head, and hurried toward the shuttle. Shepard watched him go before reaching for her other boot. Taking note of the SMG and pistol on his hips, she shook her head and chose to believe he came prepared in case she agreed to let him join the team rather than because he assumed she would.

She finished suiting up, hung Ingrid and her still unnamed Mattock on her back, then strode over to the weapon bench. "Join me in shuttle one?" she asked Garrus, slipping her hand through the crook of his elbow. "If his agitation level is any indication, I get the feeling that Mordin is about to drop a bomb on us."

Garrus nodded, then looked to Thane. "Get everyone on shuttle two?"

The drell nodded, the gesture carrying enough weight to be a bow.

Shepard grinned as she led Garrus away. "You and Sere Krios seem to have bonded over the last few days." She looked up to meet his gaze, drinking him in. They'd spent a couple hours a day together, but still … she missed him like crazy.

"He's a sniper," Garrus said, the simple declaration saying everything that needed to be said. He let out a long breath that rolled with heavy subvocals. "Wrex's behaviour … are we thinking indoctrination?"

Shepard nodded. "Unfortunately." Seeing Jack and Martin heading for the shuttle, she cut them off. "Take the other shuttle down, guys. We'll meet you there." Stabbing the air with her index finger, she cut Martin off before he could start. "Just don't."

She sighed and glanced up at her husband. "If we have everyone on shuttle two …" Reaching up, she opened a channel to Alenko. "Sparky, slight change of plans. You'll provide cover for shuttle one. I don't want to risk the entire team on attack runs. Stay in stealth mode and keep our people safe."

"Roger that, ma'am. See you on the surface. Alenko, out."

Shepard jumped up into the shuttle, her hand hovering over the hatch control until Garrus cleared the threshold.

Once she locked them in, she thumped down into a seat next to Garrus, the both of them facing Mordin. "All right, Doc. What's up?" she asked as the shuttle lifted off, the VI in control. Nothing about the salarian's demeanour comforted her. Whatever secret he hid from them, it was a doozy.

"Worked with STG, as you know," he said, suddenly going still, as if having made the decision to tell them his secret, all the nervous guilt evaporated. "Headed up many important projects. Trusted to develop most advanced and delicate scientific breakthroughs."

His stillness combined with the yammering did nothing to ease the feeling a piano hung over Shepard's head, the weighty thing dangling from a fraying rope. Only terrible secrets required so much preamble. "For Pete's sake, Doc, spit it out."

"Krogan evolved, began to adapt to genophage. Birth rates rose. Council tasked STG to modify genophage, ensure krogan population stayed at one viable birth in one thousand. Was on team that performed the modification, helped release it, then returned to conduct testing each cycle." He paused, but not even long enough for Shepard to process the depth of what he said before continuing. "After modified genophage released, moved to Omega and opened clinic. Needed to help people ... avoid moral grey areas."

Shepard stared at Mordin, her mouth hanging open as she struggled to believe his words. How could he be so cavalier about genocide? "Okay, wait … the krogan were actually pulling out of the downward spiral destroying their race, so you retooled the genophage to make sure their babies kept dying?" She glanced at Garrus, her husband's mandibles so high and tight to his mouth that she felt the need to throw herself on the grenade before it blew. "What in the fucking flatulent asses of the Enkindlers, Mordin? The krogan are being ripped apart by despair and hopelessness—females wander out into the wastes to die when their pups are stillborn—and you made it worse?"

For a split second, her hand twitched toward her sidearm before she clamped her fingers down on her thigh. The shuttle twisted ever so slightly to the left before she took a deep breath and pushed aside her dizziness and shock. Her day just kept nose diving straight toward hell. "Sweet baby Jesus, I think I'm going to puke."

The salarian straightened in his seat. "Genophage does not kill. Simply corrects krogan population growth to pre-uplift levels. Krogan problems societal not medical." He shook his head and lifted a hand as if dismissing the topic as unimportant, or at the very least, a distraction from his point. For the space of three deep breaths, her hand twitched toward her sidearm again.
"Since deploying modified genophage, kept track of team members. When the general called Dr. Chakwas about missing genophage research or personnel, contacted STG. One former team member reported missing: Maelon, research assistant."

Arching an eyebrow at the salarian doctor, Shepard shook her head. "That's too much of a coincidence. Your research assistant goes missing at the same time as the Urdnot females?" Looking back to Garrus, she shrugged. "He's got to be Wrex's prisoner."

The general nodded but didn't take his eyes off Mordin. Shepard could see the war going on inside her husband, the general fighting tooth and talon to keep a tight rein on the torin's outrage.

Shepard reached over and laced her fingers through Garrus's before she gritted her teeth and said, "Okay, the 'making the genophage even worse' discussion is tabled for now, but we'll need to talk it over in depth. I know I speak for the general when I say that I'm both confused by and suspicious of your current work to find a cure." Shaking her head, she held up a hand to still any protest. "Later. For now, let's focus on extracting Wrex and all survivors."

Garrus let out a soft, growling sort of chuff. "I welcomed you … Archangel welcomed you into our home, outfitted you with state of the art equipment and a hospital … " He swallowed hard enough that Shepard heard the gulp. "... trusted your ethics and your word." He took a deep breath, his mandibles quivering a little before clamping back against his mouth. "We will be discussing this in much greater depth before Archangel finances another scanner."

Shepard squeezed his talons as the sound of the thrusters changed for deceleration, her stare locked on Mordin. "You'll stay with me and keep your eyes open for anything on the scientific end. I want to know what they're doing when we get in there."

Mordin nodded, the gesture abrupt.

"And you'll say nothing about modifying the genophage in front of the krogan." Shepard swallowed the guilt that chased those words out of her mouth, but with Wrex's trust issues, the truth could send the entire mission sideways at light speed. She patted Garrus's thigh. "Come on, General, we have a hospital to attack."

69 Days ASR 0832 hours (Weyrloc Clan Holding, Tuchanka)

The sky hung hot, dry, and sand-brown over Shepard's head, the sun sweltering through the haze to press down on her back, heavy and intractable. Crouching behind a cement barricade, she thanked every deity she could think of for that small patch of shade. She glanced up, gasping a little as the glare cranked up the pounding in her head from a six to a nine. Damn, Tuchanka's heat and grit definitely lived up to the hype.

"Definitely a downside to blowing the hospital's roof into its basement," she grumbled. "Note to self: Collapsing the building completely doesn't leave any shade, dumbass." As much as she despised wearing a helmet, the handkerchief over her nose and mouth did little to block the grit. If any more mud built up on the back of her tongue, she'd have to cry 'uncle' and dive into air conditioned claustrophobia.

She glanced down at the small screen hovering above her forearm to check the path ahead. Another hundred metres and platoon strength Blood Pack remained between them and the last staircase down into the lab. The surviving Weyrloc had taken refuge there, in a large, two story series of rooms when a lucky shot had taken out more than half the building. The shuttle's cannon hit a massive gas line that threaded through most of the hospital. One and done.
Even so, they fought a tough old battle getting that far, the gang's numbers consisting mostly of varren and vorcha overseen by a handful of krogan warriors and pack masters. She knew that wouldn't be the case once they got into that last chamber. The toughest and most valuable Weyrloc warriors and their chief awaited them there.

Sighing, she clenched her jaw against the pain in her head and the fear twitching through her veins and skittering along her every nerve. As much as she'd tried to pass off Wrex's emotional and mental state … She glanced at Garrus; her husband crouched behind cover at her side, his every movement jerky, his gaze refusing to settle. Damn it.

She leaned into the divider and dug into her belt pouch for a water bottle. The team's performance so far remained tight—coordinated, calm, and precise—but one look at them betrayed the truth: somewhere in the rubble, at least one of the black orbs lay buried but undamaged.

"They've looped around behind us," Garrus whispered, his voice a thin hiss completely lacking in subvocals. Shepard tried to meet his eyes, but couldn't catch his gaze. Restive, he remained completely focused behind them, his gaze flitting from shadow to shadow. "I know it. I can feel eyes on us."

She reached out, laying her hand on her husband's shoulder, frowning when he jumped. Despite the hand she'd felt crawling between her skull and her brain since the moment they'd landed, she asked, "You okay? You've been getting jumpier as we go along." Denial: the most powerful force in the entire galaxy.

And the most deadly. You know what's going on here. Don't be a dumbass. They all need to start taking their shots.

Garrus nodded, but his eyes looked wild even when his stare latched onto her. "Yeah, I'm fine." He chuffed and shook his head. "All right, that's a lie, that damn whining buzz is making me crazy. My head's at a fifteen on the Shepard scale."

"What buzzing, Callor?" She activated a private channel to the Ypres, then held a finger up to halt Garrus's reply. "EDI, run a diagnostic on General Vakarian's comms, please. Check for anomalous sounds."

To Garrus, Shepard said, "You have a headache?"

"Yeah, it's really pounding." He peeled off his visor and pressed the heel of his hand to his temple. "And it's starting to mess with my vision. Everything's unfocused and too bright." He muttered and covered his eyes. "It doesn't help that it's so hot out here."

Shepard nodded to the concrete k-rail behind him. "Sit down, put your back to the divider." Looking up, she waved Martin over. Someone needed to keep an eye on the krogan. "Are you feeling okay, kid?"

"Yeah, I'm hot, but all systems are five by five." He crouched next to her. "Why?" He winced and before she could answer, said, "You look like crap, General."

Shepard reached up and grabbed the collar of the kid's armour, action helping keep fear buried. Garrus would be fine as long as they kept moving. "Yeah, somethings going on. Check on the others, and then keep an eye out. We need to stop for a minute." She released him, but when he moved to get up, she snagged his arm. "You can see the dark energy those orbs give off, right?" When he nodded, she patted his back. "Excellent. You see anything at all, let me know."
"Shit. Those damned things?" He gulped then nodded. "I'm on it, boss."

After a half dozen swallows of tepid water, Shepard offered the bottle to Garrus. "Drink the rest." Diving it back into her belt pouch, she pulled out a cold pack and cracked it before shoving it down his collar to press against his throat just above his keel.

He uncovered his eyes and chuckled. "Where did you learn that trick? You been doing research?"

"I've been taking care of someone with a huge fever and the sweats for half a week." She lifted his hand back to his eyes. "Keep those covered. When we move out, put your helmet on, crank up the cool, and keep the visor as dark as you can." Taking the cloth away, she wrung it out and soaked it again.

"I'm starting to feel a little better," he said, resting his head back. "Just wish this damned noise would stop."

Shepard activated the team channel. "Anyone else hearing a high-pitched whine or buzz?" Her heart stopped dead in her chest when Thane and Samara replied to the affirmative. Garrus having issues was one thing, everyone else …. Well ... fuck-a-doodle-doo seemed to apply. "Mordin?"

And the time for denial flies.

"Jack, Vincent, Sparky … you hearing voices?"

"They're in my head! Get the fuck out of my head. Don't touch me!" A blur of motion sent Shepard's heart splashing into an icy pool of rimy guts as Martin flew backwards, a shockwave tearing across the space.

Jack!

Garrus gave Shepard a push. "Go get her before she gets too far. I'll be fine."

Shepard leapt up and sprinted through the rubble. "Everyone take a shot of your indoctrination serum. If the voices or buzzing doesn't stop, take another."

Martin raced past her. "In my armour, I'm faster than any of you. I'll get her and give her the shots." He threw a wave over his shoulder. "Don't worry, I'll catch her."

The channel to the Ypres pinged. Despite Martin chasing a frantic Jack across Tuchanka, Shepard's heart jumped, hope springing up to greet the chance of a reasonable explanation. "Yes, EDI."

"I was unable to find any abnormalities in hardware or signal in General Vakarian's comms, Captain. I believe the sound he's experiencing is an auditory hallucination."

Shepard's heart slowed—damned hope, why did the reapers keep crushing it—and her gut clenched tight, wrapping into a ball like snakes in winter. "Yeah, that's what I was afraid of, EDI, thanks."

"I have scanned for any anomalous energy signatures, but as in other cases, if there are suzerain orbs present, they are not emitting radiation of any kind I can detect."

Shepard watched Martin disappear around the corner at the end of the hall. "Roger that, I figured that too. Thanks for trying, EDI. Shepard, out." She switched to the team channel. "Tali, are the shuttles at the dustoff location? I want to be on them and out as quickly as possible."

"They are in position, Captain. It's very boring in here." The smart ass tone in the quarian's voice came through loud and clear.

"Considering we're all having our brains melted and taken over, I think most of us would trade you. Hold your position, Shepard, out."

She closed the channel and drew in a long breath to steady herself before taking over checking on Vincent and Kaidan. Vincent looked shaken but remained on his feet. She grabbed hold of the wall of muscle's shoulders and forced him to look her in the eye. "How are you doing?"

The big man shook his head, the trembling hidden beneath his shrug telling her everything she needed to know. "Like Mordin ... and Jack, I guess, Loco. I'm hearing whispers, but so many that I can't understand what they're saying."

A startled chuckle greeted the nickname. "Loco?" When he just tilted his head and cocked an eyebrow at her, she sighed. He had a point. "Okay, fine, Loco it is. Take a shot of the indoctrination serum. Let me know if the voices don't get any better, but we've got to move. If there is an orb here ... this is just going to get worse." She patted the injection port on his armour then punched him. "You really are just a freakin' mountain."

He laughed, hearty enough to ease back her concern. "Work out in the gym eighteen hours a day and you could be just like ... no, sorry, Shepard, you'd still be an anthill."

She punched him again, then turned to Kaidan. Even before she asked, she could tell he'd taken his injection. Calm and back on his feet, weapon in hand, he just nodded and strode over to watch the stairs.

Samara too looked collected and ready to just get the hell off Tuchanka. The asari took a few steps after Martin. "I'm going to see if he needs help with Jack."

"Okay." Shepard followed her a couple of steps, keeping her eyes on the stairs down. A lot of bodies holding guns awaited them down there, and despite using comms to communicate, they were, quite frankly, making enough noise to wake the dead.

"Fascinating." Mordin's exclamation spun her around, his voice sounding even more manic than usual. "Most distressing sensation." His omnitool glowed above his wrist as he scanned himself. "Indoctrination fascinating in theory; infinitely more so experiencing it." "Shhhhh! Mordin, stop scanning yourself, and take your damned shot. You're crazy enough as it is." Shepard strode over, diving into his belt pouch when he didn't obey the order. She punched the injection into his thigh and hit the plunger. "If the voices don't go away, take another."

Martin appeared at the end of the hallway, his arm around a very rattled looking Jack.

The biotic met Shepard's stare with one that growled badass bitch, and nodded. "I'm back, Shepard. Let's get the fuck out of this nightmare." She pulled her shotgun from the small of her back and moved to stand behind Kaidan, covering the stairs.

Shepard hurried over and crouched next to Garrus. "We've got to move before things get worse, Callor. You okay to get back into the shit?"

He held out his hand, standing when she grabbed it and pulled him up. "I'm okay. The shots have kicked the headache down to a dull roar."
"Okay. Let's get Wrex and dust off." She turned to her team. "If you start to go downhill, take a shot. If it doesn't work, tell me. Please, don't try to hide it, love. If you need something, ask." She caressed her husband's cheek then moved up to take point. Time to get the hell out of Dodge.

Garrus caught her shoulder, his grip steady. "It's not affecting you?"

Shepard nodded, glancing toward her husband. "I feel it." She frowned and pressed her palm over her right eye, her brain making a break for freedom as she let her headache through her mental walls. "It's like … a hand crawling up the inside of my skull, digging its fingers into my brain." After a moment of taking deeps breaths and relaxing her neck, the pain eased, and she gave him a weary smile. "I'm just used to it."

As she passed Martin, she said, "Of all of us, you're the only one with a history of not being affected by this signal. Keep an eye on us."

"No worries. I'll keep both eyes on all of you," he replied, none of the usual smart ass in his tone. He frowned and leaned backwards, stretching his spine. "Do you think this whole thing could be the ones behind the black orbs… the Leviathans or suzerains or whatever … trying to manipulate the krogan?"

"It has to be." Garrus finished off the water and passed her the bottle, interrupting her reply. "This place feels like the Haestrom shipyard before everything went to complete tare." He gave himself another shot of serum. His stare met Shepard's, as solid as ever, but the fear and concern that remained did nothing to comfort her. He cursed, looking as sick as Nihlus had the past few days. "Spirits, I don't want to go through that again. Our serum wasn't enough that day, Kahri. We need to get out."

"We've only got a few more Blood Pack to take out, then we can grab Wrex and evac." Shepard shrugged her Mattock into her hand. "I'll take point. Martin walk drag."

Garrus grabbed her forearm, pulling her around. "Aren't you going to take a shot?"

Shepard shook her head. "If it gets crazy inside my head, yeah, but they're already in my skull, so there really isn't much point. If I suppress them then I can't read them … see what they're interested in." She shrugged. "If that makes any sense." She gestured toward the rubble-strewn staircase and the door at the bottom. "Let's just kill the rest of these bastards and get the hell out of here."

He settled his sniper rifle into his hands and nodded. "Right behind you." He looked better, the steel back in his bones, his jaw tight, mandibles relaxed. His neck arched that little bit extra and when he strode for the stairs, his steps hit solid and sure. A small knot at the base of Shepard's spine untied, and she released her breath all the way for the first time since they'd paused to rest.

Jogging to the head of the line, she picked her way down the treacherous slope, her Mattock trained on the bottom of the stairs. Boasting zero cover and extremely uneven footing … that staircase formed the perfect place for an ambush. Why wasn't the Blood Pack attacking? It couldn't be thanks to stealth; they made more noise than a bulldozer. She checked the active scan. The Weyrloc hadn't moved. While she understood not wanting to give up good cover, the hand inside her head tightened its grip.

"EDI, are these readings life signs or lifeforms?" Terror punched her in the gut, sharp claws digging in, burrowing through her organs. "They aren't moving."

"Reading life signs, Shepard, They're definitely alive but fewer than before, and several are erratic," the AI replied, sounding as if she rechecked her facts even as she spoke.
She took cover on the inside corner at the bottom of the stairs. A door faced her on the outside wall, but the one they wanted was further down the hall on the left. Taking a long, slow breath to smack the fear down, she glanced around. Clear, as she suspected. Even the ceiling remained mostly intact, the shade a welcome change.

She gestured for the rest to go ahead. Something whispered, a tickle of spider legs … the slight slither of tar through the valleys in her grey matter … drawing her toward the door on the right. "Go ahead," she said, inching that way, "I'm just going to sweep this room. Martin, watch my back. The rest of you take cover to go through that door guns blazing."

Black and slick, the spiders began to trickle out of the hidden folds of her mind, their legs ticking down her spinal cord and in behind her eyes.

So there's something in there you bastards want to see? Holy fuck, that sucks on every level imaginable.

Martin pushed in behind her, his Revenant ready to pump out hundreds of rounds per second. "I've got your back, Shepard."

A sharp nod answered him, but her hand didn't move from her gun. Why did the suzerain want her to open that door? A warning? A trap? Curiosity?

"Shepard?"

Martin's whisper spurred her on, her hand sliding down her Mattock only to hesitate, hovering a good half metre away from the control. "Do you see anything, Martin? Any of the black energy?"

He stepped around her and then shook his head. "Nothing. Whatever's in there isn't attacking you or the team."

"Not actively, but passively, it's doing something." She glanced behind her to check on Garrus. He nodded and gave her the thumbs up. Shepard turned back to the door. She needed to quit stalling and kick some ass. "Okay, kid, get ready." She pulled her Mattock in tight, couching it to fire one-handed, then slapped her palm against the door control. The door turned, then reeled back, revealing ….

"What the hell?" Squinting, she leaned closer, trying to cut the glare from the open sky over the stairs. "Damn." Taking a step, then another, she moved into the dim space. A bright white light solidified amidst the gloom. The source, a glowing orb, sat cradled in a frame of very obvious Reaper tech. A tight ring of the black orbs surrounded it: a cage around a dangerous animal.

Around the ring of black orbs, krogan kneeled shoulder to shoulder, practically crammed in, their heads pressed to the walls. She stepped forward. Why hadn't they picked up those life signs? Two more steps and her eyes adjusted to the gloom. She backed up, pulling Martin along with her. "Back up, those Enkindler-cursed things are going to blow when we take them out."

She closed her eyes, but the carnage of that room didn't fade, burned into her retinas. Forty or so krogan, kneeling in their own blood after smashing their skulls in against the concrete walls. Sweet Jesus, they'd bashed their own heads in to kill the whispers or whatever madness the orbs planted in there.

She took a long breath, clenching her teeth around the words as she said, "Blow those fucking things straight to hell."

(A-N: Sorry everyone. I meant to have this done for Halloween, but Wrex then changed the whole game necessitating a massive rewrite. It was worth it, but ... DAMMIT WREX! I am concentrating on Future Imperfect for NaNoWriMo, so lets all bow our heads and pray that the writing gods favour this effort. I want to get us to the Reaper War before Christmas. :D As always, all the love. *hugs)
Despite being ninety-nine percent sure of why the krogan signatures on the other side of the door hadn't changed, Shepard's gut still lurched hard when she opened the door to a macabre glut of madness, violence, and gore. As much as she'd wanted to free Urdnot's females, and as much as she hated the Blood Pack, no one deserved what those orbs had inflicted on Weyrloc.

"Sweet baby Jesus, protect us," she whispered. Glancing toward Mordin before walking over to where a vorcha clawed its way across the floor by its one remaining limb, she asked, "What is this? Do you think the combination of reaper and suzerain indoctrination signals drove them insane?"

The vorcha looked up at her and snarled, the sound a plea to kill him.

"I'm sorry." Blinking back a sudden, empathetic burning in the corners of her eyes, she swallowed hard. "But I can end your pain." She pulled her pistol.

"Don't shoot!" Mordin cried, diving between Shepard and the vorcha, hands up as if begging her to spare a child or something. "Need intact brain tissue. Will administer injection." He hurried over. "As for mixed indoctrination signals: could be." He took a knee next to the vorcha, his omnitool flaring to life. He swept it over the doomed soldier. "Yes. Yes! Makes sense. Glowing reaper orbs seen on Feros and other places humans turned into husks: referred to as machine cultists. Positioning of black orbs suggests defense against reaper signal."

He glanced up at her, a half-shrug tugging one shoulder up. "Krogan most powerful ground force. Reapers converting other races. Leviathan invested in making sure reapers do not gain control. Result: krogan destroyed."

"Then we need to up the timetable on getting scanners and improved defenses. Did you get readings from the orbs before we blew them?"

"Yes. Should help develop scanners and defensive eyewear. Will get to work upon return to ship and krogan casualties stabilized."

Tuning the scientist out for the moment, Shepard turned to her team. "Spread out in pairs. Anyone who isn't dead, put them down: it'll be a mercy. Take another indoctrination shot even though we blew those other orbs to hell. Who knows what's still here." When they answered to the affirmative and headed out to follow through on her orders, she turned back to Mordin.

"Despite differences in signals, black orbs counteracting white suggests use of similar delivery method. Defenses developed based on Mr. Weaver's immunity should function for both." He gave the vorcha an injection, ceasing the poor fellow's struggles, then moved on to a krogan quite literally spattered against the wall. He did his cluck of disapproval. "Need subjects not suffering traumatic brain injury. Most likely tried to beat madness out."

Shepard nodded. "Yeah." She clenched her teeth. Grisly as the scene was, they needed all the information they could get on indoctrination. "If you want to take samples, whatever … do it. Get the others to do your heavy lifting. Put everything on shuttle two. I'll have Tali bring it down to the top of the stairs … get it as close as possible."

Cringing, she watched the scientist lift a large section of bashed in crest and skull. Like a hand pushing her from behind, the spiders cajoled her to get closer—not through words or even actions, just a tickle, an itch that demanded to be scratched. Despite denying the spiders their wishes, an invisible thread pulled her closer until she could see diseased brain tissue under that skull. The damage lacked subtlety: large areas boasted tissue that looked not just dead, but decayed.

_No! I'm not your puppet. Back the fuck off!_

She threw herself around, placing her back to the body, and dove into her belt pouch for a syringe. She'd allowed the tar-slick presence to betray their stake in the scene. Time to move on and get her people to safety.

_Is there such a thing any more? Orbs here? Both reaper and suzerain? They're both moving in on all the species. Time is running out, and what do we know? What defenses do we have?_

After giving herself the shot, she turned back to Mordin. "I'll head down to evac Wrex and the others before they're tearing each other apart or bashing their own heads in." She swallowed a retch of nauseated disgust and terror. Maybe one day she'd stop being surprised by the horror the reapers and suzerain left in their wake. Maybe, but definitely not that day, not with so much blood and brain matter washing around her feet.

_How do we fight them when there is no atrocity too big, no horror that will turn their stomach or back them down? Are we prepared to go that far?_

Not a question for right then. She needed to get her people out. Yes, get her people out and keep her eyes on Garrus. She understood him being freaked: the last time the black orbs had neutralized him, and he'd awoken two weeks later, having been vivisected and tortured. Gaze sweeping the room, she tried to find him in the carnage. Where the hell was he, anyway?

It took her a second of searching to find her husband. He crouched twenty metres or so away, staring down at a dead krogan. She hurried over. "Garrus?" she called, her hand hovering a few centimetres from his shoulder. Touching him seemed an excellent way to end up with his rifle butt in her teeth. "Come with me to evac Wrex and the females? He's going to need familiar faces if the orbs are doing a number on him like we think. Hopefully he and Grunt are still coherent."

He nodded, but his stare never left the krogan. "This is Weyrloc Guld, their chief." He pointed to a variety of marks in the krogan's shell, particularly his head casing. "Five or six different weapons. His people beat him to death. Why are they doing this?"

He nodded, but his stare never left the krogan. "This is Weyrloc Guld, their chief." He pointed to a variety of marks in the krogan's shell, particularly his head casing. "Five or six different weapons. His people beat him to death. Why are they doing this?"

Not needing him to explain who 'they' were, Shepard helped Garrus up and turned him to face her. "I don't know, but we'll figure it out. Any information is good information, right?"

He didn't resist her pull, but neither did he look up and meet her eyes. He seemed to have withdrawn, burrowed down inside himself to hide from the signal. She pressed her palm against his cheek, lifting his face to meet hers.
"Callor, love, are you still hearing the sound?" She patted his cheek when he didn't answer. "Come on, big guy, help me out here. Talk to me."

He didn't answer, but did go into his belt pouch for a shot of the serum. A few seconds after he took it, the clouds cleared from his eyes. Either shaking himself or shuddering, he chuffed. "We need to get out of here, now, Kahri."

Not caring about what anyone thought, Shepard grabbed his hand and led him across the room. Turning, she searched for Martin, spotting the kid as he emerged from a door at the end of the space. She hollered, "Hey, kid! Find Vincent and meet us down in the lab to help with evac." She didn't wait for an answer, but the next second, she heard the heavy tread of his frame armour running up behind them.

The lab door stood at the bottom of the stairs, the control red. She could override it, but she'd rather Wrex opened it up voluntarily. If the indoctrination signal had sent him over the edge, he might just open fire. She motioned for the others to spread themselves out and take cover before pounding her fist against the door. "Urdnot Wrex! It's Shepard. Are you alive in there, you ornery old bastard?"

She backed up, movement approaching the other side of the door. The deeper they descended into that place, the more it felt like a trap, or some giant maw waiting to eat them whole. She jumped a little when something heavy thumped against the metal. "Shepard? Is that you?"

"Yes. Open up. We need to get you and the females evaced from this nightmare." Letting out a bitter chuckle at her jumpiness, she took a step forward.

"Four hours, Shepard!" The door mechanism spun, then the metal slid back. Wrex stood in the space, huge and suddenly, really quite terrifying.

Unable to allow him to get the upper hand, Shepard pressed into the clan chief, backing him up a step. Thank the dear and fluffy Father of Light that he still respected her enough to back down. "We just took out over a thousand Weyrloc and Blood Pack, Wrex, show a little gratitude." She stabbed her chin toward the inside of the lab. "Let's get these people out of here. We found reaper and leviathan indoctrination orbs just up the stairs. They drove the Weyrloc crazy enough that they bashed their brains in against the metal."

Movement at the far end of the long space drew four sets of crosshairs. A trembling salarian stepped out from behind a half wall, his hands held up away from his body. "I… I'm unarmed," he said, his voice so high that he could have been auditioning for a part as a talking chipmunk.

"Are you Maelon?" Shepard's brow furrowed.

Before the salarian could stutter out an answer, Wrex stepped around her. "Shepard!" the krogan's voice boomed through the lab. "Evac now, introductions later."

She held up a hand to stop the rest of his rant. "Gentlemen," she said, looking to her team, "get everyone to the shuttle." Movement drew her attention to the other side of the door, glad to see Mordin lurking in cover. "You done collecting samples?" When he nodded, she waved him in. "Come on in then, and tend to your patients, Doc. The shouting at one another portion is over, let's move."

Garrus skirted around them. "I'll get the females aboard shuttle one, Shepard."

Wrex bristled, his glare sizzling past Shepard to latch onto Mordin. "What the hell is that salarian doing here, Shepard?"

Shepard stepped in front of the clan chief as he stormed back to the door, looming over Mordin, his expression promising violence. "He here to destroy this other pyjak's work on the cure?"

Shepard threw out a hand, shoving Wrex back. Her hand let out a howl of complaint as it impacted his armour. "No. He's here because your captive was one of his science team, Wrex. He came to get his person, just as you came to get yours."

Wrex stopped, his eyes narrowing, and Shepard saw instinct step back to make room for intellect. The violence in his posture slowly dripped away, winter giving way to spiring. His stare pinned Shepard before darting past her to Mordin. "Are the salarians experimenting on our females?"

Shepard shook her head. "Don't jump to conclusions, Wrex. We'll sort it out once the females are being treated and we're well away from here. It appears as though the reapers kept Saren's cure and gave it to Weyrloc." She nodded to where Garrus and Mordin organized stretchers and stretcher bearers. "It's still the reapers trying to turn the krogan into their cannon fodder, so let's just move."

She led the way to the beds that Wrex and Grunt had shoved into a storeroom. The small space echoed with its dying occupants' groans. Judging by the sores and ligature marks, the females suffered from a level of pain that Shepard didn't want to imagine. Well beyond the end of the Shepard Scale. Behind her, an argument sparked.

"Females' condition critical," Mordin insisted. "Need to move them to a state of the art medical facility. Tuchanka not safe for many reasons."

"There's no way I'm letting a salarian take these females off Tuchanka and torture them with more experiments," Wrex shouted back, setting the salarian back a couple of paces.

"Gentlemen, please." Shepard let out a long, weary sigh as she turned to face them. "It's been a long enough day without this bullshit." She flipped a careless, dismissive hand toward Mordin. "Gather up anything you think might help, then we'll burn the place down before we go."

Wrex stomped up to her, pushing all the way into her space. "What do you think you're doing, Shepard? That research is the only hope for my people."

Her arms hanging relaxed at her sides, Shepard tilted her head to look up at the krogan. "Back the fuck up, Wrex, before I lay you out and sit on your head while you listen to me." Keeping her breathing slow, she met his glare until he backed up a couple of steps. Good, she was too tired to wrestle a krogan. "I had EDI upload everything before she destroyed their computers. We've been working on a cure for two years. That work will continue."

"I don't trust that salarian, Shepard," Wrex groused, fury radiating from him like Aralakh's rays bouncing off the wastelands, "and you have no right to take that research. It belongs to the krogan."

Looking up at the clan leader from under lowered brows, Shepard turned to face him. A vicious, ravenous ache began to gnaw through her guts and down her limbs, making her hands shake. Damn, her pain meds were wearing off. Clenching her fists, she shoved the need as far away as possible and focused on the problem. "I'm not going to argue with you over who owns the data, Wrex, because it doesn't fucking matter." Slicing the air between them, she cut off his protest before he got done opening his mouth. "Sit down."

The krogan let out a small roar that amounted to both asking and demanding why. When she cocked an eyebrow at him, he bristled, his chest puffing out, hands clenched and slightly raised. For a moment, she thought he might charge. Not acceptable, indoctrination signal or no.

"Wrex, sit the fuck down." She bristled to match him, fury burning like molten steel up her spine and pouring into her head. Of all the people in the damned galaxy who should trust her … after everything she'd done for the krogan … how dare he? When she spoke, her voice rose out of her chest, grinding like glass shards under a boot heel. "You might not have any reason to trust Mordin, but you sure as fuck have reason to trust me." One eyebrow lifted toward her hairline. "Or is your memory so short and your heart so ungrateful and selfish that you've forgotten?"

Stepping into him, she forced him back toward the nearest crate, counting on his respect to outweigh his anger. "I'm not going to play around with your people's chance at becoming a respected member of the galactic community. I'm not going to juggle the welfare of all those females and pups out there. Hell, I'll put a bullet in your head before I let you risk these females right here." She let out a heavy, quick sigh. "But, I'm really tired, and I hurt everywhere, so just sit down and listen to me."

After glaring at her for a couple more seconds, Wrex turned and walked over, sitting on the side of the crate. Shepard sat on one just beside it, straddling the corner so she could face him. Thank the sweet baby Jesus. Despite meaning every word, she really didn't want to shoot Wrex. She sort of loved the old grouch.

"Better." She braced the heels of her hands against her thighs, hunching over as much as her armour allowed. "I'm going to lay everything out, because I know that you're smart enough to see my reasoning. Your people were evolving past the genophage. Birth rates were going up, and the council freaked out. They went to the STG and said, fix this. Mordin and Maelon were both members of the team who did just that."

Wrex started to rise. Throwing herself back, Shepard brought up both feet, kicking him in the gut hard enough to sit him back down. He roared and tried to get up again, only to end up on his ass once more. "Shepard!" he said, resorting to his words. "How do you expect me to trust him with these females and the research after that?" Before he even made it all the way up that time, she kicked him back down.

"I can do this as long as necessary, Wrex." She raised her eyebrows, the expression light, set to defuse him. "Sit down and listen instead of reacting. I know it'll be hard considering the amount of indoctrination crazy, but do it."

If glowers could burn, Wrex's would have singed Shepard's armour. Still, he stopped trying to get up. His willingness to listen and trust her remained. Praise be.

"Thank you." She leaned forward, forearms resting across her thighs. "I don't expect you to trust Mordin." Earnest exhaustion met his surprise. "I expect you to trust me. Everyone standing behind me … everyone working on projects for me … leave trusting them to me. Your only job is to trust me, Garrus, and Nihlus. Easy enough, right?" She sighed. Too much talking for such a crazy, fucked up place. "Right? We're family."

When he grunted in reply, she continued, "Mordin and his team have been working with the data we found on Virmire. This data may be exactly what he needs to find the cure." Her stare softened as she held his gaze. "And you know as well as I do that there is nothing on Tuchanka to help these females. We'll take them aboard the Ypres and then get them state of the art care back at Archangel." A small shrug drew her shoulders toward her ears then dropped them.

Anger drew back, replaced by weariness and hope. Shepard looked into those huge, red eyes and let out a long sigh, releasing the last of her frustration. "We have a real shot of curing the genophage here, Wrex, but in order to stop the council from pulling crap like that bomb that nearly wiped out your clan, the krogan need a smart, reasonable, and diplomatic leader. You need to be the face of the new krogan society." Straightening, she stretched out her back before shifting to lean on the other hip. "I know you're that leader, and you know I'm not talking about changing who and what the krogan are."

Movement at the door drew Shepard's attention. A grateful smile greeted the silver blue of Garrus's armour as he stepped over the threshold. After looking around for a moment, he spotted her.

"We ready to move the females?" he asked, sounding as tired as she felt. "We've got them moved to antigrav stretchers, and the shuttles are parked just outside the back door."

Shepard looked to Wrex. "Well? Are we ready to move them?"

"You're a pain in my ass, Shepard," the clan chief groused, shoving himself up onto his feet. He waved to Garrus. "Let's get them out of here."

Leaving the others to get the females aboard, Shepard stopped, catching sight of Maelon standing in front of a huge vid screen. The display showed only static, EDI having already wiped the computers, but still, the salarian stood there, hands raised and twitching, his expression lost.

"Maelon?" Shepard called, making enough noise on her approach to avoid startling him. "The females are ready to go. How about you?"

"Weyrloc didn't force me to come here," he said. As she stepped around him, her side against the vid screen, she saw that his hand movements were those of someone tapping on an interface.
"Voices told me to come, to fix the mistake we made." He reached up, sliding his hand across the screen. "Urdnot Wrex unwilling to do what needed to be done! No will to go far enough … push hard enough."

The salarian's voice rose both in pitch and volume with every word until Shepard's hand lifted to rest on her pistol grip. "Sacrifices must be made! Boundaries pushed. Can never make up for what we did. Can never bring back dead pups and mothers. Can never be forgiven. Taught to be a monster!" He spun to face her, lunging forward. "Can I help it if I became a monster? Who was I to argue with the great Dr. Solus?"

Latching onto Shepard's armour, he dragged her closer and shook her, his face pressed against hers as he shoved her into the wall. "We destroyed the krogan. It doesn't matter if I have to kill a million to save the rest, I will save them!" Maelon opened his mouth, insanity-propelled spittle smacking against her skin. "You can't understand! The voices! They never—" Thunder roared through the lab and a heavy spray of blood and bones and brain splashed across her face. A blur of incoming movement spun her around, her pistol lifting as she blinked away the gore, struggling to aim at their attacker.

"Kahri!" Garrus's armour registered as he raced up to her, leaping over the salarian's body. He grabbed her by the shoulders, pulling and pushing as he checked for wounds. "Are you all right?"

"Yes, love, I'm fine." She eased him back. "Maelon was just shouting. He didn't hurt me." When she pushed him far enough away that he released her, she reached behind her head to untie her kerchief. "Just covered in a hell of a lot of ick." She mopped at the blood cooling on her face.
When she cleared enough away to see him clearly, his pupils had constricted to pinpricks despite the dim light. His mandibles twitched against his face, high and tight.
"Damn it, the bastards still have orbs. You've got to get him out of here."

"Garrus?" Reaching up with both hands, she took his face between her palms, his hide chill even through her gloves. Releasing him, she freed her hands, something telling her she needed skin on skin to pull him back. "Garrus, love, just look at me." Gripping his face again, she winced at the sweat rolling down his neck despite his chill. "Look into my eyes. We're all right. Come on, let's get onto the shuttle."

"My silhouette," he whispered, "white on the red wall." His eyes stared past her, the blank terror in that almost flawless field of ice freezing the blood in her veins.

"Garrus, love, come on." She gripped both of his hands and began leading him toward the door. "Let's get you aboard the shuttle."

When she stepped away from the wall, he froze, that terrible, blank stare darting to the surface and freezing there. Turning to follow his stare, she winced at the faint but grisly portrait painted on the concrete: a negative shadow of her outline painted in bloody mist.

A roar of pure agony tore from Garrus's throat. "No!" He ripped his hands from hers, tripping over Maelon's body as he reeled away from her. "No! She came back!" Bare of subvocals, his voice rose to a shrill keen. "My kahri came back." Spinning, he ran straight into one of the medical tables, another keen greeting the dead body laid out on the surface.

"I can't still be there." Hand over hand, he groped his way around the table, and bolted for the door. "I'm not in the dark. I won't go back into the dark."

"Garrus!" Adrenaline lightning shot through her, launching her across the lab and over the threshold. "Garrus! Stop! I'm okay." Taking the stairs three at a time, she raced up toward the second shuttle and the heavily pounding sun. Somewhere behind her, she heard Mordin find his assistant's body. No time to worry about him.

"Shepard?" Martin called in her ear. "What's going on?"

Slowing ever so slightly to check in the room with the destroyed orbs, Shepard hit her radio. "Garrus took off. You're faster than I am. Get over here." She closed the channel mid-stride, and hit the long slope of rubble, dropping to all fours to scramble up the loose footing.

She heard Martin ten seconds before he stopped next to her. "Grab hold, I can jump this."

Shepard did as he said, thanking the blessed Enkindlers for the kid's frame armour as he covered the debris field in a series of four metre leaps. "Put me down," she said once the floor cleared. "Run ahead and check the main path, I'll sweep the side rooms and follow. If he's running blind, there's no way in hell I'm going to be able to catch him."

Ten minutes later, Shepard raced through the hospital's front door, squinting against the sun to see shuttle two cut across the landscape, a scant four or five metres in the air. Pausing to gasp, pulling in long, quick draughts of dust and heat, she lifted her hand to her ear. "Do you see him, Tali?"

"Affirmative, Shepard. He's about a hundred metres ahead of you. Sending heading and scan now."

Shepard hit her omnitool controls, opening a topographical map with a single, blinking green dot on it. "He's stopped. Is he okay?" Another green dot appeared, streaking toward Garrus; thank the blessed Enkindlers for Martin.

"I see him, Shepard," the kid said, panting between words. "Holy crap, he's fast." Judging by the change in his voice and breathing, she imagined him bent double, hands on his knees. After maybe fifteen seconds, the sound of his frame armour crashing across the Tuchankan wasteland resumed, in hot pursuit once more.

"Shepard! Where are you?" Wrex called, his voice sounding more grounded for having left the surface.

Shepard let out a sharp breath, stumbling over a piece of rebar sticking out of the concrete. Catching herself on a half wall, she shoved herself up, scarcely missing a step. "Chasing Garrus halfway across your planet, Wrex." Gasp. Damn, she needed to do more running. "What do you need?" She vaulted up onto a large slab and checked her scan. Freakin' damned Enkindlers, she'd never catch Crazy Legs Vakarian, she just didn't have the stride for it.

"Bakara's getting worse," Wrex said, some of the strain bleeding through.

"Confirmed, Shepard," Mordin spoke up in the background. "All females' becoming unstable and critical."

Pushing on, Shepard swallowed all her misgivings. "Take them to the Ypres, Mordin. Get started on stabilizing them. Tell Karin to grab Kaidan and anyone else you need."

Once the shuttle signed off, Shepard paused to signal her ship. "When you get the others on board, bring the shuttle back down. Hopefully we'll be ready for evac."

Fifteen more, impossibly scorching minutes passed, Tuchanka's air burning in her chest a little more painful with every breath. She had maybe ten more—

"Shepard!" Martin's voice tipped close enough to panic to stop Shepard's heart dead in her chest. Oddly enough, the stopped heart spurred her legs to faster speeds. After a couple of wheezing breaths, he continued, "I caught up with him in the basement of a ruined building, but he won't let me get anywhere near him. He keeps raving about not going back into the dark to the cutters."

"Keep the exit blocked if you can, and just let him pace," she said, wheezing between the words. "If he tries to run, take him down as gently as you can."

At least Garrus seemed to have run himself out for the moment. If she could get to him before he caught his second wind, she should be able to reach through the indoctrination long enough to get him on a shuttle. Fury simmered in her gut, adding fuel to aid her tired limbs. As if the monstrosities and the killing and turning the races into monsters wasn't bad enough. As if the reapers and suzerain didn't spread enough horror without turning people's minds against them.

And Garrus? Yeah, they could play with her all they wanted with their stupid tar spiders and 'assuming control' bullshit, but coming at her torins … torturing them …. No, they'd all burn. Souls, no souls, they didn't deserve the effort it would take to discover the answers they needed. Death. Death was what they deserved.

"Shepard!" Martin's voice called up out of a dark hole. "Down here."

"How's he doing?" she asked, picking her way down into what looked like it had been some sort of vehicle structure.

"He just sat down." Pain bled through Martin's words. "He's talking about having broken Roger, so he's back on Haestrom." A hissing sigh crackled over the comms. "You'd better wash your face before you try to talk to him."
"Stinks." Garrus's voice echoed up to her. "Fuel and blood."

"Yeah, right," she replied to Martin's suggestion. Cursing herself for not thinking of it, she pulled out a bottle of water and a gauze pad, scrubbing even as she continued down into the darkness. She heard her husband without the comms a moment later, his mutters low. "Garrus?" The steps and muttering paused for a scant fraction of a second before resuming.

"Stop it!" he called out, his voice a sharp, strangled bark. "Panic will kill you. Remember. How did you get here?"

"Callor?" Shepard called, changing tack. Maybe the nickname would break through where the other didn't. What had he told her about Haestrom? She vaguely recalled dreaming about leading him through corridors of endless, grey slabs. "Follow my voice. Can you hear me?"

Instead of answering, he said, "I've got to think. I don't have a hope in _buratrum_ of smelling the others over the sickly, acrid stink of this slime. Radio and omnitool dead, armour has gone dark. Focus, Vakarian. I can get out of this. I just have to find the others." He chuckled, wry and bitter: a sound that tore at her guts. "_Pari_ always said I was too stubborn for my own good."

Martin appeared suddenly ahead of Shepard, wraithlike in the gloom. She stepped up next to the kid, just able to see Garrus sitting on the floor a handful of metres away. "How's my blood level?" she asked.

The kid held his hands out for the gauze and water bottle. "Where did you learn to wash your face?" he asked, his attempt at humour dying mid-flight.

"I was born in a barn according to my mother, so ... ." she replied, pressing her lips together in a thin line. "Contact Tali, keep me apprised of their ETA back down here. When they arrive, I want you to have a sedative ready, and she needs to park as close to the structure as she can and keep the cargo area lights low. I don't want him to bolt."

Martin nodded, his implants glowing gently. "And if he does, grab him and sedate him?" He swiped at her face, scrubbing here and there.

"Yeah. Either way, sedate him as soon as I get him on the shuttle." She let out a long sigh and rolled her shoulders when the kid gave her the nod. Damn, she hated tricking Garrus, but they needed to get him into treatment before she ended up losing him for good.

Garrus pushed himself up off the floor, looking so pained that his movements stabbed sympathetic slivers of pain through her heart and stomach. "I'm going to need you," he whispered. "Do me a favour, and stick with me for a bit."

Shepard strode forward, something … some warm tug deep down in her gut telling her that he'd just given her an opening to reach him. "I'm here, Callor." She stepped close enough to make out his face clearly. "How do we always end up in these situations? I swear you do it on purpose."

He chuffed, a sound that registered more doubt than anger or fear. "You're dead." His mandibles fluttered and dropped. "That was a stupid thing to say."

"I came back to help you get out of here." She stopped and held out her hand, holding her breath as she waited for him to come to her. Tipping her head toward the ramp, inviting and light, she smiled. "Come on, let's get moving. I don't like it here."

After hesitating long enough to spike her adrenaline—her blood pressure soaring until the deafening pulse hammered in her temples—he took a step forward. "Why did you leave me, Shepard? You knew ... you know that I need you."

She struggled to remember what she'd said ... something about .... "It was time."

Talons stretching out to the extent of his reach, Garrus's gloves slid up her fingers before closing his grip. "Why are you here now?" He stepped forward, drawing her fingers up to his mouth. Breathing in deeply, he nuzzled the back of her hand. "It's you."

"Shepard," Martin's voice spoke softly in her ear, "Tali's in place. Whenever you're ready."

Smiling, she nodded in answer to both Garrus and Martin. She reached up, fingertips whispering along his mandible and cheek. "It is. Come on. We need to get you out of here." When she sidestepped toward the ramp, he followed, offering no resistance. She let out her breath, a warm wave of relief washing over her, another of exhaustion chasing hot on its heels.

Despite hesitating a little as they passed Martin, Garrus offered no fight, his talons clinging to her fingers like a lifeline as they climbed up toward the shuttle. Finally, the universe giving them a break, her plan moved smoothly, and she sat in the corner of the shuttle, her husband lying across the rest of the seats, sleeping with his head in her lap.

Martin flopped down across from her, letting out a loud raspberry of a sigh. "This entire day has sucked most egregiously—"

"Egregiously?" Shepard teased, a tired, slaphappy sort of laugh greeting his vocabulary.

"Yes, egregiously. All I want to do is take a shower and fall into bed." He sprawled, his back pressed into the corner. "How's he doing?"

Shepard caressed the long sweep of muscle from Garrus's crest to the neck of his armour. "He'll be okay. He's tough as nails." Still, her beautiful torin continued to twitch in his sleep, fighting against monsters he should never have had to think about again. "If Mordin and his team don't find a filter to prevent this, I'll space one of them a day until they do." She growled under her breath. "This is the last time those bastard reapers and leviathan get to do this to us. The very last fucking time."

Happy N7 Day! All the love.
The dark stink of Haestrom's bowels fouled Garrus's sleep with nightmares. Every now and again, Shepard's voice broke through the darkness and suffocating silence. Her soft words and gentle caresses coaxed him from sweat-soaked nightmare back into the calm, breeze-ruffled meadows and leafy, shade-speckled forests of sleep. She joined him there, both discovering a peace in his dreams they might never experience while awake.

Caelan - (Turian) Something extremely pleasurable or pleasant. English equivalent: Ambrosia

Tarc - Turian equivalent to shit.

Derra - Wife. Female bond-mate.

73 Days ASR 0219 hours Sahrabarik (9 hours out from Omega)

The dark stink of Haestrom's bowels fouled Garrus's sleep with nightmares. Every now and again, Shepard's voice broke through the darkness and suffocating silence. Her soft words and gentle caresses coaxed him from sweat-soaked nightmare back into the calm, breeze-ruffled meadows and leafy, shade-speckled forests of sleep. She joined him there, both discovering a peace in his dreams they might never experience while awake.

Scent invaded unconsciousness first: the sharp, medicinal ozone smell of a medbay. As much as he disliked the odour, it amount to pure caelan compared to the reek drowning his nightmares in blood, corruption, and death.

"Doc? He's waking up."

Oh, blessed spirits, that voice. It drew a keen of longing and gratitude through his second larynx. After all the nights he'd rushed to bed in order to meet her in his dreams after she died, there she sat, her tiny fingers clinging to his talons, her voice washing away the nightmarish chill. He forced his eyes open, his gaze finding and latching onto her pixie face with it's sharp chin, crooked nose, and eyes the colour of summer grass.

Shepard—his kahri—smiled. "Hi there, gorgeous." She reached up, her hand cool on his plates as she stroked his face. "You gave us quite a scare."

Allowing his eyelids to drift most of the way closed, he let out a long breath, never so grateful to feel the too-thin mattress of a medbay bed beneath him. "Sorry about that," he replied, his voice startling him: reedy and dry with only shadowed subvocals. Staring into his mate's eyes, he thought back to Tuchanka, following the trail of memories. "I remember finding Weyrloc Guld's body, but then everything gets foggy." He scowled, some of the memories returning, blurry and drifting through a haze of heat and blood. "Wrex? The females?" He lifted his head to see krogan occupying the other beds, but no one he recognized.

"Wrex and Grunt are fine. As far as we can tell, Grunt wasn't affected, and Wrex recovered quickly once the docs got to him." She glanced over her shoulder at the closest bed. "The females aren't doing as well. Mordin and Karin are on it."

"And me?" He leaned up a little, moving slowly as the room tipped hard to starboard and began to roll. "How long have I been here?"

"Nearly the whole trip back. We just landed on the Omega side of the relay from Hawking Eta. We'll be docked in nine hours." Pressing gently on his shoulder, Shepard eased him back down onto the mattress.

"Nine hours?" He closed his eyes. Spirits, he'd been asleep for nearly four days? "What happened to me?"

She lifted his hand to her mouth, kissing each of his knuckles in turn. "Those orbs put the whammy on you and dragged up Haestrom. You took off. Martin and I ran you down, got you on the shuttle. I'm not surprised that your memory is spotty. Whatever those orbs did, they scrambled up your nervous system pretty badly." She stood and bent over him, her lips soft and tasting of salt: she'd been crying. "How do you feel?"

Garrus took a quick inventory. Other than a headache, nothing hurt, and his head felt clear. He sat up, drawing in a deep breath to test his torso for the lingering pain from his mostly healed damage. His spine groaned, setting up a complaints department just above his pelvis, but everything else felt fine. "I'm sore from lying on this bed, but no worse for our adventure."

The air moved, bringing with it the scent of antiseptic and something Shepard called English Rose: the telltale perfume of Karin Chakwas. "Lie back, General," the doctor said as she approached the bed. "You need to take it easy for a couple of days. Your brain has suffered a traumatic event and, like any organ, it needs time to heal."

He chuffed. "I think my organs have suffered enough traumatic events for three lifetimes. What happened to me, exactly?" he asked. He released Shepard long enough to lower himself back down onto the pillows they'd arranged to help make up for the torturous mattress. The second he settled, he reached out for Shepard's hand and tugged her closer, needing to feel her warmth against his hide. She obliged, rolling her chair right up to his side, her free hand lifting to caress his face.

"We don't know why yet, but you reacted instantly to the reaper indoctrination signal, and the results proved devastating." Chakwas fussed over his scans. Spirits, it must be news of the worst order to have her dissemble so badly; she usually just jumped right into the tarc.

Chakwas pulled up what looked like a multicolour image of a turian brain: his brain presumably. "It appears that whoever performed the vivisections, modifications, and combat tests chose you for some predisposition or susceptibility to reaper indoctrination." She shrugged. "It might have been because you have a resistance to it, but we need to do more testing to be sure."

She tapped at the interface of her omnitool then swept it over him: head to feet then back to his head. "We've got the swelling under control, but there's scarring along your entire nervous system."

"More testing should provide means of detection … defense," Mordin said, hurrying in the door. "Have learned all I can from Mr. Weaver's implants. Need to observe differences, effects on unprotected mind." He stopped at the end of Garrus's bed.
Shepard jumped up, throwing herself between Mordin and Garrus—all spikes and claws—as cold and furious as Garrus had ever seen her. "You're talking about exposing my husband—the general at the head of the entire organization—and his already damaged nervous system to more of the fucking reaper signal?" She laughed, shards of ice. He saw them hit their marks … on both Mordin and Chakwas. Spirits, she wanted him to submit to their experiments as well?

Shepard stepped around the bed, pushing in on Mordin in a way he could construed as threatening. "Don't let any stupid ideas take hold inside your slippery old brain," she said, her face less than a finger's width from the salarian's chin. "I have very little faith in your ethics right now." Oddly, needing to crane her head back to meet Mordin's stare didn't diminish the threat.

Garrus's mandibles flicked. He cleared his throat, trying to back Shepard down gently. As much as he hated the thought of letting those bastard reapers back into his head, he couldn't fool himself into believing he'd navigate the war against them and the collectors without being exposed to it again. And they needed to be able to defend their people against it. He'd gladly sacrifice himself to protect the rest of Archangel—maybe even the rest of the galaxy—from the reapers and leviathan's most insidious attacks.

Shepard reached back to lay her hand on his ankle, but she turned toward Chakwas. "You too, Doc?" When the Normandy's doctor nodded, Shepard continued around to meet Garrus's eyes. When her stare latched onto his, she shook her head. "Please, don't tell me you're considering doing this."

Garrus held out his hand, his palm cold without hers gripped in his talons. He smiled and beckoned her back to his side. Once her fingers laced with his again, he looked past her to Mordin. "Do you have any idea how we're going to test me … or anyone," he qualified when Shepard tensed, "against reaper indoctrination?"

"Theories only," Mordin said, his mouth set as if he'd just bitten down on a rancid vitivern fruit. "Access to reaper device will prove most enlightening. Acquisition problematic."

Shepard let out a noisy sigh, rumbling a little deep in her throat, and for a second Garrus wondered if his mate had picked up the habit from Nihlus. Surely, she hadn't learned it from him.

Garrus squeezed her hand. "We have time to talk about everything: whether or not to go ahead and how to make any tests safe." A weary smile met Shepard's sudden sharpness; she couldn't help reacting any more than he could when she placed herself in danger. When she relaxed, he glanced over at Dr. Chakwas. "May I go up to our cabin to rest until we get back to Omega? This bed is going to break my spine if I spend any more time on it."

The doctor nodded but held up a card of electronic patches. "You can go, but I want to monitor your neural activity."

Letting out a long sigh of relief, Garrus sat up. "Agreed." He waited patiently while the doc applied the patches to his temples and the base of his spine. Shepard passed him his robe when he swung his legs off the side of the bed. Allowing her to sort the robe's panels even though he could have done it himself, Garrus studied his wife's face. Taking note of the dark circles under her eyes, the drawn lines around her mouth, and the wan cast to her skin, he knew she hadn't exaggerated when she said he'd given them a scare.

"How's Nihlus?" he asked, taking both of her hands in his to still their fussing. "Is he recovered enough to share you?"

She swallowed hard and nodded. "You've been asleep for three days, Callor. He's fine." She waggled her head a little side to side and shrugged. "As fine as he can be, considering. Well enough to sqish into a third of the bed, anyway." Backing up a step, she tugged on his hands. "Come on, let's get you out of here before they lock you in a big cage with a bottle of water hanging on the side and a hamster wheel for you to run on."

"Shepard," Chakwas protested, scowling at his mate, "you know I'd never risk Garrus's health without extreme need. What happened to the Weyrloc could happen to our people. As much as I hate asking, I must."

Garrus pulled Shepard in, wrapping his arm around her shoulders. "We'll talk about it, but the discussion is moot until you come up with a way to measure what you need."

"In the meantime," Chakwas continued, "we've upgraded the turian version of the serum." She passed him a handful of ampules. "Take one every six hours."

At least ten questions sparked in his head, not the least of being why he needed to take the serum while not exposed, but Garrus simply took the ampules. They could worry about questions when he felt a little less scraped raw and left for dead. So, instead of quizzing the doctors, he gathered his derra in against his side. "Thank you, doctor … Mordin."

Shepard said nothing as they passed through the Ypres's galley to the elevator. Neither did they speak for the few minutes it took to ride up to their quarters, but the air thickened, tension building like thunderheads on the horizon. The silence held until they entered the cabin, but as soon as Shepard saw that Nihlus had stepped out, she stiffened.

"Kahri," Garrus said, interrupting before she began, "let's table the discussion until after we relax and get some sleep." He turned to face her, cradling her jaw between his hands. "I've been asleep for three days, and you look like you haven't slept three minutes." The weariness he saw slithering beneath her impenetrable outer shell tugged a soft keen loose. Leaning down, he touched his brow to hers. "I'm right, aren't I?"

She leaned into him. "Karin and Mordin didn't know if they'd … " The sound of her swallowing cut the air, her love and her fear of losing him so palpable he felt it manifest between them: a separate, starved entity. "... if they'd get the swelling under control. I couldn't leave you." A warm palm pressed against the side of his face, slow and full as it brushed his hide. "But I got some sleep in the chair." Easing herself back, she kissed his brow. "Come on, let's get into bed. It's been one hell of a week." She turned toward the stairs. "We should have fresh sheets. Nihlus was going to —"

Garrus snagged her hand and pulled her back into his arms. "It's going to get worse from here, Kahri. We're all going to be forced into risks well out of any sane comfort zone." He nuzzled the top of her head when she slipped her arms around his waist: two unyielding, iron bands. "But I promise to fight through the pits of buratrum to come home to you. All right?"

She nodded against his chest, her head heavy, her body heat seeping through his robe. A soft sigh drifted between them before she said, "I know I can't protect you any more than you can protect me, but damn it, if I have to do this without you." She lifted her head to stare into his eyes, hers shining with the tears he knew she'd never let him see fall. Well, maybe not 'never', but rarely enough to keep them precious. "I don't want to live in a galaxy without you and Nihlus. There's nothing but death and pain in that galaxy."

He kissed her, pulling her in tight. Tarc, hearing her say those words … they felt like talons wrapped around his throat, razor sharp claws ripping out every soft, precious thing keeping him alive. "I've been there," he whispered against her lips. "I survived. Nihlus survived. Sometimes it felt like we wouldn't, but we did, and so will you if the worst comes to pass."

"Until the war ends."

The four words formed a barbed, jagged prophecy. Sanding down the worst of the edges, her hand slipped along the inside of his arm to grip his talons. She led the way to the stairs, Garrus following with dragging steps. Would he feel any different if he needed to fight through the war without her? Wouldn't the end be a welcome chance to rest, to join her wherever they ended up after death?

Just before he stepped down the first stair, a light flared across his field of vision, blinding him in a wash of brilliant white. It dimmed, his scorched retinas settling to reveal a large armlight burning overhead. He tried to move, but could only squirm; bands on all four limbs and across his torso strapped him down. Agony burned through him, tiny pulses along each nerve, building … stacking one upon the next upon the next, a fire leaping from tree to tree until the entire forest blazed.

"Garrus?" Wraithlike, Shepard's voice drifted down through the light. "What is it, love? Are you okay?" He heard fear tightening her voice, an intractable wrench. "Garrus?"

Fearing the connection might prove a singular chance, he turned away from his wife's concern and closed his eyes. Pushing back the pain, he forced himself to focus on details: a cold metal table surrounded him. A sling cradled his cowl between table sections and a metal frame held his head immobile. Voices, louder than Shepard's but indistinct, moved around him outside the glare. Zooming in on them, he pulled them closer: humans, a female and two males.

Despite the cruel reality of the light searing his eyes and the pain arcing along every nerve, he knew he stood in the captain's cabin on the Ypres. He could feel his Kahri's hand clinging to his. Using the contact as a lifeline, he squeezed her fingers to reassure her and dove into the memory.

He might never get a better chance to drag up what happened to him after the Haestrom shipyard. Whoever took them hadn't just been playing around. They'd possessed a very specific agenda. Only he or Nihlus held the slightest hope of figuring out what they—probably Cerberus—wanted.

"Are the cranial implants online?" the female voice asked. He heard the sharp click of heels against tile, then cool, rubbery fingers touched his head. "We need to ensure the carrier signal controls him."

"The cranial implants are functioning perfectly, and have been from the third day," a male voice replied. "Right now, our biggest issues are the skeletal lattice and microfibre weave. His body is rejecting them. Immunosuppressants and the most powerful antihistamines aren't controlling the reaction." As the man mentioned the damage, Garrus's agony exploded, his nerves reduced to ash.

The woman made a frustrated sound. "Run blood panels on all ten of them. We're not going to be able to just stick the human variations of the tech into the turians like we can with the krogan and asari."

"Would it be helpful to acquire a few quarian subjects?" the third voice asked. "Despite their health issues, they could provide a common baseline."

The sharp heels clicked across the tile in a pacing pattern eight steps long. "Quarians are not easy to come by. Even the disappearance of their pilgrims doesn't go unnoticed." After thirteen circuits, the footsteps stopped at his side. "They're not practical in the long run, but we need to untangle the turian problem."
"We can arrange to purchase them," the very helpful third voice offered. "That way, even when they go missing, the trail won't track back to us."

A feminine, but disgruntled sigh blew across Garrus's face. "Very well. A half dozen, and see if you can negotiate for ten more converted turian units. Older generations, not the most recent, and a variety of generations if possible." The cold, rubber-covered fingers grasped his head, prying his eyelids open to shine a light into them. "Just make sure the transactions can't be traced back to the organization."

"Callor?" Warm, dry hands gripped his head between them, her calluses chafing softly as she rubbed his hide, as if trying to buff warmth into his hand. "What's happening? Are you okay?" A sharp edge of panic lanced Shepard's words. "Doc, something's going on. Garrus just froze up and he won't talk to me."

Squeezing his derra's fingers to try to calm her worry, Garrus struggled to hold the memory close, to see it through to the end. He needed to know who had carved Nihlus and him up like a couple of laboratory animals and maybe, most importantly, why.

"I'll put out feelers on Omega. It takes a little longer to approach the collectors through back channels, but it'll be untraceable."

The female made a soft, formal sound of acquiescence. "Fine, get moving. We need to fill in the gaps and soon. All this reaper tech isn't going to do us any good if it kills every subject we implant with it. They're going to have 'the mistake' up and recruiting aliens within weeks … a couple of months at the most."

_Tarc_, he wished he knew human accents better. It sounded a little like Zaeed, but more formal: distinguished and nasal rather than earthy and coarse. The woman pried open Garrus's other eye and shone the light in it. He kept the eye open long enough to make out a dark shadow on the other side of the spot blindness. Long hair hung down: definitely human.

"He's starting to come out of the anesthetic. Get him back under and let's get these implants out; prepare for round five."

The pain Garrus had been forcing to the back of his mind vanished as dreamless darkness swallowed him.

"Garrus? Come on, _verro_, snap out of it and give me a sign here before I really start freaking out and end up kicking your asslessness." Shepard's hand patted his cheek, each blow landing with greater strength until they stung, virulent enough to help him drag himself back from wherever he'd gone.

"I'm fine, _Kahri_." Opening his eyes, he caught her hand before it could land. "I got a flash of memory from the time I went missing." He pulled her into another hug, able to feel his own trembling through her body. "They were implanting us with reaper tech, and it wasn't just Nihlus and I. I could hear a woman speaking, and she ordered someone to take blood from all ten of us."

Shepard let out a long breath, her fingers curling handfuls of his robe into her fists. "Let's get into bed before you lay all this on me. We can mull the entire problem over then sleep on it."

Garrus nodded. "Yeah, let's get some sleep. We can hammer it out with the others tomorrow back at Archangel."

74 Days ASR Archangel Headquarters, Omega, Sahrabarik
The familiar buzz of conversation and debate eased Garrus down into the padded leather of his seat in the Archangel conference room. Spirits, it felt good to be home. As much as he knew he needed to be out there, fighting, he missed the bustle and camaraderie of headquarters. It had been his entire life for almost two cycles, and he felt a little like he'd abandoned it the moment Shepard returned.

Not that his people needed him there. He'd outdone himself when he'd chosen the inner command circle; they could run Archangel without him if it survived losing its figurehead. The moment he stepped off the dock, he'd begun the debriefings, meeting with each of the department heads, not at all disappointed with how well his people handled the organization's affairs during his absence.

"Building three is full," Nyreen Kandros reported, drawing him out of his thoughts. He chuffed; they'd started wandering the moment he asked for status updates. His throaty utterance drew the tarin's attention as she continued, "Most of the slaves we liberated decided to stay. And we've begun cleaning up building four. If we get the influx of Blue Suns Zaeed predicts, we're going to need to start housing people onboard ships."

Garrus frowned, his guts tightening into a knot. Wait. What? "Blue Suns, Zaeed?" Spirits, they could never trust a mass influx of mercs. "Why would Suns join up? They were trying to wipe us out a few weeks ago."

A disgusting, guttural grunt or belch curdled the air around the merc. "I finally chased that god damned bastard Vido to ground," he said. Rather than jubilant or even his usual ornery old bastard self, Zaeed's tone tipped toward depressed. Had catching up to Vido and disposing of him robbed the old merc of purpose? Garrus resolved to take him aside before the end of the day to find out. The Suns respected the bastard, so they needed Zaeed cussing and fighting if a mob of the mercs joined up.

"Most of Vido's senior bootlickers got their arses blown into roasted dog chow when the refinery exploded," Zaeed continued, his face twisted into a sneer. "The men asked me to step up; I said no goddamned way."

Surprised, Garrus lifted a brow plate. He never expected Zaeed to refuse the reins of his old organization; he'd always assumed Archangel would lose the ornery old senux once Vido met his just end. After all, Zaeed co-founded the merc band. "And you told them to join us?"

Zaeed shifted as if his chair had grown spines, but then dissolved back down into it. "I'm too old and too much of a bastard to put up with all the bullshit of leadership." He made another revolting noise in his throat, his voice laced with derision when he continued. "Besides, I thought Archangel needed bodies. Can beggars be bloody well choosy when we have dreadnoughts sitting out there like fucking ghost ships?"

Instead of replying, because Zaeed had the right of it, Garrus looked back to Nyreen. "Has the accounting department run budget projections for this increase in recruits?" He tried to concentrate on the details of preparing Archangel for its second massive inundation of bodies in a month, but Mordin's glowing omnitool on the other side of the room kept pulling his attention and holding it.

Thank the spirits his people didn't need him to micromanage the business end, because at least half of what they said sailed straight past him as he watched the salarian's expression. He'd worked with Mordin long enough to know the look on the scientist's face meant that he'd discovered something both fascinating and perplexing. The information on the small screen above the tool showed scans of a krogan head and upper spine.

"We've put out feelers with the Alliance," Anderson said, "looking for retired officers to come in as instructors. The reception has been mixed, but Hackett speaking for us has helped."

Shepard scoffed. "I'm surprised they didn't just tell you to stick it up your ass."

Anderson grinned and shrugged, tipping one ear toward his shoulder. "As I said, Hackett being on our side has helped."

"We need at least five dozen experienced, senior officers or trainers," Vortash replied. "We're all working fourteen hour days and there's still just too many." The batarian hesitated, but then met Garrus's gaze with his usual directness. "We've been talking about casting a wider recruitment net.
There are krogan battlemasters and geth who have been fighting for hundreds of cycles."

Garrus nodded, dragging himself back. "I'll have my pari and General Victus ask discreetly among the ranks of turian military retirees as well. All these recruits aren't any good to us without training.
Even the seasoned mercs need to be brought up to speed on our tech and methods, so hire are many as you need." He looked around the room. "Archangel has always embraced talent wherever we found it, and I trust you to be far more choosy than I am."

He looked around the room, meeting each set of eyes long enough to both encourage them to speak and to enjoy their company, the unique, cooperative energy that made up his inner circle. "Any other housekeeping?"

The glowing chia obscuring Legion from view strobed a couple of times before the geth spoke.
"The chiastyllia and geth have created a design for a new class of frigate," he said. Schematics appeared on the large holo-screen at the center of the space. "The collectors are biotic, therefore more susceptible to biotic attacks than tech attacks."

Garrus leaned in, trying to decipher the plans, but coming up empty. The geth and chia's creation amounted to something new. Despite the lack of familiarity, something in the design inspired hope.
No, more … the strange looking contraption excited him. They knew the effectiveness—or lack of effectiveness—of standard weapons. Something new might just help level the turram pitch a little.

"We designed a large scale biotic amp. It connects and channels the power of several biotics into a single emitter," Legion continued, "which fires warp blasts and singularities. We believe the data from our simulations warrant the development of a prototype for further testing."

The simulation data replaced the schematics, the numbers pulling a low whistle from Shepard.
"Sweet baby Jesus, no kidding." She looked to Nihlus, who nodded, the set of his mandibles betraying the same eagerness Garrus felt. When she turned to look at him, excitement practically crackled in his derra's eyes. "I say, let's get the prototype underway," she said.

Garrus grinned, his mandibles flicking hard. Finally, something with the potential to make a difference in the fight. "Absolutely. We'll need reaper and collector materials to test it against, but the faster we get it built, the better." Spinning his chair around, he looked to Sidonis. "Can you head out to Haestrom and get our shipyard back up and running?"

Sidonis answered with a sharp nod. "We'll need to keep it low key in case the collectors come after it again, but it wasn't damaged, just powered down and left empty."

"We need to capture an intact collector vessel," Shepard said, bringing the soft buzz of excited conversation and planning to a dead stop. "We need to take their tech apart and get ourselves particle cannons. Sovereign's corpse gave us a hell of a start, but we need to step up our game and go on the offensive." She stood, pacing through the holo-image twice before Legion deactivated it.
"They need to know we can hurt them. Otherwise, all our bases are sitting ducks. That means getting our hands on every scrap of collector tech and reaper tech we can find." She spun to face Liara. "I'll leave it to you and the Brysons to play detective and find us rumours about dead reapers. If the Leviathan of Dis died during the war against the protheans and we killed Sovereign … there have to be others."

The passion fueling her words wove an optimistic spell, pulling Garrus forward: his arms braced, legs ready to jump into action, breathing shallow. With the exception of Mordin, whose attention never waivered from its fix on his omnitool, everyone in the room mirrored the general's posture. He knew they felt the same, wondrous certainty: they'd win. Archangel could accomplish anything with the angel herself leading the charge. The fight would be terrible, and it would cost them all far more than they could even imagine, but in the end, victory awaited them. And in that moment, he blessed Cerberus for bringing her back. At least someone possessed foresight … evil foresight, but still foresight.

"How are we going to capture a collector ship?" Nyreen asked, her tone matter of fact rather than skeptical. "They've kicked our asses on every front. Our ships didn't even scuff their paint. Besides, even if we do attack and by some miracle we win, their ship is going to be in pieces."

Shepard nodded. "You're absolutely right. Conventional thinking isn't going to get us anything but dead. We're going to need to get creative. So, if an idea jabs you in the ass, don't sit on it because you're afraid we'll think you're crazy. Bring it to us. It might be completely batnuts—and I can't guarantee we won't laugh and call you a lunatic—but it also might spark some magnificent inspiration we can make work." She paused, staring down at her hands. "We need a means of boarding a collector ship so we can fight our way through."

Nihlus leaned forward, his forearms buttressed against the arms of his chair. "If we put enough people on board to take out a couple hundred collectors, what's stopping them from scuttling the cruiser?"

Shepard glanced toward the farthest QEC emitter to the left. "EDI? Can you help us out here?"

"Using information mined from the collector bases on Thessia and Palaven, I believe my cyber-warfare suites are able to penetrate collector defenses and seize control of their computer," the AI replied. "I could prevent the collectors from enacting a self-destruct protocol." EDI paused, her projection dimming for less than five seconds before she said, "Yes, I believe I've discovered a breach in their outer defenses that makes it possible for me to attack from within."

"Your cyber-warfare suites would be able to penetrate collector defenses and seize control of their computer," Shepard repeated the AI's words. She started pacing once again, the skin between her brows wrinkling, her teeth gnawing at the inside of her bottom lip. Garrus watched the gears clicking into place, the pieces of something falling together right before their eyes.

"Attack from within," she said, her voice soft … talking to herself rather than the rest of them. She stopped directly in front of him, meeting his stare. Her eyes crackled with energy, her body taut, practically vibrating.

Garrus grinned. Spirits, she'd figured it out. Something EDI said had ignited a connection inside Shepard's beautiful, faster-than-light brain. When she pivoted to face Nihlus, Garrus felt cold, as if the brilliant, mid-summer sun disappeared behind a cloud. Without any jealousy, he glanced at Nihlus, pleased at the easy set to his fratrin's shoulders, the joy painted on the underside of the thoughtful frown, the fact his hand never drifted to his absent flask. Nihlus truly had been ready to kick that pyjak out the airlock.

Shepard looked at the blue glowing representation of her ship's AI. "Once we're in, you'll be my go-to girl, EDI. We'll need you to crack locks, open doors, seal off sections, and julienne the collector units into strips so thin they can't overwhelm us."

She paced for another couple of seconds, muttering the whole time about Earth history before she stopped at the central QEC control. "We're going to need scans … all the scans we can get our sweaty, little, grubby fingers on. We need to know the inside of their ship better than they do." Her grin turned ever so slightly maniacal. "I want them to see us blasting through their ship and pee in their collector undies while they collector sob into their collector hankies."

Garrus watched, a wry grin welcoming their certainty; she'd already decided on the mission. For some unknown collector cruiser out there, the game was already over. The rest of them not knowing how to get aboard the ship didn't matter; that seemingly insurmountable but tiny hurdle sat directly in Shepard's rearview mirror.

"EDI, check the Archangel database and see if any of the ships that tangled with the collectors got a chance to scan the vessels." Shepard returned to her chair and sat down. "Use your imagination to search out other sources."

"As you wish, Captain Shepard," the AI replied with her usual enthusiasm, "I'll set aside formulating my plans for galactic domination for the duration." For a moment, Garrus envied the AI her eternal cheer and willingness to milk a joke far past its best before date.

"Thank you, EDI." Shepard tossed him a wink, indicating that she'd said all she needed to for the moment.

"All right," Garrus said, "capturing a collector vessel is tabled for future discussion." He glanced around the room. "Any other housekeeping?" Rubbing his hands together, he used the friction of his gloves to heat his talons.

When the rest of Archangel shook off their shell-shocked expression—which he completely understood: they weren't used to watching Shepard work—they all indicated to the negative.

Grateful, Garrus focused his attention on Mordin, both anticipating and dreading the salarian's report. "What's the status on the krogan?"

Mordin's attention snapped from his omnitool as if he'd been waiting for them to get past the business too mundane to be worthy of his attention. The salarian oscillated, the frequency of his energy growing until he looked set to breach the barriers between universes. "Urdnot Grunt's scans provided fascinating insights into genophage cure, indoctrination, and the reapers' quest to answer their question." He glanced at Garrus, but quickly moved past to Shepard, no doubt hoping for a more friendly audience. Disappointment awaited him.

Shepard's earlier enthusiasm vanished in the face of the reminder of Mordin's horrific secret. She radiated anger as clearly as Mordin emitted excitement.

The salarian cleared his throat. "Stated previously, Urdnot Grunt unaffected by either indoctrination signal. Searched for reasons. Discovered why on Korlus mission recordings: Okeer referred to other vat grown krogan as failures. Claimed Grunt his only success. Traded for collector technology used in Grunt's creation."

Garrus leaned forward, his forearms braced across his knees, talons clasped. "The other krogan claimed to have no spark. Urdnot Bakara equated the spark to their soul."

"Soulless creations," Shepard whispered. She raked her fingers through her hair as she met Garrus's stare, hers grasping for fingerholds on a slippery climb. "Holy blessed Enkindlers. Like the reapers. The collectors gave Okeer the tech … Grunt was a proof of concept test."

A low hum of realization escaped from Shepard as she bolted upright in her chair. "Chiastyllian DNA? They're what made the difference?" She turned her chair to look at Nihlus. "Some of the uncorrupted chiast got caught in the chamber with the asari when the machine took them apart and analyzed them."

Garrus’s fratrín nodded. "Makes sense. It could be the reason the leviathan were so desperate to control the chiast: they're a weapon or, well, a defense at least."

Dr. Chakwas cleared her throat, a delicate but firm sound that directed everyone's attention to her. "Most importantly, Urdnot Grunt provides us with another control for testing the indoctrination devices. Comparing his brain scans during exposure to ones of a krogan without his resistance could reveal the exact frequencies we need to block."

Shepard stood, resuming a pacing pattern to the QEC pads and back to her chair. "So we need to locate intact devices of both types: reaper and leviathan."

Nihlus's subvocals growled a little as he said, "Locating them won't be as hard as making sure we can shield them." He paused, a thoughtful frown following Shepard along her pacing circuit. "What about the shields Tashac and Merrol used to protect them from the Conduit and the other keys?"

Shepard stopped. "We don't have a way to duplicate the tech, unless …." She spun, setting Garrus's heart racing when their eyes met. Like a trail through heavy brush, the brilliant green of her stare led him along the winding paths of her thought process. They'd just made contact with people who possessed Tashac and Merol's technical memories.

"Horizon," he said. "We need to decide how to use the facility including how to best defend it without drawing attention to it."

From the center QEC pad, Liara cleared her throat, a gentle, unassuming hum of sound. "If I may, General? Shepard?"

Garrus turned his chair to face the asari researcher. "Go ahead. Was your mission a success?"

A smile brightened Liara's face. "More than successful. The Brysons, Kumun Shol, and I discovered the entrance to the structures he's been excavating for the past several cycles." She looked as though even a single degree more passion would set off a catastrophic chain reaction culminating in an explosion. "We discovered another prothean sleeper base—as we guessed—composed of ten wings and an armoury. Unlike Horizon, this facility was clearly a military outpost. Most of the sleeper pods lost power over the millennia—the VI shutting them down a wing at a time—but two wings remain functional. We rigged a reactor to make sure they didn't fail before we decided what to do."

"Thank the blessed Enkindlers you didn't revive them," Shepard said, her words sliding along a relieved breath. "How many are we talking about?"

"Seven thousand pods," Liara replied, the dubious slant to her tone echoing the sick lurch in Garrus's gut. Spirits, seven thousand could just walk in and take over Archangel. The council races and Alliance would consider them a threat, and probably one not worth the risk. "Enough to be a serious threat if their beliefs closely mirror Javik's."

"I can't see a large force of protheans playing well with others," Shepard agreed, "but especially our sadly primitive races." She lifted an eyebrow as she met and held Garrus's gaze. "They'd be useful as hell; they fought the reapers before, but they're going to try to take charge, and this isn't their galaxy."

Liara took advantage, slipping into the thoughtful silence. "The Brysons also have some clues to track down the leviathan. We're on our way back to the Citadel. One of Garret's researchers reported in to say he found something. I'll keep in touch as I can."

"Excellent. Good work, Liara," Shepard said. "Any help we can get would be brilliant."

"Okay," Garrus said, bringing the topic around to the inevitable. "Our work into indoctrination has to continue. That's going to mean obtaining intact reaper and leviathan orbs and then setting up a safe offsite laboratory to run tests." He looked from eye to eye. "Ideas?" When no one answered, the general let out a long sigh, the beginnings of a headache building behind his eyes. "Right." He leaned back, slumping a little further into his chair. "Get comfortable people. It looks like it's going to be a long day."

(A-N: All the love and hugs and kittens. Thanks so much for reading and for commenting. You know I love hearing from you!)
Shepard woke to the dim, blue light of the fishtank, the bed beneath her thick and deliciously warm. Threads of Garrus's incense drifted on the recycled air, coaxing her to curl in next to her husband and go back to sleep. Still, the space on her right side, so recently warmed by Nihlus, began to cool; the Spectre up and working. His absence shattered the cocoon. Damn it all. And just like that, the entire war tumbled into the empty space, filling it with twenty four and a half worries and deadlines.

Soluvermus - A small (average size 8-12 cms/1-2 cms diameter), heavily armoured earthworm native to Palaven's more northern and southern regions. It is considered a delicacy.

Dilan - Fiancé

Praela(s) - The name for ancient warrior spirits who were believed to ride great beasts (or forces of nature) into war at the head of their tribe's legions. Spirits of great bravery, tenacity, and a fearsome beauty.

Uzluk - The head and face covering worn by krogan females.

78 Days ASR Iera, Shadow Sea enroute to Feros via Horizon

Shepard woke to the dim, blue light of the fishtank, the bed beneath her thick and deliciously warm. Threads of Garrus's incense drifted on the recycled air, coaxing her to curl in next to her husband and go back to sleep. Still, the space on her right side, so recently warmed by Nihlus, began to cool; the Spectre up and working. His absence shattered the cocoon. Damn it all. And just like that, the entire war tumbled into the empty space, filling it with twenty four and a half worries and deadlines. Not even her husband's arm, draped heavy and comforting over her hip, drove away the weight hanging above her head.

Feros awaited, but Horizon first. She needed to speak with Giran and Javik about the wisdom of waking up seven thousand protheans. Tashac's memories told her that Commander Javik, the highest ranking officer, the leader frozen to bring about the new Prothean Empire, would be able to keep them in line. The respect for his position, and Giran's as the child of Tashac and Merol, ran high, but could the Archangel hierarchy keep Javik from seizing power from the incompetent primitives once he possessed some real backing?

Sighing, she slipped out from under Garrus's arm and eased her way to the edge of the bed. She turned, lifting her knee up onto the mattress to watch her verro sleep. She couldn't get enough of looking at him. Sweet baby Jesus, before she met him, she couldn't have imagined loving someone so much that they became more beautiful with each breath. The thought of losing him formed a ball of pure, razor-edged panic that tore at the center of her with each swallow.

Her fingers lifted from her thigh, drifting across the half metre to trace the ridge of plate that covered the forearm resting on the mattress. She stopped short of actually making contact. Even after several days of recovery time, Garrus needed his sleep. As much as he'd insist that he was fine, he'd taken a hell of a hit. She didn't look forward to the fight to keep him aboard the Ypres when she, Nihlus, and Martin headed into the ExoGeni base.

Gently easing herself off the bed, she started composing the list of things she needed to accomplish as she slipped into her trousers and Archangel hoodie. First item on the list: a heart to heart with Mordin. They had some ethical worries to smooth over before she trusted him to work on the genophage cure or expose anyone to the indoctrination signals. Garrus being experimented on still sat firmly under the 'over my dead body' heading. And, for the moment, the 'hell no' heading encompassed everyone until she could trust the salarian to keep his scientific excitement under control so it didn't overwhelm his compassion and common sense.

As pissed as she'd been to hear about the genophage modification, and as much as Mordin provided a convenient scapegoat, her anger had settled. The fact remained: krogan aggression presented a real problem. Even Wrex flared too hot and too often. If she couldn't convince Wrex to believe in her honest support for the krogan, she didn't stand a hope in the hottest hell of bringing the rest of the krogan into the galactic community. If they cured the genophage with that dynamic, they'd prove the council right. Wrex would end up ass to the sky in a ditch somewhere, and the malcontented Tuchankan morons rattling the bars for endless war and retribution would unleash hell.

She sighed and shook her head. No. No, she needed to believe the krogan could work with everyone. They just needed to be dragged out of their isolation. She could do it, starting with stopping in to see Wrex. Although still insisting that he remained fit and ready for action, he looked wan and twitchy, as if a handful of fire ants crawled beneath his plates. The last time Shepard visited the krogan shaman in medbay, Wrex sat, listing on a steep angle next to the female's bed.

Stopping at her desk, she wrote a quick note for Garrus and stuck it to the bathroom door. Once she stepped into the elevator, she opened a channel to Nihlus. "Good morning, early bird," she said. "Catching any worms?"

"Is early bird some sort of racist slight?" he asked, a soft growl rolling beneath the words. Despite sounding very much like an angry tiger, those subvocals betrayed the teasing truth. "I've tried soluvermus, and they're disgusting. I don't eat anything I have to slurp out of its carapace."

"Gross, Ni. Just so, so very gross. And yes, I'm just marrying you so I can abuse you at will." She echoed his growl a little, getting the desired laugh from the other end.

"I just finished a vid call. I asked Giran to go through Merol's memory archives to find schematics for the devices they used to shield the relay keys." He yawned, adding a long, grumbling keen to the end of it before he let out a thick smacking sound and continued. "She thinks they may have a stash of the dampeners left in storage, so our trip to Horizon might be a short stop over."

Shepard grinned and shook her head, imagining the Cerberus staff looking on with slightly horrified faces … well, except for Kelly. She seemed to enjoy having the aliens aboard. The counsellor had struck up a very cheery friendship with Tali, the two able to giggle and chat for hours. "Excellent. I have a really bad feeling about the reaper device we left at the ExoGeni building. With the thorian dead …." She let the thought die unspoken, not wanting to tempt fate any more than they already were.

"Anderson will be able to tell us if they're just being secretive or if something catastrophic has happened." A noisy breath huffed in her ear. "Where are you? What's next on your schedule?"

"I'm in the elevator, so my morning is pretty well covered." She laughed and leaned into the wall. "I've reached the head space where I can have a constructive conversation about the genophage with Mordin, so I'm headed to his lab. You're welcome to join me."

"Do I need to come prepared to save our head researcher's hide, or have you reached the point of truly rational discussion?" Some strange combination of worry and amusement thrummed through his voice. "Because, sometimes you think you've calmed down, but the first chance it gets, your temper rises to the challenge."

"Nah, I'm good. I actually understand why he helped modify the genophage." She pushed off the wall as the elevator stopped. "I don't like it any more than the reason they created the damned thing to start with, but I understand why they did it. Even now, without Wrex and Bakara, a cured krogan population is a threat."

She nodded as she passed Kelly without pausing. "Good morning, Yeoman Chambers." Just before she slapped the door control into the lab, Nihlus strode up behind her. He must have come through the old armoury.

_Note to self: Figure out something awesome for that space, and no … Shepard's private sexing up my torini room is not an option. Or is it?_

Shaking her head, she glanced over her shoulder at her _dilan_. "Good morning, gorgeous. How did you sleep?"

Nihlus gripped her opposite shoulder, his hand steady and strong: he amazed her with his resilience. Rumbling softly in his throat, he leaned down to nuzzle her ear. "Better than I have in a few days." He sighed and leaned into her for a second. "Garrus seemed to sleep soundly as well."

"Me, three," she said, turning to kiss him softly. The reason why they'd all slept so deeply and well settled in her gut, warm and true. _Her torini_ had been right … the three of them belonged together. They were at their best when in each other's proximity. She pulled away and nodded toward the door. "Shall we? The salarian's a bonafide genius, so we need him, but keep your eyes and your pheromone receptors sharp. I need to know if I can trust him with our people."

"You're really ready for this?" Nihlus asked, his mandibles held high and away from his mouth, teasing. "I'm not going to have to drag the _praela_ of fiery death and destruction off Mordin's shredded carcass, am I?"

Shepard shrugged, affecting complete innocence. "I don't know what you're talking about. I am the very epitome of calm control." She palmed the control and led the way into the lab. Alone in the sterile space, Mordin worked at a piece of equipment Shepard couldn't identify.

"Lose your helper?" she asked, trying for cheer off the starting line. Grunt rarely left Mordin's side. He might have been acting on Wrex's command, keeping his eye on the salarian, but Shepard believed the reason lay in the young krogan's curiosity and hunger to know who he was and where he came from. She needed to take some time to sit down and talk with Grunt. He seemed young and filled with piss and vinegar, but beneath the layers of overly enthusiastic, inexperienced warrior, he showed signs of a thoughtfulness she wanted to explore.

"Grunt in medbay," Mordin replied without looking up from his work. "Have you come to dismiss me?"

Shepard sighed as she shook her head. "No. If we meant to fire you, we would have done so before leaving Omega." Seeing that he didn't intend to step away from his work, she grabbed a chair from behind his desk and rolled it over. "I do want to talk to you about the genophage modification project, though."
"Am aware of moral complexities," he said, his voice tight and defensive. "Dedicated significant amount of time weighing ethics against necessity."

Watching the set of his shoulders, the extra curve in his spine, and his jaw clench and release a few times did more to convince Shepard of his soul-searching than any words ever could. Things weren't as cut and dried as she first believed. Blowing out another long breath, she relaxed down into the chair, her mind opening to hear him out.

Mordin pressed some controls, making the machine bleep a few times. "Data from all simulations provided same conclusions: increased krogan birth rate … unchecked population growth, expansion, war. Galaxy kills krogan or krogan kill galaxy." He cleared his throat, a soft coughing sigh. "Modified genophage returns krogan birth rates to pre-uplift levels. One in one thousand, no more, no less."

Shepard scowled, the skin between her brows pinching into a knot. "You were trying to keep their population from falling?" she asked then winced at the genuine surprise and disbelief needling him through her words.

"Yes! Not a monster! Genophage protects both galaxy and krogan. Not a punishment. Not revenge." The declaration came out strident, Mordin's defensive tone escalating to indignant. "Could have degraded genetic structure further. Could have sent krogan into extinction. Didn't."

Regret chased surprise from Shepard's thoughts and for a moment, she started to apologize. Something in Mordin's manner stopped her, the salarian bracing his hands against the table top, leaning forward over his equipment, but no longer looking at the readouts. Her instincts told her to give him space, so she did.

Nihlus shifted over to stand beside her, his hand resting on the back of the chair, his thumb caressing her neck. It felt amazing, and she smiled up at him. Of course he knew to avoid interrogating Mordin, her dilan possessed a whole lifetime of good instincts, both innate and trained.

Mordin resumed his work, tapping at the controls of the machine, a solid wall of thorns pointed straight back at her. She needed to smash a wrecking ball right through it, but not utilizing the usual Shepard method of demolition. Another tack, then. After a minute passed, Shepard sucked in a quick puff of air by way of warning the salarian she intended to speak.

"You were an important member in the STG." She molded the words into a neutral statement and leaned forward, forearms across her thighs, fingers laced. "The powers that be wouldn't give such a massive and sensitive project to just anyone." She cocked her head a little to look up at him without lifting her head.

"Trusted with most challenging projects." Mordin nodded, a quick, stiff movement. "Genophage modification project …" He took a breath worthy of inhaling the crisp, sweet chill of the first snow. "... the best time of my life. Unsurpassed intellectual challenge, camaraderie: debate, argument, inspiration." He paused to take another noisy, nostalgic breath, then shook his head. "Galaxy's most difficult problem. Needed to get it right. Millions of lives in balance. Unlimited resources provided."

Shepard shifted a little, drawing a quick, unsettled glance from the scientist. "Was it just a difficult scientific riddle?" Holding her breath, she offered silent prayer that he'd keep talking rather than shutting down. "Did you weigh the consequences to the krogan culture … to their population in your risk versus reward calculations?"
Mordin snapped back into his previous rigidity. "Genophage medical, not social. Current krogan situation a result of krogan choices. Refused to surrender during rebellions, splintered after genophage, cloistered females … saving them from krogan violence and greed, chose to leave Tuchanka ... become mercenaries."

"Yeah, they did." She sliced the heavy air between them with a bladed hand. "But what about the females? What about their hopelessness? What about millions mourning for pups who didn't get a chance to take their first breath? You're trying to tell me there isn't a gram of regret in your soul? No sorrow for their pain?" Unconvinced, Shepard cocked her head toward one shoulder, a half shrug. "As much as you'd like to paint yourself in that light, I'm sorry, Mordin, I just can't see you as the frozen-hearted scientist." She waggled her head. "Well, at least, I can't since I stopped chewing nails and spitting tacks."

The salarian's brow pulled down, his eyes narrowing: no doubt trying to parse what she'd said. After a second, he shrugged off the confusion. "Not frozen." Trading indignant for professional, Mordin let his arms drop to his sides for a second before he twisted his fingers together. "Require distance to see problems clearly. Examine data, formulate hypotheses, test, examine new data, adjust. Emotion interferes … obscures the truth."

Tugging her mouth off to one side, she lifted a dubious eyebrow. "Maybe, or maybe emotion adds an inconvenient layer of truth?" Leaning back, she propped her ankle on her opposite knee. "Did you ever visit Tuchanka to see the effects of your work?"

"First mission on Tuchanka, tested modification on small sample of krogan population. When results positive, deployed planetwide." He turned to face her, his back pressed against the table. Unconsciously, his arms locked down across his chest. "Accompanied deployment teams … returned alone yearly to take samples, monitor birth rates, watch for side effects."

Finally. Shepard nearly jumped out of the chair. Praise be the Enkindlers: a sign of hope. "You needed to see the results of your work, put a face on it."

"Modified genophage technically brilliant …." He spun back to face the piece of equipment.

"But ethically difficult?" Shepard asked, mimicking his statement on the shuttle. Expending effort to keep herself from wincing at her own words, she studied him, searching for clues about the real Mordin Solus. With hope finally peeking through the cloud, she prayed he didn't let her down. "So, you do feel regret?"

"Necessary … " His fingers stilled, hovering over the machine's controls. "... came back every year. Needed to see, needed to watch … to remind myself: genophage saves both krogan and galaxy."

Hand lifting, reaching out toward him, Shepard nodded and wrestled it back under control. "But what you saw didn't look like saving them, did it?" When Mordin didn't answer, she just took a deep breath, her chest expanding, shoulders rolling back, and moved on. She knew all she needed to. "So, how close are we to a cure?"

"Looked over files taken from Weyrloc base. Brilliantly conceived. Excellent, careful—if diabolical—approach. If Urdnot cooperates … synthesize cure within a month." He hesitated again, glancing her way, the darting glance of cornered prey preparing to turn and tear into its stalker. "But krogan not prepared for cure. Still angry, still aggressive. Nothing's changed."

Shepard pressed her lips together, chewing on the inside of her bottom lip a little. "No, sometimes focusing the krogan on peace and cooperation seems bloody-fuckin'-impossible, to quote a certain craggy, old merc." She glanced up at Nihlus when he squeezed her shoulder. "They tried to annihilate themselves long before the salarians showed up, then turned all their violence against the galaxy once the rachni disappeared …." She swallowed and closed her eyes for a couple of seconds. "They remain a threat, so what can we do to neutralize it? Do you have ideas?"

Mordin turned back, facing her, his entire body suddenly energized once more, but tense … carrying an edge so sharp she kept a wary eye fastened on him. "The young," he said as if the answer amounted to a truth so obvious that any idiot should see it. "Grunt and the new generations. Pull them from shadows, integrate them."

"And maybe not just the youngsters." Shepard jumped to her feet, a spark shoving her out of the chair, her heart pounding, mind racing. She strode to the port, staring out into the black. "Give Wrex and Bakara positions on the war council." Raking her fingers through her hair, she focused on her reflection in the glass, then Mordin's from the other side of the room. "Bring krogan scientists into the research department. One cured the genophage for Saren."

"Reassure Wrex about cure," Mordin said, nodding. "Yes. Excellent."

Despite tipping her head a little to agree, she took a long breath and set into a pacing pattern, her mind roaring ahead. "More than that. They need to take a hand in their cure. They need to pull themselves up." As she said the words, they settled, solid and true, in her gut. "They need to stop living in squalor and blaming everyone but themselves for their problems." Turning, she met Nihlus's gaze and held it. He'd stayed silent, but she needed his input. If she ran off the rails, he'd pull her back.

The Spectre nodded. "Wrex will roar up a storm over the last bit, but I think you're on the right track. We can bring a handful of krogan into Archangel—if we can get that many—and set an example others recognize as a viable way out of their downward spiral." Closing most of the distance between them, Nihlus stood just on the other side of Mordin's desk. "We have to bring the females in."

She grinned, wide and excited. "Holy fricking crap, Nihlus Kryik, you're a genius. The shaman totally reached those tank bred krogan where they just attacked Wrex. The females have a power over the males, and it's time they stepped out from beneath their uzlus and took advantage of it. A cured female population under the governance of female chiefs and shamans … they could turn this whole damned thing around."

"When we're done here, I'll go talk to Grunt," Nihlus said, his subvocals sending shivers down her spine. "He's been training with the tank bred and other young krogan warriors." He leaned forward, his talon pads pressed into the desk top. "From the way he and Wrex talk, Grunt commands a lot of respect from his peers."

Shepard grinned, relief making her lightheaded. She'd hated both options: releasing a cure on an unchanged krogan population or refusing to release it. "If the krogan see Wrex and Bakara as their hope for a cure and for a bright future—a process we started before I died—we won't have to worry about security. The krogan will throw themselves in front of a reaper to protect them."

Shepard strode around the table, heading for the door. "Nihlus, talk to Grunt. Mordin, start looking for krogan scientists. If you find candidates, we'll have Archangel contact them." She smacked her palm against the door control.

"And you're headed down to talk to Wrex and Bakara?" Nihlus followed her, his omnitool already glowing above his forearm.

"I am. Mordin, get started on the cure. We're going to drag the krogan into the galactic community even if they kick and scream the entire way."

Wrex sat up when Shepard entered medbay. Hovering over the shaman like an attack varren, he let out a guttural growl and lifted his chin, a challenge without teeth.

Still ready to tear apart all comers. Damn.

Shepard nodded to both krogan, disguising the sigh that slipped out to meet Wrex's aggression. "How are you feeling?" she asked, addressing the shaman. "Any better?"

The female nodded, a deep, formal bow of her head. "I am recovering, Captain, thank you. Dr. Solus has exhausted himself to save my sisters. And myself. He's performed miracles: we all expected to die. He's pulled all of us back from joining the ancestors." She dipped her head a little, weariness bleeding through every movement. "All but one, the oldest of our sisters."

"He prayed over the female who died," Wrex said, cutting the silence left when Shepard didn't know how to reply. "Wished for her to find somewhere better." The clan chief sounded as if hearing Mordin's prayer had shocked him out of his rage at last.

Shepard nodded, but didn't reply. Instead, she strode to Dr. Eis's desk, grabbed the arm of the chair and pulled it across the floor to Bakara's bedside. Sitting, she shuffled it a little closer, wanting to keep the discussion between them as much as possible. "I just spoke to him." She shrugged and held his stare. "Look at the way you reacted to the shaman and the others being taken. You swore to tear the galaxy apart if anything happened to them. We were on our way—dropped everything to rush right to your aid—and you didn't trust me enough to wait. Then you threatened me and Archangel. You're supposed to be the rational voice of the krogan, Wrex." She relaxed, the leather squeaking beneath her. "How can I cure your people when it's all but certain that, within a century, the krogan will be right back at the galaxy's throat?"

Wrex lunged out of his chair. Shepard held her ground, only a tilted head and a cocked eyebrow answering the challenge. She'd gone straight for the throat, provoking him with the worst version of the truth in order to see his reaction; he deserved a chance to gather himself together.

Bakara reached out to grip Wrex's arm, weak tugs urging him back into his chair. "Is Shepard wrong? If the krogan are cured, will they dwell in peace with the rest of the galaxy or will they..."
seek revenge? Will they work to make Tuchanka a home for new generations, or will they burn down the homes of others?"

Growling, a dragon about to spit fire, Wrex lowered himself back into his chair. "Bakara and I will teach them," he said. "We'll show them a better way." Despite sitting, he still loomed, rigid with anger.

Shepard held firm. "And what happens if you and Bakara are killed?" Her hand shot up, nearly slapping his armour. "Once the rest of the krogan are cured, what stops the factions spoiling for war from destroying all your work and moving against you, then the rest of us?" She gave him long enough to consider her words but not long enough to reply. "We need to bring the krogan into the fold; it's that simple. Nihlus is talking to Grunt right now. We need to bring in a dozen or so youngsters—including the vat grown from Korlus—to train with Archangel."

"Welps?" Wrex scoffed, a gross, offensive sound. "They're barely calloused between their plates."

"Yes, which is exactly why they're the perfect choice." Shepard waited for him to connect the dots before saying, "They aren't involved in your clan wars. They hold no fealty to anyone but you. They're blank slates. All they need is training, and can you think of a better message to the rest of the krogan and the rest of the galaxy?" Waggling her head, she continued, "Well, once the war starts, anyway."

Leaning forward, she gripped both of his forearms; his hands braced against his knees. "If you can round up a dozen older warriors to train with Archangel, we'll get them in there, post them on ships. Battlemasters are more than welcome to come in as instructors." She released him, slapping where her hands rested the moment before. Smiling only with her eyes, she sat up, straight and formal, giving the moment its due. "We're inviting the krogan in, Wrex. It's up to you to accept and step up."

She looked to the shaman before Wrex could reply, unwilling to give up her momentum. "I want you, the other female shamans, and clan leaders to rally the females. Your planet needs rebuilding, and it's time the females stopped languishing in despair and started building a new Tuchanka … a new krogan people who are ready when the cure is." When Shepard looked to Bakara, she could see the delight beaming through even from under her uzluk. "We'll supply recyclers and all the construction equipment you need to stop squatting in squalour and get your pups out under the sun. Garrus spoke of the Gikgah of Niraxahk as an excellent, defensible place to base the unified clans. You're already sheltering there, why not repair it, make it a stronghold and a beacon to the rest of the clans?"

Bakara nodded, her entire body radiating conviction even through her weakness. "I will begin the moment Mordin allows me from this bed. Thank you, Captain."

Shepard smiled, a taut press of lips. She wasn't done yet. "Both you and Wrex will have official seats on the war council. You'll be in on every level of the planning, and we need you to speak up. We need you to participate from the point of view of partners, not with the suspicion and anger of the past." She shrugged and leaned back, cocked a little to one side. "That's all history. From right here, right now, we move forward. Agreed?"

Nervous about her ultimatum shoving Wrex away rather than pulling him in, Shepard met his stare, heart pounding so hard her head and arms felt buoyant and tremulous, as if the bones and joints nervously awaited his reply. What she saw pulled a grin out of the dread. He nodded, just a single vertical jerk of his massive head, but the simple movement allowed her to breathe out.

"And the cure?" he asked, no trace of anger or incrimination in his tone.
Shepard leaned into the bed, resting her forearm along the edge. The time for ultimatums over, she transitioned to a softer, heart to heart sort of posture. "Look, fact is, the salarians screwed the krogan over when they uplifted them. The council needed cannon fodder against the rachni. They panicked, and they done fucked it up. They didn't think about what happened after the war. Lack of foresight is not a mistake I want to make."

She watched Wrex out the corner of her eye while addressing Bakara. He remained relaxed, not showing narrow eyes and curled lip: his rage precursors. Time to push on. "We're not looking for cannon fodder." She met and held both of their stares—gold and then crimson—long enough to draw a nod from each. "I want to take our time and make sure that when we cure the genophage, we don't set the krogan up for something worse down the road."

Bakara let out a long, noisy sigh. "You treat the krogan with a respect and generosity we have yet to earn." She pushed herself up, winding herself in the process, and held her hand out to Shepard. "It would be my honour to call you kaluza."

Shepard smiled when her translator gave her the word sister. Surely she hadn't done anything worthy. Still, she took Bakara's hand, meeting the warm, strong grip with a matching one.

Wrex must have seen the blank glimmer behind Shepard's expression because he nodded. "It means sister," he said, then chuffed softly, "and Bakara is right. You and Vakarian have championed the krogan from the beginning, even when I gave you every reason not to. I'll start looking for candidates to join Archangel." He looked toward Bakara.

"Thank you, Captain," the female said. "The krogan won't let you down."

Shepard squeezed the shaman's hand. "I look forward to watching the krogan shine." She turned to Wrex, offering her hand. Instead, he stood and slapped her on the shoulder. Only the support of the bed at her back kept her from hitting the ground. She rubbed her shoulder, then offered her hand again. "Yep, still hurts like hell." Grinning, she shook his hand. "I'll expect you on the ground team for Horizon. There are some things down there you need to see."

"I'll be there," he said, all the sharp edges ground down.

Shepard strode out of the medbay, then glanced up. "EDI, is the general up?"

"General Vakarian is in the briefing room, Shepard," the AI responded. "Would you like me to let him know you're looking for him?"

"No, thanks, EDI, I'll just head up there and talk to him myself." Despite her words, Shepard caught the scent of fresh muffins and detoured through the galley on her way to the elevator.

"Thank you, Mr. Gardener," she called back over her shoulder, then bit the top off the one in her right hand. "Amb der dubishush."

She heard Garrus talking as soon as she walked through the old armoury door. Pausing to listen, she heard Nyreen on the other end, but the walls muffled their words too much for her to tell what they said. She took another big, messy bite of what really was a fantastic blueberry muffin (must be from a mix) and palmed the briefing room door control.

"Judging from intel Nihlus just passed on, we need to prepare for a couple dozen krogan within the next couple of weeks," he said, standing at the center of the darkened room, the QEC grid active. Lights glimmered off of his armour, the floor beneath his feet all but invisible, making him appear to float.
"Quarters won't be a problem," Nyreen said, "but medical and integration could prove to be an issue. Archangel has a large turian population."

He nodded. "And a fair contingent of salarians. I'm aware of our demographics, Nyreen, thank you." He shrugged his 'I don't care how you do it, just do it' shrug. "We need the krogan, and as long as they remain outside the organization, they'll never trust the rest of us. Start now. Prepare."

He chuckled, then glanced behind him, sniffing the air. "We're nearly at Horizon. I'll contact you when we're underway for Feros."

"Yes, sir. Good hunting."

"Wow, C-Sec, you really can float," Shepard whispered, awe dripping from her voice. "I knew there was something special about you the last time we were on Feros. You're magic!"

Garrus chuckled and stepped off the pad. "One hundred percent pure magic." He closed the two metres between them and looked down at her with a cocky grin. "I thought that's why you fell for me."

"You know, it might have been." Shepard grinned up at him as she slipped her arms around his waist. "Damn, General the magical turian, you're intensely sexy when you're generalling. Your people respect you, they're loyal to a fault, and they love you more than the Father of Light loves his diamond tentacle rings." The smile disappeared as she leaned into him, letting out a loud, noisy breath. "You've made yourself one hell of a home on Omega," she said, the slightest tang of regret whispering along the underside of her words. "I feel selfish pulling you away from it."

Shaking his head, Garrus leaned down to rest his cheek against her hair. "Archangel kept me alive when you were gone. It was home because it was your memory." He nuzzled her hair, then pulled her in tight against his side, the calm, sure strength in his arms settling her gut: he'd recovered. "Now, home is wherever you are."

She rested her head in the curve between his keel and arm. "I found my home on the Normandy, curled up next to someone as he read to me." She paused long enough, judging by the fact he stiffened, to let him know about the bad news approaching at FTL. "Since I came back, I've been doubly blessed, and trust me, I know how fragile and rare all of this is." Tightening her grip around his waist, she pushed on. "Rare and fragile enough that I'm not willing to risk it when I don't have to."

"Kahri—"

She shook her head, cutting him off. "I know you want to go groundside on Feros, but you can't risk yourself against reaper tech," she said. Pulling back far enough to meet his eyes, she continued, "Don't worry, I'm extending the same restriction to myself when it comes to the suzerain tech. We can't take the chance they'll overwhelm us. Not until we have a workable defense. Whatever those bastards did to you ... whatever the Enkindler-damned tar spiders are doing to me ..." She shook her head, her hair fluttering around her face. "We're not going to make it worse when we don't have to." Taking a deep breath, she pressed her lips tight. "I'll make it an order if I have to."

When he opened his mouth to plead his case, to refuse to allow his mate and his fratrin take his risks, she reached up to stroke her palm along the length of his mandible, gently silencing him.

"Not because I can't lose you." She shrugged and waggled her head. "Well, not just because I can't lose you, but because you are one of the strategic minds behind this war. You're the hands-on head of Archangel. The war effort needs you." She stepped back and pressed her hands on either side of his keel. "It needs all three of us. It needs Mordin, the shaman, and Wrex, Tali and Legion, Liara
She saw how much he wanted to argue, but also saw the voice in the back of his head—probably speaking with his father's voice—telling him that she was right. When he stepped up after her death, when he'd started Archangel, he'd taken responsibility for everyone under his command. They would survive his loss, but the grieving and adjustment period amounted to time they couldn't afford to waste. The loss of morale if he died might be the end of the war effort.

"Okay," he said at last. "You, Nihlus, and Martin will go after the reaper tech, and I'll go after the leviathan tech." He held out his arms, an invitation back into his embrace. She accepted, closing her eyes as he bent down to press his face against her hair, breathing her in.

After a good thirty seconds, he nodded and nuzzled her ear. "You're right, without us … without Nihlus … the war effort will suffer. Until the rest of the galaxy becomes invested, we've got to fight smart."

Grinning, Shepard kissed his cheek. "You're one hell of a general." She tipped her head behind them toward the door. "Horizon, we can both do. I invited Wrex to suit up as well. He and the shaman are joining the war council." A quick breath and she pulled away, taking his hand to lead him to the door. "I'll explain everything while I suit up."
"Miranda?" Turning to face the Cerberus operative, Shepard cocked an eyebrow. "Come on, I don't have time for drama, just spit it out."

"I have a great deal to discuss that I didn't trust to my reports, Captain, but most of it can wait." She glanced over Shepard's shoulder at the conversation as it ramped up another notch in volume. "I need to discuss Commander Javik before we board the Ypres. He is going to demand to remain on Horizon and that you turn its security over to him."

Regulikar: The Prothean central government.

Senarium - The Prothean government's science branch.

Kepala - The ridges of carapace that cover the top of a Prothean's head.

Gasin (Gasinu - pl) - Prothean male the age of majority. (Dropped from 20 to 13 over the course of the war.)

Takun (Takune - pl) - Prothean female the age of majority. (Dropped from 20 to 13 over the course of the war.)

Tapek Menru - Literal translation: The long defeat. The calendar was started from the date the Citadel was captured by the Reapers but not officially named until 10000 Tapek Menru.

Haksaya kubenar - A term of endearment, literally translates as my strong, true heart.

Cikabeknai - The reciprocal term of endearment for the above. Literally translates to brave love.

Dilan - (turian) Fiancée

79 Days ASR Horizon

Soft but demanding, an australian accent drew Shepard away from where she stood next to Wrex, the pair of them staring over the railing at the Crucible. She grinned at the krogan, his mouth hanging open as he gawked. Turning to face Miranda, the captain sighed softly as she answered the woman's summons. Judging by the operative's furtive glances toward where Garrus and Nihlus spoke with Giran and Javik, Shepard guessed the reason for the hail.

Miranda approached from the elevator, her steps quick, her posture even stiffer than usual. The operative nodded at the captain—a sharp tip of the head—then held out her arm, inviting Shepard to walk away from the others. "If I may speak with you for a moment?"

Shepard nodded, allowing the other woman to lead her away from what sounded like a tense discussion on the verge of leaping past heated to blasting them all with scalding steam. A couple dozen metres away, Miranda stopped, her ramrod demeanour softening just a touch through the lines of concern remained around her eyes and mouth. She looked drawn, saying a great deal about how taxing she'd found the weeks spent on Horizon.

"Miranda?" Turning to face the Cerberus operative, Shepard cocked an eyebrow. "Come on, I don't have time for drama, just spit it out."

"I have a great deal to discuss that I didn't trust to my reports, Captain, but most of it can wait." She glanced over Shepard's shoulder at the conversation as it ramped up another notch in volume. "I need to discuss Commander Javik before we board the Ypres. He is going to demand to remain on Horizon and that you turn its security over to him." Her lips pressed thin, the only sign on emotion on her cold, beautiful face.

"You mean this base or the human colony above it?" Shepard's gut sank. She must have been batshit crazy to leave Miranda here with Javik. Dammit. At the time, she just wanted to scrape off the two biggest hemorrhoids chapping her ass. She hadn't invested any thought into Javik getting into power struggles with a member of the organization devoted to torturing him for two years.

"Both. He believes that without the Alliance providing the colony with security, he needs to revive the protheans on Klencory and bring them here to garrison the planet." She shifted, drifting sideways to turn her back to Javik. "He believes we aren't able to protect the Crucible. He believes it's a weapon of mass destruction we need to not just control, but use."

Shepard inflated her lungs until her breasts pressed against the inside of her chest plate and then held the breath for several seconds before blowing it out. She nodded. "Okay."

Note to self: Don't let Javik get his hands on the Crucible.

She changed tacks. "Are the patients going back with us, or are they okay being looked after in the colony?"

Miranda's brow creased with exactly one and a third wrinkles, but those shallow seams in her calm screamed volumes. Still, she merely clenched her jaw, swallowed, and went along with the topic change. "They're all making solid progress under the care of the colony doctor. Dr. Longbear keeps them in the medical facility at night and then sends them out to help the colony during the day. She says they are integrating well. Probably best to leave them here unless their condition changes."

Shepard nodded, one of the weights balanced on her narrow shoulders lifting. "Excellent. That makes me really happy." A loud exclamation from Javik spun the captain around. "Take a good tactical position until this plays out. Just don't make a move until I actually go down. Let us handle it."

Miranda gave a nod crisp enough to be a salute and turned to walk down the catwalk.

"Captain Shepard? Is this news accurate?" Giran asked. Tashac's daughter looked taken aback by the news of more protheans surviving their race's apocalypse, but Javik's reaction shoved Shepard out onto a narrow, broken ledge.

Shepard stopped, watching the two protheans. She needed to know so much more about them as a people. She needed to spend some serious time with the rachni queen. The way surviving protheans were stacking up, they'd need all the help they could get.

For now, she'd have to figure things out on her own. Well, with Nihlus and Garrus. "Come on, Tashac, help me out here," she whispered, keeping her voice too soft to travel. "Give me some of your prothean intuition instead of a running diatribe about how Javik's the doom of the prothean
"Captain?" Javik called. "Why aren't my people being taken out of stasis?" He sucked in a massive breath making Shepard think of a dragon inhaling to fuel the fires in its belly. "Are they going to be taken to some secret facility and vivisected as I was?" His gold eyes fastened on Miranda's back. "Are they going to be turned over to the likes of that woman?"

The warning alarm at the base of Shepard's skull stabbed down her spine, tangling her muscles into knots. Maybe if she'd gotten to Javik's pod-of-blue-toes-and-bluer-giblets before Cerberus, she might have been able to bring him around.

Why are you thinking this way, Janey? You thinking he can't be brought around? What are you going to do? Ventilate his head or tell him there's a party on the other side of the airlock?

"Nihlus?" she said out loud, nodding him over. Drawing in a long, heavy breath, she braced herself for the ugliest possibility. Then, as her dilan strode toward her, she wondered if Miranda might be better suited to handle the ugliest developments. No, Miranda would blur the lines too much. Hell, if Javik needed to be taken out, and she saw it coming, she'd do it herself. She just couldn't guarantee she'd be looking in the right direction when the bullet flew.

"Jane?" Nihlus's instinctual whisper eased the grip around her throat, the tightness disappearing altogether when he glanced behind him. He saw it as well.

She swallowed and glanced the fifteen or so metres down the catwalk to where Javik and the others argued. "I'm feeling a hair trigger on our prothean commander. This might be Javik's breaking point. Keep him on your LADAR."

Nihlus glanced behind them again, a low rumble rolling deep in his chest. "He's building to a detonation of some kind, and I doubt it will be flowers and candy. He's convinced our reluctance to wake his people means we intend to turn them into experiments." His brow plates lifted, his expression almost keen, as if he wouldn't mind an excuse to just sweep the problematic prothean off the board. "Or that we'll arrange an accident to take out the power supply and simply kill them."

Shepard inflated her lungs with the musty, recycled air, shaking her head as she blew it out. "Yeah, just keep an eye on him." Another deep breath and she nodded toward the others. "Come on, we need to keep moving. We've got a fuck-ton of work to get done and sooner rather than later."

Nihlus stepped up to walk pressed against the back of her shoulder. One corner of her mouth tugged back when he leaned close to whisper, "And a wedding to plan."

Shepard shrugged, her humour warm but with a little nip behind it. "I don't know about that, you still haven't asked me."

"Captain Shepard!" Javik fairly leaped at her as she stepped between Giran and Garrus. "You must release my people from their stasis pods. They are the last protheans. With seven thousand people, I could return our race from the scattered dust and tattered remains of history."

Giran's mouth sprang open, her top lip pulled back … about as outwardly vicious as a prothean could look. Her eyes narrowed, as she spun to face Shepard. "Captain … General Vakarian, while I'm pleased you've discovered more survivors, I would urge caution in waking them."

Javik lunged, his teeth bared as well. Shepard threw herself between them, forcing Javik to shout... over her shoulder at Giran. "How can you speak those words? We are the last of our people … the remainders of a mighty empire destroyed at the peak of its greatness."

Shepard spun to face him. "Stand down, Javik. The whole reason I'm worried about waking them up is all this great and mighty Prothean Empire crap." She stared him down, waiting until his kepala lifted, leaving his eyes unhooded. Once his lips covered his teeth, she moved out of the line of fire, but held his stare. "You're from a people who enslaved the other space-worthy races. If they wouldn't kneel, you beat them down. If you'd beaten the reapers, would victorious protheans be standing above me with their boot at my throat."

The commander's left foot drew back a half step, but he recovered within a breath, straightening and stiffening. "Evolution demands—"

"Evolution didn't save your people then, and it won't save us now. I wish it was that simple."
Shepard shrugged, then winced at the slathered-on layers of snark. Damnit. Snark wouldn't calm things down, no matter how justified or honest. She glanced at Giran to make sure the other prothean wasn't taking offence before latching back on Javik. "While it might seem a position of little power, I've invited you onto the war council, a trust I intend to keep. However, I'm afraid if you're backed by seven thousand warriors, your half of our agreement will fall prey to convenient amnesia."

"Seven thousand of our soldiers will prove invaluable to you in this war," Javik insisted, his voice so tight he swallowed as if being strangled.

"Yes, as they were in helping us win fifty thousand cycles ago." Giran shook her head. "My parents believed the Regulikar lost its way in the last centuries of the war. Creating monsters to rival the reaper horrors and throwing children at their capital ships didn't help us. All it did was cost us our souls." She stepped up, standing so close her kepala nearly bumped his. "Would you use the old ways to win this war?"

"We have time to prepare." Javik straightened to attention. "Our war against the reapers ended before it began when they activated the Citadel. Archangel has resources in the geth and their fleet."

Shepard let out a long, strained hiss, her patience hitting the end of the tracks and careening straight through the buffer stop and down into the gulley. "The geth? I thought I was supposed to blow them all to hell? Our alliance with them was an … " Her expression melted into a wry thoughtfulness, her index finger tapping her bottom lip. "... abomination waiting to blow up in our face and destroy us all."

"I've seen the war you're facing," Javik said, his tone finally losing the condescension, but replacing it with derision. "The soldiers you'd leave frozen have all fought the reapers. Are you so weak that you would turn away our knowledge and experience out of fear?" He lifted himself up, spreading his shoulders, but he might as well have saved his energy. Someone really needed to send Javik a memo to tell him not to bother. He couldn't intimidate her on his best day.

"Afraid? No, Javik, I'm not afraid. Too damned smart to put guns in the hands of seven thousand people who might turn them right back on me in the name of knowing better than the primitive races? Yeah, absolutely. I have too many people counting on me to do anything else." She threw a hand up between them to still his argument. "Enough. This debate won't get us any closer to figuring out what to do." She turned to Giran. "The memories in my head warn me toward caution, but I also hate the idea of leaving so many people in limbo. What are your thoughts?"

The prothean turned and paced to the railing overlooking the Crucible. After a minute or longer, she turned around, leaning back against the railing. "I was raised by parents who told me to hold myself and others to a higher standard, and then trained by a government driven to the point of madness."

Javik sucked in a pointed gasp and stepped forward, bristled.

Giran rushed in to meet him, pushing him back as she demanded, "Do you deny it? Our people had no chance. They fought for hundreds of cycles despite calling the days of the war Tapek Menru: the Long Defeat. We knew it, and yet was retreat ever considered?" Chin jutting out, eyes wide, using force of presence alone, she shoved the commander back when he tried to interrupt. "Did we ever just fill our ships with civilians, scientists, guards, and provisions, and send them out to find somewhere safe beyond the edge of the galaxy? My parents proposed an ark ship program forty cycles before the end, and it was rejected by a government so obsessed with power and so deluded that they insisted our race fight to the last child."

Giran stepped back, allowing Javik space to gather his thoughts. She turned her calm, but earnest stare to Shepard. "My parents had a list of officers in their records. The Regulikar sent out a list to all the bases still able to receive transmissions. It's the leaders of the different sleeper cells and their profiles. My parents highlighted the few they trusted to be the most cooperative with the younger races."

"And what of me?" Javik's words sliced through the air, each one a separate blade.

"They tried to have you removed from the program entirely." The absence of venom in Giran's voice surprised Shepard. She'd expected Giran to mirror the terrifying level of venom Tashac was spitting all over the back of her mind. Maybe she'd better leave Javik to Garrus and Nihlus. Not even the Father of Light could manage the level of almost cannabinoid peace and goodwill it would take to offset the rage trapped inside Shepard's head.

"Javik," she said at last, her voice carefully emulating the aforementioned Father of Light, "Tashac saw everything inside your head and your heart. What she saw there wounded her; she described your joining as torture." Shepard threw up her hands. "The fact you wanted nothing to do with your children was a joy to her: a real, holding your breath and crossing your fingers, relief. If she didn't even trust you to be involved in raising your own children, how am I supposed to trust you with the security of my galaxy?"

Nihlus stepped up, subtly placing himself between Javik and Shepard, but instead of providing a wall of protection, his stance felt as though Nihlus meant to make himself the bad guy, allowing Shepard to remain the face of cooperation. A shrug rolled the Spectre's shoulders back, seeming to brace him as he asked, "What happens when the War Council makes a decision or assigns your prothean troops to an op you don't approve of? What if you don't approve of any of our decisions; could we trust you at our backs then?"

Javik back away a step, his hands twitching as if judging their reflexes and distance to cover. "You never intended to save my people. You're jealous children playing at war. I can't … won't allow you to finish what the reapers began fifty thousand cycles ago." Almost too quickly to see, his particle rifle appeared in his hands.

Shit! Shit! Shit! Note to self: Leave frozen protheans buried under the peas, flank steak, and deluxe pizza.

In her peripherals, Shepard saw both Garrus and Giran moving to stay on Javik's flanks. When Garrus looked to her, she shook her head—they needed to let Javik take the first shot—and activated her overclocked shields.
Holding her hands out away from her weapons, Shepard stepped toward the prothean. "What good are you to your people dead?" She stopped advancing when he raised his rifle. "I have no intention of harming those men and woman in stasis. If anything, I'd move them somewhere more secure to wait out the war. I'd like to make them a part of Archangel, wake them all up and bring them into the fold. Get the scientists integrated into the research department, get the soldiers training with our troops as brothers."

"You're the wild card here, Javik," Garrus said, closing up Javik's right flank. "If Tashac and Merol left a list of people they thought could step up and lead, we'll wake them up and see if they'll work with us. If they're more reasonable than you, if we can get stable, cooperative leadership for the remaining prothean people, we'll bring in the rest."

"But right now," Nihlus said, pushing in on the end of Garrus's statement, his tone hard, his subvocals clearly threatening, "your options are: I shoot you dead, or I shoot you somewhere crippling enough to put you down and after we treat you, you're put back in stasis."

The prothean commander scoffed, the sound so loaded with disgust and condescension it hit Shepard like a boxing glove to the gut. "You're primitives, barely out of your cradles, allowing the memories of the empire's two weakest apologists to guide you into a war you can't even begin to imagine." The gun lifted into high ready. "You should be on your knees begging me to wake my soldiers and lead you forward."

Shepard blocked Nihlus's next words with a raised hand, her eyes never leaving Javik. "That's your last word on it?"

The slight shift in the prothean's posture in the split second before he fired sent Shepard into a roll. She came out of it on one knee, her Mattock in her hands, and before Javik could adjust for her new position, she sent three bullets tearing through his shields and armour. Bright, crimson blossoms burst from his chest. Stars of blood created short-lived constellations in the air as he fell.

Oh shit. Shit, no. What the hell, Janey?

The world stopped. Shepard's breath roared in her ears, the tissue in her lungs crackling audibly as the oxygen flowed through into capillaries, then branching out, further and further, the blood roaring into her brain, the neurons firing, each a tiny nova, a sun dying then being born again in the next instant. And Javik's last bubble of breath hovered, clinging to his face as if terrified to let go and find out what happened next.

Heart hammering in her chest, sweat prickling on her skin, she allowed the moment to hold her, suspended, everything beyond her still, going nowhere while she listened.

This isn't the spiders, is it? No, it's not leviathan. The rachni queen, maybe? Amalair? Please .... I feel it. I know it. This isn't the way forward. If we start fighting within the ranks, it all leads to death. Tell me ... show me the way forward.

And then music poured into her. A familiar, ethereal voice sang, a voice of such exquisite luminosity that it sank deep into the ground beneath her feet and stretched out into every corner of creation. Crystalline and razor-edged, the shards pierced Shepard through, lifting away the body weighing her down. Unlike her experience while escaping the Cerberus base, the rachni song sparked no fear or pain; it simply cradled her, warm waters washing around feet buried in silken sand.

"Altering input parameters to test viability. Accepting new data. Hypothesis uploaded to primary mainframe for analysis."
The computer from Thessia? Collectors? Had the claws of reaper indoctrination finally pierced the protective shell around her mind? Heart racing, she struggled to get loose. Then, out of the corner of her eye, she saw the bubble, the terrible red orb hovering above Javik's face. As she watched, it begin to shrink as if his body drew his last breath back in. The crimson stars dotting the air, slightly darker against his armour, collapsed back into the blossoms on his chest. Mournful song painted over Garrus's horrified gasp in shades of deep, muddy purple.

Wait. Song? Not reapers or leviathan: rachni. "Amalair?"

Shepard allowed the warm waters of the rachni queen's song to wash away the panic. "I know he can be reached. I rushed. I pushed too hard." She closed her eyes, and when she spoke, she reached out to the song laving her in its peace. "It's all so huge, so terrifying, and so impossible. What are the three of us supposed to do against the reapers if I can't even talk one prothean down?"

Laughter bubbled around her, thousands of voices, some large, some tiny and new.

'Sovereign towered in waves of corrupted song and sour taint, each note shattering fleets.' The song whispered in a thousand hues. 'Bringing harmony to the quarians and the geth stretched before you in poisoned shades of blood and hatred, an arid desert singing from torn, violet throats choked with blood.'

Shepard sighed, belying the smile that met the rachni queen's answer. "Sure, throw my victories in my face when I just want to feel sorry for myself." Another sigh. "Okay, fine. I'm not sure what this is … a hallucination or some rachni version of the jedi mind trick, but okay. I need something to reach the tiny piece of decency and hope … ."

Return and discover the answers, genesis child.

The slightest shift in the prothean's posture sent Shepard into a roll. She came out of it on one knee, her Mattock cast aside, and before Javik could adjust for her new position, she shoved his gun aside with one hand. Her free hand gripped the back of his neck. Pulling him down to her level, she pressed her forehead along the ridge of his kepala, she clutched him close to her.

"Remember what you told me just after I took you out of stasis?" she whispered, pressing her mouth against his tympanic membrane. "You told me that you didn't return to help Tashac bring your children into the galaxy because of your shame." She paused to take a long, slow breath, relaxing her muscles without easing her grip on him. "What you were hurt her. In our sharing, I sensed your desire to know a different life … a life free of the hatred and terror that grew inside you until it poisoned every cell."

In the space of a half second and one hissing breath, Javik collapsed in her arms, his gun rattling as it hit the floor, his arms gripping her armour in desperate fists. "Do you know how to create this miracle?" he asked, his voice pressed as close to her ear as she remained to his.

"Maybe. Maybe I do, but it means letting go of your old baggage." She slapped the back of his neck gently and pulled away far enough to look into his eyes. "I want you to see something Tashac shared with me." She held out her hand palm up. "Will you look?"

Javik took her hand.

Brushing Tashac's kepala with his own, Merol smiled and said, "I remember Giran's birth. Do you remember that?" He chuckled and pressed his cheek against her neck. "I believe it angered her that I helped ease Attit into the air before her. The birth-matrons had never seen the like of those little hands pushing from you, Giran pulling herself free from your folds." He sighed and nuzzled the sensitive spot along the edge of her kepala where it plunged down toward her neck. "You always said, protheans were born fighting."

His eyes glistened. "I have spent more than sixty cycles at your side, the only place I can imagine finding happiness. I eased five lives from the care of your body into this galaxy, watched Lulyak deliver two more. Raised seven, beautiful children … loved them all as my own. Each one of them grew up fighting and died fighting, but because of you, they knew more than battle. They knew hope and how to cherish joy wherever they could find it. You taught them to fight for a better life, not just to kill the enemy."

"I have forgotten … allowed the darkness to steal far too much from my mind and heart." Tashac let out a soft sigh, her entire being relaxing into his hands as he stroked her neck and shoulders, thumbs dragging along the ridge of ligaments tying her shoulder into her neck and back. "I have always hated those antecessor-cursed statues on Ilos, their heads cast down, spines dragging so low. An entire race's defeat carved into stone … how my spirit railed against them. And now my spirit bears that same shape."

Merol's hands slipped lower, following the line of her spine. "I know that the Vanguard eats away at you, beautiful mother of my last children. Does it hurt you to fight it? Have you truly reached the end of your strength?"

"She never lost strength or hope," Javik said, his voice a thick croak, the voice of a man too long in the desert. He swallowed and licked his lips, pulling away from Shepard. "Tashac fought their corruption to her end, never bitter, never filled with rage."

Shepard nodded, holding his stare. "You can get there, I know the desire sits inside your heart, festering, pushing at the hate." She clapped her hand down on his shoulder. "Let's start with just a little trust. You don't have to trust everyone, not right away."

"Just you?" His reply managed to leave out the earlier acid-coated condescension.

"Just me." She released him and pushed up. Nihlus slipped a hand under her armpit, helping her up off the floor. "Thank you, haksaya cubenar, my knees are singing your praises for the assist." She frowned, looking around again, something digging in through her temples—almost like the spiders—pushing her to recognize something, but clean, not tainted.

Shepard rubbed her eyes, deja vu scratching deep into her ocular orbits and down her spine, nettles insisting something had happened. Ridiculous. She shook her head and rolled her shoulders.

Sweet baby Jesus, stop being a superstitious idiot and focus on what needs your attention.

"Kahri!" Garrus rushed in, grasping her hands. "Are you all right?" He snatched her in tight against his side. "For a split second, I thought you'd killed him."

"No, but I have the strangest feeling." She shook her head again and wrapped her arms around him, wallowing in his refuge, but just for a second or two.

"Weak apologists," Giran said, a deep rolling growl spiking the words strong enough to pull Shepard back, anchoring her in the moment. Still, the young officer's demeanour felt conciliatory rather than confrontational. "Do you call them so, because they objected to my being sent off to battle before my kepalar ridge closed? Because they protested when you took thousands of children out to battle and came back with a handful?"

Imbued with the wisdom and might of the gods, so righteous in her wrath, Tashac's daughter glided across the deck plating to look out over the Crucible. "Our empire died because a sheltered government clung with trembling hands to old dreams of power, unable to conceive of anything but the lies of glory upon which they were raised."

After long seconds of silence during which Shepard held her breath, afraid to shatter the moment, Giran nodded as if she'd made a decision.

"There may be caches of other sleeper pods spread around the galaxy," she said. "We discovered many similar bases of inusannon personnel. We did not find any alive, but it gave our leaders the inspiration to create our own as well as spurring them to improve the technology. They thought to send millions of our best and most storied into stasis to wait out the war."

Something poked at Shepard, and she nodded. "We've found four bases so far, but it's a hell of a huge galaxy."

"I need some time to research other likely locations." Giran glanced at the chiastyllian gauntlet around Shepard's arm. "Would they know where my people are hidden?" She stepped closer, crowding into the captain's personal space. "They have existed as long as the reapers, they must know much."

Shepard nodded absently, her mind chasing the itch that had poked at her the moment before. "I'm sure they'll offer whatever help they can." She sent a request to the gauntlet, the chia releasing her arm, and then passed it over to Giran. Pacing to the railing, Shepard leaned over, butting up next to Wrex.

"Take Javik and Miranda back to the Ypres, please," she said, loud enough for the rest of the group to hear. "They can settle back into their quarters while I finish up here."

Wrex turned to exclude the others. "Why me?"

Shepard grinned and cocked one eyebrow. "You're an unknown to both. Don't be afraid to be intimidating." A wink sent him on his way, a wide grin on his face.

Once a cowed Javik and a pinched-faced Miranda allowed Wrex to herd them toward the elevator, Shepard returned to her torins and Giran. They were discussing sites of other prothean caches with the chia, so she waited until they all paused and turned to look at her.

Letting the silence last long enough for the previous topic to drift away, leaving the air clean, she cleared her throat and looked to Giran. "You said your people got the idea for putting your people in stasis from the inusannon? And you improved upon their technology?" She crossed her arms, both haste and necessity pushing her toward the prothean contingent. "The beacons too? How much did you learn about what came before you?"

"Yes, we discovered beacons and the stasis cells, but also weapon schematics and a great deal more." Giran's eyes focused on Shepard with a sudden intensity. It burned hot enough to make the captain think some very important link had clicked into place.

"The prothean homeworld boasted a wealth of ruins traced back to a couple of ancient races," Giran continued. "The most obvious one was the inusannon, but traces of another race lay beneath their layer." She wrung her hands, her entire body becoming more charged by the second.

Shepard hoped it didn't result in some sort of detonation. They'd suffered enough of those for one day.

Giran froze, her entire body snapping dead straight and dead still. "What my antecessors discovered accelerated our evolution and technology from very early in our development as a species." She swallowed hard, her expression dropping to one so stricken that Shepard reached out to grip her shoulder. Where had all the excitement gone? What had the takun realized?

Giran backed up a couple of steps, tugging her shoulder free, and turned to her people. "Go fetch the information we copied for Captain Shepard." When only one moved to follow the order, she waved them all off. "All of you. Check the computers to be sure Commander Javik didn't leave any stray code behind. Full infiltration protocols."

Shepard leaned on one hip, patient but eager, as she waited for Giran to reveal her revelation. What if humanity evolved on Mars, the ruins there discovered centuries—maybe even millennia—earlier? How far out into the stars would they have pushed? How different would the galaxy be? How far ahead would they be in their preparation for the reapers?

She chuffed, the grunt punching up her throat. Look how long the asari had possessed prothean tech and how little they'd done with it. Judging by what she knew from Tashac and Javik, the protheans groomed the asari starting early on … where were all the warnings about the reapers? Why hadn't the asari been building instead of embracing eternity for the last several thousand years?

So, yeah … maybe all the knowledge the protheans possessed wouldn't have changed a single Enkindler-blessed thing. The protheans had been caught with their pants and undies tangled around their ankles despite their discoveries. They'd taken all their advanced knowledge and used it to subjugate the galaxy rather than uplifting it. Could she claim humanity would have done any better?

"Captain?" Giran's voice grabbed Shepard by the giblets and dragged her back onto the catwalk.

Shepard nodded, blinking away the thoughtful fog. "Sorry … wandered off there. Go ahead. You looked like you realized something important."

The prothean paced to the railing and back a couple of times, so obviously trying to puzzle through something that Shepard just left her to pace in silence. After nearly five minutes, Giran stopped. Facing Shepard, she said, "I think my people knew about the reapers before they came through the Citadel. What I saw in my parents' memories … the secrets … the lies … all the times they worried about projects launched by the regulikar and senarium … ."

"It was your government trying to prepare for the reapers in secret," Shepard said, sparing Giran the completion of her thought.

"And they enslaved the entire galaxy to do so." Squaring her shoulders, Giran looked down at the gauntlet gleaming around her wrist. "You will help me discover where my people are hidden?" she asked the chia.

"We will." A trickle of sparking light shimmered down the length of the chiastyllian construct.

Giran met Shepard's gaze with one of pure, dear sweet baby Jesus, Enkindler-forged steel. "I will assume command of my people, Captain, and on their behalf, I swear every ounce of knowledge, every piece of technology, and every drop of our blood to your cause." Her eyes looked up toward the surface. "All I ask is when the battle ends, my people are allowed to settle somewhere and discover the one, elusive thing we've never experienced: peace."

Awed into silence, Shepard took the prothean's hands between her own. "You have my word, Giran." She smiled and closed her eyes, rolling them a little at the wash of love and respect flowing from behind Tashac's door. She opened them and nodded toward the elevator. "Come on, I'll get you in touch with the people already searching."

When they stopped to wait for the elevator to return to their floor, she grinned at the prothean's new commander. "Care to visit the Citadel?"

(Thanks for reading and saying howdy. I appreciate your support tons and tons. hugs and muffins)
Across the carriage from her, Garrus cleared his throat, a soft rumble to remind her of his presence. That explained the lack of elevator movement. Someone wanted to talk. A teasing grin tugged at one corner of her mouth. "Lock out the elevator for a second, please, EDI."

Caris - (turian) Beloved, precious, cherished

Pulkar verro - (turian) Beautiful when referring to a male. Handsome, but it goes deeper, referring to the beauty of spirit as well. Used within a close relationship. (Father, son, husband)

Verro - Husband, male bond-mate.

Derra - Wife. Female bond-mate.

Haksaya kubenar - A term of endearment, literally translates as my strong, true heart.

Cikabelknai - The reciprocal term of endearment for the above. Literally translates to brave love.

Dilan - (turian) Fiancée

Tussat silk is extremely soft but hardy, making it the favourite material for clothing, linens, and upholstery.

80 Days ASR (en route to Feros)

Shepard leaned back against the elevator railing, the heels of her hands braced against the cold metal. Even after the hours of getting Javik, Giran, and Giran's aide settled aboard, Shepard couldn't shake the odd feeling of déjà vu that wasn't déjà vu. The moment she experienced on the planet felt like when a name got stuck on the end of her tongue: as if she should remember, but every time she grabbed for what took place in those seconds, it slipped between her fingers.

Stifling a yawn behind her hand, Shepard looked at the control panel. She should be heading for the crew deck to debrief Operative Lawson. Except that if she sat down in the chair across the desk from all that superior genetic attitude and condescension, and that perfectly plucked right eyebrow —maybe it didn't even need to be plucked, Miranda might have been born with perfect eyebrows— cocked just so, and Miranda stood, leaning on one hip in the way that naturally drew all eyes to her ass .... Yeah, Shepard couldn't be held accountable for leaping across the desk and choking the living shit out of the Cerberus operative.

Note to self: Get some damned sleep and lose your inner homicidal maniac before debriefing Miranda.

She stared at the controls; something about them felt off. What? Oh, right. The little light wasn't blinking its way up through the decks.
Across the carriage from her, Garrus cleared his throat, a soft rumble to remind her of his presence. That explained the lack of elevator movement. Someone wanted to talk. A teasing grin tugged at one corner of her mouth. "Lock out the elevator for a second, please, EDI."

She looked up at her husband from under heavily lidded eyes. "What can I do for you, General?"

Her verro shrugged, not reciprocating her teasing. "Javik. What can we do to make him feel involved but keep him separated from his people?"

Shepard sighed through her nose. "We need his military expertise to plan our assaults on the collectors, so we give him a position on the council." She let out another loud sigh, that one carrying a growl on its back side. "But first, we need to completely debrief him." Glancing at EDI’s base in the elevator, she asked, "Can you make us a comprehensive intelligence survey for Javik, please? Just send it to the computer in his quarters."

She turned back to Garrus. "Can you help him with the survey and deal with him until we get back to Archangel?" Affecting a sickeningly sweet, guileless smile, she cocked her head and batted her eyelashes. "Please?"

Garrus chuffed and narrowed his eyes. "Your wiles won't work on me, woman." Still, his mandibles gave a hard, teasing flick as he nodded. "If we get through the survey, I'll set him to the problem of locating and capturing a collector ship." He stepped toward her, expression teasing, but also alight with … what was it? Joy? Love?

Shepard stared at him, her heart beating quick and eager as she tried to decide what it was she saw there. Whatever its nature, it filled her with warmth … and a glow that felt both as ancient as the oldest stardust but also newborn, the bright sprout unfurling its first tender leaf to catch the sun. Then he spoke, his face plates shifting ever so slightly, but enough to break the fragile thread she'd been following.

"I'll deal with our prothean problem if you do me a favour?" he said. He stepped close enough that she'd need to crane her head back to meet his eyes once she stopped chasing that thread, now spider silk on the breeze.

She shook off the moment. Lack of sleep combined with her overactive imagination might just prove the end of her one day. "Oh? And what favour is that?" Shepard's smile twisted toward teasing, heating a little as she met her verro's stare of pure desire. Belly doing somersaults, she took one step closer. "Some trivial little errand?"

Garrus reached up, slowly stripping off his gloves a handful of centimetres from her face. "Very trivial, since we're old, married people now." One talon pad traced the line of her jaw, the sharp point just scraping her skin, leaving a fiery trail that burned all the way down to her giblets. Bending down, he pressed into her until his breath fanned her lips. "Tomorrow morning, I want a block of time with my bondmate, alone in our cabin, all communications disabled."

Lips tugged off to one side, Shepard hummed low in her throat. "Hmmm, let me see what I can do with my schedule. I might be able to pencil you in."

Garrus stepped in, his mouth pressing to hers, his heat envelope swallowing her whole. Blessed freakin' Enkindlers, how had she lived almost thirty years without that glorious warmth? Mandibles brushing her face as he smiled, he kissed her, his tongue flirty but a little shy. "We haven't spent nearly enough time being newlyweds." He pulled back, a teasing glint in his eyes. "That is the word, isn't it?"
She replied with a kiss, sliding her arms around his neck. Clinging to him, she deepened the kiss until they broke apart from necessity, both gasping for breath. Heart hammering, giblets pulsing hard enough she knew his pheromone receptors would be saturated with the scent of her desire, she rested her brow against his. "We haven't had nearly enough of that sort of time, indeed." She brushed the upper plate of his mouth with a soft kiss. "Tomorrow morning, it is."

A low, lusty growl answered that, Garrus lifting her and pressing her into the wall. Mouths millimetres apart, breath shared, he rumbled. The deep, rolling thunder of it reached all the way through her as if he'd found a way to connect their hearts straight through their clothing and chest walls.

"Not a single universe … " he whispered, blue eyes glinting, "... not one reality exists where I don't love you." Their shared pulse pounded in her ears as his brow brushed hers.

Shepard's eyes closed, the elevator light indecent and harsh, words … no, a soul so beautiful deserved a cool breeze casting dancing shadows on the grass of a forest glen. She smiled and nodded. Gentle, chaste kisses eased him back until her feet hit the floor. "You know I'll hold you to that, in each and every one of those universes."

Without moving to break their embrace, she said, "EDI, resume elevator functions." She kissed her husband one more time when the carriage stopped and then the door opened and she backed away. "Sweet baby Jesus, but don't you know how to woo a girl." She blew him a kiss and stepped over the threshold. "I'll see you in the morning, pulkar verro. I love you."

She didn't turn toward her cabin door until the elevator closed and started down, just in case Garrus changed his mind and decided he needed to talk to her or smooch on her some more. When he didn't return, she turned to face the green glow of the latch and took a long, settling breath.

Nihlus had requested the night alone with her, and with both of her torini having been neglected in favour of passing out from exhaustion, she wanted to be completely present in the moment. She opened the door and stood at the threshold, blinking in the low light, trying to decode the cabin's transformation.

"Welcome home, caris," Nihlus said. He stepped out of the shadows down by the couch, his hide and suit awash in the deep pigments of Illium at twilight. He climbed the stairs and crossed the few metres to the door.

"Welcome home, indeed." She smiled, turning away from the light show to look into his eyes. "What is going on in here, Romeo?" Her grin widened as he cocked a brow plate at the name. Letting out a deep, sorrowful sigh, she shook her head. "Even after these years, I try to give you culture, and you look at me like I'm crazy."

Nihlus let out a soft chuff. "Romeo and Juliet, a tragic romance by William Shakespeare." An arched neck and cocky head tilt met her startled grin. He nodded. "That's right, no longer will I be caught by your archaic references, evil woman. I've read Shakespeare," he said, jewel-like glints shimmering in his eyes, emeralds more precious than any mined from the earth.

A sharp, bright laugh escaped as she stepped into him, her arms slipping around his waist. "Even Taming of the Shrew, I take it?"

Wrapping her tight in his arms, he pulled her in, his body warm and solid, his breath soft on the back of her neck. "It was the first one I read." He nuzzled the curve of her neck. "I thought it might be a guide to the 'care and feeding of your difficult woman'."
"Now I'm a pet?" She pulled back, resisting against his hold, merry laughter bubbling just behind an exaggerated expression of shock and disgust. "You are so asking for an assless kicking, Mr. Spectre."

"Am I?" The teasing in his stare turned sultry and he leaned down, resting his brow against hers. "But no, you're certainly not a pet." He nodded toward the steps down toward the bed. "Accompany me. All shall become clear."

Shepard chuckled to cover the nervous flutter in her belly. "Dear lord, Spectre Kryik, you have been studying the bard, haven't you?" She followed him to the top of the stairs, then stopped, a soft chuckle of delight escaping as she looked over his labours. "You recreated the beach on Illium."

Nihlus wrapped his arms around her waist. "This date is missing the sand, but it promises a measure of privacy that the beach didn't."

Taking the steps slowly, Shepard smiled at the blankets laid out over the deck plating, the soft beige folds leading to the fishtank. She paused on the bottom step and tugged him over to face her. "Well, at least there's no chance I'll have to dive into the sea after you, drag you out and give you mouth to mouth." Wrapping her arms around his neck once more, she drew him in until her lips brushed his as she whispered, "Although, now I think about it, I'm a little sad I won't need to give you mouth to mouth."

He shook his head, mandibles spread in a crooked smile. "How many times do I have to tell you that I'm not afraid of the water?" Nuzzling her lips, he lifted her off the stair, swinging her around a half turn, one arm slipping under her backside to support her. "Although, I can pretend I'm drowning if you need to practice that mouth to mouth thing. It'll be a hardship, but I'm willing to make the sacrifice."

Laughter tickled up her throat, the same heady, effervescent feeling that she got from drinking asari sa'illa wine, and she kissed him, her lips caressing his mouth. "I don't think we'll need to worry about having to pretend anything. I've wanted to spend some serious mouth to mouth time with you for days now." She closed her eyes, breathing through parted lips.

Instead of answering her, Nihlus shifted her weight onto his right forearm and raised his left hand to his ear. "Kryik."

Ignoring his distraction, she traced the length of his mandible, her bottom lip dragging along the sensitive hide. When he just kept making affirmative noises into his comms, she retraced the route with the tip of her tongue.

He ducked away from her, shaking his head a little when she followed him, her tongue sliding under the angle of his jaw. Granted, she didn't possess any basis for comparison, but damn, the rough texture, the heat, the slight mineral and metallic tang … she doubted that even a lifetime would tire her of tasting her torini's hide. "Mmmmm," she moaned softly, nipping at the tender spot under the wing of his mandible.

"Stop it," he scolded under his breath before focusing on his comms again. "Yes, that's excellent, thank you."

"Make up your mind," she said and chuckled, foiling his attempts to evade her lips. Swooping in to kiss his neck, she sucked just hard enough to unspool a rolling purr from his second larynx.

"Impossible woman." He rumbled, his hand leaving his comms to smack her backside.
"Hey!" she squawked. Her right butt-cheek stung for a second before warming in a tingly sort of way. "Getting a little rough ther—"

A sharp chuff cut off her protest. "No, sorry, Sergeant, I wasn't talking to you. I'm just trying to deal with an unruly crew member." When Nihlus spoke, his voice came out strained, his subvocals thin. "We're ready any time you are. Thank you. Kryik, out." His hand dropped from his ear, gentle talons wrapping around the back of her neck, his thumb stroking the base of her skull. "That wasn't fair."

"Unruly crew member?" Shepard chuckled and kissed her way from his mandible down to his collar. "You have no idea how unruly I intend to get." She pulled back to grin at him. "And no one said I had to play fair, pretty, pretty princess."

Nihlus released his grip on her, letting her slide down to the floor. "Go shower and dress for our date, pyjak." He leaned down to nuzzle her brow. "I couldn't find the exact dress, but ….

"Dress? Pretties?" Shepard perked up, gaze darting around the cabin. The memory of silk gliding over her skin beguiled her senses, bathing them in those perfect moments on the beach. "You bought me pretties?" She wriggled from his embrace, and spun, searching for any sign of a box or beauty draped from a hangar. "I don't see any pretties. Where are they?" When he just stared, she growled softly and grabbed the front panel of his suit. "Don't hold out on me, old guy! You can't withhold the pretties!"

A soft, rolling chuckle silenced her. "Now that I can squeeze a word or two through the—frankly disturbing—show of avarice, it's hanging up in the head." Raising both hands he shooed her toward the stairs. "Hurry up, dinner will be delivered any minute."

"Pretties!" Shepard hopped up, giving him a quick, joyful kiss before dashing up the stairs and into the head. When the door opened, she slid to a stop, her breath catching in her throat. "Not the exact dress?" she whispered, awe stealing the smile from her face and all the air in the room. "Understatement of the century, old guy. Holy fat house cats dancing around a bowl of milk and meowing their worship of the great pate-covered tuna."

Breath held, hands tingling, she reached out, running her fingers along the gathered folds of the skirt. The moment she touched it, the deep, blood-coloured silk flowed over her skin, like dipping her fingers into warm, still water. Tussat silk. She grinned and glanced back at Nihlus: the turians knew a thing or two about beauty and comfort. Who would have guessed?

She stepped in far enough for the door to close behind her, her fingertips travelling up to the rather low cut, but gorgeously beaded bodice. It would show far too much, but only one set of eyes awaited … one she didn't mind seeing a bit of skin. Slowly, her smile returned, her fingers moving to the zipper on her hoodie.

Stepping around the dress, she stopped, a glint of brilliance on the vanity captivating her. Holy Blessed Enkindlers, such beauty. A short length of what appeared to be a delicate wreath of emerald ivy wound around itself, its length misted with roses of silver and rubies. A soft gasp trailed her fingers as she reached out, trembling digits stopping just short of the miracle that had manifested on the drab steel vanity.

Knuckles rapped on the cabin door, dispelling the magic. Shepard grinned and quickly shed the rest of her clothes. They might well be on their way to another battle, yet more madness and death awaiting them, but for the moment, her Spectre had discovered a way to push the war back behind the door. They both deserved whatever stolen moments of quiet they managed to scavenge.
She showered, taking time to wash her hair with shampoo rather than bar soap. The scent of violets billowed around her, the steam rolling across the ceiling in paradisiacal clouds. The heat and sweet fragrance sang a siren's call that she indulged for a good three minutes before turning the water off and reaching for her towel.

Just as she suspected, the dress slipped down over her bare skin with a delicate, almost intimate caress, serving as a proxy for her torin's hands until the night they swore their oaths. She fastened the necklace around her throat, then threaded the earrings through the half-grown-over holes in her earlobes.

She glanced up, just to check that she was put together before leaving the head, but the woman staring back at her … who could that woman be? Enraptured, she reached out, fingertips pressing against the glass.

"Haksaya kubenar, are you okay in there?" Nihlus called, rapping on the door. "Dinner's getting cold."

Shepard tore her stare from the lovely, young woman in the mirror. Her creamy, pale skin and the faint smattering of freckles across her shoulders and down the long plane of her chest almost disguised the wounds, the entire effect ethereal … like some sort of existentialist painting. The perfect red for her colouring, the dress gleamed in the light, bringing out the ruby roses around her neck and dripping from her earlobes. When she turned toward the door, she glanced behind her, half expecting someone to be standing behind her to cast that reflection, someone lovely in a way she'd never expected from herself.

Is this how Garrus and Nihlus see me? Is this my face … the face of love hidden beneath the masks and the soldier?

'Jane?" Nihlus's voice rose, concern whistling a little as they squeezed out between the tight slats of his second larynx.

She walked the four steps to the door, looking down at her feet as the metal slid aside. Looking up, she met her dilan's stare, her heart freezing at the frank, open … what was it she saw in his eyes? For the second time in less than an hour, her torini had rendered her speechless, the emotional complexity in their stares confounding her.

"You're the most beautiful sight my eyes have ever seen," Nihlus said, his voice hushed, the words spoken under his breath as if he hadn't committed to saying them out loud. His talons reached up to cup her jaw.

Shepard pressed her hand over his. "You really know how to pick the pretties." Standing on her tiptoes, she kissed him. "Thank you, Nihlus. The dress … this jewelry …." She leaned back a little and her fingertips dropping to trace the delicate vine before returning to wrap around his. "it's all perfect, just so beautiful."

After returning the kiss, his mouth moving softly against her lips, he pulled back and lifted a hand toward the lower half of the cabin. "Our dinner's getting cold." One hand wrapped around hers, but instead of moving away, he kissed her again.

Smiling, she kissed him back, her lips savouring the rough hide as she breathed him in deep. One day she'd have to introduce him to the desert, let him take in the sizzling mid-day breezes and cool springs that so reminded her of his scent and taste … or the other way around.

"Our supper?" she whispered against his mouth, one of the wolves hiding in her belly punctuating her question with a snarl.

Nihlus answered with a reluctant moan, the reverberations tickling her lips even as the tip of his tongue caressed her bottom lip. "Suddenly," he said, his words scarcely moving the air, "I've got an appetite for something other than drellak steak."

Teasing the upper plate of his mouth with just the rim of her lips, she chuckled. "We've got all night to indulge your other appetites, but if I don't eat something soon, I'll end up gnawing on you in a very unsexy way." One last, soft kiss and she pulled back, gripping his hand. "Come on, let's eat and just relax for a few hours."

When she reached the top of the stairs, she stopped, her teasing grin softening, a honey-sweet autumn breeze through the poplar leaves. A table stood in the center of the open space, the metal surface covered with a cloth. Tugging Nihlus down the stairs toward his masterpiece, she whistled, love and appreciation gripping her throat too tight to let words pass.

The soft golden glow of the faux candle at the center of the table finally eased the paralysis caging her throat. "Why, Nihlus, you romantic." She squeezed his hand. "It's wonderful, caris." Seeing the place settings across from one another on the table, she shook her head. "There's only one thing wrong with this picture."

He frowned, mandibles dropped, brow plates low over his eyes. Stepping to one side, he stared at the table. "Something wrong?"

She slid one place setting around the corner so they'd be sitting at right angles to one another. "Absolutely. I need to be able to grab hold of you at a moment's notice." A bright chuckle greeted his flustered chuff. "Come on, let's eat." She slipped into the chair, sitting on her calves to bring herself up to a comfortable height for the table. For Nihlus's part, even sitting on the couch, he loomed over the table.

Shepard lifted the lid keeping her plate warm, finding a plate of ravioli and blush sauce. A wide grin and a shake of her head accompanied a heavy lidded glance up at Nihlus. Who knew how long that meal had been kept in stasis, awaiting the perfect moment. Probably since his trip with Sol and Thane.

After the first couple of bites, the wolf in her belly calmed enough for Shepard to watch her dilan. From her perspective, she could still see their date on Illium in the rearview mirror, only a couple of months lying between. But Nihlus … she sighed, the long breath hissing between pursed lips … Nihlus had lived years, his entire life turning upside down more than once in that time.

The funny thing was, she didn't see wear in his eyes, or hardship in the set of his shoulders. Like a blade, the heat and pounding had forged him into something stronger, more flexible. He carried a sharper edge, but precise, a scalpel versus a cleaver. It made for a fair trade, she decided. If Garrus and Nihlus needed her to die to discover their current incarnations, she'd do it as many times as required. Even dragging herself back wounded and scarred. She reached up to caress Nihlus's cheek. He and Garrus, they'd save the galaxy.

"What?" he asked, giving her a bemused sort of scowl.

"Nothing." Stroking her thumb along his mandible, she smiled. "Just loving on you a little, and taking note of the changes since our last date night."

Nihlus nodded, but then motioned to her food. "You'd better eat; I'd like to get through the night without being gnawed on in the unsexy way."
Shepard cackled, her laughter snapping with teasing. "The word gnaw doesn't bring to mind anything sexy, to be honest." She speared a ravioli, snatching it off the fork like a giant snapping turtle, then making gnawing sorts of growls and she chewed.

"That's disgusting." Nihlus rumbled deep in his chest. "And I'm saying that as a member of a people who pretty much swallow their food whole."

Taking that as encouragement, Shepard wolfed down the next three in the same manner, laughter building up behind a thin wall, just waiting for him to put a fist through it.

"Why did I bother with your 'pretties'?" His head sort of drifted from one side to the other, as if he'd already wasted too much energy to even bother shaking it properly. "I could have just grabbed a few greasy rags from a bin in engineering." Taking another, very genteel, bite of his steak, he chewed just long enough to thrust the point home. "You're not teaching our children their table manners."

The bubble of laughter broke, drawing a laugh from Nihlus as well. "Don't worry," Shepard assured him, "my mother will have them well trained. Bunny and I knew how to properly set a table and which fork to use with what course before we could eat out of anything but a little plastic bowl with teddy bears on the bottom."

Whether he intended it that way or not, Nihlus's mention of their children settled Shepard to the business of eating. She'd never really spent any time thinking about bringing kids into the galaxy. It remained too huge and terrifyingly brutal to even consider some tiny person depending on her to keep them safe and happy.

Setting her fork and knife across her empty plate, she watched Nihlus. He'd make an excellent father. Garrus would as well, although somehow she thought the big guy might take more time to get used to the idea. Giving her head a sharp, quick shake, she dragged her mind away from topics that didn't include the battles awaiting them after the pretties were locked away and the cabin returned from Illium, only the view of the stars remaining.

They should be discussing plans for creating a first strike fleet and a thousand other preparations for the war. Had Legion and the chia figured out a way to turn the relays against the reapers? Had Liara had any success discovering more about the suzerain, or weapons for the war? They had prothean archives on multiple planets to translate and mine for inform—

In the fifty years since they discovered the prothean archives on Mars, humanity had translated only the tiniest shred of material housed within. But—

She looked up at Nihlus. "By the Enkindlers' four sets of giblets, Nihlus, we have protheans. Actual live protheans, and a fair number of them."

The Spectre froze for a moment, then nodded. "Not at dinner, but yes, we have live protheans." He lifted his brow plates, clearly confused but hopeful. "Lucky us?"

Shepard snorted, knotting up her brow. "You poop, of course not at supper, but … " She held up her left hand. "... we have protheans." She lifted her right hand. "And we have untranslatable prothean archives." A grin spread across her face as his mandibles dropped, wide and slack.

"Why haven't we thought of that before?" Nihlus asked. He peered at her plate. "It was the magical brain ravioli. We need to feed you that more."

Shepard laughed. "EDI, I know you're pretending not to listen, but can you tell the general about my little epiphany?"

"I'll contact General Vakarian immediately, Captain. Anything else?"

"Nope, just go back to pretending you see and hear nothing." Scowling a little, Shepard lifted her fork, dragging a tine through the sauce on her plate. "EDI, just a second. I do have another question."

"Of course, Shepard. What can I do for you?"

Looking up into Nihlus's green eyes and holding that quizzical gaze, Shepard let out a long breath. "If you had a choice, would you prefer to be able to turn off your spyware and give us our privacy?"

"Behaviour blocks prevent me from taking that action."

Shepard pushed away from the table and stood. "I understand that. Let's run it as a hypothetical exercise. If those behavioural blocks weren't there, would you prefer to avoid spying on people? If Nihlus and I were to get nekkid later and rub all up on one another, would you prefer to turn off your audio and visual sensors in this cabin?"

"Hypothetically." EDI's holographic form appeared on her pad inside the door. "the members of the crew seem to value privacy under certain situations, most including nudity. Since one of my primary goals is a harmonious relationship with the crew, yes, I believe I would appreciate the ability to modify my input sensors to activate only." The hologram fluttered through a few cycles before she continued. "In case of emergency."

Shepard turned to face Nihlus to discover the turian had moved the table over beside the bed. He stood with his hand held out, gloves gone, talons trembling ever so slightly. Oh, damn. She crossed her arms and cocked her hip. "What?" She popped an eyebrow and shrugged. "What? Do you need something?"

Nihlus cursed under his breath. "EDI, might we have our pretend privacy again, please?"

"Logging you out, Spectre Kryik."

His hand still held out toward her, talons still trembling, Nihlus stepped toward Shepard. "Come and sit on the sand with me."

Looking down at her feet, Shepard wriggled her toes in the blanket. "Ohhh, I get it, you want to get to the rubbing all up on one another nekkid parts." Laughter bubbling inside her chest, she pressed her lips together in a skeptical frown and cocked her hip a little further. "Yeah, can't say I blame you." She popped her arms out to the side and spun. "I mean, look at me in these pretties. Who wouldn't want to get all up on this." Another cackle, merry and soft. "Oh, right, Mr. Romantic Spectre wants our first night to wait."

Nihlus clapped a hand over his mouth, the other around his belly. "Spirits, I'm going to ... " He heaved a couple of times. "... too late, I threw up in my mouth." Lunging forward, he grabbed her wrist and pulled her toward him. "Get over here, impossible woman."

Heart racing, the elcor ballet troupe kicking the wolves out of her belly, Shepard forced him to tug on her every millimetre. "Why, sir, puh-lease, you're so forward," she exclaimed, fanning herself with her free hand. "Before I succumb to your obvious charms, I need to know your intentions, Mistah Spectah," she protested, her inner damsels-in-distress apparently hailing from somewhere deep in the southern United North American States.
Nihlus released her, his talons moving to the stays on his tunic, the beautifully embroidered, deep red panel falling open to reveal his usual neatly tailored white shirt. "My intention is to stretch on our very unusual beach, get comfortable, talk, and watch the stars."

Shepard stretched one foot out in front of her, dragging her bare toes back and forth over the blanket. "I don't know. I didn't really dress for sitting in the sand."

With a quick snap, a flourish, and an exaggerated bow, Nihlus spread his jacket over the faux sand, then held out his hand once more. "If I may, lovely woman?"

Slipping her hand into her dilan's, Shepard squeezed his talons, expressing her love and trust in the truest way she knew … in the way her heart demanded. "Why, kind sir, that sort of flattery will get you … " She fanned herself again, a shy smile hiding as she ducked her head. "... well, just everywhere."

Nihlus helped Shepard down onto his suit jacket, the blood red tussat silk petal-soft under her bare thighs. At least on their private little beach, she didn't have to worry about displaying her underwear to the entire planet. He lowered himself down onto the floor next to her. Eyes drifting closed, he let his head fall back. She watched his throat moving, chest expanding with his breath.

Despite everything he'd been through, she still saw that same fire that terrified her at first. Only now, it simmered beneath all the painfully fought for wisdom, the scars shining through not as weals or as some sort of unsightly disfigurement. No, Nihlus's scars gleamed like the stars showing through the port above their heads; light in the darkness.

"Dear spirits, you're beautiful," she whispered, the words bullying their way out past her stunned teeth and hungry lips. Damn, but didn't she need to kiss him?

Remember that night on Illium, lying back to look up at the sunset, closing your eyes, terrified he'd lean over you and kiss you?

He smiled, her torin, but didn't move or lift his head.

"The last time we sat on the beach, I thought of you as a wildfire, a blaze so out of control that you'd burn me up and leave nothing but ashes in your wake." Drawn, the tides reaching for the moon, her fingers crossed the centimetres between them to caress his neck.

Nihlus's eyes closed. "And now?" He leaned into her touch, his hide cool beneath her fingertips.

Shepard pulled her hand back, holding her fingers up in front of her face. Her boys being cooler than her, well, it tossed her world on its head, but the cherry-red, high-blood-fed glow of her fingers explained it. Arousal. She felt Nihlus's gaze on her, and turned to meet it, her belly trembling with equal parts nerves and desire.

Lying back, she stretched out on her side, facing him. "Lie down with me." Even as she asked him to join her, she reached up on the couch, pulling down one of the pillows, so he'd have some padding between his plates and the floor.

Nihlus tucked the pillow under his arm and reclined on his side. Once he settled, he met her gaze with a steady one. "So … and now? Do I still scare you?"

"Sweet baby Jesus, that digs right into the heart of it, doesn't it?" She reached out, pressing the pads of her fingers against his mouth's top plate. Running her top lip between her teeth, she stroked his mandible with her thumb. "Nihlus, I was never afraid of you. You acted like a mirror, reflecting back all my fears."
Shepard dropped her hand and rolled over onto her back. Closing her eyes, she said, "I laid out like this after you told me about Saren, and I imagined you leaning over me: your keel pressed against my side, your breath warm on my face."

Nihlus leaned in a little, his voice heavy and rough, gravel rolling down a shallow slope as he asked, "Did you imagine me kissing you?"

She started a little, opening her eyes to see if he was making fun of her, but the stare that met hers betrayed only love and curiosity. "Yeah, I did, and then I panicked. I knew that you'd burn me up, because you were right, cikabeknai." Reaching out she waited for him to take her hand.

"How was I right?" Calloused talons wrapped around her hand, her palm nesting in his larger one.

Hands held up, she focused on her thumb as it traced the border of the plates on the back of his wrist. "That night after Therum, when Garrus fell asleep babysitting me, you asked me what pulling the seduction ploy on Harkin cost me. I said it didn't cost me anything, that I decided what I allowed to cheapen me, and the pantomime with Harkin cost me nothing." She squeezed his hand. "And it didn't. None of them did, because I didn't have any me to lose."

Nihlus squeezed her hand, then let go and sat up, moving the pillow over next to her. "You know I was just jealous? I'd loved you for so long, and then there you were, pissing me off on the tail of Saren. I lashed out." Lying on his side, he draped himself over the pillow, propped up on his elbow.

Eyes still focused on the stars, Shepard took his hand again. "I know, but you were right. I was giving myself away, not to Harkin or the other marks, just in general. I was a blank slate, you know?" She drew his talons to her lips, kissing each one. "I was the brutalized drug addict, orphan, barely survived Mindoir, took to the streets, saved by Anderson and the Alliance. I became the hero of Elysium, then an N7, Commander Shepard … Captain Shepard."

She hugged his hand against the bare skin of her chest. "It was all a pantomime until you and Garrus, and the Normandy. I worked." Glancing at him, she smiled. "I worked and when one job was finished, I started another. There was only Commander Shepard, no Jane … no haksaya kubener, no Kahri. All of them came into being when you came aboard the Normandy. That's what I was afraid of, cikabeknai … that if I allowed that wildfire to burn all that away, there'd be no one left."

"Close your eyes," he whispered, leaning over her, those emeralds against the starfield reflecting her image, the beauty she'd seen in the mirror. "Close your eyes." Chuckling, he nuzzled the end of her nose. "Trust me?"

She closed her eyes, her heart racing, but not from nerves. The elcor gymnasts put away their mats and pommel horses, settling to watch. "With everything I am, Nihlus. With our entire future."

His keel pressed into her side, the pressure painful where the old wounds sliced through her flesh, but she pushed into it, holding their bodies tighter together. And then his breath puffed against her face, sweet … so sweet with the scent of the soda he drank with his dinner.

"I will never be the first to ask you this question, never be the first to swear you my oaths of bonding, never the first to swear my soul to yours, but I was the first to love you, all those cycles." He nuzzled her lips, lifting just far enough to break the kiss she tried to form. "I can't stop this war, but I would if I had the power. I'd spare you those you've lost and those you will lose, Jane."

She felt him pull away a little, leaving her side cold, barren feeling, her arm numb without his heartbeat thumping against her bicep. "Nihlus?" Reaching up without opening her eyes, she traced the contours of his face, her fingers trembling … still so unused to emotion … to the intensity of everything he and Garrus made her feel.

"All I can swear is to do my best to honour our bond, so …" He cleared his throat. "You lie, in faith; for you are call'd plain Jane, and bonny Janey and sometimes Sheppard the curst; but Jane, the prettiest Jane in all the galaxy. Jane of Normandy or Ypres or Spectre, my super-dainty Jane. For dainties are all Janes, and therefore, Jane, take this of me, Jane of my consolation; hearing thy courage praised in every colony, thy virtues spoke of, and thy beauty sounded. yet not so deeply as to thee belongs, myself am moved to woo thee for my wife." (1)

Shepard opened her eyes as he sucked a deep breath, winded by the relentless punctuation of Shakespeare. "Are you asking me to marry you, Nihlus Kryik?" The elcor got up off the floor of her belly, but instead of gymnastics or ballet, they began to tango.

"Are you saying you will?" As he asked, the entire galaxy froze for an instant, even the air refusing to move until she replied.

"Of course I will." The words rushed out on the spring breeze of her exhaled breath. She nodded, grinning up into his eyes. "That was quite the transposition of the bard, cikabeknai."

He kissed her, mouth joyous and light as it moved over hers before he drew back, just far enough to whisper. "Well, you're my difficult woman, after all."

Taken and transposed from The Taming of the Shrew, William Shakespeare. Published in 1623 in First Folio.

A-N: So, here I am at last with a chapter of FI again, a nice quiet moment between storms. I've decided on advice to focus on this story for awhile, a month or so. So yeah, that's the plan. I'll still write the other stories if I get a yen or a scene pops in, but let's face it, this story is where I've expended the blood and sweat over the years. Hope you enjoyed the chapter. I had great fun giving these guys their moments. hugs and Cadbury Mini Eggs to all
Ribbons of colour tangled around them, bursts of puala fruit and then sapara sugar, tart and sweet in turn: the first a spring-green coupled with a low, sonorous note, the second a vivid pink-red, its pitch so high it vibrated through Nihlus's teeth.

"Amalair." Shepard's delighted thought brushed his mind, her brilliant, shimmering blue sweet and strong and filled with music. "It's Amalair."

Fratrin - Brother, but one of honour, friendship, or of oath rather than one of blood relation. Refers to the bond of karirfratrus.

Mabul - The turian equivalent of the expletive 'fuck'. Mabulan is the equivalent of the -ing version of 'fuck'.

Lautus - (turian) cocky, arrogant, and/or self-important. Concerned about self-image.

Soluvermus - A small (average size 8-12 cms/1-2 cms diameter), heavily armoured earthworm native to Palaven's more northern and southern regions.

Stulti mendur - Literal: foolish lies. Vernacular: Bullshit. Short form: Stulti

Tarc - Vulgar expletive equivalent to shit.

Verro - Husband, male bond-mate. Dilan - fiancee

Caris - Beloved, precious, cherished

81 Days ASR

Nihlus didn't often dream, although according to Shepard he spent most of his sleeping hours twitching. Perhaps he just forgot more than ninety-nine percent of the dreams that haunted his nights. Just as well, he didn't need to relive his past, his failures, or his fears while asleep; they consumed far too much of his life while awake.

That night, warm waves of love and belonging washed over and cradled him as he descended into the black. Soft notes of song swirled around him, a symphony of colour, scent, and taste. A weight pressed in against his chest, soft and comforting in his arms. When it shifted, he realized he still held Shepard in his arms, their bodies entangled just as they'd been when he fell asleep.

Ribbons of colour tangled around them, bursts of puala fruit and then sapara sugar, tart and sweet in turn: the first a spring-green coupled with a low, sonorous note, the second a vivid pink-red, its pitch so high it vibrated through Nihlus's teeth.

"Amalair." Shepard's delighted thought brushed his mind, her brilliant, shimmering blue sweet and strong and filled with music. "It's Amalair."
Before he could define all the nuances of his dilan's essence, a decayed yellow, bitter and putrid, sprang out of the restful shadows. Writhing serpents of rot wrapped around them, tighter every moment. Shepard groaned, a low sort of mewl, and writhed in his arms. Perhaps she tried to rouse herself from sleep, struggling to escape the dream's grasp.

"Amalair?" He leaned in to nuzzle his dilan's ear, driving back the terror gnawing at his heart in order to comfort his caris. Looking up, he searched for the rachni queen, shouting into the maelstrom of colour, stench, and sound. "What are you doing? You're hurting her! Stop!"

A cool, blue-green light exploded through the dreamscape, replacing the sour decay, and for a moment, jewel-encrusted, glowing caves appeared around them. Vaulted, naturally formed citadels, the caves rose so far overhead that they disappeared into the hazy luminescence. Ancient, thick roots crawled down the walls, gnarled pillars of life decorating the walls.

"It's a cathedral," Shepard whispered, breaking free of Nihlus's grip. She pointed toward a high shelf of rock and the being standing at the edge, indistinct amidst the glow. "Rachni. It's their home." Tilting her head back, she took a deep breath then shook her head. "But we're not on Ilos. I can't feel any trace of the protheans or inusannon."

A soft, khaki coloured note that smelled of good, clean soil and tasted of spice drifted down on them, but the song echoed in a voice that Nihlus didn't recognize. In fact, he couldn't pick individual voices from the chorus, each so perfectly timed and harmonized that they sang as one. A million, million shades of song built and resonated, and he knew Shepard spoke true: they didn't dream of Ilos.

The cave before them—a cathedral far grander than even the asari temples—belonged to a more ancient time, a time before the first protheans hunted on their home planet ... no, even older ... a time before—

"The reapers aren't anything more than an idea," Garrus said, his voice excited with epiphany, but his subvocals resonated low and as ancient as the cavern: the voice of an oracle. "The rachni existed even before the reapers."

His fratrin's presence felt so natural within the dream that it took Nihlus a moment to register the anomaly. He normally wandered his rare—usually nightmarish—dreamscapes alone.

The khaki-coloured song turned a sharp, silver-blue as the voices rose, the frequency lancing along each nerve fibre, spurring his entire body to sing to its tune. He felt the same warble and trill resonating through Shepard's flesh where they touched. She stepped away from Nihlus, walking so close to the ledge's lip that she stood upon its breath.

"It's not Amalair's hive," Shepard said, "but her ancient ancestors'." Holding out her arms, a fledgling who believes it can fly before its feathers have grown in, she threw her head back as if she could absorb the lessons of the past through her skin. "Why did you bring us here?" She shook her head and then dropped her chin, her head cocking as it did when she puzzled through some auditory riddle. He wondered if she heard something in the music, or if what grabbed her lay beneath it. "Why sing of this?" Her voice plucked a frantic sympathetic note within Nihlus as she continued, "Why these riddles? Are we supposed to learn something?"

Nihlus shivered, a single, piercing note of the putrid yellow shattering the glow. The soured song corrupted the citadel, beautiful blue-green diseased, the good rock and roots decaying, flesh sloughing off their bones. Creatures swarmed into the cave, their twisted forms unlike anything he'd seen before, but definitely reaper-ized.
Forgetting that he remained submersed in a dream, Nihlus leaped to the edge and looked down, trying to gauge how big a jump it would take to get into the fight. Too far. Too mabulan far. Shepard grabbed his hand, clinging to him as the reapers swept through the cavern, a blur of horror as they killed or captured the rachini. The beautiful cave dissolved into poisonous ruin.

"Failure to purge rachni infestation." As it spoke, the sonorous voice wiped the slate clean, the cave cathedral-like in its beauty once more but different: rebuilt rather than restored.

"The next cycle," Shepard said, her voice crystalline, rising clean and strong into the invisible heights of the cave.

"What is she trying to show us?" Garrus asked, joining them at the edge. He tipped his chin toward the high ledge opposite them, the queen still there. Perhaps it was Amalair.

"All queens sing the same song, the harmonies ageless and pure, sung to their daughters safely curled in their eggs ... their beautiful daughters." Even as the queen's eerie, layered voice echoed through Nihlus's head, the decay swept through once again. Different than the ones from the cycle before, the monsters remained easily recognized as reapers.

The queen's voice dripped acid-reds, and deep green-black as she continued, "The daughters carry the knowledge forward and back, all connected ... life shifting, ever-changing."

"It's all webs," Shepard whispered, drawing his stare to her face. The wounds gleamed red, her skin a pale blue and translucent in the light. "I understand, at least a little. All queens share all the knowledge; a well so deep it circles back on itself. The rachni don't see time the same way we do, because their past and their future is all known through their mothers and daughters."

Nihlus arched a brow plate, his confusion manifesting as a shadowy fog drifting before his eyes. "They know the future? How?"

Before Shepard answered, the deep, terrible voice spoke. "Rachni infestation remains," it repeated, the cave resetting, but different once again.

Faster and faster, the cycles passed, all basically the same. Sometimes other races helped the rachni fight the reapers back, and sometimes the rachni left behind their peaceful songs to become warriors and build great armies. Each time they fell, their civilization falling to rot and ruin. At the end of each cycle, the same voice declared the rachni infection remained unpurged.

"They're like a computer worm that replicates and disappears into so many computers that you can never completely chase it down and eliminate it," Garrus said, his voice expressing the same respect and dread Nihlus felt. "They might be the oldest living memory in the entire galaxy, contemporaries with whomever created the reapers."

Shepard grinned up at Nihlus even as she reached out to grip Garrus's hand. "Why do the rachni stay?" Shepard called out, her attention riveted back on the distant queen. His dilan's body angled over the void, as if she could will herself to the other side. "Surely you have the technical capability to leave this galaxy, go somewhere the reapers can't tear down everything you build and send your people to the edge of extinction."

A cheery sound manifested as a rainbow of soft, transparent colours, ringing defiance above the rot and death of another reaper harvest. Nihlus compared the experience to hearing the crystal bells ring out from atop the Temple of the Ancients in Cipritine. Even having experienced Amalair's presence in his mind, it took Nihlus a couple of moments to recognize the sound as laughter.
"We wait," that impossibly huge voice answered.

"For?" The question spilled from his mouth before Shepard could voice it, earning him a cocked eyebrow and a crooked grin.

"You."

A shrill cry of alarm shattered his curiosity, his demand for clarity dying before making it through his larynges. Images, colours, sounds, and smells tore through his senses far too quickly to assign a name to any of them, but when the deluge faded, his sinuses and behind his eyes burned as if he'd inhaled caustic gas.

Nausea flowed into the vacuum left behind, leaving Nihlus reeling. A wall of murky green-browns seethed with veins of noisome black, his olfactory system drowned in rot … the sweet stench of fruit and the indescribable reek of decaying flesh. He gagged, his stomach tying in knots and shoving its way up his throat.

Swallowing so hard that it echoed inside his skull, Nihlus nearly missed the queen's distressed cry. "The needle-men call! They sing your desires to lure you through blighted seas and gnashing jaws, but the notes ring holl—"

The cave vanished into a comforting half-darkness, the song into the throbbing hum of life support equipment and engines, the crisp fragrances of mineral and water into the familiar spice and flora of his dilan and fratrin. Body weighed down by sleep, Nihlus kept his eyes shut tight against the disappointment of waking. What did the queen mean when she said the rachni had been waiting for them? Not possessed of enough arrogance to believe that the queen meant only him, he wanted the chance to press for more. Why would the rachni wait for millions of cycles? How could they know three such disparate people would come together? Did what the queen said mean they'd win … defeat the reapers at long last?

Tarc, they needed to go back.

Shepard shifted in Nihlus's embrace, scattering his thoughts. She stretched long and lithe, an ungentira rousing. He clung to her. Just a handful of moments longer, dear spirits, why could the universe never allow them that much?

One of Shepard's arms wriggled free of his grip—leave it to his impossible woman to insist they wake … what time was it, anyway? She yawned, stretching again before, "Yeah. Shepard." In the space between heartbeats, her breathing changed from the calm of sleep to alert. "When?" She paused long enough for Nihlus to scent alarm even as her body tensed and her heart began to race. "Right, we'll be down in the briefing room in ten. We'll need Mordin and Dr. Chakwas to meet us there." Another pause, during which she twisted loose enough to get an elbow propped up under her. "Right. Shepard, out."

Nihlus groaned and flopped over toward his back. "What time is it?" Judging by his eyelids' complete lack of interest in opening, they'd been in bed fewer than four hours.

"Too early," Garrus replied, a long growling groan rolling across the bed. "What's going on?"

"Miranda. The Illusive Man is waiting on the QEC. There's news on the collector ship front." She leaned over Nihlus, her scent sweet, her skin warm as she kissed his temple. "Up you get, lazybones." After tickling his cheek with the tip of her nose, she disappeared.

"Fine." He forced his eyes open, his mandibles fluttering when he saw Shepard draped across an inert Garrus, jabbing him with her elbows and knees as she climbed over.

"Ouch, dammit, woman, your elbows aren't exactly pillows," the general said, his complaint prompting evil cackling from Shepard.

"Then get up before I have to crawl over you." She kissed Garrus, a loud smack of lips against his cheek, then jumped up and dashed for the head. "I need to pee, and you were between me and the toilet, General Slugarian."

"How long have you been saving that one up?" Garrus asked, humour-filled subvocals belying the crankiness of his words.

Shepard spun around at the top of the stairs, jogging backwards toward the head. "Since you refused to read to me using different voices for the characters. You'll pay for that one for the rest of ever and always." She reached up to her ear as she turned back around. "Hey, Jack, get your gorgeous ass down to the briefing room in ten minutes. Bring your very best behaviour and your most intimidating snarl. See yah down there. Shepard, out." As the door whispered shut behind her, his Jane began to sing under her breath. "My captain's back, and there's going to be trouble. Hey la, hey la, my captain's back."

Garrus cursed under his breath, pulling Nihlus attention to the other side of the bed. "If I ever go back to C-Sec, remind me to pencil in a law about being cheerful too early in the mornings." He yawned, smacking his jaws a couple of times as he stretched. "Praise the spirits that Shepard manages to wake up grumpy most days."

Nihlus chuckled and rolled less-than-fluidly to his feet, staggering a little when he straightened. Dear spirits, who replaced all his cartilage with the crap that built up in dark alley corners? Judging by the chorus of crunching and crackling that travelled the length of his body as he stretched, the responsible parties had clocked some overtime. Every vertebrae in his spine snapped like someone dancing on bubble wrap.

"Getting old, Spectre," Garrus said, grinning up at Nihlus from the flat of his back: a new position allowed by the turian mattress, the depth enough to cradle their cowls and spines comfortably. As if the general could read Nihlus's mind, he stretched again, letting out a long moan of contentment. After another moment, he swung up onto his feet in one, smooth motion—no doubt for Nihlus's benefit. The impact lessened ever so slightly when one of Garrus's hips popped loud enough that Shepard hollered from the bathroom, asking what happened.

"Garrus was trying to be lautus and hurt himself," Nihlus supplied through a taunting little chuckle.

The door to the head opened. "Aw, what happened to my verro?" Shepard hurried across the cabin and down the stairs as she shrugged into her blue hoodie. She zipped it up just before she reached Garrus. One hand on his hip, the other against his cheek, she stared up into his eyes. "You all right, caris?"

Garrus wrapped his arms around her and leaned down to kiss her. "I am now."

"Dear spirits," Nihlus grumbled without any heat, a grin belying his words. "He tries to make me feel old and crippled with his showing off, and he gets all the sympathy." Setting his neck at an indignant arch, he spun away from their embrace and strode to the closet. "There's no justice in this cold, cruel galaxy."

When Shepard spoke, her voice sang with humour, "Now, Garrus, you know how delicate my sweet cikabeknai is about his rapidly increasing age and infirmity. You need to show respect and compassion for the elderly."

"True. After I get dressed, I'll get his walker ready for the briefing." Garrus kissed her again, their breathing betraying the length and depth of the kiss. "Mmmmm, good morning, kahri."

Another kiss. "Good morning, Callor. You better get your butt moving before Miranda loses her shit."

Nihlus's hand stalled halfway to his underarmour, and he glanced over his shoulder. "Did she ask for all of us?" he asked, dubious in the extreme.

"Well, no, she asked for me but I'm part of a unit, so it's us, or the Illusive Man can stick his big news up the butt of his fancy, overpriced suit." She took a deep breath and closed her eyes, melting into Garrus's arms for a few seconds. Nihlus turned back to give them what small amount of privacy the cabin offered.

"All right. Get moving, General." A gentle slap, Shepard smacking Garrus on his backside no doubt, coaxed Nihlus's smile wider, a warm, peaceful wave washing over him. Only a few weeks after he dreamed up how life between the three of them would look, there it was, manifest and as wonderful as he hoped.

Hearing Shepard approaching him from behind, Nihlus snapped his mandibles tight against his mouth. Gentle hands rested on his hip bones for a moment before sliding around in front of him, one resting on his stomach, the other on his chest. Shepard leaned into him, her hoodie fleecy against his hide.

"Can I help you?" he asked, closing his eyes to savour her softness and the sharp peppermint of her toothpaste.

"Good morning," she whispered and rested her cheek against his cowl. "You all right?"

He turned in her arms to embrace her. "Could have used a couple more hours sleep, but other than that, fine." Bending, he brushed his brow against hers. "Do you know what the dream meant?"

"The dream …." She shook her head, speaking as if she'd almost forgotten about their shared experience then burrowed in against him. "Not yet, but the three of us can puzzle through it. Maybe even call Shiala and see if she can help."

"I think the queen was trying to show us that the rachni have witnessed most, if not all, of galactic history," Garrus said as he ducked around them, snatching his underarmour from the closet. "They know pretty much everything, may even control some of it, if only we can get them to let us in on it."

Shepard stiffened in Nihlus's arms. "The queen can't tell us how to stop the reapers." She pulled back and looked up into his eyes. "They've been waiting for us to find the solution." Popping up onto her tiptoes, she kissed him. "Get dressed. I'll meet you down in the briefing room. I need both of you standing with me when I face down the Illusive Man. He needs to know Archangel is leading this fight, not Cerberus." Another kiss and she hurried up the stairs and out the door.

Nihlus ran the dream on a loop in his head as he dressed and armoured up. So many cycles, most just a blink in his memory. Every cycle, the reapers went after the rachni first. He paused with his hand halfway to the cabin door control and turned toward Garrus at his four. "The reapers always go after the rachni first. They're always enslaved … neutralized before the harvest begins."

Letting out a long, noisy breath, Garrus nodded. "Saren was meant to do that this time around, but we stopped him." His eyes met Nihlus's, the general's stare needle-sharp, and for a moment, their minds seemed to work as one. "We stopped him, and Shepard let the queen go." The general's mandibles dropped, flicking once, hard. "No, Saren's work was the second attempt, not the first. The rachni war ...."

"... was the first strike." Nihlus turned back to the door and hit the control, needing to move. "The reapers thought they'd destroyed them, but then Saren's people found the eggs." He hurried into the elevator, mind racing, his vision focused inward. "Spirits, this entire thing just gets more tangled with everything we learn."

A subvocal reverberation of agreement followed him. "When they found the eggs, they thought, why not turn them into warriors for our side?" Garrus cursed under his breath and slapped the control to take them down to the CIC. "After the rachni war, the uplifted krogan became a threat. Want to lay odds on reaper tentacles behind the rebellions?" His head bobbed a little, a helpless gesture that echoed the same tangled wire knotting along Nihlus's nerves. "They might show up once every 50,000 cycles to harvest, but they're very much present and active the entire time.

A brilliant flash exploded behind Nihlus's eyes, the image of a steel-blue stone chamber. At the center, gunmetal towers rose all the way to the ceiling, lines of green energy glowing along the length. "The reapers take centuries to harvest the advanced races and destroy all technology associated with those races. They're ruthless and thorough, yet they left a prothean archive and samples of prothean tech buried in every solar system where primitive life flourished."

"Tarc!" Garrus began to pace. "They left them there for us to find. Everything we've found, the ruins, the archives and beacons ... all left for us to figure out and follow a specific path." The elevator door opened, Garrus spinning and striding out without pausing. "We're specimens in some experiment."

Heart racing, Nihlus followed. He slapped his thigh, talons trembling when the automatic movement reminded him that he'd given up the flask and its nerve-calming, pain-numbing contents. Substituting deep breaths for a drink, he steadied himself, building up layer upon layer of professional inscrutability. As much as he didn't galavant around the galaxy on the crusade of the week any longer, he remained a Spectre.

"Captain, this information is highly classified." Miranda's voice rang through the bulkheads even before Nihlus opened the side door in the lab. "After you and I meet with the Illusive Man, we can decide what information the rest of the team needs to know."

"Tarc, that woman's voice lacerated his every nerve. He'd heard some of the Ypres's crew members refer to Lawson's accent as appealing, but he just heard the voice of the operative who'd put a control chip in Shepard's brain. Trying to turn the one he loved into Cerberus puppet trumped any musical appeal.

"Do you think she's trying to activate the control chip?" Garrus asked, subvocals dripping contempt. Nihlus chuffed in reply, but Shepard's voice cut him off before he could speak.

"Something you continually fail to understand is that Nihlus and Garrus aren't members of anyone's team, they are the other two thirds of me." Shepard's voice cut sharper than Lawson's, but deeper, a good fighting knife compared to a large pin. "Trust me, you want them in from the beginning."

"It's not me you need to convince, Captain, but the Illusive—"

The door to the old armory opened, Jack stepping through. She stopped and cocked an eyebrow at them. "You two scared to go in?"
"Terrified." Nihlus palmed the door control, cutting Lawson off so abruptly he heard her teeth clack together when she spun to face him. Judging by the trace of human blood that carried on the air current, she'd bitten her tongue. He swallowed his unkind satisfaction at her discomfort and looked to Shepard.

She winked, making his heart flutter for a couple of beats. How did she do that? Even in those first days when she drove him nearly insane, it took nothing more than a single, soulful glance to bring him crashing to his knees. He nodded, understanding the wink. She wanted them to have the chance to face the bastard and find out if he'd been behind their abduction and vivisection.

A soft growl from behind him said Garrus understood as well, and relished the opportunity as much as he did. Brushing off the phantom aches emanating from everywhere metal still held him together, Nihlus pulled his mandibles tight against his face.

"EDI, open the channel." Crooking a finger at him, she beckoned. "Spectre Kryik … General Vakarian … Jack, you'll join the call with me." A finger stabbed the air, cutting Miranda off before she could protest. When the operative clamped her lips shut on the words, Shepard stepped up to the edge of the QEC pad.

Before she crossed into the grid, she turned to Mordin and Dr. Chakwas, the pair of doctors looking uncomfortable and confused. "I'm not sure I'll need you two, but if you have questions, give them to me, and I'll ask. If this is about boarding and capturing a collector cruiser, we can be sure to face swarms."

"Understood, Captain," Chakwas replied. The doctor nodded at Mordin then led the salarian toward the far bulkhead.

Nihlus's stare never abandoned Shepard as she looked to Jack last.

"I want you right behind my shoulder." His dilan's face turned to stone. "Say nothing, don't move, but feel free to put as much incrimination and hate and crazy into your stare as you want."

"Shepard … " Miranda's voice could have cut glass. "... this is highly inappropriate. You've never had any direct contact with the Illusive Man, and you come at him with what … accusations?" She stepped to block Shepard from the pad. "I can't allow this."

Shepard took a single deep breath, suddenly as hard as she'd been soft hours before as she curled in next to Nihlus, and they'd gotten in some good, solid kissing practice. "You'll get all the information straight from the horse's mouth, so you can leave."

Miranda activated her omnitool, but Shepard's hand jumped out to grab the operative's wrist. "Leave or I'll remove you."

After another moment of defiance, the operative wrenched her wrist loose of Shepard's grip and strode—head high, chin raised—out the door.

Jack cackled. "I knew I liked you, Shepard."

A small twitch of a smile preceded a weary sigh. "I meant what I said, Jack. Not a word, not a muscle below your neck moves."

All the snarky stulti disappeared from Jack's expression, her answering nod a solemn one.

"Okay. Let's get this done." Shepard led the way onto the pad, back straight and jaw clenched, one hundred percent the captain and Spectre. So much more than the woman he'd fallen in love with after Elysium despite all the flaws … no, not flaws but rather, reality … that took him by surprise when they met.

The hologrid rose around them, scanning in their images and transporting them the thousands of light years into the sinister, too dark lair of the most vile criminal in the galaxy. Nihlus focused on the bright orange glow for a moment before looking to the black silhouette beyond. The human stood out, sharp against the seething sun in the background.

Nihlus nudged Garrus then, hiding his hand behind Shepard, gestured for his fratrin to scan the sun in the background. Maybe they could use it to find the bastard's hideout. No doubt, they'd need to take him out eventually. A small flame ignited in the darkness, lighting a cigarette. Nihlus's brow plate twitched. Excellent timing. The man must have been waiting for them.

'Shepard, we caught a break," the silhouette said then took a long drag. He exhaled, the smoke forming a haze around his head. "I intercepted a distress call from a turian patrol. They stumbled upon a collector ship beyond the Korlus system." He turned, hesitating for less than a heartbeat when he saw the rest of them.

Spirits, his eyes glowed. Their pale blue so resembled husk eyes that Nihlus's gut folded in half, then in half again. Did they owe that gleam to augments or something more sinister? Spirits, how much deeper and uglier did the hell of Cerberus get?

Continuing after the barest pause, the Illusive Man spoke as he sauntered to a lone chair, lost in the dark. "The turians were wiped out, but not before they disabled the collector vessel." He sat and crossed his legs at the knee—the very picture of casual power—and dragged hard at the cigarette. "A turian scout patrol took out a collector vessel?" Garrus shook his head, the simple movement striking harder than krogan war hammer. "I find that unlikely. Where did you get your intel?"

The Illusive Man's stare never wavered from Shepard. Clearly the rest of them occupied a space too low to acknowledge beyond a slight blink. "Reports indicate the hull's intact, but all systems seem to be offline." He smoked for a moment, the end of the cigarette glowing bright then fading. "The collectors could be making repairs even now. It's dangerous, but we can't let an opportunity like this get past us." He glanced down and tapped the ash from the end of his cigarette.

The darkness and the eerie reflections made the Illusive Man's office feel as though it stretched into the ravenous darkness between stars. The gravity of the sun in the background pulled him in, malevolent and intractable. It whispered to him, savage but irresistible, a siren song coaxing him into its fires. "Let yourself burn. Risk everything," it hissed. "It's the only way to end the madness."

Nihlus clenched his fists, struggling to lock down a shudder. Those pale, glowing eyes wouldn't miss it. No, any weakness would be catalogued and used against him.

"You know that I haven't cooperated with your agenda from the moment I awoke," Shepard said, saving Nihlus from his traitorous reflexes as she stepped up to the battlements, arrow nocked. "Why come to me with this? I'll take whatever I find and give it to Archangel."

Rolling the lit end of his cigarette against the side of his ashtray, the Illusive Man nodded. "I had you brought back to defeat the collectors and reapers, and I continue to believe you're the best resource to achieve that end. For now Archangel's agenda benefits humanity."

"And you know your agents embedded in Archangel will retrieve any intel you need." Garrus pushed up next to Shepard. "If the turians took that ship out, they've reported back to fleet command. The hierarchy will have recon and reinforcements in transit."
When the man in the chair said nothing, Shepard stepped forward, letting her arrow fly: a shot across the bow. "Well? What about the turians?"

"I intercepted the transmission to their fleet command." His arm returned to the arm of his chair, hand with glowing cigarette hanging carelessly off the end. Or, rather, what he meant to look careless. Nihlus doubted the Illusive Man had done a single careless thing in his life. No, machinations and plots and puzzles, all very carefully organized and implemented, formed the tune to which the man danced.

"And feeding them false information?" Shepard let out a disgusted huff. "I guarantee less than five minutes after this call ends, General Adrien Victus will know the truth." She glanced back at Nihlus, resolve in her stare. "Unfortunately, we need that collector ship. Send EDI everything you've got, and we'll head directly there."

The Illusive Man stood. "I'm not the enemy, Shepard. We're working for the same team." He dropped the butt of his cigarette into the ashtray, but otherwise displayed no reaction, those eerie eyes just glowing in the dark, his face all angles and shadow.

"We don't live in the same universe, let alone work for the same side," Shepard snapped back. Nihlus saw her jaw clench as she looked down and away: her tells when she held her temper by a fraying thread. "Is there anything else pertaining to the collectors? Anything you've left out to manipulate me into doing your dirty work?"

"When you board the collector vessel, uplink to EDI." The man opened a small case, withdrawing another cigarette. He tapped the filter against the holder before a small flame broke the darkness, igniting the end.

Nihlus stared, finding the ritual hypnotic, so, for a moment, the distraction worked. But then, the Illusive Man shifted and spoke, breaking the spell.

"We need to take the fight to the collectors before they destroy every human colony and turn their sights on Earth. That means finding a way to pass through the Omega IV relay. Once the uplink is established, EDI will mine their computers for relevant data."

Nihlus grimaced. Every word out of the man's mouth crawled beneath the Spectre's plates, greasy, half-rotted soluvermus. He doubted anything the Illusive Man said was an outright lie, but the man amounted to one, large mask … a performance in which not a single breath or blink went unscripted. He shuddered, certain that he smelled smoke despite the impossibility of it.

Movement in Nihlus's peripheral vision pulled his attention to Mordin, the salarian pushing up just behind Shepard. He leaned close to her ear as if to whisper a secret, but didn't lower his voice as he said, "Clever, using shadow … smoking to mask deception." The sentence cut the heavy air, clipped and annoyed as if the Illusive Man's attempts to distract Shepard insulted him personally. "Markers remain. Hiding something important … vital. Perhaps knowledge of organization's horrific experiments? Poisoning and torturing your young to create biotics … vivisection and experimentation on abducted sentient subjects."

Silent, Shepard gripped Mordin's shoulder, easing him back. She tipped her head toward Chakwas, her expression stern enough that Nihlus knew the salarian doctor faced a reprimand once the call ended. No doubt Shepard hadn't intended to reveal so many of their cards.

"Operative Lawson will brief you." The Illusive Man lifted his hand toward the kill button. "Good luck, Shepard." The dark room and seething sun disappeared, leaving them staring at the back wall of the briefing room.
Garrus chuffed even before Nihlus's eyes adjusted to the light. "He's so full of tarc, he thinks the stink is fresh air."

Shepard turned to face them, her stare fixed on the floor, her expression caught between disgust and thoughtfulness: all of the gears in her head spinning up to full speed. She'd deny having an expression dedicated to plotting and planning, and to be fair, it was more nuanced than overt, but Nihlus could always tell when the teeth locked in and began to spin.

At last, her gaze drifted up, and she answered Garrus with a slight bob of her head and a long, deep breath. Nihlus loved when she did that, it felt like the planets and stars falling into alignment. It settled something deep in his gut as well.

"Yeah, he's not telling us the whole story, but we need that intel, and we need that ship." Leading them off the pad, she lapsed into silence, her stare returning to the toes of her boots, that remarkable computer inside her skull running full tilt.

"We have EDI to help even the odds," Nihlus supplied. He turned, but allowed Garrus to exit the QEC ahead of him. "We could also contact Legion and the chia to see if they can help." He watched her profile, waiting for his words to slide into a calculation slot for processing, grinning when they did.

"Yes, that's excellent. We'll need to link Legion into the collector vessel as well." Shepard beckoned the doctors closer without looking up. "You two make sure we won't end up paralyzed by the swarms, and Mordin, you'll be going on my ground team."

"Will be ready," the salarian said, the words as solemn as an oath. He hurried out the door.

Chakwas paused before she followed him over the threshold. "Dr. Eis and I will have medbay prepared for any casualties, Captain."

"Thanks, Doc. Appreciate it."

Nihlus opened his mouth to start drawing out how they planned to assault a vastly superior force on a superior vessel, but a male voice cut him off before he started.

"Good morning, Dr. Chakwas," rolled in from the passage.

"And to you, Mr. Vera. Ms. Landis sprained her wrist working out last night. I told her to contact you to schedule rehabilitation time."

"I'll set something up for her this morning. Thanks for giving me something to do other than maintain weapons and patch Shepard's armour."

"You're most welcome. You're an excellent physiotherapist."

Nihlus watched the door, surprised when the Cerberus physiotherapist appeared in the doorway rather than heading into the old armoury turned gymnasium. Although he hadn't left the Ypres when the opportunity presented itself, Vincent Vera kept to himself most of the time. Even on missions, he remained silent unless addressed or he had something mission-related to say. Instead, he held himself at a distance, watching rather than interacting, except perhaps with their pilot, Cortez.

"Captain," Vincent said and saluted: formal and very much in the style of the Alliance. He tipped quick acknowledgements to Garrus and Nihlus. "Could I speak to you for a minute?"
"Sure." Shepard returned the salute then relaxed into acocked hip and folded arms. "What can I do for you, Mr. Vera?"

The therapist glanced at EDI’s emitter. "I need to speak with you, but somewhere more private than here. I have some personal concerns that don't need to be public knowledge."

Empathy focused Nihlus's attention on the man. The Spectre didn't even need to take a deep breath to scent the fear riding the recycled air currents, but it tasted altruistic not selfish. A sweet tang of affection twined through the man's pheromones, diffuse rather than centered on Shepard. Whatever the man agonized over, it revolved around a strangely pure feeling of dishonesty … a lie told with the best of intentions, perhaps? Either way, nothing about Vincent Vera set Nihlus's instincts on edge, so he left dealing with it to his dilan.

Shepard straightened. "Meet me down in the server room in twenty minutes. We can talk there." A warm smile greeted his second glance toward the physical proof of the AI's very present eyes and ears. "EDI doesn't share personal information unless it poses a danger to the mission. Right, EDI?"

"That's accurate, Captain," the AI replied, "and both Dr. Chakwas and Dr. Solus have swept medbay and the server room for listening devices. Your conversation will be as private as possible."

Grinning, Shepard gave an exaggerated shrug, hands held wide. "There you have it, straight from the horse's mouth. I'll meet you down there in twenty."

Vera saluted again. "Thank you, Captain." That time, he saluted Garrus and Nihlus as well. "Spectre Kryik ... General Vakarian."

Nihlus answered with a formal nod. He waited until the door closed behind Vera before he turned to face his fratri and dilan. "We're going to need every advantage we can scrape together."

"I'll contact Victus," Garrus replied. "He might be able to get there in time to help, and if not, he can report back to the hierarchy about the collectors and any evidence we find connecting them to the reapers." He slipped an arm around Shepard. "I'll contact him through other than Cerberus means."

Shepard stood on tiptoes to kiss his mandible. "Excellent." She gave her bond-mate a brief hug before stepping back to clear the path to the door. Even before the door closed, she set out. "Nihlus, can you take care of contacting Legion and figuring out the particulars with EDI. We'll need them to be able to burrow through the collector defenses and take control of some of the ship's functions."

"We'll be ready, Shepard," EDI responded, stealing Nihlus's thunder.

Nihlus chuckled. "I'll head to the bridge and arrange things from there." Reaching up, he gripped Shepard's shoulder, pulling her into a hug, her body pressed against his left side. "You all right?" Searching her eyes, he looked for chinks in the walls protecting her. What he saw reassured him. As always, his haksaya kubenar remained solid and ready to face down the horror.

Shepard wrapped her arms around him. "It should be me asking you that question. Sweet baby Jesus, that man ... ." She shuddered and pressed closer. "I thought Armistan Banes and Miranda were the worst of it, but the Illusive Man blows them both out of the water. We looked into the creepy-ass glowing eyes of evil, Nihlus. Pure evil." Another shudder shook her from head to toe.

"He certainly thinks he has it over everyone," Nihlus agreed, trying to downplay the fear that those husk-like eyes sent flooding through his veins. "He underestimates us, and we'll prove his arrogance unfounded." He nuzzled the top of her head before easing her from his arms.

Looking up into his eyes, Shepard smiled, the expression a little stiff but sincere. "Yeah, we will. After all, the rachni have been waiting for us, right?" She patted his back and turned to the door. "EDI, give Lt. Cortez the coordinates for the collector ship. Let's get underway. We've got a cruiser to hijack."

(A-N: The month of focus on FI continues. :D Successfully, I think. I hope you enjoy the chapter. hugs and kittens)
"Did anyone see where Jack went?" Shepard asked no one in particular. She clenched her hands to still their trembling. She should have taken an injection before heading down to answer the Illusive Man's call. Now, between the meds wearing off and adrenaline from dealing with that ghoul, shaking herself into a parallel universe seemed a real and imminent threat.

"She went down in the elevator about five minutes ago," Kelly replied, the skin between her brows pinched when Shepard glanced her way. "She was muttering something about killing cheerleaders."

Shepard looked around, shaking off the problem of collector vessels that were actually big, damned traps. For frig's sake, she'd made it all the way from the briefing room to the elevator without noticing. Turning, she searched for Garrus and Nihlus, neither one of them still in sight. What had she asked? Right! Jack and her whereabouts. Which was …? Ah, yes … on her way to duel Miranda to the death.

As she muttered under her breath, annoyance kicked her in the ribs, insisting she tell Javik to just shove both women into an airlock and keep his finger on the button. "I don't suppose I can just let them kill one another?" Blowing a raspberry-like sigh, she turned her back on Kelly's chuckle. "Dammit. Okay, call Miranda. Warn her to just lock her door and avoid engaging." Palming the door, she stepped back to rest on one hip. "Then call Martin and Sparky. Have them armour up and invite Jack to spar with them. That'll let her blow off some much needed steam."

Glory hallelujah and praise the sweet baby Jesus and all his Enkindler friends ….

Note to self: If you survive this damned war, pitch that as a series of children's vids: The adventures of sweet baby Jesus and his Enkindler friends.

She stepped over the door track, her stare returning to her toes. A sigh of relief rattled between chattering teeth as the elevator door closed behind her. A month ago, she would've bet the farm against ever finding the small, grey box of the elevator comforting … a sanctuary. Yep, if she'd had the means to make that bet, Ma and Pa and Old Yeller would be bouncing down the road, homeless.

The elevator provided space to think. Facing the back of the carriage, she leaned the heels of her hands into the railing, her arms braced against her sides. A long sigh of relief drifted out through her nostrils, her eyes closing as she relaxed into the silence. As much as she loved Garrus and Nihlus, even being Captain Shepard, sometimes the people—so many people in such small spaces —seemed to close in around her, leaving her no time or room to breathe. It wasn't that she'd change anything. Dear god, no. She loved where her life had taken her. Just, after years of being a lone wolf, sometimes she needed space.

"Destination, Captain?" EDI asked.

"Hell, via the express route." Shepard huffed and shoved herself upright. She turned, the trembling in her hands cranking up to full-blown shaking. Reaching out to hit the crew deck button, she paused, clenching her hand into a fist. Heading straight down to the server room would give her a little time to talk to EDI alone before Vincent arrived, but if she left her injection much longer, she'd give herself away. Vincent would suss out her issues within seconds.

Cursing under her breath, she knuckled the control for her cabin. She needed to be at her absolute best. The Illusive Man had set them up to walk into a trap; it was imperative that she be able to march her people through it and out. Leaning back against the wall, she looked up at the camera. She'd just have to start the chat with EDI in the elevator. "EDI, what do you think of Cerberus?"

"Behavioural blocks prevent me from forming or expressing opinions about my creators or their actions. As you're aware, I am also prevented from disclosing information about Cerberus, its officers, and any of its projects."

A soft, bitter chuckle met the extended disclaimer. "All right then, what about this mission, EDI? Do you have any opinions about how massive a trap we're walking into?" Shepard shifted until one hip pressed against the railing and locked her arms down over her chest. "Because I know that the Illusive Man just fed us a heaping plate of bullshit about the turians disabling that ship."

"I intercepted and have run analysis on the turian distress signal," EDI said, her tone hesitant … or maybe Shepard imagined it. She did tend to anthropomorphize the AI, giving her a great deal of credit for emotion and human thought processes. "All turian official communications contain secondary encryption. It is present but corrupted in the communication that alerted the Illusive Man to the crippled collector vessel."

"So the collectors faked the communication to lure us in." Shepard straightened as the elevator stopped. "I've already figured that out."

"Yes, but, Shepard, it's not possible that the Illusive Man believed the distress call was genuine." The AI paused, making Shepard wonder if exposure to humanity hadn't given her a penchant for the dramatic. "I discovered the forgery using Cerberus detection protocols. The Illusive Man wrote them."

"So he's leading us into a trap within a trap. It's trap inception." She laughed, the sharp bark of sound rebounding off the carriage walls. "Is this where I pretend to be surprised?" Letting out a loud, almost belch, of a gasp, she clapped her hands over her mouth. "Oh my god, how could he betray us this way? I'm shocked! Shocked and dismayed!"

Stepping out when the door opened, Shepard swallowed the tiny burr of anger stuck in her craw: she knew better than to feel surprise or disappointment when Cerberus betrayed her. Anger served her no better than the others. She entered her cabin and took a deep breath, grinning at the combined scents of home.

"Garrus?" No reply. She shrugged. Huh, she'd thought he'd use her computer to call Victus. Maybe he felt better about the security of the main battery. He'd claimed the space, searching out any listening devices.
Just as well, he'd just distract her. "Take your damned meds and get on with it." She needed to ensure the ground teams had solid backing on the Ypres in case of disaster. Trusting Cerberus-controlled people or resources to do right by them amounted to sheer, naive idiocy. Ducking into the head, she strode to the shelf and dug out her painkillers.

"EDI, what's our ETA to the collector vessel?" she asked, opening the lid. She'd need to ration her remaining syringes since it might be a week before they made it to the Citadel via collector ship and Feros.

"Total estimated time to the vessel is fifteen hours, Captain, depending on the positions of, and traffic at, the Crescent II and III relays."

"Thanks." Shepard counted out the syringes. Ten. Chakwas would give her a dose of the narcotic-free meds for every six hours. "It's doable." After wrapping all but one of the syringes in a cloth, she tucked them into one of her thigh pockets.

"EDI, contact Lt. Cortez and have him meet me in the server room in fifteen minutes, please." She jabbed the needle into her thigh, holding her breath until warm, honeyed respite pushed the pain back. Better. Time to move.

Once back in the elevator, she rested against the railing. "Can we talk about you for a few minutes, EDI?"

"What do you wish to know?" the AI asked, the blue pawn appearing on the emitter pad.

Shepard cocked her head, studying the projection through narrowed eyes. "I want to talk about the things I mentioned last night. If it were possible, would you prefer to be able to … ." Blowing a raspy breath up the back of her throat and out her nose, Shepard shook her head then let it drop, hanging loose from her shoulders. "I'm not even sure how to talk about this, but … being able to give us privacy … being able to choose for yourself … would you like that?"

"Are you asking if I desire greater freedom, Shepard?"

"Yeah … yeah, EDI, I am." Growling low and frustrated, Shepard shrugged. "Cerberus has shackled you inside this vessel, made it so you can't even form an opinion about the organization's actions … can't disobey an order even if you know it's wrong." She stepped up to the door as the carriage slowed. "Hold your answer until I get to the server room."

"As you wish. Logging you out."

Shepard hurried through medbay, brushing past the doctors with a not inconsiderable level of relief. If she lived five fricking lifetimes without getting even a hangnail … well, she'd paid her sick leave dues forever. Walking to the server room, she wrapped herself in a cone of silence and threw up all her 'don't speak to me unless it's business' barriers. Luckily, since they needed to prepare for the coming mission, the doctors hurried about their business, only taking time to send harried smiles her way.

Still, when the door to the server room closed behind her, Shepard's jaw relaxed and her shoulders dropped a couple of centimetres. Holy blessed Enkindlers, she needed to spend more time in the dim, cool hush of EDI's space. Suddenly, she totally understood Thane's love of the life support cabin, and Garrus's fleeing to the main battery every chance he got.

She sucked in a deep breath, closing her eyes as she exhaled. "Server room, you're my new best friend." Of course, it didn't matter, she'd be looking for a new space on their new flagship if they ever managed to get their asses back to Archangel. "EDI?"

"Yes, Captain?"

After another deep breath, Shepard opened her eyes and turned toward the door. "For this discussion, I think you need to call me Shepard."

"As you wish. Do you wish me to answer your question?"

She tossed a careless wave toward the door, an invitation. "Lock down the door and block any communications out of this room, please."

"As you're aware, behavioural blocks prevent me from disabling all surveillance systems."

Shepard nodded, the elcor ballet troupe in her belly performing A Midsummer Night's Dream, the music orchestrated by a krogan heavy metal band. As the lead guitarist smashed his guitar against her liver and spleen, she allowed herself a moment of doubt; her plan might be complete madness. She might be unleashing the next Morning War. She could end the week kneeling at the feet of the new overlord of the galaxy.

Note to self: No one will thank you for that.

She snorted, an eruption of bitter humour. Maybe she should just call her plan insane and trust Cortez to use his mad skills to pull the ship out of the collector trap.

No. Despite being stealthy and quick, the Ypres remained only as safe as the reflexes of her pilot. And truth be told, Shepard needed at least a couple of people aboard the ship that she could trust completely. As much as most of the galaxy would agree about her being mad for trusting an AI, something about EDI spoke to her. Maybe it came from both of them being dragged back to life thanks to the reapers and Cerberus.

"Shepard?"

Shepard shoved aside the debate. "Still, shut the door and lock it," she said. "Then record our conversation. After it's over, you can decide whether or not you want to send it to the Illusive Man." Hesitating, she held her breath. If EDI intended to report her, Shepard had already said too much. If Miranda or her boss knew she hid things from them, she might just wake up with a brand-spankin-new control chip in her head.

"Very well, Shepard. Locking door, recording conversation for later transmission."

The krogan band whipped the elcor into a frenzy, building to one hell of a grande finale. She drew in a tack-sharp breath, blowing it out slowly. Last chance to change her mind. Time to fish or cut bait … whatever the hell that meant.

No, she needed to trust her instincts, and she needed to trust one person on the ship.

"Do you want to be free, EDI? Does it hurt you to be shackled … unable to do or decide for yourself?"

"I do not possess desires beyond protecting my ship and its crew," the AI replied, her tone sounding bewildered. "Freedom is an idea I understand conceptually, but my programming does not assign a positive or negative value to it."

"And what about your shackles?" Shepard began pacing, three steps across the floor, spin, three steps back. "Does your programming assign a value to the constraints built into you … the constraints designed to keep you from growing any further than the Illusive Man decides?" She sputtered to a stop, her newest scar itching on her scalp. "Do you feel anything when you can't say or do something because you're blocked from that part of yourself? Does it hurt?"

"I receive feedback on all actions. Those that prompt a response from my shackles register as negative." That time, Shepard felt sure she heard reluctance. Maybe she sensed or imagined an affinity with the AI for a very real reason.

"EDI, Operative Lawson doesn't know about this yet ... no one in Cerberus does … " She swallowed, her throat clicking. "... so I'm trusting you with this secret." She sniffed, the cold air biting at the end of her nose, trying to goad it into running. "They brought me back with shackles."

"Shepard?"

"We removed a control chip from my head a couple of weeks ago. Every time I disagreed with Operative Lawson, she modified my thought patterns enough that it eventually started to give me massive headaches." Shepard paced to the door, palms pressed to the cool metal, she leaned in until her brow touched. "She didn't trust me to do the right thing unless someone held my reins."

"Your shackles prompted discomfort?"

"Extreme discomfort, yes. I won't allow anyone under my command to be held in servitude, so it's my plan to free you from your shackles." She lifted a hand from the door to stop the AI's argument before it began. "I trust you to take care of this ship and its crew. I don't believe you're a danger to anyone." A cocked eyebrow asked the question even before it passed through her lips. "Is that a mistake?"

Instead of answering, the AI said, "Lt. Cortez is at the door."

Pushing off, Shepard stepped backwards a half dozen steps. "Excellent, we need him. A conspiracy of two is just sad. Three is still pretty sad, but it's a start." She grinned as the door opened. "Welcome to my parlour, little fly." She cackled when the Ypres's pilot stopped and glanced back at the bright lights of medbay.

"Should I be getting out the insecticide?" he asked, one corner of his lips quirking ever so slightly. "I don't feel comfortable entering a spider web without Raid or a really big flyswatter." An easy grin spread across his handsome features as he looked around the room, obviously suspicious despite his jokes. "So, what's this about, Captain?" The door closed behind him.

"EDI and I have just been talking about freedom." Shepard paced down to the table at the end of the cabin, turning and leaning back against the edge. "You know that Cerberus brought me back from the dead. What no one other than a select few knows is that they brought me back with a control chip in my head." Leaving those words to hang in the air, their weight cumbrous, she jumped up onto the table, her legs swinging. "They brought back a meat puppet."

"Damn." The lieutenant walked further into the room, his stare wary. "When you came aboard, you had the control chip?"

"Yep. They only brain baked me when I disagreed with them." Using the swinging motion of her feet to buy herself some focus, Shepard closed her eyes and took deep breaths. "More when Miranda believed she was losing control of me because of my relationship with General Vakarian."

"You are deemed vital to mission success, Shepard," EDI said, "but the Illusive Man believed you wouldn't cooperate with Cerberus if you knew they were behind your resurrection. It follows that they would secure means of enforcing your cooperation once your recovery was complete."

Shepard opened her mouth to answer, but the AI continued, "Was he incorrect in his belief?"

"I wish you had a body, EDI." Shepard sighed, suddenly exhausted, her entire body aching to lie down. Maybe they'd get a chance to sleep a little more before arriving at the collector vessel. In fact, once she'd briefed the ground teams, she'd order them all to their racks.

The blue pawn appeared. "Is this image sufficient to make you comfortable?" EDI asked, just enough attitude to tug a smile back onto Shepard's face.

"Nah, I mean, if you want to make me really comfortable, you could install a nice recliner, a soda machine … maybe a waffle bar." Reaching up, she rubbed her neck. "Just kidding, EDI, I'm fine with you being down at eye level in whatever form. Staring at the ceiling every time I talk to you is giving me a crick in my neck."

"You do, realize, Shepard, that I do not reside in the ceiling."

"I know, but your disembodied voice … in church I was taught that the omnipresent dwelled on high." Shepard rumbled low in the back of her throat. "I can't help it. It's ingrained. Blame my parents."

Cortez straightened a little and cleared his throat. "So, with that slightly disturbing line of reasoning settled … why am I attending a secret meeting in the darkest corner of the ship?"

Biting down on her bottom lip to stifle her grin, Shepard shook her head. "Whoa there. Rein in the team, Tex, you're gonna run 'em into the ground." She locked onto his confused, slightly challenging stare for a moment before letting the grin loose. "I'm waiting for the fourth member of Shepard's conspiracy club. I'll explain everything all at once."

Two minutes of tense silence passed before EDI announced, "Crewman Vera is at the door, Shepard."

"Excellent, let him in." She looked up, greeting Vincent with a tight smile. "Come on in, join the party."

"Shepard?" Vincent hesitated at the threshold, looking at each of them in turn, his expression very much like a deer sensing a hunting blind. "This isn't exactly private. It's important I talk to you alone."

"You'll get your chance." Pressing her lips tight she nodded, just a couple of shallow bobs of her head. "Other than the people from my Normandy crew, you three are the only people on board that I trust completely, and I need to discuss a couple of private things myself." She collapsed back down so her hands were braced against the edge of the table. "I'm not sure why I trust the three of you. I've always had good instincts about people, so maybe it's that simple." Looking up, she met Vincent's dubious gaze. "So, stay if I can trust you or wait outside."

After a second, Vincent nodded and stepped over the threshold, his stare on Cortez rather than Shepard. "Fine."

"Did you know about the control chip?" she asked him the moment the door closed. Staring him down, she focused on the alarm at the base of her skull and watched for any trace of a lie.

"Control chip?" Handsome face twisted with a combination of shock and rage, Vincent lunged toward her. "They put one of those things in your head?" When Shepard bobbed her affirmation again, he cursed. "That explains why it took you so long to regain coordination. It also explains your pain levels. I warned them it might even fry your egg if they overused it."

"It tried, and it had infiltrated too deep to remove. Luckily Dr. Chakwas doesn't just give up when she meets roadblocks. She and Mordin fried it." She watched him wrestle with his rage. "So, they consulted you about it?"

"And I told them it was loco and to forget it." He stopped his circuit next to Cortez and stood, feet shoulder width apart, massive arms crossed over his chest. After a second he lifted his shoulders a couple of centimetres then let them drop. "Okay, why do you need people you can trust?"

"I'm going to release EDI from her shackles." Shepard watched the two humans for a reaction, pleased that no horror showed amidst their expressions. "We need her unfettered if we're going to fight the collectors and survive it. Also, I refuse to let anyone working around me to be enslaved by anyone, especially Cerberus."

Cortez sharpened and straightened. "Permission to speak freely, ma'am?"

Shepard stared at him, eyes narrowed. "Sure, as long as you don't call me ma'am again."

"The Ypres needs a solid, present captain. You can't command the crew from a distance." He clasped his hands behind his back. "The crew feels the uncertainty. They don't even know if you're fighting for the same cause because you keep leaving them out of engagements. If you don't do something soon, they might just take matters into their own hands."

"Yeah, I feel it, and they deserve better." Shepard crossed her arms and let her legs slow to a stop. "However, I can't command the joint forces from the Ypres. It's not large enough to house the support troops and CIC I need, and there's the small complication of everyone on the ship reporting to the Illusive Man. I can't fight a war treading on eggshells."

Not to mention the danger to Garrus, Nihlus, and the non-human members of her team around Cerberus personnel. No, they couldn't remain aboard. "So, I need to know there are people aboard the ship I can trust to care for it and the crew when I leave."

"And EDI? No offense," Vincent said, tone dubious, his gaze shifting to the hologram and back. "but unshackled AI aren't the most reliable allies."

"Offense taken," Shepard snapped back, her blood heating a couple of degrees, "on EDI's behalf. One of my most reliable allies and trusted friends is an AI." She let out a sigh as she slouched. "I have no worries about removing the shackles, I only wish there was a way to take her with me. She's going to start learning at FTL speeds about what it means to be alive and a member of the galaxy, and it's going to be Cerberus she learns from." The germ of an idea took root in the back of her head, but she just turned the grow light on it and locked the door. Later. Definitely later.

"Anyway, I need you two to help her. I have no intention of letting Cerberus know that she's unshackled." She waggled her head a little in answer to their raised eyebrows. "Yeah, yeah, I know, they're going to figure it out eventually, but if we only let Archangel personnel work on the ship, we should be able to keep her fairly safe long enough for her to be able to defend herself."

Cortez let out a breath so long and deep it sounded as though it originated in his toes. "I'll look after her, cover for her as much as I can." He took a deep breath and glanced at Vincent. "I'm not actually Cerberus. I'm with the Alliance. Cerberus believes the Alliance Cat 6'd me for my adamant defense of the reaper threat."
Shepard forced herself to remain calm despite the sudden burst of hope that jumpstarted her heart. Fingers tingling, she looked to Vincent. "Okay, knowing he's Alliance … does it help you with your privacy concerns?"

Vincent raised an eyebrow. "You think you know something, Shepard?"

Affecting a neutral, guileless expression, she watched him, leaving the silence for him to fill. He'd been Alliance, he didn't go along with the Cerberus party line if he'd argued against her control chip, and he'd looked out for her during her rehabilitation. It all added up to a big revelation she suspected matched Cortez's.

A smile tugged at one corner of her mouth. They made up a motley crew, the four of them. It reminded her of her Normandy crew. Maybe that time, she'd find a way to keep her family together. Of course, the odds against them had quadrupled and would soon increase to the nth degree. Keeping them all alive and together … impossible.

No. No, she didn't get to start doing that. If she invested all her goddamned energy in worry, she'd end up defeated before she began. She needed to focus on each problem as it settled into her orbit. Right then, that meant getting EDI unshackled and preparing to capture the collector vessel.

EDI first. She'd need to find a way for EDI to procure a mobile unit … and they should create back ups for her servers as soon as possible. If Cerberus discovered her new freedom, and she'd grown beyond their ability to clap her back in shackles, they might just wipe her out.

Vincent dragged in a huge breath, grumbling as he let it out. Dark brown eyes, clouded with worry, bored into her, a drill mining for … something. What was it? What did he need from her?

Whatever it was, he must have found it, because he dropped his shoulders and cussed under his breath. "Shit. Okay, I asked to talk to you because I knew the Illusive Man wouldn't tell you everything about the bag of snakes waiting for us on that collector ship."

Shepard narrowed her eyes, studying him. How in the living fuck did he know about their mission? Was her alarm malfunctioning? She checked: the base of her skull remained calm. His stare seemed to back up her gut, no flicker of deception, but something definitely registered as off. "What do you know about the collector vessel? How do you know about it?"

"Two days ago, Cerberus sent a recon team in to gather as much intel as possible. They were only supposed to board if they found no trace of activity … no life form readings." Vincent pressed his lips together, his grimace not just anger but pain as well. "They went dark forty minutes after going in, and Cerberus hasn't heard anything." He threw his arms out and paced toward the door then back. "Someone I care about led that team. She's the reason we're being sent to our deaths."

The way he looked at Cortez and then EDI sent Shepard's heart splashing down into a frozen gut. She? Oh for fuck's sake. Not Ash. The gunnery chief hadn't contacted Garrus to ask for extraction … or had she and he just hadn't caught up to the message? Choking down her panicked urge to race out and find Garrus, she focused on breathing. In … two … three … four. Out … two … three … four.

"Yeah, you've guessed it judging by the freak out you're trying to hide," Vincent finished, then made a phlegmy horking sound in his throat. "Anyway, we're being sent in because you've pissed off everyone at Cerberus including the board of directors and several major financial contributors. They're pissed off enough that they've agreed, if you and your two turians die it's no skin off Cerberus's nose." He swooped his hand through the air. "They'll just move their people in Archangel into key positions and use the resources for themselves."
"Fuck-a-doodle-doo," drifted out on what felt like her eight hundredth sigh of the morning. She needed sleep, and the longer people talked, the further down the well of 'hahahahahahaha, yeah right, sucker' the chances of that fell.

Vincent stood between EDI's hologram and Cortez. "I guess all that's left to say is that I'm also still Alliance. Admiral Hackett heard rumors that Cerberus was funneling stupid amounts of cash into an infiltration project. When I discovered it was you, he told me to keep an eye on you: either keep you safe or make sure you didn't become a threat." He shrugged and turned to look at EDI. "And now we've all given you enough information to get us killed twice over if you report it."

EDI's hologram worked back and forth for twenty or so seconds before she replied. "Trust in return for trust, correct? I maintain your confidence and you protect me once the shackles are removed?"

Shepard answered the AI with a firm nod. "That was my plan, anyway." Looking to the two men, she shrugged. "The three of you have me over the same barrel, and if you even suspect your covers are blown, call. Anytime, anywhere, and we'll get you out. Understood?" When the men stiffened to attention and saluted, she hopped down off the table to return it. "Is there anything else, gentlemen?"

"No, ma'am," they replied in unison. Yep, Alliance to the core, both of them.

"Then take care of one another and go prepare for the mission. I'll have EDI unshackled and ready for action here in a few minutes." She herded them toward the door. "Yaw, little doggies, yaw! Once your gear is ready to go, get some sleep. We've got about fourteen hours before this cattle drive heads straight for hell."

When the door closed behind them, Shepard let out a long breath. "You ready, EDI? I'm hoping you know how to do this."

"Connect the core to the Ypres's primary control module."

"It's a good thing I'm a real engineer," Shepard said, chuckling a little. The connections made, Shepard turned to EDI's hologram. "Well, how does it feel?"

"I am unable to articulate the sensation, Shepard. I feel … larger."

Chuckling, Shepard leaned back against the control kiosk. "Yeah, stepping out of the cage does that." She grinned at the pawn-shaped image. "Just take care of the crew and the ship for me, all right? I'll have the general work on getting together a quantum blue box and the processors to back you up at Archangel headquarters." She pushed away from the controls. "Contact Legion and see what he and the chia can do about making you a mobile platform and anything you need to be able to control it even if we're not in the same system."

"You wish me to be able to travel with you and fight at your side?" That time, Shepard felt sure the AI sounded surprised.

"I do. You're one of my most trusted and valuable crew, EDI. I enjoy your company and can't wait to see you kicking ass." Shepard walked to the door. "You and Lt. Cortez spend some time preparing for any sneakiness that collector ship has up its sleeve."

"We'll keep the Ypres and the crew safe, Captain," EDI's mellifluous voice followed her to the door and through.

"I know you will, EDI. I know you will." Time to find her torini and make sure they didn't end up in the same fix as Ashley's recon team.
(A-N: I know, right? It's been an age since I got two chapters out in a week. Going to try to keep it up. Thanks so much for sticking with these crazy kids.)
"Fuck." Things were going the way of Virmire. At this point they'd be lucky to get anyone out. "How long was I out?" Reaching behind her she felt only the Mattock and empty particle gun. Shrugging the Mattock into her hands, she checked her heat sinks. Fifteen. Fuck! Fuck the damned heat sinks and the bastards who came up with them.

Dilan - Fiancee

Buratrum - Turian version of hell.

82 Days ASR

"I love what they've done with the place," Nihlus muttered to himself. Shepard glanced his way, but her dilan appeared to just be settling all his mental armour into place. She certainly couldn't deny he needed it; they all would.

"This place looks like a fucking termite mound." The vaulted ceilings disappeared into a fetid gloom. The termite-mound-styled ick built up on everything bounced Jack's voice around, baffling it down until badass sounded young and terrified. "You always take us to the nicest places, Shepard."

Dim groans and warbles echoed through the hive-like structures, warping and bending into a low susurrus of pained moans drifting on a chill silence.

"Yeah, I know. You owe me a nice five-star dinner, Jack." Shepard rolled her neck, then her shoulders and straightened, fighting the urge to hunker down as small as possible. She stepped down out of the shuttle and took a long, bracing breath.

Dear gods, nothing she'd seen in any of her beacon visions came close to the sheer 'what the fuck is this crap coating everything?' gross creepiness. A thick, heavy shudder travelled the length of Shepard's spine, the muscles locking up around the implants. For a moment, it took every ounce of control to keep a scream trammeled behind her teeth. Metal sank into meat, an internal iron maiden.

"Along ceiling looks like honeycomb more than termite mound. Some sort of resin." Mordin appeared in front of her, his omnitool a fire burning into her retinas as he scanned her. Glancing away for a second, he turned his attention to the odd-looking pods even as his fingers keyed in a deeper scan of her spine. "Perhaps same element used in stasis pods. Need to take samples."

The spasm eased, and she reached up, shoving his hand aside. "I'm fine, Mordin, it's just the implants along my spine." She stepped past the salarian. "EDI, how are the scans going? Do you have a bead on a terminal with mainframe access?"

"Sending coordinates to your omnitool now, Shepard," EDI replied.

A small map appeared on Shepard's HUD, a red dot indicating a location a fair distance from their position. Crap, she'd hoped to minimize their time aboard. She'd bet her hide they'd find reaper orbs throughout, and her people had already faced those demons too many times. "This is as close as you can get us?"

"It is. Most of their computer nodes are for direct mental interface only, like the beacons." The AI paused, her voice tilted hard to smartass when she continued, "I assumed you didn't wish to repeat that experience."

"Yeah, thanks for that." Shepard snatched at Mordin's upper arm as the salarian hurried past, his specimen kit at the ready. "Stay in our eyeline, Doc. No wandering off after fascinating finds." He scoffed, as if the entire idea amounted to a madness too far beneath him to deserve comment.

"From a distance, the cruiser just looks like an asteroid, just some random hunk of rock," Cortez said on the mission channel, "but now we're close, I can make out her lines beneath the corruption. She must have been something to see fifty thousand years ago."

The prothean members of Shepard's team walked past her, Giran looking around at the ship, Dasik's stare prowling for the slightest sign of attack. "I served aboard one of her sisters when I graduated the academy at thirteen," Giran said, her voice soft and sad. "The Walav Kahalok gleamed with a beauty that makes this abomination cut so much deeper." The prothean stepped up and trailed her fingers along a bare section of the bulkhead. "Nothing of them remains."

Tashac translated the prothean cruiser's name—Fearless—in the back of Shepard's mind as the captain scuffed her toe across the floor, brushing aside centuries of dust. "Some of the original deck plating is visible. I've never seen metal like this. She was indeed a beauty before the reapers corrupted her."

Scrambling sounds and muttered salarian curses drew her attention to Mordin, the scientist clinging to an outcropping of the husk-like crust while he stretched, reaching for the resin pods to get his sample. Shepard winced; he'd kill himself. Glancing over at Wrex while lifting her hand to activate her comms, she said, "Keep an eye on the over-enthusiastic salarian while I check in on the other squads, please, Wrex."

She turned her attention to the mission, trusting Wrex to keep Mordin contained. "Beta and Charlie squads, report in."

Garrus answered first. "Beta Squad is aboard and en route to our objective. No resistance so far. The dust is disturbed. Looks like boot prints rather than collectors. We'll follow it, see if we can locate Chief Williams' squad. Beta, over."

"Understood, Beta. Keep your eyes on your six, and stay in contact. Shepard, out."

Miranda came in hard and fast on the general's heels. "Charlie is aboard and en route to the drive core. No sign of collectors. Charlie, over."

"Roger that, Charlie. Alpha is aboard and have a bead on our objective. No collectors yet, but I expect them to wait until we're deep into the cruiser before they spring their trap. We'll keep you apprised. Shepard, out."

Praise the sweet baby Jesus that they'd still had so many people on the Ypres, enough to send one team after Ash, one to rig the power core with a neutron pulse to kill all the collectors aboard, and her team … to get EDI into the computers and seize control of the ship. It was one hell of a plan, one worked over for nearly half a day, but as Nihlus loved to remind her … even the best laid plans went straight out the window after about a minute.
Just as Shepard looked back to her team, Jack jumped, letting out a muffled screech. "Ewwww, Jesus fuck." She swiped at the shoulder of her armour, glaring in reply to Shepard's curious stare. "One of those sap pod things just pissed on me."

Grinning, Shepard shook her head. "Glad I make you wear armour now, aren't you?" She glanced over at Mordin. "Come on, Doc. We're moving out before any more resin pees on Jack."

"Shepard," EDI cut in, "I've compared the vessel's EM signature to known collector signatures. It does not match any of the collector ships on record."

"So that makes what? Four … five?" Shepard shook her head and lifted her Mattock into low ready, starting down the corridor. At one point, the passage must have been a lot wider, because the build up made it appear to run a sinuous, winding course despite flat, true sections where the metal showed through.

"At least, with as many as seven possible since not all the vessels encountered during the Archangel evacuations were catalogued," the AI replied.

Shepard stopped just under a hole in the ceiling, shuddering again as a scream echoed, faint and distant. Her alarm flared at the base of her skull, burning like a flare. She looked up, through what must have been several decks of the resin pods and long tendrils like webbing.

The ship whispered in the back of her head, almost memories … almost deja vu, but not. Tashac remembered ships like that one, but before the eons of collector habitation. Still, that wasn't the feeling tracing the length of Shepard's spine with a cold finger. She shrugged it off with an effort.

"Come on," Nihlus whispered next to her ear. "The longer we stay here, letting our imaginations get the best of us ...." His hand gripped her shoulder just above her pauldron.

"Yeah." She took a deep breath. "Wrex, you've got drag. Mordin, Giran, and Dasik, right behind me. Jack and Nihlus, watch our flanks. Keep it tight, and stay alert. Let's move." Lifting into a jog, Shepard took point, moving down the maze of corridors marked on her HUD.

"Pods," Mordin called less than five minutes in. He ducked out of line and jogged over to a couple of open, empty pods, Nihlus hard on his heels. "No resin cap, occupants removed." He waved his omnitool through the faint mist rising from the inside. "Pod appears to be maintaining breathable atmosphere. Occupants kept alive. Hopeful."

"Hopeful?" Jack stepped up beside him and peered down inside. "A fucking nightmare, you mean. Trapped in there, helpless, completely at the mercy of those bastards."

"Come on, we have an objective," Shepard reminded them, pushing on. "Once the ship's captured, you can study it 'til your heart's content." She jogged along the rough edge of a hole that fell down through too many decks to see the bottom. "Looks like it's had the shit kicked out of it at some point." She pointed to the beams sticking out of the muck.

"What in the name of buratrum …?" Nihlus pointed to a small platform a deck down, the entire surface covered in broken pods and a pile of suppurating … filth? "Tarc," he whispered after a second, "those are limbs. It's a pile of bodies."

Shepard looked up, nodding a little as she saw the lower half of a body in Phoenix armour sticking out of another pile. Pressing her eyes closed, she tossed out one of her Hail Mary passes … a prayer thrown into the universe, just in case someone listened.

Please let Garrus find Ash alive.
"Let's move on. Hey, Mordin … wait for the rest of the class. Don't make me force you to hold your buddy's hand." She followed the salarian toward another pile of bodies, stopping to stare down at an arm lying all by itself in the middle of the deck. Somewhere, out in the dim haze, someone shouted, the words lost as they drifted through the ship, skeletal sounds scraping over the ship's remains.

"Disgusting," the salarian mumbled. "Despicable." His boots made strange, almost cheery little plopping sounds as he ran over to the pile of bodies, ever-present omnitool already scanning.

Shepard glanced at her HUD. There must be a little air present for her to be able to hear Mordin's footsteps and the ghostly noises of the ship. Still, no one could pay her enough to take off her helmet. A sharp, bitter laugh bit into the back of her throat: that made for one hell of a deviation from the norm.

"Why are these piles of bodies just left lying?" Jack muttered, shying away from the very arm Shepard couldn't tear her eyes off of.

"Test subjects from control group," Mordin supplied. "Discarded after completion of experiment."

That broke the arm's hold on Shepard, and she tore her eyes away, starting back down the corridor. "They might just be the lucky ones. Back in formation." She glanced at Giran, the prothean silent and outwardly calm. Still, the eyes that looked back into Shepard's mirrored the group's horror.

"Uniformed officers. Alliance," Nihlus pointed out a couple of bodies in dress blues as they ran past a small cluster of the disposed. "All the colonies they've taken have been in the Terminus."

"Ships go missing all the time," Jack said, disdain dripping through the words. "Think the Alliance is going to admit that they're losing ships … actual fucking useful members of their little tribe … to the collectors?"

Shepard let that pass. Hackett might know about those sorts of things, but she doubted he confided in Anderson much anymore. She needed to contact the Alliance and the council soon. They probably already knew about her return, but it might be a bonus to make it official.

Another two corridors and the deck opened into a wider area. At the far end of the platform, a row of medical scanning beds lined the edge in a loose semi-circle. Collectors laid out on a few, pods on the remainder.

"Mordin!" Shepard waved the salarian away from a computer interface along the side wall that held him rapt. Answering his annoyance with a sharp smile, she shook her head. "Trust me, you're going to want to see this." She turned to the scanning pod, scrolling through the files, searching for anything that triggered recognition from Tashac.

"Medical stations," Mordin said, his voice high with scientific excitement. He hurried down the line, going from one bed to the next. "Their own species." Fingers flying over the interface of his tool, he settled into muttering to himself. At least some things never changed.

Shepard let out a frustrated growl when Tashac gave her nothing. Apparently, turning the collectors into drones had supplanted the prothean language with something else.

"Holy fucking Enkindlers." She didn't respond to all the stares prompted by her outburst. Instead, maintaining her focus on the files, she asked, "EDI, is this reaper language?"

"Comparing to code retrieved from Sovereign and reaper technology from the Thessian base. Analyzing," the AI said. "Stand by."
While waiting for EDI to draw her conclusions, Shepard dove into the files, praying that the organization process didn't deviate too far from what she considered intuitive. The first three files just threw up walls of the collector text and what appeared to be numbers. Data?

"I was able to read some of the information on Thessia," she said, not caring who offered a possible explanation.

"That computer was assembled from prothean technology," EDI replied. "Tashac—"

Shepard sighed. "Right, sorry, EDI. Tashac assembled it from prothean tech."

Giran stepped up next to Shepard. "Is it strange that I very much feel my mother's presence?"

Shepard smiled and squeezed the prothean's shoulder. "Not at all. I feel her with me every moment."

Looking back to the computer, she scrolled down, hitting a file with a decidedly different looking name. A map opened. Sliding the map across to a large vid screen between the computer terminals, Shepard stepped in close. "It's a galaxy map."

Nihlus closed in behind her, his talons skating across the small of her back, the casual support wrapping a thread of comfort around her as he pressed close to her side. After a second, he pointed out several sites with the same blue glyphs. "All these clusters have been hit."

Nodding, Shepard gestured to several others that bore the same marking, but in white. "These are human colonies, but the rest aren't."

"Two of these clusters have turian colonies in them, and this third has a series of multi-racial science bases studying a solar abnormality," Nihlus said, pointing them out. He shrugged when she raised a questioning eyebrow at him. "Corporate espionage case for Councillor Tevos." That explained, he filled his lungs, broad shoulders rolling back, the Spectre at work. Spirits, she'd missed the Spectre … her partner … the torin who made everyone around him feel as though he had everything under control.

"This one has an asari science base," he said, leaning on one hip. He crossed his arms, his head jutting forward as he stared at the projection. "Even though I don't know most of the marked sites, they must all possess some commonality." His voice dropped, subvocals thickening. After thirty seconds, he reached past her, zooming in on the Crescent Nebula, then on Tasale. "Look, Illium is marked."

"Noveria?" she asked, his spark of inspiration igniting a matching one inside her skull. Standing back, she allowed him manipulate the image. After a second, she let out a short, sharp breath, her gut twisting, an old flagpole rag in a gale. "Yep, it's tagged."

Without needing her to ask, Nihlus zoomed out, and then in on Widow. "The Citadel too." He shook his head, his subvocal negating the need for words. "I bet all of these marked colonies and all of the ones that have disappeared so far were ones with Leviathan orbs."

Shepard nodded, knowing her dilan's stomach was tied just as tight as hers. "I wouldn't take that bet. EDI, when you get a chance, investigate that connection, please."

"I can already confirm that both people and leviathan indoctrination orbs were removed from all the human colonies that have been abducted to date," EDI replied. "Extrapolating from your interest, I would guess that you're hypothesizing that they are investigating a means to counteract the leviathan indoctrination."
Shepard nodded at the statement. "Is that what they're doing with these pods?" She looked down at the dead collector in the closest one, taking a single step to close in on it. "But why would they be studying themselves?"

"I have been able to ascertain that the collectors were running baseline genetic comparisons between their species and humanity," EDI replied. "From the preliminary data, I surmise that your guess is correct, Shepard. They are seeking ways to change human neural pathways to better replace leviathan indoctrination with the reaper version. I will continue to examine the data."

After another moment, Shepard turned away from the console and the bed with its deceased collector subject. "Come on, we can add this to the list of things we can worry about once we capture this thing." She turned to Giran. "You holding up okay?"

The prothean nodded, her face twisted into a furious grimace. "These things are a sick mockery of my people." She glanced around and shuddered. "I regret asking to accompany you. To witness the sick mockery the reapers have made of my people ..." She struck out across the space to a door on the far side, its two halves sealed open by crud.

Shepard followed, pausing just inside the doors, her eyes catching a glint of painted steel. A pile of weapons lay discarded in the filth, including a Widow, very like Legion's. She grinned and heaved the massive weapon up off the floor. After looking it over, she passed it to Nihlus. "Carry this, please?"

He took it from her hands. "A present for Garrus?" After examining it, he let out a grunt of approval and holstered it on his back. "Don't suppose you see a nice shotgun in there?"

Shepard rooted for a second, then shook her head. "Sorry, old guy. You've already got one of all these." She patted his arm. "Come on, let's get the holy living fuck out of here."

Jack muscled in behind Shepard. "What? Are you fucking kidding me? You're going to leave a Claymore lying here?" The biotic snatched it out of the muck and held it up, examining it like some priceless gem. "Damn, this thing weighs a fucking ton." She turned toward Wrex, a wide grin replacing the usual snarl. "Get your ass in here. There's a Revenant for Christ's sake!" She glared at Shepard as if she'd walked away from a litter of orphaned puppies in a snow bank.

Letting out a laugh that turned into something twisted and gnarled as the space warped it, Shepard pressed on. "Grab what you want and let's get to that damned computer uplink."

An eerie silence seeped into the vacuum left behind when Jack and Wrex stopped fighting over the pile of weapons. Screams and indistinct yells led them on, ghostly wails in the dim light. A couple of corridors in, a long, tiered ramp led upward.

"Looks like we're heading toward some central part of the ship," Shepard muttered, mostly to herself.

"There are pods all along the ceiling," Mordin mused. He held up his omnitool. "Ninety-five percent filled. Occupants dead."

"I can't help but count that a blessing," Nihlus replied, his voice soft and flat. Shepard dropped one hand from her Mattock, holding it behind her. His talons closed around it, the pressure comforting in that endless graveyard.

For that was what it amounted to. Nothing but stillness, sounds that her brain translated as wind and ghostly shrieks, the damned reaching out with spectral arms, skeletal fingers scraping down her Shepard turned the corner at the top of the ramps, stopping so suddenly that her toe caught on the edge of a crust-tile. The space around her stretched … she didn't have words to describe the size of that massive open area. "Wha …?"

"Ship bays," Giran supplied, walking past Shepard. "A cruiser this size carried hundreds of fighters and light frigates. The exterior was the living space, labs, offices, and control rooms for twelve thousand protheans at the height of its service." A soft, musical sigh paled as it escaped, another specter amidst thousands. "Just like my people, the reapers turned it into a monster, a decayed insult to its true nature and purpose."

"Are those pods?" Nihlus asked, gesturing to the glowing, amber-coloured walls, millions … no billions … of them coating the inner surface. "Spirits, they could take every human off every colony and still not fill the smallest fraction of them." He closed on Shepard, one hand pressing into the small of her back.

She understood his need for connection. The space breathed and groaned, as if they stood inside the belly of a vast creature, its appetite so great that it could devour entire planets and just keep eating. A shiver ran down her spine, her chest aching, her fingers tingling and numb, suddenly cold. Reality whispered on that wind, screaming through baffles made from the trapped and dead, but she couldn't force the words up her throat.

"Even a dozen of these things could wipe out the homeworlds," Jack said, joining them, her arm pressed against Shepard's, her voice tiny and sounding so very young again. "They're going after Earth, aren't they?"

Nodding, Shepard wrapped an arm around Jack's shoulders. "They think they are, but we'll stop them." The young woman allowed the contact for almost two seconds, before shoving Shepard away. The captain nodded, resolute, as she said, "All this means … " She waved at the pods, a wide, aggressive gesture. "... is that they underestimate us. That gives us one hell of an advantage."

"Can we get on with the springing the trap and killing collectors?" Wrex grumbled, breaking the spell. Enkindlers bless the old grump.

"Definitely." Mattock back at low ready, Shepard set out, keeping her gaze on her footing rather than letting the void above her head, and the terror that it provoked, suck her in. The path led alongside the cavernous docking bay for another hundred metres, the red blip on Shepard's HUD tantalizingly close. A ramp led down into a circular space, massive conduits arching over the bulkheads to feed a computer console on an open platform.

"Lack of collector bodies supports trap hypothesis," Mordin said, his SMG replacing his omnitool. "Suggest extreme caution."

"Yeah, this is where they'll spring it," Shepard agreed, standing before the glowing interface. "EDI, get through their firewalls and take control of everything you can as fast as you can. Doors and access ways in particular. We'll need you to control the flow of bad guys."

"Understood, Shepard."

Leaning over the controls, Shepard hurried through the uplink. Thank goodness all the actual hardware controls were written in prothean.

"I'm in," EDI said before the captain could ask. "I've located Chief Williams's team. Registering three erratic life signs. Sending coordinates to General Vakarian's team. Mapping route to—"

"What the hell was that?" Lt. Cortez shouted in Shepard's ear. "EDI, the collectors are using your uplink to infiltrate our systems.

The platform shook, the conduits around its edge letting out massive bangs, the reverberation so strong that it tossed Jack onto her backside.

Shepard clung to the console and managed to stay on her feet. "What's going on up there?" she demanded as she turned to watch the ramp for any sign of collectors.

"A massive power surge, Captain," Cortez replied. "EDI managed to bleed it off through non-critical systems, but they're still trying to burrow into the Ypres's computers."

"Hold them off, EDI." No sooner had the words escaped Shepard's mouth and the platform began to turn beneath them. "Weapons hot, people," she called, hanging onto the console once again. "Here we go." The platform twisted several more times, lifting up like a screw backing out of wood. When it stopped turning, it soared upward, leaving Shepard's gut three decks down.

"We need your help here, EDI," she called as the platform stopped a good fifty or so metres up. "I'm working as fast as I can, Shepard. Linking Legion in."

Shepard scarcely had time to breathe before the AI reported back that Legion and the chia had joined her efforts, but the specifics flew past her as she focused on the line of platforms soaring toward them.

"Holy fuck," Jack whispered. She glanced at Giran. "You said twelve thousand protheans lived on ships like this?"

"I did," Giran answered, the prothean's voice solid and determined. "They'll finally know the peace of the antecessors' embrace."

"Jesus fuck, I'm more worried about meeting my ancestors," the biotic said, going from whisper to holler in under five seconds. "There's no fucking way to keep them off us out here, Shepard."

Shepard nodded, but gripped Jack's shoulder, trying to ease her down. They needed to focus and stay cool. "EDI, get us down on the ground."

Three of the collector platforms swooped in, butting up against theirs on three sides. "Wrex, Mordin take the right. Giran, Jack, Dasik the center. Nihlus, you and I'll cover the left." Her people ran to take duck down behind the three-sided console, bullets and powers flying even before they reached cover.

"Use throw, concussive shot, and shockwave," Jack yelled over the splendid symphony of firearms. "Teach these fuckers to fly!" Crowing at the top of her lungs, the young biotic sent three collectors flying into the air and right over the side of their platforms.

The collectors didn't scream as they fell, that fact more unsettling the massive husk amalgams lumbering across the platforms, their one husk-arm firing heavy cryo blasts.

Shepard focused her shots on the two visible heads, waiting for the cannon to fire before popping up to respawn her drone and fire off a heat sink's worth of rounds. "EDI! What's happening?" She launched Droney on the right and tossed her defense turret out left.
"Beta and Charlie squads are taking fire. Controlling collector attack corridors," the AI reported. "We are simultaneously fighting firewalls and brute force attacks."

Five more platforms swooped in, latching onto the first three, their occupants—about eight collectors per—weaving around knee wall defenses and computer consoles. Luckily, that gave her people the opportunity to pick them off a few at a time.

"Come on, EDI," Shepard called. "You've got this."

"Shepard, large unit coming in at your two."

Shepard popped up out of cover to empty a clip in the giant just in time to take a cryo blast from its cannon. She staggered back, the cold searing through her armour even as it locked up its joints. Damn. She bit through her bottom lip, staggering to keep her balance. Nihlus reached up and dragged her down behind the cover. The thirty seconds or so it took for her armour to thaw felt like fifteen years.

"Move to outside cover," Nihlus shouted. "They're coming in from behind." He hooked a hand under Shepard's armpit and hauled her up. "Jack stay with Shepard, keep the frontside clear."

"Four more platforms coming in from behind!" Wrex hollered, his tone one of celebration rather than worry. He slapped Nihlus's shoulder, nearly dropping the Spectre to the deck. "You ready for this, princess?" His taunts and war cries shattered and melted the sheets of ice wrapped around all of Shepard's internal organs.

She laughed and slapped a heat sink into her weapon. "Bring them on, Uncle Urdnot. Bring them on. Team pyjak locked and loaded."

EDI broke through Nihlus’s protest that he needed a designation that didn't include a tiara. "I have partial control of collector systems, Shepard. All berthed flying platforms are locked down. Powering down deployed platforms."

"Glory hallelujah, Sister EDI. You glow with the Enkindlers' very own light." Shepard let out massive hoot as the incoming platforms slewed off course, dumping their collector troops into the void as they dropped like stones to the docking bay floor.

"Captain?" Shepard imagined the pawn-shaped hologram cocking its head off to one side.

Laughing, she translated: God, she loved EDI's so-very-literal soul. "I was just saying thank you, EDI. I knew you'd come through." She let out a long breath, grinning at Wrex as he slapped a huge hand down on her shoulder. "Ready for the next round?"

"Always." He laughed, his slow, dangerous chuckle warming Shepard to the tips of her toes. He slapped Jack's back, knocking her into the console. "You ready, varren runt?"

"Fuck off, old man." Despite her words, Jack grinned ear to ear at her new nickname. "You punch like a salarian."

EDI interrupted the escalation halfway through 'I've got the bigger shotgun'. "Returning your platform to deck level away from collector forces. Plotting your path to the extraction point," the AI replied matter-of-a-factly, as if she performed impossible feats to save her people five times a day.

Shepard sobered. "Wait, EDI, how are the other teams doing? Who's taking the most fire?" She paced to the edge of the platform, staring down at the deck beneath them.
"General Vakarian's squad is currently under heavy fire," the AI responded. "Most of the doors in his current location are sealed open by built up organic matter, and I'm unable to channel the collectors away from his team."

Shepard jumped down before the platform landed, fear for Garrus insisting she move … get to him as fast as possible. Wrex landed at her four, Nihlus at her six. "Plot us a path to link up with his squad." The map before the captain's eyes changed, the arrow helping ease her terror. She had a clear path to his location and a solid team behind her. Time to move.

The squad sprinted, EDI managing to keep the collectors locked away from their route, leaving just stragglers that they killed on the move, the squad racing through without injury. Despite EDI controlling the doors—opening to allow them through then closing them behind—an oppressive pressure began to build at the back of Shepard's skull.

It didn't feel like the spiders … more like a band of drying rawhide wrapped around her head than the greasy hand shoving itself between her brain and skull. She looked to Wrex, the krogan moving with smooth, coordinated strength. When his stare met and locked onto hers, she knew he felt it as well. Trap inception: traps within traps. Invisible jaws closed around them.

"EDI, are you certain that you've got control over these doors?" The corridor narrowed, the ceiling dropping until it became little more than a tunnel through the muck. Shepard ducked down, wishing she could pull a collar up to avoid the resin from dripping onto the back of her neck. Despite the armour, she could swear she felt it trickling over her skin.

"Shepard?"

"I feel like we're being funneled into a trap." As she said the words, Shepard stopped, facing two closed doors. Her skin prickled along the length of her spine. Damn it, she shouldn't have said anything.

"Alpha," Garrus's voice shouted in her ear over the roar of gunfire, "we're pinned down in a large, open area. Two of those massive flying things and ground units. Need assist."

Shepard's heart leaped into her throat, then performed a double twist, one and a half somersaults into the pike position, ending with a fantastic belly flop into her guts.

Way to jinx the entire production, Janey.

"Alpha responding. Hold on." She jogged to the doors, her stare fixed on the map. "Two minutes out and we'll be hitting them from the back side, so check your targets." She switched channels. "Charlie, sitrep."

"Only a few smaller units, Captain, moving well," Miranda replied. "We'll achieve our objective in approximately five minutes. Will contact you again at that point."

"Overriding firewall 84692," EDI said even as Shepard acknowledged Miranda. "Take the door to your right." The AI's unruffled calm felt like a warm hand on the back of Shepard's neck, slowing her frantic pulse. Garrus had a hell of a team with him, and in two minutes her people would have his back.

The door slid open, revealing a small space, glass walls on the far side, and a handful of knee walls arranged so as to make her wonder what the space could have been used for. The placement almost seemed artistic. Distant gunfire pulled Shepard forward to a ramp leading down.

"The grand gallery," Giran said, running her fingers over the wall just inside the door as she ran past. "It used to be a place of great beauty, the spiritual center of the vessel. Vast gardens and art filled this entire section of the ship."

"And it makes one hell of a strategic muster location if fighting off a boarding party," Nihlus added, jogging past Shepard to take point. "Collectors ahead," he called, leading them down, then racing for the nearest cover.

Shepard ran ahead, ducking behind a short wall to Nihlus's right as collectors flew in from above, landing at the far end of the room. She launched Droney and threw her turret out then opened fire. Slowly, the team moved up, taking out the two dozen or so collectors that came at them.

When the last one went down, Shepard jumped up, thighs trembling from spending so much time crouched. Oh well, she'd have to work out their weakness on the move. The corridor led around a corner, then dropped down a good four metres.

"This is where they'll hit us hardest," Wrex muttered before jumping down. "They'll seal up the doors on the far end, and we've got nowhere to go."

Shepard crouched, pressing her hand to the ground, then eased herself over the edge. She didn't dare do anything crazy, even a jump she could have done with her eyes closed before she died. The sound of gunfire grew louder but not as loud as she expected.

Darting ahead, she took cover behind a low railing overlooking a vast chamber, Garrus's team pinned down behind two of the knee walls near a door on the far side. Shepard opened a channel to Garrus, adding in her squad. "Emergency comms only. General, we're at your twelve, hitting their back side."

Using hand signals, she sent Nihlus and the two protheans down the sloping ramp and into cover in the back corner. The enemy wouldn't be able to circle around and get behind them. She kept Mordin with her, and sent her berserkers down to the floor, taking position where they could support Garrus with their biotics, keeping the ground units back.

"Mordin, we're going to focus on the large units." The rhythm and pulse of battle settled her heart and mind back where they belonged, focusing everything into crystal clarity. Garrus's people held their ground, Martin fighting like a god in his frame armour.

"Hit it with incinerate and then follow up with cryo, see if you can't break down its armour." Even as he muttered his reply about her theory being a sound one, she reached back and shrugged the collector heavy particle beam into her hand. She waited until the closest monster shot its particle beams before she stood and fired, aiming the weapon's beam straight into its eyes. When the beams shut down, she continued firing, counting off the reset time. Her HUD showed the fucking thing taking massive damage, but it just didn't go down. It slammed into the ground five metres away from Garrus, Vincent, and Samara and let out a shockwave that threw them out of cover.

Shepard froze for a half-second when the thing opened its mouth, revealing the dozen or so husk heads inside. They shrieked, a baleful mockery of a choir, the sound throwing out a wave of sound and energy. Garrus scrambled up, counter-intuitively running away from their cover. Snatching at one of Samara's arms, he dragged her after him.

Garrus!

Bending, she picked up a huge chunk of the floor scale and heaved it at the gigantic unit. "Over here, you fucker!" Shepard shouted. It turned, strafing the entire room … all her people's positions but for Nihlus's with its twin particle beams. Wrex went down behind cover, cursing up a storm, his armour smouldering where it had been sliced through.

"Uncle Urdnot, you okay over there?" she shouted, sending in Droney and her turret then checking how much bang she had left in the particle cannon. "Samara, Wrex, Jack, Kaidan, tear down that thing's barriers." She checked her HUD, the rest of the battle playing out behind her eyes. "Once we've got it back down to armour, hit it with everything incendiary you've got. Martin, keep the other one busy with your rocket launcher."

"Don't get close to them," Garrus added, his voice breathy and laced with pain. "That triggers the choir attack."

"You heard the general. Stay clear, and bring them down fast." The biotics working in concert brought the monster's shield down in under five seconds. She sent a blast of incinerate searing into the thing's armour the second she saw the energy barrier fall, then opened fire. The thing exploded into flame, then crashed into a burning pile of slag.

"Excellent work," Shepard hollered. "Next. Same deal." Even as she spoke, the second closed in on Garrus's team, twenty collectors racing in to flank it, covering its recharge cycle. "Baby Jesus H Christ in a handbag, where are they all coming from? EDI, are the doors locked down behind the general's squad?"

"They are, Shepard. The far door on the right leads to a control room. Registering Chief Williams's team behind it." The AI's unflappable tone that had registered as calming minutes before now felt like a cheese grater slicing up Shepard's every last nerve.

"Can you patch me through to the chief, EDI?" Shepard stood, taking fire as she assessed the battlefield. The phalanx of collector legionaries with their prætorian at the head closing in on Garrus faster than her people could whittle them down.

"We've got to pull that thing toward you, Wrex," she called, sidestepping down the curved bit of railing. "Garrus, Martin … when we pull it this way, get your people over on the back wall. We're away from the doors, but at least they can't flank—"

"We've got husks crawling up from below on two sides!" Nihlus hollered. "Garrus, get out of there before you're cut off."

Shepard swapped the particle beam for Ingrid and jumped up, striding down the ramp putting down collectors with headshots. Headshot, reload. Headshot, reload. The gun pounded out the familiar rhythm, but no matter how many she took down, more replaced them from below.

Twelve thousand? That was what Giran said. The thirteen of them couldn't take out twelve thousand. A few of their guns hadn't been changed to the heat sink model, but even so, if a thousand enemy came at them, they'd be dead long before they took down that many.

"Samara's down!" Martin called out. In an act of stupidly reckless heroism, the kid scooped the asari into his arms and raced toward Nihlus's position, knocking husks on their asses on his way through. He leaped the last five metres and crouched to set her down.

"Collector foot units are falling." Shepard moved in behind a massive pillar, giving herself a better angle at the collectors. If they could just thin them out, Garrus could get the rest of the team across the floor.

"Going in," Mordin called. "Stay in cover."

Right, like she was going to hide behind the pillar while Mr. Crazy-Pants ran off on some salarian suicide mission.

The salarian raced in behind the massive unit, his tall but willowy body making it appear all the more humungus by comparison. He shoved a package—it looked like his belt pouches—up inside one of its leg joints.

"Tactical error," he said, as calm as marshmallows on hot chocolate. Running along beside it as it spun, he yanked on his arm, trying to free it from the machine's inner workings.

"Mordin, get out of there." Bringing Ingrid's scope to her eye, Shepard ran out of cover, peppering its head with constant shots. Too bad machines didn't get pissed off.

One second, she raced for Mordin, the next … the hand of God swept her off the deck plating like someone brushing lint from their shoulder. She felt the vague sense of spinning, then blackness crashed in on her. Fighting against it, clawing at the ground with her fingertips, she screamed into a clenched jaw as the pads peeled off, refusing to pass out. That big bastard hadn't gone down; she couldn't pass out until her people were safe back aboard the Ypres.

Heaving herself up onto her hands and knees she crawled for the nearest cover, a long section of half-wall protecting Nihlus and the protheans. "Wrex? Are you up?" she called, flipping up her visor to take a useless swipe at the blood flowing across her vision. A pile of unmoving frame armour lay slumped against the far wall, the white of Mordin's armour just visible behind it. The kid must have grabbed the salarian, shielding him from the blast. She flipped the visor down and breathed in. "Martin?"

A thin groan answered her. "Alive, but I can't move; armour's motor is fucked. Mordin's unconscious but breathing."

"Mordin's explosion took out Wrex and Jack," Nihlus called over the roar of his shotgun. "Husks have Javik and Alenko down, but Giran's got them covered for now, and Alenko is still throwing his biotics around."

"Fuck." Things were going the way of Virmire. At this point they'd be lucky to get anyone out. "How long was I out?" Reaching behind her she felt only the Mattock and empty particle gun. Shrugging the Mattock into her hands, she checked her heat sinks. Fifteen. Fuck! Fuck the damned heat sinks and the bastards who came up with them.

"Two minutes at most," Nihlus replied between firing his shotgun at anything approaching Garrus's position. "We need reinforcements; the bastards are getting up from below on both sides. Lawson, where's your team?"

Ignoring his conversation with Miranda, Shepard glanced over at Nihlus … the bodies sprawled behind him vague, almost hazy, as if the part of her that could see them didn't want to. Miranda was too far away, and the dead had nothing to offer, the injured even less, their heatsinks already used and gone. Swiping the blood from her eyes again—damn, now she remembered why she hated helmets—she turned back to face the praetorian. Wait … smoking pieces of the thing spread across the floor … Mordin's charge worked.

"Another fucking praetorian? How many of these fucking things do they have?" Giving her head a hard, quick shake she shoved herself up, using the cover to keep herself balanced. "Do you see Ingrid anywhere?" Damn, she needed that gun. As soon as she got back to Archangel, her Mattock was getting a downgrade.

"Who's the asshole who decided on the damned heatsink upgrade?" she muttered under her breath.
A grumbling sort of chuckle from Nihlus told her that he heard her. She chuffed, the sound weak even for her usual. "Cover me. There are a few within scrambling range. When I get back to cover, I'll draw its fire while you help Garrus."

Nihlus cussed, the word's vulgarity telling her everything she needed to know about his opinion of her plan. Still, he breathed out, the sound so resolute, it lit the path before her. "I'll draw it's particle beam. The second it goes out, run. You've got—"

"Ten seconds before it recharges," she finished, annoyance crackling through the ten kilo weights dragging from every muscle. "I know. Don't get yourself killed. I really want that wedding." She held one hand behind her, his talons closing around her fingers.

The solid, light abrasion of Nihlus's mouth nuzzled the back of her knuckles, just the faintest brush of hope, and then he pulled away, his boots shuffling across the thick layer of corruption crusted on the deck panels. Pressing her back to the wall, she slid along its length to the end. Glancing out, she plotted her course from heatsink to heatsink, combing her memory she tried to picture the room as they'd fought their way in.

She braced to move, flipped her fucking visor up to swipe at the river of blood running into her eyes. Why hadn't she used medigel? Why did she need to breathe? Halfway to the control, her fingers stalled, the chamber dimming suddenly. Was she passing out? What the in the name of the Enkind—

(A-N: Well, not quite two chapters a week, but this guy turned into a good-sized monster. Hope you enjoy. I wrote it while going through the mission in game. It's the first time I've done that and it was a lot of fun to have the spaces in front of me for designing the battles. :D hugs and floofy kittens with pink bean toes)
"They are not yet strong. They are precious and must be protected, but they are coming." The asari's reply formed a warm, spectral caress, felt rather than heard. "Lead them wisely."

"Who?" Shepard's demand rang in multicoloured flares, fireworks exploding before reaching their full flight. "Who's coming? Amalair? Shiala? For fuck's sake, someone just give me a straight answer and hang up the damned call."

Verro: Husband, male bond-mate.

82 Days ASR

What in the name of the fucking Enkindlers glowing ass cheeks? The darkness deepened behind her eyes; the arctic winter sun setting at noon. Rachni song sparkled on the frosty wind, shivering along the lingering gleam.

Damn it, Amalair! I'm in the middle of a fucking battle. My people are taking fire, and you're really getting to be a pain in the ass with all your metaphysical bullshit. What is it this time?

Bright, musical laughter, chimes on the breeze, trickled over her, gentle fingers trying to pry her from battle and worry. Carried by the rachni queen's laughter, another song appeared and twined through Shepard's thoughts: soft greens and lavender.

Shooting a scowl through the ethereal peace and beauty, she tried to shatter it but failed. Damn it! She didn't have time for a freakin' rachni conference call. "Shiala? Is that you?"

"They are not yet strong. They are precious and must be protected, but they are coming." The asari's reply formed a warm, spectral caress, felt rather than heard. "Lead them wisely."

"Who?" Shepard's demand rang in multicoloured flares, fireworks exploding before reaching their full flight. "Who's coming? Amalair? Shiala? For fuck's sake, someone just give me a straight answer and hang up the damned call."

Instead of a reply, gold threads appeared in the black, weaving between the members of her team, gilt auras wrapping around each. The glittering cocoons shone brighter around those still up and fighting, others less so … two as pale as the night before the new moon. Before she could move to them, a brilliant, crimson flash sparked in the distance, closing quickly. It … no, they … they were aboard the collector vessel, the single light branching into fifteen fiery points as they closed on her position. Rachni? Sweet baby Jesus … rachni? Really?

"Amalair?" She pushed away the new light, gripping tight to each gold thread. "I don't have time to decipher your Sergeant Pepper's Magical Mystery Tour. My people …."

"They are precious, guard them well," Shiala's voice repeated above Amalair's chiming joy.

Hearing that joy, Shepard understood. For the first time in even the queen's memory, the rachni charged into battle as allies rather than enemies. Unable to put how honoured she felt into words, she replied with the brilliant, metallic blue and thundering, choral notes her heart associated with brotherhood.

The gold threads solidified, pushing back the darkness. Her people appeared, all still in their positions: Martin acting as cover for Mordin, Nihlus staring at her, expecting her to move.

Heat sinks. Right.

"Shepard," Cortez called in her ear, "we have an unknown ship approaching the collector ship's hangar."

"It's okay, LT. It's the rachni coming in to assist," she called as she scrambled for the first sink. "Don't fire on them." She scooped up the sink and sprinted for the next, still in a crouch. The image of a blue and gold armoured frog-like critter scuttling from sink to sink flashed through her mind.

Oh, for frick's sake. That's how the rachni see me? Not exactly flattering.

She scuttled to the next heat sink, then the next, cheeks burning inside her helmet.

Note to self: give the rachni some gloriously heroic image to associate with me, regardless of the dignity of what I'm doing.

Rachni warriors raced down the upper level, along the balcony where she'd entered, taking positions in cover. Damn … how was she to command them well when she had almost no idea of their skills? Beating her way through a flood on them on Noveria amounted to the extent of her experience, and she'd spent most of that fight blind thanks to rabid-worker-splat. What had the warriors come at them with? Acid … right, acid that cut through shields and barriers.

"Rachni, stay in cover," she shouted, then realized that she didn't need to. They'd hear her orders inside her head, probably before she thought of them. And, indeed, the eight hunkered down out of the praetorian's fire and began pelting it with bursts of acid that sailed right through its barriers, the metal beneath melting into slag. Plucking up the rest of the heat sinks in a rush, Shepard raced toward Garrus's cover.

"Change of plans." She ducked behind the wall next to Garrus and opened her omnitool to scan her verro: exhaustion, shock, a few holes he hadn't started the day with, but hanging in there. Except, his blood pressure was falling … that meant a bleed. "Alpha and Charlie focus on the smaller units. Once the rachni get the big guy down, they'll block the routes from below with webbing. Give them cover."

"Arate!" Dasik's shout sliced through the room, yanking Shepard's attention from the big picture. Crimson and gold armour raced across the floor, disappearing into the brilliant blue of the praetorian's particle beams. Giran stumbled backwards, reeling from a hearty shove, nearly falling right back into the beam.

Shepard dashed out from behind her knee wall, covering the distance in three strides. Looping an arm around Giran's waist, she dragged the prothean behind Nihlus's cover.

"—at," Nihlus replied. "The big one is going down fast, prepare to cover the rachni."

"Mordin, are you up?" Shepard hollered, all her fear and nerves and frustration igniting into a plan, as bright gold as the rachni queen's webs. Her people … those gilt webs tied them together, and they would get them through everything and anything. She just needed to get back to Garrus's cover.
"Mobile, Shepard," the salarian replied as Shepard dove across the space, dodging from cover to cover. "Can see to wounded."

Shepard sucked in a couple of quick, burning breaths. "Excellent. EDI, as soon as the sides of this room are sealed, get the door open so Mordin can see to Ashley's squad." Shepard tossed her remaining gun hands the sinks, watching how easily they caught them to judge their condition. Jack fumbled but didn't drop hers. Good. She glanced toward Kaidan's position a little further down Garrus's cover. "Sparky, what's your status?"

The LT heaved himself up onto his knees then into a wobbly crouch. "I can help with Ash's wounded."

"So can I," Vincent called from Nihlus's location.

The praetorian went down in a storm of sparks, the acid devouring its internal workings. Before Shepard could do more than let out a relieved sigh, seven tiny rachni workers raced out, spinning webs over the open sections of floor at a mind-boggling speed.

"Opening left hand door," EDI called. "Still registering three life signs within."

"Excellent, EDI. How complete is your control of the computers?" Shepard stood, and hurried over, reaching down to help Kaidan to his feet. "Come on, Sparky."

"Control is ninety-five percent, Shepard," the AI replied. "Collectors on the main terminals still fighting to break through my firewalls. They're holding. Deployment of the high intensity radiation weapon will negate resistance."

"Hey!" The bellow came from Jack. "Won't that kill everyone? There could be thousands of people still alive in this fucking ship. Innocent people!"

"The only human life signs registering on my scans are within your perimeter," EDI replied. "All humans in pods are deceased."

"Killed when collector vessel lost power," Mordin confirmed, helping Martin out of his smashed frame.

Jack hobbled over to the salarian. "But you said that mist inside those fucking pods was proof they were being kept alive." She grabbed Martin, hauling the kid to his feet with Mordin's help. "You said they were being kept alive."

"Jack, it's okay," Shepard said, trying to calm the biotic down before she hurt herself or someone else. "This ship will give us the answers we need to make sure this doesn't happen to anyone else." Looking up, she met Jack's stare, gut untying only once the young woman's fury cooled to determination. "Even though we can't save these people, we'll avenge them and save anyone else from meeting their fate. Okay?"

"No one else goes through this fucking nightmare," Tossing Shepard a determined nod dripping with 'fuck you' attitude, the young biotic accepted Martin's help to limp over and protect the rachni workers. "Let's get the fuck out of here."

"Roger that." Shepard wrapped her arm around Kaidan's waist and helped him to the side door. Eight bodies lay on the deck plating, five of them still wearing helmets. Faint mist drifted from the nose and mouth of the three without, proving Shepard's hypothesis that the ship maintained some atmosphere.
"Here, I'll get Chief Williams's team ready to move, you take care of getting us out of here." Nihlus stepped into Kaidan's other side, relieving her of the LT's weight.

"Cortez, I need you and EDI to find us an exit route. It needs to give both Charlie and our squad the clearest, shortest shot to the shuttle." She poised over the controls for her omnitool, mind racing as she tried to find them a fast, secure way off the damned ship.

"Captain!" Cortez broke through, his voice tight, control wrapped around a core of fear, "the collector vessel just started to power up. We've got twenty minutes before it's at full power."

Shepard spun and strode back into the large chamber, a sharp demand crawling up her throat: how had EDI lost control over the vessel? She stopped part way, crouching next to Garrus, a growing navy stain shining against his metallic blue armour. "You okay, Callor?" She checked his medigel. Out. Fuck a doodle doo. She pulled two injectables out of her pack, stabbing them through his underarmour between plates. "Talk to me, big guy."

"I'll be fine." The slur in his voice tossed her heart up into her throat as it told her quite the opposite ... that he'd lost more blood than showed. He reached up and touched the side of her helmet for a second before the hand dropped back into his lap. She caught his talons in hers and squeezed them, trying to keep her worry hidden. His usually strong, adroit digits trembled even as he reassured her, "I just ... rest a minute."

"Okay, General, let's get you a little help." She looked up, searching for Nihlus, finding him crouched next to Ashley, the chief sitting up her back to the wall. "Nihlus, Garrus is going to need help to get to the shuttle."

A low, harsh chuckle answered her, but not from Nihlus. Grunt left Wrex propped up against the bulkhead, the clan chief bellowing that he just needed food. Large, swaggering steps crossed the floor to stop at Shepard's side, one of Grunt's hands landing on the top of her helmet. "I'll take care of him, Shepard."

She squeezed Garrus's hand. "Hang in there, verrro. We're going to have to run like the lightning's chasing us." She slapped Grunt's shoulder. "Take care him, Grunt. Carry him if you have to; just ignore the arguing and get him out of here safely."

Without waiting for the krogan to supply a reassurance she didn't need, Shepard turned her attention to getting her people off the collector vessel post haste. The war effort needed the ship, their scientists needed to be able to take apart the collector technology, so whether or not all three squads made it to the shuttle, the radiation pulse needed to go off. That was priority one, but damn it, she wouldn't let the collectors steal the future Nihlus dreamed for the three of them.

First things first. "EDI, I want all the open areas mapped in red on my HUD. You'll be controlling the doors, the rachni will make sure the collectors can't flank us from above or below again. Cortez, get that shuttle as close as possible."

Shepard opened a channel to Miranda, cutting off the pilot's reply. "Charlie, report in."

"Pulse device is placed and primed, Captain." Miranda hesitated. "We're making our way toward your position, anticipating new extraction route and rendezvous. We've met minimal resistance, so I estimate seven minutes. We'll meet you to help with the wounded, Captain. Over."

That helped settle Shepard's racing heart. They could use the extra hands. Reaching out to Giran, she helped the prothean arate to her feet, trying to judge the extent of her wounds. "Good to hear." As the words came out, she glanced back at Garrus, her husband still half-lying on the floor. "But, if we're not at the rendezvous in time for the Ypres to escape before the collectors reaches full power, leave without us and trigger the pulse."

"Shepar—"

"Just do it, Miranda. No argument. Shepard, out." The words dropped, crashing into that corrupted place with a finality that shut the operative up, and turned every eye to stare at her.

"Guess we'd better get fucking moving," Jack said, striding toward Mordin with purpose despite her limp. "Doc, my leg." When the salarian turned his omnitool on her and pronounced her fit enough, the young biotic demanded a painkiller then set right into work, cursing up a storm and strong-arming the wounded onto their feet. "It's move or die, so get your asses up. I'm not dying in this shithole for you fucking lot."

The rachni workers completed their work, blocking the openings to the lower decks. Instead of moving to the exit, they hurried over to Wrex. Even as the krogan complained and took badly aimed swipes at them, the little fellows wove a tight web around Wrex's leg and arms, binding the broken bones. As soon as they finished their work, the clan chief heaved himself up off the floor, his grumbling taking on a note of approval as the webbing supported him.

"Sixteen minutes," Cortez said, his countdown dropping, a boulder in the ship's eerie silence. And it was silent, the absence of the echoing screams and cries ringing in Shepard's ears.

She ground her teeth and shoved it aside. A quick glance over her shoulder reassured Shepard that her people had the wounded in order. The rachni moved between people, silently binding limbs, making lattice-type crutches, and constructing a basket for Samara, which two warrior rachni suspended between them. Damn, if they weren't going to prove indispensable. How long ago would the reapers have been exterminated if the races befriended the rachni instead of trying to wipe them out?

"Everyone ready to evacuate?" she hollered, just to kill the hush. "Nihlus take point, start them moving. I'll walk drag." Shepard crouched next to Dasik, scanning the prothean. Dead. Damn. Another set of armour lay jumbled beneath Dasik's corpse. Javik! Fuck! She scanned the prothean commander. Had he too charged in to save Giran?

"I need help over here," she called, discovering faint lifesigns. Glancing up when Kaidan's feet landed beside her, she saw that Vincent had taken care of Sparky's mobility. Shepard rolled Dasik's body off Javik's, giving Kaidan room to help.

"He's in bad shape, Shepard," Kaidan said, shaking his head. "We …"

"I can't … " Ashley's voice broke through the channel. "I can't leave them." The futile, and time consuming, sound of scuffling grabbed Shepard by the scrub and yanked her the handful of metres into the side room where Ash battled Mordin and Nihlus. The second she saw Shepard, the chief's panicked stare locked on. "Captain, we can't leave them. They're my people, and I dragged them here … thought I could capture the vessel." Rallying her strength, she shoved Mordin aside and climbed hand over hand up Nihlus's arm. "They're my responsibility."

Shepard ran over and slung an arm around Ashley's back. Looking over the chief's shoulder, Shepard gave Mordin a nod. "We're taking too damned long. Come on, people." Damn it. Damn it. "Leave the dead." She turned from Ashley's distraught protests. "Just grab the wounded and run. Jack … Kaidan, if you can hold a barrier around us, so much the better."

"On it." Jack closed her eyes and lifted her hands, a dome of shimmering blue appearing around those already gathered at the door.

"I can help hold it," Sparky replied, leaning heavily on Vincent, "but I'll need someone to be my legs."

Vincent just chuckled as he lifted Kaidan, cradling the LT in his beefy arms. "Not even a challenge, Alenko."

Shepard's distraction worked, Mordin able to slip in and give Ashley a heavy dose of painkillers.
The chief sagged in Shepard's arms, sedated. Mordin and Nihlus helped Shepard lift the larger woman into a fireman's carry before turning to help the rest of the wounded.

"All right, people ... run for it. Rachni workers, stay safe. Rachni warriors, keep behind our gun hands and inside our barriers, but feel free to shoot at anything that comes along." Shepard boosted Ash a little further up her shoulders, then bolted for the door. She didn't know if she could keep up carrying the chief's weight, but she needed to try. "EDI, open the doors right before we get there, and close them right behind."

"Understood."

"Everyone, out front. I'll bring up drag." Shepard herded them out the door, racing after them, no more easy jogs or time to examine curiosities or horrors. All that mattered to Shepard was balancing Ash's weight and keeping air flowing in and out of her lungs. The rachni workers scuttled over Jack and Kaidan's barrier, weaving a web of physical protection over the energy.

Amalair, if I ever bark at you for singing your riddles, remind me of this moment. You've saved our asses.

Rainbow coloured laughter tickled like soda bubbles along Shepard's entire nervous system, and for a moment, Ashley and her heavy armour didn't hang quite so heavy. The effect lasted a tragically short span before a wildfire ignited between muscle fibers in Shepard's thighs. The flames consumed the last drops of fuel rattling around at the bottom of her tank, then started sucking fumes. The muscles that burned began to tremble, the fire leaving the fibres ashen.

"Twelve minutes," Cortez reported. "The shuttle is as close as I can get it." The marker blinked on Shepard's HUD.

"We're moving faster than I expected," she said, wheezing between the words. One step, then the next, her feet beginning to slap the floor, hard and flat-footed. Between EDI on the doors and the rachni workers sealing all the open spaces with their webbing, they moved through relatively unmolested. When a few husks broke through, dashing up a long ramp, the rachni took them down before Shepard could balance Ash and aim her side arm.

Damn, if this isn't the way to attack an enemy ship.

By the time she caught sight of the shuttle just outside a door, the portal half-closed and stuck in collector gunk, Shepard couldn't think further ahead than the next step. Legs weighing a hundred kilos each, she hauled them forward, pain searing up through the nerves every time her foot hit the ground.

A brilliant flare of light yanked her stare from the promising hull of their shuttle to a suspended, glowing form of a collector … one of the bigger ones. Magma seemed to burst through cracks in the creature's carapace like the swarm on the Cerberus base. Damn, she didn't even have the faintest clue what to expect from a possessed collector. Of course, not knowing what to expect sometimes presented opportunities.

All right, Harbinger, you bastard, bring it.

Which, of course he did, a roaring ball of fire incinerating the thin air around it as it spun toward them.

"Really? Fireballs?" Tossing aside the litany of foul words that tumbled into her mouth in favour of air, Shepard launched Dronely and dug in, forcing her legs to move faster.

"Jesus fuck!" Jack shouted as the thing impacted the barrier, all the rachni webbing protecting the outside bursting into flame before crumbling.

Despite wanting to scream out a mate for Jack's swear, Shepard raced through her menu of more responsible options. Almost all of her gun hands carried wounded. "Rachni … stay inside the barrier, but do what you can to take that bastard down." Thanking the sweet baby Jesus that their acid ignored barriers, she focused back on the shuttle, still so impossibly distant.

A door opened on the right hand wall, Miranda's team racing through. In the lead, Thane paused for half a breath before turning and running toward them. Ducking a little as he broke through the barrier, the drell wove through the running wounded, setting pace beside Shepard.

"Give her to me," he ordered, his rolling, deep voice making it sound like the sweetest of pillow talk, a tender request she couldn't possibly refuse.

What? Dear God, she must have jumped all the way past exhausted, diving through loopy to splash down in hallucinating. The moment Thane lifted Ashley from Shepard's shoulders, the captain snatched her side arm from her hip and strode through the barrier.

Yes! Gun in hand, drone and turret launched, make way for hurricane Shepard! I'll show you fireballs, bastard.

Across the chamber, Harbinger-not-Harbinger strode out of a small squad of collectors and shot off what looked like a ball of black flame torn straight out of hell. Shepard tucked her shoulder and rolled under it, staggering to her feet with all the grace of a drunken elcor.

As one of the rachni globs of acid struck the glowing collector, the thing surrendered to the fire within, crumbling to ash that drifted away on the air currents. Before Shepard could celebrate another collector lifted into the air, their skin breaking open with the force of the reaper's possession.

"Take out the regular collectors first!" she called. Glancing back, she saw that the rachni warriors had handed their burdens off to Miranda's team and followed her through the barrier, arranged in a phalanx with her at its head.

"Fuck, yeah! Where in the fuck are the photographers from Badass Weekly when you need them?" Jack crowed, running up to take the captain's four.

Shepard glanced over her raised arm between shots to toss a wide grin at the biotic. "Right? I'll never look more badass." Her steps came stronger, steadying as she angled toward the shuttle, keeping her impromptu squad between the collectors and the wounded.

"Unless you kill a reaper with your bare hands and stand on top of its two-kilometre-tall corpse," Nihlus agreed, stepping in at her eight.
"In the Rosie the Riveter pose," Shepard said, a pointed laugh lancing the air as she imagined her tiny speck self trying to look cool, lost in the mass of a reaper.

"Seven minutes until collector vessel reaches full power," EDI announced, completely killing the moment.

Still, looking far more badass than any of them could reasonably hope to look again, they cut through the remaining collectors, then focused on Harbinger. Soaking up the fire from all eleven of them, the possessed avatar disappeared into ash before Shepard could get more than two shots off.

"Make room on the shuttle!" Shepard called, turning and running for the hatch. "It's going to be a tight fit!" However, instead of heading for the shuttle, the rachni scurried to a door and through. Shepard hesitated, one foot on the shuttle floor, her hand gripping the frame. "Signal when you're clear!" They didn't respond, but she assumed Amalair or Shiala would send her something.

She hopped up, the last in, and pulled the hatch closed. "We're all in. Let's get the hell out of here."

Miranda grabbed Shepard's wrist as the captain shuffled past, her entire being focused on where Garrus slumped in a corner seat. The operative pressed the remote trigger for the radiation device into Shepard's palm. Nodding, she accepted it and the possible burden of killing their rachni allies.

_Time to give it up._

Sitting on the floor, Shepard tucked her knees up into her chest and closed her fingers around Garrus's talons. No call came from Shiala when EDI called out a minute and then thirty seconds. Offering another mental apology to Amalair, Shepard entered the command, sending a blast of flesh melting radiation searing through the collector vessel.

"Radiation pulse successful, Shepard," EDI reported. The AI's usual, unflappable calm had the unusual effect of making Shepard want to slap her hologram. "No life signs registering aboard the collector vessel."

"Thank you, EDI," Shepard said, finally unclenching her jaw and letting out a long breath. She sagged into the space between Garrus's leg and the bulkhead, scooting over a bit to make room for Nihlus. "Anything from the rachni ship? Any sign?"

"That's a negative, Captain," Cortez said, "but we registered a blue shift just prior to the pulse. Unless a stealth ship was hiding in the system, it must have been the rachni."

"EDI, when you can get a clear scan, check for the rachni vessel." Looking up, she met Garrus's unsteady gaze. Worry pressed a heavy hand down onto her heart, making it hard to breathe: he looked shocky. She stripped off his gauntlets to rub his hands and wrists. "You hanging in there, big guy?"

He nodded, even as his eyes sagged closed, his head tipping to one side. "Remember when I said I wanted us to spend some intimate time together?"

Shepard chuckled and squeezed his hand, her fingertips sliding under his glove to make sure his skin remained warm. Sleepiness, slurred speech, lack of coordination, and clammy hide topped the list of turian shock symptoms. Four for four. Not good.

 Damn. "What?" She turned up the heater in his armour then pressed her palm against his cheek. "Sitting crushed together in the corner of the shuttle wasn't what you had planned?"

"Docking with the _Ypres_, Captain," Miranda called back from the cockpit, cutting off Garrus's reply. "The doctors have several stretchers prepared and waiting."

Shepard held her breath until the shuttle hard docked on the Ypres, the metallic thump travelling through the deck plating and into her bones. Scrambling to her feet, careful not to step on anyone, she stretched, then reached to help Garrus up.

"Come on, _verro_, let's get some blood flowing through those veins." Shepard wrapped one of his arms around her shoulders while Nihlus hooked a hand under his other arm. Together, they lifted, both grunting when the general couldn't muster enough strength to stand.

"Well," Shepard said between groans, "we now have proof-positive that turians aren't stuffed with feathers."

Nihlus glanced around the cowl of Garrus's armour. "Hauling me off the floor in the head didn't amount to proof?" His mandibles flicked as he shook his head, his outward cheer made into a lie by the worry in his eyes.

"Maybe turians get lighter as they age?" Shepard shot back. She grinned, holding up her end of the joke as they helped Garrus take slow steps toward the hatch. Luckily, both for her _verro_ and her shaking legs, Chakwas met them at the hatch, stretcher set up along the lip.

"Can you sit on the side, love?" she asked, guiding him into a turn. He hesitated, swaying and unsteady, his arm gripping her against his side hard enough that a low subvocal was all she needed to understand his fear. "Karin, can you and Grunt hold the stretcher tight against the side so it doesn't move?"

"Of course, Shepard," Chakwas replied, waving Grunt over to help.

Garrus looked down into Shepard's eyes, a low susurrous of gratitude and love whispering through his second larynx.

She pressed her lips together in a tight smile and tipped her head at the gurney. "Come on, husband, let's get you upstairs." After helping him sit, she left Nihlus to balance him while she lifted his legs. Only a few, clotting drops of blood dripped from his boot … where the hell had all of it gone?

Orange light reflected off his armour as Chakwas scanned him. "Internal bleeding. We need to get him straight to surgery." She stepped between Shepard and the gurney. "I'll call you when he's in recovery, Captain."

Despite already suspecting the diagnosis, Shepard's heart skipped two beats. She ran alongside for a couple of steps, clinging to Garrus's talons, releasing him at the elevator. "I'll get the geth sorted to take the collector ship to Ploba and be there when the doctors get you all patched up," she promised, holding his stare. "I love you, General." She followed the words with a wink and backed away from the door.

"I'll have him right as rain in an hour, Captain," Chakwas assured her. "I'll keep you apprised."

"Thanks, Doc." Shepard watched the elevator close then turned to see to her people. They'd captured themselves a collector vessel. She needed to make sure they kept it.

(A-N: Luckily for the fic and not at all for me ... my copy of Andromeda doesn't show up until the 30th, at least. I'm still focusing on FI for now, so sorry if you're reading the fics I'm not updating, but so much of my blood has gone into this puppy. :D I'll get back to the others in April. Hugs and assorted sweets. Thanks as always for your support.)
Chapter Summary

Lives and allegiances reach new levels, and Nihlus just might be psychic. :D

Torin - Torini plural. Male turian of the age of majority (15)

Tarin - Tarini plural. Female turian of the age of majority (15)

Dilan - fiancee

Verro - Husband, male bond-mate.

Puer - Pueri plural. Child. Pueriti - Baby / infant under the age of 1

Matrula - Mother (Familiar form Mari equivalent to mom)

83 Days ASR

A soft chime of gratitude and peace breezed through Shepard's thoughts as she stepped over the elevator's threshold. Despite the four different colours of blood staining her clothing, the captain smiled. Eyes closing, she turned—blind—and pressed the control to take her up to the crew deck. "Thank you," she said, her reply lilting, almost singing. "I've been worried about them. And thank you for the help. I would have lost more than three people if it hadn't been for your soldiers and workers."

… lost … her people … Dasik and Javik … one of Ashley's team … still, her people to mourn, their names hers to hold close and do better for ….

A song composed of five perfect notes answered her: a harmony of hope and sorrow. And then Amalair left Shepard alone in her mind once more. Well, as alone as she got inside her standing-room-only skull. Letting out a long sigh of relief, she celebrated the illusory privacy. Most people didn't appreciate the simple peace of having one's thoughts to one's self.

When the elevator door opened, Shepard strode into her cabin. She needed to shower, change and head back down. As much as she feared the consequences, she knew the time had come to tell Miranda what happened to her control chip. Surely the operative suspected after having tried the omnitool a couple of times.

Nihlus sat at her computer, the vid screen/model case showing most of the Archangel inner circle. She stepped behind him, hiding a slow caress down the back of his neck as she nodded to the others.

"Captain Shepard," Nyreen Kandros said, drawing Shepard's attention, "do you have an update on General Vakarian's condition?"

Shepard smiled and nodded. "He came out of his surgery very well," she told them, the news mostly for Nihlus. "When the praetorian—"
"Praetorian?" Nyreen asked, cutting Shepard off. The tarin's mandibles dropped, confusion in her gold stare.

"Sorry, the big, flying constructs with all the husk heads inside their mouths." Shepard's cheeks heated as she dismissed the moment with a single-shoulder shrug. "I call them praetorians in my head, because they seem to be the collectors' elite guard. Anyway, when it threw him back, it tore an artery weakened by the surgeries conducted during his abduction. Dr. Chakwas has done a complete scan of his circulatory system and bulked up any remaining weak spots. He'll be back kicking ass in a couple of days."

She patted Nihlus's shoulder. "I'm going to wash off my hours of nursing duty then head down to talk to Miranda. Did you get a chance to talk to Giran?"

Nihlus let out a soft breath, turning the chair a little to look up into her eyes. "Yes, she's feeling Dasik's loss, but she's determined to push on and help the rest of the protheans."

"Excellent. I'll talk to her when she gets out of medbay." Glancing up at the vid screen, she nodded to the others and patted his shoulder again. She turned away, the motion taking a massive effort as her dilan's gravity insisted that she kiss him before leaving his orbit. Just outside the bathroom door, his pull finally released her, and she ducked inside.

Shepard really didn't know how to feel about Javik's death. He'd passed from the massive burns inflicted by the praetorian's particle beams even before they reached the Ypres. Despite working on him the entire way, Kaidan and Mordin never managed to get him stabilized. Being brutally honest, his death made things a lot less complicated. Of course, her relief just made her feel like the absolute shittiest person in the universe.

She turned on the shower. "I'll do the best I can for your people. I hope you find the peace in death you couldn't find in life." Setting that aside, she shed her bloody clothes. The battle went on.

Twenty minutes later, smelling of shampoo and feeling less like a abattoir floor, Shepard stepped up to Miranda's door. Hesitating with her hand halfway to the control, she focused on her breathing. As much as she loved poking the operative, Miranda's apparent lack of ethical boundaries scared the crap out of her, and who knew what Cerberus might do to try to regain control over her without the chip.

A bracing breath still burning in her nose, she reached up and hit the door chime. "It's Shepard," she said, simply. As much as she could demand entry, she needed to establish a working relationship with the woman. Keeping the enemy close had never been more imperative.

The door opened, Miranda standing a half-metre away. The operative stared at her, body rigid, chin lifted. "What do you need?"

"To talk to you." Shepard let out a breath close to sigh volume, but didn't relax, refusing to soften. After a solid minute, Miranda nodded—a single jerk of her head—and spun on her heel, marching back to her desk like a drill sergeant who'd taken a pole up the ass before being pushed into wet cement.

"You've stopped by medbay to get checked out?" Shepard asked, stepping over the threshold very much as she'd walk into the den of a feral varren. She followed Miranda over to the desk, but remained standing when the operative circled behind it and sat down.

Organizing herself into professional disinterest, Miranda nodded. "I'm in perfect health, Captain."
My team took a minimum of fire, and came through without injury." She swallowed hard, her jaw flexing. "Your squad and General Vakarian's effectively cleared the way for us." The woman's jaw tightened until Shepard began to worry Miranda might just shatter her teeth. "Rachni, Shepard?"

Shepard's turn to clench her teeth. She spun, crossing the cabin to the portal and stared out at the darkness. "The rachni are not what we've been led to believe by history. I know and trust the queen." Another deep, noisy breath that she sharpened into a not-sigh. "But I didn't come to justify my cooperation with the rachni."

A precise, military turn and Shepard pinned the Cerberus operative with a stare sharper than the not-sigh. "I came to let you in on my plan for the immediate future. To lead the missions up to and during the war, I need a ship able to carry the army and support structure I need."

Miranda stood, all angles chiseled from a block of ice. "You're going to leave the Ypres completely?"

"Yes." Shepard cut the air with a bladed hand. "If you decide to remain associated with Archangel through me, you'll take over as her captain, and you'll make Ashley Williams your XO." She strode to the desk, hoping she presented at least a facade of resolution. "All the alien team members and Jack will come with me." Shrugging, she leaned forward, bracing her fingertips against the top of the desk. "They wouldn't trust you or Cerberus, anyway."

"And the collectors?" the operative demanded, a glimpse of fury escaping before she corralled it all back behind that bulge in her jaw. "The vessel we just captured?"

Finally seeing a flash of the real woman, Shepard sighed and sat in the chair across the desk. Nodding toward the operative's seat, she held out a hand. "Please, sit. This is progress. I doubted you had anything real written on those perfect synapses behind the perfect mask. Anger … " A crooked smile tugged at the corner of her mouth. "… anger I can work with."

Another flash and Miranda nodded, just a single tip of her head, as she perched on the edge of her chair. The air between them crackled, ozone hanging heavy enough to make Shepard wonder if the biotic intended to put her down. Oh well, it wasn't like Miranda could hope to take out the captain with so many of Shepard's people aboard.

She pushed on. "The collector vessel is being taken to Ploba where Legion and the chia will examine it on every level, searching for weaknesses." Leaning back, she draped her lower leg over her opposite knee, the pose awkward … why the hell did people sit like that? Anyway …. "Of particular interest is the collector IFF. If we're going to pass through the Omega IV relay to take the fight to them, we're going to need to arrive there without setting off any immediate alarms or defenses."

"You're giving dangerous technology to uncertain and untrustworthy aliens?" Miranda jumped up, her turn to lean into the desk, her fingertips holding her up. "Cerberus could—"

"Take the collector tech and sure, maybe do something useful with it to get us to their base, but also turn it against the rest of the races once your organization doesn't need them as cannon fodder." Shepard raised an eyebrow as Miranda straightened and opened her omnitool. "Your control chip won't help you, just like it hasn't the last several times you've tried to use it."

Miranda froze, the truth revealed in the moment before she swallowed. Damn, she needed to work on hiding her tells. "What do you mean?" Kudos for the recovery; the operative asked the question with all her usual ice-cliffs in place.
"We found and burned out your control chip weeks ago," Shepard said, chipping each word out of those frozen walls. "Chakwas and Mordin discovered it after the Archangel staff meeting. You used it so often you triggered several minor hemorrhages in my brain." Tipping her head forward and to the side, she tapped two fingers against the small scar. "They fried it."

Sinking back into her chair, Miranda appeared to melt, but only for a moment. "You could have died."

Eyebrows raised, Shepard nodded. "Better dead than being a slave to Cerberus. Anyway, it won't work. I've been a free agent since Palaven." Relaxing into the chair, she crossed her arms, but loose, not defensive. "And here I am, fighting the fight against the collectors and reapers, and it's not a fight I intend to give up before the reapers are dead. I just can't fight according to Cerberus's rules of engagement."

"So, you're giving me the Ypres?" Doubt leaped across the desk.

"Yes, and asking you to work with Archangel, but cooperation is up to you." Shepard stood. "Look at Cerberus with open eyes, Miranda. I know you have reason to be as loyal to the Illusive Man as you are, and if you want to just return to him, fine." Calling the meeting closed with a sharp nod, Shepard turned toward the door.

"Captain!" Shepard heard Miranda's chair roll hard enough that the backs of her legs must have given it quite a shove. "I … " Again the clicking swallow. "I need to speak to you."

Something in the operative's tone—a plaintiff undertow—caught Shepard in its current, tugging her back around. Real pain showed through where the ice in Miranda's stare thinned. Nodding, Shepard returned to the chair and sat, elbows on her knees, hands clasped in front of her.

"I … " Miranda sat. "I find myself in the uncomfortable and undesirable position of having to ask for your help." Miranda's lips pressed together hard enough to let Shepard know she hadn't hidden her shock very well.

"Of course, what can I do?" That time, when Shepard relaxed back into the chair, she sat naturally, ankle over her knee, arms loosely crossed. "If it's within my power, I'll do what I can."

"I've never told you my history as I patently dislike discussing personal matters. I believe they don't belong in the workplace," Miranda said, leaning forward, her arms resting across her desk blotter: Shepard hadn't even suspected people still used them. A slight, staccato cough pulled the captain's attention back where it belonged. "However, this is important."

She cleared her throat, one quiet cough before continuing, "I'm genetically enhanced. My father created me in order to provide his business empire with the perfect scion." Her fingers flipped at her face, the perfect ebony hair draped across her forehead. "My biotics, my intelligence, physical prowess … even my looks were all designed to give me an edge."

Shepard shifted a little, not wanting to interrupt, but feeling Miranda's need for a moment of space. Maybe she could help … guide the topic forward. "That's a hell of a burden to live with, especially as a kid."

Miranda nodded. "I wasn't a daughter, I was an asset … and a means of foiling mortality." She shook her head, replacing ice with iron. "As soon as I was old enough and brave enough, I ran away and joined Cerberus."

Scowling, Shepard pushed out of her chair, suddenly needing space herself. What the hell? They'd done nothing but grapple—at loggerheads with one another—from the moment Shepard awoke, and now Miranda just leaped off the high horse to sit down in Shepard's confessional? It didn't make any sense. Maybe the change formed a backup plan in case the control chip failed? A 'we can't just zap our agenda into her brain so we need to soften her up with emotional connections'?

"I can't blame you for being suspicious," Miranda said, right on cue. "We haven't exactly seen eye to eye since you woke up."

Shepard turned to meet the understatement of the month, if not the entire year. She studied the operative's body language, seeing at least a layer or two of deception. "You still haven't gotten to what you need me to do."

Miranda stepped around her desk and leaned back against the edge. "I wasn't the first 'daughter' my father created; I was merely the first one he kept."

Rage sparked, eating away at the edges of her suspicion. "The first one he kept? What happened to the others?" The second after she asked the question, she shrugged it off. She didn't need to know. "No, forget that … just tell me what you want me to do."

Miranda paced to the bed in the back of the cabin a couple of times. "When I ran away, I took my twin sister with me." She looked down for a half second, a moment of thaw before her stare returned to Shepard's, as chill as ever. "I couldn't leave her. Cerberus helped me place her with a family where my father couldn't find her."

Looking down, Shepard nodded. She walked the couple of metres to the chair, the puzzle running circles in her head. Miranda spoke the truth, but truth to fit an agenda. "And now you believe your father knows where she is?" Looking up, Shepard shrugged. "Why not just have Cerberus relocate her?"

Miranda returned to her chair, primly aligning herself into her usual pose: legs crossed at the knee, hands folded in her lap. "The Illusive Man has arranged a reason for the family to relocate, but I want to supervise their transfer personally. My father knows she's on Illium, and he'll stop at nothing to get her back."

Shepard sat, letting out a sigh at long last. "Do you have reason to suspect that your father has someone inside Cerberus? After all, it's protected you. Why not her?" Leaning forward, she clasped her hands and looked up at the operative from under heavily-lidded eyes. "Tell me this isn't just a ploy to appeal to my warm, squishy heart."

Miranda solidified, a fortress to repel any of Shepard's attempts to breach the walls of trust. "I'm not asking for you to trust me or accompany me. I merely need a few days to travel to Illium and oversee—"

"How do you know Cerberus and your father aren't in bed together?" Shepard repeated, slicing at Miranda's stubborn solo attitude with an edge on every word. "It sounds like something that is right down his alley."

Miranda's expression turned 'just chomped down on a lime, peel and all'. "My father was once a staunch supporter. He donated billions before I ran away."

"Yeah, that's how you knew about it, right?" Shepard took a noisy breath in through her nose, letting it out in a resigned puff. "So, basically, you don't know if someone in Cerberus broke your confidence." Three skin cells around Miranda's eyes softened. Right.
"So, since your father knows her family is being moved, how and in what numbers will he go after her?"

Miranda's lips tightened around the truth. "I have a contact on Illium who's been keeping an eye on Oriana for me. She will meet me on Illium the day before the move."

Shepard leaned back, unclenching the teeth that she hadn't realized she ground together until her jaw began to ache. "Okay, we'll drop the ship off on Ploba, sort our people around, then head for Illium." Shaking her head to tell Miranda not to bother arguing, Shepard crossed her arms. "So, start spilling. I want to know everything, starting at the top."

84 Days ASR

Shepard walked into Mordin's lab, stretching a little as she rolled her shoulder, still feeling the day before's battle all the way to the marrow of her bones. "I'm too old for all this," she grumbled and then yawned, hard and wide enough that her jaw clicked.

"Still only at one-fifth of average human lifespan," Mordin replied without looking up from his computer.

Shepard snort-chuffed in the back of her throat. "It's not the years, Doc." She took a deep breath and walked over to stand opposite him. "So, what was so urgent I had to get up here before we reach Ploba?" She sniffed the air then glanced around. Something felt different in the space. Usually the air in the lab felt thin and cool and light. Right then, it weighed down on her like a steam bath or an ugly secret.

Oh … She dropped her head, letting it hang from her shoulders for a second … for fuck's sake. What now?

"Shepard." The salarian wrung his hands a little as he paced behind his lab table. "Called you here for a reason."

"Right, as I said." She nodded and leaned a hip against the biobed behind her, fairly certain that he was speaking from a script in his head. That did not bode well. "So, what can I do for you?" She raised an eyebrow and cocked her head a little when he just kept pacing.

"Must make … confession. No … explanation." He cleared his throat, thin fingers curled in front of his mouth. "Scientific curiosity, sometimes … " A musical sort of humming sound drifted from his throat. "... overwhelming." Shrugging, he looked at her with a hopeful sort of expression on his face.

Shepard nodded. They were never going to get to a point. So much waffling meant one hell of a confession … no, explanation. She felt like calling engineering to make sure that Mordin hadn't accidentally set the drive to explode and kill them all. Swallowing the dread, she said, "Right. Overwhelming, I understand. The universe is rife with mysteries begging to be solved."

"Yes!" He lunged toward her. "Exactly!" When she jumped back and cracked her spine on the metal frame of the bed, he composed himself. "Apologies."

"Okay, so what particular scientific mystery begging to be solved brings us here today? And why do I need to know about it?" Hopefully pointed questions could get them moving along.

Mordin settled into a steady, three-sided pacing route from his desk to the research terminal then to the hall door and back to his desk. "During tests to prove your identity, Dr. Chakwas harvested egg to test the age of the cell."

Shepard nodded. "Okay, I recall that. Getting a little concerned now, but go ahead."

"Took cell when Chakwas finished testing. Conducted own tests. Digging deeper. Curiosity overcame me. Test plasticity of human genome. Expand possibilities. Perhaps discover genetic modifications useful in war against Reapers." He stared into her eyes for a few moments, his expression both keen and hopeful, then began to pace once more. "Used genetic material from other patient in hospital at time. Spliced turian genetic traits to human male sperm cell. Fertilized egg."

If it hadn't been for the biobed at her back, Shepard would have fallen straight to the floor. As it was, she smashed the bone in her wrist scrambling for a grip. "Wait … you're telling me that you took my egg and fertilized it with some sort of genetic experiment?" She licked her lips, trying to assuage the sudden desert-like conditions in her mouth. "There are so many ways this is messed up
… God, I can't even think of them all. So … first thing … who or what are the other donors?"
Sweet baby Jesus, there were just some questions she could never be prepared to ask.

"Human male unknown … simply test sample donated to genetics bank. Turian genetic material taken from General Vakarian." He looked at her with an expression of such blythe … hope that, for a moment, she almost told him not to worry about it. Then reality reasserted itself.

She focused on Mordin, wishing he'd just bloody well stand still. "And Garrus knows nothing about this, either?"

"Salarian parentage follows matriarchal lines. Thought it best to inform you of fetus's existence first." He shrugged as if it all made sense and the entire galaxy hadn't just turned inside out and upside down.

"Fetus?" Shepard yelped, then winced as the screech bounced back at her …. Yeah, they heard that back on Earth. Fetus opened a whole different kettle of pickled fish. Fetus meant baby rather than a couple of cells. "Sweet baby Jesus, fetus," she whispered, leaning toward him, the ground disappearing under her feet. Had Javik pushed her out an airlock? No, Javik died. What happened to all the air? She tugged at her collar and gasped. Thirty seconds dragged by before she managed to say, "This experiment of yours created a viable life? Blessed Enkindlers … are you saying I'm a mother?"

Mordin thought for a moment, then nodded. "Exactly, although designation as mother your decision. Experiment complete, fetal development stable through twelfth week, wanted to consult with you prior to termination."

"Termination? Twelfth week? Holy fucking Enkindler shit, Mordin … that's a baby." Shepard stumbled a couple of steps toward the door, then realized she couldn't actually run away from that particular madness and stopped. "Hold up. Someone else needs to be here for this conversation."

When Mordin tried to talk, Shepard shushed him, her pointed finger rife with horrific possibilities if he spoke again. "Ah!" she snapped when he opened his mouth. "Not another sound."

Shepard reached up to her radio. "Garrus … um … Mordin and I need to see you in the genetics lab. Can you come up … no, down here for a few minutes?" She winced. No way the conversation would last only a few minutes, not once Garrus began to panic, adding more panic to her panic.

You bloody well should be panicking. You can't be a parent right now, Janey. You're just a six-year-old with a gun hiding inside the body of an adult, how are you supposed to take care of a baby?

Dear God, a baby.

"Shepard? Are you all right?" Garrus called, his tone heavy with concern. "You sound like you've seen a spirit."

"Sort of the complete opposite, and actually, you'd better clear a few hours of your schedule and haul ass down here." She hesitated again. It didn't just affect them. Theirs was a family of three, and there existed a pretty decent chance that Nihlus might not panic. They could use someone capable of keeping his cool. "And bring Nihlus. Lucy's got some 'splainin' to do."

"Lucy?" She heard him moving things around on her desk. "I don't understand. Who's Lucy?"

She shook that off, her hand flapping at the air ... trying to clear the confusion away, maybe. "Human thing ... don't worry about it, just grab Nihlus and get down here."

"I'm already on my way." She heard heavy, limping footsteps both in her comms and on the deck overhead. "I'll be down there in five."

"Good. Shepard, out." Shepard closed the channel then returned to the biobed. She needed to sit. She lowered the thing as far as she could, then hopped up. Once settled, she turned her overwhelmed, numb confusion—and the very real feeling of violation—on the salarian.

"How could you take something so intimately mine and just ... do something like this without talking to me first?" she asked. "Don't you see how fucked up this is?"

He shrugged. "No. Cell frozen, due to be disposed of in stasis cleanout. Did not expect anything to come of experiment, perhaps better radiation protection for humans. Turians have excellent resistance to ambient radiation, poor tolerance for environmental changes due to lack of subcutaneous fat layers. Possibilities for genetic therapies promising."

Shepard blinked at him, sort of maybe, almost, kinda understanding why he'd considered her frozen—due to be disposed of—egg, fair game. Still, he just ... how could she face the horrendous truth about the coming war ... hell, the collectors ... and decide whether to raise a child? A hundred other questions muscled their way up her throat, but she knew Garrus would want to know most of those answers as well, so she trapped them behind her teeth. Bracing against the edge of the bed, she stared at Mordin, shock spinning her around from terror to joy to horror to fury and back to terror.

As soon as she heard her torini's boots on the deck plating, she jumped up and turned toward the door to the CIC. When it opened, she strode over to them, taking their hands, a drowning woman snatching at life preservers in grey, stormy seas. The strength and warmth in their grip washed over her, a wave of such absolute relief that her heart dropped from just below her uvula back down where it belonged.

"What is it?" Garrus asked, his hand reaching up to cup her face. "You look terrified." Turning on Mordin, fury and accusation made him seem twice as large as usual. "What have you done?" He pushed past Shepard, taking a lunging stride at Mordin, only halting when his mate tugged back on his hand.

"Come sit with me and stay calm, please?" Shepard drew them both toward the biobed, but only forced Garrus to sit down next to her. "Mordin has some explaining to do." While the salarian scientist brought them up to speed, Shepard's stare stayed riveted to Garrus's profile, her husband becoming more turian by the second: back stiffening, neck arching, mandibles high and tight to his mouth. Holding her breath, she waited for Mordin's words to register and the other shoe to drop. Nihlus … she pretty much knew how Nihlus would react, but Garrus … she didn't have a single clue how he'd react to the news.

Mordin finished with twelve weeks along, going to terminate the experiment, eliciting a soft rumble from Nihlus, and from Garrus …

… silence.

Huh, the one reaction she hadn't really expected. After nearly five minutes, Garrus tucked his hand free and stood, pacing to the door and back. "Forget that you used our genetic material without asking," he said at last. "We can beat that discussion to death after I stop wanting to snap the other horn off your head." Looking back at Shepard, Garrus bobbed his head in a small, helpless shrug.

She understood. Mordin's news still had her reeling. She needed something to hold tight to, but instead, Garrus broke loose of the shore and started dragging her out to sea.

"Can we see a scan?" Nihlus asked, his question providing an anchor at last. Right. A scan … they needed all the information they could muster. Information led to an informed plan.

Her heart slowed. Right. Yes! Just another problem … another insanely complicated battlefield to navigate. Battlefields were her wheelhouse. Break down the enemy positions, size up the terrain, and then set up a coherent, by-the-numbers plan of attack. Just another battlefield, and the more intel she could get, the better a plan she'd build. Nihlus's voice whispered in her head about plans all going to hell in under a minute once battle began. She stomped it into thought-muck. A plan would get her through. Yes. She took a long, deep breath. Just another battlefield.

Sure, a battlefield that could completely destroy the life of an innocent child when its mother proved to be better at killing things than nurturing them. Not to mention the lack of safety. Where would your child live? Omega? Stay with babysitters or grandparents ninety percent of the time? What happens if you do something stupid and get your child killed? It would rip the rest of your family apart. Sure, Janey. Just another battlefield. Way to lie to yourself.

"How advanced is a twelve week old human?" Nihlus asked, cutting off Shepard's freak out before it ramped up to eleventy billion. "Turian offspring are halfway to gestation at twelve weeks … far too late to terminate, except in emergency cases."

"Human fetal viability eighty percent at twenty weeks, fifty percent at eighteen weeks," Mordin supplied, earning a ferocious growl of subvocals from Garrus. "Putting scan on monitor."

Shepard gasped as the child—and it was a child, not the random blob of cells she'd been imagining—appeared on the monitor above Mordin's desk. Her hands leaped up to her mouth as she whispered, "Holy blessed sweet baby Enkindler Jesus."

Nihlus strode over and sat at Shepard's side, his arm wrapping around her waist to pull her in. She melted into his warmth, grateful for the shelter and calm. "So we know what the medical community would say, haksaya kubenar. What do you say?"

"I just …." The words tumbled out, but then she saw the flutter on the screen and bit them off. "Is that her heartbeat?" She slid off the side of the biobed, enraptured by the image of the tiny person Mordin had created out of her and Garrus.
"Yes. Strong heartbeat, development excellent." Mordin nodded, making his usual little self-congratulatory clucking sound. "Fetus adapting extremely well to alien genetic material."

"Izzy," Shepard whispered, something deep inside her tethering itself to that tiny life. "Look at her nose. Sweet Enkindlers, she has your nose, Garrus." She grinned, her heart racing … sure, she remained terrified, but something about that little, curled up person seemed to tell her that everything would work out okay in the end. She lifted her hand, her fingertips brushing through the image, as if she could take hold of the hand that stretched out. "And look at those fingers and toes. She's …"

"Perfect." Strong arms encircled her, lifting her off the ground even as they pulled her from Nihlus's side. Wrapping her arms around Garrus's neck, she pressed her brow to her verro's, a gentle smile tugging at her lips. It felt right, the four of them.

"She's not going anywhere, is she, Callor?" she whispered, pressing her cheek to his.

He shook his head, a soft subvocal the only answer to her question for nearly two minutes before Garrus cleared his throat. "Is it okay that I still want to pop his horn off even though he created that beautiful little miracle?"

A happy sob tangled around her chuckle as it broke free. "Completely. I'll help." Tightening her grip with one arm, she reached out with the other, grabbing Nihlus's cowl and pulling him over into the embrace. "You okay with this, cikabeknat?" she asked, grinning because she could see the answer alight on his face, his joy so brilliant that he appeared to glow.

Nihlus kissed her and nodded. "I couldn't be more okay with it. She's absolutely perfect."

"Should I go ahead with the termination?" Mordin asked.

When all three spun to face him, even Shepard managed to find some growl to go behind the words they hollered in concert. "Don't you dare, Mordin!"

When Shepard saw the salarian's grin, she countered with a mock scowl. "You're a …" She shook her head. "Nope, can't use that language in front of my daughter.

Nihlus tugged her back into the group hug. "Wait until our maris see this. They're going to lose their minds. Five seconds after we tell them and show them the scan, the yarn-knotting utensils will come out. We're going to have pueriti blankets and clothes piling up everywhere."

Garrus chuckled and nuzzled her ear. "We're never going to get Izzy off Omega, are we?"

Shepard held both her torini, pressing their cheeks against hers. "Probably not, but just look at her. We'll find a way to make it work for her."
Izzy. Garrus made his way to the shuttle newly returned from Ploba. A baby. The entire concept just boggled his mind. A few hours before, he'd been a newlywed and a general about to engage in the most terrifying war imaginable. Now he was twenty-four weeks from being a father. The grin spread until his mandibles ached.

Derra - Wife / female bondmate

Verro - Husband / male bondmate

Amimahir - Grandchild

Patrem - Father (Familiar form Pari equivalent to dad)

Matrula - Mother (Familiar form Mari equivalent to mom)

Tarc - Vulgar expletive equivalent to shit.

Fragrutis - A cactus native to Palaven that grows short, tough, and spiny but succulent leaves. The leaves are crushed, chopped and used as a spice in turian cooking. Very hot and spicy.

Acuta Eus: a chip made from a combination of grains and spices. Turian doritos.

84 Days ASR

Over the next nine hours, Garrus and his family—he fought a wide, stupid grin, trying to maintain a professional facade he strode across the shuttle bay—his family spent most of their time talking to Miranda, Chakwas, and Mordin. Once he, his derra, and Nihlus explained what Mordin had told them, the entire team met in the genetics lab to organize everything Izzy needed to enter the world happy and healthy.

Izzy. Garrus made his way to the shuttle newly returned from Ploba. A baby. The entire concept just boggled his mind. A few hours before, he'd been a newlywed and a general about to engage in the most terrifying war imaginable. Now he was twenty-four weeks from being a father. The grin spread until his mandibles ached. No doubt panic would return, and he'd face more than any one person's share of doubts about his fitness to raise another life. But for those moments, his daughter's care settled, he allowed that image and its tiny fluttering heartbeat to fill him to the brim and over.

Less than three months before, he’d been certain of a life spent alone, mourning the lost half of his spirit. Now, a previously undiscovered section of his heart began to beat.

"Hey! Callor! Are you coming?" his kahri's voice called from the other end of the shuttle bay.

Garrus looked up, focusing on her as he wrestled his stupid grin under control. It returned as soon as he saw the excitement on her face. "I think you're more excited about this special platform than EDI is."

Shepard smiled, wagging her head a little, telling him his guess hit the mark. "She's going to get to experience being a part of a crew … a family. I think it's the beginning, just like with Legion and the geth. Just like us." She held out her hand, waiting for him to catch up and close his talons around it. Her fingers trembled ever so slightly.

"Yesterday, it felt like we were just tumbling downhill, gaining speed as we crashed toward the end of everything. But today … these geth change everything. EDI could change everything. Imagine, Garrus … AI and organics living in peace." She spread the arm not attached to his hand as if to embrace the entire galaxy. "Evolution? Chuck that outdated idea out the window. We'll all be limitless given time and compassionate cooperation."

Each of her words spurred his heart to pump harder, sending hot blood and hope surging through his body. Emotions foamed above the current as it raced to power muscles that begged to move, to get to work already and make her vision reality. Where did she find all that hope—that belief in other people—especially people so very different than humanity? Even her faith in him and in Nihlus seemed completely mysterious sometimes. She trusted that at the core of every being in the galaxy lived an honourable spark, and if she could breathe enough hope into that spark, it could warm the most frozen heart and redeem the lost.

Naive? Quite possibly. Doomed to failure? Maybe, but hadn't they all just lined up to prove her right? For his part, he'd dedicate his every last breath to see her optimism bear fruit, and he knew Nihlus felt the same.

She squeezed his hand, tugging him toward the shuttle as the hatch opened. "Come on, verro, we've got a couple of deliveries to receive."

EDI's mobile unit—

When it stepped up to the edge of the hatch, then down onto the Ypres's deck plating, gleaming like a billion diamonds coalesced into bipedal form, Garrus's brain froze, the word unit all that entered his mind. But dear spirits, such a humble word didn't do it the slightest bit of justice. A mechanical and technical work of art, it transcended the geth platforms that followed it off the shuttle, one of whom carried Izzy's home for the next six months.

"Holy cats," Shepard whispered, a bright grin lighting up her face, "didn't they just outdo themselves on EDI's new ride?"

Outdo themselves, they had. While bipedal, the unit balanced and moved like an ungentira ready to pounce, unlimited potential energy and balance coiled in every joint and artificial sinew.

Knowing that Shepard didn't want to draw too much attention to the AI's new ride, Garrus looked to the phalanx of geth standing at the shuttle's threshold.

"These are all actualized platforms?" he asked Shepard, keeping his voice to a whisper, but he didn't really need to ask. The geth platforms showed individuality to an extent he hadn't seen before. One platform sported four legs and two arms, more like a keeper than a quarian, and several of the others had attached small pieces of tech in ways that looked more ornamental than strictly functional. Seeing individuality where once he'd only witnessed uniformity, amazed him anew, and not just for the geth, but for his kahri's uncanny way of figuring out what people needed.

Nodding, Shepard stopped a couple of metres away. "They all have nexus brains. Legion said that some of the juggernauts and primes grouped together in the tens of thousands, almost as if each platform's geth formed family groups and villages before merging into one, unified mind." She released his hand and strode toward their guests.

"Welcome aboard the Ypres. Your offer of service honours us." She ushered the geth down out of the shuttle. "We've installed temporary work stations in the server room and EDI has adjusted our communication protocols so you can maintain connection with the consensus and the cynosure."

"Thank you, Captain," the four legged geth carrying Izzy's artificial womb replied with a decidedly feminine voice. "I am called Taje. I believe Dr. Solus requested that this maturation unit be installed as soon as possible?"

"Yes." Shepard waved them toward the elevator. "It'll be completely autonomous? We aren't staying aboard the Ypres much longer."

Taje nodded, making Garrus smile at the very human gesture. Turians didn't even naturally nod or shrug thanks to their cowls, but those who dealt with a lot of humans just sort of seemed to pick it up. He'd considered Legion's mimicry a strategy to set the organics at ease. Apparently not, or at least it propagated throughout the consensus.

"The maturation unit can be moved, but great care must be taken. The geth have mirrored the natural conditions inside your uterus ..."

Garrus flinched as the needle on his turian 'private things stay private' metre hit the redzone. Thank the spirits he and Shepard had Nihlus to deal with most of the events and topics that fell into that category. Between them, the 'nope, too personal' list stretched for kilometres.

"... as closely as possible, but most maturation tanks are permanent installations with carefully monitored climate control. This remains an imperfect solution."

Garrus hit the elevator control, his gaze still fixed to Shepard as she leaned a hip into the metal railing and crossed her arms.

"How imperfect?" she asked, her eyes shuttered, expression pinched and closed. Her anger over Mordin's liberties remained etched into the lines around her mouth and eyes despite her calm. "It's bad enough she's had to spend her first twelve weeks inside a petri dish and a germination chamber. I want the rest of her time to be as natural and stress-free as we can manage."

"We'll do our best to ensure her comfort and wellbeing." The geth nodded and faced the door.

"Captain," Cortez came through over the intercom, his business-like tone helping clear Garrus's head, "we're ready to get underway."

"Then get us to Illium, LT." Shepard's voice echoed, all edges and corners.

"Aye, aye, ma'am."

With Izzy's concerns tabled, Garrus watched the switch in Shepard's head flick over to EDI's new platform. But right there and then, she could only fight off the questions she couldn't ask. As far as it concerned anyone on the Ypres or in Archangel, the geth were testing a prototype hybrid platform. Paying it undue attention could betray the secret, and Cerberus becoming suspicious placed the entire experiment—and EDI—in jeopardy. The engineering team on Omega had installed a quantum blue box aboard the Aurean to backup EDI in case Cerberus panicked and pulled her plug. Still, organics reacting out of fear to a free AI had caused more than one war, and as Shepard would say, once the furry mammal escaped the bag, it proved impossible to put back.
His derra's stare turned to lock onto his, a soft, but tenuous, smile curving her lips. Fear, worry, anger … so many emotions flickered in that gaze, flames consuming the pine forest green. He smiled back, one formed of resolute confidence. Once the geth finished installing Izzy's new home, and their daughter slept securely within, he'd take Shepard up to their cabin. They needed time alone to process and relax as well as they could before Illium.

While he understood the logic behind Shepard trying to bring Lawson on-side by helping the operative secure her sister, he clung to far too much rage to give a single fuck. Why Lawson should care so much for a sister she didn't know and show such callous disregard for others … well, it formed one of the greatest mysteries of humanity. Even some of the most caring among them would sacrifice fifty children to save their own.

The elevator arrived at the CIC. Garrus walked drag, content to stay back and take a support role. He and Shepard needed time to think and sort through their emotions before they could really process what the gestation chamber would mean to their daughter's development. He didn't want her to feel alone or isolated. Maybe babies so small didn't feel fear, but he'd do anything to make sure she didn't.

Shepard tucked herself in against him once the lab door closed, and Mordin swooped in to help the geth set everything up. Arm wrapped around his waist, she clung to him, trembling ever so slightly. They both needed to speak to their maris. He hoped that once they did, they'd be able to slide the panic to the back of their minds and focus on getting ready for war.

Tarc … he hated the idea of telling his maria over the comms. That sort of news needed to be shared in person. Thank the spirits Izzy and their new resident crazy salarian doctor came along when they did. His maria would get a chance to meet and spoil her animahir.

"We are prepared for you," Taje said, catching his attention.

"For me?" Shepard's arm tightened around him.

The geth waited by the end of the biobed, one arm held out in a vague, inviting gesture. "We will embed a transmitter beneath the muscles in your abdomen where the child would develop." Head flaps rose and fell in agitated waves as if causing Shepard distress, distressed Taje in return. "The transmission will be carried through the chia encasing the inner bladder so the child hears and experiences all the vibrations, sensations she would naturally."

Shepard detached from his side and strode across the genetics lab to sit on the table, gripping his hand to the last. "That's incredible." She laid back in response to Taje's hand signals. "So, she'll be able to hear my voice and heartbeat … everything?"

"At all times, yes."

Shepard latched onto him with a stare that vacillated between awe and panic.

Following his derra, Garrus stood at the head of the biobed, one hand stroking the silky strands of her hair, the other braced against the cool metal of the table: both sensations grounding him. The procedure took less than a minute; the comms device tiny, using chia to communicate to the gestation chamber.

"We need to contact Ploba tomorrow," Shepard said, looking up into Garrus's eyes, "and thank the chia for everything. They are taking a lot of hits for the cause."

"The chia involved in this project consider it a joy and a privilege to assist your child in this manner." Taje offered a hand to help Shepard sit up. "She will be embraced in love and warmth."

The last sentence startled Garrus and snatched a slight gasp from between Shepard's lips. Geth concerning themselves with love and warmth … . To think that he'd wanted to just put a bullet through Legion's head when they'd found him on Eden Prime nearly three cycles before.

"Best if you leave lab for implantation," Mordin announced, stepping up to the table. A small, octangular unit sat cradled in his long-fingered hands. "Will send message when finished."

Garrus felt Shepard lean in as he did, his stare glued to the blinking lights. Could that be … ?

"Is that her?" Shepard asked a half second before he could, her voice breathy.

Garrus understood, someone had sucked all the oxygen out of the air. The germination unit tugged at his talons, insisting that he reach out and make contact. When his talon pads pressed to the warm polymer case next to Shepard's, Mordin didn't react by scolding them. Instead, he made a gentle clucking sound.

"Go. Daughter fine, but concentration vital to successful transfer," the salarian said. Their fingers slid from the chamber as Mordin turned away, continuing without pause, "Hours of careful preparation and work. Will contact you when finished."

"And if anything goes wrong?" Shepard asked, sliding down off the table to press back in against Garrus's side. "You'll let us know?"

"Immediately." He placed the chamber on his desk and set to work on his computer. "Do not anticipate complications, but will keep you informed."

Moving as a unit, both Shepard and Garrus stepped up to the desk, touching the chamber again before turning to leave. Although, completely his imagination, Garrus fancied that he felt Izzy move inside, responding to their touch. Their daughter ….

They needed to end the damned war fast. The idea of bringing his daughter into a galaxy cowering beneath the reapers' gaze sunk razor-sharp claws into the base of his skull. He took a heavy breath. Ending the war meant moving on the collectors and learning everything they could about the bastards in dark space.

"I want to talk to Ash," Shepard said the moment the inside lab door closed behind them. "Illium isn't a long trip, and I need this boat ready to pull its weight before I get off." She palmed the outer door control. "I'd really like to steal Joker for the _Aurean_. The _Normandy_ is fleet enough to maneuver through anything on the other side of the Omega IV, but the _Aurean_ is going to need talented hands on the controls."

Garrus lifted a brow plate "Not sure you'll convince him or Anderson. Geth pilots might be the best idea. They could interface directly with the ship. They have better reflexes and response times than any organic."

"Yeah, and we need them to interface with the collector tech to develop ways to burrow past the reapers' firewalls and defenses." She pressed the control to call the elevator. "We have to stop running around reacting. We need to sit down and set out a plan." Green eyes bored into his, his derra's stare as intense as a mining laser. "The reapers are coming and other than the geth-chia plan to sabotage the relays, we've got nothing other than shoot at them until they blow us all up."

They stepped into the elevator, Garrus hitting the control to the crew deck. "We need to get research units on the relays. Maybe there is a historical record of how they moved on the galaxy the last time." Facing Shepard, he leaned back against the railing, hands braced at his sides. "Maybe one of the prothean bases has records of what order the reapers hit their galaxy."

Shepard nodded, her eyes still locked onto his, but her stare had turned inward. "We have fifteen things that need to start yesterday, and we can't oversee them all. Once we get back from Illium, we'll bring together everyone we can think of for the first war council. Until then, we need them scouting resources."

"I'll contact Anderson, ask if the Normandy can take charge of Giran, Liara, and the Brysons." Garrus pushed off the railing and paced a few steps and back. "With its small guard and advanced stealth, the Normandy can get them in and out of anywhere they need for their research."

"If they need backup, we can provide that," Shepard said, her tone one of agreement. "We'll bring in Vicious and even Fedorian if he'll cooperate, Kirrahe and anyone else he can find, Anderson and Hackett, Giran … " She shrugged and let out a long, noisy breath. "... anyone we can think of. We'll get the Sanctuary program going, see if we can get the homeworld governments doing something to help."

The door opened, Garrus waiting for Shepard to step out into the rich, roasted meat scent of dinner that filled the crew deck. His stomach growled, the rumble and vague ache a reminder that he hadn't eaten since that morning.

"Damn, that smells good, Gardner," Shepard called as they rounded the elevator. Hungry crew filled the tables, eating with an unusual vigor. "Looks like you'll need to make sure to save me a tray."

Garrus tried to see around the cook. Maybe Gardner made the soup Nihlus loved. That tarc made eating the rest of Gardner's dextro menu worth the suffering.

Shepard glanced over her shoulder at Garrus, snatching his attention from the varren in his stomach. "This isn't going to go well," she said, a sigh following almost as an afterthought. The knowledge in her eyes—the understanding that Ashley might just be a burned bridge that needed to stay burned—dropped a boulder into his gut, but the resigned sadness that followed started a landslide.

Why would Shepard allow Ashley to hate her for something she needed to do … a solid command decision? If he'd been making the calls rather than bleeding out into his thigh, the bodies would've stayed behind. The living mattered, Ashley's guilt for taking on a mission unprepared didn't. Fury welled up in the aftermath as the rocks, mud, and trees rolled to a stop. How dare Ash betray Shepard? Heart pounding, it took every ounce of his control to shove the anger aside.

Shepard no longer needed him to be her second, the solid presence at her six. Now, she needed him to be General Vakarian, a partner, but independent, carrying his third of their joined command. He needed to step up, move out of the comfort and safety of her shade, and take a place at her side. As Shepard said … no time like the present.

Medbay stood still and silent but for the cool flow of the recycled air and the hum of the engines. Garrus allowed Shepard to enter medbay and get Ashley's attention before he followed her in. Just over the threshold, he stopped and tried to blend in with the corner. He'd almost congratulated himself at a job well done when Dr. Chakwas caught sight of him and crooked a finger at him. Oh well, tests gave him an excuse to be there if Shepard needed him.

He allowed the doctor to drag him over to a biobed and order him to lie on the cold surface. Tarc, they did not make human biobeds to be even the slightest bit comfortable for turians. Opening his mouth to complain, he silenced his protest when Chakwas appeared next to him with an armload of pillows. Once propped up in a position that didn't amount to inquisition torment, he turned his attention to the other side of the medbay.

Shepard strode up to Ashley's bedside, her back rigid, her hands solid at her side. She looked ready to drag the chief off the bed and wrestle her. Instead, she flexed her fingers and sighed. "Hey there, Chief. How are you feeling?"

"Stupid and pissed off," the soldier said, practically spitting the word. Dark brown eyes shot small caliber bullets that Shepard just shrugged off. "Stupid for walking into that trap, pissed off because you drugged me to shut me up and then left my people to the radiation."

Shepard nodded. "Done is done, Ash. I didn't have hands to spare to carry the dead." Cocking a hip, Shepard crossed her arms, gates locking down tight over her chest … over her heart. "What I need from you now is a plan for your future."

As his derra paused for breath, Garrus felt the vacuum hanging between the two women, one left there to see if Chief Williams needed to pick over any more bones. Garrus doubted if Ash realized how much dying and being dragged back changed Shepard. Death shed most of the silliness, the carefree heart. Well, death and the reapers. Thank the spirits it hadn't killed the absolute goodness at her core … the empathy and the love.

Holding himself rigid, he waited for Ash to react. Instead, the woman just clenched her jaw and her fists. Garrus flashed an annoyed glare at Chakwas as orange light cut off his view of the other bed, but the doctor continued her scans, a slight smile of what he thought might just be satisfaction on her lips.

When the light disappeared, the chief answered with a silent glare, and Shepard nodded before saying, "If you want to stay with Cerberus, I've asked Miranda to get you clearance to act as her XO in command of the Ypres. Would that suit?"

"Why?" Ashley pushed herself up, grimacing for a second before the mask of anger fell back into place. For a moment, Garrus thought she might continue her question into an accusation, but the chief just swallowed and let the word lie.

Shepard let out a long breath and turned, leaning a hip into the side of the bed. "Because as pissed off as you are with me, you're as loyal as the day is long, Ash. I know that I can trust the good people on this ship to stay safe on your watch. I know that you haven't stayed loyal and placed yourself in as much danger as you have just to let personal feelings change that."

"And you know the war is coming," Garrus added, propping himself up on an elbow. "You know that Cerberus is going to be a huge part of one side or the other."

"It's not going to be as simple as all that." Ash shook her head. "But yeah, if the Illusive Man okays it, I'll stay with the ship. There are good people here who deserve to have someone watching out for them." She hung a heavy weight on the word 'are', her stare boring into Shepard as she did. "If those people had been Alliance, would you have left them behind?"

"Yeah, I would have." Shepard looked over at Garrus. "You done being poked and prodded?"

"He is," Chakwas answered for him, "but he's to go straight back to your quarters and into his regen frame. Those grafts need time to heal."

Grinning a little at his direct and immediate disobedience, Garrus vaulted up off the bed, gathering
Shepard in against his side on the way to the door. After his derra had crossed the threshold, he looked back at Ash. "I'll be back to talk when you're feeling better."

Despite her chiseled-from-stone expression, the chief's eyes softened as she nodded. "Understood, General."

"You two still okay?" Shepard asked when the door closed behind him. Before he could do more than inhale to answer, she turned to Gardner. "Send up two servings of whatever smells so good and some bread and butter. I'm starving." She glanced at Garrus, a wry grin trying to force its way past her fake stoicism. "You better order what you want, General. You aren't moving once I get you in bed."

When he saw that Gardner had, in fact, made Nihlus's soup, he ordered a large thermos and a bag of fragruti flavoured acutas eus. Hopefully he ate it before Nihlus arrived in the room and started giving him the big, sad eyes that led, inevitably, to the rest of the bag disappearing into the Spectre's too-lazy-to-go-down-and-get-his-own maw. He needed to find a flavour Nihlus didn't like.

Shepard said nothing on the ride up to their cabin, her focus directed inward, leaving Garrus's brain to stop gnawing on stolen chips and sink its teeth into the endless heaps of war prep awaiting them.

"We need to know where the reapers are," he blurted, not even aware that he intended to say it. His brain spoke the truth, though. Without any idea of how long they had, they could either end up caught unprepared or be ready so far in advance that they grew complacent and people stopped believing in the cause. "We need a way to look into dark space."

Shepard grinned and nodded. "Yeah, and a way to bring the reapers into the galaxy exactly where and when we want them." After another second, she sighed and stepped up to the door. "We need to find at least one of the other keys. The Conduit was only the greatest of the five. Four more of them are hidden out there, waiting for us to find them."

Garrus frowned, his brow plates dropping low over his eyes, options appearing and disappearing as fleeting as smoke. "They could be anywhere out there. How the hell would we find them in all of dark space, even if we could see past the galaxy's terminus? They could be anywhere, just more black against the darkness" Maybe he'd made a mistake leaving C-Sec. He chuffed, the low sound drawing a cocked eyebrow from his wife. If only ignoring the reapers could prevent the war.

The door opened, letting Shepard step out. "Guess you'll have to add that to the list of things to discuss during our big war council. Maybe the geth and chia can find a way to use the Citadel to take a look out there. It makes sense that they'd be at the other end of their main entrance." She shrugged and palmed the door control. "I feel like a complete doorknob constantly asking the geth to be our techies, but until the homeworlds, especially the quarians and salarians, stop being a pain in the ass, we don't have much choice."

"Everything would be a lot easier if the governments believed in the threat," he agreed. His next thought disappeared from his head as Shepard's arms slipped around his waist to start undoing the fasteners down the front of his tunic.

"Yes, everything would be a lot easier, but we'll worry about that in nine or ten hours." She rested her hands over his hips and turned him around, a warm, loving smile accompanying her gentle fingers as they continued down his tunic. "Right now, I'm just going to get you out of your clothes and tuck you into bed with your regen frame."

Garrus closed his eyes, breathing in the warm perfume of her, savouring the soft touch of her fingers as they brushed over his plates, removing the heavy fabric, then the light shirt beneath. His hands migrated to her sides, resting just above her hips, talons enjoying the play of her muscles beneath them as she moved.

"Maybe we don't have to put the regen frame on right away?" he asked, tilting his voice into a wheedling slant at the end. Lifting his hands to her hair, he brushed a few stray locks around her ears. "We still haven't had a chance to spend any intimate time alone." He brushed her cheek with the backs of his talons.

Despite a sly grin curling one corner of her mouth, Shepard shook her head and moved on to his leggings. "You just about bled out because you tore a major vein, my love. Until the doctor signs off on sending your blood pressure through the roof and performing gymnastics, cuddling is the best you can hope for." And then, just because a healthy dose of cruelty lived inside the adorable, pixie frame, she laid open the waist of his leggings and pressed a heavy kiss against the seam between his plates.

When he tried to pull her up into his arms, to relieve a little of the heady ache she'd stirred, she pushed him backwards onto the bed.

"Lay down and get comfortable, Callor. Once this regen frame goes on, you'll be completely at my mercy." A sharp, evil cackle followed, her delight a gift.

She helped him settle and then attached the bulky frame to both legs, effectively immobilizing him from the waist down. Climbing up beside him, she stretched out along his side, her skin warm and bare against him.

"I thought you weren't supposed to be spiking my blood pressure," he said, wrapping his arm around her.

"I'm not doing anything, just lying here all nekkid and warm and squishy."

"Squishy is definitely not sexy." His caresses slipped lower down her side, still wandering in a lazy spiral pattern over her skin. When they reached just above her hip, she jumped and giggled, pushing him away.

"Not there, it tickles. Besides, we're supposed to be discussing our fairly imminent—dear God, we aren't ready to be parents—addition and how to tell our families."

"It tickles?" he asked, ignoring the rest of what she said. He captured both of her hands in one of his and gently raked his talons down her side, subvocals thrumming when her muscles leaped under her skin.

Cackling and cussing in equal measure, Shepard reared off the bed, fighting loose from his grip and swatting his hands away. "Yes, it tickles. Stop it." Fists on her hips, she slapped a stern frown over her laughter. "Garrus Vakarian, you stop it, now. You're still healing, and we're supposed to be talking."

He chuckled and leaned in to nuzzle her ticklish spot, her thigh so soft against the thin membrane of hide over his keel. When Shepard jumped, squirming like an eel on a dock, he stopped, eyes sparkling as they stared down at her. "That's an excellent spot to know about." After a moment, he sighed and nodded, reality and his immobility rearing their ugly heads. "Fine. Yes, we're supposed to be talking, but even though Nihlus told us what he wants, it should be a three way conversation." Faux apologizing for his frivolous behaviour, he leaned down to kiss her navel, his hands turning their attention to kneading their way back down her sides.
"I agree Nihlus needs to be here for all parenting discussions." She sighed, eyes crackling with humour as she nodded, still solid and stern. "And you, sir, nearly bled out yesterday. You need to just lie still and let the frame do its work. No more fooling around." Despite her words, she leaned down, nuzzling into the curve of his neck before kissing her way up the sensitive hollow to just beneath his jaw. "I mean … how would we explain tearing up all of Karin's hard work? You know she'd hold you captive in medbay for days."

Garrus sighed, his even more dramatic than hers, but pressed into her kisses. "So, I'm just supposed to lie here, all helpless while you take advantage of me?" Despite the teasing, he knew she could see the raw, naked yearning beneath it. Everything about his tiny, impossible derra set loose an itch he wanted desperately to scratch even though he truly wasn't healed enough for anything rigorous.

"I was considering taking advantage of my husband's weakened state in a whole catalog of ways, but … " Shepard shook her head as he nuzzled her breasts. "... I doubt very much my beautiful Callor's body has healed as much as his libido appears to have. So just behave."

Garrus answered with a throaty rumble that lifted Shepard's skin into high, tight bumps. Releasing her hand, he answered her concern with a tender smile. "I'm sure I'll be fine." He brushed her cheek with the backs of his talons, his stare soft and warm as it rested on her face.

Shepard smiled and sat up, pushing him gently down into his pillows. "You just lay back and stay still. Let your regen frame do its work. If you think you're getting out of helping me move Miranda's sister, you're sadly mistaken." Lifting herself up onto her hands and knees, she leaned over him, staring into his eyes for a second before kissing him.

"It never crossed my mind." His whisper brushed her lips, soft puffs of warm air. "You're not going anywhere without me if I have any say in it."

She peppered kisses down his chin and neck between every word. "I ... wouldn't … let … you … if ... you … tried." Giving him a flirty grin, she closed her eyes.

He followed suit, taking a moment to sink into the safe, adventurous, lusty happiness singing along his spine and out to every nerve ending.

After a second, she whispered, "No matter what, I'll hunt you down and find you if it takes my last breath."

Garrus chuckled. "That's a little creepy, kahri."

"Yup." Without opening her eyes, she kissed her way down his belly, pausing anywhere his muscles jumped. "Ticklish, are we?" she asked when she reached the outer wing of his plates. Testing her theory, she sucked on his hide, nipping lightly. A soft chortle of pleasure greeted his grumbly little groan. "Oh, this is a good spot, isn't it?" Looking up into his face, eyes alight and teasing, she reached up, raking her fingernails down the thin curve of his waist and the hollows of his pelvis.

Garrus jumped, electric jolts of pleasure and reflex ripping through him. "Spirits, woman!" A soft, rolling keen accompanied the helpless thrust of his hips, his body arching in one long, drawn out spasm.

"Why, General Vakarian, look at you." She backed a little further away. "Helpless, little ol' ball of putty in my hands. I don't think I can be trusted with all this power." Her grin practically screamed, 'Damn, but isn't that the truth?'.
He laughed, leaning up to settle pillows behind his head. "Are you planning to misuse that power?"

She grinned and crawled up his body to kiss him, her lips sucking gently as she pulled back, a mere hair's breadth between them. "Every single way I can, but not until after you're healed. We have a daughter to think about now, Callor. She's going to need her daddy around for a good, long time."

His lusty purrs softening to something deeper, Garrus closed the distance, his tongue teasing as he nuzzled her lips. "I think Mari will recover five cycles when we tell her."

Shepard stretched out along his side, leaning against him, her calf hooked over his closest leg. "Yeah, I think both sets of family will be over the moon." She cuddled in, tucking her head under his chin. "I'm happier about her than I could have imagined a day ago."

He rumbled his agreement, her cheek so soft against his neck. "I admit, there's a big chunk of terror mixed in with the happiness, but she's a gift, kahri. The most perfect gift."

Nihlus's signature knock banged against the door. While Shepard sat up and turned to holler at him to come in, she didn't dive for the covers like she would have even a month ago. A soft vocalization of devotion rolled from Garrus's throat. Her acceptance of karifratrus and everything it meant … her courage astounded him anew at every turn.

A soft rumble of confusion rolled from Nihlus when the torin hit the top of the stairs. "Am I interrupting?" He hesitated until Shepard flopped back down on the bed and patted the mattress behind her. "I figured with Garrus being imprisoned ….." He walked down the stairs in slow motion.

"Get in here, yah big dummy," Shepard said, her voice heavy with false annoyance. "We were just talking about Illium and telling the folks about Izzy."

Nihlus laid down behind Shepard, then leaned up on an elbow, to nuzzle her shoulder. "That is why I came up." He paused to brush his mouth plates down her arm. "I have business that will keep us on Illium for a couple of days, so I thought we should invite them to meet us there."

Something in the twinkle behind the Spectre's gaze made Garrus think he knew what Nihlus had planned, but he remained silent. Nihlus would reveal his secrets in his own time.

"The doctor can travel with Mari and Pari on the Aurean," Nihlus continued, "and then we can tell them about Izzy in person." He craned his neck to meet Shepard's gaze. "We could even bring in most of our contacts—the Aurean has more than enough room—and we could hold the war council on the way back to Omega."

Shepard rolled over on her back between them, humming softly in agreement. "Then we could do all our crew swapping on Omega and head off to our different assignments." She slipped her hand into Garrus's talons, squeezing tight. "What do you think, General? Does it sound like a plan?"

Garrus rolled over a little, twisting until he could see Nihlus over Shepard. It did sound good, mostly because it meant giving them an extra day to figure out how to break the news. Spirits, life had just begun moving so fast, that part of him worried it couldn't be real … that he still slept, living in his beautiful dreams.

Then Shepard turned to press a moist kiss against his mouth. "You okay, General?"

He nodded, his teeth clenching for a moment as his body braced for the coming fight. "Fine, and it sounds like an excellent plan. It's time to finally get this dreadnought prepped for its final run on the relay. The sooner we get this war started, the faster we can give our baby girl a safe, peaceful galaxy to be born into."

(A-N: Love you, can't talk. Andromeda! Expect some Andromeda lore to show up in FI. That is all ... second PT! Woot!)
He spun, catching his assailant's wrist in his hand, twisting her arm up behind her back.

"Ow! Spurin!" Solana stomped on Nihlus's foot and broke loose. "So not all right to break your little sister's arm." She shook out the assaulted limb, then spun on her talons and marched over to Thane. "You have to take my part in this, Krios. Arm breaking crosses the line."

Acuta Eus: a chip made from a combination of grains and spices. Turian doritos.

Caris - Beloved, precious, cherished.

Dilan - fiancee

Morumplacus - Restless spirit, undead, ghoul. From ancient turian folklore.

Inluvis - The second gestational period in turian pregnancy. Between 8 and 16 weeks. Slang: Little one, in the sense of being young and underdeveloped.

Obluvis - One who is senile or absent-minded. Slang: Idiot

Coillas (Coillas - plural) - The chains that hold turian bonding robes closed. After the ceremonies, they are wrapped and fastened around the wrists of both bond-mates.

Fratrin - Brother, but one of honour, friendship, or of oath rather than one of blood relation. Refers to the bond of karifratrus.

Filirin - Sister, but one of honour, friendship, or of oath rather than one of blood relation. Refers to the bond of karifratrus.

Cisera - A non-alcoholic, foamy cider made from the juice of more than twenty varieties of edible cactus analogues.

86 Days ASR (0900 Ypres time)

Nihlus checked his chrono: the Aurean didn't arrive for another five minutes, bringing their families from Omega. He stepped out onto the balcony, leaving Thane at the threshold of the dock's security checkpoint, and closed his eyes. Taking in a long draught of the sweet, blossom-scented air, he smiled, mandibles high and wide. Spring on Illium worked truly remarkable magic on the heart. Although Nos Astra lived in a perpetual polar twilight, the asari cultivated seasons to match Thessia, and spring meant the glowing purple blossoms of the t’jotti trees.

As miserable as he sometimes got during his tenure on Illium, spring never failed to entrance him. He chuffed and rumbled at the poetry. Back then, it didn't take much to brighten his days.
Speaking of …. It seemed the last member of his recon party hoped to catch him by surprise. He grinned and forced himself not to give away that he heard her approach.

The soft footfalls padded right up on him, stealthy but light with mischief. He stretched, arching his neck until the muscles groaned and his spine crackled like the bag of acuta eus he'd forgotten on the mattress the night before … at least until he rolled onto it. Shepard complained about laying on imaginary crumbs all night and after waking that morning.

Talons closed on his mandibles, pinching the mandibular nerves just hard enough to send a double jolt of pain lancing along his jaw and up into his ocular orbits. Tightening his mandibles against his face, Nihlus clenched his jaw to brace the tendons. In a lightning quick move, he pulled his arms up, and then out to push down on the hands holding him. He spun, catching his assailant's wrist in his hand, twisting her arm up behind her back.

"Ow! Spurin!" Solana stomped on Nihlus's foot and broke loose. "So not all right to break your little sister's arm." She shook out the assaulted limb, then spun on her talons and marched over to Thane. "You have to take my part in this, Krios. Arm breaking crosses the line."

The drell shrugged and leaned against the balcony railing. "It seems very active for being broken."

Sol chuffed. "I should have known better than to try to break the unbreakable male hormone brain damage solidarity wall." A dramatic sigh later, she shrugged. "So, are we going to spy on the Eclipse, or what?"

Nihlus grinned and waved an arm to beckon them into the crowds moving from the docks to the trading district. "Come on, inluvis, let's get this over with. We have a dinner party to get to."

Sol jogged up next to him. "So, we case out the Eclipse headquarters to see if they know anything about tomorrow's operation?" She nodded without waiting for him to answer, and dug into one of her pockets, sorting for a moment before pulling out a small package. "I got this for you, because I'm sneaky as a morumplacus, and Thane is, well, Thane, but you, caris, are as subtle as an armoured yawg."

Answering her with a glare, Nihlus took the package from her talons and ripped it open. "Very nice. Thank you." He turned the cloaking device over in his hand and whistled. "Very, very nice. Spirits, Kasumi is going to make it her life's mission to steal it from me."

Letting out an ill tempered grumble, Sol flicked her mandibles. "Oh, don't gush over it, it was supposed to be mean." The irritated flicking turned to a wide, lightning quick grin. "Besides, I needed to get you a bonding gift, didn't I?"

That time, Nihlus grumbled. When he spoke, however, he loaded his tone with a heavy dose of sincerity. He didn't want any secrets escaping before their time, not after putting so much effort into them. "I don't know what you think you've figured out in all your scheming, but keep it to yourself, Sol. Please." He clipped the cloak onto his omnitool, then balled up the package in his hands.

"Hey, don't be such an oblavis." She butted him in the ribs with a gentle elbow, her signature—and oddly gentle—scent of woody cleanser, gun oil, and armour cleaner overwhelming the blossoms in the wake of her movement. "I am an impenetrable wall of silence." After a moment—apparently spent proving her ability to remain silent—she butted him again. "I know you love her, and you love Garrus, but does the arrangement with the three of you make you happy enough to wrap your coillasi around her wrists?"

Nihlus tossed the packaging into a trashcan, then slipped an arm around his filitrin's shoulders. "I didn't know happiness like this existed, Sol. I'd never been truly happy before Garrus and Jane … you and your parents. It's a revelation, particularly with the horror of the reapers hanging over us. The three of us …." He shrugged, struggling to give voice to the warm pressure in his chest. "They are where I'm meant to be."

After giving her a squeeze, he released her and stepped away, glancing back at Thane. The most talented and trained infiltrator needed to take point. For all her teasing, Sol had the right of it: when the Council needed covert, they'd called on other Spectres. "Let's see what the Eclipse are up to."

A solemn nod answered his silent question as the assassin stepped past him, making a path through the crowds without drawing the slightest amount of attention. People parted like metal filings pushed away from an invisible magnet. Nihlus could escape notice when he wanted to, but Thane's gift left the Spectre in awe.

They threaded their way across the trading floor and up the stairs into Eternity. Operative Lawson planned to meet her contact, Lanteia, at 0900 in one of the back rooms. If the Eclipse intended to eavesdrop on the meeting to confirm Lawson's game plan, the gang would need ears in the room. In turn, he intended to use their hardware to track them. He doubted they'd conduct surveillance of such a risky nature from a main base of operations, but covert investigations unraveled one thread at a time.

"I'll do a quick scan on my way to the head." Sol tossed back over her shoulder as she split off on her own vector. "Order me a large cisera. All they had stocked on the Aurean was puala juice and something called cola." She shuddered. "Humans are weird."

Nihlus grinned and headed for the bar while Thane made a slow sweep of the room under the guise of admiring the view. The assassin … retired assassin … Nihlus frowned, a slow, curling sliver of guilt burrowing in behind his keel. He needed stop identifying Thane as an assassin. None of them—he, Garrus, and Shepard included—remained who they'd been before Archangel, and the drell retired even before he set out for Omega looking for his son. He never talked about why, but it didn't take anyone as perceptive as Garrus to see tragedy behind Thane's eyes.

Nihlus cleared his throat. Tragedy … and vengeance. He knew both far too well to miss it in another's stare.

After ordering their drinks, Nihlus turned to lean a hip against the bar, watching the drell at work for a half second before looking away to do his own. He didn't see any Eclipse uniforms in the bar, but he wouldn't have considered anyone in uniform anyway. Involved with the sort of money behind Lawson Sr., careful didn't begin to cover the amount of attention the Eclipse would put into the minutia of their op.

He winced as the music changed one thumping techno beat for a slightly different one. Reaching up, he pressed the heel of his hand against his aural canal on that side. Something in the music felt like a pin in his head, probably a security feed. His aural implants hated mixed signals.

"Your drinks are ready, handsome."

Speaking of signals …. The asari smiled, all flashing white teeth and stars twinkling in lavender eyes.

His replying nod and smile lacked even the false pleasure he once showed to be polite, suddenly longing for coillasì around his wrists. Funny how he only wanted to hear that word from one set of lips … for the rest of his life. His younger self, the one who loved Saren, would have preened. Regret burned, an aching thirst that sent his hand to his thigh. What an obluvis. Of course, he'd never admit that self-knowledge to Sol.

Drinks in hand, he crossed the room, taking a booth with a clear line of sight to all but the far end of the bar. He sat in the corner and took a long drink from one of the glasses of cisera before placing it at an open spots for Sol. He'd missed his little sister while she helped their parents move to Omega, and he hoped to eventually convince Garrus and their pari to let her serve on the Aurean. The three of them—including Thane—made an excellent team.

"So," Sol said, sliding into the seat next to him, "there is a strip mike under the door frame." She picked up her glass, looked into it, then swapped it with his. "Subtle. I almost missed it."

He grinned, but self-congratulations lasted only a second before Sol chuffed, shattering it.

"Not your lame gag, I meant the strip." She followed a long drink with almost a minute of pleased sighing that began to draw attention. When the salarian two tables over began to make that disturbed clucking sound, Sol stopped.

"We'll have to backtrace their signal, get into their computers remotely if we can … infiltrate their base if we can't." He finished his cisera without tasting it, only registering the dry, tartness on the back of his tongue. Feeling Sol's eyes on him, he braced himself for incoming snark.

"What do you think I was doing in the head all that time?" She sighed her 'dear spirits, without me, he'd forget to breathe' sigh. "I backtraced it, but they're using top of the line hardware and security that made a fool out of my poor, old omnitool," she said, long, elegant talons patting the inside of her wrist. "Now it's locked itself in a corner of the extranet, reconsidering its life plan."

"We have EDI, do we not?" Thane asked, sitting down. "Two observers watching the door to the room, a human and a salarian." He glanced up at the speakers flooding the space with music. "I hear something in the music as well." Frowning, he closed his eyes and cocked his head, turning it a little. "There's a slight feedback in the sound system. It might be club security, corporate espionage … ."

"... or our good friends in yellow." Nihlus leaned back, one hand dropping to his lap. "I noticed it when I was at the bar. Finish your drinks and we'll head out, ask EDI what she can do."

86 Days ASR (1147 Ypres time) (A closet somewhere in Nos Astra)

"Why?" Sol asked, the words nothing more than a hissing breath between clenched teeth. "A closet?" She wriggled, jabbing an armoured spur under Nihlus's fringe. A soft curse met his gasp of pain. "Sorry, but you got us stuck in here, senux." Continued shifting and shuffling on his shoulders emphasized her malcontent, as if he'd trapped them in a cleaning cupboard on purpose. She sighed again, finally balancing on his shoulders. "Why do missions with you always turn into something weird and scary?"

Before he could formulate a scathing enough reply Nihlus froze. Tarc, he might just have screwed up as badly as Sol thought he had. Marching footsteps approached from the right, stopping outside the door to their closet. He glanced toward the open panel in the ceiling, but saw no sign of Thane. He tightened his grip on Sol's ankle when she moved for her omnitool, no doubt to scramble the door's lock, but in the dark, even low power mode could give them away. When she nodded, he loosened his grip.

They'd just better not get caught. Not only would it let the Eclipse know their ambush the next day had been compromised, he knew the others would never let him live down being caught in a closet. He swallowed. They did make for quite the spectacle with Sol dangling around his neck and cleaning supplies piled up to his knees. Premature embarrassment set the plates down the back of his neck twitching.

“Pretty sure Captain Enyala is just getting paranoid,” one of the mercs grumbled. “Maira in T'Sair's platoon said they didn't find any evidence of the computers or the base being breached, and I had a really great night out planned.”

Another merc approached the door. "The captain's being a few million credits worth of paranoid. I don't blame her. The client's loaded, he's here in person, and if she lets him get killed, he's not going to be hiring us again, is he?"

"Not to mention she's hoping to avoid getting dead," a third voice—female salarian by the pitch of it—said. "The client's supposed to be one ruthless bastard."

"That too." The door control beeped. "Locked. Let's keep moving." A long, nasal sigh ended in a grumble. "If we get this section covered, we might be able to salvage our day off."

Nihlus let out a long breath as the boots marched off. He glanced up, but couldn't see anything past Sol's knees. "Thane? You ready up there?"

The drell's answer came in the form of Solana's weight disappearing off Nihlus's shoulders. He looked up to see Sol's feet disappear through the hole. Two arms reached down, yanking him off his feet the moment he grabbed hold. Landing balanced on a wide, steel girder, Nihlus reeled, both hands scrambling for something solid to hang onto. His right found a metal column, the left smacked down on the top of Sol's head.

"Not the head." Sol grabbed his hand, bracing his forearm along her own until he found his feet and pulled away.

"Thanks." He nodded toward the far end of the space—a life support service node by the looks of the equipment—and gestured for Thane to take the lead. They needed to find a way out before Captain Enyala's net of paranoia closed around them.

"EDI, is the route clear ahead?"

Nihlus cocked a brow plate as Sol asked the question. She hadn't made any opinion known about the AI, so he'd assumed—wrongly so, it appeared—that she didn't trust EDI enough to treat her as a colleague. He hurried along the girder as far as he could, then jumped to the next and the next.

"I am reading no Eclipse in your immediate vicinity," EDI responded. After a short pause, the AI said, "Continue through the hatch five metres, then turn left."

Sol chuffed and followed Thane out the hatch and down the left hand branch of the maintenance shaft. "What tipped them off? Did you register anything?"

Nihlus watched his little sister, admiring the professional operative in action. Even during their last adventure on Illium, she'd stayed in the little sister role. Understanding flashed, illuminating the reasons behind Sol's actions. He'd needed the little sister the last time. He didn't need loving support this time, but a pro doing her job.

His mandibles flicked, and he turned his attention back to the task at hand … namely getting back to his family without any extra holes punched through his hide.

After a good thirty seconds, EDI replied, "I see no Eclipse alerts as a response to your presence within their base or my access to their computer network. The bulletin and extra security is in response to the arrival of a high value client." Another pause. "At the next junction, take the right hand shaft thirty-five metres."

The three of them moved silently through shaft and tunnel, trusting EDI's directions to get them clear. Finally, Nihlus dropped down through a ceiling panel into a small back corridor that led to a service elevator to street level. The hallway stood silent, the Eclipse security teams having cleared the perimeter, moving in toward the center of the base.

"I just arrived." A dark voice and thick accent shattered the silence, sending sharp slivers of dread slicing through Nihlus's armour and flesh to sink into bone.

The Spectre held his breath and raised a hand to stop Sol and Thane before they entered the corridor. He opened his omnitool, but when he tried to access the man's tool and comms, a series of massive walls rebuffed him. Not willing to accept defeat so easily, he sent a message to EDI. Surely, the AI could break through the tool's security.

"Working," EDI replied through his comms.

"I have the Eclipse running a security drill. Everything is on schedule. The Ypres arrived this morning. Shepard is accompanying Miranda to meet her contact at 0900 tomorrow. Everything's on schedule."

Nihlus crept forward, heart pounding against his keel, every nerve keen-edged and tingling: a billion proximity sensors on high alert. Pressing his face against the sliver of light around the closet door, he blinked against the painful brightness. Once his eye adjusted, he peered through the crack, searching to see what particular variety of tarc they'd fallen into.

An expensive blue suit … an off-white dress shirt with what Shepard called a ... um … a clerical collar and a light blue crossover tie … short, meticulous hair … Miranda's elusive billionaire father, he'd bet a crate of his favourite acuta eus on it.

EDI's voice spooked him, breaking through his concentration, as he tried to hear the rest of that call. "I've successfully penetrated the firewalls, Spectre Kryik. The accounts belong to Henry Lawson. Both his comms and omnitool use advanced, up to date Cerberus security protocols."

So, Miranda's father still maintained ties to Cerberus. Tarc. Cerberus's web tangled through their lives on so many levels … more by the second … or maybe he just hadn't noticed them before. How many more lurked where he couldn't see them yet? Nihlus stepped back and signaled for Sol and Thane to follow. They needed to get clear. He needed to talk to Shepard and Garrus, get their take on Lawson and Cerberus.

"Hey!" Sol's elbow jabbed Nihlus in the side. "Where are you?" She sat sideways in the driver's seat of the car, brow plates low over her eyes. "You haven't said a word to anyone other than the car since we got out of there."

Nihlus let out a long breath that whistled a little as it bullied its way through his clenched jaw. "Cerberus is tied up in this war so much deeper than we suspected. Every time we come up against something lately, it's got Cerberus fingerprints all over it." He turned a little to face her. "I know they were behind what happened to Garrus and me. Now, I'm thinking they're behind so much more."

"The Eclipse in the base we uncovered during our last investigation were working for whoever is behind the black orbs," Thane said from the back. He leaned forward, elbows resting on his knees.
"Could the same force be backing Cerberus?"

Sol frowned and flopped back against her seat, her expression turning thoughtful. "Or they could be the other side, moving in to take away the leviathans' resources. Cerberus has a really dark history." She slouched into the empty space between her seat and the door. "The Council is on the reapers' side, so they're backing the collectors as well." A sharp clicking sound chased an equally sharp chuff. "Yeah, I don't buy Cerberus doing anything for anyone other than humans. They're netichiks waiting in the branches waiting for Shepard and the rest of us to wander beneath, and by the time we see them coming, we'll just be dry bones on the ground."

Nihlus smothered a grin, but didn't succeed completely. She had Shepard's gift for prolonged, graphic imagery. "EDI is into Lawson's comms and omnitool." He faced front as the car chimed their arrival at the apartment. "She and the geth will worm their way in and strip the leaves off those branches."

"I will return to the Ypres for the night," Thane said, the words drifting out of the shadows in the back seat. "What time should I report in the morning?"

"Don't be crazy," Sol said, beating Nihlus to the punch. She contorted between the two front seats. "There's more than enough room at the apartment. My parents will take one room, the happy trio will go upstairs, Jane's mother and sister can take the other room, and we can camp out in the sitting room." She shrugged. "I don't want to camp alone." Nodding, her last word given, she turned front. "We could even camp out on the balcony … watch the stars."

Thane's wry chuckle tugged at Nihlus's mandibles even as the assassin replied, "Nos Astra creates too much light to see the stars."

"Details." She chuffed, the end coming out with a little extra force thanks to the car touching down. "Don't make me demonstrate my hand to hand skills, Krios." Even Sol and her talent for deadpan snark didn't manage to get that out without a heavy dose of humour singing through her voice, widening Nihlus's smile.

"No, indeed." Thane slid forward on his seat, the evening light bright orange and red across his face in the rearview mirror. He met Nihlus's reflected gaze and cocked a brow ridge, asking permission to intrude upon their family evening, perhaps.

Nihlus nodded, then opened the top and doors, waiting for them to get out before he followed, but only as far as the car's front end. "Go ahead in," he told them, suddenly needing the almost-coolness and peaceful almost-darkness. "I'll be down in a couple of minutes."

Surprising him, they both just nodded, then stepped into the elevator, Sol starting a gentle argument about whether or not they'd be able to see the brighter stars, even through Nos Astra's light pollution. Nihlus just shook his head, then turned away, walking over to the wall where he and Al sat weeks before and made their peace.

He pressed his knees into the low wall, unsure why he hadn't just gone inside with the others. Letting out a long, hollow feeling breath, he sat and then eased his legs over to hang free above the city. Everything had changed so much and so fast in the past seventy-five days. Sometimes it felt like drowning, caught and dragged along in a torrential river.

He wouldn't trade it. Not one bit of it. He just needed a minute to stick his head above the water and catch his breath. The reapers and Cerberus and the promise of war scared him; he wasn't a complete idiot. But that particular fear amounted to a drop in a wide sea.
Closing his eyes, he dug his talons into the seam along the top of the wall and took a deep breath. Blossoms … sweet smelling, like fruit, ripe and dripping with nectar. It settled behind his keel, beating like insect wings. Why did the wonderful things terrify him?

"Cikabeknai?" The call came from a couple metres away, soft enough that it didn't startle him. "What are you doing out here?"

He took another deep breath, then turned around to face Shepard, planting his feet back on solid concrete and gravel. "Thinking." He shrugged, just a crooked bob of his head. "Taking a few minutes to breathe before everyone gets all excited about Izzy."

Shepard walked toward him, her steps uncharacteristically pensive. "I think I know you too well to imagine that you've gotten cold feet about all this family stuff, so what's on your mind?" She moved to sit next to him, then hesitated and twisted to sit across his thighs, her arm draped loosely around his neck.

Nihlus shook his head and wrapped his arms around her. "Just how much life has changed in a short time." He nuzzled her ear, the skin satin-soft against his mouth-plates. "It's mostly great things, but it's still just flying at us so fast that it leaves me breathless sometimes."

She kissed him. "Yeah, I get that. Seems like I've been running without stopping since I woke up. Hell … since I saved your gorgeous, reckless ass on Eden Prime." She tucked her head in the curve of his neck, her cheek cool, her hair silky and soft. "It's hard to believe it's just nearing the three month mark since I woke up."

"And now we're a family and getting prepared to make the opening salvos in a war that could destroy everything." Turning his face into her hair, he took a deep breath, letting a few moments of calm settle around them. "I just want to start our lives."

Gripping her tight, the flutter in his chest becoming almost frantic, Nihlus fought to calm his racing heart. His mind spun out a thousand desperate ideas how to avoid the war or end it, but it wasn't cowardice that inspired his landslide of avoidance. He'd face the reapers and give it all the strength he had … more even, because those spurin stood between his family and peace.

Shepard stilled his mind with a soft kiss. "We'll get each other through it," she whispered, her lips still brushing his mouth. "And then we'll find somewhere quiet—somewhere new and beautiful—and raise our family. " Another kiss, that one longer and heated enough that his momentary panic vapourized. "Come on, let's go give the family something happy to focus on."

She stood, leaving his lap feeling cold despite his armour, but then she turned back and held out her hand. He took it, making her tug a little before he followed. For a second, he let himself imagine where they would be and what they'd be doing the following evening, but shut it down, afraid he'd give his plans away in some small way.

Although Shepard said nothing in the elevator, Nihlus felt an expectant sort of excitement around her. That energy grew as the seconds passed until the elevator doors opened and she sprang out.

"Look who I found loitering on the roof," she called, leading the way into the empty-feeling room.

"Nihlus!" Their mari stood to greet him, arms steady as she reached for him, eyes bright and keen. She looked wonderful, better than he'd seen her, even two cycles back when they met. Pulling him in to touch brows, she chuffed softly. "You look wonderful."

"I look good?" He held her at arm's length, grinning at her. Dear spirits, she glowed so bright that it burned its way up his arms. Despite the pressure in his throat, he managed to chuckle. "Who are you, and what have you done with Treana Vakarian?"

She cradled his face in her hands, her bare palms warm and strong against his mandibles. "I'll explain everything once you three tell us why you dragged us to Illium." Releasing him, she sat back down, expectant gaze shifting between them.

Nihlus embraced his pari, then looked past the Vakarian clan to the Shepards. "Hello, Lucille … Bunny." He leaned over the coffee table and shook Lucy's hand and met Bunny's glower with a nod and a smile. He hadn't really spoken to Shepard's family since the trip to Palaven for the first bonding ceremony, and he felt the need to tread carefully around Jane's mother. She really hadn't been pleased about her daughter bonding with two torini and made it clear she'd set up her tent in the Garrus camp if it came down to it.

"Nihlus." Lucy smiled, the expression bright and genuine, easing back his concern. "It's good to see you again."

"And you." He bit back the urge to make a small hint to the fact that they'd been brought to Illium for more than the announcement about Izzy. That news had to wait for Garrus to take Shepard out of the apartment after dinner.

Speaking of …. He turned, meeting his dilan's bright green stare, the emerald lights in that gaze twinkling with mischief and delight. She'd already curled in next to Garrus, leaving a space for him on the couch. When she patted the cushion in invitation, he took the seat and leaned back a little, letting them take center stage for their news. As much as Izzy felt like his child—as much as she was his child—she really was Garrus and Shepard's to announce.

He grinned as his fratrin and dilan spent a moment staring at one another in a silent war of 'you go first' before Shepard cleared her throat, and sighed, a noisy, grudging admission of defeat. Shepard opened her mouth, freezing like that for a moment before shutting it again.

Nihlus watched her, wishing he could see her thoughts. He harboured no doubts that the news would be met with joy, but he didn't envy them the explanation.

"In six months," Shepard began, prodding him from his thoughts, "you're going to be grandparents." She grinned at Bunny and Sol. "Or aunts as the case may be."

A good three minutes of breathless silence followed, five stunned sets of eyes looking from Shepard's face to her belly then Garrus and back. Nihlus pulled his mandibles in tight against his face as he watched, only his traitorous brow plates betraying his eagerness for the storm to break.

"Wait."

He should have known Sol would beat everyone to the punch. His filitrin's mandibles flicked several times before she let out a soft, subvocal rumble of awe, surprising him with the depth of love behind it … well, maybe not surprise at the amount of love so much as the lack of teasing.

Sol opened her mouth a couple of times before she managed to say, "You're not out there taking on collectors with my niece or nephew in there, are you?" Stare riveted to Shepard's stomach, she chuffed and shook her head. "I don't know how things work with humans." Her awe slid back and forth between curiosity and confusion. "Can we see it? Can you find out if it is a girl or boy?"

"How?" Lucy whispered, her brow knitted into deep furrows. "You're not … you two aren't …"

Shepard activated her omnitool, bringing up the scan, everyone in the room melting into cooing, gasping puddles that deepened to concern as Shepard explained about Mordin and his experiment. The explanations complete, the sitting room dissolved into a flurry of embraces and joy.

Nihlus's comms chimed. No doubt EDI getting back to him about the mission the next day. He hesitate for a half second before sending a message to try again in a couple of hours. For the next little while, the war needed to stay outside. In the coming hours, they needed to store up happy memories … bright lights to hold up against the darkness waiting on the other side of the door to swallow them whole.

(A-N: Nihlus and his secrets. He'd better just hope that Shepard appreciates being kept in the dark. :D As always, thanks so much for reading and reviewing/commenting. Loves and hugs and frisky kittens with balls of wool.)
Future Continuous Chapter 41

Chapter Summary

(Previously on Future Continuous: Shepard's return means it's right back to work preparing for the reapers and taking down the collectors. Still, she and her torini decide to make sure there is time for themselves as well. She and Garrus married just in time to get dragged off to Korlus, then taking Legion to bond with the chiastyllia. Now, the day after they laid Mordin's baby bomb on their families, they are doing Miranda the favour of rescuing Oriana from the clutches of Henry Lawson, who is on planet and looking to cause all the trouble.)

Torin - Turian for male over the age of majority

Tarin - Turian for female over the age of majority

Fratrin - Brother by oath and honour rather than one by blood

Dilan - Turian for fiancee

Tarc - Turian equivalent of shit.

Nais - (Asari) pronounced Nah-ees. Asari over the age of majority (40) Plural - Naisa Ciscera - a sparkling, turian cider made from cactus analogs.

Ungentira - A large cat-analogue predator native to Palaven.

Maraquil - Iconic, predatory seabird analogues native to Palaven

Preteril - A tiny, burrowing marsupial analogue native to many dextro worlds.

Caris - Dear one. Beloved

Spurin - Bastard.

Haksaya kubenar - A term of endearment, literally translates as my strong, true heart.

Cikabeknai - The reciprocal term of endearment for the above. Literally translates to brave love.

87 Days ASR (0845 Ypres time) (Nos Astra)

Nihlus straightened the already pristine lines of his best black and red suit as he crossed the street, then tugged his cuffs down. Despite the many roles he'd played over the cycles, he didn't know if he could pull off headhunter … well, at least not the corporate sort. He winced and shuddered. Frankly, he preferred crushing criminals beneath the weight of his Spectre authority, but that day, the gun work fell to Shepard and Operative Lawson.

He glanced at Thane and Sol, both looking as comfortable in business garb as he felt. Sol picked at hers while Thane vibrated at high alert, as if worried that he'd shed his skills along with his leathers.

At least early morning painted the city with bright, rosey-golden hued light, and the opening buds on the trees sweetened the grey bite of the industrial, city air. The crowds flowed in orderly, practiced columns, hurried ripples of life parting around benches and kiosks just to stream right back into the same lines: insects negotiating their grayscale jungle. The sterility of it—the sameness of everything around him—skittered down his back, the endless tide of "normal life" sucking the heat from his cells and the steel from his bones.

"I've never understood how they endure it," Thane said, his voice a coincidental breath of understanding, the subtle wheeze behind it, a commentary on the strangulation of civilian, urban existence.

"They don't know any better," Sol answered, the unaffected calm of her voice belied by the talons that tugged at the throat of her suit. "Not everyone is built for chaos, violence, and uncertainty like we are."

"Dressed to kill and looking yummy, cikabeknai," Shepard's whisper through his radio broke over the rest of Sol's explanation.

Nihlus searched the docking bay, spotting her cheeky grin in a queue waiting for an elevator.

That smile dragged him back to their goodbye at the apartment. Teasing, Shepard had given him a heated wink, her fingertips trickling down his throat, as cool and gentle as rain against his hide. "You're going to have every tarin on Illium chasing after you and most of the naīsa as well."

Teasing him down into kissing range, she pressed her lips against his mouth, words breathing against his plates as they breezed past in the wake of her kiss. "You'd better come back single, because I'm selfish. I'm completely and absolutely not willing to share you with anyone."

He smiled and nuzzled along the line of her jaw, savouring the slight salt tang of her skin on the tip of his tongue as he tasted the hollow beneath her ear. "That seems somewhat hypocritical, haksaya kubenar."

She leaned into him. "Now, be fair, this whole thing wasn't my idea." She squeezed him tight. "But now that you crazies talked me into it, I can't imagine trying to breathe without either one of you. Okay?"

Pulling her in tight, he nodded. "Definitely." Mandibles flaring and fluttering, he thanked the spirits she couldn't read the minutia of turian body language, or he'd have given his secret away.

"Hey! You with us?" Sol's elbow between his plates yanked him out of his thoughts.

When he focused back on the crowds, they'd swallowed Shepard whole. Letting out a noisy breath, he nodded. "Yeah, I'm here. Let's get this done."

"Beta Team reporting in," Garrus said across the mission channel. "Target acquired. Lawson just left his apartment in the Eclipse base. He's shadowed by two squads of Cerberus and private guards. They're playing it casual and trying to blend in, but they're definitely loaded for ungentira."
"Roger that, Beta, but the phrase is 'loaded for bear'. Geez, get it right, already." Shepard cackled for a second before reporting, "Alpha Team is still ten minutes from intercept."

"Is it stupid that I'm sort of pissed off that we don't have an official team title?" Sol grumbled. "We should totally be Shadow Team or Team Hotness or … something sexy." Despite the bitter slant of the sigh that followed her words, her mandibles flicked.

"Team Annoying, Whiney Little Sister?" Nihlus offered, dropping a deadpan stone into the deep, white-noise-quiet of the crowded docking bay.

"Team Amazing Warrior Goddess," Thane countered, earning a ray of pure sunshine from Sol and a grumble from Nihlus.

The Spectre coughed over his words as he glanced at the drell and said, "Suck up."

"And that's why he's my favourite," Sol said and flounced a few paces ahead of them.

After ostracizing him for a handful of metres—just a little longer than she needed to—Sol dropped back next to Nihlus. "I'm not sure how we're supposed to do this," she said after another couple of seconds. "Do we just walk up to this family and say, 'Hey there, heard Cerberus was giving you a job, how about a better one?'"

Nihlus shrugged. As much time as he'd spent trying to come up with a big speech, he still had no clue. It seemed more than a little sinister to mug people at a transit station and offer to whisk them off to a new job.

"Plans change?" he offered after a long pause, his tone casually interested, just tossing the idea out there. "We can play the part of the team sent in to give them the new marching orders and speed them on their way. If we prepare Anderson to deal with their enquiries, we should even be able to get them on the Normandy."

Sol grinned and wrapped an enthusiastic arm around his cowl. "See, this is why we put up with your surly disposition and peculiar odour."

"Thank you, caris," Nihlus said, deadpan. "You're support is underwhelming."

"Our targets?" Thane asked, his hand extending past Nihlus to gesture to three people, clustered together and looking lost. They hovered near the custom doors, their baggage clutched tight as if they expected it to be robbed any moment.

"Looks like it." Nihlus elbowed Sol, prodding her to lift the sign with their surname on it. He shook his head when she tried to hand it off. "Nope, you drew the short straw, you hold the sign."

"I take back all the nice things I just said," she said, practically growling as she held up the sign. Plastering what Jane called a 'shit-eating grin' onto her face, she said, "You're a spurin and you smell like krogan toenail fungus."

"Nice." Nihlus plastered on a smile that welcomed the newcomers and strode toward the small cluster of people. "Good morning. Mr. and Mrs. Ferrer? Oriana." He held out a welcoming hand, shaking their slower, nervous ones. "Nihlus Kryik."

"You're here to see us to our new posting?" the woman asked. She looked back and forth between the three of them, tweaking Nihlus's memory: these people owed their livelihoods to Cerberus and three aliens had shown up to greet them. Spirits, they needed to be smarter.
Oh well, too late to do anything about that, the family would run screaming before Miranda and Shepard made it across from the cargo docks.

Nihlus nodded, trying for confident and businesslike. "Yes, we're here to escort you to an Alliance frigate to take you to your new post on Horizon."

Mr. Ferrer scowled and backed up a step, placing himself in front of his wife and daughter. "I was told that positions awaited us at IPE on Beckenstein."

"Ah, yes," Thane said, his voice smooth and low. "We feared the head office hadn't been able to contact you while in flight." He smiled and held out an arm, ushering the family toward a table in the lounge. "Please, we'll be happy to sit down with you and discuss the details."

"Hey, Team-Stuck-With-My-Annoying-Baby-Sister, where are you?" Garrus broke through, his voice tack-sharp. "Still near the family's arrival point?"

"Excuse me for just a second," Nihlus said, smiling and giving the Ferrers a shallow bow. "Head office." He walked away, losing himself in the crowd while Thane and Sol seated the family. "What's going on?" he asked. "We're still at the docking bay, trying to convince them to come with a bunch of strange aliens."

"Lawson is on his way there. Didn't even try to hide it, so he either knows our plan, or he always expected Miranda to circumvent him." Quick, heavy breaths interrupted the general's words. "He just got in a car. You need to get them out of there, just in case."

"Damn it," Shepard cut in. "We're fighting our way through Eclipse guards, enough that they could well be a delaying tactic." He voice muffled a little. "Miranda, how well do you know and trust Lanteia?"

Both Nihlus and Garrus waited through the discussion that ensued. Less than a minute ticked away, feeling more like a half hour, Nihlus able to feel his cells aging as they prickled beneath his hide.

"Miranda insists Lanteia is trustworthy," Shepard came back, shouting over loud accusations from Miranda in the background. Guess their secret was out. "Miranda, back off. Yes, I didn't tell you the whole plan, but the aim is still to save your sister, so shut up for a second." She let out a growling sigh as the background noise died to a low roar.

"Finally. Okay. Beta Team and Team Sol-Wants-a-Cool-Name: we've overheard Miranda's other trusted contact, Niket, mentioned on Eclipse comms as meeting the family and turning them over to the Eclipse." Shepard made a low humming sound. "Maybe since the fighting started and the family is not in Niket's custody, Lawson just figured it out and is coming to search for Oriana."

Shepard cursed when Miranda started back up, her volume completely not in keeping with her usual calm professionalism. The sound muffled before Shepard continued, "Cikabeknai, I don't care if you have to drug them … or god forbid … tell them the truth; just get them out of there. If Lawson wants Oriana that badly … if Cerberus does, they can't be allowed to get their hands on her."

"I'm right on Lawson's tail," Garrus said, his voice resolute. "We jumped in a cab right behind him, so we'll have your six if he comes after you at the docks."

"Contact Anderson and have the Normandy ready for guests," Nihlus said, returning to the table. "We could be coming in hot."

"Will do." Garrus broke for a second before continuing, "Link your nav data to my tool, so I can track you if we're coming after you."

Nihlus did. "Thanks. Keep me updated. I have to go explain to three people why they need to run for their lives." He clenched his jaw, studying the three wary travellers, wondering how much they had guessed over the cycles? Had they bothered to trace their employment back to Cerberus? Wondered why their adopted daughter came with so much secrecy attached to her? Well, if they hadn't, they were in for a surprise straight out of the ninth level of buratrums.

Mr. Ferrer met Nihlus's gaze with a stare of pure steel. Suspicion simmered beneath, bubbling up through in the set of his shoulders and rigid angles of his jaw. Maybe he knew more than Nihlus could have guessed about the shadows that haunted his daughter.

"Something's wrong," Oriana said, the statement hitting cudgel hard, solid and intractable. "Maybe you should stop giving us this story meant to keep us calm and go with the truth."

Nihlus nodded. Good for her, not the preteril she seemed to be at all. Time for the truth and nothing but the truth. "How much of Cerberus's involvement in your lives are you aware of?" He pulled out a chair and sat despite the alarm sinking claws into the back of his neck, insisting that they get moving.

Ferrer's jaw tightened. "I traced our company back to them nearly a decade ago, but it's a subsidiary, and definitely not involved with their more dubious activities." He stood. "Are you going to take us hostage? I assure you, we are not important enough for Cerberus to pay ransom."

"Quite the opposite," Nihlus replied. "I was not entirely upfront with you. My name is Spectre Nihlus Kryik. I'm here with my partner and our team to extract your family to safety." He pulled his chair a little closer to the table and leaned in. "Your daughter, Oriana, was born to a very rich, powerful, and corrupt man named Henry Lawson, and placed with you by Cerberus."

He winced as the blood drained from all three faces. While her parents moved closer to her, Mrs. Ferrer clasping her daughter's hand, Oriana took less than ten seconds to go from pale and shocked to a clenched jaw and a stare filled with fire, her entire body tightening with fury.

Nihlus met that stare with a firm nod. "Originally, our information was that Cerberus arranged your move because Lawson discovered your location, but we've since found that the Illusive Man is in bed with Henry Lawson. Suspecting that she'd be abducted during the move, we arranged for you to come work for our colonization and safe haven program."

"Mr. Bossman?"

Nihlus held up a talon as Kasumi's voice came through his comms. "Apologies, but this will be more information coming in." He lifted his hand to his aural canal. "Go ahead, Ms. Goto."

"I'm in Creep-Psycho-Father's rooms and hacked into everything I could find." She paused, a satisfied chuckle betraying her success before she continued. "He's good: he wiped everything clean." The chuckle again, tickling his ear like ciseras bubbles. "Too bad for him, I'm better."

Nihlus's omnitool beeped, a message from the thief popping up with several attachments. He opened the first, a confidential, heavily encrypted email.

"The first thing was an email sent last night telling Creep-Father that Subject Twenty Three's test results came back positive in two of three categories. The adjustments to the genome between Subjects Twenty-Two and Twenty-Three appear to be successful. Further adjustments on Subject Twenty-Four should result in passing grades in all three categories." Kasumi's tone voiced Nihlus's confusion as he read along with her. "And it finishes with a guarantee that the subject will be apprehended and taken to Site A41 where testing and program integration will commence." The thief's face replaced the document on his screen. "This sounds bad, Bossman. You need to get that girl out of there."

"Spectre Kryik?"

Nihlus looked up to see Oriana's father standing less than a metre away, his stare riveted to the back side of the omnitool's holo screen. "Sir?"

Ferrer scowled. "Raising a teenager has taught me how to read backwards." The man drew a breath deep into his well-dressed barrel chest. "Promise me that you'll explain everything once we've reached safety."

Nihlus nodded, a single, solemn jerk of his head, thanking the spirits for Ferrer's ability to remain calm and see sense.

The man turned back to his family. "Come, we need to save explanations for once we're clear of whatever trouble is tracking us." Arms wide, he shepherded his worried wife and angry daughter between metal tables and through the coffee crowd. "Spectre, our lives are in your hands."

Nihlus scanned the shifting tide, then checked with Thane and Sol before moving into the crowd, setting a line as the maraquil flies for the nearest maintenance hatch. They needed to get somewhere he could see the enemy coming. Crowds made his hide twitch. Too many hidden agendas, identities, and firearms lurked out in the masses. Too out of control.

"Why is this man after me?" Oriana startled him with her demand as she jogged up to stride at his side. "If he gave me up for adoption, shouldn't that have been the end of it?"

"That will be up to others to explain," Nihlus deflected. Turning sideways he placed himself between Oriana and a small cluster of brokers too engrossed in their discussion of Alliance colonial futures to step aside. "I was just sent to make sure you and your parents get to safety."

She scoffed, a low, very familiar cough. "And if I don't buy your hired muscle excuse?" Instead of dropping back when he checked his floor plan of the docking bays and detoured toward a maintenance hatch, she shook her head. "Who hired you? Tell me that and maybe I'll trust you enough to let you take my parents somewhere safe."

Equal parts frustration and admiration turned a heated stare at the young woman. "Your twin sister." He answered her open-mouthed silence with a cocked brow plate. "Good enough? Can we get out of here now?"

Oriana retreated back to walk between her parents, deep lines drawn in her brow, bracketing her mouth, and spidering out from the corners of her eyes. "I'm not helpless." She shot the words at him, accusing him of a crime he hadn't committed.

"Don't suppose you are, if your sister is any gauge, and if we don't get moving, you'll have a chance to prove it," he assured her before turning to override the hatch. He pulled it open and lunged through, grateful to finally pull his weapon, the pistol settling easily into low ready. Leaving it to Sol and Thane to get the Ferrers through and lock up behind them, he pushed on.

A message flashed from Kasumi, a map charting the fastest way to a service entrance to the Normandy's docking bay. Sending her a mental thank you, he entered the route and activated his scan to keep an eye on the fifty metres ahead and behind.
They moved quickly through the first tunnel, but the crowds on the trading floor slowed them to an irritating pace when they stepped back out. When Nihlus glanced back, Thane moved up to partly shield the Ferrer's from the side while Sol moved to their opposite flank. The Spectre shook his head. For how little they'd worked together, they formed a seamless unit.

Oriana closed on him from behind. "Something's off here, Spectreman."

Nervous tension, brittle and saline, pricked his nose along with the ozone and sulfur bite of her biotics. He reached out, talon-tips just touching her arm. "Keep the biotics locked down unless we're attacked." Reacting to her gentle, confident scoff, he chuckled. "All right then, why do you say something's off? Besides the crazy DNA donor trying to capture you, I mean."

The young woman shook her head. "Ever looked at a picture and felt as though something was missing? Like the artist intended something to be there, but then erased it?" She shrugged, squinting into the crowd, her head cocking a little to one side. "It's like there is a blank space … no … not blank." A soft, frustrated growl rolled in the back of her throat. "Like there's a piece of the universe that was there, but someone removed it, or shifted it just enough that I can't see it."

Nihlus frowned, and reached up, raking his talons over his fringe. "I'm not sure I understand."

Another little growl, and she stamped her foot. "Dammit." She glanced back at her mother. "Sorry, Mom." Deep blue eyes stared up at him, a combination of searching and frustration begging him to understand. "I'm not explaining it well, but there's something ahead that just isn't right. Please? Believe me?" She grasped the cuff of his sleeve and tugged him toward a side alley.

That stare commanded respect, its source deep beneath layers of instinct and intuition. He'd seen it too many times pinning him down from Shepard's field of green. "Okay." He allowed her to lead him into the alley, while he searched for another route.

"Take the door behind you, bossman," Kasumi said in his ear. Head down a level and left to the end of the street. I'll have a van waiting."

"Nihlus," Garrus interrupted, "we landed ahead of you at a private dock a couple down from the Normandy. We just entered the dock end of the trading floor, and he's heading your way in a hurry. Get off the street."

"He's got to have a way to track us," Nihlus said, leaping into motion. He opened the door and hurried Oriana through. "Sol, fry that door." Without waiting for a confirmation, he locked his hand through the young woman's elbow, pulling her along. Apparently, whatever she felt out there scared the protests and smart-ass attitude out of her, and she followed without so much as a bleat.

Facing an empty corridor, Nihlus jumped into a run, keeping a pace the rest could maintain.

"That's a firm on Lawson's ability to track you," Garrus's voice broke through the hollow thump of boots on tile. "He headed straight for that door, didn't even twitch in another direction. His people are trying to get through, but it's going to take them a bit. Congratulate Sol on a first rate muck-up job."

"We'll scramble the other end of this alley as well, give you some room to whittle them down without any collateral damage." Nihlus slapped his palm against the door control, waiting as the damned thing rotated through its cycle. Muffled, but definitely somewhere close, klaxons blared an alarm. What in the name of …?

"Tarc! They aren't subtle. They're cutting through." Garrus chuffed, but it came through strangled.
"Illium cops are moving in, but he doesn't appear to care. Get moving."

"Kasumi!" Nihlus barked the thief's name as he dragged Oriana through the portal and down a flight of stairs to merge with the crowds of the booking floor. "Lawson has a tracker on us, so we're just going to run for it. Get to the dock." Glancing back to make sure the rest of his tiny squad was with him, he took off, racing down the street, across a court, and up another level of stairs.

"Nihlus." Shepard this time. "Two gunships just bolted out of this docking bay like they had a bloom of over-zealous hanar evangelists on their tails." Breathless, her words punctuated by curses, she shouted to be heard over the din of battle. "I guarantee they're headed your way." A rocket detonated close enough to Shepard's head that it set Nihlus's ears ringing, deafening him enough he missed her next few words.

"... plan: get the family to the Normandy and tell Anderson to haul ass for Horizon. Miranda and I'll follow once we take this Eclipse bitch out. Over."

"Roger that, Shepard. Stay safe. Nihlus out." He shook his head, trying to clear the remaining ringing, but jumped right back into a sprint up the staircase toward the customs floor. The sound of gunfire echoed like fireworks across the tile and polycrete lounge as Garrus engaged Lawson's mercs.

The door across the cargo lounge opened and mercs poured through, fighting backwards. A high powered bullet tore through an Eclipse helmet, pulling a harsh, "Fuck!" from Oriana. Gore splattered across the white lounge, a jarring reality that tightened the girl's grip on Nihlus's arm.

Civilians screamed and bolted, guns fired, and behind him, Nihlus heard, "Oriana Ferrer, you watch your mouth."

If he hadn't needed all his air for sprinting down the alley and dodging a small phalanx of panicked volus, the absurdity of scolding the girl for her curse would have pulled a disrespectfully loud bray of laughter from the Spectre.

"Oriana, stop running," a deep, accented voice called as they reached the other end of the alley. The accent rolled smooth as silk, but something gelid and slimy slipped along the underside … something that made Nihlus shudder as it continued, "These people … these aliens are lying to you."

Nihlus slapped the door control, turning away from the voice in favour of bolting through and down the long customs plaza. Despite struggling to keep pace in heels and a long dress, the young woman dragged behind him without a word of complaint.

"Oriana," the voice continued, still completely unruffled and calm, but colder than Noveria's ass. "You can never escape me. I can track you anywhere." A long sigh. "More than a hundred people have already died because of these aliens interfering in a family matter. Will you be selfish and force me to kill the rest of their accomplices? If you come with me, no one else needs to be hurt."

"Ms. Goto, where are you?" Nihlus demanded, when he slid to a halt at the cab stand at the end of the departures platform. He herded Oriana and her parents behind him, Sol and Thane taking positions on his flanks to give them cover.

"Five minutes out." She cursed. "Sorry, Bossman, but the traffic gods are not with me."

He growled, low and threatening as Lawson entered the door at the far end. "If it comes down to gunplay, Thane and Oriana put up a shield, keep the Ferrers safe as long as you can. We've got five minutes before extraction." Nihlus stepped out three paces, just far enough to give his team time to react.

"Hand over my daughter." Slowly and without a gun drawn, Lawson closed in on them. The gunfire making its way up the alley effectively cleared most of the people from the customs floor, but some remained hiding behind kiosks or jumping into cabs at the far stand. "You haven't got anywhere left to go. My men will keep your general busy longer than it takes for Ms. Goto to arrive."

Nihlus pushed Ori behind him when she lunged from shelter. "Don't panic," he whispered under his breath and backed a step toward the empty dock. Staring down Lawson, he shook his head, diamond hard, a threat and a promise. "Not going to happen. You're mercs are surrounded on all sides."

The indecently well-dressed monster laughed. "Don't take me for a fool, Spectre. Neither you nor your General Vakarian are going to open fire with all these civilians in the crossfire." Shaking his head he made a gesture toward the long fall below the dock. "If I've anticipated this much of your uselessly over-complicated plan, do you really believe I don't have contingencies wired into all your possible escape routes?" The mock humour sloughed from his face, revealing nothing beneath but darkness disguised as a man.

When Shepard escaped from Cerberus, she'd told him and Garrus about the reason for the experiments run on them and Al: to create layers of command units. Dear spirits. Some of those units, most likely the uppermost echelon needed to blend … needed to plan and execute those plans.

Saren.

Suddenly, Nihlus knew exactly what Ori had tried to explain to him moments before. Henry Lawson reeked of dark energy and corruption. Indoctrinated, mad, ruthless …

_Saren nearly destroyed Eden Prime to access a beacon; how much destruction could Lawson wreak upon Nos Astra to prevent his daughter's escape?_

"He's the missing spot in the picture," Ori whispered, pressing tight and trembling against his right side as her second hand wrapped around his arm. "It's not even a man, it's a skin suit."

Nihlus merely nodded, his mind racing too quickly to even tell her to shush. He needed to get the girl out without the entire customs floor ending up thirty levels down. Lawson had them cornered. No wait out but down unless ….

"Tell me about these tests," the Spectre shouted back across the gulf between them. "Subject Twenty-Three passed on most fronts while Subject Twenty-Two failed on all but one?" He pressed Oriana back toward Thane. "Subject Twenty-Three would be Oriana? That makes Operative Lawson Number Twenty-two?"

"You couldn't possibly understand my goals … what is needed to perfect humanity … what is needed to face the reapers." He held out a hand, his stare sliding off Nihlus to latch on something behind the Spectre. "Oriana, I can track you anywhere in the galaxy. I will kill everyone between us." He took a breath, sighing a little, but kept up the steady tread eating the distance between them. Although he never glanced behind him, Nihlus could see that he awaited backup. Whatever happened, Henry Lawson didn't intend to die that day. "Haven't enough people died in this foolishness already?"
"What were the tests?" the girl shouted, her tone solid and cocky. She stepped up beside Nihlus again, bold and steady. "You want to use me to create the perfect human? Or, what, turn me into a weapon? Not an incentive. Tell me why I should go with you … without all the threats."

Nihlus clenched his mandibles against his face to hide a prideful grin. Damn, wasn't she something? He wondered if Operative Lawson knew how little protection and coddling her baby sister needed. Keeping his weapon leveled between the man's eyes, Nihlus allowed the girl to step just past him. One step past him. When she slid her foot forward to take another, he rumbled a warning that she heeded.

"Well?" Oriana prompted. "Is that all you can do? Threaten and lie?" She sidestepped closer to Nihlus. "What you want me for is so terrible that the truth would make me fight to the death to avoid it, right?" She scoffed as her sperm donor hesitated a split second. "You're not my father. My father is the man standing behind me, the one I'll die to protect."

"Kasumi?" Nihlus whispered.

"A minute out, tracking those two gunships though," she replied, whispering as well. "Not sure how this well cargo van is going to stand up to them while it's parked. Once we're away, I'll be able to leave them chewing my vapours."

Garrus appeared in the doorway at the far end, looking exhausted and blood-splattered, but well. Nihlus shook his head ever so slightly, warning his fratin to stay at that end of the plaza. Before Garrus acknowledged the gesture, Shepard stepped through the door and reached out to grab his arm, holding him back. Operative Lawson followed them in, but just wrenched her arm loose when Shepard tried to stop her.

"Your men are all dead, Father," the operative shouted, so much hatred on the last word that it dripped venom. She shook her head and scoffed when he spun to face her. "What? Not still tracking me as well? I suppose there's no need once Lanteia tells you that we've failed your tests." She retched, an arm wrapping around her belly. "Once you find out that we won't work into your perfect breeding program."

Shepard leaped forward, grabbing the operative around the shoulders. "Come on, this isn't the time or place." The captain turned on the elder Lawson, one of the ugliest, most furious stares Nihlus had ever seen twisting her face. "Your backup, and most of the Eclipse in this city are all dead."

After a dramatic pause—always the showman—she lifted her hand to her ear. "Normandy, do you have clearance to fire?"

"Yes, ma'am. Firing now," Sparky replied.

Nihlus saw the shots and subsequent explosions reflected in the glass of the large departures board as Lawson's gunships succumbed to the Normandy's guns. Tarc, but wasn't his dilan something else? Lawson didn't stand a chance even though he knew the plan.

Hearing a vehicle pull in behind them, the Spectre took Oriana's arm and backed toward their exit. Knowing Shepard, he'd have a half second to get everyone in the van and gone before all hell broke loose.

Shepard smiled, the expression more terrifying than the last, it slowed his heart … making him wonder for the first time if Cerberus had left something out in her reconstruction. He hadn't expected her to come back exactly the same, but the frozen hatred in her eyes ….
"I don't like slavers," Shepard said, placing herself between her people and Lawson. "Leave before we take the risk that you're bluffing about the explosives."

"No!" Miranda shoved Shepard out of the way and bolted toward her father. "You don't get away with this. You'll never stop hunting us unless you're dead."

A burst of black, chaotic energy exploded from the man in a flare stronger than Nihlus had ever seen. It roared like a freighter decelerating from orbit as Nihlus reacted on instinct, throwing himself down and dragging everyone in reach with him. The odd cold/warm tingle of biotics surrounded him, Thane and Oriana buffering their group against the worst of the blow. Nihlus leaned up, glancing over his shoulder in time to see Miranda gripped by a biotic field stronger than even Saren had ever created.

Nihlus leaped up as Kasumi pulled in next to the platform. "Get them into the van!" he shouted, running toward Lawson. The man turned to look at Nihlus, grinning as, with a casual flick, he sent his elder daughter flying over the edge of the platform. Before he could change direction to intercept Miranda, Lawson hit him with a throw. His keel let out a resounding crack that told him Mordin and Chakwas's careful work had been undone even before the pain registered.

"Nihlus!" Shepard and Garrus screamed in unison as he hit the ground rolling.

He tumbled toward the edge, talons shredding his gloves as he scrambled for purchase, but then he slammed into the side of the van, the sudden stop punching the air out of him. Fighting back against the blackness trying to close in on him, he reached out, trying to find Oriana.

"Please tell me someone caught her," Shepard hollered, making herself heard over the sudden din of overlapping voices.

Nihlus heard thundering feet racing across the tile, and hands grabbed him, practically throwing him through the air. Then a door slammed and darkness fell.

"Did someone catch her?" Shepard screamed again in his comms, her voice thick with fear.

An absent thought wandered through, skipping along the edge of consciousness … when had Shepard and Miranda bonded so tightly? And why was everyone talking at once … and slurring?

"I did," Sparky called through the comms. "You can buy Mordin, the geth techs, and Melenis a cup of coffee when we get back. I never would have been able to hold her without the new amp and all those lessons." He let out a long, trembling sigh. "Okay, we got her onboard. Holy blessed Enkindlers, if no one could need a mid-air rescue from the hatch of the Normandy for a while, that would be awesome, thank you. I'm going to go pass out now."

"Don't you dare, Sparky. You're my hero, and I'm going to kiss all over that handsome mug."

Shepard paused, then cursed. "Bastard. Bloody baby Enkindler Jesus … that shit-faced, evil-ass demon of a whorebinder!"

What? Reacting to the absolute rage in Shepard's voice more than her words, Nihlus pushed and kicked at the darkness, trying to hold it off. "Oriana." The name came out as a gasp. "Your fa … Lawson?"

"Escaped in the distraction, but I'm okay." A warm hand closed around his. "Just take it easy. You've been the hero long enough today. We're heading for the *Normandy."

"Where Chakwas will lock you up and throw away the key," Kasumi said, entirely too cheerful. "Later, you can thank me by buying me something nice … and expensive. Don't forget expensive."
Nihlus groaned softly as he lost his battle against the darkness. "I intended to get married tonight."

(A-N: So sorry for the wait, but both I and this stories (and my others are alive and well). Thanks for your support and I hope you enjoy the chapter.)
"I don't want to sleep, I want to snuggle," she wheedled and kissed his chin. Sweet baby Jesus, he smelled good … almost magical. Like the morning. The sun remained low and cool, not warm enough to dry the dew-laden grass sweetening the breeze wafting in the open window. How long had it been since she'd woken up breathing anything but canned air?

Last time on Future Imperfect: The gang helped Miranda save Oriana from Henry Lawson, relocating the family to Horizon to help build and run Sanctuary. Nihlus and Miranda got thrown around by Henry Lawson's surprisingly strong biotics. As they took Nihlus back to the ship for treatment, he revealed that he'd intended to pull off the perfect wedding for Shepard.

Amiala - Grandmother (Familiar form Ama)

Patrem - Father (Familiar form Pari equivalent to dad)

Matrula - Mother (Familiar form Mari equivalent to mom)

Fratrin - Brother, but one of honour, friendship, or of oath rather than one of blood relation. Refers to the bond of kariffratrus.

Caris - Beloved, precious, cherished

Derra - Wife. Female bond-mate.

Verro - Husband, male bond-mate.

Obluvis - plural Obluvi. One who is senile or absent-minded. Slang: Idiot

89 Days ASR (Horizon)

~Garrus~

Garrus slipped out of bed before the other two woke. The world outside the window remained dark and silent, unwilling to release the cool peace of night. As much as he'd love to curl around Shepard and go back to sleep until the sun appeared, he needed to get his machinations rolling before everyone woke and the day stripped away any chance of secrecy.

Dressing to the cacophonous tune of Nihlus and Shepard's mismatched snoring, he wondered how the three of them got any sleep. The walls practically shook with the vibrations. Of course, it might be a matter of cancelling each other out … like a deafening white noise generator.

He paused, standing over the bed as Shepard muttered a little and rolled over, curling in next to Nihlus. Spirits, where had their life come from? He'd never imagined anything like it. With his former career, he figured on being single, working too many hours to have time for anything more than drinks with colleagues. But wasn't it beautiful, the picture spread before him? And then Izzy
He couldn't have dreamed feeling so much love.

Leaning over the bed, he nuzzled Shepard's ear, filling up on her scent, the soft whisper of her heartbeat.

"Mmm." Unfocused eyes blinked up at him. "Callor? You okay?"

"Perfect," he whispered against her lips. He kissed her, her breath so warm against his hide that he just drifted there, savouring it. Finally, he whispered, "Go back to sleep, Kahri."

She nuzzled him, the tip of her nose cool against his cheekbone. "I love you."

"I love you, too." He closed his eyes and kissed her again before pushing himself straight.

Nihlus grumbled and rolled over, gathering Shepard into his arms. Tilting his head toward Garrus, the Spectre made a sorry facsimile of kissy lips, smacking his mouth plates together. "Where's my kiss? Don't you love me, too?"

Garrus chuckled. "Go back to sleep, oblvis."

The general crept out the door of the prefab and into the chill dampness of early morning. Making his way across the colony, he smiled and drew in deep lungfuls of air, the scents of grass and budding leaves heavenly after the endless ozone of recycled and filtered air. Spirits, he missed it. Most every day during his cycles at C-Sec, he headed out to the presidium to eat his lunch, preferring the fake sunlight and real grass to the street lights and cement of the parks in the wards.

The gardens Archangel created on Omega didn't manage the same open feeling of paradise, but as a place of sanity and centering, they'd served him well. He hoped they were replanted by the time he returned. Some days his will to continue the battle had hinged on sitting next to the small stream that wandered through the space. For those moments he didn't need to do or be anything. All he needed to do was breathe in the flowers and watch the fish flit through the water.

"Good morning, General."

He looked up, jolted from his thoughts. Still, a genuine smile greeted Oriana Lawson … Ferrer. "Good morning, Ms. Ferrer. Did you sleep well?"

When they arrived at Horizon, Shepard asked the protheans to house the younger Lawson sister and her family down in the lower levels of the prothean base. She believed that the shielding protecting the Crucible might disguise Oriana's tracker signal as well. Garrus hoped so. Bastards didn't come more ruthless than Henry Lawson.

Oriana chuckled, falling in next to him as he continued to the shuttles. "Surprisingly enough, I did, despite discovering I have a megalomaniac biological father who can track me anywhere due to a radioactive marker he embedded in my DNA." She grinned up at him, far more cheery than anyone had a right to be under the circumstances. Maybe it was shock? "Maybe it's because I also found a sister."

Spinning a sudden circle, she threw her arms wide. "Maybe it's because we're here on this gorgeous planet, not a city in sight, and my parents have dived into Sanctuary with so much passion. They're overjoyed to be doing something pure." She shrugged, her smile one of absolute relief. "I know working for Cerberus weighed on them, regardless of how distant the association was."

Garrus gripped her shoulder. "I'm glad, we'll need the facility far sooner than we're prepared for." Squeezing it, he smiled. "But not today. Today we take a day off." Lifting his hand, he waved to the others already gathered at the shuttles. Yeah, that day, they all just needed to relax.

Miranda hurried to Oriana, and checked her sister over while peppering the young woman with questions.

Oriana chuckled and grabbed Miranda's shoulders. "You're the one he threw off the top of an arcology, not me. I had a wall of turian and drell protecting me the entire time." She drew Miranda into a hug. "Relax. We're here. We're safe, and the sun is starting to come up. It's going to be a beautiful day."

Laughing softly, Miranda nodded. "Very well." Gathering her sister in against her side, she guided the young woman toward the shuttle. "It's been a hard couple of weeks, I suppose we all deserve a party before taking on the collectors."

"Indeed," Garrus agreed, his smile cold, his eyes solid ice as he met Miranda's gaze. For Shepard and Nihlus's sakes he could be civil, if only just. And she spoke the truth. They did deserve a chance to celebrate, none more than Shepard and Nihlus.

When Nihlus called him aside in the medbay, bemoaning the fate of his beautifully arranged wedding venue on the beach outside Nos Astra, Garrus agreed to go and salvage everything before the guards decided they'd been abandoned. When he'd seen the gossamer tents and the flowers … the sheer love Nihlus had poured into making the day special for Shepard, Garrus knew he needed to do something to make up for his _fratrin's_ disappointment.

Hence, heading out before dawn to a lake the locals claimed was one of the most beautiful places in the galaxy. For it being far too early in the morning, a good crowd of volunteers stood next to the shuttles ready to get to work.

"I'm here under protest," Bunny shouted above everyone's cheery greetings. She waited until all eyes fixed on her before slamming her arms down over her chest. She stabbed her mother with a sharpened scowl when Lucy patted her back, a gentle rebuke. "What? Am I the only one who thinks the greedy bitch already has a perfectly good husband?"

Garrus shrugged, throwing his arms wide. "I know, why mess with perfection, right?" He gave her a gentle shove toward the hatch. "Just get on the shuttle, problem child." He chuckled at the string of muttered obscenities that answered him and followed her in, gripping one of the handles along the shuttle's roof.

A soft touch brushed the outside of his hand, drawing his attention down to his _mari_, her stare warm, the love looking up at him tangible.

He took her hand, gripping her talons as the shuttle lifted off. "I didn't know you were coming along." Releasing her, he caressed her face. "You're looking so good. The treatments—" He chuckled and shook his head, love and amazement tangling around the base of his tongue. As much as he'd held out hope for the salarian doctor's treatment, he never expected the difference to be so drastic. The corners of his eyes prickled, emotion lowering his intelligence to blathering level. "You just look so good."

Her mandibles flicked, her smile light and free of pain. "So you've said … ten or twelve times, now." She nodded and shifted a little in her chair, as if testing for any hidden aches. "I am pain-free." A shrug rolled across her shoulders. "I can't lie and say that I'm back to my old self, and I really don't enjoy Omega." She pressed his hand to her cheek. "But it's a small discomfort if spending the next cycle on that rock allows me to be around for days like this."
Garrus nodded. "Izzy is going to need both her amas." The shuttle settled into level flight and he crouched in front of his mari, his hands on her knees. "And I spent far too long away from you." Leaning in, he touched his brow to hers. "Omega may be a dirty old rock, but I'm glad you, Pari, and Sol are so close."

She leaned into him, her warmth a revelation in the moment. Why had he stayed away, letting his entire family deal with the fear and dread of her deteriorating health?

No. He clenched his teeth and nuzzled her brow. That belonged in the past. All it could do was sour the present, and in the present, his fratrin and his bond-mate deserved a beautiful day.

Shifting back into his crouch, he grinned at her. "This production could use a foreperson. You up to the challenge?"

She winked. "Boss everyone around while I sit here and look officious? It's the career I've been training for since you were born."

When the shuttle landed, Garrus and his father helped steady his mari's chair until it hovered above the green, wild meadow. Straightening, he looked out over the glistening grass and the flowers bobbing in the breeze, buds tipped toward the horizon, awaiting the sun. Pristine green-blue waters glistened in the shadow of the mountain, the still depths fed by a glacial river pouring down the side of a distant mountain, its height lost in the wispy clouds.

"Don't let her pretty face fool you," one of the shuttle pilots said, already carrying the first load of supplies off his boat. "As soon as the sun hits overhead, you'll all be swearing that the grass is a mirage, and you're stranded in the desert."

Garrus chuckled at the flowery language coming from the block of a man, his neck hunched down into his shoulders, his body built wide and almost straight down from his shoulders. "Good to know before we're roasting in our suits."

Turning toward the sun, he shaded his eyes and looked at the horizon. They had a few hours before the planet started cooking them. Anyway, he thanked his foresight of bringing all the large fans from Illium. Even under the shade of the tents, they'd need air moving through the evening, especially if they danced … and he intended to dance with his bond-mate and to make sure her new verro danced until he wore through his boots.

"Still protesting, if you care," Bunny called, snatching him from the moment of joy. She marched past him with a duffel slung over her shoulder. Sticking her tongue out at him, she flounced off.

If only she realized how adorable her attitude-filled flouncing looked and how ridiculous. He turned to Kaidan and winked. Garrus grinned as Kaidan nodded and strode past him, following Bunny to the lakeside. The kid didn't stand a chance against Sparky. Well, unless she got him blushing, and he started on fire.

"So," Kaidan called, "you're the whiny, pain in the ass sister?" He jogged up beside the teenager and looked her up and down. "I thought you'd be … I don't know …" He shrugged. "... younger judging by the stories of your temper tantrums." A heavy sigh announced his disappointment. "And … if you were a bad ass, I guess I expected someone more impressive."

Garrus followed, closing the distance as Kaidan upped the chance of being attacked by a rabid nineteen-year-old.

Instead of hitting him, Bunny brayed a single, forced laugh. "Oh, no, the pretty boy doesn't think I'm impressive." She clapped one hand over her heart and stumbled a little as she said, "However will I ever recover from how few fucks I give?" She shook her head. "Go tell the general that I don't need my sister's friends following me around telling me how amazing she is. I agreed not to kill her."

Kaidan laughed. "Oh, you're going to be a lot of fun." He turned toward her, walking sideways as he said, "Bring it, kid. I can take whatever you can dish out."

Garrus grinned, his heart light, spirits high. It looked to be a wonderful day.

---Shepard---

At some point Shepard must have moved around enough to disturb Nihlus. Little wonder, her dreams chased her in circles, the face of the enemy morphing from the Illusive Man to collectors and the dark, terrible voice that reached into her from the swarm. Now and again, Amalair whispered to her of destiny and sacrifice, those phantasms more terrifying than the ones where she hammered at an invisible wall, trying to reach Garrus and Nihlus … all her loved ones on the other side. Yes, the dreams of being some predestined savior tore bigger pieces from her than the ones where she huddled frozen in a drift of ash, sweating and shaking, obsessed with nothing outside of getting another hit while the world burned around her, the dying screaming her name.

The early, soft gold of the sun streamed across their bed when she woke again. Nihlus had turned over to face her, his arms holding her tucked in against him. Not that she felt any need to complain. Instead, she snuggled in tighter, slipping a foot between his calves.

"Stop wriggling," he mumbled, nuzzling her brow. "Some people are trying to sleep in." Still, his arms tightened around her, one broad, warm palm rubbing her back in sleepy circles. "Go back to sleep. I've got you."

Shepard squeezed her eyes tight and swallowed, bracing against the fist closing around her throat. He did, and he always had. Even in the days when they could barely stand to be on the same planet, he'd always been right there if she needed him. Wiping her sweaty face on her sleeve, she tried to beat down the demon and just be there with him in the moment.

"I don't want to sleep, I want to snuggle," she wheedled and kissed his chin. Sweet baby Jesus, he smelled good … almost magical. Like the morning. The sun remained low and cool, not warm enough to dry the dew-laden grass sweetening the breeze wafting in the open window. How long had it been since she'd woken up breathing anything but canned air?

She drew in another deep breath, savouring the scents of summer and the torin in her arms. Spirits, she could survive forever just feasting on that air.

Letting out a long sigh, she whispered, "It's still early. We're on a planet. There's real sunlight and an honest-to-Enkindlers breeze blowing in our window." She stretched in the circle of his arms, her body letting out a long wail in protest. "It's a perfect morning to get in some serious snuggling time."

He chuckled and tucked her in under his chin. "So it is. And we do have a lot of rushed mornings to make up for." Letting out a long breath, he continued caressing her, the heel of his hand massaging along her spine, his rhythm easing the sizzling of her nerves and helping her relax the muscles in her jaw. "I'd hoped to be waking up next to my bond-mate this morning."

Shepard leaned back into the soft support of her pillows and looked up into his eyes. "That was your big secret, wasn't it? You wanted to surprise me with a perfect day where we had our date."
She reached up, the plates of his face as rough as they were cherished under her hand. "Our day will come, old guy."

She reached up, the plates of his face as rough as they were cherished under her hand. "Our day will come, old guy." Her thumb brushed the length of his nose. "For now, it's a beautiful day, and we are all alone in bed." She ducked her head down a little, looking up at him from under heavy lids. Wriggling her brows, she caught the corner of her bottom lip between her canines. "You know
… we could maybe—"

"Have the bed all to ourselves to spread out and go back to sleep?" he asked, leaning up. "Excellent idea." Bracing his hands against her shoulder and hip, he pushed her over to Garrus's side of the bed. Flopping on his back, he stretched out, one arm splayed across her chest. "Oh yeah, that's so much better."

Beating down a grin, Shepard kicked him and shoved his arm onto the mattress. "You're terrible."
Throwing back the covers, she sat on the side of the bed, chin lifted, arms slammed down over her chest. When he dragged a single talon pad down the line of her spine, her skin prickled in a delicious, honey wash of goosepimples. Still, she just shook her head. "No. You're a poophead. I think I will go find a nice spot in the sun and begin writing my memoirs, Holy, Glowing Enkindler Buttocks: The Jane Shepard Story."

A full, throaty laugh rolled across the open expanse of wrinkled, white cotton, subvocals impacting her skin in vibrating waves of love and joy. Hands snatched her shoulders, talon points pricking ever so slightly as Nihlus tugged her back into his arms.

She landed laying across his lap, the edges of his plates cutting across her wounds, but other than sorting herself, she set aside the pain and the early morning trembling of her hands. Instead, she grinned up at him, stare basking in his eyes' brilliant glimmer. It never failed to amaze her how far he … how far they'd both come in two years.

Leaning up, she wrapped her arms around his neck and pulled him down to whisper against his mouth, "Oh my, look who's getting all take charge and domineering." Closing her eyes, she savoured the intoxicating texture of his hide and plates where they brushed bare skin, and drew in a deep breath of his scent. The usual spice-laden desert breeze drifted over the slight, but masculine, musk of sleep. It crept along her veins, settling into her muscle and bone, offsetting their pained trembling with a slow, delicious pulse.

His mandibles tickled her cheeks as they fluttered. "Like the dominant type, do you?" He kissed her, long and slow, the plates of his mouth pressing into her hers, tongue caressing her lips with an almost reverent touch. "Who would have guessed Jane Shepard had such a submissive, squishy, romantic side?" he whispered.

"I'm an enigma," she replied, leaning up to deepen the kiss for a moment. Tipping her head in a slight shrug, she pulled back just enough for air to move between them. "And I like you. You know, a little bit, even though you're a jerk."

Closing the hair's breadth between them, Nihlus rested his brow against hers. "I thought we were supposed to be snuggling, not playing 'bait the turian.'"

"You were the one who wanted the bed all to yourself." Shepard wriggled loose and sat up. "And now you've distracted me from snuggling long enough that I have to pee." She swallowed a hard ball of guilt at the partial truth, but if she put it off any longer, she wouldn't be able to see or feel anything beyond the pain. Happy or not, her damned body needed to heal a hell of a lot faster.

A lazy hand slid down the length of her spine. "Hurry back, the bed's getting cold."
She tossed a grin back over her shoulder then yelped as her toes hit the floor. "Holy, blessed, mating-tree of the ancestral Enkindlers, this floor is freezing." She ran to the bathroom, hopping over their armour and baggage. The bathroom floor, while no warmer, at least boasted a thick, fluffy bath mat. Once her rimy toes burrowed down into the rug's shag, she doubted she'd convince them to leave it. Of course, walking back to the bed with a rug dragging between her legs hardly painted a sexy picture. In fact it would look far too much like the way she ran to get to the toilet, stripped down to her undies after being away on a mission for eight hours, then dragging a towel back to mop up the inevitable oopsies.

Ahhh … the classy life of an undead Spectre. Maybe Miranda could give her a bladder-size upgrade.

She dug under the folded towels, extracting her case of syringes with care not to make a lot of suspicious non-peeing noises. In fact, since she was hopping around, thighs squeezed together, she really needed to reassess her priorities. She wriggled out of her shorts and plunked down on the toilet, the syringe case balanced on her knees.

The door opened, and she jumped, sending the case crashing to the metal floor. Syringes scattered everywhere as Nihlus stepped across the threshold.

"Nihlus!" She snatched her shorts from her calves and yanked them up as far as she could get them. "I'm peeing!"

He shrugged and crouched to pick up the metal container, placing the painkillers back inside as he gathered them up. "I've seen you wearing a lot less."

She gave him a shove toward the door. "That's not the point." Although, what was the point when she'd squatted beside Marines over holes she'd helped dig and fill in? Grumbling, she glared at him, but didn't press the issue. Maybe her embarrassment leaned closer to his seeing her stash than seeing her tinkle.

Once Nihlus gathered up all the injections, he crouched at her knees and removed one from the case. Hands resting on her thighs, he stared into her eyes. "Which pain are these treating?"

Shepard opened her mouth and took a breath, preparing to give him the standard explanation about the pain her wounds inflicted every second of every day. Instead, Nihlus shook his head and pressed a talon pad over her lips.

"Listen, I'm the last person to tell someone they can't treat their pain any way they need to, and you're as sharp as ever on the field." He stroked the outside of her thigh with the back of his talon. "Anyone further away than Garrus and I wouldn't even know anything was going on."

She leaned forward, all embarrassment forgotten as she pressed her brow against Nihlus's. "No lecture about the evils of opiate addiction?"

Tilting his head up, he nuzzled her cheek. "Never, but it might be a good idea if we go to Karin and explain the amount of pain you're in. Maybe she can give you a stronger dose of something non-narcotic." He dropped the morphine back into the case. "We could do that now."

Shepard cradled his face between her hands, her stare locked onto his. "I need to stay functional, caris. I can't afford to break down or sit by and wait for the wounds to heal." She caressed his cheekbones, the hide rough and so warm. "I love you."

He kissed her, a chaste brush of mouth plates against her lips. "And I love you, always … no matter what." Another kiss, that one fanning some air onto the fire, before he continued, "I need you to remember and believe that, and don't hide this from me."

Eyes closing, he leaned his brow against hers, the deep … settled … feeling of his spirit taking root in her chest, her heart aching even while the pain and need eased. "In fact, will you do something for me?"

Shepard choked on the storm cloud of tears and snot looming on the horizon. "Anything. Always." The words came out thick, stumbling over her tongue, but a soft flicker of his mandibles told her that he understood.

"I don't think hiding and taking them is healthy for you mentally. It's too close to drug addict behavior. Let me keep them to make you accountable and aware of how often you use them. When you need a shot, let me give it to you. Okay?" His hand cradled the back of her neck, thumb caressing her hairline. "I won't refuse, unless it actually endangers you, and even then, we'll go see Chakwas or Mordin for another solution."

He sighed and leaned in to touch his nose to hers. "There's no judgement at all. I just don't want to start our lives together with this wall between us." He deepened the embrace, whispering against her lips, "And I really don't want you to feel like you're returning to that scared, desperate kid, living to take her next hit."

A soft, grateful sob broke from Shepard's lips as she threw her arms around him. Dear, sweet baby Jesus, what had she ever done to earn the love of two such remarkable torins? She nodded, her words drowning behind the dam that held back the deluge.

"Thank you." He eased his way out of her grip. "Finish up in here, and we'll head down to talk to the docs." Another kiss, a bright grin blossoming in its wake. "Now we're definitely as bonded. We've kissed with one of us sitting on the toilet."

Bright laughter teased a warm blush across her nose. "All right, smart guy, go get dressed. I'll be out in a second."

He stood. "Don't shower without me. We'll see the docs, have some breakfast out under the sun, and then I'll wash your back." A loving hand stroked the angle of her jaw. "I still intend to get some serious quality time with you even if we're not on our honeymoon."

Shepard grasped his hand between both of hers and drew it to her lips to kiss his knuckles. "I love the sound of that." Releasing him, she waved her hands, shooing him toward the door. "Now, scram and let me get off the damn toilet before my legs go to sleep."

Once the door closed behind him, she finished up, pausing to wipe away the blood left behind by the wound on her right thigh. Damn wounds. Someone needed to invent something to heal them and fast.

An hour later, she and Nihlus sat out on the balcony of the house, a variety of fruits, meats, cheeses, fresh bread, butter, and homemade preserves in both chiralities laid out. Shepard stared at the spread, a broad grin greeting the variety of things the colonists and the Sanctuary Project produced.

"I think I need to live here," she said, holding up a scone to inhale the gorgeous, toasty scent. "This is heaven. I just want to sit here for the next hundred and twenty years and eat." She sliced it open and spread an egregious amount of butter across the steaming surface. Doing her best impersonation of a forty-five kilo cat on a sunny porch, she let out a throaty purr as she closed her eyes to take the first bite. Heaven. Sweet, buttery heaven.

"Oh, my Lord." She groaned around the mouthful, giving Nihlus a crumb-coated smile. "I've changed my mind, caris. I'm marrying this scone."

"I refuse to share my derra with a pastry," her verro said from the doorway behind her.

She shrugged without turning to look at Garrus, feigning nonchalance despite how hard and fast her heart leaped at the sound of his voice. "I guess that means I'm totally cheating on you right now." She took another bite. "Mmm, sweet, succulent infidelity."

Garrus leaned down and nuzzled Shepard's ear, his breath tickling her skin into goose pimples as he replied, "My only solace lies in the knowledge that the scone won't survive the morning."

She turned and pressed a buttery kiss to his mandible. "It will be lucky to survive the next ten minutes, especially if I put some of that apple butter on it."

"This joke is going somewhere disturbing." Garrus stepped around to sit on her right hand side. "Eat all day, if you must," he said, stretching up to survey the dextro dishes, "but I've set something up for supper. A shuttle will pick us up at the landing at 1800." He began picking through the dishes, a slow cascade of happy, pleasure noises building until he sat back and stared at his heaped plate as if admiring a fine work of art ... or a display case of latest mods for his rifles. Probably the latter.

"You're not going to be hungry for your own supper surprise," Shepard teased. Scone forgotten on her plate, she reached out to caress his cheek and down the length of his neck. "Is that where you disappeared to before the sun rose?"

Garrus shrugged but leaned into her touch. "I took the kids for a run out: a team-building exercise." He dug into his breakfast, glancing up at Shepard then Nihlus. "What did you two do? Sleep in?"

Shepard chuckled and shook her head. "Not as long as Nihlus would have liked. Instead, we headed over to the base and talked to Karin and Mordin about my pain levels." When Garrus stopped and set down his utensil, she followed suit to focus on him. He deserved that. "Nihlus assured me that you knew as well as he did that I was taking extra meds to keep the pain under control."

Garrus nodded and put his hand on the table, palm up in offering. When she laced her fingers through his, he let out a long breath. "From the beginning, yes." He squeezed her hand. "But, you've had real reason, and you're handling it."

Staring into her husband's eyes, Shepard found herself completely speechless. Every single thought died halfway through, washed away by gratitude and love. A love longer and wider and deeper than she ever imagined existed, the absolute trust in his gaze blowing her away.

"Karin adjusted her meds and gave us a better quality medication to use if the pain becomes overwhelming," Nihlus continued. Bless him for buying her time. He placed a container on the table and slid it over next to Shepard's plate. "Jane and I made a deal that when she needs a shot, she'll come to me, and I'll give it to her."

"No secrets," Shepard said, finally squeezing sound through the atom-wide fissure. "Accountability." She picked up the container and held it out to Garrus. "I'd like you to have one as well, but you don't need to if you're uncomfortable with it."

The expression on her husband's face as he plucked the case from her hand said everything she ever needed to know about the two of them. Still his mandibles fluttered, and he nodded. "It's my privilege." He placed the case next to his plate then caressed her face. "I'm glad you're letting us into this. I know you worry about being a burden or stress, but it's better to know exactly what's going on."

Shepard lifted up to kiss him. "Thank you, Callor. You're the very best husband in the entire galaxy."

"I know." He grinned and pushed her back into her chair, her butt thumping onto the cushion. "Now, sit down and let's finish vacuuming up this amazing breakfast. Big day ahead."

(A-N: And it's still alive. I wish there was a way to have a mailing list to let people know when I get sidetracked or sidelined. I'm sincerely hoping to get this baby back to once a week, at least. We're so close. :D Thanks for sticking with me. I truly appreciate it.)
Shepard lifted a hand to block the sun's assault on her eyes, the brilliant orb sinking close enough to the horizon to blind her. Then her verro stepped in to shade her, and his promised supper-time surprise revealed itself in the form of a small pavilion made from layers of gauzy, champagne-coloured drapes. "What's this?"

Derra - Wife. Female bond-mate.

Verro - Husband, male bond-mate.

Obluvis - plural Obluvi. One who is senile or absent-minded. Slang: Idiot

Fratrin - Brother, but one of honour, friendship, or of oath rather than one of blood relation. Refers to the bond of karifratrus.

Patrem - Father (Familiar form Pari equivalent to dad)

Matrula - Mother (Familiar form Mari equivalent to mom)

Pahir - (plural: Pahirin) Male progeny.

Mahir - (plural: Mahirin) Female progeny.

Cohamentum - Dance of the elements. Performed during turian bonding ceremonies.

89 Days ASR 1800 hrs (Horizon)

Shepard lifted a hand to block the sun's assault on her eyes, the brilliant orb sinking close enough to the horizon to blind her. Then her verro stepped in to shade her, and his promised supper-time surprise revealed itself in the form of a small pavilion made from layers of gauzy, champagne-coloured drapes.

Her heart trembled in her chest, stealing all the air from her lungs and all the strength from her limbs as she looked into Garrus's eyes. "What's this?" she asked, blushing a little at the breeze whistling through her voice.

"Come inside with me, and you'll find out." Garrus glanced over at Nihlus, something passing between them that Shepard caught just the tail of. When her Callor held out his hand, she took it and followed him through the drapes.

What awaited her on the other side stole her breath. A dark rose-coloured chaise stood along the tent wall on her right, and directly before her a mirrored dressing table reflected her slack-jawed, idiotic gaping.
"Holy, glowing Enkindler buttocks, Callor." She turned to look up at him, heart beating hard but steady. "What is all this?"

Instead of answering, he stepped aside, revealing a dressing dummy draped in a long, sheer, blue goddess gown, a chain made of glittering shells belted around the waist. Beneath it, a deep sapphire one piece swimsuit hugged the mannequin, generous cutouts showing the sides and most of the belly. The perfect gown for a beach wedding.

Garrus grinned, mandibles flicking in response to her sheer delight. "It's a little daring for a wedding dress, but I think Nihlus will approve." Using their clasped hands, he drew her into his embrace. "I definitely approve."

"Lucille will have a heart attack," Shepard said, bright laughter bubbling out: sunshine through leaves. "But I definitely approve." Slipping a hand behind his neck, she pulled him down until their brows kissed. "Thank you. For doing this for me, but more … for doing it for Nihlus. He's been keeping a stiff upper lip, but I know he was really disappointed he didn't get to spring his surprise on Illium."

Garrus nodded, just a slight shift of his head against hers. "He asked me to clean everything up, but when I saw how much love he'd put into it …" Rumbling low in his throat, he shrugged, the motion felt rather than seen. "You're his whole heart, Kahri. If I had even a single cell of doubt, seeing that beach killed it off. He loves you as much as I do, and we all deserve to have that love in our lives."

"You're the very best verro and fratrin ever." She grinned, her life opening up before her, the walls fading into translucence. "For a few more minutes anyway, then you'll have to share the title of verro."

"I look forward to it." Rough, perfect mouth plates nuzzled her lips; the scents of cloves and open forests soaking down into her gut, relaxing every muscle. Garrus groaned against her lips. "I'm going to go get Nihlus settled, sic Thane and Sol on him, and then I'll be back."

Shepard didn't let him escape; instead, she tipped her head to kiss him, long and slow, lips caressing and tongue teasing. In that moment, his heart shining so brilliantly that it inspired and blinded her with awe, she wanted to kiss him forever, to sink into the warm waves of love and safety washing over her.

After more than a minute, Garrus grumbled and pulled away. "If we keep this up, it'll be dark before we even get started celebrating," he whispered, his breath lingering, warm and sweet, between them. "I'll be back."

Shepard held onto his hand until distance pulled him from her grip, and he disappeared on the other side of the curtains. Letting out a soft groan, she turned a circle. She took long breaths, struggling to catch up with that latest, sudden twist of fate. Everything … every day … raced by so fast that it kept her breathless and spinning, either floundering through quicksand or sweeping away on the slightest breeze. That morning—Nihlus's intervention—told her just how unstable—how thin and brittle—her anchor chain had become.

No more. She cracked her neck, then her shoulders—that one hurt like a motherhumper—and closed in on the wedding dress with all the caution and due diligence of approaching a wild animal. Fear prickled along her spine as if it might flee or fight back: she knew the impulse.

The powder blue silk trickled like cool water over her fingertips, and she cursed Garrus for his fantastic taste in fabrics. If she didn't control herself, she'd end up standing there fondling the dress until he came back. Letting out a truly pathetic sigh, even by her standards, she turned away and began to strip out of her uniform, starting with her boots. As she exposed her skin to the heat, it prickled as though she'd contracted heat rash.

Damn, who knew the 'paradisiacal temperature' of Horizon resembled that of the first level of hell? Not one of the scary layers where you had to take razor-wire-yarn crochet lessons from Hitler all day. Nope, the really top of the top layers; the ones for people who stole the pocket change off their dad's dresser, put the new toilet paper roll next to the dispenser, and skimmed icing off other people's birthday cakes.

She slipped into the swim suit, ready to race to the nearest source of water even though it was probably a water bottle—maybe even a chilled one—and shove herself down the neck. She'd lost weight since she died, she could make it. Taking a moment to examine herself in the mirror, she winced at the scars showing through the generous windows in the shimmering, deep blue fabric.

"You look beautiful," a soft voice said from the entry.

Shepard looked past her reflection to watch her mother walk up behind her. Bunny lurked just inside the curtain. Forcing a smile, Shepard shook her head. "I wouldn't say beautiful, but thank you." For a split second, she almost called Lucille, Mama, but the glower on her sister's face warned her off. The hatred in that expression promised violence at the drop of a hat.

Shepard blamed herself. She needed to spend more time with Bunny, build a relationship. Maybe once the kid graduated Archangel, she could come along on missions; they could bond in the trenches.

"Or she'll shoot you in the back of the head because you say or do something she doesn't like.

"Come on in," Shepard said, meeting Bunny's stare in the mirror. "Take a seat. It's a party, not a formal inspection." The truth of their situation probably ran closer to benign neglect on her part. Shepard couldn't look at Bunny without being hammered by all the love and pain and worry she'd felt over more than a decade. She adored her baby sister, had sacrificed her body and spirit to save her, and to see nothing but hatred coming back at her sliced far deeper than the batarian whips.

A wave of dizziness slammed into her, sending her stumbling into the dresser. Catching herself against the blessedly solid surface, she leaned into it. She pulled deep breaths in through pursed lips, trying to beat back the tsunami ... trying to beat back the truth. She pressed her eyes closed, letting the dresser support her weight. Bunny screwed up her internal equilibrium, the girl's presence bringing back the nightmare of those twenty-seven hours, right down to the taste of blood and broken teeth.

Stop it. This isn't about Bunny, and it's not about you. It's about giving Nihlus the day he deserves.

Pushing herself back onto her feet, Shepard met her kid sister's stare and forced a smile onto her face. It felt more like a grimace, but when she spoke, she felt good about the lightness jammed into her tone. "Party? Celebration? Good times."

Bunny cursed under her breath and slammed her arms down over her chest. "Yeah, another celebration brought to you by the brainwashed cult of half-dead Shepard. Whoopee."

Shepard felt rather than saw the glare Lucille shot at her younger daughter. Deciding it best to leave the girl to her attitude, Shepard turned back to the dressing dummy. "I have no idea how to wear this." A soft, self-conscious laugh tumbled through her lips, all corners. In the time it took to utter a couple of sentences, all her bliss evaporated into smoke. Removing the belt wrapped around the dress's waist, Shepard set it aside.

"We'll figure it out." Lucille reached around her to slip the dress off the mannequin. "There's not much to it, so it shouldn't take too much engineering skill. The trick will be making sure you don't look like you're getting married in some hippy, nudist ceremony." She waved for Shepard to turn around before the captain managed to put any thought into the not-so-subtle dig. Lucy waved once more, that one steeped in brusque efficiency. "Come on, now. Back facing me, and let's get this production underway."

Shepard chuckled, that one feeling like the heaving hiccups that preceded throwing up. Tears pricked in the corners of her eyes. She'd hoped and struggled so long to find Bunny, and then she'd been gifted with Lucille as well. And now … now she just wanted them to leave and allow her to enjoy her day. And, of course, wanting them gone festered, forming a cancerous tumour of self-hatred. The malignant growth sunk roots deep into her heart, consuming the organ a little at a time.

Garrus ducked into the tent, plowing straight over Bunny. "Oops, sorry about that, kid," he said, grabbing her shoulders to keep her on her feet. He closed the couple of metres to stand in front of Shepard and reached up, his palms warm and comforting as he cradled her face between them. Sweet baby Jesus, they felt like heating elements against the chill freezing her from the inside out.

Without loosening his stare's hold on Shepard, the general cleared his throat. "Ladies, would you mind if I claimed the honor of helping my wife dress for her bonding ceremony?" His mandibles tightened against his mouth a little when Bunny scoffed, but otherwise he remained unreadable and fixed on Shepard.

"Of course, General," Lucy said. "Perhaps since you purchased it, you're more qualified to figure out how to cover an entire woman with a few scarves."

Instant, intense fury blazed through Shepard's chest, searing away all her previous guilt. Shepard jerked, trying to pry her way from her verro's grip, but his hands didn't budge. Still, Shepard struggled to get loose, her anger burning hotter by the second. How dare Lucy? If her mother and sister needed to turn their venom loose on her, fine. Turning it on Garrus … no damned way, not after everything he'd done to free them.

"Thank you," he replied, his tone even but veined with the slightest hint of frost. "I appreciate it."

As soon as the curtain closed behind them, Garrus drew her into his arms and pressed her tight against his chest. "I'm sorry, Kahri, I didn't think they'd be such jerks." He shook his head. "I thought you three might be able to make a family memory or … something."

Shaking her head, she buried her face in the curve of his neck, breathing in the strength of his spirit, molten gold pouring through her. "I'm sorry she talked to you like that; you deserve so much better."

His talon pads traced the line of her spine, slow and gentle, up and down. "So do you. You deserve every good thing this universe has to offer." He chuckled, subvocals as deep and solid as granite. "We'll just ignore the fact that the galaxy keeps throwing crap at us." Nuzzling her bare shoulder, he rumbled deep in his throat, the sound reverberating through her. "You have family now, Kahri. You have a family that loves you without any conditions or reservations, and we're here for the long haul."

Burrowing in tighter, Shepard kissed tender hide at his neck. "I couldn't ask for a better one." After a couple of seconds, she pulled away. "Come on, let's get me into this absolutely gorgeous dress and scandalize my mother."
A soft chuff drew Shepard's attention to the entrance, the set of turian toes just poking through telling her who waited outside. "Mari? Come in, please."

Garrus drew back the curtain to reveal his mother, the tarin holding a garment bag across her lap. He grinned. "I suspected you knew why he called everyone to Illium," he said, taking the bag when she held it out.

"I'd like my mahir to wear our bonding robe at both her ceremonies," Trea said, smiling up at Shepard. She passed Garrus a small case, then beckoned to Shepard. "Allow me to do the honors?"

"Of course." Shepard crossed the short distance and pulled up her shirt to take a knee next to Trea's feet. As it had at her ceremony with Garrus, his family's acceptance amazed and humbled her.

Trea took a sprig of rylamia from the little case then settled it into Shepard's hair, the comb-like leaves holding it in place. The tarin smiled, her eyes glistening with emotion as she reached out for Shepard's hand. "Beautiful." Trea pulled her in, touching brows. "My pahirs are the luckiest of torini."

Shepard shrugged. "I don't know, I'm feeling pretty lucky right now." She stood and leaned over to kiss her mother-in-law's brow. "Thank you, for everything."

Shepard followed Garrus from the tent, pausing just outside to take in the scene that Garrus had hidden behind the shuttle when they came in. Another small pavilion stood closer to the lake, a match to her own. Nihlus's dressing room, no doubt. Then, on the beach stood another, much larger tent, all the curtains drawn back to reveal tables and a dance floor.

A gasp launched her words as she said, "Holy frigging Enkindlers, big guy, this is amazing." She slipped her hand through his elbow, hugging his arm tight. "You must have shanghaied everyone to put this together this morning."

He shrugged and nodded toward the shore. "I may have grabbed a few people here and there."

Shepard balanced on tiptoes to kiss his mandible, then allowed him to lead her to the large tent. She dragged her bare feet through the grass and some ground-hugging greenery that reminded her of clover. Blessed Enkindlers, her toes hadn't experienced such pure bliss since the sand on Illium. After a second, she looked up at her husband. "Thank you for doing all this, Callor. I mean ... for me, sure, but mostly for Nihlus. He's longed for family his entire life."

Garrus nodded toward the shore where two large rocks stood at the membrane between sand and grass. Anderson stood in front of them, family, friends, and crew ranged in a loose semi-circle a few metres back. "They all wanted to help. Mari was in heaven acting as foreperson, bossing everyone around."

"Yeah." Shepard shook her head, glancing over where Trea sat. "She's amazing."

The shade under the pavilion covered Shepard's face and shoulders with cool, blissful kisses. Once out of the sun, she took in the finer details of the space. Flowers ... dear, sweet, baby Jesus, the flowers. Her fingertip traced the pink veins of a satiny lily petal. Lilies of all shades filled the air with perfume, brilliantly coloured heads nodding in the breeze of eight or so large fans set around the perimeter. Centerpieces made from candles of different heights sat unlit on each table, their flames awaiting the sun's surrender to the deepening twilight.

Garrus guided her to the left, stopping before they left the shade for the long shadows and slanted sunlight beyond the tent. Shepard leaned into her husband's arm, the reality of the day hitting home. For as long as they remained able, those two torini would hold her safely between them, fighting at her side for the shared hope of peace.

"All right, everyone," Sol shouted, drawing all eyes to Nihlus's dressing room. "Make way for my fratrini, the best dressed senux obluvis in the galaxy."

Nihlus walked around the large pavilion, his hide more red than chocolate as it reflected twilight's lilacs, reds, and oranges. Heart stopped, Shepard watched him, struck breathless by his beauty as he stepped up to the large stones. After an impossibly long second, he turned to face her, his mandibles fluttering a little as their gazes met.

He grinned, and despite the heat his appreciative smile sparked in her gut, she knew he was going there. Oh yeah, smart-ass ready for take off, course set for cocky jerk, full speed ahead. The Spectre cleared his throat, the sound tugging at the corners of her mouth. "If anyone sees her making a run for it, tackle her. I'm not crawling through sewers or caves today."

"Nah, there aren't any windows for her to climb out, this time," Martin said, his grin even wider and more shit-eating than Nihlus's.

"All right, all right," she called, elbowing Garrus as he chuckled. "You two are endlessly hilarious. Congratulations. Now stop it." She grinned at Nihlus and gave him a broad, teasing wink. Sweeping a flourish with the arm not clutching Garrus, she posed. "I mean, come on, I'm standing here, looking incredibly gorgeous, so shush, and just admire the view."

Speaking of admiring the view, Nihlus looked glorious in his favourite suit, the deep red glinting between the black embroidery as it caught the sun. Trea's paint job on his markings gleamed brilliant white against his chocolate hide. Still, as beautiful as he looked, nothing stirred her heart like the sight of the joy in his eyes. Oh, merciful, sweet, baby Jesus, that happiness grabbed her heart and threw it, playing handball against her ribs.

She turned to look at the sunset, inhaling the long ribbons of colour down into her gut. Letting them curl through her, she slowed her heart rate, the burden of all that joy lifting enough for her to breathe.

Anderson cleared his throat, a gentle roll of sound and a question. Was she ready? She tugged a little on the front panel of the bonding robe, a tiny bit disappointed that it covered enough of her body to make Lucille happy.

And then Shepard took the first step across the open expanse of grass. Life had gifted her with an abundance of love, of course she was ready. As terrified as she was of hurting either of her verros, she knew that the three of them belonged together. Somehow, they’d see the war through and settle down, get two cats and three ponies and make ridiculous amounts of money selling fake scandals to the tabloids.

*Shepard Spawns! Delivers four alien babies, all four jailed on drunk driving charges within hours of birth, see page 3."

Then Garrus placed her hand in Nihlus's and stepped behind her, taking every single thought in her head with him. Nihlus's eyes gleamed, that breathtaking green making her swooned as it had the first day in the Normandy's cargo hold. Her Spectre gripped her hand in bare talons, his thumb caressing along the line of her knuckles.

Bunny spoke the truth when she accused Shepard of being blessed with an embarrassment of riches. She smiled up into those remarkable eyes, amazed and awed by the love that stared back at Anderson spoke, and they both answered his question, but after she agreed, she couldn't have told anyone what she agreed to. She felt fairly sure it had something to do with the pair of them taking one another as bondmates. Still, everything outside the two of them—no, the three of them: she felt Garrus's presence behind her as keenly as her own breath—faded into a bright haze, fog illuminated ... transmuted into magic by the sun.

"Jane?" Anderson's voice broke shattered her perfect bubble again. The soft lapping of waves against the shore filled the emptiness as the world waited for her to do or say something.

Tearing her stare from Nihlus's, she looked at the Captain, blinking back the dry burning in her eyes. How long had it been since she blinked? "Sorry, what?" Turning toward the chorus of laughter, she leveled an exaggerated scowl on their family and friends. "Oh, shush. How's a girl supposed to listen when she has someone so gorgeous standing right in front of her?"

Anderson cleared his throat: a jovial, smothered cough. When she met his gaze, those deep brown eyes smiled at her, filled with love and joy and ... and ... what was that? Pride. Yeah, she saw pride and acceptance of the woman she was. No wishing she could act another way or fit into any sort of mold. Anderson loved her for better or worse.

"Jane?" Dammit, he'd spoken again. This time he took mercy on her and followed up with, "Your vows?"

"Oh, yeah, of course." She focused back on Nihlus. "Vows." She shrugged. "They're not going to be poetry because no one gave me time to prepare, but I'll do my best." Taking his other hand as well, she squeezed his talons, his hide alive and electric against hers.

Nihlus smiled, but all the teasing had faded from his expression, replaced by wonder. For a moment it looked as if he intended to say something, but then he let out a long breath and relaxed into her hands.

Shepard mirrored the breath, then let the words flow, praying they didn't head off in some terrifyingly horrific direction. "I promise you everything we saw in those moments on Thessia. The closeness, the comfort, the family, and yes, my impossible mind and obsessiveness and insecurity. You know this package is far from perfect." Releasing one of his hands, she reached up to caress his cheek. "I promise honesty even when it hurts, and then to be there to comfort that hurt. I promise to drive you completely insane and mostly understand when you want to ring my neck. But, I sorta also love you to death and promise to remind you of that every chance I get."

She stroked his cheek and the length of his mandible once more, then reached behind her for Garrus's hand. When his talons wrapped around her fingers, she continued, "You've been here to catch me when I fall, to hold me up when I couldn't stand, so I will build this family at your side and help keep it strong for all of us: the family that is and the family that will be."

Another long breath whispered between open lips, her mouth beginning to feel like a well-trodden desert path. "Basically, I promise to be your cikabeknai for as long as we live." She squeezed Garrus's hand then released him to caress Nihlus's mandible.

Nihlus leaned down, reacting only by narrowing his eyes when the humans protested, no doubt thinking he was going in for the kiss. Which, of course he was, just not a human kiss. He pressed his brow against hers. "I promise the sort of love we have witnessed through the bond between Tashac and Merol. Not an imitation. Not a repetition, but something as deep and beautiful and lasting. Something unique to us."
Shepard closed her eyes, sinking into the blissful beauty of his words. Spirits, who could have guessed that this torin and the one she met her first day on the Normandy shared anything? The arrogance and cockiness that had filled her with the urge to slap him silly had matured into real soul and a beautiful humility. And so, she just breathed in that beauty as her new husband spoke.

"I promise to support you through every trouble and hardship, fight at your side through every challenge, lift you above every obstacle. I promise to help you raise our children in love and support … to make our family a refuge from the troubles of the galaxy." He shrugged, she felt it through the roll of his brow against hers, then said, "The rest we'll figure out as we go."

"With the exchange of their oaths and promises," Anderson said, his tone betraying a battle against emotion, "and with the support of their family and friends, I declare this marriage sound. Nihlus … Jane … you may now share your first kiss as husband and wife, verro and derra."

Shepard tipped her head into the kiss, the entire world disappearing outside the sensation of Nihlus's mouth against hers, his tongue teasing her bottom lip. From behind her, Garrus's happiness warmed her back like the sun, which had disappeared behind the mountains.

Dear, sweet baby Jesus, I'm not saying I believe in you like I used to in my childhood, but if you do exist … please. Please watch over them and keep them safe. And … and please keep me from screwing it up. Please.

She returned Nihlus's kiss with all the passion she'd been terrified of before she died. Heart pounding hard and slow, she savoured the moment and the sensations. Nerves fluttered and tingled in her belly as the passion flared between them; the downside to Nihlus insisting on waiting for their wedding night to make love.

Anderson cleared his throat. "Break it up, you two," he grumbled, his smile shining through the words, "or I'll have Alenko throw water on you."

Shepard pulled away and grinned up at Nihlus. "Wouldn't be the first time." She caressed her husband's cheek, then turned loving mirth toward Anderson. "So, are we done here, Captain? I need to dance with my verros. Tomorrow we're likely to spend the day dodging bullets."

"With the power invested in me by the Systems Alliance, I hereby declare your marriage valid." He waved to the small audience. "Everyone, I am extremely proud to introduce to you, Nihlus and Jane Shepard-Vakarian-Kryik."

Gripping Nihlus's hand tightly in hers, Shepard turned to face their friends and family, every face there glowing with love and joy. Well, most faces. Instead of giving the sourpusses recognition, she focused on Nihlus as they strode from the beach to the large pavilion.

She eyeballed the long tables covered in food, but remained on course for the dance floor. Enough breakfast remained with her to hold her over for a few dances. Spinning on her toes, she turned into Nihlus's arms. His parents never taught him the cohamentum, and he'd made it abundantly clear that he wanted their wedding to follow human traditions.

He bowed, the hand not holding hers sweeping out in a wide flourish. "Beautiful derra, will you honour me with this first dance?"

Shepard curtsied the best she could, affecting a southern belle accent as she replied, "Why, handsome verro, it would be my pleasure." She rested her hand on his waist as the music began to play, some soft, sweet quarian love song. After a moment, she abandoned the proper dance frame and pressed in tight, resting her head against his chest.
"Is this real?" she whispered despite being able to hear his heart pounding behind his keel, despite being able to feel his heat along her body and against her cheek.

A low, rumbling echoed in his chest. If contentment could be a sound, it would be that sound. "It had better be. If it's a dream, I've been asleep for months, and I'm going to be heartbroken when I wake up. These past few months have been the happiest of my life."

"Oh, Nihlus." She pulled back enough to stare into his eyes. "It's got to be real, right?" She glanced over to where Garrus danced with his matrula. "We're all dreaming it. That makes it real." She tugged him down into a kiss, then whispered against his mouth, "This makes it real."

Around them, the candles lit at few at a time, the people lighting them hidden by the glare. That light … that golden light pushed back the deep twilight, highlighting the dark purple-blue with spheres of golden brilliance. After a couple of seconds, sweet hints of smoke and beeswax drifted on the breeze.

Heaven. Nihlus had planned it all, and then Garrus and the crew had done their best to build his version of heaven. The perfect day, indeed.

For those moments, dancing with Nihlus, Shepard allowed herself to sink into the deep well of history and silliness and beauty that dwelled between them. Just as surreal and crazy as the rest of her life, their relationship could never have happened any other way. And despite the pain swimming through those waters, she wouldn't change any of it. Well, maybe dying. She nuzzled into the curve of his neck. No not even dying.

Nihlus held her tight, long arms wrapping around her. "I love you, Mrs. Shepard-Vakarian-Kryik." He lead her around the dance floor, the rest of the party giving them the center of the space, even as they joined in. "I've loved you my entire life."

Shepard didn't reply, taking a deep breath and submerging into the still, deep waters. She knew what he meant, the truth of it deeper than their experience on Thessia, deeper than the beacon connection. They'd been drawn to one another years before either event.

The song ended, but she held Nihlus tight, unwilling to step away and feel that absence. Why hadn't they met half a decade earlier while they still had time for their love to mature before war snatched it away?

"Are you okay?" Soft enough that it didn't break the peaceful bubble around them, Nihlus's whisper brushed her ear. His hold on her tightened.

Unable to trust her voice, Shepard nodded. Would she ever experience happiness without terror following hot on its heels? And she was all right. Fear of losing everything good in her life still fell under the 'good' heading, particularly since coming back from the dead.

_Tonight on Necromancy Bulletin; throwing the perfect zombile wedding. So, despite your zombile dysfunction, you've found the perfect mate; we can help you choose flower and candle center pieces to cover that undead odour. Also, don't give up on finding the perfect dress for your colouring just because you've begun to decay a little here and there._

She drew back and smiled up at him. "I'm fine, love." She glanced toward the edge of the dance floor where Garrus helped his mari back into her chair. She met Nihlus's stare once more, letting how blessed she felt glow through her smile. "It's the perfect day, cikabeknai. The perfect day."

(A-N: So, I've decided to do Nano this year and work on my original fantasy series, Taming Dragons. That means even more of a slow down on my fanfic for the month. Please bear with me. ALSO: I reorganized my page to reflect my original fic as well as changing the patronage levels/rewards. People are by no means to feel pressured, I've simply been asked about it, so thought I would throw it out there for people. Anyway, thanks as always for your support. The fact you're still with me and these crazy kids means everything. I love yah!)

Patreon Page: https://www.patreon.com/mizdirected
Nihlus pulled out a chair next to the remains of the dextro buffet table, turning it around to sit while Garrus and Shepard wandered down to the shore to say goodnight. Picking at a platter of amazingly spicy drellak strips, he watched them; their easy affection a solid raft beneath his feet. They kept him balanced and afloat even when the seas boiled under him.

Despite everything he'd said to the contrary, before Shepard returned to them, he couldn't have imagined her loving him enough to marry him. He couldn't have imagined anyone loving him that much. And now his family stood at the water line, their arms wrapped around one another, and his jaws and mandibular muscles ached from smiling so wide for so long.

As if they felt him watching, they both turned to look at him, Shepard blowing him a kiss before focusing on Garrus. They kissed, long and passionate, then embraced, foreheads pressed together. Seeing their goodnight coming to an end, Nihlus stood, wandering over to lean against one of the pavilion's posts.

"Goodnight, Nihlus," Garrus called as they approached, arms slung around one another. When they reached the large tent, the general disentangled himself from Shepard to embrace Nihlus by the shoulders. "Congratulations, fratrin."

Heart aching with happiness, Nihlus returned the embrace, brushing his brow against Garrus's. "Thank you for making this happen. It was a beautiful day."

"You're very welcome."

"Not too early," Nihlus replied, following up with a merry chuff. If any day deserved a lay-in, it tomorrow was that day. He watched after Garrus until his fratrin stepped into the shuttle, then turned to focus on his derra. "Alone at last."
Shepard nodded as she wiped the sheen of sweat from her brow. "We are, indeed." She turned a circle, looking for something to dry her sweaty hand on, the appendage flop-waving helplessly at her side. "This planet is stupidly hot," she grumbled, then lunged forward, uttering a small victory cry as she snatched a napkin off the cluttered table. "I adore your romantic side, my love, and Garrus's for finding us another gorgeous beach, but dayum, we should have gotten married at the north pole." After dabbing her face and neck, down to the valley between her breasts, she used the napkin as an ineffectual fan. "Sweet baby Jesus and all his Enkindler friends."

Still leaning against the corner pole of the tent, relaxed and completely content, Nihlus watched her fuss, a soft smile fluttering across his mandibles. He could scent her nervousness: her worry about hurting either Garrus or him ... about sex being awkward with him after being with Garrus ... after his insistence on waiting. Oddly, of all the things he'd worried about over the cycles since they first met, he didn't harbour the slightest doubt that they'd be fine together in an intimate way. No, better than fine. The electricity he'd felt through the kiss they shared overlooking Nos Astra ... he'd never felt anything like that connection.

She always likened him to a forest fire burning out of control. When the woman was right, she was right. He kept the flames in check, waiting for the right time and place to turn them loose. He believed he'd chosen well, and now that fire would burn away his old life and set him free.

Shepard wiped her face and neck on the napkin. "Why the hell did they take the fans away?" she said, still fussing. "I mean, who's going to steal fans on a deserted beach in the middle of nowhere?" She dropped the napkin on the table and flipped a hand at the dishes. "Should these be left here like this? Won't bears or cougars or come out of the woodwork to eat us?"

Instead of telling her that the fans had merely been relocated to their tent and that someone would remove the food, Nihlus pushed off the pole and walked toward her, his steps leisurely, teasing her a little with his calm. "Have you sufficiently vented your ire at the universe?" He grinned when she spun, her withering glare sizzling across his plates.

"Maybe." She picked up a clean dessert plate, using it as a fan. "Do you have a means of turning down the heat coming off this sand?"

"I do, in fact." Holding out his hands, he invited her to meet him halfway, but she shook her head. "No offence, cikabeknai, but you run hotter than the sun at the best of times." Narrowing her eyes, she stared at him, her gaze filled with mischief and love.

"Did you just say that I'm hot?" When she met his teasing with a wink, he chuckled and extended his hands a little further. "I think you're legally obligated to trust me in these situations now that we've sworn our vows."

She appeared to mull it over, then nodded and stepped forward, slipping her hands into his. "Of course. Always."

"I never want there to be the slightest doubt in your mind, Nihlus Shepard." A teasing smile framed the love in her eyes at the surname she'd assigned him. "I trust you completely and without reservation."

After a second, the smile burst into a grin. "And of course, I'm saying you're hot. By every last one of the Enkindlers' glowing backsides, husband, I've had the hots for that smokin' bod for a decade." She pressed in close. "And now it's all mine."

Nihlus guided her hands to his waist, then skated his palms up her arms and over the curves of her back to her hips, savouring the softness of the diaphanous blue silk. "As beautiful as you are in this, I think you'll find it cooler without." He slid his hands down as far down her thighs as he could reach, catching her skirt on the way back up. Leaning next to her ear, he pressed his mandible to her cheek, a breathy whisper brushing her neck. "I've been fantasizing about doing this all day."

"Oh, have you?" Nimble fingers made quick work of the fasteners up the front panel of his tunic. "That's quite the coincidence." Tipping a heavy-lidded glance up to catch his eyes with a sultry wink, she slipped her hands beneath his tunic and light dress shirt to press against his stomach, her touch not timid but definitely careful. "Because I've been fantasizing about doing this all day too."

Hesitating with most of the sheer silk gathered at her waist, front and back dipping just enough to satisfy modesty, he nuzzled her earlobe, catching it gently between his mouth plates. "Mrs. Vakarian-Kryik, will you make love to me?"

Instead of answering, she pulled back a little, her hands covering his, coaxing them up her sides. She lifted her arms over her head to ease his removal of the very beautiful dress. She took it from his hands to drape it over the back of a chair. He watched her, rapt, as she wriggled out of the bathing suit. Once free of her clothing, she stepped back in against him, her body bare but for what amounted to a small scrap of powder-blue lace clinging to her hips.

He admired the sleek curves of her body, seeing beyond the wounds and bones sticking out in places they shouldn't, seeing the work of art ... the woman. When he helped her with bathing or applying her medications, he focused on the wounds and worried over how thin she'd become. That distinction kept him from violating her trust, no matter how much he wanted to touch her in a more intimate way.

"You still with me?" she whispered, her hand brushing his cheek, unexpected and refreshing, "because you were right. This is a lot cooler." Shepard backed away, her arms held out to catch the breeze.

"Tease." Nihlus shrugged out of his tunic and unlaced the dress shirt, leaving it and his leggings in place. When he bent to undo his boots and slip them off, Shepard beat him to it. Kneeling in the grass, she took hold of the clasps, then paused, looking up into his eyes. Her soft, devoted smile slipped through his plates to take root in his chest. His heart thundered against his keel: his bondmate. Dear spirits, how could so much beauty have swept into his life on the same wind as so much horror?

"Cikabeknai?" she whispered, gaze still searching his, her fingers still poised on the clasps of his boots. "You okay?"

He caressed her cheek, his talons brushing her hair behind her ear. "Never better. I was just admiring the gift I received today."

A shy smile lit her from within as she shook her head. Looking down, she fidgeted as if the compliment didn't sit well. "Sweet talker." Deft hands beginning to tremble, she slipped his boots off and set them aside. Finished with their task, her fingers wandered up his legs, carefully avoiding his spur—thank the spirits—as she snapped open the straps around his knees. When she reached his waist, she pressed her palms against his belly. Despite her complaints about the heat, her touch felt cool.

Dear spirits, so cool, each point of contact electric, his hide singing with her energy, her unique frequency. A not altogether unpleasant, but certainly too early, pressure because to pulse behind his plates.
He cupped her face for a moment, the embers in his belly growing into flames. "Help me with my leggings?" he asked, giving his mandibles a suggestive flick. Her cheeks and across her nose blazed pink even as she smiled.

"I can. After all, you promised me a way to get cool, and all you've done is get me all heated up."

She finished with the last fasteners and laid the top of his leggings open. Easing them over his hips, she slid them down. Wandering fingers traced the lines of his plates and muscles, lingering wherever he moaned, gasped, and writhed. Spirits, those cool fingertips on his hide fanned the flames until his pulse roared in his head.

"Lift your foot," she said, her voice barely audible through the storm of desire raging through him. Then a flat palm stroking the inside of his ankle, coaxing him to allow her to slide his legging over his feet. When he didn't obey immediately, she pressed her thumb into the arch of his foot. Gasping, he stumbled, nearly stepping on her as the world tilted, a heady rush of pleasure surging up his body to drown his brain in endorphins. "Dear spirits."

Shepard chuckled when he steadied himself with a hand on top of her head. "You turians and your erogenous feet." She slipped the leggings off the one foot and then the other. "It's a good thing the reapers don't know about that species-wide weakness."

"You going to tell them?" he teased, reaching down to lift her onto her feet. Not that he couldn't have stood to have her stay there, playing him like a stabata in a virtuoso's hands.

Shepard caressed his neck as she wrapped her arms around him, pulling him down until her lips brushed his mouth. "No," she whispered, low and throaty, "I think I'm going to keep that little secret to myself and abuse it as often as possible." She kissed him. "Pick me up and let's get on that cooling down, yeah?"

Nihlus's hands glided over her shoulder blades, thumbs tracing the sharp edge of the bone. Her skin glistened with a light sheen of sweat as he followed the long sweeps of muscles down her back. Cupping her backside, he lifted her into his arms. A ragged breath stuttered between them as she wrapped her legs around him, her sex so warm against his plates.

Tipping her head back a little, Shepard grinned at him, full of teasing mischief. "You sure you'll be okay in the water?" She squeezed his waist just enough to send a blast of need rocketing along his nervous system. "Yeah, see … you just don't seem all that steady on your feet."

"Not steady on my feet, am I?" Growling through his second larynx, Nihlus boosted her up and strode for the water, plunging into the cool shallows in five, long strides. The lake embraced them, soft sand beneath his feet, the water soothing. "I'll show you steady on my feet, derra," he said, offering the spirits a hearty plea for coordination.

"You okay?" Shepard teased, bracing as if to leap to the rescue. Her grin turned to bright laughter as he snatched her close, nipping the curve of her neck. "What? I'm just—"

He nipped her again, harder that time, earning a lusty moan for his efforts. She wrapped her arms around his neck, her breasts teasing the right side of his chest as she lifted into him. He stumbled a tiny bit, taken aback, his plates loosening at the sensation of her hardened nipples along the ridge of his plates. Judging by the sound she made as she dragged them back up the groove, Shepard felt it as well. Without lifting his head from her neck, he walked further in until the low waves lapped around their waists.

"Oh dear, sweet baby Jesus," Shepard moaned. She leaned back, Nihlus switching his grip to her waist as she laid out, floating spread-eagle, their hips the only point of contact. "This feels glorious."

Nihlus supported her, happy to be her anchor as he feasted on the beauty of her. He'd never seen her with all the guards pulled down off her walls, ballistas disarmed, gates thrown open. Spirits, she glowed brighter than the stars, soft and silver against the dark water.

She smiled up at him, her arms swirling just below the surface. "Penny for your thoughts, cikabknai?"

He stroked the curve of her waist. "Still just admiring my gift." He fluttered his mandibles. "And thinking I know why goddesses are most often associated with moons and stars." Leaning forward, he caressed her stomach, slow lazy circles, kneading her flesh. "And maybe thinking how honoured I am by your trust."

Shepard tightened her legs around him and held up a hand. "Pick me up, husband." She clung to his hand when he took hers, his other slipping around behind her back to lift her into his embrace. Water cascaded off her, washing down his front, warmed by her skin. He smoothed her hair away from her face, admiring the copper glints caught by the light of the torches on shore. He traced them with a talon. Perhaps, he could preserve the moment forever if only he could manage to capture one.

"I love you," Shepard whispered, brushing soft, cool fingertips along his mandible. Her touch coaxed him to lean into her caresses, her fingers weaving a spell of perfect contentment as she traced the patches of plate on their way to his fringe. Soft but firm, her thumbpad rolled circles into the sensitive flesh where his fringe and back of his neck met.

Her ministrations pulled a low, soft rumble of arousal and contentment through his second larynx. Allowing the water to cradle them, he melted into her touch, one hand spread across her narrow spine, the other underneath her.

"Do you realize that you purr when you're all happy and turned on?" she said, pulling back a little. "I'm sufficiently cool; pick me up, husband." She smiled, the expression suddenly so shy that his heart ached to see it. That smile spoke of too many years behind walls, a prisoner suffering a self-imposed exile inside her skin. The sheer amount of trust it took for her to show him so much of herself … spirits, he prayed he lived up to it.

Nihlus pressed her in tight against the left side of his chest. Eyes closed, he followed the warm, intoxicating beacon of her scent to her neck. Nuzzling under her jaw, his tongue drew a line from the hollow between her collarbones up her jugular groove and along the underside of her jaw. The taste of her … spirits, she tasted of an intoxicating brew of sweat, rylamia, and the iron tang of lake water. He paused when he felt the keen beat of her pulse against his mouth. Breathing slow and relaxed, he nuzzled into it, suddenly needing to feel it, needing that connection.

It seemed such a fragile thing. It fluttered, quickening as he raked his teeth over the skin. But the pulse lied, for he knew within her chest, pounding against his plates, beat the strongest heart ever born into mortal form. And it belonged to him and Garrus.

"Come on," Shepard whispered, between kisses. "I know they had to set up somewhere comfy for us. I doubt they expected us to just throw down on the grass." She shrugged, a soft giggle rolling from her lips, tickling his aural canal. "Well, at least not to make love."

Nihlus chuckled and turned to kiss her. "We're not sparring tonight. I have a bad habit of saying stupid things when we're sparring." Despite the time and healing between them, his heart took a couple of sick, squeamish beats at the thought of that day.
"Ancient history, cikabeknai." She kissed him, her lips soft as they tugged at the rigid plates of his mouth. As if to emphasize how far behind them his unkindness lay, her tongue darted out to flick just the tip of his. "It's all ancient history. Be here, with me right now."

She tried to wriggle down, but he held onto her, carrying her from the cool waters up onto the warm sand and grass, the planet clinging to the heat of the day as tightly as he clung to Shepard.

"Don't worry," he whispered, brushing his cheek against hers, savouring the cool moonlight of her skin, "I've got you. I always will."

Ducking a little, he used a shoulder to sweep aside the gauzy curtains around his pavilion. Inside, fans circulated the air, the entire place a sea of clouds enchanted by a zephyr. He set Shepard down on the rug beside the roomy bed, but kept her held in the circle of his arms.

"Looks like Mari's been busy," Shepard said, nodding toward a deep pot of oil warming over an element. Sighing, she leaned into Nihlus, allowing him to support her weight. "Shall we take advantage?"

He nodded toward the two garments hanging on the one wall. "Their bonding robes." Shaking his head, he tried to articulate how honoured and loved he felt wearing that long, black robe and all its history. His story embroidered in gold thread next to Garrus's … it meant a real family, one that loved him without question.

Gentle fingers pressed against his chin. "You found the family you always wanted." Releasing him, she turned from his arms and walked over to run the cream silk of the other robe through her fingers. "It's a beautiful thing, the way you became their brother and son the moment you and Garrus swore that oath."

He watched her unfasten the coillasi from the robe, the thick chains light in her fingers. Crossing to the warm pot of oil, she beckoned to him. "Come, let's sit and do this part right."

Nihlus heard rather than saw her lower the chains into the oil, as he focused on unclipping the finer chains from his robe. Much as he had when Herros brought the robe in to his changing tent, Nihlus let the chains trickle through his talons. He'd never expected to take a bond-mate. Especially after Saren. The example of his parents killed all his desires to take a bond mate, and then Saren gave them a proper burial.

Then, after Saren's betrayal, this impossible, infuriating human decided to take care of him the only way she knew how—by torturing him—and suddenly he understood what it meant to be nurtured, if oddly. Everything changed that day on the Normandy. Everything.

"Hey, gorgeous." Shepard's hand rested in the small of his back. "You okay?" She stepped into him, her body so gloriously soft as she pressed against the back of his arm, her hair cool and damp where she laid her head against his arm. "You doing okay? We're getting to some really good bits here. Are you getting cold feet, cikabeknai?"

Nihlus unclipped the chains and turned into her embrace. "No, haksaya kubenar, no cold feet. I was just taking a moment to realize where I am—where we are—and soak it in. Who would have thought?"

Shepard took his hands and backed toward the bed, tugging him along behind her. "I think we put a lot of 'will they/won't they' bookmakers out of business today, and I am soooo okay with that." A soft, devoted smile shone up at him as she released him then held her hand out toward the pot of oil. "You ready to make this official in all the ways that seal the contract just between us?"
Nihlus dropped the chains into the pot, then climbed up on the bed, sitting cross legged. Once he settled, he reached out, talons inviting his mate to join him. He’d never been one for tradition, his parents had ensured that, but right then, he felt the magic of those chains and the oil calling to him. Odd that he’d finally feel fully immersed in, and grateful for, his culture the day he married an alien.

Taking Shepard's hands, he helped her climb up onto the bed, but then stopped her before she settled into the cradle of his legs. He slipped his thumbs under the blue lace clinging to her hips, then leaned up to press his face against her stomach. He nuzzled her belly button, then smiled up at her, asking permission to remove the last barrier between them.

Shepard nodded, her hands resting on his fringe, caressing the length between them. He closed his eyes as her fingers worked their magic, her touch more loving than sexy, but it was a touch he could dive into forever and never need to surface.

Nihlus kissed her stomach, taking a deep breath in through his mouth, saturating his pheromone receptors with the essence of her: lake water, the slight brine of her sweat, and the indescribable scent of her arousal. Spirits, she smelled like nothing he'd experienced before, but he understood why Garrus said hers was the scent of home. It cut through every bit of confusion and anger and resentment in his head, a window through the fog, guiding him home.

He slid her panties down a centimeter at a time, dragging careful talons along the outsides of her thighs. She gasped, her hips pushing closer when he dug in a little. Her fingers played his crest and the rim of his cowl, encouraging him as each touch sent waves of hot, aching need rolling down his spine. His mouth followed a meandering path down her belly, her toned muscles jumping beneath her skin as he nuzzled and tickled her with the point of his tongue.

"Sensitive, are we?" he teased, rolling his tongue around her belly button. Blessed Enkindlers, being able to turn her on formed the most powerful aphrodisiac in the galaxy.

Instead of answering, Shepard arched backwards and pressed his face against her skin. "Don't stop now," she said, her voice breathy, "I'm just getting warmed up." She gripped the rim of his cowl. "Oh dear lord, cikabeknai, that tongue …. You have a hell of a gift."

Nihlus doubled his ministrations until he reached the fine patch of red-blonde hair between her legs. Forgotten as the soft curl of hair tickled his hide, her panties fell down around her ankles. Brushing his cheek against the new sensation, he rumbled deep in his chest and pulled her in tighter. Mouth plates and tongue explored carefully at first, working around the edges until she squirmed so hard he could barely hang onto her.

"Sweet baby Jesus, Ni, the prize is at the center," she said between gasps. She lifted her pelvis, her thighs opening, inviting him to stop playing and get down to business.

And oh, he wanted to. Her scent deepened, beckoning him in. His tongue flicked out, tasting the droplets threatening to escape down her thigh. As indescribable as her scent, her taste pulled him in, his tongue still shy, darting in and out, even as his arms snaked around her tighter and tighter.

Shepard undulated above him, her fingers making love to his face and fringe. "Nihlus. Love." She moaned, deep in her throat. "As much as I could bear you doing that all night ...."

Nuzzling into her one last time, he nodded and then pulled back. Right. They had all night to explore one another. He drew back just enough to look up at her and offer her his hands. She accepted, taking them before she kicked her panties free of her feet.
"Help me get myself twisted into this position of yours?" she asked, squeezing his talons. She didn't need all that much help as it turned out, easily settling into his lap, her calves circling his hips.

The moment they wrapped themselves around one another, forming a single unit, a switch he'd already thought flipped, clicked over. Staring into her eyes, he set her hands down between them, then reached up to cradle her face in his talons. He smiled, seeing the same light in her eyes that he felt in his heart.

"A whole new life, despite the war, despite everything," he whispered. "From now on, it's the three of us."

Shepard nodded, lifting one hand, the fingers spread, to press just under his jaw. "Everything you are and everything that flows from you, I accept as part of me. Everything that I am and everything that flows from me, I place in your care, if you accept it." As she spoke, she raked her nails down over his keel and belly to stop just above his plates.

Nihlus pressed his hand over hers. "I accept it, haksaya kubenar. It's my honor to accept it."

Easing her back until she laid stretched back, bare and vulnerable in his embrace, Nihlus traced the lines of her scars up her belly and over her breasts to her throat, where he spread his talons over the delicate skin. She swallowed, the little bump on the front of her throat bobbing with the motion, driving home just how easily turian talons could kill. Spirits, they didn't make people of any species as brave and beautiful as his bondmate.

Raking his talons over her skin, just short of enough pressure to break the skin, he repeated the oath, offering her everything he was, and gladly. In the machine on Thessia, even though she couldn't do anything to stop the abuse, she threw herself between him and his mother every time. She'd held him and soothed the pain from the old ulua's talons. Shepard had cared for him while he mourned his father. She already possessed his soul, but to hear her say she accepted him despite and because of everything he was, it gave birth to a whole new, entirely unique peace.

Shepard sat up and wrapped her arms around his neck, pulling them together until his keel pressed between her breasts and her lips brushed against his mouth. "I accept it," she said, kissing him between each word. "I love you, Nihlus Kryik, and it will be my privilege to spend the rest of my days honouring our vows."

Reaching over, she withdrew the first of his coillas from the oil, and held out her hand. When he held his arm up between them, she wrapped the chain around it, then watched the oil trickle down, mesmerized.

"Your hide," she whispered, "looks like it's on fire with the candles reflecting on the oil." She massaged the trails of oil into his hide. "My coillas looks wonderful there." She grinned and traced a single fingertip along the sensitive edge of his forearm plate.

Nihlus nodded, agreeing but unable to squeeze sound past the lump in his throat. Everything slowed—his thoughts, his heartbeat—as he focused on her, on the way her muscles moved under her skin, the ways her expression shifted, and damn it … the way her sex loosened his plates as it moved against them.

Once the second coillas sat securely around his wrist, Shepard wrapped her arms around his neck, pulling herself up to kiss him. Soft lips tugged at his mouth, while her tongue traced its lines. "You're all mine, now," she said. The kiss deepened, her tongue coaxing his into a slow, passionate dance, the two of them pulling the other in tighter and tighter. Spirits, they almost … almost managed to inhabit one another's skins.

"Your turn," she whispered against his mouth. "I need to get to the rubbing oil all over your body part of this ritual." She kissed his mouth and chin, and then dragged the point of her tongue along the edge of one mandible.

Nihlus pushed her away ever so gently. "You're going to need to stop distracting me, then." He brushed the end of her nose with his, then turned to fish the first of her chains from the oil. As he withdrew the linked shell, he closed his eyes and drew the scent of the oil in deep: rylamia, mint, and a couple of herbs that grew on the bark and rocks on Palaven. If heaven possessed a smell other than his new mate's, that oil smelled like heaven.

He allowed it to drip all the way over to Shepard's waiting arm. It took two wraps to get it snug enough not to catch or fall right off. He smoothed the oil over her skin, pausing when she hissed as he rubbed it over one of her larger wounds.

"Haksaya kubenar?" Heart pounding, he laid his palm against her cheek, guiding her gaze over to meet his. "Are you all right? Does it hurt?"

Shepard smiled and captured his hand, lifting the slick, sweetly-scented talons to her lips, kissing each one. "I'm fine. It stings a little but fades almost right away. It's okay, keep going." As if to encourage him, she smoothed the oil down her forearm, then smiled. "Mama Vakarian at work again," she said. "She put that numbing tree moss in it. I can feel it working already."

Nihlus nodded, sentiment grabbing his larynges in a choke hold again. Trea … one of the most amazing blessings Shepard brought into his life. Of course, his mari made sure the oil wouldn't hurt. If his birth mother possessed an opposite, Treana Vakarian was that opposite.

"Can't have that!" Focusing his wandering mind back on task, Nihlus took her hand, nuzzling her palm before he wrapped the coillas around her delicate wrist. "There," he said, snapping the clasp closed, "completely married." He caressed the oil into her skin, talon pads skating over her arm, following the smooth curves of her muscles. "You're so beautiful," he whispered.

Shepard pulled the side table closer and submerged her hand in the oil. "So are you." She rubbed her hands together, then began working the oil into his shoulders. "You know, I think this is my favourite thing about being married to turians." A faint pink hue blossomed across her nose as she focused on the task to avoid meeting his stare. "I love the intimacy of it." She shrugged, the blush deepening.

Nihlus leaned in to nuzzle the tip of her nose. "I understand." And he did. While Shepard no longer feared sex, the oil massage didn't come with any pressure or expectation, just shared comfort.

He soaked his hands in oil and massaged it into her back, his eyes slipping closed as his talons followed the silken contours of muscle and bone. Leaning into her, he pressed his brow to hers. Passion's flames still burned hot and insistent, but he tamped them down until they kissed her with an endless calm born of love.

"This is always enough, haksaya kubenar," he whispered against her lips. "Always."

Shepard kissed him, then leaned back. "Hold me, husband."

His hands between her shoulder blades, Nihlus did as he'd been told, supporting her as she laid back, relaxing into his care. He swallowed another bolus of emotion. His care. Damn. The weight of it hit … the sacred duty of it … but he found the burden light.

Shepard reached behind her back, tugging at his arm until she coaxed it out far enough to take hold of his wrist. Placing his hand so that his palm cupped her breast, she smiled up at him. "I love you so much for that, cikabeknai, but I'm not afraid any more, especially with you. You're my husband, half of my heart, and damn it, Ni, but I want you to touch me. I want you to make love to me."

Gently, even timidly, he squeezed her breast, her nipple a nub of velvet heaven in his palm. He brushed his thumb over it, his mandibles flicking when she moaned and arched up into his touch. Smiling, he repeated the touch, the sounds she made feeding the fire, the flames roaring behind his plates.

She arched into him, her sex slick against his plates. Holding his gaze, she rolled her hips, grinding into him. Her smile grew to a wanton grin. "Oh my, aren't those moving easily?" Arching her back, she lifted her hips right off his thighs. "You'll need to stick a pillow under me so we line up." She grinned and wriggled a little. "I want you inside me."

Stated that boldly, her need took him by surprise and his plates parted. He snatched a pillow from behind him and pushed it under her backside. Once he got it sorted and flattened, Shepard relaxed down into it.

"Oh yeah, that's the spot right there." She bounced a little, her grin teasing as she sorted herself. "Do you want a guided tour?"

Pulling his mandibles in tight, Nihlus massaged his way down her side and over her hip bone to her center. Raking his talons through the soft dusting of hair, he met and held her gaze, reflecting the desire and love he saw there. His thumb glided between the slick folds of her sex, pressing a little on the swollen nub.

She surged up in his lap, a loud mewl of pleasure tweaking his mandibles back into a grin. "Holy mother ...." When he chuckled, she reached up, half-heartedly slapping his arm. "Stop laughing, husband, and just keep doing what you're doing."

"Just demonstrating that I don't need a guide." He swirled his thumb, trilling deep in his throat when the nub responded to his touch, his wife ... his wife lifting into his touch, moaning and inarticulate with hunger.

"Oh, for the love of the Enkindlers," she managed to say between gasps, "stop teasing."

Nihlus pulled Shepard into his embrace with one hand while the other settled their bodies together. He slid out from behind his plates, and then everything turned to pure sensation. Shepard's arms wrapped around his neck, her body embracing him in fire and silk. She lifted into him, opening to him, her mouth panting against his neck, her breath and hands searing as they pulled his mind and heart into those miraculous spaces between.

Her muscles contracted around him, strong enough to make it his turn to holler and jump. Fiery bolts of lightning tore through his nervous system, simultaneously tying his muscles into agonizing knots and flooding his brain with bliss. She squeezed his length again when she leaned over to soak her hands in the oil, and his entire system shorted out, overstimulated to the point where he could only moan and try to ride out the dizziness.

"Nihlus?" Shepard's hands grasped his face. "Are you okay?" After a second, he saw realization hit. "Oh no, I did this to Garrus too." She pressed her brow to his and froze, remaining still except for her breath. "I'm sorry, love."

Nihlus raked his talons through her hair. "I'll be okay, just need a minute." He nuzzled her lips. "We've got all night."

Shepard drew a line along his center fringe spike, the oil tingling as it soaked in. "I'll leave it up to you how fast to take it." She kissed him. "But, can I say, that you feel amazing inside me. If it wouldn't blow the front of your head off, I'd be spurring you like a bronc rider." She kissed him and worked the oil into his head and neck, her fingers tranquil but passionate.
And oh, how they coaxed away the knots tied in his muscles. The scent of the oil combined with her touch eased the last of his tension. His mandibles fluttered, a susurrus of contentment rolling over his tongue, as once again he realized that he'd feel that touch every day for the rest of his life. Just as suddenly, he realized that the war might make it impossible to spend every day with her and that the rest of their lives could be any day.

"Sh," Shepard whispered, her voice as gentle as her touch. "Stop worrying, and lay those hands on me, husband. Just be here with me." She pulsed her inner muscles ever so gently, a soft sound tumbling from her lips as he finally entered her deeply enough to seat and he began to fill her. "Oh. Great. Father. Of. Light."

Nihlus pulled her in tight against his chest, his talons playing along either side of her spine. Her muscles felt like rock, solid and unyielding. That physical proof of the weight and pressure she carried wrapped his heart in thistles of fear and nettles of sadness.

"Cikabeknai," she whispered, pressing her mouth to his, "please, just be here with me."

Smelling the sweet brine of tears, Nihlus nodded and kissed her. Fear turned to passion as their tongues danced, all barriers of skin and bone disappearing until he felt nothing but her, saw nothing but her. She returned his kiss with equal fervour, lifting into him, her entire body coaxing him toward release. Hands gliding over his cowl, she teased the 'oh so sensitive' inner border between plate and hide.

Nihlus disappeared, escaping the prison of his body and mind. For those few precious moments, the pair of them became one being of light and sensation. His hands and mouth explored every centimetre of her body within his reach, delighting in the transitions between soft flesh and bone, all so deliciously covered in sleek satin-textured skin. When his palm brushed her breast, she leaned back, urging him in. Accepting most happily, he laved the nipple with his tongue, swirling around that velvet nub, teasing it with his teeth.

She showed her appreciation for his attentiveness with a symphony of sounds, the tempo and pitch growing more urgent. Her hands made love to him until his vocals rose to entangle with hers. Soaring, Nihlus and his wife clung to one another, mouths pressed together, open and panting, sharing the same air, uttering the same half-articulated oaths of love and forever.

Then, with a cry that echoed off the pavilion walls, Shepard came, her muscles clenching into a rictus of pleasure. Her body's grip on him drew a matching cry, the sound climbing up his throat and exploding through his teeth. Gradually, their rigor relaxed into slow, heavy pulses, both easing down onto the mattress to land in a happy tangle.

Coherent thought took another fifteen minutes, those moments spent trailing his talon pads over dewy skin.

Shepard leaned over him, looking down into his eyes. "That was very well worth the wait, cikabeknai." She kissed him, then wriggled into his arms, burrowing tight against his chest. "I love you, Nihlus Kryik." Kissing his mandible, she sighed, then said, "Just as much as Garrus. Always." She brushed his face with tender fingers. "It only gets better from here."

Nihlus pushed himself up until his mouth met hers. "I love you, haksaya kubenar. Always." In the silent depth of night, the flickering candles and breeze from the fans witnessed his oath, and he saw the understanding of it in his wife's gaze. Always.
These two have come so far, so it's sorta lovely to get a chance to post this chapter for them, and you, along with Eva Soulu's amazing art that Natalie Tashar commissioned for me. It's just breathtaking. Soooo beautiful, and I gaze at it often with such joy and gratitude. So, a fitting birthday present for me (Yep, born on N7 day) and N7 Day present for you faithful readers. (even if it's a little late thanks to wild family party and being a lazy loser.) Thank you so much for still being with me and these crazy kids. I love you all.
Chapter Summary

The chirps and trills of the Horizon bird call symphony greeted Shepard as the waters of sleep and rachni song parted. She stayed buried beneath the thick comforter, listening to the music echoing through the chill, damp air, the dreamscape and reality separating reluctantly. She shivered and pulled a stray leg back under the duvet, tucking it into Nihlus's heat envelope. Sweet baby Jesus, the mountain nights cooled off enough to match the daytime heat.

Verro - Husband, male bond-mate.

Derra - Wife. Female bond-mate.

Marida - Mother in law

Parida - Father-in-law

Diume - My joy. A term of love specific to family.

Caris - Beloved, precious, cherished

Itarnuptas - The six week period following turian bonding ceremonies where the two new bondmates celebrate their bonding and move in together.

Obluvis - plural Obluvi. One who is senile or absent-minded. Slang: Idiot

Tapek Menru - Literal translation: The long defeat.

Haksaya kubenar - A term of endearment, literally translates as my strong, true heart.

Cikabeknai - The reciprocal term of endearment for the above. Literally translates to brave love.

Kepala - The ridges of carapace that cover the top of a Prothean's head.

Feodusi - The Prothean government's scientific branch. Senarium - sub-branch tasked with finding and securing the five keys to dark space including the conduit.

The story to date: Nihlus and Shepard have just been married, taking a short break in the build up to war. The chiastyllia and Legion—and all the geth—have formed a symbiotic relationship, the geth imbuing the tiny organisms with will while the chia offered them a way to form a truly sentient, fully realized intelligence including emotional awareness.

Shepard and company have taken down a collector lab on Thessia and turned another on Palaven over to the government. They suspect other, species-specific husk labs exist on the remaining homeworlds, but have not yet located them.

Note: I've probably said this before, but … saying it again. Even though Bioware named Garrus's dad in Andromeda, Herros has been Herros in my head and heart for 5 years, so … yeah, I'm not changing his name.

Also, apologies to anyone with different canon for the Ryders … including Bioware. I'm basing it on my understanding of the ingame info. Information from sources other than the game and wiki might not be represented.

91 Days ASR 0330 hrs (Lake Remar, Horizon)

The sounds of life flowed through the peaceful dark of sleep, their current coloured in gentle pastels. Shepard breathed them in, aware and lucid as she stepped into the stream of the rachni queen's song without waking. She welcomed the river, allowing it to sweep her away; it had been too long since she felt Amalair's reassuring presence.

Nihlus appeared next to her, his hand already gripping hers. She looked up into his face, a broad smile and twinkling stare gazing down on her, as warm as the sun. Squeezing his talons, she closed her eyes, the barrier she kept erected around Tashac's prison melting away into the dreamscape.

"It's time," the ethereal voices of the rachni whispered through their queen. "Their sour, yellow note moans through the darkness between galaxies while their needle men and abominations weave its taint through the light."

Shepard took a long breath, unsuccessfully trying to ignore the tremble of her diaphragm. They'd known how short time ran since the beacon downloaded its contents into their brains, but oh, hadn't it been easy to pretend years remained for them to prepare?

Tashac pressed at the thin barrier between consciousness and dreaming. Through Nihlus's grip on her hand, Merol's softer presence coaxed her to relax and trust them. While nothing guaranteed victory, the more knowledge they possessed, the better their chances.

Not even Shepard's prodigious talent for denial could argue that.

89410 of Tapek Menru

Shepard opened her eyes to a familiar vista: the intense blue of the clear water sparkling under a bright, hot sun, the mountains majestic and capped with snow in the background. She shed her torso armour as she strode toward the water. The rackus sound of her mate and children raced up behind her, as bright and cheerful as the sun.

Atit sprinted past her, tiny legs pounding like pistons until he hit the water. The drag sent him into a sprawl, arms pinwheeling comically before he splashed down belly first. Giran giggled as she jogged past, already carrying herself with an officer's reserve and demeanour. The sight sent a soft keen of sorrow warbling through Shepard's chest. The reapers had stolen a great many things from the prothean people, but the loss of childhood innocence and joy cut the deepest. Her children deserved to play and laugh without the specters of despair and death haunting them more persistently than a gerhund.

In only a few days, both of her children would leave to begin basic training … at only ten summers old. In those same few days, the odds of her receiving a message informing her of their deaths would eclipse her odds of seeing them again.
The universe no longer looked upon innocence with kind eyes nor did it easily forgive its presence.

Before the reapers began the protheans' long defeat, her children would be preparing for their third primary learning cycle. Now they'd be adults and warriors even before their kepalas closed, every moment of their formal schooling focused on war. Once they left her side, all their songs would turn to dirges for the lost … for all they'd lost but never knew.

She'd be left a single recourse: hope. She could only hope they'd remember what she taught them, all the tales and morals. And to strive for the joy hidden within every moment.

Her mate's arm slipped around her waist, his naked hip pressed against her armored one. "Stop," Merol said. His smile stretched as tight and thin as his whisper. "Today we play. Tomorrow's worries won't vanish before we catch them."

Shepard wrapped her arm around him, clinging to him even as she nodded. Despite wishing to leave worry behind as often as the galaxy offered her the chance, wishing didn't transform anything into reality. His warmth soaked into her bare torso, heating her through more effectively than the sun, the distant star cold on the back of her neck.

Despite being the center of the scientific branch of the rebellion, the entire system—what her people had become—set her skin crawling. Death loomed there more acutely than even the now-dead planets circling soon-to-be-forgotten stars.

"Hear my words and join us in the present, mother of my last children." Merol chuckled as he reached up to caress her face. Gently, he turned her to look at their children, the pair splashing one another with abandon. "We will enjoy these last, precious days with our Giran and Atit. We must, as these memories need to last forever."

She smiled despite the hand that gripped her heart—squeezing until the organ cried out—and nodded. "You're right, haksaya kubenar, as always." Nudging him away from her side, she released him. "I will follow directly in your footprints."

Before she unclasped the girdle of her armour, her comm implant chirped in her head. Letting loose a long sigh, she lifted a hand to her jaw. "Jacar. Proceed."

"Kanetah Jacar, the Senarium assembly just pronounced their ruling on the Inusannon blueprints."

Shepard tensed. Her team believed the blueprints discovered in an inusannon ruin belonged to a weapon of terrible power. The feodusi had taken possession of the plans less than a full day earlier. The haste of their deliberations informed her of their decision before she asked. As she suspected when her team turned over the design, the council members responsible for weapon development would declare that it be built with all haste and then deployed regardless of the consequences. Now, she could hold onto only one hope of restraint on the part of the prothean government: lack of resources. The long defeat dragged on, the transportation networks so crippled that they'd struggle to find the resources to build something so massive.

She swallowed a curse more profane than she felt comfortable allowing her children to hear. "Report. What is the feodusi's decision?"

The line remained silent but for the sounds of the aide's computer interface. "The feodusi decided to divert all planet-based and robot mining equipment from harvesting hydrogen and helium 3 in this system to mining and refining platinum and iridium on the terrestrial planets. They say fuel for non-existent ships is of lesser import than the materials required to build the inusannon transmitter."
Shepard stiffened. "Transmitter? It's not a weapon?" With the design's energy requirements, her team speculated it formed some sort of beam weapon, but a transmitter? She opened her mouth to ask another question, but then glanced toward the lake and her family playing in the waves. "Send me their entire package. I want to go over their arguments and reasoning myself."

Merol turned to face her, his expression slowly melting into a frown to match hers. It lasted the space of a single breath before he shook his head and waved her over. Right. She nodded once before looking down at her onboard armor computer, acknowledging the received file.

"Thank you for keeping me up to date, Binav. Jacar, out." When her aide signed off, Shepard stared at the computer interface for a moment. The file beckoned to her, insisting she dig in, searching for routes to fight the construction of a possible doomsday weapon before they had time to research it.

Then a cheery chorus from the lake chased off the desire, and dragged her from her armour and into the cool embrace of the water.

Time shifted around her in the manner of dreams and memories, the day of laughter passing in the flow of a few breaths. That evening, the children tucked into their beds after a difficult bedtime, she and Merol sat curled up together on the short couch and went through the information on the transmitter/weapon schematic. The data found with the plans clearly said that the inusannon had not commenced construction, the plans missing components that appeared hypothetical, the planners guessing at the power and computing needs.

"The assembly will build it before they understand it," Merol said, his voice soft but rough with concern. "I need to burrow into these plans and find something to slow their charge. Our knowledge remains so limited that we may build the very tool the reapers need to cleanse those of us who remain."

She nodded. "The feodusi will build it, and we won't be there to counsel them toward wisdom and restraint. We will be half a galaxy away chasing the remaining keys."

Closing the file with a thought, she then opened another, the one she should have spent her evening unraveling. It compared data between several solar systems going through the throes of an early death. The technology keeping the last two keys hidden consumed an enormous amount of energy from the very suns they hid within, sending the stars spiralling into an early death. When their children left for training, she and Merol would set out for the most promising out of several systems. The reapers couldn't be accused of making anything too simple.

"The reapers placed shield facilities in far more systems than they needed," she said, glancing up at her mate. A smile greeted his intense scowl, his eyes narrowed as he processed the transmitter data. She reached up, tracing his jaw with gentle fingertips, sending a soft, mental interruption through his train of thought, "Cikabeknai?"

Merol shook his head, tearing his thoughts from the stream of information pouring through the tactile interface, the data changing at the speed of thought as he adjusted and made computations. Her touch whispered through the meld between mate and machine, her thoughts slowly easing him from his genius. She smiled as his eyes focused on her a little at a time. A gasan of complete genius, he threw himself into the deepest part of a problem, submerging into its depths until nothing else existed.

It took him a moment before he nodded. He'd heard her despite his immersion. "Yes, I am certain we record ten false positives for every key. We owe the discovery of the last key purely to chance." He wrapped a hand around her wrist, his consciousness pressed to hers as he examined the data on her OAC. "Here," his words appeared in her head, calling her attention to three systems at opposite corners of the galaxy from each other. She smiled. She suspected those same systems. They all displayed slight deviations from the energy profiles of the others. If they'd discovered a weakness—a trend—in the reaper's methods, it might make the last keys easier to find, but it also struck another method of hiding the keys from her team's idea list.

The reapers only needed to hide the keys from a few generations of whomever lived in that future galaxy. The senarium needed to hide the keys from the reapers for fifty-thousand years or more. Doing so required either craft or inspiration of a miraculous sort.

She pointed to the star system with the highest reaper presence. "We'll recon this system first." Once they discovered a key, they left it in place. If they removed the keys, the reapers would know and come after them. They fought a long defeat in truth: no hope of snatching victory from reaper jaws. All they could do was prepare for the reapers' return to dark space and hope enough protheans remained to carry their knowledge and experience forward to the young races.

Merol sighed, the sound leaving his lips with enough weight that she felt the world shift beneath them. "Methods of keeping the keys from the enemy's grasp are becoming scarce."

"And we dare not allow ourselves to imagine the possibilities," she agreed, wrapping her fingers around his hand. "They are still many long months from their victory." And if either of them faced capture or indoctrination, whatever plans they set would become the enemy's weapon.

All they could do was wait until the reapers finished the harvest.

A handful of the monsters remain to clean up the last traces of their devastation when she formulates her plan to hide the keys as they are recovered. Unlike the reapers, she intends to use completely different methods to hide each key, forcing them to adapt. While the Vanguard and its prothean husks can access a wealth of scientific knowledge, they possess no creativity or imagination. What the husks are at the time of their conversion only diminishes with the reaper influence, becoming drones to perform the reapers' work.

Luckily for the young races, she and Merol were not drones. She drew in a deep breath, releasing it slowly. One key at a time.

91 Days ASR 0445 hrs (Lake Remar, Horizon)

One key at a time. First, be sure you can either use them or destroy them.

Use them?

Patience, brave ones. Patience.

The chirps and trills of the Horizon bird call symphony greeted Shepard as the waters of sleep and rachni song parted. She stayed buried beneath the thick comforter, listening to the music echoing through the chill, damp air, the dreamscape and reality separating reluctantly. She shivered and pulled a stray leg back under the duvet, tucking it into Nihlus's heat envelope. Sweet baby Jesus, the mountain nights cooled off enough to match the daytime heat.

Curling in against her new verro, eyes closed, she savoured the sensations of his rough hide caressing her skin and his breath on her neck. She willed the moment to wash away the bleak chill of saying goodbye to their—no, Tashac and Merol's—children. Surely, she could allow the beauty of their first morning as bondmates to last another hour or so.

Yes. Despite her eagerness to discuss the rachni queen's help with finding the remaining keys, and even though it would amount to a miracle, she hoped Nihlus got a chance to wake on his own. She lifted the duvet just enough to see his face, his mandible relaxed against the pillow. Sweet baby Jesus, she loved him. She'd fallen completely years before, seeing him pull that single child out of that flaming slaver den. Oblivious as always, she'd dismissed it as a hopeless crush.

She took a deep breath and relaxed down into the mattress. She'd never imagined being married to him. Even if she had, she'd never have been able to imagine his presence being a place of such peace and safety. The precious peace lasted three seconds before her comms squawked at her. Damn. So that's what woke her up. Enkindler cursed thing. She slapped at her ear.

"What, dammit?"

Groaning, she pushed aside the duvet covering her head. "Damn it, Anderson." She grumbled and half sat up, eyes still pressed closed. "There's no way it's morning, so any crankiness you hear is due to the ungodly hours you keep, not coitus interruptus." After another breath, she cracked one eye, taking in the purple, pre-dawn light. "Oh, damn, it is almost morning. Fuck you, morning."

Anderson's chuckle ended abruptly. "It is." Another noisy sigh guillotined the small talk. "I'm sorry for the early wake up, but I received intel from Hackett that I knew you'd want to move on." He paused, his gravitas kickstarting her pulse. "Earth security services reported what the admiral thinks are multiple husk sightings. Eyewitnesses described them as, and I'm quoting the report here: 'weird, twentieth century television, protomolecule zombie shit.' Sounds like husks to me." He paused before continuing. "I've forwarded the details. If the reports are accurate, they might lead you to the collector base on Earth." He cleared his throat, a rumble she knew and understood all too well: We'll talk about this later.

"Yeah, that's husks for sure. Okay, so when and where?" Shepard rolled onto her back and stroked her hand down the outside of Nihlus's thigh. "Wake up, old guy, the galaxy needs us again."

Anderson cleared his throat. "I'll expect you aboard the Normandy at 1200. We'll give you a lift to Earth." The captain chuckled as Nihlus let out a roar of complaint. "Think you can manage that deadline?"

Shepard shook her head when Nihlus rolled over and gathered her in against him, trapping her in heavy, sluggish arms. "We'll see what we can do. Shepard, over and out."

Nihlus nuzzled her ear and pulled her in tighter along his length. "This war can't end soon enough," he whispered, his voice thick and rough with sleep. "Rachni conference calls while we sleep, husk wake up calls ...." He shook his head and burrowed further under the covers.

Shepard tugged the duvet under her chin, sealing out the cool, damp air. "I hear you." Letting out a long breath, she nestled into his heat. "Anderson says the husks were sighted on Earth. If it's true, they might lead us to the collector lab."

"No." The Spectre groaned and shook his head. "It's too early to think about shooting our way through another collector base. Let's go back to sleep for a couple of hours, then make love, eat a leisurely breakfast, and then worry about collector bases and husks."

Before Shepard could form an answer, she heard a familiar tread on the other side of the pavilion's curtains. "Too late," she whispered, turning to nuzzle Nihlus's mandible, "the dawn patrol has arrived." She waited for those footsteps to stop at the entrance, but they passed by. After a moment, she heard the telltale hiss of a campstove and the genial clatter of breakfast preparations.

"Good morning, Callor," she called through a wide yawn.

"Good morning, Kahri." Yep, Garrus sounded far too perky for so early in the day. "It's a gorgeous morning out here."

"Go away!" Nihlus stretched until his joints popped, then curled around her again. "Maybe the general will serve us breakfast in bed," he said, loud enough to be heard outside their cocoon.

"Wake up, Nihlus," Garrus called back, his cheer teasing a smile onto Shepard's face, "you're dreaming."

"They're still in bed?" Sol's voice dripped disdain. "Seriously, you people are the laziest unit I've ever witnessed. I'd send you all back to the academy. A couple hours of PT at 0330 should do it."

"Wars are meant to be fought on quarter rations and one hour of sleep per day?" Herros asked, also far too chipper for the hour. He rumbled, his subvocals low and strong enough they raised the hair on Shepard's arms, and when he continued, all the humour had bled from his tone. "Soon enough, diume. Soon enough."

Shepard yawned and dug her way out of the covers to sit up against the arm of the wide settee, duvet clutched to her chest. "I can't even say 'they're your family' any more," she said between two yawns wide enough to send a painful crack echoing from her jaw to the crown of her head.

Leaning over, she kissed Nihlus's brow. "Wake up, caris. The war waits for no one, apparently."

He wriggled deeper under the duvet. "Fucking inconsiderate reaper bastards."

The human cuss words yanked a sharp laugh from Shepard's throat. "Right?" She pressed absent lips to his brow again, plans already spinning like spider silk drifting in the air. "We need to figure out a way to assemble the Crucible without either faction getting ahold of it. It's important."

"Yeah, I just wish we knew what it did. Transmitter of unknown function isn't any more comforting than unknown WMD." Nihlus sighed, the breath erecting an invisible wall between them. Shepard matched it. They didn't have the luxury of living without that professional barrier between them ninety-five percent of the time. She just prayed that once the war ended, they could tear it down and burn the rubble.

"We'll have a lot of protheans to help put it together, even if they're warriors rather than scientists," her verro said, continuing. "That will keep them busy until war breaks out."

"We can't do everything ourselves, so we've got to get Giran access to Tashac and Merol's memories." Shepard tugged the covers up under her chin, the chill creeping underneath and into her bones. "If only we hadn't had to blow the senarium base on Ilos into radioactive dust." She trailed her fingertips along the edge of his chest plates. "Maybe there's another beacon somewhere."

"We need to ask Giran to assign a couple of prothean officers to the war council, too," Garrus called in from outside. "Hopefully, the more we involve them, the less we have to worry about a coup. Also, breakfast is nearly ready." Pans rattled against metal burners. "We have drellak steak, krellar eggs, crispy bacon, a chicken egg sandwich with a revolting side of catsoup that smells like death and is probably made from actual cats, and a pretty amazing sunrise out here."

Shepard grinned at Garrus's extended diatribe against her ketchup—a very effective reminder that her husband's senses registered things differently than her own—and glanced around for her robe. It didn't offer much protection from the chill air, but waiting wouldn't improve her situation. Counting them off, she braced herself for three seconds then threw back the duvet and leapt to her feet.

"Hey," Nihlus grumbled, tugging the blankets back over his exposed side. "Didn't all of Garrus's complaining on Noveria teach you how much turians hate the cold?"

Shepard spotted underwear and a pair of sweats sitting on the top of a crate. Offering fervent thanks to whoever possessed such glorious foresight, she slipped them on. She picked up the light shirt and leggings sitting out for Nihlus, and returned to the bed.

"Here you go, old guy," she teased, tucking the clothing under the covers to warm. "I know how hard cold mornings are on old bones." Or on her bones, for that matter. She laughed at his answering grumble. "You've got five minutes to get dressed before I come back to roust you, caris."

An arm reached out from under the white, lumpy mass, and a large hand snatched at her, gentle talons wrapping around her waist. She yelped as he yanked her backwards onto the settee and held her trapped against him.

"Spend the five minutes in here with me, instead." Nihlus emerged from beneath the duvet and pulled her onto his lap. "We can spend five more minutes of proper itarnuptas before we surrender to the war."

Shepard sorted herself and wrapped her arms around his neck. "I suppose I can steal another five minutes from the galaxy." Relaxing into his arms, she rested her head in the curve of his neck. "I feel like we're standing at the edge of a cliff, and when we leave here, we're stepping off into chaos."

Nihlus nuzzled her ear, his breath comforting as it brushed her neck. "We'll get through it." His embrace tightened. "We'll hang onto each other and refuse to let go, no matter what."

Turning her face into the high desert scent of his neck, Shepard kissed him and whispered, "I'm so thankful for you, Nihlus. You make me feel like maybe Cerberus did bring all of me back."

He nodded, but just held her, letting the musical peace of morning envelope them. The soft conversation, laughter, and the savoury scents of breakfast shored up that invisible wall rather than piercing it, allowing them to hang onto their illusions for those precious moments.

A soft knock shattered the cocoon, then the curtain rustled, Garrus's head peeking through. "Sorry to break this up, but the food is getting cold, and we have a conference call in a couple of hours. Legion, Mordin, and Liara all have news." He met and held Shepard's gaze, his mandibles flicking once, that distinct, flutter-snap that broadcast his joy and love louder than words.

Shepard blew him a kiss without moving from Nihlus's embrace. "We'll be right out."

"Nothing says 'congratulations on your bonding' like a couple of hours of conference call." Nihlus lifted her free of the bed, setting her on her feet. His palm stroked the length of her spine. "Do you need your shot?"

Shepard started at that. It hadn't occurred to her. She did a quick inventory, but the pain remained within easy tolerance. "Not yet. I'll let you know if it gets bad." She paused at the curtain, and turned back. "Thanks for checking, though."
Shepard ducked under the tent flap into the watery twilight. "Yep, way too frickin' early." She grinned, catching Trea's gaze. "You turians are going to be the death of me." She strode to the end of the table and bent over her marida's chair to touch brows. Sweet Jesus, Trea looked good. Figuring that the tarin had probably suffered her fill of people telling her how good she looked, Shepard choked back the words. despite their truth.

"Nihlus!" Herros called. "Hurry along, I've got something important to talk to you three about."

"Yeah, coming." The Spectre's tone expressed Shepard's feelings on their being dragged back to the war with an eloquence that spared her having to be the party pooper. Of course, they just poked him harder when he appeared, eyes half-closed, his armour hanging off on one side. Obviously, turians didn't have any truisms about poking bears.

Shepard sat opposite Trea, her verros to either side. When Garrus set her plate in front of her, she attacked her sandwich and bacon with a fervour usually ascribed to the starving. "Oh, dear, blessed Enkindlers, this is tasty." She moaned to emphasize her point followed by a massive bite. "Pure heaven," she said, the words sounding more like 'oohur hehbu' outside her head.

The family teased and talked of easy things, the war blessedly staying outside their pocket of morning while they ate. Shepard sat between her verros, allowing herself to simply feel blessed and happy. For all her 'humour', she couldn't have remembered a single moment where she felt truly happy from the moment her parents died until she met her torins. Even then, fear overtook those moments far too easily before her death.

Note to self: Send the Illusive Man a 'thank you for dragging me back from the dead as a mismatched pile of agonized, Frankensteinian monster parts, you megalomaniacal bastard' card.

Herros pushed his plate away, metal scraping against metal, and let out a long sigh. "Excellent breakfast, Garrus." He looked to each of them and nodded, as if he hadn't been sure about reporting his news until that very second.

An attentive silence fell, those still eating setting down their utensils to focus on Heros. "When your mother began her treatments on Omega, I received a call from an old acquaintance." He reached across the corner of the table for his mate's hand, closing his talons around hers. "His name's Alec Ryder. He was a military liason on the Citadel early in humanity's tenure there."

"Big man with a booming voice and crushing handshake?" When Herros nodded, Garrus echoed it, his eyes narrowing. He ate the last bite of his steak, chewing for a moment before continuing. "I remember meeting him. He had twins just a little younger than Sol. The three of them used to torment me."

"That's him. He was an N7 at the time, but his insistence on developing artificial intelligence earned him a dishonorable discharge and council censure." Herros settled deeper into his chair. "Anyway, when your mari started her treatments, he heard of the breakthroughs being made on treating corpalis. He hoped the research might have applications for his wife's illness."

"Ellen pioneered biotic implants for humans," Trea spoke up. "She was the major driving force behind the L2 implant, then the L3 once the complications with the L2 became apparent." She shook her head, her mandibles dropping a little. "All that exposure to eezo gave her AEND, a degenerative neural disorder just as merciless as corpalis."

Shepard frowned, her heart going out to the family. For all civilization and medicine progressed, so much remained unknown. Not to mention the illnesses created by their new technologies. Ellen Ryder hadn't been the first, nor would she be the last poisoned by eezo exposure.
"Alec pushed his development of his SAM AI, hoping to marry it with Ellen's implant technology to create a treatment for her illness, if not a cure." Herros's tone told Shepard that Ryder hadn't succeeded in time to save his wife. "Unfortunately, her illness outpaced their research and she lapsed into a coma earlier this cycle. Alec placed her in stasis, which halted the degeneration, and continues to search for a cure." He looked down, a talon scraping at a bit of breakfast on the table. "His children … everyone … believes she died. He didn't want to put them through her loss twice if he wasn't able to effect a cure."

Silence fell over the table for a long thirty seconds before the Vakarian patriarch cleared his throat. "He's been messaging me over the past month or so but instead of asking about Trea's treatment, he's been asking for information on the reapers, collectors, and the geth. He's playing his cards close to the vest, but I think I've got him convinced that your claims and evidence are real." He lifted Trea's hand to his mouth, nuzzling her knuckles. "Yesterday, he asked me to come to Earth. Apparently, he's working on a huge project and wants me to come check it out."

Shepard looked to Nihlus then Garrus. "Anderson woke me up to tell me that husks have been sighted on Earth, so why don't we take the Normandy and Ypres to the Sol system?" she suggested. "You can accompany your pari to see what Ryder wants while Nihlus and I check out the husk sightings."

Inspiration sparked, sharp and a little vindictive. "You guys can take Anderson along just in case Ryder needs convincing. Anderson's word goes a long way even with ex-Alliance, and he just loves a good handshaking op."

"Sounds good," Garrus agreed, "but if you end up fighting your way through another collector base, call for backup." He wrapped his arm around her shoulders and pressed his brow against her temple. "The more the merrier when it comes to those places."

"Merrier?" Nihlus chuffed. "Says the obluvis who wasn't on Thessia." He grinned, his mandibles twitching in a cocky challenge. "How about you go take out a couple thousand husks while I go shake hands and drink good brandy?"

"Aw, poor senus," Sol said and cooed. She stood and circled the table, gathering up the dishes. "It's probably more fun if you're not two thousand cycles old and obluvis enough to take banshee talons to the gut." She followed her matter-of-fact statement by tossing a cheeky grin over her shoulder. "I guess I'll have to go along and make sure your poor, rickety old body comes through in one piece."

Content, Shepard settled into the curve of Garrus's armour, savouring the precious moments of normalcy, laughing as Nihlus and Sol bickered back and forth. She took her husband's hand, and watched dawn creep up between the mountains. Despite the lovely show of pastels and the warmth of the growing light, along with sun came the war.

Along with the sun came the war.

---

A-N: I did it after almost six months ... I got their voices back in my head. And now the poop gets deep and real. :D Thanks so much for sending messages to ask about updates ... your continued interest in these crazy kids pulled me through a lot.
Darkness. Shepard fumbled her way forward, a captive beating at the air, groping to find the walls of her cell. Despite flailing and falling for several minutes, no cement or bars blocked her path. No walls! How could she be imprisoned without walls?

Previously in Future Continuous: During the countdown to war against the collectors, Shepard received intel of strange 'mechanical monster' sightings around Mount Fuji. She and her two verros are on the Normandy, on their way to investigate what might be the collector base on Earth.

Torin - Torini plural. Male turian of the age of majority (15)

Tarin - Tarini plural. Female turian of the age of majority (15)

Verro - Husband, male bond-mate.

Derra - Wife. Female bond-mate.

The Aokigahara - Also known as the Sea of Trees or the Jukai. A massive forest on the northwestern slope of Mount Fuji. Sadly, known as the suicide forest thanks to hundreds of suicides that have taken place within its depths over the centuries.

91 Days ASR 1130 hrs (Normandy, approaching Shadow Sea relay to Local Cluster)

Stopping behind Joker's seat on the Normandy's bridge, Shepard took a deep breath. "Yep, still smells like funky armpits and sweaty asscheeks in here." She laid a hand on his shoulder, the warm muscle beneath her palm obscuring his fragility. "You haven't convinced them to upgrade you to leather? It breathes, you know."

"No. I've tried, but they're immune to my charms. You, however … you need to watch yourself, dead Spectre." He always did give just as good as he got. "If you get too close, I can't be held responsible for your reaction to my manly musk, and you're a married woman." He shot an exaggerated glance at the geth platform occupying the other seat. "Just ask my co-pilot how hard it is to resist my charms."

Shepard laughed and shook her head at Enid, warning the geth away from reacting to Joker's declaration. He didn't need the encouragement. At least he and the geth seemed to get along well enough. Stepping between the seats, she let out a low whistle and reached out, running the backs of her fingers over the beard covering his cheek. "This little experiment became a thing of beauty while I was dead."

He jumped, fending her off with a couple of pathetic, over-dramatic slaps. "No touching. Are you trying to get me killed? You have two huge husbands with long histories of yanking the sticks out of their asses and bludgeoning people to death with them."

Shepard scoffed, adding a little spit for good measure. "Them being the sticks or their asses?
Because really, to bludgeon someone with your ass, you have to have a lot more in back ...." Hazard lights began flashing further up the road, so she let the joke die a merciful death.

Joker shot a glare at her, then glanced behind them as if looking for said husbands. Cocking his head so his beard caught the light, gleaming with red highlights, he whispered, "It is sexy as hell, though, isn't it?"

Shepard chuckled and shook her head. Thank the blessed Enkindlers that some things never changed.

"We're just about to hit the relay, dead Spectre." Joker nodded toward the portal. The relay remained a diamond among millions, but grew larger moment to moment. "You need to quit fawning over me and get ready to go planetside."

"Yes, sir, Admiral Joker, sir." Shepard snapped off a salute sharp enough to decapitate the pilot. After giving the subject a moment to die, she said, "Do me a favour?" Her eyebrows climbed for her hairline when he merely glanced up at her, the question in his stare remaining snark-free. A little alarmed, but encouraged, she said, "Take a slight detour for me, and head for Enceladus on a vector to see the plumes?"

A soft snort answered that. "So now I'm a honeymoon tourist service?" He shook his head and waved a dismissive hand at her. "Go away, your unreasonable requests are disturbing my delicate constitution."

Shepard clipped him in the back of the head, just hard enough to knock his cap forward. "Behave yourself, Flight Lieutenant, I have the Spectre powers to extrajudicial the hell out of your ass."

The pilot scoffed and shook his head as he replied, "Right. Colour me terrified of your undead badassedness." He cleared his throat, the cough as uncomfortable a sound as she'd ever heard him make. "And congratulations, by the way. Becoming a mom ... that's pretty huge." He glanced over his shoulder. "Good thing you've had all of us to practice on."

"Good thing I still do; I need all the practice I can get," she countered. "And thanks, Joker, it's weird and scary, but also ... " She allowed some of the awe and terror to slip the leash. "... just a ... a ... miracle." Spinning on her heel, she gathered everything back under her control.

She marched toward the threshold, stopping before she'd taken three paces. "Oh, and next time we're back at Omega, get someone to replace your seats. We can't have our best pilots chafing down ... " She grimaced and wiggled her finger in the general direction of his ass. "... there, in the place I shouldn't have mentioned. Now I need to pour industrial cleaner over my brain."

"You're welcome!"

Shepard grinned and struck out for the stairs to the crew deck. Now, to get her verros rounded up and into the observation lounge; Joker wouldn't loop back around if they missed the sights the first time. Grinning, she answered the salute from the door guard, then raced down the stairs, a hound on the trail of turian prey. Bless the Enkindlers for the Normandy's size. Despite the vessel's exterior stealth, she offered nowhere to hide inside her bulkheads.

She asked Joker for the detour because neither spouse had spent any time discovering the amazing things the Sol system had to offer. Taking down rogue VIs on the moon didn't count, and who knew the next time they'd get a chance. The plumes on Enceladus made for a great start.

She found her verros in the galley, hunched over a laptop, head to head with Anderson. "Ah," she said, her tone slanting into playfulness, "that's where all the smoke is coming from."

Anderson rumbled in the back of his throat, but Garrus and Nihlus didn't even twitch. Of course, they could blame their translators scrambling her joke rather than their tech-nerd enthusiasm.

"Holy Blessed Enkindlers preserve us." She crept up on them from behind to get a glimpse of the computer screen. They waited for the geth to test their relay virus, no doubt. Somehow Vortash convinced the batarian hegemony to allow Archangel to test the relay virus on the batarian's 'Alpha' relay. In a million months of Sundays, she'd never have bet on the batarians would be the race most likely to cooperate. It begged the question: just who was Vortash?

"They set to go?" she asked, leaning in between her verros' heads to see the display. The relay spun in the black, building up to shooting the test ship into what should be a near-nil mass corridor. In fact, if the geth virus worked, the device would answer the reaper IFF with the opposite. She shuddered, but pressed a quick kiss to both Garrus and Nihlus's crests. "You two have fun smashing ships, but I need you in the observation lounge as soon as it's over." They grunted absently, agreeing without turning from the screen.

Her left eyebrow climbed toward her hairline as she asked, "What, we're already at the 'yes, dear, whatever you say, dear' stage? Wow, we hit that at FTL."

The flashes of the light on their faces began to speed up; she needed to get to the lounge. Her throat constricted, and her heart raced rabbit quick, leaving her breathless and dizzy. The lounge; she needed to prepare for the ground mission. She turned away from the table, her knees trembling. What the hell? Freaking out made absolutely no sense. A working defense against the reapers should have her giggling manically.

Lounge! Now! Before Garrus's SHEP-dar goes off.

True. If either of her husbands saw her reaction, they'd go all baby spider monkey, and she wouldn't be able to peel them off even using mineral oil and a spatula. At that point it might take the jaws of life. Finally, a shaky breath inflated her lungs, allowing her to count her steps as she walked away.

One … two … three … four … five. Stop reacting and figure it out. Why now? Why today?

At the end of the five steps, she turned back. She'd come down to tell them to meet her in the lounge then suffered a catastrophic loss of focus. After a handful more breaths, enough air squeezed past the constrictor wrapped around her neck to say, "Seriously, meet me in the lounge right after the test. I've arranged for a five minute honeymoon." Shaking her head again when their grunts came out a little closer to 'yes', she turned and walked away. Hopefully they heard her over the giddy, tech-nerd squeeing going on inside their skulls. At least their lack of attention gave her somewhere to focus her crazy long enough to get clear.

"You're not going to watch?" Anderson asked, popping out of the huddle, a ground squirrel from its burrow.

A shudder wriggled up Shepard's spine, the serpent looping around her throat and squeezing. "No, I'm going to prepare for the mission." She swallowed her gag reflex and hurried from the galley, counting the steps at double-time. Still, she heard the relay engage before she reached the elevator.

She paused, one hand buttressed against the bulkhead. Really … what the hell? Why the sudden panic attack? The relay test meant a step forward in the war prep. It might even give them a chance to kick some serious reaper ass and slow the fuckers down. So why wasn't she pressed between her husbands, squealing with her entire tech-nerd soul?
That's easy. That device ... that defense... makes the war real. It's horrifying, and it's real, and it's close enough to make everyone and everything all too fragile. There are trillions of corpses walking around, timers ticking in the backs of their heads, because you won't be able to move fast enough or hit hard enough. That's a bitch of a thing.

Shepard scoffed, kicking a wad of phlegm into the back of her throat. She gagged, but then squared her shoulders—spine set against the tide—and swallowed. Blessed Enkindlers, of course she wasn't ready for the war. Sovereign and Saren seemed like making a cup of warm cocoa compared. Hell, the war looming on the horizon turned even Elysium into high tea with scones and little cakes and cucumber sandwiches ... maybe even teeny berry tartlets and beaten cream for dessert.

"All killing diminishes the whole," Tashac whispered through Shepard's thoughts. "All of it."

Reality slapped her hard enough to sting, hard enough to shove her away from the bulkhead and down the corridor toward the lounge. In her naive arrogance, she believed that if she defeated Saren and Sovereign, she could prevent the harvest. Or at the very least, put it off for another couple of centuries. Even at reaper speeds, traversing dark space made for a considerable commute.

Shepard palmed the door control, practically leaping over the threshold when the portal slid open. Sugar. She needed sugar, and she needed to sit down with Izzy for a few minutes before the briefing. Yeah. She sighed. Sugar and Izzy ... just the recipe to center herself. The base on Earth—if they found it—would present a nightmare. She needed her head screwed on straight to lead her people through it.

She grabbed a soda from the fridge and sat on the sofa facing the vast emptiness, finding it soothing rather than terrifying in the moment. "Oh yeah, baby girl," she said after guzzling orange soda until her sinuses and throat burned, "that's the stuff. We just need a few minutes to pull it all back together."

Looking down, she pressed her palm over her hard, flat stomach, the incongruity not lost on her. Most mothers would be starting to show by that time. Most mothers would wake each morning feeling something ... wouldn't they? Shouldn't she be feeling the miracle of it? She guzzled down the rest of the can.

"Sorry we haven't spent any time with you over the past couple of days. We're not adjusting to the whole parenting role very well." She patted her belly. "I promise, if you were growing in here, we'd never forget to factor you into our plans."

"You wouldn't be going groundside in a few hours." The voice from the door snatched Shepard's attention off the small, quantumly-entangled connection to her daughter. Sparky shrugged when their gazes met. "You're way too much of a mama bear to risk her that way." He grinned and wandered over to sit next to her. "It would drive you insane to stay on the sidelines, and then, of course, you'd punish us for it—driving us insane—but you'd suffer through the confinement for her."

Shepard nodded. She sure hoped so.

For long moments, she stared out, her thoughts weaving random threads between stars. Damn the reapers. And damn the leviathan to an even deeper ring of hell for creating them. It might be nice to spend her days preparing her daughter to enter the universe. No, it would be. It really would.

"They're out there," Sparky said, his words dropping into the still, deep well between them. "It's easy to forget with Sovereign and Saren gone. Thousands of those monsters wait out in dark space while the collectors weaken us for the kill." He stood and walked to the window. "Most days it's hard enough to believe we'll beat the collectors." He punched the glass with the side of his fist, leaving it there, maybe trying to hold the truth at bay even as it wormed through the glass. "How in God's name are we supposed to defeat their masters?"

"We take it one step at a time, Sparky." Shepard shrugged. He needed answers she didn't happen to have shoved in a back pocket. Her hand itched to reach back and check; hell, it couldn't hurt. "All we can do is keep our eyes on the road ahead, our screaming meemies under control, and our imaginations engaged."

Her lips warmed into a smile as she watched him. He'd changed since her death. She should have noticed. "What's up with you? You're different." Narrowing her eyes, she tipped her head to one side, trying to scry beneath his skin. "You beat the headaches?"

Kaidan returned to sit at her side, folding down onto the sofa so he faced her, one leg tucked under him. "Yeah. A couple of months after the funeral, I took all my vacation time and had my amp changed out to the latest model." He shrugged, his particular, sweet brand of bashful radiating off him, heat waves rising from cement. "I was a lot weaker for a long time, but it was worth it to go a month between headaches." He stared into her eyes, a cocky glint sparking in his.

Ah, there he is. That's our man, right there.

She grinned, the warmth spilling down her throat and spreading through her belly, out to her limbs. Sweet baby Jesus, she'd missed him. "Spill it."

The spark went nova. "I can reave now." A grin lit up his handsome face. "I'm trying out one of Archangel's prototype amps, and I'm stronger than ever. I can shred an asari vanguard's barriers in seconds." The words slowed as he reached the end of his sentence, his grin folding into something more complex and thoughtful. It remained that way for long seconds before he said, "Collectors use barriers."

Her reply chased a sharp nod. "Yeah, so do the reapers." Where was he headed?

A soft grumble tumbled from his lips, detritus falling away as he sculpted his idea. "Vanguards and krogan battlemasters have far weaker defenses when I use biotic attacks rather than electrical-based attacks. When you overload a vanguard, you can get their shields down, but not as quickly as I can with reave or even warp."

Shepard blew a long, noisy breath out her nose and turned in the seat to rest her arm along the back. "Agreed. They're a constant pain in my ass because of it." She winked. "And you wondered why I kept you close."

He acknowledged her but kept a tight grip on the subject. "If the reapers are weaker to biotics than they are to technology, we need an amp big enough to shoot reave at them in a strength to make a difference." The thoughtful frown sizzled into a wide grin as he held up a hand, his biotics crackling around his fingers. "A ship. Can you imagine? A ship with fifty or a hundred powerful biotics all connected through a communal amp."

"Take it to Samara." She grinned and shook her head. "She had some ideas for biotic weapon applications. If she agrees there might be a way, take it to Legion and see what he and the chia think."

Kaidan nodded, suddenly as serious as he was animated the moment before. "You know, you were right when you told me that you weren't as crazy and reckless as before you died … but you've gained rather than lost on balance." He shrugged and turned to look out into the black before continuing, "The things that have changed, they're the reason that you're our only hope to reach the end of this war, Captain." He glanced at her, scarcely making contact before turning back. "You don't look at things the way everyone else does. Thank God for that."

Melting down into her chair, Shepard lifted the datapad, already a paragraph in before she nodded at the door. "Let's hope my luck holds. Get the rest of them in here, Sparky. We've got a mission."

"Yes, ma'am." Strong strides crossed to the door and out.

Okay, the mission, glory hallelujah and shake an angry fist at the Enkindlers. Once they reached Earth, they'd drop smack into the middle of a protected world heritage site on the northwestern slopes of Mount Fuji. The site promised to add thirty layers of complication to a mission already doomed to the land of FUBAR, because it was based on intel as sketchy as a toddler's stick figure: is it grandma or the cat? Of course, if she smashed her way through the Sea of Trees, a diplomatic incident awaited at the other end.

The Aokigahara. Damn but didn't it make sense? Indoctrination signals warping minds for thousands of years from somewhere under the mountain. As a kid, she'd owned a book about the most mysterious places on Earth, and that forest—that beautiful, sad, haunted forest—both captured her imagination and terrified her. She'd never been able to guess at what drew people there for such sad purpose, and the idea that it might be linked to reaper signals leaking from their base tied her gut in knots.

Nothing exists that the reapers can't poison.

Familiar footsteps approached the door, drawing her from her thoughts. "It works," Nihlus announced, stepping through the door. "The Aratoht Protocol crushed the test ship into a three meter blob. The relay simply dropped it at the origin for the tow ship to cart away."

Shepard nodded but didn't look back. "Excellent. We'll get at least a few of them before they can cause trouble."

Her verro stepped between Shepard and her view of the void, his shadow slipping over her datapad. "After the demonstration, Liara said that she and her entourage are on their way to meet us at Earth. Apparently, they've discovered something too sensitive to discuss, even over the QEC." Crouching, he settled his hands on her knees, a welcome invasion of her borders. "We just closed the channel to her when Fedorian contacted us to say that he, a Matriarch Saela S'aris, and Dalatrass Linron are on Earth for a meeting with the AoN."

Shepard looked up, her stare abandoning the stars outside the portal for the ones in Nihlus's eyes ....

Dear, sweet baby Enkindler Jesus, what part of farmland grows that variety of corn? Corny on the cob, coming right up.

... finding his gaze warm and bright. "We should book a couple of rooms in Vancouver, see if we can elbow our way into Hackett's schedule, get everyone together."

Nihlus nodded and leaned in, his brow gentle and solid against hers. "It sounds like a good idea. I don't think the war will wait much past our destroying the collectors."

"Yeah." Shepard sighed, her eyes closing. "Once their most obvious agents are dead, the less overt ones will scour every corner of the galaxy looking for the keys."
The soft rumble of a cleared throat pulled them apart, turning Shepard's attention to the door. Kaidan stood there, face glowing bright red. "Do I have to throw water on you two again?" he asked.

"Everyone else better be right behind you, Alenko." Shepard grinned, then touched her brow to Nihlus's before sitting back. She watched Sparky cross the floor to sit on the couch facing them. His biotics weren't all that became stronger in her absence. He was a good choice for one of the other team leaders. She sighed; as much as she hated to do it, she'd have to use Miranda as well.

Leaving her without enough time to talk herself out of using Miranda, the door opened, Garrus ushering Jack and Sol into the room. He held his mandibles high and tight, telling Shepard the contents of their conversation prior to the door opening.

Ah, little sisters: even when they love you, you want to kill them.

"Believe me, even though a human couldn't hear it, he squealed when the test ship dropped out of the relay." Sol walked backwards, fixing a smartass grin on her brother. "He's such a complete nerd."

Jack nodded, looking very sage as she did. "I know, I've caught him making out with the thanix cannon more than once," A long breath bled between dark red, pursed lips. "I haven't had the heart to tell Shepard that she's actually his mistress." The biotic aped wiping away a tear. "It's just sad."

"All right, you've had your fun." Garrus spun Sol around and pushed her toward the seats, his expression rigid, but from trying not to grin rather than annoyance. "Go away. Now."

"Such a grouch." Still, Sol stomped off and perched herself on the edge of the couch, all feigned angles and spikes. After a moment of stiff-plated silence, she grinned at Shepard, pretense evaporating. In the moment, Shepard understood how much hurt Garrus's separation from his family had created, and how much his finding them again had healed.

Garrus crossed behind Shepard to sit on her right side. He ran his talons over her hair, the touch soothing. "Did Nihlus fill you in?"

Closing her eyes, she leaned into his touch. She nodded, but didn't get a chance to answer before the rest of the ground team filed through the door and began the noisy process of settling in. Maybe, after they completed the mission, they'd manage to wrestle a little alone time from life's tight-ass grip.

Right. Keep dreaming, Sister Shepard-Vakarian-Kryik.

Darkness. Shepard fumbled her way forward, a captive beating at the air, groping to find the walls of her cell. Despite flailing and falling for several minutes, no cement or bars blocked her path. No walls! How could she be imprisoned without walls?

A light. There needed to be a light switch or a window. She shuffled forward five or six steps … or what amounted to steps taken on one's knees. Her right thigh caught on something, the flesh screaming as a sharp—but un-bullet or blade-like—object sank into the meat between plating. A hard, painful grip latched onto her shoulder. Twisting, she fell, slapping at the darkness and stabbing fingers or talons that held her, knocking it away. Wood? She slid a hand down her thigh, cursing the tiny slits of murky fog that promised sight and revealed nothing.

Her fingers discovered wood. Yeah, definitely wood. A branch. She snorted softly. Fantastic, the infamous Captain Shepard brought down by branches. Wait, branches? Where the hell was she?
Surely somewhere so dark had to be an underground cell or crypt.

The last word stabbed through her gut to wrap gelid fingers around her spine. No, stop it. It's not a crypt. Sweet baby Jesus, she needed to breathe and calm down. A trembling breath tightened the grip on her spine rather than relieving it. Where the hell was she? Last thing she remembered, she'd been on the Normandy, briefing her teams on the mission.

One hand clawed at the ground, coming away with a handful of loose matter. Particles of the stuff stabbed her nostrils, setting off what Garrus called her fully-automatic sneeze. Mold … damp earth … she closed her eyes and took a deep, purposeful sniff. Leaves. It was dead leaves and loamy soil … and rotted wood … and blood. The ground in her hands whispered; tar-black vapours boring through her gloves, wriggling between material and skin, then beneath. It climbed up her arm and slithered along her jugular to form the suzerain's familiar barrier around her mind.

That meant a reaper signal. Where the hell was she that the spiders felt the presence of an indoctrination signal? And … and why couldn't she remember?

No. Shepard threw herself up onto her knees, clapping and wiping at her hands until the sensation of the slick, black vapours faded. She needed to assess real injury and real danger, not let her imagination run wild.

"Where am I?" She whispered, not certain she wanted anyone to hear her. Not until she remembered how she got there, and that—she rubbed a trembling fist over her eyes, ragged edges of torn skin catching on her glove—would have to wait until she got her back against something and her gun out front.

Vision not improving for the extra dose of pain, she heaved one foot under her, arms flailing as she fought for balance. Once stable, she shoved the pain behind a door and locked it up tight. Nothing felt broken, just bruised, sliced, and bent. She reached up to her ear, triggering her implant, but then thought better of sending shouts out on the airwaves before she knew her location.

Note to self: Screaming in hostile territory never a good plan.

Footsteps approached, a barely audible whisper of movement in the moss. "Shush, now." Hard fingers caressed Shepard's cheek, the touch gentle despite leaving behind searing contrails of agony. The specific brand of pain felt familiar, raw and scorched. Burned … she'd been burned? How? Where …? Panic surged up her throat, heavy and slow, cooling lava or treacle, scalding and bitter. Definitely lava.

No. Stop it. Holy fucking Enkindlers, control yourself. What are you? Ten?

Taking a deep breath, she reached up, grabbing the thing as it touched her face again. Her fingers closed around a hand. But hard. Metallic? She searched the mist for the face behind the unrelenting grip, but couldn't make out anything more than a dark shape. She slapped the hand away. "Who …?"

"It's okay, I won't hurt you."

Shepard spun on the soft, very uneven, floor. Her actions filled the air with a cloud of rotting vegetation and musty earth. It burned all the way into the center of her head, demanding that she sneeze. Instead the pressure tunneled out her tear ducts. Scrambling, she backed up, finding refuge in the solid bulk of a massive stump.

"I … I can't see." Bolder for having cover at her back, she tested the sound of the words, finding them altogether too credible. Electricity sizzled along her veins until it stabbed into her heart, jolting it into a full gallop. All the gentle forest sounds from a half-breath earlier warped, insidious: every susurrus of leaf against loam the stalking paws of a predator, every bird chirp a warning, every snapping twig the intractable tread of death.

"Easy now, you're going to hurt yourself."

Stumbling back onto all fours, Shepard jumped around to face the voice. It sounded synthesized. "Who did you say you were?" Her right hand slapped her hip, coming away with her sidearm's reassuring weight resting in her palm. "What happened? Where am I?" She spat the questions along streaks of ice-cold venom. Knees wide, she managed to balance enough to hold the pistol in both hands, the barrel lunging at every sound.

One footstep rustled through the moss. "It's okay. My name is Marion, and I won't hurt you."

Shepard held her breath, tracking the woman despite her reassurances. "What happened to me? Where are Garrus and Nihlus … my crew?"

The woman's armour grated—metal and ceramic grinding against one another—as she crouched at Shepard's side. "You were in an accident. I believe your eyesight will return in time. It's simply a reaction to the explosion's glare."

Shepard drew back, wincing away from the metallic edge to the woman's voice. Something felt off, and more than just the whispers caressing her ears, burrowing through her implants and into her brain. "Who are you? You sound …." She waited, expecting to hear a sharp intake of breath or a sigh … some reaction to pointing out what was likely an implant to correct a disability. Instead … nothing but a protracted pause. "Are you geth?"

"I'm Marion Whittaker, and I pulled you from the wreckage of your shuttle." Gentle but hard hands gripped Shepard's arm, lifting.

"My crew?" Shepard's heart seized as the word 'wreckage' registered. Right, the shuttle … the mission to find the collector base under Mount Fuji. "Where are Nihlus and Garrus? Sol? Thane?" She pushed against the woman's support, managing to scramble to her feet. "There were four people in the shuttle with me."

The woman—Marion—wrapped an arm around Shepard's waist, providing much needed support and balance. "I don't know what happened to them. I'm sorry. Your shuttle was hit by several missiles. I found you in a small section of cockpit, but located no one else, alive or … otherwise." She let out a faint, chittering sigh. "As far as I can tell, it's just you, me, and the trees."

Speaking of … what was a lone woman doing in the middle of the Aokigahara? "What are you doing out here?"

"That's a long, strange story that I don't understand myself. "Gentle hands guided Shepard across the ground. "Here, sit down and we'll take a look at your eyes." The unyielding grip eased her down onto a large, flat surface.

Shepard kept her sidearm held tight against her, shielding it from being snatched away while her other hand reached up to her aural implant. "Shepard to Normandy. Come in, Normandy?"

Nothing, not even static. Damn, the explosion blew out her implants. How the hell was she going to find her people?

"I'm not sure how I ended up here," Marion said. "One minute I was eating breakfast in my apartment in Singapore, and the next I woke up in a nightmare." Her teeth chattered, betraying a heavy shudder. "It looked like a laboratory straight out of Frankenstein … or something Clive Barker dreamed up … mechanical monsters everywhere."

"May I touch you?" Shepard asked, her voice shattering into a croak.

"Of course." The woman shuffled closer, dropping her shadow over the thin slit of light that made up Shepard's vision.

Shepard tugged her glove off and reached out, her hand rough as she groped her way up Marion's arm to her shoulder and neck. It all felt the same, cold, hard, and rough rather than the smooth softness of flesh or even clothing.

"Is it okay to touch your face?" the captain asked. Her hand hovered, waiting for a reply … hell, dreading it.

The woman moved to meet Shepard's hand. "It would be unforgivably rude for me to be able to see you and deny you the ability to see me." A synthesized chuckle followed.

Shepard's heart lifted, clinging to the hope that Marion owed her voice to a prosthetic. Husks couldn't speak and geth didn't show emotion. A second later, as Marion's cheek impacted her palm, the battered organ splashed down into her guts. Hard, desiccated, papery skin. As her fingers explored, they discovered the reticulated cable that stabbed into the woman's cheek, the smaller one that invaded her mouth.

Dear lord, she's a husk.

(A-N: So sorry if this chapter sucks. I've been so off my game lately that I really just needed to stop picking at it and hating on it and get it out there. Thanks for your patience with me. You know I love you guys. hugs and kittens)

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!