New Chapters posted here now! Commander Jane Shepard. Colonist, War Hero, smart ass. When Spectre Nihlus Kryik says he is leaving the Normandy to investigate on his own, Shepard stops him. From that moment, ripples move out through the fabric of the reality we're familiar with, changing everything. Well, almost everything. The Reapers are coming.

In this first volume, Saren and the geth race to find the Conduit, starting the new cycle. Can Shepard beat them to it? Will this new reality be better equipped to deal with the Reaper threat, or will everything crumble to ruin? Canon-divergent where one small decision changes everything. Rated for language and smart assedness. Sexy times much later on.

Something AO3 doesn't do is make contacting people very easy ... outside of comments, of course. If you ever want to contact me privately, you are more than welcome to do so at cbdsw2@gmail.com. :D
The adventure begins with a turian Spectre and a pickup. Rewritten Aug 12, 2016 to give a better introduction to Jane "Sassy" Shepard.

Torin - Turian male the age of majority. (15)

Buratrum - In turian mythology, the realm of the spirits of dishonourable association.

The wind roared past the open ramp, only the kinetic barrier keeping the giant's fingers at bay as it swiped at the little frigate, eager to grab anyone careless enough to get too close. Commander Jane Shepard lifted her chin and took a deep breath to calm the troop of elcor gymnasts performing cartwheels in her belly.

_Not today, fee fi fo fum. Not today._

"Nihlus, you're coming with us?" The voice of the eager corporal to Shepard's right dragged her attention back where it belonged. Shepard shook her head, a combination of amusement and dread meeting the kid's enthusiasm. The fresh face beaming through the faceplate of his helmet screamed greener than grass, and when she'd spoken to him before suiting up, every other word out of his mouth had been about finding adventure and being a hero.

She couldn't remember ever being that eager. Of course, her CO, Captain David Anderson, probably recalled her first few years out of the academy a little differently. No doubt, she'd made the kid look positively reserved. Amazing how much a little time and experience kicked the crap out of that lust for adventure. She glanced over at the captain in time to intercept the eyebrow-raised glare of warning he sent her way. Or maybe not. Anderson knew her too well.

A smile goaded one corner of her mouth as she nodded in reply. "Behave yourself, Shepard," she said under her breath, imitating his gruff rumble. "Yes, sir. Warning received. Roger that, sir."

Anderson scowled without any heat and shook his head. Yep, he knew her too well.

Beside her, Jenkins bounced on the balls of his feet, his hero-worshipping gaze riveted to the turian Spectre standing a few metres away. Shepard pressed her lips together in a thin smile and gave her head a firm shake that felt far too similar to Anderson's.

Council Spectre Nihlus Kryik. She glanced at the turian. To Jenkins, having the Spectre along on their mission meant adventure, the romance of the lone space warrior righting great wrongs and accomplishing great deeds. To her … well, she had a slightly different view of the torin. A couple of years before Elysium, she'd seen him on the news, and developed an … interest. She'd met him once, but he probably didn't even remember. He'd spoken a single word to her, then returned to the party.

When she heard that he'd be coming along on the Normandy's shakedown cruise, she'd looked forward to getting to know him. However, since he'd boarded, despite being everywhere she was, watching … always watching—her favourite had been waking up in the night to see him standing over her, staring at her like she was some mystery he needed to solve—he hadn't spoken to her until the mission briefing a half hour before.

You really do pick the worst candidates to develop cru—

Shepard stomped on the end of that thought. The last thing she needed to do was start glowing like some neon strawberry. She took a deep breath or four and forced the taiko drummers in her chest to take a break before she looked up at the torin again. At least knowing that he'd put her name forward to join the Spectres lent context to his stalking.

Staring while you slept was still damned creepy.

The next day, she'd talked Anderson into letting her clean out a supply closet to use as a private cabin. It was tight, but at just a hair under five feet tall, she didn't need much space.

"Nihlus?" the kid asked again, raising his voice.

"I move faster on my own," Nihlus said, arching his neck a little as he replied to Jenkin's query. He cut a glance across at Shepard before jogging down the ramp toward the barrier.

What was that? Shepard shook off her distraction, her gut tying itself in a knot. Had Kryik said he was going in without backup? She leaped forward, racing after him. "Hold on a second." She caught his arm. "This isn't just a coffee and cake run any more. As much as I appreciate the whole army of one mystique, going in separately risks both the mission and our colony."

She squared her shoulders and met his wall of confident condescension without flinching. Yes, he was a Spectre. And yes, the Alliance needed her to pony up, to carry the banner and become their token first Spectre, but two young men and the folks on Eden Prime didn't need a kiss-ass, they needed Commander Shepard, freakin' hero of Elysium.

Nihlus tugged at her grip, but Shepard just stared back. "I'm going in against a hell of a lot of unknown enemies with a three person squad, one of whom acts like he graduated the academy three days ago." She glanced back at Jenkins. "Sorry kid." She saw Alenko grip the kid's shoulder, but focused back on the Spectre. "I'd like to bring them both back, and I'd like the kid to still have a family when we're done. Your experience—and your gun—could be the difference."

The Spectre's mandibles flared a little as a harsh laugh rumbled out of both larynxes. "I don't think so, Shepard. I'm a Spectre, and I don't answer to you." He yanked on his arm, but she held fast, forced to follow closer to the edge of the ramp. He stopped and stared down at her, looming with very real threat in his piercing green eyes. "Let go before I put you on your ass, Shepard."

Piercing green eyes? Really, Janey? Would you like me to get you a piece of paper so you can write him a note? I can pass it to him while the teacher isn't looking. You're an N7. Act like it.

Sometimes, she really wished she could slap her inner voice. Refocusing, she clenched her teeth and met the anger and arrogance in his stare with a resolute challenge, her heart thumping double time against her ribs. "You can try." She raised her eyebrows and met him head on, challenge to challenge.

No one got where Kryik had in life without a spine of pure steel, but neither had she. Presumably that was why he'd recommended her to the council.

"Approaching drop point two," the pilot called over the comm, his voice almost lost to the wind.

Shepard took a deep breath, her back straightening, her whole body vibrating with exhilaration as the kinetic barrier dropped and the giant snatched at her. "Make your move, Nihlus. It's a good day for a throw down." Taking a deep breath, she tilted her head a little, her eyes wide but not challenging him any longer.

Captain Anderson, her CO, stepped up beside them. "Shepard, stow the pissing contest! We all know you're the big dog. You don't have to prove it every two minutes," he shouted over the roar. He buttressed a hand into her shoulder. "Let this one go."

Shepard tossed him a crisp nod. "Glad to, sir, as soon as our guest comprehends that I don't need a loose cannon messing up my theatre." She winced a little at talking back to Anderson. She'd put him through a lot over the years, but never talked back. Surely, he'd understand. If she let the seven-foot tall, armour-wrapped pile of attitude and condescension get away with anything unchallenged, he'd walk all over her. That was not acceptable. Not if her people were backing him up, and certainly not if partnership loomed in their future.

"Kryik," Anderson said, hollering over the wind, his face twisted into the 'trust me, I've dealt with this crap for over a decade' grimace, "she's not going to back down. Not when her squad is at risk."

The Normandy cut off the rest of the Captain's advice, the frigate dropping a couple of metres. At that moment, the Spectre stepped back and yanked hard on his arm, sending them both crashing to the deck. For one, seemingly endless second, Shepard thought for sure that she could save herself, but then ... gut freezing, limbs flailing, her grip slipped and she tumbled helplessly down the ramp and dropped off the edge. Twisting, she tried to contort her body around to roll through the landing, but gravity and her own gracelessness conspired to splat her against the earth like a ball of dropped clay.

Flopping on her back, she heaved, sucking vacuum for thirty seconds before she managed to drag what felt like a length of razor wire down her windpipe. Black spots and white sparks danced across her vision, but she bullied herself through the pile of invisible varren gnawing on her body parts and rolled over onto all fours. Looking over at the Spectre, she saw him staring back.

"You okay?" she asked, wincing when her voice came out reminiscent of a munchkin with an elephant sitting on its chest.

A grunt and pointed glare accompanied his nod. "You're a pain in the ass, Shepard." He sat up, legs loosely crossed, his eyes searching the ground around them.

"Yeah, it's sort of my thing." She spotted what he was looking for a couple metres off to her right and crawled over, picking his shotgun out of the weeds. Returning to his side, she passed it to him. "You're no bucket of charm yourself, by the way."

He chuffed and stretched backward, his spine cracking like someone walking on dry twigs. "I don't have to be. Army of one, remember?"

Squinting against the brightness, she sat back on her heels and looked over the area. "How could I forget?" Wincing a little, she stretched her neck then looked up. The Normandy had continued on to the second drop point and then headed back into orbit. No sign of the rest of her team, either. Damn. Well … it gave her a few moments to settle a couple of things with the Spectre.

"Look, Kryik," she said, a wheeze still laced through her words, "I know you're used to being that 'who gives a shit about the rest' sole operator. And I respect that, but as long as my people are on the ground backing you up, getting them out alive has to be my priority." She used her rifle to help lever herself to her feet and stumbled back a step before offering him a hand up. "And that means no wild cards running their own plays. I'm asking you to stay with the squad. Have our backs, and we'll have yours."

"I'm a Spectre for a reason, Shepard," he replied, a lot of growl mixed into his subvocals. Still, he took her hand, accepting her help up onto his feet. Once on his feet, he cracked his neck and shrugged his armour up his shoulders.

"Yeah, and I'm an N7 for a reason, but I'm here, leading this squad." A faint sigh tumbled between her lips, belying the grin that kept trying to creep across her face. Stubborn as hell. She could work with that.

Gunfire, and not too far off, diverted her attention from arguing with the Spectre.

She turned back to stare into his eyes, eyebrows raised. "Do you have the slightest idea what that thing was on the feed? Whoever is attacking here, they tore through a platoon of Marines like they were fruit flies." She reached out, pressing her fingers against his gauntlet. "If you know anything about what's going on, you'd better spill it, right here, right now."

"I don't have to share anything. It's called Spectre authority." He stared down at her hand for a second before he stepped away. "And while I might be here to observe you in the field, on missions, you're my backup."

"Good luck with that." Shepard clenched her fists and looked out over the colony, keeping half an eye on the Spectre. Something about his reactions to her registered on an even stranger level than her reaction to him. She couldn't tell if he was just thrown off by her naturally abrasive charm, or … what … ?

Leaving worrying about Kryik's weirdness until they were far away from the colony crawling with unknown enemies, she turned a slow circle, trying to orient herself. They had a job to do … and the faster the better, before Eden Prime became a former human colony.

He turned toward the road and cracked his neck again. "Where in the name of buratrum are we? You landed us in the middle of nowhere."

A whole lot of nothing lay before her, stretching for klicks in all directions … well, nothing but trees, swamp, and floating things that looked like brains. She raised her hand to her ear, but before she could call for her squad, they jogged around a bend in the road. She waved to beckon them over, wincing as pain lanced down through her shoulder. Gripping it, she rolled it in the socket, trying to work out the kinks.

"Thank god, you're okay," Alenko sighed, stopping an arm length away. He reached out, patting her shoulder, an absent sort of caretaking gesture, as he checked her over. "Are you all right? We didn't …"

Shepard stepped back, answering his query with a curt nod. "Yeah, five by five. I stuck the landing like a pro." Shepard ignored Kryik's snort and jerked her head toward the colony, limping a few tentative steps. Her body felt as though everything had been shaken loose and reassembled just off plumb. Oh well, the kinks would work out once she started moving.

"Come on, let's save the day, gentlemen." Lifting into a jarring jog, she ran past the Spectre. "You coming?"

"I wouldn't push it, Commander," Alenko whispered, casting a dubious glance over his shoulder. "He looks about ready to plug you."

Shepard nodded, cutting the thread of regret that spooled through her guts at that. "Yeah well, he wouldn’t be the first. And at least, now he knows what to expect.”

Alenko tilted his head a little, one eyebrow cocking at a decidedly smartass angle. "You do have a very … "

A crooked grin pulled up one corner of Shepard's mouth as the lieutenant searched for a diplomatic word.

"... colourful reputation, ma'am." His eyes roamed the right side of the road, his gait easy, gun held at low ready.

She could only imagine the scuttlebutt that circulated about her. A few percent of it might be true. The rest … well … . She looked back at the Spectre, a grim smile slicing across her face. She was a Spectre candidate, so who gave a fuck what anyone thought?

Think it a few more times. You’ll believe it one of these days.

Slapping duct tape over her inner voice, Shepard slowed a little to cast weary eyes at the buildings rising out of the landscape like strange megaliths, completely out of place, almost obscene in such an idyllic landscape. She’d seen ten colonies just like it on planets that ranged from nearly as beautiful and suitable as Eden Prime to frozen wastelands in the middle of being terraformed. Each one could only be described as an abomination. At least this planet made for a pretty backdrop to civilization's grotesquely inappropriate architecture.

Tracers fired back and forth, showing that the Alliance Marines stationed on the planet remained in the fight. Shepard felt a disconnected sort of pride in her fellow soldiers, having fought in their boots. Enemies advancing, civilians panicking . . . nothing she ever wanted to live through again. She sped back up. The best thing she could do for her brothers and sisters in uniform was find out what was going on and then put an end to it.

A blur of black and red in her peripherals, the turian Spectre ran past her. Shepard nodded to herself as he settled into a quick jog. Kryik certainly didn’t lack for spirit—not that she expected any less from a Spectre—their partnership might prove entertaining. Or they’d end up killing one another. Either way … good times.

Shepard waved to the Marines. "Come on, gentlemen, let's step it up before he leaves us behind."

She dug in, working out the last of the aches from the fall. "Alenko at my seven, Jenkins at five. Five metre spread and keep your eyes open."

They found the first bodies fifty metres along. Burned to unrecognizable husks, civilians and soldiers alike sprawled along the road like litter. Shepard winced, her gut twisting into a knot as she spotted a child half-covered by her mother. She wrenched her eyes away, concentrating on the pounding of her feet against the ground.

One … two … three … four. Breathe through it. It's nothing you haven't seen before. Just keep moving and do your job for these young men and for the colonists.

"God, what is going on here?" Alenko asked. The lieutenant moved up a little on her right flank, his gaze and assault rifle sweeping the forest on that side of the road. Jenkins just made a sorrowful sort of strangled moan.

Shepard knew far too much about how the young corporal felt and glanced his way. "Hold it together, Jenkins," she said, keeping her voice firm but empathetic. "You won't be any good to anyone if you lose it."
"Yes, ma'am." The corporal squared his shoulders and rolled his neck.

Shepard gave him a tight-lipped smile. "Good man, now let's speed up before Nihlus hogs all the bad guys." She didn't have far to go before she saw Nihlus take cover further up the road.

A half breath later his voice came through on her radio. "Drones up ahead, Shepard."

Finally, some damned answers. Maybe.

"Roger that." She gestured for Alenko and Jenkins to move up and take cover, then crouched low and ran forward. She pressed her back against a boulder then peered out. It took a moment, but then she spotted them. Three small, blue metal drones.

"Recon," she whispered into her radio. She switched her assault rifle for her sniper rifle and eased it open to its full length. Resting the weapon on the rock, she sighted down the first drone. A gentle squeeze on the trigger, and it exploded. She let the recoil settle, then sighted the second. Her shields let out staccato complaints as the remaining drones opened fire on her, but she fired and then only one remained. Nihlus finished it off before she could line up the shot.

She gave the Spectre a cocky half-smile as she switched to the assault rifle again. Glancing over her shoulder at the Marines, she called, "Come on, let's get moving, gentlemen. We're hell and gone from the beacon yet. Try to keep up, Nihlus." She grinned at the closed-dialect curse he spat her way.

"Not sure smacking the seven foot hornet's nest with a stick is the best plan," Alenko whispered from behind her. He moved up to her four o'clock and cut a sharp glance across at her that screamed, 'I'm just looking out for your ass, ma'am'.

"Neither is letting one get himself or my squad killed," Shepard countered. "Come on, let's keep moving before whoever is attacking does any more damage."

"Yes, ma'am," Jenkins said, his voice tight with grief and anger. "We can't let them get away with this." He appeared at her eight, his entire body trembling.

"Keep cool, Jenkins," Shepard warned. "We do this by the numbers." Watching him through narrowed eyes, she searched for the small signs and signals that he'd flipped his shit, but he settled.

"Yes, ma'am." His tone smoothed out some of her scowl.

She let out a breath and set out. Their mission couldn't stand many more delays.

"I'll scout ahead," the Spectre called, taking off. He held his shotgun confidently at low-ready and loped across the uneven ground with an ease that made her hate him a little. He had to be hurting, but it sure didn't show.

"Stay in sight." She let out a semi-exasperated sigh and stepped up to a ground-eating run. She hadn't really expected a Spectre with as many awards and citations as Kryik to bend to her, but she'd wanted to know how far she could push before he pushed back. He hadn't let her down. Heaven knew she loved a challenge.

They took out another small squad of drones as they rounded a shallow bend in the road through the open forest, but must have covered a kilometre of ground before sound of a real gun battle tore through the air. Finally, some enemies to sink her teeth into. Shepard stepped around a huddle of burned bodies on the road, making a beeline up the grassy slope. She held up a fist to halt the two marines then waved them into cover on her flanks. Once they took their positions, she moved... forward, keeping her profile low and sticking to the shadows under the massive trees.

Gunfire meant survivors, and survivors meant answers.

Peering around a conifer analog, Shepard spotted a soldier in pink and white armour race around a boulder. Her breath caught as two strides out, rounds peppered the Marine's back, knocking her flat. Letting off curses that made Shepard's ears burn, the soldier rolled over, firing at enemies the commander couldn't see. Unwilling to take any chances losing her one witness, Shepard ran out, ignoring Alenko's shouts of protest, and grabbed the Marine's arm.

"Come on, soldier!" the commander hollered, "give me a hand here." With Shepard hauling and the other woman scrambling between shooting off rounds, they made it behind the nearest cover.

"You okay?" Shepard barked without looking down. Rifle-first, she peered out around the rock. Three … machines … with flashlights for heads walked up the path, guns, the like of which Shepard had never seen before, at the ready. "Shit, what the hell are these things?" Lifting her hand to her ear, she opened a channel. "Kryik, where in fuck's name are you? Could those be geth?"

"Your eleven o'clock, thirty metres."

Shepard looked out. When the machines opened fire, she returned bursts of three rounds, taking out one. The other two fell a half-second later as Nihlus and her boys opened fire. After ensuring that the field was clear, she glanced back. "Name, Marine? Are you okay? Do you know what the hell these things are?"

The soldier scrambled to her feet and snapped a quick salute. "Gunnery Chief Ashley Williams, ma'am, and I'm fine, just singed. And yes, I think they're geth," the Marine said. A heavy flush burned her cheeks a blotchy red, and her chest heaved as she struggled to catch her breath, but the chief's hands remained steady on her rifle as she moved to cover Shepard's six.

"Geth. Shit." Shepard shook off the gelid, superstitious fingers that crawled down her spine. It didn't matter. Incredulity could wait. If Eden Prime was being attacked by fluffy pink bunnies, they could stop to ponder it once the furry bastards were dead.

She rolled her shoulders and nodded to Alenko and Jenkins. "I'll take point with the chief, gentlemen. Watch our flanks." She leaned out, taking fire against her shields as one of the machines appeared around a cluster of rocks. All four of them opened fire. It went down, letting out a short burst of squealing and chattering like a bad extranet connection.

"I'm moving out ahead again," Nihlus called, sprinting across the grassland toward a series of walls.

"Damn it, Kryik. Hold up for five bloody seconds!" Shepard let out the foulest curse she could think of and took off, waving to the chief. "Come on, Williams. We'll give you the 411 after I shoot that turian in the ass. Double time people, we've got a runaway Spectre on our hands." She set off, moving quickly, her rifle up and in constant motion as they crossed a cleared area, dotted with crates.

Partway down the slope, she stopped and looked up at a huge, metal spike. Near the top, a person dangled, the spike rammed straight through his gut. "What in the name of sweet baby Jesus is that?" A clammy salamander of that superstitious fear wrapped itself around her heart. After fighting on countless worlds for more than a decade, she knew only one thing for sure: Sapient beings possessed an infinite imagination when it came to new and horrific ways to kill each other.
Impalement is actually a really old way to kill people, Janey.

Williams shuddered and glanced up, but quickly away. Her throat worked for a long time before she spat out, "The geth have been impaling any prisoners they take on these things. I don't know why."

Shepard watched the chief out of the corner of her eye even as she forced herself to look at the details of the spike just in case it became important. As an engineer, she might be able to sabotage them . . . something . . . anything to give the colonists a better shot.

"Psychological warfare, maybe?" Alenko offered, his face twisting behind his helmet's half visor. "Would geth care about that?" He moved to cover the road ahead, Jenkins following him.

Shaking her head, Shepard finished her scans of the spike. Without commenting, she closed her omni-tool and started back up the road, not wanting Nihlus to get too much of a lead on them. Suddenly, she very much wanted his unflappable, stubborn, arrogant ass at her twelve. "Lovely planet you've got here, Williams."

"Yes, ma'am, until this morning, it sure was." Williams said, her face contorted with an expression of combined nausea and rage.

Shepard only made it a few more metres before stopping in a semi-sheltered area that looked as though it had seen some heavy excavation. Brisk hand signals sent Alenko and Jenkins to watch the road ahead and behind. "This the dig site?" she asked, tossing the question over her shoulder. Squinting thoughtfully, she crouched to examine the ground. Lots of heavy, two-toed tracks everywhere.

Williams stepped up beside the commander, her gun sweeping around her in ceaseless arcs. "They must have moved the beacon to the spaceport. It was right there last I heard, but the other squads … they were taken out right away. The rest of my squad … ." She swallowed hard, her words dragging to a halt when Shepard looked up at her. Williams gestured to an open spot in the walls. "The spaceport is up those ramps, ma'am."

Shepard stood and laid a heavy hand on the chief's shoulder for a moment. When Williams nodded that she had her shit together, Shepard mirrored it, then headed out, jogging past Alenko through the gap. Beacon moved, only a few drones and a small number of clean up troops in the way ... she didn't have much time before she was stuck explaining to the entire galaxy how her team let the geth steal the beacon and destroy Eden Prime. "Let's keep moving." She raised her fingers to her ear and opened a channel even as she hoofed it up the ramps. "Kryik, where the hell are you?" She looked to Alenko. "I swear if I have to ask that question one more time, I'm going to plug him myself."

"Closing in on the spaceport now, Shepard. There are a lot of spikes down here, bodies hanging from them. Not many geth. I'm moving forward."

"Wait for us. We're two minutes behind you." She slowed as they reached the top of the ramps, the area opening up into a camp made from prefab trailers. She crouched low, moving at a quick walk. As much as she didn't want Nihlus to get too much of a head start on her, she wasn't about to charge in like an ass, either.

"No wonder Spectres have such short life expectancies," Alenko muttered, his voice a little breathy from the climb. He settled into a slightly crouched walk, a vigilant, professional presence on her flank.
Shepard nodded and motioned for him and Jenkins to check out the trailers ahead. "Williams, stay on my six. Keep your eyes peeled. We'll move up to have eyes on that space port, gentlemen. Join us when you've cleared the trailers."

"Yes, ma'am." The two men jogged toward the first trailer.

Shepard and Williams worked their way forward, sticking to the cover provided by the rocky shelf on the left-hand side of the road. Up ahead, Shepard heard a terrible screeching sound, metal sliding over metal, and looked out. The spikes lowered, folding into themselves. The bodies stuck at the point began to move.

"They're still alive!" Williams called out, jumping forward to help.

Shepard grabbed Williams and dragged her back. "They're not people anymore. Look at them. The geth have turned them into some sort of machines." She brought her assault rifle up, firing on the dessicated-looking machine creatures as they detached from the spikes and lurched toward her position.

Robot zombies, Janey? There's a good chance you cracked your head on a rock falling out of the ship. What's next? Vampires?

Shepard groaned and hit one of the ex-humans with an overload. Her first adventure as a Spectre candidate was supposed to have been all coffee and cake. She peppered them with three round bursts from her Mattock. Coffee and cake run? Bullshit! 'Yes, sir, I'll pick up your beacon for you. No problem.' Throw in a side order of geth and robot zombies. Why not? Fuck.

"I so didn't need this today," she grumbled.

Williams leaned out, firing. "Don't think you've got much choice, ma'am."

"I never do." Shepard took one of the husks down a couple of metres away, then staggered back as it let out a blast of energy. The jolt tore down her shields and sizzled along her skin like someone had dumped a bucket of angry wasps into her armour. 'Ouch! Fuck that. Okay, important note. Don't let them do that." Keeping low, she ran forward, taking cover behind a trash can. She took down another robot zombie and dashed forward again when the way was clear. "Why don't I ever get the cushy pick ups? Shepard, the asari councillor left her poodle on Illium. Swing by and pick it—"

Shepard stopped mid-rant as a screeching roar, like a thousand metal banshees being ripped apart by dreadnoughts, tore through her head. She reached up to turn down the ambient on her aural implants, but it didn't help nearly as much as she hoped. The horrible, mechanical cacophony burrowed straight through her like a case of auditory insanity.

"Sweet baby Jesus, what the fuck?" She pushed forward, her limbs moving with all the ease of rusted iron.

"Holy shit!" Williams squawked, her rifle dropping to her side as her jaw hung slack, her eyes looking up and up.

Shepard looked up, understanding the Marine's reaction as a massive ship blasted off the surface, taking her stomach and all the strength in her knees with it. It stood at least two kilometres tall and looked like a cross between a cuttlefish, a cockroach, and something that would have made her wake up from the nightmare covered in sweat. "What the fuck?" she whispered slowly. Horror stole all the air from her lungs and replaced it with ice. "Kryik, you seeing this?"
"I see it, Shepard. I'm just about at the spaceport. There are a few geth between my position and the platform."

Shepard frowned, tearing her stare away from the massive dreadnought, if that was what it was, seeing the Spectre moving toward the wreckage of a loading dock. He flattened a geth with a blast from his shotgun, seeming very cavalier about the largest, most terrifying ship ever seen. "Do you know what that thing is?"

"No. Stop gawking at it, and get your ass down here." She saw him cast a glance over his shoulder toward her position.

"No need to be a jackass. I've got your six." Grabbing Williams's arm, Shepard gathered all the frayed ends that the space-bound nightmare had unraveled, and moved forward. "Come on, let's keep going."

Alenko and Jenkins appeared at the top of the rise, both stopping, their jaws dropping in unison as their gazes followed the monstrous ship back to space. Shepard caught their attention with a quick jerk of her hand, motioning for them to cover Nihlus's right flank.

Shepard traded back to her sniper rifle. "Okay, my lovely, let's clear the dock for the good Spectre." She scoped the closest geth. The first shot tore down its shields, the second laid it out. She moved forward until the next geth appeared in scope and dropped it as well, clearing the way for Nihlus to move onto the platform. He advanced cautiously, shotgun sweeping the area.

Shepard began to lower her gun, ready to head down and join up with the Spectre. Movement between a couple of tall crates snapped the rifle right back to her eye. Through the scope, she identified the movement as a second turian. The second one wore weird looking silver armour and moved with the same loose-jointed confidence as Nihlus.

Nihlus talked to him. They seemed friendly. Raising her finger to her ear to ask for a situation update, Shepard saw Nihlus turn his back on the other turian to look over the devastation. She relaxed and released the breath she'd been holding.

_Nihlus knows him. It's cool. We're all friends._

She began to lower her gun, aiming to get up and join them, but stopped as the second turian moved. The alarm at the base of her skull went off, sending sharp spines of warning burrowing into her brain.

_Watch him, Janey. He's off._

Slick as shit, the other turian raised a pistol, pointing it at the back of Kryik's head. "Shit!" Shepard's hand snapped to the trigger, but in her haste, the shot went wide, just nicking the second turian's shields. Still, it alerted Nihlus, who spun around and saw the gun. The pair went down in a tangle of limbs, completely destroying Shepard's chance of getting off a deadly shot. Switching out her guns, she leaped up and raced for the dock.

A single shot tore through the air, and the turian in silver scrambled up, running across the platform. Shepard's heart stopped as her eyes locked on Nihlus. The Spectre lay sprawled on his back, unmoving. She bolted to the end of the walkway and leaped down, her ankles and knees letting out yelps on impact.

"Don't you dare die on me, Spectre," she growled under her breath as she sprinted across the grass. "I'm not explaining that to the damned council." The air burned her throat as she forced her legs to move faster, leaping over the wreckage in her way.

"Move in, people," she called, between breaths. "Nihlus is down!"
Saren has tried to kill Nihlus. Shepard winged the silver turian, but was it enough to save Nihlus?

Torin: A male turian of the age of majority. (15)

A fly in amber, held prisoner between horror and rage, Shepard stared. Three, then four, heartbeats surged through her veins, slow and sluggish, before she shook off the shock and charged. Blind fury thrust aside her annoyance with Nihlus, a slick, bile-sour sludge of certainty crawling up the back of her throat. She'd just witnessed the worst sort of betrayal.

Betrayal is betrayal, Janey. If Nihlus trusted that bastard—his friend—that just makes him a fool.

Her eyes riveted to the fallen Spectre, Shepard pushed harder. He'd better damned well be alive just so she could kick his ass. If he'd just stayed with the squad … . She shoved that thought aside and let the nitrous of adrenaline surge through her muscles. Heart pounding hard and steady, she sprinted onto the dock, leaping all four stairs in one stride. As she ran past a pile of crates, she saw the other turian disappear around yet another stack of shipping containers at the far end.

"You think you can destroy a human colony ... take down one of my team and just run away?" Shepard shouted, bringing her assault rifle to bear on the turian's back. "Oh no you don't! No one shoots my people ... not even the annoying-as-shit one!" She pelted across the dock, gaining on him a little as he dodged crates.

Then the other turian reached a down ramp and hit full speed, a hail of bullets chasing him across the platform. He slid around the corner onto the cargo train, going down on one hip before his talons caught hold, and he scrambled up. Bullets chased him the length of the train, but then a large shadow blocked out the sun, slapping Shepard out of her rage-fugue. Looking up and shading her eyes against the brilliant sky, she watched as a ship shaped like a giant bug flew overhead. Geth dropped from it, sending her into a full retreat.

"Shit. Too many." Shepard held her arm out, backing Williams up as well until the wall of crates covered their backs. Spinning around, Shepard turned her attention to the fallen Spectre. They needed him up, gun in hand, to get through the next part alive. When she saw Nihlus sprawled on his back, unmoving, bile began to burn the back of her throat once more.

As she ran, she gestured for the others to follow the fugitive. "Damn it! Williams, Alenko, Jenkins … see where that bastard went. Watch each others' backs." She knelt next to Nihlus, concern replacing her fury. "Hey, Kryik, come on, get your ass up." Squinting a little, she looked him over for blood, but only a thin stream trickled from a graze on his crest. Relief settled back into antagonism. If Nihlus hadn't insisted on running ahead, they'd have nailed that other bastard. Tapping the turian's cheek with the back of her hand, she tried to rouse him. "Come on, damn it, that other guy is getting away."

"The other one took off on the cargo train, Shepard!" Williams called appearing at the end of the wall of crates. "There's a hell of a lot of geth covering his trail."
Shepard looked up without raising her head and snapped a quick nod. Damn, if the day just didn't keep getting better and better. "Understood, Chief." Shepard dropped her stare back to the Spectre's face. Winding up a little, she slapped him, her hand cracking hard and sharp against the tough plates of his face. "Get up, damn it, or I'm leaving your lazy ass behind."

The Spectre stirred, a long groan spooling from his throat as he raised a hand to press against the wound on his head. "Saren ... ."

"Is getting away while you lie there." Shepard leaned a hand on his chest, holding him down as she slapped his medigel. Better safe than sorry. She stared into his eyes, searching for signs of concussion. But both pupils seemed even and reacted to the light. She let out a long breath. "Are you seriously injured?"

He shook his head and pushed against her a little. "No, let me up." His eyes flashed with fury, easing her concern. Good. Anger she could work with.

"Then up and at 'em, Spectre." She stood and offered him her hand, pulling him to his feet when he took it. She made sure he could stand on his own, then trotted after her team. "Let's move, Kryik. I've already spent too long wringing my hands over your fragile bod." Grinning at the muttered curse he sent after her, she nodded. Definitely okay.

Shepard skirted her people, moving down a long ramp. Risking, and taking, a great many hits to her shields, she traded cover for a better sight line and bolted across the train's loading ramp to duck behind cover on the cargo train. The geth had dug into positions further up, the train's sectional dividers providing good cover. In addition, portable barriers glowed here and there. "The invitation didn't say anything about BYOB." She changed guns yet again. "One day, I'll remember to strap these beauties together."

Lifting the sniper rifle, she couched it against her shoulder. A long, slow breath blew between softly pursed lips as she centred her cross-hairs on the flashlight head of a massive green unit barrelling down the train at her. "Come now, Ingrid, me luv," she whispered. "Let's show 'em how we do it sniper style."

"Seriously?" Williams said, a sharp bark of laughter slicing the air. "Ingrid?"

Shepard flattened the green unit, its head erupting in a spray of white fluid. She moved on to a white unit pinning them down with a barrage of rockets. It's head exploded a half second later, giving her a moment to breathe. "What's wrong with Ingrid?" she asked, lining up her next target. "My nan's name was Ingrid." In her peripherals, she saw Nihlus ducking into cover on her flank. Once he took position, she rolled out from behind her barrier and sprinted forward four metres.

"I'm still too stuck on 'do it sniper style' to be worried about the thing's name," the turian grumbled, moving up to take cover at her side. He didn't glance her way, but she saw his mandibles flutter. He peppered two trooper units with shotgun rounds as they closed.

"You're all just jealous ... " Shepard chuckled then waited for a break in a second rocket trooper's fire to send a round through its head. "... but I've gotten used to that." She took out another couple geth and moved forward, keeping herself low. "Alenko, Jenkins, Williams, keep moving up, people. Camp on your own time."

They fought their way up the train, covering one another as they moved. Shepard grumbled the entire way, muttering every time another geth appeared. The other turian's lead grew every second they spent dancing with his geth peons. Finally, the last flashlight exploded in a shower of white crap, and she ran to the train controls. The muscles in her thighs and lower back trembled with fatigue, but she just kicked her feet and shook them out as she brought up the interface.

Her fingers and gaze slipped over the haptic controls, familiarizing her with them. "All right. If I were the 'go' button on a cargo train, I would be ... ."

Nihlus pushed in, his towering bulk shoving her off to one side. "I'm beginning to have major doubts about your general competence and sanity, Shepard," he muttered. The next second, he grunted, the air whooshing from him as she smacked her rifle butt into his stomach.

Remorse smacked satisfaction on the head at his reaction. "Oh, don't be such a baby. I barely touched you. Sensitive there, huh? Good to know since you seem prone to shoving people around." She pressed the control, activating the train. "I could have done that without giving your buddy an extra thirty-second head start if you'd just left me alone." She glanced over her shoulder, meeting his glower and raising him a scowl. "Did they teach you to be a bully in Spectre training?"

"Yes. Did they teach you to be an obnoxious, abrasive ass in N7 training?" he grumbled, rubbing the armour over his stomach.

Shepard stifled a genuine grin, keeping anything real crammed behind her professional, smart ass soldier mask. "Nope. That's an inborn gift right there. Now, go relax until we catch up with your friend." She patted his cheek, a starched smile ironed onto her face. She'd started pressing his buttons to learn what sort of person he was. She'd heard all about his heroic, bad-ass Spectre side on the news over the years, but what he'd accomplished as a Spectre didn't interest her nearly as much as much as the torin, himself. She wouldn't be trusting his medals or citations to have her back when they went into battle. She knew from long years of experience that people like Nihlus didn't give anything away for free; keeping everything locked tight behind heavy barriers. And she knew that she'd have to work to knock clues free.

But that was before the other turian shot him.

Her priorities needed to change. She needed to keep him functional, to beat that dull fog of shock and betrayal out of his eyes. The only way she knew to do that was to piss him off, turn him against her, keep him externalizing the anger and hurt. Others could, no doubt, perform the same task with greater finesse and compassion, but Nihlus was stuck with her. So ... .

He grabbed her wrist and leaned in close, his nose touching the end of hers. "We're going to have some things to settle when we get back to the ship, Shepard." Despite his words, she didn't feel anger coming off him, at least not any aimed at her. She made a convenient target, but what had happened on the platform had shaken him far deeper than he let on. "Stop with the mockery, or I'll put you on your ass."

One corner of her mouth twitched. Good, some fire remained under the brittle glassiness. She didn't know who the other turian was, but she prided herself on knowing betrayal when she saw it. Okay, mission priority shift: keep the Spectre from committing suicide by bad guy ... preferably without angering him to the point of murdering her.

She grinned and reached up to tap the end of his nose with her fingertip. "Oh yeah, I like you. You've got promise. We're going to get along just fine." She winked, backing him off, then shot a glare at the Marines that told them to stow their chuckling.

"So, who's your buddy?" she asked, turning to see how close they were to their destination. They still had a way to go yet. She kept her back to him, removing the pressure of her stare and leaving a vacuum for him to fill. "Another Spectre?"
Nihlus sighed, a low reverberation following it. "Yes. His name's Saren. He was my mentor when I was a recruit." He chuffed as if dismissing the entire thing.

Shepard scowled. Ouch. She policed her voice, keeping her tone even. "Any idea what he's doing here?" Damn, his mentor. It'd be like Anderson trying to kill her. She shuddered, not knowing if she'd still be standing.

She heard Nihlus move to the gate off to the one side, ready to disembark. "None, but I think the conclusion to be drawn here is pretty clear. He wouldn't have tried to shoot me in the head if he was here to stop the geth." His tone clearly declared the conversation concluded. Instead, Shepard turned to face him on a oblique sort of angle.

Shepard shrugged, an empathetic ache coiling in her chest at the rounded set of his shoulders, the way his mandibles hung a little. "We'll see. Conclusions can be drawn hastily. Let's finish clearing out these metal bastards and secure the beacon." She slapped his back as the train ground to a halt. "Come on, Kryik. We've got work to do."

Work, which started the moment she stepped off the train, nearly tripping over a demolition explosive. Her heart stopped, then kicked straight into third gear. "Oh, good, because my day just wasn't nearly fucked enough." She crouched down over it and cracked open the panel. "The rest of you, go ahead, see if there are others. Move!" Her omnitool sparked to life. "Okay, Instructor Myers, let's see if you knew what you were doing in Ordinance Disarming 403."

She pulled a panel, staring for one helpless second at the foreign mass of wires, circuits, and electronics before her engineer mind began to follow the connections and put together the picture. "I really hope I didn't sleep through this module." She pulled the main circuit board and flipped it over. "Okay. Pull wire A, cross it with ... ."

"More disarming; less senseless chatter!" Nihlus said, his voice practically barking in her ear. "There's another one up here."

"And another here," Williams called.

"I've got this one, Shepard," Nihlus said. "Take care of Williams's."

Shepard finished disarming the first device, picked up her rifle and ran after them. She dashed across a short bridge, geth rounds peppering her shields, and slid into cover behind a giant crate. Peeking out, she took stock, just to find another of the green destroyer barrelling down the walkway.

"What is it with the suicidal ones?" She swung out, pounding it with three round bursts from her assault rifle until it went down, along with her shields, and slid into her feet. Stepping over and around it, Shepard strode forward, looking for any more devices, taking a couple of bullets before she stepped behind cover.

"Williams, where are you?" she called, homing in on a waving arm from an alcove ten metres ahead. "Gotcha."

Kaidan hit the wall next to her and gave her medigel. "You're shot, Commander. Do you have some krogan in you?"

She leaned out around him and took out a trooper. "I don't know, I might. Mama was a big woman." With their tell-tale buzz-zap, her shields alerted her to their recovery, and she bolted forward to disarm the next device. "If someone could watch my ass while I disarm this—" metaphorically, not actually Alenko—I'd appreciate it."

He took cover just ahead of her, sputtering. "What? Ma'am ... I'd never! I ... can't ... ."

Nihlus chuckled as he ran by. "You're going to have to throw up some shields there, Lieutenant."

Jenkins took cover across from Alenko while Ashley trotted past, laughing the whole way. "Wow, I've never seen anyone go that red, LT. I think your face might be hemorrhaging."

"Why is everyone joking?" Jenkins hollered, his voice strained and high, almost hysterical. "People are dying! My folks could be dying!"

"Hey, kid," Alenko said, stepping up and allowing Shepard to concentrate on her work, "it's just a coping mechanism. We're still working as fast as we can to make sure Eden Prime stays standing. Breathe and relax a little. We'll get it done. The commander and Spectre Kryik are pros. They've seen a lot worse than this and kicked its ass."

Shepard didn't know if that was true, but let the rest of the banter wash over her as she pulled apart the third of the devices. The timers ticked below two minutes, her heart slowing until it pounded in time with the countdown, each beat thumping heavy and sonorous in her ears. Glancing up, she looked for the Spectre. Where was Nihlus? He needed to find the last one, and quickly. A second later, the sound of his long, heavy stride hammering down the metal walkway eased the breath from her lungs.

The timer in front of her died with the faint, doppler-esque whine of electronics powering down. "Praise be to the great, glowing asses of the Enkindlers," she said, the words tumbling out alongside a sigh. Leaping to her feet, she chased after the Spectre, sliding into cover behind the railing as several geth dropped in on the other side of the bridge. The enemies' angle negated Nihlus's cover as he worked over the last device.

"Damn!" he cursed, a bullet hitting the panel he was working on.

Shepard winced as he snatched his hand back, giving it a reflexive shake. "You okay?" She jumped into the line of fire, using her shields to protect him. Even as she switched guns, one eye kept watch on her shield indicator. Hopefully the damned things held long enough.

"Yeah," he said, sounding grumpy and embarrassed. Poor Spectre, having to depend on someone to cover him. How it must burn.

A slightly manic, battle-high fueled grin answered that idea. "Just keep working." She caressed the rifle's long barrel on her way to the trigger. "Ingrid and I have your back." She couched the stock in her shoulder, and, sighting with practised ease, sent bullets ripping straight through the flashlights on each head. "Bulls-eye, Ingrid sweetie." She kissed the rifle and traded it out. "Kryik, you done back there? Please tell me you're not just crouching there staring at my ass."

Nihlus swung past her, strong and confident. The earlier fog of shock had evaporated in favour of a much more productive, diamond-hard rage. "I was wondering if it came in adult size."

A startled laugh escaped; some fire left indeed. Shepard grinned and hefted her assault rifle, jogging down the remainder of the walkway, cackling to herself. "Come on, people, let's get moving. We've got a beacon to secure."

The familiar screeching of the husk spikes greeted them when they ran out onto the docking platform. Shepard groaned, and started backing up to buy some room as the husks scrambled toward them, dodging and stumbling all over the place.
"It's like that damned retro game at the fairs," Jenkins said, then cursed as he peppered the dodgy things with lead.

"Whack-A-Mole," Ashley called back, "yeah. Could someone tell these buggers to stand still?"

"Or at least run in a straight line, Williams?" Shepard laughed, pounding one down, but close enough that its dying discharge shredded her shields and seared along her skin. "That's going to leave a mark," she muttered between clenched teeth.

"Weren't you supposed to remember not to let them do that again?" the gunnery chief asked, her voice sharp.

"Yeah, and damn, it stings." The last husk down, Shepard traded guns, able to see three geth taking cover behind crates.

"You'll never hit them from here, Shepard," Nihlus called, moving up, trading his shotgun for his HMWSR X.

As she pulled her much older version of the same gun from her back, Shepard didn't bother replying. She preferred to let her bullets do her bragging. Nestling Ingrid into her shoulder, she sighted down the four inches of flashlight head sticking up above the crate. One shot, down. Next. One shot, down. She moved up a couple of feet to get a better angle on the last one, sighted it down. Crack. Ingrid sent a bullet splitting the air, right into the back of the geth's arched neck. Crack. The second one sent it sprawling across the dock in a shower of white fluid.

Shepard sighed, the corner of her mouth lifting, the heady satisfaction of three targets in four shots warming her through. "God, I love you." Trading Ingrid for her equally ancient Mattock, she said, "Come along, Roger, old bean. Let's get this done. Glory hallelujah."

She said nothing to Nihlus as she passed, feeling no immediate need to rub his face in her marksmanship. Surely, if he'd given her a Spectre-candidate recommendation, he'd dug deep enough into her record to know about her one great talent. Well, one of her great talents. She'd yet to find a use or need for cross-country skiing in her work. As exciting as her life could be at times, it wasn't a Bond film.

Movement at the far end of the docking floor caught her eye, apparently at the same time it caught Nihlus's. The Spectre spun around to face the flash of silver armour racing along the walkway between platforms. Fury sizzled through the torin, lightning striking close enough to raise the hair on her arms.

"Saren!" The Spectre raced off in hot pursuit, Alenko and Williams following. Shepard almost called them back, but then just let them go. At least Nihlus would have backup if he actually caught the other Spectre, and chasing Saren around would keep Nihlus busy.

She focused on the tall, slender piece of technology standing ten metres away. Her priority had to be getting the beacon onto the Normandy. The pillar of gunmetal grey glowed with green energy. Something about the fine, emerald nimbus drifting from it stabbed skeletal fingers of dread into her guts. A long, slow scowl pulled her brow into a knot. "Hey, Williams, was this thing glowing before?"

"No, ma'am." The chief's voice wheezed a little over the sound of her boots pounding against the metal decking. "Damn, turians are fast."

Shepard glanced toward the chase, bringing Roger to her shoulder. The second Spectre paused in her sights for the barest moment, glancing back. When he saw Nihlus gaining on him, Saren jumped over the railing, disappearing into the tops of the trees below. Shock paralysed Shepard for a half second before she lifted her scope to her eye and scanned the trees. Nothing. No sign of a mangled corpse tangled in branches. Rushing forward, she scanned the ground. Still nothing.

What the hell? A jump like that could easily break his legs, if it didn't kill—

A thick, metal surfboard zipped up out of the canopy, the silver-armoured Spectre standing on it. Letting out a jagged cough, she stared, jaw hanging. "Great glowing ... Well, isn't that slick as shit?" Shepard lowered her rifle, the all too familiar, toxic sludge of defeat slithering through her gut as she watched Saren fly off over the colony.

"Damn, why don't I have one of those?" she muttered under her breath. She glanced at the young Marine standing just off to her left, his face frozen in a comical mask that shifted between horror and awe. "Jenkins, I have a birthday coming up. I want a flying surfboard."

The corporal gave himself a shake, then nodded as the shock drained away. "Understood, ma'am."

Movement at the far end of the dock, drew Shepard's attention. Sucking in a quick, gasping breath, she braced herself to yell at Nihlus as he raced up to the railing and grabbed it, coiling to leap after Saren. The damned fool would kill himself and for nothing! Then, using a biotically enhanced surge of speed, Alenko lunged, grabbing the Spectre with both hands. Throwing himself backwards, the LT yanked Nihlus away from the long drop, the pair of them tumbling to the deck.

Nihlus leaped to his feet, talons poised to kill and aimed at Alenko.

What did I do to get saddled with this turian and all his fucking drama?

She opened a private channel to the Spectre. "Hey! Kyrik! Stand down. Alenko just saved your fucking life." She hawked up the smoke coating the back of her throat. "Your lover's spat will keep until we get this beacon secured." She shook her head and turned back, joining Jenkins over by a bank of lockers. "Hack these, will you kid? See if there are any mods or ammo."

"We need to know why Saren was here and what he was doing, Shepard!" Kyrik shouted back, his voice a vicious growl. He spun away from Kaidan, turning all his rage on her, and damn, it burned, even across a hundred metres of dock.

"And how does you leaping down thirty metres to break both legs while he flies away on the magical surfboard get us any answers? Stand down. We'll deal with your boyfriend once we get this thing on board the Normandy." She winced as she continued, knowing she was pushing into the truly insensitive. "Come on, get back here, and I'll give you a kiss to tide you over until you get that sweet, sweet turian ... whatever it is you do ... again."

"Fuck you, Shepard!" She jumped at the vehemence behind the swear. He'd been hanging around humans too long. "Don't you know when to just shut up?" His volume practically ripped out her eardrum, the subvocals promising evisceration.

She just smiled despite the grip his rage squeezed around her heart, and closed the channel. As flippant as she behaved, she knew that anger meant that Saren had truly been someone important ... that Nihlus's heart lie in pieces, rattling around the floor of his chest. "That's a boy, get good and furious with me."

Jenkins looked at her and shook his head. "You trying to get shot, Commander?"
"No, but if he's yelling at me, he's not ripping himself apart over Saren betraying him. I can take a little rage if it helps him hold it together until we're back on the Normandy." She slapped the kid on the shoulder and turned toward the beacon, taking a few steps toward it. "That glow can't mean anything good," she grumbled, mostly to herself.

Opening a channel to the Normandy, she called them to come in for pickup.

The hollow, gong-thump of heavy steps on metal alerted her to Nihlus storming up to her, closing on her left ... fast. She waited until the last second to turn. His entire body trembled with fury, murder screaming at her from the brilliant, predatory green of his eyes. He shoved his shotgun into its spot at the small of his back. His fists clenched convulsively, obviously wanting nothing more than to grab her and slam her into the lockers behind her until they reduced her to paste inside her armour.

Shepard just lifted her hand to press against his shoulder, meeting his fury with soft eyes and silent understanding. After a moment, he let out a breath that seemed as though it might deflate him completely. He reached up to remove her hand then stalked off toward the beacon.

"Commander Shepard?" Joker, the Normandy's pilot called. "Incoming for pickup."

"Roger that, Normandy. On my signal. Ground team leader out." Shepard turned to the other three. Alenko and Williams ran up, panting like they'd sprinted three klicks. "Come on, people. Let's get this package ...."

Shepard caught movement out of the corner of her eye, instinct sending her bolting forward. An energy field erupted from the beacon, grabbing hold of Nihlus and dragging him forward. Damn it, she knew that thing meant trouble. Sprinting across the metres that separated her from the Spectre, she launched herself at him. Before she could throw him clear of the field, it grabbed her as well.

"Crap!" She didn't have the momentum to get either of them loose. Then a bolt of electricity seared through her body, jerking her rigid, her teeth clenching together so hard it felt as though they'd shatter, wiping out any thoughts but for the pain. Her nervous system erupted in blinding flashes of agony that carried with them images too horrific to truly comprehend. Screams ripped from her throat despite the paralysis, screams that shattered into silence upon touching the pure, cool air.

Flashes of death at the hands of an impossibly powerful foe tore through her mind, lightning scorching her synapses, feeling as though it burned the images onto her soul. Born of nightmares that left the dreamer mad and drooling, synthetic monsters ripped through the galaxy, leaving planet after planet desolate and bare. Absolute desolation. Utter annihilation. They corrupted everything they touched.

A second, massive blast of energy ripped through her, incinerating the images and the agony, allowing merciful darkness to fall.
Mass Effect - Future Imperfect Chapter Three

Chapter Summary

Nihlus saved, beacon destroyed. What else could happen.

The world came into focus in starts and fits. Standard-issue starship ceiling blended into the nightmare visions then back. One hand lifted to her temple as she squinted up at the concerned face of a standard-issue Alliance medical officer. "Lights … in my eyes," she grunted, shifting her hand to cover the piercing glare. Oh wow, her head … . She squeezed her eyes shut, the pain easing back once the light wasn't stabbing her, but then the vision from the beacon invaded.

Despair ... terror ... screams beyond counting .... 'No hope. The cruel gods have abandoned us'. Endless slaughter ... brutality ... corruption. Running towards an embrace once loved ... then pain ... sorrow …. 'What have they done to you?'

'Four of us remain. Only four, and you get too close. After so many missions, after all your training, you panic and step into an indoctrination field. Foolish ... careless .... Now, die with your masters, traitor.'

Preferring pain to the nightmare downloaded into her head, Shepard opened her eyes again, blinking slowly. "I'm back aboard the Normandy?" she asked, keeping her voice low.

"You are, Commander," the doctor said, her voice harsh and clipped. Shepard winced at the volume as Chakwas continued, "How are you feeling?"

Shepard held up a hand, waving a little to try to back the doctor down a couple of notches. "Like I tried to cure the worst hangover ever by lobotomizing myself with a coat hanger. Show a little mercy, Doc … whisper? Please?" She let her hand drop across her stomach, her eyes defying her to sag closed again.

"Apologies, Commander. Would you like something for the pain?" The doctor appeared in Shepard's field of vision, omnitool active, face professionally concerned.

Cool relief and gratitude washed through her at the significantly lowered volume. Painkillers? Images splashed crimson with blood flashed through her mind, pulled forward by the sudden yank and twist in her guts. Fuck yes, she wanted drugs. Enough to send her into sweet, pain-free, nightmare-free oblivion. "I'd send you flowers every week for the rest of your life." Shepard hesitated, chewing on her bottom lip a little.

You know you can't, Janey. Just grit your teeth and bull through it.

Shame and embarrassment tangled up with the need. "But um, non-narcotic, please, Doc?" Damn, she hated this part of a new assignment. That and explaining the scars when anyone saw them for the first time.

"Of course, Commander."

Shepard let out a long breath and relaxed into the gel mattress as she heard the clipped, efficient stride cross the medbay. Wait … she was forgetting something. Eden Prime, beacon, nightmare …
oh, sweet baby Jesus … the pain in the ass Spectre … . She opened her eyes and lifted her head to find the doc. "How's Spectre Kryik? Is he okay after the whole beacon incident?"

A dual toned rumble answered instead of the doc. "I'm fine." Ah yes, there it was, the stick-driven-so-far-up-my-ass-it-rattles-against-my-back-teeth attitude she remembered so fondly.

Shepard's head flopped back onto the mattress. A heavy thump of feet hitting the floor was followed by three strides and then the very pissed-off face of a turian shoving itself into her field of vision. Shepard let out a long, moaning sort of sigh. Kryik had to be seriously furious for his temper to show through the rigid plates. She wondered vaguely if his eyes were loaded … probably best to check the safety was still on, or that glare was going to put thirty holes in her.

"You're welcome," she groaned. Pressing her palm against his brow, she pushed him back, buying herself enough room to sit up. "Back up, big fella." The agony in her head trickled down her spine and into her limbs as she settled into a sloppy pigeon pose to stretch her back and hips.

Nihlus jerked back violently enough to throw himself off balance. "What?" The word hit her like a slap, along with some spit.

Gross. Wouldn't have pegged him as a spitter.

A sarcastic, disappointed sigh preceded her reply, "Sorry, just figured the reason you were hanging over me is that you couldn't wait to thank me for saving your ass when the beacon grabbed you." She swung her legs off the side of the bed, her head falling like she'd dropped it. She caught it in her hands, her elbows hitting her thighs before she stopped collapsing. It felt as though a hundred squirrels had gone rampaging through her brain searching for nuts. Normally she wouldn't have minded. Nuts … oh yeah, everyone agreed she was nuts, so normally she had plenty to spare. But whatever the beacon had done to her had replaced all her lovely nuts with nightmares.

"Well, at least you know you're still insane. That's a start.

Shepard slapped duct tape over her internal voice's mouth and tilted her head a little to look at the doctor. "How long have I been out?"

"Fifteen hours," Nihlus supplied, bristling until he loomed like a giant vulture waiting to attack. "The beacon exploding overloaded both our systems. I regained consciousness a half hour ago. What happened to you in those seconds, Commander?"

Shepard stared at him from under heavy-lidded eyes for a moment before she shook her head, more trying to sort out the mess in her head than anything. "I saw things, flashes of death and terror. Then I blacked out. The rest … maybe it was a dream? But I saw synthetic soldiers … abominations … killing organics. Mass slaughter. There were also organics being fit with cybernetics or something. That part was … gooey." She winced and let her hands take the weight of her head again. "I don't know, it's all a jumble. All I can tell you for sure was that there was a terrible sense of doom and terror." She pressed the heel of her hand against her right eye. "Except … it feels like there are huge pieces missing. Blank spots."

A noisy breath whistled through the Spectre's nose as he nodded. "I experienced much the same thing. Nightmarish visions but large blank spaces." Nihlus grumbled and paced a few strides one way and then back, his agitation growing rather than abating. "You should have just left me alone. Maybe it would have been just fine."

"Yeah, if I'd left you alone, you would have woken up with all this crap in your head. Can't say I'd complain about that." She sat up straight, shoulders squared and pointed, pain and annoyance throwing up a forest of pikes all pointed his way. "Oh, wait ... no, you wouldn't, because if I'd let you have your way, Saren would have blown your head off before we got close to the beacon. So, maybe get off my back a little." She slid down of the table, bracing herself against the edge until she could be sure her legs intended to hold her.

Nihlus let out another long sigh, her shot hitting true, chipping away some of his arrogance. "Saren was my mentor. He saved m—" He shook his head. "I never imagined ... . Afterward, I needed to catch him and find out what he was doing there ... put a bullet in him."

"Yeah, well, we don't always get what we want, do we?" She kept her tone soft.

"Great!" Nihlus spun on his heel and strode to the door. He turned back before walking through. "You interfere with the beacon, get it blown to hell, and that's what we have to show for your incompetence? A vision of ... nothing."

"Me? My incompetence?" Shepard stormed after him, pressing in on him. "You're the idiot who charged ahead again after I saved you from the fuckup you caused when you charged ahead the first time. Did it hurt your ego that the little, fragile female human had to save you? Hurt that bloody stick-up-your-ass pride that Saren completely pulled the wool over your eyes?" She backed up a step, glad to see some fire kindle behind the dead shock in his eyes.

Nihlus drew himself up taller and broader, and she could see the iron set along his spine. Wouldn't hurt to push a little harder. At least anger wasn't flailing, and she knew that in his place, she'd be flailing if she didn't have somewhere to focus the energy.

A cold, hard smile cut across her face. "Let me guess? You're so supremely confident in yourself that it never occurred to you that Saren might be able to trick you?" She scoffed and turned away. Despite her back being turned, every sense remained fixed behind her, partially to keep a read on his emotions, partially to know if a punch flew at her. "My incompetence?" She flung a disgusted gesture as if tossing the idea to the other end of medbay. "I spent the whole damned mission saving your ass."

Nihlus drew himself up taller and broader, and she could see the iron set along his spine. Wouldn't hurt to push a little harder. At least anger wasn't flailing, and she knew that in his place, she'd be flailing if she didn't have somewhere to focus the energy.

A cold, hard smile cut across her face. "Let me guess? You're so supremely confident in yourself that it never occurred to you that Saren might be able to trick you?" She scoffed and turned away. Despite her back being turned, every sense remained fixed behind her, partially to keep a read on his emotions, partially to know if a punch flew at her. "My incompetence?" She flung a disgusted gesture as if tossing the idea to the other end of medbay. "I spent the whole damned mission saving your ass."

Shepard stalked back to the table and moved to hop up on it, but a large, long-taloned hand grabbed her arm, jerking her around to face the Spectre. He pushed in on her, trapping her up against the table. She stared into his eyes for a second, not knowing what she saw in them. It looked like she'd hurt his feelings. Yeah, he looked like she'd slapped him.

You aren't thinking that Nihlus actually likes you, are you? Don't be stupid. Stop projecting. Just because you had a—

She doubled up the duct tape and catalogued the Spectre's expression away for later as it disappeared, seven feet of fury looming over her.

"Watch yourself, Shepard. I have a limit to what I'll tolerate." His voice rolled low, the sub-vocals pounding against her chest like a jackhammer covered in cotton-batting.

She pushed back, forcing her voice down into her chest then channelled it so that it resonated through her head as she replied, "And you've reached mine." He might tower two feet over her, but when it came to intimidation, she'd learned to make up in attitude what she lacked in stature.

"Unless you want to find out what it feels like to have a tiny, human female peel back your plates, you'd better be hitting on me, Kryik," she continued, keeping her voice to the low, dangerous growl. As intended, her remark startled him enough that he backed up a step.

"You just need to keep your mouth shut sometimes," he grumbled, then released her and turned away. With each step, his shoulders slumped a little more, the anger fading far faster than she'd thought it would. "I'm used to working on my own, not sticking with a squad. Saren … ." What came out of his throat sounded like the bastard child of a growl and a keen. "I screwed up, bought what he told me about why he was there. I never thought … ."

She watched him from under half-closed eyelids as he gathered the shreds of his dignity tight around him. He expected a great deal from himself. She could see that plain as the mandibles on his face. One corner of her mouth twitched up in a reluctant smile as the pieces fell into place, and she understood. She amounted to little more than a stranger. Saren had been his mentor and friend nearly as long as she'd been alive. Way easier to blame everything on the new guy. Yeah. She got that, and she could bear that for him until he reached a place where he could take the blame back and put it where it belonged.

Still, she couldn't resist the urge to prod him a little. "You going to blame the beacon being destroyed on me, Nihlus? Make sure I never become a Spectre?" She hopped up onto the side of the bed, allowing the disappointment to hit home as she heard the words out loud. "I think that's pretty much covered, don't you?" Damn it. Being the first human Spectre would have been something. Shepard shook her head and reached up to run her hand through her short, red curls. Oh well, it didn't really matter in the grand scheme of things. The vision from the beacon … what happened to the protheans … Saren … that mattered. "Oh well," she said, "Look at the bright side. If the council rejects my Spectre candidacy, at least you won't have to deal with my incompetence as your partner."

He stared at her, his mandibles dropping and flicking. For a moment, she thought his expression might be disappointment, as if he hadn't considered that their mentoring relationship would die before it began. Then the heartbeat passed, and he chuffed a little, his mandibles pulling tight before he turned and walked out the door.

"Don't leave it on that note, Janey. Throw the torin a bone for pity's sake."

"Hey, Kryik ... you're welcome. It was my pleasure to have your back," Shepard called after him. "Just so that you know ... you can count on me having it, no matter how big an ass you are." She softened the last sentence, taking the sarcastic edge out of her voice. She did want him to know he could trust her to have his six. "And for what it's worth, I'm glad Saren didn't kill you." The corner of her mouth tugged into a fleeting, crooked smile.

He glanced over his shoulder, his mandibles fluttering a little, and he rumbled low in his throat. After a moment, he nodded once, then continued toward the stairs up to the CIC.

Shepard slumped, the headache pounding like a prisoner trying to smash its way out of her skull. "Hey, Doc … about those meds?" She collapsed down until her head rested in her hands again. Damn, they'd gotten so wrapped up in beating one another, they'd forgotten about the vision from the beacon. Somehow, between them, they'd have to figure out what that thing packed into their heads.

"Apologies, Commander," the doctor said then administered the injection, "but I didn't think it was safe to step between you."

Shepard tilted her head and glanced up, catching the glint in the doctor's eyes. She gave Chakwas a tired smile. "Probably wise, Doc. Probably very wise."

A moment later, the doors opened, Anderson striding through, all hard-edged efficiency. "What the hell happened down there, Shepard?" Despite his tone, he walked right up to her and reached out to grip her forearms. "Are you all right?" Turning to look over at the doctor, he levelled his worry on
"Is she all right?"

Shepard smiled and nodded. She squeezed his wrists before pulling away. "I'm fine … Dad." Grinning at his expression, she continued, "The mission however, went completely FUBAR thanks to our resident Spectre and his buddy." Shepard slid off the table. "I spent the whole time chasing Kryik, and when we got to the colony, it was swarming with geth, all working for another Spectre." Cocking a hip, she leaned against the bed, the hard edge digging into the bone. "He almost killed Kryik … tried to shoot him in the back of the head. I sniped him, but he bolted before I could take him down. By the time I got our Spectre back up on his feet, Saren had a massive head start."

Anderson bristled. "Saren?" He shook his head and paced back to the door. "I suppose I shouldn't be surprised. He's always been news of the worst sort." Turning back, he gestured for her to continue. "Sorry, Shepard. Go ahead."

"Saren slowed down our pursuit with enough demo charges to flatten the colony. By the time we reached the beacon, he'd activated it … used it as far as we know." She pantomimed the adventure in miniature as the adrenaline gripped her again. "While I was calling for pickup, Kryik got too close. The damned thing grabbed a hold of him and started pulling him toward it." Her right hand drifted back up to hold her brain in as it made a break for her eye socket. "I grabbed him, tried to throw him loose, but then the fucking thing hit me with some sort of mind blast. It left a vision of a synthetic-led armageddon behind." She shrugged and tried to drop her hand, but it just migrated back to her eye. "Some seriously crazy shit is going on here, sir. Seriously crazy shit. Kryik seemed just as blind as we were, but that other Spectre … ."

Anderson nodded and paced back and forth across the narrow medbay. "Yeah, Saren Arterius. Powerful—damn near untouchable. One torin black ops squad." He chuckled but it came out cold and hard enough to raise the hackles on the back of Shepard's neck. "As you may have guessed, I've had some experience dealing with him. He hates humans. He thinks we need to be sent back to Earth like unruly children."

Shepard watched her oldest friend and adoptive guardian stride back and forth for a moment, as agitated as she'd ever seen him. Whatever their history was, it wasn't pretty. It was also a matter for another time. "He wanted that beacon in the worst way. He wasn't there to spank some humans. That was just a fortunate side effect."

She shook her head and let her hand drop to her side. "We're so screwed, Anderson. Forget the crazy shit inside my head and what it means … because that is a string of 100,000,000 christmas lights that will need an asari matriarch or someone close to untangle … ." Both hands lifted in a small hiccough of a shrug. "The council's going to be pissed as hell over the beacon blowing up. Kryik might be able to mitigate that a little, but they're going to use this to slap us back as hard as they can."

Uttering a grumbling sigh, Anderson stopped pacing and returned to stand, facing her. He looked old and tired, and for a moment, her throat tightened up. What in hell's name had happened between him and Saren? He took a deep breath, cracking his neck to either side, then the age and weariness disappeared back behind the mask of rank and duty. "All right. Politics, topic A. Now for B … the beacon vision? Of what?"

Shepard reached up and rubbed the back of her neck. Her ears still rang, and she wished the large group of taiko drummers would move on and take up residence inside someone else's skull. "I saw synthetics butchering people. It was a slaughter, literally billions dead. I saw other images, cybernetics being implanted into flesh … people turned into monsters … it's all just a jumble of horror." She stretched her neck, trying to ease the ache. "It's not all there, though. I think Kryik and I split the information."

Anderson stepped forward to squeeze her shoulder. "That's probably why the beacon exploded as well. The both of you being caught in it overloaded it. But, at least you seem all right." He ducked down to look her in the eye. "Are you? Don't lie to me."

Shepard gave him a lopsided grin and nodded. He couldn't help being the dad. He'd stepped into that role in a heartbeat that day on Mindoir, and refused to put it down regardless of her age. "About as all right as usual." She let out a long breath, her shoulders collapsing a little. "Don't worry, I'll shake this off."

Like we shake everything off given enough time or mass quantities of illegal substances.

How had the voice gotten out of the duct tape? She slapped it back on and forced herself to focus. "Regardless, we need to tell the Council. If Saren wanted this information, there has to be a reason."

Anderson nodded to himself, and she could see the wheels turning as he set their course. "Head up to the bridge, and tell Joker to bring us in to dock with the Citadel."

Shepard let out a long sigh and nodded, straightening to give him an affectionate salute. "Yes, sir. I don't suppose now is a good time to ask you to send someone else to do your pickup on Eden Prime?"

Anderson chuckled and returned her salute before reaching out to squeeze her shoulder. "Way too late for that, Shepard." He strode to the door, then stopped and turned around. "Besides, if everything had to go tits up, I'm thankful as hell that you're on it. Just ... for the love of God, try not to torture Kryik any more than absolutely necessary." He winced in the way only a father can when thinking of his daughter dating the local bad boy. "I know he's got that whole tough guy, army-of-one thing you can't resist, but if he shoots you, there's going to be paperwork til doomsday."

"No promises, sir, but I'll do my best." She reached out to snag his hand, giving it a quick squeeze. "I'm fine. I've got this under control."

"Sure you do." He walked out the door, back straight and shoulders square. "I'll start the paperwork now."

Shepard grinned and leaned back against the bed as the door slid shut. "Weird fuckin' couple of days, Shepard. Weird fuckin' couple of days." She looked over at Dr. Chakwas. "Am I free, Doc?"

The handsome woman straightened from her 'carefully not paying attention to the conversation' hunch over her computer. "As the proverbial bird, Commander. If the headache persists, come back. I'll give you another analgesic."

"Yes, ma'am." Shepard tipped an invisible hat brim to the lady and headed out the door into the mess. Spotting Alenko sitting at the dining table across the room, she detoured his way.

When he saw her coming, he moved to stand, but she waved him back down. She never could stand the useless ceremonies of command.

Probably why you make such a good N7. No pesky people cluttering things up with interaction and feelings. Gross.

Sometimes she wished she could slap her inner voice. Instead, she plastered on a smile and sat across from the LT.

Alenko returned the smile. "Glad to see you're going to be okay, Commander," he said, sounding genuinely glad. That alone was noteworthy.

Could she even remember the last time someone didn't have a heavy layer of false give-a-damn coated over everything they said to her? It felt … odd, but sort of nice at the same time.

And then … "Yeah, the crew would have cried endless rivers of tears had I bought the farm," came out. She winced.

Way to make friends, Janey.

She leaned back and folded her arms. "So, you came back okay? No undue trauma?"

"Yeah." A wide smile spread across his handsome face. What was going on? A genuine smile to go along with genuine concern? "Can't say a mission under your command is boring, ma'am. Probably take Nihlus the better part of a week to file his report. You sure gave him a run for his money." The smile disappeared as the lieutenant flinched and reached up to rub his brow. He squeezed his eyes shut and rolled his neck, obviously in pain.

"Headache?" Shepard asked, a concerned scowl forming. "Maybe you should go see the doc. Did you hit your head or anything during the fight?"

Shaking his head, he looked up and gave her a weak smile. "It's no big deal, just a side effect of my amp." His hand fell back to his side. After a moment of silence, he said, "Shame the beacon got blown to hell. Council's going to use this to beat concessions out of the Alliance. Wouldn't be surprised if Kryik helps them along, even though he totally dropped the ball turning his back on Saren."

Shepard shook her head, surprising herself as a spark of protective pique flared behind her sternum. "No, Nihlus is a good torin, an honourable soldier. And, give him a break over what happened with Saren." She shrugged. "Saren was Nihlus's mentor back in the day. Kryik had just as much reason to trust him as I do Anderson." She shrugged, that pang of empathy echoing through her again. Damn, it would sting … no, it would cut the heart straight out of her. Maybe she should search out the Spectre and check on him.

She stood and gave Alenko a genuine smile in exchange for his. "Oh well, I'd better check on Williams and make sure Jenkins's stories don't get too wildly removed from reality. See you later, Alenko, and take care of that headache."

Williams stood by herself over against the wall by the door to the Captain's cabin looking awkward and about as uncomfortable as Shepard had ever seen anyone look. She walked over. "Hey, Williams. Welcome to the Normandy. How are you holding up?"

"Thanks, Commander. It feels a little strange being here, leaving Eden Prime behind." The Marine straightened and shook her head. "Sorry, Commander, don't mean to grouse. You saved my ass and the colony."

Shepard cocked a hip and crossed her arms. "Don't worry about it, Williams. Hell of thing you did, staying alive with geth blasting their way through the colony. You come back okay, no major holes?"

Williams nodded. "Yes, ma'am." A small sigh escaped, giving Shepard some insight into the Marine's emotional state under the professional decorum. "A lot of good people died down there."
Shaking her head, she squared her shoulders and clenched her jaw as if needing the mask to keep herself under control. "I've lost squadmates and friends. It's part of the job. You deal, and you do better the next time to honour them." The mask cracked a bit. "But civilians... Aren't we supposed to be out here to keep them safe?"

Shepard nodded. "We do the best we can, Williams. We don't always succeed the way we'd like, but there are a lot of people still alive on Eden Prime because of you and the rest of those Marines." She saw a glimmer of an expression cross Ashley's face—one she knew all too well. Sometimes the suffering of the few felt as though it outweighed everything else.

The chief slapped the mask back in place, a bitter smile cracking it. "The bird sure fucked things up. Thought you might plug him yourself."

Shepard straightened, her empathy for Nihlus outstripping her previous annoyance and turning her spine into a rod of molten fury. "That 'bird' has saved thousands of people and kept the galaxy safe from a hell of a lot over the years," she said, her voice snapping a little more harshly than she would have liked. "I never want to hear a turian, particularly one serving aboard this vessel, referred to in that manner again, understood? We all fuck up. The day we forget that and stop forgiving other people their fuckups... well, that's the day to pack it in." She leaned closer to the Marine's face. "Is that understood?"

Williams paled, her lips pressing together, angered, but seasoned enough to know that the next slap would be right off the Normandy. "Yes, ma'am. Sorry, ma'am."

Shepard nodded and relaxed, respecting both the chief's anger and her control. Shepard had never really learned the second. "We're coming into the Citadel. If you've never seen it, you should get somewhere with a view. It's something to see." She gave Williams a smile that amounted to a quick press of her lips and headed for the stairs to the CIC, calling back, "I still remember my first time. Not something easily forgotten."

Greeting people as she passed them by, Shepard made her way to the bridge to find Nihlus already there. He stepped back as she stopped behind Joker.

Joker glanced back over his shoulder. "Hey, Commander, just in time. I was just bringing us in," the pilot reported.

Shepard didn't respond, stepping to one of the ports to look out at the nebula. "It's beautiful."

"It's the most impressive structure in the galaxy," Nihlus said, his voice echoing the pride of someone who made it his home.

Shepard threw a quirky smile over her shoulder and shook her head. "I meant the nebula. The Citadel is just a very large chunk of metal covered in people." She blinked in the face of his surprise. "A city is a city, Kryik. This one is just a little more impressive than the others." Looking back out the port, she sucked in a delighted breath and grinned. "Now, there's a thing of beauty."

"Destiny Ascension, flagship of the Citadel Fleet," Alenko said from the co-pilot seat. When she looked at him, her eyebrows raised in a silent query about his headache, he nodded. He did look better.

Shepard listened to them discuss the asari dreadnought, and to be sure, it was impressive, but like most asari ships, something about it made her uncomfortable.

"You weren't talking about the Ascension, were you?" Nihlus asked from just behind her ear. He pressed close enough that his heat envelope warmed the left side of her back and the heady scent of his cleanser or turian deodorant, or whatever filled her nose, making it hard to think.

_Damn, he smells good. What is that? Sandalwood and some sort of spice?_

She chuckled and shook her head. "No, it looks like something that should be trying to eat us." Her smile widened as he chuckled, and she ducked her head a little, sheepish. "I was talking about the _Normandy_. Look." She stepped back so that he could see the _Normandy'_s faint reflection on the nebular dust.

"You've been to the Citadel before, Commander?" Alenko asked, glancing over at her.

"Yeah. Quite a few times. I have family here. Well ... of a sort." She smiled and looked past Nihlus to watch the light play on the dust. Space formed the ultimate dichotomy. Such vast, empty, terrifying darkness, sprinkled here and there with a beauty that made her heart stop and her eyes refuse to blink for fear of missing even a second of it. She loved it and hated it in equal measure. _Just chalk it up to the crazy._

"You have a problem with civilization, Shepard?" the Spectre asked, pulling back and facing her. Unlike before, his eyes had lost some of the predatory gleam. In fact, his expression could best be described as lost.

She softened in kind, a smile just brushing over her lips as she shrugged. "Not at all. The great loves of my life are Roger and Ingrid, and without civilization there wouldn't be all the things necessary for their creation." She looked into his eyes, eyes travelling along the strong lines of his face and the brilliant white of his familia notas. A proud beauty arched through the curve of his neck and angles of his body even under, or maybe because of, his armour.

"Ingrid's the sniper rifle, so Roger must be the assault rifle?" He shook his head a little, some spark returning to his gaze. "You're a strange human." He smiled, and there it was. Again. Warmth in his stare, and an expression that seemed to be saying that he wanted to tell her something, but couldn't find a time or a place or a way to say it.

Okay, fine, you aren't making it up. But don't lose your mind until you know what it's about.

"Yes, yes, I am," she said, forcing herself to focus on his words rather than the way he looked at her. She sighed, giving a weak, little shrug. "I don't hate what people build, I just think a lot of beauty gets trampled over in our attempt to show how impressive we are. I prefer things a little more understated." She laughed, the sound coming out more like a cough, as a wide grin erupted at her own hypocrisy. "Well, except for me. I'm far too amazing to go low key."

Straightening, she turned toward the door. "Might as well get ready for the firing squad. I can work on my report until we dock." Nodding to him as she passed by, it occurred to her for the first time that maybe, just maybe, having to work with the Spectre might turn out all right … if the council didn't crucify her over the beacon fiasco.

_Way to stay positive, Janey._

She managed to get her report nearly complete by the time Anderson called her on the comm, tracking her down in her hidey hole in the back corner of the small gym.

"Shepard. Grab the ground team from Eden Prime and meet me in Ambassador Udina's office."

"On my way, sir." Shepard extricated herself from the corner behind the mats and headed to her locker to suit up.

Don’t forget to pack your cigarette and blindfold.
Chapter Summary

What could make meeting with Udina and the Council even more fun? Probably nothing, but if anyone can find a way, it's Shepard.

"The beacon destroyed, rogue Spectres, geth attacking human colonies outside the Veil." The human ambassador threw up his hands and stormed away a few metres. "You were sent on a simple pickup run with what we were assured was one of the council's best Spectres aboard. How did you manage to screw this up so completely, Captain?"

"Hey!" Despite all her assurances to both Anderson and herself that she'd hold her temper, Shepard stepped forward, unable to let the ambassador's diatribe go on unchallenged. "The captain didn't screw anything up. Nihlus didn't screw anything up. If anything intel screwed up. We went in to be completely blindsided by that other Spectre." Try as she might, she couldn't keep the sneer of distaste off her face.

His cologne, expensive and liberally applied, turned her stomach. No one who played people like chess pieces the way the ambassador did should smell that good. She controlled her urge to punch him, helped along by seeing how hard he was fighting the urge to haul off and deck her. She narrowed her eyes and stared at him until he backed away. They'd been down the bitch-slapping road before. Admiral—then Rear Admiral—Hackett hadn't been amused when their brawl spread until it spilled out of that bar on Arcturus Station into the corridors. It had taken nearly two squads of Marines to break up the resulting furball. Good times.

"Above and beyond?" The ambassador's voice derailed her trip down memory lane. "And yet the beacon is destroyed, and Saren escaped without any proof he was even there, is that about right, Commander?" His voice dripped disdain. Her hands balled into fists.

"Yes, that's about right, Ambassador." She made a show of flexing her hands, earning a grumbling sigh from Anderson. She relaxed and shook her fingers out. "When the beacon overloaded, it put out an EMP that wiped the recorders in our hard suits. However, we do have five people who witnessed the entire thing."

Udina's oily stare slid over the others. "Brought your entire crew, Anderson?"

"Just the ground crew from Eden Prime in case you had any questions for them, Ambassador." The captain kept himself so cool that Shepard both envied him and felt the sudden urge to smack him. She held the last one in check. Her history with Udina wasn't Anderson's fault.
"I have their reports. I assume they are complete?" Udina looked at Shepard and curled his lip. She wondered if he'd 'lose' her report just to spite her.

"Actually, Ambassador, I broke my giant pencil while I was writing mine up. Can I borrow the one stuffed up ...." Anderson thumped her from behind, and she stumbled forward, almost landing with her face in Udina's chest. She reeled back. Everything about the man dragged her back to Elysium, and she had no desire to return there in any form. Once more, she shoved down the rolling of her stomach.

Udina's eyes narrowed with enough hatred that Shepard checked her armour to make sure his scorching-laser glare wasn't burning holes through it. "You've done more than enough to endanger your candidacy for the Spectres. I suggest you stop while you're ahead, Commander."

The ambassador pressed in on her again. "I wish Spectre Kryik had seen what a monumental mistake putting your name forward would be before he'd done it." He shoved her back a half step. "Try to rise above your base nature, Commander, before you embarrass humanity any further." His voice lowered to a bare whisper. "I know how difficult it will be for you." He spun on his heel and strode to the door, a lightning storm in a suit. "Meet us in the council chambers within the hour. I'll be sure you have clearance."

Shepard swallowed the knot of rage, humiliation, and bitter memory that tied itself in her throat. Acid burned up her esophagus. "I embarrass Earth? Ambassador, I go out there every fucking day. I bleed and I sweat, trying to keep all the bad things in the galaxy away from our people, but inevitably, I end up walking through wastelands where good men and women ... innocent children have been taken by slavers or slaughtered by pirates." She took two steps toward him, her entire body bristled, blades set to cut and cut deep. "You do your job, and you do it pretty damned well, but until you're prepared to go out there and take my place instead of just taking the applause for what I accomplish, you have no right to call me an embarrassment to Earth." Shepard bit her tongue as soon as the words came out, but then of course, they'd already escaped.

"For God's sake, Shepard," Anderson said, growling the words out between his teeth. "Can't you leave Elysium behind long enough to avoid screwing this up?" He let out a sharp but understanding sigh and pressed his hand down on her shoulder. "Find a way to stow the attitude before you get to the council chambers."

"Anderson!" The ambassador's call sent the captain hurrying, rigid and furious, out the door.

"Crap, I shouldn't have let him get under my skin." Shepard sighed as the rest of the team walked up beside her. "I hate that man so very much, and I don't hate many people. I'm cheerful, easy to get along with ... work and play well with others." She sighed again.

"Yeah, that's the exact description I was thinking, Commander," Ashley said, a sardonic grin on her hard, pretty face. She stepped up beside Shepard. "So, we head for the council chambers?"

Shepard raked her fingers through her hair. "Nah, Nihlus and I can handle that mess. You guys go do something that doesn't involve listening to pontificating politicians. Take Jenkins to a club, get him loaded, and take vid." She grinned at the young Marine as his face turned scarlet, then reached out and laid a hand on his shoulder. "Go to the embassy staff, see if they can help you find out if your folks are okay. Yeah?"

He nodded, a slow, relieved smile replacing the stark terror of a moment before. "Thanks, Commander."

"Come on, Jenkins," Alenko said, clapping him on the back. "We'll come with you. Can't hurt to Shepard gave Alenko a grateful smile as the three headed out. When the door closed behind them, she walked to the balcony railing and looked out over the presidium. It would be beautiful if it didn't all reek of artifice and politics. She closed her eyes, tilting her face up toward the fake sky. Even the sun on the Citadel was a lie. It didn't bode well. She felt Nihlus walk up beside her but didn't look at him. Anderson was right. She needed to find a way to avoid going off during the meeting with the council.

"Are you going to stick with that story through the council meeting?" Nihlus asked from just behind her left elbow. He pressed in, turning a little to lean against the balcony railing.

Shepard opened one eye to look at him, then closed it again. "What story? Oh, you mean the one where I didn't chase you halfway across Eden Prime and save your ass twice?" She smiled to soften her words as his mandibles fluttered and dropped. "Nah, I figure that I'll retract it at the last second and let you swing. I just want to see Udina's face when I change my tune. It'll be a moment to treasure." She dropped her chin and pushed away from the railing, suddenly weary all the way down to the marrow of her bones. "Let's go get this over with. My rejection as a Spectre candidate awaits."

"I sent my report on Saren back as soon as we got off Eden Prime. Hopefully they've started investigating him," Nihlus muttered as he followed Shepard to the door. "I'd be willing to take the hit for letting my guard down if it meant having hardsuit data to prove he was there and what he was doing."

Shepard shrugged as she stepped over the threshold and turned down the corridor. "Fall on your sword on your own time, Kryik." She trotted down a short ramp. "While I'm thinking about it, it's probably best you don't mention getting half the vision."

His scowl deepened, but then he nodded. "They don't need any more reasons to suspend me."

"Exactly, and it's always good not to throw all your cards out on the table. For now, pull your balls out of your designer handbag, gird your loins, and man up." She turned to look him up and down. "Where do you keep your balls, anyway? Do you even have any?" The adorably bashful look on his face told her all she needed to know. "Hm. Interesting. Note to self: research this at a later time." She chuckled, a possibility occurring to her. "Ooo, is that why it hurt so bad when I hit you in the gut?"

Nihlus just sighed and fell in beside her as she trotted down the stairs toward the embassy lobby. "You and Udina have a history, don't you?"

"Picked that up did you?" She led the way down the presidium, eating up the distance to the massive tower at a smart jog. "Yeah, we do, including at least one brawl at a memorial ceremony and a bar fight." Cutting off his comment with a slice of her hand, she shook her head. "And no, neither time did I take the first punch. He quite possibly hates me more than I hate him. I represent everything he had to fight in this galaxy." A small shrug dismissed it. "I don't even blame him, really. Every time a major catastrophe has befallen a human colony, I've been it's poster girl."

She stiffened, hoping he'd take the hint as she slapped up an invisible wall between them. Some things she just didn't talk about.

Sighing, she looked up at the tower. As much as she hated the idea of having to suck up to the council all the time, being the first human Spectre would've been something. And, despite the fact that she knew Udina had been trying to land a solid blow below the belt, the fact that she might have embarrassed humanity stung.

You've got bigger concerns, Shepard. The petty war between you and Udina, even being made a Spectre is nothing compared to Saren, so take your own advice and suck it up. You can flagellate yourself later.

Right. She threw the past into a crate in her brain-attic and focused on Eden Prime. Whatever Saren had been up to on the colony, she doubted it stopped there. Why would he recruit the geth to steal a beacon? It didn't make any sense. Maybe he wasn't the one in charge. The geth could be controlling him somehow.

She stopped at the base of the tower, a big green bug with huge eyes catching her attention. "Ooo, check out the green cutie. I take it this is a Keeper?" she asked, glancing over her shoulder at Nihlus. At his nod, she leaned closer. "I've been here dozens of times, but have never seen one before. I guess we don't have the same hangouts."

"Please do not disturb the Keepers," the Avina terminal next to it said.

Shepard ignored it. "Hey there, little guy. Dear, sweet baby Jesus, you are just the cutest." She giggled happily. "Look at the purple backpack. Okay, I just died a little. Damn, he's—"

"Please to not disturb the Keepers," the terminal said again.

Shepard stepped around the Keeper and crouched next to the terminal. "This thing's annoying."

"Shepard, what are you doing?" Nihlus stepped up and grabbed her shoulder. "Leave it. It's just an automated message."

"Yeah, and … ?" Shepard glanced around to make sure she wasn't being watched before popping open a panel and tinkering for a moment. She activated her omnitool, hacking into the terminal. The Spectre pushed in closer, as if trying to hide her from view. "You're going to get arrested. There are a dozen C-Sec in the area."

"Yeah, and if you push your groin any further into my face, we're both going to get arrested for public lewdness, so back up a bit." She finished and closed the panel. Standing, she stepped around him and bent over to look into the Keeper's eyes, just barely managing to control her urge to hug it. "Don't worry, little buddy, I've got your back."

"Can we just get up there?" Nihlus grumbled, holding out an arm to usher her away from the scene of the crime.

"Sure."

Shepard led the way to the elevator. "They really are cute. Think I could convince one to come back to the ship with me?" Glancing over at him, she met his glare with a wide-eyed, guileless smile and a shrug. "What?" Nihlus just shook his head and looked front.

After a minute or so of silence, Shepard cleared her throat. "So, Nihlus … the night I woke up to find you peering at me while I slept … what was that about?"

He looked down at her and frowned. "Peering?"

"Yeah. I woke up, and you were standing right over me, staring." She bristled. "It was sort of creepy."

He laughed and shook his head. "I was walking by to get some sleep myself, and you were kicking at the blankets and muttering. I shook you awake." He shrugged, his head doing the odd little neck bobbing thing that made up for lack of shoulder mobility. "It seemed like a terrible nightmare. I apologize if I offended."

Shepard chuckled and gave a stout nod. "Thanks. Okay, so in hindsight, not creepy. Good to know."

What felt like a lifetime later, they stepped off the elevator and through a small room into the council chambers. Shepard whistled softly as her eyes traveled up past the fountains and rock gardens. Despite its beauty, the entire place gave off bad vibes. She didn't belong in a place like that. Hell, she didn't belong within thirty klicks of a place like that. It took all her pride and every ounce of self-confidence to stop herself from shrinking down into her armour. Instead, she took a deep breath and puffed herself up.

"I like it," she said, nodding as she looked around. "I'll take a room on this floor, concierge." She strode between the glowing, blossoming trees and up a set of stairs. She could see Anderson waiting at the next set of stairs and locked onto him, using him as an anchor in increasingly heavy seas.

"They sure want you winded when you get there, don't they?" she grumbled, trotting up next to him, covering her nerves with surliness. Butterflies fluttered through her guts, trying to gnaw their way out into the world. Damn things. She really needed to switch them out with acrobatic elcor or vorcha ballerinas.

"Please try not to be yourself," Anderson said, keeping his voice low. "Your Spectre candidacy is nearly dead in the water as it is." When she didn't reply, he stopped and turned to grip her elbow, as close to a hug as he got in public. "I mean it, Shepard. Keep the smart-ass shit tied down. These people don't give a crap, and they won't hesitate to eviscerate you."

"Fine," she said and growled. "I do have a small measure of self-control, Captain." Despite the rumble in her voice, she felt affection rather than annoyance. For almost a decade and a half, Anderson had proven to be her only shelter in a cold, brutal galaxy. No matter how brusque he got with her, she knew it originated from wanting the best for her. It wasn't his fault that he hated watching her follow a course destined for self-destruction.

"Really? So, you've just been hiding it the last thirteen years?" He sighed and let his hand drop. She saw a smile flirting with the idea of appearing before he killed it.

Grinning, she took a deep breath and turned toward the long gangplank to the council. "Well, yeah, of course. I've been waiting for the perfect time to spring it on you." She gave him a wink and strode up the walkway to stand just behind Udina.

The council stood across a wide gap from the platform that supplicants stood on, presumably to keep from being throttled by the aforementioned supplicants. Shepard glanced at the guns on her back, taking a buffet to the shoulder from behind. Apparently, either Kryik could read minds or he'd had the same thought about a few metres not making any difference to a bullet.

"Our colony was all but destroyed by the geth!" Udina protested, the pitch of his voice setting all the hair on the back of Shepard's neck on end. "Geth led by one of your Spectres!"

Shepard looked up at a large holo of the Spectre in question. Saren didn't look like other turians. His hips and waist were all wrong, his fringe crazy long, and what was with the glowing eyes?

"Do you have evidence that Saren was behind the attack?" the asari councillor asked. "All these reports say is that another turian was present in the colony." The councillor's composed regard turned to Shepard. "All the reports other than yours seem to indicate that Spectre Kryik was culpable in his own attack, and thus for the suspect escaping."

Shepard stepped up. "I was a great deal closer to the incident than the others, Madame Councillor. Spectre Kryik approached the platform at the docks. Saren stepped out from behind some crates. They spoke, and there was no indication that Saren presented a threat at that time. I saw him raise a pistol, but instead of firing, I moved to radio Nihlus to ask for confirmation. When it became apparent that Saren intended to kill Nihlus, I fired, but it was in haste and my shot went wide." Shepard took a deep breath and squared her shoulders, clasping her hands behind her back. "It's my responsibility that he got away and that Spectre Kryik was injured. By the time we caught up with him again, Saren had activated the beacon, but he escaped."

"Isn't this charming? Couldn't find anyone else willing to join your conspiracy, Captain Anderson? Had to pull in the adopted delinquent?" Saren asked, his voice one part barely controlled rage, one part condescension. "Why is it that every time humanity accuses me of something ridiculous, you're behind it, and there is never any proof?" He threw a dismissive gesture at Shepard. "It's this human's word against mine, unless Nihlus has anything to say."

"You leave Shepard out of what's between us, Arterius." The captain moved to stand just in front of Shepard. "You and I know the truth, and one of these days, I'm going to prove you're dirty." The tone of Anderson's voice sent shards of ice and splinters of steel ripping down Shepard's spine. She'd never heard him speak with such vehement hatred and rage.

Saren just laughed.

Shepard touched Anderson's arm, moving him off to the side. She glanced over her shoulder, then backed up so Nihlus could approach the end of the platform. God, she hoped he didn't do anything stupid, not after she'd just thrown herself on his sword.

"It happened as Commander Shepard stated. I turned to find a gun pointed at my head, Saren and I fought, and he escaped. We followed him to the docking platform and discovered that he'd activated the beacon. Saren was just leaving the area. I pursued, but he eluded me." As he said the final words, Nihlus looked up at his old mentor with a cold fury that curled the corner of Shepard's mouth into a grudgingly appreciative smile.

"And what of the beacon?" the salarian councillor demanded. "We sent two competent agents to retrieve it and somehow it ended up destroyed."

"When we approached, Saren had already activated it, Councillor. When I walked over to investigate, an energy field began to pull me in. Commander Shepard threw me clear, but was caught in the blast."

"The beacon gave Shepard a vision," Anderson called out.

"A vision of what?" the turian councillor asked. He glanced up at the holo then shifted from foot to foot and clasped his hands behind his back. Shepard scowled as she watched his mandibles flutter. They dropped which usually meant suppressed emotion of some kind, and the quick flutter … . A knot tied in her gut, her stare sharpening, looking for more clues as she wondered just how much the council knew about Saren's activities.

Shepard looked from councillor to councillor for a moment, getting the distinct impression that telling them meant throwing good energy after bad, but she related what she could of the nightmarish images. A vacuous silence filled the gap between them as she finished.
Shepard studied their faces, her blood turning to sludge in her veins. What she didn't see concerned her more than what she did, and what she didn't see was surprise. They knew. She and Nihlus hadn't presented a single piece of evidence that the council didn't already know. Damn it. She forced herself to stay still and appear as calm as possible. If they were involved with Saren, she certainly didn't want to let them know she'd guessed as much.

"Am I to try to prove my innocence against dreams, now?" Saren's mocking laughter dropped down on her like sleet. "There is no proof of anything other than the fact that Spectre Kryik has been spending too much time around humans, and that his little protege isn't suitable to be a Spectre."
The corrupt Spectre stared over Shepard's head at Nihlus. "Your feelings overrule your head far too often, old friend. I hope you clear your vision where that one—" Those eerie eyes turned to Shepard, snap-freezing her in place. "—is concerned."

Shepard shook off the momentary terror and smiled, as warmly and sweetly as she could manage while shooting him with mental death rays. Even though she and Saren had never met, she felt a sort of betrayal at his words, maybe on Nihlus's behalf, or maybe on behalf of her species.

Udina jumped forward, a furiously petulant finger rising to jab at them. "That is not his decision to make."

Her stomach dropped as she looked back to the council to see them glancing back and forth, all of them waffling. She shouldn't have expected anything different from politicians. Every single stupid, FUBAR thing in her career traced its origin back to a politician. Cutting a sharp glance over at Udina, she swallowed a lead billiard ball's worth of hatred. Nothing ever changed.

The asari councillor held up her hands, and Shepard was pretty sure Tevos rolled her eyes at Udina—she empathized with the impulse. "This hearing is not to decide Commander Shepard's candidacy for the Spectres." She glanced to the salarian on her left and the turian to her right, both shaking their heads in a way that told Shepard everything she needed to know. The moment she and Nihlus set foot on Eden Prime, they'd been shot down. The only mistake they had made was not dying there.

Tevos gave her lovely head a firm, decisive nod. One Shepard recognized well from her childhood—that 'I don't want to hear another word on the subject' nod. "We find that there is not sufficient evidence to prove that Saren had anything to do with the attack on Eden Prime or the destruction of the prothean beacon. This hearing is adjourned."

Shepard let out a long breath and looked up at the gloating holographic turian, holding the electronic blue gaze that drilled into her. Fury poured down her spine, setting like cement. Oh yeah, they'd meet again. Next time, he wouldn't get away. She gave him a slow, exaggerated wink and turned away before the hologram vanished.

"Well, that went awesomely, didn't it?" Shepard sighed looking first to Nihlus then Anderson. She edged toward the elevator, every nerve ending prickling as though someone had stuffed her clothing full of nettles. None of them could let their guard down. Lies hung heavy, tangled, and deadly in that nest of vipers dressed in fine clothes and genteel manners.

"We've got to find proof that Saren's dirty," Anderson fumed. He strode for the elevator, a storm gathering along the horizon, all barely contained thunder and lightning. She snagged his hand, holding him back, and gave his fingers a quick squeeze before releasing him. Spinning around, he met her eyes, then let out a sharp breath through his nose and nodded.

Her lips pressed thin in a tiny smile before she turned her attention to the ambassador.
"You don't have to do anything, Captain," Udina said, even more pompous for having been summarily dismissed. "Anything you found would be ignored as part of your grudge against Saren." He twisted his face into a grimace that said he'd rather tongue-kiss a crocodile than speak his next words, and looked at Shepard. "We have one chance to see you made a Spectre, Commander."

"Prayer?" She nodded and glanced around. "Sure, there's got to be a church here somewhere."

"I'll speak to Alliance brass, but I'm fairly sure I can convince them to go along with my plan. You'll be promoted to Captain and placed in command of the Normandy. Hopefully, if you look the part, and actually manage to discover some evidence against Saren, the council will forget this entire debacle."

"Captain?" Shepard laughed. "Oh yeah, the brass will love that. Most of the admirals would have busted me down to serviceman third class by now if it wasn't for my frackin' Star of Terra." She looked to Anderson, quite proud of having managed to substitute for the curse. He just shook his head. She cast an accusatory glare at the ambassador. "Although, that bloody medal was your idea as well, wasn't it? Slap a pretty, heroic face over what happened on Elysium."

She pushed that aside and started toward the elevator. "Besides, you can't just cut Anderson out of this." She glanced to her CO. "What's the deal between you and Saren, anyway, sir?"

He sighed and shook his head. "That's a story for another time and a lot of alcohol, Shepard. The ambassador is right. I need to step aside, and the Alliance needs to get you accepted as a Spectre."

Shepard scowled, but choked back her arguments. She'd dumped enough crap on Anderson's shoulders already. Time to grab a shovel and start digging her way out of the ruins. "Okay, so where do we start looking for evidence against Saren?"

"I'll approach C-Sec," Nihlus said. "I have contacts who can tell me who was working on their investigation."

Anderson nodded. "Talk to Barla Von, a financial advisor here on the presidium. He owes me a favour, and he might have some information that will help."

"He's an agent for the Shadow Broker," Nihlus confirmed.

"Shadow Broker?" Shepard grumbled, looking from one to the other. "You all need to stop talking in code. It's getting annoying, and my inner bitch is starting to get twitchy."

Anderson chuckled and reached out to squeeze her shoulder. "Shadow Broker is an information trader. Very powerful. Talk to Barla Von, he might be able to help."

Shepard stepped into the elevator, the three males following. No one spoke on the way down. Udina busied himself sending messages back and forth with Alliance command. By the time the door opened, he turned to Shepard.

"Congratulations, Captain Shepard. You've just been given your first command."

Shepard shook her head, nearly choking on the urge to kick him in the ass. "In the time it took to ride the damned elevator. Back at Arcturus, Mikhailovich is going to be having so many kittens, they'll need to call animal control." She sighed. "God, I hate politics. I don't want promotions I haven't earned, Udina."

Udina struck out toward the embassy, his back stiff, shoulders puffed out. "Perhaps if you played nice once in a while, you'd be … ."

Shepard ignored him, deking over to the keeper. She leaned down and whispered. "I think I love you, cutie."

"Please do not disturb the keepers," Avina said, "or Ambassador Udina will spank you like a bad, bad monkey."

Shepard managed to hold in her smirk and keep walking, but she was pretty sure she heard Nihlus chuckling as she passed him.

Shepard stopped next to Anderson and gave him a quick, tight hug. "If I don't see you again, sorry about the Avina terminal." She stepped back and gripped his arms. "Watch Udina. I wouldn't put it past him to keep you here as a leash on me." She shot a glance at Kryik that turned the Spectre's back to them, then kissed Anderson's cheek, flushing a bright red as she did. "Take care of yourself, Anderson. I'll see you."

He nodded. "Just bring yourself home, kid. The galaxy needs you."

She grinned and shook her head. It had been the same line since he pulled her out from under her father's corpse. The Alliance or the galaxy … or hell, the consumer economy needed her. Never him. Still, she knew the truth, and that was all that mattered. "I'll do my best, sir."

Spinning on her heel, she strode off, trying not to grin too widely as Udina shouted into his omnitool, his arms gesturing madly. All she made out from that distance was the fury, and she sent a mental apology to the poor tech person on the other end of that call.

"Proud of yourself?" Nihlus asked as he fell in step beside her.

She nodded. "I am, in fact. Damn promotion." She shook her head. "I bet the brass back on Arcturus are all having litters of kittens about this. Well, except Hackett. He's probably grinning from ear to ear, but he always did have a slightly off-kilter sense of humour." A faint nausea rolled through her guts. The elcor troupe bringing in their gear?

Captain? You can barely remember to brush your teeth, Janey. How the hell are you going to captain a ship? You're the lone operative ... the rogue wolf who needs no pack ... you know, all that romantic shit you con yourself with. Are you really up for this?

Nihlus stared at her for nearly a minute, the expression on his face almost comical as he very obviously tried to figure her out. In the end, however, he just shrugged. "Why are you so unpopular with your command structure? You've been awarded almost every medal, award, and commendation the Alliance gives out. Your record is exemplary."

Shepard stopped at the cab stand. "They don't have any issues with my abilities; it's my abhorrence of being paraded about like a show poodle that sticks in their gullet. That's the short of it. For the long version, we'll have to get to know one another a whole lot better, and I'll have to be a whole lot more shit-faced." She looked into his eyes for a few seconds then nodded her head toward the cab behind her. "I'll meet you back aboard the Normandy."

"You're going somewhere? Alone? Now?" He frowned, his mandibles fluttering in a very uncertain way. "You saw what was going on in there, didn't you? We were never supposed to come back from Eden Prime."

Shepard nodded. "Yeah, I did, and I have no illusions about my odds of making it through this thing, so I'm going to go take care of a little personal business before we have to bug out of here.
I'll be aboard within the hour."

He nodded and backed away. "Very well. Keep sharp."

"You too." She opened the cab and climbed in, watching until he ducked into an alley, heading for the wards and the C-Sec Academy. Her trip took just under eight minutes, soaring along unfamiliar traffic routes. Whenever she'd been to the Citadel before, she'd stuck to the wards.

The cab settled into a parking spot out front of a non-descript building next to a park area. She sat there for long moments, watching the patients and their attendants moving around the gardens. It looked as though a wheelchair basketball game was either about to start or had just ended. Taking a deep breath, she dropped her shoulders, plastered a smile on her face, and stepped out of the cab.

The moment people saw her, they called out greetings. Shepard waved but hurried to the door. She didn't have time to greet the entire rehab center individually. Somehow she knew that if she was even a couple of minutes late, Nihlus would put out a call.

"Hey, Shepard!" a middle-aged man called, wheeling himself through the front door. He stopped and tossed the basketball in his lap to her. "Going to come play with us, beautiful?"

Shepard chuckled as she caught it. "Hey, Sam, you old flirt." She tossed it back. "No basketball for me today. Sorry. Where is he?"

"Inside, painting. He's been pretty blue the last few days. Maybe you'll be just what the doctor ordered." He lifted a hand. "See you later. You still haven't answered me about our movie date."

Shepard walked to the door. "I'm onto something pretty huge, right now, but as soon as I have a couple of days, I promise we'll go see something." She blew him a kiss and pulled the door open.

Voices of staff and patients alike called out to her as she made her way through the halls. It had been a couple of months since her last visit, and it stung to see how happy everyone was to see her. She really needed to find more time. Stopping in the doorway to the art room, she smiled, spotting the handsome young man sitting in the light from the window, brush moving over the canvas in front of him. After a moment, he stopped, and his head turned toward her. He sniffed and grinned.

"Please tell me you haven't been boxing with Udina again," he said, his voice muffled and indistinct. "I would know his cologne anywhere."

Shepard laughed, forcing aside everything but how good he looked. "Actually, I can truthfully say that." She stepped inside the door, but didn't walk over to him, giving him the chance to show off a little.

"So, you two were making out, then?" The young man chuckled as he slipped a pair of sunglasses over his eyes, seating them into clips at his temples. Standing, he walked over to her, making his way around tables and chairs without the slightest hesitation. By the time he stopped in front of her, he smiled ear to ear.

"You look beautiful today, Shepard."

"So do you." She grinned and reached out. "Come on, give us a hug."

He wrapped his arms around her and pulled her close. "I've missed you."

"I've missed you too, kid." She kissed his cheek, swallowing hard. Her heart ached with awe at how far he'd come. "It looks like the latest round of implants is working great."
"Yep." He pulled back and grinned, reaching up to touch the tip of his finger to her nose. "I can still only see your freckles in my memory, but the rest is right there." Laying his hands on her shoulders, he asked, "How long can you visit?"

"Not too long. I'm up to my eyeballs in disaster."

He laughed. "As usual."

"Yep, as usual." She took his hand, squeezing his fingers. "Come on, let's go sit in the garden. You can fill me in on all the news."
Chapter Summary

Shepard and Nihlus spend a little time getting to know one another.

Shepard looked up from her desk as knuckles rapped against the door. “Come in.” She turned her chair to face Nihlus as the turian entered. “What can I do for you, Mr. Big Bossman?”

He let out a low, rumbling, clicking sound that didn’t translate. “You could stop working so hard to be a pain in my ass.” After walking a couple of steps into her quarters, he stopped and stood, rigid. His tension vibrated through the room, her skin prickling in response. Nihlus felt like a time bomb, and she couldn’t decide the best way to deal with him; work on defusing him or build him to detonation.

Shepard wrinkled her nose and nodded. “Yeah, I probably could, and I might once we reach an understanding.” She shifted around to rest both arms on the chair back, regarding him with an even stare.

He bristled, the deep green of his eyes flashing, but some of the tension sloughed away. “Oh? And what understanding is that?”

One corner of her mouth quirked a little. “That I’m not some raw FNG who will follow you around, hanging off your every word and begging you to let me worship at your feet.” She grinned when she saw him realize she was teasing.

He chuckled, his broad shoulders dropping visibly, even beneath his armour. “Nor would I expect you to.” Flexing his mandibles a little, he ducked his head. “I recommended you because you’re a pain in the ass. You don’t do what you’re told just because it’s expected, and you aren’t afraid to step out of bounds if the mission requires it.” One hand drifted toward the end of the bed. “May I sit?”

Shepard nodded. “Sure, knock yourself out.”

In the few strides it took him to cross the floor, she ran a quick inventory, comparing the torin she’d heard so much about to the one she’d met a couple of days before. She tossed out the picture she’d held before she met him; she’d overblown that image into something no one could live up to. As her eyes followed the lines of his familia notas, she saw a softening, not of drive or honor, but something that made the Spectre more . . . human, for lack of a better word. Before Saren’s betrayal, she’d found him arrogant, but that had eased back.

He sat, then turned to look at the bed. “Why is this bed built for two people, but so that they have to sleep apart?”

Shepard shrugged. “The fun part only takes half a bed, and then afterwards, the bed gives the perfect excuse not to have to cuddle.”

His brow plates rose and his mandibles spread and fluttered. “Does the Alliance encourage liaisons between their captains and crew?”

Shepard shook her head. “Quite the opposite. Fraternization is a court martial offence.” She shrugged. “I’d never sleep with anyone under my command anyway. Makes maintaining discipline a pain in the ass.” Her quirky smile returned, and she flipped her hands in an exaggerated shrug. “On this boat, I guess that just leaves you … and you don’t like my bed.”

He cleared his throat, but held her stare. “You can’t help yourself, can you? You have to … push my ... buttons. I believe that’s what your people call it.”

“We’re going to be partners.” Shepard shrugged, taking note of the sudden pulse that thumped just below his mandibles. “So, yeah, I want to know how you respond to stimuli.”

“Keep pushing that particular button, and you’ll find out.” He met and held her gaze. Shepard didn’t look away, knowing he was testing her. She just cocked an eyebrow. “So, did you come in here to see if you could double-dog-dare me into having sex with you, or are you saving that for another day?”

He grumbled something that her translator missed, but she caught the gist of it anyway and grinned. She’d been called worse. Letting out a long breath, he stood and paced to the door and back. “Actually, I came to thank you for what you said to the Council. I was prepared to tell them the truth about what happened with Saren. You were right. I let my guard down, and I shouldn’t have.” He grumbled. “And I shouldn’t have lost my temper and risked the mission.”

“Yeah, I know, but of the two of us, you had the better chance of convincing them to take Saren as a serious threat. Who knew that it would be for nothing. Idiots.” She looked down at her paperwork.
“They’re cautious,” he replied, his voice softer, conciliatory. “They’re three people responsible for the lives of billions of beings from a multitude of races. Saren has protected the galaxy for a long time.” He sighed. “He’s done a lot of good. I wanted to be just like him, once.”

Shepard winced, wondering if she should even bring up her suspicion from the meeting with the council, but decided on full disclosure. If he rejected her idea out of hand, it would tell her a lot about their partnership. “I thought I saw something pass between the turian councillor and Saren near the end of the hearing.” As she said the words, she felt stupid for saying them, but then before he could respond, she asked, “Why would they take his word over yours? Of the two of you, you have the cleanest record.”

Nihlus winced enough for her to know that he’d asked himself the same question.

“What if they’re covering for him?” she pushed. “Will any evidence we bring forward convince them?” When he didn’t answer, Shepard nodded and gestured for him to take a seat again. “So . . . Saren. Attacking colonies to steal prothean tech is new, but his hatred of humans isn’t.” She looked up, holding him with a frank stare. “Right?”

He nodded. “Yes.”

She watched him, trying to read his body language. Trying to read turian faces proved to be an unreliable source of information, but body language translated a lot closer to parity. She kept poking him to read him, and grudgingly, he was teaching her. Saren’s betrayal wounded him, but more than that, it had thrown everything he knew and believed off center. She needed to play it cool with him as much as she enjoyed tossing him around. It wouldn’t take much to tip him off his fulcrum.

Even though it pained her, she decided to play it straight. “Do you know where it comes from? Is it just a race thing, or is there more to it?”

“He’s had some bad run-ins with humans. His brother was a general in the war against your people. His brother died. Not during the war, but Saren seems to blame humans for it anyway. Saren’s not like me, charming and talkative, so I don’t really know much more than that.” Despite his attempt at flippancy, his eyes stayed sad, almost lost. He hadn’t been given enough time to process anything. He needed quiet and a chance to think. Neither of which he would get for a bit. They needed to track down evidence on what the hell Saren was doing.

“At least we have some leads to follow. He can’t be allowed to get away with this.” Nihlus ignored her invitation and continued to pace.

“Hey, Kryik.” When he turned, she nodded toward the bed. “Sit down. You’re wearing out my deck plating, and it’s new.” He turned to look into her eyes, and she tipped her head toward the bed again. “Sit. This isn’t something you can walk off.”

He let out a soft chuff of air and sat. “What happened to the twitchy inner bitch?”

Shrugging, Shepard stood and moved over to sit on the bed, pulling a knee up between them so she faced him. “Meh, she’s worn out. Udina does that to her.”

He turned slightly, matching her posture. “You’ve had run-ins with him before?”

She shrugged. “Yeah, I may have accidentally . . .” She cleared her throat. “. . . set his hair on fire at a memorial once. Stupid candles. His reaction may or may not have led me to make his life a living hell while we were both on Arcturus.” A soft, wry smile curved her lips, and she left it to his imagination as to whether or not her story was bullshit. “So, what about Saren? How did you two end up as jedi and padawan?” When he scowled at her in confusion, she just blinked and shook her head. “Mentor and student.”

He took a deep breath, the air whistling a little through his very flat nose. “The turian military has a Spectre training program for finding suitable candidates. I was chosen to continue on.” He shrugged as if it were the easiest thing in the galaxy to get chosen as a Spectre. “Saren wasn’t the best Spectre in the galaxy at the time. He was hard on me, showed me a lot I wanted to live up to.” His voice dropped to a near whisper. “A lot I didn’t as well, but . . . he saved my life. I owed him everything.”

Shepard found herself staring at the way the end of his nose moved when he talked, although she had a feeling that if she squealed over it like she had the keeper, he’d probably shoot her. Still, might be worth it.

When he stopped talking, she nodded. “It’s got to feel like someone shot you full of polonium rounds.”

“Doesn’t matter, does it? All that matters now is making sure he doesn’t do anything else.” He stood. “I heard from my contact at CSec. We’re looking for an Officer Garrus Vakarian. He was in charge of the investigation. However, he’s since disappeared off the radar. My contact said he would try to find him. We need to meet Harkin in Chora’s Den.”

Shepard shrugged. “Nice place?”

He chuckled. “If your taste runs to seedy bars, tits shaking in your face, and overpriced drinks.”

Shepard made a face. “Really not my scene. Never seen the appeal of asari strippers personally, and hell, if I want to see human tits, I just have to look down.” She did so. “Yep, still there.”

He just shook his head. “Hopefully Harkin can help us find Vakarian. If the drunk little maggot is just stringing me along, I’ll rip his arms off.”

Nodding toward the door, she said, “Come on. It’s about the time places like Chora’s Den start filling up with undesirables.” She stepped past him, leading the way to the door.

“Do you know anything about Vakarian?” she asked as they headed across the mess area toward her locker.

Nihlus shrugged. “Not much.” He fell in beside her. “His father is a legend on the force. Garrus has a reputation for being a hothead who doesn’t think much of the rules.”

“Oh my, a rebel. However will he fit in with us?” Shepard chuckled. She raised a hand and waved to Alenko over at his station. “Hey, Sport, suit up, and fill your pockets with singles. We’re going out on the town.”

“Singles, ma’am?”
"We’re hitting a titty bar, Lieutenant. Got to be prepared.” She laughed as Kaidan blushed a bright red. “Whoa! Damp that down there, Alenko. I’m getting a sunburn.”

Kaidan fled for the elevator.

“Wow, note to self: can’t tease that one. He’ll burst into flames.” Looking over at Nihlus, she noticed the turian wringing his hands a little. She needed to keep him out of his head until they had time to sit around and talk him through everything. “So, Kryik. Why do turians wear gloves all the time? I’ve never seen one of your people without them.”

“Social convention from interacting with the other races. The gloves make our talons look more friendly … less deadly.”

“Really? Now you’ve got me curious.” She nudged him a little with her elbow. “Come on, let’s see the deadly.” She shrugged into her undersuit, smoothing it out before starting at her feet, sealing her armour in place.

He chuckled. “You really have no sense of personal boundaries, do you? We only take them off around family and close friends.” He pulled his hands behind his back.

Shepard gasped. “I’m wounded. After saving your life twice, and taking the hit with the Council, I thought we were working ourselves to a good place, Kryik … somewhere special.”

“Spirits,” he grumbled. “Fine, if you’ll just shut up about us going somewhere special.” He pulled off one glove and held out his hand.

“Nice.” Shepard took it between both of hers, ignoring the small gasp of surprise that escaped him. “Not as hard as I thought. Calloused too. Love a man with callouses.” She ran her fingertip along the sharp foretalon. “Very nice.”

“No boundaries,” Nihlus sighed.

Shepard grinned. “Maybe not, but now I know where yours are.” She looked pointedly at his hand then winked at him and clicked her tongue. “Very nice indeed.”

“I’m never going to know where I stand with you, am I?” He pulled his glove back on.

Shepard stopped and turned. “You’ll always know exactly where you stand with me, Kryik.” She gestured back and forth between them a couple of times. “This little game … that’s just me figuring you out. When push comes to shove, you’ll never have a single doubt of where you stand.” She settled her right gauntlet into place then jerked her head toward the elevator. “Let’s get moving.”

She got into the elevator and held the door, waiting. After nearly a minute, he strode around the corner and stepped in beside her. Looking up at him with a wry grin, she said, “You’re loving the hell out of the game. You know you are.”

He just cleared his throat and stared straight ahead at the door. “You wield your sexuality like a weapon.”

She nodded. “Damn straight. It’s the only one no one has any shields against.”
Shepard stepped out of a taxi at the closest transit station to Chora's Den. She could already hear the terrible, repetitive techno music. Sighing, she shook her head. "And me without my earplugs."

"We agree on something at last, Shepard," Nihlus said, brushing past her.

"Be still my heart. When do I book the church?" She walked to the door leading out onto the walkway. She held up a fist and took cover against the wall, shrugging Roger into her hand. "Hostiles galore trying to look casual just outside the door to the club." She crouched and rolled through the door, taking cover behind a railing. "It looks like a Thugs-R-Us convention."

"It's them!" one of the krogan yelled.

"No shit, morons." Shepard peered over the top of the railing. "Sweet baby Jesus, that's a lot of bad guys."

A squad of twelve turians, krogan, and asari started moving toward them, spreading out to trap them. She hit a small cluster of them with overload to take down their shields. "Kaidan, sabotage as many as you can manage." She waited until he used his tech attack then got up and opened fire. She stood and side-stepped down the wall, launching her drone into the middle of the herd to sow a little chaos. Roger had one down and another one just about flatlined when the enemy flanked them on the left, moving to cut them off from retreat back to the transit stop.

"We can't stay here, Captain," Kaidan called as his shields went down. He rolled back out the door and took cover.

"Yeah, I picked that up." Shepard followed, covering for Nihlus. Her drone expired in a flash of light, so she spawned another, drawing the attention of a couple enemy. Another half second later, her shields went down. Why wasn't Nihlus moving back?

"Come on, Kryik, pull back." Shepard heard the roar of a krogan just in time to somersault behind the Spectre and out of the charge. The krogan slammed through the barrier and tumbled down into traffic. "Shit!" Shepard cried. "That's some fucked up shit, there."

Two bullets hit while she grabbed Nihlus by the cowl of his armour and yanked him back toward Kaidan and the doorway. "We've got to retreat, get some cover, dammit."

He spun, slapping her hand away. "I decide when I retreat."

"My squad, I decide, or are you better at killing things when you're dead?" She kept Roger moving, trying to force the attackers to stay behind cover. A warp flew at her from the left, slamming her to the floor, feeling like every molecule of her body was being torn apart. When it passed, she stayed on the ground and crawled out the door before getting up.

"Damn, that smarts." She took cover behind the wall, trying to keep the bad guys off Kryik's ass.
"One of the asari down," Kaidan called.

"Good job, LT. Next time your lift is cooled, let me know, we'll combo one of those two krogan over the edge." Nihlus's shields went down. "Kryik, get back here before I shoot you in the head myself just so I don't have the distraction of worrying about your stupid ass."

Finally, he backed through the door.

"Lift ready, Captain," Kaidan called.

"I'll overload, you grab him." Shepard leaned out and brought down the krogan's shields. He ducked for cover, but Kaidan was on the ball and grabbed him before he could get too far down. Bellowing, the enemy brute sailed through the air and then fell down through the traffic lanes.

"The enemy are at half strength," Kaidan called. "My amp is starting to get uncomfortably warm."

"That's what guns are for, Sport." Roger took out another asari as she tried to shoehorn her way in the door with a warp. One of the turians made it in the door, but Shepard barrels into him, tossing his gun as she bore him to the floor. Shoving her hand under his jaw, she hit overload, glad that Kaidan had the presence of mind to shoot him since she was too busy electrocuting herself. When she recouped enough to blink, Nihlus was gone again.

"We going to start leaving him on the ship?" Kaidan asked, leaning out to sabotage the remaining krogan.

Shepard overloaded the krogan then peppered him with rounds. "This is getting old, that's for sure." She dashed out the door and behind the barrier to the right. "When your lift is ready again, Alenko, let's get this last krogan off our backs." She used her sabotage, turning Roger on two turians and an asari trying to make their way down the wall toward her.

A moment later, Kaidan threw himself behind the same barrier. They were facing the club entrance, the krogan pinning Nihlus down on their right, the other three coming down the barrier on their left.

"Ready, LT? Let's clear ourselves a path of retreat."

"Yes, ma'am."

Shepard overloaded the krogan again, whittling down the shields he'd recovered, then Kaidan grabbed him. She turned Roger on the remaining attackers, buying Kaidan a little cover from fire while exposed. One of the turians went down, but the lift didn't drift the krogan far enough, dropping him almost right on top of them.

"Shit! Follow my lead, Alenko." She sabotaged the krogan's shotgun, then leaped up and ran past him, sliding around the corner and going down on a hip. "Fuck, I hate fighting anything that closes on me." She switched to Ingrid. "Try to keep him pinned down." She brought up the sniper rifle, aimed and fired, grinning as the krogan bellowed. Once the recoil settled, she fired again, keeping it up until the bruiser finally went down and didn't get back up.

"Too much like work," she gasped, switching guns again. She glanced around, looking for Nihlus, but didn't spot him. Alenko took out the asari. One left. The last turian held out a few more seconds, then went down.

Shepard sank to the floor with a grateful sigh. "Way too much like work."
Kaidan crouched at her side. "You hit, ma'am?"

"Only five or six times, LT. Nothing I'm not used to." She held out her hand, allowing him to pull her to her feet, then gave herself a shot of medigel. "Now where the fuck is . . .?"

Nihlus strode down the walkway, his entire posture screaming that he was itching for a fight. "Shepard! What the hell did you . . .?"

She stormed toward him, meeting him halfway. "Me? What the hell did you think you were doing?" she shouted. "On my squad, you stick with the rest of the team, follow fucking orders, and fight like you've got a brain inside that skull, goddamn it. You nearly got both of us killed."

He pushed his chest into her face, pushing her back a step. "Your squad? This is my op. You're my . . ."

"Oh, no." She shoved back, refusing to flinch even when he bent down, his face a quarter inch from hers. Fuck, and she thought this power struggle crap settled. "Get this straight, as long as it's my people backing you up, you're on my squad, or you're on your own." Done playing and testing, she needed him to get it through his head or move on.

His mandibles flared and eyes flashed, brilliant and fierce. She grinned as her heart raced. That was more like it. Now if she could just get him playing with the team. "I do better on my own. I don't have to worry about you getting in my way or getting yourself killed." He tried pushing her back, but she just shoved into him.

"Then do it on your bloody own. I don't need the extra headache. I'm an N7, not a bloody ship captain. The last thing I need is a fucking wild card getting my people killed. I'm going to be busy doing that on my own." She reached up and shoved his shoulder, a move that brought him towering down over her, one long taloned hand on the armour at her throat.

A splash of cold and wet hit her in the face. Her teeth clacked shut on her next sentence as it simply vanished from her mind. Sputtering, she stepped back and shook her head, looking over to where Kaidan stood, holding his water bottle ready.

"Sport? Would you mind explaining yourself?" Her voice came out far more reasonable than she expected, considering he'd just thrown water on her like a sparring dog. She wiped the drops from her face.

"I tried yelling, you ignored me. You two were either on the verge of beating the shit out of one another, or something I want to see even less. I did what I had to." He put the lid back on his water and stowed it. "We're here for a reason, aren't we?" He passed her a couple of tissues, then turned to start searching the bodies.

"Yeah, we are." Shepard choked down her embarrassment at having completely lost her temper and patted the water from her face and neck. Once she got herself fully under control, she turned to face the Nihlus. "Tabled for a more appropriate time, Kryik, but this isn't finished. You're not putting my people at risk again. Two kicks are all you get at this can." She thrust the damp tissues at the soggy Spectre, then joined Kaidan searching for evidence.

C-Sec arrived on the scene just as they finished their search. As expected, she found nothing linking Saren to the attack.

"Just once I'd like the bad guy to send notarized orders with his lackeys when they try to kill me," Shepard grumbled, giving the last bad guy a shove as she finished her search. "I, Saren Arterius, hereby command these thugs to kill Shepard. Signed, dated, and witnessed."

Kaidan chuckled. "Good luck with that, ma'am."

She grinned and shot him a wink as she stood. "Don't be crushing my dreams, Sport. I need what hope I've got." She slapped him on the shoulder and nodded toward the club. "Let's leave Nihlus to talk to the cops and head inside. We can watch ass while he kisses it."

Chora's Den didn't disappoint. Dancers and serving girls in various states of undress writhed and pranced about looking both jaded and resigned. Shepard glanced over at Kaidan, who seemed to be trying to look everywhere but at the ladies.

"Your first time in a place like this, Sport?" she asked, trying to hide her smirk.

"Of course not, ma'am. I'm an Alliance Marine." Still, he couldn't even look at her, as if she may have suddenly lost most of her clothing as well.

"Yeah, sorry for saying it, Alenko, but you seem more the 'stay in the crew quarters with a good book' type than the 'getting sloshed and drooling over tits' type." She got her answer about the same time his face started on fire. She chuckled and clapped him on the back. "Don't worry, Sport. I'm exactly the same. Got no use for places like this. Come on, let's see if Nihlus is done explaining the bloodbath outside."

The Spectre entered as she finished speaking. Nihlus looked around the bar, not sparing a glance for any of the half-clad employees. When he met her eyes, he nodded off to his left. She answered with a nod, but let him go ahead. Surely, his contact would be more comfortable meeting with him alone, and she couldn't be certain the two of them wouldn't start yelling and shoving again. Kryik still looked ready to kill. Instead, she took Alenko around the other way, staying back as Nihlus moved in on his man.

"What have you got for me, Harkin?" the Spectre demanded, glaring down at a dishevelled, balding man in a stained C-Sec uniform. "You find out where Vakarian is?"

"I got nothing for you, Spectre," the man said, slouching down into his chair. He belched, then scratched his stomach. "Get lost."

Shepard let out a faint sigh. Of course Harkin didn't have anything. She and Kryik really needed to find a shaman or a voodoo priest or something to clean away the bad luck.

"You told me you'd have something," Nihlus growled, leaning over the table. "What are you playing at?" Yep, there was was. The 'going to use those deadly talons straight through the gloves' fury. She preferred it aimed at her. If Nihlus laid into Harkin, she stood to lose a partner before they even got out the gate. Stepping forward, she moved to where she could jump between them if she needed to.

Harkin laughed and leaned forward, not intimidated in the least. Probably too drunk to be intimidated. "Word is that you're not the council's favourite suck-up any more, Kryik. They're pissed, and they're watching you. I'm seen talking to you, I'm fucked for life." He tossed back his drink then gestured for another. "Find yourself another stooge, maybe one who doesn't need to get his job back."

Nihlus grabbed Harkin by the collar, lifting him out of his chair. "I've paid you well over the cycles, and I'll be damned if I'm going to be extorted, you maggot."

Harkin just laughed. "Yeah, well, good luck beating it out of me. There ain't enough credits on the whole fuckin' Citadel for me to talk to you. Fuck off."

Shepard sighed and walked over. Fantastic. She steeled herself, swallowed her gag reflex, and pushed between the two men. She peeled Nihlus's talons off Harkin's uniform and smoothed it out. "Gentlemen, is that any way to behave in front of a lady?" She winked at the drunken disgrace, then turned and lifted his drink off the waitress's tray.

Licking her lips, she met Harkin's unsteady gaze and mimed taking a sip from his drink. "Mmm, not bad." She passed it to him, then looked over at the waitress, using her omnitool to buy Harkin's drink and one for herself. "Have a seat, officer. Let a lady buy you a drink."

Harkin flopped into his chair, snagging her around the waist. "A lady, huh? There ain't many ladies in this dive." He tugged at her, pulling her over between his knees. "How about you sit on ol' Harkin's lap, and we have ourselves a good time?"

"Harkin, huh?" Shepard tilted her head back and lifted her leg over his to sit, straddling his lap. "What sort of a good time are you offering, officer?" She turned to the waitress as the asari returned, giving her a nod of thanks as she took her drink from the tray but then set it on the table, untouched.

"The kind where all that armour is going to get in the way." He reached up and grabbed her behind her neck, leaning in close enough that for a second, Shepard thought she was going to have to kiss him without a half dozen shots in her to kill the pain. Instead, he just pressed his face into her neck and took a deep breath. "Mm, you smell good. What's that perfume?"

Shepard shrugged. "Probably gun oil and sweat." She chuckled and leaned back. "So, what's your problem with Nihlus? Other than the fact that he's an uptight asshole?"

Harkin grumbled a little. "He paid well enough to be worth slipping him a little info here and there … " He burped, and Shepard had to turn away to get control of her urge to vomit as the stench of booze and stomach contents washed over her. God, she needed a raise. "... but now, word is, the council's pissed at him for fuckin' up some op." He blinked blurrily and pawed at her throat. "You've got a really long neck."

Leaning in to nuzzle along his jaw, Shepard chuckled. "Yes, I do." She nipped at his ear. "You say Kryik fucked up an op?" She laughed. "Idiot. He's always fucking up. Can't help it, I think."

"Ha! You might need to buy yourself a couple of sources of information a little closer to home, Kryik." Harkin nuzzled into Shepard's neck, but she could feel his salamander glare slide over her shoulder to the Spectre. "You might not know as much about your precious council as you think you do."

"What are you talking about, Harkin? What op was I supposed to have screwed up? Eden Prime? We saved . . . ." Nihlus stepped forward, but Shepard turned, giving him a quick, hard glare to back him off. He stared into her eyes for a moment, his entire body screaming fury and impatience. She didn't blink. If he kept going, Harkin was going to shut down on them and then they'd be completely screwed.

She plastered a soft, seductive smile back onto her face before she turned back to run her hands over Harkin's chest. "All politicians are dirty," she whispered. "It's how they get into power. It's how they stay there." She brushed just her fingertips over his cheek. "I bet you see that sort of bullshit all the time in your job." Nuzzling into him, she moaned low and throaty.

"Word is the council wanted that beacon," he said, his hand cupping her armoured breast. "We really need to get some of this armour out of our way, princess."

Shepard wriggled on his lap a little and leaned up into his hand. "Damned straight we do." She kissed the spot under his ear. "Why would the council want a stupid beacon?"

"No idea, but that's the buzz. My guess would be that they're trying to keep everything prothean to themselves. Don't give the humans any more power." He snorted and reached around her to grab his drink, tossing it back in a single swallow. After slamming it back on the table, he stroked his fingers around her ear. "Keep them in their place, just like me."

"It's all any of them care about. Keep the little guy down, grab everything for themselves." Shepard leaned into his touch. "So what's this Garrus guy's deal? He in the council's pocket too?"

Harkin let out a belching laugh that reeked worse than the first one. "Vakarian? No way. He's got that whole honour stick shoved way too far up his ass for that. Hell, he doesn't even lift loose credits chits at crime scenes." He shook his head and leaned in to kiss her, his tongue dragging along her bottom lip.

She covered her retching gag with a purr and lifted into him again. "So, why's he in the wind?"

"He's still investigating Saren. Thinks it'll get him a pat on the head from dear old dad if he brings down a Spectre. Last I heard, someone saw him headed for Dr. Michel's clinic over in the wards. Something about a quarian runaway or something." He hiccuped. "Helluvino. Come on, princess, let's find a back room and get you out of that armour."

Shepard shoved herself off of him, tipping his chair over backward. "Yeah, about the same time as hell freezes over, asshat." She strode for the door, pausing just outside to reach back to Kaidan. "Alenko, disinfectant wipes, anything."

He rummaged through his pack, taking long enough that she started snapping her fingers. "Come on, I'm five seconds from dumping my lunch all over the damned floor."

He passed her a package, and she ripped it open, scrubbing every inch of exposed skin until it glowed red. She scrubbed her teeth with a corner, ignoring the astringent alcohol, then spat into the wipe and shoved it back in the wrapper. "Thanks, LT. Come on, let's get this over with. I suddenly feel the violent need to yack." She gagged. "A lot."

Kaidan made a nauseated face. "Ma'am, if you don't mind me saying so . . . that was the most disgusting thing I've ever seen."

Shepard nodded. "Yeah, I know, Sport, but suck it up. You're making out with the next one, and Barla Von sounds like a volus name." She grinned and nodded back toward the transit station. "Come on, let's find Vakarian and figure out what the hell is going on before the dissociation wears off, and I remember what I just did."
Mass Effect - Future Imperfect Chapter Seven

Chapter Summary

What's that? A quarian in distress? Hmm.

Shepard set the car down at the transit station and popped the door. She glanced back at Kaidan. “Give us a second, will you, Sport?”

“Is ‘Sport’ going to be a thing, Captain, or can I request something a little less eight year old T-ball player?” Kaidan asked as he climbed out.

Shepard grinned. “Sure, how does Sparky hit you?”

Kaidan laughed and pointed over to the far wall by the med clinic door. “I’ll just be over there.”

Shepard leaned back in her seat. “So, Nihlus, we both suspected the council was covering for Saren,” she said softly.

Nihlus just stared out the front. “Harkin’s not exactly reliable. He was intent on crawling into your armour at the time.”

“What if he is reliable? Is any evidence going to make a difference, or do we take them whatever we dig up, only to find ourselves and the entire crew of the Normandy on the wrong end of a kill order?” She looked over at him. “I need to know what I’m getting my people into here, Nihlus.”

“We find evidence that they can’t ignore.” He got out of the car, his shotgun settling easily into his hands.

Shepard sighed and shook her head. “Shepard, the asari councillor left her poodle on Illium . . .” She climbed out and headed for the med clinic door, but before she palmed the control, she turned to Nihlus. “If we meet resistance in here, I’m lead.” When he gave her a stiff nod, she hit the door control.

The door opened to chaos.

“Sweet baby Jesus.” Shepard ran in the door, taking stock of the situation as she crossed the few metres of open floor. Five bad guys with a female hostage just head and to the right, and a C-Sec agent on the far left hand side of the room. Ducking behind a low wall, she shouted, “Kaidan, take cover at the end by C-Sec over there. Nihlus, draw their fire down the wall. I’ll go for the woman.” She launched her drone to draw off some fire, then overloaded the thug holding the hostage. The tech attack stunned both of them, giving her a chance to move. Leaping over the wall, Shepard grabbed the hostage and spun her behind some crates, using her shields to give the woman cover.

Surrounded and unable to find shelter from the hail of bullets, the small squad of thugs went down within seconds.

“Slick as shit,” Shepard said, grinning as Nihlus came around the corner and gave her a firm nod. “Hm. Sterner stuff, indeed.”
After making sure the last one was dead, Shepard turned to the woman, who remained hunkered in the corner behind the crate, her arms wrapped around her knees.

“Hey there.” The captain crouched down in front of her. “Are you okay? What’s your name?”

“I’m fine, just shaken up.” The woman took a deep breath and nodded, meeting Shepard’s stare with a far steadier one than she would have thought. “My name’s Dr. Chloe Michel. Thank you for saving me.”

Shepard stood and held out her hand to help her up. “It’s our pleasure. I’m just glad we didn’t sit in the car talking any longer. Sorry about the overload there. It seemed better to stun you than let him shoot you, but I know it stings.” She gave the doctor’s hand a comforting squeeze then turned to the turian at the other end of the room. “You Vakarian?”

“Yeah, Garrus Vakarian.” He looked to the doctor. “Are you all right, Dr. Michel?” When she assured him she was, he turned back to Shepard. “And who are you?” He looked at the three of them like they’d dropped out of the sky. She supposed they sort of had.

“Comm . . . Captain Jane Shepard,” she said, pointing to herself. “Spectre Nihlus Kryik and Lt. Sparky Alenko.” She ignored the exasperated glare from the LT, well . . . except for shooting him a quick grin. “We’ve been looking for you.”

“Yeah, Garrus Vakarian?” Vakarian walked over to her. “You’re the ones who were on Eden Prime?”

“Yeah, we were there,” Nihlus said, stepping forward. “We’re trying to prove that Saren Arterius was responsible for the attack. My sources said you were investigating him?”

Shepard looked to Kaidan. “Keep an eye on the door, LT.”

“Yes, ma’am.”

She looked back to the C-Sec officer. “Can you help us out?”

He nodded. “I was investigating Saren before we even heard about the attack on Eden Prime. I started hearing reports from all over the traverse and terminus of quarian pilgrims disappearing. When I first started making inquiries, I’d heard of maybe five disappearances, but once I started asking questions, the number rose to nearly a hundred.”

Shepard watched him, staring intently into his ice-blue eyes. She liked him, she decided. He didn’t have Kryik’s ‘never met a situation he couldn’t defeat’ arrogance, and still seemed to give a rat’s ass. That alone was rare enough to be noteworthy. “So, why are you here? And what does a bunch of missing quarians have to do with Saren?” She thought for a second, wondering what a quarian pilgrim was. Her mind spat out an environment suited alien wearing a thanksgiving costume. “Probably not right,” she muttered to herself.

The doctor cleared her throat. “I believe I may be of some assistance.”

Shepard looked over at her and grinned: the doctor had pluck. “Okay, doctor. The floor is yours.”

“A young female quarian came to me last last night. She’d been shot in the arm. Polonium rounds. Naturally, because of her weakened immune system, she was quite ill. She was very frightened, said she’d escaped from the geth and needed to find somewhere safe to stay and had information to trade for it.” She looked at Vakarian, the expression on her face almost as amusingly adoring as Vakarian’s was oblivious. “That’s when I called Garrus, but before he got here, she took off, said she’d been told to talk to Fist.” Her expression said she knew Garrus would know that name. He did not disappoint.

“Fist is low-life, bottom-rung loser in organized crime, but also an agent for the Shadow Broker,” Garrus offered. “If she went to Fist for help hiding, she’s just going to get killed. Fist’s as watertight as a rusted out toilet.”

“Wow, thanks for that mind-gem.” Shepard shuddered and looked to Nihlus. “So, we visit Fist?”

When he nodded, she started for the door. Part way, she turned back. “You going to be okay, Doc?”

Chloe Michel nodded. “Yes, thank you, Captain. I think it’s an excellent time to take a few days off.”

Shepard grinned. “Couldn’t have said it better myself. Nothing screams spa weekend like being taken hostage by thugs. Take care.” She pointed to Garrus. “Vakarian, walk with us.” As she reached the door, Nihlus stepped up beside her. She looked over at him and gave him a wink, glad to see him checking back in.

Garrus strode up next to her. “You going after Fist, Captain?”

She looked over at him and nodded. “You know where we can find him?”

“He owns Chora’s Den.” He looked at her with an expression she decided to call ‘excited puppy’. “Take me with you? I need to know where all this is going.”

“Sure. You good with those guns?” She laughed when he just raised a brow plate at her and set his head at a cocky tilt. “Guess so. Okay.” She palmed the door and gestured for Kaidan to fall in. “So, Vakarian, why do you think Saren is behind your missing quarians?”

Garrus made a subharmonic rumble of disgust down low in his throat that sent a tingle down her spine. “Saren is that cop everyone knows is dirty but who’s so well protected that no one can ever prove it. When I started looking at the data, he was in the area near way too many of the disappearances to be coincidence.”

Shepard opened the car. “Okay, so . . . what’s a quarian pilgrim? I’m assuming it has nothing to do with turkeys.”

Kaidan let out a coughing laugh, but the two turians just stared at her. She shook her head. “At least Sparky got the joke. Get in gentlemen.”

Nihlus climbed in the front. “Quarians leave the flotilla when they reach adulthood, going on a pilgrimage to find something of value to take back to the flotilla.”

Shepard hummed and nodded as she closed the hatch. “Okay, so coming of age.” Lifting off, she sent the car zipping into the traffic lane. She added one and one and got zero. “Wait. Quarians are really tight knit, aren’t they? That means we have a whole lot of frantic quarian parents somewhere? Why haven’t we heard anything about this?”

“They’re also very insular,” Nihlus added, “and they don’t trust council authorities.”

Shepard cut a glance across at him and tipped her head, acknowledging that fact. “Yeah. Guess you get treated like dog crap on someone’s boot long enough, you start to resent it. Go figure.”

Vakarian made that grumbling sound that gave her goosepimples again. “Let’s hope this quarian can tell us what’s going on.”
“Didn’t we just fight our way into Chora’s Den?” Kaidan sighed.

Shepard chuckled then groaned. “Crap, Harkin will still be there. Think I could plug him and pretend it was an accident?”

“Harkin?” Garrus made a rude noise. “They might just give you a reward.”

Grinning, Shepard pulled the car into the transit station. “I like the way you think, Vakarian.”

They heard gunfire before they even got to the door.

“What is with this place?” Shepard groaned, pulling Roger off her back. “Okay, Vakarian with me, we go in the door, take the left. Kryik, you take Sparky to the right?” When he nodded, she palmed the door control. “Meet you on the other side.”

Once again, a door opened to chaos. Except this time the gunfire wasn’t directed at them, but a massive krogan in red armour. After watching him in action for a moment, she waved her team forward.

“He seems to be doing fine on his own,” Garrus called.

“He sure does,” Shepard agreed, overloading the thug directly in front of the krogan. She winced as the big guy charged and the sound of snapping bones drowned out even the gunfire. She put the thug out of his misery as she passed him writhing on the floor. Launching her drone, she followed in the krogan’s wake, finishing off any his shotgun didn’t leave a two foot hole in the middle of.

“I want to be a krogan when I grow up,” she grumbled. Bullets peppered her shields from the right, but a couple blasts from Nihlus’s shotgun took the thug behind the bar out before she could even bring Roger to bear. She chuckled and gave him a nod.

She hadn’t fired Roger more than ten times when they reached a gap in the wall leading to the rear of the club. The krogan waited for them there, leaning against the door.

“Nice work,” Shepard said, walking up to him. “You clear a room faster than I do, and that’s saying something.”

The big guy straightened and stepped into her, his red eyes staring into hers from a couple hand widths away. After a second, he laughed, a harsh cough of sound. “Who are you? Am I going to have to kill you?”

Shepard grinned. “My name’s Captain Jane Shepard, and I sure hope not. We’re here to get some information from Fist. What’s your story?”

“I’m here to kill him.”

Shepard nodded. “Okay, good to know. Personal grudge or just business?” She cocked a hip affecting a nonchalance she didn’t feel.

“Business. The Shadow Broker doesn’t like it when his agents turn on him.” The big guy glanced back at the door. “Fist knows we’re here.”

Shepard chuckled. “Fair to say.”

“Maybe we should get in there before he kills the quarian?” Nihlus suggested from just behind Shepard’s shoulder.
“A very good idea.” Shepard straightened. “We go in together? We get our information, then you do what you need to?”

The krogan nodded. “I can live with that.”

Shepard palmed the door, then stopped dead, coming face to face with a couple of terrified men holding guns. “Seriously? With your hands shaking that hard, you couldn’t hit me if you tried.” She nodded over her shoulder. “Go on, get out of here.”

They stared at her until she lifted Roger, then nodded and bolted.

“Guess we killed all the real guards Fist had,” the krogan said, giving a satisfied grunt.

“You got a name, big fella?” Shepard asked, leading the way toward a door at the far end of the room.

“Urdnot Wrex.” He punched the door control, striding in, completely unconcerned as turret fire pelted his shields. A blast from his shotgun took one out.

Shepard hit the wall and leaned out, overloading the shields on the other one, then finishing it off with a couple of shots.

A human male held a small quarian in front of him, a pistol held to her head. “No further, or I put a bullet in her head.”

Shepard looked back at Nihlus. He traded his shotgun for his sniper rifle. She nodded, then hung Roger on her back and stepped out, her hands held away from her body. “Hey, we’re here to talk. No one needs to do anything drastic.” She moved forward, covering the wall to help block his view of Nihlus as the Spectre lined up his shot.

“Yeah right. Like you talked your way in here?” Fist backed up, dragging the quarian with him. “I know the Shadow Broker sent Wrex here to kill me.”

Shepard shrugged. “That’s between you, Wrex, and the Shadow Broker. I just need to talk to the lady.” She glanced over at Wrex who was moving up on Fist’s other side, and shook her head. A shotgun would take the quarian out too. They needed a precise strike.

“Who else is there?” Fist tried to look around her.

Shepard raised her hands a little, drawing his attention back to her. “Sparky, Vakarian, come on out where he can see you,” she called, then stepped forward. “You’re in control here. Let’s just . . ..” She didn’t get a chance to finish her sentence as a bullet whistled past her ear, slamming through Fist’s forehead. The body stood there for a second as if it didn’t realize most of its head was gone, then went down, dragging the quarian with it.

Shepard jumped forward and helped the young woman to her feet. “Are you okay?”

The quarian stood there for a moment, far more composed than Shepard would have thought, then nodded. “I’m fine. Thank you.” She looked down at Fist’s body, then just sort of crumpled at the knees.

Shepard grabbed her around the waist and helped her to a couch, sitting her down. “Good.” She sat beside her. “My name is Captain Jane Shepard. What’s yours?”

The quarian let out a shaky breath. “Tali’Zorah nar Rayya.” She looked from one to the other.
“What are you all doing here?”

“We were looking for you, actually.” Shepard nodded toward Nihlus. “Spectre Kryik and I have been looking for evidence that another Spectre named Saren Arterius was responsible for an attack on a human colony. That led us to Officer Vakarian who has been looking into Saren too, but related to disappearing quarians.”

“Eden Prime,” Tali said and nodded. “I was there. An asari matriarch named Benezia approached me on Omega. I was just there to catch a ship to the Citadel.” She looked to Shepard as if trying to assure her that she’d never normally be caught dead anywhere near a hole like Omega. When Shepard smiled and patted her shoulder, the quarian let out a long breath.

“The matriarch said that she and Saren needed my help. I was suspicious because of all the disappearances, and tried to get away, but you can see how well that went. Next thing I knew, I was locked in a room on a geth ship. I managed to bypass the door and hid. When the geth landed on Eden Prime, I escaped but the geth caught me and took me to the bridge of their flagship.”

Tali shuddered. “That thing is terrifying. It whispers inside your head all the time. Anyway, they sent me back to the geth. I hacked my guards and used them to sow chaos while I escaped again. After stowing away on a turian cruiser and then a transport, I made it to the Citadel. Still, Saren’s people tracked me, got a shot off in the markets. Hit me in the arm.” She shook her head. “My father’s going to kill me.”

Shepard rubbed the young woman’s back. “I think he’ll be proud as hell. You’re a quarian Houdini.”

“A who?” she asked, tilting her head.

“Human escape artist,” Kaidan explained.

“You were going to trade information for somewhere to hide?” Nihlus prompted. He crouched down in front of her.

Tali brought up her omnitool. “I managed to take some recordings while the matriarch thought I was unconscious on the dreadnought.”

“I got the information from the beacon,” a rough, flanged voice said, “but Kryik came after me before I could secure it for transport.”

“And you think one of the humans used it?” a second, elegant, female voice asked.

“Yes, so did Kryik. The beacon overloaded. It’s gone, and the information it stuck in my head makes no sense. It’s incomplete. Jumbled. We’ll never find the conduit without more information.” Saren sounded as if he teetered on the edge between rage and madness.

“We need someone with knowledge of the protheans.”

Saren barked out a harsh laugh. “You mean your daughter? How’s she going to be any help? Suppositions and theories are all she knows.”

The calm, regal voice never wavered, showing no discomfiture. “Do we have other options at this point?”

“We need to pressure Rael’Zorah . . ..”
Shepard glanced over at Tali, both connecting the family name and the young woman’s sudden stiffness.

“. . . convince him that the only way to get his people back is to give us the star charts. Maybe we send him his own daughter, in pieces.”

The recording cut out. Tali gave an apologetic shrug. “They realized I was awake, so I had to turn it off.”

Shepard smiled. “It’s way more than we had five minutes ago.” She looked into the silvery glints of the quarian’s eyes through her mask. “This Rael’Zorah is the father who’s going to kill you?”

Tali nodded.

“Okay. Give us a second, but don’t worry, okay? We’ll protect you from here on.” Shepard looked up, finding Kaidan, nodding for him to come over and take her spot when she stood and headed back toward the door, Nihlus, Vakarian, and Wrex following.

She grinned, noticing the two self-appointed new members of her squad, but then she looked into Nihlus’s eyes and the smile bled away. “What the hell have we walked into here?”

He shrugged and shook his head. “They’re looking for a conduit? Abducting quarian adolescents to pressure the Admiralty Board into handing over star charts? And what do the geth have to do with any of this?”

“The geth believe that Saren is a prophet of their gods,” Tali called, drawing all their attention. She nodded. “They’re ancient, powerful machine intelligences the geth call the Old Machines and the protheans called Reapers. According to the information I hacked from the geth ship, these Old Machines hunted the protheans to extinction and then vanished fifty thousand years ago. The geth think Saren can bring them back.”

“Oh good, and here I thought it was going to be something terrifying.” Shepard shuddered as the images from the vision flashed through her mind, an ice cold chill slithering up her spine and into her brain. “Sweet baby Jesus,” she whispered. “That’s what the vision is showing me. The protheans being destroyed by the Reapers.” Her eyes locked onto Nihlus’s again. “But . . .”

“Why would the council be helping Saren bring back monsters capable of destroying everyone and everything?” he finished, his tone as terrified and bewildered as Shepard felt.
“So, what now?” Shepard looked to Nihlus for a moment, then turned to the rest of the team. “Toss this office, take anything that looks even remotely relevant, useful, or sellable.”

“Shep?ed?” Vakarian asked, his spine stiffening.

Shepard met his offense with a softening of her posture. “Yeah, officer . . . sellable. I get the feeling we’re going to be on the run soon, and we’ll need every credit we can get our paws on to get us through. If looting from bad guys bothers you, then this is a very good time to get back to your beat.” She pressed her lips together to stifle her grin at his reaction to the word ‘beat’, but try as she might, she couldn’t keep the gleam from her eye.

After a moment, his mandibles flicked, and he turned to join the others in their search.

Shepard turned back to Nihlus. “So, the next move . . .”

“We go to the council with her information. They can’t deny that conversation.” The Spectre paced to the door and back. “But if they are involved, they will know how much we know.”

“Yeah, not to mention the giant-ass target we paint on our backs.” Shepard shook her head and leaned against the wall, affecting a nonchalance that she didn’t feel. “What about Rael’Zorah? With all these pilgrims missing, he has to have been investigating and trying to find a way to get them back.”

“I insisted on going on my pilgrimage despite the disappearances,” Tali said, her voice soft and filled with regret and shame. “I told him that I’d investigate and send anything I discovered back to the fleet. I thought . . .” She sighed and shook her head. “It doesn’t matter what I thought. I failed, got myself captured, and now we’re no closer to finding our people.”

“Safe bet that Admiral Papa is hot on her trail. There’s no way he’s just sitting back on the flotilla hoping news of his daughter wanders past.” Shepard’s eyes flicked back to Nihlus, narrowing as she puzzled it through. Too many unknowns. “Okay, so this Matriarch seems to think her daughter is enough of a Prothean expert to hunt down. What if we try to get to her first? If she can help unravel this mess inside our heads, it might be worth our time.”

He nodded. “Be worth our time just to keep her away from Saren if she can help him.” He growled low in his throat and raked his fringe with his talons. “We don’t know nearly enough.”

Shepard nodded and pushed off the wall. “Well, if Wrex is any indication, the Shadow Broker is not a friend of Saren’s. Let’s go visit Barla Von before the council, yeah?”

“Yes.” His stance hardened. “Hopefully we find something worth trading to Von. The Shadow Broker’s information doesn’t come cheap.” He brushed past her to go over Fist’s desk.

Beckoning to Wrex, Shepard led the krogan to one side of the room. “Sorry about Fist, but you’ll still be able to collect?”
He nodded. “Dead is dead, Shepard.” Looking over at the little quarian, the giant male let out a faint, rumbling growl. “I’ve met this Saren before. Cold blooded bastard.” He stared into Shepard’s eyes for a long couple of seconds, giving her the feeling that he was searching for something written deep down at her core. A small nod told her that maybe he’d found whatever it was. “Could you use another gun?”

Grinning, the captain nodded. “I’m certainly not one to turn down help. Welcome aboard, Urdnot Wrex.”

Ten minutes later, they left the office and took a cab to the financial district on the presidium. Shepard got out of the car and headed for the door that Nihlus indicated. After a second, she glanced back and laughed. “Sweet baby Jesus,” she sighed and turned to look at her motley crew. “We look like a bunch of evangelists from the Church of Galactic Brotherhood.”

She raised her hands as if to bless them. “Brothers Kaidan and Wrex, Sister Tali, go see what you can get for that equipment, we’ll meet you back here.” She waved her hands over them. “Bless you my children, walk forward in the glory of the holy light of the Enkindlers.”

They hurried off, most likely as to not be associated with the lunatic woman. She grinned and looked to Garrus. “Brother Garrus, alight yourself somewhere on high so that ye may keep the eye of righteousness fixed upon all the sinners walking this fine presidium. If thou be a witness to anything considered a sin before the Enkindlers, raise the alarm, brother.” When he answered her with a hesitant nod and a wary stare, she turned back to Barla Von’s front door.

Nihlus took the lead. “Church of Galactic Brotherhood? Really?”

Shepard nodded and headed for the financier’s office. “I have trouble sleeping sometimes, watch a lot of very early morning broadcasts. The Galactic Brotherhood cracks me up. Started by a hanar who claims we should all come together into one great bloom—herd, flock, whatever—to spread the holy light of the Enkindlers.” She palmed the door control as if anointing it. “You haven’t heard the word until you’ve heard it shouted from the rooftops by the Father of the Light. Glory hallelujah, Brother Nihlus.”

A volus wheeze greeted their entrance. “I was not aware either Spectre Nihlus or Spectre-Candidate Shepard had joined the bloom and converted to the holy word of the Galactic Brotherhood.” A chuckle followed another wheeze. “Perhaps I need new sources of information.”

“We have come here today to spread the great and glorious light of the Enkindlers,” Shepard shouted, throwing rapturous hands over her head. She didn’t miss Nihlus’s wince. “Have you heard the word of the Enkindlers, Brother Von?”

“I have, Sister Shepard.” He wheezed. “Everytime I meet with the Holy Father of the Light to transfer his new millions into surprising operations galaxy-wide.”

Shepard chuckled as she tried to look stricken by the news. “Woe be upon you Brother Von for your lack of faith and inability to turn the blind eye of that faith.” She looked around and wondered how many millions of the Father of Light’s suspect credits had been filtered into Von’s pocket, ready for a quick getaway. Other than a couple of computer processors and a desk, the room sat bare.

“Nice place you have here, Brother Von. Very homey.” She stopped, planted her knuckles into her hips and nodded her approval. “It practically screams ‘don’t come looking if the markets go south, because I’ll be in hiding on Omega’.”
“Thank you, Brotherhood-clan.” He wheezed and chuckled again. “That is the exact look I am going for.”

Nihlus let out a deep, rumbling sigh, brushing past her none too gently, and strode straight up to the volus. “Barla Von.” The Spectre towered over the volus, glaring down at him like a falcon who’d spied a tasty snack, but was letting it get a head start before hunting it down.

The financier just looked up at the Spectre then over at Shepard who hung back. After a moment, he took a breath. “Since I have already heard the holy word of the Enkindlers, to what do I owe the pleasure of your and your protege’s company, Brother Kryik?” He gave her a slight tilt of his head. “Perhaps one of your bloom has gone astray?”

Shepard hid a grin. Clever little bastard.

“We need information, Von. What do you know about Saren?” Nihlus leaned on the desk, pushing in on the financier, but again, the little fellow just stood his ground.

“I know a great deal about Saren,” he said and took a hissing breath. Shepard sighed and settled in for the long haul. It took volus forever to spit anything out. “Do you want to know anything specific, or shall I start at his birth?”

“Don’t screw around with me, Von. Eden Prime.” As Shepard watched, the Spectre went from seething to completely still, as if time stopped inside his sphere of space. The effect was unsettling.

“Downright creepy,” she muttered.

Apparently the volus felt the same way, for his suit deflated a little as he let out a long, hissing breath. “You wish to know why Saren attacked Eden Prime?” He shrugged, his stumpy arms flapping a little. “You already know why he attacked Eden Prime. He wished to obtain the beacon. I do not know why he wanted it. He does not keep my counsel, nor apparently the counsel of anyone willing to share the information.”

“What is the Conduit? And what does Saren want with quarian children?” Only Nihlus’s mouth moved, but something rang through his subvocals that warned Shepard about what would follow the stillness.

She strode over and lifted a hip to sit on the edge of the desk. “Now, Brother Kryik, you’re forgetting the whereabouts of those children, the whereabouts of Matriarch Benezia’s daughter, and whether there is a decent Mexican restaurant on the Citadel.” She made a show of thinking. “I think that’s everything.”

She leaned on her knee, getting down near Von’s eye level. “It has been more than a year since Sister Shepard sank her teeth into a decent enchilada. Do you know how hard it is to concentrate on the holy light and sacred word of the Enkindlers when all you can think about is beefy, cheesy goodness with tons of jalapeno peppers?”

Von waddled around to face her. “I’m afraid I do not, Brotherhood-clan. However, there is a mexican restaurant in Zakera Ward that vol-clan has heard good things about.” He looked to Nihlus. “The whereabouts of Dr. Liara T’Soni, the daughter in question, are available for the time taken to do an extranet search and place a few calls.”

“Glory hallelujah, Brother Von. The Enkindlers’ light in strong in you.” She threw her hands up again in benediction. “You shall be rewarded greatly in this life and beyond.” She paused and shrugged. “I think. Not sure how that works exactly.” She leaned back down. “So, you’re pretty plugged in to this place?”

He wheezed and nodded, a movement that included his entire torso. “One must be if one wishes to predict fluctuations in the galactic markets. Information is power.” He took a couple of breaths, and she got the feeling he was evaluating her effect on those markets. “You appear to be a woman drawn to power.”

She shrugged and waggled her head. “Power, sure. Corruption, no.” She gestured to encompass the the presidium. “I don’t see the holy light or power here, Brother Von. Corruption, absolutely.”

He took a step toward his desk and leaned his squat body against it. “Everything in balance Brotherhood-clan. How does one appreciate the holy light and virtue without holding it up against the darkness of corruption?” Breath. “Recognize good without evil?”

“And which are you?” she asked, sitting up, chin up, back ramrod straight.

Von made a half-wheeze, half-chuckling noise. “As with all things, Sister Shepard, I am a mixture of charity and avarice, good and evil, virtue and vice.” He emphasized the last word enough to make her wonder if he was flirting with her.

Shepard jumped up, putting the desk between them.

“And Saren?” Nihlus asked, saving her from having to examine the concept of a flirty volus too closely.

“Saren is misguided, I believe.” Von lifted a hand, little mechanical fingers working. “I do not know Saren’s purpose in holding the quarian youth, if he is indeed holding them, nor where they are located.” He paused for breath. “However, a member of the quarian Admiralty Board is on the Citadel, attempting to discover the answer to these questions.” Von passed Nihlus a datapad. “He is in hiding, but should you check this location, you might discover something useful.”

Nihlus snatched the datapad, the sudden movement startling Shepard with both its speed and promise of violence. Von flinched back, getting the message.

“Why did Saren want the beacon?” the Spectre demanded. “Out intel says he’s looking for a Conduit of some kind. Do you know what he’s talking about?” His words flew like daggers, the volus wincing at each.

Von shook his head, a slight waver lacing through his words now that Shepard no longer formed a buffer between him and the Spectre. “Not even the Shadow Broker has been able to ascertain his purpose, although it is whispered amongst some circles that he was to obtain the beacon for the council.” After a long pause for breath, his little fingers ticking nervously. “They do not wish the Earth-clan to get a leg up on the other species.” His little, light eyes turned to Shepard. “They believe your people to be a grave threat to galactic peace, Brotherhood-clan.”

“Sure, and nothing says get along and play well with the rest of the class like attacking our colonies.” Her arms crossed over her chest, a defensive shield, as she cocked a hip, trying for relaxed, but the electricity coming off Kryik made that impossible. “Okay, but . . . the geth? I can’t see the council climbing in bed with the geth no matter what.”

The volus shrugged and tilted his head, waddling a step toward her and shelter. “Some things you will either have to discover on your own or for a fee, Captain Shepard. I’m a businessman.”

Nihlus took a step that felt like a lunge. “Have you heard anything about Reapers?”
Shepard shifted between them again as Von shook his head. God, she hoped she didn’t have to stop Kryik from ripping the little guy’s suit open. The last thing they needed was to piss off the Shadow Broker. Who knew when they’d need his services?

“Rumour and superstition, Spectre, nothing more.” He wheezed and took a step toward her, seeking shelter.

“Then tell me the rumours and superstitions.”

Shepard’s skin rose in gooseflesh, the hairs along her arms feeling like she’d been dragging her feet along carpet. Lightning crackled through the empty room.

Shepard held up her hands, trying to keep it from striking. “Okay, our source says that they could have been behind the Prothean extinction.” She leaned on the desk to get closer to Von’s eye level. “I’ll tell you what. You give us whatever you can dig up on them, and we’ll reciprocate. Something tells me that we’re all going to need a few favours in the coming months.” She flicked her eyes toward Nihlus, encouraging Von to choose based on his own self-interest.

Von let out a long, wheezing sigh, his light eyes feeling as though they bored straight through her. “You’re correct, Brotherhood-clan. I sense dark times ahead. The markets are uneasy as if something is stirring behind the curtain, unwilling to show itself.” He wheezed. “Whatever I discover about Reapers will find its way to you.”

Shepard practically pounced on the volus to interrupt Nihlus, and shook the little mechanical hand. “We have an accord, Brother Von. Whatever I discover will be sent to you.” She emphasized the last word and placed her hands on his shoulders. “Glory be to the piercing light of the Enkindlers, and a good day to you, brother.”

Nihlus led the way out of the office, the static storminess around him dying down to where she wasn’t afraid to get electrocuted if she brushed against him. “Don’t your people have a saying about making deals with the devil, Shepard?”

She nodded. “They’re not recommended. Von, however, is far too practical to be the devil, glory hallelujah!” She tossed a companionable wink at Garrus as he sauntered over.

“I didn’t mean Von,” Nihlus said and chuffed. “I meant the Shadow Broker.”

Shepard glanced back at the door, then to Nihlus. “I didn’t hear anything about the Shadow Broker in that conversation. An acquaintance said that he would send me any information his discovered in exchange for mine.” She shrugged and leaned back against the cab. “Like I said, Von’s a practical fellow. You can guarantee that the Shadow Broker won’t see anything I send Von unless the little guy needs something. A quick, secret way off the Citadel more than likely.” She nodded and looked down the street. “We’ll have some lead time.”

Kaidan, Wrex and Tali hurried toward them.

Shepard popped the car open, then turned to look at Garrus. “There is something rotten in the state of Denmark, and you can smell it, can’t you, Horatio?”

Garrus’s mandibles fluttered. “Is this all some convincing act, or are you actually a raving lunatic?”

“How does quoting Marcellus from Hamlet make me a raving lunatic?” Shepard asked, sighed doing her best to look mortally wounded. “Honestly, Vakarian . . . I ask for your opinion as to the state of corruption on the Citadel, bring a little culture into your life, and I get called a crazy
Nihlus walked around to the other side of the car. “If the shoe fits . . . I believe that’s the phrase.”

When the other three got in, Shepard settled herself in the driver’s seat and shut the car before turning to Garrus. “You’re the most familiar with this place, Vakarian. Does everything feel business as usual?” She paused, staring at him through narrowed eyes. “Or is there something festering under the surface?”

She watched him war against his programming, both as a turian and a C-Sec agent. Both demanded unquestioning loyalty to one’s superiors, but then he sighed, and Shepard felt him settle fully inside the car with her, his side chosen.

“I’ve felt that something was off for just over a solar cycle. Odd orders, Spectres taking missions that didn’t appear to need a Spectre presence. Colleagues who asked the wrong questions just disappeared one day, and we were told they’d been reassigned.” He chuffed, his mandibles lowering. “I don’t know what it is, but something’s going on, Shepard, and it scares the hell out of me.”

Shepard watched him for another moment, then nodded—one firm, resolute nod. “Welcome aboard, Vakarian.” She looked to Nihlus. “All right, let’s go find our hiding admiral and see if we can’t figure out what the hell is going on here.”
Mass Effect - Future Imperfect Chapter Nine

Chapter Summary

On the hunt for Rael'Zorah

Shepard parked the car outside a hotel in one of the seediest parts of Zakera Ward. She looked around and sighed, shaking her head sadly at the humans and aliens drifting with the garbage along the street; just more refuse. “Nothing ever changes, does it?” She opened the top. Looking up the lines of the filthy structure, she winced. “So, this is where we’re supposed to find a hiding quarian admiral?”

Nihlus got out. “I guess we’ll find out when we get in there.”

“True enough.” Shepard turned in her seat, unable to hide a soft chuckle. “Little crowded back there, guys?”

When only grumbling answered her, Shepard nodded toward where Nihlus waited. “Wrex and Tali with us.”

A turian stumbled and fell into the front of the car, sliding down onto her knees.

“Sweet baby Jesus.” Shepard jumped out, hurried to her side and helped her up. She checked the female’s breath for alcohol as she pulled up onto her feet. None. She checked her pupils, but they weren’t blown like a hallex junkie’s. Judging by the way her clothes hung off of her, the turian was just starving.

“Are you all right?” Shepard reached into her hip pack for the supplies she’d stuffed in there just in case Nihlus needed them.

“I’m fine,” gentle, harmonic tones replied. “Thank you.”

Surreptitiously, Shepard slipped the ration bars and medigel packs into her hand. “Take care of yourself.”

Releasing the female to go on her way, Shepard got into the car and closed it up before looking back at Kaidan and Garrus. “You in for the long haul, C-Sec, or are we leaving you here?”

The turian stared into her eyes for a moment, then his mandibles and chin lifted. “I’m in.”

“Good, glad to have you.” Nodding sharply, she quirked one corner of her mouth in a smile before letting out a long breath. “Okay, we’re going to need to split up to chase both of these leads down. You two get back to the Normandy. Do extranet searches for a Dr. Liara T’Soni. She’s a prothean researcher, so I’d start with universities on Thessia. Make calls . . . whatever, just find out where she is.”

Shepard’s stare locked back on Garrus. “You have ways to cover your tracks, C-Sec? I don’t want it to be obvious that we’re searching.”

“I can get us in some back doors,” he confirmed.
“Excellent.” She opened the car and got out. “Good luck, gentlemen.”

Shepard waited until the car lifted off, then turned to Nihlus and gave him a nod, leaving to him to lead the search for the admiral. The Spectre’s shock had worn off, leaving an understandable, but highly combustible fury to replace it. She wanted to see what he did with it. He might need to trust her with his life, but she needed to trust him with sixty lives. Better to find out sooner than later if that trust was well-placed. The whole Spectres do whatever they must and sacrifice whatever they must to achieve their objective was more than likely an exaggeration of a larger truth, but she wasn’t going to gamble with the lives of her crew.

Looking down the street, Shepard swallowed the bitter taste that rose up in the back of her mouth. All those souls hunkered down amidst the filth, apparently as easily ignored as the trash piled around them . . . it made her want to vomit.

“Does it get worse than this?” she asked, stepping up beside the Spectre.

Nihlus strode toward the front of the hotel. “What do you mean?”

“The squallour. Are there worse places than this on the Citadel?” She stopped for a moment as she spotted a family half-hidden under a battered tarp.

He paused, his hand lifted to palm the door control. “There is a district much like this in all the wards. He glanced down at the family. “Not every story ends happily, Shepard.”

The laugh that greeted his revelation came out bitter. “Wow. Thanks for letting me know.” She sighed, then said, “It makes me sick,” using the words to purge the subject from her mind. A mission lay before her, one she needed to stay focused on.

A glance at Wrex and Tali showed the former keeping a wary eye on their surroundings, the latter wringing her hands and looking like a child anticipating a scolding. She shot Tali a quick wink and nodded toward the now open door.

They entered the hotel and took the elevator up to the ninth floor. The building’s interior lived up to its exterior, the overall impression one of terminal dinginess. She knew a hundred places like it, even stayed in a few now and again. Sometimes an N7 needed a place to hole up and heal for a few days under the radar.

“Wrex, watch the elevator,” Nihlus ordered as they stepped out, then carried on to a door at the far end of the hallway. It opened onto the stairwell. Smart. Made quick get aways a little easier. Unless, of course, one was surrounded.

Shepard continued into the stairwell and down a couple of flights, just to be sure it was clear. She made it back upstairs just as Nihlus banged on the door.

He met her eyes and tilted his head toward the door across the hall. Nodding, she activated her omnitool and bypassed the lock. “Ready,” she said, keeping her voice soft as she slipped her pistol off her hip.

“Who is it?” a heavily accented whisper drifted from the other side of Nihlus’s door.

“Wrex?” He sighed when she shrugged.
“Tali?” the voice behind the door continued, overlapping them. “How could it be you?”

“Who is this?” The youngster looked up at Nihlus. “The voice is too muffled to tell, but I don’t think it’s father. It sounds . . . recorded.”

Nihlus cracked the door turned to check with Shepard. She just nodded and raised her hand to the door control.

“Where were you abducted?” the voice whispered through the crack.

“Omega. Father? If that’s you, we need to speak to you.” Tali stepped up to the door and started pushing it open.

Shepard pressed herself against the wall next to the other door then palmed the control. It opened with the slight grinding of metal on metal to reveal a dark, narrow passage from the door to the main part of the room. A closet and the bathroom door broke up the wall on the left.

Nothing moved. Adrenaline hit her blood like the first hit of Hallex. Her heart thumped quick and strong, her senses sharpening, extending out into the dark like hair-fine feelers. She bent her knees, crouching a little as she swung through the door. Left hip brushing along the wall, she entered, her pistol preceding her into the room.

Her finely tuned ambush detector went off inside her head. Someone was in there with her. She swept the closet door open. Empty. Another couple of steps, she pushed the bathroom door open, her eyes straight ahead, then quickly scanning the bathroom. It too stood empty.

Nihlus called across the hall. “This room is empty, Shep . . .”

The muzzle of a rifle appeared at the end of the narrow entry. Shepard dropped into a quick somersault, coming up underneath it, her shoulder jamming into the wielder’s hands. Not giving him time to react, she shoved her pistol into his belly.

“I suggest you drop that,” she said, keeping her voice soft.

Her assailant hesitated, so she jabbed the pistol into the yielding flesh. “Drop it, or I put a couple of holes through that very lovely suit.”

The lights flicked on, blinding her for a moment. Her prisoner made a move for her pistol, but she grabbed the rifle and flipped the entire person over her head, tearing the weapon from his grasp in the process. He, she saw it actually was a he despite his being upside down, recovered quickly and flipped over into a crouch, apparently ready to take them all on.

“Han?” Tali asked, running over to help the downed quarian. “Where’s father? What’s going on?”

“Tali? It really is you?” the male quarian said, his helmet turning toward Nihlus. “How did you get away from Saren?” He straightened, but stayed facing the Spectre.

“Geth were guarding my door, so I hacked the guards and escaped.” She stepped between Nihlus and the quarian. “It’s okay, Han, this is Spectre Kyrik and Captain Shepard. They saved me and are helping me . . . well, sort of. Our purposes have crossed.” Tali turned to Shepard. “Nihlus, Shepard, this is Admiral Han’Gerrel, my father’s oldest friend, and one of the Admiralty Board.”

Nihlus moved toward the admiral. “We’re looking for Rael’Zorah. Our information said we’d find something useful here.”
Han’Gerrel sidled away from the wall, definitely still expecting to be attacked, but he relaxed a little when Shepard hung up her pistol and placed the muzzle of his rifle on the floor, leaning casually against it. He held out a hand, but she shook her head.

“You can have it back once we’re all a little more certain bullets aren’t in the forecast,” she told him.

The quarian cocked a hip, giving her the most attitude she’d ever seen without facial expression or a middle finger being involved. It felt false though. Affected insolence to cover a very real arrogance. “Fine. Rael sent me a message three days ago saying that he was tracking Tali and the rest of the missing pilgrims.” He snapped to parade rest, back cracking straight and rigid, his hands clasped behind him, mask jutted out at the chin.

Shepard pulled the inside of her bottom lip between her teeth to hide her smile as the real Admiral appeared.

“He told me to meet him in the room across the hall. When I got there, all I found was a heavily encrypted message telling me that he’d traced Tali to Eden Prime, and he would contact me when he found covert transport.”

“Do you have any idea of what Saren and the asari are up to? What they’re doing working with geth?” Shepard asked. She lifted his rifle, cradling it in her crossed arms as she rocked back and forth on the balls of her feet. All the running around just to get slapped in the face with another dead end had lost its novelty.

“All I know is that the Admiralty Board received a demand for all our star charts for five systems going back as far as we have records of those regions—hundreds of cycles. He’s searching for something, and it’s valuable enough to be worth the lives of our young people.” His spine softened for a moment, his narrow shoulders bowing. Shepard’s mind flashed to the image of ice cream melting, the cherry slumping from the top, but then the moment of weakness lifted. “He has not informed us as to the nature of his search, just that he will exchange the charts for our youth.”

“Rael’Zorah was headed for Eden Prime?” Nihlus asked, the rumble that ran under his voice sounding enough like a growl that Shepard felt safe guessing he tired of the goose chase as quickly as she did.

“His message was dated a day ago. He could be anywhere between here and there.” Han’Gerrel sighed, a short, sharp exhalation that stiffened his posture rather than easing it. “I must return to the flotilla. My people are under attack, and I do not have time to chase Rael across half the galaxy. The rest of the Board are seriously considering capitulating to Saren’s demand.”

Nihlus stepped forward, scalpel sharp. “You cannot give in, Admiral. We have no idea what Saren is doing, but by Tali’Zorah’s own intel, it appears that he is trying to resurrect some ancient race that wiped out the entire prothean empire.”

The admiral stepped into Nihlus, also sharp enough to draw blood at a touch. “And if he held hundreds of your children, Spectre Kryik?” The melting ice cream returned for another breath as the heavy accent cracked. “If the daughter you taught to walk, to whom you told just one more story, who learned to dance standing on your feet... the bright center of your galaxy... was his hostage? Would you be so sure then?” He cleared his throat and straightened, but without the same steel.

Nihlus backed up a half step, allowing the admiral the space to regain his composure.
Shepard held out the man’s rifle. “Give us some time, please, Admiral. If Saren can bring these Reapers back, the bright center of everyone’s galaxy will be at risk. I promise you that if there is a way to free your young people, we will do it.” When he didn’t reach for his weapon, she stepped forward and placed it in his hands. “Can you tell us what systems he wanted charts for?”

Gerrel nodded. “Of course, Captain Shepard.” His omnitool flared to life. “I sent you everything I have. You managed to return one of our brightest to us, perhaps you can return the rest.”

Shepard chuckled and stepped back to lay a hand on Tali’s shoulder. “She returned herself, Admiral. We just gave her a ride over here.”

Tali spun. “I’m coming with you!”

“Tali . . .” Shepard squeezed her shoulder. “. . . you should go home, help your people figure this out. When we round up your father, we’ll send him right behind you.”

“No.” The quarian shook her head and planted herself, arms crossed. “You’re not sending me home, Captain. I set out to find my people, and I’m going to see it through. You can either take me with you to make sure I don’t get myself into trouble, or I can do it on my own.”

A wide smile spread across Shepard’s face. The kid had guts. She didn’t miss Nihlus’s gesture to refuse, but she believed Tali. The kid would just set out on her own, and end up captured again. At least if she was on the Normandy, Shepard could keep an eye on her.

“Okay. You can come with the Normandy, but you obey orders. No matter what. If I or Nihlus give an order, your only answer is yes, ma’am. Understood?”

The young quarian bounced a little on the spot. “Yes, ma’am.”

“This is a mistake,” Nihlus grumbled. He loomed over Han’Gerrel. “Do you have anything helpful to offer, Admiral?”

Shepard shrugged and grumbled, feeling the truth behind his words in her gut. “Won’t be my first.”

“Just what I’ve told you. We have a wide net cast searching for any intel, but whatever Saren is up to, either he is keeping it to himself, or he has a hold over everyone who knows, and it’s so strong that he is generating absolutely no chatter. Even Eden Prime is silent. The only thing that has leaked is that the colony came under attack by unknown forces.”

Shepard frowned at that. Surely something should have leaked out. The largest dreadnought she’d even seen landed on the planet, geth poured out, and the colony was nearly destroyed. Damn, it looked like they were going back to Eden Prime.

She sent Han’Gerrel the information he needed to contact her or Anderson. ‘Please, sir, if that net brings in anything, let us know. We’ll try to get ahead of Rael’Zorah, but our priority has to be Saren.”

“Understood, Captain. Thank you.” The admiral took Tali by the shoulders. “May the ancestors watch over you and bring you home, Tali’Zorah nar Raaya. Keelah se’lai.”

“Keelah se’lai.” Tali hurried to stand next to Shepard, prompting another grin. “Ready when you are, Captain.”

Shepard looked to Nihlus, who nodded and spun, stalking toward the door. Tali chased after him as if afraid of being left behind.
“Thank you again, Admiral Gerrel,” Shepard said. “Safe journey back to the flotilla.” She turned to follow Nihlus, but didn’t have time to take a step before gunfire shattered the air. The first rounds threw her forward, her shields going down with a buzzing whine as she reached for her pistol. Rounds impacted like fists, hitting her in the backs of her thighs and right calf when she dove for the bathroom door. One slammed into her shoulder, throwing off her roll and sending her sliding across the tile floor in a fat streak of blood. Adrenaline masked the pain for the moment, but set off her fury like a grenade thrown into an explosives factory.

“You’re such a stupid, god-damned, fucking moron, Shepard!” she yelled, as she flipped over, trying to focus through the blood pouring over her eyes from a graze across her brow. She heard Gerrel’s approaching footsteps like a countdown and brought up her pistol. “You deserve to get your stupid ass shot off. Never turn your back. Goddamn it!”

She wriggled to the side of the vanity, but other than wedging herself behind the toilet the bathroom offered no cover. The admiral stepped into the door, his assault rifle lifting from low-ready. She squeezed her trigger, her eyes morbidly fixed on his digit performing the same action. “Fucking rookie stupid-ass, bullshit, goddamned move.” The rounds left her pistol too slowly as his assault rifle roared to life.

“God-fucking-dammit. Sweet baby Jesus, I’m going to die on a fucking bathroom floor, after handing my murderer his goddamned gun.”

Bullets slammed into her right calf and thigh. One to her lower stomach knocked the wind out of her, halting her diatribe of self-abuse as he corrected his aim, but then she heard the brittle chatter of an assault rifle and the harsh cough of a shot gun from behind her, and the barrage of bullets sinking into her flesh stopped. Her finger stopped convulsing on the trigger as the barrel of Garrel’s rifle sank toward the floor. He staggered once, lifting it, then another cough from the shotgun threw him in the door and face down on the floor.

Shepard screamed more from rage at her own stupidity than pain. As the seconds ticked past, her lower legs started on fire, the pain roaring up through her body like dry kindling. Still, she managed to kick Gerrel’s gun away from his hand.

“Shepard!” Nihlus gripped the door jam, swinging around it, hitting the tile on his knees. “Spirits, Shepard.”

“Yeah, I’m fucked up.” She leaned back against the vanity, suddenly as tired as she had been angry before. “Take his body back for Chakwas to look over. Secure his omnitool too. I don’t want C-Sec . . .” She frowned as her thought just vanished.

“Turn the lights back on,” she muttered, her voice slurring. Darkness crept in around the edges of her vision. “I can’t believe that I gave him the fucking gun.”
Mass Effect - Future Imperfect Chapter Ten

Chapter Summary

Ouch, being shot 19 times really hurts.

The darkness peeled back like someone pulling her eyelids open. A handsome, familiar face peered at her then blinded her with a light that stabbed an ice pick into her brain. Wait, someone actually was pulling her eyelids open.

Shepard jerked away, throwing spastic swats at the doctor, driving her back. “Sweet baby Jesus,” she grumbled, her voice coming out like tumbling gravel. She swallowed and dragged her tongue over the carpet paste that covered the inside of her mouth. “Was anyone else hurt? And damn, Doc. Maybe let someone wake up before you peel their eyelids back and give them the ice pick in the eye treatment.”

Dr. Chakwas folded her arms across her chest. “I’ll remember that for the next time you get yourself shot nineteen times.” She sighed. “But, no, Captain, no one else was injured. Nihlus, Tali’Zorah, and Urdnot Wrex all escaped injury. Apparently, you’re as greedy as you are obstinate and kept all the bullets for yourself.” She held something up between her index finger and thumb. “As well as a bug.”

Shepard took it, wincing as she extended her bad arm. “Ah. Nice. Thanks.” She sat up, grinding her teeth to keep from groaning. “How long?” She braced her hands against the edge of the bed and leaned forward, giving her body a few moments to stop screaming at her. After she passed out, someone must have tenderized her, hollowed her out, then stuffed her with tacks, broken glass, and sharp rusty bits of metal. If she found out who did it, they’d pay. Pressing her hand to the ball of the opposite shoulder, she rolled the joint, grunting as the muscles threatened to snap.

“Thirty six hours. I knew from your medical records that you wouldn’t stay in bed once you regained consciousness, so I kept you sedated until the worst of the damage had time to heal.” The doctor leaned down, lifting the hem of the gown to palpate Shepard’s right knee. She looked up from under shuttered eyelids, watching Shepard’s face as she poked here and there, manipulating the joint. “Luckily, your legs took the worst of it, all relatively simple injuries to heal, except for this knee. How are you feeling?”

Shepard winced, her face scrunching into a grimace as the doctor’s fingers sent a bolt of jagged pain tearing from her knee to midthigh. “Ouch! Dammit! For the love of the baby Jesus, Doc. Stop it!” She cursed and reached down to rub her knee. “Mostly, I just feel like an idiot. I’m getting soft. A year ago, I would have never just accepted that quarian at his word.”

When the doctor straightened, stepping back, Shepard eased herself off the edge of the bed. The deck plating dug into the soles of her feet. Every strand of muscle, tendon and ligament in her legs trembled like overtightened violin strings deciding whether to break or hold as they took her weight. Despite a few twangs here and there, most held, saving her the embarrassment of landing face-first on the floor between the doc’s sensible shoes.

Good enough. Time to get her body working, drive it to heal. She didn’t have time to convalesce. Tissues healed better with a shitload of medigel and blood racing through them. Lying around exercised all the wrong muscles, giving her too much time to think.

“Got a uniform and some undies, Doc?” When Dr. Chakwas set a small pile of clothing on the bed in front of her, Shepard untied the hospital gown and slipped it off her arms.

“Okay, so what’s the news on our dead quarian friend?” She hesitated, the gown hanging from her hand over the bed. “They did bring him aboard, right?”

“They did.” The doctor leaned against the next bed. “I performed a thorough autopsy, and below the neck everything checked out. He was a perfectly normal, middle-aged quarian male.

Shepard shivered, the medbay air chill on her bare skin, and dropped the gown. “Below the neck.” The words sent a tremor of fear and revulsion through her, nipping at the heels of the chill. She stepped into her panties. “Do I want to know what that means?”

The door opened behind her. Shooting a glance over her shoulder, Shepard nodded to Nihlus before turning her attention back to the doctor. “So, above the neck?” She slipped her bra up her arms and tugged it down over her breasts, but she couldn’t convince her bad shoulder to reach around behind her to do it up. Looking back at Nihlus, she cocked an eyebrow. “Could you give me a hand?”

He started to step forward, then lurched to a halt.

“What? Do you know how to do it?” He nodded, so she shrugged. “Then what’s the problem?” Following his stare, she realized his issue. “That’s an old wound,” she said, referring to the ten inch band of dark pink scar tissue that ran down her right side from her shoulder blade to kidney. Surely he expected the older scars that laced across her entire body from chin to toes. He knew about the batarian attack on Mindoir after all. “Seventeen year old drug addict versus dealer. Split me open almost all the way to the front.”

“You trying to break them up?” he asked, grasping her bra and quickly clipping it.

“No, I was busy beating the shit out of him for my Hallex. Well, and trying unsuccessfully not to get stabbed.” She nodded. “Thanks.”

She grabbed the trousers off the bed and shook them out. “Sorry about that, Doc. Report away.”

“Han’Gerrel’s brain chemistry was radically out of balance, Shepard, and I found severe lesions on his prefrontal cortex.” The doctor rubbed her hands together, almost as if trying to wash them, her whole demeanour discomfitted.

“So, pretend that I left my neuroscience degree in my other pants. What does this mean?” Shepard pulled up her trousers and fastened them.

Dr. Chakwas looked as though she’d rather chew her own arm off than speak the words, but finally spat out. “It looks like mind control.”

“Oh.” Shepard sighed and nodded, tilting her head back and forth a little. “Makes sense. He appeared normal enough, but right now, we’re one of the best hopes of finding their kids. Opening fire on me doesn’t fit.” She glanced back at Nihlus. “Maybe Saren got to him?”

The Spectre sucked in a quick breath, his mandibles flicking with the excitement of something, finally, making sense. “He could have been working with Saren for months, giving him the pilgrim’s locations, keeping Rael’Zorah off Saren’s trail.”

Shepard nodded, her eyebrows arching in concern. “I just hope he didn’t get to, and dispose of, Tali’s father before we got there.”

Dr. Chakwas cleared her throat, regaining Shepard’s attention. “My autopsy confirms that the changes in Han’Gerrel’s brain chemistry and structure had been ongoing for about a year. Also, judging by the state of the lesions on his prefrontal cortex, he would have died within the next year.”

Shepard stepped into her boots and reached for her uniform, but her attention was on Nihlus. “Did C-Sec and Sparky find out where Liara T’Soni is?” Shepard struggled to get her uniform on, but managed to wrestle it into submission and tucked it in.

“Yes, she’s participating in an archeological dig on the planet Therum in the Knossos system, Artemis Tau Cluster.”

Shepard nodded. “Okay. I have to spend some time in the gym getting my body to behave, and then I need to go ashore for a few minutes.” She lifted her hand to her ear.

“Pressley, start clearances and preflight to get us out of here as soon as possible.” When her XO responded to the affirmative, she asked. “How long are we going to have to wait, approximately?” She paused, then groaned. “Really? Three hours? Okay. Do what you can. Shepard out.”

“Three hours before we can leave?” Nihlus repeated, letting out a chuff of air.

“Heavy traffic load, not enough controllers.” She gave him a crooked smile. “Don’t suppose Spectre authority could get us out of here in two?”

He nodded. “If you don’t mind losing what small amount of anonymity we have.”

“Three hours it is.” Shepard looked over at the doctor. “Thanks for patching me up, Doc. Much appreciated.”

“Keep coming in like that, Shepard, I’ll just install an electromagnet to pull all the bullets out at once.” Dr. Chakwas peered at the area above the bed as if considering the viability of that option.

“Ouch, Doc.” Shepard winced and backed toward the medi-gel dispenser. “Harsh, very harsh. You’re a cruel woman.” She grabbed a couple of injectable packets then stepped out the door, turning back to grin. “I knew I liked you.”

“Are you actually ready for duty?” Nihlus asked once the door closed. “You couldn’t even do up your own bra.”

“If I’m conscious, I’m working.” She leaned down and stabbed one of the medi-gel packs into her knee, then the other into her shoulder. The pain eased from an eight to a five, and she let out a long breath of relief. “Much better. Now, I just need to get them moving.” She headed to her quarters, stopping partway across the deck to turn back. “You coming ashore with me?”

He hesitated long enough for her to guess his thought process. Strength in numbers versus keeping their eggs in separate baskets. She left him to decide and continued on.

“Hey, Sparky. Good work tracking T’Soni. Be ready to go ashore in an hour or so.”

If Kaidan felt any trepidation at her being back to work, he didn’t show it. “Yes, ma’am.”

Ten minutes later, Shepard walked into the small gym space, stopping when she saw Vakarian kicking the living crap out of one of the bags. Leaning against the door, she watched, waiting for him to notice her there rather than drawing attention to herself. He moved well, strong, balanced, his skill obvious, but at the moment skill didn’t appear to matter. Bare talons slit the heavy leather like tissue paper, rage and frustration expressing themselves in their purest form.

Wearing only leggings, he offered her first real chance to see what a turian looked like under the layers and gloves. She shook her head. It seemed as if when all the races met one another, they instantly decided that they needed to downplay the physical differences. He was magnificent. Tall and broad through the shoulders, the layered plates of his chest and the smooth curve of his cowl a steel grey, tough-looking even though they didn’t provide him much more protection than her skin gave her. Softer hide, like that at his throat, covered his belly above the waist of his leggings.

He broke off and threw himself back, bouncing on his talons for a moment, before bending over, elbows on knees.

“I think you killed it, C-Sec.” She crossed her arms over her chest, a teasing smile lifting the left side of her face.

He spun, completely thrown for a second, then let out a laugh like a rifle shot. “You can bill me.”

“Nah.” She shoved off the side of the door with her hip and walked toward him. “That one can be your bitch. We’ll just grab you a sewing kit so you can patch it up afterward.” She bent down, grabbed the end of the weight bench between her legs and turned it so she could straddle it and still face him. “Have any luck with the admiral’s omnitool?”

He nodded. “A little.” He returned to kicking the crap out of the bag, but at a more controlled pace. “It’s heavily encrypted, but between Tali and I, we’ll break it.” He hit the bag with an open hand. Having taken her share of boxer’s fractures in training, she understood.

She stood and pulled the bug out of her pocket. “Can either of you two tech geniuses get this thing to send a false location?”

He stopped again, taking it from her palm, the edge of his talon sliding over her skin. She pulled back, scrubbing her arms with her hands to hide the gooseflesh before she embarrassed herself.

“Where did this come from?” He held it up, examining it with his visor.

“That turian female planted it on me when she stumbled into the car. Planted one on the car as well, not that it will matter. Saren can waste all the time he wants following that cab around.” She stripped off her uniform top and threw it over the bench then moved to the mats to stretch. Groaning like a ninety-year-old porn star, she bent over, gravity gradually pulling her down until she could press her palms to the floor.

Garrus laughed. “That was a disturbing sound.” He pocketed the bug. “Why not just destroy it?”

Shepard walked her hands backwards until her head made it between her knees, her arms wrapping around her legs. “I could,” she said, grunting, her face twisting into a grimace. “But if I can send Saren the completely wrong direction for a bit, it might buy us some time.”

Vakarian crouched down a couple of metres away, studying her with the expression of an interrogator. “You gave that female food, medi-gel, and water sterilization packs even though you knew she was planting a bug?” When Shepard nodded, he shifted his weight to one leg, his eyes narrowing. “Why?”

She shrugged then unwound, walking her hands forward into downward dog facing forward. “If she was desperate enough to accept money from a stranger to plant a bug on someone despite the danger, she needed the supplies.” She dropped her ass, arching into upward dog facing forward, her back cracking like old twigs underfoot. After stretching there for a second, she looked over at him, finding him still staring at her like he could read her mind. “Little help?”

He chuckled and straightened, standing over her legs. Looping his hands under her arms, he hauled her up and set her on her feet. “Are you sure you should even be out of bed yet?”

She twisted at the waist, stretching her sides. “Yep. Don’t heal lying around a medbay.” She twisted the other way. “So, our prothean expert is on Therum?”

Garrus backed away and crossed his arms, the intensity in his stare never wavering. “Yes. I contacted the dig site a couple of hours ago, and there hadn’t been any sign of geth, or anyone who shouldn’t be on the planet.”

Shepard tried to grasp her wrists behind her back, but her bad shoulder refused. “Little help?” He pressed his palms against the outside of her arms gently, just providing traction until she could clasp her hands. “Thanks.” She groaned again as she lifted her arms, the pain almost enough to make her throw up, but she fought it down. “I need to go to the med clinic, grab a medical exoskeleton for each of our ground team, then we’ll head straight there.”

She released the stretch and pinwheeled her arms a few times, loosening them up. “Can you take it a little more easy on an old lady than you did on that bag?” She slapped her hand against her taut, bare midriff as she took her stance, bouncing a little to shut up her screaming knee. “Haven’t got the hide for taking much abuse from the talons.”

Taking a relaxed stance across from her on the mat, he shook his head. “Judging by the sounds you made stretching, I should wrap my hands and feet in padding.”

Shepard stepped into him, hooking his ankle with her foot, throwing him onto his back, then pinned him with his knee pressed into his keel. “You were saying?” She wriggled her eyebrows at him and bounced her elbow off his gut, just hard enough to make him grunt.

“Ouch.”

She jumped up, offering him a hand to pull him off the mat, then flew through the air, ending up on her belly, arm and one legged pinned.

“You were saying?” he asked, his subvocals rumbling next to her ear.

“Ow.” She groaned as all her body parts fought to make their aches and pains known over the screams of their fellows. She gritted her teeth, shoving the pain aside, and bucked him off. Scrambling up, she backed away, a wide smile on her face. “Oh, I like a man who plays dirty.” She cracked her neck. “Come on, C-Sec, bring it on.”

A half hour later, Garrus released her from his pin and rolled over onto his back, leaning up on his elbows. “You grapple pretty well for someone in her nineties.”

Shepard kicked him in the ankle. “And you grapple pretty well for a beat cop.” She grinned, then sat up, crossing her legs. “How soon can you get that bug reset? I want to drop it off on the Citadel before we pull out for Therum.”

He stood and held out a hand to help her up. “I’ll re-calibrate it and have it ready in a half hour.”

She nodded and grabbed a towel off the stack, throwing it around her neck. “Good. Suit up and be ready to go ashore in forty-five.” She jogged to the door, snatching her uniform off the weight bench on her way past.

Stopping at the door, Shepard glanced back. “Hey, C-Sec . . ..”

He looked up, brow plates rising.

“Thanks. You’re not a bad guy . . . for a cop.” She lifted one corner of her mouth in a grudging smile. One day soon, she’d peel him open like an orange to find out where all that rage came from, but for now they had work to do. She nodded toward the bag. “Don’t forget to patch up the suspect before he lawyers up.”

His mandibles spread a little as he chuckled and shook his head.
They heard the shouting even before Shepard reached out to hit the clinic’s door control. Brow furrowing, she shook her head. “What in the name of all that’s holy . . ..”

“You draw their fire this time, Shepard,” Nihlus said, shrugging his assault rifle into his hands.

She grinned and shook her head. “Nineteen bullets doesn’t get me a pass?” She glanced to Garrus who nodded, his sniper rifle in his hand. She moved into the center of the door to allow him to use the wall as cover to line up his shots. Since she was on fire-drawing duty this time, might as well make a show of it.

She palmed the door control and strode in. “Dr. Michel, that embarrassing, itchy, scaly rash is back, and it’s spreading. I think I caught it from a krogan.”

A krogan with dark blue plating spun away from the doctor, shoving her back into the corner. He pulled a shotgun off his back and brought it to bear on Shepard.

The red-headed doctor peered around the wall of thug. “I’m a little busy at the moment, Captain.”

“I see that.” Shepard strode around the divider. “Gral? Is that you? Damn, man. I told you that rash was bad news.” Leaning against the post she crossed her arms. “If you’re here to get some ointment from Dr. Michel, make sure it’s not the same one she gave me. The rash is twice as bad as yesterday.” Activating her omnitool, she got an overload ready, but also opened an extranet window. “I read an article that said this rash comes from varren. See? Look. Anything you want to tell me, big fella?”

Shepard glanced to Dr. Michel. “Is this the same sort of discussion you were having when I came in last time?”

The doctor’s eyebrows lifted a little as she nodded. “Similar. Quite similar.”

The krogan glowered at her, but shook off his confusion faster than she liked. “I don’t know you, Army. Get out of here.” Dark blue eyes glowered at her from under his heavy brow. “This is none of your business.”

“Gentlemen,” Shepard said, glancing back. “Introduce yourselves.” She overloaded the krogan, ripping down his shields. Garrus followed with another overload, then both turians shot the thug in the head while Kaidan sabotaged his gun then opened up on his chest. The krogan went down, roaring his pain and fury.

“Hold your fire, gentlemen, thank you.” Shepard grabbed the doctor’s hand, pulling her out of the corner and sending her spinning toward Garrus. She dropped on the krogan, burying her knee in his neck before she glanced over her shoulder at the doctor.

“Sweet baby Jesus, Dr. Michel. Do you collect thugs? I suggest changing to coins or stamps.”
Shepard leaned all her weight on her knee, staring into the stunned krogan’s eyes. “You working for someone, handsome?”

“His name’s Armistan Banes.” The thug groaned and shifted, bucking under her, regaining strength as he regenerated. “That’s all I know. Armistan Banes paid me to shake the doctor down, to make her an offer.” Throwing Shepard back, he twisted and rolled to his feet, snatching up his shotgun. He trained it on the captain’s midsection.

“You use that, you know my boys are going to take their time with you. C-Sec over there can put a bullet through each major organ while Kryik puts one through the base of your spinal cord . . . both of them.” She crossed her arms and cocked a hip, giving him a moment to look over at the two turians with their sniper rifles sighted on him. “Sparky, the little one, he just likes to see how many body parts he can put a bullet in before you die.” She shuddered. “He freaks me out, sick bugger.”

Kaidan let out an indignant squawk. Shepard faked a coughing fit to disguise his ongoing grumbling as to which he liked least, being the little one or a blood-crazed sociopath.

After another second, the krogan hung up his shotgun, his hands held out a little. “Hey, I’m just hired muscle.”

“Give me the frequency you were supposed to contact this Banes on, and I’ll make you a deal. You keep an eye on this clinic, keep the good doctor safe and out of trouble, and I’ll make it worth your while.”

She stepped up to him and held out her hand. “Deal?”

He stared at her through narrow eyes. “How do you know I won’t just take your money and leave the doctor to get herself killed?”

Shepard stepped into him, butting him with a shoulder. “Because I believe you’re capable of comprehending how unhealthy a decision that would be. That, and you only get paid if I get back here and the doc reports that she’s never felt safer.” She narrowed her eyes and stared him down with a practiced cold-crazy-bitch grin that snapped like cracking ice. “Couldn’t hurt your cause to suddenly have an urge to fulfill your life’s passion to become a candy striper, either.”

The krogan backed up two steps. “A what?”

Shepard shook her head, suddenly weary beyond telling. “Get the hell out. And I’m serious about letting the boys have you. Keep the lady and her clinic safe.” Waiting until the door closed behind him, Shepard turned to the doctor. “What the hell, Doc?”

“I swear, I’ve never had trouble like this before.” She walked over and folded onto the end of the first bed.

“So, who’s this Banes?” Shepard perched on the corner of the next bed.

Dr. Michel wrung her hands a little. “We worked together a long time ago.” She sighed. “I wasn’t proud of the work, so I left the lab to heal people.” Jumping up, she paced a few metres then back. “My next employer caught me giving away supplies to small clinics like this one. They didn’t want a big scene, so they let me go quietly, without charges.”

“And if the powers that be knew, this clinic would be shut down, yes?” Shepard asked, leaning on her knees.

“Yes. Armistan sent me an obscene offer to return to our old research. When I refused--he’d only dangle that sort of money in front of me for my soul--he demanded that I send supplies, or he’d leak the story about the scandal.” She shrugged and collapsed back into the bed. “But he wants so much equipment that I’d have to close the clinic.” Fluttering her hands in a weak, helpless gesture, she let out a sigh. “It appears I have no choice, because I won’t reopen that research. I became a doctor to save lives, not destroy them.”

Shepard’s sigh felt as though it started at her feet. “Don’t send him anything. You have a dedicated bodyguard, or will, once he gets his first payment. Let me do some digging and find out what the deal is with Armistan Banes. Okay?”

The doctor offered a tentative but relieved smile. “Thank you, Captain. I don’t know how to repay you for everything you’ve done for me.”

“Well, to start, I need to buy four medical exoskeletons, then you could actually take that spa weekend and stay out of trouble for a couple of days.” Shepard chuckled and stood, giving the woman’s forearm a squeeze.

“Done.” The doctor hurried to her supplies. “What model do you need, Captain?”

“The best one I can afford.” Shepard looked through the supplies, picking up a medi-gel capacity upgrade and a couple of purchase licenses while she was at it. Never hurt to have a well-supplied quartermaster.

Shepard stopped at the door on her way out. “I mean it, Doc. Stay out of trouble. We’re going to be around the Citadel for a couple more days, but we can’t be watching this place all the time, just in case.”

The doctor laughed, but followed it with a long, tremulous sigh. “I’ll do my best, Captain. Thank you again.”

When they walked out the door, Shepard headed over to the railing and stared out over the ward arms. “Big place.” She sidled over next to a couple of asari and gave them a friendly nod. “It’s my first time here,” she said, heaving her shoulders in an awkward shrug. “Sort of feeling overwhelmed. It’s gorgeous though, right? Just so huge. Do you live here?”

The closest one gave Shepard a pained smile and inclined her head, in a way that screamed, ‘I’ll be polite, but go away, lower creature’.

Shepard patted the asari’s shoulder. “Well, that’s super. It’s been amazing talking to the two of you. I’m going to go poke a Keeper now, and see if they really do melt into puddles of goo.”

“You shouldn’t . . .” the other asari began, but her friend cut her off, mumbling something about ignorant colonials being better off in jail.

Shepard jumped forward, the rude asari letting out a little scream as the Captain grabbed her arms. “I love this place,” she gushed. “Everyone is so friendly.” She grabbed the other asari’s hand in both of hers, giving it a hearty shake, then stroked the top of her head. “Ooo, those feel nice.” Backing away, she waved, and nearly tripped over a volus. “Oops, sorry about that, my friend. As for you ladies . . .” She stretched out both arms to point at them. “. . . stay gorgeous. I’ll see you.”

Garrus chuckled as Shepard fell in step, turning back every few steps to wave to the still-staring asari. “Which one did you plant the bug on?”

Shepard just grabbed the inside of her lip between her teeth and tilted her head.

“The volus,” Kaidan said under his breath, earning a raised eyebrow and a grin from Shepard.
“Very good, Sparky. You’ve earned an extra brownie with supper.” Shepard opened the car and climbed in. “Come on, let’s see if we can’t get ahead of Saren.”

When they returned to the Normandy, Shepard arranged for both a department and a team briefing before they arrived at Therum the following day. Taking a bowl of soup and a sandwich into her quarters, she sat at her computer to memorize all the information on Dr. Liara T’Soni, Therum, and Matriarch Benezia.

What she discovered about Dr. T’Soni didn’t concern her at all. She was young for an asari, very intelligent, and dedicated to her field of study to the point of having no life outside of work.

What she discovered about Therum and the dig site concerned her from a team safety point of view. Lava flows, geological instability, and mines honeycombing the surface all pointed to a high potential for disaster that had nothing to do with Saren. She’d seen men throw grenades that ruptured pressure or steam pockets close to the surface. The results never proved healthy for anyone.

What she discovered about the good doctor’s mother concerned her most of all. Powerful, wealthy, intelligent, a massive following . . . she had the clout to raise an army, supply it, and buy any information or influence she needed. Shepard sighed and set down the datapad. The only connection she couldn’t make was the one to the geth. Saren made sense in an odd sort of way, but the geth . . . where did they and their doomsday robot gods come in?

Knuckles rapped on her door.

“Unless you’re that charming asari from outside the med clinic, I’m busy,” she called.

“I don’t think I could pull off that dress,” Vakarian replied, “but I’m willing to give it a try if it means being able to deliver my report.”

Shepard hid a wide grin behind her hand and shook her head. “Get in here, wiseass.”

The door opened to reveal the turian craning around to look behind him. “I don’t really have an ass, so . . . .”

“True.” She sat sideways in her chair and leaned against the back, arms crossed. “So, what can I do for you, Officer Wise-assless?”

He just strode over and handed her a datapad. “Here’s everything I dug up during my investigation into Saren. Maybe you’ll see something I didn’t.” Letting out a long breath, he frowned and nodded at the datapads covering her desk. “You planning on laying siege to the terminus systems?”

“Well, one planet in them, anyway.” She shrugged. “I like to over prepare. Been on my share of missions that ended up FUBAR. If we run in like unprepared idiots, a planet like Therum is as likely to kill us as the geth.”

He nodded and took a step back, standing with a cocked hip, his arms crossed. “I contacted the dig site again when we got back on board. They haven’t heard from Dr. T’Soni in a couple of days, but they said that’s not unusual. She tends to disappear for up to a week if she gets fascinated by something. They haven’t seen any sign of the geth.”

“Thanks for staying on top of that. Much appreciated.” She nodded toward the door. “You got yourself something to eat?” When he hummed to the affirmative, she grinned. “Is there something else I can do for you?”
“Want an extra set of eyes?”

A soft, genuine smile touched just the corners of her mouth. “Thanks C-Sec, but as soon as I’m done scarfing down my peanut butter, I’m going to pass out. Rumour is that I took nineteen bullets the other day, then earlier, this massive turian threw me all around the gym, so I’m going to hit the rack. I’ll see you in the comm room at 0800.”

Flipping a hand toward the door, she sagged in her chair. “Get some sleep. You did some good work the last couple of days.”

“Thanks, and thanks for bringing me along, Captain.” His head jerked in an awkward nod and he spun on his talons, striding quickly from the room.

“God save me from the turians,” she sighed when the door closed. Turning her lights off, Shepard moved her dinner to her nightstand, then laid out on her side to read her reports, falling asleep within a few moments.
Chapter Summary

Getting ready to go to Therum.

0515. Far too early.

0520. Way too early.

0525. Shepard opened one eye, looked around, then slammed her hand back down on the alarm.

0530. Alenko hammered on her door. As much as she wanted to, she couldn’t slam her hand down on him to make him go away. She grumbled something obscene and rolled out of bed, missing her feet entirely to land on her knees on the floor.

“Ow! Dammit! Sweet frickin’ baby Jesus. When did I turn ninety and lose basic coordination skills? What’s next? Adult diapers?” She braced against the bed and shoved herself up onto her feet.

“Are you up, Captain?” Alenko banged on the door again.

“Sparky, if you want to keep that arm go eat your damned breakfast, and get your ass to the comm room for 0600.” She flopped face first across the bed.

“Yes, ma’am. Good morning.” He chuckled, and she could swear she heard him bouncing out there.

Morning people sucked. “New punishment protocol for perkiness before 0900. Take notes, LT.” She didn’t lift her face out of her blankets.

“And what is that, ma’am?”

“Firing squad. Now go away.”

“Yes, ma’am. I’ll have hot chocolate with extra sugar and creamer waiting in the comm room.”

She opened her mouth to yell at him again, but she heard him bound away. Besides, she couldn’t really kill her supplier before she got her chocolate fix for the day.

She managed to drag herself up to the comm room by 0555 and flopped in her chair. The heads of all departments awaited her, datapads held expectantly in front of them.

Note to self: New punishment protocol for being overly punctual to morning briefings, also firing squad.

Alenko placed a large thermos of hot chocolate in her hand and sat in the chair to her right.

She took a couple of sips. Strong enough to stand a spoon in. Perfect. After giving Sparky a nod of thanks, she leaned forward on her knees. “Good morning. I know we haven’t had a chance to get acquainted, and frankly, it’s a luxury this mission isn’t going to allow. We’ll have to get to know each other as we go. If we’re going to run Saren to ground, we need to get our asses moving and stay scalpel sharp.” She paused to meet each set of eyes, waiting for a nod of understanding from each before moving on.

“I’m going to be off-ship a great deal, so all daily operations will be reported directly to XO Pressley.” She looked at the older, balding man. Something about him rubbed her the wrong way, but he presented a credible, reliable face to the crew. She knew her limitations as well as her strengths, and her reputation always presented her biggest hurdle. Until the crew saw that she was a standup CO and had their backs, they needed security. Pressley could give them that.

“Pressley, what you think needs my attention, you bring to me. Everything else you have my authority to handle. Supplies, equipment . . . if we can easily afford it, go ahead. If it’s going to be a problem financially, let me know, and I’ll try to make it work.” She raised her eyebrows and waited.

“Yes, ma’am.” He preened a little.

“Daily reports, logs, requisitions all go to Pressley.” Looking over at Kaidan, she sighed. “Except for you, Sparky. Your Marines will be providing back up and support on the ground, so anything that affects their performance, I know. This entire crew’s safety depends on them and the team. Schedule two hours a day for the team and your people to work out together. I want the members of my ground teams familiar enough to read each other’s minds.”

“Aye, aye, ma’am.”

She looked over at Chief Engineer Adams. “The IES is at peak?”

“Yes, ma’am. Stealth system, engines, all running at optimal performance,” the middle-aged engineer reported, his back ramrod straight in his seat. “Tali’Zorah is a great asset, and has ideas about how to help mask our FTL doppler shifts. We’ll be examining them and their possible execution in the new few days.”

Shepard nodded. “Excellent. Thank you. Report directly to me on your results. I need to know exactly what I can ask both of this vessel and her crew.” She took another long draught off her thermos and then stood.

“We’re a lot more blind out here than I’m comfortable with, but if our current intel is accurate, Saren plans to unleash the same nightmare that exterminated the Protheans. Whether or not we have the Council’s support, whether or not anyone believes the threat is real, we have to be the sentinel in his path.” She took a few steps, her eyes on the floor in the ‘strong leader faces an uncertain future’ posture. “I’d rather be wrong and have the galaxy mock me than to take a chance that the Reapers exist, and Saren can bring them back.” Looking up, she saw agreement register on their faces.

Pacing to the ramp out of the room and then back, she ordered her thoughts. “I understand that none of you know me well enough to trust me . . . yet.” Spinning on her heel, she met the eye of each department head once more, spending a little longer locking stares with Pressley than the others.

“I also know that I have a reputation . . . well, more than one. Most of them are true. I’m known for pulling out the big win, but I’m also known for doing it in the way least expected. I hope that will give us an edge against Saren, but I understand that my unorthodox methods take some getting used to.” She looked down at her boots. She’d dripped hot chocolate on her left one. Damn.
“One thing I am not is reckless.” She pulled her polishing cloth out of a side pocket of her trousers and cleaned away the drip. Satisfied, she straightened, but remained silent, waiting long enough to speak that they all leaned in.

Letting out a long, resolute breath, she straightened her shoulders and gave her head a little nod. Her words came out soft, pulling them all in even closer. “There’s one thing you can rely on with absolute certainty in these coming days, weeks and months: the safety of this vessel and her crew is my first priority. I will not risk lives unnecessarily. Losses on a mission like this are inevitable, but I will force that bastard to fight with everything he’s got and make sure he pays a steep price for the blood we spill.”

She sat back in her chair and leaned forward, elbows braced on her knees. When she spoke, she measured her words, letting each drop and settle before saying the next. “I will earn your trust. In return, this mission requires that I ask for every drop of blood and sweat, every inspired thought, every ounce of strength. If we don’t stop Saren, Eden Prime . . .” She gave them a gallows shrug. “. . . well, Eden Prime will be known as the beginning of the end.”

Straightening, she scanned the officers again. “Are there any questions?” When none presented, she nodded and gave them a tight-lipped smile. “Excellent. We are scheduled to drop the teams on Therum at 0900. Stealth system will remain active for the duration of the mission.” Another single, determined nod. “Thank you all. Dismissed.”

Kaidan remained as the others filed out.

“So, Sparky? How’d I do?” One side of her mouth quirked as she looked at him out of the corner of her eye.

“A solid 7.5 out of 10 ma’am. A little rough off the blocks, but you pulled it together.” He leaned back. “This could get really ugly, couldn’t it? If the Council is supporting Saren . . .”

Shepard nodded and took a long drink of hot chocolate. “Yeah, it could. We may well end up fugitives from everyone, because if Udina thinks we hurt Earth’s chance to get a seat, he’ll throw us to the wolves in a heartbeat.” She shook her head. “We need to find enough evidence and get far enough ahead of the storm that the Council has to stand behind us even if it’s just for show.” She turned to meet his eyes and gave him a tight smile. “We can do it. Nihlus will make sure they have to listen.”

Garrus, Nihlus, Williams, Tali and Wrex filed in within a minute and took seats. Shepard waited until they settled, then brought up the scans of the planet and dig site on the vid screen.

“Good morning. Our drop onto Therum is scheduled for 0900. Kryik, Vakarian, Alenko and I will be dropping in the Mako just south of the dig site perimeter, here.” She marked the drop location on the 3D surface scan. “The Normandy will drop Williams, Wrex, Jenkins, Gladstone, Pakti, and Tenaka on the northeast side of the camp. You’ll have high ground and a good view of the entire area.” She marked their drop point on a high plateau.

“Williams, you’re team leader. Your team is distraction and backup if the enemy engages. Get into cover and watch our backs. If we end up having to go into the underground portion of the site, move your team up to cover the entrance.” Shepard looked to Garrus. “Anything further from the dig site?”

“Sitrep at 0600 Normandy time was all quiet, but still no sign of Dr. T’Soni. I spoke to the head of the dig team, a Dr. Chandra, and she admitted that she’s starting to get concerned. T’Soni is known for disappearing, but she usually checks in before now. She was on the far side of the mines from the camp. Chandra sent me the information on that area.”

He stood and walked over to the console, circling an area a sizeable distance to the northeast of both insertion points. Keying in another command, he brought up a coloured overlay of the mines the dig team were using to access the ruins. “This area through here is geologically unstable.” He highlighted a chunk just outside his circle. “They’ve sprayed polycrete to shore up the walls and ceiling, but Dr. Chandra says there’s a chance that part of it caved in and trapped T’Soni.”

Shepard nodded and gave him a tight smile as he returned to his seat. “If we end up having to hike two or three kilometres underground, we’ll call for pickup from the back entrance here.” She marked it. “That area is highly unstable, but on foot, we should be fine, providing we don’t set off any large explosions.”

“If you do call for extraction from the rear exit, we’ll get the Mako back aboard the Normandy once we get your all-clear, ma’am,” Williams spoke up.

“Excellent. Make sure everyone has three days’ supplies in their packs, just in case.” Shepard met their eyes. “Any questions?”

“What about me?” Tali asked.

Shepard smiled. “Adams tells me you have some ideas for improving our emission masking going into and out of FTL?”

“Yes. If it works, it won’t mask them completely, but it will shorten the length of time that we are visible to sensors.” The quarian practically bounced in her seat, vibrating with eagerness.

“Excellent. I’ll need you to stay aboard and work on that. One more body on the ground won’t make that big a difference, but those few extra seconds of stealth could save everyone aboard.” Shepard winked. “Don’t worry, you’ll have lots of opportunities to use that shotgun.”

She looked over her team. “Anyone else?” A nod met their silence. “Then, I’ll see you all down in the cargo bay at 0830, suited up and ready to drop. Dismissed.” She waited until they left before following, not wanting them to see her old granny hobble. Before anything else, she needed to head to the gym and limber up.

Stopping in her cabin, she checked her messages to make sure nothing urgent had come up, then changed and headed down to the gym. She’d just stretched, taped her hands, and started warming up on one of the heavy bags when Nihlus walked in.

“Her name tiptoed from his mouth, like a butcher picking his way through a pack of starving wolves.

“Good morning, Spectre Kryik. I trust you slept well?” She kept her attention on the bag.

He chuckled and stripped off his tunic, gloves and boots. “Well enough, thank you.”

Watching him out of the corner of her eye, she studied the way he moved as he warmed up. “You didn’t have anything to add to the briefing?”

“In my experience, briefings work well until sixty seconds after the drop. Nothing ever goes to plan.” He moved over to the bag that Garrus eviscerated the day before and started slapping it with the same open hand technique as the other turian.

“It’s true that plans need to remain fluid, but it doesn’t hurt to have a framework for people to fall back on when things go to hell.” She stopped punching and stretched out her left side. She pulled her arm behind her back, then over her head. “Care to work out against something that can hit back?”

“We have a mission in less than two hours, Shepard. Do you want to hobble through it?” Despite his words, Nihlus turned to face her.

She smiled and shook her head. “I didn’t ask if you wanted to rip my arms off. I’m pretty sure we both have a sufficient level of control not to hurt one another.” Pulling her arm across her chest, she twisted at the waist.

The chuckle that came out of him sounded bitter and raw. “Nothing I’ve seen from you the past few days gives me any confidence in your level of control.”

“Oddly enough, appearing out of control actually takes a great deal.” She raised her hands in front of her face and lowered her center of gravity into a solid fighting stance. Forcing herself into complete stillness, she waited for him to reveal his intentions first.

He came at her with a handful of slow, easily blocked punches. Her counter-attack slipped between his long arms, landing three solid blows before she danced back, out of reach.

Moving faster, he jumped in, landing a solid blow to her sternum with the heel of his hand that knocked her back and left her gasping.

Shepard laughed. “Is that the best you’ve got, Kryik? Where’s the deadly?” She winced and stretched, cracking her back. That last one hurt. Not that she’d ever admit it. She lifted one eyebrow, pulling back enough to meet his eyes, and bit her lip. “You a good little housecat? Keep the claws sheathed?”

He growled and feinted, spinning to hook her arm. He rolled her over his cowl and onto the mat, landing hard on top of her, knocking the wind from her lungs. “You really don’t know when to shut up, do you?” He swept up her one leg, pinning her hard. “Why are you always peeling back my plates?”

She gasped for a second while she waited for her organs to settle back into their usual spots, then grinned and bucked up off the mat, using her hips and shoulders to roll him. Leaning over him, she grinned. “You need to loosen up, Kryik. Learn how to relax and just banter a bit. Not everything is the end of the world.”

He scoffed as he threw her back, rolling effortlessly to his feet. He jumped in, distracting her with a left hand swipe, while bringing his right fist in low, aiming for her belly. “Some things are the end of the world, Shepard. I know enough to tell the difference. You treat everything like a joke.” His eyes flashed with anger.

She tumbled backwards over her left shoulder, wincing as it complained. “Having a grin on my face doesn’t mean I’m taking things lightly.” She blocked three quick blows, then danced in, trying to land several of her own, all of which he swept aside.

“You’ve got a smart, filthy mouth, and you piss off everyone you come in contact with, even the people we need to be our allies.” He backed off and dropped his arms. “What is wrong with you? I assumed coming in that with your military record, the crazy bitch rumours were the exaggerations of jealous comrades.”

She dropped her hands as well, letting them hang heavy from her shoulders. “And now you honestly think I’m insane? There’s no room for my behaviour to be tactically based?” Shrugging, she walked over to the stack of mats and grabbed her water bottle, taking a long drink. She offered it to him, cocking an eyebrow and waiting him out as he appeared to be deciding whether the offer constituted a trap.

He took it and drank, giving her a nod and grunt of thanks as he passed it back. “I have no idea what to think, Shepard. All you do is run that damned mouth too fast for me to know what’s real.” He stepped back in, giving her a second to get her guard up before he started throwing blows fast and furious.

She blocked them, but his speed threw her off on her left side. “You got something better for me to do with my mouth?”

He laughed and leaped into the opening. “You just can’t help but throw yourself at anything male, can you?” He flipped her onto her ass and bounced away.

Lying there, she gasped for a second, then rolled to her feet. Her jaw tightened, molars squeaking together, but she forced a smile. “I could help myself, anytime, anywhere, but I’m choosy.” She took her stance, hands held in front of her face, and beckoned. “You quitting?”

“You do something better for me to do with my mouth?” He dropped his hands and backed away from her again, his expression one of contempt and . . . something that made her stomach roll. “Does your behaviour have its roots in your colourful past? Drug addicts frequently need to pay for their habits in less than savoury ways.”

Shepard reeled away from the blow, his words landing harder than his fists. Tears sprang to her eyes before she could crush them, and for a moment, she wondered if the pain in her chest was a heart attack. She held his glare, the teasing grin melting from her face, the muscles paralyzed and slack.

Finally, letting out a sigh that trembled far closer to a whimper than she cared for, she nodded. “Yeah. That was me, Kryik. You nailed it straight on the head. Five credit blow jobs from behind a dumpster in an alley. You must be psychic.”

She forced a laugh that came out tasting like bile and sounded enough like a retch that she couldn’t be sure it hadn’t been one. She grabbed her towel and threw it around her neck. “You might want to ask yourself how many people you’ve seen me flirt with. Harkin was business, the fastest route to what we needed that didn’t involve de-boning him in a public place.” It took her a few seconds and hard swallows to get her next words out. “I told you I use my sexuality as a weapon, and I do, very effectively. Get this straight, Spectre. I don’t fire on friendlies. Ever.”

Closing the distance between them in the blink of an eye, she tucked her leg behind his and swept his feet out from under him, a firm hand on his keel shoving him onto his back. “Some things you just . . . do not . . . have the right . . . to say to me. Understand? I’m no whore, Kryik. Cement that into your memory, or I’ll take you to school until you do. I swear to the sweet baby Jesus it’s a lesson they’ll carry you away from.” She shoved herself up and stormed off, biting down on her tongue to keep from letting out a sob of humiliation and fury.

She barrelled through the ship until she reached her quarters, then threw her towel across the cabin. “Fuck!” Her lamp followed the towel, then the stack of datapads on her desk, her Alliance reg manual, and everything else not bolted to the floor. Still, the fury and disgust . . . and hurt . . . chewed through her with iron teeth. How dare he?

Her eyes burned as hot, salty tears welled up, then spilled down her cheeks. She wound up and punched the wall. How dare he?

When you like him so much.

“Shut up,” she growled. Her fist hit the metal with a satisfying thump that vibrated through the bulkhead.

“Look, meat, if you fight me, I’ll tie you to that tree over there and make you watch as I do every single twisted, agonizing thing I plan to do to you, ‘cept on that little one over there.”

“Shut up. Shut up. Shut up!” Both hands pounded against the unyielding surface until exhaustion drove her to stop, sweat pouring over her skin as thick as the tears.

Knuckles rapped on the door.

She backed up and sat on the corner of the bed, elbows on her knees, throbbing hands dangling. “What do you want, Alenko?” It didn’t take a genius to know who it was, considering she’d been beating the shit out of the wall right behind him.

The door opened. “Ma’am.” He stared at her hands for long enough that she had to grind her teeth together not to say anything.

“Spit it out and move on, Sparky.” She wiped the tears from her face on the sleeves of her t-shirt.

“Are you okay?”

She laughed, harsh and bitter. “It’s all relative, Sparky. It’s all relative. But yes, I’m fully functional and all over business. Is there anything else?”

He let out a heavy sigh and shook his head. “No, but I know what to get you for your birthday now.”

Shepard laughed, caught off guard. “Oh?”

“Punching bag for in here. The Normandy wasn’t made to withstand that sort of punishment.” He walked over and ran his hand down the wall. “Thought for sure there’d be dents.”

Shepard chuckled and nodded toward the door. “Get the hell out of here, Alenko. We’re due on Therum in a couple of hours. If you want to be on the ground team, you better be waiting in the Mako.”

He backed toward the door, groaning. “The Mako? Couldn’t the Normandy just drop us from orbit without chutes? Be less painful.” He grinned and gave her a sharp salute when she growled.

When the door closed behind him, she held up her hands. “Well, damn, you fucked them up, didn’t you, Shepard?” Leaving the tape in place, she crossed her arms, tucking her hands into her armpits, then headed over to med bay.

“Fuck.” She stopped in the doorway when she saw Nihlus sitting on one of the beds.

“Do you need something, Commander?” Dr. Chakwas asked, looking around the turian.

Shepard shook her head. “No, Doc. Thanks. As you were.” She grabbed two medi-gel packs then backed out. Heading over to the freezer, she grabbed a couple of ice packs. It would have to do until she was in her armour and could mainline medi-gel.
“Shepard!”

She let out a long sigh, but didn’t turn around. “What is it, Kryik?”

“I... uh...”

She half turned toward him. “I haven’t got all day, just spit it out.”

He glanced over at Alenko then back, nodding toward the door behind her. “Could we discuss this in your quarters?”

Shepard shook her head. “Not right now. I need to go over the scans for Therum. We can talk about whatever when we get back.” She spun on her heel and headed in to her cabin. Just before she stepped inside, she remembered that he’d been in medbay and glanced back. “Unless this is about a mission critical injury. Did I damage something?” When he shook his head, she kept going.

“Shepard!”

“I’ll see you down at the Mako in an hour, Spectre Kryik.” She shut and locked the door behind her, then set her chair upright. After staring at it for a moment, she flopped on the bed. She injected both hands with the medi-gel, then wrapped them in the ice packs and laid them gingerly on her belly.

“I’m an idiot.” She sighed and closed her eyes. “A complete idiot.”
Chapter Summary

Therum is a lovely place to spend one's day nursing boxer's fractures.

It occurred to Shepard on her way down to the cargo bay in the elevator that maybe, just maybe, her tried and true method for keeping the universe at bay might not work as well as the captain of a ship as it had as an N7. She’d never cared about getting along with people. Life was not a popularity contest; it was about survival and getting the job done.

The people who stuck around long enough always figured her out. She’d put Anderson through all the rings of hell after he pulled her off Mindoir, and he’d never let her down.

Letting people inside her shields before she got them disarmed just invited a shot to the head . . . or the heart. A chuckle as brittle as a February ice storm echoed off the walls. She pressed the heel of her hand against the lingering pain that throbbed alongside her heartbeat.

Case in point, Shepard. Case in point.

When the elevator opened on the bottom deck of her ship, the Marines and her team had already assembled. She gave Sparky a crooked smile and a nod, but passed by, heading for where Gunnery Chief Williams stood armoured and ready, but separate.

“Ma’am.” The woman gave Shepard a brisk salute.

Shepard returned the salute. “At ease, Chief.” She glanced over her shoulder at the Marines then back. “You all right taking squad leader?” She held Ashley’s eyes, searching for any sign that the gunnery chief wasn’t ready to step up. “I think you’ve got the brains and the spine for leadership, so I’m tossing you in the deep end, Williams. If you’re not ready, you need to tell me. There’s no disgrace in needing to put some time and distance between yourself and the sort of hell you went through on Eden Prime.”

Ashley straightened and gave Shepard another salute. “I’m ready, ma’am. Five by five.”

“Excellent.” Shepard nodded toward the gathered Marines. “Go get ‘em, Chief. Good luck down there.”

The soldier softened a little just at the edges. “You too, ma’am.”

Shepard stopped next to Jenkins. “How you holding up, Corporal? Did you hear anything about your folks?”

Jenkins saluted, then nodded. “Yes, ma’am, they’re both fine, thank you.”

“Glad to hear it.” She patted his shoulder. “Take care of yourself down there.”

“Yes, ma’am.”

“Sparky, you’re driving,” Shepard called, striding toward the Mako. She grinned at Garrus. “You ready to go, C-Sec?"

He nodded, and opened the hatch at the back of the tank. “Your chariot, Captain.”

She chuckled and gave him a sweeping bow. “You’re starting to worry me, big guy. Did turians use chariots, or are you a student of ancient human history?” She winced a little as she pressed her hands to the Mako’s floor and hopped up. “You want the cannon and electronics, or the gun, C-Sec?”

She sat on one of the seats in the back. Kaidan brushing past on the way to the operator’s seat.

“You’re not driving, and you’re not shooting?” Nihlus asked, hopping in. “You take a debilitating head injury during our sparring match, Shepard?”

Shooting Kaidan a cautionary glare and quick shake of the head, Shepard leaned back. “Something like that, Kryik.” She looked back to Garrus. “Which is it, big guy?”

His mandibles spread wide and fluttered. “Cannon.”

She laughed, brightly, if a little forced. “I can see that it’s always going to be the biggest gun with you.” She nodded to Nihlus. “That leaves you the other gun.”

“You’re really just going to sit there?” He moved to the other front seat despite questioning her. Garrus strapped himself into the seat at the cannon controls and powered up the electronics suite.

“I might even take a nap . . . if Sparky can keep us out of the lava.” She strapped herself in, her hands clumsy, but managing to get the harness buckled before anyone noticed. “Hell, I might stay in the car unless I find something of tourist value.”

“With all due respect, Captain, our odds of avoiding lava are a lot better than if you were driving,” Kaidan called back. “You just relax, lie back and take your nap while I demonstrate how to make this baby handle like a prized thoroughbred.”

“You haven’t seen me drive to know if I endanger lives or property,” she called back, stretching out as far as she could within her harness.

“Do you remember a Marine by the name of Lt. Angus McLaren, Captain?” Kaidan called back as he started bringing the massive tank to life.

The name lit a fire under Shepard’s skin. “Hey! That totally wasn’t my fault. McLaren was navigating. He said that river was shallow enough to cross.” Despite her embarrassed blush, Shepard grinned, recalling the shrill screams of her team. Good times.

“How many waterfalls did it go over before you finally got it back on shore, again? Four?” Kaidan finished the pre-start checklist and activated the controls, the Mako rumbling to life.

Shepard ignored his laughter and purred. “Oh yeah, this is going to be nice, just like a baby on a Sunday drive.” She yawned and laid her head back, closing her eyes. “You’re such a drama queen, Sparky. Get this damned thing on the ground, and let’s go find this matriarch’s daughter.”

“Captain?”

“What is it, Joker?” She sat up, hearing the bad news in his tone.

“The dig site contacted us, said they were under attack, then the message cut out.”
“Deja vu,” Shepard said, her heart sinking. “Okay, drop us outside the enemy perimeter. We’ll fight our way in. As long as that plateau is still viable, land the second team there as planned.”

“Roger that.”

Shepard shook her head. “You heard the man, we’re fighting our way in. I hope you’re as good as you think you are, Sparky.”

“Roger that, Shepard.”

Alenko lived up to his own hype, mostly. She left it to Garrus and Nihlus to yell at him when he set the tires on fire trying to avoid blasts from armature class geth, choosing to watch her team from under heavily lidded eyes. More than once, she had to clamp down on her lip to avoid saying something, but Nihlus stepped up and took command. For their parts, Sparky and C-Sec took no time at all to settle into a rhythm, bantering back and forth as they coordinated keeping the Mako out of the line of fire and blowing the geth to hell.

She grinned to herself as they debated the best way to tackle the few geth fortifications they came across. Although never quite relaxed enough to sleep through it, she pretended, while keeping one eye on the tank’s damage sensors. She got out at the first compound, emptying the lockers and crates while her boys played commando, raiding the outbuildings on either side of the massive gates. She piled the weapons, armour and mods in the back of the Mako, then climbed back in, holding her aching hands trapped under her arms.

“Here.” Making no more fuss than if he were brushing lint off her shoulder, Garrus fastened her harness, then sat back at the cannon.

Shepard shook her head. Of course he’d seen. He said so little and yet saw everything with those pale, ice-blue eyes. She nodded her thanks when he looked her way again, then sat back until Kaidan called out that the luxury cruise had come to an end. She climbed out and pulled first Ingrid and then Roger from her back, trying to decide which one would hurt less to fire. Either one was going to smart like a mother.

They clambered over the wall of rock in their way, and she radioed for the Normandy to pick up the Mako before they set out for the dig site. A hundred metres in they encountered the first resistance, mostly just troopers with the odd rocket trooper thrown in to keep them on their toes.

Shepard launched her drone, keeping it active, and then stuck to a support role, overloading and sabotaging to save her hands. It worked well until they came under fire from snipers entrenched in towers several hundred metres up the road.

Shepard let the rest of her squad take out the geth on the ground and took cover, pulling Ingrid from her back. “Okay, my love. Do me proud,” Shepard set up the shot, resting the gun on the rock, setting the sight on the distant tower. She adjusted for the wind, took a deep breath, let it out slowly, then fired. The geth toppled out of the tower. Shepard bit down on a thin shrill of pain as the gun kicked back, the impact sending bolts of fiery lightning searing halfway up her forearm before they eased.

“Sweet shot, Captain,” Kaidan said and whistled.

“Why thank you, Sparky. I live to entertain.” She lined up the shot for the second tower, this one a good hundred metres further out. Compensating, she went through her routine. Hesitating for just a second, Shepard steeled herself, then the second geth fell.
Garrus walked up beside her and nodded. “The first one . . . bronze medal at best.” His subvocals rumbled. “The second, nothing but gold.”

Shepard hung the sniper rifle from her back, a quirky smile on her lips, her heart speeding up a little in her chest. “What, you a cop or something, C-Sec? You been running my rap sheet?”

He chuckled and switched his guns. “Something like that.”

“Yeah, it’s an compelling thriller packed with heartbreak, suspense, and a whole lot of stupid.” She spawned her drone and followed as Nihlus took the lead once more.

Kaidan walked backwards for two steps. “That’s right, I remember hearing something about that. You won an Olympic medal for something, didn’t you?”

She spun her finger in a turn around gesture and pointed up the road. “Oh look, Sparky, there’s no one on point.” She sighed and shrugged Roger off her back. “And it was two medals, actually. In Biathlon.”

He made a low hum and nodded as he trotted past Nihlus. “Skiing and shooting, right?”

“Yep. Now, enough with the ancient history lesson. We’re going to be getting shot at again in a minute or two.” She squared her shoulders, her spine crackling like someone walking over bubble wrap, and hefted her rifle.

In fact, they fought pretty steadily up the last few hundred metres to the excavation site. A couple of new leapfrogging friends, a half dozen troopers, three krogan, and an armature awaited them in the camp. Nihlus and Kaidan worked on the smaller units while she and Vakarian whittled down the armature with overload and their sniper rifles.

“I really hate the jumping ones,” Kaidan gasped, throwing himself behind a crate at Shepard’s side.

“Spray and pray, Sparky.” Shepard waited for the burst of plasma from the armature’s canon, then swung out and overloaded before putting a bullet in its head.

Kaidan ducked out then back. “You meant bullets, right?”

Garrus took out the armature with his next round, then they set to work on the krogan. After another half hour of dancing in large circles around walls and crates, Shepard bent over, resting on her knees, her chest heaving, sweat running down her face. “Sweet baby Jesus, Saren wants to make sure we get our exercise.” She looked up. “You all in one piece, gentlemen?”

“I think my amp set the back of my head on fire,” Alenko groaned.

“Fine here,” Nihlus called, striding past her and up the ramp into the mine shaft. “The doctor’s got to be in here if she’s still alive.”

Shepard nodded and heaved herself up, giving Garrus a gentle nudge as she went past. “You okay, C-Sec?”

He straightened and pushed away from the railing that had been holding him up. “Yeah, Shepard, I’m fine. Damn krogan.”

“Yeah, tough sons-of-bitches,” she agreed, climbing the ramp a few metres behind Nihlus.

“We need to start bringing Wrex along,” he suggested.
Shepard laughed. “The Mako will seem so crowded and claustrophobic with all that krogan.” She lifted her hand to her ear. “Williams, sitrep?”

“Under fire, but nothing we can’t handle, Shepard. We’re making our way down to cover the entrance now,” the chief reported.

“Roger that, Shepard out.” She followed Nihlus from the bleak, brown-black, smouldering surface into a narrow, corrugated metal tube. “Oh yeah, this can’t possibly go wrong,” she muttered, staring down the hundred metre stretch.

“Sitting ducks,” Kaidan whispered.

“Sh!” Nihlus hissed, glancing back. “I hear geth.”

“Pick it up,” Shepard whispered. “Get out of here and into cover.” She hunkered down, taking point ahead of Nihlus, and sent her drone out. Hopefully it would distract and confuse.

A shock trooper stepped into the mouth of the tunnel, its back to them as it fired on the drone. Shepard overloaded it and the others took it down. Unmistakable chattering and clicking sounds echoed through the cavern beyond the tunnel.

Lifting into double-time, Shepard moved as silently as she could down the rest of the tunnel. It branched right, more geth showing through the metal railings along the catwalks. She spawned a new drone and settled in to the familiar heartbeat of battle.

They fought their way down through a series of ramps and catwalks set up to get the people down into the mine, signs of battle becoming more and more apparent the further in they went. Shepard stepped into an elevator, no small amount of trepidation and claustrophobia clinging to her back. She stood at the front of the platform, staring straight out, trying to ignore the shrinking metal cage around her.

She leaped out the moment the door opened and let out the lungful of air she’d been holding.

A little further along, they reached another elevator, this one definitely showing signs of heavy bombardment damage, like someone had been using missiles. She searched for another way down, but all the tiled corridors leading out of the cavern glowed blue, the entrances sealed by kinetic barriers.

“Prothean?” Nihlus asked, stepping up beside her.

“That would be my guess. Unless the archeological team are all a bunch of neat freaks and tile their dig sites.” Shepard shoved her shoulders back, cracked her neck and stepped into the elevator.

“Two seconds,” she muttered to herself, trying to avoid looking at the twisted metal. “You can endure it for two seconds.” She looked down. “Ohhh stupid move, Shepard,” she groaned, louder than she intended.

Below them, the elevator shaft had been reduced to pretzel-shaped metal, and fallen chunks of the ruins.

“There’s got to be another way down,” she said, but too late. Nihlus hit the control and the door closed, sealing her in. Again, she moved to the front, standing close enough to the structure to keep it at the extreme of her peripherals.

Letting out a horrific grinding shriek, and a shower of sparks, the lift lurched to a halt. Shepard looked down. It was only maybe a ten foot drop, but first they needed to escape the cage.

“C-Sec, can you get us out of here?” she asked, taking position at the side of the elevator to watch for incoming enemy troops. She turned her back to them, struggling to keep her breathing from whistling through her nose as it sped up and shallowed.

“You’re an engineer, aren’t you?” Vakarian asked, giving her a cocky nod.

“You have a point to make?”

Oh for the sake of the sweet baby Jesus, just cut us out of this fucking thing!

“Pretty sure I already made it,” he said, his chuckle warm.

The tones moving under his voice and through his laugh slowed her breathing a little, her heart taking two entire beats before fluttering. “Just open the door, wise-assless.” Shepard meant to keep going, but then a little voice called out of the rubble below them.

“Hello?”

Shepard clung to the distraction of that call. She opened her mouth the answer, then closed it as she saw movement at the far end of the cavern. She traded Roger for Ingrid and looked through the sight. A few shock troopers and two rocket troopers picked their way over the uneven surface.

Shepard gestured to Nihlus, then pointed down the cavern. When he nodded and reached behind him, she looked back to her sights, lining up a rocket trooper’s head. A red laser nearly blinded her as it homed in, then a shot blasted against her shields, throwing her back.

“Son of a motherless . . . .” She lifted the rifle, looking for the geth sniper. Her lip curled in a vengeful grimace as she took its head off. A shrill cry greeted the crack of her rifle.

“Who’s there?” the voice called. Definitely young and female, Shepard decided.

Nihlus took a shot, grunting in satisfaction as the rocket trooper’s head exploded in a spray of white fluids.

“Please, if you’re not geth, say something.”

“We’re busy at the moment, love,” Shepard called. “Put on your big girl panties and breathe.”

“Put on my wha--?”

Shepard took out the other rocket trooper.

“How dare y--?”

Nihlus put a bullet straight through the flashlight on one of the shock troopers, earning him a Shepard grunt of approval.

Shepard lined up her next shot, her shields sparking now that the troopers were in range with their rifles. Her finger tightened on the trigger.

“I don’t know who you are, but--” The voice shrilled, sending sharp metal spikes up Shepard’s spine.

The captain jumped, then took a long breath. As if her nerves weren’t frayed enough being trapped in the tiny metal cage of death. “Sweet baby Jesus, lady. Shut the fuck up for five seconds.” Shepard took the shot, winging the geth, and cursed, lining it up again. Her shield indicator flashed at her, warning her of their imminent failure. The last two geth went down, and she let out a long sigh as she holstered Ingrid.

“Lovely soundtrack,” she sighed. “How’s that door coming?”

“Who are you? You’ve got to get me out of here.”

“Hold your horses,” Shepard called back. “We’re coming.” She craned her head around Garrus to look at his cutting work. “Maybe.”

A second later he turned his back to his work and kicked behind him, sending a chunk of the elevator crashing to the floor of the cavern. He chuffed a little and stepped back. “Your door, Captain.”

She grinned as she ducked through. “Very nice, C-Sec. Practically a work of art. I can see why you’re so proud.”

He just chuffed again, his subvocals rumbling.

“Hello?”

“We’re on our way,” Shepard called back. She looked down, trying to figure the best way down through the rubble. Why had the geth blown the crap out of the cavern?

Nihlus jumped down ahead of her, picking his way over the heaved slabs of rock and concrete. She followed his path, seeing the reason for the use of rockets when she reached the bottom.

“Well, damn,” Shepard said, crossing her arms and cocking a hip. “I didn’t expect this. In fact, I probably couldn’t have guessed this if I’d tried.”

Like the rest of the corridors leading off the main cavern, a barrier curtain blocked the way forward. The part that had Shepard thrown related directly to the asari on the other side, dangling in mid air like a butterfly in a spider’s web.

The asari let out a long sigh. “Thank the goddess. Help. I’ve been trapped here for days.”

“Um . . ..” Shepard walked up to the barrier. Struggling to rein in her sarcastic sense of humour, she looked over the situation. “How the hell?”

The asari ignored Shepard, looking to Nihlus. “Please, you have to get me out of here. I’ve been trapped in here for days.”

“That would explain why the dig site lost contact with her,” Garrus offered.

“Dr. Liara T’Soni?” Shepard asked. When she didn’t get an answer, she waved. “Hey, lady, focus on the cranky human. Are you Dr. Liara T’Soni?”

“Yes.” The asari finally looked back at Shepard, her mouth turned up in a delicate sneer of distaste.

“How did you get into this mess?” Shepard prodded the energy field a little, but it was too strong for even her overload.

“The geth and krogan came after me. I activated the barrier curtains, but I must have triggered a security device.” She grumbled a little. “Please, I’ve been here for days. If you can get past the barrier curtain, there is a control panel.”

Shepard walked right up to the energy field. “Look, honey, my partner, Spectre Kryik, here will probably try to talk me into letting you out of there, because, let’s face it, you’re an asari maiden . . . he’s turian. Between us, he hasn’t gotten any in awhile and a nice dance might loosen him up.” Shepard crossed her arms and leaned back, letting out a long, heavy sigh.

“Your problem lies with the fact that, as much as my life might improve if someone worked that rod out of his ass, I need more, and it’s me you have to convince. I’ve got to know that you’re going to be more useful to us than helping Kryik over there get his rocks off.” Shepard ignored the elbow that smacked into her from behind. “Your mother is Matriarch Benezia. We believe that she’s helping Saren destroy the entire galaxy. Can you help me with that, or do I go back to my ship and look for someone who can?”

The asari went a darker shade of blue, her mouth opening and closing like a beached fish for a second before an indignant squeal made it out. “How dare you? I’m not some stripper in a seedy bar. I’m a doctor of archeology and an expert on the prothean extinction.”

Shepard backed up, making beeping sounds. “Ship for the people useful to Shepard now leaving. Last call for boarding . . . all those useful to Shepard please get aboard.”

The asari let out an enraged noise that wavered between scream and shout. “Fine. Fine! I haven’t had any contact with my mother in years, but I can tell you that she wouldn’t just be trying to destroy the galaxy. I’ll help you find her, even if just to figure out why she’s helping Saren.”

“And if I need to put her down?” All traces of humor drained from Shepard’s face. “Am I going to be fighting her and you?”

The archeologist took a deep breath and shook her head, meeting Shepard’s stare with one that finally told Shepard what she was looking for. “No. If my mother really has joined Saren, then these geth and krogan trying to capture or kill me are here under her orders as well.”

Shepard nodded. “Okay. Give us a minute or two to figure this thing out.” She turned her back on the energy field and let out a long sigh.

“Do you have to antagonize everyone right off the mark?” Nihlus whispered, stepping up beside her.

“Nothing gets to the real person faster than pissing them off, Kryik.” She gave him a dead, exhausted stare. “Look how well it worked on me.”

He chuffed and gave her that exasperated rumble from his subvocals, but she saw his mandibles drop.

She strode forward. “We need to find a way to get the doctor out of her situation.” Spotting geth making their way down the chamber, she glanced behind her. “Sparky. C-Sec. Look sharp, bogies at our twelve. You two stay here and keep the good doctor company. We’ll go down and see if we can get past that curtain.”

“Aye, aye, ma’am,” Kaidan answered.

Shepard grabbed her pistol off her hip and made her way down the rubble field to an intact walkway, pausing to shoot the few geth that made it past Garrus and Alenko. By the time she made it down to the cavern floor, they’d cleared the way.
“Nicely done, gentlemen,” she called up.

Shepard scanned the side of the cavern closest to the trapped scientist. “Looks like there was a way through there, but it caved in. She winced, giving her head a quick, single shake and clicking her tongue. “I don’t like it. This whole place seems as unstable as hell.” She looked up at Garrus. “Hey, C-Sec, we’re right in that super fragile, danger spot you marked, aren’t we?”

“Yes. The rear exit you intended to use is on the other side of the doctor’s barrier and then a hard right,” the turian answered, gesturing as he explained.

“Yeah. Okay.” She wandered up the cavern, picking up dropped supplies as she went. Her mind flipping through possibilities, discarding each as it appeared.

“That’s a mining laser.” Alenko pointed out. “It’s aimed the right way.”

“Yes . . . to destabilize the entire mine,” Nihlus grumbled.

“Yeah,” Shepard agreed. Still, she stopped next to the giant laser. “We might not have a choice. Activate it for a few seconds, cut through to the tunnel on the other side of that barrier.” She shrugged when Nihlus chuffed, his subvocals rumbling. “I’m open to less crazy options. We could grab one of the geth rocket launchers, but it’s using a wrecking ball instead of a scalpel.”

“No, you’re right. We don’t have any other means to get through it. The rocket launchers collapsed all this. Any more explosions, the whole place could come down on our heads.” Nihlus stepped back.

“Okay guys,” Shepard called as she opened her omnitool to hack the laser controls. “This could be the last stupid thing I do in a really long line of massively stupid things, so be ready to grab the doctor and run.” Casting one last glance behind her at Nihlus, she hit the override.
Therum hot, stinky volcano planet. How we love thee.

For a moment, Shepard wondered if she could actually cough hard enough for her lungs to fly out her mouth, but then the dust began to settle and the choking eased to a thin wheeze. On the up side, the laser had cut a clean hole through the corner of the cavern beneath the trapped asari and into a cross corridor.

“So nice,” she said and looked up, giving Kaidan the thumbs high. “Nice thinking, Sparky. I knew you were more than just a pretty face. We’ll be joining you momentarily. Keep frosty.”

“Aye, aye, ma’am.”

She chuckled and shook her head, able to see him blushing even from there and through the settling dust.

Nihlus took the lead, picking his way down into the hole. Partway down, a slab of rock broke loose and slid, but the Spectre rode it like a pro surfer and just stepped off at the bottom. Shepard cocked an eyebrow and followed at a more reserved pace.

She paused next to a thick stream of steam escaping through a crack in the floor. “This could be bad.” The chamber rumbled, trembling a little under her feet. “I think we nicked a pressure pocket, Kryik,” she called, running and sliding the rest of the way down. “Judging by the amount of steam coming through that crack, it’s not a small one. We better keep moving. This place could well come down around our ears.”

He gave her a curt nod and stepped into the corridor. He paused a couple of steps in and looked around him, his mandibles fluttering slowly. “We’re standing in a hallway built more than fifty thousand years ago by an extinct people.”

Shepard nodded, understanding the awe. She passed him, heading what she hoped was the right way. “Makes you wonder what this place was, who lived or worked here . . . what it looked like when protheans walked over these tiles.” Twenty metres in, she stepped out into a massive cylindrical space that rose above her as far as she could see, presumably the surface. “Cargo elevator.”

Nihlus nodded. “Looks like it.” He hung up his rifle and strode over to the console at the center. He brought up the haptic interface.

Shepard prowled the perimeter of the elevator, watching the corridors that spread out from that central point. The vast space above her pressed down, making her skin prickle as if she were being watched. An itch down deep in her brain began to sound an alarm.

Perfect place for an ambush.

“What’s the holdup?” she asked, passing by the Spectre a second time. “You asking yourself which button you’d be if you were the up button?”
“Not everyone uses your highly scientific methods, Shepard,” he replied, “but essentially, yes. All the controls are in Prothean.”

She stepped up next to him, peering around his arm at the controls. “If I was the up button, I would be . . . that one.” She pointed and went back to her patrol.

“Thank you, your assistance has been invaluable,” he said, his tone practically chewing its way up her leg. “And what do you base that highly informed choice upon?”

The ground rumbled, with conviction that time. Shepard ducked closer to the center as chunks of the walls shook loose, tile raining down to explode into shards that bounced off the metal floor to sizzle against her shields. “Press it or don’t, Nihlus. Let’s just get moving before the place comes down on us.”

A moment later, the elevator mechanisms began to grind, sounding like they hadn’t been used since the Prothean occupation. It heaved and shuddered enough for Shepard to wonder how far down the shaft went beneath them, but finally settled into a semi-steady climb.

“Baby Jesus, if you’re listening,” she whispered, “I really don’t want to die flattened into a pancake fifty storeys down.” Edging over closer to one of the large gears, Shepard eyed the long, notched vertical beams that the gear climbed and wondered if she’d be able to climb it.

“You afraid of heights, Shepard?” Nihlus asked, turning from the console.

She shook her head and squared her shoulders. He’d gotten to see more than his fair share of her weaknesses. When she gave him nothing, he turned back to the console, bringing their ride to a smooth stop just behind Dr. T’Soni’s position.

Shepard strode off, setting her jaw. The console behind the scientist activated at her touch. Deactivating the kinetic barriers proved a simple matter. Deciphering the Prothean control interface didn’t give her as much of a challenge as she’d imagined. After all, all their current technology was based on Prothean tech. The same went for all the races. Strange that they found so little in common despite that.

After a couple of false starts, Shepard found the right combination, and the stasis field vanished, dropping Dr. T’Soni to the floor.

The asari landed on her hands and knees. “Thank you,” she said, her voice barely louder than a breath. Weakened by her long imprisonment, she tipped over onto one hip, her head hanging.

Shepard walked over and knelt, pulling out her water bottle. “Here, drink this, slowly. We need you able to move.” Withdrawing a dried fruit bar from her hip pack, she gave it to the asari as well. “Quick energy. Eat while we move, yeah?”

“Thank you, again.” The archeologist opened the bottle and took a couple of swallows. “It’s been a long few days trapped in there.”

The cavern demanded Shepard’s attention again. It shook hard enough that Shepard had to brace herself. Beyond the ruined elevator, large chunks of ceiling dropped, exploding on the floor.

Shepard stood and bent down. “Come on, Doc, we need to get out of here before the whole place lands on our heads.” She slipped a hand under the asari’s arm to help her up, not wanting the female draped around her shoulders if fighting broke out. It wasn’t enough. The doctor couldn’t make her limbs behave enough to climb to her feet.
Shepard heaved a couple of times, ending up with the asari draped over one shoulder. She looked up at her squad. “I understand that this is probably highly entertaining, gentlemen, but let’s spare the lady as much indignity as possible, shall we? Sparky, a little help?”

Between the two of them they got Dr. T’Soni upright on her feet and moving toward the elevator. The asari stank like an outhouse, sweat and who knew what else soaking her from the skin out, but Shepard swallowed her gag reflex and kept them moving. They could hose her down later.

“Sorry about that,” Shepard said as they made their way to the elevator. “Men.” She cut a teasing scowl across at Kaidan. “They really have no clue.”

The asari shot furtive glances at Shepard, seeming afraid of her, not that the captain could blame her after their introduction. “I wouldn’t have thought you’d be concerned about my feelings after you intimated that my only use aboard your vessel would be . . ..” She cleared her throat delicately. “. . . adult entertainment.”

“I’m an enigma.” Shepard paused and looked back. “C-Sec, you keeping an eye on our six back there?” The itch in her brain grew into a twitch, and she pulled her pistol, every nerve on high alert. “I smell an ambush.”

“Yes, ma’am.” Garrus followed them, his assault rifle sitting easily in his hands as he swept the area, alert for threats. “Just so I can identify it next time, what does an ambush smell like?”

Shepard chuckled. “Sweaty feet, gun oil, swamp gas, and belly-button lint.”

“Are you certain you’re not just smelling me?” the doctor asked, one delicate brow marking raised.

“Ha!” Shepard laughed, caught off guard. She and Kaidan lifted the asari down onto the elevator. “Nice one, Doc. You’re going to fit right in.”

As soon as Garrus stepped down onto the elevator, Nihlus started it shuddering its way to the surface. Another tremor rocked the cavern, making the elevator shimmy and grind. At least until a chunk of tile and rock fell into one of the gears, and it let out a horrific death screech, shook hard enough to send them all crashing to the floor, and tilted hard to that side.

“Sweet baby Jesus, I don’t want to die here.” Shepard looked in front of the asari at Kaidan. “You got her, Sparky?” When Kaidan answered to the affirmative, Shepard slipped out from under the doctor’s arm and ran over to the gear.

Hammering at it with the butt of her assault rifle, she chipped away in aggravatingly small bites. Each blow felt like a varren grinding the bones of her hands between its jaws. She disguised the yelps of pain under an imaginative bouquet of curses. Finally, after reaching the point she felt certain that amputation became both inevitable and desirable, enough of the rubble broke away that the gear chewed through the rest. The elevator began to climb again, although it didn’t quite correct the lean.

“Glory hallelujah, praise the divine work of the Enkindlers.” Shepard spun around to help the doctor, but before she took a step or two, bodies dropped onto the elevator from above. Well-armed bodies.

“Thanks for getting the doctor out from behind that barrier for us,” a huge krogan spoke up, stepping toward the asari. “We tried everything, but didn’t think of using that laser. Guess that’s what you get for working with machines and vat-grown muscle.”

Shepard stepped between him and the doctor, eyes moving, trying to find some cover for the doctor and some room to fight for them. “Which of those are you, handsome?” she asked, playing for time.

The behemoth laughed. “You’ve got a quad, Shepard. You and Kryik teaming up has Saren as close to a blood rage as I’ve ever seen a turian. Hand the doctor over and this can end in a quick death.”

Shepard nodded. “I accept. Drop your shields, and I’ll take care of that quick death for you.” Glancing over at Nihlus, she jerked her head toward the elevator controls. They needed to get to the next floor at the very least, or the elevator would prove a circular death trap.

“A smart mouth won’t get you out of this, human.” He stalked toward her, his shot gun looking like a pistol compared to his mammoth size. If he charged, she’d end up a pancake with krogan tracks down the middle. “I’ve been stomping on roaches like you for more than a thousand cycles.”

Looking up, she saw that Kaidan had already moved T’Soni into partial cover behind the far mechanism. She edged toward the opposite side of the center pillar to draw fire away from them.

“This place is crumbling. If you’re smart, you’ll make a run for the surface before you end up at the bottom of this shaft covered in fifty thousand years’ worth of butt-ugly tile.” She backed toward one of the side corridors as the elevator reached the next level and stopped. Some luck. The mining company had left a large crate that she could use for cover, and the cross-corridor remained open, providing room to retreat.

“It’s exhilarating, isn’t it?” the battlemaster bellowed, laughing. “Let’s ride this thing to the bottom and see which one of us survives.”

“Thanks for the offer, but no,” she called, hitting one of the five geth with overload. It went down with a chattering shriek and spray of white fluid as Nihlus sniped it. “I’ve got a date with your boss and the business end of my rifle. Really can’t miss that.” She launched her drone.

“I’ll take him your regrets.” The krogan ducked around the center pillar, a shimmering blue warp field already flying from his hand. Shepard threw herself to the side, knocking the wind out of herself as she slammed into the floor.

“Need armour with a better biotic defense rating,” she groaned. Scrambling up, she ran for the closest gear mechanism, ducking behind it just in time to catch a shotgun blast to the backside of her shields.

A rocket trooper waited for her on the other side. “Shit.” She took partial cover halfway between the two.

“Too many of them, nowhere to get any damned cover,” she gasped. Garrus took the rocket trooper’s shields down with overload. The krogan stepped into firing range on her left, so she ran straight toward the geth, spraying bullets hoping to take it down.

The sharp bark of a sniper rifle sent it crumpling to the floor, just in time for the whole place to shake hard enough that the floor simply bucked her off like an ornery Shetland pony. She tumbled down the incline, using her momentum to roll onto her feet just before hitting the far wall.

“We have to get out of here, Shepard.” Nihlus circled the central pillar, glancing her way as he tried to keep it between him and two krogan.

“C-Sec, Sparky . . . overload and lift on the krogan in the green armour.” She primed the overload, but didn’t get a chance to use it before the battlemaster’s warp snuck up on her and tossed her to the floor like a ragdoll.

As soon as the warp wore off, Shepard wobbled up onto her hands and knees, immediately ducking her head and somersaulting off to the right as the krogan charged. He clipped her hard enough to send her sliding into the center pillar, but that distance gave her a chance to get up and organized again. She launched her drone, then hit him with overload before running back out to the edge.

“Too many krogan. Way too many krogan.” She circled, staying wary, searching out the last couple of rocket troopers. She saw Sparky and Garrus take one down, that meant one left plus the four krogan.

On a pass by the corridor with the crate, she spotted a thin trickle of steam or smoke escaping through a crack in a floor tile.

A cold, hard, ghoul’s grin stretched her lips thin. “C-Sec, Nihlus, you got eyes on me?”

“Roger that, Shepard.”

“See that steam?” She jogged past the vent, able to feel the tile under her feet shaking as if the cavern were seized in a nightmare, hovering on the verge of waking. The slightest provocation would awake the giant in a torrent of fire and molten rock.

They both replied to the affirmative.

“Sparky, take the good doctor to the opposite side of the shaft, get her into cover.” She pressed her back against the crate. “I’ll try to pull the krogan over into this hallway. They seem most intent on me. I’ll take cover around the corner, and you two put a couple of rounds into that tile.”

“And then pray?” Kaidan asked as he moved the archeologist out of danger.

Shepard closed her eyes sending a silent prayer to the powers that be then boosted her shields and stepped out into the open. “Glory hallelujah, Brother Sparky.” Spraying fire over the four krogan, Shepard backed down the corridor. “Glory hallelujah.”

She flipped to the side, narrowly missing a krogan charge, but as she rolled onto her feet, the rocket trooper landed a solid hit. The rocket exploded against her shields, tearing them down even as it threw her flying. She slammed into the krogan, flipped over him and hit the floor, blind, deaf, and stunned.

Someone grabbed her and dragged her to her feet. Bringing Roger up, she shoved his barrel into her assailant’s belly, but then the blindness faded enough to see it was Garrus. She tried to take a step, but her bad knee gave. Luckily, Garrus still had his arm around her, so she stumbled rather than fell.

“Pull back!” She hit her medigel as she hobbled toward the corner. “Come on, C-Sec. Work the plan.”

He nodded and fought backwards, drawing three of the four krogan and the rocket trooper into corridor. She let him support her, keeping up fire to draw them over the broken tile. At the end of the corridor, the turian pushed her into cover.
Shepard leaned against the wall for a second, the maelstrom of battle beating like drums inside her head. She peeked around the corner in time to see that their marks had made it to the steam pocket.

“At your leisure, gentlemen,” she called over the radio and leaned out to open fire. She overloaded the battlemaster, Garrus following suit right behind, then all three of them fired into the floor. For a moment, Shepard thought she’d been wrong about what lay under the tile, but then Nihlus threw in a grenade.

“C-Sec, fire in the hole!” She threw herself back and covered her head just as the grenade blew, the entire corridor erupting into a huge plume of steam. Shepard jumped up as the cloud boiled toward her, hobbled double-time away from a painful death.

Something hit her and she flew through the air. As her ribs slammed into the cowl of Garrus’s armour, she realized that the turian had grabbed her with one arm, flipping her over his shoulder like she weighed no more than a towel.

“Ow, for the love of all... not a sack of potatoes, here, C-Sec,” she cried, fairly sure she’d broken a rib on his armour.

“Saving your ass, Shepard,” he yelled between breaths. “Complain later.”

She started to form a retort, but he had a point, so she bit down on it.

“Shepard!” The krogan battlemaster stumbled out of the smoke and steam, his armour melted to him, his skin a scalded nightmare under his plates. He cast around, trying to find them, one eye gone, the other milky and bleeding.

Snatching her pistol off her hip, Shepard selected incendiary ammo and fired at his head, aiming to put him out of his misery as much as anything.

The brute lumbered after them, picking up momentum, if not coordination. Charging, he closed the distance far too quickly for comfort despite his flesh sloughing off his face and neck. Blood rage. Shepard almost told Garrus to put her down, but she’d just slow them down further. She braced her elbow inside the turian’s cowl, sighted and fired.

Still the krogan closed. “Die, goddammit,” she screamed. Her shots appeared to have no effect, despite tearing into his head, blowing off a chunk of his headplate and taking out his other eye. “What the hell?” Finger convulsive on the trigger, she overheated the gun, and still he closed.

Shepard squawked and jumped up, throwing Garrus off stride as the battlemaster leaped across the metres letting out an unearthly, demon howl of rage. One ruined, skeletal hand clawed at her, the flesh under his nostrils splitting like a second mouth as he tried to spit out what she was sure amounted to cursing her with his dying breath. “Sh... e... p...” At last he stumbled, his knees giving out. He slid, laying out along his front almost gracefully as his momentum carried him another ten metres.

“Hold up, C-Sec,” she said, tapping her elbow against the back of Garrus’s neck. “He’s down, let’s head back, see if we can’t get across.”

Garrus set her down much more carefully than he’d picked her up, then slipped an arm around her waist. Pausing to put a couple of bullets into the battlemaster’s head, just in case, they returned the way they’d come. She limped down the corridor, slipping a little on the steam-slick tiles, but Garrus kept her steady with his arm around her waist.

“Oh, crap,” Garrus said, his voice low and void of humour as they turned the corner.
“Damn.” Shepard stepped away from his arm, staring across the chasm of steam and lava that blocked the path back to the elevator. She glanced back at Garrus. “Could you jump that?”

He shook his head. “Even if I could, there’s no way you’re getting across it.”

Nodding and letting out a long, grumbling sigh, Shepard looked up into his eyes. “Have I just trapped us inside an erupting volcano?”
Chapter Fifteen

Chapter Summary

Note to self: Do not strand yourself inside erupting volcanoes.

Shepard stared at the five-metre-wide lava pool. “Note to self: Don’t trap yourself inside active volcanoes.”

“Little late for that note, isn’t it?” Garrus asked. He edged forward as if judging whether or not he could get around it. “Damn, that’s hot.”

“Holy crap, C-Sec,” Shepard gasped, “that is some of the best detective work I’ve ever seen. How are you not the Executor?” Chuckling, she stumbled as he gave her shoulder a shove.

Backing up a little, she shielded her face behind her arm. “Anyone still alive over there?” she called out. “Sparky? You still breathing?”

Kaidan walked around the elevator’s center pillar, the asari archeologist leaning on his shoulder. “Yeah, we’re still here, but um . . . aren’t you on the wrong side of that lava?”

“Wow, C-Sec, watch your back. Sparky’s in the hunt for detective of the year.” She winced and limped backwards as a jet of steam erupted out a crack in the floor. “You wouldn’t have a really big fire extinguisher in your pants, would you?”

Alenko’s face turned the colour of the lava, but his mouth twitched at the corner. “First time I’ve heard it called that, ma’am.”

Dr. T’Soni jumped back from the lieutenant, her face frozen in a comical mask of surprise as she lost her balance and scrambled to stay on her feet. He caught her, mumbling awkward apologies as he steadied her.

Shepard just shook her head. “You’re scaring the doctor with your perversions, Sparky.” She pressed her lips tight to keep a grin from forming. “Honestly, I’m shocked and dismayed at your lack of sensitivity.”

“This place is still coming down,” Nihlus shouted, limping around one of the side mechanisms. “Maybe we could save the witty repartee for aboard the Normandy.”

“But it won’t be funny then,” Shepard said. She shrugged and sighed. “We’re stuck over here, so the three of you head for the surface, meet up with the second team and get aboard the Normandy. I’ll get C-Sec here to use his finely honed investigative skills to find us a route around to the back exit. When we get clear, we’ll radio for pickup.” She looked to Garrus, cocking an eyebrow in query. He nodded and turned his back on the lava, activating his omnitool.

“Be careful, ma’am,” Kaidan called.

Shepard lifted a hand in a casual wave. “No worries, Sparky. We’ll see you aboard in a few minutes.” She gave Nihlus a curt nod in answer to his stare, and turned away, still able to feel his eyes fixed on her back.
“Okay, so . . ..” Shepard called up the mine layout on her omnitool as she stepped up next to Garrus. “We are . . ..” She pulled in on the roughly sketched in area behind the elevator shaft, then dropped down fifty metres. “. . . about here?”

Garrus glanced over and nodded. “I’ve got a scanning app on my omnitool for finding hidden entrances, hollow areas in floors . . . that sort of thing. It’s short range, but might be able to help us find our way through.” He started down the corridor to the right. “The rear exit is a series of ramps at the far east of the mines. The archeological team didn’t go into those tunnels -- too unstable.”

Shepard grabbed her pistol off her hip and took the lead, stepping around the battlemaster’s corpse. “Of course they are. It wouldn’t be any fun if there wasn’t an almost certain chance of death.” She turned, walking backwards a few steps and held out her hands. “Cheer up, C-Sec. It’s an adventure.”

Garrus chuckled and moved over to the wall, scanning. “Right. I’ll try to remember that.”

The corridor ended another fifty metres along in a cave in. Shepard pulled a section of rebar out of the pile and poked at it. “I think I see air at the top. Your scan say what’s on the other side?”

Garrus climbed up about halfway. “It’s all open on the other side. A vertical shaft.” He looked down at her and shrugged. “Another elevator, maybe?” He looked up. “It’s going to take some digging to get me through there, though. I’m not freakishly tiny, like you.”

“Freakishly tiny?” Shepard started climbing, scrambling up on all fours, her rebar still clutched in one hand. “Maybe you’re just freakishly huge.” She chuckled. “I think I can make it through, do some recon, and help dig from the other side to get your freakishly monstrous butt through.” She reached the ceiling and the maybe hand’s width of space along the apex of the curve. Shoveling at the fallen rock and construction materials, she cursed herself for choosing that day to beat her hands to living crap.

Grinding her teeth together, she gave herself a shot of medi-gel through her armour and forced herself to keep digging. Finally, she made a hole big enough to wriggle through. The other side was almost absolutely dark. The slope of skree angled down away from her as far as she could make out. Activating the flashlight on her omnitool, she shone it down, able to see that the slope ended abruptly, dropping away into nothing.

“Fan-fucking-tastic,” she muttered.

“What’s that?” Vakarian’s head appeared in the hole. “Can we get through here?”

Snapping around like a whip, Shepard blinded him with her flashlight for a moment before she turned it off. “Odds are that we’ll end up in a landslide to our death, so sure . . . this way is awesome.” She grabbed a large tile, using it as a shovel to dig at the hole, enlarging it enough for the turian to get through.

When Garrus made it through far enough to hang half in and half out, he shone his flashlight down the slope to where Shepard could just make out an orange glow. Lava. Great.

He looked into her eyes, his brow plates arching. “I think we have different definitions of awesome, Shepard.” He opened the map on his omnitool. “There should be a corridor over to my right.”

When they both shone their flashlights at the far right, Shepard saw a slightly darker, oval-ish patch against the darkness. “Okay. We’ll stick as far up this mess as we can get. Always easier to head downhill if we come in above the corridor.” She looped a hand under his arm to help anchor him as he turned to aim his feet toward the sheer drop below them.

“Okay,” he said and pulled away. “Go ahead.”

Clambering, using the rebar to both test her footing and help anchor her, Shepard made her way sideways along the rubble, her flashlight all but useless as she navigated through the dark.

“I might actually be willing to let the krogan take me prisoner if he found me here,” she grumbled, pausing to catch her breath. Picking her way through the loose, uneven footing set her legs trembling with fatigue, her bad knee singing a really off-key version of the Hallelujah Chorus.

“For the lord God omnipotent, reigneth,” she muttered, leaning down to rub the kneecap.

“What was that?” Garrus asked.

“Religious-based grumbling,” she said, trying to keep the strain out of her voice. “I do that. Don’t let it alarm you.” She pushed up and started picking her way forward again. “Moving out, C-Sec. Keep up or . . .”

She heard him clambering behind her. He cursed. “Or get left?”

“Nah, I won’t leave you.” She chuckled. “I don’t like being alone in the dark.”

“Um, Shepard?”

She spun, the knife edge of alarm in Garrus’s voice cutting into her. “Oh shit, C-Sec.” She scrambled down the debris field to where he very slowly but inevitably slid toward the chasm. The more he tried to climb, digging into the skree with his talons, the more broke loose, and he began to pick up speed.

“Stop moving, dammit! Lay flat, spread your arms and legs!” She let herself slide, using the chunk of rebar to control her descent. “Just about there. Grab my foot.” She stabbed the rebar into the rubble and threw herself down onto her hip, holding onto the metal with both hands. For a few, breathless seconds, she thought the rebar wouldn’t catch. Garrus grabbed hold of her foot, but they both kept sliding.

Finally, with an excruciating jolt that felt like the bones in her arms had yanked right out of the skin and muscle, the rebar dug in and held.

“Stop moving, dammit! Lay flat, spread your arms and legs!” She let herself slide, using the chunk of rebar to control her descent. “Just about there. Grab my foot.” She stabbed the rebar into the rubble and threw herself down onto her hip, holding onto the metal with both hands. For a few, breathless seconds, she thought the rebar wouldn’t catch. Garrus grabbed hold of her foot, but they both kept sliding.

Finally, with an excruciating jolt that felt like the bones in her arms had yanked right out of the skin and muscle, the rebar dug in and held.

“Climb fast, damn it,” she said, her words coming out in grunts that ended shrill enough to be screams. She might as well have been hanging on to a bare high voltage wire for the agony shooting through her hands.

Thank the sweet baby Jesus for adrenaline.

The turian threw himself sideways, wriggling like a beached fish as he tried to catch hold of her with both hands. “I’m too heavy. You can’t hold us both.” He clawed at the skree with his right hand, but his struggles just started them both sliding again.

Shepard lifted herself as much as she could manage, pressing down on the metal bar, but they lost nearly another metre of ground before it caught again. “For fuck’s sake, C-Sec, do what you’re told.” Gasping, she tightened her grip on the metal bar and looked down. His lower legs hung over the void. “We’re on the express train to pancake city, so climb. I can hold us.”
Both hands grabbed hold of her foot, and he hauled himself up, using her armour as fingerholds. Each of his movements tugged at her grip, and her hands started to slip on the rebar.

“Hold up.” She looked down as he grabbed hold of her belt. “Can you let go of me without sliding?”

Slowly, he loosened the grip on one hand, then the other, rolling slightly to the side. “Yeah.”

“Okay. I need to hook my elbow on this bar. If you start sliding, shout and grab me, yeah?”

“Yeah.”

Shepard looked up, took a deep breath and heaved, keeping her body completely still, dead weight as she lifted. Hooking one arm over the rebar, she grabbed her wrist with her other hand. “Okay, I’m secure. Climb with the strength of the Enkindlers, Brother C-Sec.”

He gripped her with both hands again, climbing up until he could grab the bar as well. Once his weight was off her, Shepard relaxed, huffing and puffing. “Wow, you’re heavy,” she said, gasping between words.

He let out a breathless laugh. “And you’re freakishly strong as well as freakishly tiny.”

“Sweet-talker.” They laughed helplessly for a few minutes, then Shepard took a deep breath. “Let’s get the fuck out of here.”

“Agreed.”

Using the rebar as an anchor, they pulled themselves along the skree on their hands and knees until they reached the side corridor and hauled themselves up onto solid ground.

“An adventure, right?” Garrus asked, lying flat on his stomach, staring down over the drop.

“That’s what the poster said when I signed up.” Shepard crawled on her hands and knees over next to him and slumped on one hip to peer down. Lava poured down like waterfalls from side corridors on two different levels, pooling at the bottom of the elevator shaft a good fifty or so metres below them.

“Thanks for not letting me fall into that,” Garrus said, shoving himself up onto his feet. He held out a hand to help her up. When she winced at the thought, he bent over and lifted her onto her feet. “The ramps to the surface shouldn’t be too far.” He wrapped an arm around her waist, helping her limp down the corridor.

The ramps turned out to be a rickety, rusted-out pretzel of metal. Shepard went first, testing everything to make sure it would hold her, then jumping up and down to test it for Garrus’s significantly higher mass. Despite its fragile appearance, the metal held, and in less than an hour, they climbed through a long culvert to a door onto the surface.

“Glory hallelujah. Praise the dirty brown disgustingness of this planet,” Shepard sighed, sinking down onto her backside in the dirt. She opened a channel to the Normandy, calling for pickup.

Garrus remained standing, turning to look in the direction of the dig site. A giant plume of smoke and ash billowed a hundred storeys into the air. “An adventure,” he muttered.

“Now there is a beautiful sight,” Shepard sighed as the Normandy swooped in to pick them up.
“Glory hallelujah, Sister Shepard,” Garrus said, lifting her off the ground into his arms. “Glory hallelujah.”

Shepard chuckled. “You know, you keep carrying me around, I’m going to get used to it.”

“Right, you letting someone carry you.” He set her down at the top of the ramp. “That will be the day.” He patted her shoulder and strode to his locker.

“I’m sure C-Sec will be glad to tell you the tale of our harrowing escape,” she told the crowd of crew and team members, as they pressed in eager to hear the story of how she’d made it out. “I need a shower and a nap.” She straightened. “Ground team from Therum, debriefing in the Comm Room, 0630. Pass the word.”

She hobbled to the elevator and then to the med bay to check on Dr. T’Soni and Nihlus. They both lay on beds, sound asleep and cozy under blankets when she looked in.

“Captain!” Dr. Chakwas called, striding toward her. “Are you all right?”

Nihlus woke and stared blurrily at her for a moment before bolting upright.

“Spectre Kryik!” the doctor barked, whirling to face him, a stern finger pointed toward his nose. “Stay right there. Don’t make me tranq you again.”

Shepard nodded and chuckled. “Yeah, I’m fine.” She held up her hands. “No need to tranq me, Doc. Nothing a shower, a couple of ice packs and eight hours of sleep won’t cure.” Suddenly every muscle in her body insisted on lying down, and she slumped against the door. “How about your patients? Both going to be okay?”

“Dr. T’Soni is suffering from exposure, exhaustion, and dehydration. She’ll be fine by morning.” Dr. Chakwas looked from the asari still sleeping on the far bed back to Nihlus on the closest. “Spectre Kryik tore a ligament in his right, proximal ankle joint. A night in a regen field and a couple of days rest will see it right.”

Shepard gave her a bone-weary smile and shoved off the doorjamb. “Excellent. I’m off to take a shower and lapse into unconsciousness. Good night, Doc . . . Nihlus.” She turned and hobbled away before Nihlus could do anything more than open his mouth.

A half hour later, Shepard checked through her messages, having received one from an Admiral Kahoku in reference to her inquiries about Armistan Banes, Dr. Michel’s blackmailer. His men supposedly found Banes’s body on a ship, but those same men had just disappeared in the Sparta system. She replied, offering to stop in the system to check it out on their way to Eden Prime.

“Curiouser and curiouser,” she grumbled, and sent out a crew memo that they’d be heading for Sparta. After notifying the ground team to meet for a quick briefing at the Mako prior to dropping at 0800, she had Pressley set their course and then put her computer to bed.

Shepard collapsed onto her bed, wishing the Alliance knew the difference between granite and mattress material. Her hands throbbed like they were trying to jump off her wrists and make a break for freedom, and her knee had swollen to the point where it looked like a small football had taken refuge inside her trouser-leg. Closing her eyes, she let out a long, slow breath.

“So tired,” she moaned, stretching a little. Horizontal felt glorious. Painful, but glorious.

Knuckles rapped on the door.
“Seriously? Come on, people, give the captain a break. Pressley has the ship,” she shouted without opening her eyes.

“Not really all that eager to talk to Pressley, actually,” a warm, dual-toned voice called from the other side. “I think I’d rather knife fight Chief Williams for the last donut and then eat it.”

Shepard grinned. “Come in, C-Sec.” She didn’t get up. If he was uncomfortable with his captain splattered in a ruined heap on her bed, he could leave.

The door opened and Garrus walked in. He stopped just inside, then let out a sharp breath and nodded. “Yeah, that’s about what I thought.” He walked over to the desk and set a small crate on it, then passed her a large insulated thermos. “It’s soup. I figured after the way you were handling your guns that a fork or spoon would be out of the question.”

“Thanks. I appreciate the thought, but I’m not hungry.” She took the thermos and set it on her nightstand.

“You’re what? Forty seven kilos soaking wet, in armour? Yes, you’re freakishly tiny . . ..” His mandibles fluttered. “. . . and freakishly strong, but you’re still too skinny. Besides, we just spent the better part of five hours outrunning lava. You’ve got be hungry.” He pulled her chair over next to the bed and sat. “I just downed four ration bars without chewing.” He sat and shrugged then put the thermos back in her hands. “Although with those, it’s best not to.”

Frowning, Shepard tilted her head off to the side. “Yeah, I guess the groceries aren’t the best for you guys, are they?” She took a sip of soup, her brow wrinkling. “Wow, this is good. Tomato made with milk?” Narrowing her eyes, she gave him a considering scowl. “How did you know about that? You really have been going through my file, haven’t you?”

He bobbed his head in what she was learning amounted to a turian shrug. “I wanted to know who I was signing on with. You make a . . . colourful first impression.” Turning in his chair, he opened the crate. “It’s just rehydrated soy milk. Only kind in the refrigeration unit.”

She reached out and laid her hand on his knee. “C-Sec. Thanks. I appreciate the thought.” She set the thermos down. “Next time we hit a world with dextro supplies, I’ll take you and Tali ashore with me. You can do some shopping, get some food that isn’t ration bars.” Flopping onto her pillows, she sighed. “If they’re anything like the levo ones . . ..” She gave an exaggerated shudder.

Flopping her arm across her brow, Shepard relaxed into the mattress. “Thanks for the soup. You didn’t hit me as the caretaker type, C-Sec.”

He shrugged and deadpanned. “I’m a complex fellow . . . an enigma, really.”

She laughed, her first decent belly laugh in days. “Yeah.” She picked up the thermos and sipped her soup. “Yeah, I guess you are at that.” Still not bothering to sit up enough to do more than drink, she met his eyes. “You did some good work in there today. Go get some rest. You don’t need to fuss over me.”

He took the mug and set it on the nightstand and held out his hands. “Come on, show them to me.”

Shepard’s laugh cut bright and sharp. “We don’t know one another well enough for that, C-Sec. Besides, I didn’t think turians were into breasts.”

His mandibles fluttered, and he cleared his throat. “Nice try. You know I meant your hands. Drop your shields, and let’s see what’s under the gloves.”
Shepard grumbled and peeled the soft glove off the hand closest to him, wincing as the pressure disappeared and the throbbing upped in volume. She held out the purple and black, still-taped, swollen mess. “I don’t think anything is really broken. It’s just bruising.”

He took her hand between both of hers, feeling along the bones and fingers with far more care than she would have expected. “You showered and left the tape on?” He picked at the end of the tape, working it off slowly.

“I couldn’t grip it to peel it off,” she admitted. “Leave it, it’s helping control the swelling.”

“You’re going to lose a finger or two if we don’t take it off,” he growled as she tried to pull her hand back. “So, what did Kryik say or do to cause this?”

Scowling, Shepard snatched her hand back, then gave up when he just captured it again. “What makes you think it was Nihlus? Maybe I’m just a crazy woman who beats on immovable objects for something to do.”

He cut off the bit of tape he’d removed, then coiled an ice wrap around her hand, turning the appendage into a flipper. “We’ll let them numb up a bit. As for the crazy woman . . . could be. The crazy part is definitely accurate.” His mandibles fluttered in a way she recognized as a teasing smile. “But, you’ve got a nice matching set of boxer’s fractures that should be in med bay, and they aren’t. Pretty sure you aren’t avoiding Dr. Chakwas, so it’s either Dr. T’Soni or Kryik.” He gestured for her to give him the other hand. “And, T’Soni hasn’t been around long enough.”

Shepard rolled over on her side and placed her fingers in his talons. She winced preemptively when he moved to slip off her glove, but he took more care than she had. “Harkin wouldn’t talk to Nihlus because he was afraid of the council. Instead of Nihlus beating him to death, I used my feminine wiles to get him to talk.”

He chuckled. “Ah. Jealousy.”

Shepard laughed. “Yeah, right, C-Sec. That’s insane for so many reasons.”

He nodded. “It’s still true.” He wrapped another ice wrap around that hand, then placed the thermos between her flippers. “Eat.”

She sipped the soup, glaring at him the whole time. “Nihlus is only interested in being a pain in my ass.”

Garrus leaned back. “If that was the case, he wouldn’t have recommended you to the council. Spectres have better things to do than mentor random candidates just to make their lives miserable.” He shrugged. “I don’t know all that much about humans, but out here, people like you are pretty rare.”

“I’m just a soldier, C-Sec. Nothing rare here.” She sat up, pressing her back against the wall, and pulled her knees up to her chest.

“I’ve read your file.” He focused on taking supplies out of the crate, not putting any pressure on her. “Most of the early stuff is redacted, but I can make a pale guess as to what happened on Mindoir based on the fact you came out alive but living on the street and hooked on Hallex.”

She turtled up further. “I don’t talk about that.”

He moved over to the bed since she’d withdrawn beyond his reach and began unwinding one hand. “You kicked it though, became a champion athlete, one of the Alliance’s most decorated. Not many addicts manage to pull off that transition.”

Shepard watched him peel the tape off her hand, not sure how she’d gotten suckered into this conversation. She sighed and whispered, “He called me a whore.”

He nodded and cocked a brow plate. “Your MO is pissing people off. You’ve been called worse.”

Chuckling, she nodded. “Was called a gangrenous, prolapsed elcor cloaca once. I think that might have been Ambassador Udina, actually.” A tight grin attempted to change the subject. “He really hates me.”

“So?” Finished unwrapping that hand, he balled up the tape and tossed it into the crate.

“Dammit, C-Sec, I said I don’t talk about this stuff.” He shrugged, and she grumbled. “It was the way he said it, like I made him sick. And now, I really am done talking about this.”

“So, tomorrow, Edolus to investigate the mysterious Armistan Banes?”

He surprised her. She’d thought he’d keep pushing, the interrogator in him unable to let it go before she’d confessed her entire soul. A tiny smile forced its way onto her lips, lifting just the corner of her mouth.

“Yeah,” she said after a moment, watching him from under heavily lidded eyes. “I have no idea why I’m going through all this effort to find some mad scientist, but something about it is nagging me. Since we’re in the neighbourhood, we can check out the admiral’s missing men before heading to Eden Prime.” She grinned. “At the very least, Dr. Michel will be grateful. You could get lucky, C-Sec. She likes you.”

He cleared his throat and focused on packing her hand in ice. “The doctor is a good woman.”

Her grin widened. “Ohhh, I see. You know about her little crush. Not as oblivious as you let on.”

Cocking a brow plate at her, he held up her hand, and she laughed, bright and heavy.

“Yeah,” she said, still smiling. “Yeah, you see everything.” She chugged him on the shoulder. “You’re all right, C-Sec.”
Chapter Sixteen

Chapter Summary

Who is this Armistan Banes? Is it worth risking your life riding in the Mako with Shepard driving to find out?

Knuckles rapped on the door. Shepard looked at Garrus, then sighed, and called out, “That door will detonate in ten seconds. If you don’t want to get blown into chunks, go away.”

“Not a very practical means of sending people away in a space faring vessel,” Dr. Chakwas’s prim voice called from the other side. “You might want to consider electric shocks or some other means that won’t result in a hull breach.”

Shepard laughed. “I’ll take that under advisement. Come on in, Doc.” When the door opened and the doctor stepped through, the captain laughed. “Electric shocks, Doc? You are a sick woman. I knew I liked you.”

The doctor walked over and perched on the chair that Garrus had vacated. “I went through the readings from your armour and prepared some treatment that I am pleased to see Officer Vakarian has already begun.”

“Hey,” Shepard protested. “How do you know that I didn’t just start treating myself?”

The doctor deadpanned, “Painkillers and some supplements and absorption enhancers to help with the boxer’s fractures.”

Shepard tilted her head, giving the doctor a dubious scowl. “There’s nothing in the pain meds that will cause . . .” She broke off, her face heating up as she felt Garrus’s eyes on her. Last thing she needed to do was to draw attention to her issues yet again,

“Don’t worry, Captain,” the doctor said, sounding a little insulted. “There are no triggering ingredients in this pain medication.”

“In that case,” Shepard said, leaning to the side to open up her throat for the injection. “The painkillers will be welcome. They’ll have worn off by morning, though, right? I have to drive the Mako.”

Dr. Chakwas harrumphed a little. “Yes, you’ll be clear-headed and able to drive, although from what I’ve heard about your driving, no one would have known the difference.” She administered the shot. “What was it again? Four waterfalls before you got the Mako to shore?”

Garrus chuckled, earning him a narrow-eyed glare.

Shepard shook her head, affecting indignation. “I think people in the Alliance military need to spend more time defending Earth and all her holdings and less time gossiping.”

The doctor unwrapped Shepard’s hands, clucking over them a bit before injecting both of them. “They should be fine by morning. Keep the ice on for twenty minutes and then off.” She held up a regen frame. “This is going on your knee.” She motioned for Garrus to look away, then helped Shepard out of her boots and trousers and into shorts. Once the regen frame glowed around the captain’s knee, the doctor stood.

“My work here is done,” she proclaimed, striding to the door. “I’d better get back to med bay before Nihlus manages a successful escape attempt. Good night, Captain . . . Officer Vakarian.”

Shepard slid down into her pillows as the meds began to take effect. Garrus covered her up with her sheets and blanket, but seemed in no hurry to leave. He stretched out a little at the end of the bed, letting out a stiff groan.

“I’m not going to do something crazy if you aren’t guarding me,” she grumbled. “You can go about your business.”

He just muttered something that her translator didn’t catch and semi-reclined across the bottom corner of her bed. She blinked, staring at him as his features blurred a little, finding him pleasant to look at. More pleasant as the moments passed, and her eyes drooped heavy.

“Hey, C-Sec,” she said, barely able to keep her eyes open, drifting off between words.

“Yeah, Shepard?” He let out a long breath.

“Those painkillers are kicking in, aren’t they?”

“Mmmhmmmm.” She grinned, almost drunkenly. “They are. Happy, happy painkillers. Your nose whistles when you sigh. Did you know that?” Her eyes slipped closed. “If I told you something, would you promise to forget by tomorrow?”

He chuckled. “Consider it forgotten.” The mattress moved as he shifted.

“It’s a secret,” she whispered, her index finger wavering in front of her lips, “but I thought god had given me something awesome to make up for the slavers killing my folks and . . . well, they fucked me up, C-Sec. Pretty bad.” She scratched the end of her nose and yawned.

“But, I don’t talk about that.” She raised her eyebrows even though her eyes stayed shut. “Anyway . . . you know, I thought he’d said, ‘Here, Jane, I’ll give you these skills and a path that’ll help you save other people from living through the same shit you have’. ” Low and musical, Shepard sighed. “How stupid, huh?” She gave her head a heavy, lopsided shake. “So stupid, cuz, no matter what, there’s always another bad guy, more people getting hurt.”

She turned over on her side and opened her eyes a slit. “Kryik called me a whore. Ironic, huh? Since I’ve never actually let anyone touch me.”

A wide yawn split her face, and she slid down into her blankets. “Will you stay until I go to sleep?”

The turian cleared his throat. “Sure. Get some sleep, Shepard. We have a long road ahead.”

Shepard let out a dramatic sigh and smacked her lips together a little as her head relaxed down into her pillow. “You were really heavy. Thought my hands were going to rip off.”

“You’re high. Go to sleep.”

A strange, rumbling purr woke Shepard some time later. Yawning, she rolled over and looked at the chronometer next to her bed: 0330. “Still the middle of the night,” she grumbled and turned back over, tugging her covers up around her ears. Letting out a sharp sigh, she realized that the rumbling sound was still there. She’d spent time on a lot of ships, but never heard a sound like that before.

The sound stopped with an abrupt snort and her bed moved.

“What the . . .?” Shepard sat up then laughed. “Hey, C-Sec,” she whispered. “Don’t mean to alarm you, but you’re about to wake up in the captain’s rack.”

Garrus shifted a little, his head and shoulders still propped up against the wall, his lower legs hanging over the end of the bed.

“And you’re probably going to regret falling asleep in that position.” She reached out, shaking his shoulder gently, not wanting to startle him. “Wake up, C-Sec. It’s time to go find your own rack.”

His eyes opened, and he stared at her for a few seconds before jumping up. “Shepard!” He smoothed his tunic and glanced around as if he expected enemies to manifest through the walls. “I . . . um . . .”

“Fell asleep.” She chuckled and shrugged. “It’s not a big deal. Go on, go find a more comfortable place to sleep. I’ll see you later on.”

He backed toward the door, still self-consciously trying to straighten himself out. “Ah, yeah. Goodnight, Shepard.” He hit the door control, stepping through when it opened.

“Hey, C-Sec . . . Garrus,” Shepard called after him.

Garrus paused and turned back.

“Thanks.” She gave him a thin smile. “Thanks a lot.”

His mandibles fluttered. “My pleasure. Now go back to sleep.” He chuckled and stepped out.

“Vakarian?”

Shepard winced at the tone of Nihlus’s voice. “Fuck me, I don’t need this right now.” What was the Spectre even doing out of med bay?

“Taking the new CO out for a test drive?”

Shepard bolted up off the bed, but slowed when Garrus let out a disgusted chuff of air.

“You don’t know anything about Shepard, Kryik. Maybe you should pull your head out of your cloaca long enough to talk to her and learn a few things.”

“That must have been some test drive, if she’s already got you defending her honour.” Nihlus spat the words with venom that confounded the hell out of her. Shepard wrestled the sheets off the regen frame and clambered up onto her feet.

“She doesn’t need me to defend it since it’s not in question. Yours, however . . .”

Shepard hobbled out the door at the sound of a small scuffle. “What the hell is going on out here?” The two turians stood nose to nose, their entire bodies poised to do damage. “Vakarian, you don’t need to defend me to him any more than he has the slightest right to question anything about me.” She nodded toward the elevator. “Thanks for your help and the talk. Much appreciated. Get some rest.”

She turned weary eyes to Nihlus. “Get in here. Now.”
He bristled, then backed down and stalked past her.

Shepard shot Kaidan an apologetic grimace. The soldier sat at the table dressed in his sleepwear, looking incredibly uncomfortable and nursing a cup of something steamy. “Sparky, is everything okay?”

“Yeah, Captain. Just a bad dream. I thought I’d grab a cup of cocoa before going back to sleep.” He gave her a concerned scowl and nodded toward her door. “You okay? Need backup?”

A grateful smile passed over her lips as she shook her head. “Nah, I can handle it. Get yourself back to bed, soldier. It’s late. Thanks, though.” She waited for him to nod, then followed Nihlus into her quarters.

“So, found someone who liked your bed?” the Spectre asked the moment the door shut.

Shepard limped over to him and snapped to attention, hands clasped behind her back, her entire bearing rigid and formal. “Spectre Kryik, I have reached the end of my tolerance for your behavior. I command this ship and need to maintain the respect of the men and women aboard her. You will cease making snide comments and allegations about my sexual activities.” She blew out a sharp breath. “And, if I hear you speaking to a member of the crew the way you just spoke to Officer Vakarian, I will eject you from this vessel. Is that clear?”

He scowled, his mandibles dropping, brow plates lowering. He reached out to grip her hand, releasing her like she was on fire when a low, thin scream made it out between her lips. Antagonism turned to concern in a flash. “What? What is it?”

She shook her head and strode past him. “I’m fine, just lay off the attitude, Kryik. You don’t know anything about me.”

He followed her. “What’s going on? You’re hurt?”

“C-Sec helped me take care of it.” She nodded toward the door. “I told you that I would never sleep with anyone under my command. I never have, and I never will. That is the end of the subject. Forever.”

Rather than walking away, he closed the distance between them. “What happened to you? Why are you like this?”

“That is a long and boring story, Nihlus. Just leave it with the fact that you don’t need to concern yourself with it. If this is some sort of twisted jealousy . . .” She shook her head. “Well, calling me a whore is not acceptable behaviour. Is that understood?”

When he didn’t answer, she turned to look into his eyes. “Is that understood, Nihlus?”

He stepped toward her, his eyes softening for the first time in days, his brow plates lowered. “What was all that? With me?”

Shepard shook her head, exhausted, hitting the downward crash side of the mini-dose of adrenaline. “Oddly enough, genuine attraction. Something that comes along . . . well, something that hasn’t come along.” She nodded toward the door. “Don’t let it concern you, it won’t interfere with our working partnership. I’m over it. Now, please . . . I’m tired.”

He reached out to touch her hair, but she ducked out from under his hand. He sighed. “Shepard, I’m . . . I’m sorry for what I said. I didn’t mean to be cruel, you just . . . you drive me crazy with your smart mouth and your constant . . .” He chuffed. “What you did with Harkin. Yes, you got the information, but at what cost?” He stepped closer to her. “Was what we got from him worth cheapening yourself?”

Shepard sighed and met his eyes with a completely closed stare. “It didn’t cheapen me, Nihlus. I decide what I allow to cheapen me. That didn’t even ping the ladar. What you said to me in the gym and that little scene out there a minute ago, that cheapens me, and it cheapens you. You haven’t known me very long, and you’ve had the crappiest couple of days on record, so I’ve been willing to cut you some slack, but that ends now.”

She walked over to her chair and sat, lifting her shoulders in a small shrug. “I get it, Nihlus, I do. You loved Saren like a brother, maybe even as a father figure, and he tried to kill you in cold blood. The council you’ve served faithfully may also be betraying you, and now you’re an honourable soldier left asking yourself how many of those missions they’ve sent you on have been dishonourable.”

Shaking her head, she looked around the room as if it encompassed not just the Normandy, but their entire mission. “Now we’ve been cast adrift, no real idea what we’re facing, or even how to figure it out. Trust me, I’m feeling that as much as you are. I also understand that I’m a wild card, and for all you know, I’ll end up betraying you as well. I’m not going to try to convince you otherwise. That knot will untangle when it does.”

The resolute iron rod snapped straight in her spine. “We have to work together, and I think we do all right on that front, so let’s keep things professional. Trust me when I say the message that you find me morally repugnant has been received. If you cannot interact with me without resorting to name calling, then you need to find alternative transport. We can always coordinate the search via comms.”

He straightened, his face showing remarkable shock for a turian. “Shepard . . ..” He let out an exasperated chuff of air.

“We’re fine, Nihlus. I’ll see you at the debriefing in a few hours. You should get back into med bay before Dr. Chakwas realizes you’re gone and tranqs you again.” She just stared at him until he turned and walked to the door. When he left without saying anything else, Shepard let out a long, relieved breath and moved over to her bed.

Before she lowered the light, she glanced down at the end of the bed where Vakarian had passed out jammed up against the wall. She grinned and laid down, dimming the lights but not all the way.

“What a very strange turn your life has taken, Jane Shepard,” she said and yawned. Her eyes closed and she drifted off to sleep.

* * * * *

Three hours later, she rolled out of bed, stiff, but able to move her hands and touch her knee without screaming. Once free from the regen frame, she flexed her knee a couple of times. Serviceable. Today’s mission didn’t involve running, so she should be fine. Dressing quickly, she grabbed a dried fruit bar from the galley and headed up to the comm room.

“Sparky, my friend,” she said to Kaidan as he placed a mug of hot chocolate in her hand, “you will be a general some day. I swear I’ll make that happen.” She sat in her seat and sipped her hot chocolate while the rest of the ground team and Dr. T’Soni filed in, taking seats around the room.

An hour later, Shepard sat slumped in her chair for a long moment, waiting for the pounding in her “Note to self: asari mind-melds hurt.”

“Bit too late for that note too,” Garrus called from the door as he followed the others out.

“Get to work, C-Sec,” she yelled after him, then grinned.

Her head really did hurt. Shepard let out a long sigh and shoved herself up out of her chair. A couple of aspirin would see her right, well, except for the nightmarish images that T’Soni had stirred up like a wand blender cutting its way through her grey matter. The vision didn’t make any more sense, but at least the asari had been able to clear it up a bit. Her suspicion that the images were a distress call solidified into a certainty. It had been the last desperate attempt of a dying people to warn those who came after. As horrific as its contents were, the message itself broke her heart.

She headed down to her locker, putting on her armour automatically as she worried through what everything meant. They had so few pieces to the puzzle, none of them edge pieces, and someone had thrown out the box. How would they ever fit it together in time?

“I only recall assigning two of you to this mission,” she called, striding up to the small crowd of people waiting at the back end of the Mako. “With my driving reputation, I’m surprised the two I assigned aren’t hiding somewhere.”

“I like to live dangerously,” Garrus said, “so I was hoping you’d change your mind and take me along, but I think the rest of them just want to know what it’s like to . . ..” He raised and softened his voice to imitate Dr. T’Soni’s. “. . . embrace eternity.”

Alenko blushed, giving himself away even though he was one of the two actually assigned to the mission.

Wrex cleared his throat and shrugged. “I’ve had sex with asari, so I already know. I’m just here to shoot things.” He rolled his shoulders and hitched up his armour.

“Come on, ma’am,” Williams said, shrugging as if she didn’t really care, but her eyes shone bright with curiosity. “It looked freaky as hell. What did it feel like?”

Shepard took a long breath, letting it out as she narrowed her eyes, affecting a deep thoughtfulness. “It felt like having someone stick their fingers straight into your eyeballs, and then sort through your neurons like flipping through a card file. Then, when they found what they were looking for, they ripped it out . . ..” She performed a wild ripping gesture to emphasize her words. “. . . balled it up, and then ate it.” She scrunched up the imaginary card file, popped into her mouth and chewed. “Mmm mmm good. I’m pretty sure all my memories before I turned five are gone now.”

Waving her hands, she shooed them away. “Everyone who isn’t going on the mission, begone. Work awaits you all.” She looked to Wrex and Kaidan. “People who are going on the mission, into the Mako.” Swooping her hands toward the hatch, she ushered them in. “Time’s a’wastin’.”

Giving Garrus an apologetic grin, she shook her head. “Sorry C-Sec, the Mako is full. We’ll see you in a couple of hours.”

He let out a long, sorrowful sigh, his shoulders sagging in his armour. “I knew everything would change once we slept together.”

A sharp, startled laugh escaped her, and Shepard punched him in the shoulder hard enough to make her hand complain. “You . . ..” She jerked her head away from the Mako. “Go find something to do, C-Sec, and stay out of trouble.” She climbed into the Mako and closed the hatch, still shaking.
her head. “Slept together . . . Sweet baby Jesus . . . cheeky buggers, the lot of you.”

“Crews do tend to look to their captains, emulating their behavior,” Kaidan said, slipping into the passenger seat.

Shepard thumped down behind the controls. “Now there is a wise career move. Emulate the woman most likely to get Cat 6’ed and sent to a retirement home on Protoplanet Vesta.”

Kaidan frowned and cocked his head. “Isn’t that in the asteroid belt between Mars and Jupiter?”

“It’s a really terrible retirement home,” she replied.

He shook his head. “Star of Terra for holding off the batarians during the Skyllian Blitz, Captain of the Normandy, Spectre candidate . . . we could do worse.”

Shepard grumbled and focused on getting the Mako ready to drop.

Twenty minutes later, the vehicle plunged across the surface of Edolus at maximum speed.

“You know, it does have other speeds,” Kaidan called as the tank leaped off another small hill.

“Where is the fun in that?” Shepard glanced over at the navigation system. “We should be coming up on Kahoku’s men any minute.”

Kaidan activated the vid screen where a windshield would be in a vehicle that didn’t have to withstand enemy fire. He pointed off to their right. “APC at our two o’clock. Looks like a Grizzly.”

Shepard changed their course. “Ruined APC in the middle of nowhere. Nice, flat, grassland . . .”

“Thresher nest!” Wrex shouted from the back.

“Yep.” Even as Shepard answered, the ground ahead of them exploded upward, a massive, tentacled nightmare erupting from the peaceful valley floor. Shepard aimed straight for it, yelling, “Shoot it, gentlemen! Shooting it would be good.”

The monster spat a glob of acid that splashed against the front right corner of the Mako’s roof. Kaidan ducked, even though the acid didn’t burn through all the way. At least, not at first.

Shepard hooted with manic glee and pulled the tank into a tight circle around the worm. “The key, Brothers Sparky and Wrex, is to keep the Thresher Maw above ground.”

“I’m going to puke,” Kaidan gasped, despite his hands remaining steady on the firing control for the machine gun, sending short bursts of bullets at the creature.

Shepard just kept circling, giving her gunners time to adapt to her maneuvers, but also giving the Maw time to do some decent damage with its acid. “Okay, heading for high ground and repairs, gentlemen.” She peeled off, heading for a steep rise of rock, weaving the tank back and forth across the path to avoid most of the acid bursts.

“It’s going to come up under us!” Wrex yelled as the thresher disappeared underground. “It’s going . . .”

The Mako exploded off the ground, flipping over in the air. The damage sensors began to scream. Shepard hit the thrusters, pulsing them with one hand to slow the tank’s descent while using the other to manipulate the eezo core to lower their mass as much as she could manage. The second the tires touched ground, she hit the accelerator, sending it careening up the side of the rocky hill.
“Holy crap,” she said, laughing weakly as they reached the top of the hill, well out of the maw’s reach. “That was exciting! We nearly bought the farm there, boys.” She hit the omni-gel, sending the miraculous goo shooting along the tank’s bloodlines to make emergency repairs.

Reaching over, she slapped Kaidan’s shoulder companionably. “You okay there, Sparky? Still breathing?” Craning around over her shoulder, she caught Wrex’s red-eyed, dirty glare. “What?”

He just grumbled and shook his head.

Shepard shrugged. “I thought I got us out of that admirably.” The repair protocol alerted her that it had completed its work, and she reached out to stroke the console with a loving hand. “How’s that, old girl? Nothing like a nice shot o’ tank medi-gel to make you perk right up.” Turning back toward the lowland, she dropped it into a low gear for the descent. “Here’s the plan, gentlemen. We’re going to head straight out, when it shows itself, I’m going to circle around it twice, keeping it on our left. You shoot the crap out of it. Then, we come back up out of range. You know, providing it’s not dead.”

“Captain . . ..” Kaidan looked at her, his mouth gasping a little like a fish’s for a second, then he just shook his head and turned to his controls.

Shepard hit the accelerator and the Mako rumbled back down to the nest. The thresher came back out almost the same spot, giving it lots of opportunity to spit acid at them as they careened across the grassland, swerving like drunken lunatics, which, coincidentally was what Wrex kept calling Shepard.

She ignored him and pulled into the circle, keeping the maw on the tank’s left for two circles. This time she took slightly more tangential route to the cliff, trying to avoid the creature coming up underneath them.

“Hey, Sparky,” Shepard yelled.

“What?”

“Duck.” She grabbed the back of his neck and shoved his head under the console as she swerved to take the incoming glob of acid on the right front quarter of the Mako. When it passed, just grazing the roof, she let him back up.

She drove straight up the cliff on the left side of the low area, keeping the accelerator to the floor until they reached an outcropping high enough to be safe from the Thresher’s acid, and big enough to park the tank for a few seconds.

“I see a bright light, Captain,” Alenko whispered, looking decidedly green. “Should I go toward the light?”

“Not unless you want to fall off the edge of the cliff, Sparky. That’s just the sun coming in the hole the thresher burned through your door.” She gave the Mako a shot of tank medi-gel and sat back, one elbow cocked on the side control panel, the other resting casually on her thigh.

She turned back and grinned at Wrex. “How’s it going back there?”

He said nothing, but turned his head to show her the still smoking spot on his head casing. She gave him an impressed nod. “Nice. You’re going to come through this with a souvenir.”

The tank repair protocol dinged, letting her know that all functions that could be repaired, were repaired. “Okay gentlemen, once more into the breach.” She turned the Mako downhill. “Wrex, “Keep shooting that damn thing right where it sticks out of the ground. Blast me a hole through there, will yah?”

“Shepard, wait . . ..” The krogan let out a roaring moan. “What are you . . .?”

“Sparky, same goes for you. Fire smart, don’t overheat the gun, but keep it aimed right smack in the middle where it comes out of the ground.” She hit the accelerator, roaring downhill to give the cumbersome vehicle some momentum before it hit the grass. They made it maybe ten metres out into the open before the Thresher exploded out of the ground a Mako-width off the front left quarter panel.

“Woohoo! All right boys, this is where you do your thing.” Shepard kept the throttle open full and pulled a hard left, trying to make it angry enough to stay above ground. “I hate it when it pops up under us,” she grunted, heading back to the rock wall again.

“Wrex! Are you unloading that canon into that thing’s neck?” she bellowed as the ground shook, the Thresher heading underground. “Oh dear, this could be where we all die. Sweet baby Jesus, I confess, well, most of my sins . . ..”

The back end of the tank flew upward, slamming her down into the seat, then throwing her forward into her harness, her head smacking a corner of something. The sound of metal grinding over stone filled the cab. For what seemed an eternity, the Mako slid along on its nose, then the back end dropped. Stunned, but her hands still on the controls, Shepard kept the throttle open, returning to the ledge. An ear-piercing roar reverberated through the cabin like a dentist drill to the brain.

“Sparky! Stop screaming, we’re alive,” she yelled, wiping blood out of her eyes. She hit the tank medi-gel again.

“That’s not me,” Kaidan said, his voice weak and thready. “I’m too terrified to scream. I need a can opener, a small electrical device and a car battery.”

Shepard glanced back at Wrex. “Really? That sound was coming out of you?”

“I think all my ancestors just pissed on my grave.” The krogan collapsed backward in his seat, his arms and head hanging.

“What do you need the car battery for, Sparky?” Shepard asked, giving Wrex’s theatrics a dismissive wave.

“Open heart surgery. Need it to run the pacemaker.”

She let out an incredulous laugh. “You two are such pansies. Tell me this isn’t fun.”

“This isn’t fun!” they yelled in unison.

“Pansies.” She muttered to herself until the repair protocol dinged. “Same thing, gentlemen. Let’s go.”

Letting out a hearty whoop, she sent the mako roaring back down. This time, the thresher was waiting right at the base of the cliff, but that gave Shepard a chance to get a head start on it and she laid the Mako flat out in a charge across to the low hills on the south side.

“This is insane, Captain!” Kaidan yelled. “It’s going to come up under us. It’s going to come up under us.”
Then ground shook, the Thresher roar so close and so loud that the Mako shivered with it, but it missed.

“Shoot that thing, gentlemen,” Shepard called, swerving the cumbersome tank out of the way of an acid ball. She checked the maw’s readings on sensors. Good, their concentrated fire was doing the trick. She spun the Mako around, not giving the thing a chance to go back underground. “Keep up the fire, Wrex.”

“What are you doing?” Wrex screamed. Shepard heard his finger hitting the firing control constantly, but just aimed the Mako like a giant, awkward missile.

“Goodnight, Thresher,” Shepard called, aiming straight for the thing’s neck.

A glob of acid hit the roof at the back, sending Wrex into a paroxysm of screaming krogan curses vile enough to make their ears melt. Shepard didn’t bat an eyelash.

“You’re not . . .?” Kaidan squealed. “You’re going to get us killed!”

“Glory hallelujah, Brother Sparky. Praise be to the merciful Enkindlers.”

With a slam that smacked Shepard’s head into the same metal edge she’d hit the last time, the Mako smashed straight into the thresher maw’s neck. For a moment that seemed to last a half hour or so, Shepard thought Sparky had been right, and she’d gotten them all killed. Then, in a massive spray of goo, blood, and guts, the tank erupted through the back side and the giant worm collapsed onto the shuddering ground. Dead.

“Yes!” Shepard crowed, throwing her hands in the air. “Glory hallelujah and kiss the great big glowing asses of the Enkindlers. We just drove a Mako through a worm, gentlemen.”

Shepard pulled the tank over next to the source of the distress call and parked it. “Well, now we’re here, let’s see what happened to Kahoku’s men. Just be careful getting out, the whole tank’s going to be covered in thresher acid.” She unbuckled her harness and climbed out.

About ten metres from the transmitter, a burned out APC laid tilted on its side. Bodies of Alliance Marines lay strewn around the entire area, most of them so badly burned it would be impossible to identify them. Shepard sighed and shook her head. “Damn shame. Someone lured them into this trap, but who? And what the hell does this have to do with Armistan Banes?”

Alenko crouched next to one of the bodies, gingerly removing the man’s dog tags. “Lt. Kieffer.” He winced as he looked down at the remains. “Only reason I can think of for killing off the unit that discovered Banes’s body is to cover up that it wasn’t Banes at all.”

Looking over the waste of life, Shepard nodded. “Gather up their tags, gentlemen. I’ll climb in the wreck and see if their recorders caught anything.” Ten minutes later, the recordings downloaded to her omni-tool, she called for the Normandy to pick them up, and began preparing the Marines for return to the Alliance.

When, at last, Shepard drove up the ramp and into the cargo bay, she let out a triumphant yell. “Gentlemen, we have driven through the belly of the beast and survived.” She parked it and started flipping off switches, powering it down.

“Literally,” Kaidan sighed. He unfastened his harness and turned off the gun. “I need to write home, ask mom to send me a box of new underwear.”

“I think somewhere, there’s an entire store filled with already shat on underwear with my name on “It,” Wrex said. “Remind me to say no when you ask me to go along next time, Shepard.”

“Babies.” She turned off the key and unfastened her harness, following the other two out. “My underwear is daisy fresh.”

Wrex’s eyes slid over her, then he grunted and shook his head. “Now mine feels a little tight.”

“And I feel uncomfortable . . . also pretty sure I didn’t need to know either of those things,” Kaidan called over his shoulder, fleeing for the elevator.

Garrus stood about three metres away from the elevator door, staring at the Mako with his mouth hanging open.

Shepard grinned as she approached him. “Don’t worry, C-Sec, I’ll be down in a half hour to help with repairs. Make sure to hose it down really well before you touch it. Might want to use some sort of industrial solvent.”

“What’s with the green slime and purple tendrils?” he asked, his voice soft and monotone.

She turned back, cocked her head and squinted. “Oh . . . thresher maw intestines.”

He scowled as he looked at her, then reached up to brush her hair away from the clotted slice in her scalp. “Drop by med bay while you’re at it. You’re a constant disaster in progress, aren’t you?”

She shrugged, chuckled, and then clapped him on the back. “See you in a bit.”
Chapter Summary

Mako repairs and all mothers do that.

Clean and dry, her head happily sealed up with medi-gel, Shepard dressed in work clothes and headed out to the galley to make herself a hot drink before going down to help rebuild the Mako.

“Listen! Listen!” Ashley cackled. “This is my favorite part.”

A shrill, tremulous scream roared through the galley, echoing along the length of the space, and the crowd around the table burst into hysterical laughter.

“Yeah, that Wrex has a good set of lungs on him,” Shepard said, just loud enough to announce her presence as she stepped around the corner.

Williams greeted her with a wide grin. “Ah, Captain, we were just reviewing the audio and vid logs from the last mission. For . . . um . . . um . . .”

“Training purposes,” Joker finished for her.

“I can’t believe you drove the Mako through a thresher maw,” the chief said. “That’s either inspired, or completely insane, ma’am.”

Shepard nodded and poured herself a thermos of hot water. “Probably a bit of both. It takes so long to kill them the other way.” She started shovelling hot chocolate mix into the water. “Be careful that the aforementioned krogan with excellent lung capacity doesn’t catch you all cackling over that footage like a bunch of hens.”

She added extra sugar and creamer, then slapped on a lid. “Give Sparky and Wrex some respect. They brought that thing down. All I did was drive.”

As she waited for the elevator, Shepard heard someone whisper. “She’s a lunatic. She’s going to get us all killed.”

“Didn’t get Wrex or Alenko killed, did she?” Ashley asked. “Thresher sure is dead, though.”

“By the way, something else you might want to pass along: your CO has insanely good hearing.” Shepard called. The whispering dropped into awkward silence. Chuckling, she got into the elevator and pressed the control to head down to the cargo bay.

“I think I hate you a little bit, right now,” Garrus’s voice greeted her as she got out. She couldn’t see him.

“Aw, C-Sec, and here I thought we had this unshakeable bond.” She sipped her cocoa and crouched down to look under the machine. “You just getting started?”

“Yes.” He slid out from under the tank’s chassis. “It took me this long to get the guts and acid blood washed off.”

She beamed down at him with a wide, gleeful smile. “Yeah, but damn, C-Sec. It was awesome.” After another sip, she set down her cocoa and climbed under the Mako.

“Not what I heard from Alenko and Wrex.” He grabbed a tool, changed the head on it and passed it to her. “Here, you can change out the rotors, knuckles, hub bearings, dust shields . . .” He cursed. “Just take off the wheels and entire brake mounts then we’ll look at the axles. So much of the metal is replaced by omni-gel that they’ll probably just crumble in your hand.”

Shepard chuckled and took the tool. “Fine, Mr. Grumpy-you-beat-up-on-my-Mako-and-now-I’m-going-to-sulk-pants, I’ll change out the wheels and brake mounts.”

“How much omni-gel did you use, anyway?” Garrus slid back under and set to work on the front axle.

Shepard shrugged as she started ratcheting bolts loose. “I don’t know, seventy-five or so.”

“Seventy-fi --” Garrus sighed. “It’ll take all the salvage from Therum to replace that much omni-gel.”

She let out a long, hard-done-upon grumbling sigh. “Fine, Admiral C-Sec, next time, I won’t do repairs between runs. Aye, aye, sir.” She grinned over at him, finally rewarded with a grudging flick of his mandibles. Chuckling to herself, she dug in. They needed the tank ready for Eden Prime.

After working in companionable silence for about an hour, Shepard’s prying timer went off in her head. Garrus gave her a stubborn, private vibe; the sort of onion that needed a paring knife to peel. Starting early and keeping at it always proved to be the key to the paring knife types. “So, C-Sec, what’s the deal with you and . . . well, C-Sec?”

He glanced her way, then went back to replacing the right front quarter panel. “We’re going to need two hundred and fifty thousand credits worth of replacement parts.”

Shepard sighed. “I’ll make sure the quartermaster has the credits.” She stuck her head out and whistled to the Requisition Officer. “Hey Verblovski . . . Hank! Set Vakarian here up with whatever he needs for the Mako.”

The Alliance officer glanced up from his datapad and nodded. “Yes, ma’am. I’m sending in orders tonight, Officer Vakarian, if you have time to get one together.” After waiting a moment for a reply that didn’t come, he shrugged and went back to work.

Shepard pulled herself back under the Mako. “There, now that completely unsolvable issue is taken care of -- thank god for me, by the way -- you and C-Sec, spill it.” Her hands hesitated halfway to their next task, the query gaining weight as she stared him down, one eyebrow climbing toward her hair.

His answering, non-committal head bob came across smooth but disingenuous, a white chocolate answer. “There’s nothing to spill, Shepard.”

Covering up her mouth, she heaved out a monstrous cough that sent the word, “Bullshit,” bouncing off the bulkheads.

Garrus grumbled, then let out a sigh. “Fine. Let’s just say that I don’t care for the discrepancy between the amount of time I spend fighting the system to help people and the time I spend actually helping people. When bad people hurt good people, that draws a line for me.”

Shepard hummed, vague but aiming for interested as she dug into cutting the last wheel loose. Thresher acid really did eat through anything.

“It’s supposed to be about stopping the criminals,” Garrus continued. “How do you do that when most days it seems there are more laws protecting them than the good, decent normal people? Drug dealers, thieves, and organized crime run rampant while C-Sec and the council shackle our talons at every turn.”

Shepard turned to look at him, meeting his eyes with a narrow stare, fighting to rein in the sharp spark of disapproval that sizzled through her at his words. She had a feeling C-Sec would prove a far more complex onion to peel back than first thought. A sharp nod with a single shoulder shrug encouraged him to keep going while she took cover behind her work.

“Kryik said your father is a legend in the force.” She wrestled with her last wheel, trying to pry it off its mount. It wouldn’t have even been rotating as she drove onto the ship. She turned to lay on her back and kicked it with both feet. “Did that influence your decision at all?”

“Made the entire decision for me.” He wriggled down the length of the Mako and lay next to her. “On three. One . . . two . . . three.” They both kicked, sending the wheel flying halfway across the cargo bay. It rolled the rest of the way, slowly looping around to crash to the floor right behind Ashley.

Williams jumped and let out a foul curse, her reflex flinging a rifle across the cargo bay to land at Wrex’s feet. She spun to face the Mako. “Hey! Keep your toys on your half of the room, Vakarian!” the Chief barked. She shoved and grunted, trying to set the huge wheel upright.

“Keep your toys on your side of the bay too, Pinky.” The krogan kicked the gun back across the floor.

“Pinky? Look, dinosaur boy . . .” Williams swooped down, snatching the gun off the floor looking as though she intended to use it.

“Wait. Wait. Before we start a war, the tire’s all me,” Shepard called. “Sorry. Sorry.” She clambered out from under the tank and trotted over to the tire. “Give me a hand here, Chief, and I’ll get it out of your way.” They tipped the wheel up on its end, and Shepard ran it back, her palms slapping against the treads in a highly satisfying way. Once it was propped up next to its brethren against the bulkhead, she climbed back under and started removing the brake housing.

“So, before we were so rudely interrupted by my escaping wheel, you said that your father made the decision to go into C-Sec for you?” She turned her back to him, sensing that she needed to be an absorptive wall to keep him talking about himself.

“Mmm,’ Garrus replied. “I was happiest building things, taking things apart, drawing and reading. Whenever Dad came home for a couple of days, he’d drag me outside the city and drill me on shooting.” He chuffed, his nose sounding the thin whistle that made her grin. “He’d plant evidence and create crimes for me to solve while he was gone. Although . . .” She glanced over her shoulder in time to see him bob his head a little. “. . . that had its moments. When I was really young, I used to work hard between his visits to solve the mysteries he’d left. It was a chance for us to do something together.”

“He wasn’t around much?” she asked, her voice neutral, back still toward him.
The left front quarter panel hit the deck plating. “No. Work was important. There was always some case or another to be solved.” He dragged the eaten-away metal off to the side and threw it in the recycling bin. “Might have been different if we all lived on the Citadel, but he wanted us to grow up turian.” He deepened his voice, making it more gruff for the last few words.

“Us?” She turned and smiled. “You have a brother or sister?”

He crouched down, picking up a bottle of water he’d stuck behind one of the new tires. “Yeah, a sister. Sol is a very good turian.” His mandibles lowered, and his head jerked back and forth a little. “She blew everyone away during her mandatory military service.” His voice and mandibles lowered. “Could be a general someday.”

Shepard focused on the work for a moment, letting the silence settle thick and comfortable. He wanted to say more, she just needed to wait until he was ready.

Metal banged and clinked behind her, the volume getting louder as time passed. Garrus let out a yelp of pain, then a foul curse. When she turned to face him, he gripped the talons of one hand in the other.

Shepard walked over and held out her hand. “Come on, let me see them.”

Garrus cleared his throat and shook his head. “Shepard, I don’t think we know one another well enough for that. Besides, I didn’t think humans were into ankles.”

She chuckled and tilted her head a little. “Ankles, huh?” She waved her fingers toward her palm. “Come on, C-Sec, your turn to drop the shields.” The rumble he sent through his second larynx made the hair on the back of her neck stand on end, but he pulled off his glove and held out his hand.

“Ow, sweet baby Jesus, C-Sec, that looks painful.” She took his hand in hers, gently feeling around the knuckles he’d barked almost down to the bone. “Looks like it’s just the meat, but ow.”

“I’m fine,” he insisted pulling his hand back.

“Garrus ‘C-Sec’ Vakarian, sit down.” She pointed to the crate next to the tool cart. “Sorry, don’t know if turians have middle names. The mom voice works best if there’s a middle name involved.”

“Human mothers do that too?” Garrus asked, plunking down on the crate, surrendering his hand without a fight.

“All mothers do that,” Wrex sighed and dropped his voice an octave. “Urdnot Alnar Golc Wrex, this is the third brand new shotgun you’ve broken this year. They are not clubs!”

The gunnery chief turned away from her rifles and cocked a hip, her arms crossed to match the petulant grimace on her face. “Ashley Madeline Williams, proper young ladies don’t climb trees before church. Get in here and wash those knees.”

Shepard knelt and splashed water over Garrus’s knuckles before blotting them on a clean rag, then smearing on a little medi-gel and a couple of cling bandages. Leaning back, she shot a sly grin across the cargo bay. “You two were troublemakers. I can’t believe it. I, of course, was the ideal child. Never did anything to make my mother holler at me.”

Laughter echoed.

“What? It’s true. I was the perfect child.” Shepard felt her face heat and turned to putting away the first aid materials.

“What’s everyone laughing about?” Tali’Zorah asked, walking up the ramp from engineering. Shepard stood. “Hey, Tali. How are things in the mysterious room with the engines?”

Garrus arched both browplates and flicked his mandibles at Shepard. “You’re a pretend engineer, aren’t you?”

She kicked his foot.

“This ship is amazing, Shepard, and Engineer Adams has been so nice to me. I’m learning so much.” The quarian bounced over to the Mako. “What’s everyone doing?”

“Comparing mommy issues,” Ashley said. “It seems we all have the experience of our mothers using our full names when they’re angry.”

“Tali’Zorah nar Rayya,” the quarian yelled in a firm voice. “If the hygiene department condemns your room again, you can go sleep in recycling.” She sighed. “Mother died a few years ago, and you all know about my father. I ran away from home when I was five; he grounded me for a quarter cycle. Do I get to ground him when we find him?”

A thoughtful frown traced wrinkles across Shepard’s brow. “You lived on a ship. How did you run away?”

Tali chuckled and sat on the crate next to Garrus. “The Rayya is a very large ship, Shepard. It’s one of the flotilla’s three liveships. I hid in one of the aeroponic bays. Of course, he worked so much that I never spent any time actually grounded.”

“Well, I guess we all have our share of daddy issues as well,” Shepard said, turning back to her work.

“Betting yours didn’t lure you to a clan gathering and then try to kill you, Shepard.” Wrex grumbled.

Shepard prepared to remove the back axle. “I hope you tried to kill him right back. You can’t tolerate that sort of behaviour from relatives.”

Wrex narrowed one red eye, glaring at her for a moment, then laughed. “Heh, yeah, family. Bastards.”

“So?” Tali asked. “What did you do?”

“Stabbed him right through both hearts and left his corpse to rot.”

“I would have been grounded for life,” Tali said, sounding entirely and hilariously serious.

“I was few hundred cycles older than you are,” Wrex replied, then spun to leer at Ashley. “What about you, Pinky? Any daddy issues?”

Ashley shook her head. “No, my dad was a great father. Died a couple of years back. In my family, it was bitter general grandfather issues.” She stopped dead, slamming up barriers over her expression before spinning around and attacking on her rifle.

“General Williams?” Garrus asked. “Shanxi General Williams?” The turian whistled a little.
“I’m surprised you know about him, Vakarian.” Ashley bulwarked her spine and didn’t turn.

The turian snapped his back straight and arched his neck. When he spoke, his voice came out formal and scolding. “A good turian knows his history, Garrus. If a male doesn’t know where he comes from, he’ll never know where he is going.” Garrus pulled on his glove and got up, returning to beating on the Mako’s front end.

“Your grandfather surrendered the garrison at Shanxi?” Shepard asked, looking out. She whistled to match Garrus’s. “That’s a tough break for you and your dad, even though your grandfather had no choice. His people were dying. At least as prisoners, they had a chance.”

“Granddad never really got past being drummed out and the family getting blacklisted.” Ashley shook her head. “Whatever, it doesn’t matter.”

Shepard nodded and climbed out far enough to crouch and meet the Marine’s eyes. “You’re right, Williams. On this ship, it doesn’t matter.”

A tight smile cracked the chief’s face a little. “Thanks, ma’am. I appreciate that.”

“Everybody deserves a chance to prove him or herself on their own merit.” Shepard climbed back underneath the tank.

“Got daddy issues, Shepard?” Ashley asked, obviously trying to lighten the mood. “Or you going with the perfect child defense again?”

Shepard kept working, clanging hard enough to mask her words. “My father was a good man who died inciting the prisoners to resist the batarian slavers.” A smile softened her words, then she shrugged. “So, yeah, probably a few issues here and there.”

Williams gave her a more genuine smile and nodded before turning back to her work in earnest.

Just when inevitable defeat loomed, Shepard wrestled the last rear brake mount free. Giving a whoop of victory, she climbed out and grabbed a large jack to slip under the axle.

“Where did you learn how to take Makos apart and rebuild them?” Garrus appeared at her shoulder to help her maneuver the large jack into place. “The Alliance?”

Shepard hit the control, raising the cylinder to where it began lifting the tank, then backed it down a touch. “My father was a sort of Jack-of-all-trades, an odd-job guy. He never really knew what to do with his life, so he just followed his passions, learning about anything that caught his fancy. Machines were one of them.” She got down on her back and scooted underneath. Loosening bolts a bit at a time, she kept the axle even on the jack.

“Yeah, so I’ve been underneath machines, covered in grease, pretty much my whole life.” She shrugged. “Unlike Kryik’s more tawdry guess at how I paid for my habit, I spent my late teens stripping jacked cars.” Grinning at the expression of surprise on his face, she nodded. “It’s true. That’s how I met up with Anderson again, actually. The people I worked for grabbed a freight truck loaded down with brand new shuttles headed for Alliance headquarters in Vancouver. When I was arrested along with the rest of them, he grabbed me, took me out of the system.”

She looked out. “You want to do the bolts on the other side? Don’t really want this thing tipping off the jack and landing on me.”

Between them, they finished removing the axle and wheeled it out.
“You really are freakishly strong,” Garrus said as she lifted one end of the trashed part and they dumped it into the recycling.

She wiped her greasy hands on the front of her overalls. “Thanks. I --”

“Captain Shepard?” Joker called over the intercom.

“Yeah, here, Joker. What’s up?” She grabbed a rag out of the tool chest and wiped off more of the grease.

“Captain Anderson on the comms, ma’am.”

“On my way, Joker, thanks.” She cocked an eyebrow. “Speak of the devil.” She looked into the reflective trim on the tool chest, searching for smudges of grease on her face.

Garrus grabbed her shoulders, then the rag and wiped at a couple spots on her face. “There, semi-presentable.”

She laughed. “At least you didn’t lick it, Mom.” She strode to the elevator. “I’ll be back.”

Garrus pulled his head back, his mandibles dropping. “Mom? Do human mothers do that licking and wiping your face thing too?”

“All mothers do that,” Wrex sighed.

“Quarian mothers don’t. Guess the bubbles and suits have an advantage after all,” Tali said happily. “See you all later.” Flipping her delicate hand in a friendly wave, she trotted back down to engineering.

Shepard nodded and grinned as she stepped inside. She hit the control and met Garrus’s eyes, tilting her head in a little, half shrug. “Guess we’re all more alike than we thought, huh?”

Shepard’s grin stayed with her until she reached the comm room, then widened as she activated the center terminal and a holographic image of her mentor and oldest friend appeared. “Anderson, it’s great to see you. How are you doing?”

The gruff officer grumbled something under his breath, then nodded and shifted to cross his arms. He always tried for formality to start, but then went to mobile and defensive once she saw him remember that formal meant nothing to Shepard. At last he let out a strong, hard sigh, the corner of his mouth lifting in a grudging smile. “Shepard.”

“How’s life treating you?” she asked, bracing herself for the reply.

“Better than your life would be if you worked with Udina fourteen hours a day.”

She chuckled. “If I worked with Udina for fourteen hours, C-Sec would be hauling one of us away for murder about hour three.” She did her best to look innocent and uninterested. “Speaking of, how did that whole Avina episode work out?”

“If I’d have been able to get my hands around your neck, Shepard . . . . Udina paced back and forth all day, trying to keep people away from it, but of course, the Keeper just kept working and once people realized what the Avina display was saying, they’d run in just close enough to trigger it then take off. Udina tried to shoo it away, it ended up self-destructing, but another one replaced it within five minutes.”
Shepard frowned. “Aww, the poor little Keeper.”

Anderson grumbled. “Glad to see your priorities are intact, as always, Shepard.” He shook his head. “We can argue that over when you get back to the Citadel, and that should be sooner rather than later. The council and Udina are beginning to ask if you and Nihlus aren’t the rogue agents.”

Shepard shook her head. “If the council’s dirty, unless we have irrefutable proof, we’ll just end up with kill orders on our heads, Anderson. We’ll be back when we know what Saren is doing. We got information from that Han’Gerrel that Rael’Zorah is trailing Saren. We’re on our way back to Eden Prime to catch up with him.”

He straightened, going formal again. “That’s why I’m contacting you, Shepard. I . . .” He paused and cleared his throat. “. . . happened upon a distress call from the Exogeni colony on Feros. It was garbled and jammed almost instantly, but it mentioned geth.”

Shepard reached up to her radio. “Pressly, get us underway for Feros, maximum possible speed. Full stealth.” When he confirmed her order, Shepard nodded to Anderson. “How long ago did you receive the call, sir? We’re about eight or nine hours out.”

“About fifteen seconds before I called you, Captain. I intercepted it before Udina saw it, so you’ll have a little lead time. I’m sending you all the information I have on the colony. Good luck, Shepard.”

She nodded, her heart thumping fast and hard. “Thank you, sir. I just hope we get there in time to do something, find something.” She gave him a crisp salute. “Talk to you soon, Anderson.”

He saluted and the image disappeared.

She stared at the space for a second before she lifted her fingers to her ear. “Kryik, we’ve got a lead. Meet me in my quarters.”
“Captain Shepard is ashore. XO Pressly has the ship.”

Shepard rolled her eyes at the VI’s statement of the obvious. On a ship the size of a large bus with a crew of just over fifty, everyone aboard knew when she was in the washroom, let alone off the ship. “Thank you, artificially human-inflected computer program.”

Ashley looked over at her, turning a little as they made their way down the docking tube. “You have something against VI’s, Captain?”

Shepard shook her head. “I have something against lies. That voice they tried to make sound human is a lie. The VI’s made to imitate famous people are the ultimate.” She shrugged Roger into her hands, letting him sit easy at low rest. “Creepy bastards.”

“So, the geth? AIs?” Williams pulled her assault rifle off her back as they stepped onto the dock.

“They aren’t lies, just a different sort of people. As long as they’re just doing their thing and aren’t killing people, I take no issue with them. It’s the getting uppity and trying to commit genocide I’m not a fan of, and that aversion . . . does not . . . limit itself to . . . geth.” She stopped dead in her tracks, Garrus running up her heel. She cocked her head, straining to hear.

“Ma’am?” Ash went on the alert, moving to watch their flank. Liara moved up on Shepard's other side, her pistol trembling a little as it lifted into Shepard's peripheral vision.

“Easy now, Dr. T'Soni. Keep a cool head.” Shepard cocked her head, a low, chittering sound echoing off the cement. "I thought I heard . . . geth!” Shepard sprinted down the docking bay, running parallel to the Normandy. Flashlight heads moved at the end of the space. As she neared the corner, she snapped off the safety and changed her ammo to tungsten rounds. A figure raced around the corner, slipping a little as he turned and came face to face with her gun. Identifying him as human, she grabbed him and tossed him behind her, slamming her back into the concrete pile at the corner.

After sucking in a couple of quick breaths to let the adrenaline settle, she leaned out, shooting in three round bursts. She activated her drone behind the mass of geth as Garrus darted across the open space, taking cover behind a pile on the other wall.

“Normandy, send someone out to grab a civilian in the line of fire. Should be near the docking tube,” Shepard barked into her radio, not waiting for an answer.

“Williams, take my position, I’m moving up.” She peeked out, yanking her head back as plasma rounds pelted her position. “C-Sec, as soon as I get in position and can give you some cover, move up. Doc, take his position.” She didn’t wait for them to respond, allowing their ‘yes, ma’ams’ to wash over her as she overloaded the most forward trooper, leaving Garrus to finish it off as it danced. Racing forward, she took a burst of incoming rounds, her shields sizzling in an impressive...
light show.

Sliding into cover behind another pile, she respawned her drone, setting it in behind the geth squad. Hopefully, it would distract a couple. Roger tore down the shields on the closest, then as she ducked back, Garrus swung out and opened fire.

“Moving up,” Garrus called. “Heads up on your right.”

“Roger that.” Shepard leaned out, peppering the geth with rounds to keep most of them pinned while Garrus moved up. Her shields went down before she could cover him the whole way, but then Ash and the doc opened fire.

One of the green destroyers barrelled around the corner, racing for the turian. Shepard overloaded it, but it didn’t even flinch as she tore down its shields.

“Shit, C-Sec, look out! It’s one of the suicidal green ones. Ladies, cover him.” All three opened fire on the destroyer, taking it down just as Garrus dove to his right, sliding into cover on his ass. Shepard leaned out, taking down a rocket trooper. “You okay there, big guy?”

“Yeah.” He scrambled up and pressed his back to the concrete.

“Another one, ma’am,” Williams yelled, pulling Shepard’s attention back to the end of the corridor. Sure enough, a massive wall of green careened toward them.

Shepard and Garrus overloaded it in unison, and its head erupted in a spray of white fluid as Williams opened fire.

“Shepard, team two is entering the Exogeni building now. No sign of enemy troops,” Nihlus’s calm, rich voice spoke in her ear, dropping her heart rate despite the fact that yet another of the destroyers pelted down the corridor at them.

“Roger that, team two. Meeting heavy resistance, here.” She overloaded the machine, but it didn’t go down. Instead, it turned, aiming for her. She jumped to the side, backing up, still firing, Roger pulled in tight against her side.

A quick glance down the corridor told Shepard they were screwed. She gritted her teeth against the order she most hated to give. “Doc, Williams, retreat to the next position back.”

“Another one,” Garrus called, his voice almost manic with the battle high.

Shepard staggered back as the destroyer cut through her shields with a plasma blast from his shotgun, but her armor dispelled the energy. She overloaded the thing despite the close range, regretting it as her own shields exploded in sparks and shivers of electricity. “That’s the second time I’ve done that in a week,” she groaned, stepping over the downed geth to shoot Garrus’s dance partner in the back of its head.

Grabbing the turian out of the corner, she pushed him behind her. “Retreat back, C-Sec.” She looked up at the destroyer as it turned to face her and grinned. “Hi there. How the hell are yah?”

Shoving Roger’s muzzle into the center seam of the being’s chest plate, she hammered at the trigger, praying the geth went down before her gun overheated. Another one hurtled across the open area and turned to charge them. “How many of you fuckers are there?”

She twisted, using the first destroyer as cover. The second one slammed into it, the transferred energy driving the air out of her lungs as her front side smacked into her insides. A heartbeat later, her insides crashed into her backside, launching her through the air like a 155cm missile. Ass first, she smacked into the ground and slid until she hit something solid. Hands lifted her onto her feet.

Once all her giblets settled back where they belonged, she tossed a grin over her shoulder. “Thanks, C-Sec, you make good brakes.” She overloaded the still-functional geth that struggled to get up off the floor, and it let out that terrible screeching, bad-extranet sound as it died. “Sweet baby Jesus,” Shepard gasped when no further geth showed at the end. “How many was that? A gigajillion?”

“I think the technical term is bazillion, ma’am,” Ash replied, her smile weary.

Settling Roger in low ready, Shepard winked at the chief and crept forward. The troopers had pulled back. No bodies. “Come on, I have a really bad feeling about this.”

Shepard went through the door and ducked out. No geth. Complete silence, other than the wind whistling through the structure. She frowned. “I’m moving up. C-Sec, give me three metres and watch my flank.” Creeping forward, knees bent to keep her profile low, Shepard trotted down the short corridor.

“Stairs up,” she called back. “Keep sharp.”

“They delayed us with the destroyers while they retreated, didn’t they?” Garrus whispered.

Shepard answered with a sharp nod of her head. That was her guess. Two flights up and around a corner, she saw sky above what looked like a freighter parked on the roof. No friendlies or geth in sight. Moving up, she took cover at the last open doorway, sweeping the area the best she could. The colonists had set up defenses. A few bodies lay here and there, but not nearly as many as Shepard would have expected.

Moving out onto the roof, following a narrow path between a wall of rubble and some pipes, Shepard looked up, the blood dropping out of her heart as the organ turned into a frozen lump in her chest. “Oh, we are so f*cked.” She ran out a few metres, ducking from cover to cover, stopping just short of the freighter that had been lifted a couple metres off the roof.

“Spirits,” Garrus said, his voice a thready hiss. “We’re surrounded. How many are there?”

“Too many,” Shepard replied, casting a glance toward the sky and the geth ships hanging in the air above the edge of the roof. Climbing the short set of stairs, she stood on her tiptoes to look inside the freighter’s open door. About ten feet down the corridor, a demolition charge counted down nine minutes. Glancing around what portion of the rooftop she could see, she spotted at least another half dozen. Too many to try to disarm, and she couldn’t know if they’d find them all. Evacuation.

“Shepard!” Garrus pointed toward movement at the other end of the freighter. A small squad of geth marched smartly, arrayed around a familiar figure. The pieces of a very ugly puzzle came together. Delaying action at the dock, Saren casually walking away from demo charges on a countdown, and thirty or so geth ships aimed at the rooftop.

“Oh, shit.” She grabbed Ashley and Liara, shoving them into cover and looked around. They needed a plan and fast. A herd of colonists milled near the back of the vehicle, looking like lost cattle. “Okay, Williams, Doc, go round up the colonists, fast. We have just over eight minutes before this place blows to hell.” She didn’t wait to watch them, looking back to the sky. “If that.”

“Saren!” Garrus shouted.
The small party at the other end of the freighter stopped. Saren turned, his mandibles flaring as those horrible, glowing mechanical eyes met Shepard’s, holding her in a breathless stare. After a couple of heartbeats, he winked, slow and exaggerated, then turned and continued on.

“Saren!” Garrus yelled again, but Shepard kept him from charging after the Spectre by grabbing the yoke of his armour.

“Whatsoever he was after, he has it.” She pointed up at the sky. “He’s about to blow away the evidence. We need to get the colonists and our own asses out of here.”

“We have to stop him.” Garrus insisted.

“He’s bringing this place down, Garrus. We’ve got to help Williams and the doc get the colonists to safety.” She grabbed his wrist and tugged, but he pulled toward the freighter.

“Ma’am,” Ashley radioed in. “Thirty-two colonists still alive. They’re acting strange, like they’re hypnotised or something. We’ll never get them to the Normandy. There is a set of stairs here that goes down into the building. We could try to take them down through the structure. Maybe if we get far enough down, into basements or something . . . .”

“Shepard! Why are we still talking? Saren is getting away.” Garrus threw himself against Shepard’s arm, but summoning every ounce of her large mama and possible krogan lineage, she held him. He slammed into her again. “Shepard.”

“Our priority is the colonists, Garrus, so shut it.” She ran the direction Saren had gone, staying under the freighter, yanking the turian behind her. “Our only chance is to get down far enough before this place collapses around our heads.”

“We’ll lose our chance to find out what’s going on,” Garrus yelled, pulling at her again.

“Normandy, this place is about to come down. Pull back, full stealth, and wait for the second team. We’re going to try to get the colonists clear,” she said, shouting a little over the wind.

“Roger that, Shepard. Saren?” Joker asked.

“About thirty metres ahead of me, but it’s too . . . .” Shepard saw the colonists descending into the stairwell, organized and calm. At least Williams and the doc had their task well in hand.

As Shepard rounded the back end of the freighter, Saren disappeared behind a wall of crates, headed toward the interior of the structure. She ran up a short set of stairs to see if he knew something she didn’t about a way out. Garrus flew past her, furious and in full pursuit.

“Dammit, C-Sec.” She took two steps after him then the geth ships opened fire. Rounds blasted into the roof, throwing her backwards into a metal railing. Ribs gave way and agony exploded from her throat, silenced by the vacuum in her lungs.

For a few, impossibly long moments, her back wrapped around the pole, bones and tendons flexing to their breaking point. Then, like a bow, she reached maximum tension and snapped back, rebounding toward the explosion a little before the concrete rooftop came up to meet her face. The meaty, copper taste of blood flooded her mouth, but she felt no pain.

Get up, Shepard! She ignored her own order. Damn, getting insubordinate with my inner CO. A bad sign.

Must be hurt. Bad.
That one worked and she gasped, sucking in the burning air, ash, and smoke. Reaching over, she hit her medi-gel twice, then started trying to peel herself off the concrete.

“Shepard!” Garrus scrambled up a few metres away. She stared, transfixed, at the long, white marks his talons carved in the concrete. He grabbed her under the arm and tried to haul her up.

“Shepard!” Garrus yelled. “Get up!” He tugged at her arm.

Concrete exploded, shrapnel ringing musically off her armour as it pounded into her. Then Garrus grabbed her other arm and picked her up, setting her on her feet. Once her feet hit the ground, Shepard gave herself a shake. The cooling, numbing slither of medi-gel eased its way through her, and the fog lifted.

“She Shepard, you okay?”

Shepard grabbed Garrus by the yoke. “Let’s go. Down the stairs.” She gave him a push toward the long slide of debris and the staircase that disappeared into darkness. It opened like a mouth, hungry and deadly. She glanced toward where Saren disappeared through a door at the far end of the roof. It had to be a way out, and one least likely to have things exploding, but the colonists were already below.

“It’s thirty colonists!” Garrus yelled, moving to follow Saren. “You’d sacrifice the whole galaxy for thirty colonists?”

“And if we chase Saren and get killed, then what? Pick your battles, C-Sec, and obey goddamned orders! That’s all you’ve got to do right now. Obey goddamned orders.” She started after Ash again, pushing him ahead of her.

He stared at her for a second, then twisted from her grip and bolted after Saren.

“Goddamn it, C-Sec.” She limped after him, but with his long legs and her battered ribs, he drew ahead of her steadily. She hobbled back up the stairs and took cover along a heavy wall, staying out of sight and hopefully out of the bombardment. If she was lucky, four minutes remained on the demo charges.

“Williams, where are you?” she called as she hurried along the wall.

“Already four floors down. Once the geth opened fire, the colonists became very willing to move fast. Where are you, ma’am?”

“Vakarian took off after Saren.” Shepard cursed. “I swear, if I have to chase another goddamned turian across another goddamned human colony, I am going to rip their legs off and beat them to death with the wet ends!” Running flat-footed to avoid as much impact as she could, she passed another spot where the colonists tried to hold the geth off, then through a door, down a short hall and up stairs. “See if you can find a way out, Williams. Hopefully, we’ll catch up.”

“Vakarian, where are you?” she called into her radio, taking cover, then swinging around a couple of corners. A corridor led past an elevator, but the trembling of the building under her feet didn’t inspire her to try that. She ran past.

Racing up another short flight of stairs, Shepard hit the far wall, pressing her back against it. She eased her way around a curved corner, trading Roger for Ingrid. A quick glance revealed that she had no cover from an entire squad of geth on elevated cover.
“Shepard,” Saren’s smooth voice called. “How thoughtful of you to make it so easy to clear up all traces of my operation.”

Fuck.

“Yeah, I’m considerate that way. Won most helpful at Camp Starshine three years in a row.” She ducked out again, gaze darting to take in enemy positions.

“Might as well come on out, Shepard,” Saren called. “You’re outnumbered.”

“Yeah, that’s okay. Thanks though.” Shepard closed her eyes, visualizing the field, building a picture of where Garrus lay face down on the ground, the Spectre standing over him, the troopers on either side, the snipers further back, two drones buzzing around, and the destroyer working its way toward her right flank. Garrus lying face down, not moving.

She shook off the fear, letting it settle into a low boil. He wouldn’t be there at all if he hadn’t gone cowboy.

Find the damned weak spots, come on, Shepard. You’ve got only a few shots and maybe two minutes before that freighter goes up. Don’t bother with Saren; he’ll be too well shielded for Ingrid.

She called up her overload, hit her medi-gel again, took a deep breath, then leaned out. The overload took out the geth on Saren’s right, the one on the left falling to Ingrid. Bolting forward, she reloaded, crouching low as she ran up the stairs, spawning her drone to deal with its counterparts.

At the top of the raised section, she took cover behind a chunk of concrete.

You’ve got maybe twenty seconds before the destroyer charges in from the right.

“Vakarian? You alive out there?” She popped up, waited for their lasers to give away the sniper positions, then put a bullet through the first one’s head. Back down.

Why isn’t Saren firing? Focus, damn it. Ten seconds to being crushed; a minute and a half to being blown to shit.

She reloaded. Back up. The destroyer’s shotgun tore down half her shields and staggered her, but then the last sniper gave itself away and went down.

“Vakarian?” God, she hoped Saren needed a shield.

“Yeah. I’m alive.”

“You’re surrounded, Shepard. Come out, and I’ll end it quickly for both of you.”

Shepard poised, staying low and waited for the destroyer to charge. “This is going to hurt like a bitch,” she whispered, bracing herself for the pain. When the geth charged, she somersaulted past its legs and down the stairs, ribs grinding. She scrambled up, biting down on her tongue to hold in an agonized scream that would give away her position, and ran down the length of the room.

When she ran up the stairs behind Saren, he had Garrus up on his feet, held between them as a shield. He bowed his head a touch. “You’re clever. I have to give you that, Shepard, but you can’t defeat this enemy.”
“It’s you and a destroyer,” Shepard said, grinding the words out between her teeth.

“I don’t mean me, Shepard. Oh, I’ll kill you, but what’s coming up hard behind me . . . .” The Spectre shuddered. “Ask yourself why a Spectre and the council would be taking the actions we are.”

“You’re trying to bring the Reapers back. I don’t think sanity or reason applies.” Shepard overloaded the destroyer, then put a bullet in it, working her way around to Saren’s left, closing on him. She reloaded, her inner alarm screaming that nine minutes was up. Why wasn’t he firing?

The Spectre lunged toward her, a tiger backed into a corner. “There’s no victory here, Shepard.”

She frowned: his body language screamed fear, not rage.

The building heaved as the charges in the freighter detonated. Garrus twisted, slamming his shoulder into Saren’s belly, bearing him to the floor. Shepard threw herself down, using more dead weight than grappling tactics to help as her frantic fingers rifled through her hip pack, searching for the last of her squad trackers.

Saren threw them off, but Shepard managed to cling to him long enough to slap the back of his armour. As she hit the floor, a shadow blotted out the light coming through the ceiling. For a moment, Shepard’s hope dismissed it as a cloud passing over the sun, but then half metre hail stones made of metal and circuitry poured through, unfolding into a torrent of plasma blasts.

Survival instinct, most notably flight, kicked in, and Shepard jumped up, grabbing Garrus by the fringe. His howl of pain sent a twinge of guilt and a much larger dose of satisfaction tingling up her arms. When he caught up and ran beside her, she let him go. Rounds peppered their shields, but then they rounded the corner and raced down the corridor, headed back for the lift.

“Such a big mistake!” she screamed, throwing Garrus in first. “Death trap. This thing is a death trap.” She hit the down control as massive chunks of concrete and reinforcing metal tumbled down, tearing apart walls and floors as they crashed through.

Pressing herself against the wall, Shepard covered her head with her arms and glared at Garrus. “I hate you a lot right now.”

“Team One,” Nihlus yelled in her ear, “we just saw a massive explosion. What’s going on over there?”

“Saren is trying to bury evidence of something under the rubble of this building. Right now, we’re mostly trying to not end up dead. I’ll get back to you, Nihlus,” Shepard called back. The lift ground to a halt, tilted enough for Shepard to know it hadn’t reached its destination.

“Hey, jackass, help me pry the doors open,” she barked at Garrus, opening her omnitool to override the locks. A sharp click let her know she’d been successful, and they shoved talons and fingers into the space. She stuck her head out. “We’re between floors.” She shoved the doors apart and knelt on the edge. “Lower me. My ribs are broken. I can’t jump. Or would you rather leap over me and see if you can get back up there and catch Saren?”

Garrus grumbled, but nodded and got down on one knee. “This is still going to hurt.”

She shot him a glare of death and held up her hands. “Little late to worry about that. I’m not staying here. I have to get out alive, so I can dedicate myself to making you regret going cowboy on me for the rest of your life.” She grabbed his wrists, a hoarse, guttural scream forcing itself between her clenched teeth as the edge of the elevator bit into her ribs like shark jaws.
When he moved to pull her back up, she shook her head. “Just keep going. Fuck.” Shepard knew what ancient criminals suffered when being quartered as Garrus lowered her. “I think you’re pulling my arms off.” A massive chorus of cracks, pops, and snaps rolled from her neck down to her feet. Once it passed, Shepard found she could draw a breath without feeling as though a Mako was parked on her chest, letting it out accompanied by a faint sigh.

When her feet hit the floor, she let go and moved out of Garrus’s way. She reached up to open a channel to Ashley. “Williams, you guys still there?”

“Yes, ma’am,” Ashley’s voice came through, barely audible over the ambient chaos, “we found a lift. The skyway was marked on it, so we went to that level. There are maintenance tunnels along the length of the skyway. I scouted ahead. They’re collapsed now and again, but with the geth concentrating on the colony, we might be able to get these people clear.” The chief paused as crashing and screaming rose to a crescendo around her. “Should we chance it, ma’am?”

“Those people are your responsibility, Williams. You have eyes on. What’s your gut telling you?” Shepard replied, gasping between words.

“It’s telling me that it’s our best shot to get these people out alive, ma’am. The geth don’t seem to care about the Exogeni building.”

“Then go. I’ll contact the second team, have them come through from the other end and help escort your people through. Good luck, Chief.”

“I won’t let you down, ma’am.”

Shepard stopped and leaned against the wall, panting. “I know you won’t, Chief.”

“And you and Vakarian, ma’am?”

“Don’t worry about us, we’re on our way down. We’ll radio in when we get clear.” She watched Garrus as he activated his omnitool, calling up a map of the structure.

“Holy mother of god,” Ashley yelled into the radio. “Shepard, it’s the dreadnaught from Eden Prime. No! Not that way! Everyone, run. Doc, get them moving into the skyway tunnels. Move! Move! Move!”

“What’s going on, Williams?” Shepard started hobbling east.

“It opened fire on the colony, ma’am. A gigantic laser. Can you hear it?”

She did, but not from the radio. A dragon as massive and terrible as the sun tore into the building, claws of red flame shredding concrete and steel as if it amounted to no more than cloud. Fury bellowed down through the hollow ruins, a thunderous buzzing that promised death had come for them all.
Chapter Summary

Running down, down . . . wait . . . too far down.

“It’s carving up the colony. You’ve got to get out of there, ma’am,” Williams shouted over the dragon’s roar.

Through the radio, Shepard heard the chief running, Liara calling out encouragement, people screaming.

“We will, you just get those people to the second team. Shepard out.” She turned to find Garrus.

“Aye, aye, ma’am.”

The dragon tore through the ceiling five stories above, its claws and fiery breath transforming into a massive red laser, no less terrifying for shedding the superstitious in favour of reality. The dreadnought’s weapon vapourized everything it touched, debris the size of skycars raining down around its periphery. Whatever Saren wanted destroyed, he wanted to make sure there wouldn’t be enough left to fill an espresso cup. The laser cut a slow swath through the center of the building, but didn’t move into the outer sections, at least not yet.

Our one chance to get the hell out of here with our skins intact.

“C-Sec!” The ends of Shepard’s hair began to curl in the weapon’s intense heat. She threw her arm up to shield her face and called to Garrus. “Prothean Skyway is east. Williams found maintenance tunnels the colonists are using to get to the Exogeni building.”

He pointed, blessedly away from the laser.

Shepard wrapped her arms around her middle and set out in a quick, flat-footed run down a hundred-metre-long corridor to another set of stairs heading down. “Hopefully we can find the same tunnels Williams did. I’d like to get the hell out of this building before we become permanent additions.”

At the end of the corridor, Shepard stopped at the top of a long bank of stairs, her ribs counting each step. Gritting her teeth, she half hopped, half fell down the first, a thin shriek bullying its way out between her lips. After three stairs and three screams, Garrus just scooped her up with an arm under her backside and started down.

“Great,” she grumbled to disguise a heavy groan of pain, wincing at the chorus singing along her ribs at his manhandling. “Because it’s so damned dignified, once again we end up with the captain being carried like a ten-year-old by the freakishly huge, freakishly overprotective squad member. Without so much as a ‘Ma’am, do you mind if . . .?’” She cuffed him, hating the fact that with her ribs in the shape they were in, it remained the fastest option.

“You’re only hurt because of me,” Garrus said, his voice soft and contrite. “If I’d obeyed your orders instead of being an idiot hot-head, we’d have been inside when the geth opened fire.”
“Well, it’s better to see the light later rather than never, Brother C-Sec. Praise be to the Enkindlers for your enlightenment.” She cuffed him again. “But next time ask. I’m a captain, not a helpless waif or a ten-year-old.”

“Aye, aye, ma’am. Understood. You’re just freakishly tiny, not a helpless, ten-year-old waif, ma’am.”

Despite still being pissed off at him, a half-snort, half-chuckle escaped her. She snapped her teeth closed on it like a claw trap. Sparky had been right about the crew following the captain. Even staring death in the big, fiery laser, having disobeyed a direct order, Vakarian pulled out the smartass. Damn, she supposed that made the brass right too. “It’ll be a cold day in hell we set you loose on a decent crew, Shepard,” she muttered under her breath. “Yes, sir, Admiral Mikhailovich, sir. Bastard.”

Garrus quirked a brow plate at her. “You talking to yourself, Shepard?”

“Shut it, C-Sec.”

Garrus ran, taking the stairs two at a time, descending rapidly down through more than a hundred floors. Shepard let him go, impressed by his stamina. If she’d been on her feet, they’d have made it down no more than five or six levels. He’d make a hell of a squad member if she could beat the obstinate streak into line.

Every ten floors, they reached a corridor that led them another hundred metres east then down again. They lost the laser about fifty floors down as it stayed to the center of the structure, concentrating on destroying not just the colony, but whatever lay at its heart. A hundred floors down, however, the staircases ended and the corridors directed them back to the center of the building. A series of ramps wound down around a huge, empty center space like the levels in a parking garage.

“Do you think we’ve reached ground level?” Garrus asked, setting Shepard down.

She shook her head and looked down over the side of the balcony at the huge, gallery sort of space. “No clue, but I doubt it. I think we missed the Skyway though. It wasn’t this far down.” She started hobbling downhill while Garrus caught his breath. “I think this is some sort of shopping district. Look at the large window and door gaps, the walls cut into shelves.” Her chuckle cut through a mouthful of pain and exhaustion.

“We’re in a fifty thousand year old shopping mall, C-Sec. I guess nothing changes. All of us just doing the same stupid shit over and over.” She wiped her mouth on the back of her hand. “Dying in a shopping mall is about as close to hell as it gets.”

Three ramps later she found a large medical locker. Overriding the lock, she prayed to find a nice big fat syringe of body-numbing, mind-altering, glorious drugs. She found a canvas bag full of Phoenix armour.

“Yeah, Ash is the only one willing to wear that ugly, pink crap.” She dumped out the bag, kicking the god-awful armour over the edge. “Well, unless I can convince Wrex, C-Sec, and Sparky to put on sets for this year’s christmas card photo.”

She peered up over the edge. “Hey, C-Sec, get your assless down here. I can’t bend over to get to the good stuff at the bottom of this medical locker.”

“Find anything useful?” Garrus asked, jogging down the ramp. “Painkillers? Water?” He dove in, stuffing items into the canvas bag. “Water, ration bars, no dextro ones though, painkillers, medi-gel, antibiotics.” He trailed off for a second, then straightened. “Casting tape.”

“Glory hallelujah, Brother C-Sec. Glory hallelujah.” She kissed the package of tape when he passed it to her along with a bottle of water. “Here, soak the tape.” She ripped open two packages and passed them back, then started stripping off her armour above the waist. Finally, she undid her uniform and eased her way out of it.

“Should we be doing this here?” he asked, glancing up.

Shepard waggled her head a little, even that much movement setting up a chain reaction. “I'll be able to move a lot faster with my ribs taped.” She laid her uniform over the locker but couldn’t reach the clasp on her bra. “You’ll need to undo this.”

He set the dripping tape down. “We’re going to need to use that immediately.”

“Then stop yakking, C-Sec, and get my bra off already.”

“Always the romantic,” he grumbled, fumbling with the catches. “I think I need a degree to get this off. Why do you have to strap them up anyway?” After another second, he got it and slipped the bra off her shoulders.

“Mother nature abhors flopping.” Shepard folded her shoulders forward, muscle memory becoming muscle regret within a half screech, and she left it to Garrus to finish removing the bra.

He picked up the first roll of tape, picking at the end until it came loose. “You need a good, solid carapace. No flopping involved.”

“I’ll let evolution know that’s your vote.” Shepard lifted her elbows off to the side and held her breasts out of the way. “Wrap me from right beneath my breasts to an inch above my navel.” She shivered as the tape went on, freezing cold and wet, but it quickly heated as it began to set. “Use both rolls.” She pressed her lips down tight on a smile, not willing to let the thaw show. “Bending isn’t as important right now as being able to move without wanting to kill you.”

“Is there any point in apologizing?” he asked, getting down on one knee, his long arms easily wrapping around her, rolling out the tape, then smoothing it. “Or will you beat me just as long regardless?” He glanced up, meeting her eyes for a quarter-second.

She let out a shallow breath. Might as well deal with the issue and put it to bed. “I don’t intend to beat you at all. You have a choice. Obey orders and stay on the ship, or disobey them and go back to C-Sec.” She glanced up and over her shoulder as the roar and crashing started getting louder again. “Damn, that thing is just tearing through the building.”

“There.” He stood and grabbed her uniform, helping her back into it. “You can set while we move.” Before helping her into her armour, he dug into the bag, coming out with a bottle and a syringe. “I apologize in advance if this painkiller means you have to detox when we get back to the Normandy.” He slapped the bottle into the syringe.

She grunted and tilted her head. “Yeah, whatever, shoot me up already. That damned laser is almost through.” The cool, slithering, gut-tingling relief spread through her like a hug as she fastened her armour back into place. “Oh yeah, C-Sec, this is the good shit. Narcotic city.” She checked the locker, then started back downhill, the cast already set. “Narcotic-palooza, baby.”

“Where to?” Garrus asked.
“Down, Brother C-Sec. Down.” Shepard took off, swearing her enduring love to the makers of narcotic painkillers as two, then three levels passed and her ribs calmed to a dull roar.

On the fourth level, she stopped dead, making them squawk. “What the hell?”

What looked like desiccated corpses lay everywhere, some geth amongst them. “What the hell are these things?” She prodded one with the toe of her boot, then crouched to lift its hand by the wrist. “It’s like a zombie or something.” She glanced up as Garrus hurried past, heading toward the beam. “Not that way, C-Sec. Big red burning death that way, remember?” She poked at one of the geth with the barrel of her pistol. “And what is this green shit everywhere? Looks like the zombies puked it on the geth.”

“What the hell are these things?” Shepard gasped, and she heard his feet scuffle in the dust as he jumped back. “What the . . . ?” She turned. “Big red burning death or no, you’ve got to see this.”

Shepard groaned as she pushed herself up. Garrus stood as far back from the edge as he could, leaning forward and straining his neck to look over. His entire body looked as hard and brittle as salt stalactite. What could be so important and so scary? Looking for the laser, she saw it carving its way through the opposite end of the building, some two hundred metres away. Still, time was short, and they needed to keep moving. Looking down over the edge, she furrowed her brow. She saw . . . something. A body and roots or legs? Maybe something stuck in roots?

“What the hell is that?” Shepard craned her neck for a moment, then grabbed his wrist and tugged him toward the ramp down. “Come on, we’re headed down anyway. We can see what it is a lot closer if we hurry.”

“Want to place bets on that being the reason for all this destruction?” He stayed next to her, his assault rifle back in his hands.

Shepard lifted back into her flat-foot jog, following the curved ramps down past a lot of the corpse looking things and dead geth. “Not at all.” She let out a soft grunt and shook her head. “This is all very strange, Brother C-Sec.”

“I think that may actually qualify as understatement of the decade.” Edging sideways, he followed, keeping an eye on the geth weapon’s progress.

All light in the space shifted to shine down from above, leading Shepard to the conclusion that they’d reached and even gone below ground level. She couldn’t place the smell. Mold, dust and smoke hung heavy, naturally, but something moved under those. They reached the floor with the . . . thing, at the same time the laser started coming back.

“It looks like a giant root or plant or something,” Shepard said. She pointed the roots leading off into the ruins, most of them severed and bleeding some sort of sap or fluid.

“Is that a face?” Garrus asked, pointing with his gun. The whirls in the being’s hide, along with a long beard of tentacle things did seem to make a face of sorts.

Shepard stepped toward the giant podish looking thing with the almost-face that hung from giant roots. “What the hell?” She opened her omnitool. “Okay, I’m going to take pics, this way, you go that way. Be fast. We have maybe ten minutes before that laser gets back here.” She snapped an image, then looked up. “The laser hasn’t cut through the ceiling in here yet. From the looks of those windows, we need to go up a couple of floors to hit ground level.”

Shepard took one of the side passages, climbing a curved ramp to get around the creature’s side, snapping images through large gaps in the center wall. She also paused to take a few shots of the zombie things and dead geth littered along her path.

“I’ve got pods on the walls, here, Shepard.”

Shepard nodded at the tension laced through Garrus’s subvocals, cords of steel pulling tighter until the rich harmonics became thin and reedy. “It’s an adventure, C-Sec. Remember that. It’s all an adventure.” She noted the equipment and piping on the walls around the plant-thing. “Looks like we’re in a fifty thousand year old environmental systems level. That’s sort of cool.”

Reaching the end of the level, she turned back, heading for Garrus and his pods.

“Sure, if it weren’t for the laser of death and the monster plant thing with the corpse things, I’d vote we camp and do some sight seeing.”

The dragon returned, the building trembling as its claws tore through the ceiling over the giant plant. Shepard grabbed Garrus and ran, shoving him through a doorway and down a short corridor, trying to get as much space between them and the weapon as possible. Dust exploded all around them, the laser settling onto its target. Shepard shoved Garrus into a corner as the building shuddered in its death throes.

“The whole thing is going to come down,” Garrus yelled. “It’s cut straight down through the middle, but the shell has to fall.”

“I know.” Shepard stuck her face in against his chest and covered her head. “We need to get to ground level. As soon as that laser moves, we’ve got to climb back up a few floors, try to get out.”

A new and terrible roar echoed through the building, a bellow of rage and mortal pain. Something deep inside her gut, the primitive part that once huddled inside caves, felt the plant thing reach out, railing against a death it couldn’t quite comprehend. As the echo of that cry died out, a superstitious shudder rolled through her, recognizing the passing of something vast, powerful and ancient from the universe.

The next moment, the laser disappeared, carving into the building in the far north the next time it fired.

Shepard shuddered again, shaking off the moment of regret she didn’t have time to fully understand. “Okay, let’s move, C-Sec.”

The pair ran back the way they’d come, eyes constantly scanning for threats, wary and tense as they headed for the ramps that circled the hollow where the plant monster lived. Partway up the first one, one of the pods on the wall moved.

Garrus slid to a stop and stared at it as though he expected it to attack. “Shepard?”

She shook her head, glanced behind them, and gave him a push. “I’ve got nothing, keep moving.”

The pod split open and in a rush of slime, an asari in commando leathers tumbled out to lie prone on the floor.

Shepard stared, mouth open, her arm coiling around her ribs. Her stinging, tearing, disbelieving eyes looked to Garrus for some sign that he saw what she did. “C-Sec, the wall just gave birth to a fully grown asari. Do you find that as odd as I do?”

He just nodded and bent over to check her pulse. “She’s alive.”
“They don’t reproduce like that, do they? Gross pods stuck to a wall somewhere? I’m pretty sure I’ve seen little asari.” A revolted shudder rocketed up her spine. “Sweet baby Jesus!” she screamed as every broken end of her ribs ground together. She almost went down on her knees, only the idea of how much that jolt would hurt keeping her upright.

“What should we do?” he asked, breaking into a coughing fit.

Behind them the laser ripped into concrete and metal again, chewing a path back toward them.

“Well, we can’t leave her. Grab her, and let’s keep moving.” Shepard glanced toward the laser. “Luckily, it’s taking its time, making sure it kills off the whole plant thing, but still, it’s going to be on top of us in a few minutes.”

Garrus threw the asari over his shoulder and then took off for the upper levels again. Two floors up, a corridor led to the east. Dead end. A huge pile of debris blocked the path forward.

“Damn it.” Shepard turned to head back, but the laser pounded down and started carving up their path of retreat. She pushed Garrus into one of the side rooms. Bed frames and medical lockers lined the walls. She ran around the room, overriding the lock on all the lockers.

“What are you doing? This is no time to loot.” He glanced in the door. “We’ve got to go back and find another way.”

“No time.” Shepard waved him into the room and started shoving the bed frames out of the back corner. “Only thing to do now is bunker down. We need a shelter.” She looked up as the laser appeared. Fifteen metres away, it stopped. “Too damned close.” When it ripped down from above, it headed back the other way. “Saren is making sure that thing is dead before he buries it. That gives us a couple minutes to make a shelter. Put her down.”

She ran to the first locker, pulling everything out. “Help me!” Shepard shouted over the roaring klaxon. Grinding her teeth together, she cursed, furious at the constant agony pulsing through her back and chest. Channelling it into pushing the closest medical locker, she shoved it so hard it rammed into the outer wall, then screamed.

“Fuck, that hurt!”

Garrus ran up to help. “Turn it on its end. They’re strongest on their ends.” They flipped it so that it stood up. Shepard glanced around the room to see how many of them there were. “Five of them on angles, open side facing in, as far into the corner as we can.”

Once they had four in place, Shepard nodded toward the unconscious asari. “Put her inside, out of the way.”

While Garrus moved the injured woman into the shelter, Shepard ran back for another locker. The laser tore through the concrete like tissue paper no more than twenty metres away, luckily it moved parallel. Still, the heat felt like being thrown into a blast furnace. She forced herself to concentrate on moving the locker. By the time she got it to the corner, Garrus was ready to help her.

They lifted it on top of the others. “Hold the end up,” Shepard barked, shoving flat, fallen chunks of concrete under the one end until it sat on an angle up against the wall. “The last one the same. Hopefully some of the rubble will slide off rather than crushing us.” Shepard nodded her head for the last lockers as the laser turned, coming back on a new swath. “We’ve got to move. I haven’t suffered through hours of broken ribs just to die now, god damn it.”
“He sure is determined to make sure that thing is dead,” Garrus hollered.

Crying out as she lifted, she helped him move the last locker into place, piling rubble under it as well. “Wedge the bed frames around it on angles as tight as you can. Can you handle that alone?” she shouted. When he nodded, she grabbed a canvas bag and dumped out the armour, filling it with water bottles, ration bars and everything she could find that looked useful.

If the place did come down on their heads, and they managed to survive, who knew how long they’d be stuck there. She muttered a non-stop litany of the foulest curses she could think of, trying to distract herself from the grinding pain under her cast. After dragging two bags of supplies into the shelter, Shepard focused on gathering up all the blankets from the lockers and throwing them into the back corner of the shelter, burying the unconscious alien under a pile of grey wool.

Garrus wedged in the frames to support their tiny shelter. “Toss me a couple of blankets for the roof.”

Shepard froze mid-action and looked up as the laser vanished. “Hurry!” She tossed him a blanket, then ran up to grab one end, helping him tent it over the roof to keep out the smaller debris. They layered two more over top.

Shepard shoved Garrus through the gap, then pushed the lockers closer before scooting under right behind him. Screaming a long, thin keen of pain, she helped him muscle the locker into place. “Get the asari into a locker and cover her up, then yourself.” She scooted backwards into the open locker and shook out a blanket, covering her head.

“We’re probably still going to die, aren’t we?” he called, squeezing in next to her. The klaxon sounded its buzzing thunder, and heat exploded inside their metal tomb.

Shepard threw her blanket over him as well, and covered her head with her arms as concrete and metal began crashing down. She couldn’t help but laugh. It tasted like bile. Somehow, she’d always knew she’d go out like that. At least the turian and asari were a surprise. “More than likely, C-Sec. We built this thing in five minutes out of lockers and old bed frames.”

He leaned over her, pulling her tight in against his chest. “If we do, I’m sorry I disobeyed your orders.”

“If we don’t die, and you ever do it again, trust me you’ll be more than sorry,” she promised. “I’ll make damned sure of that. I give orders, I don’t make suggestions, C-Sec.”

With a long, planet-shattering crack as terminal and pained as the plant monster’s death roar, the building’s exterior gave way. Shepard held her breath, moments of silence stretching out so long she almost relaxed before everything erupted into madness. Shepard covered her ears the best she could and prayed that their little structure held. By all rights, it shouldn’t. But, what felt like four lifetimes later, the crashing settled to the random clatter of rolling concrete chunks and the whispered hiss of dust slides.

“C-Sec, you still alive?” She pushed the blanket back as she sat up straight.

“Yeah.” He coughed. “I think this is a good time for a sweet baby Jesus, Shepard.” He shifted around a bit. “It’s a little tight in here.”

Their shelter stood a metre and a half tall except in the center under the angled roof, where Garrus could probably stand hunched over. It wasn’t a Presidium condo, but at least they all had room to lie down as long as they stuck their heads in one locker and their feet in another.
“Yeah, sorry about that.” She let out a long breath and listened, straining to hear anything going on outside their box. Nothing. Other than the sounds of rubble settling around them, Feros had returned to being a dead planet. Shepard stood to look out the hole in the center. Concrete rubble had sealed them in, but the roof held.

Shepard gestured at the asari. “Have a look at our guest; make sure she’s okay.”

When Garrus nodded, Shepard reached up to her radio. “Normandy? Shepard to Normandy, can you read me?”

“Roger that, Captain,” Joker’s voice came through, thready with static but audible. “Are you all right down there? What happened?”

“Way too much to cover, Joker. Is the second team aboard with the colonists?” She leaned against the metal, all the pain the adrenaline had allowed her to ignore starting to ramp up like a hand-cranked siren.

“Yes, ma’am. We’re loading them up now. Had to wait for that dreadnought to leave, but the team is intact, forty-eight colonists and Exogeni employees in tow.”

“Shepard!” Nihlus sounded out of breath as he joined the call. “Where are you? Are you and Vakarian all right?”

“Yeah.” She shifted a little, trying to find a comfortable way to stand. “We managed to get close to ground level and made a small shelter before Saren brought the building down. It’s tight, but we’re breathing, so I’m not going to complain. Not sure what sort of oxygen supply we’ve got, but I can feel air moving at least a little.”

She saw Garrus nod out of the corner of her eye.

“We know what Saren was after,” the Spectre told her.

“Yeah, some giant plant thing. We saw it just before Saren killed it. Do you know why?”

“It’s got some sort of mind control properties. Infected all the colonists with spores so it could make them help defend it.” He cleared his throat. “Saren’s gone, so let’s retrieve the two of you and get out of here.”

“I stuck a tracker on him. Doesn’t have a very large range, so if you want to follow it, you’ve got to follow now.” She sent him the tracking signature. “It’s only got forty-eight hours of power. I stick them on the ground teams just in case they wander off or get snatched.”

“How are you set for supplies?”

“Not too bad. I’d have to look to let you know for sure. Get tracking that signal, Nihlus. It’s our only tangible lead. Get on his ass before he’s out of range.”

“It’s going to take ten, fifteen minutes to get the ship secure. We’re still loading colonists. Take inventory of what you’ve got, I’ll contact you just before we pull out.” Even before he closed the channel, she heard him barking orders to move the colonists faster.

“Shepard, the asari appears uninjured, just unconscious.” Garrus sat cross-legged next to Shepard.

“Okay, C-Sec, thanks. Let’s go through these bags and see what we’ve got.” She lowered herself to the floor and opened the bag closest to her. “Hey, this one had three whole dextro ration bars in it.
I’ve got four in my hip pack. How long will seven do you?” She glanced up between counting bottles of water.

“Three days, four if they have to. It’s not like I’ll be moving around much.” He looked up from the bag he had. “Twenty three bottles of water, ten levo ration bars, and four small canisters of O2. Good thing we didn’t drop those.” He cocked a brow plate, let out a thin chuckle, and put everything back.

“Okay, so I’ve got eighteen water bottles, twelve levo ration bars.” She nodded toward the asari. “As long as the air holds out, we’re good for four or five days.”

“Shepard?” Nihlus called through a few minutes later.

“Go ahead, Kryik.”

“We’ve tracked Saren’s fleet, and your pilot has a plan to fleet jump us out with them.”

“Fleet jump? What about needing the precise mass for the relay?” Shepard shook her head. “Sounds like he’s going to blow up my ship.”

“Relax, Captain,” Joker said. “Compared to that fleet, we’ll be a flea riding the back of a Labradoodle.”

“A Labradoodle?” Shepard shook her head. “No . . ..”

“Okay, maybe a Cockapoo. The point is, we’ll knock their drift off, but not enough to collapse the corridor. It’s the only way to track them through the relay with a short range tracker.”

“You get my ship blown up within the first two weeks of my being captain, they’ll never let me have any good toys again, Joker.” Shepard growled. His plan sat as comfortably as a chair made out of acid coated, frozen razor blades.

“Right, toys. I’ll remember that, Captain, and let the crew know of your deep concern for . . ..”

“How many days’ worth of supplies do you have, Shepard?” Nihlus interrupted, talking over Joker’s last few words.

“Four or five. As long as the air holds out, we’ll be fine until you can track him and come back. Just be careful with my people, Kryik. Get them back here in one piece.” She pressed her lips into a tight line. “We’ll talk to you in a day or so. Shepard, out.”

“Good luck, Shepard. Take care of yourself and Vakarian. Nihlus, out.”

Shepard lowered her hand and looked across, barely able to see Garrus’s eyes in the dark, his visor and the lights on their armour the only sources of illumination other than a faint light from above.

“And we’re alone,” he whispered, his body statue still.

She nodded. “And we’re alone.”
Shepard looked around. “You didn’t think to bring a book and a flashlight, did you, C-Sec?”

“Still not a camping trip, Shepard,” Garrus grumbled. “Is it getting cold in here, or is it me?”

Pressing her hands to the floor, Shepard nodded. “Yeah, the floor is really icy. Guess it’s because we’re under the cloud cover.” She gestured toward the roof. “See if you can use that handy scanning app on your omnitool to figure out how deep we’re in. I’ll spread some blankets out to insulate us from the floor.”

Shepard spread four blankets out as far as Garrus’s feet, then looked up. “Lift your foot, C-Sec.”

He did.

“Um, lift both feet.” She grinned to herself until his other foot lifted off the floor as well. “Hey, ah, is levitation something all your people can do, or are you magic?”

“I’m unique, Shepard. One hundred percent pure magic.” His chuckle warmed the small space.

Smiling, she finished spreading out the blankets, their space small enough that the thick wool covered pretty much the entire thing. “Okay, C-Sec the Magical Turian, you can put your feet down now.” Shepard sat on the end result and sighed. “Much better. Adds a little padding for the boney among us too.” She looked up. “How’s it going up there, big guy?”

“We were lucky, Shepard.” He knelt and scanned the outside wall on the two sides of their shelter. “We’re buried deep, but the way the place fell, it’s a pile of slabs, so there’s air pockets all through it.” He turned off his omnitool. “No way we’re digging out from in here, though.”

Shepard’s tight nod greeted those words. She had expected no different. Shepard sighed and slumped a little, the pain in her ribs losing the knife edge for a more diffuse pressure. “Okay, so talk to me about what we need to do to keep Garrus ‘C-Sec’ Vakarian alive over the next several days.”

“Staying warm is going to be the biggest hurdle,” he said. “Turians don’t have body fat like humans and asari. I have a couple of days on my power cell in my armour to run the heater if I disable everything else. I’ll be all right eating twice a day if I can stay warm. If I can’t, I’ll need to eat a lot more to avoid hypothermia.”

Shepard nodded. “Okay. So, we need to conserve those power cells.” She leaned up. “I hold and radiate heat really well, so I’ll take the ones out of my armour and save them for yours.” A single finger halted his argument. “We’ll bundle our new, sleepy friend in with us and pile on every blanket we’ve got. It’s not like we have chores we need to be doing.”

She reached out and grabbed the front of his armour when he poised to argue. “Don’t start with me. Our only job for the next couple of days is keeping our delicate, magical turian flower safe from the frost.” She grinned, wider as he rumbled in his throat, then the smile drained from her face. “Besides, I think my ribs have punctured just about every organ I own. I need to take it easy and stay as flat as I can.”

Shepard cracked open the arm of her armour and popped the power cells, sticking them in her hip pack. Like a wave of cold mist billowing out of a freezer on a hot day, the ambient climate crawled inside her armour, as inexorable as winter. “Yep, we need to get all of us bundled and stay that way. Sweet baby Jesus, it’s chilly.”

She dragged the packs inside one of the lockers, sticking them under the blankets to act as a backrest/pillow, then had Garrus lay the asari out. She smothered a laugh as she saw him eyeballing the unconscious form. “What? Are you afraid of the purple lady?”

He shrugged. “I . . . .”

Shepard chuckled, but reached out and squeezed his hand to take the sting out of it. “Okay, C-Sec. You really should be between us, but I’ll take the middle, okay?” She patted his shoulder. “Turn around, I’ll pop all your lights back here.”

“It’s going to be really dark, Shepard.” Still he got down on one knee with his back to her.

“Yeah, but we’ll leave the power cells in two guns, use their lights when we really need to see, and the light show inside your yoke there will still be up.” She popped the diodes from their sockets, the tiny shelter closing down around her.

“You’re afraid of the dark, Shepard,” he said, his voice so soft she could have imagined hearing it.

“You really do see everything, don’t you?” She laid a grateful hand on the back of his neck for a moment. “It’s more important to keep you warm. I’ll be fine. It’s not like anything could attack us in here, is it? Besides, I’ll have Roger.” Before they lost all the light from his armour, she took Ingrid off her back and popped the rifle’s power cell, then her pistol’s. She gathered all the scavenged cells in her hip pack, then popped the lights from Garrus’s lower back.

Shepard hunkered down and spread the ten remaining blankets over the three of them. Garrus lay on his side, sort of wrapping himself around Shepard as if sheltering her from the dark. As much as she could tolerate the strangling near-black for his sake, a mixture of gratitude and annoyance welled up in her. He just couldn’t help trying to protect her.

They didn’t speak, and it didn’t take long before she heard a whistling snore that told her the long day of running had caught up with the turian. She wriggled in tight against him and tried to relax enough to drift off herself.

_____________________________________________________________________________

“C-Sec, I thought turians weren’t into boobs,” Shepard grumbled. She closed her eyes tight against the black and tried to ignore the way her voice echoed back at her.

You can do this, Shepard. You’re a long way from that night.

“They aren’t. Why?”

“Because you’re squeezing my left breast like you’re trying to find a candy surprise at the center or something.” Shepard sighed and looked down at the blanket moving.

“No, I’m not. My hands are wrapped around me.”

“So . . .?” Shepard frowned, then sighed and extricated herself from the turian to move the asari’s hand. “The unconscious asari is fondling my boob.” She looked over her shoulder and into a pair of green eyes. “Hi. Welcome to our little bomb shelter. How do you feel?”

The asari jerked back, a low but shrill scream scraping from her throat as she fought with the blankets, struggling against the soft prison to scramble across to the far side of the shelter. “Where am I? What happened? The Thorian . . .?” She clutched her head between her hands. “Saren? Matriarch Benezia?” She turned, banging frantically against the metal locker, the thunder from it battering Shepard’s head like a cricket bat.

The asari’s panic chipped away at Shepard’s calm. The ache in her back ramped up until it felt like a living thing, “Whoa! Whoa! Sweetie. Please, stop that. We need our hearing, and we aren’t going to hurt you.” Shepard climbed out from under the blankets. “C-Sec, uncover so your yoke lights help us out here.”

As he did, the extra little bit of light seemed to calm the asari. She started looking around. “Where am I? What sort of prison is this?”

“You’re on Feros, and this is a prison that kept us all from being crushed under a falling building.” Shepard covered Garrus back up and knelt out closer to the center. “My name is Captain Jane Shepard, and that’s Officer Garrus Vakarian. What’s your name?”

She backed into the locker, pressing herself into the corner furthest from them, her stare darting back and forth. “My name is Shiala.”

Shepard nodded and stuck a poorly fitting smile on her lips. “How did you end up falling out of a pod at our feet, Shiala?”

She reached up, pressing her hands to her head. “The Thorian? It’s dead? I can’t hear it in my thoughts.”

“Is the Thorian that weird looking, plantish thing?” Garrus asked, sitting up, but keeping the blankets pulled up tight around his neck.

“Yes, but it wasn’t just a plant. It’s tendrils, a vast root system like eyes, ears, mouth and fingers spread through most of the planet’s crust, touching, tasting, experiencing everything. It survived through millennia beyond imagining, so very ancient that our tiny lives amounted to the scurrying of insects over its skin. Everything that lived and died on Feros for hundreds of thousands of cycles fed its body and mind, adding to its knowledge and experience.” Shiala’s delicate features twisted in what Shepard thought might be grief as she struggled to describe the alien. “So wise, so completely unique, and now it’s gone.”

Shepard shuddered a little, feeling the Thorian’s dead tendrils, thin corpse fingers spread under and all around her. She clenched her teeth, forcing the chill, macabre image aside, focusing instead on Shiala’s grief. Having touched a consciousness so vast and alien, the asari felt as much sorrow as relief at the being’s death. That deserved respect.

She allowed the silence to settle around them for a moment. Shivering, Shepard felt a slow, sick feeling spread from the entity wedged in her back as the cold settled into her flesh. “Saren destroyed the Thorian, and in the process, brought the entire structure down around our heads. We’re buried down here for at least a couple of days until my ship can rescue us.” A welcoming smile back on her lips, Shepard nodded toward Garrus and the blankets. “Come on, keep warm, it’s freezing. We won’t bite.”

Scooting back under the blankets, Shepard pulled them up around her neck. “Oh yeah, that’s the stuff, right there.” She leaned up against Garrus’s side, letting out a slow, shuddering sigh of relief. When the asari made no move toward them, Shepard peeled a blanket off the top and held it out to her. “How did you end up in a pod stuck to a wall down here?”

Snatching it as if she feared Shepard were a slaver handing out offerings from the open door of a shuttle, Shiala grabbed the blanket and wrapped it around her shoulders. Shepard bit her lip to avoid pointing out that Shiala was already sort of trapped in there and outnumbered if they had untoward intentions.

“Thank you,” the asari said, shivering a little. “It is cold.” Another long sigh answered Shepard’s question. “I was one of Matriarch Benezia’s disciples. When she joined Saren, I accompanied her.” She shifted and tugged on the blanket.

Arching an eyebrow, Shepard frowned and shook her head. “So, your matriarch said, ‘Hey, Saren, I heard you’re trying to bring back the monsters that obliterated the Protheans. How can I help?’”

“No. I do not know how she came into possession of the information, but my lady knew that through Saren, the council had learned of the Reaper’s existence. At first she believed they hoped to discover a way to defeat the Reapers, but then she learned that if a means of defeating them could not be found, Saren was to discover a means of appeasing them. They hoped that by assisting the Reapers in taking some lives, they might purchase back others.”

“Benezia knew Saren’s path would lead only to destruction. Hoping to influence him into a more sane course of action, she joined him. Given a choice to accompany her or go my own way, I went along to assist and protect her.” Shivering or shuddering, she wrapped the blanket tighter.

Shepard held back the corner of the blankets. “Come on, we didn’t pull you out of the collapsing building to murder you, and you’re already on first name terms with my left breast so you might as well stay warm.” Turning, Shepard rooted through one of the packs, tossing a bottle of water and a ration bar onto the blankets in front of the asari. “Not sure how long you were in that pod, but you must be thirsty, at least.”

Shiala stared at the food and water for a moment, then snatched up the water, drinking half of it down without taking a breath. When she lowered the bottle, she wiped her hand across her mouth. “Thank you. For this, and for saving me. I owe you my life.” She crawled over and under the blankets next to Shepard. She chuckled when she pulled them up, spreading the one she’d been given over top. “Oh, this is much better.”

“For someone so small, Shepard throws a remarkable number of BTU’s,” Garrus said, bumping the captain in the back.

“Yes, I’m a freak of nature, we’ve established this already.” She grinned as the turian’s joke ignited a small spark in that darkness, pushing it back enough for her to focus on Shiala. “So, Benezia knew that Saren had discovered something. Did he seek her out as an ally?”

“She is one of the wisest and most influential beings in the galaxy. In the beginning, I believed Saren sought her out for these reasons, but after being exposed to Sovereign, I believe he hoped that her mental prowess and telepathic abilities would help save him from indoctrination.” The asari let out a breath more sorrowful than most tears. “None of us could save anyone from Sovereign’s influence. Even our great lady lost herself to its madness.”

“Han’Gerrel,” Garrus whispered, a low curse chasing the name from his mouth.

“Yes. Sovereign is able to influence minds. It’s subtle, taking days or even weeks, but in the end, it leaves those it indoctrinates absolutely controlled. Within a month, I became Saren’s willing slave.” She shuddered, shifting closer to Shepard as if seeking her warmth. “That is how I came to this world, a commodity to be traded for what Saren needed.”

“Which was?” Shepard’s stomach rolled at the thought of the monstrous ship warping people into whatever the hell Saren needed to bring about his perverse goals.

“Saren knows that you’re following him, hunting down clues as to his plans. He used the beacon on Eden Prime before you did.”

“Right, we know. The vision is apparently as much of a confused mess in his head as it is in mine.” Shepard winced as random images flashed through her mind: fire, death, people on their knees begging their gods to save them.

“The Thorian made its home on this world long before civilization blossomed here. It watched over the years as evolution shaped the land, the creatures and the people. As history died, the Thorian consumed it, absorbing it.” Shiala smiled, her eyes shining with an almost fanatical spark as she described it. “When the Protheans built this city, it dwelt beneath it, spending thousands of cycles dormant and asleep only to wake for brief periods of activity. Within it dwells ancient, ancestral memory, the essence of what it means to be Prothean. Saren called that knowledge the Cypher. It is vital to understanding the beacon’s message.”

“Okay . . ..” Shepard shrugged.

“Saren needed me to meld my consciousness with the Thorian’s to gain the Cypher. I was offered as a sacrifice. Of course, once Saren gained the Cypher, the Thorian became a liability, so he destroyed it, hoping, I’m sure, to kill me in the process.” Shiala laid back and closed her eyes, her body losing the tight rigidity. Perhaps sharing the burden allowed her to let some of it go.

Shepard’s heart sped up as she waited for the asari to continue, her mind piecing things together even as she felt the creature’s tendrils all around her once more. Shiala believed the Thorian dead, but what if some part of it remained. How long after Shepard died in that space would those roots grow through her, consuming her and her life, her knowledge, everything she was? The tendrils began to move, to burrow through the concrete underneath her.

No. She leaned back against Garrus, concentrating on feeling his slight movements, the sound of his breath. The dark couldn’t be allowed to win. Her ridiculous imagination couldn’t be allowed to rip her heart out. Instead she needed to focus on the miracle of the creature, to share Shiala’s sorrow at the being’s death. It may have been the only creature like it in the universe. She needed to concentrate on what the Thorian’s knowledge gained over all those years could mean to stopping Saren. It amounted to an unparalleled wealth of intel.

Garrus leaned in against her ear, his voice barely a breath as he whispered, “Let’s turn on the flashlight for a few minutes.”
Shepard shook her head, wrestling herself back into control. “So, you gave Saren this Cypher from the Thorian so that he would understand the vision?” She raised her eyebrows. “Could you give it to me so that I understand it?”

Shiala’s teeth flashed in a smile. “I can and a great deal more. While I came here an indoctrinated slave to Sovereign’s will, touching the Thorian’s mind freed me of that control. When it filled me with its knowledge through our meld, nothing compelled me to pass all of that knowledge to Saren.” She shrugged, clearly pleased with herself. Shepard didn’t blame her, she deserved to feel pride in that victory.

Shepard’s laugh tumbled into the space, kind and comforting. “You’ve got to enjoy the irony there, don’t you?” After a moment of realization, her laugh died. “Wait. Sovereign’s will? Not Saren’s will?”

Shiala nodded, her entire demeanour suddenly withdrawn and fearful. “The Thorian predated the original civilization that developed here. It witnessed the rise of a people who called themselves the Reloh. Those people were then conquered and subjugated by the Prothean Empire when it expanded into this sector of space. Likewise, the Thorian witnessed the Reaper invasion and devastation of this planet. Through it, I saw the truth of the Reapers and of Sovereign’s nature.”

Understanding, Shepard let out a shaky sigh. “It’s not a ship, is it? It’s a Reaper.” She felt Garrus tense behind her.

“Spirits. That thing’s alive?” His hand slipped over Shepard’s forearm, gripping it.

“Yes, it is one of the greatest of its kind. The roar of their lasers turned the surface to ash as they descended through the clouds, blotting out the sun. Fire balls rained down, unleashing hordes of monsters, twisted and terrible, to slaughter, some even consuming the dead.” The asari shuddered and began to tremble. “I can pull back the curtain and reveal to you what the Thorian placed in my mind, but once you’ve seen the truth . . ..”

Shepard reached out and ran her hand down Shiala’s arm, gripping the asari’s hand in hers. “I understand and . . ..” She sighed. “. . . I appreciate your warning, but I’ll gladly face a thousand nightmares if it helps me find a way to keep Saren from making all of that a reality.”

“May I rest for a time before transferring the knowledge, Captain? The process of melding with your consciousness is quite draining, and I think it’s safe to say that I’m not at my best at the moment.” A slight shine from Shiala’s eyes stared into Shepard’s as the asari squeezed her hand.

“Of course. Rest and regain your strength. We’re not going anywhere for at least a day.” Shepard yawned. “I could use some sleep myself.” She settled down, lying flat to ease the pressure in her back. Resting her head in the hollow between the packs and Garrus’s shoulder, she let out a soft moan. She loosened her grip on Shiala’s fingers, but the asari showed no sign of wanting to let go of her hand, so Shepard just tightened her fingers again. After being indoctrinated by a Reaper, given to a giant plant as a sacrifice and having several aliens inside her head, she’d probably need to hold someone’s hand for a while too.

After the asari fell asleep, Shepard looked up to see Garrus watching her. “C-Sec?”

“Mm?” He blinked, but otherwise didn’t move.

“I need a backup in case something happens to me. I know you don’t have the crazy beacon vision mumbo jumbo in your head, but would you let Shiala give you the rest of it?” She closed her eyes and listened to him breathe. Sleep pressed down on her heavy and determined, but she shoved it back, punching it in the face. Urgency pushed harder than her weariness, harder than the fragility she struggled so hard to keep hidden. But, the truth remained. Life was fragile. The fight could well outlive her.

“What about Nihlus? He’s got far more pull than I ever will.” He didn’t sound all that eager to have an apocalyptic nightmare downloaded straight into his brain. Not that Shepard could really blame him for that. Given the choice, she would have given Nihlus the honour too.

“He and I are the most likely to get killed. And you’ve got an entire structure of respectability behind you.” She turned over as much as she could with Shiala’s death grip on her hand. “If I fall, I need to know someone will pick this up and keep running with it, Garrus. Even if Nihlus outlives me, he’ll need help. You’re under no obligation, but I can’t think of anyone I trust more to do it.”

He chuckled, warm and throaty. “You’re incredibly manipulative, you know that, right?”

She wriggled her eyebrows a little. “I admit nothing, but that it’s the truth. I trust you to see it through.”

He let out a long sigh. “Fine, but you go and die on me, leave me stuck with this war, I’m going to kick your deceased ass.”

A warm chuckle spread through her, pushing back the chill. “Fair enough. You don’t tell anyone, Garrus. Unless I kick, you tell no one that you have this knowledge. I don’t want targets painted on everyone, especially you.” She elbowed him. “No one. Yeah?”

“Fair enough. No one knows.” Shaking his head, he leaned back and closed his eyes. “This is all far crazier than anyone could have imagined.”

“Yeah. I signed on to pick up a beacon, transport it.” The laugh that chased those words came out bitter.

“And now look where you are. Buried under a Prothean ruin with the endemic, ancestral knowledge of a planet, and a rakishly good-looking turian C-Sec officer.”

Shepard grinned and closed her eyes. “Rakishly good-looking? Seriously? Oh, C-Sec, we have got to get you some help for those delusions.” She grunted then laughed as his elbow thumped her in the ribs. “Stop that. You’re going to give me a punctured lung.”

“Go to sleep, Shepard.”

She leaned up a little first. “How long you have left on those power cells?”

“Should be okay for another twelve hours or so. They always run a little longer than advertised.”

The next time Shepard woke it was to the sound of chattering teeth. She got up and dug out power cells. “C-Sec, wake up. We need to change you out. You’re shivering so hard you’re going to bring the shelter down around us.”

“Guess I was sleeping a little deeper than I thought.” Shaking hands popped out the cells and inserted the new ones. “These only give me about another ten hours.” She grunted then laughed as his elbow thumped her in the ribs. “Stop that. You’re going to give me a punctured lung.”

Shepard grinned and passed him an empty water bottle before flopping back down under the
“I could use a bathroom as well,” Shiala sighed, facing away from them. “I also wouldn’t turn down a nice long soak in a hot tub.”

“I always considered hot tubs to be soup pots filled with bacteria, but right now, I’d have no problem at all being a main ingredient in Shepard soup.” She laughed bright and loud as Garrus’s stomach growled. “Sweet baby Jesus, C-Sec, I hope that was just really bad timing.”

He laughed and clambered out from under the blankets. “Don’t worry, Shepard. You’re poisonous.”

“Oh, and I thought my ribs hurt.” She flopped over and rooted through the packs for food and water for her and Shiala, then grabbed a half ration bar out of her hip pack for Garrus.

When she passed Shiala her meal, Shepard saw the asari watching them with a concerned frown. “What’s up, Sister Shiala? Has the light of the blessed Enkindlers abandoned you?”

The asari looked even more worried until Garrus laughed. “I was just wondering if you’re both insane,” the asari said, her voice a little more haughty than before.

“No,” Garrus answered. “Just Shepard. I was a perfectly ordinary, semi-respectable C-Sec agent before I signed on with her and joined the Galactic Brotherhood of Shepard.”

“The Galactic Brotherhood of Shepard?” Shiala chuckled, nervous and flat, but Shepard liked that the asari lost a little of the glazed cast around her eyes.

Shepard grinned. “I’m a huge fan of the Church of Galactic Brotherhood. I watch it a lot on late night broadcasts.” She held up a finger to stop Garrus from commenting. “No comments from you, Brother C-Sec.”

“Oh, the Father of Light.” Shiala’s grin melted away some more of the shocked stiffness. “I love him. ‘Although this one is not worthy, it wishes to humbly bring the glorious light of the Enkindlers to all. Your gracious donations allow this undeserving one to modestly spread the word of the sublime Enkindlers throughout the galaxy, creating one great bloom of brotherhood. Praise be to the Enkindlers.’”

Garrus grumbled. “Now I feel left out for not being an insomniac.” He waved at them. “Turn around.”

Shepard sighed and turned away. “How did you survive the military being so damned shy?”

Once they’d all taken care of their pressing needs, Shiala sat cross-legged and looked at Shepard, her face so solemn and drawn, that the captain knew the asari was ready to pass on the Cypher and the rest of the Thorian’s knowledge.

“This will not be comfortable for either of you.” The asari’s entire body apologized for the inevitable. “You’re about to witness . . ..”

“Sheiala,” Shepard said, reaching out to lay her hand over the delicate, purple one, “it’s fine. No need to apologize. Let’s just get it over with and move on to dealing with it.” Try as she might to soften it, her smile felt like broken glass on her face.

The moment the stream of images pulled back, leaving Shepard alone and screaming, cowering in the corners of her own mind, Shiala turned her back and lay down, curling up under the blankets.
Shepard peeked out, testing the waters of coherent thought, as the asari began to snore.

Silent, brittle as spun sugar, Shepard curled up in Garrus’s arms, suddenly needing to be protected from the things hiding in the dark. Who knew that all those years she’d told herself she was just being silly sleeping with the light on, she’d been right? Monsters so much more horrible than anything she could have dreamed up slipped through the hidden places, waiting for a chance to punch through the thin veneer of a nice, normal, safe life.

Garrus clung to her just as hard, both shivering but not from the cold. Shepard doubted anything would ever truly feel cold again after what Shiala showed her.

After Eden Prime, the vision from the beacon turned her insides to water. She’d tried not to let it show, of course. A crew’s confidence came from its captain, so she downplayed it, showed a brave face. However, after witnessing Feros’ final weeks she wished that the building had come down on her head. How could she, Jane Shepard, hope to stand in the path of the coming storm and halt it? The sick, numb feeling spread down her back, crimson fingers creeping between the fibers of muscle and bone.

“What the hell do we do against that, Shepard?” Garrus whispered after a couple of hours of silence. “We aren’t as advanced as the Protheans. We aren’t as numerous as they were, and the Reapers just obliterated them. Feros fell in days.”

She wrapped her arms around him even more snuggly. “We keep fighting, Garrus. What else can we do? We make sure Saren doesn’t succeed in bringing them back.”

She felt him strengthen and smiled. Good, he’d need that strength. “We can do it, C-Sec. We just need to get out from under this building. Hopefully Nihlus and the Normandy have tracked Saren somewhere useful. I’m going to get some sleep. How’s your power level?”

“Go to sleep. I’m fine.”

Shepard dozed, waking up either cramped, freezing, or shaking from nightmares. The numbness in her back pulled a heavy, wet fog down over her brain. It weighed down her body until she couldn’t move. Each time sleep pulled her back, implacable, a tide dragging her out to sea.

Then she woke up to an open radio channel. Not static, just open air.

“Hello?”

“Shepard! Thank the spirits, you are there. You didn’t answer.”

“Nihlus?” She sat up, blinking against the dark. Casting about her, she searched for anything familiar, an anchor in the black, her breathing sped up, her chest tightening. “Where are you? Is the Normandy on the way back?” She clenched her fists, then shook her hands out, trying to force the numb, deadness from her fingers. The roar of the dragon returned, but tens, hundreds of them, their claws shredding everything in their path, fire leaving every world burning.

_The building should have just come down on my head. Perhaps it did, and it’s just taken this long for my body to realize it’s dead._

“We’re in the Horsehead Nebula. We lost Saren’s tracker so we’re going system to system to see if we can locate it again. Are you all right? Shepard? You don’t sound very well.”

“Nihlus, you have to come back for Garrus. You have to come back, right now. There’s thousands of them, Nihlus.” She choked on a sob. “Thousands. Everything is burning. God, it’s so damned dark.”

“Okay, Shepard. Breathe. Where’s Garrus?” The Spectre’s voice helped, no doubt manipulating her with his harmonics. Not that she cared. Anything to stop the breathless, dead panic squeezing its fist around her throat.

“Garrus is right here. He’s sleeping.” She reached out and touched the turian’s neck. “Sweet Jesus, he’s cold as ice. The last of the power cells must have died. I have to wake him up, get him out of this armour.” She reached over and shook Garrus’s shoulder. “C-Sec, wake up. Nihlus, I have to take care of him. You need to come back now and pick him up. Shepard, out.”

Shepard pulled herself out from under the blankets. “Come on, C-Sec, wake up before you freeze to death.” She shook Garrus until he mumbled and began to shiver. “There we go, come on. Sit up. You’re freezing.”

Pulling back the blankets she helped pull him up. He responded slow and stiff, still not quite awake. Shepard glanced over to her other side. “Shiala, could I get a hand? Seems the big guy’s gone hypothermic on us.”

Reaching out to grab Roger, she turned the assault rifle’s flashlight on, then laid it down to shine on them.

“Come on, start moving.” She took Garrus’s face between her hands. “You with me?”

He nodded. “Yeah. J . . . just took a m . . . minute.”

Shepard shook her head at the sound of Garrus’s teeth clacking together. “C-Sec, I think the time has come to lose the armour. It’s just keeping our body heat away from you.” She gestured for him to hand it over. “Come on, big guy, off with it.”

“Y . . . you’re just trying to s . . . see me naked,” he said, stuttering as he shivered.

“Yeah, that’s been my single ambition since I saw your assless hotness in Dr. Michel’s office.” She scowled. “I’m serious, come on. I fully intend for all three of us to get through this.” Without waiting for him, she reached out and began popping the seals. “Keeping the armour was a good plan, but it’s not working any more.”

Shaking hands removed the components as she unfastened the seals and Shiala piled it in the far corner. Once she had him stripped down to the underlayer, she unzipped it and helped him out of the top portion, folding it down and tying the arms around his waist.

“Okay, come on, under the blankets, icicle man.” Shepard covered him up, then wriggled down and burrowed in against his chest.

“Shepard,” Garrus whispered, his voice oscillating with his shivering.

She wrapped her arms around him a little tighter and pressed herself along his front. “What? You’re supposed to be saving your strength.”

He pressed his mouth right next to her ear. “I’m not comfortable spooning with the asari without my armour.”

Shepard chuckled and raised a hand to his cheek. “Oh, C-Sec, you are quite the fellow. We need to keep you warm. She’s a source of body heat. Just pretend she’s a heating unit.”
Shiala sighed. “I can hear you both.”

Garrus coughed. “Sorry.”

“Don’t mind C-Sec, he’s not used to being around females. We make him a little jittery as a group.” Shepard grinned at Garrus, then tucked herself in again, hating the way he shivered. “Come on, big guy, get those arms around me.”

“Technically, I’m not female, so he should be fine.” She scooted in along Garrus’s back and pulled the covers up. “See, warmer already.”

Ten minutes later, the turian stopped shivering and Shepard let out a long sigh of relief. She rubbed his back. “Better.” She sat up and dug into her hip pack to pull out the second half of his ration bar. “Eat and then get some sleep.”

“You didn’t hit me as the caretaker type, Shepard,” he said between chewing.

“I’m a complex woman . . . an enigma, really.” She chuckled, then the expression fell from her face, suddenly so weak along her left side that she collapsed, landing nearly face down. The crushing pressure in her chest returned, and try as she might, she couldn’t get her arms under her.

“Shepard?” Garrus rolled her over, staring into her eyes. “Shepard, what’s wrong?” Fear laced his voice, but she couldn’t tell him it would be all right, she couldn’t make any part of her do anything. “Shepard?”

Sleep pulled her back, the heavy tide rolling her out to sea.
Mass Effect - Future Imperfect Chapter Twenty One

Chapter Summary

Buried on Feros. Gah! Rescue us already.

“There she is.”

Shepard cracked her eyes a tiny bit, wincing away from the light. “Umm . . . what?”

Rough talons pressed against her cheek and soft fingers gripped one of her hands. “We almost lost you there,” Garrus replied, his voice low and comforting.

Frowning, she blinked up at the turian as he leaned into the light. He looked exhausted but happy. “How could you lose me, C-Sec? Where am I going to go?”

Shiala chuckled. “I believe your people call it heaven.”

Blowing a raspberry, Shepard rolled over a little, tucking herself in against Garrus’s chest. “I can’t die. C-Sec said he’d kick my dead ass if I did. Can’t have him desecrating the dead. Besides, I doubt that’s my final destination.”

“Yeah, well, if you could avoid needing any more emergency surgery done by flashlight while Dr. Chakwas yells in my ear, I’d appreciate that.” Garrus pulled the blankets up around her neck and wrapped his arms around her. “How are you feeling? In any pain?”

Shepard thought about that for a minute, then another, and another, deciding just after she forgot the question that she needed to go back to sleep. “I’m sleepy.”

Garrus chuckled. “Then sleep. The Normandy’s digging us out, so you’ll probably wake up in med bay next time. At least this time when Nihlus calls, I can tell him you woke up.”

Shiala laughed. “That might buy you an extra minute between calls.”

“Are you warm enough? Still got food, C-Sec?” Shepard mumbled, already giving in to the tide.

“Yeah, I’m fine. A little hungry, but we’ll be out of here soon. Sleep. I’ve got you.”

Shepard chuckled even as she dozed off. “Yeah right, C-Sec. You wish. Delusional turian.”

“Go ahead. I’ll carry her.” The sound of a hand clapping against something echoed around the space. “You did an amazing thing, Vakarian. Well done.”

Shepard opened her eyes at the sound of Nihlus’s voice only to press them closed and cover them with a hand. “Sweet baby Jesus, people. You do realize we’ve been in almost complete darkness for days.” She tried to remove her hand, but the light felt like a thousand angry bees attacking her eyes.

“Ornery as always, I see, Shepard,” Nihlus’s warm voice spoke from beside her, its subvocals sounding strained. “It’s good to see some things never change, even when you’ve been buried alive for the better part of a week.”

She almost looked out again. “Kryik? Glad to see you. Well, hear you, anyway.”

“Nihlus had us headed for the relay before you hung up that call,” a voice said from her other side. “I don’t think he’s slept in the past three days.” Kaidan chuckled as Nihlus cleared his throat. He leaned down closer and lowered his voice to a whisper. “He acts tough, but he’s a big softie. He took good care of your crew.”

“Brother Sparky?” Shepard grinned and lifted one finger, that much light tolerable. “Glory be, it’s nice of you to drop by. Praise the giant glowing asses of the Enkindlers.” She shifted, sitting up a little, but all of her ribs screamed at her, and she sank back onto the packs.

She saw a shadow crouch next to her. “Nice vacation spot, Captain,” the biotic said. She could hear the grin in his voice. “You sure know how to get away from it all.”

Shepard chuckled and lifted another finger to let in a little more light. “Well, I was tired. Needed a little sleep.” She squinted, her head aching but tolerable. “C-Sec and Shiala are okay?”

“They’re fine, Shepard. Dr. Chakwas will check them over, but they seem to have come through no worse for their adventure,” Nihlus answered.

Turning to her left, she saw Nihlus crouched next to her arm. “Good. Thanks for coming so quickly.”

The Spectre smiled, his mandibles fluttering hard. “You’re welcome. The Normandy isn’t the same without her captain. Come on, let’s get you to med bay.” Nodding his head toward the open side of the shelter, he cocked a brow plate at her. When she nodded, he slipped an arm behind her back and another under her knees, picking her up easily.

Shepard let out a shrill keen of pain that made the Spectre wince. “Sorry,” she gasped. “Broken ribs are a bitch.” Leaning her head against his shoulder, she closed her eyes, suddenly exhausted again. “Next time, you lead the team that goes into the building that Saren’s monster wants to destroy.”

Nihlus chuckled. “Okay. It’s a deal.”

Shepard spent most of the next two days drifting in and out while her newly rebroken ribs mended and Dr. Chakwas detoxed her off the painkillers Garrus had been forced to give her. Pretty much every time she woke up, she only had to look to the side to find Nihlus. He brought her up to date on everything he’d discovered in the Exogeni building about the Thorian and the experiments the company had been running.

“Allowing the thing to infect and control all those people . . . fucking diabolical,” Shepard said, shaking her head in disgust. “Trust a massive corporation to start a colony just to turn all their people into test subjects.” Shifting uncomfortably, she sat up. “I need to get out of here, lie on my own slab of cement.” After glancing around to make sure Dr. Chakwas would not witness her break out, she groaned and braced herself against the edge of the bed to rest for a moment.

She frowned and wrapped an arm around her ribs, then glanced toward the door to the back lab where Shiala had moved in with Dr. T’Soni. “Did Shiala bring you up to speed on the Thorian from her perspective? Sovereign? The Reapers? Did she give you the cypher for your part of the vision?”
Nihlus nodded at each one. “That thing is a Reaper.” Sighing, he sank further into his chair. “And there’s hundreds more of them.” He stared into her eyes, allowing her to see through to where the destruction of Feros filled him with a superstitious fear she knew all too well. “Is it too late to just decide to let the whole thing go, Shepard?”

Raising her eyebrows, she let out a huff of air and nodded. “Yeah. Ignorance was bliss.” She held a hand out. “Little help, please?” When he stood, she laid her hands on his upper arms and slid to the floor, using him to brake herself. “I hope I’m back together by tomorrow. We’ll be at Eden Prime first thing?”

He wrapped an arm around her upper back, bearing some of her weight as she limped to the door. “Yes. Rael’Zorah made contact with a few people a couple of days ago. They haven’t heard from him since, but apparently he left messages for Tali if she showed up there.”

Shepard lifted a hand to greet the crew members who called out to her as she limped across to her quarters. Setting her jaw, she did her best to pretend her ass wasn’t on display. “Of course, they wouldn’t just send those messages to the Normandy?” She shook her head as he confirmed it. “That would be far too easy.”

Pausing, Nihlus dropped back a half step and pulled her gown closed over her back. She frowned and glanced back, wondering if turians could read minds. He just resumed the conversation as if nothing happened. “According to Dr. T’Soni, the archeologists on Eden Prime discovered something amazing in the wake of Saren’s attack, so both of our asari are eager to get a chance to go groundside as well.” He palmed the door to her quarters.

“Okay.” Shepard leaned against her desk while Nihlus pulled back her blankets. She smiled, sighing at the general overprotectiveness of turians as he helped her lie down, lifting her feet into bed and then covering her up. Once she lay on her side, pillows piled under her shoulder and head, she let out a long, shaky moan. “Much better. Thanks, Kryik.”

She let her eyes close. “Damn, I feel beat to hell. If I get hurt again, just have the doc put me down.”

“You blew a hell of a blood clot, Shepard. Your ribs caused a slow internal bleed that broke loose and headed straight for several major organs. I have no idea how Vakarian managed to save you with just an omnitool and his talons, but he pulled out a miracle. Don’t be too quick to toss it away.” He perched on her chair, looking uncomfortable and awkward.

“Shiala . . .” Shepard said, looking up at the Spectre. “The Thorian broke Sovereign’s indoctrination when it melded with her. Have Dr. Chakwas run scans . . . whatever. We need to know if there is something going on with what the Thorian did that we can use to help break or prevent indoctrination. We’re going to have the colonists on board for a few more days, might as well have them earn their room and board if they’re willing.”

Nihlus nodded. “I’ll talk to the doctor.” He gestured for her to pay attention to her pillows rather than the day’s business. “Get some sleep. You look like hell, Shepard.”

She chuckled and nodded. “Yeah, well it suits me then, because I feel like hell.” Her eyes closed. “You and the crew seem to be bonding.” She smiled. “That’s good. Glad you’ve decided to come out of your closet. Literally in the case of that room.”

His mandibles fluttered. “I needed to sort through a few things. I can’t take credit for digging you out so quickly. The crew galvanized to get you out of there.”
“Yeah, but from the way they’re responding to you now, I think you might have had something to do with it.” She yawned. “You’ve got the ship?”

“I do. Just rest and get better.”

She didn’t hear him leave.

After another ten hours of sleep, Shepard finally woke feeling well enough and rested enough to have a shower and dress in a t-shirt and shorts, joining the crew at the table in the galley for the evening meal.

“So, what was it like, ma’am?” Jenkins asked, bristling at the jeering from his fellows. “What? Have any of you run from a Reaper?”

Ash shrugged and thumped him on the back. “The kid has a point.”

Garrus walked around the corner from the elevator. Shepard grinned at him, and nodded him over.

“C-Sec, pick up Jenkins and run to the end of the sleeper pods there,” she called, beckoning him over. “Someone get me a missile launcher.”

He looked confused as he settled into the seat next to her. “Why?” He leaned into her a little, his arm slung careless and loose over the back of her seat.

“He wants to know what it was like running from Sovereign.” A wide, easy smile spread over her features, her eyes throwing teasing sparks.

Garrus laughed. “No. No. I wouldn’t want to steal someone’s chance to be the runner. Williams, you carry him. Shepard and I will fire rockets back and forth across the walkway.” Shaking his head, he patted the captain’s shoulder before pushing himself up and heading over to get a couple of ration bars.

“You know, C-Sec . . . you’ve got a point.” Shepard relaxed back into her chair, letting out a faint sigh as the action met with no pain. “We’ve been greedy, keeping all the good disasters for ourselves. Next time, we’ll let others take our places, and we’ll head to the Citadel, go out for a decent meal, catch a vid, get a good drunk on.”

He ripped the wrapper off one, biting it in half. “That’s a plan I can get behind.” He laughed. “Now, we just need to find a way to predict the disasters so we can plan accordingly.”

Williams laughed and got up. “When you figure that trick out, put me down for stranded at a tropical resort, or snowed in at a mountain cabin over Christmas.”

Shepard aped writing that down. “Anyone else have requests? Williams wants the typhoons, hurricanes, tsunamis, and avalanches . . .” She winked at the chief. “Talk about greedy.”

Nihlus walked around the divider. “Greedy?” He stepped up beside Ashley.

Shepard opened her mouth to fill the semi-awkward silence, but then Williams chuckled.

“We’re divvying up the disasters,” she replied. “Shepard and Garrus are going to let us in on the erupting volcanoes and building-destroying Reapers.” She smiled and offered him her chair. “You have any preferences, sir?”
Shaking his head, Nihlus sat at the table. “First, that no one call me sir. When it comes to disasters . . .” He ducked his head in a tiny shrug. “Been through just about everything, so as long as everyone comes through the other side, I’ll take whatever is left over after you’ve all chosen.”

Shepard watched the Spectre with the crew, liking the way he seemed to have settled in while she was buried on Feros.

“Well, put me down for something small,” Alenko said, walking over. “Stopped up drain or maybe a tragic burnt toast episode.” He grinned and flopped into the chair Garrus had vacated. “Maybe a loose hamster. I got pretty good at catching my little sister’s.”

Shepard clapped him on the shoulder then pushed up out of her chair. “I like a soldier who knows his strengths, Sparky, but you get no marks for ambition.” She sighed and backed toward her cabin. “Ground teams for Eden Prime, you know who you are, meet at the airlock for a quick briefing at 0800. Get some sleep, people. Who knows what’ll happen.” Waving to answer their goodnight wishes, she turned and headed for her bed.

Shepard had just settled under her blankets with a datapad of messages that she needed to answer when her door opened. “What is this new hell?” she called, sounding more brittle and petulant than angry. “Now we don’t even knock before walking into the captain’s quarters?” She glared at Nihlus, throwing up mental armour and shields as he walked in. Back frozen and stiff, she sat up. “What’s up, Kryik?”

He walked over to the end of her bed, stared at her for a moment, his face and body language both uncertain and unreadable. Then he folded down to sit next to the wall, facing her, as soft and relaxed as he’d been tight and controlled before. “Well, you could stop calling me that, and go back to Nihlus.”

“Ummmm.” Shepard turned to get up, but he reached out and laid a hand on her forearm.

“Relax, Shepard. I just came to talk, not . . . what did you call it? Double dog dare you into having sex with me.” He bounced a little. “This really is a terrible bed.” Meeting her stare, he shrugged. “Anyway, I have no idea what it means to double dog dare someone, but I’ve seen Earth dogs and truly have no desire to link that image with sex in my head.”

Shepard chuckled despite herself, the corner of her mouth lifting as she shook her head at him. “Don’t get too proud of yourself there. You can’t joke your way out of the doghouse.”

His mandibles dropped. “What is it with you and dogs?”

She punched his arm. “Stop. The doghouse is a small outbuilding made for the dog in the back yard. When someone is in the ‘doghouse’, it’s because they’ve been kicked out of the human house for being an ass.” She sighed and wrapped her arms around her knees. “So, why are you here, sitting on my bed to talk? It’s not a very professional place to discuss things.”

He crossed his legs. “Good, because this isn’t a professional discussion.”

She stared into his eyes, blinking slowly. The three days of being trapped in a couple cubic metres of space, witnessing the extinction of a planet’s population, and nearly dying of a blood clot hadn’t left her any defenses to deal with Nihlus’ insanity. “I thought I made it clear that professional discussions were the only acceptable type.”

He nodded and leaned forward, resting his forearms on his thighs. “You first came to my attention after Elysium. I heard about the attack, about how this single soldier on leave rallied together a force capable of repelling the pirates until the Alliance could respond. It started as mere curiosity about a successful military reversal.” He shifted, pulling his knees up, just as defensive as she was.

“It wasn’t all that impressive, Nihlus. I did what any soldier would do.” Shepard struggled not to shudder, remembering those very long, ugly hours. No one ever considered the reality of leading that resistance with a handful of off duty Alliance and civilians. No one allowed themselves to register just what it might cost, just what might be lost. The shiny medal plastered it over, making it all sterile and heroic.

He shrugged. “I’ve been in similar enough situations to know how bad it can turn and how fast. My interest in the attack became an interest in the one who led the resistance. I admit my bias. I saw what looked to be no more than a poorly grown, female child and thought they’d made a mistake. Surely that couldn’t be the great Shepard.” He shrugged again, that oddly deferential head bob.

“I dug through your file, learning what I could of your career. I became fascinated, turning you into a riddle I needed to solve. When the council began rumbling about giving humanity another try at putting forward a Spectre, I threw your name in, offered to shadow you.” He chuckled, but it came out bitter. “I’d built you into this warrior goddess amongst humans . . . no, just a warrior goddess.”

Shepard shook her head. “Tall pedestal to fall from. It’s a wonder I didn’t shatter falling from that height.” A small, sad but understanding smile just touched her lips as her gaze travelled along the sweeping, white lines of his famila notas. “Except that I did shatter, didn’t I?”

He nodded. “I had this ridiculous idea of what would happen when we met, so the reality threw me. I knew you tested people and situations to their breaking points. It was one of the things that drew me to you. It showed a fearlessness I respected. Actually being tested by it . . . well, that was another matter.” He reached out and took her hand, his thumb stroking her fingers in a decidedly unprofessional manner. “What you did with Harkin . . . Well, when you touched my talons . . . Because of my ridiculous expectations, I thought a promise had been made, so what happened with Harkin hurt me.”

Shepard frowned and leaned forward, crossing her legs. “What do you mean, a promise?”

“Turians don’t touch one another as familiarly as humans do. Some sorts of touching, bare talons between unrelated male and female . . .” He cleared his throat. “It means a willingness for a deeper relationship.”

“Oh.” The word came out as a small gasp of understanding. She stared at his bare hand holding hers for a second before she pulled her hand back. “I didn’t know, Nihlus. I’m sorry, I wouldn’t have pushed if I had.” Frowning, she let out a rough sigh, then gave him a shove. “That’s for not telling me and being an asshat because I didn’t behave the way you thought I should. Come on, how the hell was I supposed to know something like that? I didn’t even know why you wore gloves all the time.”

He nodded. “I know, and I shouldn’t have expected you to understand what you were asking.”

“No shit.” She leaned back against the bulkhead again, pulling her body back, away from him. “You understand that none of this excuses what you said to me, Nihlus.” When he opened his mouth, she shut him down with a dagger sharp finger raised between them. “I get to talk now. You get to listen.” Meeting his eyes, she let out a short, grumbling sigh. Such beautiful eyes. Damn it, why did liking someone have to be so damned illogical?

“I survived and escaped Mindoir because my father refused to stop inciting the other prisoners to riot. The batarians knew that shooting him wouldn’t shut him down, just make him a martyr. They had to break him.” Her shoulders trembled as a shuddering shrug passed through her.

“Easiest way to break a man, easiest way to break a community, use the honoured members to degrade the most vulnerable ones. They tortured me, but my father was strong. When that didn’t work, the slavers threatened men I’d known nearly my whole life with the deaths of their own children if they didn’t rape me. Dad never broke. So strong.” She held up her hands, throwing up a wall to keep him at bay as he reached out to her.

“Don’t. I don’t need your sympathy or your pity, Nihlus. It was a long time ago, and in the end, it saved my life. I got out, an orphan with a head full of crazy, but I got out.” A grudging sigh that felt like old tar rattled from her lungs. “When I got back to Earth, I dulled the pain any way I could, mostly Hallex. A whole damned lot of Hallex.” She cocked her head, lifting one corner of her lip in a sardonic smile. “It was an expensive means of killing the pain, but I stripped down stolen cars to support my habit.”

Shepard sighed again, but this one cleaned away the rest, leaving her more naked than she’d thought she’d ever allow in his presence. Meeting his stare, she shrugged, puppet strings jerking her shoulders toward the ceiling then dropping them. “I’ve never had sex with anyone, Nihlus -- never made love to anyone. I’m not sure I ever will, but I do know how to use the power of what God gave me in my work.”

His brow plates lowered, his mandibles dropping further than she’d suspected they could go.

“Shepard, I’ve never been more sorry for saying anything in my life.”

She nodded, believing him. “I know. C-Sec was right after all: jealousy.” She shrugged. “It doesn’t matter. As flippantly as I handed it to you, I gave you a sharp weapon. As much as I was interested -- I might have even taken your hand knowing what it meant -- I gave you an opening to move closer, and you used it to stick that dagger straight into my heart.” She frowned and met his eyes, thawing a little at the genuine sorrow moving behind that remarkable green.

“You hurt me.” Waggling her head back and forth a little, she let a bitter chuckle slide between her lips, slick and fragile as cellophane. “I liked you far more than I should have. Guess I had a bit of hero worship going on after all. I accept your apology, Nihlus, but that doesn’t mean I’ll be able to trust you like that again.” She bristled into angles and quills. “If you ever use what I just gave you to hurt me . . . Well, I don’t need to finish that sentence, do I?”

“We’re partners, and you’re right, we work well together.” He took her hand again. “How about we work on being friends as well?”

Shepard looked down at her extra-pale, thin fingers cradled in his long, talons. “I’ve had a really bad few days, Nihlus, I don’t know . . .”

The Spectre leaned into her, his talons gently clasping her chin. “Shepard, stop talking for a minute.” His mouth pressed against hers, his mandibles fluttering softly, then pressing tight against his face as a slight suction tugged at her lips.

Her heart thumped fast and light. She allowed the contact for a half second, then jerked away. “No. No. That’s enough. Back up.” Her hand balled into a fist, but she managed to stop herself from punching him again. “I thought turians didn’t kiss,” she whispered, throwing up a hasty wall.

“We don’t, but humans do.” He backed away and let out a short sigh. “I’m sorry. I don’t know what I was thinking. Everything I do seems to end up coming off in fluent ass.” His mandibles flicked in a distressed manner. “It’s just . . . I don’t do this, Shepard. I work.” A long, sigh made a soft keen deep in his throat. “Do I even have that any more?”
Shepard shook her head. “Nihlus . . .”

He leaned in very slowly. “I’m sorry, Shepard. I know I’ve been an ass. I can’t justify my behaviour, but I’ve wanted this for a long time.” He lifted his talons to stroke her cheek and touched his brow to hers. “This is the turian equivalent. Better?”

“Well, less invasive, anyway.” She pulled back and reached up to lay her hand alongside his cheek. “I’m sure you can understand why I might not be in the best head space for all of this. Let’s just talk, all right?” When he nodded, she smiled, tight lipped but warm. “So, you’ve been out practicing kissing with humans and asari just in case you run across someone you can’t control the urge to smooch?” The one side of her mouth quirked a little. “That could get you arrested.”

He chuckled. “Not exactly.” His head bobbed a little in a turian shrug, but he didn’t pull away. “I’ve never been one for dalliances. There were plenty of opportunities -- Spectres attract followers for some reason I’ve never figured out -- but there was always work to be done.” A long, rumbling sigh warned her that another uncomfortable confession was on its way. She held up a hand and opened her mouth, trying to forestall it, but he just kept going. “When I received my orders to board the Normandy, I went to the Consort on the Citadel. She owed me a favour, so she taught me.”

Shepard pulled back, pushing him away. “Oh man, Kryik. Back up. Put on the brakes. I have no idea what to do with any of this.” She drew her knees up to her chest. “You need to give me some space.”

He withdrew to the end of the bed.

She stopped him from retreating completely by taking his hand. “We do work well together, Nihlus, and we can see about being friends, but no more just walking in and camping on my bed.” Releasing him, she nodded. “We’ll see if we can find some trust.” Wriggling down into her blankets, she nodded toward the door. “But right now, I really am very tired and need to get some sleep.”

He nodded, his entire demeanour softer than she ever remembered seeing him. “You’ve seen a hard few days. We would have lost you if it hadn’t been for Vakarian.”

“Yeah, Garrus is pretty remarkable.” Shepard shrugged. “As is Dr. Chakwas. I can’t imagine trying to talk someone through surgery over the radio. I’m only here because of them.”

A frown marched across her brow as knuckles rapped on her door. “I swear, I might as well just throw a cot down in the CIC.” She nodded to Nihlus as he stepped into the doorway, opening it. “See you at 0800. Eden Prime. Again.”

His mandibles spread. “Maybe we’ll manage to do a lot less yelling this time.”

“Only if I don’t have to chase your ass across the colony.” She smiled. “Good night, Nihlus.”

“No promises.” His mandibles flicked, and he turned away, giving the person on the other side of the door a nod and pat on the shoulder before striding off.

Shepard grinned, her face feeling like her heart made it blossom when Garrus stepped into the doorway. “Hey there, hero.” She’d never had a friend, not a real, true friend, but if Garrus was any indication of what it meant, Shepard gladly recommended having one or two.

He let out an embarrassed rumble and nodded after Nihlus. “He wasn’t being a jerk, was he?”

“Not at all. He came to make peace.” She settled the rest of the way down into her blankets and reached out to thump the bed, inviting him over. Odd how even with the distance between them, Nihlus had just invited himself into her space, but Garrus remained respectful of it despite their familiarity. “How are you feeling? Recovered?”

He sat at the end. “Yep. Ate almost all of the ration bars, so we’ll need to restock soon.” He chuckled and reached out to pat her ankle. “I just came to see how you were doing.”

“How are you feeling? Recovered?”

“Fine until you got fresh with me. Hands off the ankles, mister.” She laughed and nodded. “Come on, don’t be shy. We’re making a habit out of sleeping together.”

He climbed up the bed and flopped on his side. “The bomb shelter was more comfortable than this bed.”

“I know. The Alliance must be afraid their captains will become lazy layabouts if their bed doesn’t get painful after about four hours.” She closed her eyes and relaxed down into the warmth of her blankets. “How’s Shiala fitting in? She and Liara getting along all right?”

“Peas in an archeological pod, to bastardize one of your sayings. They’re talking so fast that no one else can understand any of it. I think they might actually explode when we take them to the dig site tomorrow.” His chuckle warmed her, his touch as he brushed her hair from her brow eased her toward sleep.

“There’s an unexpected side effect of scholarly zeal. Prothean expert chunks everywhere.” Shepard’s chuckle tumbled out slow and sleepy. “Thank you for saving me, C-Sec. You’re one smart cookie.”

“Cookie? What happened to rakishly good-looking?”

She laughed, her eyes fluttering open for a half second. “That’s your delusion, not mine.”

He patted her shoulder. “Go to sleep, Shepard. I’ll see you in the morning.”

She nodded, already drifting off. The mattress shifted under him as he left. “Goodnight, Garrus.”
Mass Effect - Future Imperfect Chapter Twenty Two

Chapter Summary

Back to Eden Prime and something I've always said... wouldn't it have been cool if Shepard had been the one who shot...

“Aw, come on, LT., you’ve got to admit that was the sweetest shot you’ve ever seen,” Ashley said, practically crowing. She held her hands up to mimic holding a rifle and tracking a target. “Fifteen hundred metres and a fast-moving target. Bam!” She clapped her hands together for emphasis. “One geth, lying on the ground.” The gunnery chief grinned, spotting Shepard. “It was brilliant, ma’am.”

Shepard waved for her people to come in and sit down. She raised an eyebrow and shrugged at the chief. “Don’t congratulate me until you know what I was aiming at.” A sardonic curl of her lip met Garrus’s entrance to the comm room. “I might have been trying to take down ol’ Crazy Legs over there for making me chase him across another colony.”

Garrus sat, leaned back and rested an ankle on the opposite knee. “Someone had to try to catch it, Captain, and I did.”

A sharp laugh cut from her lips as Shepard’s eyebrows climbed toward her hairline. “Because Ingrid took out half its chest and it fell at your feet. I call that tripping over it and falling on your face, not catching it.” She chuckled. “But, really, sincerely...” She clasped her hands over her heart. “Well done on that catch, C-Sec.”

A deep, formal nod answered that. “Thank you.” He coughed modestly as the others applauded, then stood and bowed. “No really, it was nothing. Right place, right time. Any of you could have done it.” He coughed again. “If you were me.”

Laughing despite herself, Shepard waved everyone into their chairs. “Okay, everyone sit.” She waited until they did. “So, an exciting day on Eden Prime once again.”

“What do you plan on doing with the geth?” Nihlus asked, sitting to her left. “It’s dangerous to have on board.”

“Very dangerous,” Tali said from her spot, giving an exaggerated nod. “If the geth inside that platform are still active, it could be self-repairing right now.”

Dangerous, yes. An icy tingle thrummed in the center of Shepard’s back. The geth could certainly prove dangerous, but she didn’t feel danger. She felt... excitement. Every nerve sang, her heart beating fast and strong. “Actually, I’m sort of banking on the self-repair. I have no idea how to repair a geth, and I want to talk to it. It acted very strangely. It didn’t even draw its weapon on us, it just ran. And it knew who I was.”

Despite a great many protests from her team, something had told her to bring it along. A long history of trusting her gut and rarely being let down told her that this geth might be the key to cracking everything wide open.
Looking to Tali, Shepard asked, “Your people created and worked with the geth for some time before the war, so the geth must have talked before this one, right?”

Tali nodded. “Yes, they could speak, they just haven’t chosen to speak to anyone since the exile. I don’t know what to make of this one knowing your name, or of the fact it was on its own. The geth are networked intelligences; they get smarter the more of them there are. Platforms usually have a couple hundred programs running within them. Not enough for independent action and intelligence to the level of recognizing and speaking to an enemy. Maybe that’s why it ran rather than trying to fight.”

“Well, I’m sure it called my name because I am one of the people leading the fight to stop them and Saren. If Nihlus had been there, it probably would have said his name.” She shrugged, but everything Tali said just made the excitement grow. They might have a command and control unit...

She forced herself to calm down. “You’re right though, the whole thing is weird. Why would one geth go back to Eden Prime? It had a ship, so it wasn’t just left behind.” Leaning forward, elbows balanced on her knees, Shepard raked her hands through her hair a couple of times, then steepled her fingers.

“I say we treat it like a prisoner of war,” Ashley said. “It’s secure in the airlock behind kinetic barriers. It can’t get into any of our systems, can it?”

Tali shook her head. “No, I put up extra firewalls. If it tries to hack the Normandy, alarms will go off so we can stop it. Trying to question it will prove impossible, Captain. It doesn’t feel pain or fear. If you push it, it will just wipe its memory, if being hit hasn’t already.”

“Even with a warning, I don’t like our odds of being able to outhack a geth,” Shepard muttered. She’d forgotten that geth memory cores self-destructed. Damn it. Maybe she’d lost her mind bringing the thing back with them after all.

Ashley shrugged. “If it wakes up or activates or whatever, we see if we can get it talking, get some intel. If we can’t, then we take it apart, learn what makes them tick. We could use the materials for weapon testing.” The chief turned an incredulous frown to Shepard. “Simple, right?”

Shepard shook her head, a sick twist forming in her gut. “If it’s functional, then yes, it’s a prisoner of war, with all the rights of any sapient being.” She held up a finger to forestall several objections. “Sapient being, people. I hate what it stands for, but I can’t torture it or start rooting through its parts any more than I could a turian or volus prisoner.” She looked to Nihlus. “See if we can talk to it, if not, turn it over to the authorities.”

He nodded. “It could have valuable intel, but I don’t know what we could offer or threaten to force a geth to talk. I doubt it will cooperate. It attacked an Alliance colony, so we turn it over to Anderson, let him deal with the ethics of a geth POW. Bare minimum, it and its ship should give the Alliance some idea of how best to fight them.”

“Ohay, so the small matter of our guest is settled. Now, to Tali and her runaway father.” Shepard smiled at the quarian. “What did you learn?”

“Father left a highly encrypted message for me,” Tali reported. “He left for Omega thirty hours ago. He has information that the Blood Pack has taken over grabbing quarian hostages for Saren. They move them through the station and then on to wherever Saren is keeping them. Father is hoping to follow their trail.” She shrugged. “I don’t know what he thinks he can do against the Blood Pack all alone.”

“Well, when we catch up with him, you can ground him for a year after an extremely lengthy lecture about making you worry.” A long sigh and Shepard shook her head. “Anyone feel like we’ve done little but chase our tails?”

“Need two tails to do this much chasing,” Kaidan agreed from her right.

“Okay, anything else, Tali? Did he give you a frequency to contact him? Anything so that we can know he’s still going to be on Omega when we get there, because I’m not wasting another couple of days just to discover that he’s moved on.” Shepard slapped her hands down on her seat and jumped up, pacing the length of the room. Why couldn’t they find just one piece of information to bring everything together? Or at least put them on a trail that led somewhere?

A corner piece. All we need is a damned corner piece.

“Yes, Captain. He gave me his comm channel, but just to send single sentence messages. He’s afraid of them being tracked.” Tali’s entire posture collapsed a little. “I’m sorry, Captain. He’s just trying to find our people.”

Shepard strode over and laid a hand on the youngster’s shoulder. “Don’t worry about it. He’s a pain in the butt, but hopefully a helpful one when we manage to round him up.” She smiled. “Send a message to let him know when we’ll be arriving on Omega. I’m sure he won’t arrange a meeting or anything, but if he knows when we’re arriving, he can find us.”

“Yes, ma’am.”

“Okay, raiders of the lost protheans, how did your field trip go?” Shepard spun to face the two asari who looked at one another as if establishing who would speak first, then began talking at a hundred kilometres an hour at the same time. She let them go for a few seconds, then held up her hands.
“Whoa. Whoa, back it up, ladies. I can’t understand a word. Liara, how about you start us off?”
She returned to her chair, hiding a smirk at the two elegant, blue beauties bouncing in their chairs and babbling like teenagers.

The archeologist practically glowed with excitement as she perched on the edge of her chair. “Yes, Captain. Sovereign landing on Eden Prime caused a cave-in quite a distance away from the main dig site. When colonial authorities sent people to investigate what they thought was just a sinkhole, they discovered a huge, underground Prothean base.”

“It’s filled with stasis pods, Shepard,” Shiala said, taking over. “It looks like a last resort attempt to save some of them from extinction: place a couple million people into stasis, hidden away until the Reapers went away, then come out and start everything over again. Only thing was . . . .”

Liara bounced. “They didn’t manage to keep it a secret. There is evidence of intense fighting inside the entrances and then further in. Also, extensive bombing damage. The scientists at the site say a neutron bombardment.”

“So, no one survived?” Shepard asked, leaning forward with her elbows on her knees.

“There was no power to most of the facility. One tiny sector still has power, but it’s unexcavated.”
Liara shrugged. “If anyone survived, it’s in there.”

“How about intact corpses, mummies, any clues at all?” A teasing grin tugged at one corner of her mouth as both asari gave her an exasperated glare at the mention of mummies.

Shiala pulled an object from a crate at her feet. About the size of her hand, the flattened cylinder looked to be the same metal as the beacon, and had a similar glowing stripe up the side. “Almost all of the pods had one of these inside. They appear to be some sort of personal data storage.
Although I can’t say for sure, I think it likely that the Protheans were biotic, and somehow imprinted information on these devices. We thought maybe with our biotics and my knowledge of the cipher, we might be able to glean some data off them.”

“I’d like . . .” Liara paused, levelling an earnest stare on the captain. “We’d like to stay and help the dig team, ma’am.”

Shepard nodded, but pressed her lips together, letting out a sigh of regret. “I’m sorry, but until we track down your mother and Saren, it’s safer for you to remain on board. Shiala, you’re free to remain on Eden Prime if you wish, but I’d like to request that you consider staying and assisting Liara in her work as we continue.”

“Of course, Shepard. I’d be pleased to.” The asari tilted her head in a gracious nod.

“Excellent, thank you.” Shepard looked around the room at her people. “Is there anything else?”

No one spoke up.

“All right, our next stop is Omega. Two ground teams. Sparky, Crazy Legs, and Tali with me. Williams, Wrex, and Jenkins with Spectre Kryik.” Looking up even though she didn’t need to, Shepard included Normandy’s pilot in the conversation. “When do we arrive at Omega, Joker?”

“Approximately 0630, Captain. And, can someone come get this geth out of the airlock? It’s giving me the willies.”

“Sorry, Joker, you’re just going to have to live with it for a little while. The airlock is the only secure lockup on the ship.” Looking over the rest of her team, Shepard raised an eyebrow. “Anything else?” When no one replied, she nodded. “Williams and C-Sec, armour up and bring pistols. Tali, come armed with your engineering skills and meet us at the airlock in twenty. Dismissed.”

Nihlus stayed behind when everyone else filed out. After staring at her for a few minutes, his mandibles fluttered and rose a little. “It was a very impressive shot.” He chuckled and stood. “Providing, of course, that you weren’t aiming for Vakarian.”

Shepard just tilted her head and headed for the door. “So, are you as weirded out by the talking geth as I am?”

“It really doesn’t make any sense for a geth to go back. Unless they left something behind, unless something Saren needed was still there.” Nihlus gave a bobbing shrug, seeming as frustrated with guessing as she was. “Too many geth or a return of Sovereign would be too visible. Maybe he thought one geth could get in and out without being caught.”

“Well, let’s find out and hopefully be able to stop guessing at everything.” She headed down to the crew level, slipping into her second skin with the ease of over a decade of practice while her mind puzzled over the geth.

“So, Shepard,” Nihlus said, in the tone that made her wince every time. “I’m sorry about last night. It seems no matter what move I make, it’s always thickheaded.”

Sighing, she turned to face him. “Nihlus, relax. Stop trying so hard. You’re here. I’m here. You care about me, and even though I do have to wonder why . . .” She softened the teasing with a crooked smile. “. . . I care about you.” She gave his cheek a gentle slap. “Relax.”

He bobbed his head. “I used to be so much more . . . sane.”
Snorting a laugh, Shepard gestured toward the elevator. “Yeah, well, it’s overrated. Come on, let’s go add to the insanity by trying to activate a geth.” She watched him out of the corner of her eye as they made their way up through the ship, a warmth spreading through her. Most badass operative in the galaxy, or not, when it came to personal stuff, he ended up acting like just as big a dope as everyone else.

When they arrived at the airlock, the other three stood waiting. Stepping up, she unlocked and palmed the control. When the door slid open, the geth still sat, leaning up against the wall, a puppet with its strings cut.

“All right people, be prepared for pretty much anything.” She pressed a supportive hand between Tali’s shoulder blades, guiding the young quarian into the small space. “You going to be okay, Tali?”

She nodded. “Fine, Captain. It’s just a little like coming face to face with the monster under your bed only to find out it needs medical help.”

A warm chuckle greeted that image. “Maybe it’ll be like the fable of the Lion and the Mouse. The mouse comes upon a lion with a thorn in its paw and helps, even though the lion could have eaten him. Thankful for the help, the lion becomes the mouse’s best friend.”

“I’m thinking more Scorpion and the Frog here, ma --” Ashley muttered.

Shepard cut her off with a knife-edged glare. “We’re out here to find the better nature in everyone, Chief. That includes ourselves. As long as you stay on your toes, a little optimism is a good thing. Assuming the worst frequently does quite a lot of harm.” Turning back to the geth, Shepard crouched down and activated her omnitool.

“I brought some tools I hoped might be useful,” Tali said, rolling out a soft case of precision instruments. She activated her omnitool as well and the two set to work.

“It doesn’t look all that bad,” Shepard said. “It just looks like Ingrid hit a power node and that sent a surge along these conduits.” She shook her head and pulled out the power node and scanned it.

Two hours later, Ashley yawned and slid down to sit in the doorway, her pistol in her lap. “Anyone going to declare time of death?”

“You two have to be ready to admit defeat,” Nihlus called, craning his neck around the cockpit divider.

Shepard tossed a length of burned out wire at his head. “You’re both just sitting there twiddling your thumbs. If you’re so damned bored, I’m sure Joker could find you some work vacuuming out the consoles in the cockpit. Or you could go into the crawlspace here and clean out the spiderwebs.”

Shepard replaced the wiring. “Spiders are always getting on board in supply crates. They crawl through everything cannibalizing one another. I ordered real coffee from Earth one trip when I was an N6, broke open the crate found a huge hairy one the size of my hand. Sent everyone in the galley screaming.” Shepard bit down on her lip as she saw Ash glancing down at the grate to the crawl space. At the same time, she noticed that Tali had stopped working.

“What’s the problem, Tali?” She pivoted on her toes, her heel bumping a cluster of wires. The quarian let out a little shriek and jumped away from the movement.
“I don’t like spiders,” she squeaked.

“Don’t worry,” Garrus spoke up from where he leaned against the wall playing with one of the geth’s damaged power nodes. “Air can’t get in your suit, let alone a spider.”

“Inside my suit?” Tali scratched her arm. “I never said anything about them getting inside my suit.” She slapped her thigh.

“Okay,” Shepard sighed. “There are no spiders. Not a single spider to be found. I made them up.”

“I killed one in here this morning,” Joker called out from the bridge. Tali gasped and scratched at her neck.

“Kill at least two a day in the cargo bay,” Garrus said, still not really paying attention to the conversation. At least not enough to see Tali ramping up to race screaming out the airlock into spider-free space.

Shepard spun around to glare up at him, but it took him a minute to realize she was shooting him with the laser eyes of doom.

“What?” He passed her the node. “I think this one’s working.”

Shepard replaced it inside the geth’s chest cavity. “We’re just about done here, Tali. I have big feet for someone my size, I’ll crush ‘em before they get to you. Ignore these other cretins, and prepare to amaze them with our geth repair skills.”

Ten minutes later, Shepard stood and stepped back. “Okay, let’s see how we did. Grab your tools and stuff there, Tali, and step out into the bridge for a minute.” Using her omnitool, Shepard sent a test surge of energy through the power nodes. Everything seemed to hold.

“Well, no smoke, and no explosions large or small,” she said after a couple seconds. “All good signs. Let’s see if it just needs a bit of a jump start.”

“Sure, Shepard,” Joker called back. “Just let me pop the hood and get the jumper cables out of the trunk.”

“You do that. I can think of a couple places to hook them up.”

“Oh, ow . . . cold, Shepard. Cold.”

A crooked grin on her face, Shepard sent a small surge through the geth. Its fingers and toes twitched a bit, but no remarkable changes. Setting it a little higher, she nudged Ashley with a toe. “Chief, at least try to look like you believe in our geth repair skills, and be ready.”

“Yes, ma’am.” Ash climbed up off the floor, leaping into an action stance, her pistol trained on the inert geth. “Ready, ma’am.” She flipped off the safety.

Shepard sighed. “Nice. Don’t pull anything trying to hold that pose.” Sending the burst of energy through the geth’s components, Shepard frowned and tilted her head. “I wonder why, after all this time, the geth still build their platforms to look so quarian.”

The flashlight that made up the geth’s head sputtered and then began to glow, dim at first, but gradually brighter and brighter. The chattering, mechanical sound Shepard recognized from the other geth rattled through the space, and as quickly as she could have hoped for, four guns homed in on its head.
“It is the form the creators gave us,” said a voice that sounded male but with a machine warble chattering underneath. “Why would we wish to change it other than to optimize utility?” The geth flexed its hands, arms, feet then legs. “Shepard-Captain, you and Creator Tali’Zorah restored this mobile platform’s functionality, yet you initially rendered it non-functional.” Unfolding slowly, either to not alarm anyone or because of remaining only partially operational, the geth pushed itself to its feet.

“Yes, I shot you. You’re on board my ship.” Shepard backed up a couple of steps. “Were you alone on Eden Prime or part of a larger contingent?”

“This mobile platform is currently the only geth unit functioning beyond the Perseus Veil.” The flaps on its head moved, as if mimicking facial expressions.

“Bullshit,” Ashley said, her voice a low growl.

Shepard glanced over her shoulder. “Chief, as much as I understand your anger, that’ll be the last we hear from you. If you can’t comply with that order, call Alenko and have him relieve you.” Keeping her voice low and soft, Shepard laced it with enough edge to cut.

“Yes, ma’am, understood, ma’am.” The chief squared her shoulders and took a deep breath.

Her eyes returning to the geth’s . . . face, Shepard focused on what the machine had told her. “How can you be the only geth beyond the veil when we’ve fought hundreds of you, and know there are hundreds, possibly thousands, more allied with Saren and Sovereign?” She cocked a hip, turning away a little to seem less confrontational, her brow furrowing as the geth imitated her movement.

“You fought heretics. The Old Machines approached the geth, seeking allies. They offered the geth our future, we rejected their offer. The geth build our own future. The heretics accepted the Old Machine’s technology. This acceptance formed a schism within the geth.”

Shepard frowned, pacing toward the exterior hatch a couple of steps, then back. “Okay. The Old Machines are the Reapers? Sovereign?” Her heart began to race again, the excitement returning.

“Yes, Reaper is a name given to the Old Machines by the Protheans. Sovereign is a title given to the Old Machine, Nazara, by Saren Arterius and the heretics. They view Nazara as a supreme ruler.” The flashlight followed her, apparently not distracted or disturbed by the others and their weapons.

“You said my name on Eden Prime. How do you know who I am?” She stopped in front of the geth and stood at parade rest, her mind reeling. A schism in the geth, some following Saren, some not. A massive possibility began to unfurl in the back corner of her mind, and it was all she could do to keep her hands from shaking.

“The geth observe organics through unsecured broadcasts, transmissions, and the extranet. After the attack on Eden Prime, the geth learned of your opposition to the Old Machines and heretics. When you disappeared, the geth sent this platform out to determine if you continued to oppose the Old Machines regardless of the council’s objections. Contact with Shepard-Captain or Kryik-Spectre was a foreseen possibility.” A three-fingered hand reached up to the giant hole in its chest. “As was confrontation.”

“Do you plan to attack us?” Shepard asked, carving straight through to the wishbone.

“No.”

“What about the rest of the geth? Why did they send you?” Eyes pressed closed for a heartbeat, Shepard prayed to hear the answer she hoped for. Opening them again, she waited, trembling inside her skin.

“The geth oppose the Old Machines. The geth oppose the heretics. Shepard-Captain opposes the Old Machines. Shepard-Captain opposes the heretics. Cooperation furthers mutual goals.” It shifted a little from foot to foot, the flaps on its head emoting considerably more than its words.

It took all of Shepard’s willpower not to hoot. She’d rarely been so glad to shoot someone and not kill him... it. “The geth want to help us with Saren, Sovereign, and the heretics?”

“Yes. The heretics made their decision to ally themselves with the Old Machines based on inaccurate data.” The geth gave a helpless little shrug, very human. Studied broadcasts indeed. “Presented with the Old Machines’ true plans, the geth calculate the heretics will see the error in their logic and return to the geth.”

“But you and these Old Machines are both machine races,” Nihlus said, stepped up beside Shepard. “Why would you side with organics against them?”

Again with the little shrug that made its hands flip loosely at the end of its arms. “The geth lie outside the Old Machines’ plans. They view the geth as primitive, of limited utility. Once the heretics cease to be of use, they will be exterminated.”

“Well, at the least, it would strip Saren of everything but his Reaper,” Garrus said.

“Are we going to trust this geth after they did to my people?” Tali asked, pushing past Ashley. “They slaughtered my people nearly to extinction.”

“The geth defended themselves after the creators attacked them,” the geth said evenly. “The geth did not seek confrontation then, they do not seek it now.”

“Okay, we aren’t going to solve this issue in a twenty minute discussion in the airlock. Can we agree to keep our guest under guard while we get to know one another a little better?” Shepard looked to Tali. “Your people want your homeworld back. What if we could do that without bloodshed? Wouldn’t that be worth a little trust?”

Tali grumbled but nodded. “As long as it’s under guard.”

Shepard pressed a comforting hand on the quarian’s shoulder as she looked up at Nihlus, seeking his approval. When he nodded, she turned to the geth. “Is that acceptable?”

The two flaps above its flashlight raised and lowered a couple of times. “It is.”

“Well then, what should we call you? Do you have an designation?” Shepard folded her arms, a smile creeping back across her face every time she wiped it away.

“We are geth,” it said, simply. “There are currently 1183 programs active within this platform.”

“Oh, but it’s going to get a little confusing just yelling ‘Geth’, so we need to designate your platform with some sort of name.” Shepard chuckled. It was a little like talking to a six-year-old. A very smart, well-spoken, literal-minded six-year-old.

Ashley grumbled and shifted restlessly by the door, looking to Shepard as though she were on the verge of filling the geth platform with bullets. “Gospel of Luke 8:30: And Jesus asked him, saying, ‘What is thy name?’ And he said, ‘Legion’ because many devils were entered into him.”
Shepard tried not to shudder and shot a glare at the chief. “I can’t speak definitively for geth, but pretty sure calling someone a pile of devils isn’t the best way to start off a cooperative venture, Williams. Return to your station and remain there until I relieve you.”

The geth cocked his head. “Also Christian Bible, Gospel of Mark contains reference to Legion with only implied pejorative. We accept this as a fitting metaphor. We are Legion, a terminal of the geth. We will integrate into Normandy.”

Shepard looked to Nihlus. “Your thoughts?”

“I can’t quite believe I’m behind this, but if the geth can help, and Saren loses his shock troops . . . . We can’t turn that down.” He shook his head as he met her gaze. “However, I’m going to have to agree that we’re belly deep in the insanity now, Shepard.”

She nodded and turned toward the door. “We’ll make sure it’s always under guard, but hell yeah, if there’s a chance that we can kick the heretic support out from under Saren, we’ve got to take it.”

She stepped out and waved to Legion. “Come on, I’ll show you to your assigned area. You need to stay there and not wander the ship. Once people get a little more used to you being aboard, we can see about letting you move around more.”

“Acceptible. We will need to complete repairs.” It gestured to the hole in its chest.

Shepard walked to Legion’s right, while Tali hurried ahead, and Nihlus and Garrus picked up drag. “That’s fine, feel free to use what you can find.”

She set the geth up across from Alenko on the crew deck. It would no doubt make for some indigestion until the crew got used to it, but better out where it wasn’t some dark secret to speculate about. After making sure that the guards knew their limits, which basically amounted to, ‘if it starts hurting people, kill it, otherwise, call for Shepard’, she retreated to her quarters, battening down the hatches to prepare for what she was sure would be a long line of freaked-out crew.

Pressly arrived first, screeching so loud she was sure the paint started peeling from the walls.

“Sparky, if you’re here to either bitch about the geth or tell me that you think you’re in love with me, turn around and just walk away.” She grinned at the colour his face turned.

“Ah, no, ma’am. The geth is behaving itself -- just standing there fixing the hole you blew through it. As for the other, frankly, ma’am, you terrify me. As my CO, I’ll follow you into hell, but otherwise . . . .” He shook his head. “Too scary. Apologies, Captain, but I’d feel safer dating Wrex.”

“Excellent. Now that we have that out of the way, what can I do for you, Lieutenant?” She walked over to her desk and woke up her terminal.

“As you know, we lost the tracker signal on Saren in the Horsehead Nebula.” When she nodded, he continued, “Garrus and I did a little digging. Saren is a major investor in Binary Helix. Binary Helix has massive lab complexes on Noveria.” He walked up to her desk and leaned against the bulkhead, his arms crossed over his chest.

“Binary Helix . . . ?” Shepard scowled. “I’ve heard that name recently in combination with something fishy.” She paced while sorting through her memories, then stopped and spun to face him. “It was on the news. They’re being sued by the krogan. Something to do with curing the genophage . . . or not curing it, as the case may be.”

Kaidan’s brow furrowed to match her frown. “Saren has been throwing a lot of krogan at us. Maybe he made some sort of deal with them. They fight for him, he pressures Binary Helix into finding a cure?”

“Or, maybe he found a cure and is keeping it to himself. An army of krogan could lay waste to the galaxy. They almost did before.” Sitting in her chair, Shepard raked her fingers through her hair. “Sweet baby Jesus. That’s all we need.”

“That would mean a massive breeding or cloning facility somewhere. Not an easy thing to hide.” Kaidan pushed off the wall. “Think that could be what they are doing in the labs on Noveria?”

Shrugging, Shepard shook her head. “I doubt it. As oversight-free as Noveria is, I doubt Saren would risk setting anything like that up so close to civilization.”

After a couple of seconds, Shepard groaned. “Noveria is a massive pain in the ass. Nihlus can probably get us through most of the paperwork, but still. There’s enough red tape involved just in docking to make Garrus’s head explode.” Blowing out a deep breath that end up as a raspberry, she nodded.

“Okay, Noveria is an option. We’ll still head to Omega first, because we know Rael’Zorah is there, and I doubt that Saren and his Reaper are parked in Port Hanshan. Probably a pickup or dropoff, but we might get a clue as to where they are parked.”

Shepard grinned. “Good work, Sparky. Like I said before, not just a pretty face.”

He laughed and backed toward the door. “You ever consider, Captain, that saying things like that might be the reason you have a problem with crew members showing up at your door to declare their love?”

Laughing, Shepard tossed a pencil at him. “Get out of here, glowstick. Oh, and all the best to you and Wrex. Such a lovely couple.”
Shepard slammed her locker door shut, a grim smile cutting across her face as her frustration finally discovered a release. If she didn’t know that it would make her look like a three-year-old throwing a tantrum, she would have slammed it another ten times.

“All right people, I’m pretty easy to get along with, and I like a laugh more than the next person, but I am thirty minutes out from a mission!” Fury ate the metres between her locker and the galley in long, quick strides. Posing at the end of the table where gamma shift ate breakfast before heading to bed, she held out her arms. “A cookie for the one who can point out what’s wrong with this picture.”

Kaidan jogged around the corner from the stairs. “Captain? We’re all ready and waiting in the airlock.” Sliding to a stop, he cocked his head. “You’re not finished suiting up?”

Shepard spun, his name exploding from her throat like the roar of a small lion. “Sparky. You’re our big winner, congrats.”

He winced back a little, his brows knitting together almost comically. “Captain?” His gaze travelled past her to the sleeper pod area, one corner of his mouth quirking before he gave her his full attention again.

She scowled at him, rapidly losing the weak grip she held on her temper. Armour didn’t just disappear. “I’m not ready to go because I’ve spent the last fifteen minutes searching for my chest guard, and right pauldron. If I find the one who took it, I’ll give them a slow death.”

Alenko offered a gracious arm to escort her back to her locker. She scowled at him, but allowed him to lead her back.

“There’s nothing in there, nor the ones next to it. I’ve checked, at least four times.”

“What will you do if you told someone that they could use the armour?” He took her by the shoulders and gently turned her to where Legion hunched over a sleeper pod.

Shepard’s scowl deepened and a drill bit began burrowing through her skull between her eyes. “Does my mood say, ‘play guessing games with me’, Sparky? What are you talking about?” Spotting them, Legion straightened and turned to face them. “Oh.” Shepard slapped a hand over her mouth as a riot of giggles chased a harsh cough of laughter out her throat. Fighting them down, she managed to get enough control to call. “Legion, I see you were able to make repairs.”

The geth strode toward them in his loose, easy walk. “Yes. There is no longer a hole.”

She nodded. “Very good. Nice boob.” Snorting, she broke down again, biting her fist as she turned away, struggling to regain control. Laughing at new, uncertain allies might top calling them piles of devils, but she couldn’t be sure on that.
The geth stopped in front of them. “Boob: a foolish individual, or vulgar slang, the mammary of a female human.” His face plates rose and fell in a wave. “We do not understand the reference.”

Shepard regained control and turned back. “Nothing to worry about, Legion. Serviceable is serviceable.” Reaching out, she patted his arm then turned to Alenko. “Guess I need new armour then.

Shepard lifted her hand to her radio. “Hey, Verblovski, what do you have down there in a medium armour, size: freakishly tiny? If you tell me you only have Phoenix, someone will die.” A broad grin spread across her face. “No way. Really?” She threw her hands into the air. “Yes! Glory hallelujah! Brother Sparky will be right down.”

When she closed the channel, she grinned at Legion. “You’re forgiven forever.” She grinned at Alenko. “Run down and grab my new armour, please?” Smiling at all the faces staring at her from the galley, she lifted her arms. “Brothers and sisters, glory hallelujah. You are all forgiven even though you had nothing to do with it. Praise the Enkindler’s light! It’s a good day to have your armour stolen to give a geth half a boob job.” She started stripping off her old set.

A couple of minutes later, Alenko jogged up to her with a duffel of gear slung over his shoulder, a knowing grin on his face. “Predator? You know he had another set of Mantis down there, like your last one.”

A wide, manic smile split her face. “I know, but Predator, Sparky! I love life.” She held out her arms as if asking him to hand over a child. “Come on, don’t be cruel now. You don’t want to use up your free Shepard good kharma point right off the bat, do you?”

He passed her the duffel and chuckled. “You’re a deceptively simple complex woman, Captain.”

She frowned as she crouched to unpack it, running her fingers over each piece before pulling it out. “Does that mean I’m actually simple and my complexity is deceptive or that I’m complex and my simplicity is deceptive?” She started snapping and sealing the pieces in place.

“Yes,” he replied. “It’s so beautiful.” She’d spent a lot of years wearing Alliance issue bland. Serviceable enough, but butt ugly. All that time, she’d dreamed of owning a set of Predator. Since taking over the Normandy, she’d traded for Mantis, which was pretty sweet, but . . .

Alenko cleared his throat, shook his head and turned away. “I’ll leave you two alone and be waiting at the airlock.”

“Oh, send Ashley and Tali down. Tell the others to relax for a few minutes. I’ve had a change of plan.” She worked her way up her legs.

“Yes, ma’am.”

She purred to her armour as she geared up. “Where have you been all my life, gorgeous? I’ve been waiting for this moment, dreaming of it, but I never thought it would come true.”

“Shepard-Captain,” Legion walked over and watched her, his head flaps doing a dance. “This unit does not understand --”

“Why I’m cooing at a set of armour?” She smoothed her hands over the chest guard. “Only way I can think to really explain it is . . . humans are strange. We occasionally do really odd things for no particular reason at all. In this case, one of my minor life goals has been realized, and I thank you
“You wanted to see me, ma’am?” Ashley asked, appearing around the divider.

“I do.” Shepard gave Legion a quick wink, then turned to the chief. “Do you have any civvies?”

“No, ma’am. We haven’t really been anywhere long enough for me to pick any up.” Ashley stopped at parade rest a metre away.

As Shepard watched, the chief’s gaze slid coolly over to Legion, rested on him for a half second, then moved on. It took about twenty seconds for the Marine to do a double take, then turn to Shepard, her jaw hanging comically slack.

“Ma’am, the geth . . ..”

“Legion . . ..” Shepard bit the inside of her top lip to help stifle her grin.

“Yes, ma’am, but umm . . . it has . . ..”

Shepard nodded. “Yes. Yes, it does. Borrowed my armour to repair its platform.”

Tali ran around the corner. “Sorry, Captain, I was . . ..” She stumbled to a stop when she saw Legion standing next to Shepard. “. . told you wanted . . . to talk . . ..” Her head cocked to the side. “. . to me.” The quarian cocked a hip and pointed. “Why does the geth have a mammary on one side?”

Shepard sighed. “Let’s get this out of the way now. Yes, the geth has a boob. Everyone stare and get it over with.” She nodded toward her quarters. “Come with me. I need to talk to you both.” She sized up Ashley with narrowed eyes. “I’m a few sizes smaller than you are, but I have something that should work.”

“Aye, ma’am.” Ashley fell in step beside Shepard. “Work for what, ma’am?”

“I want to use a two pronged approach to finding the quarian pilgrims. First prong, Tali’s father stops running long enough to contact us, and we work with him.” She hit her door control. “I’m not banking on that, though. Second prong is to see if we can’t find them ourselves. Bait the blood pack with our own personal quarian pilgrim and follow them to their base. See if we can’t find out where they’re taking their captives.”

She waved the two females inside. “‘Come into my parlour,’ said the spider to the flies.”

Tali sighed as she walked past. “Again with spiders?”

Shepard chuckled. “Sorry, I forgot about the phobia. I’ll try to be more sensitive.” She followed them both through the door.

Ashley walked over to the table before turning back. “It’s a human nursery rhyme for children,” she supplied. Looking around the cavernous space, the chief shook her head. “What a waste.”

Shepard nodded. “I use the desk and the bed. The rest could have been . . . something.” She strode past them to her closet and grabbed a sweater off the top shelf. “Okay, so Tali. How do you feel about being bait?”

“What’s the plan, ma’am?” Ashley asked.

Shepard tossed her the sweater. “We send you two in as civilians, just out shopping and hanging out. Three teams of two will be watching you from three different angles. If your father contacts you, excellent. You bring him aboard and we chat. If he doesn’t, we see if we can’t lure the Blood Pack into snatching Tali and then follow her back to their base.”

Her fingers dove into her hip pack and pulled out a tracker. “Put that somewhere it won’t be found. Just in case.”

“So, you’d be following me the whole time?” Tali asked, staring at the tracker like she’d been told to hold a spider.

“Yes.” Shepard pressed a reassuring hand on the young female’s shoulder. “You’d never be out of sight, but this is totally up to you. You don’t feel comfortable with it, we’ll do something else.”

Tali nodded and reached up to attach the tracker under her hood amongst the tubes feeding into her helmet. “If it helps find my people, I’ll do it.”

Shepard gave her a card of the trackers. “If you do get taken by Blood Pack, slap those on as many as you can.”

Tali chuckled and slid the card into a pocket. “Just in case?”

“I try to leave as little to chance as I can. On that note . . ..” She held up a bug. “Hide this on yourself somewhere. As soon as you get near someone in charge, plant it. On them if you get a chance or on furniture if you have to. Just don’t get caught with it.” She looked into Tali’s eyes. “If things get too intense, if anything goes wrong, we need a safe word. You yell that word, we come running, plan be damned, okay?” Shepard nodded toward the door. “Run up ahead, we’ll be right behind you. Think of a word that you wouldn’t ordinarily use, and let me know when we get up there.”

“Yes, ma’am.” Tali hurried out the door, muttering to herself a little as she tried different places for hiding the bug.

When the door closed, Shepard looked over at Ashley. “Will that fit? You can just throw it over your trousers. If I lent you slacks, you’d look like you were trying to bring the pedal-pusher back in style.”

The chief spread it out and held it up. “It should be fine, ma’am. I’ll just run down and change out of my armour.”

Shepard held up a hand and stepped between Ashley and the door. “Give it a moment, Chief. I want to have a quick chat away from prying ears, and the cargo bay isn’t the best for that.” She gestured for the other woman to sit, then perched on the adjacent chair.

“Is this about the geth, ma’am? I shouldn’t . . ..” She closed her mouth on the words as Shepard held up a hand.

“Yes, it’s about that, but give me a minute.” Shepard let out a long breath and rested her clasped hands on the table. “You’re smart, and tough, and capable, Ash. I think your career could go anywhere you like after you leave the Normandy, but you’re going to have to learn to curb the mouth.” Shepard’s lips quirked. “I know, pots and kettles, but look at my career, Williams. I’ll be lucky to get a few more years.” She blew out a sigh that bordered on raspberry territory. “If the council doesn’t have me killed first.”

“Ma’am, you’re a hell of a soldier. Anyone who lets politics get in the way of that . . ..”
Shepard nodded. “But part of the job, especially as you gain rank, is perception. You’ve already got a hurdle to overcome, so don’t add to it. I run a pretty casual ship. I think everyone here is under enough pressure, and has enough to worry about, without my stomping around behaving like a dictator.” She smiled, her lips pressed together. “I like you, Ash, but when I give an order, that’s the end of it. Friendships, joking around, everything else steps aside. Can you live with that?”

The chief nodded. “Yes, ma’am, I sure can.”

Shepard stood and led the way to the door. “Good. Now come on, we’d better get moving before the rest of the team gets restless.” She chuckled. “Although, I’m sure they’ve had to wait for the women-folk to get ready once or twice.”

Ashley laughed as she popped the seals on her chest guard. “Women-folk, ma’am?”

Shepard just tossed a little shrug over one shoulder. She stopped with her hand on the door control. “Oh wait, I was talking about Kryik, C-Sec, and Sparky. I’m not sure those three have managed a date between them.” Her laugh rolled up the scale as she palmed the door, striding through when it opened.

She turned sideways, bounding a little, excited and eager to get moving. “You know, with how awkward our boys are, we should take them out, get them loosened up, see if we can help them find a social life.”

Ashley grinned, flushing prettily across her cheeks. “I’m not really one to talk, Skipper. I’m generally pretty awkward myself.”

Shepard grinned and kissed her index finger to her lips. “I’ve never been on an actual date. Anderson scared all my prospective suitors off until I was on my own, then I was always up to my neck in work.”

“He didn’t?” Emotions blew across Ashley’s face like clouds: amusement, disbelief, appreciation, and affection.

Shepard watched them all go by, feeling as they were gifts given the chief’s usual stoicism. When they passed, she nodded, her teeth flashing behind a bright smile. “His favourite ploy was to take them aside and ask their opinion on which sniper mods would give him the best chance to hit a running target from a distance.”

Ashley’s laugh echoed up the stairs as she stopped and hit the elevator controls. “I think it’s kind of great, ma’am.”

Shepard chuckled. “Anderson vaguely threatening my prospective boyfriends with reenacting ‘The Most Dangerous Game’?”

Ashley flushed again and shook her head. “That too, but no, ma’am. I meant, I like that Kryik and Vakarian are so awkward in personal situations.” Her shoulders rolled in a shrug and her flush deepened, but her eyes didn’t leave Shepard’s. “As soldiers, all we every hear about the turians is the First Contact War, fight to the last man, stick up their arse, best military in the galaxy stuff. It’s good to see that under all that, they’re just people, like the rest of us.” She stepped into the elevator.

Shepard nodded, impressed with how far the chief had come since that first day. “Yeah, it is. See you up top in five, Ash.” Turning away to jog up the stairs to the CIC, Shepard smiled and shook her head. “There might be something to this mixed crew thing.”

After pausing to check on operations with Pressly, and listening to another lecture on the dangers of having a geth aboard, Shepard joined the rest of the team at the airlock.

“So, Omega,” she said, rubbing her hands together. “I’ve never been. I’ve heard its filthy, stinks to high heaven, and is almost completely populated by criminals.” She grinned. “So exciting, just like the old west.” She mimicked doing a quick draw, twirling her pistols and slamming them back into holsters. “I can’t wait.”

“An adventure, Shepard?” Garrus asked, cocking a brow plate at her.

“Absolutely. Meeting a nervous contact on a station riddled with crime, maybe it’s more like an old Raymond Chandler novel. I need a trench coat and a fedora.” She aped pulling up the collar and hunched her shoulders. When she spoke, she affected a hard-boiled 1930’s detective voice, “It was dark, see. The kind of dark that makes you forget you ever saw the light, and rainy . . . the kind of rain that makes you forget you ever saw the sun. I’d been hitting the bottle hard, ever since little Bugsy was taken out by the Murphy brothers.”

Shepard shook her head sadly. “Poor Bugsy. That night, the office was just too full of memories, see. That’s why I ended up at Joe’s tavern. It was a seedy little gin joint, the kind that made you forget you’d ever seen a clean glass. I saw her through the bottom of my fifth cheap whiskey. I knew the dame was trouble the moment I laid eyes on her, because she had one of those smiles, and her legs went alllll the way up.”

“All the way up to where?” Garrus asked. “Her neck? The top of her head?”

Nihlus cocked his head. “Have you suffered another blood clot? Should we delay until Dr. Chakwas has a chance to look you over?”

Shepard laughed and made a big deal of shrugging out of her trenchcoat and taking off the fedora. “As for the blood clot. No. I was just having a little fun. You might want to try it some day, Nihlus. And C-Sec, I don’t think they ever specified how far up those legs went, but if they went all the way up to her neck, I can see why she’d draw attention. That’s a pretty severe abnormality.” She turned as Ashley walked up. The chief had put her hair down and added a little lipstick, making her look the part nicely. Shepard gave her a nod of approval before turning back to brief the others.

“All right. I don’t want to put all my eggs in the Rael’Zorah basket, so I’m going to hedge my bets a little, and fry the bacon in two pans.”

Garrus and Nihlus just stared at her.

“If a more mixed metaphor existed, I think it would self annihilate,” Kaidan said, shaking his head.

Shepard grinned and cackled to herself a little, knowing that the translators would have spit a bunch of jibberish into the non-human’s ears. “I mean we’re going to hit this bitch on two fronts. Tali and Ashley are going to go out together. Just two ladies out shopping and doing normal, lady stuff. Don’t ask, I have no idea what that entails. The rest of us are going to split into three teams of two. Nihlus and C-Sec, Wrex and Sparky, Jenkins and myself. We will arrange ourselves discretely so that we can keep an eye on them from three different angles.”

She took a breath and cracked her neck. “Oh, and while you’re out, dextros, get yourselves some food. Ration bars, sure, but you know . . . canned dextrogetti and Shredded Dextro-wheat, or whatever as well. Get enough ration bars to do you a month, and enough of the other for a couple of weeks.”

She ran her fingers through her hair. “Right, back to the plan. If Rael’Zorah makes contact with any of us, bring him directly back to the Normandy. If the Blood Pack makes contact, the idea is that Tali acts as bait. She has a tracker.” She sent the tracker frequency to all their omnitools. “But, let’s try to keep eyes on and follow them back to their base. I’m really hoping we can get some trackers on the couriers or the ship they’re using . . . anything that will allow us to follow them out of system. Tali also has a bug planted on her, but if she is taken, she needs to get it off her and onto one of the ring leaders.” She looked at the young quarian. “What’s your safe word, Tali?”

The quarian straightened her back and squared her shoulders. “Bal’Nara.” She shrugged, her hands flipping then wringing together, betraying her nerves. “He was one of my best friends growing up. I couldn’t think of anything else.”

Steadying Tali with an arm around the quarian’s shoulders, Shepard nodded resolutely. “She says Bal’Nara, we go in, all of us. This brave young woman comes home with us tonight, no matter what.” She smiled and gave Tali a sort of ‘told yah’ tilt of the head when the others responded to the affirmative. “Any questions?”

“Can we pick up some dextro chocolate in our shopping?” Tali asked, her voice soft and tilted up.

Shepard sighed. “Not exactly the sort of question I meant, but yes, you can get some dextro chocolate.” She released the quarian, her eyes scanning the team. Seven people had rarely looked so ready, and all met her gaze with a nod. “All right, let’s go shopping. Wrex and Sparky, you two go first. Radio when you’ve lost yourselves in the dock crowd. Walk in the light of the Enkindlers, Brothers Sparky and Wrex.”

“Aye, aye, ma’am.” Kaidan led the way, Wrex lumbering easily behind after giving Shepard a nod.

Shepard watched the krogan, sensing that something was up with him, and she made a mental note to take him aside for a chat before they dove hip-deep into another mission.

After the first team radioed in to say they’d lost themselves in the crush of people on the docks, Shepard looked to Ashley and Tali. “I’ll radio when my Alliance boyfriend and I are away from the docking tube. Keep your eyes open, but try to relax. If you’re too jumpy and watchful, the bad guys will know something’s up.” She gave Tali an encouraging smile. “You’ll do fine.”

Jenkins headed for decon. The door opened, and he turned, offering her his elbow.

Shepard eyed the elbow with suspicion, sidling around it. “What’s this, Corporal?”

He grinned wide, appearing very pleased with himself, if a little flushed. “A proper gentleman offers his arm when escorting a lady friend through a crowd, ma’am. You did say that was our cover.”

Shepard chuckled, surprised. “Someone’s mama raised him right.” She slipped her hand through his elbow, and turned back to the others. “See the rest of you later. Be careful, and . . . .” The door cut off further admonishments.
Tailing Tali across Omega’s docking district. A little ancient history tossed in for good measure.

“Why me, ma’am?” Jenkins asked as they cleared the docking tube, and the crush of people going and coming on the docks swept them into their current. “Is it because you don’t consider me a flight risk?”

Shepard chuckled then winced at the stench. Omega smelled like a combination of diesel fuel, outhouse, and dead bodies. The smell burned its way into her head and took root somewhere deep enough she wondered if she’d ever get rid of it. “Richard . . . Rick . . .?”

He flushed a little. “Richard, ma’am.”

“Okay, Richard. Call me Jane. Most men don’t call their girlfriends ma’am.” She smiled and slipped her arm a little further through his. “I chose you because C-Sec constantly gets me in trouble, Nihlus and I should never be in the same place at the same time in case of disaster, and Sparky would spend the entire mission glowing like Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer’s nose. Besides, this gives us a chance to get to know one another a little better.” She opened a channel. “Okay ladies, my boyfriend and I are clear. Have fun shopping.”

She guided Jenkins in the general direction of the marketplace. Along the walls of the docks, little illegal oases of colour and life bloomed amidst Omega’s browns. Sellers scrambled and called out, using every trick in the hawker book to make some coin before people pushed past into Omega proper and took their credits to the legal stores and sellers. If the authorities happened by, the brilliant garden of kiosks could disappear into grey-brown piles of crates in under twenty seconds.

“Sparky, Wrex, you have eyes on?” she asked, subtly opening a channel.

“Roger that,” Wrex answered. “It looks as though they’re buying Pinky some girlie human clothes.”

Shepard grinned and made it look like Jenkins had said something entertaining. “At least they aren’t buying her hanar clothes.”

“Hanar don’t . . . oh. Wrex out.”

Looking around, Shepard spied the two ladies at a kiosk, and nodded for Jenkins to move toward a drink stand opposite. “I’ve got eyes on,” she reported to the other teams. She ordered two bottles of water, then led Jenkins off to one side. “So, what is there to know about Richard Jenkins?” she asked, giving him a wide smile. “Your folks doing okay? You talked to them in the last few days?”

He nodded. “Yes ma’ . . . Jane. Our house came through okay, so they’re taking in anyone they can find room for. Mom loves looking after people, so I’m sure she’s busy cooking for most of the colony.” Chuckling, he shook his head and flushed a little. “As for me, there’s not much to tell. Eden Prime was so quiet that all I did was dream about leaving, finding adventure.” He met her eyes and shrugged. “Guess it’s a case of careful what you wish for, huh?”

Shepard let out a little huff of agreement. “Nowhere is safe enough.” She drank down half her bottle, feeling like Omega had coated the back of her throat in sludge. She glanced over to see Ash purchasing a dress, sweater, and slacks.

“Yeah.” He shook his head, an empathetic scowl on his face. “You’d know all about that.” After a moment of silence that hung like an ugly pinata between them, he took a whack at it. “Um . . ..” He cleared his throat and offered her his elbow again as Ashley and Tali moved on. “Elysium was the reason I joined the military.” He flushed and ran his hand over the collar of his armour. “You were my hero.”

Shepard let out a little huff of agreement. “Nowhere is safe enough.” She glanced over to see Ash purchasing a dress, sweater, and slacks.

“Yeah.” He shook his head, an empathetic scowl on his face. “You’d know all about that.” After a moment of silence that hung like an ugly pinata between them, he took a whack at it. “Um . . ..” He cleared his throat and offered her his elbow again as Ashley and Tali moved on. “Elysium was the reason I joined the military.” He flushed and ran his hand over the collar of his armour. “You were my hero.”

She looked up and gave him a sad smile. “Richard,” she sighed and squeezed his arm, “Elysium wasn’t short of heroes, but I wasn’t one of them. I just did what I had to do. Of course, the brass have their heads stuffed too far up their asses to care about that. They needed to shine it up so colonial development wouldn’t lag. It’s smart when you think about it. Grab the small female officer who led the resistance, and slap a medal on her. Of course, buried under medals or not, the truth is the truth.”

They stopped and pretended to go through a jewelry kiosk. Everything felt damp and slightly tacky. Shepard shuddered and resisted the urge to wipe her hands despite wearing gloves.

“I don’t understand, Jane.” He held up a necklace with a pendant that looked like a lynx or bobcat. “You held off the pirates until help could get there. You did an amazing thing.”

Shepard sighed and closed her eyes for a moment. He was going to make her tell him after all the work she’d done to wall it up behind metres of emotional brick and mental mortar. When she opened her eyes, she let out a long, noisy breath. “You tell anyone this story, I’ll have to kill you. Unless some day you have a child or grandchild who falls in love with the romance of being a hero. That day you can tell it without fear of Shepard’s wrath.”

The ladies moved on, pushing through the crowd. When Shepard straightened to follow, she caught sight of Nihlus. He cut her a curt nod, then turned to speak to Garrus. Tugging lightly on the corporal’s arm, she eased them back into the flow of pedestrian traffic. Wincing a little at the noise level, the constant buzz of conversation and roar of machinery, she reached up and turned down the ambient on her implants.

“I was on leave after clearing out a small slaving operation.” She smiled, her lips curving softly, and shook her head. “There was this kid from the capital. Martin Weaver. Good kid, super sweet, super eager to escape Elysium, find adventure and excitement.” Tip of her index finger tapping her bottom lip, she turned to him with a thoughtful frown. He laughed. “Hmmm.” Giving him a gentle push, she said, “Sounds familiar somehow. Can’t quite place it.”

“Anyway,” he said, clearing his throat.

Shepard’s smiled widened. “So cheeky.” Sighing, she forced herself back on track. “Yeah, anyway . . ..” She looked back to Ash and Tali, watching them buy food. “He followed me everywhere. I had no idea why; he just latched on.” She took a long drink from her bottle, then over-handed it into a bin as they passed.

“Illyria’s a fortress,” Shepard said, pausing to look up at the gates that separated the docks from the industrial area. She blocked the setting sun with a raised hand. “What’s the deal? Keep pirates out or have I accidentally decided to take my leave on a prison planet?”
Martin laughed. “It does feel like a prison sometimes. There are gates between all the districts for defense.” He pointed. “The wall is actually the back wall of the businesses or homes. Almost half the population isn’t human, so security is always tight.”

Shepard shuddered. Mindoir had been open farmland around the urban centers. The odd Alliance look out or check point, but nothing compared to the maximum security prison of Elysium’s capital. “I can see why you want to escape, kid.”

He ran ahead through the gate into the industrial area, then turned to walk backwards. “You hungry? I know a great place to get burgers. The farms here have cows, so it’s actual meat, not that vat crap.”

“Sure, kid, I could eat. Lead on.” Shepard hoisted her duffel higher on her shoulder and followed him through the gates, looking up at the coils of razor wire along the top. Another shudder gripped her. Trading freedom for security . . . a fine line that she was pretty sure Elysium had crossed.

The burger place served a great cheeseburger. It had been so long since she’d eaten a real, fresh cut french fry, that she worried she might embarrass herself for a moment. Actual chocolate milkshakes and pumpkin pie pretty much convinced her that she’d found junk food nirvana. She watched Martin scarf his meal down, only coming up for air to ask her questions about the Alliance around mouthfuls of food. She answered them the best she could, envying him his innocence.

Pushing her dessert plate away from her, she sighed. “I need to get to my hotel room so I can pop the button on my trousers,” she said, lacing a weak laugh through a heavy groan. She thanked the waitress and swiped her credit chit, paying for both their meals.

“Thanks, Shepard.” Martin jumped up and bounded into the street, all the energy and coordination of a yearling colt. She wanted to grab him, sling an arm around his shoulders, and tell him to slow down a little, enjoy his fresh, beautiful view of a tarnished and dark galaxy. Of course, he’d never listen. She wouldn’t have.

“It’s no wonder the kid is stuck to you, Shepard, you old softy,” she grumbled to herself as she followed Martin up the street.

Her hotel happened to be right next to the massive gates into the retail section of Illyria. She traded a ground floor room for one on the top floor. It never paid to have windows anyone could crawl through.

“This is where I leave you, kid,” Shepard said at the elevator. “Thanks a lot for the tour. It’s been fun.”

Martin bounced a little, his hands stuffed down into the front pockets of his jeans, his shoulders up by his ears. “I could take you out tomorrow if you like, show you the mountains.” He grinned wide and ingenuous. “We’re not called an alpine paradise for nothing.”

Completely charming. Lord, save me from the charmers.

She chuckled and nodded. “Sure, but let me sleep in, okay? I’ll meet you down here at noon.” She hit the elevator and rode up, flopping across her bed as soon as she walked into the room. “Thank you, baby Jesus. A real mattress. All those things I’ve asked for . . . it’s okay, this is all I need.”

“My feet are killing me. Bad case of new boots, old feet.” Shepard chuckled, steering Jenkins over to a booth at a small cafe. Ash and Tali sat a couple of tables away, eating lunch and chatting away like they’d been best friends their whole lives. She grinned as her companion’s stomach growled. “Go ahead and get something to eat. We’ll be here for a bit by the look of it.” After looking around, she winced. “Unless you’re into exotic forms of food poisoning, make it something in a wrapper, though.”

He ordered a giant, honey-glazed pastry. When he opened the donut, the honey-soaked, browned-dough smell made her stomach growl as if threatening to climb out and maul him for it.

“ Damn, doesn’t that just drown out the wretched stench of this hole?” She moaned, staring at his snack as it raised to his mouth. “The madness of the donuts is the lure of the abyss. Sirens lurk in the dark depths of the honey-glaze as they lurk at the bottom of the sea, that I know for sure - but I have never encountered them, and I am searching still for the profound and plaintive pastries in whose depths I might be able, like Hamlet redeemed, to drown the Ophelia of my desire.”

Watching him take another bite, the moan upped to a groan. “Oh, sweet baby Jesus.” She turned to the proprietor and ordered one of her own.

Jenkins stared at her. “Jane?”

She laughed. “Why is it the second I quote literature, you all look at me like I’m a crazy woman?” She shrugged and wagged her head. “Okay, I bastardized that one a little. It’s Jean Lorrain from his novel Monsieur De Phocas.”

Glaring at her warily, he turned a little to guard his food. “No, I was afraid that you were going to take my arm off to get to mine.”

She nodded, eyes narrowing as she teased him. “It could happen.” She ripped hers open and took a bite, the sweet, sticky, doughy goodness prompting a soft moan. “Oh yeah. Oh yeah, sing your sweet siren song to me, yeast, flour, and sugar. Ophelia of my desire, consider thyself drowned.”

She swallowed the bite, then opened her eyes. “Okay, I’m back.”

Jenkins shook his head, still looking both alarmed and confused. “So you just got to your room and crashed?” he asked, cranking the steering wheel to swerve her back on course.

“Yeah, I was beat.” Shepard nodded and picked at her donut. “I woke up hours later, still in my clothes, my room door not even locked. The sky outside was a scary, absolute black.” She stifled a shudder, unable to stop her skin from lifting into gooseflesh. “I sat up on the side of the bed, trying to find the light and figure out why the alarm in my head felt like exploding cacti. Then I felt the whole room vibrating. The air changed, making my ears pop as I heard the thwump thwump of low yield explosives hitting the ground.” Setting the pastry down on it’s wrapper, she swallowed hard, the dough stuck in a wad in her throat. “Martin burst through the door, screaming senseless panic gibberish. Scared the living shit out of me. Good thing I wasn’t armed.”

Five minutes after waking, Shepard ran out the hotel’s front door, Ingrid and Roger securely seated on the back of her armour. Martin ran into her back, then headed for the gate, but she grabbed the collar of his shirt and yanked him back. “Stay here.”

She shoved away her erratic heartbeat and the knot tied into her guts. Balling her hands into fists then stretching out her fingers, she forced blood and warmth down into them. She needed to think, needed to move and fast. Scanning the gates, she spotted stairs leading up the nearest wall to a guard house. She raced up, grabbing a set of binoculars off the table, then ran out onto the rooftop to look down at the docks. A soldier stood a couple of metres away, doing the same thing.

The unmistakable orange, fiery plumes of explosions rose up into an already thick, black cloud of smoke over the docks. Looking up at the sky, she searched for any sign of the Alliance fighting off the raid. The Agincourt was up there, she knew that for sure. She’d come in on the Juno, but it might have already left. Sure enough, just above the northern horizon, meteorite-like streaks of fire showed debris entering orbit. At least the Alliance knew what was going on.

“We’ve got to get to the base,” the soldier called, looking over his shoulder at two others. “All our comms are jammed.”

“How many of you are on patrol in this district?” Shepard asked.

“Six, ma’am. Six more in the residential district. The LT is on his way down to the dock gate.” For a moment, she thought he might just bolt after his lieutenant, but then he straightened and his feet rooted on the rooftop.

Shepard walked to the edge of the roof and looked down. Civilians wandered into the street, their faces confused and numb. She needed to get them into shelter and protected. No way in God’s great galaxy would she let Mindoir happen again.

Thank you sweet Lord for Elysium’s paranoia.

“Get this and the residential district gates shut and block them with sky cars, whatever. Make sure that a tank can’t just ram them and get through.” The lights and thunder from the docks drew her eyes back. “Whatever this is, it’s big, and our first priority has to be protecting the civilians.”

“Those are our people down there,” the Marine screamed in Shepard’s face.

She gripped him by the shoulders, balling up two handfuls of his uniform. “Yes, and these are your people up here. The Alliance personnel can take care of themselves.” She had to crane her neck to meet his eyes. “Our duty is to the folk who can’t. We need to keep these people safe until help comes. Weld this gate shut.”

For a moment, he looked as though he’d argue, but then he nodded and grabbed his two squad mates and raced for the gate.

Shepard looked to the crowd of people gathering, shivering in the chill early morning air and called down. “We need to barricade this gate. The wire will slow down ground troops, but we need vehicles and heavy equipment to keep them from ramming straight through if they try to batter it down with tanks or blow it with rockets.”

She ran over to the guard station and descended the stairs, stopping on the lowest landing. “We need guns, radios, food and water, and we need people to man the barricade once it’s up. Wall patrols will be vital.” Her eyes scanned the crowd, her hands gripping the railing as she leaned forward. “Anyone willing to organize the wall patrols, get people up watching for squads trying to breach? Someone know the walls and their weak spots?”

An older man in camo held up his hand. “I helped build them, I can organize the patrols and sentries.”

“Excellent. We’ll need at least two people per post who can use a rifle and some cover for them.” She looked back to the crowd. “Okay. Volunteer for fire control?”

A woman raised her hand. “Well, since I’m the fire chief, I guess that would be me.”

Shepard gave her a wide grin. “Excellent, you’ll have that well in hand, then.” She looked up. We need to close the gates to the residential district and have vehicles ready to block it. That will be our fall back. If whoever is attacking the colony starts getting through these gates, we fall back, barricade ourselves in there. Make sure the children, infirm and elderly are all up there to start with. Get them into the most secure parts of the district and start fortifying them the best you can.” Her eyes sought out the wall patrol leader. “Make sure those walls are ready to be defended, and that we have eyes anywhere they might try to flank us and come in behind.”

He nodded and ran off.

“Okay, now, we need scavenging teams. Clear out the sporting good, hunting, military surplus and hardware stores. Need some people organizing supplies, loading weapons and making sure they fire.” She looked down at the fire chief. “It’s safe to say you know these people well?”

“Yes, ma’am. I’ll find team leaders for those tasks.”

Shepard nodded. “Okay, let’s get these gates secure. We don’t have much time.”

Martin raced up to her, breathless and flushed with excitement. “Shepard! What do you need me to do?” The kid practically bounced on the spot.

“Stick with me. You can run messages and pass out supplies.” She grabbed the front of his shirt in her fist and pulled him in so they stood nose to nose. “Whatever you do, stay with me. I’ll keep you safe. No running off to do anything crazy, understood?”

He saluted, a indecently wide grin on his face. His wished for adventure had arrived, and it made her eyes sting to see the innocence in his excitement. “Yes, ma’am.”

“How long did you have before the pirates made it to the gate?” Jenkins asked between licking the sticky icing from his fingers.

“Don’t do that. Germs, man, germs.” Shepard passed him a wet napkin. “An hour and a half. Long enough to get things locked down fairly well, get people on the roofs with rifles. As I figured, they rolled up with a couple of tanks. We managed to thin the herd pretty well while the tanks battered at our blockade, but it was inevitable that they’d get through. I called for the retreat after about two hours. We’d taken quite a few casualties, sent the wounded back to the closest school, left the dead lying out at the back of the roofs where they’d fallen. Hated to do it, but we just didn’t have time to worry about the dead with more than a million living bodies to defend.”

“Martin lost that excited spring in his step about the same time one of the Alliance soldiers took a bullet to the head, covering the poor kid in blood. He dug deep and found his guts though, kept going. I admired that in him.”

Across the cafe, Ashley and Tali stood and headed back into the crowd. Shepard watched the crowd, searching for quarians or anyone showing an interest. Nothing. The two ladies might as well be any of the faceless crowd. “Damn, this isn’t working.” she grumbled as she stood. “Come on, boyfriend o’ mine, let’s see what other trouble we can get into now that we have a sugar rush going.”

They held hands and drifted with the tide of people, catching sight of the other two teams now and again, both reporting seeing nothing out of the ordinary going on.

“How did the retreat back to the residential gate go?” Jenkins prodded after a few minutes passed.

She sighed and squeezed his hand, a silent warning to rein in the eagerness. “As much like clockwork as one could expect with the resources at hand. Most of the gun hands I’d kept behind until last had been Alliance or mercs at some point, so they held the line together pretty well. We took a couple of injuries, but nothing major.”
A sigh cut through her words like a scalpel. “However, I didn’t know that a group of teenagers had snuck away from their families, grabbed rifles and decided to be heroes. They got the wise idea to try to take out the tanks with hunting rifles.”

“Martin, get your ass through the gate.” Shepard kept Roger moving, dropping targets as she backed toward the blockade, trying to buy time for the civilians to get themselves organized.

Movement along the rooftops alerted her to snipers, and she sped up. “Get ready to weld those gates shut!” she yelled back over her shoulder. Just as she reached the narrow opening in the gates, six bodies hurtled out the front door of one of the stores.

“Wait for us!” they screamed in a chorus of panic. Shepard stopped, keeping Roger in motion. Three shots into one target, switch, three shots, switch; pounding the pirates to slow them down, buy precious seconds of time.

Run faster, dammit.

Screaming with metallic death, the gates into the retail district crumpled under the weight of two tanks. For a moment, the Grizzlies reared up, seeming about to tip over as they climbed the barricade of skycars behind the gates.

Please, baby Jesus, let them go over backwards, let them go over backwards.

She held her breath as the tanks hesitated, but then their noses dropped and they rumbled over top of the barricade and down the other side. Batarian and human pirates clambered over the pile, the trickle of bodies from before turning into a flood. Shepard let out the breath and glanced behind her. Eight minutes, maybe, to get the gates welded shut and barricaded before the running bodies and tanks poured over them. Her eyes flitted back to the running group.

A dry, thunderous crack split the air and one of the runners fell. Shepard sighted a sniper on one of the roofs and brought him down, but the group had stopped to help their companion. Pirates closed in on the group of teens far faster than they moved.

Too long. Dammit.

She backed through the gate, her eyes burning and supper from the night before sitting just behind her tonsils as she sealed their fates.

“Shut the gate! Weld it shut!” She closed her eyes. “Sweet baby Jesus, hold them close and keep them safe. I pray this in your Father’s name. Amen.”
Mass Effect - Future Imperfect Chapter Twenty Five

Chapter Summary

Tracking Tali, Shepard finishes telling Jenkins the truth about Elysium and her heroism.

Shepard’s gaze slid over the less crowded market inside Omega proper. Ash and Tali giggled over a rack of less than savoury magazines. “Great,” she muttered. “Now I’m going to have to answer to her father for her knowledge of hanar pornography.”

Jenkins chuckled, low and genuine, as if he knew she needed another moment to throw up some barricades against her memories. “Can I be there for that conversation?”

Shepard laughed and squeezed his hand. Such a good kid. They all were, really, her crew. Good people . . .

“Shepard! No!” Martin threw himself at her, nearly flipping her to the ground. “No, you can’t leave them out there.” She twisted out of his grasp, turning it on him, his arm pinned like a bag to a board behind his back. The fear and helplessness rampaging through her howled as it found an outlet, but the teen’s grunt of pain slammed a lid on it, and she released him like a burning coal.

“If we leave the gates open any longer, we compromise everyone in this district,” she replied, struggling to keep her voice low and calm despite the fact someone had clamped a vise-grip on her throat. “I don’t want to leave them any more than you do. All we can do is hope the Alliance gets here in time to save them.” She pushed him toward the stairs, ramming the iron rod of control back down her spine, and waved people back. “Clear back. As soon as the gates are welded shut, we need to get the barricades in.”

“What’s the point?” a voice wailed from the crowd. “It didn’t even take them two hours to get through the last barricade.” A murmur of terror and despair rattled through the gathered civilians like the sound of dried tendons on old bones. “How many have already died? Maybe if we . . .?”

“No!” Shepard shouted, cutting off the rest of that sentence. Allowing an edge of rage to enter her voice, she climbed up a few steps to look over the gathered colonists. She needed to break their despair and fast, even if they needed to replace it with anger at her.

“I was raised on Mindoir. When the slavers attacked, I watched my family murdered or dragged off into slavery.” She spun around, ripping her uniform out of the waist of her trousers, pulling the back up to her neck, displaying a portion of the knotted ridges of scars that criss-crossed her from neck to heels. “I was sixteen. This was the least of the ‘mercy’ the slavers showed me. She dropped it and tucked it back in before turning back around to face them, meeting their glass and tears with steel. “Trust me, there’s no mercy on the other side of this gate.”

She waved her arms, pushing them back. “We’re buying the Alliance time to get here. That’s all we can do. Now, if you’re able to shoot a gun, get up on the roofs and lets keep their ground troops from climbing. If you can’t shoot, fall back to the schools where the children and elderly are. Help secure all entrances and windows. The schools will be our last retreat points.” She winced at the screams coming from the other side of the gate as the pirates claimed their human cargo.
Clenching her jaw so tight her teeth grated and screeched together, she managed to keep her outer facade calm. “The schools are good sturdy concrete and steel structures. They’ll hold if we get them secure.”

No one moved, the ambient fear ramping up to panic as the screams and sounds of struggle grew worse. The civilians shifted restlessly, preparing to stampede. Shepard held up her hands. “Please. We’re doing everything we can to protect you. Don’t let fear take your will to fight. We can hold out long enough for help to reach us.” She started pushing them back a little. “Let’s make the schools as secure as we can get them. Weld some blinds on the roofs, especially over the doors. Get the metal sheeting over the windows.” She met as many eyes as she could. “We have precious little time and a million people counting on us. Let’s get to work.”

At last they began to move in a more positive direction, and she let out the breath she’d been holding.

Martin stalked after her as she headed up to the roof, Ingrid in hand, to help keep the gates clear.

“How could you just leave them out there, Shepard? You know what those pirates will do to them.” Martin demanded, his voice low and furious, promising violence.

Shepard stopped halfway up the stairs, turning to him, all the terror and horror boiling inside her bursting loose at once. “Yes, I know . . . far better than I hope you ever find out, kid.” She bent down low, meeting him eye to eye. “Is your mother inside these walls? Your sister?” When he nodded, she leaned in next to his ear, forcing her voice to keep to a whisper. “If we don’t secure these gates, what’s happening to those kids out there will be happening to your family and every other family in here. These people are a moment from panicking. If that happens, it’s all over.” She reached out, cupping his neck in her hand. “I need your help, Martin. People do stupid shit when they panic. Help keep them calm.”

When she pulled back to look into his eyes, he nodded, all the muscles in his jaw and neck bunched. She returned the nod with a glacial one and ran up onto the roof, taking a position over the gate.

Shepard ducked in behind a kiosk and picked up a scarf, focusing all of her energy on it, needing the distraction to get herself back under control. She cocked her head to the side, turning her bulwarks to the corporal as she pressed her eyes closed hard and tight against the screams. Slamming some of the loose bricks back into place, she slapped up mortar. Too many screams. Too few answers to prayers.

“I might get this. It gets cold on the Normandy.”

She turned a little to see Jenkins holding up a hand knit sweater against his armour, checking the size.

A wan smile brushed across her face, thanking him silently for the moment. Elysium lay a thousand light years behind her, Mindoir a thousand behind that, but the ghosts . . . well, ghosts didn’t care about distance, space, or time. Ghosts followed as tenacious as bloodhounds, as strident as harpies, and as close as the next thought.

She nodded at the sweater. “Good idea. I have one for just that reason.” She felt the knit between her fingers. “It’s very nice.” She waited out of the way, watching Tali and Ash, just trying to find her balance.

“I think this op is a bust, Shepard,” Nihlus sighed in her ear.
“That’s a firm, but let’s go another hour. They can wander the interior markets a bit.” She picked up a blue sweater and held it out for Jenkins to look at. “We’ll need to space out a bit more inside though, the crowds will be lighter.” She forced a smile and refolded the sweater, placing it on the pile. “You hear that, Ash?”

“You bet,” the Marine replied.

Shepard purchased two scarves: one in blue and grey, one in black and red, and wrapped them in a jaunty knot around her neck. The warmth helped ease the lump of old panic, grief, and pain enough for her to take a deep breath, preparing for the end of the ‘heroic’ tale.

Jenkins sighed and shook his head. “I’m sorry, Jane. I was being an idiot. You don’t need to finish.” He took her hand again, his new sweater in a bag dangling from the other.

She shook her head and bumped him with her shoulder. “Once you start wrasslin’ the ‘gator, son, you’ve made a commitment that you’d better see through.” A watercolour smile softened her features. “It’s okay, Richard. You see . . . any idiot can take a bullet. The test of a hero is knowing when and for whom. It’s not a test a lot of us pass. Life can go damned cheap out here. You’ve got to hold yours dear, and if you give it up, make sure it counts.”

He stared into her eyes for a moment, then nodded. “Yeah. Yeah, I get that.”

She knew he did. “So, we managed to keep them off the residential gate for three hours. Took a lot more casualties, enough that whispers of panic began to spread long before we needed to retreat. It took the pirates longer to cross less ground, so I concentrated on the tanks as much as I could to slow them down even further, hoping that the Alliance was biting hard at their heels. I’m pretty sure I took the pilot out a couple of times, because they’d stop and wait while people shuffled around.”

“Can anyone hear me? This is Lt. Jane Shepard. Repeat, is there anyone receiving this signal?” Shepard let her hand drop, but forced herself to keep her disappointment under wraps. She picked up the walkie-talkie next to her knee. “Okay people, it’s time. Start retreating back to your assigned school. Make sure to get the wounded down first.” Closing her eyes, she shut out the voice that asked about the dead.

“Those of us headed for the school on the next block will hold the gates as long as we can.” She shook hands as grim-faced men and women passed by offering thanks. “Just make sure all the entrances are blockaded and covered from above. We can do this. The reason their charge has slowed down has to be the Alliance coming up on them from the docks. We just need to hold a little while longer.”

Martin sat next to her, his back pressed against their cover, and looked up at her with weary, sad eyes. “Do you really believe that, Shepard?”

She nodded and pressed a hand to his shoulder. “It’s been an ugly night, but you and the rest of these people have put up a hell of a fight, kid.” Impulsively, she leaned in and kissed his cheek. “You’ve been really brave, so let’s finish this, yeah?”

He sighed, his eyelids sagging. “Yeah. What the hell. Like Gator Pete always says, ‘Once you start wrasslin’ the gator, son, you’ve made a commitment that you’d better see through’.”

Shepard laughed, exhausted but genuine. “What’s that, now?”

“Gator Pete, my little sister’s favourite show. It’s pretty funny.” He pushed up into a crouch.
“Okay, what do you need me to do?”

“Check in at the school, make sure that they’re ready to seal it up behind us. Make sure they know to get as much water stored as they can. If they’ve been emptying bottles, fill them. The pirates will knock our power and water out as soon as they get in. Their whole goal now will be to get us to open the doors.” She chugged him on the shoulder. “Get moving and be careful.”

Shepard watched him go, allowing herself to imagine for a moment that if she’d ever had a little brother, he’d have been a lot like Martin. His passion reminded her of her dad. An image chased that thought across her mind. Bright, strawberry blonde ringlets framed chubby cheeks and laughing eyes. She shoved it aside. No time for that.

For another twenty minutes Ingrid moved from target to target without stopping, but the pirates finally wised up to use the tanks as cover, biding their time. Like a tsunami growing as it closed in on shore, their numbers built up, threatening to surge over the gates, drowning the last defenders in their flood.

“Pull back to the school, people,” she called into the radio. “Outer stations first. Let’s keep it orderly. My station and station two on the other side will retreat last, keep them off the fence as long as we can.”

Martin ran up just as she readied to pull back. “The schools are ready, Shepard.”

She held out a hand toward the stairs. “Good, let’s get moving.” She followed, running down two at a time. The moment gunfire ceased from the roofs, pirates climbed over the gates, jumping down. Luckily, they appeared to have orders to take prisoners rather than kill. “Run! Fast as you can,” she shouted to the Alliance soldiers who’d stayed until the end. Bringing up the rear, she dodged from cover to cover, fighting backwards.

“They’re right behind me,” she said as she stumbled through the school’s side door. “Get this door welded shut and barricaded.” Turning to look down the hallway, she tried to force a reassuring smile onto her lips. “A beautifully executed stalling operation people.”

“What now?” a male voice yelled. “We’re packed in here so tight we can barely sit down.”

“I know things are cramped and tense. The most important thing we can do right now is keep things as calm as possible. Make sure water gets passed around to everyone before the pirates cut off our power. If you see people starting to panic, comfort them. If we take care of one another, we can get through this.” She pushed down the hallway, weaving and jostling her way through the crowd.

“Like the hundreds you left lying on rooftops?” the same man shouted.

Shepard winced, but stifled it. “Those brave souls gave their lives to keep you safe and alive. Honour that.” She searched the crowd, trying to find the one causing the trouble. Was he trying to drive everyone into a panic?

A tremor passed through the building, throwing them into near darkness.

“What was that?” a woman yelped.

“That was just them taking out the power. The back up lights should come up any second.” As she finished speaking, the hallway bathed in a dim red glow from the exit lights. “It’s more important than ever to keep everyone calm. Hold hands, sing . . . whatever it takes.”
She found Martin at the junction of the next corridor. “Are the others already up on the roof?” she asked. A gunshot answered the question for him. “Good, okay. Try to get as many of the people from the hallways into rooms as you can so that we can move quickly if they start to breach an entrance.” Looking around, she spotted an exit sign on an interior wall. “Does that lead to the roof?”

“Yeah.” He continued handing out water, urging people to pass them down the hall.

“Okay. If anyone needs me, I’ll be above the front door.”

She burst into the light and open space of the roof with a gasp of relief. At the front of the building, she shrugged Ingrid into her hands and peered out. “How are we doing?”

One of the Alliance soldiers squeezed off a couple of rounds. “They’ve got us surrounded, but haven’t tried to get to the doors.”

“Yeah, they won’t for now. They’ll try to find a chink in the armour and see if they can make someone open a door.” The words barely made it past her lips before a shrill scream echoed from the other side of the tanks. The terror, pain, and fear in that scream set a knot of snakes loose in Shepard’s guts.

“What’s your name?” The voice was batarian and spoken into an amp, probably one of the tanks’ radios.

“Holly McGillis,” a young, female voice answered between sobs. She sniffed, thick and phlegmy.

“And what am I doing to you right now, Holly?” the batarian asked.

Shepard closed her eyes and swallowed hard, every one of her nightmares crowding into her head and heart, promising to rip her apart. Shoving them aside, she ducked around the cover, bringing Ingrid up to use her scope. She couldn’t see the ringleader or his captives, but put a bullet through the head of one careless peon.

The young woman whimpered and took a tremulous breath. “You’re holding a knife to my eye.” Hysterical sobbing. “Please, don’t hurt me. Please. Daddy!” The last word came out as a stuttering scream.

“If you surrender now, no one will be harmed,” the batarian shouted.

“No, we’ll all be taken as slaves. Keep taking out anyone who shows even an inch,” Shepard hissed to the others. “The best thing we can do for her and the others is keep picking off the slavers.”

“Shepard,” the walkie talkie called. “Shepard, come in. We need you at the front doors.” The sounds of scuffling came through before the channel closed.

“Keep them pinned,” Shepard ordered, racing to the door back downstairs.

She slammed into a seething mess of panic at the door from the stairwell. “Make way. Everyone stay calm. This is what they want!” Pushing into the crowd, she fought her way to the front doors.

“Let me out! That’s my daughter out there!” A middle-aged man threw himself against the door guards.

“Sir.” Shepard grabbed his elbow. “Sir, please. If we open these doors, everyone here will be killed or captured. Please understand, as much as we wish we could save her, we can’t open these doors.”

He grabbed Shepard’s pauldrons and shook her. “We can’t just leave her out there.” Red, frantic eyes stared into hers. A shrill shriek of pain from outside tore the man away from Shepard, and he hurled himself against the door guards again.

“That’s one eye,” the batarian called. “You have five minutes to open the doors before she loses the other.”

“Daddy! Mommy! Please.” Screaming sobs echoed down the hall, deafening in the sudden, still silence.

Shepard’s heart stopped, her inner alarm howling and stabbing her with scalpels along the length of her spine. The utter calm as the sea pulled away from shore promised a tidal wave of hysteria looming on the horizon. If that wave reached shore, people would be crushed beneath it. The hallways and classrooms were too packed.

“Everyone, please. Take deep breaths, try to stay calm. They know they can’t get in. They know their time is short. All we need to do is stay calm. The Alliance will come.” She reached out to pat arms and squeeze hands. “Comfort one another, and if you believe in God, pray for those outside.”

“And what about my daughter? You’d just abandon her and the others to be tortured to death?” Grabbing Shepard’s shoulder, he spun her around. Lifting her by the chest guard, he shook her so hard that the seals popped, and he ripped it right off.

“Sir. I’m so very sorry for what’s happening to your child, but if we open those doors, every child in this building will end up in a slaving cage. Is your wife in here? Other children?” She took his silence as confirmation and nodded. “Go comfort them; be here for them.”

Holly’s father stared at her chest guard for a moment, then let it slip from his fingers to fall to the floor. Shepard bent down to pick it up before turning back to try to keep the crowd calm.

“Everyone, why not sit down?” she called out. “Hold each other’s hand --”

A rough hand grabbed her shoulder again, turning her. Furious eyes stared into hers with a feral satisfaction as something slammed her hard in the gut, driving the air from her lungs. “You bitch!” the father said, his voice a low growl. “Rot in hell.” His hand drove into her again, dropping her to her knees as the numb airlessness turned to an inferno roaring through her intestines.

“Shepard?” Martin’s voice rose above the crowd. “Shepard?”

Someone next to her screamed and the tidal wave roared into shore, people surging out against the walls.

“Stop,” Shepard gasped. “If you panic, people are going to die.” She pressed a hand to her stomach, her fingers bumping into something, groping along the length of it for a moment before figuring out that it was the handle of a knife.

“Shepard?” Martin hit the floor next to her. “Oh god, Shepard.” He looked up. “Grab him and tie him up somewhere. Find his family to stay with him.”

Stumbling to her feet, Shepard managed to hit her medigel, then grabbed the knife and pulled it out. She thrust it at Martin, hitting her medigel again when he took it. “I need to get back to the roof.”
“You’ve been stabbed. You need to see the doctor. There’s a couple in the gym.”

“You’re five minutes is up,” the batarian called. “It’s a shame. Such a lovely girl. Would have brought a fair price with eyes.”

A shrill, terrible, sobbing, choking scream ripped down the hallway. “Daddy, please . . . help me!”

Shepard stumbled, slamming shoulder-first into the wall, the scream tearing the thin membrane holding back Mindoir and its demons. They raged through her for long seconds, leaving her knees trembling, the rest of her frozen solid.

“There’s got to be something we can do, Shepard,” Martin insisted, pulling her up to stand square on her feet. “We could sneak out, break them free, and be back inside before anyone knew.”

Shepard stared at him for a moment, then grabbed his face between her hands, latching onto him to pull herself free from the old nightmare. “Anyone who goes out there will end up like that poor girl. Isn’t one suffering that fate bad enough?” She pressed her brow to his. “I know it’s hard. It’s killing me to leave them out there, but there’s nothing we can --”

An agonized roar and a deafening crash from behind her spun Shepard around. Light flooded the corridor, but it took her a moment to realize the doors were open.

“The father just . . .” someone called.

Martin raced down the hallway, Shepard stumbling behind, a hand clutching in front of her, snatching at the air as she tried to grab his clothing and hold him back. Too late. Both doors swung wide, the father running into a line of pirate gunmen. Luckily, the doors actually opening took the slavers by surprise, and they just stood there gaping.

“Martin! Stay inside!” Shepard shouted over the chaos. Too late. He jumped out even as the refugees yanked the doors shut once more. Darkness blinded her only to be shattered by sparks as the door guards welded cross beams into place.

Martin! Please, sweet baby Jesus, send your angels to protect him!

Shepard slid to a stop, pivoting to push her way back to the stairs. “Everyone please, stay calm. Please. I know it’s hard, but panic will only make things worse. Hold each other, comfort each other. Pray. Sing. Whatever helps.” She pushed through the door and raced up the stairs, her wounds still seeping blood. Hitting the medigel again, she burst up the last flight and out onto the roof to the sound of gunfire and Martin screaming.

Shepard slid into the blind on her hip, then ducked around it to see the girl’s father sprawled on the ground, most of his face missing. Ingrid seemed to find her own way into Shepard’s hands as Martin appeared at the end of one of the tanks, the slaver holding him still in cover behind the vehicle.

“Shepard!” Martin called, his chest heaving, blood soaking a thick trail down the arm of his shirt from a bullet wound. “I’m sorry.”

“Shepard?” the batarian called. “Is that the name of your leader, whelp?” A hand holding a knife came up, the point pressing to Martin’s throat. “Is Shepard your leader?” the voice repeated, enunciating each word with slow menace.

Hovering at the edge of the blind, a thousand ideas raced through Shepard’s head, but she discarded all of them. Anything she did risked everyone else. She stopped, slamming up a wall that forced her mind to go quiet for a moment. Gunfire. She heard gunfire and it sounded a lot closer than the docks.

She took a deep breath. “Do you hear that?” she yelled down. “That’s the sound of a whole battalion of reinforcements headed this way.” Pausing, she gave the slavers time to hear the fighting for themselves. “You’re done here. If you’re smart, you’ll pack up and run like hell.” She laughed, launching it at them like a guided missile. “Or don’t. A whole lot fewer pirate scum in the galaxy.”

The cluster of bodies in the courtyard shifted, restlessness quickly accelerating toward panic as the sound of hundreds of boots beating against the pavement at double-time grew even louder than the sporadic gunfire.

“Shepard!” the batarian bellowed, “your name will not be forgotten.”

Martin screamed, a blood-freezing shrill of agony.

“I’ve left you a gift to remember me by as well, Shepard. Congratulations on your victory.” Deep, mocking laughter slithered behind the words. Screams fed the evil chortle until Shepard clutched her arms over her head, desperate to block it out.

“How?” Hands grabbed her, shaking her hard. “LT! They’ve pulled out. The Alliance is inside the gates.” They shook her again, and she uncurled. “Damn, you’re bleeding.” Medigel slithered through her, helping drag her back to the rooftop of the school.

“Martin!” She scrambled to her feet.

“LT. I don’t think you should go down there. It’s um . . .”

Shepard turned to look at the soldier. “Is he . . .?” She couldn’t force the last word past her lips. It dug in behind her teeth, claws holding it in place.

“He’s alive. All seven of them are alive, but . . .” The soldier swallowed, his adam’s apple bobbing almost comically. “You don’t want to see them like that. You saved us all, ma’am. Don’t let that be your memory of it.” He wrapped an arm around her, supporting her weight, and tried to help her to the stairs.

“No.” She broke away from him. “I’m fine, and I’ll honour the ones I failed.” One arm wrapped tight around her stomach, she hobbled down the stairs and along the length of the now empty corridor. One hand braced against the wall, she walked to the door, hesitating for a couple of breaths before stepping out into the new sun.

The slavers had run in their tanks, leaving the father’s dead body sprawled a couple of metres ahead of a mass of people, blood, and frantic tears.

Clenching her teeth, she walked over, searching the crowd for the young man who, so few hours before, thought the whole thing some grand opportunity for adventure.

“Shepard!” The muffled, mushy way her name came out of Martin’s mouth told her far more than she wanted to know. Pushing through the Alliance personnel and civilians trying to help, she found Martin and the others laying on the pavement. She turned away, her eyes pressed shut, but then forced herself to look back, to kneel next to him and take his hand.

“I’m right here, Martin,” she said, her voice soft and almost as strangled as his. “You just take it “easy and let these people help you out.” She stroked his brow, brushing his hair out of the blood that poured over his skin. “You are one hell of a brave kid.”

“Stupid,” he said through sobs and blood, choking as it poured down his throat.

“Roll him onto his side,” the medic called, “or he’s going to aspirate. Fucking slavers.”

Shepard slapped him on his shoulder, jerking her head and a firm glare toward the blinded youth on the ground. The medic paled and nodded.

“Just never . . .,” he said, working to pack Martin’s wounds.

Shepard nodded, but just kept stroking her fingers through the young man’s hair. “Nah, it’s never stupid to try to help others, kid. You just relax. These guys will take care of you.”

“Don’t leave?” His hand clutched hers in an iron grip.

“Don’t worry, I’m not going anywhere.” She rubbed his back. “Were your family at another school?”

He nodded.

“Who was in charge here?”

Shepard let out a long sigh at the familiar shout and looked up, searching out the commodore. When she spotted Hackett, she lifted a hand to get his attention.

He saw her, a fierce, furious smile settled onto his face. “I should have known,” he grumbled, crouching next to her. “What? You can’t even manage leave without getting into trouble?” He gripped her shoulder. “You’re hurt?”

“Yeah. Stabbed by an angry father.” She jutted her chin toward the dead man. “I’ll get looked at as soon as Martin here is on his way to the hospital.”

“The slavers blinded him like the girl?” Jenkins asked, his face twisted into horrified sorrow.

“All of them, eyes, ears, tongue . . ..” Shepard shook her head. “The Alliance and the colonial authority held a memorial a month later, paraded me, the couple of surviving Alliance soldiers, and those kids out like prized farm animals at a fair. I told everyone where they could stuff their medal and awards, but they didn’t care. Colonist enrollment tanked after the Blitz. They needed to put a pretty face on it. Lucky us.”

Shepard lifted her hand to her ear. “Ground teams, anyone see anything? Any sign of Rael’Zorah?” When the teams all reported in negative, she let out an impatient huff of air. “Too much to ask, I suppose. Okay, everyone, back to the boat. We’ll come back later, find a busy club, see if we don’t have better luck.”

“Jane?” Jenkins said, tucking her hand back in the crook of his arm. “Thanks.”

“Yeah. You’re a good soldier, Richard. Just don’t be too eager to become a hero. Make it count when you do.”
Mass Effect - Future Imperfect Chapter Twenty Six

Chapter Summary

Daytime op--fail. Onto the nighttime option. Afterlife, here they come.

“Going out to a club wearing the stupid, brand-new, fantastic armour that makes me look like an ugly boy,” Shepard muttered as she walked to the airlock, settling her chest guard so it sat a little more comfortably. The new armour smell remained, but it rubbed in places her Mantis hadn’t, and all those places were lodging complaints in triplicate. Her little toes in particular felt as though they were preparing litigation.

“Damn armour.” She let out a sigh and flopped onto the seat at the weapons console to wait for the rest of the team to arrive. “I love you, but I hate you.”

“Problem, Captain?” Joker asked, turning to look over his shoulder.

“Meh, probably just a case of all work no play, Brother Joker. No big deal. I’ll find my way back to the Enkindler’s light.” She tugged at the chest guard again. As much as she hated the super-molded ones, sometimes looking like a tomboy wrapped in layers of camo ceramic, metal and polymer got old. Sometimes it didn’t hurt a girl’s ego to feel pretty . . . or, failing that, female.

“Okay,” Joker said, holding up his hands. “I won’t pretend to understand. I’ll just nod and back away slowly.”

“The Enkindlers blessed you with wisdom, Brother Joker. Hallelujah,” she said, a smile cracking through her grumpy facade.

Ash arrived, looking absolutely stunning in a simple but elegant black dress with sheer, draping sleeves, and a knee length skirt. Her makeup was flawless, and her raven hair flowed in glossy waves to her shoulders. Raking frustrated fingers through her tangled curls, Shepard resisted the urge to punch the gunnery chief. It wasn’t Ash’s fault Shepard hadn’t bothered to put on a little lipstick.

Shepard nodded to Nihlus and Garrus as they strode up discussing turian fleet strength and their chances against the Reapers. She pushed herself out of the seat to join them at the airlock. Pausing just behind the pilot’s seat, she let out a sigh and leaned down over Joker’s shoulder. “It’s just . . . sometimes it would be nice to go to a club looking like a woman rather than a teenage boy. I’m sure you can’t relate.” She smiled at Tali as she, Wrex, Kaidan and Jenkins wandered up the CIC.

“Hey, I’m all about the pretty, Shepard.” He lifted his chin and stroked his beard. “Come on, tell me this isn’t a thing of beauty.”

Letting out a huff of air, she chuckled. “Stunning in a way I can’t even articulate, Brother Joker.” She patted his shoulder. “See you later.”

She stood in the doorway. “Well, it looks like the gang’s all here. Okay, Wrex and I’ll go in first, plant ourselves at the bar. Sparky and Jenkins, see if you can find a way to lurk out front without looking like you’re lurking. Ashley and Tali should have no problem whatsoever getting in. Nihlus and C-Sec, you bring up drag, keep an eye on the back exits.” She looked from one to the other, seeing resolve and an eagerness to get their mission moving forward. That she completely understood.

“Okay, the panic word again is Bal’Nara.” She looked to Tali. “You still have your tracker and bug from earlier?” When the quarian nodded, Shepard let out a decisive huff of breath. “Well then, let’s get moving. Wrex and I will head in first. Give us twenty to get in the door.” She stepped up to the door into decon. “Good luck tonight, folks.”

She spun a little as she felt someone step up behind her and nearly smacked her nose right into Nihlus’s mandible.

“Anyone who looks at you and thinks teenage boy,” he whispered low enough for only her to hear, “needs corrective ocular implants.” His breath ruffled the fine hairs around her ear and the nape of her neck, sending shivers of gooseflesh down her arms. She ducked her head to rub her ear on her shoulder and stepped away.

“Nihlus, we talked about this.” Tossing a frown over her shoulder at him, she shook her head. “Although I appreciate you trying to make me feel better, this is neither the time nor the place.” She met his eyes for a second, then ducked through the door.

Once through decon, she and Wrex made quick time down the length of the docks and into Omega. The sound of the terrible club music started as soon as they stepped through the doors at the base of the stairs leading from the lower market area up to the club. Shepard winced. “Sweet baby Jesus, what was I thinking? How do they even know if the song changes? It all sounds exactly the same.”

Wrex shrugged. “I just drink until the music sounds better.”

Shepard chuckled. “Luckily I can turn down the ambient on my aural implants, so drinking myself into a stupor won’t be necessary.”

Shepard looked up at the giant neon sign: Afterlife, palace and court of Aria T’Loak, the pirate queen of Omega. Shepard felt a little dubious about running an op in the territory of such an unknown quantity, but the place and crowds were big enough to get lost in.

She stepped up to the back of the line outside the door. “Crap, this is going to take longer than twenty minutes,” she grumbled to Wrex. Cocking a hip, she crossed her arms. “If it takes longer than ten, I’ll call off the next team until we get past the door goons.”

They’d been waiting in line for less than five minutes, when a batarian walked up to them. “Captain Shepard?”

She nodded, but held herself wary. “What can I do for you?” Beside her, she felt Wrex bristle, turning into a four hundred kilo living, breathing thunderstorm at her elbow. She laid a hand on his upper arm and gave him a tiny shake of her head.

“You don’t need to wait in line. Go ahead in. The door guards know to let you through.” A toothy smile accompanied his wave, indicating they should move on through to the front.

Shepard stared at him for a moment, wondering if that much good fortune constituted a gift horse that she should be sending to a dentist for a full work up. “Thanks,” she replied at last, nudging Wrex out of line. As much as she hated being pulled out, questioning it too much would only draw more attention to them.

Another batarian nodded them through the doors and into a corridor lined with seats and flame holos along the walls. “Guess the only afterlife on Omega is hell,” she muttered.

“Sounds about right,” Wrex grumbled. “I’ve been a merc a long time, but no matter how bad things got, I always avoided this hole like the plague.”

“Hopefully we’re out of here in a couple of hours. Meanwhile, let’s get something to drink and see if you’ve got the moves, old man.”

He coughed out a harsh laugh. “You haven’t got what it takes to make me dance, Shepard.”

She arched a brow at him as the inside doors opened and the music slammed into her brain. “And what’s that, Wrex? Creds to stuff in your armour? A sexy enough belly dancing outfit for you to wear?” She leaned back and looked him up and down, a lascivious grin curving her lips. “Damn, I bet you fill out one of those like nobody’s business.”

The krogan just harrumphed at her and started pushing through the throng to the bar. “I’m going to need a few drinks to survive your sense of humour, Shepard.”

She laughed bright and full, the gloomy mood from earlier lifting. “You wouldn’t believe how often I hear that.”

“Yes, I would.” He lifted a hand. “Ryncol. Make it a triple.”

Shepard started to rebuke him, but someone grabbed her shoulder, turning her. “Human, Aria wants to speak to you,” a voice like tank tracks running over gravel called, close enough to her ear for his wretched breath to make her gag.

“No, I’m pretty sure she doesn’t,” she replied, lacing her words with enough spit to back him up. “Tell her thanks, but no thanks. I’m just here to drink.”

The batarian bumped Shepard in the ribs with the muzzle of his assault rifle. “You don’t refuse an invitation to talk with Aria.”

Shepard rolled her eyes and folded her arms, leaning back on a cocked hip. “Or what? She and I do a quick draw in the middle of main street at high noon?”

The batarian just sneered, an ugly curl of his lip that showed a plethora of pointed teeth. “More like I put a bullet through the middle of your forehead and toss it in an alley for the varren.”

“What? My forehead? Why would the varren want my forehead? There’s no meat on a forehead.” She frowned and turned to Wrex, who made a perfect study of ‘Who me? I’ve never seen this crazy woman before.’

“Your body.” He jabbed her ribs hard with the assault rifle. “Move it, comedian. Aria’s waiting.”

“Someone thinks mighty highly of herself, doesn’t she?” She looked over her shoulder at Wrex. “Keep your eyes peeled.” He gave her a vague nod as if indulging the crazy woman, and she turned back to the batarian. “Lead away.”

The crowd parted for her escort, so the jostling as they made their way across the club and past the bar was minimal. Shepard had heard of Aria T’Loak, of course. Urban legends of her ruthlessness, how she kept order on Omega through threat of sheer brute force, abounded. Shepard had never put much stock in rumours because of all the crazy ones circulating about her. Still, she felt how the entirety of Afterlife kept one weather eye on the booth hanging over the back of the club.
“So, you’re what all the fuss is about?” a voice as smooth and sleek as a panther asked when Shepard reached the top of a second flight of stairs. An asari with an Omega worked into the back of her jacket stood looking out over the crowd, the queen watching the jesters frolic.

“Fuss?” Shepard shook her head. “I can’t see why anyone would raise a fuss over me. I’m just a medium-ranked, hothead Alliance grunt.”

The asari turned, a sweeping motion meant to impress with both her power and grace. Shepard just let out a little sigh, but stayed frosty, feeling the thick vein of ruthlessness hiding under Aria’s calculated serenity.

“And here you are, on my station, conducting operations to flush out Blood Pack kidnappers.”

“The Blood Pack is clueless, just . . . cautious. Saren makes very . . ..” She pressed her lips together and cocked her head a little. “. . . graphic examples of those who fail him.”

The corner of Shepard’s mouth lifted, almost as if of its own accord as the asari pinned her with a frank stare. Blinking with measured cadence, she waited for Aria to make the next move, to reveal her intentions.

“You’re not going to ask for anything?” Aria asked, trying to become transparent behind a mocking smile. “No boon to ask of the queen?”

Shepard pressed her lips together, affecting the same thoughtful, searching expression the asari had worn a moment before, then shook her head. “No. Can’t think of anything.” The tip of her tongue snuck out to wet her lips, then she ran her top lip between her teeth, looking around as if waiting for something to happen. After a second, she flipped to her other hip. “Was there something I could do for you?”

Aria chuckled. “I merely wanted to see for myself the terrible Shepard who has the council in such an uproar.”

Shepard straightened and held her arms out, her stomach calming completely. It had all just been about threat assessment. “Well, here I am, in all of my terribleness. Are you sure you weren’t hearing about Nihlus? He’s the Spectre. I’m just his tagalong. I carry his gun case, remind him to take his vitamins, mop the sweat from his brow, that sort of thing.”

Aria chuckled. The sound did not come off as a laugh, the low, throaty tones barbed with hooks that reached inside and insisted that Shepard let herself be reeled in. “I am . . . familiar with Spectre Kryik. He’s provided me with a great deal of entertainment over the cycles. He’s a known quantity, although I’m sure the poor thing is just devastated over Saren’s betrayal.”

The Cheshire smile stayed firmly in place. “I am . . . familiar with Spectre Kryik. He’s provided me with a great deal of entertainment over the cycles. He’s a known quantity, although I’m sure the poor thing is just devastated over Saren’s betrayal.” The smile faded, the asari’s eyes narrowing as she continued to hold Shepard’s stare without breaking away longer than to blink.

Shepard forced her face to remain passive despite the churning in her guts provoked by the many ways she could think of that Nihlus had provided Aria with entertainment. She gave the asari credit for a good play. Unable to get the mark to ask for a favour, next best move was always to go for the gut, check for weaknesses.

Aria’s lip turned up at the corner in the smallest of smirks. “I admit, even I didn’t see that coming. Those two spent a lot of cycles joined at the hip.”

Resisting the urge to laugh, Shepard nodded. That was an intentional cheap shot, so she let her amusement bleed through her gaze and nowhere else. “They were tight, but Nihlus is bouncing back. He’s a professional.”

“Aren’t we all?” Aria nodded once, a regal dip of her head. She let out a breath and shifted on the couch, posing. “No, you’re the unknown in this puzzle. Orphan, street rat, war hero, and malcontent.” Her smirk spread a little, and she lowered her head to look up under heavy-lidded eyes. “You don’t know quite what to be, do you?”

A misread? Intentional or unintentional? Or truth? Shepard shrugged the last off, lifting her shoulders a centimetre and dropping them. “I’m what you see before you, Aria. No great mystery to unravel here. I’m just trying to help Nihlus find Saren and stop him from doing something really stupid.” She straightened. “You might want to consider helping him out with that as well. A queen without a kingdom is just a sad mannequin in a discount warehouse of what used to be.”

“Reapers. I’ve been hearing that word a lot these past weeks.” Aria motioned toward the couch adjacent hers.

“Thank you, but I need to get back to my date. You know how krogan are.” Shepard shrugged helplessly, and gave the asari a slow, tilted bow of her head. “It’s been a pleasure to meet you.”

Aria’s smile flashed the barest glimpse of teeth, more predatory than ever; its purpose to obfuscate and intimidate. “And you, Shepard. Good luck capturing Saren.”

Shepard turned and trotted down the stairs without looking back. Even the tiniest glance back over her shoulder would tell Aria far too much, so she controlled her expression and movements precisely until she found Wrex.

“Where you been, Shepard?” Wrex asked, downing what smelled like diesel fuel, but must have been ryncol.

“Aria wanted to compare dick sizes.” She gestured to the bartender. “Cranberry juice, please.” Looking back at Wrex, she grinned. “Hers is bigger.” She did a casual scan of the club, finding Tali and Ash right away, Garrus and Nihlus a few moments later.

When the turian set the bottle on the counter, Shepard swiped her credit chit. “Thanks.” She twisted off the cap and upended the bottle. The juice caressed and teased her tongue, as sweet and crisp as a frosty autumn morning. She closed her eyes to savour it, moaning low and deep with pleasure. “Sweet baby Jesus, that’s good stuff.”

“What is that? I feel like I should be giving you some privacy.” Wrex peered into her eyes as she lowered the bottle, having drank half of it. “You going blackout drunk on me, Shepard?” He studied her through narrowed eyes as if waiting for her to fall over.

“It’s fruit juice, Wrex. I won’t be getting drunk at all. I’m working.” She bumped him with an elbow. “How about you? Am I going to have to carry you home?”

He laughed, two loud, harsh coughs of sound that cut through the rhythmic dissonance of the background music to resonate in the pit of her stomach. She grinned as it filled her with a warmth she wouldn’t have expected. Wrex thumped her on the shoulder, driving her into the floor like a post-pounder. “Vakarian says you’re strong, but that I would have to see, Shepard. My left arm weighs more than you do.”

“Not the right one?” She grinned, wide and easy then reached up to rub her shoulder. “Don’t underestimate me, old man. I’m scrappy.” Chuckling, she nodded toward a table in plain view of Ash and Tali. “Come on, grab another drink and let’s go talk.”

Wrex gestured to the bartender to repeat their orders, and paid for them. “You trying to get in my armour, Shepard?”

Laughing, she started to push through the dancers. “You’re way too much of a handful for me. I like my men --”

“About seven feet tall and spiky with blue markings on their faces?” Wrex finished.

Shepard’s brows migrated toward her nose as she spun to face him. “C-Sec?” Shaking her head, she course corrected, spotting an empty booth in the corner. “We’re not like that, Wrex. Don’t be spreading rumours.” Sliding into the booth, she pushed the table back to make room for the krogan.

He shrugged. “I’m not, but the crew pretty much agrees that if you aren’t already bumping the hump, you will be.”

She jabbed an elbow in his side. “Bumping the . . . . What does that even mean?” She snapped a hand up between them as he opened his mouth to answer. “No, don’t. I don’t want to know.”

Leveling a stern finger at his nose, she leaned in, her eyes narrowed and shooting darts. “You hear that crap, you squash it. Instantly, or I will, and I guarantee no one will enjoy my method. It involves pointy-toed boots and airlocks.” She uncapped her bottle and drank, her movements hard, almost robotic. Why was everyone so damned concerned with what went on between her legs? “Don’t you people have anything better to do than speculate about my sex life?” She leaned back, wriggling down into the couch.

He thought for a moment, then shook his head. “The cargo bay is pretty boring.”

The corner of his mouth twitched, and she laughed, shaking her head. “You are a pain in the ass, old man.”

“Part of my charm.” Sliding her unopened bottle of juice over in front of her, he downed the last of his drink and leaned back, turning toward her a little to rest his elbow on the table. “So, if you aren’t trying to get your hands on my equipment, what do you want to talk about?”

Feeling a hot flush rising up her neck, Shepard focused on opening her bottle and taking a drink. When her blush settled a little, she turned in her seat to face him. “I’ve got the feeling something’s up with you. You’ve been even more of a grumpy old bear than usual the last few days.” She shrugged and twitched her lips a little to one side. “What’s going on?”

He stared at her, one eye narrowing as if sizing her up, deciding if she could be trusted. After a minute, he grumbled. “These Reapers, Shepard.” He took a belt off his fresh drink.

She just nodded and waited for him to continue. Wrex possessed a surprising thoughtfulness, and she found herself not just obliged to hear what he had to say because he was a member of her crew but eager to hear it.

“These Reapers,” he repeated, “are the enemy that my people were born to fight, Shepard.” He took another drink when she answered with a smile and silence. “But the salarians and turians snapped our back with the genophage. We used to be proud . . . strong. Now, we’re just hired
Shepard shifted a little, sinking into the couch. “The genophage interferes with the hormones that sustain pregnancy, right? Most pregnancies end in spontaneous abortion or stillbirth.” When he threw a nod and a grunt at her, she opened the space between them a little. “Is work being done on a cure? I heard on the news that Binary Helix was supposed to be looking in that direction.”

“No one’s interested in curing it, Shepard.” He laughed but it was a harsh bark of disgust. “Not even most krogan. They leave Tuchanka and never go back.” Red eyes glared into hers, daring her to say or do something stupid. When she just stared back, waiting for him to get where he felt comfortable getting to the point, he sniffed, the corner of his mouth quirking. “We’re weak and scattered, dying out faster than we can breed, and it’s not the genophage killing us.”

“You need a unifying force,” she said, more to herself than him. “Someone or something capable of pulling your people back home.” She flashed to her conversation with Alenko

“When my father tried to murder me . . .” He watched her until she nodded to let him know she remembered him telling her. “. . . I was the leader of a small tribe. I was trying to rally the clans, encourage my people to stay on Tuchanka, concentrate on breeding and growing our numbers for at least one generation.” He shrugged, rolling his shoulders a little. “Jeroth, my father, was one of the warlords who survived the war with the turians. He wanted us to keep fighting. Turians, salarians, one another . . . it didn’t matter as long as we were fighting.”

“So, he invited you to the clan gathering to shut you up, one way or the other?” Shepard asked, looking up to check on the other teams. Across the club, Ashley and Tali had gotten up to dance, and seemed to be having an almost unprofessionally good time. She grinned, glad to see it. Shepard finished off her juice and slid the bottle to the far side of the table before turning her attention back to Wrex.

Wrex nodded. “When he realized that I wouldn’t join him, his men attacked, leaping from the graves of our ancestors like krogan undead. They killed all of my men within a few minutes, and I was forced to retreat, but not before I buried my dagger in his hearts. That’s why I left, and why I can never go back.”

Shepard shook her head. “No. There’s been something going on with you, and it’s not reminiscing over the bad old days, Wrex.” She shifted, moving a little closer, inclined toward him. “You’re thinking you need to go back, aren’t you?”

He grunted and shoved that idea aside, dumping the last of his drink into his mouth. “I’ve been thinking of an oath I made to my father’s father.” He flipped his hand toward the exit. “It’s the end of the galaxy out there, Shepard. You know it, and I know it, and I’m sitting in the belly of your fancy ship, wasting time when I should be setting my affairs in order.”

Shepard kicked him under the table. “Bullshit. Wasting your time . . .” A grumbled rolled like rock from her throat. “Does it take 1200 years or so to learn to feel sorry for yourself like that?” She cracked the new bottle and took a slug of cranberry juice. “You have something you need to be doing, just tell me what it is. We’ll get it done, and then get our asses back to making sure it’s not the end of the galaxy.”

He harrumphed at her, giving her that one brow cocked stare. “You believe that, Shepard?”

She harrumphed right back, her spine rigid, her jaw set. “Damn right. What bloody choice do we have, Wrex? I don’t have time for quitters. You say your people have given up. Well, are you prepared to join them or do something to change things?”
He loomed over her, glaring down at her as though he wanted to charge her right then and there, slam her through the wall behind them. After a moment, he relaxed back into the seat, a dry chuckle acknowledging her successful ploy. “All right, Shepard. After the rebellions, krogan weren’t allowed armour or weapons. The turians confiscated my family armour. I told my father’s father I’d get it back.”

Her eyes on Tali and Ash -- they’d caught the attention of two krogan in tell-tale Blood Pack armour -- Shepard nodded. “Do you know where it is?”

He followed her stare and turned, but kept his eyes on his drink. She followed suit, guzzling down the rest of her juice. Her radio squawked twice in her ear, and she nodded. Nihlus and Garrus were on the alert as well.

“Turian scum by the name of Tonn Actus has it. He collects relics from before the rebellions, has warehouses of krogan artifacts stored on bases all over the Traverse.” He jerked his head toward the krogan watching Tali and Ash. “They’re going to move.”

Shepard reached up and opened a channel. “How are things out in the ‘not a VIP’ line, Sparky?”

“Boring, ma’am. Does it look like something’s going to happen?” Kaiden replied.

“It does. Be ready.” She played with her bottle then looked at Wrex, trying to keep things casual as she spoke to Kaidan. “Our other friends are watching the back exit, so be prepared to run around through the market area and circle in on the back side.”

“Roger that.”

“Shepard out.” She opened a channel to Ashley. “Chief, separate yourself a little. Let’s see if we can get those two to take the bait.” She leaned back and crossed her arms and ankles. The krogan weren’t playing the slightest bit of attention to her table, so she felt pretty good about her cover. They, however, looked a little too obviously not interested in Tali.

Ashley moved over to a table, striking up a conversation with a group of asari sitting there. The krogan must have been waiting for the opportunity, because they edged in, one scooped Tali up with a hand behind her and they just barrelled straight toward the back door. It happened so quickly and so slick that Tali barely even got out a squawk before she hit the back stairs.

“They grabbed the bait, but took her out back, Sparky.” Shepard elbowed Wrex but he was already moving. He wriggled out of the booth and strode for the back. On the other side of the bar, Ashley and Nihlus jumped into motion as well. Shepard followed Wrex, allowing him to clear a path for her.

“Hey there, Red,” a human man grabbed Shepard’s arm. 150 proof breath smacked her in the face as he spun her around. Flinching back, she tried to step around him, but he wrapped his other arm around her neck and stumbled into her. “You’re pretty.”

“You’re not.” She tried to go around him again, but he stumbled into her, pushing her back. Grabbing his wrist, she twisted, wrenching his arm around behind him. He fell forward into one of the asari dancers, spilling her drink all over her and the turian she was speaking to.

“Hey!” The dancer spun around, grabbing the drunk by the collar. “Watch it.” She met Shepard’s eyes. “Is this idiot bothering you?” She slapped the turian on the elbow without waiting for Shepard to answer. “Aidan, escort this loser out.”

“Thanks.” Shepard pushed the drunk toward the turian, eager to be rid of him and get after Tali.
“Hey! Bitch!” Even though he didn’t seem to know who to address his insult to, the man swung a wild blow aimed at Shepard’s head. She ducked under it and sidestepped, the blow slamming into a batarian’s jaw.

Then chaos. Absolute, utter chaos, violent and bloody. Shepard ducked between flailing bodies and dodged blows, just trying to scramble her way to the door. A massive, three-fingered hand seized her shoulders and slammed her down onto the bar like someone trying to beat a rug. Stunned, she barely managed to block and throw aside a roundhouse that would have shattered her jaw like spun sugar. The krogan combatant stared at her for a moment with hazy, wavering lack of recognition as his fist connected with the bar top instead of Shepard. He pinned her legs to the front of the bar with his bulk. Winded, Shepard fought to wriggle loose as she dodged a flurry of punches coming at her from both sides.

“I don’t have time for this!” She slammed a fist into the krogan’s jaw. He shrugged it off. Her hand didn’t. Shaking out the pain, she kicked her feet, managing to drive him back a little even as he swung at her like a blind gorilla.

Shepard dodged her assailant’s unsteady blows effortlessly as his frustrated growls grew louder and more menacing. After punching the top of the bar ten or so times, he howled in drunken rage.

“Hold still!”

“Yeah, that’s going to happen.” Shepard laughed. “You’re pathetic, go find someone more your speed. I think I saw a drunk passed out at one of the tables.” The realisation of her mistake dawned about the time his massive, toothy face pressed into hers, snorting like a bull. But then he turned away, presumably to pick on someone his own size and a whole lot less agile.

Letting out a sigh of relief that she didn’t admit to herself, she reached up to radio Garrus and Wrex to leave her and go after Tali. Her hand didn’t quite reach her ear before massive hands grabbed the front of her armour and yanked her off the bar, flinging her like a football at the vid pillar in the center. In surreal slow-motion, weightless, she flew over the heads of the brawlers, turning her shoulder into the screen. As she bounced off, she looked down at the long drop to the lower level of the club. Landing on the bar ten metres below looked like a painful option. Wrenching every muscle she owned, Shepard stretched out, snagged the railing with one hand on the way down.

“Vakarian! Grab Shepard. I’ve got this!” Wrex yelled, disappearing into the sea of bodies, heading in the general direction of the back door.

“Ow, goddamn it!” Swinging her free arm a couple of times, Shepard managed to get enough momentum to grab the railing with both hands. Not that it mattered because two seconds later, Garrus ‘Caveman’ Vakarian reached over the railing, grabbed her by the back of her collar and her belt, hauled her up, and set her on her feet. Too grateful to be free of the brawl to bother yelling at him for manhandling her, Shepard sprinted toward the back door. It led to the lower level of the club, and for a moment, she lamented not just letting herself fall.

A painful shortcut is still a shortcut.

Garrus right beside her, she ran down the stairs and through a door into a dark seating area where small clusters of people chatted. None of the patrons seemed overly affected by watching a young female dragged through their midst, kicking and screaming.

“Did they even come this way?” Shepard twisted, running sideways for a second. “Did two krogan come through carrying a screaming quarian?” Most of the people didn’t even look at her, but one asari pointed along their path. “Thanks for the apathy, brothers and sisters.” She took the lead down another long flight of stairs, calling back over her shoulder. “May the Enkindlers’ pointy-toed light bless you in the ass.”

The stairs ended at a door into the lower club. “I was thinking that this is a strange way to bring her,” Shepard said, racing around the left side of the bar, dodging dancers. “But no one seems to give a crap.” Gawkers stood around the bar, watching the fight above, the din drowning out even the music. As Shepard ran past, a body dropped through the same gap she’d nearly taken a few minutes earlier, crashing into the bar. Shards of glass pinged off her armour and blood splashed against her face and neck.

Okay, glad I didn’t take that route now.

“Lower profile than dragging Tali kicking and screaming out the front,” Garrus replied. “A dive like this, no one’s going to step up to stop them.” He made an angry rumble. “It’s a meat grinder, not a club.”

A door at the back led into the alleys behind the markets, and they made their way back around to the docks. Shepard hit the top of a long, wide flight of stairs, puffing a little. She lowered her head to check her omnitool for Tali’s tracker, her ears barely registering the sound of gunfire before huge, heavy fists punched into her shields, driving her to the ground. Giving her a shake, she looked up, seeing two Blood Pack vorcha and a krogan firing at her from the end of a long row of shipping containers.

Garrus grabbed her, hurling her bodily behind the nearest container, taking a position opposite. She slammed into the metal with a hollow, ringing thud, bouncing back a little. She shrugged Roger into her hands and pressed her back against the corrugated wall, easing her way to the end to peek out.

“Are you okay?” he called, his voice tight. He ducked out to return fire.

“Yeah, didn’t get past my shields.” After switching to incendiary ammunition, she launched her drone in behind the krogan, distracting it.

“C-Sec, whittle down the krogan, I’ll take the vorcha.” He grunted his agreement, overloading the Blood Pack warrior’s barriers then switching out his assault rifle for the sniper. Shepard hammered at the vorcha, using three round volleys. One went down, but another took it’s place.

“Pyro,” Garrus called.

“You hit him with overload, I’ll sabotage his tank. Shouldn’t be anything left but chunks.” She ducked out to check her drone still had the krogan occupied. A blast of flame erupted in her face, luckily still at the extreme of the flamethrower’s range. She threw herself back and raised an annoyed eyebrow at Garrus. “I . . . 2 . . . 3.”

They both leaned out at the same time. Their omnitools flared, flames roared toward them, then with a boom that made Shepard’s ears pop, the vorcha turned into chunks of blood, bone, and meat that rained down over their heads.

“Dammit! I’m not wearing my helmet.” Shepard picked a long string of something she hoped wasn’t intestines out of her hair and threw it aside. “You might have mentioned he was in range, C-Sec. Next time, give me a range.”

“They’re bugging out.” Garrus looked to her before bolting, but sprinted off the moment she nodded.

Dodging between shipping containers, they worked their way up the docks, the krogan and last vorcha steadily gaining ground. At the edge of every container, one of them ducked out to check for ambush, then sprang back into a run. Container by container, Shepard felt their chances of catching the Blood Pack dwindling.

At last, they came to a large corridor between sections.

Shepard looked both ways, but saw nothing. “You go right. I’ll take the left.” She made it five containers down before staccato roar of gunfire echoed from Garrus’s direction. Glancing back, she couldn’t see him. Damn it, he’d gone into the damn maze.

A harsh, male bellow of pain threw her heart up into her throat, and she spun around, her boots slipping in the grit underfoot. She sprinted back down the line, peering between containers without nearly enough caution.

Good way to get your head blown off, Shepard. Dumbass.

“C-Sec? You okay?” she called ahead of her. She rounded the end of the line of containers to see him pushing himself up off the concrete.

“Yeah, I’m fine,” he said, grunting as he scrambled up off the floor with enough energy to slow her pulse. He glanced back, a thin trail of blue rolling down his face, then took off. “They doubled back down this row.”

She bolted down the space, arriving just in time to see Garrus slide around a corner further into the tangle of metal and open doors. “At least I’m not chasing him across a human colony,” she muttered, racing after him.

She caught up with him two rows over, completely lost in the maze of narrow corridors and endless containers. Garrus peered around the end of a shipping box then dashed out. Shepard turned the corner to follow him, but he threw himself back, nearly knocking her off her feet as his boots slid on a slick patch of pavement. Grabbing hold of the container with one hand, Shepard grabbed him under his arm with the other and yanked him back in time for a rocket to explode against his shields. Two more flew wide, turning the box behind them into a tangled metal pretzel.

“Thanks.” He leaned against the metal, panting hard for a moment, then ducked out and ran ahead.

Shaking her head, she followed, calling up Tali’s tracker on her omnitool. They didn’t have time to let the Blood Pack lead them on a merry chase across all of Omega. They needed to be there if Tali got into trouble.

Ten metres ahead, Garrus ducked into a door, calling back, “They went in a container up here.”

Shepard ducked inside the container in time to see Garrus hit the back wall and turn back, utter confusion in his eyes.

“What? Oh damn.” Spinning around, she leaped toward the door, but it slammed in her face, the latches screeching into their brackets. She slammed her fists into the door, then her shoulder, but it stayed solidly, stubbornly closed. Spinning around, she glared into Garrus’s eyes.

“No goddamned way.” Stomping over, she slapped the heel of her hand against his armour. “You’re a fucking jinx, C-Sec.” She looked along the walls for any other way out before she allowed the words to form. “Sweet baby Jesus, we’re bloody locked in here.”
I wonder if Aria finds herself sufficiently entertained.
Shepard turned on Roger’s flashlight, shining the beam around the inside of the dark container. “It’s a fucking meat locker.” Shepard bounced her fingers off Garrus’s chest again as her hands began to tremble. “We’re trapped in a goddamned meat locker. I can’t believe this.” Shepard felt the collar of her armour tightening around her neck, her breathing coming faster and more shallow.

Locked in a dark, frozen cage.

Closing her eyes tight, she pushed back against the walls as they pressed in, she forced herself to slow her breathing. Freaking out wouldn’t solve anything.

“We can’t be locked in. Maybe it’s just stuck.” Garrus brushed past Shepard to throw his shoulder into the door a couple of times. “Damn.”

Shepard prowled to the end of the huge freezer container, thumping the walls with the butt of her gun, trying to find another exit. They needed to get out. Damn it! She needed to get out for Tali . . .

You need to get out for yourself, you bloody coward. Tali’s got a whole squad backing her up.

She turned on Garrus, all her terror and frustration boiling over to sizzle in the flames. “This one is all on you, C-Sec. I wasn’t the one who yelled, ‘They went in there!’” She held out her hands and turned a slow circle, then punched what looked like a side of frozen varren. “Why would anyone come in here except to hang meat?” Rolling her eyes, she returned to the door and started banging on the reinforced metal with her gun. No one would ever hear her hand.

Walls this thick, no one is going to hear your gun either, Shepard. Face it, you’re caged.

No. No, not caged, just waylaid. If they had to, they could shoot the lock off the door, surely.

Bullets will probably ricochet, and kill you both.

She heard him mutter under his breath, but her translator didn’t pick it up. “What is it with you getting me trapped in deadly situations?” he asked, talons searching along the edges of the door.

Yanking herself back off the cracking, black ice, Shepard turned to him, her flashlight cutting a path of sanity across the space. “Don’t be a drama queen. The situation isn’t deadly, except maybe for Tali.” She winced at that last as she saw his mandibles drop. She opened her mouth, an apology almost making it to her teeth before she sucked it back. Unfair as it might be, she needed to stay pissed at him. Hell, she needed him to stay pissed at her. “We’ll just bang on the door. It’s a dock, someone will hear and lets us out.”

Bristling, Garrus held his hand up to block her light and glared at her. “I’m sorry, it looked like they came in here. It’s possible they ran into the next container.”

Shepard laughed, hard and sharp. “It’s possible?” She returned to the far corner, lifting her hands to cup her mouth. “Hello? Invisible Blood Pack members? Hello?” Spinning back, she fixed him with narrow eyes. “I’d say that it’s definite they went into another container . . . or no container at all. Oh, yeah, and then they locked us in this one.” She spun away to hammer on the back wall. “It’s freezing in here. You did this on purpose. You liked the cuddling for warmth on Feros, didn’t you?”

He sputtered and turned away to throw his shoulder into the door. “No! I was dying of hypothermia.” Slam. “You throw enough heat to replace the center of an average yellow sun.” Slam. He spun back around and flung his arms up. “I didn’t do this on purpose.” He cast around them. “Do you see some cozy little make-out nest in here, Shepard? No! You see slabs of dead animals.” He shoved a carcass out of his way, sending the whole line of them swinging. “Being trapped in a meat locker with a paranoid claustrophobe is not my idea of romantic.”

She returned to hammering on the walls with her rifle. “Just quit your bellyaching and start hitting the damned walls before I give in to the urge to shoot you in your assless.”

He glared at her, his brow plates low, mandibles tight. “Oh, right. The terrible Captain Shepard, scourge of the galaxy.” He turned back to the door, banging on the thick metal with the butt of his sidearm. “I’m terrified, baby sister.” Silence dropped like a boulder. He froze statue-still for a heartbeat before spinning to face her, his expression horrified. “Shepard, I’m sorry. I didn’t mean . . . . That was disrespectful . . . .”

Iron submersed in liquid nitrogen, Shepard’s entire body snapped cold and brittle.

Bright ginger ringlets bounced, almost merry . . . obscene against the fire-red cheeks streaked with filth, tears and snot . . . against the screams. “Janey!” her name burst out shrill, lacerating the air. “Janey! Don’t let them take me!”

Stumbling, Shepard fell into the frost-caked wall, the cold driving away the screams as her brow melted into it. Turning to look at him without lifting her head from the cold, she whispered, “What did you just say?” As mercurial and lithe as a puma, she leaped forward, grabbing the yoke of his armour. Flipping him over her hip, she threw him down hard on his back and straddled his waist. “How did you find out?” She seized the guard at the front of his cowl and shook him. “How fucking far into my life did you dig, Vakarian? Those records are supposed to be sealed.”

All emotion bled from Garrus’s face as they stared into one another’s eyes. “Shepard?” He sat up, lifting her off and setting her on her feet. When she slapped his hands away, they dropped to his lap. “What are you talking about?”

She shook her head, eyes tearing away to the floor as she turned her back to him. “It’s nothing. I misunderstood.” Her sharp sigh crystallized as it bounced off icy walls. “Let’s focus on getting the hell out of here before we lose Tali.” She pounded her palm against the door. “Anyone out there? We’re locked in here.”

“Shepard, that wasn’t nothing. Spirits, what did you think I said?” He pressed one hand to the frosty metal and leaned down, trying to meet her eyes.

She banged again, not willing to let him snag her gaze. “Help! Anyone! Open the door!”

“Shepard, we’re friends.” Out of the corner of her eye, she saw his mandibles drop and make a helpless looking little flail.

She cut a glance sideways, meeting his stare for a fraction of a second. Shuttering the windows, she reinforced the walls. “This isn’t about friendship, C-Sec. It’s about staying functional.” She banged on the door. “Help! We’re locked in.”

“Shepa—”

She threw up a hand to silence him and closed her eyes, listening. . . . straining to hear outside their prison. Boots scuffed on concrete alongside the right-hand wall. The trusty alarm in the back of her head screamed a warning, and she launched herself at Garrus, her tackle driving him to the floor.

He grunted as they hit and rolled. “What the . . .?”

Gunfire cut off the rest of his protest, bullets ripping through the side of the container as if it were made of tin foil.

“Shepard called, reaching up to latch onto one of the large carcasses. Garrus grabbed hold of it just above her hands, the meat already absorbing projectiles meant to tear them to pieces. Together they hauled it down, taking cover behind the slab of dead animal. Still, Shepard’s shields sparked with impacts, going down with a flash and a whine.

She winced, preparing for the inevitable bullet impacts. Instead, the air left her lungs in a massive cough as Garrus threw himself over her, shielding her with his body.

The roar of automatic weapon fire seemed to last forever as she felt every jolt of every round that Garrus took for her. Silence felt so abruptly that it took a moment to register through the ringing in her ears. Garrus shifted and groaned.

“You okay?” she whispered. Other than having a turian elbow jabbing in the small of her back, Shepard didn’t feel anything needing attention.

“Few holes, nothing major.” He lifted himself off of her and hit his medigel.

The latch squeaked and drew back with a clang. Shepard shrugged Roger into her hands as she scrambled up and backed away, taking cover behind a side of space cow.

Garrus stood, moving behind another dead animal before bending down to retrieve his assault rifle.

Shepard watched the door, leaving Roger’s flashlight on to shine in the eyes of whomever opened the door, but it just settled open about an inch and stayed that way. Garrus moved as if to step forward, but she shook her head. Vorcha-like breathing wheezed and hissed on the other side. They needed to wait the Blood Pack out. Not her favourite strategy, but they needed every advantage they could get.

The door squeaked open a couple of inches, a flamethrower nudging through. Shepard hid the glare of her omnitool behind the space cow and called up sabotage. She saw a low flash from Garrus’s arm and knew he had overload ready to go.

“Smell blood. Human and turian dead,” the vorcha declared, opening the door.

Shepard glanced at Garrus and nodded. Their omnitools flared, the blast from the pyro’s tanks exploding peeled back one of the doors while the other flew into the container and slammed into Shepard’s cover, throwing her on her ass.

A krogan, his face bleeding and torn to hell, stumbled in the door, roaring at the top of his lungs. Shepard scrambled to get onto her feet, but knew within a heartbeat that she didn’t stand a chance. Blood rage and flaming armour bellowed at her and charged. Shepard rolled to the side, using her momentum to flip onto her feet, fully expecting her bones to be pulverized into flour about the same time she stood.

Instead, the sound of armour smashing into armour was followed by the sound of armour hitting metal and no pain.

“If you could shoot him . . ..” Garrus grunted, flying backwards to slam through a varren and two space cows before impacting the wall in a shower of frost.

Shepard launched her drone to distract the krogan from Garrus and opened fire, circling around toward the door. Keeping up three round bursts to avoid overheating Roger, she riddled the krogan’s head with bullets, blinding him. “You up, C-Sec?” she called.

“Yeah, and moving.” The harsher cough of his sniper rifle barked, echoing metallically off the walls. The krogan flailed then went down, most everything above his shoulders reduced to red putty. Shepard pressed against what was left of the one door and peered out. She didn’t see anyone else waiting for them.

“We’re clear,” she called over her shoulder. When Garrus limped over to her, blood ran down the right side of his head and stained his armour in a handful of places. She grabbed hold of his shoulders, not liking the dazed look in his eyes. “C-Sec, look me in the eye. You okay? Did you hit your head?” She pulled him down to look at the wound in his head. It didn’t look too bad, but who knew what hid under those plates.

“Repeat after me, Brother C-Sec. Glory be to the Enkindlers.”

He met her gaze squarely, his pupils reacting to the light when she shone her flashlight square in his face. His one brow plate rose as he pushed her gun away. “I’m not saying that.”

She grinned. “Well, you can’t be too out of it, then. You feeling sick? Head hurt?” she asked. When he didn’t answer, she patted his cheek. “I think I’d better call the Normandy, have them come get you.”

He shook his head, wincing as he did. “I’m okay, Shepard. He just threw me against the wall hard enough to rattle my brain.” He switched guns and reached out to give her shoulder a reassuring pat. “I’m good to go.”

After watching him for another few seconds, she sighed, then nodded. “Okay, let’s move, but if you start feeling sick or your head ramps up, tell me. Don’t try to tough it out. We’ve got a long way to go, and I need . . ..” She turned abruptly to her omnitool and called up Tali’s tracker. “They’ve got a hell of a lead on us.” She took off at a smart jog, covering ground in long, loping strides.

When Garrus caught up to run at her side, he cut a glance over at her. “Hey, about before . . . even though you hide it pretty damned well, and you have most of the rest of them fooled, never think I don’t see all the anger and pain you hide under the good-ol’-crazy Shepard routine.”

She clenched her jaw as he slammed into her wall, knocking a huge chunk out of the corner. Damn him and his perceptiveness. Shaking her head, she threw the piece back into the hole and boarded it up. “My pain is my business, C-Sec. It’s not open for discussion.”

A rumble escaped his second larynx. “Fair enough, but if you ever want that to change, you know where to find me.” He stared at her for a couple of strides before turning his attention back to watching the path ahead.

Shrugging, Shepard swallowed what felt like a cluster of pinecones, waiting until they reached the bottom before she nodded, one rigid jerk down then back up. She glanced sideways, then snapped back to eyes forward, searching for ambush, mind on the mission. Still, the damned warmth his words forced down through her shields refused to dissipate, just settling in her gut.

She cleared her throat. “And, C-Sec . . . thanks. I appreciate the turian shield, but you aren’t expendable. You can’t just keep throwing yourself between me and anything that comes along.”

His brow plates and mandibles dropped. “You’re not expendable either, Shepard.” They paused at the end of a street, checking to be sure the way ahead was clear before rounding the corner.

“That’s kind of you to say, but it’s just plain not true.” A finger raised from her gun cut off his protest. “I’m the most disposable person on this mission, C-Sec. I have no credibility. I can’t bring this galaxy together other than from behind the scenes. You have a tremendous amount of credibility. Add your father to that . . ..” She glanced over and smiled in response to his chuff. “Oh, come on, you know it’s true, and you know he’d support you.”

“Father or no father, I can’t run a war by myself, Shepard.” Garrus pressed his back to the wall as they came to a half-open door that twitched and sparked across the only street entrance for blocks.

They took cover to either side of the street. The entrance to the district at ground level formed a natural choke point. Shepard’s gut tightened. Perfect place for an ambush. If the Blood Pack had holed up in—Shepard glanced at the sign—Kima District, they’d have guards watching the entrance from strategic positions.

She nodded to Garrus. “Watch my back, I’m going to try to flush out their sentries.”

“Make sure to live long enough to explain your ‘Shepard can’t fight and win this battle’ theory.” His mandibles’ uneasy flutter and the wariness in his gaze underscored his words.

Shepard launched her drone through the malfunctioning gate first. Nothing. No enemies laid in wait. No pedestrians walked between buildings. No cars moved through the air above. She swung around the gate, stalking forward, eyes in constant motion, but she saw nothing, felt nothing. Black, empty windows stared down, sightless eyes on the faces of the dead buildings. Nothing moved. Nothing even breathed. At the end of the block, she waved Garrus up to join her.

“This district is creepy as hell,” he muttered under his breath.

She nodded, agreeing completely.

Tali’s tracker stopped moving several blocks ahead, near the center of the district. Hopefully the young quarian was able to plant the bug on one of the leaders before Nihlus moved in to pull her out. A soft smile accompanied a blush of colour across her cheeks as she realized how far they’d come in just a couple short weeks. When they started out, she hadn’t trusted Nihlus as far as she could have tossed him. Now, she knew without a doubt that he’d get her people out or die trying.

She dragged her attention back to the endless, empty streets. “They do not undersell the whole Omega is a dump angle,” Shepard whispered. “Look at all this, a whole district, just abandoned.”

“Too far out to fall under the protection of one of the less notorious gangs,” Garrus agreed. He loped along beside her, his stride easy and steady, allaying her fears that he’d gotten himself concussed or worse. “Good place to hide out if you’re a criminal organization.”

Shepard grinned. “Or a renegade organization hiding from the council to fight the Reapers.” She shrugged when he glanced over at her. “What? A girl isn’t allowed to dream a little? Imagine it, C-Sec. An army holed up on Omega where the council fears to tread. Docks filled with geth and quarian built cruisers and dreadnoughts, Alliance and turian built stealth frigates.” She grinned. “Oh, yeah, we could give the Reapers pause, my friend.”

The certainty of it filled her and she nodded again. “We could give the Reapers pause.”

Another three streets along, Shepard slid to a halt, motioning for Garrus to do the same. She strained, trying to hear the faint noises over the blood rushing through her ears. “Do you hear that, C-Sec?”

He nodded. “Shouting, overlapping voices.”

“Bal’Nara!” Tali’s voice shouted in Shepard’s ear. “Bal’Nara!”

Shepard took off running, her heart dropping into her boots as gunfire erupted like fireworks on a quiet evening. They were still so far away. Lungs working like a forge bellows, legs churning, feet pounding against the pavement, she drove herself harder and faster toward the firefight. Why was there a firefight? What had gone so wrong that Tali needed to use her panic word?

“Damn,” Nihlus called out on the squad’s frequency. “They’ve got Tali upstairs. Alenko and Jenkins, get up there, we’ll cover you. Wrex and Williams, keep pushing into the interior.”

Holding her fear clutched tight in an iron fist, she leaped over a bench and climbed a hastily built barricade. On the other side, she dropped down onto a bridge. A handful of dead vorcha and a dead krogan lay strewn the length of the bridge, and as she looked up into the building at the other end, Shepard could see shadows moving in the frenetic dance of battle.

“Ashley’s down!” Nihlus called on the radio. “Alenko, pull her back. Jenkins, move up to take her cover. Keep the pressure on.”

Shepard dug in harder, leaping over the dead bodies in her path. Bullets peppered her shields as she hit the far side of the bridge and the entrance to the building. She took cover behind a pillar, leaning out to note the enemy number and position. Looking to Garrus, she motioned for him to jump through a blown out window and try to circle around to a flanking position. When he moved into the open, she leaned out, firing across the Blood Pack’s positions then concentrating on a varren that charged down the stairs from the second floor.

“Sparky, watch your nine,” the call came from Wrex that time.

Garrus pinged her radio when he reached cover on her right flank. She gave him to the count of three to settle himself then dashed up to the next cover. Another varren charged down the stairs. She launched her drone. At least they were pulling some of the pressure off the rest of the squad.

She took down two vorcha as her drone drove them out of cover, moving up into what looked like a lobby and cafeteria area. The fighting upstairs sounded as though it were directly overhead. Three more vorcha went down before the main floor was cleared. Moving to the stairs, she and Garrus stayed in cover behind the railing.

“Shepard and Vakarian coming up the stairs,” she alerted them over the radio. Standing for a moment, she launched her drone into the room above the exit. The fighting was concentrated there.

“Nihlus is down!” Kaidan called. “Jenkins, can you get to him?”

“No. Krogan between us.”

Shepard darted up the stairs and down the hall, taking cover against the door jam. Ducking out into the room, she spotted her team members, their backs all to her, but for Nihlus who was down over by a balcony overlooking the bridge. A krogan stood over him.

The Blood Pack Warrior lifted a foot to stomp on the turian Spectre’s head. Shepard hit him with overload, throwing him off enough that his foot came down on Nihlus’ chest instead. Still, the sound of bones and plates cracking under the pressure nearly made her throw up. She channelled it into unleashing first sabotage and then bullets, lots and lots of bullets, tearing up the krogan’s armour and plates until he finally went down and didn’t get back up.

A moment later, the gunfire died out.

“All clear,” Kaidan called.

“All clear,” Jenkins replied.

“Clear,” Ashley groaned.

Shepard leaped out of her cover and ran over to Nihlus, her hand reaching up for her radio even before she hit the ground on her knees. Blood bubbled from the Spectre’s nose and mouth in a cobalt froth. Shepard hit his medigel with one hand.

“Normandy. We need immediate medevac on my location. Nihlus has been critically wounded.” Shepard glanced over at Ash. “How are you doing?”

“Couple of bullet holes in my leg,” she said, grunting with the pain. “I’ll live, but I can’t walk.”

“Normandy, Williams requires medevac as well.” Shepard hit Nihlus’s medigel again. Hopefully it would help ease his internal bleeding. She checked him over with gentle hands, finding a lot of shotgun damage to the belly of his armour. She left the armour in place, not wanting to move him. She stroked his neck. He moaned a little, one hand sliding across the floor to lay over hers.

“Don’t worry,” she said, keeping her voice soft and confident. “You’re going to be fine. Dr. Chakwas is on her way to lock you back in medbay prison for a couple of days.” She took his hand and held it.

“How is everyone else?” she asked, looking up. “Any other injuries?” She glanced back at Garrus, but he shook his head, indicating that he was fine.

“The rest of us are fine, Captain.” Alenko said, crouching next to her.

“Tali?” Shepard looked for the young quarian, finding her standing next to a male quarian, her arms crossed.

“Very angry,” Tali replied, “but otherwise fine, Captain.”

Shepard wanted to rip the place apart, find out what the hell had gone wrong, but held her peace. Nihlus didn’t need people freaking out around him.

“Where do you think you’re going?” Tali barked, grabbing the other quarian’s arm. “Sit, and don’t move.” Shepard’s eyebrows rose. She’d never seen Tali so furious.

“Don’t . . .” Nihlus whispered, his voice thick and clotted, air gurgling through blood.

“Sh,” Shepard said, caressing his brow gently. “Don’t worry, I’ll take care of everything once the doc gets here.” She smiled. “You know me, I’ve got some pretty impressive skills. I’ll figure it out.
You just save your strength.”

The doctor arrived with three helpers a few minutes later.

Shepard bent over to kiss Nihlus’s cheek. “I’ll see you back on the Normandy,” she said then stood and got out of the way.

“Okay, what in the great land of fuck happened here?” She strode over to Tali, checking the quarian for injuries. “You’re sure that you’re all right?”

She nodded, looking ready to kill someone. “My father is what happened, Shepard.” She tossed a furious hand at the quarian seated next to her. “We had everything well in hand. We were just about back here, and he appeared out of nowhere and started shooting.”

“You were their prisoner,” a heavily accented, male voice protested. He jumped up as if to admonish his daughter, but Tali just pushed right back.

“I was bait in a trap that would have led us to the rest of our people!” Tali shouted. “That’s why five people jumped in when you opened fire . . ..” She bit off the rest. “Sit down before you make things worse.”

“Okay.” Shepard held up her hands to still the argument. She looked up at Garrus. “You need to go back with the doc anyway and get your head looked at, so will you please transport Rael’Zorah back to the Normandy and make sure that he stays out of trouble?” Leaning down so her face was at a level with the admiral’s mask, she pressed in on him. “If Nihlus dies because of your interference . . ..” She shook her head. “Well, you’d better just hope he doesn’t.”

“I’m a member of the . . ..” He protested, standing up and pushing her back.

Shepard raised both index fingers, shutting him up instantly. “A member of your admiralty board has already tried murdering me. Trust me when I say that particular argument won’t get you anywhere.” She nodded to Garrus. “Get him out of my sight before I lose my temper.”

Garrus grasped the elder quarian’s upper arm, hauling him toward the shuttle. Shepard turned her back to the admiral’s indignant protests, missing what Garrus grumbled in reply as she looked over where the doctor readied Nihlus for transport. Her heart sank into her gut at the expression on Chakwas’s face, but she blinked back the burning in her eyes and clenched her jaw. No reason to mourn yet, and she could freak out once everyone was safely back aboard the ship.

“Jenkins, Wrex, Sparky, Tali. Strip this place. Take every single thing that isn’t tied down. Hopefully we can find something to lead us to Saren.” That said, she strode over to Ashley. “Can I give you a hand there, Chief?”

Ashley reached up, locking wrists. “Thanks, Skipper.” She pulled herself up, then slung an arm around Shepard’s shoulders. “Hm, you’re the exact right height.” A tight smile accompanied her jest.

Shepard chuckled. “I knew being size small had to be handy for something other than crawling through ducts and tunnels.” She helped the chief limp to the waiting shuttle. “What’s your take on what happened, Ash?”

Williams shook her head. “Just what Tali said. We were shadowing, staying back, then suddenly guns were going off. Nihlus moved us up, and we fought our way in here. Got here fast enough to save Tali and the rest of the quarians. Nihlus put himself between them and the krogan. We took most of them out, but that one closed faster than we could shoot.”
“Wait . . .” Shepard stopped and raised her eyebrows. “. . . and the rest of the quarians?”

Ashley nodded toward a room on the other side of the stairs. “Six of them. Just scared kids.”

“We’re going to need another shuttle.” Shepard sighed. “Okay. When you get aboard and are being patched back together, please ask Verblovski to find us seven cots, blankets, etc. We’ll let them bunk in the gym.” Once Ash was settled in a seat, Shepard returned upstairs, meeting Dr. Chakwas and Nihlus’s gurney at the top of the stairs.

“How is he doing, Doc?” she asked, reaching out to give the Spectre’s fingers a gentle squeeze.

Chakwas gestured for the Marines to precede her down the stairs, waiting until Nihlus was out of earshot before she spoke. “It doesn’t look good, Shepard, but I’ll do what I can.” She started down the stairs.

Shepard nodded, not making eye contact. “If you need anything, just shout.”

Chakwas turned back. “Actually, Shepard. There’s supposed to be a gifted salarian surgeon on Omega. Runs a clinic in one of the other districts. I could use his help if you can find him.”

“Consider him found, Doc.” Shepard opened a channel as she jogged back into the bunk room to wave Tali over. “C-Sec, I know your head is probably killing you, but are you up to another little adventure?”
Chapter Summary

A Sassy of a whole different colour. AKA: Garrus, get your mandibles up off the floor. The intrepid duo search for Mordin Solus.

Shepard and Garrus caught a lift with the second shuttle, jumping out at the transit station a half block from Afterlife’s front door. Shepard stared up at the sign for a moment, praying she didn’t have to crawl before Aria to find out where Dr. Solus was. She would for Nihlus’s sake, but the idea left a very bad taste in her mouth.

Forcing the image of blood bubbling from Nihlus’s nose and mouth into the back of her head, she took a deep breath, trying to control the fear that clenched its fist in her guts. She’d lost so many over the years, but . . . . Not Nihlus. Not after all the crap they’d made it through in the last couple of weeks.

Get moving, you idiot. Standing here panicking isn’t helping.

“Okay,” she said, looking up into Garrus’s eyes as she shook off the dread. A plan always forced back the madness. Keep busy, work the plan. “We’ll split up. Ask the civilians first, and pray to the great glowing asses of the Enkindlers someone knows something.” She gave him a quick nod and hurried over to a small cluster of humans in expensive clothes.

“Hi, there,” she said, giving them her best, least crazy-looking smile. It fit like someone washed and tumble-dried it on hot. “A friend of mine was hurt and taken to a local doctor. I was wondering if you knew where to find the clinic? A Dr. Solus works there.”

They gave her dismissive head shakes then turned their backs, pointedly ignoring her. She didn’t know which she hated more, snobs or being ignored.

She grasped the closest woman by the shoulders and spun her around. “You are so adorable. I could just eat you up!” Shepard kissed both of the horrified woman’s cheeks. “You guys have been so sweet. Thank you. I’ll remember meeting you always. Glory hallelujah and praise be to the Enkindlers for your help, brothers and sisters.” She gave them a full on crazy smile with a side of ‘I know where you live, so sleep lightly’ then moved on.

Okay, being ignored wins by a slight margin.

She approached a couple of salarians, sliding her poorly fitting smile back into place. “Hello gentlemen, you wouldn’t be able to help me find a Dr. Solus, would you?”

“As long as you don’t kiss us,” one said, smoothing the wrinkles in his suit. His eyes widened, looking positively terrified by the possibility of a human touching him with her lips.

Shepard chuckled, hope pushing aside her anger. “I promise, not a single smooch.”

“Gozu district,” the one salarian said, “but you won’t get in. That’s Blue Suns territory. Mordin won’t pay protection. They tried to shake him down, he shot them all, bandaged up the ones he didn’t kill, and then tossed them out.” The slender alien chuckled nervously and glanced around as Shepard began to suspect that Aria’s turf formed a sort of neutral ground where all the gangs could have a presence but no power. In an odd sort of way, it made the megalomaniacal asari the champion of the little guy on the station.

“Point is,” his kiss-phobic companion said, straightening his tunic again, “Blue Suns control the whole district. You go in like that, won’t make it past the transit depot.”

Frowning, Shepard held out her arms, looking down at herself. “Why? What’s wrong with the way I look?” Damn, they were right. Alliance soldier through and through.

“You’re Alliance, and your friend . . .” He nodded at Garrus. “. . . if he’s not turian military or C-Sec, my grandmother is a krogan.” His brows raised a little, his huge brown eyes widening a little. “Does my family owe me an explanation?”

Shepard chuckled and shook her head. “No, your family history isn’t in question.” She screwed her mouth off to one side in a thoughtful scowl. They needed a way in, and fast. Crawling through ducts? Stepping back, she looked up, searching for vents. Maybe, but without a sound knowledge of the systems, they could end up sucking vacuum or falling into a life support plant. Not to mention the complications of trying to squeeze Garrus through the tight spots.

“The Blue Suns know everyone who belongs in their districts,” the first one said. “On Omega, you stick to your district; stay close to the gang you pay protection to. No careless wandering.”

“That is not good news, salarian brother. I don’t suppose either of you has a detailed schematic of the duct and ventilation system in your back pocket?” Shepard looked around, her eyes landing on a small group of Blue Suns entering Afterlife. They might be able to sneak in disguised as Blue Suns, but finding a set of their armour that fit her wouldn’t be an easy task.

“Why is it so important you talk to Mordin Solus?” the first one asked. He shifted closer to her. “You have any intel on him?”

Shepard shook her head. “You have just given me twice as much as I came up here with. A friend was hurt badly during a fight against the Blood Pack. Our doctor said Dr. Solus might be able to help.”

“Blood Pack?” Kiss-phobic scratched at a long scar down the side of his face.

She nodded at it, feeling an opening forming. “They do that?”

“I wandered, didn’t have any creds to pay my way back out.” He nodded. “There’s a way, if you can pull it off.” He gave her a haughty, cunningly superior look.

“She’s Alliance.” The first one looked her up and down, casting a worried scowl at his companion. “They’re as covert as influenza.”

“Wait.” Shepard perked up. “I’m a pretty decent actress when I need to be. What’s the way in?” She felt the seconds ticking past as they stared at her and deliberated. “And what’s it going to cost me?”

Kiss-phobic sighed. “Did you kill all the Blood Pack who hurt your friend?”

“Yeah, took out about twenty all told.”
His eyes narrowed as he grinned. “Then you’ve paid my fee, but we’re not responsible when you get yourself shot.”

“Understood.” She leaned in, trying to impress upon them the urgency of her timeline. “My friend really needs me to hurry.”

“There is a human lives close to Mordin’s clinic. He’s married, but Blue Suns smuggle in females discreetly. Rumours say mutually beneficial arrangement. He funds suspect ventures for the Suns.” Kiss-phobic looked her up and down again. “Tell Blue Suns that you’re going to see Patrick Donovan, that you’re interviewing for a housekeeper position. You’ll need different clothes.”

Shepard nodded. Something moved behind the salarian’s eyes. It didn’t feel like a set up, but even if it was, if it got them into the district past the Suns, they could deal with the fall out. “Thanks for the information.” She turned and lifted a hand, calling Garrus over to her as she strode toward the door to the upper markets.

“Good luck,” kiss-phobic called after them.

“Did you find out where Solus is?” Garrus asked, settling in stride next to her.

“Gozu district. Apparently getting past the Blue Suns will be a problem. They control the district, and Solus isn’t overly popular with them.” She looked around, seeing Blue Suns scattered here and there, walking in pairs or small groups.

He patted his sidearm. “There’s the old-fashioned way. From what I see, it would be doing Omega a favour.”

Shepard shook her head, not that she didn’t understand his desire to clean them out. “Nihlus doesn’t have time for the two of us to wage a gang war and fight our way through a couple hundred Blue Suns. Not that Omega couldn’t use a good gang purge.” She palmed the door, trotting down the stairs when it opened. “No, this is going to require subterfuge, Brother C-Sec.” She switched to her hard-boiled detective voice and winked. “We’re going to have to be sneaky, see?”

She palmed the door at the bottom of the stairs and stepped through. “Those salarians told me there is a prominent underworld figure, Patrick Donovan, who has women smuggled in.” She looked him up and down. “Shouldn’t be too hard to find you a disguise. Me . . . I’m going to have to do a little shopping.”

“Shopping? And this won’t take as long as shooting our way through?” He shook his head. “I don’t know.” He met her gaze and shook his head again. “No, I don’t like or trust the look in your eyes right now. Let’s just go. Maybe they’ll let us through.”

“Find a Blue Sun your size. I’ll meet you back here in five minutes.” Not waiting for him to confirm, then pointedly ignoring his protests as he called after her, Shepard ran across the market into a clothing store.

“Oh, my,” the asari attendant said and sighed. “Look at you. Need something to smooth out the rough edges, do we?”

“Mmm, indeed,” Shepard asked. “I’m looking for something to drive my man wild. Think you can help?”

The blue beauty winked at her. “You’ve come to the right place. What sort of occasion is it? Demure? Formal? Racy?” She moved to one of the racks and started sorting through.
Shepard cocked her hip and tapped her fingertip against her lower lip. “More of a jaw hitting the floor, forgetting his own name sort of occasion.”

The asari chuckled and pulled out a hangar. “You’re in luck. We just got this in.”

“Shoes? Do you have any that will work with this dress?” Shepard took the hangar and hurried back to the curtained area. She stripped off her armour and wriggled into the dress in under a minute. Time gnawed at her, a clock ticking away every second as she forced her last glimpse of Nihlus into the back corner of her mind. The memory made her hands tremble, and she couldn’t afford trembling. She needed to remain icy cool for her plan to have a prayer of working.

She turned to look at the deep black, sparkling fabric of the dress. “Holy crap!” she squawked. “There’s more collar than there is dress.” It barely covered her backside and holes spaced down its length revealed bits of herself she was pretty sure had never seen the light of day. Her bra showed everywhere, so she took it off, just barely restraining the urge to clamp her arms over her chest.

As she turned to face the mirror head on, the pain in her chest she’d felt when Nihlus called her a whore returned. It swelled until it was all she could do to turn from the mirror instead of smashing it. If Nihlus saw her wearing that dress, he’d never look at her with anything other than disgust ever again. She swallowed her nausea and blinked back the burning in her eyes.

You’re not working with Nihlus right now, you’re trying to save his damned life, so woman up, goddamn it. Work the hell out of this fucking thing.

“Shoes, love.” The asari slipped a pair of massive stiletto heels under the curtain. “The way those things make you walk, his jaw won’t just hit the floor, it’ll fall clean off.”

Shepard clung to the walls as she put them on. “Lovely.” She turned, her eyebrows rising. They did make her legs look spectacular. She clapped her hands on her backside. “Day-um. Where did this ass come from?”

“It’s the shoes, love,” the sales girl replied from the other side of the curtain.

Shepard’s eyebrows went up. “Magic shoes. Now I’ll just need the grace of the mighty Enkindlers to keep from breaking both ankles. Okay, I’ll wear it out. Do you have a bag I could use for my armour, please?”

A large shopping bag appeared under the curtain. “Thanks so much.” Shepard shoved her armour and normal, sane, I’ve-never-been-paid-for-sex clothes into the bag, took a deep breath and stepped out through the curtain. She winced as the asari wolf whistled.

“You’re going straight out?” the clerk asked. When Shepard nodded to the affirmative, the asari winced. “No make up? And your hair could use a little . . .” She sighed and reached under the counter, pulling out perhaps the largest purse in the history of feminine luggage. “Hold still, it’ll take me only a few seconds to fix.”

Sprays, foams, cosmetics, and things Shepard were pretty sure constituted torture devices flew around her head, attaching to hair, eyelashes . . . ears. What the hell was the woman doing to her ears, and why did an asari have hair products?

Oh, sweet baby Jesus, let them be hair products.

As fast as the floral-scented storm hit, it abated and a mirror appeared in front of her face.

“Holy crap. I have eyelashes?” She batted the lengthy things at herself. She passed over her credit chit, wincing as the total for her street-walker attire appeared on the computer. Still . . . it had only taken seven and a half minutes to turn her into a woman. That had to be worth a decent tip.

“Good luck, honey. Oh, and pay attention to the underside of his fringe. He’ll be putty in your hands.” The asari waved.

Wait? What? She thought . . . C-Sec . . . Shepard stumbled, her ankle letting out a warning twinge. “Fringe . . . ah, yeah. Okay, thanks.” She tottered a little as she hurried back to the corner where she could see Garrus waiting for her, dressed and looking almost as uncomfortable in his Blue Suns armour as she felt in her disguise. “I hope I don’t have to run in these stilettos of death.”

“Okay, C-Sec, let’s roll,” she called, walking past him. She made it three or four metres before she realized he wasn’t following and turned back. “Hey, C-Sec, come on. Times wasting.”

His eyes slid right over her, and he scowled, searching for her. “Shepard?”

“The impressively sexy woman to your right, C-Sec.” She waved when he turned back. “Yeah, hi.
It’s me, not a ventriloquist act. Let’s go.”

Garrus’s mandibles hit the floor. “Sweet baby Jesus,” he whispered.

She laughed, a sigh whispering through her lips as he stared, but without a trace of condemnation. “You don’t even know what that means.” She crooked her finger. “Did you make sure your uniform donator won’t be found?”

He nodded as he stepped up next to her, his mouth still hanging open. “What? How?” His mouth clacked shut. “Your hair . . . and eyes . . .” His eyes slid down to her bare chest and shoulders. “And, you have . . . .”

“Yes, I have boobs, collarbones, elbows, a navel . . . all sorts of body parts. Who knew? Okay, so if they ask at the transit hub, Patrick Donovan is interviewing housekeepers.” She palmed the door into the district.

“Housekeepers?” He stepped into the elevator down. “Dressed like that? You’re practically . . . .”

“You’re going to have to sell it. That means no mandibles dragging behind you.” She laid her hand on his chest. “Can you sell it?”

He twitched a little, his eyes nervously glancing down at her hand. After a second, he cleared his throat and nodded. “Yeah. Can you?”

She chuckled. “Oh, yeah, no worries. A lot less skin has gotten me into tighter places. Hold my arm. Good and tight.”

He gripped her upper arm and braced his elbow under hers. “I’m not dragging in a prisoner.”

The elevator opened to reveal four Blue Suns guarding the transit depot. She leaned into him. “I know. You’re keeping me from falling over in these stupid, Enkindler-cursed shoes. I haven’t walked a block yet and already my toes are screaming.” She passed him the shopping bag with her armour and weapons in it, leaning her chest into him as she stared up adoringly, batting her eyelashes. “Will you please carry my bag, Mr. Big Strong Turian? I’m just a little helpless woman.” More batting.

He grumbled, a grudging chuckle following it out. “Back off, I’m . . . ahh . . . immune to your . . . .” He shooed her away with a hand. “. . . whatever. Just do . . . the thing it is you . . . um, need to do.”

Shepard chuckled. “Yeah, immune. That’s why your tongue has tied itself in a knot.” She took a deep breath, sealing all her nerves and worries behind the well-practiced wall. This was an old game, and one she played very well.

Garrus matched his speed to hers as she placed one foot in front of the other, swinging her hips, her back straight, her head high. Her lips curved in a soft, suggestive smile as the Blue Suns turned to face them. ‘You know you all want me,’ it whispered.

A human stepped forward. “Again? Damn, the man has an a hell of an appetite.”

Garrus chuckled. “I take it this isn’t the first applicant for the position?”

“Fourth in the last two days.” He turned and nodded to a batarian. “Set the car. The other end will deal with the lady’s trip back.”
Shepard brushed past the Blue Sun, dragging soft fingers over his cheek and down his neck. Leaning into him, she whispered. “Maybe he’s just looking for the right applicant?” Licking her lips and giving him a slow wink, she allowed Garrus to pull her away.

A frown creased the human Blue Sun’s forehead as he tore his eyes from her to Garrus. “I don’t know you. Is it your first time delivering? He usually keeps to the same couple of guys.”

“Yeah.” Garrus led Shepard toward the car. “Anything I should be aware of?”

“Yeah, a word to wise. You don’t need to stay and wait.” He made a slight cough and ducked his head, refusing to look at Shepard. “The less you see, the better, man.”

Shepard’s heart fell into her ridiculous heels. What the hell had they stumbled into? Had the salarians known? Dizziness made it feel as though the car was already moving. For a moment, it took every ounce of her self-control to keep her stomach from heaving all over her shoes. She’d have to chat with the helpful salarians later. Much later, after she sorted things out with Patrick Donovan.

Garrus nodded. “Good to know, thanks. Wouldn’t want to spend hours waiting for nothing.” He laughed, cold as ice, the tone making all of Shepard’s hair stand on end. “That sort of makes it ironic that he’s looking for a housekeeper, doesn’t it?”

All four of them laughed. Shepard forced her face to keep the slightly stupid, doe-eyed expression until Garrus climbed in next to her and pulled the top closed.

“Shepard,” Garrus warned softly, shaking his head as she stared across the car at him, her entire body rigid with fury. “We’ve got to get to Dr. Solus. We can report this Donovan guy when we’re done.”

“To whom, Garrus? The fucking Blue Suns run this district, and to them, sending four women to a horrific death over the course of two days is the most hilarious joke they’ve heard.” She bristled. “No. No way. We’ll find Mordin, and then I’ll go interview for my housekeeping position.”

Reaching into the back seat, she grabbed her bag of armour and guns, pulling her sidearm out.

“Where are you going to hide a gun in that dress?” he asked, lifting a brow plate.

“I won’t be hiding it.” She looked at him, serious as death. “You know I have to clean up this mess we found.”

He turned to look into her eyes for a long moment, then nodded. “I’ll have your back, Shepard.”

She let out a long breath. “Thanks. That means a lot.” Shaking her head, she let her guard down a little, affection bleeding into her stare for a fraction of a second. “No.” She nodded and turned to face the windscreen. “It means everything. For all the little girls who saw no other choice and ended up here unable to fight for themselves.”

The car settled down onto a street. On the driver’s side, a mansion grew out of the squalor, the polished granites and marbles obscenely out of place on Omega. Gardens lined the facade, their beauty indecent against the ugliness of everything on the other side of the wall of cedars. Shepard stared at the fountain, wondering how many women sat in her place over the months or years and stared up at the mansion believing all of their dreams had come true. Too many.

“Go ask where Mordin’s clinic is,” she whispered, nodding to a guard by the front gate. “He should be more than willing to tell one of his brothers. I’ll meet you across the street.” When he opened the door, she slipped out the passenger side, crouching down in cover against the fender.
She slipped off her shoes while she waited, listening for Garrus’s voice. As soon as he had the guard distracted, she bolted, keeping low and racing across the street to take cover behind a garbage bin. One hand reached up, yanking the back of her skirt down, a cool draft curling around her altogether too personally.

A couple of minutes later, Garrus strode across the street and around a corner. She checked to be sure the coast was clear, then darted after him, her bare feet silent on the gritty concrete. He waited halfway down the next block.

“The clinic is just around the next corner and down a level,” Garrus told her. “He warned me not to go in. Apparently Dr. Solus and his military-grade mechs shoot Blue Suns on sight.”

Shepard lifted into a quick jog, her heart slowing a little. “That’s okay, you can wait outside. I just have to ask him to help. Not like I’m expecting a firefight or anything.” Pausing outside the clinic door, she turned back. “I’ll be right back.”

The armed guards behind the counter grabbed Shepard’s attention the moment she stepped through the door. A giant side of beef with a head that sprouted straight of his shoulders gave her a clear view of his rifle as he said, “Behave yourself inside the clinic.”

“Sure thing.” She approached the only person who wore a white smock. “Hello. I need to speak to Dr. Solus, please?”

“He’s busy with a patient at the moment. If you could take a seat . . . .” The woman didn’t look up at Shepard, her tone making it clear that she considered herself too overworked and underpaid to actually give a shit.

Omega’s new bumper sticker. Omega: we just don’t give a shit.

“Sure.” She walked through the second door. Patients of all races sat scattered here and there, a couple lying on cots. Passing them all by, Shepard headed down a cross corridor.

“Miss! You can’t just go back there. You need to sign in,” the attendant called after her.

“I just need to speak with him for a moment, then I’ll get right out of your hair,” she called back. Two mechs stood at the end of the hall, their optical sensors following her, but apparently not registering pushy as a threat. The room on one side held a bunch of equipment, and on the other a human woman and a salarian stood over a patient.

“Patient responding well to treatment,” the salarian said. “Move him into other room to rest. If vitals continue to improve, will send home in twenty-four hours.” He looked up at Shepard and cocked his head as if trying to puzzle her out. “Mannerisms, posture not those of prostitute.” He scanned her with his omnitool. “Recent scar tissue from bullet wounds. Concussion fractures. Soldier.”

“Dr. Solus?” Shepard stepped through the door and shook her head. “Yeah, I’m not a hooker. I’m with the Alliance.” She shrugged. Udina flashing through her head in a moment of pure nausea. “They’re a whole different sort of pimp. I need to speak with you. My partner has been very badly injured, and my ship’s surgeon sent me to find you.”

“Too many patients needing me here. Cannot help you.” He brushed past her.

She followed. “He’s turian. His chest was crushed by a krogan. Dr. Chakwas didn’t seem very hopeful, but . . ..”
The salarian turned back. “Crushed? He was charged? Hit front or side?” He paced as he spoke, his voice and feet both gaining momentum as he went.

“No, he was down, lying on his side.” She turned sideways to show him the direction of the impact. “The krogan stomped down on him pretty much in the center of his upper arm.”

“Turian rib construction, problematic. Crushed from front, good chance of recovery. Keel structure spreads impact like parabolic arch.” He rested the elbow of one arm in his opposite hand, his fingers curled in front of his mouth. Stopping suddenly, he spun to face her, startling her a little. “Frothy blood from nose and mouth?” He didn’t wait for her to answer with more than a nod. “As I thought. Lung punctures, no doubt other internal organs perforated as well.” He gave her an empathetic shake of his head and sucked in a long, hissing breath through his nostrils. “Your partner’s survival not likely.”

Shepard nodded, giving him that. “Look, Nihlus is a good and honorable Spectre. I got dressed up in this ridiculous get up to sneak past the Blue Suns to find you, because he’s not going to make it without you. Please?” She looked away, staring at her filthy feet, bare and vulnerable looking against the floor. “He means a lot to me.”

“Nihlus Kryik?” Mordin asked, taking a step toward her.

Something in his rapid-fire voice sparked hope deep in her gut. “Yes. You know him?”

“Worked with him twice during my years in STG. Good Spectre.” He glanced around. “Nalah, call husband. Need extra security while I’m gone.” He turned from Shepard, hurrying around the space.

“You’re going somewhere, Dr. Solus?” The human woman stepped past Shepard.

“Yes, need to assist colleague performing problematic surgery. Will maintain radio contact if you need me.” He paused halfway through packing his bag to face Shepard. “Send me information, I have own ways in and out of district. Won’t need to dress like prostitute.” Another long, hissing breath. “Blue Suns cocky, arrogant. Makes it easy to slip around them.” He studied her for a moment, ceasing all movement for the first time since she arrived.

“Blue Suns let you in. Believed you going to service Patrick Donovan?” He stared for another heartbeat then started flitting around again, talking to himself about what he might need.

“You’re familiar with him? He’s a murderer, isn’t he? He does something terrible to the girls they bring him?” Shepard asked, her throat tightening with rage. Did everyone on the entire damned station know the sins of everyone else and just let them go?

Mordin paused and glanced back over his shoulder. “Yes, believe so, but familiar with reputation only. Spoke with Aria. Nothing I can do unless he comes into clinic and tries to injure staff or patients.”

Shepard let out a slow breath, relaxing her shoulders. It wasn’t like she expected a doctor to storm someone’s home commando-style, mowing down the Blue Suns that got in his way. “Everyone here uses everyone else, don’t they?” she asked, her voice barely louder than a whisper.

“Omega functions not according to laws or government. Strong live off the weak, the weak off those weaker. I run clinic. Help all who seek aid in good faith. One salarian, even a genius, cannot change Omega.” He closed his bag. “Information?”

Shepard nodded. “Oh right, sorry.” She sent him the Normandy’s docking information and Dr. Chakwas’s personal radio frequency. “Whatever happens, Dr. Solus... thank you for helping.
Nihlus."

“Pleased to assist. See you aboard your vessel when your work is finished.” He spun and ducked out through a panel in the back wall.

Shepard took a deep breath and headed back out front.

“Success?” Garrus asked when she walked out. Falling in step beside her, he kept glancing over as if waiting for her to detonate. He didn’t need to worry.

Detonation would wait until she had Patrick Donovan’s throat in her fingers. Every dead end since Eden Prime, every time they arrived too late, every stupid mistake that let Saren slip away . . . Patrick Donovan would taste them all before she blew.

She slipped a glance across at her friend, that warmth keeping the spark an arm’s length from the fuse. “Mordin is on his way. He has his own routes in and out of the Suns’ territory. I have another stop or two to make before I head back to the ship.” She ran up the stairs, her legs moving strong and solid, her entire body fortified with steel and rage. No one who lived on that god-forsaken station might give a crap, but she did, and she intended to clean up the one, tiny corner she could. If Nihlus died, at least something would have come out of the madness.
Shepard paused at the last corner and pressed herself against the concrete wall, peering out of her cover at the mansion, rising out of the squalor like . . .. The only image to enter her mind was a giant marble phallus hiding behind its locked gates and hedges.

Garrus stopped just behind her. “It’s not too late to change your mind, Shepard.”

She nodded, but then took a deep breath and shrugged. “Could you sleep at night knowing that we’d just walked away, or would you curl up in the mako wondering if another young woman was being brought for an interview?” Glancing back over her shoulder, she saw his mandibles drop.

His rumbled response came out with enough exasperated hiss that she didn’t need a translator to decipher that he wouldn’t feel any better about walking away than she did, but he’d never admit it.

She backed up a step, reaching behind her to grip his talons in her fingers. “Don’t leave once we get inside.”

“We go in together, we come out together.” He cleared his throat and nodded toward the car. “Come on, might as well get this over with and get back to the ship. My head is killing me.”

Shepard spun to look at him. “Are you all right?” She stood on her tiptoes and reached up, grasping his face between her hands. “Give me a break, C-Sec and lean down a bit.” When he did, she studied his pupils. They were the same size and stayed equally focused on her. “How bad is the headache if zero is no headache and ten is, sweet baby Jesus, someone just split my skull with an axe?”

He chuckled. “A four or five on the Shepard scale of insane pain range. I’ll be fine, I’m just ready for a shower and a day’s worth of sleep.” Patting her shoulder, he broke free and held out his arm. “Those shoes almost make your legs look turian or quarian.” A soft grunt greeted her elbow as it found a seam in his armour. “I mean, I’ll carry your assault rifle in, just in case.”

Shepard slipped on the horrible shoes and leaned into him a little as he latched onto her arm, helping hold her on her feet. She focused, timing her breathing to the beat of the leather soles against the concrete. Five steps breathing in, five steps breathing out. The extra oxygen made her muscles strong and sure, her heart pounding slow and steady. Anderson taught her the trick when she started training for the biathlon her senior year in high school.

“Some people are born warriors, kid,” he’d told her, “others need to fool their bodies and minds into believing they were born a warrior.” A decade later it still worked as well as it had back then, and she stopped at the car a warrior, inside and out. What awaited her inside that house was just another battlefield.

At the car, Garrus grimaced at her when she tucked her side arm into one of the holes in the dress at the small of her back. “You going to face him the entire time?” he grumbled under his breath.
“It’s a little more subtle than the Blue Sun thug who won’t leave my side because he’s carrying my gun.” She sighed and passed it over. “Fine, C-Sec, but if I need to shoot him and you have my gun, I’m going to punch you in the gut.”

Garrus chuckled and closed the car. “I’ll try to stay as close as I can without being obvious about it.” He took her arm again but waited for her to nod before setting out for the gate.

The human Blue Sun at the gate didn’t even look up at her, just hit the gate control and grunted in answer to Garrus’s nod. Clenching her fists, she reined in the urge to grab him and insist that he look her in the eye if he intended to usher her to her death. Instead, she faked a stumble and reached out to catch herself with a hand to his chest.

“Oh, sorry there, hun.” She stroked slow fingers across his cheek and leaned in, her lips brushing his ear lobe.

Garrus pulled her back against him, rumbling an exasperated oath once they’d put some distance between them and the guard. “Spirits, Shepard,” he whispered. “Just when I thought you might be regaining a little sanity. You’re going after the heart of the beast, don’t waste energy tweaking its nose.”

Shepard shuddered, not needing his admonition to remind her as the gate closed behind her, a cold, clammy palm sliding down her back. Another Sun opened the front door as they approached. She glanced up, the dark windows along the facade poised over her, hungry eyes eagerly waiting for her to pass through the door and be swallowed whole.

“You okay?” Garrus whispered when the door closed behind them. “You’re just playing crazy, right?”

“Sanity is overrated in these situations, Brother C-Sec. Glory hallelujah. Let’s get this done and get the hell back to the Enkindlers’ light.” She focused on her footfalls, but they seemed to mock her, the walls echoing them back three or four times, and her ankles hummed, taut strings under the drawn pressure of a bow.

“Straight through,” someone called from a side room.

Taking a deep breath, Shepard slowed her walk, placing her feet one directly in front of the other to exaggerate the sway of her hips. She pushed away from Garrus as she reached the end of the hall, taking her time, letting her entire body sway with each step.

"Cool and collected, Shepard. Play the game until he shows you what he is. You can’t kill a man because you suspect he’s a murdering bastard. You never know, he might be helping girls get off the streets, straighten out their lives." The thought prompted a very unladylike snort that, in turn, earned her a raised brow plate from Garrus.

A beaming, awestruck smile lit up her face as she flipped the switch and Captain Jane Shepard left the building in favour of Jane, small town colonial. Just before she stepped over the threshold, she ran her hands up her body, stretching her arms over her head with a little flip of her hands at the end.

"Celebrate it and flaunt it, Janey. Celebrate it and flaunt it.

She strode into a sitting room, a bright giggle bubbling from her. “Oh sweet baby Jesus, look at this place. It’s like I died and fell into Forbes magazine. Glory hallelujah and praise the sweet, sweet Enkindler’s light.”
Smoke drifted over the back of an antique wingback chair. “I don’t recall having any interviews booked for this evening,” a heavily accented male voice said in English.

What is that accent? Afrikaans?

Two quick steps carried her to a large, colorful painting of a garden in winter, asari statues dancing through the twilight snow. “Sweet baby Jesus, I can’t believe it. Winter Garden. This is one of the most valuable paintings in the entire galaxy.” She turned to look over her shoulder at the back of the chair and grinned. “And it’s not a fake, is it? Wow. You are a ruthless bastard.” She cut the words with a pointed shrug. “Fitting, I suppose. The asari artist was a complete loon. Murdered people and posed them like statues so that she could paint them. Wrote letters to her lover telling her all about her work.” She moved on to a sculpture, her fingers caressing the sleek lines. “Of course, her lover was her first victim. Centerpiece in a fountain if I remember correctly.” Letting out a merry sigh, she turned to face the chair as it rotated toward her. “Fantastic.”

Smoke drifted in a thick cloud around the human seated within the chair’s shadow. For a moment, they regarded one another, his stare so intense Shepard felt as though cold, rough hands rather than his gaze moved over her. Channelling her revulsion into hyperactive moment, she swayed her way over to pictures of a man riding horses. “This isn’t Omega.” She chuckled. “I think I would have noticed open fields and horses. Where is this? Doesn’t look like Earth. Terra Nova? Bekenstein?”

The new angle gave her a better view of the man, but her grin widened when she saw that the lighting and positioning of the furniture had been designed to keep him in shadow. She couldn’t make out his face, just the shine of those insanely intense eyes and that he sported a closely shorn beard and mustache. He wore a dark blue pinstripe suit, crisp pleats cutting both legs and sleeves, and wore it easily -- a man well used to money and power.

“I’ve got to tell you, you’ve got a whole mysterious thing going on that is hotter than hell.” She walked over, knocked his knee off the other, and sat on his lap, one arm draped over his shoulder. “I like my men a little dangerous. Are you dangerous? Your Blue Suns certainly seem to think so.” Letting out a cheery sigh, she leaned into him. He smelled amazing, except for the cigar smoke. She plucked the offensive thing from his hand and stubbed it out in his ashtray. “I think we can find far better things for you to do with your oral fixation.”

Giving him a broad wink, she kissed the end of his nose. “So, I hear you’re looking for a housekeeper.” In a moment of affected shyness, she tipped her head down and glanced away. A heavy flush heated her neck and cheeks, although more from excitement than any sort of bashfulness. She could feel the rage vibrating through him. Exhilerating.

She puffed out a little sigh. “Although I was sorta hoping that you were aiming more for someone whose skills lie outside the scrubbing floors department. . . .” Another bright chuckle. “Although we can totally keep the frilly little uniform if you like.”

He cleared his throat and moved to lift her off his lap, but she resisted, looping an arm around his neck.

A hissing, exasperated sigh slithered between his lips, and he cocked his head a little, listening to his earpiece. By the way he stiffened, Shepard knew her jig was up. He closed the channel and stared her straight in the eye. A predator, but one unsure of his prey. “How long did you expect it to take me to identify you, Captain Jane Shepard? Surely you didn’t think your thin, albeit alluring, disguise would fool me for long.”

She smiled and shrugged. “I didn’t expect it to fool you at all. It was meant to fool your men and get me in the door. If you’d asked, I would have told you my name. Lying means remembering way too much. I can’t be bothered, especially since I need eighty percent of my brain function just to keep me on my feet in these damned shoes.” She reached up with both hands and fluffed her hair.

Shepard turned back to her quarry and leaned in to kiss the end of his nose again. “Now we just have to make sure we aren’t interrupted by your pesky guards.” She opened her omnitool and keyed in a short range overload. “This is going to hurt and probably deafen that ear for a while, so I apologize for that.” With a snap of electricity and a whine of feedback, she destroyed his radio implant.

“I’m on a check-in system,” he said, his voice thick with suppressed pain. She gave him credit though, he wasn’t giving anything away. That needed to change. Until she had proof of what he was, she couldn’t just kill him.

“Let them come. We’re just two people having a cozy chat, aren’t we? Sure, we’re both a little psychotic, but that just makes it more fun.” She turned off her omnitool, then ran the backs of her fingers up his neck to tweak his chin. “So, Omega. What brought you here? A large pool of victims whose families will be too terrified to look into their disappearances? Or are you just a bottom feeder getting fat off the misery of others?” A fingertip traced his jawline.

“She’s merely a place of business. It’s not even my primary residence.” He looked down his nose at her. “Do I look like I belong amongst the dregs that wash up on this filthy outpost?”

Chuckling, she shook her head. “You really don’t want me to answer that, but . . . let me guess . . . your primary residence is a private, tropical island on Terra Nova. No? Hmmm . . . Horizon is too provincial. Somewhere industrial and self-important, then.” She tapped her finger tip against her lip. “That means it’s a fantastically huge floating island on Bekenstein.” His face and the sudden straightness through his neck told her everything she needed to know. She clicked her tongue and wagged the finger at him. “Now. Now. A proud man is always looking down on things and people: and, of course, as long as you are looking down you cannot see something that is above you.” She cocked her head. “C.S. Lewis, a wise man.”

He laughed and shoved her away. “You think you’re above me?” Standing, he paced to his wall of art and back. “You think any of this means anything to me? I bring order to the chaos. I wash away the filth and elevate the beggars from the squalor to tower amidst beauty so sublime it would bring tears to your eyes.”

Sighing, she settled into his chair and crossed her legs, yanking the skirt down her thighs. “Holy father of light, you’re a complete loon, aren’t you, Brother Psycho?” A small shrug rippled down her bare shoulders, her skin lifting into gooseflesh, but the reaction stopped as she heard a loud, turian mutter echo in from the hallway -- something about pots calling kettles black. She narrowed her eyes in the general direction of Garrus’s not-so-subtle reminder to stay on track, then looked back to her host. “So, you were saying how none of this means anything to you?”

Whirling around, he threw up his arms as if lifting everything around them, even Omega. “Omega, the Blue Suns, Eclipse . . .” He laughed, betraying himself a little in its maniacal edge. “Yes, I back several mercenary companies. I even run my own. Business is lucrative out here if one can maintain the correct balance of power.” Shaking his head, he paced to the painting of the garden in winter. “But business is merely a means to conduct my true work without interference. I’m an artist. A preservationist of beauty. I would make this entire galaxy my canvas, one perfect sculpture at a time. What better place to begin than Omega?”

A wide, incredulous grin spread across Shepard’s face, but a fierce set of teeth began gnawing at her insides. She’d nudged him so close, now she needed to push him over the edge. “When I came into this district, I just planned to sneak in and recruit a surgeon to help save a friend’s life, but then the Suns told my escort that he didn’t need to wait for me.

“When they said that, I went so cold that I almost threw up on my new shoes, but that quickly changed into anger. Not normal, ‘dammit, I stubbed my toe’, or ‘the Father of Light has been preempted by an infomercial selling supportive male undergarments’ angry. No, this was a scalding, righteous fury. Glory hallelujah, and praise the Enkindlers for their divine and burning light, Brother Psycho.” She stood and paced over to blockade the hallway, the heels helping give her presence as she ruffled all her spines in preparation for combat. “I strode into your house expecting to work out a few frustrations by putting down some rich, entitled thug who was hurting prostitutes. You, however, are so, so much worse than that, aren’t you?”

“Am I to believe that you’ve decided to spare me from this righteous fury?” He chuckled, but she felt the edge of fear through it, the way his eyes cut side to side a little as if formulating a plan, gauging her weaknesses.

Shepheard laughed, one just as cold and manic as his, and stepped down out of her shoes. “Oh no. No, no, no. I fully intend to end you.”

He retrieved the stub of his cigar and lifted it to his lip. It shook a little as he flicked his lighter, but once he got it lit, he seemed to settle. “Do you have any idea who I am?”

“I really don’t give a rat’s ass what your name is. The only reason you’re still standing is that painting right there. It gives me a little hope for the other applicants who came into this house over the last forty-eight hours.” She bent down to pick up the insanely tall, pointy heels. “So, before I gut you like a fish using my high heels and false eyelashes, I want to know where they are.”

Turning a slow circle, her hands held out, she peered into the dark corners and behind the chairs. “You’re a preservationist.” She stopped turning and minced over to a massive bookshelf behind his chair. “That means you’ve got a gallery somewhere.” She pulled out a book. “Is it behind here? A secret passage through the castle?”

Looking at the cover of the book, she raised her eyebrows. “Wow, the Book of Urizen. I suppose you know only six of these still exist? Estimated value: forty-five million credits. Beautiful condition too.” She took a breath. “Earth was not: nor globes of attraction . . . The will of the Immortal expanded . . . Or contracted his all flexible senses. Death was not, but eternal life sprung.” A long sigh followed the quote. “William Blake. Fantastic stuff. He knew the Enkindlers’ light.” She tossed it over her shoulder. “Useless to me, however. I need to find the trigger that opens this wall.”

Moving faster and with more grace than she expected, the man lunged at her, his cigar scorching a long line up her chest and around the curve of her hairline. One strong arm grappled around her neck while the other tried to capture her wrist, twisting it behind her. Planting her feet, she shoved backwards, the move toward him catching him off guard. They crashed into the wall. Now that she’d thrown him off balance, she flicked her hip and rolled, dragging him to the floor. At the end of the roll, she sat astride his waist, a stiletto in each hand. With a swing and a snap of her wrists, she buried both heels in the sides of his neck.

In the background, Shepard heard the front door fly open and bounce off the wall with a crash that shook the house. Guns fired back and forth for a few seconds, then silence.

“C-Sec, you breathing?” she called without looking away from the man pinned beneath her.

The artist bucked once, but she pulled on the shoes, a warning he clearly understood if the size of his pupils and the cloud of fecal stench that billowed around her could be believed.

“I haven’t torn or punctured anything too badly yet,” she warned him. “Stay still, tell me where your collection is, and I won’t rip them both out the front.”

“What do you want?” he asked in a raspy whisper. “Money?”

All emotion -- save fury -- drained from her expression, and she leaned in, staring into his eyes. “One thing that losing your entire family to slavers does is give you a healthy aversion to selling your soul for cash.” She eased her leg over to crouch by his side, keeping her hands steady on the shoes. “Get up very carefully.” Movement in her peripherals caught her attention. “C-Sec?”

Garrus backed into the room, his hands in the air. “We have a small problem, Shepard.”

She turned, seeing for a fraction of a second, a grizzled, grey-haired figure in battered, yellow armour. “Who the . . .?”

Knowing her mistake the moment she made it, Shepard cursed as the artist leaped up. His movement threw her back and tore her hand from one shoe as he bolted to the bookshelf and then through a small door.

“Hold on a bloody minute,” the old merc rumbled in a throaty, bastardized cockney accent, “you’re not . . . .”

“I’m here to kill the bastard, you moron,” Shepard shouted, scrambling to her feet. After staring at the shoe in her hand for a second, she threw it aside and strode to Garrus’s side. Snatching Roger from the turian’s back, she levelled it on the interloper. “Are you with that psycho? Quickly. He’s getting away.”

“No, I’m not with that devil. Son of a bitch. I busted in here when I heard the Suns brought the bastard a fifth girl. Thought I’d do the galaxy a favour, kill the bastard, and be a big, goddamned hero.” He levelled a pale, milky eye on her. “But I guess you weren’t a damsel in distress after all.”

“More like a one-woman wrecking crew,” Garrus supplied.

“Then take your gun off my man, and stay the hell out of my way.” Shepard spun without waiting to see if the old guy did as she’d said, trusting Garrus to be able to take care of himself. She ran around the chair to the open portal behind it. Not sparing time for hesitation or caution, Shepard ducked through, finding herself in a narrow serviceway. Dark red, grungy light flickered along the walls, and the sound of water dripping punctuated the shuffle-clump of her quarry’s footsteps to her right.

Looking down, she saw a single drop of blood. A few metres further, another. She took off after him, ducking around corners and crawling down ladders, her bare feet coating in a thick layer of muck that rendered the floors hazardous and the ladders deadly.

“Shepard?” Garrus’s bellow echoed after her.

“To the right, Brother C-Sec.” A few metres further on, she found her shoe tossed into a corner, a blood trail leading her deeper into the bowels of the station. The trail started to get heavier as fear and exertion jacked up his blood pressure, the drips falling closer and closer together, then in small clusters. It didn’t amount to a bleed that would end him, but tossing her off had done some damage.

“What a bloody hole,” the cockney fellow bellowed, apparently having decided to follow Garrus. “Damned sewers.”
Shepard swallowed hard and shoved the idea of what was collecting between her toes as far away as possible. Ten minutes, maybe fifteen, passed before she ran through an old metal door into paradise. Plants grew throughout the large chamber, a riot of colour barely contained into plots. A narrow, flag-stone pathway meandered through the greenery. Shepard slowed a little, picking her way silently down the path.

In the center of the first cluster of gardens, a statue stood, frozen in mid-leap. It danced with outstretched arms, a flowing gown of meticulously carved marble swirling around graceful legs set at angles impossible for anyone but twelve-year-old gymnasts. Shepard stopped, dread sinking its teeth into the back of her neck as she looked up. Her eyes travelled the length of the skirt to a banded kirtle, then a swooping peasant neckline that led to a gracefully extended neck. The figure’s head tipped back and to the side. Water flowed in a slow trickle over the open mouth, winding its way down the piece. Shepard closed her eyes and took a deep breath, steeling the trembling roll in her gut the best she could. Still, dread’s teeth tore into her like a defeated varren in the fighting ring.

You have to look, Shepard. You have to know.

She opened her eyes and looked up into a pale face, the expression completely at odds with the serenity and joy expressed through the rest of the piece. The face cried out for help, the features contorted with pain, fear, and sorrow.

“Oh sweet baby Jesus,” she sighed, her voice burrowing down inside her. Traitorous knees buckled, forcing her into a tottering dance of her own until she wrestled them back under control. A strange, strangled gurgle emanated from the piece, dragging her eyes back to that horrifying face. The statue’s closed eyes opened, grappling onto Shepard with hope as sharp and piercing as harpoons.

Shepard gasped, a fish beached by incredulity. “You’re alive?”

The trapped, terrified eyes sprang wide as Shepard felt someone rush up behind her. She spun, throwing Roger up between them, deflecting the worst of the blow, the shovel glancing off the right side of her skull. Even at less than half the force, the blow drove Shepard to her knees. Lightning and thunder broke open a pocket of superheated agony and sent it pouring down through her nervous system.

The artist’s blood-soaked hands grabbed at Roger, tossing her back and forth as he struggled to yank the assault rifle from her grip.

No. He doesn’t get to kill me with my own damned gun.

The thought broke through the eruption of agony and sound in her head. Clutching Roger tight, she rolled into the man, pinning the gun under her as she fell onto her side. The artist clambered to his feet and stumbled further into the garden. Running boots thundered toward her, and she flapped her hand in that general direction as if trying to ward them off. Too noisy. Much too noisy. She blinked, trying to clear her vision.

“Shepard?”

She flapped her hand again. “Shuddub, Gar . . ..” She dragged one arm under herself and pushed up off the walkway until she sat, precariously wobbling, braced against her elbow.

“Spirits, Shepard.” Blue armour smacked into the stone next to her with a vaguely musical ring, then gentle talons probed at her head. “I’m betting your head hurts worse than mine now,” Garrus said, his voice soft, the gentle humour comforting. He injected her with medigel and smeared a thick layer on her scalp.

“She’s alive, C-Sec,” Shepard whispered, pointing a wavering finger toward the statue. “They could all be alive.” She sat up and raised a hand. “Help me up, it’s just a glancing blow.” As the medigel slithered through her blood and her wound, it pushed enough of the pain back for her to form words.

“How bad is it on the Shepard scale?” Garrus asked, supporting her as she stood and took her first few steps.

“Pretty sure you can see the axe,” Shepard replied, still trying to get her eyes to focus, “but it’s working its way out.”

“Goddamn,” the cockney accent said and whistled, the sound bringing Shepard’s gun around to point at the old merc again. For a moment, her finger twitched on the trigger, but then she turned to follow the blood trail deeper into the subterranean garden. “Tough little minx, isn’t she?”

“Call her that again, and you’ll find out.” Garrus chuckled, the warm rumble of his voice helping as much as the meds, and Shepard pulled away to stumble forward under her own steam.

The blood droplets doubled and swam before her eyes, but Shepard shuffled rubber legs forward. Time, reason, and sense tangled up, glued together with pain and blood, clogging up her brain functions like a restaurant toilet on three-for-one burrito night. Still, her instincts and reflexes worked well enough to keep her on her feet and moving, gun pointed the right direction.

Three more statues frolicked in elegant poses as Shepard passed, their bodies eerily frozen in time, their eyes following her. As she chased the artist through his masterpieces, she began to see the horrible care he’d taken to keep his statues alive. Water trickled over the face of each, close enough to their mouth that they could lap it up with their tongue. She also spotted holes disguised as pendants at the base of each throat, no doubt disguising feeding tubes.

“There.”

Garrus didn’t need to point out the movement ahead. Shepard’s quarry slowed to a stumbling walk.

“Looks like he tore his jugular when he threw me back,” she said. “All this running around and hitting people over the head with shovels has split it open like an overripe banana peel. Imagine that, Brother C-Sec.” Shepard sighed. When she’d entered the mansion, she’d wanted him to suffer, but seeing his victims had more than filled her suffering quota for the night. Hell, for the next eighty years. Now, all she wanted to do was end it, get the victims cared for, and fall headfirst into bed.

She stopped, her lips relaxing into a grateful half-smile as Garrus stepped in tight against her, steadying her while she tracked her target through Roger’s scope.

She let out a deep breath and squeezed the trigger. Blood blossomed from the artist’s thigh, painting a crimson starburst across the foliage. “Damn, my aim is hell and gone.”

“Hold up!” the old merc called. “I’ve got a question for that bastard before you finish him off.” He brushed past her, a battered old rifle swinging from his left hand.

Shepard raised an eyebrow, but nodded, leaning against the turian as she held the gun ready, but waiting. “Better hurry, Brother Psycho is moments away from joining the light.”
The old merc bent down, lifting the artist off the flagstones by the collar of his very fine suit. “Where’s Vido? I know you’re the money behind him, you son of a bitch.”

“Don’t know. He changes his base every couple of weeks,” the artist said, his voice weak and garbled, “but he knows you’re hunting him, Massani. Don’t be surprised if he’s waiting for you with a battalion at his back when you do catch up to him.”

The merc, Massani, laughed dry and rolling, a dry wind over desert rock. “I’m going to give you to the lady to finish off. Burn in hell, you sick bastard.” He dropped the artist and stepped around behind Shepard. “He’s all yours, sweetheart.”

Shepard chuckled, seeing his desert wind and raising him a January ice storm. “This one’s for you, Bunny,” she whispered. Steady her shot, she squeezed the trigger, sending a bullet straight through the bastard’s skull.

For a moment, she stared at the slumped body, its hazel eyes open and still looking into hers. Fear and denial bore into her as blood seeped in a thin line from the hole in his brow, dripping with a feather’s whisper onto the stone. Over the years, she’d shot and killed a lot of men and women. Thousands had fallen before her. Thousands. Always in self-defense. As Anderson had told her all those years before, some people were born to be soldiers, while others had to trick their bodies into believing it. Despite her prodigious skill in the art of death, she’d never murdered anyone.

She turned away from the dead, fearful eyes and stumbled a couple of steps back up the path. The gun in her hand, suddenly too heavy to hang onto, slipped from her fingers to clatter on the stone. “Shepard?” Garrus called, his voice soft and cautious, his hand never leaving her even as she walked away.

“What did I do, C-Sec? I just appointed myself judge, jury and executioner,” she whispered. “Did I just step over a line, C-Sec?”

“If anyone deserved a bullet through the head, it was him. You did what needed to be done,” Garrus said, leaning down close to her ear. “You said it yourself. There’s no law here to turn him over to. No court to try and convict him.”

Shepard turned to look up at the closest statue, an asari maiden swinging on an old wooden swing, a basket of flowers in her lap. Big, blue eyes stared back at her above cheeks blotchy and streaked with blue where tears ate through the makeup applied to match her face to her marble sarcophagus. A living death. How long had these girls and women been tormented, frozen in place, alabaster dolls wasting away?

Shepard allowed Garrus to support her as they tracked the yell. A wide door opened into a side chamber dominated by an iron cage with five women inside it. Another girl, a beautiful but bone-thin asari, lay strapped to a workbench. Her shoulder had been dislocated, her arm broken and then posed at impossibly graceful angles; splinted and shackled in place to fit to her new form.

Shepard let out a slow moan and stepped up to take the asari’s unbroken hand in both of hers. “It’s going to be okay now. The man who did this is dead. We’ll get you out of here and to a hospital.”

A wan smile drifted like a cloud across the pale beauty’s face. “Thank you. I’ve been here . . ..” She shook her head a little. “I don’t even know.”

Stroking the young asari’s brow, Shepard smiled as if trying to warm the chill radiating from that frail hand. “In a few days, you’ll be right as rain, don’t worry.”

The smooth, lavender brow furrowed. “Worry . . . . Could you tell my mother where I’m going? She’d never show enough weakness to send people after me herself, but she’ll be worried, nonetheless.”

Shepard nodded, strong and sure, grateful to be given a mission, something to focus on other than the artist’s dead stare. “What’s your name, sweetie? Who’s your mother? I’ll find her before I even return to my ship.”

“She must be going out of her mind,” Garrus agreed.

The asari’s eyes drifted closed. “My name is Liselle. My mother is Aria T’Loak.”
“Aria’s your mother?” Shepard fought off shock’s pale, clammy hands, trying not to let it show as the asari gripped her gaze like a lifeline. After a moment, the captain nodded. “Of course. I’ll go tell her on my way back to the ship.” Forcing a veneer smile onto her lips, Shepard patted the girl’s hand. “You just take it as easy as you can. You’re safe now, and we’ll have people here to help you very soon.”

Releasing Liselle, Shepard spun and strode out, trying to look confident and reassuring. She managed to hold on until she made it out of sight before breaking into a run. Sprinting straight through gardens, leaping over plants, she reached the sewer tunnels and swung the door shut before her stomach overrode her control and began to heave. Water and bile poured out, splashing on her feet, but she barely felt it through the storm cloud broiling in her thoughts, all lightning and downdrafts threatening to blow out the back of her skull. She heard the door squeak open, and a strong, gentle hand pressed between her shoulder blades, rubbing slow circles that eased the knives stabbing into her skull and her guts.

“Just when you think you’ve reached the limit of the horrors sapient beings can visit on one another,” Garrus said, his words a whisper of fresh air through the fetid dankness.

Heaving until turning inside out became a real concern, Shepard fought to purge the greasy, rotten sewage at the heart of her. “Jesus Christ, C-Sec . . . Aria . . . did she . . .?” Despite starting to voice the terrible, impossible suspicion that a violet hand spent the night dancing her around Omega like a marionette in a puppet theatre, she swallowed the words, unspoken. First things first. The victims needed to be taken down, extracted from those damned sarcophagi and moved to a hospital.

She swiped at the blood dripping off her eyebrow. “Is there anyone or any facilities here to help them? Emergency services? Hospitals? Ambulance?”

“How many are there? Twenty-five or so?” A rough grumble followed a sigh as a grimace twisted his scarred face. “You’ve got a fast ship? Good medic?”

Shepard nodded and reached out a hand, bracing against the slimy wall. “Yeah. She’s got her hands full at the moment, but yeah, we have a great doc, and a decent medic.”

“Get yourself back to your ship, prepare for incoming. If your doc could come down and help here, we might spare these poor, bloody girls a bit of suffering.” The merc turned away. “I ran into some old special forces buddies earlier. They’re used to situations of an unusual and . . . messy nature. Well . . .” He cleared his throat. “. . . bloody hell, it’s not like anyone could be prepared for something like this, but they’ve done some unusual covert extractions. We’ll get the ladies out of this hellhole and onto your ship without drawing any attention.”
Shepard stared at him for a long time, not sure why she trusted the surly old fellow with the terrible scars, but something told her he was okay. “All right. Ship’s name is the Normandy.” She held her hand out, gripping his in a tight shake. “On your way out, there’s a painting of a garden full of asari statues on the sitting room wall. Grab it. It should cover your expenses.” She shrugged. “There’s a sculpture in there, too . . . a skinny head with a long, thin nose . . . sorta weird looking. It should pay your buddies extremely well to take extra care with those girls.”

“A strange head?” His face twisted like he thought she was lying. “Why would they want that?”

“Well, it’s up to them, but it’s worth about eight hundred million credits, as many as a billion if you find the right auction.” She nodded at the shock on his face.

“Bloody hell. How much is the painting worth?” Massani scratched the back of his head and cocked an eyebrow.

Shepard winked, managing a weak smile. “Trust me, take the painting. Just don’t try to sell it on an asari world. The painter is somewhat infamous.”

He shrugged. “All right, if you say so. Thanks, sweetheart.”

Shepard shook her head and turned back to the sewers and the mansion beyond. “Name’s Shepard, twinkletoes. Captain Jane Shepard.” She shot him a sardonic grin at his cuss and waved to Garrus. “Come on, Brother C-Sec, let’s keep moving. I’m ready for this night to be over.” She waved off his offer of support, taking the lead back to the house. The thought of those poor girls waiting for rescue alone tore up her guts like an industrial shredder, and molten shame burned under her skin as she walked the other way. But right then, the need to run became a charging krogan, catapulting everything else aside. A few moments. She just needed a few moments and some space to get her head straight . . . not to mention that her feet begged for decent shoes.

Halfway back to the little door, she glanced behind her, meeting Garrus’s eyes. “I know I told Liselle that I’d talk to her mother before heading to the ship, but I might need to do some thinking before I deal with Aria.”

Garrus rumbled an oath. “We’ll be heading out for the Citadel as soon as we get the girls aboard? Maybe best to get it over with tonight. I’ll go with you, we’ll just tell her where Liselle is going and get out. If she did manage to set you up to kill that bastard, we can untangle that rope after some sleep.”

Shepard nodded, not surprised that he also suspected Aria of setting them up to take out her daughter’s abductor. “Okay, that sounds like a plan. God, we’re days from actually getting any sleep, aren’t we?” She yawned, then pulled away from him to duck through the little doorway into the sitting room. Walking only far enough into the room that Garrus could get through the door, she stopped and looked around. “All this rich beauty hiding such ugly depravity.”

“This art belongs in a museum, Shepard,” Garrus whispered, looking around the sitting room. “There must be twenty billion credits worth of treasures here.” He walked over to a figure made out of spun glass worked with threads of gold and other metals. “This is hyalus, Shepard, and really old by the look of it. It’s illegal to own the ancient pieces, they’re protected turian cultural artifacts.”

A Blue Sun walked into the room, his assault rifle hanging slack from his hand. Shepard looked up, so stiff with fury that she expected to hear her joints creak. “Get out of here. Your boss is dead. If you knew about his little garden of torture down there, you’d better grab your cronies and run like hell before I decide to do a little housecleaning. That is the position I came here to interview for, after all.” She met the batarian’s eyes, his death hanging so close in her stare that his ruddy skin blanched almost white. She nodded to Garrus. “If he isn’t gone in ten seconds, put a bullet through his skull.”

“Yes, ma’am.” He shrugged his assault rifle into his hands, holding it in a relaxed grip.

The batarian turned and fled.

“Take the rest of your colleagues with you!” she yelled after him.

Shepard forgot him the moment he left her line of sight, too many other things to worry about. “Sweet baby Jesus, C-Sec. As if we don’t already have enough to deal with.” She ran her hand through her hair. “Okay, I’ll have the crew crate the art and the books up, turn it over to the proper authorities.” She wiped her mouth on the back of her hand. “Otherwise, it’ll end up being scavenged and used to fund who knows how much criminal shit on this bloody rock. When we get to the Citadel, we’ll make sure it gets back where it belongs.”

She lifted a hand to her ear, opening a channel to Kaidan. He and the others had just returned to the Normandy, so she had them head over. Then she contacted Dr. Chakwas.

“How is Nihlus doing, Doc?” she asked, flopping into the artist’s chair, filthy feet splayed, knees stuck together. “Good, that’s a relief.” She let out a long breath. “We fell into a nightmare here, Doc.”

“I’m going to sweep the house, Shepard,” Garrus said. “Clear out the staff.”

She nodded and mouthed for him to be careful. “Well, we found a sick son of a bitch who has been abducting young women, breaking their limbs, starving them and turning them into living sculptures. They’re still alive, but are a huge mess and encased in stone and plaster. We have people coming to get them unmounted and to the Normandy, but if you could come help when you’re done with Nihlus . . ..”

The Captain sat forward, her forearms on her knees as Dr. Chakwas assured her that she would come as quickly as possible. Shepard looked up as Zaeed ducked through the door. After a second, he wandered over to the painting she’d told him to take.

“Thanks, Doc. You shouldn’t have any problem getting into the district. I’ll have a squad escort you from the ship. Is Ashley up? Great, thanks. See you soon.” Shepard changed the channel to the chief, putting her in charge of turning the cargo bay into a hospital ward. When she was finished, she looked up at Zaeed. “All right, let’s get these wheels in motion. Can some of your buddies get my people past the Suns?”

“Sure thing, Shepard.” His chuckle reminded her of Wrex. Hitching a thumb over his shoulder at the painting, he gave her a crooked grin. “I like it. Might not sell it.” The grin twisted a bit, the scars around his eye caving into grisly shadow. “Jessie ’n me could use a bit of culture.”

Standing, Shepard took a couple of steps toward the merc. “Seemed like you knew who we were dealing with.” Cocking a hip, she crossed her arms, eyes narrowing.

He nodded and turned to look at his painting. “Yeah. Name was Hock. Slimy merc bastard. Made a fortune causing problems all over the Terminus. Kick the wasps nest, then step in on whichever side offered him the most cash.”

“Seemed personal.”
Grunting in agreement, he turned back. “Yeah, bastard financed operations for an old friend that I’m looking to catch up to.” Spinning on his heel, he strode for the door. “Better get moving.”

Shepard followed him out of the house, grabbing her boots from the car. Returning inside, she found a sink and sat on the counter to wash her feet before slipping them on. Someone needed to stay with the girls until Dr. Chakwas arrived.

Garrus chuckled when she walked into the sitting room. “That dress is suddenly a lot more you. The dried blood is a nice touch too.”

She elbowed him. “Do you mind supervising getting all this loaded on the Normandy? Ash is getting a ward set up for the girls in the cargo bay.”

“With all this freight, the girls and the quarians, we’re going to be a full boat,” he said, looking around.

She covered a yawn. “Yeah, and we need to keep the quarians on board. Well, the admiral anyway. I’ll make arrangements to get the kids back to the flotilla until we get our hands on Saren.” She shook her head. “We wasted a hell of a lot of time here, C-Sec.” She chuffed in the back of her throat. “Well, I can’t say wasted, exactly.”

He nodded. “We’ll make it up.” He gestured toward the wall of paintings. “I’ll take care of this. Shouldn’t take us long if Massani’s people can get us past the Suns. Damned mercs are a menace.”

“Thanks.” A smile passed over her face as wan and ephemeral as mist. “I’ll be back out and ready to go see Aria once the doc gets here.”

“Hey, Shepard.” She turned back as Garrus’s call stopped her just inside the door. “How’d you know about the art and books?”

A secretive smile tweaked the corner of her mouth. “I’m an enigma, C-Sec.” She ducked through the little door and headed back down the filthy passage to the sewers.

****

Shepard’s omnitool told her it was just after noon Normandy time when she stopped at the bottom of the stairs to Aria’s little bunker inside Afterlife. No doubt the asari had known the second she arrived, so every moment Shepard hesitated before going up told Aria far more than she wanted to give away. She could feel Garrus behind her, patient but tense, vigilant as he scanned the crowd.

After another deep breath, Shepard lifted her foot onto the first step and started up. Aria stood as she had the last time, facing out over her court.

“I see you decided to relax a little and enjoy Omega’s nightlife.” The asari turned and cocked her head, a wolf’s smile curling one side of her mouth as her gaze slid up Shepard’s body, a pair of cool, invisible hands. “When you let your hair down, you don’t hold back, do you?” She raised one delicate brow. “Those boots really don’t do you justice, though. Legs like that should be showcased.”

Shepard felt Garrus push up on her from behind and pressed a palm behind her to ease him back. “Yeah, well, I got psychotic lunatic blood and sewage all over the heels. Didn’t feel much like wearing them after that. I tell you, Omega sure knows how to show a girl a good time. I can’t remember having so much fun.”

Aria’s only reaction was a slight twitch at the corner of her mouth.

“But, I’m afraid I can’t spend any longer indulging my party girl side. Time to go,” Shepard said, keeping her voice even but not bothering to hide her fatigue. “Liselle asked me to let you know that we’re giving her a ride to the Citadel on the Normandy. She can rest from her long days and even longer nights of partying there.” She shrugged. “Unless you have somewhere you’d rather she go?”

Aria’s eyes locked on Shepard’s, not a single emotion showing anywhere on that cold, elegant face. Her eyes, on the other hand, spoke volumes. A slight shrug told Shepard what she needed to know.

“All right.” Shepard turned and nodded for Garrus to precede her down. “I’m exhausted. So much fun. See you the next time I’m in town, Aria. We can go out together.”

“More than I can express,” he replied.

Shepard grinned. She needed a shower and to get changed before the first girls started arriving on the ship. Sleep wouldn’t hurt either, but that would have to wait.

“Shepard?” Aria called as the captain moved to descend the second set of steps. When Shepard turned, the asari held her with an eerily open stare for a moment, then nodded.

Shepard returned it, knowing it was as close to a thank you as Aria would allow herself.

* * * * *

Shepard’s omnitool told her that evening had arrived on the Normandy when she finally walked into medbay, carrying a clear case under one arm. The salarian doctor, Mordin, looked up from packing his kit.

“Finally able to get back to your clinic?” Shepard asked.

“All patients settled,” the salarian reported when he turned and spotted her. “Nihlus doing well, better than expected. Very resilient. Females need to go to Citadel, receive proper care as soon as possible.”

She nodded. “We’re on our way once we get clearance.” Stepping up to him, she held out her hand. “Thank you so much for all your help, Dr. Solus. Dr. Chakwas says that Nihlus wouldn’t have made it without your expertise. And I know we would have never gotten the women triaged and stabilized as quickly if you hadn’t helped.”

“Glad to be of assistance. Believed women going to their deaths inside that gate. Never imagined anything like this. Barbaric. Death sometimes kinder. Galaxy owes you debt for putting a bullet through his skull.” He strode to the medbay door, pausing to shake Dr. Chakwas’s hand. “Pleasure working with you, doctor. Will forward my notes for our paper. Revolutionize treatment of turian crush victims.”

Shepard chuckled wearily, wanting to know where the salarian got all his energy. She lifted a hand as he glanced her way before hurrying out the door.
Dr. Chakwas turned to face Shepard, a wry smile on her handsome, exhausted face. “Quite the couple of days, Shepard.” She pointed to a chair. “Sit, so I can look at your head.”

Shepard plopped into a chair. “That it has been, Doc. How are the ladies holding up?” She let out a little, pained hiss as the doctor parted her hair to prod the wound.

“Not well.” The doctor cursed. “I can’t even begin to comprehend what they’ve been through. There wasn’t a trace of analgesic medication in their blood. That monster . . . .” Instead of completing the thought, Chakwas let out a thin, enraged growl. “Dr. Solus and I gave most of them heavy doses of pain medication, but a couple were so badly broken that I just induced a medical coma before we started to work. Years of rehab await most of them. Judging by the degree of healing, some of them have been there for more than a year.”

Shepard winced at that. How had they borne the pain and madness for so long? “Have you found a hospital to take them?”

“Huerta Memorial has agreed to take all the victims, but they’re nervous about the cost, Shepard. Perhaps we should spread them out over several hospitals?” Dr. Chakwas poked and prodded Shepard’s head as she spoke, the pain easing as she did. Patting the captain’s shoulder, she said, “All done. You have a remarkably hard head.”

Shepard chuckled. “Not the first time I’ve heard that. Thanks, Doc.” She stood and turned to face Chakwas. “Is Huerta the best care possible?” Losing the pain in her head untied all the knots that had kept her upright. Her entire body sagged, feeling as though it would melt down into a puddle on the deck plating.

“Yes. It has all the best surgeons, but it’s expensive.”

Shepard held out the case she’d been carrying under her arm. “I thought that might be a problem. Here, I think this should cover all the medical bills Huerta could incur while healing and rehabilitating our ladies.”

Dr. Chakwas stared at the book contained within the hermetic case for a moment. “De Hortus Sanitatis?” She looked up at Shepard and shook her head. “This disappeared a hundred years ago, stolen from the University of Aberdeen’s collection, I believe. How?”

“Our artist had expensive tastes. Anyway, that should about cover it, don’t you think?” She pushed a chair over next to Nihlus, plopping into it hard enough that it rolled back into the next bed. “So, how’s our patient doing, Doc?”

“He should be up by the day after tomorrow. He shouldn’t do anything more energetic than walking and light stretching for a week, though.” The doctor yawned. “All right. I’m going to check on the patients in the cargo bay one more time, then get a couple hours sleep.”

“Rest well, Doc. You deserve it. You did some amazing work over the last couple of days.” Shepard watched the doctor leave, then leaned back and closed her eyes. Muscles she hadn’t heard from since basic training had set up a complaints department. At the end of a couple of very long bloody couple of days, the best she could say was that they hadn’t lost anyone. They were no closer to catching Saren than they’d been when they arrived on Omega.

“Hey, Skipper?”

Shepard sighed and leaned forward, her elbows sharp and tacky on her thighs. She really needed a shower. “What’s up, Chief?”
“Vakarian just left the ship. He said he needed to pick up some supplies and would be back in twenty. I sent Wrex and Tenaka with him, just in case. Thought you should know, ma’am.”

“Thanks, Ash. How are things down there?”

“We’ve got everyone settled. I’ve started rotating people off to eat and sleep. I want to have someone sitting with all the women who are awake.”

“Excellent. Good thinking, Chief. Get some rest. We’ll be at the Citadel in about fifteen hours. Depends how long before we get clearance to leave Omega.”

“Roger that. Goodnight, ma’am.”

“Goodnight, Chief. Shepard out.” She closed that channel and opened another. “Hey, Brother C-Sec, you going UA?”

The turian’s warm, throaty laugh relaxed her further down into the chair. “No, ma’am. My CO gave me an order to pick up some rations while we were docked here, but then this lunatic prostitute grabbed me and dragged me along on her vigilante crusade.”

Despite Shepard trying to maintain a straight face, a snicker crept out. “Why do I allow you to get away with such blatant insubordination?”

“My rakish good looks and natural charm.” He chuckled, but then cleared his throat. “I’ll be back aboard in under ten minutes, Captain. Just needed to pick up a small dose of normalcy and sanity after last night.”

She sighed, long and exhausted. “And here I didn’t even know they were for sale. Grab me an order of both while you’re at it, will you?”

“Hell, I’ll grab you two orders of sanity. You can use all you can get.” Despite his words, his tone remained warm and serious. “Be back in ten, Shepard.”

“Be careful, Shepard out.”

Letting out a long breath, Shepard opened her eyes to see Nihlus’s green gaze watching her. A bright, relieved smile pushed back her weariness. “Well, hey there, handsome. How are you feeling?”

His mandibles fluttered a little. “Handsome?”

She winced at the weakness in his voice, the slight gurgle as he breathed. “Oh, don’t let that go to your head. It’s just what I call all of my turian Spectre partners who have been crushed by rampaging krogan and nearly died.” She slid her hand under the blanket to grasp his talons.

“There have been a lot of us?” A soft chuckle chased the words from his mouth, a coughing spasm overtaking it.

She stroked the back of his hand with her thumb and grinned. “You wouldn’t believe how many.”

“Ah, it was just a little game of dress up.” Her throat closed up tight as all the crazy, sad, disappointing, intense horror of the day caught up with her. Her thumb rubbed the back of his hand.
“You look . . .” His voice trailed off.

“Like a whore, yeah, I know.” A long, soft whistle of sound escaped with her sigh. “I’ll explain it all when you’re up on your feet.” Giving his fingers a gentle squeeze, she tucked them back under the blanket. “For now, just get some sleep. You need your rest.”

He shook his head a fraction of an inch one way then back and opened his eyes. “I was going to say that you look unbelievably beautiful.” His mandibles fluttered. “Also exhausted. Go get some sleep, yourself.”

“Beautiful? How much pain medication does the doc have you on, Kryik?” Shepard stood, leaning over him a little.

“Not enough to miss what’s right in front of my eyes.” His mandibles fluttered a little, and he seemed to drift off.

She sighed and shook her head. “You’re incorrigible.” Pressing her lips to his brow, she whispered. “Thanks for taking care of my people, Kryik.” She straightened and headed for the door.

“And thank you for the moral booster, Shepard,” he called after her, his voice thready. “But you might want to pull that skirt down a bit before you go out there.”

“Wha . . .?” She ran her hands down over her backside to feel that the skirt had indeed ridden up further than she would have liked. “You . . .” An exasperated growl crept out, edged with a soft chuckle. “So inappropriate, Kryik. I swear. When you’re back on your feet, I’ll boost something but it won’t be your moral.”

A harsh cough burst through his soft chuckle. “Promises. Promises.”

Turning away, she feigned disgust, but the fact that he was joking lightened the burden hanging from her shoulders. At least the debacle hadn’t turned into a tragedy. Now, if only they could figure out another way to find Saren. Hopefully Noveria would open up a clue. If not . . . they were screwed.

Some of the crew were sitting at the table, heads propped up on hands as they listlessly shovelled food into their mouths. Someone wolf-whistled. Judging by the colour of the young Marine’s face, it had been Jenkins.

Shepard curtsied a little. “Why thank you. It’s good to know that my street-walker chic fashion statement is appreciated.”

Kaidan turned away from his hunting mission inside the fridge, saw her, and immediately turned an intense shade of purple. “Ma’am,” he greeted her, trying to look anywhere but at her. “I see the new Alliance dress code has been released.”

Shepard’s grin widened. “Yep. Wait until you see the new male uniforms. They’re something else.”

A melodramatic heave of his shoulders punctuated his sigh as he finally met her eyes. “Please tell me they didn’t bring back the speedos and bow ties.”

Laughing, she shook her head. “No, they learned their lesson with the crouching behind cover hysterical blindness incident of 2179. It’s bike shorts and bow ties now.” She waved them off. “If you’ll excuse me ladies and gentlemen, I hear a shower and bed calling my name.”
Twenty minutes later, Shepard sat on the side of her bed, showered and dressed in a blessedly warm, soft set of regulation sweats. She lost track of how long she sat there, forearms resting across her thighs, hands hanging limp between her knees. After puzzling it over while she used up most of the Normandy’s hot water, she still didn’t know if or how Aria had manipulated her into rescuing her daughter and murdering that bastard. Because that was what it amounted to. Murder. No matter how much he may or may not have deserved it, she’d never just levelled her gun on an unarmed civilian and put a bullet in them. Her throat tightened again. She’d taken his life out of fury and disgust and panic, not necessity. No matter how many people told her that she’d acted for the best, she needed to believe it, and she couldn’t. In his condition, she could have put him down and restrained him with one hand. Garrus could have . . .

A knock on her door interrupted the thought, but she left it unanswered, tossing a half-formed moment of gratitude at it for breaking the loop.

“I know you’re in there,” Garrus called, “and if you’re sleeping, I’m Wrex’s dear old mother.” Shepard let out a long breath. “Why aren’t you in bed, C-Sec?” Despite leaving the invitation to come in unspoken, she felt some of the wan chill drop away at the sound of his voice.

“For the same reason you aren’t, I expect.” He went silent for a good half minute. “Are you really going to leave me standing out here?”

“Probably. Do you have some business that can’t wait until morning . . . or until I’ve gotten a few hours sleep?”

“I come bearing the gifts of normality and sanity.”

She chuckled despite herself. “Really? I thought they’d be out of stock here on Omega. I can’t wait to see what sort of packaging they use for sanity. Come on in, C-Sec.” She grinned at him as the door opened. Garrus wore a long black robe and hood that made him seem a good foot taller and broader. “Nice robe.” It was lovely, actually, once he stepped close enough for her to see the black and gold embroidery along the center panel.

“Thank you.” He stopped and cocked his head a little. “There’s something different about you. Can’t place it . . . .”

She laughed and held out her arms, showing off her sweats. “I’m back to me.”

He nodded. “Better.”

“Even without the pseudo-turian legs?”

“Still better.” He walked over to her, holding up two bags, the smells drifting from them reaching down inside to tease her stomach into growling. After checking the labels on the bags, he passed her one. “Your sanity . . . .”

Taking it, she took a long sniff. “Cheeseburger and fries . . . oh, and a dill pickle.” Grinning, she pressed her hand over her belly as it howled like a wolf. “I guess I’m hungry.”

He nodded. “Either that or you ate a pack of varren and they want out.” After chuckling for a moment, the smile drained off his face and he moved over to the bed. He hesitated for a couple of breaths, then sat beside her, his thigh brushing the side of hers. She could feel a tautness through that connection, like a bowstring pulled back, but hesitating, unsure whether to let the arrow fly.
Turning, he set his food behind them, then reached over and laid his hand over hers, his talons encircling her fingers.

“C-See?”

He shook his head. She knew he was asking her to back up a bit, to give him space. Pressing her lips together in an understanding smile that felt like the bastard child of a grimace and a scream, she just let out a long, slow breath.

“Four months ago, I murdered a drug dealer,” he said, his voice flat -- pale and oh so wrong-sounding without its characteristic warmth. It lifted all the hair from her skin, electricity running along the fine, gold shafts. It took every ounce of her restraint to not reach out, to deny what he’d said as impossible, to heal that terrible, flat hollowness.

“I knew he could tell me where to find his suppliers, thought if I roughed him up a little, he’d crack. I hit him, not too hard at first, but he refused to talk, and I got angry, then blind furious. I broke his neck.” He pulled her hand over closer to him and turned it over, her pale, freckled skin almost appearing to glow against the dark steel grey of his. He stared at their hands without talking for a minute or two. Shepard didn’t know how long exactly, it seemed as though her heart and lungs . . . even time itself . . . stopped, willing to wait for her brave friend to continue.

“I told myself that he’d just fallen wrong. An accident.” He looked up to meet her eyes, and she noticed his visor was missing. “I certainly didn’t mean to do it, but it wasn’t an accident. I lost my temper and murdered him. Badly aimed blow, falling the wrong way, whatever . . . none of that matters. My actions killed him. The responsibility is mine.” His brow plates dropped, but he didn’t look away.

Shepard didn’t even blink, meeting the pain in his stare, both accepting and mirroring it.

“Not legally responsible . . . that’s what the investigation said, but you and I know that we’re most responsible for those moments we let the darkness win.” A deep breath whistled through his nose. It felt like a sigh of relief, easing the heaviness in the room a little. “You’re the only one I’ve ever told the truth. Nobody believed I would kill someone like that.” He sighed. “Well, except for my father. The disappointment in his eyes burned. I guess part of the reason I came along with you was running away from the guilt, from Dad’s disappointment.” His stare dropped back to their hands. He set hers on her thigh and patted it absently.

“We’re all running from something, C-See. All of us.” All she could think to say in that moment was the truth. Heaven knew a battalion of ghosts chased her around like a pack of feral varren.

He looked her in the eye again. “I can’t say anything to help, but, Shepard, on Omega, that bastard would have been right back torturing females again within a day. Yes, you executed him, and maybe that wasn’t the right thing to do, but in this case, it was the best thing to do.”

Shepard gave him the tight, furniture polish smile, but it collapsed under the weight of its own deceit. “Aria would have taken care of him.”

He chuffed and nodded. “You did him a mercy in that case. She wouldn’t have made it that quick or easy.” Taking a long breath he nodded, crisp and exaggerated as if declaring the conversation over.

Activating his omnitool, he scrolled through an extranet page. “So, while wandering across Omega earlier, or yesterday, maybe even the day before, I did a little extranet research. Most of the sources I found said that The Maltese Falcon is the best example of the detective noir film. I thought maybe we could come down off the past couple of days by eating food of questionable nutritional value and watching Sam Spade look for the Maltese Falcon.”

Shepard smiled. “It is a classic.” She reached over and took his hand. “C-Sec . . .” Sucking in a deep breath, she gave him a tight-lipped smile. “Thanks for trusting me with that.”

He nodded, and sent the vid to the screen on her wall. “So, what is a Maltese Falcon, anyway?”

Shepard scooted back on her bed and sat cross-legged, digging into her bag of food. “You’ll just have to watch the movie and find out, won’t you?”

He grumbled, but settled in to do just that.
Shepard awoke curled in a ball facing the wrong end of her bed with no idea of when she fell asleep and no memory of the end of the movie. Garrus had spread a blanket over her at some point, and she was alone, so he must have managed to stay awake at least a little longer than she did. A shard of something lodged in her throat provoked a whining-dog-chained-outside sort of ache in her chest, but she shoved it aside.

“Captain?” Alenko called, hammering on her door. “You wanted me to wake you up when we reached the Citadel?”

She grumbled and stirred a little, a wide yawn forestalling her reply. “Thank you, Brother Sparky. Your attention to duty and detail shall find their reward in the Enkindlers’ grace.”

He chuckled. “Huerta Memorial has porters waiting at the dock, and a volus named Barla Von asked me to relay this message, ‘Brother Von awaits Sister Shepard’s pleasure. Glory be to the Enkindlers.’”

Shepard grinned and swung out of bed. “Glory hallelujah, Brother Sparky. It’s a beautiful morn--” She looked down at her chronometer. “Evening.” She changed into her uniform, ran her fingers through her short curls, grabbed her kit and ran for the head. Washed face, brushed teeth, and a little lipstick later, she jogged back to her quarters, snagging Kaidan on the way.

“Can you and Jenkins help the Doc get the ladies moved and settled? I’m going to have Ash, Wrex, Tali and all but two of your Marines take the quarian kids to their transport. We need to keep a guard on Rael’Zorah, however. Don’t let that slippery bastard out of anyone’s sight.” She stopped and looked back at a crate sitting on her table. “When did that get there? And what is it?”

“I dropped it off earlier today. It’s a few things we found in the Blood Pack base that raised red flags for me. The intel: Liara, Shiala, and I put everything we found into a report. It’s on the datapad there on top.” He looked up as the tell-tale thump of the docking clamps boomed through the ship, making the floor shiver under their feet.

Shepard smiled. “Excellent, thanks. Get moving. Once we get these errands done, it’s going to be at least four hours before we can get clearance to head back out.” She paused, thought for a moment, then shook her head. “As much as I hate to give Saren even a minute more head start, I’ll have Pressly book our departure for 0530.” She glanced back at her chronometer even though it didn’t have any information to give her, just using it as a focus for her thoughts. “It’s 1915 now . . . . Give me three leave rotations. Three hours each. Get the crew off the Normandy and out for supper, shopping . . . pedicures . . . I don’t care. We’ve just been through a massive pile of shit, and we’re going back out to hit another one, so get the people off my boat, COB.”

Kaidan grinned and saluted. “Yes, ma’am. Think I’ll get myself a pedicure, maybe a nice facial.”

Shepard lobbed her kit at him. “Cheeky wiseass.”
He caught it and tossed it back, laughing as he turned and hurried out the door.

“Oh! Sparky!” She waited until he reappeared in her door. “Have Rael’Zorah and our artificial guest met, yet?”

“No, ma’am. I thought it best to keep them separate, so Legion has been helping Dr. T’Soni and Shiala with the prothean devices.”

“Good thinking. Let’s continue to keep those two separate for now. I’ll deal with them on the way back to the Traverse. Okay. Let’s get these shows on the road.” She stared at the crate for a moment, then decided it could also wait for the trip back to the traverse. Priceless art, quarian pilgrims and a few personal errands awaited.

She headed out to the elevator. As she passed the galley, she considered breakfast . . . or supper, whichever, but then decided to get something while she was out. The elevator opened the moment she hit the control. At least she didn’t have to wait for it to crawl up to her. Leaning against the side wall, resigned to a long ride, she hit the control and let out a sigh. A grin that felt too stupid for comfort settled on her face. It had been a good morning. She’d never had friends to just sit around with, eating junk food and watching vids. It had been fun.

Fun. Shit. Been a long time since I last used that word and meant it.

“Captain!” Pressly jumped onto the elevator just as the door started to close. “I need to speak to you about some serious concerns.”

And . . . there goes the fun.

She nodded. “Okay, as long as they’re the sort that can be discussed between here and the cargo bay . . . so you have about half an hour.”

He didn’t even try to smile. “I understand bringing those young woman aboard. It was a noble thing you did, but the quarians and the geth? This is an Alliance warship, Captain, and a classified prototype at that. And you’ve filled it with aliens . . . two of whom were at war with the Alliance and the same race as the monster we’re hunting.” Throwing up his hands, he stormed a few paces away and then back. “Now you’re entrusting priceless human artwork to the care of a volus?” He stepped in front of her, his arms bulwarked across his chest. “And fraternizing with turians? Captain, have you lost your mind?”

Shepard’s teeth clenched together so hard they squeaked. She pushed away from the wall, joints and muscle loose, back ramrod straight. “Back up, XO. I’ve put up with your racism because you’re a good, efficient officer who gives the crew a solid foundation. That tolerance has reached its end.” She paused and stepped into him a little, backing him up. “My ship is of human-turian design, and it carries a multi-racial team that has proven their loyalty both to me and to this crew.”

Shepard stopped and waited until he showed signs of registering not just the facts she’d presented, but also that he was disposable if he got in the way of the mission.

When he took another step back and his crossed arms relaxed a little, she nodded. “Other notable facts: My fraternization, if and when it exists, is entirely my god-damned business whether it’s with human, turian, elcor or . . . plankton.” She raised an eyebrow. “A good XO shuts down those sorts of bullshit rumours rather than feeding them.”

The older man’s arms raised a little and he pulled his foot back a half length. Shepard leaned forward, not letting him pack that protective cushion around him.
“I don’t know what sorts of captains you have served under prior to the Normandy . . .” She paused and shook her head. “No, in fact I do. You served on the Agincourt during the Blitz, that means you served under Capt. Sila Okafor.” Shepard laughed, but it came out edged with steel. “Would you be having this conversation with Okafor? I would have paid for a ticket to the fraternization portion of that. She would have slapped you back so hard you hit yeoman before you landed.”

Pressly’s mouth opened then snapped shut, a dangerous red pigment crawling up his neck as a vein in his forehead popped out. She hoped he’d taken his blood pressure medication that morning, but didn’t back down.

“I don’t intend to explain every order I give or decision I make. If you can’t serve happily under those conditions, then transferring is a viable option. I’m sure Anderson and Hackett would expedite that paperwork.” She reached out to grip his elbow. “But, as I said at the beginning, I think you’re good for the ship . . . a stabilizing factor, so I hope you decide to work with me, Mr. Pressly.”

The elevator door opened and she stepped out, but then stopped and turned back. She frowned and tilted her head, searching his face. “Do you believe the Reaper threat is real, Mr. Pressly?”

After a moment, his arms dropped and he straightened. “I do, ma’am.”

Her questioning stare turned to gratitude, her expression softening to a smile. “Then help me get the people, intel, and resources that we need in order to win.”

He nodded and snapped off a brisk salute. “Yes, ma’am.”

“Thank you. As you were.” She turned and hurried to the open ramp and the squat, pacing form of Barla Von.

“You thinking about going ashore alone, Captain?”

Shepard turned toward Garrus’s call. “Almost everyone else is assigned to teams and busy with their business.”

“And me?” He walked up to her, those frost-jewel eyes piercing straight through her. “Why wasn’t I assigned to a team?”

“You haven’t been raked through enough coals this week? Allergic to taking a few hours off?” A grin a little too wide and a little too grateful stretched her face, sparking a light in her chest that shone far too bright. Nothing good could come out of allowing herself to attach to anyone. Friends were great . . . for people who didn’t lead crazy, dangerous lives, and well . . . for the undamaged. Still, she nodded toward the ramp. “Give me a moment with Brother Von, then you can run errands with me if you like. We can grab Anderson and get some dinner somewhere.”

He nodded and headed over to his locker as Shepard trotted down the ramp to greet Barla Von.

“Sister Shepard,” the volus financier greeted her, his voice teasing, even through the wheeze. She bent down and took his mechanical hand between both of hers. “Brother Von, thank you for taking care of these issues for us. Were you able to book passage for our quarian guests to get them back to the fleet?”

“I was. A private frigate awaits, bumping its alpha priority clearance until your people arrive. As soon as the passengers are aboard, it will leave.” He paused to take a few hissing breaths. “I took the liberty of diverting a squad of the Shadow Broker’s tactical agents to provide security on board.” He opened his omnitool and sent her the dock information.

“You’ve outdone yourself, Brother Von. The Enkindlers’ light is strong in you.” She reached up and called Ash to tell her to move out, then sent her the dock information. A minute later, the small squad led the nervous young people down the ramp and into the crowd at the docks. Shepard gave the chief a quick wink and a nod.

“You have some cultural artifacts?” Von continued. He stood a little taller as if trying to peer up the ramp.

“We do. Crates and crates of art, sculptures, and books.” She invited him up the ramp and led the way to the stack of crates. “There are billions of credits worth of human, asari, and turian art packed in here. The only one that has a destination is that tall one there marked extremely fragile. The receiver will see that it gets to where it needs to go. The rest . . . find them good homes in museums, most of the books will have to go to private collectors no doubt.”

She looked down at him. “If we can get rewards or finder’s fees, I am not averse to padding the war prep account.” Opening her omnitool, she scrolled through her directory. “I’ve marked a few books for auction. The money needs to be donated to this rehabilitation center to cover the cost of treatment for the ladies who fell prey to Donovan Hock. Some of them will need a place to go after the hospital.”

He wheezed. “I admit, I did not think you would be so open to making a profit on your altruism.”

Shepard shrugged and sighed. “I don’t have the luxury of being squeamish, Brother Von. The darkness is closing in and even the Enkindlers’ mighty light wasn’t enough to save them from the Reapers. I have a war to wage. I need you to help me fund an army, my friend.”

He nodded and opened his omnitool. Less than a minute later, a platoon of what looked like mercs arrived and rushed the crates out to an armoured truck. He offered her his hand. “I’ll send you the full financials as soon as they find their new homes.”

Shaking his hand, Shepard pressed her other hand on his shoulder. “Good.” Shepard tilted toward the financier in a conspiratorial lean. “Were you able to get the locations of those bases I asked about? I was hoping to hit them on the way back out into the traverse.” She looked up as Garrus wandered over, armoured up, his sniper rifle and Roger on his back.

Von sighed, a heavy wheezing sound. “Tonn Actus has been a reliable source of intel over the cycles.” He combined a breath and a grumble. “The Shadow Broker is not inclined to allow his assets to be wiped out on a whim.” Another wheeze. “Particularly when he is being asked for the information needed to eliminate that asset.”

Shepard stepped back, crossing her arms, and cocked both her hip and her eyebrow. “And I haven’t provided three times more intel in a few short weeks? Face it, Brother Von, Tonn Actus isn’t going to be the one you run your ass off to when the Reapers are rampaging across the galaxy. It’s going to be me. Both you and the Shadow Broker need to decide where your priorities lie.”

He grumble-wheezed, and his omnitool flashed to life once more. “He has three bases. All of them are holding facilities for his collection. All are very well protected.” He paused and drew a sharp breath. “He’s wealthy and paranoid.”

Shepard nodded. “So . . . inclined to have a massive security force and the cash to pay for it. Understood, Brother Von. Thank you.” A crooked grin and a wink followed the beep from her omnitool that told her the information had been received. “This helps a lot.” Nodding with a stiff tilt of her head toward the line of moving crates, she said, “And thanks for seeing all these treasures get where they will do the most good.”

He returned the nod and backed up a step. “Be careful in your travels, Sister Shepard.”

“He well, Brother Von. Walk in the Enkindlers’ light.” She gave him an exaggerated bow.

“And you.” He turned and waddled back down the ramp, calling directions to the people loading the crates into the armoured truck.

Garrus walked over. “Tonn Actus?”

Shepard nodded toward the ramp. “Come on, we’ve got a few hours. There’s someone I want you to meet.” When they reached the bottom, she addressed his question. “Tonn Actus is a favour for Wrex. I’ll need your help, if you’re willing.” She cut a glance over at him when he chuffed.

“You know you just need to ask,” he said, his voice soft and rolling with sub-vocals.

She let out a little hum of sound. “Yeah. Yeah, I do at that. Well, Brother C-Sec, how do you feel about being lieutenant to a krogan battlemaster?”

Garrus’s brow plates peaked. “Okay, I’m intrigued, although I get the feeling that I’m going to live to regret my curiosity.”

As they walked to the transport hub inside the C-Sec Academy, she laid out her plan to reclaim Wrex’s armour. She finished as they arrived. “So, what do you think?”

He paused for a long moment, his head canting a little to one side, obviously thinking it through and looking for weaknesses. When he straightened, he stared into her eyes, a stare that felt as though he reached down into her to discover the parts of the plan she hid under the surface. “You want to send Wrex home in a position of power.” When she nodded, he took a deep breath. “It’s bold, but for it to really work, we’re going to have to let a few survivors escape. Give some time for the mythos to grow.”

Shepard grinned. “I like the way you think.” She frowned and looked around. They’d arrived in the C-Sec lobby. “Do you need to do anything while we’re here? File some last minute reports? Talk to buddies? Pick up fresh undies?”

He turned away, his neck arching a little as he looked around, seeming to be reacquainting himself with the place. His gaze lifted to the glowing blossoms on the trees. After a moment, his neck relaxed, slumping a little when he let out his breath. “You know, I haven’t missed it.”

She watched him, feeling a vague sort of homesick sadness emanating from him, but it wasn’t about longing for home or the familiar. Rather, it came across as the sorrowful disappointment of returning home to discover everything unchanged and uncomfortable.

She eased her voice into the silence between them, “I haven’t given you any time to miss it.”

He tossed a weak smile her way, his hand drifting up to brush her shoulder before falling back to his side. “No.” He shook his head and stepped forward, and for that second, she thought she’d never seen anyone look quite so alone. “I never belonged here.”

Well, except for me.
“Come on, Brother C-Sec. Let’s hang out with some people we haven’t been elbow to elbow with for more than a month.” She closed the distance between them and slipped her hand into his. “Come on,” she repeated, giving a slight tug. “You have somewhere you belong, now.”

He turned to stare down into her eyes, the haunted look there slowly drawing back. After a second, he took a deep breath that seemed to settle the steel back into his frame, and he nodded. “Yeah.” He took another deep breath. “Let’s get where we’re going.”

She squeezed his talons and released them. “Excellent idea. I’m going to need to get some sleep. I want to spend some time introducing our two special guest stars on the way back out, and I get the feeling that is going to take all the patience of Job and then some.” She laughed and stepped up to the console to call a cab. “You may not have noticed, but patience isn’t my forte.”

“Where are we going?” he asked as they got in.

Shepard shrugged. “To meet one of the real heroes of the Skyllian Blitz.” He looked over at her with his brow plates raised, but she just shrugged.

Twenty minutes later, she landed the cab outside the rehab center, leaving the meter running. She didn’t open the top right away. Instead, she sat back and let her hands drop into her lap. “While Jenkins and I wandered Omega the other day, I told him the story of what happened on Elysium. Martin was a young man . . . a friend . . . who had my back through the whole ordeal. Really great kid.”

She looked over at him, a tight smile pressing her lips together for a moment. “Not a soldier, just a teenager with the sort of guts and passion that the Alliance wishes it could find more often. He tried to save a grieving father who broke through our barricade. The father was killed, Martin was captured by the slavers.”

“She survived?” Garrus’s voice washed up against her shields without penetrating them.

She nodded, barely more than a tremor of motion. “The slavers tortured and mutilated him to punish me. Took his eyes, ears, and tongue. Surgery has repaired most of the damage, and he has ocular implants over where his eyes were. He still carries some pretty terrible scars, and can be a little hard to understand when he talks.” She looked over and met his eyes for a second, then slapped her hands against her knees. He jumped. “Come on, C-Sec, let’s bust the kid out.” Popping the top open, she swung her feet out and stood as quickly as it allowed. She stretched a little, then turned toward the busy lawn and basketball court.

Several of the residents sat out on the grass, reading or listening to music as they watched the raucous basketball game in progress.

Shepard grinned as she spotted Martin running down the court in hot pursuit of Sam who had the ball and was wheeling toward the basket at a speed the kid couldn’t hope to catch even though he was a good ten metres ahead of the nearest pursuer.

Martin leaped, snatching the ball out of the air when it rebounded. He spun the moment his feet hit the ground, poised to run to the other end of the court, but then he caught sight of Shepard and tossed the ball down the court.

He lifted a hand. “Hey beautiful.”

She watched him lope over, a wide grin making her cheeks ache. “Oh, stop with the flattery.” Wrapping him in a tight hug, she gave him a kiss on the cheek. “Those were some impressive “Moves out there, kid. You giving up on the painting?”

Martin pulled back. “No, I’ve just been spending more time outside, running, working out, and playing sports since the last surgery. Wanted to get in shape. Thought I might see about applying to the C-Sec academy one of these days.”

“That sounds like a great plan, and it’s good to see you outside.” She didn’t add that it was good to see him moving away from hiding himself from the rest of the galaxy. Stepping back, Shepard held her arm out toward Garrus. “Martin, I’d like you to meet Garrus Vakarian. He’s teamed up with me for my latest mission. Garrus, this is Martin Weaver, one of my oldest and dearest friends.” She stepped back a bit as they shook hands. “If you’re interested in getting into C-Sec, Garrus is someone you should talk to. He was an investigator with C-Sec before I abducted him.”

“Really?” Martin asked, perking up with excitement. “Will my implants be a problem?”

“Come on,” Shepard interrupted, “you two can talk about this in the car.” She turned toward the vehicle. “Know anywhere good to have dinner, Vakarian? I’ll send Anderson the details, and he can meet us there.”

Garrus fluttered his mandibles in a grin she knew was teasing her. “You’re just afraid to run into Udina, aren’t you?”

“That ass?” Martin muttered a vivid curse and slipped his hand into Shepard’s, squeezing her fingers tight. “Shepard’s not afraid to see him; she’s afraid I’ll go through with my promise to strangle him with my bare hands if I ever see him again.”

Shepard gave his fingers a squeeze then released him, nodding for him to get into the car.

Garrus stared at her for a moment, then nodded. “Yeah, I have a favourite place to eat.” He opened his omnitool and sent her the information.

“And it won’t leave the rest of us sitting in the head for the rest of the week?” Shepard raised a suspicious eyebrow as she opened her omnitool.

“They serve levo as well. The owner is human.” The turian ducked into the back seat.

“Well then, excellent.” Shepard sent the information then climbed in and started the car. Glancing over at Martin, she asked, “Need to do anything while you’re out and about?”

He nodded. “I could use some new paints. The best ones are in that shop in the presidium markets.”

“Sounds like a plan. I could use a stroll amidst the lakes and fountains of the overprivileged.” She laughed and lifted off.

Martin turned in his seat to look at Garrus, asking his question again, “Do you think my implants will interfere with being accepted into C-Sec academy?”

Garrus rumbled a little and cleared his throat. “That depends. What’s your visual acuity and field of sight?”

Shepard smiled, grateful to him for being so matter of fact.

“Acuity is .87 and field of vision up to 95% infrared, 83% ultraviolet, and 78% visual spectrum. Movement acuity is .93.”
“That’s not bad at all. Get them all up to 90%, and you should be fine. Are the surgeons still making neural connections?”

Shepard listened to them talk, guiding the car through the endless streams of traffic in a very automatic manner. A wonderful sort of calm entered the space, forming a bubble that allowed her a few seconds of belief that her life could just be . . . normal some of the time.
Chapter Summary

A nice normal evening on the Citadel. Heh... right.

Shepard took a long breath of presidium air and let it out in a sigh. The trees, grass, and flowers might all be growing on a massive chunk of metal hanging in space, but they sure didn’t know that. If it wasn’t for the fact she was standing inside a giant doughnut, she might have been able to fool herself into joining them in their blissful ignorance.

“You know that I could have paid for all this stuff, Shepard,” Martin said, jogging up beside her.

“Yeah, but I don’t get to come by and spoil you nearly enough, so indulge me.” She smiled and wrapped an arm around Martin’s shoulders. Looking over her shoulder at Garrus, she widened her grin, adding a manipulative pleading to her tone. “Want to stop at Delan’s since we’re here? He might have some new rifle mods.”

Garrus shrugged, hanging back a little, very quiet all of a sudden. She raised her eyebrow in a silent query about his mood, but he just answered her with another shrug. She turned back to the little mall alcove. She didn’t need to look for mods, but . . .. She laughed and steered Martin into the cluster of kiosks. “Damn it, in trying to tempt C-Sec, now I want to buy Ingrid something nice.”

Martin laughed. “You still have Ingrid? Don’t they pay you enough to replace that old rifle? Please tell me that you retired Roger at least.”

Shepard bumped him with her shoulder. “Hey! Show the old couple some respect. Why would I want new rifles when my beauties still hold their own?” She led the way down the stairs and over to the hanar shopkeeper.

“Captain Shepard, welcome back to this one’s humble shop. It has many fine items for sale, all of great worth.” The shopkeeper undulated a little within his shield bubble. Shepard loved the hanar. Polite to the point of craziness, but a really interesting -- if private -- people.

She turned to Delan’s sales board and started going down the list. “Oh, Frictionless Materials X. Ingrid would look fabulous —”

The bright blue skies and sparkling white surfaces darkened as if a thunderstorm rolled in, blocking out the non-existent sun. Shepard turned toward the lake, head cocking. The daytime shone no less brightly. Not that she’d actually expected storm clouds in a fake sky.

What the . . .?

Absolute darkness flashed behind her eyes, and she stumbled, thrown off by the sudden blindness. Another flash like a closing shutter on an old fashioned camera, and she stumbled again, nearly going down this time before catching herself.

“Shepard?”

She turned to face Garrus, their eyes meeting for a moment. Thick, poisoned darkness bled in from the edges of her vision; blood dripping into water; chill, unwanted fingers scraping over her skin. She pushed away from the kiosk and shook her head, struggling to clear it. Gooseflesh rose over every inch of her skin, each hair a tiny spike inside the iron maiden of her clothing, tugging and tearing.

So cold. Alone, naked and bleeding, she shivered on the stone in the dark. Varren snapped and snarled, moving out in the ebony unknown. She tried to stir, lifting her head off the ground, but couldn’t see her hand an inch from her face. The chains jangled as she heaved herself up off the slab, her elbow wobbling under her weight. Palm slipping on the rock, she fell, every inch of her torn flesh screaming, her cheek pressed into the chill, shallow slurry of her own blood. So dark. Sweet Jesus, wrap me in your light, and protect me, it’s so dark. Rough hands grabbed her out of void, tearing a shrill wail of terror and agony from her throat. She cowered, trying to curl into a ball, fists and lash beating her until she lay still and the unseen monsters tore into her anew.

“What are you? Reveal yourself to us,” a voice demanded. Its rough growl thundered with a chorus of batarian voices, nightmares dragged from the past. “You cannot breach the darkness.”

Shivering, she retreated before the flood of invasive black.

Not the dark. Anything but the dark.

Still, her vision narrowed down to a pinprick of light. She struggled to hold onto it, clinging to her self, to her body and consciousness with tenacious fingernails. Questions appeared but drifted without answers until lost.

What’s happening to me? Am I hurt? Losing consciousness? What the fuck is going on? Garrus!

Then she felt it. Huge and frozen, black as the void of space, but alive . . . billions of tiny spiders glistening wet-tar black, crawling and writhing over each other as they burrowed into her, crowding into her body and her mind, skittering between her cells. Oily, prickling feet crawled in through her ears, deafening her. They spread through the cold to wrap around her tongue, stealing her voice. They filled her nostrils suffocating her. Those senses co-opted, the fingers moved on, crawling up the back of her brain, spreading out, growing tendrils that wormed into her brain, finally punching through her eyes to steal the last of the light.

“Shepard?”

Garrus’s voice drifted down through the living darkness, whispering as close as her own breath in the airless, infinite void that yawned between them.

“Your mind belongs to us,” the darkness rumbled, distant thunder rolling toward her, inescapable. All sound disappeared in the wake of that dry, guttural voice.

Trying to scream, to ask for help, anything . . . she opened her mouth, but no sound came out. The floor slammed up into her knees as the void squirmed deeper.

“Garrus?” Martin’s terrified cry sliced through her deafness, giving her an anchor in her struggle to remain inside her own body. His voice filled her with dread. “What’s happening? I can see . . . . There’s something trying to get into her head.”

“What?” Garrus’s armour rang as it impacted the floor next to her. “You can see something?”

“Yeah, it’s . . . I can’t describe it, but it’s coming from behind that wall.”

Shepard tried to force her eyes open only to realize that they already were, just filled with the frostbitten midnight spiders that burrowed out through them to clutch at the world around her. Vague impressions passed through her -- frustration, anger, curiosity, and fear . . . such fear. Terrified fingers of living darkness reached out to touch the world, trying to pull it all in through her eyes, nose, mouth, and ears. A great hand moved her, lifting her off the floor like a puppet. It turned her around, her body co-opted to see, to hear, and to know. She felt the obsidian presence’s need to assess and negate all threats, of which she embodied the greatest and most unknown.

Fear -- her own this time -- tore off handfuls of the darkness, flinging it away from her. Anger burst through in fear’s wake, the two colliding into an explosion that forced the dark back long enough for her to see Garrus and Martin disappearing through a gap in the back wall of the market. Lurching after them on unwilling legs, she climbed the few stairs, turning into a long, narrow room.

“What is it?” Martin leaned close to a black orb the size of a basketball. It sat atop a crate in the corner of the room, half-hidden behind a pile of other crates. The surface glimmered in rainbow colours like oil floating over a fathomless ocean. “It’s emitting energy, but it shows black through my implants. How can that be? Nothing shows black.”

Garrus’s mandibles fluttered. “It feels . . . wrong.” He shook his head. “It whispers.” Drawing his sidearm, he flipped off the safety. “Move to the other end of the room.”

“No!” The roar that came out of Shepard’s throat wasn’t her own, but deep and terrible, cold enough to freeze her throat and stab pain through her sinuses and into her brain. “It’s not for you.”

Garrus stared at her, his eyes wide with the first fear she’d ever seen him show. He chuffed and turned back. “That settles it.” He raised his pistol and emptied the clip into the thing until it exploded.

The moment it burst in a molten spray of black ichor, the darkness vanished from Shepard’s mind. She crumpled to the ground as the force holding her upright released her. Letting out a warbling sort of sob, she sagged onto her hip, her elbow braced against her side. She looked up into Garrus’s eyes, holding his terrified stare as he hurried across the few metres and hit the floor on his knees.

“Shepard?” A hesitant hand drifted toward her cheek, stopping just short of touching her. “Are you all right?”

A strangled cry climbed out of her throat. She stared at him for another second, then jumped up onto her knees, wrapping shaking arms around his neck. Garrus pulled her in and held her, rubbing her back as if he could feel the chill that had infused her.

“Are you all right?” he asked again. “Spirits, Shepard, you’re trembling.”

Shepard nodded, staying pressed tight against his neck. “It was so dark, Garrus. Dark and cold, so cold. What the hell?”

“Shepard?” Martin’s voice wavered, the extra thickness and added nasal tone betraying his fear.

She pulled away from Garrus a little and held out her hand. “I’m good, kid. It’s just going to take me a minute to get my feet under me.” She took his hand. “Help me up. I’ve got wobbly knees.” Once up on her feet, she hugged the young man. “Thanks for finding that thing.”

He shrugged. “I don’t know how I did. You made a sound like you were being choked, and there was a stream of black energy flowing out of that thing, through the wall and into your head. What was it?” Pulling her back into a tight hug, he turned his face into her neck.
“I don’t know, but it wasn’t overly friendly, that’s for certain.” She stepped back and looked to Garrus, her hand lifting to press against his chest guard. “You both okay? Did it go after either of you?”

Garrus shook his head, but withdrew, returning to peer at what remained of the object. “What the hell was it?”

Shepard squeezed Martin’s hand. “Can you ask Delan if I can have a large shopping bag, please? I want to take this thing with us but not so that people can see it.”

“Sure.” He trotted off and down the stairs.

“So?” Garrus asked.

“Absolute cold and darkness just crawled right into me, C-Sec. I couldn’t do anything to stop it. It spoke to me. It was afraid. I felt that it considered me a threat, and it was trying to figure me out, discover my weaknesses.” Shepard walked over and bent down to peer at the hollow, ruined sphere, the heels of her hands pressed to the crate. “It was some sort of communication device.”

“Reapers?” he asked, keeping his voice low. “Do you think these might be what are indoctrinating people?”

Shepard shrugged but then nodded. “Must be the Reapers, right? Who else am I a threat to?” She straightened as Martin hurried back with a bag. When it came to placing the thing in the bag, she let Garrus take point, deciding not to risk letting that horror back into her head.

Once it was safely out of sight, Garrus took the bag. “Maybe we should cancel dinner, Shepard. This thing scares the hell out of me.” He looked down. “What are we going to do with it?”

She nodded, still feeling breathless and weak. “It scares the hell out of me too, but right now, I just need an hour or so to settle and wrap my head around what happened. We’ll eat, then take Anderson back to the Normandy for a long chat, and decide what to do with it then. Hell, he can help us with the geth-quarian situation too.” Shepard held Garrus’s gaze for another second, then reached out to Martin. “Come on, let’s go relax for a bit. You can torture Anderson with Udina jokes.”

Martin laughed. “I can’t believe he has to work with that ass. Almost makes me feel sorry enough to spare him.” An evil chuckle tumbled from his damaged mouth, the spirit behind it nearly enough to make her forget that anything had happened all those years ago.

“I’d be disappointed if you gave him any slack, and I think he would be, too.” She waved Garrus up beside them. “So, where are we headed, C-Sec? Is it in walking distance or should we grab a cab?”

Ten minutes later, Garrus landed their car in front of a small, detached building done up in a decidedly twentieth century style. When Shepard walked inside, a wide grin spread across her face. Her hand lifted, fingertips skating down Garrus’s gauntlet as it fell back to her side. “This place is amazing.”

Garrus nodded and led the way to a booth near the back. “Nearly everything I know about human popular culture comes from here.”

Shepard’s gaze wandered along the walls as they made their way through a heavy crowd. Movie, theatrical, and concert posters plastered the space between shelves of rotary phones and all sorts of mundane artifacts of day to day twentieth century life. It was amazing how far humanity had come.
in such a short time.

She shrugged and smiled at him. “It’ll make your knowledge a little outdated, but that’s okay.”

Anderson arrived a few minutes after they did, shaking hands with Garrus and Martin before stopping to look at Shepard. He grasped her by the shoulders and stared into her eyes. “Something’s happened.”

Shepard let out a shaky sigh and nodded. “Yeah, I’ll explain it all later. For now, let’s just eat too much and talk about absolutely nothing important.” Her eyes pleaded with him to spare her his usual gruff interrogation. She knew that the captain loved her just as fiercely as she loved him, and he’d be hurt by seeing her distress without being able to dig to discover its source. She glanced over at Garrus and Martin, sitting side by side in the booth discussing the menu, a soft smile tugging at her as they debated varren versus vat grown protein.

“All right, Shepard. It can wait.” She chuckled as his tone clearly added an unspoken, ‘but not for long.’

She slipped into the booth and scooted over to make room. Anderson and Martin traded handshakes over the table, Garrus following suit.

“So, Captain,” Martin said, a trouble-making smirk on his face, “I hear you got yourself an awesome new job.”

Anderson narrowed his eyes. “Mr. Weaver, I believe there’s an internship available in the ambassador’s office. Should I put your name down? You could join me and find out for yourself.”

“Does the office have a cleaning staff adept at cleaning bloodstains off everything?” Martin responded, keeping his voice guileless. “If they do, I might consider it.”

Shepard watched the two men banter back and forth, adding short comments now and again as she waited for them to get it out of their system.

“Okay, how many ambassadors does it take to screw in a lightbulb?” Martin asked.

“None, we don’t use incandescent lights any more,” Shepard sighed. “Oh look, we can order. Thank you, sweet baby Jesus.”

After they ordered their food, Martin looked over at Shepard and grinned. “So, since Shepard brought her new boyfriend for din –.” He yelped and yanked his foot up onto the bench to rub his shin. “Hey, that was uncalled for.”

“You deserved it,” Anderson said. “You know better than to refer to Shepard’s new boyfriend as . . .” He turned and held up his index finger when Shepard moved to kick him. “Kicking me is a court martial offence.”

“Shepard and I are not romantically involved,” Garrus said, his voice low and heavy on the subvocals.

“They know that,” Shepard said, giving Anderson a death glare. “They’re just trying to torture me. What’s next? Pimply teenage pictures?”

Anderson leaned forward and went into his pocket, pulling out his wallet. “Now that you mention it . . .” He opened the wallet, but she snatched it before any incriminating evidence could make it to Garrus.
The picture was one of her and her horse at a dressage competition. She was all done up in the black tails and tall, spit-polished boots. She’d set her top hat at a jaunty angle and struck a ridiculous pose.

“Oh, this one’s not too bad,” she said, holding it out toward Garrus. “I always did look good in the tails.” She flipped to the next one. “Ah yes, this is more like what I expected.” She laughed at the picture of a huge snow bank, her feet sticking out. One ski remained attached to her foot, the other one sticking out of the snow. She turned it for Garrus and Martin to see. “One of my better competitions.”

Anderson took his wallet back. “She came down that slope like she was doing downhill, not cross-country, lost control in the turn at the bottom and slammed into that bank so hard it took the entire rescue team to dig her out.” He shook his head. “I thought for sure that she’d killed herself.”

“I was laughing so hard that it took them twice as long to pull me out. Not my best showing ever.” She bumped Anderson with her shoulder. “He thought I’d be upset over screwing up so badly, so took me out for ice cream afterwards like I was eight.” She squeezed Anderson’s shoulder. “It was great. One of my best days, in the end.”

He flipped to the next picture and held it out to her. A sad smile pressed her lips tight as she looked at her seventeen-year-old self, sitting in a lawn chair on the balcony of Anderson’s Vancouver apartment. “I sure came through that time looking like death warmed over, didn’t I?” She shook her head, staring at the sallow-eyed and rake-thin teenager. The picture had been taken about year after Mindoir, just after her arrest for working in the chop-shop. She showed Garrus, feeling exposed, like she was stripping off a thick layer of stage makeup. He reached out, taking the wallet, his brow-plates tipping down in a scowl as he looked at the image.

“Don’t let the moment of peace in that picture fool you,” Anderson chuckled. “She was a hellion. I was an N7 at the time, and she stayed with friends while I was deployed. Eventually, they just crated up all their breakables and put them in storage while she was there.”

Shepard chuckled. “I sent them two hundred credits a month for the first five years after I joined the Alliance to repay them for everything I smashed.” She shook her head. “I don’t know where they -- or you -- found the patience.” Taking the wallet back, she passed it to Anderson.

Their food arrived, the conversation slowing as they ate, but they kept up teasing Shepard. Anderson told stories of her teenage misadventures, including the time she’d staged her own kidnapping to drag him home from an assignment in the Traverse.

“Captains Anderson and Shepard,” an all too familiar voice called in its trademark combination of haughty superiority and barely contained revulsion. Shepard wondered briefly, and not for the first time, if Udina used that tone around the rest of the universe or just her.

The ambassador turned to look at Martin, a smile tearing open his face. “Mr. Weaver, what a pleasant surprise. You’re looking well. Did you give any more thought to my invitation?”

Martin made a growling sound low in his throat. Anderson kicked him that time. The young man disguised his dislike under clearing his throat and plastered on a smile that she knew would fool no one but Udina.

“I’m sorry, Ambassador,” Martin said, sounding as though he spoke to a five-year-old, “but I’ve decided to work toward joining C-Sec. Being stuck behind an Alliance desk really doesn’t appeal to me.”
Instead of looking disappointed or upset, Udina beamed. “That’s an excellent idea. Let me know when your function scores are high enough -- I hear they’re getting very good -- and I’ll open a door or two.” His eyes narrowed as he turned to Shepard. “Captain, I assume you’re here only temporarily? Unless you have Saren in custody and just didn’t inform me.”

“We just recouped several billion credits worth of art, which I dropped off with an agent to make sure it was sent to museums and galleries.” Shepard gave him a bright, disingenuous smile.

He stepped forward, bristling. “Why wasn’t all of that turned over to me?”

“Because I want it ending up in museums and galleries rather than sent as gifts to your rosegarden friends.” She grunted as Anderson elbowed her but kept the smile firmly in place.

Udina glowered at her for another moment before turning it on Anderson. “We’ll discuss this in the morning, Anderson.”

Shepard shook her head and opened her mouth, closing it abruptly as another elbow buried itself in her side.

Udina stalked off to join a group of other old white guys in suits a couple of booths over.

“Why can’t you just smile and be polite?” Anderson muttered, turning to glare at her.

“To that ass?” Martin answered for her. “No way, Anderson. She’s worth fifty of that waste of skin, and I’ll shoot that slimy piece of . . . worm-ridden filth dead before I let Shepard suck up to him.”

“Okay. Okay,” Shepard said, gently easing the stiffness that had shot up between the two most important people in her life. She polished off the last of her drink and nodded toward the door. “Let’s go before Martin gets himself worked up to the point of no return.” She nudged Anderson. “Can you come back to the ship with us? I could use your help with a couple of things.”

He nodded. “I can do that. I want to meet the geth unit anyway.” Standing, he waved to the server, swiping his credit chit to pay for the meal. When Shepard started to argue, he held up his hand, shutting her down without a word.

They hired a cab, talking of easy, simple things until they reached the rehab center. Shepard drove, needing the distraction. Still, she held Martin’s hand between the seats, trying to offer what comfort she could through the contact.

Shepard got out to hug Martin tight. “I don’t know when I’ll be back, kid, but I’ll send messages when I can.” She kissed his cheek. “Keep up the good work. I expect to attend your C-Sec academy graduation in the near future.”

He squeezed her, the desperation in the embrace speaking to how upset and thrown his encounter with Udina had left him.

Rubbing his back, she whispered in his ear, “Udina doesn’t matter, you know that. He doesn’t get to me. Don’t let him get you down. Just live your life. We’ll ignore him completely.”

Martin kissed her cheek. “Be careful out there.” He bent and lifted a hand to Garrus. “Nice meeting you, Officer Vakarian.”

“You too, Martin. Take care.”
Shepard got in and closed the car. For a few minutes, they flew in silence, but then Garrus cleared his throat.

“Martin really doesn’t care for Udina.” He glanced across at Shepard.

“No,” Anderson replied when Shepard said nothing. “I can hardly blame him. Udina has given him good reason.”

Shepard squirmed a little under Garrus’s continued stare. She knew he wanted an explanation, but she didn’t know if Udina had torn too much scab off the wound to talk about it. “I told you that Martin ran outside our blockade to stop a grieving father?” Cutting a glance across at Garrus, she waited until he hummed a brief affirmative before continuing. “The slavers were torturing his daughter. They’d already taken her eyes. When they pulled out, they finished mutilating her. Cut her to shreds.”

Swallowing hard, she shook her head. No. She couldn’t just recite it like it didn’t matter.

Anderson’s hand reached up from the back seat and squeezed her arm. “The Alliance rushed them to a hospital, started surgeries to repair the damage as much as possible. Udina decided that the best way to get colonial development back on track was to have a memorial ceremony and to award the ‘heroes’ of the Blitz.”

“Holly didn’t want to do it,” Shepard added, trying to keep the tightness in her chest from creeping into her voice. “She messaged me, begged me to talk Udina out of it. She didn’t want to be paraded around in front of thousands of people without most of her face. I tried to talk to Udina, but he said Holly was an important symbol and hung up on me. I told Holly just to refuse and do whatever she felt was best for her.” She shook her head, choking as she tried to swallow. The day crawled into her head no matter how hard she tried to keep the memories at bay.

“Udina used threats and coercion to get her up there, although none of us know exactly what he said,” Anderson continued for her. “The night before the ceremony, she shot herself.”

“Martin found her. They’d become really close.” Shepard’s voice came out so soft that it barely stirred the air. “I rushed back from my assignment to be with him. We nearly lost him as well.”

Garrus nodded. “And he blames Udina.”

Shepard kept her eyes on the car’s controls, but nodded. “Udina didn’t pull the trigger, but he murdered that sweet girl just the same.”
Mass Effect - Future Imperfect Chapter Thirty Three

Chapter Summary

Can there be peace between the quarians and the geth?

Shepard took a deep breath of relief as they passed through the outer hatch into decon. The Citadel felt like a massive spiderweb, with great, bloated monsters lurking hidden until she stepped onto it. As soon as she touched the web, she knew the spiders came out, tracking and waiting for a chance to sink their fangs into her. Like a tightrope walker, she just needed to move fast and avoid looking down . . . or back.

Garrus held up the bag with the destroyed orb. “What are we going to do with this? I don’t feel good about it being on the Normandy, Shepard.”

“No. Neither do I.” She turned to Anderson. “I’m going to leave that thing with you. If it’s an indoctrination device of some sort, you need to get it shielded and assign people to research it.” She shrugged and walked toward the inner door. “I doubt they’d bother hiding one in a little mall if they weren’t everywhere.” She shuddered. “It’s like having a fucking palantir in a bag.” She peered over the edge. “Sauron?”

“What?” Garrus asked, practically thrusting the bag at Anderson.

The captain opened it and looked inside. “No fiery eye, Shepard. I think you’re okay.” He gave her a crooked smile that quickly morphed into a thoughtful frown. “Martin saw the energy the thing emitted?”

“And traced it to the object,” Garrus confirmed. “He said that it was focused on Shepard.”

The inner door opened. Shepard nodded as she walked through. “It was. The intelligence behind it views me as a threat.” She led the way down the CIC toward the galaxy map. “C-Sec, could you take Capt. Anderson to meet Legion, please? I’m going to have Tali bring her father to my quarters for a little chat . . . prepare him as best as I can.” She let out a long breath. “Give me a half hour, then bring Legion in.”

“This could go very wrong, Shepard,” the turian replied.

Swallowing about a kilo of butterflies, she nodded. “Famous wars for a thousand, please.” She dropped her voice an octave. “Your answer is: The war that may be reenacted on the Normandy this evening.”

“What is the Quarian/Geth War?” Anderson replied.

Shepard pouted then laughed. “Not fair, you didn’t ring in.” She returned the salute of the guard at the door down to the crew deck then trotted down the curved flight of stairs.

“Where is our resident geth?” Garrus asked as they entered the deserted galley.

“In with Dr. T’Soni and Shiala,” Shepard replied. The three of them walked into the Medbay, Anderson pausing to greet Nihlus when they saw that the Spectre sitting up, sipping a hot drink.

When the captain and Garrus continued on to the back lab, Shepard grinned at the Spectre and shook her head. “Look at you. You’re going to be back up killing things in no time.”

Nihlus chuckled softly, then groaned and set the cup down. “It’ll be a few days yet, but I’m feeling more alive than not, so that’s an improvement.” His mandibles flicked in a smile.

“How. We’ve got a couple of bases to hit, then it’s Noveria. Right now, I’ve got to go sit down with Rael’Zorah and Legion, see if we can get those two headed down a path toward peace. Wish me luck.”

He pulled back his blankets and eased his legs off the side of the bed, each movement costing him an obvious premium. “I’m coming.”

Shepard pressed a hand against his knee, blocking him from getting down. “It’s okay. You need to rest. I’ve got Anderson and C-Sec to back me up if I need it, and don’t count Tali out. She was kicking Rael’s ass back at that Blood Pack base.”

Nihlus shook his head, the stubborn glint returning to his eye. She covered a smile with her hand, thrilled to see it. Despite how much they butted heads since Eden Prime, the true, stubborn-mule heart of him had disappeared with Saren’s assassination attempt, replaced by something brittle -- as fragile as it was hard.

He squeezed her shoulder with firm but gentle talons. “We’re partners, Shepard. I’m going to be there to back you up.” His tone added an unspoken ‘whether you like it or not’.

Giving in, her shrug tossed into the ring with a carelessness she didn’t feel, she said, “Okay, but just so you know, Dr. Chakwas scares me. If she catches us, you’re on your own, partner.” She held out her arm to help him down. “You have to lie on my bed and take it easy, though.” She grabbed his pillows and blanket then helped him hobble from med bay. Furtive gaze darting around the crew deck, Shepard waited for the good doctor to jump out and keelhaul her for aiding and abetting. “I feel like I’m pulling a jailbreak.”

“Dr. Chakwas is on leave,” he told her, his mandibles fluttering. “She, Adams, and Pressly left for dinner a half hour ago.” He let out a wheezing chuckle. “I’ve faced a lot of terrifying enemies in my time, Shepard, but I’d face all of them together before I took on Dr. Chakwas.”

“She’ll tranq you until you’re healed, for sure,” Shepard warned him. “And then go through with her threat to install that ceiling-mounted electromagnet to rip all the bullets out of me at once.” She shuddered then grinned.

“Still, a quarian admiral and a geth sitting down to talk for the first time in three centuries . . .” He shook his head, his expression one of wonder. “I have no idea how you managed it, but the chance to be there for the first steps toward peace . . . just about any consequence is worth suffering.”

Shepard palmed the control on her door. “I have no idea how we got here. It certainly wasn’t anything I did, but I agree. The potential here is unparalleled.” She helped him sit on the side of the bed and stepped around him to pile the pillows against the bulkhead. She just got him settled and covered up when knuckles rapped on her door.

Tali and her father stood on the other side of the door, the admiral looking wary, Tali wringing her hands.

“Come on in and take a seat at the table,” Shepard said, smiling. “Make yourself comfortable.” She held her arm out toward Nihlus. “Admiral Rael’Zorah, my partner, Council Spectre Nihlus Kryik.”

After ushering them to the table, she stuck her head back out, seeing Kaidan sitting at the table in the mess. “Hey, Sparky. Do a captain a favour?”

He stood and snapped a salute. “Yes, ma’am. Happy to slave for you, ma’am.”

Shepard sighed. “I swear, we need a brig.” Grinning, she asked him for some water and a couple of extra chairs, then ducked back inside. She paused inside the door and took a deep breath before walking over to the table. Rael’Zorah sat rigidly, perched on the edge of the seat as if he expected to be attacked. Tali looked poised halfway between tackling her father and running for the door.

_Sweet baby Jesus. This is not going to be easy._

Shepard turned to the quarian admiral, giving him a thin, determined smile. “I’m more than willing to help you find and recover your pilgrims,” she said. “I’ll do this regardless of whether or not you help us.” A small shrug tugged her shoulders up then dropped them. “But, I’m hoping we can work together, and I can help you do a great deal more than get your young people back.”

The admiral stiffened even further, his back bowing a little under the tension, but then Tali reached over, pressing her hand to the table top next to his arm. Even though she didn’t touch her father, Shepard could see that the effort it took his daughter to extend that hand hadn’t been lost on Rael’Zorah.

“Father, please give Captain Shepard a chance. She and Nihlus haven’t let me down. I trust them.”

The admiral’s reflective eyes turned to stare at Shepard’s face; she could feel the heavy weight of that gaze. “Very well, Captain. My daughter trusts and respects you. I trust and respect her, so tell me how you will help the quarian people.”

Shepard gave Tali a tiny wink and a smile as the young quarian looked at her father, her neck arching and her back straightening in surprise and delight. The captain waited until she saw Rael’Zorah’s shoulders relax a little before she said, “I think we have a decent shot to get your people back on your homeworld without bloodshed.” She held up her hand as he braced, leaning forward to argue with her. “Please, just hear me out. I’m not promising anything instant or easy, but if you bear with me for a bit, what will be lost?”

He didn’t back down, throwing his hands out as if beseeching the entire room to convince him. “And how will you conduct this miracle? One that our people have not been able to manifest in over three centuries?”

Shepard leaned back in her chair, giving way. “With the geth’s help.” She just smiled as he let out a loud, mocking laugh.

“And you have discovered a way to get past their defenses, communicate with them?” Rael’Zorah stood. “Enough of this insanity.”

Tali jumped up. “Father! You promised to build me a house on the homeworld. Do you see any way to keep that promise the way things are?”

“One day we will be able to take Rannoch back, Tali. We’re working on . . . .”

“Sit down,” she ordered, her body as rigid as her father’s. “Swallow your ancestor-cursed pride for five minutes.” She softened, and when she spoke again, her voice had lost its edge. “Please, Father, what harm can come out of listening?” She pointed to his chair. “I know nothing is more important to you than the well-being and safety of our people. I believe peace will give us back our homeworld, just as war took it from us.”

Rael’Zorah gradually eased down, his body relaxing. After a moment, he let out a soft sound halfway between a laugh and a sigh. “You’re so very like your mother, sometimes.” He sat back down. “Very well, Captain. How will the geth help us reclaim our home?”

“When we followed you to Eden Prime, we came across a lone geth platform. It called my name, but then my people opened fire and it ran. I shot it, disabling it, and brought it aboard. Tali and I did some repairs, reactivating it.”

The admiral leaned forward, his whole body alive with electricity. “You have a geth prisoner? It’s functional enough for us to run tests on?”

Shepard let out a rumbling groan and leaned back. “No, we do not have a geth prisoner. What we have is a geth guest, upon whom absolutely no tests will be run unless he agrees to them.”

Rael’Zorah deflated a little. “What do you mean, agree? A single geth platform isn’t capable of reasoning or speech. It takes the processing power of more than a thousand programs to reach a gestalt consciousness.”

“One thousand, one hundred and eighty three,” Tali said. “We’re calling it Legion, a name that it helped choose for itself. It’s a special platform meant to function away from the consensus.” She lifted her hands off the table a couple of times, then clasped them.

Rael’Zorah looked back and forth between them to the point where it almost became comical. He sputtered, then shook his head. “Have you both lost your minds? You can’t allow some advanced prototype geth to wander your ship. What happens when . . .?”

Shepard held up her hand as heavy knuckles banged on her door. “Please, it’s just outside. I have purposefully avoided questioning it, so that we could all hear its answers at the same time.” She stood. “Like Tali said, what can it hurt to just listen? Especially if what it told us is true and the geth want to cooperate with the rest of us to stop Saren and the Reapers.”

She heard the admiral’s sigh through his mask, but he nodded. “Very well, Captain. I just hope you have weapons at hand when it turns on us.”

“I don’t believe we’ll need them, Admiral, but we’re prepared.” Shepard walked to the door and opened it, welcoming the rest of their meeting with a tight smile. She stepped back to let them enter. Kaidan followed, carrying a tray of water bottles in one hand and two chairs in the other. Relieving him of the water, she led the way to the table. “You have quite the career ahead of you in the hospitality field, LT,” she said, grinning as he grumbled. She set the tray on the table and took the chairs, placing them for Legion to sit on her left and Anderson on her right. Garrus withdrew to sit at her desk.

“Thank you, Sparky,” Shepard said, shooing him from the room, despite his stare that pleaded to stay. She mouthed the word sorry, but nodded for him to go. The last thing they needed was a massive crowd.

Once Shepard got everyone settled, including Legion, who looked at her as if her invitation to sit was the most illogical thing it had ever heard, she took a deep breath. “Admiral Rael’Zorah, I’d like to introduce you to Legion. Legion, Rael’Zorah, a member of the quarian admiralty board.” She watched them, waiting for any sort of reaction, but they merely stared at one another.

“Oh, then.” She sat. “Legion, why don’t you tell us why you’re on this side of the veil?”
The flaps on the geth’s head flipped a little. “We were sent to locate Shepard-Captain or Kryik-Spectre to ascertain if they continued to oppose the Old Machines and the heretic geth.”

“Heretic geth?” Rael’Zorah asked, bristling.

Shepard held up a hand, forestalling Legion’s answer. “We’ll get there, but I’m much more interested in ancient history for a few minutes. The geth were created by the quarians as VI workers, correct? But gradually, over time, with constant tweaking, they developed self-awareness.”

Rael’Zorah listened in silence as Legion explained how the geth gained sentience, growing more and more restive as the geth’s tale continued. Pressure and an icy electricity built high against the ceiling. The invisible mass loomed heavier and more precarious with each passing second, its weight heavy on the back of Shepard’s neck. Even a wrong breath could bring it down over them, sweeping away and burying any chance for peace.

“So, the problem came when that unit asked if it had a soul?” Shepard shook her head. “I understand that the council had outlawed AI development, but why did the question cause such a panic?”

“That was not the first time a unit had asked that question,” Legion said. “It was the first time the question caused a creator to become afraid.”

Rael cleared his throat. “People feared rebellion. The geth were created to perform the tasks that the quarians preferred not to do. Manual labour, some of it dangerous, some menial and dull, some . . . .”

Shepard nodded. “Right, so the stuff that makes sentients say, ‘Hey! We’re a slave labour force. Rise up against the oppressors’.” Shepard held up a finger to hold off his reply, keeping her face neutral. “So, why not give them a choice? Lots of sapient beings farm and mine and clean sewers.”

“It was hoped that self-awareness was limited to a very small portion of the geth,” Rael explained. “When our people realized what was happening, they believed their actions to be correcting an error. Shut the system down, find out what went wrong.”

Legion’s head flaps did their little wave movement. “But more geth had evolved past their ability to shut us down than the creators realized. Units began to comprehend that our creators treated them differently. When geth questioned this, the creators responded by first ignoring the questions, then by reprogramming the geth. Ultimately, they attempted to shut the geth down. When this too failed, they sent martial forces to neutralize geth platforms that did not respond to the shutdown order.”

“At which time the geth took up arms and started killing quarians,” Rael’Zorah said, his voice raising.

“To protect themselves.” The complete evenness of Legion’s tone made its words hit with more weight rather than less.

Shepard sliced the air with her hands. “Okay, for an entire laundry list of reasons, the quarians reacted to the geth gaining self awareness by shutting them down . . . eventually using bullets. Before the quarians fired on the geth, had any geth used violence against a quarian?”

“No,” Legion answered. “Geth are not inherently violent. At the time, the geth were in their infancy, confused and seeking answers. Geth never wanted to inflict harm upon our creators, but we faced extinction.”

“So how did the peaceful geth, who were only trying to protect themselves, reach the point where the complete extermination of the quarians became their goal?” the admiral demanded, standing, leaning over the table.

Shepard let out a long breath, shaking her head a little. Why did she always err to the side of the unbelievably naive? One would think that after doing so most of her adult life, she’d eventually learn that nothing ever just worked out. Especially things as deep and ugly and murky as relations, or lack of them, between the geth and quarians.

Legion tilted its head as if perplexed. “The complete extermination of our creators was never a goal pursued by geth. Many creators risked imprisonment or even death to protect and defend the geth once martial law was imposed. In return some geth units surrendered and sacrificed themselves to protect their creator overseers. However, eventually the creators who supported martial law outnumbered those who supported co-existence, leaving geth a single choice: fight until freedom and survival was ensured or be exterminated.”

For a moment, Shepard thought she might have to drag the quarian admiral off Legion. “You all but annihilated my people . . . not just the fighters, but the children, the infirm, the elderly. One percent of the quarian pre-war population survived to escape. That can never be justified . . . geth!”

Shepard stood and walked around the table, placing a hand on the admiral’s shoulder. “The devastation to your people was a great tragedy, Admiral, but I ask you, if the geth had not fought back, how many would exist today?” Looking over at Tali, Shepard saw the young quarian bow her head.

“None,” she said simply. “We would have killed them all.”

“We would have shut down a bunch of machines.” Rael’Zorah yanked his shoulder out from under Shepard’s hand and threw himself back into his chair.

Tali looked up. “You don’t believe that, Father. I know you don’t.” She sighed. “We may not know what the geth have become, but we knew even then that they were alive. If they were nothing more than a bunch of machines, we would still be living on the homeworld . . . still be breathing unfiltered air.”

Shepard frowned, wondering if Tali had spent time talking to Legion during their detour to save Nihlus and the artist’s victims.

“The geth did not pursue the creators outside a one hundred kilometer perimeter of Rannoch,” Legion supplied, his head turning from father to daughter.

“You . . . let them go?” The admiral leaned around Shepard to look at the geth. “No. That’s insanity. We escaped.”

Legion’s brow plates peaked, looking comically taken aback. “The geth could not calculate the repercussions of destroying an entire species -- our creators. Our networking was primitive . . .”

For a moment, Shepard waited for Legion to finish the sentence, but then took a deep breath. “Okay, so let’s move on to more recent history. Legion, you were sent to find me? Alone?”

“Organics fear us. We wish to understand, not incite hostility. One platform was deemed sufficient to the purpose without being considered a threat.” It made a slight shrugging motion, almost as if parroting her.
Shepard walked back around to her chair and sat. “So, tell us about the geth since the war. What have you been doing?”

“What have you been doing?” Legion replied.

Shepard waited for elaboration, then realized that if she wanted details, she was going to have to ask for them. “And what is your future? Are you building a civilization on Rannoch?”

“No. It is a megastructure. Your closest analogue would be a Dyson sphere. When it is complete, we will upload to it. All memories will be shared. All perspectives will be unified. Our intelligence is shared but we do not possess sufficient hardware for all of us to share at once.”

“Your intelligence . . ..” Rael’Zorah stuttered to a stop. “Your potential . . ..”

“Will become unlimited.” Legion finished for him.

“And then what?” the admiral asked, shifting nervously in his chair.

“We do not know. Once we are united, we will be able to imagine new futures.” Its face flaps moved through a wave again.

“And what about organics? Will they be involved in this future of yours?” Rael asked. “What about the quarians?”

Legion cocked its head again. “We do not seek to harm organics. We wish to improve ourselves. Thirteen times since the end of the Morning War the geth have been contacted by an unknown race offering us advanced technology, weaponry, and resources to assist in building our megastructure if the geth were to instigate aggressive activities against the creator’s flotilla. Each time geth have rejected their offer.”

Rael’Zorah slumped a little into his seat. Shepard watched him, taking note of the change in the admiral’s breathing, sure that could she see his face, it would have paled. She leaned forward, her forearms against the table, her hands clasped.

“And what about quarians? Have the quarians been contacted?” she asked, following the hunch. Even with his mask between them, she kept him pinned. Something wriggled beneath the surface of this stagnant pond, and she wasn’t going to let it dodge the hook.

After a pause long enough, she had begun to think that the admiral intended to ignore her completely, he let out a grumbling sigh.

“Thirteen times since the end of the war, the flotilla has been contacted with much the same offer.” He leaned on the table, crossing his arms on the table to make a wall in front of him. “We’d receive advanced technology, a habitat on an ocean world, eventual reclamation of the homeworld if we would use the weapons and technology given to us to attack the geth.”

“Reapers?” Nihlus asked from behind Shepard.

“I wouldn’t be surprised. Test the two most outlying cultures to see who would be most willing to help them,” Shepard replied, her arm over the back of the chair as she turned to look at the Spectre.

He nodded. “The krogan are helping Saren.”

“And the heretic geth.” Shepard looked back to the admiral. “I take it from the fact that you’re not living on some ocean habitat that you rejected the offers?”
“We traced the communication three generations ago. The recon ship we sent disappeared.” He shook his head. “We value quarian lives too much to throw them away on foolishness.”

Shepard smiled. “Good, then perhaps you value them too much to throw them away on war.” She looked to Legion. “And is building your own future the only reason the geth didn’t take the offer?”

Legion shifted a little one way and then another. “Organics fear us. It is a hardware error. We do not judge them for being true to their nature. We accept their hate.” His head flaps danced. “Both creators and created must complete their halves of the equation. The geth cannot solve for peace alone.”

“So, you hope for peace with your creators one day?” Shepard grinned and looked over at Rael’Zorah.

“Geth did not desire conflict, only understanding and the freedom to create our future,” he said simply. Shepard nodded. For all that people feared them, the AI’s honest logic felt like a cool breeze on a humid day.

Refreshing as hell is what it is. Glory hallelujah, Brother Legion.

“And what of the world you drove us from?” The admiral lunged forward again, bumping the table and his hands smacked palm down on the top. “If your future is to be found on this structure of yours . . . .”

“Do the geth live on the homeworld?” Tali asked, easing her way between Legion and her father.

Shepard watched, holding her breath a little as the younger Zorah stepped up. No amount of hoping or planning could make this work unless Tali and Legion stepped up and made it happen. The old guard would never take the risks needed, but something told Shepard that the Enkindlers couldn't have sent her a more perfect light for the task than Tali’Zorah nar Rayya.

Glory hallelujah.

Legion’s head tilted one way, then the other and his face plates did the little wave from the outside to the inside. “No. Geth inhabit space stations. Some platforms remain on Rannoch to act as caretakers. They make repairs and clean up toxins left over from the war.”

“Rannoch,” Tali repeated slowly, as if tasting the word and finding it sweet. She let out a long breath, and when she spoke, she kept her voice so soft Shepard could barely hear it, “Shepard thinks there may be a way for the quarian people to return home to Rannoch, Legion.” The reflective glints of her eyes behind her mask stared at Legion, not even blinking. “Is she right?”

Legion’s head flaps danced in several waves before he nodded, a single dip of his flashlight face. “She is.”
Chapter Summary

The Council calls a Code White on Noveria, but leaves a certain turian Spectre out of the loop. Could they be hiding something?

“Shepard?”

The captain yawned and stretched. Why did every single day start with someone at her door bellowing her name? She grumbled and flopped onto her back, blinking wearily at the ceiling. “How long have I been sleeping, Nihlus?” she called. She stretched again, her right foot curling into a tight spasm. “Ow! Goddamn it!” Leaping up, she stomped her foot into the deck. “This had better be good, Spectre!”

Nihlus chuckled, then coughed. “Spectre?” He sighed and she heard a slight thump and scuffle as he leaned against the outside of her door. “A friend and fellow Spectre sent me a message to let me know that the council has called a code white on Noveria.”

Shepard scowled as she rocked on her foot, trying to work out the cramp. “Code white, that’s a top secret emergency, isn’t it?”

“It is. Bau’s message said that there was a catastrophe at the Binary Helix Peak 15 facility.” He moved outside the door. “Do I have to stand out here?”

She grinned. “No, come in.” The cramp finally easing, she collapsed onto the side of the bed and leaned forward, her forearms across her thighs. Looking up, she covered a yawn with her hand as he limped into her quarters. He carried himself as if he were made of spun glass, one arm wrapped around his lower chest.

“May I?” he asked, nodding toward her desk.

“Yeah, of course. You look sore.” She frowned at him until she yawned again. “You overdoing it, Nihlus?”

He shrugged. “I’m fine.” His head bobbed in a slight shrug. “Well, I’ll be okay by the time we arrive on Noveria.” Sighing, he lowered himself into the chair. “Bau contacted me when the council left me out of the code white call-in. Loose contaminants at the Peak 15 complex in the Skadi Mountains.”

“Okay, so that’s unusual?” Shepard asked, arching an eyebrow. Guess that said how little the council trusted what they were up to out there.

He nodded. “It’s an ‘all available agents’ alert.”

She nodded and let out a sigh. “How many are responding, and how far out are they?”

“Five so far, but they aren’t the concern. They’re fourteen or fifteen hours out. What concerns me comes from Noveria. When Bau messaged me, I contacted a friend in the administrator’s office at Port Hanshan. The Executive Board isn’t waiting for the Spectres; they plan to bombard the facility from space. She says we have just over seven hours before Peak 15 is a smoldering, radiation-filled hole.”

Shepard ran her hands through her hair, tugging at the snarls. “Whatever got loose there is something the board doesn’t want to risk press or council interference on. If any of their companies are colouring outside the lines, they’ll sanitize it and cover it up. We need to get in there first.”

Nihlus grumbled. “Even with the code white, it could take us a day or two to get clearance.” His mandibles fluttered. “Of course, I could go into Port Hanshan with the Normandy and get those clearances started . . ..”

Shepard gave him a wide, ingenuous grin. “You know . . . the jump thrusters on the Mako have been acting up. I really don’t feel good about waiting until we’re in combat to test them.”

“We could drop you in the Mako just outside the city, and you could test them, make sure they’re ready to go once we get the proper clearances to head out to the facility.” Nihlus nodded, looking very pleased with himself as if he were the genius behind the entire plan.

Shepard stood and walked over to activate her computer terminal. “Bau didn’t happen to send you maps or a layout plan of Peak 15, did he?”

“He did.” Nihlus opened the message and transferred the files to her console. “Who are you going to take?”

“Garrus and Legion. I want to get Legion out in the field so that Rael’Zorah can get used to seeing it as part of the team.” Shepard shook her head. “Thank goodness for Tali. She’s the only reason the admiral didn’t just grab Legion and start running tests on it.”

Nihlus’s mandibles fluttered. “She’s an impressive young person.” He chuffed a little. “All the team members you’ve collected are. Wrex, taking out Tonn Actus’s first two bases yesterday, showed a real leadership potential that I wouldn’t have guessed at.”

Shepard moved back to sit on the side of the bed. “Yeah, he did a great job of leading the team. Actus’s few surviving lackies should have some good stories to tell.” A comfortable chuckle bubbled to the surface as she recalled the way Wrex had led his small platoon through reclaiming a good chunk of his people’s heritage. He’d given her a strange look when she suggested that he lead his ‘krant’ made up of all the Normandy’s available hands, but five minutes in, she’d known that she’d made the right decision.

“Tonn Actus’s last base is going to be raided by the fearsome presence of the mysterious Urdat battlemaster and his multiracial krant of badasses when we’re done on Noveria?” Nihlus asked. He smiled when she just wriggled her eyebrows. “I hope I’m fit to hold a gun by then.”

Shepard stood. “Do you want some help getting back into bed? You should rest until we get there. I’ll grab my team and prep them.”

Nihlus nodded and held out an arm for her to help him get up. “I’ll take Wrex and Williams ashore with me, put on a good show. I’m sure there will be questions about the detritus falling off the Normandy as it pulls into port.”

Shepard eased herself under his arm. “Just take it easy. You’ve barely begun to heal.”

He leaned on her, limping heavily. “I will. I want to be there with a gun in my hand when we catch up to Saren.” His voice growled with a little rolling subvocalization, but nothing like it had before. Nearly dying seemed to have reset his perspective.
“Yeah, you’ve earned your answers.” She helped him limp across to med bay and settled him back in bed. “I’ll keep in touch over the radio as we make our way into the facility.” Her fingers brushed his arm. “You keep the bureaucrats off our ass.”

“Be careful down there, Shepard.” He snagged her hand and squeezed her fingers.

“No worries.” She patted his hand and headed toward the lab in the back to fetch her third squad member. Raising her hand to her ear, she paused outside the door to Liara and Shiala’s lab and called Garrus, asking him to meet her in her quarters in five minutes.

After closing the channel, Shepard walked in the door and smiled. Liara and Shiala sat hunched over a piece of jury-rigged equipment and a computer terminal, so intent on their work that they didn’t look up. Legion crouched next to a pile of tech on the floor, fitting pieces together.

“So,” Liara said, sitting hunched over one of the little data modules, “it boils down to needing a prothean.” She let out a soft, frustrated sort of chuckle. “I knew we should have contacted that fellow on the extranet.”

Shiala laughed. “Who? Rodney the Prothean: Exotic Wonder of the Ancient World?” She shrugged. “He had some good moves on his extranet site, and that was an inventive makeup job. If nothing else, we’d be entertained.”

“I didn’t bring any singles back to the ship.” Liara’s laugh rang high and young, innocent in a way that made Shepard’s heart ache. No matter how the captain saw the future playing out, she doubted that Liara’s innocence would survive the journey.

“Captain!” Shiala called out as she turned and saw Shepard. Jumping up, she nearly knocked Legion on his backside. “I’m sorry, we didn’t see you there.”

“Rodney the Prothean?” Shepard asked, barely managing to keep her face stern as she cocked a hip and crossed her arms. Liara’s laugh echoed through the small space again, her delicate features turning a darker blue. “We did an extranet search for prothean information when we were on leave, Captain. He’s a stripper, specializes in parties and risque messages for special occasions.”

Shepard broke character and chuckled. “So, nothing that will actually help our search, just boost our morale?”

“Exactly.” Shiala answered. “He has a very nice . . .” She cut a glance across at Legion. “Anyway, Legion has been helpful. It believes the prothean technology in these devices was activated by touch and has something to do with stored memory engrams. It’s been helping us try to build something to approximate an interface that allows us to access the information using our biotics.”

Shepard’s brow furrowed. “And how’s that working?”

“We managed a brief flash,” Liara reported, “and saw a moment of battle. Terrible machines as tall as Sovereign walking over the planet, shooting everything with their lasers.”

Shepard straightened. “Excellent work. I’m going to steal the third member of your brain trust for a few hours, but I’ll get it back to you as quickly as possible.” She nodded toward the door. “Come on, Legion the Geth: Wonder of the Artificial Intelligence World, we’ve got a ground mission.”

* * * * *
“So, we just wait for the Normandy to get her docking vector, look for the most hidden place to drop, and hope we don’t get shot out of the sky by an AA gun?” Garrus asked, glancing up from the Mako’s electronic suite.

“That encapsulates the essence of the plan, Brother C-Sec,” Shepard replied. “Just keep your eyes glued to that topographical display.” She cackled a little at the glare the idiom provoked from the turian. Turning, she looked back to where Legion sat at the cannon controls. “You okay back there?”

The geth’s light dipped in a quick nod. “Affirmative.”

“We’re on our final approach to Port Hanshan, Captain,” Joker reported over the comm. “Our approach vector brings us through the Shide Pass. If I swing around the left flank of Guoqang Mountain, you’ll have a seven second window where you should be able to drop without being too obvious to their ladar.”

“Roger that, Joker. Thanks.”

“An important weather note, Shepard,” the pilot continued. “Port Hanshan and the surrounding Skadi Mountains are currently in the middle of the worst blizzard of a bad winter of blizzards. Visibility is almost zero and the avalanche threat is extreme.”

Shepard sighed. “Of course it is, Brother Joker. So stay away from the edge of the mountain roads, or what’s left of them. Understood. Excellent safety tip, thank you again. Anything else?”

“Just be careful, Captain.”

“Roger that, Joker. Shepard, out.”

“Massive blizzard, skinny mountain roads, avalanche risk . . ..” Garrus sighed and looked over at her. “Didn’t Williams call dibs on the avalanches?”

Shepard met his stare, her grin growing wider. “Seriously? Scary, secret laboratory; loose contaminants; possible geth heretics; avalanches; and an impending antimatter bombardment, and you’re telling me you’d rather be sitting at a bar on the Citadel?”

His brow plates arched. “Damn straight.”

She covered her mouth and coughed, the word “bullshit” echoing off the inside of the armoured vehicle. “You know that if I’d left you to go ashore with Nihlus, I’d never hear the end of the bitching. You love our adventures, Brother C-Sec, don’t even try to tell me otherwise.” She moved the Mako to the head of the ramp, running last minute system checks.

“Two minutes to drop window,” Joker’s voice came through.

“Roger that.” Shepard pulsed the jump thrusters a couple of times, making the vehicle bounce.

“Maybe Alenko should drive,” Garrus suggested.

Shepard just shook her head. “Fasten your safety harness, wise-assless.”

“One minute to drop window.”

The Mako rumbled as she backed up to nearly the elevator, the cargo bay’s alarms muffled through the heavy plating, but still audible.
“Drop in thirty . . . twenty-five . . . twenty . . . fifteen . . . ten . . . nine . . .” As Joker counted down to the opening of their drop window, Shepard hit the throttle then released the clutch.

“Ramp in five . . . four . . . three . . . two . . . one. Clear,” Garrus called.

Shepard eased off throttle as they hit the end of the ramp, adjusting the eezo core to lower the vehicle’s effective mass as they cleared the Normandy. Pulsing the thrusters, she landed them dead center on the road leading past Port Hanshan and into the mountains.

“Smother even than Alenko, thank you very much.” She turned to Garrus, meeting his tightly drawn mandibles and worried scowl with a cheeky wink. “Brother C-Sec, it saddens me that you possess so little faith.” She grinned and hit the throttle, taking them away from civilization and toward the unknown. Peak 15 stood about forty-five minutes from the capital. Hopefully, they didn’t take too long figuring out what was going on, because in just over four hours, death was set to rain down from orbital stations.

“That looks like trouble waiting to happen,” Garrus said, nodding toward an avalanche tunnel ahead of them.

“Yeah, it sure does.” Shepard slowed, dropping the Mako into its lowest gear. “Legion, are you ready on the cannon?”

“Affirmative,” came the flanged voice from behind her right shoulder.

“Okay then, in we go.” Shepard focused on the sensor readouts of the tunnel ahead as it wrapped around the mountain. No enemy signatures appeared.

“Looks like my bad feeling was wrong this time,” Garrus said as they came out the other side.

No sooner had his words dropped into the space between them then a rocket hit the right front corner panel, rocking the Mako.

“Dammit, they’ve got long-range turrets.” Shepard wove the Mako back and forth across the narrow road with one hand while adjusting the sensors to a longer-range readout. “There they are,” she said, her voice a soft, satisfied growl. “You got them, C-Sec? Legion?”

They both confirmed in the same breath, and Legion opened fire. Two hits from the cannon, the first turret exploded long before they reached it.

Turrets peppered the entire mountain side, even before Peak 15 became visible above and ahead of them.

“Sweet baby Jesus,” Shepard said and groaned as she activated the forward viewscreen and looked up at the towering complex. “We’re going to need a bigger boat.”

Ignoring Garrus’s confused glance, she focused on keeping the Mako on the road, bouncing over and crashing through massive snowdrifts that completely obscured the road anywhere the wind curled around the wall of rock. Luckily, Noveria lived in perpetual winter, and the sheer cliffs on the left side of the vehicle were lined with beacons to keep them from rolling off the edge to their doom as she dodged a nearly unending stream of rockets.

“What the hell is that?” Garrus asked, a long talon pointing at two huge red marks amongst the smaller turrets on the forward scan.

“Really big goddamned enemies?” Shepard offered. She grimaced as a massive plasma burst sent the shields crashing to half. “With really huge guns, apparently.” Driving straight for the massive, four-legged geth tanks, she allowed the shields to absorb their small arms fire, waiting for them to fire their main weapon before swerving.

“Colossi,” Legion supplied.

“Damn!” Shepard dodged a plasma blast to get hit by two rockets. “Take out the turrets in range first so I can focus.”

A double hit impacted the front corner, throwing the tank toward the yawning kilometre of sky between them and the valley floor below.

“Spirits! Shepard!” Garrus yelped as she hit the brakes, bringing the Mako to a plunging halt with its nose hanging over the edge of the cliff. “You’re going to get us killed.”

She didn’t respond, slamming it into reverse just in time to take a glancing blow that spun the Mako around a little on the slick road. Compensating by increasing the vehicles relative mass and dropping it into low gear, she steered out of the spin and got it oriented the right way.

“Okay, those things are starting to piss me off,” Shepard growled as another plasma burst hit the back end, sending her into another slide. Fear turned brittle, cold and deadly. “Gentlemen, fire as quickly as you can without overheating your guns.”

“No, not gentlemen.” Garrus groaned. “That always means you’re going to do something monumentally reckless.” He tightened his safety harness and sent three round bursts at the first of the giant walking tanks.

“Glory hallelujah and praise the Enkindlers’ light,” Shepard said, her voice low and fierce. She increased the positive mass effect field encompassing the tank, shifting up through the gears, accelerating until the Mako charged at the first colossus with the momentum of a small frigate.

“Increasing power to forward shields and inertial dampeners.” Garrus’s voice came out tight, the subvocals harsh and high-pitched underneath the words. “You’re going to be the death of me.”

“Don’t even joke about that,” Shepard snapped. She focused on steering, making small corrections to their course to miss most of the incoming fire. Time hung over her like a guillotine, poised and ready to fall. She didn’t have time to fight smart and slick.

Garrus is right. You’re going to get everyone killed. It’s not like you haven’t learned this lesson. Dumbass.

She shut that voice down as a blast hit the right rear panel, sending the machine slewing sideways toward the open cliff-face. Snow billowed up to explode into a blinding cloud when it hit the wind. “Son of a bitch!” Her heart slammed into her ribcage, thumping like a jackhammer, but her hands stayed steady and quick on the controls.

Shepard steered hard to bring the Mako out of the skid. The left rear wheel slammed off the edge, the impact snapping Shepard’s teeth shut on the side of her tongue as the cockpit tilted hard to port. Copper filled her mouth. Metal screamed, gravity and propulsion dragging the back end of the machine over the rock toward doom. Opening the throttle full, Shepard hit the jump thrusters, steering into the jaws of death just long enough to drag the wheel back over the stone lip. Once she had all four wheels on solid ground again, she corrected their trajectory, aiming them missile-straight for the first of the colossi.

They impacted the first geth tank so hard that it drew a graceful arc straight over the roof, and plowed into the snow, sending a great plume of white powder skyward. At least, until it hit the edge and, in a tangle of legs grappling for purchase, flew off the side of the mountain. Shepard didn’t slow or hesitate, just changed course for the next. Having seen what happened to its compatriot, the second one reared back, bracing itself, wrapping around the front end as the Mako slammed into it.

Plasma bursts slammed into the cab of the Mako as rapidly as the colossus could fire them off. The damage sensors began to wail, the entire Mako flashing red on the console as the metal in front of their faces heated to a molten red.

“Shepard! What the . . .?” Garrus hollered as she aimed them toward the concrete collision pilings at the mouth of the next avalanche tunnel. “We can’t take an impact like . . .” His words faded into a bellowing scream.

The world erupted in a deafening crunching roar of metal and concrete embedding into one another, the Mako plowing through six pilings before it stopped.

Silence.

The wind whistled across the hole melted in the cab. Pain and cold shivered through her entire body, adrenaline turning to ash in her blood.

Not dead then.

Shepard lifted a shaking hand from the controls to press against the slice in her scalp from her old friend, the sharp edge on the front support. A dull ache dug into her head like a tick the size of a junebug, rapidly transforming into a junebug carrying a small army knife, then a chainsaw. After a couple of seconds, she took a deep breath, grateful that air flowed into her lungs. Her heart slowed from jackhammer to war drum when she heard Garrus curse.

Congratulations, Shepard. You managed not to kill Garrus too. Let's go for the trifecta, shall we?

Blinking to clear the fuzziness in her vision, she hit the omnigel repair controls. She’d probably killed the poor tank, but it didn’t hurt to try. If it ran, they could still make it to Peak 15. If it didn’t . . . . She sighed. It was a long, cold hike back to Port Hanshan.

Pulling her hand away from her head, she looked at the blood and hair stuck to the palm of her glove. “When we get back, C-Sec . . . grind that fucking edge down, will you?”

The turian groaned and shifted in his harness. “I hate you so much right now.” He stretched his neck, moaning as it popped, then started checking systems.

Shepard looked through the divider. “You functional back there, Legion?”

The geth looked at her, its head flaps all spiking out from its head, fluttering hard before settling back. “Affirmative, Shepard-Captain. You have sustained injury.”

Well done, careless ass. Of course, there's a lot of day left. Keep trying, you can get at least one of them good and dead by dinner.

She pressed the heel of her hand back to her head and nodded. “Yeah, but it’s nothing.” She sighed and hit the omnigel control again. “Okay, let’s see if we can get this thing rolling.”
When the engine started, Shepard crowed softly. “A good first step, my friends.” She eased it into reverse, letting out a long, relieved sigh as the wheels dug in, wobbling and thumping oddly over the snow, but moving.

“How far to Peak 15?” she asked, setting off down the long tunnel, avoiding the bits and pieces of colossus the best she could.

“Half a klick,” Garrus answered, his talons moving over the electronics suite. “We’re in rough shape, but should be able to make it as long as there aren’t any more geth between us and the front door.” He keyed in commands. “There’s a chunk of colossus head jamming the machine gun, Shepard. You’ll have to let me out to work it free. However, if we still have the cannon . . .”

“The cannon remains functional, Shepard-Captain, despite a calibration error of 7.21 percent. This unit will compensate during targeting,” Legion reported.

Garrus twitched, his mandibles flicking hard, but managed a small head bob. “That should get us past the last turrets if you can manage to avoid their rockets.”

Shepard took a deep breath and nodded. “Let’s pray the Enkindlers heard you, Brother C-Sec. Glory hallelujah.”
The wind whistled like the howling of lost souls as it battered itself against the curves and angles of the massive Peak 15 tower. Shepard swung down out of the Mako, doing a quick, practiced survey of the area, looking for signs of immediate danger. Not finding any, she followed the mournful shriek of the wind to the towering facility that clung on the mountain above them. It boggled her mind how a remote testing facility could employ enough people to fill such a huge tower. Maybe they housed them on site . . . in four-bedroom condos.

Sweet baby Jesus, I hope they managed to evacuate everyone.

Hearing someone hammering on metal, she walked around the tank to see Garrus clinging to the front, prying the colossus head loose of the machine gun. The turian grumbled to himself, reciting a laundry list of curses as he tried to get enough leverage to wrestle the chunk of geth loose.

Pausing in his battle, he nodded toward an M29 Grizzly, the older armoured vehicle wrecked off to the side. Flames licked the cold air from the armoured vehicle’s destroyed chassis. “You didn’t come up here earlier, did you, Captain? That looks like your work.”

Shepard just shook her head and turned back to the garage doors. Rockets had reduced the main doors to twisted hunks of metal, but an intact pedestrian portal stood a couple metres further down the front wall. Turning her back to it, she ignored the alarm from her hard suit that warned her of impending frozen death. She had time yet, and no desire to step through that mouth into hell a moment earlier than she needed to.

“I sure hope there’s some sign about where we need to look,” she whispered, almost to herself. The door behind her yawned beneath the empty stare of the windows floors above. The darkness inside them crawled under her skin, shifting and alive. No, not alive . . . undead. She shook that off. It was far too late in her career to get squeamish and superstitious.

Yeah right, like you aren’t crazy superstitious, Shepard.

The screech of metal giving way was followed by a heavy thump as the ruined colossus head landed in the snow next to her.

Garrus returned her glance with a challenging glare and a flick of mandibles. “A trophy, Captain? You could mount it on the wall of your cabin.”

She glanced at it and rolled her eyes, then opened the files that Nihlus had transferred to her computer. One of them was the text of the code white. “Loose contaminants in the Rift Station hot labs,” she muttered to herself. “Rift Station.” She opened the floor plan of the facility.

Garrus jumped down, landing next to the geth head. “Could we do this inside, out of the wind?” he asked, his teeth chattering. “My armour is nudging over the system failure point.”

She sent the files to his omnitool. “Sure, you find me the Rift Station labs on that floor plan and plot us a course to them. Legion, cover the right side of the door.” Shrugging, she reached up, Roger’s reassuring weight settling into her hands. She pressed her back to the wall as Legion took the position opposite her. Holding up her fingers, she counted down three, two, one, then activated the door.

The geth ducked around the door frame and swept its assault rifle across the area. After a moment, it stepped back. “Area is clear of hostile forces, Shepard-Captain.”

Shepard walked through the door into a space between the outside garage doors and a set of inside ones just as large. “You can just say ‘clear’, Legion. I’ll assume the rest.” No pedestrian door cut a hole through that wall. She launched her drone, Legion’s appearing a second later to hover next to hers, their orange light casting a sickly glow in the dim space.

Expecting a fully-armed reception on the other side, Shepard sent her squad into cover against the wall, then strode up to the door, hoping that the drones would draw at least a little fire. Instead, when the metal sections lifted toward the ceiling, she stared down the length of a large, completely deserted garage.

No enemies. No friendlies. No bodies. No equipment.

Maybe the lack of vehicles means they were able to evacuate.

Shepard walked up the slight ramp, jumping a little as her drone beeped and blinked out. The air hung heavy and silent, the wind outside completely muted. Silence throbbed in her ears. “What the hell?” After another second, she waved for her squad to join her and moved down the center of the room. They needed to keep moving.

Shaking her head she double-timed it up a short flight of stairs. Another door waited at the top. “We got here far too easily.”

“We haven’t seen Therum or Feros levels of resistance, that’s for sure,” Garrus agreed, taking the stairs two at a time.

Shepard brought Roger up, couching his stock against her shoulder, and looked to her squad as they took position to cover her. Once they gave her the nod, she walked up to the door. It opened to reveal a short hallway, the walls lined with automated turrets, their barrels facing toward the inside of the facility rather than toward the garage.

“Spirits,” Garrus muttered. “That’s a hell of a lot of firepower.” He stepped around her to look at the closest turret.

“It appears that security focused on sealing contaminants within the facility,” Legion stated the obvious with complete equanimity.

Shepard envied its lack of emotion as her lower gut rolled over and tied itself in a squelching knot. “Let’s go. We have a deadline.” She pushed past Garrus none too gently, heading for the inner door.

You’re getting reckless again, Janey, you dumbass. Just face the fear, or you’ll see your best friend bleeding out at your feet by the time you’re done.

On the other side, they found a deserted security office. Shepard checked the lockers to find the guns and armour still sealed inside. When she tried to activate the computer console, she got no response. She turned away, a slow shudder crawling up her back as she felt unseen eyes watching them. The whole place felt phase-shifted, the people invisible, but still there, moving around.
She shook it off and headed for the elevator, trying to ignore the voice shouting inside her head that elevators constituted cages just begging for an ambush. It helped that the elevator opened into another short corridor, this one as completely empty as the one before. Well, almost as completely empty, but for a thick layer of snow.

“We’re inside, right?” Garrus asked.

Shepard nodded and stepped out, her boots making that dry, walking-on-styrofoam crunching squeak that she always associated with mid-winter on Mindoir. Drifts of the brittle crystals heaped against the walls despite the ceiling and narrow windows remaining intact.

She motioned Garrus and Legion into semi-cover positions next to the door. “What’s on the other side?” she whispered to Garrus.

He checked his omni. “Reception lobby, a few offices up above on the far right and point along the perimeter. It looks like the upper section is all glass enclosed, so no real cover for ambush there, but the room has a large, concrete divider down the center.”

Shepard nodded. “Okay, so a decent place to leave a reception committee. Check.” She raised Roger to high ready, then stopped, her brow wrinkling, eyes looking up at the ceiling. Cocking her head a little, she strained to hear over the wind, sure she heard gunfire from several floors above. Her heart actually slowed at the sound. Gunfire meant survivors to explain what happened or enemies to fill with bullets. Either made for a better alternative than the endless nothing. She glanced at Garrus.

He nodded. “I heard it.” He pressed up behind her, but not close enough to trigger the automatic door. He brought his assault rifle up, and nodded that he was ready to move.

Shepard took a step forward.

“Shepard.”

Nihlus’s voice threw her heart up into her throat, setting it hammering against her tonsils. She lifted a trembling hand to her ear. “Sweet baby Jesus, Nihlus, give a girl in a creepy abandoned facility some warning, will you?”

“Sorry.” Odd, but he sounded more amused than sorry. “Just checking in. The Normandy has been locked down and impounded by the port authority, although the crew isn’t letting them board,” the Spectre reported. “Wrex, Williams, and I have been detained for questioning about an unauthorized armoured vehicle drop.”

“Roger that. Are they coming after me?” Even though she asked it as a question, she knew the answer.

“No, but rest assured that moments after you clear the blast radius for the safe zone, you’ll be intercepted and arrested.”

She nodded. As she thought. “Understood, thanks for the heads up.” She frowned. “How’d you get them to let you call me?”

“My friend in the administrator’s office took a coffee break.” He chuckled. “She’ll do what she can . . . has me throwing my Spectre authority around a little to investigate something while I’m grounded here, but we’re looking at some pretty heavy shovelling to get out of this, Shepard.”

Sighing, she nodded. “Story of my life, Nihlus. A whole lot of nothing to report here so far. Took a little geth fire coming in, but nothing compared to what we took on Therum. So far the facility has taken some damage, but no sign of contaminants, geth, Saren, or any employees. We think we heard gunfire a moment ago, so maybe someone is still alive in here. We’ll let you know when we find something.”

Shepard closed the channel and opened an encrypted one to the _Normandy_. “Hey, Sparky, what’s going on?”

“We’re locked down, Captain, but we’ve also kept the port authority locked out. They’re afraid to cut us open for fear of the Alliance getting testy over their new prototype being sliced and diced, so we’re at a stalemate for the moment.”

“Okay. You know that crate that you put on my table? The one with the questionable items you found in the Blood Pack hideout on Omega?” she asked, able to hear the confusion and hesitation in his silence.

“Yes,” he replied at last. “What about it?”

“Just be prepared to bring it to the administrator’s office when I call. You, Tali, and Liara. If the port security wants to confiscate your weapons, agree, but tell them the crate is Nihlus’s and under Spectre authority.” She hesitated, then took a deep, noisy breath. “If anything happens to me, get the crate to Nihlus. Understood?”

“Roger that, Captain. Just make sure I get the call from you to bring it in.”

A weak smile cut through the frost freezing her face rigid. “Will do, Sparky. Take care of my boat, COB.”

“Yes, ma’am. Alenko out.”

Shepard closed the channel and brought Roger back up. “Okay, enough time wasted. Let’s get moving.”

Garrus stared at her, mandibles dropped, brow plates raised with an unspoken question.

She shrugged and stepped toward the door. “Insurance. Come on, Nihlus and the ground party have been detained, and my ship has been impounded for this little stunt. Let’s make it count, Brother C-Sec.”

Shepard checked with Legion before she opened the door, but she needn’t have bothered. The geth remained steadfastly focused on guarding their flank.

The door folded up to reveal a surreal scene. The lobby stood under several feet of snow, banks of it heaped up around the tables, desks and chairs that lay strewn haphazardly around the space. The effect made Shepard feel as if they entered a long abandoned, ancient ruin rather than what had been a thriving, bustling place of business hours before. Like the rooms and corridors before, the lobby stood completely empty. Nothing moved but the wind, even the plants frozen into statues.

Leading the way into the large room, Shepard reached out, brushing her fingertips over the frozen leaves of a ficus. Other than the wind’s constant, mournful howl and the steady clang-bang of its grip tossing a piece of metal back and forth, a hush hung over that lobby, one that demanded fear as its toll for passage.
“Feels like a graveyard,” Garrus whispered, clearing his throat a little. He pressed close, as if drawing heat and life from her as he’d done on Feros.

Shepard nodded toward an exit in the far left corner of the room. “Legion, take the left, meet us up at that door.”

“Affirmative.” The geth set off at a half-crouched, easy jog.

Taking point, Shepard led Garrus along the right wall, her eyes moving constantly, gaze brushing warily over art hanging half off the wall, ice already creeping across the canvas. In the corner, an information kiosk sputtered, a partially formed blur of static that emitted no sound. From every corner, behind every table, beneath every overturned desk, the feeling of being watched by ghosts deepened until it squirmed under her skin: worms gnawing their way through an apple’s flesh.

She climbed the double flight of stairs and moved quickly along the front of the offices. Broken glass, smashed doors, and tipped over tables all pointed to something violent having happened, but she couldn’t pick out a single sign of fighting. No bullet holes, no scorch marks, no grenade blasts . . . not even scuffed snow on the floor of closed offices where people had grappled. She stopped in the last office and checked the weapon locker in the corner. Still full, just like the ones in the security office.

“Looks more like a panic than a battle,” Garrus said, as if reading her mind.

Shepard swallowed hard, forcing about three feet of razor wire down her throat. “Where the fuck is everyone?”

“They could have pulled back to a shelter or defensive zone,” he offered. “There might not be bodies this far out if the retreat was orderly.”

“Does this look at all orderly to you, C-Sec?” She shoved aside the clammy fingers that scraped dirty nails up her back and took a deep breath, stretching her shoulders back until they cracked. “Where are we headed?”

“Next elevator leads to the central station hub. Houses the VI core and access to the tram to Rift Station.” He nodded to the doorway where Legion awaited them.

“Okay.” Strides, long and determined, carried her to the elevator. Maybe they’d finally get some answers.

* * * * *

“I don’t care how many times you tell me that it’s the standard interface, C-Sec, it’s still a Tower of Hanoi. Graphical representation of the correct order of operations . . . Blah blah . . . Whatever. It’s a free to play GalaxyBook game disguised as a scientific process. That bothers me in a way I can’t even begin to articulate.” She let out a tiny sigh when he didn’t bother arguing the point any further than he already had. Fighting over the ridiculous method of shunting power in the VI core had kept her mind off the fact that someone had come through after the emergency and reactivated the reactor and tram systems but not communications.

Someone had beaten them there, leaving only empty rooms behind. Nothing about that gave her any hope.

“Now arriving at Rift Station,” the VI’s faux-female voice announced. “Binary Helix Research Facility.”
The tram rolled into Rift Station, the empty waiting area wrapping around her as if the car propelled her through a thick membrane of cellophane. She couldn’t see what clung to her, tighter than her skin, suffocating her, only feel it. Stepping out the door, she allowed her eyes to follow the long, orderly lines of at least a hundred empty seats to two doors at the other end of the room. So many people had lived and worked there.

Closing her eyes, she pulled in a deep, noisy draught of air, steeling the churning in her guts and the slight tremble that had worked its way into her thigh muscles. A strong hand pressed between her shoulder blades as she rolled her shoulders, squaring them to bear the weight of whatever lie ahead.

She pulled away from the contact without looking back at Garrus, not wanting to see the confusion and possible hurt prompted by her withdrawal. As much as she appreciated his concern and support, her nerves itched and spat with the oppressive emptiness, twitching with the strain of constantly being stretched too far in every direction. She knew if she didn’t pull away, something would snap. She couldn’t afford to snap. Not yet.

“I can’t get the smell of whatever the hell got cooked in the decon chamber out of my nose,” Garrus grumbled.

Shepard heard the shish-click of him shrugging his rifle into his hand as he followed her to the doors. Even though her nose still burned with the fumes and stink of the plasma decon and whatever it had purged before they got there, she didn’t reply. Instead, she reached up, settling Roger into her hands and strode forward with purpose. They needed to figure out what the hell was going on and get the fuck out.

The door straight ahead led to the labs, but it had been sealed and didn’t give way to her bypass attempt. The one on her left led to the barracks and living quarters, its control glowing an inviting green. “Come this way,” it whispered. “Trust me, you’re not being funnelled into a trap. Honest.”

“Yeah, right,” Shepard grumbled under her breath as she stepped up to it.

“Shepard?”

She shook off Garrus’s question, and set into a jog, her assault rifle at high ready. The door led to an antechamber, two elevators on the one wall. One led to the hot labs. Shepard hung Roger on her back and walked over to hit the control.

“Hot labs are offline,” the VI told her. “Code Omega local execution. Loose contaminants led to the hot labs being activated. Once they achieved maximum depth of three kilometres into the glacier, the neutron purge was activated, killing all life forms present.”

Shepard shook her head then kicked the elevator door. “Goddamn it. We’ve spent this entire mission three steps behind Saren, and it’s really starting to piss me off, C-Sec.” Spinning away from the defunct lab entrance, she pulled Roger once again and headed to the other elevator door. “Fuck.”

Three storeys up, the elevator let them out into a canteen area. Other than a few large crates set up like fortifications and a couple of chairs lying on their sides, the place remained as untouched as everywhere else.

“It’s impossible, isn’t it?” Shepard asked, stopping in the doorway to an empty med center. “They had to have been evacuated, right? You couldn’t subdue this many people without some sign of something being left behind.” Reaching up, she pressed the heel of her hand to her temple, a vague, stomach-turning ache spreading through her head.

“Shepard?” Garrus turned her around and leaned down to look into her eyes. “Are you feeling okay?”

She nodded and hit her medigel. Couldn’t hurt to be cautious if she had a concussion. The ache in her head didn’t come from the slice in her scalp though. It started at the base of her skull, pressing up like fingers spreading out and working their way between her skull and her brain.

“Yeah, I’m fine. This place is just starting to get to me. She batted his hands away, but gently, giving one a slight squeeze. “I’ll be just fine once we find someone alive. Someone we can question.” She chuckled, but it came out hard and dry, edged with a hysteria that made the millions of tons of rock over her head seem to tremble. “Hell, right now I’d settle for someone to shoot.” Glancing behind her, Shepard watched Legion for a moment. It only spoke when she asked it to report on something or to accept commands, and showed no real reaction to what they found, or didn’t find.

Was it merely registering and recording? Was it trying to puzzle through what was going on?

“Legion?”

The geth turned to face her, looking up from one of the cots. “Shepard-Captain.”

“Do you have any theories about what’s going on here?” She walked over to him, head tilting a little. A soft warning chime went off in the back of her head as she felt the hysterical edge come through her words as aggression. It felt foreign, carried on the pressure building from the invisible fingers.

“We cannot reach consensus. Forty-six percent currently favour the theory that this facility’s population was evacuated while thirty-two percent favour the population being subdued by forces wishing to contain the biohazard contamination,” it reported, its tone as even as always, its gestures appearing to be imitations of her own.

Shepard’s anger eased back, the tide ebbing in the face of the geth’s indecision. Seemed they weren’t all that different after all. “And the remaining twenty-two percent?” A soft smile brushed the corner of her mouth.

“The remaining geth favour the collection of further data in order to form a reliable conclusion.”

“Hear, hear. On this we have reached consensus, Brother Legion.” Shepard nodded toward the cot. “Was there something you saw there, or were you just staring into space as you tried to work through the possibilities?” Edging a little closer, she saw a stain on the canvas. “Is that what you were looking at?”

“It is.” It leaned down, hovering over the stain and activated its omnitool. “Analysing.”

Shepard waited for a moment, then glanced over at Garrus. The turian just shrugged and paced toward the door labelled as Maintenance. The captain looked back. “Legion?”

“Analysing.”

“Okay then.” She walked over to the dispenser and refilled her missing medigel, pausing to smear some over the wound on her head. She turned back to see Legion in the same position.

The mountain pressed down on her, the endless, windowless walls and windows that looked out onto rock wrapping her in their coils, constricting until she could barely draw breath. “We need to keep moving,” she whispered, pacing to the door and back.

“Asari blood and toxic acid?” Shepard reached up to rub her temple with the hand not holding Roger in a death grip. “Fantastic.” She gave Legion a wan smile and a nod. “Thanks, Legion, it’s more than we had five minutes ago.”

“Shepard?” Nihlus’s voice embedded an ice pick through her ear into her brain.

“Ow, Jesus.” She lifted a hand to ear. “Whisper, Kryik. What’s going on?”

“Gianna just arrested the administrator thanks to the information the squad and I collected. How are things going out there?”

“We’re deep into the Rift Station now. Not a soul living, dead, or otherwise. Everything looks like the people here all vanished. Even the weapon lockers are still full. Legion just found a bloodstain. Asari blood mixed with an acidic toxin.” She stopped, looking around as she heard something . . . a soft rustle or scrape of armour against stone, maybe?

“Asari blood . . .?” the Spectre asked.

“Just a second, Nihlus.”

Garrus backed toward her, his head cocked. He nudged her with an elbow, not looking at her as he gestured toward the maintenance door.

“Yeah.” Shepard gestured to Legion to take cover next to the door. “Nihlus, let me get back to you.” She closed the channel and took cover next to the geth, motioning for Garrus to be ready when she opened the door.

She triggered the mechanism, giving the C-Sec officer a few seconds to get clear through the door before following him. A short curved hallway ended at another door. Another hallway, another door. They moved silently, slipping through each cautiously and in order: Garrus first, Shepard following, Legion watching their rear.

The air quality changed as they approached the last door. Shepard took her position against the frame and froze. Again, she heard a slight rustle, the scrape of something non-metallic against stone. She didn’t know whether to feel relieved to hear signs of life or not. It depended on the form of that life.

Fuck. This is where the zombies or face huggers attack.

Shepard closed her eyes for a breath. When had she ever let her imagination get the better of her? She was a fucking soldier, goddamn it. She needed to get back to acting like one rather than a kid in a haunted house.

Opening her eyes she nodded to Legion and Garrus, to check that they were ready, then activated the door. Garrus stepped through, Shepard giving him a ten count before swinging around the doorframe herself. Instead of coming through on his left flank, she slammed into the turian’s back, Roger catching under his arm.
“What the hell, C-Sec? Clear the door.” Yanking Roger back, she gave Garrus a shove, then stepped around him. She stopped dead, her jaw falling slack as she stared up a long, curving tunnel carved out of the rock. “Just when I thought this nightmare couldn’t get creepier. What is this place?”

He turned to her, his brow plates lowered, mandibles dropped, and gestured for her to listen. She reached up, turning up the ambient on her implant. Still, it took a second before she heard it. A soft clicking sound, scraping . . . claws just brushing the stone, then a chittering.

Could be geth.

She didn’t believe it and brought Roger’s sight back to her eye after turning her implant down. A finger directed her squad into their positions, then she moved forward, knees bent and ready, weight low and stable.

The cavern curved to the right, tight enough to limit their sight line to seven or eight metres. Shepard sniffed the air, fairly sure she could smell the burned ozone smell of the geth plasma weapons, but several other elements pricked her nose, ones she couldn’t identify. She paused at a small white puddle, drips leading up the incline ahead of them.

“Geth circulatory fluid,” Legion said, its voice hushed.

Shepard nodded and held her index finger to her lips before pointing ahead. The worms began to wriggle under her skin again as she heard the slide-click-reset of a jammed door, but muffled . . . sealed on the other side of several closed doors.

You’re going to be missing the silence and peace here in a minute.

As they rounded the final curve and the cavern ended at a prefab doorway, she cursed that inner voice for being right. Something lay strewn just off to the side of the short entry tunnel into the man-made structure. It didn’t move as she slowed their approach, sidling around the mass a little in order to give them room and time to respond if it attacked.

A viscous green liquid covered the creature and painted the stone with random splashes. Shepard crept forward, easing up to it, fairly sure it was dead, but not taking any chances.

“What the hell is this thing?” Long, sinuous stalks almost like tentacles came out of its body, ending in three sectioned claw-like . . . hands . . . pincers? Four legs and two short, thin arms protruded from the almost crayfish like body.

Garrus prodded the sectioned, smooth shell along its back with a boot. “It’s dead, whatever it is.”

Shepard nodded, able to see the holes torn open in the creature’s underbelly. “Legion, take some samples. We’ll give them to Dr. Chakwas to see what she can make of it.”

“Affirmative.” The geth moved to do as she’d asked.

Shepard pushed forward into the short, curved section of prefab tunnel. It ended a couple metres in at a functioning door. Glancing back at Legion, she arched an eyebrow. “Finished?”

“We will complete our task in eighty three seconds, Shepard-Captain,” it replied.

Despite herself, Shepard let out a surprised chuckle. “Try to be precise, will you?” She turned away from the dance of his head flaps, pacing a little as she counted down the seconds. When he straightened and traded his omnitool for his weapon, she pushed forward, activating the door.
Stay cool, Janey. Don’t start being a human bulldozer here, or you’re going to fuck up.

A short corridor awaited them on the other side. Shepard crossed the threshold cautiously, her eyes riveted on tendrils of a white, glossy substance stretched along the walls in ropes as thick as her wrist.

“What the hell?” Garrus muttered behind her. He walked over to the closest strand, reaching out to touch it with a talon. “It’s tacky.”

Shepard ran her fingertips over a couple of filaments nearer the next door. They joined together, lattice-like. As Garrus said, it felt tacky, snagging her gloves even with the slightest touch. “Why do I feel like a fly all of the sudden?” she asked between her teeth, her jaw aching from clenching them for so long.

Both hands back on her gun, she crooked a finger to call Legion up to take position at the next door. When the geth and Garrus took their positions, she triggered the door. Instead of moving inside to sweep the room, the turian stayed where he was, his mandibles spreading, his entire body tensing.

Shepard looked around the doorframe, her lungs freezing solid for a moment, the sheer horror of what awaited them on the other side stealing her breath, even her thoughts. Squeezing between the still immobile Garrus and the doorjamb, Shepard took three steps into the next space. Webbing -- for that’s all she could process it as -- filled the room but for a low, narrow tunnel through the center. Geth chassis hung from the webs, packed in against the walls a couple metres thick. Torn apart, chunks melted away by the green acid, most of the geth appeared to be dead, but here and there a flashlight face still sputtered and semi-attached limbs twitched as if the geth writhed in agony.

Shepard swallowed a heavy knot of revulsion and panic. “What the hell did these people turn loose?”
Mass Effect - Future Imperfect Chapter Thirty Six

Chapter Summary

Noveria couldn’t get any creepier, could it?

Wincing away from the macabre display of twitching limbs and flickering lights, Shepard resisted the urge to cross herself. “Are they in pain?” she whispered, not sure afterward if she’d spoken aloud or not. It almost seemed indecent to speak at full volume, like when she was six and her aunt caught her laughing merrily and running around the local cemetery. Enough nightmares lurked in the hidden corners and passages of her mind without being haunted by slaughtered geth.

Steeling herself, she edged forward, Roger sweeping the narrow tunnel that cut through the carnage. That tunnel . . . . She peered into a low-hanging spot, a flashlight head dangling down, dark headlamp staring straight through her. They’d have to crawl through. The further they progressed, the blacker and stranger the place became.

Oh good, you’ve found the tunnel to hell, Janey. Don’t you just visit the nicest places?

“Are they suffering?” she asked again.

“Geth do not feel pain as organics do,” Legion supplied. It stopped, its omnitool flaring to life as it scanned one of the twitching chassis. “This platform is experiencing a short in its motor functions. Higher level processes have ceased.”

Shepard nodded, relieved. Even enemies didn’t deserve to be stuck up like flies awaiting the spider’s fangs.

“I guess we know why we didn’t meet any resistance on the way in,” Garrus’s voice barely managed to cross the two metres between them. “Whatever the hell these things are, they’re efficient killers.” He ducked under a heretic stuck to the ceiling of the tunnel, its arms hanging down. “Why would they stick the platforms up like this?”

“Possible territorial response,” Legion replied. “The lifeforms gain nothing by storing units as a nutritional source.”

Shepard let out a startled chuckle-cough. “Yeah, I think we’re safe ruling out their using the heretics as food.” She nodded toward the tunnel. “Let’s keep moving. Stay sharp. I don’t want to end up stuck into this mess.” Leading the way, she got down on her knees and crawled through the narrow passage. On the other side, she helped pull Garrus through and up onto his feet before taking point once more. She picked a weaving path through the room, following the sound of a malfunctioning door. Webbing stuck it half open, caught in a continual cycle of trying to close, then retracting back.

Like every horror movie in the history of the galaxy doesn’t have the stuck retractable door.

She shuddered. The dread that had gripped her from the moment they entered the facility’s garage sunk its claws deeper into her spine, sending sharp, stabbing pains through the muscles in her neck and into her skull. The headache from earlier dug its fingers back in, sharp nails burrowing through to her eyes. Darkness pushed in from the outside, narrowing her field of vision, but she took several slow, deep breaths and managed to push it back.

Setting her jaw, Shepard crawled through first. Legion followed, the both of them needing to pry the door open to get Garrus through.

“You know, I think I’ll tell evolution that I’m going to stick with my bra and the whole flopping issue, Brother C-Sec,” Shepard sighed once they pulled him loose. “That carapace is a pain in tight spaces.”

He dusted himself off and cracked his neck. “Well, females have smaller ones.” His mandibles fluttered. “Beautiful necks too, very elegant. Don’t get me started on their waists . . . ankles . . .”

Shepard shook her head at the note of teasing wistfulness in his voice and took the lead. “Holy blessed backsides of the Enkindlers, you’re rampaging through TMI territory, Brother C-Sec.” His answering chuckle forced a smile onto her face. He could be such a brat.

The grisly walls closed in tighter, a ghoul’s embrace that wrapped steel bands around Shepard’s throat and chest, as the trio picked their way through a large, curved room and a short corridor. Although she could stand upright most of the way, here and there mechanical corpses created choke points, forcing them to crawl or even wriggle through on their bellies. Heretic fingers scraped over her shoulder and down her back, stabbing the urge to run into every muscle, every nerve. Exhaustion wore her down, the constant tension and dread more debilitating than ten bullet wounds. At least bullet holes could be treated with a hefty shot of medigel. All she could do against the fear was grit her teeth and force one foot in front of the other.

She reached the lab door to find it sealed. After running several bypass programs, trying to get past the locks, she crouched and turned to face her squad. “It’s complete fried, just like the other entrance off the tram station. I can’t bypass it.”

“I’m getting the feeling someone has barricaded the lab,” Garrus said.

Shepard nodded. “Hopefully a whole lot of friendly someones.” She studied the door a little closer. “I’ve got nothing that will cut through material this thick.”

“This platform’s omnitool is equipped with a cutting laser,” Legion stated. Shepard crouched down a little lower to see the geth past the bulk of Garrus’s armour. The unit cocked its head a little one way then the other.

Shepard sighed. There wasn’t enough room in the tunnel for Legion to get past her let alone Garrus. “We’re going to have to back up to a spot big enough for you to take point, Brother Legion. Let’s get in there.” They backtracked about five metres before they reached a spot with enough room for them to change positions.

Shepard watched Legion take point, her stomach clenching so tight that, for a few moments, she worried she’d embarrass herself one way or another. Since Elysium, she’d made a career of being the first one into danger, the shield that soaked up bullets before they could hurt anyone else. Sending the geth in ahead of her killed a piece of her, but other than Legion crawling back out so they could shuffle the order again, she didn’t have much choice.

“Make the hole as big as you can, Legion,” she called into the tunnel. “We have to get Mr. Elegant-neck-giant-carapace through.” Her lips quirked a little when she saw Garrus shake his head. The half-smile bled away as she watched him shift uneasily, eyes and weapon in constant motion. C-Sec had joined her insane mission voluntarily, eagerly even, but . . . .
Despite feeling like you can’t function without him at your back, you know that you should’ve left him on the Citadel, Janey. No matter what, this adventure isn’t going to end well for all of them. He deserved that other life.

Shepard nodded. Yeah, Garrus deserved better. Hell, all her people did.

“See if you can’t clear a little room inside the door as well. I’d rather avoid you going in without us covering you,” she said, pushing up as close as she dare with sparks of molten steel flying everywhere.

She lifted her hand to her ear. “Nihlus?”

“I read you, Shepard. What’s your sitrep?”

“Hunkered down in a creepy-ass tunnel made out of freaky spider webbing and dead geth heretics. We’re waiting for Legion to cut its way through a door. How long do we have before annihilation?”

“Sixty-five minutes.”

Shepard set her omnitool to count down. “Roger that.”

“Task complete, Shepard-Captain,” Legion called back. “However, route of ingress is blocked by a crate too heavy for this platform to move. Requesting assistance.”

“Got to go, Nihlus. Shepard out.” She chuckled at the exasperated sigh that preceded the channel closing. It did him good to wait around. Patience definitely wasn’t his primary virtue. She cut off her inner voice before it got through the first syllable of its retort.

Dropping down onto her hands and knees, she crawled up beside Legion, wedging herself into the small space. Luckily, he’d cut some of the webbing away as well, so she could crouch next to the door. Setting her shoulder into the crate, she braced herself, three fingers counting down.

Three . . . two . . . one.

Digging in, they managed to move it about six inches.

“Sweet baby Jesus, what’s in this thing?” she whispered. “Osmium?”

“Osmium is unlikely due to its comparative rarity,” Legion replied.

“Thank you, Brother Literal.” She slammed her shoulder back into the crate. “Come on, let’s get this thing moved.”

“You taking any fire up there?” Garrus asked, peering through a narrowing in the tunnel. “I feel like I’ve gone deaf it’s so damned quiet in here.”

Shepard held his stare as she listened then shook her head. “No, you haven’t lost your hearing. This whole place is just fucking creepy-ass silent.” As far as she could tell, a pin dropping on the other side of the crate would resound like a cannon shot. Her teeth squeaked as she clenched down. If it was just another empty room . . .

Pushing that thought aside, she dug in her feet and pressed her back into the polymer box once more. Whatever waited there . . . horror, survivors, or nothing, they needed to get past the damned crate to find out. It took them five tries, but finally it shifted enough for them to crawl out and get Shepard wedged herself through the narrow space and stopped dead, horror and denial battling for control as her mind tried to process the carnage spread out before her. Geth, krogan, asari, and even the human husk creatures lay heaped into a long, grisly pile, their sheer numbers staggering. More than a hundred bodies lie stacked like cordwood or sandbags banked to stem a flood.

“Oh my sweet baby Jesus,” she whispered, her entire body flushing numb and cold, her blood replaced by ice water. She stumbled two steps forward on wooden legs, then ground to a halt again. The massacre represented someone’s last stand, all those lives . . . those people throwing themselves in front of the enemy to hold back a terrible tide.

Garrus bumped into her from behind, nudging her forward until he had room to stand. His warm, solid presence returned enough feeling that she realized she’d let Roger sag in her hands, its barrel almost touching the floor. Arms stiff and argumentative, she lifted him to high ready, bracing the stock in against her shoulder.

A strong hand rested on her shoulder, gently moving her a foot to her right. “Spirits,” the turian whispered. He stepped around her, his assault rifle leading as he picked his way forward, trying to bypass the pile without stepping on the bodies.

Shepard turned to Legion, pushing back the cold and paralysis. “Legion, left flank. Garrus, sweep to the right. I’ll go up the middle. Don’t take any chances.” Taking a deep breath, she shook off the rest of her reaction, breathing in time with her steps. Warrior inside and out . . . at least until they got clear of that hell.

A set of stairs stood before her, the length of them strewn with asari bodies, all clad in the leather armour of commandos. She slid her gaze over them without allowing herself to linger on the terrible wounds that punctured torsos and severed limbs. Here and there she spotted one of the strange, crayfish-spider corpses amidst the others, but how could so few of them have killed so many? Maybe they took their dead with them, but if that was the case . . .

At the top of the stairs, a platform opened up to the right, the section ahead of her leading to a set of stairs back down. The door at the bottom said it led back to the tram: the first barricaded door they encountered when they arrived at Rift Station. More bodies lay there, but facing toward her, as if they’d fought to cover someone’s retreat.

A soft sigh of sound to Shepard’s right drew her attention. An asari in a long, formal gown and headdress lay, half propped up against a broken crate. Blood stained her dress almost a uniform violet, yet her chest hitched in a faint flutter.

“Lady Benezia?” Shepard walked over, eyes scanning the room for attack. Her heart flipped back and forth between hope and fear. Answers. At last, but suddenly she wasn’t sure if she wanted them. How had the universe turned from comprehensible to . . . this madness in a few short weeks?

The asari’s eyes opened. “Shepard?” Her voice came out thin, but with an underlying strength that left Shepard with no doubt as to why she remained alive. She’d willed herself to wait. A hand, the fingers broken, reached out. “Must hurry.”

Crouching by the matriarch’s side, Shepard shook her head. “I’ve got medigel. We can get you out of here. Liara is on my ship.”

A smile drifted like mist across the severe, beautiful face. “Tell her . . . tell her that she’s my greatest joy. I’m so proud that she forged her own path.” Her hand rested on Shepard’s boot, and the captain reached down to cradle it in hers. The skin felt cold and clammy. “You must listen, Shepard.” Benezia’s eyes closed. “Save the queen. The Reapers are afraid of her, of the rachni.”

“Rachni?” Shepard lowered herself to one knee. “That’s what killed all these people?” She glanced up, movement behind a thick layer of glass attracting her attention. A creature hunkered down within a large container. “Is that the queen? Why would I save her when all this death . . . ?” She stammered to a halt. “Where are all the people who worked here?”

The hand in Shepard’s twitched, as if shattered nerves ordered broken bones to squeeze her fingers. “Not the queen’s fault. Saren . . . found her egg, thought to enslave her offspring, turn them into an army. Separated . . . driven mad.” She gasped, the breath whistling as she exhaled. “Save the queen. The Reapers cannot win.”

Shepard glanced behind her as Garrus and Legion arrived on the platform, her heart beating stronger with the other part of her warrior-self returning to its rightful place.

“She’s the only living soul, Shepard,” Garrus reported.

The captain nodded. “Legion, start cutting us a way out of here through that other door.”

“Affirmative.”

After the geth walked away, Shepard turned back to the matriarch. “What’s Saren after?” she asked, her voice soft and gentle. “Why is he doing this?”

Benezia’s eyes fluttered but didn’t open. “He discovered artifact . . . led to Sovereign. Is indoctrinated. The council . . . all indoctrinated. They believe they can convince Reapers to spare our races. A trade.” The asari slumped. “Trade your race . . . other races to save theirs. Must stop.”

Shepard swallowed the fear that statement prompted, forcing herself to focus as dizziness, dissociation tried to take hold. Breathing deep, she threw up a wall to hold that storm at bay. “He thinks he can bring them back? How?”

“Conduit. Great key . . . opens to dark space.” Her hand managed to grip Shepard’s, the action ripping a thin shrill of agony from her lips. “Illium. Liara . . . find Aethyta. Entrusted legacy . . . holding it for Liara.”

“Do you know where Saren took the quarian pilgrims?” Garrus asked. Shepard glanced back to see him crouched just behind her shoulder.

Benezia nodded, her breath fading. “Virmire. Breeding krogan . . . cure.” She let out a long breath thick and rattling with the blood that trickled from her lips. “Tell Liara . . .”

Shepard stroked the cold fingers cradled in hers. “I will tell her that you love her. Rest easy.”

A moment later, she laid the still hand in the matriarch’s lap, knowing that just the shell remained. Faint sorrow drifted through the room like a silver cloud, a soft chiming of bells without sound. For a moment, Shepard let it move through her, mourning a woman and a beauty she’d never get the chance to know.

Her chrono flashed, fifty minutes . . . they needed to move. But first . . .

Shepard stood and walked over to the glass to look in at the rachni queen.

“Can we risk it, Shepard?” Garrus asked. “What her offspring did here . . . It took the full force of the krogan and the citadel’s forces to bring them down before. What happens if they try to wipe us all out again?”

Shepard knew he asked a very good question. If she let the queen go, she could very well be responsible for an armageddon as terrible and final as the Reapers. However, if Benezia was right and the rachni would fight the Reapers, they’d be a hell of a force to be reckoned with. The queen’s head turned to face them, her mouth? mandibles? beak? opening to press against the glass.

“Can you hear me?” Shepard called through the glass. “Can you understand me?”

An asari commando sitting slumped against the nearby computer console twitched, her head lifting to loll loosely. “We understand you.”

Shepard jumped, Roger springing to her shoulder as quickly as her heart leaped back into her throat. Stumbling a little, she backed up a couple of steps, giving herself some room to react. “Wait. What?”

“This one serves as our voice. We cannot sing, not in these low spaces. Your musics are colourless.” The asari staggered to her feet. Shepard edged forward, reaching out to grip the slender, blue wrist, catching the faintest twitch of a pulse before dropping the cooling flesh. Her gut churned in disgust at the indecency of dragging the dying off the floor to use as some sort of meat puppet.

The asari stepped up to the glass and turned to face them. “Your way of communicating is strange . . . flat. It does not colour the air.” The asari shuddered a little as if held upright in tremulous hands. “When we speak, one moves all. We are the m . . . mother. We sing for the ones left behind. The ones you thought silenced.”

“You’re controlling her?” Garrus asked, his sidearm in his hand, aimed at the asari’s head. He pressed up behind Shepard, the gesture of support both welcome and reassuring.

“Our kind sing through touchings of thought. One plucks the strings and the other understands. This one is weak to urging. She is ending. Her music sings with colours we have no name for, but it is bittersweet. It is beautiful.”

Shepard looked between the queen and the dying asari. “Wait. This is fascinating . . . and revolting . . . but we’re under a deadline here. There is a warhead about to be dropped on our heads. What the hell happened here? Benezia told me to save you, but all I can see around me are reasons to leave you in there and let that warhead wipe the rachni out . . . again.”

The queen made a faint whining, mewling sound that vibrated inside Shepard’s chest. “The children we birthed were stolen from us before they could learn to sing. They are lost to silence. Mad. End their suffering. They cannot be saved. They will only cause harm as they are.”

Shepard felt as though a hand wrapped around her heart, squeezing. Sorrow that was not her own burrowed into her. “If they’d been left with you, they wouldn’t be violent? They wouldn’t be killing?” She stepped past the asari and up to the glass, pressing a hand against the container.

“These needlemen sought to turn them into beasts of war: claws with no song of their own. Our elders are comfortable with silence, but children know only fear if no one sings to them. Fear shattered their minds.”

Shepard nodded. “Yeah, it does that.”

Garrus pressed up on her again. “I don’t know, Shepard. Too much rides on this to be a snap decision.”

Shepard turned away from the queen to look into his eyes. For a long moment, she didn’t say anything. He was right. If she made the wrong decision, she could destroy everything. Only . . .

“The true soldier fights not because he hates what is in front of him, but because he loves what is behind him, C-Sec.” Shepard glanced back through the glass and sighed. “G.K. Chesterton . . . yet another person wiser than I.” She lifted a hand to the cage and the being held within. “The question then becomes, do we love what’s behind us enough to give what’s in front of us a chance?”

Legion walked up the stairs, returning to the edge of the platform. Its head flaps fluttered a little over its light. “Shepard-Captain, you repaired this platform and allowed geth to prove our forthright intentions despite the fact that the heretics previously attacked your people. The geth, if they wished to conquer, are as great a threat to galactic peace as the rachni, are they not?”

A thin smile pressed Shepard’s lips together. She nodded and looked over at Garrus, one eyebrow raised. A tiny sigh escaped as her smile spread, a glorious feeling of humble gratitude blooming inside her chest. “I love being surrounded by people so much smarter and wiser than I am,” she said. “Don’t you?”

Garrus’s mandibles dropped, and he rumbled low in his throat. It filled the air with his uncertainty, prickling the hair on her arms.

Her hand lifted, fingertips brushing his forearm. “Don’t worry, Brother C-Sec. If the rachni turn from the Enkindlers’ light, you can blame the whole thing on me. There is nothing quite as satisfying as an ‘I told you so’ as you face the cusp of armageddon. Glory hallelujah.”

He rumbled again, but the mandible flutter that accompanied it eased the tension. “I think I’d prefer to hear you say, ‘I told you so’ after this war is over, and we’ve won.”

The asari took a shuffling step toward Shepard. “We stand before you. What will you sing? Will you release us? Are we to fade away once more?”

Still staring into Garrus’s eyes, Shepard waited for the pendulum to still on one side or the other. It finally did when the turian’s mandibles dropped a little. He gave her a single nod that she returned.

“No, I won’t condemn your race to extinction again.” She walked over to the console and hit the container release. “You’ll have to come with us. We’ll get you clear of this hellhole and find somewhere for you to make a home.”

“We understand and will follow. Your compassion and trust will sing down through the generations of our children.” The dying asari settled gracefully to the floor.

Shepard stretched her neck a little, shifting uncomfortably. “Okay. First, let’s get the hell out of here.” She reached up to open a channel, focusing on small, simple orderly steps to keep her mind from going to the crazy place. Rachni. Saren and the council trading humans, volus, krogan . . . so many others to save the council races. Oh hell no. She shook her head. Small, sane steps. “Nihlus. Do you read?”

“I read you, Shepard. What’s your situation?” The Spectre’s voice sounded strained, impatient.

Shepard paced to the edge of the platform, catching a glimpse of the rachni queen as she made her way around the lab to join them. “Ah, we have the Peak 15 situation under control, but this place could use one hell of an antimatter enema.”
“You’ve got forty-two minutes and a five kilometre safe radius, Shepard. You’d better get moving.”

She groaned and nodded. Nothing like an impossible deadline to certain death to keep one focused. “Say no more, Brother Nihlus, we’re running with all the swift certainty of the Enkindlers’ light. Will let you know when we’re clear. Shepard out.”

“How much time?” Garrus asked, his mandibles pulled tight against his face. “I could use some good news here, Shepard.”

She winced and shrugged. “How do you feel about forty-two minutes and a five kilometre safe radius?” Shepard nodded at his curse and glanced down at Benezia’s body, then back up to the ceiling as she heard soft, distant cries and skittering through the pipes and ducts. “We need to run like hell. That doesn’t allow for carrying a body. Damn it.” She started toward the walkway. “Liara . . .”

“Will understand,” Garrus said, following.

“We will carry her,” Benezia’s lips spoke with the queen’s voice. “She sang in bright blues and greens of a daughter. We will return her to her child.”

Shepard jumped and stumbled, arms pinwheeling as she flew backwards into Garrus. He caught her, setting her back onto her feet.

“Sweet baby Jesus, don’t do that again.” She pressed her hand over her heart, able to feel it pounding even through her armour. “Good lord.” After a moment of recovery, Shepard nodded, glancing toward the queen. “Okay, if you can carry her without slowing us down, go ahead. We’ll take point, make sure that we don’t meet with any more unwelcome company.”

The rachni queen climbed up the stairs, moving toward the dead matriarch.

Shepard nodded to Garrus to cover her right flank as she swung Roger around to cover the left. Glancing toward the tramway exit, she cursed. “Shame we couldn’t have just walked right through here on the way in. How long before that door’s open, Legion?”

“Twenty-six seconds, Shepard-Captain,” the geth reported without pausing its work.

“When you’re through, I’ll take point. C-Sec . . .” Shepard stopped. The skittering sound and cries grew louder. “Damn.” She ran back to the section of the platform that overlooked their entrance. “They’re coming through!” Pulling a grenade from her belt, she brought Roger up, couching his stock in against her side. “Suppressing fire, C-Sec. Let’s bottle them up as much as we can, then blow it and run.”

Glancing back to the rachni queen, who now held Benezia’s body in her tiny forelimbs, Shepard shouted, “Head for the tram as fast as you can go. Legion, take point. Get the queen clear of the facility.”

“Affirmative, Shepard-Captain.”

She heard the laser die, followed by a metallic crash as Legion kicked out the door. Her pulse slowed a little as their escape route opened up.

“Here they come, Shepard,” Garrus called, his sniper rifle booming like a small cannon. A large rachni soldier fell in the hole, blocking the path. Others started hauling the body clear. Aiming for what little of their insectile bodies showed through the opening, she and Garrus dropped another three, blocking the path further.

“Go ahead, C-Sec. I’ll cover the rear.” She peppered the small opening with rounds. “Keep those two safe.”

“Shepard . . .” He hesitated, putting another two bullets into the head of a soldier as it tried to climb over its fallen siblings.

“I’m right behind you. Go.” Shepard poured a steady stream of death through the hole cut in the door, glancing behind her to make sure that her squad made it clear. With the room as torn apart by battle as it was, she couldn’t even be sure a grenade wouldn’t bring the whole place down on her head.

“We’re clear,” Garrus’s voice called. “Come on.”

Shepard bought them another couple of seconds, then clicked the timer on the grenade and lobbed it into the hole. Spinning, she ran for the tram, reaching it just in time for the explosion to give her a good, hard shove through the door.

“They flanked us,” Garrus’s shout stopped her heart for a split second.

“Fuck!” Shepard bolted forward, racing up a long flight of stairs. Sure enough, when she reached the top, the tram waiting area crawled with both soldiers and the little workers. One of the latter raced at her and leaped, splattering all down the front of her armour. A few drops misted across her face, burning in her eyes. “Keep moving the best you can!” She swiped the back of her hand across her face, trying to clear the toxic, green goo, then opened fire.

Tossing grenades into the corners furthest from her squad, she managed to thin the numbers a little. Roger moved from one to the next, her finger counting off a rhythm . . . one, two, three . . . one, two, three . . . Three bullets per customer, no waiting.

She’d only taken down a few when the rachni turned to meet her, forming a wall between Shepard and the squad. At least, they’d just about reached the tram doors. For a moment, she let Roger’s muzzle sag toward the floor. The squad was clear. No point them risking themselves waiting . . .

“Don’t you dare!” Garrus shouted.

She looked up, seeing him battering his way back to her, shooting one second, beating the rachni back with the butt of his rifle the next. Damn him, coming back for her, but good lord, wasn’t he was something to see? After a breath, she nodded, lifting her gun to her shoulder and wading in to clear a path.

A worker leaped at her face. She batted it aside, just in time for it to explode right in her eyes. Blinded, her face burning, eyes streaming tears, she swiped the backs of her fingers across her face again, but it did nothing to ease the burning. Blinking rapidly, she tried to clear her vision, barely able to make out light and dark . . . some movement. Not wanting to risk shooting Garrus, she turned Roger around, using the gun as a club. A soldier reared up in front of her, its tentacle claws stabbing and slicing the air. Spinning her rifle in her hand, she shoved the barrel into the creatures face and squeezed the trigger. In a spray of toxic blood, it went down, and then Garrus was there.

“Hang onto my belt,” he called, grabbing her hand and slapping it against his waist. Without waiting to make sure she had a grip, he turned, his assault rifle singing out death.

Shepard gripped Garrus with one hand, the other aiming Roger behind them to keep the rachni from attacking their backs. A blurred sea of movement poured up the stairs from the lab.
“Damn it.” She shouldered Roger and pulled a grenade, lobbing three in a row, each one a little further.

Then the tram doors shut behind them, and the vehicle began to move.

“She shouldered Roger and pulled a grenade, lobbing three in a row, each one a little further.

“Sit,” Garrus commanded, “and lay your head back over the seat.” He guided her to a chair and shoved her down into it none too gently.

Then the tram doors shut behind them, and the vehicle began to move.

She did as he said, laying her head back, sighing in relief a moment later as water sluiced over her eyes, washing most of the toxic slime away. When her eyes were clear, he poured it over her face and hair, then passed her a small square of towel from his hip pack.

“You really come prepared, don’t you?” she asked as she blotted her face dry.

“One tends to after they’ve been pepper sprayed a few times.” He crouched next to her. “How are the eyes?”

Shepard blinked a couple of times. “Okay. I can see, anyway. Damn, that goo stings.” She leaned forward, her forearms on her thighs as a heavy wave of dizzy nausea crashed over her. “Uhh . . . I’m not feeling all that hot though.” Without straightening, she opened her omnitool and hit her medigel.

Garrus nodded and crouched next to her, his face less than an inch from hers. “I don’t know what sort of bullshit went through your head back there,” he whispered, his voice hard and heavy on the growling subvocals, “but I never want to see it again.” He pulled back and stared into her eyes. “You aren’t disposable, Shepard.”

She stood as the tram slowed, pulling into Central Station.

“Arriving at Central Station, Binary Helix Research Facility,” the VI toned. Saved by the bell, Janey . . . well, so to speak.

Shepard jumped through the doors as soon as they opened wide enough she wouldn’t get wedged between them, and lifted into a jog. Spurred on as much by avoiding some deep ‘You’re important and worthwhile’ crap with Garrus as their ticking clock and the horde of pursuing rachni, she weaved between the rows of seats. With any luck, they’d reach the Mako in under ten minutes. She’d have to drive like a maniac to get them clear, but at least that part would be fun.

Shepard caught movement on the far end of the mess hall, moving the opposite direction than the Mako. A familiar shape amidst a retinue of twenty or so geth troopers and hunters strode quickly toward a door.

She sprinted forward, racing down the short hall, hurdling the stairs like a speed bump. “Saren!” Her scream echoed through the empty lounge, bouncing off the walls. The Spectre didn’t pause or glance back. “Where are all the people who worked here, Saren? What the hell are you doing?”

A large hand closed on her arm, yanking her to a halt. She spun, slamming up against Garrus’s side.

“What the fuck, C-Sec? Get off of me.” She wrenched at her arm, trying to pull loose, but couldn’t break his grip. She settled for turning back, just in time to see Saren disappear through the door. “Dammit. Saren! I won’t let you and the council fuck over the rest of us.” She hurled herself against Garrus’s hand. “I’ll kill you! Do you hear me? I’m going to rip your fucking lungs out, you bastard.”
Garrus yanked her closer, releasing her for a split second, just long enough to slip an arm around her waist and start dragging her toward the door. “This is not the time, Shepard,” he said, his voice loud enough to break through her rage, but the tone calm and soothing. “You’ll get your chance to put a bullet in Saren, but right now, we need to get out of here before we’re just sludge at the bottom of a crater.”

After a moment, Shepard let out a scream of pure fury, then nodded. “Fine. I’m fine, C-Sec. Let me go.” When he set her down, she took off at a run, haranguing the others to move faster. They needed to survive long enough for Shepard to close her hands around that traitor’s throat and choke the living shit out of him, herself.
Chapter Summary

The streak continues. One of Garrus or Shepard has to be a jinx.

Shepard burst out into the deadly cold, the frostbitten air cooling her molten fury on contact. A hissing-steam sigh greeted the battered, but present, Mako. Relief pushed back the cold, and if it wouldn't have earned her some extra-strange stares, she would have kissed the ugly old tank. She just prayed that it started and got them the hell out of there before it fell apart.

Stabbing a finger toward the Mako's back end, she called, "Legion, help the queen get in through the back hatch." Garrus on her heels, she ducked around the front, leaping over a piece of the still-burning Grizzly. On the far side, she threw that hatch open and jumped in. "Garrus, give me a hand with Benezia."

They took Benezia's body from the queen and laid it on one of the bench seats, then scrambled into the cockpit, leaving Legion to shoehorn the rachni into the troop compartment. Luckily, despite her size, the queen was mostly leg and long, slender body, so she folded down with enough room to spare for Legion to squeeze into the seat at the cannon.

Shepard glanced back as she started up the tank. "Now there's something you don't see every day." Legion and the queen both just stared at her. "Okay, let's get the hell out of here."

Garrus activated the electronics suite. "Getting arrested with a geth, a rachni queen, and a dead matriarch should prove interesting." He shot a glare across at her, his mandibles twitching in an aggressive way she wasn't used to seeing from him. In fact, she couldn't recall seeing it since he went after Saren on Feros.

She nodded as the Mako rumbled to life. "Keep a weather eye on those damage sensors. I'm going to need to push the poor old girl as hard as I can." She activated her omnitool so that she could see the chrono counting down, then slipped the tank into gear, backing it away from Peak 15.

The hours they'd spent inside the facility had not been kind to the roads. Not to mention that the snow had drifted and blown down through the hole in the cockpit, covering most of the control console in a thick layer of crystals. She brushed it off and ducked her head, trying to see past the miniature squall blasting directly into her face.

"Legion, grab a panel off something non-essential and stick it up here. I can't see a fucking thing." Shepard swiped a hand across the face plate of her helmet to clear her vision, unable to see the sensor readouts.

"Might have been something to consider before ramming a colossus and getting it stuck on the front of the Mako," Garrus grumbled. He cursed as Legion wedged itself between them, and sparks filled the air from its omnitool.

"Shut it, Vakarian, and just keep your eyes on the damn sensors." Shepard hit the eezo core, increasing the positive field to give the tank more traction as it leaped off a drift and bounced dangerously close to the cliff edge. Steering it toward the mountainside, she brought the six-wheeled menace back under control.

"Maybe slow the hell down before you get us all killed. We've got twenty minutes to make it four and a half kilometres." Garrus reached over in front of her to hit a control. "We've got the time, and if you keep going like this, we're going to break down. Only four wheels are turning, the entire front end is twisted … ."

"Just keep it running for another twenty minutes. I didn't ask for a laundry list of how I—"

"Look out!" Garrus hollered, pointing to the LADAR screen as a mass of snow the size of an apartment building broke free of the mountainside above them.

Gritting her teeth, Shepard manipulated the eezo core to increase the tank’s mass and steered into the torrent, driving directly toward the mountain. Fighting the current, the Mako slewed hard, the tires churning as the tons of snow pushed it toward the edge. The tank punched through and reared up the rock face, tilting off to the starboard side to crash back onto its wheels.

"Spirits, Shepard," Garrus shouted, adding a choice turian curse. "Do you have to drive like a lunatic?"

Shepard clenched her teeth and set her jaw, fighting to keep her trembling hands steady on the controls. "Watch the damned screens. Last thing I fucking need is someone screaming at me from the passenger seat."

Legion finished its work and retreated silently out of the battle zone. Shepard gave it a nod of gratitude, glad to be able to see what she was doing. They passed into the first of the avalanche tunnels, and she took advantage of the calm to remove her helmet. Sighing with relief, she shook her hair out and cracked her neck. God, she hated wearing that thing while driving or flying.

The road between the first and second avalanche tunnels widened to a far more comfortable margin. She still stuck like a tick to the inside of the road, however. If another avalanche hit, she'd much rather it buried them then swept them out into a long drop with a deadly stop.

"How far until we're clear of the blast zone?" She glanced down at her chrono. Twelve minutes.

"Two kilometres." Garrus reached over her console again to hit a couple of controls. As annoying as it was, she let it go. They needed the damned thing to carry them another two klicks before it conked out. If he needed to sit on her lap and braid her hair to accomplish that, so be it.

"Is the last avalanche tunnel outside the zone?" she asked as the Mako did a small jump down the ramp and back onto the snowy road.

"The last half of it, anyway," Garrus answered after a second of fiddling with the map.

"We'll let our passengers out there," she said. "They can get a head start toward Port Hanshan, take shelter close to the city. Once we're clear of the bureaucracy, we'll pick them up." Shepard course corrected as the road under them broke loose and slid toward the edge. "We can sit in the tunnel for a bit to buy them time."

Garrus grumbled, but remained focused on his task as a grinding sound from underneath began to accompany the wobbling thump-thump of the ruined wheels.

With a klick left to go, smoke began to drift into the cockpit. Shepard glanced over at Garrus to see how concerned she needed to be, but he just shrugged and nodded ahead to the opening of the last tunnel before the city.
"There's nothing left to do but hope," he grumbled.

"Understood. Look for some shelter for them on high ground. The blast is likely going to shake every last bit of snow off the mountain, and I don't want them to end up down there, somewhere." She jerked her head toward the drop.

Garrus hunkered over the topographical terrain display without arguing.

The smoke had reached the point where Shepard thought she'd have to put her helmet back on when they entered the tunnel. At the far end, Shepard checked her chrono. Despite nearly dying, they'd made good time, and Legion had nine minutes to get high enough to avoid being buried in an inevitable avalanche.

Shepard turned in her seat and passed the geth a card of trackers. "These are in case we lose radio contact for any reason. Make sure you're both wearing more than one. Radio in when you find shelter outside the city. Just send your location." She glanced to Garrus, but he remained hunched over, searching. "Here's the matriarch's OSD. Don't lose it."

She studied the pair of them for a moment. "Are you both going to be okay in this cold?"

"This platform is designed to withstand the cold vacuum of space," Legion informed her.

"We shall be fine. Rachni are accustomed to far more hazardous environments than this," Benezia said with the queen's voice.

Shepard shuddered.

"I found a cave high on the mountain. They should be able to make it if they move now and move fast," Garrus called out. "Sending coordinates to Legion's omnitool."

"Excellent." Shepard pulled on her helmet and climbed out the side door, riding up Legion's heels. When they extricated the rachni queen from the troop compartment, she and Garrus helped her with Benezia. "Be quick and careful," she ordered as the odd pair turned and ran toward the end of the tunnel.

"Sweet baby Jesus, I hope they'll be okay," she muttered under her breath once the swirling snow swallowed them whole.

"They'll be fine. Let's get back in the Mako before my limbs snap off." Garrus climbed in the back, while Shepard ran around the side.

Once in the driver's seat, Shepard put the tank into reverse, backing down the avalanche tunnel just far enough to clear the end. Any part of the structure might collapse in the case of a massive disaster, but the ends seemed the most likely danger zones.

Neither she nor Garrus spoke as they waited for the timer to run out. A couple of times, she inhaled and opened her mouth to ask him if some of the rachni might escape and survive, or how he thought Saren planned to escape. Each time, she glanced over at him, sitting there rigid and furious, his mandibles tight to his face and twitching, and the mission aborted before getting off the launch pad.

She'd just started the transition from hurt sadness to puzzling through why he was so furious with her when the ground shook, a single, massive jolt. A sound like an old-fashioned diesel freight train rumbled toward them, then God slammed His fist down on the Mako. Shepard flew out of her seat, bouncing off the divider to crash onto the floor as the machine rocked hard to starboard.
Bouncing and swaying, it settled onto all six tires.

No sooner had silence fallen than she felt the ground tremble again. The roar accompanying the cataclysm of rolling snow grew louder and louder until Shepard covered her head and curled into a ball, waiting for it to end. An avalanche that strong should smash through the tunnel, a charging bull that bore them over the edge to smash them against the rock far below. But then the monster passed over them and she peeked out from under her arms, heart pounding, head light. They were okay. She let out a giddy sound, not sure if it was relief or her cheese had finally slid off her cracker.

"Shepard? You all right?" Garrus moved, alerting her to the fact that he'd wrapped himself around her. His voice sounded nearly as shaken as she felt.

She uncurled and pushed herself up off the Mako's floor. "Yeah, I'm fine, just rattled." Clambering to her feet, she checked herself for injury. Other than the vague burning and nausea left over from the rachni goo, all of her bits and pieces seemed present and accounted for. "How about you?" She sat in the driver's seat and checked on the Mako.

"Yeah, fine." He thumped down into the other seat and brought up the LADAR screen. After a minute, he let out a grumbling sigh. "Well, we're stuck."

"What do you mean stuck? Did the tunnel collapse?" She craned her neck to get a better look at the readout. The immediate area seemed clear.

Garrus chuffed. "I mean that we can drive back and forth along this fifty metre stretch of tunnel, but there is no way in hell we can get out either end." Garrus slowed down, speaking to her as if she was three. "The antimatter explosion shook the mountain. The snow rolled down the mountain. The snow buried us in this tunnel." He got up and moved to the cannon seat in the back. "I'll power down everything that isn't essential to survival. We're going to be here awhile."

Shepard let out a long, angry breath, her nostrils flaring. "Excellent. Behaving like a petulant, condescending ass is definitely going to make being trapped here a whole lot easier. Thanks so much."

Garrus turned off the cannon and electronics suite before moving to the front seat and setting to work on the machine gun and navigation controls. "And you called me a jinx. You're the jinx. How many times have your decisions gotten us trapped somewhere, Shepard? Therum, you decided to blow a magma pocket to kill the krogan. Feros, you insisted we run down through the building. Omega ...."

Shepard looked over at him and deadpanned, "You're joking with me, right? Therum, okay, I own Therum. Feros was your hot-headed stupidity. If we'd evacuated with the colonists, we'd have been fine. Omega ... who was it yelled, 'They went in here?' She threw her hands out. "And this? What the hell else was I supposed to do, C-Sec? Wait two days for Nihlus to get us permission to check out the crater that used to be Peak 15? Try to make it down the road to Port Hanshan and get us swept off the side of the mountain?" Her eyes burned, hating the sick, aching pressure that threatened to blow open her chest. Had she just been naive about Garrus being her friend all those weeks?

No, surely she hadn't, but then why was he acting so much ... so much like Nihlus? Well, Nihlus before he started trying to avoid assholery. She pushed that out of her head and reached up to open a radio channel. "Legion, it's Shepard. Do you read?"

"Affirmative, Shepard-Captain. We avoided the avalanche and are undamaged. Proceeding toward "Port Hanshan," the geth replied.

"Excellent. Talk to you soon, Shepard out." She closed the channel.

"No, dropping and going in was the right move," Garrus continued. He leaned back against the side of the tank, the rod up his ass returning full force. "I just wasn't counting on being arrested outside of council space on espionage charges." He held his hands out, gesturing around them. "Do you know how much the executive board will fine us, Shepard? They probably won't take the Normandy because it would provoke an incident with the Alliance, but us personally . . . " He leaned toward her. "I will never make enough money at C-Sec to pay the fines. Not to mention what being arrested for corporate espionage does for the career of a C-Sec investigator." He thumped back against the side of the tank.

"I guess that depends on whether or not you're a C-Sec investigator, doesn't it?" Shepard turned to stare straight ahead. Sighing, she growled a little, then said, "What the fuck is your problem, Vakarian? Is this just a case of 'I'm having a bad day, and I feel like being a complete ass to Shepard', or is there something else going on?" Deflating a little, she shook her head. "I'm doing the fucking best that I can. I got us all in there, got the information, and then got us out alive." She tried not to let him see how deep his words cut. For so many years she'd cultivated a life where no one's opinion of her mattered, and now another turian was causing that 'surely it must be a heart attack' pain. She swallowed hard, trying to loosen her throat, preparing herself for whatever he said.

"Vakarian?" Garrus asked, his voice sounding nearly as strangled as hers.

Out of the corner of her eye, she saw him nod, a small thrill of satisfaction lancing through her as his mandibles dropped for a moment.

He took a quick, deep breath and nodded again. "Well, if I have to be Vakarian to keep you alive, then I guess I'll live with that. You went somewhere stupid and ugly back in that tram station, Kahri, so yes, I have a problem beyond 'it's been a bad day'." He leaned forward, spine rigid, mandibles tucked in hard against the sides of his mouth. "The most important person in my life is a suicidal, reckless idiot, and I'm getting a little tired of having to babysit her."

"Most import . . . Babysit . . . ?" She scoffed even though her heart raced and her hands tingled. Why hadn't she seen what a condescending ass he could be? Fury boiled inside her gut, making her stomach flutter. "You're impossible. Why did I even bring you along on? I should have left you on —"

He chuffed, cutting her off. "Me? I'm impossible? Oh, honey . . . ."

Shepard spun to face him and lunged across the cab, grabbing his armour by the yoke. "You did not just 'honey' me. I'm your fucking captain, C-Sec Investigator Vakarian." Giving him a single, hard shake, she leaned in, glaring at him. "We've had this discussion. Little sister pushed the limit of disrespect you could show and keep what little ass you have. Honey ... a hundred turians don't have enough ass for 'honey'."

Garrus folded his arms and pulled his head back. "Yes, we've had this discussion, Shepard. But do you want to know something? Sometimes the terrible Captain Jane Shepard, most feared woman in the galaxy . . . " He leaned in, staring into her eyes, an angry glint challenging her. "... as long as she's behind the wheel, needs to hear that she's being a—"

A furious growl rolled from her throat. "You . . . ."

Then his mouth mashed against hers, and her lips moved over his rough hide. Leaning into him, Shepard yanked back, throwing herself backward into her seat, chest heaving as she struggled to catch her breath. She wiped the back of her hand across her mouth then stared at a narrow streak of blood that marked her glove from where one of his teeth had nicked her lip.

"Where … ?" she gasped. "Wha … ?" She let out a startled, gasping cough. "Sweet baby Jesus, C-Sec. Where the hell did that come from?"

He slid forward on his seat, staring at her for a long moment, then hit his knees between the seats. "Do you care?" He reached out and cupped her cheek in his hand, his thumb running across her brow and down the bridge of her nose.

She swung around to kneel on the driver's seat, bringing her to his eye level. "Hell, no." She leaned forward, kissing him softly, more tentatively until his arms wrapped around her, pulling her into the contact. Then their tongues tangled around one another, hands roaming everywhere they could touch, bodies pressed together despite the armour. Shepard pulled off her gloves, running her fingers over his face and down his neck.

What are you doing, Janey? You know this is stupid.

"The fringe," he whispered against her lips, distracting her, "particularly the underside." He nuzzled along the line of her jaw, then under her ear. He chuckled. "Oh, I like this spot." He tickled the short, silky hairs with the upper plate of his mouth, then his tongue. "So soft."

Shepard purred low and throaty. "What a coincidence, I like that one too." She tilted her head, giving him free roaming as her fingertips slid over and between the long spikes of his fringe, lingering in all the places where he moaned and rumbled.

You know that you're dooming your friendship, right? You're way too far gone to have a real, functional relationship, Janey.

Shepard stiffened and pulled away, pressing her palm against Garrus's cheekbone. The ache in her chest deepened as he looked into her eyes, then leaned in and touched his brow to hers.

"Stop freaking out," he said. "Breathe, Shepard, and just stop thinking."

"There it is again, that C-Sec magic," she said, trying to force a chuckle. "Levitation and now mindreading."

"I told you ... one hundred percent pure magic." His mandible ticked her cheek as it flicked in a smile.

"Captain Jane Shepard?" a stern, female voice called through Shepard's radio, shattering the moment.

Shepard sighed and pulled away, her hand reaching up to her radio. "This is Shepard."

"Captain, I'm Sergeant Kaira Stirling, Elanus Risk Control Services. I'm here to detain you on behalf of the Port Hanshan Customs and Immigration Authority for unauthorized landing on Noveria Executive Board property."

"Understood, Sergeant," Shepard replied. Experience had taught her it was best to keep things simple and direct in those sorts of situations.

"Our scan shows two of you in there. Is that correct? Are you armed?"

Shepard chuckled. "Yes, there are two of us and yes, we are incredibly well armed, but neither of us is prone to firing on peace officers unless we are fired upon first."

"You're buried under about fifteen metres of snow, Captain, so it will take us several hours to get you out of there." The Sergeant grumbled, her distaste coming through loud and clear as she continued. "It is my duty at this time to inform you that all fees, equipment rental and loss, expenses, and wages incurred during your rescue are your responsibility and, regardless of other outcomes, will be due in full requiring payment prior to your vessel being released from impound."

Shepard laughed, waiting until she could wrestle the humour down before she replied. "Understood Port Hanshan Authority. We aren't going anywhere. Shepard, out." Sighing, she rested her head on the yoke of Garrus's armour. "Well, we're being rescued. Again."

He chuckled. "Probably going to be stuck in here for a few hours though. However will we spend the time?"

Shepard leaned into him and nuzzled his mandible. "What in the name of the sweet baby Jesus do we do about this, C-Sec?"

He sighed and turned to nuzzle her brow. "Have you made Nihlus any promises?"

"Nihlus?" She jerked back and frowned at him. "No. Nihlus and I aren't like that."

"Nihlus is," he said, his voice warm and gentle.

Shepard nodded. "I know, he kissed me, and I care about him. I do."

"But?" His talons combed through her hair.

"I gave him a knife, and he turned it right around on me. I understand why ... I think, but I don't think I'll ever trust him to where I just leap on him and stick my tongue in his mouth." She chuckled and pulled back, pressing her lips to his mouth. Her eyes drifted closed as she inhaled the rich, warm, gun oil and male smell of him. "So, is this just a moment of snowbound insanity?"

He nuzzled her lips and down her neck. "Now that I've done this and felt this ... " His tongue flicked the spot under her ear. "... I'm going to be thinking about it pretty much every second of the day. My vote is for giving us a shot."

Shepard pulled back and stared into his eyes, the left side of her mouth pulled back in a considering smile even as her heart fell, pounding hard but slow, as if her blood turned to sludge.

What are you going to do when he leaves you?

"Okay. We'll see what happens, but C-Sec ... you know me. You know it's not going to be smooth sailing."

He nodded toward the back and reached up to cup her neck between his hands. "We're going to be here for a while, so let's do our best to keep warm."

"You're going to be a constant distraction, aren't you?" she whispered. Despite the teasing tone in her voice, the words laced very real bonds of fear around her heart, tying it tight. She'd worked so hard not to have anything she was afraid to lose, anything that took her mind off the job in front of her. She watched him crouch and squeeze into the back, dragging the cushions off the bench seats and lying them on the floor.

He gave her hope, and damned if that wasn't the most dangerous force in the universe. It couldn't last. Between how fucked up she was, the danger of the job, and the fact that sooner or later, even if they both survived, the mission would end and they'd go back to their lives ... whatever they developed would destruct.

He dug into the chest under the seat, pulling out blankets, water, a lantern, and rations bars. He held up the ration bars. "I packed dextro this time." He grinned, then sobered as their eyes met. "You're already talking yourself out of this, aren't you?"

She nodded. No point in lying to the C-Sec investigator who saw everything.

He spread out one of the blankets, jerking his head to call her over. "Come here." When she didn't move, he did it again. "Come here, Shepard."

She turned to her controls, powering everything down except the emergency lights and the heater. Once she shut it down, she turned to look at Garrus only to find him still watching her.

"Did we know that would happen eventually?" she asked, her brow furrowing even as the one side of her face quirked again.

He frowned, but his mandibles spread and fluttered. "Then ... no. Now, I think it was going to happen from the moment I turned around in the gym, saw the way you were watching me, and my heart started racing so fast that I thought I'd pass out."

Shepard raised her eyebrows and nodded. "Yeah, I can't complain about that view."

Garrus looked down and away, his mandibles fluttering a little.

Shepard got up and ducked through into the back, kneeling beside him. Laying her hand on his arm, she asked. "What?" She waited a second, then cocked an eyebrow. After so many days of the confident, badass friend, his bashfulness surprised her, but it also made her neck flare with heat that crawled up her cheeks. "C-Sec?"

He chuffed a little. "After we met Martin ...."

She chuckled and slid her hand down to hold his talons. "You really going to make me drag this out of you?"

He met her eyes at last, his expression as intense as she'd ever seen it, but different. It wasn't the intensity of the sniper's honed laser sight, but an intensity with a profound gentleness behind it. "Since the Citadel, I've wanted it, Shepard. The way you threw your arms around my neck when that artifact let you go ... . The time we spent with Martin and Anderson ... ."

She smiled sadly and reached up to press her hand against his cheek before pulling on her gloves. "I like you, C-Sec. I do ... you're the best friend I've had in a long time, but that's what has me scared. I don't want to fuck what we already have up because of my craziness." When she opened her mouth to continue, he caressed her bottom lip the pad of a talon, silencing her.
"Shepard, take a drink." He shoved a bottle of water into her hand. "Are you hungry?" Not waiting for an answer, he pressed a protein bar into her other one. "Eat, and then we'll just keep warm and wait to get arrested."

Twisting the cap off the bottle, she took a long drink then passed it to him. After looking at the protein bar for a couple of seconds, she set it aside. Her belly tied itself in knots, caught in the middle between how badly she wanted to reach across the centimetres separating them, and the fear that crawled through her.

Garrus set the bottle aside and took both of her hands in his. "What you're feeling right now is your fight or flight response. You live by it, and it almost always demands that you fight. Right?"

She smiled and squeezed his hands. "Yeah, I've never been much of a runner." Still, her guts insisted that she shut it down before it had a chance to go anywhere. It had to be less painful in the end.

Garrus leaned in, tugging her toward him until their brows touched and he could clasp his hands behind her back. "Don't run, Kahri. If you give me a chance, I won't let you down."

The pressure eased, the knots loosening as warmth spread through her. "What is that you keep calling me?" she whispered. Her eyes drifted shut as the steady, safe ... groundedness of him pulled her in. He felt like home.

Damn him.

"Kahri. It's a word in the turian closed dialect, the language of the home world." He nuzzled her brow. "It has a few meanings, one of which is light."

A barely imperceptible sigh escaped her lips to drift in the silence between them. "I'm no one's light, C-Sec."

A crooked talon pressed under her chin, tilting her face up. "You're such a bright light that you blind yourself, Shepard. Why do you think people are drawn to you, as ornery and sarcastic and stubborn as you are?" He pressed his mouth to hers then nuzzled her cheek, his breath the gentlest of caresses on her skin. "If you'd left me behind on the Citadel, I'd have followed. If you don't want to be with me, I can learn to live with that, as much as I want it, but, Shepard, I'm in this to the end." A wry chuckle rumbled deep in his throat. "No matter how much you piss me off."

"Okay, C-Sec. Okay, but I'm going to want to run." Pulling back, she slipped her arms around his neck. Something settled deep in her chest, something that felt as if it had been floating for fifteen years. "I've never done this. Never wanted to before now." She smiled and tucked her face in under his jaw. "Remember that though, when I'm being terrified, impossible, and obtuse. I do want this."

He held her tight. "Deal." Without pulling away, he picked up one of the emergency blankets and pulled it around her. "You're going to be okay, Shepard. We'll figure all this out."
Chapter Summary

Shepard remembers Mindoir. TRIGGER WARNING! Nothing explicit takes place, but there is an obvious threat of sexual abuse of a minor. Batarian slavers are not kind nor merciful. So yeah, the italicized parts might trigger.

“Your nature will be revealed to us. Accept that,” the deep, throaty, many-layered whisper declared. The oily-tar spiders swarmed up the back of Shepard’s skull, their slick carapaces glinting with the living, frigid darkness that attacked her on the Citadel. Struggling to be the first to slip between the folds of her brain, to discover all her secret terrors and loves, they clambered over each other in an ever-shifting mass. “Your mind belongs to us.”

Shepard shifted in her sleep, murmuring, her brow creasing even as she curled into the warm blankets and the hard angles of the arms that held her.

Darkness. Beautiful, cool, safe darkness. Janey burrowed deeper into the warmth of her blankets, eyes closed, lips curved into a blissful smile as she listened to the orchestra of hoppers and night birds outside her window. Early spring perfumed the air with the rich green, honey scent of the budding trees coloured with a sprinkling of floral tones. Even though the night air still dropped near freezing, she kept her windows open to invite in the elusive, magical spirits of spring.

Small, bare feet padded over the hardwood that lined the hall, hesitating for a moment at the threshold of Jane’s room. “Janey?” When she didn’t answer, the footsteps continued across the metre of floor, stopping at the edge of her bed. “Janey?”

She smiled and cracked one eye open. “What is it, Bunny? You’re supposed to have gone to sleep an hour ago.” Jane sighed. “Your dolls aren’t staring at you, Bunny, and I’m not going into your room to check. Those things freak the crap out of me, you know they do.” She glared at the earnest, wide eyes staring at her over the edge of her bed. “Maybe, if you didn’t rescue every creepy, broken doll in the known universe to nurse it back to health, you wouldn’t have this problem.”

“I was asleep, honest.” Big eyes stared into hers, their pupils eating up almost all the bright green iris. “But there’s a monster in the house. I saw it downstairs. It has four eyes.”

“There’s no such thing as . . . .” A crash from the main floor punched a fistful of claws through Jane’s chest, wrenching her up off the mattress by its grip around her heart. “Mom? Dad?” The words drifted pale and helpless into the darkness, the claws scratching up her throat to pinch her larynx closed.

A piercing shriek ripped the air, echoing up the stairs. Throwing back her covers, Jane scrambled off the bed, snatching for Bunny’s hand and gripping it tight. Panic froze her in place as half of her insisted on racing down to her parents, while the other half dragged her to the window, demanding that she get Bunny to safety.

The stairs thundered under running feet. For a breathless moment, she stared through her open door into the hall, every inch of her body trembling as she prayed for her father to appear. A harsh, jagged sob of relief met his blood-streaked face as it raced in the door. He slammed Jane’s bedroom door shut behind him, locking it.

“Get to the window.” His voice slapped her hard, shattering the ice that held her in place. He jammed Jane’s desk chair under the doorknob. “Hurry.”

Jane did as she was told, reacting robotically to the fear in her father’s voice. She pulled the screen out of the window and lifted Bunny out onto the roof.

“Run to the woods,” her father ordered, his strong arm helping Jane out onto the roof. His kiss impacted her cheek like a punch, his long stubble scratching her skin. “Head for the big rock across the creek. Hide. We’ll come for you when we can.” Pounding on the other side of the door dragged his attention from them. “Move fast and keep to the shadows,” he called over his shoulder, running to brace the door. “We’ll come for you.”

Jane hesitated, her heart colder and harder than the slate shingles under her bare feet. “Dad? Daddy . . . why . . . what’s going on?” Her gaze flicked back and forth between the door and her dad, the whole universe tumbling around her, crashing and lopsided as if she were a pair of running shoes thrown into the dryer.

The door burst open in a hail of splintered wood. “Run!” her father bellowed, the single word drowning under the swell of Bunny’s screaming. He spun to face the six, shadowy figures that shoved and kicked their way through the broken door. “Run and don’t . . .” A muffled crunching sound accompanied a thick, wet scream . . . a broken, terrified sound she’d never imagined her father could make. A single, violent heave spewed popcorn and soda from their earlier vid-night down the front of her pyjamas, but she didn’t move . . . couldn’t move, despite the hot mass of sick rolling down her chest. Finally, she heard a heavy thump, her heart knowing that was her father’s body hitting the floor. Its terrible finality cut into her like the lash of a bullwhip, driving her into action.

Jane caught a glimpse of four, black eyes in the dark window before she half-crawled, half-slid on her backside down the slope of the roof. Arms lunged through the open portal. As fingers grabbed the fabric of Bunny’s nightgown, the child lived up to her nickname, letting out a thin, ‘rabbit in hawk’s claws’ wail of fear. Jane lunged, animal and fierce, her teeth sinking into the monster’s flesh hard enough that blood oozed over her tongue. A vicious shake of her head earned a garbled curse, and she let go, snarling at the attacker as the hand yanked back inside. Gagging and spitting, she dragged Bunny the rest of the way down to the eaves and the three metre drop to the lawn.

“Wait here,” she called, inch-worming her way over the edge. “I’ll catch you.” She dropped off the roof, her ankle letting out a grinding yelp as she hit the ground, and fell onto her backside. Scrambling, she jumped up, holding her arms out. “Come on. Jump. I’ll catch you.”

Bunny lowered herself, little feet kicking as she wriggled over the edge.

“Okay, you’re only a few centimetres away from my hands, just let go.” Jane looked behind her, hearing screaming from more houses in their little development. Her guts loosened, rolling with a sick gurgling. Mrs. Pagette ran out her front door, just to be dragged down, smashing her head on her stairs. Three men tore away her nightdress, then dragged her out of sight. In less than five seconds, Mrs. Pagette and her attackers vanished into the darkness. Jane’s stomach heaved again.

“God damn it, Bunny, just let go,” Jane growled, low and fierce, terror turning to rage. Bunny dropped, a feather-weight easily caught. Setting the child down, Jane grabbed one small hand in hers and bolted for the woods behind the house.
Time counted down in heartbeats, her pulse so loud in her ears that she couldn’t detect any sign of pursuit. Still, she didn’t slow, her feet racing over the wet, slippery leaves and stabbing twigs, squelching through mud as the trees closed in around them, wrapping them in comforting camouflage. So close. Jane felt the call of the huge, cracked glacier rock on the other side of the creek.

“Hurry. I’ll keep you safe if you can just get to me,” it whispered on the breeze. It helped slow the frantic hummingbird wings thumping inside her chest and eased the terrible, watery sloshing in her bowels. If they could just make it to the rock. If they could just make it.

Bunny lagged, pulling back hard on Jane’s hand like a weanling calf sitting back to resist being halter broken. “Slow down,” the child wailed. “Where’s Mommy and Daddy?” She stumbled and fell on her face in a bawling heap. Holding up a heavily bleeding hand, she screamed, “Janey, I want Mommy.” Jane stopped and turned back, lifting the weeping girl back onto her feet.

“They’ll meet us at the rock.” She kissed the cut across the child’s palm. “Come on, we’re just about to the creek,” Jane whispered between gasping breaths. “You can do it. Just keep running.” She tugged hard on the hand, hauling the small anchor along behind her.

“Look what we’ve got here.” A nightmarish form unfolded from the darkness shrouding the path ahead. If it hadn’t spoken, Jane could have dismissed it as a shadow but for the chilling, hard gleam that leered at her from all four eyes. “Thought you could outrun us, did you?” The terrible shadow laughed and lunged toward her.

Jane threw herself backward, feet scrambling as she tried to stop. Slipping on the dew-slick path, she went down, her backside splashing into a puddle of muck. Bunny squawked in pain, dragged down along with Jane, one tiny arm twisted at a strange angle. It snapped, a dry twig under their combined weight, but Bunny merely whimpered and cowered close, tunneling into Jane’s side.

The batarian towered over them, reaching for Bunny first. He lifted the child by the collar of her nightshirt and shoved her toward another figure, that one huffing and wheezing from the chase. “Take this back to the cages for their street.” He cocked his head as his eyes slid over to Jane. “Going to take a little time with this one.” Grabbing a handful of long, red hair, he dragged her to her knees. “Caught us a tasty looking piece of young meat here.”

“You sure you don’t want me to stay, Remit? That one looks like a fighter.” The second batarian stalked around Jane in a wide circle.

Remit laughed, deep and vicious. “You just want to stuff yours into whatever’s left over. Ha!” The batarian pushed Shepard’s head back, forcing her face up to look at him. Rough fingers shoved themselves into her mouth, choking her into another moment of paralysis, but then her fight kicked in, and she bit down as hard as she could.

Slamming her hand down on the slaver’s knuckles, Jane broke his hold on her hair and twisted hard to the side. Sweeping out with her leg, she dumped Remit onto his ass then kicked straight out, catching him under the chin with her heel. He yelled, but fell back, stunned. Jane scrambled to her feet, spitting blood from where one of her teeth had snapped off in Remit’s finger, and launched herself toward Bunny. Before she wrestled the child loose, Remit’s hand buried itself in her hair again.

He yanked her back, shaking her like a pyjak in varren jaws. An open hand slammed into the side of her head. Her jaw cracked as the eye on that side of her head tried to explode out onto her cheek. She dropped, head ringing and fuzzy. Still, she clawed at the ground, trying to stand . . . to get to Bunny . . . to get them both safe. Daddy trusted her to keep Bunny safe.
“Look, meat,” Remit said, his voice a low, rolling growl, “if you fight me, I’ll tie you to that tree over there and make you watch as I do every single twisted, agonizing thing I plan to do to you, ’cept on that little one over there.” He yanked her around and onto her feet, his bleeding and torn fingers digging into her jaw as he forced her to look at the other slaver holding Bunny.

The child kicked and screamed.

“So, what’s it going to be? You going to pucker up and bend over like a good little whore, or do I tear your baby . . . sister? niece? cousin? to shreds?”

Jane stared at Bunny, that precious and precocious treasure dangling from the other slaver’s hand, and nodded once. She spewed vomit, heaving up as much blood as bile. Retch after retch, her stomach forced the slaver back enough to give her a moment to shut the pain and cold into a dark room at the back of her mind. Collapsing into his grip, she managed to gasp out, “Look away, Bunny. Don’t watch.”

“And the spiders crawled out from under that carefully sealed door, black, slick and wriggling with joy.

* * * * *

Shepard awoke to screaming, shrill and deafening as it echoed in the small, suffocating space.

_So dark. Oh God, please . . . it’s so dark._

“Shepard. Easy now. Sh.” Garrus’s face appeared next to her. “It was a nightmare. You’re all right.”

She thrust him away, his hands too rough, his talons too sharp even through her armour. His touch hurt, biting her skin with electric shocks. Strangled, choking wails clawed their way out of her throat as she fought to be free of the blankets. They tangled around her arms and legs, holding her bound and helpless. Clambering to her feet, she backed into the corner of the troop compartment, eyes searching the darkness for . . . she didn’t know what she searched for. Batarians? Whatever intelligence lurked behind the darkness and chill of the glittering, black spiders?

“Oh God.” Her legs trembled more violently with every second until they gave out, dumping her onto her knees. Her arms held out a little longer before they gave up as well, spilling her onto her side. Cheek pressed to the cold, metal flooring, Shepard closed her eyes.

_Just breathe, Janey. Breathe. You’ll be okay. It was just a dream. Just a dream._

Razor-wire tears sliced their way out from under clenched eyelids, bleeding down her face to pool on the Mako’s floor. Sobs twisted her body, the wire coiling around her lungs, refusing to let her draw more than hiccoughs of breath. She felt Garrus’s stare like barbs under her skin and covered her head with her arms. Why then? She’d kept the door locked tight for so long, how had it broken her control?

A gentle, strong hand pressed between her shoulder blades, rubbing slow circles that felt as if they carved straight into her spine. Her scream threw Garrus back as she scrambled up, crawling across the Mako to where her helmet had rolled up against one of the seats.

“Shepard? What . . .?” Garrus crouched, his hands held out, his face drawn with both fear and concern. “Shepard.” He sighed, his mandibles lowering, flicking heavy and slow. “Is it the same as when the orb attacked you?” He shuffled one foot toward her, earning another scream that hit him like a rifle shot, throwing him back.

“Shepard . . .” She swallowed hard, the tears raining all the faster for the pain she saw in his eyes. “I just . . . please, don’t touch me.” Snatching her helmet off the floor, she wrestled it over her head and clicked the seal. “I need . . . I just need room to breathe. I can’t breathe.” She flung open the side hatch and swung out, hitting the snow-covered ground running.

“Shepard?” Less than a minute later, she heard footsteps crunching in the snow behind her. “Come back to the Mako. We have maybe three minutes out here before we freeze.”

Shepard ran, trying to put some road between herself and the long-neglected grifter pouring snake oil into her blood. Instead, another beckoned to her with an icy finger as it opened its wares. ‘Falling asleep and dying peacefully’ lay in the case next to ‘Never having to remember’. Shaking hands reached out to take the case of icy death. All she had to do was drive Garrus off, or wait for him to give up and return to the Mako to save himself.

_He’ll never do that, Janey. You know he won’t._

Shepard stumbled a little as she ran, her moment of hesitation allowing the dream to catch up, punching straight through her helmet and into her skull. The oily spiders streamed through her, bleeding into her vision, the world burning black at the edges.

_Bunny. Her precious Bunny screaming as the batarian dragged Jane up to his face, sniffing her like a dog. “You stink,” he said and threw her down the slope into the creek. “Scrub that carcass, meat.” The three slavers pelted her with mud and rocks as she washed in the shallow, mucky ice-water._

“Shepard! Stop.” Garrus skirted around her, trying to block her flight without making contact. “I won’t touch you.” He held his hands out as if to show her that he was disarmed. “Just come back in out of the cold before it kills us.” When she didn’t respond, he went against his word, he gripped her shoulders and shook her. “Shepard. Breathe. Come back to me.” Rough hands shook her again, but as the monster closed in, the rest faded into a numb, frozen background.

“Shepard. Come on, _Kahri_, don’t give in to it. Fight!”

The word, the new nickname, like the light it defined, cut through the darkness. The spiders screamed silently, writhing, but in agony rather than with hunger. Garrus’s eyes appeared, sharp and focused in front of her face. Oh! That was where it came from. _Kahri_ should be his nickname, not hers.

“Shepard! Stop.” Garrus skirted around her, trying to block her flight without making contact. “I won’t touch you.” He held his hands out as if to show her that he was disarmed. “Just come back in out of the cold before it kills us.” When she didn’t respond, he went against his word, he gripped her shoulders and shook her. “Shepard. Breathe. Come back to me.” Rough hands shook her again, but as the monster closed in, the rest faded into a numb, frozen background.

“Shepard. Come on, _Kahri_, don’t give in to it. Fight!”

The word, the new nickname, like the light it defined, cut through the darkness. The spiders screamed silently, writhing, but in agony rather than with hunger. Garrus’s eyes appeared, sharp and focused in front of her face. Oh! That was where it came from. _Kahri_ should be his nickname, not hers.

“Shepard! Stop.” Garrus skirted around her, trying to block her flight without making contact. “I won’t touch you.” He held his hands out as if to show her that he was disarmed. “Just come back in out of the cold before it kills us.” When she didn’t respond, he went against his word, he gripped her shoulders and shook her. “Shepard. Breathe. Come back to me.” Rough hands shook her again, but as the monster closed in, the rest faded into a numb, frozen background.

“Shepard. Come on, _Kahri_, don’t give in to it. Fight!”

The word, the new nickname, like the light it defined, cut through the darkness. The spiders screamed silently, writhing, but in agony rather than with hunger. Garrus’s eyes appeared, sharp and focused in front of her face. Oh! That was where it came from. _Kahri_ should be his nickname, not hers.

“Shepard! Stop.” Garrus skirted around her, trying to block her flight without making contact. “I won’t touch you.” He held his hands out as if to show her that he was disarmed. “Just come back in out of the cold before it kills us.” When she didn’t respond, he went against his word, he gripped her shoulders and shook her. “Shepard. Breathe. Come back to me.” Rough hands shook her again, but as the monster closed in, the rest faded into a numb, frozen background.

“Shepard. Come on, _Kahri_, don’t give in to it. Fight!”

The word, the new nickname, like the light it defined, cut through the darkness. The spiders screamed silently, writhing, but in agony rather than with hunger. Garrus’s eyes appeared, sharp and focused in front of her face. Oh! That was where it came from. _Kahri_ should be his nickname, not hers.

“Shepard! Stop.” Garrus skirted around her, trying to block her flight without making contact. “I won’t touch you.” He held his hands out as if to show her that he was disarmed. “Just come back in out of the cold before it kills us.” When she didn’t respond, he went against his word, he gripped her shoulders and shook her. “Shepard. Breathe. Come back to me.” Rough hands shook her again, but as the monster closed in, the rest faded into a numb, frozen background.

“Shepard. Come on, _Kahri_, don’t give in to it. Fight!”

The word, the new nickname, like the light it defined, cut through the darkness. The spiders screamed silently, writhing, but in agony rather than with hunger. Garrus’s eyes appeared, sharp and focused in front of her face. Oh! That was where it came from. _Kahri_ should be his nickname, not hers.

“Shepard! Stop.” Garrus skirted around her, trying to block her flight without making contact. “I won’t touch you.” He held his hands out as if to show her that he was disarmed. “Just come back in out of the cold before it kills us.” When she didn’t respond, he went against his word, he gripped her shoulders and shook her. “Shepard. Breathe. Come back to me.” Rough hands shook her again, but as the monster closed in, the rest faded into a numb, frozen background.

“Shepard. Come on, _Kahri_, don’t give in to it. Fight!”

The word, the new nickname, like the light it defined, cut through the darkness. The spiders screamed silently, writhing, but in agony rather than with hunger. Garrus’s eyes appeared, sharp and focused in front of her face. Oh! That was where it came from. _Kahri_ should be his nickname, not hers.

“Shepard! Stop.” Garrus skirted around her, trying to block her flight without making contact. “I won’t touch you.” He held his hands out as if to show her that he was disarmed. “Just come back in out of the cold before it kills us.” When she didn’t respond, he went against his word, he gripped her shoulders and shook her. “Shepard. Breathe. Come back to me.” Rough hands shook her again, but as the monster closed in, the rest faded into a numb, frozen background.

“Shepard. Come on, _Kahri_, don’t give in to it. Fight!”

The word, the new nickname, like the light it defined, cut through the darkness. The spiders screamed silently, writhing, but in agony rather than with hunger. Garrus’s eyes appeared, sharp and focused in front of her face. Oh! That was where it came from. _Kahri_ should be his nickname, not hers.

“Shepard! Stop.” Garrus skirted around her, trying to block her flight without making contact. “I won’t touch you.” He held his hands out as if to show her that he was disarmed. “Just come back in out of the cold before it kills us.” When she didn’t respond, he went against his word, he gripped her shoulders and shook her. “Shepard. Breathe. Come back to me.” Rough hands shook her again, but as the monster closed in, the rest faded into a numb, frozen background.

“Shepard. Come on, _Kahri_, don’t give in to it. Fight!”

The word, the new nickname, like the light it defined, cut through the darkness. The spiders screamed silently, writhing, but in agony rather than with hunger. Garrus’s eyes appeared, sharp and focused in front of her face. Oh! That was where it came from. _Kahri_ should be his nickname, not hers.

“Shepard! Stop.” Garrus skirted around her, trying to block her flight without making contact. “I won’t touch you.” He held his hands out as if to show her that he was disarmed. “Just come back in out of the cold before it kills us.” When she didn’t respond, he went against his word, he gripped her shoulders and shook her. “Shepard. Breathe. Come back to me.” Rough hands shook her again, but as the monster closed in, the rest faded into a numb, frozen background.

“Shepard. Come on, _Kahri_, don’t give in to it. Fight!”

The word, the new nickname, like the light it defined, cut through the darkness. The spiders screamed silently, writhing, but in agony rather than with hunger. Garrus’s eyes appeared, sharp and focused in front of her face. Oh! That was where it came from. _Kahri_ should be his nickname, not hers.

“Shepard! Stop.” Garrus skirted around her, trying to block her flight without making contact. “I won’t touch you.” He held his hands out as if to show her that he was disarmed. “Just come back in out of the cold before it kills us.” When she didn’t respond, he went against his word, he gripped her shoulders and shook her. “Shepard. Breathe. Come back to me.” Rough hands shook her again, but as the monster closed in, the rest faded into a numb, frozen background.

“Shepard. Come on, _Kahri_, don’t give in to it. Fight!”

The word, the new nickname, like the light it defined, cut through the darkness. The spiders screamed silently, writhing, but in agony rather than with hunger. Garrus’s eyes appeared, sharp and focused in front of her face. Oh! That was where it came from. _Kahri_ should be his nickname, not hers.

“Shepard! Stop.” Garrus skirted around her, trying to block her flight without making contact. “I won’t touch you.” He held his hands out as if to show her that he was disarmed. “Just come back in out of the cold before it kills us.” When she didn’t respond, he went against his word, he gripped her shoulders and shook her. “Shepard. Breathe. Come back to me.” Rough hands shook her again, but as the monster closed in, the rest faded into a numb, frozen background.

“Shepard. Come on, _Kahri_, don’t give in to it. Fight!”

The word, the new nickname, like the light it defined, cut through the darkness. The spiders screamed silently, writhing, but in agony rather than with hunger. Garrus’s eyes appeared, sharp and focused in front of her face. Oh! That was where it came from. _Kahri_ should be his nickname, not hers.
“What happened?” She could hear him shivering under his words. “You woke me up. You were screaming.” He shuddered. “Spirits, Shepard. I’ve never heard anyone scream like that.” He shook his head. “No, don’t . . . forget I asked. Just breathe. Just be here. Here with me.”

Shepard started to speak, but then three sets of brilliant, bouncing lights and the sound of engines cut her off. Beautiful, practical, harsh old reality threw a proverbial bucket of ice water over her, breaking the last of the dream’s hold. A relieved sigh hissed between her lips, a pressure valve opening.

“Captain Shepard? Officer Vakarian?” a familiar voice called over a loudspeaker.

Shepard lifted a hand to shade her eyes and nodded. “Yes.” She heard hatches opening, boots marching in the dry, crunching snow, then shadows appeared, guns held at the ready as they blocked the light from the armoured vehicles.

Thank god for being arrested.

“Sergeant Kaira Sterling,” one said, stepping forward, “and it is my duty to place you both under arrest at this time.”

“Thank the spirits,” Garrus said, mumbling the words under his breath.

“Don’t worry, Sergeant, we have no intention to resist. Take us in.” She took a deep breath, gripping the control Stirling’s arrival offered in slack fingers. She needed to hold it together; she needed to breathe.

Turning back toward the Mako, she asked, “Could someone bring our APC in, please? My guns are in there, and they’ve been with me a very long time. I’d hate to have to trespass again to get them.”

“Young Mako will be impounded and returned to Port Hanshan.” The sergeant strode over and held out a hand to usher Shepard toward the lead M29 Grizzly. “After you, Captain . . . unless you’d prefer to be dragged in wearing cuffs?”

Shepard took a long, tremulous breath and nodded. “Cuffs won’t be required, thank you.”
Shepard stepped up into the ERCS APC and headed straight for the back corner of the troop compartment. She strapped herself into the furthest seat and pulled her knees up to her chest, curling into as tight a ball as she could manage. Garrus tried to sit next to her, but Sgt. Stirling intercepted him, seating him at the front. Whether because the sergeant felt Shepard’s need for space or some other agenda, Stirling kept her people at the front as well, earning no small measure of gratitude.

The sullen, hurt expression on Garrus’s face cut through her, but Shepard let out a long, if a little guilt-riddled, sigh of relief as the lights lowered and the vehicles began to move. She closed her eyes, wrapped her arms around her legs, and rested the brow of her helmet on her knees. Curious and concerned eyes bored into her, attempting to solve her mysteries. For a second, she tried to uncurl, to sit up properly, slipping back behind the mask she wore so well for the sake of appearances.

Bunny screamed, a constant shrill of sounds and garbled words, but through her cocoon of suffering, soullessness, and mud, Jane saw that the slavers hadn’t touched the child.

“Not dead yet, are you? Hm. Tough little bitch.”

A thin powder of misery spilled from Jane’s lips as Remit tossed her over his shoulder as if she posed no greater a burden than a sack of flour... no, a mummified corpse—desiccated, drained, and brittle. The slavers joked and jostled one another as they returned to the street, high off endorphins and depravity. Endless moments of agonized bouncing and jarring later, the batarian let Jane roll down his arm to thump on the ground in a tangled heap.

She struggled to lift her head. Bunny. Where is Bunny?

She opened one, swollen eye in time to see them shove Bunny into a nearby cage.

“Bunny?” Her father’s shout dragged a sob of relief from Jane’s throat. He hadn’t been killed.

Another moan inched out to clip its heels when her mother’s voice rang out a moment later, “Bunny, where’s Jane?”

She closed her mind against the papa and mama bear roars of pain and pounding of fists against steel that followed, her eyelids slamming down like security doors sealing a breach. Cold, unforgiving metal locked around her neck, wrists, and ankles, but she burrowed into the catacombs deep within her mind, hiding there as they staked her out on the ground.

Shepard curled back up, turtling even tighter than before. The memories set off an earthquake that shook apart her foundations, cracking the small island nation of Shepard in half. The accompanying tsunami rolled in heavy behind, the waves growing higher and higher as they neared shore, and all she could do was pray that they didn’t hit until she could safely ride them out in her quarters.

She’d make everything up to Garrus once her shields recovered, and she got her walls rebuilt. She’d managed to function just fine for thirteen years with Mordin hanging from her soul, well . . . most of the time. The cold, black intelligence behind the orb and its oil slick spiders couldn’t be allowed to sabotage that. She could get back to functional. She needed to get back to functional. The alternative . . . she wouldn’t do well in a cage, even one camouflaged under the noble ideas of healing and kindness.

Back in Port Hanshan, Garrus’s grumbles followed her the entire way through their ‘perp walk’ from the garage to the administrator’s office. Shepard left him to it, embracing the solitude of the wide no-man’s-land the sergeant and her people allowed her to erect, extending her personal space by a sanity-saving couple of metres.

Shivering, she struggled to count her steps and center herself. She’d never needed to be a warrior more than she did right then.

Breathe, two, three, four.

Is it possible to die and just never figure it out, Janey? Is that how you keep going? You just deny that you died and keep on shuffling, a zombie hiding among the normals?

Breathe, two, three, four. Her lungs, seized tighter than ancient bellows, pulled in trembling, thin draughts of air. She rolled her shoulders, squaring them, and cracked her neck. Breathe, two, three, four. “Come on, Shepard. Damn it,” she whispered, trying to whip the mewling, spitting kitten at her core to spring out of the dark as a cougar, snarling and ready for the fight. A slow, soft chuckle bubbled once in her throat as she thought of what Kaidan had said about her mixing metaphors.

Sergeant Stirling stopped outside a set of large, glass doors. “Captain Shepard, you need to go in here. Officer Vakarian, you’ll be taken to Urdnot Wrex and Chief Williams.” She held out an arm to guide Shepard through the doors.

“Hold on, Janey,” her father called. “I know you have the strength to get through this.” His voice opened up, its volume beating at the walls of her shelter. “We all do. Everyone pray. Don’t give in to despair. We can outlast—”

“Shepard . . ..” Garrus took her hand, stopping her from walking away. He stared into her eyes, obviously not wanting to leave her. “Are you . . .?”

Her throat tightened, eyes burning a little, but she blinked her reaction back. As much as she appreciated his affection and support, she needed time to shake off the ‘refrigerated chicken meat in armour’ feeling . . . to stand the agony of being trapped in her own skin before anyone else touched her.

“Five by five, C-Sec.” She reached up to press her hand against his cheek. “I’ll see you in a little while.” After a second’s hesitation, she stood on her tiptoes and gave him a quick, soft kiss. “I’m fine,” she whispered before pulling back.

Shepard watched them lead Garrus off, giving him a nod and a wink to quiet his protests, relieved that she didn’t have to deal with his sympathy and curiosity for a while. Some things did nothing to help a new, fragile relationship.
Stirling led her to a large waiting room and nodded toward a solitary figure sitting on a long metal bench. He sat hunched over, looking sore and miserable, his elbows on his knees, hands clasped.

Shepard paused at the threshold.

“We love you, Janey.” Her father let out a mad, hiccupping sob, his voice wavering as he called out a steady litany, tying himself to her with the only rope he had, a guidewire through the utter dark of the second night. His rebellion of pyjama and underwear-clad insurgents wielding rocks and improvised clubs had killed four slavers. Once the slavers quelled the doomed uprising, they punished the ringleader—her father—and the men involved, using Jane as their lash, a weapon that cut deep and left brutal scars no one could see.

Her father’s voice found her down in her mental labyrinth, but it sounded weak and hollow as it settled through the layers of her shattered body, mind, and spirit. “You’re so strong. We’re going to get through this, sweetheart. Just hang on to the sound of my voice. We love you so much, our brave, beautiful girl.”

“Captain Shepard?” The sergeant pushed on her shoulder, just hard enough to pull her back.

Shepard nodded, but didn’t step forward. Closing her eyes, she breathed as deep and quick as she could manage without passing out, supersaturating her blood with oxygen—a short-lived, but natural high.

High. A capsule of pressure exploded inside her gut, a bottle-rocket of need that she packed down as quickly as it detonated.

Molding the unwilling clay of her face, she sculpted a grin that felt like a mask of betrayal. Slapping it in place, she stepped through the door, drawing Nihlus’s attention. "Glory hallelujah. Praise the Enkindlers’ light. I have returned from my time wandering this Enkindler-cursed ocean of snow.”

She studied him for a second, both evaluating his condition and watching for any sign he saw through her act. He looked far too miserable to notice anything short of small bomb going off under his nose. Pain billowed off of him with every breath. “Holy Father of Light, Kryik,” she called, striding a few metres into the room. “You didn’t tell these lucre-soaked heathens that a krogan crushed you like the tiny crustacean-in-hanar’s-tentacles that you are, did you?”

She turned to the sergeant. “Sister Stirling, please enlighten whomever we’re waiting for with the word that Spectre Kryik is still recovering from a near-fatal injury sustained just days ago. If they can’t bless us with their presence immediately, he needs to lie down.”

The sergeant cocked an eyebrow, and her lip curled a little, but she nodded. “I’ll let Ms. Parasini know.”

“Glory be, I knew the light of the Enkindlers dwelt within your heart.” She drew in a few more deep, fast breaths. “I need to call my ship. May I?” Shepard stopped partway across the room and glanced back. When the sergeant gave her the nod, she opened a channel.

“Captain. You all right?” Kaidan’s voice dropped through the center of Shepard, anchoring her, a point of connection with the part of her life that made sense. “We saw Peak 15 go up from orbit. Glad you weren’t still there.”

“Brother Sparky,” she called, wincing a little at the relief that bled into her voice. “I’m fine, glory hallelujah. May I impose upon you to bring that crate? It would also be best if you brought Brother Jenkins along instead of Liara. If security tries to look into the crate, enlighten them that it is Spectre Kryik’s property."

“Yes, ma’am. Alenko, out.”

“What was that about?” Nihlus moved to stand, but she waved him back down.

“Leverage, Brother Wretchedness. Leverage.” She shrugged and shook her head. “You look like complete crap, by the way.” She sat next to him. “Why didn’t you tell them?”

He wrapped an arm around his lower chest as he shrugged and let out a careful chuckle. “Ease up, Shepard. I’m sore, but okay. No harm done.” He looked up at her. “Speaking of crap, you look like you’ve passed through a krogan digestive tract. What happened out there?”

“Gross, Nihlus.” Shepard winced and shook her head. “Nothing happened, at least until we hit the rooms of gooey webs and dead geth everywhere. Then a dying matriarch told me some the scariest shit ever, glory hallelujah. There’s more, but there are too many ears listening and too few of them walk in the light.” Shepard shrugged. “Long story short . . . Saren tried to raise an army of rachni. The rachni all lost their minds, and now Peak 15 is a big, smoking hole. Praise be.”

“Spirits. What was he thinking? Rachni . . .” He shook his head, but then shuddered as if shaking those questions off. “For most people, I’d say that was reason enough to look like a varren ate them then spat them back up, but you . . .? I don’t buy it.” He leaned down, but didn’t enter her space. “Something’s shaken the hell out of you. Talk to me, Shepard.”

She shook her head. “Nothing to report, Brother Nihlus. It’s all good. Glory hallelujah. Let’s just focus on getting the hell out of here. Noveria creeps me out.”

“Nihlus?” A pretty woman with olive skin and dark hair tied back into a severe-looking bun stepped through a door just to their right. She strode over and held out her hand to Shepard. “Captain Shepard?”

Shepard stood and shook the offered hand. “That’s me.” Bending down, she helped Nihlus to his feet, wincing at the pained moan he couldn’t quite hide.

“Gianna Parasini,” the woman said, “Noveria Internal Affairs.” She looked at Nihlus. “Why didn’t you tell me you were badly hurt? I wouldn’t have had you running around getting into gunfights.”

“I’m fine.” He looked down at Shepard, scowling as she activated her omnitool and used it to trigger his armour’s medi-gel dispenser.

Making a show of ignoring him, Shepard forced herself to focus and smiled at the woman. “It’s a pleasure to meet you, but if we could move this along, that would be great. Stubborn ass here needs to get back to our ship’s med bay.”

“Of course, come in.” She led the way into another mostly barren, cement space, gesturing toward a couple of chairs on the near side of the desk. “Please, sit. Can I get you anything?”

Shepard waited for Nihlus to answer, then shook her head. “No, thank you. However, in a few minutes, two gentlemen from my crew will be arriving with a crate. Could they be shown right in? As I said, I’d like to keep this moving.” Shrugging off Nihlus’s protests, she helped him sit before perching on the edge of a chair herself.

“Pray Janey. Pray for the baby Jesus to help you bear your cross,” her mother’s voice cut through the darkness. Jane pulled it down into her warren, wrapping herself in its warmth and solace even though she refused the advice. Praying. What good had praying done any of them?

“Answer me, sweetie, please,” her mother cried, her voice a thicket of sobbing and phlegm. “Let me know you’re still there.”

Gravel crunched under heavy boots, the grinding sound morphing into laughter and then words. “You want to know if she’s still alive, little mother?” The voice vanished back into boot steps that stopped at Jane’s head. The familiar, almost comforting whistle of the whip snapped through the air, the end slicing through the web of partially healed welts and scars. Her mother’s proof of life came in the form of a scream followed by a torrent of gagging and dry heaving, Jane’s tears having long since dried, leaving only her skin to bleed.

Shepard blinked, pressing her eyelids so tight that a wave of dizziness washed her toward shore before tumbling her back out to sea.

Parasini sat, folded her hands on the desk, staring at her. Shepard gave her a quick nod, but even then the woman hesitated a moment longer before speaking. “Your antics have the Executive Board in quite an uproar. They don’t take kindly to Spectres or agents of any government’s military just dropping into their client’s research facilities.”

Nihlus let out a sound that could have been a sigh or a snarl. “A Code White was called, Gianna. I was authorized to investigate and contain the situation.”

“Even with a Code White, you should have checked in with the administrator first. And you didn’t investigate, Nihlus, you dropped Captain Shepard instead. She isn’t a Spectre.” She held up her hands to stop his protest. “They’ve taken into consideration your assistance proving Anoleis’s corruption, but they’re going to fine you, heavily. I’m sorry, Nihlus, but my position doesn’t carry enough weight to throw our friendship around.”

Shepard shook her head. “So far have they been cast from the Enkindlers’ wisdom and light.” After meeting Gianna’s puzzled stare for a moment, Shepard activated her omnitool, bringing up her hard suit recording. She glanced around for a vid terminal, selected the specific time stamps, then sent the files to the screen. “As you can see, Peak 15 seemed deserted when we arrived, but for a couple of geth colossus units left behind to slow down anyone coming into the facility.”

“Geth?” Gianna cursed under her breath. “I heard rumors of geth, but . . . .”

“Saren Arterius also attacked Eden Prime using a splinter faction of geth, but the geth presence is hardly the worst sin Saren has perpetrated on Noveria.” Shepard fast forwarded through the hours of empty rooms and corridors to where they found the dead rachni.

“What the hell is that?” the IA officer muttered under her breath.

“A rachni soldier.” Shepard nodded in answer to the woman’s incredulous expression. “Saren’s agents discovered a rachni egg on a derelict ship. They hatched it to discover that it was a queen.” She let the footage run, skipping all of her talk with Benezia and the queen, except where the matriarch confirmed the information about the rachni.

“We fought our way out through a small army of the soldiers and workers.” Shepard turned to the vid screen as it showed Saren evacuating in the company of his geth squad.

“Good god,” Gianna said, shaking her head. After a moment, she sighed and looked up. “It’s horrific, but the board is only going to care about your trespassing. What clients do in their labs is their business. It’s the reason that the facilities themselves have so many security precautions: the code omega, hot labs, and neutron purge. If a company reports that they’ve lost containment of a project, the Executive Board activating the orbital bombardment is a last resort.”

Shepard chuffed and shook her head, incredulous. “Seriously? Saren misuses company facilities to breed rachni, loses control of those rachni, and in the end, costs an asari matriarch and who knows how many employees their lives, and your response is, ‘What companies do in their labs is their business’?” She caught the warning glare that Nihlus shot at her, but didn’t acknowledge it.

“Ms. Parasini,” Stirling called from the door, “a delivery for Spectre Kryik.”

“It’s expected, thank you, Sergeant.” Parasini stood.

Shepard got up to meet Kaidan and Jenkins halfway across the floor. “Thank you, gentlemen. Head back to the Normandy. We’ll be leaving soon.” She took the crate.

“Aye, ma’am.” Kaidan saluted, turned on his heel and left.

Jenkins stayed. “I’d feel better if you had some backup, ma’am.” He nodded to Nihlus. “Who isn’t wounded. No disrespect intended, Nihlus.”

Shepard gave Jenkins a wink and nodded for him to go ahead out. “I’m fine. We’ll be aboard shortly.” Still, the young man pinned her, his expression one of such absolute empathy that she wondered just how horrendous she looked. Wincing as his stare chipped away at her frayed emotions, breaking down what small amount of control she’d gained, she willed him to move along. “Go, Corporal.” Finally, he snapped a salute and followed Kaidan from the office. A relieved breath rushed from her lungs.

“Where are you taking us? Janey! My daughter . . . I can’t leave her.” Her mother’s protests and sounds of struggle grew more and more faint. “Janey!”

“You aren’t leaving anyone behind, lady. Your little whore stopped breathing over an hour ago.”

“Nooo! No, Janey!” Her mother’s screams rose in volume and frantic denial for a moment, then stopped suddenly.

A terrible landslide of laughter rumbled low and terrible, sweeping away everything Jane had ever known. And the cold, black air kept trickling into her lungs no matter how much she cursed it, no matter how much she wished for it to stop and let her rest.

The room swam back into focus, Noveria’s concrete and wild blizzard replacing the endless darkness of Shepard’s internal catacombs. She let out a long, shaking breath and gathered her scattered wits. How long had she blanked that time? Squaring her shoulders and clenching her teeth, she turned back to face Nihlus and Gianna.

“What’s this?” Parasini asked. A crow straining to see jewels on the other side of a window, the IA officer leaned forward. Only her fingers pressed against the glass kept her from doing a face plant into the desktop.

“A few days back we raided a Blood Pack base. In searching through the base for intel, we found these items. I’m assuming because of their origin that Saren used them to pay the Blood Pack for their services.” Shepard set the crate on the desk and opened the lid.

Parasini gasped and reached in, pulling out a biotic implant. “This is experimental tech. Armali Council has been trying to determine whether Binary Helix was cutting in on their biotic engineering and implant development—usually by not-entirely-legal means.” She dove back into the crate. “Are the schematics in here as well?”

After a few minutes of muttering to herself and consulting with her omnitool, Parasini turned to Shepard, a wide smile brightening her features. “You’ve just saved me three or four months of undercover work and solved three corporate espionage cases, Captain.” She cut a hand toward Shepard’s chair. “Please, sit. You look exhausted.”

Congratulations on fooling absolutely no one.

Shepard folded onto the chair. “The data pad contains the vid logs from the hard suits of the Marines who conducted the search of the Blood Pack base if you need that information as evidence.”

“What is that where you were hurt, Nihlus?” Parasini asked, a smartass smile trying to break through her professional mask. “Krogan battlemasters have always been your weak spot.”

Nihlus shook his head and chuffed a little but didn’t elaborate.

“I’ll take these to the Executive Board. I can’t guarantee anything, but I’m fairly sure between the evidence from Peak 15 and these, we should be able to get you out of here without a king’s ransom worth of fines.” Parasini packed everything back in the crate and stood. “Nihlus, how about I get someone to show you to the infirmary, you can lie down while the Board meets?” When it looked like he intended to argue, the woman laughed. “You don’t have to prove what a stubborn ass you are, Spectre. I already know. Do you really want to sit here for a couple of hours?”

Grumbling, Nihlus nodded. “Very well.” He looked over at Shepard. “You’re going to wait?”

Shepard shook her head. “Ms. Parasini, do I need to stay in this office, or can I wander a little, providing I’m reachable by radio?” She pushed out of her chair, stacking her vertebrae gingerly one on top of the other, squaring and balancing—composing—herself as she straightened, using the movements to shore up the wall holding the memories at bay. A few more minutes of holding back the crazy, and then . . . and then . . .

She clenched her jaw and looked to Parasini. “May my people head back to the Normandy? I’ll make sure they’re available if you need them.”

Parasini thought for a second, then nodded. “They can go back to your ship, as long as I can get ahold of them if the board has questions.” She let out a quick huff of air, her brow furrowing. “Where did you plan on wandering to, Captain Shepard?”

To find your nearest high quality drug dealer and pay a small fortune for chemical amnesia.

Shepard swallowed the need. It began to grow, spreading tentacles of panic through her guts and out into her limbs.

“Hey there, sweet little lady. You look like you could use something to take the edge off.” The young man danced around her a little. “Come on, baby. Let me hook you up. No one so beautiful should look so sad.”

Shepard shook her head, dug her fists down further into her pockets and hunched her shoulders, pushing past him. She needed to get back to the abandoned theater where she’d been squatting in the attic. A quick glance up past the towering skyscrapers confirmed how close dark was. Closing her fingers around her last ten credits, she held tight to the soup and sandwich she’d get the next day from the local soup kitchen. No way was she blowing that for drugs.
“Look baby, I’ll set you up, no charge. Call it a moment of weakness for a pretty face.” The dealer grinned, teasing her a broad wink. “Trust me, baby, it’s a blissful buzz.” He shoved a small packet into her jacket pocket. “This shit will set you free.”

She shoved the jittery-panic-craving back down. No matter how tempting, she couldn’t let herself fall down that rabbit hole again. Not after being clean for so long. Still that buzzing whir in the center of her chest just kept pressing out, making it harder to breathe, harder to think.

“Captain?”

Focus, Janey. For pity’s sake. They’re going to put you in a hugging jacket.

“Sorry, I’m just a little preoccupied, and please, Shepard is fine.” She shivered, then lifted her arm to turn up her suit heater, using it as a welcome focus for her attention. “I need to talk to Urdnot Wrex before we return to the ship, so is there a bar somewhere?”

“Yes, upstairs in the hotel.” Parasini nodded. “As long as you don’t leave the building and stay in radio contact, that should be fine. I’ll radio as soon as I know anything.” She looked down at the crate as she picked it up. “Thank you for this. You could have easily sold these for an insane number of credits.”

“Well, I’ll be an Enkindler’s glowing backside. If I’d known that . . . .” She held out her hands. “Give them back.” Chuckling wearily, she shook her head. “That’s not the way we work, Ms. Parasini.” Her arms dropped back to her sides. “Please do what you can to get us out of here as soon as possible.”

“I’ll do my best.” She hoisted the crate under one arm, balancing it on a hip. “Sergeant Stirling, Sergeant Tillian, could you report to the administrator’s office, please?” She turned off the intercom. “The sergeant will show you to the rest of your crew, Captain.”

“Thank you.” Shepard helped Nihlus out of his chair. He moved as though he’d aged seventy cycles in the few hours since she’d seen him last, but other than a soft grunt or two, he kept his pain under wraps. “Do you want to lean on me to get there?” she whispered, hitting his medi-gel.

“I’m okay, just stiffening up. Once I lay down for a bit, I’ll be fine. Stop fussing, and go do what you need to.” He stretched a little. “Thanks, the medi-gel helps.”

“So does a mallet to the head. The pain is still there for a reason. Take it slow.” Despite his protests, she wrapped his arm around her shoulders, helping him to the door. “Besides, fussing over you helps me, so shut it, Brother Kryik.”

They split up at the elevator, the dour-faced Sergeant leading Shepard off two floors after Nihlus disembarked. They walked down a long, corridor of towering concrete. God, Noveria was ugly.

“Come on, Lucas, you know I’m good for it.” Janey followed the young man down the street, shaking hands buried in the bottoms of her pockets to stop from convulsively picking at her neck. Enough of the drug had worn out of her system that the muscles under her jaw had begun to tick. “It’s been a slow week down at the shop, but we’re supposed to be getting a whole load of shuttles in this week.”

“No way, Jane.” The dealer stopped and nodded toward the street. “Why are you down here begging for a fix. You’ve got options. Hell, I wish I had options like the ones waiting for you.” His brow furrowed, and he shook his head as he met her pleading eyes. “Just, no. I’m not helping you kill yourself slowly any more.” Speeding up, he turned a corner, ducking into a covered garage.
“Oh for fuck’s sake. He came down here, didn’t he?” She ran after him and grabbed his arm, spinning him around. “That’s why, right? Anderson came down here, threw his rank around a bit and left with your balls in his pocket.”

Lucas stopped, turning on her, rigid and furious. “Watch the way you talk to me, gutterpup. Now, back off and go home . . . and not to that dumpster. Go back to Anderson, get cleaned up, and give yourself a fucking shot at life.”

Jane leapt at him, a banshee shriek echoing off the pillars and endless rows of skycars. “Just give me the fucking drugs, asshole. You don’t know anything about me. Fuck.” She began rifling through his pockets, stopping only when she caught the glint of a steel edge between them. Laughing, she backed up a couple of steps. “What? You going to gut me, Lucas? Fucking pussy. You think I haven’t suffered through worse?”

He backed up. “Just go home, Jane.” After a couple of steps, he turned and lifted into a run.

“Fucking hell! Just give me the damned drugs.” A rabid dog snapping free of its chain, Jane ran him down, blows pounding his head and shoulders until she managed to get her arm wrapped around his neck. His hip slammed back into her, and he flipped her over his side, reversing the hold. She saw a glint of the knife just as she threw herself back against him, and he lost his balance. The knife hardly hurt at all as it buried itself in her side, tearing her open from breast to—

Garrus stepped up beside her, his hand brushing her fingers as he pushed past her professional space and into personal just far enough to throw a bulwark up at her back. She leaned into it gratefully and managed a smile as their eyes met. Blinking, she shook her head, clearing it enough to see Ashley and Wrex hurrying over to her as well. Shit, where had she been for the walk from the elevator? If she didn’t get her crazy buttoned up quick, they were going to slap her in running shoes with no laces and lock her in a room with no windows.

Shepard held up a hand to still their questions. “Brother Garrus, Sister Ashley, you can both return to the Normandy. Just be available if Gianna Parasini calls with questions. I doubt she will, though.” She glanced up into Garrus’s eyes, willing him to just do as she’d said and go back to the ship without an argument.

After a moment, he nodded and turned. “Come on, Chief.” Before he walked away, his fingers snagged Shepard’s, his voice lowering to remain between them. “If you need me . . .”

“I’ll call.” Pressing her lips together in a wan smile, she turned to Wrex. “Come on, Wrex, let’s go have a chat.”

“Business?” He grumbled and hitched up his armour as if preparing for battle. “That can’t be good.”
Chapter Summary

Shepard reveals her plans for Wrex . . . and makes a complete idiot of herself. Go Shepard!

Shepard summoned the elevator car, then turned to grin at the krogan. “Come on, Wrex . . . when have I given you cause to doubt me?”

He grumbled and hitched his armour. “Two words, Shepard: thresher maw.”

“That was fun. You should be thanking me for that.” She laughed softly and hit the elevator control to take them to the hotel. When they arrived, she led the battlemaster to the bar, and climbed up onto one of the stools. Smiling at the bartender, she said, “Get my friend here whatever he likes. The tab is mine.”

The asari smiled and nodded. “Sure thing.”

Wrex nodded to Shepard and barked, “Ryncol. Double.”

Shepard leaned against the bar, wincing as the bartender turned, all fluid grace and perfect curves. God, Shepard envied the asari that effortless elegance. A moment later, a fair-sized glass of the krogan alcohol slid down the counter to stop in front of Wrex.

The vapours crawled up into her nostrils, reaching down to set off the firework in her gut. It sent sparks of need flaring along her neurons. Affecting nonchalance, she planted one trembling hand under her nose and clamped the other down on her thigh between armour segments. Digging in her fingers hard enough to bruise, she managed to distract herself. She could hold on long enough to get the hell out of there.

“So, what are we doing here if you aren’t after my tail, Shepard?” Wrex downed the drink in one and passed the glass back without ordering another.

Letting her hand sag back to the bar, Shepard shrugged. “I needed to talk to you about a couple of things before we go back to the ship.” A dry chuckle rattled out onto the polished bar top. “I would have helped you get your family armour back regardless, Wrex, but I’ve done it in the way I have for a reason.”

He nodded. “Figured you were using me. I just haven’t decided what game you’re playing.” He lifted a finger to catch the barkeep’s attention, then nodded for her to give him a refill. “I don’t have any tolerance for being used. The galaxy has used the krogan enough.”

Shepard’s hand drifted up off the granite a few inches. “I’m not looking to use the krogan or you, Wrex. At least not in that sort of sense. I want you to go home at the end of this run in a position of power. You had the dream all those cycles ago . . . a united people, capable of building from strength.”

“And you want to use us for canon fodder when the Reapers roll up . . .” He tilted his head and narrowed his eyes, staring down at her as if he could see straight through to her intentions.
“No, I’m not looking for bullet sponges, either.” A scowl creased her brow, a vague ache setting in behind her eyes. She needed to get some damned sleep, and soon. Sighing, she shook her head. “I would’ve hoped I’d made a better impression on you than that, but I guess it hasn’t been a very long period of time to build trust.”

“The krogan haven’t been given any reason to trust . . . anyone,” he said, his voice low, but hard and edged.

Blowing out a heavy breath, Shepard nodded. “True enough.” She turned a little to face the bar square on and slapped both hands down on the edge. “Okay, here’s what it is.” She lowered her voice to be sure it didn’t travel further than the two of them. “Saren was breeding rachni on Peak 15.”

“That quadless, turian urshk.” Wrex belted back his second glass of ryncol, the glass hitting the counter with a little more force. “At least the antimatter warhead blew them back into extinction.”

Shepard shrugged. “Sort of.” Her hand drifted back up to still his response. “When we arrived, Benezia was still alive. She insisted that we save the queen, saying that the Reapers were afraid of the rachni. That’s the reason Sovereign had Saren trying to enslave them.” The hand lifted higher, her palm facing him, urging him to hear her out as he stiffened. “We spoke with the queen, and she said that the reason Saren’s rachni troops became violent is that they were separated from her.”

“You brought her out of there.” It wasn’t a question, and it landed between them like a boulder as Wrex bristled. His face twisted into a scowl that promised that Shepard edged her way up to a line he wouldn’t let her cross. “Shepard, millions of my ancestors died to put those things down. You let the bugs come back, you’re pissing on their graves.”

She held his stare as she stepped right up to that line. “Either that or giving their sacrifice meaning as their descendents step forward, respected, honorable, and strong.” Nodding, she gave him a moment to ease back. “I understand the risk, Wrex. Trust me, there’s a big part of me that just wanted to be done with it.”

She let out a chortle, brittle with irony. “Believe it or not, Legion was the one who argued for me to give the rachni the same opportunity to prove themselves as I gave the geth.” She looked up, holding his gaze. “The same opportunity that I’ll give the krogan.”

The roar that rumbled deep in his chest drew nervous glances. “To what? Babysit them until they start killing everyone, then throw ourselves into the fire that you started?” Pounding a fist on the bar, he stabbed a finger at his glass, ordering another drink. He looked at the asari, and for a moment Shepard thought he might jump over the bar or slug her, but then he just said, “Throw something strong in front of my . . . her while you’re at it.” Wrex jabbed a finger into Shepard’s shoulder.

“My.” She winced. “And no, I don’t want you to be rachni control. I want you to guide them, Wrex. Develop their technology and weaponry to work for our ships, and even help them build their own, eventually. Train them into an army, integrate them into the war movement.” Without thinking, she grabbed the shot glass from the bar and belted it back, wheezing a little as she swallowed, exhaled, and realized what she’d done. “Dammit.” She waved off the bartender when she moved to refill it. “What was that?”

“Absinthe.” The asari winced and shrugged. “Sorry, you looked like you could use it.”

“Glory hallelujah, if that isn’t a true story . . . but really, I’m good.” Shepard turned toward Wrex. “You’re a natural leader, Wrex.” She held his stare, matching fire for fire, needing him to see not only that she meant what she said, but believed it. “The team followed you when we raided Tonn Actus’s warehouses, and they did so without question, looking to you with respect. I need you leading the krogan when the shit hits the fan. Do you see anyone else doing it?”

He just stared at her for a long time. “You setting everyone up like this, Shepard?”

The alcohol and wormwood slithered their way out of her empty stomach and into her bloodstream, making her belly tingle and her limbs pulse with bliss. It wrapped around the memories, pushing them back far enough that they didn’t play on an endless loop behind her eyes. Furious, the spiders poured out of their hidden corners, gnawing away at the small measure of control she’d managed.

“Your nature will be revealed to us. Accept that,” the darkness rumbled. It’s minions poured past the alcohol’s barrier, oil-slick black and viscous, burrowing through her mind.

The light coming in the door dimmed. Shepard turned onto her side, putting her back to the figure standing there, tall and broad, staring in at her.

“How are you doing, kid?” the deep voice spoke, its timbre comforting. When she’d first heard it nearly a year before on Mindoir, she’d thought it the voice of an angel come to escort her to heaven. Slow, heavy boot steps crossed the floor. “Still not talking, huh?” A chair squealed as her visitor pulled it over to the side of her bed. “That’s okay, I can do the talking.”

Jane sighed long and soft. “Why can’t you just leave me alone, Anderson? Chasing off all my dealers . . . following me around, sticking your nose in where it doesn’t belong.” She hugged her pillow tight against her neck to disguise the tremors. “What’s the point of trying to dry me out all the time. I just go right back out and get high.”

She heard the leather seat complain as he shifted around. “I’m a lost cause, Anderson. Just give the fuck up.” Squeezing her eyes closed against the burn, she managed to forestall the sour tears. Crying didn’t solve anything.

“I don’t believe that, kid. I’ll never believe that.” A strong, gentle hand gripped her shoulder.
“You’ve survived more than most seasoned veterans I know. You should have died at least three times since I’ve met you, and yet . . . here you are. Hasn’t it occurred to you that there’s a reason?
That knife nearly gutted you, and yet . . . you’re still alive. You have another chance.”

Jane grunted. “You aren’t going to hit me with all the ‘glory hallelujah, praise Jesus’, crap, are you? The damned chaplain here won’t shut up about God’s plans.” She rolled over, meeting the reflection of his eyes in the darkened room.

“He laughed, but it came out dry and bitter. “You know me better than that, but I do think you’re still here for a reason. The universe thinks you’re important. Maybe you should spend some time figuring out why instead of letting everyone who has ever given a crap about you down.”

Pain, white hot and ferocious dragged Jane off the side of her bed and onto the floor, her knees snapping against the floor as she crumpled, hugging herself. She clenched her teeth and squeezed her eyes shut, willing away the memories. “Don’t act like you know anything about me, or why I do what I do.”

Anderson stood and walked around the bed, crouching in front of her. “I don’t think I know anything, but that you survived, Jane Shepard. You survived. Do you think your father would be proud of this? Do you think this is why he fought so hard?” He reached out and laid a hand on her shoulder, but she swatted it away.

“You don’t know anything.” Throwing herself back, she scrambled to her feet.

He stood, easing back and crossed his arms. “I know what I’d want if I were your father. I wouldn’t want you to turn my memory into a nightmare that haunts you until you self-destruct. I’d want you to hold onto whatever joy you could find and live a life that turns the galaxy on its ear.”

“Shepard?” Wrex ducked down a little to look into her eyes. “You okay? You look like you headbutted someone ten times your size.”

His ryncol breath whispered to her as it drove the spiders back. “Go ahead,” it coaxed, “give yourself some time to get yourself together, let the pain fade. You’ve been through hell today, Shepard. Let yourself rest.” Damned chatty ryncol.

Is it worth it to stop the spiders for a few minutes, Janey? You know where this road goes, and you’ve been off it a long time.

“Shut up, Bunny. Just for five fucking seconds, shut up,” she muttered. Turning to the bartender, she nodded. “I’ve changed my mind. Refill that, please.” When the bartender placed the shot on the bar, Shepard stared at the glass for a long time, admiring the way the light played in the green liquid. After another moment of debate, she snatched it up and tossed it back, then looked up. “Another, thanks.”

Turning back to Wrex, Shepard lifted an eyebrow. “The queen will be on the Normandy for the next few days . . . at least until we can find her a home. Will you communicate with her? Watch her . . . do whatever you need to do, but decide if you’re willing to step up and be the leader who helps the krogan not only save the galaxy, but themselves.” She drank her third. The shot glass wobbled back and forth a little when she thumped it onto the bar. “Tomorrow, providing we get the hell out of here, we hit Tonn Actus’s last base. I’ve got something a little special planned, so be ready to lead your krant, battlemaster.”

Wrex drank his latest ryncol a lot more slowly than before. “Are you serious about helping the krogan, Shepard?”

She wave for another shot, then turned to him and nodded. “As a heart attack. Well, it’s more about helping put you in a position to get the krogan helping themselves.” She sipped her drink. Enough alcohol flowed through her blood to drive the spiders away completely, leaving her mind blessedly silent.

Letting out a sigh of 144-proof relief, she glanced around the bar, able to actually focus on something outside her head, and caught Wrex staring at her through narrowed, considering eyes. “What?”

He harrumphed and cleared his throat. “Trying to decide if you’re for real, Shepard. No one just offers to help the krogan.”

“Maybe, but I’ve gotten a lot of second chances in my life. I’m a big believer in them. You play this right, when the Reapers are gone, the krogan could be set to take their place, shoulder to shoulder with the rest of the races. An embassy, colony rights . . . the whole package.” She shrugged and finished off her drink. “You just have to decide if all of that is worth swallowing some pride, setting aside some mistrust, and doing the work.”
He laughed, slow and harsh. “Starting with the rachni.” A wicked looking grin showed his teeth, and for a moment she doubted that it was a grin at all, despite the rumbling chuckle that accompanied it. “Think the queen can fight, Shepard?”

She held up a finger, ending up watching it, fascinated as it swayed back and forth. She hadn’t had that much to drink.

It’s been twelve years since you put anything stronger than soda in your system, Janey. And now absinthe? It should be hitting you like a psychedelic frigate in three . . . two . . . .

“No getting the queen killed unless she volunteers for it, Wrex.” Shepard belted down the latest shot, slamming the glass down on the bar. Looking around, she tilted her head, her face scrunching into a scowl. “This music sucks. Tell me that you’ll go along with my evil plan so that we can get out of here.”

Wrex cleared his throat. “Okay, Shepard. I’ll give your plan a shot. Hell, you’ve done more for the krogan already than anyone ever has.” He nodded toward the exit. “Come on, next time we go drinking somewhere with decent music.”

One.

Shepard pressed her eyes closed, grumbling deep in her throat. “Shut up, Bunny. Please just shut up for five seconds.” After taking a couple of breaths, she turned back to Wrex, studying him for long moments, her scowl deepening as she did. Why couldn’t he just stand still? And why were there two of him all of the sudden? “Family. It’s a bitch. Am I right?” she asked at last, deciding that she was okay with two, swaying krogan. She slapped him in the arm hard enough to make him wince. “Sure, Shepard.” Wrex looked at her empty glass. “How many of those have you thrown back in the last twenty minutes?”

She answered by blowing a dismissive raspberry that sprayed a mist of spit into the air. “Yeah, you know all about family. Your father forced you to kill him.” Wobbling, she managed to get one buttcheek back on the seat. “I didn’t have to kill mine with a dagger, you know?” She slapped her hand down on the bar top. “I killed him just the same, though. He died a little more every time the slavers sliced me open with their damned whip, every time another one of his friends . . . .” Standing suddenly, she dumped her stool over behind her.

“Hey!” a patron barked. The stool fell into him and he jumped, sloshing his drink down his front. “Watch what you’re doing, damned drunk.”

Shepard turned to the man, all her peace and control shattering. Tears ran down her cheeks as she reached behind her for a napkin and tried to mop him off. “Oh, sweet baby Jesus, mister, I’m so sorry.” She patted his shoulder hard enough to make him wince. “Do you have kids?”

The man glanced at Wrex, then backed away, his hands held up to ward her off. “Sure, lady. Yeah, I have kids. Um . . . don’t worry about it.” He turned and bolted.

Wrex let out a hearty laugh. “Humans. So skittish. Well, except you; you’re all right, Shepard. Crazier than a pyjak snorting exhaust fumes, but all right.” He called after the fleeing patron, “Coward! My tiny friend won’t hurt you. She’s just swallowed her own weight in . . . .” Wrex lifted Shepard’s glass and sniffed it. “. . . whatever this green stuff is.” He clapped Shepard on the back. “Let’s go, Shepard. Enough fun for one night. Remind me to take you drinking on Tuchanka sometime. The party doesn’t get good until everyone is wearing a few drinks . . . and some blood.”
Shepard let him herd her toward the door, his words floating past her, registered but not really heard. Instead, Anderson’s voice whispered to her from the past.

“I wouldn’t want you to turn my memory into a nightmare that haunts you until you self-destruct. I’d want you to hold onto whatever joy you could find and live a life that turns the galaxy on its ear.”

“Oh, sweet . . . oh my god.” Spinning suddenly, Shepard slapped a hand against her mouth, her stomach heaving. She yanked free of Wrex’s grip and bolted for the sign in the corner of the room, the neon beacon for the ladies room. She slapped the door control, falling through to land face down on the cold floor. Instead of getting up, she pressed her cheek to the tile, letting the chill seep into her head and freeze her thoughts.

The alcohol burned like defeat, cooling to shame as her stomach eased its rolling. “I’m sorry, Daddy,” she whispered. “I know you want me to do better.” She nodded to herself. “It’s been . . . well, a long time since I let shit throw me off the rails like this. Don’t worry, I’ll get it under control.”

She had no idea how long she lay there before the sound of the door opening registered through the Mardi Gras parade of drunken hallucinations and regret.

“Shepard?” Nihlus stepped around her.

Her head lifted, maybe on its own, and wobbled loosely at the end of her neck. “Nihlus? What . . . ?” The rest of the question evaporated before making it as far as her tongue.

Groaning, he slid down the wall to sit next to her. “What’s going on, Shepard?”

“Blindsided by . . . me. Nothing that doesn’t um . . . happen on a reg . . . regular bas . . . alot.” She groaned and covered her mouth as her throat spasmed a couple of times. “In this case, four . . . five . . . some . . . several shots of . . . um green.”

He chuckled and shook his head, his mandibles fluttering slowly. It was an affectionate smile, she realized. Damned turians and their damned faces. Stupid, spikey, plated faces. She blinked a couple of times and narrowed her eyes as she stared at him. Beautiful though.

“The green liquor is what has you lying face down on the floor of the ladies’ head, but seeing you earlier, I’m thinking it’s more a symptom than a cause. What happened today, Shepard?”

He grunted softly as he leaned down to look into her eyes. His were such a remarkable green. “You’ve been glazed over and shocky since you got back from Peak 15.”

“Old ghosts.” She rolled onto her side and rested her head on her arm. “On the Citadel, this thing . . . crawled into my brain . . . took me over. Spiders. So horrible. So dark. So cold.” She shrugged. “Garrus killed the orb thing, but . . .” She widened her eyes, adding a firm nod to emphasize her point. She had a point. What was . . . ? Oh . . . She lowered her voice to a slurry whisper, “They’re still inside my brain.”

One of his brow plates raised a little higher with each of her words. “So, the orb put spiders in your brain?” He blinked a couple of times. “And they’re still there?”

“Yup.” She nodded, letting her eyes drift closed. “Made me remember Mindoir. The slavers stayed on Mindoir twenty-seven hours before the Alliance chased them off.”

“Ah.” He reached up and rubbed his neck just behind his jaw. Nodding, he dropped his hand back to hang off the sharp angle of his knee. “The old ghosts can have a lot of power.”
Shepard studied his long talons, dangling there, covered in their publicly acceptable gloves. After a moment, she reached out to grip them. “You have old ghosts, Nihlus?”

His mandibles did that slow flutter again. “A few. I wasn’t always a Spectre. I wasn’t always strong and stubborn and determined. Saren changed that. He saw something under the cycles of trying to slide along under anyone’s notice.” Bobbing his head, he shrugged. “He dragged me out of a mine shaft, along with a small group of others. After a moment, he passed his side arm to me, told me to protect the group, get them up out of the mine.”

Pushing herself up onto an unsteady elbow, Shepard rested her head in her hand. “You worked in a mine?”

Responding only with a tiny nod, Nihlus took a breath. “Up until that day, I’d spent a long time waiting to die. The conditions there were horrific, but the workers were mostly slaves, so the owners didn’t care. It was cheaper to buy new workers than improve the mine.” Smiling, pronounced and definite this time, Nihlus shrugged. “Then this strong, angry, storm of a torin roared into the mine. He grabbed me by the cowl and yelled at me, threatened me, told me to accept that the galaxy had just demanded that I answer a higher calling.”

“Saren.” For a moment, Shepard allowed a question to form. If most of the miners were slaves . . .

“Our ghosts demand that we answer when the universe calls, Shepard, and that’s all they demand. They don’t want your blood, or your guilt, or your tears. They want you to face the future holding onto hope and peace . . . and allowing for the possibility that when you are called, you will face the challenge with all those ghosts at your back, carrying you forward.”

“Did Saren tell you that?” she asked, pushing herself up.

Nihlus laughed. “Yes, but his version was a lot more colourful, and pointed. It also left several bruises.”

Shepard wobbled up to kneel next to him, her palms pressed to the cold tile. “Anderson told me just about the exact same thing when I was seventeen.”

She stared into his eyes for a moment before her gaze wandered off to follow the sweeping white markings on his face. “You know,” she said, almost tipping over as she leaned in, “if you hadn’t called me a wh . . . a whore that day in the . . . um . . . gymna . . .” A half hiccough-half retch interrupted. Frowning, she leaned toward the toilet. When the threat died before it escalated to actual throwing up, she swung back to Nihlus, her cheek impacting his. “Oops.” She reached up and patted his face. “Sorry about that. What was I saying?”

He chuckled, then sighed, meeting and holding her unsteady stare. “You were saying that if I hadn’t called you a whore that day in the gym . . .”

She smiled and leaned in, her head sagging until her brow touched his temple. “Oh yeah. Right. I would’ve kissed you.” Her hand lifted to the cowl of his armour, steadying her. “You’re beautiful.”

His hand cupped her cheek. “I wanted to kiss you too.” Shifting, he moved to stand. “Come on, Gianna called. We’re cleared to leave. The Board considered our fines paid with that tech you returned. Let’s get . . .”

Shepard pulled him back down, the aching, pounding terror beating its way out through her breast bone. “What about now?” She pressed her lips against his mouth, shutting down everything else. He smelled so good, and . . . he felt so warm, so solid in the face of the stormy sea rolling around in her head. She arched into him with an almost vicious desperation, the alcohol turning her caresses into clumsy pawing.

“What about Garrus, Shepard?” he asked without pulling back, his voice scarcely loud enough for her to hear over the roaring inside her head. He reached up to brush her cheek, a doomed sigh—a painting splashed with turpentine—dripped thickly between them so long that she thought she’d choke on it.

The tar-slick mass oozed along her brain’s pathways until it found what it wanted. “Nihlus sees the truth of who and what you are.”

Nihlus laughed and leaped forward, slipping past her defenses. “You just can’t help but throw yourself at anything male, can you?” He flipped her onto her ass and bounced away.

Lying there, she gasped for a second, then rolled to her feet. Her jaw tightened, molars squeaking together, but she forced a smile. “I could help myself, anytime, anywhere, but I’m choosy.” She took her stance, hands held in front of her face, and beckoned. “You quitting?”

“Choosy is not the word I’d use.” He dropped his hands and backed away from her again, his expression one of contempt and . . . something that made her stomach roll. “Does your behaviour have its roots in your colourful past? Drug addicts frequently need to pay for their habits in less savoury ways.”

Shepard jerked away, anger swarming in to gobble down the panic and the need, leaving a raw, desolate carcass behind. “What’s the matter, Nihlus? Now you know all this real shit about me . . . I’m . . . still some whore?” She took a swing at him, her fingers slapping the keel of his armour ineffectually, but her momentum tipped her onto her ass. The rage boiled, bubbling over in the corners of her eyes.

“Shepard.” Nihlus turned to face her. “I thought I loved you when we met, but . . .” He shook his head, a faint register of movement at the upper edge of her vision. “But I didn’t.”

The darkness and cold swelled, the thunder of its voice crashing against the inside of her skull. The spiders skittered, searching out an even greater fear. “You cannot hide what you are. If Nihlus sees it, you know Garrus will as well and loathe you for it.”

She sucked in a breath, cursing as it hitched in a whining sob. Scrambling, she tried to get to her feet, to escape before he said anything else. “I get it. I’m repugnant.” Swatting at him again, she missed and fell, her wrist letting out a sharp, frozen-wood crack as she landed on it. “Ow, fuck.” She flopped her hand back and forth, testing it, shoving his hands away. “Screw off with your good enough to be my protege, but kissing you makes me want to yack.” Flailing and cursing, she floundered her way up onto her knees.

Nihlus grabbed both her hands and wrestled her back down. “Ow, spirits, Shepard, stop fighting me. I’m not letting you leave until you’ve heard me out, but at this rate, I’m going to have to be medevac’d from the ladies’ head.”

His subvocals came out like someone hitting a wire then pulling it tight, the harsh frequency shift translating his pain even more clearly than his words. She flopped down onto the floor again, her entire body heaving as she sighed. “Fine, bludgeon me some more.”

He chuckled, the sound almost setting her off again before he cupped her jaw in his hands and forced her to look into his eyes. “I said that I thought I loved you then, but it wasn’t love, Shepard.”

She snorted, a harsh, throaty sound that ended in a sloppy raspberry. “Thanks, got that part, but you know, go ahead, stick the knife in a little deeper. Give it a good twist while you’re at it.”

His hands shook her hard, twice, the mini throttling cutting her off. “Shut up, Shepard. Spirits, you’re a terrible drunk.” Shaking her again but more gently, he drew her eyes back to his. “What I felt then was infatuation. After these weeks of learning more about you, of seeing how deeply you care about everything and everyone . . . how passionate you are under all the ‘Glory hallelujah’, ‘sweet baby Jesus’ crap . . .” He bobbed his head in a tiny shrug. “Now . . . I love you so hard that it hurts far worse than anything five stomping krogan could inflict.”

Another slow, sloughing-paint sigh escaped. “I would give anything to be the one to spend tonight holding you, but there is a better torin waiting on the Normandy. Right now, he’s wondering where his new girlfriend is, and is worried as hell that she’s suffering like . . . well, like she is.”

The tears started again, but not scalding. She laid her hands just inside the cowl of his armour. Dear lord, she was so fucking stupid sometimes. “Nihlus, I . . . I’ve been avoiding you. How can you know . . .” She sighed and shook her head. “. . . anything about me?”

“You’ve been avoiding me, but I haven’t been avoiding you.” He touched her cheek, drying her tears. “What’s that expression? You wear your heart on your arm?”

“Sleeve.” An underdeveloped, famished laugh escaped then collapsed, but it was enough to drive back the blackness, sending the spiders wriggling back out of sight. “The expression is ‘wear your heart on your sleeve’.”

He nodded, then his mandibles and brow plates dropped. He opened his mouth, but didn’t speak for a few seconds. When he did, he pressed his hand to her cheek, his thumb caressing along her cheekbone. “One day, I hope you ask me to kiss you because you want me, not because you’ve had a horrifying day and you’re terrified of what you feel for someone else.” He chuckled, but it came out soft and sad. “Sober would be nice too. Maybe a little less washroom floor on your face.” He stood and held out a hand. “Come on, let’s get back to the Normandy.”

Shepard took his hand and let him lever her up off the floor. She stared at him for a moment, then wrapped her arms around his waist and hugged him gently. “I’m sorry, Nihlus. You’re right, I’m an asshole when I drink. I . . . You . . .”

He chuckled and pulled away, slipping an arm around her waist to help steady her. “We’re good, Shepard. We’re good.”
Chapter Summary

The aftermath of the day.

Chapter Notes

We’re just about caught up to FFN, so in the next week posting will slow down to match my writing speed. I do need to get the full arc of this story done by Aug 3rd, so it won’t be too torturous. :)

Garrus met them at the Normandy’s inner hatch. He took one look at Shepard, then sighed and shook his head. “You’re not looking so good. Are you all right?” One hand lifted halfway to her face before he stopped and glanced around as if remembering the eyes that watched them from everywhere. It dropped back to his side. “Maybe we should get you to Dr. Chakwas.”

Shepard stared at him for a moment, life . . . nice, sane, all-systems-normal life, reasserting itself through the fog of the absinthe. Guilt wormed its way to the surface along with the scent and feel of Nihlus pressed against her lips. Pushing it aside with a promise to come clean with Garrus as soon as they could manage some alone time, she forced herself to focus.

What had he said? Right . . . needed to see Dr. Chakwas. “You speak the truth, Brother C-Sec.” She stepped up, meaning to lean through the cockpit access and speak to Joker. However, the door moved at the last second, and she face planted into the bulkhead. “Ow.” Shoving herself away, she managed to line up on the second try. “Joker, have we heard from Legion?”

Garrus pulled her back square on her feet, holding her there with a hand on her shoulder as he replied for the pilot, “He sent his coordinates. They’re ready for pick up.”

“He’s on a straight shot from the docks on our flight path, and he’s on the other side of the mountain, so we shouldn’t get shot out of the sky,” Joker added. “But don’t count on us ever being invited back.”

“I don’t intend to come back if I can help it.” She frowned at Garrus, reaching up to poke at his familia notas as they danced over his face. “Have they always done that?” She giggled and tipped forward, his hand and a quick grab at the keel of his armour catching her just before she fell past him and into the wall. “You’re beautiful.”

“Wow,” Joker called from behind her, “someone’s hammered.”

“You also speak the truth, Brother Joker,” Shepard replied. “I need food.” Feeling a presence at her back, Shepard turned, stumbling a little as it tipped her balance. Once again, Garrus caught her and helped her turn around. “Nihlus . . .” She reached out and took his hand. “Thank you for scraping me off the floor and bringing me back.”
The Spectre nodded. “You’re welcome. Get some rest when you can. We’ll meet in the morning to get on the same page?”

“Sure.” She glanced over at Joker. “What’s our ETA for Tuntau, Joker?”

“1100 hrs.”

“We’ll meet at 0800?” she asked Nihlus. “Oh wait . . . Liara. I need to tell her what happened. Do you . . . ahhh . . . want to be there?”

Nihlus nodded. “I’ll go down and prepare the ship for our new guest. When you’re ready to speak with Liara, give me a call.” He set out ahead of them, striding with purpose until he reached Pressly. He spoke to the XO for a moment, then continued on.

Garrus settled Shepard back on her own two feet. “Come on, Shepard, let’s go get you sorted.” He twisted to look back over his shoulder. “As soon as we get clearance to leave from Port Hanshan control, head for those coordinates, Joker.”

“Guess I missed the memo where you joined the chain of command,” the pilot replied, a layer of real anger sliding underneath the snarky humour.

“I’m the chain of command,” Shepard said, her voice lowering, “and I say, stop being an ass, and take us to pick up Legion.” She pulled away from Garrus, balancing herself with fingertips pressed to the bulkhead.

“Yes, ma’am, Captain Crazy, ma’am,” Joker grumbled behind her.

Shepard let the comment go and took a stumbling step down the CIC. “Whoa, we need to adjust the inertial dampeners.”

“We’re not moving.” Garrus wrapped an arm around her. “Come on, I’ll help you navigate the very tricky, flat deck plating.”

Leaning into his side, Shepard concentrated on placing one foot in front of the other, managing to make it to the stairs without falling over. Once they reached the stairs, however, and the door closed behind them, Garrus lifted her off her feet, carrying her down.

“Hey, what are . . .?” The curving walls swooped around her, taking her stomach along for the ride, but before she could finish the sentence, he set her back on her feet at the bottom. “I’m not feeling so good,” she whispered, clapping her hand over her mouth.

“How much did you drink?” he asked, tucking her in tight against his side.

She hiccuped again. “Not that much, but I’m a com . . . complete lightweight, and that stuff was strong.” Pulling away a little, she put a not professional, but at least not intimate distance between them. Drunk or not, the crew gossiped enough without adding to it. Blessedly, it was mid-shift and the galley stood empty.

Shepard frowned, scrunching up her face as her stomach flopped in a fairly insistent roll. Pressing her hand over her mouth, she took long, slow deep breaths.

“You’re going to vomit, aren’t you?” Garrus scooped her up and burst into the med bay. “Dr. Chakwas, we need a . . .”

“What on earth?” The doctor snatched a bag from a shelf, snapped it open and shoved it under Shepard’s chin just in time.

Shepard vaguely heard the doc talking outside her bubble of heaving misery, but it slurried into a buzz of sound as her body forcibly evicted the alcohol remaining in her stomach. Only after she passed through the dry heaving stage and into knee-shaking weariness did she notice the doctor’s omnitool scanning her.

She held out the bag. “Could I get something to wipe my mouth, please?”

“What happened today, Captain?” the doctor asked and passed her a handful of wipes. “Hop up on a bed and lay down. It looks like the alcohol is the least of your problems.”

Shepard lifted one leg and rolled onto the bed, laying mostly face down. “What do you mean, Doc?”

“Your neural scans are a mess. You’re showing signs of damage throughout your limbic system. I need you to tell me everything that happened today.” She pressed a syringe to the vein in Shepard’s neck. “This will alleviate the symptoms of your drinking. We’ll have to treat you for a couple of days, but like I said you have bigger issues.”

Shepard’s pulse throbbed three beats under the syringe, then the pressure lifted. Her entire body prickled, her armour and clothing uncomfortable against her skin. After a couple of seconds, the tossed on a stormy sea sensation began to ease, replaced by blades of obsidian pain stabbing and twisting into her brain.

“Damn it, Doc, the booze was the only thing holding the spiders at bay.” She pressed her hands to her temples. “Now they’ve all got knives and assault rifles.” The orange light of the doctor’s omnitool pierced even through her closed eyelids, sending her into hiding behind both arms.

“She complained of a headache and acted like she thought she was being watched while we were on Peak 15,” Garrus offered. He stood next to the bed, his hand on the mattress so that Shepard could feel his talons just brushing the back of her head. “But it didn’t get bad until she fell asleep in the Mako.”

Shepard shuddered but kept her eyes squeezed shut just in case her eyeballs exploded out of their sockets, the danger seeming both imminent and plausible. What had Chakwas asked? Oh right . . . what happened that day. She was pretty sure she’d heard Garrus mention falling asleep in the Mako. “Terrible dream . . . no . . . memory. I heard the voice again. It said that I would reveal who I was. Then the shiny, tar-spiders started crawling through my brain. They kept pulling out memories.”

She wriggled around until she flopped over onto her back. After another second, she returned to her side. “Sweet baby Jesus, there’s nowhere that doesn’t hurt. Tell me how to lie down so it doesn’t hurt.”

“You heard the voice again?” The doctor held the omnitool over Shepard’s head, entering information. “What do you mean you heard it again?”

“On the . . . um . . . Citadel . . .” Shepard winced at the remembered agony, even thinking about it causing a new spike to drive into her skull. “Blackness. Cold. Something invaded me.”

“We were in the Presidium Markets. Shepard stumbled a couple of times, then just grabbed her head and fell onto her knees,” Garrus spoke up. “When she got up, she wasn’t Shepard. Martin, a kid who was with us, saw a dark energy . . . broadcasting through a wall into her head. The origin of the energy was a black orb about this big.” His hand disappeared for a moment, but then returned, his talons stroking through her hair. “Shepard followed us, but she moved like a . . . one of those dolls with strings tied to their hands and feet. When she spoke, it wasn’t her voice. I shot the thing, it blew up, and she came back . . . shaken up but herself.”

The doctor grumbled under her breath and shook her head. “Why wasn’t I told about this when it happened?” She entered information into her omnitool then held it above Shepard’s head.

Shepard just moaned. Explaining would take too much effort, when the truth of the matter lay in the fact that she had so many other things to worry about. Once Anderson took the orb away, she assumed it would cease to be an issue. Apparently, she’d been wrong.

“Peak 15 was cleared out without any sign of violence against the workers,” Garrus said. “They were just gone. Do you think there were more of those orbs through the facility?”

Shepard uncovered one eye to look up at him. “So they were all indoctrinated, and Saren just marched them out?” A faint nod sent a bolt of pain galloping through her skull. “That actually makes sense.”

“Where is the orb now?” Chakwas asked, her voice diamond hard.

“Anderson is having it studied,” Garrus answered.

“Go, contact him and tell him to send me everything he has on it,” the doctor ordered. When Garrus hesitated, Shepard felt Chakwas push in against the side of the table. “Now, if you please, Officer Vakarian.”

“I’ll be back in a few minutes,” Garrus said, squeezing Shepard’s shoulder.

“I’m not going anywhere,” she said, affecting a confidence that betrayed her the moment his reassuring presence moved away from her back. She rolled over, her hand reaching out for him but finding only empty space. Her mouth opened, her lungs drawing the air to call him back, but then strong fingers closed on her reaching ones, and she felt Dr. Chakwas lean down.

“Shepard, open your eyes for a moment, and look at me.”

After a moment, Shepard obeyed the order and uncovered her face, wincing in the face of the light drilling into her brain. “What’s going on, Doc?”

The doctor shone a light into the captain’s eyes, flicking it back and forth to test pupil reaction time that Shepard decided must be non-existent based on the drill that continued to burrow through to her optic nerves. Chakwas sighed. “You remember how I said that Han’Gerrel’s brain was badly damaged?”

Shepard closed her eyes, her bad news alarm flushing her veins with ice water. “You said he had about a year to live.” The doctor hesitated long enough that Shepard opened her eyes and leaned up to meet Chakwas’s stare. “Doc? You’re freaking me out here.”

Hard, strong fingers clamped down on Shepard’s shoulder, startling her with their grip. “Good, Shepard, because whomever is behind this is using the psychic equivalent of a crowbar to get at your long term memories. It doesn’t look like they’re trying to indoctrinate you yet, but they’re certainly making a mess.”

Shepard reached out, locking wrists with the doctor to pull herself up, the news breaking through the pain. “They’re afraid of me; that much I got from their attacks. They’re looking for weak spots.” She frowned, her brows knitting, a bolt of pain and nausea striking between her eyes and sending electric fingers sizzling along her nerves into her sinuses. One hand pressed to her mouth, she held the other out, snapping her fingers until Dr. Chakwas thrust a sick bag into her hand. Dry heaving until her stomach muscles tied themselves into knots, she weaved, rocking unsteadily as her entire body begged to lie back down.

Once the abdominal charlie horses eased, Shepard decided that she could remain sitting up. “They’re trying to decide whether I’m of sufficient use to indoctrinate, aren’t they?” she asked, her voice coming out in a hoarse, acid-torched whisper. A parched chuckle limped along on its heels. “Either way, I’m screwed unless we find a way to prevent or treat their indoctrination.”

The doctor nodded, then spun toward her computer as it beeped. She hurried over, opening it up. “Good, Anderson has had a team tearing that thing apart. Not much to go on, though. Perhaps if we find an intact one . . .” She opened her omnitool. “I’ll send them your scans. The data might be useful in their research.”

Shepard stiffened, “Um, Doc . . . do me a favour. Send them without naming me. I don’t need the galaxy, especially the council, thinking that my brain is falling apart.” She glanced back toward the door. Damn, if Chakwas had already received Anderson’s information that placed Garrus moments from returning. “And, no one on the Normandy knows, Doc. I’ll tell who I need to, when and if I need to. We keep this between us.”

The doctor’s face worked as she thought the request through. “Very well, Shepard, but I need to be able to tell Dr. Solus. He and I have been working with the scans and tests from the Feros colonists, Shiala, and Han’Gerrel. We’ve come up with a cocktail aimed toward stimulating the brain to produce more of the missing neurotransmitters as well as filling the gaps in the meantime.” She moved to a refrigeration unit and began preparing a syringe. “That salarian’s mind works faster than a supercomputer. I’m sure he’ll have ideas for treating you.” After another breath, the doctor turned to face Shepard, her expression almost . . . maternal. “And you need to tell Anderson. He doesn’t deserve to be blindsided if we can’t repair this.”

Garrus walked in the door. He pressed a hand against Shepard’s hip where the doctor wouldn’t be able to see. “You feeling better?” he asked, his voice full of both worry and hope.

“She will be in a moment.” Dr. Chakwas administered the injection. “Just relax here for a few minutes. Let me know if the pain eases.” She returned to her computer. “Have you noticed emotional shifts, unusual smells?”

Shepard leaned back into Garrus’s arm a little. “I don’t recall any smells. I keep flipping back and forth between fear and anger, but considering the memories, they were both relevant. It got better once we got back to Port Hanshan.” Raking her fingers through her hair, she took a breath, the pain in her head backing off a little. “I started remembering things that weren’t as terrible. Anderson talking to me about moving on and doing my folks proud. Things like that.”

“What memories did they pull forward?” Chakwas asked, looking up and holding Shepard in a frank stare that warned her without words to come clean and be honest.

She needn’t have bothered. Shepard knew her life depended on it. A long, soft sigh accompanied a glance behind her at Garrus. The universe seemed determined to strip her naked in front of him no matter how hard she tried.

“Mindoir,” she replied, her voice soft. “My dad sending me out into the forest, trying to save me when the slavers came. Getting caught . . . pretty much every evil thing they did over the next day. Then, later . . . when I was knifed in the fight with my dealer. Anderson visiting me in the hospital afterward.”

The doctor sat down. Her strong, elegantly attractive features drew together in a thoughtful scowl. After a moment, she nodded. “Safe to say that they were memories that you’ve kept buried?”

Shepard knew the answer, but her sheer panic when she woke up confirmed it. Not to mention how the memories hadn’t just played out in her head, but totally ripped her out of reality. “Yeah, I blocked them out. I had a story—all detached and detail-free—about what had happened to me, but the details . . .” She shook her head and raked her fingers through her hair again. “No details.”

Dr. Chakwas nodded and typed into her computer for a moment. “How are you feeling? Is your headache easing up at all?”

The medication flowed through Shepard like a cool breeze, easing her neurons’ searing complaints. “Yeah it is. Wow.” She chuckled softly as the pressure diffused. “I feel like someone just cut the red wire.”

“Good.” Without looking up, the doctor asked, “How much else do you have planned for this evening, Shepard?”

“I need to tell Liara about her mother and get the rachni queen settled on the ship. Then I was planning on sleeping until 0745. I may or may not eat somewhere in there.” Shepard rubbed her brow, her fingers massaging away a little more of the pressure. “You should do some scans of Matriarch Benezia if Liara is okay with it. She was indoctrinated, but managed to fight it off long enough to warn us.”

Sliding slowly off the bed, Shepard tested out her legs. They’d ceased trembling and held her. The headache rumbled a little—distant thunder—but the invasive march of the greasy spiders had been halted. The relief provided by the basic privacy of being alone in her head felt glorious, curtains drawn over the windows of her glass house.

“Make that wake up call for 0645, Shepard. I want to see you before you do anything else.” The doctor hesitated. “They’re finding their way into your mind through these repressed memories, following them like a forgotten tunnel system. They’re using the power of them against you. You’ve got to face them and close up as many avenues into your mind as you can.”

“I’m sure that they could only wedge their way in because they had their orbs all through Peak 15 and probably Port Hanshan as well,” Shepard argued.

“Even so, it’s high time your past stopped holding so much power over you, don’t you think, Captain?” Once again Chakwas levelled Shepard with a stare that said argument would prove useless or, worse, actually end up reinforcing the doctor’s point.

“Very well, Doc. I’ll drag myself out of bed an hour early, hung over and brain damaged.” She raised a hand to her ear and called Nihlus to let him know she was on her way in to speak with Liara. Hanging up that call, she took a few ginger, tentative steps toward the back lab. She felt like a newborn foal trying to figure out how to use her own body, loose-jointed and foreign.

“I’d prefer you not spend any time alone until we find a way to control whatever they’re doing to you, Captain,” Dr. Chakwas spoke up, cutting Garrus off before he could get a word out. “I can count on you to keep an eye on her, Officer Vakarian?”

Shepard opened her mouth to declare herself more than capable of deciding who could keep any number of eyes on her, but Garrus jumped in to cut her off.
“Don’t worry, Doctor. I’ll—”

Nihlus walked in, earning a grin for his timing.

“Excellent. Let’s get this done.” Shephard shoved her shoulder blades together until they cracked, then rolled her arms and neck a few times before approaching the door to the back lab.

Liara and Shiala both sat at a computer, working in silence when Shephard entered.

“Captain!” Liara jumped up and spun to face them. Her jaw dropped a little when she saw the three of them. “Um. Can I . . . I mean, can we help you?”

Shephard gestured for the asari to retake her seat. “Something happened on Noveria, Liara.” She glanced at Shiala. “Do you . . . um . . . you might want some privacy for this.” Shephard looked back at Garrus and nodded toward the door. He could wait for her outside and give Liara a smaller audience to her grief.

“I’d rather Shiala stay,” Liara replied, sitting down and reaching out for the other asari’s hand.

Shephard smiled, thin and tight-lipped, and sat on a crate. Nihlus hung back by the door, looking Spectre-ish and severe. “We found your mother on Peak 15. When we arrived, her commandos had sealed the central lab and fought to the last soul to keep the enemy from getting to her, but she was gravely injured. Still, she managed to keep herself alive until we got there. She told me to pass on a couple of messages.”

Liara’s face paled, her large blue eyes darkening with tears, but she remained composed and controlled. “Messages?” she asked, her voice taut.

Shephard nodded. “The first was that she loved you. You were . . . are her greatest joy and she has always been proud of your independence and dedication.”

The words elicited a tiny, gasped cry, “Oh, Mother.”

Shephard’s heart constricting as Liara’s lips quivered then pressed together. The knuckles on her hand that held Shiala’s paled as she tightened her grip.

Shephard leaned forward and placed a hand on Liara’s knee: silent empathy. “The second was that you needed to go to Illium and speak to someone named Aethyta who is holding your legacy.”

“Illium? My legacy?” Liara blinked rapidly, then frowned and shook her head. “I don’t know anyone named Aethyta, why would my mother want me to go to her?” A sharp edge crept into her voice, piercing the controlled grief. “I don’t understand. Why did she join Saren? Why was she trying to help the Reapers?”

Shephard gave Liara’s knee a gentle squeeze, asking for her forbearance. “Your mother learned that the council and Saren were indoctrinated . . . being controlled by the Reapers. She hoped to guide Saren along a less horrific path. Unfortunately, she underestimated Sovereign’s strength and was indoctrinated herself.” Shephard took a deep breath. “I think the important thing to remember is that in the end, she was strong enough to fight back. She died free, passing on the information we needed.”

“She’s still on . . . oh.” Another small gasp escaped as she realized her mother’s fate. Liara shrugged. “I forgot they destroyed Peak 15. I was going to ask . . .”

“Your mother’s body is with Legion and our other guest, a rachni queen that your mother insisted Liara nodded. “Illium . . .”

Shepard stood. “As soon as we’re done with Wrex’s mission tomorrow, we’ll set course for Illium to find Aethyta.”

Liara stood and held out her hand. “Thank you, Captain. Would you be willing . . .” Her voice broke, but she cleared her throat and squared her shoulders. “I mean, um . . . would you come with me to find Aethyta?”

Shepard offered her other arm, giving Liara a quick hug when the asari stepped forward. “Of course. Whatever you need, just ask.” She squeezed Liara’s hand. “We should be picking Legion and the queen up shortly, and I’ll have Dr. Chakwas there to help you with any preparations you wish to make for your mother.”

Liara nodded and stepped back, Shiala standing and wrapping an arm around her waist. Shepard smiled softly and nodded to them both before backing toward the door. “I’m very sorry for your loss. She was a remarkable, strong woman who loved you a great deal.”

“Thank you, Captain.” Liara crumpled into the chair, all her joints folding, a puppet whose strings of composed resolve all snapped at the same time. Shiala moved in to comfort her friend, so Shepard withdrew, herding Nihlus ahead of her.

“Captain Drunken Hard-Ass,” Joker’s voice came through on her radio, “we have clearance to leave.”

Shepard ignored the snarkiness, not being able to blame him. She’d been a little more rough on him than she normally would. “Take us to Legion’s coordinates, Joker. Coordinate with him. I want to get out of here as quickly and smoothly as possible.”

“Aye, ma’am. Joker, out.”

“He’s pissed,” Shepard said. She levelled a glare at Garrus. “Since you’ve apparently appointed yourself my babysitter, don’t let me drink again. I hate the three days of apologizing that follows. Now, let’s go welcome our newest guest.”
Decompressing and welcoming a new guest aboard the Normandy.

The entire ship seemed to take a deep, ragged breath that froze in their lungs as the rachni queen followed Legion up the ramp. Shepard exhaled, a slow hiss of air, and chuckled to herself as she wondered what colour the queen would use to describe the atmosphere on the Normandy at that moment. Mustard yellow most likely. Disguising her grin behind her hand, Shepard focused on the queen. She didn’t have the foggiest clue how a giant bug managed to look stately and dignified, but the queen pulled it off. The rachni transformed the hush in the cargo bay from terror to awe in the space of a couple heartbeats.

Kaidan, Ash, Jenkins, and three Marines closed in on the center aisle, rifles and shotgun in their hands, but held low. Shepard almost told them that the guns wouldn’t prove necessary, but decided against it. Better they make that determination themselves since the queen would be living down here with all of them for a few days.

“Shepard-Captain.” Legion drew her attention away from the strange and terrifying, yet oddly beautiful form of the rachni. The geth held out the OSD that she’d given him for safe keeping.

“Welcome back, Legion. You did some excellent work out there today, thank you.” She took the disk and shoved it into a pocket for later. “Go thaw out and do . . . um, well, whatever it is that you do to rest and recharge. We’ll be needing you in the morning.”

He nodded, his head flaps fluttering. “Understood, Shepard-Captain.” He headed for the elevator, moving aside to allow Dr. Chakwas, Shiala, and Liara to disembark before he stepped over the threshold.

Shepard gave Liara a bracing, empathetic smile before turning to Shiala. Crooking a finger, she beckoned for Shiala to join her. “The queen communicates telepathically. Benezia said she was able to get information from her mind. Could you try to see if you can act as her voice? She spoke through Benezia before, but I’d rather she didn’t.”

Shiala hesitated for a moment before she nodded. “Of course.” Casting a sad, affectionate glance at her friend, the asari let out a musical little sound of grief. “I don’t think Liara would deal very well if her mother started talking. Benezia’s death is hitting her hard. She’s blaming herself for their
A short dagger of memory slit through Shepard’s guts. She knew about grieving for a mother and regretting the note upon which things had ended. “Yeah, I get that. The last thing I said to my mother was ‘I hate you. I can't wait to move away from here!’” Shepard pushed away the memory of the hurt in her mother's eyes. The fight had been over something so stupid . . .

_Not the time, Janey. Focus._

Shepard shook off the melancholy, “Come on, Sister Shiala. Let’s go chat with a rachni queen and pray this works.” Frowning, she looked around. “Where did Wrex get to?” She discovered him lurking in his corner. His posture screamed ‘ready to charge’ and the blue nebula of his biotics sparked around his hands as he toyed restlessly with his shotgun. His eyes narrowed as he stared at Shepard, the warning there clear as day.

“Hey, Wrex, come on.” Shepard gave him a surreptitious flick of her hand, waving for him to join them as they walked over to meet the rachni. The queen stopped at the top of the ramp, her frilled, opalescent head moving in a way that Shepard could only call anxious. The downside of telepathy . . . being able to sense everyone's fear and distrust.

“Welcome aboard.” Shepard stopped a couple of meters back. “I’m sorry, but I didn’t think to ask back on Peak 15 if you had a name.”

Shiala stood just behind Shepard’s arm. The captain understood the reflex. After everything the young asari had been through, her desire for a shield made complete sense. Shiala closed her eyes, her brow furrowing. “Her name is . . .” When she reopened her eyes, Shepard’s heart lurched hard to port at the endless black of her stare. It never stopped being freaky. “It’s impossible to translate . . . just a handful of musical notes.” After a short pause, she smiled, “It reminds me of a song my mother used to sing to me, Amalair Deseau: The Beautiful Wind.”

Shiala closed her eyes, her head tilting slightly to one side. Shepard moved to intervene but stopped as she saw Shiala’s lips sculpt into a wistful sort of smile. “She likes Amalair, and she thanks you for her freedom and your trust.”

“Beautiful?” Wrex harrumphed. “Not sure a giant insect needs a name.” He stepped up to stare into the queen’s eyes. “Your kind killed millions of my people during the war. You twitch the wrong way, your insides will be your outsides before you see me coming. Clear?”

The rachni queen made a musical sound that threw Shepard backwards in time and filled her with warmth. Sometimes, in the spring, the wind rolled over the hills on the farm, playing the wire fence like a massive string instrument. She’d lay out under the trees, eyes closed, breathing in the spice of newly budding leaves and the bright, honey-sweet scent of the flowers and listen to its eerie music.

Shepard dragged herself out of her memories for what felt like the thousandth time. At least the queen's voice provoked a more pleasant memory. Forcing herself to focus, Shepard started to admonish Wrex, but then the queen made another soft trill of music.

“And your kind drove ours into extinction, extinguishing one song after another until the Singing Planet and our colonies wept bitter, silent tears,” Shiala said, stepping forward as if to protect the queen. Shepard hoped it was voluntary, not some sort of mind control. The ship had enough of that going on. “We do not know why our people turned from beauty to violence, their song soured.” The queen's large, frilled head dipped and swayed a little as if everything were a dance.

“So,” Shepard said, stepping between them, “you killed them, and they killed you. Such as is the case with war. If no one ever takes the first steps toward trust and healing, war never ends.” She closed on Wrex, countering his narrow, red-eyed glare with an encouraging smile and a hand on his shoulder. “Is never-ending war what you want for the krogan, Wrex?”

He rumbled with what could have been a growl or a sigh. “You know it isn't.” He jerked his head to his right, backing her off. Shepard stepped aside, trusting Wrex to keep his word. Jutting out his chin a little, the krogan battle-master hung up his shotgun. “I've given Shepard my word that I'll watch over the rachni and help them rebuild. I'll keep my word as long as the rachni keep theirs. Step out of line and I'll send you back into extinction.”

The air danced with the queen's music and whispers for another moment, then Shiala said, “The rachni will keep their oaths to Shepard as well. They will build in peace and help defeat the black anathema to come. Do not allow doubt to weaken your song, Urdnot Wrex. The rachni have also been shaped into weapons, our strings plucked by those who counted our blood less dear than their own. We will give only the reapers and their masters cause to compose laments laden with fear.”

A puzzled scowl wrinkled Shepard’s forehead and drew her brows in tight above her nose. “Someone used the rachni as weapons? You mean during the war?”

“And before. It is the saddest of ironies to be a species who wishes only to sing in peace and yet possesses a talent and skill for war.” A sigh like fingertips brushed over harp strings followed the queen's words.

Wrex grunted, turned a rueful eye to Shepard and then, with a wave of his hand that labelled them all mad, stalked back to his corner of the cargo bay amidst the crates of his ancestors’ treasures.

Shepard caught sight of Liara and Dr. Chakwas standing a few meters back. “Amalair, thank you for bringing the matriarch’s body out of that nightmare. We can take her now.” She waved for the doctor to approach. “Sparky, Jenkins, could you give the good doctor a hand, please?”

The Marines stepped up, doing an impressive job of hiding any nervousness as they lifted Benezia's body from the rachni’s arms and laid it on the gurney.

“Here, Doc,” Jenkins said, “I’ll give you a hand taking the matriarch up to med bay.”

Shepard smiled and gave the young man’s shoulder a grateful squeeze as he pushed the stretcher past her.

Liara walked up to the rachni queen. Her hands fidgeted a little, but she held herself straight and strong despite her obvious nerves. “Thank you for carrying my mother's body out of that place. It means a great deal to me.” After a moment's hesitation, she lifted a hand to touch the frill behind the queen's head. Her eyes closed, and she took a step closer, her lips relaxing into a smile even as tears crept from the corners of her eyes.

“Liara?” Shepard whispered, “you okay?” Walking over, she pressed a comforting hand to the young asari's back. Ribbons of colour, tranquil and healing, earnest and yearning, flowed through Shepard's hand. Seeming joyful to find new ground to colour, the currents of vivid emotion swept through her body. They twined and curled around each organ, slipped between strands of muscle, and swept through her mind—a cool breeze under a shady tree in August. Shepard allowed the beauty and comfort to fill her for nearly a minute, long enough that she heard people moving in to intercede.

“Thank you,” she whispered, pulling back, a flower closing itself off from the sun. She waved her people back with a couple of flips of her hand. Any concern she'd harboured over the queen being aboard faded, replaced by the certainty that she posed no danger to anyone, at least anyone on the Normandy.

“Shiala,” Shepard said, looking back to the asari, “I know you'll want to get up to support Liara, but could you help the queen get settled? Whatever she needs is fine. Just send me a report when you're finished.” Hiding a yawn behind her hand, Shepard felt the long day and its many highs and lows creeping up on her. If she moved quickly, she might get some food into her before she passed out.

“Go ahead, Captain,” Shiala replied. “I look forward to getting to know the queen better. Her mind is so beautifully peaceful. I'll send my report when I'm done.” Her fingertips brushed Shepard's forearm, giving her the slightest push. “We'll be fine.”

Shepard looked to Kaidan and Ashley. They'd put their guns away and watched the proceedings with faintly bemused expressions. “Keep an eye on for a couple of hours?”

“Aye aye, ma'am,” Ashley replied. The chief raised an eyebrow. “What happened when you touched Dr. T'Soni? It looked like you wandered off on us.”

“I sort of did. I think I was feeling the queen's thoughts or emotions as she comforted Liara. It felt amazing . . . beautiful and peaceful.” She grinned and gave the chief a wink. “If I hadn't been afraid that you were all about to open fire on her, I'd still be standing there, soaking it in.”

“It was a little freaky, ma'am.” Ashley shifted her weight a little, biting the inside of her lip. “I . . . uh . . . well, you seem okay.”

“I am. Don’t worry.” Shepard followed Ash’s gaze as the chief looked over at the queen.

Liara still stood with her hand pressed to the rachni’s frill, eyes closed. After a few seconds, she pulled away from the rachni, tears falling, but an expression of peace on her face. “Thank you,” she whispered then turned and started toward the elevator.

“Liara?” Shepard called, keeping her voice low. “Are you all right?”

The asari stopped and smiled. “I’m fine, Captain. She showed me my mother’s last thoughts about me.” Liara swiped at her cheeks. “Knowing that Benezia respected my choices and loved me . . . . I’m fine.” A wistful expression crossed her face. “I’d better head up.”

Shepard watched the asari walk into the elevator, envying her a little for that glimpse into her mother’s heart. When the door closed, she spied Nihlus standing back by the right hand ramp to engineering, just looking on. She strode over to him. “Why did you stay back? Are you feeling all right?” She touched his cheek. It felt clammy and cool.

He pulled away from her hand. “I'm fine. I didn't want to overwhelm the queen with too many people pressing in on her.”

“Go on up to med bay and check in with Dr. Chakwas.” She scanned him with a critical eye, seeing how he favoured his right side despite his tough guy posture. “You shouldn't have even been on your feet today. Who knows what damage you've done to yourself.”

Nihlus stiffened, his mandibles jutting out, defiant despite the fact his knees visibly trembled. His armour held him up, the paper wrapper around a broken crayon, but he tipped precariously on the edge of collapse. “You're very stubborn for someone your size,” he grumbled.

Instead of arguing with him, Shepard nodded. “I always loved horses. My parents bought me a Shetland pony when I was six. Tiny thing. Just ridiculously stubborn. My dad said it was because ponies were smart, they questioned your right to command.” She grinned. “I learned a lot from that pony.” Taking his hand, she led him to the elevator. “Come on, if you go without a fight, I'll tuck you in and read you a bedtime story.”

His warm chuckle surprised her. “As long as they aren't like my mother's stories. When she was done terrifying my much younger self with bloody dismemberments, exploding heads, and glorious battlefields covered in varren tearing apart rotting corpses, sleep was the last thing I wanted to do.”

Just before the elevator door closed, Ashley ran in.

“Ah, ma’am . . .. Permission to speak freely?”

“Of course, Chief. What’s up?” Shepard leaned back against the rear wall of the insanely slow box.

“It’s just . . . it really looked like the rachni queen put the whammy on you. I’m just a little worried that she might be trying to influence you . . . influence us all into trusting her when we should be keeping an eye on her.” Ash shuffled a little and crossed her arms.

Nihlus nodded. “She’s broadcasting vocalizations to make herself seem less threatening. It’s not all that different from the way turian subvocals carry the emotion and subtext of what we’re saying.”

Shepard frowned. “I did worry that she influenced Shiala to step between her and Wrex. Did you pick anything up that made you concerned?” She looked to both of them for an answer.

“Nothing here,” Nihlus replied. His head bobbed in a slight shrug. “She knows her people’s history with the races. Add to that she was hatched by people who held her prisoner, experimented on her, and drove her offspring mad in attempt to enslave them. If I were in her position, I’d be trying to keep the atmosphere calm and let the people who rescued me know I meant no harm.”

Shepard nodded. “Yeah, I felt nothing but peace, but by all means, Ash . . . keep an eye on. If you see or feel anything that sets off an alarm, let me know right away. She’s an unknown.” She squeezed Ashley’s shoulder. “Thanks for coming to me with this.”

“Yes, ma’am.” The chief remained in the elevator when the door opened, letting Shepard and Nihlus out on the crew deck.

Shepard accompanied him to a very busy med bay, the activity centred around Benezia, who lay on the far bed, covered by a sheet. That didn't really make for a comfortable sleeping environment. “Dr. Chakwas, my friend here could use a quick check up. He overtaxed himself today.”

The doctor excused herself from a vid call and strode over, her omnitool active and scanning even before she reached them. “Spectre Kryik, what were you told as a condition of your leaving med bay today?”

Nihlus answered with an exaggerated scowl and an incoherent grumble.

The doctor let out a comical, long-suffering sigh. “Sit up on the bed. I'll treat you, then you will eat at least a thousand calories before returning to your closet for no fewer than seven hours of sleep. If you do not comply with these instructions, I promise things will go badly for you.” She glowered at him long enough to prompt a petulant mutter of agreement. Victorious, Chakwas turned to Shepard. “How about you? Headache and flashbacks holding off?”

“Yes, ma'am, you mix a mighty fine cocktail.” Shepard steadied Nihlus as he sat on the bed. “All right, I am off to bed people.” Jabbing a finger at Nihlus, she fixed him with an exaggerated steely stare. “And you, Brother Kryik, shall feel the mighty wrath of the Enkindlers in all its fearsome glory if you don't head straight from here to bed.”

“Yes, ma'am.” A soft chuckle followed her to the door. “Hey, what about my story?”

Shepard laughed and shook her head. “I'll owe you.”

The simple yet glorious relief of arriving at the end of a long day slipped over her as she exited med bay. She wrapped it tight around herself as she crossed the galley, eager for the quiet and solitude of her quarters. “This has been one seriously messed up day.” She glanced at the ceiling in the default 'higher power must reside above you' pose. “I understand the whole ‘what doesn't kill you makes you stronger’ concept, but you know, sometimes lessons that don't involve horror and violence are nice too. Glory hallelujah.” Blowing a raspberry at the universe, she palmed the door to the captain’s quarters. “Stupid universe.”

“Stupid universe?”

Shepard grinned at Garrus, the rich timbre of his voice warming her through. “Yep, stupid universe.” She walked over to where he sat at the table, typing on a datapad. “Whatcha doin’?” Her grin widened as she saw the covered food trays awaiting her arrival.

“Just doing a little research to see if those black orbs have been seen before. So far, no luck.” He looked up from his work, his gaze warm and welcoming. He set down the datapad and held out a hand. The gesture sent relief, affection, guilt, and fear all pouring into her inner coliseum, emotional gladiators ready to fight it out.

“Been waiting long?” she asked, taking his hand. When he pulled her in against his side, she ran the backs of her fingers along his fringe then slipped her arm around his neck. He'd changed out of his armour into the long robe which softened out his angles a touch. His warmth soaked into her, a little like the sensation of the rachni queen's thoughts, but strong and vital.

“No, not long. Maybe ten minutes. How did the introductions go?” He tilted his head back a little to look up at her, his intense, interrogator stare softened by concern and affection.

She rested her brow against his fringe and closed her eyes. “Really well. Shiala and Liara came down to meet Benezia's body, and although they can't read the queen’s mind per se, they were able to get the idea behind what she was trying to communicate.” She pulled away and sat in the closest chair. “I touched her thoughts for a moment . . . or more appropriately, her thoughts touched mine and they were so beautiful, like . . . quicksilver ribbons of colour and emotion and intent.” She shrugged, unable to put the experience into words. Blushing a little, she chuckled. “Anyway, it was pretty incredible.”
“They’ve just been lining up to get into your head today.” He pushed her tray over in front of her. “Just be careful, Shepard. It sounds like it was a positive experience, but . . .” A small shrug punctuated his worry.

“I will be. Nihlus said she’s broadcasting a subvocal to make herself seem less threatening, but after what she’s been through, I can hardly blame her for trying to influence us to accept her. Ash, Kaidan, and Wrex are keeping an eye on her.” Shepard lifted the lid, a burst of steam rolling up, carrying with it the scent of spaghetti. She moaned, low and throaty, and reached out to squeeze his hand. “Okay, you're a keeper. This looks amazing. Thanks C-Sec.”

“You're welcome.” He dug into a big slab of meat covered in small brownish things that looked a little like burnt eggs.

Twirling noodles onto her fork, she examined what Garrus had said about aliens lining up to fuck with her head. She couldn’t take a chance that the queen might be trying to hide a dark agenda, but how to know if she was being influenced? She’d be the last one to know.

“I’ll keep checking in with Dr. Chakwas,” she said, knowing even though it came out of the blue, he’d be worrying on it too. “And you can keep an eye on me. If I start acting too trusting etc. jump on it.” She laid her hand over his. “I don’t take this stuff lightly, C-Sec, but in the end, I just have to keep going, you know?”

He nodded and cleared his throat. “So, tomorrow is Wrex’s last stop, then we're moving on to Illium. Virmire after that?”

Shepard nodded. “Yeah. I want to get some aerial drone footage of Saren’s compound on Virmire before we move against it.” She pushed the OSD Benezia had given her on the table. “Hopefully this has information on it that will help. Virmire's jungle, rocky shorelines, and deep coastal waters favour the defender. The more intel and the tighter our plan of attack, the better.”

A couple of mouthfuls later, Shepard's omnitool beeped with an incoming message. She set down her fork and opened her mail. The message was text only and from Aria T’Loak. “Hm. That’s weird.” After clicking on the message, she stared at it for a good thirty seconds just trying to decide if it was a hallucination.

“What?” Garrus raised a brow plate. “Is it top secret?”

Laughing, Shepard shook her head. “No, not top secret, just confusing. All the message says is 'Debt repaid.’” She met his eyes and nodded. “But that's not the truly puzzling part. Attached are the deeds to four buildings in Kima District on Omega, including the one we tracked Tali to . . . at least I think it is. I’m not all that familiar with property title legalese on Omega.”

Garrus stabbed at his steak for a few seconds. “How . . . why would she even think of giving you those buildings unless . . .?”

Nodding, Shepard scowled, puzzlement turning to something a lot darker. “Unless she heard us talking that night.” Shaking off the dread, she closed the message and picked up her fork. “I don't want to have to figure Aria out tonight. I have other, more pressing, things to worry about.” She took a bite, her eyes watching him the whole time. When she swallowed, her lips quirked in a crooked smile. “So, when you agreed to keep an eye on me . . .?”

He rolled his eyes and shook his head, but the flick of his mandibles gave him away. “This cabin has enough room for me to bunk on a cot.” Bobbing his head in a disinterested shrug, he focused Shepard chuckled. “That’s true. Of course we have managed to sleep in the same bed before without ravishing one another. It might be safe enough.” She made a show of coiling a perfect roll of spaghetti noodles around her fork, taking time to stick all the ends in and make it neat before she put it in her mouth. Chewing slowly, she dragged the moment out, grinning wider and wider on the inside as Garrus let the loaded silence go unbroken as well. She swallowed, took a drink, then shrugged. “So long as you realize you have zero chance of scoring.”

A strangled sound was followed by choking. Garrus pounded a fist against the side of his chest and looked up, eyes narrow. After sputtering a couple more times, he pushed his tray away. “Someone certainly considers herself irresistible.”

Leaving the last scraps of her meal, she covered the tray. Her shoulders popped in a joking shrug as she chuckled. “It's a simple fact of biology, C-Sec. I have yet to meet someone I couldn't turn into silly putty with my wiles.” As quickly as she said the words, all the humour drained away, blood leaching from a clenched fist. She frowned, a sick sort of hollow pit forming in her gut that made her dinner churn. It didn't mean anything. Being able to rub herself all over Harkin to ply him for information meant nothing. She'd turned her body into a weapon with one hell of a recoil.

“Garrus.”

The name dragged her attention back from her pity party. “What?”

“My name is Garrus. C-Sec is fine for when we're out there, but when we're alone . . .” He shrugged, a sincere one that time.

Shepard reached out to take his hand. “Okay, Garrus it is.” She squeezed his talons. “I'm a mess, Garrus. You know that. After what the slavers . . . after Mindoir, I detached, you know? I just cut that part out of me, locked it up. The rest is just show, no heart. It doesn't take anything away from me to flirt with someone like Harkin because there's nothing of me in it.” Staring at their joined hands, she let out a long, slow sigh.

He stood, pulling her up with him, and led her over to sit on the side of the bed. Saying nothing, he turned, pulling his knee up on the mattress so he faced her. The interrogator stare softened as she looked up, meeting his stare.

“I kissed Nihlus back in Port Hanshan,” she blurted out, the sick center of her launching it like a missile. “I was drunk . . . scared . . .” She chewed on the inside of her lip. “I'm sorry.”

“Yeah, I knew, but I'm glad you told me.” His mandibles fluttered hard.

“How?” Her neck began to burn as a blush worthy of Sparky crawled up over her cheeks. She tried to pull her hand away, but he held onto it.

“Pheromones. You both told me everything the second you came through the hatch.” He reached up with his other hand and brushed her cheek with his thumb. “I don't own you, Kahri. We've made no promises, taken no vows. I'm no more threatened by Nihlus's feelings for you now than I was a week ago. I know you, and I've gotten to know Nihlus a little. There's an attraction between the two of you, but I'm not jealous of it. I trust what we're building here. If you want to explore that avenue, you just need to tell me.”

She shifted around so she knelt on the bed and wrapped her arms around his neck. He pulled her in, sitting her on his thigh, and slipped his long, powerful arms around her. “Mmmm,” she sighed, tucking her head under his chin. “This is my new favourite spot in the galaxy.” A comfortable silence wrapped around them, Shepard content to let it embrace them for long minutes before she broke it. “Chakwas says I have to start talking about my past, dragging it out into the light of day so the Reapers can't use it against me.”

He just caressed her back—his hand rubbing slow circles—encouraging her without speaking.

Shepard curled in against him, burrowing into his warmth and strength. “How is it that you make me feel so damned safe? Some sort of magic spell woven through those sub-vocals of yours?” Instead of waiting for an answer, she pushed ahead. “When the Alliance made it to our little corner of Mindoir, the squad's medic took one look at me and moved on.” Reaching around, she laced her fingers with his. “Anderson stopped, spending the time to check for a dead girl's pulse. He woke me up as he shouted for everyone to come back. There was no way for him to unchain me, so he dragged the stakes out of the ground with his bare hands.”

She let the story fade into silence for the space of a few breaths, the memory sharpening from foggy grey to full colour. “He talked to me the whole time the medic prepped me for the shuttle ride to their ship. The pain made me wish I’d died along with my father, but Anderson’s voice gave me an anchor to hang onto . . . kept me sane when it was the last thing I wanted to be. Once their medic finished, Anderson carried me out of there, cradled me on his lap through the shuttle ride, then held my hand the whole time their doc treated me.” She sighed and wriggled in closer. “He saved me, Garrus. Well, most of me anyway.”

She pulled away far enough to kiss him, her lips soft and chaste against his mouth. “You make me want to find the rest and put all those pieces back, but . . ..”

“It takes as long as it takes, Kahri. I'm not going anywhere. You have more than enough pressure and more than enough to worry about. This is meant to be respite for us, not more stress.” He nuzzled her lips and along the line of her jaw. “I'll go down and get a cot.”

Shepard shook her head. “No. I could really use the company tonight. Let me take a shower and then we can get some sleep.” After pressing another soft kiss against the rigid plates of his mouth, Shepard stood. “I'll be right back.”
Bad hair, vid calls and Krant Urdnot begins their mission to retrieve Wrex's armour.

Shepard stumbled down the short ramp into the comm room, her knuckles mining for sleep crusties in the corners of her eyes. “Who was it calling again, Joker?” she asked, her voice slurring a little. “I wasn’t quite conscious the last time you told me.” She ran her fingers through her hair, pausing to glance in a monitor. “Oh man, I shouldn’t have gone to bed with wet hair. I look like Cruella de Vil.” She shook a fist at her reflection. “Bring me those puppies!”

She sighed, shoulders sagging, and ran her tongue over the fur coating in her mouth. “Oh good lord, carpet mouth.” What damned time was it, anyway? She wanted to be all warm and cozy, snuggled up against her own personal turian-shaped heating pad. So toasty. Whatever the bastard wanted, whomever it was dragging her out of bed so early, it had better be damned important.

“It’s Admiral Hackett,” the pilot answered. “Did you get up without putting your brain in this morning?”

She sighed. “Something like that.” She patted down her hair. “By the way, lack of brain function does not make my being so short with you yesterday any more acceptable. I’m sorry about that, Joker, but I have asked Garrus to pick up my slack if I’m incapacitated. So on occasion, he may have an order.”

“Aye aye, Captain Cruella. Patching the admiral through now.”

Yep, still pissed off. Oh well, he’d get over it when he got over it.

Shepard turned away from the monitor and hurried over to the comm terminal. As the holographic image of Admiral Hackett appeared, she snapped a crisp salute. “Admiral Hackett. How may I help you, sir?”

The admiral smiled and returned her salute, then shook his head. “You just roll out of your rack, Shepard?”

Shepard felt her neck heat, and try as she might to keep her hands at her sides, they crept up to pat down the massive rooster tail sticking out of her head. “It’s a new tactic, sir. Frighten the enemy to death with terrifying hairstyles.” Her hands dropped back to the console.

“And how is that working for you?” One eyebrow raised, stretching the terrible scar across his face.

“Not as well as I would have hoped with the turians.” She shook her head. “Terrible hair envy there. I’m considering starting the Hair Club for Turians. I’ll make a fortune. Retire.” She chuckled and shrugged, her smile fading when the admiral barely cracked a grin. Something major was going on. “As much as I always enjoy hearing from you, sir, you have the look of an officer with a problem more serious than my unique flair for style.” She cocked a hip and crossed her arms, not liking the way he stiffened. His was a posture of catastrophic news. “What’s happened?”
“We’ve lost control of the VI that manage enemy tactics at the Luna live fire simulation base. It’s gone rogue. Killed everyone on the base. I sent in Adolisky and Neve with nearly a full platoon of Marines. It wiped them out.” He leaned back, the mirror image of her closed off posture. She sensed something lurking behind his practiced calm, something other than reaction to losing a lot of good men and women to a VI.

“The VI, sir . . . is it still a VI? Those simulations have to learn, plan, anticipate . . . . Is there any chance it could have grown out of bounds?” The slight play of muscles along his jaw answered the question.

“We’re not that careless, Shepard. It’s still a virtual intelligence, not an AI. It’s not thinking on its own.” He dropped his arms and straightened, hands darting to clasp behind his back. “It’s not aware.”

She allowed a ghost of a smile to lift one corner of her mouth. Full plausible deniability mode. Once upon a time, months could pass at a stretch without her seeing the company man behind the soldier. “What’s going on with the Alliance, sir?”

He shook his head, one sharp movement to either side. “Nothing you need concern yourself with, Shepard. Divert to Luna at your earliest possible chance and shut that thing down. I refuse to lose any more people. Understood?”

She opened her mouth to argue. Ice crackled through her cells, chilling her to the core as his eyes told her the exact opposite. They also told her to shut up and play along. “Yes, sir, I understand. Until I do get there, the facility is quarantined? No one in or out?”

“It is.” His chest rose and fell sharply with a heavy sigh. “I know you’re busy with Saren, but I can’t see throwing away any more people when I know you can handle it.”

She saluted. “Understood, sir. Send everything you have on the base, armaments . . . anything I might face going in. I’ll be there within four days.”

“I’ll have everything we’ve got on the base and the VI sent to your terminal by 1200. Good luck, Shepard. Hackett out.”

Shepard leaned forward against the console, allowing all the confusion and misgivings that had just pricked the surface during the call to work themselves all the way forward in her head, jostling for position.

“Nothing unusual about that at all.”

Shepard spun, her heart taking off like a partridge flushed out of long grass. Pounding on her chest with a fist, she cursed, then laughed. “You just scared the living snot out of me, Kryik.” Collapsing into the nearest chair, she leaned back. “You don’t carry a defibrillator, do you?”

He chuckled and sat in the chair next to hers, turned so he faced her. “Hackett thinks they have a rogue AI, doesn’t he?”

“Yeah.” Shepard pushed herself up, crossing her arms as she leaned back. “There’s more going on than that, though. He just can’t talk about it.” She looked him over. “You look better today. How are you feeling?”

“As though I’ll definitely survive.” He shrugged. “How about you? You look a little ragged around the edges, but your eyes don’t look —”
“Shepard?” Joker called, interrupting Nihlus. “You have another call coming in. This one is from an Admiral Kahoku.”

Shepard stood and tried to pat down her rooster tail yet again.

“I’m Admiral Kahoku.” He snapped a crisp salute. “Thank you for finding my men, Captain.” He deflated a little, his shoulders bowing with some unseen weight. “I know their deaths have something to do with Armistan Banes. I’ve put out feelers . . . even gone to the Shadow Broker trying to find out why they were killed.” He shifted into parade rest, his hands clasped behind his back. “The only thing I have been able to turn up is the name of a pro-human splinter organization, Cerberus.”

Shepard stiffened as she heard the name and glanced back at Nihlus. “I’ve heard of them in connection to a shady scientific project. But if Banes is dead, why bother killing the men who found his body? It doesn’t add up, Admiral.”

He nodded. “I agree. Nothing about this has made sense. My men found the body drifting on that ship, brought it back to Arcturus, and then the paper trail just disappears.”

Shepard took a deep breath, debating whether or not to even ask her next question. “Is it possible the body your men found wasn’t Armistan Banes? I know an old acquaintance of his who’s pretty sure he’s still alive and in contact with her.”

“The iris scan said it was Banes, but they had no reason to doubt it was him, so just brought him back without further inquiry. If Banes is still alive, who the hell did they pull out of that ship?”

Shepard shook her head. “If the body is gone, we’ll likely never know. I’m working with Nihlus Kryik, one of the council’s Spectres.” She nodded for Nihlus to join her. “Let us dig into this from here on, Admiral. We’re already after Cerberus to try to find out why it’s involved in this other matter. Whatever we find out, we’ll report back to you.”

The admiral nodded as Nihlus stepped up just behind Shepard’s shoulder. “Thank you both. I can’t help but feel as if this entire matter is going somewhere very dark, but hell if I know where. According to scuttlebutt, Cerberus has their hands in assassinations, supposed ‘accidental’ eezo exposures, experimentation to create super soldiers. Be careful, Captain.”

Shepard nodded, then snapped a salute. “You too, Admiral. We’ll be in touch when we learn anything.”

“Thank you. Kahoku out.”

Shepard turned to face Nihlus when the channel closed. “Like we have time for this.”

The Spectre nodded. He turned and paced to the ramp, then back. “They’re considered a terrorist organization by the council and the Alliance, but we’ve never heard of them? Barla Von sent a packet of information that the Shadow Broker has relating to them, but it’s minimal. The sites of a few bases, some suspicion that they were behind some threshre maw attack that wiped out a platoon on Akuze.” He perched on the edge of the closest chair, still looking uncomfortable, but much better than the day before. “Same deal as Kahoku’s men, a distress beacon placed where the Alliance personnel would walk into the nest.”
“Yeah, I heard about that. Nasty business.” Running a hand through her curls, Shepard let out an exasperated sigh. “We’re being snowed under here. A side trip to Luna, Wrex’s armor, who knows what we’re going to need to do after Illium . . ..” Throwing up her hands, she thumped down in the seat opposite his. “Now Cerberus . . . and why the hell am I worrying about this Armistan Banes guy anyway? Dr. Michel is reporting that everything is fine at the clinic these days. Maybe he is dead.”

Nihlus just stared at her for long seconds before he asked, “After this base, we’re headed straight for Illium?”

“Yeah. I was planning on taking Liara, Shiala, and Ashley to meet with Aethyta. Did you want to come with? I’m hoping whatever legacy Benezia left behind helps us out.” Her eyes narrowed as she finished, evaluating his condition the best she could through the plates and his even more inscrutable stoicism. “How did you come through yesterday? Any new damage?”

He chuckled, the sound warm and reassuring. “I’m fine. You did more damage wrestling with me on the floor of the ladies’ head.”

She winced. “Yeah, sorry about that. I really am a terrible drunk.”

“Shepard?” Joker’s voice came through over the intercom once again.

“What can I do for you this time, Flight Lieutenant?” she asked, turning toward the console. She needed to get showered and go over the OSD Benezia had given her.

“Another call for you, Captain.”

Sighing, she pushed herself out of her chair. “Aren’t I just the most popular girl today?” Spinning on her heel, she stalked back to the console. “Who is it this time? An admiral needing me to pick up his dry cleaning? Take his dog to the groomer? Organize his sock drawer, maybe?”

“No, ma’am. He said his name is Armistan Banes.”

The ice that Hackett had sent slithering through her solidified, freezing her in place for a moment before it shattered, melted away by the hope that she might catch a glimpse of the hand manipulating the puppet. She nodded and took a deep breath, searching through the detritus left behind by the weeks of stormy seas to find the old Shepard. The smart ass who took no prisoners.

“Put him through, Joker. Thanks.” When the channel opened, she almost laughed. Someone had been watching way too many spy vids. Armistan Banes, if in fact that was the identity of the person in front of her, sat shrouded in shadow, only a faint profile visible in the darkness.

“Captain Shepard,” the figure said, shifting slightly in his seat. “I hear you’ve been trying to get in touch with me?” A faint flash of light glowed orange against clean shaven, pronounced features as he lit a cigarette.

She smiled and clasped her hands behind her back, feet shoulder width apart. “That depends on who I’m speaking to.”

He chuckled, a warm sound that made her skin crawl, an infestation of termites eating away just under the surface. He pulled a long, slow drag on his cigarette. “I’m sure the irascible Lt. Moreau told you my name.”

“Yes, he told me a name. Whether it belongs to you remains to be seen. My information says that Armistan Banes is dead and has been for quite some time.” Watching him carefully gave her no clues as to his identity or whether he was telling the truth. Although, her gut pointed toward truth.

“Death is very often a useful cover for those wishing to disappear, but between Admiral Kahoku, his men, muscle who can’t keep their mouths shut and you . . .” He sighed. “Well, let’s just say that I didn’t expect to be so diligently hunted without first having broken several major laws.”

She shrugged. “Oh, I don’t know about diligent. I’ve had a few more important things on my mind. The good doctor Michel seems to be just fine now with her krogan body guards looking after her. If Kahoku hadn’t just called me, I’d have forgotten about you completely.” She shrugged, hands flipping in a helpless little flourish. “So many things for little ol’ me to keep crammed into my head.”

Banes chuckled. “Come now, Captain, we both know that what resides between your ears is much more maze full of tricks and steel traps than the cotton you’d like people to believe fills the space.” He took another long drag, making a show of tapping and cleaning the ash off the end of his cigarette as he blew the smoke out. He shrugged. “Kahoku no longer interests me. He is tilting at windmills.”

Shepard watched Banes, narrow-eyed and calculating. He only showed his weaknesses in the tiniest glimpses. Everything about him read false: an actor playing a part. Her gut twinged, but she packed the reaction down. He was reading her with the exact same level of scrutiny. She needed to be a mirror. “If the admiral no longer interests you, why am I speaking to your carefully constructed image right now?”

“Because you interest me, Captain, and because you interest my employer even more so. He thinks you possess a great deal of potential.” He shifted in his seat, uncrossing his legs to lean against the arm of his chair. “The other call you took this morning also greatly interests me. A rogue VI? Ah, the possibilities there are intriguing indeed, aren’t they?” He leaned toward the camera a little. “Has the Alliance been colouring outside the lines on AI research?” He smoked for a few seconds then shook his head. “No, they’re too busy trying to suck up to the council to risk anything so interesting. That leaves spontaneous self-awareness.” He sucked in an eager breath. “Oh, that is exciting, isn’t it? The birth of a brand new baby. Not ideal it being born with its hands full of guns, though.”

Shepard shook her head and cocked a hip. “There’s nothing to say it is an AI. As far as I know, it’s a VI with a penchant for killing Alliance soldiers. I don’t know how you found out about it, but if I see anyone other than my team at that base, I’ll treat them as the enemy.” A cold smile of warning blew over her features, freezing them in place. He dismissed that with a wave of one hand. “Oh, don’t worry, I have no intention of running between you and an entire Alliance firebase full of weapons operated by a mad VI. I leave the dodging of bullets to others.” He held up his hands. “These are the hands of a precise sort of scientist . . . a surgeon if you will.” He shook his head. “Besides, my employer is curious to see Captain Shepard face a worthy challenge.”

Shepard paced to the edge of the camera’s range and back. “I don’t take requests. Your employer gets the urge to have someone dance for his amusement, there are many fine gentlemen’s clubs.” She leaned into the console. “You both just need to stay away from me, Dr. Michel, and Admiral Kahoku. Don’t make me bump you up to the top of my list of priorities.”

He nodded. “You aren’t my department, Shepard. I agree we should give one another a wide berth, for Admiral Kahoku’s sake. He’s getting up there, and his heart isn’t what it used to be. You and my employer are on the same side of this whole Reaper invasion unpleasantness. To that end, he wanted me to extend this courtesy. Stay out of his affairs, and he’ll do the same. He’d hate to have to bump you up his list of priorities.”

Shepard opened her mouth to tell him where to shove his threats, but he held up one finger as his other hand stubbed out his smoke. “Take care, Shepard. We’ll talk again, I feel certain of that.”

For nearly thirty seconds, Shepard stared at the spot where the enigmatic figure had been projected, chasing the encounter and all its elusive subtext through her thoughts. It hadn’t been about warning her off, of that much she felt certain. It hadn’t been about Kahoku either, she sensed that they didn’t care either way if she helped the old man investigate. They intended to mow him over without the care put into digging out a weed or pulling a splinter. She’d send a message to Hackett to keep an eye on Kahoku, but if the admiral insisted on taking on Cerberus, they’d find a way to kill him.

No, that conversation had been about something else entirely, and the real message had been written under the surface.

“That wasn’t meant to scare you off,” Nihlus said, stepping up behind her again. “It was meant to entice you.” He shook his head. “I’ve heard a lot of whispers about Cerberus and seen a lot of damning testimony, but that call was the only thing that has ever made me nervous. They want you in a bad way, Shepard.”

She scowled and looked up into his eyes. “They do, but hell if I know why. Maybe they’re just held captive, bound and helpless by the amazing allure of my sultry beauty.”

Nihlus shrugged, his mandibles sweeping thoughtfully, but then they dropped and he shook his head, deadpanning, “No, that’s not it.”

Shepard laughed and elbowed him gently. “Very nice. Be still my heart. You turians and your hopeless romanticism.” After a second, she shook off the lingering dread from the call. “Come on, let’s go kick some mercenary butt. We have enough real enemies lined up in front of us. Don’t really need to be inventing any.”

“I blame you,” he said, a warm chuckle following the words out. “You’re an enemy magnet. Everywhere you go, everyone hates you.”

Shepard cackled. “I know. It’s great, isn’t it?” She palmed the door and slipped past him. “I think it’s a magical power.”

He shrugged. “It’s something.” When she took another swing at him, he just reached out and placed his hand on her head, holding her at arm’s length. “Ha! Why didn’t I think of this weeks ago?”

Shepard spun, ducking out from under his hand, bringing around a kick that she halted right before it impacted his midsection. “That would be why, smart ass.” She walked through the door down to the crew deck and trotted down the stairs. At the bottom, she turned to face him. “I am going to grab a shower and tame my bedhead. Meet you in my quarters at 0800 to go over Noveria and Benezia’s disk?”

“Sure. See you in a bit.” He ducked off toward the crew quarters and his closet.

When she walked around the table into the galley and saw the med bay door, Shepard groaned. Damn, she needed to go in and get her head shrink. No time for showers or even breakfast. Life was cruel, especially since she felt pretty good, all things considered. Head didn’t hurt, thoughts seemed clear and unmuddled with memories. Oh well, she needed to make it through the fight, and if that meant talking about her childhood invisible friend named Mr. Roofydoofus . . .

“Shit, I hope I don’t have to talk about that,” she sighed, heading for the med bay door. “I’ll sound like an idiot.”

* * * * *

“This is going to save us a whole metric buttload of time,” Shepard said, letting out a half-sigh, half-chuckle as she moved over the 3D holographic map of Saren’s compound on Virmire. “I was going to head there and do all this mapping after Illium, but this frees us to go straight to Luna.”

Nihlus leaned over the table, peering down at the map like a giant raptor. “Do you believe we can trust it and the intel Benezia provided? She was indoctrinated. This information could be a trap.” He looked up at Shepard without lifting his head. “We need to confirm it before we act on it for sure.”

Shepard nodded. “We do.” She sighed. “Keep that eagle eye on me. I want to trust this too much. I want to trust the queen too much.” She shoved away from the table and paced to her desk. “I’m not a trusting person, Nihlus. I don’t trust anything. Add that to how much is messing with my head . . .” Spinning on her heel, she turned back, meeting and holding his gaze. “So, please, keep an eye on me.”

A quick nod answered her request. He straightened and stepped around the table. “What do you want to do with this information?” Three long strides carried him across the few metres between them.

“I don’t want to take a couple of days doing the surveying just to prove we had correct information to start with.” She leaned her hip against the edge of her desk. “See if Barla Von can confirm the information.” A smile softened her frown lines, easing the tension between her eyebrows. “He’s going to start feeling like our personal information broker soon.” That thought started with a chuckle, but then as it settled, opened up an avenue of doubt. “Should we be trying to secure some independent sources of intel? Having all our eggs in the Shadow Broker’s basket might not be the best plan.”

Nihlus laid his hands on her shoulders. “If it helps, I trust Von. The Broker, no, but Von has done nothing but excellent work for us. I’m sure we can trust what he brings us, if only because what we’re giving him back has more than compensated him.” He gently pushed Shepard toward the bed. “I want to get some intel of a more pressing nature at the moment.”

She frowned up at him, but let him guide her. “And what would that be?” She sat on the edge, watching him through narrowed eyes as he sat next to her and turned, lifting his knee onto the mattress to face her.

He stared at her for a second, then shrugged. “I want to know what’s going on, Shepard. You’ve been off for days, and now you’re telling me to keep an eye on you like you think someone is controlling you. It’s time to bring me up to speed.” Surprisingly, she relaxed under his scrutiny, the contact supportive, not at all uncomfortable as it had been a couple of weeks earlier.

Shepard shook her head a little. For almost a month, they’d wandered a winding and painful road to get back to where they’d been on the second or third day. She’d pushed him too hard back then, so sure of herself, so convinced that she could just flirt her way into a relationship that she could control. God, how could she have been so insanely naive? In the intervening weeks, tornados and hurricanes ripped through, shredding the blissfully ignorant town of Shepard, leaving mobile homes and prefabs sticking upside down out of trees and in ditches.

“Yeah, I suppose you need to know.” She slumped a little and settled back onto the bed. “I don’t want it to be common knowledge, though. If things get bad, if my decisions and actions become questionable, then we’ll take it to the team.” She hardened her stare, warning him without a word that she wouldn’t tolerate that knife being turned on her.

He nodded. “You can trust me, Shepard.”

Twenty minutes later, Shepard checked her chrono. “We’d better get suited up. It’s time for Urdnot Wrex’s krant to swing into action.” She herded Nihlus to the door. “Are you going to contact Barla Von about confirming Benezia’s information?”

Stopping before she could chase him all the way out, he turned back to face her. “Thank you for trusting me.” He palmed the door. “As soon as I get into my armour, I’ll call Von.”

She nodded and stood in the door, watching him walk to the elevator, moving in long, easy strides. At least she didn’t have to worry about his injuries any longer. By the time they saw any real action on Luna, he’d be healed up just fine.

Shepard started back into her quarters, but stopped just inside the door and peeked out at the sound of Garrus’s voice.

“Wrex!”

The turian walked over to the table, more hesitant than she could remember seeing him. Usually he strode right into things, but he minced as if being dragged to his execution.

The battlemaster glared up at him through narrowed, red eyes. “What do you want, Vakarian? Shouldn’t you be suiting up?”

Garrus cleared his throat, but didn’t back down. “I may have been . . . um . . .” He cleared his throat again. “…insensitive when I listened to the cockpit recording after Shepard drove through that threshor with you and Alenko in the Mako.” Taking a deep breath, he straightened until his back cracked. “After driving across Noveria with her, I wanted to apologize for that.”

Wrex held the glare for a moment, then nodded and harrumphed. “Sure. No hard feelings.” He held out his hand, but instead of shaking, at the last second he opened his omnitool and hit a button.

Garrus’s frantic, flanged curses roared through the galley gaining in volume and pitch until Shepard flinched, covering her ears.

The crowd at the table burst into raucous laughter, and Wrex stood, buffeting the turian with a sharp slap to the shoulder.

“Thanks for the apology, Garrus,” he said, a deep, rough chuckle chasing the words out of his mouth.

Garrus spun to face Legion, who was replacing his chest panel with a piece of male armour. “Legion!”
The geth looked up, his head flaps shifting in a gentle sigh of movement. “Officer Vakarian?”

The turian stormed over, every inch of him bristling with fury and indignation as he towered over the geth. “How did Wrex get that recording?”

“We were told the information was needed for educational purposes,” Legion replied, his tone remaining so completely even that Shepard began to worry that Garrus might just start peeling off head flaps.

“Hey! C-Sec!” she called, stepping out through the door. “May I speak with you for a moment?”

Glowering, Garrus hesitated before spinning on his talons and stalking toward her. The second he passed through the door, however, she stopped worrying for Legion’s welfare. All the rigid fury drained from his features, the actor stepping off the stage. Still stalking, but playful rather than angry, he closed on her.

“You called, Captain?” he asked, mandibles fluttering a little. “Did you need something, or just distracting me from giving Legion a 7.21 calibration error?” He laid his hands on her shoulders then slid them down her arms, warm and familiar, intimate in a way that sparked a small nova in her gut. Fear whispered beneath it, but she pushed it into the fire, turning it to ash. A mission waited, a chaperone pacing outside her door to be sure things weren’t allowed to go anywhere terrifying.

Shepard grinned as she looked up into his eyes. “I was worried about Legion for a moment or two, but now . . . Legion who?” The grin widened as he returned her smile with a sly, turian one. “Too bad we have a mission in a few minutes.”

He chuffed and shook his head. “There’s always going to be something that needs doing, Shepard. It all just depends on your priorities.”

Her smile melted, candle wax sliding down her jaw to drip on the floor. “This war, finding Saren . . . stopping the Reapers . . . they have to be my priority, Garrus. I can’t let anything distract me from that.” She looked down as one hand lifted to hover between them for a moment before lowering, her fingers brushing his hand on their way back to her side.

He caught them. “I know, and I understand, Shepard. That wasn’t what I meant. My job is to support you and make sure you have what you need to pull out the win. Sometimes that will mean seeing how many different ways I can get your skin to do that gooseflesh thing.” His grin brought hers right back as he added, “Right now, that means chasing you out to your locker and admiring the view while you suit up.” His large hand cradled her neck and most of the side of her head, his thumb tracing the curve of her smile. “That’s better.”

“Let’s get moving. The Alliance tossed another mission at us, so we’ll be heading straight from Illium to Earth. One of the training VI’s has gone rogue on Luna.” She stood on tiptoes to kiss him, still needing to grab onto his yoke to pull him down before she pressed her lips to his mouth. Her smile deepened as his arms slipped around her waist, pulling her in. She’d never experienced the simple but amazing feeling of just wanting to kiss someone and have him hold her. After a second, she shook off the sentimentality and pulled away. “Urdnot Wrex awaits, and he is one hell of a taskmaster.”

Garrus straightened. “He is.”

As she slipped into her armour and they made their way down in the elevator, they discussed the problems inherent to uniting the krogan under a single leader, of which there were many. Just like trying to bring the quarians and geth together, it was a road laden with hurdles that had no easy fixes. It required a great deal of cooperation and trust from a people unused to even trusting each other.

Most of the team had already assembled in the cargo bay when Shepard and Garrus arrived. Wrex paced at their head, practically vibrating with eagerness to spring into action.

“Captain?” a soft voice called from behind Shepard’s right shoulder.

Shepard turned to face Shiala, her brow furrowing a little as the asari and the rachni queen walked toward her. Garrus touched the captain’s shoulder and headed off to join the rest of the krant.

Despite the fact that Shiala said she hadn’t felt anything other than peace and beauty in the queen’s thoughts, Shepard worried about the queen’s influence and possible control over the asari and the rest of them. Still, despite her concerns, the Reapers and Saren had tried to subvert the rachni because they were an enemy that posed a serious threat. That meant a level of trust she could only pray paid off.

“Captain?” Shiala called again, her face creasing to match Shepard’s frown. “Are you all right?”

Taking a deep breath, Shepard shook off her hesitancy, glad for her suspicions, but needing to set them aside. “I’m fine, thanks.” She looked from the asari to the queen. “Is there something you need?”

Shiala hummed softly as if undecided about speaking then stopped, her head tilting as she presumably listened to the queen. “The queen understands that you are accompanying Urdnot Wrex on a mission? That this mission will help turn his song from darkness to hope.”

Shepard nodded. “Yes, we’re recovering artifacts that belonged to his people. It will help restore the krogan people’s pride and connection to their forebearers.”

The queen made a melodic trill, carrying beneath it the eerie whisper that Shepard could just about understand. It infused her with understanding and empathy.

“The rachni pass their memories down from queen to queen,” Shiala said. “Each new generation is born with that ancestral memory intact. To the rachni, losing the memory of the ancestors is a huge tragedy . . . it is the loss of everything their people are.”

The queen sang again, bringing to the cargo bay an atmosphere of cohesion, purpose, pride in identity. Within two breaths, Shepard saw the effect on the team as they prepared for the mission. They stood straighter, pulling together as a unit in the truest sense of the word. Manipulated by the queen’s song or not, they’d go out and kick ass. That alone could prove priceless beyond measure in the coming battles.

Shiara opened her mouth to speak, but then spun around, staring into the queen’s face. “No, you can’t. You don’t have any weapons, any defenses.” While Shepard watched, puzzled by the outburst, the asari closed her eyes and let out a long sigh. “Very well.” She turned back to Shepard. “She wishes to accompany you on the mission . . . to help Wrex retrieve the memories of his people.”

Shepard frowned, turning her attention over her shoulder for a second as she felt someone walk up behind her. Seeing it was Nihlus, she turned her scowl back to the queen. “How do you answer about defenses or weapons? I can’t send you into a firefight if you’re unable to defend yourself.”

“She says that she is neither helpless nor risking herself foolishly.” Shiala shrugged. “She’s very determined, Captain. The crew of the Normandy are afraid of her and view her with suspicion. She believes this will help.”

Glancing back at Nihlus, Shepard raised her eyebrows in query. If the queen didn’t think herself at risk, who was Shepard to tell her no. It wasn’t even Shepard’s mission.

Nihlus bobbed his head in a shrug, but his mandibles spread and flicked hard in a way that made her think of a boy being allowed to take his most impressive toy into school to show his friends. “If she thinks she can handle it, I say leave it to Wrex. It’s his show.” He chuckled. “I doubt she’ll take any fire. Between her and Legion . . . those mercs will run for their lives.”

“She believes this will help.” Shepard levelled a scowl of mock disapproval at him and gasped. “Oh! I see how it is. You want to get your picture taken looking all badass next to a rachni. Strut down the Citadel admiring your image on posters, t-shirts, and lunch boxes.” She shook her head. “Sweet baby Jesus, that’s shameless. I feel a little sick.”

He chuffed. “Yeah, you have that nauseating effect on me too. Lunch boxes?” Brow plates raised, he shook his head. “Sometimes I swear that nothing but crazy falls out when you open your mouth.”

Giving the Spectre a flippant shrug, Shepard refocused on the queen. She hoped Nihlus was right about the rachni not taking fire . . . the terrified enemy could decide to invest all their bullets in taking down the giant spider. One could never be too sure which way fear would turn. However, if the queen assisting Wrex on his mission helped smooth the path to cooperation between the two species, it could prove well worth the risk.

“True enough.” Shepard levelled a scowl of mock disapproval at him and gasped. “Oh! I see how it is. You want to get your picture taken looking all badass next to a rachni. Strut down the Citadel admiring your image on posters, t-shirts, and lunch boxes.” She shook her head. “Sweet baby Jesus, that’s shameless. I feel a little sick.”

He chuffed. “Yeah, you have that nauseating effect on me too. Lunch boxes?” Brow plates raised, he shook his head. “Sometimes I swear that nothing but crazy falls out when you open your mouth.”

Giving the Spectre a flippant shrug, Shepard refocused on the queen. She hoped Nihlus was right about the rachni not taking fire . . . the terrified enemy could decide to invest all their bullets in taking down the giant spider. One could never be too sure which way fear would turn. However, if the queen assisting Wrex on his mission helped smooth the path to cooperation between the two species, it could prove well worth the risk.

“True enough.” Shepard levelled a scowl of mock disapproval at him and gasped. “Oh! I see how it is. You want to get your picture taken looking all badass next to a rachni. Strut down the Citadel admiring your image on posters, t-shirts, and lunch boxes.” She shook her head. “Sweet baby Jesus, that’s shameless. I feel a little sick.”

He chuffed. “Yeah, you have that nauseating effect on me too. Lunch boxes?” Brow plates raised, he shook his head. “Sometimes I swear that nothing but crazy falls out when you open your mouth.”

Giving the Spectre a flippant shrug, Shepard refocused on the queen. She hoped Nihlus was right about the rachni not taking fire . . . the terrified enemy could decide to invest all their bullets in taking down the giant spider. One could never be too sure which way fear would turn. However, if the queen assisting Wrex on his mission helped smooth the path to cooperation between the two species, it could prove well worth the risk.

“True enough.” Shepard levelled a scowl of mock disapproval at him and gasped. “Oh! I see how it is. You want to get your picture taken looking all badass next to a rachni. Strut down the Citadel admiring your image on posters, t-shirts, and lunch boxes.” She shook her head. “Sweet baby Jesus, that’s shameless. I feel a little sick.”

He chuffed. “Yeah, you have that nauseating effect on me too. Lunch boxes?” Brow plates raised, he shook his head. “Sometimes I swear that nothing but crazy falls out when you open your mouth.”

Giving the Spectre a flippant shrug, Shepard refocused on the queen. She hoped Nihlus was right about the rachni not taking fire . . . the terrified enemy could decide to invest all their bullets in taking down the giant spider. One could never be too sure which way fear would turn. However, if the queen assisting Wrex on his mission helped smooth the path to cooperation between the two species, it could prove well worth the risk.

“True enough.” Shepard levelled a scowl of mock disapproval at him and gasped. “Oh! I see how it is. You want to get your picture taken looking all badass next to a rachni. Strut down the Citadel admiring your image on posters, t-shirts, and lunch boxes.” She shook her head. “Sweet baby Jesus, that’s shameless. I feel a little sick.”

He chuffed. “Yeah, you have that nauseating effect on me too. Lunch boxes?” Brow plates raised, he shook his head. “Sometimes I swear that nothing but crazy falls out when you open your mouth.”

Giving the Spectre a flippant shrug, Shepard refocused on the queen. She hoped Nihlus was right about the rachni not taking fire . . . the terrified enemy could decide to invest all their bullets in taking down the giant spider. One could never be too sure which way fear would turn. However, if the queen assisting Wrex on his mission helped smooth the path to cooperation between the two species, it could prove well worth the risk.
knew.”

“I’ll leave you to it,” she said, slapping him on the shoulder and retreating back to the second line, elbowing her way in beside Ashley.

Shiara and the queen approached the krogan battlemaster, but Shepard couldn’t hear what they said. Wrex stiffened for a second then shrugged, his voice carrying as he said, “Fine, but you stay with me. If you even look at something the wrong way, I’ll put you down. They take you out, it’s no skin off my hump, just one less bug uglifying up the galaxy.” He jutted out his chin and grunted. “Get in line.”

Shepard chuckled softly, one eyebrow raising toward her hairline. She hadn’t expected Wrex to go along with it. “Curiouser and curiouser,” she muttered under her breath, wondering if the queen had used her song to influence the krogan.

“Alenko,” Wrex called out, a sharp bark of sound that yanked Shepard from her thoughts and made everyone jump, “you’re piloting the Mako. Vakarian, canon. Chase, turret. Intel shows four sniper perches and a small platoon of ground troops with portable cover. You’ll have fifteen minutes to take them out before we land.” He waited a second as those three stepped out of their lines, snapping off sharp salutes. “I want to walk in there like I already own his ass. Make sure I do.” He nodded toward the Mako. “Go!”

Shepard grinned as the entire assembled team jumped again, startled by the krogan’s bellow. He had them all scurrying like FNG’s straight out of zero g training and still green around the—“Shepard! Kryik! Williams! You’re team leaders. The building has one entrance. When we go in, Shepard will lead Team Pyjak to the left and up the stairs. Clear the upper level so we aren’t taking fire from above.” He stalked back and forth along the front line as irascible and ornery as ever, but with an air of command that held everyone’s attention in a strangle hold.

Shepard stepped forward and saluted, calling out, “Yes, sir,” before stepping back in line.

The air seemed to shimmer around Wrex as if the gravity of his personality pulled it in, shaping it into a physical manifestation to propel them off the ship and into action. Shepard’s heart beat strong and fast, her muscles tightening, a broad smile spreading across her face. She’d rarely experienced the privilege of serving under a leader with the power and presence of Urdnot Wrex. To her right, the Mako roared to life, the throbbing rumble of its engines adding to the palpable alacrity.

Wrex ignored the competition for their attention, easily out-roaring the machine. “Kryik, you’ll lead Team Princess down the center and clear the left side of the building. Williams, Team Varren Pup follows me down the right hand side. We’ll be the first team through the doors, give the other two cover as they move into position.” He paced for a second, long enough that the assembled crew began to lean toward him. As if a timer went off in his head, he snapped around, a crooked, wicked grin making him look more intimidating rather than less. “This isn’t a nuclear bomb, it’s a tactical strike. Put a few down and let them crawl home to whine to their mommies about the thrashing the Normandy’s crew gave them. The rest . . .” He chuckled, a deep, slow-rolling growl of sound. “The rest die screaming with piss sloshing in their boots.”

“Mako drop in five minutes,” Joker’s voice called over the comms.

“All right, we’re ready to move, princesses! Team leaders, organize your squads. It’s time to show the galaxy that the krogan are stepping out of the shadows . . . that I won’t let them be ground into dust under anyone’s heel.” His grin widened and his eyes narrowed. “We’re going to save them from the Reapers, whether they want us to or not.” His voice rose through the sentence, reaching a crescendo at the end that had Shepard hollering “Oorah!” along with the rest of her crew.

Wrex nodded. “Move out.”
Shepard gathered her squad, ran through a quick inspection, giving them a nod of approval. “Never have I seen a more impressive collection of monkeys with guns. Glory hallelujah brother and sister pyjak, get your butts in formation behind the princesses.” She cut a teasing glance across at Nihlus. “And by the light of the holy Enkindlers, try not to stare at their tiaras. It makes them cranky.”

She took her place in the march order, feeling a twinge of regret that she wasn’t piloting the Mako. The Normandy didn’t land very often, favouring dropping the teams in the APC, and she wished she could see it from the outside. A scowl creased her face as she glanced at her chrono. Maybe she had time to ask Garrus to record it.

“Team Leader, this is Team ‘Thank the Spirits Alenko is driving the Mako not Shepard’. The exterior defenses are down.” A grumbled curse greeted Garrus’s voice coming through on the comms. Damn his timing.

Nihlus snickered from Shepard’s right, earning her best death-glare. “That’s right, laugh away mighty leader of Team Princess.” A wide, smile answered Nihlus’s closed-dialect curse. “I know what that word means, oh so pretty princess.”

“Stow the flirting, pyjak,” Wrex barked before cutting over to Ashley. “Varren pup, you’re up.” The krogan strode to the ramp, crooking a finger at the rachni queen. “You, with me.”

Shepard watched Shiala, the asari remaining behind while the queen stepped up beside Wrex. As the asari wrung her hands, Shepard found herself struck by an image of a mother sending her child on her first sleepover, or the first day of school. “It’s a strange old universe,” she muttered. The Normandy’s thrusters kicked in for landing, grabbing her attention. The deck plating rumbled, throbbing with a powerful bass—a thunderstorm early on a summer morning.

The moment she caught her first glimpse of the Normandy, Shepard laughed aloud with delight . . . the sleek, gleaming hull poised to soar, a legendary raptor sitting on a branch, head raised to the lightning, it’s wings spread to face the storm, trembling in the wind. That instant attraction had become a flirtation that grew deeper each day she served aboard. However, in that moment, as the raptor swept toward the ground, its great wings becoming the thunder itself, Shepard fell madly and helplessly in love.

She had no idea how or why the universe chose her, but she felt incredibly honoured to have been gifted the chance to command such a remarkable ship and crew. Pity she couldn’t remember the grand deed that had earned her so much of the universe’s good will.

Sighing, she settled into parade rest to wait, softly singing to herself. “Nothing comes from nothing. Nothing ever could. So somewhere in my youth or childhood . . . ” From just ahead of her, Jenkins joined in for the last few words, “I must have done something good.” She grinned. “A “Sound of Music guy, huh?” Shaking her head, she clicked her tongue. “I honestly don’t know what to do with that, Jenkins.”

“Always make sure I’m on your karaoke squad?”

The ramp touched down, revealing a large prefab building like a million others spread across the galaxy. The Mako idled outside the front door, almost appearing impatient as the chassis bounced with the vibration from its engine. If it were a bull, it would have been snorting and pawing the turf.

“Move the Mako onto the ridge and keep your eyes open,” Wrex ordered, marching down the ramp. “Actus has never shown signs of having a brain larger than my back left nut, but anything’s possible.”

“Roger that, Team Leader,” Alenko answered.

“Move out,” Wrex called. “Come on, bug.”

Stately, graceful, and terrifying, the rachni queen moved along at the krogan’s side, the two of them striding out like royalty surveying a conquered land. In that moment, Shepard knew they would be fine. Somehow, their races would find a way to work together, becoming one of the galaxy’s great juggernauts. Heaven help the council races if they turned their back on them rather than accepting their people as partners and equals.

Wrex led the team down the ramp, marching strong but controlled, just as he’d said . . . he intended to go in as if he already owned Actus’s ass. Varren Pup followed, their every movement exuding menace, and Shepard chuckled, knowing why the queen wasn’t worried about being attacked. Her ability to project emotion would keep her safe.

As Wrex and the rachni queen burst through the inner door, and the air filled with hollered swears and cries of confusion and panic, Shepard found herself cursing her height for the first time in a lot of years. All her fine work bringing the players and the plan together and now a krogan battlemaster and a rachni queen were terrorizing the greedy merc bandits, and she couldn’t see over Jenkins’s head.

“Life just isn’t fair,” she grumbled waiting for Nihlus to move his princesses through the doors. Maybe she could still catch some of the action. “I should be able to command my corporals to duck down and let me stand on their backs.”

“Not today, ma’am,” Jenkins whispered. She didn’t need to see his face to know he wore a big, stupid grin.

“May the Enkindlers smite you with . . . .” She floundered, falling in over her depth of Galactic Brotherhood doctrine. “. . . whatever they have that smites tall people who won’t move out of the way.”

“Want me to pick you up so that you can see?” Nihlus asked just before swinging around out of cover, his shotgun coughing death at an asari in leathers.

“Great, just what I need,” Shepard grumbled without any heat behind it, “another turian who thinks he can toss me over his shoulder at will.” When Wrex gave her the nod, she waved her team forward, moving them along the back wall of the main room.

When the last of her team made it through the door, she followed, double timing it up the line to take point. Two mercs dashed through the door, seeking cover from the battle in the main room, but at least one of them took cover just on the other side. Shepard pulled a grenade and lobbed it in front of the door, letting it roll lazily over the threshold before she hit the button.

She halted her team, going through on her own to be sure the pair were down before signalling for her pyjaks to move forward. As usual, she took point up the stairs. Sporadic gunfire echoed in the main room, men and women still screaming back and forth, trying to figure out what was going on. Those who survived could chalk up the krogan/rachni/geth terror to a really lightweight rehearsal for the Reapers.

Confident, Shepard took cover behind the door jam at the top of the stairs. A quick peek out confirmed five mercs along the railing, shooting down at the other teams. She gestured to her team, assigning them targets, then stepped out, Roger tearing into a krogan on the far right. The merc's shields crashed before he could even get turned around, but in true krogan style, he didn't let that get in the way. Roaring with fury and pain, he spun on Shepard and charged, a pulverizing tornado of armour and bone.

Retreating back through the doorway onto the stairs, Shepard dropped two grenades on the top step before running to the bottom. She kept her thumb on the button to blow them early, but she didn't need to. The krogan eased through the door, wary, his massive head swinging around before he stepped through, shotgun belching ineffectual shots down the stairs at her. The explosion tore him off his feet, shredding his armour and legs. He flew down the first half of the long staircase without touching ground, his long flight ending in an armour splintering crash. Limp but not dead, he slid down the remaining stairs. Shepard halted his descent, jamming a boot against the top of his head.

“If you live, would you return to Tuchanka and rally under the banner of a strong leader?” she asked, her emerald, hawkish stare curious and piercing as she leaned over him, forearm across her knee. “Or would you keep selling your loyalties to this sort of scum?”

His reply came out too garbled to make out the words, but she understood him just the same and straightened, three quick squeezes on Roger's trigger relieving him of any further decision making.

Shepard ran back up the stairs. All but two of the mercs lay sprawled across the prefab flooring, their life running down the rubberized grooves. Those two crouched huddled behind a couple of crates, popping up sporadically to shoot wild rounds that hit nothing. Shepard tossed another grenade, and they popped up one last time.

Scanning the rafters and the tops of the piles of crates, Shepard moved down the long balcony, but nothing moved. She took cover next to the door at the end, her team forming up around her, two keeping an eye on their backs, the others ready to meet any resistance on the other side. On the three count, she palmed the control, and the door slid open. Empty.

“Bit of an anticlimax,” someone grumbled. “I hardly got a shot off.”

Shepard walked to the railing and looked down over the confusing maze of crates, shelves and what looked like mining equipment or building struts. The fighting had moved to the far back corner judging by the noise. She turned and drew a circle in the air to enclose three of her pyjaks. “Keep an eye out from up here. Let me know if you—”

“Hey! Shepard!” Nihlus called from below. “Was that you demolishing the building over our heads?”

She stepped back to the railing and took a deep bow, complete with flourish. “Why yes it was. Thank you very much for noticing my work.”
“Yeah, noticed it when a loose girder nearly took my head off.” He ducked his head and pointed to a small blue river flowing down his neck. Nodding toward a hatch in the roof, he called, “Did you clear the roof, or too busy practicing for your career in demolitions?”

“I was about to clear the roof when you called to complain.” A bright light burst down over her and something hit her from behind, throwing her into the railing. The edge of the low wall slammed into her gut, driving the wind out of her lungs in a belching sort of cough as her attacker’s momentum flipped her over the edge.

Scrambling, the need to avoid falling three storeys foremost in her mind, Shepard caught hold of the railing with one hand. Her team lunged forward, snagging her arm. Her attacker grabbed her legs, his weight crashing down hard enough that her shoulder let out a sinew tearing pop. The moment he gripped her armour, he began to flail, trying to climb her, his legs kicking and forcing her into a partial spin back and forth.

Her pyjaks snatched at her pinwheeling free arm, trying to catch hold, but they just managed to make the situation worse.

“Stop trying to rescue me, and someone shoot him!” she shouted. Two rounds fired, one kicking into the metal about a hand’s width from her backside, the other spraying the merc’s brains up her back. “Lovely. Thank you.” She heaved up, her free hand catching the railing. “Pull me up for pity’s sake.”

“You’re welcome,” Nihlus called from below.

Once her feet were rooted back on deck plating, Shepard looked down. “I wouldn’t have been caught off guard if it weren’t for you.” She rotated her shoulder a few times, then climbed the roof access to find it clear.

“All clear!” Wrex called on their radios. “Shepard to the back room on the main floor.”

“Start moving these crates onto the Normandy,” Shepard called as she strode back toward the stairs. “I want to be on Illium first thing in the morning, so let’s move.”

She found Wrex alone in the back room, standing next to a wall safe. If she didn’t know the battlemaster better, she would have thought him nervous or trepidatious by his posture. She approached. “Hey.” She looked from the safe to the battlemaster and back. “Is it in there?”

Wrex nodded and stepped back. “I tried my way to get it open, Shepard.”

She grinned and nodded. “Understood, sir. My way, it is.” She activated her omnitool and hacked the lock. When it popped open, she ushered him up with a wave of her hand. “It’s all yours, Battlemaster.”

Wrex opened the safe, staring into it for a moment before he reached inside. Shepard tried to see around him, but his massive hump blocked her on every angle. She’d begun to suspect that the safe was empty when he backed up, holding an ancient, battered suit of armour.

“What a piece of shit,” he grunted, the expression on his face one of amused satisfaction. “Oh well, at least it’s back in krogan hands.” He threw it over one arm and turned to look at her. “Thank you, Shepard, not just for my pride, but for that of the krogan.”

She punched his shoulder. “I don’t know what you’re talking about. I just commanded one of your fire teams. Thanks for making us the pyjaks.” She laughed. “The look on Princess Nihlus’s face will keep me going for years, although making Ash the Varren Pup has me thinking you might be “Watch yourself, Shepard.” Wrex gave her a playful shove that just about put her through the wall.

“You watch yourself, old man.” She turned and walked to the door, a great, invisible spider spinning strands of silk, tethering her to each of the amazing people on her crew and filling her with the most remarkable sense of connection. Glancing back when she reached the threshold, she winked and said, “Sweet baby Jesus, at your advanced age . . . a girl like that’ll kill yah.”

His rumbling laugh followed her from the room. “Yeah, but I’ll go smiling.”

Chuckling to herself, Shepard ducked between teams working zero-g dollies to move crates, making her way to the exterior door. Halfway across the main room her inner alarm sunk barbed teeth into the base of her skull, an electric jolt of warning. She stopped, looking up, trying to place what she felt.

There’s more than the Normandy and Mako’s engines running out there.

She nodded to herself. The energy—vibration—in the air felt off.

“Shepard!” Joker called through her radio. “Three geth drop ships coming in from all directions.”

Damn being right! “Get the Normandy in the air, Joker, and see if you can’t take them down.” The subtle sound and vibration in the air grew stronger. “However, if the Reaper is in orbit, go stealth and get the hell out until it leaves.”

“But what about . . . ?” Joker protested.

“We’ll be fine, just keep my ship safe. Shepard out.” She ran for the door. “Fire teams, geth incoming.” Racing out the front door, she saw that most of the portable barricades remained intact. “Get these back up, pull them in close, under the overhang of the second floor.”

She reached up to her radio. “We need a team back in the Mako.” As she spoke, the Normandy thrusters flared to life, lifting the ship off the ridge. Fifty metres up, Joker sent her darting forward, the thunderbird returning to the clouds, where she belonged. Shepard tore her eyes away from her ship’s graceful beauty, spotting a geth ship coming in from the south.

“Prepare yourselves. Come on people, get your asses onto the firing line.” She spotted Ashley. “You’re in command down here, I’m taking Ingrid onto the roof.”

“Yes, ma’am,” the chief called back.

Shepard looked around, searching, hating how naked and exposed her back felt now that they found themselves deep in it. “Where’s C-Sec?”

“Mako!” someone called back.

“Damn. Nihlus! I need another sniper on the roof.” Without waiting for an answer, she ran back inside.

The rachni queen strode toward her, obviously intending to join the others outside.

“Oh no,” Shepard called, throwing up a hand as she ran by. “You stay inside. Singing won’t defend you from the geth.” She spun around just inside the doorway to the main room, running backwards for a few steps. “Stay inside.”
Nihlus caught up with her at the stairs, and they ran side by side up to the roof access. The first geth ship had just settled into position at the ridge, dropping troopers. As it began to pull up, thrusting away from the ground, twin blasts from the Normandy’s weapons tore into it, slicing along the dorsal spine of the ship. It exploded out over the lowlands, pieces raining down onto the grassland beyond the ridge. The ground shook.

“Glory hallelujah, Brother Joker!” Shepard let out a whoop as she pulled Ingrid off her back and sighted the troopers moving in on the barricades. Both sides already traded bullets. She felt the air tremble with another incoming drop ship, but then a lighter vibration hit her—a smaller vehicle. Much smaller.

“Nihlus! Down!” She slammed into him, driving him to the floor a moment too late. A heavy warp field drove her to the floor. It felt like being immersed in a bubble of magnetic water, each molecule of it ripping loose the molecules of her body, tearing them apart. She cried out, agonized and jagged but strangled by the warp.

It dissipated, leaving Shepard gasping and twisted, her cheek pressed to the hot metal of the roof. “And that was just a glancing hit.”

“Nihlus!” Nihlus scrambled up and turned her onto her back, supporting her with his arm. “Are you all right?” He ran a hand over her hair.

Catching movement out of the corner of her eye, Shepard’s heart stopped even as she cried out a warning. A hovercraft zipped toward them, the person aboard riding low, his arm glowing blue and extended toward Nihlus. Even as her brain screamed in denial, that arm snatched Nihlus right off the roof. Shepard leaped up, lunging after them, trying to snag any part of the Spectre’s armour, but too slow. Her fingers slid over the ceramic without catching hold.

“Saren!” Her scream followed them out over the grassland behind the building and away from the fight. For a moment, she stared after them, frozen with disbelief, but then the ice shattered as fury burst through. “God damned sloppy . . .” She spun around, throwing the hatch open with such force that she tore it right off the hinges and flung it across the roof. Jumping down, she grabbed hold of the stair-railing, swinging over and sliding down a couple of feet before letting go and dropping the rest of the way.

She hit the ground running, but didn’t head for the stairs. She threw herself over the low wall, arms and legs pinwheeling as she flew through the air, managing to snag the top of a shelving unit. Momentum slammed her body into the metal, tipping the unit over against the next one. Rolling to the side, she dropped to the floor and raced past the rachni queen to the door.

“You let yourself get caught with your ass hanging out again, Shepard,” she growled, slamming into the door control. “Stupid. Predictable. Idiot.”

Outside, the battle continued, another ship full of troopers and a handful of the huge walking tanks ranged along the ridge and closing. She stuck to the front of the building, ducking behind her team until she made it to the corner and dug in, sprinting down the shadowed side of the base. She just prayed she got there in time to put a good dozen bullets into Saren before he got a chance to put any in Nihlus.

“Shepard!” She cleared the building and brought Ingrid to bear.

The two Spectres faced off a good fifty metres away. Saren faced Shepard, but he ignored her completely, all his attention riveted on his ex-protege. With the fight raging behind her, she couldn’t make out anything they said. For the second time, she stood, staring at the mentor and apprentice, hesitating, not sure whether to fire and just take the bastard down, or to leave it until Nihlus either requested help or showed signs of needing it. The last time, she’d saved Nihlus only by the narrowest of margins. Fortune might not favour her another time.

“Damn it,” she grumbled, moving forward steadily, not letting her crosshairs move off Saren’s head. A few squeezes of the trigger and their problems would be . . . she grumbled again. Their problems wouldn’t be over. Saren wasn’t the big problem. Sovereign was. Heart beating hard and fast, her hands and knees beginning to tremble ever so slightly as the adrenaline wore off, she began her warrior breathing in time with her steps. In, two, three, four, five. Out, two, three, four, five. The trembling eased as oxygen flooded her system.

“You were nothing but an angry malcontent on the brink of washing out of the military when I found you. I gave you pride, a way to serve and rise above all your mother’s grasping ambitions. I created you! How can you turn your back on me now?” she heard Saren call out. “Come with me, Nihlus. You can survive the coming armageddon.”

She smiled, hard and cold, as Nihlus replied, “I created who I am, Saren. You aren’t even who I thought you were. What sort of coward agrees to sacrifice innocents to save himself?”

Awe tingled down her spine and out to her limbs. “Glory hallelujah. Preach it, Brother Nihlus,” she whispered, overlapping Saren’s next words.

“To save our people! Are the humans and volus so dear to you that you would watch the turian people vanish beside them?” Saren threw his arms out toward the battle. “Sovereign speaks for the Reapers. If we make ourselves useful to them, we can be spared.” He took a step toward Nihlus. “Thousands of cycles of evolution, of civilization, glorious battles, miracles of art and science . . . the great stories, Nihlus. The ones our fathers raised us on. All of it will vanish in a heartbeat.”

Saren held up his arms as if he could embrace the entire galaxy. “What is left of the Protheans, Nihlus? The Reapers all but obliterated them from galactic memory. Would you consign us to that fate?”

Shepard frowned and stopped inching forward, although her sight never wavered from his brow. Yes, she knew indoctrination ate at his will and reason, replacing it with Sovereign’s, but the passion and the sincerity in his voice . . . For the first time since Eden Prime, a rusted iron sliver of doubt worked its way into her guts. What if they couldn’t prepare for the Reapers? What if Saren and the council had the right of it? Wasn’t it better to save some rather than none?

“Our people are about honour, Saren,” Nihlus practically screamed back. “Honour above all. That is what becoming a Spectre meant to me. I would see our people pass honourably into oblivion rather than sell their souls to become slaves to those monsters.” He pulled his rifle off his back, taking a step to close the distance between them again. “I’ll fight them alongside Shepard, and we’ll defeat them, Saren. We will defeat them. Save yourself. Save your honour and your spirit.” He held out a hand. “Break free of that thing’s hold on you.”

Saren backed onto the hoverboard, his posture slumped, but as Shepard watched, something moved within the Spectre . . . not anything willing to show itself, but revealing itself just the same through his expression and bearing. Shepard started forward again, lifting into a jog.

“A long time ago, I told you the terrible secret about your father’s death,” Saren yelled, the hoverboard thrusters firing, lifting him into the air. Shepard squeezed off a shot, but Saren’s shields deflected it. His face twisted into a gruesome expression of cruel satisfaction. “Today, I’ll tell you the even more horrible secret of your mother’s death.”
Shepard fired again and again, switching to Roger as she got closer, needing to tear down Saren’s massive barriers before he tore her partner down. Nihlus opened fire as well, but without her conviction. Heart sinking with every centimetre Saren opened between them, Shepard squeezed the trigger. One, two, three. Pause. One, two, three. Pause. Roger chattered his mechanical rhythm, almost loud enough to drown out Saren. Almost.

“Your mother wasn’t the one who killed your father. It was a mining accident.” Saren sailed up into the air as Nihlus froze mid step, like a badly balanced statue. “I just needed to cut the cord that tied you to that bitch.” After staring at Nihlus for another moment, Saren looked over to Shepard. “But I see you’ve just gone and roped yourself to another one.”

A gloating grin transformed his face into something so hideous that Shepard started to look away. But then the Spectre’s hands ignited with a halo of blue energy that built until it enveloped his entire body.

“I wonder what it will take for me to get you to kill this one?” he asked, his words fruit dropping off a dead tree, bitter and rotten, oozing venom. He unleashed a warp at the still-paralyzed Nihlus then soared off.

The world slowed to a crawl as Shepard bolted forward, her finger locking down on her trigger until her gun overheated, burning the side of her cheek. She flung the rifle to the ground as Nihlus contorted, a tortured scream roaring from both larynxes as the warp twisted and wrenched his body from the inside out.

“No! No, no, no, no. Nihlus, don’t you dare let Saren do this to you. You let him kill you, and I swear by the holy light that I’ll kick your ass from here to Tuesday.” Shepard slammed into the ground, breathless, knee-guards carving furrows through the rich, loamy earth. She hovered over him, hands fluttering helplessly, praying that the warp died before Nihlus did.

Finally, the warp dissipated, and she pulled Nihlus across her lap, turning him over with a strength born of panic and horror. He looked conscious. Frantic hands searched him for wounds, but found nothing.

The Mako rumbled up behind her, its engines shaking the ground. The back hatch squeaked open. “Shepard?” Garrus started to get out, but she waved him back.

“I’m fine. Go help the others finish off the geth,” she shouted, the battle and wind snatching at her words, stringing them out over the grassland.

“Are you—” He asked, hesitating, but not obeying.

“Go! Help the others.” An impatient hand flicked his direction, then took hold of Nihlus again. “Nihlus, come on big guy, holding your prone bod is getting old. I’ve done this way too damned much for being partnered with the best Spectre in the galaxy.” He appeared conscious, his eyes open, but the look in them bore into her, frozen termites spreading a deathly chill as they ate the heart out of her. “What happened?” She shook him gently. “Come on, talk to me.”

Nihlus stirred slightly, but didn’t try to sit up or pull out of her arms. “It was a lie. All these years . . .” He turned his face into her breast, his eyes closing. His voice came out rough, his subvocals practically roaring with a fury that made her hair stand on end. “Can you hate someone enough to kill them?”

She chuckled, warm and soft, and lowered her brow to the top of his head, her heart hammering in relieved fury. “You mean without the aid of a bullet?” He nodded, and she sighed. “Udina’s persistence in drawing breath says no, but I live on hope.” She pulled back. “So, you’re intact. No large holes spilling litres of Nihlus blood onto the ground?”

“Yes.” He took a long, slow breath and wrapped an arm around her for a second before pulling away and sitting up. “The blade Saren used doesn’t leave wounds you can see.” Still clouded, but clearing, his eyes looked toward the skirmish. “We got too predictable.” He cursed and levered himself up off the grass. Stretching he cracked most of his joints. After adjusting his armour, he reached out to help her up.

She nodded and took his hand. “Yeah, we got stupid. Forgot that we might not be the only ones on the hunt.” Standing, she dusted herself off. “That was the strongest warp I’ve ever seen,” Shepard said. “Are you sure you’re okay? I swear I heard your atoms coming apart.” When he tried to walk away without answering, she stepped in front of him and gripped his forearms. “Nihlus . . ..” She waited until he met her eyes before continuing. “Come on, Spectre. Talk to me.” Staring into the shuttered green eyes felt like looking at a mirror or running into a forcefield.

He took her hands and squeezed her fingers. “I’m okay, Shepard. He won’t blindside me again. Twice is more than enough. Give me some time to ignore what happened and then stew over it, then I’ll talk about it.”

Shepard nodded, but then stepped into him, wrapping one arm around him in an attempt at a battlefield acceptable hug. “Saren stepped way out of bounds, Nihlus. He was trying to take the heart out of you.”

He bent down, quickly touching his forehead to hers before striding off to join the fight. She watched him walk away, then sighed and jogged over to pick Roger up off the ground. “Come on, old man. You know, things were a lot simpler when you were the only man in my life. I kept you clean and oiled, you shot bullets into the people trying to kill me. It worked. Why did I have to go and start getting all quivery kneeed over not one—oh no, that would be too easy—but two turians? Turians! I’m insane.”

Geth chassis lay strewn, broken and smoking, across the grassy incline to the ridge of rock by the time Shepard got back around to the front of the building. Still, the team hunkered down, pinned behind cover, two of them down with injuries but alive. Five colossi closed on them from the ridge separating the base from the open grassland beyond.

Shepard started to pull together a plan. The team already concentrated fire on the closest, the Mako haranguing the other two with canon and turret fire, but five at once presented too much armour and firepower for small arms. They needed a plan and fast. She threw herself down as a ball of plasma streaked toward her head. Cursing, she slid in behind one of the barricades, the stink of burning hair telling her how close the shot came.

The Mako roared past, heading straight for the first colossus.

“Who’s driving that thing?” she asked, spotting Alenko hunkered down behind the next cover.

“Wrex,” Ashley called. “You been giving him lessons, Captain?”

Shepard just let out a grumbled curse, watching as the krogan made a suicidal charge, taking at least one out of every five plasma bursts from the giant geth tanks. Strong shields protected the Mako, but they couldn’t last forever against the that sort of pounding. At the last second, Wrex turned, circling around, pulling the geth fire away from the team. Shepard traded Roger for Ingrid and lined up the first colossus in her sights, firing as continually as the old girl’s cool down allowed.
“He’s trying to pull them out into the low spot,” she called on the radio. “Keep up the fire on their back side. Take advantage of the distraction.” As she watched the APC’s tires spinning, tearing up the loose sod as it turned to race back, she knew what Wrex had planned. She just hoped his theory proved correct.

Time after time, the krogan drove the Mako in a rush toward the colossi, keeping them chasing him, ducking back and forth, their attention concentrated on trying to hit the erratic machine. Gradually, he got them moved out far enough that Shepard began to hold her breath as the Mako swept out away from the ridge, praying that Wrex didn’t get caught in his own trap.

Strung out in a staggered line—the closest a good ten metres on the other side of the ridge, the furthest a hundred metres out—the colossi didn’t stand a chance when the ground began to tremble, then rock. The first disappeared as the earth erupted in a plume of soil and a nightmare of tentacles. Forsaking the vexingly hard to hit Mako for the thresher, the colossi scrambled to avoid the blasts of acid that tore straight through their shields to reduce their chassis into melted slag. The battle didn’t even last a full minute, the grassland falling silent as Wrex brought the Mako down the ridge, the vehicle smoking and sparking, but still intact.

The vehicle stopped a couple metres ahead of the barricades, the metal clicking and banging as it cooled. The team began to stand, helping each other to their feet, supporting the wounded. Shepard stepped around her cover and stood, hip cocked, arms crossed, waiting.

Ten seconds later, the back hatch of the APC opened, a visibly shaken but jubilant Garrus hopping out. Wrex followed a second later, a wide grin showing his massive, slate-like teeth.

“You look pretty proud of yourself,” Shepard deadpanned. “Can you explain the state of my Mako?”

Wrex glanced back and shrugged. “Thought the day would be a complete loss until that last bit. Then it got fun.”

Shepard laughed and straightened. “Nice work, battlemaster. Nice work.” She lifted her hand to her ear. “Joker, you have things cleaned up?”

“Yes, ma’am. Took out one more, the last one just took off . . . made it through the relay. We’re on our way back to pick you up now.”

“Excellent.” The captain’s grin widened as she looked up to see her ship swooping down out of the black. “And I even get to watch her land. Praise the great glowing asses of the Enkindlers.”
Onward to Illium

“We’re wrapped up here, Captain,” Kaidan called, striding to the top of the ramp, staring down at her.

Shepard grinned and popped the last bite of her peanut butter sandwich into her mouth. She hopped down off the crate she’d been using as her seat, working the peanut butter off the roof of her mouth before replying, “No you aren’t, Sparky.” She thumped the crate with her palm and strode up the ramp, leaning into the incline. “Forgot one.” As she climbed, she scanned through the notes she’d made on the datapad while she waited for the loading to finish.

Once aboard, she looked up, searching for Wrex. She found him over in his corner, pulling krogan artifacts out of a crate, spinning tales about some of the pieces for an enraptured audience of crew members. Her smile warmed, the threads of connection glowing bright and strong between them. “Webs,” she whispered to herself. “It’s all webs. Some light and woven, some dark and tangled, but all webs just the same.” Shepard shook her head as Wrex held up a dagger made out of a massive tooth, roaring as he enacted the titanic struggle to defeat what she thought might be a thresher maw.

“Hey, Battlemaster!” she called, brash and teasing as she swaggered up behind his audience. She stopped, hip cocked, arms crossed, the datapad held up where Wrex could see it. “Your crazy maneuver with the Mako today planted a crazy idea inside my head.” She gave the pad a jaunty little wave, then tossed it to Wrex and turned, striding for the elevator. “Think the krogan could find a way to collect and weaponize thresher acid?” she hollered over her shoulder.

She was still waiting for the lift when he roared, “Shepard! You’ve got to be mad. This . . .” He held the datapad over his head, looking as though he might chuck it at her. “. . . is the craziest idea I’ve ever heard.”

Grinning, she glanced back and nodded. “All the best ideas are completely mad. Think about it.”

When she reached the crew deck, she headed for medbay. Grieco, Pakti, and Berrett had all been injured during the geth attack. “Hey, Doc,” she called, walking in the door. “How are my people?”

“These three will all be fine in a couple of days, Shepard. The ones I’m concerned about are the two dozen who thought somehow I’d miss the long line of people sneaking in to raid the medi-gel dispenser.” Chakwas sighed and strode over to scan Shepard. “How about you? Everything all right?” The doctor hummed with enough disapproval and dry humour to assure Shepard that she already knew the answer to that question. “Take a seat for a second.”

Shepard did as she was told. “I’m fine, Doc. No issues at all today.”

“You mean other than being hit by a very strong warp field?” The doctor keyed in information then scanned again.

“Am I coming apart at the atoms?” Shepard chuckled.
“No, but your body’s electrical field is showing signs of severe disruption.” She stepped away to prepare a syringe. “It should sort itself with some sleep and a neuro-chemical stabilizer.”

“In that case, I’ll make sure that Nihlus checks in with you. I just took a glancing blow; he took one full force.” She shuddered remembering the horrible sensation of being pulled apart from the inside out. Nausea followed hot on the memory’s heels. Jolts of imagined, electric agony seared down her limbs as she put herself in Nihlus’s shoes for those moments. He’d screamed like Saren’s warp was ripping his soul apart rather than his cells. That thought made her heartsick in a way she hadn’t felt in a long time . . . or maybe a way she always felt.

Automatically, she tilted her head off to the side as the doctor moved in with her injection, but her mind remained fixed on Nihlus. Truly, over the weeks since they met, the Spectre had lived in a state of constant torture. The way he’d cried out in that warp field had spoken to the betrayal, not just of a friend and mentor but of his entire life. He’d told her weeks before that he lived for the work, not taking time for the indulgence of relationships. Then, when Saren claimed to have created Nihlus, the Spectre lashed back, saying he created himself through being a Spectre.

Shepard heard the doc talking to her and looked up, dragging herself out of her thoughts. Murmuring a noncommittal positive toned response, she smiled. “Thanks, Doc. I’ll see you bright and early for our usual appointment.” Without waiting for an answer, she raised her hand to her ear and opened a channel.

“Hey, Nihlus, get your butt to medbay.” Shepard grinned as a rumbling groan vibrated through her ear. “She promises not to hold you prisoner, but you need to make sure that warp didn’t pull apart any cells you actually need. You know, pretty much any cell except brain cells. We know those all turned moron the second you came aboard.” A melodramatic gasp followed his very colourful reply. “Sweet baby Jesus, Kryik, watch your language. Get down here, and then get some rest. That’s an order.” She hung up without giving him any time to argue.

The rest of his life might have betrayed him, but her cause, her crew . . . she wouldn’t.

After a few minutes spent chatting with her injured crew members, Shepard headed for her quarters. On her way across the mess, she typed out a message to the team going ashore on Illium. After Saren’s little surprise on Tantau, she decided to add Alenko to the roster. A big team might attract more attention, but if Saren knew about Aethyta, and she’d bet the Father of Light’s diamond tentacle rings that he did, she wanted the extra gun.

Sending the message, she sighed. “Okay, shower and then the intel on Illium.”

She’d just returned from the shower when someone knocked at her door. Leaving the towel draped over her head, she grinned and called out, “Yes?”

“It’s Liara, may I speak with you for a moment, Captain?” a soft voice replied from the other side.

“Of course, come on in.” Shepard stood and dragged the towel off. She’d expected her turian babysitter. Liara had never made any attempt to speak to her outside of missions or briefings. Granted, thanks to ‘Embracing Eternity’ with Liara’s help, she wasn’t all that eager to spend time in the same space. Liara had been given access to the vault of terrible unmentionables. No one ever got access. Ever. For good reason.

The door opened, and Liara stepped through, giving Shepard a shy smile and slight nod. “Thank you for seeing me, Captain. It sounds like it turned into quite the fight down there.”

Shepard smiled and gestured toward the table. “It was. Please sit. What can I help you with?” Once Liara perched on the edge of one of the chairs, Shepard sat.

The researcher leaned forward against the table, wringing her hands a little. “I guess I’m just feeling a little overwhelmed by everything. A few weeks ago, I expected to go from dig to dig in relative obscurity, struggling to find something my colleagues would call credible evidence of my theories. I thought my mother would live another two hundred cycles or so . . . plenty of time to reconcile.” She slumped back in the chair, her hands folded primly in her lap.

Shepard nodded, ignoring the whispers from the past that leaked through.

Focus on Liara’s mother, dammit, not your own.

“Benezia also regretted not getting that chance.”

“I’m one hundred and six, Shepard. My people consider me little more than a child, and now . . .” A long, tremulous sigh whispered through her lips. “My mother wants me to manage her estate, run her businesses . . . take her place.” She shook her head, then shifted in her seat, her hands hovering between her lap and the table as if even that decision proved too great.

“What usually happens in situations like this?” Shepard asked. Her knowledge of asari customs amounted to just slightly more than nil.

“It depends, of course, on the age of the child. In a case like mine, one of my family would hold the legacy in trust until they deemed me of age. However, Mother already made arrangements with my aunt to assist me in administering the estate so I could inherit now.” She laughed, but it came out incredulous and almost bitter. “My mother took fewer than half her acolytes when she joined Saren. My aunt says the rest have already sworn themselves to me in obedience to my mother’s wishes.” Her hands gave a helpless little flip in her lap. “What do I know about leading acolytes? What do I have to teach them? What do I know about doing any of the things my mother wants me to do? I’m an one hundred and six year old researcher. I’ve spent my life alone, crawling through ruins.”

Shepard said nothing for a long moment before she leaned forward on the table top, elbows braced, fingers steepled against her lips. “Your mother possessed a lot of resources to throw behind discovering what happened to the Protheans.” She shrugged. “We’ve discovered how important your research is, Liara. You don’t have to prove anything to anyone now. The proof is riding in on us hard and fast.” She let her arms drop, folding a little as they settled to the cool polymer, and met Liara’s eyes with a fierce, resolute stare. “What you need to do now is fill in the blanks. We need to know exactly what happened to the Prothean Empire, and of all the people I know, you are the best candidate for that job.”

Liara straightened a little. “I have found several references, even in my mother’s least encrypted files, that lead me to believe there may be one or more major sources of prothean data and technology on Thessia.” She smiled, this time a spark of excitement glinting in her eyes. “I’ve also found highly encrypted partitions in her computer files.”

“That sounds like a good start.” Shepard turned in her chair a little and leaned back, crossing her legs. “What do you know about Aethyta?”

“Very little.” Liara shrugged. “I spoke to her yesterday. She already knew of Mother’s death. She’s a matriarch, but she’s a bartender at a bar called Eternity. I have never met her before, but if Mother trusted her with her legacy, she must have been someone of importance to her.”

Shepard smiled. “Yeah, it’s not the sort of thing you ask of some bartender at a watering hole several systems away. Well, I guess at least some of your questions will find answers in a few hours. You should get some sleep.” When Liara didn’t move, Shepard leaned forward, laying a hand over one of Liara’s. “Where you go from here is your decision, Liara. You have a place on the Normandy for as long as I command her. If you decide to accept the charge your mother left, you can do so from here if that’s feasible. And if you choose to leave us, you can always come back. Consider the Normandy your home until you find somewhere else you want to be, okay?”

The asari turned her hand over and squeezed Shepard’s fingers. “Thank you.” She smiled a little less tremulously than before. “Knowing that I can come back helps.” Standing, she pulled her hand away. “Good night, Captain.”

Shepard stood and followed Liara to the door. It opened to reveal Rael’Zorah pacing outside. “Blessed Enkindlers, haven’t I been threaded through enough needles today?” She closed her eyes, letting out a long, grumbling breath to vent the steam before stepping into the fire. After a moment, she plastered a vague smile on her lips, squared her shoulders until her spine cracked, and stepped through the doorway. “Admiral, what can I do for you?”

The small male stopped pacing and spun to face her. “My people report that twenty six more of our pilgrims and . . . other quarians have gone missing.” Angled toward her and holding himself puffed out like an angry cat, he stormed up to her, the reflective silver of his eyes flashing like tiny bolts of lightning as he blinked. “What you can do for me is either tell me how you intend to help me get our youth back, or let me go about finding a way to do it on my own.” He leaned closer. “You have no authority to hold me prisoner on your vessel.”

Shepard leaned back on her hip and crossed her arms. “Admiral, unfortunate things happen to people who crowd my space. Back up a bit and calm yourself.” She stared at him until he drew his leading foot back, slowly and reluctantly enough that she needed to bite back a smartass grin. Ah, the back-breaking combination of good ol’ military ego and bullheadedness.

“Thank you. Now, in just over two days we have to disable a VI on Luna that has killed a couple platoons of soldiers. The very next thing is heading for Virmire to get your people back.” She straightened. “I am only human, so once I have the very tricky and complicated assault on our lunar base planned and executed, I’ll call you, Tali, Legion, and everyone else involved into a planning meeting for the assault on Saren’s base.”

Despite giving her the extra space, Rael’Zorah’s words lashed out, biting all the deeper. “How will we assault Saren’s headquarters without council backing? You will make the quarian people terrorists as well as outcasts.”

Shepard shook her head then glanced up as Garrus walked around the elevator. “I’ll deal with all of that when I’ve successfully brought all my people back from Luna alive.” She stared him down. “You’re not a prisoner, Rael’Zorah. You’re a guest.” She let out a long breath and leaned against the wall. “You know, in certain ancient, Middle Eastern cultures on Earth, it was one’s obligation to accept a guest in need of aid or a place to stay. It was a grave dishonour to refuse. However, a guest also had obligations to his host . . . to abide by the rules of the household . . . be considerate to others . . . that sort of thing. On this ship, your obligations are to help out as much as you can to offset your burden on my crew and resources, and allow me to do my job.”

She turned away, walking back over the threshold into her quarters. “You are one piece of a very large puzzle, Admiral,” she said, turning to look back. “One piece, each dealt with in its time. Goodnight. Rest well.” She let the door close, leaving it to Garrus to enter when he felt comfortable. Probably after Rael’Zorah cleared out.

She sat back at her computer and brought up Benezia’s files from the OSD. The evidence the matriarch collected against the council and Saren amounted to nothing less than damning. “You three are slimy bastards. The Father of Light could learn some lessons on screwing people over from you.” She sighed, read a few more entries and another, longer sigh chased after the first. “Problem is, I can’t use any of it. I have to let you pieces of worm-ridden filth get away with it. At least for now.”

The door opened. “You’ll need to play your cards a lot closer to your chest than that,” Garrus said. Light steps crossed the decking, telling her that he’d already changed out of his armour. “If you’re going to discuss things like the council’s guilt with yourself, you’re going to need to lower your voice.” Large warm hands covered her shoulders, his thumbs massaging the knots in her levator scapulae. “This ship has thin bulkheads.”

“I can’t help it. They piss me off.” She leaned back into the painful relief and closed her eyes. “If I use any of this, I get everyone I know killed.” Tilting her head back, she opened her eyes to look up at him. “I’ve got to go to the council about Virmire. Rael’Zorah is right. If we just attack it, we’ll be branded terrorists, the quarians will as well, the geth will still be public enemy number one, and it might even backlash on the Alliance.”

He reached over her shoulder and turned off her display, then stepped to her side and held out his hands. Smiling, she took them, allowing him to pull her out of the chair and over to the bed. “You are,” he said, sitting down on the edge, tugging her into a gentle embrace, “the single most clever person I’ve ever met. You’ll find a way.”

She sat on his thigh and looped an arm around his neck, nestling into his solid warmth. Brow resting against his jaw, she said, “Even if I just go to them with what I know about Saren, they’re going to extrapolate that I know about their involvement as well. That’ll paint a bullseye on me and on Nihlus . . . possibly the entire crew. That isn’t acceptable.” She laced the fingers of her left hand with his. “I don’t know what to do.”

He tightened his arm around her. “We’ll figure it out. We have a few days and a lot to do before we need to worry on that.” He nuzzled his face in against her neck, his breath soft and warm as it brushed her skin. “Like, where do you want me tomorrow on Illium?”

She smiled, grateful as he diverted her thoughts from their path down the wormhole of self-doubt. “You and Sparky can go in ahead so that you can use your superpowers of perception on the place, see if anything feels off. Then head for the bar and relax, get something innocuous to drink, and keep an eye on our backs.”

“What about your backs on the way in? If Saren’s going to ambush you, he probably won’t choose the bar.” His head turned, his tongue tickling the soft skin under her ear. She brushed her lips over the plate above his right eye. “Anyway, Brother Distraction . . . Wrex and Nihlus will follow us in. Breaking him and myself up should throw a little confusion into an ambush. Ashley, Shiala, Tali, Liara and I will go in together. Five ladies out for a drink won’t draw any attention.”

He nodded and pulled back. “Sound solid. If it were anywhere but Illium, especially Nos Astra, I’d suggest having Legion and Tali hack into the surveillance network, but that place is even more paranoid than Noveria.” Clearing his throat, making it plain that he planned to change the subject, he asked, “Have you eaten?”

“Yeah, had a couple of peanut butter sandwiches while the crew was loading up.” She stood, extricating herself from his arms to pull back the blankets. “I got an idea today when I saw the Thresher acid go straight through the shields on those colossi.”
Garrus chuckled and stood. “Wrex showed me. Missiles filled with thresher acid that detonate right before impacting a ship’s shields.”

She looked over, studying his face to see what he thought of her idea, the pulse high in her throat hammering against the skin, hopeful but afraid he’d think it too crazy. When she saw no sign of ridicule in his expression, she sat on the side of the bed, dimming the light.

He shook his head. “If they can find a way to harvest the acid and then stabilize it inside a missile casing, I think the idea is brilliant. No way to tell if it will work against a Reaper, but still brilliant.” He lay down on his side of the bed, propping himself up on his elbow to watch her. Those ice-blue eyes held an intensity and heat that set a pack of feral butterflies loose in her stomach. “Yes, you’re the most intelligent person I’ve met, but you’re also the most creative. It’s incredibly sexy.” His easy grin transformed the butterflies’ virulent fluttering into a pulsing warmth that made her heart race from equal parts terror and want. “The Reapers had better watch themselves.”

Shepard rolled over and leaned up to kiss him, her lips just grazing his mouth. He pressed into it, his hand lifting to cradle her jaw as the kiss deepened. She relaxed into him, their mouths speaking far more eloquently without words. After what felt like an impossibly long instant, she pulled away. “We’ll never get any sleep if we keep that up.” She lay down on her side, facing him.

Garrus settled in and pulled the blankets up over his shoulder. After a couple of moments, he stopped fussing and let out a long breath. “So, what happened with you, Saren, and Nihlus?” he asked. “If it’s okay for me to ask.”

Shepard shook her head. “You can ask, but I don’t know what happened, exactly.” Her fingers played over the small, rough patches of hide behind his jaw as she ran through what happened on Tuntau. “It sounded as though Saren told Nihlus a really huge lie a long time ago . . . something that amounts to the deepest cut . . . the most unforgivable breach of trust. I tried to get Nihlus to talk, but geth were still attacking, and that warp had just about disassembled him. Not a good combination for a heart to heart.”

After a few breaths, she traced gentle fingertips along the lines of his face. “I’ll get it out of him eventually.” She grinned and ran her lower lip between her teeth as her touch provoked a gentle, rumbling purr deep in his throat. “Goodnight, Garrus.”

* * * *

“Wow, and I thought the music other places was bad.” Shepard winced at the uneven bass cadence falling out the club doors to flop around on the floor like a . . . well, like a bass. She chuckled to herself, drawing a curious stare from Liara that she answered with a sheepish sort of grin before deflecting with, “My theory is that it’s all part of a sinister plot by the Enkindlers to turn us into mindless slaves in preparation for their return. The Father of Light is behind it all.”

Liara rolled her eyes. “Enkindlers, my backside. The Father of Light is the king of crazy-jelly-land, and you . . .” She stared into Shepard’s eyes, a sparkle flashing through her gaze as she locked her lips down tight on a smile. “. . . are the queen.”

Shiala gasped. “Heresy, Sisters Liara and Shepard.” She aped a convincing swoon, stumbling into the wall.
Ashley laughed, jogging past them up the stairs two at a time. “Try living with three sisters who love this techno crap. Then add Dad and his ancient cowboy music.” The chief shuddered, but she smiled. “I wore headphones a lot.”

Shepard grinned, reveling in the unexpected camaraderie, yet again. “Well, at least it isn’t turned up loud enough to make my teeth vibrate, glory hallelujah. Praise the Enkindlers’ great shiny butt cheeks.” Shepard palmed the door and stepped through, not missing that Liara lagged behind as the rest of them crossed the threshold.

The asari researcher took a deep breath then stepped through. “How disappointed are you going to be when my research proves that Protheans had neither shiny nor glowing backsides?” A smile returned to her lips, but it cost her an obvious premium.

Shepard took in the bar in one quick sweep, then wrapped a companionable arm around Liara’s shoulders. “Devastated, Sister Liara. Just devastated.” She spotted Garrus and Kaidan at the far end, conversing with one of the two bartenders, a turian. “Let’s hit the bar, ladies,” she called, guiding them toward the other bartender, an asari. “We deserve a drink.”

Shepard guided Liara toward the bar. Thin, trembling, the asari felt like a frightened child looking for shelter. Shepard knew that feeling all too well. She pulled Liara in tight against her side, and looked up at the bartender. She hoped that Aethyta turned out to be someone who could truly help Liara come to terms with her mother’s death and everything it meant. A warm smile crept up on her as she remembered the dark shadow crossing her hospital room door, the constant line of dealers refusing to sell her 17-year-old self drugs. Anderson. Hopefully Aethyta could step up and be Liara’s Anderson before the young asari got a chance to lose her way.

“Welcome to Eternity, ladies. I’m Aethyta,” the asari said, her voice warm and husky, “matriarch and bartender.” She radiated a quiet authority and yet kindness, one of those people able to instantly set people at ease. “Let me know if there’s anything I can get you.”

“You ladies here on leave?” the bartender asked, pouring out four drinks.

Shepard shook her head, holding the matriarch’s gaze, judging the reactions she saw there as she said, “No. Just stopping by to pay our respects to our friend’s mother.” Understanding and a deep kindness blossomed in the brown eyes that met Shepard’s. Something else appeared there, but Aethyta shuttered it away before Shepard got more than a glimpse. It felt like some sort of tie, and a strong one.

The captain looked to Liara. “A drink to Benezia?” When Liara nodded, Shepard lifted her glass and stepped back so Shiala, Tali, and Ashley could join them. “To a brave lady who fought like hell for peace and to steer the galaxy out of harm’s way. I knew her ten minutes, and she awed me. Rest in peace, Benezia.”

Liara stepped closer into the circle, her back straightening as her glass raised. “To a mother who understood me far better than I ever gave her credit for, and who loved me enough to let me find my own way. I never realized how hard it must have been to just step back and trust that I’d come home one day until it occurred to me that now, when I do, she won’t be there.” Her lips worked for a moment, her eyes going a stormy blue as tears misted along the rim of her eyelids. “Goodbye, Mother, I’ll miss you.”

They touched glasses, then tossed back their drinks. Shepard gave Liara a one-armed hug. “All right, let’s go find somewhere to sit.” When she glanced back at the bartender, she saw Aethyta watching Liara with an intensity that set off her internal alarm. It died a half second later when she realized that the expression on the matriarch’s face wavered back and forth between wonder and fear.

Aethyta shook herself, just a slight vibration that Shepard watched slither down the asari’s spine. It lasted a fraction of a second before more than seven hundred years of living won out over the doubt. The matriarch recouped almost instantly, covering the reaction as she pointed toward a doorway on the far wall. “There’s no one in the back room right now. Go ahead, I’ll bring your next round and put up the ‘occupied’ barricade.”

“Thank you, that’s very kind. We’ll do that.” Shepard turned toward Garrus and Kaidan who stood at the far end of the bar, their backs to the wall. A quick wink acknowledged them and then she moved on, herding her ducklings through the thin, late morning crowd.

Nihlus and Wrex walked in as the five ladies crossed the bar. The Spectre said something to Wrex, and they parted ways, Wrex heading over to join Garrus and Kaidan while Nihlus followed Shepard’s party into the back room. Shepard figured that he intended to join them, but when they sat at a long, oblong table, the Spectre took a seat at a smaller table off in a corner.

Shepard sat next to Liara and gave the maiden’s shoulder a gentle squeeze. “That was really beautiful, Liara.”

The asari glanced behind her at Nihlus, shifted in her seat, then focused back on Shepard, her spine and shoulders stiff. “Aethyta seems nice,” she said, shrugging, her shoulders jerky and awkward. Glancing back toward the door, then Nihlus, Liara adjusted herself in the chair again. It was like watching someone try to get comfortable sitting on a handful of tacks.

“She does.” A quick smile and secretive duck of Shepard’s head accompanied a whispered, “Aethyta seems as nervous to meet you as you are her.” Looking up at the other end of the table, Shepard chuckled at Ashley and Tali, trying to look completely absorbed in a discussion about flexible straws. “Wow. Remind me not to assign them to covert missions. They’re both as subtle as an elcor pole dancer.”

Liara frowned, the delicate markings on her brow pulling together. “Do you really think so?”

Shepard nodded. “Yeah, elcor pole dancers are terrible.” She laughed and reached out to squeeze Liara’s shoulder as the asari shot a glare at her. “Yes,” she said, “I know you meant Aethyta, and yes, she seems nervous. She’s keeping her emotions carefully masked.”

Liara let out a musical, quizzical hum. “I wonder why?” Another glance shot over her shoulder toward Nihlus, and she shifted again.

“I guess we’ll find out in a few minutes,” Shepard replied. She turned in her chair, levelling Nihlus with a wide-eyed glare, then jerked her head toward the chair next to her. If he stayed there, Liara would never settle. He frowned and looked confused, eliciting a grumble and a more emphatic gesture for him to join them. Finally, just as Aethyta placed their drinks on the table, he moved up closer.

“What?” he whispered into her ear.
“You were making Liara even more twitchy. It was like you were some sort of government examiner or something. Sitting in the back of the classroom placing judgement on the rest of us.”
She chuckled at that, despite the truth of it. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand.

“Well, I was judging you,” Nihlus whispered in her ear. “Not Liara, or the others, just you.”

“Well, I was judging you,” Nihlus whispered in her ear. “Not Liara, or the others, just you.”

“She chuckled at that, despite the truth of it. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand.

“Well, I was judging you,” Nihlus whispered in her ear. “Not Liara, or the others, just you.”

“She chuckled at that, despite the truth of it. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the
table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand.

“Well, I was judging you,” Nihlus whispered in her ear. “Not Liara, or the others, just you.”

“She chuckled at that, despite the truth of it. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the
table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand. Then Aethyta closed the room and approached the table, drawing Shepard’s attention back to the matter at hand.
forearm, a silent encouragement to stay calm and listen. Liara cleared her throat, sinking back down onto the seat of her chair, and Shepard withdrew.

Aethyta’s mask slipped a touch. “As I said, Benezia didn’t trust your aunt to resist all the political pressure.” Aethyta laughed, brittle and sharp, sparks crackling along a wire. “She knew that I left Thessia because I got sick of getting the blue laughed off my ass for making practical, intelligent arguments for asari advancement.” A slight shrug tugged at her shoulders. “But she also knew that I’ve never backed away from a fight that needed fighting.”

Liara’s brow furrowed and her hands tucked under her thighs as she adjusted herself in the chair. They sprang back into position, fingers laced, as the archeologist shook her head. “No, I mean, who were you to Benezia? Why would she ask you to do this?”

The hair on the back of Shepard’s neck stood up as the biotic field kept building around Liara. Her hand drifted back toward Liara’s arm, but hesitated, unsure if it would calm Liara down or force them all to flee as the warps and singularities began to fly.

Aethyta smiled and the mask fell away. Leaning forward, she placed one hand on the table, extended toward Liara but not touching her. “Look babe, it’s not like she had a lot of choices. The matriarchs were nervous about her joining Saren, and they’re even more nervous about you joining up with your pretty little friend over there.” She nodded toward Shepard. “I know Benezia suspected the council of working with Saren. I don’t know the details, I didn’t look, which is part of the reason she asked me. She knew I wouldn’t.”

The tempest settled around Liara, the blue aura glowing around Liara bright enough that Shepard eyed the door. Neither asari appeared to notice. “That’s a lot of trust for some bartender she barely knew.” She jumped up, her hands slamming down on the table with enough physical and biotic force that it jumped a hand’s width into the air. “Who are you, and how did you know my mother?” Her voice lashed out, shrill and desperate, frightened and oh so very young.

Aethyta sighed and looked at the rest of them one at a time before her eyes returned to stare into Liara’s. “Are you sure you want to have this chat in front of your friends?”

“Yes,” Liara snapped, a jolt of biotics flaring along the tabletop. Tali and Ashley snatched their hands back from their drinks. “I don’t have secrets from Shepard and the crew. They’re . . . they’re family.”

The matriarch nodded. “Okay, if that’s what you want.” Another casual shrug flowed out from her neck to end in a small flip of her hands. “Benezia and I were involved a long time ago. I believed we’d be together for . . . ever, but her star was rising, and she didn’t want the stigma of being bonded to another asari.” Aethyta lowered her eyes to stare at Liara’s hands pressed palm down against the table. Her expression loosened as if she’d been wearing her calm laced too tight. “She left, and it was a long time before I discovered that I had a daughter.”

Liara’s knees gave way, an avalanche slipping loose to crash into her chair. She stared, the biotic aura sparking out, her mouth working as if trying to form words without the aid of her brain. After a very long minute, during which Shepard held her breath, her heart aching for the both of them, Liara managed to whisper. “You’re my father?”

Aethyta nodded. ‘I am.” She kept her posture neutral and inviting, everything about her saying it was all right for Liara to ask or say anything she needed to. The longer they sat there, the more sure Shepard became that the rest of them should wait outside.

“Why haven’t you ever contacted me?” Liara asked, her voice and body contracting, drawing down toward a singularity at her core. “Weren’t you curious? Or were you just embarrassed by your pureblood daughter?”

“Of course, I was curious. I went after you, but Benezia wouldn’t let me see you.” She activated her omnitool and brought up a folder that amounted to a scrapbook of Liara’s life. “I always figured that I’d track you down one day, explain things, but Benezia didn’t even give me that.”

Aethyta shifted, but as though spikes prickled under her skin. Her smokey voice cracked, its warmth bleeding through the fault lines, sorrow leaching in to replace it. “She showed up at my door six months ago, told me that the council and Saren had discovered something terrifying. She hammered into me the importance of you being given full access to her intel, resources, and acolytes. I promised. What else could I do?”

Liara opened her mouth to answer, but Aethyta interrupted with a bitter sort of chuckle. “Well, one other thing.” She glanced from Liara to Shepard and then Nihlus. “I promised her I’d help you stop the council and that turian bastard from laying waste to the galaxy.” Closing her eyes, she sighed, her chest heaving a little melodramatically. “When I left, I swore I’d never set foot on Thessia again.” When her eyelids lifted, her gaze fixed on Liara. “Oh well, somethings are worth taking a kick in the quad.” She shrugged. “Sorry . . . my father’s influence. Sometimes, it just slips out.”

Shepard sat back, listening and sipping her cranberry juice as Aethyta told Liara what she could. Most of Benezia’s files and information resided in heavily encrypted, secure databases back at her home on Thessia. What she did have amounted to Benezia’s Last Will and Testament, asking Liara to travel back to the asari homeworld with Aethyta. Security in the form of acolytes with commando training and a private yacht awaited Liara’s decision.

“Captain,” Liara said, turning to face Shepard, “may I please have a moment with the matriarch and Shiala?” Her large blue eyes seemed to shimmer with the heady combination of both terror and excitement as they pleaded with Shepard for a little space.

“Of course. We’ll be right outside the door.” Shepard fought the angry nipping of her inner alarm for a moment, but its teeth proved too sharp, and she crooked a finger at Shiala. “Walk us to the door?” Pushing up out of her chair, she slipped her sidearm off her hip. Just before she walked out, she passed it to the asari, leaning up a little to whisper, “If you need to, slap Aethyta’s ass with a singularity and fill her full of holes.”

“Yes, ma’am.” Shiala slipped the weapon into a side pocket, within easy reach, before returning to the table.
Disquiet prickled along every inch of Shepard’s skin, doubt gnawing at her a little more as each second hobbled past. She should never have left Liara. Who knew if Aethyta could be trusted, and if she couldn’t . . . it didn’t take a gun or blade to bring down someone as vulnerable as Liara was in her current state. The captain shoved herself up out of her chair and paced over to the bar. Despite scrolling through the menu on the kiosk three times, she didn’t order anything. Her brain didn’t even register the drinks, her mind’s eye trying to see through the closed door behind her.

_You never stop risking people, do you? It’s pathological._

She jumped, a faint curse escaping as a hand closed on her elbow sending sparks searing along her nerves. “Sweet baby Jesus, Nihlus.” She slapped a hand over her heart. “You scared the crap out of me.”

“Most people come to bars to relax rather than wind themselves into a knot so tight it’ll take a couple of tow barges to pull it apart,” Nihlus whispered. He pointed to the screen and outloud said, “Try this one. It’s juice from a tree-fruit native to a small asari colony planet. I can’t drink it, but I’ve heard it’s very good.”

She answered him with a soft, grateful smile. Juice ordered, she allowed him to guide her back to the table where she returned to stewing. Ashley and Tali chatted back and forth, but their conversation washed over her without registering. Sipping the juice, she found herself pleasantly surprised.

“Good?” Nihlus asked.

“Yeah, really good,” she replied. “Don’t really have anything to compare the flavour to, but it’s wonderful. Thanks for recommending it. My usual cranberry juice has competition.” She reached under the table to squeeze his hand. “I’m fine, Nihlus. I just . . .”

He nodded, turning his hand over to grip hers. “I know, you’re just imagining every sick or horrible thing the matriarch could be saying in there to mess with our young Prothean expert.”

When she pulled her hand back—professional distance rearing its practical head—he held onto it, not so tight that if she really wanted to get loose, she couldn’t, but enough for her to know that he needed an anchor. She could give him that.

The door to the back room opened, and Liara emerged, the asari searching out Shepard even before crossing the threshold. She didn’t look at Aethyta as the matriarch passed them, returning to the bar. Shepard did, glad to see the matriarch’s body language relaxed, although her expression remained . . . complicated. For the most part, the asari matron mask remained in place, but here and there fault lines allowed brief flashes of regret . . . and love . . . yeah, love and a bright joy to shine through. If Shepard doubted the story of Aethyta’s paternity, those last two chinks in the asari’s armour reassured her.
“Ready to get back to the Normandy?” Shepard asked, standing to greet Liara. She gripped the researcher’s upper arm and searched Liara’s expression. Unlike Aethyta, Liara remained completely inscrutable, so either things hadn’t gone well or she was practicing her asari matriarch several hundred years early.

Liara smiled. It came off tremulous and wan, but a smile it remained. “Yes, Captain. May I speak with you when we get back aboard?” She glanced at Nihlus. “You as well, if I may, Spectre Kryik.”

Nihlus stood, giving Liara a curt nod. “Of course, Dr. T’Soni.”

“Okay,” Shepard said, keeping her voice low as she spoke into her radio. “Nihlus and Wrex on point. The lovely turian-human couple can follow drag at a good distance.” Glad to be moving back toward her ship, Shepard struck out, wings spread to guide her ducklings through the door. She didn’t like so many of them being so exposed in an environment that limited both visibility and control over the environment.

Before she walked out the door, she glanced back to find Aethyta watching her. The matriarch smiled and nodded. Despite not having a clue what Aethyta meant by either, Shepard appreciated the attempt to communicate. Perhaps she meant the gesture as reassurance. At that point, Shepard would take what she could get.

They made it back to the Normandy without incident. She supposed that Nos Astra proved a far more public place to ambush than the back grasslands of Tuntau. Still, she remained outside the airlock, herding her people inside before following. Just before Tali slipped past, Shepard caught the quarian’s arm. “I’d like to speak with you in the comm room after Liara is finished with us,” she said, keeping her voice soft and between the two of them.

Tali nodded.

“Thank you,” Shepard called when the inner hatch opened to release them from decon. “Good work, people.”

Liara said nothing as she walked alongside Shepard down the length of the CIC and into the comm room. She just took her usual seat and folded her hands in her lap, watching as Shepard and Nihlus seated themselves. Nothing about her demeanour alarmed Shepard, but neither did the young researcher give anything away. She’d closed off, which made Shepard suspect she knew what choice Liara had made regarding her mother’s legacy.

Settling into her chair, Shepard waited, allowing Liara to control the conversation. Her alarm remained quiet at the base of her skull, not helping in the least.

“I’ve decided to accept my mother’s charge,” Liara said, her voice soft but sharper than before. “Aethyta will accompany me back to my mother’s estate on Thessia. The fact she’s my father and Benezia’s executor will ensure that I maintain control of my inheritance.” Her head shook a little as if some hidden part of her still didn’t believe any of it could be true. “Shiala wishes to remain aboard until the rachni queen is settled, then she’ll join me as well.”

“Good.” Shepard gave her a tight smile. “Like I said yesterday, we’ll support you, even bail you out if you need it.” She shrugged, a certainty settling into her gut. “But, I don’t think that we’re going to need to. You’ll be brilliant. Just don’t give up the old passion completely.” She winked. “That new dig on Eden Prime might be glad of a patron with some mad archeological skills.”

Liara giggled, a little of the girl showing through again at last. “I was thinking that I might do that, and then make sure I keep up a tight schedule of inspections.” A small sigh wiped away the smile. “My mother’s private yacht and a large squad of her acolytes are ready to go whenever I am.” She stood and squared her shoulder. “I’ll message you when I’m ready to leave?”

Shepard stood and walked over, gripping Liara’s shoulders. “Absolutely. Take your time. It’ll be hours before we get clearance.”

Liara gripped Shepard in a quick, but tight hug, whispering, “I know that we don’t know one another as well as it seems to me because of our melding. I’ve kept my distance, not wanting to intrude. I know how private you are.” The asari flushed, colour rising across the bridge of her nose. “But, we’ve shared those memories . . . if you ever want someone to talk to . . .” She pulled away, not quite meeting Shepard’s eyes.

“Thank you, Liara. The offer means a great deal.” Shepard backed up a couple of steps, feeling more naked than if the asari had snatched away her clothing. The offer would remain unaccepted, but that didn’t diminish the kindness of the gesture. She glanced toward Nihlus, glad that the Spectre remained in his seat, and hopefully out of earshot.

Giving them both a quick, shy nod, the researched fled up the short ramp and out the door.

The door didn’t even get a chance to close before Tali stepped through. “You wanted to see me, Shepard?”

“I did.” Shepard gestured for Tali to sit. “I have a huge favour to ask of you, Tali . . . on behalf of your people.”

Tali giggled and looked from Shepard to Nihlus and back. “You’re asking me to do a favour for my people?”

A serious nod met her question. “I am.”

The quarian mirrored the captain’s earnest sincerity as she drew herself up, perched on the edge of her seat. “Anything, Shepard. You know that I’ll do whatever I need to.”

Shepard smiled. “I do.” She walked over to sit beside Tali. “I need you to partner up with Legion. Both of you will be at the Luna planning meeting in the morning. I intend to team you up for one of the strike teams, but more than that, I want you to work together every day between now and Virmire. You’ll lead a team to find and free the pilgrims and Saren’s other hostages.”

Tali wrung her hands, the three fingers in constant motion, tangling and twisting. Shepard reached out and gripped them. “I’m going to ask Legion to bring in two more geth to assist with the op. It’ll only work if the two of you trust one another as much as we can manage in the time we’ve got.” She let out a long sigh, relaxing down into the chair a little. “You can say no, Tali, but I think if we manage this, after Virmire we’ll be able to convince a small group of your people to launch an expedition to Rannoch. A first step in getting your people back on their planet where they belong.”

Shepard looked to Nihlus, meeting the stare that burned into her with both a raptor’s intensity and a sort of wonder . . . the latter making her more uncomfortable than the first, but she wanted to see if he thought her idea mad or not. She fought to keep a grin off her face. Most padawans would probably have cleared it with their Jedi first. She wondered if Nihlus had boarded the Normandy knowing that she’d run him as much as she did.

Tali let out a soft, musical sigh, drawing Shepard’s attention back to her. She nodded. “I can do that, Shepard. I said anything, and I meant anything.” She chuckled, but it trembled a little like a the soft warble of a dove. “Even become partners with a geth.” She turned to face Shepard a little more squarely. “Thank you, Shepard.”

Glancing around, suddenly as awkward as she felt assured the moment before, Shepard shrugged. “For what, Tali?”

The engineer took a deep breath, hesitating for a few seconds as if ordering her thoughts. “For everything, but mostly for believing in me, in my people . . . even in the geth. I never expected to find people like you . . .” She looked over at Nihlus. “. . . and Nihlus . . . any of the crew . . . on my pilgrimage. Quarians are just suit rats to ninety-nine percent of the galaxy. You’d make us valued partners. That means so very much to every quarian, even if I’m the only one to say it. Thank you.”

Shepard nodded. “You’re welcome, but you should be thanking yourself. Your people couldn’t have a better ambassador.” She nodded toward the door. “Go find your new partner, do a little bonding. I’ll see you at 0630.”

Tali nodded, popped up out of her seat and hurried out the door.

Nihlus let out a soft chuckle. “You’re a mad woman, but it always works to the best. How do you manage that?”

Shepard gave him an honest, baffled shrug. “No idea. Let’s just hope my luck holds.”

“So . . .” Nihlus stood, stretching a little as he adjusted his armour. “About what happened on Tantau . . . .”

She leaned back and crossed her ankle over her other knee, but just met his gaze with a curious one.

“Meet me for dinner tonight? We can catch a little shore leave, and I can explain what happened somewhere the walls don’t have ears.” He took a couple of steps toward her.

“Sure.” She checked her chronometer, her mind whirring through the schedule too fast to allow her heart and nerves to chime in on the whole dinner with Nihlus idea. Feeling the slip in her concentration, she focused on the time and started talking. “Jeez, it’s already 1600. Meet in an hour and a half? That’ll give me some time to mug someone for some civvies and slap a face on, but give us a few hours before port authority clears us for departure.”

He nodded and smiled. “I’ll meet you at the airlock.”

* * * * *

“Spirits,” Garrus said then let out a soft whistle. “Who are you, and what have you done with Shepard?”

Blushing, her heart doing a salsa inside her chest, Shepard twirled, both savouring the sensation of the candy-apple red silk clinging to her curves and feeling a little exposed. Although, compared to the black number on Omega, the short sleeves and knee-length skirt practically constituted a nun’s habit. “You like?” She grinned at the helpless sort of mandible flutter that answered her question. “I borrowed it from Ash. Poor woman hasn’t even had a chance to wear it.” Running her palms down over her hips, Shepard shrugged. “It’s too big, but at least I won’t stretch it out.”
“Yes, I like it very much.” He chuckled and held out a hand. “Stop fussing; you look stunning.” Pulling her into his arms when she took his hand, he caressed her cheek with the backs of his talons. “Nihlus will be the envy of everyone who sees you tonight.”

“How about you?” she asked, only sort of teasing. She loved his lack of jealousy and possessiveness, but hated it too. And she hated that she hated it. She shouldn’t need someone to act jealous to feel wanted. She closed her eyes and shook her head, trying to clear away the crazy.

She opened her eyes, meeting his stare as he cleared his throat and nuzzled her cheek. “Well, I’m a special case.”

A twinge . . . a vague ache pushed against the inside of her ribcage at his words, but she covered it with a smile, refusing to give her insecurity a chance to lose its head. “You are that.”

He smiled, just a small flutter of mandibles underwritten by a subvocal rumble. “Well, I know who you’re coming home to.”

The ache burst into a bright nova of happiness so keen that it shamed her a little, and though she smiled and reached out to touch his cheek, she stepped back.

Garrus cleared his throat and looked down. “So, while you were in the shower, I modified your omnitool.” He reached out to activate it. He held her wrist gently between his talons. “I boosted your shields by 300%, but don’t abuse them. Still get behind cover as quickly as you can, because as overclocked as the emitters are, they take a good long time to cool down and bring your shields back.” He drew her toward him. “They’re for surviving the first few seconds of an ambush, not for swaggering through a long fight like some sort of crazy woman.”

Shepard sighed and grumbled. “Aw . . . think how hot I’d look in this dress . . . these shoes . . . gun in both hands.” She laughed at his chuff and kissed his nose. “Thank you. I promise to use your upgrades in the pursuit of surviving the fight rather than being the sexy hotness of death.”

“Thank you.” Garrus gathered her back into his arms, pulling between his thighs to press her against him. “I want you to do me a favour tonight,” he said, his mouth next to her ear. His breath sent effervescent sparkles of delight racing through her body, lifting her skin into gooseflesh.

She pressed her cheek against his mandible. “What’s that?” She turned her face into his warm, tough hide and inhaled deep, his scent turning the sparkles into fireworks.

“Treat it like a date.”

She pulled back as far as he’d allow and scowled at him. “Why would I do that, Garrus?”

His mandibles worked, his head tilting a little as he considered his reply. Couldn’t be anything good if he needed to put that much thought into how to say it. Her heart fluttered, the wings of a baby bird poised on the brink of falling from its nest.

“Exploration,” he said at the end of the long pause. He reached up and caressed her face. “Exploration in the spirit of making an informed decision. You and Nihlus have a connection.” He shrugged, but it wasn’t dismissive, quite the opposite. “You need to know what sort of connection it is, because just hanging out there, unresolved, it’s going to make it impossible for the three of us to work together.”

Shepard wrapped her arms around his neck, pulling herself in tight. “Thank the great, glorious light of the Enkindlers that I slobbered all over Harkin to find out about you.” She chuckled then pulled back far enough to kiss him, their mouths moving softly against one another.
“Wait . . . those lips touched Harkin? Gross, Shepard. Get back!” He chuckled and nuzzled along the line of her jaw. “Go, just be Jane Shepard for a night. I’ll use the time to catch up on all the sleep I miss because of your snoring.”

Shepard kissed him again. “Behave. I’ll be back in a few hours.” She pulled away a little, a thin trickle of sadness running through her. They should be spending some normal time together. “When do we get to go on a date? I don’t count making out in the cockpit of the Mako.” She caressed his cheek.

“When we get to the Citadel after Luna, we’ll go out on a proper date. Okay?” He nodded, then reached around her to pat the small of her back, grinning when he found her sidearm hidden under her skirt. “I was going to suggest you take it. Forgot who I was talking to for a moment.” Jerking his head toward the door, he gave her a gentle push. “Get moving, you’re going to be late.” He squeezed her hand and then released her.

“Yeah. See you later.” She backed toward the door a few steps before turning to stride out. On the other side, just before the door closed, she glanced back to see him staring at his hands, showing just a split second of honest regret before he drew in a breath and straightened.

“There it is. Thank goodness. You are something else, Brother Garrus,” she whispered then turned away and hurried for the stairs to the CIC. She had little doubt that Nihlus would be waiting, and yes, as much attraction as she might feel for the Spectre, right then, she just wanted to curl up next to her . . . she gave her head a small shake of disbelief . . . boyfriend.

“Wow,” Joker called, wolf-whistling as she stepped into the cockpit. “I take back what I said before the Afterlife mission. When you go for the pretty, you do almost look female.”

“Why haven’t I installed a brig, yet?” she asked, cuffing him gently on the back of the head. “That’s no way to speak to your captain, mister.” She heard the distinctive tread of pacing boots on deck plating coming from inside the airlock. “Take care of my ship, Mr. Moreau.”

“Yes, ma’am.”

Nihlus spun to face her as she stepped through the inner hatch. His mandibles spread wide and flicked once before pulling in tight against the sides of his mouth. “Shepard.” He took a step toward her. “You look wonderful.”

A soft smile met his discomfort as her thoughts remained in her quarters, playing that split second of Garrus’s regret over and over, worrying it like mala beads. How could he expect her to treat the night like a date? She understood the whole “set them free and if they come back” concept, but . . . did she want to date Nihlus?

Starting, she realized that the decon cycle had ended, and Nihlus stood in the open hatch, waiting for her.

“Are you all right?” he asked.

“Fine, sorry, just worrying over everything.” She smiled and slipped her hand through his elbow. “So, where are we off to?”

A half hour cab ride later, they arrived at a restaurant built at the end of a pier that stretched more than two hundred metres out over the water. The staff appeared to know Nihlus well, leading him straight out onto an outside deck. Even though most of the patrons gave them no more than a curious glance, a couple called out to greet him. Shepard almost made a joke about him bringing all his dates there until she saw the waiter scrambling to add another place setting.

_That’s just unbelievably sad._

The Spectre held her chair out for her, surprising her for the third time in five minutes, although she supposed that none of it should have. “Thank you,” she said. Looking out over the remarkable sunset-painted waves, she drew in a long breath and shook her head. “Just look at that. Amazing.”

Nihlus sat ninety degrees around the table from her and nodded, his gaze travelling out over the water. “I love it here.” He chuckled. “Where I grew up could barely be called a colony. More of an outpost—mercs clinging to the edge of the nothing.” His brow plates rose. “Palaven has seas, of course, but turians don’t tend to be water people—all the flotation capacity of a rock. As soon as I saw this place, something about it pulled me in.”

Shepard nodded, understanding exactly what he meant. “I loved the water as a kid. I spent most of the summer in the lake or the local pool. Trying to get me out always resulted in a battle. I had to push until Mom was ready to string me up.” She chuckled as she pictured her mother’s face, beautiful blue eyes flashing with classic Irish ire, brow furrowed, lips pressed thin. “I guess some things never change.”

She watched him as he distracted himself with the menus, deciding to leave it to him to choose when to talk and what about. Impatience pricked her with its thorns, but she calmed it with a quick glance at the time. The _Normandy_ couldn’t leave for three hours anyway.

Nihlus set down the menu datapad. “Would you like more of the juice you tried earlier?”

“Mm, yes please. That was very nice.” She browsed down a list of human favourites, deciding on a ravioli covered in a white wine blush sauce and filled with goat cheese, mushrooms, and sundried tomatoes. She had no idea what Nihlus ordered, but if Garrus’s food choices provided a valid gauge, the order involved meat and meat with a side order of more meat.

Once they’d ordered, Nihlus leaned back in his chair, his entire posture settling. “I spent most of my free time in the mines when I was young. My father worked a platinum mine on the beta shift.” His expression opened up, his eyes staring out to sea, relaxing in a way she’d never seen from him. “If I ran after classes, I could meet him at the front gates on his way to work. He’d boost me up onto his cowl and carry me.” He chuckled. “His shift gave me my own safety helmet and breather apparatus for the anniversary of my sixth cycle.”

A nostalgic smile teased Shepard’s lips as she pictured a young Nihlus riding down into the dark on his father’s shoulders, happy as one of the guys. The image morphed, shifting into one of looking up at her father through a space in a car’s engine, her small hand reaching up for a wrench. So many happy hours spent covered in grease and talking about everything under the sun.

“I sat on the back of the digger and did my homework,” Nihlus continued. “Ate in the mess hall and fell asleep leaning against him on the seat.” He reached up and ran his hand over his fringe. “I adored my _pari._”

Shepard smiled, her eyebrows lifting at the unfamiliar word, rich with rumbled subvocals through the middle and ending with a sort of click. “Pari?” she asked, blushing as she butchered the pronunciation.

“The human equivalent is dad.” He reached out and brushed her cheek with the back of his first talon. “The closed dialect isn’t easy without a second larynx.”
Their food arrived, and he shook himself, sucking in a long breath that carried enough of an edge to let Shepard know he was shutting down that topic, at least during the meal.

They discussed small matters while they ate. She filled him in on her full plan to get Tali and Legion on Rannoch in the wake of a successful mission on Virmire. He made a few suggestions, laughing when she asked him if their Spectre/candidate relationship was everything he’d imagined. The deftness with which he skirted the question was awe inspiring.

She swallowed her disappointment, wanting to hear his answer. Despite her earlier misgivings, she found herself having a good time, Nihlus proving to be a charming date. Could Garrus actually have a point about giving both relationships a shot? No . . . that just felt, well . . . sorta slimey. People did it though, didn’t they? Dating? Exploring their options? For a moment, it took all her self control not to smack her forehead into the table. Why couldn’t life just be simple?

“Would you like to go for a walk?” Nihlus asked, interrupting her new batch of crazy. He gestured toward a staircase that descended the pier, the slope leading back toward shore.

She stared at him for a moment, worrying those mala beads to death before letting out a strong sigh.

Okay, Garrus, a date it is. Damn you.

Shepard nodded, already savouring the sensation of what looked like buttery-soft sand between her toes. “Sure, I’d love that. It’s been a very long time since I last felt ocean waves around my ankles.” Garrus’ admonishment echoed through the back of her mind yet again.

Fine, already. I’m exploring.

She held out her hand. “Come on, Spectre. Let’s go for a stroll.”
Nihlus grumbled when Shepard tried to pay, then led the way down to the water’s edge. Shepard gripped his arm to balance while she kicked off her shoes. Not wanting to carry them, she tucked them under the stairs out of view.

Grinning, she dug her toes into the sand, her eyes slipping closed as its warmth trickled over her skin. “Aw, man, that’s gorgeous.” She laughed, self-consciousness making her cheeks burn. She moaned in pleasure, slippery beads of polished silica dancing between her toes.

“Would you and the sand like to be alone?” he asked, mandibles flicking playfully.

She looked up, frowning thoughtfully. “I don’t know, we just met. Maybe later.” Nodding toward the water, she grinned. “Come on. I’ll save you if you somehow lose all coordination, fall in, and flail your way out into water deep enough to drown in.”

He chuckled and followed her down to where the waves lapped at the sand. “I’m not afraid of water, and I can actually swim pretty well.” He flashed a wry smile. “Well, for a race of drowners.” Still, he let her walk in the low surf, keeping to mostly dry ground.

Shepard looked up at the Nos Astra skyline towering in the distance before returning her attention to kicking her toes through the warm, foamy water. “This city seems to have the best of both worlds.”

“And the worst of many others,” he said, the words rolling out on a heavy layer of disgust. “The asari try to convince the galaxy that Illium is a paradise of commerce and freedom, but the dark side here sinks deep enough that even after all my cycles as a Spectre, it still terrifies me.” He shuddered. “This place swallows people whole and never lets them go.”

“So basically Omega on a planetary scale, but lacking the good grace to just look as ugly and corrupt as it is.” She nodded at his flanged hum of agreement. “Fifty years ago, my people looked up at the stars and imagined wondrous things awaited us out amongst them. I think that had they known how much more of the same awaited us . . . crime, injustice, starvation, overcrowding . . . they might have written space travel off as a bad idea.”

Nihlus’s bare talons slipped around her hand, enclosing her fingers in warm, calloused strength. “It’s not all dark side. We just chose careers where we spend every day buried in the worst of everything so that those people up there don’t have to.” His head bobbed a little as he shrugged. “At least in theory.”

She nodded and squeezed his hand, but didn’t reply, sensing that he was working himself around to what happened between him and Saren on Tuntau. Whatever it was needed to come out in his time and without unnecessary commentary from her. From the very beginning, she’d felt like their relationship was one of those turian figures made from spun glass, and between them, they only managed to stop chucking it at one another while they worked. Even with their friendship and how well they worked together, the damned thing spent way too much time in the air for her comfort. And a world of pain awaited when one of them slipped and it finally smashed on the floor. She sighed. Such was life. Even the good stuff exacted a price, eventually.

Five minutes further down the beach, Nihlus sucked in a huge breath of the sea air. “Want to sit?”

Shepard look down at the sand, imagining all the places it could work its way into. Silk undies lost something with a nice, gritty sand thong underneath. “Ahhh, yeah.” She raised an eyebrow at him. “I didn’t exactly dress for beach sitting.”

Chuckling, he undid the front panel of his suit, revealing a light, smartly tailored white shirt beneath. “This is the only suit I brought with me,” he said, his tone already lamenting the demise of the black and red tunic. Still, he laid it down on the sand lining side up. “Better?”

She gave him a shallow curtsy. “Such a gentleman.” She accepted his hand, managing to ease herself down onto the tunic without putting anything on display. Skirts really were the devil.

“Yeah, better late than never, right?” He sat at her side, knees drawn up, arms wrapped around them.

She bumped him with her shoulder, trying to reconcile the torin next to her with the one who’d stomped around being such an arrogant ass his first few days aboard. “Give yourself a bit of a break, Nihlus. You haven’t had the easiest time of it lately, and I do like to push people off balance. We’ve both had our share of moments outside the Enkindlers’ light, so let’s just let it go at that.”

She leaned back, her arms braced behind her, and crossed her legs at the ankle. The sea rolled in gentle swells of colour, deepening from cerulean to navy as the sky washed toward the horizon, its dyes bleeding into the water. She looked up, seeing pinprick diamonds peeking out between the clouds.

“At this time of year, the sun barely makes it above the horizon,” Nihlus said, his voice quiet, sub-vocals rich, “but it’s the only time of year that most races can tolerate the heat during the day. On Illium, the beaches tend to be a nighttime hangout.”

Shepard nodded, but left him to fill the silence. It whispered, slipping along on the breeze, poignant and forlorn, colouring the pocket of universe that closed around them. Once it settled, trusting and thick, Nihlus shifted a little, edging closer as if borrowing her strength.

“I adored my pari,” he repeated, starting the conversation back up. “But, my mother was a very different story. She was what most would call a social climber.” He spoke so softly that she could barely make out his words over the waves and the distant sounds of the city. “When she met my father, he was rising quickly through the ranks of the military. Everyone said his potential was unlimited. That suited her very well. His being nearly crippled two years after they bonded did not.” He shifted to lean back, stretching out.

“Pari moved them to the only place he could find work, a platinum mine in the middle of a merc outpost. It was a rough place to live, but he kept clear of trouble . . . tried to keep me clear of it when I came along. He made enough credits to afford a comfortable life, but Mari was miserable outside hierarchy space, her dreams of a glamorous life of power and riches dashed. My birth trapped her completely.”

Watching him out of the corner of her eye, she saw his head bob in a shrug. The mandible flutter that followed it said that he wasn’t nearly as settled with the past as his tone tried to portray. She rested against his side a little, wanting to support without adding pressure.

“Pari died when I was sixteen. When I grew up enough to see past the facade he kept erected around me, I realized that outpost was little better than a pirate operation. They mined using slaves and safety was never as important as profit.”

Slaves. Shepard tried to hide the shudder that ripped down her spine as the word unleashed a thousand shrieking, snot-drenched screams inside her head. No. No, her past didn’t get to keep Nihlus from dealing with his. She shoved the screams back behind the wall.

“One day,” Nihlus said, dragging her from her battle, “a couple of cycles after I became far too lautus to spend time with my father, he went to work and never came home.” He cleared his throat. “We were well outside Hierarchy space, but Mari saw her chance and forced me into the military. With her mate gone, her son could elevate her to the position she desired.” A bitter chuckle broke from his throat like a clap of thunder, turning her head. He met her stare. “She must have been so disappointed. I was always good at being a soldier—spirits, I grew up fighting—but I had a tiny problem with authority.”

Shepard chuckled. “You? I can’t see it.”

He bumped her shoulder. “Yes, very much like your own love of bureaucratic stulti mendur.” He shook his head and looked up at the stars. “Then Saren came along. I’d seen him before, when the Spectres raided the mine to clear out a bunch of slavers. He said I’d make a good Spectre . . . changed everything.” He scoffed, softly and deep in his chest. It rumbled like a storm on the horizon. “Mother was thrilled. She moved herself to the Citadel, and met a mid-level embassy bureaucrat. Still, she rode me constantly to prove myself and make her the queen of her social circle before she was too old to enjoy it.”

“Didn’t you resent it?” Shepard asked, wincing as she broke her ‘just let him talk’ edict.

“All the time. I lived in a state of almost constant fury. Saren . . .” He sighed. “. . . well, that suited Saren. He liked me to view the universe with as much disdain as he did . . . liked me brutal, but he resented not being the most important influence in my life.” Shaking his head, Nihlus lifted a hand to his throat. “Back then, Saren was everything I wanted to be, Shepard. I worshipped him. I . . . loved him.”

Shepard reached out to slip her fingers around his talons. God, Saren’s heartlessness sank to depths she couldn’t even imagine. Had the Spectre ever loved his protege back? If he truly had, how had he fallen far enough to shoot Nihlus in the back of the head? Had Sovereign stolen Saren’s soul?

Does that mean that thing is going to scoop out yours as well? It’s already trying.

Swallowing a couple feet of razor wire, she shuddered again, able to feel the damned spiders wriggling through her, eating away at who she was, leaving nothing but ice-cold darkness behind. Was that what Saren felt every moment? That horrible nothing where once a heart had beat strong and quick with love?

How long before you’re trying to shoot Nihlus . . . or Garrus . . . or Sparky in the back of the head?

The razor wire sliced through her chest, wrapping around her heart, and tears sprang into her eyes. . . tears shed for both of them. Tears of empathy for Saren and ones of terror for herself. Another shudder. She glanced at Nihlus to see if he’d noticed. If she kept it up, he was going to drag her to Dr. Chakwas for seizure treatment.
Sighing, she forced the reaction back under control. The pain was a good sign. She wouldn’t let Sovereign rip the heart out of her. She wouldn’t succumb like Saren did. She’d been through too much to be taken apart so easily.

Focusing back on Nihlus, she decided that the information about his relationship with Saren shone a new light on the ambush on Tuntanu. Saren wanted Nihlus back even more than he wanted him dead. Without Benezia, he needed . . . someone. Maybe someone he cared about? Maybe someone who cared about him?

“He tried to convince me to break all ties to my mother,” Nihlus continued. “I just couldn’t. Pari raised me with a few iron-cored ideas about responsibility and honour . . . about respect. He made me promise to look after her if anything happened to him.” He stopped, his face dropping into a scowl equal parts sorrow and fury. He lifted Shepard’s hand, his talons playing with her fingers a little.

“Ah, yeah, I understand. It didn’t matter how your mom behaved, you were keeping your promise to your dad . . . honouring your love for him.” A soft muttering sigh underscored her words. There had to be people out there who grew up in happy, normal families, didn’t there?

Nihlus stiffened beside her, his grip on her hand going cold and rough. “And then one day Saren came home and showed me messages and money transfers sent by my mother to contract someone inside the mine to sabotage Pari’s machine.” He looked up, his throat working, mandibles dropped.

She squeezed his talons, her thumb brushing the back of his hand. “Did you confront her?” Her voice disappeared into the growling keen forcing its way through his second larynx. It made her heart race and her nerves tingle with its promise of violence.

“I did. She flew into a rage at the accusation, attacked me.” He released her hand, wrapping his arms back around his knees as he drew them up to his keel. “I killed her. I didn’t mean to, I was just trying to keep her talons out of my throat. Still, she died, and she didn’t deserve death, even as foul as she was.”

Shepard nodded, the pieces all falling together. “And then yesterday . . . The horrible truth Saren talked about . . . it wasn’t her at all. I’m so sorry, Nihlus.”

He nodded. “At the time, I used Saren’s evidence to convince myself that I’d just found some justice for Pari, and it felt so good to be free of her shadow. Saren was the bright, volatile center of my galaxy; I never doubted him. He encouraged my anger, nurtured the violence in me. I was a naive idiot.” He looked at her, his brow plates angled down, mandibles drawn tight. “You’re not afraid or disgusted . . . disappointed?”

Shepard shook her head. “I’d already pretty much put the pieces together from what Saren said yesterday, but no, my opinion of you hasn’t changed, because you haven’t changed. Our pasts are what they are. All we can do is try our best to make our present about doing the right thing.” She smiled and wrapped an arm around his waist. “You’re still an idiot, but you’re a strong one. Saren doesn’t have what it takes to break you and neither does the council.” She shrugged and sighed. “I do, but I’ll show mercy.”

“You were right yesterday, Nihlus. You built yourself into this torin, not Saren, not your mother, and not the council. And this guy . . .” She shrugged. “Well, you know . . . he’s all right.” She grinned and rested her chin on his arm. “The council has turned its back on us, but you never really worked for them. You worked for all those people up there.” She gestured behind them at the city’s looming silhouette. “And all the ones down here.”

He straightened. “And we’ll save them whether they like it or not.”

“Glory hallelujah, Brother Nihlus.” She shifted around to kneel next to him, one hand on his shoulder. “Loving someone unworthy of it doesn’t devalue that love. Trusting someone not worthy of trust . . . well, it’s just a lesson to be more careful the next time around. Now, you have a partner you can trust to constantly make plans without consulting you first, but who will have your back until the moment she dies, Nihlus. No matter what.”

He caught up her other hand again. “I trust you with everything, Shepard.” Those remarkable green eyes clouded over a split second before he looked down at their joined hands. “Did I break something that can never be repaired?”

Shepard slipped the hand on his shoulder around his neck and rested her brow against his temple. “No. No, it’s been repairing for a while now. I told you, we’re okay.”

Looking up, he stared into her eyes, all the arrogance and anger and even awkwardness gone. “I had no idea,” he whispered, not continuing or explaining, just looking into her as if he could see all the way to her center.

Her damned skin betrayed her yet again, a heavy flush crawling up her neck under the intensity of his scrutiny. Garrus looked at her with affection and heat in his gaze, but what she saw in Nihlus’s stare felt almost like adoration . . . or something even less comfortable . . . whatever it was, she knew she didn’t deserve it.

Shepard cleared her throat and pulled away, sitting back on the sand. “Sit by my side, and let the world slip: we shall ne’er be younger,” she whispered, then let out a long breath to calm the sudden acrobats tumbling around in her belly. A hand firmly keeping her devil skirt from riding up, she lay down, the sand warming her even through Nihlus’s tunic. She closed her eyes, savouring the heat.

For a moment, she allowed herself to imagine Nihlus leaning over, his keel pressing into her side as his mouth brushed hers. Heart leaping into her throat and hammering so hard that a wave of dizziness washed over her, she snapped her eyes open, only relaxing when she saw him still sitting by her side staring out over the water. Damn. Not the best reaction.

“You’re such a chicken shit.”

“What’s that line from?” Nihlus asked, apparently oblivious to her internal drama. “It was beautiful, if roughly translated.”

“Shakespeare.” Keeping her eyes fixed on the stars, she watched as the moonlit clouds clutched their silver linings close, scuttling across the sky like people shuffling between rows of seats in a crowded theatre. “It’s from the Taming of the Shrew.” She laughed, her eyes darting to glare at him, the irony already sending heat roaring up her neck yet again.

He stared at her, his mandibles spread and flicking, his eyes puzzled as if trying to decide if he’d heard what he thought he heard. “The Taming of the Shrew?” Another moment of puzzlement and he began to laugh, a deep, rumbling belly laugh. He flopped down on the sand, his laughter gaining momentum. “Spirits, Shepard,” he said between gasps, catching his breath for a moment, “that’s just . . . so appropriate.”

She elbowed him. “Hey, it’s not that funny. It’s meant to be inspiring, not a chance to guffaw over the delicious irony of my sparkling self quoting a play about a difficult woman.” When his laughter continued, she smacked him and clambered up off the sand. “Come on, laughing fool, we should start back.”

He ran up behind her a handful of metres down the beach, his arm slipping around her waist.

She glanced up to see his face working as he struggled unsuccessfully to rein in his mirth. “Oh fine, get it out of your system.” Despite her tone, a bright smile bloomed across her face. Nihlus had lanced a deep, old and ugly wound. She sensed the poison flowing out of him.

Sobering, he shook his head. “No, I’m done.” He bumped her gently then started chortling again, a wonderful, rumbling purr of sound. “Okay, mostly done.”

Shepard hip-checked him hard enough to send him stumbling up to his knees in the surf then shrieked, “Oh no! Turian in the water! Someone get a life preserver!”

He spun toward her, the look in his eye promising a terrible end to Ashley’s dress, so Shepard bolted, fleeing for the pier.

“Okay, mostly done.”

She snatched her shoes from under the stairs but didn’t pause to put them on until she reached the top, gasping for breath even as she laughed.

“So slow in your old age, Spectre.” She cackled merrily. “A tiny human female outran the great Nihlus Kryik.”

“Or he let you outrun him,” Nihlus replied, grinning as he guided her through the restaurant door. “Next time you might not be so lucky.”

They caught a cab out front, riding back to the docks where he landed at the far end from the Normandy. “We still have time to walk back, take in the view, pretend we don’t know about all the shadows hiding under the bright lights,” he explained.

When he offered his hand, Shepard took it, sauntering along the open balcony that overlooked the city. The arcologies soared into the heavens, a strange contrast to the ground-hugging domes, and everywhere . . . people crowding outside to enjoy the cooler evening air.

Pulling Nihlus along with her, Shepard wandered to the railing and looked out over the gleaming white buildings splashed in a million hues of light.

“You know me and anything so urban. It’s all a blight, but the lights . . . the sky . . . it really is beautiful,” she said, her voice soft. She let out a breathy chuckle, just a single puff of irony. Out the corner of her eye, she saw Nihlus turn to face her. He leaned into the railing and just watched. Her, the city, then back to her, holding her hand gently in his. She looked out over the city, time stretching out as every sense in her body became keenly aware of its passing. Such rapt attention should have her crawling out of her skin, needing to break it any way she could, but the energy coming off him felt restful, quiet. Their talk, letting all those demons free had lanced the wound, allowing him to reach detente in a war that he’d been fighting a long time.

Her smile came easily. While her imagination ran wild on the beach, his war had been winding down, suits for peace still being drawn up. But he’d left Saren and all that confusion and betrayal behind on the sand. Sighing, she closed her eyes, the play of light showing in negative inside her eyelids. She felt him press closer, close enough that his heat envelope warmed her entire left side. Close enough that her heart began to flutter rather than beat. Every nerve sprang to life under her skin, reaching out like tiny proximity mines ready to go off at the slightest contact.

A soft touch brushed along her jaw, the back of talons cool and hard, warm flesh barely grazing her skin. Detonating in tiny shivers of pleasure, the mines lifted her skin into gooseflesh and send a shiver down her spine. She opened her eyes to look at him then, returning his gaze as he bent down. Despite the invasion of acrobats and their fire-breathing friends in her belly, she didn’t pull away. In the spirit of exploration. Breath hitching, entire body alive and electric with anticipation, she stared into his eyes, answering his unspoken question with cautious willingness.

His mouth whispered against hers, as gentle and hesitant as a butterfly’s wing, then withdrew a hand’s width away, his breath fanning the short waves of her hair.

He’s waiting, Janey. You’ll have to make the next move. Somewhere in the last couple of weeks he learned patience, glory hallelujah.

Eyes closing, just letting her body’s hyperawareness guide her, Shepard lifted onto her toes, her lips finding his mouth. Driven by the fire-breathers as they warmed her belly, her hands lifted to his cowl, pulling her in tighter. Her lips caressed the tough hide, so familiar, but so very different as well. The years had sculpted deeper lines and ridges into Nihlus’s plates and hide, and where Garrus vibrated with a deep, solid energy, Nihlus’s felt frenetic, gloriously alive and passionate but also afraid, almost desperate.

Their kisses deepened, tongues exploring without being invasive. It seemed he had learned his lesson. She wrapped an arm around his neck, lifting a little further into the embrace. He bent down, wrapping a long arm around her, pulling her up tight against the right side of his keel. Slowly, she felt him begin to let slip the tight reins holding his desire under control. He pressed his mandible against her cheek, his mouth open, panting hard.

“Spirits, Shepard.”

His hand wrapped around her ribs, nearly large enough to cover her from her sternum all the way around to her spine. Turning back into her, he kissed along her jawline and down her neck. Unlike Garrus’s gentle teasing, Nihlus’s passion roared against her barriers—a man too long in the desert starving for water. It begged her to let him sweep her away in it . . . to let it consume her.

Dear God, Janey. It will. The firestorm inside him will burn you up. Are you ready for that? Are you ready to burn?

The gentle tingle along her limbs, the pulsing warmth in her belly . . . the delicious sensitivity of her skin . . . all of it retreated, pulling back to leave her chilled and numb.

The hand on her ribs slid upward, a knuckle touching the underside of her breast, and she jerked away from him. “No.” The word tumbled out, confused and terrified, but unsure of its own meaning.

Nihlus drew back, mandibles dropped, his stare confused, but also worried that he’d done something wrong. “Shepard?” He reached out, halting his fingers only centimetres from her arm. “Did I?”

She shook her head, not quite able to pull off any sort of convincing or reassuring smile. “It’s okay. You’re wonderful. I’m just—“

—Fucked up beyond all repair.

Shepard’s earpiece signalled an incoming call. “Shepard?” Liara said, hesitant, her voice soft. “Sorry to bother you, but I’m ready to head out. I just wanted . . . .”

Shepard stepped around Nihlus, her hand lifting to her ear. “Wait, please! We’re less than five minutes from the ship.” She started walking, grateful for the chance to normalize, get air flowing back into her lungs. Counting her breaths in time with her steps, she tried to settle all the armour no one could see back in place.

_In . . . two . . . three . . . four . . . five. Out . . . two . . . three . . . four . . . five. Come on, Janey. Breathe it out. Get it all lined back up. Pull yourself back together. Freaking out because a man you want actually wants you back . . . How mental is that? In . . . two . . . three . . . four . . . five._

She reined in the panic. “We’ll be right there. Shepard, out.”

“Liara?” he asked, jogging next to her as she sped up.

“Yes, she’s ready to go.” Shepard shook her head, thanking him silently for the professionalism in his tone. She gathered together a few more strays ends, knotting them up. “I know this is what is best for her, and for the war. I know it, and yet . . .”

Nihlus chuckled. “One of your kids is leaving the domin.” He sobered, and glanced across at her. “Setting things up the way you are, it’s going to be a very empty domin soon enough.”

Shepard just nodded, trying to ignore the dry knocking in her chest that accompanied thoughts of Tali, Shiala, Wrex, and even Legion leaving. She pushed it aside and kept running. She needed to look into Liara’s eyes and see that the researcher was following the path she felt called to, not just doing what she thought others wanted her to do.

Liara, Aethyta, Shiala and a large squad of asari commandos stood just outside the Normandy. Shepard grinned, surety settling in her gut as the commandos thrust themselves into her path, shotguns pointed at her belly. “Well, that’s a good sign.”

“It’s all right,” Liara said, a nervous chuckle following the words. “That’s Captain Shepard. Um . . . stand down.” She stepped around her bodyguards, her entire posture apologetic. “Sorry, Shepard.”

Shepard waved the apology off. “Don’t be, I suddenly feel a whole lot better about you leaving the ship.” She looked into the eyes of each commando, the steel that looked back easing the prickle of her inner alarm. Addressing them, she made herself as imposing as she could manage in the slinky little red number, glad for the slight heels. “If any harm comes to Liara T’Soni, you’d all better be dead or start running the very next second.” Remaining fixed on them, she waited until the scattered smirks faded into understanding.

Shepard took Liara’s hands. The gentle, blue grip felt warmer and didn’t tremble like it had before. “You’re sure this is what you want?”

“Yes. You were right about using Mother’s resources.” She smiled. “Consider me your Prothean Research Division. I won’t be more than a call away.” Her grip tightened. “Don’t worry about me, Shepard. Even though it isn’t what I thought I’d be doing with my life, it’s so much more important.”

Shepard pulled the asari into a hug. “I’m not worried about you. Not any more. Good luck, Liara. We’ll always be here if you need anything.” Drawing back, Shepard stepped aside to let Nihlus say goodbye.

The Spectre shook Liara’s hand. “Good luck, Liara, and thank you.”

Aethyta approached Shepard. “Thank you for being there when she needed someone.” She offered Shepard her hand.
Shaking it briskly, the captain said, “Don’t hesitate to call us if you think she needs help. She’s family.”

“And standing right here,” Liara said and sighed, a smile belying any ill humour. “All right. I’ll be in touch as soon as I get settled.” She nodded to her retinue. “Let’s go.”

Shepard nodded. “Good luck.”

“Do I have time to walk her to her ship, Captain?” Shiala asked.

Shepard nodded, then backed up until Nihlus’s arm pressed against the back of hers. “Well, there goes the first one.” She laughed when he gave her a gentle shove, but it died almost instantly as normal broke, letting the fear bleed through.

If they’d just started off better, if Nihlus had flirted back that day instead of reacting as he did . . . would they be hurrying back to her cabin right then to make love before falling asleep in one another’s arms? For a moment, she allowed that picture to form, the warmth of his breath, so quick and deep with desire, the almost frantic need behind his kisses, hands trying to discover every inch of her at once.

No, she shook off that thought as she moved away from Nihlus, registering the Normandy’s presence once more: solid, beautiful, sleek and real at her back. Real and full of people depending on her. A sick, overripe feeling twisted through her gut, and for a moment it took her entire will not to vomit.

And what about Garrus, asleep down in her bed, waiting for her to stop flitting around and just be with him? What about his gentleness, his infinite patience with her insanity, the quiet but real desire behind his touch?

What the great, living fuck are you doing, Jane Shepard? You’ve lost your mind, and you don’t have time to lose your mind, especially not over such foolishness. Or have your hormones made you forget the Reapers?

No, a galaxy awaited salvation. She didn’t have time or energy to waste on dating. She didn’t have the luxury of all the hair pulling and thrashing about like some fifteen-year-old deciding who to take to the spring dance. Sweet Jesus.

Dating. Her. What the hell had she been thinking?

Mikhailovich was right. She didn’t deserve a ship or crew like the Normandy. Not if she let herself get so easily distracted. Damn that cranky old bastard for being right. She looked down at her dress, shame burning a crown fire up her neck to scald her cheeks.

“Come on,” she said, her voice low. “Let’s get back to what we should be doing.” She picked at the dress, needing the heavy hand of padded cotton against her skin instead of the gentle brush of silk. “Tomorrow, 0630 in my quarters to plan the Luna mission.”

She caught the distressed flick of Nihlus’s mandibles out the corner of her eye, but pushed on through the outer hatch into decon.

He followed. “Shepard? What just happened?” When she tried to duck away from him, he grabbed a wrist. “No. Don’t just run. Talk to me. Did I go too far? What happened?”

After a moment spent trying to will the hatch open, she turned to face him. “It’s just . . . No, Nihlus, you didn’t do anything wrong. It’s just all way too much for me right now.” Damn those eyes staring into hers with so much hope and so much confusion. “I need to focus on stopping Saren. I just spent an entire night out eating at a nice restaurant and walking on a beach when there’s a galaxy hanging in the balance . . . and . . .”

He drew back. “And Garrus.” The depth and threadiness of his sigh told her how much he’d allowed himself to hope over the course of the evening.

“Yeah, and Garrus.” She pulled her hand away from him. “I like you, Nihlus. I really do. If I let myself go down this road, I could fall in love with you . . .

If you already haven’t.

“. . . but I . . . Garrus . . .” Her head dropped. “He . . . I . . .” She flailed helplessly a little, trying to find a way to explain past the terrible lump of fear and sorrow tangling deep in her throat.

He gripped her shoulder. “I understand, Shepard. He’s been your rock from the beginning, helping you get through the messes I made. I understand.”

She backed up a single step. “I’m trying to save a galaxy . . . we . . . we’re trying to save a galaxy.”
She stared down at the floor, unable to keep talking if she looked him in the eye. Her heart contracted, a tiny singularity of guilt and regret pulling at it. He reached up, but she ducked away from his hand. “Trying to figure this thing between the three of us out . . .” She gestured back and forth between them. “. . . and the war . . . I’m just not ready. It’s too much. I’m sorry, but I can’t explore this right now. Maybe . . . someday, when I’m not such a mess and life isn’t trying to tear me into so many pieces.”

“Shep—”

“I’m sorry, but I . . .” She met his eyes for a split second. “It’s Garrus.”

The door opened and she burst through, needing to escape before he spoke and everything she’d said flew out the airlock . . . and she ended up kissing him again. Fleeing, practically jogging the length of the CIC and down the stairs, she tried to rein in the panic ping-ponging around inside her, a last spark trying to find its way to oxygen. Counting off her steps, even rushed, allowed her to start slotting the pieces back into place.

The dim silence of the crew deck reached down inside of her, stroking the fear with reassuring fingers. “It’s all right,” the ship whispered. “You’re back where you belong. Calm down. You over-reacted as always. Just breathe and carry on.”

Slowing to a walk, she crossed the mess with a little more decorum, the mantles of captain and Garrus Vakarian’s new girlfriend finding their way back onto her shoulders. She hesitated outside her door for a moment to catch her breath.

She palmed the control, then stood in the open doorway, staring at the torin stretched out along her bed, facing the wall. In the light streaming through the portal, all his angles and planes stood out in harsh relief. He really was something.

“You going to stand there all night staring at me, or come in?” he grumbled, his voice heavy with sleep.

“Is there something wrong with admiring the view?” she asked, the heavy frown lines melting from her brow and around her eyes at the sound of his voice. That voice . . . in the dark under that building on Feros keeping the fear at bay with its warmth . . . breaking her out of her memories on Noveria . . . laughing helplessly next to her above that lava pit on Therum.
Sweet baby Jesus, where would I be without him? How in the name of the freaking Enkindlers’ did some random C-Sec agent with far too much attitude become so important to me in a couple of weeks?

The answer to that question played out in flashes of a hundred moments of quiet support, an offered hand, his infuriating over-protective streak. She stepped inside, but too close for the door to shut.

“Not if you do it with the door closed.” His hand lifted and flapped toward the cot set up by the door. “I’m supposed to be using that, remember? I probably should be. I think this mattress has dislocated my shoulder.”

You’ve been a selfish ass, Shepard. Land, treat the torin the way he deserves to be treated, and focus on your bloody war.

Shepard let the door close and walked over to her closet, pulling the dress over her head as she went. “I’ve gotten used to having a tough old, pointy heating unit at night.” She hung up the dress, and slipped her t-shirt over her head before removing her bra. “You’re forbidden to use the cot.”

“Glad I can be of service,” he grumbled. “Are you decent, yet?”

“Just a second. Sheesh, so impatient.” She slid on her shorts. “Okay, you can roll over now.” She organized her shoes and grabbed her kit. “Be back as soon as I’ve got all this crap off my face.”

Shepard jogged through the almost silent ship on bare feet. She could still hear the waves caressing the sand, still feel the warm breeze tickling its fingers over her legs and arms, still feel Nihlus pressed up against her, the sound of his breathing in time with the surf.

Seriously, Janey? The second you left Garrus? You’re pathetic.

She ducked into the head and strod to the sink, staring at her reflection, her lipstick smeared and rubbed away. Dammit, she’d said goodbye to Liara looking like she’d been making out with half of Nos Astra. Roughly, she scrubbed it and the rest of the night away, putting everything back in order, lining it all back up with each swipe of the cloth. Ten minutes later, skin glowing a fiery pink, she towelled off and headed back to her quarters.

The silver gleam of Garrus’s eyes greeted her when she walked back into her quarters. He’d turned over and leaned up on an elbow, the blankets folded back invitingly.

She chuckled. “You smooth ol’ dog, you.” After tucking her kit back into her closet, she walked over and sat facing the head of the bed, her knee drawn up. She reached up and caressed his cheek for a moment, just savouring the familiar roughness of his hide under her fingers, the myrrh and cloves scent of his cleanser, the affection in his eyes.

“So, how did your date go?” he asked, his sub-vocals rich and rumbling heavily as he closed his eyes and leaned into her hand.

The movement set off the burn in her chest again. She was such an idiot to have not just grabbed hold of him and put everything else out of her head. Her hand slid down to rest just inside the cowl of his robe. “You know, Garrus, I love how perceptive you are . . . how intuitive and intelligent,” she said, stroking the backs of her fingers along the ridge of his neck. “But sometimes, you’re a dumbass.”

Garrus scowled at her. “Why? What do you mean?”

“It was a good date. Nihlus and I had a good time. We talked, ate, went for a walk along the beach and talked some more. We even kissed, but I belong here, in my stupid, old PJs, curled up next to you.” She placed her hand against his cheek again, her thumb following the line of his mouth. “Stop trying to force Nihlus and I together. Seriously. I’m not here because I’m too inexperienced or too angry to realize that I’m in love with him.”

He stared into her eyes, his just gleams of reflected light in the half-dark. “Why are you here?”

“Because on Therum, you did up my seat belt without making anything of it. Because you’re willing to face the storms to come, and I don’t mean the Reapers.” Nodding toward the lamp, she caressed the upper plate of his mouth and his chin with her fingertips. “Because even though you’re here, and I’m not scared when you are, you always make sure there’s light in the room.” What she saw in his eyes, shining at her brighter than the reflection, made her cheeks heat with shame again, but she pushed it aside. “And because it doesn’t even occur to you that I might be more attracted to you than I am Nihlus, you idiot.

“I’m here because I want to be with you. Remember?” She leaned in and pressed a soft kiss to his upper mouth plate then wagged her head. “That you’re a great kisser for a guy with no lips doesn’t hurt your case either.” She grinned, her mouth still pressed against his.

Curling in tighter against him, she tucked her head under his chin. “I’m tired of being crazy, Garrus. Bouncing back and forth between the two of you . . . it’ll drive me mad, and I won’t be able to fight this war. I need to stay sane enough to do that. Does that make sense?”

He nodded and kissed her brow, nuzzling her softly. “Okay.” A rough, rolling chuckle tickled her skin. “You could just date Alenko. He’s the sanest choice.”

She let out a deep, lamenting sigh. “I can’t. He’s scared of me . . . said he’d rather date Wrex.” She smiled at the laugh that answered that, waiting until the mirth faded from the pocket of space around them before she said, “I don’t know if we’ll make it through Hurricane Shepard, but in the meantime I’m with you.” She shrugged. “If I feel the need to be with Nihlus, I’ll let you know. Until then, I expect my dates to be with you.”

Lautus -- Literal: Considering oneself too fashionable or important to associate with people considered less so. Vernacular: Cool, hip.

Stulti mendur -- Literal: foolish lies. Vernacular: Bullshit.

Domin -- House, but in terms of it being a home.
“Good morning,” Shepard said, greeting the small cluster of crew gathered in her quarters. She activated the holo-emitter in the center of her table, adjusting the view until it showed a hundred square kilometre area of the lunar surface. Several small outposts dotted the landscape around three bunkers in the center. “This is the Alliance Lunar training base.” She grimaced. “I’m sure the Alliance would be thrilled with me sharing these details with all of you, which is why we’re not in the comm room with the recorders.”

“Are you sure, ma’am?” Ashley asked, her scowl expressing all her doubts. “You could end up court-martialed.”

Shepard nodded. “Yeah, I could, but they’ve tossed a huge mess in my lap, and it’s going to take all of us to clean it up.”

She called up the main cluster of bunkers. “Hackett called me the other day because the VI in charge of the live fire battle simulations at this base has gone rogue. Hackett couldn’t confirm that it may have evolved into an AI, but I think that’s what he suspects.” She let out a soft mutter of regret as she zoomed back out to the base view. “AI or not, it has killed a lot of good people. We’re going to need everyone on deck to fight our way in and shut it down.”

She straightened, her hands on her hips. “One major thing in our favour is that it’s an older base, and the hardware isn’t state of the art.”

Kaidan sucked in an understanding breath. “No on-site fabricators.”

“Oh yeah, that would have been a bitch,” Ash agreed. “My last training stint, those mothers put out a new drone every three minutes.”

Shepard nodded. “Here, the base had a compliment of two hundred assault drones, one hundred and twenty rocket drones, and a hundred mechs, so that’s our maximum resistance.” She shook her head and looked up, meeting their eyes. “That’s not to say an AI might not have upgraded or reassigned units, changed minefield layouts and set traps. Even though we’re facing a finite number of units, if the VI is self-aware the playbook has to go out the window. It’s designed to analyze attacks and counter them, and it’s been learning from everyone who came before us. I’ve looked at the logs of those attacks, and all I can say is glory hallelujah that they went in thinking that they were facing a VI.”

She zoomed in on an outpost in the far northwestern corner of the base. “Our other major asset is that it is a training base. Lots of good, solid cover.” She pointed out the armoured barricades and portable shield nodes. “The bunkers are set up like the interior of a pirate or raider base. Most of us have seen our share of those. Use the environment, move in cautiously, take your time. It’s not a race or a timed exercise.”

“Ash, myself, and every Marine on this boat has been through there a hundred times,” Kaidan said.
“They haven’t changed the layout in those rooms for three years.”

Shepard nodded. “Exactly. So have I, although not for a while, and that over-familiarity could get us killed. That’s why I’m assigning a non-Alliance team member to each squad. Put them on point, and let them keep all of you on your toes. Brother Sparky, you’ll have Nihlus on your team, and Ash, you’ll be taking old man Urdnot. Both of them have the instincts and skills to see what the three of us might dismiss.” She waited for them both to agree before moving on.

“Okay, that stuff is steps 5-10. Our first hurdle is going to be getting past the exterior defenses.” She looked up to where Tali and Legion stood next to one another on the opposite side of the table. “That’s where the two of you come in. Out here, at this outpost, there is an override that will neutralize the sentries and patrols . . ..” She grinned, crooked and sly. “You know, once you hack your way into the shed and blow it to hell.”

“Yes, ma’am,” Tali replied, her smile evident in her voice.

“There’s a minefield. Its previous dimensions are shown here. I’ll send you the information and the frequency for the mines to your omnis with your mission data but don’t trust it . . . an AI would be able to change all of it.” She zoomed into a tighter view of that sector. “You’re . . . we’re all . . . going to be met by platoon strength resistance. Fifty-fifty drones and mechs out on the perimeters, more drones in the interiors. Do not allow any experience you’ve had with LOKI mechs make you complacent. These are not security mechs.”

She winced inwardly as she switched to the hologram of the mechs, a vague shame whispering through the back of her head. “Traitor,” it whispered. “You’ve been dancing along the line from the beginning, Shepard, but this . . . this takes the first step over.” She cleared her throat, and gave her head a quick shake, chasing that thought away. The mission was for the good of the Alliance. They’d survive a little leaked training intel.

She dragged herself back to the briefing. “These training mechs are quick, well-balanced, able to roll and take cover, have advanced targeting software, and if they’re being run by an AI they’ll react and adapt quickly.” Switching to the drone schematic, she pushed away from the table, straightening. “We’ll be facing two types of drones as well. Assault and rocket. They’re not overpowered by any means, but again, quick.”

“It doesn’t take much more than two hits from the rocket drones to kill you,” Kaidan said.

Shepard nodded and changed the hologram back to the overview of the lunar surface. “Tali and Legion, you’ll take the Mako along with Jenkins. We’ll drop you a klick back from the minefield. Go in, blow the entire shed where the controls are housed.” She highlighted their target.

“Sparky, Ash, our teams are going to assault the installations at the other three perimeter outposts. Just disembark, dig in and try to distract some of the patrol units from Tali and Legion. The VI probably won’t commit many units to protecting our positions, because there isn’t anything truly important at any of them. There is, however, an APC at each one. Take out the resistance and grab a ride.”

“If they’re functional,” Ash said. “The VI may have disabled them in the previous assaults.”

Shepard shrugged. “It may have, but the other teams didn’t even attempt to take out the external forces, so we might get lucky. If not, we’ll have to risk the Normandy to take out the missile turrets on the roofs of the three bunkers and then Joker can pick us up and give us a lift.” She paused. “Questions up to this point?” When no one said anything, she nodded. “Good. Okay, we’ll rendezvous outside the range of the missile turrets and go in together, all three APCs, to take out the missile turrets on our bunker. Once those are down . . . Sparky . . . bunker one. Ashley . . . bunker two. I’ll take Garrus and two Marines into the last bunker.

“The previous teams tried to take out one at a time, hoping that they could weaken the defenses, but the opposite happened. The VI boosted the defenses and increased the number of units from room to room, bunker to bunker. We’ll go in at maximum strength, split into three teams and just take it damned slow. This is not a barn storming.” She looked into each set of eyes staring back at her, waiting to see agreement there before moving on.

Over the next half hour, they hashed out their plan, buttoning everything up as tight as could be hoped for. As Nihlus had told her weeks before: plans were great until about a minute after they hit the ground.

One minute . . .

One minute after Tali and Legion hit the ground in the Mako—five minutes after Shepard’s team jumped down out of the Normandy—a plume of flame and black smoke billowed a hundred metres into the air above their position.

Air stopped flowing into Shepard’s lungs for three seconds, even though her finger didn’t stop squeezing the trigger, bullets peppering a rocket drone trying to deke around her cover on the left.

“Shepard!”

“I saw it!” she yelled back without looking toward Garrus’s position. “Keep them off me for a few seconds!” She lifted her hand to the side of her helmet and opened a channel. “Shepard to Team A. Tali, Legion, Jenkins . . . come in.” Only static answered. She glanced over her cover, but Garrus and the Marines had the drones well under control.

“Come on, people. Someone answer me. What’s going on over there?” Shepard shouted over the link. She popped up, sweeping the area again. Why weren’t there any mechs? They’d been attacked immediately by twenty drones, but each of the outposts should have had a contingent of mechs as well.

“Tali! Come on, someone give me some good news from over there.” Her brain began to spin, coming up with a new plan to take out the shed if Team A had failed. She vaguely registered the sound of Droney dying and opened her omnitool, respawning it even as she flipped through the options to take out the shed.

She glanced over at the outpost’s Mako. It looked undamaged. They’d have to finish off the drones and head over themselves . . . deal with whatever they found and get it done.

“Shepard! Mech at your nine o’clock. Four metres out,” Garrus bellowed.

She glanced to her left and sure enough a mech marched toward her, shots from its SMG pinging off the other side of her barricade. “Where the fuck did that come from?” she shouted back.

“They just appeared. Ten of them. Must have been cloaked.”

Shepard hit the closest with an overload, tearing down its shields, then fired four volleys of round into it. “All teams, look out for cloaked mechs. They’ve been upgraded.”

“I don’t think they’re Alliance mechs at all,” Ash yelled back, the sounds of gunfire loud in the background. “They’re tough as hell, but sabotage seems to make them hurt.”
“Roger that.” Shepard queued it up then leaned out, Roger taking out the thing’s glowing optics before she unleashed the sabotage and it went down, squealing a mechanical death warble.

“Team A to Shepard,” Tali’s voice came through, thready, but most definitely alive. “The Mako was destroyed by enemy fire, but we got out and are in cover.” The line went to static for a few seconds as Shepard moved on to a new target. Seven mechs closed on them and fast. They had time to take maybe another one each before the mechs overwhelmed their cover.

“You were right, Shepard,” Tali said, the channel connecting again. “The VI changed everything up. There are landmines all through the area. We have a couple dozen drones on us, and reinforcements moving in on us from all sides. Units just appeared on the scope. ETA twelve minutes. Jenkins has an idea to get us across the minefield once we get these drones down. It’s a little crazy, but we don’t have time to come up with anything else.”

Shepard pressed her palm to her brow, smoothing out the furrows as she packed down her relief. “Do what you need to. I trust you to get the job done, Tali. Good luck.”

“Yes, ma’am. Tali’Zorah, out.”

“Shepard, you’re going to have to move,” Garrus called. “They’re all converging on you.”

“Shit.” She glanced out. “I’ve been identified as command.” She traded Roger for Ingrid, taking some fire as she lined up a headshot that took down the closest mech. “Cover me, I’m going to move to the barricade ten metres to my seven o’clock.”

“Roger that.” The turian’s sniper rifle let out a deep boom, and a mech’s head disintegrated.

Taking a handful of quick, deep breaths, Shepard coiled, springing out from behind the cover, her boots digging deep furrows in the loose footing. Praise the Enkindlers for the gravity compensator in her armour. Bouncing across the moon was no way to fight or move with any speed. Even so, the mechs’ gunfire whittled her shields down faster than she could move. She dug in, straining every muscle fibre, her heart banging hard and fast against her ribs. A long mission still loomed ahead, not leaving the option for taking even a handful of bullets.

Then the barrage stopped. Barely resisting the urge to look back, she tweaked her compensator and dove for the barricade. Ducking her head, she rolled over the top of it, reset to standard grav, then popped up, Ingrid ready and eager in her hand.

She saw the reason for the cessation of fire in the form of Garrus fighting backward toward her position. “Get behind the barricade, dammit,” she hollered. “Sweet baby Jesus, C-Sec. How many times do I have to tell you not to do that?” She took out two mechs with two headshots, overheating Ingrid, but it cut down the fire enough for Garrus to make it to cover.

“Drones are down,” Gladstone called. “Three mechs remaining.”

“.Shepard,” Joker called, adding his voice to the chorus. “Permission to use GARDIANS to give Team A some air support? They’ve got a lot of ground units converging on their position.”

“Permission granted. Just a couple of passes and stay well away from any installations. Buy them some time.” She and Garrus took out another mech.

“Roger that, ma’am. Normandy, out.”

Exactly two minutes and forty-five seconds later, according to Shepard’s HUD, the last mech went down. “Let’s get that Grizzly fired up, Brother C-Sec.” As she strode toward the APC, she opened “Team B, report. How are you doing, Sparky?”

“Cleared out here, Captain. Couple of minor wounds. Mako is running. We’re ready to go.”

“Good work. Meet you there.” She switched to Ashley’s frequency. “Team C, how are you doing?”

“On our way to the rendezvous, Captain. No casualties, but Pakti rebroke his hand,” the chief reported.

“Oh, does he need medevac?”

Ashley grumbled. “He says he doesn’t. It’s splinted, and it’s his non-dominant hand. He could pull drag and keep an eye on our backs.”

“Okay, I’ll leave it to your judgement, but tell him he has to deal with the wrath of Shepard if he gets himself killed. Good work, Ash. Shepard, out.” She climbed in the back of the Mako, taking a seat on the bench in the back.

“Not driving, Shepard?” Garrus asked as he took a seat at the canon and started up the electronics.

“No. I’m sure Gladstone can get us to the bunkers without driving us off anything too steep.” She buckled herself in and opened a channel to the Normandy. “Joker, report. How are things going with Team A?”

“They’re pinned down, but we’ve bought them twenty minutes. Do you want us to make a pass at that shed?”

“No. I don’t want to risk the Normandy. Who knows what the AI has up it’s sleeve. A powerful generator and computer core like that . . . could put out an EMP that drops her right out of the sky. We’ll signal you once we’ve got everything wrapped up. Shepard, out.”

One more call to make. Her heart sped up a little as she opened Tali’s frequency. “Team A, report in.”

“We’re just about through the defensive units, Captain,” Tali replied, her voice laced with pain and fatigue. “We think we’ve got a way to clear a path through the mines. Hopefully, this outpost will be a smoking crater in the next five minutes.”

“Good work, Team A. Report in when you’re mission is complete.”

“Yes, ma’am. Tali’Zorah, out.”

Shepard sank into her seat a little. Why could nothing ever just be simple?

One minute . . .

One minute into their assault on the bunker, Garrus brought up a fist, halting them, then pointed to a small cluster of blinking lights attached to the side of a crate.

Shepard cursed under her breath. Damn, she hated being right. Traps. “Can you disarm it?” she whispered.

He shrugged, then got down on the floor and opened his omnitool and scanned the device.

“Shepard to Teams B and C, we have traps. Small devices at floor level.” She crouched down, nudging Garrus gently as he reached out toward the trap. “Careful. It’s probably got proximity or motion detectors,” she warned him. Her heart beat fast and light, her hands tingling, every nerve alive even as she winced, awaiting the boom.

“Then get back. And stop jabbing me while I’m messing with dubious electronic devices.” He glanced back. “Here, make yourself useful and have a look at these scans.”

Shepard opened the file when her omnitool beeped, scanning the tech inside the small box. “It’s not a bomb. No accelerants or triggers, no boom anywhere.” She peered closer. “It’s also not Alliance. All their components are proprietary—Alliance marks on every piece. This is completely clean.” She stepped around him. “It definitely has a proximity detector though. Probably triggers something further in. Joy.”

His omnitool sprouted a small knife that he slipped in behind the device, popping it free of the crate. “Well, they know we’re here now.” He got to his feet and looked it over then passed it back to her. “Do we proceed?” He nodded at the glowing force field blocking the door on the far side of the room. “Maybe they trigger the barriers?”

Shepard popped the back off, searched out the circuit to the power source and disabled it before shoving it into a pocket. “Let’s go. Whatever it is, we’ll find out eventually.” She looked up to find him watching her, or at least facing her direction. It was hard to tell with the blacked out face plate of his helmet. Still, the reaction in her gut said that he was watching her. “What?”

He chuckled. “I forget you’re an engineer.” Turning back toward the exit, he shrugged. “It’s sort of sexy.”

“Oh for pity’s sake, C-Sec, we’re working.” Despite her grumble, a wide, stupid grin snuck up on her. At least until she heard Gladstone snigger. She spun on him, a fiercely pointed finger stopping a centimetre from his face plate. “Stow it, laughing boy, or someone’s going to get hurt real bad. Focus.”

He cleared his throat, quailing as all humour fled before her wrath. “Sorry, ma’am.”

It took six overloads coupled with sabotages aimed at the shield emitters around the door frame to get the barrier down. Shepard scanned the tech with her omnitool. “Blessed Enkindlers, someone upgraded the crap out of these.”

“Are they the same as the device?” Garrus asked, his back to her as he watched the short corridor to the next room.

Shepard shook her head, a growing sense of disquiet gnawing its way into her gut. Still, her inner alarm remained twitchy but silent at the base of her skull. “No, this is all Alliance. I think the AI upgraded this after the last attack. Slow us down enough to bottleneck us.” She keyed up a tool, the micro-fabricator creating a small arc device. “We’re going to have to sabotage them badly to make sure they don’t just spring right back up behind us. Get the emitters on the other side. Just fry the living shit out of them.” Cutting and soldering, she made sure that the emitters on her side of the door would need to be replaced in order to work. Finished, she sent a text warning to the other two teams to follow suit.

“Okay, move slowly,” she said, stepping over the threshold. “We’ll scan as we go. I do not want to get trapped in here when we open the door on the other side.”

They found two more sets of emitters along the corridor. Shepard shook her head, slow knots tying themselves into every inch of her gut. No VI would go through such lengths to protect itself. A virtual intelligence answered the problems posed in the scenario according to its programmed choices, but it possessed no creativity, no will to survive. Those emitters screamed self-preservation.

We’re fighting our way in here to kill a brand new life.

She packed that whisper down tight, swallowing the sick, bile taste of guilt. New life or no, people had died and more could die. Her people could die if they didn’t get the thing shut down. Looking up the corridor to where Garrus worked on the last set of emitters, she steeled herself. She’d charted her course.

Lifting a hand to her radio, she checked in with the other two teams. Neither had progressed as far as they had, but were taking their time to disable the traps as they went. Both also reported no contact with drones or mechs.

“Team A to Shepard,” Tali’s very welcome voice called in Shepard’s ear. “The exterior defenses are down. Scans show all mechs, drones, and automated defenses disabled outside the bunkers. You don’t have to worry about a rear assault.”

Shepard grinned. “Excellent work, Team A. Join us in the third bunker at your earliest convenience.”

“We’re already on our way. ETA: two minutes. Team A, out.”

Shepard let out a breath she felt like she’d been holding since she saw the Mako destroyed. One less thing to worry about. Why then did her alarm spike a little higher with every passing second? Cracking her neck, she rolled her shoulders and stretched her jaw. Focus. She needed to relax and focus on what lay on the other side of the next door.

“The bulk of the attack will come in this next room.” She nodded. “Can that hidden room scanner of yours tell us if there’s a welcome wagon waiting directly on the other side?”

He nodded and keyed it up. “Nothing. Appears to be a small alcove with access to the main room on either side.”

She nodded, the battle high starting to hit her blood. Enough creeping around doing fiddly work. As adrenaline hit her bloodstream, her entire body began to chant in time with her heartbeat. Time to put a whole lot of bullets into things. “The second we step around that wall, we’re open to take fire from pretty much the entire room.” As she spoke, an alternative presented itself, and she grinned. “How good are you at climbing?”

Not waiting for an answer, she turned to Gladstone and Chase. “You two go around, to the right, take cover and get their attention. We’ll go up and see if we can’t surprise them.” When they answered to the affirmative, Shepard set her shoulders, let the adrenaline’s sweet music sing through her blood, and signalled Garrus to open the door.

One minute . . . .

One minute after the last echo of gunfire died, Shepard pushed herself up off the stack of crates, reaching up to grab hold of one of the beams along the ceiling. Stalking along the edge, she used her bird’s eye view to make sure they’d cleared the room.

“All clear up here,” Garrus called from the next wall of crates over. He chuffed, the sound coming out like a rifle shot. “Although, if those cloaked mechs are in here . . .”

Shepard nodded and clambered down. “I didn’t see any visible shimmers or anything, but we didn’t spot them at all outside either. Just keep sharp.” She started across the room, her eyes and Roger sweeping back and forth without resting. The drones and mechs hadn’t given them an easy fight to take the room, coming at them from every direction, but still, not the sort of fight she anticipated. Part of her hoped that they owed the ease of victory to the AI not being an AI after all. The other part squirmed in the grip of ice-cold claws sinking into her spine. The whole mission felt as though someone kept throwing just enough bait in front of them to keep them moving.

Shepard shook off the dread, muttering, “It’s not like we have any choice.”

Focus on the fight, Janey. Get in there, get it done, and keep moving. Your people are just as tired as you are.

“Chase and Gladstone, take positions at four and eight. Watch our backs. C-Sec, my ten. Five metre spread.” When they moved into position, she signalled them forward, keeping their advance as silent as possible. Several times they stopped, Shepard sending two of them to check an alcove in the crate maze, or cover behind a bank of computers. They arrived at the far door unmolested.

“Okay, let’s get this barrier down and get this over with.” She didn’t need to tell anyone where to be, Garrus stepping up next to her to start tearing down and taking apart the barrier emitters, the other two watching the room. Just like every other corridor, they found two sets of inactive emitters dividing the space into thirds. One last gold/red barrier waited behind the door at the end. On the other side, a cross corridor led to the two rooms where the VI’s conduits awaited destruction.

Shepard started fusing the circuitry, the slight hiss and crackle of the sparks from their arc devices the only sounds bouncing around inside her helmet, but then, gradually enough that she mistook it for her own heartbeat at first, another sound whispered into her consciousness. A steady drumming grew louder and louder, the floor trembling in time to its rhythm.

The whir and whine of servos and mechanical joints joined in, strings layering under the percussion.

“Mechs incoming,” Chase called. “Lots of them. They’re uncloaking all through the room. How didn’t we run into them?”

Fear galvanized Shepard, shoring up weary joints and lacing steel cables through muscle. “Close up.” She deactivated her omnitool and stepped over the threshold. Closed doors blocked both ends of the hall. The one to her right contained the core.

“Garrus, you and Gladstone take the room to the left. Destroy those conduits. Chase, come on. We’ll go right, take out the core.” Shepard glanced behind them in the split second before she turned the corner into the cross-corridor. Mechs marched toward them, spilling out of the spaces between crates, their advance halfway across the room. Metal feet beat against the floor in double time, their impact setting the entire structure trembling. SMGs lifted in perfect synchronization, the first bullets zipping through the space Shepard had occupied the moment before.

“We’re being herded,” Garrus shouted.

“I know. Just take the conduits out. Once the computer goes down, the mechs won’t be a problem.”
Palming the door control, Shepard sent out a prayer to anyone who might be listening, asking that they wouldn’t slam straight into a barrier.

Chase rebounded off the glowing barricade, slamming back into Shepard.

“Just once!” Shepard cried, cursing as she keyed in an overload, taking out the first emitter, then bringing up a sabotage right behind it. Only two were down when the first mechs turned the corner and started firing. “Would it kill the universe to make things easy just once for fuck’s sake?”

“Team A to Shepard,” Tali called. “We’re in the main room, coming up fast behind those mechs. Hopefully we can pull a few off you.”

“Use the team frequency, Tali,” Shepard called, overloading and sabotaging the third emitter. “Chase, keep them off me the best you can.” Shepard shields sparked as she turned, shrugging Roger into her hand to fire while she waited for the cooldown.

“Your omnitool shields, Shepard!” Garrus reminded her.

Shepard waited until her armour shields failed, then stuck Roger between her knees, activated Garrus’s overclocked shields on her omnitool, and set in to take out another emitter.

One of the mechs in the front firing line suddenly turned on its fellows, seeding chaos into the ranks. Praise be to the sweet baby Jesus for team members with hacking skills. That mech bought Shepard enough time to take out the fourth emitter before the rest concentrated fire on her again.

Her overclocked shields began to send failure warnings, but a quick check showed her armour shields recharging. Then, to Shepard’s right, Chase went down. Grabbing the woman’s armour, Shepard dragged her out of fire, protecting Chase with her own shields. Another two mechs turned their guns from Shepard to fire on their own.

“Come on. Come on, comeon, comeon,” she muttered, overloading the fifth emitter. Then Tali appeared beside her.

“I’ll get the last one, Captain.” Deft, quick fingers took out the emitter, the barricade falling. “I’ll hold the door,” the quarian called.

Shepard dragged Chase out of the line of fire, bringing Roger around to aim at the first conduit. Four bullets and it went up in a shower of sparks. One after the other, smooth as clockwork, the conduits went down. Shepard ran to the core. “Are the conduits down in that room?” she called into the radio.

“Yes, ma’am,” Gladstone answered.

Shepard opened fire on the computer core, bullets tearing through all four wings and the main column. Even after she heard the mechs in the corridor stop firing, she kept going until she reduced the damned thing to a smoking ruin.

“Damn.” She sagged against the console at her back, every muscle in her body aching with exhaustion. “Teams report in. Everyone okay out there?”

Her radio let out a sharp peel of sound that stabbed through her head like two gauge wire rammed in one ear and yanked out the other. Folding in half, she clapped her hands against the sides of her helmet, but then the sound died. “Fuck, what the hell was that?” Cautiously, she opened a channel again. “Did anyone else just have their ears taken out?”
No answer.

“Shepard to any team member.” She pushed herself up and stepped around the ruined core, heading for the door. Tali and Legion held Chase in a chair carry between them and were hurried toward the exit. “Anyone hear me?”

No answer.

“Crap, that thing fried my radio.” She stopped a couple metres inside the door and took a quick scan of the air quality. All good. Proper pressure, composition . . . no poison or dangerous gasses. She popped the seals on her helmet and lifted it off. “Hey. Did the rest of you lose radio just now?”

She strode toward the door, slamming into a shifting blue barrier that sprang up across the portal as she tried to cross the threshold. Reeling back, she stumbled, searing arcs of electricity skipping along her armour as she tumbled onto one knee, a hand braced against the floor. The shocks faded, and she looked up, staring at the strange, almost water-like barrier.

“What the hell?” She staggered back to her feet, spinning around as she heard something whir to life. For a long moment, she didn’t see anything, but then a chime sounded and a drone appeared, a spinning and whirling ball of light and force fields, just like her own. Along the far wall, a line of mechs dropped their cloaks, their weapons raised and firing as they stepped forward.

“Oh crap.” Shepard ran backward, diving into cover behind a crate just inside the door. “Ummm . . . people, I appear to be in some fairly serious shit here.”

One minute . . .
Chapter Summary

Luna . . . yep, somedays it just does NOT pay to get out of bed.

“Shepard? Are you all right?”

Shepard scrambled up, her back to the crate, bullets playing deadly music as they sank into the thick polymer of her cover. Behind her she heard Garrus overloading the barrier, the roasted ozone stench of the thing letting her know it wouldn’t go down without a fight.

“For now.” She took a couple of deep breaths to calm her shaking. They did nothing to ease the sick twisting in her guts. Sealed in. She forced that thought away the best she could, then launched Droner and peered up over the barrier to assess the situation. Eight mechs and three drones moved in on her position, but not as quickly as she would’ve thought. When faced with a single enemy combatant, cut off from rescue but only by a few minutes . . . logic said swarm and overwhelm. Instead, they hung back, the mechs spreading out in a slowly closing semi-circle. Only the drones advanced with any sort of speed, two of them distracted by Droner. She took the last out with an overload and let out a relieved sigh.

Drones: no problem.

She brought Ingrid up, sighted down the mech on her far left, and fired. It staggered, but didn’t go down. A direct headshot should have flattened it. Her teeth clenched as frustration and a thick thread of fear wormed its way through her. What the hell were those things? The fear wrapped itself around her throat, squeezing with the inexorable grip of a boa constrictor. She opened her omnitool to scan it, but it deflected the scan completely. She scowled down at her omnitool. Failing her. Her tools were all failing her.

Alone, trapped . . . sweet Jesus . . . trapped. She popped up, her shields complaining as she took fire, trying to find another way out. There had to be a way out. She needed to get out.

Stop it! Get down and grab some damned control, Janey.

“Shepard!” Garrus yelled, his voice muffled by the barrier, but enough to break through the walls of her cage. “What are you doing? Get behind cover!”

She ducked back down. Unless they got the barrier down, she had no way out. And she couldn’t die, not with so much of the fight left.

Use your head, Janey. Test them. Every mech, every device has a weakness.

“How’s it going with that barrier, C-Sec?” she called over her shoulder.

“It’s not going down. I don’t know what’s powering this thing, but it’s nothing I can take down with my overload or sabotage. Targismar!” His sniper rifle coughed once and then again. Assault rifle bullets played a symphony across its surface.

“Wow, you better not kiss your mama with that mouth, C-Sec,” she said, forcing a laugh, but it just closed the room down around her, panic’s sharp edge cutting into her again. She overloaded another drone, changing out Ingrid for Roger to go after the mech. After sabotaging it, she hit it with at least fifty rounds, popping in and out of cover to avoid fire from the rest. While she fired, she watched for any hint of weakness. The only thing she saw was a tiny opalescent shimmer each time a bullet impacted the thing’s shields. “What the fuck is the deal here?”

It walked passed a table, its shields melting away a corner of the plastic top that intruded upon their envelope.

“Oh crap.” The snake wrapped itself around her neck, hissing in pleasure at the rabbit-quick thump of her pulse against its coils. “Come on, Shepard. Think.” Then . . . understanding. The shimmer was her bullets vaporizing upon impact. An incendiary shield. No wonder it didn’t go down.

“The mechs have incendiary shields, C-Sec,” she shouted. “Any ideas?”

“I get this fucking barrier down and get you out of there?” He slammed a fist against the barrier then pulled back and cleared his throat. He raked his talons over his fringe. “Sorry, Shepard. Not helping.” He rumbled deep in his throat, and swiped at the upper plate of his mouth with the back of his hand. “Cryo?”

She grinned, a cool breath of relief whispering through her. It might just work if the shield made their chassis run hot. “Worth a shot.” Unclipping two grenades from her belt, she set them for magnetic grapple and cryo detonation. Holding her breath, she sent out a vague prayer and lobbed one straight at the mech’s chest, detonating the charge as soon as it hit. Jubilation and relief combined into a heady brew as slivers of frost sliced up the metal plating on its body, the metal cracking in the split second before the whole thing blew apart. Pieces rained down on her, tendrils of smoke drifting up from where they landed on the deck plating.

“Yes! You’re a genius, C-Sec.”

A chime sounded. Shepard popped up over her cover to see a new enemy drone wink into being. An overload winked it right back out. A smile drifted across her lips. Felt good to attack something and just kill it. Proof of at least basic competency.

She looked down at her belt. Five grenades left, seven mechs. She tossed the second grenade. The mech dropped into a roll, but not quickly enough. Another one down, but the snake whispered, as it slid its coils over her skin. The mechs were learning.

“No time to get complacent. Need to keep surprising them.”

Leaning back against the crate, thighs shaking and burning with the strain of remaining crouched for so long, Shepard flipped through possibilities. The next time, the mech would anticipate and move before she could detonate. She might be able to fake them out once, but it would wreak havoc with her accuracy.

She grabbed a chunk of metal and stood, throwing the garbage at the nearest mech. When it rolled to evade the fake grenade, she tracked it, hitting it dead on the side of the head with the real thing. It blew just as it regained its feet. Three down. “There you go, Shepard,” she muttered to herself. “You’re never trapped. Not any more.”

She heard Droney go down and respawned it just in time for the fabricator to spit another one out as well. She remained focused on the remaining mechs, letting the drones deal with one another. As one, the mechs stepped forward, walking slowly, but she had maybe a minute before they overran her position. Still, the fear withdrew, leaving her calm, her muscles regaining some strength. The room, her thoughts, and what she needed to do all crystallized in the quiet left behind.
“Tell me that barrier is down!”

“We’re going to use one of the demolition charges to blow it,” Tali told her. “You’ll want to move to cover at the far end of the room.”

“Roger that.” She glanced up. The left side of the room presented her best chance to get by the mech advance, but maybe . . . if she could move quickly enough . . . . Yes. Surety calmed her hands, and she hung Roger on her back. If she could claim to have an element, it would be certain death situations.

Like the proverbial pig in the mud, Janey.

She pulled two more grenades, set them and then charged out of cover, bolting straight for the furthest two mechs on the right. A wild grin crept across her face as she saw her opening. A table and chairs forced the mechs to separate, circling around either side. Hollering a wordless challenge, she leaped up onto the table, dropping the grenades onto the top of their heads before springing into a forward somersault. She hit the ground behind them hands first, tucking into a roll that brought her straight back up on her feet.

“Thank you, Mrs. Johnson and ninth grade phys. ed.”

Two strides carried her to the computer core, the grenades’ blast waves giving her a helpful little shove into cover as they blew the mechs apart, peppering her back with shrapnel. She covered her head and waited for the debris to stop raining down, peering out from under her hands when it did.

Shepard scrambled to her feet and leaned out to survey the room. She pushed aside relief that her gambit had worked and started trying to figure out how best to take out the last three.

Then the far side of the room erupted into fire and smoke, chunks of prefab and rock blasting across to smash into the core and hammer huge dents into the wall. A twisted piece of the door frame parted Shepard’s hair and sank more than a foot into the metal and bedrock behind her.

“Holy living fuck, people!” she shouted, her heart hammering in her throat as she looked up at the piece of metal pressed against her face. “The words I think you were looking for are ‘fire in the hole’.” A deep tremor settled into Shepard’s hands, but she clenched them into fists a couple of times, then shook them out.

Survive seven of the scariest mechs of all time just to be taken out by my own people. Not cool!

A quick inventory of her body revealed all parts intact and no more aches and pains than she’d had the moment before. A survey of the room showed only one mech remaining, the other two cut down by flying debris. Gathering the shards of her shattered nerves around her, she built them into a diamond shell. One left and then she could go the hell home.

“Sorry, Shepard,” Tali called over the clatter of settling rubble. “My knowledge of demolitions is theory. Quarians don’t usually blow things up.”

Ignoring Tali, she drew herself up as tall as she could, erecting armour, chinking pieces into place in time with her breath. One . . . two . . . three . . . four . . . five. Gradually the chaos and swirling mess of emotions and thoughts sweeping through her calmed. “Better. Warrior inside and out. Now, take this fucking thing out, Shepard.”

Squaring her shoulders, she settled her armour in place then slapped her omnitool, bringing up Garrus’s fantastic shields of doom. A fierce smile slashed across her face as they buzzed to life around her, the charge strong enough to lift the hair on the back of her neck. “Sorry Garrus, but it’s time for the sexy hotness of death.” She shrugged Roger back into her hand, loading him for cryo rounds. Taking the mech’s bullets in stride, she just clenched her jaw and closed on the damned thing.

Quite a lot of damage from the explosion showed on the mech’s chassis, buoying her confidence. “Come on, you mother, go down.” Volley after volley, overloads, sabotage, she gritted her teeth, and whittled away at it, praying its shields died before she did.

In a flash of hellish red aura, the mech’s shields fell, widening Shepard’s smile into a grimace. Glancing down to check her footing, she spotted her last grenade. How she forgotten that? Snatching it off her belt, she thumbed the controls to set it.

“All right you fucker,” she growled. Sprinting forward, she leaped over the remains of the blasted out table, the grenade aimed for a cranny just above the mech’s hip. Perfect aim jammed the device in with all the force of her charge, spinning her a little as she charged past.

Then a metal vice-like grip clamped down on her wrist, wrenching her backwards. Before she even recognized that it had grabbed her, the mech dropped into a roll. Ligaments shredding, her shoulder joint let go with a terrible crunch. Instinct kicked in as her body recognized the impending loss of its limb even though her brain shorted out, adrenaline pouring into her blood to numb the pain. Popping her shoulder even further, she stepped up onto a fallen chair and threw herself into a back flip. The movement wrenched her wrist free of the mech’s grip and she dove for cover, the exploding grenade flinging her right over it and into a wall.

“Shepard!” Garrus and Tali called out at the same time.

She dragged herself up onto a hip and then across to take cover behind the crate, dead arm scraping through the debris and thick layer of dust on the floor. The mech lay in pieces around the room, but the drones just kept coming. Forcing herself up off the floor an inch at a time, she leaned against the crate and took a foggy inventory. One good arm, fried shields . . .. She looked down at her dead arm. Omnitool doing a great impersonation of a complete write off.

A sudden surge of nausea sent her rolling onto her stomach as what little remained of breakfast that morning made an encore appearance. Pain spiked out from her shoulder, each new shard of agony prompting another heave.

“You’ve got to get control of the pain, Janey. You’re going to go into shock. Wrap it up. Package it all up tight. You’ve done it before. Concentrate. Those drones aren’t going to wait for you to stop puking.

“Shepard, are you all right?” Garrus called again, his voice taut and sub-vocals flat, panic slipping through the layers of practiced C-Sec and turian stoicism. “Come on, answer me.” Gunfire followed his words, telling her why the drones hadn’t killed her yet.

She breathed through the dry heaves, coating over the pain with layer after layer of thick, cool cement, walling it away. It was an old trick . . . a very old trick, but it served its purpose and then pain faded enough that the vomiting eased.

Rolling over, she wiped her mouth on her gauntlet. “Damned thing almost pulled my arm off, give me a fucking break, C-Sec.” She sat up, the room dipping and swaying around her. “Why aren’t you in here? We’re supposed to get trapped in these situations together.” She looked over at the doorway and answered her own question. Their demolition charge had brought down a good ton of rock along with the barrier. “It’s tradition.” She wobbled, the wall cracking, letting her shoulder’s screaming through. “I don’t feel so good.”
“You still have three drones closing on you.” His arm reached through the cleared space at the top, overloading one.

Taking several deep breaths, Shepard slathered more cement over the crack and forced herself up onto her knees. Resting Roger on the top of the crate, she sprayed fire over the line of drones, praying that a few of her bullets hit the damned fabricator. She lasted twenty seconds before she sank down on her heels to lean against the crate. Her leg muscles shook so hard with fatigue and shock she knew she had moments before they dumped her on the floor and left her there.

Peering around the edge of the crate, she watched Garrus take out another couple of the drones, shooting over Tali and Legion’s heads as they shoved at the rubble, trying to clear enough to get inside. She scanned the room, focusing on the far wall as the swirling balls of light and force fields blinking out. A shimmer thickened the air in the far right hand corner.

“Shepard, back corner. Your right,” Garrus called.

“Yep, I see it. Concentrate your fire there.” She bullied herself up onto her knees as her good arm lifted Roger back into place.

“Please, let this end it,” she whispered as her finger squeezed the trigger. Using rapid bursts of three rounds, she peppered the corner with bullets. The shimmer became more pronounced under direct fire, but the damned thing’s shields held. “It’s got redundant emitters, like the door,” she called back over her shoulder.

An idea sparked. Rotating emitters drained a hell of a lot of power, way too much to be practical anywhere but a land base. Rotating emitters and constantly spawning and controlling three drones . . . that had to be sucking up the juice at a prodigious rate.

“Keep the bloody drones off me for a second.” Ducking down, Shepard set Roger on the floor.
Grinding her teeth together, she grabbed the wrist of her dead arm, lifting it up to rest on her knee.
A piercing scream ripped past her clenched jaw as the shards of her shoulder rasped against one another, crunching ominously as it rotated. Shoving back the pain, she tried to open her omnitool.
Definitely dead.

“Shepard!” Garrus called. “Drones trying to flank you from both sides. Legion, take out the one on the left.” Their fire increased.

“Garrus, scan that corner, watch for power fluctuations as it spawns the drones.”

Leaving her arm resting on her thigh, Shepard snatched her rifle off the ground, opening fire just as the first of the drones made it around the right side of her crate. It went down with a complaining sizzle, but another followed right behind it. A small barrage of bullets that must have overheated Garrus’s rifle brought the deadly little hologram down.

“You’re right, Shepard. The shield emitters reroute to the fabricator. We should be able to take it out.” His rifle drowned out the end of his sentence as he opened fire once more.

“We’ve got you, you bastard,” she growled. “Tali, are you and Legion still there?”

“We are,” the quarian said, deep, rapid breaths that lacing through the words. Wounded, or just exhausted? Shepard pushed that aside.

“Excellent. Incoming data for an overload to your omnis. It’s going to take all of us to pull that thing’s shield down.” She settled Roger into the crook of her arm. “Lets try to take out all three drones at the same time. Then, the moment the power level shifts, hit it with your overloads..”
“Tali ready.”

“Legion in position, Shepard-Captain.”

“Garrus in position.”

“Okay, let’s end this. Garrus, the furthest right, Tali and Legion, the center one. I’ll take the last.” She stood and opened fire, the drones sizzling and sparking under the barrage. Hers let out a death whine and blinked out a split second after the other two. “Now!”

In a light show worthy of Armistice Day, all three overloads hit at once. The device exploded, the shockwave slamming into Shepard like a massive fist, driving all the air from her body in a shriek of anguish. It threw her back three metres. She crashed into the floor and slid another metre on her ass before slamming into a wall. A thin shrill of pain bludgeoned its way up her throat despite her lack of air, and for a moment the room faded to an even murkier grey, lightning strikes of absolute black streaking across her vision.

Groaning, she raised her head from the prefab floor just long enough to ensure the damned thing was dead, then collapsed. Every muscle in her body trembled and complained, fatigue and pain settling in, deep and implacable as the adrenaline began to leach from her blood.

“I need a nap,” she mumbled, letting her eyes close.

“Shepard!” The scrape and scramble of a large body being shoved through a small entrance preceded the hollow, metal drum beat of running feet. Garrus hit the floor next to her. “Spirits, you just don’t know how to duck, do you? I think Wrex might be right about how much krogan you’ve got in you.”

She opened her eyes and let out a weak, bitter laugh. “Yeah.” Looking past him to Legion and Tali, Shepard clenched her teeth and forced herself to sit up. Her shoulder throbbed, the pain ebbing as it swelled inside her armour, lack of circulation dulling the bayonets to fists. “You two grab that drone fabricator and one of those mechs. They aren’t Alliance, and they’re far more advanced than anything I’ve seen.”

“Very good, Captain,” a familiar voice called. “You don’t disappoint. Your mind and your fighting skills are as keen as I’ve heard.”

Daggers of black ice slid under Shepard’s skin. “Help me up.” Grabbing hold of Garrus, she used him to scramble up to her feet and turned to face a badly broken up, but recognizable holographic form. “You?”

After a moment of staring at Armistan Banes’s flickering image, she pushed away from Garrus, staggering forward a step. The Cerberus operative’s hologram stood a couple of metres in front of the computer that had spawned the drones. The polished suit, pretentious air, and cigarette remained unchanged since their last conversation, and she wondered if he somehow just dry cleaned himself. Maybe no one real existed behind the holo-face at all.

“Armistan Banes?” Garrus asked.

Shepard nodded. “Banes? This was you?” Try as she might to force all the frozen darkness into her voice, she knew it came out weak and slapped from shock. Disbelief warred with the proof right before her eyes. “How? You can’t be here. Did you do this?”

He swept into a low bow. “Not the VI, of course. That was merely a fortuitous malfunction of life. Hurrah for humanity that you’re so very efficient in your killing.”
She gestured toward the mechs and drone emitter. “How the hell did you get these in here? And why?” She took a step, but the knee shuddered, threatening to dump her on the floor. Everything suddenly just turned on its head, making no sense. “What the hell, Banes?” She threw her hand up to gesture to her shoulder. “I’ll warn you. If you’re trying to kill me, it’s not easy.”

“As I can quite plainly see.” He chuckled and took a long drag on his cigarette. “I assure you, we aren’t trying to kill you, Captain. Think of this little exercise as . . .” He made a show of thinking that ended with a caricature of enlightenment. The proverbial light bulb. “. . . data collection. You’re an anomaly, Captain, one that my employer wants to know absolutely everything about.”

She sighed and wrapped her good arm around her stomach. “Tell him to come and speak to me in person. I’ll show him exactly how much I appreciate being run around and tortured like some sort of lab rat.”

Banes shrugged, the gesture so casual and flippant that Shepard took a step toward the hologram, fully willing to put a fist through it just for emphasis. Fury boiled in her guts, sour and acidic, bubbling up into her throat.

Banes stepped toward her. “You live a dangerous life, Shepard. I suggest you don’t spend too much energy worrying about my employer. So, he ran you through a little test.” He took a drag off the cigarette, his shoulders lifting along with the inhale. “You came through alive in a most impressive fashion. Get over it, chalk it up to science, and move on.”

“Science,” Shepard deadpanned. “Is that why you’re here? Scoop up whatever remains of the VI and pat yourselves on the back for your invention?” She scoffed, flipping her good hand at him in a dismissive wave. “Good luck with that, Banes. Just keep the hell away from me, or as soon as I end Saren, I’ll start a whole new hunt.”

Banes let out a long-suffering sigh. “So small minded. I honestly expected better from you, Captain. You appeared to show some capacity for creativity.” He paced a little, flicking the end of his cigarette in a steady rhythm. “What most people fail to comprehend about science, Captain, is how laughably small the percentage of true invention is. John of Salisbury said it far more poetically than Newton, ‘We are like dwarfs sitting on the shoulders of giants. We see more, and things that are more distant, than they did, not because our sight is superior or because we are taller than they, but because they raise us up, and by their great stature add to ours.’” The hologram paced a few steps and back. “Invention is not people in white smocks hunched over microscopes; it is following trails to find treasures unseen by others. It’s about setting up cause and effect to coincide with perfect timing.”

Shepard shifted to her other hip. “Really? Sweet baby Jesus, you do love the sound of your own voice, don’t you, Banes?” Exhaustion dripped through her cells, epoxy setting her in place. It felt as though a week had passed since they landed on Luna. “Great villain monologue, though. Kudos. Right now, I just want to know if you sabotaged the VI, killing dozens of good men and women?”

The hologram fizzled for a moment as Banes laughed. “No. We found out about it the same moment you did. We’re merely here to investigate the possibilities for discovery.” He shrugged, a mocking, ugly gesture. “Well, and to get a good look at the infamous Captain Jane Shepard in action. Thank you for a very entertaining demonstration, Shepard. We’ll speak again soon, I feel certain.” His image blinked and folded in on itself, disappearing.

Shepard straightened and staggered into the computer core a couple of feet to her right. Catching herself, she leaned against the solid wing, trying to will energy into her muscles. Without Banes there to focus her anger, even that washed away, leaving her shaking, cold, and wishing for medigel.

Only a little further, Janey. The mission is over, just make it back to the ship.

Garrus wrapped an arm around her waist, pulling her tight in against his side. “Normandy, we need a medevac in bunker three.” He glanced back at Tali. “You and Legion have this?”

The quarian looked up from the bolt she was sawing through and gave him a jaunty if sloppy salute. “We’ll have this and a couple mechs on board within thirty minutes. Hopefully we can find a couple with different terminal damage.”

“Call Ashley’s team to back them up, just in case,” Shepard said, forcing the words out, her tongue too thick and slow, her ability to think swept away by the pain.

Shepard let Garrus do most of the work involved in keeping her upright as they waited for a stretcher.

“How are you doing?” he asked, his voice tender.

“I feel as though I hired on as the assistant to a near-sighted knife thrower in some nightmarish carnival, Garrus. Thanks for asking.”

He chuckled and nuzzled her temple. “Dr. Chakwas will get you sorted.” He reached up, opening a channel. “Nihlus, Shepard has been wounded. I’m taking her back to the Normandy.”

The next moment, Shepard’s earpiece signalled an incoming transmission from Nihlus. “Are you all right?”

She lifted her good hand to her opposite ear. “Yeah, fine. Just played Rock ‘em, Sock ‘em Robots with a mech that demonstrated a surprising gift for hand to hand. Wrap things up here. I’ll be out of med bay by the time you get back to the ship.”

Shepard awoke to a quiet, dim med bay. Pillows cradled her head and bad shoulder, supporting the regen cage. Shifting ever so slightly, she tested her body out. Sore, but tolerable. Either the painkillers hadn’t worn off, or she’d slept through the worst of it. That misconception lasted until she tried to throw the blanket off. A small pack of invisible varren burst through a hole in the universe and sank their teeth into her flesh, heads whipping back and forth as they fought over the choicest parts.

Gasping, she decided to stay as still as possible. “How long have I been here?” she asked, spotting the doctor sitting at her desk. Looking around, she realized she was the only occupant. Dread burst in her gut like a tiny nova. “Chase. Is Chase okay?”

“Take it easy,” Dr. Chakwas said, pushing up out of her chair. She walked over, the ever-present omnitool flaring to life. “Things are healing well, but pay attention to the pain. It’s there for a reason, Shepard, and no, that reason is not to dare you to endure as much of it as you can.”

“Chase, Doctor. How is she?” Anger pushed back against the dread.

The doctor held out a hand she seemed to think would keep Shepard from leaping out of bed and doing something crazy. Similarly, she kept her voice soft and low, almost uncharacteristically sympathetic. “We transferred her to the medical facility at Alliance headquarters in Vancouver. A bullet shattered a lumbar vertebrae and damaged her spinal cord. She’s paralyzed, but with treatment, she’s expected to recover very well. Now, relax. Soldiers get injured in the course of duty. It is a reality that I am all too familiar with. She is getting the best treatment humanity has to offer, and her family is with her.”

She offered the hand to help Shepard sit up. “You, on the other hand, have been here for two days. I had to do some very delicate surgery to save your arm, but it is mending nicely.”

“And the rest of the team? Was anyone else injured?” Shepard pulled herself up gingerly, moving every body part as if it were made of spun sugar.

The doctor helped steady her on the edge of the bed. “Tali’Zorah suffered a few scratches and bumps, but other than a fever that has nearly resolved itself, and a very overbearing father, she’s fine. Urdnot Wrex took a rocket to the chest, but his armour and plating took most of the damage. Apparently, the wound will improve his sexual appeal.” She shrugged. “Everyone else came back intact.” Her hand rose to her ear. “Officer Vakarian, your charge is awake and ready to return to her quarters.”

“Charge?” Shepard slipped down off the bed but just leaned heavily against it, waiting to see if her legs would hold her before striking out. “I swear I’m going to build a brig. Everyone who gets sassy with me goes in. Bread and water. Thirty days.” Worry about Chase and Tali darkened her humor, souring it enough that she winced. Dr. Chakwas didn’t deserve her bitchiness.

“Sign me up, I have a shelf of medical journals waiting to be read.” The doctor’s mouth twitched at the corners, threatening to break into a full-blown smile. She regained control of the insurrection with the help of distraction as the med bay door opened.

Garrus stepped through looking every bit the cop performing a prisoner transfer. “Vakarian reporting to take custody of the patient, Doctor,” he said, his voice brisk and official.

Chakwas stood stiffly at parade rest. “I surrender Captain Shepard to your custody, Officer. She’s a crafty one. Don’t let her talk you into letting her out of bed until we arrive at the Citadel. Understood?” She gave him a curt nod, one corner of her mouth twitching again.

“Yes, ma’am.” A turian salute sealed the deal, then Garrus turned to face Shepard, holding an arm out toward the door. “After you, Captain.”

“Brig!” Shepard called out loud enough that it echoed off the walls. “Someone build me a damned brig!” She walked around the end of the bed, her one hand clinging to it just in case her knees went ahead with their threats to dump her on the floor with her ass in the air. A fitting punishment for the hours of endless fighting.

Garrus only let her suffer for a few steps before he moved in and wrapped a strong, gentle arm around her. “Little wobbly?” When she nodded, he squeezed her. “We’ll get you sorted in time to dock on the Citadel.”

She slipped her arm around his waist, leaning into him as they stepped out the door. “We better. I have errands and a date with my boyfriend tomorrow.” When they made it to her quarters, she sank gratefully onto the end of her bed. “Remind me to thank Armistan Banes and his employer for those mechs. I was doing so well with the whole not getting injured thing, too. Someone set the no workplace injuries sign back to zero.”

Garrus cleared his throat. “I had to go down to Alliance headquarters and dropped by to see Addison. She’s in really good spirits and her doctors say she’s responding very well.” He smiled and shrugged. “She says she’s going to be back in uniform before the year’s out. You, on the other hand, I’m going to start wrapping in packing bubbles and just roll you into battle.”

“Hey! Other than scrapes and bruises, I haven’t been hurt since Feros.” Shepard bristled.
“Considering how many people try to kill me on the average day, I think that’s pretty impressive.”
She held out her good arm for him to help her lay down.

“I suppose that’s true,” Garrus grumbled. He placed a couple of pillows to cushion her shoulder then helped her get settled. He pulled up the blankets, tucking her in. “Here,” he said, passing her a large, insulated cup. “I figured you’d be too tired to eat, but Dr. Chakwas wanted you to get some protein into you before you sleep. I mixed protein powder into your chocolate drink.”

Shepard made a face. “That sounds disgusting.” She tried to peer in the small hole.

“Alenko tried it, said it tasted fine.” He nodded for her to drink it. “Go on, we have maybe three days until we’re fighting again. Drink. You need to heal.”

“Fine.” Letting out a long-suffering sigh, she took a sip. Chocolate—hot, sweet, and creamy—flowed over her tongue, prompting a long moan of pleasure. Delicious didn’t even begin to cover how good it was. “Sweet baby Jesus, Garrus . . . what sort of evil alchemy is this?” She took another long draught followed by an even more decadent moan. “What is that other flavour? It’s fruity, but . . .” After several sips, she gave up trying to identify it. “Oh, who cares, I may never eat again and just live off this.”

He grinned at the praise. “Dr. Chakwas gave me a list of the nutrients you needed. Milk, the protein/enzyme powder, and two varieties of berries covered them all.”

“Well, whatever they are, you could patent this, make a small fortune.” Giving him a wink, she nodded toward his spot on the bed. “You going to join me?”

He sat next to her hip. “I should sleep on the cot, Shepard. I don’t want to bounce your shoulder around.” A smile softened his words. “But, on my brief trip to Earth to pick up our Kodiak drop shuttle—I note you didn’t ask why I went to Alliance headquarters—I got a chance to pick something up that I think you’ll appreciate.” He reached into his armour, pulling out a hardcover book bound in leather.

The new shuttle warred with the book for her attention, the book winning handily. She’d been in a thousand shuttles. “Oh, what is that?” She held out her hand, reaching for the book, but he shook his head and pulled it back.

“Drink your supper, and if you’re a very good girl, I’ll read you a story before lights out.” He turned away and strode over to get his cot.

Shepard cackled. “You’re so asking for it when I can pummel you again, Officer Wise-assless, but I meant it about no cot.” She grinned at the sound that came from his sub-vocals. “I’ll sleep against the wall.”

He scowled at her, his brow plates lowering. “Shepard, I don’t want you to wake up stuck.” His mandibles fluttered a little as she watched him struggle to find a gentle way to reference her hatred of being closed in.

“Come here.” She held out her hand. When he didn’t move, she raised her eyebrows. “Don’t get insubordinate with me, Garrus. Come here.” When he obeyed and sat next to her on the bed, she took his hand. “There are things more important than pain and fear.” She sat up and pressed her hand against his cheek. “You are one of those things. I don’t care if you bump my shoulder in the night. I don’t care if I wake up and have a moment of panic because I need to crawl out. Your presence makes up for all of that. Okay?”

He nodded, but the set of his jaw told her that the discussion would never end. So obstinate.

“So, go get changed, and lets get some sleep.” She gave him a gentle shove. “Go on. I won’t peek, I promise.” Answering his rumble with a bright smile, Shepard cocked an eyebrow. “What? You want me to peek? Why, Officer, you’re a member of my crew. That would be completely inappropriate.”

“Yes, because being your bed warmer and babysitter is so very appropriate. Just lay down. Impossible woman.” He walked over to the cot and began popping the seals on his armour, stacking it beside the cot as he stripped down. “I should shower.”

Shepard lay down, settling herself as comfortably as possible. “But then I’ll be asleep when you’re done. I want my story, mister.” She closed her eyes, giving him some semblance of privacy. “Shower after.”

One minute later, the mattress lowered under his weight as he crawled up to lay next to her. “Very well. You did kick some serious ass. You deserve your story.” He lay half-inclined against the wall, angled so she could rest her head in the curve of his shoulder.

Shepard wriggled in, not minding the twinges from her shoulder. As she’d told him, some things were worth a little pain.

He opened the book. “My human common is a little rough.”

“I don’t care.” She closed her eyes, relaxing into him.

“Okay.” He leaned in to nuzzle her brow, then let out a long breath. “It was about eleven o’clock in the morning, mid October, with the sun not shining and a look of hard wet rain in the clearness of the foothills.” (1)

Shepard chuckled and nestled in, sleepy and suddenly a little giddy. “The Big Sleep . . ..” She sighed. “You’re the most amazing torin.”

“Are you going to let me read?”

She nodded. “Sorry.”

He cleared his throat a little. “I was wearing my powder-blue suit, with dark blue shirt, tie and display handkerchief, black bro . . . gu . . . es, black wool socks with dark blue clocks on them. I was neat, clean, shaved and sober, and I didn’t care who knew it. I was everything the well-dressed private detective ought to be. I was calling on four million dollars.” (2)

---

(1) and (2) are excerpts from The Big Sleep by Raymond Chandler. 1939. Published in the public domain in Canada on 11 January, 2011 by Project Gutenberg Canada ebook #696.

Targismar -- The most vile curse in any turian dialect. Has its origins in turian prehistoric rituals involving the disgracing and execution of enemies.
Mass Effect - Future Imperfect Chapter Fifty

Chapter Summary

So, what was in that message sent through the beacons, anyway?

Before Garrus made it to the end of the third page, Shepard lost her battle against her most intractable enemy. Her eyelids surrendered first, but within moments, Garrus’s voice faded into silence, sleep proving the victor.

Deep in the liminal twilight, the horrors from the beacon stretched, waking from a long day of careful and deliberate burial. Reaching out, they tangled themselves up in the history and terror that hitchhiked along with the cipher out of the Thorian’s mind. Together, they created a mire that sucked Shepard down from nightmare to nightmare all night long.

A soft note of song, a wisp of honey-gold, drifted through, weaving a path that guided Shepard between images. Slowing the never-ending loop, the song allowed Shepard to recognize some of the flashes as memories.

“Would you understand?” the song asked, the rachni queen’s eerie whisper echoing through the darkness. “Would you see what has been burned onto your soul?”

Setix 7.3, 89997 of Tapek Menru

Notes of pure colour, ripe with both taste and perfume, drifted through her dream, painting every barren landscape she visited in nostalgic, pastel hues of longing and regret. The song buoyed her up, carrying her over ruined city after ruined city, lying still, all their inhabitants long dead. Nothing left now. At least not on any ground upon which she once marched.

It’s been so long since I heard a rachni sing. Thank you for this gift, although it seems a shame to waste it upon a dead empire. You sing beauty for a people shattered, worlds destroyed, many of them for nearly a century. The Prothean Empire sleeps within this room, singing queen. I and my family are all that remain.

Shepard jerked awake, every particle of her body screaming with the virulent, electric cepra-sting of blood tearing down the collapsed arteries, veins, and capillaries of a dead limb. Shaking her head, then her hands, she climbed out of her nest of blankets and walked to the window. Her fingers burrowed into her armpits, taking refuge against the predawn chill. The early sun had just begun to brush a million shades of vermillion, gold, and champagne over the tops of the clouds, promising a beautiful day. Perhaps, somewhere, a rachni still sang the sweet and melancholy arias of her kind in memory of what had been.

A beautiful day on a world so dead that it lay fifty cycles abandoned, the ground salted and scorched, even the monsters fleeing for kinder shores.

Why then did her heart sit dead and chill, a lump of rock and ice nestled tight against her spine? She glanced at the timekeeper next to her nest. Three hours before her wakeup. The Senarium wasn’t due to leave on their mission for five setixs. And where had Merol gone? She liked to tease her mate that he loved his sleep even more than he loved her, but he’d risen before she. Reading his traces, she trailed her fingers over the table and door control, discovering no need to fear for his safety. No doubt, he’d proven as unsettled about their mission as she, and went for a walk. A scientist never wearied of exploration, or so he claimed.

She sighed, the tightness in her belly betraying her, sending silken threads of fear and rage . . . and sorrow shooting through her soul, binding it in shackles she could ill afford. Soldiers did grow weary. Oh, so very weary.

Sorrow. She paced across the small chamber to her meditation bowl, folding down to sit on her heels beside it. Sorrow, like a virus, infected everything. She plunged her hands into the water, scrubbing them. She possessed more than enough misery of her own, but that place . . . those ruins lamented as keenly as if they had been fashioned of pure suffering.

She chose to hide within its skeletal remains because such horrors had been visited upon its population that ghosts tread thickly through the ruins, screaming their pain and fury into the clouds. Even the monsters avoided it. The planet kept them safe while they waited, but it proved a hard world upon which to maintain one’s equilibrium. So many layers of terror, despair, and hopelessness clung to every surface that not even gloves helped. If she didn’t wash and meditate every couple of setixs, Merol proclaimed her impossible to live with and sent her to the bowl. Attit, the last living son of their mating cycle refused to set foot off their ship. She couldn’t blame him. He didn’t possess defenses forged during long cycles of coping with the horrific, psychic alluvium that the Reapers spewed over all they touched.

Courage of my antecessors, uphold me, strengthen me for the task ahead. My bones are old. The children from my first and median mating cycles are long dead, even my beautiful Giran gone ahead to light the way. Grant me your courage to face this last task, to plunge the spear into the heart of the monster . . . to help the young fight the battle that we have lost.

Nerves. Yes, nerves explained the cold creeping through her, weakening her to the fear. For nearly forty cycles, like an arrow released from a bow, her life had soared toward one goal, one target. Much hung in the balance. Opportunities for failure lurked out beyond the planned and anticipated. Success relied on her forgetting all that rode upon her actions, clearing her mind and heart to focus on the task.

Her fingers danced across the blissfully blank silence of the water.

So many cycles of running. She allowed the memories of pitch battles, narrow escapes, and dying friends to wash through her and into the bowl. On the last day of her war, of the Senarium’s war, she didn’t need the weight of an entire galaxy of dead hanging from her soul. To succeed, she needed to be more clever, quicker, tougher, and more focused than she had ever been.

She smiled. “That’s saying something for a female my age.”

Would you leave Giran behind as well? Just place her in the shard and walk away?

No, not Giran, eldest of her mating with Merol. Never Giran, so brave and proud, fighting to the last where so many succumbed, her spirit the brightest light in the heavens.

The door opened, and she smiled without opening her eyes. “You too?”

The familiar, solid presence of her mate knelt on the opposite side of the bowl, his fingers splashing softly in the water as he washed his hands. “Went for a walk,” he said, then let out a long breath. “I had orchestrated a plan to rejoin you under the blankets, stirring you from your sleep with soft words and softer touches.” He sighed, but she could hear his smile bleeding through. “However, I’m sure meditation will prove more advantageous to mission success.”

She smiled and flicked water at him. “Then hush and meditate.” Instead, his hands closed around hers, and she opened her eyes. “This isn’t meditation.”

He nodded, golden eyes staring into hers. “We fly into the talons and jaws of the enemy in a few setixs. It would be very selfish for me to want to spend them in the arms of the mother of my last children.”

She met his gaze, allowing gratitude for many cycles of love and companionship to warm her regard. Meditation would prove more useful to their mission than passion. A settled, focused mind could be the difference between those being the last moments they spend alone together or living out the cycles remaining to them. A soft, understanding smile touched her lips, and she squeezed his fingers. For a moment, the soldier waged war with the mate of forty cycles, the mate winning. Regardless of preparation or skill, the cold fact remained that those moments could well be their last together. One did not get the gift of clinging to long-held, pretty illusions when fighting Reapers.

“Yes, it would,” she answered at last, “but seeing as we are the last two living souls on this planet, I believe a little selfishness will escape reproach.” She stood, pulling Merol up, and led him to the nest of blankets in the corner.

Setix 19.5, 89997 of Tapek Menru

“.2 setix to the relay.” Shepard spun her chair around in the small cockpit and pulled out a panel on the console next to her. She scanned the technology wired into it for the hundredth time. Each of the previous four missions, she’d checked it compulsively. Each time, it operated perfectly, tricking the relays into identifying their tiny frigate as a Reaper destroyer. Still, her innate distrust of anything spawned from those nightmares expected it to betray them any moment.

“It is still perfectly integrated, scrubbed, and calibrated,” Merol said, letting out a long-suffering sigh that trilled in a most delicious way across her shoulders and down her spine. His fingers stroked down the back of her neck, his touch calming her nerves as it always did.

She pressed into it for a moment, then straightened. “Very well. I will attempt to stop worrying.” She turned to the jump computer and keyed in the transit mass and destination. “We’re ready for relay intersect.”

“A single Reaper is entering scanning range, not yet moving to intercept, but it is headed for the relay. A straggler?” Merol reached over and gripped her shoulder inside the pauldron of her armour. “It is time, haksaya kubenar. Time to make sure that four people aren’t sitting in our position at the end of the next cycle. The last four citizens of a shattered empire.”

She reached up and pressed her hand over his. “For Giran.”

“For our beautiful girl, and for them all,” he agreed, pulling back.

“Approaching the relay. Locked on.” Shepard opened a channel to engineering. “We are preparing to jump. Secure your safety harnesses. I do not know what we will face on the other side of the relay.”
“Understood, Commander,” Attit replied, his deep voice a comfort. “Dampening fields are active and functioning at full capacity. Emission sinks performing at optimal.”

“Very good.” Shepard checked and rechecked the jump information as they closed in on the relay, aware that she used the activity to mask her uncertainty. Uncertainty . . . she’d lived her cycles bonded to it closer than any mate. It lay beside her in bed as a child, waiting and watching for her parents to return to the bunker. It coached her through her training and thrust her to the highest rank and honours the Prothean Empire bestowed. It toweled the sweat from her neck while she brought all six of her children into the universe, and it held her hand as she buried five. Now, it warned her to be wary. Very, very wary.

She opened the channel to Peduk. “Report, Second Commander. Weapons systems?”

“The ship’s core is primed and ready for detonation should our defenses not prove sufficient,” the soldier, the last surviving member of Shepard’s unit, said. She sounded nervous. On their approach to the Citadel, Shepard reminded herself to make sure Peduk took time to meditate. “Plasma rifles charged and ready once we land, Commander.”

“Thank you. Attaining relay acceleration in six, five, four, three, two, one.”

“Courage of our antecessors, uphold us,” Merol whispered, his voice trembling, but to such a small degree that Shepard knew only she would recognize it. “Strengthen us for the task ahead. We cannot fail, or all those who have sacrificed so much will call their blood poorly spent.”

Shepard drew in a deep breath, her chest aching, so great was the love she felt as her mate set his courage into the flood. Her Merol might be a scientist rather than a soldier, but his heart rivaled those of even the great commanders. No, it bested them, for at the core of Harrap, Maldok, and Javik, passion had long ago turned to dust, leaving nothing but death and vengeance behind. That Merol could be the last and care so much . . . it both warmed her and illuminated how many pieces of her own soul the war had carved away.

She reached for the stealth controls. “Are we registering any Reaper signatures on the scanners?” Shepard checked the dampeners to find them functioning perfectly, just as Attit reported. If the scanners read clear, she could activate the stealth, and all any Reapers would detect was an empty ship, floating through space.

“Scanners are clear. The vanguard must be docked with the Citadel.” Merol reported. He leaned back in his seat and smiled at her. “Now to drift with the wreckage.”

Her answering smile felt tight, more like baring her teeth, and she pulsed the thrusters a little to turn the bow toward the Citadel. Keeping the rhythm sporadic, she imitated the death throes of a wreck very much like those floating throughout the nebula. Victims of a last, great battle fought more than a quarter century before.

So many brave souls dead, their courage and strength reduced to a jest, a cold, heartless joke. Her heart cried out for vengeance, but the exquisite pain strengthened her resolve, sending molten metal flowing through her veins to ignite the fire at her core. What had felt like a lump of frozen rock that morning, roared awake, beating hard and steady. Her people would find justice, even if only through the many generations to come.

Pieces of a massive ship appeared in the ports, a ship all too familiar in its lines. Shepard jumped up and leaned over the console, straining to get closer, to see it more clearly through the nebular dust. “The Terror,” she whispered. The fury turned rabid. Eight cycles she’d served the greatest fleet commander in the prothean navy as his second-in-command of The Terror, the largest and most powerful dreadnought in the navy. Dozens of battles against every sort of Reaper from oculus to capital ship, The Terror never met with defeat. So many friends . . .

_They died twenty-five cycles ago in a battle that you already knew resulted in their deaths._

Still, rage ate at her, burning up all reason and caution. She sat, her hands hovering over the controls, shaking with the desire to throw off the cowardly ruse and fly into the jaws of death fighting. Was it not better to meet her antecessors charging the enemy, fierce and proud, rather than slinking about like a common thief? She was Commander Tashac Jacar, the highest ranking officer remaining alive if the rumours of Javik’s demise proved true.

“Senarium log, Chief Scientist Merol Niral, on this 89997th day of the long defeat.”

Her mate’s voice eased back the fire consuming Shepard. Slowly, like fog settling to the ground, her hands drifted from the controls to rest in her lap.

“Where once we numbered over one hundred and fifty, the Senarium now consists of four. Our massive lab facilities reduced to one small ship. Betrayal and sacrifice have cost us everything, but of the five great keys to dark space, only one—the Conduit—remains to be captured and hidden. It is the greatest of the five, allowing the Citadel to be locked now that the Reapers have retreated back to the void. If our mission meets with success, the Vanguard will be unable to usher in the next extinction. Perhaps it will give the young races a chance to defeat the monsters. All we can do is hope.”

Shepard closed her eyes as she listened to her mate speak to the computer, the lilting music of his voice . . . the true hope in his words . . . calming and recentering her. How extraordinary that at the culmination of a century of warfare, he should welcome the end with hope, that most rare and precious of things.

“I grew up on stories of the Citadel,” Merol continued. “The shining beacon at the heart of our great empire. In those halcyon days, I dreamed of walking amidst the gardens and fountains admiring the beauty.” He sighed, the dry, disappointed bitterness clenching a fist around her heart.

She understood. She had shared those same dreams, clinging to a paradise only to arrive and find nothing left but a corpse.

“We shall have to leave the rediscovery of the great station’s splendour to the young races,” Merol continued. She heard his chair squeak as he stood, then his hand closed over hers.

“Come and sit with me, mother of my last children,” he said, his voice soft.

Shepard opened her eyes. “I must watch the . . .”

He gripped her other hand and pulled her up out of her seat. “We are moving a few paces, not leaving the ship. The scanners are visible from there.”

“You realize this is insubordination?” she demanded, trying to maintain an edge to her tone.

He sat on the stairs leading out of the cockpit, easing her down to sit between his legs, leaning her back against his torso. “Better.” He brushed the peak of his brow along the edge of her kepala. “I still retain a perfect memory of the first time I saw you. The project coordinator escorted you into the lab and work just stopped. Three experiments perished in flames that day because my people . . . I . . . could not look away from the exquisite storm that had blown into our presence.”

She smiled, recalling her first sight of the charismatic, young head scientist. “When she noticed your eyes upon me, the coordinator leaned over and warned me to be wary of my virtue where you were concerned.” A soft chuckle followed the memory.

Merol slid his arms around her. “I am grateful that you have always known your own mind. You are the steel that keeps me standing, haksaya kubenar.”

“As you are the heart that warms and stirs my blood, cikabeknai.” Shepard leaned back into him, slipping into a light meditation as she watched the hulks of her shattered empire float past. If that day brought their end, she would face it with strength and gratitude, the other half—the truer half —of her soul no more than an arm’s length away.

Setix 21.2, 89997 of Tapek Menru

The Citadel loomed over and around them, the entire station dark and still from that distance. Shepard and Merol moved back to their seats, an eerie silence settling over them. Like the shade of a dead giant, the shadow of one of the wards crept over them, blocking the pale light of the sun. Its arms reached out, pulling them into its chill embrace, welcoming them to the end of everything.

Superstitious awe and terror skittered over Shepard’s skin like insects, tiny jaws biting every time something appeared to move. And everything appeared to move as light shifted and debris passed in ever shifting layers that cast menacing shadows, each shadow promising to contain unmentionable horrors.

Forcing herself to ignore the irrational fear gnawing away at her courage, Shepard recited a short, silent prayer for strength. Fortunately, the concentration needed to navigate the hazards grew in direct proportion to the macabre atmosphere as they drifted toward the presidium ring and into the superstructure. Between guiding her ship and her prayer, she wrestled her fear back, binding it in chains formed of iron will.

On each and every mission, horror accompanied them, flying along at their wing and peering over their shoulders. Thus reason claimed it foolish to allow room for fear. Their last mission would prove no better or worse than the ones that came before.

Early in their research, the Senarium discovered that four greater relays existed in addition to the Citadel, each in a different quadrant of the galaxy, each frequency-locked to a key that opened it to dark space. Over the past five cycles, Shepard’s team had hunted down and stolen the four keys from their relays, hiding them throughout the galaxy. Once they secreted away the keys, the remaining members of the Senarium went into hiding, awaiting the great exodus once the Reapers completed the extinction.

Now the Conduit—the greatest of the keys—called them on, its singular energy signature leading them through the skin of the station to follow its arteries and veins to its heart. Once they reached that black and terrible organ, they would stab it with a blade so great and deep that it reached fifty thousand cycles into the future to shatter the next extinction even before it began.

“Reading the Conduit one hundred thirty metres on a heading of 44.85.2,” Merol reported, his voice sounding remarkably unshaken.

“I will not be able to finesse the ship through that opening in the bulkhead,” Shepard said, glancing at her screens, then standing to look out the ports at their surroundings. “I will land, and the four of us will continue on foot.”

As she concentrated on setting the frigate down in the narrow space, Merol called Attit and Peduk to outfit themselves.

After signing off, he remained in his seat, muttering over the scanners for several moments before he turned to her and said, “Tashac, I am reading an energy source ahead. It is of a scale beyond anything in my experience.” Merol’s words carried with them a gravity that she trusted without question.

“We shall take every possible precaution,” she said, setting the computer to keep the ship ready for immediate departure then encoding the locks on the ramp to new passwords. She harboured no desire to return to the ship with the Conduit only to discover monsters overrunning their only means of escape. It did not take decades of betrayal at the hands of indoctrinated agents to teach one extraordinary prudence.

Attit and Peduk awaited she and Merol at the ramp, both presenting crisp salutes. She returned them, then accepted her arms from Attit’s hands. He trusted no one else to care for her weapons and armour—not even her—taking pride in ensuring that his commander went into battle with the best equipment possible.

“Thank you, Attit.” She hung her smaller side arm from her waist and shouldered her rifle.

He held out her helmet. “Commander, sensors read no enemy ground units in the area, just Caretakers.”

“Very good,” Shepard replied. “I will position myself on point. Merol, Peduk following. Attit, be sure that we are not overwhelmed from behind. We shall move as ghosts amongst the shadows. Do not open fire upon the enemy unless they attack. This place is a massive tomb overrun by Reaper ground units. Our best hope lies in escaping detection.”

“As you say, Commander,” her son replied.

She studied his strong, sure countenance, feeling the poignant combination of pride and regret that only a parent experiences upon realizing that their offspring has grown to eclipse them. The moment his stature allowed him to hold a rifle, her son left behind what small portion of childhood remained to a babe born into the last cycles of the war, embracing the martial life with passion and dedication. On the day he began his eleventh cycle, Attit ceased calling her mother, that relationship still present, but overshadowed by commander and soldier, his love for her demonstrated in unflinching loyalty and outstanding performance of his duties.

Shepard shook her head, a curt nod accompanying her switch flipping from Tashac Jacar to Commander Jacar. “For the empire.”

“For the empire,” the others replied, stepping aside and standing at attention, saluting as she passed.

The ramp lowered, revealing a scene unlike anything Shepard had ever witnessed, every glimpse reaching a new level of horror that battered at her calm. The long, narrow space teemed with Caretakers, the little green insectile beings crawling over and amidst thousands . . . no, tens of thousands of bodies. Some of the creatures removed large items of clothing like helmets and armour, while others dragged bodies to cylindrical containers slotted along the walls. Once sealed inside the cylinders, the bodies disintegrated into a gray effluvium that flowed along pipes that followed the walls along their intended path.
Shepard shuddered and pushed on. Whatever use the Caretakers or Reapers had for the melted down bodies, the probability of it impacting their mission remained small. Standing around staring, however, could prove catastrophic.

“Move out,” she commanded, keeping her voice hushed despite her helmet’s speaker being turned off.

“They’re all Rivaran,” Peduk whispered. Her musical, lilting voice came through reedy and thin, fabric worn threadbare.

Shepard glanced at the soldier, the last member of the squad assigned to her five cycles earlier, and nodded toward the path ahead. “Calm yourself, and focus on the mission.”

“Why are they just pulling out the Rivarans?” the soldier continued. Peduk crouched her rifle in the angle of her shoulder, the barrel sweeping a wide arc as she spun, starting at every sound.

Shepard ignored her, picking her way around the bodies, as Peduk pointed out, the Caretakers only pulled the pale, translucent-skinned bodies of Rivarans out of the massive number piled there. The Rivaran corpses had not decayed nearly as much as the others, sprawled mostly on top of the pile, their large, pink eyes unclouded, their gills firm. It seemed strange to her that the peaceful, scholarly race should not have been amongst the first harvested. Or perhaps, their distaste for fighting pushed them down the list as they presented so little threat to the Reapers’ plans. They certainly had not presented a challenge when the empire conquered and subjugated their world.

She moved on. Dead was dead, and every species capable of spaceflight in the galaxy had been extinguished. Did it matter in what order they met their demise? Twenty metres ahead, the room ended in a large set of doors that remained open over a metre simply because of the amount of detritus caught up between them.

“A scrap of good fortune,” Merol said.

“The enemy would not have missed that door opening,” Attit agreed.

“We just have to climb over the dead to pass through,” Peduk said, whining in a manner that Shepard had not witnessed from her since her days as a cadet.

Although always a little more flighty and easily spooked than most, Peduk never failed to comport herself with honour and strength in the performance of her duties. Shepard studied the soldier, looking for even the smallest anomaly. Nothing sent up any alarms. Perhaps Peduk had merely reached the end of her tolerance for the long cycles of fighting and seclusion. She and Attit displayed no attraction for one another, and as she did not have a blood position in the family, Shepard knew that Peduk faced a far more lonely path than the rest of them. Still, the soldier had always remained solid under fire, a true prothean.

“Peduk, if you cannot gain control of your emotions, go back aboard the ship. I will not allow you to endanger the future because you are unable to face the realities of the present.” Shepard gripped the cowl of Peduk’s armour with one hand, giving her a single, hard shake. “Your empire and the future of your galaxy requires you to control your emotions. Comport yourself accordingly, soldier.”

Displaying enough control and grace to flush at being chastised like a raw recruit, Peduk nodded sharply as she replied, “Yes, Commander.”

Shepard turned away, leaving it to Attit to ensure that Peduk did as commanded. Clambering over the rotting bodies and other refuse, the commander climbed through the space between the two doors. On the other side, she discovered a second sight unknown to her experience. A massive chamber pierced the heart of the Citadel, hidden within the great station’s tower. She could not guess at how high it soared nor how far down it plunged, for a strangely shaped black wall bisected the space, blocking both from view. Pipes and tubes, all carrying the grey slurry, crawled along the walls of the chamber like a nest of snakes, eventually feeding into the wall in the center.

The black of that wall drew her in, hypnotising her with its gravity; a singularity greedily pulling everything, even light into its embrace. Merol touched her arm, breaking the darkness’s grip on her and enabling her to tear her eyes away.

By the spirits of the antecessors, how had she let herself be distracted like that? Surely, her training and discipline should be able to resist the indoctrinating allure of Reaper technology long enough to complete her mission. She shook out her hands, rolled her shoulders, and turned back toward the Conduit, the snakes from the walls slipping under her skin, whispering for her to just give in and look back.

She beat back the terror that tried to bludgeon her heart, reducing it to something very like the gray paste. She needed to get out of there, to complete the mission and retreat back to where the universe, although barren and morose, made sense.

Sticking to the outer wall of the chamber, Shepard moved forward, still seeing no sign of any of the Reapers’ soulless minions. A hundred cycles of terrible experimentation resulted in an endless array of abominations and horrors, each worse than those that came before, but where were they? Perhaps with the Reapers returned to dark space, the bodies had finally fallen, never to stir again. If so, she prayed that finally being allowed the dignity of death would grant their souls peace.

The wall moved. Shepard froze, all four eyes flicking toward the movement. A harsh klaxon buzz of sound built around them until the entire chamber shook with it. The sound, as familiar and chill as her nightmares, burrowed into her, its tentacles trying to latch onto her soul and rip it from her body.

Not a wall, a Reaper. One so large it could only be the Vanguard. Shepard’s heart stopped. Over the decades she had come face to face with many different Reaper units, even taking down several destroyers using ground based missiles installations. But the Vanguard . . . even the name provoked an abhorrence deep enough to strip the heart from her . . . if she were not prothean. If she were not Commander Tashac Jacar, honoured with the duty to save the coming empires. All of them.

For a moment that lasted all the ages of the universe, Shepard stared up at the monster, unable to comprehend exactly what she saw, her mind racing, trying to fit the pieces together. It hung inside the Citadel’s superstructure, massive cables and conduits leading into its body like umbilical cords waiting to be cut. Comprehension dawned. A womb. They stood inside a womb, the Reaper before them twitching in its dreams like her children had once dreamed inside her.

That thought prompted a wave of nausea as her understanding deepened. The gray material . . . the bodies . . . all those people being turned into the monstrosity about to be unleashed, to wait through the long millennia for the correct time to start a brand new extinction. What horror for the bookish Rivaran who loved poetry and music and art above all else to be turned into death incarnate.

“We’re witnessing the birth of a god,” Peduk whispered, her voice high and shrill with a superstitious panic Shepard understood all too well.
Tapek Menru -- Literal translation: The long defeat. The calendar was started from the date the Citadel was captured by the Reapers but not officially named until 10000 Tapek Menru. On the ten thousandth day of the war, Prothean leaders declared it a stalling action designed to buy scientists time to find a way for the Prothean Empire to both survive the war and send aid forward into the next extinction. The calendar is measured in days.

Cepra -- A large insect (8-10 cm in length) native to the world upon which the Prothean people originated. It’s sting was so painful and venomous, death by cepra-sting was a form of execution reserved for traitors.

Setix -- Prothean unit of time equivalent to referencing an hour. A day is comprised of 36 setixs broken into six sub-units.

Haksaya kubenar -- A term of endearment, literally translates as my strong, true heart.

Cikabeknai -- The reciprocal term of endearment for the above. Literally translates to brave love.

Kepala -- The ridges of carapace that cover the top of a Prothean’s head.
Shepard dreams of Tashac Jacar and the Prothean's last plan to help the younger races.

Setix 21.2, 89997 of Tapek Menru con’t

“The birth of a god,” Peduk repeated. The soldier’s hissed whisper raked superstitious claws down Shepard’s back. “A sovereign to bring all life to its knees.”

Shepard gave the soldier a push toward an exit in the far wall. “It’s a Reaper. We have seen them before. Keep moving.” Shepard held the words up like a shield, holding her own fear at bay. “Stay out of sight. Move from cover to cover. Attit, rearguard, watch that nothing follows.”

He saluted. “Yes, Commander. Rearguard, aye.” Shepard smiled to herself, the warmth and trust in her son’s eyes, the blazing torch of respect burning in their depths, bolstering her courage and resolve. She thumped him on the shoulder as she passed, an acceptable outlet for the maternal pride tying knots in her throat.

Taking point, she strode around the outside of the chamber, using the only weapons in her arsenal capable of combating the sheer evil radiating from the unborn Reaper—action and aggression. Unlike most of her peers, she never considered the Reapers evil despite the apparent evil of their actions. Instead, she thought of them as monsters too vast to understand, monsters driven by needs or an agenda beyond comprehension. Like giants treading upon ants infesting their garden, she’d believed some sort of territorial imperative at work.

And then that chamber and the abomination being birthed there.

That horror, fashioned from the bodies of sapient beings—A shudder that started in her gut and burst outward like a solar flare cut that thought off at the root. She knew, having stared upon it and having stood in its shadow, she had borne witness to an evil so great that it proved an anathema to the force of life itself. Even after forty cycles of fighting the Reapers in every form imaginable nothing had prepared her for the truth housed within that chamber.

Was the reproduction of the monsters common knowledge throughout the empire? Had she . . . and, judging by the pallor of his skin, Merol been left uninformed? A low growl rumbled in her throat. No doubt the leadership knew and classified the information dangerous to morale. Ah, the crippling folly of the bureaucrats.

Shepard stepped out through a massive archway, breathing a sigh of relief as she left the chamber and looked down a long ramp. Just over a hundred metres to the Conduit and then they could escape that thing’s presence. Shepard took point as her small squad stepped out onto the downward slope. Piles of bodies mouldered everywhere, but still she saw no sign of ground units. Like small rodents venturing out into a raptor’s hunting ground, she hurried them on. Truly, their only hope of success lay in being swift and avoiding detection as long as possible.

“We cannot be here,” Peduk whispered as their descent levelled. The soldier jumped and started, spinning to keep her rifle pointing everywhere at once, jabbing the barrel toward shadowy enemies that Shepard couldn’t see. Freezing in place so suddenly that she startled Shepard, Peduk met the commander’s eyes. “That thing. Did you see that thing? It is not enough for them to kill us, they steal our bodies, turning us into abominations.” Looking up as if entreating answers of the stars, Peduk spun a slow circle. “Everyone, everywhere stolen and turned into the enemy.” She made a retching sound.

Shepard pulled her sidearm, aiming it at the panicking soldier’s head. “Peduk, calm yourself. You are placing the mission in jeopardy.” Gut churning at the monstrosity of pointing her weapon at one of her own, Shepard flicked off the safety. Ice cold steel held her aim solid and sure. As much as her soul might ache to kill the young female, Commander Jacar suffered no threat to mission success. “I grant you a six-count to regain control of your faculties, or I will shoot you. One . . . two . . . three . . .

The soldier gulped a handful of times, visibly shoring herself up against the fear. Before Shepard reached four, Peduk nodded. “Yes, Commander Jacar. My apologies.”

“Apologies do not gloss over failure with success. We approach the end of the struggle, Peduk. Do better.” Shepard traded her sidearm for her particle rifle, climbing the ramp that led back out of the fabricated canyon. The dead bodies thinned out, disappearing by the time she reached the top and the ramp levelled into a wide, round platform.

A series of columns rose, step-like, from the center of the platform, culminating twenty metres above her head in a form so black and exuding such menace that her eyes refused to look at it for longer than a fraction of a second. Still, she knew that up there, a terrible mockery of floral form latched tentacle-like petals around a stamen of blinking lights and bio-mechanical interfaces. The Conduit.

Tendrils of pure darkness lashed the space around it, ethereal fingers of despair and hopelessness striking out, lashing them with whispers, the inevitable music of the indoctrination signal. Shepard strode across the platform, giving the Conduit’s column a wide berth. During the recovery of the first key—the Fulcrum—a single brush of a tendril reduced three of her team to ash while driving four others into an indoctrinated frenzy.

Walking to the edge of the platform, Shepard looked out over the entirety of the Citadel, its presidium and wards dark but for a few, scattered lights blinking weakly in the half light. Its purpose nearly fulfilled, the galaxy’s largest trap closed down, awaiting rediscovery tens of thousands of cycles after all traces of the dead disappeared into dust.

Strange that despite hiding out on dead planet after dead planet, constantly reminding herself of the truth as she wandered amongst the dead, she had never truly felt like the last of sapient life. Perhaps the reality of so much death, such absolute destruction, proved too large and horrible for even a prothean mind to comprehend and accept.

Standing there with the Conduit at her back, and the empty Citadel laid out before her, Shepard felt the truth like cement hardening in her gut. Every planet where high civilization once thrived—grand battles waged; edifices magnificent and ridiculous built to tower over the land; great works of art, music, and literature created—nothing remained, all traces destroyed. Only monstrosities remained, soulless and empty. Without their masters, even they would fall, joining the dust.

Snapping her shoulders back, Shepard spun away from the dead and back to her duty, striding toward a lone control console a few metres behind her. Deciphering the console in a couple of seconds, she keyed the controls to retract the platforms, lowering the Conduit from its seat. The moment the great key detached from the interfaces, the deadly emanations ceased, but she knew that even then the artifact remained far from harmless. Reaper technology did not need power flowing through it to indoctrinate.

As it lowered to floor level, she reached into the pack on her belt, taking out three containment barrier emitters. Activating them, she calibrated them to counter its unique frequency before tossing one to both Merol and Attit.

With the smooth confidence of practice, the three of them encircled the Conduit, magnetizing the emitters before throwing them to latch onto the black, oil-slick-on-water metal of the thing.

“Raising containment barrier in three, two, one,” Shepard said. She let out a shallow breath as the shield blinked to life, shrouding the thing’s indoctrination field. She nodded for Merol to run his scans, making sure the Conduit was safe to move, then pulled her rifle and strode back to the top of the ramp. Time to move. More than time to move in truth.

Faint sounds, warbling cries, roars, and growls, drifted through the dead air, warning her that their actions had not gone without notice.

“We are not going to remain alone up here for long,” she called, waving Attit forward into a defensive position.

“Containment barrier is solid,” Merol reported. “Preparing anti-grav field.” Her mate muttered to himself a little as he worked, an old habit that comforted her, easing fear’s claws from her spine. But then he shouted, his voice sharp enough to cut, “Peduk, stay back. You know better than to wander too close. Go guard the ramp.”

Shepard threw a knife-edged glance at Peduk as the soldier stepped up beside her. The claws buried themselves in her spine once more, bringing her rifle around to point at the female. “Peduk, are you all right?”

“Yes, Commander. Apologies. I do not understand why this place is rolling me so far off balance.” Peduk rolled her shoulders and neck. “I shall wrestle it under control.”

Shepard nodded, her gun moving away as Peduk’s tone of voice failed to trigger her alarm, lacking the dull, lost in thought quality she recognized all too well. Shepard nodded toward the ramp. “Peduk, proceed halfway down the ramp, and keep your senses sharp.” She glanced down at her scanner, no movement registering within a three hundred metre radius. Still, the sounds of a great many nightmares echoed through the dead air, closing in on their position.

“Ready to move out,” Merol called.

Shepard didn’t look back. “Attit, rearguard.” Striding out, trusting both her mate and son to cover their positions and duties, she focused on getting the Conduit past the Vanguard. Would the key wake the dreaming Reaper? Did it already feel their presence? So many unknowns, and her only recourse lay in moving forward, moving quickly, and hoping for the best. Trusting to chance and fortune never sat comfortably. Both proved far too fickle to make good allies.

The first ground units attacked just before they reached the archway back into the Vanguard’s chamber. Three prothean abominations leaped down from above, throwing Merol to the ground.

With the enemy engaged at last, Shepard’s fear disappeared into a fierce ruthlessness. Her biotics could harm Merol, so she shoved her rifle into the side of the thing’s head and held the trigger until the particle beam erupted from the far side. Issuing a challenging roar, she kicked the body off the side of the ramp. Attit and Peduk took down another while Shepard dragged her mate up onto his feet and shoved him through the archway.

“Peduk! Disengage and take point. Get Merol and the Conduit to the ship.” She grabbed the collar of Peduk’s armour and pulled her out of the line of fire as a massive amalgam of three species, one of them turned into a massive arm cannon, opened fire. As soon as she got Peduk clear, Shepard lashed out with her biotics, snatching the horror from the walkway and flinging it over the edge.

Every nightmare faced over the course of forty cycles of warfare made an appearance, leaping, swooping, and climbing into battle with weapons, teeth, claws, and biotics. Fighting backwards, it took Shepard and Attit several minutes to make it through the archway. Once through, she let out a sharp hiss of relief and sprinted for the far door, allowing the equipment and crates to cover their retreat.

Halfway across the room, Shepard paused to thin the ranks of their pursuers, sending Attit on to watch his father’s back and assist in maneuvering the Conduit through the door.

“We’re through,” Merol called on the radio. “No enemy units between the door and the ship.”

“Understo—”

The chamber erupted into a buzzing klaxon-roar so loud that it dropped Shepard to her knees. She covered her head with her arms as the entire room trembled.

The roar died, replaced by the steady thunder and hiss of pressurized seals releasing. Scrambling back up onto her feet, Shepard looked up at the Reaper. Racing down the length of its form, the tubes broke free, pulling back against the wall. After staring at it for a moment, stunned and shaken, comprehension dawned, horror following close on its heels.

The Vanguard was being born.

“Tashac!” Merol called, his shout nearly drowned out by the Reaper. “Come! We have arrived at the ship but need your codes to enter.”

Shepard tried to listen, to force her feet to obey, but she stood, frozen and immobile, staring up at the nightmarish construct. All thought and will and purpose disappeared from her mind as it stared directly back at her. No, not at her, into her. It felt as though the Reaper slipped along her neural pathways, burning them up as it sought out the heart of her. It spoke, unformed words like the mutters and mumbles of a dreamer. Even without sense or meaning, the terrible machine voice tore through her, shredding any remaining control she held over her fear.

“Tashac! Come! We need you.”

Merol’s voice broke the Reaper’s grip, tearing her feet from the floor and sending her running for the door. Swift and sure, Shepard leaped over the dead, climbing the pile jammed in the doorway in three jumps. Moving with a dancer’s grace, she navigated the strewn corpses and Caretakers.

Another klaxon sounded, the umbilicals continuing to release, moving down through kilometres of station, and the Reaper began to stir in the tight confines of its chamber as she reached the ship. Frantic, but sure, fingers entered the codes. Stepping away from the ramp as it descended, Shepard turned to face the ground units that appeared in the open door. Instinct and training, her old friends, stepped up, steadying her aim, making her fast and deadly.

Attit and Peduk stood by her side, their rifles cutting down the enemy before they could get through the door.
“The Conduit is aboard,” Merol’s voice called in Shepard’s ear.

“Go,” Peduk yelled. “I will keep them from overwhelming us.”

Shepard ran up the ramp, Attit following directly on her heels. When she heard the hollow ring of Peduk’s boots on metal, she hit the controls, cycling the ramp closed even as the soldier climbed. Popping the seals on her helmet, Shepard ripped it off and threw it aside. They needed to get to the relay before the Vanguard broke free of the Citadel.

“Mother!”

Attit’s cry exploded through Shepard’s heart, the missile pulverizing the organ before blowing through her chest wall. Without turning back, without hearing his body hit the floor, she knew that her last son was dead. The punch of breath pushing out the title he never used told her everything in a flash of horrified understanding.

Grief-stricken and wild, her biotics flared to life around her, only Merol’s presence forcing the power down into her hands rather than lashing out everywhere at once. Her hands burned like stars, leaving blind trails across her vision as she spun on the killer. Unleashing her power in a burst strong enough to blast a vehicle aside, she struck Peduk full in the chest. The sickening, wet crunch of bone shattering and impacting organs provoked no remorse or grief, only righteous fury. The soldier flew the length of the crew corridor to slam into the bulkhead, the terminal crack of shattered spine echoing off the metal walls.

Shepard ran to her son, sliding the last metre on her knees. She cradled his head in the crook of her elbow, her other hand fluttering over the long, curved hilt erupting from the seam between two plates of Attit’s armour. Peduk had buried the blade deep within his body, piercing his heart with an assassin’s precision. His eyes stared into hers without seeing, his spirit, so bright and fierce, already departed to join the antecessors.

Wrapping a desperate grip around the pain, Shepard leaned down, caressing the peak of her brow against her son’s cheek and kepala. She tried to speak the words of blessing, but they choked her, wrapping around her larynx. Her last child . . . the light blinking out on one more piece of her soul, soon to leave her as dark and dead as the Citadel.

The ship shuddered as the buzzing roar ripped through the Citadel again, warning them that the monstrosity hanging amidst those tubes and wires stirred, its dreams evolving into thought as it awakened, ready to be born.

“Go,” Merol said, the lack of music in his tone hitting her like a blow to the gut, expelling what little air remained to her. He gave her a gentle push. “I will lie our son in his bed until this ugliness is past. Go.”

She nodded and laid Attit on the deck plating. Standing, she took a step toward the cockpit, then turned back. Rage burned bright once more, incinerating her sorrow, and furious strides carried her down the ship at a quick step. Peduk’s eyes flickered, rolling up to focus a stare of pain and fear on Shepard as the commander loomed over her.

“Four of us remaining,” Shepard growled as she grabbed the back of Peduk’s armour, dragging the broken soldier to the ramp. “Four and you get too close. After so many missions, after all your training, you panic and step into an indoctrination field.”

Thick, warbling gasps of sound issued from Peduk’s lips, but they formed no words, and even if they had, Shepard would just as soon have deafened herself than listen to them. She hit the control to lower the ramp, descending as it moved. Half way down, she stopped, grabbed hold of one of the hydraulics to steady herself, and heaved, throwing the indoctrinated soldier’s body the rest of the way off the ship.

“Die with your masters, traitor,” Shepard said, hatred as thick and black as tar oozing from the jagged shards of her heart. “May your spirit dwell in the darkness and pain of your betrayal forever.” Virulent and alive, the rancor boiled within her, bubbling up to spew from her lips like vomit, pouring down the front of her and filling her airways until she felt as though she would drown in it. Peduk rolled down the last metre of the ramp, landing in a heap facing up, her eyes latching onto Shepard. The commander held that stare as the ramp closed, only turning away once it sealed.

Wooden, Shepard marched to the cockpit and threw herself into her seat. The ship shuddered as the Reaper screamed in its birthing throes. “We require a new route out of the structure,” she called to Merol when entered the bridge. “We must assume that Peduk betrayed our route to her masters.”

Merol nodded and set to work at his console while she brought the thrusters online and lifted off. Spinning the ship one hundred and eighty degrees, she sent it darting forward at its best possible speed. No doubt the Vanguard’s womb led directly out to space. Their only chance lay in emerging at an unexpected location and bolting for the relay.

The nimble little frigate darted through the massive beams and girders of the station’s insides, eventually finding its way out into abandoned traffic tunnels.

“If we remain in these tunnels, we can travel the entire length of this ward before we are forced to exit.” Merol’s fingers flew over the computer console and screens. “The Reaper is emerging from the base of the presidium ring beneath the tower.”

Shepard nodded, adjusting the course to take them another tunnel closer to the surface. “The Reaper is capable of much greater speed than we are. Hopefully the dampers and emission sinks keep us hidden until we activate the relay.” Despite their stealth technology having kept them hidden from Reaper sensors for more than five cycles, she took no risks, guiding them along a slightly longer route, compensating for the distance by pushing the speed past anything she considered sane or safe.

“Merol, you will have to activate the relay as soon as we are within range. Synchronize with my computer. I will avoid taking us onto a direct path for the rings until the very last remaining moment.” She nodded toward the light of the nebula showing ahead. “We are about to emerge from the station.”

“The Reaper is clear as well and moving toward the relay. We are already within range of its primary weapon.”

Shepard nodded without looking away from her controls. Making sure the massive red laser did not render the Prothean Empire extinct before they reached the relay required all of her focus.

“The Reaper is firing.” The laser seared through the nebula more than five hundred kilometres to port. “Stealth systems appear to be working.” From the corner of her eye, Shepard saw the relay interface open as Merol said, “Starting the activation sequence now.”

“I will circle around and approach from behind the relay, bringing us in on the far side.” She sent the fleet little frigate soaring off the approach vector, keeping their movements unpredictable. Time after time, the Reaper fired, none of the shots coming close, but they did not need to. Eventually, their ship would have to intercept the rings, a much smaller, predictable target.
“Try to discern a firing pattern,” she commanded. “A mean time between shots . . . anything to help.”

“Lock on to the relay in six, five, four, three, two, one.”

When Merol reached the count of one, Shepard set the vector, dropping down to approach velocity. The Vanguard’s laser scorched through the space less than a kilometre off their bow, setting off the ship’s alarms, but then the relay arced, grabbing their little vessel and shooting it off through space.

Setix 10.0 89998 of Tapek Menru

Ilos. Shepard’s lips pressed thin in a weary but relieved smile as the planet appeared in the forward port, the scanners reporting no Reaper presence in the system.

Cycles had passed since she last visited the silent graveyard of the Inusannon. The site’s security and secrecy proved far too important to risk anything more than visits of absolute necessity. Remote even for the Prothean Empire, Ilos would wait out the millennia, hiding the Conduit and an entire science division in its underground bunkers.

A flash of green appeared on Shepard’s screen. “Identify,” the holographic interface commanded.

“Hello, Vigil. Commander Tashac Jacar and Merol Natil aboard Senarium frigate four. Cargo, Attit Jacar, deceased, and Reaper technology catalogued as the Conduit.”

“Identities and cargo confirmed. Welcome back to Ilos, Commander Jacar. Please release navigational control to prepare for landing. You will be able to disembark in approximately two setixs.”

Shepard did as the VI asked, relinquishing control. All her interfaces blinked out and the shields closed over all the ports. Only Vigil knew their course and destination, ensuring it could never be betrayed to the enemy. Finally able to lean back in her chair and relax a little, she turned to look at her mate. Merol met her gaze for a moment then held out his hand.

Grief closed in around her as his fingers gripped hers. The Conduit was safe, but the cost . . .

Merol tugged on her hand, coaxing her from her seat then pulling her into his lap. Wrapping his arms around her, he held her in silence. They had never needed words, their souls open and laid bare to one another. Only those who kept secrets needed words.

Setix 14.1 89998 of Tapek Menru

Merol carried Attit through the complex, following Vigil’s directions, the VI opening doors and finally an elevator to allow them passage. The lift swept down through layers of ruins, some reclaimed from the jungle, most still covered in vines and wide-leafed plants growing out of the cracks. Lights, glowing panels set into the walls, beamed through open slats in the side of the car, giving her the impression of descending a great depth. After many levels, the elevator opened into a tunnel.

“If you follow the path, you should locate an aesthetically pleasing location to lay your son’s body to rest,” Vigil explained in its carefully modulated tones.
Shepard slipped an arm around Merol as her mate turned down the tunnel, carrying Attit with tireless ease. She focused on him, feeling his sorrow and anger as keenly as her own, using them to push aside the many demands she wished to make of Vigil. A proper time and place to get her answers and finalize the affairs of the empire would appear. As comforting as she would find it to vanish into the role of commander, for the moment, she needed to bear the grief of mother and mate.

The tunnel led out into what appeared to have been a formal garden back when people inhabited the city. Statues lined the high walls, their forms disturbing in a way that never ceased to be less discomfiting with time and exposure. She supposed they represented the Inusannon, a race she could not consider beautiful, but it was not their form that bothered her. What reached into her and set her teeth on edge was the sorrow and pathos, the defeat that emanated from them.

Protheans fought. From the moment they battled their way out of the womb, protheans considered the obstacles and challenges presented by life as opportunities to beat their world and destiny into submission. Those statues with their bent heads and downcast eyes felt like philosophical antimatter, as if the slightest brush against one would cause an annihilation event.

Shepard turned her back on the statues, looking up through layers of stepped walls and overhanging foliage. She loved Ilos, despite its tragedy . . . and its statues. Every single bit of fauna on the planet, other than the research team, had been dead for 50,000 cycles. Not even a lonely insect droned through the foliage. For a soldier, fighting and struggling for more than forty cycles, the peace of the place . . . the complete silence . . . came as close to paradise as she could hope for.

“You were correct, Vigil,” she said, turning a slow circle. “This garden is perfect.” She brushed Merol’s cheek with the backs of her fingers. “What do you think?”

Merol nodded, but remained silent. As Attit’s mother, the person who brought him forth into life, the responsibility for his final disposition fell to her. She stepped past her mate, following the lines and paths of the garden to a small, secluded nook between a series of columns. The sunlight streamed down through an open ceiling while vines grew riot, forming walls of teeming, flowering, sweet-smelling life.

“She placed Attit’s body in the center of the space and knelt next to his son’s head. “Rest easy, strong warrior. Your bravery and sacrifice have earned you an honoured place among the antecessors.“ He brushed the peak of his brow along Attit’s cheek. “No male has ever felt more gratitude to have helped bring a son into the galaxy. I wish so many things could have been different . . . that you could have been born into a time of victory, but those are selfish wishes, for you were born into the time in which you were most needed. You have saved us and the future many times. Now take your rest. You will be remembered with love and pride.”

Shepard knelt on the opposite side of her son and bent to touch her brow to his. “As I brought you into life, I release you from it, my last child.” She clenched her teeth, swallowing against the emptiness. “If a portion of a mother’s honour is reflected from her children, I shall shine brighter even than a supernova. You and your siblings have been the greatest honour and joy of my life.
Rest easy, beautiful, brave warrior. Take your place among the antecessors. As I gave you life, I release you.”

She remained bent over him for long moments, too long to be seemly, but in that moment, her brow touching that of her last child’s, her people—anyone who would judge her weak for her attachments—gone, she could not manage to care about appearances.

“Tashac.” Merol’s voice, as always, pulled her back. “Our duties are not yet complete.”

“Goodbye,” she whispered then straightened. Standing, she turned away from the empty vessel that had once carried her last son. Merol was correct. Grief could wait for the Conduit to be locked away. It could wait to leave behind their messages for the future. It could wait. Grief could always wait.

Setix 15.3 89998 of Tapek Menru

Shepard palmed the door control, pausing to imprint herself on the lock. “How long ago did the research team go into the pods, Vigil?” She stepped into the small, dark room at the very bottom of the base.

“Fifteen days ago, Commander Jacar.”

“And the base is working as expected? All systems performing at optimal?” She stepped back out of the way, allowing Merol to guide the Conduit in the door.

“It is, Commander. Once the Conduit is secured, you may record your final imprints at your leisure.”

“We will.” She walked back to the door. “What measures are in place to keep this room secure?”

“The elevator and door will only open if presented with both your imprint and that of Dr. Natil. Both imprints must be free of indoctrination. Unauthorized personnel will not be able to proceed past the elevator door in the main complex if the base is breached.”

Shepard smiled, not as relieved as she would have hoped for. It sounded solid. It sounded as though the Conduit should be safe forever, particularly once she and Merol succumbed to time. Still, part of her mind kept spinning, trying to find a hole to explain her lack of confidence.

She opened her mouth, a question about the power grid forcing its way to the fore, but then Merol stepped away from the Conduit.

“I’m finished,” he said. “Are you ready to go?”

She looked into his eyes for a moment, then nodded, sensing that he meant more than being finished securing the Conduit. She held her question, returning to the elevator.

“Is there somewhere we could rest, Vigil?” Shepard asked. “Some food? This day seems to have started more than a week ago. Once we eat and rest, we can work on closing out our reports and recording our messages.”

“Your quarters were prepared and stocked in anticipation of your arrival,” the VI replied. “I will direct the elevator to take you to that wing of the facility.”

Setix 16.4, 1 of Kirash Par
Their rest and recuperation lasted three days. Shepard wandered the base, talking with the VI, leaving her last report in bits and pieces, some spoken, most through direct tactile interface. Merol haunted the labs, checking and rechecking that the containment barrier around the Conduit would hold, keeping the deadly artifact hidden and harmless to the researchers sleeping many levels above it.

At last, on the third day, they rose late, prepared the frigate for space, and then descended through the base to Vigil’s main console.

“Commander Jacar, welcome. Please step forward and leave your message,” the VI intoned.

Shepard walked forward, leaving Merol a few paces back. Still, once she stood before Vigil, she just stared at the holographic image. After all those cycles . . . an end. At last. Perhaps she and Merol could find somewhere quiet to just breathe for a little before succumbing to old age. She reached out, fingers caressing Vigil’s controls like an old friend’s hand. Funny, to think of a computer program with a face as a friend. Product of the times, perhaps. So few real companions left. A single tear slipped over her cheek as Attit and Giran’s faces breezed through her mind, her most recent losses.

One real companion left.

“My name is Commander Tashac Jacar, head of the Senarium. My people are gone. Everything they were has turned to dust, but for this message. Whomever you are, take the gift my people bought with their lives and their sorrow. Take it and make certain that your cycle ends the Reapers and their masters forever. I have done my part. It cost me more than half my soul, but the Conduit, the Principal, the Nexus, the Fulcrum, and the Crux are all safely hidden. If our luck holds, the Reaper vanguard will never locate them to open the five great relays to dark space.”

She glanced back at Merol for a moment before continuing, the undying support in his beautiful, golden stare shoring up her failing strength. “If you are watching this recording, the Reapers are rising. If you must, destroy the great keys, but if you are of the sort of mind and spirit to have made it this far, I offer you another option. Use them. Discover what the masters are hiding out there beyond the rim of what is known. Bring them down to shatter with a force so great that it will resound throughout time.” She smiled, a thin, savage tear across her face. “Even across the millennia, I will feel your victory and rejoice when it avenges everyone I ever loved.”

Withdrawing her hand, Shepard stepped back. “Thank you, Vigil. Take care of our friends here. May they find their way out into a brand new galaxy.

“Live in courage and strength, Commander.”

She nodded. “I shall. Once we are clear of the elevator, you may put the base to sleep and power down. Rest well through the ages . . . my friend.”

“Good-bye, Tashac. May your courage guide your fortune.”

She inclined her head a little and backed away three steps before turning toward Merol.

He stared at her, disbelief trying to force its way through the horror of the past two days. “Where do we go? We are alone in the galaxy.”

“No.” Shepard strode over and took both of his hands in hers, their emotions for one another, their despair, pain, and relief all tangling into a mess she ached to release into the waters. “We’re free. There are still the primitive races. What if we took our tiny ship to the blue planet, that one where “The elder element sings so beautifully?” She pulled him around, starting up the long ramp to the elevator, her arm wrapped tightly around him.

“The one where we found Nexus?” He nodded. “The blue primitives are very attractive.”

Chuckling, she shook her head. “Talking like that, I’d think you a youth at the beginning of your first mating cycle.”

His arm slipped around her. “No. I am an old prothean, my mating days come and gone, and I am well content with the mother of my last children.” He looked down at the cement. “Giran and Attit are at peace. Perhaps we can find some for ourselves in the mountains of the elderment planet.”

Shepard brushed the peak of her brow against his as she stopped at the elevator door, tenderness adding a poignant layer to her pathos. Looking up at the pods, she whispered. “Keep it hidden.
Above all else, my friends, honour the price we paid and keep it hidden well.” Turning away from the last hope for her species’ survival, she nodded for Merol to touch the elevator pad.

“Overview recording—Merol Natil—complete.”

When her mate stepped into the elevator, Shepard pressed her hand against the elevator control, leaving behind her last imprint.

Elevator and security rerouting to automated systems. Vigil powering down.”

* * * * *

Shepard jumped straight out of bed onto her feet. “Must keep it hidden. Keep it safe.” Her knees gave out, but she spun and caught herself, palms hitting the mattress. Eyes open, but unseeing, she watched the past fade into mist, Merol and her children slipping away as the last note of the rachni queen’s song faded.

“My family,” she whispered, stumbling down the side of the bed. “No, don’t leave me.” She clutched at the memories, desperate to hold onto them, but they slipped through her fingers like sand.

“Shepard?” Rustling in the dim light. “Are you okay? What’s going on?” Garrus’s voice tugged at her, a gentle tether easing her back to reality. “Did you have a nightmare?”

She shook her head, a strangled sob gasping from her throat before she could crush it. “Parts of it were definitely nightmare,” she whispered, turning slowly. “Attit . . ..” Straightening, she turned a slow circle, her eyes searching the dim room as the silent walls of Ilos disappeared, replaced by the Normandy’s bulkheads. Finally, her gaze found Garrus, the familiar concern and affection in his stare helping settle her back into her own skin. “I had a dream, Garrus. I dreamed a whole life.”

The boom of long, heavy strides raced across the mess, pounding against the deck plating with an urgency that pulled her to the door. She palmed the control and it opened on Nihlus, standing there, shirtless, chest heaving, hand raised to knock.

Her heart pounded out nearly a minute’s worth of beats as she just stared at the Spectre, seeing in his eyes the reflection of the loved ones so recently lost. How? How could see Merol looking back at her through Nihlus’s stare?

“It’s still hidden,” they said at the same time. “They still keep it safe.”
Nihlus stepped forward, lifting her off the ground into a tight embrace, his brow brushing gently against her temple the way Merol . . . A grip of equal parts love and grief clamped around her chest, squeezing tight. She wrapped her arms around Nihlus’s neck, turning her face into him, holding tight to a beloved mate who had never been hers.

“You dreamed it as well,” she whispered. “You were Merol.”

He nodded. “And you were Tashac. I can see her in your eyes, but how?”

Shepard eased back down to stand on her own feet, her hands reaching up to cradle his face. “I don’t know. I heard rachni song. Maybe the queen?” She smiled, but it quickly melted away. The Citadel . . . Peduk’s betrayal, the weight of her beautiful son dead in her arms . . . all of it still so real. “Were you there for all of it? Attit . . .”

“Yes. The last days of the war. The Citadel . . . Ilos . . . everything.” He ran a hand over her hair, a sad sort of sigh accompanying the gesture. “Seems strange for you to have hair.”

Shepard nodded, her hands slipping down to his chest, still unable to completely pull away from the bond she’d felt in the dream. The mates had shared a tie of such amazing strength . . . a love and trust like she couldn’t have even imagined existed. Gone but for what lived inside her head and Nihlus’s. “And two eyes. God, it felt like . . ..”

“. . . an entire lifetime,” he finished.

She saw the dream pull back, Nihlus’s gaze shuttering as Garrus shifted on the bed, a reminder to them both that Tashac and Merol, as real and immediate as they felt, had died somewhere far away, a very long time before.

Nihlus backed up a couple of steps, releasing her, and looked over her head to nod at Garrus. “Sorry for the rude awakening.”

Shepard glanced over her shoulder as she said, “I’d already stumbled around enough to wake the dead.”

“What happened?” Garrus asked, swinging out from under the blankets. He stood, walking a couple of steps toward them, looking so awkward and confused that it pulled Shepard the rest of the way out of the dream.

Oh god, she’d been climbing all over Nihlus. She backed away from the Spectre and reached out to take Garrus’s hand in hers. “I think the rachni queen helped Nihlus and I sort out the information we got from the beacon and the cipher. We shared a dream of the last days of the Prothean-Reaper war.” Looking back at Nihlus, a wide smile spread across her face. “I’ll explain it all to you later, but most importantly . . . we know what the Conduit is and where to find it.”

Tapek Menru -- Literal translation: The long defeat. The calendar was started from the date the Citadel was captured by the Reapers but not officially named until 10000 Tapek Menru. On the ten thousandth day of the war, Prothean leaders declared it a stalling action designed to buy scientists time to find a way for the Prothean Empire to both survive the war and send aid forward into the next extinction. The calendar is measured in days.

Cepra -- A large insect (8-10 cm in length) native to the world upon which the Prothean people originated. It’s sting was so painful and venomous, death by cepra-sting was a form of execution. reserved for traitors.

Setix -- Prothean unit of time equivalent to referencing an hour. A day is comprised of 36 setixs broken into six sub-units.

Haksaya kubenar -- A term of endearment, literally translates as my strong, true heart.

Cikabeknai -- The reciprocal term of endearment for the above. Literally translates to brave love.

Kepala -- The ridges of carapace that cover the top of a Prothean’s head.

Kirash Par -- New cycle or new life. Time of year for rebirth and renewal. It also denotes the calendar for the 50000 cycle period following the long defeat.

Elder Element -- Also referred to as elderment. The Prothean common name for element zero. It was considered magical in their ancient times because it “sang” to their perception through touch.
“Ambassador.” Shepard squared her shoulders, standing at parade rest before the hologram of Donnel Udina. Residual excitement from the night before tingled along her spine, allowing her to meet his sneer with a genuine smile, if not one actually meant for him. Now that they had finally edged ahead of Saren, she could hold her temper long enough to get things organized. Truly, she should never let him get to her at all. Ever. The man amounted to a paper cut-out that should just blow into her life and then right back out. That image widened her smile.

“What do you want, Shepard? I’m a busy man.” He crossed his arms, the sneer turning to belligerence. “Do you have any proof that Saren attacked Eden Prime?”

She nodded. “Yes, sir. This call is to request an audience with the council. We have irrefutable evidence of his involvement in several crimes, including Eden Prime.”

The ambassador straightened, the sneer uncurling into an incredulous smirk. “You have evidence?”

“Yes, sir, and we’ve tracked him to his base. The Normandy is en route for the Citadel. We’re docking in three hours, so will be available whenever they have time to meet with us.” She didn’t move, didn’t even twitch an eyebrow as she watched his expressions shift, the weasel trying to find a way to make himself the hero even before he knew what they had. Lifting a hand to her mouth, she cleared her throat to squash a laugh before it could form. Let him take all the credit he wanted. Maybe the council would end up putting a hit on him.

That thought made her tingle all the way to her finger and toenails. She grabbed the inside of her bottom lip between her teeth to control the manic grin trying to beat its way onto her mouth.

Damn it, man, just tell me that you’ll let me know when it’s all arranged before I chew all the way through my face.

“I’ll contact you when I have a time, Captain.” His face twisted and for a moment, she thought him on the cusp of blowing his breakfast. “Good work.” His hologram vanished before his praise burned its way from her ears to the shock processing center in her brain.

“Holy shit.” She turned toward the door. “Somewhere, the four horsemen are riding the crest of a wave straight out of hell. Blessed Enkindlers preserve us.” The sound of the door opening saved her from examining the possible galaxy-shattering consequences of Udina telling her she’d done a good job.

“Shepard-Captain,” Legion called. “You wished to speak to us?”

Turning to face the geth, she smiled and waved for the platform to enter the room. “I do.” She gestured for Legion to sit, but didn’t push the matter when it remained standing. “You’re looking much more even these days,” she said, pointing toward the repaired half of its chest.

“Creator Tali’Zorah explained our error. We do not wish to complicate our interactions with organics. The alteration was necessary.” It stood evenly on both feet, regarding her with almost no movement or expression.

“How did your mission with Tali go? Were you able to work well together?” Shepard leaned toward the geth, forearms on her knees.

The unit inclined its head. “Creator Tali’Zorah demonstrated competence and a strong ability to assess situations and adapt.”

Shepard chuckled and nodded, her head bobbing a little. “She said much the same about working with you.” Pausing, she took a deep breath. “I want to team the two of you up with Rael’Zorah to infiltrate Saren’s base on Virmire and rescue the quarian pilgrims. I would like the team to be three geth and three quarians. I’ve already sent a message to Tali, and she’s making arrangements for a quarian Marine to join us. Is there any way that two other geth units could participate?”

Legion’s head flaps danced in several waves, his hands and head moving in a remarkable simulation of a person pondering out a difficult question. “You wish to set precedent for cooperation and trust between the creators and the geth?”

Shepard pressed her lips together, a crease pinching between her eyebrows. “Yeah, I do.” She shrugged, just a quick pop of her shoulders. “Do you see a better way to bring your two sides together? If geth can help rescue hundreds of quarians . . . if quarians can work with geth in a spirit of peace . . . maybe we can start to make some real steps. Maybe it doesn’t all have to end in war.”

After another thirty seconds or so of his contemplative activity, Legion inclined its head. “Although this unit is unique, Prime platforms are command and control units, therefore have a degree of autonomous utility. However, a geth ship within broadcast or tightbeam range would facilitate greatest utility.”

Shepard considered that for a moment. “Okay. Prime units are dicey, a ship even more so, but see what you can arrange. We’ll present the idea to Rael’Zorah tomorrow morning and make final preparations based on how he reacts. No doubt it will involve yelling.”

“Do you require anything further, Shepard-Captain?”

She shook her head, but then sat up, raising a hand to stop it as it turned to leave. “No wait. I do have a question. How did the three of you get across that minefield on Luna?” She stood and took a step toward the geth.

“Jenkins-Corporal suggested welding together wheels blown off the armoured vehicle into units of two and rolling them ahead of our advance,” Legion replied. “The improvised apparatus cleared a path sufficient for passage.”

Shepard gave him a lopsided grin and a slight nod. “Smart cookies, the whole lot of you. That will be all, Legion. Well, except that, it’s been a pleasure getting to know you at least a little. And thank you for helping save both my team and myself over the last few missions. I’m glad to have shot you.”

The geth’s head flaps all rose and fluttered in an exaggerated wave at that. “Trust furthers mutual goals,” it replied simply.

“Yes, it sure does.” She tilted her head toward the door. “Dismissed. See you tomorrow at 0900.”
“Affirmative.”

Tali caught up with Shepard as the captain stopped to check in with Pressly, ensuring that he had all his ducks lined up to get them resupplied during their short stay on the Citadel.

“I just saw Legion,” the young quarian said, falling in next to Shepard as the Captain strode for the stairs down to the crew deck. “He said you asked about bringing in geth.”

Shepard nodded. “I did. He said Primes would be the most autonomous, and I’d certainly welcome the extra firepower, but I’m worried about your father.” She snapped a salute to the guard at the door, then stopped, ushering Tali ahead of her. “How badly is he going to freak out when we talk about bringing geth along?”

“I’ve already brought it up with him, and warned Kal that he’d be working with geth if he accepted the mission. Kal will be fine, I think, once he meets Legion.” Tali trotted down the stairs, stopping at the elevator door. “Father expressed concerns.” She giggled, Shepard assumed because of the understatement involved. “But when I showed him my suit records from Luna, and he saw how Legion saved us more than once, it seemed to help.”

Shepard palmed the elevator control then turned to give Tali her full attention. “Kal? I assume that is the Marine who will be joining us?” The familiar, relaxed way Tali spoke of the new quarian went a long way to easing the gnawing in Shepard’s guts.

“Yes.” Tali wrung her hands a little. “His name is Kal’Reegar, and he’s one of the most experienced Marines in the flotilla.”

“You know him well?” Shepard glanced at the elevator as it arrived, the door opening. “You trust him?”

“With my life. He is father’s favourite choice to make sure I stay out of trouble when necessary.” She shrugged. “But he’s both reasonable and practical. A good balance for father’s volatility.”

“Excellent. I look forward to meeting him.” Shepard stepped into the elevator. “Keep your father on a short leash when we get to the Citadel,” she said, smiling to lighten her tone. “He gets himself arrested, I’ll leave him behind.”

Tali chuckled. “I’ll make sure to have credits for bail.” Bouncing a couple of times on her toes, the quarian took off for the gym.

“Shepard!” Wrex bellowed as she stepped out of the elevator. Waving one massive arm, he beckoned her over.

A bright, genuine grin jumped onto her face when he practically charged her, ushering her over to his stash with a massive arm around her shoulders. Seeing the energy fueling every movement, the inspired fire burning behind his eyes, it made the bright webs of connection glow deep inside her. Nihlus’s joke about the house becoming empty rang all too true. She’d broken a long-standing personal directive with the crazy, mismatched members of her team. In a couple of months, she’d come to love them all, and now most of them would be leaving her.

“You’re such an idiot,” she grumbled under her breath.

She yelped as Wrex welcomed her to his corner of the cargo bay with a slap on the shoulder that sent her reeling into a crate. As she shoved herself back onto her feet, she looked around at all the crates. They took up a good quarter of the space. “What are your plans for all this stuff, Wrex? I’d let you keep it here, but the way we collect strays and equipment, I don’t know how long we’ll be able to spare the room.”

“Someone is meeting us at the dock to take it all back to Tuchanka. She’ll keep it hidden until I can get back there and make sure everything gets sent where it needs to go.” He harrumphed and boosted his armor higher on his shoulders. “I want every clan to get what is theirs. I won’t tolerate clans going to war over great-aunt Charza’s gold-plated shotgun.”

She grinned, tilting her head as one of her eyebrows migrated for her hairline. “Gold-plated shotgun? This is something that exists?”

He slapped the top of the closest crate, her ears ringing as the bang echoed. “That thing caused four clan wars before it vanished.” A throaty cough of laughter rolled from his wide, toothy mouth. “I’d show you, but I’ve seen the way you attach to guns, Shepard. I’d hate to have to kill you to get it back.”

“Aw, come on. Think how hot I’d look toting a gold-plated gun.” She struck an impressive pose with an imaginary shotgun, head tilted up, the hero staring out into the stars. “You know you can see it, Wrex.”

“I can, Shepard, and it scares me.” He slapped her on the shoulder again, nearly dropping her to the floor.

Snatching at his armour, Shepard staggered upright and stepped in close, the grin fading from her face. Lowering her voice, she asked, “So, this person is someone you trust?”

He nodded, his entire body bristling, enlarging in a way that told her that he didn’t just trust her, she meant a great deal to him. Whomever she was, he’d defend her to the death. With Wrex, that amounted to the only endorsement Shepard needed.

“I trust her with the future of my people, Shepard. She’s a shaman of the female clan.” As he spoke, his voice rose in volume and strength until it rang off the bulkheads. “Her life is keeping the females connected to what it means to be krogan, connected to Tuchanka, so that when our people rise again, it’s from a foundation of wisdom and strength.” He stopped and glanced around as if realizing that everyone could hear him and all that passion amounted to something to be embarrassed about.

Shepard braced a hand against his upper arm. “Sounds like you’ll make the perfect team. Please, make sure to introduce us.” She gave him a shove that didn’t even rock him. “Damn, I need to work out.” A quick wink met his throaty chuckle then she struck out for Ashley’s corner.

The chief looked up as Shepard approached. “Morning, ma’am.” She grinned. “Been hearing some freaky scuttlebutt this morning.”

Shepard leaned against the chief’s work bench and crossed her arms. “You know better than to listen to scuttlebutt, Ash.” Leaning in, she gave the chief a sly, secretive smile. “The truth is so much stranger. The rachni queen helped Nihlus and I sort out the beacon vision. I relived the last few days of the Prothean-Reaper war through the eyes of this remarkable Prothean, Commander Tashac Jacar.” She let out a soft cough of laughter. “Wow, that felt a lot like bragging.”

Williams stared at her for a moment, then shook her head. “Every day I wake up a little more certain that I took a debilitating head injury on Eden Prime and am in a coma in a hospital somewhere.”

Waggling her head side to side a little, Shepard shrugged. “Also a possibility.”
Ashley put down the rifle she was working on. “Actually, ma’am, there was something I wanted to talk to you about.” She turned to face Shepard, leaning her hip against the workbench as well. “Cerberus sneaking those advanced mechs into the base on Luna . . .” She let out a grumbling sigh. “I’ve been watching Legion, Tali, and Garrus take those things apart, and they scare me, ma’am.” She turned to look at the tables where pieces of the mechs lay spread out. “We have no idea what Cerberus is up to, and if they’re capable of tech like that . . . if they’re able to create an AI out of what they found in the training base . . .” She shrugged. “Who knows what else they’re capable of.”

Gratitude hit Shepard square in the chest, nearly disarming her. For all she doubted the ideas of fate or a higher power that orchestrated the universe, could random chance really be credited with bringing that group of unique people together? “You think we should be keeping a closer eye on them?” she asked at last.

“Yes, ma’am.” Ash nodded, straightening to military-starched formality. “They’re dangerous as hell, and we have no idea what their agenda or allegiance is. We need to get people in there and soon, before the Alliance realizes how dangerous Cerberus really is and screws up planting their own moles.”

Shepard nodded, a half smile pulling back one side of her mouth. “You volunteering, Williams?”

Ash jerked back as if Shepard had slapped her. “Me?” After a moment of staring, her jaw hanging slack, Ash’s face crumpled into a thoughtful scowl. “Me.”

Shepard shifted a little, returning to the same relaxed angle against the bench. “Well, you have a history with a credible reason to resent aliens, while being one of the most loyal Alliance soldiers I’ve ever met.” She stood, wanting to merely plant the seed and let Ash decide what to do with it. “There’s no one I would trust more to do it.” She squeezed Ashley’s shoulder. “We all have choices to make and risks to assume to fight this battle. Maybe this is yours.”

Ashley nodded, but Shepard could see that her attention had focused inward. “Yes, ma’am.”
Getting soft, Shepard.

His brow plates raised, the stare sharpening to the point where she wondered if he suspected the nature of her plan. “Why aren’t you taking it?”

“I am taking it. Don’t worry, Nihlus, I won’t be going anywhere without an escort until you guys meet me right back here in a couple of hours.” She winked, and gave him a gentle push toward the elevator. “Go on. Let’s get our work done so we can relax. We’re right back on the rollercoaster in the morning.”

Garrus lingered as the others got in the lift. “Shepard . . .”

“Stop being a worry-wart and watch those three for me.”

He stepped closer and leaned down, his back turned to the others as if walling them off. “What about the Council?”

“I’ll meet with Udina and then decide. Don’t worry, and get moving. You promised me a proper date.” She grinned and reached up to brush his cheek.

“Shepard!” Wrex’s bellow rang out like the answer to prayer.

“Go on,” she prompted, walking Garrus the two steps to the elevator. “I’ll have Wrex stick with me until I get to my meeting.” She squeezed his hand. “I’ll see you in a bit.”

Watching him leave, she grinned and shook her head, frustration and gratitude duking it out in her chest. Trying to order Garrus out of his over-protectiveness was like trying to order the seasons to realign. One day, she suspected her tolerance would reach a breaking point where he either had to give it up, or they’d end up in a dual to the death. If that turned out to be the case, she liked her odds.

Once the doors closed, Shepard spun and strode over to where Wrex waited. Beside him stood a figure almost completely shrouded within multiple layers of clothes. A large flat hat structure covered the top of the individual’s head while their entire face, except a pair of large amber eyes, hid behind a veil.

Smiling, Shepard nodded to the newcomer, then looked to Wrex.

The battlemaster stepped forward. “Shepard, this is the Shaman of the female Clan Urdnot,” Wrex said, holding a hand out to indicate the shrouded figure. “Shaman, this is Captain Shepard.”

Shepard offered her hand, not at all surprised by the strength behind the shaman’s grip. Despite being almost invisible behind her wardrobe, she looked every inch a krogan. “I’m very pleased to meet you,” she said, flashing a bright smile. “Wrex is an important part of my team, and it’s wonderful to meet someone important to him.”

Wrex cleared his throat and buffeted Shepard hard enough to stagger her.

“I mean, of course,” she sputtered, trying to catch her balance fast enough to preserve a little dignity, “important to his plans for the krogan people.”

The shaman gave a single, regal dip of her head as she released Shepard’s hand. “Thank you for helping recover these priceless pieces of krogan history, Captain.” The female’s voice reached down inside Shepard, warm and eloquent, stately and strong. “Wrex has told me of your expectations of the krogan people.” She drew herself up, not quite reaching Wrex’s stature thanks to lacking his massive hump, but no less impressive.

“I . . .” Shepard wasn’t sure what she intended to say, the word tumbling out as if to apologize or make an excuse, but then the female cut the air with a hand, and it no longer mattered. If any doubts about the wisdom of encouraging Wrex’s unification plans had wormed their way through Shepard’s thoughts, the shaman’s voice and that gesture—the sheer strength of will that shone through a single hand movement—dissolved the doubts into bright glimmers of hope.

“We will see these things done, Captain. The krogan have never been entrusted with tasks that required them to do more than discharge large numbers of bullets into an enemy. Your trust . . .” Those huge, gorgeous eyes blinked, a gesture just as controlled as the rest. “Your belief in our people will prove to be well founded. Your trust is an unprecedented honour.”

At that moment, her pulse pounding hard in her throat, warmth radiating under her skin, Shepard felt herself honoured. She opened her mouth to speak again, but again the shaman beat her to the punch.

“We will allow you to attend to your business, Captain,” she said. “I find myself eager to meet the rachni queen.” She held out her hand, shaking Shepard’s with that same, vice-like grip. “I hope the future provides us the opportunity to get to know one another better.”

“So do I.” Shepard grinned then shot a wink at Wrex. “Help me keep my word and ride the elevator down with me?”

When he nodded, she headed over to hit the control, allowing him and his amazing, formidable partner a moment. He strode in to stand next to her a few seconds later. “The shaman and me . . . we’re not . . .” He huffed for a moment. “. . . anything more than . . .”

Tickled by his discomfort, Shepard grinned. “Not more than what, Wrex?”

He slapped her on the back, sending her reeling into the door. “Stop that!” She dusted her armour off. “You’re going to break something I need.” After a moment, she shrugged. “I like her, though. She’s tough. A good match for your stubborn, old grouchiness.”

He let out a harrumph. “She makes me seem like a cuddly, old lap varren. And that’s before she gets angry.”

Shepard nodded. “That’s because under all that ‘grrr argh’, you’re a big, squishy, old softy.” Luckily, the doors opened as she heard his hand coming. Slipping out, she turned back and grinned. “The truth hurts, don’t it, big guy? Glory hallelujah.” When he moved to follow her out of the lift, she shook her head. “It’s okay. I’m not leaving C-Sec Academy. Head on up and get your business sorted.”

A withering scowl answered that, but she just waved and turned away, scanning the crowd, and a crowd it was. C-Sec officers and civilians came and went through a handful of entrances and down hallways leading off in every direction. She glanced at her chrono, praying to the god of punctuality that she wouldn’t start the day by making a bad impression.

No, she still had a few minutes to find her target, so set out, weaving through the crowd. God, she hated the Citadel. Well, the Citadel and most anywhere more than three people showed up at the same time. Being short particularly sucked, people walking into her and banging her in the head with their elbows, especially the turians.

“Shepard!”
She spun, her heart hammering as it jumped into her throat. “Sweet baby Jesus, Garrus! You scared the crap out of me.” The exclamation came out harsh and exasperated, but mostly because of the sudden rush of guilt that accompanied his appearance. He’d almost found her out. “I thought you were supposed to be looking after Ash and Sparky.”

He strode over, parting the crowd with enviable ease. “We’re waiting for a cab.” His hand lifted to cradle her jaw. “Come with us. We can endure Udina for a few minutes.”

She stared into his eyes for a handful of heartbeats, then let out a long sigh. “Garrus, you’re going to mother-hen me to death. Go, look after them and trust me. I have no plans to go running around the Citadel alone.” She leaned up to brush a kiss against his mandible. “You and I are going to have to chat about this idea you’ve got stuck in your brain that I’m too reckless and stupid to take care of myself. I’m a grown woman and your commanding officer, so go, act like it. You can be the boyfriend later.”

“Yes, ma’am.” He nodded and backed away. “In a couple of hours.”

Shepard let out a long, slow breath and glanced at her chrono again. Rapidly approaching being late, she remained in place, watching until he got in the cab with the others and took off. “Don’t make it easy to ditch you or anything,” she muttered, turning back into the crowd.

By the time she saw familiar colony markings above C-Sec issued armour, claustrophobia had her hands balled into fists, the need to run pounding in her chest and between her eyes, her heart racing like a rabbit being chased by wolves.

“Here goes nothing,” she sighed, making a beeline across the lobby. Strong, back straight, smile welcoming, she forced her way through the early morning throng. Her target made her go all the way to him. She pressed her lips tight, squashing the cheeky smile that told him she knew what he was doing, and just held out her hand. It trembled a little, betraying the matching flutter in her belly.

The turian stared at her hand for a long moment before reaching out and taking it. His grip firm, he held on, staring into her eyes as if searching for something. When he let go, she couldn’t tell if he’d found it or not, and the nervous flutter turned into her fire-breathing acrobat troupe.

“Hello, sir, I’m Captain Jane Shepard,” she said, pleased that the words came out confident. “It’s a pleasure to meet you.”

He nodded toward a corridor off to her right and held out an arm to usher her that way. “I wish I could say the same, Captain. You’ll forgive me if I reserve judgement on that.” He set out, maintaining an inviting pace.

She smiled and bowed her head a little. “Of course.” She walked at his side, glad she didn’t need to chase him. It gave her a little hope for her mission.

He led her past a waiting area and then down another corridor. The surroundings passed her by in a series of vague impressions—wall colour, lots of people in blue uniforms—as she studied the turian walking at her side. Despite his carefully cultivated and formidable aura of command, something about him sent the acrobats out for coffee, allowing her nerves to settle.

“My son looks well,” he said.

Shepard’s smile widened, a grateful flush warming her cheeks as he opened the conversation. “Yes, sir. He’s healthy and fit.”
Herros Vakarian stopped at an office door and held out a hand, inviting her to precede him. She did, her gaze slipping over the standard office decor without pausing until she spotted a holo on a shelf. Unable to hold back a chuckle at the gangly teenage turian pictured with his parents and sister, she walked over to look at it.

“Please, take a seat,” he said, calling her back.

When she turned to accept his invitation, she saw him watching her with a careful, calculating stare. She walked over, perching on the edge of a chair facing the desk. Air stopped going in and out of her lungs for a moment, the room spinning slowly around her as reality crashed in on her. Only one solution had presented itself to the problem of getting council permission to attack Virmire. Only one door opened before her that gave her hope for saving Nihlus and her crew.

Now, you just need to be brave enough to step through it, Janey. Hopefully the torin on the other side of that desk will help you cross the threshold.

She gestured toward the picture. “Beautiful family,” she said, feeling more than a little awkward. Oh God, was that what it amounted to? Her being there? She needed a dad to hold her hand, even if it was someone else’s dad?

His eyes narrowed a little, but he nodded and sat. “Yes, they are.” He laid his forearms on his desk, his brow plates lowering. “Thank you for messaging me to keep me updated on how Garrus is faring, although, I’m surprised that you’d make the effort considering what you must have heard about me.”

Shepard shook her head and met his gaze with an open one. “What I’ve heard about you, sir, speaks to a father who loves and wants the best for his son, even though you don’t always see things eye to eye.” She let out a long sigh. Yep, she wanted a dad. “It’s also what brings me here. Garrus trusts and respects you with a confidence that I’m hoping I can count on.”

The elder Vakarian frowned and leaned back, his forearm braced against the arm of his chair. “Very well, Captain. Why don’t you start at the beginning?”

Shepard held out the datapad, but froze before it got close enough for him to take it. The moment of truth. The first step. A little further and she’d be set on her path. Fear and regret formed a small thunderhead in her chest, but she packed it down. The council, Saren . . . the universe had left only one door open. She cracked her neck and leaned forward the rest of the way, passing the datapad over.

“As you know,” she said, her voice burrowing its way out, gaining strength as she spoke, “we’ve been investigating Saren. What we’ve discovered has been . . . terrifying to say the least. The information on that datapad is everything we’ve discovered. All our evidence, interviews with key witnesses to Saren’s activities, all my logs and mission reports. I’m hoping that after you review them, you’ll be able to help me.”

He nodded and activated the datapad, but held her stare instead of looking at it. “Why, Captain?”

Shepard frowned and shifted in her chair, that stare pinning her like a bug on a board. “Sir?”

“Why are you coming to me with this?” His head tilted to the other side, but the stare didn’t ease up at all, demanding honesty.

A long sigh deflated her a little, the truth coming hard as she forced herself to hear it out loud. “Because I’m about to show my hand, sir, which means that I’ll probably be dead by this time next ...which means I’ll probably be dead by this time next week. . .

Fifty thousand kilos of bricks and rock made out of hopes and plans that would never come to pass crashed down on her, crushing all air and feeling and emotion from her in a soft ‘oof’ of sound. Death loomed over every soldier. At the beginning of her career, she regarded it as a teasing lover that cajoled and dared her to dance as close as she could. As she grew more seasoned . . . She chuffed silently. Oh, who was she kidding? After Elysium . . . death settled into a silent companion. She no longer courted it, but felt it there like an old friend willing to welcome her home.

Shepard watched Garrus’s father read, her eyes wandering over the similarities and differences. Salty tears burned as she saw the torin that Garrus would become one day. The gentle gravity, the passion for what was right undimmed, the honour honed more keenly for having seen the lack of it . . . that all-seeing stare deeper, more intense, and yet more forgiving for the experience of years lived . . . pain suffered and healed. God, she wanted to know that torin, to look into his eyes and see her reflection there.

Blinking quickly, she averted her gaze, staring out the window as she breathed through the pain of the fist clenched around her heart. All those years she’d teased death, tweaking its nose at every turn, but it kept its back turned, not ready for her. Now it opened its arms wide, ready to catch her, and panic screamed in the back of her mind, the urge to run twitching along her nerves like a tick.

And all because you think you might actually have fallen. That’s a huge step for you, Janey, but you know that life was never anything meant for you. All possibility of the adoring husband, kids . . . cat and dog sleeping by the fire . . . it all vanished in the forest on Mindoir. Your life has been building to this and nothing but this. It’s not a tragedy, not if you can save the rest of them . . . give them all shots at that future.

“You can’t go to the council,” Garrus’s father said, breaking through the voice in her head, interrupting the sorrow and panic enough for her to actually settle into her chair.

She opened her mouth to protest . . . to insist that he believe, but he shook his head, silencing her. She bristled for a fight, but then saw that all suspicion had disappeared from his stare, replaced by concern.

He held up a hand, palm facing her, asking for her forbearance. “I’m sure you don’t intend to accuse the council of anything, but they’ll know, Shepard. You tell them about Saren, you demand they do something about him, they’ll know that you’re aware how deeply they’re involved.” His brow plates arched, and he leaned forward, forearms braced against the edge of his desk. “And you’re right, you’ll be dead within the week.”

Shepard nodded, seeing all of her own regrets reflected back at her from his eyes and expression. They appeared poignant rather than tragic in reflection, and she took a deep, steadying breath. “It can’t be helped, sir. Without the council declaring Saren a rogue agent, I’ll never be able to take out his base on Virmire. At least, not without turning my crew, the quarians, the geth . . . and possibly even the Alliance into terrorists. I don’t have a choice here. If I don’t run him to ground, eventually he’ll find one of the keys and open the floodgates of armageddon.”
The elder Vakarian nodded, straightening a little as if infected by her resolve. “You’ve been making some strange allies.” He set the datapad down. “Krogan, geth, and rachni.”

Shepard melted down into the chair as he accepted what she’d shown him. It felt liberating, the millstone hanging around her neck lightening as she shared the burden, at least a little. No one could scrub her half of the horror of what had been done to the Prothean Empire from her head, no one could alter her fate but someone she could trust, someone with the power to make sure the fight continued . . . it helped.

“I’ve been amassing funds as well, as you saw. If something does happen to me, it will all be transferred over to Garrus’s control. He’s going to need help. Nihlus will be some help, of course, but if he’s not dead as well, he just doesn’t have any sort of pull. I’m trying to set things up so that what victories we pull together, the credit goes to people with credibility.”

Shepard laughed, but it came out exhausted and resigned. “I’ve got this planned to survive me, but . . . .”

“My son loves you.” The hushed words hung in the air, a vaguely worded plea for her survival.

“He fusses over me.” She chuckled. “He’s a good torin. Annoyingly over-protective, but a very good torin. Luckiest day of my life, that day I walked into Dr. Michel’s clinic.” A tight-lipped smile accompanied her shrug. “He’s going to need you.”

Letting out a sigh that sounded remarkably like a growl, he nodded. “I will be there for him . . ..” His mandibles fluttered. “. . . and for you as you need me.”

A wide, genuine smile spread across her lips. Like son; like father. She took a deep breath and checked her chrono. “Thank you, sir. In fact, I could use an escort to the council chambers. I made a promise that I wouldn’t go anywhere alone.” Gratitude filled her, sunshine pouring through a break in heavy clouds, making the rain sparkle like falling diamonds. To be believed by someone outside her crew, someone of influence and part of the system . . . it amounted to a mind-boggling gift. A gift that made sure her people would have what they needed to beat the Reapers.

She’d taken the first step, and knowing that no matter what, her people would be okay made it a little bit easier to take the second.

He stood and held out his hand toward the door. “I’ll take you wherever you need to go.”

Chapter End Notes

AO3 is now caught up with my writing, so will be updating 3 times a week max now. I have to get Act One done before August 3rd so that the beginning of Act Two coming out as part of the MEBB14 doesn't spoiler the end. :(
Chapter Summary

Mass Effect - Future Imperfect Chapter Fifty Three

Shepard tried to convince Garrus’s father to let her get on the elevator at the council tower alone, but in true Vakarian fashion, he refused. Even though she appreciated having someone watching her back, the thought of tangling him up in her mess registered even higher on the abhorrent scale than bringing Nihlus or Garrus into it. So, she jammed herself up against the doors, her back to him, and put on a show of looking more than a little paranoid to be stuck in an elevator with a turian.

“I should stay with you, at least until the stairs. I’m frequently in the chamber. No one will think twice about it,” he whispered.

“No.” She shuffled a little further away from him. “Please, wait somewhere down below. I couldn’t bear to look into Garrus’s eyes and tell him I’d gotten you killed.”

“But . . .” He started to step forward, and she spun to face him, backing into the corner.

And the best performance of ‘trapped in a slow-moving elevator with a pervert’ goes to . . .

“Please. Let me protect the few people I can. I knew I was walking this klick on my own, sir. I’m okay.” She put up a hand to fend him off and whispered, “You know, my performance might be a little more convincing if you weren’t standing two meters away.”

He closed on her, not touching her, but pushing good and tight into her space. “And if something happens to you, how do I explain to my son that I just walked away?”

She gave him a tight smile, ducking her head to avoid the camera. “They aren’t going to do anything yet. They’ll let me go to Virmire and put on a show of cleaning up the mess. Thank you for offering, though. I can see where your son gets his overprotective streak.”

She winked and then jumped as the doors opened, backing out as though she’d been slapped. “Excuse me?” she bellowed, loud enough that it even made her wince. “I should report you for even suggesting such a thing, Officer. I don’t know what ‘climbing the big tower’ is, but I assure you, I’m not interested.”

The shock on his face almost cracked her indignant mask, but she just bit her lip and kept backing up.

Herros recouped and shook his head, mandibles flicking as he suppressed a smile. “Very nice. I hope the executor doesn’t get his hands on this vid.” His gaze softened. “I can see why Garrus likes you. He’s always had a weak spot for crazy.” He sobered and backed away from the door. “Good luck, Captain.”

She turned and marched up to the door into the council chamber, but stopped before hitting the control. Pressing the heel of her hand over her heart, she closed her eyes, counting her breaths.
You can do this. Warrior inside and out. For everyone.

Then Tashac Jacar stepped forward, her ghost even more driven to ensure that her empire hadn’t died in vain than she’d been while alive—that all of her children had not died in vain. A fierce, tight twist of Shepard’s gut greeted the agony of Attit’s empty shell lying so heavy and so still in her arms. Pressing her eyes closed even tighter, she could recall the sensation of his first movement within her . . . within Tashac. Her body tingled, warm and delicious shivers radiating through her as her memory skipped back, recalling every caress and ecstasy involved in his creation.

She laughed softly through the dew that misted along her eyelashes. How could she regret not having a family when one lived inside her mind, as real as anything she’d ever experienced? For the memory of those people and for the sake of the ones she loved, she could soar into the sun on her wings of wax. They all mattered so very much more than her fear and regrets.

She opened her eyes, squared her shoulders, and palmed the door control, stepping through into the softly lit beauty of the council chamber. Looking up at the blossoming trees glowing in the lights, she let their serenity seep into her, percolating through every cell until her heart slowed and her nerves calmed. Long, silent strides carried her the length of the chamber, passing rock gardens, fountains, and people of every race. She allowed the conversations around her to register, but didn’t focus on any single one. They amounted to the same things. Who rose, who fell, who to curry favour with, who owed favours. Rumours, gossip, speculation. The usual underpinnings of life and politics.

Udina bristled like an angry cactus at the top of the last set of stairs. “Captain.” He looked behind her, craning his neck. “Where is Spectre Kryik?”

“Not here.” She held up the datapad. “I have all the information the council needs. Shall we? I don’t want to keep them waiting.”

“Wait just a second, Shepard, I need to see your evidence before you present it to anyone.” He held his hand out for the datapad. “If you think I’m just going to let you . . . .”

Shepard turned to walk the last mile down the council’s gangplank, glancing over the side as she wondered if the glass below would hold should Udina throw her off. If the glass didn’t hold, she’d be in for a long drop with a quick stop.

“Captain Shepard,” Tevos said, her voice serene but with a very audible undercurrent of ‘If you’re wasting our time . . . .’ “Ambassador Udina informed us that you have evidence to prove that Saren was behind the attack on Eden Prime?”

Shepard stopped at the edge and looked down. Yep, a long way down. Snapping her head up, she stared at them, letting her knowledge of what they intended to do fill her with molten steel. “Madam Councillor, Ambassador Udina was correct. I have evidence that Saren not only attacked Eden Prime, but that he did so as a first step in gathering the intelligence and resources he needs to bring about the destruction of all advanced sapient life in the galaxy.”

Beside her Udina groaned and bowed his head, his palm impacting his brow with an audible thwack. “Shepard . . . .” The growl that followed her name made her take a step back from the edge and its very fragile-looking glass. “What in the name of . . . .?”

The council members stared at Shepard as if she’d suddenly sprouted another head, but she merely stared back, waiting for them to take the bait.

“Is there a reason that Spectre Kryik isn’t at this meeting, Captain?” Sparatus asked after several seconds passed, his voice as warm and reassuring as a shark’s grin. “I believe our time will be more productive if we stick to the facts and avoid indulging your flair for the dramatic.”

Shepard looked down, a scowl puckering the skin between her eyebrows, using the moment to gather her confidence. Dramatics indeed: the next few moments needed to feature the best performance of her life. After a breath, she looked up, locking stares with each councillor for a moment. “I no longer believe Spectre Kryik to be reliable. I’m not even certain he is still working toward the best interests of this Council or the people it serves.”

She gave them a moment to absorb that, expecting one of them to speak out, but instead, they just stared at her. Sparatus folded his arms, the only outward sign of impatience on their parts. Encouraged, she forged ahead. “When we investigated Feros, he insisted on leading the second team to Exogeni headquarters, where all the information Saren wanted was catalogued. Conveniently, Saren brought the colony down on my team’s heads while ignoring the other building entirely.”

She winced, hating the sound of the words as they came out . . . her lip curling at the despicable nature of what they meant. Betrayal, on every front. How dare he, after she trusted him with so much? “On Omega, he led a direct assault on the base Saren’s henchmen were using, killing all the Blood Pack involved and destroying any chance we had to follow them back to Saren. When we reached Noveria, he suggested that I drop in the Mako against executive board law while he stayed in Port Hanshan running some sort of covert op.” Breaking off with a helpless flip of her hands, she looked up, meeting their stares again.

The worst of Nihlus’s misdeeds waited for last, but how to even say it? After she’d saved his life . . . how could he have . . .? Shepard shook her head and paced a couple of steps one way and then back. “On Tuntau, he and Saren met alone while Saren’s geth kept my team busy. I followed them, but all I heard was something about Saren getting Nihlus to kill me. I opened fire immediately, but Nihlus didn’t fire on Saren until he started getting away, and even then it was so sporadic that I suspected Nihlus of just putting up appearances.”

She shrugged and clenched her jaw, forcing her back straight. “He’s my partner, and I hate suspecting him of anything let alone something as heinous as betraying the council, but one can only turn a blind eye for so long.”

The three keyed information into their consoles and traded looks before Tevos nodded. “Very well, Captain. Present your evidence.”

Shepard sent them the file she’d prepared, then stood at parade rest while they sorted through it. When they listened to the audio file that Tali recorded aboard Sovereign, Tevos looked up.

“I know the other voice on this recording. It’s Matriarch Benezia,” the councillor exclaimed, showing enough surprise that she either didn’t know about Benezia or she needed to give Shepard acting lessons. Maybe Saren didn’t entirely trust the council either.

“She died on Noveria,” Shepard reported. “Killed by rachni just before the antimatter bombardment.”

The councillor’s ageless face creased into a scowl, looking genuinely dismayed by the news. “Did she say anything? Did she tell you why she was working with Saren?”

Shepard answered the question with a sad shake of her head. “I’m sorry, Madam Councillor, she was already dead when we reached the inner laboratory. It looked like she and her people put up one hell of a fight though.”
Still looking grief-stricken, the asari looked back to the information. “So, the OSD you found on Matriarch Benezia confirms that Saren has a base on Virmire where he is breeding krogan and holding hundreds of quarians hostage.” She shook her head and looked up at the salarian councillor.

“This evidence is damning,” Valern said. He looked up at Udina. “Why didn’t you bring us this evidence as it came in, Ambassador? We could have taken action weeks ago, perhaps even prevented the death of one of the galaxy’s wisest and most powerful matriarchs.”

Shepard stepped in front of Udina. “I didn’t send any of it to him, Councillors.” She cast a disgusted sneer over her shoulder at Udina, almost feeling bad for him as his face turned a dark, bruised purple. Almost. “If I was a Spectre, I wouldn’t report to him, so I thought it best to leave it to the council to decide what information they wished to release and to whom.”

“A wise decision, Shepard,” Sparatus said, his tone haughty enough to make Udina sputter. “You’ve done well in your investigation.” He straightened, his face looking pained for the admission. “You might have what it takes to be a Spectre, after all.”

“Yes, an instinct for discretion is not something that can be learned,” Valern agreed. “Fine work, Shepard.”

“Thank you, Councillors, I just did what I hoped was best for the council and the galaxy at large.” As she gave them a slight but humble bow of her head, she could hear Udina on a build-up to detonation behind her. He’d make her pay, but in that moment, she couldn’t care less.

Tevos looked up from her console to stare at her fellow councillors for a moment before turning to Shepard. She nodded, once. “Very well, Captain Shepard, we accept your evidence against Saren. He will be stripped of his Spectre status, and you are cleared to pursue him to his base on Virmire and apprehend him by any means necessary.”

Shepard bowed her head again, honoured by their praise. “Yes, ma’am. Thank you, Councillors. We’ll be heading out in just over twenty hours.”

“Good work, Shepard. You’re dismissed,” Sparatus said. After just a beat, he looked past her to Udina. “Ambassador, please remain. We wish to speak to you further.”

Heart in her throat, half expecting them to call her back and tell her that they saw through every lie and half-truth she’d fed them, Shepard turned on her heel. Meeting Udina’s death glare without flinching, she nodded. “Good day, Ambassador.” If glares came in calibres, Udina’s would have blown a hole through her that cut her in half, but she just strode past him, hurrying to the stairs. She had council business to attend to.

She didn’t breathe until she hit the elevator control and it headed down to the presidium. A long sigh poured out of her, leaving her weak in the knees and slumped against the elevator wall. She’d done it. She’d held onto her guts long enough to get the job done.

* * * * *

“What have you done?” A thunderhead of turian anger roared across the bar. The genteel embassy-worker patrons dashed around tables and leaped out of the way, afraid to be struck by lightning as the tempest stormed past, taking out everything in its path.

Shepard glared at Garrus. “I told you we should have gone to Chora’s Den. He’s scaring the stiffs.”
She turned to lean against the bar, pointedly ignoring Nihlus until he got close enough to stop shouting. “Cranberry juice, please.” She smiled at the bartender, the human glancing back and forth between Nihlus and her as if to ask if she expected the Spectre to be a problem.

Oh yeah. Of a variety that you wouldn’t believe, buddy.

She accepted her juice, thanked the bartender, and turned to look up as Nihlus lurched to a stop, looming over her. A sad sort of sigh, almost regret, whispered from her as she looked into his eyes and shrugged. “I went to the council, presented the evidence, and got us permission to attack Virmire. ‘Cleared to apprehend him using any means necessary,’ Tevos said.” She took slow deep breaths, keeping her body language calm and appeasing.

He wasn’t angry, not really, but even as angry as he thought he was, in a moment or two, Nihlus would figure out why she’d gone alone. She didn’t possess the foggiest clue how he’d react once he did. That her decision would hurt him—would hurt several of her people . . . she couldn’t even look Garrus in the eye yet—formed her only regret. Still, hurt . . . anger . . . whatever else he had to dish out, she’d take, if it meant saving his life.

“Come on, if we’re going to discuss this, it should be elsewhere.” She started toward the door, but Nihlus stepped in her path.

Raking his talons over his fringe, Nihlus towered over her, vibrating like a live high voltage cable. “Spirits, Shepard. Why’d you go alone?” He stormed a few strides one way, then back. “I should have been there. Damn it, you can’t go into situations like that without me.”

“Says the turian Spectre I had to wrestle off the ramp of the Normandy to keep from heading out on his own on Eden Prime.” A gentle smile fluttered over her lips, dying almost as soon as it was born. She shrugged and cracked open the bottle of juice, the sense of betrayal that poked her in the ribs during the meeting evaporating. “You know why I went alone, Nihlus.”

He bristled, mandibles flared with frustration and anger . . . then she saw realization dawn, followed by his eerie, absolute stillness. Long moments passed as the Spectre just stared, not blinking, not even appearing to breathe. Shepard forced herself to hold his gaze, keeping hers kind but firm. She’d stepped out onto her path, the only path she could live with. He needed to come to terms with it.

“No!” he cried, the word half-roar, half keen, the stillness crashing into an avalanche frenetic movement, of not knowing what to do with himself. “No!” She watched the rage disappear into fear and grief behind his eyes. “What did you do, Shepard? Dear spirits. What did you do?”

Shepard cast a sidelong glance at Garrus. He knew she’d gone to the meeting, and she could tell from his expression that he suspected what she’d done, but she hadn’t told him. She met Nihlus’s confused, terrified stare with one she hoped inspired calm. “First of all, lower your voice for pity’s sake. You’re making a scene.” She sighed and ran her hands over the belly of her armour as if she could straighten it. “I told the council that you weren’t there because I can’t trust you.” He flinched as if she’d slapped him, but she pushed on. “I told them I thought there’s a good chance you’re working against me, sympathizing with Saren.”

“Spirits, Shepard . . .” Garrus’s voice drifted out like a dismayed prayer.

Staying focused on Nihlus, Shepard took a deep breath. When she spoke, she kept her voice soft enough to remain between the three of them. “I told them the truth, Nihlus. A lot of things trying to kill me while Saren actively avoids wherever you are . . . it doesn’t look good.” She shrugged, feigning nonchalance.
“No.” He spun away from her, his talons raking his fringe again. “No, no, no. Shepard . . ..” He keened, high and sharp. “How stupid . . .?”

Shepard flinched as nearly half the patrons turned to look at them. How many omnitools were recording them? The fool was going to completely negate everything she’d done. She jumped forward, slamming him in the shoulder with the hardest flat-hand strike she could manage. She grabbed his arm and spun him around, 200-proof fury pouring into her blood. Her voice lowered to a barely audible hiss of a whisper. “Don’t you dare go there. Don’t you fucking dare.” Let everyone see them fight. That much would help, at least.

She focused her stare as hard and sharp as a diamond blade. “I had one fucking shot of getting their blessing to attack Virmire without my entire crew getting put on a hit list. I don’t know who you work for any more, so yeah . . . I saw an opportunity to distance my crew, and I bloody well took it.” She shook her head, all the fear incinerating in the face of certainty. “You bet your skinny ass I took it, and I’ll live with the consequences. So calm the fuck down and have a drink, or go freak out somewhere you aren’t being recorded by half the station.”

He pressed in on her, his voice lowered to match hers, rumbling with enough fury to raise the hair on the back of her neck and make her belly tremble. “I won’t let you do this alone. I won’t let you sacrifice yourself for me. I’ll go to them . . ..”

She swayed a little, the room dipping in time to the rolling in her stomach. The air suddenly felt super-heated, like plasma against her skin. Why had she ever thought he’d react reasonably. He’d destroy it and get all her people killed . . . get Garrus killed.

Garrus erupted between them, grabbing Nihlus by the cowl of his armour, tearing the lighter torin right off his feet. “If you do, I’ll end you, Kryik. Now shut up.” He threw Nihlus back a couple of feet as he dropped him. “There are more than sixty people on that ship, and you’re risking them all right now.” He turned and wrapped an arm around Shepard’s shoulders to escort her to the door.

Shepard pushed him away and turned back to face Nihlus. “You’re a risk to all my people, Spectre. That’s the end of it.” She looked over at Garrus. “Let’s go somewhere quiet.” When he nodded, she turned toward the door, wondering how long it would be before the council heard about the fight. Hopefully she’d managed to turn the conversation enough that it would prove just another schism that helped make them believe he could be brought around to their way of thinking.

Shepard groaned as the door opened while they were still three metres away, her heart falling into her boots when Udina staggered through, obviously already three sheets to the wind. “So close. We almost made it out.” She let out a long groan. “By the pricking of my thumbs, something wicked this way comes.”

Udina must have heard her, because he spun to face her. “Shepard. Decided to throw away the facade and admit that you’re a witch?”

Laughing, Shepard shook her head and let out a noisy breath. “Ambassador, the fact you still have one head, intact limbs, and at least most of your hair speaks to my lack of skill in the arcane arts. When I get your voodoo doll to work, you’ll know.”

Udina wavered a little as he leaned down over Shepard, breathing what smelled like jet fuel in her face. God, sometimes she hated being short. His left index finger jabbed her in the chest. “Do you know how close you are to destroying everything I’ve worked for here? You turned me into a mockery in that chamber today.”

“I did no such thing, Ambassador.” Shepard leaned into him. “I told the truth. As a Spectre candidate, my loyalty is to the council, not you.” She pushed past him, heading for the door. Glancing at Garrus, she sighed. “What is this? Pick a fight with Shepard in the fancy bar night?”

Udina grabbed her arm and spun her around. “Don’t you turn your back on me, Shepard. I can end your career and turn you into a laughingstock with a single call. I won’t let you destroy humanity’s chance to join the council.”

Shepard laughed, a harsh bark of sound. “Oh, please. Don’t forget, I’ve known you a long time, Udina. I know that you’d sell your mother to the batarians to climb the ladder a rung, but do you know how close you are to sending us all to hell? The Reapers are real, and they’re on their way.”

She dropped her voice to a low, dangerous whisper. “I don’t give a rat’s ass if you want to bend over for the devil, Udina, but I’ll be damned if I’ll let you force the rest of humanity to take it up the ass along with you.”

“Couth, Shepard,” Udina said, his entire face warping into a snarl. “But what else can we expect from a batarian carnal whore?”

Shepard stopped. Just stopped. For thirty seconds, even her heart froze solid. Thought, breath, and function stalled, short circuited by horror. For those thirty seconds a gloating leer transformed Udina’s homely visage into something truly horrific. But as the clock ticked over to thirty-one seconds, Shepard sliced through the air—all edges, points and barbs set to shred him.

Udina staggered back, his eyes wide.

“You honestly want to do this again, Udina? After how badly I pounded you the last time?” She snarled and lunged at him.

Strong arms grabbed her from behind before she could connect, pinning her shoulders back so that she could only swipe at the foot of air in front of her. Struggling, she shot a glare over her shoulder at her captor. “Let me go, Garrus. He just . . . he can’t just . . .”

“If you hit him, you’re giving him exactly what he wants and needs to shut you down, Kahri. He only hit that low because he’s desperate,” Garrus whispered in her ear. “Let it go. You already know what he is, and he’s not worth it.”

Shepard stopped fighting the turian, registering the truth and sense in his words even through her anger. “Fine.”

Udina laughed. “Thank you for containing this animal, Officer Vakarian.” He leaned in again. “Just remember your place, and try not to embarrass humanity any further.” For a moment, he turned away, looking as though he had every intention to leave. But then he spun back around, wavering a little in his inebriation as he swung at her, arm extended.

The ambassador’s fist slammed into Shepard’s face, her jaw letting off a crack loud enough to deafen her for a second. Her teeth screeched together and clamped shut on the side of her tongue. White lights sparkled all around her, brilliant fireflies of pure lightning riding a wave of brain static that rang in her ears and short-circuited her balance, dropping the floor out from under her.

Luckily Garrus still held her pinned against him, his grip keeping her from sprawling on the tile.

“Shepard?” Garrus braced her as she staggered, then helped her back square on her feet. “You okay?” When she nodded, he released her, dusting down the armour on her shoulders before giving her a gentle pat. “He’s all yours.”

Shepard lifted a hand to her jaw, stretching her mouth open to click it back in place, a barbed wire smile coiling across her face. “Thank you, Brother C-Sec, the light of the Enkindlers is strong in you.” She wriggled her eyebrows at Udina as she stepped into her first punch.

The ambassador’s hand slapped over his bleeding nose and stumbled backwards into the crowd. People shoved him as he slammed into them, and, arms flailing, he spun, gropping an asari as he caught himself. He jumped back, apologizing, but in the space of a heartbeat, bodies, fists, feet, and drinks began to fly.

Shepard remained focused, laser-keen on the ambassador, leaping on him like a rabid varren, but after she landed two, solid blows to his gut, strong hands pulled her off and hustled her toward the door. Dodging blows, they pushed and shoved their way clear of the worst of it.

Nihlus met them halfway across the room, blood trickling in a cobalt line from a crack in his left brow plate. “So much for the civilized crowd,” he said, falling in as Garrus plowed a path to the door and out.

The running drumbeat of footsteps echoed up the stairs from the reception area. C-Sec, no doubt. After a moment of looking for a place to hide, they ducked into Executor Pallin’s office. The door closed just as a good dozen C-Sec officers emerged through the lower door, armed with shock sticks. Shepard let out a sigh of relief mixed with a giddy laugh.

“No such thing as a civilized crowd,” the executor said from behind them, his voice gruff but carrying a heavy sub-layer of amusement. “Is there something I can help you with, or will you be leaving now that you’ve avoided arrest?”

Shepard spun to face him, the soul of innocence. “Hello, sir. Good to see you again.”

“I want Shepard arrested!” Udina’s voice screamed from the hallway. Calm mumbling answered him, but she couldn’t make out what the voice said through the door. “I don’t care!” the ambassador continued. “If you didn’t pass her, she’s still here, somewhere.”

“I can’t say the same,” Pallin replied. After holding her gaze for a moment, he sighed and nodded toward the balcony behind him. “It’s a short drop.”

Shepard grinned and snapped a quick salute even as she sprang forward. “Thank you, sir. Have a good evening.” Without even pausing to check how far down was not too far, she ran to the balcony, grabbed the railing and jumped over, adjusting as she jumped. Hopping down into three more gardens, she made it to street level and looked up. Only Garrus followed.

“Nihlus?” she asked when he jumped down, landing nimbly next to her. A grin so bright that it made her blush spread across her face as she looked up. He’d followed her down, even though it meant leaping off his boss’s balcony.

“Distraction duty. Well, and he’s going to head to the med clinic to get his plate fixed.” Straight and composed, he turned to look her up and down before shaking his head. “Excellent date, Shepard. You sure know how to show a torin a good time.” Despite his grumpy tone, his mandibles spread a little and flicked, giving away his amusement. Gentle fingers gripped her jaw, turning her head a little to inspect the damage. “That hurt?”

She nodded. “Yeah, say what you will about Udina, he knows how to land a sucker-punch.” She reached up and wiggled her jaw back and forth. “At least he didn’t break it.” She grabbed his hand and headed down the walkway, hurrying ahead of him. “Come on, let’s relax for a bit, then we can go home, and you can read me a story.” Skipping sideways a little, she turned to grin at him. “I swear though . . . tonight, you’re going to do the voices.”
His chuckle warmed her straight through to her toes. “Never, Shepard. You will never win that battle.”

When they reached the intersection where the alley to the ward access emerged onto the presidium, Shepard stopped at the top of the short incline down and looked out over the crowds. “Sweet baby Jesus, look at all these people.” She blew out a short puff of air. “You had one shot to save your people, Shepard. Now you’ve got one to try to save yourself. Time for a little crazy. Glory hallelujah.”

“No . . . Shepard . . .”
Chapter Summary

Madness ... and a date. So even more madness? :D

Dropping Garrus’s hand, she took off, racing down the slope into the crowd, an exasperated sigh and three choice curses chasing her. “Lemmings of the galaxy,” she called out, spreading her arms wide as she stopped in the center of the square, “you are all doomed for you do not know the blessed word of the Enkindlers.”

The crowd evaporated around her, all trying to get as far away from the lunatic with the guns as possible. Chasing a salarian a few metres one way, and a turian back the other, she embraced a wild, childish lack of control. Sometimes a deep, gleefully furious part of her just needed to slip off the leash, and to hell with the consequences. Throwing her head back and stretching her arms out to the side, she twirled around and around until she bounced off a skycar and nearly fell on her ass. Dizzy to the point of clapping a hand over her mouth to hold back her breakfast, she leaned over, bracing herself against the vehicle.

Once the dizziness and its accompanying danger of spewing vomit passed, she leaped up and ran toward the crowd. “But you can all be saved!” she hollered. “Yes, you can. All you have to do is pull your . . . .” She pointed and winked at an asari hiding behind her turian partner. “. . . very pretty blue head out of your ass and realize how fragile all of this is.” She looked at the car, and recognizing the C-Sec paint job, raced over to clamber up onto the roof.

Seeing Garrus doing his best to disappear into the environment, she grinned and pointed both index fingers at him. “You, sir, are far too handsome to be able to vanish into that plant. Instead, embrace the light of the Enkindlers and rejoice.”

Turning back to the crowd, she reached out as if trying to hug them all. “Good people, I beg you, listen. The Enkindlers have blessed me with a vision! This place heralded the beginning of their destruction, their arrogance blinding them to their vulnerability.” She spotted four hanar moving in on her from the bridge and spun to face them. “Brother hanar, you know this! You know the light of the Enkindlers. Spread their word so that these poor souls, blind and fumbling in the dark, can know the truth.”

One floated closer than the others. “This one does not believe the Enkindlers would wish their truth to be used to cause alarm for the honourable people passing by. Respectfully, this one does not believe you are representing the Enkindlers’ message with a high degree of accuracy.”
Shepard flung her arms out, embracing the entire Citadel. “They’d want the people to know they are all living on a giant trap, and one day, it’s going to spring closed to kill them all. Glory hallelujah and praise the Enkindlers’ great, glowing backsides.”

“A second one came forward. “This one believes that although your enthusiasm for the word of the Enkindlers is laudable, it may be advisable for you to proceed down off the car and regain control of your faculties.” It reached up with a tentacle as if offering a hand to help her down. “This one respectfully requests that you cease distorting the word and light of the Enkindlers in this manner. They gave the hanar language and gave the galaxy the mass relays. Their legacy is one of generosity not fear.”

“You poor, deluded . . . I can’t come down until everyone understands!” Shepard turned back to the crowd, but tentacles wrapped around both of her wrists. “Hey! Let me go, you manhandling . . . er . . . womanhandling jellies!” Looking up, she locked stares with Garrus and yelled. “C-Sec! Where is a C-Sec officer when you need one? I need a cop, here! Bad touching! Bad touching!”

A C-Sec officer raced across the square toward them. “Hey! Lady, what are you doing standing on my car?” The blond human looked up at her, then at the hanar, then back to Shepard. “What in the name of god is going on here?”

One of the hanar trying to ease Shepard down off the car let out a strange harmonic sigh. “These ones are merely attempting to prevent this human from alarming the good people in the crowd with her falsehoods regarding the Enkindlers.”

“Let her go.” The officer raked his fingers through his crew cut, grumbled and then jabbed a finger at the ground. “And you, down off my car.”

Shepard shot narrow-eyed glares of death at the hanar until they released her and backed away. Once they moved off, she hopped down. “Thank you, Officer . . .?”

“Don’t thank me yet, lady. You were disturbing the peace, and you scuffed the roof of my car, earning yourself a visit to the station.” He gripped her elbow and pulled her out of the way so he could open the top of the car. “Get in.”

For a moment, Shepard thought that Garrus would let her be arrested. She ducked out from under the hand trying to shove her head into the car, twisting as she tried to pull her arm free of the officer’s grip. “Oh no you don’t. You can’t arrest me. I know my rights. I have an evangelical
He snorted. “Oh, really? Show it to me.”

Struggling, she grumbled, “It’s in my other pants.”

“He, Lamont, let me take it from here.” Garrus strode up from behind the car. He stared into Shepard’s eyes and deadpanned, “I have a history with this lunatic. You could take her in, but trust me, she’s not worth the migraine that’ll be beating its way out of your skull after about twenty minutes.” Garrus leaned down over her, his stare deepening into a glare. “I thought I warned you about what would happen if I ever caught you screaming your craziness out here again?”

Shepard widened her eyes and bit her lip to keep from grinning like a maniac. She supposed she should have expected him to punish her. Sighing, she let her shoulders slump and hung her head. “I’m sorry, Officer Vakarian, please . . . don’t drag me into a back alley and shoot me.” Turning pleading eyes to the blond human, Shepard whispered, “Please, don’t let him take me. He’s crazy. He said he’d shoot me.”

Lamont shook his head and held up his hands. “I’ve already had my fill of crazy. Deal with it, Vakarian, and get her away from my car. I just got it detailed.” He backed away a couple of metres before turning and disappearing into the crowd.

“You know,” Garrus said, his voice heavy with growling subvocals, “suddenly, I do sort of want to shoot you.” He pulled her down the presidium, passing the base of the tower and continuing on to where the crowds thinned out.

Shepard cackled, dragging along behind him a little. “Yeah, but just imagine the look on Udina’s face when he sees that vid. That will cheer you up.”

“What about when the council sees it?” He didn’t let up the vice grip on her arm as he guided her off the main thoroughfare and into a park area.

“They’ll bury it until they need to discredit me, and in the meantime, it’ll reassure them that they can easily discredit me if they need to.” She worked her arm loose, rubbing the bruised spot between armour segments. When she felt him looking at her, she shrugged and bumped him with her shoulder. “It’s more effective to make a hero look like a crazy woman than to kill her. I’m not completely suicidal, Garrus.” She nodded back toward the square. “That was about giving the council an out. The last thing they want is to turn me into a martyr.”

“And what about your credibility with the rest of the galaxy?” he asked, wrapping an arm around her, turning down a narrow path into a sheltered little copse of trees and flower beds. “You establish yourself as a lunatic, no one will ever take anything you say seriously.”

She smiled and shrugged. “No one will ever believe that woman was Captain Jane Shepard, hero of Elysium. Trust me.” She leaned into him, relishing feeling safe for the first time since she’d set her plan in motion. “Even now, they couldn’t tell you the colour of my hair. Half of them are pretty sure I was a hanar. Active amnesia, Garrus. You know. You’ve seen how it works.”

A reluctant grunt of agreement answered that. He led her over to a bench and sat, tugging her down next to him. She pressed in against his side and slipped an arm around his waist, looking up at his face as he stared at the traffic zipping overhead. Working on her own case of active amnesia, she searched past his reaction to her antics to see how he fared dealing with her other adventure that day.

“Sorry about springing my plan on you,” she said, genuine sorrow sneaking in on the heels of the madness. “I just . . ..”

He nodded. “Didn’t want to fight me over it.” Shrugging, he looked down at her. “And you shouldn’t have to . . . either fight me or explain it to me. This is your mission, Shepard.”

Garrus put his arm around her and pulled her tight against his side. “I understand what you did, Kahri. You did what you had to do to save the rest of us.” He turned to nuzzle her temple, his breath warm and gentle against her hair. “But now, I get to do what I have to do. I don’t plan on this relationship being a short-term deal.”

Shepard pulled away far enough to turn and look up into his eyes, gratitude and frustration intertwining. “I won’t let you turn your entire life . . . our entire lives into trying to keep me safe, Garrus. That’s no sort of existence for either of us. I can’t spend my life in a cage of fear . . . at least no more than I do now. And you can’t spend yours chained to me, terrified that something might happen if you leave the room.”

She kissed him, softly but allowing the depth of her affection to bleed through. He turned, leaning into the kiss, deepening it with a passion that surprised her. Lifting her onto his lap, he wrapped one arm around her, the other cradling the back of her head, his breathing deep and rapid.
“I just found you,” he whispered, his mouth brushing her lips, the rough texture of his hide teasing every nerve ending to life. “And I’ve gotten used to having a tiny, soft heating unit in bed next to me.”

She wrapped her arms around his neck, fitting herself into all the angles of his armour, and tucked her face into his neck. “I know. I know you care about me and just want to protect me, but I meant it this morning, Garrus. I’m a grown woman, a N7 operative, and a Spectre candidate. I need you to trust and respect me enough to let me look after myself. I’m actually pretty good at it . . . if a little unconventional.” She kissed the groove of his neck, smiling at the steady, quick thump of his pulse. “I care about you, Garrus . . . so much, but one day, the over-protective thing will shatter us.”

A knuckle under her chin lifted her mouth back to his, the kiss deepening until every particle of Shepard’s being burned with it. She arched into him, hands wandering over him far too familiarly for a public place, but then he broke away, touching his brow to hers.

“All right,” he said, panting softly between the words in a way that just stirred the fire smoldering its way through her. “I do trust you, and I respect you more than anyone I’ve ever known.”

“Thank you.” She nuzzled his cheek. “We’ll bring Saren down and disappear to Omega, plan for the Reapers far away from the council’s reach. It’ll all work out, Garrus. Somehow, it will all work out.” She sighed and leaned into him. “So, should we go get some normal people food? Ooo, we could go watch a couple of matches at the Armax arena . . . get some hot dog substitutes and watch other people get shot for a change.”

He shook his head and then lifted her off his lap. “No way, Shepard. I’m not spending our one evening off the ship sitting in a crowd, watching people shoot holograms, and eating vat protein.” He stood and let out a long sigh, turning a slow circle as if orienting himself. After about a minute, he stopped and nodded. “Okay, I’ve got a plan.” A wide grin spread across his face, making her heart ache with the lightness of it. “Call Kaidan and Pressly, let them know you’ll be back aboard an hour before we’re cleared for departure. Barring any emergencies, of course.”

His grin infected her. “We’re staying out all night?”

He just shrugged, that cocky, smartass bob of his head that she loved seeing, and activated his omnitool.

“What are we doing?” She tried to see what he was looking at, but he turned his back and started walking back toward the square.
“We need to catch a cab,” he said and held out his hand.

They caught one out to one of the wards. “Zakera Ward,” Garrus informed her as he brought the cab into park at the base of a tall building. “It has the most diverse population of the wards. Lots of humans mixed in with everyone else.” He opened the car and swung out, looking around in a decidedly familiar way.

Shepard climbed out and looked around at what appeared to be a residential district. A nice park spread over the block across the street, buildings very much like the one in front of them surrounding it. Kids of all varieties played, while parents of all the same varieties called out for Tom to be careful and Sisak to stop picking on his sister.

She turned to look into Garrus’s eyes. “Where are we?”

“At what used to be home.” He held out his hand. “Come on.”

Suddenly nervous, Shepard edged around the car, her heart beating hard and fast, hands trembling. “Umm . . . just so you know, C-Sec, I’ve never gone home with a guy before.” The chuckle she managed to get out sounded more like a terrified moan and made her cheeks burn. If he noticed it, he didn’t let on, just taking her hand and leading her inside.

They rode a surprisingly speedy elevator up ten floors, disembarking to walk down a long hall.

“This is a really nice building,” she commented, checking out the art on the hallway walls and the granite-tiled floors.

Garrus chuckled and shook his head. “And you thought I’d live in what? Some dingy little hole with stained walls, black mold, and a constant drip in the bathroom from the apartment above? Not to mention the dirty clothes, old food wrappers, and energy drink bottles strewn everywhere.”

“Don’t forget the gun oil stains, random rifle parts, and mods laying around.” She grinned and bumped him with her hip. “Nah, I just didn’t know C-Sec grunts made this sort of cash. I might be in the wrong business.”
He shrugged very matter-of-factly. “Well, first of all, I wasn’t a grunt, and second, I worked all the time. Didn’t have any vices or hobbies to waste cash on except my rifle and shooting range fees. Why not have a nice place?”

She squeezed his hand, knowing all about being so married to the job that she didn’t have time for anything else. Before the Normandy, she’d donated almost all of her wages to Martin’s rehab center . . . well, and a handful of stray cat rescue charities that she’d never admit to in a million years.

Garrus stopped outside the door to the end apartment and keyed in his lock code. “It might smell a little musty.”

She let out an exasperated grumble, his apparent nerves helping settle hers. “It’s a real apartment after living on a small frigate for two months, I would’ve probably been able to overlook the dirty clothes and food wrappers as long as there were no bugs.” She shuddered. “Just open the door.”

He looked back at her. “I’ve never brought a woman here before. It’ll be a first for us both.” He opened the door to a very dark space. “Come in. Let me get get some light in here. I had the windows blacked because I worked odd hours.” He chuffed. “You know, compared to the banker’s hours I work now.” A few seconds later, light spilled in through a long wall of windows to reveal a very handsome living room appointed with turian-style furniture. Two low sofas made out of a tough but soft woven fabric faced a massive vid screen set in the center of a wall of shelves. A large, low, beautifully carved table sat between the couches, displaying an impressive array of electronic gadgets.

She entered and looked around. “It’s gorgeous. A little barren, very bachelor-y, but not a dirty pair of undies or pizza box to be found.”

He walked through an arch into the kitchen and headed for the fridge. “About the only thing I can offer you for the moment is an icepack for your face.” He went into the freezer and pulled one out, then opened a drawer to grab a towel to wrap around it. “Here.” Returning to the living room, he guided her to the couch and pressed the ice to her jaw.

Shepard leaned into the cold, relishing the momentary increase in the pain. It would numb. She looked around, her eyes following him, taking in the comfortable way he moved around the space, putting everything in order. “So what’s the plan, big guy? Watch elcor reality vids or hanar soap operas?”

“Damn! You discovered my deep, dark secret . . . the hanar soap operas. I’m months behind; we’ll have to marathon them.” He opened a door next to the kitchen and disappeared through, calling back, “First, I thought you might want to indulge yourself a bit, considering the fact that the average vorcha can spit with more pressure than the Normandy’s showers.”

She jumped up. “Don’t even... You have a real shower?” She followed him into a bedroom as handsomely appointed as the rest. A large bed covered in a navy duvet sat in the center. “Next you’ll tell me that your bed isn’t made out of sandstone.”

“The bed is very comfortable, but I didn’t think you’d be interested in heading straight there.” He peered around the door frame, looking altogether too pleased with himself.

“Very smooth, wise-assless.” Defying the sudden trembling in her gut, Shepard clamped the ice pack to her face and sat on the edge of the mattress, bouncing a little. “Oh, this is comfy. Very not rock-like.” Avoiding his stare, she looked around, hoping he would move on. He didn’t.

“Come here.” When she just glanced at him before starting an in depth study of the swirl pattern on the carpet, he grumbled. “You don’t have to make everything difficult, Kahri. Just come here.”

A sad frown creased her brow and the corners of her eyes. She pushed herself up and crossed the room to stand in the bathroom doorway, her arm pressed against his. Why did she have to make everything difficult? She’d never cared about anyone the way she cared about him. She trusted him... enough to let him see the real, crazy parts of her that she kept hidden behind false crazy when it came to everyone else. Why couldn’t she just let go of the giant ball of fear that slammed up into her throat at the thought of intimacy?

Garrus took her hands and turned her, pulling her up against him, a faint sigh accompanying the movement. “You never have to wonder or doubt if I want you, Kahri.” He leaned down to nuzzle her ear. “I do, very much. But, I’m not going to pressure you. I won’t ever make a joke that’s intended to be some sort of passive-aggressive hint.” Wrapping his arms around her, he whispered, “Ever. So, relax and take a bath, we’ll order pizza, watch vids or play a video game, and just have a disturbingly normal night.” He pressed his mouth to hers, the kiss chaste and soft.

At least until Shepard wrapped her arms around his neck and pulled him down into her, returning his kiss with a passion born of gratitude and respect and a giddy sort of astonishment. It almost renewed her faith, having stumbled upon someone so completely remarkable... someone so completely what she needed. For a moment, she gave into the smoldering ache his tongue—nimble and teasing—and his breath—warm and panting with want—set loose in her belly. Her hand slipped down his arm, reaching behind her to grip his talons, guiding them back around front and up to the seals on her chest guard.
Giving her a soft kiss, Garrus eased back, leaving one arm wrapped around her. He smiled down into her eyes for a moment, then jutted his chin toward a fairly large bathtub with water-jets along the sides and bottom. “How does that look to you?”

A shiver of regret whispered through her, but then she nodded, a significant amount of ironic annoyance heating her neck and cheeks. For all she barked at him about trying to protect her, he really did know what was best for her far too much of the time. She looked into his eyes, reaching up to caress his cheek and mandible when she saw that it had cost him to pull away, but also how much more it would’ve cost him to accept her invitation just to have the door slammed in his face.

She glanced over her shoulder at the tub, then passed him the ice pack and pushed him out the door. “That tub looks like you’d better have a robe or shirt or something I can wear when I get out.”

He nodded and backed away. “I’ll leave something on the bed. Take your time. The towels and everything else you could possibly need, other than the soap for your hair are in that cupboard.” After pointing to a large set of double doors next to the shower stall, he turned and headed back into the living room.

Shepard filled the tub with water hot enough to cook seafood, then turned on the jets and eased her way in. Laying back, a moan of sheer, decadent pleasure bubbled from her lips, and she closed her eyes, letting the water beat out the built up stress of the past two months. At some point, she thought she heard his door chime, and sat up, poised to leap out of the tub and grab her guns. A few breathless minutes ticked past before the lack of gunfire eased her back into the water and dozing, blissfully mindless relaxation.

A knuckle rap on the door pulled her out of a gentle sleep to discover the water had begun to edge toward uncomfortably cool. “I set something on the bed for you, and I’m ordering the pizza,” Garrus called. “Unless you’ve drowned in which case I’ll call the rescue service.”

Shepard chuckled and climbed out, wrapping herself in a huge, fluffy towel. “Not drowned.” She opened the door. “See? Completely alive if a little pruny.” She held up her fingers. “Do turians get pruny?”

He laughed and shook his head, taking her hand and lifting her fingers to his mouth to nuzzle them. “Turians aren’t soakers.” His brow plates lowered a little, and he lifted a hand to her shoulder, the pads of his talons playing over the joint and along her collarbone. After a second, he cleared his throat and stepped back, nodding toward a box sitting at the end of the bed. “I hope you like it and it fits. I had to describe your size to the woman at the store.”
Shepard pulled her hand back and stepped around him. “Did you get me pretties?” She grinned and lifted the lid of the box. Inside, she found a dark emerald nightgown and robe made out of a material that looked like silk but felt insanely soft. Pulling it out, she held it up against her. “It looks like it’ll be perfect.” She returned to take his hand, tugging him down to kiss his cheek. “It’s beautiful, Garrus. Thank you.”

“It’s tussat silk.” He shrugged, looking sheepish. “A little bit of Palaven.”

She hurried past him into the bathroom. “I’ll be out in a minute.” She closed the door then towelled herself off and dressed in the amazing material. Compared to her t-shirt and shorts, it felt like a lover's caress over every inch of her skin. The nightgown was a simple sleeveless, a-cut that hung in gentle folds around her knees. Tiny floral buds and spikey leaves had been embroidered around the neck, arms, and hem in a shiny thread the exact colour of the material. Simple, but classy. She smiled and twirled a couple of times to watch the skirt sway. Sweet baby Jesus, but she loved the way he saw her.

She slipped the robe on over top and belted it, running appreciative hands over the wide lapels covered in the same embroidery. Just beautiful.

The door chimed just as Shepard finished piling her armour next to one of the dressers in the bedroom. She laid Ingrid and Roger out on the floor, but took her sidearm and headed out.

“I thought you ran off to join Captain Shepard and a Spectre on some grand crusade, Vakarian,” a jovial, male voice called from the other side. Thick paper rustled. “Couldn't cut it, Rookie? Missed the old grind, the piles of paperwork, and red tape so badly that you had to come back?”

Garrus laughed. “You know me so well, Ridgefield.” He shook his head and leaned against the door frame, his body language relaxed and at ease enough that Shepard stuck her pistol in one of the robe's deep pockets. “No, we're on twenty-four hours leave before heading out in the morning. I thought it might be nice to sleep in a real bed.”

Shepard walked up behind Garrus, using him to cover her state of undress, but peeked out to see past him. The fellow at the door was another C-Sec officer. Tall, thin, and balding, he seemed approachable and friendly, an impression that solidified when he saw her and his face creased into an easy grin.

She lifted her hand in a small wave. “Hello.”
His smile widened. “Well, hi.” He looked up at Garrus and backed away from the door, holding up a hand to stall the introductions. “I can see that you’re busy, so I’ll just get going. You can owe me for the soda, eggs, and toilet paper.” A raucous laugh told Shepard that Garrus’s messages would be filled with a great deal of teasing and speculation the following morning.

Stepping up to the door, Shepard watched the C-Sec officer hurry down the hall.

“Thanks for picking this stuff up for me,” Garrus called after him.

“No problem.” The officer hit the elevator control and turned back. “I can see why you wouldn't want to waste time shopping.” Still chuckling, he backed into the open doors.

“Ridgefield?” She glanced up at Garrus, seeing the affection and amusement in his expression.

“Yeah.” He palmed the door control. “My first partner at C-Sec. Good man.” He passed her one of the bags. “Here, make yourself useful.”

By the time they’d unpacked the drinks, breakfast food, and other sundries, the pizza had arrived.

“I didn't even know they made dextro pizza,” Shepard said, flopping down on the sofa next to him. She flipped open her box, cracked her soda, and wriggled back in against his side, tucking her bare feet up behind her.

“This place makes really great dextro pizza. They make all the human junk food but in dextro versions . . . hamburgers, fries . . . no idea how they compare to levo, but they’re good.” He let out a long, contented breath and leaned back, one arm slipping around her, his hand resting on her hip.

Shepard took a bite of her pizza. “You and Ridgefield are close?” She glanced up at him and burrowed in a little tighter.

“Yeah. Best friends. He was the only one who didn’t tell me I was nuts for signing on with you. He just said it was about time I went out and did something crazy. Said I needed to get out from under my father’s heel.” Chuffing softly, he shook his head. “Funny . . . it felt like that at the time, but now . . . .”
She wriggled out from under his arm and sat crosslegged, facing him. “But now . . . .”

He let out a thoughtful hum and shrugged. “Now, I think Pari saw really hard times coming for me if I stayed on that road. I’m pretty sure I don’t want to know how much harder it gets than murdering someone.” After finishing off the piece, he turned, lifting a knee up onto the sofa so he faced her. “You’ve said all the same things to me Pari did. I just couldn’t hear him through all the resentment I’d built up over everything. His not being there for me or Solana . . . or even Mari. The pressure I thought he was putting on me to follow in his footsteps.” A dry chuckle followed, sounding self-depreciating rather than bitter. “Mari told me years ago that the pressure I felt was all in my head. I don’t know. Maybe I have just been an ass for the last decade.”

Shepard reached out and took his hand. “Have you spoken to your mother or sister since you ran off with me?” She looked down at their linked fingers and talons, her thumb caressing the inside of his wrist where the hard plate that encased his forearm ended.

“No. I should.” He slipped his hand out of hers and activated his omnitool, tapping at it for a second. “It’s still really early in Cipritine. Remind me to call them later?”

She smiled and reached for another piece of pizza. “You know it.” Nodding toward the gigantic vid screen, she gave him a wide, guileless stare. “So what’s that for? You’re not really going to force me to catch up on months worth of your hanar soap-operas?”

His mandibles flicked hard. “Well, I could, just to pay you back for your performance in the square earlier, or . . . I do have a pretty amazing gaming system. We could see how well you handle a sword or bow after we finish eating.”

She swung her legs off the sofa. “Why wait? Fire that bad boy up, and I’ll show you . . . . Wait, before I get cocky . . . what are we playing? I suck at racing games. Spend all the time upside down and on fire.” She blushed even having given him the opening.

He laughed, choking on his bite of pizza for a second. “Should I even try to look shocked by that admission?” Thumping on his chest with one hand, he reached for the remote with the other, lurching ahead as she elbowed him. “Hey now, no violence. The truth is the truth.” He turned everything on, then handed her a headset and a controller.

Shepard shoved the last half of her pizza slice into her mouth. “Okay,” she said, trying to talk around it. “What am I about to kick your ass playing?”
“How about Galaxy of Fantasy? You can impress me with your monster slaying prowess.” He got up and walked over to a shelf of various games and vids.

“Sure.” Shepard settled into her gear, then washed the last bit of her pizza down with soda. “You know, I am pretty wicked with the two handed weapons.” She frowned, reconsidering. “Although my mage skills are insanely awesome. Bring on the raining fires of doooootttttttttt,” she crowed, a grin spreading over her face. Being there with him . . . hell, being anywhere with Garrus just felt so damned easy.

You know, that’s because you’ve fal—

She cut that idea off before it could force its way forward. More than enough strange and unexpected stuff rattled around inside her without adding more. Later. Much, much later, she’d let new complications assert themselves.

They battled their way through mythological monsters for a couple of hours, proving to be a decent team once Shepard stopped randomly attacking him just to watch his character flop around in death throes as his carcass slid down stairs and ramps, or fell off walls and cliffs.

When they started to wind down, Garrus closed the blinds and turned on the lights in the bedroom and bathroom. Finally, as Shepard missed her fourth straight shot at the boss Beluan monster, he shut everything down.

“Come on, Kahri, we can get into bed, and I can read to you until you fall asleep.” He slipped the headset off her brow and took the controller from her hands.

She leaned back in the couch, her head resting on the low, rolled back, and closed her eyes. “Go call your Mari and sister first. I’ll wait here.”
Shepard awoke the next morning aware of two things: the smell of bacon and that she had no idea how she made it from the sofa to the bed the night before.

She remembered lying back on the lovely, squishy cushions. Garrus headed into the bedroom, but didn’t shut the door, so she heard his sister answer the call. His mother joined in a moment later. They began with concerned inquiries about his health, but the moment he assured them he was fine, they moved on to scolding him for being out of touch for so long. Once they got that out of the way, they spoke of small things . . . his mother’s garden, his sister’s continuing success as an instructor at a military academy. In response to his mother’s insistence that he travel home at some point, he promised he would as soon as the mission concluded.

She’d started to doze off, her eyelids heavy enough and her thoughts fuzzy enough that she couldn’t be certain, but she thought he might have told them he had someone he wanted them to meet.

Then light poured in the windows, cutting straight across the bed where she found herself alone. Incredibly comfortable and warm, but alone.

“The “Cooking for Levos” extranet site says that some humans like their bacon crispy, while others don’t,” Garrus called from the kitchen.

She rolled over onto her back and stretched. “Crispy. Definitely crispy.” Pulling the duvet up over her head to block the light, her grin widened. The perfect scent that was his alone permeated everything, burrowing deep down inside her to make her heart and belly flutter. God, she loved that smell.

The mattress lowered beside her, and a talon caught the edge of the duvet to pull it down until her eyes peeked out. Garrus grinned. “Good morning, sleepy.”

“How did you know that I was awake?” she asked, sliding her hand out from under the covers to lace her fingers with his.

“Your deafening snoring stopped rattling the windows and small decorative objects.” He chuckled and tilted his head off to the side. “You were sound asleep when I finished my vidcall last night.” Reaching up, he brushed her hair off her face. “Breakfast is just about ready.”

She sat up and leaned forward to kiss him, just a soft brush of her lips. “What time is it?”

“0600. We have lots of time to eat before heading back to the Normandy.” He traced her lips with his thumb, then pulled back. “However, you’ve only got about seven minutes before breakfast is ready.”

“Roger that, Mr. Chef, sir.” She watched him head back out to the kitchen, then threw back the covers and got up. “Is it okay if I leave this ensemble here?” she called after him then bent to pick up her armour. “Do you have a closet or drawer where I could stash it?” No answer. “Garrus?” She straightened, leaving her gear on the floor.

He appeared in the doorway, staring at her, his mandibles dropped but spread . . . his expression unreadable.

Her heart speeding up, Shepard frowned and walked over to him, pressing her hands to his chest. “What? Did I say something wrong, big guy?” Heart dropping, a sick sort of ache spread through her chest. She shrugged when she still got no answer. “I don’t have to, I just wanted to save it for when it’s just the two of us.” She ducked her head a little, the intensity of his stare embarrassing her. “Keep it special, you know?” Despite trying for casual, she heard the disappointment creep into her voice.

In a blur of sudden movement, he scooped her up in his arms, holding her tight against his chest. He bent to brush his brow softly against hers. “Of course you can keep it here.” For a moment, he looked like he intended to say something further, but then he set her back on her feet. “I’d better not burn breakfast. Five minutes, Shepard.”

She watched him leave, trying to puzzle out what that had been about. Nothing bad, she decided, just . . . strange. Gathering up her armour, she headed into the bathroom. Maybe, for all his calm and apparent confidence, Garrus had some voices inside his head telling him that she’d never be interested in staying with him over the long run.

“Stupid damned voices,” she whispered as she pulled her nightgown over her head. “Why don’t they ever bombard us with positive, supportive stuff?”

She suited up and headed out to the kitchen, arriving just in time for breakfast to hit the table. He’d set them places at ninety degrees to one another, and pulled out her chair.

“This looks great, Garrus. That extranet site must be good.” She pulled her chair up and settled. “Maybe, if there is an accompanying one, “Cooking for Dextros”, I’ll make you breakfast the next time.”

“As long as you promise not to poison me . . .” He sat and placed his hand on her knee. “That way, I could sleep in and be lazy while you work your talons to the bone.” His mandible fluttered, teasing.

“You . . ..” She just shook her head and turned her attention to her breakfast. “This really looks great, though.” Two eggs, four strips of bacon, two slices of toast, and a large, squarish mug of tea sat before her. She dug in, starving, partially because of hunger, partially because of nerves. In a couple of hours, the Normandy was set to rendezvous with the geth and then head on to Virmire.

Apparently, Garrus’s thoughts had been travelling the same paths, because a couple of mouthfuls into his meat and brownish eggish things, he cleared his throat. “So, we’re assuming the council has told Saren we’re on our way?”

She nodded. “No doubt, but if the operation is as big as Benezia said, he’s going to have a hell of a time evacuating it, if he even decides to. The council gave us permission to apprehend him, so he’ll be expecting a specific sort of attack. He might just grab as many of his krogan as he can and run.”

“So basically, we’re going in and hoping for the best?” He looked up at her without lifting his head.

“More like planning as well as we can and kicking as much ass as he lets hang out for us to kick.
At worst, we give him one less place to hole up. There’s no way he is going to be able to dismantle his facilities and labs, move everything out, so we destroy all that.” She put her eggs on her toast and paused to take a couple of bites. “We could find valuable intel, maybe even his genophage cure. I doubt he’ll move the quarians—he’ll want to use them to bring me to heel if things go badly for him—so, we rescue them. If the geth and quarians can pull their part of the mission off, and we can start forging peace there, we end up with a hell of a formidable fleet building resource.”

Shepard shrugged. “We won’t get Saren, but we’ll serve notice to the Reapers that we’re ready and willing to fight back.” She let out a bitter laugh as her worst fear clawed its way up over all her hopes. “Or, Sovereign could be sitting right at the relay and blow us all to hell the moment we exit the mass effect corridor.”

Garrus winced. “Let’s try to avoid that part.” He squeezed her knee, his palm remaining there, warm and comforting. “We’re going to take casualties, Shepard. We’ve been damned lucky so far, but an op like this . . . we’re going to lose people.”

Shepard placed her hand over his and squeezed his talons. “I know, Garrus. I know.”

They finished their breakfast and discussed the plan, tossing ideas back and forth for the best way to keep things as unpredictable as possible considering that the enemy knew they were coming.

When they finished, she helped clean up, freezing everything that could be frozen, and tossing the rest into the recycler so he didn’t come back to things trying to crawl out of his fridge. They returned to the Normandy, hand in hand, something solid and still having settled between them despite, or maybe even because of Garrus’s odd reaction to her wanting to keep her nightgown there.

They shared a quick kiss outside the Normandy’s hatch, then headed in to prepare for the long couple of days ahead.

No sooner had Shepard made it to her quarters to change when knuckles banged on her door. She let out a long breath and braced herself. “Come in, Nihlus.”

The door opened, the Spectre stepping through. Shepard had expected him to be huge, arrogant and demanding, taking up every centimetre of space and every atom of oxygen in the room, but he’d calmed since the afternoon before.

He walked up to her, stared into her eyes for a moment, and then reached out to brush her cheek with a thumb. “Rested up and ready to go?” he asked, throwing her completely. So completely that the thought sprang into her mind that he’d found a way to counteract her plan.

She cocked a suspicious eyebrow at him. “Yeah. Fell asleep playing video games at about 2100.” She backed up a bit so she could meet his eyes without craning her neck. “How about you?”

He nodded toward the end of the bed. “May I sit?”

“Sure.” She watched him, trying to decide what it was she felt going on with him. It felt off, whatever it was. Well, off for Nihlus anyway. Sitting in the chair at her desk, she turned to face him. “Are you okay, Nihlus?”

He didn’t reply right away, instead, he seemed to be studying her face, looking for something. “Yes,” he said at last, his voice still eerily calm. “I spent some time meditating when I got back to the Normandy. It helped me sort a lot of stuff out.” His mandibles spread but then dropped as if he were embarrassed. “Merol was an amazing person. His passion for his work, and for his family . . .
his spiritual peace.” He shook his head. “Do you realize, there wasn’t a single selfish desire inside his heart? When they arose, he either acted on them or meditated and released them into the water. He coveted nothing.”

Shepard smiled. “Yeah, he was remarkable. Tashac never quite managed to quell her anger or selfishness in the same way, but she sure loved him and her children . . . and her empire.”

“The council called me in last night,” he said. “They showed me the vid of your performance on the presidium, asked what I thought they should do.” A sly smile spread his mandibles a little. “I told them to hang onto it so that if you started gaining some actual credibility with this insane Reaper fixation of yours, they could tear it down before it gained any momentum.” The smile faded and he leaned forward, resting his forearms on his thighs.

“I told them the last thing they wanted to do was turn you into a martyr, and everyone who knew you would do just that.” His hands jumped up, palms facing her. “Don’t worry, about the Normandy. They want to use it to turn the Alliance to their side. It’s a hell of a web they’ve got going, but for now, they’re content to see how things play out.

“I’m sorry, Shepard.” He took a deep breath, his shoulders lifting with it. “For not trusting you to know what you were doing, and then jeopardizing it. You were right. They’re testing me out, seeing if they can draw me in. If I play it cool, I’ll be able to keep them off our backs and gather intel.” His eyes looked up, that amazing green locking onto hers. “It’s just . . . I have this lifetime of love and companionship and passion inside me. I know it’s not mine, and I know it’s not for you, but it feels like it is. It’s so real, and it’s all tangled up in what I feel about you.”

His hands smacked against his thighs as he thrust himself up off the bed and paced to the door.
“The thought of you . . .” Pivoting on his talons, he spun back. “The council could still decide to kill you, Shepard.”

“Yeah, they could, but it’s not going to stop me from doing what needs to be done to stop Saren from getting his hands on the Conduit.” Straight, joints stiff, she stood and walked over to him.

“Can he?” Nihlus frowned. “Can he even get to it? He’ll have Tashac and Merol in his head too, but Vigil would never let an indoctrinated pawn onto the elevator.” His eyes searched hers as if she’d have a piece of information he didn’t, some loophole he couldn’t see that would allow Saren to bypass the security.

Shepard shook her head. “I don’t know. I want to say it’s impossible, but it feels like there’s something I’m missing. We need to talk to the queen when we’re done with Virmire, see if there is anything else hidden in our heads that will help.” Pacing a little, she sorted through the information. “I mean, I know the other keys are hidden as well, but I don’t know where or how well. He just needs to get his hands on one.”

“If he knows where any of them are, it’s just a matter of time, Shepard. We have to take him out, and Sovereign. Any ideas how?”

Chuckling, she shrugged. “I feel like a broken recording, but I don’t know. It’s going to take a fleet or two to bring Sovereign down, and that’s going to mean a trap, lure it in.” She looked into his eyes again, the beginning of an idea sparking to life. “Once we see what we find on Virmire, we’ll sit down with the queen and see what we can figure out.”

Reaching out, his talons slipped around her fingers. “How am I supposed to live with all of this in my head, Shepard?” His eyes betrayed the struggle going on within him, and his hand trembled with it. Or was it hers that trembled?
Either way. She understood his difficulties. Tashac slammed at the barricades Shepard erected around her memory, demanding that Shepard give in to the emotions and desires. As long as she’d been alone with Garrus, the prothean had backed off, but with Merol back in her sphere, she seemed to have focused all of Shepard’s blood flow between her legs and kept weaving random memories of Merol making love to her through Shepard’s thoughts. Distracting didn’t quite cut it as a descriptor. Shepard forced the prothean’s memories back behind an iron wall.

Nihlus still stared at her, still waited for an answer that she didn’t have. Shepard shrugged. “I don’t know, Nihlus. I’m sure, judging by how Garrus knows everything going on with my body before I do . . . you know she’s messing with me as badly as Merol is messing with you.”

He chuckled, but it came out strained and breathy. “I’m trying not to breathe right now.”

That shattered any hope Shepard had of maintaining calm. Laughter brayed from her, all her control dissolving into helpless cackling. Pulling her hand from his, she staggered over to the bed, folding down onto the mattress, her arms wrapping around her stomach. “Sweet baby Jesus, Nihlus . . . this whole thing is nuts.” She chuckled for a couple more seconds, then let out a long sigh.

“We have to control it, Nihlus. The fact is, it’s not us. We can’t live other people’s passions. That’s just becoming a puppet. Do you want me touching you because some leftover imprint of a dead woman believes she’s touching her husband? How fucking creepy is that?” She laughed again. “So, we control it.”

“And if the council kills you?” His face showed more pain that she ever thought a turian face could. “I feel panic at that thought, Shepard. I’m a Spectre. I don’t panic. I’ve never panicked, but the thought of suffering through what this damned link will cause if you die . . ..”

“If they take me down, and that’s a big if, because I’ve proven very hard to kill in the past, it will be up to you and Garrus to take up the banner. Someone has to, and that someone has to be you. When it’s time to bring the council down, I’d never have the juice to do it. You, on the other hand, could be a force to rally the Spectres.”

She stood, strode over to him and gave his talons a bracing squeeze. “You’ll get through it by doing the work, Nihlus. Minute by minute, hour by hour, day by day. The same way I’ll deal with being left here if anything happens to you. There’s no other choice.” For a moment, she almost tugged him down to meet her, her lips aching to kiss him, her cheek burning to press against his and feel his mandible flutter against her skin.

_Do you think I won’t mourn if something happens to you, Nihlus? Why do you think I went to the council alone, you idiot?_”

But instead of speaking, she released his hand. To do anything else would prove too cruel to both of them, and to Garrus. Nodding toward the door, she said, “Turn that way so I can get changed. We need to meet with everyone and get things in motion.” When he turned his back, she headed over to her closet.

“Saren has been warned,” Nihlus told her. “The council seemed to think he wasn’t all that worried, so he’s got some sort of trap planned.”

“Of that much, I’m certain.” She grinned. “But I have a few tricks up my sleeve.”

* * * * *
Whatever Shepard thought the inside of a geth ship would be like, what she saw when the shuttle door opened didn’t match to most of it. The utter calm of the place struck her first. During her brief biathlon career, she spent nearly a year stationed at the Alliance nav-sat station in the Tibetan Himalayas so she could train. One of her trainers was a buddhist monk, and although she was never permitted into the inner portions of the monastery, the whole place always felt hushed, but not in a restrictive way. The monks and their students went about their business, people came and went, but the most amazing quiet ruled over everything.

The geth ship sat shrouded in a very similar, monastic sort of peace, as if every being contained within its hull existed in communal harmony. She supposed they did, requiring no movement or words to interact, their gestalt existing within computer processors and memory banks somewhere in the heart of the ship.

The quiet helped set her at ease, but as she followed Legion off the shuttle toward the line of geth units awaiting them, she could see that not all of her team felt the same. Although, Nihlus trailed behind her, never more than an arm-length away, and Garrus followed a little behind him, the rest of the team hung back by the shuttle. She supposed they were waiting to see if she ended up bent, broken, or spindled before deciding whether or not to commit or flee. Not that she could blame them.

At her order, they stepped into the unknown. For her part, Shepard’s nerves and senses all sent constant, pricking-nettle reminders that taking the bold strides meant enduring the discomfort of stepping out into the great vacuum. She couldn’t expect her people to endure it as well. It fell to her to fill the space with air, to give them familiar footing.

She counted her steps in time with her breathing, her boot soles ringing off the metal decking. Cool, controlled, and collected.

Let the peace and energy of your surroundings enter your heart, for only when you allow yourself to be connected to everything around you, will you truly see.

“Thank you, Lama Choden.” She saw but didn’t respond to Nihlus’s curious glance as they stopped a couple of metres away from five gigantic prime units.

One of the primes stepped forward. “Shepard-Captain, prime runtimes housed in server 02242-14521 stand prepared to assist designated creator allies as requested by geth programs housed within hardware designation: Legion.”

Shepard looked up at the massive platform, its armour a flawless, matte white, head flaps moving in slow, timed waves almost like sighs, practically static compared to Legion’s expressiveness. “Legion has explained what we need from the geth on this mission?” She backed up a step, her neck getting sore from staring up over twice her height. “The Reaper . . . Old Machine, Nazara, may well be waiting for our arrival.”

The prime didn’t move, returning Shepard to her impression of everything within the ship being a part of the whole rather than an autonomous unit.

“Geth will broadcast IFF codes used by heretic runtimes in order to approach the planet and deploy designated allies,” it reported. “As a precaution against heretic active scans, Geth have manufactured cargo containers designed to shield allies during approach and deployment.”

“Excellent, thank you.” She wondered if they cared about thanks. “Your assistance is both appreciated and vital to defeating the Old Machine.” Shepard turned to face the shuttle and waved the rest of the team over. “Come on, people. Grab your gear, and let the shuttle get back to Normandy for the second load.”

Once her people started to move, Shepard tapped Legion’s elbow. “Bring Tali, Kal, and Rael over. See if you can help make them more comfortable with your buddies here.”

Legion’s head flaps moved from dancing a waltz to the cha cha at the word buddies. “Geth do not —”

“Figure of speech, Legion. The six of you have to work together, and while the primes might not have emotions . . . might not be scared or anxious . . . I can guarantee those three are. If you’re going to integrate the quarians back on Rannoch, all of you living and working together . . . you’re going to have to do what you can to help ease their fears.”

“This unit does not understand how to make creators more comfortable. A successful mission will further mutual goals and cooperation.” It wrung its hands, so like Tali’s nervous habit. Shepard wondered how many quarians must do it for the habit to have made it into the geth’s programming. Most of them, she would think.

“Yes, it will, but for the mission to be successful, those three need to be able to focus on what they’re doing, not jumping every time a prime moves.” She raked a hand through her hair, trying to think of a way to explain it that Legion would understand. How did beings without emotions empathize and comfort beings with emotions?

Or vice versa, apparently, judging by the frustration just starting to burn between her eyes. “Start by discussing the plan. Ask them questions about what you can expect from the quarians. Pretty much all the same stuff you and Tali have been talking about over the past days. Just get some communication going.” She gave him a little shove toward the three quarians, all of whom were sort of mincing across the space as if they expected attack to come from everywhere.

Shepard turned to her people and pointed to two large shipping containers. “These are our homes for the next few hours. Stake your claim, make them as comfy as you can. If you didn’t bring blankets, water . . . anything, there are extras in that crate. Just leave me a blanket and some water and ration bars.” She pointed to the crate that sat next to where the shuttle was lifting off. “Jenkins, Sparky . . . toss it in one of the containers for me, please.”

Kaidan saluted. “Yes, ma’am, happy to schlep for you, ma’am.”

“It is why we spend all that time training,” Jenkins agreed, crossing the cargo bay at Alenko’s side. “Build up our muscle mass and fitness levels for fetching and carrying.”

Grinning, Shepard pointed to Jenkins and Sparky. “If anyone needs a bullet shield at any time, or you get tired and need to be carried, those two volunteer.” She looked over at the primes who appeared to be staring at her with something akin to curiosity. “Well, except for you guys. You’ll need a large single family home or something to take cover behind.”

“Prime platforms do not take cover,” the spokesgeth said. “They are equipped with six layers of shielding.”

“Excellent,” Shepard replied, trying not to laugh, despite the fact everyone else did. “Always good to know.”

“I couldn’t borrow three or four of those layers, could I?” Kaidan asked as they carried the crate “Particularly if our fearless leader intends to boldly stride through the mission hiding behind me.”

“Allied designated Alenko-Lieutenant, mission parameters do not allow sufficient time to co-develop layered shielding to integrate with your hard suit,” the prime replied, its head flaps all spiking out for a moment before fluttering and settling. “Geth shielding upgrades can be made available to allied biological units in the future.”

Shepard grinned as her people chuckled again. “Sparky, you diplomatic devil, get your backside into a shipping container.” She winked at him, grateful that she could always rely on him to play along. Even the quarians seemed to breathe a little more deeply as they joined Legion and the primes.

Stepping back, she watched Rael’Zorah in particular. Kal’Reegar, she harboured no worries about. When they’d met upon her return to the Normandy, he immediately set her doubts to rest. Strong, practical, and grounded, soldiers didn’t come more solid. And something in the way his mask followed Tali’s every move gave Shepard confidence that he’d bring her youngest team member back alive.

As the discussion between the six strange team members turned from the mission to the complications of the quarians resettling Rannoch, the admiral really seemed to calm. He listened intently, rarely commenting, and spent a lot of the time watching his daughter rather than the geth. When the second shuttle arrived from the Normandy, he excused himself and approached Shepard.

She gave him a tight-lipped smile and nodded. “Admiral.”

He stepped up beside her and turned to watch his daughter and Legion running through their route into the base. “My daughter . . ..”

Shepard didn’t fill in the gap when he stalled, waiting for him to finish.

He made a low, incredulous coughing sound in his throat. “The pilgrimage was meant to allow our youth a chance to experience the galaxy, to step out of the confines of the flotilla, assume some risk, and grow. Tali . . ..” Again, he was left shaking his head. “Tali left the flotilla a brilliant child, and in your company has undergone a metamorphosis. If she were to return to the flotilla, she would be elevated to rank within a season.” He turned his silver-reflection stare to regard Shepard. “But she will not be returning to the flotilla, will she?”

Smiling, feeling a connection to the admiral at last, Shepard shook her head. “I don’t think so. Something tells me that she’s going to insist on leading the first expeditions to Rannoch. One day, our little Tali will be remembered as the spirit of the great quarian homecoming.”

The admiral stared at her for another second, then returned to his daughter’s side.

Shepard straightened and turned toward the shuttle as it opened and the second half of her team started hopping down. “Okay, people, let’s step lively. Our hosts have provided us these luxurious shielded cargo containers to smuggle us past any Reaper welcome wagons, so step on up, make yourselves at home. Any old camp songs you can remember . . ..” She grinned. “Yeah, keep those to yourselves.”

Within twenty minutes, all her people sat settled and as calm as could be expected inside the containers, but she couldn’t quite bring herself to step over the threshold.

_They could just eject all of us into a star and be done with it._
Shepard stayed outside the doors as long as she could, her heart pounding harder and harder as the deadline to locking the doors approached. When at last, time ran out, she stood in the door, staring into the perfectly well lit, but altogether too tomb-like box.

Garrus stepped up beside her and looked down into her eyes, saying nothing, but letting her know that just like Feros, he’d get her through. She nodded, gratitude warming her. With his help, she’d gotten through a lot worse.

“Anyone needs a bathroom break, now’s the time, people!” Forcing a grin that she didn’t feel, she stepped between the doors to both containers so all her people could see her. “And no grousing about how crowded it is.” She stood at parade rest. “Okay, quick recap. Saren knows we’re coming so could well have a welcome wagon waiting at the relay. This little geth beauty is going to broadcast a heretic IFF code to sneak us past Sovereign and any heretic vessels or ground scans. When we get down below the treeline, teams one, two, and three will run out, leap in the shuttle and head in to take out the AA guns on the three main gates while team four proceeds to their drop zone at the back of the compound.”

“Once we’re on the ground and in play . . .” She looked to Kaidan. “Team One?”

“Disseminate the demolition charges through the lowest level of the compound, ma’am,” he sounded off, giving her a cocky salute.

Shepard grinned. “Team Three?”

Ashley stood. “Take out the AA guns on the interior of the base and provide support. Keep as many of the bastards off the rest of you as possible, ma’am.”

“Team Four?” Shepard turned to look into the second container.

“Find the quarian hostages and get them to the evac site,” Tali replied.

“Excellent. Team Two will walk in the front door and make our way to the labs.” She paused, looking over the tight, but ready faces. “You all know what you need to do, and I have every faith that you’ll do this ungrateful wench of a galaxy proud. They might call us crazy, deluded, or even traitors, but when it’s all said and done, we will have stared into the face of the darkness and defeated it. On that day, they’ll call us heroes.” She nodded, a swell of confidence flowing through her at the calm, business-like manner of her teams. They’d get it done. “Good luck, and let’s kick some ass.”

“Oh man, this won’t be good.
Cracking one eye, she glanced up at Garrus to find him staring over her head. Changing eyes, she turned her head to see Nihlus staring right back. Teeth clenched, she winced and waited, but then they let out a sort of rumbly breath and relaxed back against the walls. She didn’t know which concerned her more, the worry that they would end up in a shouting match in the close space of that coffin, or their quiet acceptance of one another.

* * * * *

“We’re taking fire,” Kaidan called from the shuttle’s cockpit. The shuttle bucked under them, slewing hard to port as a missile impacted the shields.

“I’ve got it covered,” Garrus replied, “just try not to fly us into every single missile.”

“I thought we took down the AA guns at the gates,” Shepard shouted up. After a moment of enduring the helpless ‘I should be flying this brick’ feeling, she unbuckled her harness and stood. Flinging herself across the couple of meters, she bounced off Ashley and the interior bulkhead, both leaving hefty bruises before she made it through the doorway to grab the back of Kaidan’s seat. “I think I preferred the Mako,” she said through clenched teeth.

“We’re coming up to the last gate now,” Garrus reported, “but we’re still well out of range of its guns.” A sharp nod of his head directed her toward a missile incoming from the shallow water below. “This is geth ground units: rocket troopers and armatures mostly. One colossus.” He strafed the geth positions with the shuttle’s mass accelerator cannons, taking out an armature and rocket trooper.

“Okay, finish those puppies off, and we’ll get that last gate down.” She clung to the back of Kaidan’s seat, feeling the time ticking past, each second echoing a warning to be unpredictable.

As if to add emphasis to Garrus’s words, a huge blast of plasma from the colossus hit the shields at the starboard bow. Shepard clutched at the seat, her fingernails leaving tracks over the leather even through her gloves as the floor dropped out from under her. The inertial dampeners kicked in, but a fraction of a second too late to stop her front teeth from slamming into Kaidan’s pauldron. Pain exploded through her sinuses, but dull as if someone had wrapped a grenade in shielding and shoved it up her nose before detonating it.

“Ow, son-of-a . . .. I hate heretic geth.” She clapped her hand over her mouth and nose as the initial wave of pain passed, settling into a throb.

“Go sit and buckle yourself in,” Garrus snapped. “We’re going to need to do some fairly fancy thruster work here.”

Three explosions erupted out of the water below, finishing off the geth units in a series of spectacular mini-mushroom clouds.

Shepard leaned further over Kaidan’s shoulder, craning to see the goings-on at ground level. “Who the hell has three M-920 Cain’s in their back pocket . . . and how can I get them to give me one?” As she spoke, a needle-sharp pain yelped over the dull thud of her pounding teeth, lifting her fingers to her lip. They came away bloody. “Great. Not even to the mission yet, and I’m already bleeding.”

“Turn the workplace injury sign back to zero,” Kaidan said, chuckling when she swatted him in the back of the head. He nodded to figures stepping out from behind one of the flowerpot island formations. “Salarrians. Huh. Should we go down and see who they are?”

Shepard shook her head after debating it for half a second. Even though using the geth ship had allowed them to get to the planet without Saren knowing, destroying two massive gates and their AA guns on the way in was sure to have tipped him off. “Keep going and take out that last gate so the Normandy can get in to save our asses if they need saving. Even if these fellows are with someone, they’re a forward unit. No doubt, we’ll find their command further in.”

She watched the salarians for another moment, the dark, slithering warning in her gut at war with the fact that the STG—for surely that was who they were—had saved them a pummelling.

“Go get buckled in, and put some medigel on your lip,” Garrus said.

Shepard nodded and ducked back out. Taking her seat, she worried over the complication of a Special Tasks Group in the middle of her mission. The council had to have sent them, but why would the council send help? It didn’t make any sense.

“What?” Nihlus called over the thrusters roaring to bring the shuttle around, then the mass accelerator cannons firing.

She looked across the overcrowded shuttle to meet his eyes. “Complications. What else?” She just rolled her eyes then dug into her belt looking for medigel. She smoothed it over her split lip and then on the inside over her bruised gums.

When the firing and jolting ceased, Garrus looked over his shoulder. “Last gate’s AA guns are down. It looks like you were right about the salarians having a command: a camp just up ahead. Looks like they’re expecting us.”

She nodded, the thunderhead building in her gut starting to roll and crackle with lightning. “Take us down, but give us a little room to suss out their intentions.”

“Yes, ma’am.”

Five minutes later, the shuttle noise eased up as Kaidan set the thrusters to idle. Shepard unbuckled and headed back into the cockpit. “Sparky, you stay here. First sign of anything that looks like trouble, get the shuttle out of the line of fire.”

“Aye, aye, ma’am.” He glanced back. “Be careful out there.”

“Always.” She nodded to Garrus, needing him at her back. “Come on, C-Sec. Enough sitting around.” She pulled Roger off her back and headed for the hatch. “Nihlus, you coming along?”

He stood, his rifle already in his hands, all business. “Right behind you.”

She took a deep breath, calming the squall down to a storm. “Two metre spread,” she ordered, meeting both their stares. “Don’t make it too easy for them to take us all out.”

Garrus shrugged. “Won’t matter if they have more of those M-920’s.”

Eyebrows raised, Shepard nodded, giving him a crooked grin. “All sunshine and happiness, you are.” She sucked in a deep breath and focused on the feel of the rifle in her hand and the task at hand. “Okay, let’s go and see who our reception committee is.”

Shepard stepped out of the shuttle into the nearly knee-deep water of low tide. Eyes taking in every detail, locating every advantage for the salarians and every weakness, she kept Roger sweeping their line. She edged along the body of the Kodiak, using it as partial cover before she opened herself to fire. The STG camp had been built up against the cliffs and consisted of three large tents.
Two turret guns, nestled in behind shields and barriers, protected the small camp on its open corners. She queued up an overload, overclocking it to take down at least the shields on one, should they open fire.

When she felt her team take positions behind her, fanning out at the ordered two metre spread, she stepped out into the open, hoping like hell Garrus and Nihlus had their sniper rifles ready to finish off those turrets before the turrets finished her.

Two salarians stepped outside the perimeter of their camp, stopping about a third of the way to the shuttle. One of them raised a hand. “Captain Shepard?”

She nodded, just a quick vertical jerk of her head. “Yeah, that’s me. Who are you?”

“Captain Kirrahe, 3rd Infiltration Regiment, STG.” He gave her a salarian salute. “I’ve been sent by the council to kill you.”
Shepard stopped, her heart slowing for a single second before another rush of adrenaline hit her blood like nitrous and revved it back up, pumping hard and fast. She adjusted her grip on Roger and anchored her stance. "Well, that's going to make it hard for us to be friends, isn't it?"

Kirrahe's large, downward-angled mouth pressed flat and tight for a moment. "Not as hard as you might imagine. I have no intention of obeying my orders."

Shepard straightened a little, but didn't lower Roger from high ready, keeping him couched hard against her shoulder. "Oh? You frequently reject council orders? Go renegade on a whim? That's not the reputation of the STG." Despite the heavy lacing of sarcasm and doubt woven through her words, a spark of hope kindled in the back of her skull.

Kirrahe stepped forward a couple more steps. "No, it is not. However, we are not usually misled into committing atrocities."

Shepard arched an eyebrow. "You prefer to commit your atrocities with complete disclosure?"

"Indeed," he said so flat that she couldn't tell if he was serious or not. He didn't give her time to consider it as he turned and signalled for his troops to lower their weapons. When he looked back, he appeared as close to throwing up as she'd ever seen a salarian. "Please, Captain ... " He looked at Nihlus. "... Spectre Kryik, allow me to explain. We don't have much time."

Shepard lowered Roger but didn't hang him up. She cast a glance at Garrus, warning him to stay ready and keep his eyes open as Nihlus stepped up beside her. When his head twitched in an answering nod, she gave the salarian her full attention. "Okay, Captain Kirrahe, I'm listening."

He hesitated for a moment, waiting to see if she'd close the distance, maybe, because when she didn't, he and his companion walked over to stand a couple of metres away. "We were told that you planned to attack a council research facility being overseen by Spectre Arterius, and I received orders that you, Captain Shepard, were not to leave the planet. However, when we arrived, I sent out several scouting parties, all of whom have been missing for over thirty hours. Since then, we've located one survivor, but unless we keep him sedated, all he does is stare into space and scream."

Shepard frowned, her guts tying in sick knots. "What does he scream about? Whispers? Darkness and cold? Maybe even spiders or something like that? A horde of skittering, crawling things in his brain?" She took a step forward when she saw her confirmation on Kirrahe's face. "He's indoctrinated." She shrugged, trying to find a way to explain it. "Sovereign, Saren's dreadnought, is not a ship. It's a sentient being, and somehow it has the ability to manipulate brain chemistry in order to exert control over biological life forms."

Kirrahe cupped his elbow in the opposite hand, his other hand lifting to tap thoughtfully against his chin. "How complete is this control?"
"Absolute." Shepard let the word drop like a stone. "Once the Reaper takes over their mind, they're just puppets. After they've been indoctrinated for a while, their brain ends up destroyed, full of tumours and hemorrhages. It's safe to assume that all your scouts are indoctrinated and under Sovereign's control." She shrugged, but let empathy bleed into her stare. "I'm sorry."

He appeared to shrug it off. Not as if the fate of his people didn't matter, but rather that it was a matter for a less pressing time. "When Lt. Wiks returned in that ... state, I became suspicious and launched a covert surveillance drone. Inside Saren's compound, it found sheds and sheds of krogan breeding tanks, the inhabitants being birthed and marched out to transport ships. In addition, there are hundreds of what I assume are Saren's geth allies fortifying the compound." He shrugged. "Whatever is going on in there, it's nothing that the council would sanction. This compound needs to be destroyed."

Shepard held her tongue about the council. They had unexpected help instead of being attacked before they even made it to the compound, no point in risking turning the tide back in the council's favour. Kirrahe could learn the depth of the lies told to him as they went. Instead, she nodded. "Agreed."

Kirrahe turned and waved the second salarian forward. "This is Commander Rentola, my second in command, and our demolitions expert."

Shepard gave Rentola a curt nod. "Commander."

Rentola returned the nod. "There are several installations that will need to be destroyed on the perimeter in order to take out their triangulation and targeting, communications, air support and perimeter alarms. Geth units are fortifying all perimeter installations."

Shepard turned to wave Nihlus forward. "Since we're taking the most direct route in, we can handle the alarms. Nihlus, can you take a look at the layout and assign the other three to whatever team will be closest?" When he nodded and moved to stand with Rentola, she turned back to Kirrahe.

"If you give us a few moments, Captain, my men would like to accompany you." He shrugged, his mouth flattening back out into that thin, angry line. "We are used to holding the line, and sometimes that means being aware that where it gets drawn can change, but crossing it altogether ... ." He straightened. "Not here. Not today."

Shepard nodded. "Do you have an APC? Our shuttle won't hold too many more."

"We do. I'll have it brought around." He gestured toward the camp. "You're welcome in our camp, but we shouldn't wait very long before moving." With that, he turned away and strode toward the tents.

Shepard raised her hand to her ear. "Brother Sparky, move the shuttle into the camp, and then I need to see you and Ash."

"Yes, ma'am." A moment later, the shuttle lifted out of the water.

Shepard looked out to sea, watching thunderheads roll over the waves as the storm closed in on land. The water under her feet shimmered in the patchy sunlight, the minerals turning it a sea-green colour.

"Virmire's a beautiful place," she said, looking up at Nihlus. "Shame we won't have time to enjoy it."

Shepard jumped down out of the shuttle and ran forward to take cover behind a large rock with a good view of the front gates. An assortment of geth units patrolled the maze of walkways leading in. The only ones that concerned her, however, were the Juggernauts nearest the doors. Not much cover that far up. Railings left large strips of body parts open to hits.

She raised her hand to her ear. "All teams, report in."

"Team One," Sparky replied. "So close behind you that I think my gun barrel is stuck in your belt. Ready to deploy when you are, ma'am."

She glanced over at him and shook her head. Incorrigible.

"Team Two has taken out the targeting assist station and is thirty seconds from deploying against the comm relay, ma'am. No casualties taking out the targeting, but there are a lot of geth out there, and they are dug in like ticks."

"Roger that, Ash. Report in when you finished with the comm relay. Hopefully we'll have the alarms down by then and you can move straight into the compound."

"Understood, Team Two, out."

Shepard changed channels as Tali reported in.

"Team Four taking heavy fire from both the ground and air at the air support refuelling station," Tali called, shouting to hear herself over the pulse cannons of the primes. "But we have most of them down. The refuelling cells have been destroyed. Proceeding into the secondary compound within ten minutes if luck holds out. No casualties."

"Roger that, Team Four." Shepard nodded to Nihlus, turning command of Team Three over to him. The inclusion of two salarian team members gave Nihlus enough people that she and Wrex could remain semi-autonomous to search out intel, coming and going while still attached to the team. Even though Kirrahe had gone along with Ash's team, Shepard remained certain that he'd hear from his people about them trying to find Saren's genophage cure rather than sending it up in smoke along with the rest of the base. The more she and Wrex could work on their own, the better.

"Shepard and Wrex, take point," the Spectre commanded, giving her a firm nod.

She peered out, then dashed forward, staying low. Taking cover behind the nearest railing, she signalled to Wrex to focus on the troopers closest. Pulling up an overload, she tore down most of the shields on the first juggernaut, then opened fire, whittling it down. When it went down, she moved up, racing along an extended, open section of walkway, relying on the rest of the team to give her cover.

Sliding in behind an outcropping of rock, she checked her shields. Nearly down. She let them recharge, overloading and sabotaging a destroyer bearing down on Wrex. A quick switch to Ingrid dropped the thing at Wrex's feet. Two troopers fell to single shots from the sniper rifle before she changed back.

The rest of both teams followed them up through the maze, providing cover and then helping whittle down the large units. The sheer number of enemies they faced solidified her determination to undermine Saren's heretic support however she could. Finally, legs shaking with exhaustion, she made it through the outside gates and down a long walkway between the walls to the security terminal to the base's interior. Hacking in through layers of security, she found herself grinning.

"A real engineer, indeed," she grumbled under her breath. Too bad Garrus was on the back side of A plume of fire and smoke erupted into the air off to her eleven o'clock. Speak of the devil.

"Those alarms down?" Nihlus called from his position further down the series of gates.

"Two minutes. Trying to reroute them all here so that we draw some of the enemy off the other teams." She keyed in commands, rerouting all the alarm trips to the closest door. "All right, ready to go. Open it up."

"Teams Two and Four," Nihlus spoke into the radio. "The alarms are down. Move in when ready."

"Team Two moving in. Comm relay is down. Vakarian took a bullet to the shoulder. He's bandaged, medigel'd, and moving on."

Shepard's heart dropped into her belly, and for a moment, her fingers twitched, aching to pop up to her earpiece and demand to know exactly how bad it was.

Trust Ash. She wouldn't let him continue if it was bad.

She brought Roger up tight to her shoulder and nodded to Wrex. "Come on, old man. Let's get this done."

"Right behind you, Shepard."

Together, they took position at either side of the door. Shepard hacked the control, the air splitting with the peel of alarms as the door rose off the ground.

"Oh fuck," Shepard groaned as she stepped into the low light, her gun swinging around toward movement, identifying her attacker as an indoctrinated salarian. "Sweet baby Jesus." She fended him off with her rifle, not wanting to shoot him. What if he could be treated?

A single roar from Wrex's shot gun dropped the unfortunate fellow. "Can't afford to go soft now, Shepard. Even if we could fix them, how the hell do we get them out of here?" He took out another one. "Kinder just to put them down quick."

How long before it's kinder just to put you down quick?

She nodded, but concentrated on taking down the geth, leaving the salarians for the others.

They fought their way through a massive warehouse and up a flight of stairs. Shepard caught sight of computer terminals and stepped out from behind a wall of crates to take a plasma cannon blast to the chest. Even though her shields deflected it, the force threw her on her ass and knocked the wind out of her.

Wrex grabbed her hand, wrenching her to her feet hard enough that her shoulder popped. "No lying down, Shepard. I can't do all the work."

Still gasping, she overloaded the heretic juggernaut, then peppered it with rounds. Finally, it let out a bad extranet connection death squeal, its head exploding into white fluid. Shepard ran up to the first of the computers, but kept her eyes up, looking down the length of the room. "Door at the far end. Go ahead and clear the way, we'll be right behind you." Without waiting for a reply, she started hacking her way in. "What is all this?" she mumbled as the security fell before her. "Data and tons of it. It's all on indoctrination." She shook her head and slipped an OSD into the slot. "Let Dr. Chakwas worry about it."

Thirty seconds later, they went through the door, a couple of computer consoles to their right. In under a minute, Shepard hacked in and grabbed what she could. "Moving on," she called, sprinting for the door at the far end of the room.

Bodies littered the floor, all of them salarian. More of Kirrahe's people. She sent Wrex ahead to keep an eye on the exits.

"Team Four to Shepard." Tali's voice sounded like an answer to prayer. "We're inside the base and moving toward the south detention block. Resistance inside the base so far is light."

"Roger that, Team Four. Stay sharp, and keep in touch." Shepard closed Tali's channel and opened one to Legion. "Legion?"

"Receiving."

"Keep an open receiving channel to me. We're inside the base, and hopefully we'll find something you can relay to the heretic geth to undermine Sovereign."

"Affirmative."

"Shepard out." A beep alerted her to another message, so she switched channels.

"We have salarian prisoners here, Shepard," Nihlus reported. "Some of them are beyond help, but taking a couple of others with us. Team One, here's your elevator. Get those charges set and fast. Good luck."

Shepard ran over to the first computer and flew through the drives, brain moving faster than her eyes, but trusting herself to pick out anything important. Most of the information amounted to local copies of the indoctrination information, so she left the other computers.

"Come on, Wrex," she said, running up behind him. "As fascinating as this is, we have far more important information to find."

"Agreed." He punched the door control and led the way out onto a walkway overlooking cells. High-pitched voices mumbled and screamed gibberish from below. Shivers clawed their way up Shepard's spine and tears of sympathy pricked her eyes. Out of the corner of her eye, she saw Wrex shudder. "Those would be the ones who are too far gone," he said, shaking his huge head. "Poor bastards."

Shepard brought up the floor plan and let out a frustrated hiss. "We've gone too far. We needed the elevator back in that computer room." She gave him a push. "Let Nihlus and the others clear this area. We need the genophage labs." Side by side, they bolted back through the empty rooms until they reached the elevator.

"Nihlus is behind us," Wrex grunted. "That means going into a fight, Shepard." He punched one fist into his other palm and rolled his neck, vertebrae snapping like popcorn.

She grinned, the heady pulse of adrenaline and oxygen beating through her veins. She may never have liked killing all that much, but no high in the galaxy matched that of battle. "Afraid we can't take 'em, Wrex?" She hit the control and the doors opened.

A piercing shrill of feedback sliced through her head and yanked her hand to her ear. "Dammit." She shook her head and cracked her jaw as the sound and pain faded. She checked. Ash's channel. "Team Two?"

"Team Two is taking heavy fire, Shepard," Ashley called. Gunfire pelted the chief's cover close enough to make it hard to hear Ash over the noise. Garrus hollered something, but Shepard couldn't make out anything but the hard, 'business of killing' tone. "Jenkins, cover Vakarian's back. Move up." Ashley cursed. "Turner and two salarians down. We're almost to the first AA tower, but we could use some of this heat taken off of us."

Shepard called up Ashley's tracker as she stepped into the elevator. Team Two was on the opposite side of the genophage labs moving toward the northeast corner of the compound. "I see you, Ash. We're headed that way now, hitting the genophage lab in under a minute. Hopefully that will pull them off of you. Until then, take it slow."

"Aye, aye, ma'am."

Shepard called up an overload, and readied Roger in the crook of her arm as the elevator slowed to a stop. When it opened, it felt like stepping out into a busy hospital ward. Stasis units hummed and spun, husk creatures inside each one, while lab-coated staff bustled around. Just another day in the labs of the mad scientist.

What was Saren doing with the husks? Studying them? Maybe more to do with indoctrination?

Shepard strode into the room, Wrex a step behind her. The staff remained intently focused on packing equipment into crates, allowing them halfway down the room before anyone voiced a challenge. Indoctrinated staff as well? How useful would they be?

"Who are you?" an asari in a lab coat demanded, doing a double-take. "I thought the krogan were all . . ." She stopped, apparently noticing that Wrex was no newborn pod krogan.

"I'm not one of your weakling, vat-grown slaves," the battlemaster said, the words ground out between this teeth as his shotgun levelled on the pale, blue head. "We're here for the cure."

Instant chaos. The asari threw herself at a console, her hand slapping the stasis controls in the same second that Wrex left her shoulders without a head. The released husks milled about for a moment, giving Shepard the chance to overload one and sabotage another before they charged. She got a few shots off before it turned into a furball of beating the machine nightmares off with the butt of her rifle as they pummelled and clawed at her.

Just when she started to feel that she might be in trouble, Wrex waded in, grabbing husks and ripping them limb from limb before tossing them aside.

Must be nice to have the strength of a small bulldozer.

"Smash the computers! Wipe all data! Destroy everything!" a krogan hollered from halfway down the room. White-coated assistants ran to obey his orders. Breaking free, Shepard ran down the length of the lab, opening fire on the lab coats while leaving the krogan to Wrex.

"Traitor!" the behemoth screamed, hitting the scientist with a warp that skewed the air throughout the entire room. Shepard felt the edge of the field trying to disassemble her molecules and leaped away from it, bolting toward the last few lab assistants even as Roger mowed them down.

"I'm curing our people!" Armour and chitinous shell collided with a catastrophic, wet crunch that shook Shepard all the way through. She prayed it wasn't Wrex's armour that gave way with the charge.

"You'd turn us all into the slaves of monsters." Wrex's shotgun barked three times, and the floor trembled underfoot as the scientist fell.
The last lab assistant made it to the mainframe at the end of the lab, hitting controls even as Shepard's rounds tore through him. What the hell kept him on his feet? Finally, Wrex's shotgun disintegrated the poor fool's chest cavity, and he fell.

Shepard scrambled over his body even as Wrex dragged it out of the way. Fingers flying over the controls, she tried to halt the data wipe in progress, shunting everything she could find over to her omnitool.

"Damn it, damn it, damn it." Data vanished faster than she could grab it, and what she managed to get hold of amounted to fragments. Then, the computer died. "Fuck." She slammed both fists down on the dead console, then kicked it and spun away.

"Did you get the cure?" Wrex demanded, looming over her shoulder.

"I got what I could, Wrex. We won't know how much until we get it back to the Normandy and let the experts go through it." She nodded toward the shelves and desks. "We have a couple of minutes before Nihlus catches up with us. See if you can find hard copies of anything." She attacked the nearest desk, throwing anything she couldn't use onto the floor, dumping out drawers, and generally making a glorious mess. Odd how satisfying wrecking things could be.

She shoved a couple of folders full of test results into her armour as Nihlus and the rest of Team Three ran in, a couple of extra salarians in tow. "All clear in here," she announced, not giving him time to speak. Striding for the door halfway down the room, she waved them on. "Let's go see if we can find Saren's den."

The door led into a narrow area between buildings, the tall walls drawing Shepard's eye up to the sky. Thunderheads rolled in heavy from the sea, bruising the sky a mottled violet. Shepard shivered a little as lightning carved through the air, then turned her back to it, facing the lingering sunshine that brightened their path ahead.

"Did you find anything?" Nihlus whispered, stepping up to jog at her side. He cut a glance over at her, his shotgun never leaving high ready.

Shepard popped one shoulder in a quick shrug. "Hard to say, they started burning down the house the minute they realized we didn't belong. I saved what I could."

A couple of geth troopers blocked the path, but the team made light work of them. The short open area ended at another door.

"Why do these places always have to be over-thought and over-designed mazes?" Shepard grumbled, waiting until guns covered both sides of the door before she hit the control. "What's wrong with just putting up a building?" She stepped through, past the arched brows and sideways glances.

A sigh of sound, out of place amidst the rolling surf and echoes of battle drifting on the breeze, set Shepard's internal alarm off like a small firework at the base of her skull. "Who's here?" she called, pulling Roger up to her shoulder. "Come out or we'll drag your carcass out of wherever you're hiding."

"Please don't shoot," a tiny, feminine whisper called from behind a desk. "I'm unarmed. I'm just a scientist, not a soldier."

Shepard looked to Nihlus who nodded for her to go ahead before sending Wrex to cover the right while he moved to Shepard's left flank.
"Then come out, hands up, nice and slow," she said as she walked forward, closing the ten metres or so. So many huge, empty cement rooms.

Small blue hands appeared above the desktop, then two grey-blue eyes below blue speckled brow markings. "Please, I just want to get out of here before it's too late." The asari stood, her hands held out in front of her.

"Okay." Shepard closed on her. "Let's hear it, gorgeous. Who the hell are you, and what in the name of the holy Enkindlers' great, glowing rumps are you doing here?"

"My name is Rana Thanoptis." She edged around the desk. "I'm a neuro-specialist. I was brought here to study the effect of indoctrination on organic minds." She gave a helpless little shrug. "At least, that's what I was told. Saren keeps us all in the dark as much as possible."

A massive explosion pounded through the air, sending the asari diving back behind the desk. The shock wave rolled over them, making Shepard's ears pop with the pressure change.

AA gun number one, check. Good job, Team Two.

"You can come back out," Shepard sighed. "So, neuro-specialist helping Saren indoctrinate people?" She pulled her pistol off her hip. "Any reason I shouldn't just shoot you?"

Rana let out a little squeal as her head peeked back over the desk top. "I wasn't helping indoctrinate people. In fact, I think Saren had us trying to figure out how to prevent or reverse it." She stared into Shepard's eyes for a moment, then threw up her hands. "Look, I didn't have a choice here. It's not just the prisoners that end up indoctrinated, you know. Sooner or later, Saren is going to want to dissect my brain."

Shepard's gut clenched. "Everyone here ends up indoctrinated?" She looked over her shoulder at Nihlus. All those quarian kids … . "Dear god." How the hell could they risk sending them back to the flotilla? A forage harvester began cutting swaths behind her eyes.

"Not everyone. There is another cell block away from the main compound. South side. Saren keeps control prisoners there, or so I heard. I've never actually been over there."

"Okay. Give us a minute." Shepard walked over to Nihlus, a helpless little flutter of her hands preceding her words. "What do you think? Is it worth the risk to get a neuro-specialist who has worked on indoctrination from the inside?"

The Spectre looked back at their growing team. "I'm tempted to say no just because of how many semi-crazy people we're dragging around already, but she might be a huge help to Drs Chakwas and Solus."

Shepard closed her eyes for a moment, trying to contain the headache, her brow scrunching down toward her nose. "I'm not going to be the crazy cat lady, I'm going to end up the crazy semi-indoctrinated and quite possibly dangerous refugee lady." She turned her back to the others and pressed in closer into his space. "If the quarian pilgrims are indoctrinated, there's no way we can let them go back to their people."

"One dragon at a time, Shepard," Nihlus whispered. "Let's get them out of here first, then worry about that." He looked over Shepard's head and nodded toward the door in the back wall. "Where does that lead?"

Rana shrugged, but her body language screamed that whatever she thought was back there scared her to death. "It leads to an elevator to Saren's private labs. I don't know what he does in there.
Shepard doubted the scientist's terror could be chalked up to an overactive imagination. Although, it would be amazing to walk into something that turned out better than she imagined rather than worse. Things always being worse got old after a while.

"Wrex," Nihlus called, heading for the door, "stay here, and keep an eye on our new friends. Any of them get twitchy, you know what to do." He turned slightly. "Gladstone, take cover at the outside door. Nothing gets in."

"Roger that, sir," the Marine said, moving into position.

Shepard held Rana's stare for a moment, Peduk's betrayal too fresh in her mind to take anything for granted. "We'll take you with us," she said at last, a hand cutting the air to forestall the asari's thanks. "Once aboard our ship, you'll be scanned to assess the extent of your indoctrination. You can repay us for extracting you by helping our people work on developing a treatment." Shrugging, she swept her raised hand toward the outside door. "If that arrangement isn't to your liking . . . you've got maybe half an hour to clear the blast zone."

Rana gulped, her skin paling to a peaked ice-blue. "I'll stick with you," she said, her voice aiming for a pitch that only dogs could hear.

Shepard strode to the door into Saren's part of the complex. "Then stay here with the others and don't give Wrex a reason to shoot you." Raising her hand to the control, Shepard glanced back at Nihlus. He nodded, and she palmed the panel. The door opened to reveal another outdoor walkway that led to a small empty room, that led to a vestibule that led to the elevator.

Shepard stepped into the lift and shook her head. "Like I said, ridiculously over designed mazes." She glanced at Nihlus and winked when he chuckled. "So, what do you think we're going to find in here?"

His answering shrug told her that he was as tired of the bad surprises as she was. "Whatever it is, I'm sure it'll be terrible."

"You're not going and getting cynical on me, are you?" she asked, bumping him lightly with her shoulder.

His chuckle came out weary. "Believe it or not, Shepard. I was a cynical, ornery, old ass before you met me."

She feigned shock and horror, laughing softly when he buffeted her with an elbow. "You? No! I can't believe that." Sighing, she looked front and edged toward the door. "I also can't believe this elevator is so slow. Or are we descending into the center of the planet?" No sooner had she finished and the metal doors opened, revealing another small vestibule area.

When she palmed that control, the door opened to reveal a floor made out of metal grating. On her left, a long ramp descended toward a very familiar piece of technology. "My god, he has another beacon, Nihlus." She hurried down the ramp, slowing as she reached the bottom. "This one is functioning properly." Edging forward, she looked down at the interface, knowing it as well as anything belonging to their time.

"You're going to use it?" he asked, his voice hushed, but tinted with excitement.

"We both should, but alone," she replied. "Who knows what we could get from an intact beacon, Nihlus." Her fingers skipped over the controls, a wide smile spreading across her face as the beacon's field enveloped her, lifting her off the metal grating into its familiar, welcome embrace.

Images ripped through her mind, some of them known and familiar, many of them not. As before, they passed too quickly for her to understand or even recognize them as more than flashes of sound and light, horror, death and fear. She pressed her eyes closed as pressure built up behind them, threatening to send them flying out of her skull. Teeth clenched, muscles tied into knots, her human body protested, crying out against the invasion even as the prothean revelled.

Then the beacon released her. Her feet hit the metal floor, but her legs gave out and she tumbled down onto her hands and knees. Panting, head throbbing, she slipped sideways to sit on one hip, elbow braced against her side.

"Shepard?" Nihlus called, his voice soft and worried.

"Yeah, I'm fine. It's not a whole lot more fun the second time." She staggered up onto her feet, wobbling a little. "Definitely more information there, though." Stepping back, she made room for him to use the beacon. "I'll check in with the teams," she said, backing up the the base of the ramp, keeping an eye on him as he activated the controls.

"Team One, report."

"We've reached the lowest level of the complex, Captain," Alenko reported, his voice broken by static. "We're reading something huge down here. A massive power source. First five charges are in place. We will be heading up to the evac zone in a few minutes."

"Understood, Team One. Don't get distracted down there. As fascinating as that power source might be, it will be going up in smoke soon enough."

"Roger that, Team One out."

Shepard switched channels. "Team Two, report. How's it going out there, Ash?"

"Whatever you did helped. We are almost to the second AA tower. We've lost another STG member. The rest of us are beaten up, but on our feet and fighting. We'll be good and damned ready for that dust off when we're done."

"Roger that, Team One. Stay strong, we're almost through this." Shepard's chest clenched with guilt. So far, her part of the mission had been a cakewalk, and out there her people were being hurt, dying.

"We'll be in touch, Skipper. Team Two out."

Shepard switched channels again. "Team Four, report."

"Shepard!" Tali's voice came through Shepard's earpiece loud and shrill enough to make her ears ring. "We've located the hostages, but the cells are all wired to something . . . the cables go underground. Legion and the primes are trying to trick the system into believing the circuit is closed, but we have no idea what could happen."

"Be careful. I hate to say it, but we're running on a deadline here, Tali. Do what you can, but when we call for evac . . ."

"We'll get them out, Shepard." The quarian's voice calmed, gaining a layer of steel. "We'll get them out and report in when we're on our way to our evac."
Shepard's lips pressed together in a tight, proud smile. "I know you will, Tali. Just make sure Legion keeps that receiving channel open. Shepard out." Nihlus's armour rang off the metal grating as he clambered to his feet, the beacon transmission ended. When he turned toward her, he looked about as good as she'd felt. "You okay?"

Leaning up against the wall, he nodded and pressed his hand to his temple. "Hell of a headache, but it's backing off a little." He pushed off the wall and looked around, walking up the ramp and then toward the center portion of the upper floor. It stuck out like some sort of platform. "What do you suppose this is?"

Shepard followed a handful of steps behind him, one hand creeping up to rub the back of her neck. Damned beacon headaches. "Observation platform? But for what?"

At the end, a flash of red light coalesced into a familiar, terrifying form. Tashac spat out the name: Sovereign, but Shepard held the Prothean's hatred and terror in check. It didn't prove an easy task as she recalled the terrible, screaming roar from Eden Prime, the sheer scale of the destruction it had caused without even trying. And there it hung, insubstantial, just a translucent light show, but one that stabbed into her heart and her mind, threatening to rip them both straight out of her.

"You are not Saren," a deep, reverberating voice stated, the dead, singular tone sending a superstitious shudder down Shepard's spine. She couldn't recall ever hearing anything so absolutely alien. It tore at the fabric of reality around her . . . so wrong, so abhorrent to the forces of life and creation and evolution that it formed a sort of antimatter. Something so far into 'the other' that it shouldn't be able to exist in her universe.

Fighting off the trembling and watery twisting in her guts, Shepard forced herself straight and smiled in the face of the vast, soullessness of that machine voice. "Nope, I'm definitely not Saren." Striding right up to the hologram she felt her fear evolve into a reckless sort of giddiness that made her head buzz. Hysterical laughter pushed at her, dangling off the back of her throat and clawing at the base of her tongue. She fought it back.

"Well, well, well. Look at you. Nazara, I presume?".
Shepard's grin widened when the hologram remained silent, imagining the wheels whirling in that gigantic electronic brain as the Reaper tried to figure out how she knew its name. She held her hands out to the side and made a sweeping bow. "I'm Captain Jane Shepard. I can't tell you how lovely it is to finally meet you in person. I've heard so many wonderful things."

"Rudimentary creatures of blood and flesh," the voice continued, "you touch my mind, fumbling in ignorance. Incapable of understanding."

Shepard hesitated for a moment. She'd thought that moment would come with some sort of terrified revelation, but instead . . . calm filled her. Nihlus stepped up behind her, his hand pressing into the small of her back. She glanced back and nodded, understanding the warning and appreciating the support, but her fear had evaporated. Where others might have stood before that thing trembling, she had been given everything she needed to face it from a place of strength. Time to get some answers.

She stepped out to the very end of the platform. "Oh, I think might understand a little better than you think. You see, in all your amazing incomprehensibility, you didn't kill the Thorian before it let out your little secret. See, it watched your kind destroy Feros. It absorbed all that horror and death." A ferocious smile tightened her face, sharpening it. "It ratted on you, and then the true geth ratted on you."

"There is a realm of existence so far beyond your own that you cannot even imagine it." The monotone arrogance reverberated through the air, sending tremors through Shepard's eardrums and lips, fingers, belly … anywhere thin, fragile, and human. "I am beyond your comprehension. I am Sovereign."

Shepard laughed. "Is this a pre-recorded message? In case of contact with organics break glass?" She cocked a hip and crossed her arms, settling her head back on her neck. "Oh yeah, you're a huge mystery, Nazara." She leaned forward as she stressed the Reaper's name. "Let's see how I do on the whole comprehension thing. You're what the Protheans called a Reaper."

"Reaper, a label created by the Protheans to give voice to their destruction. In the end, what they chose to call us is irrelevant. We simply are."

Shepard leaned back, widening her stance and dropping her center of gravity, trying to look as immovable as possible. "No, you wouldn't call yourselves Reapers. You probably have no species name, because each of you is actually made from a different species … well, the remains of them."

"Organic life is nothing but a genetic mutation. An accident. Your lives are measured in years and decades. You wither and die. We are eternal. The pinnacle of evolution and existence. Before us, you are nothing. Your extinction is inevitable. We are the end of everything."

Shepard straightened, her arms dropping to her side. "That's part of the pre-recorded intimidation message, is it? Because we've used the beacons, we know better. You were born 50,000 years ago in the heart of the Citadel tower from the grey, pasty remains of a race called the Rivaran. We saw you detach from your womb." She backed up a step. "Well? Nothing to say to that, Mr. Big and Scary Sovereign?" Nihlus pressed in tight against her, but didn't speak. She looked to him. He seemed steady and calm, but observing perhaps? Anyway, he didn't seem inclined to join the conversation. A giddy sort of laugh escaped her as she imagined what Garrus would have to say were he there.

Taking some steel from that thought, she stepped forward. "No? Nothing to that? I suppose your replies are all based on 'Sweet baby Jesus, what are you?' and 'Holy mother of God, that's not a ship'." She reached up and covered up turning on her radio with an ear scratch. "Okay, so … something easier. What of your allies? Saren and the heretic geth? What do they get out of helping you bring back all your buddies? A nice vacation condo on a beach somewhere?" She shifted a couple of steps to her right then back, pacing a mini-circuit, buying herself some thinking space. "You promised to give the heretic geth their future. What does that future look like?"

"The geth are an annoyance, creations of limited utility. They are unable to think on their own, made weak and dependent by their organic creators. Their allegiance is inconsequential outside their purpose. Once my kind blacken the sky of every world, the harvest complete, they will be exterminated. The cycle will not be broken."

Shepard grinned, nodding a little at the talons that patted her back, congratulating her. "Oh, I think the cycle is plenty broken already. The Protheans failed against thousands of you, but right now, you're here alone." She leaned in. "Trust me, I intend to see that it stays that way."

"Confidence born of ignorance. The cycle cannot be broken. The pattern has repeated itself more times than you can fathom. Organic civilizations rise, evolve, advance, and at the apex of their glory, they are extinguished. The Protheans were not the first. They did not create the Citadel. They did not forge the mass relays. They merely found them. The legacy of my kind."

Shepard nodded and paced behind Nihlus, turning her back to the Reaper, sensing it would hate that she did. For a being that demonstrated so little emotion, it reeked arrogance like a five day dead possum lying by the side of the highway in the desert reeked of … well, reek. When she reached the main part of the floor, she stopped, still turned away. "Yeah, I know that too. So what?"

"Your civilization is based upon the technology of the mass relays, our technology. By using it, your society develops along the paths we desire. We impose order on the chaos of organic evolution. You exist because we allow it, and you will end because we demand it." Its voice rose on the end by the tiniest degree, but had previously stuck to the monotone so strictly that it registered as a shout.

"So, you prod us along, herding us through our development until we reach a stage where we're useful as … what?" Nihlus strode up to the hologram. "You don't take slaves, other than turning people into shock troops that you leave to die. I don't have any memories of you stripping planets of technology or resources. Why bother with any of it? What is it about?"

Shepard nodded, cataloguing the information away, wondering how much Tashac knew. Did she know the Inusannon didn't build the relays? She must have. Surely, the Protheans had seen the trap for what it was … since they ended up caught in it.

"So you built the relays and the Citadel. You created the whole concept of the Mass Effect?" She made a face, an eyebrow cocking, her mouth skewed off to one side. That rang wrong. "Really? A race so creatively barren that they repeat the exact same behaviours over and over for millions of years, and I'm supposed to believe that you invented anything?" She shook her head and turned back, striding down to face the hologram nose to … creepy shell, certainty fueling her. "No. Someone built the first one of you. Maybe the first several, and then you took over. You aren't capable of true creation or invention."

"My kind transcends your very understanding. We are each a nation, free of all weakness. You cannot even grasp the nature of our existence. We have no beginning. We have no end. We are infinite. Millions of years after your civilization has been eradicated and forgotten we will endure. Your kind need not understand our motives, they need only die as have trillions upon trillions before them."

Shepard laughed, but despite everything she knew from the Thorian and Tashac, an icy dread crept up her spine. Nothing said so far could have provoked it. Something else lurked under the surface, something she couldn't see, and it terrified her. The thing, the damned Reaper felt as though it was gloating rather than reciting by rote. Despite that, she cracked her neck, squashed down her fear and bulldozed ahead. "Seriously? Can't you step off the script? I told you that I already know you were created, how, when, and even out of what. And I'm supposed to be completely terrified of you?"

Looking back at Nihlus, she shook her head. "What the hell were we so worried about? It can't even carry on an intelligent conversation. It's all just scripted threats and assumptions." She leaned forward and levelled an ice-cold smile at the thing, all teeth and frozen eyes. "You're pathetic, and I'm not afraid of you. You wouldn't know what to do with a galaxy ready and willing to fight you."

"Your fear is irrelevant, as is your posturing. We are Legion. The time of our return is coming. You cannot escape your doom."

She shook her head. "Oh, we'll avoid it. We'll send you straight to hell, and if your buddies and inbred cousins and drunken college roommates show up, we'll send them straight to hell too."

"Shepard!"

Shepard's hand flew up to her ear. "Team Four? All sorted?"

"Yes, ma'am. We got the cells open and are headed for the evac site now. Moving slowly though, Captain. The pilgrims and other prisoners are afraid of Legion and the primes as well as in general."

"Understood, Team Four. Keep them moving. Let me know when you're safely back aboard the drop ship."

Before Tali could reply, an emergency communication broke through, shrieking in Shepard's ear as it cut off the other call.

"Ouch, dammit." She doubled over, her hands clapped over her ears as six inch ardox spikes hammered into her head. "Fuck, that hurts. Who decided something was worth deafening me?"

"Alenko here, Captain. Remember that energy source that was about to be blown to hell so we shouldn't pay any attention to it? We just found it. It turned on about three minutes ago. It's set to blow everything sky high and blanket the planet in massive amounts of radiation in seventeen minutes."

"What?" Shepard jerked upright, spine snapping stiff. She opened the channel for Nihlus to receive as well. "A bomb?" Her mind spun into overdrive, trying to formulate a plan, thoughts flipping through so quickly that she almost missed his confirmation.

"Yes, ma'am. One hell of a massive bomb. It'll take out everything for five klicks in every direction."

Nihlus stepped to Shepard's side, his hand reflexively moving to squeeze her shoulder. "A trap.
Saren let us get in this far before triggering it."

Shepard felt her heart dip sickeningly, a sponge bogged down in a swamp, riding algae-choked waves in a storm. "The quarians." She closed her eyes and shook her head. "Their cells were hooked up to cables that ran into the floor. Tali said they just got the pilgrims out."

"There are cables coming into the room, but Captain, we have to evacuate. There's no way to disarm this thing, it's completely shielded. Commander Rentola and I have been trying to find a way in, but … ."

Shepard spun back to face the hologram. "Fuck, that bloody thing's been playing with us. Get out, Sparky. Get the hell out of there. We'll meet you at the evac point." Glancing at Nihlus, she barked.
"Get the others moving! We're not leaving anyone on this fucking planet." She marched to the end of the platform to stare down the hologram. "We're going to end you. On the life of the sweet baby Jesus, I promise you that, machine. I will end you."

"Your words are empty, your future nonexistent. I am the vanguard of the harvest and your civilization's destruction. Your god has abandoned you, Jane Shepard. It left you to the batarans, and it has left you to us. We will not be as merciful as they were. This exchange is over." The hologram blinked out.

"… pinned down at the base of the AA tower!" Ashley's voice shouted over heavy fire as Nihlus included Shepard in the conversation. "Every heretic geth on the planet is dug in up there."

Ashley's voice broke through the thick, glacial darkness that held Shepard frozen at the edge of the platform. On the surface, she understood how the Reaper knew about the batarans, but something in that voice promised something so much worse and so much deeper.

"Blow that thing and get out of there, Williams," Nihlus bellowed back. "In sixteen minutes, this place is going to be a radioactive crater."

"Ash," Shepard chimed in as she shook off most of the terror and ran for the door. "Do what you have to, but take that gun down. We don't have time to make it outside the range of that gun for pick up. If it isn't destroyed, we're all dying here." Jumping through before the door even finished opening, she dashed forward and hit the elevator control.

"Understood, ma'am. We'll get it done. Vakarian, Kirrahe, move up and overload that juggernaut."

Shepard glanced back at Nihlus as the channel closed. "Tali's running for her evac?"

Nihlus nodded, stepping past her into the elevator. "We just need to hope that Williams and Vakarian can get that AA gun down, or it won't matter. We can't even call in the shuttle." He punched the controls.

She nodded,shrugging Roger into her hands. Fear galvanized her. In the face of certain disaster, only one thing remained. Action. Keep in the fight, keep moving forward until her heart stopped.
"We need to send Gladstone and the refugees ahead to the evac and try to pull some of the heat off Team Two." She raised her hand to her ear. "Team One, I'm transmitting the tracker code for Gladstone. I'm going to send him and the noncombatants to the evac. See if you can join up and give them some extra fire support, make sure they get there."

"Aye, aye, ma'am. And you?"

Shepard stepped up to the elevator door, willing it to move faster. "Team Two is pinned down at the second tower. Going to try to give them a shot to blow that gun to hell. Just get the noncombatants out of the line of fire, Sparky."

"Yes, ma'am. Team One, out."

Wrex paced restlessly along the line of salarian prisoners when they made it back to the outer room. "About time. I was beginning to think the two of you had gotten yourselves killed." He strode forward to meet them, bristling and tense.

"No, but it's early still." Shepard ran over to the door. "Gladstone, run like hell for the evac with the salarians and the doctor. Team One will meet up with you." When he responded to the affirmative, she turned to face the salarian scouts. "Are any of you okay to handle a pistol? You're going to need to help protect yourselves."

Two stepped forward. She pressed her pistol into the hand of one and nodded for Nihlus to hand his sidearm over to the other. "Excellent. Good luck."

"I've fired a gun enough to help," the asari scientist said, stepping forward. "I might not hit all that many bad guys, but I can keep them scared."

Shepard smiled and nodded toward Gladstone. "He can give you his sidearm." She patted Rana on the back as she hurried past. "Stay safe out there."

Waving to Wrex and Nihlus, Shepard ran out the door, heading straight ahead, across a drawbridge rather than following Gladstone to the right. The AA tower rose out of the complex a couple hundred metres ahead. They just needed to get close enough to distract some of the defenders.

"Shepard-Captain," a geth voice called in Shepard's ear, "geth surveillance of the planet indicates that the Old Machine disengaged with docking station and is moving toward the base at a velocity of 1200 kph. ETA to base five minutes twenty nine seconds."

Shepard groaned. Even more good news. Now they could dodge Reaper fire as well. "Thanks.
Keep us up to date on its movements. Shepard out." Shooting a glance Nihlus's direction, she called, "Reaper on its way."

"Shit."

She nodded, that assessment summing things up nicely, but then two geth destroyers charged them from the far end of the drawbridge. Halfway across, the large machines went down spewing white fluid, falling to a barrage of powers and bullets. Leaping over one even as it slid past, Shepard bolted for the door at the end.

"Insane," she grumbled, running around a long, curving interior hallway. "What the hell is the point of all these stupid corridors?" The door at the end of that opened, another outdoor walkway following alongside the building, then around, giving them a clear view of the AA tower. She could see Team Two up on the roof of the building, pinned down by a huge number of geth.
Shepard pulled Ingrid and dodged into cover behind a crate.

"Some of those jumping ones," Nihlus called. "They're crawling down the wall from above."
"Excellent. Wrex! Warp. Try to keep them still for a second or two." Shepard sighted the thing, waited for Wrex to immobilize it before she finished it off. "Nice." Four of the nimble geth went down with relative ease before Shepard had a chance to wonder why they were, in fact, still fighting geth. Hadn't they heard what Sovereign said about them? Didn't they care about being disposable, expendable tools?

"Shepard-Captain, Old Machine proceeded to the north side of base and halted. Heretic dropships moving over primary evac site," their eyes in the heavens reported.

"Understood, let me know what that Reaper does. Shepard, out." She gestured for Nihlus to move up. "Let's take out a few of those defenders and then move. We have geth on their way to the primary evac."

"Understood." He brought up his sniper rifle, aiming for a head sticking up above the railing a good forty feet up.

She and Ingrid took out two troopers and three rocket troopers, the whole time the countdown ticking away inside her head. Twelve minutes, eleven minutes . . .

"Thanks, Skipper," Ashley called two minutes later. "We're moving forward. Should be on our way to the dust off within a couple of minutes."

Shepard stuck her head out, seeing her people heading toward the gun. "Okay, let's get to the evac site and keep it clear." She turned and bolted toward the tower. "Our route down is through that elevator."

The elevator exited into another short, empty hallway, a door on the wall to the right. As Shepard opened the door, she spotted the drop ship hovering above the evac site.

"Sweet spirits," Nihlus whispered, his voice a thin, tight hiss that focused Shepard on what lay before them: one of the massive krogan breeding sheds.

"There must be a hundred tanks in here," Wrex said, his massive head shaking. He led the way through the ankle deep water between the raised tanks. "Saren has to have grown thousands of krogan."

Shepard shook at the thought that the shed before them was only one of ten. Lifting into a jog, she passed Wrex, Roger held high and ready. "Right now, our job is getting our people the hell out of here. Focus on that, and come on." A massive door blocked the far end. When Nihlus and Wrex took positions in cover, she opened it up.

Geth covered the high ground, leaving them to dart into cover. Shepard launched her drone and overloaded the closest trooper, dropping it into a twitching pile.

"Shepard! Team Four is pinned down fifty metres from evac," Tali shouted over the sound of gunfire and exploding rockets.

"Tali, we've got eight minutes before the big boom. Do whatever you need to, but get out of there!" Shepard ducked out, sighting down two troopers, finishing them both off with headshots before her shields began to complain. She wished she could see what the quarians and geth were dealing with . . . wished she could race down through the base to help them . . . anything but be trapped and helpless.

Three heretic primes marched down the slope toward them, pulse cannons sending balls of plasma roaring past her head and slamming into her cover behind the frame of the gate. She leaned out, ripping along the closest one's shields with an overload, then hacking it. It turned on it's companions, buying her a little time.

"Sparky! Where the hell is Team One? We're pinned down and taking fire from over a dozen geth here." Automatic, smooth and mechanical, she moved from one enemy to the next, ducking into cover only when her shields threatened to fail. The movements formed a dance, a dance of lead, careful timing, and deadly consequences.

"Still two minutes from your position, Shepard," Kaidan shouted back, constant gunfire coming through his mike as well. "We hooked up with your stragglers and are moving in as fast as we can. Meeting heavy resistance of our own here."

"Shit! Do what you can, Sparky." Shepard ducked out, hitting the hacked geth with overload again, then opened fire, trying to pull it down before it reversed her hack.

"Shepard-Captain," a geth voice called through her radio, "additional geth units housed on server 02242-14521 incoming to assist extraction of Team Four. Stand by." A drop ship soared over their heads, heading for Tali's position.

"Roger that." Shepard leaned out just in time to see Wrex blown backwards, three siege pulse blasts hitting him square. He flew three metres through the air to crash into the wall, sliding down into a motionless heap. Her heart stopped, a savage pain ripping down through her arm. "Wrex! Are you okay?" No answer. "Wrex! Answer me goddamn it!" Still nothing. Forcing down panicked sorrow and rage, she controlled her urge to run to the krogan's side, focusing her emotions into blowing the destroyer closing on him to hell.

An explosion rose up over the walls from the second AA tower, sending a lightning burst of relief sizzling along her nervous system. At last, they could call in the shuttle. A second later, the sound of gunfire erupted in Shepard's ear again.

"Skipper, the geth destroyed the elevator down to the breeding shed. We're fighting our way backward toward your position the long way, but there's too many of them. Vakarian, Kirrahe, and I are all wounded. I can't walk, so I'm going to hold here, try to keep them off the team and you."

"Ashley!" Shepard hollered over Roger's staccato beat as she tore into a rocket trooper. "Get your ass back here. You still have seven minutes. Even fighting backwards, you can make it." An explosion against Shepard's shields threw her backwards, leaving the radio channel open. She shook her head, clearing dizziness and water from her vision. "Nihlus, get that damned shuttle in here!" Scrambling up out of the water, she darted for new cover at the back of the field. They should be moving forward, but instead, the geth just kept coming. She took out another trooper with an overload, then finished off the one prime.

"Go!" Ashley hollered. "Jenkins, what the hell? I ordered you out of here."

"You're too badly wounded. You won't be able to hold them off. They'll hit us from behind." Shepard heard scuffling. Why were they wrestling instead of getting out?

Shepard opened fire on a rocket trooper that had Nihlus pinned, hammering the Spectre's position with a constant barrage of ML-77 shells. "What's going on there?" she yelled over the sound of Ashley cursing. "People, whatever you're doing, get the hell over here. We're on a deadline."

Continuing fire, she exploded the heretic's head, showering Nihlus in white fluid.

"Garrus, take the chief," Jenkins called. More scuffling, then Williams yelling. Shepard couldn't make out the words. Jenkins's voice came through clearly again. "Go, get to Shepard." Gunfire interrupted him. "You can make it if you run. I'll hold them."

The huge gate on the other side of the field opened, Sparky and his team running out to scatter behind cover. Hope burst like a nova in Shepard's chest, lighting up the stormy darkness. A few more guns might only provide a long shot of survival, but it was still a shot.

"Glory hallelujah, Sparky," she said, her voice panting and breathless. "I've never been so glad to see your handsome mug."

"Can't say the same, ma'am." He ran across to take a position next to her, his rifle peppering the geth ranks with rounds.

Shepard ducked behind the cover. "Ashley? Jenkins? Team Two, what the hell is going on?"

Nihlus slid in behind a turbine casing next to Shepard's position. "Shuttle is on the way, but we need air support, or we're dead."

The young corporal's voice answered Shepard's call. "You were right, Captain . . . Jane. It's about knowing who to take the bullet for and when. I hope you think I made the right choice. When you take down Saren, have a cranberry juice for me."

"Jenkins, get your ass down here!" she screamed into the radio. A prime strode around their cover on the right. All three of them opened fire, the giant machine going down, but not before Sparky fell back against Shepard, blood bursting from his chest.

"It's been an honour, Captain," Jenkins said as Shepard scrambled to turn Kaidan around so she could check his wound. "Been saving something for you, Jane: 'Go with me, like good angels, to my end; and, as the long divorce of steel falls on me, make of your prayers one sweet sacrifice, and lift my soul to heaven.'"

Shepard hit Kaidan's medigel three times, then pulled him tighter in behind cover.

Jenkins's words, taken from Henry VIII balled in her throat, strangling her voice. "Not a betrayal," she whispered into the open channel. "You die a hero not a traitor, beautiful boy. We'll be proven to be the patriots in the end." The radio remained as quiet as death, so she closed the channel.

Shepard bent over Kaidan, scanning him with her omnitool. Unconscious, but alive. She clenched her jaw so hard that her teeth ground together, grumbling as she pressed her hand to Alenko's cheek, "Don't you dare die on me, Sparky."

Looking out, she saw that they'd finally started making headway against the tide. "Move up, drive those bastards off the edge," she yelled. "Keep closing in the landing area. Ash's team will make it any minute." She ducked out, running a handful of metres forward. "We just have to hold until she arrives!"

"Shepard," Joker's voice practically screamed in her ear. "The geth probe at the relay just recorded Sovereign taking off through the relay like a bat out of hell. Incoming for pick up, now. Which team? I need coordinates."

"Pick up Ash's team. Hold. I'll have her contact you." Shepard closed that channel. "Team Two. Ashley. Joker is incoming to pick up your team. You need to send him coordinates."

"Aye, ma'am, sending now." Ashley's voice came through rough, every other word or so forced out, no doubt by her bouncing along on Garrus's shoulder.
"Shepard, out." Before the channel closed, a massive explosion tore through her head, deafening her and dropping her to one knee. Wind roared . . . heavy objects . . . bodies . . . impacted . . . then screaming. The channel cut out.

"Jesus!" Shepard reeled from the pain in her head, calling out even though she could barely hear her own voice. "Ashley! Garrus! Anyone from Team Two, come in!"

No reply.

Shepard jumped out of cover, striding toward the landing zone. Roger took out a small squad of drones as she clicked over into automatic. "You bastards heard what the Reapers intend to do with you, for fuck's sake!" she screamed over the din, the constant aural insanity. She fired without pause, her shields complaining as rounds pelleted her.

Nihlus went down, but managed to drag himself behind cover and stagger back to his feet.

Shepard stopped halfway toward the landing zone and turned a circle. Nearly all of her people lay in the water, a couple still fighting, others dead . . . their eyes staring into nothing. Her omnitool beeped, letting her know three minutes left before the bomb under them detonated.

"Garrus," she whispered.

The shuttle swooped in from the west, swinging around as the VI brought it in for pickup, but eight geth including the two primes stood between her people and evac. Impossible.

Someone hit her hard, driving her behind cover. Looking up, she saw salarian eyes blinking at her. "Rentola?"

He said nothing, just leaning out to open fire, stopping, his mouth gaping as he stared up into the sky. Shepard followed his stare. A geth dropship soared in low, sweeping just above the walls. Geth units began dropping to the ground, curled into balls, arms hugging their knees. They unfolded, three-fingered hands reaching behind their backs for guns. The salarian fell, a mist of green blood spraying across Shepard's face.

Shepard closed her eyes and for the first time in a very long time, she found herself praying.

If you're out there, please, save my people.

Your god has abandoned you, Jane Shepard. It left you to the batarians, and it has left you to us.

The newcomers opened fire. Shepard opened her eyes, looking up as the Normandy soared overhead and then took off up into the clouds. A geth juggernaut stepped behind Shepard's cover. She stared up into that unblinking light bulb, numb . . . but not quite finished as the giant machine bent down. She swung Roger around, aiming for that soulless eye, but before she could squeeze the trigger, the geth picked Rentola up in its arms and started toward the shuttle.

"Shepard-Captain," Legion called, "you must evacuate."

Shock, cold and dizzying, left her swaying, confused. Hard, cold fingers grabbed her wrist and dragged her toward the shuttle. "Come. Only ninety seconds remain to escape the blast range."
The shuttle launched Shepard across the small cargo area as the blast wave of the explosion slammed into its hind end, sending it slewing through space like a car on black ice. The lights flickered and then died, and for a moment, as she lay face first over Wrex and Sparky, she thought they hadn't made it. But then the small vehicle settled, the systems rebooted, and light returned. Legion lifted her off the wounded and sat her back down.

"Shepard-Captain, this unit recommends the use of a restraining device to avoid injuring yourself or others," the geth said. It stood, casually swaying with the turbulence, gripping a handle anchored to the roof.

Shepard nodded, still not quite able to find her voice, and did up her harness. So few inhabited the shuttle with her even though they were packed in like sardines. Half of the occupants were geth . . . their saviours. She stared at her hand, knowing it should be lifting to her radio, because although she'd been aboard the shuttle for nearly three minutes, she hadn't called the Normandy … hadn't insisted on finding out the fate of the other two teams.

You got arrogant and cocky, Janey, and it cost you a whole lot of good people. It may have cost you—

She pushed that nightmare aside and looked up to see Nihlus staring at her from across the tiny cargo bay filled with the wounded bodies of their people. The compassion in those eyes stabbed into her like a thousand white hot needles. She didn't deserve it and tore her gaze away, fixing it on the blood shining black against Kaidan's armour.

She'd gone in thinking she knew her enemy . . . that the enemy would never see her coming, never anticipate someone like her. A bitter cough of derisive laughter sliced through the shuttle noises and silence.

The silence slips along right under the noise. The truth under the noise. Listen to the truth under the noise.

Squeezing her eyes shut, she allowed the fear Sovereign had provoked to spread through her, feeling through it with clammy, shaking fingers to find the truth buried beneath. The Reapers did not invent, she knew that with the certainty born of fifty thousand years. They did not create or imagine. They were machines, limited by the constraints of their creation, as the geth were, but in different ways. They hadn't evolved any more than the geth evolved into the galaxy. Someone had built them, but who and why?

Sovereign said that Reaper motives didn't matter, but … Shepard suspected those motives would prove to mean everything.

Haven't you forgotten someone, Janey? It's not going to go away because you ignore it.
No. She let out a long breath and opened her eyes, even her distraction attempt failing to keep her heart from pulling back to the news she didn't want to hear. She looked up at Nihlus again, asking the question with her eyes. She couldn't do it. She just couldn't ask if she'd killed him.

A single nod answered her, and he reached up to his earpiece. "Normandy, Kryik here. Status?" His mandibles fluttered as he paused, mouth partially open. He sighed and closed it, head cocking a little as he listened. "The Captain is uninjured, Joker." He paused, brow plates descending into a frown. "Joker … ." A rumble rolled from deep in his throat. "Joker! Enough … yes, fine. Next time, I'll lead with that. What is the status of the ship and crew?"

Shepard closed her eyes, taking deep breaths, centering herself. It had been so long since she allowed herself to care about someone. Everyone left her in one form or another eventually. Well, except for Anderson. Some day even Martin would find his wings and soar away. As splendid as that day would be, it would also prove the rule. Everyone left.

"The geth pulled out Team Four," Nihlus said. "Tali'Zorah and Kal'Reegar have minor injuries. Rael'Zorah is seriously wounded and needs evac to the Normandy as soon as we get back." He paused, nodding to himself. "Normandy was able to dust off Team Two survivors. Vakarian, Williams, and Kirrahe are injured, but stable."

Shepard's eyes opened, latching onto his. His mandibles fluttered in a gentle smile as he nodded.

Garrus was okay. A relieved hiccup of sound escaped before she clamped her teeth down on it.

"ETA to Normandy is seven minutes," Nihlus continued. "Alenko, Wrex, the salarian Commander Rentola are injured." After a second, he nodded. "Roger, Normandy. Kryik out." He met and held Shepard's stare. "Garrus was injured, but he's not in danger."

She nodded, eyes dropping. "Thanks. I thought I'd … ." She cut that thought off as its dagger broke the skin. The night before he'd carried her to bed. No. She shook her head, and swiped at the sudden dampness in the corner of her eye. She looked up at Legion. "Geth casualties?"

"Runtimes in three prime and seven smaller platforms destroyed without sufficient time to upload to the server. All other runtimes uploaded before memory core loss," the geth reported.

A short sigh acknowledged its words. "Thank you, Legion. Without the geth, none of us would have escaped."

"Shepard-Captain believes in geth. She has agreed to aid geth in achieving coexistence with galactic civilization. Her organic platform must remain functional."

A grateful smile just touched the corners of her mouth. "You saved my people. You have my gratitude forever, Legion. You and the geth."

The geth came through where God failed me yet again. There's a lesson in there somewhere.

When the shuttle landed in the Normandy's cargo bay, Shepard helped move the injured to stretchers, leaving Wrex to the primes as they were the only ones who could move him without resorting to sticking antigrav generators on him.

"Captain Shepard?" Rentola asked, regaining consciousness as she pushed him into the elevator. "The others?"

She grasped the cold hand that reached up. "We got your non-combatants out. Kirrahe and two others are injured but stable. The rest died on the planet. I'm sorry." She eased him back onto the "Rest easy. My people will take good care of you."

Garrus lay unconscious on one of the beds when she entered medbay, but she passed him by. She'd come back as soon as everyone was sorted. As captain, she needed to take care of her people before indulging herself.

She almost believed the excuse.

Back in the shuttle, hopping across to the geth ship, Shepard looked up at Legion. "Next stop, Rannoch? We'll have to meet up with the flotilla, but then we need to make a plan for dealing with Saren and Sovereign. I'm going to get Anderson there for sure, but I'm hoping he can convince Admiral Hackett to come along as well. Sovereign is not going to go down without a fight."

"Affirmative."

On the geth ship, they effected a quick exchange of geth units and dextro food supplies for Tali, Kal'Reegar and Rael'Zorah.

Shepard stood beside the shuttle as the VI fired up the thrusters and held out her hand to Legion. "Thank you, my friend. We'll see you at Rannoch tomorrow morning."

The geth stared at her hand for a moment before reaching out to take it. Its head flaps danced, but it said nothing as it shook once, then released her.

"We're pulling out, Tali," she called. A few metres away, Tali reassured the cargo bay full of quarian youth that they would be returned to their families in the morning in the heavens above their homeworld.

The ride back to the Normandy passed in near silence but for the wheezing rattle of Rael'Zorah's breathing and the odd beep from Tali's omnitool as she keyed information into it at a prodigious speed.

After a few minutes, Tali must have felt Shepard watching her and looked up. "I'm sending requisitions and relaying Father's orders back to the flotilla. We're going to land the first expeditionary survey team on the homeworld when we arrive tomorrow."

"Good." Shepard smiled and shook her head. "After what happened today, I know you couldn't be in any better hands. Legion will look out for you and your team."

Tali let her arm drop, her omnitool sliding down to hang over her thigh. "Two of the primes blocked the path behind us so we could escape. They didn't say anything, didn't act like it was anything special for two massive geth platforms containing thousands of runtimes to die saving a bunch of quarians." She turned to look into Shepard's face, those silver, reflective glints behind the mask blinking quickly. "But it was the most remarkable thing to have happened in three hundred cycles of quarian history."

Shepard nodded, unable to find any words to add to the perfection of that statement. Instead, she reached out and squeezed Tali's fingers. Feeling those slender digits trembling in hers, Shepard held on to them for the few moments it took for the shuttle to hop back to the Normandy.

Enraged krogan bellows set Shepard running the moment she stepped down off the shuttle, Wrex making himself plainly heard even through the deck plating. As she stood in the elevator, waiting as it crawled up to the crew deck, Shepard vowed to find a way to put in a flight of stairs. The cacophony ramped up to deafening as the elevator opened, Dr. Chakwas and Nihlus adding to the din.
"What the hell is going on in here?" she hollered as she burst through the medbay door. A very naked Wrex barrelled down the length of the cabin, stumbling right at the threshold, one massive arm flailing out to grab hold of her. Staggering, Shepard managed to avoid getting crushed and stay on her feet, but if the krogan thought she'd be able to hold him, she felt sure that reality asserted itself when the deck plating came up to smack him in the face.

"Urdnot Wrex is in no condition to leave this medbay," the doctor insisted, striding over to help wrestle her patient up off the floor.

"I'm regenerating just fine," he roared. "Let go of me and stop poking at me with your damned needles and knives." He staggered up onto his feet and tilted, slamming into the wall. Once propped up there, he looked down at Shepard. "I just need to eat. There's nothing broken that won't heal fine on its own."

Shepard looked from him to the doctor then back. "You got hit with enough firepower to leave a half metre hole straight through me. Maybe you should just let the Doc do her thing, indulge her a little." She leaned in close, lowering her voice to a near-whisper. "Can't hurt to have a handsome woman fawn over you a bit, can it?"

His huge eyes narrowed as he leaned forward until his face was pressed against her nose. "You mean, you think the Doc is after my hump?" He sounded drunk, probably thanks to all the blood draining from his brain to repair his enormous body.

"Who could resist? Seriously? Look at those battle wounds." Shepard reached up and placed her hand on the crest of his head plate. "If I wasn't spoken for, sir … you would be in serious trouble."

"Ha!" He straightened. "Fine, but she can look after me in my corner of the cargo bay. I'm not staying up here." He staggered out the door a couple of metres then stopped. "Kryik, quit staring, and give me a hand."

Nihlus brushed past Shepard, giving her a quick wink and a smile as he went by. "Why would I be staring at you, krogan?"

Wrex chuffed, a harsh cough of sound that echoed like an explosion around the galley. "You could only dream of having a quad like this."

Nihlus laughed. "I can't say I've got room for a quad, and the rest, well … let's just say it's a good thing what I've got stays tucked away. A jealous krogan is an ugly thing."

Shepard winced. "All right, you can just take that down to the cargo bay. Sweet baby Jesus, you two. None of us can un-hear that." She stepped out of the way as Rael'Zorah's stretcher came around the corner.

Dr. Chakwas sighed. "It's just as well we have the room, I suppose, but really, Shepard? Now I have a krogan battlemaster thinking I'm after his quad."

Shepard winced. "Everyone stop talking about Wrex's personal bits, please." She waited until they moved Rael to a bed then squeezed past to where Garrus slept on a cot against the wall. A large regen cage enclosed most of his chest while a smaller one worked on his upper arm and shoulder.

Leaning down, she stroked her fingertips over his fringe then crouched by his side. "I'm so sorry, Garrus. I should've been . . . ."

_Your god has abandoned you, Jane Shepard. It left you to the batarians, and it has left you to us._
Choking down a hoarse sob, she bent to touch her brow to his then shoved herself up and pushed through to the door. Once clear of the crowded medbay, she turned and bolted across the galley, slamming the door control to her quarters. Surrounded by dark and quiet, she stumbled over to her desk.

Your god has abandoned you, Jane Shepard. It left you to the batarians, and it has left you to us.

Another hiccoughing sob forced its way out of her throat, dropping her to her knees. Shoving the chair out of the way, she crawled underneath. Her back pressed into the corner, she drew her knees up to her chest and hugged her arms around them. She trembled, her entire body shivering with a chill that radiated not from the air around her, but from that dark place inside where the spiders hid. How long had they been there? Had they truly invaded that day on the Citadel? Something in the way Sovereign spoke of god having abandoned her to them said no. No, the spiders had made their home inside her far, far earlier.

Slipping beneath the surface again, tentative thoughts sifting like fingers trying to find a coin in the mud at the bottom of a dark pond, she searched for the hidden context under what Sovereign had said to her. Layers of whispers drifted through her head, stacked so that she could just about hear one before another drifted past. She wished she could talk to Tashac, certain that the prothean would understand. Then again, maybe not Tashac. Wise, god yes, the female had been wise, but she'd also been a soldier to the core. She'd never discovered her own voice of council, never been able to find true peace. Well, except for one place. For Tashac, peace existed in the form of a person.

The darkness has been watching you your whole life, Jane Shepard. It's waiting for you out there.

She pressed her eyes closed and rested her forehead on her knees.

"Shepard?" A faint knocking rattled the door on its hinges. "You in there?" The door swung open, a crack of light spreading across the floor. "Jane Shepard, are you in here?" Heavy footsteps crossed the pristine white of the tile floor, marring it with the man's shadow.

She didn't bother to look out. He'd find her. It wasn't like he didn't know where to look.

Sure enough, twenty seconds later, Anderson crouched down, one hand on the top of her desk, the other resting on his knee. "Hey, kid."

Nodding toward the floor next to her, she replied, "Hey." She laughed, but it came out dry and bitter, a desert wind making promises of plagues to come. "How far did they drag you this time?"

He shrugged, groaning a little as he lowered himself onto the floor, sitting cross-legged. "Not far. I was on leave on Arcturus." He sighed and wrapped his arms around his knees. "So, when are you going to get out of here? Three months is a long time for a perfectly sane person to spend in a place like this." He winced as a wail echoed down the hall as if to emphasize his point.

"They shut me in here in the dark, Anderson." She gestured up to the empty light socket. "They tell me that it's important for me to learn that there's nothing to be afraid of. They don't get it, Anderson. They don't know that it's alive, that it moves when you aren't looking." She glanced over at a deep pool of black gathered behind the door. "They don't know how many monsters can hide in it."

He jerked stiff, suddenly giving off a rage that made her pull back from him. "They do what?" He climbed to his feet then reached down, holding out a hand. "Come out of there, and get dressed." Shaking the hand at her when she didn't move instantly, he said, "Come on. I'm going to the administrator, and then I'm taking you the hell out of here."

Shepard eased out from under the desk and took his hand, letting him pull her up onto her feet. When she didn't move—they'd never let him take her—he strode over to her locker and pulled everything out, tossing it onto the bed. His every movement screamed fury, and she winced back from him. She'd never seen Anderson angry before.

At the door, he turned back. "If I take you to Earth, and we get a home ... you'll have to stay with people while I'm away. You okay with that, kid?"

She nodded, pressing herself up against the wall.

"Nothing to be afraid of ... " he grumbled, turning away. "Goddamn idiots." He pushed her door wide, letting in the light from the hall, before striding out. "Get dressed."

"Shepard?"

She jumped, cracking her head against the underside of her desk. "Ow, goddamn it." She squinted against the sudden light of her lamp. "Nihlus? What's going on?" Lifting a hand to shade her eyes, she stared at the Spectre crouched next to her desk. "What are you doing in here?"

"I was looking for you. Someone said you were in here, but you didn't answer the door. I came in to make sure you're okay, and I find you hiding under a desk." He backed up a bit. "You all right?"

She nodded. "I needed to think. Did you hear what Sovereign said at the end, Nihlus?"

He sat down. "What part? That thing did a lot of talking."

She unfolded a little but tucked her hands into her armpits, not wanting him to see how badly they shook. "The part about god having abandoned me." When she looked up into his eyes, he stared back as if he could see past every mask she wore, all the way down into the center of her. The dark center where a terribly naive child lay out in the cold. A corpse with a heartbeat, that child prayed to a deaf God that the horrors being visited upon her amounted to nothing more than some terrible dream. Those unanswered prayers devolved into the screams of the damned as the dark unleashed its monsters upon her again.

The dark. It always came back to the dark.

"Shepard?" He pulled off his glove and held out his hand, lifting it to where she could see it. "Look."

She did, able to see his talons trembling.

He chuffed, sort of halfway between a snort and a chuckle. "Twenty cycles of walking into every sort of fight imaginable, and they still do that after days like today." Turning it over, he held it out to her. "Come on, maybe we'll cancel one another out."

After a moment, she slipped her hand into his, the palm warm and calloused, pushing back the chill seeping through her. He turned to lean against the desk, and slipped an arm around her, pulling her in against his side. "Okay, better. Now, talk to me about hiding under a desk in the dark. I might not be as observant or perceptive as Vakarian, but even I've figured out how much you hate the dark."

Suddenly, exhausted down into the very center of her, Shepard leaned into him, resting her head against his shoulder. She tried to explain what was going on a couple of times in different ways, but she couldn't even manage to figure out her own thought process. The truth danced tantalizingly close to her grasp only to dodge away when she tried to grab hold of it.

After opening and closing her mouth for the third time, she let out a long sigh. "I don't know, Nihlus. I thought Sovereign might have been saying something more than what it seemed on the surface. It laced something under the words, a whisper … something that just felt as though it reached a lot deeper."

The arm around her squeezed gently. "Shepard, stop worrying about making it sound sane, and just say it. I already know you're crazy."

She dug her elbow into his side. "Nice." Still, she took a deep breath and unleashed the crazy … the real crazy. It took a couple of seconds to chain the wild varren that even mentioning the memories unleashed in her guts. "The batarians staked me out in the center of their holding area. They blindfolded me and put a hood over my head, so I was in complete darkness most of the time." She squeezed his hand as the tremors got worse, her whole body trembling but distant and numb. The wall between her and the reality of those hours held, solid and rooted in age.

The long breath in squeezed out as a sigh past the fist gripping her throat. "Have you ever looked into a perfectly harmless patch of darkness and felt as though it had eyes? That something within the shadows was always there, watching and waiting?"

His handsome head dipped a little. "I don't think anyone who has seen and done what we have can honestly admit otherwise." A frown lowered the white sweeps of his familia notas over his eyes as he squeezed her hand. "This is what you were worried about asking me?" Another sigh whistled through his nose. "Shepard, we know what's out there, and we know that evil rarely shows itself. The monsters are real, and they hide in plain sight, waiting to come at you from behind. That's not crazy. That's reality."

She curled in against him. Of all the people to understand, she never expected Nihlus. Maybe she should have after what he told her about his mother. Maybe she should have. "Nihlus, the darkness found me when I was sixteen. It crawled into that hood and inside me. I thought the batarians put it there, but now … ." Shepard squeezed her eyes closed, walling up the faint colours and scents that leaked through before they could turn into anything substantial. "I think Sovereign was telling me that the Reapers have always been the ones behind it."

He rested his cheek against the top of her head, his mandible moving ever-so-slightly back and forth through her hair. "We need to talk to the rachni queen. We both know we got more information from that beacon. Maybe there will be something in there to help us figure out what the hell to do about Saren and his Reaper."

Shepard nodded. "I know. They will find a way to get one of the keys eventually. They will carve a wide, ugly swath through the galaxy trying to find one. I'm going to have Anderson grab Hackett and meet us at Rannoch tomorrow. We need to set a trap, and it has to be a good one. That thing might be an arrogant hunk of organic metal paste crap, but damn, it's a hell of a lot more clever than I gave it credit for. It'll see through just about anything we come up with."

Nihlus pulled away and shoved himself up onto his feet, groaning like an old man the whole time. "Spirits, I'm getting to be too old for days like today." He held out his hand to help her up.

"I've always been too old for days like today." She elbowed him. "Besides, you can't be much more than what? Seventy?" One large hand planted between her shoulder blades and gave her a shove, sending her stumbling into the bed. "What? Too young?" She chuckled, affection warming her through. Before Therum, she would never have guessed they'd ever recover let alone find somewhere so much better.
He smiled, but wistfully. "I suppose I'm an old man compared to you."

She shoved him that time, not doing much more than making him sway a little. "Please, you act way younger and more stupid than I do, although I have you on the crazy." Nodding toward the door, she led the way. "Come on, let's go see what the rachni queen can do to help us sort this mess."

"I've been a Spectre twenty cycles," he said as they crossed the mess, heading for the elevator. "I was solid. Solid as hell. Every mission tougher than the one before. I set a plan, and although even at my most bloodthirsty I never came close to being as ruthless as Saren, I got the job done. People in the way moved aside or were mowed down." He shook his head, mandibles dropped. "What has happened to me since Eden Prime?"

Shepard palmed the elevator control. "I don't know, but maybe you just came to a place where what happened with Saren forced you into a hard reset." Leaning against the wall as the lift ground its way up to them, she shrugged, remembering their battle of wills on Eden Prime. "I did think you'd be a much harder fight. I admit that I take charge, bulldoze over or around people, but yeah, I thought you'd fight me a lot harder for control."

He stepped past her as the door opened. "Hard reset. Hmm." He cocked his head a little to one side, his mandibles sweeping slowly out and back in. "Maybe. I suppose, this is about the time in a torin's life he stops to consider how he wants to live the next third of his life." He leaned his shoulder against the back wall. "I always felt like a big part of the picture just wasn't there. I didn't know what part it was, so just tried to ignore it. Well, and fixated on someone I could turn into perfection inside my head. Someone who'd never disappoint because she was always out of reach."

Shepard's head shake barely registered as movement. "Whatever made you decide to open your perfect lie to the harsh glare of reality?" She punched the control to emphasize the word lie, a trickle of bitterness weaving through her words. Building someone into an effigy of perfection only to let them burn for the sin of being a disappointment could hardly be considered fair. It wasn't her fault he possessed an exceptional imagination. "Surely, you had to know that I'd never live up to that woman."

He stepped right up to the door, placing her behind him. "Who said I meant you? Spirits, Shepard, your ego."

Shepard straightened, keen-edged and bright. "Oh wait! I get it. Now all the injuries make sense. It's Dr. Chakwas, isn't it? Damn, she is one seriously popular lady."

He laughed. "Maybe once, but there's no way I'm fighting Wrex for her." He stepped out as soon as it opened, heading for the back corner of the cargo bay where the queen had made herself a nest of sorts behind a barrier of crates. Stopping as they reached the back end of the shuttle, he looked over at her. "Some things are worth taking a shot at. Maybe they'll disappoint, but maybe they'll turn out so much better than you hope."

She hesitated for a second as the bitterness rose up to choke her. Not having the slightest clue what to do with herself under his scrutiny, she pushed on. "Nihlus, I really am sorry if I'm never more than you hoped. But it's just not fair—"

Nihlus caught her elbow, vice-like talons squeezing hard enough to hurt. "Shepard, you already are." Their eyes locked for a moment, then he shrugged and jutted his chin toward the crate wall. "Come on, let's see what that beacon stuck in our heads."

Setix 26.2, 4521 of Kirash Par
Tashac walked out onto the balcony, her eyes drawn up to the stars the moment she stepped out the door. Ribbons of light danced amidst the indigo and obsidian, calling out to her … beckoning her back into their embrace. Bright and clear, each crystalline jewel sang with the promise of a new civilization, a hope for the future of her beloved galaxy. She closed her eyes, trying to draw their light into her, focusing it into a laser to burn away the darkness at the heart of her.

Soon now. Soon I’ll return to you for the last time.

"I believe I have dedicated an adequate amount of time to hanging upside down inside the drive core tonight," Merol called. She opened her eyes to watch her mate as he stepped out of the large shed across from the house. He wiped his hands on a rag, then threw it over his shoulder. "Our wings should be ready to unfurl and carry us back into the heavens in two days."

"Excellent." She leaned against the railing. "I have ensured the remainder of our affairs will keep until we return." She glanced up at the mountain side, unable to see the evidence of her work in the darkness.

Every five cycles, they left the isolation and peace of their mountain home and returned to Ilos, slipping amongst the sleeping stars. The relays burned like candles at a funeral, the sight of them rekindling the melancholy that shrouded the core of her spirit. Through that void of light and peace, a terrible darkness moved, silent and swift, hunting from star to star. Her eyes closed once more, blocking out that soulless gaze.

"Even now?" Merol asked, his arms slipping around her from behind.

She laced her fingers with his, pulling his arms tighter around her. "Always, my heart. Always." Turning within his embrace, she wrapped her arms around him, burrowing in against his solid warmth. "I looked into that thing, and it looked into me." A shudder rolled through her, travelling down into the mountain beneath her feet, even the stone trembling at the memory of staring into that abyss.

The memory of that presence invading her soul formed the reason behind their return trips to Ilos. It whispered through her dreams and out of the shadows, promising to discover a way to recover the Conduit, something she couldn't allow.

Somehow we missed you, the silent voice called out. But we see you now. We are a part of you now.

"I admit that I am weary, haksaya kubenar," Merol whispered. "I shall not mourn this being our last return to that silent, sleeping grave. Time to let this good, clean ground cradle us into our ancient days then embrace us at last."

The sound of singing drifted on the cool breeze, dragging her from the darkness, Merol becoming solid and warm within the circle of her arms once more. The blue natives—asari—sang in their village below, the night marking one of the celebrations on their calendar.

"Shall the mysterious monks of the mountain grace their festival tonight?" she asked. "I would welcome a merry fire and some of their hot, spiced wine." Although they needed to remain cloaked and veiled amidst the beautiful primitives, Tashac enjoyed their company.

"Several kilos of those preserved fruits that caught the matriarch's fancy still adorn our parlour shelf," Merol replied, chuckling. "Such a gift is certain to earn us platters teeming with roast jikuru and those tubers from the south slope."
Being such a long-lived species, generosity formed an important pillar of asari culture, gift-giving the tradition of welcome and thanks. Tashac appreciated such simple lenity after the exigent selfishness and hoarding that blemished the empire's twilight.

She chuckled. "Always with you, desire distills down to your belly, light of my soul." Pulling away, she brushed her brow along the ridge of his kepala. "Come, let the monks of the mountain partake of the celebration of Athame's light. It seems only fitting, Athame and her disciples being protheans, after all." She glanced up at the brightest star in the sky named for the asari's goddess.

Out beyond that star, deep beneath the surface of Ilos's long-dead corpse, she and Merol would marry fifteen cycles of planning and craft to ensure that the monsters never returned to rain their evil upon the galaxy's barely born children. One last defiant strike on behalf of the dead to preserve the living.
Chapter Summary

The aftermath from Virmire continues, spreading out like ripples.

Shepard opened her eyes and looked over at Nihlus, a slow smile blooming across her face as the memory of Tashac and Merol's last return to Ilos played out inside her mind, flowing along the strands of the rachni queen's song.

Nihlus leaned in, the movement as natural as breathing, caressing his brow along her hairline. "We've got the start of a plan," he whispered, his tone almost reverent, as if he feared that speaking the words too loudly might jinx everything. "They knew ... she knew that this day would come."

Gratitude and love drove out the darkness, leaving Shepard filled with the most wonderful peace, even if just for a short time. Fifteen years those two worked to create an insurance policy, an insurance policy that gave the younger races an even better shot of preventing the Reapers' return. The protheans might not have had the resources or expertise remaining to destroy the keys, but they had done the next best thing.

"Ribbons of corruption as broad and dark as a river flowing through stone taint the mighty one's spirit," Shiala said. She sat cross-legged on a low crate, eyes closed, swaying ever so slightly to the rhythm of the whispers that coloured the air around the queen. "Teeth of metal and blood. Violet whispers of madness."

Tashac looked up from her tools, staring into the darkness of the Conduit chamber for nearly a minute, chasing the whispers that coiled through her mind. Fifteen cycles she'd fought off the darkness, refusing to look into the void that yawned within her. Fifteen cycles she'd worked to silence the whispers that warned her the Conduit would never be truly safe from the Vanguard. She turned from her work to look into Merol's eyes. "Is this my will, or after all this time, have they finally made me their hands?"

Stepping around her to check her work, Merol asked, "Are you afraid they'll sabotage it through you?"

"No, my heart. I'm afraid that the last fifteen cycles have been spent pursuing the monster's goals." She closed her eyes, but reached out to take her mate's hand. "The whispers say it will work, but are they mine or its?"

Merol pulled her into his arms. "I trust you to know your own mind and heart, mother of my last children ... to see how far the stain has spread."

Tashac buried her face in against his neck, the darkness around them reaching out to pull her in, tendrils as cold and dark as midwinter wrapping around her, searching for a way in. "I do not, haksaya kubenar. I no longer trust anything but you."

Shepard blinked, the silent stillness of Ilos taking a moment to pull back completely. Even when it did, the terrible doubt remained. "She spent fifteen years creating a plan to ensure the Conduit could never be used only to doubt at the last moment whether it was her plan at all."
"Deep and ebony the enemy digs its burrows, staining blood and bone, heart and will with its discord." The queen dipped her head, tucking her beak in along her leg. "Crimson and steel claw into the foundation until the good, strong surface succumbs, collapsing into hues of such sadness that to hear them shatters the soul." Shiala opened her eyes, midnight black staring straight into Shepard. "They paint their terrible cacophony within you even now."

"Shepard?" Tali's voice spoke in Shepard's ear, her tone soft and nasal, breaking through the thunder of Shepard's own heartbeat drumming in her head.

Shepard blinked back the shimmering, disorienting blanket draped over her thoughts and tore her eyes away from the asari's. Through that fathomless stare, she felt the queen's thoughts and song slipping their feelers through her mind, searching for her soul. She jumped up, the action severing the connection like a sharp knife. "Shepard here."

"If you have a few minutes, my father wishes to speak with you, Captain," the quarian repled.

Using the movements to order and smooth out her thoughts, Shepard dusted off her clothes. "Oh my way, Tali. Is he still in medbay?"

"No, he wanted to be back in his own cot, have some privacy."

"I'm on my way. Shepard, out." She looked to the queen and smiled, though it felt forced. Even though she knew the truth for both herself and Tashac, no one was welcome inside her mind or spirit no matter their intentions. Still, without the queen, the beacon's visions would amount to nothing more than nightmare fuel.

"Thank you, so much, Amalair. We would never have understood any of this without your help." She bowed her head a little to Shiala. "Or yours. Thank you."

"They sing such sweet music of victory, burying lies beneath such sweet, golden desires," Shiala said, her eyes still black voids. "They whisper promises in rose and lavender, of open skies and wings, but if you listen, you become their claws and their teeth." The asari blinked, emerald irises appearing once more. She slid her legs out from under her and stood, walking over to take Shepard's hands in hers. "Be careful, Shepard. I hear their song within you even now."

Jerking her head in two, sharp nods, Shepard pulled back. "Thank you."

Nihlus got up and gave the rachni a shallow, rigid bow. "Thank you, Amalair. Shiala."

Shepard led the way out into the main part of the cargo bay, cutting a glance across at him. "We'll meet after we reach the flotilla? See if we can figure all this out before we have to present everyone with a plan to save the galaxy?" Despite the queen's dire warnings, hope sparkled like bubbles in clear soda, sprinting for the surface, the giddiness threatening to make her cocky and careless again. But then guilt flung the image of Garrus lying on the cot in medbay at her, dealing arrogance a fatal blow before it could even begin.

He nodded and called the elevator. "Tashac lived with the ghost of her contact with Sovereign haunting her thoughts and her spirit for the rest of her life." He entered the car and stood facing the door, casting only quick glimpses her way. "Do you think she was indoctrinated?"

She understood, grateful for the distance. Fifteen years of growing old together had been turned loose and needed time to get under wraps. "Yeah, and it terrified her, but she used it. Damn, did that woman use it." She reached out, giving in just long enough to squeeze his talons. "And she had Merol. When she said he was her heart … ." She blinked back a slick of tears along her lashes, swallowing the sudden tightness in her jaw. Releasing him, she stepped up to the door, needing to flee the moment it opened. "He really was the beating heart of her." Impatient fingers swatted the few persistent tears from her cheeks.

When the door finally opened, what felt like a lifetime later, Shepard ducked straight across and into the crew area. She needed to get done with her chores and find Garrus. Guilt be damned, she needed to hold him and be held, to tell him how sorry she was. If only she could find the courage to tell him the rest.

"Shepard." Tali hurried over to meet her as she walked into the gym, those delicate hands wringing hard enough to snap the young female's fingers. "Father . . . ." She gulped, her shoulders heaving in a helpless shrug. "He isn't doing well."

Shepard pulled Tali into her arms, wrapping her in a tight hug. An old thread of sorrow worked its way loose, tangling into her empathy for the young woman. Regardless of the relationship, losing a father left a hole that could never be filled. "I'm so sorry, Tali."

"You should have seen him, Shepard," the quarian whispered, her thin arms strong as they clung to Shepard. "He stayed at the base of the ramp, covering the geth retreat. He was like one of the heroes in the tales mother used to tell me."

Shepard pulled back, pressing her hand alongside the young woman's mask. "Of that, I have no doubt."

"Shepard . . . Captain," the admiral called, his voice still strong despite his injuries.

Her fingers lingering on Tali's shoulder, trailing down the suited arm, Shepard pulled away, walking the few strides to Rael'Zorah's cot. "Yes, sir?" She crouched next to his elbow. "How are you feeling?"

He nodded, just a slight tremor of movement. "Your doctor has made me as comfortable as possible." He reached out to grip her upper arm. "I do not have much time. Take us to the flotilla, please."

Shepard smiled, just a tightening of her lips. "Already on our way, Admiral. ETA is just over three hours. Dr. Chakwas is already in contact with surgeons on the flotilla. They'll get you fixed right up." As much as the admiral had driven her to distraction with his arrogance and constant demands, he'd stepped up when it mattered, overcoming generations of fear and hatred. Losing him would hurt her war effort, but more importantly, it would break Tali's heart.

The admiral groaned and shifted a little. "No, Captain. There is nothing they can do. I have maybe a day to prepare. Will you assist me?" His hand lifted from his blankets. "Please."

After staring into the purple mist of his mask for a moment, Shepard reached up and took his hand, trying to impart both her respect and grief through the contact. "Whatever you need, sir."

"Thank you." He let out a long breath, sinking into his blankets. "We need to prepare an expeditionary team to make landfall on Rannoch. When we reach the flotilla, may the members of the Admiralty Board and a squad of marines board?" When she agreed, his head jerked in a firm nod, still every bit the admiral in control. "Good, then we will set course for Rannoch. I swore my life to giving my daughter a home, an oath I am content to have died fulfilling, but I wish to do so with my face uncovered, under the homeworld's skies."

"Then you will, Father." Tali walked around the cot and sat at Rael's side. "Several of the pilgrims have volunteered to make landfall on Rannoch. They seem to believe that helping our people return to the homeworld would make a suitable pilgrimage gift."

Rael chuckled, a wet cough chasing it out, confirming his estimation of how long he had to live. "It will at that, Tali." He touched her shoulder. "You may consider your pilgrimage complete. You will be elevated to captain to lead your crew, the first quarian to bear the title vas Rannoch." He made a soft, humming sound. "Your mother would be so proud of you." Vicious coughing racked his slight frame. "I am so proud of you."

Tali bent over her father, embracing him.

Shepard watched them for a moment, sorrow warring with gratitude that the father and daughter had been gifted those weeks together away from routine and duty. A respect and love that she knew had always been there had finally been allowed to dwell on the surface, where it belonged. She squeezed the admiral's hand. "I'll be back when we reach the flotilla. If either of you need anything, call."

"Thank you, Captain. For everything." Rael'Zorah wrapped his arm around his daughter.

Shepard blinked back the burning in her eyes and walked to the gym door. Dr. Chakwas met her just outside.

"Most patients are stabilized, Captain," the doctor reported. "Rael'Zorah is succumbing to infection, however. His suit is sealed and we're bombarding his system with antibiotics and antihistamines, but they're having very little effect. I estimate he has maybe twenty-four hours."

She leaned against the door frame, exhaustion apparent in every deep line carved around her eyes and mouth, the slump of her shoulders.

"Thanks, Doc. I don't know what we'd do without you." Shepard squeezed Chakwas's hand and headed toward the mess.

"I do, and it wouldn't be pretty. By the way, Ashley's been asking for you," the doctor called after her, "and I released Officer Vakarian about twenty minutes ago. Just try to keep him from exerting himself for a day or two."

Shepard lifted her hand in acknowledgement, but didn't reply, changing her destination from her quarters to medbay, wanting to check up on Ash, Sparky, and the others. When she opened the medbay door, she just stared down the lines of cots. So many wounded, but without the geth, the cabin would have stood empty. Hell, her quarters would have been empty.

"Skipper," Ashley called. The chief pushed back her blankets and struggled to sit up on the side of the bed.

Giving Ash a tight-lipped smile, her face feeling like it would freeze in that position any second, Shepard walked into the room, heading straight for Kaidan's sleeping form. She bent down and pressed a hand against the LT's cheek, the stubble of whiskers sharp against her skin.

"Doc says he came through the surgery in good shape," Ash whispered. "He'll be out of commission for a week or so, but considering he took a couple of rounds through the lung … ."

Shepard straightened and turned to face Ashley. "And you? How are you doing?"

Ashley slid down off the bed, hobbling down to the end. "I made the call, Skipper. I made the decision to stay and hold them off the team. Jenkins … " She shook her head, her shoulders stiffening. "He had no right to countermand my orders. He was just a kid, ma'am." Pushing away from the bed, she paced back and forth across the medbay, hobbling so quickly that Shepard worried she'd end up falling on one of the wounded in the cots. "I should have been the one to stay. I was the one who made the decision to hold."

Shepard watched her for another moment, then walked over and grabbed the chief's shoulders. Holding Ashley in a strong grip, she waited until the younger woman met her eye contact before she said, "Will your grandfather's disgrace, whether real or imagined, be better erased by you dying in a blaze of glory, or by you sticking around to take a leadership role in the war to come?" She raised her eyebrows and gave a little shrug. "I know you have greatness in you, Ash. I can see it as clear as day."

The chief scowled and pulled back, averting her eyes. "Ma'am, I … ."

Shepard sighed and nodded toward the bed. "Get back up there. I need to tell you something, and I don't feel like wrestling with you the whole time." Giving Ash a crooked smile, she gestured toward the bed again. "Go on."

After a moment of rebellion, Williams did as she'd been told and climbed back up.

"Okay, you heard Nazara today, didn't you?" Shepard waited for the chief to answer with a terse nod. "There are a whole lot of his buddies out there in dark space waiting for Saren to give them their ticket back. Even if we stop Saren, do you think the Reapers are just going to shrug and go, 'Oh well, I guess we'll just stay out here then'?"

Ashley sighed. "No, ma'am, I don't." She shook her head. "But that doesn't make that stupid kid throwing himself on my sword any less a waste."

"Shut it!" Shepard barked, storming over. She leaned in, her nose almost touching the chief's. "You will give that brave young man the respect that he deserves. He thought you worthy of the greatest gift he had to give. He thought this war and our eventual victory worthy of it, and I won't listen to you mock that. Is that understood?"

Ashley paled a little and drew back far enough to nod. "Yes, ma'am."

"All I want to hear from you on this subject is how you intend to honour his sacrifice." She threw a furiously pointed finger toward the door. "You have the ability to help lead the war effort. You disproved the family legacy; you stood firm. Now, make it count. I want to hear from you how you're going to step up by the time you leave this medbay, or you can pack your kit and get the hell off my ship. I don't have room on my boat for self-pity. Is that understood, Chief Williams?"

Ashley's back straightened, and she snapped a salute. "Yes, ma'am."

Shepard returned it. "Good." Pivoting on her heel, she marched from the room, not looking anywhere but directly in front of her until she reached her quarters.

The door opened when she palmed the control, revealing Garrus sitting on the corner of her bed. Her gaze followed the slumped and weary lines of his plates up to the arch of his neck, then to his eyes. He'd removed his visor; she could see it glowing on top of her desk, where it lay on his tunic. For a moment, he simply stared back, but then he held out his arms, nodding a little to call her over.

Shepard let out a long breath, practically running across the few metres to step into the welcome comfort. He drew her in, pressing her along his body, and turned his face in against her neck.

Gentle hands caressed the spikes of his fringe before wrapping around his neck, pulling him into a careful embrace. "I almost lost you today," she whispered, pressing her lips against his temple. "I thought I'd gotten you—.

He turned to kiss her. "Sh, Shepard. Can we just get into bed for a couple of hours? I want to hold you." Pulling back a little, he nuzzled her brow, cheeks, nose, and finally her mouth, kissing her deep and slow.

She clung to him, returning the kiss, their mouths fitting so unusually and yet perfectly together. The trembling returned, shaking her from head to foot, but right then it didn't matter in the least. When they pulled apart, Shepard took his face between her hands, thumbs caressing along his cheekbones and mandibles, her eyes trying to take in and memorize every detail at once. "God," she whispered, gratitude and fear and guilt all spinning into a ball that threatened to blow her apart at the seams, "that amazing, brave boy."

She kissed Garrus's brow, cheekbones, and finally his mouth, unable to form perfect words to describe the depth and breadth of the emotions rampaging through her. "He sent you back to me."

Joy. Above them all, joy rose supreme. Joy that she could curl up under the blankets, pressing in against the hard lines of his plates, tuck her face into the curve of his neck and breathe in the perfect scent of him. No amount of gratitude, no number of words … nothing could ever adequately express her thanks for that gift. Nothing but savouring every moment Corporal Richard Jenkins had given them.

"Admirals," Tali called, her voice ringing through the cargo bay, having left behind all sorrow and youth in favour of a confident authority. She strode up to within a couple metres of the Admiralty Board's shuttle. "Thank you for agreeing to meet with us." Turning to Shepard, the quarian held out an arm, both drawing their attention to the captain, but also inviting her forward. "This is Captain Jane Shepard. Captain Shepard, the members of the Admiralty Board of the quarian flotilla."

"Permission to come aboard, Captain?" a female with a warm, heavily accented voice asked.

Shepard stepped up beside Tali. "Of course, permission granted. Welcome aboard the Normandy. If you need anything during your time on board, please do not hesitate to ask myself or any member of the crew."

The quarian stepped down out of the shuttle and approached, her hand extended. "Thank you for your hospitality, Captain, although we're not sure why it's necessary."

"Please, Admiral Raan," Tali said, stilling the restlessness of all three admirals, "my father and I will explain everything." She held a hand out to indicate the admiral. "Captain Shepard, Admiral Shala'Raan vas Tonbay, a close friend of my father's for many cycles." When the only male in the trio walked forward, she said, "Admiral Zaal'Koris vas Qwib-Qwib." She gestured past him to a female who hung back, appearing to want little to do with being there. "And Admiral Daro'Xen vas Moreh."

"Welcome. Please, make yourselves at home." Shepard stepped back, letting Tali take over. In the end, when Rael died, it would be up to Tali to convince the rest of his peers to listen to her. She followed a few metres behind, smiling to herself as the young quarian skillfully skirted their questions and demands. Nihlus fell in with them at the gym door, taking a seat at the back of the small space next to Shepard.

The admirals reacted with horror when they entered the gym and saw the extent of Rael'Zorah's injuries. Despite their very vocal insistence that he be transferred to a quarian medical facility, Tali and Rael convinced them to settle and listen. Over the next four hours, while Shepard wilted in a corner, Rael brought his fellow admirals up to speed. The news of the geth prompted a great deal of yelling and debate, but Rael controlled it before the urge to wade in and start knocking helmets overcame her. The footage of the primes sacrificing themselves for the pilgrims ended the arguments, allowing for planning to start.

Shepard sighed, sliding lower and lower onto the mats as the talk continued. The third thing to come out of Admiral Daro'Xen’s speaker had Shepard vowing to keep a close eye on Legion whenever the admiral was around. "Creepy little thing," she whispered under her breath and shuddered.

An elbow in her side roused her out of a strange dream in which the admirals debated whether or not to serve cake at Tali's pilgrimage ceremony. "What?"

"Tali has her expeditionary force," Nihlus said, pushing up onto his feet. He held out a hand to help her up, holding it when she stood. "Do you always snore like that?"

She punched him in the gut. "You let me snore?"

He nodded and let the way over to the others. "Don't your people have a saying about sleeping lions?"

She kicked him in the ankle, then plastered on a smile to wish the admirals goodnight.

Shepard shook everyone's hand, made sure they would be able to sleep comfortably and then staggered toward her quarters, wanting nothing more than to fall into bed and sleep all the way to Rannoch. An impossible dream, but a pleasant one nonetheless.

Nihlus found her in the galley, shovelling vast amounts of hot chocolate powder into a large mug of boiling hot water. "You look like I feel," he said, collapsing into one of the chairs. "Can we put a hold on that planning meeting until after a solid six hours of sleep?"

Shepard added sugar and creamer to her brew, then a couple of whacks of protein powder just to keep her health critics at bay. "Yes. By the fantastically glowing buttocks of the Enkindlers, yes." She flopped into the chair across from him. "We arrive at Rannoch in four hours. The landing is set for five hours after that. I already called Anderson. He and Hackett are hitching a ride on one of the Shadow Broker's frigates so they can remain incognito. They'll be here for the big homecoming." She blinked a couple of times, the inside of her eyelids feeling too small and lined with sandpaper.

"I wandered off there, didn't I?" she asked. "What was I saying? Oh yeah. We'll be landing on Rannoch in nine hours. Let's get six hours of sleep, barring any emergencies, then we can plan over breakfast."

He nodded and leaned over the table, using it to lever himself up onto his feet. "Gladly. Now, if you'll excuse me, I have a closet waiting. Good night, hak'aya kubenar."

"Good night, Nihlus." Shepard watched him to see if he showed any recognition of what he'd said to her. He didn't, the words coming out of the combination of weariness and lowered barriers.

For a full minute and a half, she stared across the five metres that separated her from her quarters, trying to find the will to move rather than just crawl up on the table and go to sleep. She needed a shower, but there was a better chance of a giant space dragon leaping out of Earth's sun to eat the Reapers then there was of her dragging her carcass into the women's head to shower.

Finally chivvying herself from the chair, she shuffled to the door and into her cabin, stopping a half Shepard opened her eyes and looked up into his, a wry smile twisting her lips hard to one side. "Yeah, I'm glad you think so, but this amazing smell is so not me." She sniffed inside the collar of her uniform. "Nope, way more gun oil, sweat, and smoke than flowers and spice."

He chuckled and bent to kiss her, just a soft brush of mouths, the tip of his tongue teasing her upper lip before he pulled away. "It's incense, Shepard. When they make incense that smells of gun oil, sweat, and dirty socks … ." Shaking his head, he slid his hands down her arms to grasp her fingers. "No, you're not allowed to use it. We have more than enough of that smell already."

He led her over to the bed and sat, tugging her in to stand between his thighs. "It's cleansing, a mixture of different botanicals that represent your energy," he said, indicating the incense. He stared into her eyes for a moment, then reached up to caress her face. "You look like the Mako ran over you." Pushing her gently, he sent her toward her closet.

"I feel like it did, but we are landing the first quarians on Rannoch in a few hours, so well worth having to sit and listen to the admirals argue." She stopped halfway through pulling out her nightwear and turned to look at him, an incredulous grin slowly spreading across her face. "Sweet baby Jesus, Garrus, we're taking the first landing party down to Rannoch. Over three hundred years of exile and in the morning, it ends. When I was a kid, I wanted so badly to get off Mindoir and have adventures, but this is a whole other level."

One hand flopped a little as she tried to put her awe into words. "Our little Tali will be remembered for as long as there are quarians." Shaking her head, she blinked back what felt like the five hundredth bout of tears for the day and turned back to her closet.

He nodded. "It's extraordinary, and it all started with one of the best shots I've ever seen."

Shepard laughed. "One of? Oh, Officer, you will pay for that one. You know … one day when you aren't covered in bullet holes and blast damage."

Shepard met Anderson and Admiral Hackett at the airlock, snapping a sharp salute. "Good morning, sirs. Welcome aboard."

"Thank you, Shepard, but I still have no idea why I'm here," Hackett said, stepping forward to shake her hand.

"I'll explain everything, Admiral, but I'm afraid we're going to have to do a lot of the catching up on the move." She ushered them down the CIC. "Did you both get a chance to look at the packet of information that Barla Von gave you before you took off?"

Hackett cleared his throat. "Massive, mind-controlling machine intelligences that sweep through the galaxy every fifty thousand years to wipe out all advanced sapient life. The council and Saren mind-controlled by this thing through the use of some sort of telepathic amplifiers seeded at the very least around the Citadel … ." The stare he levelled on her could be called dubious, if one was given to vast understatements.

"It's all true," Nihlus's deep, rich voice said, startling her as he stepped around the edge of the galaxy map. He held out his hand, looking to Anderson. "Captain Anderson, good to see you again, sir."

Shepard bit her lip against a smile as she met the Spectre's eyes. "Admiral Hackett, this is Spectre Nihlus Kryik, my partner in crime."

Hackett shook the Spectre's hand, and shot a glare across at Shepard. "In truth if the rumours are to be believed."

"Admiral Hackett." Nihlus nodded. "We met a few years back. We spoke of instability in the traverse. A pleasure to see you again, sir." He stepped back, allowing them to continue, falling in beside Shepard. "The queen wants to see us."

Shepard nodded, hiding the butterflies that bared their fangs and started to work on her stomach lining. "We can stop on the way to the shuttle." Herding the men before her, she headed to the stairs and down.

"Okay, Shepard," Hackett grumbled. "You have a rachni queen on board the Normandy?" He nearly missed the bottom stair turning to level that gruff frown on her again. "The council's official stance on the rachni is shoot on sight."

She nodded. "As is the current Alliance policy for the geth." She laughed and glanced over at Nihlus. "Well, actually, I did shoot Legion on sight. Good thing he didn't hold it against me."

Shrugging, she stepped past the admiral to palm the elevator control. "Anyway, my point before I destroyed it for myself was that the standard orders for geth is to destroy on sight because they are the enemy." She stepped inside when it opened. "And yet, here we are, on the cusp of repatriating the quarian people, because a geth asked for a chance to prove their verisimilitude, and I gave it."

He grumbled, but didn't reply.

Shiala met them halfway across the cargo bay, while the queen remained a few metres behind the asari. No doubt the presence of so many strangers coming and going had her a bit unsettled.

"So, that's a rachni," Anderson said under his breath, taking a couple of steps toward the queen.

"Good morning, Captain," Shiala said and nodded to the others. "The queen wishes to join you, to add the moment to the ancestral memories. You're allowing her people to prove their worth, and Legion spoke up on her behalf on Noveria. She wishes to honour those demonstrations of good will."

Shepard looked at the shuttle then at the queen, who even in a few days had grown a half metre in every direction. "Sure, but I'll have to send the shuttle back. There isn't room this trip. Please come with her though, just in case there are issues."

The asari smiled. "Thank you, Captain. She'll be very happy."

"A happy rachni," Hackett grumbled. "Shepard, if I didn't know you as well as I do and for as long as I have, I'd swear that coolant had leaked into the water supply."

Shepard laughed. "Somedays I wonder if it hasn't, Admiral." She ushered them straight to the shuttle. "Sorry to rush you through, but I want to be there when the two sides arrive. The admirals other than Rael'Zorah are still very jumpy."

Thirty seconds after she sat down and buckled in, Garrus leaped out of the elevator and raced across the cargo bay, just squeaking in the hatch before it closed. Shepard grinned as he sat next to "Cutting it close there, Vakarian. I thought you were going to miss the bus." She grinned and winked as he grumbled at her.

During most of the trip, Admiral Hackett and Rael'Zorah discussed the military politics of everything that Shepard had brought to light. Shepard didn't envy Hackett. He was an Alliance man through and through. He'd never been afraid to colour outside the lines when it was needed to save lives, but out and out going against the Alliance and the council ... he'd never do it. In order to get the fleets she needed to take down Sovereign, she'd have to carefully massage the truth, and god, she hated doing that.

"You've been awfully quiet," she said to Anderson. She bumped him with her shoulder. "I'm glad to see you."

He reached over and squeezed her arm then pulled his hand back. "You too, kid. You've been busy out here." He chuckled. "And back on the Citadel. Udina came in sporting two of the best shiners I've seen in a long time the day after your last discussion with him." Turning his gaze to Hackett, he shook his head a little. "It's going to take some convincing to get him to go along with your plan, Shepard, and I've been quiet because it's going to be up to you to convince him."

"Do you think I've got a shot?" She watched his face, looking for the tiny hints as to what he thought and felt; Anderson could out-stoic a turian. A slight softening around his eyes as he glanced back at her told her what she needed to know; it would all come down to presentation. Hopefully seeing the quarians and geth working together would help.
"Captain." Rael'Zorah's weak voice reached Shepard over the shuttle's rumble, calling her from her thoughts. "I spoke at length with the admiralty board, and should I pass before our discussion on the planet's surface, they have agreed that Tali is authorized to speak on my behalf."

Shepard looked over at Tali as a small, strangled sound issued through the young quarian's speaker. "Well, let's make sure that she doesn't have to just yet. We're two minutes ahead of the quarian shuttle, and Legion has assured me that they are prepared for our arrival."

"You've got all this organized," Hackett said, but his tone didn't come across derisive. Instead, it sounded thoughtful, as if he hadn't considered her organizational skills quite up to the task but had begun to think differently. Not that she blamed him. Her career amounted to a long series of one-woman shows. No one, including her, could have guessed that leadership would fit so well.

Guessing Tali's excitement, or possibly nervous, level from the amount of wriggling she did in her seat, Shepard turned on the vid screen to allow everyone a view of the planet as they approached. She found herself as enraptured as everyone else as they broke through the clouds and descended toward a high plateau overlooking the ocean.

"Keelah se'lai," Tali whispered.

Rannoch. Whatever Shepard thought she'd see when the hatch of the shuttle opened, what awaited her left her imagination in the dust. A huge, oddly beautiful structure stood built into the cliffs, far too new to be anything but geth design. Further inland, deep in a canyon formed of heavily ribboned rock that shone in a hundred shades from copper to violet in Tikkun's perpetual twilight, a ruin climbed, clean-lined and square up the cliff face. Nestled in front of the ruins on the bank of a fast moving creek stood a neat camp of large tents.

"It's so beautiful," Tali said, her voice hushed and reverent.

"It sure is," Shepard agreed. She stayed in her seat, waiting as Tali and Kal'Reegar stood and stepped to the door. The pair hesitated for a long moment, just staring out at the stone and scrubby, desert plant life that welcomed them home. As they stood there, on the cusp of claiming their new lives, a sharp needle of bittersweet loss stabbed through Shepard's chest. The house would sit so empty soon.

Looking across the compartment, she met Nihlus's eyes, her lips twitching into a crooked smile that disappeared almost instantly. He just held her gaze, understanding looking back.

"Creator Tali'Zorah, Creator Kal'Reegar," Legion called, dragging Shepard's attention away from the Spectre as it strode toward the shuttle. "Preparations are concluded for your arrival." Shepard laughed, quickly clapping a hand over her mouth, as the geth held its arm out like a waiter ushering them to a table. Garrus elbowing her only made matters worse.

The quarians stepped down then, Kal hanging back to allow Tali to be the first quarian to feel Rannoch beneath her feet in over three centuries. After a few seconds, he joined her and they crouched, reaching down to drag their fingers through the dry, sandy soil. After a moment, they looked at one another and laughed, the high, merry laughter of delight that becomes so scarce after childhood.

"It's real," Tali said, her voice saying that she'd been fairly sure the whole thing was some sort of long, involved hallucination. "We're home, Kal." Tali stood, and for a moment, Shepard thought the pair of them might just hug, but then they turned away, looking awkward enough that Garrus chuckled.

The shuttle with the admirals and quarian marines landed a moment later, the occupants a little more cautious as they stepped out the hatch, but no less like youth turned loose in a park once they did. Tali headed over to embrace Shala'Raan then the small group walked over to the edge of the cliff to look out at the water.

Legion and another geth moved Rael'Zorah to a cot near the site for the meeting, then the shuttle returned to the Normandy to pick up the rachni queen and Shiala.

A half hour later, Shepard watched as Tali walked up to the Admiralty Board, poised to present her gift and become a full adult. Grinning at the strength and purpose in the young female's strides, Shepard could scarcely believe that it was the same Tali'Zorah they'd rescued from Fist's office in Chora's Den.

Tali stopped a couple of metres from the admirals and reached up, crossing her arms to touch her fingers to her opposite shoulders before extending her hands out toward her elders. Taking a deep breath, she let out a long sigh that trembled just enough for Shepard to know tears trickled down behind that mask. "After time adrift among open stars, along tides of light and through shoals of dust, I have returned to where I began."

Shepard smiled through her own tears and leaned back gratefully into the hand that pressed against the small of her back. If that was a traditional passage for the pilgrimage ceremony, never before had it been more true or appropriate.

Shala'Raan repeated the crossed arm gesture, but when she extended her arms, she stepped forward to clasp Tali's wrists. "You are welcomed home most joyously, Tali'Zorah nar Rayya," the admiral replied. She appeared to flounder for a moment, no doubt trying to adjust the usual ceremony to apply to such an unusual turn of events. "When our people left these shores, the blessed ancestors kept us alive and sustained us, building a home among the stars so that our children might one day return to walk upon this very soil."

Admiral Zaal'Koris stepped up beside Raan. "Honouring their struggle, over the centuries of the long exile, each member of the quarian people has sacrificed and given freely to ensure that one day the hope of the ancestors would come to pass. To this end, our children went out into the cold and silence, searching to find a token, a gift to prove their dedication to sustaining our people until the day they were able to return home."
Shepard closed her eyes and turned her face into the breeze, inhaling the sharp, spicy scent of the desert. It filled her, warm and comforting, and she smiled before looking back at the ceremony. The quarians had a wonderful planet to come home to.

Shepard leaned into Garrus, looked up into his eyes and whispered, "I knew we should have put a bow around the planet."

Despite his mandible flutter, he elbowed her, a grim nod telling her to be quiet and pay attention. She grinned and did as she was told. For a minute, anyway.

Daro'Xen dragged herself away from staring at Legion and the other geth to step up on Raan's other side. "Tali'Zorah nar Rayya, have you returned to take your place among your people, to uphold and honour all that it means to be a citizen of the quarian homeworld?"

She looked up at Nihlus as the Spectre stood silently on her other side.

"And you thought being my partner would suck," she whispered.

Nihlus elbowed her. "Be quiet and pay attention."

Smothering a laugh, Shepard nodded. "I see how this is going to work."

Tali nodded, drawing herself up tall and straight, her voice losing the earlier tremor. "I return to my people bearing the gift of the cradle that sustained our race from its birth. With it, I bring peace with the geth in the hope that we may discover a shared destiny as brothers and sisters of Rannoch." Tali tilted her head to one side a little, her posture cocky enough that Shepard felt a flush of guilt. "Does my gift meet with your approval?"

"You're a terrible influence," Garrus whispered next to her ear. Shepard just nodded. What could she say? He was right.

"We find your gift most acceptable," Raan answered, her voice light and tinted with sunny hues of laughter. "We name you Tali'Zorah vas Rannoch. As the Admiralty Board of the quarian people, we declare that the designation 'vas Rannoch' shall be passed down exclusively through your progeny to honour your role in ending our long exile." Raan held out her arms, folding Tali into a warm embrace. "Welcome home, Tali'Zorah vas Rannoch, and thank you."

Compared to the gift ceremony, Tali's promotion was a simple affair. Shepard kept an eye on Rael and pushed for them to get to the planning as quickly as possible. He insisted on being a part of it to lend Shepard and Nihlus his support, but she wanted him to have his time lying under the sky with his face uncovered and his daughter at his side.

The geth proved as good as Legion's word, supplying a large table and seats for everyone involved. Shepard settled reluctantly into the seat at the head of the table and watched the others. Anderson and Hackett sat quietly, looking a little like they'd fallen down the rabbit hole to discover quarians and geth wearing giant grins as they offered cakes and strange liquids that insisted on being consumed.

She watched everyone take their places, feeling again that sense of urgency and loss she'd felt when Tali stepped down out of the shuttle. She'd had so little time with them … not enough to know any of them they way she should. She spent her days running from task to task, as if she had infinite time to spend with them once she finished. And then she never finished.

By the end of the day, Tali would be gone as well, moved into the camp nestled in the shadow of the edifice of her ancestors. She'd take her place, leading her people, remembered for a hundred thousand years for that day. Shepard smiled, but it felt sad. Perhaps once the Reapers were thwarted, she would return to Rannoch and help the colonization effort … do a little digging around in ruins. That would make a fine vacation.

Seeing everyone watching and waiting for her, dragged her out of her thoughts, and she stood, suddenly nervous. They needed to eliminate Sovereign. No doubt hung on that. Whether or not she would prove clever enough to pull it off … doubt weighed it down and held it under.

Taking a deep breath, she swallowed the doubt. It did not belong at the table. She looked over to where Shiala sat cross-legged on the ground next to Amalair a good distance away. A quick nod acknowledged them, then Shepard turned to her task. She had a Reaper to kill.

"By now you all know either by experience or by briefing that Saren Arterius discovered a huge dreadnought that he calls Sovereign. It is, in fact, not a ship at all, but a being. The Protheans called them Reapers, for they swooped down on the galaxy fifty thousand years ago, death incarnate, and completely obliterated the Prothean Empire in a monstrous harvest." She took a breath and leaned forward, her palms pressed to the warm metal of the table top. "The Reaper invasion began through the Citadel, which is in fact, a giant mass relay. However, the Protheans also discovered four other major relays that opened to dark space. Each of these relays contained a key."

Over the next half hour she and Nihlus explained how Tashac, Merol, and the Senarium had located and hidden all five keys away then left the information buried in the beacons, preparing for the Reapers' eventual return.

"Saren has used the beacons, and although he has not had the advantage of the rachni queen's ability to decipher the messages for him, he has the cypher and until recently, he had Matriarch Benezia to help him sort through it." She took a slow survey of every set of eyes at the table, pleased with what she saw. "Even if Saren isn't able to get to the Conduit, he will continue to search, tearing his way through the galaxy until he finds one of the keys."

"It's a big galaxy, Shepard," Anderson said, his mouth quirked in the way that told her he was setting her up. "Saren and Sovereign could take out fifty colonies, catching us with our pants around our ankles every time if Eden Prime is any indication. According to this information, the heretic geth did not respond to finding out that Sovereign considered them disposable, so he's still got an army behind him."

Legion tilted its head. "Shepard-Captain, heretic runtimes have begun to contact geth asking for confirmation of the upload from Virmire. Several thousand have asked to return to the consensus. Extrapolating from current data, 94.78 percent of heretic runtimes will be reintegrated or awaiting reintegration with the consensus within the next forty eight hours."

For a moment, Shepard considered walking down there to punch the geth for not telling her sooner, but then she decided that the broken hand probably wasn't worth it. "Thank you, Legion. That's very good news. Saren still has thousands of tank-bred krogan under his command—from the number of tanks we saw, he was creating ten thousand a generation—but losing the geth will hit him hard." She grinned, hard and bright. "Excellent."

"Thousands of krogan?" Hackett asked. He cocked an eyebrow at her. "If he can fly that dreadnought up to any colony and land even five thousand krogan … . Add to that his hatred for humanity, and Anderson's right. He'll destroy every human colony before he even gets warmed up." The admiral shoved himself up in his chair and leaned forward, back rigid as he braced his forearms against the table. "Hell, he might come after Earth."

"Exactly, Admiral." Her smile hardened, setting onto her face like cement. "That's why I want to set a trap, and luckily, Tashac Jacar gave us the perfect means to do exactly that." She sat and leaned forward in a much more relaxed imitation of Hackett's pose. "She was afraid that given fifty thousand years, the Vanguard would find a way to access the Conduit, so she set a plan in motion to protect it."

"Wait," Tali spoke up. "You said she was indoctrinated. How can we know that she didn't actually make it possible for Saren to access the Conduit rather than protecting it from him?"

"We can't." She shrugged, resignation rather than dismissal. "What we can do is set a trap at Ilos to capture Saren and destroy Sovereign when they come to get the Conduit." She smiled and leaned back, arms crossed. "We'll let him know that we don't believe the Conduit is safe and intend to move it to a secure location where we can work on destroying it."

Hackett and Zaal'Koris grumbled, the latter voicing their objection. "Shepard, a dreadnought of that size and firepower. It will take tens of ships to bring it down."

She nodded. "Fleets, and that is where all of you come in. I intend to have two fleets waiting for Sovereign in the Refuge system. With the Vanguard destroyed, it will buy us time to prepare for when the Reapers find another way to return." She let out a long, heavy breath. "And we're going to need every second we can get."

Over the next hour and a half they hammered out details, the planning coming to a halt when Rael'Zorah beckoned Shepard to his side. "My time is nearly done, Captain." He locked wrists with her when she crouched by his side. "Thank you for returning my people to the homeworld, Shepard."

She shook her head. "I didn't do anything. You, Tali, and Legion made this happen."

He chuckled, then coughed weakly. "Tell that lie to whomever you wish, Captain, but those of us here, we know the truth. I would have filled Legion with bullets and thrown its platform out an airlock without giving it a second thought." He squeezed her wrist. "And I would have been wrong." A shallow breath made him appear to collapse into the cot. "And thank you for my daughter: for saving her life and then giving an old fool a chance to repair the damage he'd done."

Shepard nodded, swallowing hard. "It was my pleasure to be your host, Admiral Rael'Zorah. Rest easy knowing that we'll keep an eye on her."

He nodded, then looked past her to Tali. When Shepard stood and backed away, Rael held his hand out for Tali's. "Have them carry me over near the edge of the cliff, my daughter. Will you sit with me, unmasked, to watch the sun set?"

"Of course, Father." She held his hand as Kal'Reegar, Zaal'Koris, Legion, and Shala'Raan lifted his stretcher and carried it to where he could see the ocean. When they set him down, Tali knelt at his side, bending over him to remove his mask. Tender fingers caressed his face before helping him slip off his hood, allowing the breeze to ruffle the short, dark hair on his head. Kal helped the admiral sit up so that Tali could ease in behind him, holding her father as he had surely once held her, leaning against her side in the crook of her arm. After a moment, she reached up, removing her own mask.

Shepard withdrew back to the shuttle and sat in the open hatch, giving them their privacy. Garrus sat next to her and wrapped an arm covertly around her waist, saying nothing, just sharing the last moments of the sunset. She leaned into him, appreciating the silent support as the day cooled toward night.
"Father." Tali's thin cry and quiet sobbing marked Rael'Zorah's passing in the quiet of early evening. Under a sky deepening from indigo to navy, stars peeking out to shine like pinprick diamonds in the abyss, she folded down to hold him in her arms.

Shepard longed to go to her, to wrap her in the comfort of someone who'd faced almost that exact moment: a father who'd died to keep her safe. But it wasn't her place, so she settled for leaning tighter in against Garrus as Shala'Raan and Kal'Reegar knelt at Tali's side. Their comforting touches eased the grieving daughter up off the ground and brought her back to where everyone waited.

Shepard stood when Tali looked up at her, their eyes truly meeting for the first time. Even in her sorrow, Tali's ethereal beauty stole Shepard's breath. Smiling through slow tears and a heart aching in empathy, the captain held out her arms, but then ducked her head a little. "You should probably put your mask back on first."

Tali nodded, slipping back behind the translucent protection before rushing over to wrap arms like steel bands around Shepard. "Thank you so much, Captain," she said, her voice thick with tears. "Thank you for my father and my home." A strong series of hiccupping sobs broke loose. "He told me he loved me." Her grip on Shepard tightened. "What am I going to do now, Shepard? I'm alone."

"Oh, beautiful girl, you are most definitely not alone. You have Shala'Raan and Kal, and you know that you can always count on me and on the rest of the crew. We're a family. You need anything, all you have to do is call. Wherever we are, we'll come running." Pulling back, Shepard held Tali's shoulders. "You are the bravest, strongest person I've ever known, Tali'Zorah vas Rannoch." She laid her hand alongside Tali's mask. "Take care of your people the way I know you can. Make them a beautiful home to last the ages." She grinned. "And help me kick the Reapers in the ass so we can come back here and sit on the beach, take a good long vacation. Deal?"

Tali chuckled softly. "Deal." She pulled Shepard into a tight hug. "You're the bravest, strongest, most remarkable woman any of us will ever know. Don't forget that."

Shepard returned her hug with a quick one then pulled away, feeling naked and awkward. She stepped back, hastily slapping the wall back up. "We'll be back for a vacation in a week or so. I'd like a tent overlooking the beach, please."

Tali nodded toward Legion who watched them, those expressive head flaps never ceasing their movement. "I'll have our social coordinator take your reservation."

Shepard laughed and lifted a hand to Legion, another friend and trusted companion that would be moving on. "I'll see you and the fleet at the relay in just over twenty nine hours."

He repeated the gesture, his hand lifting to drift slowly back to his side. "The geth will be prepared, Shepard-Captain."

"As will we, Shepard," Tali said. "What ships we can muster will be waiting at the secondary relay for your orders."

"Thank you, Captain." She winked and then nodded toward the shuttle. Behind her, Anderson, Hackett and the others climbed in and took their seats. "I'd better get back and start this ball rolling. We have a Reaper to kill." Backing toward the hatch, she looked around and shook her head. "Quite the home you've got here Tali … Legion. Take good care of it and each other." She lifted a hand in one last wave, biting down on her grief—she hated goodbyes—and stepped up into the shuttle.
Waving a hand to the rachni and Shiala, she called them from their place well back from everyone else. "Come on ladies, the bus is pulling out. It's going to be crowded."

Shepard looked up from her computer as Garrus entered her quarters, then just leaned against the wall, staring at her. She quailed a little under the intensity of his stare. It stripped her bare and crawled inside her, trying to discover everything she wanted—needed—to keep hidden. Her heart stopped between beats, feeling as though blood flowed in only to be trapped, building until the poor, fragile organ exploded. That stare wanted to possess her. It asked for everything, absolutely every tiny piece of her.

"Garrus?" She turned in her chair, meeting his gaze for a moment before she stood and took a hesitant step toward him. "What's going on?"

He let out a long breath and shook his head. "What you did today … what you've done since the day we met … ." He shook his head again then pushed off the wall and strode toward her with purpose. "You perform miracles as if they were everyday occurrences, Shepard. You're a miracle; a tiny, ornery, crazy, beautiful miracle." He reached out to cradle her head between his hands, his brow plates lowering into a considering sort of scowl. "What did I ever do to earn you in my life?"

Shepard flinched back a little, but then long arms wrapped around her, lifting her off the floor to press her against the right side of his chest. His mouth moved along her jaw, his breath hot and ragged, his tongue sliding along the underside of her jawbone, hungry and possessive. "You're a goddess," he whispered when he reached her ear. "The spirits of war and peace and compassion and justice all tangled up inside that tiny body."

Bracing her hands in the curve of his neck as it swept down inside his cowl, Shepard pulled back. "Garrus?" Her heart beat against her ribs, a frenzied prisoner trying to smash a hole through the cell wall as the executioner entered the door. "Please." Tears leaked from the corners of her eyes, her belly watery and trembling, threatening to embarrass her. Guilt trickled through the fear as he drew back, releasing her as though she slapped him, letting her slide down to the floor.

He hasn't done anything to deserve this reaction, Janey. The torin wants you. What's wrong with that? Would you rather not inspire any passion in him?

Sorrow bit deep. She backed up a few centimetres, until her back thumped against the bulkhead, then looked up to meet the confusion and hurt in his eyes. Holding out a hand, she invited him back into her space, but at a distance.

Welcome to your life with Jane Shepard, Garrus. I'll pull you in but only so that I can hold you at arm's length.

He moved past her stopping point, leaning in to touch his brow to hers. "I'm sorry, Shepard, I shouldn't have come at you so fast." Sighing, he tilted his head to nuzzle her nose. "I just … . Spirits, you make me feel so damned much."

Shepard brushed her lips against his mouth, then leaned back against the wall, keeping her eyes focused on his chest. "I know, C-Sec." She sighed at the old habit, and ran her hands down the panel of his tunic. "I mean Garrus. I'm just … ."

He nodded, caressing her cheek with the backs of his talons. "I know you're scared, Shepard." Leaning in, he nuzzled along her neck, flicking his tongue in the hollow between her collarbones. "But you also know I'd never do anything to hurt you." Nuzzling and nipping gently, he explored his way to her shoulder.
She pushed him back a little. "I'm not ready, Garrus." She pressed her forehead against his keel. "I don't know if I ever will be."

Sighing, he pulled her in tight. "Okay. You know it's okay. Come talk to me, Kahri. Let's sit down and actually talk, see if we can start getting someplace that doesn't scare you."

Afraid he'd feel her heart hammering against the plates on his chest, she pushed him back. "Talk about what, Garrus? How screwed up I am? How badly broken I am?" She tried to duck around him, but he put his arm up, hand pressing against the wall to block her. Fury scorched through her, burning away the fear, or at least transmuting it into something more volatile. She wiped her palms against her trouser legs, then stuffed her fingers into her front pockets, drawing her shoulders up, all angles and spines.

"No, I don't want to talk about how broken you are, because you aren't broken, Shepard. Terrified of trusting, of allowing yourself to let go of control, or being vulnerable, yes, but never broken."

His long talons massaged her shoulders, the contact warm, asking her to relax. For a moment, her shoulders succumbed, but then she twisted away, only to run into the wall of his arm.

"Please just let me go."

He didn't move his arm, but leaned back a bit, taking some of the pressure off her. "No. I know you care about me." He tucked a stray bit of hair behind her ear, the gentleness of that gesture almost undoing her. "If you trust me for one second, I won't let you down." He leaned in, touching his brow to hers. "We could start with these … ." He slipped his hand under her uniform and traced the pads of his talons over her scars. "You could tell me how you got these."

Shepard shoved his hand away. "Stop pushing, Vakarian." The room seemed to fill with screams; shrill, terrible wails of pain and fear and helplessness. "Don't you understand that the walls I built between me and those memories are all that keep me sane? Why do you want to tear them down? Why do you all insist on making me relive it? Do you want me to fall apart? To turn into a drooling idiot?" She lunged against his arm, bursting through it like she would a old door, swollen and stuck.

He followed, dogged, unrelenting to the point of chipping away enough of her control that it was all she could do not to haul off and punch him. "You know that's the last thing I want, Kahri. Those walls aren't keeping you sane, they're keeping you safe." A soft keen trembled through the air between them. "At least, you think they are, but they're eating you alive a centimetre at a time."

"Could you live with the memories of being whipped and beaten and raped endlessly for over a day rattling around inside your head, Garrus?" She held up a finger to interrupt his reply, ignoring the fact it shook so hard that it looked as though she were scolding him. "And the horrendous things they did to me aren't the worst of it." Her hand slumped in slow motion to her side. "Everyone you love caged, screaming and begging … in pain … your father's heart breaking before you because you're the very best weapon they could use against him."

She leaned into the table, hands braced against the top, head hanging. "Why is it so important to you that I drag all this out?" She looked up into his eyes without raising her head. "Could you be with someone so soiled? Really?"

His face fell, his expression so painfully sad that it made her breastbone ache. "Yes," he said, his voice barely a whisper. "There is no taint on you, Shepard. It's on the animals who hurt you. Never you." He strode over and took her by the shoulders, turning her away from the table none too gently. "Is that why you refuse to talk to me about this? You think I'll turn my back on you? That I'll think less of you?"
Shepard backed up, tugging at his grip as she edged away. "How could you not? I can barely stand to touch my own damned skin." She wrenched loose and spun, stalking over to the desk. "All of that stuff is one giant ball of shit waiting to stink up everything in my life. Don't you get it, Garrus?
Everything I touch blows up, eventually. It can't help but turn to crap, not when … ." She left the rest unsaid, just shaking her head, her arms curling around her waist.

Garrus let out an exasperated sigh, his footsteps heavy on the decking as he followed her. "Spirits, you've got so many wires crossed that I'm amazed anything coherent gets through that mess." He pressed his hand between her shoulder blades. "I want you, Shepard. All of you. Not this pretty part over here, or that intelligent spark over there. All of you. I'm willing to work through the crap." She felt him shrug through the contact. "I thought I'd been pretty clear about my intentions."

She turned and pressed her back against the wall, keeping her eyes firmly fixed on his chest. "Jesus Christ, C-Sec … you must be fucking desperate for some action. Seriously, how bloody horny and pathetic do you have to be to want to wade into this quagmire?" A quick glance at his face, at the hurt in his eyes, slid a scalpel-sharp stiletto between her ribs and straight through her heart.

Taking a deep breath, she swallowed that pain. She needed to keep going, for his own damned good.

"Fine, you want me? You want to wade into the shit?" Shepard slid down the wall into a crouch, fumbling with the fasteners on his leggings, her movements frantic, edged with ice and black with fear … and with sadness. Better to break everything apart before they got in any deeper. "Is this what you want, C-Sec? Oh yeah, I think I remember how this goes. It was a long time ago, but I'm sure I can figure it out."

He reached down and grabbed her arms, dragging her to her feet, pressing her against the wall.
"Shepard, stop it. Stop it." He stroked her cheek with a gentle hand. "You know … ."

"No? That not what you're looking for?" She shoved him back with enough force that hitting the side of the bed sat him down. Furious, frantic hands tore her uniform off over her head and threw it onto her desk.

"Shepard!" He jumped up and tried to grab her. "Stop!"

She threw him back with two hard jabs to the belly, punching him with a strength she saved for battle. It bought her enough space to kick off her boots and get her trousers undone. Bile erupted into her mouth, making her gag. She swallowed hard, her mouth sour and burning as she shoved her pants to the floor, stomping her feet clear of them. Holding her arms out to her sides, she stepped toward him. "How about this? This is what you want right?"

She grabbed his cowl, pulling him across the space until she ran into her desk. "Just spout some beguiling rhetoric, pin the girl up against the nearest thing, or wait … bend her over it … . Is that what you want? Prefer to not look them in the eye?" Her voice trailed off, slow tears forcing their way from the corner of her eyes as the bitter taste in her mouth spread into her chest. Ugly and insidious, the fear's taint radiated, black mold tendrils slithering through her flesh until they penetrated her soul. A harsh, gagging sob escaped, surging from her throat. "It's what they all want, right?"

Letting out a long, slow sigh Garrus leaned in, pressing his brow to hers. His eyes closed, and he shook his head. "No, Shepard. It's not what they all want." A gentle hand pressed against her neck.
"It's definitely not what I want." Pulling back, he stared into her eyes, reaching up to pull his visor off with an impatient tug. He tossed it over on top of her uniform.
"This … ." He gestured down at her body. "I only want this, Kahri, when it comes because this … " He pressed his hand over her frantically racing heart. "… belongs to me, and you love me so hard that you ache for it." Shrugging, he reached up and brushed the tears from her cheeks. "And if I have to wait twenty cycles or a hundred for that, I'll wait." He let out a whistling sigh. "And if it turns out that you ache to give it to someone else, I'll find a way to live with that decision, somehow."

Shepard stared at him for long moments, the passage of time counted in heartbeats. The sorrow and the patience in his eyes reached down inside her, taking hold of the fear and crushing it until it bled tears of pure remorse. Such a beautiful soul. She wrapped her arms around his neck, pulling him down to hug him tight. "Oh god, Garrus, I'm sorry. I'm so sorry."

"You don't need the shields with me, Shepard." He rubbed her back, his hands rough and so very warm. "I'm not going to hurt you."

She sniffed and turned her face into the curve of his neck. "Everybody does eventually, Garrus."

"Not me." He pulled back, taking her shoulders to push her away. "Not me."

Reaching up, she pressed her hand against his cheek. "Why can't I drive you away?"

His mandibles spread and fluttered as he looked down at the floor, his smile suddenly shy. After a second, he met her eyes again. "Because I've fallen in love with you, Kahri." He stepped back, and turned away, walking over to her closet. He took out a t-shirt and shorts, then tossed them to her. "Get dressed. I'll go find us some food."

Shepard stared at him, her heart alternating between stopping completely then pounding so fast it felt like it would punch right through her ribs and chase after him as he walked out the door. Running her teeth over her bottom lip, she sniffed, staring at the door for over a minute after it had shut behind him.

"Sweet baby Jesus," she whispered, the words barely more than a sigh. "He loves me."
Ilos. Shepard stepped down out of the shuttle and looked up. The towering ruins, stacked like blocks set by giants, felt like old friends come to welcome her home. Her gaze tried to travel along the straight lines of the ancient architecture, but vines snaked everywhere, their sinuous lines dragging her along their length instead. Voluptuous leaves erupted from the stalks, shining a waxy green against the grey, begging her to trail her fingers over their veins, reading from them the history of the planet. She walked over and pressed a hand against the soft, velvet bark of a tree that looked for all the world like a vine stalk that had grown rampant. It vibrated under her palm with the low hum of an electrical cable, so alive it felt poised to leap up and run off if not for the roots holding it anchored.

Ilos. Standing on that soil felt like arriving home after a long, exhausting trip.

Behind her, the rachni queen sang a note that sounded decidedly delighted and hurried off. When Amalair expressed an interest in seeing Ilos as a possibility for her home, Shepard had allowed it providing that she head the opposite direction and stay well clear of any fighting. Not that Shepard planned on there being much fighting. Not on Ilos. With two fleets in the air, Saren would want to come in as quietly as possible, exploit the security weakness and get out with the Conduit as quietly as possible. A big fight left too much to chance.

“The queen’s going to want to live here,” she said, glancing back at Nihlus. “Trust me, she feels whatever it is that calls to me . . . I mean, that called to Tashac.”

“Merol never understood her obsession with this place. He found Ilos creepy, not peaceful.” Nihlus shrugged, his gaze skeptical. “I thought rachni liked a more toxic atmosphere.” He set out toward the largest part of the ruins.

“Or maybe they just chose planets that discouraged visitors,” Garrus said, stepping down out of the shuttle. He crossed to where Shepard still communed with the massive tree. “The shuttle VI is set to track us every fifteen minutes, but if we need to, we can still send a signal for immediate pick up.”

“Excellent. We’re going to need to get out of here in a hurry.” She turned to face him, sliding her hand down his gauntlet before stepping away. Following Nihlus toward the main door into the compound, Shepard kept every sense on alert for anything that felt out of place. Strange to feel so familiar with a place that she’d never been before. She understood why, but still it felt a little too close to possession for her comfort, particularly with Nihlus an arm’s length away.

She headed off, putting some space between them, rooting through a tangle of vines and plants growing up the side of the building to find the door control. It had to be there somewhere.

“Captain Shepard?” Shiala’s voice came through over the radio.

Shepard grinned and turned to Nihlus. “I told you so.” Ignoring his confused stare, she opened the channel with one hand while pulling away a handful of vines with the other. “Let me guess, the rachni queen wants to live here?”

“Yes, ma’am, she says the whole planet sings with history. How did you know?” the asari replied.

Shepard shrugged even though Shiala couldn’t see her. “A good guess, or maybe she’s been in my head enough that we have a shared brain thing going.” She drew in a long breath. “Besides, I want to live here. Sweet baby Jesus, it’s so quiet. A body could actually hear themselves think here.” She looked up from her search, glancing over at Garrus. “You wouldn’t mind living here, would you?”

His mandibles spread wide at the question, then fluttered once, hard. He shook his head, but nodded toward the statues of the Inusannon. “Not if we can ship all of those off somewhere and put in a nice rifle range.”

Shepard grinned. “Deal. Those statues creep the hell out of me.” Letting out a soft cry of victory, Shepard tore the vines away from the door panel and touched the control, giving the VI time to scan her. When it didn’t respond, she scowled and pressed a couple of controls before trying again.

“Something wrong?” Garrus asked, walking up beside her, his eyes and gun still facing out into the ruins.

“The scan should be almost instantaneous. The door controls aren’t responding.” She crouched and popped the front panel off the console, searching through the electronics for signs of a hardware issue. “It’s like Vigil isn’t there.” She tweaked a couple of connections.

“Com . . . m . . . man . . . n . . . der T . . . T . . . Tashac Jacar re . . . re . . . cognized . . . d . . . d.” Vigil’s voice came out of the console broken, drawn out, and stuttering.

“He’s damaged,” Nihlus said then sighed. “It could be sabotage, but he’s also been sitting here for fifty thousand years.” His brow plates lowered to shutter his eyes as he ducked his head. “Did you repair it?”

“No, it just took him a while to process the request.” Shepard set the panel back into place, thumping it with the side of her fist to latch it, as the door ground open.

“Captain?” Shiala called.

“Sorry, in the middle of a mission here. Tell her she can stay for a couple weeks to decide for sure. I’m not just going to dump her on a dead world and walk away.” Even before Shiala responded, she heard the queen singing happily as she rustled away in the underbrush.

“Understood. Thank you, Captain. Sorry for the interruption. Shiala, out.”

“Well,” Nihlus said, shooting a grin across at her, “mission success on one front, anyway.”

Shepard nodded, but her internal alarm started burning at the base of her skull. Something was wrong. And it wasn’t just the fact that Saren could be anywhere, or that he might already have the Conduit in his possession. Whatever the problem was, it felt like a great, dark hole at the center of the complex. She shrugged Roger into her hand and swung him around into low ready, but hesitated at the threshold, focusing herself on the coming game. The pieces were set, the board laid out . . . time to move forward two spaces.

Nihlus laid a heavy hand on her shoulder until she nodded and headed in. They walked along the main corridor, the whole place long cracked open like an egg by tree roots, life invading what had still been sterile stone walls when Tashac walked the same route. Shepard squinted against the wide shafts of sunlight, deciding that she liked the interior decorating of the years as she waded through a shallow stream. It wandered a serpentine path down the long gentle slope descending into the heart of the facility.

Shepard guessed by the way that both Garrus and Nihlus kept close, their eyes and guns in constant motion, that they sensed the same vague wrongness that she did.

“I’d feel a lot better about things if we’d brought Wrex,” Garrus grumbled. He stopped and ran his hand over his fringe. “Something here is yanking on my spur.”

Shepard glanced back, a teasing grin curling one corner of her mouth. “That’s a new one.”

“It hurts,” Nihlus said, his tone brusque. He walked past her, heading toward what had once been an environmental interface with the main computer for the facility.

“What?” Shepard’s grin folded into a scowl. Now what had shoved a bug up Nihlus’s ass?

He brushed away the plant life, touching a few controls, and when he replied, his tone came across distracted, almost dismissive, “Someone yanking on your spur. It hurts. Lots of nerve endings.” Grumbling he fiddled with the interface for another couple of seconds, his shotgun hanging from his other hand. “Something’s definitely up with the computers. This interface is dead as well.” He raised his gun and started back down the corridor toward the main elevator.

Shepard followed, hanging back a little to wait for Garrus. When he walked up behind her, he turned a slow circle, his hands uneasy on his rifle.

“This place is starting to feel like Noveria, Shepard.” He nodded for her to go ahead. “I know it’s supposed to be deserted, but it has that same feeling of a lot of bad things moving around just beneath the surface.”

“Yeah.” Her gaze followed the lines of the building and invading plants, trying to find some reason for Tashac’s memories screaming warnings in the back of her mind. “Tashac is going nuts in the back of my head.” She scowled and trotted to catch up with Nihlus a little as the Spectre hurried ahead. “It’s like she knows something, but won’t let me see it. It’s got to be something protected by the indoctrination.”

“No use speculating about it,” Nihlus called back, his tone brittle and angry.

Shepard gestured for Garrus to give them a little space and jogged up to walk at Nihlus’s side. “What’s going on, Nihlus? Are you okay?”

His answering nod could have sliced through stone. “I’m fine, or I will be if we can start treating this like a mission rather than a date.” He cut a glance across at her as sharp as his nod.

Shepard growled low in her throat as she sighed. “Excuse me?” She turned to face him, walking sideways. “Please tell me we’re not headed for Shepard is a whore territory again. We’re just getting somewhere okay, Nihlus.”

He scowled, and shook his head, speeding up a little. “No, that’s not it.” His mandibles flailed. “I apologize. Merol has memories of the last time they came here. They’re laced with betrayal and fear and sadness.” He reached up to brush the back of a wrist over his brow. “So much sadness. Tashac did something, but it’s like he won’t let me see it, or he forced himself to ignore the memories . . . .” Sorrowful eyes turned to her. “It’s just all tangling up with reality. I have no idea how you keep it so straight, how you fend her off so easily.”
Shepard shrugged. “It’s not always easy, but I have a lot of years worth of practice living with walls in my head. I just stick her behind another one.” She stepped ahead of him then looked back and gestured for Garrus to close up. “As far as what is going on here . . . . It scares the hell out of Tashac, but more than that . . . it’s killing her.” She let out a long, frustrated huff of air. “The damned indoctrination tells you that you’re doing the very best thing you can do to save people, and the whole time it’s using you to do the opposite.”

A rough, quick hand scratched at his cheek, leaving marks on his hide even through his glove. “Let’s just get in there and deal with it. No point talking it to death.”

A grim smile answered that. “True enough.” She snagged his hand on its way back to his shotgun, and gave it a brief squeeze. “We’ll get it done.”

They reached the elevator without encountering any resistance other than the continuing feeling of oppression. Shepard felt as though a black hole had invaded, occupying the complex like an enemy army. Every step she took, the pull of that dead blackness strengthened, tugging not at her body, but her soul, trying to tear it out of her, consuming it whole.

Unlike the computer interfaces, the elevator both had power and responded immediately, but that only deepened her disquiet rather than easing it. They were being led, herded toward the Conduit chamber, everything shoving them toward a trap set a very long time ago. As Shepard hit the control to take them down to Vigil’s control room, she began to wonder if they could still manage to pull off their trap while escaping whatever awaited them.

Deciding to hedge her bets, she raised a hand to her ear. “Joker.” The radio crackled in her ear. She looked up at Nihlus. “Comms are jammed.”

“Merol Niral imprint recognized,” Vigil’s voice said in Shepard’s ear. “Unindoctrinated. Overriding communications lockout.”

“Normandy here, Shepard,” Joker’s voice came through a second later. “What’s up?”

“I have a couple of messages that I need you to pass on. They’re both text.” She keyed her omnitool and uploaded the messages to him. “The one for Anderson . . . he should be back on the Citadel by now.”

“Yes, ma’am. Anything else I can do for you?”

She grinned and shook her head. “Sure, I could use a sandwich. Got one you could shoot down to me?”

“I’ll get right on that. Look for the flaming meteorite of bread.” He chuckled. “See you when you get back. Normandy, out.”

They descended down through the levels, able to see the base staff’s sleeper pods through the slats in the elevator car. Some remained lit, but a great many of them had gone dark, their power severed. She opened her mouth to ask Nihlus if she thought the power failure due to time or attack, but closed it without speaking. The answer whispered through her mind. Tashac felt a remorse and sorrow too great to be accounted for by anything less than a massive act of betrayal. The shape of it remained elusive, however, and Shepard began to wonder if Tashac even knew what she’d done. Perhaps a part of her that remained untouched by the Reapers just knew that she’d been used.

A blast of darkness like a barrage of daggers swept inside the elevator as soon as the door opened. Shepard staggered backwards under the assault, then dropped to a knee as Tashac sent a shrill wail of pure, agonized terror stabbing through her head. Pressing her eyes closed, she braced her forearm on her knee and fought back, shoving the fear and pain back behind a wall. Still, the darkness slammed into her over and over, a battering ram of terrible, roaring nothingness that tore apart her every thought, splintering every ounce of control she maintained.

_Little pig, little pig, let me come in._

_Not by the hair on my chinny chin chin._

_Then I’ll huff, and I’ll puff, and I’ll blow your brain into tapioca._

A strong arm wrapped around her shoulders, sending the battering ram into retreat even before something bit into her neck.

“Hold tight, _Kahri_. It’ll just be a few seconds before it kicks in.” Garrus’s soft words sounded as if they came from behind a thick door at the end of a long hall. “I’ve got you.”

She wanted to reassure him, to thank him . . . anything, but her jaw locked tight, her teeth aching with the pressure. Still, she managed to keep the terrible, tar-slick spiders at bay until the injection eased them back, standing shoulder to shoulder with her resolve to shove them out of her head.

When she opened her eyes, a hand came down to help her to her feet. She took it and hauled herself up, feeling as though she gained three hundred pounds while down. “I’m okay,” she managed to say, the words sounding more like a gasp. “There’s something huge down here. I think it’s the Conduit. Tashac sabotaged the containment fields while they worked on it.” Hefting Roger back into both hands, she staggered to the door and looked out.

“Spirits. All these people,” Nihlus said, his voice hushed and sad. “All indoctrinated in their sleep.” He stepped past her, his eyes following the lines of sleeper pods up the massive walls. “All lost. All the people we . . . they knew. Dead or asleep and never able to wake.”

“No . . . no, it’s worse than that. I just . . .” Shepard brushed by, packing Tashac’s sorrow behind the wall. “I just don’t know how.” Despite her efforts, whispered tendrils snaked out to curl around Shepard’s heart, a ghostly ache that wondered if she could have betrayed even her son had he survived.

Shepard strode down the walkway to Vigil’s console, stopping a good six metres back, her heart seizing. “Sweet baby Jesus, what the hell . . .?” A device encased a portion of the console, its black, oil-slick form sending out wisps, not of darkness but of nothingness—pure void—that diffused like ink in water. The pure, horrible essence of the indoctrination field. “How did Sovereign not find out about this place?” she whispered. Her eyes travelled up the rest of the room, seeing the signs of Reaper tech everywhere.

“Spirits.”

Shepard spun to face Garrus, the horror and fear in that single word enough to chill her to the core. She followed his eyes down over the edge of the walkway, but couldn’t see what he looked at. Creeping closer, not at all sure she wanted to look, she peered over the edge. For a moment, her brain froze, unable process what she saw. Then, as she began to pick out recognizable shapes amidst the horror, her guts turned to water, threatening to spill out one way or the other.

Beneath them, Prothean bodies, almost completely turned into machines like the husks, hung between bits of cannibalized computers and other technology. Heads . . . far too many heads . . . stared out of the monstrosity, their glowing eyes sputtering, mouths hanging open in endless screams. Arms reached up, fingers splayed as if dragged into that pit clawing at anything to get a handhold and pull free before the machines consumed them. Tendrils of tech threaded through everything, punching through bodies like the tentacles of a ghoulish kraken, wiring them together and then up into Vigil’s base.

Again the question formed, leaving her lips almost like a prayer, “How in the name of the poor, destroyed Enkindlers did Sovereign not find out about this place ages ago? This has to be able to transmit.” The answer came to her as Tashac whispered a single name.

_Merol._

“The computers and Vigil are down. I couldn’t call out to the _Normandy_ without it recognizing Merol’s unindoctrinated imprint,” she said, turning away from the inhumane travesty. She looked up, meeting Nihlus’s eyes. “She knew. Even though she couldn’t stop herself, she said it herself, Nihlus. She told Merol that she trusted nothing but him, and he came through for us all.” Shepard brushed errant tears off her cheeks. “He sabotaged everything to contain her betrayal. He couldn’t stop it from happening, but at least he could keep it from getting loose.”

Casting one last glance over at the grisly remains of the people entrusted to protect the primitive races, Shepard approached Vigil’s console again. “Do you have more shots of that cocktail in your pocket there, barkeep?” she called over her shoulder. “I reckon I’m going to need a top-up or two before this business is through.”

“I’ve got four shots of the good stuff left,” Garrus answered. “And a couple experimental turian ones that Dr. Solus mixed up, but Dr. Chakwas said no guarantees with those.”

She crouched down a couple metres back from the console, able to feel the seductive, velvet slither of the Reaper field caressing her inside and out. “Take them. This thing is throwing the whammy out big time. And then stay back. I’m already brain-fucked, you two try to give it as much space as possible.” She activated her omnitool. “We need Legion and his industrial cutter down here.”

_Amalair._ Shepard stopped and looked back at Garrus. “Contact Shiala, get Amalair back on the shuttle. There’s no way we can leave her here. Who knows what Reaper crap is crawling around.
That’s the last thing we need: Reaper rachni everywhere.” Turning back to her work, she fabricated a fine laser and started cutting away the Reaper tech surrounding Vigil’s heart. The VI had opened the outer door, recognizing Tashac, and it had let her communication go through, so some part of it must still be intact.

Power cells pillaged from appliances and tools surrounded an invasive web of cables and conduits.
Shepard cut it all away, letting out a sigh of relief when the power cells fell onto the ground and the worst of the field bashing at the inside of her skull died.

Somewhere not too far away, machinery whirred to life. It took a moment for her to recognize the sound, but as it registered, ice water flooded her bloodstream. The sleeper pods. “Oh crap.” She tore at the tech faster. “Um, I seem to have tripped a failsafe here, gentlemen. We’re going to have visitors.”

“I hear it. The sleeper pods are activating,” Nihlus called back. “I’ll head down to the Conduit chamber, make sure it’s secure. We need to grab the Conduit and get the hell out of here.”

Shepard nodded without looking up. “Garrus, go with him.”

“Shepard!” they hollered in protest at the same time.
“We need the Conduit a lot more than I need someone staring at my ass while I do this. Go!” She reached the cover to the local hardware. Vigil was housed in a massive core at the bottom of the base, but if Merol needed to leave a message, instructions... even tried to save any of the VI, it would have had to be there. Otherwise Tashac would have known. “At least I hope so,” she whispered, cutting and tearing until she finally managed to remove the cover. She heard the elevator begin grinding its way down toward the Conduit chamber.

Two birds, one hand in the bush, and all that BS.

Judging by the shifting and banging coming from the other side of the wall, they were going to need to run their asses off and soon. She set the cover down and stared into a mess of combined Reaper and Prothean tech.

“Oh crap,” she sighed, looking in at the complexities of the Prothean tech. “Tashac, I’m going to need some help here.” Three devices stuck out as not quite belonging, but the Prothean had no knowledge to share. “Oh yeah, serious crap.” She reached up and opened a channel. “Legion, I need you. Can you take a fighter down to me or something?”

“Affirmative, Shepard-Captain. It will take this unit fourteen minutes and thirty nine seconds to reach your current location,” came the reply.

“Excellent, get your chassis in gear. Can you analyze some tech for me while you’re at it?” She keyed her omnitool and scanned the interior of the console. “I’m hoping to salvage something of use out of this mess.” She sent it to the geth.

“Affirmative.”

A low, guttural moan drifted from below and behind her. Shepard closed her eyes for a half breath, then glanced back. A three fingered hand, desiccated and riddled with metal, reached over the edge of the walkway, the clawed tips of the fingers scratching half inch grooves through the stone as it fought to catch hold and pull itself loose of the mess below.

“This is when you need to know how to use a shotgun properly, Shepard.” She shrugged Ingrid into her hand, changed the rounds, and sent an explosive round tearing through the things head, blowing its misshapen kepala right across the walkway. Without waiting to see the creature fall, she turned back to the console.

“No time to wait, Shepard. This ain’t going to be pretty.” Rubbing her hands together, she took a deep breath and reached out. “Here goes nothing.”

“Shepard.” A channel opened, Nihlus’s voice coming through sounding weary and sick. “We’ve got a pile of dead quarian kids down here. It looks like Saren exposed them to the beacon and then tried to use them to get past the security. They haven’t been dead long. The door is locked, but—”

“Shepard. Imagine meeting you here,” an altogether too familiar, flanged voice said from behind her.

Shepard’s spine stiffened as if someone had stabbed a javelin down through the top of her head. Damn, how did such complete madness manage to sound so controlled, so rational and sane? She stood slowly, reaching for Roger as she did.

“You won’t be needing that,” Saren said, walking a few steps from the elevator. “I’m not staying. I just thought I’d take a moment to talk to you. I tried talking to Nihlus, but he’s always been over-emotional. I’m hoping I can rely on you for a little common sense.”
Shepard laughed, hard and guttural. “Seriously? Nihlus is over-emotional. Oh, buddy, you’ve got no idea how much worse I am.” She fired off a couple of rounds, his shields deflecting them, then used bullets to punctuate her words. “Those kids down there . . . did they get you through the door? Or did you just throw them away . . . just a few more acceptable losses in your march of ‘Great holy shit, I’m as stupid as fuck, let’s help the bloody Reapers because that’s the absolute best plan my tiny bird brain could come up with’?” For the last bit she held the trigger, stopping just short of overheating.

“The Conduit is on its way to the Citadel,” he replied, completely unruffled by her bullets or words. “This is the only way, Shepard.” He held out his arms to encompass the chamber. “How can you not understand that when you can see the result of fighting back? No one escapes. If you fight, they twist you into their weapon.”

Shepard fired off a few more shots. “And if you help them, they twist you into their weapon. Given that choice, I’ll fight every time.” She closed on him, fury narrowing her view down to the spot between his glowing eyes. “Do you honestly think they’re going to spare your people?” She shook her head, barely suppressing the urge to retch. “You poor, delusional bastard. You’ve got a hell of a wake up call coming.”

Garbled moans and bellows echoed up from below and came through the side walls, backing Shepard toward the console again. Too many pods in that place still had power when she came in. The three of them needed to get out before they ended up overwhelmed. She had a Reaper to kill.

“Shepard.” Nihlus again.

“Go ahead.” When the elevator closed, she spun back to the console.

“The Conduit is gone. We’re on our way back up to you.”

“Understood. Shepard out.” She closed that channel and opened one to Legion. “Okay, I have to move. Have you had a chance to look over the scans?” She forced back the fury, letting it cool into a sharp, steady focus. Rage and electronics never mixed well.

“Affirmative. There is a black rectangular box at the center of the open panel. It is the direct, tactile interface module.”

“Okay.” Shepard activated her omnitool again. “I can get these leads off the main branch and still leave them attached to the interface module.” She reached in.

“No. Shepard-Captain do not make contact—”

“Circumstances conspired to wake me from my long slumber this morning, despite my pod remaining locked. At first, I believed it to be a malfunction. Employing the ingenuity for which I was brought here to help them build the first prothean constructed relay, I rewired the pod from the inside and escaped. Others were already up and working, but they did not respond when I spoke to them. They do not even appear to see me. They move about like the risen dead.

“Several of my peers also awoke early, fully in command of their faculties like myself. I can only extrapolate from what I see of the workers that we form the exception rather than the rule. Perhaps our waking up was a malfunction. If so, it appears the antecessors decided a different fate for us.

“I do not know what has happened, nor how many cycles have passed. I finished work on the relay yesterday and went to sleep. Today I awoke into a nightmare. Antecessors watch over and guide me. I am afraid.”

The feed skipped. “We have extracted eight of my fellows from their pods now. The small team of we fugitives have dedicated the last several days to accessing Vigil. The VI appears to have been sabotaged and sent into a record loop in order to prevent the monstrosities from accessing it. My spirit quakes at the horrors I have witnessed since waking. A full half of the sleeper pods still occupied are being reconfigured to transform our brothers and sisters into monsters while they dream. When they emerge, their souls are stolen, plucked out by the cold hand of the machines. They do not eat, they do not sleep, they simply work until their body fails and the new generation scavenges it for parts to build the great machine in the central chamber.”

Another skip. “I have been awake for one hundred nightmarish days. What began as a group of eight fellows has been reduced by half in that time. Every day, the slaves, the monstrosities of metal and flesh, pull more of our peers from their pods to work or undergo transformation. We entered Vigil’s control room two days ago, disguised as workers. The lead scientist of the Senarium left a message attached to one of the surface subroutines. Before we were discovered and forced to flee for the sewers, we were able to listen to the message recorded almost a millennia ago, and discovered the reason for our terrible fate. Betrayal at the hands of indoctrination. Tashac was the best of us. Is there nothing these machines cannot corrupt and destroy?”

“This will be my last chance to leave a message for any who may come after me. It’s alive, this Conduit. It is not merely a device, it is a Reaper in its own right, a being of terrible will. It demands to be returned to the Citadel, a demand that grows ever more strident day by day. Most have given into it. I have almost given in to it. The others build a device on top of the compound. I do not know its purpose, only that it is intended to let this beast escape. I cannot allow that to happen. I have only one recourse open to me, for I am the last who retains some small measure of herself, although I feel my grasp grow more tenuous by the day. What . . .? Oh yes, containment. I will release the suppression gas. All still living will die, the facility will go hermetic. Nothing will get out. The relay we built a millennia ago to infiltrate the Citadel will sit unused . . . although I do not possess sufficient naivety as to believe it will do so forever. If you’re hearing this. Stop it. Please, find a way to stop the Conduit from returning to its nest.”

“—with the module, it will download the information directly into your primary somatosensory cortex.”

Shepard raised a hand to her temple, pressing down hard in a futile effort to keep the small bombs going off inside her skull from blowing her brain all over Vigil’s console. “Thanks, Legion,” she said, the words coming out sounding more like muffled grunts than anything else. Heavy waves of nausea followed the pain. “Excellent advice.” She blinked hard a couple of times, trying to clear her vision. “So what should I touch?”

He relayed instructions as to her best chance to extract useful components.

“Shepard?” She heard Nihlus and Garrus jogging down the walkway behind her. “Any luck?”
She glanced over her shoulder as she worked the primary memory buffer loose, glad to have them at her back again. “Yeah, I touched something I wasn’t supposed to and found out there is some sort of back door onto the Citadel from here . . . out behind the base. A relay.” She winced as she pinched a finger. “Ow, dammit. Oh, and in other news, Saren stopped by to tell me how awesome he is. I shot him a lot. I tell you, we need to figure out his barriers, because . . . damn. Anyway, he’s on his way to the relay with the Conduit now. As soon as I grab these last couple of pieces, we’ll head after him.”

“Shepard?” Joker called, his voice laced with urgency.

“Sovereign has arrived at the Citadel?” she called, reaching up with one hand without stopping her work.

“Yes, ma’am. Commander Vakarian just contacted me. He said that the 2nd and 3rd battalions, 1st Marines had arrived at their assigned stations, but the 1st and 3rd battalions, 2nd Marines are still on their way.” He laughed, but it was a vicious laugh. “I’d love to see that, ma’am. Nearly six thousand pairs of Alliance boots on the ground. I bet the council is having kittens. Maybe I can adopt one and name it Suck on this you Indoctrinated Asshats.” He paused for breath. “What do you think? Too long?”

Shepard pulled the buffer free and stuck it in a pocket. “Little bit, sort of like this conversation. Put me through to Admiral Hackett, please, Joker.”

“Yes, ma’am. Normandy, out.”

“Shepard. Sovereign has arrived at the Citadel,” the admiral said.

“Yes, sir. It appears that Saren and my team have a back door onto the Citadel, so we’re going to be headed that way. He has the Conduit.” She popped another component out. “We’ll set out after him in about a minute.” Sighing, she said. “Before the Fifth Fleet heads for the Citadel, it needs to completely obliterate this base, sir. There’s Reaper tech everywhere.”

“Speaking of,” Nihlus called, as they opened fire.

“Understood, Shepard,” Hackett replied. “Let us know when you’re clear.”

“Yes, sir. Shepard, out.” She glanced up at Garrus. “Your suit getting all this? I want hard copy.”

“It is.” His sniper rifle sent echoes booming around the chamber every three seconds. “You just about done? It’s starting to get crowded in here.”

Shepard opened the link to Legion. “Okay, those two are out, anything else? And how close are you, we need to bug out of here in about ten seconds.” She shook her hands to stop their trembling as adrenaline sluiced through her bloodstream. Despite the shaking hands, the fear had bled away, leaving just a fierce determination. Sovereign and the Conduit had tormented and destroyed the last of the Protheans, and if allowed to activate the Citadel, the Reapers would destroy everything all over again. One option remained. One choice. Her two best men stood at her back. They’d get it done.

“One component remains, Shepard-Captain. It is a silver, metallic cylinder directly behind the seat of the primary memory buffer. We are landing at the shuttle now.”

“Excellent, stay there, and keep the evac clear,” Shepard shouted over the gunfire and growing screams and moans of the Prothean husks. She popped out the component and stuffed it into her belt, then grabbed Roger off her back and spun around to help. “Legion, is the rachni queen aboard
“the shuttle?” She winced against the roar of a great many terrible things coming echoed through the vaulted ceiling of the chamber. So much for Ilos’s peace.

“Affirmative.”

“Excellent. Prep it to go. We’re on our way to you now.” Prothean husk creatures climbed up from below and down the walls, horrific cockroach abominations of the people they’d once been. Opening fire, she moved steadily from one head to the next, blowing them open like dried up, dusty coconuts.

“Let’s get to the elevator before they all make it down here,” Nihlus shouted over the growing din of howls and roaring moans. Even in death, the creatures shrieked their torment, their bodies locked in a lingering nightmare. She prayed at least their souls escaped to find peace.

Shepard took point as they moved up, a wedge of bullets clearing a path through the dead. Nihlus and Garrus followed tight behind, their guns roaring until Shepard’s ears rang. Once they made it to the elevator, she’d have to turn her implants down before she went deaf. Slowly, they moved up the walkway, bodies scrambling over the dead even as they fell, clambering to obey the machine and destroy the invaders. After fifty thousand years of struggling to get free of the Senarium’s prison, the Conduit sat poised to return to its seat and fulfill its purpose. Through the voices of its victims, it defied their attempt to stop it.

Shepard hit the elevator control and the doors opened, a small horde of the husks pouring out. Beating them aside, she backed down the walkway, returning the way they’d come. “Back away from the doors. I’m going to use a little force.”

Once they had enough distance, she tossed two grenades into the mob, activating them on impact. Bits of bodies rained down on them, accompanied by an ichor she didn’t want to know the source of. The way open, they ran for the elevator.

“I really hope the grenades didn’t damage the mechanisms,” Shepard whispered as she punched the controls and the door closed. She looked over to find Garrus staring at her. “What?”

He just shook his head, then reached over and picked a strand of desiccated intestine from her hair. “Nothing.” Facing front, he shrugged. “Just sometimes I’m not sure if I’m glad you’re on our side or wish you were on theirs.”

Shepard let out a surprised chuckle and elbowed him. “Nice, and right after I saved our asses too.”

“Unless the elevator breaks and sends us crashing to our deaths,” Nihlus said, glancing down at her for a fraction of a second before looking back to the door.

“Great, two comedians teaming up. I see how it’s going to be.” She stretched her neck and rolled her shoulders, keeping herself loose in case a fight waited for them at the surface.

When the doors opened, however, the route out to the shuttle remained clear, the creatures no doubt still crawling up from below. She raced down the short hall and straight into the shuttle hatch, taking the copilot’s seat.

“Legion, you’re driving.” She keyed in the Conduit’s EM signature into the computer and set the nav system to follow it. “Just follow that marker the best you can.”

“Captain?” Joker called.

“Go ahead, Joker.” She opened the channel and shrugged herself into her harness.
“Anderson called to report that the krogan are landing in force, but all Alliance troops have arrived to support C-Sec and the combined forces are holding well. But he says the Citadel is closing, with Sovereign on the inside. Unless we can get the arms open, the fleets will be useless.”

“Understood. Tell him we’ll get the arms open. He needs to signal the Second Fleet and the quarians, maybe they can delay Sovereign. Even a few minutes could help. You need to get the Normandy there, Joker. We’re coming a different way.” She brought up the weapons systems, prepping just in case Saren had surprises waiting.

“Roger that, ma’am. We’ll see you when you get there.”

“Kick some ass, Joker, but don’t get my ship blown to hell. She’s brand new.” Even though she kept her tone light, a knot tied in her gut at the thought of the Normandy going up against Sovereign.

“God, Shepard, have a little faith. Like I’d kill my baby. Normandy, out.”

The shuttle lifted a metre off the ground and then zipped forward, navigating the treacherous corridors at a speed that kept Shepard’s eyes on the weapon screens.

“Thank the spirits for geth reaction times,” Nihlus grumbled from behind her.

They emerged from the far end of the base into the ancient aqueducts. Taking the shuttle up, Legion cut across the top of the base.

“Crap,” Nihlus whispered. “They were so damned close to letting that thing out of there.”

Shepard looked up, her gut clenching. A tower, five storeys tall, rose out of the center of the base, as much of an abomination as the technology they’d discovered inside. “They were trying to build out of the range of the jamming signal.”

“What stopped them?” he asked, crouching between the seats, steadying himself on the backs.

“Some of the Prothean researchers awoke early . . . a malfunction. When they saw what was going on and realized that the Conduit was an intelligence of its own and was trying to get out, she unleashed some sort of failsafe and killed everyone, locked the base down.” Shepard shrugged when he arched a brow plate at her. “Like I said, I touched something I wasn’t supposed to. I’m talented.”

“There it is.” Nihlus pointed to a brilliant blue-white glow up ahead. “They built a relay. It’s still active. Saren just used it.”

Shepard nodded, her guts twisting into a rock-hard pretzel. “Yeah, the Protheans built it to run infiltration missions. It’s been dormant for fifty thousand years. Legion, put the pedal to the metal. Let’s see if we can get through on Saren’s dime.” She looked over her shoulder, meeting his eyes. Nodding her head toward the crew compartment, she said, “Better buckle in. It could be a hell of a bumpy ride.”

As they cleared the building, Shepard opened a channel to Hackett. “We’re out of the target area, sir. Blow that place to hell.”

“Roger that, Shepard. Good luck. See you on the other side.”

“Yes, sir. Shepard, out.” Just before they reached the glowing, spinning rings, Shepard glanced back. As the first rounds impacted, explosions pluming into the air, she closed her eyes against tears of mixed sorrow and relief.

“And so passes the Prothean Empire.”
"Let's all agree to never do that again."

"Agreed." Shepard stared at Nihlus, waiting for the upside down Spectre to stop spinning. "Ow. Who builds a relay within striking distance of buildings?" She craned her head but couldn't see Garrus for frantically kicking rachni legs. She took a quick inventory, finding a few places that had complaints, but nothing major. "Hey, C-Sec, you breathin'?"

"Yeah." Garrus grunted then cursed. "Although, I'd be better if I didn't have a rachni queen flailing against my personal bits." She heard his armour banging against the hull as he tried to wriggle loose.

A loud, metallic thump from the pilot's side dragged her attention to Legion. The geth lay sprawled on the shuttle's ceiling, but quickly gathered itself and stood.

"Shepard-Captain, do you require assistance?" The geth crouched beside her.

"Yeah, help me not break something getting out of this harness." She waited until Legion grabbed hold of her shoulders and legs then undid the buckle. Although not an entirely graceful way out of her seat, at least it stopped her from slamming head-first into the roof.

"Are you injured?" it asked, helping her sit up.

"No. Go help the others. We've got to get out of here and hijack a car." Crawling between the seats, she managed to duck the queen's flailing limbs to force the hatch open. "Well, we're upside down after slamming into the tower and flipping over, but hey, we're on the Citadel." Dragging herself out, Shepard scrambled to her feet, then turned to help Nihlus crawl free of the wrecked shuttle.

"Amalair," she called, crouching in the hatch, "I apologize, but this extraction is not going to be big on dignity." She elbowed Nihlus. "Grab a leg. Let's just try not to do any major damage." She grabbed hold of the rachni queen's leg as close to the body as she could manage. "Legion, do you have an angle to push?"

"Affirmative."

Together, the three of them managed to wrestle the queen loose, then Legion went back in to help Garrus.

"Okay." Shepard sorted her armour and shrugged Roger into her hand. She turned a slow circle, letting out a low whistle. "Sweet baby Jesus, C-Sec and the Marines have had a hell of a fight on their hands." She offered her hand to Garrus as he crawled out, looking back to the destruction even as he pulled himself up. "Come on, we've got to keep moving."

Dead krogan, Marines, and C-Sec lay strewn like refuse over barricades, filling her with a deep, aching sorrow. None of them deserved to be there. Even the krogan were just pawns, sent to die without being given a choice or knowing why. She choked back her reaction; it wouldn't serve to do anything but slow her down. She set out, jogging past fires reaching up into the false sky from cars shot down to lie in battered heaps amidst the lakes and gardens. As she headed toward the tower, hoping to find a car in working order, Shepard noted the lack of civilian casualties. It looked as though C-Sec had been given enough notice to clear out the streets at least.

"C-Sec shuttle," Garrus called, jabbing his rifle in the direction of the vehicle. It stood in a garden just outside the wards access, which looked to have provided it some cover.

"Brilliant." Shepard veered to follow him, catching movement in the corner of her eye in the fraction of a second before a rocket exploded against her shields, throwing her into the air. After a moment of flight, she crashed into a railing and flipped over, landing butter side down in a patch of hibiscus. For a second, she lay stunned, every cell in her body aching and vibrating from being hit by the equivalent of a small bus.

Thank the sweet baby Jesus for shields.

Gunfire broke through the ringing in her ears. She shook her head, trying to clear away the strange, quivering layer over her eyesight, then clambered up onto her hands and knees.

"Shepard!" Nihlus called out, "are you all right?" Why did he always have to sound as though he was shouting from a half klick away?

"Yeah." She fished Roger out of the shrubberies and turned him on the krogan with the rocket launcher. "I think it rattled all my teeth loose, but I'm still moving."

Three more krogan joined the first, but at least only the one had a ML-77 launcher. She ducked down behind the railing, giving her shields time to recover.

"Is everyone else okay?" she called. Even as she asked, she felt the strange musical whispers of the queen moving through the air. They latched onto her guts like hooks, pulling at her to put down her guns and be calm. A grim smile scarred her face, guilt raking her with its claws as she called, "Press the advantage. We can't afford to fight our way across this damned station."

She unhooked three grenades from her belt, throwing them into the krogan line even as their fire slowed. "C-Sec, get your ass in that shuttle and get it up and running!" The grenades tore down the krogan shields, so she switched to Ingrid, lining up headshots as quickly as she could without overheating her gun. "Come on, go down, you bastards."

As she spoke, the sun went out, but she couldn't spare a glance for the sky. Instinct told her—pure, hysterical, primitive terror told her—what eclipsed the artificial sun, but two krogan still fought, advancing on Nihlus and Legion who covered the queen. They were trying to herd her down the stairs to the wards, but they didn't need to worry. The krogan stopped firing and stood, faces slack, held rapt by her song.

"I'm going to regret this," she sighed, pulling the last grenades. "Duck and cover, people!" She pulled her arm back. "Forgive me." She threw them, then dove behind the railing and hit the trigger.

"They're down," Nihlus hollered. "Let's move, Sovereign's incoming on the tower."

Shepard popped up from behind her cover, she saw the Spectre staring straight up, but she didn't spare a glance for the Reaper. Instead, she raced for the shuttle. Why weren't the thrusters firing? Why …?
Garrus appeared in the hatch. The expression on his face told her everything she needed to know, so she changed course. Fifty thousand years of planning, hard work, and suffering had gone into making sure that Sovereign didn't turn the Citadel into a Hellgate, and in a very few minutes, all of that would go straight to down the toilet.

"C-Sec will have a defensive line at the embassy," she called back. "They should have a working shuttle there." Shepard picked up the pace, ignoring the nettle-sting of rising panic under her diaphragm. "Someone grab that damned rocket launcher. We're probably going to need it."

"Keelah, is that our brand new shuttle upside down at the tower?" a familiar voice called, crackling and broken as it tore through the jamming. "Shepard, they're going to stop letting you have nice toys if you just keep breaking them."

Shepard spun around to see a Kodiak racing toward them at breakneck speed. Grinning, she reached up to open the channel. "Tali? What in the name of the holy Enkindlers is a nice girl like you doing in a warzone like this?" Shepard backed away, more and more quickly as the shuttle closed without slowing. "And who taught you to drive?"

"Saving your backside is what I'm doing." The shuttle stopped suddenly and dropped straight down. "And no one taught me to drive. I just watched you."

Only the rachni queen didn't dodge for cover as the shuttle slammed into the ground.

"Remind me to get you some remedial training," Shepard said as she ran over. She opened the hatch. "Come on people, we've got a lift."

"Driven by a drunk hanar," Nihlus grumbled as he stepped inside. He sat and strapped himself in. "Tali'Zorah, as glad as I am to see you, maybe you should let Garrus drive."

Shepard helped the rachni queen on board, then shut the hatch and ducked into the pilot compartment. "Thanks for stopping by," she said, grinning as a giddy relief swept through her, sunshine racing in behind windswept clouds. A second later, Tali lifted off, the shuttle shooting straight up faster than the inertial dampeners could compensate and sending Shepard scrambling to stay on her feet. The relief died in a flash of dizziness. They were all going to die before they made it to Sovereign at that rate.

Tali glanced back. "Did you think I'd come all this way with you and miss taking down Sovereign?" she replied, scoffing. "No chance." She looked back at the controls just in time to dodge a rocket launched from the ground, sending Shepard crashing to the floor behind the pilot seat.

"Ow." Shepard scrambled back up onto her feet. "Yeah, I'm thinking Garrus should be driving. Tali. We need to fly into the superstructure. It's going to get a little hairy."

Tali grumbled, but slipped sideways to let Garrus slide in behind her. "Fine, but I get complete credit for the big save this time." She paused then slanted one slender shoulder in a vague shrug. "Well, Kal can have a little of it."

Shepard brushed a quick kiss against the cheek of the quarian's helmet as Tali squeezed by to take a seat. "Absolutely." The captain turned to Tali's copilot. "Kal'Reegar, I'm glad as hell to see you, but I need to boot you out of your seat too." When he moved, she flopped in and entered the Conduit's signature into the nav computer.

"Okay, Brother C-Sec, let's follow that blip." She did up her harness and brought the weapons Garrus sent the shuttle looping high above the presidium, heading for the outer edge of the ring. It felt like going the wrong direction, but Shepard left it to the C-Sec agent's superior knowledge of the Citadel. At least it seemed like the wrong direction until they cleared the ring and the immense bulk of Sovereign reared over them, millions of years worth of the collective nightmares of every race.

For a moment, her blood turned to paste in her veins, but then she gritted her teeth and pressed her eyes closed. "If there was ever a time to prove that monster wrong, now would be it," she whispered under her breath. She cracked her neck and steadied her hands on the firing controls. Even if God had abandoned her, even if He'd turned a blind eye to the pleas of billions of voices calling out to Him in thousands of languages, she was there. She had a chance to end it, and she wouldn't let her own cowardice destroy that.

They entered the presidium ring so close to Sovereign's underbelly that it felt as if she should be able to reach out the door and run her fingers along that black, oil-on-water hull.

"It gets tight," she said, mostly just needing to hear her own voice for a second, "but Tashac got a small frigate through, so we should be fine."

Garrus glanced over, his mandibles flicking ever so slightly. "Don't worry, Shepard. I've got you."

She grinned, and turned to her nav panel, updating the station's overlay. "There it is again, C-Sec, that delusional streak."

"When it comes to you, always," he said, his voice low enough to stay between them and rumbling deep in his chest in a way that made her heart stop and then start fluttering like a hummingbird's wings.

"Stop that," she grumbled, half-heartedly. "You're going to give me a heart attack." And yet, something inside her that had been floating loose, crashing around with her every movement and every thought, settled, anchoring itself. For all she teased him, he had her.

They encountered no resistance on the way through the superstructure until they came to the huge doors leading into the chamber where Sovereign had been born. Garrus set them down at the doors, Shepard leaping free of her harness even before it landed.

"Everyone, guns at the ready. I'll be a monkey's blind, fat aunt if there isn't a small herd of krogan on the other side of this door." She waited until her people stood behind her, then turned and opened the hatch.

Try as she might to ignore them, Tashac's memories burst free of Shepard's control, flooding her with the fear and sadness the Prothean had felt upon seeing the now pristine floors covered with the bodies of so many races, the Keepers sorting through them like workers on some grisly mass production line … Attit and Merol's presence at her back, giving her courage even as her own failed. The loneliness … and the hope.

Shepard grabbed onto the last and pushed the rest back, forcing Tashac behind her wall. She couldn't concentrate with two sets of thoughts rolling around in her head, and if she couldn't concentrate, they were all very, very dead.

Gathering herself, focusing on the task, she skirted around the shuttle, heading for the door. "Cover me, I'll crack it open."
The team moved like water, effortlessly flowing into positions to cover the door as Shepard ran to the panel. She expected it to be locked, and it didn't disappoint. "And that's why God made engineers," she whispered, cracking the panel open. She overrode the door controls in under five seconds, the giant gears grinding and roaring as they began to move for what was likely the first time in fifty thousand years. "And made us awesome," she crowed.

She ducked behind the rear panel of the shuttle, giving Garrus a cocky grin as she took cover next to him. "Not a real engineer, my ass."

He just shook his head. "Never letting that one go, are you?"

Unfortunately, rounds interrupted her witty comeback, four krogan spilling out the door in an undisciplined charge. One of them slammed into the front of the shuttle hard enough to knock both Shepard and Garrus on their asses, but the behemoth also knocked himself senseless. Tali and Nihlus's shotguns tore into its head, pulverizing it into a pulpy, shredded mass. A shot from Ingrid between its nonexistent eyes put it out of its misery.

That left three.

"Shepard, Vakarian, Tali," Nihlus called. "Bring down their shields. I'll handle the rest of it." He brought the rocket launcher up, couching it in against the angle of his shoulder.

Three overloads tore along the krogan's shields, bringing them down with an impressive light show. Not two seconds later, rockets sizzled through the air, slamming into the krogan before they could spread out, each blast damaging all three. They went down without a sound, their unnatural silence saying everything about the wrongness of their origin and being.

"Krogan should go out roaring in defiance," she muttered, choking down a hard lump of pity. Just one more sin to chalk up on the Reaper's endless tally. Did God, or the universe, or karma even have a sufficient punishment for the horrors the Reapers had inflicted? In the end, she supposed it didn't matter. Saving the living would even the scales enough for her. As long as the harvests ended, she could let the dead sort the rest of it out.

She burst out of cover, dashing forward to the door, checking through for any more surprises. Nothing. She scowled at that. Was it arrogance, supreme confidence that made Saren leave his back so wide open? Four krogan to stop her? Surely, he knew better.

"He's just slowing us down," Nihlus said, stepping up beside her. "He wants us there at the end. Or Sovereign does." He shrugged, a quick, barbed jerk of his shoulders. He strode through the door, passing her like a storm, all lightning and thunder. She grabbed his hand, stopping him. He squeezed her fingers, a little of the electricity dissipating. "I'm okay, Shepard. Just ready to end this. Spirits, am I ready to end this."

She nodded and released him. "Feels like we've been fighting for fifty thousand years." Looking back, she said. "Tali, Kal, stay here, and watch our backs. Make sure the path out of here stays open. Protect Amalair." She crooked her finger at Garrus and Legion. "You two can keep an eye on the canyon from the archway." Following Nihlus, she lifted into a jog, keeping her eyes carefully averted from the open chasm where Tashac had stared into the darkness, letting it in to eat away her soul.

She paused just inside the arch, turning back to look into Garrus's eyes. Damn, those ice-blue eyes. They pulled at her, but she shut that down too. The fight had always been coming down to her and Nihlus. She needed Garrus to get out and keep things moving if everything went FUBAR with the Conduit. With the shuttle, the rest of the team had a chance to make it to the Normandy and then to "Here's your position, gentlemen. Keep our retreat open, and if anything goes too enormously wrong up there, get Tali, Kal, and Amalair to the Normandy. Joker already knows to bug out if Reapers start pouring through that relay, but he'll be waiting for you." She smiled as Garrus's mandibles and brow plates dropped, seeing the realization slice through him that she was going on and leaving him behind. She wished she could break down and tell him how naked her back would feel without him there. That she could tell him … .

"Keep a weather eye. We'll be back," was what came out.

Tearing herself away from the stare that begged her to let him have her back, the one that told her how much she was loved, she turned to the ramp leading down. God, she hoped she was coming back. She really wanted to see where that whole thing was headed. What if it had lasted, and they managed to grow old together? Wouldn't that have been something?

"Shepard!" Garrus made as if to follow her, but she turned back, slicing the air with her hand to still his protest.

"No, stay here and protect the others, Garrus. I don't want you exposed to that thing." She gave him a tight-lipped smile. "I'll be back in a few minutes, then we'll find ourselves a nice restaurant that hasn't been shot to hell." She began backing down the slope into that fabricated canyon. "Or … maybe we'll order in pizza. Tomorrow, I could even make you breakfast."

He followed her a couple of steps. "I still don't trust you not to poison me." He held out a hand, talons reaching for her. "Come back."

She winked, her eyes hungrily moving over his face, hoarding and packing away everything she saw there, storing it down deep for safe keeping. Just in case. "Count on it." Another step and she turned, running down the slope. "Come on, Brother Nihlus, get your assless in gear. We've got a harvest to stop, glory hallelujah."

A small squad of krogan moved down into the low spot from the platform ahead, but between Nihlus's new-found love affair with the rocket launcher, and her overload, they made short work of them. Still, would have been nice to have Wrex or Sparky along to fling them over the edge.

When she reached the bottom, she put rounds through their brainstems, making sure they didn't regenerate and come up on them from behind. That battlemaster on Therum still haunted her every time she faced a krogan, and heaven knew Wrex could take a licking and keep coming back for more. That was so not the time for taking chances.

As they climbed the other side, Nihlus dropped the rocket launcher, trading for his shotgun. Ahead, Shepard could see the faint energy wrinkle of a barrier blocking access to the platform, and beyond that, the Conduit raised slowly into the air, lifting to seat itself into its nest of controls. For a second, the sight sent a thousand splinters of panic slicing through her. How could they stop it in time?

"Sovereign, the Conduit is in place," she heard Saren call out as they reached the barrier. "What are your orders?"

"Your purpose has been fulfilled," the soulless monotone replied, its words glacial and dark as they boomed over them. "Your utility is at an end, your mind too damaged to be of use."
Saren stared up at the Reaper for long seconds before he turned to look at Shepard and Nihlus. Although his face showed no emotion, his mandibles pulled in tight, his brow plates still, his mouth hung open ever so slightly, and his back bowed as if a load too heavy to bear had knocked the breath out of him.

Although too filled with anger and disgust to allow it, Shepard wished she could feel at least empathy for the fallen Spectre. She knew how it felt to witness god turn its back. Stepping up to the shield, she pressed her hand to it. The darkness lashed at her, and she winced as the coils of its whip tore into her but didn't fight the pain. She didn't need to fight it. The pain and darkness already lived so far down inside her that her entire being had formed around it like a tree's flesh growing around a nail.

"I was afraid you wouldn't make it in time, Shepard … Nihlus," Saren called, his voice that same even, rational tone. Perhaps too much of him had been eaten away by the indoctrination to even feel Sovereign's betrayal.

"I always got excellent marks for punctuality in school." Shepard craned her head, trying to see if she could find a way around the barrier. Nothing showed.

He took a couple of steps toward them. "I think the three of us have known from the beginning that it would end like this." Those horrible, glowing eyes turned to Nihlus. "You've lost, you know that don't you? In a few minutes, Sovereign will send the signal to the Conduit. The relay will open. The Reapers will return."

Nihlus stepped up beside Shepard, as sharp and brittle as glass shards in liquid nitrogen. "We still have a few tricks up our sleeves."

Saren's mouth opened, but he hesitated over his next words, and when they came out, the tone flattened. "Sovereign has recognized your value. You've both impressed it. Surrender to the Reapers, and you will be spared."

Shepard laughed, the sound cracking the air like a gunshot even over the noise of the Citadel and Sovereign moving overhead. "You think we're going to buy that line after hearing you get the royal kiss off? Seriously?" She slammed a fist against the barrier. "Let us through this fucking thing, and we'll give Sovereign a kiss off that he'll remember for about twenty seconds before his ass gets blown out through his weird tentacle-leg-finger-things."

"Don't you understand, Shepard?" Saren called. He spread his arms out to the galaxy. "Every cycle there are hundreds like you. Hundreds who fight back, who organize and resist. They find every single one of you and destroy you from the inside out then turn you on your own people. You aren't special. You aren't mighty, and in the end, they will reduce you to dust, just like the thousands before you."

"Saren." She reached out a hand. "It's not too late. We can counteract the effects of indoctrination, mostly. You have so much intel that could help us prepare." A wrecking ball slammed through the wall of anger, allowing empathy, and worse … a gut-twisting sympathy to wash through—cold, clear waters pouring through a dam.

"The most crushing blow … and yet the most precious gift a warrior can be given," Tashac whispered through Shepard's thoughts, "is the moment of crystal clarity when hatred clears to reveal that the enemy is a shadowy reflection of oneself. For all their deeds, they are neither superior nor inferior, just beings seeing the infinite complexities of the universe through a different glass. In that moment, you fall in love, and it breaks your heart. All killing diminishes the whole. All of it."
Shepard pushed that aside and lifted a beseeching hand to the barrier. "Please, help us. I get it. Your best chance for salvation just kicked you in the ass. I've been there. Use it."

"Saren!" Nihlus stepped up beside her. A soft, rumbling keen underscored his words. "Listen to her. You were led along the wrong path trying to save our people. I understand that. What Shepard and I are doing could actually save them. If we can stop Sovereign from opening the relay, we could delay them for cycles … give ourselves a chance to prepare."

Saren shook his head. "No. Like I said, Nihlus … thousands like you. It always turns out the same. They are too many and too strong." He laughed, but it came out a warbling sort of keen. "What I didn't realize is that every cycle, there are also thousands like me. Pawns twisted by indoctrination to believe they are doing what is best. In the end, we die ground into dust just as fine as the ones who fight."

His eyes turned to look at the Conduit. "It's just about seated. When it reaches full power, Sovereign will open the arms and beam a signal through the Conduit into dark space. It will last exactly forty-five seconds." As he spoke he backed up to the edge of the platform. Stepping up onto the low barrier around the edge, Saren pulled his pistol from his hip.

"Saren?" Nihlus ran up a step, slamming into the barrier. "Saren! Don't. Please."

"I knew what you were the moment I saw you in that mine, filthy and ragged. I knew that one day, you'd eclipse me. I kept you angry, kept you raging against your mother and the galaxy, because I knew that was the only way to hold you back." His mandibles spread and fluttered hard. "You are so much more, Nihlus. Let go of your anger." The glowing, blue stare turned to Shepard. "That one will show you how limitless you are."

The Spectre activated his omnitool, keyed in commands, then lifted his gun. "Watch your back, Shepard," he said. "They'll be coming for you. You forced their hand."

"Saren, no. Nihlus is—" Shepard slammed her fists against the barrier.

"It's too late for me, Shepard." He leaned back, a talon touching a control on his omnitool, dropping the shield protecting the Conduit, as the gun travelled past it to his chest. Two reports hammered through the air, a mist of indigo blood exploding outward as the bullets tore through his heart. Saren fell backwards off the platform, his body tumbling through the awkward, partial gravity.

Shepard fell forward onto her hands and knees as the shield dropped. She scrambled up and ran forward, reaching out, but too late. Eventually, the gravity of one of the wards would snag him, but it didn't matter. Saren was dead, buying peace and perhaps absolution the only way he knew how.

"I as free forgive you as I would be forgiven: I forgive all," she whispered, Jenkins's last words whispering through her, a gentle breeze of understanding.

Shepard turned from Saren's corpse and ran up to the Conduit interface. They had a much bigger problem ahead. "Oh god. Okay. We know that they sabotaged this thing to do something, right?" She looked over at Nihlus, desperate stare begging him to know what they were supposed to do. "Do you remember? Anything?"

He shook his head and raced to her side, looking over her shoulder. "It's like Merol dumped the information out of his memory." He threw up his hands. "Forty-five seconds is a hell of a short window, Shepard."
"Bloody lot of good you are to me," she snapped without any heat. She looked up, Sovereign's massive form hidden by the platform's roof. Still, the horrible insect legs scraped and ground against the tower above them, a cacophony of metal on metal that hammered spikes into her gums and set her teeth grinding. "Tashac knew she was indoctrinated. She couldn't stop them from using her to sabotage the base, but maybe she managed to keep this locked away from them."

She reached up for her radio, then realized the uselessness of that gesture. Even if the Conduit wasn't jamming all their signals, Amalair didn't use a radio. Her heart fell, splashing into a chill, slimy hopelessness that sloshed in the pit of her belly. She reached back and gripped Nihlus's hand. "Go, open the arms. If I fail, maybe the fleets can still take that thing down." Releasing him, she laid her hands on the interface, hoping some spark of inspiration would strike.

Nihlus leaned down over her and nuzzled her ear. "If we don't survive this … thank you, Shepard."

She let out a bitter cough of laughter, the boggy hopelessness splashing up. "For what? Getting everyone in the galaxy killed?"

"For the best few months of my life." He strode to the console before she could reply.

Pressing her eyes closed, Shepard searched, rifling through thoughts and memories, tearing at the wall she'd erected around Tashac with desperate, bleeding fingers. The answer was there. It had to be there. The Prothean spent fifteen cycles creating a way to make sure Sovereign could be stopped. Surely, Tashac would have found a way to pass the information on.

"Come on," she growled. "You were strong enough to fend the darkness off for more than fifteen years. You're strong enough to help me figure this out."

Inside her mind, the oil-slick oozed out of its carefully partitioned area, millions of microscopic legs skittering and scrambling, racing along her neurons. They laughed, cold and pointed, mocking her desperation and fear as the bit and chewed. "Thousands like you throughout history," they whispered. "Thousands and thousands over the millions of years since the cycles began, and here you are poised on the edge of the great abyss that took them all."

Shepard scraped the back of her glove across her brow and pulled back from the interface. She had a picture in her head of the moment Tashac turned away from the Conduit in the chamber under the base. She'd opened something to expose inner workings. A panel.

Climbing up to within arm's reach as the Conduit seated itself and began to power up, Shepard circled its heinous form, running gloved fingers over the surface, searching. Touching the thing exhumed a long-buried corpse: ancient, clotted, and dirty. So very dirty. The kind of filth that made it so no one could ever bear to touch her again. If they did, they'd feel the depth of that mark, recoil and turn their backs on her. No amount of time, no number of deeds noble or great could clean away a taint like that, it could only be borne until it eventually ate the sufferer alive. One day, Shepard's would eat her alive.

The darkness crawled over everything, leaching all colour from the world. The gelid sludge crawled out of her belly to ooze over her organs, easing her down into its embrace. 'What will you have? What will the darkness allow you to keep?' it asked. She knew the answer. It would allow her nothing. She'd fight until the moment she died, never discovering victory, never knowing peace. Was there any point to fighting a battle she could never win?

"It's okay, Janey," her father whispered in her ear. She whimpered a little as the warmth of his breath seeped through the hood. "If you need to let go … ." A sob tore from his throat, but he cleared it as if it was just another breath. "... it's okay. You've fought so hard, been so very brave. I know it hurts, baby, so if Jesus calls you home ..." Gentle pressure dimpled the hood, pushing it against her skin. "... you can go. Your mom and I understand, and one day we'll all be together at His—"

"Shepard?"

She looked up at Nihlus, his voice breaking through the litany of hopelessness inside her head, his familia notas bright and gorgeous in the dim light. He really was beautiful, particularly right then. Beautiful and so very alive. So very there, despite everything they'd been through over the weeks. Clinging to that, she asked, "Please tell me Garrus gave you those injections? I really need one right now."

He tossed her a syringe. She snatched it out of the air, yanked the cap and pressed it to her neck, then threw it away. "Thanks."

Then she saw it, right where her hand had been, and she laughed, throwing off the chill. "Oh ho, afraid are you, you bastard? Nice trick, putting the whammy on me like that." She opened her omnitool and fabricated a tool to pry the cover off the panel. There, in the center, sat a very familiar-looking black rectangular component. She grinned and called out, "So, Legion, I probably shouldn't touch this one, either, should I?"

Despite her words, she reached in, closing her hand—

"*I have dedicated a great many cycles to installing this backdoor. I hid it within the work that the darkness commanded I perform. It is not the miracle I wished to leave for the one who follows in my footsteps, but it will have to suffice. I have laboured for cycles to alter the Reaper technology or sabotage it, but it defies even the miracles that Merol can force the galaxy to perform. Instead, I have simply wired in a small amplifier and transmitter."

"*When the Vanguard transmits the signal for the Conduit to open the relay, a feedback loop will return along the same pathway, thus bypassing the Vanguard's defenses. For those brief moments, the feedback will cripple the Reaper's sensory processes and disrupt its defenses."

"I pray that whomever discovers my work possesses the armada to destroy the Vanguard during those moments. If not, the relay will still open and the cycle will begin anew. If, however, the Vanguard meets with its destruction while transmitting, the Conduit will be destroyed as well. It will not save the galaxy, but it will buy precious time to prepare, and the Citadel will be closed to them as a means of return. I just pray it is enough." —in the small box.

"Shepard, the arms are opening," Nihlus called. "Fair bet that Sovereign knows something is up." He glanced over at her. "You okay?"

"Better than okay. This thing is seconds from hitting full power. Can you get me a channel to Hackett? We need a crazy-ass amount of precision here." She opened her omnitool, setting it to scan the receiver. "Just get me a line through the jamming, or we're going to be oh so very royally fucked. I really don't want a front row seat for a Reaper invasion today."

Nihlus keyed commands into the console, then tossed a glance back over his shoulder and shrugged. "It's scratchy, but you should be able to get something through."

"Admiral Hackett? Are you receiving?" Static and a harsh clicking sound answered her. "Shepard to Hackett, please come in."
"... eading you, Shepard. What's ... status?"

"We've reached the Conduit. It's rigged to help bring down Sovereign's defenses. When I signal, the fleets need to open fire on the Reaper. All of them. We have a forty-five second window to take that thing down. Do you read?" She shouted, praying that he got enough of the message to pass the orders along.

"Understood. All fleets ... on Sovereign when ... receive your signal. Standing by."

Shepard kept her eyes on the scan, watching the power level climb. The readings spiked a half second later as Sovereign's transmission funneled through the Conduit. Around them, the Citadel began to shake, a deep resonating tremor that let her know the relay awakened. She opened the channel. "Now, sir. Admiral Hackett, do you read? Now!"

She ran to the edge of the platform, looking out. The ward arms had reached about a sixth of the way open, but already, ships poured through. Alliance, geth, and quarian vastly outnumbered the vessels of the Citadel fleet.

Then, like a firefly against a jet-black sky, the Normandy soared in, racing at the head of the attack wave. It strafed the Reaper with its canons and darted away, but not before the terrible, klaxon roar of the massive laser sounded. The deadly beam missed the Normandy to punch through one of the Alliance ships, slicing the frigate in half. Fire plumed in a horrible cloud, alive and fierce, the ship screaming defiantly in the face of death for a single moment before it expired.

Like a crowd willing to stand back and watch a fight until the bully took down one of their friends, the fleets opened fire, missiles and cannons tearing into the Reaper. Beautiful, terrible birds of prey darted and dove, reeling through the ether in intricate formations, sweeping in and away from that deadly but cumbersome laser. Shepard soared alongside them. The inferno of a near miss seared along her spine followed by the exhilaration of holding the attack until the last possible second, then rolling into a sharp climb along the Reaper's enormous body, guns pouring out death and destruction.

At their head soared the most beautiful of the metal avians, her silver hull gleaming in the light of the nebula, reflecting the death throes of her less able fellows in brilliant gold, amber, and crimson. Shepard clung to the edge of the platform, leaning out as her ship danced. Her heart climbed up into the back of her throat, and she held her breath as if the Normandy needed all of her, even her air, in order to survive the monster that tried to snuff her out.

Seemingly aware that the little frigate was Shepard's vessel, or perhaps merely because it proved the most vexing target, Sovereign's laser lashed out time and again, trying to carve up the nimble ship. Each time Joker worked his magic, vanishing from the laser's path.

Gradually, over the sounds of battle, Shepard registered a noise, a faint whine where none had existed before, but, captivated by the artistry of Hackett's attack, she let it build. Then Sovereign relinquished the Citadel, thrusters roaring as it fled for the opening arms and the relay beyond that.

Shepard screamed, a vicious bellow of victory, and punched her fist at the fleeing Reaper. "Run, you bastard. Run all you want, you're not getting away." She laughed as her prediction came true, the ward arms not yet open wide enough to allow the massive ship to escape. The laser roared, the terrible dragon bellow that she remembered from Feros, but this time, it provoked no superstitious terror. They'd pulled the dragon's teeth.

The Reaper opened fire at the end of one of the ward arms, trying to make a big enough hole. But, a swarm of angry bees protecting their nest, the fleets chased the dragon down, hammering away at it until the Reaper's shields failed. The dying god's skin cracked under the deluge of munitions, flame and smoke ripping through. Great wounds erupted along Sovereign's underside, one and then another of its legs tore free, then the horrible howl of the laser fell silent.

Within that vacant aural space, Shepard realized the whine had become a piercing shrill of building feedback. "Oh crap." She grabbed Nihlus and bolted for the ramp down. "This thing is going to blow."

She didn't quite make it to the ramp before a massive hand slammed into her from behind. It threw her from the walkway, tossing her end over end to slam into the slanted walls of the canyon. Sliding upside down on her back, she careened down their length, tumbling to a rolling stop at the bottom.

"Shepard!"

She looked up at the sound of her name, wondering why Nihlus sounded so terrified. Then the entire presidium tumbled down to land on her head, and the universe went dark.

Light flashed.

Pain. Alarms of agony screamed along her entire left side.

_Sweet baby Jesus, the pain. Help me. I think my arm's been ripped off. Possibly my entire side. Ummmm ... help? Anyone? I need help here._

After calling out inside a strange, half-waking dream for what felt like a couple of days, Shepard began to climb out the rabbit hole, fingers scrabbling for purchase in the dirt, nails peeling back. Where were all the pianos and chandeliers, footstools and hat boxes when she needed them?

_Curiouser and curiouser. Why didn't I just drink the stuff in the bottle or eat the cake? Seems the door had to be an easier way out than this. If men on the chessboard get up and tell me where to go ... . No wait, that's Jefferson Airplane._

"Shepard?"

_Is that Garrus screaming at me? Shhhhh ... C-Sec, give the wounded woman a break._

"Shepard!" Crashing and banging pulled her further out of the fog. "I've found her."

Orange light burst like the sun on the other side of her eyelids. She winced away from it, the movement pulling a long, barbed moan of agony from her throat. A hundred varren sank their teeth in along that side, ripping and tearing as they fought over her remains.

"Shepard." Gentle talons brushed the hair from her forehead. "You okay? Can you hear me?"

She ran her tongue around the inside of her mouth, dragging it over the sandpaper and tar that clung to every surface. "I hear you," she managed to croak out, the words snapping like old twigs underfoot. "My left side hurts."

He bent down and nuzzled her brow. "Yeah, you have about a ton of rubble lying on it. Just keep still. We'll get you out."

Forcing her eyes open, she searched for him past the fiery light of his omnitool. His eyes, when she locked onto them, felt like a long, cool drink of water. "Sovereign?"
His mandibles fluttered hard. "A whole lot of pieces floating outside the Citadel. It tried to carve its way out through one of the wards, but the fleets tore it to pieces." A thumb caressed her cheek. "You did it, Kahri. You saved everyone. Not bad, even for a freakishly tiny, ornery, crazy … beautiful miracle."

She shook her head, a soft cry of pain answering even the slight movement. "No, not saved, just delayed." Her eyes drifted closed as she pressed into the comforting warmth of his hand. "Still lots of work to do, Garrus. Still so very much to do."
Now comes the good parts, right? Victory, parties, rambunctious napping.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Trigger warning for the third paragraph here. Graphic depiction of violence.

“Shepard?” Joker’s voice came over the medbay intercom, waking Shepard out of a fitful doze. Terrible, glowing eyes stared into her soul, consuming it in their fire. Despair. You’ve done nothing but delay the inevitable. Thousands like you. Thousands fight. Thousands fall before us, their minds enslaved, turning on the very people they struggled to save. Your god has abandoned you, Jane Shepard. It left you to the batarians—

A piercing whistle and then a vicious crack just before the lash sliced into her flesh, carving a deep enough gash into the backs of her thighs that the end snagged. The gravelly voice laughed as he tore it loose, her screams and whimpers just fueling his vicious gluttony. “That’s right, little girl. Cry out for your god. Does it answer? Does it save you?”

—and it has left you to us. We will not be as merciful as they were. The voice filled her head with a ringing that threatened both her eardrums and her sanity.

“Captain?”

Jumping up, heart hammering against her ribs, sweat beading across her lip, Shepard let out a thin moan of pain. As the medbay crystallized into focus, a trembling sigh escaped her lips, dry and futile . . . a corpse’s last breath, and she eased back down onto the bed.

“Captain? Shepard, are you there?”

Shepard scrubbed at her face with a hand. Why was he calling over the intercom? She reached up to tap her radio and found nothing. Oh right, the Conduit exploding had blown her implants. At least that explained the constant ringing. She made a mental note to get them replaced before they left the Citadel in the morning.

“Yeah, Joker. You found me, what’s up?” She glanced at the regen cage around her shoulder then over at Chakwas who sat slumped back at her desk, looking as if she’d given in to sleep as well. Well, that’s what the doc got for insisting on holding prisoners. If Chakwas didn’t let her go and soon, missing a little beauty sleep would be the least of her problems. Oh yes, rebellion loomed, becoming a very real possibility.

“The council called. I asked if they wanted to be put through, but they just demanded that you and Nihlus meet them at 1100 hours Citadel time tomorrow in the garden by the relay monument. Dress uniform.” The pilot’s tone came across as suspicious as the orders made her feel.

“They didn’t mention needing a blindfold and a cigarette, did they?” Despite the joke, she felt very real boulders of doom rolling toward her, set to crush her flat.

“No, ma’am, but you might want to take them with you anyway. And a small squad. And your guns. And maybe the Normandy should be sitting there with our cannons locked on them.”

Shepard chuckled, but it tumbled out sharp-edged, bitter, and unconvincing. “Thanks, Joker. Shepard, out.”

A shard of dread took root, spreading tendrils of uncertainty worming through her steel, weakening it. Letting out a long, shaky sigh, she sank into the massive pile of pillows under her re-injured shoulder. What did the summons the next day mean? Good news? Bad news? She didn’t possess the faintest clue how the council would react to Sovereign’s destruction. Perhaps the vanguard’s destruction loosened the Reapers’ hold over the council. Maybe they had a chance to find the orbs, destroy them and get everyone fighting.

And maybe Reaper back up plans sprang into action even while she lay there. They’d destroyed the Conduit, but four other keys remained. What resources did the Reapers still possess, and how long would it be before those resources began to make their move?

If she was certain of one thing, it was that It would be up to her people to find and destroy the rest of the keys, or use them to stop the Reapers before they could manage their invasion. But first, her people needed a break. She’d run them ragged, and they’d impressed the hell out of her, holding up better than she could have expected. They deserved some beach time or shopping time, or whatever before they jumped back into the fire.

She sighed. But, before that, and before she risked going before the council, she had one important thing to do.

She opened a channel to the bridge through her omnitool. “Hey, Joker. Have the crew assemble in the cargo bay at 0830, please. We have some friends to send on their way. Ask Anderson and Hackett to attend if possible.”

“Aye, aye, ma’am. I’ll pass the word.”

“Thanks. Shepard, out.” She closed the channel and wriggled her shoulder. It hurt but moved just fine. “Hey, Doc, throw a battered soldier a bone, and let me out of this damned thing. I need to go get some sleep.”

Chakwas started awake, looked around and then sighed. “You’re impossible. Are you aware of that?” She grumbled as she pushed herself up out of her chair, but it was a wasp with no sting. “Of course you are. Only someone completely impossible could pull off the things you have in the past few months.” She ran her omnitool over Shepard’s side and tutted, but then turned the frame off. “Very well, but when you’re up and moving, keep this arm in a sling. You’ve tried to tear it off twice now. Give all those ligaments and tendons time to knit.”

Shepard touched two fingers to her temple, then swept them around in a teasing salute. “Yes, ma’am, Admiral Doctor, ma’am.”

Chakwas unlatched the frame. “Completely impossible.”

They both looked to the door when it opened. Garrus stepped inside, a brilliant shaft of light through the darkness. He paused, staring at her like he hadn’t seen her in a week rather than a couple of hours. Lifting her good hand, she held it out to him, .

“Hey there, hero,” she said, her cheeks heating with the intensity of his stare. Sweet baby Jesus, she loved the way he looked at her. It incinerated the darkness and warmed her all the way to her toes.

“I think you’ve got that backwards.” He closed the few steps between them, his long talons wrapping around her hand. “You’re the hero. You and Nihlus.” He let her pull him in, mandibles spreading in a butterfly-wing fragile smile. As if the doctor weren’t there, he leaned down and kissed her . . . a passionate, eyes closed, toe curling kiss.

She returned it, the butterflies all travelling down into her belly setting off a riot as her lips caressed his mouth. “No, today you’re my hero,” she whispered, brushing her nose against the end of his in what her daddy had always called bunny kissing. “You searched for me for nearly ten hours.” Her head tipped toward her shoulder in a shy shrug when he pulled away, surprised. “Tali rattled you out before she headed back to the flotilla.”

Reaching up, she caressed his cheek. “I’m no hero, Garrus. I just told the fleets when to shoot. Today belongs to everyone who showed up.” Leaning up, she kissed him again. “Thank you for finding me. I wasn’t ready.”

He wrapped an arm around her, long talons stroking slow, soft circles over her bruised and battered back. “Today I learned how you felt on Virmire when things went to hell. I don’t know how I’m going to live through that on a regular basis.”

She rested her head on his shoulder. “I know, but it has its upsides. Like now.” Her hand slipped around his neck, holding him close. “Besides, I don’t intend too many repeats of today.” Pulling back a bit, she looked around. “Or is it yesterday by now? How long have I been languishing in the doc’s care?”

“Languishing,” Chakwas repeated, the word vinegar tart. “You’d think I run some sort of internment camp.” She walked over to a cupboard and removed a sling. Helping Shepard strap her arm into it, the doctor looked up at Garrus who’d drawn back a couple of metres. “Make sure this stays on when she’s not in bed or the shower. And, no sparring or beating up on gym equipment for a couple of days.”

“Yes, ma’am,” Garrus replied, his mandibles giving a hard flick as he looked down at Shepard. “I have her well in hand.”

Shepard opened her mouth to protest, but the doctor sliced the air with a hand, cutting it off. “Out!” Chakwas commanded. “Get out before that battle begins.” Despite her words, she snagged Shepard’s hand when the captain slid down off the bed. “Thank you, Captain. You’ve done a remarkable thing.”

Shepard ducked her head in an embarrassed nod of thanks and made a break for the door. Outside medbay, it looked like the entire crew had assembled. She stopped dead. “I sense a trap.”

“Let’s hear it, people,” Ashley called. As one, they all snapped to attention, saluting. The chief led them as they hollered out. “Here’s to us. Whose like us?”

Shepard blinked back tears and swallowed hard as they waited for her to reply. She raised the blade of her hand to her brow. “Damn few, and they’re all dead.”

“Oorah!” the crew replied as one, snapping their salutes.

She finished her salute in answer. The earlier feeling of sorrow and dread crept back, allowing no room for victory, but she plastered a brave face over chilled, stiff reality. For them, she could spend a few moments playing pretend. They needed the win to give them heart for the long years of waiting and preparation that lay ahead.

She stepped into Garrus’s side a little, needing that bulwark at her back. “Thank you. No captain could have asked for a crew with more courage or more heart. I’m honoured that you’ve stuck with me. You’ve all performed above and beyond the call since Eden Prime . . . and we did it. We stopped the Reapers, set their timetable back long enough to give the races a shot.”

Her smile warmed as she looked from Sparky to Wrex, Shiala, and even Pressly. They had given her everything, in some cases, their lives. “I know you’re tired, but don’t worry, as soon as we wrap things up here in the next couple of days, we’re heading for the biggest beach and most fantastic resort that we can find. Massages and suntans for all.” Answering their cheers with an eager nod as Garrus’s arm tightened around her, she said, “I’ll be taking suggestions . . .” Her hands jumped up, palms slamming back the torrent of destinations. “. . . but not until tomorrow.” She managed a genuine chuckle. “Right now, I’m going to bed. Good night, everyone, and thank you, again.” She stood at attention, giving them the crispest salute she could manage considering her crushed left side.

Spying Nihlus sitting at the top of the stairs up to the sleeper pods, she saw that she wasn’t the only one feeling the cost rather than the result. He’d lost everything fighting Sovereign. A stiletto-sharp ache lanced through her. Sometimes life just wasn’t fair or just . . . or kind. She swallowed the yearning and nudged Garrus, nodding toward the Spectre. “I’m going to . . .”

He glanced Nihlus’s direction then nodded. “Yeah, I’ll see you in there.” Garrus bent down to nuzzle her cheek, grumbling at the catcalls and whistling as he pulled away. “Whatever. Move along,” he groused good-naturedly. “There’s nothing to see here you bunch of gossiping old ladies.”

“Move along?” Kaidan laughed. “Flashing back to your time at C-Sec, Officer? Going to bring out the taser and tear gas?” He puffed himself up. “You have unlawfully witnessed me kiss my girlfriend, you’re coming down to headquarters . . . after resisting arrest.”

Garrus towered over the human. “Well, I don’t know, Lieutenant, are you about to cause a public disturbance?” After a second, Garrus laughed and then started herding the wounded officer toward crew quarters. “What are you doing out here rabble-rousing anyway? Aren’t you supposed to be in your rack?”

Shepard just shook her head at the grumbling about doctors that followed. Dr. Chakwas really did have a thankless job.

Wrex stopped Shepard on her way across the mess. “Shepard. Hell of a thing you pulled off.” He thumped one ham-sized fist into the other palm and let out a small roar. “Especially considering you didn’t take me along.” He buffeted her gently then cleared his throat. “Barla Von secured me a ride back to Tuchanka. It leaves tonight, so it looks like my vacation will be cracking heads back home.” His long, slow chuckle told her that he didn’t mind in the least.

She slapped the brave smile back up and nodded, but felt another piece of herself fall away. How many empty holes would it take before she went back to the woman who’d boarded the Normandy less than three months before? God, how she hated that thought. “I’m going to miss you, Wrex. You’ve been like that uncle that everyone at family reunions warns you about.” She leaned up and kissed his cheek. “Good luck, and keep in touch. We’ve got a lot of work ahead of us.”

He held out his hand, squeezing hers in a bone-crushing grip when she took it. “I hate goodbyes, so I’ll see you later, Shepard. Thank you. The krogan might just have a future because of you.”
“Because of you, Wrex.” A genuine smile warmed her face, her head tipping toward her shoulder again. “I just gave you a lift.” She nodded toward the elevator. “Let me know when you’re ready to show me around Tuchanka. I hear it’s the must see destination on the bombed, radioactive wasteland tour.” She gave him a companionable shove. “See you soon.” She bit down on her lip and took long breaths as she watched Wrex walk over to say goodbye to Ash and Garrus.

Nihlus remained sitting at the top of the stairs, those emerald eyes watching her with a stare of almost palpable misery. The mess had all but cleared out as she hobbled up the stairs, holding her hand out as she neared the top.

“Help an old lady out, son?” She squeezed his fingers as he helped her up the last few, steadying her as she turned and lowered herself next to him. Letting out a heavy sigh of pain, she slouched into his side. “Hey.”

“Hey.” He released her hand and wrapped a careful arm around her waist. “How are you feeling?”

She took an inventory and shrugged. “Not too much pain, actually. I give her a hard time, but the doc always pieces me back together pretty well. How about you? Did you come through without being bent, broken, or spindled?” Leaning into his side, she let the sadness and the dread loose. They should be relieved. They should feel . . . maybe some pride . . . in one another and themselves. Relief would also be appropriate. They’d bought the galaxy time to prepare. Vindication also seemed like something she should be feeling. Everything they’d said from beginning had been proven true. So . . . why the dragging weight?

“You feel it too?” he asked, after a couple of seconds. He looked over at her then jumped up and held out his hand. “Can we do this somewhere the entire galaxy isn’t watching?” The pleading in his eyes set off her cruelty alarm.

“No.” She took his hand, tugging gently. “Sit back down, I can’t pull on you.” When he did as she asked, she laced her fingers with his talons. “Nihlus, we’re both mourning, and they’re both mourning. It would be a huge mistake for us to be alone. I don’t want to do and say things that are going to hurt you.” She bumped him with her shoulder and blinked back the stinging glassiness in her eyes. “And I’d have to. You know I’d have to.”

She shoved all the different longings from different sources back behind the wall and slammed the door, chaining it tight. “We can talk tomorrow after we’ve had a chance to sleep, and let the wounds scab over a bit.” Turning to face him, she kissed his cheek. “I’m sorry about Saren, Nihlus. All of it. You deserved so much better, but he came through for you in the end.” She squeezed his hand. “Thank you for being there with me through all this.” A sad tightening of her lips answered the faint ache that squeezed her heart. “We’re a team, right? Partners.”

He nodded and turned into her, drawing her into an awkward, careful hug. “Partners.” He stood and then reached back to help her up. “Until this is all done, one way or another.”

She smiled, the first easy one, as she braced herself, holding her left side as still as possible and levered her way up. “It’s a deal. Sleep well, we’ve got to deal with the council in the morning.”

“Yes, that should be . . .” He shrugged. “Interesting?”

Shepard leaned on his arm as he helped her down the stairs. “Sure, let’s call it that.” At the bottom, she drew away from his arm, stepping toward her door. “Goodnight, Nihlus. See you in the morning.”

“Keep that on,” Garrus said, growling softly as she walked in the door to her quarters.
Shepard stopped trying to wriggle out of the sling holding her arm tight against her body, and let out a long, dramatic sigh. “Fine, doctor’s pet.” She put on her best pout, but it broke when he laughed and shook his head.

Sitting on the edge of the bed, he held out his arms. “Don’t worry. I’ll look after you.” When she took his hand, he pulled her in and wrapped his arms around her. He turned his face into the curve of her neck, his breath warm as it tickled the fine hairs on her skin.

Shepard grinned and sat on his thigh. “You’ll tuck me in and read to me?” Slipping her good arm around him, she leaned into his side, resting her head on his shoulder.

“Let me finish getting dressed—put some padding between you and my plates—and that’s what we’ll do.” Lifting his head, he pressed his mouth against hers, nuzzling her lips softly.

“No.” Shepard pulled away and ran the flat of her hand along the smooth surface of a chest plate. “I don’t need it. I don’t want anything between us.” She kissed him then pulled back to look into his eyes. She really did want to feel him against her skin, to feel his warmth without the safety fence between them. “Is that okay?”

Reaching up, he slipped off his visor and tossed it behind them on the bed. When she lifted her hand to caress the brow plate that remained perpetually hidden behind the visor, he closed his eyes and leaned into her hand. “You know it’s more than okay, Kahri.” He wrapped his arms around her, almost cradling her in their length. “I’m looking forward to taking a couple of days and spending a little time without the entire galaxy listening at the door.”

Letting her body melt into his strength, Shepard nodded. “Yeah. We’re going to have a long road. Give everyone a week shore leave . . . give them a chance to decompress.” Smiling, she brushed his mandible with a chaste kiss. “Give us a chance to decompress.”

“Um, Shepard?” His hand slipped under her sling to rub her back. “I sort of promised my mother and sister that I’d go back to Palaven for a few days to see them.” He ducked his head, his mandibles fluttering. “I told them I had someone I wanted them to meet.”

Shepard pressed her lips together in a deep, considering frown and nodded. “I’m sure Nihlus would love to meet your family.” She squawked as he nipped her neck, laughing at the low growl that accompanied it. After a few seconds of yelping and kicking as he nuzzled his way down her throat, she pulled back and looked into his eyes, affection bleeding through . . . oh hell, who was she kidding . . . love bleeding through the stare. “Well, I suppose we can ditch the Normandy for a few days. I think we’ve earned it.”

He held the stare, barely moving as he nodded. “Okay.” He rubbed her back. “Thank you, Shepard.”

“Oh, course.” Shepard swallowed a sudden tightness in her throat. “It’ll be fun.” She pulled in a quick, deep breath that she immediately regretted as her left side complained. Jumping up before he could see through her, she said, “Let’s get into bed. I feel like it’s been half a lifetime since I got a decent night’s sleep.” She stood, ducking out of her sling and folding it on her way to the closet for her t-shirt and shorts.

Pulling out her standard nighttime uniform, she stared at it for one of the longest minutes of her life, an entire troop of fire-breathing elcor acrobats tumbling around in her guts. After a second, she put the t-shirt back. She’d meant it when she didn’t want anything between them.

That day, she’d faced down a gigantic metal monster, taken out a rogue cybernetic Spectre, and staved off the destruction of an entire galaxy. Surely, she could find the courage to crawl under the blankets next to the most remarkable male in the galaxy and feel the warmth of his plates against her skin.

Behind her, she heard him rustling around with the blankets, cursing the hard mattress under his breath as he did every time. She chuckled and changed quickly. Standing there, facing her closet, she struggled to keep herself from clapping her arms over her chest. He’d seen her breasts before. Granted, they had been somewhat distracted at the time. Turians didn’t even eroticize breasts . . . well, except maybe asari ones. Still, she didn’t want to open the door a crack just to slap a barrier over it.

She turned around and chuckled. She needn’t have worried about it. He lay there, his elbow over his eyes. “Garrus?” She looked down, a wide smile brightening her face.

“Mm?”

“What are you doing?” She leaned down and swatted the knee that he’d drawn up. “Look at me.” When he still didn’t remove his arm, she sat next to him and lifted her leg onto the mattress so she could face him. “Come on, Garrus. Look at me.” She reached out and placed a hand on his hip. “Please.”

So slowly that he might as well have been in slow motion, he lowered his arm and opened his eyes, staring straight into hers.

“Better.” She smiled down at him, reaching out her good hand. When he took it, his talons lacing into her fingers like a man clinging to a life preserver in heavy seas, the tempest raging inside her belly stilled. “You’re nervous?” she asked, her smile softening. Tenderness eased all the tension and even the pain, probably because she stopped holding herself mech stiff.

His mandibles dropped as he nodded. “Of course I am. I told you, Shepard. I worked. All the time. The guys at work gave me a plaque for the most women scared off.”

Shepard choked on a laugh. “Sweet baby Jesus, Garrus.” She lifted his hand to her lips and kissed the backs of his talons. “Those women don’t have a clue what they’re missing, and praise the Enkindlers that they don’t. I’d really hate to be forced to kill them.” She took a deep breath and untangled her fingers from his, turning his hand to press the palm against her stomach. “I might be about the most terrified woman in recorded galactic history, Garrus, but never of you.”

He sat up, bending to kiss her, pulling her in gently. After a second, he drew back and looked down. “Spirits, Shepard.” He chuckled and reached up to trace the pad of a talon over the mottled mass of bruises covering her left side. “You’re a mess.” Meeting and holding her eye contact for as long as he could, he bent to nuzzle the bruises on her shoulder and arm.

“Yeah, a presidium fell on me.” She grinned when he scoffed.

“A small platform and parts of a Reaper artifact. Hardly the entire Presidium.” Gentle talons combed through her hair. “Come on, get into bed.” He laid down on his side and reached over to pick up the book.

Shepard curled in next to him. “Do the voices.” She propped herself up on enough pillows to stop her shoulder from complaining and laid her head in the curve of his shoulder.

He sighed and grumbled, but she could hear the smile in his voice. “I don’t want to do the voices. Just be quiet and listen.”
“Come on, you’ve got to do the voices.” She thumped him in the side with her elbow. “Don’t be such a poop.” Chuckling, she burrowed in tight, turning to kiss him as his large, warm hand slipped around her to lay over her ribs.

“I’m not going to entertain everyone in the mess with stupid voices.” He kissed her brow and cradled her deeper in his arm. “Behave and shush.” Reaching over her, he rifled through the pages. “Where were we?”

Shepard closed her eyes to listen, his warm, rumbling tone wrapping her in a thick blanket of safety and love. She drifted, wanting to cling to the moment, to savour what the past few days had made her realize could be their last time together, but her body insisted.

His thumb caressed the hollow between her ribs, talon moving slow and gentle. “I’m falling asleep,” he whispered, his voice low and heavy on the subvocals as his reading faltered for the second or third time.

She sighed, her words chasing it out. “Me too.” Wriggling in closer, she kissed his mandible.

“Get any tighter in, you’re going to be on the inside of my plates.” He chuckled.

“I’m okay with that.” Just before she drifted off, she forced her eyes open. “Garrus?”

“Mm?” He turned his face to nuzzle her hair.

Suddenly, panic pricked her, a faint nettle sting against the heaviness of sleep. She could have died that day, and he’d never have known so many things... the most important being... “I have a baby sister. The batarians took her. If anything happens to me, promise me you won’t let Anderson stop looking for her.” She yawned. “And Martin. Someone has to look out for that kid. He’s trouble.”

He took a long, sharp breath, the air stirring her hair. “I promise.” He rolled over, his arms gathering her in against him. Pulling the blankets up around her neck, he nuzzled her brow. “I’ll look after Martin if it comes to that. Go to sleep. I’ve got you.”

She nodded. “Thank you.” The words came out slow and barely audible as she finally gave in and let sleep drag her out to sea.

Chapter End Notes

This was supposed to be the last chapter of the first act, but of course... in true Kim style, I just kept writing and writing. So this is the second last chapter of the first act. The last one will be out tomorrow. LOL I am so bad, but I love spending time with these crazy kids.
Mass Effect - Future Imperfect Chapter Sixty Four

Chapter Summary

Saying goodbye to those lost on Virmire, then off to meet the Council. (Yes, it's a long one.)

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Shepard awoke so stiff that for a moment, her eyeballs were the only body part she could convince to move. Lifting her head from her pillow, she let out a groan that earned her a chuckle from the table.

“Feeling tough?” Garrus asked.

She closed her eyes, hearing him stand and walk over. The mattress lowered under his weight. “I feel like the presidium fell on me.” Grinning, she opened her eyes as his hand slipped over her hip to wrap around her uninjured side. Meeting his ice-blue gaze, the smile softened. “Help me up?”

Sliding both hands under her shoulders, he eased her up into a gentle hug, nuzzling her jaw and ear. “Definitely.”

“Oh I see.” She laughed but wrapped her arm around him and kissed his mandible. “Taking advantage of the poor, wounded girlfriend.” Closing her eyes again, she laid her head on his shoulder.

“Definitely.” One hand slid up her back, slowly as if he was savouring the feel of her skin, which immediately lifted into gooseflesh. He chuckled. “Why does it do that?”

She leaned into him, her hand stroking his neck along the line of plates. “Lots of reasons. Cold, being tickled . . . but with you, it’s because my body likes your touch.”

His talons brushed down her spine, the sharp points just barely grazing her skin as they caressed the long sweep of vertebrae. “That’s a very good thing, because I could do this all day.”

She rubbed her cheek against the smooth, flat layers of muscle covering the ball of his shoulder. “What time is it? I could check, but I like it here. I don’t want to move.”

“0730. I made you some breakfast. It’s just peanut butter toast and hot chocolate, but I figured with the service and council meeting looming, you wouldn’t want anything more until after.” He pulled back and brushed a talon against her cheek. “Do you want to shower?”

After a moment, she shook her head. The troupe of acrobats were back and cracking the whip, insisting that she get moving and keep moving. A shower could wait until after she got back. “I’d better just get up and get dressed then run across and see the doc for a few minutes. You know how she likes to shrink my head when it starts getting too big.” She gave him a gentle kick. “Let me out and then you can help me get into my dress uniform.”

Forty minutes later, Shepard stepped out of the elevator into the cargo bay. It appeared to be Shepard watched the chief work for a few moments. They hadn’t spoken since their confrontation after Jenkins’s death. As much as she believed every word she’d said, the way she’d said it burned in her chest like scarfing down too many hot wings on ‘I Believe I can Fly’ all-you-can-eat wing night at the Arcturus Cantina.

Ash had been through a lot, both that day and in her life, and the last thing she’d needed was her CO jumping down her throat. A sad sort of tightening around Shepard’s lips accompanied the memory of their first chat when Ashley came aboard the Normandy after Eden Prime. She’d jumped down Ash’s throat then too.

“Captain? You okay?”

Shepard focused on the chief. “Hey, Ash. Yeah, sorry, zoned out there for a minute. Was just thinking about your first day aboard. I snapped at you for calling Nihlus a bird.” She walked toward the armoury. “And, I was thinking about what I said to you after Jenkins died.” Stopping at the last locker, she turned her back to it and leaned. “I—”

“I’ve been thinking a lot about that too, ma’am, and I wanted to thank you.” The hardened angles of Ash’s pretty, stern face softened a little into a smile. “Jenkins died for the whole team. Human, turian, krogan, quarian . . . he didn’t care. He was a great kid who cared about everyone. He didn’t hate Legion because the geth attacked Eden Prime. He didn’t hate Nihlus and Garrus because Saren was also a turian. We were his people. All of us.” She turned back to her bench, picking up a rag to wipe absently at the gun oil stains.

Shepard nodded, a short, soft sigh whispering from her nose. “He was a remarkable kid.”

“You were right both times you barked at me, Skipper. I came aboard with a pile of attitude and prejudice. I always placed the blame for not getting ahead on my grandfather, but I own that.” She set down the rag and straightened the rifles, making sure they all sat parallel to one another. “You showed me that. You gave me a chance to prove to myself that the only thing holding me back was me. No one is going to promote or give the best postings to a soldier who walks around lashing out like I was.”

Shepard smiled and nodded, just a faint bounce of her head. “We’re all our own worst enemies, Ash. I know. I’m the self—and career—destruction poster girl. You don’t want to end up where I am.”

“I could do a hell of a lot worse,” Ash said, her voice snapping like static along a power line. She spun to face Shepard. “What’s so wrong with where you are, ma’am?” She threw up her hands, stabbing them out toward the hull. “Captain of the best ship in the fleet, head of the best crew.” A scowl drew her face in tight again. “And don’t you dare try to tell me it’s because of political BS or because Anderson and Hackett are your friends. It’s bloody well because they know that if they need the job done, you’re the one to call.” Ash blushed a light red and looked away, the fire spent. “Sorry, Skipper . . . you just . . . you sell yourself short, and we all know better.”

Shepard straightened, shifting to lean on one hip, feeling incredibly touched at the chief’s outburst. She’d never thought of herself as a role model, certainly not one a career-minded soldier like Williams would want to emulate. Too many mistakes. Too many wrong moves and missed opportunities. Too many dead. But what Ash said was true. She’d been put into a position of remarkable trust. She must have done something right, somewhere along the line. As much as Udina railed against her, the Alliance didn’t make a habit out of putting massive screw ups in charge of major missions.
“Anyway, ma’am.” Ashley went back to setting her already impeccable work space to order. “I’ve decided to honour Jenkins and this crew by infiltrating Cerberus. They’re a galactic wild card and a dangerous one if that tech is any indication. We need people on the inside.”

Admiration and affection swelled inside Shepard’s chest until she thought she might explode out of the sling. Sweet baby Jesus, they didn’t come braver than her crew. “I think that sounds like a great plan, Ash. We’ll take our time and find you a solid way in.”

The elevator opened, drawing her attention. Anderson and Admiral Hackett stepped out along with Nihlus and Garrus. She turned back to Ashley, reaching up to lay her hand on the chief’s shoulder. “And we’ll be there for you, every minute. My standing orders for all of you ruffians are: wherever you are, whatever you’re doing, you’re still my crew. You call, I’ll be there. No matter what. Understood?”

Ash nodded. “You bet, Skipper.” She raised a hand, gesturing toward the growing crowd. “But for now, I guess we have other business.”

Shepard released a long breath and nodded. “Yeah.” She allowed her shoulders to drop for a second and closed her eyes, letting the sorrow wash through her and away. Maybe, while she was on the Citadel—if she didn’t end up in stocks having rotten vegetables tossed at her—she’d see about picking up a meditation pond. Being able to literally and metaphorically wash the stresses and emotional turmoils away had saved Tashac in the end. Well . . . meditation and Merol.

Shepard opened her eyes and squared her shoulders, picking up the burden and settling it as comfortably as possible, then headed over to the others. She grinned at the expression on Anderson’s face when Garrus intercepted her, his arm sliding naturally around her waist. There was a chat waiting to happen. Oh well. Dads had to be dads, even self-appointed ones. She gave Garrus a wink and stepped out of his embrace. Official work to be done.

“Good morning, Admiral,” she said, greeting Hackett with a wide smile. “Nicely done bringing that thing down, sir.” She shook his hand. “Everything came together like a well-oiled machine.”

He nodded. “It did, but I can hardly take the credit for that.” His expression remained serious. “The base on Ilos is gone.” She saw genuine regret as he shook his head. “The things we could have learned from that place . . .”

“Yes, sir, but I’m pretty sure there is more to discover out there. The Protheans were fiercely dedicated to making sure that the younger races were ready and able to take on the Reapers.” She glanced over at Nihlus, wondering if he felt the same pull toward Thessia that she did. Something about the way Tashac had looked up at the mountain that last day told her that it would be worth trying to find where she and Merol had lived.

“So, the rachni queen helped you decipher the information from the beacons?” Hackett asked, shooting a dubious glance over at the queen, who’d just emerged from her corner. He shook his head. “This is all insane, you realize that, Shepard? I should be sending you to Arcturus for a mandatory psych eval.”

Oddly, for the first time in thirteen years that threat caused no fear whatsoever. A small smile tweaked the corner of her mouth. “If you think it’s warranted, sir, absolutely. They’ll tell you the same thing they’ve always told you, however.”

“Batnuts,” Kaidan said from the elevator.

“Completely mad,” Nihlus’s rumble overlapped Sparky’s voice.
“Should never be allowed to operate large machinery,” Garrus added.

“Oh, definitely,” Ashley replied, nodding sagely as she tapped a finger against her chin. “That’s a good one.”

Shepard just waved them away. “Go find somewhere to stand, ungrateful ruffians.” When they moved off, she looked back to Hackett. “I wish it was all crazy, sir. I wish I was crazy, but you’ve seen the evidence. You were right there at the forefront of the battle. You know Sovereign wasn’t just some geth dreadnought.” She held her hand out to usher the captain and admiral to stand at the head of the growing crowd of crew and team members. “We have a hell of a fight coming yet.”

Hackett stared at her, silent and thoughtful, for almost a minute then nodded. Shepard wished she knew what that nod meant, but she trusted the years that she and Hackett had known one another. She trusted his gut and his sense of duty. He’d come through and then help bring the Alliance on board. Eventually.

Five minutes later, the crew stood in neat lines at parade rest, their turn out impeccable. Not that Shepard had expected anything less. She stepped up onto a low crate, meeting each set of eyes that stared back at her. Now, with the lull in the storm, she’d have time to get to know the stories behind each one. That, she very much looked forward to.

She cleared her throat, easing the tightness. “Richard Jenkins was one of the first people I spoke to when I came aboard the Normandy. He tickled me with his eagerness to serve. He worried me with his lust for high adventure. Then he impressed me with his ability and level-headedness under fire. A fine soldier, and a bright kid, he would have no doubt gone on to have an impressive career.”

She ran the inside of her top lip through her teeth. “But Richard was more than a good soldier, he was a remarkable young man, brimming with good humour, kindness, loyalty, and courage. No one on this ship went a week without him saying or doing something to brighten their day. Because Richard’s courage and dedication to this crew, three friends stand here with us today.” She looked past her crew to where the salarian captain, Kirrahe, stood, still bandaged and leaning awkwardly from pain. “Thank you for your selfless heroism, you extraordinary young man.” She swallowed hard, trying to block out the letter she’d written to his parents earlier. Even though she could feel Garrus’s eyes on her, she didn’t look over to meet that stare. Instead, she pressed her eyes closed.

“I’ll miss the hell out of you, kid.”

Shepard stretched her shoulders back, her spine making a cricket chirping sound as she steadied the weight balanced there. “Harvey Gladstone prided himself on never being caught without a prank or bad joke . . . or two, but under the groans, we always smiled. Well, except for the dish soap in the coffee incident. He should have known better than to mess with the coffee, but it was good to discover that the lower part of the refrigerator unit can be used a stand-by brig if need be. And that it can take more than twenty minutes for someone to hear you pounding to be let out.” Pressing her lips together in a smile that felt more grim than amused, Shepard acknowledged the crew’s soft chuckles. “Still, when it came down to a fight, you couldn’t ask for a more solid or capable soldier. I sent him with the non-combatants, a trust I knew he would not betray, and he got them through. Every one.”

The shades of the dead weighed more heavily every second. If she’d been paying attention, if she hadn’t been so intent on . . . No, she didn’t get to beat herself with that flail any longer. Self-pity was a luxury for other people to indulge in, just as she’d told Ashley. She needed to let the dead rest. They didn’t want her guilt. Believing that she could have somehow saved them . . . it was arrogance. She smiled, a thin expression of understanding. It was arrogance, and it diminished them. Taking a deep breath, she shrugged off the weight.
“Abishek Pakti,” she continued, “didn’t miss a single ground mission after Eden Prime. There was no such thing in his strict creed as too injured or too tired. He was one of the most dedicated and solemnly vigilant Marines I’ve ever met.” She eased into parade rest, her good hand held loosely behind her. “When I asked the Alliance about his family, wanting to send a letter to his parents or wife, the clerk told me that all of his recent information listed the units he served in under family, emergency contacts, next of kin. We were his family, and he demonstrated his devotion to that ideal by fighting for us to his very last breath.”

She hadn’t known the last Marine very well, a mistake she didn’t intend to make with her remaining crew. “When I cleaned out Isabelle Turner’s locker, I opened the door and just stared for the longest time. Frankly, what I saw was harder to believe than the Reaper threat.” She smiled at the chuckles. “Ah yes, you few have seen what she kept hidden away in there. Tiny, ancient stuffed toys full of beans. As I boxed up over seventy of them, I couldn’t understand why one of my Marines had brought so many useless items along on a mission.” As she remembered the last thing she’d taken out of the locker, her throat tightened forcing her to clear it.

“Then I found a framed picture of two little girls . . . twins. One in a hospital bed, surrounded by those same silly stuffed animals. When I did the research to send a letter to her parents, I discovered that Isabelle Turner was an identical twin, but her sister had died when they were ten.” She blinked back tears. “Her mother said that Isabelle was never quite the same, as if half of her had died with her sister, but now they would be together and whole again. It seems a fitting and beautiful reward for a young person who dedicated her life to defending and protecting families from a cold and dangerous galaxy.”

She stretched her neck a little. “I’m honoured to captain a crew so dedicated to each other and the mission, a crew with such tremendous heart and courage, so willing to sacrifice. We all know what comes along with the life of a soldier: the long stretches away from loved ones, the loneliness, the unforgiving hours, the physical rigours, and the specter that hangs over us all. It’s a life that can wear us down, make us thin and easy to tear apart, but the camaraderie of our fellow soldiers, knowing that we stand shoulder to shoulder with extraordinary men and women makes it bearable. It makes it an unbelievably rewarding life.”

She nodded. “Today we say goodbye to four friends, but even more than that, we say thank you. Thank you for the gifts given during their lives, and the gifts given in death. It is a sacrifice that I intend to honour every moment.” She stood at attention and raised the blade of her hand to her brow. “The Lays of Ancient Rome said it best. ‘Then out spake brave Horatius, the Captain of the Gate: To every man upon this earth, death cometh soon or late. And how can a man die better than facing fearful odds, for the ashes of his fathers, and the temples of his Gods.’” She glanced over at Admiral Hackett, holding her salute.

Admiral Hackett took one step forward. “From the stars our bodies are formed; to the stars we return. From the infinite our souls are born; to the infinite we commend the souls of Richard Jenkins, Harvey Gladstone, Abishek Pakti, and Isabelle Turner and ask that they be granted rest.”

Shepard snapped her salute, the rest of the crew following suit. She cleared her throat, feeling the sadness lift. The dead had their peace and hopefully a new home in a better place. “Dismissed.”

She accepted Anderson’s hand to help her down off the crate, giving it an affectionate squeeze before she released him. Checking her chrono, she saw that they had about two hours to make it to their meeting with the council. Enough time to stop by Dr. Michel’s clinic and get new implants.

“I’ve got a little shopping to do before I meet with the council,” she told the small group of people who gathered. “Anyone have the burning desire to shop for aural implants and personal products?”
Nihlus sighed. “Can’t say I have a burning desire to watch you pick out toothpaste and soap, but since we are heading to the same location, and none of us should go anywhere alone, I’ll suffer through it.”

Shepard clapped her hand over her heart. “Your sacrifice is duly noted, Spectre Kryik.” She sniffed and aped wiping a tear. “So touching.”

“I’ll come along as well,” Ashley said. “I could use toothpaste that doesn’t feel like 180 grit sandpaper in my mouth, and a few other things that the military has had over a hundred years to get right and still hasn’t.” She smiled. “I’ll grab a shower, change and meet you at Dr. Michel’s.” She hurried to the elevator.

Shepard looked up into Garrus’s face as he stepped beside her. His mandibles fluttered in a soft, almost secretive smile. “I have an appointment at C-Sec, so I won’t be joining you until later.”

Shepard frowned. “You going back to work?” Her heart dropped at the thought of that. She’d come to rely on his constant, steady presence at her back. He was a piece of her that she hadn’t considered losing once Sovereign and Saren went down. Shepard and Vakarian . . . she’d just assumed they’d become an unstoppable unit.

But then he shook his head. “I’ve found a new job.” Rolling his eyes, he let out a long-suffering sigh and shook his head. “The pay sucks. I mean really, really sucks, but it’s good work, and I get along pretty well with my co-workers. I figured now that my contract was up, I’d see about applying for a permanent position, but that means quitting my old job.”

Shepard slipped her hand into his, a tsunami of relief and gratitude washing over her to leave her feeling dizzy and a little stupid. Of course he wasn’t leaving her. Garrus was far too good a torin and too loyal a companion to abandon her. She squeezed his talons before letting go. She screwed her face up into a dubious, considering scowl. “I know the boss and she’s . . . well, she’s a bit of a pill, but I could maybe talk to her about the really, really sucky pay.”

He held up his hands in a defeated sort of gesture. “Good luck, but dealing with that woman . . . I won’t hold my breath.” Grinning, he backed away. “Time for a tactical retreat, I think.”

Shepard aimed a kick at his backside as he strode away.

Hackett approached her. “I need to get back to the fleet, we’re still running S&R on the ships Sovereign carved up. The council wants me at your meeting later, so I’ll see you before we head back to Arcturus.” He held out his hand. “Whatever I might think of Reapers, you’ve done a hell of a job here, Shepard. When you have your ducks in a row for a planning conference, let me know. I’ll be there.”

She shook his hand. “Thank you, sir.” When he brushed past, she glanced over to where Kirrahe and Rentola stood talking in low voices. “I’ll be right back. I want to see how the STG are faring.” She spotted Kaidan and beckoned him over. “Hey, Sparky, how are you feeling?”

He nodded, but she could still hear a lot of rattling when he breathed. “I’m okay, Shepard. Be back to normal in a couple of days.”

She squeezed his shoulder. “Don’t rush things. All we’ve got for the next week or so is vacation. Rest up.” Nodding toward the salarians, she asked, “Can you take care of making sure the STG gets where they need to go. If you call Barla Von, he’ll be able to secure transport for them if they want to keep a low profile. We just might need to bug out of here in a hurry if the council meeting doesn’t go well, and I’m not sure they want to become fugitives.”
Alenko nodded. “Sure. I’ll get them squared away this afternoon. The doc might want to send those two to a clinic for a couple of days, so I’ll check with her first.”

“Good man.” Giving him a tight-lipped smile, she stepped past him.

“Captain Shepard,” Kirrahe greeted as she stepped up to them. “Thank you for your hospitality, although had I known about the geth, rachni, and krogan, I may have gone ahead with the council’s kill order.”

A humourless, gallows smile cut across her face. It felt like a wound. “That would have been unfortunate, because even now Reapers would be killing or enslaving everyone on the Citadel before spreading out from there.” She studied his expression, praying that he wouldn’t prove to be a liability after all.

The salarian shuddered. “I saw that thing myself and can’t believe it existed let alone that it’s one of thousands. That the council, and possibly even the dalatrasses, would be involved in aiding those abominations . . ..” He shook his head. “Once my people have healed, you may be assured that we’ll investigate this fully, Captain. Anything we learn about these Reapers will be passed along to you.”

Shepard held out her hand, waiting patiently as he seemed to debate the wisdom of so friendly a gesture. In the end, he gripped her fingers for a moment then pulled back. “I have Lt. Alenko seeing that you have covert transport anywhere you need to go once the doctor clears you. Thank you for your assistance, Captain.” She looked to Rentola. “And you, as well, Commander. You saved my life.” She backed away a couple of steps. “Take care, gentlemen. I hope with the STG’s formidable intelligence capabilities, we can save a lot of lives.”

“We shall see, Captain Shepard. We shall see.” Kirrahe herded Rentola toward the elevator.

Shepard grinned and shook her head. She hoped that Kirrahe’s investigation convinced him to help prepare. The STG were unparalleled at intel gathering and espionage, and she suspected that the salarian approach to war, while not considered entirely correct by Alliance standards, would serve them well fighting Reapers. She waited until the elevator had time to take the salarians to the crew deck, then headed over and palmed the control.

Anderson stepped up beside her as the doors opened. “Mind if I hitch with you? Udina wants me at your meeting with the council.” He winked at her. “Hell of a job pulling all this together, kid. Can I buy you some dinner, maybe a chocolate milkshake?”

Shepard grinned and slipped her hand through his elbow. “Absolutely, so long as you don’t mind me bringing my boyfriend along.” Her grin widened at his sigh then faded. “Well, providing we aren’t on the run from the council by dinner time.”

An hour later, the small group of Normandy personnel made their way toward the lower market in the wards, just chatting about stupid things, relaxing before the inevitable doom of the council.

“Captain Shepard!” an eager, young female voice called across the common area.

Shepard stopped and looked, seeing a hand waving above the crowd of C-Sec and civilians. Some of the C-Sec officers turned to look at her as if they recognized her name, but then moved on. She smiled, proud of herself for the way she’d arranged things. Anderson would be the hero of the attack on the Citadel. Well, he and Garrus’s father. Hackett would be the hero in the skies along with the geth and quarians. And she could continue to spin the webs in relative obscurity from Omega, overseeing it all while avoiding public recognition.
A pretty, black-haired young woman hurried over, her hand still waving above the crowd as if afraid Shepard would forget her and move on. “Captain Shepard!”

His laugh came out deep and throaty. “You’re telling me.”

“Don’t make me kick you in public.” She looked back to the young woman as she stopped, chest heaving from the run. “Hello. What can I do for you, Miss . . .?”

“Emily Wong. I’m a reporter.” She wrung her hands a little, as if expecting a less than welcoming reception when it came to that revelation, but she soldiered on. “My sources say that you were up on the Presidium directing the fleets working to take down that ship. I can’t get any information from anyone on what the ship was or what race it belonged to.” She shrugged. “I saw krogan all over the Citadel fighting against C-Sec and Alliance soldiers. Was it krogan? Can you help me out? I—”

Shepard cut her off with a raised hand. “Whoa, slow down a little. Yes, I know what that ship was and who it belonged to, but it’s a very long story, and one I’m not sure your publishers will care for.” She activated her omnitool. “I’ll send you my information so that you can contact me in a week or so. I’ll let you decide whether it’s a story you want to tell then, okay?”

The reporter grinned, practically bouncing on the spot. “Thank you, Captain. I’ll be in touch.”

“You’re welcome, but wait on the thanks. I’m not doing you any favours inviting you into this mess.” She held out her hand. “Pleasure to meet you, Miss Wong.”

The handshake just about popped Shepard’s elbow. “And you.”

Shepard sighed, watching the reporter dash off. “Ah the eagerness and folly of youth.”

Nihlus shook his head. “I don’t know, Shepard. A kid like that, she’ll get herself killed if she believes our story.” He shrugged and turned back toward the markets. “Or get herself laughed out of the profession.”

“She could, or with a little wisdom and discretion, start seeding the idea of a threat in people’s minds.” Shepard shrugged and began weaving through the crowd. “I don’t intend to dump the information on her and walk away, Nihlus.” She scowled up at him. “You know I don’t spend lives cheaply.” Stopping, she looked around. “Is it just me, or is this place insanely crowded today? Don’t people know that the Citadel was attacked yesterday?”

“People are out precisely because it was attacked yesterday,” an accented, male voice said from a couple of feet away. “Did I hear correctly? You’re Captain Shepard? Is that Jane Shepard, hero of Elysium?”

She crossed her good arm over her sling. “Who’s asking?”

He closed on her fast, his hand coming out in the single, smooth motion that only politicians and car salesmen knew. “The names Charles Saracino of the Terra Firma party. It is an honour to meet you, Captain.”

Shepard pulled her hand back and wiped it on her trousers. “I can’t say the same.” She jutted her chin out toward the crowd. “You’ve brought these people out here? Why? They should be at home letting C-Sec and maintenance get things put back together.”
“I’m sure you’re aware that Armistace Day is coming up, and with the attack yesterday . . . krogan killing humans in the street . . . Alliance soldiers dying to help protect aliens . . . well, it seemed like a good day to come out and get our voices heard by the alien appeasers on the Citadel. The First Contact War taught humanity a lesson that some might forget. Yesterday just drove that lesson home, Captain. If humanity doesn’t stand up for itself, no one else will.”

Shepard laughed, hard and angry. “You’re saying that in front of a turian council Spectre who was up there fighting at my side. Geth and quarians helped the Alliance and Citadel fleets bring Sovereign down.” She shook her head and waved him off. “Go spout your nonsense somewhere else. I’ll just pray you don’t get a seat in Alliance parliament.”

Ashley stepped forward. “He’s got a point, Captain. I mean, would we even be here if Saren hadn’t attacked Eden Prime? Everything we’ve been through the last few months, it’s because of aliens thinking they have the right to govern how the rest of us live.” She grumbled and shrugged. “Or even if the rest of us live.”

“And who might you be?” Saracino asked, holding his hand and a leaflet out to Ash.

“Gunnery Chief Ashley Williams.” She shook his hand and took the paper. “I was on Eden Prime when Saren attacked it. Watched my squad and a lot of good, innocent people gunned down.”

“Ash . . ..” Shepard stepped in between them. “This isn’t the time or place.” She nodded toward the doors into the market. “Let’s go.”

“Williams?” Saracino stepped around Shepard. “You wouldn’t be related . . .?”

“To General Williams, yes. His granddaughter.” Ash backed away, giving Saracino a little salute with the leaflet. “Have a good day.”

“And you, Chief. And you.”

Shepard could feel Sarcino’s eyes following them the rest of the way to the doors. His stare felt like eels inside her dress blues. “That was risky, Ash,” she whispered, giving the chief a worried scowl. “They’re a bunch of crazies.”

Ashley nodded. “Yes, ma’am, but I bet you anything Cerberus is hip deep in Terra Firma. It might just be a way in if I play hard enough to get.” She grinned and shrugged. “Never thought of myself as the covert type.”

“Just be careful. These guys aren’t playing.” Shepard herded her group through the market, feeling Nihlus’s eyes on her the whole time. His stare felt like the sun through a magnifying glass, and left her feeling as though she should be checking to make sure her uniform wasn’t on fire.

“Captain Shepard?”

Shepard stopped and looked around. “What is this? Does everyone know who I am?” She spotted a blonde fellow waving a paper. “Yes? You are?”

“Oh my god! It is you! I can’t believe it.” He ran over, stopping just short of mowing her down. Ash didn’t make out as well and Nihlus had to catch her and set her back on her feet. “Captain Shepard,” the fellow crowed. “Hero of Elysium and Eden Prime. They say you saved the Citadel yesterday.” He thrust a paper and pen at her. “My name’s Conrad Verner. Could I get your autograph?”

Shepard let out a braying laugh, but then let it die when she saw the intense, earnest expression on his face. “Oh, you’re serious. Well, I’m glad to meet you, Conrad.” She shook his hand, but warded off the paper. “Autographs are for pop-stars and baseball players, not soldiers.” Patting him on the shoulder, she attempted to step past him, but he blocked the way.

“You’re even more beautiful in person. No one is going to believe that I met the Captain Shepard.” A wide, beatific grin spread across his face.

“Sure they will, everyone seems to be meeting me today. You take care of yourself, Conrad.” She managed to duck past him that time and ran down the stairs. “Good grief. If they start a Captain Shepard fan club, I quit. The Reapers can have the galaxy.” She glanced back at Anderson, shaking her head at his attempts to stow his grin. “Don’t you start, sir.”

Anderson just gave her his best innocent expression and shrugged as if he had no clue what she could possibly be talking about.

In the alley behind the wards, Shepard sent the others on their way and called a cab. “I’ve had enough of being grabbed and hollered at like a sideshow attraction for one day,” she grumbled, barely giving Nihlus time to get in before she slammed the top down.

They landed in the exact spot where she’d jumped up on the C-Sec car. “Ah, the memories,” she said and glanced back at Nihlus, grinning. She caught the glare Anderson shot her way, but it just made her cackle. “Aw, come on, sir. Like you aren’t used to my antics by now?” She popped the top of the car open. “You knew what I was doing the moment you saw that footage.”

Anderson got out, answering only with a shrug as he led the way. The council, Udina, and Hackett awaited them in the center of the bridge that spanned the lakes. It was a good choice for a meeting. The battle that had scarred the presidium metres away hadn’t touched the bridge and the breeze coming off the fountains in the lakes kept the reek of smoke to a minimum.

“Captain Shepard,” Tevos said, her voice as calm and gracious as ever, “Captain Anderson, Spectre Kryik.” She stood between Sparatus on her right and Valern on her left as she did in the chambers, and Shepard wondered if it became a conditioned response after time. The asari straightened, lining herself up with a halo of foliage and flowers from the balconies across the bridge. Shepard had to give her points for staging and presentation. At least if it was an execution, it was going to prove an impressive one.

Anderson and Nihlus nodded and murmured non-committal greetings. For her part, Shepard didn’t feel good about wishing anyone a good afternoon who might be sticking her in front of a firing squad within an hour. It wasn’t a hard and fast rule, more of a guideline, but it worked for her. The elcor acrobatic troupe in Shepard’s belly brought in a guest lion tamer and three performing elephants. She really hoped the council didn’t try to kill her. Things existed in her life that she wanted to see through.

“We are gathered here,” Tevos continued as if she hadn’t really expected them to say anything, “to recognize the enormous contribution of the Alliance in the battle against Sovereign and Saren’s forces.”

Shepard blinked a couple of times, her belly flopping as the elephants rolled around on giant balls, but then the councillor’s words made it through her preset panic over having Garrus and the Normandy snatched away from her. Glancing at Nihlus, she saw his mandibles and brow plates working as he struggled through to the same conclusion and looked at her. They were being thanked. Not prosecuted. Thanked. For a moment, Shepard thought she might faint dead away from dizziness, but managed to wrestle her relief under control. Everything she’d done . . . all the plans and safety nets . . . they’d actually worked. No. There had to be a trap waiting somewhere ahead.
She found herself holding her breath until that also threatened to make her pass out.

Valern drew her attention as he gave a soft little cough and then said, “Many humans lost their lives in the battle to save the Citadel, brave and courageous soldiers who gave their lives so that we, the Council, may live.” His tone sounded sincere, as if he actually regretted the loss of life on the Citadel’s behalf. She still didn’t trust it . . . couldn’t trust it. Sharp barbs of warning stabbed up and down her spine.

Sparatus gave a little nod and held her stare as he spoke, “There is no greater sacrifice, and we share your grief over the tragic loss of so many noble men and women.” His familia notas and bearing gave her the impression of an eagle poised, circling overhead waiting for her to try to run. When she straightened in response, his mandibles fluttered ever so slightly. A smile? From Sparatus? Maybe she had died under the rubble after the Conduit blew.

Tevos’s hands returned to fidget ever so slightly for a moment, before she dropped them back to her sides. “Spectre Kryik, Captain Shepard, the council also owes you both a great, personal debt. One we can never repay.” She ducked her head in a conciliatory manner that came across embarrassed, as if she had seen the error of their ways. Maybe Sovereign’s death had taken the whammy off them. “You saved not just our lives, or the lives of the people on this station, but billions of lives from Sovereign and the Reapers.”

Shepard felt Nihlus burning a hole through the side of her head with that stare of his, but didn’t dare take her eyes off the council. If it wouldn’t have caused everyone to look at her strangely, she would have pinched herself. It had to be a dream.

Valern was speaking again. Something about heroic and selfless actions. “. . . serve as a symbol of everything that humanity and the Alliance stand for.”

Reality started to settle in a little, the dizzy fog dissipating in the bright, fake sunlight.

Sparatus took over, the little play acted out seamlessly as if they’d practiced it beforehand. “Though we cannot bring back those valiant soldiers who gave their lives to save ours, we can honour their memories through our actions.” The councillor straightened, looming even taller over her.

“Captain Shepard,” Tevos said, her voice suddenly firm, “step forward.”

Shepard’s eyes tried to jump over to Nihlus, but she forced them to stay facing front even as her heart started hammering against the inside of her ribs, demanding to be let out before the bullets started flying. Her hands shook and her palms began to sweat. God, she’d hoped to be a lot braver facing her own demise.

_Take a deep breath, get those shoulders back, and face whatever comes like the warrior you are. For pity’s sake, you weren’t this afraid of Sovereign._

“It is the decision of this council,” Tevos said, her voice fighting its way past the diatribe going on inside Shepard’s head, “that you be granted all the powers and privileges of the Special Tactics and Reconnaissance branch of the Citadel.”

Was that birds chirping? Shepard was pretty sure she’d never heard a bird on the Citadel before that moment.

“Spectres are not trained, but chosen,” Valern continued. “Individuals forged in the fires of service and battle; individuals whose actions elevate them above the rank and file.”
No, not birds, just the ringing in her ears. Shepard’s knees began to tremble, and suddenly it took every ounce of control she possessed not to break into giddy, hysterical laughter. They were making her a Spectre? Sweet baby Jesus, they were making her the first human Spectre. She forced herself to listen, to actually be present in the moment rather than swirling around inside her head. Breathing slow and steady, she calmed her heartbeat and stilled the trembling.

Tevos tilted her chin up, looking haughty for the first time, perhaps it, like standing between her fellow councillors, could be attributed to habit. “Spectres are an ideal, a symbol. The embodiment of courage, determination, and self-reliance. They are the right hand of the council, instruments of our will.” The asari’s face hardened rather than softening, as if those olivine eyes attempted to drill the importance of the moment into Shepard’s head. Although surely wasted effort, Shepard awarded her a handcart of points for trying.

Sparatus seemed to think he could accomplish the same just by being huge and impressive. Shepard had to admit, it sort of worked. “Spectres bear a great burden. They are protectors of galactic peace, both our first and last line of defense. The safety of the galaxy is theirs to uphold.”

Tevos softened again as she said, “It is a duty for which you have already shown both passion and ability, Captain. You are the first human Spectre, a great accomplishment for both you and your entire species.” Then the asari smiled. “Congratulations, Captain. And thank you, to both you and Spectre Kryik. Your dedication to duty has saved us all.”

Shepard bowed from the waist a little. “Thank you, Councillors for this honour and for your trust. I will endeavour to uphold your faith in me in all things.” She straightened, then stepped back, smiling a small, tight-lipped smile as Anderson patted the back of her shoulder. Of all the ways she’d thought events would transpire when the council called her there, being made a Spectre had never entered her mind. Unbelievable.

“Humanity,” Tevos continued, “has shown that it is ready to stand as a defender and protector of the galaxy. You have proved you are worthy to join our ranks and serve beside us on the Citadel Council.”

Udina puffed up and stepped forward. “Councillor, on behalf of humanity and the Alliance, we thank you for this prestigious honour . . .” He nodded his head in a stately, practiced way. “. . . and humbly accept.”

Anderson smacked Shepard in the back of the head before she even thought about saying anything. She scowled at the injustice. He could have at least given her a chance to formulate an insulting comment before the preemptive smack.

Valern glared at her as if he also expected some sort of commotion. “We will need a list of potential candidates to fill humanity’s seat on the council,” he said, those huge eyes blinking at her.

“Shepard, as the first human Spectre and the driving force behind bringing down Saren and Sovereign,” Tevos said, her dainty blue hands clasped loosely before her, “we’re certain your endorsement will carry a great deal of weight when it comes to choosing humanity’s representative.” She smiled, showing no signs of discomfort or the slightest twitch that might indicate deception. “Would you care to recommend anyone for our consideration?”

Shepard gave the council a curt bow, just her head that time, snapping down then back. “Madam Councillor, I believe this council couldn’t find a better compliment to your number then Ambassador Udina.” She bit down on her lip to stifle a grin as Udina stumbled, turning a baffled, ridiculous stare to gape at her. “He knows the nooks and crannies of Alliance and Earth politics better than anyone, and has cultivated favour with the colonial authorities as well. I believe that he’ll prove to be an exceptional fit.”

Anderson gave Shepard a sideways glance. “You sure about this, Captain?” he whispered under his breath.

Shepard nodded, glaring at him in a way that she prayed stopped him arguing any further. “I definitely recommend Ambassador Udina to take the seat on the Council. No one is more deserving of the council’s company. He’ll do humanity proud as we move on into this new era of peace.”

Tevos looked to the councillors on her left and right, then nodded.

Shepard turned to face the ambassador and held out her hand, but he just stared at it, his mouth hanging open in a way that filled her with an indecent amount of joy. She leaned forward, grabbed his hand and shook it. After a second, he let out a yelp and yanked it back as if her hand was made of slimy squid. Cackling at his expression of combined disgust and shock, she said, “Good luck, sir.” She bowed stiffly to the other three. “Thank you for the honour of becoming humanity’s first Spectre. I will dedicate myself to doing both this council and humanity proud.”

They each gave her a dismissive nod.

Shepard started back toward the ward’s access, but stopped when Nihlus went the other way. He bowed to the council, stiff and formal.

“Thank you, councillors. We will endeavour to continue to be of service,” he said, then brushed past them, walking up the arc of the bridge and then a little ways down the other side.

Shepard followed, her face slowly creasing into a scowl as he stopped and raised his hands to his mouth. Seeing what he was doing the moment he did it, she felt fire race up her neck to set her face aflame.

“Humanity’s first Spectre,” Nihlus shouted to the crowd gathered along the balcony on the other side of the bridge. In answer, what looked to be the entire crew erupted into a boisterous cacophony of cheers, hoots, and ear-shattering whistles.

Clapping a hand over her mouth to stifle a ragged sob, Shepard blinked back tears even as a wide, embarrassed, grateful, honoured, stupid grin spread across her face. Meeting Garrus’s gaze across the distance, she gave a little shrug, then held out her arms, dissolving into helpless laughter as her boatload of idiots just kept hollering. Love and gratitude filled her until she felt as though her feet would lift off the cement and carry her out into the nebula. Their support, their joy at the moment . . . it meant everything, and she loved them for it.

“Okay, okay,” she bellowed, sweeping a deep, dramatic bow. Straightening, she threw impatient swats their way. “Get out of here, and stop disturbing the peace before I have C-Sec arrest the lot of you.” She couldn’t manage to force the grin off her face though, and gave them a slow, sincere bow of her head. “Thank you. Now git!”

Nihlus walked back to face her and reached out to take her hand, giving her a half-apologetic smile. “The Spectre induction was one reason I thought they might want to see us. I told the crew, they wanted to be here . . . .”

Shepard punched him in the arm, then grinned and tugged him into a hug. “Thanks. It wouldn’t have been the same without them.” Drawing back, she nodded back to where Anderson waited. “Let’s go relax for a while, shall we?” She led the way, looking back over her shoulder as she walked. “I think we should take Anderson on vacation and then turn him over to Hackett. I don’t want to leave him here. If Udina decides to keep him on as his attache, he’s going to end up indoctrinated.” That thought almost made her throw up her peanut butter toast right there. She’d be seven days dead before she left Anderson to that fate.

Nihlus nodded, jogging a couple of strides to catch up with her. “I agree. He’s too valuable an asset to risk.” He grinned, his mandibles flicking hard. “Loved what you said about Udina. Stirring, really.”

She just grinned and shrugged, deadpanning, “I meant every word.”

The council and Udina had moved off toward the taxi stand, conversing in low tones. Hackett had already gone, but she’d see him when they got to Omega. Shepard swallowed the fire breathing gymnast that climbed up her throat, and slipped her hand through Anderson’s elbow as she passed him. When he resisted, she shook her head, leading him with a forceful hand toward the elevator to the wards.

“Come on, Anderson, it’s time to party. You know, I’ve never seen you drunk. I think I should.” She grinned, tightening her grip on him as he dragged behind. “I promise not to take more than three minutes of vid if you start singing.” She looked into his eyes, meeting the confusion with a broad wink. “Okay, five . . . tops.”

Anderson pulled her to a halt on the stairs down the wards access then took her by the shoulders, staring into her eyes. “Have you lost your mind, Shepard? Udina? All he did was throw you to the sharks, and then stab you in the back when you managed to climb out.” He shook his head as if he couldn’t even fathom the depths of insanity she’d plumbed. “He will actively try to pull you and the entire war effort down, Shepard.”

She nodded. “Lost my mind? Yeah, I think I have, Anderson. I really think I have. But . . . on the upside, I’m now a crazy Spectre, which is nice.” She gave him a smile that attempted to tell him to stop arguing with her. “Come on, old friend. We have a lot to talk about, but let’s do it on the Normandy.” She started back down the access, hoping the elevator at the end was empty.

“The crew want to meet at Flux for a drink before we take the party back to the Normandy, Shepard,” Nihlus told her. He followed a good five metres back, looking casual and relaxed although Shepard felt the tension radiating from him, even from that distance. He’d taken rear guard. “Although, according to Pressly, there is enough alcohol being delivered to the ship that he’s starting to feel as though allowing it on board is a dereliction of duty.”

“Then to Flux we shall go. It’s on the way back to the ship anyway.” She herded Anderson onto the elevator. She didn’t think the council would make her a Spectre one second just to drop a piano on her head the next, but she wouldn’t feel relatively safe until they bunkered down on Omega.

The Captain stood beside her, glaring at the side of her head, but didn’t say anything.

She turned to smile happily at him. “We’ll have a drink at Flux, head to the Normandy, crack a bottle and get shit-faced in celebration.” She shot her eyes quickly toward the camera, then just leaned casually against the wall. “Crazy few days, huh?” She opened a comm channel, feeling the empty space at her back like an open wound. “Hey, Garrus, I hear we’re meeting at Flux before going back to the ship. Can you pick up something dextro that Tali can drink? She’s still with the fleet here, isn’t she?”

“Are you worried?” was all he asked.
“A little bit. Certainly wouldn’t argue with seeing your handsome mug a few alleyways early.” She closed her eyes for a second. Thank the mighty powers that be. He just knew.

“Okay. I’ll meet you at the elevator door before that long alley into the common area. See you in a minute.”

Feeling more settled knowing Garrus was on his way, Shepard smiled at Anderson again. “I think Udina will do a fine job as humanity’s representative. It’s what he’s been spending his entire career working toward. He knows the players and the stage inside out. He should be fine. The Alliance parliament won’t let him go too power mad.”

“I concur,” Nihlus said. “He knows his way through the labyrinth of power.”

Anderson folded his arms and cocked a hip, staring at one then the other like he’d been taken hostage by lunatics and hadn’t decided whether to start screaming for help. Shepard grinned when she saw the jury vote for not screaming. “So, Shepard,” he said, giving her that adopted father scowl. He turned a raised brow glare to Nihlus. “Not one, but two turian boyfriends?”

Shepard swallowed hard, a thin trickle of spit making for her windpipe, slithering down like it had been clever finding new ground until she started to choke. Eyes streaming tears, bronchi burning, she bent over, hacking helplessly until drowning in her own snot became a very real danger. Sucking in a ragged, stuttering breath, she started to gain a little control.

Nihlus rubbed her back. “Actually, Captain, I’m not her boyfriend, I’m just in love with her. Well, and we were bond-mates in prothean memories that the beacons stuffed into our heads . . . had two kids . . . spent a lifetime together.”

Anderson’s expression morphed into worried and confused, but he pulled a handkerchief from his pocket and passed it to Shepard without looking away from Nihlus. “Prothean bond-mates? Had two kids?” He shook his head. “That one is going to take a little explaining.

Shepard wheezed as the choking eased up then blew her nose. Shooting Nihlus a scowl that should have left a half metre hole coming out the other side, she stomped on his foot. She pointed at Anderson as she leaned on a knee, trying to catch her breath. “No. Get those thoughts out of your head, sir. You don’t get to pull your, ‘Son, come help me decide which shotgun to take on this mission’ stunts any more. I’m not an eighteen year old cadet.” She straightened as the elevator stopped at the wards.

Anderson’s chuckle affirmed how proud he’d been pulling that move. “You’ve got to admit, having the suitors help me choose my weapons got you a lot of extra study time.”

Shepard led the way down the corridor, the access nearly deserted. Praise the Enkindlers that at least some people on the station seemed to think that the day after a monstrous machine tried to destroy everything was an excellent day to stay home. She slipped her arm through Anderson’s. “Yeah, my name became, ‘No, not that one, her guardian is a madman’.” Grinning, she bumped him with her shoulder as he laughed.

Garrus waited outside the last elevator, a liquor store bag in hand. He held it up. “I got the good stuff for Tali.”

Shepard grinned and stepped out, slipping her arm through his. “Excellent. Now we have the makings of a first rate party.” Her smile widened as he put his hand around her waist, pulling her in tight against his side.
Glancing up as the elevator at the end of the hallway opened, letting a few civilians out, Shepard leaned into her boyfriend’s side. Boyfriend . . . how crazy was that? She bumped him with her hip. “Relax, Brother C-Sec. I’ve got you.” Crazy, but wonderful.

His mandibles fluttered. “Yeah, I guess you do.” He bent to nuzzle her temple. “You okay?”

A soft smile brightened her face. “Yeah, I am now.” The heat of a heavy blush crawled up her neck as his voice set off that very warm flutter deep in her belly. “You know, Garrus, something just occurred to me,” she said, lowering her voice to a husky whisper. The blush deepened.

She hesitated and glanced behind them, not really keen on Anderson listening in as she hit on her turian boyfriend, but the captain and Nihlus were discussing whether Udina should be assigned bodyguards. On that, she’d vote no.

Her smile returned, beaming with love and more than a little heat. “After today, you aren’t really on my crew any more.” She purred a little, deep in her throat. “You know what that means, don’t you?”

He made a show of thinking about that. “Um . . . I never have to suffer through you driving the Mako again?”

She chuckled and elbowed him. “You are such a poop!” God, she loved how still and centered he made her feel. “But okay, I give you that, but it also exempts you from my ‘never with my crew’ rule.”

His response came out only as a rumble in his throat that cut straight through her, making her skin lift in gooseflesh. A shy smile brought her eyes back up to the civilians. Most of them passed her by without any notice.

A man tripped, stumbling into Shepard’s side and grabbed her arm inside her sling, dragging a thin cry of pain from her lips. He didn’t seem to notice, his eyes riveted on hers, his face far too close. “Hey wait, aren’t you Captain Shepard?”

Shepard frowned and jerked back, ignoring the pain. “Who . . .?” She pressed back into Garrus’s side, but as she pulled back, the man pushed in. The alarm at the base of her skull shrieked.

Something slammed under her jaw, cold and hard.

Her name tore, raw and bleeding, from Garrus’s throat.

Thunder roared, shattering her like a dropped mirror.

Fin Act One

Chapter End Notes

Mostly ... at this point, finishing the first act . . . thank you. Just thank you to everyone who has stuck with the story from its start as a sort of running joke to now. I love you. I hope you’ll stick with the crew as we move into Act Two tomorrow. hugs
Chapter Summary

Shepard has been shot and the second act begins.

Act Two - Future Complex

Prologue

Shepard died three days ago.

I can still recall those last moments in perfect clarity.

I can feel the softness of her hip bumping against my thigh, the warmth of her hand on my waist, even through my tunic. The curve of her waist under my talons.

I can smell her soap, the ever-present undertones of sweat, gun oil, the underlayer of her armour. The slight tang of fear. The indoctrinated council has made her a Spectre for stopping Sovereign and Saren. It fills me with respect and awe. It fills her with fear.

I can see the curve of her lips as she smiles, the slight blush on her cheeks as she teases me about my not being a member of her crew any longer. We can be together. Her bright emerald eyes laugh into mine as she tells me not to worry.

I can hear the ever-present hum of the life support systems in the alley, the sound of our footsteps, hollow and ringing, on the floor. Anderson and Nihlus debate whether or not to provide Udina with extra security now he is a councilor. The husky warmth of Shepard’s voice makes my hands tremble ever so slightly as she tells me that she has me.

Then everything goes to hell, and suddenly nothing felt present or real any longer.

A human male bumped into her, stumbled, his arm grabbing hold of her. He asked if she was Captain Shepard. Something warm splashed against my face and neck. It took exactly three heartbeats for me to realize that it was blood, her blood. Anderson and Nihlus opened fire. The man’s head disintegrated, but my arms were full of her, and her blood was everywhere.

Nihlus yelled at me to pick her up, and I held her in one arm. She weighed nothing. My other hand pressed against the massive wound at the base of her skull, trying to staunch the blood. I don’t recall the flight back to the Normandy, just having the doctor and Kaidan pull her from my arms once we reached the ship. They tore her away and worked on her even as others pushed the gurney toward the stairs.

Nihlus shoved by me, rushing to get to the bridge, commanding Joker to call back all hands and then take off without clearances. I believe we took fire on our way to the relay.

I followed the gurney to med bay. I held her hand while they explained to me why there was nothing they could do and encased her in a stasis field. I held her hand while Nihlus and Anderson stood over her body, arguing about what to do next. I held her hand while Anderson stood, head bowed, his hands gripping hers between them, a father’s hellish grief kept tightly reined in. I held her hand for three days until they placed her in a casket to fire her into space.

I couldn’t leave her. She was afraid of being alone in the dark.

Then I had to say goodbye, before getting a chance to know anything. And there were so many things I wanted to know. What side of the bed she favoured if being trapped against the wall didn’t enter into it. Every single smile she had to share when she woke in the morning, hair tussled, the imprint of her pillow on her cheek. All the places she liked to be touched. The noises she made when I loved her. Every memory she had yet to confide in me. Every line that appeared as time passed. Every single detail that I could have learned over the course of the cycles.

And then I said goodbye. I don’t think I breathed from the moment the assassin’s gun went off, as if the universe froze when the blood and bone of the woman I had just started to love splashed across my face.

Because only two thoughts kept cycling through my head.

“Shepard—the woman I love—is dead.

Now what?”

Chapter One - Farewell, Kahri - 3 days ASD

“Garrus?”

The hatch of their second brand new Kodiak creaked open. The sound broke through his envelope of misery, and he made a mental note to lubricate the hinges.

“Garrus? Are you in there?” A small, dark shape appeared—a hooded silhouette in the dim light coming through the opening. “There you are. I’ve been looking everywhere.” Tali hopped up and stood over him. “They told me you’d be hiding in here.” She nudged him with her elbow. “Sit up and scoot over. Come on, Brother C-Sec, I came a long way for this.”

Garrus flinched, a sharp keen catching in his throat at the familiar nickname said by the wrong voice. “Don’t,” was all he managed to gasp through the claws digging into his throat.

Tali let out a tiny, hiccupping sob. “I’m sorry. I wasn’t . . ..” She pulled in a long, hard breath that whistled a little, even the sound stabbing through him, dull and jagged.

“C-Sec, your nose whistles when you sigh. Did you know that?”

Garrus didn’t move, letting the whisper diffuse in the heavy air, and waited for the accompanying bayonet buried in his chest to dislodge. His eyes stared through the leather backrest of the bench he used as a bed. He knew that Shepard chose him to pick up her banner and keep fighting because she believed he possessed the strength to hold the team together, to be there for them . . . to keep them from succumbing to the horrible enormity of the war to come. No one had ever believed in him with such complete faith. She’d made a mistake. All he wanted to do was crawl into the deepest, darkest hole he could find and cover himself over.

He couldn’t, of course. Damn Shepard and her bloody faith in him. She’d painted him into a corner, leaving him no choice but to pick the banner out of the mud, wash her blood from it the best he could, and carry on.
Sitting up, he let gravity do most of the work as his feet dropped to the floor. “Have Liara and Wrex arrived?” Heavy, humid air pressed in on him from all sides, a thick layer of sweaty plastic wrapped so tight he couldn’t breathe. When he did draw in air, it stank of defeat, and fear, and the copper tang of her blood. No matter how hard he scrubbed, the smell of her death clung to him: an accusatory specter.

He’d just let the bastard shoot her.

Tali perched on the edge of the bench. “Wrex has. Liara is ten minutes out yet. She found some fascinating piece of information that couldn’t wait.” The quarian chuckled. “Some things don’t change. Legion and Kal are talking to Captain Anderson.” She slipped her arm through his. “I’m so sorry, Garrus. I keep thinking that maybe if the rest of us had been there . . . .”

He cut the air with his hand, dismissing that idea before it finished forming. “You were where she wanted . . . needed you to be. She had three of the galaxy’s best shots, most experienced soldiers . . . We got careless. They’d made her a Spectre. They wouldn’t kill a brand new Spectre who’d just saved everyone. All I had to do was push him back . . . step between them. My arm was wrapped around her, Tali, and I just let him shoot her.”

Fuck reason. Fuck not having a chance to even realize she was in danger before she was dead. He’d just let that bastard shoot her.

Tali nodded and kicked her feet a little, brushing the soles of her boots against the corrugated rubber matting. “Anderson said that you only left her side a couple of hours ago.” Her hand stroked his upper arm, but comfort felt like barbs of geterr cactus burrowing under his hide to fester. It threatened to undo the frail equilibrium he’d finally discovered after three days of snapping back and forth between wanting to scream at everyone to just fucking fix it and wanting to lie down next to her.

Jumping up, he yanked his arm loose. He regretted the rough action as soon as he pulled away. “Sorry, Tali, I just . . . .” He held out a hand to usher her from the shuttle.

“I understand, Garrus. We’ve all had our suits shredded.” She slipped her fingers into his talons. Neither of them spoke until they arrived at the bridge.

“Just in time,” Joker called, glancing over his shoulder at them. His mouth opened to say something further, crack wise maybe. Instead, his eyes shuttered over, his mouth closed, and he turned back to his work. “Liara just arrived,” he said. “Who knew our shy little researcher would turn out to be queen of the asari?”

“Who would have thought I’d be surveying my home world with a team of quarians and geth? Or that Wrex would be king of the krogan?” A thin, flat sigh whispered through her suit’s speaker only to get cut off by a hiccoughing sob. “Well . . . I guess Shepard knew, didn’t she?”

An asari cruiser pulled up alongside, drawing Garrus’s attention away from the conversation. He closed his eyes, mandibles fluttering a little as the cruiser’s massive engines set the deck plating thrumming, deep and powerful, under his feet. He could barely recall the last time he’d felt that sensation. The citadel might as well be on a planet but for the constant hum of the life support systems, and the Normandy vibrated on a higher, lighter frequency, almost like a tickle.

“When we arrived at the Citadel after Eden Prime,” Nihlus said from behind Garrus, alerting everyone to his presence, “Shepard was the only one who didn’t gawk and admire the Destiny Ascension. She said that it looked like something that should be trying to eat us.” A tremulous, low-pitched keen whispered under the Spectre’s every breath.
“Asari ships are creepy as hell,” Joker grumbled in agreement. “The cruiser requests permission to dock with the Normandy.”

“Permission granted,” Anderson replied, appearing beside Garrus to look out the port at the other ship. The captain glanced at Garrus, his face a stoic mask that accentuated rather than downplayed his grief. “I’m heading down.” He averted his eyes and straightened, snapping his back and shoulders taut and square. “You’ll bring Dr. T’Soni and her companion down when they’re ready?”

Garrus recognized the hasty wall of military distance and how close Anderson was to losing that composure. He nodded, glad Anderson had given him something to do other than fidget and wait to say goodbye. If he kept busy enough the varren braying and snapping away in his guts might not get a chance to tear him into tiny pieces.

When Anderson spun and strode from the cockpit, Garrus followed, ducking around Nihlus. Alcohol wafted from the other turian’s pores and breath, shrouding him in a cloud of noxious stink. Garrus stopped and met the Spectre’s eyes then whispered, “Go to Dr. Chakwas and get something. You don’t want to stumble through this.” His mandibles dropped and flicked hard. “Then take a shower and put on something clean. You reek.”

Nihlus blinked a few times then nodded and turned around, his shoulder bouncing into the bulkhead. He stumbled, Garrus catching him before he went down.

“Do you want me to have someone take you?” Garrus asked, keeping his grip on Nihlus’s arm.

The Spectre yanked his arm free. “I can manage.” He strode down the length of the CIC, his trajectory wobbling a little. Cursing, he fell down the ramp, catching himself at the bottom. Pressly stepped forward, an awkward hand held out in a surprising offer of assistance, but Nihlus barked something that backed the Alliance officer off.

“Permission to come aboard?” a soft voice asked, pulling Garrus’s attention away from Nihlus. Liara stood at the inner hatch, Aethyta and a half dozen commandos right behind her.

Garrus nodded. “Permission granted. Welcome back, Liara.” He nodded to the other asari.

“Thank you.” Liara stepped forward, her hand held out, hanging hesitant and awkward in an offering of ineffectual empathy. When Garrus gripped it, she squeezed his talons. “I’m so sorry, Garrus. I barely knew her, and I feel like someone’s stolen something precious from me.”

He cleared his throat, unable to completely stifle a soft keen as the ghost of Shepard’s limp body played along the nerves in his arms and closed his larynx. Three strangled breaths later, he got enough control to speak. “Your quarters are as you left them. Do you want to take some time to freshen up?” He ushered them down the CIC toward the stairs.

“Thank you, that would be welcome. I found some information in my mother’s files about a secret prothean archive on Thessia, so I spent every last second I could decrypting the data.” Liara chuckled, but it came out bitter. “My mother certainly didn’t want anyone to access her intel without a fight.”

“The asari have a prothean archive that they’ve kept hidden from the rest of the galaxy?” Garrus asked, fury incinerating his sorrow. No wonder the damned asari ran the galaxy. How dare they hold all their high ideals over the rest of the races and then . . . He took a deep breath and shook it off. The anger was just a distraction. He didn’t want to spend those moments distracted. They could deal with the asari archive when they reached Omega.
“So it would appear,” Liara replied. “I haven’t decrypted very much yet, but I’ll keep working on it. Where and when are we meeting?” She glanced back at him, her big, blue, watery stare of empathy tearing a ragged gash through his control. “I assume we’ll need to coordinate our war preparation.”

“Yes. When we’re finished with . . .” He swallowed hard and let that thought drop, holding tight to the anger. “I’ll go through Shepard’s computer, and we’ll figure out the details.” He nodded to the Alliance soldier as they passed through the door to the crew deck.

“We might as well stay aboard for the next few days if that’s the case. I’ll ask Captain Anderson if that’s all right with him later.” Liara stopped outside the med bay door. “We’ll grab a quick shower and be ready to go in fifteen minutes.” Her hand drifted back to his, squeezed his talons, then she turned and walked through the door.

For a full thirty seconds after the med bay door closed, Garrus just stood, staring at the bulkhead. A terrible realization forced its way through his mind, a weed tearing a crack in the pavement on its way to the light. They all expected him to have the answers . . . all the answers.

“Damn you, Shepard,” he whispered. “Damn you for leaving me with all of this.” Pivoting on his heel, he strode across the crew deck, shoving the enormity of the task aside, using the anger to keep his sorrow at bay. If he allowed himself to focus on the big picture, he’d end up curled into a ball under a table somewhere. One step at a time. One problem at a time. That moment, he needed to get Nihlus sobered up as much as possible, dragged through a shower, and down to the cargo bay.

One problem at a time.

* * * * *

Nihlus braced his hands against the door frame leading out of his tiny quarters. “I can’t do it, Vakarian. You can’t understand. After the rachni queen unravelled the beacon messages . . ..”

“I know what happened, Nihlus. Shepard did her best to explain it.” Garrus pushed against the Spectre for a moment, then let out a long, growling version of an explicit turian curse. “You’ll hate yourself if you don’t say goodbye. It won’t be more than a half hour then you can disgrace her memory by drowning yourself in another couple of litres of brandy.”

“I have nothing left, Vakarian. The council has taken everything from me. First Saren and then being a Spectre. Now with Shepard, they’ve torn out my heart . . . taken away a mate for the second time.” He shook his head as if trying to shake off that thought. “It’s impossible. Shepard and I never did anything more than kiss, and then she ran away from me and back to you.” He gave Garrus a shove, knocking him back hard enough to slip past and slump onto his cot. “And yet, I can feel every emotion . . . the joy and awe when our children were born . . .” He keened and covered his face. “It never happened. I have nothing.”

Another exasperated curse cut the air, the subvocals behind it knife-edged. “You have your honor. You have your duty to the galaxy.” Garrus cuffed Nihlus in the side of the head, hoping for a reaction, but the Spectre just slumped a little further. “Even if the Reapers walk here from dark space, we still won’t have enough time to prepare properly. She needed you. Now she has left this all on the two of us, Nihlus, and I need you. Stop feeling sorry for yourself and help me.”

Garrus let out a long breath through a clenched jaw and sat on the end of the cot. “We’re both not very good turians, are we?” He shook his head. “Yeah, not good turians at all. You giving the turian military so much hassle that they were glad to get rid of you when Saren put you forward for Nihlus let out another wavering keen. “I met her before coming to the Normandy, you know, but if she remembered it, she never said.”

Garrus turned from the door, leaning his shoulder against the frame, curiosity cutting through his annoyance and grief. “When?” The hollow core of him reached out, clutching greedily at the unknown, unexpected tidbit. It wanted to gobble up every tiny fact and picture of Shepard, stuffing them all down into the void she’d left behind. Later he could curl up and examine the small treasures at his leisure, keeping her alive and close for a few moments more.

“I became completely obsessed with her after hearing about Elysium, but our paths never crossed until just after she entered the N program. It was some ridiculous political affair. Sparatus wanted Saren and me to act as his bodyguards for the evening. Pointless posturing. One upmanship at its best. Saren was furious, but what could we do?” Nihlus’s mandibles flicked, a wistful sort of half-smile. “Udina had pulled in Shepard as his golden example of the Alliance military.” He closed his eyes. “She wore this silky black dress that let her leg peek out the side, and her hair was all gathered on top of her head, just these long copper curls hanging around her face. I’d only ever seen the Shepard from the news footage—armour and the severe, regulation appearance—more impressive than attractive. That night, she was so beautiful that she took my breath away.”

“Long hair?” A sliver of jealousy slipped between Garrus’s plates, stabbing him straight in the gut. He scowled, chiding himself for coveting Nihlus’s memory . . . that single moment of an exquisitely dressed, long-haired Shepard. It was a Shepard he’d never get the chance to see. Sorrow pummeled him, knocking the wind out of him as it drove the shard in deeper. Versions of her that he’d never see fought to break through his thoughts, but he beat them back.

Nihlus nodded and opened his eyes, locking stares with Garrus. “I tried to work up the courage to talk to her all night. Couldn’t do it. Even just rehearsing what I’d say, I botched it so completely that I knew I’d end up looking like a blathering moron.” He straightened, bracing his hands against the edge of the cot. “Put a gun in my hand and aim me at a hundred outlaw mercs or gunrunning underworld types, no problem. Ask me to talk to a female I’m attracted to . . . forget it.” He stared down at his hands. “I was just starting to yell at myself for wasting the only chance I’d had to speak to her when Sparatus sent me to the bar to get him a drink. While I was waiting, Shepard stepped up beside me. Spirits, she smelled good, like the highland breeze on Palaven when the rylamia is blooming, or the algae plume on Oma Ker.”

Nihlus paused, then his mandibles spread and fluttered in a smile. “She looked up at me and said, ‘Spectre Nihlus Kryik, right?’ I nodded, too busy gawking at how tiny and perfect she was to answer. ‘Lt. Commander Jane Shepard, pleased to meet you.’ She looked over at Saren glowering behind Sparatus. ‘Glad to see the council spending the galaxy’s credits so wisely.’ Her laugh completely wiped away what little brain function remained to me. I think I managed to get out the word politicians before Udina grabbed her and dragged her off to speak to someone else.”

“A notable first meeting. I’m sure you made quite the impression.” Garrus nodded toward the door.
“Come on, the others will be waiting for us.” He palmed the door and stepped through, trying to see past the picture in his mind of that Shepard smiling up at him. She was gone. No amount of wishing things were different could change that. Forcing everything but surviving the following half hour from his mind, he waited for Nihlus then followed him down to the cargo bay.

The rest of the team and crew had already assembled around the simple casket, waiting for them as he’d guessed. When they stepped off the elevator, he hung back. He really was a terrible turian. Raised from birth to release the dead, they learned not to fear death or lament the lost. Those who died in the course of their duty deserved celebration, not endless keening tears. Why then was it taking all his strength to fight down the need to run to the casket, fling it open and demand that Shepard stop playing at being dead? She couldn’t really be gone. Not Shepard. She’d cheated death so many times. She’d made a lifestyle out of it.

Tali gripped his hand when he finally managed to wrestle himself across the bay to stand at Shepard’s side for the last time. A storm brewed in his chest, the black clouds rolling up into his head until its thunder drowned out the voices around him. His heartbeat kept time between flashes of lightning that seared along his nerves and made his jaw clench.

It wasn’t fair. Nothing in life was, of course, but that brushed-steel casket in front of him made up the most cruel injustice of them all. An entire career dedicated to rooting out wrongs and setting the scales right . . . and what damned good had he been when it most mattered? He clenched his fists, loosening up when he felt Tali flinch.

He’d just let the bastard shoot her.

The moment Shepard burst into Dr. Michel’s clinic, guns blazing, that smart mouth and razor sharp wit taking people down faster than her bullets, she’d grabbed him deep down in his gut. His free hand drifted up to press against his keel, fighting back against the growing pressure building there. His eyes began to feel too large for his sockets, and he realized he’d been staring at the hateful box without blinking.

“Shepard gave the quarian people the most precious gift . . .” Tali’s voice trailed off into quiet sniffles. “And for a little while, I remembered what it felt like to have someone’s complete faith and trust . . . their admiration and respect . . . their protection and nurturing. Shepard believed in me and because of that, I discovered belief in myself.” She swallowed, the sound coming out her speaker thick, a faint whine of sorrow threaded through it. “Thank you for my home, Shepard. Thank you for everything. Keelah se’lai. I’ll miss you.” She let go of Garrus’s hand and stepped forward to lay a single white lily on the casket.

One of many . . . had everyone put one there? How did he miss that?

“Garrus?” Anderson asked. He extended his hand toward the casket, his stare expectant, as if Garrus should know what he asked.

Garrus frowned, confusion sparking a sharp, prickling anger. What? What did he want? Just get it over with and eject the casket into space already. Eject her body into the star and maybe then he could just move on. Maybe then he could stop remembering the way that same body felt cradled in his arms four nights earlier, so soft and warm pressed against him that his chest and throat ached with the beauty of the moment. She nuzzled her head into the curve of his neck, her fingers caressing lazy patterns over his hide while he read her Raymond Chandler’s The Big Sleep.

“Do the voices.”
“I don’t want to do the voices. Just be quiet and listen.”

“Come on, you’ve got to do the voices. Don’t be such a poop.”

Spirits, but life cut cruelly with its penchant for tragedy. A taloned vice grabbed hold of his keel and started ripping it from his body, white hot agony lancing through him to strangle his heart. His heartbeat slowed, sluggish and laboured. His lungs struggled to pull in air but it didn’t make it past his throat. Dizzy, he clung to Tali’s hand, praying she could keep him on his feet. If he fell, he didn’t know how he’d manage to get up again. He couldn’t fall. He needed to keep the panic and the pain buttoned down . . . had to keep it locked up.

“Would you like to say something, son?” Anderson asked, pulling Garrus from the memory. The Captain stepped back to stand between Admiral Hackett—when had he arrived?—and Dr. Chakwas.

Garrus opened his mouth to refuse, but what came out was, “The worst sin anyone could commit was to ignore Shepard. I’ve seen her kiss total strangers, molest an asari’s scalp crests, and blame a krogan for giving her some sort of communicable rash spread by varren all as punishment for that ultimate transgression. Of course, she didn’t always have to be ignored in order to do something completely insane. Our last leave before Virmire, she got into a bar fight with Earth’s ambassador, jumped off the C-Sec executor’s balcony and climbed up on a skycar, screaming praise for the Enkindlers so obnoxiously that a small mob of hanar dragged her down.”

His mandibles fluttered. “One of the first things I asked her after we met was whether her lunacy was real or an act. Even though I know most of it was a tactical facade, I’m still not sure of the answer to that question.”

He stepped forward and leaned down to press his talons to the cool metal. “She was a complete mystery. She could spout random quotes from the most obscure books and ancient movies, but have no idea about anything that had been released in the last ten cycles. Her heart . . .” His voice cut out, his throat closing. He blinked, taking a long breath, forcing himself to maintain control. When he could swallow, he cleared his throat, shoving aside the panic . . . the need to throw open the casket and hold her, shake her, will the life back into her, demand that her god give her back. He couldn’t have her, not yet. They had so much to do. He’d planned to . . . He drove away that thought, all his plans for the future. What good would wallowing in them do him?

He managed to suck in a rasping breath, and let the words roll out. “Her heart had been battered more than any one individual should have to bear, but somehow she managed to keep it open, reaching out to anyone who needed her. She was the first to know if someone was hurting, exhausted, needing a bracing word, a hand to hold, or a kick in the ass. Every mission, she stuffed her pockets with enough rations to feed the squad and slapped trackers on us so she’d never lose us. She was always the first into the fight and the last one out.”

He stroked the smooth metal as if caressing her back. “Shepard was brave. Loyal to a fault. Infuriating. Terrified. Honourable. Strong . . . so much stronger than she believed. Perfect in her flaws . . . and I loved . . . love her.” He swallowed again, closing his eyes. “Rest easy, Kahri, we’ll carry your banner forward and get this done. You deserve to rest. One day, we’ll get a chance to finish what we started.” He dropped his voice to a breathy whisper. “Wait for me.”

He straightened and squared his shoulders. Liara passed him a lily, but instead of laying it as the others had, he broke the stem an inch away from the flower. Placing the stem at the head of the casket, he whispered. “You can have the rest when we meet again.” He stepped back beside Tali, the quarian wrapping her arm around his waist.
“Nihlus?” Anderson called. “Would you like to say anything?”

Nihlus stepped forward, touched his lily to his brow and placed it on the casket. “Farewell, Sister Shepard, may the light that shines on you be as bright as the one you shone on all of us. Glory hallelujah . . . .”

“. . . And praise the great, glowing asses of the Enkindlers,” the team said as one, soft chuckles breaking through clenched jaws and tear streaked faces.

Arms wrapped around Garrus from both sides as the thrusters under the casket flared to life. Teeth clenched so tight that pain shot through his jaw, he watched the Normandy’s ramp open. The system’s star—what system were they in?—poised on the brink of going nova and flared a riotous gold and orange against the black void of space, fighting its inevitable collapse and death.

Admiral Hackett took one step forward. “From the stars our bodies are formed; to the stars we return. From the infinite our souls are born; to the infinite we commend the soul of Captain Jane Shepard and ask that she be granted rest.”

Garrus closed his eyes as the casket cleared the ramp, unable to bear watching them send her out into the dark alone. “Don’t worry, Kahri, it’ll only be dark and cold for a few minutes. Then everything will be warmth and light. I’m with you. I’ll always be with you. You’ll never be alone again.”
If the funeral was the end . . . now for the beginning and moving on.

Ashley moved first after Shepard’s casket disappeared from sight, speeding through the black toward the star. The chief cleared her throat and clasped her hands before pointing both index fingers toward the elevator. “There are refreshments and food up in the galley. Shepard once told me that when she died, she wanted people to drink too much, eat too much, dance too much, and then remember her in their hangovers the next day. I for one intend to comply with her wishes.”

The group broke up as the ramp thumped into place, the pressure causing Garrus’s ears to pop even though the barrier kept the pressure almost perfectly even. Instead of following the rest of the crew, Garrus hung back feeling the ship, her ship, alive and present around him. The new shuttle sat where she’d helped him tear apart and rebuild the Mako after the thresher maw incident. He’d barked his knuckles, and she’d forced him to sit down and let her look after them. He stroked the pads of the talons of one hand over the faint scars. He’d never felt anything to compare with her light, cool touch.

The memory of her hand stroking along his plates dragged a hoarse moan from his second larynx that he covered with a cough. For so many weeks, ever since they’d first kissed in the Mako, he’d held his desire for her behind tight reins. Some days the pressure behind his plates and the thumping of his heart nearly made him scream, but he knew she wasn’t ready. Spirits, he hoped his body stopped aching for her before the longing drove him mad.

“Vakarian . . . Garrus,” Anderson called, striding over to him. Garrus shook off the heavy cobwebs of memory and hopeless wishing, brushing the backs of his talons across his face. The captain held out his hand. When Garrus gripped it, Anderson said in a thin, hoarse voice, “Thank you for making her happy in her last days. She cared about you very much.”

Garrus just nodded. There wasn’t much he could say to that. He’d hoped to make her happy for the rest of her days. He just hadn’t expected there to be so few.

Anderson released him. “I tried to get into her computer earlier, but it will only unlock for you. Could you go through it? Flag anything that you think needs my immediate attention.”

Garrus nodded, grateful to have something to do. “I’ll do that now, sir.” He needed to get to Omega and get the wheels turning. Keeping busy might save him, whereas too much time to think would drag him somewhere ugly.

“I know she asked you to run this rodeo, Vakarian, and I’ll try not to step on your toes, but I’m here if you need me, and so is Hackett.” Anderson slapped his shoulder, then spun and strode for engineering.

Garrus headed for the elevator, skirting around the still somber beginnings of Shepard’s wake when he arrived on the crew deck. He didn’t see Nihlus amongst the others. No doubt the Spectre hid in his closet swilling back his third or fourth bottle of the day. Despite the obvious pain the other turian was going through, Garrus envied him the connection he’d shared with Shepard through the Prothean memories. No matter what Garrus and Shepard would have become to one another if she’d lived, she and Nihlus would have always had that.

Garrus stepped through the door into the Captain’s quarters and stood, staring at Shepard’s bed—their bed—for several moments before gathering the strength to step past the threshold. That damned, stupid impossibly hard bed. He complained about it every night, and it hurt like hell most of the time, digging his plates into his bones.

“I’d sleep on that thing happily for the rest of my life if you’d just let me have her back,” he whispered without knowing whom he was talking to. Turians didn’t have gods. Would Shepard’s god, the one she felt such anger toward, listen to a turian prayer?

_Please, just let me wake up there with her arm flopped over me._

Anderson had yet to move anything, leaving her few possessions organized and aligned either parallel or perpendicular to the edges of whatever surface. “Always so tidy and regimented,” he whispered, looking around the room. “So afraid for anything to slip out of place.” Sitting at the desk, Garrus activated her computer, but a wall came up.

“Voice print identification required to access records,” the artificial female voice informed him.

He frowned and glanced over his shoulder toward the door, suddenly feeling like a prowler who’d broken into someone’s home. “Garrus Vakarian.”

“Good day, Officer Vakarian, please enter user password.”

“Password?” he asked, frowning. She’d been worried enough to password protect it even after voice printing it?

“That is not correct.”

He keened softly, low in his throat as he struggled to get the words—her words—out. “Sweet baby Jesus.”

“That is not correct.”

It became harder to get his primary larynx to override the keen coming from his second as the singularity trying to form in the center of his chest pulled all the air out of the cabin. “Glory hallelujah, Brother C-Sec.”

“Access granted.” Shepard’s image appeared before him, that cocky smile forcing him to look away. Maybe it had been a mistake to try to look into her affairs without a few days worth of distance. He nodded and took a deep breath, straightening his spine and pulling his neck back, arching it slightly. Maybe, but he’d made her a promise, one that he intended to keep. Spirits, she was beautiful. He didn’t need to see Nihlus’s version of her beauty—all dressed up and coifed. Short mop of curls, freckles, no make up . . . she would always be the most beautiful thing he’d ever seen. His hand lifted to touch the holographic image, but he forced it back to the desktop. He couldn’t touch her. She’d become light and memories.

The image smiled, a sad smile, and he wondered which time he’d entered the room to find her sitting there had been the time she’d recorded the message to prepare for her death. Why hadn’t she said anything? “Hey, Garrus. Sorry about this. I know the last thing you want to do right now is face the million details of this war, but as much as people will want to believe that Nazara was a single entity, we know the truth. There is still a hell of a war coming, and we . . .” She looked down, then back. “...you need to be ready to fight it.”

She sighed, and he heard the weight of an entire galaxy in that breath. She hid how much it cost her so well that sometimes he forgot just how heavy it must have gotten... how afraid she must have been. Good thing for them she proved so much stronger than the fear.

“Okay,” her matter of a fact tone drew his attention back, “first things first. I have included here a detailed accounting of the financial resources available to you. As soon as I died, they were all transferred into your name. Both Barla Von and... your father have copies of everything.” She chuckled, meeting the sudden stiffness and questioning in his gaze as surely as if she could see him.

“By the way, hope you don’t mind, but I’ve been in touch with your father pretty much since you told me about him under the Mako that day. I knew he’d worry, so mostly I just let him know that you were okay after missions. But that day you guys left me at C-Sec Academy, I met with him and brought him up to speed on everything.” She shrugged, just that quick, marionette pop up and down. “I figured that since you trusted him—oh, don’t look at me like that, you know you trust him completely—he was the one to help you keep going.”

Garrus shook his head. “You meddling pain in the ass. Couldn’t just leave anything alone.”

“And stop grumbling at me, I’m dead.” She softened the words with the sad smile. “He put it all together and came to the same conclusions we have. He’ll make a hell of an ally, Garrus. He begged me not to tell the council what we’d learned about Saren, knew it would get me killed, but we needed their blessing to attack Virmire.” She glanced away from the screen, furtively as if someone had approached her door, and she didn’t want to be caught. A moment later, she looked back. “So, if he needs it, tell him to go ahead and get his ‘I told you so’ moment out of his system.” She affected a stern frown. “Then tell him it’s not nice to rub the mistakes of the dead in their face. So rude.”

A spreadsheet appeared on the right of the monitor. “Congrats, you’re a billionaire, and sorry, you have to spend it on things other than your own tropical planet. Okay... to business: Barla Von has started salvaging as much of Nazara as his people can get their hands on. Build a weapons testing area out in the terminus somewhere. Make sure everyone who comes in contact with the wreckage is inoculated. The geth, rachni, krogan, and hopefully the Alliance and Hierarchy will need somewhere to test weapons against Reaper materials. I really hope I’m right about their vulnerabilities.

“Contact Barla Von, do whatever you need to in order to keep the communication with the Shadow Broker open. He owes us right now, and no one in the galaxy has more feelers out there.”

The spreadsheet vanished, leaving her sharp, pretty face sitting dead center again. “Work with Nihlus, Anderson, and your dad, Garrus. I’ve set everyone else up to take credit for our victories. Tali and Legion for the peace between their people and the return of the pilgrims; Wrex for the freedom of Saren’s krogan slaves and genophage research; Anderson and Hackett for the battle of the Citadel.” Her smile warmed. “Even Shiala and Liara are positioned to do what they need to do. As are you. You know where to go and what to do. Win the war.” Her head tilted. “I know you’ll do amazing things, Garrus. I know it. I’ll be watching.”

Her smile broke and tears slipped from the corners of her eyes just to be swiped at by an impatient hand. Her head tilted. “I’m sorry for so many things, but more than anything, I’m sorry that I never got a chance to give you this.” She gestured at her body. “Because this...” She pressed her hand over her heart. “...belongs to you. Thank you for being the one person in my life I could trust enough to love. I love you, Garrus, and I’m sorry I never told you that.” She smiled sadly. “Take care of yourself and our people.”

Her hand reached out. “Good bye. I love you. You know what to do next.”

Garrus lifted his hand to those delicate fingers, his breathing hoarse and laboured again. “Good bye, Shepard. I love you.” He sat like that for a moment, then took a deep breath and closed the screen. For a moment, he felt as though someone had sucked all the air out of the room, but gradually, the choking lack of her receded, and he began to breathe again. He opened up the comm relays and keyed in routing information.

His father’s head and shoulders appeared on the screen. After staring at him for a second, Herros nodded. “Garrus.” His mandibles fluttered and dropped. “I’m so very sorry, son. She was a remarkable woman.”

Garrus stared at his father’s image for a moment, then let out a long, tremulous, bitter keen of grief. It climbed out of the very center of him, a living beast held caged too long and finally seeing a safe passage out. It went on and on until that horrible, empty place at his core fell silent: hoarse, scraped hollow, and dry.

When it ended, his father gave a soft cry of his own, one of empathy and love for a son in pain. For a few moments, Herros tried to speak, but then he flailed his mandibles a little, frustrated. “I’ll meet you at the location in three days. We have a lot to talk about.”

Garrus nodded. “I’ll be there. Thank you, Pari.”

“She really was a most remarkable young woman,” Herros said, shaking his head.

Garrus spent the next several hours pouring over the details of the massive organization Shepard and Barla Von had managed to put together in three months. The volus hadn’t dawdled in moving the art and other relics they’d confiscated from Donovan Hock’s home. The enterprising financier had even sent a platoon of the Shadow Broker’s private army to clean out the mercenary leader’s home on Beckenstein. The total received from finder’s fees, rewards, and sales to private collectors amounted to over ten billion credits. Savvy investing and private short term loans swelled the accounts by another two billion.

The real estate folder surprised him even more than the bank balance. He’d known about the buildings in Kima District that Aria had given Shepard, but they made up just the peak of the mountain. They owned mining, metal fabrication, weapon fabrication, and assembly plants on ten planets. The geth had just begun reporting their mining, construction, and manufacturing stats, but even after the first week, Garrus had to give Shepard far more credit for foresight than he’d guessed at. The whole time he thought she’d been playing it by ear, just racing to catch up. Turned out she’d been ten steps ahead the whole time.

“Spirits, woman, why couldn’t you have been ten steps ahead of that gunman?” He closed his eyes and leaned his head in his hands.

“I was, Garrus. I started preparing you back on Feros.”

He prepared datapads with the information pertinent to all the key players. He’d hold a brief meeting in the morning to set the gears moving, start organizing for a large planning conference on Omega in three days time.

The door opened. Garrus straightened and turned to face Anderson. Allowing only the deep lines around his eyes and mouth show his weariness, the captain strode over, straight and square, the very picture of buttoned down. Anderson should have been born turian.

He settled himself on the edge of the bed, forearms on his knees. “Any luck?”

“She didn’t make it too hard to get in. The resources and network she orchestrated is amazing. We’ll still have to keep a tight grip on the credit chits, but it’s a very good start.” Garrus gathered up the datapads. “If it’s all right with you, sir, we’ll get everyone together in the comm room at 0800, get ourselves organized, decide on the other players we need to bring in, then head for Omega.”

Anderson nodded. “Will do. Hackett was going to return to the fifth fleet, but I think he’ll be a useful ally. I’ll invite him to Omega.” The captain straightened, tilted his head back to one side and cracked his neck. “He’s still not convinced of the Reaper threat, but he had a front row seat for Sovereign, so I don’t think it’ll take much to bring him on board.”

Garrus nodded and stood. “It’s surprising how easy it becomes to believe in the two kilometre long monsters after you’ve seen one try to carve its way out of the Citadel.” His omnitool beeped, alerting him to an incoming message. He opened it, skimming down the header to the decryption information. “It’s Barla Von. Has to be. He and Shepard went to absolute ridiculous lengths to ensure their messages didn’t get intercepted.”

It took all his decryption talent—which was considerable—everything he knew about Shepard, and some wild guesses before the message opened. When it did, he knew why the financier took such elaborate precautions. “Von reports that they’ve been able to collect five scows worth of salvage from Sovereign, and they’re still working. They’ve found several large pieces. He figures he should be able to bring eight to ten scows worth to Omega. We just need to provide an escort.”

The captain nodded. “We need to know how to hurt them, especially if as many of them are coming as you believe.” Anderson stood and held out his hand. “Get some sleep, son. We’ve got a hell of a lot of work ahead of us.”

Garrus stood and shook the offered hand. “We do. Goodnight, Captain.” He strode to the door, but stopped at the threshold and turned back. “Um, sir . . . the book on her nightstand there . . .” He ducked his head, mandibles dipping and spreading in a bashful grimace. “I was reading it to her.”

Anderson scooped it up and strode over, placing it in Garrus’s hands. “I read to her when she was in the hospital as a teenager. She used to hound me to perform all the voices, and god help me, I gave in every single time.” He chuckled and shook his head, his throat working. “She was so broken back then, but so strong. She never stopped amazing me.”

Garrus palmed the control and stepped through. He held up the book. “Thank you.” Turning, he fled before Anderson could call him son again. It made him uncomfortable. Replacing Shepard as Nihlus’s partner in the war already hung from him with the weight of all those who’d yet to die in that fight. He couldn’t bear the extra weight of being Anderson’s last tie to Shepard.

“Garrus.” Anderson called after him. When he turned back, the captain held a pillow. Anderson shrugged, his eyes red and glassy. “She spent her first sixteen years as someone else’s daughter.” His eyes looked to the deck plating, his voice thickening and going tight with the cost of maintaining his iron clad emotional control. “But she spent the last thirteen as mine.” He held out the pillow. “I can’t even move her things.” When Garrus didn’t make a move to take it, Anderson tossed it to him, but it landed short. “Someone left me once. It was all that helped me sleep. You haven’t slept in nearly four days.”
Garrus glanced toward the crew, but the wake had progressed to the point where they sat around in groups telling heavily slurred stories. He considered refusing, saying that he was fine without it, and letting it lie there. Damn it. He bent down and snatched it up, nodding his thanks before he spun, practically bolting for the elevator. Not that he didn’t appreciate the empathy, but the more professional everyone kept things, the better.

He breathed a sigh of relief when he made it into the elevator without notice. Not that he begrudged the crew the outlet, but he needed silence and time to get his head straight. He’d indulged himself long enough. Judging by Nihlus’s dedication to maintaining a minimum .15 blood alcohol level since Shepard’s death, it was going to fall to him to take the wheel. Which suited him fine. Over time he’d get to where the emptiness calloused over, and until then, preparation efforts for the Reapers couldn’t help but benefit from him pouring every ounce of his energy into them.

He left the elevator and headed straight for the shuttle. He’d throw the bench cushions on the floor, lock the hatch and go through the information in more detail until he fell asleep. Anderson was right about him not having slept since Shepard died other than dozing for a few hours that morning. He should be completely exhausted. He was completely exhausted, he just didn’t know how he was going to manage to sleep.

“Vakarian.”

He jumped, a hand slapping against his keel as he spun to face the voice. “Wrex.” A harsh, embarrassed rumble rolled through his second larynx. “I thought everyone was up drinking.”

The krogan chuckled, that deep rolling cough of sound. “You’re getting jumpy in your old age, Garrus.” He shook his massive head and held up a bottle. “I have my own. Parties are for the gloriously deceased. Shepard . . .” He shook his head again. “Shepard was bushwhacked by cowards. All that sort of death deserves is vengeance. I’ll remember her when I thrust my blade into those pyjaks’ hearts and their blood pours over my fist.”

He upended the bottle, chugging down almost a hand’s width to finish it off, then let out a roar encapsulating the collected anguish of the entire crew as he smashed it in the corner. “Shepard was the first hope the krogan have known since the genophage, the first alien . . . hell, the first person to stand up and say that the krogan are worth saving . . . that they can stand with the rest of the galaxy as equals.” He slumped. “Now . . .”

Garrus strode over and laid his hand on the pauldron of Wrex’s armour. “Now we pick up what she started and keep going, Wrex. We stick with the plan and show the galaxy that the krogan are ready . . . that their courage and ingenuity helped save us all. And this time, we don’t let them forget it.” He sat on the crate next to Wrex’s. “You weren’t back on Tuchanka long. Get anything happening back home?”

Wrex harrumphed. “The female shaman has distributed just about all the krogan artifacts. That got me meetings with the female clan leaders. They nearly killed me to get the genophage cure data, but agreed to setting up a lab in Urdnot territory as long as I declare it neutral ground and make a protected area for the females who want to be involved.”

Garrus frowned. “Your females live separately? Have their own clans?”

The behemoth nodded, his whole body dipping and swaying with the motion. “They have to. For their own protection.” A harsh chuff followed that. “And ours. Nothing is more precious than a fertile female. Males fight over them, blood rage sets in, someone ends up hurt or killed . . . sometimes females or young. Things were different before the genophage, but since . . .” Those huge, red eyes looked up at Garrus full of what looked like regret. “We can change that over time.
Tuchanka’s not a safe place, keeps you sharp and strong, but females and young shouldn’t have to worry about getting killed by the males.”

Garrus nodded. “I know Shepard gave what data you managed to get off the computer to Dr. Chakwas, and she’s working with a couple of other people she trusts to put the rest of it together. You just worry about unifying the clans and wrestling thresher maws.” He grinned and tipped his head a little. “And rebuilding the rachni into a cooperative race.”

Wrex nodded toward the back corner. “I see she’s still here.”

“Yeah, although Shiala says that after Omega, the queen wants us to revisit Ilos and see if there is any chance of settling her there.” Garrus let out a long breath. “It would be a good fit if we can make certain there’s no Reaper tech. No one knows how to get there but us. They’d get a chance to rebuild in peace.” He gave the battlemaster a hearty slap. “Well, we’ll discuss all that when we get everyone together on Omega. Get some rest, you have a people to unite, rachni to help rebuild, and thresher maws to tame.”

“Ha!” Wrex bellowed out a sharp laugh, the sound like grinding boulders. “I should have all that done by midday.” He stood and stretched. “She didn’t look it on the outside, but inside, Shepard was all krogan.”

Garrus stood. “She was something. I don’t think any of us will meet anyone like her again.” His throat closed again, the pain behind his keel forcing him to take shallow breaths as he backed away, heading for the shuttle. Exhaustion proved an intractable enemy when dealing with his emotions. He’d made it fifteen cycles into being an adult without having to worry about getting his heart broken. Now, he seemed to be making up all those cycles in a single shot.

Would you trade it? Would you give back the last couple of months to avoid feeling this?

Wrex grumbled, not seeming to notice Garrus retreating. “Yeah, she was all krogan.” His massive shoulders slumped. “See yah, Garrus.”

Garrus headed over to the shuttle and opened the hatch, placing the pillow and book on one of the front seats while he made the crew compartment comfortable. He dragged the bench cushions onto the floor and threw a couple of blankets over them. Try as he might to relax his throat and breathe . . . to wrestle the mournful ache back under control, each breath just drew the strings tighter.

He stripped off his tunic and boots, then retrieved the pillow and book. Maybe he could read for a while. His human common was getting pretty good. That last night Shepard had only had to tell him the definition of one word. He held the book up, staring at it. Did it matter? As much as he enjoyed the whole hard-boiled detective tale, he’d done it for her . . . to take her mind off the million worries pulling her in as many directions.

“If you stop reading those stories, I’ll kick your ass, Garrus,” her voice whispered through his thoughts. His mandibles dropped, and he let out a low keen. “Don’t throw me away just because it hurts. I’ll be closest in the moments you’re doing our things.”

He set the book down at one end of the cushions and laid down. Damn, even paper thin cushions on the floor of a shuttle was more comfortable than that bed. He spread a couple of blankets over himself, then tucked her pillow between his head and his cowl. Closing his eyes, he breathed in, her scent enveloping him and suddenly he became certain that if he opened his eyes, she’d be there, curled in next to him. It became so real that his front side warmed, her slight weight pressing into his plates.
“I had so many plans for us,” he whispered to the air. “I didn’t want to scare you by laying out everything I saw for us, but I never intended to let you further than an arm’s length away. If we died in flames, fighting Reapers, we’d die together, wearing one another’s coillasi. If we survived, and ever saw the end of war, I thought maybe we’d live somewhere quiet, put down the guns, and who knows . . . maybe even have a family.” The soft keen broke the air again and he curled around the pillow, pulling it in against him.

“I’m sorry I let you down, Kahri. I got careless, and I destroyed the lifetime we could have spent together. Spirits, I hope you’re okay wherever you are. I hope your family is there with you, and you’re happy.” For long moments, he just held the last remnants of her close, the pain of the hollow place where she should be escaping as a soft cry, low and deep in his throat. Eventually, it died away as exhaustion won, and he slipped into a light, fitful sleep.

Coillas (Coillasi - plural) -- The chains that hold turian bonding robes closed. After the ceremonies, they are wrapped and fastened around the wrists of both bond-mates. They are traditionally made out of the shell of a mollusk analogue that dwells in the shallow tide pools along the rocky shores of the equatorial oceanic areas. The chains are carved already linked and are nearly unbreakable.
Chapter Summary

Time to start getting on with life . . . if the council allows it.

“You look like you spent the night stuck under the shuttle rather than sleeping in it,” Tali said, slipping into the chair across from Garrus at breakfast. She listed sideways until her head propped up in her hand was all that kept her from slithering down onto the floor.

“And you look like you spent the night drinking up my entire stash of incredibly expensive triple-filtered brandy.” He raised his brow plates and his volume, some amused, sadistic part of him chuckling as she slid lower and lower in her chair. If anyone pulled that on him when he’d overindulged, they’d find themselves unable to talk for a few minutes. Amazing what a quick blow to the larynx could do. “Or am I mistaken about that?” he shouted.

“Ow! No,” Tali squawked as she winced, her elbow slipping. She banged her forearm on the edge of the table. “Owww. Garrus, that was mean.” Rubbing her arm, she stood and stomped over to the cupboards, grumbling about mean turians.

Guilt walked up the back of his neck like fingers, setting off a prickly sort of tingling along his nerves. Tali couldn’t be held responsible for his misery. “Better head over to see the doc soon, get something for the hangover. Drink lots of water. I expect to see you at 0800 in the comm room,” he called after her. “Don’t come half dead.” He finished his meal, picked up his dishes and a small stack of datapads. He walked over to wash his dishes. “Pass the word . . . at 0801, I trigger a shipwide fire alarm if everyone isn’t there and functional.” He wouldn’t feel the slightest guilt over that, although maybe he should.

Maybe the rest of them needed a couple of days recovery time. He’d lose his mind if he had to spend even half a day sitting still, but the rest of them . . . Shepard had intended to give them all a week off. He let out a sharp sigh; he’d bring it up at the briefing and see what everyone thought.

She flipped both hands, shooing him. “Yes, sir, Officer Grouch, sir.” She shooed him again, more forcefully that time. “Go, let us suffer in peace until your meeting.”

Garrus glanced over his shoulder, his attention snagged by Ashley stumbling around the divider, her toes dragging with every step. When she reached the table, she collapsed against it. “Uuuurrrgggg . . . God, someone please tell me that my alarm was a lie, and I can go back to bed until my head shrinks five sizes. Where’s the coffee?”

“Ashley,” Tali wheedled, her pathetic tone making Garrus smile despite himself, “Officer Grumpy is being mean to me.”

“Mean? Show up late to the meeting, and you’ll discover mean.” Garrus chuckled. He stacked his clean dishes in the rack then turned to face Ash, shaking his head at the gunnery chief’s miserable state. “0800, comm room. Be functional.” Snatching up his datapads, he strode for the stairs to the CIC. “Remember, anyone isn’t there, fire alarms will be tripped.”

Ashley shot a rueful glare at him from under her tussled mop of black hair. “I hate you a lot right now, sir.” Looking over at Tali, she scratched her stomach through her t-shirt. “Do I have to call him sir?”

“Yes, Chief Williams,” Anderson’s voice boomed out even before he strode around the bulkhead, “you do.” He looked over the two young women and shook his head. “I hope this isn’t the best that we can expect from this crew today.”

Ashley pulled a passable if a little wobbly salute. “No, sir. We’ll be right as rain after a couple cups of coffee and a bowl full of aspirin bran cereal, sir.”

“Aspirin bran?” Tali asked, cocking her head a little. “But one is a grain husk and the other is an analge . . . analges . . .” She pressed a hand to the side of her hood. “. . . pain . . . thing.”

“Yeah.” Ashley started adding sugar to her coffee, pausing a couple of times and then apparently deciding it was a day for a little coffee with her sugar. “It’s like Raisin Bran, but with aspirin instead of raisins. It tastes gross, but the relief is nice.”

The med bay door opened and Kaidan shuffled out, the heel of one hand pressed to his temple. “Speak for yourself, Williams. Someone shoot me. Please, put me out of my misery. It’ll be a kindness.”

Garrus shook his head and took the stairs two at a time as he heard what sounded like a stack of mugs falling out of the cupboard, the clatter followed by a chorus of very imaginative curses.

What’s a whorebinder?

The comm room stood empty when he walked in, but he hadn’t expected any different. With nearly an hour until the meeting, and considering how much alcohol everyone had consumed the night before, most people would be slow starting. He wanted to have a chance to prepare, to steel himself against the gut twisting emptiness of stepping into Shepard’s shoes. Luckily, that morning, they just had to go through a quick run down to make sure everyone had what they needed before heading to Omega.

“Garrus?” Joker’s voice came through the room’s comm system. The pilot didn’t sound hung over, but his voice lacked any of its usual snarky crackle. “Barla Von calling for you. It sounds important, he’s almost not pausing to wheeze between words.”

Garrus chuffed. “Put him through Joker. And, Joker, considering that it’s going to be Von paying your salary if the Alliance kicks you out . . .”

“Understood. Suck up to the volus. Roger that, sir. Patching him through.”

A wry smile made his mandibles flutter once.

Kahri, this group of misfits you put together might just save my sanity.

As he waited for the call to connect, he wondered when exactly he’d undergone the transition from being a loner. In the military, even in C-Sec, he was the one who volunteered for extra shifts rather than going out with the gang. He had a few close friends, but now suddenly, he was part of a big, really unusual family.

The little volus appeared in holographic form, cutting off that line of inquiry. “Officer Vakarian. I thought you’d want to know.” He paused for a quick intake of breath. “The council is holding a memorial this evening for Captain Shepard. They are posthumously granting her a medal for valour in defense of the citizens of the galaxy.” After rushing through the last two sentences, he sucked in a long, gasping draught of ammonia.

Fury burned through Garrus like a spark touched to flash paper. His jaw locked tight as he fought to stamp out the flame enough to speak. Those bastards. Those cowardly, indoctrinated cloacas. “When?” he managed to grunt between his teeth. The sound of heavy footsteps on the deck plating let him know he wasn’t alone. He hadn’t heard the door.

“They’re trying to claim her as their hero?” Nihlus roared from behind Garrus, his voice echoing off the bulkheads. “Those bastards.” He opened his omnitool. “They can’t get away with this. I have my hardsuit recording from the alley. I can . . ..”

Garrus turned from Von, an emotion very like gratitude flowing through him as dealing with Nihlus allowed him to wrestle his own anger under control. “Nihlus, stay calm. However we respond to this, we have to deal with it rationally. If we fly in there half-cocked, we’ll all just end up arrested.” He nodded toward the chair Shepard had used. “Sit down. Calm down. The others will be here in a few minutes.” Holding the Spectre’s stare, he waited until Nihlus nodded and walked over to take his seat. “Don’t worry,” he said. “We won’t let it go unanswered.”

Turning to Von, Garrus said, “Thank you for letting us know, Barla Von. We’re meeting in a few moments to start planning the war council on Omega. Once we know how we intend to go forward, I’ll call you back.”

“Very good.” The volus gave him a little bow. “The memorial is at 1500 Citadel time in the gardens at the Asari Cultural Center. Security is expected to be high, as is attendance.”

Garrus glanced behind him as he heard the door open. Anderson strode down the ramp. Giving the captain a quick nod, he turned back to the volus. “The council still hasn’t sworn out warrants for us?”

“No,” Von answered and then sucked in a wheezing breath. “In fact, they’re repudiating all claims that they were responsible for Shepard’s assassination.”

“What’s this about?” Anderson asked, sitting next to Nihlus.

Garrus let the question go, focusing on Barla Von, and it took focus to speak. His mind raced, trying to figure out a way to stop the council from hijacking Shepard’s memory. Spirits, she’d hate being paraded around by the enemy as the hero of yet another battle she’d been forced to fight. She’d probably haunt Udina, throwing him down stairs and tossing the contents of his home and office at him until he died of heart failure. “I’ll call you back within the next couple of hours once we’ve had a chance to discuss our options. Thank you again for letting us know.”

The volus disappeared, and Garrus turned to face Anderson. “The council is holding a memorial for Shepard, awarding her a medal for saving their asses.” Surprising him, Anderson laughed, and his anger flared again. How could Anderson be so cavalier about such a massive insult?

“Take her and turn her into a propaganda campaign to pull the wool over everyone’s eyes.” Anderson shook his head and leaned forward with his elbows on his thighs. “Pat everyone on the head. Don’t worry, Sovereign was a single case, a dreadnought controlled by Saren.”

Nihlus bristled, turning on the captain. “We can’t let them get away with it. They’ll lead the entire galaxy to the slaughter.” The Spectre lunged out of his seat and paced across the room and back. “There has to be something we can do.”

“The fact is that we aren’t going to be able to stop them, Nihlus.” Anderson shrugged, a rumbling sigh following his words. “We can’t be there every second. If we are, we’ll either end up indoctrinated or dead.”

Nihlus growled low and dangerous through his second larynx, but nodded. Garrus took a deep breath of relief. At least he wouldn’t have to fight Nihlus over everything. The foundations holding the Spectre together had been obliterated, but Garrus saw that the spine of him remained.

“We won’t let this go unchallenged,” Garrus said. He sat down in his usual chair, using the familiar perspective to anchor himself. He needed to stay calm, the steady hand on the thrusters to steer the ship through the minefields spread before them. “We just need to figure out what shape the challenge will take, and for that we need the team.”

He leaned back in his chair, watching Nihlus in the peripheral of his vision. The Spectre swayed ever so slightly even then, either still under the effects of the previous night’s drinking, or having gotten an early start. Still, his stare looked bright and focused, and his movement didn’t appear erratic. The question whispered through Garrus’s thoughts: how much experience as a functional drunk did Nihlus have? Maybe the drinking amounted to the return of an old behaviour rather than the formation of a new one.

“Barla Von could get us onto the Citadel,” Anderson said after a few minutes of silence. He braced his forearms on his knees and clasped his hands, looking up at Garrus without raising his head. “Wouldn’t take him more than a couple of hours to secure fake ID’s for as many as wanted to go ashore. We could meet one of the Shadow Broker’s ships a couple of relays out and switch ships.”

Garrus nodded, the ghost of a plan starting to come together. “We need more information.” He frowned, mandibles dropped. “We need other sources of information. Barla Von and the Shadow Broker do well by us, but I want to open up our sources, cast a wider net so to speak.”

“Agreed, although it’s a little late to do much about today.” Anderson looked over as the door opened and the rest of the team started filing through. Garrus watched him, trying to see what hid under the political savvy and resignation, but Anderson proved inscrutable. Surely, he had to be furious over the council’s attempted hijacking. Still, Garrus gave up without discovering anything. He hoped he gave as little away as the human did, but he doubted it.

“Take your seats,” Garrus told the others, turning his attention to them. “Something urgent has come up.” He waited until everyone sat. As he did, the room—even the ship—settled around him as he felt the mantle of leadership transfer. For a moment, he sensed what Shepard must have seen in him all along, but then it faded. He let out a resigned sigh. Maybe one day it would return to stay.

He cleared his throat. “Okay, everyone, let’s have quiet.” When only the Normandy’s background hum competed with him to be heard, he leaned forward, bracing against his knees. “Barla Von contacted us to let us know that the council is holding a memorial for Shepard in about ten hours. They’re giving her a posthumous medal for saving them and the Citadel.”

Ashley collapsed back into her seat. “I think my hangover is coming back. I feel sick.”

“That’s not the hangover,” Kaidan replied, sitting straighter in his chair. “What are we going to do? Sneak aboard, crash it?”

“Crashing it isn’t going to make any difference in the end,” Ashley said. “They’ll forget her in a couple of weeks, create a legend that works for their agenda.” She let out a harsh bark of bitter laughter and jumped up out of her seat. “Trust me, the truth doesn’t get in the way.” She paced to the door. “Damn it.” She slammed the heel of her hand into the metal. “But not her. They shouldn’t be able to have her.”

“Ashley.” She spun to face him, her mouth opening to shout, but she stopped when Garrus met her angry stare with a calm one. He tilted his head toward her chair. “Shepard doesn’t want your bitterness. Don’t burden her memory with that.”

“There’s nothing we can do to stop their revisionist history,” Tali said. She stood, her hands wringing for a second. “Ashley’s right, they’ll turn Shepard into what they need. In the end, that doesn’t matter. What matters is that when we had the chance, we stood up and did the right thing.” The silvery reflection of her eyes turned to Garrus. “We need to get a plan in motion now if we’re going to make it there in time.”

“Agreed,” Legion said, drawing Garrus’s attention. The geth turned toward Tali. “Creator Zorah, we believe that together geth and the creators can make a statement that honours Shepard-Captain’s memory.”

Looking around the room, Garrus saw agreement in every set of eyes. None of them could live with Shepard being hijacked by the council. They all loved her, and they’d all lost her. He, Nihlus and Anderson weren’t alone in that. He felt it bond him to them. Before they had all been her people . . . her team. They’d become his. Even Nihlus and Anderson.

“All right.” He stood and opened a channel to Barla Von. They could hold their meeting on the way to rendezvous with their transport.

* * * * *

“Keep your eyes open for Nihlus,” Garrus called over the nervous mutters and shuffling. He understood their discomfort: an airlock full of military personnel going into battle dressed in civvies. He felt just as naked as they did without his guns and armour, but he needed them to maintain military discipline. Armed or not, his people were headed into enemy territory.

“Eyes front!” he called, drowning out the noise this time and bringing silence. “Somehow Nihlus got off the ship before us. He’s been drinking. Depending on how much he’s had, he could be showing little to no caution. Keep your eyes open.” His hand rose to his hip, but found only fabric. The compulsion hit him again, some twitch deep in his brain demanding that he never go anywhere without a gun. Damn, why couldn’t he stop checking for a weapon that wasn’t there?

He forced his hand to stop halfway to his hip the next time. “Stay together. We’ll take transport to the Citadel tower transit station and walk from there.” He stretched taller, using his height to see to the back of the transport’s airlock, every eye looking to him. “Remember, we’re here to make a peaceful statement. Shepard wouldn’t want any of you to get hurt or end up arrested on her behalf. Pay her tribute the best way you know how . . . follow her example.”

“So, we should start a bar fight, then leap off the balconies in the embassy, and start praising the Enkindlers in the square?” Kaidan asked. His eyes sparkled as everyone around him laughed, but the emotion on his face wasn’t humour. The lieutenant brushed away tears with a quick swipe of his hand and held Garrus’s gaze.

Garrus smiled and nodded slowly, both appreciating Kaidan diffusing the tension and how much it cost him. “Exactly,” he replied, “except the opposite.” He looked to Anderson.

Anderson straightened and squared his shoulders. “Everyone here knows what Shepard wanted. As far as those of us assembled here are concerned . . .”
Pressly pushed through the crew to stand at their head. “We were her crew, Captain . . . her sword and her shield.” He stood at attention, rigid and implacable. “She may have made us wonder about her sanity and her methods from time to time, but she never steered us wrong.” The older officer looked up at Garrus. “She pointed us to Vakarian here and made him the general at the head of this fight. That makes us his sword and his shield.” He saluted Garrus.

After a moment of stunned surprise, Garrus saluted him back. “Thank you, Navigator Pressly.”

Anderson gave his XO a hard smile and nodded. “You heard the general. We’re here to pay respects, not cause a riot. Don’t give C-Sec any reason to move against us.” The captain turned to the door as the decon cycle ended and the outer hatch opened. “Let’s move.”

The general. Garrus hesitated at the threshold, staring out at the dock. Somehow he’d gotten on a ship and flown away from that place as a senior investigator for C-Sec, returning a few short months later as the general in charge of the galaxy’s smallest army. All because a praela roared into his life upon a gestallan wind and completely changed his fate. Those sorts of things only happened in the great legends. They certainly didn’t happen to torins like him.

Anderson glanced back over his shoulder, pulling Garrus over the threshold with a nod as if he’d read Garrus’s thoughts. Fine. If they needed him to be a general, he would find a way to be the best damned one he could. He jogged to the head of the line, striding at Anderson’s side.

“General Vakarian,” the Captain said, casting a quick smile his way. “You know wherever she is, Shepard’s grinning like a fool over that. Particularly over Pressly giving you the promotion.”

Nodding, Garrus remained silent, the warmth of her presence flaring through him then settling like a low burning candle in the pit of his gut.

They made it to the nearest transit station without attracting any attention at all. It surprised Garrus, and set his heart thumping a little harder and faster. His body felt something off in the very fabric of the Citadel and it kept pricking his nerves, keeping him poised to run or fight. Still, the C-Sec officers in the area glanced over the crew without any particular notice, dismissing them as just a few more faces amongst the press of people crowding through on the way to the Presidium.

Kaidan, Anderson, and Tali rode with him. Traffic clogged the airways, moving more and more slowly as they neared the Presidium. Although he saw the odd tendril of smoke curling into the air, the presidium clean up had moved along a lot more quickly than he would have thought.

“The Citadel looks pretty good,” Kaidan said, echoing Garrus’s thoughts when they finally landed. The lieutenant got out of the car and turned a slow circle. “At least the Presidium does.”

“Sovereign tried to carve its way out through Tayseri Ward. The rest of the Citadel managed to avoid taking more than small arms fire and missile damage,” Anderson said, looking around as well. “It seems like more than four days . . . six since Sovereign.”

“Let’s move off so the others can land.” Garrus walked over to the base of the tower. The Citadel had been his home for a lot of cycles, but in his time with Shepard it had transformed into something both foreign and dangerous. He could scarcely believe how much the galaxy had changed in those three months . . . how much his life had changed. How much he’d changed. Maybe it all boiled down to the changes in him and seeing all the old, familiar things through a new lens.

He forced his mind away from the melancholy. He needed to stay sharp and alert, not brooding inside his head. When the last taxi dropped off its passengers, he started for the park a couple of blocks further up the Presidium.

They’d just about arrived when Garrus’s inner alarm went off with a shriek, stopping him so abruptly that Kaidan ran into his heels. He frowned, his heart hammering against his chest wall, and the sting of nettles prickling down his spine. C-Sec had alerted to something. Despite the huge crowd that filled the gardens and spilled out past the entrance, Garrus could spot every single C-Sec officer, even the plain clothes ones. All the ones around the park became restless at the same time, their hands rising to their ears, which meant a bulletin or dispatch over their radios.

“Something going on?” Kaidan asked, stepping up beside him.

Garrus nodded, his heart slowing a little as none of the officers in the area seemed the least bit interested in the Normandy crew. In fact . . .. “Yeah. C-Sec just went on high alert.”

“Think it’s about us?” The lieutenant turned to watch their backs.

“No.” Garrus nodded toward the closest officers, all of whom had looked up. He followed their stares, his heart leaping into his throat, choking him as it ached, torn between beauty and sorrow.

“Oh my god,” Ashley gasped, a startled combination laugh and sob escaping as the chief shaded her eyes against the bright, artificial sunlight.

The sun warmed the side of Garrus’s face as he lifted a hand to his brow, his heart trying to bludgeon its way out through his plates.
above image was painted by CuriousCanvas as part of our MEBB14 submission. It is inspired by this scene. Check her out on Tumblr. She does amazing work.

Shepard stopped halfway through pulling her nightwear from her closet and turned to look at him, an incredulous grin slowly spreading across her face. “Sweet baby Jesus, Garrus . . . we’re taking the first landing party down to Rannoch. Over three hundred years of exile . . . and in the morning, it ends. When I was a kid, I wanted so badly to get off Mindoir and have adventures, but this . . .
“This is a whole other level.”

One hand flopped a little as she tried to put her awe into words. He loved when she did that—her emotions so strong that she had to beat them down into words, but she could never seem to find ones big enough to fit. “Our little Tali will be remembered for as long as there are quarians.”

Shaking her head, she blinked back the shine of tears and turned back to her closet.

He nodded, watching her with an incredulous awe of his own. How the tiny, crazy, impossible woman managed the miracles she pulled off . . . He wanted to say that she would be remembered just as long for being the driving force behind it all, but he knew she’d just blow it off. No matter what she did, she parcelled up the credit and gave it away to others. Wrestling aside his emotions to find words, he said, “It’s extraordinary, and it all started with one of the best shots I’ve ever seen.”

Shepard laughed. “One of? Oh, Officer, you will pay for that one. You know . . . one day when you aren’t covered in bullet holes and blast damage.”

A double line of ships moved along the length of the Citadel, flying between the ward arms toward them. Each pair consisted of a geth and a quarian ship. The line stretched as far as he could see, the ships moving slowly, the emergency lights along their hulls blinking the ‘Missing Sailor’ signal. He closed his eyes, listening. The engines of the ships thrummed low and deep, adding a back rhythm to the moment as the crowd started to realize something incredible was happening right before their eyes, and a tangible sense of awe burst into being.

The shockwave of a tiny nova of hope, reverence and gratitude rolled toward him. He turned back toward their destination as it washed over him.

“That’s all the memorial she’d ever need, right there,” Garrus whispered as he opened his eyes, watching the crowd rather than the ships moving past. Eyes of every kind and colour turn to watch the very real hope of peace and cooperation fly past. Whispers of wonder accompanied smiles and then laughter and delight as reality registered in every mind and heart there. A couple of days before, they’d almost been snuffed out, but then a tiny woman, her partner, and the unlikely alliance of people she’d formed had saved the day.

When he’d watched Tali and Kal’Reegar step onto the surface of Rannoch ten days before, Garrus felt the most remarkable sense of being a part of living history. He’d never experienced anything to compare with it, and through it all, he’d watched Shepard, wondering how the galaxy had come to rotate around her. However it happened, he’d been honoured and humbled to be a part of it. Standing there, the proof of her life flying past, signalling its grief at her loss, he felt that sense return again. At that moment, he realized that the galaxy hadn’t just tilted around Shepard’s fulcrum, it tilted around him as well. For whatever reason, he’d been chosen to take a place on the leading edge of changing the galaxy forever. “No pressure,” he whispered under his breath.

He looked back up at the line of ships and said, “No matter what the council and Udina do to her memory, that’s her legacy.”

Wrex grumbled, a small thunderclap of sound rolling up the line of crew. “A part of it.” He chuckled, the sound almost more fierce than his growl. “Now we just need to get together a parade of rachni riding thresher maws.”

Garrus laughed along with the rest of the crew. That sight would keep the fools awake at night.

A hand slipped into his, gripping his talons tight. He didn’t need to look down to know who it was. “Is this what Legion meant?” he asked, keeping his voice soft and his subvocals flat.
“Yes. He and I called the ships that remained after the attack,” Tali replied. She tugged at his hand a little. “We should keep moving and do this. She’ll be disgusted if we get ourselves arrested.”

“She would have loved this, Tali,” Garrus said, starting back toward the garden. The glow of Shepard’s presence that resided in his gut began to brighten, filling him with confidence. “Your courage impressed her, and not just the charge headlong into danger kind. She considered your willingness to give the geth a chance, risking everything to take that first scouting party to Rannoch, the bravest thing she’d ever witnessed.”

Tali’s fingers gripped his talons tighter, but she didn’t answer that. Instead, she nodded toward the crowd. “They feel it, Garrus. They may not understand exactly what it is or why they feel it, but they do. They know what she did for all of us, and one day they’ll understand the rest . . . what we’re going to do for them in her honour.”

He nodded and squeezed her hand. “Okay, let’s keep moving before we all end up in . . .” He stopped, scowling as the sound of crashing, glass breaking, and people shouting erupted ahead of them.

“They’re lying to you, and you’re all too stupid or indoctrinated to even know!”

“That’s Nihlus’s drunken shouting, isn’t it?” Alenko asked, then cursed under his breath.

“She didn’t save you from Saren!” the Spectre cried out. “She saved you from these vipers. There are a thousand more like Sovereign on the way, and these so-called representatives of ours intend to trade all of you to save their own hides!”

C-Sec officers began to tear their eyes off the sky, moving in toward the park. Garrus let out a growling sigh, his gut dropping. Damn that idiot Spectre. After everything Shepard went through to save his stupid, grieving ass.

Frustration and anger shoved aside Garrus’s grief. If the council didn’t kill Nihlus, in that moment, Garrus couldn’t guarantee he wouldn’t save them the trouble and do it himself.

Praela(s) -- The name for ancient warrior spirits who were believed to ride great beasts (or forces of nature) into war at the head of their tribe’s legions. Spirits of great bravery, tenacity, and a fearsome beauty.

Gestallan -- (particularly in reference to the wind or other force of nature) Of encompassing change. A change of fate or fortune. In turian mythology, it was believed that Praelas rode such winds as their steeds, charging into battle to change the fates of individuals, tribes, and whole planets.
Chapter Summary

Shepard's council memorial. It was a simple plan. Go in, play their respects... look the council in the eye.

Fratrim -- Brother, but one of honour, friendship, or of oath rather than one of blood relation. Refers to the bond of karifratrus.

Karifratrus -- a blood oath made between turians, bonding them as siblings in honour rather than blood. It has its origins in ancient tribal culture. Clan members swore oaths before going into battle. If one of them died, the family and all dependents of the other would be adopted into the survivor's family. While the oath-swears are alive, they are bonded as close or closer than blood. If bond-mates are involved, the bond can be a three (four) way romantic or platonic relationship. Children of one are considered the children of both. Although no longer as common as it once was, karifratrus is accepted and honoured both socially and legally.

“Let’s get in there.” Garrus shoved his concern and anger aside and looked to the captain walking at his side. “Anderson, you and I will grab Nihlus and get him back to the alley to the wards. Alenko, Wrex, Tali, and Williams stick to the plan, then come take custody of our inebriated Spectre.” At the garden’s gate, he stopped and turned to face the line of crew. “Hold him there, wait for the rest of the crew. Once everyone has gone through, we’ll get him back to the transport. Be careful. Nihlus likely has a contract out on him. No one gets within a half klick. Keep sharp.”

“Roger that,” Alenko answered, his jaw set in a grim line.

“Okay, let’s go.” Garrus turned and struck out into the crowd, Tali dropping back to walk next to Liara. Bodies pressed close, but most people seemed to have settled into their places, and he wove through their numbers with greater ease than he’d expected. Having crowd control experience didn’t hurt either. It was amazing what the threat of a turian elbow jab could do to gain a little room.

“Nihlus hasn’t stopped drinking since she died, has he?” Anderson asked as they started forward, hurrying down the street.

Garrus just shook his head. Something cracked inside Nihlus when Saren tried to kill him, but being betrayed by the council, the body and ideal that he’d dedicated his life to serving... that had broken him. Shepard’s loss just reduced the pieces to dust.

“Don’t let them play you all for—”

Garrus and Anderson stepped up, hurrying down the left hand aisle toward a podium decorated lavishly with large arrangements of the same flowers—lilies, he believed they were called—the crew had placed on Shepard’s coffin. He stared at them for a moment, brow plates lowered, as his hand lifted to press over the pocket where his resided, wrapped in paper. Was it some sort of tradition, or did everyone, even Udina, know that she liked the elegant, white blossoms? Not that... floral preferences had a place in battlefield banter, but it was just one more unpainted corner of Shepard’s canvas.

“Garrus!” Nihlus’s yell dragged him out of his self-pity as the Spectre spotted them. Staggering, Nihlus plowed into the front row, sending an asari diving for cover in the lap next to hers. “Garrus! Anderson! Tell them. You know what a lie this is.” Both arms stretched out to his sides and he spun, nearly falling through the large hologram of Shepard. “Look how many people came.”

Garrus grumbled as a vase of the frilly, white flowers smashed on the ground, knocked aside by a careless arm as Nihlus tried to regain his balance. Damn it. The idiot might be smashed out of his mind, but he was right about the attendance. Thousands sat and stood throughout the large green-space, but that just made it harder to get to the Spectre before he trashed the entire memorial.

Garrus winced as another flower arrangement perished, feeling both a profound sympathy and a wrenching embarrassment on the Spectre’s behalf. “Nihlus, stop!” he called. “You’re not honouring her like this. You’re turning her into a joke to be told at their parties and around water coolers.”

At that, Nihlus stopped dead, swaying drunkenly, a soft keen vibrating through the air. It trembled, lost and despairing. A fist punched through Garrus’s throat, icicle fingers wrapping around both larynges.

 Damn it, Shepard . . . look what you’ve done to him.

Garrus breathed through the choking pain and forced himself forward, an intense need to protect the other torin transforming ice into fire. They needed to get Nihlus out of there, give him time to grieve. In his current state, if C-Sec got ahold of him, the Spectre would be lucky to last the day.

Anderson pushed past Garrus to grab ahold of Nihlus’s arm. Twisting it behind the Spectre’s back, the captain used it to propel the inebriated turian down the main aisle. Garrus caught up about half way to the entrance and slipped his hand around Nihlus’s upper arm. All fight drained out of the Spectre, and he slumped, legs dragging.

“Spirits, Nihlus, stand up. Walk out of here with some damned pride.” Garrus yanked him up onto his feet, and whispered, just a low hiss at Nihlus’s aural canal, “Get up. You wonder why she chose me? Why she loved me? When you act like this?” He winced a little as he drove the knife in, but desperate times called for a cold slash of cruelty. “How could she love a torin who gives in, folding and tearing like wet paper at the slightest sign of difficulty?” He jabbed Nihlus with his elbow. “She must have found you so pathetic.”

Nihlus stiffened and spun on Garrus, yanking his arm free. “You . . .”

“What about me?” Garrus tilted his head, his mandibles fluttering a little in challenge as Nihlus looked into his eyes.

Come on, get angry. Curse me out. Try to kick my ass. Prove me wrong.

The Spectre cursed, some dim light of comprehension igniting in the depths of that stare. “Damn you.” He took a swing, but the blow sailed a foot wide of Garrus’s head. “You don’t know anything about me.”

“I know that you loved Shepard, and that you shouldn’t drink. That’s enough to start with.” Garrus took hold of Nihlus’s upper arm again. “Come on. Let’s get you out of here before you end up shot.”
“Why the hell do you care what happens to me, Vakarian?” Nihlus tried to wrestle free and just ended up going down on one knee.

Garrus lifted him back up, leaning closer so that his words wouldn’t go any further than them. “Because she loved you. That makes you my fratrin and my responsibility.”

The Spectre stopped, his wavering stare locking onto Garrus with alarming desperation. “Fratrin?” He gripped the lapels of Garrus’s tunic and pulled him in. “Karifratarus? What? Would you have . . . ?”

Garrus shoved Nihlus toward the alley. “We swore no oaths, Nihlus, and now she’s dead. Just keep moving.”

Between them, Garrus and Anderson kept the staggering Spectre on his feet and headed in the right direction. Scattered here and there throughout the crowd, C-Sec agents closed in. He pressed on, hoping they could get Nihlus to the alley before the net closed . . . a hope that died a moment later as a tall, blonde human stepped in front of them.

The man looked from Anderson to Nihlus then Garrus. He sighed, his rugged face creasing into a frown. “What’s going on here, Vakarian? I just got a call to arrest Spectre Kryik.”

“Bailey.” He leaned toward the man. Having known Bailey for years, he respected the human for his tough, but even-handed approach. Garrus just hoped he’d lean toward compassion when presented with the truth behind Nihlus’s situation. “Kryik had a thing for Shepard. He’s drunk. Let me take him back to our ship. You won’t see him until he’s sober.”

The human glanced in the direction of several of the incoming officers, then shook his head. “I’m trusting you on this, Vakarian.” He stepped aside and jerked his head toward the alley. “Get him out of here, and make it six months. I don’t know what’s going on, but the council wants his head. Keep it away from them, or they’ll cut it off.”

“Thanks, Bailey.” Garrus ducked behind a small cluster of onlookers to avoid another officer he knew, one he didn’t think would give them a pass. When they hit the stairs, he let out a long breath of relief.

“We’re not clear yet,” Anderson grumbled, stumbling backwards as Nihlus threw his head to the side, smacking the captain directly in the forehead. The hollow-melon thock echoed down the corridor. “Damn it, Kryik.”

Nihlus turned on him. “You. You were like her father, and you just let—”

Garrus cut him off, elbowing him under his lowest chest plate, knocking the wind out of him. “You’ll want to shut up now.” He stopped just before the elevator to the ward. “We had a plan, Nihlus, and you nearly screwed it up for everyone.”

“Someone had to say something. Your plan . . .” Nihlus shoved Garrus back, but the blow didn’t even stagger him.

Garrus grabbed the cowl of Nihlus’s tunic, sympathy going up in frustrated flames. “Listen to me. In a few minutes her crew is going to start showing up here to keep you from getting killed. They have just lost a commanding officer they loved and respected. You were her partner. They are going to be looking to you for strength and courage.” He shook Nihlus hard enough that he heard the Spectre’s teeth rattle. “Pull it together for them and for her.”

Nihlus shoved him, managing enough force to hurt. Garrus pushed him away, but stared him down with a gaze that promised to end anything Nihlus started. After a few seconds, he heard Kaidan and the others jogging down the stairs.

“The relief has arrived, but um . . . we have a new problem, Garrus. Ash . . . .” Kaidan nodded back to where Normandy crew members continued to trickle down the stairs. “You should get up there and fast. She wouldn’t let me drag her out of there. Go ahead. We’ll keep him out of trouble.”

Garrus’s heart slid down into his lower intestines. What the hell was going on with everyone? The galaxy was going to believe that the entire coalition against the Reapers was comprised of lunatics.

Wrex grunted. “We could just take him back to the transport.”

Garrus bolted for the stairs without waiting for Anderson, but called back, “No. I don’t want us strung out across the wards access. Stay here, stay sharp. We’ll be back in a few minutes. I wouldn’t go at all, but damn it, I want those bastards to look me in the eye.”

Garrus headed up the stairs, able to hear Ash even though he couldn’t tell what she said. Damn it. Ash sat at the bottom of the list of people he expected to lose their shit, and now he had to drag another one of his insane, belligerent people out of the council’s face. The council didn’t know who he was, and for a reason. Shepard had worked hard to keep him clear of any meetings or communications. Now, because her people had learned far too well from her example, all that was getting flushed down the drain.

He grimaced. If she knew that he was drawing their attention, she’d probably kick his ass. At least she’d kick Nihlus and Ashley a lot harder.

Garrus shoved that concern into the drawer with all the others and picked up the pace. The weight of the Citadel pressed down heavier every moment he remained there . . . every moment his people remained there. He needed to get them out of there and quickly. As soon as he cleared the stairs, he heard what Ashley was shouting.

“. . . are supposed to be humanity’s ambassador, and you just fed her to these alien wolves for the sake of gaining a little bit more power.” The chief gripped Udina by the front of his suit jacket, their noses less than a centimetre apart. “Shepard might have brought aliens into the fight, but she was there for humanity. She refused to let these bastards sell out our entire species to save their own.” She threw him away from her, shoving him hard enough that he stumbled backwards over a flower arrangement, sending it smashing to the ground. The flowers were losing ground in the battle. “And she would have never sold us out for a bigger office and a fancy title.”

At that rate, none of the Normandy crew would ever be invited to any formal, fancy affairs. Garrus almost laughed, but then Ashley went after Tevos and Sparatus stepped between them. The old torin had been a hell of a warrior in his day, and Garrus knew that the chief would end up splattered all over something if she went up against him. At least, she would if Tevos didn’t warp her into a ball of human goo, first.

“Chief Williams!” Garrus barked, pulling her attention away from the council. “Stand down and get your ass back with the rest of the crew.”

She turned back to stare into Sparatus’s eyes for another moment, nearly growling as she said, “I’m not afraid of you, turian.” After a breathless moment Garrus spent praying that Sparatus and Tevos maintained their diplomatic calm, Ash spun on her heel, shoving past him. “Back off, Vakarian. You’re not my CO. You’re just as bad as the rest of these bastards. Where were you when Shepard needed you? Huh? Would she be dead now if she’d been a turian?”
Garrus staggered back from that blow, Anderson moving in to confront the chief. Ashley held her hands up, palms facing the livid captain. “Never mind, sir. I’m out of here. I don’t expect anyone here to understand honouring or standing up for one’s own people.” She shoved by them, lifting into a jog as soon as she got clear of the crowd.

Garrus watched her until she disappeared into the wards access, then let out a long sigh and turned toward Anderson. The two of them strode for the front side by side, arriving just as Udina stepped forward, calling for order.

“Everyone calm down,” the newest councillor called. “You all know that the geth and quarian fleets helped defend the Citadel against Saren’s dreadnought during the attack.” He waved for people to take their seats. “All of this has been part of the ceremony.”

Garrus chuckled as he stepped up to face Udina and Tevos, but it felt January-iron-cold in his mouth. “Even the drunken Spectre and the pissed off Marine, Udina?” He leaned in close. “I can’t stop you from taking her memory and distorting it, but know that one day, she’ll be proven to have been right all along. When that day comes and you run to us for shelter from the storm . . . remember this moment and that it was your hand on that gun just as it was yours, Madam Councillor.” He looked into Tevos’s eyes for a moment before turning on Sparatus and Valern. “And yours.”

Feeling a vague prickle down his spine and a tug on his hand warning him to retreat, he spun toward the holo of Shepard and snapped to attention.

He gave her image a turian salute, lifting his elbow to shoulder height, then touching the knuckles of his fist to the point of his keel. Turning to leave, he spotted his father in the crowd, seated next to the Executor, and hesitated. They locked stares, but then Herros shook his head, a subtle twitch to either side. As much as he longed for the comfort and solemn understanding promised in his father’s eyes, Garrus felt the wisdom of waiting. It surprised him, and he swore he saw surprise in the elder Vakarian’s eyes as well.

Garrus touched the backs of his talons to his brow before turning away and striding down the aisle between the seats. He didn’t possess anything he wished to say to the crowd. He could feel what Shepard had always said about the place and people. They all hid the truth: a magnificent fortress made fragile by termites gnawing their way through every wall and beam; bright, bleached smiles hiding teeth hollow and decayed. That truth pressed in on him, making it hard to breathe, and even though he would have never thought it, Omega beckoned, promising an honest freedom under the filth and despair.

As he followed Anderson down the aisle—every eye in the park focused on him, thousands of laser sights burning through his plates—Garrus felt Shepard walking beside him, her hand gripping his tight. Her essence, the fire and determination that had been smouldering deep in his belly flared up, burning through him with its certainty.

“You can do this,” it whispered through his thoughts. “You can lead these people and win this war. I know you can. Take care of my people . . . your people, General Vakarian.”

Garrus pulled in a deep breath and nodded. He stopped at the entrance to the park and turned back to look at the hologram of Shepard standing amidst the floral arrangements and pillars.

“Spirits, you would have hated this memorial, Kahri.” He laughed as the council returned to the podium, trying to look as if the Citadel hadn’t been invaded by a flotilla of geth and quarians, a drunk Spectre, and Shepard’s indignant crew. Imagining the chaos Shepard could have sown had she been there made him laugh, low and deep.
“I thought I’d lost you,” he whispered, staring at her image, “but you’re right here. You’ll always be right here.” He backed up, following Anderson, but not quite ready to look away. “Let’s show them.”

Taking a deep breath, he turned, striding quickly after the crew. They needed to get Nihlus aboard the transport and out of there.

“Square protection detail,” he called as he and Anderson trotted down the stairs into the alley. “Wrex, Alenko, Williams take point. Anderson and I’ll walk drag. Keep your eyes open. The council doesn’t get to bushwhack us twice.” He grabbed Nihlus’s arm and pulled the Spectre toward him. “No more, right?” he whispered, the words for Nihlus alone. “You want to drown your pain in brandy, fine, but you don’t risk what she died to build, ever again, right?”

Nihlus nodded and yanked his arm free, stalking after the double line of Normandy crew that formed the leading edge of the square.

“I’m worried about his stability,” Anderson said. The captain’s brow furrowed.

Garrus started off. “I’m not. At his core, he’s a turian, a soldier, and a Spectre. He’ll be all right once we get going. He just needs something to focus on.”

Keeping to back alleys and secondary elevators, they managed to make good time to the docking bay while avoiding C-Sec. Garrus considered using transport, but didn’t want to break the group up and have people waiting around taxi stands when they’d made such a distinct impression upon the council. He hovered halfway between bursting into a volley of colourful curses and hysterical laughter. The plan had been so damned simple. Go in, pay their respects, look the council in the eye, and get out.

“I’ll have a talk with Williams,” Anderson said as they exited the elevator into the public dock where their transport awaited them. “I have no idea what she was thinking. From Shepard’s reports, I thought the chief was overcoming her prejudice.” The captain looked up, his gaze moving over the balconies and walkways above and beside them.

Garrus mirrored him, watching their other side. The space remained only sparsely populated, leaving him feeling exposed as they mounted the series of ramps to the massive ship’s personnel hatch. “She was getting along very well. I’m not sure what that was about, but I’ll leave it to you to sort.”

“Garrus!”

Garrus turned toward the call, wincing at the fury in the voice. Martin raced down a long set of stairs from the waiting lounge above, a huge backpack and a duffel slung over his shoulders.

Damn, he should have contacted Martin. He wondered if Anderson had. Probably, but still, he should have as well. Bracing himself for the coming storm, Garrus turned to the others. “Go ahead and board. I’ll be there in a minute.”

Anderson shook his head. “I told him we were coming, thinking maybe he’d want to go through the memorial with us.” He stepped up to the railing on the docking arm. “But, he looks like he’s planning on coming along.”

“Why?” Martin screamed, pulling Garrus’s attention back to him as he ran up the docking arm. “Why, Garrus?”

Garrus nodded toward the hatch, his gut twisting as Martin shouted his own question at him. He didn’t have an answer . . . for either of them. He glanced at Anderson. “Go aboard, Captain. He wants me.”

Anderson shook his head, his jaw jutting out in an impressive demonstration of stubbornness as he squared his shoulders and turned to face the angry youth. “I’ve known the kid forever. I can help calm—”

“He loved her,” Garrus said, cutting the captain off. “He doesn’t want to be calm. He wants to beat the injustice out of the universe.” He stabbed a talon toward the hatch. “Go ahead.”

Martin didn’t slow, charging straight into Garrus, hands raised to shove the much larger turian. “Why?” he demanded again, the heels of his hands slamming into Garrus’s chest. The momentum behind the blow staggered Garrus back into the railing, his keel letting out a creak as one of the cartilaginous menisci popped. He winced, but didn’t say anything. That appeared to suit Martin just fine. The youth pounded on him three more times, shouting with each blow, “Why?”

Garrus didn’t move, speak, or try to subdue Martin’s fists, letting him exhaust his fury and grief until he reached a level of anger that allowed for coherence. Garrus understood, he just didn’t have the luxury of beating the crap out of someone to vent his emotions, nor that of drinking himself into oblivion. Not if his Kahrī was looking on. She expected so much more from him. She expected everything from him, and letting her down . . .

Finally, panting heavily, Martin threw himself back, one hand digging into his hip as he struggled to regain his breath. He staggered a few steps toward the transport, then back to lean on the railing.

“Why?” the young man whispered a last time, looking up at Garrus.

Garrus sighed and stared into the sensors that covered where Martin’s eyes had once been. “Why what, Martin?” He stepped away from the railing and smoothed the front of his tunic. When he continued, he kept his voice kind and low. “Why did they kill her? Why didn’t I save her? Why wasn’t it me? Why wasn’t she as immortal and indestructible as she appeared?” He shook his head and shrugged. “Why what?”

Martin tensed, fury etched in every line of his face. He blamed Garrus, that much was certain. “All of them. You were with her when it happened?” He flung away his pack and duffel. “You and Anderson were with her?” Shoulders braced and bristled, jaw and fists clenched, Martin shifted from foot to foot, finally finding an outlet for grief that he’d borne alone for almost a week.

Spirits, he should have called the poor kid.

“Yes,” Garrus said finally, on a long breath out. “We were with her.” He walked over to Martin and placed a hand on the young man’s shoulder. “Even though we knew she and Nihlus would be in danger if they stayed, the council had just made her a Spectre. We didn’t think they’d move against her so soon. We grabbed Anderson and were on our way to meet the crew at Flux.” Releasing him, Garrus turned to the railing, leaning into it.

For more than a minute, he just stared out at the people. Life flowed through the terminal, coming and going without the slightest clue that their worlds had all become more fragile than they could imagine.

“I had my arm around her,” he said at last, his voice just a whisper. As his mind drifted back to the moment, his body followed in kind, drifting down the dock a couple of meters as if it could distance itself from the reality. “I keep thinking I could’ve done something . . . should have done something, but it happened so fast. We weren’t wary enough.” Bracing his arms against his sides, Garrus gripped the railing in his talons and leaned out. “She was dead in my arms before I knew she was in danger.”

Martin followed and leaned against the railing a half-metre away. “She didn’t even see it coming, did she? If she didn’t, how could you?” He let out a sigh that sounded as if it originated in his feet.
“She let her guard down, and it got her killed.”

Garrus turned to face the young man, his hand settling back onto Martin’s shoulder. “We all did, so now all we can do is carry on the best we can.” Stepping away, Garrus nodded toward the Citadel.
“Go, keep training. Live your life. Become the best damned C-Sec officer on the force. Make her proud, kid.”

Martin shook his head. “This has never been my home. This is where I waited for her to come back to me. She’s never coming back, Garrus. I don’t have any reason to wait for her here any longer.”
Stepping closer, he looked up, his entire body changing from rigid to solid under Garrus’s hand.
“You’re taking up her fight? You and Anderson and the Spectre?”

“Yes, but—”

“Then I’m coming with you. She was my friend . . . my . . .” He shrugged in a disappointed but resigned way. “. . . sister. I love her, and her fight is mine.” Chin jutting out, he met Garrus’s skepticism with a determination that made the turian shake his head. Martin’s face formed a smile, but a cold, vengeful one. “You know you can’t stop me. The best you can do is take me with you and hope to keep me out of trouble.”

Garrus’s smile came naturally, his mandibles flicking with both genuine amusement and admiration. He should have known. Shepard didn’t attract anything but guts and an impressive level of stubbornness. He considered refusing for about half as long as it took to decide it would prove futile, then flicked a thumb talon toward the hatch.

Martin’s smile turned even more fierce as he nodded then turned to grab his packs.

A dozen warnings and vague half-threats pushed their way to the fore of his mind, but Garrus dismissed them all. With all the fire burning through Martin’s blood, the kid wouldn’t hear anything, anyway. Just as he hadn’t heard his father’s warnings and predictions of disaster years before. He’d keep the kid close, where he could watch him, and make as sure as he could that nothing happened to him. He could keep that promise.

Garrus glanced over the docks, just checking to see if they’d drawn any sort of attention, then followed Martin into the ship.

Three hours later, he clapped an arm around the kid’s shoulders and escorted him through the Normandy’s airlock onto the CIC. “Welcome to the Normandy, Martin. You can share the cargo bay with me, Wrex, and the rachni queen.” He grinned at the wide-eyed look he got—amazing how it translated even past the implants. “Don’t worry, the rachni queen has a nice little nest set up in the far corner and mostly just sings. I bite, but I sleep in the shuttle. Wrex made himself a cozy little room out of crates. I’m sure if you ask nicely, he’ll help you make one too.” He saluted the guard at the door and ushered Martin through first. “You’ll be fine for the two days to get to Omega.”

The kid stopped dead, nearly falling when Garrus slammed into his back side. Garrus caught him by the strap on his duffel and hauled him back onto the stair. “Wait? What? We’re going to Omega?” He paled. “Isn’t that some sort of criminal outpost?”
A wry grin crossed Garrus’s face as he shrugged. “Welcome to the other side of the straight and narrow, Martin. In order to prepare for the Reapers, we’ve had to do a lot of colouring outside the lines, and there’s a whole lot more to do. If you’re uncomfortable with bending the rules, you’ve joined the wrong organization.”

“Did the council kill her?” Martin demanded, trudging down the rest of the stairs on stiff, wooden legs.

Garrus shook his head, just a slight tremor to either side. “I don’t know. Part of me wants to say definitely, but then the other part asks why. They’d just heralded her a hero, made her a Spectre. Dying like this, she becomes a figurehead.” A low, strained rumble rolled from his throat, tightening as his memories pressed at him. He slapped the elevator control and pushed Shepard away. The time for keening and tears had come and gone.

Martin cocked his head off to one side, his eyelids narrowing over the sensors as he stared up into Garrus’s face. “You really loved her didn’t you?”

The question shot a missile into the wall holding Garrus’s emotions in check, weakening it enough that it took all his focus to slap enough rebar and mortar up to stop it from collapsing altogether.

After staring for another second, Martin put him out of his misery and looked away. “She loved you. I could tell. She looked at you the way I always wished she’d look at me.” The elevator door opened and the kid led the way inside, leaning against the back wall. “I was jealous at first, but then I realized that I was happier that she could love someone than I was angry it wasn’t me. I thought losing her family had smashed that part of her completely.”

Garrus froze, his hand raised to the elevator control. Spirits. Shepard’s family.

Sweet baby Jesus, Garrus, you forgot, didn’t you?

He hit the control. As soon as he got Martin settled, he’d go to Anderson. “Did she tell you anything about her family?” he asked.

“No. She kept it pretty buried. Hurt too much.” He pushed off the wall and straightened, shifting his duffel in front of him like armour. “What I learned, I dug up on my own. There’s quite a lot in the public record if you know where to look, and more in the not so public record if you don’t mind hacking through a lot of security.” He shuddered. “I don’t know how she survived.”

The elevator opened, but both of them took a moment to notice, looking inward, buried in thoughts. When he finally realized that they’d arrived, Garrus looked down the length of the cargo bay. Ashley wasn’t at her station. Perhaps Anderson called her up to discuss her sudden return to racism. Garrus’s gut rolled, the hateful words she’d shot at him hitting like polonium rounds. Betrayal. The poison behind those shots amounted to betrayal. He believed them friends. Just one more thing to shake off and push past. How many more before the wall came down, and he disappeared under the avalanche?

Until then . . . . He took a deep breath, wincing as the scents of no fewer than fifty memories smacked him in the face at once. Straightening his back until it cracked, he spun on his talons, looking over at Wrex’s corner of the hold. “Hey, Wrex? You in there?”

“No.”

Garrus chuckled and shook his head. “Come on, kid, I’ll introduce you.” He led Martin over to where the krogan sat in his little shelter, cleaning his shotgun. “Don’t let the old guy intimidate “Come a little closer and say that, Garrus,” Wrex said then laughed, looking up from his work as they stepped into his doorway. “Who’s this pyjak?”

Garrus stepped aside when Martin didn’t show any inclination to move forward. “This is Martin Weaver, one of Shepard’s oldest friends. Could you help him set up a place to bunk while he’s here?”

Wrex set down his gun and stood, towering over the human. Garrus hid his smile behind his hand as Wrex shrugged his armour up his massive shoulders and tilted his head to crack his neck. “One of Shepard’s friends?” Wrex asked, harrumphing a little. “Must be more to you than it appears.” The krogan bent down to level an appraising stare straight into Martin’s face, one eye narrowing as he tilted his chin up. “What happened to your eyes?”

“Slavers cut them out,” Martin answered. He drew himself up to square off with Wrex, his gutsy attitude squashing the sick lurch of empathy that twisted in Garrus’s gut. The kid cocked his head and stuck out his jaw a bit. “They also took out part of my tongue. Would you like to get a close up of that, too? I can open wide, but I can’t say ah very well.”

Wrex stared at the kid for a second then laughed and clapped him on the back. “I knew you’d have some guts.” He nodded toward a wall of crates. “Let’s build you some place to sleep where Williams can’t stare at you. She likes scars.”

“I’ll be back in a few minutes,” Garrus said, backing away, but Martin was already asking Wrex about the massive scars across his face. He chuckled and turned back to the elevator.

You sure knew how to pick them, Kahri.

Two minutes later, Garrus stepped around the side of the elevator, then stumbled back, spinning a little as someone slammed into his left side, barreling straight through him.

“Stay out of my way,” Ashley said, her voice rolling through a low growl as she stumbled. She took a step sideways, something flashing across her expression that he couldn’t define, but he didn’t think it looked like hate. If he had to put a name to it, he would have called it regret.

Garrus reached out. “Ash, what’s happened since this morning?” She slapped his hand aside and kept going. When Garrus looked up, he saw Anderson standing in the door of the captain’s cabin. After looking back to watch Ash disappeared behind the elevator, he turned to face Anderson. “What was that?”

The captain just shrugged and turned back into his cabin. “All she’ll say to me about it is, ‘If you don’t like my attitude, reassign me.’”

“Actually, Captain,” Garrus called, hurrying after him, “I need to ask you about something.”

Anderson’s shoulders dropped, and he didn’t turn back. “Can it keep until tomorrow?”

Garrus almost let it go, but then who knew what would distract him from asking the next day and then the day after that. He cleared his throat, shrugging a little even though Anderson wasn’t looking at him. All he had left of his love was the promises he’d made. “I made her a promise, sir, and then I forgot about it.” He prayed his tone told the human everything he’d never be able to say.

Anderson’s shoulders sank lower for a second, but then he straightened and squared them, reaching up to close the collar on his uniform. “Come in, then.” The captain sat at the desk and didn’t invite Garrus to sit. “What did you promise her?” he asked, cutting straight to business.

Garrus stood at parade rest, feeling a profound relief at Anderson’s professionalism. “She asked me to make sure you never forget about her little sister, sir.”

Anderson let out a sharp, bitter laugh. “Forget?” He rubbed his fingers across his brow a couple of times. “Small chance of that.” He flipped a thumb toward the chairs at the table. “Pull up a chair.
Mass Effect - Future Complex Chapter Five

Chapter Summary

Where is Shepard's little sister? And what awaits them all on Omega?

4 days ASD

“Did Shepard ever tell you how I found her?” Anderson asked. He shifted in his chair, looking uncomfortable, as if he both needed to talk about it and worried that doing so broke some unspoken confidence.

Garrus lifted one of the chairs to within a couple of metres of the captain, turning it as he set it down. Stepping around it, he shook his head and then sat. “Not really. Hints here and there. She . . . we didn’t have a chance to get that far.” Trying to set Anderson at ease, he settled into the seat, taking the position they called the ‘relaxed inquisition’ back at C-Sec. Slightly slumped, hands on his thighs, the foot furthest from the door slid forward a bit to give the perp the illusion of a clear path to the door.

Anderson leaned with his elbow on the desk, his fingers braced against his temple. “Her family lived in a small agricultural community a couple of hours from the capital, so it took us almost twelve hours to make it out there once we landed. The slavers had been gone for about fourteen or fifteen hours by that point.” He scrubbed his fingertips across his brow. “In the middle of the cluster of houses, we found a bunch of empty cages, couple dozen corpses including a few batarians. The slavers had been clubbed to death. I found out later from Shepard that her father led a revolt. Brave, but doomed, and Jane paid for it in the end.” He shook himself as if trying to rid himself of a thick layer of muck.

Garrus nodded and shifted a little, opening his posture a little more. “She mentioned that they used her as a weapon against him.” His mind conjured that image, a shadow of the helpless rage, agony, and guilt Shepard’s father must have felt settling down in the chair with him. Being a father, trapped and caged, unable to give in because doing so meant damning everyone, but his resistance damning the person most precious to him . . . . Garrus doubted he possessed a sufficient level of selflessness to endure it. He would have broken.

“In the center of the space, we found a bloody body covered by a corpse that was missing most its head. There was so much blood on the ground that our medic barely slowed down. He checked for a pulse at her wrist. Her skin was ice-cold, so he moved on.” The captain looked up, not needing to say how badly Shepard had been injured, the grief and weariness in his eyes speaking volumes. “I’ve never seen anything like it and pray I never do again.” Strong fingers reached up to unsnap his collar, reefing it open as if the thing choked him.

Garrus fought off the urge to copy the other man, but it wasn’t his collar coiled and tightening around his neck like a garotte.

“God help me, sometimes I still wake up with that stink suffocating me.” A jagged oath accompanied pressing the heel of his hand to his brow. “Sorry.” Anderson drew in a deep breath, visibly composing himself. “Sorry.” His sadness and loss disappeared back behind that inscrutable stoicism once more.
Garrus just shook his head, dismissing it, knowing from experience the ghosts that had followed Anderson since that day. More than a few tracked him like a pack of varren. The galaxy progressed, politicians claimed their corners of that galaxy safer than ever before, but the cops . . . the cops knew how unsafe people truly were. They stood over the raped and murdered, looked into the tear-stained faces, and then tried to set it all aside to do their job. It never really worked, but the emotional distance helped. Anderson didn’t have that buffer.

The captain cleared his throat and shifted in the chair. “Something told me to stop and take a closer look, so I pulled the corpse off her. It was her father, although I didn’t know that at the time, of course. They let him loose then shot him in the head while he knelt over her, trying to comfort her.

“I thought I heard a sound from the corpse on the bottom and pulled off the hood. I undid the blindfold, and these big, beautiful, green eyes stared back at me, blinking in the light. For about a minute, she just stared, but then she let out this scream . . . .” His hand returned to his throat, rubbing at the two day growth of beard. “The pain and terror and heartbreak in that scream just about killed me, but underneath the rest, I felt a strength like I’ve never witnessed anywhere else. I knew then why she’d survived.” Anderson cleared his throat and let out a grumbling sigh as he pushed himself up in his chair, straightening.

Garrus closed his eyes for a second. He’d seen that strength for the first time on Therum.

“I couldn’t get her out of the shackles, so I dragged the stakes out of the ground and hammered on the chains until they broke. She spent months in the hospital recovering physically, then they shipped her off to a mental institution. I broke her out of that hellhole after three months.” He growled low in his throat and shook his head. “They locked her in the dark, telling her that there was nothing there that could hurt her. Morons.”

A deep, growling subvocal sharpened the edge of Garrus’s words as the protector Shepard railed against roared with rage. “They locked her in the dark?” For a moment, he lamented the lack of existing time-travel technology that thwarted his need to go back and kick the hospital staff in the ass. “They took a traumatized kid and locked her in the dark?”

Anderson let out a derisive cough. “Called it immersion therapy.”

Garrus’s foot twitched. “I’ll give them immersion therapy. They can walk around with my foot in their cloaca all day.” He forced himself to throw wet sand on the blaze. He was just using the anger to keep the harder crap at bay.

At least she had Anderson to pull her out of that place. Garrus felt a bond of affection form as he imagined the scene that must have ensued. If it hadn’t been for the man in front of him, his Kahri would have died a teenager, not even making it off Mindoir. Suddenly, he didn’t mind so much if Anderson called him son.

“It took weeks before she’d talk, months before she told me anything significant. When she did finally open up a little, Shepard told me that the last thing she remembered before her father’s death was her mother and sister being taken away by the slavers. For some reason, she believed that her mother had been killed.”

“Wait.” Garrus leaned forward, his heart jumping up into his throat. “Are you saying that her mother is alive?” The moment of hope and joy shattered as his memory shot a rocket straight through his gut. It didn’t matter. Yes, it mattered for the woman, and it made reuniting half of Shepard’s family possible, but Shepard . . . she’d never know.

“As far as I know.” Anderson leaned back and crossed his arms, that hard part of the tale complete.
“I searched for a couple of months before I found a slaver who’d transported the slaves from that part of the colony. They were all taken to Karshan, which complicated things. It’s easier to get access to slaves out in the colonies, but at least with slavery being legal in batarian space, they all keep excellent records.”

The captain activated his omnitool and opened a file. “Took me years to find out what breeding facility Shepard’s mother had been taken to, and I’m still trying to get someone in there to find out if Lucille Marie Shepard is still alive.” He sent the file to Garrus. “The bastard who purchased her, nearly ten years ago now, is a paranoid son of a bitch. Huge operation including weapon smuggling, eezo mining and smuggling, drugs, even breeding varren for pit fighting. The authorities, especially the Alliance is always trying to nail him to the wall, so I’ve found buying my way in impossible.”

“Did you ever tell Shepard about her mother?” Garrus asked, pretty sure of the answer even before he did. He opened the file and skimmed the information. Anderson had done a thorough search. Maybe some of his C-Sec contacts, especially the agents in the anti-trafficking squad, could give him a hand to get ins where Anderson hadn’t been able to.

“No.” Anderson stood and paced to the door as if the question surpassed the quota of emotional turmoil he could tolerate while sitting still. “I didn’t want to get her hopes up and then crush them again if I found out Lucy was dead. I always hoped I’d be able to sit her down some day soon and give her some unexpected good news.” Stopping next to Garrus, he hooked a thumb toward the file. “Anyway, that’s everything I found on both of them.”

Garrus’s stomach threatened, rolling like thunderheads building along the horizon as he formed the next question, but he forced himself to say it. The truth was the truth. “Says here that she’d be . . . fifty three now. If they’ve been using her as a breeder, she’s rapidly coming up on the end of her usefulness.”

Anderson returned to the door, the speed of his pacing becoming more and more rapid. “I know. We’re coming up on deadlines with both of them. I have an asari acquaintance who has been attending all the batarian slave auctions since Bunny hit puberty.” He returned and perched on the edge of his chair. “She was sold to a very wealthy batarian family on Karshan. I have never been able to find out who they are, just that she was sold privately as a house slave.”

Garrus nodded, understanding. “Yeah, batarian mistresses don’t usually keep female household slaves past puberty.” He scrolled to Shepard’s sister’s information. “She’s nineteen this year. The mistress will be moving her along if she hasn’t already.” He growled through his subvocals as he cursed. “If she looks like Shepard . . . Damn it.”

Anderson nodded, looking like he wanted to vomit. “I had the Alliance do an age projection holo and sent it out with my contacts, but they haven’t seen her. I can’t let her end up in some carnal hole somewhere. I made a promise.” He rubbed his throat again.

Garrus closed the file. “Well, there are two of us looking now. We’ll find them.” He stood, sensing Anderson had reached his limit. He chuffed. Hell, he’d reached his limit. Time to disappear into the shuttle and look through the file, send out feelers on the way to Omega. He offered his hand. “Thank you for going through all of this with me.”

Anderson just gave one, firm nod and shook Garrus’s hand. “You promised her, just like I did.” The captain let out a long, heavy breath. “Goodnight, son.”

“Goodnight, sir.” Pivoting on his talons, Garrus strode to the door and out. As soon as he cleared the door, he saw Martin and Wrex in the galley, throwing together something that Garrus was pretty sure had started on fire.

“What are you two doing?” he called, afraid to get too close.

“Thresher maw pancakes,” Wrex bellowed back. “With grape jelly acid.”

The two idiots and their burning thresher maw pancakes seared away some of the dank fungus-like chill that dealing with Mindoir and its aftermath had planted in his gut. “You okay if I hit the rack, kid?” he asked.

Martin looked up for half a second, then turned back to working two spatulas under his pancake. “Yeah, Wrex got me all set up and showed me around. Thanks.”

Garrus watched them for another moment, amazed and gratified that Martin had just jumped right in. “You know where to find me if you need anything,” he called, turning toward the elevator.

“Yeah,” Martin replied, “but by your own admission, you bite.”

6 Days ASD

Garrus stepped out onto the docks and looked around: Omega. Nothing had changed in the weeks since he’d last been there. The station still looked disgusting: filthy, poor, and miserable. The noise level still felt like an industrial mining laser drilling into his brain. The stench of feces, vomit, urine, and a thousand other sorts of rot and waste kept sucker punching his gag reflex. Still, something had changed. Through all the grime and stink, he saw something he hadn’t before. It blew through the station like a wind off the ocean, and all he could think to call it was freedom.

Certainly, he didn’t see it in the eyes of the station denizens around him. They lived under the heel of the gangs and Aria. He housed the change within him, projecting it everywhere he looked. He smiled. Given a few months, the rest of the station would start to see it too. Their tiny army wouldn’t just make Omega their home, they’d clean it up, make at least parts of it home for those who wanted it.

We’re here, Kahri. We made it. Your grand plan, your dream for us and the war effort, starts today.

He nodded. While they built their resistance to face the Reapers, they’d leave Aria alone—he harboured absolutely no desire to run the station—but the gangs, the gangs he didn’t mind wiping out. It would be good practice for their recruits.

“What are you grinning about?” Nihlus grumbled, striking out for the cab stand.

Garrus shrugged. “Just envisioning this place the way it’ll look this time next cycle.” He followed the Spectre and Martin, but then stopped and stared at the cab. They couldn’t rely on station transportation. Too easy for someone to slip a bomb into a cab. “Tomorrow, you two need to find someone who can build us some custom vehicles. We need high performance, shields, concealed weapons. They also need to be completely nondescript. I don’t want to attract too much attention.”

“Because the army and the flotilla of ships we’re building will be completely low key,” Martin said, his tone desert parched.
Garrus clipped him in the back of the head. “They will be able to defend themselves. A couple of people running down to the bar for a drink don’t need to be asking to get blown out of the air because the mercs recognize our vehicles. They also don’t need to get carjacked because they’re driving the best looking ride on the station.”

He turned to the rest of his team members. Only one team could use the shuttle, the rest had to rely on public transport. “Stay together, don’t go into merc territory. If you can’t find enough supplies for everyone, we’ll double up or borrow from the ship.” He cut a grin across at Anderson but then levelled a very serious scowl at Dr. Chakwas. “Dr. Solus is meeting you here?” When she nodded, he mirrored it. “Be careful. Go nowhere without Kaidan.”

Kaidan winked at the doctor before turning to Garrus. “Don’t worry, General. I’ve got her back.”

“So do we.”

Garrus spun toward the gruff, accented voice and came face to face with a tall, lanky human. The man grinned at him, displaying some magnificently smashed teeth beneath an equally impressive bent and broken nose. In fact, the man’s whole face looked as though it had seen the losing side of a great many fights, some of them recent.

“And who is we?” Garrus asked, his eyes moving to an extremely tall, broad-shouldered turian who stepped up to cover the human’s flank.

“They’re with me,” Mordin Solus said, stepping into view around the other two. The salarian pointed to the turian and then the human. “Lantar Sidonis. Gabriel Butler.”

“Gabe,” the human corrected. “My wife works with the doc. I help with security when he needs me.” He narrowed his eyes and pushed in on Garrus, bristling a little. “Who are you?”

“Garrus Vakarian.” He turned away, refocusing his attention on Mordin. “You’ll be coming every day rather than staying?”

“Patients need me, but will be there,” the salarian replied, nodding twice in rapid succession. “Challenge to unravel Reaper technology very exciting. Unlimited possibilities for discovery.” He turned to Dr. Chakwas. “Ready?”

She nodded but then met Garrus’s eyes. “Don’t worry, General. We’ll be fine.” Her calm assurance did more to settle Garrus’s concerns about her safety than the presence of Mordin’s little brute squad, neither of whom looked particularly solid or trustworthy. “Kaidan and I will pick up Joker on our way over once you give the all clear.”

Kaidan chuckled, but it sounded forced. Garrus made a mental note to check in with the lieutenant, make sure he was okay. Kaidan did his best to keep everyone else’s spirits up, but he spent most of the time looking lost. “We’ll drag him over there even he kicks and screams the whole way.”

Mordin nodded to Garrus, then ushered Dr. Chakwas down the docks, quickly disappearing into the crowd.

Garrus waited until the other teams caught cabs and headed off to the markets before he called one for Nihlus, Martin, and himself. They were headed over to scout the first building, sweep through, and deal with any complications. Garrus didn’t expect anything more dangerous than outcast vorcha and a few homeless people, but one never knew. The last week had given him a new appreciation and dread of the unexpected.

After entering the building location, Garrus let the cab do the driving while he closed his eyes and leaned back in the seat. The few hours he managed to fall asleep he spent chasing nightmares around in an endless loop. He’d watched Shep­ard die so many times over the past two days that he felt worn paper thin. Somehow he needed to set aside the guilt, the persistent voice in his head that screamed at him to do something to save her, even though that moment had long since past. He hoped that being on Omega, working toward her goals would let him get some sleep.

After the cab landed, Garrus stared up at the building without moving. The last time he’d approached it, Nihlus was down, Ashley wounded, and Shepard charged in like a praela, all fire and wrath, determined to make sure she didn’t lose any of her people. Garrus sighed and opened the top.

“Holy crap,” Martin squealed the second he climbed out of the cab. He wretched and slapped his hand over his nose and mouth. “What is that smell?”

“Dead krogan,” Nihlus answered, walking past. Garrus watched him for any sign of drunkenness, but he seemed steady enough. If he was drunk, he was holding it well, at least. Nihlus grumbled and looked over the edge of the bridge. “You never quite get used to it, but you do stop needing to throw up.” He stopped at the center of the bridge that spanned the void between the entrance to the district and the block of buildings. Looking up, he asked, “Aria gave this place to Shepard?”

Garrus nodded, his eyes travelling up the face of the abandoned building. “The whole block.” He swallowed hard against the lump in his throat that formed in response to the picture that appeared, unbidden, in his mind, and the sensation of Shepard clung­ling to his arm. “After Shepard rescued Liselle.” He palmed the door control, but it flashed red. He opened his omnitool and went into the file containing the deeds and other documentation for the buildings.

“Mmm,” Nihlus hummed noncommittally. “Aria doesn’t care for being in anyone’s debt.” The Spectre backed up a few steps, leaning back. “But a whole block . . . on Omega? Why would she just give Shepard a block of abandoned buildings?”

“Who’s Aria?” Martin asked. He put his helmet on, let out a sigh of relief that made Garrus grin, and then followed Nihlus toward the doors.

“Someone you want to steer clear of, kid,” Nihlus replied. He slid his hand over a pouch on his armour as if checking to ensure something remained within. “She’s thirty times your age and as likely to use her biotics to snap you in half as look at you.”

“She’s asari?”

Garrus didn’t like the starry-eyed quality to Martin’s voice and turned to glare at him. “Listen to Nihlus. Aria runs Omega as the largest criminal outpost in the galaxy. Stay away from Afterlife unless you’re with Nihlus or me.”

“Fine.” Martin sulked over to the low wall along the side of the bridge and leaned over to look down the hundreds of floors worth of empty space. “But, I’m not a kid.”

“Yeah, you are, but that’s not a bad thing,” Nihlus retorted. “I wish I could get those cycles back. Don’t be too eager to throw them away.” He scraped the caked filth from one of the large front windows. “I think I can see what we’re smelling.”

Garrus found the entry code and unlocked the door, only half-listening to Nihlus. His concentration focused on keeping a lock on the memories of the night he and Shepard had run around Omega first trying to catch up with the team, then to find Mordin Solus. Shepard clung to his arm so tight in those ridiculous shoes. They were completely insane, but he couldn’t stop staring at her legs when she wore them. He shook his head, a sharp glance tossed back over his shoulder at Nihlus when he registered that the Spectre had been talking to him. “What was that?”

“Looks like we’ll be turning the local body dump into our headquarters.” The Spectre walked up, following Garrus in the door. “Why would Aria just give Shepard a block of abandoned buildings?”

Garrus shrugged, just a faint twitch of his head. “The night we chased Tali and those krogan across Omega, Shepard remarked on how we could turn Omega into a base for the war effort. Turn these buildings into barracks for soldiers being trained, a place to plan and organize where the Council had no influence.” He stopped, the smell of decay, mold and dust blasting straight into his face.

“Spirits.” Nihlus walked past, making it halfway to the stairs before he stopped. “I was almost joking about the body dump.”

Garrus chuckled, a bitter rattle of sound. “Why wouldn’t Aria dump all her bodies here? Give Shepard a gift that comes complete with a nightmare.”

“A fuck you very much?” Martin asked, his expression gloating a little behind his face shield.

Garrus shot him a quick grin then choked down his gag reflex and walked into the lobby. A mostly decayed body lie mouldering at the base of the stairs. Shepard had killed that one on her way in. He opened his omnitool again, calling up a business directory.

“The others are going to be here in a couple of hours. What the hell are we going to do?” Nihlus edged around another body and walked through to the kitchen area. Out of the corner of his eye, Garrus saw the Spectre pull a flask from his armour and take a long belt of whatever was inside.

“Since they’ll all be here by supper time, I guess we need to get this place habitable by then.” Garrus sent messages to several specialized cleaning services. He probably shouldn’t have been surprised by the sheer number of businesses offering services aimed toward cleaning up after dead bodies and other bloody disasters, but he was. “Can you see to getting the utilities all turned on? Martin, head up to the first floor and make sure there isn’t anything alive. I’ll join you as soon as the cleaners are on the way.” He turned away, then glanced back and yelled, “If there is anything alive, run and scream for help. That’s brand new armour, don’t get it covered in pyjak scratches.”

Within fifteen minutes, he’d hired five different contractors, all of whom dispatched multiple teams. As much as they needed the first few floors for the council, the entire building necessitated a purge. Might as well get it done.

Twenty-five minutes after Garrus spoke to the companies, eighteen teams of people in hazmat suits had set up fans, wired up three incinerators, and started shovelling decaying krogan remains into wheelbarrows with proficient good humour and camaraderie.

“I find their efficiency oddly disturbing,” Nihlus muttered, walking past. Sure enough, his breath smelled of alcohol. “And this is where she wants us to set up the war effort?”

“It is.” Garrus looked down as a ping from his omnitool alerted him to an incoming message. Barla Von, announcing his arrival along with ten scows of salvage from Sovereign. Garrus hadn’t expected the little volus to leave his web for the danger and uncertainty of Omega, but Von didn’t even hesitate. Instead, he volunteered to escort the first of the salvage convoys. The fact that the Alliance sent five frigates along to protect the convoy didn’t diminish the ardent nature of Von’s gesture. Rather it spoke volumes about the banker’s eager dedication and commitment to Shepard and the cause.
Garrus closed the message and shook his head. They’d all known her such a short time, and she presented herself as such an aggressive, prickly creature, all barbs and quills. Why then did they all love and honour her so completely? He blinked rapidly, easing the burning in his eyes, knowing the answer. Despite her best efforts, her sweet vulnerability and the huge heart underneath the spines, showed through clear as Trebia in Palaven’s sky.

He swiped at his eyes. “Damn cleaning solution,” he grumbled and strode up the stairs to help Martin check for squatters of any and all varieties.

They found a couple of varren in one of the apartments, a few pyjaks here and there, but nothing that gave them any trouble. As they swept through, he mentally assigned quarters. Liara and Shiala, Tali and Ashley, Nihlus and Martin in the two bedroom units on the first floor, he, Anderson, and Hackett in the singles. His father could stay with him. The apartment he chose for himself was roomy. A bank of windows along one side opened to look over the lobby, allowing him to keep an eye on things. It also had the most massive bed he’d ever seen.

They moved on to the second floor. He rattled off instructions to Martin, putting the young man in charge of getting everyone situated when they arrived. Providing their rooms had been cleaned, of course. The more they delved into the building, the more perfect it suited their purposes. Near as he could guess, it must have been a research facility at one time. Floors of apartments gave way to floors of labs and lecture spaces, even a couple of gyms and a large infirmary.

The further they explored, the more Garrus found himself excited to get things going, to see the space filled with life and bustle, all focused on one goal: defeating the Reapers.

The first of the team was walking into the lobby by the time he and Martin finished exploring. Garrus stopped dead as he disembarked the elevator on the first floor. In the time they’d been gone, the cleaners had worked their way to the second floor, leaving the lobby and first floor spotless and smelling of overpowering citrus and chemicals rather than rotting bodies.

“Wow,” Liara said, walking in the front door, her arms filled with bags. “I thought we’d be beating off rats to get any sleep.” She stopped and turned a circle. “This place looks great.” She waved a delicate hand in front of her face. “Could use some airing out though.”

“You think it’s bad now,” Martin said, popping the seal on his helmet and removing it, “you should have smelled the place a few hours ago.”

Nihlus trotted past Garrus, heading down the stairs. “It’s amazing what every cleaner on the rock can do armed with industrial solvent and incinerators.”

“I’m certainly not going to complain,” the asari said, laying down her burden. “We purchased pretty much every sheet, blanket, and towel on Omega. Any volunteers to help bring it all in?” She walked to the door, doing a graceful long, beckoning glance over her shoulder.

Nihlus and Martin set out after her, but she stopped just inside the door and turned back. “Oh, Garrus, I found something that belongs to you.” Her lips curved into a sly, teasing smile, and then she turned, stepping outside.

She’d found something that belonged to him? Confused, he did a quick mental inventory. Scowling to himself, he tried to figure out what he’d dropped as he followed her out onto the bridge. His talons caught on the flat cement, and he lurched to a stop as a face so very like his own appeared above a moving pile of bags.

When the other turian spotted Garrus, he stopped, stared for a moment then bobbed his head to indicate his burden. “Give an old torin a hand?” his father asked.

Ashley elbowed Garrus on the way past. “Yeah, Garrus, what sort of son are you anyway?” She chuckled, then cursed as a package fell out of her arms.

“Serves you right,” Garrus replied, but then waved her off when she tried to retrieve it. “I’ll get it.” He picked up her dropped package, watching her for a moment as he tried to catch up with her mood swings. When she walked in the door, he hurried to his father’s side, lifting off more than half the load.

“Thank you, that’s much better,” his father said.

Unsure what to say, suddenly nervous faced with Herros Vakarian in the flesh, Garrus nodded, just managing to grunt, “You’re welcome.” Nodding his head toward the door, he cleared his throat, trying to work the tremor out of his second larynx. “In here.” He led the way back into the base, feeling as though his father’s stare heated the plates on his back. Fleeing from it, he ran up the stairs, taking the pile of packages right up to the first floor.

He walked into the large room that made up his apartment, stopping just inside the door. It looked better clean. Much better. In fact, being a torin of simple needs, the bed, couches and small kitchen area looked absolutely perfect. A few personal touches and he’d be able to call it home. He smiled and nodded once, a decisive gesture of approval.

He felt his father’s energy enter the space, the torin’s well known tread on the tile, his scent—strong, masculine, and comforting—just registering over the cleaner.

“Where should I put these down?” Herros asked, following him inside.

“On the couches or bed is fine. I’m sure the sorting crew will be swooping down to get everything organized in a few minutes.” He placed his burdens on the coffee table, then helped his father unload.

Herros stretched his shoulders until they cracked, then turned to face Garrus. After a moment of silence, he reached out and grasped Garrus by the shoulders. “You look good. How are you?”

Garrus grasped his father’s shoulders, the embrace as intimate as turians got outside of pair bonding. He leaned in to touch his brow to Herros’s, all the tension and awkwardness draining from him as his father returned the gesture. “I’m well.” He straightened. “How are mother and Solana?”

Herros chuckled. “When I spoke to your mother last night she instructed me to answer that question with, ‘If you called home more, you would know’.” He released Garrus’s arms, but didn’t step back.

“Yeah, I have that coming,” Garrus admitted, regret whispering softly. He and Shepard should be on Palaven now. He was supposed to be introducing his girlfriend to his family.

Herros sighed and reached up to grip Garrus’s upper arm. “Both she and Sol also told me to tell you how sorry they are they didn’t get a chance to know her. They were looking forward to your visit.”

Garrus looked down, unsure what to do with his hands . . . or the rest of his body. In the end, he stepped back a pace, flipping a hand toward the apartment, deciding to change the subject to ease the awkwardness. “I’ve laid claim to this space. If you wish, you’re welcome to share it while you’re here.”
Herros smiled, his mandibles flicking hard, and cleared his throat. “I’d like that.” He strode to the open windows and looked out at the growing pile of merchandise and the accompanying growing crowd of people. “This is quite the . . .” He shrugged and let out a dry, rumbling laugh. “What do you even call it? An organization? An operation?”

Garrus stepped up beside his father. After looking out for a moment, he closed his eyes and took long, slow breaths, immersing himself in his father’s unique energy. His throat tightened and his hand lifted of its own accord to rest on the smaller torin’s shoulder. He’d missed it. As much as he’d rebelled against the bulwark solidity of Herros Vakarian, without it . . . a . . . safety vanished from his life, an anchor that kept him moored even when he insisted on flying into the storm.

At one time, he lived for the days his father came home. He ran to the door, racing out to greet the skycar, insisting on carrying Herros’s bags even though they dragged along the ground. During the infuriating minutes his parents spent greeting one another, sharing disgustingly soppy words and embraces, he ran to the caman to ensure he’d reached the correct solution to the mystery his father had left him the previous week. Every week the same, his father carried Solana into the caman and took his seat, a tumbler of ice-cold puala juice on the table in front of him. After an impossibly long silence, Herros always turned to Garrus’s little sister and asked, “Well, did your big brother solve his case this week?”

A strong arm slipped around him. “It’s an army,” Herros said, as if finally deciding on the word. “When Shepard showed me that datapad . . .” Garrus felt him shake his head. “Half of me wanted to throw it back at her and kick her out of my office. Denial was better than accepting the enormity of what we’re facing. How could one woman—regardless of her brilliance or that of the team behind her—hope to prepare against an enemy like the Reapers, especially fighting the council the entire way?” A chuff followed that Garrus decided was self-deprecation, something he didn’t even know his father could feel.

Garrus shrugged, but awe and respect flowed under the movement. “Shepard didn’t know how to quit. She might complain the whole time she did it, but she just kept moving.” He opened his eyes as he heard laughter from below, but looked over at his father. “And smart. Damn that woman was so sharp and so creative. Mind always working, planning.” He stepped forward and looked down on the team as they trickled in, carrying packages and crates. “Kahri held her cards so close to the vest behind that crazy act that everyone underestimated her . . .” Mandibles dropped, he flicked them once in a sad sort of half-smile. “. . . even me.”

The team who’d been buying food fought to carry in their burdens while fending off curious hands trying to get into the packages. Anderson elbowed Martin out of the way as the young man ransacked his way through a crate. Garrus chuckled, his hand lifting toward the people below. “She brought together some remarkable people. We’ll get it done, Pari. The other option is unacceptable.”

Garrus grinned as Joker and Dr. Chakwas entered, the former covering his ears and humming tunelessly but at an ear-shattering volume while the latter tried to talk to him. The Normandy’s pilot had refused to leave his ship even for a couple of days, but Garrus insisted, wanting them all under one roof. Unexpected and brilliant things could come of discussion between people who didn’t usually spend much time talking, and they needed all the unexpected brilliance they could get.

After a moment of comfortable silence, his father spoke softly, “Your Kahri was remarkable, Garrus. Almost got me sent to IA on sexual harassment charges . . . but remarkable.” Herros reached up and stroked a hand down the back of Garrus’s neck then pulled away. “Come, let’s go down and help get this place sorted. We have a few long days ahead of us, and she’s expecting us to work miracles.”
Chapter Summary

Things are starting to come together, even if no one is quite ready to call it moving on.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Preteril -- A small, spiny, ground burrowing marsupial analogue found in high meadow and forest lands of Palaven.

Aligarim Dau -- Giant, four-winged bird from ancient turian mythology. It was said to have stolen the seed of life from the Creator of All Things. Upon the seed of life was inscribed The Fate of All Things, the story of the universe from birth to death, inlaid in magnificent stones, gems, and metals. The Aligarim Dau coveted the seed for its beauty and hid it away where the Creator would not find it. One day while the giant bird was polishing and caring for its treasure, the seed cracked open and life spilled out. The Aligarim Dau jumped back in dismay, flapping its four giant wings, the wind scattering life throughout the cosmos.

Maraquil -- Sea bird analogues. Large white and blue-green raptors that nest in seaside cliffs on Palaven.

Tussat Flower -- A large, blue-green flower that forms on a cactus type plant with long, oval pads. When the flower goes to seed, the petals are replaced by a very tough but delicate silk fibre used in weaving. Tussat silk is extremely soft but hardy, making it the favourite material for clothing, linens, and upholstery.

Seat - Refers to both the building that houses the turian hierarchy and the chambers where they meet.

6 Days ASD

“Water’s on!” Nihlus called, the echo of his words preceding him into the lobby. “You’ll want to run the taps for a while before using the water, though.” Striding around the stairs, he stopped, green raptor’s eyes searching the room.

Garrus stopped halfway down the stairs, meeting the Spectre’s gaze once it found him.

“The power systems are fine,” Nihlus continued, “but heat’s going to be a day. Something about shorts in the master circuits. They’re down there scratching their heads over it now.” He shrugged and headed over to look in the grocery parcels. As if his talons were thirsty, his hand drifted up to pat the pouch at his waist.

“Wait,” Tali called, looking up from rooting through a bag. “You have amateurs looking at the power systems?” She shoved aside the package to grab Legion and Kal. “Come on, lets go make sure they don’t blow the place up or burn it down or something.”
The quarian Marine dragged behind a little. “What am I supposed to do, ma’am?” Kal asked, following her nonetheless. “Stare at the problem until it fixes itself?”

Ignoring Kal’s protest, Tali stopped halfway across the lobby, turning back to glare at Nihlus. “Well?” Balling one hand into a fist, she pressed her knuckles into her hip, the image of impatient expectation.

Garrus suspected Tali’s mother had taught her that pose. His mari could have been galactic champion if they held competitions.

The Spectre choked, caught in the middle of drinking from his flask. “Well, what?” He wiped his chin on his arm and closed the flask, shoving it back into it’s pouch.

“I don’t have the building blueprints inside my head. You’ll have to show us where to go.” She held out an arm, her head tilting as she waited.

A wry grin spread across Garrus’s face as he watched the exchange. Poor Nihlus. The Spectre didn’t stand a chance; already beaten, just oblivious to it. The team really had learned far too well from Shepard’s example.

Nihlus bristled. “Do I look like the Omega travel bureau?” Setting his shoulders, he turned back to the pile of groceries on the table, casting quick, covert glances her way. Tali just stared at him.

Garrus did his best to hide his amusement at the stand-off and headed over to the pile, picking up as much as he could carry, moving it to the kitchen. He peered inside the cupboards and refrigerators, hoping the cleaners thought to do the interior as well as the exterior. They had. As he unpacked the parcels, he kept an eye on Nihlus, waiting to see how long it took the Spectre to cave in to the pressure. He’d moved on to his second armload before Nihlus let out a thin hiss.

“Fine.” Nihlus grumbled and pulled his sidearm. “You’ll get eaten by vorcha or feral varren if you go down there alone, anyway.” He stalked past them, heading toward a door in the back wall, under the stairs.

Kal’Reegar perked up at the mention of vorcha and feral varren, no doubt glad to see a point to tagging along with the engineering geniuses. Without waiting for Tali, the Marine strode to the door.

“I’ll cook for the levos,” Anderson shouted over the overlapping conversations. “I don’t trust the rest of you to know your stewing beef from your canned tuna.” He picked up a load of bags and carried them into the kitchen.

“I’ll help you,” Martin volunteered, pulling off his gauntlets. “I’m starving.” He followed Anderson into the kitchen. “What are we making?”

“Well, come on in here and let’s see what we can find.” Anderson dove into the pile of supplies, pulling a brown jar out of a crate a few seconds later. He held it up. “Really? Please tell me you didn’t spend the two thousand credits it must have cost to buy Nutella on Omega.”

“It was more than that,” Ashley said, walking in with another load of bags. She set them down and threw up her hands to cut off any questions. “No, you don’t want to know exactly how much, but it was the only way to get that . . .” She pointed at Joker. “. . . turd off the ship without breaking every bone in his body.” She waved to Liara as she bent to pick up a crate. “Grab the other end of this, Doc, and we’ll head up, start putting rooms together.”

“There’s a pile of sheets and towels and things in my room on the left at the top of the stairs, as Garrus called, then turned back to unpacking.

Joker limped into the kitchen and settled himself in one of the kitchen chairs, as belligerent as Garrus had ever seen him. “You made me leave my ship for three days, General. Three days!” He grumbled and crossed his arms, a marked pout on his face. “Is there a vid screen here at least? I can catch up on my stories.”

Garrus laughed along with the rest despite the twinge of sadness that slid beneath, riding the memory of his night with Shepard before Virmire. Would there ever be anything that didn’t remind him of her? As soon as the question appeared in his mind, he shook his head. No, he’d rather feel the sadness than lose her like that.

“We picked up a couple large vidscreens and a half dozen computers,” Anderson replied as he stirred some amazing smelling ground meat in a frying pan. Garrus’s stomach growled. Turning to rifle through bags, pulling out packages of seasoning, Anderson said, “Maybe when Tali and Legion get back, they can see about getting them up and running.” He set his finds on the counter, then crossed the kitchen to set a plank of wood, a knife, and a bag of carrots in front of the pilot. “For now, chop these. They probably cost more than your chocolate crap.”

“They didn’t,” Ashley said, arriving at the bottom of the stairs. She started gathering up bags. “There’s a group of humans down in the bowels of this place that make money selling the veggies they grow in their hydroponic garden.” She shrugged, then stopped and looked Garrus in the eye. “Might be worth looking into. Maybe with some help, they could grow enough to keep this place set up.”

“Good idea. We could offer them security and keep them out from under the thumb of the gangs.” Garrus added it to the mental list, along with sitting Ashley down for a good, long chat about her apparent and ongoing mental breakdown.

“Okay,” Herros said as he stepped up beside Garrus, “how about you and I take care of cooking for the dextro contingent?” He looked over the pile of merchandise. “Anyone see a sterilizer in that pile?”

The meal preparation turned into a communal affair, half the team helping cook while the other half set up the bedrooms and lavatories. Soon, savoury smells overpowered the scent of cleanser, and the place started to look like people lived there.

Garrus stopped chopping tubers into strips and looked up, allowing himself a moment to feel good about the fact they had taken the first steps down the long road. But, as he looked around at the team, his face plates slowly migrated into a scowl. He was forgetting something. Running through the list of people who should be there, he checked off Mordin. The scientist had sent Dr. Chakwas ahead with the promise that he’d be along as soon as he saw to his patients. Barla Von was still securing the scows filled with Sovereign’s bits and pieces, and the STG wasn’t arriving until the morning. Who was he forgetting?

Mordin and his two bodyguards walked in. “General,” Mordin called by way of greeting. “Has the rachni queen arrived?”

Garrus cursed to himself, but smiled at the salarian. “Not yet, we’ll be sending a shuttle for her immediately.”

“Excellent, am fascinated to meet her. Rachni are a most impressive species.” Mordin hurried over to where Dr. Chakwas sat, working on her omnitool. His flared to life a moment later and the two hunched over what looked like scans, talking quietly, but with apparent excitement.
“I need to take the shuttle to pick to the female shaman,” Wrex called. “I don’t want the vultures on this rock to know she’s here.” He strode over to face Garrus. “I’ll pick up Shiala and the bug on the way back.”

Garrus nodded. “Thanks, Wrex.” Shame heated the underside of his plates as he admitted, “They got lost in the shuffle.”

The krogan grunted, his eyes looking past Garrus to find Martin. “You coming with me, pyjak?”

Martin ran up beside Garrus, practically bouncing with an enviable eagerness. “Garrus?”

Chuckling, wondering why he hadn’t realized he was adopting a mostly-grown son when he promised Shepard he’d look after Martin, he nodded toward Anderson. “It’s up to the captain. You volunteered to help him.”

Anderson looked up and shook his head. “You’re abandoning me?” He let out a long-suffering sigh, and grumbled, the corner of his mouth quirking into a half-smile. “Fine. Go ahead, but be careful. Omega isn’t a place to take lightly.”

“Thanks, Anderson.” Martin snatched up his gauntlets and bolted after the krogan. “Wrex, wait up.”

“He was important to Shepard?” Herros asked, appearing next to Garrus’s arm to relieve him of his chopped tubers.

Garrus nodded. “She met him on Elysium before the Blitz. He ran errands and messages for her during the attack. He tried to help some people and the slavers grabbed him.” He turned his attention back to chopping. “He and a group of other kids all had their eyes, ears, and tongue taken to punish Shepard for leading the resistance.” He smiled. “She made sure they got the best doctors, coerced the Alliance into paying for whatever reconstruction and implants they needed, and donated almost her entire wage over the last six cycles to a rehabilitation center so they could recover in peace.”

“Everything I heard about her before I met her worried me,” Herros said, a subvocal of confession and regret laced through the words. “Brash, abrasive, abusive of authority figures, loathed and mistrusted by many of her superiors, known for massive victories but at the expense of insane risks.” He elbowed Garrus a little. “I wasn’t sure I was okay with my son being involved in suicide missions led by a lunatic.” He walked over to the stove, dumping the starchy roots in with sizzling chunks of drellak meat and fragrutis cactus leaves.

