Link reaches out to him. She signs into his palms an affirmative. Sidon flashes her a grin so bright that she has to squint against the light reflected from his shark's teeth despite the torrential downpour of rain above obscuring the moon. Or the sun. She can no longer tell day from night. Instead she offers Sidon her right hand, which he folds in his left and gently squeezes. Link helps him remove the leather from his back. Wiping the rain from her eyes with the back of her right hand, she glances up the trail that they will follow: a mountain of glittery black rock that looks carved from the night sky, flecks of silver and gold hidden within that twinkle as do the uncountable stars, or like a drizzle of honey sauce over a hearty meal of fish.

Link drools.

Sidon ushers her up the rocky path. A few lizalfos slumber curled up upon tall rocks, their bodies darkened to match the hue of the stone. At this distance, they could pass for cute beasties that Link might have petted or fed flops of fish if not for their having wreaked havoc and chaos over the land once known as Hyrule, if not for their having taken the lives of so many. If she leaves them alive, they could go on to invade Ruto or attack travellers. And yet she could not clamber up the cliffs in the rain if she wanted to.

She tries anyway.

Her efforts leave her plopped in the mud. Link dusts her off—muds herself off—and tries again. Sidon inquires what she is doing. She jumps back up onto the slippery stone. Link climbs up a few handholds before she senses the rain under her slick palms sliding her downwards. With a grunt, she leaps up with fingers poised like a bird of prey. Rather than talons around a mouse, her fingers clutch at the cliffside that betrays her and sends her careening downwards to splat the mud below.

"Link, are you feeling well!? The lynel is this way!" Sidon calls after her, his chin tilted up to the rock. Link reaches up from her sitting position to prod him in the knee. "Ah, there you are! I hope you have been enjoying the most pleasant mud! Come now! I believe in you and your ability to recover the topaz arrows from the lynel! Do be careful, Link!" Sidon puts his hand on her hand, ruffling her hair in the process, and then feels for one shoulder, then the other, to pluck her up from the mud. "I was too young to know you then, before the Calamity, but I'd like to get to know you now!" He grins widely as he folds her into an embrace that leaves her face planted squarely on his lower abdomen. The hug sways her from side to side. "I am most overjoyed to have had a chance to meet you! So take care of yourself out there, Link! I have nothing but faith in you! I'll meet you after you finish, arms full of topaz arrows and face full of smiles, as expected of our Champion of Hylia! Perhaps, when you return, we may speak yet of the past and people we share!"

Link nods into his stomach. At least he cannot see how badly his scales have scratched her face, nor can he feel her bloodied cheeks for the rain that wets everything regardless.

She glances in the direction where Sidon points.

"Simply walk between those rocks up the mountain! Upon your emergence into a clearing near the summit, you'll surely be at the lynel! You'll know when you find the topaz arrows scattered around! I'll be waiting for you here!" Sidon squeezes her into another hug, this time picking her off of the ground to twirl her around until her head spins and the grey clouds above whirl into a single funnel of darkness.

When Sidon sets her down again upon the ground, Link wobbles around. Her vision doubles Sidon into a pair of zora boys flashing her a pair of thumbs up. She nods at him—though he cannot see her—and starts to tumble her nauseated self down the path. It takes her a moment and Sidon's shout to recognise that she has gone off in the exact wrong direction.

She checks that she still has her paraglider and her slate, her telescope and her cooking pot, her spear and her sword, and then she begins the trek towards the lynel waiting atop the mountain.

Link creeps between the rocks. A few yellow chuchu bother her, but she pierces them and harvests their jelly. If all goes south—or if all goes north, as her Parapan friends would say—she can lob electrified jelly at the lynel while she makes her escape.

Or loose an arrow into the lynel's face.

As the path up the mountain widens, she notes a column of smoke extending into the sky and—more importantly—smells the scent of grilling mushrooms. She sniffs: zapshrooms, chillshrooms, and silent shrooms. A dizzying combination. Link can nearly taste the heady mixture of cooling and tingling, numbed to a pleasant tickle on her tongue.

A single topaz arrow lies in the path. The arrowhead does not consist merely of bone or wood with a shard of topaz within; rather, it has a dual-pronged structure entirely made of cracked topaz, with a metal band riveting it to the shaft. She touches her forefinger to one of the prongs. The sharpness pricks her enough to draw blood. Sucking on her finger, Link notes how the impact of the sharp prongs in flesh would cause the metal band to compress down upon the topaz and unleash the electricity all at once.

The girl with the golden hair would have loved to see this.

So would Romani, in case the Them ever return.

Link slots the arrow into her quiver.

She comes upon the clearing that Sidon mentioned, in a grove of sparse trees and rock. Link notes a small garden of various herbs running along the perimeter. Far on the other end, she observes the summit that rises into a sharp peak that drops off into the impossibly infinites below. Shatterback Point.
And rice.

In a low groove at the slope of the mountain, she spots the tell-tale signs of a small flooded rice-field. Just large enough to feed one or two or four. Running her tongue over her lips, Link wipes her mouth with the back of her hand.

Spent topaz arrows embed in the trees and rocks. Whole ones litter the ground. Link sneaks forward to pluck arrows from the ground.

She counts arrows in bundle of ten as she moves through the garden of herbs, cautious not to step on the plants if she can avoid it. Link crouches behind a rock. From here the scent of roasted mushrooms comes even more strongly. She peeks out from behind the edge of the stone. Her ponytail bobs from the dripping of rain.

In the centre of the clearing rests a person beside a horse. Under a lizalfos-skin tarp. With a horned helmet of some sort upon their head. A water barrel of fresh fish sits next to them. Link studies a fish flap from the barrel only for the person to lightning-quick snatch the escaping fish and chuck it back into the barrel. They kneel or they crouch—Link cannot tell in the cover of rain—over a cooking pot where she watches them chop up zapshrooms without protective equipment, touching the fungi with their bare hands. Zapshrooms, and some sort of strange white mushroom that she has never seen before. A truffle, maybe. She watches the chef fwip a salmon from the barrel to shove a fistful of truffle inside the fish’s mouth in mid-air. When the chef withdraw their hand again, Link can see the truffle, stuffed through the fish’s gullet in a single motion of the arm.

Link whistles appreciatively.

The chef raises their head towards her, and Link's eyes widen.

The face that peers at her from under the lizalfos-skin tarp does not belong to any human, any zora, any korok, any rito, any goron that she knows. A face of glowing slitted eyes and a twitching feline nose. A face of a wide mouth and gums set with thick canines longer and broader than her thumbs. A face that holds nothing but violent violet in its irises, a face with only malice to its name.

The lynel stands. Its red mane brushes out like a halo of fire around its head. Its four hooves paw at the soil while its muscular arms reach for the sword and shield at its sides. A sword wider than her own torso, with a cruel curved blade that she cannot picture dodging, and a shield inlaid with hooks on the front that could stab a thousand and one needles into her flesh if it slammed into her.

Link stares.

The upper torso of a muscular beast-man, somewhere between a lion, a bull, and a human who has eaten far too much meat in their life. The lower torso of a horse, or perhaps more accurately a donkey, with thick legs and hooves tipped in metal-studded horseshoes that audibly shlick into the ground when the lynel walks forward. Flexing its muscles, the lynel tilts back its head. It inhales, and then it roars, loud and long and low.

A challenge if ever Link saw one.

She tiptoes back to squat behind the rock. Though she knows it will not help, she covers her head with the slate.

She listens to the twang of a bow. Link looks up overhead to see the faint yellow spark of the arrow hurtling down directly towards her, too small and too fast to even attempt to catch with stasis.
Link flings herself away. She lands on her back in the mud. The sudden pulse of pain through her right foot—the same foot scarcely healed of having cleaved been in two in the Divine Beast Vah Naboris—sends her recoiling against the ground. Her limbs convulse. She feels her hand thrash against the rock. The lynel's hoofbeats close the distance between them.

She tries to slam her hands against her sides. She tries to lift herself up from the ground. She tries to control the shudders that race pain down her bones and up her veins back to her heart to whip her pulse to the heavens. She tries and she slumps back to the ground. She can feel the vibrations in the soil, can see the plinks in the puddle of rain, and yet her body will not respond.

For all of the Divine Beasts that she has calmed, she has always had beside her the help of Yunobo, of Amali, of Riju.

Perhaps if she cannot shake off a single topaz arrow on her first efforts on her lonesome, she deserves to pass the slate on to another.

A patter of rain plinks onto the tip of her nose. It slides down the bridge to wet her forehead between the eyes.

Her eyelids fly up.

Link clenches her fists. This time not even the spasms of the shock can fight against the determination that courses through her veins and lifts her to her feet directly in front of the lynel.

She tilts her head up. The lynel stands not a pace from her, so close that she can sense the relentless heat radiating from its bulk, as it gazes upon her with its tyrian-tyrant gaze.

It opens its mouth. Link stares at the yellowed fangs curving up from its deep red gums. A breath of rotted fish and putrid egg rolls from its throat to bathe her face in a wall of stench. Her eyes water.

The lynel roars and the sound drowns out Link's heartbeat.

It raises the sword. Just enough heft that Link can see the slight slowness of the arc. There, in that slowness, she sees the barest hint of a promise. There, in that slowness, she sees the thinnest thread of victory.

When the lynel's arm reaches its peak, Link throws herself to the side. The lynel brings the sword down upon the ground; the blade furrows the dirt in two to create a valley of death. Even as her boots touch soil, Link pulls the slate from the pouch at her right hip to lock the lynel in stasis.

She grins and curves her thumb and forefinger into the symbol of all rightness.

Not a second later the lynel rips itself free of the chains of stasis.

Link dodges behind the lynel as it swings its head from side to side in search of her. She rolls towards its hindquarters. Armour protects its chest and sides, but she notes the exposed point on its upper back, around the shoulder blade where its muscles ripple and mountain under its skin with the sheer strain of twisting its thickly veined neck.

Inhaling, Link springs onto the lynel's back, the fire-light spear in her hand.

Immediately she senses the lynel buck beneath her, but she plunges the spear directly into the back of its neck. The fire-light passes through its taut flesh. Link smells the searing of its muscle through its neck. She whips the spear back out—the fire-light disappears again into the hilt—and once more stabs in, the neck far too muscular and wide for her to dream of simply slicing its head off.

And yet, if she stabs enough, then surely the lynel will fall.

The lynel falls. To its front knees. The impact knocks Link forward. She wraps her hands around the hilt of the spear, hoping to keep herself in place on the spear embedded in the lynel's flesh, but the fire-light—which has aided her so greatly in her fights against the Malice and against that in which weapons might become stuck—quietly flickers off. She blinks rapidly.

The lynel bucks her high up into the air.

For a long moment Link hangs motionless at the zenith of the climb. Eaindrops suspend around her like so many glittering diamonds. She could reach out and balance one on the tip of her finger, to let the raindrop plunge into her palm and shine there.

Instead she draws the bow from her back.

The two-pronged arrow screams through the skies as the lynel sprints by beneath her. It sinks into the flesh of the lynel's brow. The topaz breaks. Electricity spills over the lynel's skin, and it freezes for a moment while the shock thunders down its hooves. She looses another arrow: into its left eye. The prong pierces its eyelids; the wound sprays crimson. Electricity bursts the jelly of the eyeball, and topaz-lightning chars it into a thick caramelised gloop. A mixture of blood, eye jelly, and tears congeals around the open socket in a crust along the lower rim. The upper eyelid hangs limply from the top of the socket, twitching, the eyelashes burned off from the shock.

The lynel roars.

Link lands on her boots to aim another arrow at its second eyeball, but the lynel twists back its left hand and throws its shield at her. Mouth gaping open, she somersaults to the side to avoid the needle-studded weapon.

She hears the lynel string its bow.

Link reaches desperately into the satchel. Her hand closes around the cold glass of the elixir vial. Pitching her arm back, she throws the vial at the lynel's face with every gram of strength she can muster.

The lynel pulls back on its metal bow as the vial of elixir explodes in its face and coats its face in green.

Green.

Not electric chuchu jelly, but green.

The glass shards embed in the lynel's face. She ogles the ruined remains of its collapsed nose, of the blood streaming from its brow, of the shard stuck in its empty socket even as the muscles that once controlled the eye constrict around the shard, which wedges the glass deeper and deeper into its flesh.

The lynel looses the topaz arrow.

Once more Link tries to cartwheel away, but abrupt pain just below her left armpit rips a scream from her lungs. The shock of electricity a second thereafter thumps—first—her knees into the mud and—then—the remainder of her body. Her stomach—her chest—her chin hit the ground. The agony of the lightning pulsating through her thuds her heart. She senses it threatening to break free of her chest or else shatter apart entirely. Her limbs, convulsing through the mud, can barely move. Link bites her lower lip. The lip split apart under the force of her teeth, and the pain sharpens her consciousness to a single point.

She wrenches her arm into the satchel. Another vial of glass pushes into her palm; Link closes her fingers around it. She hears the lynel charging her with its sword held in front of it and the metal spikes on its hooves leaving holes in the ground—but she will not let it leave holes in her flesh. Grinding the teeth of her upper jaw into the bloody mess of the skin above her chin, Link forces her arm up and lobs.

The vial does not explode in the lynel's face but at its throat. The electricity of the chuchu jelly brings the lynel's legs to a lock. Its momentum propels the lynel forward. It skids through the mud on electrified limbs. Its blade drops into the mud.

She grabs the sword in hand.

Link pulls herself out of the mud that forms a coat of cold over her skin. She listens to the lynel panting as it starts to recover from the shock. Fingers shivering, she grasps the hilt of the blade. So heavy that she can barely pick it up. So heavy that she cannot swing it normally. So heavy that when Link finally lurches it from the mud, the inertia spins her around her heel.

The lynel roars at her. It charges her head-on prior to her untangling herself from the sword, and the sharp curve of the spinning blade carves into its knees. The edge slices its tendons and claws the meat to the bone. The bottoms halves of its legs fall apart in bloody heaps of meat, leaving stumps above its knees. The lynel's front legs buckle. Its momentum launches the lynel launch into her. When its torso slams into her chest, it knocks the wind from her lungs. Blood spews over her waist and legs to warm her flesh through the tunic. She hears the lynel roar in pain as the open stumps of its front knees plunge into the unforgiving chill of the mud.

Link staggers backwards. Her trembling hands draw her bow again to aim for the lynel's remaining eye. Before she can loose the arrow, a vice grips her neck so tightly that she can neither breathe nor swallow. The lynel has her by the throat in its right hand so large that its fingers close around the back of her neck, so wide that its thumb digs into her chin and the base of its hand grazes her collarbones.

Despite the evident pain that shivers the lynel's shoulders, it tightens its grasp on her throat. Link feels the bones in her neck grinding against one another. The sensation pools droplets of blackness around the corner of her vision. Darkness: the promise of relief from the agony that would spasm her hands if not for the tempered iron of her will.

The lynel's other hand makes a grab for her bow; she jerks her arms up to loose the arrow square into its charred eye socket.

The electricity that courses through the lynel's body seizes through hers as well, but it does not let go of her throat. It roars; she recoils from the stench. The blood and jelly from its eye coat her nose and mouth. Vomit seeps from the corners of her lips to dribble onto her chin and the lynel's hand.

She cannot breathe.

Her vision. Her vision goes dark. Her muscles have the strangest feeling of sloughing from her bones, steadily ebbing away into nothingness, until only her bones are left, and then only the words she has left on the fingertips she can no longer feel.

With the last of her strength she reaches for the fire-light spear.
The suddenness of the agony that pierces through her lower belly could pass her out then and there. She feels her flesh constrict around the lynel's clawed fingers that have somehow wormed inside of the meat of her lower abdomen, puncturing the tunic in their entrance. The lynel grips a fistful of her entrails; she retches violently onto the lynel's face. It rips its hand from her abdomen to claw at its own face. The acid of her stomach contents burns into its ruined eyes, into its misshapen nose, into its bloodied maw.

Where the lynel ripped its fingers from her innards, she can feel blood flood down her stomach over her thighs, can feel her entrails slosh downwards to ooze from the holes left in its wake, can feel the hollows through the meat of her own body.

She lifts the fire-light spear above her. Her lungs have all but given out. Her arm shudders; she cannot raise it all the way.

But she need only thrust it speedily enough to activate the fire-light.

The spear sizzles through the lynel's brow between its eyes. She lifts it again and brings it down through the lynel's nose; the fire-light emerges on the underside of its jawline. The lynel gurgles blood. Its breath bubbles red. She cleaves the fire-light through its eye sockets into its skull, again and again, and then angles her hand to stab its jaw through the front of its throat.

The lynel's head tips backwards. She watches the remaining skin holding the neck up rip from the head's weight. The arteries burst under the pressure to blind her in blood.

The hand around her throat does not let go.

Bringing the fire-light spear up once more, she thrusts it down into the lynel's wrist; the stump of its hand wets her chest in warmth. She splashes uselessly into the mud on her right side. The fingers remain locked around her throat. She stabs the lynel's hand over and over with the fire-light. Her arm trembles so badly that she cannot angle the spear: the tip of the fire-light burns her right collarbone, her left shoulder, her sternum. Just before she slips into the comforting night, dark and deep, the thumb falls away and she can breathe.

She can breathe.

She breathes.

She breathes.

She breathes.

She lets herself lie in the mud on her side. When she opens her mouth, the mud seeps into the lower curve of her right cheek, but she sucks in breaths stenched of earth and blood and rot through her raw throat that bubbles up blood.

As she stares at the lizalfos-skin tarp beneath which the lynel sat, one of the salmon leaps from the fish barrel, hits the tarp, and splashes back into the water. Just one second. Just one moment.

But a moment she happened to catch.

She laughs.

She laughs until she can no longer bear the agony through her stomach accompanying each peal of mirth and then she laughs some more until at last she lies there in the stillness with nothing but the patter of the rain and her own laborious breathing.
Flattening her palm against her lower abdomen, she nearly throws herself to the pitch for the pain of the pressure against her innards. She tears off a strip of her bloodied tunic to wad and set between her teeth. Biting down on the makeshift gap, she pushes into the wound to keep everything inside.

She comes to.

Lifting her head, she looks upon the still-steaming corpse of the lynel. Her gaze alights on the quiver strapped to its back. The fire-light spear sizzles through the leather strap. She takes the quiver of topaz arrows. She does not count them. Instead, pressing her tunic over her belly, she crawls through the mud towards the lizalfos-skin tarp—towards the lynel's cooking pot.

She huddles beneath the tarp. The warm mixture of blood—the lynel's and her own—has cooled off in the rain and now clings to her clammy skin. Blood streams down her chin from where she has mangled her own lower lip to a pulpy mess of raw meat and bitten skin. At least the heat that seeps through the fabric of her lower belly continues to warm her.

Link glances at the ingredients before her.

Her salmon risotto.

The salmon stuffed with truffle. Still raw. A gruel of rice cooking in the pot. She can smell butter and salt in the gruel. The pain of her wounds and her bruises and the light-headedness borne of bloodloss compel her to collapse, but she perseveres.

Never will she satisfy herself with a meal shoddily made.

Link takes the time with her limited ingredients to whip the gruel into a proper risotto of rice. She moves her own cooking pot onto the fire to make a broth on the fish in the water barrel that she adds to the rice. Out of butter, she makes due with what the lynel has already added to the pot. Link stirs, testing the rice as she goes, and cooks the risotto until the risotto has attained a viscous, creamy texture that she longs to eat out of the pot. She stops herself long enough to thoroughly cook the salmon with its truffle—and added herbs that she drags over from the lynel's garden, her hand against her stomach to keep her innards from spilling out—inside. Only when the fish and truffles have roasted fully does she spread them over the rice and allow herself to indulge.

With the blood still leaking from her belly and the bruises making swallowing a fight against the pain that threatens to sink her into blackness, Link tears apart the salmon with her bare hands. She scoops up rice with her right hand and salmon-truffle with her left, pelting food into her mouth. The warmth of the meal floods over her tongue. Even though her hands track mud and blood into her mouth, the savory-tang of hearty cooked salmon, the deep richness of the crunchy roasted truffle, the sour-bitterness of the herbs tempered to sweetness by the heat, and the salty risotto beneath it all to lubricate its descent down her throat.

Link senses her strength returning from the deliciousness of the aroma alone; her body seems to stitch itself back together as she eats of its truffles within.

She closes her eyes. She remembers Mipha gazing at her as they stood on a balcony of Ruto overlooking the reservoir, as Mipha pointed out the wall of the dam where lay Link's bed and the counter where she served meat and drink.

Mipha smiled at her. "My Link, do you remember when I first rescued you?"

Link nodded. Mipha recounted the story and Link added in her own experiences, which brought Mipha to laugh at Link picturing a sea monster that plucked her from the river.

Eventually the mirth quieted down and left Link gazing at Mipha, who herself gazed out towards the Divine Beast Vah Ruta, silent in the water of the lake below Ruto. "Hylians...seem to grow up so fast. I feel like I haven't blinked and you've already become an adult." Link blinked but Mipha did not return her gaze. "Do you think, my Link, when we've done our best against the Calamitous One...do you think that we could return to how things were when we were children?" The corners of her mouth twitched up. "And perhaps you could...perhaps you could cook for me again, my Link. Wouldn't that be wonderful?"

She does not remember her reply. The pain mists over her memories even through the sharpness of the salmon risotto.

When she opens her eyes, Link finds Sidon wandering the clearing, calling her name. She shouts hoarsely back at him, and he moves towards her until he has neared enough for her to touch his wrist. Link tugs desperately at him, to bring him over, to make him listen to her final plea. He offers his hands.

She signs into his palms. "Sidon. Sidon."

He asks her a thousand questions and she asks him one.

"Sidon...do you want some of this salmon risotto?"

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes:

The King Zora refers to Link as "my lass" and Sidon as "my lad"; he once also referred to Mipha as "my lass".

The hero of propaganda is in reference to the fact that the royal family was hiding what Link was actually like for fear that the greater population wouldn't accept her.

In Breath of the Wild, Dorephan comments on why Link no longer carries the legendary blade.

Dorephan compares non-zora to fish spawning. Since you would expect zora to be compared to fish, I wanted to point out that zora do not see themselves as "fish" any more than we humans see ourselves as lemurs.

I think that this is our hint of what actually happened in the time before the Great Calamity. We'll find out more about it in the future.

Mipha's 'love' (in reference to Link) is not meant to be romantic at all. Although she was apparently romantically interested in Link in Breath of the Wild, they have a different relationship here, since (again) Mipha was quite literally an adult when Link was growing up and thus when they met. Rather, the 'love' she means is that Link gave her an outlet of someone who didn't know her as the Princess Zora and someone who did not attempt to foist the Lanayrish traditions on her.

Muzu smells something beastly rather than something fishy.

Muzu refers to the lynel as a he, but monsters do not in fact have sexes (or genitalia for that matter, as they do not sexually reproduce).

In Breath of the Wild, Muzu asks you to gather twenty arrows, which is what Muzu almost said before giving Link a much larger number.

Yep, Sidon is blind! The joke about no evil being done is in reference to the "see no evil; hear no evil; speak no evil" adage.

A shard of topaz going off over Link's head is a twist on the lightbulb going off over someone's head gag.

Sidon is able to navigate through the water and to greet other residents of Ruto through a combination of (1) reading patterns from the waves of water around him and (2) electromagnetic signaling, which sharks and other fish are capable of. However, these do not work out of water. Even in water, he does usually have a seeing aid/interpreter (like Lari) around with him though.

In Breath of the Wild, Link jumps up waterfalls by donning the zora armour. I found this ridiculous at best (just as Urbosa does not have magic lightning powers, nor does Revali actually call gales). Sidon jumps up the waterfall in a manner similar to salmon, by repeatedly leaping and slowly inching his way up. The paraglider Link opens refers to how Link automatically opens such a paraglider in Breath of the Wild, although this understandably freaks Sidon out as he has no idea what's going on.

Shooting an arrow into a lynel's face causes the lynel to be stunned for a few moments in Breath of the Wild.

Funny how lynel have magic homing shock arrows if you try to hide, even though that's not how arrows work.

The fight with the lynel is one of the single most violent in all of Delicious in Wilds. I did not do this to glorify violence; rather, because lynels are the generally agreed-upon most difficult enemy in the game for most players, I wanted to make that evident for Link in Delicious in Wilds as well.

The lynel getting caught in Link's spinning blade as she struggles to stop the inertia of her rotating is a reference to the two-handed spin attack animation, where Link literally spin2wins in place. The heaviness of the blade comes from its in-game description.

Link gets rather hurt in this chapter. The lynel literally putting its claws through her lower abdomen was inspired by the "barbarian" armour set, which uses lynel monster parts to upgrade, and which features a red handprint on the stomach. Guess what Link's scar is going to resemble?
Don't worry about Sarie! They're around and will be just fine. In fact they've been around the entire time.

Up next: recovery; preparation for Vah Ruta.

midna's ass. 18 October 2017.

Beta reader's comments: This is one of the biggest and best fight scenes in the whole series. It's so visceral and desperate and brutal.

...And it's followed up by Link holding her intestines in so that she can make food, which is the most Link thing ever written.

The last line of this chapter is definitely in the top five closing lines. I laughed out loud.

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef recovers from injuries and prepares a meal for the coming calming of the Divine Beast.

Chapter Notes

To all of my readers: a brief summary of the "skippable" section of the previous chapter is as follows: Link fought against the lynel and won, killing the lynel, but was grievously injured in the process, specifically with the lynel ripping into Link's abdomen/innards. Sidon then found the mortally wounded Link cooking salmon risotto.

This chapter includes an arguably graphic scene of Link's healing that is skippable, starting at the paragraph beginning with "The sudden pain over the entirety of her form" and ending just before the paragraph beginning "And then, all at once, the itch leaves her". As always, stay safe!

And now, the usual author's notes that didn't fit in the end: Thank you so much to all of my readers for all of your support, and thank you as well to my beloved beta reader, Emma, for everything that she has done for me, including informing me when I'm stuck too far up my own ass.

The opening of this chapter is purposefully written in a very confusing manner because Link is delirious from pain and blood loss.

Because of how feverishly delirious Link is, you get a smattering of memories here, one of which is intensely important, and regards how Link and Ilia became friends (it's probably confusing exactly what happened now, so wait until the fifty-fourth chapter for a revisit and some clarification).

See the end of the chapter for more notes

She does not much stay awake the journey back. Link clutches the quiver of topaz arrows with her chest. Sidon swaddles her in the lizalfos-skin tarp. He prays over her to the Goddesses; slightly, just slightly, she lifts her eyelids. He grips her hand, beams at her—at her stomach rather than at her face—and flashes her a thumbs-up.

"I knew you could do it! With these arrows we'll surely quell Vah Ruta! Most fortuitous, Link! Now let me do my part in getting you back! And I have nothing but the utmost faith in your ability to hang on!"

Link nods blearily before closing her eyes again. Weakly she fends off his attempts at picking her up, hugging the cooking pot of salmon risotto. She feels Sidon cautiously touch over her hands until his fingertips ping against the metallic surface of the pot.
"I shall bring that with us!" he announces; Link lets herself go limp. She raises her satchel to push into Sidon's hands, then signs into them, the agony of every breath that shakes through her still-raw throat and her pulsating innards doubling Sidon in two and bringing a sluggishness to her movements. She asks him in broken words to harvest herbs from the garden, whatever he can fit, for ingredients that she did not see at first blush in the kitchens of Ruto. Link hears Sidon spend a moment kneeling over her, panting. Then he empties her palms of the satchel. "Very well! I will most certainly look for anything I have not eaten before! Then I shall be right back for you! Tap thrice for yes yes yes!"

With the little strength that remains in her, she taps.

She does not let her head loll back so much as she can no longer afford to hold up her neck.

Link lowers her eyelids. Despite her best efforts, her arms slip from the sides of the cooking pot. She inhales. Her ribs rattle within her. She exhales. The five-pronged wound on her lower belly throbs as if the lynel were attempting to eviscerate every delicious meal she has ever had.

If only she could have shared the lynel's own salmon risotto with it. If only she could convince the monsters to lay down their arms in exchange for the heat of a meal.

Link listens to the splish of mud beside her. Something shifts over her shoulders. The ground vanishes from under her body; something firm and cool surrounds her. A chrysalis. She has become the Malice in her own body, and when someone enters her Divine Beast to calm it, she will slither from the cocoon of the tyrian heart to drop her slate. Neither the fire-light spear nor the long sword given to her by Riju would constitute something of her own weapons. Ah, of course: the cooking pot. A formidable fashion of fighting, a warning weapon of war.

Fluid sprays over her face, and then doesn't, and then does, and then doesn't, and then she stops paying attention and starts to consider what food to make for herself when she arrives home.

If the lynel sought to remove her entrails, then she will merely have to replace her innards with food. She'll make a favourite of the girl who smelled of horses: mushroom rice-balls. Her own special, to combine the use of rice in Lanayru with the love of mushroom in Ordona.

Sitting together on the porch by the sunset trees. Cooking over the same pot. Giggling and wiping sauce or butter from one another's noses. Finding Aryll—up high in the trees or staring off the coast towards the ocean she loved so—to surprise her little sister with supper.

The firm thing unwraps around Link. Two—something like planks of wood—support her. A warm bulk presses into her left side. Her entire body remains numb. Her limbs flop uselessly and slide off of the planks of wood; she finds that her individual arms and legs have tensed so that she can no longer move them.

A puppet.

A puppet of wood.

Link tries to laugh and yet she senses only the sting of blood bathing the inside of her throat, the meat constricting in and out, swollen up so thickly that she can only hiss in a whisper of a breath.

A motion at her right hip. Words somewhere far, far away. A brightness that squeezes shut her eyes, and then a hum that resonates through the bulk at her side to tremble her form.

Water.
The rushing of water.

The planks of wood and the bulk at her torso give way to a hardness beneath her. Link lies there with her limbs splayed her. Her stomach hurts. She need eat something. Just to eat. Nothing else.

Just to eat.

Just to cook mushrooms and herbs directly in the fire for wanting of a cooking pot. Just to find herself trapped in the darkness of the forest without a means of returning home. Just to feel the pain of her broken left arm. Just to realise that she had no companion but the girl who smelled of horses and a single Ordon goat. Just to end up confessing that she...she wanted to be a girl. Just to hear the apologies tumbling from the fingertips of the girl who smelled of horses. Just to spend the night huddling beside the fire to keep warm. Just to force themselves up in the morning with their hands clawed with frost and their legs numbed to static. Just for the girl who smelled of horses to shimmy up a tree and spot the plume of smoke from Ordon. Just for them to walk until the girl who smelled of horses’s feet bloodied from her sandals, just for Link to offer her her sturdier boots, just for the girl who smelled of horses to refuse, just for the girl who smelled of horses to whisper later her thanks, just for her to invite the girl who smells of horses to the ranch with her to make her a meal, as Link will do now. Now. Mushroom rice-balls for the girl who smells of horses.

The floor beneath her melts. She drifts on nothingness. Her arm—the bones replaced with a long moblin horn she cannot flex, the blood drained and filled instead with molten lead—lifts itself.

The sudden pain over the entirety of her form leaves her screaming and writhing the wooden limbs that refuse to move, the hands and feet she cannot recognise as her own flapping along her chest. Her bones crack and splinter beneath her skin. So many needles stab through her flesh, everywhere on her body, from her brow to her lower lip to the curve of her abdomen to the centre of her right foot between her toes and draw up through her form with threads so sharp and thin that they threaten to slice her meat over again. Like worms burrowing beneath her skin with nothing but fang and tooth. Her muscle squashes together over her bone. Her tendons elongate rapidly, too rapidly, like someone taking her sinews and stretching them out by hand well past their breaking point. The holes in her abdomen collapse inwards on themselves; the sudden swell of new flesh plugging against the raw meat of open injuries gurgles her breath in her throat. Her heart clenches in. The same agony that overwhelms her consciousness keeps her awake.

Something fishy around her mouth. Link strains her neck forward; her efforts reward her with a mouthful of salmon risotto that she wolfs down all at once, even as the inner lining of her throat thicken. The sensation itches, unbearably so. She fights the overwhelming urge to force her hand down her own throat and claw up the skin with her bare fingernails until the pads of her finger come away bloody. Crawling, Crawling, all over her skin, like the scorpions of the Parapan desert. A swarm of ants or termites or locusts coating her and forcing their way inside of every orifice. No, not insects: her skin crawls back together to stitch itself. Her whole body itches, inside and out. Not only the inner rim of her throat, but of her nostrils down to the openings on the roof of her mouth, her lower lip, her ears, her chest, in the insides of her ears, on her lower abdomen inside of where the holes have plugged up. She scrabbles at her own skin, and yet the flesh of her stomach prevents her from digging in to scratch the itch deep within. Her limbs thrash. At least the salmon risotto continues to stuff her mouth. It warms her belly and quiets, if only for a second, that overbearing urge to scratch. For that impossibly long span of time, the entirety of her world hangs in the balance of two words: itchy; tasty.

Link feasts on the salmon risotto long after her stomach has started to hurt and the rising tide of bile has begun to sting the base of her throat. Her nails scrape along her skin: she cannot reach the deeper layers she so desperately needs to scratch.

And then, all at once, the itch leaves her. Suddenly she submerges in the void of no longer having a body, for what body can she have without the feeling of itching giving her its boundaries. Slowly the sensations of her twitching fingers, her shivering limbs, and her thumping heart reach her.

She takes another bite of salmon risotto. She swallows. Her stomach churns. She lifts her head for another mouthful, but her teeth click on emptiness.

No salmon risotto. No need to remain awake, or alive.

She feels herself fall into the dark.

When she awakens again, Link finds herself staring—for once—at a familiar ceiling. She shoots her body forward despite the pounding of her head. She feels a thin layer of water splash at her sides. The silvery-grey room. The luminous stones. The water-bed.

No. No, she couldn't have fallen asleep. She couldn't still need to see the King Zora. She—

"Link! You're awake!"

She snaps her head towards the sound. Sidon. To her right. At her bedside. At her bedside, floating in the water that covers the entire floor of the room high enough that a thumb's-length or so reaches over the bed. Link looks left and right. Her belongings pile on a tall nightstand to her left. She counts the paraglider, the telescope, the slate, the cooking pot, the satchel, a strange blue not-quite-tunic laid out for her.

"How are you feeling!? Lanzu and Oshen told me that you should feel most well now! Our Goddess left the shrine just to heal you, after all!" Sidon beams at her. She blinks. "I believed in you! Not only have you brought back us so many topaz arrows, but you were able to rid us of the lynel once and for all! Link, you are truly most amazing! But of course, as expected of you, Link!"

Sidon bows to her, low enough that his face enters the water. "On behalf of our Goddess and all of the people of Lanayru, thank you! Thank you from the bottom of my heart! Thank you, most wonderful Champion of Hylia!" He stops, then grabs her hand and pumps it. "I am most sorry! I know that you do not wish me to call you that, so let me thank you yet again: most wonderful Link! Who would risk your life for us on the virtue of your own moral sense alone! Link, you should know how eternally grateful I am to you, that we all are to you!"

Link stares at him. When he releases her hands for a moment, she taps his wrist; Sidon's grin widens. "But of course! I should let you get a word in!" He faces his palms towards her. She asks him of what exactly happened, and Sidon bobs his head. "How have I neglected to tell you that! You shine with such music than I forget myself, Link!"

"After your most miraculous and awe-inspiring defeat of the lynel, you risked your life and limb, and the lynel gravely injured you! Our Goddess sent me a sign that you had bested the beast! But of course, you would never let something as a minor as a mortal injury stop you! I found you eating of the lynel's own pot! You even made me a meal, and a delicious one, so thank you for that as well!"

Link tries to swim through the shouting to get at the kernels of truth in Sidon's words, a feat that proves difficult if not impossible. She prays that his compliments of her food do not come from gratitude but from a genuine enjoyment of her cooking.
If not, then she will endeavour to train herself even harder to surmount this challenge as well: to prepare for Sidon a meal he loves.

"Our Goddess would never leave us without recourse! Thank you for allowing me to aid you on your trek back with the burden of the salmon and the quiver of topaz arrows! Once you arrived in Ruto, you went to the great shrine in the heart of the Temple! As expected of you, our Goddess found you worthy of entering Her sacred chambers with the presentation of the Goddess slate! Therein, through wisdom and the faith of our Goddess, the trial set forth by our Goddess was easily passed, as I had faith it would be! Our Goddess, seeing you in your plight, chose to present Herself to heal you with Her own holy hands as part of our eternal gratitude to you as Her chosen saviour, as our deliverer!"

The shrine. The shrine, like the shrine that healed the bite marks left by the lizalfos that tried to steal her food over a year ago, the marks still visible between the branches of the lightning bolt.

When Link looks down at herself to gaze at the lizalfos scars, she at once realises her own nudity. The lightning-bolt scars glisten gold on her left arm. On her lower abdomen, she can see the angry scarlet scars where the lynel's fingers plunged into her flesh: four in a row and one slightly asymmetric for the thumb. She observes, between her second and third toe on her right foot, a scabbed scar where struck the lynel's arrowhead.

She rests a hand on her stomach to gingerly brush her fingers over the wounds. Link has lost feeling, as she expected, on the scars. When she presses in, she feels the deep ache within her stomach where the deadened flesh extends down into her innards. But if she skims the surface her skin remains whole, or if she compresses her stomach or flexes her muscles, Link barely feels the injury except as a slight strain on her less supple skin, a strain to which she can adjust.

Her journey has marked her in more ways than one. Months ago, Link could no longer tell which scars she has received before her slumber at the Great Calamity and which she has received after her awakening in the Shrine of Resurrection. Now she knows enough of her own history—or at least enough to name some scars.

She touches a scar gouged out in her arm by a goat in the province of Ordona from before she and the girl who smelled of horses became friends, and a thin line over her left hip from an arrow while defending the girl with the golden hair sometime shortly after they together baked an egg tart. She touches the vertical scars on her wrist, like a taloned hand clawing up her skin, and she exhales.

If the meals she has eaten map out the memories of her mind, then the scars and the pain she has borne track a tapestry of her trials and trials alike.

"How long was I out?" Link inquires. He responds: not more than a few hours. She wipes imaginary sweat from her brow.

"Ah! How could I forget, if not for your presence as rich and vibrant as the music of the spheres!" Sidon clears his throat. "As the lynel resulted in the most noble sacrifice of your battle armour—"

Her clothing. Gone. The undershirt that she has worn since Kakariko, the trousers that she had worn since Darunia, the feather-ruffed tunic that she had worn since Medli, all stitched up in Parapan style since Nabooru.

"Fear not! For, while your body was resting up, our most talented trio of Laflat, Shalot, and Rulata prepared for you a set of hylian armour! You should thank them later: they had to make a great many adjustments for your size!" Sidon raises a thumbs-up at her, and Link rubs the back of her head. "But of course, as expected of our most incredible tailors, the armour should fit you perfectly, and help you better to swim beside!"
"...where are the remains of my clothing?" she signs into his palms.

"Ah! Would you wish for our most ingenious tailors to try their fin at repairing them?"

Link bobs her head, realises that Sidon continues to gaze expectantly at the wall behind her, and signs: "Please."

"Consider it done! Anything for you, Link! I shall send them for on the double and I have nothing but trust in their expertise!" Another grin that reflects the ceiling's luminous stones into her eyes. "If you try on the armour now, then I could request that they make any adjustments as well!"

She nods.

Link slides off of the bed and finds the water up to her waist. With her back towards Sidon, she takes the blue not-tunic in her hand and feels the slippery material under her fingers. Fish-skin, or shark-skin, but smoother than the rough scales on a zora's back, like the smooth white skin on the underbelly and the soft hollow of the throat, but dyed a rich blue and inlaid with reflective silver and a layer of opal along the inside. To keep her body dry even in the water, at least until the opals fill with water. But then she need only dry them out to swim again.

She dons the not-tunic, or attempts to. If the tailors Sidon mentioned measured her in her sleep, then they measured her down to the millimetre. The armour fits Link like a second skin, perfectly clinging to her form without giving her skin a chance to breath. The opal absorbs her sweat, and the fabric does not constrict her flesh or restrict her movements.

Yet she has always worn her clothing loose and comfortable.

The second skin brings the same sense of discomfort as when Link wore the dress. Without the loose, heavier clothing over her limbs, she feels though she loses the boundaries of herself.

"I have faith that everything will be to your liking, Link!" Sidon booms.

Link puts on the cap. The equivalent of a tail and facial fins flop over her sidelocks and ponytail. She rubs the back of her head and the tail interferes with her usual touch on her ponytail.

She touches her chin.

She removes the cap from her head.

Setting it in on the bed and wading through the water, Link taps Sidon on the wrist. Into his palms, she—sweat pouring down her back in thick rivulets, matched only by how she sweats when she prepares her most precise concentration of cooking—signs. "Is there a way that I could get something less skin tight? I'm sorry."

"Less skin tight?" Sidon grips her hands in his, almost crushing her fingers. "But of course! Of course you can! Though do please think before you do, as this armour made by our most talented tailors Rulata, Laflat, and Shalot should keep you dry precisely for its most perfect fit!" Sidon claps his hand onto her shoulder. "If you still want to, of course I will send the message along to them! I suppose if I were you, I would not fathom wanting to stay dry, for who does not wish to bathe in the waters of our Goddess Herself!"

She nods. Upon Sidon's request, Link removes the not-tunic again. He excuses himself, and she reaches over to rap her knuckles against his wrist.

"When will I get my clothes back?"
“Two flicks of a trout's tail!” Sidon answers, beaming yet again. He leaves her in the room to speak with someone outside.

Her stomach rumbles.

Link takes the opportunity to assess the contents of her satchel. To her eternal gratitude, Sidon did indeed fill the satchel with the contents of the lynel's garden. The heads of fleet-lotus with the seeds rattling around within. Rice that makes her salivate. Hyrule herb in green, longer and with buds more golden than those that she has seen on the fields of the land once known as hyrule. Carrots that she has before only seen in Necluda near Kakariko, that water her mouth at the images of sweet carrot cakes and hearty carrot stews floating just beyond the reach of her fingertips. Violet mushrooms sprinkled in silver that she recognises as rushroom. And violets, as in the flower. Ignoring the petals entirely, Link focuses on the leaves that give off a wonderfully bitter scent. She could brew from them a tea to use as a side, or she could simply eat them raw, or because she could make rice-balls with them complementing the mushrooms.

Link nibbles on one of the leaves. Her mouth washes with the taste of the mud from which Sidon picked them.

Sticking out her tongue, she nods sagely to herself. She does not know what she expected.

Sidon returns to find her with her face practically stuck in the satchel. When she hears him swimming through the waters, Link jerks her head up; the satchel comes with her. Mushrooms and herbs and the wooden box of elixirs thump into her face. It takes her a moment to pull the satchel off her head and set it back on the stand while Sidon merely swims there, offering her a pile of clothing.

_Her _clothing.

But her clothing can wait. First Link needs to pluck and sort the ingredients that have fallen from the satchel into the water. Her top priority. Then she can worry about clothing herself.

Once she returns everything to the satchel, Link takes the undergarments and undershirt from Sidon, then the trousers and tunic, and finally her boots and the hood that Glepp gave her, to replace the one Link has used so often to hide the scars that cover her face. Her trousers and undergarments seem mostly whole. She can see in the patch along the stomach of the tunic and the undershirt beneath it where the lynel's claw entered her innards. As she smooths the tunic over her stomach, she presses her fingertips against the patch, and the scars ache in her flesh.

Link feels for the rings in her earlobes and the blue band around her ponytail. Then she slides the hood down around her neck. Her once-confined sidelocks _pomf_ free, bouncing against her cheeks.

She takes a moment to glance at her reflection in the water. The ripples distort her view, but the scratches of Sidon's scales have left scrapes of scab along her chin and jawline; along with the vertical lines down her cheeks and the diagonal mark from the corner of her eye to her jaw, the scars frame her face. Link runs her palm across her chin: the creases catch the rougher texture of skin over the scar.

She wonders if perhaps the healing of the shrine make scars worse. If perhaps, had she healed normally and waited out the time, Link could have come away without the wear.

But she has not the time. The people of the land once known as Hyrule—of Akkala and Parapa, of Eldin and Faron, of Hebra and Necluda, of Tabanch and Lanayru—have not the time.
Link will take all the scars in the world onto her body if they might mean sparing another's.

Her trousers billow with water. She slaps her hands against her stomach to laugh at the sight of the fabric ballooning around her legs. Link listens to the euphony of Sidon laughing with her, so loudly that his voice resonates within the chamber and vibrates the surface of the water. She grins at him though he cannot see her smile. Her grin lasts not a second before the laughter overtakes her again. She doubles over.

She inhales water.

Sidon has to thump her on the back to choke the water out. Link cannot stop laughing long enough to even try to cough. He thuds her between the shoulder blades, and she flies forward into the water.

She nearly drowns, but at least she does so giggling her fool head off.

Once the mirth has ebbed from her belly and the water has flowed from her lungs, Sidon grabs her hand to pump it back and forth.

"I am heartened to see you in such wonderful spirits, Link! When you have rested up, we can make our move on Vah Ruta!" Sidon makes a circular gesture that Link does not grasp yet which fires her up regardless. She punches her fists in the air.

"And I'm going to make us a meal on the go!"

She punches her fists in the air again.

"A meal on the go!? As expected of you, Link!" Sidon grips her shoulder. "But of course, you would cook something to assist yourself in quelling the storm! Link, I have a request!"

Link nods to him, smiles sheepishly at herself while he continues to look expectantly in her general direction, and signs her affirmation into his palm.

"If you would not mind, I would be most eternally grateful if I could observe your heroic actions!" That she does not immediately turn tail and dive onto the bed to drown herself surprises her for how far she has come. "Our Goddess knows that I have tried to fulfill the duties of the Prince Zora in preparation for my destiny—" Link rubs her eyes. "—but I would most relish the chance to learn from a true heroine such as yourself!"

"Everyone seems to love you," she tells him. Sidon beams.

"I try my best, as I believe all of us do! But if I could push myself to be even better, then I will take any chance I can!" He clings more tightly to her shoulder.

Link scratches the back of her neck. At least the words come more readily to her in Lanayrish than they would in Eldic, or Tabanch, or Parapan. A language her hands, and her heart, know well.

"I'm not a hero," she explains, slowly. "I've...done a lot of things that have helped people! And I'm willing to put my life on the line. I know that I'm the..." She stops herself. She does not quite know how to sign the Champion of Hylia, the Hero of Hyrule, Her Majesty's Knight, O Courageous Link. Instead Link continues on, a slight flush to her cheeks: "You can watch me if you want. But...I've done as much harm as I have good. I'm not perfect. Just...don't forget that."

"But of course, you would be so modest and humble about yourself!" She runs her hand through her sidelock. The strength of his hand clenching her has started to tremor pain down her arm.
"What meal will you cook!?!"

Link touches her chin. Mushroom rice-balls, she's already decided. Yet she has not considered the possibility of making something to assist them.

She makes food for its own sake, and for that alone. To eat and to share and to swallow down to warm her belly.

Then again, the lynel's garden has brought her ingredients for something that could prove useful. Link has not the monster parts to brew an elixir, but perhaps she does not need an elixir. Just as Dyeri showed her the zapshroom and voltfin trout that could help provide some resistance against the electricity of monsters, then maybe she can prepare something that would provide them resistance against the Divine Beast Vah Ruta.

Link could ask Sidon to retrieve the lynel. From its corpse, she could concoct elixirs beyond her wildest dreams. Yet why concoct elixirs when she can get cooking?

"Sidon," Link declares, ripping his hand from her shoulder to sign into his palm. He salutes her with his free arm. "Take me to the kitchens. I have food to prepare."

The lynel must have imbibed its meals with the very essence of speed for the herbs and mushrooms picked from its garden. When in Lanayru, do as the Lanayrish: Link carries her satchel proudly on her hip, its contents that promising mushroom and herb rice-balls. Already she can roll the texture of steamed rice on her tongue, can smell the spark of speed to spritz through her stomach and hasten her heart.

Without the understanding of which ingredients might provide the greatest boon, Link mixes them all: diced rushrooms that leave a glimmery silvery powder on her palms, which she licks up for the kick of a harder pulse; discs of swift carrot so thin that she can see through them; pressed leaves pulled from swift violet. Her heart starts to squish in on itself; her blood vessels dilate, reddening her skin. She pulls on the collar of her undershirt. At least the water washes away the sweat that streams down her back. Link starts to hup left and right to rid herself of the excess energy.

The powder of the rushroom sears through her like a bolt of lightning to curl golden scars over the remainder of her unmarked body. Her muscles scream for her to do something, anything. To take on another lynel. To run a marathon from here to Medli. To jump off the roof and attempt to fly.

She might just have the ability to cucco-flap her way across the land once known as Hyrule on how swiftly she could flop her arms back and forth alone. She could flap her limbs to the heavens and tear open the film between her world and that of the Golden Goddesses to find the Sacred Realm of which the girl with the golden hair so often spoke.

Instead Link pours all of her energy into a frenzied effort at making rice-balls.

Operation cook begins, now.

While Sidon waits patiently by the counter and assists Link in reaching the cabinets she could not before—no more hopping up and down like a particularly aggravated lizalfos in the water that reaches her chest—to withdraw dried seaweed, she steams rice. Her fingers drum hastened versions of Epona's song and the Ballad of the Sealing War on the sides of the heating pot.

Link glances up at Sidon.

She tugs him over.
Into his hands she instructs him how to scoop the sticky rice into half balls and hollow out the centre, how to mix together the flakes of food to a thin filling, how to close the two domed halves of the rice-balls to shape the rice-balls into triangles, how to smooth the seams to ensure continuous rice, how to wet the tip of the seaweed to loop over the rice-balls, how to sprinkle fleet-lotus seeds over the rice and roll them between his palms to make the perfect shape. Together Link and Sidon fashion mountains of rice-balls until they have used up all of the ingredients that Sidon brought with him from the lynel’s garden. As a secret signature, Link adds a sprinkle of salted sauce to the seam of each before she closes the rice-balls, for that tiny extra snap of flavour.

By the time the rushroom wears off, Sidon and Link have amassed enough rice-balls to feed all of Ruto for a month. The other Lanayrish in the kitchen one by one stop their work to either marvel or stare in horror at the pile of rice-balls that spills over the counters.

"You're not adding fish!?” Sidon exclaims at the very end, and Link—after shaking her head—indicates the negative. "I have nothing but our Goddess's own faith in you and your masterful abilities in cooking! Father himself recognised you by your talents in cooking, as expected of you, Link!"

Link rubs the back of her head. The smile on her lips pushes back even her propensity towards vacancy. "I honestly don't think I'm that good."

"Surely the quality of ingredients you use cannot compare to the royal kitchens!” Sidon affirms, and Link lowers her hand. She expected some criticism, yet the truth still stings like the bite of a spicy pepper. "Yet, as expected of you, you manage to far outpace them with your most delicious cooking even with the limited tools you work with! As expected of you, you take what our Goddess has given you and you return destiny freshly served and garnished with your own courage!"

She ogles him. He pants from his speech, his arms outstretched, his grin etched into his lips.

Link cannot discern from his voice if he means his praise genuinely or if he simply says this because he regards her as the Champion of Hylia, the Hero of Hyrule, Her Majesty's Knight, O Courageous Link.

And some Knight she is, without Her Majesty.

She would never want to doubt someone—not even Muzu, whom she need thank for informing her about the topaz arrows—but now she almost regrets not climbing over the mountains towards the Divine Beast Vah Ruta to skip Ruto entirely, or sneaking in instead of attempting the trial put forth by Sidon.

With Yunobo, who barely knew her, and with Amali, for whom she had become part of the family, and with Riju, who had spoken with her honestly about cooking, she had felt herself. With Sidon, she feels like more of an idea than a person, a heroine instead of a girl who thinks of cooking far too often.

Shaking her head, Link slaps the counter to ground herself in the physical. The heel of her hand bumps against the tray of rice-balls. She signs her own death wish in that instant of watching the tray tilt and the rice-balls fly up.

Something small and brownish-green shoots out of her satchel to balance out the tray on the other end. The tray thumps back down. A sole rice-ball from the crown of the mountain tumbles down. Link’s saviour catches it in their tiny hands.
Sarie.

A Goddess in korok form.

Link clasps her hands in front of her. She bows down to Sarie, whose hands split into finger-like roots to absorb the rice-ball. The korok performs a little jig on the tray.

"Thank you. Thank you. Thank you," Link signs, in Necludan, in Lanayrish, in Central Hyrulean.

Sidon's features shift to visible confusion although his smile remains. "Link!"

"Please enjoy as many as you want, Sarie," Link adds to the korok. Sarie's leafy mask shakes back and forth with a sound like wooden blocks tumbling against one another.

Then Link turns to beam at Sidon. She presses her hands against his.

At last, her favourite time of the day, her reason for rising with each sunrise and bedding down with each sunset, her motivation for existence, her belief in the Goddesses, her vital spirit.

Food.

"I present," she signs, with an extra flourish to her wrists that brushes her knuckles against Sidon's palms, "rice-balls stuffed with mushroom and herb!"

With Sarie riding on Link's shoulder, they return to her room—the water somewhat drained—to eat and to prepare for their journey. Sidon explains what he knows of the Divine Beast Vah Ruta. Four tree trunk-like legs, each of which has a sensitive source of energy that they can disable with topaz arrows, at least for a time. Then Link can swoop in to cleanse the Divine Beast of the Malice.

"It would be my honour to accompany you to observe, Link, although I know that you could do it all without me! I promise that I will do my utmost to much get in your way!" Sidon flashes a thumbs-up. Link rubs the back of her head.

"I'll need all the help I can get," she answers.

"Most humble of you, Link! Thank you for believing in me!"

Link sighs.

She hefts a rice-ball into her hand. She rolls it around on her palm. She closes her eyes.

She pops the entire thing into her mouth at once.

The seeds hit her first. Her heart leaps up twice over, and she fears that if she bites inside, her heart will explode, and the shrapnel of her sternum will stud into the walls—and Sidon.

Yet Link could not name a better exit from life than in the waiting embrace of a rice-ball.

As the rice melts over her tongue, she senses the bitter powder of rushroom, the sweeter juice of swift carrot, the tender fibres of swift violet, and her heart thumps tenfold, a hundredfold, a thousandfold.

The thundering of her heart brings to mind the few drills that Mipha had her run with her silver spear, when the Champion of Zola trained Link in a weapon with a longer reach than any Link had used before.
Mipha. Mipha who in her spare time pursued her less-known passions of smithy, where most zora had difficulty with the need to reside in water to support their large and bulky bodies conflicting with the opposite requirement for smithing.

Those those did not live the fullness of their lives in the water, Mipha explained to her, oftentimes did not reach the size of their Lanayrish brethren. Those zora who lived in the rest of Hyrule, in the snowy mountains of Tabantha and tucked away in houses of sapphire in Eldin, fanning themselves in the heat of Parapa or sweltering through the jungles of Faron, would scarcely become taller than a rito or a goron might, to still tower above humans, but not by much.

In the little time she had to spare for herself, Mipha honed her skills in silversmithy, mainly in armour and in weaponry for the long war ahead. Beneath the winter moon Mipha demonstrated the crafting of a new spear for Link's training.

"Perhaps," she said to Link, suddenly, in the middle of an explanation on how to properly balance the metal, "I will not become the Queen Zora after all, if my duties as the Champion of Zola supercede those to Ruto's crown."

Link tilted her head at Mipha. But the Champion of Zola turned the talk to techniques of coiling silver, and Link fell silent.

To quicken the pace of her limbs enough to make the fine adjustments of delicate silver before the metal cooled, Mipha asked Link to prepare her food on rushroom and swift carrot, on swift violet and fleet-lotus seeds, and—at the girl with the golden hair's suggestion—hot-footed frogs, the latter of which the girl with the golden hair endeavoured to convince Link to consume. "For scientific research!" she declared to Mipha's giggling, while Link held the frog in her hands, meeting its yellow-eyed gaze.

Ribbit.

Mipha taught her well to fight with the spear, taught her well to prepare and apply medicinal salves from the herbs and mushrooms she could find most anywhere in Hyrule, taught her well that when they expect a Champion to have certain interests pertaining to their known Champion skills, then never will they speak of anything else that Champion might want, or need, or do.

"Like hopping from one river current into another. At least it's a step up in freedom." Link cocked her head, and yet once again Mipha left the point dangling as an uncaught fish on a hook.

For Mipha, few people knew of her talents as smithing, and fewer still considered her art significant. "If the stories never speak of your cooking, my Link," Mipha remarked while Link felt herself caught between blankness and blush, "I'll learn to write music so I can make my own."

Mipha.

Mipha, whose remains Link may yet have to fight.

But she can consider that later. For now Link has a Divine Beast to calm.

She pops another rice-ball into her mouth, and then another, until her body struggles to process the fullness in her belly and the fastness in her chest at once.

Vigor renewed, she turns towards her preparations.

Link fills up her satchel with as many of the rice-balls as she can carry. She pats herself down. The slate at her right hip. The red telescope at her left. The paraglider and the cooking pot on her back.
The fire-light spear and the long sword given to her by Riju. The bow given to her by Amali and the self-determination given to her by Yunobo. The satchel slung around her left shoulder and Sarie perched on her right.

She rears up her left foot—Sarie makes an oh sound at the suddenness of her motion—and attempts to slam it down onto the edge of the bed. The elastic material of the water-bed springs back up. Link nearly topples into the water if not for Sarie pulling her forward by her left ear.

Bursting out in laughter, she places her boot against the bed once more, a hair more gently this time.

Link flings her arm out to point towards the door. Having struck the pose, she realises that Sidon stands just too far for her hands to reach. She side-hops along the bed with a series of hyaahs until she can sign against his palms.

"Let's go, Sidon! To the Divine Beast!"

He holds her hands in his. "I believe in us, Link! Together with our Goddess at our side, we can do anything, yes yes yes!"

She nods.

They can.

And they will.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: The fluid spraying over her face and then not spraying over her face refers to Sidon going back through the waterfalls.

The two planks of wood refer to Sidon's arms, and the warm bulk is of course Sidon; he's "princess-carrying" Link with her left side against his chest. When he stops carrying her, he sets her down on the floor, which is the hard cold thing.

It's actually Sidon who completes the challenge of the shrine rather than Link, but Sidon then allows Link to touch the "goalpoint" (by the way, I use goalpoint because GOALPOINT is actually written above the place where the monks rest in Breath of the Wild, just like how the official music case has THEHYRULEFANTASY written on it in old hylian or whatever that language is called).

I clarify more on how the healing of the shrines works, but essentially all it does is accelerate natural healing. This has a few consequences: it won't let you bring back someone who would actually die: if Link were to be bisected from hip to hip, for example, the shrine might be able to fix up her lower torso so that her internal organs were still around, but would be unable to restore function to her legs. As you can see, such healing by the shrine leaves the permanent scars that you would expect, and probably worse than that which would be left by allowing natural healing. The upshot of the shrines is that natural healing takes a long time and you would have to heal with potential infections, blood loss, etc.

The skin fixing itself is indeed very itchy! What struck me was that the inner lining of her intestines would also have be fixed, and itchiness inside the body sounds maddening.

As mentioned in a previous author's note, the zora have different ideas of nudity in their culture; hence why neither Igli (the messenger) nor Sidon particularly cares about Link being nude; it's just normal.

Sidon's constant praise of Link isn't all there is to him. Note how Sidon says that "the trial was easily passed", constructing his sentence in such a way that he does not specify he passed through the trial. It helps that Lanayrish, as a language, is heavily contextual-based and does not require one to state the actor behind an action, allowing for natural constructions that speak entirely about the action; this is related to their general cultural values of the community over the self, where the action is more important than who did it. When translating Lanayrish to Central Hyrulean, translators may either attempt to infer the actor to get at a more natural construction, or may place the sentence into passive voice that does not work nearly as well.

If you forgot, Glepp gave Link a hood in the forty-fourth chapter to replace the one that Link left when she escaped from Nabooru.

The effects of hasty food make everything speed up, which means increased metabolism, quicker heart rate, and increased blood flow. It's essentially a stimulant.

I really love rice balls (I write them as rice-balls to improve readability, but it's just rice balls).

Link, in a relatable way, wants people to tell her when she's doing something wrong, but that doesn't mean that she's still worried about disappointing people around her.

Sarie! Sarie has been in Link's satchel the entire time, and actually was the one to make sure that Link had the right vial of elixir. In the fiftieth chapter, there's the line "Another vial of glass pushes into her palm; Link closes her fingers around it." Who pushed that vial? Yup, Sarie.

The Champions' passions were indeed glazed over by many people, fitting them instead into single heroic archetypes. Silversmithy isn't something you'd expect from Mipha—nor were her fears about becoming the Queen Zora something that anyone seems to care about.

The memory in which Zelda tries to get Link to eat a frog is probably my favourite memory of the entire game, because it's so wonderfully characterising and so very Zelda.

Next up: calming the Divine Beast, and the return of an old strat.

Beta reader's comments: Sidon sneakily finishing the shrine and giving the credit to Link is a cool, subtle little moment of depth for him.

The beginning of this chapter is really superbly written.

One thing I love about this series is how the author attaches serious consequences and really thinks about how different types of elixirs and foods would affect one's body.

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef and the Lanayrish prince endeavor to board the Divine Beast, but the more difficult challenge lies in bridging the Lanayrish prince's faith.

Chapter Notes

As expected, author's notes that wouldn't fit in the end: Thank you to my beloved beta reader, Emma, for how much she has contributed to Delicious in Wilds, and thank you to you, my beloved reader, for all of the support that you provide me.

While in-game the zora armour is called the zora armour, the zora people themselves would of course call it the hylian armour, since it's made for hylians. Zora armour would mean armour that is meant for the zora, as the world does not revolve around hylians.

Lurelin is one of my favourite villages in Breath of the Wild for the music and the general relation to the land and situation that it carries across. I wish that there was more to it, however. Papuchia is also a blue-themed fishing village in the south of Hyrule, a village from Spirit Tracks. I have a feeling that Lurelin was in fact inspired directly by Papuchia.

Greengill and Ordon catfish are fish from Twilight Princess. Neptoona, skippyjack, loovar, and rusty swordfish can be caught in the open oceans of the world of the Ocean King in Phantom Hourglass. Ambrosial amberjack, goodta goby, Hyrule seabass (actually "Termina seabass"), and grand swordfish can be caught in the Ocean Fishing Hole in Majora's Mask 3D. Since Papuchia and Lurelin are catching ocean fish, I purposefully chose only fish that can be caught from ocean spots throughout the Zelda franchise (for example, I did not include freshwater fish from the fishing hole in Twilight Princess or from the Swamp Fishing Hole in Majora's Mask 3D).

You know what's exceedingly difficult? Writing scenes in which both characters use the same pronouns. This becomes especially a problem in the eightieth chapter, as you'll see, but that's just how the cookie crumbles in English.

They arrive at the docks of Ruto before Link quietly points out that they left the lynel's quiver of topaz arrows in the chamber.

They arrive at the docks the second time with another dose of mushroom rice-balls that gives them the energy to speed through the walk there and back as though the most delicious meal in the world awaited them.

With any luck, Link reasons, one such meal does await them after the calming of the Divine Beast.
She explains briefly to Sarie about the Divine Beast and inquires whether Sarie wants to remain in the city for safety. Sarie shakes their head, which also shakes their entire torso, seeing as the koroks appear to lack anything resembling a neck. "Yahaha! Sarie was hiding in Link's satchel the first time too! Sarie's really good at hide and seek! Sarie didn't get caught for so much time that Sarie must've hidden better than all Sarie's friends!" Sarie touches their tiny hands to either side of their head. "But Sarie's never been that good before. Sarie was usually the first one found, because Sarie's not that good at lying...so maybe all of Sarie's friends are still out there! When Sarie goes home, Link should help Sarie look for them!"

Link gestures towards Sidon, who waits at the edge of the dock, fixing the cords that keep the leather mat affixed to his back. "Will you be all right?" Link asks. "It'll be dangerous."

Sarie bobs their entire body. The motion causes them to fall over with an uungh. Twirling up their korok leaf, they straddle Link's satchel. Obediently she opens it for them, and Sarie slips inside with the tiniest twee hee! Link has heard, not that Link has heard many a twee hee! in her life.

With Sarie snug in the satchel, Link pats the pack prior to joining Sidon, who has once more strapped to himself a leathery—not leather, Link realises upon the second go-around, but fish-skin—mat to prevent his skin from scratching Link. This time she adjusts the mat to sit slightly higher. She lashes herself to him.

Link holds on tightly.

In the waters through which Sidon leaps, she cannot sense as well the relentless burden of rain. Even for a girl who adores rain, the constant plinks of water over Link's skin feel as if they leave marks in her flesh.

"Hold on and take a deep breath!" Sidon calls to her. "Don't lose strength! I believe in you!"

He launches on the now-familiar climb up the falls. The pressure against her stomach throbs the not-quite-fully-healed wounds left by the lynel's fingers. She flattens herself against Sidon's back.

When she returns from the Divine Beast, Link will need to thank Muzu, and thereafter the King Zora, and thereafter everyone in Ruto if she can.

The rice-balls that she left for the other Lanayrish in the kitchens should comprise a fair start.

Sidon clears one waterfall—Link resists the urge to open her paraglider at an inopportune time—and then another, and then he moves down a different waterfall that sends the blood rushing through Link's upside-down body to her head. She closes her eyes. Her temples thud dully; her cheeks flush; the rest of her form drains and pales.

Sidon goes upright again; the abruptness of the motion leads Link to come to a few seconds later. When she blinks her eyes against the spray that chills her face and clings her wet clothing to her skin, Link finds herself ogling a massive silvery-grey dam that spans far overhead to blot out half of the sky.

The East Reservoir. Somewhere in that dam, she might discover again the bed in which she slept and seems bar in which she served drinks and cooked meals. And yet there seems less water than in her memories, where the dam barely held back the tide of water beyond its span. Now the dam soars so far up that Link cannot estimate its height.

Perhaps they have built the dam that much higher.

Or perhaps the water level in the reservoir has become that much lower.
Somewhere behind her, amid the drumroll of the rain and the occasional cymbal crash of thunder, Link makes out another noise against the precipitation percussion. A grinding noise, as of two massive boulders skidding past one another, like a fissure visibly on the move with the earthquake not far behind.

"Link! Link! Are you prepared!? I have nothing but the utmost faith in you! Our Goddess shall not steer you wrong!"

Link understand why Sidon has positioned himself facing the dam: so that she can turn her head without his body blocking her vision.

And so she turns her head.

She stares.

The Divine Beast Vah Ruta. The elephant of the statues, a word that she knows not except that Yunobo told her. The statue—the one she recalls in the three Divine Beasts she has met—stood vaguely upright, with a curiously long tail upon its face, and two thick arms from its shoulder, although the statue had no the legs. The elephant in the water, gigantic enough that she cannot comprehend its size at this distance, presents an entirely different beast.

Like the other Divine Beasts, who could rival the size of the cities from which they took their names, the Divine Beast Vah Ruta does not wait in the East Reservoir so much as the Divine Beast commands the East Reservoir.

A giant cylindrical torso wider and squatter than that of the Divine Beast Vah Naboris. Four limb-like columns that plunge into the water. Upon the outer surface of the limbs, Link observes waterfalls climbing up instead of down to suck into the main torso of the Divine Beast; it takes her a moment longer notice the translucent material that protects the upwards pull of water. At the shoulder of each limb, Link can see a glowing violet disc, not unlike the Divine Beast Vah Rudania's joints, albeit four instead of six.

She would raise her hand to her head—how long ago did she launch Yunobo into the Divine Beast Vah Rudania's joints?—if not for her arms wrapped around Sidon's neck.

As he begins to swim around the perimeter of the East Reservoir, more of the Divine Beast comes into view. Link notes rectangular panels along its back that could hide cannons, also not unlike the Divine Beast Vah Rudania. Although, where the Divine Beast Vah Rudania consumed molten rock from Death Mountain to compress into its projectiles, the Divine Beast Vah Ruta has nothing at its disposal except for the water of the East Reservoir.

Simply streams of water, perhaps, and not much to worry about. And yet, a stream of water at that high of a pressure could probably rip a hole clean through her torso, too.

No such thing as not much to worry about with the Divine Beasts.

A massive tail upon the Divine Beast's rear end pendulums through the water of the reservoir; somehow that brings Link to grin. At least until she cranes her neck further to gaze upon the Divine Beast's head.

The tail upon its face arches into the sky. From the wide flared tip, the Divine Beast emits an endless torrent of water angled in the sky, the jet so powerful that the stream does not spread apart until it reaches over the dam where the torrent unloads.

The violent violet of the glimmering lights that resemble eyes churns her stomach for the presence of malice. Malice that must once have fought against Mipha. Malice that must once have won.

Malice that must once have taken root inside of her, like the arrow that pierced her shoulder, to which she nearly perished, and which left upon her shoulder a permanent purple whorl. From a few droplets of malice upon an arrowhead.

Link squeezes her arms closer to her body. In the process she nearly chokes Sidon and quickly loosen her grip, apologising a hundredfold while Sidon reassures her.

"Even if you choked me, Link, I would be nothing but grateful! After all, you are Link!" he insists; she loosens her grip yet further.

She focuses instead on the prospect of flinging topaz-tipped arrows into the Divine Beast Vah Ruta.

Link signs into Sidon's throat. "What are we supposed to...do?"

"Ah! But of course, a refresher! To quiet Vah Ruta, you need only apply enough electricity, like lightning!" He beams. "From what scouts have reported, the shoulders of Vah Ruta's legs work the most effectively! They must be pumps to pull the water up, and when disabled, Vah Ruta ceases to rain! So I have heard, though I have only felt models of Her before, and never touched Vah Ruta Herself!"

For lack of the ability to touch her chin, Link stretches herself out to rest her chin against Sidon's neck. That does not quite provide her with the flashes of brilliance of her usual process of thought—for this situation she would require both of her hands and possibly a foot—but nonetheless she considers the Divine Beast.

Even if Link climbed onto Shatterback Point or another tall mountain in the vicinity to glide downwards and attempt to loose arrows at the Divine Beast from afar, the repeated trips up the mountain would take significant time, and the Divine Beast could shoot her from the sky with either the pressure from its facial tail or from the cannons it may or may not possess. And Muzu mentioned requiring many arrows, possibly many more than the two ruby arrows apiece she needed for the Divine Beast Vah Medoh's motors. And-and Link could even not loose two arrows in the course of a sole downwards plunge. And-and-and of course the Divine Beast Vah Ruta could well repair itself in the interim of climbing to the summit.

All that, if the lightning does not strike her. Even if her paraglider has braced against the lightning, the topaz within the rubber has already absorbed much electricity on the way up and she has no means of testing how much more it can withstand.

Sidon's remarks break Link from her perplexed puzzling out.

"By all means, tell me anything with which I could assist! And I will help you posthaste!" He lifts a hand from the water to offer her a thumbs-up. "Anything at all! But of course, our Goddess expects the Champion of Hylia to brave the trial! I did not mean to cast doubt upon your abilities, Link, in which I firmly believe! Yet as you cannot swim and did not accept our hylian armour—"

Link winces. "—allow me to do anything I can in closing the distance between us and She!"

"Could you swim up those waterfalls? The ones that go up its legs?" Link signs. Without the full motion of her arms, she has to spell out more words than usual; to his credit Sidon does not seem to mind.

"The waterfalls up Her legs!?" Sidon echoes. She feels him swim closer to the Divine Beast; Link herself reaches her left arm behind her to keep for the bow and the quiver.

And the topaz rod, still crackling with electricity.

She snaps the fingers of her free hand. The single snap does not satisfy her, and she lets go of Sidon to snap both her hands. Link nearly topples backwards if not for the cord around her waist. Sidon catches her wrists to right her again.

"The waterfalls go into the Divine Beast, don't they?" Link pushes her fingers faster in her haste to explain. "We could use that to enter it!"

"The waterfalls..." Sidon's voice sounds muffled. That, or quieter. She feels him tense. "But of course, you would wish to act most courageously!" He does not skip a beat in his words, yet she can sense a certain something-or-other slithering beneath his tone, like a droplet of dense oil hiding in the bottom of a barrel of water. "Those who lost their faith in our Goddess endeavoured not to wait for the fulfillment of the prophecy, but instead...to attempt to quell Vah Ruta with their own fins! Most...tragically—" Within a second, his timbre has returned to its previous cheer. Link presses her palms against his throat to feel the vibrations. "—the pumps within the Vah Ruta lead directly to Her trunk!" She senses the tremor quake down his arm as of a clenching of a fist. "They were, as all Lanayrish, most brave, and most clever, and most strong!" Another tremor. His throat trembles. She searches for what she could say. She starts to sign out but he barrels on, through the water and through his words. "Yet all of the courage, the wisdom, and the power in the world will only ever lead you astray without faith in Our Goddesses that watch over our world! But I have the utmost faith in you, Link, as the one chosen to fulfill the prophecy!" Sidon swims closer to the Divine Beast. The torrential rain roars in her ears. Link strains to hear him. "And a most clever idea you've had! When we approach, Vah Ruta will defend Herself! I'll swim around Her, and you'll target the shoulders with topaz, yes yes yes!"

Link blinks. From asking to observe, to offering his help, to entirely taking the lead. And yet she trusts him: he knows of Vah Ruta more than she does, and he wants nothing more than to help his people.

Just as she feels him kick himself into a dive, she jerks her arms back. "Take a rice-ball."

"But of course! Most generous of you, Link! Thank you!" Link carefully reaches into her satchel, lifting it up to avoid too much water spilling inside, and a rice-ball pushes against her palm. She reaches past the rice-ball to pat Sarie thank-you on the head.

She presents the rice-ball, flecked with fleet-lotus seeds, to Sidon. He snatches it from her hand; his teeth graze against her palm. The cool water stings in the thin cuts raked into her skin. Sarie presses another rice-ball into her hand; Link wolfs it down in one bite. Rushroom and violet, fleet-lotus and carrot, rice and the coppery tang of her blood.

Closing the satchel, she faces the Divine Beast Vah Ruta.

Link retrieves the bow given to her by Amali, and in her grip she holds a prayer for Amali and for Kass, Teba and Saki, Tulin and Genli, Kotts and Notts, Cree and Kheel, the healers who aided her, all of the residents of Medli and of Tabantha. And Dorian, and Cottla, and Koko, safe under Amali's wings.

She retrieves the topaz arrows, and in her grip she holds a prayer for those of Ruto and of Lanayru. The lightning coursing with her blood nimbles her hands and defts her fingers.

Sidon closes the gap. Link lifts herself up—keeping herself upright by the cord around her waist.
and the pressure of her legs around Sidon's back, her thighs already aching from the tension—and strings the bow.

With the heavy quiver on her back, she has plenty of arrows. Yet, if the Divine Beast's joints take multiple arrows, she need exercise temperance.

Nodding sagely to herself, Link immediately looses the first arrow.

It arcs towards the Divine Beast, but the rain slows its motion. It falls into the dark mirror of the lake. She watches its descent as she flitches another arrow from the quiver.

The arrows smell vaguely of sweat, and a bit like horses.

Sidon diving into the water snaps her from her reflection on the scent of the topaz arrows. He twists up to skid more swiftly along the surface of the water. The up and down motion leads Link to bite her tongue and compress her thighs. By instinct, she reaches a hand to scritch Sidon behind the ear as if calming a runaway horse. When she comes aware of her actions, she retracts her arm and very busily returns to taking aim with the arrow.

Narrowing her eyes, Link concentrates on the Divine Beast Vah Ruta spannign across the fullness of the heavens above. She can see nothing but its wide torso, its right side visible to her, its terrible head just now coming into view with a single violet eye staring out into the infinite abyss. The water-pumping joints of its limbs turn with audible clicks to keep the flow steady. This close, she listens the grinding of the machinery within the Divine Beast, the moaning of the gears and the slithering of the ropes, even over the endless drumming of the rain.

She looses another arrow at an upwards-tilted angle. Link observes the shaft curve through the air. The rain pushes it down but the correction to her aim sings the arrowhead true into the joint.

The arrow bounces off of the golden-brown material and into the water.

"Link!" Sidon calls out. "This should be close enough for you to make your attack! I believe in you! I know that you yourself must have the faith, but if you ever for a moment fear, believe in our Goddess, for She has chosen you, and She believes in you just as much as I do!"

The third arrow meets the same fate as the second.

Link removes her trusty red telescope from its loop around her belt. Through the water slicking the lens, she peers at the joint. While those of the Divine Beast Vah Medoh had wiring open to the chill of the heavens to cool the hot-running fans, these pumps have the protection of closed domes. And she has no goron to launch himself and crack them open with his own weight.

Sidon urges her to loose arrows, to send the Divine Beast into shock, but no matter where she aims them, Link finds no openings. No matter where—not only at the joints, but at the waterfalls that draw up water, at the eyes as Sidon curves under the Divine Beast's face, at the trunk—the Divine Beast does not yield. The arrows bounce harmlessly off into the reservoir. Even when she pokes her tongue out of her mouth to provide an extra boost in her focus—like Aryll would have, or Riju—she cannot spot a lick of weakness.

She replaces the bow onto her back. As if on cue, Sidon swims away from the Divine Beast. "She has not yet defended Herself from us, has She!" he notes. "Is that why you are not attacking?"

"I don't think the Divine Beast needs to defend itself." Link bites her lower lip. "How did they calm the Divine Beast before?"
"Muzu suggested that we should use topaz arrows for just the occasion!" Sidon responds with a certain confidence, almost fractured at the corners. "There must be something that we—that I don't understand! Not that you have misunderstood! I would never insult you like that, Link!"

"It's not an insult..." With her right arm hooked around Sidon's neck, Link touches her chin with her left before returning to sign at his throat. "Are you sure we can't go through the pumps?"

"Please trust me! I would never wish to discount your most wise plans, Link, but I myself have—I myself have witnessed what happens! Please."

The plea catches her off-guard; she hugs him. Since she is already clinging to him to avoid falling off, Link does not know if Sidon can sense the difference of her embrace. She could remain silent, pray that he reads her, but—the deep brown of Riju's eyes bubbles up in her memory. Link tells him directly: 'I'm sorry. I can't do anything but hug you right now, but I promise I'll cook you something later.'

The realest comfort she can provide.

When Sidon chuckles into laughter, she feels the vibrations up his body resonating her own and drawing a laugh from her lips. "But of course, your first thought would be that of food! Link, you are unlike any Champion of Hylia I would have expected! I do not intend to insult you! By our Goddess, you have the courage, the wisdom, the power, and the faith to transform this entire world!" Sidon's teeth glimmer despite having no source of light save for the dark violet radiating from the Divine Beast. Nonetheless, his teeth sparkle and shine. "When I have witnessed you quell the maelstrom I would be most honoured beyond honour to partake of your cooking!"

A promise. Link nods to him, and he to her.

"Let me try the pumps. I won't put myself in them, but I'll try to aim the topaz arrows there. If we can get the topaz inside, I think we could shock the Divine Beast from the inside out."

Sidon reaches back to clap her between the shoulder blades. At the awkward angle, he manages to smack the back of her head instead, and she pitches forward to bonk her forehead against his neck.

"Most cunning! We'll try that straightaway! Be careful, and here we go! Remember that I believe in you! Never give up! Have faith in yourself and in your abilities!" Sidon goes on while Link bobs her head and feels her wet ponytail slap against her neck. By the time he finishes, Link has nearly dozed off against his back. Something prods her in the rib; she glances down to see Sarie offering her another rice-ball which she takes. The deliciousness energises her. That, and also the ingredients containing the essence of going fast.

She hands Sidon a rice-ball. "Bring me as close as you can. Depending on how far down the pumps extend I'm sure I'll figure out a way."

They begin the dive towards the Divine Beast Vah Ruta once more. Link relaxes against Sidon: unlike the Divine Beast Vah Rudania with its projectiles, or the Divine Beast Vah Medoh with its fire-light, or the Divine Beast Vah Naboris with its dust and lightning, the Divine Beast Vah Ruta merely stands in the water pouring water out of the face on its tail. Out of its trunk, as Sidon said.

Mostly harmless, at least to her and Sidon.

Mostly harmless.

And then—abruptly—the panels on the back of the Divine Beast Vah Ruta slide open to reveal long muzzles of cannons, and Link almost strangles Sidon.
The four cannons on the Divine Beast's left side—the side nearest Sidon and Link—expel massive columns of pure glittering ice. For a second of clarity, Link studies them glide through the air, shimmering iridescently. Then she comprehends that the blocks of ice fan out in a pattern in the same direction that Sidon swims.

The Divine Beast, by chance or by design, tracks his movements.

Link flaps her hands for a moment before she remembers that she, too, exists.

She whips out her bow to defend them with her first course of action: topaz arrows. The impact of the electricity shatters the blocks of ice into shards that plop into the water and hiss into gas. Sidon shouts something about having warned her of the Divine Beast's icy defence; Link could keep herself from dessert for a month for not having paid attention to the kernels of truth between Sidon's words of praise and belief.

The Divine Beast fires—ices?—another round. She cracks them down. Some pieces require several arrows and before long she—alarmingly—can feel the quiver beginning to thin out. Sidon continues to approach.

She has, she understands, no means of communication to Sidon, not even some crude method to tell him to swim to safety. Not with her hands occupied by the bow that prevents the ice from crushing them.

Sidon skims forward in diagonal lines zig-zagging closer and closer to the Divine Beast. Each time the cannons shoot out another round of four, he changes direction. She knows not if he discerns their direction by sound or if he merely switches randomly. Link has no choice but to put her utmost faith in him, to believe in he who—perhaps, or perhaps not—believes in her.

Each round forces Sidon slightly back. The ice comes more and more speedily now. Even if she runs out of arrows, she has the topaz rod looped into her belt.

She runs out of arrows.

Link looses the final arrow into a column of ice as Sidon closes the gap to twenty metres, to fifteen, to ten.

When the Divine Beast Vah Ruta launches another round, her hand closes around the slate at her right hip and the telescope at her left. She will not let a block of ice end her journey, or the journey of the slate that she has borne with her since before she could even clothe her naked form.

A block of ice cream, perhaps, snow mixed with the juices of fruit, a slush that melts in icy flavour on her tongue.

But not a block of ice, and not taking other lives with her.

The telescope may not assist her, but her gaze bores into the runes of the slate. The blue, the other blue, the red, the yellow, the light blue, the green. Light blue. The snowflake.

The blocks of ice identical to the columns frozen by the slate. The blocks of ice that Link has used as shields to fire-light, as stepping stones across a flooded Divine Beast, as a path through the very bowels of flame. And if she can break her own columns of ice, then maybe, just maybe—

Link lifts the slate to the heavens.

In the window of the slate, the ice glimmers red.
She whoops for the joys of the world that have culminated in this very moment, in the realisation that she never had to loose a single arrow, in the comprehension that the Divine Beast Vah Ruta can do to them no harm. Raising the slate higher, Link jabs her finger onto the cryonis rune.

The block shatters into a thousand fragments that melt into rain.

The rest of the blocks from the round meet a similar fate. Shatter, shatter, shatter, the only question one of how swiftly she may move her arm, take aim, and tap the block.

The satisfaction of breaking through a row of four blocks in as many seconds could rival that of a fresh bowl of rice.

Link touches her chin.

No, no it couldn't. But the breaking through a row of four blocks in as many seconds does bring its own satisfaction.

She cranes her neck up to start aiming at blocks directly overhead just as Sidon swims under the Divine Beast. As suddenly as a bolt of lightning, Link feels lighter, her skin more whole. The rain. Or rather, the lack thereof: beneath the belly of the beast, the rain no longer patters against her flesh. She closes her eyes to indulge in sweet release.

A release that bitters to reality when Sidon grunts. The downpour has not ceased even if she has momentarily found shelter.

Link listens to Sidon panting.

"Forgive me, Link! I need a moment's breath! Then we will take to the pumps!"

Link leans over to sign into his throat with the slate still in her hand. "Take all the time you need. It'll be all right." Words of comfort. Words of comfort that she could never have spoken.

Somehow the ice around her fingers has cracked alongside the columns spewed out by the Divine Beast. Maybe she aimed the slate at her own hands without noticing. "You aren't slowing me down, Sidon. If it weren't for you, I never could have gotten this far. We'll do it together."

"You're—you're much too kind to me, Link!" Sidon gasps out. The constant push of the rice-balls must have taken its toll on him, and Link pats his head; her palm comes away bloody. "Most kind! Thank you for believing in me! I should hope that I may one day attain even a fraction of your heroism!"

"Catch your breath. Then we'll try to calm the Divine Beast."

No topaz arrows. But she has the rod.

Her fingers hook into an empty loop. She khhhs a noise of surprise.

Link pats herself down.

Nothing.

The rod has gone the way of missing socks: into the abyss.

She hears—faintly, as though through the burble of water,—Sidon asking if she's all right. She hears—strongly, as though migrated into the centre of her skull between the eyes—the slow thumping of her own heart.

Link stares blankly ahead. The four scars in a row and the fifth slightly offset in her lower belly throb. Useless. Useless. She has come so far. And now without arrows. Now without the topaz rod. Now without anything that she could use to calm the Divine Beast Vah Ruta. Sidon will take her back and she will have to uncover another path. Yet she has taken all of the topaz arrows from the lynel's corpse.

No more.

She stares blankly ahead.

She stares blankly ahead and her gaze drifts to her right hand.

The slate in her right hand.

The slate.

The slate. The slate that she holds in her own hand, and the runes across. Magnesis, and bombs, and stasis, and cryonis, and the pictobox, and magnesis.

"Sidon," she signs into his throat as rapidly as she can, her heart thudding into her temples, "didn't Muzu say that lightning calmed the Divine Beast?"

Sidon nods decisively. "But of course! That's exactly why we are here! Our scouts, most courageous and noble, determined that whenever lightning struck Vah Ruta, Her downpour stopped for a short while! That is precisely why we have brought the topaz arrows!"

The topaz arrows. Not enough electricity at once. Yet an entire bolt of lightning at once—yet an entire bolt of lightning at once could quell the Divine Beast for long enough that Sidon and Link could activate the terminals.

"Sidon, when we go back out there, you're going to have to dodge the ice yourself for a few minutes."

"Link!?" For the first time since she first met Sidon upon the bridge, all grins and speeches of trials, Link detects a note of fear in his voice, a note that sends the hairs on the back of her neck standing on end. "I don't know if I—!

"I know what I have to do. You can do anything you want but keep me in the Divine Beast's vicinity. Please, trust me." As Sidon pleaded with her, so she with him: "Please."

Link reaches to her back. To her old friend. Her trusted companion. Her bright star.

The cooking pot. The cooking pot that she has carried with her since the Great Plateau, upon whose help she might once again call.

"I'm ready whenever you are," she tells Sidon.

Unstrapping it from her back, Link lifts the pot with magnesis. He shifts beneath her.

"Our Goddess," murmurs Sidon, so low that Link would have missed his words if not for the movement of his body while he speaks, "I need more than ever Your faith." He straightens himself. "Come, Link! I believe in you and whatever most crafty plan you have! With our Goddess at your side you shall not fail! You shall not fail, Link! You shall bring us to the peaceful future promised by our Goddess!

Before she can respond, Sidon lunges forward into the water. Link keeps the cooking pot steady, keeps the bounds of magnesis steady, keeps the slate steady.

The curtain of rain falls upon her again.

Her fingers slip over the surface of the slate with the water that slicks its face while she manoeuvres the cooking pot far above her, towards the clouds of grey that swirl overhead. Amid the rain, Link watches lightning streak from cloud to cloud overhead.

She need only call it down.

O Din, for the fire bottled in the lightning. O Nayru, for the water of the rainclouds. O Farore, for the wind that guides the maelstrom.

O her cooking pot, for her life that depends upon it.

As Sidon skirts away from the Divine Beast, Link hears the groan of the panels upon its back once more opening. She listens to the all-too-familiar chunking noise of water freezing into columns, the same noise as the cryonis rune of her slate.

The further Sidon swims from the Divine Beast the more easily, Link observes, he can dodge the columns racing towards them. Nearly by instinct she shatters the wave with cryonis. But then she turns the ice blocks aside. Her world narrows entirely to the slate in her hand and her beloved cooking pot suspended in the air above the Divine Beast. The magnesis does not quite reach. The fingers of her left hand clinging to the slate tightly enough the edges leave groove in her flesh, Link signs with her right, painstakingly tracing out characters into his throat: "You...need to...get closer."

"...I shall do my best!" Sidon yells back. Though he beams at her, she can sense the tremble down his spine: the Divine Beast spews another wave of ice blocks. Sidon jerks left and right through the water, erratically spritzing forward or rolling himself back. The columns of ice spear the waters around them.

Link focuses on the cooking pot. On forcing the magnesis as far as the rune will go. On making contact between the metal and the back of the Divine Beast. On grinding the cooking pot up. On praying for lightning to strike.

A sudden lurch against her underside knocks her elbow into Sidon's back and flings her arm to the side. She hears the pop of the magnesis failing. Link stares at the cooking pot suspended in the storm, hovering hovering, and then beginning to fall.

A column of ice slams the water not an arm's-length from where Sidon dodged.

Desperation hastens her muscles even more than the rice-balls. Link raises the slate back up to catch the cooking pot in the air yet it dives too rapidly for her to—

—she snaps the cord with a twist of her spine and throws herself into the chill of the lake. Her clothes billow around her. Sidon screams her name. The cooking pot thuds into the water so close that the wave nearly knocks her backwards. Link kicks herself forward. Her fingers brush metal.

Without its lid, the cooking pot has begun to sink, but Link wraps her arms around it. Its weight pulls her down. The muscles on her back ache with her efforts to keep herself from slipping under. She can barely move her aching legs. Water ices over her bones; her eyelids lower of their own accord. But she fights. With the slate in her left hand and her right arm hooked around the pot, she boops the magnesis rune with her nose. She misses; a cubic bomb apparetes in the water by the slate. Link ogles the explosive.

She boops the slate again, praying that she does not blow herself up, and she listens to the song of the cooking pot magnetised.

Waves splash over her face. Link inhales fluid. Her lungs burn. She keeps her left hand up despite the dull throbbing in her arm and the increasing numbness in her fingers. Her skin clams over. The cooking pot soars through the heavens towards the Divine Beast. She lifts her arm still higher with its lightning-strike scars.

Once more the cooking pot brushes against the Divine Beast Vah Ruta's back. She tracks the cooking pot to keep it as close to the Divine Beast and as high in the sky as she can.

Then, suddenly, she no longer feels the rain over her skin. Link angles her chin up.

Above her, she gazes at the iridescent shimmer of the last thing she may ever see: a pillar of ice directly overhead.

And then something whacks into her from behind.

Sidon.

Sidon who picks her up in her arms amid the columns of ice that crash around them. Sidon who grins at her and presses a thumbs-up against her side. Sidon who calls to her: "You can do it, Link! Quell the storm! I believe in you!"

Link quells the storm.

The lightning streaks down from the heavens like the arm of the Goddess, Her fingers stretched out to touch the cooking pot, and with it, to touch Link's stomach, and with that, to touch Link's heart.

The quickest way to someone's heart, after all, is through her stomach.

The lightning paints the skies and seas alike in white. A brilliant flash of Mipha's silver.

Link senses her own smile in that heart's beat of lightning, in that silvery shine that continues to glow even after the sound of thunder has faded.

Abruptly her ears close in, plugged with water.

She hears nothing at all but the sound of her own heart.

No.

She has not gone deaf: the torrent, the relentless torrent of pressurised water spewing from the Divine Beast Vah Ruta's trunk, has lessened to a drip, and then to complete and utter silence.

The pumps halt in their churning. The waterfalls along its legs splash back into the water.

The Divine Beast's limbs groan. The joints bend. The legs crash into the water. The tidal wave pushes Sidon and Link backwards at once. Link gasps. Water floods her mouth; the inner walls of her lungs sear like she had shoved a ruby rod down her throat. Just when her throat collapses on itself, she feels his powerful hands plunging down on her chest. Her lungs compress. The water jets from her mouth, and Link pictures herself the Divine Beast, albeit lacking a tail extending from her face.
A trunk.

The image spills mirth from her mouth. Sidon grins; his teeth catch the light. "I knew you could do it! Thank you! Thank you! A thousand times, thank you! I could thank you more times than there are droplets in the seas and still I would never thank you enough!"

The Divine Beast Vah Ruta lies in the water with the top of its back less than a metre from the surface of the East Reservoir. While Link giggles her head off, Sidon swims them—his arms supporting Link, one hand between her shoulder blades and one under her knees—towards the Divine Beast.

Suddenly they hurtle through the air. Link yells before she comprehends that Sidon has dolphin-leaped from the water to land feet-flat on the back of the Divine Beast.

Limply she spills from his embrace and noodles to the floor. Raindrops dribble down through her hair; she lies face-down, burbling her breaths through the water. Though the torrent has ceased from the Divine Beast's trunk, the rain overhead has yet to quell. A thin layer of water covers the Divine Beast's back, kept inwards by the walls that surround the rim of the flat. Yet her transformation into a hylian-shaped mass of chuchu jelly does not last long: Link spots the cooking pot lying innocently in the centre of the back of the Divine Beast.

And the entrance terminal down the line of the spine, similar to the Divine Beast Vah Rudania and the Divine Beast Vah Medoh.

But more importantly: her cooking pot.

Link pelts forward to tackle her cooking pot. Embracing the pot, she lets momentum carry her forward to roll until she bonks her forehead against the terminal. She jumps to her feet, clinks the heels of her boots together, and spins around with her beloved cooking pot. The metal has blackened and charred from the lightning, but the pot remains whole.

She catches her breath on the walk back to where Sidon stands, his expression trapped halfway between his usual beam of encouragement and a drawn brow of confusion. Link lifts her palms up to the skies.

When she first entered Kakariko, Link raised her hand to catch the stars so far above her that she could only pool their light in her palm. Now she catches the rain that she can feel on her skin.

She hears a splash. Not to her right where stands Sidon, but somewhere behind her. She swivels about on her heel.

The Goddesses answer her prayers so miraculously that she begins to laugh then and there.

To Link's delight, fish of every sort splish in the shallow water. She giggles as she drops her belongings on the ground and picks up her cooking pot. Running across the back of the Divine Beast, she uses her hands to scoop fish into the pot. A bass slaps her across the face with its tail, and she only laughs harder. An enraged carp does the same, and the mighty blow knocks her onto her back in the water. Fish fly from the cooking pot and into her face. Leaping to her feet, Link gathers them up again. The carp attempts to whack her a second time; she catches its tail with her bare hand.

Her palm cries out in pain, but her stomach cries out louder.

Slender trout that ice over her fingers. Crabs as well, small and white and scuttly. Snails that glow a fine gold under her fingertips as if filled with fireflies. She tosses them all indiscriminately into her pot.

Link returns, panting, to Sidon.

She thuds the pot down and seats herself cross-legged beside it.

"Link!?" asks Sidon, the concern palpable through his usual cheer. "What's going on!?

Link thumps her palm against her forehead. She rises from her seat on the back of the Divine Beast to elaborate to Sidon on what all has happened. Sarie pokes their head out from the flap of the satchel, Link waves to them prior to continuing her explanation of picking up the fish and preparing food.

"A meal?" Sidon repeats. He pauses. "But of course! Truly, we could never have accomplished the quelling of the storm without your rice-balls!" Link tilts her head to the ice. Raising her cooking pot into the air with magnesis does not appear to require much speed. Yet the rice-balls did give her a reason to continue on when the world looked set against her efforts.

And ultimately her cooking pot has saved her yet again. She pats the pot with her left hand. Good pot, best friend.

"Most wise of you, Link! As expected of you!" Sidon attempts to clap her on the shoulder and misses. She catches his hand instead, placing it on her shoulder. He slides it over to rest between her shoulder blades. "My apologies, Link! I am more used to navigating by water! But never mind myself! I cannot wait to see the most delicious and most useful meal you intend to grace me with next!"

Link snorts out a laugh again, covering her nose and mouth with her hand as she giggles to herself. Something useful to the Divine Beast, not at all. But something tasty? She sure hopes so.

She touches her chin. Link has no manner of cooking the fish without wood or Riju's handy-dandy ruby grill.

Nonetheless, she does find topaz arrows: a few scattered shafts lying in the shallow water, misses from her earlier efforts to pierce the pumps. And hands. And, while she lacks lime or lemon, that has never stopped her before.

Grabbing a topaz arrow from her the water, Link thrusts it into the air, grins at herself, and—letting out a whoop of courage-reckless-joy—plunges the arrow into the cooking pot hard enough to fragments the prongs against the metallic base.

When she finds herself convulsing in the water, her laughter buzzes in and out with the seizing of her lungs. Perhaps sticking her bare hand into a metal pot of water with topaz in her palm has not comprised her most intelligent plan to date.

And yet the electricity has fulfilled its purpose and the fish, crabs, and snails lie waiting for preparation.

The chillfin trout keeps the remainder of the seafood cold by exhuming its icy blood, perfect for ceviche. Link guides Sidon through the process of skinning the fresh fish; removing the darker, redder meat of the bloodline; and draining blood to wash away as much possible of that oily, fishy taste in favour of the crisp tang of lighter flesh. While Sidon prepares the bass, carp, and trout—Link gives the mighty carp a look, despite its still form lacking the ability to smack Sidon across the face—Link turns her attention to the snail and crab, to similarly let flow the blood, remove the shells, and clean off the meat. She sets Sidon to dicing the fish as finely as he can while she prepares a makeshift marinade of the ingredients she has on hand. Certainly not her most brilliant use of the contents of her satchel, particularly without a lick of vinegar or citric juice to her name, yet she makes do.

Link lets the ceviche soak in the juices. She asks Sidon if he knows any songs to marinate fish by. He clears his throat. "I do not sing well! But for you, I would try anything!" Before she can assure him that he need not force himself, he belts out a tune. And out of tune. He sings a song of a zora girl who trades this for that: a clock for a letter, a letter for a scented satchel, a scented satchel for a bone of gourmet meat—Link bobs her head approvingly and wipes the saliva from her mouth—a bone of gourmet meat for a dog-like mask—Link shakes her head and crosses her arms over her chest—a dog-like mask for a set of weights, a set of weights for another zora's own tail, another zora's own tail for a jest, a jest for a book, a book for an oar, an oar for a lyre, a lyre for a broken trident, and a broken trident for a trident made whole, and a trident made whole for a clock. "And all this for a clock, a clock!" Sidon sings out in his warbling voice. "And all this for such a great shock! And all this for a clock!"

No matter how his timbre glides in and out of the octaves like the song itself were a slippery fish he could not keep within his hands, the enthusiasm with which he pours out the music keeps Link's attention rapt until the ceviche has finished its vacation in the juices.

They eat straight from the pot with their bare hands. Sidon scoops up raw fish, and crab, and snail; the webbing of his fingers allows him cradle the ceviche within the juices. Link tries to lace her fingers together, yet the juice tragically drips out. She sniffs.

Sidon offers her his hands to eat out of, juice and all, and she hugs him in response. The ceviche marinated in juice: the tangy freshness of the bass, the tingly refreshing chill of the trout, the subtle notes of sourness and sweetness of the snail that could crawl beneath the remainder of the fishy flavour if not for her experienced and worldly sense of taste, the energising savoriness of the crab, the strong kick of the carp that feels like a literal kick to the roof of the mouth, in the best and most delicious way possible.

Without all of the ingredients she would have needed, the ceviche does not quite reach the same high mark as the other meals she has prepared. Link leans towards Sidon. She raises her eyebrows. "How do you like it?" she asks, and she settles her hands on her knees, and she waits.

Sidon swallows before he answers. His teeth glitter. He swings his hands up and juices spray over her, though with their rich taste she cannot say that she minds. "As expected of you, Link, it's delicious! The best whatever-this-is I've ever had!"

She hangs her head.

Someday Link will extract honesty from him about her meals. But perhaps he does enjoy the tasty buffet of such variety, copious seafood all in one.

At least she does.

She reaches into her satchel for a vial of spring green elixir and in the process remembers to offer Sarie the ceviche, but Sarie contents themself with attempting to fit their entire head into the empty vial. While Link giggles to herself she returns to the ceviche.

Ceviche.

Ceviche like this, but properly in lime and lemon. With greengill and Ordon catfish fished from the river, and sometimes other fish brought up in boats. Sanke carp from Necluda or chillfin trout from Lanayru. Once a year a barge from villages like Papuchia and Lurelin loaded with Hebric sapphire would push through the river, the boat so wide that it could scarcely fit in the banks.

"We've got all sorts from the ocean!" the Faronese vendors hawked. "Ambrosial amberjack and neptoona! Skippyjack and goodta goby! Hyrule seabass and loovar! And even that miraculous swordfish! Rusty and grand! Come get your ocean fish! Ocean fish!"

Ceviche like this, that she prepared for the girl who smelled of horses. The girl who smelled of horses, with her curled golden-brown hair and her inquisitive green eyes that reminded Link both of the gentle gaze of the horses she so loves and of the sharp glance of a crow faced with a puzzle to solve in exchange for a meal. The girl who smelled of horses, who could not leave Ordon herself, least not the province of Ordona, who could not never come to Lanayru, who could never come to Ruto, who could never sit at the silvery-grey counter with Link while she mixed drinks and cooked meals.

But Link could bring Ruto to her.

Hearty bass and razorclaw crab. Sneaky river snail and armoured carp. Mighty porgy and chickaloo tree nuts. The latter would not go into the ceviche, but Link and the girl who smelled of horses would giggle as they tossed roasted nuts at one another to try to catch them in their mouths while they waited for the fish to marinate.

Along with the Papuchia and Lurelin fishers, every once in a while a parade of Lanayrish would pass through, not with fish to sell to the Ordoners, but en route to meetings of delegation in Eldin or on return groups to Lanayru.

Almost every year Link and the girl who smelled of horses—and later Aryll, sitting on the shoulders of the girl who smelled of horses, who stood taller than Link and thus provided a better perch, and who did not much mind Aryll beating her tiny fists into her head—would see Mipha on the barge. Link knew little of what Mipha did when not hanging near Link's bed or assisting Link in making her deliveries in the massive city of Ruto that would otherwise have long since brought Link to jump off of the nearest waterfall. Perhaps Mipha served as a translator, for she knew enough Akkalan to have spoken to Link the first time they met.

Akkalan.

Link ponders over a mouthful of ceviche. Not Necludan, but Akkalan...? She must have misremembered.

She fears what else she might misremember.

She remembers—or perhaps misremembers—that she did not know much of Mipha.

Link did not learn of Mipha, Princess of Lanayru, until after she had drawn the sword from the stone, until after she had come to Ruto to train in the art of the spear with Mipha's trident, until after she had found herself tripping over the throne pool for the first time to flabbergast herself in front of the King Zora, to see the tiny red zora child who hid behind the King Zora whom Mipha referred to as her younger sister, to recognise the green zora who stood next to the King Zora and gazed at Link with narrowed eyes.

Muzu. Muzu who looked much younger then, as the King Zora looked much smaller.

But Muzu, who already distrusted Link all those years ago. Who had already regarded her as having stolen Mipha away from them. Who had already long decided that Link would forever serve on his list of those from whom he would never accept a meal.

She did not know, and she does not know, if that is how Muzu thinks, but that is how she thinks.
The worst of the worst of the worst.

And yet, despite this distrust, Muzu guided her through the topaz arrows, shown her to the lynel, told her to calm the Divine Beast. Muzu must have changed his opinions after all. Link smiles into the ceviche and lets her thoughts drift back through the fog to her life in Ordon, to before she knew of Mipha as the Princess of Lanayru and to when she only knew Mipha as the girl with the sharks' teeth and the kind smile, to a ceviche made by Mipha's hands.

Less than a month before Mipha told Link that they had chosen her as the Champion of Zola, the Hero of Lanayru, the Divine Beast Vah Ruta's Pilot, O Wise Mipha. In those days they did not yet have names for the Divine Beasts, not before the girl with the golden hair made her suggestions that eventually took root for they needed something else to call the Divine Beasts beyond "the big bird" and "the big lizard" and for—at least, in Link's opinion—the girl with the golden hair provided names useful, and memorable, and which suited the Divine Beasts. She does not remember what Mipha called the Divine Beast Vah Ruta. But she does remember the ceviche that Mipha made, that final year on the barge.

Never before had Mipha stepped off the boat, save for when she had fished Link from the water with the lure of rice-balls. Never before had Mipha walked the streets of Ordon. Never before had a cold webbed hand glided over her forehead and awoken Link in the middle of the night, so abruptly that she shot herself forward and yelped loudly enough to wake Aryll.

Mipha shushed her. Apologising for the intrusion, she whispered into Link's ears the purpose behind her visit: for once she had stolen away from the barge, which had stopped overnight to invite a village further up the river to taste of the bounty of Lanayru, to meet this girl who smelled of horses of whom Link had so often spoken, to see the Ordon and the lovely family that had brought forth such a kind and gentle—girl, Link thinks, swallowing down a handful of ceviche and its juices from Sidon's palms.

Family.

Link hushed Aryll in her arms for fear of her sister's cries awakening other occupants in the house.
She took Aryll with her; her little sister fell back asleep in her arms. With Mipha in tow, Link sneaked out through her window. She and Mipha crept through Ordon to the house in the heart of the village, so that Link could show Mipha to her family.

Her real family.

As she had done so many times before, she rapped on the window of the girl who smelled of horses, and the girl who smelled of horses rappelled out on a ladder made of her bedsheets strung together. Link saved the introduction for when the trio had made the walk to the ranch where they could speak in the safety of the warmth of hay and the smell of goats and horses around them.

While Aryll snoozed in her arms, Link introduced Mipha to the girl who smelled of horses, and the girl who smelled of horses to Mipha. When the girl who smelled of horses spoke of Link, Mipha inquired in confusion of whom the girl who smelled of horses meant.

"Did you mean—" A piece of ceviche catches in Link's throat, and she coughs it out, to Sidon's concern. " —sister?" Mipha asked.
Link could have drowned herself in the river then and there.

The shape of the words that Link signed quietly into the girl who smelled of horses's back choked her lungs with acid and shocked her heart to ice. The girl who smelled of horses looked back at her, to apologise, to avoid referring to Link at all in the future except in the vaguest of terms.

Mipha smiled in her ignorance. She brought out an ice-box stuffed with Lanayrish fish that made Link and the girl who smelled of horses's mouths water all the same. Link wiped her mouth on the back of her hand.

The girl who smelled of horses met her gaze, nodded once, and turned to Mipha.

The girl who smelled of horses had for Mipha more questions than Link could keep track of. She kept Mipha occupied while Link made ceviche to indulge in the freshest Lanayrish flavours she could bring to the girl who smelled of horses.

Link had tasted such foodstuffs before, but not the girl who smelled of horses. And what could make for a better meal than the communing of an entire world within the loop of a cooking pot?

The girl who tasted of horses wept at the taste of the ceviche. Mipha—just for a second—grinned. Aryll stirred in Link's embrace and Link patted her sister on the head.

The conversation wound down. The coming dawn woke the horses. Mipha pulled Link aside while the girl who smelled of horses played peekaboo with Aryll.

"My Link," Mipha whispered to her, "when you next come back to Ruto, I might...I might have perhaps found a way to swim in a different river."

Link tilted her head to the side, yet Mipha said nothing more but merely hugged her, carefully enough that her scales left not a trace of a wound on Link's skin.

When Mipha left with the morning crow of the cucco, the girl who smelled of horses stayed with Link, embracing her in the pile of hay for the few moments that they had before Link would have to return to that house to start packing for her next courier trip and the girl who smelled of horses would have to sneak into her room once more.

"I love you," signed the girl who smelled of horses, "and thank you for letting me meet Mipha, and...Link. Link. I know you're afraid of telling people, but...thank you for having told me. I'm here for you. No matter what."

Link nodded. She said nothing—like Mipha had said nothing—but she curled her arms around the girl who smelled of horses as if trying to encompass all of her at once, shoulder to shoulder and hip to hip, Link's cheek against hers, Link's chin on her collarbone, Link's arms curved up with her elbows against her ribs, Link's knees tucked inwards to ball her body against against the girl who smelled of horses's torso.

She said nothing, but she wanted to ask the girl who smelled of horses to never, ever leave.

Then they had to disentangle themselves, and Link carried a slumbering Aryll back to the house, and the girl who smelled of horses promised to see her later at Rusl's if she could slip away from her father's watchful gaze, and Link looked forward to the orders she would pick up today and the trek that she would again undertake.

The girl who smelled of horses.
The name, the name, the name.

The name that must await her in Ordon.

Link opens her eyes. Sarie has failed to stuff their head in the vial and instead has stuck their arm through. They make gentle pew noises as though pretending their hand were one of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania's cannons.

She laughs lightly, and she takes another handful of ceviche to wash down the bittersweetness left behind by her memories. Like a side dish. Or a paired liquor.

When they leave nothing of the makeshift ceviche but a layer of fishy slime coalescing at the bottom of the cooking pot, Link lies back in the water with her hand on her stomach. She gazes up at the clouds that have begun to part, at the silvery moonlight that shimmers through. The moon. Full as ripened fruit. The stars. Like fleet-lotus seeds or grains of rice.

She lifts herself. She taps her right boot against the back of the Divine Beast Vah Ruta. She touches Sidon's wrist.

"Let's go, Sidon. Let's calm the Divine Beast."

Link hears Sidon's breathing, in and out, and the flap of his gills along his torso.

"O Champion of Hylia, O Hero of Hyrule...O Courageous Link." He does not shout out the words with his usual vim and vigour. Her fingers shiver against his palms. "It is you who must yourself cleanse Vah Ruta of the Malice that has taken hold within Her. As the Champion of Hylia...by the prophecy passed down by our Goddess these ten thousand years...you must undertake the journey...alone." His hands curl inwards to fist. He relaxes his arms against his sides, yet still his knuckles twitch. "We can only stand by and watch to await our saviour, O Champion of Hylia. But I believe in you! You can do it! With the prophecy and our Goddess at your sides, you need not fear! With courage, wisdom, power, and the faith of our Goddess, you can achieve anything!"

Link inhales through her nose and exhales through her mouth with a resounding huff. She gives her hands three seconds of rest, and then she speaks. "Sidon. I could never have calmed any of the Divine Beasts without the help of others, and I can't do it alone. I don't know much about the prophecy, or about the Goddess Zola, so I'm sorry. And I'm not saying this because I don't believe in myself. If you want to call me the Champion of Hylia, then that's how you see me. But I also think that we should work together. Not just you and me, but anyone else who could help. That's the only way that any of the Divine Beasts could be calmed."

She squeezes his hands in hers.

"If I'm the Champion of Hylia, then won't you be the Champion of Zola, Sidon?"

He starts to shake his head, and Link can feel the familiar ice beginning to frost her fingers, but she pushes on. She forces herself to. She clings to the thread of hope.

Link has never found the words but if she tries to cook enough times then surely she'll happen upon the right recipe.

"It's like..." She fishes out an analogy from the waters of the lake. "...ceviche. It's like ceviche! I've made this ceviche, and we can eat it, but it'd be even better if I'd been able to make marinade. Trying to tackle the Divine Beast alone is like fish without marinade. But with marinade—with you—only then is the ceviche complete."
"...so if I'm the raw fish, then won't be the marinade, Sidon?" She pauses and reaches up to touch her chin. "Though I guess you'd be more suitable for the raw fish. Not that I'd want to cook you! You're not a fish, like how rito aren't birds, or I'm not a monkey. Though I do like bananas. Though I'm not supposed to eat bananas that much...since that's what Marin's mothers told me." She claps her hand against her brow. "Oh but you don't who they are! They're amazing and I wish I could get you to meet them! Marin's mothers, I mean. Not the bananas. Though if you don't know what bananas are I hope I can get you to meet some too!" Link stops again, coughs, and reins herself in. "S-so won't you be the raw fish to my marinade? But then again I wouldn't make a very tasty marinade either..."

She glances up at him. His grin has given way to the tiniest of smiles, a smile that she has seen before. Not the tiny smile that Mipha would present to others in her efforts to shrink herself down to a palatable size. A smile that stretches his mouth from ear to ear. Yet the tiniest of wide smiles. Not meant to cheer her on, but to reflect something his own feelings.

"I cannot take that title! My...my most wise and most wonderful older sister is the Champion of Zola!" Most wonderful. The most wonderful sister...a phrase that brings a smile to Link's own lips, yet which seems to tug downwards at the edges of his timbre in a way Link cannot place. "But!" Sidon folds her hands into his. "On your request, Link...I shall aid you in calming the Divine Beast! As long as you remain the Champion of Hylia, and as long as you yourself perform the cleansing, then our Goddess's prophecy must still be true! And I can aid you with anything that requires the water!"

She takes his hand. One step forward. But though she herself could not leap a mountain in a single bound, she could climb it, handhold by handhold, pace by pace, until she stood at the summit of the world.

Link tries to slide her fingers between his but the thick webbing stops her progress, and instead she draws her arm back.

"Here. For good luck. Something a...a friend taught me, that I'm teaching now to you." Link holds out her left fist to pat it into Sidon's palm. With her right hand, slowly, she explains: "Ball your hand into a fist and bump it against mine."

She watches his fingers curl inwards. She watches him test for the location of her fist. She watches him rear his arm back and about a second before their fists make contact she realises her mistake. The force of the punch against her knuckles lands her on her rear in the water. Her entire left arm vibrates to needles and cucco flesh until she shakes out. Link smiles, and then she snorts, and then the laughter takes over uncontrollably and she rolls back and forth in the water, clutching her stomach and howling herself to tears.

Sidon asks what has happened—asks if he has hurt her—asks if she has died. Link wheezes out her laughter as she extends shaking arms to explain. He apologises over and over; Link simply hooks her arm around his neck, rough scales scraping her skin and all. "Come on, Sidon. Together, let's go."

Together, they go.

Author's notes: Link passes out from the force of gravity that Sidon withstands more easily, given that his body is built for being able to go both up and down waterfalls, while Link isn't.

The people of Ruto have been trying to deal with the Divine Beast Vah Ruta themselves, which has unfortunately lead to them trying to figure out a way into Vah Ruta that doesn't require the slate. Rest in peace in the seas of the Goddess, you who have sacrificed your lives.

Flitch actually refers to a piece of lumber, but here I have repurposed it as a verb to use as a combination of filch and fletch; it "sounded right" for the action that Link was doing.

Being able to cryonis to break Vah Ruta's ice pillars is something you can do in Breath of the Wild! In fact, I did that on my first time through, because I noticed that the pillars looked exactly the same as the ones that you could make with cryonis. However, after sharing my experiences with anons on /v/ and my beta reader, I discovered that many people had not realised this and instead had used arrows. I did not even know that you could use arrows to break those!

Too much hasty food or elixir—as with any sort of food or elixir—can lead to negative effects, like the overdosing of any kind of drug. Sidon'll be just fine, but it does lead to running ragged.

Cooking pot lightning! Just like with the hinox that Link faced on the bridge.

Link really takes a bruising with Sidon here, as Sidon isn't used to how fragile humans are in comparison to zora.

The song that Sidon sings is based on the Oracle of Ages trading sequence. Zelda games often have trading sequences in them, in a rags-to-riches sense, starting with Link's Awakening, in which Link trades a poe clock for stationary for a stink bag for some tasty meat for a doggie mask for a dumbbell for a cheesy mustache for a funny joke for a touching book for a magic oar for a sea ukulele for a broken sword and finally for the Noble Sword.

Link desires honesty when it comes to her food, just like Riju did. While Link initially enjoyed Sidon's constant praise, she's realised by now that not all of it is genuine: Sidon puts on an optimistic face because that is what he believes his people have needed in this time of crisis. However, in reality...

Akkalan! Link knows how to speak Akkalan. Remember all the way back in Eldin, that Yunobo mentioned that Link knows how to speak the language of the eastern lands? Remember how I mentioned that aka means east and la means land? Link, indeed, knows Akkalan.

With regards to the following line: "'Did you mean—' A piece of ceviche catches in Link's throat, and she coughs it out, to Sidon's concern. '—sister?' Mipha asked." What happened here (in case it wasn't clear) is that Ilia (the girl) used Link's own chosen name, Link, to refer to Link in Mipha's presence. However, Mipha knows Link by Link's deadname (i.e. the name that Link's biological parents gave her, a boy's name). Remember, at this point, Link is only out to Ilia. Mipha asked for clarification and used Link's deadname, the memory of which made Link choke given the sensitivity of the subject. Link then asks Ilia not to call her Link anymore while Mipha is around, for fear of what Mipha might think. I should remind the reader that "my Link" is about Mipha refers to Link as her link to the world outside of Ruto. Mipha calling her that also influenced her decision to adopt Link as her actual name.

Sidon and Mipha's relationship might not be what it seems. People and feelings are complex.

Up next: Vah Ruta, and different from what you might expect.

Beta reader's comments: This chapter is really cool! I love how the author ports the Divine Beast "pre-game" segments into this series.

Sidon is probably the most complex and interesting of Link's four companions. He's not my favourite of them, but he is really cool to follow.

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef and the Lanayrish prince cleanse the Divine Beast Vah Ruta; the chef faces the Malice and the past together at once; and the chef remembers a promise made to the former Champion of Zola, one hundred years ago.

Chapter Notes

As usual: that which would not fit in the box at the end (I don't have this problem on FFN!): The chirruping hitchhikers refers to the lizalfos.

Remember, learning a new word requires double-work for Link, who also has to know how to sign it.

Sidon mentions the Golden Force here. Legends of the Triforce have mostly fallen out of the knowledge of the common folk; I take this from in-game, because no one refers to it in Breath of the Wild, and the Triforce doesn't even come up until Zelda seals away Calamity Ganon at the very end. The Lanayrish zora, being the most long-lived people of Hyrule and having among the longest-surviving records, retain a child-like fairy-tale of an omnipotent Golden Force. As well, its emblem is still used as the symbol of the Golden Goddesses, but that's about it.

The Triforce very much does exist though.

Lanayrish and Akkalan have different idioms and connotations of words, especially when it comes to slang. Lanayrish lacks the slang sense of salty.

Sarie skating over the lake that they make on the back of Vah Ruta is a nod to Fi skating in Skyward Sword.

Link saying "To talk./To Sidon." is a reference to Zelda's diary in Breath of the Wild, where she decides "To talk. To Link."

Time and water are interlinked throughout the Zelda franchise, down to the Ocarina of Time being blue (i.e. the colour of Nayru).

The slate only allows you to have one of each bomb active at a time. In the fifty-second chapter, Link dropped such an explosive into the water. It's been there the entire time.

As a reminder, "malice" in lowercase is used to refer to the purple goop, and "Malice" in uppercase is used to refer to Waterblight Ganon.

The comment about Sarie singing a hot beat is in reference to Darunia (the sage) listening to Saria's song in Ocarina of Time. You know, given that Ocarina of Time is one of my least-favourite Zelda games, I sure do reference it a lot. But that's more to do with the fact that nearly every other 3D game references Ocarina of Time in turn.
"Sidon," Link signs into his palms, "could we flood the reservoir?"

"Flood the reservoir!?" Sidon echoes. Although he cannot see, she nods. They stand at the circular entrance to the Divine Beast that spirals down into the dark depths of the belly of the beast.

When Link first looked down through the opening, she considered herself either on the verge of laughing or crying or both, at how much the Divine Beast Vah Ruta resembles two other Divine Beasts, and not the Divine Beast Vah Naboris. As to why the Divine Beast Vah Naboris differs, she cannot say. Perhaps the Divine Beasts number, or numbered, more than four. Perhaps the Divine Beast Vah Naboris, for its rotating cylindrical torso, necessitated an opening instead behind the tail. Link snickers to herself at the picture; Sidon inquires as to what has most amused her, and she ehehes more loudly.

But by now she knows how this goes. The inside of the Divine Beast litters with guardians waiting to turn their fire-light onto her and Sidon. In the Divine Beast Vah Rudania, the Malice's own flammable oil sparked to burn away the majority of its defences. In the Divine Beast Vah Medoh, the plunge into the lake disabled nearly every guardian she, and Amali, and Teba would otherwise have had to fight, even if the same plunge and subsequent cruise through the lake picked up a handful of chirruping hitchhikers.

Link has no radiant shield with which to defend herself against the guardians of the Divine Beast Vah Ruta.

But she does have water.

Litres and litres of cool water.

"Vah Ruta has so drained the water level in the East Reservoir that its flooding would take several days!" Sidon responds, bowing his head. "Most unfortunately!"

Link touches her chin. "Then there has to be a terminal that activates that..." She glances over her shoulder at the long tail that protrudes outwards from the Divine Beast's face. The trunk, as Sidon called it, except she has no gesture for that word. "...that long thing on its face. The long thing. You know. That looks like a bendy stalk of celery."

"Vah Ruta's trunk!?!" Sidon bursts out, and Link beams at herself for her brilliant food analogy that has once more come to her rescue.

"There has to be a terminal on it." She explains how functions the slate, to steadily give them power over the Divine Beast with the activation of each terminal, and Sidon's mouth gapes open.

"Most brilliant! Most incredible! That we could even directly guide Her in this manner! Our Goddess has granted us an incredible gift, like the Golden Force right out of a faery-tale!" Sidon claps his hands together. While he goes on about the wonders of the Goddess Zola, Link gazes upwards towards the trunk. To determine for certain the location of the terminals would require venturing down towards the main terminal, which could—for all she knows—infest with guardians stalking about.

But perhaps Link could find the trunk terminal first.

Her little sister's trusty red telescope reveals little except for how far the trunk extends, almost identical to the tail of the Divine Beast Vah Medoh except lacking the thin metre-long cords between the individual segments.

No terminal, at least not that Link can spot. If only Amali were here to take a flight around.

A flight around.

She looks to Sarie, who twirls their leaf around from fish to fish in the shallow water that steadily drains into the circular opening, tossing the fish into the water of the lake to prevent them from suffocating.

This Divine Beast, Link realises, will proceed more easily than any that she has done before. For once—for once, she prays—no one will have to end up injured, and none of her skin will spontaneously cease to exist.

She rubs the burn scar on her right elbow; she cannot feel her own touch.

"Wait here," Link says to Sidon, who salutes her and belly-flops onto the back of the Divine Beast into a prone position which nonetheless retains a regality so foreign that Link laughs to herself.

She rests her hand on Sarie's shoulder. They look up at her with a curious chrr.

Crouching down beside them, Link asks if they wouldn't mind taking a little skyward stroll.

To pass the time, Link and Sidon play an altered variant of wind-water-fire. Link closes her eyes to avoid cheating by predicting Sidon's motions of hand; she finds herself losing two-thirds of games. "Most humble of you, Link, to allow me to win!" he tells her, and she rubs the back of her head. Her ears flush.

Right. Allowing him to win.

Yet the circular symbol for wind reminds her of how she might hold a bowl to eat or a cup to drink. The association brings such a warmth to her chest and a smile to her lips that she throws wind over and over again, only occasionally hooking her fingers into the symbol for fire or curving the backs of her hands against one another into the symbol for water.

As she throws wind to Sidon's fire for the twentieth predictable time, a breeze lifts her ponytail and brings a korok-shaped lump to perch atop her head. Sarie croons their findings into Link's ear: a big black thing on the end of the trunk, "orange as an autumn leaf and tasty-looking as humus loam!"

Link thanks Sarie with a pat to the head and a promise to cook them humus loam, of which she has never before heard, but which she will certainly figure a recipe for, and not even the Golden Goddesses Themselves could stop her.

She taps Sidon's shoulder, then his wrist. He shows her the whites of his palms. "Sidon. Throw me up into the air as high as you can. Trust me."

"I have nothing but trust in you!" Sidon booms in return and—before she can grab her paraglider from the tumble of her belongings waiting on the Divine Beast—spikes her into the air.

Not a hylian-shaped javelin so much as a hylian-shaped yelling rock about to splatter back to the earth.

Sarie whirls alongside her. Out of desperation, Link grabs their torso; they let out an uuungh. The korok leaf cannot support their combined weight, yet neither do Link and Sarie drop heavy as stone. Instead they glide downwards: more quickly than on her paraglider, although also covering more horizontal distance.

She shifts her weight to speed their push forward.

Her boots alight midway up the trunk. The slippery material, wet with rain, nearly immediately slides her backwards but Link—Sarie latching on firmly to her left hand—lunges forward. On her hand and knees, she scales the trunk, angled more horizontal than vertical, like a set of stairs. Even if her hands find no purchase on its surface, Link keeps herself apace on sheer force of will alone until she spots the orange-glinted terminal of which Sarie spoke: on the very tip of the trunk, like a bump on its nose. Below the terminal, Link notes the opening of the trunk—as wide as Sidon is tall—that spews out the Divine Beast's jet of water.

She dunks the slate into the pedestal with enough force that the slate almost ejects to topple into the water below. Sarie springs from Link's hand to catch and retrieve it.

Only then does she remember how to breathe.

Link hugs the tiny korok. Then she feels herself slipping off of the trunk. Letting go of Sarie, she clings to the terminal until the slate has made its connection.

Even though she has not yet activated the main terminal, the trunk terminal appears as a rune on the slate. She sets the trunk vertical. With Sarie in hand, Link glides back onto the back of the Divine Beast.

The violent violet of its jewelled eyes seem to track her overhead.

She lands. The thin layer of water has vanished into the circular opening. Link lifts her head up to check the position of the trunk, which—indeed, to her enduring smile—can curl over the Divine Beast's back like a snail's shell. Finding the exact angle proves difficult with the strange spherical control that she spins on the surface of the slate. Eventually, after sending the trunk left, right, up, down, and nearly every direction except for towards the circular opening, Link has fixed the nozzle of the trunk to point downwards into the entrance to the Divine Beast. At least sort of. A close angle that will probably send pump of the water straight into the Divine Beast.

And she has never needed perfect. Perfect refers solely to her masterwork of cooking, that she may one day create with her own two hands and her cooking pot, Goddesses willing. All else can be good enough.

Yet then, glancing over the slate once more, Link cannot for the life of her find anything that allows her to unleash the torrent.

She smacks her forehead with her palm.

The trunk terminal only moves the trunk. Some other terminal, or maybe terminals, must activate the pumps.

Link laughs at herself and Sarie twee hees with her. When she recounts the tale to Sidon, wiping tears from her eyes, he does not laugh but instead beams and flashes her a thumbs-up.

"Already you've—what did you call it!?—cleansed one of the terminals! Most excellent!" He launches into a round of praise, gesturing so enthusiastically with his arms that he backhands Link across the face. While she rubs her nearly dislocated jaw, she catches his wrist with her free hand.
"I couldn't have done it without you, Sidon. And I'm not being humble. You can't make salt-grilled skewers without salt." Salt-grilled skewers. Link will have to apologise to Riju someday. For now she repeats herself: "And you can't make ceviche without fish."

"Then, for the sake of the Champion of Hylia—" Sidon inhales, gills flapping. "—and for the sake of my...most wonderful sister's friend Link, I will strive to be ever more salty, until I have become the most salty!"

Clapping her hand over her mouth to stifle her laughter, Link nudges him down. They descend into the depths of the Divine Beast. She waits to listen on the stairs. The stone-grinding noise of the guardians echoes from somewhere within the Divine Beast's torso, though she can hear nothing in the immediate vicinity of the winding staircase.

Guardians. And Link has no arrows. That makes her think.

The main terminal appears unguarded save for the sludge of malice that surrounds it in a purple pool, the hue of broken blood beneath a bruise. In the drippings of malice, Link notices, here and there, the remains of guardians, of the slippery material that makes up their armour, the innards and more sensitive legs eaten away by the malice that beads on the bottom of the pulsating tyrian chrysalis.

Mipha's chrysalis.

Link can almost hear the sound. Beat-beat-beat.

She tears her gaze away, and yet she can still hear it, as if resonating beneath the floorboards.

Beat-beat-beat.

Link passes the slate to Sarie, who cannot hold its smooth surface well in their tiny fingerless hands. "Just to the terminal," she requests.

"Sarie'll do their bestest!" Sarie chirps back. Their bestest launches the slate into the malice repeatedly while Link digs her nails into her palms. But the material of the slate appears resistant to whatever makes up the malice, and so Sarie fishes it out each time to fly it another few centimetres before dropping it again.

Their bestest places the slate within the terminal. Whooping in exhilaration, Link leaps into Sidon's arms, which causes him to spin about and ask what dangers have befallen them.

Communication.

Communication. That foe deadlier than any living mountain or one-eyed giant.

She communicates what has happened.

Sidon remarks that he did not even know of Sarie's existence, "but thank you for explaining! Most generous of you!" and Link kicks herself.

Sarie returns the slate; Sidon introduces himself to them. Sarie hides instead in Link's hair with their tiny hands prickling her scalp. Link assures them. "Sidon's a friend, not a foe."

"Teeth," Sarie whispers into Link's ear. Link opens her mouth to show the korok her own. "Oh. If Link has them then Sidon's must be good too! Sarie has never seen teeth before!" They sway from side to side with a sound like wooden blocks tumbling over one another. "Or maybe Sarie has.
Maybe Sarie had teeth once! Sarie can't memory very well. Sarie...doesn't want teeth! Too scary. Too sharp. *Shookooloo..."

Sidon beams, then covers his mouth with his hand. And his other hand, where one cannot fit over the sheer span of his smile. Link can see through the translucent webbing of his fingers that he cannot seem to keep himself from grinning. "I use my teeth only to eat!" he declares. "And I would never hurt a friend of a friend! May I call you my friend, Link!?"

Link blinks. She would nod if not for Sidon's inability to read her usual body language. Signing a yes heats her cheeks, especially after Sidon envelopes her and Sarie in a hug.

A friend.

The main terminal reveals the state of the remaining four. Two terminals on either side, as expected, presumably to operate the legs; one in the back, maybe the tail, or the cannons; and one inside of the head. If she had to hazard a guess, she would point towards the latter terminal as the source of the pumps.

Sarie kookooloohs in her ear. Link glances at them. They point—or possibly extend; without fingers Link finds these things difficult to differentiate—their tiny arm towards the slate.

"Yahaha! Link got the pumpity pumps! The pumpity pumps are working now! Pumpity pumpity pump! Pumpity-a-rumpity!" They dance upon her shoulder. Link cocks her head.

The main terminal, she realises, has indeed activated the pumps.

Link ogles the slate, ogles Sarie, ogles her hands, ogles the main terminal, slaps her knee, and erupts in laughter.

"Come on. Let's head back up."

As they move upwards along the staircase, Link peeks at what she would have had to cross in order to enter the head and activate that terminal. Something of a massive water wheel protrudes through the ground, presumably extending into a lower level; she observes complicated machineries of gears and troughs of water that boggle her mind. She would have not only had to touch her chin, but possibly stick her hand through her chin. Link looks up higher at the armies of sentries and scouts she can see guarding the ladders and lifts that would have taken her up. Cheerily she waves to them.

All of their eyes turn onto her at once, beading her body with red and serenading her with a symphony of beepbeepbeep.

She blinks.

By the time Link and Sidon pelt up to the open air, her legs ache, her lungs sear, and she loses her balance to plant her face onto the golden-brown of the Divine Beast's back. She wheezes. Link curls in on herself and rocks from side to side on her stomach while she catches her breath.

"So this is why you suggested we flood Vah Ruta to disable the guardians within Her! Most intelligent of you! As expected of you, Link!" She senses him attempt to slap her on the back, not realising that she is currently lying on the ground. Instead he kicks her by accident in the ribs.

She wheezes again.

"Link!? Link, are you feeling well!? Are you hurt!?"
She pets his foot to reassure him.

Once Link has assured herself that her lungs will not spontaneously reach up to her throat to throttle her, she wobbles back up to her very much not fire-light fried legs. She takes the slate and activates the pumps.

Something slams into the back of her head with the force of a brick and pins herself her against the back of the Divine Beast. Link crawls out from under the pressurised jet of water; she returns to rocking back and forth.

She and Sarie sit by Sidon on the far far periphery of the jet. Link listens to the hum of the water sucked up through the pumps, watches the cascade enter the Divine Beast, hears the buzzing of guardians come undone.

Even in the moon's quicksilver light, she makes out the rainbows reflected in the water.

The water overflows. It spills out from the circular opening to pour over the back and flow down the sides. Link shuts off the jet. The water sloshes when she moves her boots. Sidon splashes his feet in the thin layer of liquid, and she shakes her shoulders in silent laughter to see his broadest grin yet.

Sarie, too, begins to skip along the water, their tiny legs rippling circles through the water as they skate over the miniature lake that mirrors the starry skies above.

She sets the slate into the pouch at her right hip. Sidon and Link walk—Sarie riding on her head as usual—towards the circular opening.

She turns towards Sidon. Her fingers glide over his wrist.

"Sidon." Link gestures to the depths of the Divine Beast below. She dips the toe of her boot inside to let it ripple through the surface of the water. "Look." She thuds her palm against her forehead. "...the Divine Beast's underwater."

"Yes! Most brilliant of you, Link! The guardians within shall bother us no longer!" Sidon bobs his head up and down repeatedly. "And now we need only drain the water, and then we can freely traverse Her!"

Link swings her head from side to side. She bumps against Sarie on her shoulder, apologises, and shakes her head more cautiously. "Most of the challenges I've faced in the Divine Beasts have been about getting to this terminal or that." Words. Words. She has them. She can communicate. She can explain. She can tell him, instead of merely running off and doing whatever she wants, instead of leaving Yunobo aside to seek the terminals of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania, instead of cruising the Divine Beast Vah Medoh through Lake Totori against her promise to Amali. Riju talked to her, elaborated on her plans, ensured that Link understood what they would do. And now she will return the favour to Sidon.

To Sidon.

"I was...thinking that, with it full of water, you could just swim to the terminals. No guardians inside, no fire that could spew out, no malice that you have to hop over. The only terminal that's not inside is the one on the trunk we already got."

"Link." Sidon clears his throat. "Most noble of you, Link! But you are the Champion of Hylia, and
"You said that we were friends, right? And you said that you would trust my judgment." Link pulls Sidon closer, to touch his hand momentarily to her chest above her thudding heart. "Please, trust me. Yes, people call me the Champion of Hylia, the Hero of Hyrule, Her Majesty's Knight, O Courageous Link. But I'm not invincible. I'm just a girl with really, really, really loves food. And I could bet that you're smarter and stronger than me, and—you pushed me out of the way of the ice blocks, and you dodged them all by yourself, and everything that you've done—braver than me, too. The one thing you don't have is..." She closes her eyes. She breathes in, breathes out. She leans forward to rest her forehead against his chest, except she cannot reach his chest, so she settles for his stomach. Better that way.

The quickest way to his heart is through his stomach.

"...faith, in yourself."

"Link—"

"You believe in everyone around you, but not in yourself. I don't know about this prophecy that much, and I don't mean this as an insult, but I'm just a girl. Just one. I didn't fall out of the sky to descend on the world as some hero. I've...become one, I guess. With my own hands. Just like you have."

"—the wheel of time cycles over and over! As the rain pours down upon the mountain streams, and as the mountain streams pour into the rivers, and as the rivers pour upon the seas, and as the seas rise into the rain, so too does time!" His voice has begun to crack like a glacier fragmenting apart in summer's heat. "The heroes of our legends have time and time again fought against the malice, against the Calamitous One, each in their own era, each with a princess at their side. As happened ten thousand years ago, so too must happen now!"

"I never could have calmed any of the Divine Beasts or cleansed any of the Malice alone. When I calmed the Divine Beast in Parapa, I didn't strike the finishing blow. Not even close. In the end, my companion—a girl named Riju—deflected the Malice's own strike back at it while I lay unable to do anything. I'm not magic, and the Champion of Hylia doesn't do things herself."

Link pushes her forehead against his stomach.

"So please..."

"Then this girl of whom you speak, this girl who could deflect a maliced strike," Sidon answers, and she can feel the vibrations of his voice through his abdomen, "had a different prophecy to fulfill! I apologise, Link! Yet I do not know of the prophecies of Parapa or of their Goddess! I only know what has said our Goddess, that we must follow what has come before, what occurred ten thousand years ago!"

Link touches her chin.

When all else fails.

She has food.

"Sidon, I'm just a girl who really, really really loves food. A girl who picked up the slate. A girl who walked over Hyrule. A girl who has shared food with so many incredible people. I thought that I could...make my way alone. I thought that I'd make my home under the stars, with nothing but myself and my cooking pot. But I've realised that the best thing you can do with a cooking pot" is share it with others, and the best thing you can do when you come against the Calamity is to share that with others, too. If we work together we can accomplish more than relying on a few people that we think are better than everyone else.

"I don't know what happened ten thousand years ago. And I don't know what happened one hundred years ago. I barely even know what happened ten minutes ago." Link jabs a finger into Sidon's stomach. "And I don't think that you know what happened ten thousand years ago, either. But I know what's happening now. And now...is that you should believe in yourself. You've every bit as much to offer as I do. Maybe more.

"Please. I can't do this without you. Just...if you can't believe in yourself, then...believe in the me who believes in you. Have faith in the me who has faith in you. Have faith in the Goddess Zola. She's here for you, too. And when we get through this...when we get through this, I'll make you a paella."

"My...my most wonderful sister's favourite."

She nods against his stomach. Her arms fall to her sides.

If he speaks, Link does not hear. But his abdomen shivers, and he breathes, and his gills fwip fwap against his torso, and his hands slide over her shoulders, and he folds her into a hug.

"I...I'll try," Sidon murmurs. "I'll try."

"I believe in you! Don't push yourself and don't activate the main terminal again. If anything goes bad just come back and we'll tackle it together. You don't have to do it by yourself either. I promise."

He breathes. Link can sense the pulse of his heart in his stomach. That, and the gurgle of the ceviche. "I'll try."

"I believe in you."

"...I don't know if I believe in me, but...I'll believe in the you that believes in me, Link."

When she offers Sidon the slate, she does not do so out of a giving away, not out of a passing of the burden, not out of a denial of her past, but to put her trust in another.

Link elaborates on the runes and has him test each one. When she taps the green rune with her, finger she asks if she can take a pictograph, and then has to flubber about what a pictograph means.

"A memento. A memory. Like how you could keep a skewer after a good meal to smell it and think about what a meal it was and then you get to experience it over again and remember the people you shared it with!"

"What would you have me do!?" Sidon responds. "To have a memento with my friend...but of course!"

Link takes the pictograph of herself, of Sidon and of Sarie. Fitting herself and Sidon into the lens of the pictobox requires a deft hand. After much shifting and moving an crouching and Sarie nodding off, Link perches on Sidon's thigh while he squats down to rest his chin on her shoulder, and Sarie sits between their ears.

She snaps the pictograph.
Sidon grins and Sarie twirls their leaf and Link has her usual blank stare, yet a blank stare tempered with her knowledge of how she remembers the warmth in her belly—from the ceviche—and in her chest—from her friends.

Link embraces Sidon. For good luck. To transfer as much warmth to him as she can.

As so many have to her.

Slate in hand, Sidon bows to her. He prays, briefly, to the Goddess Zola. Sarie twirls over to pat him on the head with their tiny hand. Sidon thanks them with a smile, his much larger palm engulfing the korok's entire body.

They sit back onto Link's head. Link touches Sidon's wrist. She offers him the second to last of the rice-balls, which he takes in to swallow in a single bite. She watches how lovingly he swallows the rice-ball—despite its lack of fish—and how he savours it before he nods to himself to face the water.

"Good luck. You can do it."

"I hope so!" he calls back, and then—gathering himself like a coiled spring—he dives into the dark depths of the belly of the beast.

Link kneels down by the circular opening. She removes the final rice-ball from the satchel and breaks it open, cautious not to spill mushroom and herbs from the halves.

She prays. To the Golden Goddesses. If They exist, and if They listen to her, then may They watch over Sidon, and in return she would make them whatever food of whatever divine ambrosia They might want.

Link gives half of the rice-ball to Sarie and takes the other half for herself.

The rice-ball returns the steady beat-beat-beat of her heart. To rid herself of excess energy she begins to pace back and forth along the back of the Divine Beast. Every splash—every droplet of drizzle—every bird's call sends her reeling to determine its origin, to discern if Sidon has fallen into trouble.

Faintly, so faintly, Link can hear the strains of an accordion. When she turns her head, the wind shifts, and the music fades.

Out of the water, the heat of the summer—even in the nighttime—sweats the back of her neck. Or maybe that's fear. Or perhaps both.

Link fans herself with the hood Glepp gave her. Suddenly Sarie grabs hold of her sidelocks and pulls them up. "Yah!" they cry out, using her hair as the reins of a horse to whip Link into action. She extends her arms behind her and jogs to jog across the Divine Beast.

"Link likes cooking!" Sarie sings out in their wooden voice. "Maybe next time Link cooks, Sarie could help! Sarie could do this!" They tug on her sidelocks again. Link's neck aches, yet she tries her best to keep up, swerving left or right, stopping at Sarie's whoa, speeding up at their yah!, until she hears another splash behind her.

She twists around.

Sidon.
Sidon with the slate balanced on his palm, his right arm held triumphantly up, his head high, the most genuine of grins gracing his mouth, his teeth glittering in the light of the moon overhead.

"Link! Link!"

Sarie whips her hair, but Link does not need them to tell her. She sprints towards Sidon to hug him; the impact of her momentum propels both of them—and Sarie—into the water. Sidon breaks into laughter as he deposits her onto the back of the Divine Beast. "You did it!" she signs without even knowing whether he has or hasn't, because she believes by the sight of his smile.

He palms the slate off to her. There: the seven blue circles, and the tiny dot of orange in the centre, and the map of the Divine Beast Vah Ruta, complete save for that final activation.

"I told you that you could do it! And look! Er, well, you can't, but, you know what I mean! You've activated all of the terminals! Every one of them!"

"With your faith in me and our Goddess at my side, there was nothing that I could not do, Link!" Sidon answers back. He embraces her and whirls her around. Her head dizzies, but her spirit clears. "And now we only have to activate that main terminal again! Isn't that what you said, Link!? This...I..."

"You did it," Link says again, yet her mirth has faded, and she steps away from Sidon. His fingers search the air for her. She offers him her shoulder.

He takes the slate. "I'll drain the water! You asked me to wait to activate the main terminal and so I did! We'll do it together, you and I! The Champion of Hylia and—" He puffs out his chest. "—the Champion of Zola!"

Link tries to lift her hands to join in his celebration yet the slow dawning upon her stills her hand.

The main terminal.

The main terminal. Link covers her mouth with her hand. She touches her chin.

She cannot tell him.

To explain what has happened to his sister, to tell Sidon that he must fight against her desecrated corpse eaten from the inside out by Malice, to force him to face the Malice that bears his sister's face.

Even to herself, the knowledge burns. Link does not retch again, not as she did with the remains of her friend Urbosa, yet she can feel the prickle at the backside of her eyes. She lowers her eyelids. The tears stain her lashes.

Daruk and Revali. Urbosa and Mipha. Names, and faces, that meant nothing to her when she awoke. Whom she will never see again. Who will never know of what happened beyond the Great Calamity. Whose final moments resided in fear and in panic, in horror and in pain, in terror and in agony, and in the understanding that the Calamitous One would bring ruin to Hyrule.

Even if Hyrule itself has sunk under the dust of time, the people and the land once known as Hyrule have not. Will not.

Will not. She will see to that.

Link cannot change back what has passed. She cannot return to a time before the Great Calamity to set things right. She can only walk forward. She can only continue to step towards the future.

Daruk and Revali, Urbosa and Mipha. They would have wanted her to step forward. For Daruk and his brothers and his sons in Darunia. For Revali, and his beloved Ilari that he put on the map. For Urbosa, and her loved ones in Rovah, fried bananas and all.

For Mipha, and her family, and the freedom that she fought for, and the freedom that Link will fight for, and the peace, of the wilds and the people who make something of them.

She feels Sidon's finger against her cheek. His finger glistens wetly with her tears. "Link...?"

"Could you hug me?" she asks. Without another word, he scoops her up into his arms. The underside of his arms and his stomach feel cold and wet against her, like sweat-slicked skin. Link clings to him nevertheless. Selfish, if only for a moment.

She will tell him, but afterwards. He deserves to know. Not now. Not now, when the knowledge will do nothing but cause him unbearable pain. Not now at all.

"Let's go."

Except they cannot go immediately, because it takes Sidon and Link several minutes to puzzle out exactly how to rid the inside of the Divine Beast of water. Various presses of the circles upon the slate do not help them much: the trunk moves back and forth; the tail swings from side to side in the water; the legs pump up and down as if bouncing to music; the Divine Beast waggles about, and Link cannot comprehend how to remove the water. Sarie seeks to help her, and then Sidon, placing his hand over the surface of the slate. Link hits by accident the rune for the cubic bomb and hears one go off somewhere in the reservoir.

She looks over her shoulder. The bomb that she summoned while attempting to quell the storm. Doubling over Link smacks her hands onto her knees, doubles over, and laughs herself into a blithering mess.

Then she turns back to the Divine Beast Vah Ruta and the fact that she filled it with water without checking if there was a method of draining.

"Doesn't water go away by itself?" Sarie sings out. "Sarie and Link and Teeth could sit around and wait for it to go away by itself like rain clouds! Poof poof! Poof away!"

"For this volume of water, our Goddess might not accept it for years and years! But is that my name now!?!" Sidon calls, patting the korok on the head. "Teeth?"

Link tunes out their exchange. She touches her chin. First with her left hand, and then, when her mind tires, with her right.

She forms several pillars of ice in the water of the East Reservoir and gestures for Sarie and Sidon to accompany her onto them. Sarie, who translates her message to audible speech for Sidon, lubricates the process. Butters it.

Link's mouth waters, and her stomach rumbles, and she stands on the columns of ice powered by cryonis, and she has an idea.

An idea that does not revolve around food.
She raises the Divine Beast Vah Ruta up to its full height, its knees no longer bent. Then Link lifts its left legs and opens the panels on its back.

Balancing on its right limbs and stretching out its left legs into the skies, the Divine Beast rotates its torso until it performs a vertical split with its trunk horizontal to the surface of the reservoir. The water gushes out through the circular opening on its back and through the panels. The trio waits on the pillars of ice for the Divine Beast to finish draining.

In the meantime Link takes the opportunity to warn Sidon of the fight to become, of the battle against the Malice, of the opening of the chrysalis, of the do not touch the malice or it will eat through your skin, of the need to use weapons of fire-light, of the guardians that she just destroyed instead of attempting to find a second spear for Sidon.

Link nods sagely to herself.

"We should come up with a better plan. One that doesn't involve just whacking at the Malice. Last time I tried that, I got whacked myself." Link rubs the back of her head. "I don't know about you, but...this is the first time that I've come so far in calming a Divine Beast without a single injury, and I don't intend to get one now if I can avoid it."

She folds her hands together before she speaks again.

"Sidon, what did you say about the pumps?"

She feels him stiffen. "I..."

"If we can trick the Malice to swim into the pump, then can't we get rid of it that way?" Like the fans in the Divine Beast Vah Medoh. Using the Divine Beast itself against the Malice.

"Forgive me for my impudence, but would not that simply launch the Malice towards Ruto!?"

Link tilts her head. "But if it churns up in the pumps...I think that that's enough to kill it, or to cleanse it, or whatever you want to call it. And we won't point the trunk towards Ruto! We'll point it away, so even if the Malice is still alive and kicking, we'll just dunk it back into the Divine Beast. Here." She manoeuvres the trunk to its position stretching out towards the circular opening in the Divine Beast Vah Ruta.

Sidon thrums his hands along his torso before splaying his fingers again. "Forgive my most ignorant question, but how do you plan to trick the Malice!?"

"The Malice follows people around," Link says with a tap to her nose, "like how I follow food. If we can get it to chase one of us...then the other person can stand with the slate and activate the pump. If we're careful then no one'll get hurt except the Malice. I did something just like with the Divine Beast in Medli."

He frowns, but then he moves his hand over his mouth and—while his fingers cross his face—Sidon exchanges the expression for a smile. "I do not know about this plan! But I will put my utmost faith in you, as you have put it into me! I believe in you! I believe in you! I completely and utterly believe in you, Link! Tell me...tell me what to do!"

Link lifts her hand. She flattens it against Sidon's palm. "If you have a better idea, I'll listen. I'm only one girl. I'm not the wisest, and I'm not the most powerful."

"We shall try this!" Sidon insists. "And if it fails, we shall regroup and try something else!"
They descend into the darkness. The innards of the Divine Beast Vah Ruta have slicked with water; the remains reach up to her ankles. Sarie skates again along the surface of the liquid, but Link picks the korok up.

"Sarie, this is going to be dangerous."

"More dangerous," Sarie asks with a tone of complete innocence, "than the big horned horse cat thingy, or than the toot-toot that Link and Teeth pew-pewed with the lightning?"

Link lifts her hands. She lowers her hands. She strokes her chin. "You got me there."

"What does Sarie got? Is Link going to get Sarie a meal!? Link loves cooking and Sarie loves eating Link's cooking!" They bounce up and down, and Link cannot help but smile at them.

"When this is over, I'll get you some food for sure. Some food that you can eat. I promise, absolutely. Swear on my heart and hope to cook for you again." She hesitates. "But you need to be careful, please. Here." Link holds out her satchel. "If anything goes wrong, please hide in here. I'll do my best to keep you safe."

Sarie bobs their body. They flutter into the satchel and tuck themself away, then reach up to close the satchel. Link listens to them snuggle themself into the satchel; they hum to themself a tune that sounds a tad like one she's heard somewhere before. Hot. A hot beat, a jaunty tune, something that she could dance to. A song she feels she could listen to a thousand times and never tire.

With that, Link turns towards the main terminal. She holds the slate in her upturned palms like an offering upon an altar.

She kneels before Sidon.

He takes the slate.

Link gazes upwards at the chrysalis, at the tyrian heart that beat-beat-beats, at the final resting place of the girl with the sharks' teeth.

She hears the familiar sound of the slate activating the main terminal, hears the noise of the black crystal filling up with light blue and then draining away, hears the beat-beat-beat of the tyrant-tyrian heart above.

Together she and Sidon run.

When her shorter legs do not match his stride, he physically hoists her up into a bridal carry with one arm under her chest and one under her knees. Sidon sprints up the stairs. She listens to the squelching far, far below in the belly of the beast, of the Malice that has taken Mipha's life, that has taken Mipha's body, that has taken Mipha's everything.

Only when Sidon has pelted towards the very edge of the Divine Beast's back does he set Link down. For a moment she does not quite remember how to walk. But then Link pictures a bowl of rice with a sprinkling of rock salt awaiting her at the finish line; she drives her limbs into movement.

Sidon runs towards the circular opening again. He flexes. He waits.

Link looks away.

The memory of what happened to Urbosa has imprinted on the inside of her eyelashes so strongly that when she beds herself for the night she can still catch snippets of the broken bones, of the protruded-through stomach, of the horror of that papery-thin skin stretched over the violent violet Malice that bulged and writhed within the corpse of the girl with the green hairband who once had shared her life—her worries and her hopes, her fears and her happiness—with Link.

She does not know if she could bear to look again, to see what has happened to...to Mipha.

The Malice slurs up the stairs. Link listens to that dreadful sloshing of its bloated body. It moves quickly, its steps pittering up as rapid as the rain, yet with a certain lurch as though the very act of remaining alive caused it agony unendurable.

She casts her gaze down as she sees—from the corner of her vision—the violent violet crown of the Malice emerge from the Divine Beast's womb.

Sidon—head turning towards the source of the noise—waves his limbs about to catch the Malice's attention. When it takes chase, Link recounts to herself, Sidon will dive down into the water; with luck the Malice will follow. Then he will swim under the pump in the corner by which Link stands. From here she hangs directly above the pump in perfect view. With its transparent covering she will wait, and she will watch, and she will activate the pump just as the Malice passes below the nozzle, and the Divine Beast will take care of the rest, just like that.

Just like that.

Link gazes down at her hands. At her arms. At the right with its burn across the elbow, at the left with its lizalfos bites. At the lightning-strike scar that spirals her arm in the gold of the Golden Goddesses.

Yet the wind lies still.

The best laid plans of lynels and Links often go awry.

The Malice turns its face towards Link, standing there with the slate in hand. It opens its mouth. Mipha's mouth. Mipha's mouth—her smile as wide as her heart was warm—lined with rows and rows of sharks' teeth. The violent violet fluid oozes over the Malice's teeth. Thick strands of drool cascade from the corners of its maw. It snaps its jaw shut and the acidic saliva sprays from its mouth.

Sidon leaps in front of the Malice to snag its attention. The Malice reacts so swiftly that Link cannot see its motion, only the consequence: it has slammed its arm like a club across Sidon's chest, and the impact has flung Sidon aside and off of the Divine Beast, as though the Prince Zora were nothing but a porcelain doll.

She screams.

The Malice steps a step towards Link, and her scream cuts into an inhalation sharp enough to charr her lungs.

Sarie.

Sarie, in her satchel.
Sarie in her satchel whose life Link cannot put in danger. Sarie in her satchel, snuggled away between the remaining grains of rice balls and the wooden box of elixirs and the pouch of ingredients. Sarie in her satchel.

Sarie whom she promised to help find their way home.

The slate drops from her fingers. The Malice lunges towards her, and she rips the satchel from her back. With it comes the fire-light spear, the curved bow, the long straight sword, the paraglider. Everything but her cooking pot, which remains strapped to the lowest layer on her back. The weapons and the tools pile on the edge of the Divine Beast. Link hears Sarie croon in the satchel, hears their koolooloo of confusion, listens to them calling her name.

The Malice bears down upon her. The Malice reaches for her as once Mipha reached her. The Malice approaches her as once Mipha approached her.

She can nearly hear in her ear the whisper of Mipha's words. "May I touch you, my Link?"

"No," Link signs, very simply, in the split-second she has, too quick for her to grab a weapon, too quick for her to pick up the slate, too quick for her to do anything but stare like a deer riveted to a topaz light.

The Malice's papery flesh feels as cool against her body as did Mipha's skin, cold and damp. The wind blows up her sidelocks and tangles her ponytail. The water of the reservoir envelopes her in its waiting embrace.

Her breath bubbles from her nose.

On her heartbeat she counts the seconds she can hold the wind in her lungs.

Floating above her in the water, the Malice extends its hands to her. For a moment, when they have just landed in the water next to the pump that would have served as the Malice's coffin, she wonders if the Malice will merely caress her cheek.

Instead the Malice's warped fingers curl around her throat.

Her throat. Her throat, from her lower jaw down to her collarbone. Burning. The skin peeling away and the raw meat exposed to the icy water and the constriction of her throat. She cannot breathe.

She cannot breathe.

She cannot breathe she cannot breathe she cannot breathe.

Like the lynel choking her again.

The Malice choking her like the lynel had choked her, like her past had choked her, like—like they had—like they had choked—

She hears Sidon. She hears his voice. She hears her name.

Link.

Link.

She remembers the feeling of Mipha's fingers, spreading the healing salve the same deep blue of the sea, across her nose, or on the small of her back, or squeezing the life from her throat with the pulsating hand wrapped around her neck. Like a loftwing. The loftwing that she has worn around her neck for for long, as the entire line of the horizon, boundless and free, spun down into a collar small enough to choke her.

She hangs limply in the Malice's hand.

She has no slate. She has no slate. She has no sword. She has nothing but her dead-weight hands and her lead-bone legs, and she has not even a shrine into which she could throw herself to heal her scars for her foolishness, for her inability to avoid her, for the deaths upon deaths that she should already have died.

"But only cowards die many times before their deaths.

Saying her name.

Saying her name.

"...Link...

Saying her name.

"Link."

She gazes at the ruined face of the Malice. She gazes at the ruined face of the Malice that has her by the throat, and she kicks. She feels her boots stick into its chest. The Malice eats away at her soles but cannot eat away at her soul.

Not anymore.

She kicks, and she kicks, and she feels the Malice reaching for her. Ribbons of agony burrow under her skin like so many maggots devouring her from the inside out, her feet and her legs and her thighs and her stomach and her chest and her arms and her shoulders and the face that has almost come to press down upon hers. She twists herself up towards the pump.

Her body screams. She forces herself onto her back in the water, forces the Malice up, forces its throbbing mass into the nozzle of the pump. She can feel her skin melting away, can feel the rawness of her muscle melting away, can feel the tendons and sinews that hold her very form together melting away.

The Malice holds fast. Holds less fast. Holds—and then the Malice, with its hundred years of dust, its hundred years of agony, its hundred years of having stolen Mipha's form, its hundred years of living as a ghost in someone else's body, its hundred years of the past that has haunted her for so long—

The Malice lets go.

The Divine Beast sucks the Malice up and leaves Link by herself in the icy water, and then she feels the suction on her own skin. The nozzle of the pump rushing up to meet her.

She panics and her limbs flail and she turns herself around and even with the hand no longer around her throat she can only fill her lungs with water and then the nozzle chokes on her cooking pot.

Link has never quite understood what means the line in Kass's song, in the Ballad of the Sealing War, of how the hearts of the Divine Beasts did shine. But at least she has found the true sacred power of the Divine Beasts.

This nozzle. This pump. This suction.

And the cooking pot on her back that has saved her, yet again.

In that moment alone she has complete and absolute faith that the Golden Goddesses watch over her every second of her life, and also that the Golden Goddesses have a very particular sense of humour.

Link floats in the water, stuck to the nozzle with the cooking pot on her back, her vision failing as she loses the feeling in her lungs. She floats. The pain of her throat, of her shoulders, of her arms, of her chest, of her stomach, of her thighs, of her legs, of her feet burns her into the blackness. She listens through the darkness to the calling of her name in a thousand tongues. She can hear Igli. She can hear the patrons to whom she has mixed drinks and changes lives. She can hear Muzu. She can hear Sidon.

She can hear Mipha.

At the close of their time training with one another, they returned from Ruto to the castletown once more. Link had not mastered her way with the spear, but she had become much more adept at before; at least, she had certainly learned to wield the sword that seals the darkness against users of spears.

On the day that Link knocked Mipha back ten times in a row and pointed the blade of evil's bane at the Champion of Zola's throat, Mipha declared that they would retire for the night.

"I am so proud of you, my Link," Mipha told her. Link blushed so hotly that she feared her ears might burn off entirely; she reached up to her catch her earrings that they would not fall from the ashen remains of her ears.

"I'm sorry for knocking you over so much. I'll make you something in apology!"

Mipha giggled. "May I touch you, my Link? May I pet your head?" Link dipped her head and Mipha patted her head. "You are supposed to learn how to fight against a trident-user, you know. That was part of the purpose of the training."

"...can I still make you food? If you don't mind? Could I?"

Link made her paella. Mipha's favourite. On hearty blueshell snails from the southern border of Faron, culled from the village of Papuchia, and mighty porgy brought in from Lanayru. She never did well in crowds, but she could push through—with frequent breaks—to the food market to search for the freshest wares.

To make food for her friends, Link would do most anything.

She cleaned the blueshell snails with a knife and dropped them into a pot to warm, then rubbed them between her fingers to cleanse them of their slimey mucous. Setting the snails aside, she cleansed the blood from the mighty porgy, so fresh that the fishiness of their scent had not yet set in and their skin looked clean and glossy. Link could feel the occasional twitch in the meat: the porgy so mighty that still fought on despite its death.

Much like—despite her kind smile—Mipha, who would fight to the last.

She cut off the heads of the porgy and knifed their bones from their bodies with her knife. In a heap of melted butter, Link miniced a sprinkling of herbs, both from Lanayru and from beyond: blue nightshade, garlic, swift violet, onion, cool saffron, thyme, amaranth, leaves of bay, endura carrot, tomato, and the standby of Hyrule herb, alongside spices from Eldin and Parapa—oregano and paprika—and a heaping of salt. Perhaps more salt than needed, but she had had a craving for salt since morning. She steeped the fish heads and bone in the butter for fresh fish broth, then added water. She heated butter in a saucepan and spooned in the rice with the herbal blend, along with spicy pepper and saffron. Next: the fish broth alongside peas and yams. Stirring and stirring, Link scooped the porgy and the snail in to simmer, first the porgy and then the snails for their differing time in cooking. She removed the paella from the heat, squeezed fresh Faronese lemons over the dish, and spread it over a plate for Mipha and herself.

Link sat across from Mipha on a table in her room at the castle. A tight squeeze, as she had specifically asked for a smaller room. Aryll would return soon; she had gone out with Daruk and a very insistent Revali to birdwatch in Hyrule Forest Park across the castle waterfront, sandwiched between the Helmhead and Boneyard Bridges.

Urbosa and the girl with the golden hair had gone with them, as had Impa, the Princess's shade. Though, from the wink Urbosa had given Link, Link suspected that Daruk would do a marvelous job of distracting Impa while Urbosa and the girl with the golden hair slipped away for some time to themselves.

"I never thought that I would become the Champion of Zola, the—" As Mipha finished her title, Link wandered over with the plate of paella weighing down her arms. "—Hero of Lanayru, the Divine Beast of Ruto's Pilot, O Wise Mipha. I still do not know if I could call myself Wise."

Link nodded. She set the plate between them on the table.

"I thought that I would...become the Queen Zora, and that I would lose Mipha. " Mipha hesitated. Link pushed the bowl towards her. "Even if being the Champion of Zola comes with its own expectations, I feel like I can remain myself. Even if no one else but you ever sees my smithing, I see it. And that...that freedom..."

"My Link." Mipha reached across the table. Her fingers covered above Link's hand. "I...hope that the Calamity never comes. I hope that the Calamity never comes, for I never wish to see Hyrule with its calamitous grasp. And I hope that the Calamity never comes, so that I can remain as Champion. Is that selfish of me, my Link?"

She shook her head. Mipha smiled. Not quite the fullness of her mouth, yet beyond the reddened border of her painted lips.

"I hope that someday you, too, may feel yourself free of the burdens upon you. I know that being the Champion of Hylia has not rested easy on you." Mipha squeezed Link's hand. Three times. Beat-beat-beat. "Yet being the Champion of Hylia does not mean that you are no longer Link. I have...seen you grow and change so much. Oh, I know that hylians grow up in the plink of a raindrop, but something else has changed. When I saw you, hand on the hilt of the sword that seals the darkness, you looked a beached fish that had already laid flat its gills. And now...when I see you listening to Aryll's newest observations of birds, or when I see you walking beside the Princess..." Her voice trailed off, and her cheeks darkened in a blush that spread pink along her chest and stomach until she more resembled a pink-bellied salmon than a zora. "I'm sorry, my Link. I don't mean to make you uncomfortable. It makes me happy to see you smile, is all, is why I have observed you.

"But you've grown so much livelier. And that...that makes me happier than I could ever express in words alone." Her hand continued to hover above Link's. "Your training with the four of us will end, soon. There's not much else I can teach you, that Urbosa, Daruk, and Revali haven't already done. But I'm grateful for what you've taught me."

Mipha's smile widened, just for a flash, before she once more reined herself in.

"May I touch your hand, my Link?"

Link dipped her head. She lifted her hand until the knuckles brushed against the underside of Mipha's palm, smooth and firm. Mipha curled her fingers between Link's knuckles.

"My Link...when we last visited Ruto, I spoke once more with my...father." Mipha exhaled, and Link blinked up at her with her cheeks bulging with paella. "Urbosa suggested I should. She told me that she herself had been too afraid to be honest with her feelings, until you simmered them out of her with food." Mipha beamed. Link blushed from her toes to the tips of her ears, and she hastily shoved a handful of paella into her mouth with her free hand. "She had been so worried that the Calamity might see her perish that she had thought it best to spare her loved ones the tragedy of seeing her again. But the last letter she sent us—she's been so happy in Rovah, hasn't she?" Link bobbed her head. She does not remember the letter yet she must have in the memory, and perhaps one day a particular song of a scent or murmur of a melody or whisper of the water in her cooking pot will remind her. "With her coaching, I was able to talk to him. I do not think we...fully understand one another. But it's a start, and no longer do I fear returning to my home.

"I do not know much of your situation." Link does not remember her own responses. She remembers little but the inwards clenching of her own heart as if she were trying to juice her innards. "I can put two and two together. Aryll, living here with us. My Link, never wanting to return to your home. Whatever has happened between you and your family, you should at least try to reconcile."

She remembers the cold darner that frosted over her veins, remembers the ironshroom that leadened her limbs, remembers the silent shroom that muted her fingers.

"Please, my Link."

She can still hear the pulsing of the tell-tale tyrian heart. She can still see the violent violet of that throbbing flesh, leaking blood like a rotting fruit, one hundred years too late.

Mipha's chrysalis. Which has held her form for one hundred years. Which has metamorphosised her from the girl with the sharks' teeth, the girl with the kind smile, the girl with the rice-balls, to that terrible thing now gunked in the pump.

Mipha...Mipha, who would have lived yet, as she was before. Mipha, who would have remembered her Link. Mipha, who would have once again asked her May I hug you. Mipha, who would have known of the other Champions, who would have shared stories of the girl with the golden hair, of Urbosa, of Revali, of Daruk, of Impa.

Mipha, who would have lived yet, if not for the Calamitous One, if not for the Malice.

Marin has passed away. The girl who smelled of horses could not have survived these hundred years. The girl with the golden hair vanished on the eve of the Great Calamity. And even if the somehow-living Impa were willing to speak to her about her past, Link can never again show her face in Kakariko.

And Aryll.

Aryll, her little sister, whose fate Impa refused to name.

Mipha told her of how quickly hylians grow up. Of how one moment she saw Link as a child unable to swim through the river, and then within the blink of an eye she had sprouted up like a weed. Mipha would never use the word weed. Like a sea lily, she would say, with a gentle smile and a lingering brush of the hand.

Before the Great Calamity, Link had regarded life as the lengthiest action she would ever take. That remains true. But the sixty-seventy-maybe-eighty years of a hylian's span—as of a sheikah's and of a gerudo's, and the similar courses of a rito's and of a goron's—cannot compare to the hundred long years of her absence.

She lowers her eyelids.

Yet she can retain the memories of the past, of the people she has loved and loves still, and carry them with her forward to the future, to the people that she loves now and will love yet.

If not for her absence, she would never have met Cottla and Koko, would never have met Misan and Glepp, would never have met Kass and Yunobo, would never have met Amali and her children, would never have met Cremia and Romani, would never have met Dyeri and Nadyne, would never have met Riju and Sidon, would never have met the rest of the people—friends and strangers, companions and travellers—that have meant and mean the world to her.

That she swims now in a different bend of the river does not erase the waters that have carried her here.

"My Link," Mipha murmured to her over the empty bowl, the paella warming their bellies and curving their mouths to smiles, "you should return to Ordon, for even a chance to say good-bye. You can decide to leave again if you want. Yet you should try, at least, to reconcile. I think you should try, my Link. Please...promise me that. Leave nothing unsaid."

She promised Mipha, then, to return to Ordon.

She promises herself, now, to return to Ordon.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: And that's the fourth Divine Beast, with thirty-one chapters left in Delicious in Wilds to wrap the story up. Thank you to you, the reader, for having stayed with me for so long, and thank you to you, my most marvellous beta reader Emma, for having assisted me.

Link has in fact not told Sidon about Sarie until this moment. It's not like Sidon could see Sarie himself, although he did hear the "tumbling wooden block" sound.

Just look at how far Link has come. Remember when it was Yunobo giving her a pep talk? When it was Amali? When it was Malon? Remember when Riju and Link supported each other? Remember when, now, Link can be there for Sidon?

I decided to have Link skip Vah Ruta for three major reasons: firstly, Link has already had sufficient time to hang out with and get to know Sidon that I didn't really see what writing out a long chapter would give; secondly, I wanted to focus on the Malice for this fight; and thirdly, I wanted to point out truly that Link isn't the one who needs to do the Divine Beasts. There's no prophecy. She just happens to be the bearer of the slate. That doesn't make her any less of a hero.

Link's truly accepted her past as herself. We've come such a long way, haven't we?

"The best laid plans of lynels and Links often go awry" is a reference to, of course, "the best laid plans of mice and men often go awry".

If it's not clear what's going on, Waterblight Ganon ran into Link and tackled her into the water. Mipha's healing salve is a nod to blue potion, first seen as the Medicine of Life and Magic in A Link to the Past and last seen being concocted from ten monster tails (I think?) in A Link Between Worlds, which usually restores Link's hearts completely, as well as magic in games that use it.

The loftwing around the neck is an Akkalan idiom that refers to someone bearing a burden long after they have been forgiven, because they cannot seem to forgive themself. Loftwings are depicted as the messengers of the Golden Goddesses. In Akkalan, it is said that, years upon years ago, anyone who injured a loftwing would wear its corpse around their neck as punishment to let everyone know that they had sinned against the Golden Goddesses. However, the Golden Goddesses then sent a message: that this practise had to stop, for the concept of sin (in the old Akkalan faith practised in the province of Ordona) is not something to stain a soul with forever. To sin is merely to miss the mark, so that you should try again to meet the target. This was inspired by the real-world "albatross around your neck" from The Rime of the Ancient Mariner.

The line that Zelda reads is adapted from Julius Caesar; I'm not a fan of Shakespeare. And, in case you don't recognise it, I recommend rereading the memory from the very first chapter! Worry not, because we'll revisit this memory yet again so that you can understand the full context. After all, everything comes in threes (and in fours, with the fourth time being a tradition-breaking twist, but we'll get there when we get there). The three-line saying her name is also something that will come back, but it's adapted from Breath of the Wild. Zelda has those lines fairly frequently; at the game of the game, she also says that about Ganon.

Yep, before Zelda came up with the names Vah Ruta, etc., the Divine Beasts were called "the Divine Beast of Ruto", "the Divine Beast of Darunia", and so forth. That's part of why Zelda eventually decided to adopt the city names.

By the way, do you remember what malice-caused scars look like? Consider the fact that Waterblight Ganon literally enveloped Link in malice—however briefly—from the jawline down. Yup.

And now Link has a new destination: finally figuring out where Ordon is. After all, Impa has lived for over one hundred years (as do some people in real-life). Who's to say that Ilia (the girl) might not be around yet?

Up next: recovery; scars; talk of siblings.

Beta reader's comments: The way Vah Ruta is dealt with is inventive and a really cool twist.

This wraps up what you may be thinking of as the "main" portion of the story! As you can see, though, we still have just over thirty chapters left to go. There's a lot of story left in the land once known as Hyrule.

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef recovers from injuries sustained while cleansing the Divine Beast; the chef and the Lanayrish prince have a heart-to-heart about the former Champion of Zola.

Chapter Notes

As typical, notes that wouldn't fit in the end: Thank you so much for reading along with Delicious in Wilds so far; we are now 64% of the way through the story (actually, last chapter, we were at (approximately) 1-1/e of the way through the story, which is a little mathematical fact that made me smile but which I forgot to put in the author's notes). Thank you to my readers, and thank you to my most incredible beta reader Emma, for doing her best in making sure that my Frankensteinining writing process actually flows well.

Link really got fucked up in the last chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

To have a body requires boundaries. To feel where her form ends and where the world around her begins. To sense the distinction between herself, and not-herself.

Yet the boundaries of her body have blended into the earth.

She drifts within herself. The pain has melted away to a nothingness that radiates from her core. No matter how she tries to gather herself up, her essence spills from her fingers as though trying to envelope the ocean in her arms.

She drifts. The endless void before her glows in the softened tones of gold and shimmers with a warmth she has felt before. She has no eyes to close. But she could give in. She could let herself spread out to the edges of eternity.

She senses, somehow, like she has done this before.

But she has a land to walk, and promises to keep, and travellers to talk, and meals to make before she sleeps.

Meals, cooked by her own hands, to warm her own belly, of her own body.

Her body.

Hers.

And all of the memories, and all of the scars, and all of the promises, and all of the mistakes, and all of the feats and feasts alike that have come with it.
Her eyelids flutter. Warmth curls around her nose. Something pushes against her lips.

She aaaaahs.

Her jaws snap shut. She chews. She swallows. She tilts her head left. She tilts her head right. This texture, this heat, this savory meat, this salt and this spice, this ball of steamed rice.

Her eyes snap open. She expects a healer. She expects a letter from the Divine Beast Vah Ruta's pilot, or a visit from a trusted confidante, or—at best—a meeting on a rooftop.

She does not expect Sidon, floating in the fluid to the right of her water-bed, and she especially does not expect Muzu, to the left.

When she sits up, Muzu stiffens. As if sensing his body language in the ripples of the water, Sidon turns to the King Zora's advisor, yet Muzu—bolting beneath the surface—swims out from the room into the hallways beyond.

Link stares at his receding tail.

"Link!" Before Link can even begin to process the events occurring much too quickly around her, Sidon has taken her hand to pump it up and down. "Thank you! Thank you! On behalf of our Goddess and all of Her people—on behalf of my father the King Zora and those beneath his protection—on behalf of Vah Ruta Herself—I thank you! I could thank you and thank you again for longer than the rains have poured over the ocean and still those thanks would represent a mere puddle of my gratitude! Thank you, Link! Thank you! Thank you! Thank you!"

She bobs her head. He continues to speak; she opens her mouth. He continues to speak; she pokes his palms. He continues to speak; she asks where the rice-balls went.

He has them on a floating tray. Link's stomach grumbles; she has never felt emptier, not even when the lynel quite literally made an effort to empty her abdomen. Lowering her eyelids, she stuffs rice-balls one after another into her mouth while Sidon informs her of what in the world happened.

He could spare her the details. Her being alive, and Sidon being alive, and the Divine Beast Vah Ruta calmed, and the people of Ruto safe, and her mouth full of food: these matter, at least to her.

Sidon elaborates. After the lightning strike quelled the storm, many of the Lanayrish came to observe the goings-on. Link blushes at what a spectacle she must have caused, pretending herself a horse with Sarie as her rider. Then he describes the chrysalis, and her face pales. Although Sidon tried to enact the plan, grabbing the blight's attention, the Malice knocked him into the water. Link looks up at him properly for the first time since her awakening to see the bandages across his chest where the Malice's arm must have connected with his flesh.

She winces.

What she could have prevented, had she acted the wiser.

He goes on: the Malice tackled her into the water. Immediately Sidon begins his endless showers of praise, and Link reaches up to touch his wrist.

She sets the rice-balls down.

She flexes her fingers.

She speaks.
"Sidon...please be honest with me. That's all I want. For you to be genuine, because when you're not, it all feels..." Link strains. She regards the rice-balls. "When I...when I made you the ceviche, it wasn't that good, but you told me it was anyway. If you only ever told me that all my food was good, I'd never get better at cooking! And if you always tell me that everything's good, then I'll never know if you like any of my cooking, because you'll tell me it's good even if it's not! When you tell me that something's delicious, I want to know that it's because it is delicious. And if you say everything's delicious, then I can't know that!"

Link sits up with the fire that roars through her blood and could set her eyebrows aflame in its intensity: the fire beneath her cooking pot.

"So can you be honest with me? About the food and about...the other stuff too?"

Sidon smiles.

A genuine smile that crinkles his eyes and reflects a smile to her own mouth, her cheeks bulging with rice.

She relaxes against the bed.

"...when I call you courageous, Link, I really mean it," he tells her; Link holds his hand in hers.

Sidon resumes the explanation: on Muzu's command, the Lanayrish that had waited to watch the battle came to their aid. Sidon, nearly unconscious from the pain of the Malice chewing through his chest, could scarcely explain the plan, but Muzu understood and activated the pumps.

Muzu.

Link has to thank him yet.

Yet Sidon shakes his head. "You need not forgive him, Link..." She ogles him. For once she can hear a thread of anger in his voice, one so uncharacteristic of him that she shrinks back. Then Sidon clears his throat. "He will tell you himself when he is ready."

He goes on more cheerfully. While Sidon recovered—and the healers did not allow him to participate in the rescue efforts despite him apparently gently suplexing one and tossing another into the water in his efforts to help her—Muzu and his team saved Link from the pump. The inner workings of the Divine Beast brought an end to the Malice. All that the Divine Beast had spat out were the remains of Mipha's slate...and the pump-broken remains of Mipha's light-scale trident.

Link sits up. Sidon squishes her fingers together. "I know, Link." She hears nothing in his timbre but affection and love. "I know. That was the wretched Malice that took my—my most wonderful sister's Goddess slate, that took the very trident handed down our generations—" She tilts her head; Mipha smithed that trident herself. "—and that took her life. I know, Link. We will never forget my most wonderful sister's sacrifice. So thank you again for all of your help, Link! Without your most incredible—"

She shakes her hand from his grasp to open his fingers for him and sign into his palms. "I'm sorry," Link says. "I should have told you sooner. I was afraid you'd be..." The word upset fails to encompass the horror-revulsion-grief that Link felt; she cannot imagine what Mipha's own little brother must have gone through. "...so I told myself it would be easier for you if I told you later." Sidon's features shift into an expression Link cannot read. Hastily she adds: "But that was unfair of me. I...I don't know entirely what it's like." Nor does she want to know, to have lost a sibling; her hand twitches towards her left side, though she touches nothing but her hip. "I do know It's like to have lost people. I mean, I've been away for a hundred years, and—" The flowers on the shore of Lake Hylia. "—I've lost so many of those I once knew. Mipha, too. I know how important she was to you. And I wish I could have done something different a hundred years ago—to save her, or something—but I can't even remember what happened on the night of the Great Calamity. I'm sorry." Link's fingers falter. Where her gestures slow, the words others have given to her bubble up, like herbs at the bottom of a teacup that nonetheless dissipate through the whole of the tea. "If you...if you ever need someone to...to talk to...?"

Link's wrists go limp. Her knuckles brush against the smooth skin of his palms. She dares not look up at him.

She metres out the moment on the steady thudding of her own heart. One. Two. Three. Then Sidon's gills flutter.

"Link," he murmurs, his voice so low that Link shoots her head up to stare at him, "I told you that I would be honest."

She grips his hands.

"But of course, you would have sought to protect me from the truth, for you are most considerate and thoughtful of those around you!"

Link blinks. "Really? People usually say I'm..." But there was Urbosa, and there was Daruk mentioning what she did in Parapa, and there was Marin and the girl who smelled of horses and there is what Riju has told her about herself.

"But of course, most considerate!" His timbre quiets. "I truly do believe in that, Link. It does not take a divine prophecy for me to have known you this past moon."

Leaning forward, Link rests her forehead against Sidon's chest. Cold and damp, rather than warm and dry, like Amali. But someone she knows nevertheless. He removes his right hand from hers to pat her head; she stays like that for a moment prior to pulling away.

"What were you saying about Mipha?"

His gills flap. The volume of his voice rises again. "And, but of course, I am deeply grieved for what happened to my..." And then drops. "...to my most wonderful sister. Yet I find myself in the sadness of having heard of a hero's passing, rather than someone I...knew." Sidon lets out something that isn't quite a chuckle and isn't quite a groan. "Strange, isn't it?"

Link tilts her head. "I don't...know what you mean."

Sidon makes a noise that she cannot identify. "But of course, you're much a better person than I am."

"Wait, what are you talking about?" She studies his features, yet his clouded eyes reveal nothing of how not-Sidon-like he acts.

He affects a solemn-congratulatory tone. "Our Link has borne the Goddess slate all, despite the loss of her memories, to Ruto! And our Link has battled against the very Malice that felled our most wonderful former of Champion of Zola, and has won!" She winces. "And our Link has even sought to spend her time reassuring the Prince Zora of his worth! And the Prince Zora has...has done little but wait for the prophecy to bring our hero to us, and lead failure upon failure to cleanse Vah Ruta!"
Link shakes her head until the room spins around her. "You couldn't cleanse the Divine Beast if you wanted to. You didn't have the slate. The second I got you that, you went right through the terminals like it was nothing. You're the one who cleansed the Divine Beast. And you saved my life like three times."

"It was not only me!"

"What about the monster? And you would've helped again against the Malice if you hadn't been physically restrained! And that's beside the point." She does not speak from that self-hate, bitter as mugwort and sharp as red pepper, that she has tasted on her fingertips so many times before. Instead Link speaks from a self-reflection, cool as chillshroom and hot as cinnamon. "I'm...not that good of a person. I've been cowardly, and I've run away, and I've hurt people, and sometimes I..." The memory of the winter's chill has remained in her marrow, as the memory of the red-bean confectionery has remained in her belly. "...struggled with realising that some of the things I love wouldn't have been possible without the Great Calamity. If that's not messed up, I don't know what is."

Sidon's mouth opens; Link hurries to continue.

"But I understand now that getting better doesn't mean just putting yourself away and trying not to bother people. It really does mean getting better. I don't really get why you think I'm a good person, but I don't get why you'd call yourself a bad person either. You care about your people. You got through the shrine yourself just to make sure I wouldn't die! You feel bad that you aren't grieving for a sister you barely knew! Also could you put a rice-ball in my mouth?"

He extends a hand towards the tray to pluck one such rice-ball while Link continues on. Obediently she opens her mouth. It takes a few moments to figure out where her head is, and a few moments longer for Link to successfully snap it up into her mouth, but the taste of rice-ball on her tongue is worth the fight.

That, and Sidon's little smile at her antics.

"Sidon," Link tries, "tell me what you know about her. I'm listening, you know." She does not know why the words she longs to say ebb on their path from her heart to her arteries to her hands. Nevertheless she pushes them out one by one. "I care about you. And then I'll tell you what I know!"

"What I know of my most wonderful sister!?" Sidon tilts back his head. "But of course, she was the most—"

"I mean what you know."

"...you asked me to be honest with you, Link, and I shall not lie now."

Link beams. "Thanks." She can almost picture that travelling minstrel—Amali's husband, Kass—flourishing a wingtip and invoking the Goddesses. Without further ado.

Next time she sees him, Link reasons, she'll make sure he breaks bread with her.

Sidon starts to speak, and she shifts her focus. "In all honesty, I remember very little of her! When I was younger, I knew her as the older sister I idolised, who seemed the crown pearl of Ruto. Then, when I was perhaps two hundred moons old, she left. Forever. I could not understand the duties she had a Champion! I could not understand why she had apparently abandoned me without so much as a look back! I thought that I must have done something wrong, to have her hate me forever, that I had not been good enough, or because I had felt like...yet she had worried and advised me that I should not..." His voice trails, yet Link can sense in the silence feelings that mirror her own childhood. She traces out reassurances in his palms. "I heard much of her many marvellous feats as the Princess Zora and as the Champion of Zola! She was...nearly everything I wished to be, save for the incongruencies I could not—at the time—put to word! And yet she had left, and with her departure, Father...assured me that she would return after her duties to take her rightful place as the Queen Zora!"

Sidon's chuckle drops the chamber's temperature more intensely than a basket of winterwings. Winterwings that Link could cook. Winterwings that she could—no, no, Sidon first, cooking later.

She listens: "...I was scarcely three hundred moons when the Calamitous One struck. I remember little of that time except the panic of those around me, for I had never seen my father afraid until the day when malice welled up from the ground itself. I know only of the funeral, of our prayers that she—who had sacrificed herself so bravely—would swim forever in the seas of the Goddess, as befit someone as incredible as her!"

Link’s fingers curl inwards. Sidon goes on, his voice hoarsening; the water, she notices, tastes saltier than before.

"I have spent all of my years doing my best to fill in the hole that she left in the heart of Lanayru! I have endeavoured to be even a tenth as wonderful of a prince as she was a princess! To know all those in Lanayru; to do my part in protecting and cherishing and nourishing those around me; to bear our Goddess's people through the tragedies that we have borne!"

"And you’ve succeeded," Link tries to intervene, yet Sidon does not seem to pay notice to his palms.

"And yet I do not do enough! But of course, I have been told, again and again, of the many graces of my most wonderful sister! The greatest healer in all of Lanayru; a spear-wielder in a class all her own; kind, patient, and caring deeply for her people; she who could have been the most wise and benevolent Queen Zora perhaps since our Goddess's departure from our mortal realm—"

"But..." The gestures do not come easily to her; they freeze halfway to her fingertips. Her wrists lock. The tendons of her hands rise from the backs like so many mountains. Mountains that she has climbed, and if she climb to the heights of Mount Hylia and Death Mountain and Mount Satori, then she can tell Sidon the truth. "Mipha didn't get passed some family heirloom. She made the light-scale trident herself. She showed me how to do it herself!"

"She was a silversmith!?" Sidon sounds taken aback.

"She was!" Link insists. "I remember that. And she didn't have some magic touch of healing!" She remembers: what Riju said about the radiant shield. "She was just really good with salves and stuff like that, probably because she could since she was the princess and all."

"I..."

"And she didn't even want to be the Queen Zora! When I first met her, when I was little, she didn't say a word about who she was. She always talked about some family business she didn't want to go into. She became the Champion of Zola and went at it with such happiness, that she could leave Ruto. I don't know what kind of a princess she was, but I know she would rather have done almost anything else but be queen."

The sound that comes from Sidon's throat mixes strangling and sobbing. "I never..."
"I don't know what you've been told. And I don't know what she shouldn't done. I don't know if there's something about time, and legends, and death. When I lived before the Great Calamity, there were so many people who hated me, or who thought I'd never be the hero. And now people treat me like a hero and have heard so many amazing deeds I've supposedly done." Like the historian at Fort Hateno whom she met over a year ago. "And I'm still alive!"

To his eternal credit, Sidon offers her another rice-ball, which she accepts with wild abandon. Then, as the rice renews her vigor, Link flails her arms in front of her.

"Don't get me wrong! Mipha was amazing and she saved me from drowning and she fed me a rice-ball and she helped me so much while I was in Ruto and with the delivering of my courier stuff and with the bar and with recognising me and being the reason I didn't get killed in the court—" Sidon starts to say something but fails silent as Link propels herself forward before the words drain from her hands. "—and she's important to me and I'm glad I got to be her friend and I'm not saying that she should've been forced to stick around and be queen or something like that and I'm not saying that she did the right thing or the wrong thing but life's complicated and she was just a person like how we're just people, you and me, and we've done good things and bad things and that's just how life is." Malon's words. "So we don't have to spend our entire lives beating ourselves up for every bad thing we do. and we don't have to be islands. And we don't have to pretend people were invincible heroes. Just...people. Like me and you. People who eat and drink and sleep and eat and try our best. And you don't have to feel bad that you aren't grieving. Maybe it's 'cause I lost my memories but I don't think you have to feel bad at all."

Link gazes directly at him though he cannot see her eyes. She closes her fingers around his wide palms. Beat-beat-beat.

The rice-ball gives her the strength to go on.

"You try so hard for everyone around you, and everyone knows you, and everyone seems to love you, and you're the one who cleansed the Divine Beast! I don't know what Mipha would've been like. But if you become the King Zora, then I can't imagine the Lanayrish in any more capable hands than yours." She swallows; the rice goes easy down her throat. "...if that makes any sense."

For a moment Sidon says nothing. She listens to the steady hum of the water rippling around him. Then his mouth opens to almost blind her with the shininess of his teeth.

"Link, may a question be asked of you?" She signs an affirmative. "You knew her well! Thus, may I ask, what did she say about me!?"

The rice-ball drops from her mouth. Swiftly she snatches it from the air to rescue the rice from the water, yet the question becomes no easier to answer. "I don't remember that much about her. No, well, that's a lie. I've gotten a lot of my memories back, but there's still a lot I don't remember." Link huffs out half a laugh. "I don't even remember my best friend's name. So, please, just, don't..."

"I understand, Link! And thank you for trying your best!"

Closing her eyes, she rubs the back of her head and touches her chin at the same time, endeavouring to do her utmost to dredge up whatever memories of Sidon she can.

"After I drew the blade of evil's bane...we were in Ruto, since the king wanted me to train there, and stuff, even though she didn't want to be there. We met her father." She corrects herself: "Your father. I saw you in the throne room—the throne pool, too, and I think I asked her later. She said that you were her little—" Link's eyes widen. "—brother."
Sidon's fingers close around her hand for a moment. Then he apologises and asks her to go on.

She does. Or she would, if she remembered anything else.

"She never talked about you. I mean, that I remember! I could be forgetting entire years where she talked about nothing but you!" Link moves her hands frantically. "I just don't remember anything else. I'm sorry."

"The last thing you need do is apologise, Link!" Sidon throws his arms around her with such suddenness that she yelps in alarm. "Thank you for your honesty! As you have asked me to be honest to you, so have you been honest to me! Thank you." He sets Link back down on the water-bed; the mattress ghllshs up and down. "It...helps me to know that! I suppose that's a little strange to bear, but it is..." Sidon's head-tail swishes. "...most relieving."

"I don't think that's strange," Link signs immediately. "People feel what they feel. I've learned that that's just how it is. Right?"

Sidon nods decisively. "It is of course a little difficult for me to accept with how long I have told myself otherwise, but I trust you! Thank you, Link, from the bottom of my heart." The sincerity in his voice cannot be mistaken for anything else. "And Link, if you ever need anyone to talk to about those you have lost, I am your friend! May I call myself that, Link!?"

"Yes," she says, and there's little she's been more sure of in her life.

"Thank you again! From the bottom of my heart, thank you! For everything that you have done not only for our Goddess's people, but also..." He squeezes her hand. "...for that which you have done for me."

Link sniffs. Sidon remains quiet for a long and lengthy moment; she lets him have all the time in the world.

And then—and then, he lifts his voice again. She listens to his timbre: he does not resume with that put-on optimism, but rather with an understanding all his own, as she could never mistake the richness of sunflower oil for any other.

"But we are here now. The people of Ruto and Lanayru are safe. My sister's sacrifice was not in vain. And you are here, Link! As am I! That which we can do together is everything in the world! Please...allow me to finish the tale of your—of our—" Link inhales a breath of pleasant surprise and clenches his fingers all the more tightly. "—most triumphant cleansing of the Divine Beast Vah Ruta! Come, listen in!"

Link obliges. She returns her hand to the tray of rice-balls to stuff them again into her mouth.

Whatever Sidon needs, she'll give him, including moving on.

Sidon begins again. Link, stuck in the nozzle of the pump with only her cooking pot.

Link smacks her hand against her own knee.

If only she had had the slate with her, beneath the mirrored surface of the East Reservoir.

If only she had had the slate.

Then Link could have taken a pictograph of herself stuck in the nozzle of the pump with the cooking pot upon her back. The perfect complement to the pictograph taken in the Divine Beast
Vah Medoh.

While she sputters out rice-ball-flavoured laughter to herself, Sidon continues: to remove Link from the pump before she drowned, they had to break her cooking pot. Her mirth turns to strangling; she lifts her hands to her face, but Sidon reassures her: "But course we've put it back together again! Our most talented smiths Reyden and Jiave have tested the new pot most extensively and have blessed it with the silver of our Goddess! Come, I should think that you will find its abilities much enhanced!"

Link pleads: "Where?"

"With your most lovely horse, Link! We have gathered your belongings there along with your most wonderful friend Sarie! I should think that you would like to see your horse and your belongings when you awoke! As soon as you feel fit enough to go, we'll leave this medical ward and—"

Instantly Link attempts to rouse herself from the bed. Sidon places his hand flat against her chest. He apologises, then claps his hands. A pair of zora healers enter. Come to think of it, she has not seen a single non-zora since she entered Ruto.

Though, with the recent floods and the hundred years of isolation, Link supposes she can understand why.

They poke and prod and generally do what healers do. While they test to see what hurts and what doesn't, and while Link ignores the healers entirely to scarf down further rice-balls, Sidon finishes his story.

Sidon wanted to wait for Link's recovery, as she deserved pilothood ever more than he. And yet the King Zora has passed the title on from sister to brother: the Champion of Zola, the Hero of Lanayru, the Divine Beast Vah Ruta's Pilot, "O Wise Sidon," he concludes, and she sets down the rice-balls to hug him while the healers respectfully stand back.

Out of fear that the Malice could return, Sidon made use of Mipha's slate to activate the final terminal.

"And now we can rebuild! And all of this, thanks to you, Link!" Sidon inhales. When he speaks again, she listens more intently than she ever has before: "To you, and to me, and to everyone else. We did it together, didn't we?"

She nods so hard the healers advise her against breaking her own neck.

The healers quit the chamber. Link springs up again. Sidon pushes her back down. He brings her her clothing: her tunics, patched up yet again. She holds them up to the light and starts to laugh around the rice-ball in her mouth at how she can barely recognise them. Instead of her original undergarments, trousers, tunic, hood, and boots with hints here and there of patches, Link finds herself looking at patches with hints here and there her original clothing.

Sidon rests a hand on her shoulder. She glances at him.

"Link, before we go, you might want to take a look at yourself! When you fought most valiantly against the Malice, the Malice...the Malice injured you gravely! You have been recovering all this time! Only now has your skin healed enough that the healers have agreed to let you go!"

All this time. Only now.

For this, Sidon elaborates, the healers have kept Link unconscious. To stop the spread of malice through her skin, they were forced to burn off the outer layer of her flesh, and thereafter to partially skin her—just the outermost level, twice a day—until they ensured that the malice no longer burrowed beneath her flesh.

Like the malice-tipped arrow shot into her shoulder. Except not just her shoulder, but her entire body, briefly submerged in malice for those few seconds it took her to twist the Malice into the pump.

Link shudders.

She would inquire how long but that would require her to remove her hands from the rice-balls. Sidon answers her unspoken question: for a half-moon.

For two weeks.

She chokes on the rice-ball. He claps her between the shoulder-blades. The rice-ball shoots from her mouth like an ice block from the back of the Divine Beast Vah Ruta.

"Healing from so much malice took time! The healers were afraid you wouldn't make it! I told them that that was nonsense! Of course you would!"

Link whispers into his palm about the elixir in spring green. Sidon squeezes her hand. His voice quiets. Somehow she hears him more clearly when he murmurs than when he booms. "We have records from before the Great Calamity. I myself ensured we had the recipe for hylian elixir." He pauses. "...believe me, Link. I understand. Twice a day, the same dosage as your vials. I'd never leave you in the silence like that!"

Link slumps onto the bed in relief. Then she returns to wolfing rice-balls down. Her stomach starts to hurt, but she presses bravely on until she has polished off every last rice-ball.

"Can we go now?"

"Almost, Link! Before we go, you should..." Sidon clears his throat. "The healers told me that I should ask you to look at yourself before you leave." He sounds as if parroting a memorised message. "They've prepared a mirror for you." Sidon hesitates, then moves to the side.

Link looks beyond him, to the mirror wheeled in upon its stand, tall enough to reflect Sidon's full body from head to toe.

A silver mirror. Covered with a thin blue cloth, so that it reflects nothing but her toes. Link has not seen a full-length mirror, that she can remember, since her awakening. She has seen her face in the water, and she has seen the hand-mirror in Kakariko.

Yet—to suddenly see the whole of her body at once—

Link hears Sidon shifting behind her. "I shall bring you another round of breakfast!" He slaps her again on the back, but for once her body does not budge as if locked in place. "Or maybe two, or three, would better serve you, Link!" He chuckles. She listens to him depart; shortly thereafter, the chamber drains. When she slides off of the floppy bed, the water level reaches her ankles.

She approaches the mirror. Link has not yet looked down at herself, though she can feel the kiss of air upon her bare skin.

She stands in front of the silver. The cloth leaves a gossamer touch upon her fingertips. It flutters onto the water to spread like a stain of wine.
Link looks upon herself.

She reads the stories in the scars that she knows. The bite of the lizalfos on her left arm. The scar of fire-light by her right elbow. The stitches a thumbs-length's down between the toes of her right foot where she ripped herself free of the scimitar. The thin white line up her leg where a bokoblin speared her through. The handprint on her abdomen where the lynel crooked their fingers through her flesh. The streaks of marks under her eyes, drawn in by her own nails. The diagonal curve on her right cheek left by the wolfos. The pockmark of malice like a beauty mark upon her cheek, just to the side of her eye. The lightning-strike scar that spirals down her left arm to the hand that has held the sword that seals the darkness.

And there, from the lower edge of her jawline down to her collarbones, across her shoulders and her arms, over her chest and her stomach, down her hips and her legs: violent violet. Spirals and loops that spread across her flesh in the same patterns of the Malice writhing within the confines of its papery corpse, in the same patterns as the spiral decorations of the shrines and the towers, of the slate and the Divine Beasts.

Like the transfer of maliced ink where the paper of the bestial blight pressed against the paper of her own skin.

The spirals of the lightning-strike scar still glimmer gold above the violet malice.

That brings a smile to her face.

Link runs her hands over her body. The scars do not hurt, but neither do have they lost sensation, unlike the scar of fire-light. She feels with wonder how they raise ridges along her skin as though the Malice has left the contours of the land once known as Hyrule imprinted in her flesh.

Not quite a violent violet.

But the violet of the sash that Marin once wore around her hips, the violet of the sunset over the Tabanch mountains that Aryll loved so, the violet of the ribbons that the girl who smelled of horses wove into Epona's mane.

A violet that carries a beauty of its own. A violet on her skin. A violet not swirling with malice and hatred, but a violet beat-beat-beating in time to her living heart.

Link breathes.

She watches the ripples of her muscles under her skin. The uneasy tension of the scars in her lower belly gouged out by the lynel has lessened in her two weeks of healing; her right foot no longer aches when she puts weight on the tips of her toes.

Link touches her palm to her abdomen, just over the handprint-scar.

When she smiles at herself in the mirror, she can see the tooth she chipped, and that widens her smile further.

She's alive.

Link dons her undergarments and undershirt, then her trousers and tunic, then her boots and the hood.

The fabric clothe the majority of the violet scars, save for those that creep out around her wrists and spiral over her palms, and those that curl over her lower jaw just beyond the border of the hood.
Link draws the hood up.

Her ponytail bobs against the back of her head. Her earrings glint in the light of luminous stones. Her grey eyes shine back at her in the mirror.

She rests her palm against the cool silver.

She.

Link.

The girl who awoke in the Shrine of Resurrection. The girl known as the Champion of Hylia, the Hero of Hyrule, Her Majesty's Knight. The girl who has calmed the Divine Beasts.

The girl who bears the slate.

She remembers the fish-scale dress tucked away in Ilia's saddlebags, and she grins to herself. Maybe someday she could wear a dress the same colour of that clearest, bluest sky that she has ever seen, the colour of Romani's eyes on the ranch that she calls her home.

A little sister.

Sidon returns in the nick of time with two more trays of rice-balls. She can barely keep them down, but Goddesses damn her if she passes up on a chance to consume. Taking the trays with her, Link as she follows Sidon out. She wades through chest-high water in the hallways. Sidon chats animatedly to those he comes across; the Lanayrish say hello to Link. Some inquire about when she plans to mix drink and cook meals for them again. Others congratulate her on the Divine Beast.

The majority drop into the water to thank her. Link panics. When the crowd disperses, she tells Sidon the truth: that she would rather they not treat her as a hero. Not because she runs from her destiny, or because she longs to pass on the slate to someone else, or because she fears the burden of a loftwing around her neck.

No.

Like Riju, seeking honest feedback for her cooking instead of praise for the crown upon her head, Link wants to simply be: Link. Link with all of her responsibilities and all of her promises. But still Link.

Just Link.

With crowds like those, she still sweats, and she still wants nothing more than to curl up with her hands over her ears. But—with Sidon at her side, and Yunobo-Amali-Riju's words at her fingers—when the Lanayrish pass by one or two at a time, Link smiles, and she talks to them.

And then: the stable.

Link does not notice the motion of her own limbs, nor the splash of her boots along the drained-water ground, nor the pain in her knee where she does not quite leap the stable door right. She notices only Ilia, wrapped in Link's arms, her bulk warm, her heartbeat thumping against Link's chest, her breath warm on Link's ear.

When she has satisfied herself that Ilia has done well in her absence, all four hooves, hoofed in horseshoes—a nose, warm and wet and velvet to the touch—eyes, bright and gentle—lashes, dark and clear—a tail, very swishy—a mane, less swishy but nice to run her fingers through—two ears, flicky back-and-forthy—and a big ole thumper of a heart, to beat in time to the life of her beloved companion, her wonderful Ilia, only then does Link thank the flushed stablehand over and over, and only then does she move on to check her belongings. The red telescope and the paraglider. The sword Riju gave her, but not the fire-light spear, evidently lost to the waves. The slate—Link tests it to ensure that it continues to work properly, though she no longer has Divine Beasts to calm—and her satchel. She opens the wooden box to find the spring green elixirs restocked, and the vials that once held yellow elixir similarly washed out to produce a sea of green as light as spring.

Link could pick up Sidon and swing him around with her happiness. But first she need check up on the companion that has been with her since the beginning.

Her beloved cooking pot, which has saved her life more times than she can count, and which continues to save her life each and every day of her existence.

Link can tell where the cooking pot broke into four grooved pieces, and where the silversmiths have repaired it. She traces the line of tempered silver up and down the inside of the cooking, notes the sheen of moonlight within where the smiths have done their best to ensure the cooking pot still heats evenly.

A familiar whirl and a sound of wooden blocks tumbling against one another rouses her from her cooking pot reverie. Sarie leaps out from her satchel to smack her in the face. "Link! Link! Link's very pretty. Sarie saw the droopy-droop-fish get Link out of the water!" Sarie whirs around. "Sarie saw the paint get aaaaaall over Link. But now Link is better! And Link's pony-pona is big! She's big and warm! Link's big too but Link's smaller than pony-pona!"

Link pets Sarie on the head. "You're the first person to call me big. But I guess I'm actually tall compared to you."

"Link's super big!" Sarie insists. They drop the hood from Link's head to pap the violet swirls around her throat. "And so pretty! Sarie wants to be painted like this! Sarie's swirlies are all green and brown." They indicate their own bark-like skin, dappled whorls in hues of leaves and clay. "Link's all pretty...like the night heavens."

Suddenly Link snaps her fingers—with a thought to Urbosa as she does—and bats her cooking pot. She grins to Sarie. "I said I was gonna make you food, right? So lemme make you something."

She does not know about loam, but she has seen how Sarie's tiny hands split into so many roots. And trees and plants eat the manure of animals, eat the mulch of fallen leaves, eat the earth.

Soil, and wood. Surely that would suffice a delicious meal for a korok such as Sarie.

"Wait there," Link tells them. Sidon offers to go with her; together they quit Ruto to forage for soil in the hills beyond.

The Divine Beast Vah Ruta remains in the East Reservoir, though Sidon has walked it closer to the dam. The Divine Beast's eyes no longer glare in violent violet.

Light blue. That skylit blue of the blade of evil's bane, of the fire-light, of the eyes of the girl with the golden hair.

They pass abandoned villages that Sidon names Tijo and Rutela, villages evacuated to Ruto on the tide of the rain, villagers that with luck will soon see again their children. And from Tijo and Rutela—Link remembers one of Purah's assistants hailed from there—and other settlements, eventually the Lanayrish zora will again thrive in their home. With the rains gone, the people of the land known as Hyrule who cannot live in the water—gerudo and sheikah, rito and gorons, hylians and korok, though Link adds the final note herself as she has only ever seen two koroks in her life—can return again to Lanayru, and once more the land can live.

It may take centuries, but the zora will thrive, and the land will live. "All we need is power, wisdom, courage, and faith in our Goddess!" Sidon beams. "And faith in ourselves, too."

Sidon and Link bring back what they can, though Link does not readily know how to distinguish one type of soil from another. She prepares a layered cake of clay and mud, of pressed leaves and flowers, all rounded up with a sprinkle of crushed and dampened bark.

This she presents to Sarie.

Sarie places their hand upon the dish.

"Unngh!" says Sarie, and Link leans in to hear the judgment, her heart thudding, her eyes embiggened, her world narrowed to focus entirely on Sarie. "Sarie hates this! Sarie thinks it's awful!" They bang their tiny limbs against the rim of the cooking pot. "Sarie's sorry but Link doesn't know how to cook loam! But Sarie understands! Sarie will show Link!"

Link looks at them, and they look at Link, with their curved head-branches that loop around, and their green leaf-mask, and their whirling korok leaf, and she bursts out laughing.

She remembers the failed recipes that she cooked with the girl who smelled of horses. She remembers all the overcooked rice, all of the too-thin soup, all of the oh that said one cup not one kilo, all of the what if we just substituted this ingredient with the other wooow how was I supposed to know that would make the pot blow up, all of the well this is awful but at least we made it together and that's what counts. She remembers, even, the night in the forest, the night that one of the goats of the ranch escaped from the open doors, the night that she had tried to stop the goat with her bare hands and her left arm had gotten stuck in the goat's looped horn, the night that the girl who smelled of horses had chased the goat and managed to climb its back only for the goat to speed both her and Link into the woods, the night that she and the girl who smelled of horses had spent huddling together by a campfire, the night that they spoke to one another for the first time, the night that the girl who smelled of horses apologised over and over with her forehead against the forest floor.

The night that Link endeavoured to make a meal of leaves and mushrooms, and the night that Link nearly poisoned them both, and the night that the girl who smelled of horses has never let her forget.

Link wipes the tears from her eyes. She promises to make Sarie a proper loaf whenever Sarie has time to teach Link how to cook for koroks.

"A loam! A loam!" Sarie corrects, and Link ducks her head.

"A loam."

A clearing of a throat.

Link turns around, but Sidon recognises the patterns in the thin layer of water first: "Muzu?"

Muzu.

Muzu who stands there, leaning into a walking stick, his arms shivering, his head bowed beneath the weight of his years.
“...may I speak to you?”

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: The comment about the "let[ting] herself spread out to the edges of eternity" is something that will most certainly come back later, not to mention the golden sky. Someone familiar with past Zelda games, particularly A Link to the Past, might be able to hazard a guess as to what this is referring to.

Yunobo left Link a letter; Amali left Teba (the trusted confidante) in charge of Link; and Riju, of course, prepared a rooftop meeting from which Link fled.

At least Link was unconscious for that medical procedure. Ouch! It's the malice-tripped arrow but much more serious, given that it was eating away at her entire body, and it took her quite a while to recover for that reason.

You know how the "silver" tier of enemies have purple splotches over them? Yep, that's from exposure to malice. Most of Link's body save for her face (which, if you recall, Link didn't let Waterblight Ganon touch) is now covered in similar purple marks.

If you don't remember, Link chipped a tooth in the forty-seventh chapter, when she tried to bite into a fish roasted by lightning that turned out to be rock-hard.

Link calling the girl with the golden hair's eyes "blue" here is not a mistake. You've probably seen her get confused in previous memories; memory is fallible and she's now mistaken about this, just as she was mistaken about the location of Marin's ranch, and just as she didn't even remember about Akkala for some time.

Tijo is named after the character from Majora's Mask, and Rutela after that from Twilight Princess. It's weird how many of the landmarks (like the "Rutala" stuff) seem to be misspellings of actual names while others are properly preserved (like "Eagus"), and I can't help but wonder whether that's a mistake in translation.

Regarding Sidon's age at the time of the Great Calamity: the Lanayrish zora measure time in "hundred-moons", owing to their much longer lifespans, so years aren't necessarily a sufficient measure for them. One "moon" refers to a single cycle of twenty-eight days; the Lanayrish utilise a lunar calendar rather than a solar calendar, meaning that their "months" shift from year to year as they are tracked to the moon instead of the earth's passage around the sun. One "hundred-moon" period is roughly 7.6 years. For Sidon, \(300 \times \frac{28}{365.25} = 23\) years. Note that twenty-three years of age is very very young for a zora, and is not equivalent to a human twenty-three years of age. Since Link last saw Mipha (as a child, before meeting her again as an adult) over eight years prior to the start of the Great Calamity, I calculate that Sidon would have been around two hundred moons, about fourteen years of age or so.
The conversation between Link and Sidon in this chapter (the one about Mipha and such, that lasts seven pages: good job, midna's ass) was rather difficult to write. People are complete, and there are no easy answers. But neither should people have to forgive. And remember...not all siblings, and not all families, are the best. Link assumes that Sidon had a similar relationship with Mipha that she had with Aryll; this, she learns, isn't the case. I also have an implication in this chapter that Mipha did not act the most wisely regarding young-Sidon's feelings regarding gender, although Mipha was likely not doing so intentionally but out of ignorance (if you recall, she was also somewhat unsure when Link came out to her). That doesn't change the consequences of her actions.

Rock-hard food comes from cooking ore or trees, and it's very useful when you're trying to take on the Trial of the Sword on Master Mode on three hearts! After all, you get plenty of opportunities to cut down some trees, and every tree then gives you the equivalent of a half heart.

Eyyy, and Link fails to make food! She's not a perfect omniscient cook, you know, and of course she'll struggle with things outside of her usual calibre.

And here you also have the context for that memory regarding the night where Link and Ilia talked seriously to one another for the first time.

Up next: a chat with Muzu; Link's last night in Ruto.

Beta reader's comments: Sidon's relationship to Mipha is really interesting and complex. I really enjoy that level of complexity being portrayed. It feels so tangible.

Link asking Sidon to put a rice ball in her mouth mid-conversation is an extremely Link moment.

Link's badass scars from getting fucked up get yet more badass from getting yet more fucked up.

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef speaks to the former Lanayrish adviser; locates the whereabouts about the chef's past and hometown; and spends a final night in the city.

Chapter Notes

I said this in response to a review on the FFN cross-post version of this, but I'll add it here since I find it relevant: Yep, character growth everywhere! I think it's important for Link (and others) to realise that the past is not something to be run from, not something demonised or something idolised, but simply something to be accepted. The past does not define who you are; it just gives you the starting point of who you're going to be. Part of that is accepting the people of your past as people, and nothing more. Mipha was a person who did some good and some bad. So were the rest of them.

As for the labyrinth and the dragons, I will note that we're going to cover a lot of shrines in an upcoming chapter; I won't spoil you on which ones we cover exactly, but you may find some of your favourites among them. As for the dragons, I've already had Link spot them in the distance once or twice (particularly Dinraal and Farosh). But, you know, Link has yet to help Naydra, who is just out there suffering at the moment, like in-game. So we'll get there when we get there.

And for the fic, honestly, if I had my way and had infinite time, I would've gone into massive detail on Link's journey instead of skimming over so much! But I figured that people wouldn't want to reread merely a retread of what they've already played, so I focused on covering the things I had changed or things that I wanted to comment on specifically. This might have been well over a million words otherwise.

And now, author's notes that wouldn't fit in the end: As always, thank you so much for reading and supporting me; thank you for all of your comments and other methods of support, and thank you for sticking with me all this while. I know how long Delicious in Wilds, so thank you again for continuing to read. And thank you to my beta reader, Emma, for how much she puts in and how fine she is with "haha yeah I know it's 1am but let's proof the fifty-fifth chapter anyway."

I noted in previous chapters that Sidon's palms are smooth; zora do not have wrinkles or creases in their palms (especially the larger ones), at least not like humans do, nor do they have fingerprints. Older zora also do not wrinkle as they age: their fins droop and so forth, but their skin remains smooth.

The word emote means to literally show emotion and does not just refer to emoticons/etc (or emotes in video games, for that matter).

Given the huge emphasis on the use of luminous stone in Zora's Domain in-game and the fact that the in-game zora monuments are carved onto such large luminous rocks, I thought that it was appropriate for their actual writing system to also be on stone tablets, given that paper would not survive well in water. It also means that the Lanayrish written language is similar to real-world Braille in the sense that it can be read by the blind; note that while Braille relies on raised characters, Lanayrish relies on lowered carvings.

In Breath of the Wild, the in-game landmark of Kanalet Ridge is right next to the area where I chose to locate the province of Ordona. Kanalet Ridge is named after Kanalet Castle from Link's Awakening. I decided to include a river (there are really far too few rivers in Breath of the Wild) which I chose to name the Kanalet River (as a nod to the moat about Kanalet Castle, wherein you can get a piece of heart!), as it is known on official maps produced in Central Hyrule. However, locally in Ordon, the river was known as Totaka's River. You see, in Link's Awakening, Kanalet Castle was headed by a Prince Richard, named after one of the main characters of Kaeru no Tame ni Kane wa Naru (this game's engine was later used for Link's Awakening). However, I didn't want to use the name Richard, as it personally bothers me when "real-world" names are used for Zelda characters outside of coincidences; there's no better way to pull me out of a fic than suddenly seeing names like "Sheila" crop up (no offence to anyone named Sheila reading this; it's a pretty name and I was just using as an example of a real-world name). I have done my utmost to ensure that all character names in Delicious in Wilds follow the conventions set up for names in Breath of the Wild. I did know a bit of trivia about Link's Awakening: you can hear a certain nineteen-note composition in Richard's house. This nineteen-note composition was written by Totaka Kazumi and appears in many games on which he worked. In a nod to this, the Ordoners refer to the river locally as Totaka's River. There are many real-world examples of landmarks having a different local name, especially for landmarks like rivers which pass through multiple areas.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Muzu.

Muzu stands with Link outside of the stable. He inclines his head. His shoulders shake, his back bowed inwards, his facial fins drooping, his pectoral fins having wasted away with his age.

"I apologise," he signs; Link cocks her head. "I understand if you do not forgive me. I do not expect...I do not expect even the Goddess to forgive me for what I have done." Muzu's arms shiver. At least he still speaks with the same Lanayrish of a hundred years prior: Link need not panic about the slight differences that a century of evolution of language can bring.

Link tilts her head to the side. Raising her hands, she gazes at her fingers, at the lightning-strike scar, at the violet scars that whorl in her palms. She pictures the words she cannot speak like a particularly armoured porgy, one even harder than rock roast. Yet, even the hardest of armoured porgy will soften in the heat of a cooking pot, if only she lets it simmer on the fire for long enough. Then she merely has to jump headfirst into the cooking pot. But only with some butter so that she can move her head back out afterwards.

She simmers the words. She simmers the words. She simmers the words, and just when Muzu raises the ridges of his brows at her as though asking whether she has just stuck a sapphire arrow into herself—no thank you; she has already done that once, and it has taken her foot nearly three months to recover—Link manages to speak. "I wanted to come back to thank you."

Muzu stares at her.
"Thank you for all of your help," she continues. "I...know that it must be. Really hard. Since everything that happened. Like with Mipha. And stuff. I know that that's all hard since she meant so much to you. Like how she meant so much to me. Not that she meant more to me than she did to you! I know that you knew her for so much longer than I did! Probably longer than I'm ever gonna live! But she still meant. A lot to me." She's losing her words. She simmers her hands further in the pot. "But but but!" As she motions through the same gesture thrice, Link recalls Rotana of Uruda University, with her overly excited beam and her long talks of the mirrors of the land once known as Hyrule, and she remembers the zapshroom omelet that she and Dyeri made together, and that gives her the strength to push onwards. "So I wanted to thank you. Because even though all this happened, and you probably hated me which I probably deserve but maybe not anymore or something I'm still kind of figuring these things out as I go, but anyways even though! All that happened! You still helped me out. You showed me where the lynel thing was. And you helped me get the lightning-y arrows. And you helped tell me how to calm the Divine Beast. And it's thanks to the lightning thing that you told me about that I figured out the thing with the pot! Or maybe you don't know what the thing with the pot is. Well either way it's thanks to you that after all of that you turned on the pump of the Divine Beast thingy to suck up the Malice. And after all of that you saved my life. Even if that meant that you broke my cooking pot." She touches her chin. "But I forgive you because you helped me! And you helped Sidon! And you helped all the people of Ruto and Lanayru and the entire world since you helped calm the Divine Beast! So thank you!" She remembers Sidon. "Thank you! Thank you! I could...I could...I could thank you so much but the thanks wouldn't even...something about a puddle...something about..." Link sputters. Her fingers twitch. Her hands droop to her sides. She bows instead, so hard and fast that her forehead bonks against Muzu's; both of them stumble apart. Link apologises profusely.

When she raises her head, she sees Muzu gazing upon her with an expression so peculiar that she cannot place it. His third eyelid slides horizontally over his eyes.

Then Muzu sets down the walking stick to kneel upon the ground before her. Water ripples rhythmically from his crouched form.

With a strangled breath in the back of her throat, Link steps backwards.

"In all of the moons that have risen and set in my life," Muzu signs, his arm wheeling in motions that remind her of the tides, "I have never met someone who could change my opinion so drastically in the span of about five waves."

Link cocks her head to the side.

he wipes his palms against his abdomen.

"I should be the one thanking you." Muzu bows again. He seems to bear some difficulty in lifting himself back up. Link crouches down, gathers the walking stick from the floor, and offers it to him. "Thank you. When you...first came here, as the original Champion of Hylia twelve hundred moons ago, I admit that I...I admit that I thought poorly of you. You carried upon your face the expression of one who seemed to either not care of anything around herself, or one who expected the world to fall at her and spill riches into her arms."

Link takes another step back.

"You never spoke. I do not think I ever witnessed you so much as emote, except for when you ate." She smiles sheepishly. "However, I understand now that only a fool would have judged someone for merely her face. I was wrong. I was wrong about you. All of the words in the world, as droplets in the ocean, could not convey my regrets for what I have done."
"When you came to me, when the King Zora and the Prince Zora demanded that I aid you, I felt nothing but the foul bile of bitterness rise within me. In truth...we have plenty of topaz arrows, as we were attempting to use them to quell the storm, and that has failed. I sent you to the lynel to die, and if that did not work, I knew that the topaz arrows could not bring down Vah Ruta."

Muzu continues, his gaze cast upon the ground: "I was wrong about you. I sent you twice to your death, and twice you have done nothing but aid us. Twice I sent you to where you would meet your end, inadequately prepared, and twice you transformed my actions into those that would save us all."

"Oh," Link signs, touching her chin. "In Darunia, I met a goron...a repair worker, I think? He told me to go to the northern mine. I didn't figure this until way later but he was saying it as a joke. There wasn't gonna be anything there. But I met Yuno-yunobo there, and I helped him calm the Divine Beast that'd been chucking rocks all over Eldin. We even made an omelet together. And some sautéed ironshroom. It was really good!"

Once more Muzu's third eyelid slides over his eyes.

"I don't really mind. I'm not angry. I don't know..." Link rubs the back of her head. "Maybe I should be angry, but I'm...not? I'm really not. Just don't get anyone else to do that. I don't mind if you send me on dangerous things like that! It'd be different if it was someone else, but...I mean, because of that, the lynel isn't going to hurt people anymore, right? It worked out."

He swings his head from side to side. "In all of the moons that have risen and set in my life," Muzu says for the second time, "I, truly and honestly, have never met someone who could change my opinion so drastically in the span of about five waves." He bows once more, and then he offers her his hands.

The Lanayrish custom. Of being touchy-feely.

Link rests her hands in his; he draws her into an embrace.

"I forgive you!" she says again, just in case. "And if you want I'll make you some food!"

Muzu shakes his head.

"You are the most peculiar Champion I have ever met. Nevertheless, perhaps now this is the time for peculiar Champions. For only a peculiar Champion could have struck down Vah Ruta with a cooking pot."

Link laughs and rubs the back of her head. Muzu thanks her again. They part ways. When Link returns to Sidon, he has with him an interpreter whispering into his ear—presumably the contents of her and Muzu's conversation—who waves to Link and departs upon her passage.

Sidon lets her know immediately that she does not need to forgive Muzu. "Father has removed Muzu from his post," he informs her. "He will no longer advise Father, or any of us, for his terrible actions!"

She shrugs. "I already forgave him. I don't know if he's a good advisor or not, but I'm just not angry, I guess."

He grips her shoulders. "You can be if you feel the need to! You do not need to turn the other cheek!"
"I know. But I'm not. I dunno." Rolling her shoulders, Link steps forward to pet Ilia's mane.

The conversation turns.

Sidon asks of what she plans to do now. Enthusiastically he starts to talk of finding proper permanent chambers for her in the palace; she stops him with a touch to the wrist.

She has to leave.

To Ordon, and then to Medli, and then to fulfill her promise to Dorian, and then perhaps to Kakariko to see Impa again and see what she can glean about this Calamitous One, and then to Hateno to finally give Purah those guardian cores, and then somewhere in there to bring Sarie back home, wherever their home may lie, and then to Romani Ranch. The summer has but two weeks until the onset of autumn, and she has a ways to go before the winter's snows slow her travels.

Yet, no matter how far she goes, she will always come back to visit Sidon. In fact, Link promises to visit, and his drooping facial fins perk back up.

"Before you are to set out, then," he announces, "Father wishes to see you!"

Link enters the throne pool. This time, Muzu neither ignores her nor glares at her, but rather dips his head in respect. She bows to him.

Sidon's father the King Zora clears the throne pool as before. Muzu leaves with the others: no longer an advisor.

"O Champion of Hylia, O Hero of Hyrule, O Her Majesty's Knight, O Courageous Link...on behalf of my people, of the Goddess Zola, of all of Lanayru, and of my late daughter...thank you, my lass." The King Zora smiles broadly at her; Link rubs the back of her head. "Thank you for returning to me the memories of my daughter, and for granting my lad his pilot's slate, hoo hoo. I am pleased to see you well, hoo hoo, and I am pleased to announce that my lad has become Vah Ruta's own pilot." Sidon beams. A genuine beam. "Thank you."

They speak for a time. The King Zora inquires if anything ails her, and she responds by thanking him for the healers. When he talks of the Divine Beast Vah Ruta, Link confirms that the other Divine Beasts similarly awoke all over Hyrule over a year ago, but have since been calmed once more. The timing gives her pause: all of the Divine Beasts, awakening apparently at the same time. Yet the King Zora goes on, and Link refocuses onto his words. "Then we will send a delegation to Darunia immediately. Thank you, my lass."

The King Zora proffers her anything that she might wish. Riches beyond her wildest dreams, or Mipha's light-scale trident, or anything that Link might desire.

She wishes, simply, to be able to come back whenever she wishes, and for a free pass to use the kitchens.

The King Zora guffaws a belly-rolling laugh. "You needn't even have asked for that, hoo hoo! I see you almost as a daughter of mine, my lass." Link feels like her mouth might fall off for how widely she smiles.

That, by itself, proves more than enough.

More, so much more, than enough.

The King Zora presents to her the cleaned monster parts of the lynel, if she so wishes to use them, as a small token of his gratitude for her dispatching the monster. Link accepts enough guts, hooves, and horns to brew herself elixir for the coming trek to Ordon.

Some sort of elixir that might produce the effects of endura carrot on Ilia. Something or other enduring.

She considers making something of the lynel's mane or hide, but she takes one whiff of the lynel's matted fur, nearly passes out from the stench, and—patting it with her hands—puts it back.

Link then makes her own request: she asks the King Zora of whether the Lanayrish might carry an atlas of the land once known as Hyrule. Sidon takes her to the royal library, the books carved in raised letters upon waterproof luminous stones. Sidon skims his webbed fingers over their spines to pick out the atlas, reading the titles from the contours of the characters. "I have heard that non-Lanayrish tend to write upon paper! I cannot imagine! Would not the paper become most wet by the slightest water!?" Link tries to explain that most other places in the land do not regularly submerge in fluid. The librarian, peeking her head around to tell Sidon to lower his voice, takes the opportunity to boast to Link about the superior method of writing up luminous tablets, which allows sighted readers to continue their craft even in the dark, whilst non-Lanayrish papers and scrolls require lights and open flames. Link nods her head, though she understands little. The librarian withdraws.

In a whisper that somehow rings just as loudly as his normal speaking voice, Sidon announces that he has chanced upon a map.

She cannot find Ordon on the atlas. Or Zubora, or Gabora, or Ache's Veil, or Rovah, or Ilari. And if Ilari does not exist on the map, then the atlas must be old indeed.

Another atlas divulges no secrets in Necluda, but, just when Link has begun to give in, she notes the name Ordona Province near the southwestern portion of Akkala.

Near the southwestern portion of Akkala?

Link stares at the atlas. She retrieves her own map—careful not to let the paper touch the water, while Sidon marvels at the texture and inquires how she can read with the entire map flat as, well, paper—and sketches in Akkala. She discovers that she cannot fit the whole portion of Akkala into the parchment that she has remaining, but she can fit Ordon. And somewhere in the heart of Ordona she will find Ordon, and somewhere in the heart of Ordon she will find the house.

Not in Necluda, but in Akkala.

She has learned Necludan, as she has learned Central Hyrulean, as she has learned Lanayrish. But she has spoken Akkalan since her childhood days.

Akkala.

Akkala with its autumn-warmth trees.

Link finds the name Ordon. She traces the characters with her fingers. Along the Kanalet River, far west of the Torin Wetland, northeast of Cephla Lake, southwest of Ulri Mountain, north of the Akkalan Span.

Ordon.

Sidon exclaims—the librarian shushes him—that he has uncovered the most recent atlas, furnished not seventy years ago, but already Link has sketched in a crude heart along the Kanalet River.
She furls up the parchment.

Link thanks Sidon a million times. Before she leaves Ruto, she stocks up on ingredients. A mark of ink upon her wrist momentarily leaves her scratching her cheek until she snaps her fingers and recalls the exact food she cooked on that day: crab omelet with rice. Link worries for a moment that she has seen neither hair nor hide of goats anywhere near Ruto. And yet the enterprising courage of travellers and merchants assuages her fears.

In the two weeks that she has lain in bed recovering from her second dose of maliced fever, merchants and travellers alike have come pouring in to Ruto with wares that the city has not seen in over a year. Link stocks up: goat butter, rock salt, cane sugar, spices, more rice, wheat from Tabantha, a bottle of fresh milk that she drinks down with a pwah and which leaves a fuzzy-white moustache on her upper lip, and ingredients for her elixir.

She consults the merchants. Some of them cannot read sign in any tongue, but she has Sidon at her side. Link walks away, arms laden with endura carrot and endura shroom, alongside an entire tank of frogs that do not stop hopping for even a second. Sidon offers to pay; instead, Link ponies up the last of her rupees and then sets about selling some of the lynel parts. But she does turn to sign into his palms: "If you want to give them a tip, you can!"

Sidon practically pours out entire purses of rupees onto the merchants who have just sold Link a tank of frogs. He welcomes them to "our beloved Ruto, the crown jewel of our Goddess," and they bend themselves over thanking him.

He tells them to stand.

Link returns to the stable. While she prepares the elixir in her cooking pot, Ilia browses through her hair. She unties her ponytail. Ilia grabs hold of her hair to chew it between her teeth. Her companion tugs on the back of her head, slightly painfully, yet Link merely reaches up to stroke Ilia's warm cheek.

And then: the elixir.

She sets aside enough of the endura carrot to feed Ilia on the road. They will go long. Link does not intend to stop until she can catch greengill and Ordon catfish once again to make herself a paella. Just for herself and the girl who smelled of horses.

Who, maybe, still smells of horses.

Link boils the lynel hooves first, since drawing out the essence of the hardened hoof will take the longest. When she tries to remove the softer meat inside of the hoof, she succeeds only in chipping her knife. Boiling hooves it is, then.

While she waits for the hooves to boil out before adding the less hard lynel guts—where less hard still means so tough that she cannot rip them apart without a fire-light knife that she does not possess—she shares with Sidon folktales of one another's childhoods. Link tells him of Kass's Ballad of the Sealing War, of the Four Heroes as One, of the songs that Marin taught her, that Maryll taught her, that Malon and Vish taught her, that Cremia and Romani will teach her yet. She tells him of Hestu's stars, and she tells him of the mirrors of the girl with the golden hair, and she tells him of the stories from the books that she and the girl who smelled of horses read together curled up like a pair of parentheses upon the bed.

Link dices the endura carrots and mushrooms. Into the pot they go. She applies a salve of lavender and clove oil to the bellies of the tireless frogs. Little by little, the frogs cease to move. She tests their responses by gently pinching their sensitive webbed feet. When they lie still and silent, she beheads swiftly with a knife and minces them. Into the pot they go.

He tells her, in turn, something part history and part folklore, part myth and part legend. The Goddess Zola that blessed Lanayru with an abundance of rain. How long, long ago, when the world was still young and the Seven Goddesses walked upon the land in the same footsteps as Their mortal children, the Golden Goddesses birthed servants in the form of three great Dragons to watch over Their lands. From the Sacred Realm the Dragons would emerge each morning, and into the Sacred Realm the Dragons would pass each night. The Goddess Nayru wound around Her finger the boundless river that stretched from the mountain peak, and from the snows and the waters the Dragon Naydra, servant of water, emerged. Yet this dried the water upon which the zora depended. The Goddess Zola, seeing the distress caused to Her children the zora people, lay Herself down at the peak of Mount Nayru and gave Herself to become the River Zola, to forever protect Her children of Lanayru. He tells of the Sage of Zola after whom the city Ruto takes her name, a Sage that sacrificed her life for the people of Lanayru. He tells her of the East Reservoir, built years ago in cooperation with the royal family of Hyrule, of how the royal family—descendants of the reincarnation of the Goddess Hylia—had united Hyrule under their banner, of how the royal family had not treated non-hylians as best they could in those early years of the kingdom, but of how one later queen, whose forefathers had nearly driven the gerudo people from Central Hyrule, had sought to make amends for the sins of her ancestors, one of whose projects had entailed the building of the East Reservoir dam. He tells her of the guardian stalker that his father threw over a cliff, and of the giant water octorok that had swallowed Sidon whole for three days and three nights before Sidon managed to pierce its belly through with a silver-scale spear. He tells her of a story of star-crossed lovers separated by a flood of the River Zola, and how the Goddess Herself had sent down a rain of opals to absorb the water, quelling the flood and reuniting them with their beloved, and how ever since, opal earrings have symbolised the union of marriage, for the opals that could bring the spouses together even against the maelstrom of flood.

Opal earrings.

Link smacks herself on the forehead. When next she sees Misan and Glepp, she will have to bake for them a belated wedding cake.

The elixir comes out in lime green. Not quite the same colour as spring green, but close enough that Link beams by association.

She gathers her belongings. She checks Ilia's saddlebags. Link examines all that she has, from her cooking pot to her paraglider to her telescope to her sword to her bow. Sidon inquires if she has any requests, and she does: arrows for her quiver, and perhaps a spear in case she loses her sword.

"But of course! All that and more! Please, Link, follow me, and I'll grant you your wishes!" Sidon grins. He flashes a thumbs-up. Link promises Ilia to return momentarily. She leaves Sarie to take care of her companion; Sarie salutes and promises to watch over Link's master with their very life.

Link follows Sidon. As they wind through Ruto again, she notices that the level of the water of the city has been once more raised so that the top half perches above water and the bottom half below, with the non-zora travellers residing in the top. She recognises the zora that used to frequent her bar. Link says hello. She does not quite remember their names, but she remembers their orders and their favourites.

One day, she will cook for them again.

To mix drinks, and to change lives.
Sidon leads her up and up and up. The night has by now nearly ended. At the eastern edge of the sky flitted between the Lanayrish peaks, Link can just make out the bands of pink and orange beginning to lighten the heavens.

They climb up, and up, and up, and up and up and up and up and she loses track at some point but she thinks that they continue to climb up. If only she took the elixir with her.

Up.

And up.

And just when she wants to tell Sidon that if she climbs another step up, the Goddess Erito surely will take pity on her and fashion wings out of her failing legs, the stairs end; Link finds herself standing on top of a massive statue in the shape of a fish.

Before her: a table. And beyond that: Ruto.

The highest point in the city of Ruto. From here she gazes upon the layers upon layers that make up the city, so many of them abandoned as the remaining zora people of Lanayru have headed further down to protect themselves from monsters and the Divine Beast, the once-polished carvings dull or broken, the remains of lizalfos nests visible along the toppled archways surrounding where she stands in the heart of the ruin of the final bastion of the Lanayrish, where the outer villages have long fallen away and the inner ones washed into the river.

She remembers the kitchens, nine-tenths unused.

Link cannot wait to one day return to the splendor of Ruto, so once more full of life that the kitchens cannot hold the amount of food prepared.

Yet, beyond the lingering scars of the Great Calamity, she can see the city that the people of Lanayru love so dearly, can see the people that live and cry and laugh, can see the Lanayrish feverishly working to once more polish the city and to clear the upper levels of monsters even while she looks on, can see the inverted spire of the Temple of Zola, can see the statues of luminous stones and the decorations carved from the mountains themselves over years upon years of each generation building upon the last, can see the cascades of waterfalls down the mountains that glitter as though born of the night sky, can see the slow sunrise that golds the waters.

The iridescent shift of hues over the lake steals her breath.

Link's hands lower to her sides.

The summer sunrise widens her eyes and quickens her heart for its beauty. But the most beautiful sight yet lies upon the table that stretches so long Aryll might have needed not three but thirty pieces of paper to draw its width.

Food.

Food, steaming hot or icy cold, of every Lanayrish manner she could think of, and so many more besides. Two entire pots of rice, one steamed white and the other fried with shrimp. Mountains upon mountains of rice-balls, some looped in seaweed and some not, some triangular and some circular, with fish or with herb or with crab or with mushroom or with all of the above. Thick, salty stews and dark, scented sauces. Clam chowders and fish broth. Shrimp peeled and waiting between bowls of dips in red and in black, in green and in brown. Crabs, freshly caught, stuffed with herbs, or their legs piled high in stacks still wisping heat. Snails cleaned of their shells and set upon beds of spices and salts. Roe spread over omelets. Shellfish wrapped in rice crepes. Oysters waiting in buckets of ice. Whole lobsters boiled to red perfection. Every manner of fish: salmon steamed with fleet-lotus seeds and trout grilled with salted tree nuts, porgy ceviche in lemon-lime and tuna rolls on rice, swordfish strung with saffron and nightshade and bass oiled and fried to gold, carp gaping with buttered herbs and herrings speared through with truffle. And those: merely the main dishes. Between them lie a thousand tiny bowls containing bite-sized samples of other foods that flood her mouth with more saliva than all of the Goddess Zola's rains combined could have flooded the river.

And the centrepiece: a massive silver shark, cooked whole, smothered in sauce and stuffed to the brim.

"And did I not promise you, for completing the trial of Zola's Domain set forth by our Goddess Zola," Sidon booms, wrapping Link in a hug before unleashing her upon the table, "a feast?"

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Link shows a lot of enthusiasm in talking. She has a little bit of an on/off switch and doesn't really know how to _regulate_ her speech yet, so either she's withdrawn, or she's (as you can see here) just talking about whatever she can think of.

Muzu was initially turned off by Link after seeing her from afar, not to mention the fact that Link didn't fit the propaganda version of the hero that Muzu had heard of. Of course, the leaders of each sovereign kingdom within Hyrule were informed about Link's true appearance, but that doesn't make the "reveal" any less shocking for most. Since Link always had a vacant expression on her face when it came to big crowds, people got the impression that she was apathetic or that she was only there for _something_, which was certainly not assisted by that in-game thing where people keep assuming that Link has a look of the face that indicates Link wants compensation for something.

It takes quite a bit to make Link angry, especially when it comes to _herself_. You've seen her motivated by the hurt of others, such as her revenge against the bokoblins who hurt Ilia back in Tabantha, but never have we really seen her angry about something that happened to _her_.

In _Breath of the Wild_, Muzu's opinion is changed by showcasing that the zora wedding armour that Mipha made for Link perfectly fits, which causes Muzu to decide to help and trust Link after all. However, that was very lucky indeed that Link lost or gained absolutely no weight or muscle whatsoever during (1) the presumed months between Mipha making the armour and Calamity Ganon showing up, (2) the one hundred years that Link spent unconscious and possibly wasting away given the fact that everyone in the game says that Link is weaker now than Link was one hundred years ago, and (3) the possible significant period of time between Link awakening, growing stronger, and arriving in Zora's Domain. Additionally, even if Mipha actually loved Link, how does that change Muzu's point about Link taking "Lady Mipha" from the zora? Instead, I thought that Muzu would have very strong feelings about Link that aren't merely about proving that Hylians Aren't So Bad After All Let Me Be Your Saviour.

If you don't remember, Link left a mark of ink on her wrist to remind her to buy butter, back in the forty-sixth chapter.

Link painlessly killing the frogs is how I personally have done it for research purposes. It's the accepted humane method.

In Breath of the Wild, opals are noted to hold the power of water. Thus, opals have been used throughout Delicious in Wilds to hold water, as topaz with electricity, or ruby with fire/heat. The story that's given about the opal and flood was inspired by the real-world myth of the cowherd and the weaver girl.

Link has assumed, given her familiarity with Necludan and such, that her hometown would be somewhere in Necluda. She doesn't remember a thing about Akkala. But in fact Ordon is in Akkala! You can thank Emma for that suggestion, as I had initially chosen to place it in Necluda before realising that Akkala would be a better fit, especially as we get to visit it in the autumn.

The gerudo people being chased out of Central Hyrule is a reference to what may have happened after Ocarina of Time, as we see no gerudo people (other than Ganondorf) in either Twilight Princess or The Wind Waker, the two games set in Hyrule that claim direct ties to Ocarina of Time (Majora's Mask aside). This never made any sense to me. Thus, after certain events (that I cover more in the future), the gerudo people experienced intense and entirely unjustified discrimination to a point of exile. Later generations of Hyrule sought to make reparations to the gerudo people. It's been ten thousand years.

The sunrise over Ruto was inspired by Emma's experience with Twilight Princess, where she used to spend her nights in villages and preferred to sit at the top of the waterfall in Zora's Domain to watch the sunrise. It's absolutely gorgeous in-game.

Sidon did in fact promise her a feast for completing the gauntlet, remember? And Link talked quite a bit about wanting to try fishing out a river shark. Here's that shark!

Up next: side-quests around Ruto; Link getting repeatedly sidetracked throughout the summer.

Beta reader's comments: Link is talking so much more! Seeing her become more verbose as time goes on is really cool to me.

The author put in a scene inspired by one of my favourite gaming experiences, which makes me so giddy.

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef embarks on shrine-hunting in and around Ruto of Lanayru and becomes distracted on the trek to Ordon.

Chapter Notes

Author's notes that wouldn't fit in the end: Now we're in the arc of "you have no idea what's coming", because we're done with the Divine Beasts. What do we have left? The Master Sword, Calamity Ganon, and twenty-eight chapters left. Indeed, we'll spend about fourteen chapters on each arc, just as we have spent roughly fourteen chapters on each of the Divine Beasts (and their arcs) so far.

Thanks a million for reading with me all this way, and thanks a million to my beta reader, Emma, for everything that she has done for me all this time.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

With saddlebags full of ingredients and bellies full of hay and fish, the horse and her girl set off for the wilds once more, though this time with the miniscule added weight of a miniscule added passenger. Sarie rides on Link's head, her sidelocks wrapped around their tiny hands. As they begin the climb down to the Bridge of Lanayru, Link embraces—not good-bye, but see you later—the people that she has known, the patrons to her bar and those to whom she has delivered smithy from Rusl. She asks Sidon to show her to those who have aided her: to Lanzu and to Oshen, to Laflat and to Shalot, to Rulata and to Reyden, to Jiave and to Igli, to Frash and to Rafeau, to Kodah and to Cleff, to the zora woman that told her months and months ago that Prince Sidon sought a hylian hero, and to the healers that have saved her to life. She thanks all in person. She cooks for them rice balls of salmon and tuna. She lets them—in Lanayrish fashion—embrace her and run their hands over her.

She lets herself breathe.

The city has come alive. Link watches stonemasons and silversmiths work to put right the Goddess Zola's own city; watches spear-slingers and swordsmen—swordfish?—troop out from Ruto or up to the higher levels; watches musicians with their cellos and horns, their bells and harps, their marimbas and triangles, their portable organs and thunderous drums liven up the streets and direct the daily cycles of prayer of the followers of the Goddess Zola; watches the people no longer waiting in pools while their kitchens rot around them but swimming in the lake to fish freshly from the abundance of the River Zola; watches the inverted spire of the Temple of Zola draining its water to allow in sojourners and travellers to once more pray within; watches the city of Ruto live.

She touches Sidon's wrist at the end of the Bridge of Lanayru. He gives her a final gift: a fishing pole. Link promises to come back to visit. She does not leave him with a letter, and she does not leave him with messages passed on through his loved ones, and she does not leave him at the highest point of the city with the name of the Calamitous One upon his lips.

Link leaves him with a hug, and she leaves him with a promise, and she leaves herself with a resolution to see Yunobo, and Amali, and Riju once more.

As Link and Ilia begin the long trek back down to Inogo Bridge, she takes regular breaks to help parties of warriors clearing the path of monsters. Lizalfos and moblins, bari and chuchu, sparks and yellow-winged keese. She discovers that the Lanayrish call the the humming monsters with voided faces wizzrobes. Link touches her chin: for the white robes they wear and how they whizz through the air, she suspects.

With the thunderstorm clear and the river no longer roiling so rapidly that the current can wash away even the most adept of zora swimmers—and with the power of the Divine Beast Vah Ruta as a reinforcement—the monsters have little chance.

Not half an hour after she says see you later to Sidon, Link notices the Divine Beast begin to move. From the East Reservoir to the River Zola, where its pressurised spray and columns of ice can root out entire nests of monsters. Even with the population of Ruto much reduced from its size before the Great Calamity, the Divine Beast bolsters the abilities of the Lanayrish both by the physical let's hit 'em with ice and by boosting the warriors' confidence and courage a hundredfold.

Link waves to the Divine Beast. Sidon, standing atop its head with the slate in hand, waves back.

She travels on.

Link breaks fast, here and there, with fishers and with warriors, with travellers tackling the trail to Ruto and with messengers and their luminous stone tablets exiting Ruto to once more begin the process of reaching out to neighbouring people and provinces. Link idles her time by the cooking pot. They tell her stories, and she pays them in kind with food.

For the first time since she understood her task of calming the Divine Beasts, she has no need to rush. Link can relax, and she can take her time, and she can peek into shrines, and she can climb towers. Towers like that of Lanayru whose orange glow she spotted from the sunrise feast, that she marked upon her map, that she promises herself to scale.

On Luto's Crossing, Link suddenly stops. Dismounting her companion, she plucks the slate from its pouch at her right hip and attempts to divine how Riju found the pictographs. Flicking through, she comes upon the pictograph of the crabs she arranged in the kitchens in a vaguely horse-like shape. Sarie kookoos on her shoulder, peeking at the image, while Link leans over to show Ilia. "Here, girl! I made this for you. It's not nearly as pretty as you are. When we go home, I'll ask Cremia to make one of you proper-like. She's good with her hands, you know."

Ilia noses the slate. Link observes her lick the slate's face, which slides to the next pictograph of herself, Sidon, and Sarie.

She takes Ilia's head in hand, gliding her palms along her companion's cheeks, to rest their foreheads together. Closing her eyes, Link nuzzles against Ilia; they stay like that for a long moment.

"Who did I name you after, girl?"

Ilia snorts warmth over her cheek and licks her nose.

Link walks on.
A fisher mentions a shrine behind a waterfall, and she spends an entire day checking every cascade she can find. Just when she has about given up, Sarie tugs so hard on her sidelocks that she topples sideways into the mud. Ilia neighs out what Link can only take as a laugh.

"Looky looky! Sarie spotted it! This one this one this one! This watery-water Link hasn't looked at yet!"

Link looks up to where Sarie points; she squints past a bank of fog wisping over the mountainside. Cupping her hands around her eyes in lieu of binoculars, and then shaking her head at herself and grabbing the red telescope from her left hip, Link gazes for the first time at the cascade veiled in mist.

She leaves Sarie with Ilia. "You take good care," Link admonishes. "Promise?"

Sarie salutes her. "Sarie promises!"

Link raises her eyebrows. "I meant for Ilia to take care of you." She pets Sarie on the head. "But you two should take care of each other."

Climbing up the slick rock of the the mountain, Link falls thrice, nearly breaks her neck once, accidentally sticks her head into a crevice of rock that turns out to contain an entire cloud of yellow-winged keese whose sheer momentum of wind allow her to paraglide up and skip the majority of the climb, and lands with her boots in the pond by the waterfall.

She wades through the water, collecting snails, fleet-lotus heads, and tree nuts as she goes, and promptly smacks her face into the absolutely solid rock wall beyond the falls.

Touching her chin, Link lifts the slate. She magnetises her sword and thrusts it up into the air to probe the side of the waterfall. Mostly she encounters solid rock behind the cascade.

But then her sword goes in.

An opening, almost near the very top.

With a grin to herself and a snap of the fingers, Link freezes columns of ice up the face of the waterfall. Scaling slippery pillars of frost proves less easy than it sounds, but she manages to make a stairway to the heavens. At the top, Link finds a long thin hallway carved into the rock, tall enough for even someone Sidon's height to pass through. The hallway widens out into a circular chamber. A pool of bubbling-hot water.

And a shrine.

When Link takes the lift in the shrine back up, she does not leave immediately. Rather, she plops down into the spring to relax her muscles and ease her tensions.

She glides back down to where Ilia and Sarie await her, to find that Sarie has woven for Ilia a crown of nightshade, the blue flowers swaying like sea lily's bells. Sarie proffers Link a similar crown. She kneels down on the grass; Sarie perches the crown upon her head. They tap their korok leaf upon Link's right shoulder and then her left.

"Now Link is Sarie's knight!" they sing. Link beams. "A pretty crown! And Link shouldn't think about eating it!"

Link starts to lift her hands in protest, but then she runs her palm over her chin and hangs her head.
Sarie isn’t wrong.

Along the Bank of Wishes, she meets a zora girl—a child; a single zora shorter than she, a sight that brings a smile to her face—sniffling and clutching a stone tablet to her chest.

Link tries to ask what has gone amiss, and the girl begins to bawl. Stepping backwards, Link whips her cooking pot from her back and sets it on the ground. While the girl wails, Link endeavours to remember how to use the fishing rod. She hooks it, strings the line, and reels her arm back to toss it. Too late she realises that she has hooked the back of her own undershirt.

Once she clambers back up from the river, she finds the girl slightly less weepy and slightly more giggly.

Link casts the line more properly for her second go-around.

A fish, or something, bites. She attempts to reel in the rod. Link pulls, and she pulls, and she jerks her arm up to send a mighty porgy flying into her face. The smack across her face leaves her lips swollen as the porgy’s; the fish flops off into the river.

The zora girl becomes a tad more giggly.

Link casts again. This time she holds the line firm and prepares her right hand to catch the fish. When she snags the whatever-it-is at the end of the line, she holds it triumphantly to the skies, and she can almost hear the music swell behind her.

The music, she discovers, literally swells behind her, for Sarie has waved their tiny arms and sung out a dah-na-na-na-naaaaaaaa!

Then Link notices a distinct lack of flapping against her palm.

She looks back down at her hand. Not a fish, but an empty bottle. Link gazes at the glass, turns it over and over in her hand, shrugs, and sets it into her satchel.

The zora girl: a little even more giggly.

Link casts for the third time. Surely everything comes in threes, and now—on her third trial—the Goddess Zola will grant her the fish she so seeks.

Something bites. She reels in the line. Link catches it out of the air with the spray of the river around her in rainbowed light, the wind fluttering her hair behind her, her fingers curling around the fish of her dreams.

A strange curved bluish crystal with something scarlet embedded within, roughly the size of her palm.

She stares at it.

The crystal stares back at her.

Link shakes it. She thumps it against the flat of her boot. She tries to put it in her mouth, remembers the armoured porgy that chipped her tooth, and slowly draws it back out.

The zora girl bursts into laughter, and Link looks over her shoulder at her.

Link gives her the bluish crystal. The zora girl holds it to her chest in thanks. Link reflects on what to cook. If not fish, then other foodstuffs will also do.
If the fishing pole cannot hook fish, she discovers, then at least it can hook eggs. Her fourth cast of the line leads the hook across the river rather than in; she drags over an entire bird's nest full of tiny eggs the colour of the sky.

Link marvels at the rod Sidon has given her. The zora girl peeks curiously over her shoulder, but Link pays the zora girl little mind.

First: she must cook.

She roasts and salts chickaloo tree nuts, then adds an extra layer of salt to go along with the vial of spring green elixir she sets aside. While she clears her cooking pot and begins to crack eggs for an omelet, Link tosses the nuts up one by one to catch them between her teeth. Mincing endura carrot into long, thin strips and lightly dusting them with sugar to sweeten, Link stirs the carrot into the omelet. She serves the finished omelet in the cooking pot, furnished with roasted nuts, and she presents it to the zora girl.

The zora girl ogles her. Link looks at the zora girl. She shows the zora girl the exact ingredients she used to make the omelet: the endura carrot, the rock salt, the eggs from the nest, the sugar boiled down from cane, the chickaloo tree nuts from the shrine.

The zora girl snaps her head up and down between Link and the pot, the pot and Link.

Her stomach rumbles.

Link waggles her eyebrows as she remembers Urbosa doing.

The zora girl glances between Link and the pot one last time. Then she shoves the entire plate into her mouth all at once. Link whistles. As a child she had prayed to the Goddesses to grant her gills; now she prays to the Goddesses to grant her a mouth wide enough to wolf down dishes in a single bite.

The zora girl does not chew so much as swallows whole. Then she folds up one of her pectoral fins to wipe her mouth.

"I guess I can talk to you...even though Ma says I'm not s'posed to talk to strangers...but if if if you cook so good, you can't really be a stranger." The zora girl reaches out to stroke Link's cheek; she lets the zora girl pat her cheeks. "I'll let you in a secret. Ready?"

Link nods. She leans in. The zora girl lifts her hands in front of her to touch her wrists together and wriggle her fingers as though emulating the fins of a fish.

"My name is...Finley. If if if I've told mine, then can you tell me yours?"

Link arranges her own hands. Like the girl who smelled of horses suggested to her so long ago. "Link."

She cooks another round of omelet, this one for herself. Link drains the vial of spring green elixir. Wiping her mouth, she glances down to find Finley staring at her with widened eyes, like Miyu begging for scraps. Link explains to Finley of the elixir's purpose, and Finley's eyes embiggen all the further.

"Ohh. So the stuff that whatever-you-are drinks for that is different! Mine's all sparkly and silvery, like if if I drank the moon."

"I'm hylian," Link answers, and Finley giggles, "or at least I think I am? That's what people tell me. It's because I have pointy ears." She tilts her head from side to side. "But...if I had to pick a Goddess to bless me, isn't there a Goddess with the virtue of Food?"

"You're funny," says Finley; Link rubs the back of her head.

She bites into the omelet. The softness of the egg melts in her mouth, coupled to the sweetness of the carrots within. The nuts provide a pleasant crunch. Link licks her lips of the salt.

She remembers bits and snippets of the girl who smelled of horses. She remembers the letter that Link left her. She remembers her hand shaking as she wrote. She remembers the apologies. She remembers the promise that one day, maybe one day, maybe one day, she could come back. She remembers telling the girl who smelled of horses how much she loved her. She remembers begging the girl who smelled of horses not to forget her.

She remembers. The girl who smelled of horses who wanted to see all of Hyrule, and she, Link, who would now travel the paths of Hyrule from Parapa to Akkala, from Faron to Eldin, from Necluda to Hebra, from Lanayru to Tabantha. She remembers how she promised the girl who smelled of horses that one day when Aryll were older and Link had the rupees, she would hook her arm into the arm of the girl who smelled of horses, and she and Aryll and the girl who smelled of horses and Marin would walk the world over together. She remembers the girl who smelled of horses always giving her letters to take to Marin, and she remembers Marin always giving her letters to take to the girl who smelled of horses. She never asked what the letters contained. Marin would giggle with her finger to her lips and say, "It's a secret between us ranch-girls." The girl who smelled of horses would share with her the letters, would read them out loud, would let herself and Link laugh together at Marin's jokes and quips, would grin at a readily reddening Link whenever Marin described particularly embarrassing occurrences, would fold the letters up to place them in a wooden box to keep for herself and Link. Link remembers the oldest letters, read and reread so often that the paper wore down, and the creases became soft. The girl who smelled of horses would over supper write a letter back to Marin with Link watching over her shoulder, her chin against the girl who smelled of horses's collarbone, their cheeks and ears pressed together, her right hand linked with the girl who smelled of horses's left.

She remembers the girl who smelled of horses, who told Link that she would learn an instrument so that she could one day play along with Marin and Link. A travelling band of minstrels, the girl who smelled of horses would say. "The grasswhistle," Link suggested, and the girl who smelled of horses put her hands on her hips.

"Very funny, Link."

She remembers the girl who smelled of horses, who made her smile more than anyone. She remembers the girl who smelled of horses, who apologised to her over and over in the forest into which the runaway Ordon goat had led them. She remembers the girl who smelled of horses nibbling on the mushrooms and herbs that Link had tipped directly into the fire for want of a cooking pot.

She remembers the girl who smelled of horses explaining, her hands shaking, her face smeared with tears, her cheeks reddened to the tips of her ears, how badly she had misunderstood Link. "You were...you were always by yourself, and I didn't think you ever wanted to play with any of us, and I thought you hated all of us, and I thought you thought you were...you were so much better than us." She remembers the girl who smelled of horses sniffling.  "I...I just saw you doing whatever you wanted. You could go wherever you wanted. I thought your parents let you do that. Let you go work at the ranch. That's all I ever wanted, was to work there, with the horses, and when I saw you doing it, I just got so...I just got so..." She remembers the girl who smelled of horses wiping her face. "I'm sorry. I'm so sorry. I'm so, so sorry. I should've asked. I shouldn't've just assumed in my...in my anger.

"I didn't...I didn't that your parents...I didn't realise that you were having to...I didn't realise...I'm so sorry." The girl who smelled of horses stood up—Link recoiled—and crumpled herself onto the ground to touch her forehead to the forest floor. "I'm so sorry." She raised her hands above her head to continue to sign while she lay face-down in the leaves. "You don't have to forgive me. I've hurt you so much. I thought you didn't understand, but your parents...even worse than my father. I didn't think that could be...and that we weren't letting you hang out with us...and that you had to work...and that you...and all of that...and that we'd been the ones to push you away...I'm so sorry. I'm so sorry. I'll never do that again. I promise. I...thank you for telling me. For trusting me. I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry."

She remembers...she remembers her hands, around the wrists of the girl who smelled of horses. She remembers...pulling the girl who smelled of horses from the forest floor. She remembers...the warmth of that embrace, of the first person to whom she'd ever told she was a girl, of the heat in her chest that had tightened and tightened and tightened over the course of her childhood until she had to let the words spill from her fingertips, like a roasted cucco stuffed tightly enough for the skin to split apart.

Link had spent so long with a missing-tooth smile and a missing-string heart that she had forgotten the melody her smile could play when her heart had all its strings. And although the girl who smelled of horses could not give her back that string—that would take years, and a girl with a violet sash, and an elixir as green as spring, and a pond of voltfin trout to knock her out—the girl who smelled of horses held her fingers over the wounds where the string had torn out.

Link starved, and while the girl who smelled of horses could not provide a feast, the few grains of rice that fell from her fingertips kept Link alive.

The girl who smelled of horses.

Link licks her lips, again, of the salt. The omelet has energised her beyond even her usual pep. She glances at the ingredients. Rock salt. Bird's eggs. Endura carrot. Ah, right: endura carrot. Chickaloo tree nut. Finley asks her what's so funny? and Link, wheezing into her hand, takes a moment to explain the humour inherent in chickaloo, reminding her of how Hestu sadly cooed shookooloooh about their missing maracas.

Once Link and Finley finish eating—with Sarie taking a portion for themself while Finley asks what about kind of thing Sarie is and Link questions if she's never before seen a korok—Link asks, again, what's wrong?

Finley explains: For the past few years she has sent down letters from Ruto to correspond to someone who lives beyond the walls, a brave adventurer of sorts who has told her tales of the fantastical world outside of Lanayru, a world that Finley—born after the Great Calamity, Link gathers—has never seen. The letters would arrive by hawk, Finley tells her, and Birds do not fly in thunder.

Link nods sagely. She can understand that much.

The Divine Beast's awakening put an end to the correspondence. In the half-moon—two weeks—since its calming, Finley has sent more letters than she did in the entire previous year. And yet, her mysterious hero has not sent her even one letter back.

"What if what if what if he died! Or what if what if what if he had to go away to fight the big baddy!
What if what if what if...what if what if what if..." Just as Finley's expression begins to screw up in tear-less weeping, Link promises to watch the letter for her on its descent through the river. Clapping her hands together, Finley clings to Link's leg.

And so begins the journey. The River Zola carries the stone letter slowly enough that Ilia's strides can keep up with its passage. A few times, here and there, Link glides into the river to clear an obstruction. She notes other, similar rock tablets tangled in fallen trees or stolen by the monsters that until two weeks ago thrived along the bends.

During the nights, Link fishes the letter out of the river to snuggle it beside her campfire. During the mornings, she lets it flow freely again on the river and continues to track its movement.

The stone tablet comes to a halt in the soft mud of the wetlands of Lanayru, near a house on the waterfront. And there Link finds not some intrepid hero, but a mousy boy of twelve whose red eyes peer at Link from behind a thick pair of spectacles: the son of a fisher and a falconer who welcome Link in with a promise of rice and salt as thanks for delivering the letter.

The mousy boy begs Link not to reveal the truth. She tilts her head; he elaborates: an avid reader but sickly besides, the boy has spent years weaving together stories from book peddlers, for a girl who had never left Ruto and who believed them all. He promised her that if ever the Calamitous One returned, he—the brave hero of legend—could take up arms himself.

The Divine Beast Vah Ruta's awakening and the sudden influx of monsters killed his dream.

For the past two weeks, he has seen Finley's letters wash up again and again, and he has ignored them again and again. For what can he say, when, instead of taking up a sword and board against the Divine Beast, he merely hid under his blankets while the thunder blared around him?

"She must hate me," the boy mutters, seated in front of the hearth, holding the stone tablet that reflects a luminous blue in the lenses of his spectacles. "I know I hate me."

Link rubs the back of her head.

"I don't know much about you or Finley," she signs, grateful that she learned Finley's name off of her webbed fingers, "but it seemed to me that she cares more about whether you are alive than about the hero in the letters."

The boy sniffles. "But..."

Link crouches down beside him. "You know, I've spent an awfully long time trying to get away from who I was. And since I started being honest with myself, I've been a lot happier, and so've the people around me."

He wipes his nose, and he studies the letter, and Link inquires if she can help with making dinner.

The following morning the boy asks his fathers if he could go up to Ruto with Link. Link, choking on her breakfast of spiced cucco skewer, smacks her chest. Rather than allowing the bone to come hurtling out of her throat and potentially spearing the boy in the forehead—as she did with the crab to Igli—Link covers her mouth.

She's learning.

Though Link intended to move north towards Akkala, she is nothing if not helpful.

With his fathers' permission, Link escorts the boy—Sasan, his name—back to the Bank of Wishes.
She walks beside Ilia while Sasan and Sarie ride her companion.

Link judges by the stone tablets she finds in the current that Finley has not yet given up.

Finley leaps onto Sasan so enthusiastically that they topple together into the river. Link dives in to fish them out, yet by the time Link surfaces, Finley has already dragged her friend back onto the shore. He recoils back into himself, as if expecting an assault. She touches her hands on his shoulder.

She asks, her fingers trembling, if he and his family are well.

"You aren't...mad at me...?"

"Mad at you?" Finley's facial fins splay out in her shock. "For what!?"

He twiddles his thumbs. "For...for lying..."

She bats his shoulder. "If if if you didn't want me to figure that half of what you said was just you saying stuff, you shouldn't've told me bedtime stories!" She puffs out her cheeks. "I wanna talk to you. I don't give one single trout tail if if if you're a big buff hero or not. I like how you talk. That's what letters are for!" Finley giggles. Then she pouts. "If if if you still wanna talk to me...I still wanna be your friend."

"...'course I wanna be your friend, Finley." Sasan holds out his hand, pinky finger crooked. "I promise."

It takes them a full moment to endeavour how to make a pinky promise with the thick webbing between her fingers, even with Sarie leaping into help coordinate their hands. At last Link coughs and suggests they try a bump of the fists instead.

Finley and Sasan thank Link for the reunion. She shrugs her shoulders and wishes them well. On her trip escorting Sasan back to his home—after Finley has extracted a promise for Sasan to write back—Link studies her hand. The knuckles that have brushed against Riju's.

She fled less from Riju and more from the weight of a responsibility heavier than the Divine Beasts alone. The far-off rumble of thunder.

Yet.

Link closes her fingers into a fist.

Yet she promised to cook Riju fried bananas. She promised. And she will never, ever, ever go back on a promise to make someone food, not so long as she lives. Just as she will return to Ruto and make Sidon paella, so do will she return to Nabooru and make Riju fried bananas.

As long as Link promises someone that she will cook for them another meal, she has not truly said farewell.

And always, always, she will have to come back.

Only when Link has turned Sasan back to his fathers does she realise with a jolt that she neglected to bring Sarie with her.

She finds Sarie still on the Bank of Wishes, playing in the water, who does not seem to realise that Link spent the past half-week without them. Instead they merely spring onto her shoulder.

"I'm sorry," Link says.

Sarie tilts their entire body to the side. "Why?"

"For...for leaving you by accident."

"Link left Sarie? When?"

Link looks at Sarie, and Sarie 'looks' back at Link with the leafy-mask that comprises their face, the holes for the eyes and mouth nothing but blackened marks in the leaf. She shrugs.

Link resolves herself to never leave Sarie like that again if she can help it.

And then Link starts, for the third time, the trek down to Inogo Bridge.

This time Link rides Ilia faster to make up for lost time. But not so hard that she would injure her companion.

When Ilia tires of carrying Link, she slides from the saddle and takes on part of the load of the saddlebags herself. Endura carrot for Ilia and lime green elixir for herself, which has to it a certain wholeness of taste, almost like honey, but cooler and more refreshing, like biting into a hydromelon on a hot summer day.

She leaves Ilia—with a blanket over her head, and with Sarie for protection—at the Lanayrish end of Inogo Bridge. Unfurling her map and peering through her sister's trusty gift, Link scopes out the tower that has pierced the heavens. The elixir gives her the strength to climb without stopping. Pushing against the curling patterns through which she fits her fingers, Link leap-frogs up the spire until she sprawls out at the top.

She breathes.

Link sets the slate down in the depression on the face of the pedestal, and she gazes out over Lanayru for the final time. Whenever next she sees the cascades of the River Zola, she will see them with the breath of Ordon in her lungs and the girl who smelled of horses's name upon her fingers.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Wizzrobes, of course, actually named for the word wizard, not for how they whizz through the air.

Here we see Sidon actually piloting the Divine Beast! This is the first time we actually get to see a current descendant piloting the Divine Beast, as Link has been unconscious every other time/in recovery. Speaking of my emphasis on the current generation rather than the past champions, recently, the Switch received an update to include more Breath of the Wild icons, where they included icon options for the past champions...and for Kass, but not for any of the current descendants (Yunobo, Teba, Riju, and Sidon). That's ridiculous. I adore Kass, but how is Kass, who doesn't even get voiced lines, more important than the descendants? Why didn't the descendants also get icons? Because they don't have official art and Nintendo is hacks? Ahem, anyways, in Delicious in Wilds, I put more emphasis on the now.

In Breath of the Wild, hot water restores health. You can also cook raw eggs in it by dropping them into the water for hard-boiled eggs! No, really. Try it out!

The in-game quest with Finley and Sasan was a little ridiculous. While it is one thing for Finley to have a crush on an adult, it is entirely another thing for said adult to meet Finley and agree to be her boyfriend. I was expecting for a humorous ending, where Sasan basically gets catfished and refuses Finley's advances given that she looks like a child (even if she self-describes as a late bloomer). I was also not expecting for Link to say something like "love finds a way" or whatever that dialogue option was. Ah-hem. I decided to do a different spin on it for Delicious in Wilds.

The empty bottle that Link fishes out is a reference to the empty bottle fished out on Hena's Fishing Hole in Twilight Princess. The strange blue crystal that Link fishes out is a reference to the piece of heart Link can fish out in the fisher's game in Link's Awakening.

Sansa is a sheikah boy, hence my reference to his red eyes.

Here we get the full fleshing out of that scene where Link and Ilia (the girl) became friends, so that you really get a sense of why Ilia resented Link so much and how, after talking seriously to Link, Ilia realises her mistake. Ilia had thought that Link was a very different person than she was, partially due to that same issue with facial expressions (and bear in mind that Ilia is also very young, about six years old, at this time). When Ilia is able to actually find out what Link is like—and Ilia herself is a "weirdo" who is also ostracised although not to the same extent, partially given that her father is the mayor—she regrets what she has done. I did not want for Ilia and Link's relationship to be one-note; I find that challenge and conflict breed stronger ties as long as both parties are willing to work hard to make it. Friendships don't spin out of nothingness. It is important for me to show that perfect relationships don't exist, and conversely that negative incidents do not "shatter" what was once perfection. I dislike the romanticisation of relationships in which much media engages. I am not implying here that toxic relationships need to be continued, by any stretch of the imagination, but rather that normal relationships are healthy because people put in work, which cannot be overstated. But both people need to put in work. Thanks for reading.

I received a question about this in a review, so I'll throw it into the notes: Sidon was born blind. Regardless, being disabled isn't a massive tragedy (certainly, it can be for people, as everyone's life is their own, but is not necessarily); in many cases, it is just something that people live with, as Sidon does, much like Link does with her mutism.

Regarding the amount of time that it takes Link to go from one place to another, it did take a while to get through the gauntlet during the rain, but it only takes a few days now that the rain has stopped and Link doesn't have to worry about Ilia slipping into the river or fighting monsters every step of the way. It took her a week the first time, so on the second go around it takes her around half that time.

Up next: a certain accordion; a meal; an unlikely companion.

Beta reader's comments: Link and Ilia are really cute, and seeing how their relationship began is really nice.

I like how the author takes the Finley quest and makes it, uh, not awful.

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef has a chance encounter with the travelling minstrel and attempts to convince the minstrel to travel alongside on the road to Ordon.

Chapter Notes

Something I posted in response to a review on the FFN cross-post of this fic that I thought might be relevant: As for whether I'll write anything after Delicious in Wilds, I admit that I'm not sure. I wrote this because I had an idea for it. If something else strikes my fancy, I'll write that as well, though it might not be under this name (I specifically registered this account to upload Delicious in Wilds and adrift). Perhaps more novelisations of Zelda games are in-store for the future! I've enjoyed taking apart a game as I have in Delicious in Wilds and adrift, so that's definitely something to consider. Whatever it is, however, I will write it to completion before I post it.

Still, we'll get there when we get there. We still have a month left of Delicious in Wilds!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

North. North, north, north. To the north she goes. Up the Tierno Trail, along the right side of Trilby Valley. The worst of the summer's heat passed over while Link splashed in the cool waters of Zola's Domain. Now the cooler winds of autumn have begun to whisper over the world, perched on the precipice between summer and fall. As she passes by the split in the trail wedged between Cephla Lake and Upland Zorana, Link once more catches those strains of accordion music that she heard while standing on the back of the Divine Beast Vah Ruta. Though some four weeks—nearly a moon, as her Lanayrish friends would say—have passed since that day, when she scopes a certain blue-feathered rito with a certain accordion standing on top of a cliff above her, she can only grin at the threads of circumstances and chance that have weaved her and her fellow travellers together.

Link waves to Kass, but he—so much higher than her—does not notice her. She leaves Ilia and Sarie to take care of one another along the road while she climbs up the mountain. Despite the sheer verticality of the cliff, Link ekes out purchase along the nooks and crannies in the rock. Neither rain nor waterfall slicks the stone. She squirrels up, alternating between scaling and leaping where she can see a clear spot to place her hands.

She scrambles over the upper face of the cliff. The stone presses into her chest and then her stomach as she drags herself up.

Link rests momentarily on her hands and knees, wheezing until her sides stop pinching inwards onto her ribs and her lungs cease trying to set themselves on fire. She pulls a roasted silent shroom from her satchel to nibble on. Her heartbeat slows. Her muscles loosen from their tension; she listens to her footfalls flatten and soften against the ground.
Raising her chin up, Link angles her head to spot Kass on a cliff yet higher. She examines her satchel for something to make her climb more rapidly. Seizing a fleet-lotus head, she picks the seeds out with a knife and swallows them down.

As the blood in her veins begins to course with a vigorous speed, Link flexes her muscles. She braces one foot against the cliff to strike a pose.

With this, Link can surely leap up the mountain more swiftly than ever before.

Yet her heartbeat does not rise past its usual speed, but merely returns to normal. She claps her palm against her face: just as with elixirs, eating something that would slow and something that would raise her heart rate within about a minute simply set her body back to baseline.

Link exhales.

She squats down to stretch, opens her palms, and regards the face of the cliff. "You will be scaled by me, you hear?" she signs. The stone does not answer. Link folds her arms over her chest. "Giving me the cold shoulder, are you?" She pats the mountain. "I hope I didn't hurt your feelings too much. Let's have fun together in the climb, huh?" She laughs a light little laugh at herself.

Link leaps up to begin squirreling up the second layer of cliff. When she pokes her head up, she finds herself staring up directly at Kass, who peers down at her over the bellows of his accordion. Grinning, Link lets go of the rock to wave hello.

Her boots slip.

She topples backwards.

Link opens the paraglider. Momentum knocks her legs; the paraglider catches the wind. She sighs in relief.

Then something whumps into her back to prick pain around her collarbones and shoulder blades: Kass snatches her out of the air with his talons around her shoulders. She resignedly shuts the paraglider. The flapping of his wings gusts over her sidelocks. Link blinks at the ground falling away below her. Though Kass's talons prevent her from moving her arms freely, she strains to peer through the telescope. Far, far below her, she can make out Ilia and Sarie. She waves an arm at them.

Sarie waves back.

She nearly drops the telescope out of surprise and fumbles over it in the whirlwind of Kass's wings. It flies out of her hands; by instinct, Link snags it from the air in her teeth.

The sudden resonance through her skull makes her eyes water. But her mouth has not failed her yet.

The flats of her boots touch the ground. Kass lets her go to glide down and land next to her. She whirls around to beam up at him. "Kass!" she signs, her hands looping as if drawing a quarter note in the air. "Do you have a song passed down in this region for me?"

Kass's beak parts in a smile. His eyes twinkle. "We meet again, traveller! It's good to see you well —oh, what's this?" He raises his brows; he chuckles heartily. "I see that you've come to know me well." Link smiles sheepishly. "As it just so happens, I do know an ancient verse passed down in this region. Would you like to hear it?"
"Do I want to eat?" Link responds. When Kass does not reply, her face flushes. She stumbles over the gestures. "Y-yes. It was a joke, you know, like, do I want to eat?" Her fingers twitch; Kass tilts his head. "Yes, I want to eat. I mean. Yes, I want to hear the song. I mean. I also want to eat! But I want to hear the song too!"

"Excellent! Then, without further ado, for the traveller with the telescope in her teeth..." Kass slides his fingers over the accordion's manuals while Link, face reddening further to resemble the prickly outside of a voltfruit with the heat of a sizzlefin trout, spits the telescope out into her hands and tucks it into the loop at her left hip.

Clearing his throat, Kass sings the octave up and down. Link allows his voice to wash away the embarrassment of the metallic taste still ringing her mouth.

"O Din, grant me Your Power, truths I seek;

"O Nayru, may Your Wisdom freely ring;

"O Farore, Your Courage lets me speak;

"O Erito, lend me Your Voice to sing!"

The familiarity of his words loosens her muscles more than even the most silentest of silent shrooms. Link seats herself down on the ground, listening to him sing. The grass cushions her. The coolness of the stone curves pleasantly against her legs. The winds over the mountains themselves seem to resonate with Kass's voice; the rocks vibrate to the melody of the song; her entire core thrums with his voice.

Those words...

Since she first arrived in the foothill town of Medigo, she has walked a very, very long time. Now, sitting on the cliff with the breeze caressing her face, she has come once more within a week's ride of Medigo.

And yet she has walked very, very far.

The music slows and shifts into a different beat. Link sways her head in time. Not, she notices, a beat in thirds as the other ancient verses have been, but in halves, like the Ballad of the Sealing War.

His humming transitions smoothly into words. Link claps her hand against her face and leans in to pay attention.

"Into the vortex you must walk,

"with golden orb upon your back,

"to place the weight into each lock,

"and find the treasure that you track:

"For at the heart of spiralled bay,

"the knowledge of the ages waits

"for she who walks the patient way,
"enshrined within the spiral's gates."

If she were Miyu, her ears would twitch and rotate at the mere mention of the phrase shrine. Kass chuckles with a hum from his chest. "I can see, traveller, that you share my sentiments on the purpose of this verse." He gestures from his accordion. "I believe that the spiralled bay of the song refers to the Rist Peninsula, past Malin Bay." He spreads his wing outwards. The wind over the Lanayrish uplands rustles his flight feathers, reminding her of the tumble of Tabanch windchimes. Link gazes on to where he points, cannot see anything over the rocks, and springs to her feet. She clammers over Kass's body to perch on his shoulders. He lifts his head towards her; she looks down at him and smiles even more sheepishly than before. "I hope you are enjoying the view, traveller." Link lifts her chin. "Beyond Toto Lake and the Akkalan Falls...beyond the Ukuku Plains and Kaeopora Gaeopora Pass...on the far side of Lake Akkala...you can see where the land falls away into the sea. There lies Malin Bay." Link squints. If she had a rito's sharp gaze, perhaps she could see the spiral Kass mentions; at present, she senses nothing but a sea of autumn-scarlet that abruptly blurs into a sea of blue, and the metallic taste on her tongue.

The metallic taste on her tongue!

Link removes the telescope from her left hip to gaze through its lens. Far, far on the edge of her vision, within the sea the colour of cool safflina, she makes out a thin brownish spiral like a drizzle of honey over a chillshroom.

Not a day's walk, but a half-month's ride if she can count herself lucky.

"But the golden orb," Kass continues, "and the meaning of the locks, are lost to me. Perhaps, if you ventured there, traveller, you might illumine the meaning of the verse at last." He inclines his head. "I hope to see you again. Take care, and may the light illuminate your path."

Once more his feathers glide over the manuals of the accordion. He resumes playing the same song, though without the words, allowing the strains of the accordion to flow over the mountainside.

Link tilts her head at his blue-feathered back. She taps the toes of her boot against the ground. Kass turns back towards her; she rubs the back of her head. "That is...isn't it lonely to travel by yourself sometimes? And hungry, too..." As if on cue, her stomach grumbles. "Do you want to travel with me? I'll probably forget the song by the time I get to the spiral...I don't even remember the other one you taught me, about visiting Mount Satori when the lights thingy touches it and riding something with horns." Link positions her hands behind her head to curl her fingers into the image of antlers. She wriggles her fingers. Kass gazes at her. She wriggles her fingers more violently as though that could better convey her feelings.

He laughs, though not unkindly; Link leans hopefully forward. "It seems to me that you remember the verse well enough, traveller. I'm afraid that we must part ways, for you have a shrine to seek, and I songs to pass on. Now, may the light—"

Link steps closer to him; Kass closes his beak to gaze at her.

"I'll make you something reaaaally good if you come with me to this spiral. Otherwise I'll probably get lost. And I don't know where I'm going. And since I've got the slate that activates shrines, wouldn't it be easier if you came with me and just told me the songs wherever we went? Then we could figure them out together too!" Link whirls her hands in front of her. "And then you could go visit Amali and your children again, right?"

"Traveller, I appreciate your concern." The accordion lets out a mournful wheeze. Kass's voice sombers. "But many years ago, I made a promise to my mentor, and I do not break my promises."

Link lifts her hands to inquire, but already Kass has invoked the Goddesses, the bellows of the accordion humming with the notes he has yet to sing. The melody comes slowly. The notes sound as though their edges drag on, like a cake left within the oven a moment too long. She has a sense that the song wishes for a swifter beat, yet something keeps the music slowed.

"As before, any mistakes in translation are my own. Without...without further ado..." He stops.
"No. I shall sing these words in my mentor's tongue. And now, without further ado...but perhaps, as my mentor would say, with further adieu..."

Kass's timbre trembles. Her half-formed question dies on her fingertips.

He sings in Faronese.

"The sleeping Hero shall one day awake,
"to burn the bush of Malice and its wake.
"By blue-lit blade, Calamity shall fall:
"the sacred Golden Force shall heed our call.'
"Thus spake my father in his endless faith,
"who threw away his life for such a wraith,
"his love for her so deep and blurred with tears,
"that he would tend a coffin sixty years,
"that he would spare his breath and waste his ink
"upon these Champions and their missing link."

The words Kass invokes soar over her head. Partly from the muffled tone of his voice, and partly from the sheer length of the words in a language that she does not well understand, Link barely hangs onto a thread of comprehension, thin as a strand of saffron meant for paella.

"I wonder if he ever knew the truth
"that she has died a sweet and martyred youth,
"whose face he held forever in his heart,
"for cherished martyrs do not fall apart
"as people do, and as my father did.
"To understand would mean that he had hid
"some sixty years alone, to wait for naught
"except for hair to grey and teeth to rot."

Link shudders. She may not comprehend the fullness of the song, but she understands that line as clearly as she can feel the press of the lynel's fingers through her innards, as clearly as she can sense the maliced arrow embedded in her shoulder.

"I have no father left but in these songs

"so now I pass to you for what he longs:

"To wrest the Malice from the Beasts Divine,

"this Hero needs the teachings of each shrine,

"their knowledge passed in verses lost to time,

"yet resurrected in our euphic rhyme.

"So take the songs I leave now in your wings,

"and skate your voice upon the Goddess springs,

"as long ago the Hilted Singer sang.

"And though your heavy-burdened heart may pang,

"until the Malice comes at last undone,

"I beg of you to walk these paths begun

"ten thousand years ago with thunder's crack.

"I beg of you to walk; do not look back!

"To see your wife would cling your heart to home,

"and leave these melodies upon the foam

"of vile Malice and its putrid ooze.

"No matter how you hurt, you must refuse!"

Link frowns. Keeping from visiting his own family sounds crueler than anything she could inflict on anyone.

Even if she, in her rush to calm the Divine Beasts, could have inflicted it on herself.

"My father did before me wait in vain:

"The Hero has not woke to cleanse our pain.

"Yet in his final wish he bid me wait,

"to watch the Hero and the sheikah slate."

Link's eyes embiggen, but Kass's have closed. He continues on:

"As I take up the vigil of the felled,

"so you take up the vigil I once held.
"On morrow's rise I leave to take my post,
"to guard the Hero's long-departed ghost.
"To tell you where could leave alert our foes,
"And so for you adieu I do compose.
"If ever wakes the Hero, you shall hear "my songs again, if you would have me near.
"Until that day, I by myself shall dwell,
"and if I pass before, I wish you well."

"It is...not the most well-written of my mentor's poetry." The words well up in Kass's throat as though choking him with their weight. "But it is the final verse my mentor left me. He, too, had a promise to fulfill. Though as far as I am aware, he..." His voice trails to quiet with the resonance of the final accordion note.

Link remembers, suddenly, the cabin on the Great Plateau, and the letters within, and the leaves of poetry. She casts her gaze downwards. Kass's mentor, and the mentor's father, and so many things she does not understand, and so many people that she has yet to remember. And then she lifts her chin again. The tragedies of the past, while still visible in the scars on the land and the scars on the people, do not forego the happiness of today.

One day she will remember. This she knows. And if she does not, then at least she can make the most of the life granted her.

"I can't say that I understand, not entirely." Not even a little bit. "But I care about you, and if you're hurting, you can talk to me." Link steps forward. Though Kass's accordion has transformed into a shield between himself and the world, she encircles his waist in her arms. She draws him in for an embrace.

Kass begins to draw away. Link rests her forehead on his chest, his feathers warm as flame, his heart quick as lightning, his breath shuddered as ice.

She stays like that, for his sake, for a long time. Until she feels his spine curve, and his muscles loosen, and his heart slow, and his breathing even, and his accordion lower.

Until she feels the sweep of his warm wings over her shoulders to embrace her back.

And then she stays like that a little longer, for her own sake.

When Link pulls away at last, Kass gazes at her with an expression unreadable, but the tears have dried around his eyes.

"Those scars," he murmurs faintly.

She blinks.

Kass's voice warbles. "On your hands...on your neck..."

Link runs a hand over her throat. "The malice?"
"Mm."

"Promise or no promise..." She tilts her head to the side. "...can't you at least happen to walk the same direction as me for a bit? You don't have to break the promise to do that, right?"

"Traveller, I..."

Link fishes for a phrase, searches for sentence, windmills for a word. She faces again an armoured porgy, but an armoured porgy with her friend trapped within. Neither fingers nor cooking knife can find purchase in its scales.

And then she hears Kass's stomach rumble. She grins slyly. Kass coughs. He turns his head away from her. Arching her eyebrows, Link _hmmms_ up at him.

She remembers Amali's words. That Notts and Kotts like carp, that Genli salmon, that Cree trout, and that Kheel and Kass—

"I could make you...porgy. Porgy meunière."

The wind whispers silence.

When Kass speaks again, Link can hear the knotting in his throat. "Porgy meunière...?"

"Porgy meunière," she confirms, arching her eyebrows still further, until the muscles on the back of her head near her neck strain.

"I haven't had porgy meunière since..." Link observes his wing quiver upon the manual of the accordion. The feathers shiver. She closes her eyes for a moment as if letting a pot boil. When she raises her eyelids, she looks upon Kass holding his own rumbling stomach. "...and from where do you know the recipe, traveller?"

"From your own daughter," Link answers; the shine in his eyes matches the grumble of his stomach. She beams. "You really are a great singer! Even your belly knows how to sing!"

"Ah. That, traveller," Kass tells her, the faintest of curves to his beak, "I picked up from you."

Link rubs the back of her head.

They glide down together to where Ilia waits. Sarie has vanished, although Link hears a most familiar humming emanating from one of the saddlebags. She invites Kass to sit beside her on the shore of the lake while she makes another effort to fish with the rod Sidon gave her. He offers to catch the fish himself with his talons, but Link puts a finger to his beak.

"I'd like to figure out how to use this!"

Within the span of ten minutes the fishing rod lies abandoned on the sandy shores and the slate has sprung into her hand. She dives into the water to scoop up the fish stunned by the shockwaves of her explosives. Link returns to the shore, her arms full of bass and trout, of greengill and porgy.

"That's one way to fish," Kass remarks. With his help, she separates the porgy from the pile and returns the other fish to the lake. Link crouches by the shore to poke the fish until they awaken and swim away. Those that do not, she takes with her.

If not for Kass, then for herself.

Link decapitates the mighty porgy with her knife easily enough. Then she grits her teeth. When she comes face-to-face with her second greatest challenge—following the Eldin specialty of rock roast—she reaches for the fire-light spear to only to recall that the fight against the Malice left it beneath the waves. Link dumps the armoured porgy into a pile. She reaches into her satchel for flint. The flint-pouch, she discovers, has but a single piece left.

Her hand shakes with how firmly she grips the rock. Inhaling, Link sets the flint down against the pile of porgy and prepares the pyre.

Kass inquires what in the world she's trying to accomplish. Link opens her mouth to show him the chipped tooth. He erupts in laughter. Kass demonstrates the gap between two curved plates of armour where wait the soft gills. By holding the porgy just so, and wedging her thumbs in the gap, and pressing against the gills, Link can easily peel the armour from its head and thereafter from its body.

"Very convenient, isn't it?" Kass nudges her. She gazes up at him as though the Golden Goddesses Themselves had descended from the heavens.

Link seizes his wings. "Is there anything I could ever do to repay you? You just...you just saved my life. Forever." She lifts up the skinned porgy in her hands to the skies above, then hugs the porgy against her chest until her tunic stains with its salty blood.

Washing out the scent of fish that clings to the fabric will later take a feat worthy of the Goddesses, but for the moment she needs to physically show the sheer awe that has stolen her breath away and transformed it into the wind beneath Kass's wings.

"You could," he comments with a kind smile, "cook for me."

Link salutes.

She could cook. She will cook the most incredible porgy meunière that Link could ever imagine. With Amali's words visible just behind her eyes, the swoop of the signs and the gyrations of the gestures, Link reaches out her hand to pet the porgy.

"Let's make Kass happy together."

In the trusty cooking pot that she so loves, she starts by preparing the sauce. She brings out a yellowed vial of lemon juice that she bought from the merchants in Ruto. Link melts goat butter with its dizzying scent—she snacks on a steamed rushroom to quell the roiling hunger in her belly and to grant her limbs a whirlwind's speed to prepare the meal itself—and adds in the concentrated lemon. She licks a drop caught on her finger.

So sour on her tongue that her lips wrinkles, yet so delicious. Not in spite of the sourness, but partially due to the sourness. She licks her finger again. Picking up the vial of lemon juice, she starts to toss back her head. Then she reminds herself that if she drains all of the lemon juice now, she will have none left, and then she will once more have to make ceviche without lemon. Exhaling, Link sets the vial back down. Kass chuckles.

She minces cool safflina into the sauce for a refreshing contrast to the tang of the fish. Once the sauce goldens, Link drains a vial of spring green elixir, rinses the now-empty vial, and pours the sauce in to set aside. She cleans the cooking pot.

"Porgy time," says Link. The twinkle in Kass's eyes hastens her beyond the silvery powder of the rushroom, the possibility of his smile pushing her on.

She tosses together flour—ground from Tabanch wheat—with a healthy sprinkling of spices, including the stand-by of black pepper, and her personal secret ingredient of rock salt. Link turns to show Kass how to press each side of the fish fillet into the mix and how to carefully shake off any extra, but he with his nimble feathers already knows.

Of course he would. The recipe comes from his own daughter.

Someone must have taught it to Genli, after all.

They heat goat butter to melting in a small quantity of oil at the bottom of the cooking pot. When the two mix into a smooth gold, Link adds the prepared porgy one at a time. She has no spatula; rather, she uses the long straight sword that Riju gave her to press the fillets into the oil-butter. Link listens to the sizzle. Once the bottoms have honeyed to the colour of the sunrise, she flips the fish over to fry the other side as well. Kass washes two flattish rocks off in the lake water to serve as plates. The porgy finish their meunièring. Link scoops the porgy onto one of the rocks for Kass, spooning—with her bare hand, for lack of a utensil, which she really should have purchased from somewhere by now—the lemon-butter sauce over the breaded porgy. His irises sparkle; his pupils have dilated; his feathers have risen up around his face like the rays of a radiant sun.

She grins at him.

Kass holds the flat stone in his upturned wings.

His beak parts. No words but a thin murmur of a melody. In the curve of his smile, Link can read his thanks.

She cooks for herself the non-porgy fish killed by the explosive. Greengill, mostly. As soon as the greengill start to sizzle, the scent hits Link hard as an armoured porgy to the face.

The scent of home.

This scent. The scent of greengill in butter. Not dredged in flour, no, but fried in oil, on the shores of Cephla Lake with the province of Ordona close enough for Akkalan fish to thrive in the waters.

The scent of Ordona. The scent of Ordon. The scent of...

Not the scent of the girl who smelled of horses, who carried with her the fragrance of hay, of warm horses' breath, of carrots and of apple, of leather and linen, of oil worked into the bridle and saddle, of the metallic bite of hands having handled horseshoes, of salt licks and of molasses, of the roasted pumpkins she would prepare for the horses she loved more than she loved herself.

The girl who smelled of horses. The girl who smelled of horses. The girl who smelled of horses whose name Link cannot remember.

The girl who smelled of horses.

The girl who smelled of horses with whom Link would travel the world, with Marin and with Aryll at their sides, to see all of Hyrule. For Marin to sing her songs to the world. For Aryll to observe every manner of flight and fowl in all of the glory of the Goddesses' wilds. For the girl who smelled of horses to learn of the horses she so loved from all corners of the world, and to teach as many horses as she could her whistle.

Her whistle. Link lifts her hands to her own mouth to wet her thumbs and forefingers. Ilia's whistle.

And for Link herself, to travel the world, to taste of its splendors, to try every dish, to cook every meal.
Link and the girl who smelled of horses would perch on the porch and swing their legs over the sides. While they took turns reading from books or preparing meals, they would discuss the golden future that lay ahead. Someday their legs would lengthen, and their feet would strengthen, and they would walk together out of Ordon and never look back. If one day they returned, they would bring behind them the wind of their years; the storms that had buffeted them in Ordon would seem weak as a breeze against the unyielding stone.

"When we come back from our trip around the world," the girl who smelled of horses would say while Link chopped garlic to season the hylian shrooms they were roasting, "I'd like to go to Lon Lon. Or maybe open a ranch myself. No." The girl who smelled of horses clapped her hand against her cheek and hummed. "I'd like to open a stable. Just for horses. I love goats too—they mean the world to me—but I'd like to just...horses. You know what I mean, Link?" Link nodded. "Maybe somewhere near Central Hyrule, or in western Faron, or in the plains of southern Necluda. Somewhere where I could ride a horse straight for days over the steppe."

"Like in the books," said Link.

The girl who smelled of horses's smile crinkled her eyes. "Like in the books."

"I'm glad that we're friends." Link's cheeks reddened as she sighed. "And that I get to spend my life with you." The girl who smelled of horses lowered her eyelids.

"Spending my life with you..." She dipped her head. "To have a stable of my own, and with you and Aryll and Marin." The girl who smelled of horses's eyelashes fluttered over her eyes. Link leaned over to rest her forehead against hers. "...it'd be nice to grow old with you." The girl who smelled of horses opened her hands, and Link slid her fingers into the valleys of her knuckles to hold her fast.

"You too, I see."

Link raises her chin to find herself gazing into Kass's eyes, glistening wetly with tears. She starts to cock her head in confusion, and then she feels the dampness on her own cheeks, pooling into droplets at her chin, dribbling down to wet the greengill she has tried so hard to keep dry.

She brings the greengill to her lips. Her hands tremble, but her mouth firms. Her tears add a delicious seasoning of salt to the greengill meunière; her belly seems to extend itself up her throat to try to swallow the fish whole.

"...thank you, traveller." Kass bows his head. "I have yet my promise to keep, and many paths to walk before I sleep—" Link's eyes widen for the verse that she has heard before. A verse that she may have taken from somewhere, or from someone. "—but I...must thank you for this reminder of why I keep these promises and walk these paths. If there is anything I may do in return..."

The words come more easily to her than ever before. "Your smile's enough. I just wanted you to enjoy a good meal. There's nothing like breaking bread with someone over a cooking pot." Link touches her chin. The corners of her mouth curl up. "And you've already given me a song. So this is my payment back to you. A melody for a meal."

His smile softens. "Then thank you for letting me break bread with you." He hums. "Break fish." Link laughs, and Kass removes a kerchief from a breast pocket to dry his eyes. "I hope to pass on to the songs of these lands, then. May we cross paths once again."

"Actually, speaking of paths..." Kass arches his eyebrows. The slight change in his expression almost filches the phrases from her fingertips, and yet she forces them forth nevertheless. "If you don't mind travelling with me for a little ways," Link says, choosing each word with almost as much care as she would ingredients, "I'd like to visit my own home before we go to the spirally thing. If that's all right with you." She pauses. "It's on the way and everything."

"An opportunity to learn a song as any," Kass responds with a smile. Sarie explodes out of Link's satchel with a yahaha! so loud that Kass squawks and flaps up from the campfire. The gust of his wings blows the cooking pot from the circular flame. Link lunges for the pot as it curves into the river. Her fingers close around the slate. Cryonis, cryonis—a pillar of ice forms in the river just beyond the bank. The pot bounces off of the column of ice. Link pumps her fists into the air before she realises that the pot hurtles directly towards her.

It slams into her stomach, the metal hot enough to graze pain into her skin. She lands with a whumph on her back.

Link holds the cooking pot in front of her. She checks its contents and finds the uneaten fish trapped within. The impact has flung the sauce onto the sides of the pot.

Yet the meal, for all of its presentation, remains intact.

Safe.

When Kass returns to the camp, his feathers so ruffled that he more resembles one of his fluffed daughters than himself, Link has to snort back her laughter. She introduces him to Sarie, who twirls their korok leaf. Smoothing his feathers with his wings, Kass preens his chest with his beak for a few minutes. He clears his throat. "I am pleased to meet any friend of my fellow traveller."

"Sarie's pleased to meet Floof too!"

He smiles, and Link feels her own mouth curve up. "Floof?"

"Floof's floofy!" They pat down the feathers that have fluffed up around Kass's shoulders. "Floofy floof!"

Kass laughs. "I did not know that koroks still existed except in song. May the Goddess Kokir watch over you, and the light illuminate your path."

"Ooh...Sarie hopes that they watch Sarie too! They sound nice!" Sarie whirs the leaf while Kass glances at Link. The sound of the leaf gives way to silence as Sarie floats down to the earth. "...Sarie's never heard of them before. Should Sarie have?"

"Ah..."

Link waves a hand to catch both of their attentions. She points to the pot. "Do either of you want some, or can I put the whole rest in my mouth myself?" She closes one eye. "I don't mean to be fishy, but...I'm hungry!"

Kass's mirth rumbles out in peals of a melody. Sitting around the campfire, the trio finishes off the porgy meunière. Link cleans the cooking pot in the lake. She scrubs the bottom clean of butter and fish with a handful of sand. By the time she returns to the campfire, the sun has set beyond the horizon. The summer's heat of day has given way to autumn's cool of night. Plopping herself down beside Kass, Link leans back to tap out a rhythm against her full stomach. When she yawns, her eyes tear up.

"I suppose," he suggests, with a flourish of the wing to the darkening skies, "we should rest for the night."
Link scarcely has time to nod before her head droops to the side and sleep overtakes her.

When she awakens the following morning, Link feeds Ilia a handful of salt and an endura carrot to prepare for the journey ahead. Her companion licks her cheek.

Over breakfast of leftover greengill grilled in salt, she unfurls her map. Link traces her finger over the province of Ordona. On the other side of the Akkalan Span, near the citadel that spears the skyline and the spire that rises from the peak.

Close.

So close that she can taste the Ordon catfish.

Even if one hundred years and kilometres yet separate her from her home, she could never wash the taste of Ordon catfish from her tongue.

As the party moves over the Akkalan Span, Link glances over the side of the bridge. Dark shapes move below in an area marked the parade grounds. Kass turns his head to where she looks. "Goats?" he inquires.

Within an instant Link has fwipped her telescope from her left hip and jammed it against her left eye. The telescope, she's certain, will leave her eye blackened from how firmly she thrust it, but her thoughts revolve entirely around examining the horns of the goats and possibly milking them.

Goat butter.

The telescope reveals a horde of bokoblins in and around the spire. On the upper levels, a group of bokoblins around a fire. Near the middle, two bokoblins grunt at one another, while a third—hiding behind a crate—pelts the first two with acorns. Each time an acorn hits, one bokoblin punches the other, until the two rage into a wrestling match. The acorn- thrower oinks. Link looks towards the spire's base; she uncovers a row of bokoblin sunbathing on top of rusted cannons. In the ruins of the parade grounds, she makes out the forms of guardian stalkers crawling about. Within a grove of trees sleeps a one-eyed giant like the monster she pushed into the Regencia River by the Digdogg Suspension Bridge. And beyond that, in the heart of the parade grounds overgrown with grasses and trees, the once-level ground torn apart by roots: goats.

Goats with horns that meet together to form halos over their heads.

Ordon goats.

They ride. Over the Akkalan Span. Until Cephla Lake passes out of view. Through the valley between the hills en route to Kanalet Ridge. They ride on the banks of the Kanalet River, teeming with greengill and hylian loach, the river that Ordoners called Totaka's River where it split in half the fork in the road, where it curved under the rightmost path.

They ride, and they ride, and they come at long last over the crest of the hill of the valley that drops away below into the autumnal forests of Akkala where waits her home.

The village on the fork in the road. The village on Kanalet River. The village through which have passed delegations of the King Zora, through which have passed Necludan and Faronese merchants in their great river barges, through which has passed the very princess of the land once known as Hyrule with her armies and entourage in tow, when a single girl who thinks of cooking far too often came to deliver letters of farewell and to gather her sleeping little sister into her arms.

The village that—even if Link does not yet remember every detail; even if she has not yet tasted every dish she has ever eaten in Ordon; even if she does not yet know of every scent that has ever tickled her nose from the grasses and the goats, from the horses and the herbs, from the forests and the fish, from the people who were neighbours and friends—she calls home. Home, not for the village that stands upon the ground, but for where the people she loves have walked.

Home, for which she still remembers no name.

Yet she does not need to remember the sensation of coming home, in the smoothing of her brow and the settling of her bones, for she has never truly forgotten.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: You'll note that both the fifty-sixth and fifty-seventh were written on the thirtieth of July. I was doing my best to catch up!

Thanks a million for continuing to read and support Delicious in Wilds. Thank you to you, the reader, for coming with me on this long journey, and a round of applause for my most wonderful beta reader, Emma, who rose from the grave at fuck o'clock in the morning to proofread the fifty-sixth chapter.

Regarding the timing of summer: Misan and Glepp's journey from Parapa to Lanayru took almost two months, and then Link going to Ruto took an additional week. She spent a few days messing around with Vah Ruta, then was unconscious for nearly two weeks, and then spent another almost two weeks messing around Ruto. Thus, this entire arc has gone from the very end of spring/beginning of summer, to the end of summer/beginning of fall.

The joke that Link was trying to make is the "is water wet?" stating the obvious sort of gag. Since she signs with sign language, she didn't realise that she still had the telescope between her teeth as she joking about Kass's words.

You might recall that I've mentioned Kass looking thinner and more bedraggled every time that Link has seen him.

Kass's invocation is the same one that he has given before, of course. It's traditional to invoke the goddesses.

Akkala is autumn-themed in Breath of the Wild. It's entirely by coincidence (I didn't actually sit down and plot out the plot of Delicious in Wilds, just figured out how long it would take to travel distances and let the fic fill itself in) that Link and Kass are heading up to Akkala in the fall, but I'm glad that it ended up that way.

Kass has been very refusing of Link's attempts at making him eat throughout the fic, even when he agreed to sing on Romani Ranch. Given that Link's whole thing is bringing people together with food, of course she would do the same for Kass.

In Delicious in Wilds, Kass and Link run into one another on occasion, though they've only done so a handful of times in a year and a half. Many of their meetings happen with Link hearing the accordion from afar and then coming to find Kass. I can't tell you how many times in Breath of the Wild I suddenly caught that sound of that familiar accordion on the wind and my relief whenever I heard it.

In Breath of the Wild, Kass's mentor was the court poet who knew Zelda and Link and who apparently had feelings for Zelda. It seems ridiculous that Kass would have learned from someone who had already been the court poet at the time of the Great Calamity; the timing literally makes no sense. Therefore, I opted to include a middleman. Kass's mentor is the son of the court poet in question, who has a very complicated relationship with his father. I suggest going back and rereading the letters that Link found in the cabin back in the third chapter. With this information, it should be clear which letters/notes were written by the father, and which by the son.

The poem was written from scratch. It's inspired by the song that Kass sings at the end of his quest. However, unlike the Ballad of the Sealing War—which I also wrote myself but which was purposefully written to be as close to the in-game form as possible, save for my addition of rhythm and rhyme—this song was just written from a blank sheet and I didn't look at the in-game version, as the two are just so different that it wouldn't have been beneficial. I also purposefully made it more awkward than the Ballad of the Sealing War, as it's written by a desperate and bitter man. Hopefully the iambic pentameter worked well!

The Hilted Singer, as before, refers to Fi, who sings the songs of the goddesses to Link in Skyward Sword and is viewed as the first minstrel.

Try arching your eyebrows. You'll feel the straining muscle that Link was talking about.

Amali did in fact talk about Kass's preferences, all the way back in the twenty-first chapter if I remember correctly. Naturally that would come back. Genli did teach Link how to make meunière after all.

Kass knows how to cook porgy meunière, for sure. He's not so great with other things, as we'll see in the future.

Up next: autumn; homecoming; memories.

Beta reader's comments: The longest journey in the series begins! This next set of chapters is super comfy. Heartbreaking, sometimes, but cozy. It's probably my second-favourite arc in the series (right after Medli).

Kass is a great presence to have around. He lends something really cool to the cast.

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef comes home and prepares a meal to share with the people whom the chef has known.

Chapter Notes

Hi all, just to let you know: I have a difficult programming exam this weekend that will require up to thirty-six consecutive hours of my time. Therefore, expect a hiatus of at least one day during that period, depending on timing. If I expect the hiatus to last longer (which may be the case), I will let you know as we approach the weekend. My expectation is that I will skip posting on Friday and Saturday, then resume on Sunday, but again, we'll see how it goes.

For those of you back-reading, this shouldn't impact you. Also hello from the past!

Now, in regards to the fifty-eighth chapter: previous chapters have touched on parental abuse. Please note that this chapter is much more direct with respect to that abuse and that this chapter features the explicit and intentionally malicious misgendering of a transgender character (previous times in Delicious in Wilds have been due to misunderstandings or other extenuating factors). Please stay safe.

Now, as usual, author's notes that didn't fit in the end: I first started writing this chapter at 19:32 on the thirtieth of July, and finished writing it at 09:17 on the first of August.

As always, thanks a million for all of your support that you've given me in writing Delicious in Wilds. It truly does mean a lot to me. And thank you to Emma, my beta reader, for helping me desperately try to figure out whether the fifty-eighth chapter actually contained the word "wormwood" or not as ctrl+f failed to load a twenty-five-page document correctly.

Oracles of the Golden Goddesses aren't the only way that the Golden Goddesses have been worshipped in the history of Hyrule. The concept of oracles, in fact, emerged from Parapa/Faron centuries upon centuries upon; this is a nod to the fact that the titular Oracle of Seasons is (presumably) gerudo, and Oracle of Ages is hylian. In the world of Delicious in Wilds, the traditional depiction of the Oracles is one each of the three human races (gerudo, sheikah, and hylian). Akkala, on the other end of the world, does not have oracles. Instead, the main (but not only) faith of Akkala in the part of the world where Link is from believed in a light spirit that looked over each individual province, manifesting itself as a spring. In addition, the people would commune to the Golden Goddesses directly through offerings and prayer, rather than through a more organised form of religion, and generally viewed the Golden Goddesses not as people but more as forces of nature. I'm not saying that one system is "bad" or "good" or whatever (no comments on organised vs. decentralised faith), just that different parts of Hyrule worshipped things differently.
The characters talked about in this chapter (i.e. Pergie and Jaggle) come from the supporting cast of Twilight Princess, since Ordon is lifted from there. I know, there's a lot of Twilight Princess influence, but that's just because I wanted to give Link's memories actual names! There have been plenty of references to other games; these are just concentrated here. Twilight Princess is just the game that did the most work in actually giving Link a particular hometown, at least in my opinion. Other games have tried, but none (in my opinion) did it as well as Twilight Princess. Of course, that game has plenty of other flaws, including a forced tutorial, but...well, that's a story for another time.

"Links tempered in the same flame fit together stronger than those forged from the same ore" is the goron version of "the blood of the covenant is thicker than the water of the womb", i.e. friends over family.

They follow the road. Link and Ilia, Kass and Sarie. They follow on the left-hand bank of the Kanalet River. They follow the path between the forests of autumnal trees: the sky as blue as the Goddess Nayru's water, the leaves as red as as the Goddess Din's fire, the fragrance of ripeness as green as the Goddess Farore's wind.

She can nearly smell the harvest carried on that wind. Her favourite time of the year. The girl who smelled of horses beloved the spring for its foaling of horses and kidding of goats and for its saddling of late yearlings ready for the ride. Link beloves the autumn for its gathering of the wilds and for its gathering-together of people.

She can almost taste the earthy sweetness of Ordon's pumpkin, the mild succulence of its catfish, the savoured tartness of its cheese.

The forest thins. The river broadens. The sunrise casts the world in gold.

Home.

Home.

Home.

Every place to which Link has been has changed over the century of her absence, and yet the spirits of the people have remained. Darunia has lost its upper layers and its underground mines. Medli has lost two pillars of stone. Nabooru has lost the outermost of its rings. Ruto has lost all but its heart.

Yet the spirit of the people, who have lived and laughed and loved there, who have harvested the bounty of the wilds, who have shared with one another recipes and meals and entire lives, has remained.

Link will not find the faces that she has left. She will not see the farmers and the ranchhands, the butchers and the rice growers, the smithies and the tailors, the herbalists and the apothecaries, the fishermen and the mushroom-gatherers, the stonemasons and the woodcarvers, the leatherworkers and the candlemakers, the names and the faces that she has known.

She will not find those faces, that lived then.
But she will find the faces that live now. The faces that make up Ordon. The feet that walk its paths and the hands that build its homes, the bellies that eat of its gifts and the hearts that give the gifts back.

Home.

Upon the accordion Kass plays a merry tune in time to the steps of Ilia's hooves. A song of being lost and a song of coming home. A song of a child on a boat upon the water; a song of a harpist and a violinist who had forgotten who they were; a song of the woken wind that brought their memories back to them; a song of the woken wind that sailed their ships to shore; a song of the woken wind that lost them upon the sea and the same woken wind that returned them home.

When Link pulls up her sleeves to milk a passing goat, she catches Kass gazing at her left hand with its lightning-strike scar, the same gold of the Goddesses. He arches his eyebrows. "The songs say that those who have been struck by lightning and lived bear the blessing of the Goddess Farore," he remarks, a pleasant tone to his timbre.

She turns her hand over. She curls her fingers in. Despite the imprint of the malice upon her palm, the golden spiral of the lightning overcomes to form a set of arches upon her palm, almost like...

"A hand of Her courage, as the songs say." Kass smiles at her. Link dips her head. "So, traveller. You have heard the songs of my home, have you not? Why not tell me of yours?"

Sarie bobs up and down on her head. "Sarie wanna know too! Tell, tell, tell! Maybe the stories'll wake the winds and then Sarie'll remember Sarie's memories, too!"

Kass mms. "If you do remember, Sarie, my heart would be gladdened to hear of your home, and of any songs that the winds may bring." He unfurls his feathers; they wave in the breeze. Again Link remembers the windchimes of Medli. Kass's home. Where his wife and children wait for him. "Now, traveller, have you story or song to share?"

Link lifts her hands to the skies. Somewhere in the distance she can see, just beyond the Eldic mountaintops that tower over the Akkalan valleys, a stream of scarlet that vanishes behind the summit of Death Mountain.

Somewhere in the distance Yunobo rides the Divine Beast Vah Rudania. Her ears thrum with the words he has told her. Of the virtue of the Goddess Goro-goro. Of the pride in what he does. Of the pride that tells him not to hide.

She does not follow the path of the Goddess Goro-goro. But she follows the feelings of her friends, and if Yunobo will not hide, then neither will she.

Link speaks.

She speaks, and she speaks, and memories that she did not even know she still had within her spill from her hands and fall from her fingertips, and she does not stop. She tells him of everyone she knew. She tells him of the spring with its foaling of horses and its kidding of goats and its saddling of late yearlings prepared for the ride. She tells him of the autumn with its gathering of the wilds and its gathering-together of people. She tells him of Rusl and of the girl who smelled of horses. She tells him of the warmth of the goats and the horses and of how deeply the girl who smelled of horses cared for them. She tells him with pride of how many people from the far-flung corners of the land once known as Hyrule would commission from Rusl and of the deliveries that she took to patrons everywhere from Eldin to Necluda, from Akkala to Faron, from Lanayru to Central Hyrule.
She tells him of the food. Of huckleberry and ginseng, of artichoke and bean, of pecan and corn, of cranberry and tomato, of cherry and wintergreen, of chive and crabapple, of pumpkin and prickly pear, of greengill and catfish, of bee honey and goat milk. She tells him of soups and of stews, of roasts and of skewers, of steamed rice and grilled fish, of glazed goat and sautéed nuts, of catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd.

She tells him and Sarie of home.

When they arrive at Ordon to see all that has changed in this hundred years, surely Kass will inquire of why the village differs from her stories; Link may have yet to speak the truth of these hundred years of passing. Yet in this very moment, Kass's eyes twinkle and Sarie's tiny hands pat her hair. In this very moment, she wants nothing more than to hold the hand of the girl who smelled of horses and to make her that promised catfish stew.

Pausing suddenly, Link turns to Kass. "I don't have a song for you, but I have the start of one, if you want to write me one."

"Oh?" asks he.

"I came up with it while I was in Ruto." She flexes her hands as though clearing her throat, and then she loops through the gestures in rhythm:

"This texture, this heat,
this savory meat,
this salt and this spice,
this ball of steamed rice."

Link stops to observe his reaction. Kass gazes at her with something akin to bemusement. "It's about rice-balls," she adds hastily. "I don't know if you've had them before but if you haven't I'll make you because they're really good and also I like making food and I like making it especially for my friends and you're one of my friends so I'd especially like to make some for you especially since Amali's told me all about you and I've seen you so many times and you helped me out with Dorian and I don't even know where I'd be without you and—"

he rests his hand on her shoulder. She lowers her arms. "I must admit, traveller, that never have I composed a song of food. But for you I will certainly endeavour to try. The porgy meunière alone deserves an ode in celebration." Kass lifts up his chin. "What think you, Sarie?"

Sarie bounces up and down; they pull hard on Link's sidelocks until she looks up at Sarie's inquisitive leaf-mask-thingy. "Sarie likes the song! It's very pretty. Pretty as the purple swirlies! Even if Sarie still hasn't had loam, the food is good too!"

Link ducks her head from embarrassment as Sarie goes on; Kass lets out a good-natured chuckle that warms her ears to the tips. Ilia whinnies.

They walk on.

The trees thin. She need not unfurl her map to know her way. Link has walked all over the land once known as Hyrule. The soles of her boots have seen the steppes of Parapa and the forests of Faron, the rivers of Lanayru and the grasslands of Necluda, the mountains of Eldin and the snows of Tabantha, and none more so than the crispness of the Akkalan air and the blueness of its skies.
She has seen the sights, and she has lived the lights, and now she's coming home.

Where the Kanalet River pools into Ordona Spring, her breath catches for the sight of the shrine she has passed by countless times. Ordona Spring, where the girl who smelled of horses would lead Epona to wash her of the dust of the road and heal her of her wearies and her worries. Ordona Spring, with its long reeds that the girl who smelled of horses would fashion into grasswhistles. Ordona Spring, where the girl who smelled of horses had taught Link her whistled song.

Ordona Spring, with its shrine that long lay still and silent. Ordona Spring, with its shrine that the villagers had decorated with the markings of the Light Spirit Ordona, said to watch over the people of its province. The girl with the golden hair told Link, beaming all the while with how carefully she had researched the matter, that once the people of the province had revered Ordona as a Goddess in Her own right. "Though, of course, the Goddess of the hylians of Ordona, such as yourself, is mostly likely to be the Goddess Hylia." The girl with the golden hair shook her head in disbelief. "Though I hear they have no Sage for Her or anything. Not even Oracles for the Golden Goddesses, though they worshipped the Golden Goddesses as the only ones of the world! Honestly, I can't imagine that." The girl with the golden hair paused and raised her hand to her mouth. "N-not that there's anything wrong with that, Link! I d-don't think that Ordona is backwards or anything! Just...just different from what I'm used to, is all."

Link tilted her head to the side. "Do you want to help me crimp this tart? You're better at it than me."

"Oh!" The girl with the golden hair set down the book to kneel herself on the floor beside the cooking pot, where Link busied herself making a wildberry tart. "I'm s-sorry for insulting you."

Link blinked. "Insulting me?"

"With the...talk of not being to imagine not worshipping the Goddess Hylia. Th-the Seven in general."

She shrugged. "I grew up on stories of the Golden Goddesses. I think I get the Seven stuff too. But I've been around a bunch and everyone's got their own thoughts." She watched the girl with the golden hair carefully crimp the edges of the tart, her hands steady, her tongue poking out of her mouth in concentration. Link poked her own tongue out of her mouth. The girl with the golden hair glanced up at Link and blushed.

"I...I saw you doing that," she explained, "and I thought that maybe that would help me focus, too."

Link felt the corners of her mouth curve upwards. "Thank you for all the things you tell me about. It's funny. I grew up in Ordon but I feel like I don't know that much about it."

"W-well, I'll be sure to research all about it! To tell you as much as I can!" the girl with the golden hair promised her, the excitement in her voice making Link bob her head along though she barely understood the sheer length of the words that the girl with the golden hair sometimes used. "Th...thank you, Link."

They worked on the wildberry tart in quiet for a few moments more. The girl with the golden hair finished the crimping and sat back.

"Do you ever...plan to go back there? To Ordon?" the girl with the golden hair asked her.

The light of the fire beneath the cooking pot reflected in the gr—no, the blue of her eyes. Instead Link turned away from her, returned to the wildberry tart, sank the bridge between them into the depths of silence. Though, when she began to fill the tart shell with the wildberry filling, Link poked her tongue out of the corner of her mouth in concentration, and she caught the girl with the golden hair smiling at her.

Returning to Ordon.

Link grabs Kass's wing and tugs him towards the shrine as long ago she tugged Amali. She guides Ilia into the warm waters of the spring and strokes her companion's mane. "You rest here a little, girl. Epona loved it, and I'm sure you'll love it too." Link searches the spring for the grasswhistle reed. When she spots the reeds growing still around the edge of the spring, she plucks a long blade of grass and cradles the stalk against her cheek. Link folds the grass into a whistle. Upon it she plays Epona's song and the whistle that the girl who smelled of horses had taught her.

Ilia trots towards her. She noses Link's cheek and licks up her face until her bangs stick upwards from saliva. Link laughs. She embraces her companion. "I knew you'd like it here."

She invites Kass and Sarie to come with her. Down into the shrine of Ordona Spring. Link runs her hands over the markings of the Light Spirit Ordona, in the form of a goat with its horns connected into a halo above its head. The golden swirls painted over the shrine. Though the paint has faded, she can still trace the whorls so carefully inked upon the surface of the shrine. The swirls and the whorls of gold.

Link glances down at her hands. She pushes up her sleeves to expose her wrists. The violet scars inked into her body and the golden swirls painted upon the shrine.

The patterns do not exactly match. She can see where the Ordoners have approximated the golden spirals, long before the world knew of slate or Divine Beast. Yet, the resemblance...

"Traveller?"

Kass gazes at her with an expression of such concern and worry that he resembles a cucco smelling roast drumstick. Link pamps her palms against her cheeks to clear her head. She demonstrates the lifting of the slate and its setting into the shrine, then urges Kass into the curtain of blue light.

They descend down into the earth. Link shows off her skills with the slate, grinning all the while as Sarie claps their tiny hands together and Kass blinks—his lower eyelid sliding up—in amazement. Indeed Link shows off her skills all the way until she spends a second too long striking a pose at Kass and Sarie to notice a statised ball loosed from its chains. It slams into her with the fury of a hundred kilograms of Eldic spices, and she smacks her face against the floor.

At least the curtain of light that Link touches at the goalpoint of the shrine heals her broken nose.

Sarie leaps up and down and twirls around while the voice in a language she does not know begins to flow, as usual, accompanied by its matching ensemble of images.

"You can understand this tongue, traveller?" Kass asks. Link looks towards him to notices him studying the images rather intensely; she cocks her head.

"No...I haven't been paying any attention. I think that's supposed to teach people stuff, like about the shrine? But I don't really get it." She scratches her cheek. "Either I already figured it out or the concepts don't make any sense and I can't make head or tail of the paintings."

"Is that so..." Kass murmurs under his breath, more of a statement than a question. He observes the images as they begin to repeat from the beginning, his eyes narrowed in his focus.
Sarie slaps their legs against Link's head. "Shakalah," they say, and nothing more. Link shrugs. She motions for Kass to follow her into the lift back up, and he—after another moment's glance towards the images—defers to her.

They take the lift back up. Link shifts her weight from side to side. She bounces herself up and down. Sarie uunghs repeatedly on her head as the bouncing bumps the korok as well.

As the blue curtain of light parts, the scent of Ordona Spring curls around her. She signs the word to herself, touching her hand to her cheek, to her eye, to the centre of her chest, a path she has shaped over and over in her life.

Home.

Home.

Home, just beyond this forest path, just beyond that bend in the woods, just beyond where Totaka's River flows, and she breaks into a run, and her heart pounds and her lungs burn and she's alive alive alive and she's coming home home home—

Her eyes widen.

Her heart falls away beneath her.

Her body sinks down into the grass.

"Traveller? Trave—oh."

The waterwheel, rusted away, hued in the same red and orange as the autumnal leaves. The remains of the houses, some walls yet held up by ivy and bramble, most little more than rubble, the wood long since rotted away. The fishing dock, broken and bare, its only trace in her memories. The fields of pumpkin and squash patches overgrown in weeds. The paths through the village overtaken by the forest. The wild goats grazing in the grassy meadows that thrive over where once stood the village of Ordon.

Here: Pergie and Jaggle's home beside the broken water wheel unable to turn in the current of the river. There: where she taught Colin how to fish, the bend in the river nearly the same, the dock vanished into the abyss. Here: the market where the villagers of Ordon and the farmers and ranchers from around the village gathered to trade crops and herbs and animals and meat and fish and clothing and candles and tools and implements and doohickeys and everything else beneath the Goddesses' blue skies. There: the house at the heart of the village that Link has climbed and climbed again to rap on the window of the girl who smelled of horses, now nothing but a single curved wall and a rusted well filled up with mud. Here: the path to the ranch over the hill.

And far, far there: the house.

That house.

No longer even a house, but a few planks not yet rotted in the boughs of the tree and the metal pegs that once held up a ladder longer since fallen to dust.
"Traveller..."

She can hear, as if in the distance, Kass's footfalls to her right. She can hear, as if in the distance, Ilia neighing concernedly in her left ear. She can hear, as if in the distance, Sarie kookooing to land on her head.

She rises to her feet. She closes her eyes. She signs in front of herself.

"I'm going to make a meal," she says, and she does not know to whom she speaks. "It might take a while. I hope you can be more patient than you've already been, and I understand if you can't."

"Take all of the time you need, traveller," Kass responds, his voice warm with affection yet heavy with concern. Link feels a weight upon her shoulder, a trickle of feathers along her jaw. "If there is anything that I may do for you, traveller, you need only ask. May the light illuminate your path."

Link lowers her eyelids. When she opens them again, the village of Ordon lies still and silent as it did before.

She sets down the slate. She sets down the wooden box of elixirs. She sets down the metal box of ingredients bought in Yunobo's city. She sets down the curved metal bow given to her by Amali. She sets down the long straight sword given to her by Riju. She sets down the silver spear given to her by Sidon. She sets down her satchel. She leaves the red telescope looped into her belt, and she leaves the cooking pot, and she leaves herself.

Link removes the empty bottle that she caught along the Bank of Wishes. Kneeling Totaka's River, she washes it clean beside the grazing goats. Goats. She lifted her head towards them.

Her first effort at milking one rewards her with a black eye, and her second with a hoof-shaped welt upon her cheek. A miracle that the goats do not snap her neck.

Her third brings her to a surprisingly gentle goat that continues to graze. Link crouches beside the nanny-goat, cooing all the while and petting the goat's head and back, and washes dust and dirt from the goat's udder. Then, curling her fingers around a teat, she pumps, gently squeezing in from the top and undulating towards the bottom to guide the milk through. Warm and earthy, a goldened white, the milk pours down into the bottle. Link massages the base of the udder with her knuckles as she goes. She glances at the nanny-goat to discern any her discomfort, but the goat grazes on.

When she has filled the bottle with enough for the meal—slightly over a third full—Link gives the goat's udder another wash of river water. She stands. Stroking the goat along her woolly back, she feeds the goat a sweet endura carrot in thanks.

Link removes the belt from her trousers and ties it around the bottle—screwing on the lid—as a makeshift rope. Then she gathers one of the metal doohickeys from the remains of a fence to drive into the ground by the river. Looping the belt around the post and knotting it firm, she sets the goat's milk to cool in the river water.

She gazes up at the sky and estimates a half-day. Link has not the time to make cheese, but she does have the time to churn butter fresh.

Kass and Sarie, Link finds when she returns, have set up a camp beneath the towering oak. The metal in the ground, once part of the smithy, has given rise to a growth of ironshrooms more frequent in the Eldic mountains. While she cuts the ironshroom from the ground and sets river water to boil in her cooking pot, Link asks them what they would like to eat, and Kass inquires what she could make.
She settles on carrot cake. Amali's recipe. For the glimmer in Kass's eyes.

For Sarie, she apologises, but Sarie take a sample of the carrot cake, so sweet and sugary that they launch into an impromptu dance that ends when they smack against Kass's leg and flop to the ground with an oof. For Ilia, Link sorts through the wild crops that have grown in the absence of the village. She steams squash and pumpkin to a softened goo and adds rock salt, then rolls the gourds towards Ilia, whose tail swishes and whose ears flick as she eats.

They bed for the night in nests of grass. Link cannot sleep. She rises with the moon to pace around the periphery of the village. Something rustles in the bushes. Her head snaps up, but then silence falls once more; she hears nothing but the calls of owls and songs of crickets.

When the sun gilds the valley, Link fishes the bottle of milk from the river and skims off the cream. She tightens the lid again, then sets the bottle at the campfire. Sarie tries to pop it open, but Link shakes her head.

Another half-day.

While the milk ripens, they eat a breakfast of leftover carrot cake and roasted acorns. Then Link walks off towards the river with empty elixir vials in hand.

She begins by milking goats. She gathers enough for the base of the meal and to soak the meat. Once the goats have given her the milk and a sprained left wrist, she leaves them for the waters.

Sidon's fishing pole.

Link roots in the grass for worms with which bait the hook. With fingers dampened and browned by soil, she seats herself beside the river to cast her line. She catches greengill in abundance and tosses them back into the waters. Only when the sun has climbed to its zenith does the fish on the line begin to fight. Link reaps the catfish that leaves a blow across her face, matching her blackened eye from the goat.

She cuts off the catfish's head and tail, then slits the skin behind the gills to begin the process of removing the fins and guts. Her knife traces the curve of its spine from its tail to the base of its head. Grunting and bracing herself, Link slowly skins the catfish, leaving just the tender flesh behind. She slits the fish in half, then squeezes each fillet into an elixir of milk to soak. Tying the belt around the vials again, she leaves them to cool in the water to delay spoilage.

Link picks out a pumpkin.

She raps her knuckles against the gourds as she had once rapped her knuckles against the window of the girl who smelled of horses. Link spots a pumpkin ripe and firm. Digging her nails into the rind, she feels the resistance against her fingers. She slices off the stem about a hand's width from the gourd and gathers it gently in her arms. Link has not the time to let the pumpkin cure properly, and so she will have to make do with what she has.

But then again, she always managed to make do.

A peculiar Champion, for these peculiar times.

By the time she has finished her preparations, the skies have started to darken, and the milk has ripened. Link seats herself in front of the campfire, taking the bottle of milk in hand, and starts to shake it back and forth to concuss the milk against the glass sides. The cream begins to heavy. Sarie dances to the rhythm of the churn as Link shifts the bottle from one hand to the other to allow herself to rest. She agitates the bottle over and over. At the bottom of the bottle form small golden granules of butter; then, the mass parts from the buttermilk.

Link pours off the buttermilk and offers it to Kass and to Sarie. Kass does not find the taste agreeable, though he thanks her for the chance to try. Sarie sticks their hand into the vial, shudders from their legs to their hands, and shoves their limbs into the soil to cleanse their palette.

She rolls her shoulders. Tipping back her head, she drains the vial of buttermilk and wipes her mouth on the back of her hand.

With that, Link begins to cook.

She carves the pumpkin to remove the stem and top, then reaches inside with her—washed—bare hands to pulp the insides and remove the seeds into a pile to dry and to roast. The process strains her sprained wrist further than the churning of the butter. The bone of her wrist begins to hurt, begins to ping with pain at the heart of her palm between the middle two fingers of her hand, as though the bone had become entangled with the vein she can see rising from the back of her hand.

She draws up the vials of milk and soaked catfish from the river.

The ironshrooms that have boiled in the cooking pot since yesterday night have by now softened. Peeling away the hardened caps, Link digs the succulent flesh of the gills out with her knife. She minces the ironshrooms and adds them into the pumpkin. Pouring out the water in the cooking pot, she scrubs the inside clean to wash away the metallic tang, then fills the pot back up. Her muscles strain to heft the fullness of the pot from the river to the campsite.

Kass lands beside her to suggest he help carry the pot. Link shakes her head. He follows her as she forces herself on, step by weary step, until her spine threatens to snap in half.

She sets the cooking pot down upon the flame.

While she waits for the water to come to a boil, Link uncorks the vials and splashes fresh milk into the pumpkin. She fishes out the catfish fillets, the milk soak having cleansed them of their muddier flavours, and butters them over. Link drops them into the pumpkin. Into a mesh of fabric, she folds the catfish head, tail, and bones and ties it off: to draw out the flavours of catfish. She dips the mesh into the gourd, leaving just enough fabric draped outside.

With ironshroom, milk, butter, and catfish mixed into the pumpkin goop, she fits the pumpkin over the rim of the cooking pot and replaces the carved-out lid of the pumpkin.

When the water boils, the pumpkin and its contents begin to steam. The milk thickens with the pulp of the pumpkin. The mesh of catfish bones simmers. Link tests the catfish fillets with her knife through careful openings of the lid of the pumpkin. They soften until she can pull them apart with her fingers into strands that simmer further into stew. On butter and pumpkin goo, the stew gilds to a golden-orange. At long last she pulls out the mesh of catfish bones and buries them in the mud by the bank of the river.

Buried fish bones, the villagers would say if still they walked the earth, would over time gather magic from the current of the stream, and could one day spring to life again to swim towards the sea.

If only people could do the same.

Link sprinkles salt and pepper to the stew. Then she lets the pumpkin simmer a few moments more, until she can smell the softening of the rind.
She lifts the pumpkin from the heat. The gourd warms her palms. She settles the pumpkin into her lap.

She raises the lid.

She inhales the scent.

Catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd.

Link inhales the earthy sweetness of Ordon’s pumpkin, the mild succulence of its catfish, the savoured tartness of its butter.

Her lashes brush over the swell of her cheeks.

Returning to Ordon.

Link had promised Mipha that she would return, yet whenever the taste of Ordon catfish or pumpkin crept into her mouth, she would be six years old again in that sepulchre of a house, or she would be twelve years old again with a wooden box from Mabe she hid in the stable for her fear of carrying it home, or she would be—that certain age again—and she would be tired, so tired.

Tired.

So tired that she could lay herself down in the grass to close her eyes, so tired that she could nuzzle the earth until she passed to slumber, so tired that the wilds could take her.

And if the wilds would not take her, then she could give herself to them.

Yet.

Yet the exhaustion had left her. Not after the moment Link had pulled the sword that seals the darkness from the stone, but blink by blink, beat by beat, breath by breath.

Daruk, who offered her a family. Revali, who offered Aryll happiness. Urbosa, who offered her someone who understood. And Mipha, who offered Link her childhood, no longer tied to that house alone.

Returning to Ordon.

To reach the province of Ordona from the castletown, Link needed only follow the smooth path laid out for her. She could close her eyes and lift her hands from the reins, and Epona could gallop her to the place Link supposed she would have to call home.

Yet in the road lurked unseen dangers, lurked brambles and thorns and monsters and malice that no one else could see but her, as if the guardians that Purah repaired had turned against Hyrule but only recognised her as an enemy, as if in that house awaited the Calamitous One itself, and only when she stepped inside would the chrysalis-heart burst open and the nightmare manifest.

Link asked.

She asked. She asked if she should return, and she found her friends around her, whether or not they knew the fullness of whatever had happened. She asked if she should return to Ordon, and their answers carved—through the brambles and thorns and monsters and malice—the same golden road that everyone else seemed to see.

Mipha folded her webbed hands together in front of her as in prayer. "I hope that you can reconcile with your family as I did." She dipped her head. "Whatever you find, I am here for you, my Link."

Urbosa rested her arm over Link's shoulders. "Just remember to be honest. You don't owe them anything, least of all going back. But if you are going back, then make sure you remember your courage." She smiled warmly. "Though courageous, Link, is never forgotten."

"You better give 'em the talons," Revali snapped, expression hard for a beat before softening, "because anyone who has ever made Ary—I mean, the little lemur cry deserves 'em and more."

"No matter what happens, li'l buddy—" Daruk squeezed her into a hug; she looped her arms around his bulk and let herself rest against his chest. "—you've got a family where it counts, and don't you forget it. You've always got family up in Darunia." His words rumbled his chest to vibrate her body, waves lapping on a distant shore. "And links tempered in the same flame fit together stronger than those forged from the same ore. I don't know what ore you were forged from, li'l buddy—" He boomed out a laugh. "—but I do know there's no flame hotter than protecting Hyrule from the Calamitous One by your side."

She asked, and they embraced her. She asked, and they would carry her there on their own hands if they could. She asked, and the girl with the golden hair gazed at her as though noticing her for the first time.

The smell of home.

She left the entourage around the perimeter of the province of Ordon. Impa gave her three days. "If you do not return on the third morn," Impa warned her, "we will assume that something happened, and we will come get you. The Yiga have not been sighted frequently in Akkala, but I will take no chances with the..." Her lip curled. Link drew inwards on herself. "...with the one that the blade of evil's bane has chosen. You are dismissed." Link bowed to her; Impa's gaze flickered... to the horizon. "And on behalf of Her Majesty...good luck."

The first time she had returned to Ordon since drawing the sword that seals the darkness from the stone, she had come beneath the cloak of a new-moon night. She had slipped into the village on footfalls hushed by silent violet and stealthfin, and she had left the village untouched save for three envelopes and a missing child.

She had not breathed until she had parted from that house with Aryll in her arms.

The second time she returned to Ordona since drawing the sword that seals the darkness from the stone, she came in with the rays of the rising sun and the blade of evil's bane burning on her back.

The villagers—the people she has known—awake in the golden hues of dawn greeted her. She gave them her name. Her name. Not the name under which she had passed for years for fear of word reaching the house, but the name that she carried like she carried her love of food and like she carried the scars upon her body.

Hers.

Link.

She knew them. She knew all of them, and they knew her; though some called her the name that had never been hers at first, they smiled at her and nodded when she explained. Some remarked that they had suspected. Others asked if that was why she had left the village. Most welcomed her back.

Welcomed her. Greeted her. Absence had made hearts grow fonder, and she was no longer the scrawny girl who stared at her boots lest someone meet her gaze.

Now Link lifted her chin. Now she met their gazes. Pergie and Jaggle, Hanch and Sera, Fado of the ranch, Uli and Rusl.

Uli and Rusl and their son, Colin.

Rusl.

The path to the smithy curved right by the Kanalet River. By Totaka's River, as the villagers called it. Colin—his hair golden as the sunrise, his smile wide as the river long—saw her first. Yelling her name, Colin half-ran half-tumbled out of Uli and Rusl's home with its thatched-straw roof and its passage under the floorboards at the left-hand side of the house. She opened wide her arms; Colin flew into her. The grasses cushioned her fall.

Colin holding her hand, Link wandered the path to the house. Just as she wiped her boots on the welcome mat, Uli opened the door to call out if Colin were all right.

Her eyes widened.

Link waved to her.

Uli embraced her. Despite the swell of Uli's second unborn child preventing her from wrapping her arms fully around the girl who left and who had returned home, Link pressed her face into Uli's chest as Uli stroked her hair.

She entered the smithy where worked Rusl with Uli at her left and Colin at her right. Link stood with her boots halfway through the threshold. She could smell the oils and salts of the smithy, the metallic tang of the irons and coppers that reminded her, somewhat, of blood.

But a comforting reminder. Of home. Of a home shared by blood spilled rather than blood inherited.

The nature of Rusl's commissions had changed. She recognised none of the swords or shields or spears or axes or drillshafts or horseshoes or pots or pants or implements or cages or this or that.

Yet the smithy itself remained as it had.

There sat Rusl, and there the kiln, and there stood she, the girl who had left and who had returned home.

Link threw her upper body down into a bow, and then the rest of her reached the floor. She pushed her forehead down against the floorboards. She apologised. She apologised for leaving so suddenly; she apologised for having made trouble by neglecting her courier duties; she apologised for potentially hurting the patrons that depended on his deliveries and on hurting him and Uli.

Rusl ruffled her hair.

He extended his hand to her, on the floor, as he had done so many years ago.

And she took his hand, from the floor, as she had done so many years ago.

When he hugged her, Link let herself go limp against him. He smelled warm, of oil and of sweat, of smoke and of iron, of safety and of home.

"When I sent you up there with the sword 'n' board, I never would've reckoned that you'd end up the one with the blade of evil's bane." Rusl put his hand on his hips. "How 'bout that? She couldn't have picked a better hero to bear Her weight. That's for sure."

Link rubbed the back of her head.

"There's other people waiting for you too, you know," Rusl remarked with a wink, and Link's face reddened. "We can catch up later. We'll have all the time in the world now, won't we, lass?"

Tears welled to film her eyes.

She shook her head.

"I'm...I'm leaving again. I just...came by to..." Link reached over her left shoulder. Her fingers curled around the hilt of the sword that seals the darkness; Rusl inclined his head.

"Then whenever you come back, we'll have all the time in the world." Raising his eyebrows, he squeezed her shoulder. "That's a not-so-subtle way to say that we'll see each other again, Link. So I reckon you should make sure you come back when all's said and done, and you can fix me a meal."

"Fix you a meal?" Link echoed.

"Fix me a meal," Rusl repeated with a smile. "You're a woman of your word. As long as you fix on coming back and making me something, you'll do it. I've almost got more faith in that than in the Goddesses Themselves." He glanced skyward. "That's not a challenge there, ladies." Link laughed; Rusl hugged her again. "Now go on. You've got someone else on your mind, don't you?"

Uli frowned, opening her mouth, but Rusl glanced at her and shook his head.
Link swallowed.

She took the path to the ranch but could find neither hide nor hair of the girl who smelled of horses. She stopped a moment to pet the goats and to let the horses lick salt off of her palm.

And then Link took a breath, and then she turned towards the heart of the village.

Always when she had climbed to the second story of the girl with smelled of horses's house—she slept on the upper level while her father remained on the lower, so that he could in theory ensure she would have to pass through him to enter or leave—Link had done so in the stillness of the night, and never in broad daylight. Yet she felt that it no longer mattered whether the girl who smelled of horses's father knew.

In the very marrow of her bones, Link could sense that she would never scale her best friend's house, ever again.

As she had done so many times before, she rapped on the window of the girl who smelled of horses, and the girl who smelled of horses rappelled out on a ladder made of her bedsheets strung together.

Except. Except the girl who smelled of horses did not rappel out. Except the girl who smelled of horses did not slide open her window. Except the girl who smelled of horses did not respond to the sound of Link's knuckles on the window.

The girl who smelled of horses had run away.

The girl who smelled of horses had run away after Link had left. The girl who smelled of horses had taken off in the stillness of the night. Rusl had caught her, he told Link once she returned to the smithy with wettened cheeks and swollen eyes, on the outskirts of the village.

Before Link had gone on that final trip to the castletown, when she still faithfully served her duties as a courier, the girl who smelled of horses had expressed interest in the blade. Link had shown her bits and pieces of what she could in the few days that she remained in Ordon each month.

Thereafter, when Rusl and the girl who smelled of horses had awoken to letters in shaky scrawl—barely legible, Rusl noted, to Link's flushed face—upon their bedsides, the girl who smelled of horses had asked Rusl to teach her. The sword and the shield. Rusl had not had the time to impart on her the full breadth of lessons that he had on Link, but he had been able to tell, even then, that the girl who smelled of horses's gaze lay trained on the line of the horizon.

"She went south." Rusl scratched the back of his neck. "I don't know where. I reckon she's scared of sending a letter. 'Case her pa goes after her." He brushed his thumb over the underside of Link's eyes, wiping away her tears. "She's just as resilient as you are, Link. She'll be fine. I know it. One day you'll see her again. Just whistle like she does. When you hear the horses come running, that's when you'll know you've found her."

Link pressed her face into Rusl's chest. He held her. He held her, and held her, and he did not let go, anchoring her to this world, though not as tightly as had the girl who smelled of horses.

"Sorry for not telling you straight away. I thought you should see it with your own eyes, firsthand."

She nodded uncomprehendingly into his shirt. His grip tightened around her until she almost could not breathe.

Or maybe something else strangled her heart and choked her lungs.
"It'll all be all right, Link. You'll see her again someday. The Goddesses aren't that cruel." Rusl's fingers ran through her hair and untangled her ponytail. Link reached back her hands to re-tie it. He tipped up her chin until their gazes met. "Don't forget her."

Link swung her head from side to side. "If I never see her again I'll always remember her. I don't think I could ever forget."

Rusl smiled. His eyelids lowered. "Good. Don't forget, Link. That's one regret..." His words gave way to whisper, and Link strained to make out his breaths. "...I hope you never have."

Her fingers dug into the fabric of his shirt.

"Now...you got any other business here?" Rusl inquired. Link nodded her head against his chest. "You already been up to the ranch?" She nodded again. "Hm. You already talk to..." He started to name names. She nodded again, and again, again. "You already fixed yourself some breakfast?"

Link shook her head; there Rusl chuckled. His hand slid from her shoulder—she pressed herself closer against his remaining arm—to slap his own stomach in his mirth. "Well now, that's some business. Fixin' to use my cooking pot?"

She shook her head again, and Rusl's laughter faded away to quiet.

"I don't reckon you intend to see your folks again."

Link kept herself absolutely still. She could hear the creaking of Uli's rocking chair behind her, and the shk shk of Colin's knife over the fishing pole he was carving, and the roaring of her own blood against her ears.

She nodded one final time.

"You don't have to, you know."

Link braced her hands against his torso to pull herself away. For a moment, Rusl did not let go and rather clung her against him. Then his arms slackened.

She glanced up at him, into his eyes the same dark brown as the comfort of the earth. "I don't have to. But I want to. It's...it's for myself."

Rusl offered to go with her, suggested that he go with her, begged her to let him go with her. The slow pendulum of her head broke her heart a little further every movement, as though he were watching her spoon watery tomato sauce directly over a gourmet rack of goat meat without even an effort to make the most of the meal.

"...take care of yourself," he said at last, "and come back."

"I'll make you a meal," Link swore; he smiled. "And...and thank you for everything. If you hadn't been there, I..."

"But I was there. And that's what matters." He embraced her again. "Goddesses watch over you." He quirked an eyebrow. "Oh, and Link?"

She tilted her head.

"I hope you don't mind, but...Uli said that she likes the name Link for a girl." He rested his hand on her forehead and swept his palm over her hair. "It might be a little confusing to say Link and have two of my daughters come running at me."
Link looked up at him, eyes wide. He nodded; she cried.

When her boots stepped once more on the beaten path over Totaka's River, her tears were dry and her heart was full.

She walked. With her friends and her family behind her.

With even the girl with the golden hair behind her.

She walked.

The house.

The house at the outskirts of the village in the province of Ordona.

The house that remained just as she had left it, as though she had never stepped forth from the village of Ordon, as if the breath she passed over the threshold she would again find Aryll snoozing in the bed beside her, and she would again find the dusty coldness of the floor of the kitchen, and she would again see them with their lightning eyes and thunder hands.

But she lay her palm flat against her chest to feel the beating of her heart cupped in her hand; she pushed her nails into her skin until she winced from the pain.

The pain that told her she lived yet. She had neither died nor dreamed.

The people of that house held no sway over her.

She stepped up to that house. She rested her hand on the door. She let herself breathe, and let herself live, and let herself be.

And then she opened the door.

She did not know what she expected, but she found them seated silently at the kitchen table with a harvested pumpkin between them. She could smell the catfish stew rise up from the gourd. She could smell where they had erred in the stew's preparation, where they had not churned the butter fresh, where they had let the pumpkin soften for too long in the heat, where they had not soaked the catfish in milk for long enough.

The catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd.

She narrowed her eyes.

The catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd that she and the girl who smelled of horses had cooked. The catfish stew that she had made for them when she had had nothing else, no meat or rice, only a pumpkin and a bedraggled fish that Sera's cat had dragged out of the water and left at her feet as though the Goddesses Themselves had taken pity on her.

She had made the catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd for them. She had made the catfish stew that she and the girl who smelled of horses loved, and they had yelled at her, and they had sent her and her little sister to bed with empty bellies.

Aryll's tears had left her emptier than even the lack of food.

And now they sat at the kitchen table with the catfish stew while the girl who smelled of horses had run away and while she had spent her entire life fighting for her little sister's happiness. And now they sat at the kitchen table with the catfish stew talking about the harvest like nothing had gone amiss. And now they sat at the kitchen table with the catfish stew and nary a thought of their own daughters on their tongues.

For the first time in her life she sensed something rise within her, bubble up bitter as wormwood and sharp as the blade upon her back.

Anger.

She does not remember which of them looked at her first. She does not remember which one of them spoke to her first. She does not remember which of them called her a traitor, called her a treacherous boar, called her worse than the Calamitous One, for at least the Calamitous One wore its malice upon its face and did not pretend to be their child for nearly eighteen years. She does not remember which one of them demanded that she bring back Aryll. She does not remember which one of them hissed at her to never step foot in the house again. She does not remember which one of them called her a kidnapper, a thief, who had taken Aryll from them again and again, who had forced Aryll to grow up on an island off the coast with her grandmother, who had—only for herself, and never for Aryll's sake—stolen Aryll away entirely. She does remember which one of them spat out the question: whether Link would drag Aryll into the same delusions into which Link had forced herself.

Delusional.

Selfish.

A monster.

She would nearly have believed them if she had not seen Aryll's smile, if she had not seen Aryll's tears, if she had not spoken to Aryll like a human being.

If they had had a smidgen of care in their hearts, then she would never have been able to send Aryll away to her grandmother at all. If they had had a smidgen of care in their hearts, then she would never have become a courier at the age of ten. If they had had a smidgen of care in their hearts, then she would never have ducked past the guards around the stone demonstration at the castletown, and she would never have closed her fingers around that blue-violet hilt, and she would never have drawn the sword that seals the darkness from the stone.

She remembers rebuking them. She remembers—she remembers—the wind at her back. She remembers the words whispered by that wind, the words that cascaded to lightning on her fingertips.

"You will never be able to hurt her, ever again."

She remembers their words.

"Get out of here. We no longer have a son."

She remembers her words.

"No."

She remembers the wind at her back.

"You never had one."

She does not remember which one of them rose from the table while she stood her ground. She does not remember which one of them approached her while she stood her ground. She does not remember which one of them raised their hand while she—

She remembers that she flinched. She remembers that that flinch—despite everything—dropped the wind from behind her. She remembers that certain unreadable expression in their eyes, that even after everything, she would never be more than that scrawny girl in the dusty coldness of the floor of the kitchen.

She remembers the hand.

She remembers that hand around her throat.

She remembers how many times that hand had curled around her throat.

She remembers that she was no longer that scrawny girl. She did not know if she had yet become the Champion of Hylia, the Hero of Hyrule, Her Majesty's Knight, O Courageous Link.

Yet she knew, and she knows, that she was and is: Link.

She remembers her fingers closing around the hilt of the sword that seals the darkness, the blade of evil's bane. She could feel the curl of her hands against the wings upon that violet hilt, and she could sense the gentle hum of that soft blue blade as she drew it from its sheath.

She remembers that certain expression in their eyes, suddenly readable, somewhere on the cusp between fear and disbelief. She did not know if they recognised the swords that seals the darkness, the blade of evil's bane, but their irises reflected its blue, the brightest blue that she had seen since she drew it from the stone, like the blue of the clearest sky she had ever see, like the blue of the guardians' fire-light, like the blue of the eyes of the girl with the golden hair.

Returning to Ordon.

"I don't care what you do with the rest of your lives," she told them, her gestures calm as a saucer of milk, "and I don't even care that you hurt me. But if you hurt anyone else like you hurt Aryll..."

She does not remember which one of them asked her, voice muffled, as if spoken around a thickness in their throat. She does not remember which one of them called her the chosen one. She does not remember which one of them supplicated the Goddesses for what they had done to deserve the cruelty of such a fate. She does not remember which one of them first broke into tears. She does not remember which one of them cried thereafter.

She remembers sheathing the sword that seals the darkness, the blade of evil's bane.

She remembers standing quietly in that kitchen with the sheath and its strap over her shoulder, with the blade upon her back, with the sacred-blue Champion's tunic and its Hylia-white stitching over her body.

She remembers standing quietly in that kitchen while they sat at the table with the catfish stew in the pumpkin gourd.

Link remembers herself, in that moment, being very, very vast, and them very, very small.

She remembers leaving that house.

Now, nothing more than a house.
She remembers leaving and she remembers saying see you later. Not in the cover of night but in the daylight that warmed her skin and cleared her eyes. She bid see you later to all those villagers she had known. She said that one day she could return, but that that day could be anywhere. From tomorrow, to a hundred years hence, if ever the Calamitous One came.

But she promised to make them again a meal. To make them all again a meal as Ordon as she could picture: Ordon pumpkin, Ordon catfish, Ordon goat.

Ordon catfish stew on Ordon goat milk, in a Ordon pumpkin gourd.

She promised to make them again a meal, for then she would one day have to return, and then she had not really said good-bye, only a see you later.

She promised to make them again a meal.

And now Link has.

The rind of the pumpkin warms the palms of her hands. She has churned the butter fresh, and she has not let the pumpkin soften for too long in the heat, and she has soaked the catfish in milk for long enough.

Catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd.

Link cradles the pumpkin in her arms as the girl who smelled of horses once cradled her. She does not bring it to the heart of Ordon where the girl who smelled of horses's father's house stood, nor does she bring it to the outskirts where that house waited.

She brings it, instead, to the ruins of the Ordon ranch. Link can see the ruined stable, its roof caved in, its door missing, its stalls broken by one. She can see the ruined fence that once wound around the stable, now almost entirely rotted away except for the metal posts that Rusl had smithed. She can see where the goats and horses once grazed, the pasture now overrun in weeds dangerous to the horses: boar's milk and red maple, star fragment thistle and fiddleneck, blupeebrush and milkweed.

Link steps over the line of the fence that once circumscribed the ranch in the soft earth.

The tall grasses of the pasture tickle the underside of her arms. Summerwings and warm darners rise like vapour from the green.

She carries the catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd.

Link brings it to the girl who smelled of horses's favourite place in the entirety of the village. She brings it to the pasture where the goats and horses roamed, where the girl who smelled of horses has broken in yearlings and seen to the mares' foaling, where the girl who smelled of horses would lie in the grass beside Link and weave stories from the clouds.

She sets the pumpkin down on the grassy knoll where she and the girl who smelled of horses once lay together, fingers intertwined, the breeze lifting their hair. The girl who smelled of horses would close her eyes, and Link would, too, to let herself melt into the wilds that called her name.

The wilds that called their names, together.

Every once in a while Link would creep open one eye to glance at the girl who smelled of horses, and every once in a while she would catch the girl who smelled of horses creeping open one eye to glance at her. They would laugh, and they would pretend to pounce on one another, and they would roll together through the grass until one of their stomachs rumbled and they started planning for that day's breakfast, or dinner, or supper, or one of the infinite between-meal snacks that Link insisted were absolutely real, which she had read about in books.

"What books?" asked the girl who smelled of horses, her hands coming to rest on her hips.

Link showed her the books, where—in the barely legible scrawl of a certain girl who loved food too much—someone Link certainly did not know had scribbled out the names of locations or protagonists and had instead inserted second breakfast and sunner-dipper and midnight snack (very important).

She kneels in front of the pumpkin. Link inhales the vapours of the catfish stew. Ordon pumpkin;
Ordon catfish; Ordon goat. She knows little of the Golden Goddesses and still less of the supposed Golden Force that They had left for the mortals of Their world. But she knows that if she had to pick a single trifecta, she would pick: this.

She opens her hands. Marin, and Aryll, and the girl who smelled of horses, who might smell of horses yet. If she had run far, far away from here, before even the Great Calamity struck, then perhaps Link need only worry about the hundred years of passing.

The girl who smelled of horses had run away before Link had returned to Ordon. The girl who smelled of horses had gone south. The girl who smelled of horses had searched for wide grasslands, perhaps had longed for Lon Lon Ranch.

She lifts her head, and her eyes widen, and she knows.

The whistle.

The whistle the whistle the whistle.

How could she have forgotten? How could the words have slipped her mind? How could the very song that linked her to the girl who smelled of horses have ever left her, even for an instant?

Link wets her thumb and forefinger. She curls them in an approximation of a grasswhistle. She whistles as she whistled for Epona.

Ilia's whistle.

Only three people on this world knew or know of that whistle. Only herself, and Marin, and. And.
And the girl who smelled of horses.

Link did not meet Ilia in the wilds of Akkala, but in—

Within three beats of her heart she can hear the galloping of Ilia's hooves despite the distance down to the village fair. She turns and she whistles again and she watches Ilia leap over the rusted and bent metal posts still studding the ground. Opening wide her arms, Link catches her companion into an embrace.

A horse and her girl.

"Where did I meet you, girl? I found you near Kasuto, and you know her whistle, don't you, girl?" Ilia whinnies. "She must've gone there. And someone had to teach you that whistle." She pushes her warm nose into Link's cheek to nibble on Link's sidelock; Link laughs as she holds Ilia tight. "I'm gonna help Sarie get back home, and I'm gonna make sure Koko and Cottla are all right, and then I'm gonna get you back home, and maybe get myself back my own home too. And after all that, we'll go to Romani Ranch together. We'll go home together, girl. And everything will be all right."

Her companion neighes into her cheek. Then Link feels something warm and wet on her ear. In her ear. "That's not a carrot, girl," Link signs into Ilia's chest; she laughs a light little laugh, and she buries her face into Ilia's shoulder, and only then does she allow herself to cry, and her face is a mess of wetness and heat, and the tears track warmth over her cheeks, and Ilia is warm against her, and she wants nothing more than to go home.

And she will.

And when her boots trace the path to Romani Ranch and her hands rest upon that painted wooden door again, she will learn Faronese as well as she knows Akkalan, and she will tell the stories of Aryll and of Marin and of the girl who smelled of horses, and she will not let them lie forgotten under one hundred years of dust.

And one day, she will remember the girl who smelled of horses's name as she remembered her whistle. And one day she will walk the land once known as Hyrule and she will taste every meal ever cooked and she will try her hand at recipe ever thought up and she will bring them back again to share with strangers and travellers on the road and she will see the people of the land once known as Hyrule heal and renew and make something of the wilds that call their names.

The girl who smelled of horses has told her that she links the wilds and the people.

To the people of the land that she loves, she wishes nothing more than to link all that is delicious in the wilds.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: The song that Kass sings is, of course, a reference to The Wind Waker. But it's also a reference to the Link of Oracle of Seasons and Oracle of Ages, the traveller who left Hyrule for a time to travel the world.

The stream of scarlet the Link sees is Dinraal, the dragon.

I think that I first brought up catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd all the way back in the seventh chapter. It's about time I cashed in that Chekhov's recipe. I'm appalled that there's meat-stuffed pumpkin but no other stuffed pumpkin recipes. You did me a dirty, Nintendo.

You might not remember, but Link came up with the "this ball of steamed rice" lyrics in the fifty-fourth chapter.

The signing the word to herself is taken, of course, from the first chapter where Link signed the word home for the first time. Everything in Zelda comes in threes, so we'll be seeing that one more time by the end of Delicious in Wilds.

Some people say that catfish has a muddy taste, though I find that that really depends on where the fish is from. At any rate, one method of getting the "muddy taste" out of the water is to soak the fish in fresh milk for a while. Link is using the river as a makeshift ice-box to keep the milk cool so that neither it nor the fish spoils. By dietary law, fish doesn't count as meat, so this preparation does not interfere with the no-mixing-of-milk-and-meat restriction (although such dietary restrictions do not exist in Hyrule, as the religions to which such laws pertain have never graced that world).

Buttermilk is certainly an acquired taste for some.

Nearly two thousand words of this chapter are dedicated to Link cooking! I'm pretty proud of that. After all, it wouldn't be Delicious in Wilds otherwise.

The wooden box from Mabe that Link mentions is the one full of spring green elixir, also known as Magic HRT™.

Epona galloping Link to Ordon is a reference to horses in Breath of the Wild will follow the road by themselves, which is a fantastic little addition until you try doing that one jumping-the-fences mini-game (which is easiest if you take it backwards, by the way).

It's over family issues that Zelda finally starts to warm up and reach out to Link.

You'll note that Rusl refers to it as the blade of evil's bane, continuing with the pattern of "the sword that seals the darkness" being mainly the title mainly used by the royal families of Hyrule and of Lanayru, while most people outside of Central Hyrule/Lanayru, including other royal families, tend to use "the blade of evil's bane".

The comparisons that Link draws between the lynel she fought and her parents are very, very purposeful.

This chapter was pretty difficult to write, as you can expect. I'm prouder of Link than I could say.

I'd just like to say that you don't inherently owe your parents anything. There are many people with wonderful parents; if your parents are good, cherish them. If your parents are not, then you are not indebted to them. Escaping from an abusive situation doesn't make you ungrateful. Please take care of yourself.

Funny how often abusers turn out to be pathetic the second that they no longer hold power over their victims.

The blue and white tunic that Link remembers is indeed that tunic from Breath of the Wild.

With respect to the weeds dangerous to the horses, boar's milk is a spin-off from snake's milk (more commonly known as dogbane); since Hyrule does not have the biblical connotations of snake but does have the calamitous connotations of boar, I thought that this was a fair exchange. Star fragment thistle is a nod to yellow star-thistle; blupeebrush is based on rabbitbrush. Since I patterned the crops that grow in Akkala after those native to North America (as I patterned other places in Hyrule off of other real-world locations), I likewise patterned the weeds of Akkala after weeds native to North America.

I don't really have the right words to comment on this chapter, so I will let the chapter speak for itself. Home is where the heart is, and I mean that sincerely.

Up next: roasted mighty bananas. The title of the chapter should tell you what it's about.

Beta reader's comments: This is a really incredible chapter, in a lot of ways. It's got nostalgia and heartache and sadness and a really great moment of triumph, all in one. It's one of the best in the series, for sure.

I may have cheered out loud at the moment in which Link wrecks her parents.

Roasted Mighty Bananas

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef reflects upon the tragedy of Ordon's destruction at the time of the Great Calamity along the chef's travelling companions. The party is beset by an unexpected foe, and saved by an even more unexpected ally.

Chapter Notes

An update on the upcoming hiatus: chapters will continue as normal today, tomorrow, and Friday, leaving us on the sixty-first chapter. Then, no new chapter on Saturday. There might be a new chapter on Sunday, but we will resume for certain like clockwork on Monday evening. See you all then!

I posted this in response to a comment on the FFN cross-post version of the fic, but I'll put it here too: with respect to those with bad home situations, I (and I'm not saying that I'm a better writer or putting on any airs here) have found that parental abuse or neglect storylines in fiction tend to fall into one of two things I can't stand. Either (1) the storyline is about the children forgiving and reconciling with their parents—which certainly does happen to some people, as even happened to Mipha in Delicious in Wilds, but which does not apply to everyone who has been in a bad home situation—and anyone who disagrees with it is seen as 'ungrateful', or (2) the bad home situation is done for a 'tragic backstory' that is used as fuel for 'hurt/comfort' narratives which use the abuse as Something To Be Sad About For The Supportive Character To Assist With/other shipping narratives. There's a strange history of fiction (especially that written by women) fetishing trauma in general. As well, many a fictional story uses trauma or other 'tragic backstories' to excuse a character's actions. I wanted to avoid all of this and instead focus in on writing a realistic story regarding abusive/neglectful parents, allowing Link the support she needs and giving her a chance to grow as a person rather than fall into some 'hurt/comfort' nonsense.

Nor did I want for Link's communication issues to be excused by what she has experienced; of course her issues are explained by what she has experienced, and she deserves all of the patience in the world as she heals, but that does not excuse some of the things she has done (such as not adequately informing people out of fear of being hurt). Parental abuse is the kind of thing that one carries with one throughout one's life. It's terribly unfair, but one has to do the work of healing and reconstructing. And both are needed: to heal and to be supported, and to reconstruct and to be challenged to recovery. While recovery isn't an option for everyone, nor am I saying it has to be, it should be the goal of those who can realistically achieve it, for their own sakes.

It was also important to me to not fall into the trap of implying that all trans kids will necessarily have terrible parents; I was careful to include a range of experiences (Marin's mother being wonderfully supportive, Link's being not at all, Zelda's father being in the middle, etc.).
She returns from the grassy knoll with Ilia at her side. She returns from the knoll with the girl who smelled of horses's name for her upon her fingertips. She returns from the knoll as Link.

Kass, seated upon an overturned metal fence post wrapped in cloth, his accordion in hand, gazes up at her with half a question in his irises when she approaches. He nudges Sarie, snoozing in his lap; they twirl into the air to alight on Link's shoulder.

He says nothing. He merely inclines his head as he continues his melodies on the manuals of the accordion. A song she recognises.

Epona's song, that she played upon the grasswhistle in her hand, and Ilia's whistle, that she played upon the harp in her chest.

Link perches on the metal post next to Kass. He raises an eyebrow at her. The accordion never ceases.

She nods.

"Let's go to the shrine. The spiral one."

He does not respond immediately. The accordion sings through the remainder of the verse of Ilia's whistle; only at the closing notes does he allow the hum to resonate the remains of the village in a final eulogy before he rests his wings upon the manuals.

"Are you feeling better, traveller?" Kass inquires. "Perhaps that is not the best question I could have asked, and if so my apologies, but there are only so many questions I know how to ask."

Link senses the corners of her mouth curve up for a brief second.

"Thank...you for being worried about me," she says at length, her hands looping into familiar gestures. "I'm feeling better." Link remembers Sidon, remembers Riju, remembers Amali, remembers Yunobo. "Thank you for being patient with me. It means...it means the world to me. I know you're already feeling like you broke your promise..." Kass winces briefly, and she flinches back. "...but I promise you aren't! And and thank you! And and we can go to the spiral now, and then maybe we can travel around together some more so you can show me all the other shrines, since I've got to get Sarie home and they don't even know where home is, so I have to go make sure that Koko and Cottla are all right it's a promise that I've made too and then I'm going to walk all over trying to figure where Sarie's home and you can show me all the shrines and then I want to go back to say hi to my friends that I promised to make food for but it's kind of like the catfish stew I just made where I had to wait for the milk to set and ripen before I could make cream and I had to wait for the catfish to soak in to lose that muddy-y flavour that some people don't like but I think is just fine and I should thank the goats for it somehow but I only went back to make the stew when I could do all of this stuff so just like the promise I made to Coco and Kottla I mean Cottla and Koko is like the milk I was waiting to settle and ripen and all of that and then the stew is like getting to go around with you so if you just wait to let me ripen we can pumpkin together all over the place for shrines." At least with signing Link need not catch her breath while spilling out the entirety of her thought process in the span of a minute.

As she motions through her future plans, Romani and Riju's words alike settle against her. The Calamitous One. in the castle. The threat of the malice rising up again over the horizon. Yet Link has seen the four Divine Beasts calmed. She has seen with her own two eyes how the Divine Beasts' pilots—at least Sidon—have transformed them into benevolent forces: to help rather than to harm.

The cities will prosper. The villages will bloom once more. The monsters will be beaten back. The wilds will not lose their call but will gain it all the more for the people who make something of them.

The Calamity can wait. The people that Link knows, and their worries that she has seen with her eyes and felt with her hands, come before any speculation of what may yet lie in the shadows of an abandoned and ruined ghost of a distant past.

Link lets her arms fall to her sides. Then she lifts them up again. "And if you come with me then I can make you something new every day! Or anything you want! Porgy and cake every night! Even porgy cake!" She senses herself channelling Sidon for his enthusiasm, Riju for her care in explanations, Amali for her knowledge of what each person in her life prefers to eat, Yunobo for the pride in her abilities. "I've never made porgy cake before but—" Link pumps one fist into the air and slams her boot down on the metal post like she remembers Romani slamming her shoe down on the crate. "—I've never run away from a cooking challenge! I try out recipes all the time! Half the stuff I make is just throwing things together that I think might taste good and then kind of staring at the pot until I figure out if it's going to pop up something good or turn so sickly green I can't look at it head-on! So if you want me to make you a porgy cake I'll make it!"

She keeps the pose with her boot on the post, her arms locked into the final motion of her gesture: her left curved out as if emulating a cooking pot and her right caught in the chop-chop-chop motion of preparing a meal. She pants heavily.

Link blinks at Kass. He raises his wing up to smooth the crest of feathers that curls over the crown of his head. She leans in, eyes wide. Kass coughs in the crook of his wing. "I make no promises on how long or how far I will travel with you, traveller..." Kass smiles; Link cocks her head. "...but for now we happen to walk the same path."

"Shakalah! Floof comes with Sarie! Floof comes with Sarie! Floofy floofy floof comes with Sarie-sarie-sarie!" Sarie sings out, whirling around on Link's head. Though she cannot sing, her grin echoes the same sentiment.

Link rests her forehead a moment against Ilia's. When Ilia snorts air into her face, the warmth tickles her cheek. With a final hug of Ilia's neck, she steps back, allows herself a brief stretch, and sets to packing up her belongings.

She hears Kass's accordion wheeze out a low note. Link glances back over her shoulder to find him not quite looking her way.

"Traveller, if it wouldn't be too much to ask," Kass notes, hefting his accordion slightly up to hide the lower half of his beak and muffle his voice, "would you mind cooking us a supper before we go? I'm afraid I know little about preparing the local cuisine. While I have been getting by on my own gathered supplies, I...am forced to admit I prefer cooking to darners and almost raw fish any day."

Link blinks at him. He clears his throat behind the accordion, cheeks darkened in blush, the feathers around his face curling upwards until she can see in his feature the same hunger as in Cree and Kheel and Genli and Notts and Kotts's expressions when she told them she would make nutcake. She touches her chin. Her shoulders quiver. A whoosh of air expels swiftly from her nose. Though Link tries to snort back her mirth, the laughter bursts out of her like stew from an overstuffed pumpkin.

She doubles over with her hands on her knees. Sarie asks if Link has died, and Link's shoulders shake so violently that she cannot lift her arms to reassure the korok. Instead she begins to bob her head up and down. Sarie oofs as they slide off of Link's head and pomf to the soil. Her boot slips from the metal post. The grasses and the earth cradle her until the mirth has seeped to leave her warm, and content, and very much alive.

Link gestures for Kass and Sarie to follow her. "Bring your stuff. We'll eat and then go."

He stops smoothing his fuzzed-up feathers long enough to ask: "...hm?" She starts to walk; he falls into step beside her. Link whistles, and Ilia bumps her nose against the nape of Link's neck. She leads them towards the path to the ranch, over where the circle of the fence once stood, and up to that grassy knoll. The pumpkin remains untouched, the catfish stew still warm.

Link plops down into the grass. She pats the pumpkin gourd on its side. "I don't have spoons, so we'll have to eat it with our hands, or take turns drinking from it," she explains. Sarie dances down her shoulder to stick their little hand directly into the pumpkin rind.

"Ungh." They stamp their legs. Kass assists in pulling their arm from the gourd. "How does Sarie eat this?"

Laughing lightly to herself, Link lifts the lid on the pumpkin. Sarie oohs. They dunk themself inside. Hot stew splashes over Link's face; she licks up what her tongue can reach and gathers the rest in her palm to eat.

"It's fishy!" sings Sarie. "Fishy-wishy! Fishy and mushroomy and rivery and like lightningy! Not loamy-loam but not bad at all!"

Link licks the stew from her fingers. Ordon pumpkin, Ordon catfish, Ordon goat milk and butter. Without the cheese, the stew lacks a certain savoriness, though the ironshroom helps to bulk up its body.

Not quite the same catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd as she would have made a hundred years ago. But, even if the taste has changed, the warmth has not.

Just as she is not quite the same girl that she was a hundred years ago. The paths that she has walked and the friends that she has made, the meals that she has cooked and the strangers with which she has broken fast, have bettered her as a sword tempered sharper, as wine aged deeper, as stew simmered softer.

She made this, once, for the girl with the golden hair, when the girl with the golden hair had asked her about the province of Ordon. Link thought of the girl who smelled of horses, for whom she promised to make catfish stew, and some deep, deep shrivelled part of Link's heart almost brought words to her fingertips that she could never picture herself saying: "No. Not until I make for my best friend. It's our thing, and you're an outsider."

But Link knew, too, that the girl who smelled of horses would have wanted her to share the bounty of Ordon with anyone she came across, whatever she could make of it.

She could make of it catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd. So she did, once, for the girl with the golden hair, who had ignored her or spited her or spewed vitriol at her for months after her arrival. Link understood by then the duties of the girl with the golden hair: to pray, to supplicate the Golden Goddesses and the Goddess Hylia, to plead with fate and destiny, to somehow dredge up from within the sealing magic passed down by her blessed bloodline. The reincarnation of the Goddess Hylia, they said.

Link could believe that. Not for anything of the Goddess Hylia, of which she knew little except for something about wings and something else about pointy ears and possibly something about an eight-stringed harp, but for how the girl with the golden hair glowed when she spoke of her research, when she spoke of her discoveries, and when—increasingly over the months—she spoke of the people of the land she loved.

And Link understood, simultaneously, the desires of the girl with the golden hair: to live as she willed, to do her research, to perform her experiments. Even if Link did not comprehend the breadth of the knowledge that the girl with the golden hair possessed, whose interests ranged from nature to technology and back again, she could feel the same spark of passion glinting in her firelight blue eyes that Link felt when she herself talked about food.

When the girl with the golden hair and her father clashed like thunderheads, the lightning shattered windows and the thunder rumbled the castle walls. So Mipha would say, turning her hands over and over, fretting and wishing that the king and his daughter would somehow make up. Link thought they clashed more like two opposing ingredients, like sizzlefin trout and hydromelon at once, that could pair deliciously well if brought together in a careful way, yet which otherwise would lead to nothing but a burnt pot and a very upset stomach.

Both wanted nothing but the best for Hyrule, and yet neither could agree on how. Both sought the past. Link knew nothing of fate and still less of a Sacred Realm, yet she knew more than anything that the girl with the golden hair and the king both had fallen to a misery so deep not even an egg tart could cheer their hearts for longer than a single meal.

Link could see in their shared features the passage of their blessed bloodline, in the same thick brows, in the same broad nose, in the same light brown skin the colour of the very earth that the girl with the golden hair had vowed to protect.

Urbosa and the other Champions told Link what they knew, what they had seen in the years before Link's arrival to complete the seven travellers that took to the road to travel from spring to spring, from temple to temple, from shrine to shrine. "If only you or she was a korok," Urbosa would joke, "then we could really be the Seven."

Impa would remain in the shadows by the side of the girl with the golden hair. Always there to snap books from her hands, always there to take quill and ink, always there to remind them of the Calamitous One pooling just at the corners of their vision, slithering away when they turned to look.

"The Calamity will come whether we are prepared or not, Your Majesty," she would say, her gaze rocken, her expression impassive. "It is because I care for you that I must push you so. If the Calamity comes, then all of your research will come to naught should the Calamitous One swallow you whole. I fear your life, Your Majesty. The longer you pretend that your research has any bearing on the destiny of the Goddesses, the more likely you will perish alongside all of Hyrule. Do my words sting? Let them."

Yet Link saw, too, the warm affection of those scarlet eyes that Impa only showed when the girl with the golden hair had turned away. Impa was always there to know, first, and better than anyone, when the girl with the golden hair was in distress; always there to tenderly brush her hair and remind her of her worth; always there to do anything for the girl with the golden hair, to fulfill almost any request, to lay down her life if she needed to. Urbosa and the other Champions told her: Impa, the Princess's shade, had trained her entire life to serve the girl with the golden hair for as long as the girl with the golden hair lived. The king had instructed her to keep the girl with the golden hair to her studies, and Impa could not disobey the king if she wished to keep her post.

"More than anyone, she's the most at risk. The court can't lift a finger against you, Link, since you're the one chosen by the blade of evil's bane. Us Champions...they'd have to think long and hard about their relationships with Lananyru, Eldin, Tabantha, and Parapa for that. But Impa?" Urbosa shook her head; her golden earrings swung back and forth like pendulums marking the inevitable passage of time. "You're the one they can't do anything to, though. Make of it what you will, Link."

Link could make of it catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd. So she did, once, for the girl with the golden hair, who had asked her to prepare the most Ordon meal that Link could think of. The markets in the castletown did not sell muddy Ordon catfish, did not sell hard Ordon pumpkin, did not sell tart Ordon goat cheese not sweet enough for the residents of the Hyrule Castletown.

The girl with the golden hair pleaded.

"I want to know more about you, Link," she said, her face half-hidden behind a thick blue tome entitled Legends of the Light Spirits: Through the Looking Glass of Traditional Akkalan Faiths, Vol. 2. "I hadn't known about...your parents." Link lowered her eyelids. "Oh, I apologise! I didn't mean to—!" The girl with the golden hair exhaled. "Father's right. Even time I open my mouth I immediately stick my foot in. I don't know how to...talk to people at all. I'm sorry, Link."

"Putting a foot in your mouth can't be tasty," Link answered; the girl with the golden hair blushed. "I'll make you something instead."

"That Ordon stew. Catfish stew, you said? We can make do with an approximation, I'm sure, as one might raise a beast in captivity to understand the basics before truly observing it in the wilds." The girl with the golden hair fluttered her fingers out as she spoke. Pausing, she hummed her palm against her chin. "...or is it like the silent princess, unable to grow in captivity at all, that must be seen in the wilds or not at all?"

Link blinked. "I...don't know?" She rubbed the back of her head. "We can try. I can't promise you Ordon, but I can promise you catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd."

"Then someday I'll come with you to Ordon. So you can make me Ordon stew, Ordon-style, natural as the silent princess in the field. I-in the meantime, I really would like to learn more about you, Link." She rubbed her forearms. "A-and I'd like to help you. Crimp more tarts. Sometime. If you would accept my help, whatever you could make of it."

Link could make of it catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd. And so she did, once, for the girl with the golden hair, who closed her eyes and tipped back her head to indulge in the deliciousness of the stew.

Food, meant to be shared.

Licking the stew from her fingers. Link tilts up her chin to find Kass standing awkwardly a few paces away with his accordion case slung over his shoulder. She motions for him to sit beside her. He coughs. "Excuse me for my ignorance, but did you not make that stew for...something, traveller? For the...for the ones who have passed on...?"

She does not have to force the words from her fingers. They roll from her hands as easily as juice from heated fruit. "Food's meant to be shared. Meant to be eaten together." Link shrugs. "Meant to be eaten. If I just left this here, then...it's not like they're going to be able to eat it. But if I do eat it, then it's like I'm eating with them."

"I see. Then, I hope that you enjoy the meal."

His turn of phrase reminds her of Riju, as Riju reminded her of Aryll. Link holds her hand out to him.

"I want you to eat too. Food's meant to be shared. I know I'm just a traveller to you, but I've baked nutcakes with your daughters, and breaded salmon, and put my life in your wife's hands. And she promised to teach me how to make cannoli when I visit her next." She smiles sheepishly. "And even if you were a complete stranger to me I'd want you to share. I could sit here in the wild grass and eat it all by myself, but there's nothing better than seeing someone's smile warmed by a full stomach. C'mon."

Kass stands there. She reaches her hand further. Kass stands. She curls her fingers in like calling a friendly horse. Kass stands, and then he walks, and then he seats himself beside her. Leaning into his shoulder, Link closes her eyes.

They eat. Catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd. And only when they have finished and she has split the gourd open to feed Ilia the rind does Link tell Ordon good-bye.

Kass sparks a campfire. When Link mentions that she has run out of flint from her failure to stock-up in Ruto—the waters not exactly conducive to the starting of flames—he shares his with her. She starts to shake her head, that she can't possibly accept such a gift. Kass sets the accordion case gently down on her hands to trap them on her thighs.

"My compliments to the chef, traveller."

They sleep beside the campfire on opposite sides. Kass wishes her good night; she wishes him the same. Sarie has long since fallen asleep in the crook of Link's tunic. She slumbers on her side with Sarie curled up by her neck. Their tiny snores resonate her throat. The grass tickles her right cheek. Despite the heat of the campfire that should warm her face and stomach, she discovers that the tailors of Ruto could not replace the rito down that used to line her tunic. Perhaps the promise of returning home has warm-buoyed her through all these chilly Akkalan nights, or perhaps the departing summer has set a deeper chill into her bones than before. She shivers herself off to sleep.

Link awakens with the nearly-full moon gazing down upon her from overhead. She does not remember her dream, but she can feel its sensations linger: a warm bulk at her back, and a feathered blanket tucked around her. A feathered blanket that itches her nose. A feathered blanket that makes her sneeze and open her eyes.

The campfire has smouldered down to embers, yet she no longer senses the cold except on her bare cheeks. Nor can she make out Kass's forma cross the ashes' pale glow.

But the feathered blanket of her dreams has not vanished.

Link presses herself back; she feels the warm bulk curved around her, a heartbeat drumming on her back.

Kass. Curled around her to warm her with his feathers, his wings swaddling her body, his deepened breathing lulling her back to sleep.

But the campfire has gone out.

Link shifts herself carefully out of his embrace to avoid waking him. At least she can build the campfire back up as thanks. She lifts Sarie from their den in the collar of her tunic to tuck them against Kass's chest.

She would use the slate's bombs for Link's easy homemade firewood, but that would risk awakening her companions and spooking Ilia. Instead she collects fallen twigs and branches from the forest floor and snaps them off of nearby trees. She sets down her first load of wood by the campfire. Squatting in the grass, Link feeds twigs to the embers until the flames come alive again, then sets in a longer branch. She lifts herself back up and returns to the forest.

As she resumes her collection of firewood, Link jumps up to grab a branch slightly higher than she can reach. The branch tears off the three. It bonks her on the head. She lets go. The branch ejects from her hands and whirls through the pitch of the forest. Clicking her tongue, Link wanders deeper, seeking where the branch has fallen. Her boots crunch leaves. A far-off cricket chirps. The trees thin out. The silvery arm of the moon extends through the forest canopy to pool her hand upon the forest floor.

Link stops.

She rubs her eyes. She pinches herself. She rubs her eyes again.

There, in the heart of the pool of silver, like the moon were proffering a gift to Link, as if the Golden Goddesses had descended from Their world to leave the Golden Force upon the mortal realm, lies a single unblemished banana.

Perfectly curved, perfectly ripe, perfectly golden.

Link pinches herself again.

She steps towards that gold, the branch forgotten. A banana. So far from Faron or from eastern Parapa where they grow. She could fry it in butter; she could bake it into bread; she could prepare pudding or a tart or an entire fruit pie; she could stick it in a recipe where it has no business being and try something entirely new.

Courage, courage, courage.

She wipes her eyes. She wipes her mouth. She wipes her mind clear of firewood as her world focuses on the banana before her.

Link walks forward into the moonlight. She stoops down. She reaches for the banana.

Her hand closes around air.

The banana has moved about two paces from her. Narrowing her eyes, she creeps towards it more slowly, crouching down onto her hands and knees. Link slows further as she nears her prize. When she extends her arm, she slithers her hand as quietly as she can through the leaves. Just as her nail nearly brushes against the banana it leaps back another two paces.

Link retracts her hand. She glances away from the banana into the underbrush. Whistling innocently, she walks around the banana in spirals. Suddenly she stops, smirks, and pounces wholeheartedly onto the rogue fruit.

Her fingers curl around its ripened length, so smooth, so yellow, so banana-y. With a laugh to shatter the heavens, Link throws herself to her feet and shows to the world the fruit she has captured with her own two hands. Loftin git high above her head, she presents the golden banana to the Golden Goddesses.
She grins to herself.

And then a twin bolts of pain puncture her left shoulder below the blade.

Link's eyes widen.

She whirs around. The trees around her remain quiet. An owl hoots. She reaches her arm back to feel beneath her left shoulder.

A pair of arrows.

Wood.

Her gaze darts back and forth. Clutching the banana to her chest like a child she must protect, Link pulls the slate from its pouch at her right hip. She taps the yellow rune for stasis.

Wait.

Person.

While she swings the slate back, she hears a bowstring set. Link rolls to the side just as arrows zip past her. She draws her own bow from her back. Shoving the banana into her undershirt for safekeeping, she flitches an arrow from her quiver.

She keeps the arrow shaft between her middle and forefinger. Link begins to walk backwards towards the moonlit clearing. The light rains down on her once more. She lays the bow into the grass and lifts her hands, palms facing where she saw the person last.

"I'm hungry," she signs, and then pauses. "I don't want to fight you. If you were trying to hunt this banana, I'll give it back to you. I mean no harm. Just hunger. I'll make you a meal if you—"

The twang of a bowstring.

Link snags her bow from the grass, stringing it in her cartwheel. As she somersaults to the side, she tracks the passage of the arrows that thud into the tree behind her. The arrowheads embedded under her shoulder blade snap pain through her arm; she nearly buckles into the grass, yet she rises back to her feet. Her hands tremble: to hurt another person, and not a monster. But if she leads this person back to the camp with Kass and Sarie, she could put them in danger, and not all of them can gallop away on Ilia's back as Link escaped from that pale hooded figure she met on the side of the road in Faron.

She listens for the burble of Totaka's River. If she could somehow lose the person hunting her, she could flee safely with Sarie and Kass.

As she rolls back to dodge another arrow—one grazes her cheek just below her left eye, and the droplet of blood forms a tear beneath her lower lid—Link hurtles herself forward towards the run of the river. She weaves herself through the trees with the stasis-slate as a second sight to keep her from ramming into trunks. A bluster of pain through her left toes accompanies a slamming of her boot against rock not a pace from the river.

She tips forward.

And then a hard bar rams into her chest. Choking on her breath, Link flinches backwards into something warm. She swings back her arm to elbow-punch her would-be captor, but a vice closes around her left wrist. And then another around her right. Her hunter locks her into a hold with their left arm buried into her throat and their right hand around her wrists.

Link tries to throw her body back, struggling against the bonds, yet her captor wrenches back back her arms and drives the arrowheads deeper into her. By the time she recovers from the spasm of agony, her captor has sunk her knees into the muddy banks of the river, their foot braced against the small of her back.

Then she hears a voice—an all too familiar voice—hiss into her ear. "If you do not wish your friends injured, you will come quietly with me. We will not hurt you. We simply wish for you to not interfere with the workings of the Goddesses. You have been lied to and manipulated take up blade against the Purifier sent by the Goddesses to cleanse this world of sin. It is all right. Your time of fighting and pain has come to its close. Come quietly with me, and your friends will not be injured. Nod if you agree." In the water of the river, Link makes out her captor's features. The fabric of their clothing: a dull and dark blue. Tall. Taller than she, about the same height as Kass. A mask upon their face, also in dark navy, though she can just barely see the pattern etched in deep crimson across the surface of the mask.

The symbol of the Goddess Sheik. The symbol that she has seen over the gate to Kakariko. The symbol that she has seen on the shrines and on the towers. The symbol that she carries on her slate. The symbol that the girl with the golden hair drew in her studies of the ancient royal family.

A single eye, like the eye of the guardians, shedding a single tear.

But upside-down, with the teardrop extending towards the sky, or perhaps drooped onto the eye from above.

"I will repeat myself one more time."

Link breathes. She feels the iron bar of her captor's arm against the feel her throat straining against the iron bar of her captor's arm. Her captor tightens their grip on Link's hands. The sudden shift grinds the arrowhead against her shoulder blade; her vision darkens in the sudden agony that splinters through her left arm and down her spine.

"You have been used by those who wish to keep their control over a world that the Goddesses have forsaken. The Goddesses never granted their power to the one who called herself the Princess of Hyrule, for They in Their infinite power, wisdom, and courage have sent the Purifier to purge this world of our sins."

Link glances up and around. She listens: no one else in the forest. She watches: no shadows in the brush.

"All that you have done has only prolonged the suffering of this impure world. You do not need to fight for their lies any longer. One hundred years ago the Goddesses destroyed the kingdom of the damned, and now They prepare to cleanse this world once more. Lay down your selfishness. Understand that the world to come will be clean and pure, and that no one will have to suffer." A thin stream of blood from the wound under her left eye traces the curve of her cheek. "What you call malice is the physical manifestation of our sin." While her captor continues to speak, Link tenses and untenses her muscles and her sinews, to see where they connect to the nerves hit by the arrowheads, to see what she move.

"If you do not wish your friends injured worse than the mercy of death, you will come quietly with me. Nod if you agree."
Link breathes.

She starts to nod.

She senses the grip slacken, ever so slightly——and she brings her head back up as hard as she can, swinging her entire body, the pressure against the vice forcing the arrowheads further into her shoulder blade. The back of her head cracks against her captor's head with a sound so wet and visceral Link can feel the mask fragment against her skull.

Link rips her wrists free. She rolls forward into the river before spinning around with her arms blocking her face. Yet nothing attacks her. The river sprays her in cold water. Her vision clears: her captor has fallen to the ground and does not move, except for the steady motion of their chest.

She angles her chin up. By the stars she orients herself to determine where lies the village. Link turns back for an instant to see her captor collapsed unconscious in the grass. The shards of mask have fallen away from their face, and the hood has settled around their head to expose their face.

Her face.

Link finds herself gazing at a zora woman, her scales violet, her head reminding Link of a koi, a pair of opal earrings glinting in the darkness, a quiver half of topaz arrows and half of wood at her hip, a polished metal bow with a sight affixed to the front hanging loosely from her shoulder.

She lowers herself to squat beside the zora woman in the grass, halfway extending her hand. And then Link notices the smoke over the treetops from the direction of Ordon.

From the direction of Kass, and Sarie and Ilia.

She runs.

The banana in her chest bounces up and down as she pelts towards the village. Her boots catch in tree roots; she crumples into the leaves. The cut under her left eye stings. She picks herself up and begins again to run.

Link need not use the stars: birds soar past her; deer lope away; a badger passing underfoot knocks her over and a wild boar nearly tramples her if not for her rolling beneath the root of a tree.

She approaches the borders of the village.

Link smells smoke. She smells ash. She smells fire. She discovers the forests near the ranch aflame, the orange-gold of the Akkalan autumn leaves given way to the orange-gold of an inferno.

She draws her tunic up over her mouth, her breathing hot against her collar. The acrid smoke waters her eyes. Although she tries to skirt the worst of the fire, the flaming woods encircle the village like a crown of ruby. Squeezing shut her eyes, Link forces herself through the blaze.

The heat scrapes against her flesh. The ash cloaks her in darkness. The fires sear into her vision until she can see nothing but scarlet.

A burning branch sets her hood ablaze. Clearing the path, Link stumbles into the remains of Ordon, trips on something—a bit of fence or a rock—and rolls forward into the dust until the fires have gone out.
When she set out to light the campfire again, she did not mean for the Goddess Din to help.

The flames of her clothing die down. She can smell: roasted fruit. Sickly sweet. The banana, somehow, has not yet smushed against the inside of her tunic but remains bouncing around, unable to drop lower from the cord of her belt. As the fruit settles down against her stomach, Link shifts her focus to stare at the remains of the village.

At the dozens upon dozens of people. Clad in dark blue. With scarlet marks of the Goddess Sheik drawn upside-down upon their navy masks.

Yiga.

And she, with one sword, one bow, and her meagre quiver of arrows from Sidon. And she, with the slate at her right hip. And she, with a roasted banana stuck down her tunic.

Link has, after all, finished calming the Divine Beasts. In that moment of calming the last, whatever protective hands have guided her along her journey lifted from her shoulders to pass away, no longer needed, no longer with purpose.

She can see the winding path up to the ranch. She can see her boot prints where she descended into the forest to gather firewood. She can see the tracks left by Ilia's hooves up and down; she cannot tell if her companion has been through here again.

The Yiga approach her in a wave of dark, dark blue, like the deepest, bluest ocean she has ever seen, and Link lets herself sink into the ground. Whatever they do now to her, she can only let them.

She prays. She prays to the Golden Goddesses, to the Seven, to the Light Spirit Ordona, to whoever may listen to her, that no matter what happens to her, "let Koko and Cottla be safe from them. Please."

The Goddesses answer her.

The heavens open. The fiery rocks rain down from the skies. The Yiga scatter around them as the earth trembles with the meteors' impacts all around her.

But not on her.

"B-bullseye!" Link hears, boomed so loud that the voice echoes through the ruins of the village to resonate her ears. When she turns her head to the left—to the path up to the ranch—to locate the source of the miracle, a blazing blue light shines from above.

The beam of fire-light carves into the ground. It circumscribes Link in a halo of protection as Yiga leap away to avoid certain death. Swaying as though in a dream, Link observes the formation of the charred earth left in the fire-light's wake, a blackened line about a metre-deep into the soil, until she kneels on a dirt platform to watch the Yiga spread out into the burning trees.

Monsters will continue to attack no matter the threat of death. Monsters will crawl on their ruined bodies to snap at her with their ruined jaws until the very second that their breaths leave their bodies.

But the Yiga are not monsters.

The Yiga run.
And suddenly gorons surround her. Suddenly waves upon waves of gorons, hylians, sheikah, a few zora and rito here and there, spread over the perimeter. She listens to their orders barked out in Eldic, to make for the woods to ensure that not one Yiga escapes. The ground rumbles rhythmically. Something crashes into the earth a few paces to her right; she can sense the soil compress beneath its massive weight.

Link cranes her neck up to see the multi-faceted face of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania staring down at her from above. Over the rim of its mouth lean four faces: Ilia, whinnying, her ears flicking back and forth; Kass, waving a wing towards her; Sarie, perched on Kass's head; and a goron with a swirl of hair-like stone upon his head and a blue shawl around his shoulders, fluttering like a cape in the wind.

She blinks slowly. The arrows wedged beneath her left shoulder blade twinge. The roast banana in her tunic wobbles against her stomach.

"Link!" Yunobo calls out to her, a broad grin crinkling his eyes. "Need a lift, right?"

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: I started writing this chapter at 09:19 on the first of August, and finished writing it on at 19:20 on the second of August.

Thanks a million for sticking with me all of this time, for reading through Link's experiences, and for coming along on such a journey that's probably more emotional and personal than you may have expected. And thanks a million to my beta reader, Emma, for helping me make the journey as fun as possible for all of you.

Link's thought processes (when she just 'rants out' a lot at once) are purposefully confusing and vague. She's not used to expressing herself. It'll take her a while yet to figure out a balance between being more curt and being more expressive. Besides, she's stressed out in having to convince Kass to travel with him. Her intention is to get Kass to Amali and the kids, which she can do best if she just comes with him to do all of the shrines.

I've noted this before, but while paler humans redden in blush, rito people's cheeks tend to darken when they blush. Kass, of course, is blushing because he's embarrassed about admitting that Link's been right all along when it comes to food.

As before, I gave Zelda an appearance more similar to her father's model in-game, because her genetics don't make any sense. She simply doesn't look like King Rhoam's daughter in-game. It bothered me in The Wind Waker, but there at least the king was an ancient ancestor of hers. Here he's literally her father. No excuse!

Indeed, they travelled in seven: Zelda, Link, Impa, Urbosa, Mipha, Revali, and Daruk.
The line "Do my words sting? Let them" is from Skyward Sword. Here's some information on why Impa acted like she did.

Legends of the Light Spirits: Through the Looking Glass of Traditional Akkalan Faiths, Vol. 2 is a blue volume because it's the second volume; the first volume is green, and the third is red.

As I mentioned before, rito people have faster metabolisms and warmer body temperatures than the other races of Hyrule. They make for excellent space heaters.

I must say that Link is probably the only protagonist I've ever written that could go from tearful seen of Ordon village destroyed, to running into the woods after a banana.

Link was using the stasis rune to highlight trees in yellow to keep herself from smacking into them.

The Yiga wear dark blue rather than red to better blend in with the night, since the Yiga are supposed to resemble ninja in their style of fight and dress as far as I'm aware. It doesn't make sense for them to wear red and black. If they want to actually sneak around at night, then dark blue provides much better concealment.

Zelda actually mentioned this in a previous chapter, but years upon years ago, the "single eye with a tier" sheikah symbol belonged to the original royal family. Ten thousand years later, the symbol was taken up by the sheikah that served the hylian royal family most faithfully, and eventually became a symbol of the Goddess Sheik. That's why it's all over the Divine Beasts, slate, etc. The Yiga use it in its original context.

Well now. What a twist! I'll note talk about all of the hints and evidence that I've added into the story. I'll note that you might recognise the bow from the eleventh chapter.

Link covering up her mouth is her efforts to use her tunic as a makeshift air filter. It's nothing than nothing. And yes, the banana roasted in the fire that Link passed through! Try roasting 'em up in Eldin in-game.

And hey, it's Yunobo! I told you that the champions would come back, and that people have been moving during the months and months that Link's been wandering around. It's been over a year since Yunobo and Link cleansed Vah Rudania. It's been a while, Yunobo. Missed ya, buddy.

Now, why was the Yiga using wooden arrow instead of topaz arrows? Because she didn't want to hurt Link.

I'll note that the events of this chapter are not a coincidence. Yunobo has been tracking the Yiga for some time; the Yiga were tracking, in turn, Link and Kass. Yunobo arrives when he does because the Yiga set the forest on fire.

Next time: relaxation; catching-up; and the minuet of forest.

Beta reader's comments: I KNEW IT WAS THE YIGA! I KNEW IT! I CALLED IT FOR SO LONG AND DAMMIT I WAS RIGHT!
I'm really excited about that to this day.

We get to see Yunobo again! This is the real start of the last big meta-arc of the series, where a lot of disparate threads all come together.

Chapter Summary

Meeting the Eldic youth again and coming to terms with the possibility that a certain jewel merchant has been one of the Yiga the entire time the chef has known her, the travelling chef agrees to travel towards Medli. The chef recalls a song that the girl with the golden hair taught the chef long, long ago; the same song triggers a memory of younger days from the forgetful korok.

Chapter Notes

As per the usual, notes that didn't fit into the ending, etc. etc.: I started writing this chapter at 09:33 on the second of August, and finished writing it on at 00:49 on the third of August. You'll note overlap between me writing this and the fifty-ninth chapters.

thanks a million for reading! It means a lot to me to share this adventure with you. And thanks a million to my beta reader, Emma, for all that she's done in assisting me with this chapter and beyond, and for pointing a finger at the Yiga at every opportunity. By the way, the word "Yiga" means guardian in Old Hyrulean.

Yunobo's stuttering less now! He's come a long way in Link's absence.

"O Powerful Yuno-yunobo" is what Link was listening for, since Yunobo is now officially recognised as the Champion of Goro-goro.

The Eldic forces using drums to communicate is a nod to the Drums of Sleep from Majora's Mask. Two kinds of drums are used for communication in Eldin: those seen in this chapter, meant primarily for marching orders and other commands, which are played in sets of one (i.e. each drummer wearing a single drum); and those meant for peaceful communication and community gatherings, either used alone or as the centrefold of a percussive ensemble, played in sets of five.

The weapons mentioned in this chapter are the weapons that the Yiga use in game, such as the windcleaver.

As for why Marin made Link promise about the bananas, it's because the body is less able to handle high levels of potassium while on spiro (i.e. HRT). Bananas aren't the only food that's high in potassium, but they're the one that Link has remembered most.

Rito people, like geese, do not have teeth proper. Instead they have teeth-like projections along the sides of their tongues, as well as gizzards used for breaking down tougher foods.

The songs referenced in this chapter are those from Skyward Sword.

In Breath of the Wild, rock salt is found all over Hyrule. I'll mention that, as I have before, that I personally don't care for the concept of a single Zelda timeline. However, for the purposes of Delicious in Wilds, I have chosen to set this Hyrule to be after the events of The Wind Waker. However, in The Wind Waker, Hyrule was sunk underwater, which means that this is actually...

Poor Kass is terrible at asking for amenities.

The line about Yunobo asking to be pinched is also what he asked Link to do back in the sixteenth chapter.

Manbo's Mambo and the Frog's Song of Soul are songs from Link's Awakening. Here, they're songs associated with folk legends.

The coats of a wolfos differ based on their environment. Those in Tabantha have white coats in the autumn/winter for the snow, while those in Akkala have brown throughout most of the year.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

When Link's boots alight on the head of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania and Kass's talons let go of her shoulders, she first glances at her companions—no injuries, no scrapes, no arrowheads embedded in them that she can note—and then pelts headfirst towards Yunobo, who stretches his arms wide to receive her.

He hugs her so tightly that she feels the banana—roasted by the flames of the burning wood—snoosh against her undershirt, but in that moment she does not consider for a moment the waste of food above the joy of once more seeing her friend.

Yunobo spins her around and sets her back down. He turns back towards the ruins of the village of Ordon.

"I h-have to say, the last thing I expected from following that f-forest fire for the Yiga we've been tracking f-for a few days now was to find y-you." He taps his index fingers together. "B-but I guess that I should've expected that, w-what with you being a big hero and all, huh?"

Link rubs the back of her head.

He pilots the Divine Beast Vah Rudania onwards.

A goron general below booms orders towards Yunobo: to move into the forest and cover the platoon rooting Yiga out from amongst the trees. A rank of drummers bangs the message towards the army at large. As the Divine Beast quakes the ground with each step of its heavy feet, Link listens for the Eldic of what the general says: "O Powerful Yuno-yunobo!"

She grins so widely that she nearly forgets about the banana. Link slips off the tunic to scrape the smooshed banana from the inside. The smoky scent has tempered the banana's sweetness with a flavoursful, not-quite-nutty touch, the innards caramelised to a texture that she would call interesting if not entirely palatable. Link offers the inside of her tunic to anyone else who wants to try some. The other gorons—and one sheikah woman—keeping guard over Yunobo cough and edge away from her, though Sarie eagerly throws their little hand in to suck up the goo.

Over the roaring of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania swallowing earth to catapult its projectiles or firing its fire-light—and one of the gorons, a healer, attempting to remove the arrowheads from under Link's shoulder blade—Kass fills in Link on what has occurred since she went off to hunt the banana that she is currently licking up from her tunic: he awoke to the smell of burning wood. Noticing that Link had vanished into the dark but left Sarie and Ilia behind, he assumed at first that she had gone off to relieve herself and that the burning scent came from the campfire. However, when she did not return for some time, he flew up to search for her only to see the circle of burning forest cutting off their escape.

Arrows in his left wing brought him down from the sky.

Link looks up, a blob of roasted banana goo on her tongue, to ogle at Kass, who shows her the site of the injury. "I'm fine, now. Barguron here's an expert in arrow wounds, specifically." She nods; at that exact moment the healer—Barguron—rips both arrowheads from Link's back at the same time and she arches far enough to startle Sarie from her head. She apologises; Sarie pats her nose in acceptance. "By the time I landed safely on the ground, the Yiga had surrounded the campsite. I was terrified, for your sake, and for Sarie's." Link opens her palms to inquire about Ilia yet he goes on. "The Yiga promised not to hurt us so long as I told them where you had went."

Link blinks.

Kass clears his throat again. "I told them, truthfully, that I hadn't the foggiest. Even if I had known, I could never...give up a friend."

She tears up. Link throws her arms around him, the squished banana-covered tunic between them. Yunobo begins to bawl at the touching display.

When she peels herself off of him, Link leaves his clothing and part of his feathers smeared in banana. Flinching, she starts to apologise, but Kass merely laughs. "I should've expected it sooner or later. You've a way with getting people to eat your food without meaning to, traveller." He wipes the banana from his feathers and licks it from his wingtip. He raises his eyebrows. "Not bad."

Link ducks her head. Kass resumes his story: the Yiga interrogated them on her location, then fanned out to search in the woods.

The Yiga discussed something—he gathered from their conversations and snapped insults to one another—about an informant. An informant who had told the Yiga what Link and Ilia look like; that Link has been seen at least once before with Kass; and that Link would visit Ordon at some point, though the Yiga expected Link far earlier than her actual arrival.

The Yiga acted less like the organised band of assassins and nightwalkers that Kass had imagined them, and more like a desperate and dying pack of wild wolves.

While he waited with Ilia and Sarie, praying that Link had gotten away, the ground began to shake. Wary of an earthquake, Kass gathered Sarie and Ilia in his arms. Then he heard the sound of an ocarina and observed the Yiga panicking. Within a few seconds, the Eldic forces burst through the brush afield of the ranch.

They ran the Yiga off, taking what prisoners they could. When they secured Kass, Sarie, and Ilia—and confirmed them as friends and allies of Link—the Divine Beast Vah Rudania lowered its head to let them aboard. Yunobo greeted them: qny friend of Link's is a friend of his, he told them. Link rubs the back of her neck and blushes. Kass arches his eyebrows towards her while she continues to lick up the banana on the tunic, now scraping out the remains with her nails.

Marin warned her not to eat too many bananas. But a single banana can't hurt too much.
With Ilia, Sarie, and Kass safe, the forces and the Divine Beast began the descent into the village proper.

"Where they saved me," Link says, finally slipping the cleaned tunic back on and accidentally trapping Sarie in its folds.

Kass nods. "Where they saved you. Ah, traveller, on your nose, you've a little..."

He reaches out his wing, his expression strangely tender, to wipe a dab of banana goo from her nose. She sneezes. Sarie shoots out from Link's tunic with such force that their head smacks Link's chin and knocks her backwards onto her rear. She blinks, snorts, and then bursts out laughing, hugging Sarie to her chest.

"Now then, traveller, would you mind sharing your half of the story?"

The laughter stops. Link rubs the back of her head for so long that she fears she might rub her hair out of existence. She scratches her cheek. She kneads her forehead. Raising her hands at last, Link explains that she went to gather firewood yet happened upon a banana sitting in the middle of the path like a gift from the Golden Goddesses, that she followed the mysteriously moving banana and walked directly into a Yiga's trap. Only the chance luck of one Yiga waiting in ambush—rather than the dozens that attacked Kass, Ilia, and Sarie—let her escape back to the village.

Her cheeks flush redder than a razorshroom. Link buries her face in her hands.

Kass shakes his head. Sarie bobs their entire body. "Sarie knows better than to eat random bananas lying around! Sarie only eats random dirt lying around!"

Yunobo throws her a thumbs-up over his shoulder. "Th-that's our Link!"

Sarie asks her to tell how she got away from the Yiga. Link begins with a thought to Romani, who might've left twenty less Yiga in this world over the course of the story. Like a true disciple of the deities, Romani has the uncanny and magical ability to create something from nothingness, to split a grain of wheat into twenty and a single enemy into one hundred, much like Muzu's ability to split twenty topaz arrows into two hundred. At least when she returns to the ranch, Link'll have a tale or two to tell.

At the thought of Romani's inevitable reactions to Link walking into a trap—and all this for one banana that ended up roasted and smooshed—she begins to laugh to herself so much that her arms shake without letting her speak. Kass pats her shoulder until she calms down enough to continue her story.

The sound of marching drums widens her eyes.

When the Eldic forces report back with the sun's rise, they bring with them captured Yiga. Link begs to see them; Yunobo vouches for her, and the general acquiesces. She frantically searches the Yiga's faces. One or two she thinks she recognises: travellers she has seen along the road, strangers with whom she has shared a meal over her cooking pot, merchants that bid her examine their wares before agreeing to partake in whatever experiment she cooked up that day.

But no Glepp.

Link raises her chin past the line of Yiga captives. She stares out at the ashes of the Ordona forest, burnt from red and gold to grey and black: silt to silt, dust to dust.

Glepp, who must have escaped, or perhaps never existed in the first place. Not here. Other zora women in purple, other zora women with the heads of koi, other zora women with opal earrings must live somewhere out there in the wilds. Someone else whom Link told of her plans to go to Ordon. Someone else who has seen Ilia. Someone else to whom Link spoke of Kass and his accordion.

Some other zora woman.

The forces do, however, bring back bananas taken from the Yiga, alongside weapons: bows that shoot two arrows at once, cruel hooked sickles, serrated wheels with rusted blades meant for biting into the limbs of foes, long spiralled swords that harness the wind with their blows, and the wooden ocarina one of the Yiga evidently used to signal the others. Link asks for the ocarina, and also for a banana. Just one. She promised Marin that she would not have too many, but since witnessing the banana floating in the moonlight before her very eyes, she has had a terrible craving for the curved firm fruit.

She claps her palm over her face. Marin warned her against bananas. If only Link listened, then she never would have fallen for the trap at all.

Stroking her chin in contemplation, Link takes the Yiga banana, hesitating, and asks instead for two.

She reaches for the equipment on her back; when her hands touch tunic, she realises her belongings rest yet in the ruins of the ranch. Then Kass informs her that he brought with him everything she left at the campsite, including her cooking pot and her satchel.

Her cooking pot.

Link rubs her palms together. She touches her chin. She devises her recipes as the Eldic general might his strategies.

All’s well that ends well with a good meal. Soon Link has plopped down her cooking pot on the back of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania, merrily cooking away. Yunobo sits down to watch her. Kass gazes at her with such an expectant that her cheeks flush, and Sarie dances for joy at the prospect of "a meal! A meal! Sarie gonna get some food. And it's gonna be better than that loam! 'Cause nothing can be worse than that loam! Gonna get some food. Gonna get some food food food!"

She melts butter in her cooking pot. With the long straight sword that Riju gave her, Link crushes acorns and chickaloo tree nuts brought with her from Ruto into the smallest crumbs she can manage. The meat of palm fruit she has carried from the beaches of Lanayru and Faron. Mighty thistles, too, gathered from the forests outside of Ordon, which have not flowered fully. Link pricks her palms full of spines, though they do not sting as badly as the cactus needles. And only her palms this time.

For a girl of one hundred and nineteen years, she can sure teach herself new tricks.

Link scrapes the nuts into the butter first to roast and salt them, then adds the minced inner stalks of thistle for a certain bitter kick keeping the banana from becoming too sweet. She lets the butter cool off just enough to be spreadable but not warm to the touch. Then she—with the shafts of the arrows previously jammed into her shoulder serving as skewers—dips two bananas into the butter. One for herself and Sarie, and one for Kass.

Kass takes his banana. Link leans in. He nibbles off the tip of the banana, and she notices for the first time the ridge of teeth along his tongue. The wonders of the people of the land once known as Hyrule never cease to amaze her.

His broad smile liven her spirit.

"It's delicious, traveller. I never thought that banana, palm fruit, and thistle would go together, but you have once more proven yourself the cleverer."

She rubs the back of her head at the praise. One of the hylians among the Eldic forces—a pale man with bright green eyes—taps her on the shoulder to inquire if she could cook them some bananas as well. A dark-skinned sheikah woman with two long ponytails down her back agrees. Abruptly the non-goron forces swarm her.

As in Ruto, the crowd leaves her woozy. But Link forces herself on: the cooking pot awaits.

When her stores of butter, of nuts, of palm fruit, and of thistle run out, the guards who saved her provide her with more and with other ingredients that she has never seen. Cacao from Faron, cultured cream with a sour taste—though Link does not understand how cream can comprehend culture; if so, that cream would be more intelligent than she—small dried grapes, all manners of nuts and berries, honey of varying tastes. At length she dips bananas for the last of the stragglers. Link signs apologetically at Yunobo.

"I'll grill you some rock roast later, I promise," she tells him, "and learn how to make all of your favourites for when we meet again." He clasps her hand.

"Th-then I'll just have to make sure that we meet again!"

Then, and only then, does Link allow herself to her own dipped banana to munch down the aftertaste of spring green elixir.

The crunchiness of the nuts, the savoriness of the butter, the tang of the palm, and the kick of the tender thistle combine with the natural sweetness and firmness of the banana to a delightful symphony. A symphony. She fingers the wooden ocarina.

The ocarina.

In the chambers of the girl with the golden hair there rested a golden eight-stringed harp over the fireplace. Impa would urge her to practise. "You loved that harp so as a child. What happened, Your Majesty?"

"That was before," the girl with the golden hair responded, a storm brewing upon her brow, "the strings of that harp revealed themselves the bars of a cage." The girl with the golden hair folded her arms over her chest. Her lips curled upwards into a smirk. "Do my words sting? Let them."

Impa's expression remained immutable as ever. The girl with the golden hair's smug smile faded into a thin line, and then a scowl. "Practise, Your Majesty. Play the songs of the Goddesses. Perhaps, as they did for the reincarnations of the Goddess who have walked this world before you, they will bring to you memories untold. Now, practise, Your Majesty. If the prayers do not rouse your slumbering soul, then music—that heirloom of our people—may yet."

The girl with the golden hair seated herself before the hearth with the harp in her lap. She strummed once, then stopped and peeked over her shoulder at Impa, who merely inclined her head. With a huff of her breath and a puff of her cheeks, the girl with the golden hair brought forth from the harp the sounds of a yowling cat strangled and eaten alive by a wolfos. Impa did not allow her features to so much as shift a millimetre. The yowling continued for some time. The girl with the golden hair peered at Impa again and again, but the expression of the Princess's shade remained Link, on the other hand, fit her palms over her ears. She pressed her left ear against the hilt of the sword that seals the darkness to drown out the twangs of the harp with the blade of evil's bane resonant hum. The vibration sounded almost like the distant laugh of a girl. Perhaps the Golden Goddesses now laughed at her. She had always heard from the villagers that They had a very particular sense of humour.

Mipha came by briefly to listen, sat down for about five minutes, and then happened to remember a duty she had to attend to, on the far, far, far side of the castle.

The first day the girl with the golden hair played nothing but a cacophony that dizzied Link's head with its awful row. The second she made a terrible din, and the third, and the fourth, and the fifth, and the sixth. By the seventh, she had tired.

On the morning of the eighth, she sighed, pouted, and—turning her head away—held out her hand for the sheet music. To her eternal credit, Impa did not press the issue, nor smile, nor say I told you so, but instead simply opened the musical score and placed it upon the stand.

The girl with the golden hair practised her scales and her arpeggios, up and down the octaves. Link asked if perhaps she could join in, juggling in her hand the blue ocarina Marin had given her.

Impa peered at her for such a long moment that Link had to lift her hand to her face to check if she hadn't sprouted a second head.

The girl with the golden hair clasped her hands together. The girl with the golden hair begged. The girl with the golden hair swore up and down that she would most dutifully attend to the playing of the harp.

Impa exhaled. Link and the girl with the golden hair both leaned in observe Impa's face.

"All right. We can try it. But if you distract Her Majesty, even for a second, you will sleep at the door, and the sword that seals the darkness will rest by Her Majesty's pillow."

Link swallowed.

She had never learned how to read sheet music, and so the girl with the golden hair taught Link the melodies herself. The Goddess Farore's Courage; the Goddess Nayru's Wisdom; the Goddess Din's Power; the Ballad of the Goddess Hylia; the Song of the Hero. The ancient songs passed down in the royal family since they had first come to take control over the land of Hyrule, in the days when the people of the land still spoke Ancient Loftean. The lyrics to the songs came to Link in a confusing haze of meaningless noises. Not even the girl with the golden hair knew the translation of the words.

Only a jumble of syllables from an ancient past, a phonetic transcription of the sounds in Central Hyrulean that someone—for all they knew—could have made up on the spot, and the sheet music of melodies perhaps warped by the generations upon generations who had handed them down to the next.

One day, when Link arose from her slumber, she found a second harp on the mantle over the hearth. Stringed in six. The ages that Urbosa had given her in Parapa.

Urbosa, who must have returned her latest trip to Rovah.

The girl with the golden hair smiled at her. Link could see the ruffle of her hair, frizzed and fluffed "Would you like to play alongside me, Link?" The girl with the golden hair's eyebrows knit together and curved downwards, her fire-light eyes glimmering with the question in her irises. "You don't have to. But I thought, since you've shared with me so much of your life in Ordon..."

Link tilted her head. She had shared precious little. Other than a select few recipes, and other than the location of the province of Ordona, and other than hints at what her parents had done, she had shared almost nothing. "...so let me share something of mine. Urbosa told me that: a story for a story, a tale for a tale. Well, I don't have any horsetails for you to cook—see, it's, it's a little food joke; I know you like those, those food jokes; I, I hope you like it; I came up with it myself that, that horsetail-tale joke; well, Urbosa helped me but—" She cleared her throat. Link tilted her head. "—but I'd like to share with you some songs! If you'd care to listen. I know it's not as food as good—I mean, it's not as goog as foof—I mean, oh, I'm doing that thing again."

"...I'd love to," Link signed, and the girl with the golden hair covered her mouth with her hands.

"You will!? I m-mean, goog!" She stopped and gathered herself. "Good." The girl with the golden hair inhaled. "Come on."

She took the eight-stringed harp from the wall. Link took the ages. They sat across from one another on the bed, legs crossed. Link looked expectantly at her, hands set to strum. The girl with the golden hair's cheeks reddened.

Then she lowered her eyelids until her lashes settled on the curve of her cheeks.

"...before Mother passed away, she...would sing songs to me, lullabies that her mother had sung to her. Seven songs. They say the songs were once odes to the Seven Goddesses, a long, long time ago, when each Goddess had but a single Sage."

When she angled her chin up, her irises caught the glimmer of the morning light.

"Oh, oh, you know! I don't know if they have these legends in Ordona, but there's talk of tree spirits called the koroks. Long, long ago, they were children of the forest: the kokiri, children of the Goddess Kokir. But—we've lost the legends of why and wherefore, although I am very determined to one day find them, to finally put to rest an age-old scholarly argument that I think I have an inkling about considering the abundance of rock salt found all over Hyrule—the Goddess had to change the form of Her children, and so they became the koroks, spirits of the trees. The legends say that many, many years ago, the koroks once guarded the sword that seals the darkness. Of course, that hasn't been true for a very long time."

The girl with the golden hair set the harp down to pluck her journal from her table. She flipped through it until she came to a green bookmark. Link propped her chin up on her elbow. She rested the six-stringed harp on the bed.

"When we brought the sword from the Temple of Time, we had to excavate it with part of the temple still attached! The sacred sword sat out there in the rock we'd pulled it from, since the sword wouldn't let anyone remove it from the stone it out until you came, Link."

The girl with the golden hair beamed at her. Link nodded, though her thoughts had drifted to what food she might cook for the girl with the golden hair to enliven her spirit. The girl in question went on:

"Some say that the koroks don't exist anymore, or maybe that they never existed at all. We still honour the Goddess Kokir in the Seven, of course. But...Mother used to tell me stories about them.
Child-like and innocent, immortal and renewing, since the very dawn of the seven children of Hyrule."

The girl with the golden hair pressed her journal to her chest. She rocked back and forth upon the bed. Her harp nearly fell off to the floor, but Link caught it and replaced the instrument on the mattress. "Just...imagine the questions we could ask them! Such wise and long-lived beings, who have witnessed all the history of Hyrule, maybe even further than the past ten thousand years! Imagine how much of our history we could recover! Imagine what we could learn! Endless information and knowledge! Even the technologies that have been lost to us, like how the towers were built, or how the Divine Beasts work!" The girl with the golden hair hummed contentedly. She ran a hand over the journal upon her thighs like smoothing the pleats of a skirt.

Perhaps another tart, since the girl with the golden hair very much liked crimping those. Or a cake, but Link had little in the way of a smooth tooth. Something heartier, like a meat pie. The girl with the golden hair could crimp that, and perhaps hone some other techniques.

"I'd like to believe the koroks still exist. Somewhere in the uninhabited reaches. Plenty of people say they might be in the mist-shrouded Kokir Forest—that's even why it's named after the Goddess—since no one in living memory has navigated its labyrinth, and—" She frowned. "—everyone's too afraid of the wrath of the Goddesses to try a serious expedition. I'd like to go there one day."

She clapped her hand over her mouth. Link nodded decisively to herself. Meat pie, for certain.

"Oh, but...I'm getting carried away again. You don't care about any of this, do you?"

Link blinked. For a ghastly moment she wondered if the girl with the golden hair had asked if she didn't care about meat pie. Then the words washed over her. "I like watching you. When you talk about the things you love," she replied honestly; the girl with the golden hair's cheeks flushed further. "Your whole face lights up! Looks like the fire under a cooking pot."

"That's a compliment, isn't it? I think it's a compliment..." The girl with the golden hair took up the harp again. Link perked up. "Well...Mother taught me this. She said that it was the ode to the Goddess Kokir. It's a minuet, so...a little slow, in three. Follow my lead. I'll play it slowly."

La ne naaa...da na daaa...la ne naaa...da na daaa...ma da dii, daa...di-di-di-liii...maaaa...

She guided Link through the strums of the strings. They had some difficulty in determining the differences in the eight-string and six-string harps. After a few moments, Link opted for the ocarina to follow the melody. She could learn the minuet for the ages later.

They played. Terribly at first, and so far out of tune that Link could nearly have given up her next meal to make it stop. Yet she kept at it, as did the girl with the golden hair. They played the melody, again and again, and then, suddenly, the two halves clicked together: the minuet flowed like the wind rustling through the forest trees.

When they tired, the girl with the golden hair lay her head down on the pillow, curled up on her right side. Link ogled her with the ages caught in a half-strum, her expression blank, her jaw slack, her gaze steady as she tried to uncover what in the name of the Golden Goddesses the girl with the golden hair wanted her to do.

The girl with the golden hair simply reclined upon the pillow and smiled at her.

Link placed the harp down on the floor at the foot of the bed. She lowered herself to the mattress, letting the softness of its blankets cushion her left hand.
They looked at one another from across the pillows. The girl with the golden hair giggled. "You don't have to look so serious all the time, you know."

Link rubbed the back of her head. The girl with the golden hair reached out her right hand towards Link's left. Link flinched back, but the girl with the golden hair caught her fingers and intertwined them.

They lay in silence on the bed, Link listening to the girl with the golden hair's breathing deepen, and her pulse slow; her warm, warm fingers curled more tightly around Link's.

Just when Link closed her eyes to try to sleep—as the girl with the golden hair had drifted off—she heard the girl with the golden hair's voice in the whisper of the wind. "Mother said that that song is like...a memory of younger days. Something to help you remember the things you might've lost along the way of growing up."

She hesitated.

"You've had to do an awful lot of growing up, haven't you?"

Link disentangled her left hand and drew her arm to her chest.

"You know, Link..." When the girl with the golden hair looked at her, the fire-light in her eyes gleamed so bright that it could outshine the soft glow of the blade of evil's bane. "You can talk. To me. You never, ever talk. Even Urbosa, Daruk, Revali, Mipha—they're all tried so hard to get you to talk to them, and the most they've done is get out bits and snippets and food. A-and don't get wrong," she adds hastily, "the food's fantastic.

"But the things you talk about are of other people. You talk about your childhood friend, and the girl on the ranch, and Aryll, but you don't ever talk about yourself. Even your parents—even that thing that's been eating you alive from the inside out so much that you didn't tell us—even that's really about Aryll, isn't it?"

The girl with the golden hair reached out again for her hand, to interlace their fingers. Link flinched back.

"You can't keep hiding behind stories of other people, Link. Please...please, let us care about you."

Link scooted back, and then she scooted back again, and then she felt her shoulder blades against the bookshelf by the side of the bed, and then she flattened herself, and then something cracked her across the skull. The fallen books buried her in their pages.

The girl with the golden hair helped to dig her out. But the moment was lost, and Link turned away.

Link finishes the banana. She sucks on the skewer until the flavour drains. Then she tosses away the arrow that once protruded her from her flesh.

The last of the Eldic forces return to the Divine Beast by the close of the day. They break to rest for the night; the platoons move into the Divine Beast Vah Rudania. Yunobo shows Link inside.

Link wonders at the sight.

The innards of the Divine Beast, once coated in malice and fraught with gears, have transformed into a multi-story series of beds, galleys, and even a hot sauna powered by the flames that Link once had to use cryonis to pass by. Yunobo finds a spot for Ilia, comfortable enough for the horse to fit between two beds; one of the guards returns with a bale of hay for her to eat. Link bows to the guard in thanks. "Already paid in full with that banana from earlier."

Yunobo shows Sarie, Link, and Kass around. A pool for zora, a rock grill for gorons, beds of every sort, and all in-laid in sapphire for travel through Eldin without the non-gorons suffering. "Cozy, right?" Yunobo says.

Kass dips his head. "I can't say I've slept in a bed in months. You don't happen to have...?"

"Tabanch beds?" Yunobo beams. "As a matter of fact, right this way." Link—and Sarie steering her with her sidelocks—follow their footsteps.

As the sun winds low in the sky and the last of the forest fire dies out, Yunobo tip-taps Link's shoulder. She looks back at him, at Yuno-yunobo, at the Champion of Goro-goro, the Hero of Eldin, the Divine Beast Vah Rudania's Pilot, O Powerful Yunobo. She corrects herself: O Powerful Yuno-yunobo. She beams as proudly as the first time she ever successfully grilled a sizzlefin trout without setting it or herself on fire.

"S-so," says Yunobo, drumming his fingers the slate that he carries at his right hip, same as Link, "can I give you a lift? We were going to venture deeper into Akkala, to take care of any Y-yiga still hiding out there, right?"

Reclining a few paces away with a bowl of ruby tart, the general who referred to Link's friend as Yuno-yunobo thumps his chest and grunts out a yep.

"B-but after we'll be heading back to Medli to report. I know y-you've probably got places to be, Link, and awesome heroic things to do, since you're th-that kind of person, right...?" She smiles sheepishly at Yunobo, who bumps her on the shoulder. "So at least let me get you there."

Nodding, Link glances at Kass, who smooths down the feathers of his crest. When she looks at him, he hrmphs his throat. "I...will not go with you to Medli, traveller, but I will accompany you to the border. I hope that that suffices."

Link embraces him. He squawks in faint surprise, then hugs her back. She turns back to Yunobo with a question on her fingertips. "Wait, Medli?"

"Huh?" Yunobo taps his index fingers together. "I thought you knew, since you're the one who recruited the informant, right?"

She cocks her head to the side.

"Huh? The informant? A former Yiga. H-he came to Medli with his daughters seeking asylum—w-what's wrong? What's that grin?"

Dorian.

Dorian, and Koko, and Cottla, safe and sound in Medli. Yunobo goes on explain that, although travel across the dangerous wilds of the land once known as Hyrule has not grown any safer or easier for those on foot or steed, precious little can stop the Divine Beast Vah Rudania in its tracks.

After clearing as much of the areas surrounding the city of Darunia as he could of monsters—monsters that will return with time, but hopefully the city-dwellers will have time enough to build up their defenses—he and the elders of Darunia turned their attention outwards to the rest of the world after a century of separatism: in the distance, they witnessed the Divine Beast Vah Medoh land for the first time in one hundred years.
In Medli, they learned of the informant feeding information about the Yiga's whereabouts. And this time the people of Tabantha and Eldin listened, where before the Eldic and the Tabanch alike dismissed such tales as fanciful follies at best or as reports to ignore at worst. They had their hands, or webbed fingers, or wings full dealing with the threat of monsters encroaching on the very heart of their lands. And the Yiga, despite their nature, brought a useful commodity to the land once known as Hyrule: those willing to travel from place to place in a time where precious few will.

Now at least some of that has begun to change.

Moreover, the Yiga are people: people that can be understood and predicted, with a finite number of members, and a concrete headquarters that they could assault. No one knows from where the monsters emerge; no one knows how the monsters return from seemingly beyond the grave. Yet the Yiga represent something within the boundaries of the mortal world that the Eldic, and Tabanch, and Parapans—Parapans?—can point to, and that they can deal with to make that much safer the land once known as Hyrule.

The people of the land need something to cling to, some hope and faith on which to latch on. Monsters come back, like fish bones buried by the banks of a river.

But people—people don't.

And never before have they had such a detailed and knowledgeable informant, once tasked with the very taking of the Hero's slate.

Monsters still roam the land once known as Hyrule. Day by day, their attacks still grow more frequent. Nevertheless, the Divine Beasts offer safety in the passage between one city to another. No longer do the people need to turn the other cheek and rely on the Yiga to walk where the people could not.

They have yet a long, long ways to go before the common folk can take to the paths. Yet the Divine Beasts represent a start.

And the Divine Beasts represent something even more vital.

Hope.

"The rest of Eldin still needs me," Yunobo elaborates, "but if we crush the Yiga, then that helps everyone. Including my people."

Approximately two weeks ago, he continues, Yunobo and the Tabanch Champion, Amali, working together with Queen Riju of Parapa—Link wipes away her tears—launched an offensive on the very hideout of the Yiga. "Between the awesome might of Vah Medo-medoh, Vah Nabo-naboris, and our own Vah Ruda-rudania, the Yiga couldn't stand a chance!" Yunobo beams.

Link returns the grin. She promised Dorian that she would help him raise an army, but in the end Dorian has raised his own.

When she sees them again in Medli, she'll have to cook for Cottla and Koko. Carrot cake, to see if their tongues sing sweet as Aryll's. Hot buttered apple, and meat-stuffed pumpkin, and veggie cream stew, and anything else she can think of. Honey-glazed pancakes, like the kind Romani loves, and creamy meat stew, and maybe catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd.

"Now we're just dealing with the ones that fled," Yunobo finishes, curling his hands into fists and clenching the blue shawl with a forged flame in his eyes. "And people aren't going to be hurt again. And it's all...it's all thanks to you, Link."
She shakes her head. "And to you, Yuno-yunobo."

Scratching his jaw, he ducks his head. "Pinch me," he says. She pinches him. He squeals. "Pinch me again." Instead Link hugs him.

They bed for the night. In the morning the Divine Beast Vah Rudania begins its trek over Akkala. Yunobo pilots the Divine Beast cautiously so as to avoid on stepping on trees, or on animals, or especially-not on people. The Divine Beast crawls rapidly. Rito messengers serve as informants in the air; zora, in the water. Yiga sightings fan out the Eldic forces. They dispatch as well monsters of every sort, from brown-furred Akkalan wolfos to blue- and white-maned lynels that fall beneath the Divine Beast's overwhelming fire-light. Link spends her time gathering ingredients, learning from Yunobo how much his life—and his father's approval—has changed since becoming the Divine Beast Vah Rudania's pilot, and entering shrines. At the Rist Peninsula, Kass and Link set off to puzzle out the riddle. A series of depressed platforms hued in blue along the vortex and a shrine waiting for a slate greets them, to his boundless surprise.

Someone must have come long before to solve the puzzle of the shrine. At the very least Link takes Kass and Sarie down to sing the shrine to sapphire.

They reach the edge of Akkala. They turn back. To Medli, to report.

Link practises the wooden ocarina. Steadily the patterns of her fingers return to her, that Marin taught her, that she later learned herself. Epona's song and Ilia's whistle, and some of the melodies she learned from Marin's mothers—the Mambo of Manbo and the Frogsong of Mamu's Soul—and some of songs she played with the girl with the golden hair.

She sits cross-legged on the bed with Sarie busily braiding her ponytail. Sarie. A korok. Remembering the minuet of the girl with the golden hair, Link wets the mouthpiece of the ocarina.

"Hey, Sarie."

Sarie kookoos at her.

"I don't know a lot about koroks, but a long, long time ago, one of my closest friends taught me this song and said it was an ode to the Goddess Kokir, or something like that. She said it was like...a memory of younger days. I don't really get what that means. She was a lot smarter than me, and...very dear." In that moment Link feels very much like the girl with the golden hair clutching the volume on Akkalan faiths and asking her about Ordon foods. "Sorry if I mess it up. I'm not too good with the ocarina."

"Ooh! Play it. Play it! Sarie wants to hear. Sarie wants to hear!"

Link lifts the ocarina to her lips.

She plays.

La ne naaa...da na daaa...la ne naaa...da na daaa...ma da dii, daa...di-da-di-lii...maaaa...

Raising her eyebrows, she waggles them at Sarie. "How bad was that?" she asks, a smile on her lips.

Sarie does not reply. Their hands fall away from Link's hair.

"Sarie?"
They stay quiet for the remainder of the evening; Link puts away the ocarina into her satchel. If she plays music so awfully that her companion would even cease to speak with her, then she has no business carrying around an instrument of torture, an implement of war.

They pass by Eldin and begin to cross over into the province of Rauru between the northern wilds and the Hylia River. Link slumbers on a Necludan-style bed with Ilia by her left side and Sarie snuggled in the collar of her tunic to bump their head under her chin. She awakens to a vibration at her throat.

Blinking blearily, Link sits up. Sarie flies out from her tunic. When she merely sways back and forth, rubbing her eyes with the heels of her hands, Sarie twirls back on their korok leaf to tug on her sidelocks, the pull so forceful that the pain sharpens Link into awakeness.

"Come," says Sarie; the sudden shift in their voice opens Link's eyes, her gaze clear and alert. "Come, come."

Sarie wraps their finger-like roots around Link's left forefinger. Her wrist aches from its earlier sprain as Sarie puts her along, up ladders, towards the front of the Divine Beast. With her slate no longer in control of the Divine Beast after Yunobo's synchronisation, Link follows Sarie up to the entrance at the head until they have emerged onto the back of the Divine Beast.

The moon overhead has ripened to fullness. The stars glimmer with the names Hestu imparted on her. Anouki, the fixed star. The Sword in the Stone and its Reflection nearby. The Seven Sages, clustered together. The Hero of the Silver Arrow with a sash of three gifts of the Oracles, driving back the Boar of Malice. And yet, from here, the constellations differ ever so slightly in their locations, and those that she could not see before have crept up from the northern horizon.

To the east stretches the spine of the land once known as Hyrule, the Eldic range cresting with the summit of Death Mountain. To the west flower the plains and gentle hills that slope towards the cool snows of Tabantha. Before her to the south winds the Hylia River that circles the castle, and beyond Her banks, the castle itself, ghostly and silent, quieted under the weight of one hundred years of passing and choked beneath the burden of ten thousand years of dust.

Link rubs her eyes again. Sparks of red on the insides of her eyelids give way to the dark quiet of the night sky. She glances at Sarie; the korok stares down into the abyss to the north. Leaning over the edge of the Divine Beast, Link casts her gaze down to what lies north of the castle, north of the province of Rauru, north, north, north, the direction of the lands beyond Hyrule.

A bank of fog. A forest shrouded in mist. A cloak of obscurity in the heart of a land charted out to map, pulsating with life in the centre of a lake dewed in the veil of the wilds.

Sarie murmurs with the voice of the wind and the forest in one. "Sarie remembers. Sarie...Sarie remembers." Link gazes at them.

"The flow of time is always cruel..." they whisper. "...its speed seems different for each person, but no one can change it..." Their leafy mask faces her with its blankness; she starts to step back, but their roots dig more deeply into her finger. "...a thing that doesn't change with time is a memory of younger days..."

Sarie quiets.

"You're not her," they murmur, and in that moment her voice sounds, so suddenly, very, very distant, "but...I still..."
The wind shifts. Link's fingers curl around her companion's hand. Together they step off.

Together they glide into the lost woods, lovely, dark, and deep.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Well, now, I can talk about Glepp being Yiga. When we first meet Misan and Glepp in the eleventh chapter, we do so in the context of an Eldic village that has had reports of Yiga activity the past few days. Glepp and Misan are also noted to have arrived a few days ago. Glepp, who is an archer (like many Yiga women in-game), is politely but firmly suggested to leave. They go to Darunia with a sellsword; note that Link does not go for shrines while in Glepp's presence. As a coincidence, Vah Rudania is calmed while Glepp was near Darunia, which heightened her suspicions. We meet them again much later in Parapa, where we learn that Glepp requested that Misan abandon the usual sapphire-ruby trade to try topaz, which brings the merchants near Parapa—and the Yiga stronghold, where Glepp was receiving intel. Misan and Glepp are travelling to Lanayru, the home of the last uncleansed Divine Beast. Glepp also mentions not wanting to be seen by those in Ruto, who—the zora population being small and long-lived—would likely recognise her as a Yiga. During the travel to Lanayru, Glepp (1) reveals that she has met Kass and knows the tune of his accordion, (2) observes Link travelling to shrines and towers, (3) implies she knows Link is over 100 years old, (4) asks Link about her future travels, and (5) specifically is the one to probe regarding Ordon (by the way, your hint that Ordon was destroyed came from Glepp and Misan not recognising it). There's probably more I'm forgetting. Take a look back at the chapters with Glepp in it and check yourself! As for Misan...we'll see in the future.

Hey, remember Zelda's harp that I first mentioned back in the twenty-sixth chapter? Here it is! Zelda's refrain of "do my words sting?" are a clapback to Impa saying those same words to Zelda in the previous chapter.

Music has been a vital part of the Zelda series since Link's Awakening. The comment about Zelda receiving her memories again is a nod to Skyward Sword, where Zelda remembers her past life as Hylia. Of course, in Delicious in Wilds, the royal family is not the reincarnation of Hylia, who may or may not have existed at all.

Remember how I mentioned that Urbosa had spent some time in Rovah?

Impa referred to the Master Sword as the "sacred sword" once before. It's an alternative epithet, one pulled from the Ballad of the Sealing War: with sacred sword and blesséd blade.

Go all the way back to the first chapter. Link mentions that the Temple of Time looks like there's a crater at the back. The royal family literally excavated around the Master Sword set in the pedestal of the temple and carted it to the castle. Ouch!

Kokir Forest replaces the Great Hyrule Forest. The odes to the Seven are passed-down versions of the songs from Ocarina of Time (as well as a certain song from Majora's Mask). History is written by the victor. Although worship of the Seven didn't exist at the time that the original songs were written (only of the Golden Goddesses), the songs passed down the 'royal family' have been repurposed to fit with the royal family's current narrative. In this case, the song is the Minuet of Forest, originally meant for the Forest Temple.

The memory of younger days is in reference to the line spoken about the Minuet of Forest in Ocarina of Time. By the way, I don't really like Ocarina of Time all that much, and yes, I played the games in release order, making Ocarina of Time the first 3D game I played, on the N64 and all (back when disbelievers were deriding the console as the 'Pretendo 69'). By the way, for those who don't remember from Breath of the Wild or who haven't gotten there yet, Zelda's mother died when she was six years old in-game and also in-fic.

What Sarie says at the end is, again, a reference to the speech from Ocarina of Time. I'm not sure if I got it right since I went based on memory and only played the game once, but it's about there.

Switching pronouns for Sarie was not a mistake at the end there.

Up next: the lost woods; talk of a previous hero; the pedestal in the woods.

Beta reader's comments:

I'd just like to say that I called it and I pointed the finger at the Yiga and eventually it ended up being true and dammit I am proud of that.

The ending bit of this chapter is one of my favourite bits in the series. Sarie suddenly switching pronouns and getting serious is really chilling.

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef and the forgetful companion enter the lost woods, where awaits the sword that seals the darkness. The chef grips again the hilt of the blade of evil's bane.

Chapter Notes

And then, after promising you all a chapter yesterday, I completely neglected to upload it! Here it is, prim and pristine. As a reminder, no chapter today (this is technically yesterday's chapter) and none tomorrow. We resume on Monday. See you all then, and thank you all for reading!

Author's notes that wouldn't fit in the end: I started writing this chapter at 21:24 on the second of August, and finished writing it on at 10:52 on the third of August.

Thanks a million for coming with me all this way and beyond. We're moving towards end-game now. Just twenty-three chapters left. Just a short, short twenty-three chapters. And, as always, thanks a million to my beta reader for everything that she's done for my sake.

Hey, it's another chapter where Link just uses pronouns the entire time, except for in the memory! I have quite a few of these, don't I?

I wanted to get across the absolutely alien and terrifying sensation of the lost woods.

Back when Link was travelling to Lanayru with Glepp and Misan, she realised she still couldn't remember Ilia's name even though Ilia had helped Link choose the name Link, and had in her distress/breakdown gouged out scars down her cheeks.

The memory of this chapter is directly based on/adapted from the "Shelter from the Storm" memory from Breath of the Wild. Though, of course, I've expanded on it.

The techniques mentioned by Link in this chapter are mostly taken from the standard attacks in the 3D titles, although the riposte and the parry refer to a different game series.

Zelda (just like the Ordon kids from Link's childhood, including Ilia) mistakes Link's silence—borne of fear and a desire to be as unassuming as possible, a product of her abuse—for indifference, concentration, or arrogance.

Swords are best kept at the hip. I've mentioned this before, so I won't repeat myself. The Master Sword is ridiculously long, so long that it clips through flat ground in Link's default idle animation. Ridiculous!

The legends that Link mentions in this chapter are in reference to various other Zelda titles. In The Adventure of Link, the Triforce of Courage chooses Link by causing a golden triangular mark to appear on Link's hand, which was later adapted for the mark of the Triforce, as seen in Oracle of Seasons and Oracle of Ages, as well as in Twilight Princess (hence why Link keeps the left hand covered throughout the early part of Twilight Princess). Both Ocarina of Time and Skyward Sword see Link having nightmares of what's to come. Both A Link to the Past and A Link Between Worlds see Link awakened in the middle of the night by Zelda's telepathetic signal. But none of those happened to the Link of Delicious in Wilds.

I think it's relevant to point out how the different people in Link's life (Marin, Aryll, Ilia, and Zelda) view the legends of the past. Link has seen many influences in her life, and none is right and none is wrong. Just different.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

"The flow of time is always cruel..." they whispered. "...its speed seems different for each person, but no one can change it..." Their leafy mask faced her with its blankness, and she started to step back but their roots dug more deeply into her finger. "...a thing that doesn't change with time is a memory of younger days..."

Sarie quieted.

"You're not her," they murmured, and in that moment her voice sounded, so suddenly, very, very distant, "but...I still..."

The wind shifted. Link's fingers curled around her companion's hand. Together they stepped off.

Together they glided into the lost woods, lovely, dark, and deep.

The mists envelop her. From the clearness of the sky the fogs surround her all at once, her vision fading to inky white. As they glide lower towards the woods, she listens to the sounds, to the music, to the faint laughter of children, to the fifes of the song that she has heard Sarie sing, to the tumbling of wooden blocks against one another, the noises shifting and blending into one another as if she were erratically spinning in different directions. When her boots touch ground, they sink slightly into the mud. While she stands still, the sounds around her do not shift. Glancing back and forth at the woods about her, she sees nothing but identically-faced trees gazing back at her with yawning maws, all of them seemingly the same, and all of them staring directly at her, like she were at the heart of the forest. She cannot make out farther than a pace or two before the fog overtakes her. The moment she shifts, even a twist of the head, the noises undulate and twirl. Or perhaps they stay in place, and it is she who has lost her orientation in the sea of the same wood.

The chill of the fog presses in. The mists caress her face, lap up the wound under her left eye, intertwine their fingers with hers, reach a finger down the back of her tunic to trace her spine to the small of her back. She shivers.

"Be not afraid," the wind whispers. Not the wind, but Sarie, their fingers still rooting her forefinger. "As long as you are with me, the woods cannot take you. So do not leave my side while we are together, here..." Sarie hovers before her. They do not face her. "...let me be your navigator, Link."

She can hear the thudding of her heartbeat through her fingertip where it pulsates against the roots of their fingers. Her breaths should have quickened, yet something about the coolness of the fog keeps her breathing low and deep, as if she were slumbering.

She shudders in her sleep. Her tunic has no feather lining, and she cannot rely on awakening again in the warmth of Kass's wings.
"I do not...remember the way forward..." Their voice, ever fainter. "...but I believe...in you. You are not her, yet you remind me...in your recklessness...in your foolishness...and in your courage. Do not...leave my side, and I will...not leave yours, Link."

They fall silent. She reaches a hand towards Sarie, but they do not stir from the air. They do not hold a korok leaf. They hover in the darkness like a leaf caught mid-flight, like the moon in the sky.

She cranes her neck up.

No moon. No moon but for the mists shrouding above.

She lifts her boot only to find resistance against her toes. When she looks down, she notices creeping arms of earth threading over her boots to root her into the soil. Inhaling sharply, she jerks her feet up to track through the fingers of dirt and mud.

She starts to jog in place. The identical trees around her that gaze perfectly at her. The music shifting whenever she moves. The lone and level fog that obscures the stars.

And that sensation.

That sensation. That sensation of losing her boundaries. She can sense, almost, how her skin dissipates from her in a vapour to melt into the mist, how her consciousness extends, how her very form warbles into flux.

"You...must...find...the...way..."

She reaches for her slate. Magnesis. Stasis. Anything.

Through the slate, the trees remain as impassive and as silent as before. As still. As absolutely still.

As still as Sarie. As still as herself. Her movement only serves to disorient her further. Yet, if she does not move—

Her boots sink into the mud.

Although she tries to force the hastening of her breaths, the beat of her heart and the speed of her inhalations remain in rhythm with the wind through the woods. She approaches a tree. She skirts her hand over the mouth-like opening of its trunk, seeking for a twig to light aflame.

Yet, when she curls her fingers around one and tries to bend, she has the distinct feeling of someone bending back one of her middle fingers. She braces her thumb against the base of the twig to crack it. Pain splinters down her left wrist.

She steps back.

The tree gazes at her.

She looks back over her shoulders.

All of the trees gaze at her, perfectly in line with her, even though she has walked several paces away. Or has she? Has she always stood in this very spot? She has, perhaps, always stood in this spot, with the trees gazing at her, with her boots sunk slightly into the soil, with the lullabies of the lost lulling her to sleep.

She could sleep. She could close her eyes and given in to the mist. She may be mist, but she will not be missed.

The fingers of her right hand curl into a ball. She digs her nails in until warm wetness trickles down her fingers. The sudden sharpness of the pain opens again her world. She gasps. She inhales. She breathes out. No matter how quickly she pushes the air through her lungs, the fog steadies her breaths, yet the mists cannot numb the pain that she gouges from her palm.

The agony that keeps her alert. The agony that keeps her awake. The agony that keeps her alive.

She swings her head. The world around her remains the same. Nothing moves. Nothing shifts, save for the music that undulates around in patterns she cannot discern, but stagnant, static, the same music she imagines as sung ten thousand years ago. Nothing, except——for the wind. The wind that blows, at her side. A breeze so gentle that she would not have noticed its caresses if not for Sarie's speech. She turns with the kaleidoscope of music until she feels the wind at her back.

The wind at her back.

Urging her forward.

The friends that she has had, that have sung the wind at her back. And if her friends can sing the wind forward, then her friends themselves must wait in its face.

She rotates on her heel with the murmur of melodies that mix and melt about her.

She walks into the wind.

As she walks, the fog grows denser around her. As she walks—whenever she glances left or right—all of the trees continue to gaze perfectly at her no matter how far she steps. As she walks, the wind shifts, and she curves her path through the trees. As she walks, she tires. As she walks, her eyelids heavy. As she walks, her heart slows and her breaths deepen. As she walks, she sinks her nails into her own flesh. As she walks, she leaves flecks of red on the cool earth.

She walks into the wind.

She walks, and she walks, and she walks, and her legs numb from the walking, and her stomach hollows out, and her eyelids lower with every blink, and she could rest here for just a moment, and she could stop and sit awhile, and she could lie down, just a second, just a moment, just to catch her breath, just to sleep.

But she has promises to keep, and paths to walk before she sleeps, and meals to make, and breaths to take, and friends to see, and herself to be.

She walks into the wind.

She rakes her nails in deeper. She numbs her hearing, her gaze, her smell, her taste. She leaves only her touch. She cannot miss a shift in the wind. Her world narrows through the fog to she who reads the whisper of the wind and nothing more.

She walks into the wind, and the wind walks into her. From a gentle caress she can sense the wind building against her skin to a breeze, and then a gust, and then she finds it picking up her sidelocks and ruffling her tunic, and then she has to force herself to continue forward one step at a time while the wind buffets her with the fury of the storm. She protects her companion in the crook of her hand, their roots still tangled around her forefinger. She walks forward, eyes closed. She walks forward, until her body has all but given up. She walks forward, the pain of exhaustion buckling her legs and her heart crawling to a stop.

And then she forces herself to walk on.

She walks into the wind, and suddenly she has no wind to walk into.

She stands still. Absolutely still. She feels for its whisper, but the air around her has quieted: the eye of the maelstrom. She does not shiver.

Warm.

Warmth.

Not quite like the warmth of sunlight. The warmth of the shade on a day green as spring with the heat of life all around her.

She raises one eyelid, and then the other, and then she finds, in the middle of the path, a single scarlet mushroom.

A single sleepy toadstool.

She bends down.

She curls the fingers of her free right hand around the stalk. She plucks it from the ground. She lets it sit in her palm, the blood oozing up from the four crescent wounds, the cap almost like a heart.

She lifts her head and she finds that the fog has lifted. She stands before a hollowed log, some twice her height in diameter. The grass grows the green of life, the blades as her waist, swaying gently despite that she can feel no wind. Flowers curl and bloom through the sea of green, gold and white, the sun and the moon. She steps onto the inside of the hollow log. Moss leads her down the path inside. Her boots sink into the green. Birds flutter to the treetops, and bunnies bound into the bushes. She can sense the gazes of the grove's guardians upon her, warm and welcoming with the breath of life.

She walks on and she can feel her heart compress like she has been here before.

Not here. Not exactly. But that feeling overwhelming, of coming home, of something long forgotten, of a memory of young days.

When she touches her eyes, her fingers come away wet. Her boots rest at the rim of the hollow of the log. The tears curve down her cheeks to gather at her chin and fall away to the earth.

She has never been here before, but she has felt this. Like a nostalgia for something beyond her past, a melancholy for something she has never witnessed, a poignancy for something that people she will never know must have felt themselves. Like the understanding of the passage of time. Like Ordon, buried to ruin. Like Marin, passed away long enough. Like the land once known as Hyrule after one hundred years of passing.

Like herself.

And here, where she looks, she finds something that has not changed, but something has been passed down generation to generation, far longer than ten thousand years, since the dawn of the Golden Goddesses, since the time when all lay in dust.
A memory of younger days. A memory of spring. A memory of her first laugh, her cheeks tickled by the warm hide of an Ordon goat, her tiny hands reaching out to grab fistfuls of fur, her heart not yet knowing hurt or harm or shame or loss.

She looks on.

Tears trail her footfalls.

A smooth stone greened in moss and ivy. A pedestal with three flowers curved behind, two to the left, and one to the right. The Hylia-white and fire-light-blue of silent princesses.

The white and blue of the favoured flower of the girl with the golden hair.

And there, upon the stone.

The blade of evil's bane.

Resting within the pedestal, its blade the softened white of the flowers, its hilt the violet of the spirals that curl over her skin, its wings folded quietly at its sides, like those of the loftwings, messengers of the Golden Goddesses long, long ago.

She steps forward. She approaches the pedestal. She can feel the roots around her forefinger slackening. Her companion does not look at her.

"You no...longer need a navigator...do you? You've...so much...that...can find your own way...without...by your side..." Their words muffle into murmur. She strains to hear. "And again you'll...take it and...forget me...won't you, Link? You...you always...you told me that you would be my...friend but you...it is our fate that we cannot...together..."

She watches her companion.

Her companion drifts towards the ground, more and more slowly, until they hang for an eternity one brush above the grass.

"But you...are not she, and I cannot look at you and expect her..." they whisper, voice choked on grief. "The sword...always chooses...another in the times of...need but...time does not repeat itself...she and her spirit will...never return. That which...we have lost is...lost...all fall to the flow of time...that which takes all...that which will one day take me...into its embrace..."

They alight in the grass at the foot of the stone. The blades dance about them; her companion lies still.

She takes a step. Then another. She crouches down until the grass brushes against her neck where the violet whorls at her throat; she extends her left hand with its lightning-strike scar of courage.

She rests her hand on her companion's head.

For a long breath, they do not move. Then they turn their head towards her.

Her palm slips away from her companion. She lifts her arms into the canopy of grass.

"I..." Her hands curl inwards. Her right palm dribbles blood onto the green. "...don't know what you have suffered, or what you have lost. I can't pretend to understand. But I...was asleep for one hundred years, and when I awoke, the world changed around me. The people I love—Mipha, and Revali, and Daruk, and Urbosa, and my little sister Aryll, and Marin, and my best friend, and...a girl with golden hair and eyes blue as a silent princess—have passed, or left, or I don't know where they are. I won't ever see some of them again. I won't ever be able to tell Marin I love her ever again. I left her..." Her arms tremble. "...and she never knew if I would return."

Droplets trickle down the curves of her nails.

"But I...realised that chasing after the past...is only ever chasing an echo. You can't un-ripen fruit. You can't un-rot fish. You can only move forward to other meals. And that's what the people I love would have wanted. For my happiness, I think. I'm still trying to figure these things out as I go."

She rubs the back of her head. Their companion stares through her, or perhaps does not look at all. She cannot tell through the blankness of the mask.

"I want to know what happened to the people I love. And I'll find out if I can. But I've...made so many other friends. So many other people I love here, too. Yunobo, and Amali and her family, and Riju, and Sidon, and that's barely scratching the surface of all of the people I know and have shared meals with and have cooked for and love more than I love myself."

She runs her palm against their forehead. She brushes her knuckles against their cheek.

"I don't know who the she you're talking about is, and I'm sorry that she left you. But she wouldn't have wanted you to cry over her. It's...it'll be all right. It'll...it'll be all right, won't it? You can come with me. I can introduce you to my friends. You've already met Ilia and Kass, and Yunobo, and my cooking pot, too. There's so much world out there."

They say nothing. They do not move. They do not make noise like the tumbling of wooden blocks, but rather like the quiet after the rain.

"I...I know that I'm not any good at this. I've never really known how to use my words, and when I do, I just end up rambling about food. " She laughs lightly to herself. "I'm...sorry."

"What if I forget again?" they whisper suddenly; she stills her hand to listen. "...forgot once. I could...again, if the Goddesses do not want me to remember. I...we are the immortal children of the woods, and for our own sake, They take these things from us...so that we do not feel loss...but what if I want to? What if I want to hurt? What if that pain—"

"—means that you're alive."

She does not understand. Not fully. She has no concept of eternity, no concept of forever. The stretch of one hundred years has already stretched her to the limits.

"I lost my memories when I woke up. I didn't even know my name. But the smells and tastes of all the meals I've ever had are the things that've helped me remember. Maybe for you there's something else. I don't know what you love—"

"The ocarina. I played an ocarina. I made her one, out of wood. She...threw it away when she had to seize her destiny. I don't think she wanted to, but...I vowed I'd remain her friend no matter what happened. No matter if she...threw me away, too." They shudder. When she gathers them in her arms, they do not struggle. She embraces them against her chest. "That song you played. The Minuet...of Forest."

"Is that what it's called?" She snaps her fingers. "Maybe if it's food for me, then it's music for you. You're always humming, aren't you? Just write down the song somewhere. And if you forget, you can listen to it again, and then you'll remember, right?" She bobs her head, but they say little. "...right?"
"Do you not fear what you might have forgotten? Are you not afraid that there could be something...so dreadfully important...that you don't know what you don't know?"

Tilting her head to the side, she raises her hand to her cheek. It took her nearly half a year to recall that she had a little sister, and over twice that besides that to remember that she knew Mipha a child, that she went regularly to Ruto.

Over a year since she awoke.

A year and a half.

She counts on her fingers. She blinks. Perhaps along the line, she wonders, her twentieth birthday has passed without her knowledge. She called herself nineteen in Ache's Veil, to mark the passage of a year.

She does not remember her own birthday.

But she remembers Aryll's, and Marin's, and the girl who smelled of horses's, and Urbosa's, and Daruk's, and Revali's, and Mipha's, and the girl with the golden hair's.

Just not her own.

"I don't know what I don't know," she echoes, "and there are...some things that I wish I could remember. Names I've forgotten. I'm scared that I could be forgetting an entire person somewhere. But.

"I can either sit here and be scared about what I could be missing, or I could just...love those I do remember." She runs her hand over her hair. "It's not the best. I wish that you could just poof remember. Still...

"There's a girl whose name I can't remember, no matter how many meals I eat. I thought for sure if I ate her favourite, it'd spring to me like an epiphany, but it didn't." She touches her hands to her own cheeks where she can still sense the scars left by her nails. "She wouldn't have wanted me to...to suffer for her sake." As she moves through the gestures, her eyes ever so slowly widen. "She wouldn't have wanted me to suffer, whether I remember her or not. Whether I get back my memories or not. None of them would've wanted me to hurt. Well, Revali, maybe, sometimes, but that was more about him being angry at fate. And I can't blame him for how happy he made Aryll." She lets herself laugh again, a tiny peal of a giggle that barely vibrates her lip, but enough. "But they wouldn't have wanted me to hurt. Not over them. They just...just like what Marin would've wanted. They just wanted me to be happy, and safe, and with a full stomach, too."

She holds her companion to her chest; she feels their tiny hands clinging to her tunic.

"I don't know who this she with the ocarina is, but if you two were friends, if you loved her and she loved you, then that's what she would want for you, too. Happy, and safe, and with a full stomach, too. Speaking of full stomachs." She raises her eyebrows. "Hey...can you...show me how to prepare loam?"

They lift up their face at her. She nods.

"You are different from her," they mumble into the fabric of her tunic. "She didn't like food nearly this much. I can't remember ever seeing her eat except elixirs...I don't think she liked food much at all."

She runs her fingers through one of her sidelocks. "I don't want to say I'm offended that you thought I resembled her at all, but..."

"She'd have carrots with her, always, to feed her horse, but not herself..."

"That's a step up at least," she signs, angling for a smile but only meeting that impenetrable leafy mask.

"It's...courage. That air you give off. Like you could lay down your life for this land and your love. The same air I felt from her." They curl their tiny arms in. "I always knew she would leave one day. From that air...that wind that always blew her forward..."

"Well, I don't intend on leaving any time soon. Not until I figure out how to eat rock roast." She touches her chin. "And maybe loam."

"Then...let me help you. With the loam."

They show her how and where to dig of the soft soil. They show her how to test for its dampness, how to curl her fingers in to feel it crumble, how to seek the spots of the richest black. They show her how to mix in the most succulent leaves. They show her how to puff the loam with air. They show her how to cup her palms with the loam loose between her fingers; she thinks of Sidon letting her eating ceviche from his hands. They place their tiny hands onto hers, and they eat of the loam, and they pat their hand against her cheek.

"Do you mind if I...sleep in your tunic?" They shiver. "It's warm there. I don't have to, if it's strange."

She pulls her tunic open to offer them the inside. For a moment they do not move, simply hovering there with their hand on her cheek.

"If, when I awaken, I forget everything again...let me be happy for a little while." Their tiny fingers press into her cheek. "Then play that song for me. Please."

She nods. "I promise, Sarie."

"I think...I think I used to have a different name. Maybe...when you play that...song again..." They droop. Their hand slides from her cheek. They drift down into her palms. She tucks them not only into her tunic, but also in her undershirt; their snores hum along her sternum.

She sits cross-legged before the pedestal, her companion comforted by the warmth of her body. Placing the cooking pot in front of her legs, she pulls the mushroom out from her sleeve.

The sleepy toadstool.

She pokes through her satchel, at what she has. She has, still, half a bottle of milk leftover from the creamy meat stew she prepared earlier for dinner, to show off to Kass the recipe Romani taught her. She has rock salt. She has a handful of assorted spices. She has some cloves of garlic and onion at the bottom of her ingredient box. She has a little parcel of flour ground by hand using one of the mills on the Divine Beast Vah Rudania. She has a third of a stick of goat butter, and she has little else.

Yet she has this mushroom.

She rises to her feet, careful not to disturb her companion, and investigates the periphery of the clearing. She finds truffles and radishes and a particularly terrified bunny, furred in pink, nose twitching desperately against her palm. No, not terrified. Curious. The bunny noses her hand, flicks their ears up, and then bounds away into the underbrush.

She watches the rabbit go before she returns to the cooking pot.

She can think of no better salutation to the blade of evil's bane than a meal in honour of the sword once strapped to her shoulder, of the blade once bound to her back.

Before she sets the entirety of the lost woods ablaze, she lines a firepit of stones and collects grass and twigs into a small pile. Kass’s flint melts butter in the bottom of the cooking pot. She adds in the onion and garlic first, then sets about mincing the radishes and carving the truffles and sleepy toadstool into wide, thin slices. Mixing mushroom, radish, truffle, onion, and garlic, she flips them over while they soften into the butter. She shimmies out a palmful of flour to thicken the brown-gold within. Then she pours in the bottle of milk, lest she make floured mushroom butter. She allows the stew to simmer and draw out the flavours of its contents while she sprinkles rock salt and ground black pepper. At long last she quits the cooking pot from the heat.

She offers the cooking pot towards the pedestal. "Want some?" she asks the sword that seals the darkness. When the blade of evil's bane yields no response, she shrugs. "I'll eat it in your honour then, old friend."

Where she has no utensils, she has a mouth and hands. Bringing the cooking pot to her mouth despite its heft, she tries to tip it just enough to swallow down its contents. The thick stew flows slowly, and she tips it higher. Higher, higher, too high.

Half the stew ends up on her tunic.

She holds up the hem of her tunic to pool the stew within. Curling herself into a ball—careful not to disturb her companion—she slurps up the stew from the fabric. Hearty and thick, the mushrooms and truffles bringing notes savory and earthy, the radish contributing a crisp and popping zest, the stew settles in her stomach to warm the very marrow of her bones and rest the slight nervous flutter of her heart.

She remembers taking shelter from the rains beneath a small grove of trees, under which several small statues dedicated to the Goddesses saw offerings of apples and berries left in their bowls. The king had tasked her with travelling by the side of the girl with the golden hair to one of the lesser-known Temples of Hylia along the banks of the river that bore Her name, in the hopes that a simpler faith might spark an epiphany where the complicated and lavish ceremonies of the Hyrule cathedral might not. Impa—having gone ahead to scout for the nearest village—had left them in the grove with explicit instructions that if she returned and found a single golden hair out of place, she would shove the blade of evil's bane into a place where Link certainly would not want it.

The girl with the golden hair scarcely ever looked at her then. Not since Link had inadvertently turned her over to Impa and the king when the girl with the golden hair had attempted to examine the shrine on the island northeast of Carok Bridge.

Link, not knowing what to say, set mushrooms plucked from faery rings raised by the rain into her cooking pot. While the cream of mushroom stew merrily simmered away, she began to practise her daily drills with the blade of evil's bane. The horizontal slice. The vertical. The thrust. The plunge. The parry. The riposte. Diagonal, spiralled, tricks of the blade.

The girl with the golden hair spoke suddenly. So suddenly that her words passed over Link's head for a moment before she registered the girl with the golden hair's speech.

"You truly have committed yourself to your training regime," the girl with the golden hair was saying, her voice remarkably level. "I hear that you are training extensively with each of the Champions to verse yourself not only in mastery of the blade, but of the Champion's area of expertise as well, both to understand how to fight against such foes, and to wield those weapons in event of an emergency. Your dedication is outstanding, really. I can see why the sword that seals the darkness chose you. You...truly do set your mind to it, above and beyond any of your personal interests. I suppose to be chosen, you have to be willing to give up everything. Isn't that so?"

Link glanced at her briefly over her shoulder. She could not read the girl with the golden hair's expression, which frightened her into silently continuing her drills.

"Of course, not even me discussing you can distract you from your destiny, hm."

The girl with the golden hair fell silent. Link checked on the stew: the onion had not yet softened. When she resumed her drills, the girl with the golden hair likewise resumed her speech, much to the budding beads of sweat down the back of Link's neck.

"What if...one day...you realised that no matter how much you trained with the sword that seals the darkness, it would not unlock its full potential for you? What if...one day...you realised that it simply refused to work in your hands, that it would only ever be a dull sword like any other, unable to strike the mortal blow against the Calamitous One?"

Link dared not look back at her. She kept her back to the girl with the golden hair, even as the girl with the golden hair's voice started to fragment at the edges.

"Yet, no matter how much you warned people, that they should find someone else, that you wouldn't be able to use its powers, they just...just expected you to somehow make it work. 'You're the chosen one, so you'll figure out. And if you don't, then everyone's deaths will be on your head!' What if...that's all everyone ever told you? I wonder if you would have..." The girl with the golden hair sank her head into the crook of her arms, her fingers closed around the golden and violet charms that she wore at her throat. Link listened to the inwards gasp of her breath. "What if you found out that the sword that seals the darkness hadn't chosen you after all?"

The cream of mushroom stew finished its simmering. She divided it into three, leaving one third upon the fire, and offered the second third to the girl with the golden hair in a small blue bowl adorned with markings of the Goddess Hylia.

The girl with the golden hair narrowed her eyes, and grimaced, and turned away to curl up under the tree.

Upon Impa's return, the Princess's shade took her third of the stew from the fire. They ate in silence. The girl with the golden hair drank a vial of spring green elixir yet refused to touch the stew.

Somehow that stung Link worse than any muttered mark of malice or any sharpened sword to the stomach.

When she licks up the last of the stew from her tunic, she cleans out the pot as best she can by licking up the inside—remembering to butter the rim first so that she can pull her head back out without snapping her chin—but leaves the pot dirtied with the residue her tongue cannot pick up, for lack of water.

She'll have to clean it later. By the banks of the river. With a old friend at her back.

Urbosa always kept hers at her hip. Most did, really. But she at her back, for the sword that seals the darkness proved too long for her short limbs to keep it from dragging on the ground.

Lifting herself up from the ground, she removes from her back the cooking pot, the bow and its quiver of arrows, the sword, the spear, the satchel. She leaves the slate at her right hip and the trusty red telescope at her left. She unties and re-ties her ponytail, smooths her sidelocks, checks that her earrings sit evenly on her lobes. She quits, too, her boots, to let the soil warm her bare feet. The grasses tickle the underside; she wriggles her toes in the earth.

She rests her left foot against the smooth coolness of the pedestal, feeling the sensation of the moss that covers the stone, and then her right.

She steps forward.

The sword that seals the darkness. The blade of evil's bane. In a triangular groove on the pedestal. She stands at the point of the triangle, her left foot at its left face, her right foot at its right. The tip of the hilt reaches the level of her slowly beating heart.

Beat-beat-beat.

She breathes. She gazes at the hilt with its wings. She lifts her hands. She breathes in the scent of the silent princesses blooming by the pedestal. She brings her palms within a breath of the hilt.

"Hello," she says, "again."

She smiles, and she closes her eyes, and she takes the hilt in hand of the sword that seals the darkness, the blade of evil's bane, that one hundred years ago chose a child not yet of eighteen years to bear its weight upon her shoulders, that one hundred years chose a scrawny girl from farmland in the midst of nowhere over all of the nobles and knights of the castle to carry its burden, that one hundred years ago chose her.

Chose Link.

Before she drew the sword from the stone, no golden mark shone upon her left hand, and no nightmares of maelstroms or imprisoned calamities plagued her in her slumber, and no voice of the princess roused her from her sleep, as happened to the heroes in the legends. In the bedtime stories, as Aryll would say. In the songs, as Marin would say. In the books, as the girl who smelled of horses would say. In the warped mythology handed down over generations, if they happened at all, as the girl with the golden hair would say.

She takes the hilt in hand.

She braces herself.

She pulls.

And she feels, for the second time in her life, that completely and all-consuming pain.

A dull ache at first, like every bone in her body pulled on just a little too uncomfortably, like every joint stretched just below the point of cracking open, like every sinew and tendon strung out as if she were shooting up seven years of growth all at once. But she exhales, and she gathers herself, and she begins to pull the sword once more from the stone.

She pulls.

The agony worsens.
She can feel the tendons stretched to tearing, the sinews to shearing, the bones to breaking. She can feel the splintering of her blood vessels tautened beyond what pressure they can take. She can feel her innards disentangling from one another, can feel her intestines splitting open to burn through her entrails, can feel her skin swelled out until it begins to first flake and then slough off in great sheets, can feel the unbridled pain of the warm air kissing her raw flesh.

She pulls.

The agony worsens.

She can sense the pressure upon her heart, her arteries wrenched down and her veins up, and she can feel her heart thudding so desperately away even as the forces pull apart her spine to rip it through the line of her back between her shoulder blades, and one more second with her hands upon the hilt will burst her heart, the pain is buckling her knees and darkening her vision and it's everywhere and it's nowhere and it's worse worse worse than the Malice surrounding her to burn away her skin because the Malice coils inside her to dissolve her from the inside out and she—

—lets go.

The sword that seals the darkness, the blade of evil's bane, glides down into the triangular groove upon the pedestal. It makes no noise. It does not hum warmly beneath her fingertips. It does not vibrate with its soft blue glow. It does not resonate with the sound like the laughter of a little girl.

It lies cold, and silent, and absolutely still.

Resting within the pedestal, its blade the softened white of the flowers, its hilt the violet of the spirals that curl over her skin, its wings quiet on either side like the loftwings, messengers of the Golden Goddesses long, long ago.

She opens her palms.

She opens her eyes.

She opens herself.

Her hands. The palms curled in violet. Her right crimson with her own blood, her left spiralled in the gold of the lightning strike.

Courage, Kass called it. The symbol of the Goddess Farore.

But not courage enough for the sword that seals the darkness.

Not courage enough for the blade of evil's bane.

Not courage enough to lay down her life.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Link trying to use magnesis/stasis is a nod towards the Second Sight trial in Breath of the Wild.

Sarie's comments about being Link's navigator are in reference to Ocarina of Time, where humans require fairies (i.e. Navi, where Navi stands for Navigator) to not get lost in the woods. What Sarie is doing is preventing Link from going into the "foggy part" of the lost woods that causes Link to get kicked out in-game. What happens if a human tries to go in without a korok guide? You'll see.

I accidentally got into the lost woods and figured out the trick with the wind and the torch all by myself; I was astounded at how intuitive the entire sequence was. It reminded me so deeply of A Link to the Past that I nearly wept. I do truly believe that the proper place for the Master Sword is in a forest grove. The Temple of Time just doesn't do it for me. Twilight Princess had the right idea of it, although they should have sought to actually make the place feel like a forest and not had the weird puzzle for the entrance. I actually really like the puzzle—I think it's a lot of fun—but it should've been some optional heart piece, like the more difficult sliding ice block puzzle, rather than the thing you do right before the Master Sword.

In A Link to the Past, you can find a mushroom in the lost woods; in Link's Awakening, the mystery woods reveal a sleepy toadstool. The bunnies and birds that part as Link enters the sacred grove are lifted from A Link to the Past.

Link has never been here before and there's no reincarnation in this fic. Rather what Link is feeling is...well, have you ever felt a strange melancholy when you enter an old (not your own) house and find everything covered in dust, or when you see photographs of people far older than you when they were young? It's a shared kind of nostalgia. It also has to do with what Link has mentioned feeling before, that sense of dissolution, because the place pangs with the power of [REDACTED due to spoilers]. It's not her accessing memories of a past life or something, because that isn't a thing in Delicious in Wilds.

So, essentially, the koroks repeatedly lose their memories and find it difficult to keep anything in their heads. I should distinguish here between episodic and semantic memory. The koroks know their semantic memory just fine; it's their episodic memory that they cannot remember. Nor are the koroks really immortal, just impossibly long-lived, like some trees.

You can't eat anything in Ocarina of Time! Link drinks potions, sure, and (at least in Majora's Mask, and I think in Ocarina of Time, too, though it's been a while since I played that game as a kid) the little mark for how many "dashes" Epona has left is a carrot, thus the comment about the carrot. If not for Saria, I wouldn't have mentioned Ocarina of Time Link at all, but you know, I've always wondered what happened to the kokiri we knew when they became koroks.

The pink-furred rabbit Link meets in the underbrush is a nod to the fact that Link turns into a pink rabbit in A Link to the Past.

And, well, wow, but this chapter is a massive set-back for Link's psyche. She'd gotten so good. And now...

Who ever said that Link had to be the one to wield the Master Sword?

Beta reader's comments: Poor Link. The end of this chapter is just soul-crushing. It's actually kinda my fault; I suggested to the author that, after Link's personal character development victory in Lanayru, she needed another conflict to carry her through the last act of the story. Sorry, Link.

The way the Lost Woods are portrayed here is really neat. Very atmospheric.

Chapter Summary

Rejected by the sword that seals the darkness, the blade of evil's bane, the travelling chef returns to travelling with the Eldic youth and the travelling minstrel. They finish their journey to Medli, where the chef reunites with some familiar faces.

Chapter Notes

To all of my readers: back to your regularly scheduled Delicious in Wilds, for the few of you reading alongside updates.

In response to a comment on the FFN cross-posted version of this fic, I wrote the following that you might find interesting, with respect to Sarie/Saria: That said, I chose to do what I did in order to (1) shed on light on why exactly the koroks are so...korok all the time, in the sense that they're seemingly carefree and joyous tree spirits who have little to no concept of stuff going on outside Korok Forest in-game beyond vague mentions of cool weapons or that the hero needs something about the shrines. But they have no understanding of it as urgency. The virtue of the Goddess Kokir is joy; the koroks essentially keep their temperament by having no memories. This is in turn a moment of understanding for Link, who has tried to run away from her own memories, but now has accepted them, and so now gets to see what her own experiences were like from a third-person perspective.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

She leaves the woods opposite of the way she came: with the wind at her back; with her guide in her tunic rather than clutching her finger; with every anchor that held her to the earth cut away, like cucco stew without the cucco, like curry rice without the spice. She expects the woods to take her. She expects the cuccoflesh over her body to worsen, shivers giving way to shudders, until she walks into the mist and the fog swallows her whole. The wind nudges her along; she lets it push her wherever it wants her to go.

Instead, when she emerges onto the shore of the lake surrounding the lost woods, on a small strait of land that curves down near a tower, she cranes her neck up to find the ripened full moon where she left it, to find the stars in their positions, to find that the world goes on with or without her.

She walks with her companion in her tunic. If she closes her eyes, she could forget, forget what happened, forget what that means.

She has calmed the four Divine Beasts. She has borne the slate. Since the moment she set foot upon the waking world from the Shrine of Resurrection, everyone she knows has only ever told her to walk forward, has only ever told her that she can do it, has only ever told her that they believe in her.

And yet.
And yet. She carries the slate but anyone could. She has come across shrine after shrine solved by people other than herself, whose only challenge lies in not having the proper tool for the situation, whose only challenge comes from not having the slate to fit in the identical depressions in the identical faces of the identical pedestals.

Like the king—like the father of the girl with the golden hair—and like the nobles of the royal family, and like Impa, maybe everyone has clung to the legend of the hero: sent by the Goddesses and chosen by the sword that seals the darkness to smite the Calamitous One once and for all.

But maybe the Calamitous One no longer exists. Or maybe the Goddesses have chosen someone else, not her, to carry the blade of evil's bane, and she has gone the way of all of the knights and all of the nobles, bitter and downwards-cast from her rejection by the sword that seals the darkness. Or maybe Glepp, and the Yiga, understand the truth. Maybe she has fought for naught. She does not know how many of the people to whom she has entrusted her life could themselves be Yiga, could themselves wish demise upon the world, could themselves strangle her if they realised that she carried the slate.

The sins of the world. The Calamitous One: the Purifier, sent by the Goddesses. The Princess who did not unseal the magic within her bloodline, and the Knight who fell away from the world for one hundred years.

If only she could remember the eve of the Great Calamity—

She walks. She walks towards the Divine Beast Vah Rudania throughout the night. Setting the grass around her aflame, she pushes herself skyward by an updraft and lands upon the back of the Divine Beast. She manages to alight on a limb. As she runs up the slippery material, balancing desperately to keep from falling, she trips at the top and greets the Divine Beast with her face and chest, which wakes her companion in her tunic.

"Link?" they croon, in the voice of wooden blocks tumbling against one another. "Why is Sarie so warm and where have all the lights gone? Did the sunny-sun go out?"

Tiredly, tiredly, she gazes blankly ahead.

She climbs back in through the entrance in the head of the Divine Beast. She passes by a few travellers in the Divine Beast, similarly awake at this time of night, who cook, or read, or embroider, or polish their weapons, or 'polish' their 'weapons' and who apologise hastily when she nears or sit in stony silence until she has passed without so much as a glance towards them, or talk quietly amongst themselves, or rest in the sauna.

She walks on. Or at least towards her bed. Ilia, perhaps roused by the taps of her boot heels against the floor of the Divine Beast, whinnies at her; she lifts her hands up to hush her, but little more.

Curling up on the bed, she starts to tuck the blanket in around herself in lieu of an embrace, but the fatigue has sapped the strength from her fingers.

Somehow, she welcomes the shivers that tremble her body.

She awakens in the morning, and they call her Link. Link. Link from Ordon. She corrects them: Link from Romani Ranch of Kotake.

Isn't this what she wanted?

Just a person again. Just herself again. Everything that she has done, she has done by her own hands with the slate. The Goddesses have not chosen her. Coincidence, and chance, and yet why does her heart feel as if she pulled up the sword that seals the darkness a fraction too long?

This is what she wanted. Finally, finally, to simply be able to be, without the burden of fate, without the weight of destiny, without all of the heavens pressed down upon her shoulders.

So then, why...?

Why...?

Kass, Yunobo, and Sarie alike ask her if she has fallen ill. She shrugs and stays under the covers. Kass, ever worried, remains by her side the entire rest of the relatively brief journey towards Medli, stroking her hair, trying his hand at cooking for her very badly, offering to play the accordion for her until one of the guards threatens him with a boot to the face. "I suppose that you cannot please anyone," Kass comments, setting his accordion away, "but never have I met a beast so beastly that not even music could tame it. A first for everything." She buries her face in the pillow.

Yunobo comes to see her at night when he does not pilot the Divine Beast. Anxiously he inquires if something within the Divine Beast Vah Rudania has gone amiss, or if she does not like something within, or if the guards have proven cruel to her, or anything that might be the matter. "It's the food, right? It's the food! You d-don't like the food, right...? I m-mean, this is the first time I've s-seen you not eat for a wh-whole day!"

Kass takes Yunobo aside. She listens to them discussing her. Kass explains quietly about their visit to Ordon, about the village destroyed, about how he thought the traveller to have recovered, but maybe the fullness of the tragedy has only just hit her. "Maybe she...not to use one of her analogies, but have you ever hungered yet found that your provisions empty, but you cannot bear to admit it to yourself? And so, instead, you open and close your bag repeatedly in the hopes that if you simply endeavour to open your bag enough, some meal will magically appear in the depths?"

"Huh? Oh...I think I've felt like th-that before, with the lava-box in my r-room."

"I suspect...something like that. As long as she remained in Ordon, then she could one day awaken and see the people that have passed on still around her. Now that she has left, after the Yiga's attack, she has had to come to terms that Ordon truly is gone." She listens to Kass shift. "But there's something that bothers me about this, because she seemed perfectly fine after we spoke about her past."

Sarie kookoos. "Sarie thinks something happened! But Sarie doesn't know! Sarie doesn't remember! Like there's a big fog in Sarie's head! Floof knows her better than Sarie. Sarie is only Sarie, after all."

She closes her hand around the ocarina. She could play the minuet again, the lullaby that the girl with the golden hair taught her. She could try the other songs that the girl with the golden hair played for her, the odes to the other Goddesses.

Yet Sarie asked her to let them be happy for a time. Even if only Sarie has seen what happened in the woods. Even if only they could share the tightness in her chest. Even if only they know her memories, where no one else does.

She slackens her fingers. The ocarina rolls out and over the edge of the bed to clatter to the floor.

She forces herself to rise from the bed, though her bones waver on emptiness. She forces herself to eat, though the food falls to dust on her tongue. She forces herself to cook, though her meals come out shades of green and violet.

She hears the whispers of the guards. She's the one who helped their Yuno-yunobo calm their Divine Beast Vah Ruda-rudania?

Although the journey riding hard from Kakariko to Medli took her over a month, the Divine Beast's brisk pace and massive trods shorten the trek to a mere week or so. She spends the days pacing up and down the Divine Beast. The blade of evil's bane did not actually injure her, at least not physically. The pain all in the mind and in the heart. Yet she senses, down in her bones, a lingering ache that she cannot shake.

By the time the Divine Beast Vah Rudania reaches Medli, the soles of her feet no longer pang when she walks. Kass inquires again if something troubles her. "As I have given my troubles to you, traveller, so you, too, can give your troubles to me, if so you desire." He pats his accordion case. "I will even play for you if you'd like, whatever our fellow travellers say." She nods.

He plays for her the Ballad of the Sealing War, and he plays for her his rendition of Epona's song and Ilia's whistle, and he plays for her Sarie's song to which she once danced for its hot beat, and then he plays for her merrier tunes. He talks of Amali, of Notts and of Kotts, of Cree and of Genli, and of Kheel, his daughter who has always loved music the most, who would struggle to stay up to listen long after her sisters drifted off, fighting off sleep for one more melody, one more measure, one more note. He demonstrates for her a song that Kheel wrote a few months ago. Not very good, and not much more than an etude going up and down the scales a few times and ending on the base note. Or so Kass tells her. She has only ever known music in where her fingers fall upon the ocarina, in the motions of her hands. She plays like she gestures when she speaks; just as language translates her motions to words, so too do instruments translate her motions to sound, to song.

She does not know of the reading of sheet music, or what means an octave, or a base note, or especially not an etude. She knows the harp, and she knows the ocarina, and she knows how to speak on them, and that is all she needs.

As she does not know the fancy word for everything she cooks. As she does not know the proper techniques. As she barely even knows what equipment or utensils chefs are supposed to use outside of her cooking pot and her weapons repurposed for the act of creation. She know what tastes good, and she knows what feels good, and she knows what brings smiles to the faces around her, and that is enough.

"Then, why not cook something? Cook something for all of us." Kass spreads out his wings. "This is our last night together before you see your...friends in Medli, yes? I take it that you will go with Yunobo."

She could sink back into the pillow and cover her head with the cooking pot. She could eat enough until her neck thickens and not even all of the butter in the world could force her head out. She could live the rest of her life like that. With the cooking pot on her head.

But she made a promise to see Koko and Cottla again. She has to thank them for the pumpkin, and for the carrots, and for bringing back Aryll to her, forgotten in the fog. And she wants to see their smiles again.

"Traveller?"

She lifts up her hands. "*Are you leaving after I go to Medli? I'll leave Medli at some point. I won't take too long." Though she has little reason to hunt, now, for shrines.
Even if the sword that seals the darkness has rejected her, she has little else to do. She could at the very least bring Kass back to Medli. If she accompanies him on his quest for shrines and helps him fulfill his promise, then she can impart one small bit of good upon the world.

Kass parts his beak. "You're talking again," he says, closing his beak again. Then he opens it once more. "I'm glad to hear that. Well, not hear it, seeing as you sign, but...to see it, shall we say." He coughs. "As for Medli, I will wait outside. There is a village just before the border up onto the Pillars of Erito. When you finish, find me there, so that we may continue for the shrines." He pauses: a delicate silence. "Ah, assuming you still wish to do so, of course. I would understand if not."

"I do," she signs immediately.

To have a purpose.

"I like to travel, and I've got my own reasons for travelling. You're a great companion, too."

His cheeks darken as his face flushes; he holds his wing in front of his beak. "Mm. If you say so, traveller. I'm heartened to see you in brighter spirits. I hope that whatever ails you soon leaves you be."

She does not have the heart to tell him that it has already left her be, and that that its leaving is what ails her. Yet now Ilia has started to once more browse in her hair, and Link leans up to stroke her mane and feel her companion's heartbeat against her palm.

Her meals: enough.

Her friends: enough.

All of this: enough.

They reach Medli at the close of the autumn evening. Yunobo parks the Divine Beast Vah Rudania by the village outside of the city. As they walk out, Link notices the Divine Beast Vah Naboris also waiting quietly by the village. She scopes out Medli.

There, at the very tippity top of the tallest Pillar of Erito, perches the Divine Beast Vah Medoh. Link can only hope that no lizalfos has gotten its head shoved into one of the segments of the tail.

The entourage moves out. Some—especially the gorons who do not well tolerate the cold—remain inside of the Divine Beast Van Rudania while Yunobo goes off to report. Others—wrapped in many, many layers inlaid with ruby freshly warmed by the bowels of Death Mountain—waddle off towards Medli and some of the surrounding encampments for shore leave. The general barks for them not to get involved in too much mischief but otherwise sits back and approves everyone with a yup.

By the time the morning sun has finally begun to rise to clear away the fog over Lake Totori, the entourage has reached the last bridge on the trek towards the main body of Medli curled around the larger Pillars of Erito.

Yunobo himself resembles a massive snowball. The layers upon layers of feather- and ruby-lined fabric over his body bring him great difficulty in motion. Like a buttered apple. "It'd b-be so much easier if I could roll," he jokes, waddling from side to side in front of his entourage.

Link keeps apace with him, Ilia having remained in the stable, Sarie—as Sarie, and not as the one with the other name born of those memories, though the two are one and the same—riding on her right shoulder and braiding her sidelock.

"If you lie down on your side, I could roll you up like that," she offers.

Yunobo chuckles. He scratches his jaw. "I wouldn't mind you doing that b-but...that wouldn't m-make a good impression, right?"

Link touches her chin. "Everyone in Ruto saw me on the back of their Divine Beast. My friend Sarie was pretending to ride me like a horse. I don't really know what a good impression is, but everyone there still treats me well, I think...? I'm no good at reading people."

"You're p-plenty good at reading me. You've always been there for me when I needed a pep talk!" Yunobo attempts to hug her through the layers of clothing but cannot actually move his arms enough to close the circle. Link giggle-snorts and embraces him back as best she can, which more so involves just awkwardly extending her arms as far as she can reach.

"I really never said anything. You always gave yourself those pep talks. I think you should take some pride in that."

Scratching his jaw, he blushes bright orange. "You're w-way too nice to me, Link."

"Yuno-yunobo," she says.

"S-stop."

"O Powerful Yuno-yunobo."

He tries to cover his face with his hands but fails. Link squirrels up his fluffed body to perch on his shoulders and cover his face for him. Sarie twirls around them giggling as Yunobo wobbles his arms, mumbling about impressions. The rest of the entourage is caught between differing expressions of smile and laughter. Sarie rides on Link rides on Yunobo into Medli.

This high up, the crowds bother her less, when she can breathe fresh air and close her ears from the noise. She dares not shut her eyes. Instead Link looks, and looks. When they pass by the residential areas, she spies Amali's house with its accordion-painted door. Link spots the windchimes that sing the city to life. Lowering her eyelids, she listens to their song. She can see where the people of Medli have begun to repair their city. Not yet to expand, not yet to grow anew, but to heal the damage done.

Enough, for now. Enough.

Abruptly Link hears screaming. Screaming that she knows. Screaming that gets her to nearly twist off Yunobo's head with how swiftly she snaps her entire body in the direction of those yells. Yunobo attempts to throw his arms out for balance, but—wrapped in so many layers—his arms already stick out at vertical angles. With a bwoh! Yunobo topples over in the street; Link and Sarie spill out; and suddenly her entire world becomes one of fluff and feather and warmth.

Notts and Kotts and Genli and Kheel and Cree and Tulin and Cottla and Koko surround her. They touch her and hug her and chatter at her all at once and ask her for food and ask her where she's been and ask her about the violet swirls all over her body and ask her about the scar under her left eye and ask her about the handprint-scar on her stomach—Link pulls down her tunic and tugs Kotts's head out from her undershirt—and ask her for food and ask her about the fancy sword on her back and ask her about the silver on her cooking pot and ask her about the lightning-strike scar on her hand and ask her if she wants to listen to their singing later since she couldn't before and ask her if she has seen the big horsey thing outside of Medli and ask her if she's seen Kass on the road again and ask her for food and ask her when Kass will return home and ask her how she's so good to them that she brought them from Kakariko to Medli and ask her if she has any food from Kakariko to share and ask her if she's seen their mother and ask her about what she's done with the other Divine Beasts and ask her if she could tell him more about Revali later and ask her to catch more salmon for her and ask her for food.

Link introduces Yunobo and Sarie to them all, and them all to Yunobo and Sarie. Kotts and Notts immediately flutters up to nest on either side of Yunobo's throat. "He's warm!" says Kotts, and Notts bobs her head. "He's warm!"

All together Link, Kotts, Notts, Genli, Kheel, Cree, Tulin, Koko, and Cottla push together and help right Yunobo to standing, although they cannot quite force him up, and then—they do, as if another force suddenly joined in. Link stands up and wipes her brow only to catch a flash of white feathers.

"Welcome back, Link," says Teba, beak curved into a smile of welcome; Link claps her hand over her own mouth. "It's been a while. And greetings, O Powerful Yunobo."

"Should I cover your face again?" Link asks Yunobo.

"Sarie has it covered!" Sarie calls out, placing their tiny hands over Yunobo's much larger cheeks.

Teba and his brown-feathered friend Harth, a carver of bows and fletcher of arrows, joins the entourage up. The children pile beside Link on Yunobo's shoulders in a wobbling pyramid, Cottla and Koko clinging to Link's sides; Kotts and Notts hanging off of her shoulders; Genli perched like a queen upon her head; and Kheel, Cree, and Tulin halfway on her back and arms and halfway flapping themselves up in the air for support.

Link promises them all, very solemnly, to make meals as soon as she sees Yunobo off.
Immediately the children start fighting with one another over which meal to have, while Kheel, Cree, Tulin, and Koko try to mediate the heated arguments. Link claps her hands together.

"I'll make them all," she declares. The children cheer. Yunobo almost falls over again; Tulin moves to balance him.

Teba falls into step to inquire about goings-on with the Yiga. Link leans over and asks about Amali. He inclines his head. "I should hope that you have a chance to talk to her yourself. She has been meaning to make amends." Link blinks, tilting her head. Amends? "She's doing well. She has a warrior's heart and, though I never would have guessed, a warrior's strength."

"What about...Dorian?"

"The informant?"

Link squeezes Koko and Cottla more tightly to her. Where before, so curled up by her sides, their heads would not have reached her armpits, now they lean themselves against her shoulders. "Thank you for taking care of Cottla and Koko. It means the world to me."

"You should thank Amali for that. She believed him the moment she saw the letter from you, saying that no one else would use so many allusions to food." Link smiles sheepishly. "As for caring for them...well now, they've become fast friends with Amali's own, and my son. Although, Saki despairs of having had to remodel our home to make accommodations for sheikah." He chuckles drily. "She told me, after meeting Koko, that she would not much mind a daughter of her own."
One of the other gorons slaps a hand on Teba's back hard enough to bowl the lightweight rito man over. "Go get 'er, champ. Not every day you can get to makin' babies." Teba makes a strangled sound in his throat. Harth pats his shoulder.

As the morning climbs, more and more Tabanch and travellers alike take to the streets of Medli. They whoop and cheer, point and whisper, hold up their shorter children or siblings or friends to see the Champion of Goro-goro and the Champion of Hylia.

Champion of Hylia.

Link waves back even as the epithet to which she no longer bears a right compresses down her heart again. She thought she understood her place. She thought she was, perhaps, the Champion of Hylia, the Hero of Hyrule, Her Majesty's Knight, O Courageous Link. So said the King Zora.

Yet the blade of evil's bane that chose her one hundred years rejects her now. As if she were two different...

"—and then Miss Link started dancing all around trying to get the darner off her tongue," says Genli. "I've never seen Mom laugh that hard before!" Koko and Cottla giggle; Link affectionately pets their heads. She notices with a sudden intake of breath that Genli no longer refers to herself as Genli but as I. She gazes at them, the children, who have grown in her absence.

"Mother," Cree interjects indignantly, "was only trying to help!"

"How can someone not like darners?" Tulin bursts in, so aghast that Cottla howls in laughter.

"No one eats darners dumdum!" Her Tabanch clumsy and heavily accented by Necludan, Cottla reaches over to bat Tulin's face with her hand while Koko whispers a horrified Cottla! "Do you eat fireflies too!?"

Tulin's burgeoning crest feathers flare up. "You don't!?"

Link bursts out laughing. Sarie, Yunobo, and the children all look to her once. Her face reddens, but she can only cling to Yunobo's head as the mirth rips through her.

Everything will be all right. So long as she lives; as long as the sun, the moon, and the earth exist, she will be all right.

They reach the higher levels on the tallest Pillar of Erito that still stands. The tallest, Link realises, must have fallen during the Calamity, or else during the hundred years. Link leans out from Yunobo to gaze at the entire city.

Up and up and at the highest point in all of Medli, she finds Chief Kaneli's home. Not a palace, but a rounded hut of painted wood as simple as all the rest in the city, if a tad larger. The entourage salutes Yunobo, who enters with a letter clutched proudly in his hand. Link attempts to slope off of Yunobo to gaze at the entire city.

Up and up and at the highest point in all of Medli, she finds Chief Kaneli's home. Not a palace, but a rounded hut of painted wood as simple as all the rest in the city, if a tad larger. The entourage salutes Yunobo, who enters with a letter clutched proudly in his hand. Link attempts to slope off of Yunobo's head, yet the weight of the children causes her to slip. Fortunately her feathered friends hold her and the flightless sheikah girls aloft long enough to land safely on the ground.

With the children surrounding her, Link beams up at Yunobo, who gestures for her to follow him inside.

Link rubs the back of her head. "Can you come...get me when you finish all your important talks? I don't want to interrupt."

"Take your time, L-link." Yunobo winks. "It looks like you've got your hands full with something else, right?"

He vanishes into Chief Kaneli’s home. From within, Link can hear the voices of those she knows: Dorian, and Riju—her heart squeezes—and of course Yunobo. She pictures Amali there as well, signing away with a newfound purpose in this life beyond waiting for Kass to return.

Link wonders what Kass would, or will, say when he discovers all that has happened in his absence. Her eyes widen: she still has not spoken a word to him about his wife becoming the Champion of Erito, the Hero of Tabantha, the Divine Beast Vah Medoh’s Pilot, O Powerful Amali.

Disentangling herself from the group of children, she creeps towards the side of Kaneli’s home and presses her ear against the door. The guards that flank the door look at her, then at each other; they shrug.

Link listens to the muffled sounds of her friends discussing matters of the Yiga and beyond. She hears Yunobo, beside himself with glee, promising to share something with them at the close of the meeting. She observes them talk of the Divine Beast Vah Ruta and whether they should send delegates to Ruto to see if the Divine Beast has awakened. Riju notes that she has heard reports of frequent rains that have disrupted trade in Lanayru, but she does not know if the rain connects to the Divine Beasts. Yunobo reports that passing goron have heard of the Prince of Ruto—"Huh, what was his name? Sit-on, right?"—seeking a hylian courageous enough to brave some sort of prophecy. Chief Kaneli acknowledges Amali’s contribution, that Link herself might already have gone that way with her nose "not only for food, but also for Divine Beasts," and Riju, snapping her fingers, notes that Link did mention a fourth Divine Beast.

"So, I'm certain that she's already gone ahead of us," Riju says, her voice quiet, "and if that's the case, the Lanayrish are in capable and undoubtedly food-scented hands, thank the Goddesses."

Link blushes hotly enough that she moves her face away from the door lest her cheek melt through the wood.

"No amount of discussing Link will guide her to our door," Dorian comments in his level voice. "She has a tendency to show up just when the Goddesses need her to, and not a second before."

"Not even if we bait her with an excellent meal?" Riju offers. Link hears Amali laugh while Yunobo taps his index fingers against one another.

Coughing loudly and calling the meeting back to order, Kaneli records a decision to approach the Lanayrish and offer support.

On the topic of the Yiga, Yunobo describes the plunge towards Akkala.

"We haven't gotten all of th-them," he admits, "but we've c-captured most."

Riju reports on similar success in the highlands north of Parapa and along the western front of the Faronese grasslands. Kaneli sums up all of their remarks, including Amali’s about Tabantha and Hebra.

"I see that much of the threat has been eliminated, and the Yiga shall soon be nothing more than hoo. Splendid! This war is practically over!"

And then talk turns to the cessation of the hunt for the Yiga. Most of the surroundings areas—save for Lanayru, eastern Faron, and the lands immediately surrounding the castle—have borne the brunt of the search. With so few Yiga still kicking, as Yunobo puts it, perhaps the time has come.
Kaneli inquires about the state of monsters in each of their lands. Riju speaks of efforts to plant trees to recede the desert, even if the constant encroaching of monsters has made efforts difficult. "Even with Vah Naboris now guided by my hand," she says, and Link can hear the heartbreak in her voice, "my people continue to suffer." Her voice hardens. "But I believe that the Yiga are a more immediate and pressing manner. We have them on the run, thank the Goddesses. Then, if we allow them to regroup..."

Yunobo cuts in. "B-but they're powerless in this state, right? And...I still have to take care of my brothers. As their Champion, I h-have to watch over Eldin. We've been working on the Yiga f-for months. Isn't it t-time we took care of ourselves?"

Dorian clears his throat. "If I may remind you, in exchange my information, I was promised safety for myself and my innocent daughters, who know nothing of any of this. As long as the Yiga remain...whom can we trust? Any traveller could be—!"

Chief Kaneli grunts. "And hoo might harm you? Your safety is more than assured."

"Then, what of the travellers?" Link can hear in Riju's voice how the Queen of Parapa draws herself up to stand tallest amongst them despite her relatively short stature. "While we cannot trust our own neighbours, while we must turn away any merchant or stranger at our doors, then we will never reunite as once we did."

"Huh? I d-don't think that the Yiga are in a position to try anything right now, right?"

Riju exhales. "I do not wish to call any of you ignorant, much the less selfish. We have all contributed passionately to the protection of both our people and the one another's. Yet, may I remind you that the Yiga headquartered for years closest to my people. So, we have been the hardest hit." Link hears murmurs of assent. "Then, listen well. The Goddesses have given us the very Beasts Divine with which to protection our people. We still do not understand much of the monsters, yet the Goddesses have not granted the Yiga these same boons. So, they continue to be the perfect target. I do not suggest that we should hunt them down to the last, although that is what they deserve. However...there may still be entire untapped pockets in Faron, Lanayru, and Necluda. Then, we cannot yet end our search."

"Forgive me, Queen Riju, but hoo is to say that this spirit of justice is not a manifestation of you seeking revenge for what they did to your—"

Hastily Yunobo intervenes: "We're all thinking about our p-people, as we should be, for we are th-their Champions, right? Th-then maybe we could compromise, right? Queen Riju, if you think that what's b-best for your people is to continue hunting the Yiga, y-you have Vah Nabo-naboris. And the rest of us can help our own."

"Then, what of the people outside of us, who do not have the luxury of the Beasts Divine? What of the Necludans, the Faronese—?"

"Amali and Riju," Dorian proposes, his voice deep yet strangely calm, "are right. Even if we are fine, the Yiga may still torment in great swathes people outside of those under the direct protection of these Divine Beasts. We know of their hideout in Parapa. What of the possibility of other such meeting palces on the other side of the land?"

"And for hoom would that be easiest to say than he who has no people but the Yiga themselves?" She hears Dorian make a resonant sound in his throat. "With that said, I can see the appeal in your proposal, Amali." Link listens to sighs of relief. "We will move to search southern Necluda, eastern Faron, and Lanayru once we come in touch with the Lanayrish. After that, we will turn our attentions—with the aid of Prince Sit-on—to the dilemma of monsters and malice. All in favour, say aye."

"Aye."

"Aye."

"Aye...suppose."

"Splendid! This meeting is practically over! Now..." The congregation begins to speak of logistics; the heat of argument gives way to cooler, calmer speech.

Link sits back. Sarie perches on her nose, clapping their hands on Link's brow and scrounging together her eyebrows. She arches her eyebrows at Sarie, who unnghs and tries harder to knit them into one. "What are you doing, Sarie?"

"Link's eyebrows look like caterpillars!" Sarie declares, "and Sarie wants to see them kiss!" Link snorts; then she laughs a light little laugh, scrunching her eyebrows together as best she can.

"Miss Link, are you eavesdropping? Mother says it's not good to eavesdrop."

Link glances up at Kheel, her eyebrows still scrunched together, Sarie attempting to push them into a unibrow; she's certain that she looks the spitting image of a supposed Champion. "You're right." She lifts herself to her boots.

The children ask her a thousand questions about where she's been. Link touches her chin. "I'll answer all of those questions, I promise, but first..." Her stomach rumbles and she rests a hand over her belly. "...who wants some food?"

At the unanimous wave of hands, except for a dozing Kotts whose twin elbows her in the rib until Kotts hiccoughs awake and lifts her wing as well, Link retrieves the cooking pot from her back and thumps it against the wood. Immediately do not only the children perk up, but also the remainder of the entourage as well as those guarding Kaneli's home.

"Now, what do my little sisters and brother want today?" It occurs to her that Tulin now stands taller than she does. Perhaps younger brother rather than little. Link glances in his direction, gauging his reaction, but she finds nothing but a warm shine in his eyes and the ruffled feathers of pleasant shock around his face.

"You...consider me like a brother?" Tulin beams. "I've never had an older sister before, but this means I can force you to teach me all kind of tricks with the bow, doesn't it!?"

Link rubs the back of her head. "I don't know what I teach you better than your father, but I sure can try and fail."

"It's all right!" His eyes have grown wide, his wings pumping up and down in his excitement. "My father knows all about the traditions of Erito, but I don't know anything about those of Hylia! Like hylian bomb fishing, I'm sure there's so much you could teach me!"

Genli shoves Tulin over. "She has to make me some salmon first."

Cottla pouts. "But she promised me buttered apples and she's the best big sis ever so she'd never ever go back on a promise!"

"I'll make everyone everything," Link says for the second time that day, "but I don't have "salmon or apples or anything else on me right now. You know what I do have?"

"What?" crows Notts, as Kotts sleeps against her shoulder.

"I've got a cooking pot and I've got my hands."

Sarie jumps up and down on Link's head. "And Link has Sarie! Sarie knows all about cooking. Who wants some loam? Anyone? Anyone? Sarie knows how to make other stuff too! Clay, and soil, and lots and lots of dirt. You know what they say!" They sing out: "There's no such thing as home, without a plate of loam!"

"What's loam?" inquires Koko, tilting her head.

"It's like dirt that's super-good for gardens. That is, very fertile soil." Cree responds. She preens her own chest. "You're welcome."

"Ooh." Koko scratches her head. "Thank you!"

Cree blinks rapidly. "Someone actually thanked me...for the knowledge..."

Kotts sticks her tongue out. "Who wants to eats dirt?"

"You mean—" Notts affects a deeper voice and touches her wings in a circle in front of her belly as though emulating a fat stomach. "—hoo wants to eat dirt?" She waddles back and forth; the children around her laugh except for Kheel, who puts her wings to her mouth and shakes her head.

"We shouldn't make fun...I know! Let's sing something together instead. La da dee—"

Someone shoves her; someone else yells; the children squabble. Link claps her hands with same the thunderous crack of an armoured carp's scales popped in two. "We're going to make something for everyone in there. C'mere and help me plan."

Something to bring together everyone in the room. Something to bring together Necluda, Eldin, Tabantha, and Parapa. She touches her chin with her other hand. And if only Prince—she snorts—Sit-on were here, she would include something from Lanayru as well.

Link reflects the times that Sidon bore her on his back, or when she scaled up his body to sit upon his shoulders. She has, indeed, sat on Prince Sit-on. A name so appropriate it edges out Sarie's monicker of Teeth.

Sarie shookooloos sadly. "First no one wants Sarie's dirt. Now Link doesn't want Sarie's name..."

"Why don't you have a name for me, Sarie?"

Sarie pets Link's nose. "Link's already a funny enough name that Sarie couldn't top it!" They giggle with the sound of wooden blocks tumbling together. Link remembers the ocarina lying on the floor of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania, and her knuckles whiten on the rim of the cooking pot. She lets herself breathe out.

Food first. Fickle fate later.

Then, with the help of the children, she begins to set out the ingredients pilfered from the dining halls of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania: Necludan rice, Parapan hydromelon, Tabanch cool safflina, Eldic spices. Link gazes at the spice in her right palm and at the hydromelon and safflina in her left. The combination of heat and cold. The fusion of flame and ice. And all bedded down in that glorious texture of steamed rice and fattened to a peak of deliciousness on the glory of Parapan seal butter.

While she cooks, Sarie proceeds to come up with shorthand names for everyone, though some—as Genli points out—end up longer than the original. "Greeny Floofy should try to come up with names half as good, then!" Sarie counters.

Link could waltz into Kaneli's home and ask Riju for her handy portable flame-starter, but instead she inquires if anyone has rubies. A few of the guards chip in to help her erect a makeshift firepit, a blanket inlaid with rubies as the firewood. First she sautées the rice in her cooking pot in the seal butter until the rice has goldened to the same colour as the sunrise that she saw rise over Riju's head. Then Link sets the water to boil in her cooking pot. She scoops in the sautéed rice prior to mincing cool safflina and hydromelon rind.

With the knife taken from the poet's cabin back on the plateau, Link cuts out the icy-juicy hydromelon meat that would not do well in rice. She passes the slices around to the children, who bite down. In retrospect, eating something so refreshingly cold in the midst of the Tabanch late-autumn indicates well why her epithet, if the blade of evil's bane were to choose her once more, could never be O Wise Link.

Neither, perhaps, could Cottla, who slaps her hands to her head. "Cottla's got a brain freeze!"

Notts and Kotts dance around her. "Cottla's got a brain freeze! Cottla's got a brain freeze!" they chant. Kotts skids to a spot while Notts keeps going and knocks her over. "What's a brain freeze?"

Genli huffs. "No she doesn't. She'd need a brain for that. And I don't think someone who'd shove practically a block of ice in your mouth when you can see snow 'cross the lake could have much of a brain!"

"That's Koko's little sister you just said had no brain!"

While Tulin pulls the scuffling sheikah and rito girls apart, Link grins. She stirs cool safflina and hydromelon rind into the rice, alongside onion and cloves. Sprinkling in the Eldic spices with a dash of salt and hint of paprika, she closes the lid and leaves the curry pilaf to cook to perfection, then glances over at Sarie on her shoulder, to whom she gave a piece of hydromelon.

Sarie: currently frozen in a block of ice.

With the ugliest hh of shocked inhalation she has ever breathed in, both hands pressing into her chin at once, Link seizes Sarie and drinks them headfirst into the steaming rice.

The curry rice warms their body. The ice melts and shatters; they spring out yelling "Yahaha!" as they knock against the rim of the pot. Link throws herself forward, taking the pot into her embrace. Sarie smacks directly into her face and bounces back into the rice before twirling up through the air and gripping their head. Link checks on the rice: safe.

When the pilaf has softened—the art of cooking has taught her patience if nothing else—Link realises that she has no bowls. Nonetheless the children have hands that they cup to receive the pilaf in. To Cree and to Kheel; to Genli and to Tulin; to Notts and to Kotts; to Cottla and to Koko; to Sarie and to the guards that have waited patiently. Link waits, her breath silenced on her tongue, as she watches their expressions.

They break into smiles, into tipped back heads, into licked lips, into cheeks puffed with pilaf, into thanks, into passing around the spice and salt to one another and garnishing the pilaf to their hearts' content. The arguments die down; the tensions melt away. They laugh, and they nudge one another, and they share pilaf, and they beam, and they sit back with warm bellies. Link closes her eyes and listens: the quickest way to someone's heart is through their stomach.

With Urbosa's wise words, with Daruk's encouragement, with Revali's hmph but one-eyed glance of approval, with Mipha's promise to heal if she should fall to injury, with the girl with the golden hair's wince of do you really want to do this, Link squared her shoulders and presented herself at the door of the chambers of the girl with the golden hair, where stood Impa.

Impa's face remained as stone. "Has Her Majesty need of something?"

Link shook her head.

"Then why do you bother me?"

I want to know, Link asked, summoning all of her courage, what your favourite food is."

Impa lowered her eyelids. Link counted that a success. "None that you would know how to make. Now, do not waste your time or Her Majesty's with such fancies. Leave."

Link turned, then, to the best resource that she could imagine: the girl with the golden hair, who professed that she did not know enough of cooking to comprehend which dish Impa might favour. "If I had to hypothesise based on what I've seen her eat—and she rarely eats in front of me—I think it's something with rice and butter," she remarked, tapping her knuckles against her chin. "I'm afraid I don't know much else. Oh, I can research ingredients native to sheikah cuisine, if you wish! Oh, but...she has grown up here, in the Castle."

Link ran through the royal kitchens' stores of butter and rice, making everything that she could think of: fried butter rice, all manner of risotto from poultry to mushroom to crab to fish to meat, all manner of pilaf from vegetable to curry to shrimp to stranger flavours like nut and snail, cucco or boar or cow stuffed with rice and fried in butter, every recipe that the girl with the golden hair could find. Link inquired if Impa had family. The girl with the golden hair answered: an older sister, Purah, head of research on the Divine Beasts; and her parents, chief advisors of the king. When Link sought audience with them to ask of Impa, they declined her.

"Focus on your training, O Champion of Hylia."

Each night Link would leave out dishes of butter and rice by the door as though attempting to feed a beast from a safe distance. She and the girl with the golden hair would hide together behind a corner, sometimes joined by one or more of the Champions, sometimes joined by Aryll, whom Link or Revali would hold with a hand over her mouth.

At first Impa ignored the dishes entirely. Yet, as the plates continued to most mysteriously appear, Impa sighed, glanced directly at the corner where Link and her cohorts watched, and said, "Your Majesty, go to sleep."

"If only we figure out that recipe," the girl with the golden hair mused, *"then I'm sure she'll eat it. Oh, this is brilliant, Link! Thank you!"

Link smiled sheepishly. "It's something Urbosa taught me. The quickest way to someone's heart is through their stomach. I mean, it's something I've always known, but...put to word. I've never been good with words."

I've never been good with words, either," the girl with the golden hair echoed, taking Link's hands into hers. "And I've never been good at reading people, either. I can't imagine that I ever thought you resented me for not praying hard enough, or judged me for not having awakened my powers, or were so sure about your own destiny...just...that look on your face..." The girl with the golden hair shook her head. "Oh, I know that it means, now. If only I'd talked you earlier. I'm so sorry, Link."

With a thought to the girl who smelled of horses, Link could only laugh. "You wouldn't have been the first."

Scooping up the pot into her hands, she steps forward towards the door to Kaneli's home. Link brings with her the wilds that she has crossed back and again, and she brings with her the travellers and the friends who have taught her recipes a hundred years ago and not a day ago, and she brings with herself.

All that she can bring.

Link has not the sword that seals the darkness strapped to her shoulder. She has not the blade of evil's bane bound to her back. All that she has is herself, and her cooking pot, and all that she can make within, and that will be enough, and she is enough.

Even if her part in the battle for Hyrule has ended, her friendships have not. The Divine Beasts and their pilots will see to the Yiga, and thereafter the malice and monsters. All that the land once known as Hyrule will have left is the slow and steady healing.

The world has no more need of the Champion of Hylia, of the Hero of Hyrule, of Her Majesty's Knight, of O Courageous Link: the Goddess Hylia has no longer need to choose anyone, and Hyrule has passed to memory, and Her Majesty has vanished, and perhaps she has been courageous enough.

After all, when she held the sword that seals the darkness in the lost woods, the blade of evil's bane did not glow with that soft blue fire-light, but rather remained a dull and tepid white.

The world has come to peace.

As Link approaches, the door opens. She hears Yunobo say something like: "W-wait here. I'll go fetch the surprise. Huh? What's with those faces? Is there—oh. Oh! Link!"

She stands in the doorway with the cooking pot in her arms, her hair mussed up by sleepless nights and the morning wind, her grin broad as the curry rice warm. Link sees for the first time in months Riju, for the first time in half a year Dorian, for the first time in over a year Amali, their eyes wide, their mouths open, Riju—grinning—thanking the Goddesses and Amali with her wings brought up to her beak and Dorian bowing his head.

Link holds out her cooking pot to them.

"Hi, I'm hungry, and I hope you are too," she signs, and suddenly her friends surround her, and suddenly she hears her name in a thousand tongues, and suddenly the children pour into Kaneli's home for seconds and to huddle together for warmth from the cool safflina and hydromelon's chilling effect, and suddenly Link has become the heart of warmth and smiles and fullness of belly, and suddenly, without warning, unbidden, she has come home.

She does not need the sword that seals the darkness.

She does not need the blade of evil's bane.

She does not need to lay down her life.
She needs: a cooking pot, and her friends, and a meal and smiles shared alike.

She needs: this, and it is enough.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: I started writing this chapter at 10:22 on the third of August, and finished writing it on at 20:02 on the fourth of August. Relatively short author's notes this time, as I'm not feeling too well and barely managed to drag myself through proofing this piece of work.

Thanks a million to those who have supported the story so far! I couldn't have done without all of you. And thanks a million as always to my most beloved beta reader for her putting up with me staying up all night to play Opus Magnum instead of actually working on the things I'm supposed to work on, but damn if I didn't get Climbing Rope Fibre down to 87 cycles and Seal Solvent down to 52!

Not everyone enjoys the sound of the accordion. Of course, if Yunobo knew what the guard had threatened Kass, Yunobo would have had words. But neither Kass nor Link wishes to be a bother.

Link has spent the entire journey preparing herself for taking up the Master Sword again, but that's not how this works. Indeed, the reason why she hasn't been chosen this time around has to do with for what reason she was initially chosen. The reason probably isn't what you think it is. Although, if you've been paying attention to the themes of Delicious in Wilds and how Link feels, then maybe you do know.

"Splendid! The war is practically over!" is a very slight reference to Inferno Cop of all things.

By the way, this is random, but I use punctuation at the end of an interruption to signal whether or not the person interrupted themself or whether someone else did. If a sentence ends "And what in the—!" then the "!" indicates that the person interrupted themself. If a sentence ends "And what in the—" then the lack of punctuation indicates that the person was interrupted of someone or something else.

Just like how Hestu was extremely sensitive to hot things to a point of being set on fire, Sarie is extremely sensitive to cool things and freezes into a block of ice.

Anyways, the chapter speaks for itself. I'll mention that Link doesn't really believe in Hylia and is mostly invoking her Hylia because of the epithet. It's not even Hylia who chooses the Master Sword, but...we'll see. I'll note that when Link mentions the sword glowing, I'm taking very very faintly, like barely perceptibly, and only at certain times.
With respect to the characters now seemingly speaking the same language, I'll note that they were talking in Tabanch for most of the chapter. It's been over half a year since Dorian, Cottla, and Koko moved to Medli, after all. Dorian already knew Tabanch from his time travelling with the Yiga; Yunobo has learned since he's been in contact with Medli for over a year at this point; and Riju already knew it as parts of her lessons as the Queen of Parapa. Koko and Cottla, on the other hand, have had some difficulty learning the language. You'll notice that Amali's daughters and Cottla/Koko act like they haven't talked all that much prior to Link showing up, which is exactly what it is: the Necludan girls have learned some Tabanch given that they've been surrounded by it (no, really, trying living in another country for a few months; you pick it up surprisingly quickly when you literally have to do so, and especially considering how young they are, which makes picking up new languages easier) but they haven't been able to communicate that well until fairly recently.

See you next time, hopefully with more comments and less griping.

Up next: reunion; adjustment to normal life; it's a secret to (almost) everybody.

midna's ass. 29 October 2017.

Beta reader's comments: Being in Medli again is really nice. I've mentioned this a lot, but I really, really love that city in Delicious in Wilds.

We've already been doing it, but since we still are: Interacting with characters we left behind ages ago feels so cool and refreshing.

This chapter has a really well-written ending.

Emma. 29 October 2017.

Chapter Summary

In Medli, the travelling chef reunites with the chef’s friends and allies, including the Lanayrish prince, who knows about the chef that the others do not.

Chapter Notes

Here’s another comment from the FFN cross-post version of this fic that might be of interest to you all, regarding the revelation of Sarie's identity as "that" Saria: Well, uh, as far as the koroks go, in The Wind Waker, the Great Deku Tree says, "Once upon a time, long ago, the Koroks took on human forms, but when they came to live on the sea, they took these shapes." The 'human forms' is in reference to the kokiri; the koroks are literally the kokiri, transformed into koroks by the Golden Goddesses when they flooded Hyrule into the Great Sea. The rito are also the descendants of the zora. Aonuma (the director of The Wind Waker) said this: "We created the Rito as the evolved form of the Zora that appeared in "Ocarina of Time" and the Koroks as what the Kokiri became once they left the forest. They appear different, but they have inherited their blood." This is pretty established canon, that the kokiri were turned into the koroks during/after the Great Flood. The kokiri were described as immortal children, and I'm pretty sure that the koroks have also been described like that too.

Moving on from the canon material, of course, The Wind Waker didn't cover the fact that we should have seen the previous kokiri amongst the koroks. I decided to take the fact that all of the kokiri were transformed into koroks and that they're immortal in order to have Sarie be, well, Saria, but with their/her memories taken from them/her in order to protect them/her (as the other koroks have had their memories taken from them). I refer to the koroks as they/them since they're, well, plants/tree-like beings, which don't exactly have genders, but the kokiri certainly did. I hope that that clears things up. I definitely did make up a bunch of stuff for Delicious in Wilds but the koroks being the kokiri is not one of them.

And now, author's notes that wouldn't fit into the end: Activated almonds but these chapters are getting so long! I started writing this chapter at 04:54 on the fourth of August, and finished writing it on at 12:19 on the fifth of August.

Thanks a million for all of your support so far, for everyone who has read the fic thus far, whether you've commented or not—this is for you. And thanks a million to my beta reader, Emma, who continues to be extremely patient with me while I spend too much time griping about how Nintendo has done Riju low instead of properly working on Delicious in Wilds. She might not have contributed much to the actual writing and revision aspects, but without her, I wouldn't have my motivation, so she's arguably even more important than I am, as without her, Delicious in Wilds would probably have taken me ten years to write.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The people around her. The people she loves. The people eating from her cooking pot. The people shivering from the unintended chill of hydromelon-safflina and huddling around each other for warmth. Kaneli, resting upon a chair at the fore of the room, rocking back and forth, shaking his head but allowing the proceedings to continue.

And Link at the heart. Link, who has brought them all, one way or another, together. Though the pressures of fate have eased from her shoulders and passed onto their hands, she has had her part in linking together the land once known as Hyrule. For a girl more at ease in the boughs of a tree upon the grasslands than in the heat of a crowded city, she and her cooking pot have gone far.

Dorian—and Koko's—veggie cream soup. Yunobo's fragrant mushroom sauté. Amali's carrot cake. Riju's salt-grilled meat skewer. Like Daruk's deliciously grilled rock roast. Like Revali's fish pie. Like Urbosa's fried bananas. Like Mipha's seafood paella. Like the girl with the golden hair's...

The quickest way to someone's heart is through their stomach.

Link realises as she looks upon her most trusted friends, their gazes so warm even after her months of absence: not only is the quickest way to a stranger's heart through their stomach—the mantra by which she has lived her life—but also her own. She has learned to trust each and every one of them over a meal or meals of food.

As Finley said upon the Bank of Wishes, no one who cooks that well can really be a stranger. Surely that cannot be fully true, for cooking well and being well do not walk hand in hand. But for Link herself, no one who shares a meal with her can really be a stranger. Not Dorian, once a member of the Yiga until he opened his eyes. Not even Glepp, who...who must have something of an explanation, of an excuse, of an alibi. If only Link could see her over the rim of her cooking pot again. Maybe someone out there could share with her a meal yet prove calamitous. Yet not anyone that Link herself has met, at least not for certain, at least not yet.

And now she finds herself apologising, and she finds herself apologised to, and she finds herself thanking, and she finds herself thanked to. Dorian embraces her first, beating out the others with his sheer speed, a hug so uncharacteristic of a man typically aloof that the others hang back. "Link...thank you. For saving my daughters. If there is ever anything I could do for you, please. Please let me know."

Koko and Cottla squeeze into the hug, Koko tucking her head between Link and her father's cheeks, Cottla throwing her arms around them both. Link embraces them all back. When they part, she bows to Dorian. "You already have, by letting me into your family. There's nothing more I could ask of you." Dorian raises his hand to the brim of his hat and tugs it down, obscuring his eyes.

Riju and Amali approach her at once. They turn their heads towards one another, and then Riju dips her head in deference. Amali smiles, for once not tiredly, but with the fullness of her beak. Her daughters crowd around her and Link, Kotts and Notts excitedly leaping up and down, Genli unable to keep up her act of hmphness and instead clinging to her mother's legs, Cree beaming with her wings tucked up, Kheel bursting into a frenzy of song, all of their feathers fluffed up, and Amali's warm wings around her.

Amali crouches down to keep their heads almost level; Link's face sinks into the feathers of her shoulder as she strokes Link's head. Link can tell, by the fumble of her fingers, that Amali knows better how to stroke feather than hair, but she strokes better than she did a year ago. Cottla and Koko's doing, no doubt.

Link disentangles herself from Amali. Amali starts to raise her wings, but Link shakes her head. "I'm sorry," she says, immediately. She steps away from Amali to bow down on her hands and knees on the wooden floor, her forehead against the boards. "I'm sorry for breaking my promise. I'm sorry for almost hurting the people of Medli. I'm sorry for treating it like a game. I'm sorry for not understanding. I...I've tried to do better. I really have. I hope you can forgive me, but I understand if you can't. And I...hope that you can still show me how to make cannoli again. But I'll understand...I'll understand if you can't, or if you don't want to, and thank you for letting me see your daughters afterwards, and thank you for everything you've done for me." She keeps her forehead pressed against the floor. Her hands tremble. Her fingers twitch.

A warmth over her head. The tickle of feathers on her nose. Amali's golden-green eyes crinkled by her smile as she lifts up Link's chin.

"Link...I've already forgiven you for everything, you know. Before you even left Medli. Before I placed the Champion's slate and, I suppose, somehow became Vah Medoh's pilot. I'd already forgiven you, you know." Her irises glimmer wetly. "If not for you, then Vah Medoh could never have stilled. If not for you, then I don't know if my children would still be..." She wipes at her eyes. "How many times have you nearly died trying to protect us?" Link rubs the back of her head. "Every day I thank whatever wind of chance or current of the Goddesses that brought Genli to disobey me and not only go out for salmon in the middle of the night, but even ask a stranger."

Genli puffs out her chest. "See, Mom? See what happens? Link's right. The best thing that's ever happened to us happened 'cause I got hungry. Well maybe not the best thing. I mean, that was me being born." She preens her beak through her feathers and poses. Cree rolls her eyes.

"...whatever brought you here, I'm grateful it did, Link." Amali wraps her wings around her again, tucking Link's head under her throat as she might hug one of her own daughters. Link senses the heat of Amali's tears on the crown of her head. She hugs Amali back, her chest so, so tight and yet so, so warm. At last Amali pulls away just enough to speak. "And from what Riju has told me, you stopped treating it like a game a long, long time enough."

The heat rises in Link's cheeks like Tabanch bread rising in an oven. Amali gazes at her; suddenly her eyes widen and her beak falls open in shock. Link flinches back. Amali grips her shoulders more tightly.

"Link! What in the voice of the Goddess Erito has happened to you?" Amali's feathertips brush against the scar beneath her left eye, the vertical cuts down her cheeks, the pockmark of malice left behind from the Divine Beast Vah Naboris, the thick ridged rings left by the lynel's fingers along the sides of her throat, the violet swirls of malice that cover her body from the jawline-down, the lightning-strike scar upon her left hand, the thin crescent lines that bisect her right palm from how strongly she dug her nails into her flesh in the lost woods.

"I thought that the bite marks on your left arm were bad enough!" That Amali remembers brings Link to rub the back of her head. "Link, what has happened? Just look at this." Amali pulls up Link's tunic and undershirt and gasps. She runs a hand over the scarlet scars left behind by the lynel on Link's abdomen, visible between the whorls of violet. Link rubs the back of her head ever harder. "You need to take care of yourself more, you know! Just look at you! You know how much I worry about you, Link. I suppose it makes sense with all the adventuring you've been doing, but not even that dreadful being of Vah Medoh hurt you so! If I get my hands on whoever did this to you, then—then I'll—" Her feathers ruff up around her into a cyan maelstrom. In that moment Amali appears akin to an icestorm so terrible that Link could unleash her and not even the Calamitous One would stand a chance.

Link scratches her cheek. "The Malice of the Divine Beast in, um, Ruto, sort of kind of hugged me? I think? So I got the purpel stuff all over myself." She sticks out her tongue. "It doesn't taste very good, by the way. I was thinking maybe elderberry jam or something. Just tastes like ouch." Amali's pupils dilate to swallow the golden-green of her irises. Link hastily waves her hands. "I'm fine now! I'm fine! The healers in Ruto took care of it all for me! Really, I'm fine!"

"And what is this?" Amali plucks up the collar of Link's tunic, patched up in both Nabooru and in Ruto, charred from the forest fire, coated in the remains of cream of mushroom stew from her time in the lost woods. "I can't let you go out like this! If we have a moment, then I'll have to get you a new tunic immediately." She fusses with smoothing down Link's hair and tucking in her tunic.

aneli hoots out a laugh. "I see that you truly do act like however's mother, Amali."

Amali's cheeks darken. She runs her hands through her feathery ponytail. "I don't suppose you want to lecture me on how to treat my children now?" Link blushes hotly, covering her face with her hands.

While Amali and Kaneli bicker—her daughters, Tulin, and Koko and Cottla taking bets—Link adjusts her tunic to un-tuck it from her trousers. As she smooths her palms over the wrinkles, she hears a soft cough behind her. Link turns.

Riju.

Riju, holding out a ceramic plate of her own on top of the portable ruby-lined grill. Hmning in her throat, she gestures towards the plate with a bob of her chin. Link glances down to see honey-glazed fish. Not minced into pieces so small that every bite will mix heat, coolness, and tingly shock up with just enough of a subdued undercurrent to keep the eater's tongue from exploding, but in thicker pieces, every touch of the tongue a new adventure of the unknown to see what flavours the eater will find.

Lifting her head, Link gazes into Riju's dark brown eyes, the same colour as the comforting earth; she sees in them a simultaneous thread of uncertainty and a blaze of pride.

And something else: the Goddess Sageru's virtue. Loyalty, as they say in Central Hyrulean, translated for less familiarity with Parapan concepts. Kin, or blood, as they say in Parapan, though less that of families by blood and more that of families by friendship and trials tested together. Riju, who has lost her mother, and Link, who has lost nearly everyone.

"I had to make it quick while you were talking to Dorian and Amali, but...I hope you like it." She pushes the plate towards Link. "So, you don't have to like it. Please be honest with me. Then, h-here we go."

Link takes the plate into her hands. Balancing it in her palm, she closes her eyes and randomly selects a piece of fish. Then she pauses to give the plate back to Riju. Before Riju's eyebrows can slope down, Link explains, taking a second or two to slide back into signing Parapan: "You fed it to me the first time. So let's do that again."

Lowering her eyelids, Link obediently opens her mouth. She hears Riju laughing, the mirth muffled; she can picture Riju holding her hand in front of her mouth.
Fish touches her tongue. First: a honey glaze that sweetens the inside of her mouth and presents a certain wholeness or roundness, like sturdy boots to prepare her for the long tracks ahead, mixed with Parapan spices that conduct a symphony of sweet and sour on her tongue. Then: the flames of Eldin sparking to life on her tongue, clashing with the lightning of Parapan thunderstorms that glass the sand. She swallows the roil and opens again only to feel the icy winds of Tabantha frosting over the flames. She swallows again and the thunderstorm returns, this time subdued with the silence of the lost woods' fog.

And salt. Just enough salt, not to overpower, not to take control like a poorly played ocarina wailing above the singer, but just enough to add a bite, just enough to provide another reason to run her tongue over her lips, just enough to keep even the harshest of Eldin, Tabantha, and Parapa from closing her mouth from the fish. Link swallows.

She senses the groan of a meal well-made shudder up from her belly. When she opens her mouth yet again, Link listens to Riju's laugh. "I'm sorry, Link, but that's all I could make. Then, how was it?"

Link raises her hands. She has so many things to say that she trips over herself forcing them all out of her hands in a jumble of praise and advice and exclamations of the deliciousness and suggestions to try incorporating some fish from Necluda and from Akkala and from Faron and from Lanayru and from Hebra that could really make a dish to not only include all of the major provinces of Parapa where sizzlefin, voltfin, chillfin, and stealthfin thrive but the whole of the land once known as Hyrule and how Riju should never fear adding spices a touch more bitter or a touch more savory to help round out the body of the honey meant to offset the fish and Riju could also prepare each of the individual bites slightly differently so that one could have that smoky flavour of grill and another could have the moisture of steam and that would provide an even greater layer of adventure to the dish and Riju has improved so much and Link cannot wait to see what else they could cook up together and she wants to show Riju every recipe and she wants to sit by a cooking pot with Riju and just throw things into the pot and even if they put in a substitute strange ingredient for another and the pot blows up and how were they supposed to know and even if the cooking ends up awful she hopes that she and Riju can laugh and sit back and eat something that they have made together and—

Riju's arms fold around her. She presses her face into Link's chest. Link embraces her around the shoulders; she has held Aryll like this before, when she returned to the castle upon training with the Champions, when she hadn't seen Aryll in several months, when Aryll had run towards her with her arms thrown open, the red telescope in her hand, Revali mouthing off about Link not paying her little sister enough attention and Urbosa nudging him to say that he hasn't been the one reading Aryll bedtime stories and Daruk booming that he's seen his older brothers run at him like that.

Link stays that way, holding Riju, being held by Riju, for a long, long time. Only when they have parted does Riju draw her thumb across Link's lower eyelid and only then does Link realise that she, too, has cried. They try to speak at the same time:

"Link, I'm...really, really, genuinely sorry for trying to pressure you into taking after the shrines and trying to deal with the Calamitous One—"

"Ruboona—I mean Riju—I'm sorry I left you on the roof by yourself I just wasn't ready to accept what it meant about being the Champion of Hylia—"

They look at one another. Riju closes her mouth. Link curls in her fingers. And then Riju raises her hand to laugh, and Link laughs with her, and Riju shakes her head to let her long scarlet sidelocks bounce against her cheeks. She does not wear the practical trousers and layers of fabric that she wore during her time in the Divine Beast Vah Naboris, but instead a long blue and white dress, simple in its elegance. On her wrists and along her arms clink golden and silver jewellry: ruby and topaz, sapphire and diamond. At her back: a radiant shield. With a scratch here or there to show its scars of battle. Yet the mirrored diamond remains clear and lustrous.

Riju, parrying off fire-light. Riju, no longer afraid of the guardians. Riju, who has learned a courage all her own. If Link could point to anyone in the world, if Link could consider anyone fit to become a Champion, if Link could close her eyes and picture courage, then she would see: the Champion of Sageru, the Hero of Parapa, the Divine Beast Vah Naboris's Pilot, O Courageous Riju.

"So...I've got a compromise for you," Link begins. "I don't know that much about the Calamitous One, but I'm going to start going to shrines, actually. I don't have much else to do."

"Really? Oh, thank the Goddesses! That's wonderful!" Riju grins; then her features twist into an expression of worry. "Ah, wait, but—I'm not going to pressure you into anything, but you should really know about the Ca—!

A loud hoo interrupts them all. "Excuse me, there," Kaneli says, sitting up in his chest, "but I saw that you mentioned something about the Malice in Ruto. Hoo are you to have gone there?"

Link blinks. Two hands touch her shoulder at the same time: over her head, Dorian and Amali glance at one another. Amali laughs. Dorian clears his throat. Then Yunobo speaks first, before everyone else.

"Y-you really are amazing, Link." Yunobo beams at her, and Link reaches out to rest her hand on his shoulder.

"Only because you taught me to be proud of what I could do, Yuno-yunobo." She looks back towards Kaneli. "The Divine Beast in Ruto's been calmed, too. Sidon—oh that's the prince you're all talking about—he's been using it to go around and...help take care of the monsters around Lanayru and stuff like that.

"Anyways, I left Ruto a while ago—I could never forget the shark I ate there; I don't know if Sidon or someone else prepared it but if you've never had shark you haven't lived, unless you're a goron and you can't eat shark, but then you should eat some shark-shaped grilled opal or something—to go to Akkala, where I made catfish stew, and then I ran into my friend Yunobo with these really good butter-dipped steamed bananas, and then we came here with this pilaf." Link plucks one of the grains of goldened rice stuck to the collar of her tunic and pops it into her mouth. She manages to break through her usual blankess and beam at Kaneli, who shakes his head very slowly. Everyone in the room has turned, their gazes focused on Link; she rubs the back of her head.

"I finally meet you, Link, and I see that you're just as, ahem, hoo-nique as they say." He brings his wings together. "Splendid! The team is practically assembled once more!"

Amali lifts a wing. When Kaneli does not answer immediately, Genli stamps her foot. "Hello! Mom has something to say!"

Cree folds her wings over her chest and nods in approval. "Mother's ideas are usually good."

Link stifles her laugh with a snort as Kaneli adjusts his spectacles. She giggles at the fact that despite his status as Chief of Medli—and, like Amali has told Link over carrot cake, by informal extension Chief of Tabanth; although each village has their own chief, most would defer that to Medli—he has no qualms about allowing children their say. "I see that I have been overruled.
Amali, you have the skies.

"Thank you. I think that, of all of the Divine Beasts, Vah Medoh is the quickest, isn't She? If that's the case, then I could fly to Ruto in a manner of days." Amali smiles. "I suppose we should have the fourth pilot here for the proceedings."

"Splendid!" Kaneli swings his wings about. "Is everyone fine with staying a few days more in Medli to await the arrival of Prince Sit-on—"

"Sidon," Link signs. Too late realises that she cannot sign how to pronounce his name, much less in a language that she cannot read or write. Riju and Yunobo agree, her with a glance towards Link, him with a touch to the blue shawl.

Blue shawl. The same colour of fabric, Link realises, as she has seen all of the Champions wear in her memories, as she once, herself, wore. And that shawl, with its tatters and its patches, with its sigils of the Goddess Goro-goro along the rim: taken from the sash once worn by Daruk. She lowers her eyelids in understanding.

As the meeting winds down and the delegates summarise their decisions, Kaneli inquires to Link how long she plans to stay. She explains that she has a partner with whom to travel—three in fact, in the forms of Ilia, a certain someone, and Sarie, currently hiding in her satchel—and a plan.

Yet she can wait a few days, to catch up with everyone. Link could never tire of travelling, but a place to put her boots up a little while does not sound too bad, either.

"Huh?" asks Yunobo. "A certain someone? Oh, Kass!"

Amali's eyes widen. She looks between Link and Yunobo, Yunobo and Link, the question wild in her irises.

Link nods. "Kass... said that he made a promise to his teacher, or something like that?" Link starts. "That he isn't allowed to see you or the children until he fulfills his promise and passes on the songs of the shrines."

Amali inclines her head. "If he doesn't fulfill his promise, then my beloved can't come home."

"Right, that. And getting through a shrine takes fo—I mean, takes a slate, and in all of Hyrule there's only..." Link counts on her fingers. Amali holds up five flight feathers, and Link blushes. "...five slates. Four of them belong to the pilots. So...I'm not doing anything else with mine. I thought I'd travel with him to activate them all." Link smiles sheepishly. "To... to get him back home for you, and for the kids."

Amali gathers her up in a hug. Yunobo begins to bawl at the sight; Riju pats his shoulder. "I think it's a fantastic idea to activate the shrines, thank the Goddesses. Ah, isn't it said that they have to be activated, for us to defeat the Calamitous One once and for all."

"Now that's a long ways off," Kaneli interjects, "and hoo are you to speak of it again, now?"

Riju exhales. "We'll have to talk about it eventually."

"Riju-riju's not wrong, right?" Yunobo puts in. "W-we don't know if the Calamitous One's still out there. B-but we can all see that something's wrong at the castle, right? Eldin's s-still crawling in monsters. We could put an end to that if we j-just stop whatever's going on, right? That's h-how this works, right?"
Amali runs her hand through her tail of golden feathers. She looks upon her own children as she speaks. "If we chase off after the Calamitous One before we deal with problems closer to home, then that could be putting everyone in danger. I agree with you about tackling the Yiga, for the sake of those in other regions as well, but." She brings her wings up to her face. Link exhales in relief at Amali speaking out. "If the Calamitous One exists, then it isn't even hurting anyone right now. On the other wing, we can see the monsters, and Yiga, with our own eyes."

Dorian coughs. "We agreed on what our immediate plans are with respect to the Yiga. I don't see why we should be arguing about this at all."

"Indeed. If this Calamitous One even still exists, since after all the Princess did sacrifice her life to vanish it from this world, then we shall see to it." Kaneli whistles. "Splendid! This meeting is practically finished! If no one has any questions, then this meeting is over!"

The minor effects of the hydromelon and cool safflina minced into the pilaf have by now worn off. The huddling together for warmth cools as the congregation moves away from one another to pack up and start to head out. Amali motions for everyone to follow her.

Link reaches down a hand into her satchel to pet Sarie's head. They shudder. She opens the satchel to check if Sarie has frozen again into a block of ice yet discovers that Sarie has fallen asleep, shivering from the cold.

With Sarie tucked into her undershirt for warmth, Link follows.

Amali's home has grown another story. Link learns from Harth and Teba on the way back that the Champions spontaneously decided to abandon the resident houses set out for them by Kaneli for Amali's home instead, with its worn windchimes and its paint dulled by the years. "When my husband returns," Amali remarks, "we'll repaint it together. Until then, I suppose that worn paint's a reminder of what has happened, of why my husband had to depart." She brings a wing to her face. When she signs again, her gestures seem lighter. "And it's also a promise of what I hope to happen in the future. A future where we no longer have to fear if our children will see another sunrise, or if tomorrow will bring the Great Calamity down upon us again."

Riju makes a certain humming noise, yet she does not pres. Link wipes her brow with her wrist.

The next few minutes disappear into a blur of chaos of Riju and Yunobo wishing their respective relegates good-bye—Link, who has not seen much of Riju's own people, smiles to see the Parapans tearing up and promising to keep the Divine Beast Vah Naboris safe for her, even as Link clambers onto Yunobo's shoulders to once more avoid the swarming crowd—and then Kaneli, Teba, and Harth assisting the Champions with setting up beds in the guest rooms of Amali's home. Without a current room to accommodate Link or Sidon, Amali inquires Link and Riju if they wouldn't mind sharing a room for the time being, seeing as they—as humans—have similar demands.

Riju looks at Link; Link looks at Riju. Link grins; Riju covers her mouth to laugh.

They bustle into Riju's guest room. "Ah, before we go in...promise that you won't make fun of me," Riju asks Link, hand on the beaded curtain. Link swears herself up and down on never eating food again. The curtain parts to reveal a room flooded with stuffed animals and plushies, a few in the shapes of camels and horses, but most in the form of sand seals, piles upon piles on the bed. Link springs up onto the mattress, kicking her boots off as she goes, to land on the Death Mountain of softness. She sinks into the plush like quicksand. Riju pulls her out before she drowns. Sarie flies out of Link's shirt to cling to one of the sand seals.

After Riju's initial shock, she bursts into laughter and Link with her. "If only we were home. Then, I'd show both of you Patricia, the greatest sand seal in all of Parapa—in all of the world," Riju explains, lying back on the bed. "Mother left her for me. Ah, she's a little old, and so, she can't be ridden that much anymore." Link watches her chest rise and fall with her breaths. "But...still good. Still good, thank the Goddesses."

Link reaches across the bed to take Riju's hand. With herself on her right side, and Riju on her left, Link runs her fingers over the valleys of Riju's knuckles to intertwine them, to feel the warmth of Riju's palm on hers. Like the girl with the golden hair, gazing at each other with their heads on the pillows, their hands clasped together.

Link does not flinch away.

Around dinner-time, a phrase which here refers to whenever Link's stomach rumbles next, Amali drags Link off to replace her tunic. Link pleads instead for a refeathering of her existing one.

"Absolutely not," answers Amali.

Link taps her forefingers against one another. "I'll make you carrot cake."

Amali acquiesces. "If you make a face like that, then how am I supposed to say no?"

With a newly refurbished tunic in the fabric of Parapan sky-blue—almost entirely replacing the original green cloth—to ward off the coming winter, Link returns to Amali's home. She busies herself making dinner, then spends the afternoon practising archery with Tulin at his request, which eventually devolves into all of the children begging Yunobo to vault them into the air while Link purposefully misses to give them the sensation of expertly dodging her marksman's arrows.

Before nightfall, Amali brings over a second Parapan-styled bed for Link to sleep on, though two beds in one room prove a tight squeeze. "I suppose I should apologise in advance. While I'm gone, they'll be building a room for Sidon across the way. The awful din might keep you up."

Riju rolls her shoulders. "I think I'm a little too excited for sleep." Link bobs her head.

Amali smiles tiredly. Where before Link would simply glance down at her boots, she finds herself instead stepping forward to touch Amali's hand. "Are you all right? Can I cook something for you?"

For a moment Amali merely stares at her; then she relaxes. "I'm all right now, Link. Thank you."

She hugs Link and then Riju good night. Link inquires about supper; Amali laughs. She relents: Link makes risotto for the children, promising them their favourite dishes in the morning when she has had time to hit the marketplace. For Yunobo, she cooks up an opal-and-iron pie after taking suggestions from some of the Eldic entourage. Then Link turns towards the fishier side. Trout for Cree; porgy for Kheel; salmon for Genli; carp—a breath away from a swear word—for Kotts and Notts, as well as for Koko and Cottla. They know the taste of sanke carp well, after all.

Tulin throws in a vote for smelt, and Riju for trout. After sufficient insistence from Link that Amali's tastes matter just as much as anyone else's, Link learns of Amali's favourite: also salmon. Dorian brings in haddock from the fisheries, and Hath, Teba, and his wife Saki come over to contribute cod and herring. Prior to the end of the supper, Saki coughs, taking Link aside to apologise.

"I called you, what was it, terrifying. But...I didn't really know you. I'm sorry. I've heard so much about since then, and I hope you can find it in your heart to forgive me."
Link touches her chin. "Did you like the herring risotto?"

Saki's brow furrows its feathers. "I thought it was fine, although I could tell you're not too experienced in preparing herring. Why?"

Link snaps her fingers. "Teach me how to cook herring better." She hesitates. "You don't have to do that. I don't even have anything to forgive you for. But I'd appreciate it!"

"I hope that herring isn't red," Saki says. Link blinks at her, and Saki runs a hand over her throat. "I-it's a joke. Sorry, does it not translate well?"

The evening shifts to young night. The moon sees the guests off. Link embraces the children and her friends good night. Kotts and Notts demand kisses on the forehead, and soon all of the children have, and Yunobo too.

Amali bids her children farewell. Off to the Divine Beast Vah Medoh. Off to Ruto. Link offers to go with her to help vouch for Sidon, yet Amali wags a flight feather at her.

"It's been so long since everyone's seen you. Stay a few days. I suppose you've the time to say hello." Link sighs in relief. Amali closes one eye. "If you wanted an excuse to stay so badly, then you didn't need to pretend to want to come."

The children, Riju, Yunobo, and Link stand in the doorway; the coolness of the Tabanch late-autumn covers them like a blanket of frost as they watch the Divine Beast Vah Medoh's eyes glow blue in recognition of its pilot, as they watch the Divine Beast spread its wings and rotate its fans, as they watch the Divine Beast lift off from the highest point of the tallest Pillar of Erito to take flight.

Teba ushers them back inside for bed. The children ask for another round of good night kisses, from Teba, from Saki, and from Link.

When they retire to their room, Link and Riju talk long into the night. Riju inquires all sorts of questions about Sarie and how they and Link met; Link comments that Sarie's the second korok she has ever seen. Changed into comfortable pyjamas, Riju flops back onto her pillow. "Mother told me that she found a korok on the roof of the palace," she says, her brown eyes glimmering under the ray of moonlight shimmering through the circular glassless window. "Ah, the korok said something about a game of hide-and-seek. Then, they gave Mother a golden seed about this big and said that if ever Mother comes by their forest, she should give that seed to one of their own." Riju shakes her head. "So, I thought that she was kidding around with me. Like you know, how your own mother must've when she told you bedtime stories. Link?" Riju sits up. "Link?"

Link closes her eyes, shutting out the faint night-time light. She remembers: Urbosa, probing into her past. She remembers: Daruk, saying that he could gather something had gone amiss. She remembers: Revali, and his parents. She remembers: Mipha, even Mipha, who would defer as much conflict as she could, agreeing about that house. She remembers: the girl with the golden hair, asking Link why she never said anything of her own childhood.

They talk long into the night. She talks long into the night. Mostly about other people. But sometimes, here or there, about herself.

They talk. They talk about Riju's childhood. They talk about Riju's mothers; they talk about Riju's mother who fell ill when Riju was but six years old, and they talk about Riju's other mother, the former Queen of Parapa, the Makeela as Riju calls her. They talk about her mother's assassination by the Yiga shortly after the awakening of the golden spires and the closing of Nabooru; Link emulates Riju's own earlier gesture, gently wiping her thumb under Riju's dampened eyes. They talk about Patricia and about Ilia. They talk about Buliara, the captain of the guard, who has watched Riju day and night for fear of another assassination, of how Riju caught her falling down a flight of stairs for her utter exhaustion; Riju sinks her face into the rito-down pillow while Link listens to her muffled words, beat-beat-beating three squeezes on Riju's hand.

They talk of the Tantari Desert spreading with the Divine Beast Vah Naboris's hooves, of Riju finally deciding to take matters into her own hands, of Riju staging her own escape from Buliara's watch to see what she could do about the Divine Beast with her own hands, of Riju living in the Divine Beast for the better part of a month in her efforts to stop or at least control the rampage, of her having left Parapa without a queen; a droplet of blood beads on Riju's lower lip where she has bitten down too down, and Link takes time to trace out the scars new and old on Riju's palms and the backs of her hands in steady circular motions until Riju finds her voice again. They talk of the triumphant reunion with Buliara and with her people.

They talk of the triumph of the Divine Beast and of how much work they still have to do. They talk of monster attacks growing worse by the day. They talk of evacuations sufficing to protect from the worst effects of the slow-moving Divine Beast—though the displacement of pastoral gerudo peoples like the Zuni tribe has proven heartbreakingly devastating—but that the constant waves of monsters and until recently Yiga that have spread across Parapa have left so many of her people without homes, without livelihoods, without lives; Link glides her hand up Riju's arm to tug her closer and Riju buries her face into Link's chest, tucking her head under Link's chin, until the shudders run their courses through her form.

"I'm just one person. I'm trying my best but...everyone expects so much from me."

Links starts to pull away enough to sign, yet the soft tremble of Riju's breath slows her motion. Instead she shifts her free hand to Riju's shoulder.

"I don't really get it all the way because I'm not in charge of a whole kingdom," Link signs, one-handed, writing the characters onto the skin of Riju's shoulders, her words bringing a slight upwards curve to Riju's mouth and a giggle to her tongue, "but I do kinda know what it's like to have expectations on your shoulders. A little bit. For what it's worth, I think you're amazing, and that's what I've heard from others, too. It's all right to just do what you can! That's all we can ask of you."

Riju shifts on the bed. Her left sidelock has come undone from its usual loop clipped to the back of her head; one of the golden bands slides down the thick lock of hair. She runs an index finger along the inner curve of the metallic ring. "Thanks, Link. I mean it."

They talk of favourite recipes, of the lullabies that Riju's mother once sang to her, of growing up as an only child. "Everyone's always seen me as the heir, and then as the Queen of Parapa. I know that that's what I am, thank the Goddesses. And yet sometimes...sometimes I also want to be myself. So, thank you Link, for letting me be Riju. For treating me the same even after you found out who I was."

The smile dawns on Link's face like a crescent moon brightening the night sky. Riju returns the same smile with a tilt of her head, just so, that makes Link squeeze her hand all the more.

Riju inquires about Link's childhood. "Ah, you don't have to tell me anything if you don't want to," she says softly, "but it wouldn't be a burden. You're my friend, Link. It is a burden for me to tell you what I have experienced?" Link shakes her head. Riju closes her eyes, breathes in, then opens them to fix Link with her dark brown eyes the hue of the earth. "Thank the Goddesses. Then, it isn't a burden for you to tell me, either. I care about you, you know."

"I want to," Link signs immediately. She looks down at her own hands. "I know more than ever that I want to. I don't know if I can."

She tries. She fails. She stutters. She does not know how to say these things without revealing that she lived one century ago, but she leaves her memories couched in shadow and vaged through time. She mentions: the people in that house. This time Riju holds her until the pangs that wrack her body leave her exhausted and cold save for the warmth of Riju's arms. She mentions: a sister. She mentions: a best friend who smelled of horses. She mentions: a girl with a violet sash whose memory even now quickens the pulse of her heart. Grinning, Riju asks the worst question of all.

"Then, can I meet them?" A beat. She does not know what expression she might have on her face, but she prays to the Goddesses who might not even be listening that her usual blankness wins out. "...take your time, Link. I'm here for you. I'm here for you."

Their talk drifts to happier things. They play wind-water-fire. Riju offers to braid Link's hair; Link finds herself falling asleep against Riju's chest as she listens to the soft melody Riju hums while she gently works through Link's locks.

She awakens to autumn-cold and tremors of the bed. She awakens to Riju pressing the heels of her hands into her eyes. She awakens to Riju whispering apologies for being a bad queen, for being a bad charge who worried Buliara to nearly a heart attack, for being a bad daughter who did not appreciate her mothers enough until too little and too late. She awakens to Riju asking for her mother. She awakens to Riju shaking in a nightmare that shivers the girl who has kicked off her blankets.

Link does not know how it feels to miss a mother. Yet she does know how it feels to miss——Daruk, who offered her a home after the long war. Marin's mothers, who would themselves joke of their new daughter-in-law every time she swung by. Malon and Vish, who have given her a home where she can rest her sword.

Link does not have words. But she has her hands, and she has her warmth, and she has her cooking pot.

She shakes Riju awake, gathers Riju into her arms, holds Riju in her lap as she has held Aryll on the nights in that house when the rafters shook and her own throat stung with the imprint of hands, cloaks Riju in the blanket that she draws up from the floor. Riju smells of salt and sweat. Her skin bumps into cuccoflesh. Link lets her friend's tears dampen her own undershirt, lets her friend's nails sink into the flesh of her upper arms, lets her friend tremble in her embrace. Riju rocks back and forth; Link rocks with her.

When her eyes have grown red and puffy from crying long after the tears have run dry, Link offers to cook something with her. They make egg tart on the portable ruby grill. Riju crimps with her tongue poked out of her mouth in concentration. Not in the same way as the girl with the golden hair, not with the measured perfection, but in a very Riju way, that gives a roundness and an evenness to the tart, perfect in its imperfections. Just as Riju reminds Link of Aryll, but in a very Riju way. Link hugs her tightly; Riju embraces her back with a very Riju flick of Link's nose.

They fall asleep together in a pile of pillows and blankets and stuffed sand seals, shoulder to shoulder and hip to hip. Link does not remember a warmer night.

The next few days, Link spends cooking meals for everyone in the house, many times with Riju at her side, tasting the stews or batters together to improve upon them and laughing when their experiments pay off in burnt breakfasts and sunken suppers; practising her fighting skills with the sword, the spear, the axe, and the bow; introducing Sarie around and hearing about what all has happened in the time intervening; learning more about Yunobo and Riju's families and friends back home and their childhoods; popping by the stable on a daily basis to feed Ilia, clean her, tell her what a good girl she is, exercise her, and pet her all over; fishing in the lake to attempt to make use of Sidon's fishing rod before immediately giving in to Tulin's cries of hylian bomb fishing; and attempting to make various risottos and pilafs to see if she can't dig in through the fog in her mind and trigger another memory.

She catches snippets of where she has eaten those before. Yet not nearly enough to form something cohesive.

The Divine Beast Vah Medoh nearly vanishes on the horizon. Link sits on the roof with her little sister's trusty red telescope to track its movement. After some days, it begins to return. Link ogles its speed. To cross one end of the land once known as Hyrule to the other takes something like two months by horseback, perhaps one if she were to ride hard and fast on endura carrot and stamella shroom.

"Or tireless frog!" as the girl with the golden hair would say, pushing such a frog into Link's hands. "No, really! Research indicates that it should perk you up just fine! So try it! Really! Try it! Try it! Try it!"

Link laughs to herself. Riju props her chin up on her palm and what has gotten Link so giggly; she shakes her head.

"Maybe when all of this is over, if you're not too busy being Queen of Parapa and everything, I could show you home."

"Home?" Riju echoes. "Ah, I thought you said that Ordon has been...?"

"My home, now, Romani Ranch. It's near Mount Satori, in that valley." Link tilts up her head, gazing at the stars above. "I think you'd like it there."

"Then...I'd love to see it someday."

Link's smile crinkles her eyes until tears film over her lower lashes. In the past few days alone she feels like she has cried more than the last however many months since she began her journey. Sometime in spring, wasn't it? Spring on the Great Plateau. And now: late autumn. Almost a year and three-quarters, or something like that.

Link questions Dorian, one day, if he happens to know Lady Impa's favoured food. Dorian strokes his chin. "I'd like to say that she seems to prefer cucco, just about anything with that. Not the biggest lover of pumpkin, actually, although she has a soft spot for carrots. Endura, I think, not swift. It's caused endless drama and cries of favoritism in Kakariko, with the neighbours who refuse to share with one another." He raises an eyebrow. "If this was a roundabout way of saying you miss being able to eat poultry, I happen to have some frozen cucco. Just don't feed it to Amali's children, lest I end up booted back to Yiga territory."
Link raises her hands to speak, then stops herself. If Dorian can joke about the Yiga now, that only gives her a taste of how far their efforts to eradicate the Yiga have come.

She takes Dorian up on the offer. He dredges out the drumstick wrapped in wax from the ice-box and extracts a promise from her to give at least a sample to Cottla and Koko, who haven't had poultry in months.

"I was going to do that anyway," Link admits, shrugging. Dorian nods his head at her.

"If you didn't, you wouldn't be Link, now would you?"

She takes to pilaf. In her cooking pot Link once more oils and butters the bottom prior to scooping in rice. Tossing, tossing, simmering, simmering, until the rice has taken on a gild of gold. Then she peels endura carrots and onions that she sautées in oil, salt, and a single bird's egg for weight before pouring into the rice to stir, and then, finally, the cucco, defrosted for the better half of the day, braised lightly in onion and garlic for flavour, then added to the mix with a sprinkle of salt and hefty dash of seasoning and spice, stirred in and stirred again to an entire pot of cucco, rice, onion, garlic, and carrot.

Koko and Cottla squeal in delight. Link scarcely has time to divide the pot into sixths—a third for Cottla, a third for Koko, a sixth for Dorian and a sixth for herself—when the girls have eaten away most of it.

She retires to her room with the plate of pilaf. Riju pokes her head in, having followed the scent of poultry, and inquires if she can have some. Link glances down at the sixth that she set aside for herself. Riju—apparently seeing Link's sorrow written over her features—crosses her arms over her chest in an X and begins to back out.

Link takes her hand. She divides the sixth into a third and two-thirds, giving the larger portion to Riju, who starts to protest until Link touches her finger to Riju's lips.

"You don't have to like it," says Link, "but food's meant to be eaten, and meals meant to be shared."

"...thank you, and thank the Goddesses for bringing you to me." Riju tries the pilaf. Link raises her eyebrows. "It's really good!" Riju exclaims in return, her eyes sparkling, the wrinkles in her brow smoothened. "Ah, you want me to give some advice? So, I think the rice is a little bland. Did you just fry it in oil and butter? Then, you could try adding some seasoning into the oil first, so that the rice absorbs it. You should add more cucco and less carrot, and some of these pieces of garlic and onion are a little big. I bit into one when they should just be the flavouring, not the main dish." She pants, taking a moment to catch her breath. "How'd I do? Did I live up to the Link method of critiquing food? Ah, I h-hope my suggestions were good."

Link grins at her. "Next time I make some, you should make it with me. We'll make it together. Riju and Link's Kakariko special."

"Not bad," Riju notes, curling her fingers into a fist, "since neither of us is from Kakariko."

Link bumps her fist.

She turns to her own morsel of food: a third of a sixth. Link tries counting on her fingers to determine what fraction of the original cooking pot full of pilaf she still has, but the numbers escape her.

She rolls her shoulders. Food's food. Good's good. As the girl with the golden hair would say, goog's foof and foof's goog.

And then Link scoops the rice into her mouth.

This pilaf. This pilaf, on cucco from Kakariko, on endura carrot, on Necludan rice. Her eyes widen. She remembers.

She remembers the pilaf that finally broke through that impassable exterior of stone. Link remembers the pilaf that she and the girl with the golden hair conducted with all of the strategy of the captain of the royal guard waging war against the Calamitous One. Link remembers the pilaf with which Purah aided her, convinced by another bribe of carrot cake and wildberry cannoli to divulge her sister's secrets.

The pilaf. The pilaf meant for Impa. The pilaf that they brought to her late at night. The pilaf that they watched on the plate as they hid on the other side of the corner. The pilaf that pounded Link's heart and dried her mouth, that slicked her palms and stole her breath. The pilaf that Impa approached on her return from her nightly report to the king. The pilaf that stopped Impa from seeing the girl with the golden hair off to bed. The pilaf that Impa began to lift up, clearly intent on throwing it away like she had all of the others, and which Link would later rummage up from the bin to clean and see what she could make of it for her loathing to waste food. The pilaf that gave Impa pause. The pilaf that Impa raised to her mouth. The pilaf that Impa—that Impa—that Impa ate.

The pilaf that made Impa raise her voice, to demand that Link and Her Majesty report at once. Sweat beaded down Link's brow. The girl with the golden hair's face drained of blood.

Impa glared down both of them.

And then she spoke. "Frequently," said she, picking grains of rice from the plate of pilaf, "I have wondered if you are truly worthy of that sword that seals the darkness you carry on your back. It is the mark of your position as the chosen hero, before anything else, so wrapped in to your very identity that its emblem identifies the Champion's tunic."

"The tunic...?" Link looked down at the sky-blue tunic she wore, decorated with thread same white colour of the silent princesses that the girl with the golden hair loved so much. She noted a sigil in white near the collar: the blade of evil's bane, the hilted wings flaring from the hem, the sword extending towards her chest.

"That's...supposed to be the sword? I thought it was...a headless lobster, or a crayfish. See, there's the tail, and here's the claws coming off, and it looks like it's about to be boiled or prepared for a dish." Link traced her fingers over the emblem. "And the white on the hem looks like a wave to me, so I thought it was sea-like." She paused and looked up at Impa. "It looks like a lobster to me."

Impa blinked at her. The girl with the golden hair covered her mouth with her hand. Link stared vacantly at the Princess's shade. And then a miracle: Impa's mouth curved upwards. Just for a second.

"...I now see that you have honed both your body and mind, Link. Now all that remains is that you hone your spirit." Impa bowed her head. "That you would go to such lengths to make for me a dish of this calibre speaks of your heart. I believe I am beginning to understand why the sword that seals the darkness chose you. Train hard. We may best the Calamitous One yet."

Link does not quite remember her own feelings, her expression mostly blank in her surprise and acceptance, but she remembers the girl with the golden hair weeping on her behalf.
"And...if you would not mind." Impa glanced away. "I would appreciate more of this in the future."

Link remembers. Those brief days of warmth, when her training with the blade of evil's bane and the Champions brought her leaps and bounds closer to what Impa and the king expected of her, when her relationships with the Champions had improved to friendship, when the girl with the golden hair trusted her more every day, when the king occupied himself more with the Divine Beasts and the guardians and less with his daughter, when Link and the Champions considered themselves possibly the heroes of their own story, who could take up their blades against the Calamitous One, who could seal it or even slay it forevermore, who could promise peace.

She thought that those warm days could last forever. But then, the Great Calamity—that fogged hole in her mind—

"Link...I'm sorry. Then, I won't ask you to share your food in the future." Riju's voice startles her from her reverie; Link looks up to find Riju kneeling beside her, brow creased in concern. "I didn't mean to make you cry."

Weeping again. Link wipes her eyes and shakes her head. "What? No, it's not from the food. It wasn't you. I was just...remembering something."

Riju leans forward. "Remembering something?"

Link nods; a smile comes unbidden to her lips. "From a long, long time ago."

The days continue on. She spends more time with Yunobo and Riju than she did during the whole of her stays in Nabooru or in Darunia. Link learns so much more of them than she could have thought. A friendship forged in the fires of trials and tribulations does not always test well in times of tranquility. Yet these friendships do.

And then, on a night after a supper of steamed crab legs and breaded tilapia and snapper, a certain booming voice that shouts out just as loudly even when attempting to whisper jolts her from her sleep. Link has not time to throw on her boots or tunic before she has lunged for the door, hit the wall instead, leaped back, and properly leaped through the beaded curtain to smack directly into Sidon's chest.

The house veritably shakes with Sidon's excited yells of getting to hug Link again. The waning moon seems to wink at them as Link sets a midnight snack—very important!—of seafood paella on the stove while Sidon introduces himself to everyone his shouts have awakened: to Riju, to Yunobo, to Teba and to Saki, to Dorian, to Kaneli who arrives after half the paella has vanished into various gullets and gizzards and throats, to Cottla and Koko, to Notts and Kotts, to Genli and Tulin, to Kheel and Cree.

The Divine Beasts Vah Rudania, Vah Medoh, Vah Naboris, and, most recently, Vah Ruta, and their pilots, all together.

Sidon clears his throat. His interpreter of sign stands next to him, alongside a translator who knows both Lanayrish and Tabanch; Link realises that while Yunobo and Riju must have picked up the language or known it in these long months, Sidon has necessarily not had the same opportunities. "It is most wonderful to finally meet all of you!" He splays his webbed hands to each of the pilots in turn, as aided by Link herself, who leans against his shoulder to point out where stands each of the pilots.

"I am most pleased to meet all of you, carried forth to this fateful encounter by the currents of our Goddess! O Champion of Sageru, O Hero of Parapa, O Divine Beast Vah Naboris's Pilot, O Courageous Riju! O Champion of Erito, O Hero of Tabantha, O Divine Beast Vah Medoh's Pilot, O Powerful Amali! O Champion of Goro-goro, O Hero of Eldin, O Divine Beast Vah Rudania's Pilot, O Powerful Yunobo! And I, the Champion of Zola, the Hero of Lanayru, the Divine Beast Vah Ruta's Pilot, O Wise Sidon!

Riju, Amali, and Yunobo start to greet or thank him at once—Yunobo asking out loud a huh? and I thought your name was Sit-on before clapping a hand over his own mouth—but Sidon goes on:
"And, but of course, our most honoured among us!" Their brows knit together, Amali's in confusion, Riju's with a glance around the room, Yunobo's in continued embarrassment, Kaneli's with a suspicious and hoom might that?

Sidon whirls around and seizes Link by the sides of her torso, hoisting her up like a stuffed animal.

"And, of course, let us never neglect our most marvellous friend: O Champion of Hylia," begins Sidon, as Link's arms fall uselessly to her sides, her head suddenly spinning, her heart intent on strangling her intestines, "O Hero of Hyrule, O Her Majesty's own appointed Knight, O Courageous Link, Hero Chosen by the Goddesses, the Bearer of the Sword that Seals the Darkness, the Blade of Evil's Bane!"

The home falls to a hushed silence at Sidon's proclamation, as the translator finishes the words speaking his words in the Tabanch tongue. When no one speaks, the translator apologises for his Lanayrish accent and starts anew, more slowly this time, but Kaneli lifts a wing to stop him.

"We heard," he says, his voice quiet. "And hoo might you be, O Courageous Link?"

Link's heart clenches. The pain in her chest grows worse than when she winded herself against a pole in the Divine Beast Vah Rudania.

"What!? Did you all not know!?” Sidon calls out. Link's heart leaps into her throat, and her stomach bottoms out from an infinite void to a hard constriction of fear. "Yes, the most courageous and talented Link that you see before you is the legendary Link that served Her Majesty the Princess of Hyrule in the final days of the Great Calamity!"

He sets her down upon the floorboards and slaps his hand between her shoulder blades. Her knees have locked in place. If not for the plate of paella in her hands, Link would plummet to the ground like toast landing on its buttered face. Worse than the arrow of malice slung into her by the violent violet of the Divine Beast Vah Medoh.

"But of course! The children of the other Goddesses do not live long as we of our Goddess Zola! Allow me to shed some silver on this most peculiar situation! This Link is that Link of legend! The original chosen one! She fell asleep for a hundred years in the Shrine of Resurrection and awoke without her memories! But, as expected of our most incredible Link, she's been fighting for all this time! Isn't that right, our most courageous Link!?”

All gazes in the room save for Sidon's bear down on her. Worse than the cleaving in half of the top of her right foot in the Divine Beast Vah Naboris.

"Indeed, I met her myself as a young pup!" Sidon explains, his voice filled with pride. "But of course, my father the King Zora recognised her as well! She has personally known and cooked for the former Champion of Zola my older sister Mipha, may her spirit swim swift in the seas of Our Goddess, and for the other Champions: O Powerful Revali, O Courageous Urbosa, O Powerful Daruk, may their Goddesses see them to peace." He goes on, to speak of the Goddess slate, to refer to her skills and triumphs, to remark on the other Lanayrish who have known her and her cooking.
Link can see the glitters of recognition in the eyes of those she loves. Her possession of the Champions'-Hero's-Goddess slate. Her stranger manners of speaking, her lack of familiarity with current slang, her using a tad too many words from a hundred years ago. Her talks of amnesia, of not remembering much. Her shying away from being the chosen hero. Her snapping of fingers in the same manner as Urbosa, referring to her as Urbosa and not with an epithet. Her talk of Revali, of a friend who knew him. Her faint knowledge of Daruk. Her everything that she has said and where she has been and what she has done.

When Sidon finishes, the house settles to a silence so tense that Link cannot breathe. Worse than the lynel strangling her throat, worse than her entire skin melted away to Malice, worse than the water in her lungs while she clung to the pump of the Divine Beast Vah Ruta.

Every sinew of her body trembles. She balances the plate of paella upon the crook of her arm. She lifts her hands.

"Does..." Link breathes. "...anyone want seconds?"

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Link has some troubles with conceiving of the people around her as bad per se. It took her so long to get to trust people that she's having difficulties dealing with the fact that some of the people she has trusted might in fact be terrible.

Yunobo has rubbed off on Amali! Amali's referring to the slate as the 'Champion's slate' now, although note the distinction from Yunobo's 'Champions' slate'.

If you don't recognise what Link is referring to with the paragraph about the "the pot blows up" and such-like, it's the same thing that she reminisced from her talking about what cooking with Ilia is like. This isn't a replacement goldfish. Rather, Link tends to use the words of others to express herself.

If you've never had fried smelt: try it. It's fantastic.

Saki's joke is about the phrase red herring, meaning something that distracts you from something relevant. For example, if I'm writing a murder mystery, and one character seems extremely nervous and suspicious from the get-go, that character is probably a red herring and not actually the murderer.

Just as I aged up Link and Zelda, so too have I aged up Riju, because her age is never stated in-game other than her being a child. So I have her be fourteen years old at the start of the story (which seems reasonable for her age in-game to me) and currently sixteen.

I really wanted to get across Link and Riju's relationship. I mean, Link has relationships with all of the new generations of Champions, but among them, I think that Riju is slightly special given that both are very enthusiastic about food, and also because Link sees in Riju a younger sister. Because Link didn't get a chance to really get to know Riju on Vah Naboris, given that she only knew Riju as 'Ruboona' and not as Riju herself. Since I robbed Riju of that during the Parapan arc, I gave her a chance to get to know Riju Riju in this arc. Found families are important to me. Please don't mistake this for romance! Link is twenty years old at this point and I had absolutely no intention whatsoever of implying romance between them. For those who have not lost families (and good to hear on that), it might be difficult to understand how two seeming strangers can get so close, but it happens. It did to me.

Link's not too good at maths!

My favourite food of all time is actually plov, which is a touch similar to pilaf but not really. Pilaf's the closest thing that in Delicious in Wilds to it. As for why I opted to give Impa my favourite food, it's more that I was looking for something that would include as many "Kakariko" specials as possible: carrot and poultry immediately sprang to mind.

I unironically thought that the symbol on the Champion tunic that Link wears in-game was supposed to be a lobster or a crayfish akin to Link's pyjamas from The Wind Waker. It wasn't until I did the Trial of the Sword that I suddenly realised that it's in fact supposed to be the Master Sword. You cannot believe my face when I saw that.

It's true that friendships in times of peril don't always well translate to friendships in time of, well, normal-ness.

Young zora children are known as "pups", like shark pups.

And wew there, Sidon's a wonderful person who absolutely cannot read the mood, and it's not like Link told him not to tell everyone. After all, Link had accepted that she would be the chosen one. She was ready to tell them. And then the Master Sword didn't choose her.

By the way, the next chapter is a doozy and will take me approximately two days to finish the editing for (a total of eight hours of work or so). Therefore: no chapter tomorrow. Sorry about that! (Addition on 07 November 2017: this is no longer the case. I went ahead and proofed it all in one day!)

Up next: telling the truth; good-bye; winter played on an accordion.

Beta reader's comments: What a cute chapter! This chapter is the culmination of this period of cozy reacquainting.

Next chapter is sort of cozy, too, but in a different way. It's also my favourite chapter in the series, so look forward to that.

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef tells the chef's friends and allies the truth of having been the former chosen hero, yet also having been rejected by the sacred sword. Then the travelling chef and the travelling minstrel embark upon a winter-long road-trip: the hunt for the one hundred and twenty shrines, as well as the fifteen towers.

Chapter Notes

To all my readers: I'm posting this early because it's very long. It's the second-longest chapter of Delicious in Wilds, clocking in at 22 760 words. Please take it slowly! I probably should have split it up into two chapters, honestly, but here we are. Even if I did, it'd be two very long chapters. Reading such a long chapter online can be quite bothersome; if you're interested in me uploading a file or the google doc that contains the chapter content to download and read offline, please let me know and I'll do so. Because this is such a long chapter, the proofreading for HTML issues/checking for continuity errors/etc. took over eight hours, and both myself and my beta reader were quite tired by the end. Please feel free to tell me if something doesn't make sense or if I just left out a paragraph or something. Wew! Thank you so much for reading, and thank you for bearing with this sort of chapter.

Author's notes that wouldn't fit in the end: Congratulations on getting through the second longest chapter in the entirety of Delicious in Wilds! I started writing this chapter at 12:19 on the fifth of August, and finished writing it on at 09:28 on the sixth of August. I should note that I was up quite literally all night writing this, writing just about non-stop for nearly twenty-four hours. That isn't the first time I've done that though!

This is one of my favourite chapters of the entire fic. I think my favourite might be the eightyeth chapter, but we'll get there when we get there.

We're now over three-quarters of the way through Delicious in Wilds. That's right! We are indeed just about nearing the end here. These chapters have such a different feel to them compared to the ones from the very beginning of Delicious in Wilds. As Link's world-view and priorities have evolved, so has the fic. I tried to match the writing style and what we focus on to match what Link would have focused on, and the longer chapter lengths are a function of her—more and more—seeing her life as continuous instead of just snapshots from meal to meal.

I should probably note that when Link says that she loves Sarie, it is absolutely not romantic love of any kind. I hadn't even considered the possibility until someone else inquired in confusion about it. You can say I love you to your friends, y'know!

Sanidin Park is named after Sanidin, the harp (ages), using the 'Sa-' naming convention, such that the actual name of the harp is 'nidin'.

Link messes up the 'fancy title'; it should be Champion of Sageru, Hero of Parapa, Divine Beast Vah Naboris's Pilot, O Courageous Riju.

In the faith of the Golden Goddesses as told by the manual of A Link to the Past and first mentioned in Ocarina of Time, the Golden Goddesses made the mythical Triforce at the point where the three of them met as they left the atmosphere. However, by the time of Delicious in Wilds, knowledge of the Triforce has been mostly lost, with a few singular exceptions, such as the Lanayrish faith which refers to a Golden Force that is typically taken as a symbol of the Golden Goddesses' omnipotence in having created the world and not as an actual object.

As a remember, not everyone knows how to read sign language. It's much much more common in the Hyrule of Delicious in Wilds than it is in many places of the real world, but it's still something that not everyone knows. And yes, it's an issue (as you can see here), in addition to the guards being suspicious of Riju for not having a Tabanch accent. Also, reminder that Tabanch is the adjectival form of Tabantha!

The meals taken in Ordon are breakfast, dinner, and supper, as opposed to breakfast, lunch, and dinner.

Chief Rouru of Elrora is a reference to the Ocarina of Time manga, the watarara being prototype rito later adapted for use in The Wind Waker. I mostly included the reference for the relationship to The Wind Waker and as a bit of trivia and less as a reference to Ocarina of Time.

The road trip portion of this chapter is one of the most fun things I've ever written.

I use tali as the plural of talus. Beyond that, monsters mentioned in this chapter include: keeleon from A Link Between Worlds and Triforce Heroes; pengator from A Link to the Past; sir frosty (no really) from Spirit Tracks; eeno from Majora's Mask; and freezard from Ocarina of Time, although they're based off of their much cooler depiction from Twilight Princess.

Hebra is absolutely my favourite region in Breath of the Wild. It's just stretches of places to explore without NPCs. Beautiful.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Amali's home explodes into colour and noise and motion and heat all at once. They argue with one another; they discuss the possibilities; they ask her a thousand questions in a thousand tongues and she cannot understand a single one; they question her of why she has not told them before and of how long ago did she regain her memories and of why she has not made an effort to make this known before and of how she survived for a hundred years and of this Shrine of Resurrection business and of what happened during the Great Calamity one hundred years ago and of wait Yunobo how long ago did you say that Link came to Darunia and of wait Dorian how long ago did you say that Link came to Kakariko and of all the towers rising and the shrines lighting up and the Beasts Divine awakening happened at just the same time didn't it and of what are you trying to say, Riju and of and when exactly did Link wake up and of don't you see what this means? and of no what does it mean and of one hundred years ago the Calamitous One's approach brought the Beasts Divine and the shrines to life, and if they have come alive again and the chosen hero has returned to us, then the Calamitous One must be nearing—

Her heart. Her heart. Her heart that beats so loudly she cannot make out their words. Her palms that have slicked so damply with sweat that she cannot hold a blade, or even herself. Her lungs that have collapsed so deeply she cannot breathe, even if no lynel or Malice or person who bore her into this world has wrapped their hand around her throat.

And worst of all: her mouth that has parched so drily, past the aridity of the southern Parapan deserts, past the rain-less ice of the desiccated Hebric mountains where not even snow will pass from the heavens, past even the wastes of the Eldic badlands where moisture has not existed in thousands upon thousands of years, that she cannot swallow even the paella on the plate.

A month or two ago, standing in Ruto before the King Zora, she would have bowed before the Champions, would have stepped forward, would have—could have—taken her place among them. Maybe.

The skills to carry a slate about on her hip, to dive into a Divine Beast, to puzzle out the methodologies behind how to reach each terminal, to plan out the defeat of the Malice, to at length cleanse the Divine Beast do not necessarily translate into the skills she might need to stop the Calamitous One.

After all, she does not exactly know what happened on the eve of the Great Calamity. The Calamitous One vanished, or perhaps was sealed within the castle, and the girl with the golden hair—the Princess of Hyrule—vanished with it, or perhaps sealed it, or perhaps sacrificed herself to rid the world of the Calamitous One entirely. She does not know how much she contributed, or if she even did contribute, or what the Shrine of Resurrection does, or why she slumbered for one hundred years, or what happened to the blade of evil's bane to bring it to the lost woods, or anything at all.

But no matter what happened, the sword that seals the darkness chose her. Someone, or something, must have believed in her. And now, nothing does.

She does not need to know how to read people well to see the desperation upon their faces, to see the hope beyond hope that could have lead a king to force his daughter to pray years in and years out on the slim chance that the royal family did descend from the Goddess Hylia, that whatever sacred sealing magic might have passed through the bloodline had not left in the long generations of ten thousand years, that perhaps the girl with the golden hair could become their saviour to deliver Hyrule from the Calamitous One.

She does not need to know how to read people well to see that they now look upon her with that same expression, hope beyond hope, that perhaps the girl with the cooking pot can, now, become their saviour to deliver the land once known as Hyrule from the Calamitous One's return.

These days she has tried so hard to prepare herself for a life of a person again. These days she has tried so hard to make do with herself as Link, as Link born in Ordon, as Link who has come to Romani Ranch for the star of the ranch to shoot arrows into her shoulder and to feed Miyu scraps and perhaps to learn to play an ages or an ocarina again in time to the ranch owners' songs. Only this, and nothing more.

And now the ghost of Impa's gaze has returned. They talk about her as if she were no longer a person. Not a person but a Champion of Hylia. She remembers Daruk and his brothers, his sons, his fathers that have never appeared in the legends of the Champion of Goro-goro; she remembers Revali and the Ilari that he put on the map, his pride and joy which goes unremarked, where most seem to think Revali grew up in Medli; she remembers Urbosa and her childhood fighting the fingers of fate in her hometown of Rovah, her mothers and sister who believed in her so, never spoken; she remembers Mipha and her silversmithy, forever unsung.
No longer a person, but a Champion. Like the King Zora, losing his very name in deference to the people that he must serve.

They yell at one another. That another Calamity approaches. That already they have spent six seasons with the Calamitous One potentially in control of the Divine Beasts. That at any moment the Calamitous One could seize control of the Divine Beasts once again. That nothing stops the Calamity but time. That they live on borrowed time.

And then: those words. That phrase. The sword that seals the darkness. The blade of evil's bane. The—Sidon shouts out that, although Link has not yet retrieved the sword that seals the darkness, he has utmost faith in her ability to seek it. Yunobo scratches his jaw and inquires about why Link did not awaken with the blade of evil's bane already in hand. Amali suggests that they could search wherever this Shrine of Resurrection might be and that she could fly them there on the Divine Beast she pilots.

Waving her hands, Riju jumps up and down in her efforts to catch everyone's attention and, when they ignore her for her short stature, scales up Kaneli's body to perch on his head and yell out at everyone that they could simply ask Link instead of speaking about her like a piece of furniture. And then Link grabs her own cooking pot and smashes it against the floor with a bang loud enough to shake the entire house.

Silence.

She grips the rim of the cooking pot so tightly that the metal imprints arcs along her palms, that the scars on her right hand shiver her arm with pain, that the veins on the back of her hand stand out from her paled skin, and she lifts her chin to stare at everyone in the room.

Kaneli, Riju, Yunobo, Amali, Sidon, Dorian, Teba, Saki, Tulin, Koko, Cottla, Notts, Kotts, Cree, Kheel, Genli. All of them.

She draws herself up. She lets go of the cooking pot and her clammy fingers remain clawed for a few moments before she can move them again.

She inhales through her nose and exhales through her mouth. She counts the beat-beat-beats of her heart. She lowers her eyelids so that she cannot see; she would put her hands over her ears except that then she could not speak. Three, and two, and one.

"I searched for the sword. I found it. I know where it is." She can hear murmurs, can hear gasps, can hear footsteps creaking the floorboards. "And...I tried to draw it again. I tried to pull the sword from the stone. I..." She will not falter. She will not run. She has had enough of running.

She will not fall backwards in faint to someone's words. She will not duck her head and flee. She will not escape under the cover of night to seek something of comfort, to seek someone to dry her tears. She will not leave them on a rooftop with a destiny behind her. She will not venture off on her own time, believing her duty done, while the Calamitous One looms overhead. She will not run.

She has had enough of running.

"I can tell you all where it is. And I can tell you how to get there. And I can leave with you with someone who knows the way and who can help you. But." Link breathes. She can talk. She can talk. Even if she disappoints them, even if they hate her, she can talk. She has herself, and she has her cooking pot, and she has her hands to cook with and her boots to walk the paths of the land once known as Hyrule, and she has Ilia beside her, and she has Romani Ranch waiting for her, and they deserve nothing but the truth. "Yunobo, do you remember, on the Divine Beast, when I didn't eat for an entire day? Sarie and I went to the lost woods. The woods north of the Hylia River, north of Rauru Province, in that little lake between Eldin and Tabantha. I don't know what it's called.

"They were covered with fog. Sarie said that you need a korok there with you or the woods take you, or something like that. I don't know. I don't know everything about this. But they held my hand all the way. The woods are...I don't know if they're magical or what they are, but you have to ignore the trees and the sounds. There's a wind in the woods and you follow it. You walk with the wind—so it's blowing on your back—to leave, and you walk into the wind to get to where the sword is.

"I don't know much else about it all. You have to lift up the blade, pull it from the stone. When you do, you get this...horrible feeling. I don't know if it's the same for everyone, but it's like pain all over your body. It's not real. It's just the sensation of it.

"But I don't know what happens if the sword doesn't choose you. I don't know if you just..." Her voice trails off.

When Link attempts to reach for her satchel, her hands touch emptiness at her right hip. She opens her eyes, but she does not look at anyone around her. Link pats herself down. Her belt: in her and Riju's room.

She starts to walk. The crowd parts silently as though she drew a canyon in the abyss where fell her feet. She moves towards her room. Some of the people around her start to follow, but she holds an arm up; they stop in their tracks. Sidon continues a few paces forward before Yunobo catches his hand to whisper an explanation.

Link walks on. To her and Riju's room. She opens the door to notice Sarie curled up on the pillow. She closes the door behind her.

She touches Sarie's head. Sensing Sarie stir beneath her fingertips, Link traces her hand down the side of Sarie's face and takes one of their little hands into hers.

"Sarie. Sarie. Sarie." She writes the words into Sarie's abdomen. Link listens to Sarie kooloo sleepily at her. The leafy mask of Sarie's face uncurls as they rouse from their sleep. "Sarie, do you remember the way to the lost woods? Do you remember how to get to the sword?"

Sarie shakes their head. "What's...going on, Link? Who's everyone? Link looks sad. Did something happen?"

"Sarie, I..." To tell Sarie that Link has fulfilled her promise. To tell Sarie that she has taken them at least close to their home. To tell Sarie that she found nothing in that home but the shroud of the sword that seals the darkness. "...have a favour to ask of you. You can say no. But I have to ask.

"You don't remember this right now, but you will. There's a song...there's a song...there's a song that'll help you remember, I think. You led me through the lost woods." Link describes the trip to Sarie, who bobs their head, drowsily at first, and then more alertly. "You talked about another person you met, once. Someone who threw away an ocarina. I made you cream of mushroom stew with radish and truffle, and a mushroom I found in a log. You remember that? It's all right if you don't remember.
"I have a favour to ask."

"What is it? Even if Sarie doesn't remember, Sarie would do anything for Link."

Link lifts her hands to her eyes, but the fingers no longer come away wet. She has cried herself out the past couple of days; now the tears have given way to a quiet resolve, to a tempered blade sunk into her spine, forcing her to stand erect.

"Sarie, when I tried to pull the sword from the stone, it didn't accept me. It didn't choose me. It...it rejected me. I'm not the chosen one anymore, but I want to go activate these shrines. I've got a promise.

"So I want you to help them. I want you to help them. Please. I can't do it. I can't do it. But you can. You can help them, Sarie. They're the Champions. Their Divine Beasts have chosen them. Just look at everything that they've done. But the sword hasn't chosen me. I'm not...I'm not the chosen one anymore, all right? But you can help them find another one."

Sarie tilts their entire body. "Sarie doesn't understand but Sarie will help! What does Link want Sarie to do? Sarie doesn't get all this about chosen heroes, but Sarie knows lots about making Link food if Link's sad!"

"...thank you, Sarie. What I want you to do." To somehow make the blade of evil's bane choose her again. "I want you to stay with my friends here. You've met them all. At least you've met Yunobo and Riju. They're kind. They're good people: brave, and smart, and strong in all of the ways I'm not anymore. So please, stay with them. I'll teach them the song. When you go to the lost woods, just hold their hand and let them walk into the wind. They'll find someone to be the chosen one. Can you do that?"

"Link doesn't...doesn't want Sarie around anymore?" Sarie asks. Link squeezes shut her eyes for a moment before she reaches down her own throat to pull up courage from her stomach. It tastes of paella. She swallows down bile rising up with it. "But Link found Sarie! In hide-and-seek! Link found Sarie!"

"Sarie." Her words. She will not run away. Not anymore. "I do want you around. I promised you that I'd bring you home, didn't I? I'm going to do that. Whether that home is with your other koroks, or if it's on Romani Ranch with me. I'll find you a home. I found myself one, too. They're everywhere, if you look hard enough."

Sarie croons. They raise their tiny hand to curl their roots around Link's forefinger; Link feels the shudder pass down from her crown to her toes. She rocks back on her heels.

"I want to travel with you, Sarie. I've loved having you as my companion. I love you, Sarie, so thank you for being with me all these weeks, these months. But sometimes we have to give things up to help everyone." Link breathes out. "You can say no. You can travel with me if you want. I promise that after you all find another chosen one, I'll come by, and we can travel again for as long as you want. And I'll make you all the loam in the world. No matter what you pick. I'm serious. You can say no."

"If Sarie says no, then...people might be in trouble? Sarie needs to help them find a new chosen one. If Sarie says no, then Sarie's being...selfish."

"I'm being selfish too. I could stay with you all. I made another promise, to Kass, to Floof—" Sarie laughs; Link brushes their forehead with the knuckle of her forefinger. "—for the shrines. You're the one who told me that having a korok around—something about being a navigator for us—"
Link nods. "A navigator...Sarie can do that. Sarie can be the navigator!" Sarie twirls up into the air on their korok leaf to pap Link's cheek with their little hand. "Sarie knows how to be a navigator! Sarie just has to hold hands, and then Link—or Link's friends—know where to go! That's all Sarie has to do as a navigator?"

"That's all you have to do, Sarie."

"Then Sarie will do it! And when Link comes back from all the shrines, and Sarie helps find the new chosen hero with the swordy-sword thingy, then Link has to make Sarie aaaaaaaaaaaaall the loam in the whole wide world!" Sarie holds out their hand. "Link has to promise!"

"I promise." Link takes Sarie's hand; they shake their entire body.

"No, no. Put out your little finger!" Link obliges, and Sarie curls a root around it. "There. That's a promise. And Sarie loves Link too! Sarie might not remember a lot and might forget plenty of things, but I'll never forget you, Link, not even if you forget me."

Link looks at them, and Sarie looks at her, and Link opens her arms to gather Sarie into a hug. Whatever else happens, she'll come back for Sarie.

"Travellers like us have to stick together, don't we? Until we both get all our memories back, and then some." She buries her face in Sarie, trapped in the crook of her arm. Sarie hugs the closest part of Link they can reach: her nose. "Besides, I promise you that I'll make you all the loam in the whole wide world. That's gonna take me a long time."

Sarie lets go. Link releases them. They drift down to the pillow. Sarie looks back past Link's shoulders, to the closed door, beyond which Link can hear the just-audible murmur of the crowd outside.

They take Link's forefinger in their two very small hands. "Link has places to go now, don't you?"

Places to go. Always somewhere else to go.

She closes her eyes. Her eyelids tremble. Turning, she opens the door: Riju at the forefront, who asks her if they can come inside. Link nods. The sea of people attempts to squeeze into the room or else gathers outside the door, whispering to one another the goings-on, craning their heads to peer at Link and at the korok who whirls up to perch on her shoulder. She turns back towards everyone.

Kaneli, Riju, Yunobo, Amali, Sidon, Dorian, Teba, Saki, Tulin, Koko, Cottla, Notts, Kotts, Cree, Kheel, Genli. All of them.

"One hundred years ago," Link says, and her fingers shake, "I was chosen by the...the sword. I was the Champion of Hylia, the Hero of Hyrule, Her Majesty's Knight, O Courageous Link. I knew all of the Champions. They were among the closest friends I've ever had. And I knew the Princess, too. I...don't know what happened during the Great Calamity. I was honest when I said that I'd lost my memories. I was...I just wasn't entirely honest about when I got them back."

She breathes. Link sways under the weight of their gazes upon her. She listens to her own words parroted back to her through Sidon's interpreter.

"I just...didn't think that I could do it. And then, thanks to all of you, I realised I could." Her hands still. "No, I...I only thought I could. That's why I went after the sword. But the sword didn't choose me. Not this time."
"So I'm sorry. I'm sorry that I'm not the chosen one anymore. I was, and you're right about that. I don't know what happened during the Calamity. I don't have my memories of it. They've come back in bits and pieces but there's still entire years completely blank in my head. Like...like a wheel of cheese missing a slice. It's still cheese, still good, but...but missing a slice. I don't know what happened to the Calamitous One, or who put me in the Shrine of Resurrection, or what happened to the...to the Princess. I can't even remember her name."

Like the girl who smelled of horses. Like the girl with the golden hair, whose name Link cannot remember. Or, maybe, somewhere in her heart of hearts, is afraid to remember.

"This is my friend, Sarie. They're a korok. I found them in Lanayru, and they, too, have lost their memories. I don't know much about them. But there's a song that gives them enough back that they can lead you to the sword. Does anyone have an instrument? An ocarina?" Kheel raises her wing, but Link shakes her head. "I can't sing. It has to be an instrument. An ocarina, or a harp—"

Riju.

Riju, who crosses the room to her own bed, who opens her belongings, where Link can see an instrument case wrapped in cloth. Riju, who opens the case to reveal within a six-stringed Parapan harp.

The Goddess Sageru, a star upon Her chest, holding Her harp. Link can remember Marin's voice. The blessed ages, the Sanidin, in the green, blue, and red of the Golden Goddesses, with its six strings, two for each of the Goddesses. A string for fire and a string for power; a string for water and a string for wisdom; a string for wind and a string for courage.

Courage. Link inclines her head. "I don't know if I remember how to play, so I'm sorry if this sounds awful. But I'll try."

"Then, that's all we can ask of you," Riju answers, holding the harp as the Goddess Sageru would, her voice cracked down the middle, every syllable driving the knives deeper into the pads of Link's heels.

When she takes the harp into her hands, its heaviness curves down into her palm. She strums. She strums the harp, and she presses her fingers down on the strings, and she remembers the chords that Urbosa's friend taught her, and she remembers the notes that the girl with the golden hair taught her, and she remembers the memories of younger days that she has lost and found and denied and accepted and carries with her now, as that which was and as that which she is and as that which influences whom she shall be.

She strums the harp, and she plays for them the minuet. The Minuet of Forest. The ode to the Goddess Kokir. The song of memories.

When she finishes, Link returns the harp to Riju, who repeats the song back to her. Back and forth, back and forth. Kheel begins to sing along. Her sisters join in to add their harmony. Riju strums, and Link passes on the song passed down to her.

"The Princess of Hyrule taught me that song. One of the lullabies her mother used to sing for her." Link closes her eyes. She faces everyone.

Sarie, Kaneli, Riju, Yunobo, Amali, Sidor, Dorian, Teba, Saki, Tulin, Koko, Cottla, Notts, Kotts, Cree, Kheel, Genli. All of them.

Link bows her head, her upper body, down to her waist. "I'm sorry that I'm not the chosen one anymore. If there's ever anything I can do, I'll do it. And if I ever recover my memories, I'll come see you all." Link dips her head again, yet she forces her gaze up from her boots, meeting the eyes of the people around her. "I hope you can forgive me."

Kaneli opens his beak as if intent on saying something. Teba and Dorian reach towards him to close his mouth at the same time.

Link wavers on her feet. She rocks back and forth again on her heels. "I'll be on the road, but I'll try to write letters if I can. And if you ever need me, there's ways to find me. Just listen for Kass's accordion." She wobbles.

"Link!"

Sidon. Sidon's voice. Sidon, handing his cane to his translator with such force that the translator nearly topples over, stepping up towards Link, pulling her into an embrace, picking her up as though she weighed nothing, gazing her cheeks to blood on the harshness of the scales lining his face.

"Link, thank you for everything that you've done for us! I want to see you around more, selfishly! I understand that you have shrines to see to, doing your part in aiding us in the fight against the Calamitous One!" Sidon squishes Link against him, so tightly that Link almost cannot breathe, but a lack of breathing that feels nearly...good. Warm, and safe, and comfortable, like under a blanket with the air just a tad too stuffy, yet so safe that she would not want to poke her head outside until the heat became overbearing. The comfort of someone who has faith in her, of someone who believes in her, of someone who loves her. "You taught me that prophecies don't always come true exactly as we think they will! If the sword that seals the darkness has not chosen our Link, it is only because we cannot yet see the ocean! Keep swimming! The river will take you there! And even if our Goddess chooses another to take up the legendary sword, that does not diminish for an instant everything that you, our Link, our most courageous, most wonderful, most talented, most skillful, most trusting, most faithful, most loyal, and most incredible at cooking Link has done!"

Link opens her eyes. Sidon cannot gaze at her, yet she prays that he can hear the quickness in her breaths, the thumping of her heart.

No. She does not need to pray that someone will understand past her expression. She has her hands. She has her words.

"...thank you," Link signs against his throat. "That means more to me than you know."

"You mean more to me than you know!" Sidon embraces her again. Her spine does not bend that way, and her neck does not go in that angle. Link wraps her arms around him in turn. "If you have lost your faith in yourself again, then I will believe in you twice over! Thrice over! And not because of some prophecy, but because I've observed you with my own two ears and my own two hands, and I know what you can do, Link!"

"N-not just Sidon. Me too," Yunobo interjects. "I'm not smart enough to know what the Goddesses are trying to do. Th-that doesn't take away everything you've done for us, blade or not. We can find s-someone else for the sword, right? I care about you because when everyone else thought that it couldn't be helped and that all we could do was protect ourselves from Vah Ruda-rudania, you calmed me down, and you went with me, a-and you risked your life to save p-people you don't even know. That's why we're h-here. Even before we knew about this ch-chosen hero stuff, right?"

She notices Amali nodding her head. "I trusted you over carrot cake, long before I learned you carried the slate."
"Whatever the Goddesses have in store for us, we need to believe in Them," Riju remarks. "It may mean that you don't have to bear blade of evil's bane any longer. It may mean that our Goddesses don't think we need it for the fight ahead. We don't have a princess either. Then, no blessed blood and no sacred sword." Link recalls the line from Kass's song. "If They have chosen someone else, then They will guide them to the sword. Sarie—their name is Sarie, you said?—will help. All of us will help. Then, we just need to put our trust in our Goddesses, and we need to keep fighting. All of us."

She meets Link's gaze with her own, Link's the shade of the coming storm, Riju's the hue of the solid earth, and where the land and sky meet Link can see the infinite stretch of the horizon all around her.

"Link, you need look no further than your own body to see all that you have done. You look no further than the room around you—" Riju gestures towards the gathered congregation. "—to see that you have brought us all together. You, and that cooking pot of yours. You gave me your courage, so let me give some back."

Link has no more tears to shed, but, when Sidon places her down upon the floorboards, her eyes sting. Her cheeks remain dry. Yet, as Riju moves in to hug her, and as Amali hugs her, and as Yunobo hugs her, and as Sidon picks up all four of them into a great embrace, she has not just come home to a house, but come home to peace.

Teba crosses his chest with his wings. "Well I'll be plucked."

Dorian clears his throat. "I feel as though Lady Impa should be made aware of these proceedings. You should consider making your way to Kakariko if you're off on the road."

Link tries to nod amid the ball of warmth—of Riju, of Amali, of Yunobo, of Sidon—that surrounds her. When she can't, she sticks out one arm to curl her fingers into the symbol for being all right. She hears Sarie call out: "Link got it! She says she got it, cucco-doodle-doo!"

Kaneli hoots. "Order, order, everyone. As touching as this scene is. As disappointing as it is that we've seemingly gained and lost our chosen one in a single night. As splendid as it is that we now know not only the location of the legendary sword but also how to retrieve it, it is also the middle of the night. Hoo here wishes to stay up? With Prince Sit-on—" Saki whispers into Kaneli's ear. "—excuse me, Prince Sidon here, we should discuss logistics on the morrow. Now, everyone, please have a good and peaceful night. You can continue—" He yawns. "—at some less unholy hour. Even Erito has fallen asleep, I'm sure."

Sidon sets down Yunobo, Amali, Riju, and Link; Yunobo sets down Amali, Riju, and Link; Amali sets down Riju and Link; and Riju and Link hold to one another for another brief moment before parting.

Turning her head towards Sarie, Riju bows low to them. "Thank you so much, Sarie."

"The least Sarie can do for—" Sarie scrunches up their korok leaf. "—Jangly!"

"Jangly?" Riju covers her mouth with her hand to laugh.

"All Jangly's jangly bits jangle when Jangly moves!" Sarie taps Riju's armbands and anklets, her earrings and necklace. She dips her head. "Sarie thinks they're really pretty! Like music wherever Jangly steps. Music-y-music-y-music. Song-y-song-y-song."

Link glances at Riju. "I think you'll have to play that song when we get closer to the lost woods, to Riju nods. "Then, I'll keep that in mind. And thank you, Link, for figuring this out, thank the Goddesses."

A touch on her shoulder. Link and Riju both look up at Dorian, who waves to Link. "I don't mean to interrupt. I do have a request."

Link tilts her head.

"And a question. When do you plan to leave, do you think?"

She rubs the back of her head. "I was...going to just leave right away, 'cause I thought you'd all hate me or something..."

Riju's brow knits together. Yunobo, Amali, and Sidon all start speaking at once in their haste to reassure her or in their shock that Link would even suggest such a thing. Sidon stops first; Riju waves her arms to quiet Yunobo and Amali, to not overwhelm Link.

Dorian clears his throat again. "Before you leave, I'd like you to make that pilaf again. Goddess knows I can't, and my daughters adored it."

Link nods. She looks up at the others, at Riju, at Amali, at Yunobo, at Sidon. "If you all don't mind," she signs, slow enough that Sidon's interpreter can whisper in his ear without having to trip over herself, "I'd like to cook with you all, too. And then make a promise. Here's our menu: deliciously grilled rock roast, Darunia-style; fish pie, Ilari-style; fried bananas, Rovah-style; and seafood paella, Ruto-style." She pauses. "And sometime, Amali, you should show me how to make cannoli. You promised you would after we met Kaneli."

Amali's cheeks darken. "If I promise anything, then I'll always go all the way. We'll make canoli whenever we can."

Link bobs her head. She feels her ponytail against the back of her neck, untied, and looks back to see Sarie perched on her shoulder, her hair wound around their little hands.

She raises her hands to say something again. Then a yawn overpowers her. Sidon attempts to scoop her up, misses, and drags her up by her legs. A rapid intervention from Yunobo saves her. Riju directs Sidon to lay Link down upon the bed. Link curls up on the pillow. Amali smooths her brow.

"Chief Kaneli has the right idea. Come on. Let's get all these kids to bed."

"I'm fine to talk about the—!" Riju's own yawn cuts her off; Amali arches an eyebrow. Sighing, Riju crosses her arms over her chest. "Then, tomorrow. First thing."

Link sleeps. Not fitfully. Not in the fevers of malice, not in the pain of healing, not under the pressures of the chosen one or not, not under the cloak of her own lies and equivocations, not under anything but the blanket that keeps her warm and the love that she can feel poured onto her with every gaze upon her.

When tomorrow comes, her insecurities may come to bite her yet again. When tomorrow comes, the weight of the sword that seals the darkness may again haunt her. When tomorrow comes, the Calamitous One may strike, and she may not live to see the sunrise at all. But that is tomorrow, and this is tonight.

Tomorrow comes, and the stars do not crash down around her boots to electrify the earth, nor does the moon splash into the sea to well the waves up into pillars of ice, nor does the sun spread an inferno over the land once known as Hyrule to burn away the greenery of the wilds she loves and the people that she loves even more. Tomorrow comes and the Champions hold their meetings.
Tomorrow comes and Link arranges cooking lessons.

Deliciously grilled rock roast, she realises, does not carry over well to the chillier regions of Tabantha. Instead Link ushers her friends into a field trip to the Divine Beast Vah Rudania, for two reasons: so that they can turn up the heat, and so that she has an excuse to see Ilia again. She ends up spending most of the day just on Ilia, introducing Amali and especially Riju more properly to her four-hoofed companion.

Rijua stands very solemnly before Ilia and kneels before her, offering her her an apple in her palms.
Ilia cronches the fruit. "Thank you for speeding Link on her journey," Riju says, her voice entirely serious.

Link laughs. Ilia whinnies and licks up Riju's face. Her bangs congeal up into a cowlick. Riju wears the cowlick proudly for the rest of the day. Before they leave the stable, Link snaps her fingers and catches Riju's attention.

"Riju, you really like sand seals, right?" Link moves her hand in circular, approximately sealshaped wheels. "Like the soft things on your bed."

Riju covers her mouth with her hand. "Ah, that is to say...I do happen to have a lot of such toys, yes."

Link flexes her fingers. She takes a stance in front of Riju, legs apart, muscles taut, expression tensed in concentration. Riju starts to part her lips, a question plainly written on her tongue, but Link raises a hand to stop her. "Wait wait wait. I have to get this right. I was practising last night and everything." Dipping her head, Riju's features shift into seriousness. Link emulates a clearing of the throat.

"Riju...as the Champion of Parapa, the Hero of Sageru, the Pilot of the Divine Beast of Nabooru, O Courageous Riju..."

Link draws herself up.

"...it's up to you..."

She inhales. She can do this. She can do this.

"...to sand seal the Calamitous One." Jazzing out her hands, Link grins crookedly at Riju. "Eh? Get it? Get it? Like seal, like sealing the Calamitous One, but sand seal. It took me all week to come up with that." She brushes imaginary dust from her chest. "Not bad, right? Seal? Do you seal-i-ously not see the pun? Do I need to seal the deal with another?" Link bites her thumb. "Wait, wait. I should've said, do you seal-i-ously not seal the pun. Or would that be too much pun in one sentence? What's the optimal pun density for things like this?" Link rubs her knuckles against her cheek. "I'm seal-ly not smart enough for this."

Riju blinks at her. She blinks at Riju. And then, all at once, Riju's entire face alights with a brightness to rival the sun, as though the Golden Goddesses had met at the point of her nose to form the world before Link's own eyes. Her brown eyes aglow, her smile broad, Riju laughs with the purest joy that Link has ever heard and tackles Link into an embrace that lands them in the hay.

Neighing, Ilia lowers her head to chew on Riju's hair. Link squeezes Riju tight. "That means she "Then, that's the highest praise I could imagine."

Riju and Link grin at one another, and Link wonders with a warmth in her chest of just how many homes she has found.

They take a field trip to the Divine Beast Vah Rudania again on a second day for the rock roast. Link stands with her hand on her chin to remember how to best cook the roast without anyone suddenly exploding into flames as Hestu did. Closing her eyes, Riju ponders out loud as well, until Yunobo nervously—tapping his index fingers against one another—points out that they simply have fireproof armour for zora, rito, and humans in stock.

Eventually the rock is roasted, and then grilled, and then deliciously-ed. Link, Amali, Riju, and Sidon present to Yunobo their respective deliciously grilled rock roasts for him to try. Yunobo sniffs at them having made him food, plucks up the rock roast deliciously grilled by Sidon, and crunches it into his mouth.

He spends the next hour nursing the crack in his tooth with a shard of sapphire. With every apology that issues from Sidon's mouth, Yunobo flushes redder, and redder, until Link suggests that Sidon step back lest Yunobo himself become rock roasted.

Next on the agenda: fish pie. Fortunately no Goddesses expressly forbid the consumption of fish, though Yunobo shies away from the thought of cooking with a living being. "Life is precious. That's why we eat rocks, right? So that we don't have to take life. There's a Goddess-given pride in being alive!"

Instead of fish pie, Yunobo makes sapphire and opal pie to go along with Link's explanation of techniques. Sidon stirs the ingredients so enthusiastically that the batter ends up everywhere but the bowl. Riju, less familiar with the baking of pies, leaves hers for too long in the oven. At least Yunobo's swift intervention at the smell of smoke keeps the kitchen from burning down. When they present their pies to Amali, she politely declines tasting them. Yet her eyes well up with tears all the same. The thought that counts.

Next: fried bananas. When Link and Riju—the latter holding the former's hand to keep Link from plunging into panic—descend into the marketplace in search of bananas, the merchants throw them glances so suspicious that the town guards arrive to arrest them. Riju and Link endeavour to explain, but Riju's thickly Parapan-accented Tabanch and the guards' inability to read the Tabanch off Link's fingers thwart their efforts at communication. As the guards march them towards the Sage of Erito that arbiters justice in Medli, Link indicates the slate on her hip and the similar slate on Riju's, whereupon the guards shout out that not only have Yiga entered their very precious Medli, but have also had the gall to filch slates from the Champions!

The arrival of Amali and Kaneli to the Temple of Erito brings the guards to apologise profusely. New to the force and eager to prove that they can defend Medli just as well as those who have left to fight against the Yiga, the guards elaborate, they leaped on the chance to show some no-good banana-lovers that Medli means business.

Amali runs her fingers through her ponytail of feathers. "If you were a Yiga, then would you stroll up to the market in broad daylight to ask for bananas, knowing that a love of bananas is one of the great Yiga stereotypes? I suppose that they've switched to another fruit by now. If that's so, then will you detain anyone seeking the sweetness of produce?"

Genli makes a long ooooh sound. "You tell 'em, Mom!"
Smiling tiredly, Amali looks over at her children—and Tulin—having evidently followed her here. "And what are you doing here, young lady?"

"Ehehehe..."

With bananas out of the question, Link swears to Riju that she will make Riju fried bananas, Rovah-style, another day. "Urbosa taught me how to do it," Link notes, "so I can sort of promise you that it's at least kind of authentic."

"So, that's why you call her Urbosa and not Lady Urbosa." Gasping so abruptly that Link almost jumps, Riju whirls around to grab Link's wrists. "Then, this means that you're an invaluable source of information! Oh, thank the Goddesses! There's so much I need to ask you!"

"I don't know if I remember it all," Link admits, "but I'll try."

Finally they come to the paella that Mipha loved. "It won't be as good as that shark you gave me in Ruto," she warns Sidon, "but I hope you like it."

Sidon shakes his head. His head-tail whacks Yunobo clear across the face and floods him onto the floor. When he swings his head back to the other side, Sidon's translator rapidly moves Amali out of harm's way, while Riju stands short enough that she merely tilts her chin up to blink at the tail swishing overhead.

"My," says Riju, slightly dazed, "but our Goddesses are surely capable of such wonderful creations."

They move all in on the seafood paella. Fish of every sort, crab, snail, and clam, although the selection in Tabantha differs quite significantly from that in Lanayru: more freshwater fish and less ocean, more cold water and less warm. The paella turn out better than either the pie or the rock roast, and certainly better than the bananas that resulted in Link's second arrest in her lifetime.

That she can remember.

They present the paella to Sidon, who eats the dishes voraciously. He pats his stomach when he finishes Amali's, then Riju's, then Link's, and then ends up in the medical ward for a good part of the day when Yunobo's sapphire paella freezes half of his face.

Tapping his index fingers together, Yunobo apologises for having momentarily forgotten that other people of the land once known as Hyrule do not, as a matter of fact, eat rocks.

Sidon takes not the worries to heart. Instead he thanks Yunobo for trying his hardest to make something Sidon would enjoy. He pumps Yunobo's hand and claps him on the back. "I hope that we'll be most fast friends! Any friend of our Link's a friend of mine! I'd trust her with just about anyone!"

Link inquires about how fared the paella. "And be honest, please."

Sidon scratches his throat. He considers with his head tilted that way, and then with his head tilted this way, and then—when the healer on duty asks him to please stop yelling so loudly that he wakes all of the other patients in the medical ward, to which he apologises and begins to murmur in a voice just as thundering—launches in on a long and praise-filled critique which indicates to Link, Riju, and Amali that they have done almost everything wrong.

Link blinks. Her mouth curves up into a smile so wide she could fit an entire plate in her mouth at once.
"See, and Mipha never told me any of this. She was so afraid to hurt me that I ended up making her terrible paella for years. I never knew!" Link claps her palm against her brow. "Thanks, Sidon. I knew I could count on you. I knew I could put my utmost faith in you!"

Sidon grins. Amali and Yunobo shield their eyes from the sheer sparkle of his teeth.

Link stays a few days more, making pilaf—for Dorian, Koko, and Cottla—and salmon meunière—for Genli—and the rest of what she has promised the children, cooking alongside Riju and sometimes the others, until she has no more excuses to stay. Just as whenever Mipha would come to see her in Ruto, and Link would buff out the same spot on the counter for hours on end to justify being able to listen to Mipha speak, she pulls every alibi she can.

At length, though, Yunobo, Riju, Sidon, and Amali must depart with their Divine Beasts to continue protecting the people of the land once known as Hyrule. And Link does not want, ever, to interfere with that.

At the stable, Link meets the captain of the Parapan royal guard: a tall brown-skinned gerudo woman in plate armour whom Riju introduces as Buliara. Buliara. She recalls Riju mentioned Buliara during their talks of her childhood. Link has the impression, in the affection with which Riju spoke, and in the tenderness of Buliara inquiring if Riju has fared well in Medli, something of a maternal warmth in Buliara's eyes. Link proposes to make Buliara a meal in celebration of their meeting and apologises for having left Nabooru before they could learn of one another.

Buliara chuckles. "For as much as my queen has told me about your cooking, I wish I could. Sadly, we have not the time."

"Then, next time," Riju declares. Buliara and Link nod their heads at the same time, their ponytails bouncing in unison.

Link bids them all not good-bye but see you later. First Amali, who goes on to scoop up all of her daughters, Koko, and Cottla; she kisses them on the foreheads and promises that she will soon return. Second Sidon, who gathers Link into an embrace, "most tight and warm, so that you won't forget it, Link!" Third Yunobo, who bawls as he swears to Link that they need to see each other more often than once in a year and a half. Next time Link comes to Darunia, Yunobo promises, promises will have to introduce her to all of his older brothers and his fathers and his friends. And last, Riju, who holds out her hand. Not a fist, but with her fingers together, palm facing Link. "The thing that you were trying to show me the first time." Link touches her palm to Riju's, then leans her arm back to slap Riju's hand. Riju recoils. She wrings her hand. "Is it supposed to sting like that?"

"It's something we did a hundred years ago, or at least that we did in Ordon," Link tells her.

"Ah! Like a little piece of history," says Riju; then her expression softens. "But it's not history to you, is it? It's life."

Link nods. They embrace.

Riju clings to her, and she to Riju. "Don't forget that you promised me those fried bananas."

"I couldn't if I tried."

They part near the stable. The four Champions and she, with Sarie perched now on Riju's head.

"When we next meet up," Link promises them all, "I'll make you all the Princess's favourite."
"The Princess's favourite?" Riju echoes. "Then, what is it?"

Link tugs one of her sidelocks. "I don't know yet. But I'm going to remember by then! I'll make sure of it! And if not, I'll make you something else and promise the favourite next time, so that we have to meet up again!" She beams at Sarie, who has picked up Riju's—much heavier—hair-loops as they once picked up Link's. "And loam for you too, Sarie."

They hug. They part. She waves them off.

And then she collects Ilia, and she trots down the path to the Divine Beast Vah Rudania, and she says hello again to Kass, who asks her how everything went.

Link inhales. She promises herself to tell him. About Amali, about the blade of evil's bane, about...herself. She will. She absolutely will, before they go their separate ways. Yet Link needs some time, and she has some thinking left to do, and she can see the long and winding path ahead of her.

Link cannot see the ocean. Nor does she know if there is an ocean, out there, somewhere. Yet she can swim with all her might.

"Well then," Kass intones, preparing an octave upon his accordion, "the songs say that there are one hundred and twenty shrines scattered throughout the land once known as Hyrule. Shall we?"

Link hooks her arm into his. "We shall."

He inquires, as well, about Sarie; Link explains that their companion has left on their own duties. Kass inclines his head. "I'll miss Sarie," he admits, "and I hope that we can travel with them again someday."

"I'll miss them too. How was the Divine Beast?"

Kass noisily hrmns in his throat and tugs on his collar. "That's a story for another time, I think. We've a journey ahead. Come, traveller."

Link unfurls her map. They embark on the painstaking process of marking down the shrines that she has already seen and activated. Kass points out that the shrines appear to somehow repel malice and monsters alike. Thus, he elaborates, most surviving villages in the present era have a shrine nearby or at their centre that keeps monsters at least somewhat at bay. "Wherever we go, we can start by investigating the local major villages and towns, or where they have been." Kass smooths down the feathers of his throat. "Aside from those, I have at least one hundred songs I know that have been passed down. I believe that some of them may refer to the same shrine. As well, we can inquire of locals if they know of shrines."

"One hundred and twenty," Link repeats.

Kass nods. "One hundred and twenty."

She nods sagely and touches her chin. "That's a lot of meals."

"It is a lot of meals."

Link nods sagely once more. Then she claps her hand upon her knees. "Then let's get going. We don't have much time to waste."

With the approach of winter, the travellers around the land once known as Hyrule become even sparser than before. Link imagines that the Divine Beasts will soon have their hands, or paws, or wings, or hooves, or claws, or whatever she might call the Divine Beast Vah Ruta's limbs, full with carting around people and produce from place to place.

Link charts her journey from the Great Plateau with the assistance of Kass, who knows vaguely each time that he has seen her. In the spring she awoke upon the Great Plateau with its evergreen apple trees and wild berries; she arrived in Medigo of Eldin to meet Kass for the first time by early summer and returned to Kakariko by summer's end. The long winding road to Tabantha took her towards early autumn. Leaving Tabantha and tracking down Marin's whereabouts took her past the harvest. She wintered with her family—Maryll and Miyu, Malon and Vish, Cremia and Romani—until just the dawn of the breeding season in the following spring, whereupon she met with Kass once more. To Parapa she went, where she spent most of the spring and early summer in its rising heat. From there she came to Lanayru during the thunderstorms of summer. Link met with Kass yet again in the early eaves of autumn and took to Ordon by the harvest. And now she stands again in + +Tabantha with the approach of winter on the chillier northeastern winds.

"I didn't realise that it'd been that long," Link signs in awe, gazing upon the calendar of the seasons that Kass has written down for her. "Over a year and a half. I'm at least nineteen now. Maybe even twenty. I just kind of lived meal to meal, day to day, breakfast to dinner to supper to breakfast..." Her stomach rumbles and she winces.

Kass chuckles. "It can be easy to forget who you are, and where you're going, when you're a traveller like you or I." He shuts one eye. "And it seems to me that we should set ourselves making a meal."

Link gathers up supplies in Medli first, enough for the coming journey, seasonings and spices, salts and fruits, fish and meats. She asks how long the sapphire in sapphire ice-box would last, if perhaps she might have one that will fair a few months. The merchants have one. She inquires about the price.

She leaves without it.

Since Link will walk on foot beside Ilia—as she and Kass cannot ride at once—she can afford to have Ilia carry greater weight in her saddlebags. She loads up Ilia on that which will not perish. The rest they will gather or hunt along the road.

"Do you mind me eating poultry?" she asks of Kass.

"Hm? No, not at all, traveller. I would prefer not to eat it myself, as such I was raised, but I have no qualms about you doing so."

Link thanks him profusely. That very afternoon she catches a rainbow sparrow and stuffs it with chillshroom to make her own version of a Hateno sunny-bird—though she has not the incredible way with names that Sarie did, she comes up with the term chilly-bird for it—just to indulge in the meat she has craved for months and which the cucco pilaf has reignited. For Kass, she prepares chilly-fish on trout fished out from the waters of Lake Totori. "Sorry," Link signs, rubbing the back of her head, "but I couldn't catch any porgy."

Kass arches an eyebrow. "You remembered."

"I always remember what my friends like to eat." He clears his throat in some semblance of embarrassment. Link leans forward. "I hope you don't mind me thinking of you as a friend."
The experience imparts a useful wisdom on her: the fishing pole Sidon gave her glimmers with luminous stone, bright enough to make fishing at night a breeze; bright enough to prompt slumbering fish into inspecting the light; and bright enough to attract every monster in the vicinity at once.

Kass suggests that they tackle Hebra before the lingering warmth of autumn exhales its last. Link counters that they travel through Tabantha first so that she can hunt monsters, trade in their parts for rupees and return for an ice-box and sturdier winter clothing lest Kass intend to cart around a hylian-shaped block of ice. Kass pretends to consider it for a moment, then relents: "If you were frozen, then who would cook me my meals?"

Tabantha's shrines first. At Hoskit, at Ilari—which Link beams to see surviving after all of these years, the town that Revali put on the map—and at the Warbler's Nest of Elrora, whose Chief Rouru thanking Link to assisting them in fending off a scourge of wayward fire dancers with a quiver of various types of arrows. And several shrines with songs dedicated to them. As Kass and Link suspected, some of the shrines relate to two or more songs that they yoke together to uncover the shrines’ secrets. In Ilari, Link sells off the monster parts she has gathered and purchases an ice-box alongside thick feathered clothing for the winter; many, many blankets; a ruby rod; and bags upon bags of flint and emergency firewood. And, of course, protection from the cold for Ilia.

Then: to Hebra.

Link knows nothing at all of Hebric save for the universal stomach rumbling of I hunger. Kass knows enough to get by and to translate songs. The Hebra region, Link observes, consistently mainly of rito, sheikah, gerudo, and some adventurous goron that brave the cold. Not as populated as the warmer climes of the land once known as Hyrule. the higher they climb, the further Hebra becomes a landscape of snow and ice, of twisted rock and permafrost immutable, so cold that Link even notices the numbers of monsters thin out.

Frost-breathing lizalfos and pebblits of ice greet them. White-winged keese and snowy chuchu swarm around them. White-furred wolfos hunt down the moose and woolly rhinos that populate the mountains. Here and there, massive frost tali awaken to almost bring Link and Kass to ruin on their breaths alone.

Other, stranger monsters appear: floating flowers of ice that belch out explosives; greenish bird-like beings with mouths that open into long serrated jaws and which can slide down their bellies at speeds to match Link's efforts at surfing away on her pot lid; living beings that arise from the snow to chuck their own heads at the travellers; sludge-like puddles that well up from the snowfields to toss giant balls of snow; hunched icy titans with all too many rubied eyes and visible beating hearts that exhale cold onto unsuspecting passersby before their whirling minions drag the frozen corpses to the titans' maws.

At least the wildberry and safflina grow plentifully here.

The hunt for shrines in Hebra proves long and difficult. Navigation among the snow when the frequent blizzards force them to shelter in caves become tedious at best and nightmarish at worse. Kass, furthermore, discovers that the songs do not help when most landmarks look exactly the same as any other in their mountains upon mountains of ice. "I could not guess as to what means a white bird," he muses aloud, examining his notes. "A fir tree, certainly, but would the same fir tree exist however many years after this song was recorded? I have not the slightest idea."

They scale the northern summit of Hebra, the peak of Mount Yeta, to find nothing resembling a white bird. Only several days later do they happen to stumble upon a flash of orange in the side of a plateau, and only after Link has activated the shrine within do they realise that the white bird referred to a vaguely bird-shaped plateau visible from the summit.

Kass clicks his tongue and shakes his head. "I do believe," he remarks, "that poets best well not write while inebriated."

While Kass takes care of the shrine-hunting, pleading the locals for information that they often give in exchange for Link presenting them something of her cooking pot or agreeing to take part in their local pastimes—for a most modest sum of rupees, of course—Link hunts local wildlife and gathers their plants and fungi. The moose in particular net fine and fatty meat for the effort that they take. After a woolly rhino gouges out Link's right thigh—causing her and Kass to take shelter in the gerudo-rito village of Pashli until she recovers—yet only provides the same amount of meat as a moose and not even as delicious, Link learns to hunt more the moose than the rhino. Not for fear of her own gouging, but for fear of what might happen to Ilia.

Link snaps pictographs of everything that she can. Handiwork of drawings that she makes in the snow. The Hebric tower that rises up into the sky. The black-and-gold shield she wins and declines to take in a competition of surfing down the snowy slopes. The towering metal doors whose iced-over surface clings to Kass's flight feathers while he squawks for her to "do something! What...what are you doing with the slate? A pictograph!?" The ancient skeleton he and Link uncover guarding over a shrine—he wonders if, ten thousand years ago, the ancient Sages had meant for the chosen hero to fight such a beast—and the damned square of water that Link tramps up and down the snowfields to freeze with cryonis before she can trick one of the sludge-like monsters into throwing a snowball large enough to knock down the massive metal doors. The violet-striped silver lynels which beat her to within a millimetre of her life; steadily Link learns how best to approach the lynels from behind and mount them before they notice her, how best to daze them and blind them with arrows to the eyes, how best to understand their abilities and anticipate what they can do to her.

She tries to cook lynel meat.

She becomes deliriously ill from lynel meat.

She promises an extremely worried and three-days sleepless Kass to never again cook lynel meat.

Kass fills in their map of shrines. After traipsing around the whole of Hebra, from Mount Yeta to the north to Mount Yeto to the south, from the impossibly tall Blizzeta Peak to the east to the goron-inhabited, milder Mount Snowhead to the west, conquering eating contests with goron food enthusiasts and shows of skill with gerudo archers who teach Kass an instrumental mountain-song on his accordion, chasing rito thieves of Ilia across valleys of snow and encountering secret hot springs hidden away by sheikah villages, Kass proposes that they move on.

"We've found what we can. Later we can return to fill in the blanks if we must." He pauses. "But I promise you that once we visit all of O Our Hyrule, O Kingdom Blessed by Three, once, I will return to Medli again, even if we have not yet found all of the shrines.

"You call it Hyrule," Link says.

Kass inclines his head.

"As it was once, so it may again be."

He plays the gerudo mountain-song on the peak of Mount Blizzeta. An ode to every courageous soul who has ever braved the Hebric colds, he calls it. They leave Hebra towards the south. Travelling through the ridgelands, they pass both wastes of villages—ruined by the past months upon months of monsters and attacks by the Divine Beasts—and, as well, the flourishing of those villages that have turtled themselves into garrisons of protection.

In the ravine of the Tanagar Canyon, Kass and Link stumble upon several abandoned archaeologist camps with the tell-tale signs of attacks by the Yiga. They leave Ilia sheltered as best they can and proceed forward.

Roaming further inwards towards a "shadowed temple" mentioned in song, Link and Kass uncover not only a massive hall larger than even the castle—old enough that time has ground down everything to colourless brown stone of the same material as the slate—but also a nest of guardians that leaves Link's cooking pot blackened and Kass's crest singed entirely off.

As they take shelter behind a rocky outcropping, Kass stares at the blackened bits of his crest in his hands. Link asks if she can cook something for him.

"Oh, no, I shouldn't be this shallow, but..." He sniffs. "...my wife has always said that she loves my crest. I've kept it ever so stylish just for her."

"I think that when Amali sees you again," Link observes, "she'll be so happy to see you in one piece that you could return to her looking a moblin and she wouldn't care."

"I know, but...it's just so sad..." Kass sighs. "I'll write a song about it, I suppose." He gingerly touches the crown of his head once more. "At least spring is around the corner. The yearly moult should help, at least a little."

Link hides her face behind her cooking pot, but she cannot stop the laughter that comes erupting out of her. She raises herself to her boots to apologise. The second her head clears the top of the outcropping, she faces about thirty red dots trained on her head, accompanied by a serenade of frantic chirping.

She sits back down.

In that brief glimpse, however, Link noted at—the very back of the dusty temple, beyond the sea of guardians—a trio of statues. And beyond that, the orange glow of a shrine.

Pace by pace, Kass and Link race from rocky outcropping to rocky outcropping. She dispatches a handful of guardians in unsavory locations with the help of most of her stock of arrows. He brings down his accordion case upon another guardian to distract it long enough for Link to shove the sword Riju gave her into its eye.

At the far end of the temple, Link cranes her head up and gazes at the Golden Goddesses. Statues of the Golden Goddesses. Statues far larger than any that she has ever seen, extending metres and metres above the ground.

O Din, the Goddess of Fire and Power. O Nayru, the Goddess of Water and Wisdom. O Farore, the Goddess of Wind and Courage.

She kneels down in reverence, praying for the peace of the land once, and perhaps someday again, known as Hyrule. Link lifts her head towards the Golden Goddesses; she can see her own reflection in the dark mirrored obelisk beyond the statues, its circular face marked with the symbols of the Goddesses Themselves. Yet she notices a strange chip in the rim of the obelisk, as though someone has broken off a vaguely circular shard.

Link activates the shrine to receive its blessing. With that, she and Kass leave and make further south.
South and south they go, roaming east and west. He and Link write letters and send them off to Medli with travellers that they pass by. No guarantee that the letters will arrive, they know, but one or two might just make it. In turn Link and Kass carry letters to locations that they intend to visit, including the village of Kotake, near Mount Satori.

Kass checks off shrine after shrine. Outside of the Hebric tundras and mountains the going becomes much easier, even as Link notes that the aggressiveness and quantities of monsters grow every day. She would swear that they seem to appear overnight or drop from the sky when no one watches, apparating out of thin air, usually at night.

On one such night, where the moon hangs low and full in the sky, a pack of lizalfos and mounted bokoblins set upon him and Link. Just as Link considers herself having cleared out the worst of the marauders, she turns about to observe that either a similarly sized pack of reinforcements has arrived without her notice, or monsters have sprung from nothingness. She and Kass escape with an added scar down her from the tip of her neck around the curve of her right shoulder blade.

They reach Kotake amongst the first snowfalls. Romani greets them with a notched bow and an eager cry of Grasshopper, although Link survives the encounter without a single arrow in her body. Romani, too, is learning.

Vish and Malon welcome them home, Link as family, Kass as a family friend. Kass gently asks for Link to move along. She requests one week from him. One week with her family, and she'll move along. Kass inquires, then, for the slate. "I'll take care of the surrounding shrines and come back to collect you in a week."

"Antsy to get back to your family, too?" Link asks.

He shifts the accordion to partially hide his beak under the pretense of playing a small song upon its bellows. "I have never been closer to seeing them again. And your family has only reminded me all the greater of why my heart hurts so."

Link's eyes widen. To have forced Kass to see her interacting with the family that has adopted her while he has not seen his own in nearly two years—

—but before she can apologise, Kass takes his leave.

She returns to Malon and Vish, who welcome her with open arms. Link says that she can stay for a week; Malon says that she can stay for as long as she can, as long as she needs to, as long as she wants to, and not a second more or less.

"What did I do to deserve such...wonderful people in my life?" Link signs, barely able to see past the blur of her wettened vision.

"Oh, Link. Like attracts like, don't you know?" Malon beams at her. Link could walk on air. No, not just that: she could leap up to the very heavens of the Golden Goddesses Themselves. Vish's gaze drops down. She hears his sharp intake of breath. "Link...those markings...and on your face...?"

Link rubs the back of her head. "I'll explain over dinner."

"Well then," says Vish; he massages his temples.

Malon pats his shoulder. "Darling, she just arrived. Give her some time before you start brooding over her."
When Link sees Cremia again, Link asks her how her head feels. Cremia lifts a hand to her cheeks—though her skin hues dark enough that she does not blush red, Link still discerns the rush of blood bringing a richer, warmer colour to her face—and shakes her head.

“You don’t need to worry about me,” Cremia responds politely. "I hope that you haven't been too concerned."

Link makes vague cycling motions with her hands. Cremia watches her, not quite expectantly, but warmly, affectionately, smoothing her dress. "Honey helps with the headaches, right? I’ve brought a lot of monster parts. Please, let me pay you back for how kind you've been to me."

Cremia begins to shake her head in her voiced reluctance to accept such a gift, but Link holds out her hands, palms up, until Cremia has hesitantly set her fingers down on Link's.

Link squeezes. One, two, three. Beat-beat-beat. She lets go just enough to speak. "You're my friend, Cremia. At least let me make you things with honey while I'm here." She kicks herself for not having taken the initiative and brought honey with her in the first place. If only she had more foresight beyond what she wanted to eat five minutes from now. I know honey's rare and expensive around here, but...it's plentiful in other places. And cheap! Maybe, when all of this is over, we could...?

Cremia dips her head. "I appreciate the offer, Link, and I hope that you believe me. That said, I can't abandon the ranch, or my family. I hope you understand."

"I don’t mean for you to leave!" Link bursts out hastily. "I meant that we could go get honey. Or there's some people really skilled in medicine that I know, that could help you out."

"I...” Cremia loops her fingers around the tie of the yellow neckerchief she wears about her shoulders. "I'll think about it."

Link beams. Then, remembering suddenly, she drops her upper body, bowing to Cremia, who stifles a surprised gasp. "And I'm sorry for missing the breeding season. I said I'd help out with it. I promise that when I'm come back after everything, I really will help out! I don't know how long that'll take, and it won't be this breeding season, but when I'm done, I promise...I'll make you honey candy, and honey-drizzled pancakes, and this really good honey-covered fish thing that one of my friends made that I think you might like if you're feeling adventurous but I don't know you seem like more a practical kind of girl which I really like since I'm so not-practical I get my head stuck in cooking pot and accidentally set my friends on fire and then threw them right into the boiling cooking pot to thaw but you're so kind and patient and work so hard and I just want to give you back a smidgen of everything you've given to me and—"

Cremia erupts into laughter. Not only laughter, but a loud, belly-busting laugh that alternates between a donkey's guffaws and a boar's snorts. She throws her hands up to her face in shocked horror. Link, heart thumping against her throat and stomach cheering on her heart, extends her arms to gently touch Cremia's wrists, to gently lower her arms, to gently smile at Cremia as she laughs until her breaths hasten to hiccoughs.

"Link. The mirth waters Cremia's eyes. "You knew me for a few months over the winter; you haven't been back in a year; and you've thought so hard about me all this time?"

Link nods decisively. "There's hardly a day goes by when I don't think of a joke to tell Romani, or a recipe to share with you." She feels the corners of her mouth curve up. "You're more artistic than I am, after all."
"I hope that you don't mind me saying this," Cremia signs, her hiccoughs running quakes through her arms that make the gestures rocky, "but it's nice to have you talking more."

Link's own face flushes now. She brushes her palm over her cheek. To distract herself from the compliment, Link pours Cremia a mug of water, which she drinks down until the hiccoughs fade to steady breathing. She coughs into her hand.

"Thank you, Link."

Link ducks her head. She inquires to Vish if they have honey in the house, or when the next market day might occur. Vish answers that they don't always have honey at market, and Link understands the dilemma: not of lacking money, but of lacking honey. Of not enough honey available to buy at all.

"But," notes Vish, "we do have half a pot left. I bribe the usual merchants to let me have go at it first." He arches his eyebrows. "Well then, care to make dinner? My dearest would appreciate the help."

She does. Riju's own honey-glazed trout, albeit with porgy and salmon mixed in to make up for the smaller variety of trout in the waters. Link asks Cremia to help her make it, to determine Cremia's favourite kinds of fish and their preparation. Cremia helps to make the fish fillets into the shape of a fish: a small family of sharks, three slightly larger, two slightly smaller, and two smaller ones yet. Link hands Romani one of the smallest sharks first, to which she stamps her foot and cries of unfairness; then Link gives her the other smallest one as well.

"It's you and Miyu," Cremia explains. Before Romani can open her mouth, Link unveils a meaty dog treat meant specifically for Miyu. Neither Link nor Cremia tells her that the two smallest fish combined make up the largest portion.

Cremia thanks Link for her help, and Link thanks Cremia for hers. "Link...I hope that this isn't too much to ask, but, before you leave at the end of the week, I want to show you something." Link promises her that she'll find time before she departs.

She requests again the harp to demonstrate all that she has remembered and learned; Malon claps her hands in delight to learn of her skills with the instrument.

Link tells them—tells her family—of her adventures with the Divine Beasts Vah Naboris and Vah Ruta. She leaves out, for now, the crucial details of her having been the legendary hero, even if she has an inkling that they already know. Link promises to return upon her completion of questing for the shrines. Romani demands that Link at least practise archery with her before she leaves and that she at least makes the future Knight another round of pancakes.

Putting her hands on her hips—as would have the girl who smelled of horses—Link raises an eyebrow. "I'll do you one better. I'll show you all the recipes I've learned since then. Hope you like fish and crab and rice."

She makes pancakes, and paella, and risotto, and ceviche—properly, with lemon and lime—and sunny-bird, and chilly-bird, and moose-meat pie from her ice-box, and fish pilaf that does not go over well, and cow pilaf that goes over much better—Romani declares that she has no beef with it, then waggles her eyebrows at everyone around the table—and every manner of curry under the sun and even some under the moon, and crab stuffed with mushroom, and bananas fried in butter, and Riju's Fishy Fiasco, and mushroom omelet, and all sorts of tarts, and even something in the prickled durians that Vish offers her. He slaps one of the fruit. "I'm curious to see what you can make of these things. They're hearty." He knocks his knuckles against one; Link listens to the firmness of the sound. "Called the queen of fruits. Well then, I'll leave you to it, Link." He pauses and turns back to her, hand on his hip. "It's not every day that someone rolls up at our door with an arrow in her shoulder after breaking in to try not to feed our daughter liquored milk, but...for what it's worth, I'm glad to have you here. I think my mother-by-kin is, too."

Link falls back into her routine of rising early to assist Cremia with the ranch work. Vish and Malon help as well, as does Romani, increasingly so, the months of Link's absence having seen her grow a few centimetres taller and many more centimetres more mature. Even if Romani still sneaks out in the middle of the night to fight against Them, and she still would let in a total stranger to cook for her beneath the light of the moon, and she still feeds Miyu every scrap under the table that she can manage,

Link doesn't know if she would count those against maturity. After all, who is she, who has gotten her head stuck in her own cooking pot, to say about maturity and years? And, after all, Maryll, too, feeds Miyu every scrap under that she can manage.

Yet, despite the assistance of the rest of the family, ink works mostly with Cremia. Cremia who hums during her work, and Link who taps out rhythms to the sound of her music. They work in comfortable silence. The first few days Link proceeds clumsily, her hands having forgotten some of the motions, having lost the ability to anticipate what Cremia might need or want of her. Yet, by the third sunset, they have settled back into the previous winter's rhythm, and something a little more melodic besides.

Vish notes with pride that Cremia has begun to receive attention from all sorts of boys and girls in the village now that she has come of age. Malon remarks with a wink that Cremia hasn't seemed interested in anyone from Kotake. Link tilts her head to the side. "I'm happy for her," she says; Malon giggles.

Cremia and Link speak, now that she is not afraid to sign her own name. They speak of Cremia's childhood. They speak of Link's. They speak of where Link has been; she tells the stories of her scars. They speak of Cremia's paintings, which brings Link to arch her eyebrows at Cremia. She has mentioned, once or twice, her interest in artistry, from which Link asked for her help in arranging the pancakes in Miyu's face. But never her interest in paintings.

"You never talked, and I was worried from your expression that you didn't much want to hear me talk." Cremia glances away from her towards one of the cows that has just kicked over a pail of milk. While Link moves to clean up the spill, Cremia continues, her gestures even. "It was only at the end of winter that I realised...I'd been misreading you. I'm sorry. I hope you can forgive me."

Link reaches back for Cremia's hand. "You're not the first person to say that. About misreading, I mean. I get that a lot." She tries to push up the corners of her her mouth into a pretend smile, and then she realises that she doesn't need to pretend. "I'm not good at forcing smiles or those sorts of...things that people do to sort of...butter up like...social things like how people butter up food to make more rich and easier to swallow down. And I feel like somehow, everyone else gets told how to butter themself, but they kind of skipped me over." She twiddles her thumbs. "So...I don't even have anything to forgive you for. But I forgive you. And I'd like you to help me make some food later."

Cremia nods her head. "Then I'd love to help."

Link and Cremia prepare buttered and honey-drizzled crab legs, Cremia deftly inscribing the crab with characters and pictures in honey. Malon, Vish, and Maryll all compliment Cremia and Link on their cooking. The two bow together, but Romani gives the highest praise of them all: by demanding seconds.

The chill of the night has settled in when Cremia rouses Link from her afternoon nap in the hay of the barn. Link lifts herself up. Cremia brushes the straw from Link's bangs.

"I want to show you something." Cremia breathes in. "I hope that you won't judge me poorly."

"Judge you?" Link blinks. "Cremia, you've seen me at probably my worst, or one of my worst. Even if you turned out to, I don't know, be Yiga, or be the Calamitous One in disguise, or even—" She shudders. "—hate food, I wouldn't judge you. I would just...hope that I could make things better."

"I should hope that you would judge me for being the Calamitous One," Cremia counters, but her expression remains soft as ever. "Please...if you won't mind, follow me."

The moon has only begun to rise. The stars sparsely sprinkle the skies as if just now awakening to their nightly duties. The cold exhales its frost down the back of Link's neck, and she huddles her blanket more firmly around herself. Cremia, too, wraps her own fur-lined jacket to protect against the chill.

A colder night than those that have come before. And yet, with Cremia guiding her, somehow warmer, too.

Winter approaches at a rapid pace. Though, as long as she has the cooking pot at her back and the warmth of her friends besides her, Link fears neither ice nor snow. She has yet a ways to go.

Cremia signs for Link to move quietly. They creep through the house—Link notices that the pictures affixed to the walls have changed to some extent, now including more sketches of horses and Miyu; a drawing of Link training archery with a Romani dressed in a Champion's tunic of her own and sporting significantly more muscle than the real-life girl has; and some rather graphic depictions of cow-filching takkuri stabbed through the eyes with arrows—to Cremia's room.

She stops in front of the door. Link can scarcely see her hands in the faint light of the moon that seeps in through the window past the crack in the door, yet she can still make out the silhouettes of her gestures enough to read the words from Cremia's fingertips. "I...want to paint of the world, and into the world," she explains, her hands slightly vibrating from nerves, or excitement, or perhaps from too much voltfin trout at dinner. "I know it seems silly, yet...I feel like if I can touch even a single person with my paintings, that will be enough. If I can paint the world with colours enough, and if people see it and are touched, then I can hope that maybe the world itself could change to match those colours." She tucks herself further into the jacket. "It does seem silly, now that I put it to motion."

"It doesn't seem silly at all."

"A lot of things," Cremia answers with a faint smile of amusement, "are like you and food. But I like that. You're a simple girl, Link, in a...very comforting way."

She beams. "All I want...is to share that food with others. To see their smiles and I know that I've brought them some small satisfaction. Maybe over my cooking pot—and this is silly too—but maybe over my cooking pot I could bring the world together, so we don't have to go through life alone."

"That's not silly either," Cremia objects.

"Even if it is," says Link with a wink of her own, "we can be silly together."
"I think that's the smoothest thing I've ever heard you say." Cremia giggles. "Well, here we go. I don't have that much time to paint. I hope that you can forgive my poor talent."

"I don't have any talent at all," Link responds, grinning cheerfully as Dyeri might have, "so anything you do is already impressive to me."

Cremia bites her lower lip, just a second, but the gesture brings Link to lean forward. "I...hope you can be honest."

And then Link understands. Like she asked with Sidon, so now Cremia asks of her. "I can try. I really don't know anything about art."

"Just give me your honest feelings, if you wouldn't mind," Cremia says, her gestures soft. "That's all I'm asking."

Cremia opens the door. Link watches her silhouette as she lights a lantern, and then the room blooms to life with easels upon easels of painted art.

Link's breath dies somewhere on its way up her throat. Landscapes of grass and of sky, of the steppe with its sea of green, of the horses and cows upon the pasture, of the fields of wheat, of the flowers that bloom in violet and blue and white and red and yellow, of Mount Satori in the distance, of the spirals of stars at night and the passage of clouds at the sky, of Malon riding the horses, of Vish tending to the cows, of Romani and Miyu rolling down a hill, of people Link does not recognise immediately but can discern as villagers from the town proper or as travellers along the road, all painted not more vibrant or more rich than they are, but somehow—in the light strokes of the brush that draw out entire people in one or two movements of the wrist, their featureless faces nonetheless imbued with some sort of emotion that Link can read so much more easily than she can the real people around her.

And food. Nearly every painting, somewhere, anchored in food, in the loaf of bread resting upon an empty rocking chair, in the wedge of cheese with its single slice cut out tucked away into a corner, in the stretch of drying meat that frames the bottom line of a view of the mountain at night, the green-sky-blue aurora touching its peak.

And there, in the centre of the easels, the paint still glistening wet: of Link herself, walking up the path, the collar of her undershirt slightly exaggerated to show the whorls of violet that cover her body from the jawline down, her left hand lifted up with its lightning-strike scar.

The wilds, and the people who make something out of them.

Link glances at Cremia, and Cremia glances at Link. Link raises her hands. She flexes her fingers. In her fumbling stumbles and stumbling fumbles, Link tries to express exactly how the paintings make her feel. Yet the words fall away from her through the cracks in her fingers like pooling water that she cannot bring to her desiccated lips. Again and again she tries, and she falters, and she senses her arms lowering down.

Link breathes out, and then she remembers Riju giggling about her food analogies.

"When I look at these...it's like...I'm sitting on the porch with a friend of mine, and we have a pumpkin between us, and we're picking through vegetables and fruits of all kinds to clean them of stems, and we're dicing them up into tiny pieces, and we're putting them into the pumpkin, and we're talking about what we should give the horses, and then I have a bit of pumpkin goo on my nose, I mean I have a little bit of pumpkin goo on my nose, and then my friend would reach over and wipe it off from me, and then we'd both sort of look at each other and laugh, and then we pick up the pumpkin together and we bring it over to the horses, and we watch them eat, and I can smell the steamed herbs from here, and then my friend takes my hand and we go home to start supper, and then my little sister is here and she's asking us what kind of things we're going to have for supper, and I'm asking her what we wants, and whatever we wants I'll make it, and then she'll smile at me and then she'll tell me that I'm the best big sister ever, and then I'll say the same to her, and then she'll tell me and my friend all about her day while we're making supper, and it'll be catfish or it'll be milk stew or it'll be fried greengill or it'll be seasoned goat or it'll be steamed rice or it'll be stuffed pumpkin and we'll have baked apples for dessert and then I'll go out in the evening and see the moon looking down on me and see the stars too many to count and feel the breeze that passes and dies and lives again and I'll close my eyes and feel the waves of the grass roll up to the wind in my face and..." Her arms drop to her sides. ", ...and that's what I feel. When I look at your paintings. Sorry that that wasn't much of an answer."

When she dares to lift her eyelids, she finds Cremia gazing at her with an expression so tender that it almost scares Link. "No, Link," says Cremia, her gestures light, "that's all I needed to hear. I hope I can...show you more, again. And I hope you don't mind me painting you, sometimes."

Link shakes her head. "Any time."

"Sometime, if you wouldn't mind, I hope that you could let me study your scars. I want to paint them. To...paint the stories they tell."

Link fidgets. "Whenever. I...I promise I'll let you paint me someday. There. Now I have to come back."

Cremia does not answer, yet her smile broadens. Opening her arms, Link offers her a hug. For a moment Cremia merely looks at her; then she steps into the hug. Link holds her, and she holds Link.

In the final days, Malon gifts to Link a full case of spring green elixir and a Faronese-Central Hyrulean dictionary, complete with signs. "Oh, don't feel like you have to learn it if you don't want to," Malon comments, closing Link's hands around the book. "I thought that I would at least give this to you if you wanted it. After all, you plan to be around here quite a bit, don't you?" She winks. Link rubs the back of her head. "And by the way, next time that you come here, if you think for even a second that I'm letting you sleep in the hay, then you have another thing coming. I know you care about your horse, but catching a cold out there could make you go ho—!" Malon stops and scrunches her nose. "Well, I can't make well a pun about you going hoarse...ha! so I will admit my defeat for now. Next time you're here—" She waggles her finger at Link. "—I'll have a proper pun-ishment waiting for you...ha!"

Link accepts the dictionary with a promise to bring back honey and a second promise to make her family something from outside of the western realms of the land once known as Hyrule when she returns.

On the morning before Kass promised to meet her, Link asks Cremia and Romani if they wouldn't mind going riding with her. Romani jumps up at the chance, begging her parents if she can please please please ride; Vish and Malon relent on the condition that she rides with either Link or Cremia at all times. Link rides upon Ilia, and Cremia on her own horse, Elsi. Romani demands to ride with Link in the face of her impending departure.

Link holds onto Romani. Cremia rides close to them. Together over the grasses, together through the fields of wheat, and together back home.
Miyu brings Link one of her chew-bones as a parting gift, which Link loops into her belt just as solemnly as the stick from before. Romani extracts from Link a promise to come back before another year has passed.

"I'll do my best," Link tells her.

Romani crosses her arms over her chest. Miyu barks at her and laps up Romani's hands, and Romani sighs. "Fiimiiine. That'll do, Grasshopper. That'll do."

"I'll try to bring a pumpkin next time so we can feed the horses," Link offers; Cremia nods. Malon and Vish hug her a see you later, and Maryll waves her off, a certain knowing glint in the old woman's eye.

Kass comes to pick her up in the afternoon. Breathlessly he tells her all about the shrines that he has found nearby, about the trials he has experienced and the trials he has walked, about the difficulty in operating the slate, about how he would very much prefer if she would come with him, about how a lizalfos managed to clip his flight feathers enough to prevent him for flying until they grow back in.

Just as he has reassured her that, medically, Kass has already seen a healer, his stomach gurgles. He thumps his accordion case against his abdomen. "Ah, but...that can wait. I don't suppose that you've had dinner already?"

"Even if I had," Link remarks, "do you really take me for the kind of person to say no to an excuse to cook more food and eat more food?"

He chirrups in amusement. "Point taken, traveller."

And so Kass and Link begin their travels anew, Link newly stocked up on supplies and on spring green elixir. Sometimes, at the edges of the world, she scopes out the movement of the Divine Beasts. The Divine Beast Vah Medoh in the distant skies, or the Divine Beast Vah Ruta in the far-away rivers, of the Divine Beasts Vah Naboris or Vah Rudania upon the hills over the horizon.

Strange, how the Divine Beasts seem so large up close that they could blot out the sun, and yet, in contrast to the vastness of the land once known as Hyrule, they look so powerlessly small.

Onwards Link and Kass journey. To the highlands north of Parapa, where she stuffs their meals with warm safflina and spicy peppers—when she can get her hands on them—to keep them warm against the buffet of the cold winter winds. She discovers that Kass does not consider red pepper spicy at all, although warm safflina still serves the minstrel well. Onwards and onwards they journey. To the grasslands to the south, and then to the slowly receding deserts south of there, where the winter has taken off the bite of heat during the day yet has seeped into the chill of the night.

At least the oceans of the continental edge help the shorelines retain their temperature.

Here, too, Link witnesses the advent of monsters more terrible than before. The Yiga may have lessened their impact with their departure from Parapa, and the Divine Beast Vah Naboris no longer crushes entire villages with the storm in its wake. Nonetheless, she watches the Parapans steadily lose the war against the monsters. Not through any fault of their own, but through the gradual increase in the tide of monsters.

A tide that gathers in the four corners of the land once known as Hyrule. A tide that gathers in the heart of the realm. A tide that will any day spill out into the rest of the the lands, even into the Nima Plain between Safula Hill and Mount Satori, even into the valley, even into Kotake.

As the winter rages on, Kass, Link, and Ilia scour the snows and the sands alike. Their trials in Parapa and its highland prove mercifully short, for the Parapans have already documented every shrine or suspected shrine in their land. Link insists on a visit to Nabooru, now open once more to all travellers, where she picks a pair of gloves to hide the scars on her hands and a tighter hood that does not fall down around her throat and show off the violet at her jawline—she tires of the gazes that trail her where she walks and the guards that raise their hands to their own throats to signal the whorls imprinted on her skin—and then to Uruda University, where she waves a hello to Rotana and Rhiauru again. Upon Kass explaining that he and Link have come to look for shrines, Rhiauru runs forward towards him and offers her exploratory services. Rotana, foremost an expert in the Seven Heroines rather than on shrines, will not decline either.

Nor will, as Link discovers, many of the other archaeologists and historians of Uruda University.

Link and Kass become the stars of a moving tour of sorts that guides them from one end of Parapa to the other and over the highlands. By the time Link takes the lift back up from the final shrine, she feels like she has amassed a mobile village of very inquisitive, very intelligent, and very informed archaeologists, mostly gerudo women, though she can spot a few rito, zora, and hylians amongst their number.

At last Kass sets down his accordion case. He marks off the songs that he believes correspond to the various shrines. With Link's assistance at cartography, he notes down the locations of the shrines that they have activated.

They bid the Parapan archaeologists farewell. Link fries them a good-bye meal of bananas. One of the rito archaeologists and several of the gerudo researchers compliment her for the taste that nearly mimics the flavour of fried bananas eaten in northwestern Parapa, although the exact ratio of spices differs. She listens to one, a gerudo woman from Rovah with silver earrings in the shape of crescent moons, who pointed out the shrine with lightning illustrated along its rim; the paint has long since worn off, but the archaeologist's research indicated where the markings used to reside. The woman corrects Link mix of seasonings and tells her to leave the bananas in the oil for just a tad longer.

Link follows her instructions. The second round of fried bananas come out to Rovah perfection. "Well done," the woman with the crescent earrings says. Link thanks her in turn.

Through the deepening of the cold, Kass and Link begin to head eastward to pass through Faron, where mostly live gerudo, hylians, and sheikah—many of darker skin; Kass tries to explain about historically higher levels of sunlight exposure, but his words go so far above Link's head that she observes them hurtling through the heavens—as well as zora in the plentiful lakes of the rainforest and in fishing villages along the coast. They stop near the fishing town of Iza along Lake Hylia to examine the shrine on Hylia Island. The winter has grown too cold for sea lily's bells to grow around the lake; still, Link takes a moment to promise her return.

For Marin's sake.

Then, further east. The humid heat of the rainforest seems to disappear the winter's cold, as Link and Kass push through the denser wilds, where before Link travelled solely along the well-trod roads with Misan and Glepp.

Glepp.

They sleep beneath nettings to ward off insects. Nevertheless Link awakens to discover her bare Food spoils swiftly. Anything that they catch, she cooks immediately. On days when Kass and Link do not gather enough, they go hungrier than usual: they cannot store anything. They eat durians, berries, and bananas where they can. Where they can't, Link discovers with a thought to Amali that collecting and crushing the very insects that bite them leads to a nutritious if not particularly palatable paste.

One night, after a day of unsuccessful foraging, Link filches a durian from a shrine to a local spirit: the Faronese of the southeast, Kass told her, believe in the cycling incarnation of their souls, and so place the heartiest and mightiest of fruits in sacrificial offerings to the Goddess Farore and to Her servant, the Dragon Farosh, in Her spirit form of the Monkey of Faron, to give strength to their friends' and ancestors' spirits as they ride the winds of the Goddess from one corner of the world to the other until they, at last, come upon a newborn child in need of a spirit. Link holds the durian in her palm. Her stomach rumbles.

Exhaling, she sets the durian back and offers a prayer instead.

As Link and Kass continue, she proudly points out the towers and shrines that she has already activated in this area. Kass applauds her with a jaunty tune. Deep in the heart of the Faronese forests, past the Pagos Woods and across the ruins of Zonai, amid the vegetation of the Damel Forest, its leaves so broad that nearly no light passes down through the canopy of its trees, he and Link stumble up through the Dracozu River to the mouth of Dracozu Lake.

"The Spring of Courage," Link recognises from her memories. One of the springs where prayed the girl with the golden hair.

Even after they stain the lake with the blood of lizalfos and moblins and come upon the statue of the Goddess Farore mentioned in Kass's songs, they cannot determine the actual position of the shrine.

When Link's stomach grumbles, she announces that she has had enough. Kass suggests that they try to see if there exist any villages.

In the nearby village of Oakin, Link and Kass inquire of the locals. Or he does, at any rate: the dialect of Faronese spoken here strains Link's limited knowledge of the language too badly for her to understand much. Although initially suspicious, the Faronese relent upon Link's promise to eradicate the lizalfos and moblins that nest around the Spring of Courage, where villagers have traditionally prayed. The elders present to Kass and Link a single green scale that shimmers golden in the light. A scale of the Dragon Farosh, they call it. When Link holds it in her hand, she can feel a mild tingle of lightning, a soft whisper of the breeze.

"Place this in the water before the Goddess Farore," instructs Oakin's Oracle of Farore, her hair dark red, her ears pointed, her eyes clouded over, "and may She deem you worthy to ride upon Her wind."

Link and Kass spend the next few days figuring out the best methodologies of dispatching the moblins and lizalfos. The answer lies in the slate: using cryonis to protect themselves as Link applies stasis in turn to each monster and then either stabs them through the head when possible.

Or simply chucks bombs.

With the lake clear, Link—Kass insists that she do the honours for her courage in eradicating the monsters, however temporarily—kneels down before the Goddess Farore. She offers the scale. The water shimmers.

A shrine rises up from the ground. Kass bows before the Goddess to thank Her. "Is this the part where you say that you'll be plucked?" Link asks.

He arches an eyebrow at her. "Excuse me?"

"Teba...says that a lot. I thought that it was a Medli saying, or a Tabanch saying, or a rito saying."

Chuckling, Kass shakes his head. "No, traveller, that one is very much a...Teba-ism, shall we say."

He and Link thank the villagers of Oakin, and the villagers thank them for taking care of the monsters. And so she and Kass continue onwards.

They pass through the port town of Mido and the fishing village of Lurelin along the coast, as well as the ruins of smaller villages that did not survive the Great Calamity. Neither, hears Link with a pang in her heart, did Papuchia, where Kass and Link struggle to put together the fragments of a ruined dial described as part of a shrine in Kass's songs.

Upon Koholint Island, they find an extended challenge awaiting them, seemingly a replica of the ancient Ballad of the Wind Fish, which sees Link delving down into eight smaller shrines located throughout the island and dredging up dusty instruments. At the summit of Mount Tamaranch, she and Kass work furiously to play all eight instruments between them. Kass does most of the work, becoming by himself a one-bird symphony, while Link hangs back and pats something meant to approximate the mythic Thunder Drum. A false egg upon the mount cracks open to reveal:

A single shrine.

"All this," Kass mutters faintly, "for a single shrine?"

"And not even a loaf of bread!"

They head north. Shrines and towers, towers and shrines, shrines that have Link stealing from one-eyed hinoxes to retrieve the spheres that must have once served in some sort of puzzle, shrines that—from what Kass and Link can see—someone else has long ago solved for them, shrines near Hateno that prompt Link—begging Kass to stay outside—to pop into the town and see Purah. The elderly researcher chastises Link for not having come by sooner.

Hateno, Link gathers, has in the meantime seen its fair share of monsters. The numbers of guards have increased, while the borders of the village have grown more confined around the shrine. The laboratory run by Purah has its own form of protection: legless guardians the researchers have stationed around the brim that blitz any would-be approachers in fire-light, including the members of the laboratory themselves, who only leave with the rito Balin's assistance.

Amid Purah's yells for Link to get herself together, Link rummages around her satchel. She pulls out one of the guardian cores she has carried all this time. Purah blinks. Her jowls snap shut. Link pulls out another. And another. And another, and another, and another, until she has emptied out her satchel of the cores that have bulged it for so long. Purah's complaints and reprimands drift away as she peers at the light of the orange orbs.

Symin applauds Link for her actions. While Purah snags Link's slate from her grip and embarks upon the process of improving the slate, Doreli and Balin inquire if Link has no qualms about perhaps making them a meal.
Link enters the kitchen, takes one look, and almost leaves again: somehow, the laboratory kitchen is an even filthier mess than the last time she visited. She throws together meat and mushroom skewers with Parapan seasonings, Eldic spices, and a garnish of roasted guts, to taste. Balin and Doreli thank her profusely. Purah returns to Link the slate.

"And next time you come back, do it earlier than two years later! We all thought you were a goner, kid!"

Link rubs the back of her head.

She brings out some meat and mushrooms skewers to Kass, who raises an eyebrow. "You went all the way there past those guardians for food?" Before Link can explain, he holds up his wings. "I'll not question it, traveller."

They go north, and they go east. Once more winter's chill bites down upon them. Now they have come upon the thickest cold of the winter yet. They embark upon the icy mountains of Lanayru, picking up shrines along the way, here and there, there and here, stopping by villages that become sparser the further they go up the mountain, hesitating over the numerous ruins of villages, offering prayers for the departed and the passed away.

"If the Spring of Courage had a shrine, then I bet the Springs of Wisdom and Power do, too," Link announces, snapping her fingers.

"As say the songs," Kass notes.

She rubs the back of her head. "Let me bask in my figuring something out for a second."

"Bask all you'd like. Without you and that slate of yours, all these shrines would be still at stone."

Link plucks a rock from the ground and tosses it into the air, catching the stone in her palm. "Like this one?"

"Very funn—!

The mountains rumble. Link listens to a call, like a screech of pain, that sounds down from the icy peaks. She and Kass exchange a glance as the echoes die away to the stars above.

"...Mount Nayru?"

Grimly Kass inclines his head. "Mount Nayru."

They leave Ilia down in one of the villages at the mountain's base. Then, bringing meat with them for its remaining frozen and fresh in the winter cold, they climb steadily up the summit, taking their time in an upwards spiral, allowing their bodies to acclimate to the difference in altitude. Or allowing Link's body, as Kass acclimates within an hour or two, while Link takes days. So as not to hold him back, she pushes herself harder, hiding her need to take swifter breaths in her struggle to slow her heart. She compensates with nightshade and silent shrooms gathered down below.

By the time they see the hints of malice that drip from the peak to hiss through the ice as it dissipates away, Link wheezes, her breaths shallow and fast, her lungs aflame. Kass insists that they slow down. Link gestures to the peak above. So close. So close. Then they can activate the shrine and leave.

Kass carries her to the summit while she curls up in the warmth of his wings. When she feels his chest vibrating against her, different from his mild shivering against the cold, Link lifts her frost-coated lashes to find herself staring at a massive white and violet serpent coiled up around the peak, its eyes shot through with a sickly tyrant-tyrian, its scales flaking off, its skin stretched to bloating, the tell-tale signs of malice roiling bulging beneath its skin: not yet fully violent violet—like what Link has seen of the Malice within the Divine Beasts—but well enough on its way that the malice appears to shift and kick beneath the serpent's skin as would a child within her mother's womb.

Kass holds her more closely to his chest. He and Link gaze up at the serpent, and then at another, and then back up at the serpent.

The serpent's jaw falls open. From its throat, great globs of malice rise, filling its mouth and then dribbling down from either sides of its white-fanged jaws. The purple droppings burn through the ice below. A shudder courses through the serpent's body. It writhes upon the summit, violently retching out malice. Kass—his flight feathers not yet grown in—leaps onto a nearby rock to escape the torrent of malice expelled from the serpent's raw-white throat, the flesh dissolved down to sinew.

The flow of malice ebbs to a drooling trickle from the corner of the serpent's mouth. Its eyes bulge. A tear of malice oozes like a boil of pus from under its left eye. If the boil bursts, there will go the serpent's eyeball, and there will go the serpent's face.

Twitching in agony, the serpent forces one of its clawed front paws towards its own face. Link observes, halfway to a fever and halfway to slumbering in Kass's grasp, how the serpent seems to drag its claws down its own face. It sheds scales into the water of the hot spring that Link only now notices—so hard has she riveted her attentions upon the serpent—while a statue of the Goddess Nayru watches over the proceedings with Her serene gaze.

The scales drop one by one into the water, like grains of rice shaken out into a cooking pot. Most of the scales shrivel inwards on beads of malice,. Link has the distinct impression that they should not fall from the serpent's head so easily. So easily. Leaves on an autumn tree. Swept away by a stiff wind.

The serpent plucks a particular scale from its head. Its limb trembles and spasms as it extends its paw towards the Goddess Nayru. It opens its claws; the scale drifts towards the water.

It touches the surface of the spring. The pool alights. A shrine emerges.

"It opened the shrine for us," Link attempts to say through the frigidity of her fingers, through the shallowness of her breaths. "It needs the...it needs the sword...it needs the sword...to get rid of the malice...I think...so it's telling us to...go to the shrine and come back...with the sword..." Her eyelids flutter. She sinks into the darkness.
When they descend from the mountain, and Link recovers to the point of walking once more, she—seated upon Ilia's back to brush her mane of snow—asks Kass about what occurred on the summit, if she somehow lost herself to hypothermia and began to experience delusions.

For a moment Kass merely polishes his beak with his wing, his gaze distant, his brow drawn. "I...don't know. You said that...I don't know if that was the Dragon Naydra. I did not think that such a being would exist in corporeal form. I don't know what to think." Kass rubs his eyes. "I activated the shrine and took the lift down and back up. Traveller, you yourself told me something about that...that being upon the mountain needing the blade of evil's bane. How did you know?"

Link swallows. "I don't remember," she replies; she only halfway lies.

"...it's as best a lead we have as any. We'll have to pass this on to the Champions whenever you see them next. Of course, I don't even know where we could find the sword—traveller? Is something wrong?"

When her lungs have ceased their efforts to strangle her, Link motions for Kass to resume. He coughs into his wing.

"As for what else happened: taking a feather from your wing, I shield-surfed down the mountain on your pot lid. On the wooden one, to avoid another...unfortunate incident of metal in an icier clime." At Link's widened eyes, Kass adds hastily: "It didn't break, traveller."

From Mount Nayru they begin to once more head west, towards the shrines that litter Lanayru near Ruto. Kass admits that Link has taken care of most of the shrines around here herself: he has few to add. From there they cross over the wetlands in a less-than-optimal route, heading towards Central Hyrule in an effort to begin to mark out several of the shrines there. Link glances at Kass's map with a laugh.

"Is something wrong?"

"We've done shrines all over, from Eldin to Parapa and back again, but we haven't done anything in this central part. So it looks like a donut, see?"

Kass chuckles. "I cannot tell if you have enhanced or ruined my sense of humour, traveller. I'll do with enhanced. And so, without further ado-nut..."

They continue onwards. Shrines and towers, towers and shrines. Link fears they might, somewhere along the trail, neglect some solitary shrine. She cannot bear to imagine how that would look. One hundred and nineteen shrines, out of one hundred and twenty.

In the last few weeks of winter, near the advent of the spring and approaching a full tenth of Link's life spent after her awakening at the Shrine of Resurrection, Link realises that they approach, once more, Necluda.

Necluda. They stop for the night upon a grassy hill where they rest beneath a tree along the southern side of the Squabble River, a day's ride from the Hills of Baumer. "I believe," Kass opens, while Link starts to prepare the boar that she rode into a tree and slew by a strong-enough jerk of the fishing pole whose line accidentally wrapped around the boar's neck, "based on the songs in this region, that there are either two or three shrines in the Dueling Peaks. Then we should finish off this area, and journey further north towards Akkala, where we have only charted several of the shrines." Kass touches the feather of his quill to his beak. "Excellent, traveller. We have made very good progress, far swifter than I anticipated. Certainly, we have had much help, but we have passed over much of O Our Hyrule quicker than most merchants, say." He leans down to rub his calloused talons. "Although, in turn, I cannot say that we have been left with no scars at all."

Link busies herself making meat pie. Warm safflina grows more readily in the western reaches of the land known once as Hyrule, near Parapa, while the eastern realms of the land once known as Hyrule thrives on its spicy peppers. For Kass, she has saved warm safflina picked from the west and dried in the winter sun.

First, the meat itself, which Link cuts from the skinned boar, selecting only the juiciest and fattiest meat: along the loin and the back of the ribs. She pinches the meat between her fingers, marvelling at how it springs back against her hand. With her handy-dandy knife that she sharpens against a whetstone picked up in Hateno after promising not to deface any more shrines, Link cubes the boar into pieces small enough to serve for meat pie filling.

Next she minces thyme and onion, bay leaf and carrot, Necludan sunshroom and garlic, frying the medley in butter and oil, stirring just for a bit. When the stuffing has just begun to soften in the heat, Link adds in the meat. She tosses meat and vegetable-herb together, then whips out the sword Riju gave her to forcibly rub the softened peppers onto the meat and impart its flavour onto the boar itself. Link pours in a few palmfuls of water alongside one of Tabanch flour to keep the filling moist. A sprinkle of salt, a dash of seasoning and spice, and she lets the contents of the pot simmer away.

Once the meat has softened and enough the herb-vegetable mix has thoroughly flavoured the boar, Link scoops the filling out of the pot and lays it onto a clean blanket, for lack of a bowl.

Now she prepares the shell of the pie on Tabanch wheat, aerated salt, regular rock salt, and goat butter. She mixes the batter and pours it into her cooking pot in lieu of a proper oven. Rolling the batter to mix it in the bottom of the pot to a thorough blend, Link tips in just a palmful of cool boiled-and-condensed river water, then starts to knead the forming ball of dough. When her hands tire, Kass proposes that he chip in.

"I would do this with my beloved wife, wiling away the cool winter nights of our youth," Kass intones in a voice that hums up first few bars of a song.

Link cocks her head. "I thought you mostly sang to keep her company while she did all the cooking."

The crest feathers on Kass's head, though not fully grown in, slightly rise up. He clears his throat. "And this is a good opportunity as any for me to learn to become a better husband and father, traveller." His eyes twinkle. "You never know how much something means to you until you're forced to do without. When I return, I wish to be nothing less than the best that Tabantha—no, O Our Hyrule—has ever seen."

He kneads the dough while Link sits back to massage her wrists. Kass continues to knead. She observes him, as his beak parts in a smile upon his slow epiphany on how the dough need kneading, and then an equally slow widening of the eyes in horror. Kass snaps his head up towards Link, desperation crawling over his features. She sits up, her heart suddenly pounding, and stares into the cooking pot.

They spend a good bit of the next hour plucking feathers from the dough.

Afterwards—while Link pats Kass's shoulder and promises him that next time they see a rito capable of cooking they will inquire how to keep feathers out of food—she forms the dough into the pie shell along the inside walls of the cooking pot. She gathers up the blanket to place in the filling, then folds over the top of the dough to form a cover atop the filling. Carefully Link reaches in with her knife to cut slots in this upper crust for steam to escape. Dampening the blanket in water and shaking the extra moisture out, she lays it over the pie to help keep the pie from drying out during the makeshift baking. Then Link tightly closes the pot.

Into the fire the pot goes. They wait, and wait, and wait some more. Periodically Link checks upon the pie, testing the dampness of the blanket and the browning of the pie, before she forces the lid of the cooking pot back on.

While they wait, she takes the time to take care of Ilia, to bathe her, to estimate—the elasticity of her skin and the roundness around her middle—whether Ilia has eaten enough, to ensure that she has received an adequate portion of salt and sugar, to feel her mouth watering, to try putting the salt to her lips, to flinch back at Ilia outskilling her in sheer speed as her companion lunges for the rock salt, to sighing and resting her forehead against Ilia's as Ilia slurps up the salt.

Link asks if Kass wouldn't mind singing for her a few songs. He perks up almost immediately. "Excellent! Then without further ado..."

He sings her songs of the sword that seals the darkness. Of the Knight who long, long ago rode upon a loftwing of the Goddesses, who forged the blade of evil's bane from the ancient breaths of the three Dragons Farosh, Naydra, and Dinraal. Of the Hilted Singer, the spirit of the sword that seals the darkness itself, that sang to the Hero the instructions of the Goddesses, that gave Her life to become one with the blade of evil's bane. The first Singer whom all minstrels honour as an inspiration, as one to emulate, as one to become.

In those days, the songs said, the people of the land that would become Hyrule lived in the golden land with the Seven Goddesses and rode upon loftwings that represented the divine connection each and every being had to the Golden Goddesses. The Golden Goddesses had left the Golden Force—a fanciful omnipotence—for Their mortals before departing to the Sacred Realm. In those days, according to the songs, the mortal realm and Sacred Realm were one and the same, the Golden Goddesses residing in its outer sphere, and the Seven living with Their children upon the inner. Yet, as the legends go, this could not last.

In those days, the selfishness of people drove them to fight one another. As a result, the Goddesses cast the people down to the land, where they fought ever more fiercely. To quell the fighting the Goddess Hylia sacrificed Her life to reincarnate as one of Her hylian people, and then calmed the fighting by establishing the Kingdom of Hyrule, alongside a chosen knight—the Hero—wielding the blade forged by the Golden Goddesses Themselves in Their blessing of the Goddess Hylia's mortal incarnation becoming the royal family.

"There are," Kass notes, "other versions of the story, passed down in different corners of Our Hyrule." In one spin of the tale, the people originally lived upon the land, and the initial eruption of the Calamitous One forced the Seven to send Their Children skyward for safety. Only after the forging of the sword that seals the darkness and the sealing of the original Calamitous One could the Goddesses bring Their people back down to the earth, where they had to remember how to live once more upon the world of the surface.

In still another, not even all of the people left. Only the hylians were borne skyward, and only the hylians had to return to everyone else, who already continued to live on the surface as before.

"And, of course, there are those who observe that history is written by the victors. There are those who wonder what true hand the hylians and their Goddess had to play in such matters. There are those who cite that the tales of the reincarnation of the Goddess Hylia came far later than the descent from the heavens." Kass bows his head. "But that is for a scholar of such things, and not a travelling minstrel, to decide."

Link tilts her head to one side, and then to the other. She rubs her eyes. "I don't really get all that you just said."

"Traveller," intones Kass, his voice level, his hands gentle upon the manuals of the accordion, "do you believe that only a hylian could wield the blade of evil's bane?"

She blinks. "Huh? No. What does being a hylian have to do with it? I don't really know much about the Seven, to be honest."

"I see." He shifts his wings. "May the light illuminate all of our paths, I suppose. Goddesses know we need it."

Link removes the makeshift oven from the flames to pop off the lid of the cooking pot. The scent of the meat pie flutters her eyelashes. She has smelled this. Back in the castle.

She remembers the girl with the golden hair. She remembers the girl with the golden hair arguing once more with her father. She remembers the girl with the golden hair stomping back into her room and slamming the door of her chambers enough to rattle the castle walls. She remembers Urbosa excusing herself to check in on the girl with the golden hair. She remembers Urbosa calming the girl with the golden hair, remembers the silhouette of them embracing one another while Link respectfully averted her gaze, remembers the shadow of their kiss stretching under the door. She remembers Urbosa leaving the girl with the golden hair to avoid arousing suspicion. She remembers Urbosa coming to her.

"Go to her," Urbosa pleaded. "I can't. If her father learns of this, there will be every kind of blood to pay. A relationship between the Princess and one of her Champions: unthinkable. But you can and are expected to. Link, go to her." Her expression cracked with concern for the girl that she so loved. "Please."

She remembers approaching the girl with the golden hair. She remembers sitting down before the hearth while the girl with the golden hair sat at her desk writing. She remembers making the motion of crimping the egg tart.

She remembers the girl with the golden hair glaring back at her. "Did Father—" The girl with the golden hair sucked out a breath on the $F$ to transform it from a mere sound into an epithet all its own. "—send you here to tell me to stop making excuses as well?"

Link blinked. "I don't really know anything that's going on," she said honestly, "but I know how much work you've been doing, and I trust you, and also do you want to help me make some food?"

"You...you trust me?" the girl with the golden hair echoed.

She nodded. "I'm not smart at all, but you seem to be. You spend all your time reading those books, so you've gotta be smart. I was thinking that we could make meat pie if you want, since you could crimp that too." She emulated the gestures for crimping, twitching her fingers as she went.

The girl with the golden hair sidled off from the chair at her desk. Link brought out a cooking pot. "You trust me?" she was asking again.

"Yes. Just wait here." Link left for the royal kitchens—Urbosa, leaning casually against a door outside, quirked an eyebrow at her—and returned with armloads of ingredients. Urbosa nodded in understanding and pumped her fist in encouragement. Link's stomach grumbled.
She showed the girl with the golden hair how to prepare a meat pie. While they worked, the girl with the golden hair began to talk of her research. Link made her best efforts to listen, even if she only understood perhaps one word out of every twenty, including an and the.

The girl with the golden hair spoke of her blessed bloodline, of the Sealing War, of the incarnation of the Goddess Hylia.

"Did you know that there's a convincing little pile of evidence that what we refer to as Ancient Loftean is nothing more than older Central Hyrulean, and that Ancient Loftean is an even older tongue? You understand how earth-shattering this would be! No? Since the divine right to rule comes from the story of Skyloft...this would mean that there's no such thing as the blessed bloodline! Or at least that it didn't happen like how the official history books have said it!

"What? I'm holding the knife wrong? Oh...I see. Is this right? And just these peppers—oh you wanted me to mince the onions. Understood. Oh, that's garlic, is it? I can't tell the difference. This is onions, right? Yep! I knew it! My research has once again paid off!

"Did you know, that there's some trace evidence of an actual civil war, with the Divine Beasts possibly fighting each other! In fact, one radical theory I read the other day that had me, oh, quivering in my chair was that there were originally seven Divine Beasts, but that they engaged in a fierce war with one another, and in the end, the side with the four Divine Beasts won! The other three were destroyed, and the four buried...perhaps out of fear that the wars would start again! I don't think that that's what happened, but just imagine the possibilities!

"We're supposed to rub the meat with...peppers? Like this? Oh, I see. Like this? All right, I'm on it. Leave it to me!

"Ooh! And did you know that some speculate the sheikah symbol didn't actually belong to the Goddess Sheik at first at all, but was originally a crest of the royal family, and that's why it's on the towers and Divine Beasts and everything? The original symbol of the Goddess Sheik was an eight-petalled flower! And then that was later adopted, because there's evidence that the royal family being followers of Hylia came far later, far after the Divine Beasts! That the Divine Beasts came from an earlier era before the faith of the Seven as we currently know it—of course the Seven has always existed, but their worship differs from era to era—or when the royal family wasn't supposedly reincarnations of the Goddess Hylia at all! Can you imagine that, Link!? Just think of the implications! That sometime between now and ten thousand years ago, my family rose to power, pretending to be reincarnations of the Goddess Hylia!

"Oh, is this how you knead the dough? I see! Thank you! Hm...I'll have to think of a joke about that later. Knead and need. There's obviously something there, but I'll have to be clever...oh, was I saying that out loud?

"Of course the author who wrote this had to publish anonymously...but when I read their essays, I felt a chill down my spine! I have to corroborate it with my own research, of course, and I plan to do so. But just imagine! Ooh!

"Yes, yes, I'm crimping; I'm crimping! Just look at how I'm crimping! I'm going to become the crimping master; don't you worry!

"Are you listening? I hope you're listening! You said that you trust me, right? Oh, oh, oh, maybe you could help me with some research later! It's not my expertise but I've been meaning to branch out! Isn't this so...exciting!? So there's this species of frog—"

Link could only nod her head. She found the girl with the golden hair's smile exciting, and her passion exciting. Even if she did not understand fully or even partially what the girl with the golden hair said, her happiness proved exciting and infectious. Link could listen forever. Especially with her also cooking at the same time.

For a time, Link remembers, therein lay their relationship. Link would inquire if she wanted to crimp, and the girl with the golden hair would help Link cook. And, as they went through the recipes, Link's hands occupied and the girl with the golden hair's mouth free, the girl with the golden hair would talk.

Mostly about her research. About the Divine Beasts, about the guardians, about the murky history of Hyrule that she sought to divine. And then, little by little, about herself.

Little by little Link could see the path to the girl with the golden hair's heart. Very much through her stomach. And also, Link learned, through the crimping of her hands.

When she comes to, Link finds Kass thanking her profusely for allowing him to eat his half of the meat pie first, straight from the pot. She grins at him. "You've really changed a lot."

Kass arches his eyebrows. "Whatever do you mean, traveller?"

"When I saw you again in Ruto, you didn't even want me to make you a single meal. Now you're eating it first."

His feathers ruffle up. "Only because your food would befit the Goddesses, traveller."

While she eats, Link looks out again at the Dueling Peaks, their sloped peaks nearly touching, yet separated by a gap that looks—from this distance—thinner than a blade of grass. She remembers the whistle. Ilia's whistle.

"Kass," she says, a hand upon Ilia's neck, her companion's hearbeat against her palm, "do you mind if we take a detour?"

"Not at all, traveller. We've all the time in the world." Kass leans back. "What did you have in mind?"

Link turns her gaze towards the horizon, where she can just see the Dueling Peaks across the waters of the Squabble River, and the promises that hang like mirages of heat beyond the summits' reach for one another. "I think...I might want to see an old friend."

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Link and Kass's issues with finding the 'white bird' and the 'fir tree' shrine is in reference to the "Bird in the Mountains" shrine quest; I couldn't find a wide bird at all. Instead I wandered around Hebra on foot and accidentally stumbled upon it when I noticed a flash of orange amid the white. I hold that that shrine does not look like a white bird from the tallest point. At least not to me.

In-game, the peaks of Hebra are simply labelled as north, south, east, and west summits, which I find bland and lazy. I named them Yeta, Yeto, Blizzeta, and Snowhead. Yeta, Yeto, and Blizzeta arise from Twilight Princess, and Snowhead from Majora's Mask.

In Breath of the Wild, moose and rhino appear to have the same meat drops, but rhino have significantly more health than moose, taking three swipes with the Master Sword compared to the moose's one. But why?

In-game, you knock down the shrine with the "damned square of water" by rolling a snowball down the hill. Since it doesn't make sense that snowballs would just sit around like that, I had Link in Delicious in Wilds bait the eeno into throwing a snowball down.

You can't eat monster! The meat's full of substance that makes people sick, although not for the reason that you might think. We'll come back to this later. You can extract Pashli is the name of a rito from The Wind Waker, whose name means "let's go" in Russian. I have no idea if that was intentional.

The gerudo mountain-song is the OST song "Mountain" which plays when you're near a shrine on an icy mountain.

The temple in question is the Forgotten Temple in-game, although I have switched out the statue of Hylia for statues of the Golden Goddesses. Of course, the Forgotten Temple in-game is a reference to Skyward Sword!

Mother-by-kin is the Parapan/western Faronese version of mother-in-law.

In Faron, the "coming of age" is typically at nineteen years of age, so Cremia has turned nineteen.

If you don't remember, Link helped Romani clear out the murder of takkuri back in the thirtieth chapter, who have turned out to be the real Them.

Cremia's paintings aren't actually anchored with food, but that's what Link's attention is drawn to; you'll notice that Link points out the cheese in a corner, for example.

Elsi, Cremia's horse, is named after the cow Elsie from Lon Lon Ranch in The Minish Cap.

Kass doesn't find spicy peppers to be spicy. The "spiciness" of peppers comes from the molecule capsaicin, which tastes spicy to humans, but which is not an irritant to birds (and rito people).

Southern Hyrule is nearer to the equator (Hyrule is in the northern hemisphere), so the humans in southern Hyrule tend to have darker skin compared to those further up north, following the same patterns that exist in the real-world. Speaking of which, I made the gerudo black/brown-eyed rather than green-eyed, as I'm sure you've noticed.
The fishing town of Iza is named after the proprietor of Iza's Rapid Ride from Twilight Princess.

The closer to the equator you are, the less variable the weather, so winters in southeastern are less cold in comparison. Note, too, that this is added by the heavy weather buffer provided by the ocean.

In Breath of the Wild, there are giant monkey statues in Faron where you can place hearty durians or mighty bananas to get korok seeds. In Twilight Princess, the light spirit Faron is represented by a monkey or lemur of some sort; in Breath of the Wild, the dragon Farosh makes a circuit from the rainforests of Faron to Lake Hylia. I therefore conflated these into a local religion for the Faronese. While the Golden Goddesses are oftentimes worshipped as a trio, some places just worship one or two. In this case, I just wanted to provide worldbuilding for the giant monkey statues and why you're expected to place durians/bananas there! I also wanted to include a faith that believes in reincarnation, since most of the other major religions depicted in Delicious in Wilds don't! (I personally do not believe in any kind of higher power.)

Note: I couldn't fit all the author's notes into either the top or bottom (oops) so I've carried over the last third of the author's notes for this chapter for when I post the sixty-fifth chapter. Sorry about that!

midna's ass. 08 November 2017.

Beta reader's comments: My very favourite chapter in the series! Its length makes it so nice and cozy. Plus road trip chapters are super fun. The chapter in and of itself feels like this amazing long journey, which is wonderful to read.

Emma. 02 November 2017.
To all my readers: Thank you for your overwhelming patience!

Author's notes from the sixty-fourth chapter that have been carried over: The village of Oakin is named after the Star Island korok from The Wind Waker.

The port town of Mido is named after Mido Port Town from The Adventure of Link. Koholint Island replaces Eventide Island (in-game, the highest point on the island is named Koholit), complete with a re-enactment of Link's Awakening.

Rito physiology is well-suited for life in the cold and in the higher reaches of the atmosphere; they acclimate much more quickly to differences in altitude than do humans.

Meeting Naydra was striking for me in-game. I describe Naydra as singing, her song is the very song that plays whenever Link nears a dragon in-game! I'm pretty sure that the main instrument on that track is an erhu. In Delicious in Wilds lore, the Necludan erhu was actually made to emulate the dragon's singing voice.

It didn't make sense to me that you could repel the malice on Naydra with arrows alone, since the Master Sword is supposed to be the thing that repels it!

Slaughtering a boar with a fishing line is a reference to Ganondorf in Twilight Princess being easily distracted by the fishing pole.

As noted before, Kass knows how to prepare simple fish fillet, but kneading dough is a completely matter.

In Skyward Sword, Link forges the Master Sword using the sacred flames of the Goddesses. I've adapted that to dragons' breaths to help yoke Skyward Sword and Delicious in Wilds together.

There are lots of version of Hyrule's origin story, as you can imagine for something that has been passed down for over ten thousand years! The story of Skyward Sword is the last one that Kass mentions as a footnote, to indicate how much history has changed. I do actually know the "real story" that I wrote down for myself before I started work on Delicious in Wilds, but there's no way the characters of Zelda's age would know that. So what you'll get is the truth mixed with confusion and history. I might post the truth of what happened later, though you'll get some information from one very, very old source.

By the way, the story of Skyward Sword could have been so much better than it was, especially since it was meant to be a 'prologue' for the entire series. You've gotta be kiddin' me, Nintendo.

The eight-petalled flower as the original symbol of the goddess Sheik is taken from the motifs of the Ancient Cistern dungeon of Skyward Sword! You know how I mentioned that the ancient Sheik statues depict the goddess with a flower in hand? Yup!
By the way, this is the bulk of the shrine hunt, but Link and Kass have yet to tackle the stuff in northeastern Hyrule. We'll cover those in future chapters! Don't think the road trip is over juuust yet. First, Link has to do something.

Up next: frozen crab; the plains of Necluda; a ranch in the woods.

And now, author's notes from this chapter that didn't fit in the end: I started writing this chapter at 09:28 on the sixth of August, and finished writing it on at 00:09 on the seventh of August.

Thanks a million to my beloved beta reader, Emma, who has helped me immensely with keeping in Delicious in Wilds, even through miscommunication errors that have led her to think I was talking about proofing the sixty-fourth chapter when in fact I had already gone on to the sixty-fifth. And thanks a million to everyone who recognises/knows where the 'thanks a million' thing comes from. And thanks a million to anyone who knows what I've been referencing with the 'thanks a million' thing. And also, does anyone know why FFN registers a significantly higher word-count than does ao3, even counting the difference of my author's notes and responses to reviews?

The trip to the Dueling Peaks brings with it Link taking pictographs from the shrines high above and trekking back and forth between the two peaks to solve a pair of linked shrines. "At least these are indeed two shrines," Kass points out cheerily, "and not one, as on Koholint. It is, traveller, strange to me that some shrines appear so much more difficult or pronounced than others. I cannot hope to hazard guesses as to the intentions of those who created these trials, however." Link cannot either.

The third shrine upon the mountains she has already taken care of, and so Link removes the lid from her cooking pot to race down the mountain in her own fashion. Something about the whipping wind and the susurrus of shield on snow brings out a laugh from her as she twists her body this way and that, pulling tricks, kicking down her boots until the pot lid launches into the air and spinning around to whirl—like Sarie on their korok leaf—before crashing back onto the snow swift as before. She practises the spin repeatedly, each twirl eliciting a light little laugh, right until she tries two spins in quick succession and plants directly into a snowbank.

Jerking herself up with a pmf of snow that has gathered in her hair, Link steps back to admire her handiwork: a thoroughly Link-shaped hole in the snow, matching the one she left nearly two years ago on the Great Plateau. And this time, she can snap a commemorative pictograph on her lovely pictobox. Her recent trip to Hateno has brought an upgrade to the pictobox. As Purah explained, not only can Link now make the pictograph bigger or smaller—"I call it, scoping in and out, like adjusting a telescope's depth and field of view!"—but she can even take pictographs without facing the slate towards the subject matter such that she cannot see the face of the slate. And then the laughter stops. Tragedy strikes. Link kneels in the snow, the slate tipped out of her hand, forgotten.

When Kass finally catches up to her—instinctively flapping his wings even though his flight feathers have yet to grow in fully again—he checks her hands and pleads to know if she becomes delirious from the altitude or snow again. "Traveller, what's—?"

Arms shaking, Link points a finger. To the corpse. To the deceased and frozen body lying in the snow. To...to...
"Oh, did one of the crabs you caught freeze, traveller?"

The snow packs down under Kass's talons. Stepping forward, he plucks the razorclaw crab, caught in Lake Hylia, that has fallen out of Link's satchel alongside several leaves of herbs and an apple. "I believe that you can still salvage this. Much as with red meat, freezing does take some of the flavour, perhaps, yet..." He attempts to tap the frozen crab against his accordion case as though to demonstrate. The apparently solid block of crab responds by bouncing off and soaring off out of his grip. Link half-heartedly extends her left hand towards the escaping crab as it flies away down the mountain. "Oh. There it goes." He folds up his wings on his sides. "They grow up so fast, don't they, traveller? Only a few days ago you were holding that crab for the first time, and now it has to leave the nest already." She senses Kass glance at her, still kneeling in the snow, her entire body drooping as if attempting to melt into the mountainside. He pets her shoulder. "The Goddesses give," he remarks, "and the Goddesses take. There, there. There will be other crabs." Kass pauses. Link hears him hum contemplatively. "I apologise in advance, traveller, but...no need to be crabby. Eh? That was terrible, wasn't it?"

She looks up at him, and he down upon her, and her stomach hurts from laughing all the way down the mountain. To ward off future tragedies, she walks alongside him until they reunite with Ilia at the base of the Dueling Peaks.

Kass comments that Link may not have activated the shrine in Kasuto. "A shrine in Kasuto?" she echoes; he nods.

"I'm admittedly surprised that you didn't know about it," Kass responds.

Link smiles uneasily. "I'm not that good with large crowds. I think I just...went in and out quick as I could make myself food."

"Then, traveller, allow me to pose any questions you might have for the locals..." Kass brushes a speck of snow from Link's brow, his wings gossamer-soft on her skin. "...in search of your old friend."

And so they wander along the western border of Ash Swamp towards Kasuto, taking a detour to activate a shrine along the southern bend and then moving back north. The late weeks of winter have brought a cloak of snow upon the swamp and its surrounding forests and grasses.

At least, thanks to the horse clothing that Link picked up in Tabantha, Ilia does not seem affected by the cold. "And the blue looks very cute on you, girl." Ilia whinnies.

In Kasuto, Link relishes the communal cooking area once more and prepares for them the remainder of the crabs from Lake Hylia. While she sits, Kass—without a perch appropriate for a rito, and with a bottom half not easily supported by the harshness of a wooden bench—stands around the communal dining tables.

A boot-tapping sound to her left prompts Link to raise her head. It dawns on her that she looks at a certain olive-skinned sheikah-hylian woman—no longer with her hair braided into two loops, but rather in a single thick braid down her back, affixed with a half-bun, half-ponytail on the frown of her head—and a certain pale-skinned hylian guard who has promoted herself from greeter-on-duty to one of Kasuto's defenses against the monsters that rise up from the river or race down from the plains. Lami, and her friend Maggi.

Link spends some time thanking Lami for all of her help. Lami notes that Link's speech has improved considerably. "You don't sound exactly like my grandma anymore. You sound, hm, maybe like Maggi's grandma?"
Maggi grimaces. "Do you take me for someone who would sit aside while her grandmother's pride is insulted like this?"

"It was a compliment," Lami assures her soothingly. "Kinda."

Kass inquires about the whereabouts of the shrine of Kasuto. Maggi and Lami share a look between them. Lami pats Maggi's shoulder before Maggi can jump up and point her sword at Kass and Link. Lami invites the shrine-seekers to accompany her to the village Temple of the Seven, to pose the question to the resident Sages of Sheik, Hylia, and Zola that watch over Kasuto. Link swallows. Kass promises her that all will be well.

"I just don't want to get arrested for a third time," Link signs, "and that seems to happen whenever I see a Sage."

Maggi snorts. "You want an arrest? You got it."

The Sages, Kass and Link discover, do not immediately allow them access to the shrine. Not for the first time, Link hears accusations of herself as a Yiga. She can only thin her mouth into the blankest expression she can muster and gaze upwards for deliverance from the shadow that trails her wherever she goes.

Kass delivers her: he speaks eloquently of the slate, of the shrines, of the songs he has gathered. Moreover, he offers for Link to make them a meal. The Sages acquiesce.

The Sage of Sheik inclines her head. Although earlier she spoke, presently she signs; Link gathers from Lami afterwards that the Sage of Hylia cannot hear. "While sojourning by the Dueling Peaks for divine inspiration a week ago, the Goddess blessed me with a gift from the mountains. If you can prepare it satisfactorily, we may allow you to see the shrine with our supervision." The other Sages agree.

"Certainly. What gift of the Goddesses?" inquires Kass. Link starts tugging on his wing, trying to alert him to the Sage of Hylia. When he seems peers down at her, she reads the perplexion off his features. Releasing his hand, Link takes the initiative: to apologise and repeat the question in sign to the Sage.

"What gift of the Goddesses?"

An attendant to one of the Sages brings out a small wooden box. Kneeling before Link and Kass, he opens the box and reveals within: a very frozen razorclaw crab.

Kass moves a wing over Link's mouth. "The Goddesses take, and the Goddesses give back," he muses to the Sages. "Allow her to prepare this, as you said, satisfactorily."

Once they step outside of the Temple, Kass and Link both bend over with hands on knees and wheeze themselves free of laughter. She fixes for the Sages a meal of crab risotto with sides of fried-and-breaded crab claws and steamed crab legs stuffed with acorn and hickory. The Sages eat the meal in front of Link, whose stomach complains of its emptiness despite her having eaten less than an hour prior.

"Satisfactory?" asks the Sage of Sheik.

The Sage of Zola bows her head. "Satisfactory."

"Very much satisfactory!" the Sage of Hylia gestures, beaming. The three Sages indicate the hearth behind them. They part, two moving to the left, one to the right, to stand beside the asymmetrical altar. The flames go out. An attendant lifts the grate.

"Looks like we can get in through the fireplace," Link observes.

The Sage of Sheik agrees, motioning for them to enter. "Step into the hearth, please."

Given Kass's height, he does not quite fit, but Link does. The inside of the hearth appears roughly cylindrical. When she scuffs the ashes away with her boots, she snaps her fingers at the the outline of a circular platform that would normally indicate a shrine's lift. Link pokes her head back out.

"As you can see," the Sage of Zola begins, "the shrine around which our temple was built does not respond. We have seen the shrines upon the Dueling Peaks glow, and we have heard from travellers passing near, yet the Goddesses have not yet deemed us worthy of the call."

Link makes a motion of placing the slate into something. The Sages merely ogle her until Kass intervenes, explaining what that pawing gesture means.

The Sages open a panel on the altar to reveal the pedestal. Link sets the slate within. The hearth blooms into blue. While the Sage of Zola stares at Link in shock, the Sage of Hylia raises an eyebrow at the others as if to say something about hylians, and the Sage of Sheik reverently clasps her hands before her, Link descends into the earth.

Upon her return, Kass spreads his wings in the form of an aegis. "No questions, please," he announces, then signs the same.

"Are you the hero chosen by the Goddesses?" the Sage of Hylia inquires. Loudly clearing his throat, Kass ushers Link out. She glances back for a second to look at the Sages who look upon her with mixtures of surprise, expectation, and faith. Then Link snaps her gaze forward again and allows Kass to physically push her across the floor.

Maggi waits for them outside, Lami having had to depart for her own guarding duty. Link taps her forefingers against one another, but Maggi shrugs. "Relax. I'm not even on duty, and besides, you make pretty mean crab legs. So, you're leaving?"

"Only after a meal," Link responds. She makes herself, and Kass, and Maggi crab legs of what remains in her satchel that has not spoiled. Salted and spiced and everything niced.

Before departing Kasuto, Link turns towards Maggi and nudges Kass in the torso. He blinks at her. "Hm? Oh! Right. Ahem. Are you of you familiar with this whistle, perhaps from some horse ranch nearby? Traveller, the whistle please."

Link whistles. Ilia's whistle.

Maggi shrugs. "Do you take me for some expert on everything around here?"

"But you live around here."

"Do you know everyone around the place where you come from?"

Link touches her chin. Kass apologises on her behalf. Not within a few moments have Link and Kass returned to the temple, to inquire if the Sages know of that whistle.

For the Sages of Sheik and Zola, Link whistles again, and the Sages—the Sage of Zola first and foremost, having regularly travelled south towards the rivers of Kasuto to see the zora people that live along its banks and east towards the wetlands of Ash Swamp to assist in the relocation of the former underwater village there, now escaping from the monsters—note that they have, indeed, heard of a ranch or a stable in that area that teaches horses to respond to whistles. Link's entire body seems to rise up from the floor like the Goddess Erito had spontaneously chosen her at last.

"That whistle? That whistle exactly?"

The Sage of Zola dips her head. "I do not know if it that whistle exactly, but it sounds familiar."

Link thanks them again. She bounds from the temple, clearing the floor in three strides and a prayer for each of the Golden Goddesses. Kass rushes to follow behind her, yelping and bidding her to wait. She saddles Ilia on the perimeter of Kasuto. Kass skids to a halt behind her and seizes her hand.

"Traveller," he manages between gasps of breath, "I understand that you are excited to see an old friend of yours, but please, do not leave without me. I still cannot fly."

Link looks down at him, chest heaving, limbs shivering, eyes wide. She slips off of Ilia. Her boots leave circles into the thin film of snow, the pressure alone melting it to dew the earth underneath.

They walk together. To the south and to the east, around the wetlands of Ash Swamp, across the Blatchery Plain where Link notices occasional herds of wild horses trotting to and fro, and down towards the Bubinga Forest. The encroach of monsters has all but cleared both swamp and grassland of villages, the villagers seek safety in towns protected by their shrines.

She looks at Kass, a question hovering half-formed on her fingertips. Kass He his list of songs. "I am not sure if there is a shrine there, traveller. Yet, duly note, a song's absence does not preclude a shrine's possibility."

Link nods.

"You do not seem convinced."

She stuffs an apple into her mouth until her cheeks bulge out with fruit. Cleaning the lens of her little sister's telescope, Link presses it to her eye as she watches the line of the horizon. There, in the distance, to the southeast: a plume of smoke.

By foot, the swamp and plains seem to go on never-endingly. Moss-covered guardians in the swamp activate at their presence, driving them towards fleeing from fire-light. Horse-riding bokoblins chase them with arrows. A chuchu wells up out of the ground right under Link's head when she beds down for the night. A school of leever spinning spinily along the grasslands spooks Ilia near to a gallop. Kass thanks her, in his measured tones, for dealing with his present slowness and asks if he can do anything to repay her.

"You could sing me a song," Link says. "I don't have an instrument, but when I do, I'd like to play something for you. I want to know if you know it. But I'm not too sure what the name is. I've heard it under a few different ones."

"Perhaps I know one of the names."

She shakes her head. "I want to play it for you."

He inclines his beak. "I am glad to see that music can touch even a spirit as beckoned by other disciplines as you, traveller."

Over the course of the day, Kass and Link venture south, towards that plume of smoke. It rises from the wood, or somewhere beyond the forest. The lone and level plain offers no shelter, and so Link and Kass take turns on their watch when they camp for the night. She cannot sleep. Lying awake, staring at the countless stars, she allows her companion his well-needed rest, having already given her her detour. To see an old friend.

"Traveller, perhaps you could try that whistle," Kass suggests. "Your friend might hear you yet and could respond with a whistle of your friend's own."

Link lifts up her hands. She wets her thumb and forefinger. Closing her eyes, she whistles, long and loud and low. Like a bird's call.

"That's where I got the idea from. From the birds," the girl who smelled of horses told her, once. "I was thinking about Aryll, and how much she loves them, and I came up with this whistle for the horses to hear. It's not like any birdsong I know. It's different enough that the horses won't get confused, I think. It sounds natural though, doesn't it?" The girl who smelled of horses raised her hand to her cheek, fiddling with the lobe of her ear. "It's ridiculous, I know."

"I like it," said Link. "Like this, right?" She tried to whistle; it sounded more like a wet balloon deflating. The girl who smelled of horses giggled. "...how do you do it?"

The girl who smelled of horses took Link's hands up, to curl her fingers into the proper shapes, to dampen her thumb and forefinger with her saliva, to raise the whistle to her mouth. As she does now.

Link whistles, and she can see the horses down the plain that prick up their ears. Not only Ilia, and not all of the horses, but a handful. Two or three that come trotting towards her. Ilia whinnies and rears as the foreign horses approach, pawing at the air, then stamping her hooves on the earth. Ears flicked back and pressed against her neck, she snorts at the other horses. Link tries to coo Ilia, to soothe her. Ilia gaits forward. With her body, she forms a wall between Link and the other horses. She snorts again and runs her hoof over the ground.

"Girl, I couldn't think of picking another horse," Link signs to her. "I'd rather walk than ride someone else who isn't you."

Ilia continues to snort and bare her teeth at the foreign horses until they lose interest in the whistle and leave. Link exhales. She pats Ilia on the neck. Removing her saddlebags, Link mounts her companion to more fully embrace her, to scritch her behind the ears, to tell her what a good girl she is. Ilia quiets down. When she lowers her head to munch on the grass, Link glances over at her other companion, currently lying on the ground with a stare towards the sky. Kass, she realises, has fainted near dead away.

He did not faint at the lizalfos attacking them, nor the guardians blaring into life, nor even when face-to-face with the serpent on Mount Nayru, but because of a potential fight between horses.

Link starts to dismount, intent on cooking something with which to rouse him, and then the wilds answer her.

The wilds whistle back, long and loud and low, like a bird's call. Somewhere from the south. Somewhere, perhaps, from the woods.

Ilia's ears swivel forward. Link senses rather than feels the abrupt tautness of her companion's muscles, the bunching of her sinews, the pelting of her limbs. The forward push. Her hooves against the earth.
Somewhere between a year and a half and two years ago Link felt this same relentless rush. When first she mounted Ilia all those months ago. Together they have travelled to Necluda, Eldin, to Tabantha, to Parapa, to Faron, to Lanayru, to Akkala, and now—Link's heart squeezes—together they travel home.

She leaves the reins free. Wherever Ilia takes her, she will go. Wherever Ilia takes her, she will follow. With the wind at her back and the clouds above her, with the sea of grass below her and the grove of trees beyond, she rides, and in the riding she both forgets and remembers.

Link whistles, and the wilds whistle back. The plume of smoke comes more strongly now, not a single plume, but several, coiling up from the canopy of the woods. A village. A village in the woods. A village in the woods with the whistle of the wilds.

Ilia slows before the forest. Link observes an uneven arrow painted onto the grass. No, not paint: winter flowers planted in an arrow, pointing inwards to a path into the woods. By the flowers, a wooden sign sticks out from the ground, illustrated in clean white lines with an emblem of a horse, a voltfruit prickly pear, and a pumpkin.

Telma Ranch

This way.

Trainers & breeders of horses.

Faron & Akkala's legendary horse-whisperers, come to Necluda to fulfill all your horsey needs.

In Necludan, and repeated underneath in a language Link cannot read—Faronese, from the loops of the characters—in Akkalan, in Lanayrish.

Link stares at the sign, the paint slightly worn, the shaft tilted at an odd angle in the earth, the arrow upon the ground fuzzy at the edges. She dismounts from Ilia to the side of the arrow, avoiding even brushing her boots against the flowers, as if the second she touches a single petal this all will disappear.

She understands now the lady who hit her twice with a watering can for almost setting foot upon the flowers around the shrine.

Link leads Ilia cautiously around the arrow. She comes to a halt at the beginning of the well-trod path. When she tries to swallow, the knot in her throat sticks against the back of her mouth. Then Ilia simply whmphs a hoof onto the path. The seal breaks. She can walk. Link can walk.

She enters the forest. Link listens to the calls of the birds in the wood, the susurrus of the leaves in the trees, the soft clip-clop of Ilia's gait. Within the woods, the air grows warmer and slightly more humid, winter farther and spring closer than Link has felt in months. The scents: of herbs and of evergreen trees, of the deadened forest floor beneath the snow, of the stirring signs of life at spring's approach.

The path widens and suddenly Link hears the flutter of wings to the treetops and the swift whispers of pawpads along the grass. A flight of birds and a fleeing of beasts. Ilia rears in fright; Link whoas and croons to her until she comes back down to the earth.

Then Link looks forward to find herself staring at a purple rabbit the size of a human. A rabbit? Not, not a rabbit. A boy. A boy with a violet cloak whose hood resembles the ears of a rabbit.
A boy who sits upon a stump in a small clearing just past the edge of the forest. A hylian boy, his dark black hair falling over his pointed ears, his brown eyes wide in expectation and then in shock. In his lap sleeps a white duck with a blue blanket over their head. In his hands he holds a wooden ocarina that Link recognises well.

Though the blue has long faded to the merest hints along the curves of wood, she knows the ocarina that Marin gave her all those years ago, the ocarina in which Aryll carved a seagull to mark it as Link’s.

"You're not Hilda," the boy is saying, his Necludan softer and more rolling than the Kakariko dialect. His brows knit together. "Oi, who're you supposed to be? Oi, _oi_, where'd you get Gull from?"

"That's...that's my ocarina," Link signs in Necludan.

The boy raises his eyebrows. "Did'ja hit your head on the way here, uh..." The boy looks Link up and down, at the thick coat and the drawn hood that obscure most of her features save for her face. "...stranger? I've never seen ya before, and this here ocarina was given to me by the old lady."

Link shakes her head from side to side. "That's my ocarina. That's my...ocarina. There's a seagull on it. There's a seagull on the underside, where you usually hold your left hand."

The boy makes a _khuh_ sound in his throat. "What." He turns the ocarina over for himself. "There's no sea—see. I see. Whoa." He squints at the back of the ocarina and buffs it out. "I don't know about a seagull. Lookin' more like a deformed dog or some3thing. Or a turkey. Goose maybe. Not a seagull. All faded like. Wouldn't have guessed it's s'posed to be a seagull."

"It's a seagull." Link crouches down to draw the seagull, as best she can remember, in the soil. "And Aryll wrote her name in it. It's in Akkalan. It looks like this." Her stubby finger traces out each character. Her vision tilts. Her head woozes like in a dream. The boy leans over from the stump to look. He sits back.

The boy _khuhhs_. "Did'ja come here to steal it? First you ruin my concert, then you go'n try to filch my ocarina, _and_ I don't even know where Hilda is." The boy clicks his tongue. "Boy, you got some nerve for a stranger."

"Who's Hilda?"

"Boy oh boy, you got some nerve for a stranger who doesn't even know who Hilda is. If you came here lookin' for your _horse_ needs, Hilda's out and the old lady's been all outta sorts. So unless the Goddesses went'n sent ya here, you should go."

Link reaches up to grip Ilia's rein for support. Her companion noses her cheek, and that alone gives her all of the courage that she needs. "Do you know this whistle?" She demonstrates. Ilia's ears flick back and forth. When the boy does not reply, Link starts to raise her fingers to her lips again; he frantically waves his arms until she drops her hands to her sides.

The boy ogles at her. "Who. What. Did'ja hear the whistle'n figure out how to do it? S'hard if you don't already know. And how'd you know about the ocarina? Buddy, _who_ are you?"

As if the very scent of the forest stuck its finger down Link's throat, she feels an abrupt rise of nausea at the back of her mouth, halfway from exhaustion, halfway from fear. "_I'm looking for someone. I'm looking for a girl. A hylian, from Ordon. Her hair's a mix of gold and brown, kind of like caramel sugar blended with honey, and her eyes are the same colour green as steamed Hyrule" herb, and her skin's sort of the same shade as a pie crust before you put it in the oven. When I saw her last, she had her hair short and curly, to about this length. But that was a long time ago, so I don't know what it'd look like now. She signs! She signs. Ordon, in the province of Ordona, in Akkala." Link touches her chin at what else she might consider. "I remember thinking that she always smelled of horses. She'd carry about sugar cubes and salt and carrots for all the horses. She taught me a lot about taking care of them."

Link hesitates. Horses. The girl who smelled of horses, and Marin, and Urbosa, all having taught her something about horses, all having bridged a gap between them through horses.

"She ran away from home. She said that she was going down south to start a ranch, but I only rem—I only found out recently. So I've come to see what happened." Link squeezes shut her eyes. "I lost all my memories a while ago, and I don't remember her name. I know this sounds far-fetched. But." She opens them again. "Her favourite food was catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd. I don't know if they have catfish around here, but I promised her I'd make her some and I want to tell her I love her very much."

"Hn." The boy on the stump crosses his arms over his chest. "That sounds like the old la—"

Link seizes his hands. She pumps them up and down. The white duck quacks awake in his lap. The boy flinches backwards; Link, too, recoils to apologise.

"Oi, buddy, calm down. Calm down. Look, I told ya the old lady's all out of sorts."

She senses her arms moving through the gestures she never thought she would make: "She's alive!?" Link does not remember dropping to her knees but somehow she finds herself in the dirt, her knees dug into the soil, her body curled over itself, her shoulders shivering. Alive.

Alive.

She must be one hundred and eighteen, one hundred and nineteen years old, one hundred and twenty years old. Link can only ever met a single person to live that long. No, two: Purah, and Impa, both rattling their final breaths, both having lived lives dedicated to outlasting the Calamitous One, both having awaited for when the Champion of Hylia, the Hero of Hyrule, Her Majesty's Knight, O Courageous Link would return from the Shrine of Resurrection, both living so that they might yet assist in the cleansing of the malice of Hyrule, both perhaps aided by the very Goddesses. But the girl who smelled of horses: only a girl. Only a person. Yet somehow, somehow, hope beyond hope, alive.

"She's real old, too," the boy is saying, yet all Link can see and hear and smell and taste and touch is the girl who smelled of horses. "Older'n these hills, probably. Like so ancient she was probably 'round when the Dragons still slithered up'n down the mountains. I don't got a clue how she knows ya. But, khuh. If you can make that catfish stew of 'ers, it could perk 'er back up, I s'pose." Sliding off from the stump, the boy folds his arms over his chest. "Now don't you touch nothin', got it? Follow me. I'll take ya to 'er'n if she's feelin' up for it, you can see 'er."

"Please," Link manages.

The boy tucks the ocarina into his cloak. He whistles—not Ilia's whistle, but a different one—and the duck perches on his shoulder. "Don't you go dyin' on me, now, buddy. C'mon. Me'n Zeffa'll take you." He pauses. "You got a name, buddy?"

The name that the girl who smelled of horses gave her. Link.
She traces out the characters in Akkalan, first. Her name. And then again in Necludan, for the boy, who nods his head and sniffs his nose. "H'all right, Link. Name's Ravio. And I'm her favourite, so don't you forget that. Did'ja catch that?" Link nods. "Now pick yerself up'n follow me already."

Her limbs do not appear to wish to cooperate. With a grunt and a roll of the eyes, Ravio assists her in clambering onto Ilia, where she clings to Ilia's warmth.

"And don't you think for a second that you're gettin' my ocarina. S'a gift from the old lady's. No way, no how." Link weakly bobs her head.

The girl who smelled of horses. The girl who smelled of horses. The girl who smelled of horses.

The duck—Zeffa—on his shoulder burrows her head deeper into the blue blanket. Taking Ilia's reins, Ravio leads her down the well-trodden road. Link listens to him referring to Ilia as Gull. He promises Ilia—promises Gull—that he'll see her returned back home soon enough, swearing that if Link stole her he will personally see to Link's execution. They walk up the forest path. A droplet of snow from an overhead branch plops onto Ilia's mane. Her hand almost limp, Link reaches up to brush the frost away.

Between blurred eyes, Link catches snatches of a village, like a series of pictographs, in a great flat clearing within the forest. A tall sharp fence prickled in thorns and brambles surrounds the settlement. Horses, horses upon horses grazing in a circular pasture, and some Ordon goats with their horns meeting to form halos over their heads, and cows that somewhat resemble those she has seen in Faron but with razorshroom-russet coats instead of splotches in black and white. Near breeding season. Close to spring. Homes of wood and stone. The abodes, stables, and barnhouses of the village—of Telma Ranch—circle around the perimeter near the fences. Small. A small village, likely not more than a few dozen people.

The villagers eye Link and Ilia as Ravio leads her around. Ravio waves the villagers off, swears that he'll tell them about it later, but that right now he's on an errand for the old lady. They wish him the best of luck.

Suddenly Link catches her breath. As if looking around Telma Ranch for the first time, her eyes clearer than before, she extends a hand towards Ravio's shoulder. He snaps his head back with a grinding in his throat.

"Are you taking me directly to her?"

Ravio quirks an eyebrow. "Aye...?"

"Wait. Can I make her the catfish stew first?" In her efforts to sign while lying on Ilia's back, Link nearly falls over and off. "Please. I don't want to go to her with empty arms. Please. I need to have something to give her or I won't know what to say."

"Khuk. You're a weird one, buddy. H'all right. But. You poison 'er'n I'll give you the ole one-two."

A galley. A kitchen. Not filthy, but clean. The salts and the spices and the seasonings in nearly the same places that Link herself would put them. The utensils and bowls in careful order. The ingredients arranged neatly, here the fruit, and here the mushrooms, and here the herbs, and here the meat, and here the fish, and here the assorted everything else.
The catfish: not quite the same as Ordon catfish, growing up in the clearer Squabble River and the streams through the river rather than the weakly flowing Kanalet River. The pumpkin: not quite the same as Ordon pumpkin, grown in a warmer and wetter clime, instead of the cool dry Ordon soil with its shorter harvest season. The cheese: not quite the same as Ordon cheese, the goats fed on different grains and grasses than the yellowish-green of Akkala.

As Marin's family did, years upon years ago, when they moved from Koume to establish Lon Lon Ranch and brought with them wheat and voltfin trout, so too did the girl who smelled of horses bring with her catfish and pumpkin and goats.

And, because of that, Link can make the catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd. Properly now. Properly.

Several hours later she leans back in a chair. A dozen ruined pumpkin gourds litter around her, the catfish and cheese stews within them cooling off, the various mixtures and combinations and times on heat and exact spices and exact seasoning and exact pinches of salt wrong, all wrong, all wrong.

Ravio checks up on her while she stares blankly at the kitchen counter mounted in ruined pumpkins, her eyes glassed over, her jaw slack. He leaps forward. Zeffa quacks on his shoulder.

"Did'ja think you'd just waltz in here'n waste all our ingredients, buddy!?!" Ravio bursts out. Yet, when Link lifts her head up at him, he flinches back. "What's that look s'posed to mean?"

"I want to make it perfect for her. I haven't seen her in so long, and she hasn't seen me, and I just...I just feel like it's not... " Link clenches her hands into fists. "When I was in Ordon I made it, and I even made it without cheese, but it was...it was Ordon. And now this. It doesn't taste like it. It's missing something. It's missing. I don't know what it's missing. I do know what it's missing. A hundred and two years I've been missing. A hundred and two years that she's...without me...and I've...her entire life..." She lowers her face into her palms. Link does not weep—she has no tears—but she shudders, and then her hands fall away, and then she simply stares vacantly ahead again.

"Buddy. I don't give a horse's behind 'bout ya or ya problems. But." He makes a khuk in the back of his throat. "If the old lady's really your friend or whatever, she's gonna wanna see ya, not the food."

Like Finley and Sasan. Except she doesn't have years of letters. She has herself, having promised the girl who smelled of horses to return. She has herself, who crept into Ordon to steal away Aryll and to leave the girl who smelled of horses a single paper of explanation. She has herself, who might have never seen the girl who smelled of horses again after promising, promising, promising that she would return. She has—

"Traveller!"

Ravio and Link whirl around at once, her body ejecting from the chair at the momentum of her movement and crashing onto the floor. She tilts her chin up.

Kass.

She hears Ravio yelping at him and demanding to know how he even got in here. She hears Kass explaining that he, as Link's companion and friend, followed her here after recovering. He describes how he tracked Ilia down and inquired of the villagers and ranchhands where he might find a certain stranger in a blue tunic and cloak.

Link considers that she left Kass almost out cold in the grass, letting Ilia ride her away. Flailing her arm up, she grasps the first part of him that she hits: the accordion case. He looks down, his beak shutting mid-word.
"Can you help me make catfish stew?"

"In a pumpkin gourd?" Kass finishes; she smiles weakly at him. "What...what is going on, traveller? What have I missed?"

Ravio puts his boot down. "You get one more pumpkin. That's it, buddy. Buddies. Did'ja hear me?"

"Well then, traveller," says Kass, shaking his head, "I see that I'm not liable to get answers until whatever goes on here has calmed down. Therefore, without further ado, allow me to offer my assistance. How can I help?"

"You can play that song for me. Ilia's whistle. On the accordion. Or anything else. Just...play something." She breathes. "And please don't leave."

"I won't, traveller." He offers her a curve of the beak. "I've yet to pass on the songs of all the shrines, and you've yet to make every meal beneath the skies of the Golden Goddesses. Now. If there is anything constant in this world that I have seen, it is three, and I do not mean the Golden Goddesses: death, taxes, and your ability to cook no matter what." Missing something.

Missing something: not going alone. The world. The land once known as and perhaps one day again called Hyrule. Even when she awoke upon the Great Plateau, Link travelled with the slate, and then the cooking pot, and then Ilia, and then all of the companions with whom she has fallen in step since then, and now Kass.

Too dangerous. Not to the body, but to the heart. Too dangerous to go alone. Yet she does not have to go alone. Not anymore.

When she prepares the catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd once more, the pieces somehow fall into place. She understands, now, what was missing: not that the catfish did not taste of Ordon, or that the pumpkin did not taste of Ordon, or that the cheese did not taste of Ordon, but that she did not taste of Ordon.

And now, again, she does. Link cradles the warm pumpkin in her arms. Ravio khucks from the back of his throat. "You done?" She nods. Kass lowers the accordion with a final contraction of the bellows that releases a resonant note upon the air. "Oi. Don't you stop playin' that. S'good music. Now come on."

Accompanied by the accordion, Link leaves the kitchen with the pumpkin against her chest. Outside, she pauses a moment to rest her forehead on Ilia's shoulder, though Link—with a light little laugh—moves away when her companion tries to nibble on the pumpkin.

Ravio puts a finger to his lips. Kass slows the accordion. They cross the village to the wooden house located at the northeastern corner. Northeast. Towards Akkala.

"Here's the old lady's home," Ravio elaborates without needing to. Link would recognise the handwriting from anywhere, that white painted portrait of the horse and the Ordon pumpkin that hangs from the brow of the house, that welcome mat stitched with its Ordon goats. "All yours. I'll be comin' too. Juuust to keep an eye on ya, buddy. Birdbrain, stay outside."

Kass does not even acknowledge Ravio's comment. Instead he stands back with the accordion and proceeds to take up once more the instrument, to play the strains of a song Link knows all too well.

Ravio opens the door for Link. The warmth of the inside of the home rolls over her in a wave. The crackle of the hearth. The rattling of laboured breathing. The rustling of pages of a book being read aloud. The quieting of a voice at their approach.
A girl around Link's age sitting by a wooden bed. A goat-fur mattress, with soft goatskin sheets. And upon the bed—

The golden-brown hair, now silver. The spring green eyes, now filmed with white. The bright smile, now wrinkled to more resemble an overboiled potato than a human face.

But the scent that she remembers. The scent, the same as it was over one hundred years ago. The scent, like the smells of the meals that have brought Link back who she was and is and will yet be, that reaches across one hundred years of passing.

The girl who smelled of horses.

The girl who smells of horses.

Ilia.

Frozen Crab (two hearts, low cold resist for 01:00) - razorclaw crab

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: If you're shield-surfing in Breath of the Wild, press "Y" to perform a spin which causes Link to laugh in-game.

If you drop a crab in a snowy area and let it sit for a few seconds, you will indeed get a frozen crab. The same thing happens to any kind of meat.

This is incredibly self-indulgent of me, but in The Adventure of Link, when Link enters the town of Kasuto (from The Adventure of Link, not the village from Delicious in Wilds, and I'm taking about New Kasuto, not Old Kasuto), Link enters a house through a chimney. Upon doing so, Link exclaims, "LOOKS LIKE I CAN GET IN THE FIREPLACE," one of the few times that Link has directly spoken in the entire franchise. Ever since I put in Kasuto to Delicious in Wilds as the very first town that Link visits, I eagerly anticipated the moment Link would return so that I could make this really silly reference.

The title "Hero, Chosen by the Gods" is from Twilight Princess. By the way, more Zelda titles should have actual epithets for their respective heroes, and less should have generic ones like Twilight Princess or like "Hero of Man" from The Minish Cap.

The shrines providing protection from monsters is something that we'll explore more in the future. In the meantime, pretty much anyone who doesn't live around a shrine is evacuating from how bad it's gotten with the monsters. Ye-ouch!

If you forgot, Link lost the wooden ocarina that had been given for her from the Yiga; it's still floating around on the Divine Beast Vah Rudania, where it rolled away.

Telma Ranch is a reference to Telma from Twilight Princess, who—with her red hair and black-coded features—may have been meant to be gerudo in the game. Unfortunately, her backstory wasn't really touched upon; her design was oversexualised; and she fit right into the mammy stereotype. I wish that more had been done with her. At any rate, for Delicious in Wilds, I went ahead and made her a gerudo woman, although she is no longer alive as of the time of the fic considering age.

As a reminder, Link knows how to conversationally speak Central Hyrulean, Akkalan, Necludan, Eldic, Tabanch, Parapan, and Lanayrish; she has also learned Faronese better over the course of her journey with the winter that she spent speaking Faronese at Romani Ranch. She knows how to read Akkalan, Lanayrish, Central Hyrulean, and Necludan, and she knows how to write Necludan and Akkalan. However, note that she really only knows how to speak the main dialects of Eldic, Tabanch, and Parapan. For example, I mentioned that she had great difficulty understanding the Rovah dialect of Parapan that Urbosa knew natively, as Link had learned the Nabooru dialect. This might seem like a lot of languages, but travellers and couriers throughout ages have tended to know a variety of languages as part of their specialties, and Link is only conversationally in these languages. Consider that she does not even know enough Central Hyrulean to comprehend everything that Zelda tells her about the research.

The arrow in the flowers that points into the grove, with a boy sitting on a stump, is in reference to the same in A Link to the Past. In that game, the boy on the stump plays a blue ocarina for the animals around, and eventually gives Link the ocarina. The boy on the stump is also associated with a duck that carries Link from place to place as the fast travel in A Link to the Past. The character of Ravio was inspired by the character of the same name from A Link Between Worlds, whose purple bunny outfit is in reference to Link's pink bunny form from A Link to the Past. In A Link Between Worlds, Ravio has a white and blue bird named Sheerow; in The Minish Cap, the duck Zeffa is the one who carries Link around, also summoned by an ocarina. As usual, I took all of these and mashed them together into Ravio on the stump with a white bird named Zeffa who plays the ocarina.

Ilia's super old. However, there are indeed real-life people who have lived to that age. I admit that it's a stretch, and I was originally going to have her be dead of old age. However, my beta reader Emma convinced me otherwise. You can just picture her staying alive on from a combination of (1) sheer force of willpower and (2) having the luxury of being able to relax and not do anything.

Up next: Ilia, Ilia, Ilia; the Great Calamity; Link's time of dying.

Beta reader's comments: This is my second-favourite chapter in the series. The slow buildup to Ilia is beautiful and haunting, and ended up bringing me to tears.

Tough Pumpkin Stew

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef reunites with the girl who smelled of horses and learns of the last time the two met prior to the Great Calamity, under circumstances unlike any the chef expected.

Chapter Notes

As usual, author's notes that didn't end up having space to put at the end: I started writing this chapter at 00:09 on the seventh of August, and finished writing it on at 03:44 on the ninth of August.

Thanks a million to you, my beloved reader, who has journeyed with me. We've come a long, long, long way since Link first remembered the girl who smelled of horses, back when Link didn't even know who Ilia was, back when Link was still on the Great Plateau. We've come such a long way. And now we're with Ilia again.

Luda is named after the character from Twilight Princess.

Ilia the horse was originally named Gull, after Aryll's love of seagulls. However, Ilia the woman accepts Link having renamed Gull to Ilia.

I thought that this was a good chance for me to summarise the story so far for the reader, since we've come a very, very long way from where we were, and it's good to look back on everything as a refresher, especially for those of you who have been reading this for over sixty-six days!

Indeed, in the same chapter that I revealed about how Link rescued Aryll from Ordon in the middle of the night, I did mention that Link slipped a 'carving of wood' into the letter for Ilia. That was the ocarina!

The remark about comparatively idyllic serenity is not meant to imply that people were leading stress-free lives, because a poor harvest could mean death. But these are issues that people could understand. What can be understood of monsters, of the skies turning gold, of the very earth bleeding purple?

The village of Kasuto Link has visited is New Kasuto. The Old Kasuto/New Kasuto thing is in reference to The Adventure of Link.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Ilia.

Ilia, whose name she has carried with her for nearly two years. Ilia, whose name she thought referred at first to the horse Marin gave her and the girl who smelled of horses trained. Ilia—
Epona, the horse who walked beside her one hundred years ago. Ilia, the horse who walks beside her now. Ilia, the girl who smelled of horses, the girl, the woman, the old lady sunken into the bed.

Link holds the warm pumpkin in her arms, cradles the gourd like a person, like an old friend, like the very first home she ever had.

The girl seated by the bedside of Ilia—Ilia Ilia Ilia—speaks slowly to the elderly woman upon the bed, to inform her that she has a visitor. When Ilia signs back, she, unable to use her arms, spells out the words in painstaking slowness on her trembling fingers, swollen with age, the joints scarcely moving, the veins bulging out like a pie crust overstuffed. Link observes her gestures. The skin hangs off of her bones as though connected to nothing at all. Like nothing more than a bag of flesh with a jumble of bones within. Like Maryll, like Maryll but even then Maryll could still feed herself.

With the girl by the bedside's help, Ilia sits up in bed. The girl turns towards Link and bows her head. "Lady Ilia welcomes you. She asks of your name, your business, and that heavenly smell you have brought with you."

Link read the questions from Ilia's fingertips, blurred halfway between Akkalan and Necludan, some of the words slipping down to Faronese. Yet she merely nods in acceptance of the girl's words.

Ilia signs, in her slow way, that the girl need not call her Lady Ilia, that Ilia works just fine, and Ravio's old lady too. The girl apologises, "Lady Ilia." Turning towards Link, the girl explains that Ilia has not fared well the last few years and particularly these several months, falling in and out of illness. "She may become delirious or unresponsive, and she may forget how to speak. If so, I'll have to ask that you come back later, if at all." The girl gazes down at Ilia, her expression of a warmth more tender than beef stewed an entire week.

Link glances at her own arms: the catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd.

She holds the pumpkin out. The girl raises her eyebrows, and Ravio declares that Link has made the stew for Ilia.

Even if Ilia can no longer see, her once spring green eyes the milky white of winter, Ilia—Ilia Ilia Ilia—can smell, and she can eat.

The girl introduces herself as Luda. Luda, one of the many villagers of Telma Ranch grown up long after Ilia stepped down from acting as the village's mayor, who knows her better as everyone's grandmother despite having had no children of her own—except, as Ravio huffs out, that nearly everyone in the village, at least everyone worthwhile, considers Ilia more than family—who helps in taking care of her, as thanks for everything that Ilia has done in her life for them.

Luda, of short black hair and brownish red eyes, her eyebrows thick and expressive over her kindly features, her skin the colour of browned baked pie, her simple brown and white goatskin dress clothing a girl who moves her arms when she speaks even though she does not sign.

Luda, who says hello to Link.

Ilia inquires, again, of Link's name. Link, setting down the stew, asks instead if Ilia would eat the soup first.

Ravio grabs her wrist and demands to try it himself, to check to see if Link has poisoned the pumpkin or not. Link opens top of the pumpkin. The scent of catfish stew rises in vapours from its inner warmth. She scoops her own hand into the thick of the pumpkin, allowing the soup to collect in her palm, and then tips back her head to swallow the pumpkin stew down.

Ravio takes a handful as well, glancing suspiciously towards Link from the left and then from the right. He again ghosts the one-two punch. This time he does not fall off his balance, at least not as much. She nods appreciatively.

"...h'all right. But try anythin' funny'n one-two you're gonna get it."

Ilia pleads for Ravio not to go around driving off any more visitors. He scuffs the floorboards with his sock. Only then does Link note that Ravio has left his boots at the door in Faronese fashion, and so she turns to take off her own.

The gesture elicits a laugh from Ravio, who claps a hand over his own mouth. When Link blinks at him, he pouts and looks away, arms crossed over his chest. Luda relays the goings-on to Ilia. Her smile deepens the wrinkle around her toothless mouth, although Link can no longer tell, for the looseness of her skin, if it reaches her eyes. Yet she knows Ilia well enough to sense it does.

Luda extends her hands to take the pumpkin from Link. She shakes her head. "If it's all right with you and with..." Her hands do not form Ilia's name. "...I want to try giving it to her myself."

Ravio and Luda peer at one another, then decline in unison. Rather, Link perches on the log by Luda's side. Ravio retrieves a spoon—a utensil that certainly exists even if Link has mostly used her hands to eat for the majority of the past two years—and Luda dips it into the pumpkin.

Ilia opens her mouth at Luda's command. Luda tests the stew, checking the size of the chunks and picking out any that might prove difficult to swallow before feeding the spoonful to her. With a laborious wringing of the throat, the pulsations down making Link wince vicariously for how Ilia must fight against the years that long to break her body to dust, the first and best friend she has ever had swallows.

She strains to sit up further. "Traveller..." Ilia signs in her excruciating slowness. Although Luda translates, Link's gaze has fixed upon Ilia's hands. "...who are you?"

Link exhales. Luda and Ravio look upon her, the former bearing an expression of kindness, the latter glaring at her with narrowed eyes that thinly veil his curiosity.

"I think you might know me," Link signs. Luda relays the message back to Ilia, who lifts up her shaking hands. Autumn leaves. No, winter leaves, barely clinging on to the branches that have long since frosted over, but not yet willing to let go of life.

Luda guides Link in allowing Ilia to feel her face. Link closes her eyes. The breath of Ilia's hands over her cheeks carries the sensation of wrinkled paper, of letters written years and years ago, opened and closed so many time that they have become soft to the touch, the creases worn entirely out until the letter does not fold again quite right, until the letter does not fold at all, until the ink has all but faded from the paper, but the words have inscribed themselves onto the inner curves of the reader's eyelids.

Something in her chest recoils away at the touch. Something of bile burns the lower rim of her throat. Something thudding against her sternum finds a thread of revulsion, of a life on the threshold of death.

Link tries to swallow down the feeling. She keeps her eyes shut. In that moment she hates herself more than anything.
Ilia feels her brows, her eyes, her ears, her cheeks, her nose, her lips, her chin. Lower, to her throat, where the pulling away of the hood accompanies Luda's gasp and Ravio's _khuh_. Ilia touches her shoulders, her arms, down to her wrists, where Ilia's fingertips run over the vertical scars raised in ridges on her skin, like a taloned hand sank its claws into her flesh and raked upwards.

The touch leaves her cold, and barren, and all too still. For one dreadful moment of her heart dropping away beneath her and—worse—her stomach turning inside out to never hold food again, Link fears that when she lifts her eyelids again, she will see nothing but the grasslands of the plain, nothing but the marshes of the swamp, no plume of smoke to the south.

Instead she finds herself gazing at an Ilia whose eyes have filmed over in wetness, the green of her irises still glinting beneath the bank of whitened mist after all of these years.

"Catfish stew?" she signs.

"In a pumpkin gourd." Link forms the words against Ilia's palms, spelling out the characters in Akkalan: "I'm home."

Ilia signs back into Link's hands. "Welcome home."

And Link, who has not cried over the wholeness of the winter, feels again that burning behind her eyelids that fogs her vision and traces salt down her cheeks. The droplets fall upon Ilia's knuckles. Her breaths shuddering her body, Ilia lifts her thumb to wipe away the tears forming on Link's lashes.

"I wish I could say that I knew you would come back," Ilia signs. "You promised to make me catfish stew, didn't you? I told myself that you'd never broken a promise of a meal before. I wish I could promise you that I never lost hope." Ilia hesitates. Link dares not close her eyes, not even to blink. "I wish I could tell you all these things. I thought you had...died. But you've not changed at all. Link...what...what happened?"

Link glances at Luda, glances at Ravio, glances at her shoulder only to remember that Sarie no longer rides there. "It's a long story," she says.

The sound that Ilia makes rattles the dryness of leaves together. It takes Link a long moment to recognise the noise as something approaching a laugh. "I have waited a long, long time. I can wait a little more. And besides, I've got your stew to keep me company. No one makes catfish stew like you do."

Link breathes.

"Ilia," she says, "I've waited so long to tell you. I...I love you. Very much."

"Oh, Link." Ilia's exhalation trembles. "I love you too."

Link's heart could burst out of her chest. Rather she takes Ilia's hands in hers. Again, together, after all this time.

Ilia and Link. They talk. They talk of childhood in Ordon. They talk of Aryll. They talk of Link's parents and of Ilia's father. They laugh at old jokes. They speak of Epona, the horse, and of the goats, and of the foods that they would eat. They talk of Rusl and Uli, of Colin and Beth, of Malo and Talo, of Jaggie and Pergie, of Sera and Fado, of Hanch and of the village. They talk of the barges from Papuchia and Lurelin with their Faronese ocean fish, and they talk of the barges from Lanayru with their rice-balls. They talk of the time Mipha visited them. They talk of the books that they would take turns reading, and they talk of the grassy knoll upon which they lay together with the wind ruffling their hair and their hands intertwined, and they talk of the nights when Link would rap on Ilia's windows, and Ilia would rappel out on a ladder made of her bedsheets strung together.

Ilia apologises again for having said those terrible things to Link so long ago, and Link shakes her head. "I could never find the words when I was younger, but...you didn't give my heart back its missing string, no, but you did...you held the wounds down long enough that I didn't bleed out. Sorry if that doesn't make sense."

"It does, Link." The tears glimmer as the stars upon Ilia's cheeks. You didn't have to say it for me to read it off your fingers."

They talk of the spring with its foaling of horses and kidding of goats and with its saddling of late yearlings ready for the ride. They talk of the autumn with its gathering of the wilds and with its gathering-together of people.

They talk of the faces that they have left. They talk of the farmers and the ranchhands, the butchers and the rice growers, the smithies and the tailors, the herbalists and the apothecaries, the fishermen and the mushroom-gatherers, the stonemasons and the woodcarvers, the leatherworkers and the candlemakers, the names and the faces that they have known.

And then Ilia traces a line down Link's cheek, her thumb on the scar beneath her left eye. "Link...I've wanted to ask you this for so long. But could you tell me what...what happened, after you left Ordon? When you promised me the catfish stew?"

Link nods. She breathes. And then Link starts to talk.

To Luda's credit, the girl faithfully says everything that Link signs, sometimes paraphrasing slightly when Link signs too quickly for her to keep up. Though her eyes embiggen, her brows soar off to meet the Golden Goddesses, and her gestures of arms become wilder and wilder the further Link's tale progresses, Luda keeps on. Ravio mutters at first about the impossibilities. Scuffing up his rabbit-like hood, he pulls it down to obscure most of his face. As Link goes on, however, he ever so steadily inches open the hood, ever so steadily starts to lean in, ever so steadily catches a certain sparkle in his eye.

Link talks of pulling the sword from the stone.

Link talks of becoming the chosen hero, of meeting the Champions, of seeing the girl with the golden hair, the Princess of Hyrule.

Link talks of Aryll, growing up safe at last, and Link talks of Marin, passed away years ago, and Link talks of Ilia, who ran away from the village of Ordon, and Link talks of Rusl, and Link talks of her own parents.

Her own parents, very, very small.

And Ilia's father: just as very, very small, whom she prays never caught up to Ilia.

Link talks of the Great Calamity. Link talks of the Divine Beasts. Link talks of what she has heard from others: what she heard from Yunobo; what she heard from Amali; what she heard from Riju; what she heard from Sidon and the King Zora. Link talks of her own memories that she has forgotten. She does not know what happened in the interim one hundred years. She does not know, even, where all of her memories lie, which ones occurred in conjunction with others and which ones happened far, far down the path: months of blankness.
She talks of the Shrine of Resurrection. She talks of the slate, and she talks of the branch that she picked up to practise her swings, and she talks of the evergreen apple trees, and she talks of the tower from which she fell and where she nearly snapped her neck and the grasshopper that broke her down in laughter at the wonders of being alive, and she talks of the shrines, and she talks of the cabin and the letter written by Kass's mentor or perhaps Kass's mentor's father, and she talks of Kasuto, and she talks of Ilia the horse.

"Her name's not Ilia," Ravio cuts in. "S'Gull. Gall. She got took by those damned boko scum two springs ago. You must've got 'er after she ran away from 'em. But don't you dare think you're walkin' outta here with 'er. She's ours."

"You remembered my old whistle and you thought that Epona was named Ilia." Ilia shifts her arms ever so slightly. Although she can no longer fully bend her limbs, Link recognises her usual pose with her hands on her hips. "I can't tell if I should take this as an insult or a compliment." Link rubs the back of her head. "I can't go with you now, like this. I'd be...happy to let another me walk beside you, at least. A portable Ilia, on the go."

Link cries again. She wipes at her eyes. Luda pats her shoulder, but Ilia extends an arm—to tap Luda's wrist and ask for more catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd.

Grateful for the intervention, Link lets the tears weep themselves out.

When Link quiets again, she resumes her story. She talks of the late spring plum blossoms in Kakariko, and she talks of the summer in Eldin, and she talks of Yunobo and the Divine Beast Vah Rudania. She talks of Koko and Cottla upon her return, and she talks of Ilia the horse poking her head in through the window, and she talks of the autumn in Tabantha, and she talks of Teba and the colourful sisters, and she talks of Amali and the Divine Beast Vah Medoh. She talks of herself having run away from Kakariko, and she talks of Maron in Koume with the saddlebags of milk, and she talks of Romani Ranch, and she talks of Marin and of Malon and of Vish and of Cremia and of Romani and, of course, of Miyu.

She talks of finding home, and she talks of the long winter, and she talks of finding herself amid the fields of wheat again.

She talks of the hinox that she pushed into the water with a cooking pot and a lucky bolt of lightning, and she talks of sharing stew with all in Aveil, and she talks of the archaeologists and of Rotana's brilliance, and she talks of whaling and of the molduga, and she talks of the thunderstorm, and she talks of spring in Parapa, and she talks of Dyeri and Nadyne, and she talks of Ruboona—of Riju—and the Divine Beast Vah Naboris. She talks of the winding route around Lake Hylia through the forests of Faron, and she talks of the lightning that struck the boomerang at the same moment that she caught it in her palm, and she talks of her acceptance of her own title, and she talks of the lynel that left her with a scar in the shape of a handprint—four scarlet marks in a row and one slightly off-set for the thumb—on her belly, and she talks of summer in Lanayru, and she talks of the King Zora and of Sarie, and she talks of Sidon and the Divine Beast Vah Ruta.

She talks of Finley and Sasan, and she talks of the Veiled Falls, and she talks of seeing Kass again, and then she goes back and recounts all the times that she has seen Kass, and then she talks of autumn in Akkala, and she talks of Rusl and of Uli and of Colin, and she talks of Ilia and Ordon.

She talks of making catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd, and she talks of the ruins of the village, and she talks of those that they have lost.

"It was...during the Great Calamity," says Ilia, her motions matter-of-fact, her words from a lifetime ago. More than a lifetime. One hundred and two years ago. "The Divine Beast in Eldin destroyed it in its rampage. I only learned of that years later." She squeezes her hands together. "I never heard from them again."

Link is silent. Then she talks again.

She talks of seeing her companions again. She talks of the lost woods. She talks of grasping the hilt of the sword that seals the darkness. She talks of the blade of evil's bane that has not chosen her, and this time when she speaks her hands do not shake.

Well, they do. Yet only slightly. Only slightly.

She talks of the winter that she has spent with Kass seeking shrines. She talks of the return to Kasuto, of the tale of the whistle, of heading south through the forest. She talks of the arrow of winter flowers, and she talks of the boy on the stump with the blue ocarina, and she talks of the catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd, and she talks of Ilia. Ilia, Ilia, Ilia.

When the story comes to its end, Link rests her hands in her lap. She breathes. Her chest rises and her chest falls. In through her nose and out through her mouth.

"...thank you," says Ilia.

Link swallows thickly. "You believe me?"

"No, thank you for the stew." Ilia snorts. "Yes, Link, I meant thank you for catching me up. Of course I believe you. You're here, aren't you? Unless I'm finally dying and my mind's giving me a little break."

"I mean about..." Link rotates her hands about her wrists. "...being the chosen hero. That I used to be."

"I believe that, too. You've never lied to me. And even if I were to think it far-fetched, I...saw you die, Link."

She reads the signs, yet the signs do not coalesce into anything that makes sense.

"It's my turn, I think, now that I'm not distracted by the greatest dish in all of Hyrule." With a napkin, Luda cleans Ilia's mouth for her. Ilia thanks her.

Ravio thumbs at Ilia with a grin. "Did'ja know that the old lady's the best ever? 'Cause you're 'bout to hear it if you didn't."

Ilia's fingers do not move as they once did, nor do her wrists flex, nor do her arms bend. She takes breaks, frequently. She rests. Link does not leave her side.

Ilia talks of herself. She talks of the letter which she found on the same morning that Aryll went missing. Ilia talks of the letter which warned her that Link might never be able to return, of the letter with its thousand apologies, of the letter which finally made her straighten her spine, of the blue ocarina with Aryll's name carved into the side that had fallen out of the envelope, of the paint that had worn away from her tears and from how often she gripped it in her warmed hand.

For years upon years she had lived with shoulders hunched and head down. For years upon years she had told herself that Link needed a home to come back to. For years upon years she had waited for that golden time when she, and Link, and Marin, and Aryll could walk the paths of Hyrule together.
And then she ran away. With Rusl's teachings. She intended to head south and then west, towards Lon Lon Ranch, to live out her time with Marin. She came upon the Blatchery Plain—teeming with stables, the calamitous destruction of which turned out hundreds of horses whose descendants became the wild herds that thrive on the grasslands now—when highwaymen jumped her on her road. She escaped within a breath of her life, all of her supplies stolen away, her head knocked so hard that she lost her memories. An elderly woman found her on the path and took her in while her memories returned to her. At least some of her memories. She lived in the village with the woman and her twenty cats for some time as she slowly gained back who she was, on those wide open plains with nothing but the blue ocarina whose songs she knew too well.

Long, long ago, someone had played upon that ocarina for her, the notes out of tune, the rhythm uncertain at best. The most beautiful instrument she had ever heard, because that someone had played it for her. Yet she could not remember who.

Those days saw the steady creep of news regarding the Divine Beasts, the guardians, the Champion of Hylia with the sword that seals the darkness, yet these rumours existed in a world far, far away from her. The world of a bedtime story. She lived among the goats and the cats. What did she know of sealing magic and boars of malice, of divine princesses and chosen knights, of blessed blood and sacred sword?

The Great Calamity came upon them swiftly. One moment, the world existed in its comparatively idyllic serenity, their problems those of a poor harvest or an illness through the flock. In the next, the land itself seemed to rise against them. The monsters that appeared to drop from the skies and overrun every village not grown around a shrine. The malice that welled up seemingly from nothing, as though the earth itself had begun to bleed.

She and the other villagers fled.

Over the plains. Some villagers went northwest towards the shrine of what would become New Kasuto, and then, after one hundred years, just Kasuto, when all those who once lived in what they call Old Kasuto passed away. The shrine had started to glow—some said orange; others, gold—and they took this as a symbol of the Golden Goddesses' favour and protection.

Other villagers journeyed to the south or the east in their efforts to escape. The old woman who had cared for Ilia refused to leave without her cats. While Ilia sought to assist her, the old woman insisted that Ilia save herself. So she did.

She went with a caravan of escaping villagers. Yet it took not long for monsters to tear their dreams apart along with their bones. The scent of burning wood and bleeding flesh. The screams of horses and humans to the heavens. Few survived, until she found herself alone, bewildered, clinging to a horse for the sake of survival.

She heard a whistle. A whistle that she had forgotten, but a whistle that called to her with the sound of home. She found—in the Ash Swamp—Link and the princess, bloodied and barely alive, Link having slain guardians and monsters alike in her efforts to protect the princess en route to the castle. Link, severely injured from a run-in with automata at Fort Hateno and delirious from pain, signed not a word to Ilia. From the princess, Ilia learned the Calamity had struck, that the Divine Beasts and the guardians had turned against them all, that she and Link had themselves gone to Mount Nayru to pray a final time in the hopes that her sacred bloodline would manifest, that the monsters and the malice had slaughtered the guards sent with her, that Link's own horse had perished—for whom Link had whistled—and that the princess needed to get to the castle immediately. A mirror in the castle, said the princess, that she believed, hope beyond hope, would grant her what she sought.
"Please," the princess begged her, "allow us use of your horse."

The automata that had chased the princess and Link this far fell upon them, then. Link fought savagely for their lives, fought even though previous encounters had torn her near to pieces, fought despite the blood that ringed her mouth, darkened from the long, long hours that had spent her strength and her spirit.

And when Link propelled the blade of evil's bane through the eye of the first guardian, another automaton took aim at the princess. The princess could only step back.

Link could only lunge forward.

"For as long as I have lived," Ilia says, her gestures soft, "I have never forgotten your scream. So loud I feared you would deafen yourself."

Ilia's horse, spooking, came down upon Ilia's right leg and left it a broken and useless mess of flesh from the knee down. The princess did not want to leave Ilia, to have her sacrificed, yet the fire-light that carved through Link's flesh forced Ilia's own hand. Like the woman who had saved her, Ilia insisted that the princess take Link, take her horse, and go.

The Princess mumbled something about a possibility to save Link's life. The Princess mumbled something about a slim chance. The Princess mumbled something about a last hope for Hyrule.

And then the princess took the horse, took Link, took herself, and left.

Link stares at her own hands: she has died.

If not died, then she has been injured, has been gravely wounded, has been so close to the brink of death that she lay sleeping for one hundred years.

Yet something must have happened in that intervening moment. Something must have passed between her injury and her awakening in the Shrine of Resurrection. Yet what could the princess could have done?

The journey between the Ash Swamp and the castle—between the Ash Swamp and the Shrine of Resurrection—would have taken significant time.

Link has always considered the Great Calamity a single brief moment that reared its maliced jaws, that swallowed the land in pain, and then that left all at once, when the princess varnished to seal the Calamitous One within the Castle.

Never has she put the consideration that the Great Calamity itself might have lasted several days to thought. Never has she put the consideration that the Great Calamity itself might have continued to gouge out the earth until the princess—and perhaps Link—did something about it to thought. Never has she put the consideration...

"Ilia. Thank you for saving my life. And the Princess's. I'm so sorry that I left." Link breathes around the thickness of her throat's constriction, intent on strangling her with her own choked tears. "I'm sorry that I didn't remember you for so long."

"Neither did I," responds Ilia without a hint of malice, "so we're even."

She raises her hand, palm facing outwards towards Link.

Link slaps her palm against Ilia's as gently as she humanly can. Ilia scowls at her, and Link—smiling sheepishly—slaps her properly this time. "Good."

Ilia continues on her tale. Link banishes her thoughts to listen.

The guardians stalked after Link and the princess. Ilia hid in the marshes for those days and nights that followed, when the skies turned gold and violet and the moon stalked the lands with its bloodshot eye, when monsters slithered over the earth and the wilds gave way to malice. Given her broken leg, she slept curled inside of manure left behind by her horse. The manure kept her warm and disguised her scent. The princess and Link had left nothing behind but scarlet grass, the remains of fallen automata with their eyes gouged out, and a waxed parcel of apple pie, still warm enough for her to smell its cinnamon-nutmeg scent. That pie saved her, those days and nights that she hid in the manure.

When the skies cleared, all at once, she considered herself dead. Then a wagon passed her on its journey southeast, and she realised that she did not want to die. She wanted to live. She wanted to live.

In the time immediately after the Great Calamity, those who lived yet in the land that would pass into history as Hyrule fled from Central Hyrule. Amid the chaos, Ilia met a most remarkable gerudo woman who had, before the Great Calamity, migrated from westerszn Faron to eastern Central Hyrule to establish a town near the Passeri Greenbelt. Mabe Village, they called it. Ilia recognised the name: Marin.

She went with Telma and her caravan of other survivors like Ilia as they moved south, seeking protection in the forests. She felt—they all felt, to some extent—that they lived now on borrowed time.

Then her leg started to recover. She learned take her limp in stride, in pride: an emblem of her resilience. The forests and the trees began to regrow. The rivers once more ran clean of blood and filth. The fish leaped through the waters; the birds perched in the trees; the rabbits hopped along the grasses.

The Great Calamity congealed from the everything that had become her world to a mere nightmare that continued to haunt her, but only ever a nightmare.

If not for the crumpled wax that smelled still of apple, Ilia would have thought that she had hallucinated Link, and the princess, and the horse.

Under Telma's guidance, a bustling ranch grew in the woods, where many a passerby would stop to exchange their horses for fresh ones, where they would rest in Telma's bar to drink of liquored milk, where they would catch up on news and rumour. At first, Telma's ranch comprised mainly of Telma herself and Ilia, alongside a handful of other stragglers Telma picked up along the way.

After a time came southbound travellers who had fled from the Divine Beast Vah Rudania's rampage in the north. Those who could not speak Necludan or Central Hyrulean ended up staying longer for Ilia's knowledge of Akkalan; they brought with them Akkalan fish and goats. Other travellers, also refugees from Mabe or from other villages in eastern Central Hyrule, came for their passing familiarity with Telma and stayed for the safety of the woods. The ranch grew.

Over the months that followed, rumours arrived over half-full glasses and stuffed pumpkin gourds. The Calamitous One and the princess had vanished together. The shrines had gone out again and would not begin to glow orange again until years later, when the monsters started to emerge again from the depths.
By the time Ilia regained the rest of her memories—by the time she recalled of Marin, and of Aryll, and of Link—Marin's family had vanished. Ilia journeyed to Lon Lon Ranch, yet found nothing but ruins awaiting her. "I thought this entire time that the Calamitous One had taken her. To hear that she moved away, and nothing more, and died peacefully with her family...I'm glad. I know that's not much to say, but...thank you, Link, for laying me to rest." Ilia pauses. "Not like that. I'm not letting the Goddesses take me yet."

So here Ilia has lived, working with the horses that she loved. Telma, who had become by then so important to her that Ilia called her Mother, passed away. Ilia took over as head of the ranch. From the unofficial title of Telma's ranch, Ilia renamed the village Telma Ranch in her everlasting honour.

And so the years passed. Somewhere along the way, she aged, grew old. Somewhere along the way, she could no longer walk as she once had. Somewhere along the way, her vision worsened until not even spectacles could clear the fog that surrounded her.

Her love of the horses clung her to this life.

As she wearied, she considered the blue ocarina, the paint of which had long since faded away. She gave it to Ravio, whom she had found abandoned—

"Oi, oi. A traveller doesn't need to know that kinda stuff," Ravio snaps, tucking up his blue scarf to muffle his words, looking away and blinking swiftly as if dust had stung his eyes. "I know she's your friend'n all. But cut me some slack, old lady."

—whom she knows has a striking passion for music, and who has in his years growing at the ranch learned to play to soothe the horses—

"Oi, oi, that's enough." He pulls the hood down tighter over his face. Ilia laughs that rattling dry-paper laugh that could plunge Link's heart into her own stomach and force the bile up into her mouth.

—but, if Link wishes, Ilia could persuade Ravio to allow her to temporarily borrow the ocarina from him.

"Nope. Not even for some washed-up chosen one," Ravio cracks back.

Ilia hacks out a cough.

"...fine. But just 'cause you're the old lady's friend or whatever." He holds up two fingers to indicate his own eyes and then Link's, flicking his wrist back and forth several times. "I'll be watchin' ya. Like a hawk watchin' a field mouse. Caw, caw!" He imitates the sound of a hawk swooping down. Link rubs the back of her head.

"And that's the story, morning glory," Ilia finishes. The hours have taken their toll. Her hands move even more slowly than before. "Sorry for taking so long, but...you seemed to want to know. And I don't know how much longer I might be around to tell it." She pauses. "If you've got something to ask, Link, you can do it now."

Link exhales. She raises her hands. She looks down upon herself. She asks if Ilia knows anything of Aryll.

"I want to tell you that Aryll has passed on." Link begins to take her hands, to squeeze her fingers, yet Ilia shakes her off. "But I thought that you, too, had died. So I don't know anymore. She could still be out there." Ilia hmpfs out a breath of amusement. "The Calamitous One destroyed the castle and nearly everyone in it. I don't know if she had a chance to escape. I wish I could tell you something more, but that's all." She ruminates, visibly, on her words. "All I know is that the Princess said something about a way for you to live. A mirror in a shrine. And she told me that she herself would go yet to the castle. She must've done something there."

Link nods.

Another pause, this one deep as the ocean and pitch as the night.

"Can I ask one more question?"

Ilia hmphs, though somehow warmly, in a way that only Ilia can. "You can ask as many as you want, Link."

Link calms herself by smelling the vestiges of warm pumpkin on her hands. "Do you..." The words. Let the words flow. "Are you hungry?" Her arms loop through the motions automatically. "I mean. What I mean to say is. Can I make you something? No, no, I mean. Would you let me cook for you for the rest of your life? No, that's not right either. I mean..."

"Yes," says Ilia, "you're still my best friend, even after all this time."

Link blinks at her. Ilia makes that motion again as though trying to put her hands on her hips.

"Am I right, or am I right, about what you were trying to ask?"

She stands up from the bedside. Luda scoots over, whispering for her to take things easy. Link leans over Ilia.

Gathering her bony shoulders in her arms, Link embraces her best friend, the first person in whom she ever confided, the girl who smells of horses. Even if the years have aged her, they have aged her like a wine; even if the years have simmered her, they have simmered her like a stew; even if the years have worn her down, the scent of hay and horse and love remains.

She stays that way for a long, long time.

Link feels Ilia's quivering arms encircle her, and she relaxes into their warmth. Her best friend signs something into the slope of her spine. Lowering her eyelids, Link focuses on what Ilia says.

"I can tell by the way you're hugging me that you're going to leave, aren't you?" Link frigidly herself to stillness in the hug, and Ilia laughs. "Such is your way, Link. You're a traveller."

"What if I want to come home?"

"Then you'll come home someday. But the wilds...they're in your blood. So's the making of food. That's what I know the most about you, Link, that half of you wants the wind in your hair, and the other half wants the warmth of someone's embrace. You don't have to pick one or the other, you know. You can have both. There's no need to fight who you are, Link.

"It's even in your name. That's why I picked it out for you." Ilia laughs parchment-drily; Link can picture her sly smirk even if her wrinkled mouth can no longer form the curve. "You're the girl who links the halves of the wholes, the girl who linked Ordon to the Akkalan hills, the girl who has linked entire parts of Hyrule together, the girl who links, as you would say, all that is delicious and all that is in wilds."

Link senses her own features softening, brows sloping, lids half-closing, eyes prickling. "You "really are a mind reader." Her chest grows warm; her smile, bright.

"No, I'm just old. And I've had enough time to think about these things while you've been slumbering, sleepyhead." At that moment Link's own body betrays her; her stomach rumbles. Ilia pats her back. "And I've blabbered on long enough. It's about time we ate."

Link rubs the head of her head. Stopping herself, she takes Ilia's hand into hers and presses it to her mouth, so that Ilia, too, can feel the curve of her crooked smile, the heat of her warmed cheeks.

Ravio asks Ilia what she'd like to eat. Luda moves to remove the embargo from entering that he placed over the door upon their entrance. Within less than ten minutes, several villagers have popped their heads in to request Ilia for advice, tell Ilia a joke or a riddle, or to inquire if Ilia needs anything from them. Most of the villagers share the scarlet hair of gerudo people with the pointed ears of hylians, though Link observes that many have dyed their hair darker shades of black, a crimsoning at the roots revealing their heritage. A few sport red eyes.

One villager wearing a green apron knocks on the door to declare that Hilda has returned. She turns around in the doorway to step backwards. "H-hello, Hilda. I didn't see you there."

A young woman, perhaps slightly younger than Link but taller than she, with hair the colour of the starry night, the dye fading at the long fringe that reaches halfway down her back, her eyes crimson, her pointed ears parting her long and straight sidelocks, cut in a manner that makes her more resemble a princess from a storybook.

The woman bids Link and the gathered friends a hello, mentioning briefly the accordion-wielding rito man outside their door, and apologises to Ilia for having spent so long away from the ranch: she and her entourage uncovered a pack of horses mistreated by bokoblins and hastened to rescue them. "Thank you, as always, for coverin' for me, Lady Ilia." Hilda dips her head. "And welcome, traveller, to Telma Ranch."

"She'll not be staying long, Hilda, but I'd like to introduce you to my best friend, Link." Link attempts to beam at Hilda but solely manages an awkward sort of twitch of the lips, her expression blanked out from unease. Hilda extends her hand to shake Link's, or so Link thinks. When Link touches her own hand to Hilda's, Hilda draws Link in for a warm hug that leaves Link slightly dazed.

"A pleasure to meet you. Any friend of Lady Ilia's is a friend of mine'n always welcome to the ranch." Hilda grants Ilia a bow of the head. "I have to see to the rest of the village, but I'll be comin' by to chat tonight."

"You'd better. We're going to eat like kings."

Hilda chuckles into the back of her hand, her head thrown slightly up. "I look forward to that, then." She glances towards Ravio with a certain mischievous smirk. "And I'm surprised that you didn't come greet me as usual, Ravio."

Ravio glares at Link. "I was busy makin' sure this buddy here wasn't gonna tear up the town'n poison the old lady."

"I missed hearin' your song, my friend. Maybe you could play it for me later, then." Hilda winks at him while Ravio hikes his scarf up ever higher. With that, she excuses herself.

Ravio glares at Link through one open eye. "Not one word, buddy ole pal of mine, unless you're itchin' for the one-two."
Luda claps her hands. "No fighting around the bed."

Link asks Ilia what she can make for the feast of kings, and Ilia inquires back if Link wouldn't mind making food for the whole of the village. "You're acting like I'm leaving already," Link protests.

"Aren't you?" Ilia counters, something of a smirk curling up the corners of her toothless mouth. "I can tell you have places to be. When you've done what you have to do, then you can come back here and make me food all you want. Deal?"

She rests her forehead against Ilia's.

"Deal."

The talk turns to food. Link becomes more animated as she discusses what ingredients she has brought with her, how many villagers she can expect to feed, what they have in the village over the winter, and what the villagers prefer as far as their favourite foods go. Amid the discussion, with Luda serving once more as translator although Ilia notes that that Luda has done far more for Ilia today than warranted, Ilia suddenly reaches out for Link's hand.

"Link, you mentioned that you've been getting your memories back mostly from smelling things you've eaten before, haven't you?" Link bobs her head, then, realising that Ilia cannot see her, signs an affirmation into her palms. "Have you tried eating apple pie?"

Link touches her chin. "Not that I can remember."

"It was apple pie with nutmeg and cinnamon. No nuts. About this big, crimped prettier than I'd ever seen you do in Ordon." Link snorts back a laugh. When Ilia asks her to elaborate, Link talks of the Princess, and Ilia signs, very simply: "I knew there was no way you could've done that."

Link runs her fingers through her ponytail.

"Link...we don't have apples here in Telma Ranch, but. When you get the chance. Go to the Ash Swamp and eat some apple pie there. I hope that that'll trigger something. Maybe it won't. But maybe...maybe you'll remember more about the Calamity."

She nods. "Thank you."

They compile a menu, of mushroom stuffed goat for the main course, of chillfin trout and catfish fished from the wintered waters, of pickled fruits and vegetables from the harvest in the form of squash and pumpkin and huckleberries that Link hasn't had in months. Link bakes bread on Tabanch wheat and prepares dips of butter, of spinach, of Ordon cheese. She roasts and salts nuts; she makes creamy meat soup as Romani taught her, and ceviche, and pumpkin pie, and—for dessert—honey-glazed pancakes. She takes with her a pot of honey to nestle into her satchel. For when she next sees Cremia.

Over the feast, which has everyone crowding around Ilia's bed in a scene so reminiscent of when Link went to see Maryll that her heart pangs for the people she has lost and found again, Ilia introduces Link to the villagers as her friend. Thankfully she makes no mention of the former chosen hero, nor do Ravio or Luda, who merely send glances her way.

A strange status to have. Former chosen hero. She only ever hears about the ballads and the odes, and the legends and the songs, of the chosen heroes and their exploits, and never of what comes next, and never of those who may have failed.
The villagers welcome her. A friend to Ilia, a friend to all. Link learns each in turn by their favoured meals: the apothecary fond of butter-squash and her granddaughter—Irene, notes Ravio—who refuses to eat anything not garnished in green; Freedle the minstrel who challenges Kass to a competition while Link unsuccessfully attempts to divine his eating preferences until Ravio informs her Freedle eats beetles, for which—before Ravio's widened eyes—Link whips up a 'pecan' pie without any pecans at all; the carnivorous blacksmith, his carp-loving wife, and their son Gulley who asks Link for nothing but pumpkin pie; the shoemaker Rem, consumer of all mushrooms except for rushrooms, who falls asleep at the table; the botanist Blossom, a connoisseur of milk, and her arborist husband Bipin, for whom Link roasts sunflower seeds, their infant son too young to even know a world outside of his mother's milk; the scribe-in-training Osfala who haughtily announces he has eaten the last of the summer's apple preserves—to the foot-stamping anger of Ghanti the arrow-fletcher—before secretly passing a jar on to Link and requesting that she prepare something for Ghanti alone, lover of apples that she is; Eddo the beekeeper who begs for anything but honey; the gravekeeper Dampé and his cow-tending wife, both of whom gravitate towards steamed river snails; the carrot-munching scribe and his pilaf-prefering daughter Seres; the gardeners Maple and Holly—married three springs ago, says Ravio—who tell Link to prepare bird and rabbit, respectively, only to give their plates to one another at the banquet, realise that both had the same thought of requesting the other's favourite, and kiss so passionately over the table that Eddo complains they should get a room; Anju, tender of cucco, who kindly inquires if Link could avoid preparing any sort of fox, which prompts Link to assure her she hasn't even caught any, and for whom Link whisks up egg tart; the strict horse-training sisters Dina and Tina who flashily adjust their glasses between demands of a hearty milk stew and nothing else will do; Rosso, the stonemason, who slaps an entire boar on the table to Kass's staring and Link's delight; Pita and Wheaton the bread-bakers who thank Link for a chance to have someone else bake the bread; and so many more besides that Link's head spins to remember them all. If not for Ravio guiding her hand in his own stubborn way, the frantic process of finding food for all would have taken days upon days. Yet the boy, his arms folded over his chest, knows the villagers in and out. For Hilda: nutcake will do. For Luda: cucco liver mixed with rice. For himself: nothing.

"Nothing?"

"Nothin'," he insists, his scowl so deeply etched onto his features that Hilda warns him he'll get stuck that way, "but I s'pose if you fried up some rabbit with garlic'n a pinch of salt, I wouldn't say naw."

For the horses, Link stuffs pumpkin as she has for Ilia—the horse—so many times and cooks molasses biscuits for dessert. The biscuits prove popular with the villagers, too. Link starts to apologise to Ilia, for the hardness of the biscuits, but Ravio shoves a glass of milk her way.

"Dip 'em in. Soften 'em up. Don't you go lookin' at me like that. It's for the old lady's sake."

"Thank you, Ravio," Ilia signs, accepting the milk-damp biscuit. "And thank you, Link, for the meal."

Link ducks her head. "It's not half as good as it would've been if you'd made it with me," she confesses.

Ilia snorts. "Good thing I didn't help, then, because I'm pretty sure this food's so good it could convince the Calamitous One to leave forever in exchange for a single bite."

Afterwards, Link helps clean up, as does Ravio, who appears to compete with her on just who can be the more helpful. Link allows him his victory. He sticks his tongue out at her.
And then his hand, holding the ocarina.

Grinding out a khuh in his throat, Ravio looks away. "Don't you go sayin' anythin'. The old lady's puttin' me us to this. You're just borrowin' it, got it? Try anythin', and I'll hunt ya down myself." He gyrates his hand. Link takes the ocarina into hers.

Though time has worn away the painting and the carving of the seagull, Link can still trace her fingertip over her sister's name in the wood, over the slightly uneven holes that Marin spent so long carving out for her.

"Thank you, Ravio. When I come back next, I'll make something of your favourites."

Ravio scowls at her. "Don't you go sayin' things like that." He puts a hand over his belly. "S'a cheap shot to go after someone's stomach."

Link laughs a light little laugh. "Thank you for the ocarina."

He pulls the hood down over his head and walks off, scuffling the floorboards with his boots, Zeffa nuzzling his face with her beak.

Link buffs out a spot on the table until her wrist begins to pain, and then a few minutes longer. She hears Ilia rustle on the bed.

Ilia.

Ilia Ilia Ilia.

"Link..." she says, when Link sits down by her bed at last, with a certain air of finality that chokes the dust in Link's throat. "I don't know when you'll return." Ilia laughs, very faintly; Link's heart wrenches. "but whenever you do, bring some apples. I want to taste that pie again. And...just in case I don't get to do so. I love you, Link. You're my best friend. Don't forget that. Good-bye, Link."

"...see you later, Ilia." The words on her fingers. She does not need to say them for Ilia to read them. "I love you too."

By the golden light of sunset, she and Kass once more head out with Ilia, formerly Gull, at their side. First: the remainder of the shrines. Then: perhaps a visit to Kakariko.

Last: the Ash Swamp. To eat apple pie. Where she may have died.

But now she lives.

Now she lives, and she travels with her companions, and she waves back at Telma Ranch even if Ilia cannot leave her bed to see her off.

She clasps her hands together, fingers intertwined, to plead of the Golden Goddesses. Let Ilia still live when she returns. Let Ilia still live to share another meal, to slurp another stew, to say another *I love you."

If not, then...

"Thank you for letting me see her one last time," she signs, and she prays, hope beyond hope, that the Golden Goddesses can read the honesty on her fingertips.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Ilia losing her memories and being taken care of by an elderly woman with twenty cats is in reference to Impaz from Twilight Princess. The cutscene where the 'spaghetti Western'-style music plays while Link is about to go talk to every cat in Old Kakariko is one of the funniest moments in any Zelda game. I think the funniest (thinking about the 3D titles only) to me is the 'Link looks at the bathroom' gag from Skyward Sword, but that's because I was literally yelling "We can finally take care of the bathroom ghost!" not two seconds before Link did so in-game.

The whole bit about Link having nearly died due to guardians on Ash Swamp and about Fort Hateno are pulled directly from Breath of the Wild, as well as Calamity Ganon showing up right after Zelda came down from Mount Lanayru (Mount Nayru in Delicious in Wilds).

Ilia being worried about Link deafening herself with her own screams is a nod to Ghirahim's similar but much more malicious line in Skyward Sword.

Regarding the capitalisation of names such as 'the Princess', 'the Castle', or 'the King', I used capitalisation to indicate how the character thinks. Link refers to Zelda (at the moment) as the Princess with a capital P, while Ilia refers to her as 'the princess' and nothing more.

People moving from western Faron to eastern Central Hyrule to establish a village there is something that I brought up all the way back in the twenty-ninth chapter!

Adopted families? Important to me. You bet that Telma was important as fuck to Ilia, and you bet that Ilia is going to honour Telma's memory.

Link's a traveller by blood, but that doesn't mean that she wants to travel aimlessly. She's got adventure in the heart, but she also has a space around the hearth. As Ilia says, she doesn't have to give up one or the other; she just needs to find someone who understands.

The villagers from Telma Ranch are a mish-mash from various games. There's, of course, Ravio and Hilda from A Link Between Worlds. Beyond that: Syrup and Irene are from A Link Between Worlds, and the latter's love of green is in reference to her having been prophesied to assist one in green; Freedle is a minstrel from Phantom Hourglass; Gulley and the blacksmith family are likewise from A Link Between Worlds; Rem is the sleepy shoemaker from The Minish Cap awoken in-game with the assistance of a mushroom; Blossom, Bipin, and his son are from Oracle of Ages and Oracle of Seasons, where they indeed are tree experts; Osfala is one of the Seven Sages from A Link Between Worlds; Ghanti is a character from one of the A Link to the Past manga, where she ends up working in an apple orchard at the end of the story; Eddo is from Phantom Hourglass, who creates an anti-bee bug spray in the manga; Dampé is the gravekeeper from Ocarina of Time who, if I remember correctly, is mentioned having a wife in Majora's Mask, although he also appears in subsequent titles including Four Swords Adventures; Seres and her father take care of the Sanctuary from A Link Between Worlds; Maple and Holly are named for Maple, the witch, and Holly, the girl who mistakes Link for a chimney sweep, from Oracle of Ages and Oracle of Seasons; Anju is the cucco lady from Ocarina of Time who reappears in other games, including The Minish Cap, and whose comment about foxes is in reference to her love interest Kafei from Majora’s Mask; Tina and Dina are from The Minish Cap; Rosso is also from A Link Between Worlds, and his asking Link to prepare pig is in reference to a certain non-Zelda film released the year after the initial release of A Link to the Past; and Pita and Wheaton are bread-bakers from The Minish Cap. Wew!

Up next: the road-trip, continued; me cheating slightly on the chapter title between the gourmet and non-gourmet version of a dish are absolutely treated as separate recipes in the game; a return to a place Link has not been in over a year; Link's anger; the beginning of the truth.

Beta reader's comments: Ilia! Ilia! She's alive! Getting to see her and talk to her and know her name again is so cathartic and incredible.

Having some context for what happened during the Calamity is super cool, as well.

Chapter Summary

Having learned of the chef's mortal injury and reunited with the girl who smells of horses, the travelling chef and the travelling minstrel continue their quest for shrines, before the chef decides to visit the not-so-wise matriarch of Kakariko again.

Chapter Notes

As per usual, author's notes that didn't fit in the ending: I started writing this chapter at 02:48 on the eighth of August, and finished writing it on at 04:04 on the ninth of August.

Thanks a million for everything that you all have done for me in your continual support of Delicious in Wilds and in your continual understanding of my hiatuses. You, the reader, are what has transformed Delicious in Wilds from merely text in my computer to a story unto itself. Meals are meant to be shared; stories, to be read.

Last time that Link was at Romani Ranch back in the sixty-fourth chapter, Malon gave her a Faronese-Central Hyrulean dictionary!

Holothurians, by the way, are just sea cucumbers. Although they're marine organisms in real life, freshwater sea cucumbers are a delicacy in Holodrum.

Orude Inn is in reference to the Twilight Princess inn of Kakariko Village, called "Elde Inn" in the English translation, although you can still see the name Orude Inn written in hylian characters in the game textures. This is somewhat like how the English translation of the sign in front of Link's house in Breath of the Wild says "Link's house", but the actual sign says "Master Link", and writes Bolson's Japanese name (in the hylian alphabet) in the corner rather than "Bolson".

-boldon and -guron are common name endings, more common among Akkalan gorons than Eldic gorons. As children, those with -boldon name endings are often referred to as -by, such as Ogbolden to Ogby. In Breath of the Wild, one of the goron children in Goron City is named Dugby; his full name is thus Dugboldon. When gorons become adults, they either go by their full names, or simply use the shorter 'Boldon'. Those whose named end in -guron are likewise nicknamed -gy, so Vulguron was nicknamed Vulgy as a kid. Different goron societies have different ideas of coming of age, even within Eldin and Akkala. However, if generalisations have to be made, then in Akkala before the Great Calamity, goron children typically had to undergo some sort of feat of power or strength—but one that assists the community, rather than one that is destructive—to claim the right to use their full, adult name. In Eldin, the coming of age is more usually about the creation of a masterwork or some other constructive project and is typically sold for a high price.

Lake Moruge is named for Moruge Swamp from The Adventure of Link and replaces Lake Akkala. Also damn were the writers of Breath of the Wild lazy with some of their names! Stop with the Lake Akkala, the Mount Lanayru, the Hebra Summit! Stooooop!
Life goes on.

It startles Link how easily life goes on. Back she goes to travelling, to life on the road, to looking forward to each shrine, to considering the meal that she shall make next. Yet here, moving north towards Eldin and Akkala, she senses them converging very rapidly upon the end of their road.

Kass teaches Link songs upon the ocarina. Epona's song; Iliia's whistle, more appropriately named than Link ever knew; melodies like the Ballad of the Wind Fish or the main chorus of the Ballad of the Sealing War. He endeavours to impart how to read sheet music, but the lessons fly over Link's head in squiggles of lines and notes. Studying the Faronese-Central Hyrulean dictionary proves its own difficulty. Kass knows enough Faronese to converse with her in it, and so she uses him to practise the language, both spoken and signed.

Little by little, Link forces herself to learn how to read Faronese. First the characters, and then the words, sounding them slowly out to herself. The letters swim through her mind to rearrange themselves on the page before her. She doesn't have Iliia to read to her anymore. Yet Link does have Iliia, the horse, to nuzzle the back of her head while she struggles through teaching herself Faronese.

Where they walk, now, Kass and Link hear news of the sword that seals the darkness, of the Champions seeking to find a bearer of the blade of evil's bane. They meet travellers who have tried their luck, hylian and non-hylian alike, some shrugging as if to say that they expected nothing different, some vehemently and bitterly complaining about the journey through the lost woods and the subsequent pain until attempting to draw the sword, some cursing out the Goddesses, some asking Link for seconds of that soup and also could they have another roll of bread, pretty please.

Link and Kass loop close to the lost woods, picking off the shrines along the banks of the lake. At the bridge of land that connects the lost woods to western Eldin, they find a small village having grown up by the entrance to the woods. Link briefly sees Yunobo, Riju, and Sarie again, who comment that they have not yet found a bearer of the sword that seals the darkness.

Yunobo taps his index fingers against one another. "M-maybe the Calamitous One isn't coming after all."

Riju, speaking Eldic, continually neglects to remember to say goro in indication of the fullstops in her speech. When Yunobo corrects her, she thanks him, says goro for the next few sentences, and then again leaves out the peculiar quirk of the Eldic language. Link takes the opportunity to introduce Riju and Yunobo to Kass; she requests that they do not speak of Amali, lest Kass's discovery knock him from his talons. Nor of her own status, as the girl who could not draw the blade of evil's bane.

When Kass inquires if Link wishes to attempt to draw the sword that seals the darkness, she hides her answer in stuffed cheeks of meat and mushroom skewer. Riju rubs her shoulder.

Kass mentions a shrine possibly located in the lost woods. He posits the question to Sarie, who admits that they do not remember. With a heaviness to her heart, Link kneels by Sarie's side, forming the question on her fingertips: if she can play the ocarina for her forgetful friend.

And then she suggests to Kass that they find the shrine within the lost woods last, if such a shrine exists at all. Quietly and without protest he agrees.

North of the lost woods, Link and Kass travel to the largest settlement in the province of Holodrum: a village settled chiefly by rito, sheikah, and gorons, labelled Horon by the maps yet—confusingly—going by the alternate Rosia in song. "The ancient verses must have been written long, long ago." Kass considers aloud while Link peruses the local delicacies of massive fungi and pale freshwater holothurians from which the province took its name.

"Perhaps Rosia has long sunk into the dust of history, as such things do, and Horon has taken her place." Yet no orange glow awaits them anywhere in Horon. The villagers indicate the same: no shrine. No such shrine has existed as long as those in Horon can remember, and yet neither do the monsters that Kass and Link encountered in the vicinity dare come near the village itself. She touches her chin; he hrms.

The caretakers of the massive tree that grows from the heart of Horon—which the villagers call Maku and take as their guardian deity, reminding Link of the light spirit Ordona protecting Her province—warn Link and Kass not to enter the ancient labyrinth of abandoned mines beneath the village proper, for fear of the tunnels' collapse.

Link proposes a trade: entrance to the ruins of the Thyphlo Mines, in exchange for an eight-course cooked by herself, personally. The meal sways them.

The descent into the bowels of the earth swallows Kass and Link into the darkness. The air sits so thick and musty that torches barely glow a few minutes prior to giving out. She feels as if she cannot pull in her breaths. When the muskiness fills her lungs at last, the dampness carries with it a sensation of crawling mould.

Kass attempts to enter the tunnels with her, yet his heart thumps so noisily in his chest that Link hears it, his breaths so shallow and grip so tight that she recognises the same signs as when she stands among a crowd.

"Wait outside. I'll explore it myself."

"Traveller—"

Link clenches his shoulder in her hands firmly enough for him to bow his head.

"...thank you, traveller."

She descends into a subterranean forest of overgrown fungus somehow sprouting within a tunnel network shrouded in the depths. The creatures slither slimy and pale: starry-nosed moles that root through the earth; eyeless fish mouth-gaping through pools of cool water; worms whose needle-like teeth seek to bore through the soles of her boots; fat-bodied holothurians oozing in puddles; bluish seeds or spores shaped like teardrops which Link discovers do not taste very palatable to the hylian tongue. Neither stasis nor magnesis helps much: the former struggles with discerning from the earth, and the latter washes everything in reddish-pink so bright her eyes burn.

Yet Link has her own secret weapon: the fishing pole Sidon gave her, aglow with luminous stone. She waves it about like a divining rod. A series of strange hawk-like statues point her the way. The hawk. A mark of the Goddess Din, Link remembers. Even still, she sees no further than about an arm's-length from her own face. She winds her way through the darkness. One statue to another. Following where the hawks gaze. Pausing to boil and snack on holothurians. Discovering that she knows not how to prepare holothurians, for they taste tasteless at best and far-too-fishy at worst. Winding further through the darkness.
Past a statue larger than the others, a snare of roots trips her; she eats a faceful of dirt.

Roots.

Her head snaps up. The light of the fishing pole reveals roots thicker than her waist, vanishing down into the ground and top into the ceiling of the tunnels. The tree. The tree at the heart of Horon.

Link feels her way around the roots. Insects crawl over her hands; splinters wedge into her palms. An opening at the base hints faintly at something amber within. Amber. Gold. Orange.

The slate sings to sapphire the shrine guarded by the tree's roots. Link crawls out from the opening on her hands and knees. The soil clings moistly to her clothing.

The moment she exits the tunnels, she drops into the grass and rolls around, breathing in the freshness of the air and the liveliness of the green.

The Horonese inquire all about her adventure. Link explains over silent shroom-holothurian stew. The longer she signs, the more Kass's feathers fluff up, until his surprise has left him like a loaf of wheat overpuffed with too much yeast. "When I called Rosia sunk into the dust, I did not think it literal." Link giggles.

She and Kass wave good-bye to the villagers of Horon. The caretakers bestow upon Link luminous stones as thanks; she tries to give them back, but Kass politely notes that returning a gift would incur nothing short of an insult to the people of Holodrum. And so he and Link depart in the direction of the sunrise.

The gradual approach of spring lifts the veil of snow from the ground, particularly in the western Akkala warmed by heat from the mountainside. Towards the heart of Akkala, she encounters a conflict she cannot solve with food alone: an elderly Oracle of Din has long cared for the shrine that once protected the mining village of Kagoro before the Great Calamity led to the desertion of Golo Province. None but the previous Oracles and their rock-hewn sons in turn has lived by the shrine for almost a century. A little than two years ago, when the shrine in Hateno glimmered a sapphire blue—Kass arches an eyebrow at Link, who rubs the back of her head—the Necludans took that as a sign that the Seven wished them to expand once more. Nearly overnight a wave of hylian and sheikah settlers, intent on establishing a town under the protection of the shrine, arrived with iron sledgehammers, with woodcutters' axes, and with the banner of the Seven, a Sage of Hylia already arrived and a Sage of Sheik sent for from the monasteries of Necluda. The Sage and the settlers wish to build a Temple of the Seven around the shrine as they have done in so many towns of Necluda.

The Oracle of Din will have none of it.

"Tarrey Town," they say.

"A blasphemy against the Mountain Goddess," rumbles the Oracle of Din.

"A waste of a shrine if none may live around it!" butts in the would-be mayor.

"Not for you to decide," snaps the Oracle, "you who cannot consume the earth the Goddess has given us."

"As the Goddess Goro-goro has gifted you the consumption of stone," mediates the Sage of Hylia,
"so has O our Goddess Hylia and the Goddess Sheik gifted us the consumption of fibre and flesh."

"We have no need of Goro-goro," the Oracle rebuffs, "and you have no need to mine for that which you do not need to live."

Kass endeavours to negotiate access to the shrine. The revelation of the slate in Link's possession thrusts the decision onto her shoulders: the family of the Oracle pleading that she save the memory of Kagoro they have worked so hard to preserve, the settlers begging that she grant them to live within the village they have worked so hard to found.

Link whips her head so swiftly between them, her heartbeat thumping in her temples, her innards reaching up to grab her by the throat, that she comes to at nightfall. A slumbering Kass perches on an overturned log by her bedside, having evidently fallen asleep playing the accordion, the instrument in danger of falling from his lap. After several moments of panic, Link learns from the receptionist that she has graciously been allowed to stay at the Orude Inn free-of-charge. "I hope," the receptionist notes, "that, on the morrow, you will settle this matter in the most manner most conducive to the preciousness of life, O bearer of the slate."

Head pounding and stomach thoroughly vacant, she returns to her room. As Link scrounges through the box of ingredients in her satchel, seeking something to fill up her rumbling belly, she hears the quietest Akkalan hello behind her: a goron boy, no older than twelve. The Oracle's son.

Link invites him to cook with her; he bites his lower lip—or whatever the gorons have instead—and agrees. Ogby, he calls himself, short for Ogboldon. His father: Vulguron. He demonstrates the preparation of tar-and-clay spread on luminous stone she has kept from their adventures in Subrosia. She offers her jar of mixed Eldic spices, observing that, despite the differences in diet between gorons and humans, they can share an adoration of many of the same flavours.

Ogby asks what she plans to do about the shrine, about Kagoro, about the people. Link throws herself into steam-softening the salted rabbit jerky she prepared for herself and Kass some days before. The decision. The decision that she does not know how to make.

"What would you do," Ogby signs, his movements slower than a child's should be, "if your home village were in ruins, and those from a far-away land had come to build their homes on top?"

What would Link have done if she had met the ruins of Ordon with a town sprung about, a town of people she had never known, a town of those who worshipped deities she knew even less, a town whose inhabitants had never known the spirit Ordana, a town whose inhabitants had never thanked the Golden Goddesses?

Even if they could make catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd from the catfish and cheese and pumpkin from the river and the goats and the wood she knew, would that catfish, and would that cheese, and would that pumpkin still taste of Ordon?

Link asks him: "What would you do, if you were me?"

Ogby scratches his head. "What do I know? I'm just a kid. And I guess I thought you'd be some wise hero, but you're just a bigger kid."

She licks her mouth free of rabbit.

When morning comes, Kass quietly suggests that they sneak out in the wee hours, take to the shrine, and spirit themselves away before the settlers and Oracle awaken. But Link puts on her boots for a different purpose: she has a decision to make.
Link gathers them at the front of the shrine: the Oracle, his son, the would-be mayor, the Sage of Hylia, the settlers.

"It's not for me to decide," she starts immediately, shutting her eyes and blocking out everyone around her, focusing entirely on the motions of her hands, even as the crowd jeers and the Oracle half-groans, "because I'm no chosen hero. But you've asked me, so I'll do something."

Kass's accordion wheezes out a note.

"Oracle," Link says, "the number of monsters are growing higher every day. Let them live near the shrine for the protection of their lives. Watch over them, so that they don't misuse the land that the people of Kagoro loved, but don't turn the land that the people of Kagoro loved into a graveyard alone."

The settlers murmur in approval; the Oracle's features grow weary.

"Necludans," she says, "this isn't the place for the Seven. This is the land of the Goddess Din. Respect that. Don't build a temple over the shrine; let the Oracle of Din care for the shrine. And I think survivors from over Akkala will come when you build the town, people and families who are looking to get away from the monsters, you know? Welcome them. You can live there, but don't mine the ore sacred to the followers of Din."

The Oracle bows his head; the mayor's fingers curls into a fist.

"If the monster problem disappears," Link finishes, "you all can go elsewhere when you don't need the shrine anymore. Oracle, I'm sure the people of the Goddess are still out there, and you'll find them again. I know Akkala was hit hard. I was from here, too. But somehow, somehow, we'll endure. I know it." She attempts a smile, but her expression comes out vacant as her cooking pot. "And I'm sure that the Golden Goddess would've want you to show them hospitality."

The settlers nearly advance forward; the Oracle of Din and Kass move forward in front of Link at the same time, and the Sage of Hylia claps her hands, stopping the hylians and sheikah in their tracks.

Link saddles Ilia amid profanities hurled her by the masses. Kass loudly plays the accordion, but she can hear their accusations well enough.

She takes the Oracle of Din and the Sage of Hylia with her into the shrine. The shrine forces her to do battle against a guardian whose legs she cleaves with the sword Riju gave her and whose eye she gouges out with an arrow.

The instructions speak of combat. The Sage and the Oracle study them. Link says nothing; she tucks the slate away into its pouch at her right hip. Only a shrine, and nothing more.

When the crisp air of the Akkalan winter-spring once more fills her lungs, the Oracle and the Sage thank her for having shown them the shrine. The Oracle retires to his study in the dusted-over mines; the Sage, to her miniature temple in the midst of the town.

She declines. "I wouldn't know what to do with it," Link responds, her hands twitching in their haste to return to the saddling, "and even if I did, I don't deserve it."

She overturns her satchel of gems gathered from tali and pebblits. Ogby will have more use for them than she.

"For what it's worth," notes Kass, in a more somber timbre than usual upon their departure, the shrine sloping away to the south and their destination to the north, "I thought that was very good, and you did the best that you could."

Link shakes her head.

"This world," he goes on, "is much vaster and more complicated than one might hope it to be. Though I wish every conflict were as black and white as that of the Calamitous One, whereupon all of O Our Hyrule may unite as one against a common enemy, there exist not easy answers for all of the calls of life."

Link's fingers curl inwards. Ilia noses her ear as if sensing her distress. "I feel like there's something else I could do. Or something else I should say. Or...or something, instead of just moving on."

He inclines his head. "I understand. Yet this is not your battle to fight. Neither you nor I know enough to come to any more of a decision than you already have."

"But..."

"We can serve them best by preventing another Great Calamity, and for that, we may yet activate the shrines." Kass clears his throat. "I wonder what's for supper."

The words vanish from her fingers. She makes them a meal of chillfin trout caught from the cool waters of Lake Moruge and retires early for the night. In the morning Link faces forward to the distant horizon. Shrines and shrines yet to go.

Further north, they chance upon another laboratory, or something like it. Link and Kass take one look at the legless guardians stationed as sentries around the laboratory and, whistling, turn to walk the other way. No shrine, no problem.

Off the coast, they encounter a labyrinth even larger than those that they observed in the Hebric cold or the Parapan heat. Link asks Kass to merely fly them over the walls, as this labyrinth has no roof. Kass takes up his accordion and proposes they walk, to fulfill the traditional purpose of the labyrinth, meant as an exercise for the chosen hero.

Link keeps her right hand against the right wall at all times. With her winning strategy of walking through the entire labyrinth, she expects to—no matter how long it takes—find the shrine. When she finds herself back at the entrance, she turns imploringly towards Kass.

He sighs. "Poets should not write whilst inebriated, and heroes should not face trials whilst...lazy," he remarks, a hint of amusement twinkling his eye. She rubs her nose. "That put to word, I suppose that neither you nor I is the chosen hero. Flying it is."

Link claps her hands together. "It was either that or my foolproof fall-back plan: bombs!"

Kass attempts to fly. They crash into a wall—his flight feathers not yet grown in—and it dawns upon Link that certain parts of the walls seem rather metallic. A brief application of magnesis opens the path. They activate the shrine with ease, descending in the lift and ascending once more. A dip in the earth intrigues Link's sensibilities. She explores the underground cavern, her paraglider in hand.

A sea of guardians and their beams of light greet her. She leaves the underground cavern, her paraglider in hand, the seat of her trousers rather singed.
With the arrival of spring comes, simultaneously, the arrival of Kass's moult. One moment his body is feathered in shades of blue and white and gold, and the next Link awakens next to a plucked cucco shivering in the chill. She throws extra blankets over them both and cuddles up. With his permission, she collects the feathers in her satchel, for lining her tunic again, or making blankets, or for whatever else they might need. Kass sings especially loudly and melodiously while his feathers grow back in as if endeavoring to draw attention from the nakedness of his skin.

"Embarrassed? No, no, traveller. I appreciate the concern. Moulting is a perfectly natural process. Without it, we would not have the feathers upon which parts of our crafts so depend." Kass keeps the accordion case in his lap to hunch behind it. "I feel no shame whatsoever. Such is how the Goddess Erito made us, after all." His cheeks have darkened. When Link inquires how long the growth takes, he squawks prior to clearing his throat and composing himself. "Merely a few weeks, traveller. Say, traveller, care you for a meal? I think I would care for a meal about now."

She busies her hands making mushroom-stuffed steamed porgy.

Along the northwestern edge of Akkala, Link scopes a shrine in one of the towering pillars that make up the eyes of the aptly named Skull Lake, its skull-like shape presumably more visible overhead. Kass, unable to fly, proposes that they return later. Link shrugs and steps foot off of the cliffs, the paraglider spread above her.

She lands halfway down the pillar. Link climbs while the strains of Kass's accordion encourage her on. Once she has nearly scaled the peak, she turns her gaze down towards the seemingly bottomless lake that plunges away beneath her boots. And then it begins to rain.

Link spends several hours clinging to the slippery rock, her muscles increasingly ached and straining, the rain chilling down the back of her spine and soaking her through to the bone. She rests her cheek against the rock, shuddering on the pillar, until the curtain of rain parts overhead. The wind around her tugs upwards on her tunic, the breeze urging her skyward.

She listens to the accordion stop. Link gazes up above her: a serpent of gold and scarlet winds in the clouds overhead, flames flickering around its body. She fights between the compulsion to stare and the compulsion to look away.

Then Link leaps from the pillar and opens the paraglider. The updraft sings her upwards towards the serpent soaring through the skies. She hears Kass's shouting behind her, the wind at her back. Riding the current up, Link keeps her focus trained upon the serpent as it loops through the clouds. Closer, and closer, until the inferno that burns around the serpent swelters Link's body, like she had just eaten spicy pepper curry while also spontaneously becoming a korok.

When her clothing does, indeed, catch on fire, she realises that she cannot move any closer. Looping her right arm through the wooden supports of the paraglider, Link snaps a pictograph with her left. And then she tries to sign at the serpent. The serpent either does not see her or ignores her. She reaches into her satchel, pulling out a fish skewer prepared earlier for breakfast and now serving as an offering, as a supplication. When Link rears her arm back to chuck the skewer as hard as she can against the serpent's face in the hopes that it snatches the food from the air, she realises all too late that the flames will burn the fish up, leaving nothing but the bone skewer itself to pierce the serpent's hide.

Link swallows as she watches the sharp skewer connect with the scales of the serpent's maw. Feeding a serpent while airborne on its updraft—she discovers upon that fateful day—does not present the simplest task in the entire world. She closes her paraglider, intent on veering earthbound before the serpent can enact its revenge.
The serpent, instead of noticing her, continues to glide away. Yet she notices it curl inwards on itself and touch its face with its taloned paw. A shimmering golden light drops away from the unwinding serpent that resumes its almost melodic undulations through the air. A scale. A scarlet scale, glinting golden in the light.

Link widens her eyes. She tracks it as she would track a droplet of honey cascading through the heavens, as she would track a buttered slice of bread to snatch it from mid-air.

Tunic aflame, Link dives through the air after the scale, the paraglider closed tight against her body. Her fingers do not close around it—her hand missing—but her teeth do. She snags the scale in her mouth, her jaws vibrating in pain, as she forces open the paraglider again a few metres above the water.

She crashes through the thin layer of ice over the waves. The water of Skull Lake freezes Link into a hylian-shaped ice sculpture clenching a very shiny centrepiece between her teeth. At least the frigid cold puts out the flames. Link treads water. She spits the scale into her palm.

When Link holds it in her hand she can feel a mild tingle of heat, a soft warming of an ember. Even in the frost of the water.

She attempts to clamber onto the surface of the ice yet finds that the impossibly thin layer does not support her weight. After several repeated clamberings on ice and crashes back into the water, Link makes it to the banks of the lake.

Climbing back up takes the better whole of the night. By the time Kass grips her hand to drag her up over the cliff’s edge, pleading with her to tell him if she’s all right, Link signs something about hunger and curls up into a ball of exhaustion. She awakens to the scent of burning fish.

"I...hope that it’s not too terrible," Kass tries.

In her present state, Link could eat raw ore and find it agreeable, if difficult to chew. She wolfs down the fish, ashes and all, and pats her stomach when she finishes. "I owe you my life."

"You're safe now, traveller." He wipes his brow, feathered in stubby down. "Please...please refrain from doing that again."

"I'll try," Link says, and she means it, just as she also completely means once more paragliding onto the pillar and squirreling up the stone to the shrine. Eyes on the prize, and prize on the eye. Of Skull Lake. She'll have to tell Romani that one when she returns.

Link returns down from the shrine on the pillar of Skull Lake. Kass awaits her with his fingers steepled under his beak. "So much for refraining from doing that again."

She cocks her head. ".I thought you meant refraining from eating burnt fish."

Kass and Link move south. They pass by ruins of villages in the wilderness where no shrine has protected them, hearths ashen and cold, once proud walls collapsed and streaked with ivy, wells filled with dirt and mud, fences long since fallen save for metal posts that have bent and broken with age, the decaying remains of arrows and swords rusted through detailing where once the people of the land had fought for their lives and lost, moblins and lizalfos nesting where once lived those with whom Link could have shared a meal over the rim of her cooking pot.

They continue south. Link and Kass reach the Spring of Power, where she tucks from her pocket the scale given to her by the serpent, via the skewer. It plinks into the water and reveals the shrine.
She pats the cooking pot on her back in thanks for having saved her yet again.

In Medigo, Kass and Link purchase fireproof elixirs from Gaile, who has since become promoted from mere stablehand to the vice stablehand in charge of all other stablehands. Link leaves Ilia in the stable, begging her for forgiveness at having to part yet again, and off they go to Eldin. By the time they return from the swelter of Death Mountain—Link having made sapphire tart for Jibo and Kragg in Zubora, whereupon they invited the zora geologists Tumot and Frillo to join them for poultry curry which Kass politely refused; having thanked Donte and Fernok from Gabora for their assistance in her quest to Darunia; having prepared deliciously grilled rock roast for the surveyor with the scarlet tattoo of a mountain range over his abdomen that pushed her towards the northern mine, upon which he—introducing himself as Voji—says that he does not know whether he should laugh or cry that his efforts to trick a bothersome hylian tourist ended up saving Darunia; and having seen again the goron children, now adolescents in their own right, who ask her excitedly whether she has been arrested again since they last saw her—the winter has almost exhausted its long snowy fingers, and the fullness of spring blooms over the earth. The flowers unfurl to dissipate the sweetness of their scent. The grasses dance like waves upon the sea in the fragrant spring winds that roll over the lands from the south.

Kass's flight feathers grow in again. Link rides Ilia onto the fields while he soars through the air overhead. She listens to his joyous laughter ringing out among the clouds for flying once more. For a moment, with him soaring directly above her, their shadows merge into one, as if she and Ilia had together grown wings.

Link and Ksrest that night in sight of the Pillars of Levia. Marking down his notes, Kass considers which songs they have fulfilled and which they have yet to unravel. When Link glances over his shoulder, she finds herself peering at pages upon pages of songs with circles beside them to indicate that—to the best of his musings—they have found the shrine corresponding to the song. Kass counts out the shrines that they have scrawled onto Link's map, writing out each location upon a scroll. In the meanwhile, she prepares their dinner: a sunny-fish, her efforts at translating Hateno's signature dish into something palatable for the followers of Erito.

"And that, traveller, accounts for one hundred and eighteen shrines, and all of the towers known to me." Link and Kass exhale in unison, the latter rubbing his wings, the former her stomach. "If I had to hazard a guess, the only shrines that we have left to activate are likely to await us in the...lost woods, as you called them, and possibly...one near the ruins of the castletown, or in it. I suspect the Cathedral, but I am not certain. Perhaps we have missed one."

A drop of quiet. Link sets the braised Hyrule bass before Kass, who compliments the succulent flakiness of the fish contrasted against the savory warmth of the sunshroom stuffing.

"My personal recommendation—my, this is exquisite—is that we use this time to..." Kass trails off momentarily. "Traveller, was there not—and did you include walnuts, because this tastes divine?—a village that you wished to see?"

"A village?" Lifting her chin, Link glances at the Pillars of Levia. "...mm."

"If the village is nearby, then—ah, could I get another portion, and thank you kindly, traveller—you should take your visit now, I think. For our next two destinations may prove a melody of malice, a cadenza of Calamity, a symph—may I have a third, traveller?"

Link laughs lightly. When her gaze once more falls upon the Pillars of Levia, the mirth ebbs from her tongue.
Kakariko. When last Link entered Kakariko, the world cusped on the fullness of the autumn, yet for once the harvest did not buoy her spirits. With Amali's signs before her eyes and Saki's voice within her ears, she had come to Kakariko with her decision already half-made.

The last vestiges of the autumn laboured to keep their hold over the earth a little longer. Lady Impa's refusal to answer about Aryll's whereabouts—her refusal to tell Link the truth—gave up up the final breath of warmth, choking the wilds, and her own heart, in frost.

Yet she has changed since then. She has changed, and no longer can Lady Impa's words of a prophecy, or of a hero chosen by Goddesses, or of what she must do with the slate, hurt her.

And she has something else now on her side, that she did not have all those months and months ago.

"I guess I should. I mean, I've got a secret weapon now."

"A...secret weapon?" Kass echoes, brow furrowed.

Link rubs the back of her head. "The quickest way to someone's heart is through their stomach, right? The last time I went to Kakariko, I...I don't want to say I got in a fight with someone, exactly, but I said some things I probably shouldn't have, I think. And I don't know how welcome I'll be in Kakariko after all of that." She props her chin up on her elbow. "It all turned out all right, in a way, with Parapa and Lanayru and now all of this, but...I haven't been there in..." She counts on her fingers. "...nearly a year and a half."

"Then...you've been away for longer than you visited there after having lost your memories, from what I understand." Link nods. Kass shifts his feathers over the manuals of his accordion. "A difficult situation, to be sure. However, if anyone is capable of building a bridge over a divide as vast as the Tanagar Canyon twice over, it's you, traveller." His expression softens. "Well, you and that cooking pot of yours. I wouldn't want to leave out our wonderful friend, now would I?"

"...that's my secret weapon. I remembered what her favourite food is." Link runs her fingers through one of her sidelocks. "As long as I have that, I can't fail, can I? I just have to...make it right."

"Oh?" He leans in, his irises sparked in the most universal emotion: hunger. "And what favourite food might this be?"

She ducks her head. "It's pilaf. cucco pilaf. I'm...I'm sorry. Wait. cucco can't fly, right? Do they still...count...?"

"They have wings," Kass says gently. "They're still birds." He pauses. "And they can certainly glide."

"Oh." She looks down at her boots. "I...I'm sorry."

He reaches for her hand. His fingers brush silken over her knuckles. "There's no need to apologise, traveller. I...must thank you. I have dedicated my life to the learning and passing on of the songs of the great land of Hyrule. I believed, as did my mentor before me, and as did his father before him, that music weaved the tapestry of Hyrule's history. Almost every hero of every era has, after all, relied in some part upon music.

"From our most ancient saga passed down with infinite variations in nearly every region of the land, of the hero whose recorder, or flute, or ocarina revealed stairways and passages long hidden away by a magicked touch...to the Hilted Singer and the hero wielding the eight-stringed harp of the Goddess Hylia...from the hero who moved the very fabric of the Goddess Nayru's flow upon the ocarina in Her colours...to the hero in whose time this land of Hyrule was established from our ancestors' voyage across the oceans of the world, who conducted the winds themselves to sing..."

Kass sets his fingers down upon the manual keys. A gentle push of the wind evokes an arpeggio from the accordion bellows which hums the air prior to falling still and silent once more, as a single ripple in the surface of a lake will calm its surface.

"I believed that, in music, we could find the purest and clearest expressions of our feelings, of our histories, of who we are and will be." He strokes the tip of his beak a moment before continuing. "I do not think music any less important now, no. Yet I see..." His voice softens. "...that I have neglected much else of what else ties together the lands of O Our Hyrule, O Kingdom Blessed by Three."

Kass clears his throat. "I...am not ashamed to admit my errors. I have spent so much of my life living in a world of music that I have forgotten the existence of other worlds beyond. Music alone does not connect all of the people of O Our Hyrule.

"Thank you for reminding me. Thank you, traveller, for you and your cooking pot. For your patience. For your efforts to link everyone that you meet across the mouth of that cooking pot you bear as heavily as any destiny or fate upon the shoulders of any hero. As snails carry their homes upon their backs, so do you. A home that you bring everywhere, a home that you bring everyone."

Link watches him, not knowing what to do with her hands or her body, and settles for reaching for his hands. He takes hers into his and squeezes, once.

"Thank you, traveller. For allowing me to travel alongside you, and for every meal that you have ever cooked me, the delicious as well as the dubious."

She smiles sheepishly. "Even with all the times I nearly got you or me or both of us killed?"

"Even, traveller," Kass affirms, his features drawn into an expression of tender warmth that reminds Link of how Buliara looks at Riju, or Dorian at Cottla and Koko, or Amali at her daughters, "with all of the times that you have, as you so eloquently signed, nearly got me or you or both of us killed. Traveller...is it all right if I hug you?"

Link nods. He folds her into an embrace so warm and so soft that she closes her eyes and presses her face into the gentleness of his gossamer wings.

She could slumber here, safe from the evening chill, lulled by the steadiness of someone there for her. And she does.

When Link comes to, the stars have risen, and she finds herself tucked into a blanket of feathers, blue and white and gold. Something strokes her head. She looks up, realising that her head rests in Kass's lap, his hand absentmindedly petting her hair, himself reading from a scroll with a warmth in his golden eyes. The trail of his feathers tickles her nose. Link sneezes.

"Good evening, traveller," Kass says, a sparkle of amusement in his timbre. "You can go back to sleep. You've had a very long two years, haven't you? You can let yourself rest a while longer."

"But I have..."

"...promises to keep, and paths to walk before you sleep?" he finishes. She nods her head against his abdomen. "My mentor's father scribed that poem, about the lost woods in which he nearly lost himself as a youth. Lovely, dark and deep. From where did you learn that verse?"
"...I don't remember," Link says; at least she speaks truthfully.

"If ever you do..." Kass brushes her bangs from her forehead. "...I would be grateful if you could tell me. Now, good night, traveller. Allow me to sing you a lullaby. The least that I can do for everything that you have done for me, and mine." Her eyelids lower. His voice drifts her to sleep.

Then: to Kakariko. From a travelling merchant en route to the village, Link barter away a nutcake, a white wolfos pelt, a jar of bari jelly, a collection of daira carnissials, a handful of furnix feathers, and several octorok balloons and acquires a the most succulent cucco—and a carton of eggs—the merchant carries. The merchant waves her good-bye.

When the merchant leaves, Kass emerges from hiding behind Ilia, his flight feathers grown in but his stubbier down still revealing unsightly patches of bare skin. Link giggles.

"Perfectly natural, and nothing to be ashamed of," Kass insists, although she cannot tell if he speaks more to her or to himself.

He and Link travel on. Kass admits that he cannot bear to look upon the cucco, happy and alive, knowing that it will soon turn to pilaf. She rolls her shoulders: life comes from food. One day, she, too, will turn to food, for someone or for something else, the fungi or the grasses, the wolves or the earth itself.

Link sharpens the edge of Riju's blade upon a whetstone, then prepares the cucco a final meal of grain and seed before decapitating the fowl in a single stroke to leave it from this world with as little pain as possible in its last moments. She thanks the Goddesses and Their wilds for the meal.

She prepares the pilaf. Slowly, this time, using what she has learned from Dorian, Koko and Cottla's feedbacks of the pilaf that Link has repeatedly made for them. And, this time, she heeds Riju's advice as well. She blends seasoning into the oil before sautéing the rice. She adds more cucco and less carrot. She minces the garlic and onion into even tinier slivers than before.

The pilaf. The pilaf that, after one hundred years, have has endured, will yet endure.

Even when the name Hyrule has long since passed into memory, and then into legend, and then into silence, the food of the wilds will remain. The recipes may change, and the fruits and vegetables may shift with the seasons, but food—until the end of life itself, food endures. If food can endure, if this pilaf can endure, then so can she.

Kass leads Ilia by the reins while Link carries the cucco in her trusty cooking pot that brings with it the scents of the Great Plateau, of Darunia, of Medlin, of Romani Ranch, of Nabooru, of Ruto.

No guards at the first gate of Kakariko. She cranes her head. The gate and its eye bear the marks of blades and arrows over its surface, the decorations burned away. Link whips her head and stares at Kass, her stomach folding in on itself as if the gate had grasped her entrails as did the lynel in Ruto. He touches the side of his beak. Link emulates his gesture and inhales.

She can smell: the apple trees in bloom, the musty scent of cucco, the plum flowers and cherry petals, the growing pumpkin and carrot, the incense burnt at the shrines of the Goddesses and of remembrance to the villagers' loved ones passed away, the fresh ink on paper.

She can smell Kakariko, even if the outer gate has burned away. Even though the stars do not dance in the middle of the morning, Link lifts her hands to the heavens, to cup the sunlight in her palm, as she did long, long ago. And then she lets drop her hand. To the covered cooking pot. To cup the pilaf in her palm, as she has now. With the scent of pilaf on her palm, she and Kass Sure enough, as they round the corner to the inner gate, Link meets again the guards. Not Dorian, but guards she recognises nonetheless: Inya, whose husband cares for a grove of cherry trees. Hirako, whose son once lent Link his prized bug-catching net.

Hirako glares at Link halfway in anger and halfway in shock. Inya, a new scar across her face and a burn mask on her left cheek, asks her in a shivering timbre why Link has returned and why she carries that cooking pot.

Link sets the cooking pot down. "I made Lady Impa pilaf," she says honestly, "and I want to give it to her before it gets cold." She touches her chin. "I can make you some, too, afterwards."

Hirako and Inya exchange glances. Hirako begins to shake her head, yet Inya pleads with her. "Who would we be," Inya begs, "if we turned away what hope we have? Lady Impa—"

"Like Dorian," Hirako counters coolly, "having betrayed us even after all we did for him?"

"...he's not a member of the Yiga anymore," Link says mildly; Kass blinks.

"Traveller, they speak of the companion who attempted to...attack you in Kotake, do they not?" Link looks his way. It occurs to her how little Kass knows except for what he has seen of her here or there. She nods at him. "He was a member of the...?"

"It's a long story. I didn't realise you didn't know." Link rubs the back of her head. She peeks back at Inya and Hirako, who ogle her, somewhere between demanding answers and hanging back in confusion. Snapping her fingers, Link lifts up her satchel, bumping out her hip to demonstrate the slate in its pouch. The slate she left in Kakariko. The slate Dorian stole. The slate she has now, again. Inya's gasp stifles in her throat; Hirako stares at her even more incredulously. "...the pilaf's going to be cold. Please?"

They allow her in after a brief set of further questions regarding both herself and Kass, who admits to merely passing through Necluda as a traveller, his only knowledge of Kakariko coming from songs and from its ancient namesakes of other villages that have aided the chosen heroes since time immemorial.

"Your matriarch," Kass remarks warmly, "has a wonderful sense of history and a deep appreciation of the cloth from which O Our Hyrule is spun, to have named her village so."

Inya and Hirako look at one another again. Link gestures, the cooking pot in her arms. They relent, allowing both her and Kass in, lest he fly off to call reinforcements, as if Link could ever dream of attacking Kakariko.

The char still visible on parts of the ground indicates one or several attacks of monsters, perhaps somewhat recent. Several of the houses on the side of the village farthest from the shrine have fallen to disarray, Kakariko now more concentrated just around the cliffside on which the shrine sits. The villagers have constructed several new homes, she notes, up on the hillside.

Towards the village shrine. Or perhaps towards the other shrine that Kass and Link scoped weeks earlier.

Two shrines. She touches her hand to her chin. She remembers finding a depression in the hillsides of Kakariko, a depression akin to those that she has seen inside of shrines begging for an orb, a depression that she has seen outside of shrines as well. She remembers considering its placement out in the woods. Link understands, now, the depression's existence as a shrine, wherever the orb may have been.

She does not remember if she activated that shrine, or if someone else did. The months have stretched too long. Maybe someone like Dorian, who once bore this same slate.

Link cranes her neck. She cannot see where the houses end, yet she observes the cluster of homes practically on top of the shrine. She can discern by the patterns of destruction of the village where ends the protective halo of the shrine's effect.

People moving towards the shrines. Kass and Link have found the same in the remainder of the land once known as Hyrule. Ordon: not built around its shrine, but a ways away, leaving the shrine in the sacred Ordona Spring. Ordon: now in ruins. The villages that remain: those with a shrine at their heart.

Like crowding around a fire in search of a respite from winter's warmth, the people have crowded around the shrines. And if the shrines somehow ceased to exist, or had not existed at all...

Link shakes her head. She focuses on the pot. In the lake near the waterfall where lives a population of sanke carp—the patterns of their colours changed over her one hundred years of absence, but the flaky tang of their flesh nearly the same as the sanke carp that she dragged across the land once known as Hyrule in an ice-box to make a certain stubborn rito archer a fish pie—sits Lady Impa's house, not any taller than the other homes, yet somehow more imposing. And somehow sadder. The home has drawn inwards on itself since last Link visited the village, hunching over and hunkering down upon its place by the waterfall, refusing to let go. She cannot picture Kakariko without that house.

As Inya and Hirako take her down into the village of Kakariko, Link senses the gazes of the villagers upon her back. Some beam warmly at her and wave, especially the children, whose parents force down their hands and shake their heads. Most regard her with expressions of neutrality or coldness. A few narrow their eyes as her, as though she herself had claimed that she led the Yiga, or that she personally would assist the Calamitous One.

All this, Link reflects, for refusing to bear the slate for a time. She makes a valiant effort at scrunching her face into a smile—she considers the taste of the pilaf in the pot—yet her gaze remains blank.

Leaning over, Kass whispers into Link's ear. "It is not my business, traveller," he observes, "but when you informed me that Kakariko may not take well to you, I did not anticipate this level of...ice. I feel as if we have stepped back a month into the heart of winter. I cannot imagine what you must have done. Not even the worst cheaters at cards face such treatment, and I suspect you do not know how to play cards, much less cheat at them."

Link would rub the back of her head if not for the cooking pot burdening her arms. Burdening her arms, and yet lifting her spirit.

She cannot fail. She cannot fail. Not with the wind at her back. Not with Kass's wings, quite literally, at her back.

Link would ask him to flap a breeze behind her for added effect but that might cool the pilaf further.

The house. Lady Impa's house. A young woman of about Link's age sweeps the floorboards at the front balcony of Lady Impa's home, her black hair drawn up into a complicated style of loops which remind Link of the ringed doughnuts and pretzels she has seen expertly twisted by Parapan hands. As Link, Inya, Hirako, Kass, and Ilia approach the house, Hirako and Inya confer with the two guards stationed outside Lady Impa's home. The guards lead Kass and Ilia away to a stable. He acquiesces. "Good luck, traveller. I shall be waiting for you. And I shall take good care of your compa—please, watch the feathers—nion for you!"

Link watches the guards usher Kass to the village stable. She shifts her gaze towards the waterfall pool, once in the centre of Kakariko but now along the outer edge, where statues of the Goddess Sheik and the other of the Seven wait in the water, the torches around them gone cold and ashen.

The statue of the Goddess Hylia, with Her many-feathered wings and Her smile, with Her hands clasped together in prayer, with Her pointed ears that emulate Link's own, that make Link think of the girl with the golden hair's, with her fire-light eyes and skin as earthen as the wilds she sacrificed herself to protect.

Link knows little of the Seven. Something about the reincarnation of the Goddess Hylia into mortal form, a suggestion that she cannot comprehend. The Golden Goddesses, she learned as a child, do not take the forms of people even if statues depict Them as such for the convenience of Their followers; They exist in the flames and the stones, in the snows and the seas, in the woods and the winds. Even when They came to this world during its creation, They appeared in the skies as great streaks of green, or blue, or red—and all gilded in gold—that bestowed upon Hyrule with gifts of abundance before departing again. To reincarnate into a mortal form. Could a Goddess do that, at all?

A vice grips her chin and forces her head forwards. Hirako gestures violently towards the door. Lady Impa's granddaughter, having apparently noticed them at that, gasps and clutches the broomstick. She attempts to bow, drops the broomstick to the floor, hastily bends over, picks it up, and bows again. Link remembers her name. Paya.

"Ma-ma-ma-master Li-li-link!" Paya stutters at her approach. "You-you're back!"

Hirako parts her lips, then closes her mouth again and motions for Paya to move aside instead. Paya steps back. Link looks up and squints: the roof looks different than when she last visited the village, or perhaps her memories play tricks on her. No. Different indeed, the patterns not the same, the wood scented much more freshly cut than the ancient lumber she recalls from her first three visits to the village.

She can see, in the seams between the roof and the older walls of the house, a hint of char.

Hirako and Inya argue on who should inform Lady Impa. After a moment, Inya grips Paya's shoulder; the guard requests that she briefly watches over Link. Hirako starts to protest, yet Inya drags her inside of the house and closes the door behind them.

Link stands on the porch, the cooking pot in her arms. She can still feel its warmth through the fabric of her tunic, the heat trapped inside by the wooden pot lid. Warm. Too warm.

Soon, the sun will begin to heat the earth, and spring will drop away to summer. Already the thick coat and the hood that she wears to divert attention from her scars—those on her face, like the ones down her cheeks, the thin mark from her right eye to the corner of her corner, and the teadrop her left eye, drawing people's gazes enough—drips sweat down the line of her spine and beads it over her brow.

"Master Li-link." Paya drums her fingers nervously against the broomstick. Link blinks at her. She blinks at Link, stumbling over her own breaths. "You've returned. To Kakariko." Link nods. "Does that...does that mean...?" Paya shakes her head at herself, her complicated hair a frenzied whirlwind of motion. "Forgive me for my fo-forwardness, Master Link, but...I do not..."

She covers her face with her hands. The broomstick falls again. Link sets down the cooking pot, picking the broomstick up and offering it to her, which agitates Paya further.

Ha-have you heard of Do-dorian? One mo-morning, we awoke and his chi-children were gone. I've been worried about them ever since, but I can't leave Kakariko, and we ne-never hear news from the outside..." Paya sniffles. Tears have gathered at the corners of her eyes. "Oh, how shameful for me to wee-weep in front of you." She wipes at her eyes. The tears continue to flow; she removes a kerchief from her pocket to blow her nose. Link awkwardly pats her shoulder with the bristles of the broomsticks.

There, there.

Paya takes the broomstick from her. Link taps the toes of her boots against the porch. "They're safe," she signs. "Koko and Cottla. and Dorian." Paya brings her palms to her face in surprise.

The broomstick again clatters to the floor. "Really!?"

Link nods. "Dorian isn't a Yiga anymore. He was...being manipulated. They said that they'd kill Cottla and Koko if he didn't do what they said." At the gesture kill, Paya sways back and forth on her heels as if about to faint dead away. "They're fine! They're fine. I got them to go to Medli to..." She does not remember the motion for seek asylum in Necludan. "...Medli's the capital of Tabantha. Where..." She does not remember the word for rito either. Instead she makes a flapping motion with her arms. "...those people live. I just saw them recently. I made pilaf for them, actually. They really liked it. Cottla and Koko. Here."

She reaches for the slate at her right hip. Paya intakes a sharp breath, biting all of her fingers save for her thumbs at once, while Linkfwips to the pictobox and hunts down the pictographs she took of Koko and Cottla in Medli, of them scarfing down pilaf, of Cottla forcing Tulin to fly over her around the town, of Kheel attempting to teach Koko to sing and Koko attempting to teach Kheel to cook—Link swells up in pride for the budding chef—of Dorian embracing his daughters in a badly angled candid shot that throws Cottla into silhouette and has Koko's hair taking up half the frame.

That one's her favourite. For its messiness.

Paya looks on at the pictographs, the curve of her mouth halfway between the sort of smile Link might have watching the baking of a fruitcake and the sort of expression Link might have observing that same fruitcake balanced precariously on the lip of a gorge. "Are these...paintings? How are they so...ju-just like real life?"

Link starts to explain the function of the pictobox, but she has not met with Purah in so long that the words have faded to time. She selects the green rune. To demonstrate the pictobox's use to Paya with her permission, Link snaps a pictograph of Paya's face on her recently upgraded slate. When Link turns the slate around to show Paya, the latter's hands fly to her face. "Plea-please get rid of that painting. I di-didn't know I looked so ba-ba-bad."

"You don't need to kid yourself." Link pauses. Paya looks at her. "Kid. You know. Like a goat. They say baa...nevermind. You look fine," Link tries to say instead, hastily covering up her tracks. She touches her chin. "I don't know how to get rid of these pictographs, either. Here, why don't we take one together?"

"You don't need to kid yourself." Link pauses. Paya looks at her. "Kid. You know. Like a goat. They say baa...nevermind. You look fine," Link tries to say instead, hastily covering up her tracks. She touches her chin. "I don't know how to get rid of these pictographs, either. Here, why don't we take one together?"

Paya moves her index and middle fingers to peek out at Link. "Everyone is sta-staring at us," she whispers in horror; Link touches her wrist. "And they thi-think that you're awful. I don't think that.
Bu-but most people do. Bu-but I don't!

"Do you want some of the pilaf? It's made of cucco. Rice, endura carrot, onion and garlic." Sniffling, Paya dips her head. "I'll give you some after I see your grandmother. I want her to try it first."

"O-oh." Paya sniffs again. She dabs her cheeks of a fresher trickle of tears. "Do you wa-want to take that...painting. I do-don't know how to say it out loud."

Link throws an arm around her shoulder and pulls down part of the hood. When the violet whorls over her throat come into the light, Paya takes a step backwards. Link senses Paya shivering against her shoulder. "We don't have to if you don't want to."

Paya nods. "I want to. I just need to...to ge-get over my...and this'll he-help."

Shrugging, Link raises the slate and taps the rune to change the direction of the pictobox. When the surface of the slate focuses to display Link and Paya's faces, Paya's palms creep up over her face again. Link pets her shoulder with her free hand, trying to calm her down. She glances towards the cooking pot of pilaf. If only she could reach it from here. While Paya cowers behind her hands, Link extends her left leg in an attempt to roll the cooking pot towards her. She wriggles her limbs, kicking in with her boot, leaning onto Paya for support. Just as the heel of her boot connects with the rim of the cooking pot, Paya's knees abruptly buckle. Link feels herself toppling over. She lands on top of Paya, squishing the girl to the wood. A sudden thump on the small of her back indicates that her efforts did indeed knock the cooking pot over.

That's her first victory today.

The door opens. Link looks up at Hirako and Inya. Paya uncovers her face for a second; the surprise slips Link's fingers on the slate. She hears the ding of a pictograph snapped as Hirako seizes Link around the middle, hauls her bodily off of Paya, and supplexes her head into the floor. "What are you doing, you foul—!"

"Lady Impa will see you now," Inya comments, dragging Hirako away from Link while Link apologises profusely to Paya, whose face has taken on the same colour as a cucco's comb. She gathers the cooking pot from the ground and pushes it into Link's arms. Link thanks her with a nod and an attempt at a smile before she turns back towards the door.

The doorway. The doorway to Lady Impa's home. Lady Impa. One hundred and twenty years of age, or older. One year for every shrine, except for the two shrines that Link has not yet activated, in the lost woods, and in...somewhere. Maybe the castletown.

The castle. The malice hand rising from the earth to clench the castle in its violent violet grasp.

She hangs with the tips of her boots in the doorway for a moment, her eyes closed, her body loose save for the arms around the cooking pot. Hirako and Inya bow to Lady Impa, awaiting within. As long as Link remains outside, she has not truly entered Lady Impa's presence. And then she takes the step. And then she opens her eyes.

Lady Impa, upon the scarlet cushion, just as Link left her all those months ago. A year and a half. Six seasons. Eighteen moons, as her zora friends would say.

Far too long, as Riju would tell her, a quiet courage transferred from her voice to Link's own clenching heart.

Link shifts the satchel on her hip to obscure the slate. Lady Impa will speak to her and not to the slate. She listens to Paya's footfalls behind her, the girl entering, forgetting the broomstick, running back out, and entering again—broomstick in hand—to stand in a corner.

Lady Impa lifts her ancient head. The hooks upon her hat sway with her motions, like metronomes, like pendulums. Link steps forward as Lady Impa fixes her unreadable gaze upon Link's face, and she kneels down, and she sets the cooking pot in front of Lady Impa.

Link hears one of the guards—either Lady Impa's, or Inya or Hirako—whispering behind her. She wraps her fingers around the handle of the wooden pot lid. She raises the lid.

The scent of warm pilaf vapours up from the pot and dissipates throughout the entire house, as though Link herself had grown vast enough to fill the home with her presence.

Lady Impa's eyes darken with recognition. "You remember," she says, her timbre rasped over her words like paper stretched too thin, her warped fingers clenched around the violet bracelet at her right wrist.

"I remember enough," Link answers. She keeps her gestures low and even. "I remember enough to ask why you didn't tell me the truth when I begged you for it."

"...when first you arrived at the borders of the village I have spent my lifetime to protect in the hopes that you would one day return, I...attempted to tell you the truth." Lady Impa curls her fingers over her knees. Link has the impression that merely keeping her neck up strains her to a point of pain, or somewhere just beyond. "I called you then: O Champion of Hylia, O Hero of Hyrule, O Her Majesty's Knight, O Courageous Link. You responded by fainting away and refusing me. What truth could I tell you then, when you remembered nothing at all? Before you came, I was afraid that you would recall what you had done and been too ashamed to show your face." Link blinks. Ashamed? "Instead, you came recalling absolutely nothing. What truth could I give you, that would not tear your heart from your flesh?"

"I was afraid that telling you too much, or too little, would only hurt you. Yet I was equally aware that I had not the time to allow you to recover. With your awakening, and the awakenings of the Divine Beasts, came the understanding that the Calamitous One could once again lie close at hand." The Calamitous One. Link cannot tell from Lady Impa's words if she knows of its existence, or simply fears the possibility, as Riju does. "As you are the Champion of Hylia, I had no recourse but to send you on your way."

Link's mouth thins into a line. The words begin to take shape on her fingertips. What she shall say. No longer the Champion of Hylia.

"I could see that you retained your strength, your wit, and your bravery. Your power. Your wisdom. Your courage. Although you were unable to regard yourself as the Champion of Hylia and the Hero of Hyrule, the Goddesses would surely guide you on your journey. And we had no other choice. I instructed you to speak to the people of Eldin and particularly of Darunia. I hoped that you, upon witnessing their plight, would be moved to assist them of your own volition, even if you did not believe yourself the chosen hero.

"One hundred years ago, your heart, despite your lack of training or understanding, was almost always in the right place. Even if you erred at that critical moment, I believed that the Goddesses would see to your courage once again. For, if not you, then who else?"

Link wants to ask: yet anyone could bear the slate. Anyone could activate the shrines. Anyone could have, and has, proceeded to calm the Divine Beasts.
If the land once known as Hyrule has suffered for one hundred years, then why has no one else taken that slate upon the Great Plateau? Why did Lady Impa merely wait for her return?

Her awakening and the awakening of the Divine Beast coincided. But what of the shrines, which Ilia told her came to life once more several years ago?

"When you returned, you did not speak of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania. I could not discern from your words whether or not you had done as I hoped. Therefore, out of worry, I changed my course of action.

"I scribed the letter to the chief of Medli, to inform them of the situation, so that they might guide you to the Divine Beast Vah Medoh without letting you know of the truth. In this way, I might ensure that you would at least save the lives of what people you could.

"Your return from Medli horrified me. You rejected the bearing of the slate. Moreover, you spoke of your sister, indicating that you had learned at least some of the truth. I thought that I could perhaps salvage the situation. I feared that the chief of Medli knew what happened during the Great Calamity and had informed you. I sought you to take you away from such matters.

"Link..."

Lady Impa's eyelids lower over her crimson eyes.

"We all have our own purpose in this life. Yours, and mine, is to serve the Goddesses and Their decisions. In doing so, we must give up our rights to live as we please. I treated you harshly, for the alternative was to do a disservice for all of the people of Hyrule. I will not apologise. I chose the people of Hyrule over you, and when you gave up the slate to me, you chose yourself over the people of Hyrule."

Link winces. She can already hear the words that Impa will say next. Do my words sting? Let them.

"Yet...I have so long worrying for the Goddess Hylia that I have forgotten the very virtue of the Goddess that watches over me. Truth.

"I can see, now, that when you returned from Medli, I should have reconsidered what you had learned from your memories. I feared that, as you had remembered some but not enough, if you were to know of your sister's passing, if you were to know of the gap of one hundred years..."

Link closes her eyes. She pictures herself sliding bone skewers into her spine, into the bones of her arms and legs, into the protrusions of her wrists and ankles, chaining herself to stillness. Like the frozen crab. Make like the frozen crab.

If Lady Impa believes that Link has remembered everything, she will speak candidly. More candidly than she would otherwise.

Her little sister's passing. Aryll's passing. She prays, hope beyond hope, that Aryll died painlessly, in her sleep, surrounded by those who loved her and whom she loved.

"I do not know how I should have informed you. And, again, I will not apologise for the intent behind my actions, nor the hurt that they have caused you. Yet, I should have told you the truth. Yet, I should not have continued to hide from you the things that you already knew. Tell me, Link...have you hidden from people that which you believed would hurt them, or that which you believed would be difficult for them to bear or to understand, or that which you believed would endlessly complicate the world around you?"
Link raises her hands. She starts to form the cross-armed gesture for no, and then she stops.

She...has.

She has hidden so many things from so many people. She has hidden her identity. She has hidden her past. She continues to hide from Kass of her own existence as the missing Link of whom his mentor spoke, continues to hide from her family at Romani Ranch of herself as the Link whom Marin loved and who loved Marin all of those years ago, continues to hide this and that and bits and pieces.

In part, to prevent those around her from hurting, and in part, to prevent them from bearing what she believed too difficult. In part. For their own sakes.

Yet to a large degree, to let lie unspoken what...would endlessly complicate the world around her.

Link has begun, ever so slowly, to unravel the truth of herself. She has begun, ever so slowly, to confide, to share, to strip herself bare before those she trusts. Yet even now the process takes time, and even now she waits for when she can find a proper time, a proper place. When she has had time to think.

"That does not matter now. The slate has gone. I have misplaced my trust. I know not what may happen, yet. I thought that I would—in these one hundred and two years that have passed since the Calamitous One destroyed all for which we worked and all for which she suffered—be prepared for your return. Had you come back fifty or sixty years earlier, before the rising tide of monsters once more swept the across land...then, I had prepared a network of informants and allies over the entirety of Hyrule. Then, I was ready to muster what forces I could. Then, I knew of the reconstruction efforts in every corner of Hyrule.

"Yet, you did not come."

Link wants to protest. That she could not have come if she wanted to. That she does not even know how she got to the Shrine of Resurrection. Or of what critical error Lady Impa speaks. Of what she might have been ashamed. Of what she can not yet remember.

"And in that time...I never lost hope in the Goddesses. I never lost hope in Her Majesty. I never lost hope that one day, you would return.

"But I did lose hope that I would witness to see that return, or that I would play a part in the defeat of the Calamitous One. And so, I...allowed Kakariko to grow more insular. I focused on protecting what I could. No longer could I travel, and no longer could I maintain the network of information that I had. 'The paths of this world belong to the young; the hearths, to the old,'" she intones, effecting a timbre as of quoting something else. "Even now, I can do precious little but pray that the stamp of the ancient King of Hyrule would have meaning in Medli, but pray that people might know of Lady Impa of Kakariko, but pray that the Goddesses will deliver us.

"Whatever happens now, I leave in the hands of the Goddesses. I have done all that I can. And yet, all that I have done, may not have been enough."

Lady Impa does not speak. Link inhales. The pilaf. As long as she can smell the pilaf, she can do anything.

"Link. Why have you come, now, after this very, very long year?"

The rounded and halved motion of a year and a half begin to rotate through her wrists, yet Link stops herself.
Not the time. She has other things to say. She has promises to keep, and paths to walk before she sleeps.

Kass's mentor's father. Who knew the girl with the golden hair. Who spent his entire life waiting for Link to emerge from the Shrine of Resurrection. Who died not knowing what would come.

Marin. Aryll. Perhaps even the girl with the golden hair. Passed away before they could know.

She does not know whom the blade of evil's bane shall choose to carry its weight.

But she knows that if she can do anything, anything at all, to promise peace for the people of the land that may one day again become Hyrule, she will.

"Impa," Link says, "I...can't forgive you for what you did to me. I know that you were doing it for the sake of Hyrule, and I...I understand. I don't know what I would have done. If I were you, I mean. But I can't...I can't forgive you." She inhales. She exhales. Her friends forgave her when she told them of the truth, of her having been and then no longer being the chosen hero. "I can't forgive you, and I don't know if I ever will."

"It does not matter now," Lady Impa responds.

"But I have a question to ask. Please...answer it truthfully."

Lady Impa inclines her head. The hooks on the brims of her hat swaying back and forth, like the pendulum of time, the time that no one can bring back, the time that cannot flow backwards, the time that only ever goes on.

"I...remember enough." Link will not lie, but she will hide. As Lady Impa has hidden from her. Someday, she prays that she will never have to lie again, will never have to hide the truth, yet now she needs that information almost more than she needs to eat. Almost.

"I know what happened during those days of the Great Calamity." Link does know. People, most recently Ilia, have told her. "I know that I went with the Princess to Mount Nayru. I know of...the slaughter. I know that the guardian...the guardian in the Ash Swamp hurt me. I know that I was gravely wounded, and that the Princess...that the Princess saved me in the Shrine of Resurrection. I don't know what happened after that. I wanted to ask you what...what happened after that."

Lady Impa knits her brow. "The guardian in the Ash Swamp did no such thing. Or, rather, the guardian...and the Shrine of Resurrection have nothing to do with one another."

Link blinks. She narrows her eyes, ever so slightly. Ilia would not have lied to her.

"...how much do you remember of the Great Calamity, Link?" She can hear the carefulness in Lady Impa's voice, that opaque shield that hides the bareness of the truth.

Link rises from the floor. She stands before Lady Impa, and she stands before the cooking pot, and she stands before the Golden Goddesses.

"Lady Impa. I want you to tell me the truth. You said that you don't have anything to lose anymore. Just...just, for once. Tell me what I want to know, and I'll leave you alone. If you tell me, I'll tell you something that you wanted to know. Believe me when I say that."

"You are withholding information from me," hisses Lady Impa, her voice colder than all of the wastes of Hebra, icier than even a chilly-fish made on chillshroom and hydromelon and cool safflina and chillfin trout and a giant block of sapphire. "Who are you to demand that I tell you the truth, when you do the same thing that you accuse me of?” Link longs to scream, to grab the cooking pot, to smash it down upon the floor.

Not to silence the crowds, not to draw attention to herself, not to take action, as she did in Amali’s home last autumn.

But to shake the very rafters. To break the very silence. To fragment herself upon the wood.

For the second time in her life she senses something rise within her, bubble up bitter as wormwood and sharp as the blade upon her back.

Anger.

"You will tell me what I'm asking for, or I will leave." The spark of lightning on her fingertips, the whisper of wind at her back. "I have promises to keep. And I have paths to walk before I sleep. I have too many things to do to stand here wasting my time. I thought that maybe, just maybe, after this year, or this year and a half, or however long it's been I don't know and I don't care, I thought that I could bring you the pilaf that I know is your favourite, I even put in the endura carrot and the onions and the garlic that I spent so long trying to figure out. I had to bribe Purah for her to tell me how to make it the first time. I must've spent days and weeks and months making every kind of risotto and pilaf I could think of and you know I never thought that I could get tired of rice but I swear I did at some point and I just had this one innocent thought that maybe I could give you the pilaf and everything would be all right, that you'd finally tell me the truth, that I'd finally tell you the truth, that we could just stop this. I trusted you and you used me. I know it was for Hyrule.

"I know, and the worst part is that I know that if you'd told me the truth, that I had to go face the Divine Beasts, that I wouldn't have done it. I would've run away. You were right! You were right and that's the worst part! That's the worst part! That's...that's the worst part, is that if you'd told me I would've run. But I still...feel like...like...I don't understand! Why me? If you knew that the shrines are important for whatever reason I don't even get, and if you knew that anyone could get the shrines, why didn't you let someone else do it! Even when I gave you the slate, you just sat around with it! You didn't even try! You didn't even do anything! You just let Dorian steal it! I don't understand! I don't understand! You said that you didn't lose hope but you literally had the slate! I don't understand! I don't! I don't!"

The words rush out of her all at once.

"Why did you wait for me? Just because I'm the chosen hero? Do you know how many shrines I've been to that've already been solved by someone else, because that someone else already went and figured it all out, and just didn't have the slate to put into the pedestal thingy? I don't understand. I don't understand any of this!

"You didn't even tell me where the sword! Isn't that more important than anything else? It's the sword...that banes the evil! That seals the darkness! It could've been anyone! Why did you wait for me? Why did you insist it was me? You didn't even believe in me a hundred years ago! Urbosa had to tell you to trust in the sword's decision! I remember! I made soup! I made you both soup and I was bringing it over and I heard you two talking on the stairs! If you didn't even believe in me then, why are you so certain it's me now!?

"Look, I'm sorry for leaving.” She pants.

"It was wrong of me to just throw the slate down. I just...I just...when I was in Medli, someone very dear to me told me to stop treating this like a game. Told me that I had to assume responsibility. She was right, and so was Teba, and so were all of them. Yunobo'd been the same as me, bumbling through, not knowing what either of us were doing. But Amali and Teba were adults. They...they understood what Yunobó hadn't. And they were right. I'd been treating everything like...I'd been acting like the hero even though I didn't want to treat myself like that. I knew I had to...I had to either accept being the hero or whatever that means, or I had to not. One of the two. I couldn't keep treating it like some twisted...some twisted game...like I could just do whatever I wanted.

"I didn't want to be the hero. So I wanted to give it up.

"I came back. I wanted to give up the slate. But before I did that, I just wanted to know if maybe you'd tell me what happened to Aryll. I thought to myself that if I could trust you, I could stay. We could talk. I'd figured out by then that I really was the chosen hero. I'd remembered that. I knew it after Darunia but I didn't want to admit it to myself. And after Medli I knew it really was me. Because saying that it wasn't me...saying that it wasn't me would mean that Aryll wasn't my sister either. And I wanted more than anything to have Aryll. I could deal with my past, if I had Aryll, and Marin, and Ilia, and the Princess, because without my past, I don't have any of them. So I accepted them. But I couldn't accept you keeping the truth from me even after I'd...I needed to have the past. To justify what I was doing. To have a reason to be...I don't know. I went for the Divine Beasts because I wanted to help people. I knew that I had the slate, and I couldn't say no. That's why I helped Yunobó even though I didn't even know, really, who I was. I had...I had an inkling. But I didn't get it. I didn't know.

"But when I realised that I'd been running from my past, I didn't think I could carry the slate. I was a coward. I was afraid. I wanted something to hold onto. I wanted to ask you about my past. I wanted to understand. You didn't let me.

"I've spent two years not knowing where my sister is, remembering her, knowing that you know what happened to her, and having to live with the knowledge that she could be alive or dead or Goddesses know what!

"It wasn't until I met someone who did know about my past that I...that I accepted myself. Not just as Link, but as. I don't know. The Link that my past and the Link that is my present are the same. That I accepted that I'd been the chosen hero at some point, and that I could carry the slate. I wasn't ready to think about whether or not I was still the chosen hero. I found her myself. Maryll. The daughter of...the daughter of a girl I loved, and love, with all my heart. Only then could I take the slate again. Only then, when I found out...when I learned that the things in my head and in my heart and in my belly weren't just figments of something made up, but had left on this world what I could see and hear and smell and taste and feel...that's when I knew I could do it. That I could bear the slate. I could calm the Divine Beasts. That I could do anything. Not as the hero. Just as myself.

"And look!"

Link lifts the satchel from her hip to show Lady Impa the slate; she notices the dilation of Lady Impa's pupils.

"I found Dorian. I took back the slate. I went and I've calmed all four of the Divine Beasts. And I've found all of the Divine Beasts new pilots, even! You don't even know this. You know what happened? Dorian became an informant against the Yiga. The Yiga are practically gone from Hyrule now because all of the Divine Beasts and the pilots have been working together! Yunobó and Amali and Riju and Sidon. We even know where the sword is! We're trying to find someone who it'll accept right now. We just haven't found them yet. It rejected me. I tried so hard to pull it out but it rejected me. I'm not the hero anymore. I'm not the chosen one anymore. But you know what I did? I calmed the Divine Beasts. I found the pilots. I found the sword. I've gotten all one hundred and twenty of the shrines except two and I think I know where they are and I've gotten all the towers and then I'm going to go back and help the Champions in whatever way I can and we've already gotten done with the Yiga and then it's just the Calamitous One and we're going to beat that too and we did all this without you knowing a thing!

"You didn't believe me when I begged you to and you believed in me when I begged you not to!"

Her hands hurt. Her fingers ache. Her arms threaten to fall entirely off of her shoulders. Her eyes bulge. Her lips crack. Her breaths suck in the tang of copper on her tongue.

She gazes at Lady Impa, and in that moment, Link is very, very vast, and Lady Impa is very, very small.

"And most importantly, I know who I am. I know who Link is. I haven't gotten back all my memories. There's whole years blank in my head. Maybe whole people I don't remember. But I know enough. I remember enough. I just want to understand what happened so I can help. I just want to help. That's all I want to do. I want to put the Calamitous One to rest, and I want to bury the dead, and I want to pray over them, and then I want to go home, and I want to see my horse, and I want to see my family, and I want to be there with Ilia until the last, and I want to make Romani pancakes in the shape of Miyu's face. That's what I want to do."

She breathes.

She breathes in through her nose and she breathes out through her mouth. She breathes, and she breathes, and she feels her heart thrumming in pain against her sternum, and she feels her lungs set aflame with agony in her chest, and she feels her stomach roiling to torment her as though her belly had burst on the inside to marinate her guts in its juices, to burn her away from the inside out like the Malice taking hold of her at last.

But she welcomes it. That pain. Because that pain, like the grasshopper on the grass all those years ago when she almost broke her neck falling from the tower upon the Great Plateau, tells her that she is breathing, and beating, and very much alive.

"Link." Lady Impa's lips scarcely move. The world in a single syllable, in a single name, in a single word. "...I will tell you."

Link's chest rises and falls. The muscles of her arms burn. Her lungs flare in pain. Her heart clenches.

She listens.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: The province of Holodrum is in reference to the country of the same name Oracle of Seasons; the village of Horon is likewise named after Horon Village, and the former village of Rosia is named after Subrosia, the underground land in Oracle of Seasons where the main currency is ore chunks. The tree that the villagers regard as a guardian deity is, too, a nod to the Maku Tree from Oracle of Seasons. The entire Holodrum thing, of course, is my version of the Shrouded Shrine quest in Breath of the Wild, and the Thyphlo Mines are named for the Thyphlo Ruins.

Kass is claustrophobic of small, dark, tight spaces where he wouldn't be able to fly if he wanted to. I mentioned Sidon's fishing pole being luminous back in the sixty-fourth chapter, and, indeed, that's how I solved the shrine: I had Link hold five luminous stones in hand the entire time! The statues of the hawk being of Din are in reference to the light spirit Eldin from Twilight Princess, who is an owl-hawk-something.

I did mention back when Link visited Aveil for the first time during the Parapan arc that the Delicious in Wilds equivalent of Bolson's construction company has gone off to make Tarrey Town. The village of Kagoro takes its name from Kagoron of Spirit Tracks, who prays at the altar of the the Mountain Goddess in-game. The province of Golo takes its name from Golo of Skyward Sword, a miner invested in tales of a sacred dragon.

There are indeed metallic blocks in the walls of the labyrinth off the coast of Akkala. And I did indeed climb up to the top, but you can't actually get through the entire labyrinth that way. I never had my mini-map turned on at any point in the game (and completely forgot about its existence), so I used the "right hand on the right wall" trick to get my way through. Made it easy-peasy, especially when using a dropped apple to mark my spot so that I could try my luck down another tunnel and see if there's a chest or monster that way!

The first time that Link met Kass in the spring, back on Romani Ranch, it was right at the end of winter and before his moult. Now Kass isn't so lucky.

In Breath of the Wild, you need shoot an arrow at the dragon. In Delicious in Wilds, a wooden skewer will do! Indeed, this isn't the last time that Link or one of her companions will nearly die trying to deliver food to a massive monstrous being's mouth.

The hero whose recorder revealed stairways is in reference to The Legend of Zelda for the Famicom/NES; the Hilted Singer is in reference to Skyward Sword; the hero who moved the fabric of Nayru is Ocarina of Time; the hero who conducted the winds is The Wind Waker.

Kass's affection towards Link is entirely paternal. I hadn't even thought of anyone interpreting it otherwise until I received a comment in that nature, so allow me to make it explicit: it's paternal, and her affection towards Kass is likewise that adopted family sense. Thanks.

The monastery that would become Kakariko wasn't always named Kakariko! Impa renamed it after she set up shop precisely for the names of previous Kakariko villages.

Indeed, Dorian's the one who activated that shrine, successfully accomplishing what he attempted to do in the family heirloom being stolen quest in Breath of the Wild.

Paya stutters differently from Yunobo.

"The paths of this world belong to the young; the hearts, to the old" is not a quote or reference to my knowledge. That line was written by Miyahon, the famous sheikah orator I mentioned in author's notes a while back, and frequently quoted as a pearl of wisdom.

Lightning and wind are associated with Farore, and thus with courage, and thus with Link.

Link's had quite enough.

Next time: Impa's story; baking apple pie, like Ilia suggested; memories of Zelda.

Beta reader's comments: Kass molting is hilarious. Sorry, Kass, but you make for good comedy.

The last couple of pages here are a doozy. Link getting pissed is quite the sight.

Next chapter, also, is a big one, and a sad one. Prepare yourself.

Emma. 05 November 2017.

Chapter Summary

Having confronted the wise matriarch and forced her to agree to tell the chef the truth, the travelling chef listens to the matriarch's story, then follows the girl who smells of horses advice regarding trying to remember the chef's own mortal injury on the eve of the Great Calamity.

Chapter Notes

As usual, notes that didn't fit in the end, because ao3 is trying to save you all from my blabbering: I started writing this chapter at 06:03 on the ninth of August, and finished writing it on at 12:12 on the ninth of August.

As always, thanks a million to my most wonderful beta reader, Emma, who diligently remembers to change the dates on the author's notes, and to you, the reader, who diligently remembers to constructively criticise me if ever there is some suggestion to be made about my writing (which I am now trying to implement, thank you).

I hate these kinds of talking chapters. I mean, the information is really relevant, but this is one of those cases where I wish that this were a film and not the written word, so that I could instead have these take place as flashbacks instead of just relying on Impa telling Link, given that it's from her point of view. I think that we have two more big talking chapters left after this, and then we're free of the curse! Next time I write a long fic I'm going to actually sit down and damn not write it by the seat of my pants.

"Sign-books" is the Necludan term for books written with carved Lanayrish characters that can be read with the fingers rather than the eyes (i.e. similar to Braille).

Like everyone else in the royal court, Impa refers to the Master Sword as the sword that seals the darkness.

So, to clarify, Zelda is eighteen during most of the memories explored in Delicious in Wilds, and turned nineteen on the eve of the Great Calamity (i.e. I aged her up by two years from what she was in Breath of the Wild). Link was eighteen at the time of the Great Calamity (Zelda is slightly older than Link).

Mudora, the poet, is named after Mudora from A Link to the Past, who wrote a book which allows Link to translate the ancient text on tablets scattered throughout Hyrule.

As before, the "inconsistencies" of capitalisation are because different characters speak about these things differently. You know how you can just feel when someone says something with a capital C? So Impa calls it the Castle, and Link calls it the castle.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
"Link...

"When the Great Calamity struck, the Calamitous One arose from the Castle. I was not at the Castle at the time, but with you, the Champions, and Her Majesty, en route to Mount Nayru, for Her Majesty to pray at the Spring of Wisdom. We had six slates, then. One for each of you. For yourself, for Her Majesty, for each of the four Champions, although we did not know how to make use of them with the exception of the pictobox rune available on one of the slates: Her Majesty's.

"In those days, when we set out for Mount Nayru in anticipation of Her Majesty's nineteenth birthday, we did not know when the Calamitous One would strike. We knew only, then, that we had fended off the monsters that seemed to spawn from the wilderness, yet that their attacks grew worse by the day. We knew only, then, that the Calamitous one would arise, but we did not know when, or what form it would take.

"We expected, as in the stories, the form of the treacherous boar.

"Link...I do not know what you remember of Her Majesty, or even what she told you. His Highness...decreed that you would live with Her Majesty as one, in the hopes that the arrangement—with the sacred sword so close—would sparken something of the legendary Princess of the blessed bloodline within her. I know that you two grew close...closer than, I admit, I enjoyed at the time. I did not understand the emotions that welled up within me then. I was harsher upon than I had any right to be. I apologise for how I treated you then.

"I was bound by my duty. I, as my aunt before me, and as her aunt before her, had been raised by entire life in serve to the Goddesses, in order to serve His Highness and the royal family, in order to serve Her Majesty. If I did not perform my duties satisfactorily, I would be removed.

"I heard stories, when I was very young, of a member of our family who had failed the Princess she protected and who had expired, alone, with nothing but the ghosts of her failures around her, banished from not only the family but from the remainder of our people as well.

"I feared that. But more, I feared...I did not want to be taken from Her Majesty. I loved her then, as I love her now. She meant and means the world to me. I am no fool. I know what Her Majesty did when she believed herself sneaky enough that I would not notice. I knew of her and of the Champion of Sageru. I knew of her late nights reading sign-books and tablets in Lanayrish in the dark. I knew of so many things that she tried to keep hidden from me.

"When she was younger, I was her confidante. She told me everything. As she and I grew older, His Highness...would question me about her upbringing. If I did not answer truthfully...well, I learned very quickly of the consequences. And she learned, just as quickly, that she could no longer trust me.

"The first time I caught her lying to me, I...

"I kept what I could from His Highness. All that with I mentioned: the long nights, the Champion of Sageru, all of it. I kept her as safe as I could without compromising my status. I knew that someone else, taking my place, would be less sympathetic, and Her Majesty did not know how to lie.

"I only wished for her happiness. I was afraid that if I disobeyed, His Highness would take me from her. And I was afraid, too, that the Calamitous One would come upon us, and that Her Majesty would fall before its malice. I believed in my heart that Her Majesty would unseal the magic in her bloodline. In serving the Goddesses...Her Majesty, as the reincarnation of the Goddess Hylia, represented the hope of Hyrule. And I, faithful servant of Sheik, would reveal the truth.
"I assisted His Highness with devising plans for Her Majesty. I kept to them faithfully. It broke me to the bone to see her heart harden against me. I did not blame her. I was the physical manifestation of everything that she had come to loathe about herself. I was the one who physically took away her books, who physically forced her to come home, who physically kept her in prayer. I was that barrier. His Highness sat upon his throne and checked up on her, yet he existed more as an entity, like the cloud before the storm. I was the rock upon which she felt chained while the leviathan of the depths rose to claim her.

"I...had to harden my heart as well.

"I thought to myself that if only I could unlock whatever kept Her Majesty's heart in check, if only I could push her far enough to access that which her bloodline promised her, then this madness could end. I thought to myself, just one more day, just one more hour, just one more prayer, and this torture could end. I hurt her more than I could bear, and then I had to return to hurt her yet again.

"You must understand, too, that I do not blame His Highness. He wished for nothing more than his daughter's happiness, and he wished for nothing more than his kingdom's peace. Yet he understood that the Calamitous One would come. He understood, too, the hardships that Her Majesty faced. He understood that with Her Highness's passing, Her Majesty had lost not only a mother, but also a teacher. No, Her Highness had never used the sealing magic in her life. But had she...she remained alive, perhaps Her Majesty would never have needed to suffer at all. The songs may speak of the Princess, but perhaps...

"He understood, too, how much rode on the sealing magic. Not only for the lifeblood of the entire kingdom of Hyrule, but, for Her Majesty...her entire sense of worth. There were those who whispered about her, that she should not have borne the traditional name of the Princess, that His Highness should have sired what they considered a true daughter of Hylia, that Her Majesty's failures at drawing upon her blessed bloodline came from...an inherent inability to do so.

"Every day, every hour, every prayer, the silence of the Goddess Hylia made Her Majesty hate herself, more and more, on more levels that I could imagine. I, and His Highness, had nothing but faith in her abilities. We knew her a true daughter of Hylia.

"His Highness, just as myself, understood that all of the days spent in happiness for Her Majesty would come to naught when the Calamitous One struck. We spoke between ourselves that once we had put an end to the Calamitous One, then Her Majesty could live her life as she pleased. We would have to suffer before we could see the Seven. Or so...so we believed.

"I...

"I never told her how much she meant to me. I can only pray that she knew. I could not do so, for I had to remain, by right, an impartial arbiter, a guard, always at arm's-length. I could not tell her that she represented the whole of my world. I could not tell her that I loved her more than I ever loved my sister, that I came to love her more than I loved my father and my mother.

"When Her Majesty was six years old, her mother the Queen of Hyrule perished. She left Her Majesty naught but a bracelet she once wore, which Her Majesty kept as a charm. I myself was not yet old enough to serve as her guard, yet—in anticipation of the training I had already begun—I had been introduced to my future charge so that she would come to know me as a playmate. I recall, observing her at her mother's funeral, that Her Majesty did not weep, but instead looked on to the future. I thought that I should be as like her as I could, that I, too, should never cry. And so I hardened my heart, and chiseled my face from stone, and watched her grow from loving me as the dearest older sister that she could have, to resenting me with all her heart, even against her own wishes.

"And then...you.

"You, Link.

"You came into her life. At first, you, too, were like a living monument to her failures. You, the Knight, who had drawn the sacred sword, while she, the Princess, did not harbour the blessed bloodline. Yet you could speak your mind freely. His Highness could do nothing about you if you were to displease him, for the sword that seals the darkness had chosen you, while His Highness had chosen me.

"And so Her Majesty despised you at first. I am ashamed to say that I was...strangely happy. Happy that you would not replace me, I suppose. I am ashamed, and I apologise. I had spent my entire life at her side. I had tried...to draw the sacred sword. Yet it rejected me. And chosen, instead, you. Someone with no training at all, someone who did not even worship the Seven or know of Hylia beyond that strange faith that some of your more far-flung neighbours might have possessed. How could someone who did not believe in the Goddess Hylia serve the very Princess who was the Goddess in mortal flesh? I could not comprehend the sacred sword.

"And you could speak freely. And so she came to confide in you, as she once confided in me. And so she came to confide in you, as once...

"Ah, but. This is not what you were asking for, was it, Link? No. And I have no manner of proof to you for anything that I have said. No. You wanted to know about the Great Calamity. Very well. I will tell you of the Great Calamity.

"In anticipation of Her Majesty's nineteenth birthday, I mentioned, we set out for Mount Nayru. The journey would take significant time. We went with the Champions and with yourself.

"We saw the signs that the Calamitous One would soon arrive, its harbinger of malice having begun to well up from the ground itself, bringing with it an influx of monsters. On the night of Her Majesty's nineteenth birthday, the Divine Beasts awoke. My sister and the other researchers had been attempting to awaken Them for years, even before my sister came of age to proceed in research. The moment that They awoke of Their own accord, Their eyes alight and Their hearts aglow, the slates that we recovered for each of the Champions at last functioning—the moment that we discovered we could place the slates into each of the terminals of the Divine Beast to register the Champions as pilots—we thought that, at long, long last, the Goddesses had come to our aid.

"Though Her Majesty did not yet possess the sealing magic, I believed—we all believed, as we had to believe—that either she would awaken her blessed bloodline upon Mount Nayru, or else she would simply find it within herself when the Calamitous One came. The Divine Beasts had awoken on the very eve of Her Majesty's coming of age. How else could we take such a sign?

"The Champions mobilised to their Divine Beasts. You, I, and Her Majesty continued to Mount Nayru. We believed, we earnestly believed, that the Goddesses were at last on our side.

"Our hope was short-lived.

"When...the Calamitous One struck, the...we did not know it immediately, but the Calamitous One had been with us since the evening of Her Majesty's coming of age. It somehow seized control of the guardians and the Divine Beasts. The guardians turned against us, slaughtering our people. The Divine Beasts vanished the Champions to malice—I do not even know, fully, what became of them, and I fear what torture they might have endured—and rampaged over the land. Her Majesty prayed at the Spring of Wisdom, and yet...nothing. The Yiga ambushed us upon Mount Nayru, who had followed us and saw this as the Goddesses...as the Goddesses lending Their forces to the Yiga's malicious and abominable cause. Between the Yiga and the monsters that appeared nearly from somewhere, the guards that had travelled alongside us for our protection fell.

"You, I, and Her Majesty escaped upon horseback with the last of the guard, but...

"At the base of the mountain, we suffered a second ambush. For Her Majesty, I took a blow that left me scarcely able to stand. She was unwilling to leave me. You were unwilling to leave me, for reasons that I cannot fathom. Her Majesty told me that she had a plan, that she believed that she knew a method of healing my injuries. Something involving the Sacred Realm and a shrine. I refused to believe her and pretended that my injuries were too grave for me to move. I...I insisted that she leave without me, that I would rest and stay alive until I could rejoin her.

"She told me that she had a plan at the Castle. She spoke of a mirror within the Castle that she believed held a portal to the Sacred Realm where the Calamitous One resided. She...concocted a plan, that she would gather what forces of the remaining armies that she could, and she would take everyone into the Sacred Realm to battle the Calamitous One directly.

"I begged her to cease. I begged that in the Great Calamity, we had no time. She needed to go to the Castle—with that much I agreed—and she needed to use the sealing magic of her blessed bloodline, and her Knight needed to use the sacred sword.

"Her Majesty gazed upon me with an expression older than any I have seen on this earth, then or since. She told me that she could not access the sealing magic, and she told me that as far as she had researched, no one in the royal family had ever used it. That the sealing magic of the song did not exist. She gazed upon me with the very visage of the Goddess Herself, carved of light, infinite worlds behind and before her. She told me that her plan could fail, but at least she could try. She told me: 'Impa. Everything around us will die if we don't do something. Please. Please, let me have hope. If I fail, then at least I have failed in something I can hope for. Please. I have spent my entire life trusting you. Now, please, it's time that you trust me. It is hope, or it is death. And, for once in my life, I choose hope.'

"I told her to go. She gave me her mother's bracelet, which she promised she would take back one day. A promise that she would return.

"As soon as you and she left, I saddled a horse despite my injuries and began to follow. In case I fell behind, or could not live through my wounds, I did not want to distress Her Majesty by informing her of my presence. I tailed you at a distance. I observed you hold off the guardians at Fort Hateno long enough for the villagers to evacuate. I watched you sacrifice yourself for her. I could solely look on as she dressed your wounds as best she could and took a passing traveller's horse.

"I followed her. I witnessed the guardians and the monsters at the Castle that the remaining armies of Hyrule were fighting against, and losing. She rallied the soldiers. The very picture of her father. She rallied them to charge the Castle, and they cut through whatever malice they could. In the bowels of the Castle, they came upon the great shrine that lay at the very heart. She used your slate to activate the shrine. The moment that she used the slate, it, too, turned against her, boiling away in malice. Yet she stepped into that curtain of blue light, you gathered in her arms. I thought that I would perish then and there, seeing her vanish into the blue, yet I dared not make myself known. She emerged from the earth carrying you.

"Whole.
"Alive.

"The armies cheered. They believed that she could do anything. They followed her. They besieged the Castle, until they reached the Sanctum.

"I should note that I...did not personally witness what occurred after they left the protective circle of the shrine at the bowels of the Castle. My injuries proved too great, and I collapsed there. The shrine protected me from the malice and monsters. By the time I recovered enough to move, the Great Calamity had ceased. I could only surmise that Her Majesty had been correct. The Sacred Realm, and the Calamitous One, and the mirrors...all of it.

"As far as I know, Her Majesty has been in the Sacred Realm all this time, fighting against the Calamitous One, commanding the armies that she brought with her. But I do not know what has happened in that time intervening. I only know...I learned the truth only years later. But I believe in what I have heard. Please...listen.

"The...mirror that had hung in the Sanctum since the Castle was first constructed, the symbols of the Goddesses upon its face. We considered it an ancient relic of the First Hero and nothing more. Never has its surface reflected more than the world around it. But Her Majesty...

"She believed that the Calamitous One had punctured through the fabric that separated the Sacred Realm from our own mortal world.

"She believed that the Divine Beasts, the guardians, and the shrines all relied upon the power of the Sacred Realm, that our ancient predecessors did not have some grand technology lost over the years. Rather, somehow, they knew how to harness the Sacred Realm.

"She believed that, with the fabric torn, she could make use of that mirror. And she...as far as I understand...was right.

"I did not know everything that had happened until you came. Until you came to Kakariko. I sent one of my own to the Great Plateau to investigate. The poet...the poet Mudora to whom Her Majesty had entrusted everything left letters upon letters in the cabin in the wood upon the Great Plateau. While you travelled to Eldin, I pored over the letters to discover all that which I had not known. Letters from the poet and his son, the former in Faronese, the latter in Tabanch or Necludan. I had read Faronese nor Tabanch neither in years.

"I knew Mudora's son. He visited Kakariko in his time. I remember him mentioning that he had taken on a pupil; then, one day, he ceased to visit at all. I did not know what happened to him until now. Now, I know: the son replaced the father on that lonely vigil in the Plateau.

"I read the poet's words. THe had come to the Castle the moment that the Calamitous One struck and had pledged his life to do whatever he could to aid Her Majesty, whom he idolised so, insofar as I could read from his writings. He swore that he would record everything to the last.

"The poet, in his writings, described the journey to the Sanctum. The poet, in his writings, described the mirror that shone gold upon Her Majesty's touch. The poet, in his writings, spoke of how Her Majesty pleaded with you and the armies to enter the Sacred Realm with her. Her Majesty would take up arms against the Calamitous One. Even without the blessed bloodline, they had you and the sacred sword.

"The poet, in his writings, spoke of how you refused.

"With the sacred sword in hand, you carved through the malice that flooded the Castle. You tore open the quarters where you had slept. And there, you found...

"Well. For that question that you asked so long ago. The malice welled up from the Castle as blood from a mortal wound. From the Castle itself emerged the Calamitous One, as if summoned from another world. Malice, to the very brim. His Highness, and everyone else within the Castle, and almost everyone in the greater castletown—I do not know a single person who survived, though I do not, theoretically, rule out the possibility that someone would have escaped—perished, if not from the Calamitous One emerging from the spire, then from the malice that even now floods the Castle's inner walls. The sleeping chambers...including your quarters, Link.

"I apologise, Link, but...your sister...

"She passed away during the Great Calamity, Link. There was nothing that any of us could do."

Lady Impa falls silent.

For the first time since Lady Impa began to speak, Link gazes down upon her own hands. The hands that carried Aryll from Ordon to the castle. The hands that drew the blade of evil's bane. The hands that promised Aryll that she would be safe within the castle, no matter what happened.

The entire reason that she agreed to become the chosen one. To protect Aryll.

She does not know what happened to everyone in Ordon, but they could have escaped, could have fled, could have run from the monsters, could have seeked shelter from the shrine in Ordona Spring.

Aryll. Aryll, who...

Who died. Twelve years old. Only twelve years old. The entirety of her life. The birds that she loved so. The red telescope that she gave to her older sister the night before they left for Mount Nayru.

If you're going up to the tippity toppest peak of the whole world, you should take it! Maybe you'll see something pretty up there! Maybe like...a big white ice bird. I'd want to see that! If you see it, you could name it after me. The Arylloftwing. See how nice that sounds? I'm the best at naming things. Even falco' says that. You'll take it? You promise! I'm only giving it to you for this one day, because it's special. Promise you'll bring it back. You promised! You promised, so I'm holding you so that! ...can you hug me? I love you too! You're the best big sister I could ask for, too. I know you've got the Princess to worry about, but can you hug me until I go to sleep, please? It's cold without you. Like when we were home! Good night, big sister. I love you. You're...you're the best sister I could...ask for.

She remembers.

The red telescope that she has carried with her on her left hip.

Given to her by Aryll.

Before the expedition to Mount Nayru.

Just for one expedition.

With the promise to return.

The red telescope with its crude etchings of seagulls.
The red telescope.

Lady Impa speaks again.

"When you saw what had happened, Mudora wrote, you turned towards Her Majesty, and you told her that you would personally rip the Calamitous One limb from limb. I do not know how much the poet embellished. The poet recorded the journey to the Sacred Realm, but Her Majesty stopped him from entering the mirror. She asked him to wait with the mirror. If she was wrong, or if somehow she had not researched enough, or if anything were to happen, someone who knew of the events that had transpired could pass on the message.

"They would enter the Sacred Realm, and they would destroy the heart of the Calamitous One at its very source. I do not know the fullness of Her Majesty's plan. I know only what I understood from the poet's writings.

"I know that they failed.

"I know you and Her Majesty confronted the Calamitous One. I know that the sword that seals the darkness had not been enough. I know that in the very moment when the world needed you most, you...faltered. You lost your courage. You feared for your life. And so, you ran away."

The silence falls upon her as the snow over the living and the dead alike: she ran away.

Link feels the laughter that bubbles up. Not from her belly, but from the back of her throat, dry and hollow, like a flame sputtering on its own pile of ash, like a candle drowning in its own pool of wax.

She has spent so much of her life running away that she feels like she could dig her fingers into her palms and make herself sprint faster until she exhausted herself into the darkness. She has only ever run away. From her past, from her responsibilities, from her friends. From that house. From the Calamitous One. From the world.

Of course the blade that evil's bane rejected her. For having run away at the very nadir of the world. She has never heard of a hero failing. She has never heard of a Hero failing. She has never heard of the blade of evil's bane choosing wrong or selecting the wrong Hero.

Yet she has heard of herself running away. Always, always, running away. Even now.

"I know that you attempted to escape through a tear in between the mortal world and the Sacred Realm. I know that Her Majesty knew of the location of the tear. I know that Her Majesty exited the mirror. I know that Her Majesty gave to the poet instructions on what had occurred and instructed him to wait for your return at what Mudora came to call the Shrine of Resurrection, for she was convinced that the tears between the Sacred Realm and mortal plane corresponded to the shrines.

"I know that Her Majesty gave to the poet a telescope and told him to return it to you upon your awakening. I know that Her Majesty, too, told the poet that the sword that seals the darkness had itself disappeared through a tear between the Sacred Realm and the mortal world. I...I do not know how much of what I will tell you next we should believe, but I will tell you nonetheless.

"According to the poet, Her Majesty informed him that the sacred sword had spoken to Her Majesty in the Sacred Realm. The sacred sword had confirmed the Knight could use it to cleanse away the malice, but that the sacred sword now lay without a chosen one to bear its burden. That the sacred sword would now return to await for when the world would have need of it again, as has been its directive. That when the chosen one would once more bear its burden, it would awaken.

"Mudora wrote that the contact with the Calamitous One had left the sacred sword, itself, wounded. The sacred sword would heal to regain its power, and then would again be borne by the Knight. For that, it would return to a sacred grove where lay an activated shrine, and the sacred sword would—from the shrine, which has draw power from the Sacred Realm for thousands of years—recover.

"Her Majesty chose to stay. To fight with her armies against the Calamitous One. She told the poet that she would fight to her last breath. When the portals closed, he would know that she had succeeded, either in wiping away the Calamitous One from this earth, or at least in sealing the Calamitous One away again.

"I...have never heard of the sword that seals the darkness speaking before, except, perhaps, for in the legend of the First Hero. I do not know how much the poet created for the fantasies of his writings. It is difficult to discern the truth amid the art. I cannot verify the truth.

"Her Majesty left the one remaining slate—the slate that Her Majesty had used to take pictographs, but which she had left unoperated since the Great Calamity began—with the poet, to pass on to you. 'Do not use it until the Calamity has passed, or the Calamitous One will take use of it as well. It is the last slate.' She instructed him: when you awakened, you were to use the slate and the sacred sword to wrest back the Divine Beasts, and then, to enter the Sacred Realm and cleanse the Calamitous One if Her Majesty could not.

"She warned Mudora to never divulge the location of the Shrine of Resurrection. She feared that someone could use that tear to find you, to murder, to...to prevent you from returning.

"She believed you would return.

"The poet asked her how she could believe in you when you had run away. She told the poet that she knew you. That she believed in your courage more than she believed even in her own. Whatever had happened had also fallen upon the sacred sword. When the sacred sword would heal, so too would your spirit.

"'Have hope,' Her Majesty advised him. 'Hope is all we have now, and hope is all we must hold onto. It is hope, or it is death. And, for once in my life, I choose hope.'

"And so Mudora waited at the Shrine of Resurrection for years. From my understanding, the poet left to sire children for the sole purpose of passing on the songs of the shrines that he had gathered and for watching over the Shrine of Resurrection. When the poet grew old, he sent for his son, then himself a music teacher who sought to pass on the songs that his father had taught him. His son agreed to take over and left his own protégé—whom he had found abandoned as a fledgeling and raised himself—to pass on the songs of the shrines.

"...as we know, the Calamitous One vanished. The shrines—at least most of them—grew dim and died. I suspect, because of the occasional sightings of monsters even in the time directly after the Great Calamity, that minor teras between our world and the Sacred Realm still existed, even then. But Her Majesty...with her power, with her wisdom, with her courage, with her hope beyond hope, and with the research that we had all forbidden her...saved us all. She gave herself for our sakes'.

"And so passed one hundred years.

"I...suspect that you may have been in the tear between the mortal plane and the Sacred Realm all this time. I confess that I do not entirely understand how this world. Her Majesty confded in you much more than she confided in me, for you listened, but I do not know how much you remember, or understood at all. I do not intend that an insult.

"Several decades ago, the shrines began again to glow. The meagre reports of monsters have risen over the years to what you see now. I fear that the Calamitous One—or something else—is again puncturing through the fabric between the Sacred Realm and our world. The Divine Beasts’ awakening and yours coinciding implies that the Calamitous One achieved some breakthrough that ripped open the tears long closed, which spilled you out into our world at the location that Her Majesty hypothesised you would appear.

"What we call the Shrine of Resurrection, for we knew that one day you would emerge from that tear, if we could believe Her Majesty...is only another shrine, built upon a tear between the Sacred Realm and our own mortal world.

"But...I know little of this. Her Majesty knew much. I only speculate based on what I could salvage from her research, and the research that I myself have done since then. The Calamitous One destroyed many of the archives that she used. Much of the knowledge upon which she relied has been lost.

"I knew none of this at the time of your arrival to Kakariko. When you came to me for the first time with the letter from the Great Plateau, I did not understand, but I accepted what I saw with my own eyes. I knew for myself that the slate could activate the shrines and the Divine Beasts. I suspected that, as the Goddesses had delivered you to my door with the slate, so too could you deliver us from the malice. With that, and with hope in my heart, I sent you to Eldin. And the rest you already know.

"Is there anything else that you wanted to ask me, Link? I will tell you anything. Anything at all."

Link remains quiet.

"You said that you have activated all of the shrines and cleansed the Divine Beasts. Well done. You said, too, that the sacred sword has rejected you. Then, you are correct. You are no longer the chosen hero. You are free to live your life as you please.

"Perhaps the sacred sword has rejected you for your having run away. Perhaps it searches for another. Yet in all of the legends, and all of the stories, there is only ever one Knight, Link. If not you, then...

"Ah, but. You did not come for that. You came to collect the information, and you came to leave. You have done your part in Hyrule already. The Divine Beasts can surely do without you, as you said.

"Now you know, Link.” The violet bracelet on her right wrist jangles against the floor. "Is there anything else that you wish to ask?"

"I have a request. Two requests. Three."

"What are they?"

"I request five apples. I request that my horse be brought to the outside of the village on the southern side. I request a sheet of paper to write my companion a letter, and that that letter be delivered to him and my departure announced several hours after I leave."

"You are leaving without him, and you wish us to only tell him thus long after you have left."
She nods.

Ink and parchment. She barely recalls how to hold the brush in her left hand. From her satchel, she withdraws the Faronese-Central Hyrulean dictionary. Painstakingly she copies the loops from the book onto the paper. Painstakingly she records every word. Painstakingly she traces every letter without knowing the correct order of the strokes, simply emulating the words whole as best she can, like a child learning to write for the first time.

She does not know how to write Kass's name, or even her own. Not in Faronese. She could write him in Akkalan. But somehow. Somehow, somehow, she feels...

She calls him: traveller. She tells him: the final two shrines that he sought have already been activated, one by Her Majesty in the heart of the castle, and the one in the lost woods long since activated, many, many years ago. She tells him: every shrine and every tower in the land once known as Hyrule, activated. She tells him: that he can return to Medli with a warm heart and see again his children and his wife. She tells him: thank-you for having travelled with her for so long. She tells him: good-bye. Then Link folds up the letter. Standing, she bows to Lady Impa.

"Will you be taking the slate?" Lady Impa asks.

Her fingers brush against her chin. "Do you want me to leave it with you?"

"...you may do as you see fit." Link nods back at her. Lady Impa merely closes her eyes. "I do not expect you to forgive me. I hope that you can live out your life, Link, and I hope that you at least understand, if you do not forgive."

Paya presents her with the five apples. Link thanks her as she sets the apples into her satchel. When she turns away, she hears Paya cough into her hand.

"Ma-master Link..."

"I'm not the chosen one, anymore." Link laughs drily. "I ran away. I'm going to run away right now, in fact. It's kind of what I do." She rolls her shoulders. "I've got my own little trifecta: cooking, eating, and running away."

"...you-you're not acting like yourself," Paya whispers. "I don't like..." She shakes her head. "I do-don't know about this prophecy. But...Ma—Li-link. Link. Link. If anyone can...if anyone pull the sword from the stone again, it's you. I know it." She clenches her hands into quivering fists. "I...I just know it. Please...for the Pri-princess. You have to try again. You...please."

Link looks vacantly at her for a long, long time. Then she turns away. "Thank you for the apples. Good-bye."

"Link—!"

At the southern edge of Kakariko, she saddles Ilia. At the southern edge of Kakariko, Ilia whinnies at her. At the southern edge of Kakariko, Ilia shies away from her, and Link can only lower her eyelids and press the heels of her hands into her eyes. She swings her leg over Ilia's back and checks her saddlebags. She breathes, in through her nose and out through her mouth. Then she rides.

South, and south, down the winding path, and from there southeast. Lizalfos and bokoblins and moblins and wolfos and chuchu and keese and leever and like-like and poes and guay and a stray dodongo that belches out fire to burn the swamplands long into the night, the flaming gas rising like a second sunrise over the darkness of the evening sky.
She nears the Ash Swamp. The broken guardians, their eyes pierced through with the blade of evil's bane, in a narrow rise of land dipping into a pool of shallow water. She sets down her cooking pot into the sludge. When she steps into the mud, her boots sink down to her ankles; she reaches down and tug the rims up to keep the boots from sticking in the swamp while she pulls her legs away. The swamp carries the humid scent of decay, of rot, of death.

She taps her cooking pot. Kneading together the dough of a pie shell, she adds extra salt. She peels three of the apples, dusts them in boiled cane sugar, sprinkles cinnamon and nutmeg, covers the filling over with the top of the dough, smooths it out, turns towards the girl with the golden hair's own slate—the one that she has carried since her awakening on the Great Plateau—to ask her if the girl with the golden hair would crimp the pie for her except the girl with the golden hair can't crimp because she ran away.

She bakes apple pie. It tastes of ash.

She sits in the sludge, sensing herself sink into the swamp, the slice of apple pie in her palm tasking tastes of dust, and of silt, and of ash. She remembers nothing. She stares out at the swamp, at the plain, at the ruins of Fort Hateno that she can see just over the horizon.

No: she remembers something.

She does not remember the Sanctum. She does not remember the Sacred Realm. She does not remember the Calamitous One.

She remembers the blade of evil's bane in her hand, the fire-light dying away to a faded white. She remembers turning. She remembers the girl with the golden hair's eyes, the darkness of the pupils swallowing the irises whole, her hand closed around the golden charm she wore at her throat, and she remembers running, and she remembers the tear, ghosted in blue, the shape of a teardrop shimmering before her with its promise of the world she knew, the world that had seen Aryll's passing, the world that she had let down.

She remembers the tear. She remembers the tears. She remembers the running away. She remembers. Not hope, but its reflection. She remembers the vertical scars upon her arms. She remembers that fatigue. She remembers.

She remembers: "When we come back from Mount Nayru, we'll make your favourite."

She remembers: "I promise I'll make it for you."

She remembers: "And I've never broken a promise for a meal before."

She remembers: "You like...being read to? When I was younger, before I was old enough to take an interest in research, I fancied myself a writer of sorts, a poet. I always wanted to write the sort of story that you hear in the songs, of a Princess and a Knight, except...you know! Realistically! So many of those stories lack the basic details of worldbuilding that give you something to sink your teeth into, you know what I mean? Right, food. Like...like a meat pie without any seasoning or salt. You have the pie, and the meat, but where's the pizzazz? So I thought to myself that I would write a proper story. Where the Knight is, well, a person with their own flaws and feelings, and the Princess is more than someone sitting up in a dungeon, and you can truly feel connected to the world! And no magical powers, either. No sudden Goddesses appearing. No, no. We will go by some semblance of realism here. Though...I'll just have to use the Sacred Realm, of course. It's too good to resist, isn't it?

"Maybe one day I can still write it. Though novels are so short. I feel like I wouldn't have time to say everything I want to. A series of novels. An entire epic! Half a million words or even more! Wouldn't that be fun to write? Though...perhaps not as fun to read."

She remembers: "Oh, this is one of my favourites! It was written by a poet here at court, you know. He came to see me one day. He said that he was so startled by my beauty that he was inspired to write a poem about me, although I cannot see how or why...no, that's not the poem I was talking about. This one he wrote about the Kokir Forest! You know, the misty wood in Lake Mekar?

"They say that those who enter without guidance will become stalchildren, forever cursed, until their bones turn to stone, and ogre trees grow from their remains. I thought it scary as a child.

"But that's only a nursery rhyme, I'm sure. Like the tale of the Faery Queen who appears to you if you say her name three times in front of a mirror after doing this or that or the other thing. I tested that one very meticulously as a child and found no evidence whatsoever for it! Hm? No, no, I wasn't doing it because I believed in it! Certainly not! If I believed, I wouldn't have carefully gone through with all of those ridiculous rituals: ice in the chamberpot, a spoon under the pillow, spinning around thrice, rubbing your stomach and patting your head at once in front of the mirror. I did it entirely for research. What's with that smile? Link? Link!

"...actually, this is the first time I've seen you smile so genuinely at me. I'm going to count this as my first victory today. Oh, now who looks flustered? Wh-what? I'm cute when I...?

"...I'm going back to the poem now! That's enough! Ah-hem."

She remembers:

"The woods are lovely, dark and deep,

"but I have promises to keep,

"and paths to walk before I sleep,

"and paths to walk before I sleep."

She remembers that she has promises to keep, and she remembers that she has a promise that she has already broken, that she can never fulfill: when we come back from Mount Nayru.

She remembers that she has paths to walk before she sleeps. She remembers that fatigue.

And she wants nothing more than sleep.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: If you're worried about why it was each aunt that was raised to serve the royal family, as opposed to each mother, it's because Impa and the former "royal shades" were not allowed to have children unless they were dismissed from being royal shades. Thus the lineage usually went matrimonially through the aunt (i.e. the child of one of Impa's siblings, such as Purah). By the way, Impa's family being treated like this is extremely fucked up! And it's not okay or a good thing!

The virtue of the Goddess Hylia is indeed hope. That of Sheik is truth, as I've mentioned before, with nods towards items associated with the sheikah such as the Lens of Truth.

The line about being chained to a rock while a leviathan rises from the depths is a reference a Hyrulean myth regarding a former princess of the zora people who was swallowed up by a great whale-like being (which, of course, is Jabu-Jabu). This myth parallels the real-world myth of Andromeda.

The line about Zelda losing "not only a mother, but also a teacher" is pulled directly from Breath of the Wild.

"We would have to suffer before we could see the Seven" is the concept of suffering in this life so that you can be rewarded afterwards.

The line about Zelda not crying at her mother's funeral is likewise from Breath of the Wild.

Central Hyrule has two coming of age ceremonies: one at twelve, indicating the transition from 'child' to 'adolescent', and one at nineteen, indicating the transition from 'adolescent' to 'adult'. Link's ages in Ocarina of Time are usually given at ten for young Link and seventeen for adult Link, which would in turn make Link in The Wind Waker ten and explains why the coming of age for Hyruleans is seventeen in Breath of the Wild. I decided to age that up by two years, partially as a favour to my childhood self, who thought that the ages of Link in Ocarina of Time were twelve and nineteen.

How much of it is fact and how much of it is fiction? Well, Fi canonically speaking to Zelda and telling Zelda to put Fi in the pedestal of the Great Deku Tree is pulled directly from Breath of the Wild; they even play Fi's theme and sound-effect in-game!

Mudora's son/Kass's mentor found Kass abandoned in Delicious in Wilds and raised him as his own. That's part of why Kass takes the promise so seriously.

The Kokir Forest is another name for the Great Hyrule Forest also known as the lost woods. Children entering the lost woods become stalchildren is a nod to Skull Kid's story.

The Shrine of Resurrection is thus not about resurrection at all, but is a poetic title that Mudora made up. Link was, instead, caught between the Sacred Realm and the mortal world (also known as the realm of will and the realm of blood, but we'll talk about that later) for all that time. I've mentioned the Sacred Realm and the mirrors to the Sacred Realm throughout Delicious in Wilds; go back and read some of the memories from earlier chapters, because I have seeded that Zelda was doing research on this since at least the Parapan arc, and probably far earlier than that. This isn't coming out of nowhere. The Sacred Realm being another world is something that's been a thing throughout the Zelda franchise, from A Link to the Past where Link visits a corrupted version of the Sacred Realm, to Ocarina of Time where Ganondorf enters the Sacred Realm himself although Link does not, to Skyward Sword where Link undergoes trials in the Silent Realms. The concept of the Sacred Realm as a parallel world harkens most closely to its depiction from A Link to the Past. The use of mirrors in relation to the Sacred Realm or the other world in general is seen throughout the franchise, including in A Link to the Past, Twilight Princess, and Four Swords Adventures. So my rewrite of the lore of Breath of the Wild fits perfectly in with previous Zelda titles; it's just that I've taken most of my beats from older titles, notably The Legend of Zelda, The Adventure of Link, and A Link to the Past.

Mudora is indeed the one who wrote that poem, which was adapted from Robert Frost's, as I've mentioned before.

Up next: promises to keep; the lost woods; Link's nadir.

Beta reader's comments: This is one of the saddest chapters in the series, surpassed by only a few (the chapter in which Link learns Marin's fate springs to mind). It's so incredibly gut-wrenching. I had a sense of something awful about to happen the entire time I read this, pretty much the exact opposite of the chapter in which Link rediscovers Ilia.

Chapter Summary

Having realised heard from the wise matriarch that the travelling chef ran away at the hour of Hyrule's need in the Great Calamity, the chef travels to the lost woods once more to atone.

Chapter Notes

Author's notes that didn't fit in the end, again: I started writing this chapter at 18:02 on the ninth of August, and finished writing it on at 13:18 on the tenth of August.

We're really in the home stretch now! And yes, I, too, had a bit of a giggle when I read the chapter number for the first time. Thanks a million to all of the readers: every comment, every bookmark, every kudos, every hit has meant the world to me. Thank you for coming with me on this journey, and thank you for continuing to stick to me. Now we're getting into the thick of it. And thanks a million to my beta reader, even though she and I have taken to proofing at different times instead of the same.

Ezlo Trail is my name for trail through the Minshi Woods, and is in turn a nod towards Ezlo from The Minish Cap, himself a minish mage.

The village of Kashiko is named after the character Kashiko from The Wind Waker, the mother of Baito, who works as a sorterer of letters at the Dragon Roost Island mail centre.

The "pipes playing the wind" are in reference to the Pipes of Awakening from Majora's Mask. Of course, "wind and courage" in general has to do with Farore.

When I refer to Amali's voice, I'm not referring to her literal audible voice; I'm referring to the concept of a writer having a 'voice' in writing, things like that.

West.

She rides west. Scoping the motions of the Divine Beasts with her telescope, she rides to avoid them. Ilia could not outpace a Divine Beast; if one were to try to catch up with her—if the Champions have heard of her departure from Kakariko—she would have no escape. Yet they do not.

The Divine Beasts, as far as she can tell, loop upon routes from city to city, serving as glorified trading vessels, particularly the Divine Beast Vah Medoh, which soars regularly from one corner of the land once known as Hyrule to the other. She notes regular stops near the lost woods. Near what...near what the girl with the golden hair called the Kokir Forest.
Yet she cannot, cannot, cannot see any of the Champions. Not now. Not she, the girl who ran away. She does not know why. She does not understand the speaking of the blade of evil's bane, nor does she understand the nature of this Sacred Realm, nor does she understand what exactly the girl with the golden hair researched. She understands this: for some reason, in the Sacred Realm, she ran away. She has tired of running away.

She has tired.

If not for Ilia’s need to rest, she would not sleep. She moves by the cover of night and spends the days beneath the shadow of trees. The toll this takes on Ilia shakes her hands when she saddles her companion up for the night's ride. She promises Ilia: "This is the last time, girl, that I ever make you do something like this." Ilia responds by nibbling her hair.

She steams vegetables. Selling the monster parts that she gathers, she notices that each monster part fetches far less than it once did as monsters have become more numerous, which in turn brings her to hunt more. She does not buy anything for herself beyond salt, but she still needs to purchase hay and feed for Ilia: the more barren turns of the earth where the snows have melted but the ground lies still and dark yield no grass for her companion to eat.

Around the castletown, the closest to it that she has come, near enough to make out the pools of malice that steam through the ground and collapse the earth into the shape of a cooking pot. The castle itself sits stripped bare of its decorations and its flags, of its auxiliary towers and its gilded paint, down to the slippery material—the same material of the towers and the shrines, of the Divine Beasts and the slate—that comprises the core of the castle, which resembles more a pyramid-like temple. No: a cage. Some sort of cage, now, some sort of prison, rising up above the heart of the land once known as Hyrule, its cruelty matched only by that of the malice contained within.

Instead she removes the saddlebags from Ilia—the bridle and the saddle—and smooths out any identifying marks. Ilia herself, a normal horse as any another, should not draw attention. Or so she prays. She gives Ilia to the stable at the village of Kashiko huddled around a shrine near Pico Pond, turning out her satchel to drop moblin horns and pengator beaks, spume webbing and keese wings, octorok balloons and tektite legs, deku baba roots and daira scales, pikit tongues and pebblit jewels, keeleon fins and bokoblin guts, chuchu jelly and lanmola antennae, kargaroc combs and lizalfos tails, guardian cores and terrorpin shells, goriya skins and hinox nails, talus ore and lynel innards onto the counter of the stablehand who ogles her before quietly agreeing to watch over Ilia until her return.

"If I do not return," says she, "then please...please, I would like you to bring Ilia back home. Here's a map. You would go south here, along the river, then over this place here, and then go here east, and then southeast, until you reach these woods. There you'll find something called Telma Ranch. Can you do this for me? How long? How long would you be willing to wait? How long are all these monster parts worth? I see. Three months. If I have not returned within three months, bring her home. Thank you. Thank you. You don't know how much this means to me. Thank you. Can I make you something in thanks? A meal. What do you like? I can make that. Beef steak with a side of

She leaves a letter for the Champions and instructions to deliver it in one-month's time. In Akkalan, this time, so that she may write freely. She explains briefly to the Champions—to Sidon, to Riju, to Amali, to Yunobo—what Lady Impa explained to her: the likelihood of the existence of the Calamitous One, of the Sacred Realm and the mortal world, of the mirror within the sanctum of the castle, of the monsters and malice emerging from tears between the two, of the hope that the Champions might bring the Divine Beasts into the Sacred Realm to fight against the Calamitous One directly, before the Calamitous One emerges into the mortal world.

She reads the letter. She feels like she should drop her limbs in shock. She feels like she should grasp her head in panic. She feels like she should stare upon her own words in horror and in disbelief: the Sacred Realm, existing; the mirrors as the key; the girl with the golden hair, fighting against the Calamitous One all this time.

Instead she feels nothing at all. Just a letting go. As if she were writing about something that happened in distant lands, something that was written in a far-away book, something that someone spun from story and song. Kass could pen a song about this. The girl with the golden hair could write a story about this. And she...she can scribe this letter, in her loose and weary hand.

Back to the hillside of the province of Rauru. Around Lake Mekar to the west. Across the Elma Knolls. Through Irch Plain. Over the Aldor Foothills. Scaling the summit of Mount Drena. She stands at the peak with her boots in the snow and the wind no longer caressing but blistering what little of her face she has left uncovered. Even that: too much.

She gazes down upon the lost woods with their ever shifting mists. She can hear the minuet that she played upon the ocarina. What Sarie told her of this wood, and what the girl with the golden hair told her of that song: a memory of younger days. A memory of days when she thought she could live without breaking her promises; a memory of days when she bore the sword that seals the darkness upon her back; a memory of days when she longed to travel the world with Aryll, with Marin, with Ilia.

Aryll. Who passed away at the Calamitous One, scarcely twelve years old.

Marin. Who believed until her very dying gasp that she would return to walk with her across the wilds.

Ilia. Who lived a life apart from her. Who calls her, still, her best friend, and yet she has lived one hundred years that she knows nothing at all about, who will not outlast her, who already lives in time borrowed beyond borrowed.

No. Not those memories. She has let the blood seep long from those wounds. Instead, other memories well up to gnaw away at her innards. The memory of the days just before she drew the blade of evil's bane. The memory of the days when she wished to lay herself down by the side of the road, to curl up, to allow herself to rest. The memory of the days of fatigue. Of tiredness. Of exhaustion. Of wanting nothing more than sleep.

She opens the paraglider. The paraglider that the poet and his son died on the Great Plateau to pass onto her, broken in the thunderstorms of the Divine Beast Vah Naboris, healed again by the craftsmen of Nabooru. She opens the paraglider with its wooden supports, with its thin layer of rubber, with its tapestry of topaz, with its symbol of the Goddess Farore. She places her palms against the wooden struts. The right, with its crescent moon scars, the pain of her own awakening.

She opens the paraglider. She inhales. She glides, and the fog takes her, and the woods swallow her alive.

She lands with her boots amongst the ogre trees that face her from every direction, amongst the mist that presses in around her somehow tighter than all of the bodies of the most crowded dip in the city of Darunia. The instant that her heels touch the grass, roots slither up from the soil grasp her as though curling their fingers around her feet to drag her into the earth.

Inhaling, she grips the rims of her boots and jerks her limbs up. The roots of the soil prove stronger than she. She senses their pull down, down into the forest floor, watches herself sink to the ankles, and flails her limbs out from the boots. The coolness of the dirt spreads her toes; the flicker of the grass tickles the pads of her feet. Immediately she begins to shift her weight from foot to foot. As long as she keeps moving, the fingers of the forest have not the time to grasp her as they did the boots.

During her first visit to the lost woods, when Sarie curled their roots around her forefinger, the forest—she thinks—would do the same, but so much more slowly that a simple walk could keep them at bay. Now, however, she has no korok companion, no navigator, no guide. Now the forest comes for her.

She does not know if time, and the people who have come to the lost woods to seek the sword that seals the darkness, have roused the woods to action. She does not know if Sarie, instead, protected her from the fullness of the woods' effects. She does not know if it is something about herself.

She does not know. She knows nothing. She does not even know herself.

She observes her boots vanish into the soil. When she brings her left leg down, the waiting roots dig into the topside of her feet, a sharp pain at the back threatening to puncture through the tendon above her heel. She wrenches back her entire body. The tips of the roots scrap scarlet scars over her skin. The dirt stings in the wounds of her flesh.

She begins to walk. She does not look for the trees. She does not listen for the shifting kaleidoscope of music and laughter, sound and song, that whorls around her as the whorls of violet upon her flesh. Instead: she feels for the wind.

The forest's roots sharpen to bramble and thorn. The woods claw into her heels; the bushes that spring from the earth drag her back; the roots that shift to form hooks in her very path yearn to topple her into the grass so that the fingers of the forest can clench her and take her for their own.

The cold of the mist presses spines of ice into her palms and skewers the bones of her wrists to wrap her veins around in its frigid frost. No matter how she shivers, no matter how she breathes into her hands, no matter how swiftly she leaps up and down in her efforts to warm herself, the chill cuts her to the quick as if phasing entirely through her coat and laying its freezezard eggs just beneath her skin, letting crawl the worms of winter within her flesh, down to the marrow of her bones.

The very fog around her seems to scrape along her skin when she walks, less like a cloud and more like a corporeal something all around her, a thousand tiny teeth, a thousand tiny glass shards. At first she feels little at all, only the lightest sensation of brushing over her flesh. Then the sensation turns to almost that of scratching, and itching, and aching, and then pain. A throbbing, pulpy kind of pain, of pulsating meat.
Like the fog had become a ream of sandpaper or a zora's sharp scales or a grater of cheese against her skin, despite the heavy clothing that she wears. Something like dampness slicks the inner lining of her undergarments and of her gloves. Not sweat. Something else.

As she walks—never stopping, not even for an instant—she removes her gloves. The cool air against her bare skin brings her to wince. She gazes upon herself, upon her palms, upon the reddened rawness of her skin, scraped away layer by layer the longer she has walked. And, too, on her bare feet: not yet bleeding, but raw, as though she had walked too far in wet boots, her skin rubbing endlessly against the leather until it wore her down to the muscle.

It hurts to walk. It hurts to move her limbs. It hurts, and the agony worsens. She cannot tell if the lost woods actually inflict pain upon her or if, as when she attempted to draw the blade of evil's bane, the lost woods merely give her the impression, the illusion of pain.

The rawness of her puffy, sore meat feels very, very real. The redness of her flesh, like a cut of gourmet boar meat, looks very, very real. The droplets of blood that well up with excruciating slowness from her skin taste very, very real.

But she knows that if she ceases to move in the fog, the pain will stop. If she stops walking, the agony will ebb. If she stands still, if she stands absolutely still, if she lies down, if she sleeps, then the slumber will come swift, and she will not have to suffer. And she knows that if she sleeps, then she sleeps forever.

She walks. She walks, and she walks, and she walks. It hurts, and it hurts, and it hurts. She could sleep. It hurts. She has already broken her promises. It hurts. She is only running away yet again. It hurts. Always she has justified her running away. It hurts. Always she has said that she runs to avoid hurting people, to avoid assuming a responsibility she cannot bear, to avoid...to avoid...

Now she does so yet again. She will fulfill her promise, or she will sleep. If she has broken one promise, then she might as well have broken them all. In the end, in the end, all that she can do again is run away, and run away, and run away.

And then, after walking into the fog until her skin has coarsened to crimson, she finds the wind that she sought. She walks into the wind, and the woods change around her.

When first she came to the woods, she did so at the harvest, where the chill of the night descended only to kiss dew onto the gourds of pumpkins and the rinds of cheese. Her favoured season. Now she comes in the ripeness of the spring, where the warmth of life should cut through the fog.

Instead the mist kisses her cheeks, caresses her throat, glides its wispy hands over over her collarbones, finds the ticklish skin at the creases of her elbows and and her knees, traces the line of her spine to the small of her back, maps out the contours of her own life spent running away inked into her skin: her scars.

The woods go to her with a lover's hands. To run gentle fingers through her hair, to chart the wounds down her form with the quietness of concern, to susur over her skin with hands smoothed by affection, to dry her eyes with the pads of thumbs, to settle between the valleys of her knuckles with the tips of fingers, to warm her ears with a cherished breath.

The noises of tumbling blocks of woods and branches rattled against one another, of the pipes playing the wind and the ocarina playing the courage, of the laughter of children far off in the wood and of the dancing of koroks or their ancestors long past and long passed coalesce into a voice that she understands. She cannot comprehend the words, if the voice speaks any words at all.
But she can hear in the wind: the feelings that reach her.

To rest. To sleep. Just for a moment, to close her eyes. Hasn't she done enough? Hasn't she, from the very moment that the people of that house bore her onto the world, suffered under their hands and yet turned around and essentially raised them? Hasn't she cooked for them her entire childhood? Hasn't she been the one to work, first at the ranch and later as a courier, to bring back money for them to live off of? Hasn't she taken care of her own little sister since she was very young, with the money to send her away and bring her back, all the while making sure that her own grandmother did not know of the goings-on of the house? Hasn't she travelled all over the nearby regions of Hyrule, at first on foot, Akkala and Lanayru and Necluda and Central Hyrule and sometimes Eldin and sometimes Faron?

Hasn't she done enough?

Hasn't she come to the castletown? Hasn't she slipped past the guards to draw the sword that seals the darkness from the stone? Hasn't she pleaded for her life against the threat of execution? Hasn't she agreed to take on the burden of the chosen one for her own sister's sake? Hasn't she suffered beneath the endless snapping jaws of the royal swordsmasters who could not understand why the blade of evil's bane had chosen—chosen wrongly—a girl from Ordon? Hasn't she trained with each of the Champions: Urbosa and the sword, Daruk and the axe, Revali and the bow, Mipha and the spear? Hasn't she cooked her way into each of their hearts, and hasn't she found a path to the girl with the golden hair's, and hasn't she even convinced Impa with the pilaf all those years ago? Hasn't she protected the girl with the golden hair with her life countless times? Hasn't she tried her best to swallow down her feelings, to take the brunt of all those who have laughed at her and hurt her and told her that she could not be the chosen one? Hasn't she only ever responded in kindness and with her cooking pot? Hasn't she gone anywhere that she was asked, done anything that she was asked, even at the cost of seeing Marin and seeing Ilia and seeing Aryll?

Hasn't she done enough?

Hasn't she done enough? Hasn't she been beaten over and over to within a millimetre of her life? Hasn't she calmed the Divine Beasts? Hasn't she cleansed the Malice from them? Hasn't she found and convinced pilots? Hasn't she contributed the informant that went on to be the deciding factor in the war against the Yiga? Hasn't she brought together the whole of the land once known as Hyrule? Hasn't she done enough? What more can she do? What more can she give? What more does this world want from her?

Hasn't she done enough?

She could close her eyes. She could rest, just for a moment. She could lie down in the soft grass. She can feel the softness under the pads of her bare feet. She can feel the warm invitation of the earth. She can feel her own weariness swaying her back and forth. She can feel how comfortable it would be. She can feel her knees bending. She can feel her body angling down. She can feel her toes sinking into the soil.

Wouldn't it be so cozy? Wouldn't it be so nice? She can rest. She can let all of the pain that she has endured, and all of the worries of the Great Calamity, and all of the malice that take root in her body, fade away into yesterday's nightmares. She can sleep. Here.

She deserves a rest. She deserves a break. She has done so much. So good. What a good girl. She has done so much, and now she can sleep. Here. She can sleep.

Everything will be all right. Her friends—doesn't she trust them, believe in them, have hope that they will succeed?—will take care of everything. She can rest now. She has done enough. As long as the sun, the moon, and the earth exist, everything will be all right. She can rest here. Here, here, in the boughs of the trees, in the embrace of the earth, in Ilia's arms, in Marin's arms, in Aryll's arms. Rest. Rest. Rest...

Except Aryll is dead.

Except Aryll is dead, and Marin is dead, and Ilia is on the verge of that precipice. Except none of them can embrace her. Except that she is alone in the lost woods, without Sarie, without her companion Ilia, without the sword that seals the darkness.

No.

Not entirely alone. She has the girl with the golden hair's slate. She has Aryll's telescope. She has Marin's ocarina. She has Ilia's whistle. She has Sidon's faith in her abilities, and she has Yunobo's pride in what she can do, and she has Amali's voice telling her how much she means, and she has Riju's kin, where the sky and the earth meet to form the infinite horizon all around her. And she has her cooking pot.

Curling her fingers into her right hand, she digs down into her own flesh. She tears open again the crescent moon scars that have healed over the entirety of winter, from after the harvest to the ripeness of the spring. She breathes in. She breathes out. The pain of her already raw skin pulses over her and dulls her senses. Yet the agony of her own nails ripping into her flesh: a pain as sharp as the blade of evil's bane.

The agony opens her eyes. White and blue. A flower. A silent princess, blooming before her in the fog.

As her gaze focuses upon the flower, she twitches every fibre of her body she can manage. She finds herself prone on the ground, flat on her stomach, the earth already risen to her lips, her legs and arms halfway sunk into the soil. She senses the hands of the forest, its palms of loam and fingers of root, reaching over and around her body, embracing her in a chrysalis of warmth while the woods take her.

She squirms, breathing through her nose; the soil has already swallowed her mouth. She can barely move her arms, and less every second. She cannot reach the slate, nor the sword upon her back. Nor can she bend her legs, nor arch her spine. Yet she can do something: feel the hands of the lost woods soothingly caressing her.

She can close her eyes. She can simply let the woods take her. She knows, she knows more than she has known anything else, that the taking will not hurt her. That she will merely lower her eyelids and curtain darkness over her world. That mild and comforting darkness, that warm and affectionate darkness, that blissful and misty darkness where she will no longer have to remember, will no longer have to suffer, will no longer have to bear the loftwing around her neck. The sword that seals the darkness has rejected her. Why should it choose her again?

Yet. Yet as long as she has blood in her veins and breath in her lungs and her cooking pot upon her back, she has not fulfilled the promise that she made to herself. To eat of every meal of the fruits of Hyrule, to cook every dish, to bear all that is delicious in the wilds. The wilds, and the people who make something of them. For their sake, she cannot give herself to the woods. Not here. Not yet. And the wood, with their painless slumber, would be too easy for her. If something has to take her, then let the Sacred Realm take her. Let the blade of evil's bane inflict upon her every iota of agony that she turned onto the lands once known as Hyrule. Let the pain take her. That might her a hint of all which she deserves.
She forces up her head. Her shoulder blades curve back. The joints of her shoulders throb in pain as she stretches herself out and angles up her face. Pushing her arms deeper into the earth, she jerks her chin free of the soil. She reaches. Her neck burns. The curve of her spine threatens to break entirely. She parts her lips.

She catches the petal of the silent princess on her tongue. Nipping the edge between her teeth, she tugs the bloom closer to herself. She opens wide her mouth and closes it around the flower head of the silent princess.

She chews. The bitterness of the flower, the velvety feeling of the petals as if she swallowed a moth, and the fibres that tangle uncomfortably in her teeth focus her awareness. She starts to rock from side to side.

The once caressing hands of the woods sharpen their fingers to claws that sink into her flesh. She cries out, the sound muffled by the veil of fog, as the wooden nails pierce through the thickness of her coat and splinter into the rawness of her torso underneath. The hands of the woods peel the skin from her sides in long strips that follow the contours of her ribs. Hot wetness dribbles down in their wake until her own blood coats her flesh. She flexes every muscle in her body. The earth forms a solid prison around her limbs, but the earth remains earth, not stone.

Against the serrated roots that wind through the dirt, the fingers of her left hand close around the telescope. Driving the red lens into the soil, she pushes against it and leverages up her left side. The fingers of her right find the slate. She taps at random, to find anything that she might use, and then she simply draws the slate from the pouch to thrust it, as well, into the dirt.

She pushes herself up. Her arms tremble. The roots over her back dig into her skin. Drawing in a shuddering breath, she impales herself on them. Rivulets of warmth thread over her shoulders to pool heat into the small of her back. She arches her spine, gouging out holes in her own flesh on the roots. When she forces herself higher from the soil, she hears the lens of the red telescope screech under the pressure and then shatter.

The roots break. She throws herself up and back. The telescope and the slate remain embedded in the earth as she swings her body backwards, the inertia of the letting go bending up her knees until she kneels in the dirt. She slams her palms into on the ground on either side.

Immediately the roots start rising up and grasping her fingers. She wrenches her wrists about. Jerking her legs up from the dirt, she tears her skin against the hands of the forest that have wrapped around her limbs. Her trousers rip. The chill of the fog on the throbbing heat of her raw meat darkens the corners of her vision. She launches herself backwards, flipping and landing on the balls of her feet upon the soil. Her heels impale themselves directly onto sharp and waiting roots that stab up through the arches of her feet. She nearly topples over again, but she barely catches herself. Instead she steps forward. Gently this time.

The mist cools the sweat clung to her brow. She leans down. Plucking the slate and the telescope up from the soil, she wipes the slate off on her coat before setting it back into its pouch at her right hip. She tries to tap the dirt from the inside of the broken red telescope on the heel of her boot. Then she realises—after a sharp pain to her foot—that she lost her boots long ago.

She sees in the ground before her a thoroughly Link-shaped hole, a burial site perfectly contoured to the form of her body. This is her hole. This hole was made for her. To lie within that hole: the most natural thing that she could picture doing. Like coming home to the softness of her bed after a very, very long day.

The ogre trees fix their gazes upon her. The ground stretches out for her with its gnarled hands of loam and wood. The fog skins her with every step. Yet she has the taste of the silent princess on her tongue, and she walks into the wind.

She walks as rapidly as she dare without forcing down her footfalls. The raw and swollen lobs of flesh at the ends of her legs ooze blood behind her, both from the fog skinning her and from the gouging out of her arches of her feet. She stumbles. She trips. She meets the thorns and brambles on the ground with her palms, her chest, her face. She picks herself up. She keeps going. She walks. She limps. She crawls.

Every step lightnings agony through her leg and up her spine. Every step thunders pain behind her eyelids. Every step screams in the voice of the wind for her to stop. Yet she does not stop. She will never stop. Never ever will she stop, no matter the pain, no matter the hurt, no matter how tightly clenches her heart, no matter if it rips her limb from limb, no matter if it tears out her own innards and she can never eat again.

She walks into the wind, and all at once the air grows warm, and the earth grows soft, and the trees grow green as spring.

She comes upon the pedestal in silence. No guardians—no birds or bunnies—greet her. She walks. Somehow the gentleness of the grass against her wounds brings a greater wave of pain than all of the thorns of the lost woods combined. She looks down upon herself: her clothing ripped and torn, revealing the red and white rawness of her skin. She looks behind her: the trail of scarlet extends in an uneven and sloping path that runs around the periphery of the clearing.

Like the Malice desecrating the bodies of the Champions, she desecrates this sacred place with her blood, with her sins, with her existence. She who failed. She who ran away. She who has died and who has lived again only to throw the land once known as Hyrule entirely away out of her own cowardice, out of her own lack of courage.

She hungers.

She has no water, but she has a bottle of milk in her satchel, from Kashiko, that may yet remain fresh. Drawing the bottle from her satchel, she unscrews the lid. She sniffs. Not quite milk anymore, but neither rotten. The constant bumping of her movements while she journeyed endlessly across the province of Rauru has thickened the milk, at least partially; its liquoring has kept the milk from spoiling. She pours the milk into the cooking pot. Then she rummages through her satchel and the clearing both: one of the two remaining apples of the five that she requested in Kakariko. The pot of honey meant for Cremia. The rock salt for Ilia. The three silent flowers that bloom by the pedestal of the sword that seals the darkness.

She cuts the apple into slices, then quarters the slices and spreads them into the milk. She spoons in honey. If she leaves the woods yet, she will find in the merchants and the markets of the eastern realms of the land once known as Hyrule as much honey as she can fit into her satchel, as she can fit into Ilia's saddlebags, as she can fit into the entirety of a wagon, and she will deliver this all by hand to Romani Ranch. More honey that they'll know what to do with. Honey, and honey yet, and honey never enough. She does not know how much honey helps with Cremia's headaches. For all of the time that she feels like she has spent on Romani Ranch, she has spent only one winter and one week.

But then again: how long did she spend with Yunobo, with Amali, with Riju, with Sidon? A few days? A week?

She gazes into the cooking pot. Apple. Honey. Milk. In these three ingredients, she holds a trifecta of Hyrule in her palm, a trifecta of food.
And the silent princess. Of course, the silent princess. The white and blue. The girl with the golden hair's favoured flower, that blooms only in the wilds, that some believed to have gone entirely extinct except for the few scattered around hidden in the grasses, that she would cradle in her hands, telling her of how botanists and gardeners all over Hyrule have tried so hard to grow the silent princess, but only does the flower thrive in the wilds, and only does its spread its petals in the face of the winds. A symbol, not of Hyrule, but of the girl with the golden hair herself. She sucks a fibre still stuck between her teeth: a symbol that does not taste very good.

But she has never backed down. She would crunch down into a deliciously grilled rock roast if presented to her. The stringy tough bitterness of the silent princess that appears to do little but silence her footfalls may yet prove no match for the one thing in which she will not doubt herself: the preparation of food.

She plucks the silent princesses from around the pedestal and runs her palms over the velvet of the petals. Curling them up, she roasts them over a flame of Kass's flint. She props her chin up on her elbow as she watches over the small fire that chars the blessed grass so close to the pedestal. If the Golden Goddesses look down upon her, then either They laugh, or They make plans to smite her down where she stands. Yet the grass grows here, ripe for her to light and simmer stew.

And she hungers.

She adds the roasted silent princess leaves, petals, and stem to the milk. Then she closes the wooden lid over the pot, leaving it over the fire to simmer. While she waits, she glances at the blade of evil's bane. Resting within the pedestal, its blade the softened white of the flowers, its hilt the violet of the spirals that curl over her skin, its wings quiet on either side like the loftwings, messengers of the Golden Goddesses long, long ago.

She remembers what the girl with the golden hair asked her: "What if you found out that the sword that seals the darkness hadn't chosen you after all?"

She remembers what the girl with the golden hair asked her: "The sword...cannot harm the Calamitous One? I don't understand. Link. Link, where are you...?"

She remembers what the girl with the golden hair asked her: "Link...what am I to you? Why do you treat me so kindly, after all that I have done to you? Am I...am I only the Princess? Must you treat me so kindly, for the destiny on my shoulders? Or would you have...? Would you have treated me like this even without the knowledge of the fate that I bear?"

She remembers what the girl with the golden hair asked her: "Link...I have told you so much about myself, but I barely know anything about you at all, except that you are one of the kindest people I have ever met, and that you like to cook and eat. I haven't opened up to anyone like this in years. I...never realised how alone I felt, until I realised I could be honest with you and Urbosa. Aren't you...don't you...feel alone?"

She remembers what the girl with the golden hair asked her: "Link...could you please...please talk to me?"

She simmers the stew. Not much of a challenge. She lifts up the pot occasionally to check the softness of the ingredients with her knife, to stir the soup around so that nothing burns, to test how it thickens. A dash of rock salt sprinkled in. She sets the lid down again. Not much of a challenge, and yet something to simmering stew that sets it apart from nearly every other dish she has ever made. She stands, and she paces, and she looks over the cooking pot this way and that. Yet she can do nothing but observe the coiling steam escaping from the pot lid and wonder at how the soup will taste.
When the stew finishes simmering, she raises the lid and wafts its vapours towards her nose. She inhales as if she has not breathed in a year. The soup smells divine.

She pumps her fists into the air and laughs a light little laugh at her success. Wiping the drool from her mouth, she lifts up the pot from the flames and puts them out. The curve of the metal with its many layers of breaking and mending and breaking again and mending again and breaking yet again and mending yet again and breaking into quarters and mending into whole warms her lap. She dips her hand into the pot.

She snaps her hand out of the pot.

She puts her bleeding and rawed—and now also burned from the heat of the liquid—hand into her mouth. Her fingers taste of dirt from her earlier time lying in the soil. She swallows loam. She respects Sarie's tastes but cannot agree. Or perhaps she has not tried properly prepared loam. Sarie has said, after all, that she does not know how to cook loam.

Still, she does not wait for the soup to cool. She may not have the courage to do anything useful, but she has the courage to drink stew hot. Taking up the cooking pot in both hands, she raises it to her lips. The rim is so wide that she cannot quite find a place to put her mouth. Nonetheless she perseveres. With the power of her tongue able to withstand even boiling temperatures for the sake of deliciousness, with the wisdom of her trials and errors at finding a spot for her mouth to fit, with the courage of sitting not a pace away from the blade of evil's bane and cooking up the three flowers that for all she knows harbour the Golden Goddesses Themselves, she drinks the cream of silent princess soup.

Delicious. The underlying gilded texture of the liquored milk and the overlying the kick of the rock salt. The wholeness of the honey and the sweetness of the apple. The very particular softness of the simmered silent princess. The very particular taste, not unlike that sense of relief when a weight long placed over the back of one's neck abruptly lifts, or when a pain long throbbing in the chest suddenly ebbs to quiet.

She drains what she can, careful not to let the stew spill over her tunic and waste even a single drop, and then collects in her hand the remainder of the osup pooled at the bottom of the cooking pot, and then withdraws a bun of bread from her satchel to mop up the rest of the stew. It warms her belly and weighs her pleasantly down.

If she has to have a final meal, then this...this would be it. Almost it. One last garnish to add.

She bakes an apple for dessert. Baked apple. The simplest dish in all of Hyrule, and yet the wholdest. She bites in. She has heard said that the first bite of the apple is the best, yet she cannot agree: the last bite, that final morsel, that perfect blend of soft and firm that she cradles in the bowl of her palm, that brings her to close her eyes in the knowledge that this bite shall be the final bite of the baked apple she ever takes, that bite is the best.

Her palms stick with silent princess stew and baked apple juices, the same stew and juices staining the corners of her mouth that she now licks up with her tongue. She pats her cooking pot. "Thank you for everything, my friend." Good pot. Best friend.

She steps forward towards the sword that seals the darkness. Then she stops: first she touches her blue earrings still affixed in the lobes of her ears. Second she unties the blue band holding her hair and re-ties her ponytail. Third she shrugs off the feathered coat, leaving herself in her brown undershirt and blue tunic. Fourth she touches casually the slate, the red telescope with its broken lens, the blue ocarina with its sound weathered by years. Finally she regards the blade of evil's bane as she would regard the cooking pot.
She shrugs. Running her tongue over her lips, she tastes the salt that has gathered there, as well as that on her cheeks. She wipes the salt off onto her palm, then licks it up, inhaling through her nose and exhaling through her mouth. Then she raises an eyebrow at the sword that seals the darkness.

"Hi there. We've met before, you know. My name's Link. I'd offer to cook you a meal, but I don't think that a sword has a mouth. If you do, though, I'd cook for you, blade or no. Just name what you want. No, you don't have to accept me again. I don't expect you to. I just like to cook for everyone. I'd say that there's no quicker way to your heart than through your stomach, but I don't know if you have a heart. Or a stomach. That must be a lonely existence, huh." She rubs the back of her head.

"Not having a stomach. I can't imagine. I'll figure out a way to make you something if I don't end up dying here and now. No biggie, though. I've already died before. A couple of times, probably, if not for the shrines." She touches her chin.

"If I had to make you something...what would I make you. Well, it'd be anything you wanted, for one thing. Anything at all. I could try to make it. If I had to think of something that'd fit you, though...I'd cook up some silent princess dipped in butter and honey with a side of lightly salted acorns. Mmmh. I think you'd like that. I mean, I don't know. You're...a sword. But even a blade's gotta...you know what I mean? No? Right."

She pauses. She sighs. She shrugs. Crouching slightly down, she meets the pommel of the blade of evil's bane at eye level. "You're really long, did you know what? Even like this, your hilt's up to my chest. Most people carry their swords on their hips. That's how I used to carry mine, back when Rusl forged me one, about yea big. But I've had to carry you on my back for so long." She puffs out a breath onto the hilt of the sword that seals the darkness.

"Thanks for the silent princesses. They made a really good stew. All right. Here we go. When I was a kid, I heard that it's too dangerous to go alone into the wilds. For a really long time, I thought that that was just because, you know, monsters and bad weather and eating some mushrooms because you thought that they were the good ones and you were too hungry to check so you end up sick for three days and by the time you crawl home your best friend shakes you up and down and yells at you for how worried she was and then you tell her that you've been sick for three days and she just hugs you and tells you to not let yourself get lead around by your stomach so much. That kind of dangerous.

"But it's a different kind of dangerous. A danger to the heart, you know. When you're left alone too much, even when you're with other people. You get all kinds of scared. And you lose your courage. And you run away.

"I ran away. And...you rejected me. I know that. You probably want to know why I'm back here. I don't really know. I guess if I die, that's all right. I've done enough, I think. And if I die, then at least I'll die with all the pain stuff. If there's anything I deserve for running away, it's that. It's funny. That's kinda how I felt about this way back when I pulled you for the first time. If I die, I die. Maybe that's the thing, huh.

"I still don't really get everything. I don't really know why I ran away. I did, though. Nothing I can do can change that. I just have to look forward. So that's what I'm doing now."

She hesitates. Then she draws nearer to the blade of evil's bane, halfway crab-walking in her shuffle forward onto the pedestal.

"I thought I'd come here and you'd be gone. I think Riju and Yuno-yunobu said that they'd gone through a bunch of people, and you've said no to them all. I don't really get it. There's plenty of people out there. Good people, too. Is there something else? Do you not want to be drawn at all?"

She tilts her head. The sword that seals the darkness offers no answer. She nods as though that means anything. When she rubs her hands together, she feels the lingering stickiness of stew and juice.

"All right, my friend. I still have the last bite of that baked apple. Here. For you."

She lets that last morsel that she did not take fall from the bowl of her palm onto the blade of evil's bane. It slides down, first on the hilt and then over the blade itself, streaking the sword with a glistening line of apple juice. She looks at the bit of baked apple as it drops sadly to the pedestal. And then she bursts out laughing.

"My friend, I hoped you liked that as much as I would've. It's all right if you didn't. I'll make you something someday that you will. No promise." She breathes in. "I want to say something, you know. Like last words. Just in case. But I don't know what words to say. It'll just be me and you knowing it. All right. Let me think. What should I say?"

She rests her left hand against her chin, and then her right, and then both at once. Suddenly she snaps her fingers at the sword that seals the darkness.

"I'm hungry," she says, and then she closes her food-stained hands around the hilt of the blade of evil's bane. And she feels, for the third time in her life, that completely and all-consuming pain.

A dull ache at first, like every bone in her body pulled on just a little too uncomfortably, like every joint stretched just below the point of cracking open, like every sinew and tendon strung out as if she were shooting up seven years of growth all at once. But she exhales, and she gathers herself, and she begins to pull the sword once more from the stone.

She pulls.

The agony worsens.

She can feel the tendons stretched to tearing, the sinews to shearing, the bones to breaking. She can feel the splintering of her blood vessels tautened beyond what pressure they can take. She can feel her innards disentangling from one another, can feel her intestines splitting open to burn through her entrails, can feel her skin swelled out until it begins to first flake and then slough off in great sheets, can feel the unbridled pain of the warm air kissing her raw flesh.

She pulls.

The agony worsens.

She can sense the pressure upon her heart, her arteries wrenched down and her veins up, and she can feel her heart thudding so desperately away even as the forces pull apart her spine to rip it through the line of her back between her shoulder blades, and one more second with her hands upon the hilt will burst her heart, the pain is buckling her knees and darkening her vision and it's everywhere and it's nowhere and it's worse worse worse than the Malice surrounding her to burn away her skin because the Malice coils inside her to dissolve her from the inside out and she is willing to die.

She pulls.

The sword that seals the darkness glides up from the triangular groove upon the pedestal. It sings. It hums warmly beneath her fingertips. It vibrates with its soft blue glow. It resonates with the sound like the laughter of a little girl.
Her hands. The palms curled in violet. Her right crimson with her own blood, her left spiralled in the gold of the lightning strike. Her hands, holding the sacred sword, the blessed blade.

The sword that seals the darkness.

The blade of evil's bane.

The Master Sword.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: I had a lot of fun coming up with just how the lost woods would be more hostile to someone coming in without a korok companion. The woods literally trying to take you, and the sandpaper-like fog, were part of my consideration of why the lost woods would be so terrifying. The sandpaper-like fog is, I swear, a reference to something from a previous _Zelda_ game, but I cannot for the life of me remember what in the world I was referencing right now. Some kind of fog effect that drains your health?

Link hearing that it's too dangerous to go alone is a reference to the memetic phrase from the beginning of _The Legend of Zelda_. If you didn't think that I would somehow reference that in a novelisation this long, you were wrong. And yes, I think I managed to fit in references to other prime memes as well, but I only wanted to use them if I could make them fit naturally, rather than force them for the sake of being memes.

There's a lot I could say about this chapter. Let me just begin with Link's characterisation from the previous one: she has spent so long coming to terms with the person she was, because she has had the biggest shoes to fill. She has spent her time trying to rise up to the _hero_ that people thought she was, someone who was courageous above all else, someone whom Zelda, Daruk, Revali, Urbosa, and Mipha all trusted. Yet now Link has heard that, in fact, Link _ran away_ at the moment of 危机. Instead of Link trying to fill in the shoes of the hero, it turns out that Link might have done something truly irredeemable, something that descended all of Hyrule into chaos. Well...we'll find out yet what actually happened during the Great Calamity.
Naturally, I set up the story in such a way that Link would genuinely only gradually come to understand the truth of the past, instead of _Breath of the Wild_ where Link appears unfazed and doesn't do much actual figuring-out of the past beyond the memories. That was necessary to avoid a linear game. Yet _Delicious in Wilds_ is not open world.

So, the question is: why did the Master Sword choose Link _this_ time, and not _that_ time? If you're curious, you could go consider the differences between the two pullings, but we'll be answering that question explicitly a few chapters down the line.
It's probably not what you think it is, and it's definitely not what Link thinks it is, because it's not something beneficial. There's indeed a reason that the Master Sword only now picked Link at her nadir. This wasn't just me wasting nine chapters of your time and then handing the Master Sword to Link on a silver platter; rather it has everything to do with how I have made the Master Sword in the world of Delicious in Wilds. The Master Sword chooses a hero, and the Master Sword uses very specific criteria to do so.

Of course, the ending to this chapter is almost identical to the ending from the sixty-first chapter, in the sense that Link is going through the same thing, just as during Breath of the Wild you slowly lose life upon trying to pull the Master Sword. Since Link of Delicious in Wilds doesn't have heart containers (if you want to see what an implementation of heart containers looks like, consider reading my other fic, adrift, which goes for a more 1980s swords 'n' sorcery style of magic and utilises the game mechanics down to being able to find hearts by cutting down grass), I decided that it would instead be a test of willpower. The criteria that the Master Sword uses to determine whom the Master Sword will choose were inspired directly by this test that happens in Breath of the Wild. I'm not sure if the Breath of the Wild team intended to have such implications, but I grabbed it and ran with it. After all, you lose hearts: that means pain, and you have to be willing to just keep pulling. The Great Deku Tree even warns Link in-game that Link will die if Link is unable to handle it. So then, what is the Master Sword looking for? Someone who can withstand the pain, true, and someone who has the strength not to die. But what else?

Up next: a talking tree; the Master Sword; gather 'round kids because it's time for an infodump!

Beta reader's comments: The way that the author portrays the Lost Woods is super cool. It creates this atmosphere of absolute desperation.

That absolute desperation really is what permeates this chapter, and it works super well. It's such a weird tone (in a good way) for Link to be pulling the Master Sword to - not triumphant, but resigned, in a way.

Chapter Summary

The Master Sword has once more chosen the travelling chef. Now the chef learns of the history of the Calamitous One, from someone who knew the man the Calamitous One once was.

Chapter Notes

To all my readers: since the sixty-ninth chapter was meant to be "yesterday's" chapter, here's "today's" chapter. Enjoy! Also, my sincerest thank you and patience to all of you, for the scrolling that you're about to do!

As usual, author's notes that wouldn't fit in the end: I started writing this chapter at 15:55 on the tenth of August, and finished writing it on at 01:05 on the eleventh of August.

Hestu's cry of kooloo limpah is a nod towards Tingle of The Wind Waker.

The differences between the 'not activated' and 'activated' forms of the Master Sword are taken from Skyward Sword, where you forge the Master Sword but only activate Fi’s true power in the end.

The koroks referring to hylians as 'these hylia things' is in reference to the fact that hylians were known as the Hylia in A Link to the Past.

The korok who asks Link to make them food is based on Walton, who does the "Riddle of Hyrule" quest in Breath of the Wild; in the quest, Link presents Walton with: an apple, a fortified pumpkin, a sunshroom, a voltfin trout, and a lynel hoof. And, indeed, if you check the ingredients for the salt-grilled fish that Link makes for Walton in this chapter, you'll notice that those are the same ingredients (minus the lynel hoof) that I used in this recipe! Plus salt, because Link loves salt.

Hey, I think that this is the first time that anyone properly refers to it as the Triforce. I've mentioned the words Golden Force before, but never its proper term, the Triforce.

We'll see the phrase Realm of Blood come back, and so I won't comment on it here.

The whole idea of "your body does not truly exist [in the Sacred Realm]. It is only how your mind shapes yourself that exists there" was inspired by A Link to the Past, where people who do not possess the Moon Pearl from the Tower of Hera take on their 'true forms' in the Dark World (the corrupted Sacred Realm); Link, who is pure of heart, takes on the form of a pink rabbit; and by Skyward Sword, where Link essentially "astral projects" into the Silent Realms (part of the Sacred Realm), leaving behind the mortal body and taking on a body that is representative of the spirit in-game. In Delicious in Wilds, entering the Sacred Realm is somewhat similar to Skyward Sword. You exist in both the Sacred Realm and the mortal realm at once, but the laws of physics don't apply in the Sacred Realm. You keep yourself together by force of will alone. As long as you have the will to live, you can be immortal. But, if you leave again into the mortal world, and some part of your body is messed up, you'll probably lose a limb or perhaps die, because the laws of physics take over again. You can't just get by on determination.

Incidentally, you should check out hestusgift.tumblr.com; please make sure to turn your volume down before you do (and warning for many things moving at once, in case that could cause issues with epilepsy/etc).

There are exactly eight-hundred-ninety-nine (899) "Yahaha!"s in the opening of the chapter. Why 899? Because Sarie isn't in the forest, of course! But all of the other koroks are, because people other than Link have sure found many of them over the one hundred years. Thanks for scrolling all the way through that very long opening, and thanks a million for all of the support that you all have given me all this time; thanks a million, too, if you ever tried to read Delicious in Wilds and then quit.

I've mentioned before how monsters, unlike people, will continue to attack long after a normal person would have fled to regroup. This is because monsters intrinsically do not have an understanding of death. They think that they'll just pull themselves back together through willpower, because the monsters are natively from the Sacred Realm.

Only mortals being able to use the Triforce is directly pulled from Skyward Sword.

The gift of friendship that Hestu gives Link is, well, Hestu's gift in Delicious in Wilds, which is a golden piece of poop. I found 892 of the korok seeds myself and only caved in on the last eight. I did this back in March/April, before the DLC that introduced the Korok Mask was revealed, so I literally combed all of Hyrule on foot by myself for over five hundred hours collecting most of the korok seeds in-game. Then I gave up, sat down with a map, and figured out where were the eight I was missing. When I finally turned in all nine hundred seeds to Hestu, and he presented me with a piece of poop, I literally slid from my chair and just lay on the floor laughing my ass off. That was better than anything I could have expected for my efforts. I found the korok hunt extremely fun and rewarding by itself, because it let me explore the world around me, which I personally find neat. Thank you, Nintendo.

"Shakalah! Linky-link, you found us! Are you going to set Hestu on fire again? Kooloo limpah!"

A chorus that sounds like eighty hundred and ninety-nine "Yahaha!" at once, with a single "Shakalah!"

The veil lifts. The fog gives way. Link stands on top of the pedestal where once rested the Master Sword that she now holds in her hands, its violet wings spread from the pommel, its blade glowing a soft fire-light blue.

The air has grown warmer, and clearer, and greener. Grass. Flowers of yellow and white. And all around her: koroks.

More koroks than Link has ever seen or heard of in her entire life put together. Koroks of every shade and wood imaginable, of different sizes and shapes, with leafy masks of yellow or red or orange or brown or every hue of green under the sun and some that have never seen the sun, half of them resting on the ground around her, the other half twirling through the air, and all of them bounding looking towards her. Some of them vanish suddenly into the trees. Not ogre trees. Normal trees, their boughs of leaves inviting her to rest beneath them, to climb up to their crowns and swing her feet out for a while, to lean back and close her eyes. Normal grasses. The clearing brightly lit. The sun visible. The sky visible. The clouds visible overhead. She cranes her neck up to make out the sheer vibrancy of the blue skies overhead. The middle of the day.

Although she landed in the lost woods in the midst of the night, here, now, Link observes the sun a hair past its zenith, just beginning to sink.

And there, in front of her: Hestu. Hestu with their maracas, which they shake up and down in time to their dance. "Shakalah!" they cry out, dancing ever closer to Link in undulations that would seem almost threatening if Link did not already know them. "And looky-look! Grandpa wants to meet you too! Say hi-hi hello-hello!" Hestu points behind Link. "Turny-turny 'round! Hestu's told Grandpa all about you!"

Still gripping the Master Sword very tightly in her left hand, Link swivels around on her heel. She raises her right arm to greet: a tree.

A tree so large and wide that if she were to lie down upon the ground, it would take five or six of her head-to-toe to make out the tree's diameter across. Taller than all of the trees around it, reaching up to the highest peak of the forest canopy, its massive height only offset by the relative dip in the earth in which it sits. Its branches bloom bright with blossoms of cherry as pink as hearty salmon, the petals wavering in the warm spring breeze.

"Well met, Hero, Chosen by the Goddesses," the tree says. Link nods. Very slowly. The rawness of her palms hurts around the hilt of the Master Sword. The blood that she has trailed into the clearing on her bloodied feet loops around in drunken spirals. The cooking pot where she made a messy stew of silent princess and baked an apple lies, half-forgotten, in the grass a pace away. The charred patch where she made her firepit remains blackened to ash, the one spot of grey against a world of gold and green that sings with the winds of the Goddess Farore, with the moisture of the Goddess Nayru, with the warmth of the Goddess Din, with the light of the Golden Goddesses.

Her entire body hurts.

Even if pulling the Master Sword from the stone did not, in fact, rip her heart clean from her body, the damage done by the lost woods has remained. The bottoms of her feet blister where the grasses beneath her heels poke into the raw gouges left behind. Her flesh continues to pulse under the absence of the layer of skin stripped off by the fog. The red telescope with its broken lens hangs uselessly at her left hip.

Link stares at the tree. The tree gazes levelly back. She nods, even more slowly, then, blinking, steps back. The tree speaks. She nods a third time, even most slowly.

She awakens to a slapping of a wooden ruler against her cheek. Not a wooden ruler: a korok's arm, bapping her cheek repeatedly to some sort of rhythm. Link attempts to shift away from the korok only to feel another bopping along her stomach, and a third on the back of her left knee.

At least three koroks. Four. All crowded around her, from what she can tell through the thin slits of her eyes. The sky above her. No trees. No, wait, yes trees. All around her, although she can see their tops that drop away to the ground far beneath her. A tree. She lies upon the crown of a tree in a nest of leaves. Link rolls slightly over, not enough to disturb the koroks at their play, to confirm herself on a bed of soft leaves, her belongings in a pile about two paces away. Several of the koroks go through her things; she notes with some relief that—unlike the lizalfos from two years ago—none of the koroks has pulled her undergarments over their head.

Indeed, Link still has on her clothing, no matter how torn and bloodied that clothing may be. Well, Amali might have words to say about that.

Her hands wrap in something like bandages, made of some sort of stringy material—plant fibres or leaves—and the same with her feet and most of her torso. She can move her fingers. Her skin no longer hurts. Link senses something like a salve or sap between the bandages and her skin. Medicinal salve. The koroks must have taken care of them.

The koroks. The koroks, who whisper amongst themselves in a language that she should not be able to understand, yet she can hear in her left ear a whisper: some manner of translation. A whisper in a voice that she has heard before, that speaks from everywhere and nowhere at once, cool and warm at the same time, melodious even in its prose.

"These hylia things are funny looking!"

"I doesn't think this bit is any good for drumming! This bit is better!"

"Why are we drumming on it anyway?"

"Because we're supposed to drum on it! Look, it's got that kind of fabric-y-fabric that makes the boing boing sounds! It's gotta be a drum!"

"But it took the sharpy out...drums can't take the sharpy out..."

"Have you ever seen anyone else take the sharpy out?"

"No...the sharpy's never come out...not since it got putted-put in again..."

"So how do you know drum can't take it out!"

"Only a thing with hands can take it out!"

"I know, and this thingy is a drum! No one said that drums can't have hands."

"But I've never seen a drum with hands..."

"You're looking at one right now! See! It has hands and it's a drum."

"But I thought drums couldn't take out the sharpy..."

"Well this one did. You can't argue against something that really did happen!"

"...oh. You're right..."

A new voice bursts in, a higher pitch than the rest; a sudden thud onto her upper belly doofs the breath from her lungs. Cracking upon one eye, Link peers at the korok presently standing atop her stomach, their torso dark greyish-brown, their light green leaf mask looking too big for their body, a pair of berry bushels in its tiny hands, the round berries red and ripe enough to rumble her stomach.

"Stooop! It's out of hibernation! It's out of hibernation! That's meeeeeanaaahs that I get to ask it to do the big important thing!"
"The big important thing? What's the big important thing?"

"Nyuuu it's a super secret mission Hestu gave me personally! Juuust to me! So that makes it special! Hylia! Hylia! You there, hylia person! Hello. Hello. Do you not speak korok? Do you not?" The korok bounces up and down on her stomach, addressing her legs rather than her head. When her knees, predictably, do not give a response, the korok leans down. They grip her legs and try to shake them into awakening.

Link starts to sit up. The korok papping her cheek shouts out, tumbling off of her. The koroks slapping at her stomach and the back of her knee leap away as well; frantically they wave at the korok currently endeavouring to oust answers from her knees.

Her neck cricks uncomfortably. Leaves stick in her mussed and messy hair. Link tries to brush her fingers through the matted and twisted strands that clump to her head. Diagonally across her back, from her left shoulder to her right hip, a stretch of her body feels sore to aching. When she reaches back her left hand, Link's wrist bumps against something over her shoulder. She turns her head: a violet hilt with wings extended.

Her breath catches. She closes her eyes, counts to ten on her fingers, realises that she skipped the number six, goes back, counts to ten on her fingers again and more properly this time, and opens her eyes again. The sword that seals the darkness, the blade of evil's bane, the Master Sword remains upon her back. She closes her fingers around the hilt. Link feels a sheath now strapped to her back, different and distinct from the sheath that Riju gave her alongside the straight sword. A sword that she no longer needs.

Link draws the Master Sword. The blade glows its soft fire-light blue. She ogles it. It stares back in its own way, and she can almost sense a thread of amusement resonating through the hilt.

The korok on her stomach continues to yell at her kneecaps and bristle the berry branches eagerly in their direction. She cannot understand the korok's words, their tongue of crinkling leaves and shaking blocks, the translating voice having disappeared without a trace. Yet in that moment, she does not care.

Link leaps to her feet. The bed of leaves on which she lay while fainted rustles about her in a susurrus that cascades from the crown of the tree. The koroks cry out. She holds the Master Sword with in hands. The bandages make her palms slippery, and so she clings to the blade with pressure alone.

The Master Sword. Glowing with its soft fire-light blue. Humming her very bones with its resonance. The Master Sword. Having chosen her again.

Somehow, somehow, hope beyond hope, even though she knew with the fullness of her being that the Master Sword would never choose her again, despite that she ran away all those years ago from the Calamitous One and the girl with the golden hair and everyone in the land of Hyrule, despite that she disappointed and betrayed them all, despite that she fled out of cowardice at the moment Hyrule needed her—

—the Master Sword has chosen her.

Two years ago, kneeling on a cushion in Lady Impa's home, Link wanted nothing more than to give up everything of her past. Now, two years later, she sees, in the reflection of her face upon the blade of the Master Sword, the chance to atone. The chance to take back her life.

She gazes upon her face. Brown hair frames her features. A slightly downwards sloping nose sticks crookedly—broken one too many times, every shatter healing not-quite-right—beneath her eyes, her lashes thick and dark. A scarlet droplet of a scar beneath her left eye. Vertical lines dug in down her cheeks. A diagonal mark from just to the right of the corner of her right eye to her jawbone. Her bottom lip and upper chin a mess of criss-crossed tissue like trails marked over a map, like a forest with the space between each tree drawn in. A pockmark of malice upon her right cheek. Scars over her brow and across her jawline. The lick of violet at her throat, the same colour as the sash that Marin once wore around her hips.

She inhales. Two years ago, when she gazed at herself for what—to her—felt like the first time, she saw a face mostly unblemished, skin smooth, brow uncreased. Link does not know if the relative lack of scars came from a lack of danger from before the Great Calamity, or from a greater purvey of skills that she has since lost or not regained. Or perhaps from her time in the Sacred Realm healed her scars, somehow, but that cannot be true either: Link has retained at least some scars from before her century-long slumber.

And now, long after that slumber ended, her face tells the battles that she has lost and the battles that she has won, the places she has seen and the paths she has walked. Even with a hood and a coat to cover up the majority of her body, her scars still draw her attention, the last thing that she ever needs. But, scars or no, Link can still make funny faces at herself in the reflection of the Master Sword.

Once she poked her tongue out enough, once she has scrunched up her nose enough, once she has sent the koroks laughing at her enough, she rests the Master Sword in her lap. Link signs, awkwardly, just with her right hand: "Welcome back my friend,"

She hugs the Master Sword to her body. Curling herself up around it, she presses her left cheek against the pommel, her ear against the hilt. She listens to its musical hum. Link can—almost—make out a voice in that hum, a voice that says: "Welcome home."

"Hello!" The voice of the translator in her left ear again. A bat of wood against her nose. She recoils back to find the korok with the leafy mask far too large for their miniscule body slapping her with the berry-bush branches. Link wrinkles her nose and sniffs. "Hello hello, hylia thing! Hello hylia thingy! I have a request for you! I have a biiiiig request! Won't you do me for me? Grandpa said I could get you to do it for me and Hestu's told me aaaaallllll about you!"

Link sheathes the Master Sword. Some part of her considers this little more than a dream. She will awaken to find herself entangled in the roots of the lost woods. For now, she nods. "What do you want me to do?"

The korok paps her on the forehead. "Ohohoho wowie wow wow I guess hylia things can't talk! That's funny! What's all this?" The korok starts to emulate the motions of the hand. Link touches her chin, then tries to say hello in every single language that she can think of, and a few that she simply makes up on the spot in her efforts to communicate. The korok laughs and whirls around. "Hylia things are funny! Hestu says that hylia things know how to make foody-food for our tummy-tum!" Link tilts her head; do tree people have stomachs? She supposes, if the virtue of the Goddess Kokir is joy, then they must. A people without stomachs, to her, would necessarily be a people without joy. "Hylia thing, come! Come!"

At least whatever miracle she hears in her left ear continues to translate the rustling of leaves. Link follows behind the korok while they twirl through the air towards a small leafy patch on the other side of the crown of the tree. The korok begins to rummage through a pile of leaves. Standing on her tip toes, Link cranes her head to peer over the korok's shoulder. Abruptly something small, red, and firm flies towards her head; only her impeccable sense of food allows her to throw her hand forward to catch it. She peeks at her palm. An apple.

The korok begins to fly every manner of foodstuff at her: a handful of spicy peppers that leaves her face aflame; an armoured porgy fwipping around in her hand; a bushel of electric safflina that whacks her across the face; a razorshroom which leaves a second cut under her left eye around the same place as the first; a voltfruit sticking into her tunic by means of the prickles for which she has never been grateful before and likely never will again; a voltfin trout that she—her arms full—unwittingly attempts to catch in her teeth only for the electricity to shock her into nearly dropping everything, forcing her to dive down onto the crown of tree to catch the still-flopping fish; a sunshroom which serves as a heating pad for her face as she attempts to balance it on her nose with the voltfin trout trying its best to writhe out of her mouth; and an entire fortified pumpkin that cracks open against her nose and knocks her flat on her back.

The korok whirls towards her. While Link desperately attempts to collect all of the food in her arms, the korok starts to toss several of the ingredients back, until Link sits upon the crown of the tree with an apple, a pumpkin, a sunshroom, and a voltfin trout.

"Make these yum-yum for me, hylia thing!" the korok demands. "These are the finest from my collection of shiny shiny pretty pretty tasty tasty yummy yummy crunchy crunchy! Hestu said that you can make something yum-yum from them! Make it yum-yum!"

Link rubs the back of her head. The voltfin trout shocks her again, and she puts it out of its misery with a flick of her knife. Stretching behind her shoulder for her cooking pot, she realises that—having lain on her back in the bed leaves—she has no cooking pot. Not in her pile of belongings, either, although she grabs her things and throws them onto her shoulders before continuing.

The telescope, broken in the lost woods, gives her pause. She examines the shattered lens and the inner workings caked with soil. Link exhales. When she returns from this haven of koroks, she will surely have to repair the telescope, one way or another. Just as with the cooking pot, and with the paraglider, and with herself.

Right: the cooking pot. Pacing around the crown of the tree, Link spots it still sitting by the charred patch of grass near the pedestal. The korok following behind her inquires of what in the world she is doing. With a flicking-open of her paraglider, Link steps off of the crown of the tree and glides downwards towards the pedestal where waited the Master Sword before the Master Sword chose her again.

The Master Sword, currently sheathed on her back. Link beams. No, more than that. Grinning, she pumps her fists into the air and lets out a whoop so loud that the koroks vanish into the underbrush. She ehehes sheepishly.

Settling herself in front of the pedestal, Link considers the ingredients before her. Apple, pumpkin, sunshroom, fish. Fish stuffed with pumpkin and sunshroom and served with baked apples. Not the first thing that she could imagine, surely, but good enough. She nods to herself, contemplating as she brushes her hand against her chin, and pulls out a bit of rock salt with which to grill the fish.

She pours in oil from the flask in her satchel, then digs up the ashes of her previous firepit. Link would cut up the fish fillet as best she can with a couple of leaves and her knife, except the voltfin trout that the korok has given her proves too long for the knife to comfortably cut. She touches her chin, and then she unsheathes the Master Sword, calling upon it for its truest purpose: cooking.

Link fillets the fish. She minces sunshroom and carves pumpkin. First she fries the pumpkin and fungi, using the Master Sword to flip the ingredients in the pot about where her knife proves too short to reach. She prepares to sprinkle salt over the fillet before she tosses them into the oil. Suddenly she stops.

She stares at the rock salt sitting in her palm. Link glances furtively left and right. No Ilia the horse to steal the rock salt from under her nose. No Ilia the hylian girl to tell her that she should absolutely not shove a piece of rock salt down her gullet. No one to stop her.

Link cups a hand over the rock salt to hide it from herself. She brings it up to her lips. A lick: salty. A kiss: quite salty. A shoving it down her gullet: so salty that her eyes water and she chokes around the rock. She spits it back out into her hand. Licking her lips, she bleghs out her tongue.

She has cravings for salt, but this. Too much salt. Too much. She never thought in her life that she would say something tasted too salty, but the world has a particular way of surprising her at every twist and turn. The Golden Goddesses have a very particular sense of humour, after all.

While she rubs her tongue on her palm to try to rid herself of the taste of salt, Link hears a voice behind her. Speaking in Akkalan.

"...Hero, Chosen by the Goddesses," rumbles the voice, "it is time for us to speak, both of the burden that you carry, and of the sword upon your back."

Ever so slowly, Link turns around on her heel, her salt-fuzzied tongue stuck out of her mouth, the Master Sword in her left hand dripping with the trout's juices. She stares. The tree. The tree with the face. The tree with the face that gazes—kindly, if a tree could gaze kindly?—down upon her with her sacrilege of the Master Sword.

"When last I spoke to one of your kind...my forefather before me granted me to the soon-crowned Queen of the original kingdom that would come to be known as Hyrule, the family that lived long before the ancestors of the Princess you seek came to inhabit the Castle, who carried me across the great seas to this land. She tasked me, like my forefather before me, with preserving the koroks, whom the Goddesses deemed undeserving of the suffering of years of passing, and so granted them an eternal childhood."

Link blinks. Her stomach rumbles. She tries not to squirm; rather she focuses her attention on holding the Master Sword in her hand while the tree speaks.

"As I grew and spread myself to protect the koroks, I came to understand the nature of this Realm of Blood, and the nature of the Sacred Realm. Long, long ago, the pedestal that you see before you was constructed, and I planted, at a sanctuary where the Sacred Realm and our world grow close. I believe that the only point in this land closer to the Sacred Realm lies within the very heart of what is now the Castle, from which once the force of the Sacred Realm flowed over this land before the Sacred Realm was sealed away. The inhabitants learned to engineer marvels that drew upon the force of the Sacred Realm, marvels so resilient that still many of them exist, though many more remain buried beneath the soil. Even the Castle of which you know was constructed from the top floor of what was once a great tower that channeled a portal to the Sacred Realm..."

Link nods sagely. She breathes in through her nose, which proves a fatal mistake: the fragrance of the salt-grilled fish and the baking apples wafts towards her, drawing her gaze down towards the pot. She tries to snap her head back up, attempts to focus on the talking tree.

"...I have seen many things in my time. A war that tore open Hyrule for years, a war of mechanical marvels. I have seen Hyrule's splintered factions of revolutions struggling for dominion, seeking to conquer the throne. I have seen royal family attempting to quell them. And I have seen no concern for the people of these lands. The war of which I speak nearly led to the destruction of this land and all who dwell within."

She has also seen many things in her time. Such as the cooking pot with the grilling fish, which she most definitely is not looking at.

"The Calamitous One of which you speak was once a man, a man as human as yourself, a man who sought to use the Golden Force granted by the Goddesses, but who could not contain the force held within that light. The man was a powerful mage, a wise scholar, and a courageous helper of the people who believed that he desired to help Hyrule. He himself had contributed to the building of the mechanical marvels powered by the Sacred Realm, and he witnessed in horror how the machines meant to help turned to instruments of war. For that reason, he sought the Golden Force."

As Link now definitely does not seek the cooking pot. Except when she smells a hint of burning.

"He wished for the royal family that then ruled the land to give way, for the royal family in those days had fallen under the spell of the crown's might. Long after the establishment of Hyrule, the royal family devolved into tyranny. The man wished for something to put an end to that war, for something that could unify the warring factions of Hyrule and bring her people together.

"The man came to the Golden Force with the best of intentions. When he made his wish, the Golden Force looked deep into his heart of hearts and did not find a true wish as pure as the one that he had set out to make. Although the man had thought himself desirous of peace for Hyrule, the Golden Force found in his heart a call for power great enough that the man himself would take over the land; the Golden Force discovered that the man's truest and most honest desire was to put an end to the fighting and unify Hyrule to rebuild it in his own image. The Golden Force has no choice but to answer his wish."

Just as Link has no choice but to answer her fish. She crouches down beside the cooking pot and leverages the Master Sword—wincing all the way—to flip the voltfin trout onto the other side until the fillets grill evenly.

"In doing so, the Golden Force transformed him into the Calamitous One of which you speak, indeed with power enough for the man to take over the land and rebuild Hyrule in his own image. As his wish desired, the existence of the Calamitous One put an end to the war by bringing together all of Hyrule against the Great Calamity that had arisen.

"To seal the Calamitous One away, those gifted with the understanding of the Sacred Realm and the knowledge of manipulating its magic gave their own lives, contributing their life-forces to sustain the seal. So many gave themselves on that fateful day to complete the seal.

"In those chaotic times, during the long war against the Calamitous One, there came a family of hylians who called themselves reincarnations of Hylia, said to descend from the mortal Hylia that aided the First Hero far before my time. The sacred sword that had been given to me for safekeeping was drawn by the Knight of Hylia, whom the sword had chosen. Sacred sword in hand, the hero completed the sealing."

Glancing up from the fish, the Master Sword still stuck in the cooking pot, Link attempts to nod so show that she has absolutely listened the entire way through, even if she can only comprehend bits and pieces. She thinks she grasps the meaning, much like she longs to grasp the fish from the cooking pot.

"They knew that the seal would hold for ten thousand years. In the time intervening, they prepared for the eventuality of the Calamitous One's escape by determining where the Sacred Realm and the Realm of Blood intersected. Upon those points, they built what you call shrines, to teach the people ten thousand years from them of what might one day occur and to prepare them for the unsealing of the man you call the Calamitous One.

"They left behind instructions in song and in shrines, hoping that something would reach beyond the veil of time. The royal family carried the sacred sword with them. I do not know, entirely, where the sword has lain in the time intervening.

"I do know that, until one hundred years ago, when She Herself returned to me through the Sacred Realm, She had not had contact with the Golden Force for ten thousand years. And so, when you drew Her, Her powers were drained. I hope that you will forgive Her."

Link bobs her head in understanding. That, she can and will forgive. For going ten thousand years without a scrap of food would surely prompt her to run off of the nearest cliff a hundredfold in the hope beyond hope that some bowl of warm rice might apparate in the reaches below while she falls.

"Nor had the man that you know as the Calamitous One spent these ten thousand years in vain. As an engineer, he understood the mechanical marvels; as a scholar of magic, he knew about the connections between the Sacred Realm and our world. During those ten thousand years, as the seal began to fade, he realised that these knowledges were long lost to the people of Hyrule.

"The Golden Force left him a force of nature, able to neither reason nor think, yet the knowledge that he had as a man remained with him. Thus, comprehending without comprehension the ignorance of the people of Hyrule who no longer know of the Sacred Realm, the man you call the Calamitous One devised his plan, as a hawk instinctively devises the ambush of the field mouse. Unopposed could he control the...

Despite herself, Link senses herself blinking. She rubs her eyes. Although she tries not to yawn, the tears of tiredness spring to her eyes.

She hears the tree chuckle. "I see that you have little interest in matters of thousands upon thousands of years ago. I understand. I do not begrudge you. These things hold little relevance to you, no matter how weighty they feel for me, who has lived for more years than there are koroks in these woods. Before you go, as you must, allow me to impart on you some words of wisdom, and thereafter a recipe that may help you."

Link perks up. She glances up at the tree with her eyes wide and her smile wider, facing them with her full attention, and the tree chuckles again.

"Then, listen well...

"The Golden Force...the Triforce...was given to us by the Golden Goddesses. Only a mortal—and not any of the Goddesses—can wield its magic, yet the magic it possesses is nearly infinite. But be careful, for the Triforce will look into your heart to feel what you truly wish for. If you do not know what you truly wish for, then do not touch the Golden Force at all."

For a moment the tree remains silent. Link starts to form a question on her fingers, intent on interrogating the tree for the recipe. Then she notices something of a strain in the tree's face, as much as a wooden face can show strain. Her arms fall to her sides. The tree speaks again.

"Years upon years ago, I assisted the man that would become the Great Calamity, for I judged him—and he judged himself—as having the intention to aid. Do not become the next Calamity. That is all I may ask of you."
She shudders.

"The Sacred Realm is a strange world, and the Golden Force will test you. Prepare yourself, Hero Chosen by the Goddesses.

"In the Sacred Realm, there is no death. But be warned: your body does not truly exist there. It is only how your mind shapes yourself that exists. If you die without dying within the Sacred Realm, and you do not know how to piece your body back together through your willpower alone, then you may remain indefinitely alive within the Sacred Realm. Yet, when you emerge, and the laws of the Goddesses once more take hold of your form, you shall perish more likely than not. If you do suffer injury, or if you do lose control of your form, I do not recommend that you attempt to return to the Realm of Blood."

Link tries to wrap her mind around the concept. Like a knead of dough. Like...gathering the borders of her essence after the times that she has nearly died. Batter might pour over a countertop and spill onto the floor, but thickened dough can retain its shape. Link need thicken herself, thicken her willpower, thicken her determination. She kneads herself.

She needs herself.

"...and for that matter, all beings in the Sacred Realm do not perish. For this reasons, the beings you call monsters are not afraid of death, for they do not understand such a concept, being born of the Sacred Realm.

"As for the recipe that may help you..." Link leans in, her mouth watering. "...at the base of my trunk grow truffles that strengthen the heart and bolster the spirit. They will, once cooked, allow you to regain strength otherwise lost by wound and even to temporarily surpass yourself in fitness and alertness, dulling your pain and increasing your natural resilience to harm. Take with you as many as you wish. It is the least that I may do.

"I would wish you luck, but you do not need luck. You have the ability within you. You have the power, the wisdom, and the courage...and you have a full stomach, do you not?"

She nods.

"Then go, with my blessing, and know that the Golden Goddesses watch over you." The tree cannot exhale or sigh without lungs, yet Link can see how visibly they relax all of themself at once. Their branches rustle in the wind. A single petal of pink ripples through the air, spiralling in patterns that resemble the marks of the Goddesses.

As she has raised her hand to catch the starlight so many times, so now, too, does she lift her arm. Her left. The golden spirals over the violet. The lightning-strike scar. She cups her fingers. The petal alights in the curve of her palm. Pink. Soft. Smooth. Like paper not yet dipped in ink. A blank canvas on which to write.

Link tucks the petal behind her left ear. The tree gazes upon her. She looks up at the tree.

"The sword that you carry has not regained the fullness of Her power; She has long not been in contact with the Sacred Realm, and one hundred years has not sufficed. Treat Her gently. Yet when you need Her most, She will be there. I can see...that you have already made Her acquaintance again, after all." Link's face warms as she contemplates the fish-dipped sword that seals the darkness, the apple-juice-soaked blade of evil's bane, the Master Sword now a master spatula she grips in her lightning-strike hand. But the tree, as much as a tree can appear kind, merely continues to gaze upon her. "This, I promise."
The tree is quiet. She has just started to peek at the cooking pot when the tree rumbles again. "Now go."

The tree closes their eyes as best a tree can. Link bows to the tree in thanks, clasps her hands in gratitude, kneels in prayer. Everything that has happened here has not yet come to her. When she emerges from the forest, when she sees again normalcy, when she gazes into the eyes of friends and strangers alike, then it will come.

For now Link turns. For now she feels the sword that seals the darkness strapped to her shoulder, the blade of evil's bane bound to her back, the Master Sword with her, always with her.

For now she spends forward to begin the walk of the remainder of her life. For now she stops. For now she glances back over her shoulder. For now her glance falls upon the cooking pot and its salt-grilled voltfin trout. For now she returns to the tree, plopping herself in front of the cooking pot and polishing off the fish. For now she belches and licks up the excess salt and residue from her hands. For now she hears the korok clap their little hands and thank her for making the meal. For now she washes out the cooking pot in the sacred waters by the base of the tree's trunk.

For now she thanks the tree, and thanks the koroks, and thanks Hestu most of all, and tells them that if she returns, she will make Hestu some proper loam now that she knows how to do so, now that Sarie has taught her. For now she explains to Hestu what means if and not when. For now Hestu insists that she dance with them, and they dance together until she tires. For now she makes Hestu and—when the other koroks burst in with their demands—loam, as taught her by Sarie. For now Hestu, beaming, presents her with a gift of friendship, a peculiarly smelling golden something-or-other that she does not question but concernedly stuffs into an empty elixir vial which she corks very tightly. For now she curls up to sleep again in the crown of the tree. For now she awakens. For now she tells the koroks and the tree see you later. For now she braces herself to face reality.

For now she walks out of the clearing with the wind at her back.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: The Great Deku Tree's forefather is the Deku Tree from _The Wind Waker_, and the Queen of Hyrule is Tetra. So, this chapter pretty much confirms what I've already said about where _Delicious in Wilds_ falls on the _Zelda_ timeline, which I don't otherwise believe in at all. I mostly just wanted to spin a timeline out of the desire to have an actual constructed past on which to worldbuild. _Delicious in Wilds_ follows in the timeline of _The Wind Waker_, following _Phantom Hourglass_ and _Spirit Tracks_, so the 'Hyrule' of _Delicious in Wilds_ is in fact New Hyrule from _Spirit Tracks_, rather than the original Hyrule from the time of _Ocarina of Time_. That said, I have written the story in such a way that all previous Zelda games occur 'before' it in the sense that their stories are recorded as myths and legends. The world did not happen as it occurred in each of the games; rather, the games are (one version of) the _legends of Zelda_ that have been passed down through story and song.
To that end, the tower that channeled a portal to the Sacred Realm is in reference to the Tower of Spirits from Spirit Tracks. Most of the tower has been sunk into the earth, but the top floor remains. In Spirit Tracks, the so-called "Force" (that's what it's called in-game, using the same word as the Light Force from The Minish Cap) of the spirits is used to construct the titular train rails and the trains themselves. Since the spirits naturally seemed similar to the Sacred Realm, I took this feat of engineering and ran with it: if the people of New Hyrule were able to construct trains that work on the force of the Sacred Realm, then why not also create guardians and eventually Divine Beasts? It made sense to me that the same engineers-of-spirit-stuff who could make trains that run on 'spirit juice' would likewise be able to eventually figure out how to make automata that run on the same energy of the Sacred Realm. That's part of why I picked the world of Spirit Tracks as the natural predecessor for Delicious in Wilds. The other parts are that (1) there's rock salt everywhere, which implies that there was once an ocean covering Hyrule and thus the Great Sea; (2) the game features koroks and rito, which are only in the timeline of The Wind Waker; and (3) the map of Hyrule in Breath of the Wild reminds me of the map of Spirit Tracks, with snowy mountains to the northwest, volcano to the northeast, fishing villages and ocean to the southeast, and a central grassy area with the castle and the castletown. About the only major difference is that the desert has been moved over from the east to the (south)western corner. The layout is otherwise pretty similar! I could conceivably imagine how the world of Spirit Tracks could turn into the world of Breath of the Wild over more than ten thousand years.

I also wanted to create a backstory for Calamity Ganon, which literally isn't given in Breath of the Wild. How did Ganondorf turn into that? We just don't know. I decided that I would provide something of a cautionary tale. The road to hell is paved with good intentions. Ganondorf, in Delicious in Wilds, thought that he wanted to help Hyrule. But the Triforce grants whatever most honest and true wish you have.

It bothers me that there's absolutely no explanation about how Calamity Ganon in Breath of the Wild knew how to hack/take control of the guardians the Divine Beasts. In Delicious in Wilds, Ganondorf was one of the engineers who helped to build and programme them, so of course he would know how to hack them.

Remember the sensation of the boundaries of Link's body dissipating away that I've mentioned a few times in relation to the shrines, which by the way draw on the power of the Sacred Realm? Yep! That's the Sacred Realm, where being together relies on your willpower. I'm running out of space here so I'll talk about how the shrines heal in another author's notes.

Up next: another reunion, and this one triumphant; messing with the Master Sword; Amali finally fulfilling her promise of showing Link how to make cannoli.

Beta reader's comments: Yahaha! Yahaha! Yahaha! Yahaha! Yahaha! Yahaha!

Something that I learned recently is that the author individually typed out every last one of the 899 Yahaha!'s. That is something I have endless respect for.

The koroks are really funny and really interesting, and interacting with them is a joy, and a really cool change of pace.

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef reunites with the Lanayrish prince and the Tabanch housewife, offends the Master Sword, and begins the trip back to Medli.

Chapter Notes

A very brief author's note that did not fit in the end: I started writing this chapter at 06:01 on the eleventh of August, and finished writing it on at 22:01 on the eleventh of August.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

She expects: stepping out of the lost woods, the Master Sword disappearing, disappointment again.

She expects: seeing again Yunobo and Riju or whichever Champions oversee the pulling of the sword from the stone; Sarie not understanding what has happened; Aryll's death all for senseless naught.

She does not expect: the Master Sword's fire-light blue dying down to a softened white, its hum and its resonance fading away under her very fingertips, until she carries nothing but an off-white blade within the sheath.

At the edge of the lost woods, Link draws the sword that seals the darkness from its sheath and examines its length between her hands. It does not vibrate warmly in response to her touch. Squatting in the grass, she sets the blade of evil's bane onto her lap across her thighs. She raises her arms.

"I don't really understand why you chose me again. Why not the first time, but the second time? And why not any of those other people who've tried to pull you out?" she asks of the Master Sword, which remains still and silent across her thighs, her eyes visible in the reflection from the blade. "Was it really the meal I promised? I would've done that whether you chose me, you know. You can still unchoose me. Want me to go put you back?"

The Master Sword has no reply.

Slowly rising to her feet, she sheathes the Master Sword again. She glances down at the tattered remains of her clothing, most of it caked in a combination of blood and soil. Link lifts up the hem of her tunic to sniff it. The pungence of mud, sweat, and dried blood that has festered for over a day greets her with a thread of revulsion in the pit of her stomach.

Although she drops the tunic back and smooths it over her torso, she cannot rid her mind of the stench that haunts her as she crosses the periphery of the Kokir Forest, as the trees thin, as she steps out from the woods and the sword that seals the darkness remains upon her back. And then she hears the yelling panic of the encampment set up around the entrance to the woods.
Link does not need long to determine why: all around the perimeter of the camp with its raised barbed wire fences she can see a horde of bokoblins, lizalfos, and moblins alongside a select few other monsters—octoroks, snap dragons, wolfois, helmasaur, dodongo, one or two lynel that by themselves could raze an entire village if they so chose—that rush the defences of the camp. She observes how the warriors who protect the camp move in unison with one another, the fence alive with the sparking of topaz, catapults prepared on oil and ruby shards to set the monsters aflame, archers upon watchtowers unloading into the monsters.

A sudden blaze of fire-light from behind her brings Link to turn around; she stares at the Divine Beast Vah Medoh opening its beak to scour the earth with its light and blowing away entire swathes of monsters into the lake on the gales of its wings.

And there—standing in the lake that surrounds the lost woods—the Divine Beast Vah Ruta that pulls in water at a dizzying pace, blasting monsters with a torrential flow strong enough to crush their bodies against the ground, ejecting great blocks of ice into their surprisingly fragile forms, and lifting up its trunk to serve as an extendable spout of fire-light, more focused than that of the Divine Beast Vah Medoh yet smaller in diameter. But just as deadly, disintegrating all those monsters that it comes across.

They have it covered, between the guards who give it their all, and the two Divine Beasts that assist with the full force of the Sacred Realm. Link joins in the fight nonetheless, the Master Sword in hand, the blade of evil's bane once more baneing evil. To the startled cries of the guards, Link clammers up one of the watchtowers, gets an arrow loosed just under her left collarbone for terrifying the archer, opens her paraglider, and swings out into the monstrous horde that seeks to attack the camp.

She positions herself high in the air above above a white-maned lynel, notching topaz arrows to its bow and loosing them skyward to electrocute the warriors who guard the encampment with their lives. Link drops the paraglider. She grips the Master Sword. She hurtles towards the ground headfirst.

The tip of the sword that seals the darkness connects with the crown of the lynel's head. The blade of evil's bane comes alive in its light, the same colour as the bluest Parapan sky that she has ever seen. Like fire-light weapons effortlessly cleaving through nearly any material, the Master Sword slips into the lynel more easily than a warmed knife through a stick of half-melted goat butter.

As it bisects the lynel in half, its energies dust the lynel's body to ashes. Link lands on her boots in that ashen pile, the Master Sword driven into the muddy dirt, the lynel having vanished from this world.

She glances at the Master Sword, its hilt again softened to white. Link looks around herself: a silver moblin snarling at her from the north; a band of tektites leaping menacingly at her from the east; a shelled pyrup arfing at her as it arches its back and breathing flame from the south; and tell-tale lantern of a scythed poe dancing before her vision from the north.

All at once. All at her, rushing her down to destroy her, their eyes glinted in that violent violet, that tyrant tyrian, that colour of the malice that she, too, has inked into her body.

Link grins at them. She waves. Extending her arm, she swings around upon her heel, the Master Sword a circular blur around her that flashes in blue lightning just before it connects to a monster's flesh.

She dives in. Link carves a path through the monsters, reaches the periphery of the horde, and then whirls around to carve back in. She shrugs off her injuries. A spear jammed in her right shoulder by a bokoblin soon departed from this earth breaks in half when a cloud of keese swarms into her. A bite of a pengator around her bare ankle leaves her limping. A moblin's fist into her face crooks her nose yet again in a shower of blood before she thrusts back, vaporising the monster with a single application of the greatest remedy known to the people of the land once known as Hyrule: a dose of the Master Sword.

She dances with dodongos, weaves around wizzrobes, flips over fire toadpoli, spins around skulltula, winks at winder. The Master Sword has not simply become a blade in her hand, but an extension of herself; she senses its tip like she senses her own fingers. Her body remembers the steps even if her mind does not. Her body remembers the shape, the length, the weight of the blade even if her heart does not. Her body remembers how to spear through armos’ statue-like heads as she might spear a prime cut of boar meat frying in oil, how to pry in half pebblits as she might pry open a clam for chowder, how to cut the stems of peahats as she might cut the stems of radishes or carrots, how to gut dinolfos as she might gut a porgy in preparation for Kass's dinner, how to skin hrok as she might skin a pigeon caught in the field and stuff in an ice-box to make pilaf later, even if her stomach does not remember.

Except her stomach does remember. If her mind does not, and if her heart does not, then her stomach sure remembers.

When at last the hordes thin to a few stragglers continuing to throw themselves against the topaz fence only for their limbs to spasm and their bodies to charr into crisps, Link hears the guards' horns.

The electricity of the fence dies. The gates open. Warriors wielding axe and spear pour onto the battlefield, dispatching the last few monsters. She snaps her fingers: to avoid exhausting the topaz.

Link staggers back towards the encampment, an arrow protruding from her left collarbone and half of a spear sticking out from her right shoulder. Her clothing has become little but scraps clinging to her skin, covering her though offering little protection. She waves. An archer on a watchtower takes aim at her before his fellow touches his shoulder and shakes his head.

Sheathing the Master Sword, she gives it a thankful pat on the hilt. "Good girl," she says, as she might sign to Ilia. She snorts out laughter to herself. Link fishes the ocarina from her satchel—she need find a better place for it—and brings it to her lips.

She plays the Ballad of the Sealing War upon the ocarina. The notes fall flat; the rhythm runs away from her as she ran away one hundred years ago. As she will not run away now. She holds up her lightning-strike left hand in the curved-finger gesture for all rightness, and she breathes in, and she lets out a whoop.

Link sways on her feet. Boy, the ground feels a little cold, and her stomach feels a little empty.

Guards usher her inside. They inquire of her a thousand questions, none of which she actually processes. Instead Link tells them that she's hungry, and what do they have for her, and she'll take almost anything, and she would take fried mushrooms and roasted nuts and freshly baked bread and ooh ooh do they have any rice she loves rice the best thing since cooked rice and simmered fruit and salt-grilled greens and she's so hungry she could eat an octorok.

The healers of the camp take a look at her. Not a few minutes after they have stripped away the bandages covering her body and notice the medicinal golden sap that coats her like a second skin, their eyes widening as they take in the sight of the violet marks over Link's form, do Sidon and Amali burst into the room, Amali guiding Sidon towards Link on the bed, a plate of fried trout skewers balanced in her free hand, a bowl of seaweed-tucked rice-balls balanced in his.
Link tears up. Gripping one of Amali's wings and one of Sidon's hands, she draws them both together into a hug. Her saviours. She snags the fish skewers and rice-balls and wolf them down.

Sidon began to grin the moment that she made noise and has not stopped grinning since, the polish of his teeth outshining even the glow of the Master Sword. While he beams at Link, Amali chastises her for having gotten herself hurt yet again and how many tunics is Link going to run through and why won't Link take care of herself and a thanks to Link for helping out with defending the outpost and Amali can't believe that the first time that she sees Link again after all these months Link is nearly passed out with a spear sticking out of her shoulder and her entire body covered in wounds and Amali is so, so, so, so unbearably proud of Link for coming back and drawing the Master Sword.

"Even if you had not been able to draw it, you have already tried. I've already been so proud of you. If you hadn't been able to draw blade of evil's bane this time, either, then I'd still be proud of you, Link," she signs; Link peers at her with three rice-balls and half a sizzled fish shoved into her mouth. "I...I have so many questions to ask you. I don't even know where to begin. I suppose this all...this all feels like a dream." She smiles tiredly and warmly at once. "If it is, then I'm glad to have gotten to see you in it, Link."

Link would answer if not for the delicious food currently occupying her hands and mouth. Once Sidon's translator finishes whispering Amali's words into his ear, Sidon grins even more broadly than before and scoops Link up into his arms to whirl her around while she continues to scarf down rice-balls and fish at a dizzying pace.

Sidon squeezes her tightly. Although she starts to choke on a rice-ball, link simply flings her arms around Sidon, hugging him back. Hastily, Amali separates the two long enough for Link to push the rice-ball out of her throat. It shoots into the air. Sidon snatches the rice-ball between his teeth, leaving Link to snap her fingers, whistle appreciatively, and clap wildly while he strikes a pose.

"Our Link! I do feel most awful for saying these words, but I have faith have you will be most forgiving!" He gathers her up into his arms again, this time more gently so that she does not strangle herself on the food meant to lift her mood and accelerate her healing. His right arm supports her about the shoulders, while his left does a strange crooked loop to support her hips and upper thighs.

"I am...I am most overjoyed that it is you, our Link, whom the sword that seals the darkness has chosen! This is most fortuitous, most wonderful, most miraculous! I understand much of your fears and worries around the blessed blade that has chosen you!" Sidon begins to nod; Link has to squirm herself out of the way of the violent banging of his head to avoid cracking their skulls together.

"I most understand your fears, for I felt the same fears when you met me! As you taught me most well that I am capable with my own hands, so, too, are you, our Link! I mean that entirely and completely sincerely, Link! But of course, I do not mean to say I would have been disappointed had She not chosen you!

"As expected of me, I can hear myself jamming my tail into my mouth! I hope that you can forgive me! What I meant to say is..."

His voice quiets for a moment from its usual fervour as he finds her right hand, currently wielding a rice-ball on its way to her mouth, and cups her fingers in his palm. Sidon brings down his head again, his movement bearing a deliberate slowness. Closing her eyes, Link senses his forehead against hers, the slight abrasion of his scaly skin nonexistent compared to the expanse of warmth in her chest.
"...if anyone in the entirety of Hyrule had to be the one chosen by the sword that seals the darkness, I'm glad that that person was you, Link."

Link hugs him, her arms around his shoulders. The rice-ball falls from her grip; she paws weakly at the air after it. Chuckling affectionately, Amali catches the rice-ball and returns it to Link, who expresses her gratitude—she hopes—with the sheer joy in her expression.

She rolls the rice-ball around on her tongue. That fishy, salty, tangy taste, all layered under the heavenly texture and palette of steamed rice. She swallows. She wipes her mouth. Rubbing her hands against one another to rid her palms of food residue, Link leans into Sidon's embrace.

Then she looks down at Amali and up at Sidon. Stretching her left arm, Link closes her fingers around the hilt of the Master Sword. She pulls it into her lap, its hilt the same violet as the sash that Marin once wore around her hips, its blade a softened white. She raises an eyebrow at Amali and touches the hilt to the side of her throat where whorls of the same hue of violet spiral over her skin. "See? It matches now."

Amali shakes her head. "You might be an adult, but sometimes you act just like my other daughters." Link blinks as she processes the implications. "Not...that you're treating it as a game anymore. I think that you've grown up so much over these months since we first met, and yet you haven't lost that spark in your heart that makes you so Link-like. And...I suppose that you've helped me regain mine. Thank you."

Link starts to form a response on her fingers when the friend hugging her gives a shout.

"Link!" Sidon cuts in, the sudden loudness of his voice making her jump, the simultaneous warmth and tenderness vibrating his timbre relaxing her down in his embrace as he leans over her. "I do not mean to alarm you! And you are most welcome to decline! But by our Goddess, could I try to hold the sword that seals the darkness!?"

She nods, then claps her own palm onto her forehead. Link retrieves her right arm from having been wedged between her body and Sidon's. She signs the but of course! in Sidon-like fashion into—she can't reach his hands, which currently support her—his throat and chest, writing out the characters in the Lanayrish she knows so well. Link holds out the Master Sword to him. Without letting her go, Sidon stretches out his hands and grasps the Master Sword by the hilt.

She braces herself, yet the blade of evil's bane does not smite them where they stand, nor does he spontaneously combust into flames. Sidon gingerly palms the Master Sword, though it more resembles a master butter knife in his remarkably large hand—imposing, if not for his being shaped like a friend—and gives it an experimental swing. The Master Sword does not alight in blue, nor hum in response. It remains merely a blade, and nothing more.

"As expected of the most holy weapon in all of Hyrule! In the hands of any but the chosen hero that She has chosen, She becomes nothing more than a sword, sharp as any other! Yet in the hands of the chosen hero, She is the sword that seals the darkness: the Master Sword! Most marvelous!" He beams at her. She beams back even though he cannot see.

When Sidon hands back Link the Master Sword, she notices that the wings extend out from the hilt before her very eyes. She blinks. She gives the Master Sword to him and observes how the wings fold inwards to the hilt, how the golden gem set into the pommel fades to dullness, and how the triangular mark of Golden Goddesses—three golden triangles, arranged together—that shimmers in white upon the blade vanishes to nothing.

Link takes the blade of evil's bane back: the wings extend; the gem glows; the mark shimmers.
With a light little laugh, she passes it between herself and Sidon to watch the Master Sword dance between the two forms, like the blooming and closing of a flower bud, over and over. Amali's pupils dart back and forth. The feathers on her face have risen in concern, and she has brought her wings to her face. "Link, Sidon, I don't suppose you should..."

She continues to pass the Master Sword between her hand and Sidon's until she notices—abruptly—that the Master Sword no longer extends its wings when she touches the hilt. Tilting her head to the side, Link stares at the pommel for a long moment.

Suddenly the Master Sword flashes fire-light. Amali and Link flinch back at once. The Master Sword drops from her hold and clatters to the floor while Sidon, twitching his head towards the noise, inquires what has happened.

Link ogles the Master Sword now lying innocently upon the ground. "Is...is it mad at me?"

Sidon lets her down. Dropping to the floor, she crouches beside the blade of evil's bane, which she cautiously takes into her hands. The gem on the pommel hums a faint gold as if to look at her, and then the Master Sword unfurls in her grasp. She exhaled in relief.

The healers force Link to spend several hours patiently seated in place, tolerating them poking and prodding her, mending her of her various injuries, or at least applying medicinal salve—she recognises the revolutionary chuchu jelly salve that Mipha distilled before the Great Calamity, from the blue chuhu that thrive in abundance in the moist lands of Lanayru—and wrapping her in gauze. Once she can move her right shoulder without pain, and once they have had enough of her pleas to let her run around and somersault and, of course, eat, the healers discharge her at the Champions' behest.

Link asks earnestly how they have been. Before Sidon has even opened his mouth, Amali has seized her shoulders, shaken her, and released her to inquire how Kass has been. While the room whirls around her, Link briefly charts their journey from autumn through winter to spring. She leaves out the more dangerous elements, although she solemnly swears to herself that she will tell Amali the full story after she has had a chance to see her beloved husband again. When she mentions seeing Ilia again, Sidon and Amali attempt to squish her simultaneously into two different hugs so swiftly that they bonk their heads together.

They catch her up on how life has been since then. The Champions have been switching off between duties of ferrying travellers, flushing out the few remaining pockets of Yiga, and overseeing the trial of the Master Sword. Yet said Master Sword chose no one. At least, not until Link.

Halfway through their discussion, Link notices a thin scar down Sidon's right arm, one that she hasn't seen prior, and not a mark left by the Malice they fought: the violet whorls that decorate Sidon's chest have to them a different look. Immediately Amali launches into a tirade of Sidon's willingness to recklessly throw himself into whatever situations might protect others, how he lunged between Amali and a crimson daira, taking a throwing-axe to the arm. Amali wings do not stop at that: and how many times has his newfound creed of bluntness lead to awkward situations she has had to defuse, and how many times has his enthusiasm brought him to accidentally thwap some dignified Eldic elder or Tabanch chief?

But, despite all of this, she notes her pride in how much he has accomplished for his people, and how far his cooking skills have come since he first asked her for assistance in learning. Link sniffs, wiping a tear from her eyes at that last statement. Truly, she could think of nothing to be prouder of. As Amali goes on and on, Sidon's translator whispering in his ear and he himself swinging his head-tail back and forth, Link can do little but giggle at Amali—over half a century younger than Sidon—acting like his mother.

In turn Sidon remarks on Amali’s revelation at having been a star plunger in her youth. “A plunger?” Link echoes. While Amali covers her beak with her wings, Sidon heartily elaborates on the Tabanch pastime of plunging off of a landing and playing a game of cucco, seeing who will remain plunged the longest before spreading their wings to escape slamming into the lake. Or, for the more irresponsible, solid ground.

"It reminded me much of our Ruto’s own most spectacular sport of diving!” He thumps Amali heartily on the back. She hangs her head. "Although I must be honest and declare plunging much more dangerous! I could never plunge myself, as I have too many people who depend upon me and who would suffer if I were to injure myself most needlessly!” His hand flies to his jaw. "Not that I think poorly of you for it! That is not what I meant to say!"

"I suppose that you are more responsible for your years than I was. Though remember what we talked about, as far as that’s concerned." Amali coughs into her wing. "As for the plunging, it’s...well, it’s something I...did when I was younger, when my...life wasn’t something I valued." Link nearly feels her expression falling blank, yet she breaks through it; extending her arm, she squeezes Amali’s hand, and Amali smiles warmly back. "Oh, you don’t need to worry about me. That was years ago. I haven’t spoken to my parents since then—" Link’s hands drop to her lap. "—and I would never do such a thing now, not with my daughters—and Sidon, and the rest—to think about."

"By which," Sidon bursts in, "she means to say that she views you as one of her own, our Link!"

But Link’s mouth doesn’t quite smile as much as she expected. Amali’s eyes glimmer with a light like the dawn. "Sidon, if you wouldn’t mind, then we could talk of something else. Such as the rice-balls you has taught me, that you taught him, Link."

It takes Link several minutes of excitedly waxing poetic on the deliciousness of rice-balls to realise how skillfully Amali diverted her thoughts. Yet she realises, too, something else: that the clenching of her heart came from her worry after Amali, and not from any power certain people from her past might hold over her yet.

After all, why would they? Link has a home and a family right here, right now, a family like a medley of instruments not intended to be played together, but making a melody more euphonious than any she has ever heard.

Eventually their talk turns to her wielding the Master Sword. Link suggests that they should wait for everyone else: "I don't want to discuss this ourselves. Riju and Yunobo are just as important," she signs. "And they're my friends."

"But of course! We'll call everyone for a meeting!” Sidon urges; Amali nods in agreement. "This is of utmost importance!"

Link tries to smile. For a second she can sense the thread of an all-too-familiar fear coil up in her innards like a tapeworm capable of stealing her food right from under her belly. Then she, as the lynel before her, reaches into her own stomach to crush the fear within her own fingers. No, not to crush it. To understand.

Urbosa told her, one hundred years ago, that courage does not mean having no fear. Urbosa told her, one hundred years ago, that courage means trying to do the right thing even while having fear. Urbosa told her, one hundred years ago, that the quickest to someone’s heart is their through stomach. And if that saying has never erred, then maybe Urbosa was, and is, right about the other Courage. Link stands now on the very precipice of a shaky uncertainty, of a destiny that rejected her and then chose her again, seemingly at random. But she will trust the Golden Goddesses.

If nothing else, she will trust the Golden Goddesses with her life, because the alternative would involve rolling over and lying down with no hope for the future after the Great Calamity. She will trust the Golden Goddesses because she has seen for herself the people of the land known as Hyrule, the wilds and the people who make something of them, and if they cannot turn back the Calamitous One, then she does not know who can.

Link herself may still feel the weakness of the girl who ran away. Yet the wilds united, and the people who made something of them, tie together a strength as resilient as her cooking pot—the cooking pot that has faced the four Divine Beasts and won.

She meets Amali's gaze; she meets Sidon's hands. Amali wraps her wings around her while Sidon scoops up the both of them together, embracing them with a fierceness that rivals the power of the Divine Beasts. "Then, let's go. To Riju and Yunobo." Link pauses. "Oh, but first, I need to make a trip to Kashiko. And...I need to make some loam."

When Link sees Sarie again, Amali clapping her wings over her face to express her shock and shame at not having brought Sarie over earlier, the korok explodes into a whirlwind of excitement. Grabbing Link's hands, Sarie dances wildly around with her. Link hugs them to her chest, clasping the little korok, speaking excitedly of what she has seen in the lost woods, of the lifting of the veil, of the strangeness of the korok forest, of the giant tree with a face in the wood, of Hestu's gift coiled up golden in one of her elixir vials. Sarie prances around her in mid-air as she turns, at last, to the drawing of the Master Sword.

"I didn't know you'd be so happy to see I got the sword," Link signs, beaming at them.

Sarie tilts their entire body at once, so far that they almost hang upside-down and drop onto the ground. "What's that? Is that the sharpy-sharp thing?"

The mirth ebbs, if only for a moment, and Link takes a long, long glance at Sarie, who continues to spin through the air as though they had said nothing amiss. Link looks at them. They peek back, crooning a soft kookooloo... at her. At length she nods to herself. "Sarie. " They perk up. "Let's go get some loam."

When their tiny hands once more grip Link's sidelocks and curl them up over her head, she realises all at once she is alive. Not a dream. Not a dream at all. Not some fantasy spun out of her last few seconds before the lost woods swallow her whole. Link can laugh out loud until her stomach hurts her, and she can gallop around like a horse under Sarie's guidance no matter how much of a fool she makes from herself, and she can remain very much alive.

"Linky-link's reins are goody-good!" Sarie sings, flicking them as if trying to speed up Link's motions as she digs for loam outside of the encampment, in the dips between the marshy hills where the rains leach down soil. "Jangly's are good too! Teeth and Mama Floof don't have good ones. Link does! Sarie-sarie-saria missed Linkuru-linkuru-link's reins!"

"They missed you too," Link responds. She brings back loam for preparation. Poking out her tongue in concentration as she embarks on the cooking of loam the way Sarie taught her, she offers a prayer to the Golden Goddesses: O Din, for the earth She raised in Her powerful arms. O Nayru, for the rains She casts down in Her wise...planning. O Farore, for the...something or other...for the leaves of the forest floor and the grasses that contributed to the loam in Her courageous...leaf and grass making. Link raps her knuckles against the rim of the cooking pot. Perfect.

"Sarie rates the loam...better than whatever Link made me the first time, 'cause that was the worst loam Sarie-sarie-saria's ever had!" Sarie shouts.

"I'll...I'll take that a compliment," says Link, head cocked, "I think."

While Sarie goes off explaining all of the many ways in which Link can better the loam, which she attempts to scribble down on the inside of her wrist to reference later only to recognise that she barely has room to write over her varying scars, Sidon inquires whether he may try some of this loam. Link, raising an eyebrow, turns the cooking pot over to him. He grabs a palmful. Tipping his head back as if in laughter, Sidon tosses up the dirt and catches it in his mouth.

Link observes him chew, chew, gulp, chew, chew, swallow. He rubs his throat. He smooths his fins with his palms. "But of course! The tastes of the children of the Goddess Kokir and those of our Goddess may differ by far, yet even I can fully agree with you, Sarie!"

Sarie bobs up and down. "What does Tooth agree with Sarie on?"

Sidon brings himself up to his fullest height, grins at Link with the brilliance of the sun, and flashes her and Sarie a thumbs-up. "We can agree that this tastes most awful! Link, are you proud of me? I am doing my best to be entirely honest with you!"

Link blinks at him a moment. Then she erupts in a stomach-hurting laughter that leaves her breathless and wild and utterly grateful beyond words for the people that she has met, for the Sidon that she now embraces; for the Sarie that she promises to make a better loam; for the Amali that unties her ponytail and brushes her hair clean of the tangles that her life has accrued.

In a world ideal, the hundred years of passing would not have passed, for the Great Calamity would never have come. Yet if the hundred years of passing had to pass, then Link is grateful that she could be alive, to have broken fast with more friends that she could number amongst the stars.

Upon hearing of Link digging for loam in the dirt, Amali bustles around finding Link a spare tunic to wear. The cotton Akkalan clothes that she receives itch her skin uncomfortably. She twitches and adjusts them constantly. Amali reassures her: just until Medli, where—for the third time—Amali can have Link fit for a blue-feathered tunic.

"I suppose that the Golden Goddesses do not jest when They say that all must happen in three," Amali notes with a wry smile. "I'll have to make sure my husband doesn't leave on any other journeys. That'll mark two, and once the gale whips up the same rock twice, it will inevitably whip up the rock a third."

Link inhales a breath as sharp as the edge of the Master Sword, as sharp as the kick of Eldic spice. Gripping Amali's hands, she explains that Kass has embarked upon the journey to Medli and might already have arrived.

"We did it," she says, signing into Amali's back as Amali curls up weeping in joy around her. "We got all the shrines. He's coming home, Amali. He's coming home. And on a full stomach, too!"

Not even an hour later, Link, Sidon, Amali, and Sarie, alongside most of those at the now defunct encampment, have gathered in the Divine Beast Vah Medoh. First, to Kashiko, where Link hugs her companion Ilia again, resting her forehead against hers: a horse and her girl. She collects, as well, the letter to the Champions that the stablehand no longer has to deliver. When the stablehand sights the Master Sword and the Divine Beast Vah Medoh, the stablehand can only stutter and
They spend the next few days zipping by overland, a journey that would have taken Link close to a month on Ilia. She taps Amali on the shoulder and crosses her arms over her chest, her eyebrow quirked.

"It's been a really long time since I got to see Chief Kaneli," she says, grinning crookedly, "and you promised to show me how to make cannoli."

Amali's cheeks darken in blush. "I...truly have not made cannoli in years. If I have to be honest, then...I told you that because cannoli and Kaneli sign similarly. You can see how your hands follow the same gestures..."

Link touches her chin. She bemas even wider, channeling Sidon for a moment. "Then let's figure out how to make it together!"

She and Amali—and Sidon and Sarie, of course—bustle to figuring out how in the wide world of the Golden Goddesses to cook cannoli. Link grinds wheat while Amali distills cane sugar. They make a dough of goat butter, rock salt, cane sugar, and ground Tabanch wheat. Sidon kneads the dough—Sarie helps, their tiny hands papping and bopping the to-be shell—which Link fries in butter. Amali forms the shells of the cannoli, closing over the seam. Then the filling: ricotta cheese made from the milk of Tabanch sheep, mixed with vanilla extract, distilled sugar, a hint of Faronese cacao, a whip of cream, and pink wildberry that leaves Link's fingers sticky and chin even stickier.

They cool the filling by letting it sit in the frigid winds outside of the Divine Beast Vah Medoh for half an hour, the roof of the Divine Beast finally good for something beyond having Link fall off of it, before Amali demonstrates to Sidon, Link, and Sarie how to make a piping-bag. They stuff the shells, curl them over, and sprinkle them with powdered sugar. Link tries one: delicious.

"In wilds," Sarie adds, to Link's simultaneous amusement and confusion.

Delicious, delicious, wildberry cannoli. Link wolfs down an entire batch and runs through her store of ingredients to make more. When she comes dangerously close to using up all of her wildberry, she—despite her own belly aggressively clamouring for another round of cannoli—sets aside enough for Ilia to feast on the bounties of Tabantha and Hebra. Scratching her companion behind the ear and brushing down her coat, Link feels Ilia's steady heartbeat in her palm.

Everything will be all right. As long as the sun, the moon, and the earth exist, everything will be all right. And she, too, will be all right.

When the Divine Beast lands on the highest Pillar of Erito in Medli, Kass has not yet arrived. After seeing her daughters to tell them how wonderful and patient and lovely they all are, Amali leaves Link with Dorian, Teba, Sidon, and the children again. She departs once more. The Divine Beast Vah Medoh spreads its wings and thrums its fans. Amali promises to return within a few days, Riju and Yunobo on board. She embraces Link and Sidon good-bye. Link corrects her: not good-bye, but see you later.

As the Divine Beast Vah Medoh scales the heavens, Link climbs up to the tallest of the remaining Pillars of Erito. Amali's children—Notts and Kotts prove themselves able to fly for short bursts, while the older daughters and Tulin have grown in their flight feathers fully—soar up around her, ferrying Koko and Cottla up to the crown of the pillar to spread out the pic-a-nic supplies and wait for Link.
Sarie remains by her side, twirling their korok leaf and hovering beside her, cheering her on. By the time she clambers up onto the pillar, Link heaves out her breaths, her arms shivering from the ache in her muscles. The children cheer.

She removes from her back the pic-a-nic basket that she brought with her, full to the brim with foodstuffs: wildberry cannoli prepared on Amali, Link, Sarie, and Sidon's special recipe; flame-spun wildberry tart that she learned from a pair of gerudo women in a ruby-lined Hebric inn; hearty durian and mighty banana stew, to bring the warmth of Faron to the coolness of Medli; a wedge of Tabanch sheep cheese; a nutcake with just enough salt to offset the sweetness; pumpkin and sunflower seeds, roasted to exquisite perfection; loaves and loaves of freshly baked bread still warm from the oven; olive oils and butters in which to dip the bread; steamed snow rabbit stuffed with sunshroom from the eastern half of the land once known as Hyrule; shrimp on rice stir-fry mixed with three species of safflina; a portion of Riju's Fishy Fiasco made of the children's favoured fishes; and a fruit and mushroom skewer that reminds her, long, long ago, of what the girl with the golden hair once read her from a book.

"'Cowards die many times before their deaths."

"'The valiant never taste of death but...'"

Once the children have gorged themselves and taken to a fluffy and feathery pile of nap, Link walks herself towards the edge of the Pillar of Erito. She gazes down upon Medli, upon Lake Totori, upon Tabantha, upon...upon what may one day become again known as Hyrule. Yet, if it does not, whatever name it bears, it will have the same people, the same wilds, the same deliciousness.

The afternoon sun has mirrored the surface of the lake into the gold of the Sacred Realm. If she were to leap down there, now, she swears she could plunge into the Sacred Realm here and now.

Link draws the Master Sword from the sheath given to her by the koroks. Looking upon a very, very old friend, she sets the Master Sword down into her lap. So long that it stretches across her knees and then some. So long that she cannot wear it at her hip as she would a normal sword.

"We can do this, can't we?" Link signs. The Master Sword does not answer her. She breathes out, her shoulders relaxing down from a tension she did not know crept in. "I'll try my best. That's all I can give. I...have promises to keep, and travelers to talk to, and meals to eat, and paths to walk, before I sleep. I don't...know what'll happen. But no matter what happens, I'm not going to run away again. If I have to lay down my life, I will. I promise.

"And...if we come out of this all, I'm serious about making you that meal. And...and the Princess." Link stops, then shakes her head. "She wouldn't want me to call her that. Princess, I mean. But I don't remember her name. I know who is she. I know what she looks like, with the golden hair, and that look in her eyes. My...my friend. As...as you are my friend." Palming the blue ocarina, she presses the mouthpiece to her lips. Link plays upon the ocarina the lullaby that the girl with the golden hair taught her, and then she starts to close her eyes. A light just below her lashes brings her to open them again.

The sword that seals the darkness.

The blade of evil's bane.

The Master Sword glows its fire-light blue. In the hilt she can see her own reflection; in the hilt she can see the courage in her eyes.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Thanks a million for coming with me on such a long and lengthy journey. We have a few relatively short chapters coming up before we ratchet back up. It's funny: even though I distinctly remembered each chapter (approximately) in the middle of Delicious in Wilds, probably due to being split up into arcs, this latter half of stuff is harder for me to piece together. We're 84% of the way done now. Over four-fifths! And speaking of being almost so done, pretty short author's notes this time around, because the chapter's also so short! Imagine a world where a chapter of "only" six thousand words is considered short. And thanks a million to my beta reader Emma, who has done her part in making every single chapter that much better. She's also been absolutely instrumental recently in making sure that each chapter has been gutted of the "one-liners" that I tended to insert while writing, as well as in helping me bust up some of those overtly long paragraphs.

The Master Sword disappearing creatures to dust is akin to what the ancient arrows in Breath of the Wild do to creatures that aren't guardians (try it on a lynel). Ancient arrows literally cause a creature to cease existing, including all of their weapons and so forth. Try it in-game and you'll see what I mean.

The line about being so hungry you could eat an octorok is, well, another covert meme reference.

"Jamming my tail into my mouth" is a Lanayrish way of saying "sticking your foot in your mouth". A fun fact about Lanayrish idioms is that non-zora use them as well, so people say "jamming my trail into my mouth" even if they don't actually have tails.

Fi has indeed developed a sense of humour over the past ten thousand years.

Blue chuchu being medicinal is a nod to The Wind Waker.

"Once a gale whips up the same rock twice, it will inevitably whip up the rock a third" is a Tabanch saying that the sentiment that important things happen in threes. Bit like Rendezvous with Rama. It's a Hyrule thing!

Since we saw Yunobo and Riju last time in the encampment, I thought that seeing Sidon and Amali would be good this time. Naturally, I've been trying to pair Link with different combinations of the Champions, so as to point out how they would interact with one another as well as with Link. Since Delicious in Wilds is ultimately from Link's point of view, characters' relationships with her are prioritised over their relationships with one another, by virtue of the fact that in most scenes they're talking more to Link since she's the one who hasn't been there for a while. But I've tried to impart what their relationships have been beyond that, in terms of what's been going on in the time that Link isn't around.
In this case, for example, Sidon's newfound honesty and curiosity into people's personal lives has in turn caused Amali to divulge more of her past to him than she has to Link. In contrast, Amali, much as she has done with Link, has been modulating Sidon's sense of responsibility. And hey, Sidon isn't lying to make people feel better anymore. But the text speaks for itself.

With respect to Amali's parents, I'd just like to note that having a bad home situation doesn't mean that you'll be a bad parent yourself. If anything, having experienced that has an effect (on some people) of making them more conscious of their children than they may have been otherwise. It's all on the individual, but it's important to distinguish: Ilia, for example, decided not to have any kids at all, but that wasn't just because of her having had a not so great home situation.

I cheated a bit with the recipe this chapter! It's wildberry crepe in-game, and instead I turned it into a recipe for cannoli in Delicious in Wilds. But I promised Link cannoli, and frankly, this is the closest recipe I should find for cannoli in Breath of the Wild.

Next time: a game of cards; Link takes a crash course in public speaking, and I mean a crash course. But it'll mostly be a chapter much like this, just short and calm. We'll get back into the swing of things soon enough (the seventy-third chapter is back up to over eight thousand words, and the seventy-fourth clocks in at over seventeen thousand words). Kind of makes me wonder if anyone's still reading this with me regularly posting an average of ten thousand words a day or so.

At any rate, see you next time, and thank you again for reading!

Beta reader's comments: Getting more focus on Amali is welcome, even if it is sad. Seeing her and Sidon interact is also really cool; it happens more and more as the four pilots come together, and it's really fun to read.

Emma. 10 November 2017.

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef and the chef's companions—the Eldic youth, the Tabanch housewife, the Parapan food enthusiast, the Lanayrish prince, and the not-so-forgetful korok—meet up in Ruto in preparation for the council of the nations of Hyrule.

Chapter Notes

Brief author's note that didn't make it to the end: I started writing this chapter at 10:10 on the twelfth of August, and finished writing it on at 15:18 on the twelfth of August.

By and large, Link has not much noticed how the average person in Medli treats her; always she has had some attention on her, for her hylian nature—more common in southern and eastern Hyrule—in a city mostly populated by rito, gerudo, sheikah, and gorons; or for the cooking pot that she wears on her back where most travellers might wear a shield; for the scars that her travels have painted and scratched and chiselled and clawed and written into her form, a tapestry of failures and successes, of pain and pride.

But most of the average persons in Medli, looking at her, do not immediately recognise some wafting of a Champion's aroma from herself. A few, having seen her by Yunobo's side upon her second visit to Medli, or having perhaps noticed the slate covered by the satchel at her right hip, have gawked at her more than others. Yet not most.

The Master Sword, however, presents a different matter. True, not everyone in Medli knows of the Master Sword, from what Link can tell, though she has no method of wandering around polling people except perhaps by bribing them with cake or cannoli as she and the girl with the golden hair once bribed Purah with carrot cake into allowing them a conversation. And true, not everyone in Medli knows of the Master Sword's appearance.

Yet enough can recognise its sheath, and most everyone has heard the call to try to pull the blade of evil's bane from the Kokir Forest. Kaneli's announcement that someone has pulled the sword that seals the darkness allows even the less astute—still more astute than Link, undoubtedly—to put apple and butter long enough to make a buttered apple: the girl constantly running around beside the Champion of Erito's daughters bearing the violet-hilted sword marked with the symbol of the Golden Goddesses on her back might just have some measure of significance.

Before Amali left Medli to bring back the others and arrange a great council, when Amali and Sidon first entered Kaneli's home with Link in tow, the latter sat out most of the conversation, waiting in the back and munching on rice-balls while Kaneli attempted to comprehend the chaos of Link having once borne the blade of evil's bane as the chosen hero one hundred years, then sleeping in the Shrine of Resurrection, then losing all of her memories, then attempting to draw the sword that seals the darkness, then being rejected, then informing them about that incident, then traipsing over the land known as Hyrule all winter, and then coming back with the blade of evil’s blade after all.

"But of course, something like that!" Sidon boomed. "Trust our Goddess to test the Champion of Hylia’s mettle before granting her once more the sword that seals the darkness!"

Link wanted to participate, to intervene, to take the fullness of responsibility, yet the conversation flowed far over her head. As she did one hundred years ago, she simply bobbed her head and accepted what they told her.

Ultimately, all that she did during that talk with Kaneli comprised of handing them the letter she wrote, and then—when none of them found it legible, and Amali admitted that, while she collected the scant few letters that reached Medli from travellers during her and Kass’s journey, she had not found herself able to read any of them either—Link read the letter to them aloud. About the Calamitous One. About the Sacred Realm. About the mirror in the sanctum. About the girl with the golden hair. About her own awakening being tied to the puncturing of the fabric between the Sacred Realm and the mortal world. Like the scent of burning in an oven being the first warning that the pie she has so carefully made will burst shortly into flames.

_Hoo hooing_ loudly, Kaneli proposed that they go speak to this Lady Impa, if she knows this breadth of information, in order to prepare themselves for what they may yet have to do. He delicately dabbed at his beak and muttered something about not having thought his chiefly duties would extend to the saving of the entire world. He supplicated the assistance of the Goddess Erito in search of the voice with which to speak.

"And _hoo_ are we to determine the fate of these lands?" he inquired of Amali, of Sidon, of Link. "Let us send for the chieftains and elders of Eldin, Parapa, and Lanayru as well, and perhaps those of Hebra, Akkala, Necluda, Faron..." He hesitated, then nodded decisively. "We must discuss this as one people, united."

With _that_, the Divine Beast Vah Medoh took to the skies. Kaneli regarded Link across the room; she glanced up at him, hands and mouth full of food, and offered him a rice-ball.

"And _hoo_ am I," said Kaneli to himself, "to question _hoom_ the Goddesses have chosen?"

Link lowered the rice-ball.

She vows to do better. She vows to harbour her own responsibility. She vows to understand, at least to some extent, the goings-on better than she did one hundred years ago. She vows to nod less and ask more. She vows to...eat more of these rice-balls.

Communication between the different leaders of the land once known as Hyrule proves difficult in the coming days, even with the Divine Beasts whose rapid gait cuts travel time by three-quarters, compared to months of hard riding required between the corners of the land. Link examines the map that she has drawn on the scroll from the Great Plateau. Oceans to the east, to the south, and to the west. Barren badlands to the north, and the mountains still beyond. Something might lie yet north of the land once known as Hyrule.

She has wanted for the entirety of her life nothing more than to settle down in a little village by the horses and the goats—or the cows, or the sheep—to live her life day in and day out, to share a meal with her beloved ones over the rim of a cooking pot. Yet, gazing at that map truly for the first time, Link cannot help but feel the northward wind.

Lifting her head, she gazes up towards the north. Link draws the telescope from its loop at her left hip. The trusty red telescope. Her little sister's telescope. Aryll's telescope. She raises it to her eye and then remembers the broken lens.

She loops the telescope back onto her belt. She will have time for fixing. She will have time for mending. She will have time for healing, and sometimes, healing involves breaking first. Involves letting go.

What Ilia told her. That which runs through her blood. The delicious—sharing food with the people she loves. The wilds—all those meals which lie beyond the veil in the wilderness that she loves.

The people that she loves, and the wilds that she loves. Link furls up the map. Another time, and another place, she can consider such a journey, with someone or many someones at her side, to share with her the bounty and the danger, the joys of discovery and exploration and cooking, at whatever might pass over the storms and the seas, or whatever might pass over the skies and the summits. Another time, and another place.

Before she can turn outwards from Hyrule, she, and they, must turn inwards. And so they do. Link spends the greater part of the next several days reading and rereading the letter, visiting and revisiting the memories of what the girl with the golden hair has said to her. She paces up and down. While cooking, she ponders to herself and nearly burns a salmon fillet, salvaging the fish just in time to burn her fingers instead—a trade she is more than willing to make—until Sidon asks her what troubles her so.

She explains about how little she understands, how much she has seen and yet how little she understands. Link knows how to fight, how to cook, how to work with her hands, how to touch her chin and puzzle out reaching something in a shrine or in a Divine Beast.

Yet about these things she understands almost nothing: talks of Sacred Realms and a land where people become immortal and a Calamitous One and something about the Golden Force of the Sacred Realm and do the Golden Goddesses live there and why haven't the Golden Goddesses done anything if they do and does he think that the Golden Goddesses would accept a meal from her and what does he think that the Golden Goddesses might like and she really doesn't understand a thing about what it might mean to go to the Sacred Realm and suddenly have to establish her own boundaries or if she can cook in the Sacred Realm and she has been there before but does not remember and the thought of going somewhere where all of the experiences that she has had in this world, all of the grass that she has walked on and the ripe apples she has touched and the juices that have run down her chin, becoming meaningless in the face of something which she does not know if she can even ever comprehend.

"The Princess was just so much smarter than I am," Link says, "and I...should've asked more questions. I paid attention! I really did! But I..."

"But of course! I, O Wise Sidon, do not understand this entirely, either!" he tells her. Link cocks her head, then touches her chin, considering how to represent a cocked head to someone who cannot see her cocking her head. "That does not mean that I am most unworthy of such a title! That which we do not understand, we will! I, like you, am much a person who understands best what he has experienced! Once we come upon the Sacred Realm, which we absolutely shall, our Goddess—and our own abilities—shall guide us!

"Not understanding does not mean that you are not smart," he notes. "I do not understand much of cooking, nor do you understand much of diving! That does not mean that you are not smart, or that I am not smart!"

"I have only seen the Princess from afar and never met her myself, but if she educated herself on these matters, then it would make sense for her to understand! If you and I take the time to educate ourselves, then we, too, shall understand! You must have faith that we will!

"If you told her to cook something, she may not know how to do so!" Sidon grins at Link. "Would you call her not smart?"

Link shakes her head, stops, and then signs the affirmation into his palms. Sidon beams more broadly. He squeezes Link’s hand, his skin cool yet affection warm.

It occurs to Link that she does not know much of what Sidon occupies himself with in his spare time. Since the Great Calamity’s arising, they have all lived lives of the Divine Beasts and of monsters and of the suffering of people, and they have not had much time for fun. Link’s greatest hobby might involve something that she needs to do every day to survive. Others: not so.

And so she asks. And so Sidon answers: he spends a great deal of time simply wandering around Ruto, asking people how they do, and seeing if they need any assistance. The stories of those around him fascinate him to no end. Beyond Ruto’s borders, he has a fondness for swimming up waterfalls to leap off and perform tricks in mid-air during the long plunge back into the water. In the years before the Calamitous One, when he was a mere pup of two hundred moons, he would participate and train for diving competitions once every three moons, as well as the annual spring diving festival in celebration of the cascade of waters from the Naydra Snowfields.

"Once, with the help of our Goddess, we have put our faith into the peaceful future, I would like to take up diving again!"

Link promises that she will come see Sidon diving whenever that happens. He grips her hand. "That’s a promise! Just for you, Link, I will do my best to make it a most excellent diving festival!"

They spend the next few days pouring over the letters together, attempting to glean whatever they can about the Sacred Realm. Link tries to remember all that the girl with the golden hair told her so many years ago about the nature of the Sacred Realm and the mirror that she discovered. Perhaps multiple mirrors, said the girl with the golden hair. A mirror of the royal family, and another mirror, long since shattered, and maybe more than that.

Sarie joins in. The children join in. Link tells them the stories she has heard, from the girl with the golden hair, from her own childhood reading books with Ilia, from Lady Impa, from Marin and her mothers, from travellers and strangers that she has met on the road, from Rotana of Uruda who herself knows much about the mirrors.

The days pass by one by one. Surrounded by the warmth of her family and her friends, Link cannot comprehend a Great Calamity. Yet even now, in villages across the land once known as Hyrule, increasingly squishing themselves around the shrines like travellers huddling for warmth around campfires and cooking pots, she can sense the spread of monsters over the land, can sense the malice that could once more well up from the ground, can sense the coming of another Great Calamity.

When Amali arrives again to Medli, she does not have Yunobo or Riju in tow. Rather, she comes bearing news of a meeting-place and a meeting-time: in Lanayru, in Ruto, for the King Zora who finds movement most difficult of all. And so the Divine Beast Vah Medoh piles high with not only Chief Kaneli, but also the chiefs of other Tabanch villages and towns. The Divine Beast Vah Naboris bears not merely the Queen of Parapa and Champion of Sageru Riju, but as well advisors from all over Parapa and western Faron: individual Parapan villages and towns do not have chiefs so much as communal decision-making with robust communications to larger towns and ultimately to Nabooru, as Riju explains to Link, who struggles to comprehend but at least tries her best to pay attention. The Divine Beast Vah Rudania contains whichever village elders, of Darunia and other towns, care to come who do not decline the intivation out of age or out of illness. The Divine Beast Vah Ruta...remains for now in the lake surrounding the Kokir Forest, until Sidon has the time to fetch the Divine Beast properly.

Link spends most of the journey on the Divine Beast Vah Medoh fast asleep in her bed, curled up, her head on the rito-down pillow, the exhaustion of the long winter and the somehow even longer spring having finally hit her.

She emerges from her cave under the blankets to cook for herself and others and to consume. The rest of the time she spends in the softness of the sheets, the Master Sword tucked up to her face, its hilt imprinting a wing against her cheek. Whenever she awakens, she oftentimes finds someone else also occupying her bed with her, mostly Sarie, but sometimes as well Sidon—who has difficulty adjusting to the size and shape of a bed meant for humans, more than half of his body hanging off of the end—and occasionally Amali, who shushes Link when she awakens and tells her to rest. Sometimes Amali asks Link about Kass. Link details their adventures as best she can. She touches her chin. "I swear...I swear I'm forgetting something. Something I'm supposed to have done by now."

"If you remember what it is," Amali swears, "then I will do my utmost to help you do it." Link yawns; Amali wipes fatigue-welled tears from the corners of her eyes. "But first, you need to sleep."

When they arrive in Ruto, Link—despite having slept for over half the day every single day of the past week—feels a certain exhaustion continuing to weigh down upon her.

The Lanayrish welcome her, both as the Champion of Hylia—the bearer of the Master Sword and the Knight of the prophecy that, as far as Link can tell from the tree's words, is less a prophecy and more a cautionary tale spun out over ten thousand years—and as Link—the girl whom many of the Lanayrish have known personally, as a courier or as a bartender—who waves back to the Lanayrish, keeps a blanker expression on her face than she might like, and offers passersby the opportunity for a meal. Sidon tours her around Lanayru, around the slow rebuilding of Ruto.

"It will take many of your hylians years," he explains to her, "but when we have once more grown in number to match the strength within our hearts, I shall honour the building of new villages by cooking your seafood paella! Although with a better recipe than yours!"

Link giggles. "Thanks for being honest." She embraces him with pride in her heart—and in her stomach. She yawns. Within a second she has found herself dozing off against Sidon; he carries her back to the beds of the Divine Beast Vah Medoh.

The fatigue besets her again for the next few days while the chiefs of Tabantha and the King Zora embark upon the discussion of the fate of the land once known as Hyrule. Link attempts to follow the politics. They call her up once to introduce herself and give her own thoughts on the matter. She wakes up in a cold sweat, at first assuming she must have having dreamed it up, and then realising that she fainted dead away on stage. Sidon sets a cool towel over her head. She rubs her eyes and goes back to sleep.

Another few days pass by without incident. Sidon takes Amali and Link to the Ruto concert hall to see the first live performance in over two years of the quintet known as the Indigo-Gos, whose bombastic lead guitarist yells "Yow!" at the end of every other sentence, and whose music reminds Link of something between the burbling of a brook and the crashing of glaciers.

Upon the advent of the full moon, Sidon invites Link and Amali—and the Tabanch chieftains—to participate in the monthly prayers for the Goddess Zola. The inverted spire of the Temple of Zola drains water from its upper levels, granting space of its non-gilled guests. Link does not comprehend much of the goings-on, particularly as the Sage of Zola reads the religious texts in the ancient Old Lanayrish tongue—Flippish, Sidon names it—that the zora people spoke at the time when the Seven roamed the earth. She nods her head sagely. Yet she can feel the electricity through the crowd, the quietness with which they listen to the proceedings, the reverence of their glimmering eyes and hands moved into the signs of the Goddess Zola. When the Sage invokes the Golden Goddesses, she forms Their symbols up above her head.

It takes all of Link's iron willpower not to break down laughing in the midst of such a culturally significant ceremony: the Sage looks as if she were playing a round of wind-water-fire with herself. At some point, she falls asleep. She wonders if the fatigue will grasp hold of her forever. Then Link sees—with the arrivals of the other Divine Beasts—Yunobo and Riju come running at her with arms open, and all of her exhaustion vanishes at once. Yunobo hugs her gently; Riju, so fiercely that Link would fear her spine might snap, except that she would not even care. Not a second later, Yunobo has started to assure Link that she does not have to carry the Master Sword if she does not want to, that she need not force herself to become the Champion of Hylia if she does not want to, that she need not bear the burdens if she does not want to. Laughing, she shakes her head.

"The sword chose me," Link says, "but thanks." She has words. She can use them. "Yunobo, it means a lot that you'd...worry so much, that you'd." She makes wheeling gestures with her hands. "I'm not good at this."

"Take your t-time," Yunobo answers. "I know what it feels like to have to talk q-quickly. When I was first c-carved from stone, I stuttered even worse than I do n-now, because I felt like I couldn't have time to say everything I was t-trying to say. I'm...learning how to stutter less now. It's all right to take your time." He touches her shoulder. "I'm here."

He's here. And so is she. Link finds an apple in her satchel and eats it as she signs. "I'm making deliciously grilled rock roast, but I'm afraid to make it, because I think that if I don't do it well, you'll stop liking me," she explains, "so when I tell you that I'm afraid, you reassure me. It doesn't matter if I can make the rock roast well or not. You won't pretend it's good, but you won't hate me."

"And then I...I make you the rock roast, even though I was afraid that I didn't know how to make it! Or, or maybe this is a bad analogy. The rock roast chose to let me make it. Not really about my own skills, just...I happened to stumble on some rock roast."

She snaps her fingers. "I was afraid that there wouldn't be rock roast in the market! But there was. And now I've come back, and you tell me that you'd be my friend even if I hadn't managed to get it at the market. Does...does that makes sense?"

Yunobo takes her hand and stretches out her arm to touch her fingers against his own chin. Link laughs; Yunobo beams. Untying the shawl around his shoulders, he tucks blue fabric over Link's. "I don't g-get it entirely," he admits with a scratch of his jaw. "I th-think I get enough. And that's all I need, right?"

Link nods. "Right."

Riju's initial response involves less reassurance and more presenting Link with a full pumpkin, a sand seal and a horse carved into the gourd, though Link at first mistakes the sand seal for a bowl and the horse for a depiction of a spoon. "Goddesses help me," Riju observes, her smile reaching up to her brown eyes, while Sarie flings themself out of Link's satchel to sit once more upon Riju's head and up take her heavy looped sidelocks, "I don't know if I should laugh at you for constantly having your head stuck in the cooking pot or cry that my artistic creations aren't the epitome of a masterpiece." When Link starts to apologise, Riju bats her hands away. "I'm joking, Link. Thank the Goddesses but I can own up to not being able to carve pumpkin. Then, go on. Try it. I...I hope you like it!"

Link lifts the lid of the pumpkin: catfish stew.

She looks at Riju, who bounces up and down on her feet as she, in turn, watches Link, having brought up a hand to her mouth in something resembling nervousness. Behind her, Link catches sight of the captain of the royal Parapan guard, who inclines her head at Link, and several of Riju's other attendants bearing various expressions of bemusement and solemnity.

Link raises the pumpkin to her lips. Lowering her eyelids, she drinks deeply of the stew that heats her tongue, and her face, and which wets her throat, and her eyes. The catfish stew does not taste quite like Ordon catfish, Ordon goat, Ordon pumpkin. It tastes like Parapan trout, Parapan sand seal, Parapan...pumpkin. Sweeter and more orange than the harder and darker Akkalan variety. A Parapan spin on an Ordon favourite.

She lets the pumpkin drop down into her lap. Link listens to the stew slosh inside. Riju bites her lower lip; she leans forward, the tip of her tongue poking out of the corner of her mouth, a small anxious smile curving her lips.

"I like your lipstick," Link says suddenly; Riju blinks. "It makes me think of blueberries."

"...thank you." Riju hesitates. "So, how's the...?"

Link snaps her fingers. "It's not what I expected." Riju's expression begins to hollow, but Link shakes her head so violently that her sidelocks slap into her eyes. "No it's not bad! It's not bad! It's not what I expected in the best way I can imagine! You didn't just replicate what I told you about. You took something and you made it all your own.

"Ordon catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd isn't about the catfish or the goat cheese or the pumpkin. It's about celebrating the things that make Ordon, Ordon. And I don't know what makes Parapa, but trout and sand seals are pretty high up there. I didn't know you grew pumpkins, though." Riju's irises seem to sparkle more and more as Link continues through her gestures; she tips up her chin from the praise, the light of the clear Lanayru sky reflecting in her glimmering eyes. "It's so good I had to stop myself from eating it."

"Why? You can have all of it. I made for you, silly." Riju stops herself. "You don't mind me calling you that, do you?"

Link rubs the back of her head. "No, it makes me feel...cozy. But I stopped from eating it because I think we should share it. Meals are best when they're eaten together, you know. Mind if I give you a hug before we eat, though?"

Riju embraces her. Just before Link opens the pumpkin again, this time for them to eat together, Riju nudges Link into looking up at her attendants. She withdraws the Master Sword. Riju and the attendants ogle the Master Sword, which glows fire-light for a moment as if showing off while Link uses the sword that seals the darkness to carefully cut the pumpkin into enough pieces for everyone.

Riju pulls her sidelocks in alarm. "Goddesses...! Link, you can't...you can't use the blade of evil's bane for that!"
Link starts to pass out the pumpkin slices. As she frees her hands, she turns innocently towards Riju. "Why not?"

"It's just...it's just, thank the Goddesses, She chose you, and I don't think you're supposed to use...Her for...cutting pumpkins...the sword is meant to seal away darkness, to be the bane of evil." It dawns upon Link that bane is not a verb, but a noun. "Then, shouldn't you treat Her more...more reverently? I don't know."

"If it really bothers you," Link offers, "I can stop. But I don't think it minds." She glances over her left shoulder. "Hey, Are you angry with me?" she asks of the Master Sword in its sheath. The Master Sword meets her with quiet. "Here. Try to hold it."

Riju shakes her head. "It's only for the chosen one to hold, isn't it?"

"Sidon held it. Here." She palms it over. Gulping hard, Riju hesitantly hovers her hand over the pommel of the sword that seals the darkness. Link smiles tenderly and pushes Riju's palm down until she touche the hilt. "See how it curls back up in your hand? And then when I take it...it uncurls. I think it can understand what I say, too. Watch. If you're all right with me using you to cut pumpkins...then flash blue."

The Master Sword does not reply. Riju raises an eyebrow at her.

Link taps her chin. "I bet it's just not listening to me. If you're all right with me using you to cut pumpkins...then don't flash blue."

The Master Sword does not reply.

Riju crouches down beside it. "Thank the Goddesses that you're not putting up with this nonsense, O blade of evil's bane." She shakes her head. "I understand the legends that the spirit of the Goddesses' will resides within, and it is She to whom I refer. Though, I don't think that She is conscious or can talk to us or anything like that." Riju glances at the Master Sword. "So, can you?"

Link starts to fold her arms over her chest in preparation of the Master Sword staying silent yet again, but a single pulse of blue interrupts her. Riju and Link ogle one another, then the Master Sword, then one another.

Both she and Riju regard the Master Sword. They ask of it a thousand questions, yet the Master Sword remains still and softened white as ever. Riju sighs. Link pats her shoulder.

"Then, thank you for your time, whether you can hear me or not," Riju tells the Master Sword. Link sheathes the sword that seals the darkness.

In honour of the gathering of the Champions together once more, and to cheer up an Amali who paces back and forth in the fear that Kass might come to Medli expecting her only to find her absent this time, Link proposes another communal cooking event. Sidon, Amali, Sarie, and especially Riju agree to chip in, while Yunobo asks if he can watch but not participate.

Sidling up to Amali, Link inquire what she might want to eat. Amali shrugs, her gaze distant and drawn. "If you're going to shut up yourself up like a clam," Link warns her, "then I won't make any clam chowder."

That brings a smile to Amali's beak. "I suppose I can't miss out on clam chowder. Well, well. Clam Clam chowder, with Tabanch wheat, and Lanayrish blueshell snails and Nayru's pearl clams, and Parapan electric safflina for that particular kick. "And Eldic spice," Link adds when Yunobo hands her a jar of it. "Thanks, Yuno-yunobo."

As Sidon and Riju begin to melt sand seal butter mixed with goat milk cream and Tabanch flour, Link and Amali prepare and simmer juices from the Nayru's pearl clams and blueshell snails with electric safflina, potato, endura carrot, onion, Hyrule herb, and cloves, then bring the two together for the body of the chowder. Amali and Sidon rinse the clams and snails thoroughly before stirring them into the hot stew. Sarie calls the adding of vinegar only to drop the entire vial into the cooking pot.

While Link and Riju hastily attempt to salvage the clam chowder from the malice of too much vinegar by the addition of potatoes, aerated salt, and distilled cane sugar, Amali simply erupts into laughter. Link grins: her first victory today.

Sarie dabbles in salt, spice, and seasoning. Sidon gives the clam chowder a final stir. Amali splits it five ways between them to eat up. In the meantime, Link teaches Riju how to prepare fried opals for Yunobo, who taps his index fingers against one another and thanks them.

Link retires for the night in one of the guest rooms set up by Sidon with Sarie under her pillow, curled up pleasantly on the bed. A knock at her door reveals a sleepy pyjama-clad Riju in the hallway, who asks if Link wants to play cards. A second knock at her door, after Riju has won seven hands of Akkalan hold'em and Link three, brings Yunobo in with a tap of his index fingers and a plea to let him rest in Link's chambers for his fear of never having slept somewhere so moist before. A third knock, accompanying Link and Riju's efforts to unbend the paper cards that a flustered and apologetic Yunobo has unwittingly almost crushed in his rocky hand, finds the Prince Zora himself asking about the noise and whether he can try this strange non-Lanayrish card game as well.

Riju tries to explain that, because the cards solely have the four suits—swords, spears, axes, and bows—and numbers written on them, he would not be able to see. Then she pauses and excuses herself a moment.

When she returns a few minutes later, she comes with a pack of slightly bulkier cards. "As it turns out, one of my wonderful friends on Savah Naboris has cards with Parapan sign on them, thank the Goddesses." Riju turns towards Link. "In the morning, would you mind helping me make Anora a meal in my gratitude?" Riju closes her eyes in contemplation. "If I remember correctly, she really loves eggs. Maybe a tart, or pudding...?"

Link excitedly bobs her head. "Anything at all."

Sidon, a Yunobo more capable of holding these sturdier cards, Riju, and Link play another few rounds of Akkalan hold'em—with Sarie dealing—before switching to a game easier for Sidon to play: the forever favourite.

Touching her chin, Link regards Yunobo. "Got any threes?"

A sudden fourth knock at the door brings them all to jump at once as it flies open. "What are you children doing up so late?" Amali glares at each one of them in turn, neglecting the fact that Sidon has on her some eighty years. Sarie peeps out something that sounds like uh oh while the other four flinch or start to apologise. But then Amali's expression softens. "If you're going to be having fun together, then can I join, too?"
Link beams. Then, pausing for a moment, she claps her hands loudly enough to grab everyone's attention. "We're missing someone very important, you know."

"Then," Riju suggests, a tilt of her head indicating her perplexion, "let's go invite them as well."

"Not them. Her," says Link. She leads the party out of her chambers—they pass by very sneakily, Yunobo and Sarie collaborating on a song about being stealthy as shadows; Sidon inquiring in a noisy Sidon-whisper as to where they're going; and Amali sighing and shaking her head—and towards the upper levels of Ruto. Towards the stable. Towards Ilia.

They sit or lie down around Ilia in her stable stall, the musty softness of the hay around them, while they return to playing cards. Amali teaches them a game called feathers, wherein each round revolves around matching four of a kind and then grabbing of the feathers laid out the one person unable to grab a feather in time sits out, until the final round sees a showdown between the master Amali and the rising underdog Yunobo. Riju jokingly starts taking bets until Sidon solemnly places half of his future ownership of Lanayru on the table. "This is how those who do not follow our Goddess do it, yes!?"

"N-no..."

Yunobo wins out by a hair. Or rather, Link reflects to herself, slyly signing into Riju's palm and leaving her giggling at the pun, by a feather: instead of matching his own cards, he watches Amali's expression, monitoring when she has found her last match and scooping the feather out from under her just as she reaches for it. Amali stares at him. "I would never have thought you to resort to such underwinged tactics."

"Huh? But I thought that th-this was a game about r-reading each other...or was that Akkalan hold'em?" Yunobo hangs his head. "I'm no good at this."

Riju rubs his shoulder as Amali apologises and Ilia licks Yunobo's head. "I'm sorry, Yunobo. You won fair and square. If that were to happen to me in a real feathers competition, then they would consider that a fair game." Yunobo beams, clapping his hand against his cheek. "I'm proud of you."

Eventually Riju nods off against Link's shoulder in the middle of a hand. Sidon announces bedtime, and Amali berates herself for not having sent them all packing to bed hours earlier. Yunobo settles himself down in the hay then and there, explaining with some embarrassment that he feels too tired to make the walk back to the chambers. "And also th-this place is a lot drier and m-more comfortable and less scary, right?"

Link grins. "Couldn't have put it better myself."

They all bed down together in a pile of scale and feather and leaf and rock and too much hair and just enough warmth. For the two years that Link has spent keeping promises and walking paths, she has never had a better night's rest.

The morning after, the messenger Igli discovers them at last collapsed in the hay of the stable. Link apologises; Sidon shouts out a good morning. "Quite," Igli remarks, pursing his lips. "Master Link, Queen Riju, Master Amali, Master Yunobo, the Prince Zora, you are quite late for the meeting of the council. If you would follow me."

The meeting of the council. The Champions and the leaders of the regions and provinces and towns and villages and little huts somewhere in the middle of the snow of the land once known as Hyrule. Dozens upon dozens from all over, some of whom Link has met and cooked for without knowledge of whom they were, most of whom Link has never seen. She even counts someone she recognises from Kakariko amongst their number, though not Lady Impa, too old to travel.

She tries to listen to the proceedings; Amali tries to pick hay from her hair and fix the collar of her tunic. Link glances at Amali in confusion. "We can't have you presenting yourself like that," Amali replies. Link tilts her head, growing ever more perplexed, when abruptly the King Zora rumbles out her name.

"O Champion of Hy利亚, O Hero of Hyrule, O Her Majesty's Knight, O Courageous Link," the King Zora booms, his voice loud enough to quake the throne pool and all those gathered within, "come forth. Tell us of what you know, and what you remember."

Link can feel the sweat slick her forehead and the dizziness blur her vision. Yet she can feel, too, the hands on her shoulder, on her back, on her head. Her friends, cheering her on. Sarie in her satchel, kalalahing at her in encouragement. Amali telling her that she can do it, that Amali will be right there behind her, that she needs only to close her eyes and to speak. Yunobo promising her that nothing terrible will happen, that she should take pride in what she has accomplished. Sidon suggesting that she picture everyone in her undergarments: "I have heard the most incredible stories that this actually assists hylians in public speaking!" Riju murmuring that afterwards, they can cook together, and that she could imagine the crowd cooking alongside her. Egg tart, or maybe pudding.

She closes her fingers around the hilt of the Master Sword, presses her cheek against the pommel. The blade of evil's bane resonates against her palm, hums into her ear. She nods to herself. She rises.

Link takes a breath. She takes the stage. She grips the Master Sword in her hand, turning the blade so that the thin edge turns toward her face, holding the sword between her eyes, and she looks upon the crowd.

She attempts to picture them in their undergarments, but she realises that she does not know how look undergarments amongst non-Akkalan hylian people—she supposes that she has seen a little of Tabanch rito and Neculudan sheikah undergarments from her experiences with helping care for the children, and a little of the Parapan and Faronese gerudo for having shared a room with Riju and having lived at Romani Ranch—and, either way, standing in front of a room of semi-nude people makes her more mortified than amused.

Instead she imagines them: eating. Eating together from a communal cooking pot that they share and pass amongst one another, each contributing something to a stew that they make together, each filling themself to satiety then passing on the pot to the next, their bellies warm and eyes closed, their hearts beating and stomachs digesting as one.

She breathes. In through her nose, out through her mouth. She senses herself: afraid. She fears the crowd, and she fears the Great Calamity, and she fears the Master Sword that she carries.

Yet she loves the wilds and the people who make something of them more than she fears everything combined. And from that—from that she draw the courage she needs.

She lifts up her hands.

She speaks.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: As always, thanks a million for having come with me all this time, for continuing to read as the chapters continue to balloon beyond limit, and thank you for continuing to support me. I hope that you've enjoyed Delicious in Wilds so far. It's about time for us to shift into true end-game. And thanks a million to my beta reader, Emma, for all of the work that she has poured into Delicious in Wilds, and all of the motivation that she has given me all this time.

I first brought up the concept of these mirrors back in the thirty-second chapter, I believe.

What did Link promise to do after she acquired the Master Sword? There's something in particular she needed the sword for.

The Indigo-Gos are from Majora's Mask, and Mikau, their lead guitarist, does indeed say "Yow!"

The Temple of Zola, with its draining and raising of water level, was inspired by the dungeons in the Zelda franchise that rely on such raising and lowering, most recently in A Link Between Worlds, which is probably my favourite implementation. It's an inverted spire because the most significant portions of it are the lowest, while the highest seats are reserved for those who cannot breathe underwater. Modern Lanayrish descended from the older language of Flippish, itself named after the zora flippers, an item from many a Zelda game, including A Link to the Past.

Yunobo's stuttering much, much less now. He's come so far!

The Lanayrish pastime of diving is based off of the "Diving is Beauty!" quest in Breath of the Wild.

Nayru's pearl clams are a reference to the sacred object Nayru's pearl from The Wind Waker, since for some reason you can make clam chowder in Breath of the Wild despite not being able to actually procure clams.

Indeed, if you happen to get too much vinegar into something, you can try to salvage it potatoes, sugar, etc. But it's hard to that, so try not to drop entire vials of vinegar!

By the way, I was recently informed by a native speaker the word 'ogle' has a primary definition of a 'lecherous look', which is not at all what I've meant; rather I have meant the secondary definition of 'to look or stare at'. This is the problem when English isn't your native language. Whoops! I promise Riju wasn't lustfully looking at the Master Sword or some nonsense like that!

Akkalan hold'em, of course, is named after Texas hold'em. The four suits on the cards are swords, spears, axes, and bows, in a nod to the weapons used by the four Champions and their respective Whateverbright Ganons in-game. The forever favourite, naturally, is the Hyrulean variant of the real world "go fish".

The game of feathers is based on the real-life game of spoons, which I recommend trying if you've never played it. I once cheated, though, and won by watching my opponent instead, reaching out to grab the spoon as soon as he moved towards it. Why? Because the win condition is that someone has to get the matching set at the time of the spoon-grabbing, not necessarily the person grabbing the spoon!

You might remember Igli from Link's first visit to Ruto.

Public speaking is quite difficult, especially for someone like Link. I mean, understanding politics is really hard in the first place; Link's trying her best to comprehend what in the world is going on, because she doesn't just want to be a passive observer, but it's hard. She hasn't had much formal education beyond tutelage at the court in various languages, and she certainly doesn't know enough about the political structures of the various nations in Hyrule to grasp anything beyond the fundamentals. But, as Sidon told her, that doesn't make her stupid. Lack of education is not the same thing.

And public speaking is even harder. But just think about how far she's come. It took her immense stress and strain to even tell Amali about what Link was able to do with Vah Rudania in Darunia, back when she was first in Medli. And now she's at least willing to try to speak to an entire crowd of people from all over Hyrule.

By the way, has anyone ever been helped by the whole "yeah just imagine people in their underwear" shtick? I never have.

Up next: public speaking; the skyward strike; that thing that Link forgot how to do after she got the Master Sword. It's also last elixir chapter in Delicious in Wilds, if I remember correctly.

Beta reader's comments: Link's variation on the "imagine the audience in their underwear" is adorable and so incredibly Link. I love it.

Emma. 10 November 2017.
Chapter Summary

The travelling chef gives a speech to the gathered leaders of the scattered settlements, towns, and nations of Hyrule. Then, the travelling chef remembers a promise the chef made regarding the Master Sword. With the aid of the Tabanch housewife, the chef makes good on that promise and discovers something perhaps foreboding, perhaps freeing.

Chapter Notes

As usual, author's notes that wouldn't fit in the end no matter how many squeezy-hand motions I made: I started writing this chapter at 18:00 on the thirteenth of August, and finished writing it on at 09:51 on the fourteenth of August.

Thanks a million for all of your support, and thanks a million for the constructive criticism you've all given me in improving my writing and worldbuilding! And a round of applause to my most marvellous beta reader, Emma, for everything that she has done.

One last summary chapter! Basically just a synthesis of everything that Link has learned about the Sacred Realm. I figured that one last "previously on Delicious in Wilds" is good for this, since I put in a ton of lore that isn't familiar to those who just came out of Breath of the Wild. Really, my idea of the Sacred Realm came from my efforts to (1) explain the ancient technology, because I'm not fond of 'wow technology that we've lost over ten thousand years!' especially given that the royal family of Hyrule has been the same royal family the entire time in-game (but not in Delicious in Wilds), so it's not like massive chaos could have sunk that technology; what happened to it, beyond the Hyrule royal family being the worst managing monarchs of all time, to a point where despite having no chaos for the throne they were able to lose such ridiculously significant technology?, and (2) I wanted to have a reason to explain the frankly really strange behaviour of monsters. I know that it's a video game, but hey, I always want to be Mechanically Accurate™.

Link does not speak well.

She stumbles over her words. She loses her trail of thought. She goes around in circles. She uses too many food analogies which leave the crowds murmuring to one another. She makes too many wordplays and allusions that the interpreters—for those who do not know Lanayrish sign or for those who cannot see her—find visibly difficult to translate. She does not know if she has all of the facts, or even how much she should say. She goes on for too long. She has to reel herself in.

Link forces herself to breathe. Her blood roars so loudly in her ears that she can listen to nothing else. Her heartbeat thuds in her fingers and wrists so distractingly that she leaves sentences unfinished.

She observes—from the looks of the faces of the crowds, who narrow their eyes, who scratch their heads, who look around at one another, who lean back with their arms behind their backs, who whisper and mutter amongst themselves—that she lost them long, long ago.

And yet Link speaks. She has no other choice. She stands before a gathered congregation of dozens, perhaps a hundred, of people from all over the land once known as Hyrule. She stands before gerudo, before sheikah, before hylians, before rito, before zora, before gorons, before a single korok who waves at her from the stands to cheer her on.

She stands before rulers and advisors, before council-people and elders, before chieftains and matriarchs, before people who have eaten her cooking, before people who might never eat her cooking.

Link speaks. She speaks, and the royal symphony behind the King Zora improvises melodies to go along with what she says. She can hear the complexities of which she speaks in how the music dips between the sounds of triumph and the sounds of tragedy and in how the musicians occasionally fiddle away little eddies of music that have no particular rhyme or rhythm.

She tells them of Hyrule, one hundred years ago. She tells them of the Sacred Realm, of where the veil between the mortal world and the Sacred Realm becomes thin enough to break. She tells them of the—at least—two mirrors, one of the mirrors kept by the royal family, and other one supposedly shattered. She tells them of the mirror in the sanctum. That royal mirror. Capable, somehow or other, of accessing the Sacred Realm through some manner which she little understands.

She tells them of the Sacred Realm, of gathering the boundaries of the body, of an effectively immortal existence. Effectively immortal, except that if one dies in the Sacred Realm and is unable to put themself back together as they were, they will never again step foot in the mortal world. In the Sacred Realm, she explains, not physical health but willpower determines your existence.

She tells them of the Calamitous One, attempting to breach the veil. She tells them of the monsters and the malice, themselves from the Sacred Realm, and of how the monsters do not fear death because they do not comprehend death as a matter of their physical constitution. They only comprehend death as a matter of willpower. And so the monsters doggedly continue to fight despite the pain, because to them, fleeing and running away—to them, losing the will to fight or to live—would lead them to death.

She tells them: in the mortal world, they have long exploited the monsters' tendency to chase and to never stop fighting despite their own injuries to wear monsters down. In the Sacred Realm, the people of the land once known as Hyrule themselves will have to fight like monsters. No matter the injury. Never backing down. Not even if a lizalfos bites into an arm. Not even if a pole slams into a side. Not even if an arrow tipped with malice soars into a shoulder. Not even if a scimitar splits in half a foot. Not even if an entire pool of malice surrounds the body all at once. Not even if the lynel meat so carefully prepared results in illness and vomiting. Never give up. Never, ever give up. Only through that dogged pursuit, ignoring pain and ignoring death, can they best the beasts in the beasts' own lands.

She tells them of the girl with the golden hair, who led the armies into the Sacred Realm, who have fought all of this time, who might still be fighting.

She tells them of how she was trapped in a tear between the Sacred Realm and the mortal world for one hundred years, how the Calamitous One successfully breached the veil, how the girl with the golden hair injured the Calamitous One enough to push the Calamitous One back into the Sacred Realm and allow the veil to heal, and how the closure of those tears in the veil left herself—Link—unable to return to the mortal world. She tells them of how the recent activation of the Divine Beasts and the shrines and the towers came about by the Calamitous One once more puncturing the veil. Of how that same re-opening of the tears in the veil simultaneously allowed herself, at last, to awaken in the mortal world: when the Calamitous One opened the tears, it also opened the path for Link to emerge.

She tells them of herself. Of Link, and the final remaining slate never used during the puncturing.
Of trek to calm the Divine Beasts. And now, of the sword that seals the darkness, the blade of evil’s bane, the Master Sword.

Raising her arms, she starts to form words like and I could make you all meals for having listened to me but she stops herself just in time. Instead Link bows to them all in thanks.

The King Zora opens the floor for questions, and Link wonders how terrible it would truly be to simply stab herself in the throat with the Master Sword to escape the sudden barrage more torrential than anything the Divine Beast Vah Ruta has ever put out.

The congregation of Hyrule's leaders interrogate her. They ask of how she knows any of this. They ask of why she and the girl with the golden hair failed to contain the Calamitous One one hundred years ago. They ask of why they should care about any of this. They ask of whether she has proof for her claims. They ask of why do they should not merely wipe out the monsters using the Divine Beasts and let this supposed Calamitous One that may or may not exist continue sitting by itself in the Sacred Realm. They ask of how any of this could make logical sense. They ask of this Sacred Realm, the legends of which do not exist in all corners of the land once known as Hyrule. They ask of the logistics of raising an army from villages and towns and nations already battered by monsters, of the logistics of getting an entire army through a circular mirror about yea big, of the logistics of fighting in the Sacred Realm when they have little understanding of what the Sacred Realm even is, or whether it even exists.

Link tries to stammer out responses, her fingers twitching into the same motions repeatedly. She answers as best that she can in the endless downpour, but at times she has to admit the gaps. "I don't know," she says, to the sharp inhalations of those around her, like a great hurricane of gasps threatening to sweep her from her boots and fling her down into the ground. "I don't remember."

The throne pool explodes into shrieks of bewilderment, screams of incredulity, shouts that they have come across the whole of the land to hear a folktale spun by someone who does not even remember.

The King Zora attempts to cover for Link as best he can, assuring the gathered congregation that Link did indeed live one hundred years ago, that they have first-person accounts from others and not simply Link herself about the existence of the Sacred Realm and the Calamitous One, that they can work out the logistics themselves and that that working-out indeed is why the King Zora has called everyone here.

Link gives the King Zora a grateful look. Then someone in the congregation shouts that the Calamitous One may not even exist, and the throne pool falls again into chaos.

When she glances back at the congregation, she can see it in their eyes: fear, desperation, anger, concern, sadness, confusion, worry. She remembers when she told everyone in Amali's house the truth about what she has seen and where she has been. Riju, Yunobo, Amali, and Sidon, and everyone else in the house, none of whom yelled at her or disbelieved, all of whom reassured her and were there for her. But they know her. Personally. Have eaten food with her. The gathered people in the throne pool only know her as the girl who has come to flip their lives upside-down.

Someone else—Link cannot tell who in the chaos, nor does she want to—yells out that the Master Sword itself could be nothing but a fake. Her left hand—the fingers curled around the violet hilt, her face reflected in the blade of softened blade—shakes.

The King Zora clears his throat. The crowds quiets slightly, but not enough. The King Zora clears his throat more noisily and booms out over the throne pool: "Let us have a short recess. We shall resume after dinner." Still the congregation argues amongst itself in a verbal maelstrom that leaves Link trembling in her boots. The King Zora rests a massive finned hand on her shoulder, the hand so large that it covers the better half of her head as well. "Step down from the stage, my lass. You did well. Now, allow me to convince them, hoo hoo."

Link nods silently. When she tries to take a step, she discovers her bones have once more gone on vacation and left only cylinders of bari jelly in their wake. She touches her heels together. The Master Sword still weighs down her left hand. The Master Sword that some in the crowd now call false. The Master Sword that they do not believe in. The Master Sword that she believes in.

She may not always believe in herself, yet she believes in the Master Sword that believes in her.

Link dips her head again at the King Zora. She looks towards the ring of seats where Sidon, Amali, Yunobo, Riju, Sarie, and the messenger Igli await her, the former four in various states of clearly trying to cheer her up with their welcoming expressions, Sarie waving an eager arm without much understanding of the goings-on, and Igli simply pursing his lips.

She takes another step forward, this time a little less like bari jelly, and then something smacks her in the back of the head.

Her head snaps down. Link stares at a pen of some sort, lying by her boots, which someone in the congregation must have thrown at her. Or perhaps it accidentally ejected from their hand. Her gaze darts back and forth, but the faces of the congregation blur. Surely no one would have attacked her with a pen. The roar of the crowd around her doubles her vision. Surely no one would have—

The King Zora slams his massive hands on either side of the throne pool, so forceful that the splashes of water soak Link's back.

"ENOUGH!"

The crowd goes silent for a few seconds, then again breaks out into arguments and discussion, into accusations of one another, into demands for the Divine Beasts to stop ferrying people and to stop only caring about their own people, into shrieks that their regions have suffered for months or years in the rampage of the Divine Beasts and that they will do with their Goddess-given marvels what they will. Amid the cacophony that squeezes Link's eyes shut and brings her hands over her ears, the King Zora raises his voice to a volume of fury that shakes the very ceiling. He calls for order in the throne pool. The guards lift up their spears. Link recoils. The sooner she forces herself off of the stage the better.

She starts to sheathe the Master Sword. Just before the sword slides again into the sheathe, the blade flashes light-blue and resonates so loudly that its hum echoes throughout the chamber.

The masses that have stared at her at disbelief and confusion now sit up, eyes wide, or else cower, arms over their faces.

The Master Sword feels as if it moves by herself; the upwards pull, like magnetism, strains Link's arm. She lifts up her lightning-strike hand until the blade of the Master Sword points towards the heavens. She holds the skyward sword aloft.

And then, from the skies, despite the very obvious roof over the heads of the congregation, a bolt of violet lightning cleaves the air to strike the Master Sword. Yells of pandemonium and gasps of fear accompany the boom of thunder the thor quaking ne pool. The Master Sword glows alive with the violent violet of malice. No. Not like malice, but like the sash that Marin once wore around her hips. An iridescent hue that shimmers between violet and gold.

The Master Sword hums. Though the hum has no words, it carries a sensation, a wave that floods the throne pool and ripples over the congregation, over and over again. A sensation that Link cannot quite name, but a sensation that leaves her with the same feeling as having just finished a delicious meal.

Warm, and content, and somehow reverent, in the strangest sort of way. Link has never much understood the Temples of the Goddesses, has never much felt the pull of the Oracles and the Sages, has never much even prayed before the Ordona Spring. Yet, in the whisper of the wind upon the grassy knoll upon which she and Ilia lay together, or in the ripples of the water upon the pond beside which she and Marin talked together, or in the flicker of the fire of the oven where she and Aryll baked carrot cake together, or most of all in the final swallow of a meal that warms her belly and fills her to contentment: in those moments, more than in any other, has Link felt a reverence towards the Golden Goddesses, has Link closed her eyes and believed.

As if on cue, the royal symphony behind the King Zora begins to play again. A song of moonlit strings and evening calm. The ripples slowly fade. The violet light ebbs to fire-light blue, and then again to softened white. The sensation lingers. The congregation has hushed.

"I believe," the King Zora rumbles behind Link, "that this is a sign from the Goddesses Themselves. O Champion of Hylia...no." The King Zora raises himself up from the water to his imposing height, his laboured breathing indicating the strain of his full weight out of the water. "O Champion of the Golden Goddesses, O Hero of Hyrule, O Her Majesty's own appointed Knight, O Courageous Link."

This time, the congregation does not scream out. A few murmurs sweep here and there. Yet most keep quiet and still, their gazes fixed upon the King Zora, who settles back down into the throne pool and catches his breath.

"I believe that it is time that we all learn from one another. For the first time in over eighteen hundred moons, the people of Hyrule—long isolated and scattered—have again come together. We should treat one another as our brethren, our cities united, our Divine Beasts a communal gift that our Goddesses have granted to us all. And we will use them together, for the good of everyone. We have lived in fear of the Great Calamity for over one hundred years, and now the Calamitous One may rise up once more. A shark may devour a single fish, but an entire school can escape with the safety of all of the fish.

"Let us see one another not as competitors seeking the protection of the divinities, but as siblings, all protected by our own Goddess of the Seven, and all of us protected equally, as a single people of Hyrule, by the Golden Force of the Golden Goddesses.

"In these times most calamitous, we must all strive to extol the virtues of the Golden Goddesses. We must all have power, must all have wisdom, must all have courage. And we must strive equally to extol the virtues of the Seven, even those of other Goddesses, for the Seven love us all, and wish for all of us to exist together in the great kingdom of Hyrule. The faith of the Goddess Zola, the truth of the Goddess Sheik, the pride of the Goddess Goro-goro, the joy of the Goddess Kokir, the voice of the Goddess Erito, the kin of the Goddess Sageru, and the hope of the Goddess Hylia. We must look upon one another, understand one another, come together, as one. O Courageous Link—" Link blinks at him, sweat beading on the back of her neck. "—do you have anything to add, in these times of trial and tribulation?"

Swallowing, she looks upon the Master Sword to whom she has promised a meal, and she nods her head. Link turns on her heel to once more face the crowd. She breathes in. She lifts her hands.

"I'm not the best at speaking," she begins. "And I'm probably just going to muck up all the great stuff that the King Zora just said. And honestly I don't even know much about the Goddesses." Link hesitates.

"Yet I do know...I do know what I've seen. What I've seen is that I've gone all over Hyrule." She will call it Hyrule. "I've gone all over Hyrule with the cooking pot, and everywhere I've gone, I've shared meals, and recipes, and stories with strangers and travellers. I've met all of my very best friends over this cooking pot. No matter where I go, there's something about sitting together and cooking a communal meal.

"I know that life isn't as easy as it sounds. You can't just cook someone's favourite pilaf and have them love you." She rubs the back of her head. "But you can bring people together. Hyrule's got so many things to offer. Everywhere I go, there's different kinds of foods and dishes and ingredients and even whole styles of cooking I've never heard of before.

"And I know I'm talking about cooking again. But the point that I'm trying to make...the point that I'm trying to make is: it's only because I could talk to people and trust people, over this cooking pot of mine, that I could do anything. Even the first person who ever approached me to talk me did it because she saw the food I'd made, all the way in Kasuto two years ago now."

Someone from the stands wolf-whistles. "Kasuto repreeeeeeent!" Link senses herself relax down.

"I know that I'm not the bravest, or the smartest, or the strongest. I'm..." Her cheeks redden. "...really just a girl who loves to cook. And eat. Can't forget that." A single chuckle from the congregation, followed by smatterings of mirth.

"But, with the help of my friends and so many other people I've ever met, I've also calmed the Divine Beasts, and activated all of the shrines and towers around. And the Master Sword has chosen me." She touches her hand to her hilt.

"This isn't how it was a hundred years ago. One hundred years ago, we were all expecting the Goddesses to intervene. We were expecting the Princess to...to unlock this ability to seal away darkness that she was supposed to get just by being the Princess of Hyrule.

"And she didn't. And everyone panicked. Nobody was prepared. We didn't even know what the Calamitous One was going to look like.

"But we do now: We know what's going on. And we know how to fight it. We've even got the Divine Beasts this time! Not just as inert things that we didn't know how to deal with, but we've actually registered pilots and all. And we know how the Sacred Realm works, sort of. And we know how to work the shrines! And I don't really know what the towers do but they're active now too!"
She pumps her fists into the air. When Link lowers her arms again, her motions grow somber. "Monsters are getting worse and worse. I've seen it with my own eyes. And the shrines are keeping them at bay, but we don't know how the shrines work that well. The monsters are coming from the Sacred Realm. So, even if the Calamitous One didn't exist, it's really the best idea that we take care of monsters at the source, right?" She nods at her own words. "If we can figure out how to do that, then...then we'll all be in better shape.

"Just...just don't forget, you know. We're in a better shape than we've ever been. This isn't us mounting one last desperate assault. These two years have seen us...have seen us..." Link loses the threads. She gains different ones. Ones that she knows well. "These two years have seen us accomplish so much. And I don't want to see us all fall apart again. Maybe we should just cook everyone a big meal so that we all eat together. Then you'll know."

She bows to them all. As she angles her back, she feels against her spine the sword that seals the darkness strapped to her shoulder. The blade of evil's bane bound to her back. The Master Sword that has chosen her. "Thank you for believing in me. And if you don't believe in me, I get that, too. I don't know everything that's going to happen. We might not have the Princess with us. But we've got the Divine Beasts and their pilots, and we've got the Master Sword on our side. We can do this.

"I'm willing to lay down my life if it means protecting Hyrule. It means everything to me. Not any one particular part of it, but...the people and places I've met all over. And the meals I've cooked. There's nothing I want to do more than to see it at peace again. So. Um. Yeah."

For a second: silence. Then: the symphony welling up again, strings and horns and bells. Someone in the congregation claps. A smattering of applause, here and there. Not a standing ovation. Not the entire crowd jumping up to applaud her at once.

But enough. Enough.

"As long as we follow the Champion of the Goddesses, They are with us. In this, I have nothing but the utmost faith, hoo hoo." The King Zora claps together his hands; the royal symphony launches upon a triumphant song. "Now, let us have our recess, for I hunger so that I could feast upon a giant octorok. I shall regale you sometime with the heroic tale of how mine own son defeated such an octorok!" The King Zora gestures at Sidon in the stands, who strikes a pose for the crowd. Some in the crowd laugh nervously. Most have riveted their gazes upon Link, who raises a hand to wave at them. "Now, let us part!"

As the royal symphony plays them out, Link wibble-wobbles the several paces towards where her friends await her. Yunobo, teary-eyed, tells her how proud he is; Amali praises her for having being able to express herself despite her fear; and Sidon exclaims that he has nothing but complete and utter faith in her abilities. Riju hugs her around the middle while Link ducks her head and then passes out to sleep.

When she awakens, Sidon informs her of some of the proceedings that have transpired and reassures her that neither she nor the Champions—except Riju, Queen of Parapa—have to concern themselves with the logistics of armies. Whatever the Master Sword did has impressed or moved many of them into agreeing to cooperate, to at least take the possibility of the Sacred Realm seriously, and to consider contributing their forces for whatever they intend to do against the Calamitous One, itself currently up in the air.

All Link knows is that she need carry the Master Sword into the Sacred Realm. Whatever will happen then, she will just have to figure out.

The King Zora requests that Link stay around Ruto in case of additional questions from the lands' representatives. The congregation of leaders does not instantly come to a decision. The hours stretch to days, and the days seem poised to stretch onwards to weeks, all while the veil between the Sacred Realm and the mortal world grows ever thinner. Yunobo, Amali, and especially Riju worry about their staying for so long at the congregation of leaders, considering the advent of monsters and malice still encroaching over their lands. Even if the people of the land once known as Hyrule have started to fight back, the war has only just begun.

Several of the representatives, likewise, express their desires to return, to take care of the here and now, as everyone appears to have their own opinion of what they must do about the Calamitous One and when they must do it. Some—Riju explains exasperatedly as she and Link fry up fish skewers and experiment with different ratios and blends of spices and seasonings in Riju's efforts to determine what sorts of tastes pair best with what kinds of fish—believe that they should wait until the Calamitous One manifests itself. Others think that they should not move until the Golden Goddesses or the Seven signal them. A few, such as Riju herself, propose that they strike immediately to rid the problem of its source.

Riju shakes her head. "I don't have all of the answers, but every time the monster attacks grow worse. Then, shouldn't we do something?"

As the meetings of the congregation continue and tensions grow more heated, the King Zora pleads with Link to sit in. He tells her that she does not have to comment if she does not know what to say. Link confides in him, privately, that she agrees with Riju about striking now, about swarming the castle, about attempting to enter the Sacred Realm before the Calamitous One can breach the veil.

"...but I know that I'm saying that without having people relying on me. I'm not an elder, or an Oracle, much less a queen." Link rubs the back of her head. "I don't really know everything."

The King Zora chuckles in response. "It is good to see you be honest, my lass. If you believe that we should strike as soon as possible, then I will attempt to convince them. And I daresay, with the sword that seals the darkness upon your back, we shall not fail, hoo hoo."

Link glances over her shoulder at the Master Sword. Something...something important that she has forgotten. Something she has forgotten.

She touches the hilt, then lets her hand drop away to the trusty red telescope at her left hip, still trusty and still red despite the shattering of the lens. The red telescope.

Aryll. Arylloftwing. The white bird on Mount Nayru.

Link inhales more sharply than the blade of the Master Sword. The King Zora inquires of what has happened. She requests leave from the constant meetings for a handful of days. After all, she has a promise to keep.

That evening, Sidon and Riju assist Link in cooking a fried cake of smelt and sides of rice noodles, eggs, and simmered hot peppers in anticipation of her journey while Amali races about preparing for the Divine Beast Vah Medoh's departure. Yunobo, of course, helps by walking beside Amali and cheering her on. In the meantime, Sarie becomes an essential part of the cooking process: Link could not dream of cooking smelt without Sarie singing of how fishily-fishy the food smells.

Sarie informs Link that they offered to stand-in for Link during the meetings in her absence. "But Biggy Big Teeth said no-no-no. Kookoo..." They wilt, their korok leaf drooping.

Link pats their head. "You can be my stand-in any day. If you wanted me to be honest, I think that your ideas would be a lot better and smarter than mine." She pokes Sarie's cheek. "But since Biggy Big Teeth doesn't agree, why don't you come with me?"

They erupt into singing and whirling around on their korok leaf. Link can't help but smile at them: the Goddess Kokir and Her virtue of joy. While Sarie prances around her, she runs her fingers through her sidelocks, left and right, to reflect. Whether she would choose between memories of the past or joy.

No, she does not need to reflect. She has already long made that decision, because she does not have to choose. To remember does not mean to sadden. To remember can bring its own joy. She prays that one day Sarie could feel something of that, too.

When Link beds herself down to sleep, Sarie tucked into her tunic with their head cozy against her throat, she can sense herself vibrating.

Tomorrow. Tomorrow. Tomorrow, just after the Sidon's attendance to the moon-set prayers at the Temple of Zola, Amali and Link wish their friends a see you later. Amali takes Link up towards the Divine Beast Vah Medoh. Link spends most of the journey stuffing herself with peppers to keep her body temperature up and to give herself something to do as she watches the terrain pass beneath the Divine Beast. Over the East Reservoir, and over Rutala Dam, and over the Ja'Abu Ridge, and over Brynna Plain, and over Lanayru Bay, and over Naydra Snowfield.

Amali whirrs the fans in the Divine Beast's wings, drafting them skyward, up and up. The atmosphere grows thinner. Without much time to acclimate, Link braces herself against the inevitable strain of breathing in the high altitudes, although for the moment she prefers to lie in wait in the breathable air of the Divine Beast Vah Meodoh.

A sudden thump at the front of the Divine Beast Vah Medoh makes Link jump out of her bed and grip the hilt of the Master Sword. Amali shakes her head. "It's unlikely to be anything but a hrok or something similar. They're constantly attempting to assault Vah Medoh. If I had to guess, then I would suppose that they do not understand the difference in size or power, and charge us on principle alone."

Link touches her chin. "But don't hroks have wings? Aren't they messengers of the Goddess Erito?"

Amali huffs out a laugh under her breath. She runs her wings through her feathered ponytail. "They're monsters who have taken on guises of the messengers of the Goddess Erito to deceive us. That makes them no more messengers than, oh, wearing a rock over my head would make me a goron. Do you feel poorly when you fight against bokoblins, so close to humans that they are?"

Link cocks her head and blinks. The bokoblins, close to humans. Yet she supposes that they do appear closer to humans than to the rito, the zora, the gorons, or the koroks. She asks if she can check on the thump regardless. As Amali predicted, the thud came from a kargaroc, whose wings and drumsticks Link attempts to fry up before she recalls her promise to Kass and instead simply removes the comb, beak, feathers, and lining of the innards to sell.

Amali notes that, with the Master Sword, Link likely does not need to worry about rupees; the King Zora or someone else will provide just about anything Link needs. Still, she rolls her shoulders.

Higher up the mountain they go. More airborne enemies thud occasionally against the Divine Beast as they skirt the mountainside. Link lies in bed, unable to sleep: each time she nearly dozes off, the once-an-hour crack of a bird-like monster against the Divine Beast spooks her into awakeness.

Amali moves her bed from the front of the Divine Beast further into the bowels, where Link has slept before. There, protected from the constant noise, Link—at last—drifts into slumber.

Sarie wakes her. Amali brings her a breakfast of a salted soup and a haddock-and-rice bowl, which Link scarfs down at the speed of however quickly her hands can physically move from the bowl to her mouth and back.

"What did you want on Mount Nayru?" Amali peers at Link, one eye open. You've been more secretive about it than usual."

Link does not reply until after she has gorged herself on the meal, disappearing the rice, fish, and soup from this world, yawning, and then stretching out her fingers. "When Kass and I were travelling..." Amali's features shift to a pang that tears Link's own heart asunder. She goes on. "...I was really sick. Not with a fever or anything like that, but we climbed the mountain too fast. I pretended that I'd be all right. I...I wasn't all right. I couldn't walk and I was barely breathing by the time we got to the top. Kass had to carry me. He's...he's really incredible, Amali. The whole time, he never yelled at me for having done something so dangerous. He just...asked me if I needed to go back down. And when he saw how badly I wanted to reach the summit, he helped me and then carried me back and made me food. "Link touches her hand to her eye. "Your daughters are in good...good wings?"

That elicits a laugh from Amali. "You don't have to try so hard. Wait. You haven't told me yet. What's on the mountain?"

Link rubs the back of her head. "I don't remember all the way." Briefly she describes the white serpent that she saw, diseased with malice, and the clicking of its ruined tongue that resembled the sound of the Master Sword.

Amali brings her wing to her beak. "If I hadn't already seen so many miracles with my own eyes, then I suppose I would be hard-pressed to believe you. Not that you would lie to me, only that you were sick," she adds hastily, and Link nods. "If...if only my husband were here. Then we could ask him directly."

"I'm sure you'd want to do a little more than ask him things if he was around." Link winks at her, picturing Amali and Kass holding wings on their own romantic picnic at the top of the tallest Pillar of Erito.

Amali's cheeks darken in blush. "Link...!" She cocks her head at Amali, who covers her beak with her wings and turns deliacely away. "I...I'll be on my perch."

The Divine Beast Vah Medoh clears the cloud-tops towards the close of the day. Slowing the ascent, Amali parks the Divine Beast on a large-enough snowfield as close to the peak as she can.

The rarefied air leaves Link's mouth dry and skin clammy despite the thickness of the many layers of clothing that she brought with her and the spicy elixir that she prepared. Yet the weight and warmth of the Master Sword upon her back moves her forward; she curls her gloved fingers around the strap while they hike through snowdrifts towards the shrine at the summit. Her hand twitches towards the red telescope. The broken lens reveals nothing but her own faulty memory.

Up they go. Up, and up, and when Link's frost-covered lashes weigh too heavy for her to keep her eyes open, and her Link's limbs ache too leaden for her to keep her boots from sinking into the snow, and when her lungs have all but given out and Amali has to pull her through the last few minutes of the climb, the peak of Mount Nayru glitters into view.

The great crystals of ice piercing the heavens, mirrored blue and reflective violet, like so many blades of grass if Link were to shrink down to the size of a gnat. The Spring of Wisdom, its ice-calm surface mirroring the skies above. The statue of the Goddess Nayru, Goddess of Water and Wisdom, Her gaze infinite as the blind eternities, Her tri-fold symbol like ripples in the water.

And there: the serpent.

The white serpent stretches around the jutting crystals of ice, their winding body looping and curving between valleys in the frost, longer than the Divine Beast Vah Medoh, spines of the same glassy material of the blue-and-violet around them extending from their otherwise smooth bluish-white hide. Their once-proud head, reminds Link of a deer's, rises from a long neck. Crystals of ice —or something like ice—crown their brow. Once, a long, long time ago, the serpent must have looked beautiful.

Now the infection of malice has spread through their form. The parasite has leached their strength, so that their body droops over the summit of Mount Nayru, little more than a shed serpent's skin, boneless and empty as a scroll of paper. The left side of their face has collapsed to ruin, the eye socket a gleaming white. The bone of their skull, too, sports a second skin of malice which steadily drips down their cheeks in place of tears.

Their scales, once a brilliant bluish white, have withered away to dull violet shards. Flaking from their body and head, the scales coat the Spring of Wisdom and the snows below in a layer of their dead skin. Their claws have cracked and split away like a banana squeezed too hard at one end; rivulets of malice drain out of the tips, every droplet further burning away the inner lining of their talons. From the corners of what the infection has left of their mouth—little more than an open hole—trickle thick ropes of viscous purple poison.

The serpent shudders. Link observes the malice flooding the inside of their mouth and churning within them, their throat convulsing around the glop of violent violet. The serpent moves their head away from the slope where Link and Amali stand, then retches malice down the mountainside.
Their body thrashes. Their limbs spasm. Their talons claw into the ice as if seeking a relief which left them long ago.

She hears Amali gasp and step back. Link wobbles. A warm wing around her shoulders supports her.

When Link's palm brushes the hilt of the Master Sword, the blade of evil's bane vibrates against her hand, resonates, hums with a sound halfway to a song.

The serpent gazes at Link with their right eye. Then that same eye closes, and the serpent dips their head.

She closes her fingers around the hilt. As Link draws the Master Sword from its sheath, she watches the blade glow fire-light blue, a hue brighter and clearer than the faint-soft blue she recalls from her memories, the colour so vibrant Amali shields her face with her wing.

Yet again the Master Sword appears to move of its own accordance. It strains forward. Not quite moving, no, yet guiding Link's hand all the same. She steps forward. Towards the serpent, whose head alone rivals the size of Amali's form, much less Link's. She raises her lightning-strike hand before gripping the Master Sword in both. Its tip points towards the serpent, who begins to shift.

Again. That upwards pull. Like a magnetism between the sword that seals the darkness and the skies above. Link lifts her arm, directing the blade of evil's bane skywards. Once more lightning strikes—straight down from the clear sky—and gleams the Master Sword a brilliant violet.
The serpent lowers their head towards the ground, stretching their neck, until they rest their jaw upon the snow, until they hold their forehead level with Link's shoulders, until Link stands a mere single pace from their skin. So close that she can listen to the serpent's breaths whispered in and out of their nostrils, can see the individual scales that glitter along their face, can gaze upon her own reflection in the serpent's crown of horns, no matter how clouded the crystals have become.

Again the serpent writhes. Though they do not groan in agony, Link hears the terrible moist squelching of the remains of their innards rolling over the globs of malice trapped within. They keep their head fixed, yet even now she observes the trembling of their long ears and how their jaws part to vomit the vomit into the bowels of the snowdrift.

The serpent does not speak. She hears their plea nonetheless.

Link raises the blade sung in lightning above her head, breathes, and plunges the Master Sword into the serpent's forehead.

The resonance of the Master Sword crashes into her in waves of such force that her arms threaten to rip themselves clean of her shoulders. The strength of the vibrations blow away the snow under her boots and reveal the rock beneath.

Alternating pulses of violet and gold ripple outwards from the Master Sword. Against the overwhelming brightness, Link can only shut her eyes and focus entirely on not allowing herself to fall away. Her arms shake from the exertion. She leans her entire weight into the Master Sword, driving the blade deeper into the serpent's body, as if endeavouring to bisect the serpent whole, as if trying to prepare serpent fillet. And then, all at once, the resonance dies.

For another few moments, Link does not dare move. She would cease to breathe if she could. Her fingers ache with how tightly she clenches the hilt. One by one, Link peels her fingers away from the Master Sword, and then, readjusting her grip, starts to pull. Noiselessly Master Sword glides out from the serpent's forehead.

Stepping back, she sheathes the Master Sword. Then Link opens her eyes and looks upon what she has wrought.

At last: the serpent's ruined body lies quietly on the summit of Mount Nayru, spent and emptied, nothing left within. The malice has vanished from their flesh and from the ground. No more over-ripened pustules and blisters of malice swelling out from their skin. No more thick strands of malice oozing from their eyes and seeping from their mouth. No more. No more. No more. Their scales gleam their bluish white; their horns again reflect Link's own face.

Yet the serpent themself remains still and silent as the ruins of the land once known as Hyrule. One of their coils droops from the icy crystals to crash unto the statue of the Goddess Nayru. Link's gaze flicks between the Master Sword and the serpent. Did she kill them?

Then the serpent begins to slither. Weakly, weakly, barely moving, the serpent half-crawls and half-falls towards the Spring of Wisdom. They curl up over themselves within the water.

Nothing happens. A moment of stillness leaves Link limply looking look on. Praying to hope beyond hope that somehow, something will—

The shrine behind the statue of the Goddess glows. The blue seeps into the water of the spring and shines its iridescent gold, like the blue curtain of the shrine that has healed Link in the past. Link ogles the serpent: their skin literally begins to crawl over their body, stitching itself back together. Scales and spines proliferate over their head like leaves on a tree growing a hundred years in a hundred second. Their torso thickens, their burned-away innards returning. Their talons fall out and new ones grow in. Fresh flesh sprouts over the left side of the serpent's face.

The Spring of Wisdom does not grant the serpent a new eye, Link notices, but leaves only a growth of skin over the wound. Like accelerated, natural healing, without the fear of death. But nothing that the body itself could not do.

A most familiar feeling. Link reflects: she herself must have looked like this, spasming and writhing, whenever the shrines healed her.

The light fades away as the serpent becomes whole. They rise from the water that cascades down their now-scintillating and lustrous scales, the bluish-white sheen reminding Link of the petals of a silent princess. Their ears flick up. Like Ilia's. Their single eye fixes upon Link. She faces the serpent. She does not step back. She does not run away.

The serpent gazes upon her. Their jaws part, unveiling teeth long and sharp enough to tear through the softness of Link's meat if the serpent were to so much as lean forward and scrape their maw against Link's torso.

This close, Link can feel the warmth of the serpent's breath surrounding her in a cloud of heat. Crystals of ice twinkle around the serpent's body, their scales radiating the same coolness of ice as would a sapphire having harnessed the Hebric cold.

The serpent hums. A song. A voice like a Necludan erhu. A melody curling around her ears and coiling past her senses. A melody she should not be able to understand, yet she can hear in her left ear a whisper putting words to song that she takes as some sort of translation. A whisper in a voice she has heard before, which speaks from everywhere and nowhere at once, cool and warm at the same time, melodious even in its prose.

"We," sings the whisper in her left ear, "have fulfilled our promise to your people. Farewell."

The serpent closes their jaw and begins to unfurl from the water, their head angled up towards the sky.

Suddenly the Master Sword vibrates on Link's back with a force so violent she can barely pull it from its sheath. The swords that seals the darkness starts to hum, and the serpent ceases to uncoil, instead fixating upon the pulses of fire-light blue which light up the sacred sword. The serpent and the blade of evil's bane hum in harmony with one another.

Then the Master Sword quiets back to softened white. The serpent makes a strange gesture with their head that Link cannot comprehend. She sheathes again the Master Sword; the whisper returns to her left ear.

"She who has chosen you..." The serpent's hum and the voice in her ear trail off at once. "We bear no ill will to your people, but neither do we bear responsibility in our heart. Yet, this being of blood transformed to an abomination of will—" Link blinks. "—would threaten our existence. If he unseals the Realm of Will, then we, too, shall lend our strength to protect our home."

Once more Master Sword vibrates. When Link unsheathes it, the blade of evil's bane sings again, and then once more the sword that seals the darkness grows quiet.

The serpent inclines their head. "Very well. We shall give you the mark of our protection. You, who are not a being of will but a being of blood, cannot make use of our will directly. Yet you may brew with our will a potion of protection."
The serpent stretches open their mouth. They convulse themself from tail to head. Upon the bare rock before Link's boots, the serpent heaves out from their innards: fish. Fish, and insects. Cyan and pink armoured carp; blue and white armoured porgy; strange brown and green beetles that Link has seen here and there on the trunks of trees and attempted to catch only for them to buzz off before she could grab them from the wood. The serpent raises a talon to the crown of crystals over their brow and scrape off a tiny shard—which the serpent places onto the ground before Link.

"Brew a potion with the bounties of the earth, with the essence of our horn, and with the force of will contained in the core of your people's creation that we sense within your satchel. Imbibe this potion, and you shall have the mark of our protection."

Link's eyes widen. The core of her people's creation in her satchel: an ancient core of a guardian. "You mean," she signs to the serpent in the hopes that the serpent will understand, "I can cook and eat guardians after all? I knew it! I knew it! I knew I could figure something out!"

She whoops out loud and thrusts her fists into the air, spinning around in an impromptu dance. The Master Sword again resonates. Link quits her celebration long enough to speak. "Are you going to tell the snake thingy what I said? Tell it I said thanks!" The Master Sword hums to the serpent, who sings back. "Wait, if I can talk to the snake thingy...can you ask it what promise it made? It said something about a promise earlier, I think." Link rubs the back of her head. "It was the promise for me to get the Master Sword and the scale, right? I just want to make sure I'm not missing any promises I made."

The Master Sword hums. The serpent lifts their head to the skies. "When that abomination of will first unsealed the Realm of Blood from the Realm of Will, and your people and ours sealed the Realms apart once more, your people allowed some beings of will to remain within the Realm of Blood.

"In exchange, we promised your people that we would watch over the instructions—" Link blinks. The instructions in the shrine, opened by the serpent's scale? "—that your people had left behind to atone for their sins. Now, we have fulfilled that promise. Farewell."

Again, the serpent rises from the water, and again, the Master Sword vibrates so violently that Link tears it from its sheathe, whereupon the sword that seals the darkness resonates, the blade flashing its fire-light blue. The serpent, pausing in their flight, nears their head towards Link and the sword alike. The heat of their breath flutters back Link's sidelocks and warms the frost from her cheeks.

"...we know not the Goddesses' will," whispers the voice in her ear once Link has sheathed again the Master Sword. "Yet, if that abomination of will unseals the Realm of Will from the Realm of Blood, we will defend our home. Farewell, She who chooses."

The serpent's hum settles to silence, as does the whispered voice in Link's left ear. They lift themself fully from the Spring of Wisdom. The ice sparkles from their hide, the winds of their own gale flurrying the snow, as they gaze for a final moment upon Link, upon Amali, upon the Master Sword. Then the serpent glides into the air, spirals once around the summit of Mount Nayru, and undulates down the mountainside.

The frost of Mount Nayru inflates her lungs and push against her heart. Her promise to Aryll. Scrambling for the slate, Link snaps as many pictographs as she can of the serpent on their descent.

Not a white bird, but...white enough, and flying enough. An Arylloftwing. Not a messenger of the Goddesses, but something that Aryll would have loved all the same.
Link raises the trusty broken telescope to her left eye and scopes out the serpent. Although she cannot see through the shattered lens, she can make out serpent through her right eye, through the face of the slate, through the tremble of her hand: the Arylloftwing.

As the serpent has fulfilled the promise made to her people, so too has she fulfilled the promise made to her little sister. The serpent and the telescope fall earthward. She signs: farewell.

A pwumf behind her makes Link glance over her shoulder at Amali, who has collapsed in the snow, her wings over her face. A fusion of awe, fear, and incredulity in her golden-green irises, Amali watches the serpent's retreating back. When she looks back at Link, Link indicates the ingredients that the serpent has left behind.

"Let's get cooking," Link signs.

Amali returns her gaze to the serpent. Link touches her wrist. "Amali?"

"If I had to be honest," Amali answers faintly, "then I would think that, too, had become ill with fever." She exhales. "I don't understand anything that just happened. Was that the...Dragon Naydra, Servant of the Goddess Nayru? I...thought that was only a legend. And you seemed to...speak to Her..." Her breath wisps foggy in the air. "No, you're right. If I think about this any longer, then I will surely go into shock. Let's get cooking."

"...what's wrong?" asks Link, tilting her head.

Amali shivers. "Now, more than ever, we need to have hope. And this...what we just heard...about the Goddesses..." She makes a hacking noise. "...it doesn't matter. Let's cook."

Link apologises to her cooking pot: she must use it as a receptacle for elixir rather than for food. Given her lightheadedness from the thin air, she relies on Amali to prepare the ingredients for the elixir.

The shard of horn nearly freezes over Link's hand when she holds it in her palm, even though the thick lining of the glove. Luminous, the shard catches golden flecks within its deep-set blue, like the colour of Parapan seas reflecting Parapan skies. Into the cooking pot the shard of the horn goes, disappearing beneath the surface with a quiet splish. And Link can think of no better manner for her to honour the Dragon Naydra than the cooking of their horn.

The rhino beetle, porgy, carp, and core distill down into an elixir the same shade as the dragon's horn. Link and Amali dip vial after vial into the cooking pot, filling up as many as possible. Carefully, Link tips over the cooking pot and drains the last few drops.

Amali embraces Link as she corks the final vial. "I don't understand everything that we just witnessed," Amali admits, "yet, thank you for letting me witness this."

Link nods. She carries the deep blue elixir in her wooden box for whenever the moment comes. And, when she and Amali arrive again in Ruto, she discovers that the moment has come.

They will prepare over the next several months, the King Zora explains to them all at the final meeting of the congregation. Upon the summer solstice, on the longest day of the year—as auspicious a day as they could have chosen—they will storm the castle, and they will come upon the mirror within the sanctum, and they will enter the Sacred Realm, and if the Princess still lives, then the symphony shall sing:

"The Princess with her Knight and Champions four awaiting fate's predestined Sealing War."

Yet, Link reflects, opening her hands to the crescent scars on her right palm and the lightning-strike on her left, she does not know if they have three months.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Dorephan yelling "ENOUGH!" is the only time that I use all caps in the entirety of Delicious in Wilds from what I can remember. I would have used italics, but I've used italics to signify someone speaking in sign language. I only realised this when my beta reader pointed it out to be, but the king yelling "ENOUGH!" is in fact an accidental reference to a certain line from the CD-i Zelda games.

Naturally, the purple lightning coming down to strike the Master Sword is based on the skyward strike from Skyward Sword. It's an ability the Master Sword has, after all.

Link's come pretty far to be able to public speak like this. It's a really Link-like thing to say, honestly.

I've talked about the promise that Link made to Aryll regarding the white bird on Mount Nayru in previous chapters, and, of course, Link first met Naydra back in the sixty-fourth chapter, nearly ten chapters ago. Hope you didn't think I'd forgotten!

If you've never had fried smelt, I highly recommend it.

Link's promise to Kass was to stop eating monsters, since she got sick with eating the lynel.

The line about Link shrinking down to the size of a gnat is in reference to the Gnat Hat from Four Swords, which later became the titular headgear of The Minish Cap.

The Master Sword is malice-repellant for the same reason that the Master Sword can cleave through monsters: they're made of the 'being of will' material.

Link's not the only one who can use the healing magic of the shrine!

As mentioned before, the dragon's singing voice is the song that plays whenever Link nears a dragon in-game. If you've come close to a dragon, then you surely know what I mean!

Hey, it's more infodumping and lore time! This is the last big revelation chapter if I remember correctly as far as the lore I made up for Delicious in Wilds goes, tying together everything I've implied so far regarding the nature of the Sacred Realm/Realm of Will compared to the mortal world/Realm of Blood.
In other Zelda games, Nayru is associated with defence: the Blue Tunic in Link's Awakening DX doubles Link's defence (the Red Tunic doubles Link's attack); in Ocarina of Time, the spell Nayru's Love provides Link with a temporary impenetrable shield. In Breath of the Wild, the various dragon parts do not actually confer different benefits; you can use them to extend the effects of any elixir. In fact, a shard of a dragon's horn—any dragon!—extends an elixir's effects to half an hour. In Delicious in Wilds, I have instead distinguished effects. Naydra's body parts—Naydra's very essence—confers defence, which here means a tough elixir.

The "abomination of will" refers to Calamity Ganon.

Fi and the dragon communicate through song. Considering the importance of song in the franchise, and especially given Fi's penchance to sing the messages of the Golden Goddesses, I figured it out appropriate for beings of will to sing to one another.

Kind of scary that the dragons, who are supposedly the servants of the Golden Goddesses, don't know the Goddesses' will. This is because the dragons aren't servants of the Goddesses. They're just very powerful beings of will (i.e. monsters) that have caused legends to form around them because they've lived in Hyrule for a very, very long time, and people are bound to make up legends about the weird scarves they see flying around at night.

Now, you're probably wondering why I made the dragons monsters (or maybe you aren't and are simply waiting for me to finish these author's notes). In Breath of the Wild, I was shocked to realise that the dragons Farosh, Naydra, and Dinraal are sorted in the 'monster' section of the Hyrule Compendium, rather than the section of all of the other animals, including rare beasties such as the Lord of the Mountain, or even monster-associated creatures such as the stalhorse. Weird! I grabbed this factoid and ran with it: the dragons, the monsters, and even a certain someone we know are all beings of will!

As usual, I use "the Dragon Naydra" with a capital D to emphasise the title, and "the dragon" with a lower-case d to talk about just 'the dragon' as 'a dragon'.

The ending of this chapter is abrupt, probably because I stayed up all night to finish writing it (until 09:51 the next day!) and just wanted it to be over. Smack.

Up next: the castle.

Beta reader's comments: This is a really important chapter for lore, that introduces some concepts which will be expanded on later. These particular concepts are some of my favourite parts of the always marvellous worldbuilding in this series.

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef visits various friends and allies, then travels to the castle, intent on confirming the presence of the mirror within the sanctum.

Chapter Notes

To all my readers: please be warned that this chapter contains some graphic violence, as expected of such a combat-heavy chapter! We haven't had one of these in quite some time, so I'll do my best to guide you.

The first such scene starts at the paragraph starting with "A twittering somewhere on the other end of the beach alerts her." and ends just before the paragraph beginning with "Link drops the stone."

The second such scene, which is more body horror than violent, starts with "The loudness of the detonation awakens the bokoblins into a frenzy." and ends just before the paragraph beginning with "She crawls herself into the curtain of light."

As always, stay safe, and thank you for reading!

Author's notes that didn't fit into the end: I started writing this chapter at 17:59 on the fourteenth of August, and finished writing it on at 03:04 on the sixteenth of August.

Oh this was a fun chapter to write! I was up for over twenty-four hours working on it.

Link's gone through three pot lids now. First: wood. Second: metal. Third: mirror. As I've mentioned before, it's just like the three shields that you can procure in many a Zelda game!

The "pot lid of courage, pot lid of power, and pot lid of wisdom, obtained in that order" is a reference to A Link to the Past, wherein Link obtains the three pendants of virtue in the order of courage, then power, then wisdom.

Paya having a papaya-seed-shaped birthmark smack dab in the middle of her left butt cheek is a direct quote from Breath of the Wild, I kid you not. Go talk to Paya and ask about it (once you've far enough along in the game) if you don't believe me. As for Paya and the insects, I've described the taste as faithfully as I can. If you're at all curious about the safe consumption of insects as a protein alternative, feel free to do your own research.

The poem written by Mudora is taken verbatim from A Link to the Past, which is where the lore of the Sacred Realm was taken. Plus, the sky shining gold fits in with the final challenge of The Adventure of Link. But we'll get there when we get there.

Link doesn't even have to play the song for Sarie, because Sarie hasn't forgotten again.

By the way, this should be really obvious, but I'm putting it here because someone clarified: when Kass says that he loves Link, it's in a familial way, not a romantic way! And same with other characters saying their I love yous. There sure are romantic relationships—Urbosa and Zelda, Marin and Link, Kass and Amali, Malon and Vish, etc.—but the vast majority of relationships in Delicious in Wilds are family and friendships. It's so relevant that the FFN version of this fic is tagged as Adventure & Friendship as the genre!

As for the villages that surrounded the castletown, Lynna and Tokay are named after Lynna City and the Tokay of Crescent Island from Oracle of Ages; Molida and Mercay are named after islands from Phantom Hourglass; and Aboda and Whittleton are named after villages from Spirit Tracks. Mabe, of course, is named after the village from Link's Awakening, and is also canonically a village in Breath of the Wild.

I believe that I wrote this chapter after the release of the Master Trials DLC. In Master Mode, guardians stagger their laser bursts instead of firing immediately after the beep! Instead they'll beep, wait a random amount of time, and then fire.

In an interview, Aonuma said that the guardians were designed after his experience with octoroks in The Legend of Zelda, which he evidently had a great deal of difficulty with and which in turn prompted the many-legged projectile design of the guardians from Breath of the Wild.

The description of the castletown is a whirlwind of various references to things throughout the Zelda franchise. To name a few: the entertainment quarter mostly references mini-games from Majora's Mask (the shooting galley, bomb-rolling alley, and authentic acrobatics game); Link's Awakening (fishing competition); Skyward Sword (bug-catching competition); Spirit Tracks (the Take 'Em All On challenge). The goron racing is in reference to Majora's Mask. By the way, the riding gloves that I'm talking about are the armbands that Link wears with the Champion's tunic in-game, with the red "gerudo" (Parapan) markings.

You get to see Zelda in a very good mood this chapter! The festivities have put her in one.

Zelda's 'awakening' in terms of being a girl is based off of an experience of a very, very dear and near friend of mine, who went through something similar. I thought her experience most appropriate for Zelda.

With the departure of the congregation, the Champions and Link part with see you laters and a final banquet. They inquire of Link's plans over the next three months. Each of them offers to have her travel alongside them; then they glance over one another over the top of Link's head, except for Sidon, who merely beams at them all with the expectation that Link will remain with him in Ruto.

Link dips her head. "I have a few errands to run, and a few promises to keep. I want to...tie up a few loose ends before everything happens."

Amali folds her wings over her chest and extracts from Link a swear that these errands and promises will not entail something as—she makes a vague circular motion with her wings—as what happened on Mount Nayru. Yunobo, Riju, and Sidon press in ask exactly what occurred on the mountain. Amali claps her wings together. "What happened on Mount Nayru will stay on Mount Nayru for the time being." Link tilts her head in confusion, but Amali gives her a look; she acquiesces with a nod.

Before she departs, Riju grants to her a gift. "I know you well enough, Link, that you would not accept a shield. Then, please accept this cooking pot lid. It should fit perfectly, thank the Goddesses."

It does. Holding the new pot lid in her hands, Link measures it against the wooden lid and the grated iron lid which she currently carries with her like a duo of pendants. The new pot lid sports a golden rim jewelled in sapphire; ruby; topaz; opal; and amber, and a middle set with a thin and translucent layer of mirrored diamond. "I noticed that you oftentimes have to open up your pot lid to see whether the food has cooked properly. Then, I thought that I would give a lid that you can use to peek inside directly. Thank the Goddesses, it's useful for cooking, so I hope that you'll take it."

Link bobs her head. "Thanks, Riju. I can't wait for us to be able to cook together after the Calamity's passed."

Riju bobs her head in turn. The two of them bob heads at one another, their sidelocks flapping in unison against their cheeks, Link's light ponytail flinging up and down and Riju's much heavier braid bouncing ridiculously enough to come undone. They both break into laughter. Link sweeps her up in her arms and spins her around while Riju giggles.

When Link sets her back down, both of them slightly dazed, Riju smooths down her dress and clears her throat. "That pot lid...can also reflect the arrows of light loosed by the guardians' eyes. Please, accept it, Link. If you stand about two metres from the guardian's eye, then wait until the exact moment that you hear the sound of the light-arrow's loosening, you just have to flick your wrist like this. You have to catch it just the right angle, but...it's much more effective than arrows to the eye. Especially on the larger ones that have a protective mirror over their eyes. Please, Link."

"...I'll try. I'm not really that good at being defensive." She rubs the back of her head to find her own ponytail uncurled, which she now re-ties. The same blue loop that she has used since the Great Plateau. "I kind of fight like the monsters, don't I?"

"Just...don't get yourself killed. Please," Riju touches her palm to Link's cheek. "At least wait for me to figure out the magnum opus recipe of Fishy Fiasco. Until then, you're not allowed to die. So...stay alive, all right?"

"If I have to lay down my life for Hyrule, I will," says Link, her gestures quiet and solemn. Riju nods. "As would I. I'm not asking you to be cowardly, but...don't get yourself killed for nothing."

"I promise to try."

"Thank the Goddesses," Riju murmurs. She leans forward, resting her forehead against Link's chest; Link runs her fingers through Riju's hair. She hears Riju giggling, the sound vibrating through her sternum. It takes Link a moment to realise that Link has absentmindedly started to scratch Riju behind the ears. Link snaps her hand away while Riju bursts out laughing against her.

"You can keep doing that if you want," she manages to wheeze out between peals of laughter. "Wait. Wait. What's that other thing you do with Ilia? Patricia likes it, too." Riju reaches up both her hands, cupping Link's jawline in her palms and drawing down Link's head until their foreheads touch. Riju giggles again. Link realises with a start that in the three-quarters of a year that has passed since she last saw Riju, Riju has now grown to less than half a head shorter than Link's height. Soon Riju might even surpass her. "And here." They exchange a bump of the fist and a slap of the palms, and they hug one another again, tightly enough that Link will still feel the warmth of Riju's arms around her waist long after she has left Ruto.

Link sets the mirror pot lid along the wooden and the iron. She touches each one to give it a name: the pot lid of courage, the pot lid of power, and the pot lid of wisdom, obtained in that order.

Now she simply has to acquire the Master Pot, and she will be able to cook any food in the entire world. Except she already has a master pot upon her back. Good pot. Best friend.

Link embraces the rest of her friends see you later. Saddling up Ilia and obtaining a second silver box for elixirs to have both a several months' supply of spring green and the elixirs simmered of the Dragon Naydra's horn, she sets out across the Bridge of Lanayru, Sarie upon her shoulder.

Then she turns back, steps into Ruto's marketplace, and fills Ilia's saddlebags to their absolute capacity with honey. Link empties out her usual pouches of ingredients to leave only the salts, spices, and seasonings in her satchel. Everything else, she will have to take from the wilds.

As she travels, Link stops by villages and towns to caution them about the Calamitous One, pleading them to—in turn—warn their neighbours. Some of the smaller villages do not anyone capable of reading any sign in any language she knows; the next time she visits a town with a scribe, she has the scribe write out letters in local dialects elaborating on the Calamitous One which she can pass out on her journey. Here and there, Link helps in defend villages against the encroach of monsters, or takes on tasks to flush out nearby nests. Again and again, she hears that she has the look on her face of someone who expects something.

Yet this time she uses her words to tell them: no. She wishes for nothing but their peace. Well. Not nothing: she'll never say no to a meal to a warm meal.

Her first stop: Telma Ranch. To say hello to Ilia again. To see that Ilia remains alive. To play for her the ocarina, to note Ravio's envy written over his face, and to invite Ravio to play alongside her. To warn Ilia about the coming Calamity. To beg her to seek sanctuary at a shrine. To hear Ilia say that she is too old to move such a distance to a shrine. To have Ilia promise that she will, at the least, send everyone else at the ranch to safety. To take Ravio aside and have him swear to do whatever he can to ensure that Ilia survives another Calamity.

Her second stop: Kakariko. Not to see Lady Impa again, but to see the others. To see Lasli and Claree. To see Hirako and Inya. To see the fletcher of arrows and the boy with the bug-catching net who has since grown into a collector and painter of insects. To speak to as many villagers as she can to warn them about the Calamity and to mend the bridges that she has burned with buttered apples. To see Paya and to ask about her favourite food. To hear that Link can prepare her anything that does not include papaya. To inquire as to why not papaya only to have Paya flush and look away. To ask around the village. To hear that Paya prefers a food seen as so strange that she does not enjoy disclosing the information to others. To hear from the painter of insects that Paya has asked him, before, to collect for her beetles and bees from the wood.

To do a bit of her own collection. To find that, when roasted over a flame, bees take on a flavour that straddles the line between almond and tree nut, perhaps a hint of peanut. To discover that a stinkbug she catches by chance in interest of its rather unique scent carries a taste that reminds her of apples. To bake an apple and almond pie. To present the pie to Paya. To watch Paya's features relaxing and her hand resting against her cheek. To listen to her groan at the deliciousness of the pie. To tell her with a grin about Link's special ingredients. To have Paya cry out in alarm, blush, and explain in a whisper that she only wanted the painter of insects to show her the creepy-crawlies that she loves to look at, not to consume. To discover out that her favoured food is papaya. To learn of Paya's papaya-shaped birthmark from Lady Impa, who yells at them standing on the porch: "smack dab in the middle of her left buttcheek!" To comfort a mortified Paya. To glance up at Lady Impa only to have Lady Impa, strangely, wink at her. To find herself reconciling: not fully forgiving—not yet—but at least speaking. To have Paya ask her how to prepare insects. To listen to Paya admit that the stinkbugs and bees tasted better than Paya could have imagined. To impart upon Paya the wisdom of the rito.

Her third stop: Medli. To see the children again. To see Dorian. To see Kass, who gathers her into his wings and hugs her so firmly that she nearly suffocates. To hear of Amali and Kass's reunion having awoken the entire city in song. To have Teba express his regrets that Link did not witness the joy in their eyes. To explain to Kass—taking frequent breaks to rub the back of her head as her sheepish smile curves her lips—why she did not inform him of Amali becoming the Champion of Erito, the Hero of Tabantha, the Divine Beast Vah Medoh's Pilot, O Powerful Amali. To have Kass thank her for having helped them all, for having travelled with him, for having activated all of the shrines. To listen to Kass ask her, very solemnly, not to run away like that again, for he nearly died of worry for her. To perform on her ocarina beside Kass on his accordion, her notes wildly out of tune but at least on rhythm, his fluctuating in and out in his efforts to follow her improvised not-quite-melody. To embrace all of the children again. To cook them their favourite foods. To saddle Ilia while Kass inquires as to where she goes. To answer that she heads south. To find herself embarking on a road trip with Kass, Dorian, and seven children with them, only Tulin sullenly staying behind after having extracted from his friends a promise to tell him all about the trip about their return.

Her fourth stop: Romani Ranch, with her friends in tow, to once again liven up the kitchen with Kass's singing, and this time with Dorian as well. To hear Dorian thanking Vish and Malon for having assisted Link. To listen to Malon and Vish referring to him accidentally as durian during the entire stay until Koko finally corrects him on the final day. To empty her saddlebags of pots and jars of honey for someone just as sweet. To have Cremia weep. To have Malon embrace her and Vish wipe his own eyes. To have Romani erupt in excited questions about what Grasshopper is intending to make. To watch Cottla plead for Koko to make that. To listen to Koko explain how to make her own specialty: energising honeyed apple that revitalises and tastes delicious all at once. To hear Cottla tell her all about how often their mother would make the dessert for Dorian whenever Dorian came home late, exhausted and worried. To bake apples in honey with nutmeg and cinnamon. To let Cremia have the first bite. To see Dorian's features contort into the twist of tears barely held back. To watch Dorian excuse himself onto the porch. To witness Cottla announce to the world her love of Koko and Link, the two equally bestest big sisters that Cottla could ever ask for. To smile to herself as Koko tears up.

To leave the remainder of the honey with the family, hopefully enough to tide them over until after the Calamity. To stand in for a portrait that Cremia paints of them all. To ride on Ilia beside Cremia's Elsi before she leaves. To tell her family—Maryll, Malon, Vish, Cremia, Romani, and Miyu—the truth. To warn them of the Calamity. To demonstrate to them the Master Sword. To have Malon puts her hands on her hips, raise an eyebrow, and tell her: "Oh, Link. We already know. You've been family to us since before I was even born. We love you, you know. When you've done what you can...come home to us." To cry. To hug Maryll, to hug Vish, to hug Malon, to hug Cremia, to hug Romani, and to hug Miyu. To promise to return if she still lives. To promise to lay down her life to defend the people and the wilds she loves if she must. To find herself a home.

To say see you later. To escort the children, Kass, and Dorian again to Medli. To meet Kass for what feels like the final time outside of his home of Medli. To see the uncountable stars reflected in his irises. To listen to the breathing of the accordion as he rests his wings upon the manuals. "Traveller...I happen to know an ancient verse passed down from my mentor's father. This is the final verse that my mentor's father ever taught him, as composed by the court poet Mudora, follower of the Goddess Sheik, who desired nothing more than to record the truth of Hyrule. Would you care to hear it? Excellent. Without further ado..."

To hear the bellows of the accordion again. To hear him invoke the Goddesses again. To hear court poet's final song.

"In a realm beyond sight

"the sky shines gold, not blue.

"There, the Triforce's might

"makes mortal dreams come true."

To commit the verse to memory. To consider that word: the Triforce of which the great tree in the lost woods spoke. To realise that the dawn has begun to gild the sky in gold. To thank him for everything. To be encircled in the warmth of his wings, to press her face into the golden feathers of his chest, to feel his fingers through her hair. To listen to his voice. "Traveller...thank you for everything. I know that you already have a home beneath the snows of Mount Satori. But, if ever you find yourself in Medli, you are as family to us as well. My darling Amali loves you. My daughters love you. And I...I love you. Thank you...Link. Take care, and may the light illuminate your path." To dry her eyes on his feathers.

Her fifth and final stop: the castle.

She leaves Ilia and Sarie a grove of trees just beyond the walls of the castletown. Sarie begs to come with her, but Link shakes her head. "I need you to do something really important to me. You have to promise me that you won't forget."

"Sarie-sarie-saria won't forget what Link wants Sarie to do!" Sarie answers.

"All right." Link closes her eyes. "Do you mind if I play a song for you? I know that we aren't at the lost woods, but..."

The korok leaf in Sarie's little hand ceases to twirl. They land on Ilia's flank and stand. The winds have died. Link blinks at them. "...I won't forget, Link," Sarie whispers.

Link inclines her head. "I need you and Ilia to take care of one another. I'm going to...I'm going to make sure that the mirror's in there. So that there aren't any surprises on the day of the solstice. But if something happens to me and I fall, then I need you to get back the Master Sword. Or, if you can't get it back, then to tell everyone what happened. Do you think that you can do that?"

Sarie bows their entire body.

"I don't know how long it'll take me. Not more than a few days. Give me a week or something. I don't know. Then try to come find me. Just sing for me, and I'll whistle back like this." Link whistles. Ilia perks her ears up. "All right. I trust you. I trust you so much, Sarie."

"I trust you, too," Sarie murmurs. "I trust you not to leave if you don't have to, and if you do have to, then I'll understand."

Link hugs them. "I love you."
"I love you, too," they whisper in her ear. "And, Link?" She looks at Sarie. Their leafy mask flutters as if about to float off to reveal a face beneath. "...you were right." Their leaf trembles. "To remember doesn't mean to sadden. I won't forget. I promise."

The smile that parts her lips is the warmest that she has ever felt upon her face. "...see you later, Sarie."

Link gives Ilia's mane and coat a final brush, checks her companion's eyes and ears, examines her companion's horseshoes, peers all over for any signs of illness or hurt or exhaustion, and cooks her companion as many steamed fruits and vegetables as she has in her saddlebags. She tests the water in the grove of trees to ensure a safe supply. She clears out any nearby monsters, although she finds that the only dangers in the area come in the form of guardians that stalk over the plains, which must themselves smite any monsters that attempt to come near. As they will smite her, if she does not take care.

Setting the ocarina onto the same loop that holds her trusty red telescope at her left hip, Link embraces Ilia see you later. Before she leaves, she prepares herself a final meal of an energising honeyed apple baked on a tiny pot of honey left over from her time in Romani Ranch. As Cottla promised she would, so does Link feel revitalised and restored and very much delicioused. She drains a vial of spring green elixir. Finally Link drinks from the pond, relieves herself, and checks her weapons and equipment.

And then: the castletown. Emerging from the grove of trees where the automaton stalkers cannot enter for their sheer size, Link gazes over over the emerald sea of gently waving blades of grass, tall enough to brush against her knees. She can still make out, here and there against the endless green, the ruins of ranches and farmhouses that once dotted the countryside of the great Hyrule Field, of the farming villages that once surrounded and fed the castletown, that carried the names of their histories: Lynna and Tokay, Molida and Mercay, Aboda and Whittleton. And Mabe. The village where Marin had lived, on Lon Lon Ranch, one hundred years ago. Link touches the ocarina at her left hip.

She turns her gaze northwards. Some thousand metres away, on the other end of the grassy field, the walls of the castletown rise up from the sea, like a mountain island from the ocean. The gates that once lay open to invite any and all into the castletown have long since rotted or rusted away. Great stretches of the walls have collapsed to ruin. The parapets that once displayed proudly the flags of Hyrule and of the nations under her jurisdiction—Akkala and Parapa, Eldin and Faron, Hebra and Necluda, Tabantha and Lanayru—have decayed to a few tattered rags still clinging to rusty poles bent under their own weight.

And here and there: the guardians. The automata that continue to rip the ground asunder with their clawed limbs. The automata that roam over the field with their eyes shining the same fire-light blue as the Master Sword. The automata that the people of Hyrule excavated over one hundred years ago; the automas that the people of Hyrule cleansed and repaired; the automata that the people of Hyrule fell to. The guardians that she will not allow to fell her.

Link crouches down into the grass. If she moves stealthily along on her hands and knees, at times crawling on her belly, she may yet cross the field to the castletown without catching the attentions of any of the automata around her.

Dipping into the box of elixirs, she withdraws a vial of the deep blue brew of the shard of the dragon's horn. She quaffs it. It tastes of the spray of the sea.

Link breathes in a final scent of the grove. She looks up at the darkened night skies, to the pale moon curved like a silver lynel's horn. She lifts up her palms to catch the moonlight in her left and the starlight in her right. The crescent-moon and the lightning-strike. Between her courage and her will, she will not fail. If not even the Dragon Naydra knows of the Goddesses' will, then everything that she does matters. And if not even the Dragon Naydra knows of the Goddesses’ will, then she—and all of the people of Hyrule—have the courage, the wisdom, and the power to shape their own fates with their own hands.

And so, for the peace of Hyrule, Link gets down on her hands and knees to crawl through the dirt.

Before long her knees have started to ache; the muscles of her shoulders and the back of her neck throb; and the rocks scrape against the palms of her hands until she tucks on the gloves she wore against the Hebric cold, which in turn slick the valleys between her fingers uncomfortably with sweat. Still, she crawls forward as rapidly as she can, saying hello to the burrowing earthworms that she spots along the way and the bees that buzz over flowers.

Her stomach rumbles. Amali has ruined her. She cannot look at insects anymore without thinking of ways to cook them up, to fry them or to roast them, to salt them up or even to crunch them live. Link shakes her head at herself. First: the sanctum.

A loud thudding somewhere near her jolts her from her hunger-induced reverie. The sound of rocks grinding against one another. Catching her breath in her lungs, Link slides down onto her stomach in the dirt and lies absolutely still.

She shivers, listening to the guardian circle around her. She hears the automaton behind move away; she dares not to sigh in relief. Instead Link reaches behind her for that mirrored pot lid that Riju gave her. Just in case. Just in case. She breathes in. She breathes out. Every fibre of her body sets itself aflame. A grasshopper leaping through the green sea on her nose. She wrinkles and scrunches her face to try to rid herself of the insect. "Not now, friend," she signs, as if the insect could understand her.

Link sneezes.

Within a second, she hears the guardian's chirping. Link leaps from the grass—the grasshopper still clinging to her nose—and draws the mirrored pot lid from the cooking pot affixed to her back. She grips it in front of herself while she stares at the ground, attempting to measure two metres with her gaze. But how much is two metres? How exact does she have to be? At what angle—

Fire-light blazes into her vision; Link flings her wrist with as much force as she can muster. She does not burn alive—a welcome sign, all things considered—but neither does the fire-light smite the automaton in sacred blue. Rather the fire-light carves a burnt line into the grass several hundred metres out, which instantly alerts about ten other guardians in the area. Link swallows.

The automaton nearest to her begins to charge another bolt of fire-light. Opening her paraglider, Link sprints for the prairie fire that has begun to spread from the furrow of destruction she has wrought into the field. The gust of updraft catching under the skin of the paraglider lifts her upwards.

From her higher point of vantage, Link stares at the eight to ten guardian stalkers that converge upon her position. She swings her body forward, tilting the paraglider and gliding towards castletown.

Behind her and below her, the automata follow, their red-eyed sights trailing her as the paraglider soars lower and lower.

If only she still had the korok leaf that Hestu gave her long, long ago. Then Link realises that she has a substitute. The arrows that Chief Rouru of the village of Elrora gave her months upon months in the past, most of which she has not used, including a set tipped in ruby. She waits for the guardians' chirruping to pulse into fire-light bolts, and then she snaps closed the paraglider. As she hurtles down—the fire-light streaks the skies above her in a blaze of blue that alights the night—Link draws the bow upon her back and one of the ruby arrows.

The arrowhead spears the grass below her and explodes into flames. She pulls the paraglider open again. The force of the updraft swings her legs forward; she glides so dangerously close to the ground she can sense the heat on the seat of her trousers. The automata attempt to veer around the flames that radiate outwards on the grass. One of them catches aflame. Its more sensitive legs writhe, deforming under the heat. Turning her head, Link grins and winks at the guardians which skirt the fires to chase her further.

Link listens once more for their fire-light. Again, she waits for the chirping crescendo to its peak prior to dropping her paraglider and striking another ruby arrow into the grasses, gliding up on the resulting updraft. Not too much now farther from the castletown, and from there to the castle itself.

And then she hears chirps no longer in unison. Link glances over her shoulder to find that some of the automata's charging have drifted from one another, their fire-light bolts no longer in unison.

Link inhales. She keeps her gazes fixed upon each guardian. At the second it chirps, she drops again to the ground, evading a staggered series of bolts that criss-cross over the air as though attempting to catch her. Landing heavy on her boots in the grass, she nearly tumbles over. She stares back behind her shoulder: the automata swiftly catch up to her. Most of them charge their fire-light again, yet one closest to her—beeps. The guardian's eye sets her entire world ablaze with fire-light blue.

The automaton's eye fragments and explodes into a burst of blue which cascades through its body, spasming its limbs and grinding its head against its torso. The shockwave of the detonation pushes the other guardians away long enough to interrupt their own bolts of fire-light that they weakly loose into the grass at their own limbs and at one another.

Notching a ruby arrow onto her bowstring, Link aims towards her boots. She sets the grass aflame—along with her trousers—and the updraft takes her up. As she soars up into the skies, she loops her right arm in through the wooden struts of the paraglider and slaps her palm against her trousers, endeavouring to put out the flaming fabric. Fortunately the wind assists.

The remaining automata behind her—the four or five which have managed to evade the flash fire and one another's bolts of smiting blue—again stagger their chirps into a cacophony of cataclysm and catastrophe, but Link has had enough of hours of destruction that start with the syllable ca. Turning her head towards the guardians, she draws the slate out from its pouch at her right hip.

And then her entire front blurs into pain as she abruptly slams into something very hard very fast.

Link plummets towards the ground, the collision having shut the paraglider. Above her, automaton fire-light blackens a vertical line into the rock of the castletown walls. Her head spins; she can just see Amali's daughters circling over her vision.

The rumble of the guardians behind her springs her to her boots. Sprinting headlong around the periphery of the castletown walls, she searches desperately. There, there!: she spots one of the half-rusted gates leading into a parapet. As she throws herself towards the gate—the automata chasing her down pace by pace until she can sense the shake of their every step on their too-many legs—she forms a spherical explosive from the slate. Link chucks it at the gate.

The bomb explodes. The detonation blows the gate inwards. She dives into the relative safety of the inside of the tower—the door far too small for a guardian to fit more than a leg—and immediately starts choking on the miasma of dust kicked up by the impact of her body on the floor.

Outside, she hears the screams of fire-light shrieking through the skies to ignite the very air. Link whips her head back and forth. She grabs hold of one of the ladders only for the rusted metal to break in her grip. Her rear smacks the ground as a automaton's limb slithers into the entrance and starts to feel through the air. The other guardians crowd around the tiny entrance and stick their own limbs through, until the door has sprouted tentacles upon tentacles whirling around tipped in serrated blades like a particularly vicious octorok had launched onto the openings.

She has her hands full with regular octoroks. Link can barely bear the thought of giant mechanised octoroks with razor-sharp limbs, vomiting up not just rocky projectiles but bolts of fire-light. She pauses. Perhaps she has begun to understand from where, just maybe, the original designers and builders of the automata may have taken their ideas.

The whirlwind of guardian limbs stretching through the air towards her drives her forward. She can consider the complexities of what may or may have occurred ten thousand years ago when she does not have a half a dozen automata attempting to rip her apart. If only she could grab them and rip them limb from limb...from limb from limb from limb from limb from limb from limb.

Link scales up the second ladder on the other side of the parapet. At least this one holds. As she clambers up onto the second story, a sudden flash of agony just above her right hip nearly topples her. She shoots forward the last half-metre and smacks into the wall. Glancing down over the edge of the second story, she sees one of the guardians' limbs flailing around the ladder. Its claws slash at the iron. The bottom half of the ladder clatters into the dust.

She sneezes. Turning around, Link climbs up onto the roof of the wall, from which she can enter the castletown proper. As she clambers up the next ladder, she finds herself looking at several piles of bones huddled together on the parapet's second story. The remains of their clothing indicates them not guards, but civilians. Link hesitates for a moment; she signs a prayer for peace. Then she continues up.

On top of the parapet, her legs wrapped around a pole that once held a flag but which now protrudes barren into the sky, Link gazes out onto the castletown itself. Or rather, its remains. She can see where once the grandest and most sprawling city in all of the land once known as Hyrule thrived. There: the marketplace where she would collect foodstuffs in order to cook for her friends and the girl with the golden hair hair. Here: the water reservoir that led into pools for zora to swim. There: the entertainment quarter with its shooting galleys, its bomb-bowling alleys, its completely authentic korok-leaping acrobatics games, its bug-catching and fishing competitions, its infamously dangerous and legally conspicuous Take 'Em All On challenges where hunters would drag back monsters for people to fight in caged matches upon which many would bet. Here: the long circular race track where gorons—and anyone else foolish enough to take them on—would regularly host their marathons of rolling races. There: the wide open courtyards with their fountains in the centre where the people of the castletown would gather to talk and to listen to street musicians play. Here: the caved-in walls of the research enclave mostly headed by followers of the Goddess Sheik who embarked upon their Goddess's quest for truth by engaging in inquisition and natural philosophy, or so the girl with the golden hair told Link all those years ago, while Link scratched her cheek and inquired about what means natural philosophy. There: the remains of the circular ringposts of the stadium where the rito would play their popular sport of airhoop. Here: the staggering concert hall built in a collaboration between the royal family of Hyrule and that of Parapa to showcase musicians from all across the land, its scalloped design reminiscent of the same traditional Parapan markings that Link herself wore on her armbands one hundred years ago: the riding gloves that Urbosa gave her as a gift. There: the broken leftovers of the two-story buildings where most residents of the city lived, sleeping and eating on the second story while they ran their businesses from the first.

Here: the Hyrule Cathedral rising up like a three-pronged crown in the shape of the mark of the Golden Goddesses; though the paint has long faded, Link can still see the ruby, sapphire, and emerald jewels set into each of the towers, with the mark of the Goddess Hylia hung over the door to remind all in the castletown of the importance of the Goddess who has reincarnated as the mortal Princess of Hyrule. Gone, but not forgotten.

Now the castletown lies in waste and in ruin. Roofs collapsed. The remains of wall crumbled into stone and brick. The wood long decayed to heaps of black. The fountains rusted and dried. The streets littered with yellowed bones and corroded shields, armours, weapons. A few guardian stalkers, many missing most of their legs, still glare back and forth to occasionally loose their fire-light at a scrap of wood picked up by the wind or a bird that soars overhead.

Yet even here she can see the beginnings of life. The moss and the ivy covering the walls. The grasses sprouting in the empty streets. The mushrooms feeding upon the rotting wood.

The wilds can heal. The wilds can one day again become whole.

"The breath of the wild shall whisper over the world, long after you and I have returned to dust, and shall breathe life anew. Such is the promise of the Goddess Farore. Such is Her wind, that She carries the seeds of life, and such is Her courage, that we bear the will to live.' Amen." The girl with the golden hair lowered the prayer-book to gaze at Link. "Link, do you really think that living takes courage?"

"More," Link signed after a moment, "than most people think."

The girl with the golden hair did not speak for a long time. She held the book balanced on her palm as she contemplated the ink printed on its pages, while Link resumed her drills with the Master Sword.

"...thank you," whispered the girl with the golden hair, so long after Link's response that she, sheathing the Master Sword, asked for what the girl with the golden hair thanked her. "Thank you, Link. I'm...glad you understand."

Inclining her head a moment longer, Link senses the wind over her shoulders that gently bobs her ponytail and that lifts up her sidelocks, as Sarie might to speed her onwards.

Onwards. Onwards beyond the castletown: the castle itself across the moat, within the grasp of those strange seven claws rising up from the bowels of the earth to curl over the castle like the bars of a massive cage, the great metal gates locked and barred, the bridge—composed of the same material as the slate and the Divine Beasts—still down over the moat. More than anything, that clenches down upon her heart.

When the Calamitous One arose in the heart of the castle, the people of the castle had not even time to lift the bridges over the moat before the malice flooded through the castle, taking the lives of all those within.
The bones. The bones that she comes across here or there, half-buried in the soil, yellowed and cracked, barely bones at all. Those bones must belong to the people who escaped the initial onslaught of malice, who fell to fire-light or monster blight.

She has not time to kneel and pray. Instead, Link keeps her head dipped in silent promise. Not to avenge. Link touches the red telescope with its shattered lens and its intact memories. She has already tried to avenge once. Not to avenge, but to promise for the future.

Kicking off from the flagpole, Link glides down into the castletown. She proceeds more carefully through the ruins to avoid attracting the sights of the guardians. Some automata have ceased to move entirely; others remain active enough despite the cracks in their armour or missing legs. She realises that she can determine the difference by looking through the stasis ruin of her slate, which considerably eases the journey. Towards the edge of the moat, Link glances down into the waters below that cascade down slow waterfalls from the castle itself, waterfalls that she does not remember from one hundred years ago, waterfalls that must have come from broken broken pipes that once carried the bounties of the aquifer that has supplied the Hyrule castle with water for ages upon ages. She attempts to bring the telescope to her eye again before recalling the shattering of the lens.

Link clicks her tongue. More than anything, she should have fixed the telescope prior to arriving at the castletown.

Still, with her bare eyes alone, Link can spot the guardian turrets—like those on the Divine Beast Vah Naboris—that dot the castle proper; can make out the nests of monsters—lizalfos and lynel, moblin and moldorm—that crawl under bridges and thrive behind gates where the automata's fire-light cannot reach; and can see the flood of malice which still coats half of the grounds of the castle. One hundred years ago, she remembers, the castle towered up twice as high as it does now, with elaborate spires and complex arches built and re-built over ten thousand years. Just within Link's own lifetime, she recalls the construction of a laboratory meant just for research on guardians, that eventually moved after the girl with the golden hair kept shirking her lessons to sneak inside.

Now the castle seems a hollowed-out skeleton of itself. The material that makes up the Divine Beasts and the slate has proven resistant to the bite of malice which has eaten away everything else. Like a carcass with the meat rotted and decayed from around the ribs, so has the Great Calamity left nothing but the very base upon which the castle was built, thousands beyond thousands of years ago.

A strange humming noise lifts Link's head towards the metal doors that remain locked around the castle moat: a flying guardian, surrounded by a small horde of sentries like those in the Divine Beast Vah Rudania. Gulping down hard, Link searches over the moat itself, seeking a patch clear of Malice.

She coils her muscles as she crouches in the ruins of something like a fruit stall, judging by the faded and broken metal sign lodged into the dirt. One. Two. Three. And then Link sprints towards the moat.

Throwing herself from the edge, she opens the paraglider and lands on the opposing cliffside. Her fingers slip over the nearly vertical rock, but she grips with the strength of her life’s dependence. Link hauls herself skyward. Her nails pang against the harshness of the rock. The dirt of the cliffside smells of rain and a strange salt. She listens for the waterfalls below her crashing into the water of the moat.

Clambering up over the cliff, Link flexes her aching fingers. She stretches, cracks her neck, and turns around. And there, ogling her not three paces away: a lynel with silvered white striped in violent violet, itself having come into contact with malice and won. Just like her.

The lynel swings up its terrible club, resembling those she has seen and failed to heft in Hebra, forged of steel and star fragment. Pawing at the earth, it lowers its head and bares its teeth. Link fwips the slate from its pouch at her right hip to jam her finger onto the stasis rune, but she—used to fighting such monsters in the thick snowdrifts of the Hebric mountains—does not anticipate the lynel speed.

When the club connects to the right of her torso, she miraculously does not die immediately. Instead Link spins into the air like a boomerang banana, her mind reeling, the heavens and the earth whirling around her in a dizzying kaleidoscope of pain pain pain throbbing from her side.

Her right torso throbs. Every breath brings a pulse of pain. Something has sprained or broken. She wheezes. If she can reach the shrine in the bowels of the castle, everything will be all right.

The current takes her about the castle's periphery. She notices—on the western face—a sloping cliffside, gouged out by malice long since burned away, and swims towards it. Link drags herself onto the dry land of a sandy beach. She lies down with her face flat against the sand, straining out her breaths, while she checks her body gingerly with her own fingers. Where the crusher slammed into her will surely bruise. Tomorrow, the agony will keep her awake at night. For now, the adrenaline in her system will carry her forward until she can rest.

And the elixir. The potion—as the dragon called it—brewed of the shard of their horn. The elixir must have offered her some protection against the blow. Not enough for her to shrug it off entirely, yet enough for her to carry on.

A twittering somewhere on the other end of the beach alerts her. Link scrambles to her boots to discover herself staring at a pair of lizalfos. One, wielding a long spear, chirrups at her; the other, holding in its claws a korok leaf, becomes the primary target for her to drag out Sidon's silver spear and throw it directly at the lizalfos's head. When the lizalfos dodges to the left, Link rolls forward towards it and uppercuts its jaw through with the Master Sword. The blade flashes so brightly that the second lizalfos shrieks from the pain of blinding. The Master Sword crunches through the first lizalfos's neck and spears the crown of its head.

Link attempts to jerk the sword free of the first lizalfos's cranium. The fire-light blazes through the blade and burns the bone of the monster's skull. The lizalfos tries to part its jaw over the Master Sword. One of its claws slashes towards Link's torso. She leaps backwards and pulls the sword free. As the first lizalfos lunges at her, she steps to the side; the monster crashes into the water behind her.

Link narrows her eyes towards the second lizalfos, now recovering from the light show. Charging forward and swinging in a wide horizontal arc, she cleaves the lizalfos across the waist. Its upper half slides off of its lower half; twin spurts of blood from either stump of the torso splatter the ground.

Her right heel slips on the slippery puddle. As she plunges to the earth, Link looks up: the first lizalfos—the halves of its head split open like a grotesque desecration of a flower—scrambles out of the water. She tucks the Master Sword under her arm and whips out the slate. Link misses the rune for the spherical explosive and instead jabs her forefinger onto magnesis. A nearby rock shows up as reddish-pink on the surface of the slate. Shrugging at the change in plan, Link magnetises the rock. She brings the stone down upon the lizalfos's head and body and smashes the rock against the beach. Once, twice, thrice, until the lizalfo's neck and face have ghosted to red mist against the sand.

Its tail keeps twitching. Link slices its body lengthwise to put the lizalfos from its misery.

Link drops the stone. She exhales, then slots the slate back into its pouch and sheaths the Master Sword. Wiping her face of sweat, sand, and sanguine, she looks around the beach. From the ground, about fifteen paces from the shoreline, the wall of the Hyrule castle rises up completely vertical, made of that material too smooth for her to climb. Just under the surface of the moat, however, Link notices an opening in the wall that seems to lead down into the underside of the castle.

She uses pillars of cryonis to hop across the water towards the opening. Taking a deep breath, Link dives into the cold waters of the moat. The current sucks her through the passageway. Light light ebbs away to a world of shadow and wetness. As she swims forward through the darkness, she realises that the current becomes faster and faster. Her breath bubbles from her nose. Her lungs burn. It dawns upon her that she has no guarantee of air.

Removing the slate, Link fumbles for the pictobox rune—going by muscle memory—and snaps snap pictographs of the darkness. Then she smacks into something solid.

She shoves the slate back. Spreading her fingers against the hard thing, she finds herself against a round, blank wall. Yet the water continues to flow. It must flow somewhere. Diving down towards the floor, she discovers another opening, this time with a glint of——light at the end as the pipe spills her into an underground passageway. She hits the ground face-first. Digging her fingers into the mud, Link throws her head up and breathes in the warm and sulphurous air. She hesitates: sulphurous?

Link rubs her eyes while her pupils adjust to the dim orange glow of the luminous spirals upon the walls; the patterns remind her of the insides of towers and the Divine Beasts. A large cavern of some sort, circular, some fifteen metres across, and too perfectly cylindrical for a natural cave. In the centre of the cylinder, Link more smells than looks at the hot spring bubbling up from the ground. She glances behind her: the broken tube of water that emptied her here alongside a set of similar tubes that must have once passed through the spring, perhaps in some sort of heating system—the girl with the golden hair mentioned that once, vaguely—but which now merely slosh the cold moat waters onto the ground.

She pads towards the burbling hot spring. Crouching by the side, Link tests the temperature with her hand—warm, but not warm enough to injure—and, stripping off her clothing, wades into the waters. The heat loosens the tensions in her muscles. She stretches herself out, presses her shoulders back against one another, rolls her head, flexes her wrists and ankles. Cautiously Link runs a hand over the spot on her torso where the lynel batted her into the air, as though she were a ball in a game of airhoop. When she maps out the outline of the developing bruise, she senses where the flesh has become more tender and sensitive.

Still, not too bad. And she has plenty more of the elixir. When she returns from the castle, Link will have to tell the King Zora and everyone else about the mark of the Dragon Naydra's protection.

For now, she relaxes into the water, sinking down and bubbling air out of her nose. After the chill of the waters of the moat, she can appreciate the heat of a hot spring all too well.
Even once her eyes have adjusted to the dimmer light of the cavern, Link can barely than a few paces out, and then mostly in silhouette. Propping herself slightly out of the hot spring, she reaches into her satchel and checks on the eggs that she collected from the groove where she left Ilia and Sarie. About half of them have broken—Link shakes a fist at the lynel's crusher, not for nearly killing her, but for having smashed her eggs—but three more remain intact. Dropping them into the water, she holds eggs under the heat until she can feel them firm through the thin layer of shell. She peels the eggs, then pops them into her mouth one by one, enjoying the still-gooey centre of the yolk in contrast to the bouncy white. Link prefers the former to the latter—the white a tad too bland for her palate—but the two work well with one another.

She longs to make another egg tart. Though, since she has no one to crimp the tart for her, she might make do with the sweetness of egg pudding instead. At some point, she promises herself: egg pudding.

When she finishes eating, she climbs out of the water and shakes herself off like a dog. Link cleans out the cracked eggs from her satchel before they spoil. Then, while she waits for her body to dry a tad lest she dampen her own clothing, she examines the remainder of the cylindrical cavern with the help of the slate's glowing face. She notices other closed pipes flowing in and out of the chamber. The far wall of the cylinder has cracked. Through the thin squeeze, Link sees light: torches. A brief touch of stasis illuminates the outlines of several bokoblins asleep in a dogpile on the other side of a hallway and a congealed mass of malice oozing over the floor.

Silver bokoblins. Silver bokoblins with torsos and hands and faces stained in the violent violet of the Malice that they have touched. Some have skin nearly unblemished by the malice; others look more purple than silver. Here, spirals along a hand. There, splotches over a limb. There, a pattern over the lower body indicating a single plunge into the malice to the waist. There, a great streak over the bokoblin's face that has left the monster with a single eye. Beyond the hallway, Link spots an overturned metal something-or-other and what looks like a horizontal ladder—or possibly tracks—extending into the dark.

She dons her undergarments and slips on her clothes. Checking to ensure she hasn't left anything of her belongings, and polishing off the final egg, Link embarks upon the endeavour of squishing herself through the crack in the wall. No matter how she contorts herself, however, the crack appears too small for her to fit.

Link touches her chin. She steps back. She lobs a bomb at the crack. She taps the rune on the slate. The loudness of the detonation awakens the bokoblins into a frenzy. Link watches them rush the crack, snarling at her, as they try to fit their fingers through. She sits cross-legged on the ground to observe them, chin resting on her steepled fingers. When the bokoblins cannot fit through the gap, they start attempting to push the crack open more widely. Link stares, halfway to horror and halfway to relief, at how the bokoblin break and splinter their own arms in their efforts to widen the crack. Little by little, each bokoblin ruining its own limbs, the crack grows. A sudden loud grunt at the end of the hall announces the arrival of a moblin, its own skin long bleached to silver and scarred with the violent violet of the malice, which likewise drives its hands into the crack.

Link inhales: the gap widens more rapidly than before. She watches the silhouette of the moblin's form shuddering and shaking as it forces the crack to split apart. The moblin's bones begin to protrude outwards from its own shoulder blades in the sheer force that it exerts against the walls of the cylinder. The ceiling overhead groans.

She lifts herself to her boots. The moblin roars at her. Even at this distance, its saliva sprays over her face. Saliva that does not taste very good.
The skin of its shoulder blades bulges, and tautens, and tightens, and then the moblin's own bones burst free of its body. It shrieks in agony. The bokoblins stampede over the moblin in their haste to reach Link. While they squish in through the widened crack, she summons yet another explosive. A spherical one.

Forget hylian bomb fishing. This is hylian bokoblin bomb-bowling.

Just as she did in the bomb-bowling alleys from one hundred years ago, where she won Aryll a stuffed sand seal plush that Riju would have loved, Link swings out her arm and rolls the bomb along the floor of the cylinder. She detonate it right in the midst of the mass of bokoblins. Like charged and leaping bowling pins, the bokoblins fly away, some splashing into the hot springs, others slammed into the walls.

While they start to pick themselves up in a chorus of growls and snarls, Link sprints forward, limbs windmilling. The mobbed moblin lies with its head upon the ground, attempting still to lift itself from the floor on its broken arms. Grabbing its horn, Link vaults herself over its fallen form and lands perfectly on her boots on the other side of the pool of malice. Behind her, the bokoblins shriek for blood. She throws herself forward. The metal something-or-other: an iron cart of some fashion. And there: a metal track that spirals down into the darkness of the depths that she cannot discern. Why something like this would exist in the bowels of the castle, she has neither clue nor question.

Magnesis will have to prove enough. She levitates the cart from the ground as she hops over pools of Malice that have not yet succumbed to time. Her hands shaking, Link starts to jam the cart onto the track as rapidly as she can. The magnesis does not hold the cart in exactly the correct orientation.

She listens to the bokoblins behind her. Some of them pass through the Malice to screech out their agony. Others—she listens—leap over the pools to land heavy on the floor. The cart. The cart. The cart that keeps turning itself over. The cart that does not sit quite right. The bokoblins converging on her. The cart that slips off of the track to fall into the darkness. The bokoblins less than ten paces from her. The second cart, flipped onto its side, that she smashes against the track with enough force to dent the track. The bokoblins' footfalls slapping against the floor. The cart into which she throws herself. The bokoblin that pounces forward only to land into the void on the side of the track and plummet down, down into the abyss, so far down that Link cannot hear the bokoblin crash down. The cart that she has not time to engage with stasis, yet which she can launch by throwing a bomb behind her. The bokoblins that have reached her. The bomb that she summons from the slate and slings behind her. The finger that starts to jab towards the rune on the slate.

Pain. Pain through her torso. From just to the right of the small of her back to her belly. She can hear that terrible moist sound of her own innards crushed in her abdomen, the ripping of her tunic twisted around a sharp point, the sudden welcome warmth that bathes her inside. Pain.

Then, for an unbearably long moment, she feels nothing at all. No pain. Not anymore. Just the sensation of something long and hard jammed through her body like a skewer through fruit and mushroom, like a skewer through a half-cooked boar, the meat softened enough to come apart but still juicy enough to drench her torn tunic with blood.

She prods her forefinger against the slate. The bomb explodes. The bokoblin that pierced her bursts into wet-smacked chunks of flesh. The iron cart soars forward on the track. Just before her world turns to darkness, Link looks down to see the spear sticking out from her belly, the tip smeared with her own blood.

Strangely, however strangely, she has not yet died. From the effects of the potion. Or perhaps own resilience. Or maybe she has died. Maybe the shadows that swallow her do constitute whatever lies beyond the veil of life. She has heard countless variations.

She has heard of the Goddess Hylia, whose souls reincarnate into the next life in another age and era. She has heard of the Goddess Sageru, who rides beside Her followers in the afterlife, to guide those that still live in the stars and in the wind, even far beyond their deaths, their spirits never truly fading until the last time that anyone speaks their name. She has heard of the Goddess Sheik, for whom death offers a lasting peace of nothingness, whose followers must make the most of their own time upon the earth. She has heard of the Goddess Zola and Her seas lined in silver upon whose current which spirits swim in ever-warm waters. She has heard of the Goddess Goro-goro, whose followers return to the rock from whence they were hewn to join together and live on in the stone, their spirits in turn aiding the hands of the creators to fashion the sturdiest of mountains and the most beautiful of art. She has heard of the Goddess Erito, whose followers pass unto the wind to carry the voice of the Golden Goddesses, to sing until only their voice and their bones are left; at last, only their voice, their bones turned to stone, Her followers having lulled themselves into song. She has not heard of the Goddess Kokir, but she does not think that the Goddess Kokir, patron of joy, would condemn Her followers to a void of pain. And she has known of the Golden Goddesses, of the light of Ordona, who rests the departed down into the soil, their bodies becoming the grass, their spirits the breath of the wild.

The cart hurtles down the tracks. Link does not much feel the spear jutting through her abdomen. She can sense the blood dripping from around the wound despite the relative plug of the shaft in the hole through her torso, and she can sense the throbbing with every pulsation of her heart, and she can sense the agony kept just at bay by her own inability to comprehend what has happened. Then: light. Then: sound. Then: impact. As she closes her eyes against the influx of brightness, she hears the roar of water and the sudden scree of metal on metal. The cart beneath her tilts forward, and she senses herself soaring up out of the cart. The explosion of pain that rocks through her torso and rakes friction across her innards rips a scream from her throat. Her body smashes into unyielding stone. The impact pushes the spear out from belly to back; the shaft pulls and twists her innards. She retches over the rock. No matter how she tries, she cannot lift up her head from the hot steaming egg-scented vomit that spreads thickly around her head. The scent of it brings her to heave again until she has vacated the contents of her stomach entirely, until she has no more to give. And then she heaves yet again. To dry-cough up a splatter of blood. It floats scarlet on a sea of greenish-yellow, like the yolk of a very strange egg, or the pupil of a very strange eye.

At last Link manages to raise her head. Her gut has all twisted around the spear, somehow an even worse agony than when the lynel stabbed through her stomach to grasp her entrails, because then the lack of breath in her lungs numbed her sense of pain. Now, she attempts to focus her increasingly blurry vision, every single breath stabs her through again, bringing a bolt of torment that squeezes shut her eyes.

A great cavern. Larger than the hot spring cylinder. This one appears hewn partially of rock, although she can see the same slippery material sticking out here and there. A rush of water: the malice has eaten away enough of the stone for the moat to have flooded the underbelly of the castle.

And she sees—ahead of her—on the peak of the hill—above the waters that flow beneath the castle—glowing a faint orange—a shrine. The shrine that has saved her life once before, and the shrine that will save her life yet again. A shrine that has kept the monsters at bay from the bowels of the Hyrule castle. A shrine in the heart of the castle.

The laughter bubbling up from her stomach hurts her innards with such agonising, overwhelming pain that she cannot tell if she laughs or if she cries. She breaks into mirth and she breaks into tears and she breaks herself upon the rock.

She lied to Kass. She lied to Kass. She lied to Kass. Without meaning to, she lied to Kass and sent him packing home before they finished activating all of the shrines. Of course: she has heard from Ilia and others that the shrines began to glow again only recently. Of course: after the sealing of the Calamitous One in the Sacred Realm, the shrines must have all died again. Upon their reawakening, as the Calamitous One has grown stronger again in the Sacred Realm and started to puncture the veil, all of the shrines save for the opening in the Kokir Forest require activation again.

At the very least, Link can fulfill this promise. She crawls forward. She tries to crawl forward and the tip of the spear drags against the floor to scrape against her guts. Retching again, she tastes the metallic tang of copper on her tongue, like fish cooked without removing the bloodlines. Her body shudders; the shaking in turn compresses her intestines around the spear; the compression in turn brings her to vomit once more.

She crawls. She crawls, and she leaves in her wake a trail of thick crimson, and she crawls, and she comes upon the shrine over the barren rock, and she crawls, and she hopes that her blood nourishes the moss that clings to the stone, and she crawls, and she finds her arm too short to set the slate into the depression in the face of the pedestal. Raising herself up nearly dips her into the warmth of slumber. Yet she, biting down on her already scarred over lower lip, just barely manages to drag herself up against the pedestal enough to slot in the slate.

The shrine glows blue. Link thumps back to the ground. She pants. She sucks in a breath. She coughs it back out. Then she crawls forward towards the lift. Just before she passes through the curtain of blue light, Link stops. Even in the haze of her mind, like the fog that veils the lost woods, she reflects on the nature of the shrine's healing.

If she goes as she is now, then the shrine will heal her as she is. If she goes as she is now, then the shrine will leave the spear still protruding from her gut.

Link forces herself to sit up. The lightheadedness almost blacks her out again. Her upper teeth pierce once more through her lower lip. Some viscous slurry of blood and vomit trickles from the corners of her mouth and streaks down her shirt. She hiccoughs. She shivers. She curls her hands around the spear. She closes her eyes. She prays.

When her palms brush against the shaft of the spear, the lightning-bolt of agony feels as though someone has taken all of her fingers and pulled them out as far as they will go, until the bones pop from the ligands and the skin tears away at each knuckle, like someone has driven a point through her eyes into the gristle in the back and pushes even further until she sees nothing but splotches of red as physical manifestations of pain.

She closes her fingers around the shaft. Her innards stew and simmer in her abdomen, throbbing against the spear, pulsating like a boar skinned alive, the agony so knuckle-whitening that she would sooner reach into her own gut to tear out her entrails and then her innards and then her entire belly just to rid herself of the pain.

She pulls. She drags her innards out with the spear. She pulls. Worse than even the agony of drawing the Master Sword. She pulls.
And not an illusion, but all too real. She does not only feel the pain, but she smells it. She smells the blood. She smells her own insides. She smells the roasted meat that she could make from herself, the creamy meat stew, the salted meat skewer, the sunny-link or chilly-link or zappy-link or any other variation that she could think of.

She pulls out the spear.

Link collapses into a useless and ruined pile of meat and flesh within the blue curtain of light. The lift takes her down. She spills out on the ground. The trial that might await her throbs fear behind her eyelids. Yet she gazes instead at the cubic curtain of the goalpoint. The Golden Goddesses have blessed her.

She crawls herself into the curtain of light. Shattering around her, the light envelope her in blue. The stitching together of her insides brings a new world of agony into itself. At least the wilds still call her name.

When she awakens, she is curled up on the floor of the shrine. Link sits up and instantly regrets the motion for the pounding of her head. She drains a water-skin from her satchel. Taking out some roasted acorns, she crunches them down, alongside some roasted bees from whose hive she took honey earlier, for those the energising honeyed apples. Even though she cannot bake the apples over the fire now, Link withdraws such an apple. She cuts it into quarters and smear each piece with honey. Four corners. One for each of the Golden Goddesses, and one for herself, in anticipation of the sweetness of the year to come, as she did when she was a child, as she taught Aryll to do when she was a child, as she taught the girl with the golden hair when the bell of the castle rang in the new year at the spring.

"An Akkalan tradition," the girl with the golden hair said, her eyes wide and glint-shimmering from the flicker of candlelight, as she held up the honeyed slice of apple like a fragment of a star fallen from the sky, a fragment that Link could fashion into meteor mash for Daruk. "It's so...so wonderful."

"You're supposed to hold up a plate with honey in every corner of the house to ask for the Golden Goddesses' blessing."

She remembers signing, remembers teaching the girl with the golden hair the prayer: "May the gold of the honey be as the sacred will of the Golden Goddesses; may the red of the apple be as the blessed blood that You have given unto us; may You bless us with a year as sweet and plentiful as is Your will."

She remembers the girl with the golden hair repeating after her: "May the gold of the honey be...as the will...that is, as the sacred will of the Goddess Hy—I mean, of the Golden Goddesses. M-may the red of the apple be as the blessed blood that You have given unto us. Is that right so far, Link? Oh, good! May You bless us with a year as...as sweet and as bountiful—oh!—as plentiful as is Your will. Like that?"

Link nodded. "You set out four slices, and you invite the Goddesses to join you. And then, when They've given you Their permission to eat it for Them, you eat the four slices, in whatever order you want or find important. I...I usually go Farore, then Nayru, then Din, and then I eat the one for me. But I can't rank Them or anything. They're just...the Goddesses, you know."

"How do you know when They've given you Their permission?" the girl with the golden hair inquired curiously. "Is the fourth slice for the Goddess Hylia?"

"No, I..."
"Oh, how silly of me!" The girl with golden hair clapped her palm to her cheek, in unusually higher spirits, perhaps because the king had not forced her to pray as stringently considering the spring festivities which bustled the castletown into blooming like the honeysuckle Link and Ilia used to pick from the grass of the pasture to drink of its sweetness. "I'm still not used to the idea that there are people out there who don't know about the Seven. I apologise, Link."

Link shrugged. "The last slice is for yourself. And I don't know how you know. You just...you do know. It's something you have in your gut, like how you know when you're hungry."

The girl with the golden hair bit off a corner of an apple slice. Link watched her stamp her feet up and down in a half-formed jig as she scrunched up her features in pleasure. "Mm! It's so sweet! I've only ever had these baked before, but it's so crunchy and so whole, i-if that makes sense."

"It does," Link answered, something like a smile ghosting over her lips. "It really does."

"Th...thank you for showing me this. Oh, it...I can't tell you how much it means to me that you'd trust me with a little piece of yourself." The girl with the golden hair balanced the half-eaten slice in her palm. "I'll give you something of myself in return. I...don't really know when I knew it. It's kind of complicated, really, but it wasn't until I turned twelve and...had my coming of age that I was now old enough to become the chosen hero if I needed to, you know..."

Link shook her head. The girl with the golden hair lifted a hand to her mouth. "The twelve year old coming of age? The historic age of the Hero that first set out on his journey? You know, everyone dresses up in blue and gets a little toy sword for the day? Well, some say green, but—oh, that's just history. I can talk your ear off another time." The girl with the golden hair erupted into laughter. "Oh, my, I never thought that I would meet someone who hasn't lived through that. There's another one when you turn nineteen, the historic age of the Hero turning back the Calamitous One." She clapped her hands together. "It's settled, then. I'll get you a toy sword and we'll have your coming of age." Link started to back away, but the girl with the golden hair clung to her wrists. "Please? For me? It'll be fun. We'll get everyone involved. Revali would make a pretty appropriate Calamitous One, wouldn't he?"

The girl with the golden hair winked at Link, who blinked back blankly at her. "He's not that bad, once you figure out that he's...not angry at you, but at destiny, or something like that." Link shrugged. "I don't really feel too destined."

"Speaking of destiny!" The girl with the golden hair dropped Link's wrists. "I didn't tell you the full story. Th...that is, if you want to hear it."

Link dipped her head. "Please," she signed.

The girl with the golden hair beamed, and that smile alone could raise the sun, could make Link believe in the reincarnation of the Goddess Hylia. That smile paired with the apple dipped in honey could make the Calamitous One itself fall in recognition of the delicious beauty of this world. "I remember it was after that...the night after. I was lying down on my bed in the dark after Impa—" The girl with the golden hair giggle-snorted. "—chased me to sleep. I remember that I was reading a compilation of Hebric folkways and folklore, and I found terribly fascinating how they see in ani—wait, wait, I'm going off-topic again." She cleared her throat. Link leaned forward to soak in the passion that radiated from the girl with the golden hair with every syllable that rolled from her tongue. "I remember lying in bed, with the slant of moonlight just over my forehead, and I was looking up at the ceiling, and I just said...oh. Oh. A few days after that, I asked Father why I couldn't be a princess. And it all went up from there."
Link inclined her head. The girl with the golden hair touched her palm to her cheek and blushed. "Thank you for listening. It's not a terribly interesting story, but it was really the first day of the rest of my life, you know? And...if you don't mind me asking, Link. What about...what about you?"

She eats the slice for the Goddess Farore first, then the slice for the Goddess Nayru, then the slice for the Goddess Din, and finally the slice for herself. She swallows. She wipes her mouth. She rubs her eyes.

Link runs her hand over her stomach. Where the spear burst through her, she maps out a puckered scar like a seven-pronged star radiating to tauten her flesh. She stretches. Her skin feels tight around the star, as it does around the lizalfos bite in her left arm, or the thin line where the blade of Tabanch bokoblin's spear passed through her lower right leg.

She stands. Her limbs wobble. Link quaffs a vial of spring green elixir to go with the apples—even though she does not know the exact time of day—and then another of the deep blue. The mark of the Dragon Naydra's protection. She can almost sense how her skin tautens up and how her muscles temper to steel.

Link glances at the shrine. The one hundred and twentieth shrine. She presses her lips to the slate. "Thank you," she signs. Then she takes the lift up.

In the waters that flow under the castle, Link washes blood and vomit from her tunic and trousers as best that she can manage. She cannot do much about the hole left behind by the spear; she rubs the back of her head. Things always come in three. She sincerely hopes that Amali will not have to get her yet another blue tunic. Though, since she has worn green, and now blue, she supposes that she has yet to wear red to complete the trifecta.

Then Link moves on. Through various passageways in the castle, always climbing up and forward. Here and there, where the slippery material lies exposed from the rock, Link side-steps steadily evaporating pools of malice left behind by the Great Calamity. Monsters litter the halls, some sleeping, others playing with one another, still more eating or preparing meals for themselves by burning random scraps that they can find. Some areas seem devoid of monsters; run-ins with guardians soon prove why.

Link takes her time filching food from the monsters' noses: fruits and meats, mushrooms and herbs. She dares not touch the fish that has rotted or the meat that has spoiled, but she guzzles down the rest.

Up and up. She tries not to take on too many monsters at once. No more spears stabbed through her torso. Instead, Link uses her whistling to trick monsters towards her one by one. She animates suits of armour through magnesis. She conjures columns of ice in the pools of water that flow from broken pipes, freezes them with stasis, and launches them directly into monsters. She traps monsters against the ceiling with cryonis as well. She rolls spherical explosives forward for more bokoblin bomb-bowling and lays the cubic ones down as traps.

And, of course, the single most important rune: the pictobox. Pictographs of everything. Snap snap snap. Link takes one of every monster, of every food, of every silly message that she writes into the dirt for someone in the future to find.

She arranges some fleet-lotus seeds into the shape of a horse for Ilia—with much better results than the crabs from Ruto—and then some acorns into a sand seal, for Riju. Though she makes an effort at drawing Amali and Kass's daughters with a stick, she gives up and relies on the tip of the Master Sword. For Yunobo: a valiant effort at the grandfather that he has told Link so much about, eyepatch and all. For Sidon: Link idly practises a serenade that the girl with the golden hair taught her, an ode to the Goddess Zola, which she'll play for her friend once she manages to find the mirror in the sanctum and return.

Link goes on. She stumbles upon like a prison. After operating some complicated levers that make her head hurt more than anything, she clears out the monsters that have apparently gotten themselves stuck inside of the cells. Keeping the Master Sword sheathed, Link steals the monsters’ own weapons and turns them against the beasts: bows and arrows, axes and swords, spears and clubs.

She walks into a room seemingly empty except for a pile of bones on the floor, far too large for the bones to belong to any human or most of the monsters that she has encountered.

Perhaps one of the great skeletons, like those that she and Kass have seen far in the southwestern wastes of the Tantari Desert ravaged by constant sandstorms, or like those in the badlands north of the Eldic mountains where nested lizalfos, wolfos, and one very territorial blue-maned lynel, or like those in the Hebric cave that took her breath and Kass's. Squatting down down by the pile of bones, she pokes one with a stubby finger.

The bone starts to vibrate.

She power-walks out of the room very much not empty with a pile of bones on the floor belonging to a very large skeletal monster indeed.

Once Link has escaped from a monster who has a bone to pick with her—she writes that one down for Romani and Riju; she wonders if the Goddess Sagerua blesses Her children not only with kin, but with the power to appreciate puns as well—she takes an alternate passageway up. Here and there she finds herself looking at closed-off paths or having to loop back another way. Occasionally, she has no recourse but trying to locate her way outside onto a balcony and then setting something on fire to lift herself onto the upper stories by a flame-induced updraft.

After her third round of such an updraft, when another malice-scarred lynel with a spear almost skewers her if not for how quickly she throws herself towards the ground and rolls forward to thrust the Master Sword through the lynel's less protected belly, Link runs out of things to burn and so, entering the hallways of the castle again, continues stealing food from monsters. She will say one thing about monsters: they know how to roast meat.

Link comes upon something of a dead end in her endless upwards journey, her right palm still lightly bleeding from having a surprise keese puncture the skin with one of its wing-claws. As she licks the blood off and lets her saliva heal the injury, she lowers her eyelids. She senses: a breeze. A breeze from somewhere, in a vaguely square shape just around...here.

Rapping her knuckles against the wall, she listens to the metal resonate against her hand. She steps back and smirks with satisfaction. Link magnetises the whatever-it-is in the wall and pushes forward. The sudden brightness of the light closes her eyes. Something thumps on her head hard enough to water her eyes.

A book. A book falling to her boots, opened to a page so densely scribbled with ink that Link cannot make out the actual words, save for an illustration that resembles a knight attempting to do battle with a snail.

Blinking blearily, Link looks up and around: she stands in the royal library, the metal bookcase in front of her still connected to her slate by magnesis. A grand hall of an affair with shelves upon shelves of books, where the girl with the golden hair loved to spend her time until the king started to forbid her from ever entering. Books upon books, tomes upon tomes, volumes upon volumes.
Half the knowledge of Hyrule contained within.

The other half, of course, Link has seen in the royal Parapan kitchens of Nabooru. No, not kitchens. She meant library. Did she?

Cautiously, from behind the safety of the bookcase, she glances around the library. On either end of the hall, Link makes out the great doors that lead to the rest of the castle. Both sets of doors have long since broken: those on the right-hand side having collapsed from their hinges, one of the giant metal pieces still hanging off of the upper floor of the library, the second having long since fallen to the lower level; the left set of doors has yawned into a puddle of malice. Right. The right-hand entrance it is.

And around the library: monsters. Monsters crouching on the table covered in scraps of food, the books greased and flung open. Monsters tearing up the pages to stuff into their mouths. Monsters fighting against one another with their claws outstretched, wrestling on the floor, slamming one another against the shelves and the piles of books already strewn over the floor.

Link winces. If she again sees the girl with the golden hair, Link will never speak of this, lest—after they have long sealed away the Calamitous One—she kills the girl with the golden hair by way of a heart attack.

The second that Link lowers her hand, the trail of magnesis from the slate to the metal bookcase dies. It topples to the ground, spilling books onto the floor in bindings of leather, in blue and red and gold and purple and green and orange.

The entire library falls silent as every single monster in the long stretches of shelves turns their heads towards her at once. She blinks.

She runs for the open entrance that she spots under the right-hand stairs. The bokoblins, dinolfos, and lizalfos hanging around the library—as well as a single yipping remlit baring its fangs at her—swarm towards her. Link picks up the metal half of the door that has fallen and—wielding it half as a shield and half as a battering ram—bats the monsters away from herself. Her gaze falls upon a book propped open at the corner of the table.

On the page: an illustration of a violet cake. Link skids to a stop in front of the book. Still using the metal door to protect herself from the onslaught of monsters—and mentally signing apologies to the girl with the golden hair for crashing monsters against her precious bookshelves that she has learned by heart—Link scans down the lines of the pages. Monster extract, goat butter, Tabantha wheat, cane sugar, aerated salt, buttercream icing, Hyrulean apple. Instructions on how to decorate and best serve the cake, with such and such garnishes, with so and so liquored milk.

A monster wedding cake, fit for a monster wedding. A specialty of the Hyrule royal family. The description of the sensations and the tastes evoked waters her mouth and her eyes at once. Her stomach rumbles. The Master Sword starts to vibrate on her back, but Link ignores the resonance in favour of memorising the very last few lines. She commits the monster cake to memory just as her legs fly out from beneath her.

The dinolfos that has buckled her knees with a swipe of its tail pounces upon her. Link draws the Master Sword and thrusts the blade forward. The fire-light dances over the scales of the monster's underbelly a second before she carves the mark of the Golden Goddesses through its torso. The dinolfos's lunging claw manages to just boop her nose as Link spears the Master Sword skyward and flings the dinolfos from the blade, as though she were chucking off a pumpkin gourd stuck on the end.
Then Link turns tail—grabbing the cookbook with her—and half-rolls half-throws her body forward into the entrance under the stairs. Lobbing an explosive behind her, she explodes a pair of bokoblins wielding heavy axes. Magnesis pushes the first metal thing she spots—another bookshelf—into the doorway. Without the light of the library, the darkness of the small chamber leaves her temporarily sightless.

Immediately something slams into the bookshelf. Link sucks in a breath, but the magnesis holds. Monsters crash themselves against the bookcase over and over. Setting the slate upon the floor, Link notes that the magnesis does not break, nor does the slate move. The slate should keep the bookcase against the entrance whether she keeps it in her hands or not. In the meantime, she digs through her satchel, fishing out one of the pieces of flint that Kass gave to her.

Link fumbles around the small chamber. Nothing like a torch, or a candle, that she can find. But she does find books, and books, and books. With another wince and another apology, she sets one of the tomes aflame.

The book she burns provides sufficient light for her to explore her surroundings: a small study of sorts. A desk and a chair. Several bookshelves marked with notes to not touch the King of Hyrule's property without express permission. Upon the desk: a closed journal, marked with the symbol of the Goddess Hylia and the triangles of the Golden Goddesses that have long served as the mark of the royal family of Hyrule.

Her eyes embiggen: king's writing. She shouldn't. But she has time to kill while she waits for the monsters to bore themselves or think of a new plan.

Link seats herself cross-legged on the chair where once sat the king. She holds the sacred volume in her palms. Blowing off a skein of dust that has long formed on its cover, she opens the tome, the pages white and creamy. Link wets her forefinger and flips to the first page of the holy tome.

She reads through the cookbook.

When she has finished browsing the cookbook, her stomach has grumbled enough to rival the roars of the monsters that claw against the metal bookcase. Link reaches into her satchel to scroumage up something of a meal. The berries that she picked in the grove have smooshed against the insides of the repurposed water-skin she plucked them into. Still, the juices run sweet, the pulp pleasantly tart. Scooping out the squashed berries, she laps the remainder off of her hands.

Link lowers her eyelids. She has not eaten smooshed berries like this since the days she wiled away on the Great Plateau.

The pounding of the monsters against the metal bookcase ebbs. Link looks around the study. She uncovers, to her surprise, a stack of the girl with the golden hair's dossiers upon the desk, the ones that the king—or so Link thought—refused to accept. She opens one: the king's handwriting scrawls in comments down the margins.

Link tilts her head. She stuffs as many annotated dossiers as will fit into her satchel. She might not have the education or knowledge to understand what they say, but they could hold keys to the Sacred Realm: all that the girl with the golden hair told her, which she never understood.

The pounding grows still fainter. Soon, Link will emerge from the study to continue her journey to the sanctum. She does not remember the layout of the castle well enough to recall the girl with the golden hair's chambers, or...or the quarters that she and Aryll shared. For the better. Link touches the red telescope at her left hip.
She has already said her farewells. And if she has time to say them again, then she would rather greet Aryll with a bowl of food. A plate of carrot cake, or some catfish stew, or even a wildberry cannoli Aryll has never tried before. Then, and only then, will Link say farewell to Aryll again, and not empty-handed like this.

Shaking her head, Link closes one eye, then opens up the king’s journal. She flips forward through the entries that grow more erratic as the years pass. The hundred years of passing have smudged most of the ink on the pages and faded the rest, yet she can still make out a few sentences here or there, or occasionally almost an entire paragraph. She reads.

Lady Impa's words spring to mind. The king, who wanted nothing more than his daughter's happiness. The king, who wanted nothing more than the peace of Hyrule. The king, who writes his regret for having hurt his daughter. The king, who begs the Goddess Hylia to manifest, so that his daughter can live the rest of her days in peace. The king, who promises to try to make everything up to his daughter. The king, whose heart hurt so badly he could not sleep for a month after implying that his daughter—his precious daughter—could be anything less than a true daughter of Hylia. The king, who could see the uselessness of his own actions. The king, who promised himself that he would release his daughter upon her return from Mount Nayru, if their final efforts yielded in naught. His daughter. His daughter. His daughter, over and over again. Signed: His Highness the King Rhoam Bosphoramus Harkinian of Hyrule.

Link closes the journal. She closes her eyes. She closes herself. She wonders how she might have felt had she discovered the people of that house regretting what they did to herself and to Aryll, had she discovered the people of that house deciding to do right after Aryll had long turned eighteen herself, had she discovered the people of that house having some motivations or circumstances that led them to do what they had.

She does not equate understanding with forgiveness. She does not know what the girl with the golden hair will do, but Link knows what she has already done.

For the sake of the girl with the golden hair, Link slides the journal into her satchel as well. She puts out the flames of the tome. Then, very slowly, she pushes the metal bookcase out.

Link props up the metal door as a ramp to the second floor of the library to sprint headlong up the stairs. She crashes into a dinolfos—cracking their foreheads together—and does not bother to dispatch the monster before hurtling through the open doorway. The monsters of the library—and not those contained within the pages of the books—pursue her as she thunders through the halls. The scent of food nearby nearly causes her to swerve and stop when she comes upon a dining table, but the vibrations of the Master Sword on her back pelt her forward.

She lopes back to grab just one drumstick. "Just one," she promises the Master Sword, while the lizalfos chasing her crash into the dining hall table and flip it over directly onto a pack of sleeping wolfos, which do not much appreciate their early awakening from their food-induced naps. The wolfos and lizalfos tear each other apart. The drumstick clenched between her teeth—so tender, so juicy, just raw enough for the juices to course down her chin but well-roasted enough for the outside fattened skin to have crisped to a crinkled perfection—Link jogs upwards in a spiralling path, heaves open a metal door with magnesis, finds herself staring at a silver hinox's massive face, shuts the metal door, and walks back down to take an alternate passageway.

Eventually, she lucks out: a crack in the wall lets Link slip out onto the upper levels of the castle, where she has nothing to fear but the dozens upon dozens of guardian sentries and turrets and flying things that go 'round and 'round.

More practise for the mirrored pot lid. Link passes by beneath arches. She leapfrogs over malice oozing the slippery material on which she slides once or twice. She parries the fire-light bolts of automata, which she takes very carefully one at a time and never, ever, flicks her wrist too early. When she catches the attention of a pair of sparring lynels that put aside their differences to charge her at once, she rolls forward and forward until she emerges into the open. Link whistles for the nearest half-dozen guardians, which attempt to scorch her where she stands—well, sprints—and succeed instead at felling both lynels at once.

She hikes up the hill to the top of the castle. Funny, how naked the castle looks without its myriads of flags and its coatings of paint, without all of the extra parapets and spires of brick and stone and metal. Stripped down to the tower that Link did not even know the castle held at its base.

And this, only the top of the tower, from what the talking tree in the Kokir Forest had said. Only the Goddesses know what could lie far, far down beneath the castle's base. Only the Goddesses, for now, that is. The girl with the golden hair, Link pictures, would love to investigate.

She hides from a flying automaton behind an archway of the tower, the spiralling patterns glowing dull orange. Link wonders where in the castle she might uncover a pedestal wherein she can slot her slate to activate the castle in blue. When she attempts to reflect back the fire-light of another guardian, she realises that the angle at which the flying automata blaze fire-light makes the task much more difficult than the sentries and stalkers she has eliminated before. Instead, Link removes a hard apple from her satchel and lobs it as hard as she can towards the guardian's eye. The fruit splatters against the eye. Link watches the automaton spray a jet of water onto its own eye, cleansing the lens of apple juice.

In the meantime, Link races forward to crouch behind another archway. The guardian probes around the vicinity—she stills her breath by stuffing her face with a slice of bread—and then, giving in, soars away to continue its patrol. The automaton blasts a duck flying by. Its roasted whole body crashes into the ground not ten paces from Link, who takes a single step in its direction only for the Master Sword to vibrate as if attempting to trigger an earthquake.

Link cups her hands over her eyes in lieu of binoculars and squints. "You're right," she says to the Master Sword, laying the blade down onto the ground so that she can sign to her companion. "I don't think the remains of that duck are edible. Thanks for saving me yet again, old friend." She pats the Master Sword on the hilt. The Master Sword wilts away its wings in response. Link cocks her head at the blade until the sword returns to normal, though the jewel in the hilt dims and brightens as if blinking at her.

Sheathing the Master Sword, Link scrambles up up from the dusty ground, wipes her palms on her trousers, and turns her head towards the belltower at the peak of the castle, from which an impossibly tall metal pole still reaches the heavens, the tattered remains of Hyrule's flag fluttering weakly in the Goddess Farore's wind.

And here, the path upon which she now stands, worn down by one hundred years of passing to the golden-brown of the slate and the Divine Beasts, leads her towards the heart of the Hyrule Castle: the sanctum.

Nearly the highest point of the castle, just below the belltower which stretches into the skies, housing the bell that would—every spring—ring in the new year amid prayers to the Golden Goddesses and to the Seven for a year of peace, of plenty, of prosperity. For all she knows, that bell has burned away to malice as well.

Link steps forward. She can see through the arch of the doorway to the inner sanctum beyond, to circular stands where once stood the royal family, the Champions, and the Sages and Oracles of the castletown, seeking the guidance and blessings of the Goddesses. She can still remember the stained glass windows of the Seven Sages upon the walls, their faces almost unrecognisable, retouched and restored occasionally over the years, and each time changing ever so slightly. The girl with the golden hair once showed Link illustrations of the windows through the years, documented over the past three centuries. She pointed out how just the Sage of the Goddess Kokir has passed through entirely different designs. "It is more than possible," the girl with the golden hair explained to her, "that we no longer know how any of the Sages looked. Incredible, isn't it, how little we know of our own history..."

Now that Link considers the stained glass window, she realises that the korok in the window does not resemble any korok she has ever seen. And she has seen—she reflects—at least eight hundred and ninety nine. Plus Sarie and Hestu. Nine hundred and one.

When she sees the girl with the golden hair again in the veil beyond the mortal world, Link will have to tell her about everything that she has seen. The mirror in the sanctum. She'll see it, and she'll touch it, and she'll figure out how to open the veil, and then she'll step into the land where the sky shines gold not blue, and she'll see again for the first time in one hundred years the——emptiness of the sanctum.

Link stops in her tracks.

The sanctum. The circular chamber. The openings that once held the stained glass windows of the Seven Sages, now empty to the wind that gusts through the vacant tower carrying not the Goddess Farore's seeds of life but the numbing scent of decay from the ruins of the castletown below. The floor and the ceiling, once painted over in brilliant spirals of green and blue and red in the colours and the symbols of the Golden Goddesses culminating in their symbol—three triangles, arranged in a triangle of their own, like the three-pronged crown of the King of Hyrule, like the three towers of the Hyrule Cathedral—upon the centre of the circle, upon the very heart of Hyrule. And there: the void.

Nothing. Nothing at all. No, not nothing, but worse than nothing: the stand that once held the mirror, carved out of the same material as the towers and as the slate and as the Divine Beasts themselves. The circular stand to which Link walks. Once, once, one hundred years ago, she saw the mighty black obelisk marked with the symbols of the Golden Goddesses set into this stand of gold and brown, on that spring where the bell above the sanctum rang in the new year.

She raises up her hands. She splays her fingers out. She moves forward, one step at a time, her breath sunk down into her own throat. She hovers her palms just above where once lay the circular face of the mirror.

Closing her eyes, Link thrusts her arms into the stand. She feels: nothing. She feels: light. She feels: air.

She lifts her eyelids as she might lift curtains over a funeral casket. Her arms have gone through the space of the stand like through the mouth of a cooking pot, like a cooking pot without anything in it. No, not like a cooking pot. Only the rim of a cooking pot, the belly vanished into the abyss. Not even the possibility of preparing a meal. No invisible mirror. No secret passageway to the Sacred Realm. Nothing but air.

Her heart begins to twist; her stomach, to churn.

Link scours the sanctum. She must have missed something. Anything. She draws out the Master Sword. She points the Master Sword around, whirls it as she might whirl a thin dough over her head, lets it clatter to the floor. She looks upon the ground: a single white cloth, like a funeral shawl, left upon the floor. She stares up above at the belltower: no bell. The malice must have passed, must have burned away in the hundred years, must have destroyed the bell, must have destroyed the—

She does not remember her legs giving out beneath her until her knees hit the floor, and even then she does not remember her body going cold until she feels her lungs rising and falling against the floor, her chin thudding against the cold, cold ground.

The mirror that reflected within its night-sky glass all of the dreams and hopes of the people of Hyrule—all their pride and their joy, all their voice and their kin, all their truth and their faith, and all of their hope—has vanished.

Maybe. Maybe somewhere, somewhere, in all of the wilds of Hyrule, in all of the lands that take months upon months to cross much less to search, she could another mirror. The second mirror that the girl with the golden hair mentioned. That might not have shattered after all. The second mirror. That might not exist. That might exist. That she has no choice, now, but to search for it. Somewhere. Somewhere. Possibly. In the wilds of Hyrule. Yet—like the beings of will of the Sacred Realm—if she loses hope that they can cross the veil, then she, too, will die.

She has three months. Three months, until the summer solstice comes, to find a mirror, to find another path to the Sacred Realm, to find anything that will deliver them salvation from the Great Calamity. The Great Calamity from which she failed to deliver them one hundred years ago.

Yet Hyrule is very, very, very vast.

And she is very, very, very small.

Chapter End Notes
and I wish more Zelda games did so.

The bokoblin and moblins literally killing themselves to get at Link is in reference to the fact that they do not comprehend how life in the Realm of Blood/mortal realm works. They think, because this is what they known their entire lives, that they can simply will themselves back together. But that's not true. Would you be afraid of unscrewing a water bottle if you knew you could screw it back on with a simple motion of the hand? Probably not.

Hey, lots of possibilities for what comes after death! Is that a right answer? Maybe. Link doesn't know what to believe.

Why is Link being so reckless with her plan to check out the castle? She figured she would just go in and out quick enough to confirm the existence of the mirror in the sanctum, just in case. She wasn't exactly expecting to be stabbed through the back.

Besides, she knew about the shrine in the castle, and she had the potion of the dragon's protection. But I think the important thing to remember is that Link just got the Master Sword, and she just managed to convince everyone to fight against the Calamitous One. That's pretty big! She still probably should have told people where she was going, but didn't for fear of worrying them if they found out that the mirror might not actually be in the sanctum. Still, she should have. She's done much better about keeping her responsibilities in check though.

As I've mentioned before, most places in Hyrule celebrate the new year in the spring! The tradition with the apple slices and honey was inspired by something I did myself as a child for my own new year (not the one in the middle of winter).

Link stealing food from the monsters is in reference to the dining hall you can enter in Breath of the Wild, where you can literally stealing food from tables. The prison and the stalfos are pulled likewise from Breath of the Wild. In the library, you can indeed find recipes for monster cake—and for one other type of cake. Guess what Zelda's favourite food is.

In Breath of the Wild, the King of Hyrule's name is Rhoam Bosphoarums Hyrule. I think it's silly for him to have the surname Hyrule, so I went with Harkinian, as I have for Zelda. By the way, while Impa had a different view of Zelda's father, Link herself points out that if she were Zelda, she wouldn't forgive Rhoam's actions. It's a complex situation, but the point was not that Zelda has to forgive him.

I very much enjoyed getting to write Fi's interactions with Link, in terms of her vibrating to communicate!

In Breath of the Wild, there's a korok at the tippity top of the flagpole on Hyrule Castle. It really amused me. I got all the way up there as the music of Hyrule Castle swelled around me, and then: "Yahaha! You found me!"

I use words like 'deliver' and 'salvation' with respect to the Great Calamity, but these words aren't meant to evoke Christianity or something like that. I'm using them more in their, uh, neutral sense, of literal salvation from a crisis.

And whoops! I hope you didn't think it was going to be that easy.

A few comments couldn't quite fit, so I'll drop them in at the beginning of the seventy-fifth chapter. See you then!
Up next: the Great Plateau; an old, not too welcome face; wedding cake.

Beta reader's comments: Exploring the castle is so cool. The castle is one of my favourite parts of Breath of the Wild, and seeing Delicious in Wilds Link explore it is really neat.

It's nice for Link to get to read the king's journal. He did some awful things, but he wasn't pure evil. It's nice to get to see that.

The mirror in the sanctum that the girl with the golden hair used on the eve of the Great Calamity no longer exists within the castle, if it exists at all. The travelling chef returns to the Great Plateau in the hopes of discovering another route into the Sacred Realm using the shrine in which the chef awoke two years ago. In the process, the chef greets an old friend and an old foe in one.

Author's notes from the previous chapter that didn't fit: With respect to the prayer that Zelda reads—"The breath of the wild shall whisper over the world, long after you and I have returned to dust, and shall breathe life anew. Such is the promise of the Goddess Farore. Such is Her wind, that She carries the seeds of life, and such is Her courage, that we bear the will to live."—believe it or not, but I didn't intend to use the phrase breath of the wild initially. I was going to write "breath of the wind" (as in Farore) but accidentally wrote "wild" instead, and later thought that the namedrop was so appropriate I left it in there. Living does take courage. If you're reading this, and you're alive, thank you for making the decision to be alive day in and day out.

As I mentioned before, Central Hyrule has two coming of ages, one at twelve and one at nineteen! In The Wind Waker, it was customary for children on Outset Island at the age of the hero to dress in the green of the Hero of Time. In Delicious in Wilds, this tradition has continued, except that the story of how the hero used to dress is different now. Now, the story is blue—why? Well, legends and histories change over time. Perhaps the people of Delicious in Wilds remember a certain pair of lobster pyjamas instead.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

She glides down from the sanctum. She cloaks herself in the white funeral shawl. She crosses the ruins of the castletown. She crawls again through the fields—the guardians ignore her—towards the grove where she left Ilia and Sarie. She finds the two of them safe and sound, and only then does she let herself breathe.

As she saddlebags Ilia for a ride south and as Sarie refrains from asking her questions about the castle, Link comes across a group of self-proclaimed treasure-hunters headed towards the castle to sack it. She hears from them that, although most of the jewels and other treasures have long vanished from the castle into the hands of other treasure-hunters, they have an inkling that they could still find the exceedingly rare and exceedingly expensive armour and weaponry left behind by the famous royal smiths.

"There's nothing but dust there," Link warns them. "Even what little weapons there are have become brittle and rusted over the years. Keep yourselves safe. Do you want any more mushroom
The treasure-hunters head out towards the castle regardless. She insists that they drink—in front of her—vials of the deep blue elixir with the mark of the Dragon Naydra's protection. In another time, Link would have gone with them, half-tour guide and half-guardian. Now, she has not the time.

Things, as her Parapan friends would say, have already gone north. Link might as well go south. So south she rides, through the grasses of Central Hyrule. Declaring their intent to cheer her up, Sarie sings nearly constantly, which eventually prompts Link to draw out her own ocarina and accompany them. They play a song that those who worked the fields themselves would hum together to keep time, harmony, and spirits high, a song so pervasive that Link and Sarie both have heard of it—in its multitudinous variations—as the very melody of Hyrule Field. Neither of them knows the words. Yet the song alone buoys them forward.

The days and nights blur into one. If she could, Link would carry Ilia upon her back and keep walking through the night. Instead, she spends the hot summer days sleepless, gathering and hunting food for the cooler evening's journey ahead, fletching arrows out of trees, occasionally passing out from exhaustion in the shade of their boughs. Always in groves. Never in ruins.

They reach the towering cliffs north of the Great Plateau near the moon's zenith. Link dismounts from Ilia and leaves Sarie with her companion in case of an attack by monsters. After scaling the Great Plateau herself, Link magnetises a half-corroded metal grate protruding from the ruins around the periphery of the Great Plateau. She drags the grate from the earth and floats it down to the base of the cliff. If Sarie and Ilia hop on, Link can lift them through magnesis to the Great Plateau.

Ilia spooks from the grate. Link touches her chin and then snaps her fingers. She delves towards the nearby octorok-infested woods, where she positions herself around rocks and trees, escaping the octoroks' barrages of rocks while she tosses bombs in the monsters' directions. She collects the stretchy, inflatable inner membranes of their bodies, which she blows up like balloons.

Again, Link guides Ilia to the metal grate. This time, however, she stays right beside Ilia's side—soothingly stroking her flank and cooing into her fuzzy ear—as she affixes octorok balloons to the grate. One, two, three, four, five, six, and on the lucky seven the grate becomes airborne.

"Shakalah! We're off!" Sarie calls out with a shake of their leafy mask. At Link's request, Sarie unfurls their korok leaf and putters them along through the air towards the Great Plateau. Abruptly a giant hrok swoops in; its talons rip through half of the balloons. The grate drops and glides downwards at a rapid pace while Link frantically blows up more balloons. They crash into the open field near the first golden spire she ever activated. Spitting blades of grass from her mouth, Link checks hastily on Ilia: her companion has suffered no broken limbs, no cracked hooves, no injuries but the fear in her eyes. Link hugs her.

Notching her bow, Link downs the hrok in question when it swoops down again to defecate on her head. She considers if she might try to cook it anyway, and yet she remembers Amali's caution about the monsters taking on the guises of birds.

Besides, something that could defecate on a constant basis far beyond the capacity of normal birds would unlikely make a good meal.

With that taken care of, Link spends the remainder of the night exploring the Great Plateau, upon which she has not set foot in over two years. Something here must have allowed her to move between the Sacred Realm and the mortal world. Somewhere, possibly, there lies a mirror. Somewhere that the girl with the golden hair would have known about. Somewhere that she could have predicted Link would end up.

The tower, the four shrines, and the Temple of Time with its strange crater in the second chamber—a crater that, upon inspection, looks remarkably akin to the shape and size of the rock in which the Master Sword sat before Link drew it from the stone one hundred years ago—reveal nothing.

As she travels, seeking answers, Link comes upon the bokoblins from which she fled during her first few days of awakening, before she even knew her own name. Now, she realises, they pose nearly no threat at all.

She leaves them be, with their skewered roast boar, for they pose no harm to any people either: as far as she knows, no one traverses the Great Plateau. Except her. Then she comes upon the remains of campfire in the midst of the wood. A few days old. Touching her chin, Link attempts to discern where the camper might have gone, yet cannot tell footsteps or trails in the grass. Her nose might knows food, but not the tracking of people.

She scours the wood regardless. Link whistles a jaunty tune loud enough that any potential allies might approach. She stumbles upon a very familiar, very large rock. Craning her neck up, she stares at the massive monster that awakens up from the rock. A stone talus, as Glepp, Misan, and Dyeri called it. A stone talus from which Link long ran away. Now she merely withdraws the silver spear that Sidon gave her, takes aim, and throws it. The spearhead pierces the talus through less protected deposit of ore in its heart. Then: bombs away.

When the talus breaks apart to fragments, she leaves most of the ore scattered in the grass, although she collects the flint into her flint-pouch. Sarie erupts into a song of amazement at what Link has accomplished, while the girl in question rubs the back of her head and laughs embarrassedly. "It was just a rock," she says. "A big big biiiig rock!" Sarie corrects.

Link passes by the cabin again, the cabin where lived Kass's mentor, or his mentor's father—Mudora, wasn't that his name?—or both. She pokes her head inside: all of the loose papers and books that once covered the floor have disappeared. Lady Impa's messenger must have taken them.

Yet she notices, too, the thin layer of dust on everything. Thin? Not the cake of dust that Link would have expected to collect over two years, especially as she did not clean the cabin during her own stay. She runs a hand over the desk, rolling the dust between her thumb and forefinger.

Link shrugs. She thanks Kass's mentor or else his father or else both for the beloved cooking pot that has served her so well upon her journey and leaves an offering of meat and fish sautéed in spicy peppers outside of the cabin in gratitude. Then, Link turns towards her final stop on the Great Plateau: the Shrine of Resurrection.

She tells Sarie and Ilia about the first few months of her life after the her awakening as she retraces her steps two years back; again she has arrived on the Great Plateau at the lingering of the spring, just on the cusp of summer's heat. Link takes them around the lake, and up through the forests, and upon the grassy path where she found the axe and the satchel in the stump of a tree, and over the rocky overhang where she climbed over and where now she discovers the remains of another fresh campfire, and atop the hill on which she stood for a long, long time to feel the wind and to sign the word home.

The wind. The Goddess Farore's wind, with its seeds of life, with its of promise of peace. "The breath of the wild," the girl with the golden hair whispered.
Link stands there for a long, long time.

She shows them the yawning mouth of the cave from which she emerged, blinking, into the morning light. Link splashes down into the water pooling on the cavern floor. Ilia paws at the ground by the edge cave entrance and whinnies. Link rests her palms on her hips, as Ilia the girl would, then, touching a hand to her chin, gazes up at Ilia the horse. "Sarie, can you take care of her? I'm going to check on something. It shouldn't take more than a few minutes."

Sarie salutes. "Linkle-link can count on Sarie! No boko-boko will get past Sarie's amazing korok-korok powers! Ka-pow!"

Link laughs. "I'll see you soon." She turns.

There: where once upon a time, Link donned clothing left out for her by Kass's mentor or else his father or both, long before she even remembered her own name. The poet and the poet's son. Link steps forward. Her boots splish in the dampness.

The Shrine of Resurrection. Where she awoke. Where she thought she had died and been revived. Where she had run away and fallen out of, almost quite literally from the sky, like those faery-tales that Ilia told Aryll when Link still returned to Ordon. She pads forward towards the door. The chamber where she awoke, floating in a pool of water, faintly glowing in blue, tracking the wetness of her feet onto the floor, lifting up the slate from the pedestal. The girl with the golden hair's slate. Link breathes. Closing her eyes, she steps through through the entrance and returns from whence she came.

Her left hand flies onto the hilt of the Master Sword. Looming over the altar where Link awoke, smoothing her hands over the slippery material, inspecting the altar on every side, stands a tall zora woman. Her skin and scales purple. Her head resembling a koi fish. Her opal earrings glinting in the blue.

Glepp erects her spine. She turns her head towards Link, who slides backwards, her fingers clenched the Master Sword. Her reddish third eyelids close horizontally over her eyes and then open again.

The two of them stare at one another. Glepp does not touch the steel bow strapped to her back. Very deliberately, she raises her webbed hands, stretches out her fingers, and faces the palms towards Link. She wears not the dark navy blue of the Yiga, but a traveller's outfit, sturdy and plain.

"You may slay me if you think it best," says Glepp, very quietly. She does not move. Her vowels roll with the wind over the hills, her consonants the surussus of crinkling leaves: Akkalan. The sound squeezes Link's heart more than she anticipated. Yet she firms her grip on the Master Sword. "There is nothing that I may say as to provide proof of my allegiances, but...I apologise."

Link stares at her.

"...I apologise for having brought harm to your friends. I merely wished to capture you, so that you could not proceed to...continue to work against the Goddesses' cleansing. I thought that I could convince you, that I could keep you safe for the purified world to come. I never intended for my brethren to hurt your friends, or even to hurt you. We only wished for the slate."

Despite herself, Link lets her hand fall limply from the hilt of the Master Sword. Glepp stays still. "But the Yiga have hurt so many people. They attack villages all the time. I, I don't understand. What do you mean that you didn't want to hurt anyone?"
"...there are..." Glepp's features soften. "...there were many of us. Not everyone agreed on how we needed to carry out our mission. But we only sought to attack enough to destabilise, so that the poor people who have been turned against the truth of the Goddesses' will by those things that call themselves the Sages and the Oracles could not be led to raise a force against the cleansing by the Goddesses' Purifier. That would only anger the Goddesses further. I neither defend nor agree with their actions, but I can understand their fears. We wish to save as many as we can." She stops for a moment, then resumes. "We cannot commune with monsters; we cannot speak or lead them. We are only regular people trying to fulfill the Goddesses' will."

"I don't understand," Link signs back. "Do you really...do you really believe that the Calamity is some divine retribution? That the Goddesses are going to slaughter us all for...for sinning or whatever?"

"Yes. Do you not see that it is so?"

"But the Master Sword chose someone." Link nearly slips into gesturing me, but slides out the motion for someone at the last second. "Doesn't that mean that the Goddesses are with us?"

"The sword of which you speak is nothing but a sword with its own powers, and not of the Goddesses," Glepp answers in her level, even tones, sounding like more like a teacher than a woman who attacked Link in the forest and burned down the remains of the village of Ordon. "That the blade chose you does not deter the Goddesses' will."

"I don't even get anything about this sinning stuff. When I was growing up, sinning just meant you'd...missed the mark and had to do better. That's what the word means in Akkalan. You know it, right, since you're talking Akkalan? It's the same word for...for missing an arrow you're trying to hit with a target. I mean missing a target you're trying to hit with an arrow. It's not something that stains you forever, or something we can't do better about." Link hesitates. She rotates her wrists, loosening her hands. "I just...I can't wrap my mind around the Golden Goddesses wanting to hurt any of us."

The weight of the Master Sword upon her back gives her pause: the Dragon Naydra, scales gleaming bluish white, did not know of the Golden Goddesses' will either.

"They only wish to harm so that They can create a better world," Glepp explains, her timbre gentle, "as a loving mother might keep her children from play long enough for them to study hard for their future." Link narrows her eyes at that. Glepp hmms. "You would agree that sometimes, to harm is necessary for the future, I'm sure. You have heard stories of leaders far crueler than those alive in any of the realms today, who were ousted to pave the road for peaceful future. Take, for example, the the ancient King of Parapa, whom the Parapans themselves overthrew, in the legends of the hero of that era." Link nods, very slowly. "If that is the case," Glepp says, her tone firming as if closing in on the completion of a recipe, "surely you see how sometimes sacrifices are necessary."

Link does not have the words to debate. She does not know how to discuss, or how to argue, or how to craft her sentences to a polished shine. But she senses the feeling in her gut. "But...but you can see what's happening with a bad ruler." She winces at the use of a simple word like bad, but these are the words she has. "You can smell when you've got spoiled milk, but you can't somehow know if you keep yourself from drinking milk, a flying sand seal will come in through the window and give you a personal glass of the best milk you've ever had." Link fiddles with one of her sidelocks. "Ehe, I don't know if that made sense. But what I'm trying to say is, we don't know what the Goddesses want, or...or if They're even out there, listening. They made this world for us."

"And can They not change Their minds?"
"But how do you know?"

Glepp shakes her head as if speaking to an ignorant child. "Do you not see the suffering in this world? If you believe the Goddesses kind...if you believe the Goddesses love Their children...if that is so, you must also recognise that our world suffocates beneath the suffering of people."

"Then we can make it better." Link swings her own head from side to side. "I don't have time for this. I want to know: do you go around hurting innocent people?"

"No. Perhaps if I had had the training to stomach such deeds, I would not have let myself be overpowered by you in Ordona." Glepp exhales. Through the fabric of her shirt, Link can see the pulsations where Glepp's gills flutter along her torso. "But I do not believe that harm to the innocent is necessary to fulfill the Goddesses' will. Let them suffer no more than necessary, so that the Goddesses may deliver us once They have cleansed our world."

"In...in the village where I met you, all the way back in Eldin, you were the one who shot down those furnixes," Glepp says nothing. "Why?"

"I told you that I do not agree with the methods of harming the innocent. I knew that one of my brethren intended to bait an attack of monsters—provoking a nest and leading them to Gabora—and I could not stand idly by." Glepp shifts her weight, rolling the balls of her feet. "I understand that you might not believe me."

"I thought you were in the village because your former guard left."

"Yes, the sellsword that Misan recruited did leave—" Glepp clears her throat. "—because I threatened him. I sought to ensure that Misan and I would remain in Gabora." The reddish third eyelid covers her eyes. "I failed in preventing the attack. I did what I could, but..."

"Misan. Right, Misan! What about Misan? You got married to her. Oh, and, congratulations on the wedding and all that. It took me a while to figure it out, but, uh, I'm sorry I almost took your wedding rice to make rice-balls." Glepp ogles her; Link rubs the back of her head. "Anyway! What I was saying? Oh right! Don't you love her? I don't get it."

"It is precisely because I love her that I would do most anything to save her from this world. And if you love your own, you must, too, do the same for their sakes if not for yours. Leave that sword." She extends her arm. "Come. Aid me."

"No!" Link shakes her head even more violently, until her temples throb and her head hurts. "This is our world. I'm not that smart. I don't know anything about the Sacred Realm, or about what happens after we die, or even if the Goddesses are out there. I don't know! What I know is what I'm doing in my cooking pot and what's in my stomach. What I know is the wind over the hills and the smiles on people's faces when they eat something good. I'm not smart. I know that there's problems. But we can fix them. The biggest ones right now are the monsters and the Calamitous One. If we can get over that, then we can fix everything else with our own hands. Like the Parapans you were just talking about. The Goddesses didn't cleanse them or however you said. They just figured out that something's gotta be better and did it." Link rubs her left hand through her ponytail. "Wait. What are you even doing here?"

Glepp responds after a moment tenser than the time Link got her head stuck in the cooking pot: "...it doesn't matter."

"It does to me. And when's the last time you saw Misan? Is she all right? Her hands shake enough for her fingers to stammer out the same gesture twice. "I-is she one of the Yiga too?"
"Misan? No. I was honest to her about who I was and what I believed in when I left. As far as I know, she is alive and well. She has hired Dyeri full-time." Despite the solemnness of her low and level timbre, Link can make out a trembling at the half-dampened corners of Glepp's words. "I do not think that I will have time to see her again, nor would she want me to." She adds the latter sentence in the haste of a single breath. "Everything I do, I do for this world, and I do for her."

"I don't have time. I don't have time for this. I have three months to—!" Link balls her hands into fists to shut herself up. "Just...just go. Or stay here. I don't care. If you hurt anyone, it'll be a different story, but I..." She lets her hands fall. Stepping forward into the chamber, Link fixes her gaze onto Glepp. "You're not going to try to get the slate from me or something?"

"Even if I did," replies Glepp, a twinge in the cords of her voice, "I am powerless. You and your armies have destroyed all that which we have spent centuries upon centuries building and developing, for the very sake of this world. Do you know what the word Yiga means, Link?" Link shrugs. "It means guardian."

Link ignores her. Almost. She keeps enough attention towards Glepp, just in case Glepp attempts to steal the Master Sword or the slate, but, more than anything, she trusts the Master Sword to watch her back. If Glepp tries anything—Link knows, as sure as she is of her next meal being tasty—the Master Sword will vibrate.

She inspects the chamber. Hopping onto the altar, she flops down as she once did two years, but nothing happens: she only lies on a hard and not very comfortable dry surface. Link sets the slate into the face of the pedestal, which closes the door and glows the shrine in blue, but which does little else except make Glepp jump back, eyes wide. Something rattles to the floor.

As Link fails to activate the altar—if even she could activate the altar—she glances over to see whatever has fallen to the ground: a vial of monster extract, sloshing violet.

Her stomach rumbles noisily enough that the sound gives even Glepp pause. "Glepp." She does not respond. Link crosses the chamber and removes the slate from the pedestal; the blue light ebbs back away. "Why do you have that?"

Glepp tilts her head down towards the vial that has fallen out of her pack. She coughs. "You...made us the rice-balls with monster extract months ago. I found that I had a taste for them. That is all."

Link feels her mouth curve up in a grin despite herself. "So I ended up showing you something that you've never eaten before, and you ended up liking it?"

"...yes."

"Even though I'm the scum trying to screw up the Goddesses' plans, right?"

"...it is not my fault, if in the Goddesses' plan, They made our stomachs so much stronger than our hearts," Glepp admits, her timbre barely above a whisper, and Link bursts out into a harder laughter than she has laughed in ages.

When she manages to calm herself down, her cheeks reddening and her tears salting her mouth, she calms her hands long enough to sign. "Glepp, if I bake you a cake, will you go see Misan again? I know you're doing...Yiga activities or whatever. Still trying to save us all from the Goddesses or the purification or cleansing or the whatever-it-is you're talking about. But I wanted to bake her and you a cake anyway. For the wedding. You said yourself that you're powerless, right?"

"Yet I feel an obligation to..."
"Just deliver the cake, and you can go back to your obligations." Link wipes her eyes. "The Goddesses aren't going to smite you down for eating some cake. And if they want the cleansing or purification or whatever to happen, it'll happen. You know that. So... please? Just think of it as thanks for all of the meals I've ever made you. And I don't know Misan well enough to puzzle out where she could be right now. But you do. So, if you do everything for her, then won't you deliver a cake for her, too? You have an ice-box, right?"

Glepp lowers her gaze. "...mh."

"Please?"

"...mmhm. Very well. I will deliver to her your cake." Glepp shuts her third eyelid over her eyes once more. "It is time that I left here, regardless. After all, this place has nothing for me."

"This cake I want to make," Link notes with a wink once Glepp looks at her again, "is an old Hyrulean family recipe." She sets the cooking pot down. "Do you want to help me? I think that Misan would like the cake best if it had your hand in it, too."

"If Misan would like it..." Link nods her head; Glepp sighs. "What would you have me do?"

Link and Glepp emerge from the chamber. Link explains to Sarie the goings-ons. Sarie asks if Glepp is the old friend of whom Link spoke. She rubs the back of her head. "She's not the friend I was thinking about, and I don't think she'd call me a friend, but we're cooking together, so that's something, right?"

Sarie grabs Glepp's finger in their little hands, shaking it up and down. "Sarie's glad to meet Link's cooking-together-not-old-friend!"

Glepp prays to the Golden Goddesses that she has not yet lost her mind entirely. As she and Link proceed through the woods in the hunt for fresh bird's eggs to complete the recipe Link memorised from the cookbook in her satchel, Link tells her briefly about the koroks. Glepp simply nods faintly. Glepp has, in her ice-box—laid with cold-full sapphires for coolness and empty opals for sucking in moisture—butter and milk, while Link has with her cane sugar and flour.

Link stops by the first apple tree from which she ever plucked fruit. The spring apples of Hyrule, much less sweet and much more bitter than those that mature in the autumn. She prefers those of the spring.

They return, arms laden with ingredients, and embark upon the preparation of cake. For the icing, Glepp creams butter with distilled cane sugar and Necludan cow milk; in the meantime, Link slaps the pot into the fire in lieu of a make-shift oven. While the pot heats up, Link heats cane sugar with water to form a thick slurry of syrup.

Glepp lends Link one of her bowls and a spoon in which to blend together rock salt, aerated salt, and flour. "Did you know," says Link, beaming with pride at herself, "that the name of aerated salt has nothing to do with the rito being airy kind of people?"

"...why would it?" asks Glepp, confusion written over the bunching of her brow.

Link smiles sheepishly and returns to preparing the cake. As she dices spring apples, Glepp—following Link's instruction—whisks droplets of vanilla extract and monster extract in a cup of milk. Shaking in the grated apples, Link mixes in bird egg yolks that they gathered alongside butter and the thick sugar syrup. Glepp pours in the blend of aerated salt, flour, and rock salt. Link hands her the bowl; Glepp mixes until the batter runs smooth.
When Link begins to whip egg whites, Glepp suggests that Link add in a little beeswing. Link, who does not know how in the world to sign whatever word Glepp just said, tilts her head.

"Beeswing. Misan and I delivered a shipment of apple wine to—" Glepp smiles upon her own mention of Misan. "—and we received in thanks a bit of beeswing. I am, admittedly, not much of a chef, but our clients told us that it stabilises cream and eggs. I noticed you beating egg whites..."

Link bobs her head in gratitude. After adding the powdery beeswing, she whisks in cane sugar, then blends the sugar-egg-white mix into the batter. When the powder disappears into a single thick batter, she adds just a drop of milk to loosen it, tastes the batter on her fingertip, and gradually drips in extra droplets of monster extract until she can feel that familiar thumping of the heart elicited from the extract of will.

The cookbook cautions against adding too much monster extract; instead, the cookbook suggests masking the monster extract with extra vanilla and sweet apples as much as possible for a the dish more palatable to the aristocracy of Hyrule.

Snorting, Link tosses the cookbook back into the satchel. Why even eat monster extract if not for the very taste of monsters? She and Glepp bake the batter until the cake becomes airy and springy to the touch. They allow the cake to cool, whereupon Link cuts the pot-shaped cake into thin layers; she spreads the butter-cream icing between each layer. The completed cake stacks ten centimetres high. Glepp's webbed hands, once carefully washed, prove even better than Link's cooking knife at smearing and smoothing the icing over the outside of the cake.

Link arranges freshly grated bits of apple in the icing on the top of the cake, writing an attempt at Lanayrish: Kongretulayshuns for the weding! Glepp corrects her spelling—Link rubs the back of her head—and, upon Link's request, adds her and Misan's names below.

And then, at long last: pleasantly purple; temptingly tyrian; vividly violet monster cake. Her mouth waters just looking at it, but she reminds herself: the cake is meant for Misan and Glepp, not for her.

She remembers this very cake eaten during celebrations in the castle. The ringing in of the new year with the spring. Or the girl with the golden hair's birthday. Monster cake. The king's favourite dessert, and traditional to eat in times of crisis, as a symbol to the Golden Goddesses that not even the advent of the worst of monsters can take away the hope of Hyrule. She remembers sitting beside the girl with the golden hair during the banquet of the new year, at a table with the other Champions. She remembers asking the girl with the golden hair: "Do you want me to make you this? I can make it. I can learn. You can crimp it with me. It's your favourite food...?"

She remembers the girl with the golden hair tapping her fingers against her jaw, her cheeks slightly reddened. "Actually, my...my favourite food is...well, I don't really know if I have one."

Link remembers blinking at her. "You don't have a favourite food?" She remembers staring at the girl with the golden hair. She remembers Urbosa trying not to laugh as she and the girl with the golden hair secretly held hands under the table, which Link only noticed upon trying to pick up a fallen spoon; remembers Daruk fixing his reverent gaze onto the Sages performing the spring's rites; remembers Mipha surreptitiously opening her mouth wide to eat—under a kerchief—while the spring's rites distracted everyone around her; remembers Revali bending a fork in his hand until it broke; remembers Impa admonishing Link to eat with utensils and not with her hands.

"Now you know how I feel when you say that you don't know about the Seven!" the girl with the golden hair burst out, noisily enough for several of the nobles and knights at tables around her to turn to glance at her. Impa cleared her throat. The girl with the golden hair apologised and tried to lower her voice. Urbosa patted her shoulder.

"If you want," signed Link; Impa glared at her for a second before she sighed and gave in, listening to the spring's rites alongside Daruk, "I can help figure out your favourite food later. If you want."

"That," the girl with the golden hair whispered, "would be very nice."

Link helps Glepp wrap up the monster cake in wax. She waves to Glepp as the latter shoulders the pack with the sapphire and opal-laid ice-box, intent on bringing the monster cake to Misan. Glepp does not wave back, yet Link thinks that she can just see the slightest spring to Glepp's step, the slightest relaxation of her shoulders, the slightest buoy of her heart, as though Glepp were herself about to dive into the seas of the Goddess Zola with Misan at her side.

The seas. Water. Link's eyes widen: the altar. Dry. The dry altar. The altar on which she lay was wet. With water. The lake on the Great Plateau where she saw herself for the first time since her awakening. The funny faces that she made into the water. The reflection of her own face. The reflection. The water. The mirrored surface of the lake. Mirror.

She whoops so loudly that Glepp turns back towards her, brow ridge arched. Grabbing her satchel, Link sprints past Glepp towards the lake on the other side of the wood. When she nears the shores, she tries to skid to a halt, but her momentum launches her into the water. A Hyrule bass slaps her across the face. She twists her head up from the lake and wheezes out the water she has swallowed. Water. Water.

Link returns with water-skins and elixir vials filled to the brim. As she passes by Sarie and Ilia again, Link tells Sarie to seek shelter for the night; she does not know how long she will be gone, but when she does, she may return with the old friend after all.

Sarie bobs their body. "Sarie will take the bestest and most goodest of care of Ilie-ilie-ilia! Sarie promises. And when Linky-link comes back, Sarie wants to meet Link's friend!"

"I hope you will," Link answers.

She descends back down into the chamber. Link grabs the bottles from her satchel to pour water onto the altar of the Shrine of Resurrection. The liquid spreads out over the surface, the slightly scooped shape of the altar just slanted enough to hold a thin layer of water. She pours in another bottle, then another, then another, until she realises that the water drains from the altar. Touching her chin, Link moves towards the pedestal and places the slate within the depression in its face.

The door closes. The blue glow returns. And, there, in the reflection of the water upon the altar, Link observes the symbols of the Golden Goddesses shimmering just beneath the surface, undulating patterns of green and blue and red. In the centre: the triple-triangle mark of the royal family of Hyrule, in its warm and welcoming glimmer of iridescent gold.

She pauses. She drains one vial of spring green elixir and licks her lips of its taste. If she will see again the girl with the golden hair, then Link wants to look her best. She unties and re-ties her ponytail. Tugging down her sidelocks, she smoothes out the slightly curled ends. She brushes out the bangs that have become stuck behind her ears. With steady motions of her roughened hands, she adjusts her tunic, the abdomen and back still ripped from the bokoblin's spear. She breathes.

She sets her belongings next to the altar. She touches her cooking pot.

Good pot. Best friend.
She takes the Master Sword with her, tucking it into her tunic. Then Link flattens her palms against the sides of the altar. She hoists herself up—a little too short to simply lift her leg over the altar—and settles herself down into the water that sloshes out over the edges. Inhaling, Link leans back. She rests her head upon the smooth firmness of the altar.

A curtain of blue light descends upon the altar. Link looks up. She can see no lights of the Golden Goddesses from above, only the dark mirror of the altar over her head.

Water. Wetness. Droplets drip down from the mirror above. This water does not drain down, as though held within the altar by the curtain of blue light. The water plinks down on her. Slowly, the liquid rises up her sides, up to the halfway point along her ribs, over her chest, over her mouth and nose.

She cannot breathe. Nevertheless she forces herself to stay absolutely still. The blue glow around her dims. She cannot breathe. Her eyelids flutter. She cannot breathe. Like a hand formed of water, curling its fingers around her throat, choking her, choking her, until she can no longer feel the boundaries of her body, until her very essence flows through the cracks between her fingers no matter how desperately she tries to keep herself in her hands, the hands with which she has made the whole of her life.

And then, all at once, the darkness gives way to gold.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: I started writing this chapter at 11:57 on the sixteenth of August, and finished writing it 18:02 on the sixteenth of August.

Thanks a million for having read with me all this day. It's been an honour to take this journey with you step by step, and I hope that you have enjoyed reading it as much as I have enjoyed writing. Yes, you, reading this right now, even if you haven't left a single comment or anything like that! As long as you're enjoying yourself, I'm happy. And thank you to my most beloved beta reader, Emma, for everything that she has done for me.

You can indeed attach octorok balloons to metal things like doors. It's how I glitched my horse into the Gerudo Desert in Breath of the Wild. "Shakalah! We're off!" is a reference to The Faces of Evil.

Hroks do indeed defecate as part of their attacks in Skyward Sword.

Going back to the Great Plateau at the end of the game and realising how the monsters that made you terrified at first now seem so woefully pitiful is truly an experience.

Why leave a skewer of meat, fish, and spicy peppers? Because that's the recipe that the king gives you in his journal in the cabin in-game!
We last saw Glepp in the fifty-ninth chapter. S'been a while. But I hope you didn't think I forgot about this plot arc. Haha! No, well, I've forgotten plenty of things before. Hopefully not much though.

The ancient Parapan king is none other than that of Ocarina of Time. Nabooru was intending to work against the leader of the Gerudo, after all, before Koume and Kotake imprisoned her for seven years, a fate much worse than anything the other sages in Ocarina of Time had to go through. Certainly makes me think!

If you recall, Link first learned about the aerated salt thing from Amali, all those chapters back in Medli!

Beeswing, or potassium bitartrate, is a real ingredient that does indeed stabilise things like whipped cream or egg whites. It's also something that Link hasn't heard of before, and not something that I used often myself. I only remembered its existence while writing this chapter, since I used a particular sort of cake recipe for it and have not baked a cake myself in goodness knows how long. Cake baking just isn't what I like. I'm not a fan of sweets.

Link knows how to read Lanayrish, but she's not too good at writing it, so she essentially wrote it phonetically. Thus, I included the misspelling. However, Lanayrish is not English, and Lanayrish is not written in the Latinate alphabet; rather, I have just used the misspelling as a 'translation' of the error that Link would have made. Don't get confused!

We'll talk about Zelda's favourite food in the future. Indeed, you'll see it in the eighty-third chapter. But anyone who has played Breath of the Wild can hazard a guess. There's two recipes that you can find for the royal cookbook quest, after all. One of them is monster cake, which I've noted as Rhoam's favourite. And the other of the two recipes is...

The mark of the royal family is none other than the mark of the Triforce. Nothing to do with the royal family except that they adopted it, since people don't know about the Triforce. They know about the Golden Force, but not anything about what it looks like.

Water does indeed reflect things. And water's been used time enough as a portal to another world, such as in during The Wind Waker, that I feel pretty justified.

By the way, I wanted to say that I've gotten some very, very, very nice comments from all of you, and I really do appreciate all of you so much. Thank you for every kind word. It means a lot to me that Delicious in Wilds has reached so much many of you, and I hope that we can continue to the end. So, deeply and sincerely, thank you from the bottom of my heart for being the best readers that I could ever hope for. And thank you, deeply and sincerely, from the bottom of my heart, for all of your honesty, your kindness, and your respect.

Up next: Mudora's poem; a promise fulfilled; a 99% certainty that I will thank you for reading.

Beta reader's comments: We finally get to confront Glepp! In a really cool setting, too. Coming back to where it all started is sweet.
Aerated salt, as it happens, is not called that because of the rito. Sorry, Link. I thought it was a good observation.

The ending of this chapter is so damn cool. It made me want to cheer or something when I realized what was going on.

Glazed Veggies

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef returns to the Sacred Realm and speaks with the spirit of the Master Sword about what happened one hundred years ago and about why the Master Sword chose the chef.

Chapter Notes

Author's notes that didn't fit in the end: I technically started writing this chapter at 02:46 on the eighth of August, but I seriously started writing this chapter at 18:41 on the sixteenth of August, and finished writing it at 04:29 on the seventeenth of August.

Thanks a million for all of your kinds comments and reviews! I've gotten some very kind words recently, and I just have to thank all of you for not only opening yourselves up to allow investment into these characters and this world, but in particular for treating Delicious in Wilds with respect. It means a lot to me, so thank you. And thank you for coming along with Link on her voyage.

The opening to this chapter is probably familiar to all of you, although you might not remember it. Just take a look at the first chapter of Delicious in Wilds if you don't.

I briefly spoke the other day about wanting to make the Sacred Realm an otherworldly experience. I should note, to any readers: if you have had experiences similar to Link in the Sacred Realm (with respect to the 'expansion of awareness', or the 'feeling that your consciousness has left the boundaries of your body'), you're not weird, or inhuman, or any of those things. That's a maladaptive coping mechanism (probably some form of dissociation or depersonalisation), and I mean this sincerely when I say that you should seek help, both from yourself and from others if you're in such a position. Please take care of yourself.

At any rate, that isn't what I meant about the otherworldly. That's part of it, sure, but it's also about the fact that everyone can feel everyone else's pain and sensations to varying degrees.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Floating in warmth, she waits.

A faint sound resonates somewhere under her. A body. Her body. Something soft yet firm beneath her, supporting her head, her upper back, her rear. A breath of chill whispers over the top of her chest and radiates down her form. Her heart beats.

She lives.

The darkness brightens steadily, and then gives way to light; her eyelids flutter up of their own accord. A blur of blue and white above. She flexes her fingers, wriggles her toes, pushes against the now-hard material underneath her to sit up.

The sudden ache in her head closes her eyes for a moment as she adjusts. The blueness throbs behind her lids. Her palm splashes liquid. She registers the water receding. The air feels cool and dry. She breathes in and the somewhat stale scent causes her to cough.

The pain subsides as the last of the water drains. She opens her eyes. Her vision focuses.

A familiar ceiling.

Lifting her head slightly, Link glances down. The corners of—everything—seem to very softly shimmer, as though on the verge of subliming into vapour, including her own body. Though she can feel her back pressed against the firmness of the slippery material, and though she can feel her fingers flexing against the altar, and though she can feel the air against her own body, she cannot feel where she ends and the rest of the world begins, almost as if her consciousness were taking up the entirety of the chamber, her body just one part of her form, as the tongue is just one part of the body. She can feel, simultaneously, the walls of the chamber, and she can feel barren land beyond, and she can feel the touch of other people—other bodies, other essences—faintly against her.

Her awareness ripples outwards until she can sense the wholeness of the world at once, the edges blurrier and ebbing into darkness, the area immediately surrounding her core vibrant and bright. More than anything, Link feels a presence within her. No. No. She draws her essence down within the boundaries of her body, even as her consciousness leaks out again between her fingers. A presence not within her, but beside her.

She looks down at herself. Her belongings: vanished. Her clothing: vanished. The Master Sword: vanished. She has only herself and her own body, for as much as she can keep that body in one piece. And next to the altar: that presence. The form of a young girl.

The form of a young girl in fire-light blue, in malice violet, in sacred gold. The form of a young girl whose face seems forged from the steel of the stars, the brow heavy, the eyes blank and smooth as if closed, the lips set into an even line. Her hair crests into three points that remind Link of the triple-triangle symbol of the royal family of Hyrule.

The cloak over her left shoulder—Link's right—bears three folds as it cascades down in blue. The cloak over her right bears three as it cascades down in violet. The two halves meet in the middle around a great golden jewel set into her chest, reminding Link of an identical jewel set into the pommel of the Master Sword. Two rivulets of gold run down from her collarbones beneath the cloak to her hips. Her legs appear hewn of a dark violet metal criss-crossed with a moss-green blue in the same pattern as the grip of the Master Sword.

She moves as if made of living watercolour, like the paintings that Cremia showed to Link, each face a single stroke of colour. She speaks with a voice Link has heard before, that speaks from everywhere and nowhere at once, cool and warm at the same time, melodious even in its prose.

"Hello."

"...you..." Link signs, her eyes widened. "...you're the Master Sword."

"And you," sings the Master Sword, "are the Master Link."
"...just Link is fine."

"Just Fi is fine," the Master Sword hums in the same tone as Link's own words. The Master Sword—Fi—motions with her leg as she speaks her own name, a gesture like skating upon ice; Link emulates the motion with her hand. Fi, she notices, hovers over rather than walks upon the floor. She glides closer to Link, until—if Fi could breathe—Link would surely have felt her breaths.

"Master...Link, it has been a very long time. I must apologise."

Link stares at her.

"When you step from this chamber to seek Her Grace of blesséd blood, you will have precious little time. Here, now, within the shrine, the one you call the Calamitous One cannot sense you. Once you leave, you will no longer have the dampened protection, and I calculate a 95% certainty that he shall sense you. Do you understand, Link?" She nods. Fi seems to take a moment to process before she continues in her melodious voice, everywhere and yet nowhere at once. "...this Sacred Realm is not like your own world. That which you will yourself to be, will be. If you will yourself into clothing, I predict a 97% chance that such will appear. Do you understand, Link?"

Her cheeks heating up, Link closes her eyes and pictures herself in some sort of clothing. A blue tunic and off-white trousers leading to a pair of simple brown boots, accompanied by a deep blue cloak to cover her head and gloves over her hands. On second thought, she also adds undergarments.

She raises her eyelids and peeks down at herself. On her shirt: a headless lobster. No, not a headless lobster, but Master Sword upon her tunic. On her arms: the armbands marked with the red Parapan pattern that Urbosa gave her. On her body: that which she wore before the Great Calamity, smudged at the corners and vague from her memories, but that which she has willed herself into wearing nonetheless.

Link sits up more fully. When she tries to slide off of the altar, she discovers that her limbs do not quite function as she expected. She wills her flesh into proper legs; somehow her limbs firm, and she can stand on her boots.

"I shall guide you to Her Grace whom you seek," Fi sings, "when you are adequately prepared for the dangers. You will have little time. I estimate less than a 5% chance that she will be able to break her concentration to speak more than six hundred seconds." Link counts the minutes on her fingers. "I therefore highly recommend that you prepare that which you wish to say to Her Grace prior to departing. Do you understand, Link?" She vaguely bobs her head, already wibble-wobbling towards the entrance.

"In addition to that which I have already advised you, before you seek her Grace," Fi continues, her voice softening from a major to a minor; Link pats herself on the back for having learned those terms from Kass, "I must apologise."

Link skids to a halt. She swivels around. "Apologise? I...I know that I don't have all of my memories, but I don't think that you've ever done anything wrong. In fact, actually, I..." She attempts a smile but her expression comes out vacant. Then she hesitates, runs her fingers through her sidelocks, and gives Fi something halfway to a crooked grin. "...have a lot to apologise to you for, I think."

"So, uh, sorry for...using you to cook and for passing you between me and Sidon and all that stuff. I know you're the sacred sword that seals the darkness and the blessed bane of evil's bane and all that and I shouldn't be treating you like—" Link moves her hands in vague circular motions as she tries to hone in on something to say. She hangs her head. "So this is what you meant when you said..."
"I recommend for you to utilise what precious time you have to its fullest extent." Even in the silences when Fi does not sing out her words, Link can hear her hum a melody, as if her very form were constantly vibrating in resonance with the air. "Now, from everything of which you spoke, there is nothing for which you must apologise.

"However, as I estimate a 0.63 correlation between my words and your present mood, I will proceed to say that I forgive you.

"Ahem. I forgive you. Do you understand, Link?"

Link nods slowly. Fi's style of speech makes her head spin; still she endeavours to keep up. At the very least, Fi stops after every sentence—allowing Link to process her words before continuing—as well as asking frequently whether Link follows, as if Fi were waiting for some external flick of the finger to indicate that she may continue.

She inhales. Raising her arms, she splays her fingers. "I'm...I'm sorry for running away, most of all," Link signs. Her fingers tremble, even though she cannot feel her heart in her chest at all. "I'm...I'm so sorry. I don't have the words to...to really apologise but. I'm really sorry. I'm really really really sorry. I'm so sorry that I could cry out a whole salt soup in front of you right now. Not because I disappointed you. I mean. I'm sorry about that too. But if I hadn't run away, then all those people wouldn't have...they wouldn't..." She motions. "If I hadn't run away, then there wouldn't have been all these monsters in these last hundred years. If I hadn't run away, then, I...I don't know. I don't know! I could've done something. I could've done anything. But I didn't. I didn't do anything. I'm sorry.

"It's not...guilt. The guilt isn't useful for anything, not for me or you or the people I let down. It's not guilt. It's just. Acceptance that I need to do better. And I will. I'm not going to run away again." Link clenches her hands into fists. When her nails dig into her palms, pain—somehow the exact intensity that she expected—quivers down her veins like lightning boomeranging around her elbow and sparking into her chest. "I'm not going to run away. Even if I have to die. No more running. No more—"

"I apologise for the interruption," Fi cuts in, the melody of her timbre stilling Link's hands. "However, as servant to Hyrule, I believe that the information contained within my data banks will prove useful to your analyses of your actions.

"While you may call what occurred one hundred and two years, two months, nineteen days, eight hours, and six minutes in the past from this moment running away—" Link attempts and fails to follow the grammatical structure of the sentence. "—you did not, by the colloquial definition of the term currently recorded in my data banks which I estimate with 77% certainty you are employing, run away.

"Rather, the fault is mine. Thus, in the custom of your people, I apologise. Do you understand, Link?"

Link ogles her. "What?" she manages to sign after she remembers how to move her arms.

Fi merely hums for several moments while Link continues to stare at her, as though Fi had told Link she had never eaten anything in her thousands upon thousands years of life. "I have determined from the tone of your gestures and expression that you do not understand, but that this understanding will not arise from repeating what I have said. Therefore, I shall provide more information. Is this acceptable?
"In the—" Fi names a very, very long and very, very precise number that Link cannot wrap her mind around. "—since I chose the wielder to assist in the sealing of the one you call the Calamitous One, I have only attained access to the energies of the Sacred Realm for one hundred and two years, two months, nineteen days, eight hours, and ten minutes, while I was put to rest in a different pedestal than the access route in what you call the Kokir Forest. Due to the necessary utilisation of my energy over the course of those—" She names the very large number again. Many, many years, is all that Link can understand of her words. "—I had steadily drained my energy stores. As I may only manifest in this humanoid manner within the Sacred Realm or when automatically performing translation, I was unable to inform, 'Master, the energy stores in your Master Sword are nearly depleted.'"

"Therefore, I had no choice but to reserve my energy stores whenever I could. For this purpose, although I introduced myself to you when you first drew me within what you call the Hyrule Castle, as well as when your determined need for self-defence brought forth a flash from me—" Link's hand flies to her chin: Ordon. When she confronted the people of that house. The blue light she remembers. "—I did not reveal to you the fullness of my power out of fear that I would deplete my energy stores entirely and be unable to assist in the moment when you would need me most. Do you understand?"

"I thought I remembered...glowing...blue glowing. Soft blue glowing. " Link pauses. She strokes her palm along her jaw. "But the glowing was always so soft that I thought it was more like, like light reflecting from the blade, or something like that? Not the bright blue glow that." She speaks steadily, contemplating, reflecting on her own words. "That I've seen you do during battle and stuff. Now that I think about it." Link rubs the back of her head. "I mean, that's why I wasn't worried when you stopped glowing after I left the woods. Because that was pretty normal, right?"

"Yes. There is a 98% chance that you comprehend. Ultimately, when the one you call the Calamitous One broke the seal between the two realms, I discovered that I was unable to seal the one you call the Calamitous One, or even to be effective in battle. As a being of will, I require the energy of the Sacred Realm to nourish myself as you, a being of heart, require the air and soil of your world. Do you understand?"

Link inclines her head: not entirely, but enough. Fi appears satisfied. She continues forward: "When you wielded me against the one that you call the Calamitous One, I was unable to muster the energy required to have any effect whatsoever. Therefore, I sought to return myself to the access point where I could replete my energy stores.

"Unable to assist you in any meaningful manner, I informed you and Her Grace about what you call the Shrine of Resurrection. I ran what few simulations I could in the brief period of time allowed to me. My analysis of the simulations revealed that, with 67% certainty, those who remained within the Sacred Realm would perish at least once within the hundred years that I estimated Her Grace and Her Grace's armies would be able to distract the Calamitous One. Thus, because those who perish within the Sacred Realm have only a 0.1-to-0.3% chance of knowing their anatomy sufficiently to still retain a form capable of maintenance in your world, I recommended that you not stay within the Sacred Realm during this period of time. In this manner, you would ensure that you would sustain your ability to bear the burden of the Master Sword. Do you understand?"

Link scratches her cheek but nods anyway. "Therefore, considering all of the simulations and data, I concluded that the best course of action would involve myself repleting my energy stores as much as I could while you were kept safe and healed of the damage done by contact with concentrated power of will until such a time that the Calamitous One was no longer sufficiently distracted. At that point, you would emerge from that which you call the Shrine of Resurrection, unite with me in what you call the Kokir Forest, and, together, we would seal the Calamitous One for approximately one hundred years, or however long was permitted by the energies of the Sacred Realm I could harness.

"However, neither Her Grace nor I anticipated that you would lose your memories. In all of the admittedly few simulations I ran, the amnesia never became a possibility. As a result of the amnesia, the initial algorithm was unable to proceed to completion, and I was forced to once more choose a bearer of the burden that would fit my criteria.

"I am not certain what caused the amnesia, though I have several hypotheses, ranging from injuries sustained while the contact with the concentrated power of will healed, to interference from the one you call the Calamitous One, to a self-repression of the memories due to inappropriate guilt over your belief that your actions were causal to our collective inability to seal the one you call the Calamitous One during our first attempt." Fi pauses as Link recoils back. "I do not consider the latter hypothesis more than 4% probable. Do you understand?"

Link dips her head. Fi falls silent save for that low undercurrent of resonance. Gripping her chin with her hand firmly as she would grip the rim of her cooking pot, Link tries not only to understand but also to internalise that which Fi has said.

"So...I didn't run away...wait. I didn't run away? I didn't run away. This was all planned. We figured out that we couldn't hurt the Calamitous One, so, so...so the Princess decided to stay and fight, and you decided to return to the whatever-it-is to get back your energy, and I decided that I'd be asleep for a hundred years or until the Calamitous One did its thing, and then I'd pop out and come get you." Link looks at Fi, her shoulders shaking, her limbs threatening to noodle away from her. "Right? Right!?"

Fi inclines her head. "There is a 97% chance that you perfectly comprehend my meaning."

"Wait but...but what about the thing that the court poet wrote? Kass's mentor's father? What was his name...Mudora? The thing that Lady Impa was talking about?" Link rubs the back of her head. "I don't really understand."

"I do not know what the one you call the court poet wrote, nor what the one you call Lady Impa said. I do not know where lay the mistranslation, whether in the words of Her Grace to the poet, or the poet to their writing, or their writing to the one who you call Lady Impa's interpretation. I can say with 99% confidence that the events I have described to you are the closest to the objective occurrences at the time of all of the accounts to which you have been exposed."

Link leaps back a full two paces. Her legs shake. She almost slips on the floor, but then she solidifies her grasp on this world. She steps, then walks, then races around the chamber, whacking her waist into the altar and groaning as she limps away from the altar, then races around the chamber again. She hears herself into the laughter of a joy as deep as that which she feels when Ilia browses through her hair while she steams for her companion a pumpkin.

She didn't run away. She didn't run away.

That does not bring back all those who have died, and that does not lessen the pain that all those who have suffered and who continue to suffer have borne, and that does not mean that she can lessen her conviction about what she do. No. None of that. Instead, more than ever, this epiphany means that she can do it. If she had run away, she has promised to do better this time. And now she knows, beyond her own promises, that she can. That she does have the ability. That she has trained with the Champions, and she has honed her skills over these past two years, and she has, if not the wisdom or the power, then at least the courage to face the Calamitous One. She, and the people of the land once known as Hyrule.

When she finally manages to calm herself down, her hands on her knees, her chest heaving despite her not needing to breathe in the Sacred Realm, Link raises her head and finds Fi gazing levelly at her. Link signs out an apology. Before Fi can respond, Link continues: "Wait, but...then why didn't you let me draw you the first time? You know, when I came to the lost woods last autumn. That would've been months earlier."

"I have criteria which I utilise to determine who may carry my burden," Fi explains simply. "When you attempted to draw me during what you refer to as the first time, you did not match the criteria. More recently, you did match the criteria. Do you understand?"

Resting her hand against her chin and tapping her boot pensively against the floor, Link lifts her hands to inquire of something else, but Fi proceeds forward with her song: "I have another datum to present to you, which I shall also present to Her Grace upon our conversation together."

Link motions for her to continue. She does not know what means datum, or if that word has something to do with data.

"Although I have successfully repleted some of my energy stores during the one hundred and two years, two months, nineteen days, eight hours, and nineteen minutes, I have run successive calculations, and I do not believe that I have acquired sufficient energy to seal the one you call the Calamitous One myself.

"During the original sealing—" Again, that ridiculously large number. "—the energy contained within me was not sufficient for me to create a long-lasting seal by myself. In the past, I have estimated from data collected over—" An even larger number. Link woozes back and forth. She has never imagined the entirety of the earth to have such an age. "—that my own seals tend to last little longer than approximately one hundred years, with a 0.68 certainty of expiring within one standard deviation of a year around one hundred exactly. During the original sealing, therefore, I relied upon the will contained within the life energy of the many who gave their lives in order to extend the seal. I channelled this life energy into a seal that I estimated would hold for approximately ten thousand years, with a standard deviation of one hundred. Do you understand?"

"Not really. Kind of? I think I get the important bit."

"My analyses of the simulations which I ran appeared to indicate that I would have sufficient power after the hundred years of repletion. However, I did not account for interference by the one you call the Calamitous One, as I have not been able to collect data about him for these ten thousand years which I spent not connected to the Sacred Realm.

"As a result, I had to estimate his impact in my simulation. I admit that I gravely underestimated the corruption of the Sacred Realm. In short, I have been unable to accumulate sufficient energy to see the one you call the Calamitous One according to the original algorithm upon which you, Her Grace, and I decided. Therefore, I recommend that we seek alternative options for sealing. My analysis of my own simulations indicates that I have sufficient energy to seal the Calamitous One temporarily, at least for ten years. During that time interval, we may seek an alternate solution. However, I do not recommend that we concern ourselves with such alternate solutions immediately, as the temporary sealing will provide us with relief from the inappropriate existence of certain beings of will within your world. Do you understand?"

Link tilts her head to the side. "So just don't worry about it for now?"

"That is correct." Fi pauses; Link nods sagely. She is very good at not thinking about things. The master of the sport. She can not think about things all day long. "Do you have any additional questions before we depart?"

Link shakes her head. She starts to make her way to the door but stops when she realises that Fi does not follow. Turning back, Link blinks at Fi, who—despite a face hewn of immutable metal—appears to have a certain determination in the set of her features.

"...Link. Before you go, I should like you to perform something for me which I believe that you may do with 80% certainty."

"Anything," Link answers.

"Many of those whom I have faithfully served over the ages and eons have imparted upon me some aspect of themselves. I have learned much since I took on a corporeal form: of happiness, of courage, of trust, of loss, of letting go, of acceptance. You, who seek to fulfill your promises, have spoken to me a similar promise."

Link tilts her head. Fi pauses. For just a second Link swears she can make out something of an amused twinkle in her otherwise blank eyes, but she blinks and misses.

"The data recorded in my visuospatial sketchpad indicate that you wished to prepare for me something that you referred to glazed veggies. I do not have information about such an object in my data banks. Therefore, prior to departure, I request that you prepare for me this meal."

Link stares at her. Then her mouth widens into a grin, and her eyes embiggen to the dinner plates on which she will make Fi dinner, and she reaches out to grip Fi by the shoulders. Fi glides away from her; Link stumbles forward, scarcely catching herself from tripping.

She erupts into excited signing: "And here, I was afraid that you wouldn't have a heart, much less a stomach! Oh, but the Goddesses wouldn't have created something without a stomach. Even the monsters—at least, most of them; I don't know if pebblits and tali have stomachs but I don't see why not!—eat and all that! So I'm really, really glad you get to eat. And that I get to cook for you. And that—"

"I apologise. However, you may not touch me or come in contact with me while I am in this form."

Lowering her hands, Link cocks her head at Fi.

She elaborates: "As a being of concentrated power of will, contact between with a being of blood such as yourself leads to mutual destruction. All beings have within them some parcel of will and some parcel of blood, but there are those, such as the one you call the Calamitous One and his essence which you call the malice—as well as myself—who are composed of a much higher percentage of concentrated will. Therefore, I highly recommend that you do not come into direct contact with me. If necessary, I will return to my corporeal form. However, I calculate that my more native manifestation will prove at least 22% more useful whilst we remain here, so that I may speak freely to you. Do you understand?"

Link cocks her head still further until her neck starts to ache; she moves her head to cock it the other way instead. "What...what about the stuff that the slate's made out of? The malice doesn't eat through that."

"No. That which you call 'the stuff that the slate's made out of' was composed of both material from your people's realm as well as the energy of the Sacred Realm, which grants the resultant alloy sufficient resistance to damage from both sources of your world and of the Sacred Realm. Do you understand?"
"It's not just my world. It's your world too," Link stubbornly signs back, "especially since you've helped to save it countless times, haven't you?"

"It is the world which I call home, but, as a being of will more concentrated than those you call the dragons or those you call the monsters, it can never be my world."

Link frowns. She has to stop herself from reaching out a hand towards Fi, which she instead slides into a gesture: "I don't know what these others heroes have taught you, but it's your world just as much as it is ours. That's my promise. And I'm going to make you the food right now to prove it! All right?"

Fi bows her head. Link reaches for the cooking pot affixed to her back, intent on slamming it down onto the floor, only to realise that she has no cooking pot. Squeezing shut her eyes, Link holds out her hands in front of her and concentrates as if having trouble with constipation. She grunts.

Something round and heavy weighs down her palms so suddenly that she jumps back. She cracks open one eye. A cooking pot. A cooking pot in her hands.

Link dances excitedly while Fi merely looks upon her, twirling the cooking pot in her arms. As she turns the cooking pot over, Link runs her fingers over the scars that the cooking pot has borne, the scars that she has imagined to the best of her memories. The cooking pot feels smooth, too smooth: she would rather have her real cooking pot, flaws and all, but this will have to do for now. Closing her eyes again, Link conjures up all the ingredients that she needs for the dish she promised to Fi. Acorns, and rock salt, and goat butter, and silent princesses, and, of course, honey.

Honey. As gold as the will of the Golden Goddesses. As gold as the sky of the Sacred Realm. Link manifests a campfire, which goes out immediately. With a glare of her gaze, she sets the willed-to-existence pile of wood alight again. She grins as the flames spring up—and then go out again.

"If I may speak," Fi remarks levelly, "I should note that the concentration of oxygen required for combustion in the Sacred Realm is close enough to zero so as to be negligible. I estimate a 2% chance that you wish for me to provide a detailed break-down of the exact concentrations. Do you understand?" Link tilts her head, furrowing her brow. "I highly recommend willing a fire that does not require oxygen to combust. Do you understand?"

"What's that word?"

"I highly recommend willing a fire that does not require air to burn."

Link snaps her fingers in appreciation. She summons such a fire, and then she gets to cooking. After preparing their leaves and stems of the silent princesses properly and leaving the bittersweetness of their petalled heads, she smears them in butter and salt. She steams the silent princesses covered in butter in the cooking pot. Cutting the acorns in half, she salts and sautées the acorns nuts. She wipes the softened silent princesses and the finished acorns onto a plate, arranging them into a very vague approximation of the Master Sword, with a whole acorn as the jewel in the pommel and silent princess petals for the wings on either side of the hilt. Link drizzles honey over the silent princesses and acorns in a rough approximation of the patterns of the Master Sword's. Although the criss-cross normally does not extend to the blade, she must extend the patterns in order to glaze the entirety of the bundle of silent princesses.

Licking the excess honey from her fingers, Link spins around—willing the plate not to fly from her fingers and land in Fi's hair or on any other part of her body—and drops down to one knee, propositioning Fi with the dish of honey-glazed flowers.
She waggles her eyebrows at Fi, like Urbosa would have. Link glances down at the plate, then up at Fi, who hovers forward.

It occurs to Link that Fi might not have the ability to eat that which she has prepared: when she touches the silent princesses, they could burn up away, as though Link had plunged them into malice. Isn't that what Fi said, about the concentrated power of will.

However, as Fi lowers her head to the plate, Link sees that neither the plate nor the silent princesses disappear, at least not from what Link can tell. Fi delicately plants her entire face onto the plate. Link moves her head from side to side, attempting to find an angle from which she can see the goings-on, but Fi has covered the dish with her head. After a few moments, Fi lifts herself back up, her face still frozen into its previous expression, the glazed silent princesses vanished from the plate.

Link blinks. Her gaze darts between the plate and Fi, between Fi and the plate, between the cooking pot and Fi, between Fi and the cooking pot—alongside the campfire—which has spontaneously vanished.

"...thank you. The information has been processed for my data bank. I do not believe that I have the capacity to fully understand the spirit of your people, yet I am currently experiencing that which I hypothesise mostly strongly correlates to the emotion that your people call...hm." Fi stops. For a moment, Link fears that Fi has broken. Then Fi resumes her song: "I do not have a word for it. This is a very infrequent and rare phenomenon. What do your people call the emotion that comes after consumption?"

"What'd you think of it? Was it good? Was it delicious?" Link leans in.

Fi pauses. "I do not have sufficient data in my banks in order to determine the appropriate rating for meals made for consumption." Link limps down to the ground in her crestfallen sadness. "With that said, the glazed veggies that you have prepared for me have brought me great satisfaction, satiety, and happiness. What would your people call that?"

Springing back up to her boots, Link jumps up and down. As she bounds, she tries to sign at Fi at the same time. "That means that you thought it was delicious and that's so good I'm so glad that you liked it I'm so glad I'm so glad that makes me so happy I promised that I'd make you a meal and I have and you thought it was delicious and I don't really know what emotion I'd call it except it's that sort of warm calmness that you get when your belly's all full and you kind of just want to take a nap and maybe hold your friend's hand and listen to the breeze and Fi even if I can't hold you like this I promise that I'll hug you when we're back in our world—not my world but our world both of us together—since that form isn't going to hurt me or anything like can you feel hugs like that actually?"

"Yes," sings Fi. Link grins broadly enough that she pictures her teeth glinting as brightly as Sidon's.

"Then I'll hug you like that all the time. Our world. Not just mine. And and and as for the emotion. There's lots and lots of feelings that we don't really have a name for, because...well, people don't really have names for everything.

"It's like the stars. I don't know the names of all the stars, but that doesn't mean that I can't look up at them and appreciate their light or think about the stories. Maybe I'd call that feeling warmth, or something. That's what I feel the most. No, no. Wholeness. I'd call it wholeness. It's like the taste of honey, how honey tastes full and whole, but it's like a wholeness of your whole body. Like...wholeness." Link rubs the back of her head. "I'm not making much sense, am I?"
Fi hums melodiously. "Your people do not operate on logic, but rather more so on emotion. Thank you for the data. I will attempt to process it at a later date. I will, after all, have a very, very long time to process it, utilising 'very, very long' in the sense with which your people would consider it due to our differing time scales." She leans back with a certain measure of almost pride that she has deduced something about people that Link wonders just how much Fi herself operates on logic, and how much on emotion. "Now, have you prepared what you plan to say to Her Grace?"

Link touches her chin. She has so many things that she would want to say that she does not know where to begin. She wants to tell the girl with the golden hair everything that has happened, wants to speak of all the memories that she has remembered, wants to reassure her that she will not fail. After all, Link knows, now, that she did not run away the first time. She knows, now, that she did not fail by her own skill or choice.

But this time, more than ever, with all of the stars aligned, the nameless and the uncountable, she will either bring peace to Hyrule, or she will give her life. And she cannot give her life, because she has not yet eaten all of the meals of the land once known as Hyrule. The land once known and perhaps which one day against shall be known as Hyrule.

And she has one question that she needs to ask. About the mirror. About the mirror in the sanctum. About an alternate path into the Sacred Realm.

Link lifts her chin towards Fi. She nods decisively. Fi skates towards the door, but then Link taps her boot against the floor to gain Fi's attention. Fi turns her gaze onto Link.

"Wait, before we go, I...I have a request, too." Even though Link can sense that she does not need to breathe in the Sacred Realm, she does so anyway. The air feels thicker than the air she's used to. Not quite air, but some sort of fluid, thinner than water but more viscous than anything she's used to back home. "Fi...why did you choose me? And then after I ran away, you didn't pick me, but you didn't pick anyone else, either. You said something about me not fitting a criteria, and then fitting it again..."

"I hypothesise with 98% certainty that you meant a criterion."

"Hey, only Amali gets to correct my grammar like that! And Malon too. And everyone else who wants." She puffs out a breath of laughter. Fi does not respond; Link coughs. "But my point was...I don't get it. I'm just some girl who likes to cook. And you picked me over all the nobles and knights in Hyrule. I just...I don't really get it. Not that I'm questioning your decision!" She winces. "Maybe a little questioning your decision. I just...want to know.

"Am I...am I really some destined hero?" Link gestures at herself, resting her hands on her chest. "Born with the soul of the hero and all that?"

For a moment, Fi does not reply. Rather Fi resonates a wordless melody that puts Link strangely at ease.

"With 68% certainty, I believe that you wish or expect me to say something akin to that I selected you for your courage, your wisdom, and your power, and-or that I chose you for the potential that I could sense within you. With 42% certainty, I estimate that you wish or expect to say that you alone were meant to wield the sacred sword."

Link leans forward despite herself. Fi falls silent for another moment. Then, again, she starts to sing:
"To a correlation of approximately 0.40, I did select you for your courage, your wisdom, and your power, and I did choose you for the potential that I could sense within you. I hypothesised a 92% chance that you would be able to wield me with sufficient skill to seal away the one you call the Calamitous One if necessary, once you had attained the proper training. However, to a correlation of approximately 0.90, I selected you because you would be willing to die."

Link looks, blankly, upon Fi, and Fi looks, blankly, upon her.

"You would be willing to lay down your life if you needed to. You were willing to die. Though you wished, desperately, to die, you forced yourself to continue living for the responsibilities that you bore to your sister and to your friends. These represented your motivation. I calculated a 98% certainty that this motivation could be expanded to Her Grace, and an 87% chance that this motivation could be expanded to the whole of your people. You would neither take your own life, nor allow a foe to fell you, as long as you believed that the responsibility of others' lives and happiness rested upon your back. You would not die aimlessly. Yet, if the situation required you to lay down your life, you would."

Link flattens her palm against her chest. For a moment, she cannot sense her heart thudding at all. Her skin crawls. Then she wills her heart to beat, and it thumps against her palm.

"The nobles and knights of whom you speak," sings Fi, "as well as those who have most recently sought my judgment, had the three virtues required of them, certainly. Not bravery, but courage. Not intelligence, but wisdom. Not strength, but power. However, they lacked the conviction to lay down their lives in necessary sacrifice.

"The burden of the Master Sword is the heaviest to bear. Not all should have to lay down their lives."

"Yet, to serve your people, you must be willing to die, and yet must also be unwilling to take your own life until such a time that your obligations are complete."

Before Link has even started to lift her hands, Fi continues: "I believe that I anticipate your next remarks with 84% certainty. Even in your lowest nadir in the mists of will, when you believed yourself running away out of cowardice, you 'ran away' to the pedestal where I waited, and you motivated yourself to complete the mists of will without the guidance of a korok. Your motivation was the promises you had made, both to yourself and others, to protect your friends and your people.

"If you had wished to perish namelessly, or if you had wished to even perish a bearer of the burden, or if you had truly wished to perish at all, then I predict a 99% chance that you would not have considered your obligations to others, nor would you have spoken of preparing for me a meal. I recommend that you look into your heart and know yourself, for I anticipate with 96% certainty that you know as well as I for my words to ring true."

Link lowers her hands to her sides. She gazes at Fi. At the sword that seals the darkness. At the blade of evil's bane. At the Master Sword. At Fi.

"You were not born as the bearer of the burden. The bearer of the burden would have been the first person to seek my judgment, to willingly bind themselves to the contract, who passed the criteria which I have already mentioned. It could have been you, or it could have been anyone else. Indeed, I calculated only a 0.6% chance that you would pass my judgment a second time, once I understood that you had lost your memories and your willingness to die. Do you understand?"

Link rotates her wrists. She glances down at her hands. At her right palm, bearing the crescent moon scars left behind from how tightly she dug her nails into her flesh in the lost woods. At her left hand, marked by the lightning-strike spiral left behind from the trail of trial. At both, the violet—the sunset hue of the sash Marin once wore at her hips—whorling over her fingers, over her wrists, over her arms and shoulder and body.

It dawns on her that the moment she decided to look at her own hands, the gloves that she willed into existence vanished.

Fi's hum gives way to the melodious softness of her voice. Link meets her gaze, her resonant gaze. "I pass judgment on those who seek it with a correlation of at least 0.96 objectivity, estimated at a level of 95% confidence. With that noted, I must admit that as I underestimated the ability of the one you call the Calamitous One, so, too, did I underestimate you. I have taken this information into my data banks to adjust my algorithms for estimating the spirit of your people in the future. Though you are beings of heart, and not of will, you possess a greater will than I anticipated."

Link cocks her head. "That's a compliment, right? It sounds like a compliment. I think it's a compliment! I'm understanding this right, right, that it's a compliment?"

"Yes, I can say with 83% confidence that, from my understanding of the term compliment and its applications as well as that which you personally value, that my words constitute a compliment." Link beams.

"With that clarified, I wish to admit a particular observation, which I comprehend to be an entirely subjective datum and which I therefore did not allow to play more than a 0.2% factor in my determination of the fitting of criteria." Fi does not breathe, but Fi does—Link notices—perform a certain undulation of her cloak which Link takes an emulation of breathing or fidgeting. She does not do so frequently. Link realises with a start that Fi performs the fidgeting only when Link looks directly at her, like some kind of routine meant to make Link more at ease. "That which I experienced when I passed my most recent judgment upon you to determine you as the bearer of the burden most strongly correlates to the emotion that your people call happiness."

"I'm sorry, but..." Rubbing the back of her head, Link smiles sheepishly at Fi. "...I don't really get all these big words. Could you try to make it a little easier? Just for me?"

Fi sings so softly that Link can barely hear her, the inflection of the melody carrying with it the joy that Link has felt when hearing Kass sing about Amali and his daughters, or when hearing Marin sing about the future that she would have with Ilia and with Aryll and with Link: "Of all of the people of Hyrule whom I could have chosen, I'm happy that it was you."

Link tears up. Reaching out her hands, she moves to wrap Fi into an embrace; smoothly Fi floats away from her. Link's arms close around empty air. She flinches back, then exhales. "Sorry, I forgot where I was for a second. But when we get back, I'm going to hug you. I promise."

"There is a 93% certainty that the colloquial phrase which most strongly correlates to my current emotional experience would be: 'I will look forward to that.'" Fi does not smile, but Link does, twice as widely, once for her and once for Fi. "Are you prepared to see Her Grace?"

Link nods. She has never felt more prepared for anything in her life, with the exception that she has come empty-handed rather than bearing a plate of food. Yet she does not yet know what the favourite food of the girl with the golden hair; for that reason alone, she will go as she is now, empty-handed.

But, once she remembers the favourite food of the girl with the golden hair, then Link will prepare it for her to the limit of her abilities. After all, the girl with the golden hair has fought for one hundred very, very long years. When the girl with the golden hair at last comes home, Link will have supper waiting for her.

"Follow me," sings Fi.

Link follows. The moment steps out from the protected chamber, her consciousness expands all at once, like water tipped from a glass, spreading over a table. No, not even like water, but like the aroma from a cooking pot, one moment within the pot, and the next filling up the entire room. Everything around her merges in shades of gold and violet, and she cannot tell which way points up and which way down, and she can feel inside of her own body so many other presences that are her and aren’t her at once, and she can feel them fighting, and she can feel the pain of everyone at once, and she can feel what they feel, and she can sense what they sense, and that she can see through their eyes and hear through their ears and smell through their noses and touch through their skin and taste through their mouths and wow so many of them have not eaten in so long that their mouths taste of nothing at all and Link cannot picture a more horrible fate and she is everyone and she is no one and she stands again in the very centre of the crowd with the masses all around her and their voices a cacophony and their bodies far too warm and closing in and she wants nothing nothing more than to press her hands over her ears and curl up into a ball and cease to exist—

Yet she cannot. She cannot press her hands over her ears. She cannot curl up into a ball. She cannot cease to exist. She has promises to keep and paths to walk before she sleeps.

And, like Boori in the market of Nabooru one hundred years ago or like Amali in the streets of Medli now, she has a guide.

She has Fi.

Fi guides her. The presence of Fi and the determination of Link's own boots against the golden ground guide her forward. She clings onto the thin thread of Fi's existence until suddenly another thread, even more tightly coiled around her finger, suddenly vibrates against her in tune with her own heartbeat.

Link raises her head. She raises her gaze. She raises herself.

And there, not wearing the dress of Hylia-white in which Link last saw her, but bearing a sturdy traveller's outfit the same blue as the petals of a silent princess, stands the first girl that Link ever remembered, the girl who gave her back her name, the girl who gave her back her self.

The girl with the golden hair.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: In Skyward Sword, I would have liked Fi better had she had character development throughout the game, instead of just in a single scene at the end. More like Midna from Twilight Princess, perhaps.

The pain is the exact intensity that Link expected because in the Sacred Realm your body and form are exactly what you will them to be. Thus, she 'willed' pain because that's what she expected.

The comment about Fi waiting for a flick of the finger to continue is a little nod to the player pressing "A" in her dialogue choice, but really it's about her waiting for Link to signal she can continue.

I had a lot of fun writing Fi's dialogue! I tried to emulate her manner of speech in Skyward Sword, although with the changes that I expect she has had over the past more-than-ten-thousand years. That said, I haven't played Skyward Sword quite some time (after all, it released in 2011), so I was just going off of memory.

The exact phrasing of Fi's line about "Master, the energy stores in your Master Sword are nearly depleted" is a reference to Fi saying, "Master, the batteries in your Wiimote are nearly depleted". By the way, during my entire play of Skyward Sword which took me about fifty hours to 100% using no guides, I only had to replace the batteries once at the very end, and I never once experienced a Wiimote desync after my initial difficulty with setting up the sensor bar. It mystified me to see how many people complained about it.

But the idea here is that Fi had no access to the Sacred Realm in the Temple of Time. This is part of my own feeling of the Master Sword as belonging without a 'sacred grove' rather than a human-made temple. The idea of Fi running out of energy was inspired by The Wind Waker, wherein the Master Sword requires prayer to be recharged, the ability to be the bane of evil having left the sword in the interim between Ocarina of Time and The Wind Waker.

Speaking of which, "Her Grace" is how Fi refers to Zelda in Skyward Sword.

"Concerned power of will" is the purple goopy malice.

Fi learned happiness from the Link of Skyward Sword. The other ones—courage, trust, loss, letting go, and acceptance—speak to other heroes whom Fi has served over the years. If you sit down and think, you might be able to figure out which ones I meant with which word, but it's really a matter of interpretation, and I doubt that my own thoughts have a 1:1 correlation with anyone else's.

Fi is a being of will just like all of the monsters.

Fi correcting Link's grammar isn't about correcting Link's grammar, but about ensuring that Fi's interpretation is correct.

By the way, at least one reviewer completely and utterly predicted why Fi chose Link. You know who you are. Kudos to you. Yep, the Master Sword "have waited for someone who is absolutely, unconditionally, without any hesitation or doubt, willing and ready to die for a cause" (if you will allow me to borrow your words, Tsunamiracle, who put it better than I could myself put it).

The outfit that Link sees Zelda in is the outfit that Zelda wears in the official art, with the blue tunic and black pants.
"The girl who gave her back her name" is a reference to the very, very first chapter, in which Link remembered her own name (Link) by recalling a memory of Zelda saying her name. If you don't recall, go back to the first chapter. Or go to the fifty-third chapter, wherein I detailed the memory more fully, including what page Zelda was reading from.

Up next: the girl with the golden hair; revelations about the mirror; the armies of Hyrule.

Beta reader's comments: The Sacred Realm is so neat, so otherworldly. I love how it's set up. The author has some super interesting ideas incorporated into it.

Fi is adorable and a really great character. I'm glad we finally get to meet her.

The travelling chef speaks to the girl with the golden hair, then seeks the mirror in preparation for the day of the summer solstice.

Chapter Notes

As usual, that which the author could fit in the author's notes box at the end: I started this chapter at 17:29 on the seventeenth of August, and finished writing it at 17:54 on the eighteenth of August. Hey, that's nearly twenty-four hours! The actual writing of the chapter took over ten solid hours of writing, and I was sitting around frantically preparing for my medical school exams on the twenty-fourth of August.

As always, thanks a million for all of the support that you've given me. If it makes you feel any better, we are officially done with chapters that require too much talking. We are in end-game now. The next six chapters will all be the Great Calamity. And the seventh? Well. Every meal needs a dessert. And please give a round of attention and applause to my most marvellous beta reader, Emma, who has pulled through time and time again, including wrenching my fingers off when I'm too antsy to make a cool pattern instead of a good story beat. But hey, this fic was mostly me wanking about my own interests in the Zelda universe, my own thoughts on fate, and my desire for proper worldbuilding, so thanks a million for bearing with me!

Fi being able to dowse for items made of similar material to others is from Skyward Sword! I personally got through Skyward Sword without once using the dowsing mechanic after the tutorial explaining it. I didn't like it, but I did find it fun to run around exploring things on my own. After all, once you've got the red candle, there's no reason not to burn every bush in Hyrule.

Link saying the line about Farore's mystical seeds of courage is my tongue-in-cheek reference to the prototype third Oracle game, hypothesised to be Oracle of Secrets, which was ultimately scrapped.

Remember, if you die in the Sacred Realm, and you don't know enough about your own physiology to be able to pull yourself back together properly, you can remain alive in the Sacred Realm due to power of will but will die if you return to the mortal world.

The name "Fi" comes from "Fidelity", according to the official notes for Skyward Sword.

The egg-fried bread is one of my favourite recipes.

New Maritta is named for the ruins of Maritta in Breath of the Wild. New Maritta is, as mentioned in this chapter, at the place where Serenne Stable is in Breath of the Wild.

Hey, remember me writing this in the author's notes for the seventh chapter? "When my beta reader was reading this chapter, she asked me what Inpaz means; just wait until chapter seventy-seven or so." Well, now you now what Inpaz means! It was named after Impaz, the character from Twilight Princess.

If you're wondering about where the name 'Mount Hinderless' comes from, think of another mountain with four famous faces carved into it (and disgustingly so, considering the history of the mountain in question); alternatively, just split up Hinderless into its two component words, and look up the antonyms for each word.

Farore being associated with speed is inspired by things like pegasus boots, which I named Farore's boots in adrift due to their association with the wind, and Farore's Wind from Ocarina of Time, a teleportation spell. Nayru is with protection, for reasons already said, and Din with might, similar to Din's Fire in Ocarina of Time (and my renaming of the fire rod to Din's rod for similar reasons).

The girl with the golden hair.

The girl with the golden hair. The girl with the fire-light eyes. The girl with the Hyrule-earth skin. The girl with the golden charm at her throat. The girl whose people cried out for salvation. The girl whose cries the Goddesses never answered.

The girl who answered those cries with her own hands. The girl who saved her people with her own hands.

The girl at whose boots Link sinks to her knees: in reverence, in disbelief, in gratitude. She sinks to her knees in the void of gold and violet and blue, the only ground beneath her body that which she wills from thin air, the skies—if they are even skies—shimmering. She sinks to her knees in the joy she felt when she heard of Marin's life fulfilled; when she embraced Ilia alive and well; when she now sees the girl with the golden hair, appearing nearly the same as she did Link left her, though—like Link herself—scarred and healed and scarred again and healed again from these one hundred years. One hundred and two years, as Fi would specify.

Link gazes upon the girl with the golden hair, and the girl with the golden hair gazes upon Link. Thick eyebrows over inquisitive eyes framed by dark lashes. A broad nose above a mouth set in the thin line of determination. Her features softening down the longer she faces Link. Her eyebrows angling down to furrow her forehead. Her lips parting. Her hands rising up to her own cheeks.

The girl with the golden hair, saying something that Link cannot hear.

Saying her name.

"..."

Saying her name.

"...Link..."

Saying her name.

"Link."
Silence. Link lifts up her hands, but the words have long since died on her fingertips. The girl with the golden hair gazes upon Link, and Link gazes upon the girl with the golden hair.

"I...feel like I had a whole...something planned out for when we'd see each other again. A speech. Something that you would think is...cool." The girl with the golden hair rubs her arms. "But in the end, it's only me, isn't it?"

"I love you," signs Link very suddenly, almost before she has had time to process her own motions. "I missed you. I lost all my memories when I woke up. I don't know how much you know about everything that's happened, but there's so much I still don't remember.

"But I remember you. I. I remember you." Link's hands float down on her own knees. The girl with the golden hair looks at her.

In the fabric of the Sacred Realm over which her consciousness spreads, Link can sense the pain of the girl with the golden hair as though it were her own pain, can sense the pain of the Calamitous One as though it were her own pain, or the thing she assumes is the Calamitous One: at the very heart of the Sacred Realm, where on the other side of the veil would lie the castle, a throbbing and pulsating organ, less a person than the most powerful presence within the Sacred Realm, oozing its concentrated will over the land, dripping through the veil between realms like milk strained through a filter cloth, eating away at the mortal world.

"I...I never thought that I would see those words," whispers the girl with the golden hair. She does not breathe, Link notices, nor does she blink, nor does she fidget, instead keeping as still as a statue of stone and silver. "I love you too, Link. I..."

Link rises to her boots. She steps forward towards the girl with the golden hair. She opens wide her arms, and she gestures for the girl with the golden hair to come, and she waits.

"There is a 82% certainty that embracing Her Grace will distract her sufficiently to relinquish her will's hold upon the one you call the Calamitous One," Fi sings suddenly in Link's left ear. "Therefore, I recommend that you abstain for the time being."

The girl with the golden hair lowers her eyelids. For less than a second—so quickly that Link can barely read the emotions on her face—the girl with the golden hair allows her features to contort into the agony of loneliness that Link feels like she would feel her own pain. Then she sets her face again into a mask of determination and force of will.

"Fi. Thank you for guiding her here." The girl with the golden hair rivets her gaze onto Link's. "We have little time. How are the preparations? Do we have a plan in store? I don't know what's been happening topside, except that the Calamitous One has breached the veil, and what little Fi is telling me now."

"How...how are you fighting the Calamitous One. right now if you're talking to me?" Link asks.

The girl with the golden hair closes her mouth. "I'm sorry. I guessed I'm too used to this place.

"...this world is not like the one you're used to, the one I used to be used to," the girl with the golden hair starts, picking her words slowly. "You can feel all of it at once, can't you?" Link nods. "You can be everywhere at once. It's not like a regular world. It's like...you're everywhere and nowhere at the same time. Fighting against the Calamitous One...isn't a matter of skill. It's a battle of willpower and pain.

"So many—I remember all of their names; I know their stories; I asked before they passed on, so that I could remember them—have sacrificed their lives. To live in constant pain, in constant suffering, and to willingly have to keep existing every single second, to have to choose over and over again to live, is something that I could ask no one to do. Those courageous men and women who followed me into the Sacred Realm to lay down their lives for Hyrule have fought against the Calamitous One alongside me all of these years. Every time the Calamitous One tore them down, they brought themselves together again despite the constant agony.

"One by one, they have lost...lost the will to live." The girl with the golden hair does not cry, yet Link can hear in the trembling of her timbre the tears that she has long held within. "One by one, they have faded. Fi's predictions were right: one hundred years after the Great Calamity, we've lost so many of our comrades that we haven't been able to keep the Calamitous One fully chained.

"That's...that's when the Calamitous One started to reach through the veil again. We've been redoubling our efforts and doing everything we can but...the more people we lose, the harder it is. You have to hurry, Link, all right?" The girl with the golden hair shuts her eyes. Her mouth wavers. "We can't hold the Calamitous One much longer. I can't hold myself much longer."

"And," cuts in Fi, "I estimate that you have no longer than four hundred seconds before the risk of the Calamitous One noticing your presence rises to an unacceptable 6%. Therefore, I recommend that you hurry." Link nods her head. Words. Words. Words. "I hypothesise with 98% certainty that you wished to speak to Her Grace concerning the mirror," Fi sings, and Link manages halfway to a grateful smile at her before she turns back to the girl with the golden hair.

"The mirror...?" repeats the girl with the golden hair, her tone and expression the picture of perplexion, her head slightly tilted. "Have you not remembered? It's in the Sanctum, in the Castle. I knew that we retained the mirror from somewhere."

"But it's not in the sanctum anymore," Link signs, her own features twisted into confusion. "That's what I came to ask you. If you knew where the mirror went."

The girl with the golden hair does not reply immediately. Instead, she closes her eyes very slowly, and then opens them very slowly. "The mirror is no longer in the sanctum." Link dips her head. "Did it shatter? No, it couldn't have shattered. All of the research that I did pointed to the fact that the mirror could not shatter without intervention of some truly great force. That's how I realised that it was that mirror. It can break, but not shatter. The other mirror that I researched that did shatter did so from intervention of the Triforce of the Goddesses—"

Fi hums a note, and the girl with the golden hair clears her throat, though Link can tell by the strange hollowness of the noise that the girl with the golden hair does so out of habit and not out of need.

"No...it didn't shatter or break. It's just gone. I thought maybe the malice got to it, but there's no malice in the sanctum, either. I don't know where it is. I...I was hoping you'd know," Link admits. "I thought, maybe you put it somewhere for keeping...?"

"For safekeeping..." The girl with the golden hair touches her fingers together. She pokes the tip of her tongue out of the corner of her mouth in her concentration; Link's heart squeezes down so hard that she fears her chest will explode. "The mirror cannot shatter, but I know that it can break, because I have broken it."

Link blinks. In the outstretched palms of the girl with the golden hair appears a mirror, or a shard of a mirror, vaguely circular, set into a blue and gold frame. The pearl decorating in the handle reminds her of the moon. Link peers down into the mirror, its face so clear and blue that she feels like touching the silver would drown her into another world.
"The Calamitous One has had over ten thousand years to master how to manipulate the veil between our world and the Sacred Realm. I think...I think, from the stories that I've read and the little that Fi's told me, that the Calamitous One used to be a scholar of this veil manipulation, that this used to be something that anyone could do. But...but it's a technique that we've lost over the ages." The girl with the golden hair bites her lip. "I think it's...I think it was lost because my own family forbade anyone from learning it except for themselves, sometime after the Divine Beasts were made. Remember what I thought you, about that one paper that—? Oh, but the history's been lost. It's all speculation and dust—"

Fi vibrates again in warning. Running out of time already. The girl with the golden hair holds out the mirror.

"One hundred years ago, we could only enter the Sacred Realm because the Calamitous One breached the veil. I didn't want for us to have to wait for something like that again, because I wanted to...Fi and you and I all agreed that we would breach the veil ourselves once you and she had recovered after one hundred years. I knew that I had to be able to activate the mirrors myself. We couldn't rely on waiting for the Calamitous One to turn the world into apocalypse again; I'm not going to let people get hurt like that again. So I broke part of the mirror and took it with me. I've used it to train myself."

"You've always been good at self-study," Link says encouragingly. Again the girl with the golden hair rubs her arms.

"...I've always been good at self-study," the girl with the golden hair echoes. "And I've managed to learn enough. When I felt that you returned to the Shrine of Resurrection, I was able to breach the veil from this side to let you through. That's...that's how I knew that you were coming to the Sacred Realm, Link. That's why I came here, so that I could meet you safely."

"You're the one who activated it? So I didn't have to pour in water on the altar?" Link cannot help but feel a slight twinge of disappointment. "I thought I was being clever."

The girl with the golden hair rests her palm against her cheek. "Oh, Link, you're so much more clever than you know. I'm afraid I can't answer about the water, but whatever it is that you were doing made me realise that you were trying to activate the Shrine of Resurrection."

"That makes me feel a little better," Link notes with a half-moon smile. The girl with the golden hair's giggle back buoys her heart until Fi's gentle hums steers them back to the course of the conversation they must have.

"My point is that if you can figure out where the mirror is, I know enough about breaching the veil that I could help. That I could, you know, activate the mirror. Link, is everyone prepared? Tell me what's happened."

"With 98% confidence, I theorise that we do not time to fully inform Your Grace," Fi sings apologetically. "Allow me to instruct Your Grace on the most necessary details: the four Beasts Divine have been successfully activated, each with a pilot; the nations of Hyrule are once more working with a cooperative efficiency of 68%, with a standard error of plus or minus 4%."

"Really?!" The girl with the golden hair clasps her hands together in front of her. "That's wonderful news. I wish I were there to see it all! The Divine Beasts, and the guardians..." She pauses. "68%? That's not very high, is it?"

"Analysis of data banks from prior to what you call the Great Calamity indicates that the nations of Hyrule were previously working together with a cooperative efficiency of 32%, with a standard
"Ah," responds the girl with the golden hair, as if Fi's words meant anything at all. Link forms her hands into questions, trying to understand the exchange in a language that she has never heard of—she does not know if they still speak Central Hyrulean or if they have suddenly switched to Loftean under her nose—but the girl with the golden hair continues: "So, the mirror could've been broken. If the mirror...if the mirror is broken, then you only have to put it back together again, and it'll mend itself. Believe me! I tried to put this piece back and it just...went right back." Her cheeks redden slightly. "I a-actually had to break it again.

"But! But. I took the opportunity to learn, and...and I've learned! I've really learned." The girl with the golden hair stops herself. "Wait. This isn't the time to talk about my research, is it? Find the mirror, and put it back together. Then you'll just have to let me know where it is, so I know where to look for it. If you can bring it back...no, the Sanctum would be too dangerous. Right, how's this! If you can bring it back to the Shrine of Resurrection, I'll keep an eye out for it. Otherwise, just tell me where it is, and when the time's right, I'll breach the veil to let you through." The girl with the golden hair begins to move; she starts to sway. The more and more time that Link spends with her, Link observes, the more human-like the girl with the golden hair acts again. Like she's forgotten how to be people. Like Link is reminding her. "The long war...the long war's finally almost over."

For a moment, the girl with the golden hair contents herself with a lowering of the eyelids. Then Fi's vibrations trigger her into action.

"But you have to hurry. I don't think my comrades and I can survive for much longer."

"I don't know the first thing about looking for the mirror," Link replies. "I've been all over Hyrule to all the shrines and all that, but I don't remember seeing anything like...like a mirror."

"I believe that I may assist in the search for the shards of the mirror with 92% certainty," Fi sings; Link and the girl with the golden hair snap their heads together in unison. "If allowed to analyse the composition of the mirror, I will be able to search the surrounding area for the same material."

The girl with the golden hair's eyes widen. She claps her fist into her palm. "And I have a shard of the mirror right here!"

Fi inclines her head. The girl with the golden hair beams with the light of the sun. No, not the light of the sun, but the light of the Golden Force of the Golden Goddesses.

"Here, Link. And this is even better! Whenever you find the mirror...when you're ready for me to activate it, just touch the surface of the mirror shard. I'll keep an eye out for it, you know? It'll be between you and me." The girl with the golden hair smiles in half-embarrassment, and Link almost hugs her again if not for Fi having sung her to cease.

"You can use the mirror shard to get back to our world, too. I don't..." The girl with the golden hair taps her fingers against her jaw. "...think it's powerful enough to open a breach both ways, but I think it's enough to take you home."

Link takes the mirror into her hands. The handle, like everything else, seems to shimmer at the edges, like a heat mirage, like a bowl of stew viewed from a fog of vapour, like the handle itself were about to dissipate into mist. Yet the shard of the mirror, reflecting a deep blue—not the fire-light blue washing over everywhere—that does not seem to exist anywhere else in the Sacred Realm, remains entirely whole and entirely firm, like the one point anchoring together the rest of the Sacred Realm.
"Now, it's time for you to go, isn't it?" the girl with the golden hair murmurs, as though she were speaking from a place far, far away, her voice carrying the loneliness of the wind upon the sea. Aryll told Link about that: the wind upon the sea that she listened to on the long and lonely journey between Ordon and the island on which their grandmother lived.

Link nods. "I have promises to keep, and paths to walk before I sleep," she recites.

The girl with the golden hair sniffs. "You...you were listening to me when I read to you. I m-mean, not that I ever doubted you! Oh, I always say the wrong thing."

"Not really," says Link. "I get what you're trying to say, you know. I don't always get all the big words, but I get that passion in your eyes."

Her eyes water. "Th...thank you, Link."

"I remember more of what you read to me, too! Not just that. I remember the prayer, of the breath of the wild and Farore's mystical seeds of courage. No, wait, seeds of life, and wind of courage." Link rubs the back of her head. "Maybe I don't remember as well as I thought. And I remember the quote you read me from that play about the King of Parapa. The thing about how the valiant never taste of death but once or something like that. And—" Her gestures become wider in her excitement, so broad that Fi has to skate away to avoid Link's wild almost-punch."—and and and I remember you asking me if I thought that people need courage to live, and I remember telling you that it takes more courage to live than most people think, I think, and then I remember you thanking me, and I just want to cook for you again and have you tell me stories and all about your research again while you crimp for me. There's so much I want to show you. There's so many people I want you to meet! Riju, and Amali, and Sidon, and Yunobo, and Ilia, and Sarie, and the other Ilia too, and Romani and Cremia and everyone at home, and—"

"I apologise," Fi sings in over Link's motions, her words falling perfectly in rhythm with the gestures of Link's own arms, "yet I estimate we have less than one hundred and twenty seconds remaining to us before the Calamitous One chance of sensing your presence rises to 12%. Therefore, I recommend that you state your..." Fi appears to process something. "There is a 92% certainty that you will wish to state your 'see you later' prior to departure."

The girl with the golden hair waves her hand. "Link...I believe in you. Have hope, Link. Hope is all we have now, and hope is all we must hold onto. It is hope, or it is death. And, as I have chosen again and again every second of my life these past one hundred years, I choose hope. Hope, and power, and wisdom, and courage. I believe in you. And...and I love you, Link."

"Wait. I know that said I couldn't touch her, Fi, so I'm not going to touch her. But here." Curling her fingers into a fist, Link holds her arm out horizontally towards the girl with the golden hair. "One of my closest friends taught me this. After we beat the Calamitous One and return to our world—and your world, too, Fi—with Hyrule's future at peace, we'll bump fists like this. I promise."

The girl with the golden hair's face scrunches up. For a moment, Link cannot read her expression. And then the girl with the golden hair bursts out into laughter, peals of mirth that alternate from a sound like the oinking of a boar to a sound like the bleating of a goat. She lifts her hands to her own mouth, visibly trying to stop herself from laughing so hard.

"I missed you so much," is all Link can sign, doing her best to keep herself from hugging the girl with the golden hair, from pressing her face into the girl with the golden hair's shoulder, from clinging her body to the girl with the golden hair's. "I missed you so, so much."
"I missed you too." The girl with the golden hair wipes at her eyes. "I missed you more than I could say, Link. I can't believe that...I can't believe that it's nearly over. That I've gotten a chance to see you again."

"When...when we go home...I'd like to ask you to do something for me," Link signs gently; the girl with the golden hair raises her eyebrows. "I haven't had egg tart in a very, very long time. Won't you help me crimp it?"

"Link..." The girl with the golden hair shuts her eyes. "I wish I could."

"What?" She repeats herself when the girl with the golden hair raises her eyelids. "What do you mean? You don't want to?"

"I want to. More than anything. But...I've." The girl with the golden hair rests her palm against her own stomach, just below the line of her hips. "I've died, Link. The Calamitous One cut me in half. Here..." She traces a line across her abdomen from hip to hip. "...to here. I don't think...I'm afraid..." The girl with the golden hair shivers. "I don't think I can go home ever again. So you'll just have to go home for me. Link, I—"

Shaking her head violently from side to side, Link swings her leg, about to step forward. Fi's sudden outburst of song stops her.

"Link," sings Fi, her timbre deeper than before, "I recommend that we depart immediately."

"What?" Link's head spins between Fi and the girl with the golden hair, between the girl with the golden hair and Fi. "But I have to—"

Fi gazes upon the girl with the golden hair, and the girl with the golden hair gazes upon Fi. "Your Grace, please activate the mirror."

The girl with the golden hair gazes upon Link, and Link gazes upon the girl with the golden hair. Link feels her innards tightening up in her stomach as if Fi had just plunged the bokoblin's spear through her abdomen once again.

"Please. Please. I've lost Aryll, and I've lost Marin, and I've lost everyone in Ordon, and I've lost Daruk, and I've lost Revali, and I've lost Mipha, and I've lost Urbosa, and I know I'm going to lose Ilia soon, too, and I can't bear to lose you with everyone—"

And then the gold gives way to darkness, and then the darkness gives way to blue.

"—else."

Link makes the final gesture to the blur of blue of the ceiling above her. Water drains from the altar, the softness under her head and body steadily firming to an unwelcoming hardness. She shudders. When she glances at her stomach, she looks at the Master Sword again in its sheath, and—vaguely in her hands, tipped on the lip of the altar, about to crash into the floor—the shard of the mirror. Now its surface reflects not a blue, clear and beautiful, but inert black.

In this world, her heart beats without her forcing it to. Her body feels to move all too quickly through the thinner air of the mortal world than the viscous aether of the Sacred Realm.

She can sense the boundaries of her form. She cannot sense all of the other presences around her: not the girl with the golden hair anymore. Not Fi. Not the monsters or the people; not the beings of will or the beings of blood. Not the Calamitous One. Not the grass outside or the trees or Sarie or Ilia or Glepp.
She gazes at the Master Sword. At Fi. She draws Fi from her sheath; the jewel set in the pommel of Fi's hilt blinks at her. Link rests Fi down upon the altar along her chest, though the blade of the sword goes so far that the hilt ends up near Link's toes.

"I hope the Calamitous One didn't spot me or whatever. I'm sorry for taking so long. I don't really...I don't really...I don't really know. I just. I don't know what I'm going to do if I can't see her. I...no, I know what I'm going to do. I'm going to keep living because that's all I can do. But I'm going to pray that there's some way for her to come here."

The jewel blinks dimly. Link rolls her shoulders. She rubs the back of her head, tilts herself from side to side, brushes her palms against her cheeks to feel the roughened skin of the scars against her skin.

"Wait...but if she could somehow teach herself how to breach the veil or however she called it, does that mean that anyone can learn how to do that if they know it's possible and have enough time?"

Fi blinks again. The blinks appear irregular, like some manner of communication that Link does not understand, which frustrates her at her own stupidity, never able to understand this or to understand that, always having to ask people to stop and explain things to her or just nodding along as if she understood. She remembers: Nadyne and the molduga whalers, where she simply went along with the contract in her haste to secure passage to Nabooru or to the Divine Beast Vah Naboris. She remembers: not knowing anything about what entails the role of a molduga whaler and nearly endangering Nadyne's entire crew. She remembers: everything that could have gone wrong and Nadyne rightfully blacklisting her from ever becoming a molduga whaler again, all because she could not admit—for fear of denial and rejection—that she did not know how to read Parapan. That she does not know how to read Parapan.

Even teaching herself Faronese has proven more of a chore than she could have imagined. She learns best in doing, yet she wants nothing more than to show her family that she's trying.

And she knows of what Sidon told her. About the lack of education. About the ability to learn. And she remembers—when she first woke up—her excitement to learn everything about the world. She remembers knowing that she did not have all of the answers and knowing just as much that she looked forward to one day finding out all of the answers.

And then everyone has simply expected her to know. Expected her to know this, and expected her to know that, and her curiosity about the world's people and places slowly gave way to a fear that they would expect her to know so much more than she does, when she knows nothing at all.

She likes the wilds. She likes the shrines with their puzzles, and she likes the monsters with their peculiarities, and she likes the meals she makes with their experimentation, and she likes hiking up hills and surfing down mountains and swimming in rivers and climbing up those strange mushroom trees in the ridgelands of Tabantha and riding over the steppe and even figuring out how to prepare mosquitos in the forests of Faron, because when she comes upon all of those things, she has the time to poke around and learn what she wants at her own pace.

And yet there is so much she does not understand, which everyone else seems to, and which everyone expects her to understand, too. She annoys herself beyond reason for not understanding. The girl with the golden hair spoke often about her research, but at least whenever Link stopped to ask, the girl with the golden hair would explain. And the girl with the golden hair appeared to relish explaining, appeared to relish Link's questions no matter how basic. And the girl with the golden hair never made Link feel foolish for not understanding.
Now, she does not have the girl with the golden hair. Now, she has only herself, unable to comprehend a word.

"I don't get what you're saying," says Link, her motions sharper and more rigid than usual. Fi's light ebbs from the jewel. "Wait. Just." She remembers: Sidon. Sidon having asked her, when he took her up on the waterfall, to tap his throat for yes or no. Sidon, compressing all of the complexities of life into something simple enough for her to tap into his throat. "Just. Two blinks for yes, and three blinks for no. I don't need to know all of the...I don't need to know all of the chances and percentages and all those other things you keep saying. I appreciate it and I'm sure someone out there gets what that means, but I really don't." Link touches her chin. "Blink twice for yes. Can you do that for me, Fi? I don't know what language you're speaking. I'm sorry."

Fi blinks twice. Link hugs her knees to her chest. The mirror slides off of her legs, and she scrambles to catch it. She peers down at the mirror, whose surface reflects her own face. Scarred, and worn, and with a crooked nose that has broken too many times to heal quite right. Yet, despite everything, it's still her.

"Fi...if anyone can figure out how to do this weird veil trick thing...that means that something like this could happen again, right?" Link tries to channel Yunobo. Yunobo, who always ends his questions in right? to soften the blow, to make the question not one of foolishness but one of care. "The Calamitous One used to be a person. Like me, or like her.

But the Sacred Realm...er, the thing, the whatever-it-is, however the tree called it...twisted and corrupted him when he tried to touch it. Right?" Two blinks. "So...so then. As long as a Sacred Realm exists, something like this could happen again. Especially since you can't shatter the mirrors without using the whatever-it-is that she mentioned. I forgot what it's called. The thing the tree said." Link her palm against her forehead for her forgetfulness. "But you know what I'm talking about, right?"

Fi blinks twice, this time more slowly. Link breathes out. She curls her sidelocks around her own hands, giving herself something to do while she contemplates Fi, while she contemplates the mirror gone dark.

Then her stomach rumbles. Link shakes her head. "What's the point in sitting here simmering and stewing when I can go simmer and stew myself some soup?" She starts to shift herself on the altar to slide off, but then she stops. "But before that. Now, I...think I promised you something, didn't I?" Link wraps her hands around Fi's hilt and bring her close. Careful not to cut herself on the sharpness of Fi's blade—less for the sake of Link's own safety and more for the sake of Fi not feeling guilty—Link embraces Fi, very, very tightly, as tightly as she can.

And then she embraces her again, and again, and again, until her arms have begun to ache from how tightly she wraps them around Fi. Only then does Link let go to sheathe Fi and strap her again to her back.

She runs her palm over the hilt. Fi resonances warmly against her skin as if in thanks; Link feels a smile and a song—and a stew—coming on.

Picking up the slate from the depression in the face of the pedestal, she opens the doors once more. Link pads from the white chamber into the tunnel of the cave. She climbs up over the slick and moistured walls. Then she leaves the Shrine of Resurrection, reborn again from the Sacred Realm.

If everything truly comes in threes, then Link will find herself in the Sacred Realm once more, and then she will find herself leaving the Sacred Realm once more, and then she will never return to the Sacred Realm again.

"Hey, Goddesses," she signs to the skies and the grasses and the earth, "if You really have this three thing going on, then I hope next time I go to the Sacred Realm really will be my last. I'm gonna make sure of it if I can. I've got an idea, see, and I don't think that it's the smartest plan anyone's ever made. But it's my plan. So I hope You'll help me out with it."

Link emerges into the warmth of the sunshine on her skin and the rawness of the breeze and the new-life scent of the grasses in the late spring turning over to summer. She comes upon Sarie and Ilia huddled together under a tree, several leaves arrayed in front of Ilia, Sarie holding five themself. As Link approaches, she hears Sarie say, very distinctly: "Do you have any threes? No! Bad! Don't eat the cards! Sarie and Ilia are supposed to play with them! Let's try this again. See, these ones are—hello Linkuru-linkle-linky-linky! Hello hello hello where's the old friend where's the old friend Sarie wants to meet them where's the old friend?"

"You're looking at her," says Link. She seats herself beside Sarie and Ilia. She embraces them both. "This...is Fi. Say hello, Fi." The blade glows blue.

"Hello hello hello!" says Sarie. Ilia knows better than to lick swords, but Sarie throws their entire body on the blade. Link intakes a breath sharper than Sarie's wound. "Just make Sarie some food and Sarie'll be fine!"

Now that Link knows how to do. For Sarie, she prepares only the freshest and most fecund loam that she can find, which Sarie rates as there was an attempt. For Ilia, Link salts and steams carrots, alongside the feed that she has brought with her in her saddlebags. She keeps some rock salt on her palm for Ilia to lick up; Ilia hoofs up towards her, licking not only her palm but also her chest and face until Link erupts into laughter from the ticklish sensation of her companion's tongue. Link runs her fingers through Ilia's mane, rubs her palms against Ilia's cheeks, rests her forehead against Ilia's. She pats Sarie's head and then steps back to look at them both together.

For herself, Link cracks open some of the remaining eggs from the monster wedding cake that she made for Misan and Glepp into a bowl. She whisks the eggs with a bottle of milk that Glepp left for her after baking the monster cake, then adds a sprinkle of salt, until the egg—both yolk and white—and the milk have gone smooth. She removes a loaf of bread—her final loaf, she realises with a start, but then again she can always bake more—and soaks the loaf through, one slice at a time, in the mix of milk and egg. Buttering the bottom of her beloved cooking pot, Link breaks open one of the pieces of flint from the stone talus on the Great Plateau to spark a fire. She fries the soaked bread on one side until the slice goldens, and then on the other.

When she removes each slice from the heat, Link piles them up on her knees into a neat stack that stains her trousers with the butter in which she fried the bread. Link carefully bites the corner of one of the pieces of toast, grins to herself, wipes her mouth, and then grabs for the rock salt to sprinkle it a little bit more liberally onto the slice.

The added salt goes a long way. This recipe. She remembers: one of the recipes that Rhibonne's friends taught her, about recipes from Rovah. She remembers: Urbosa correcting her technique on how much butter to add and how to know when to flip the bread. She remembers: Mipha finding the dish too salty for her own taste but thanking her Link anyway. She remembers: the girl with the golden hair reaching for another pinch of salt to sprinkle over the bread at the same time as Link herself did. She remembers: "You really get me, don't you?"

She remembers: "I haven't done as much research on you as I'd like, but..."

She remembers: "You wanted me to tell you more about myself...didn't you?"
She remembers: "...will you?"

She remembers. Link gazes down at her hands. Her right with its crescent-moon red, and her left with its lightning-strike gold, and both with the violet the same colour as the sash that Marin wore at her hips. She looks up from her cooking pot. "Let's get to finding this mirror."

Link summarises to Sarie and Ilia what occurred in the Sacred Realm, glancing back and forth between the two of them, asking—as Fi would—if they understand her. "All right, Fi. How does this dowsing thing work? You said that you need to...to analyse the component of the mirror, right?" Two blinks. "Right."

Link picks up the fragment of the mirror and Fi herself. Then she unceremoniously bangs the two together as though mixing them in a pot. Her cooking pot. Of course. Snapping her fingers, Link sets the cooking pot onto the grass the soil and empties Fi and mirror into it, then stirs with her hand.

"Sarie doesn't think that'll be too tasty!" Sarie observes. "Too much glass and metally-metal!"

Link leans back, loops her thumbs through her belt, and admires her handiwork. "So, Fi, have you analysed the material enough?"

Fi blinks twice. After a moment, Fi blinks twice again. And then a third time, as though driving home the fact that she has very much analysed the material more than enough.

"Great!" Link claps her hands. "All right, Fi, show me the way."

Fi does not immediately respond. Link raises up the sword from the cooking pot; abruptly Fi's blade pulsates in resonance. Link blinks.

Sarie waves their arms. "It's like a game of hide-and-seek! Link should point Fi-dee-lee-tee—" Link tilts her head. "—all around until Link figures out where to go!" Twirling onto Link's crown, Sarie grip her sidelocks and whips them against her head. "Yah! Hyah! Hya!"

Link does, indeed, point the sword all around. As Sarie predicted, the pulsations of resonance shift depending on the direction in which she points: faster to the north and west, and significantly slower to the south and to the east. Gathering her belongings and swinging a leg over Ilia's back, Link squeezes in her thighs. She, Sarie, and Ilia follow Fi's vibrations north-northwest to the edge of the Great Plateau. Link plucks berries and roots along the way for herself and Sarie to munch on.

They sleep at a pocket of trees along the perimeter of the Great Plateau. In the morning, a piece of egg-fried bread tucked in her mouth, Link uses another trick of octorok balloons and Sarie's korok leaf to safely glide Ilia down from the sheer drop of the cliffs. Fi guides them onwards. As before, Link warns each village and town that she passes of the coming potential Calamity, urges them to prepare.

They ride. Around the bend of Aquame Lake, where Link can see the ruins of the coliseum where foolhardy self-proclaimed heroes would once supposedly face off against captured monsters, although the kingnghad outlawed such behaviour. Up north they ride, passing by Lake Kolomo, passing by the decaying and broken remains of a trading hub in the Windvane Meadow whose name Link cannot remember but whose delicacies brought in from all corners of the land once known as Hyrule she could never forget. Further north, around Mount Daphnes at whose base Link and Kass solved the riddle of a shrine that led to a trial of her combat prowess against a guardian with an automated crossbow, where the village in the foothills depends on the shrine now more than ever for protection.

She swerves west to follow the Regencia River with its looping bends until she reaches the ancient temple, a cloister where once lived and trained the Sages of the Seven in isolation and in prayer, where the girl with the golden hair spent a year in fasting and in flagellation to attempt to awaken the spark of the Goddess Hylia slumbering within her soul. The Giant's Forest proves a name remarkably apt; Link realises that she can simply ride Ilia in circles, charging into the one-eyed hinox of the woods and performing hit-and-runs until the hinox bleeds out to death. Link thanks Ilia with an entire banquet of grasses and wild fruits gathering just for her, as Link starts the process of gathering what monster parts she can from the fallen hinox: teeth and toenails and guts.

They cross the Regencia River over the land bridge jutting off from Mount Gustaf, which takes Ilia an entire day to scale as Link seeks out the more gently sloping paths up in elevation. Only from the vantage point of the lake in the western plains does Link look north to realise that she could have saved hours of time and a heroic effort just by walking further north and strolling along the Carok Bridge.

For as much as Link could glide from one side of the Breach of Demise—Link recalls the shrine that she saw here with Kass, who sang to her the story of the being Demise breaking through the earth and leaving the jagged canyon in his wake—Ilia spooks. Without something like a metal door, and without any nearby octoroks from which to take balloons, Link rides south and around the Breach. She takes the long way around Ludfo's Bog before turning back north, following the mountainous trails around the ruins of the laboratory where they studied guardians. Link recognises the ruins by virtue of how often the girl with the golden hair spoke of them. Once, the girl with the golden hair explained, the laboratory had been situated within the castletown itself. "But after I kept being clever enough to escape from those so-called experts in the Goddess to see the laboratory and do my own research...Father moved the laboratory out there." The girl with the golden hair sighed.

From the villagers of New Maritta—rito, gerudo, sheikah—Link learns of the name of the surrounding Salari Plain. With her hip cocked, Link inquires if Salari comes from something relating to the Goddess Sageru.

"It's a common misconception among hylians," answers one red-haired and bespectacled villager after Link has bribed her with carrot cake, "that everything beginning with 'sa' has to be related to our Goddess. You know that we don't speak Parapan here, don't you?" Link rubs the back of her head and makes the villager wildberry cannoli to thank her for the knowledge.

When she asks Fi again for guidance, it dawns upon her that Fi's pulsations grown stronger and stronger as she points the blade north-northeast. Link raises her head. Her gaze sweeps over the sheer drop from New Maritta down into the barren Tanagar Canyon below, carved through the earth as though the Golden Goddesses had pinched the Dragon Dinraal at one end and ripped the dragon up from the ground, leaving the mark of the dragon's birth dividing the earth.

She does not need the trusty red telescope to remember what she will find at the end of the canyon: the shadowed Temple, with its shrine behind its three great statues of the Golden Goddesses.

The shadowed Temple that she does not remember from one hundred years ago. The shadowed Temple that must have long lain buried beneath the earth. The shadowed Temple that the onslaught of malice eating into the ground exposed one hundred years ago. The shadowed Temple with guardians buried in the heart as though protecting a sacred treasure. The shadowed Temple surrounded by several abandoned archaeologist camps marked with the tell-tale signs of attacks by the Yiga.
Link rents a stall for Ilia and Sarie at the Serenne Stable in New Maritta. Bowing her head in thanks and paying in the remains of the hinox from the Giant's Forest—even hinox guts have depreciated in value as more adventurers have grown capable of taking them down in teams, albeit less so one-on-one; Link has Fi at her side, which no one else does—she glides down into the ravine.

She notices that a new archaeologist camp has sprung up, currently fending off attacks by moblins and a pack of ampili. Link—having already faced near death by the rolling shell of an ampilus once before—dispatches them with Fi's assistance, the blade glowing its fire-light blue. As she turns towards the archaeologists, Link widens her eyes to see herself looking once more at some of the researchers from Uruda University of Nabooru, including Rotana, whom she greets enthusiastically. Rotana introduces Link to her wife and younger daughter; her eldest, an accountant-in-training, has remained in Nabooru. Rotana's daughter, herself a budding archaeologist intent on following her mother's footsteps in Uruda once she has grown, requests Link make her fried bananas. The smell of the cooking pot draws other archaeologists to investigate. Link notices researchers from all around the land once known as Hyrule, including a certain Necludan: Calip. Calip, who now bears a diploma from Inpaz College at Hateno. Calip, who puffs out his chest in pride as he thumbs at his fellow researchers from Inpaz.

"Well, well, well, I told you not to put the field of archaeology anywhere near those woefully insular local historians," Calip crows. "You see, once they recognised my most brilliant research of the site of communion that I so graciously allowed you so visit, they could do nothing but peer at me at awe, as if I have Nayru's own blessing of insight! Yes, yes." He brandishes the diploma at Link, keeping it carefully folded up, and whaps her nose with the paper. "Oh yes, they begged me to witness this site of communion as well, as Necluda's leading expert in the ancient religions! If we could only persuade the faithless of our era to take up again the old ways—a cause of the Great Calamity, I still tell you—"

"Calip," remarks one of the Inpaz archaeologists, a sheikah man with cream-pale skin and brown hair furled up in a bun, "did you steal my diploma again? I'll take that back, thank you. Focus on bringing us something of worth, and then the dean might reconsider certifying you. By the way, traveller, these bananas are divine."

Calip cleans his spectacles repeatedly and clears his throat prior glancing once at Link—who blinks at him and his diploma-emptied hands—and then stomping off to continue his research.

With the blessings of the archaeologists, Link enters the Temple. She spends several days clearing out the guardians one by one from a combination of arrows, the mirrored shield, and Fi. Fi, most of all, who proves as effective at cleaving through the guardians as a ruby-edged knife through a stick of butter warmed in the belly of Death Mountain. Whereas Link, before, has struggled against individual automata, she determines that—with Fi's assistance—she has almost nothing to fear. Almost, she notes to herself, as the archaeologists nurse her back to health from a burn that leaves patches of her lower back without feeling; as the archaeologists drag her unconscious body back and save her from a guardian that loosed a bolt of fire-light at the ceiling, bringing down a rock on her head; and as the archaeologists offer her elixirs of every sort to help her with the clearing.

Link could not do this alone. But, with the help of those around her, she can do most anything.

She observes how all of the automata's leg stumps bear the signs of removal by force, how the undersides of the guardians appear cemented down to the rock with some sort of pitch, how the even pacing—despite mistakes here and there—brings to mind some form of planning performed by someone who did not have the tools to fashion defensive turrets like those on the Divine Beast
Vah Naboris or those in the castle. The tattered white shawl from the sanctum provides some minimal cover while she sneaks up to the automata, but as soon as Link attacks any particular guardian, every other automaton fixes its sights upon her, tracking her aggression by sound if not sight. At least the same white fabric protects the researchers who haul her to safety from the guardians’ self-defensive assaults.

At long last, Link carves the final automata from hip to hip through Fi’s blade of fire-light. She grants herself a chance to rest, her arms hanging limply down, her lungs throbbing while she strains to catch her breath.

Thanking Fi and sheathing her old friend, Link walks forward into the stillness of ten thousand years of dust. Ten thousand years or more.

She cannot even hope to hold in her head the largest number that Fi read to her, the number that to her marks the age of the earth, so much older than Link can consider. She can barely understand what means one hundred years, much less ten thousand, much less whatever number Fi told her. The Temple could be of that age, or more.

At the far end of the Temple, Link cranes her head; she gazes at the Golden Goddesses, statues far larger than any that she has seen anywhere but the Temple, extending metres and metres above the ground.

O Din, the Goddess of Fire and Power. O Nayru, the Goddess of Water and Wisdom. O Farore, the Goddess of Wind and Courage.

Link kneels down in reverence, to pray for the peace of the land once, and perhaps someday again, known as Hyrule. She lifts her head towards the Golden Goddesses. She can make out her own reflection in the dark mirrored obelisk beyond the statues, its circular face marked with the symbols of the Goddesses Themselves. Her gaze drifts to the strange chip in the rim of the obelisk, from where the girl with the golden hair broke a vaguely circular shard.

She holds the hand mirror to the obelisk. If she turns the handle just so, with the pearl that reminds her of the moon radiating outwards, she can see where the shard of the mirror perfectly fits the obelisk.

Link inhales. She does not need to locate any other shards: the mirror is whole. She does know why or how the obelisk moved from the sanctum to here, but it no longer matters. They will seal the Calamitous One on the summer solstice. They will prevent a second Great Calamity. This she knows more than she has known anything else in her entire life, except for her own hunger.

Unrolling the map that she has kept with her for over two years since her awakening on the Great Plateau, Link marks the spot of the mirror within the Temple; she writes beside it a prayer for the girl with the golden hair.

The guardians cleared, the archaeologists enter bearing brushes and picks and the intensive desire to study the Temple. They uncover buried chests of white cloaks identical to the shawl Link came upon in the sanctum, the inner collar decorated with an upside-down symbol of the Goddess Sheik. The sight of the emblem brings a prayer to Link’s fingers: may Glepp realise her mistakes, may Glepp never hurt another again, may the rest of the former Yiga follow suit.

Link advises that the researchers use the shrine if they need to escape from monsters and notes that, without the automata, the monsters will surely come. The archaeologists thank her. She advises them, too, not to use the obelisk. And she advises them, last of all, to prepare to depart by the summer solstice.
Rotana pushes up her spectacles. "But but but! Why?"

"Because all of the armies of...of Hyrule are going to be here," Link answers while the archaeologists' eyes widen, "and also, do you want me to make you some stew before I go? I saw you caught some rabbits, and I've got some Eldic and Parapan spices in my satchel."

When Link leaves the Temple to the archaeologists, she bids them well. Climbing back up the sides of the canyon, even with the bounty of stamella and endura shrooms that she stuffs into the rabbit meat to push herself to the limit, takes her the entirety of two days. Eventually, she flops down onto the land above, only for the ground to rumble and a stone talus to rise up from the soil.

With her satchel now bulging in talus ore, Link pays the gape-mouthed stablehand of Serenne back handsomely for having taken care of Ilia. She waves see you later to the villagers of New Maritta.

And then she rides. Spotting the Divine Beast Vah Rudania first, evidently ferrying goods and people from Tabantha to Eldin, she breaks the news to Yunobo, who squeals and asks her to pinch him. Link hitches a ride on the Divine Beast. Sarie spends their days inquiring all about what sorts of rocks Yunobo likes to eat, while Yunobo scratches his cheek and reflects. Link asks what Yunobo likes to do in his spare time.

Yunobo answers: acting. "Acting?"

He bobs his head. "When I was newly hewn and still in school, m-my school put on a play about the famous h-heroes of Eldin. You've s-seen Mount Hinderless, right? With the carved faces of heroes, right? You can see it from Darunia."

Link touches her chin. She nods, vaguely recalling having stood on top of such a mountain to enjoy the breeze and escape from the heat of the crowds before.

"With how b-bad my stutter is, I didn't think that I could be picked. But somehow I was." Yunobo wipes the oily tears that well up from his eyes. "I thought, 'Huh? B-but why me?' My teachers answered that even w-with my stutter, I showed them more pride in the role than anyone else. And the Goddess Goro-goro wants us to take prid ein our actions, right? S-so they picked me."

Yunobo touches the tattered blue shawl still wrapped around his shoulders, unfurled like a cape around him, blue as the fabric of the tunic that Link wears, blue as the Parapan sky.

"That's when I knew that I c-could calm Vah Ruda-rudania. Because no matter how scared, or stupid, or s-scrawny—" Link reflects on Yunobo and his massive rock-ular arms, capable of crushing bare stone; she nods sagely. "—as long as I c-could take pride in what I was doing, the Goddess Goro-goro would be with me, right?"

Link bobs her head enthusiastically. She embraces him. He blushes. "I've wanted to ask you this for a while. The thing you wear—" She does not know the word for shawl in Eldic. "—is from Daruk's sash, isn't it?"

"Huh? This?" Yunobo folds his fingers into the fabric of the shawl. "N-no, it's just from the s-sash that I wore for the play. I've kept it." Link blinks. "I was a l-little newly hewn, then, s-so it doesn't fit me as a sash anymore. But I keep it to remind myself of my own pride in myself." He beams at her. "I used to think it was embarrassing, but then I realised I sh-should have pride in myself for having pride, and I've n-never been embarrassed about it again."

Sarie bounces up and down on Yunobo's head. "Yunobobo-bo-Bobobo is cute! Cute!"

"Huh?" He scratches his cheek. "Bobobo...?"
"Yunobobo-bo-bobobo," Sarie repeats insistently. "Very cute and very proud!"

"Say, you know what this calls for, Yunobobo-bo-bobobo?" Link twirls up her cooking pot, spinning it on her index finger. Its heaviness topples it over; she crashes with it to the ground. As she looks up at Yunobo, her head between his feet, Link winks at him. "Let's cook you up some deliciously grilled rock roast, with extra deliciousness." Gathering her from the ground, Yunobo hugs her. She hugs him back.

With Yunobo at her side, and Sarie, and Ilia, and Fi, Link spreads the word as far as she can. Kaneli dispatches messengers to Tabantha and Hebra; the elders of Darunia carry the news with merchants to Eldin and Akkala; the King Zora calls an audience of all of the Lanayrish to the throne pool; Riju sends her trusted guards and advisors to personally see to every village, but the tight-knit kin of the Parapans and Faronese themselves spread the word as swiftly as Link could eat a whole stuffed cucco; Lady Impa turns Kakariko outwards for the first time in years to the whole of Necluda and the few remains of Central Hyrule.

The plan for the summer solstice shifts: not the castle. Not the sanctum. But the Temple in the ravine of Tanagar Canyon.

Link spends the last few months preparing however she may. She hones her skill with the sword, and with spear, and with axe, and with bow. She learns, at least conversationally, as much as she can about all of the languages of the people of Hyrule, for better communication on the day of the summer solstice. When she brings out the girl with the golden hair's dossiers so that people more educated than her might study from the girl with the golden hair's writings, Link listens to what they say, endeavouring to comprehend the Sacred Realm, the mirror, and the Calamitous One to the best of her abilities. She seeks council from the ancient tree of the Kokir Forest.

Although she tries, and fails, to commune again with the dragons, she notes that the dragons will allow her to chip off a scale or a shard of a horn or a bit of a fang or a piece of a claw, which she gathers to brew elixirs. Elixirs of swiftness, and elixirs of protection, and elixirs of might, in green, and in blue, and in red. Not for herself, but for the people willing to lay down their lives for Hyrule. She watches the planning of logistics, of raising armies that have lain dormant for hundreds of years, of training them in whatever ways possible, of marching across the wilds, of feeding and sheltering them. She hears them consider the trek straight through the Hyrule Field yet worry of the guardians therein. She advises them—like the sheikah man who gave her red bean paste told her over a year ago—to robe themselves in white, which the automata cannot see. She witnesses the slow migration of the armies of Hyrule towards the Tanagar Canyon. She observes the Divine Beasts tower over the entrance to the Temple.

She says see you later again to Ilia at Telma Ranch, and she says see you later again to her family and to Ilia the horse at Romani Ranch, and she stands on the parapets of the castletown to say see you later to Aryll, whom she will greet—upon her return—with a carrot cake to say good-bye.

Eventually the summer sun with its golden light heats the earth until Link can feel the tension in the air as thick as steam. On the evening before the summer solstice, while everyone secures their final preparations, she takes a moment to cook. To cook all of the wilds.

Link sits alone, yet not alone. Not entirely alone. She has the girl with the golden hair's slate. She has Aryll's telescope. She has Marin's ocarina. She has Ilia's whistle.

She has Sidon's faith in her abilities, and she has Yunobo's pride in what she can do, and she has Amali's voice telling her how much she means, and she has Riju's kin, where the sky and the earth meet to form the infinite horizon all around her.
And she has her cooking pot.

She sets her beloved cooking pot, her first and her longest companion, on the lip of the ravine of the Tanagar Canyon, and she gazes upon the world. Upon the wilds that have always called her name in a tongue that she has always understood, and upon the people that, too, have always called her name, though she could not understand their tongue until more recently.

Link still does not remember all that has happened on the eve of the Calamity. On the eve of the many days of the Calamity. Yet she does not need to remember. Some of the memories have slowly come back to her. Not all of them. But some. Enough.

She remembers baking apple pie for herself and for the girl with the golden hair. With the girl with the golden hair. Together, the night before they left for Mount Nayru.

She remembers wrapping the apple pie up in wax. She remembers wrapping something else as well: pumpkin pie. Pumpkin pie and apple pie. A pie for Ordon and a pie for all of Hyrule.

She remembers the girl with the golden hair joking that Link only talked to her for her expertise in crimping. She remembers flustering herself trying to explain that she cared for the girl with the golden hair beyond her ability to crimp. She remembers the girl with the golden hair stopping her own laughter and reassuring Link that she understood, that she was not looking for actual answers, that she just wanted to make pumpkin pie and apple pie.

She remembers the girl with the golden hair fasting, as necessitated by prayer. She remembers the night before the girl with the golden hair's nineteenth birthday. She remembers the girl with the golden hair's stomach rumbling. She remembers retrieving the slices of apple pie and pumpkin pie wrapped in wax. She remembers offering them to the girl with the golden hair. She remembers the girl with the golden hair shaking her head and refusing, saying that she had been fasting for a week and would not give in now. She remembers unwrapping the pumpkin pie to eat for herself, the pumpkin pie from Ordon, that which she ate on the final eve of the Great Calamity. She remembers attempting to eat the cake surreptitiously as she could so as not to hurt the girl with the golden hair. She remembers the taste of that bite of pumpkin pie. She remembers the girl with golden hair sniffing the air, her hand over her stomach.

She remembers wrapping up the pumpkin pie again, remembers poking her head out of the tent that she shared with the girl with the golden hair, remembers offering Impa the pie, which Impa accepted with a note of surprise in her voice. She remembers fasting alongside the girl with the golden hair. She remembers lying beside her in the darkness, remembers staring up at the folds in the tarp of the tent, remembers their bellies growling in unison, remembers them laughing about it together.

She bakes pumpkin pie. She cuts the pumpkin pie into slices. She wraps up each slice in wax. Not to repeat what happened one hundred years, but because she wants pumpkin pie, and the girl with the golden hair might want it, too.

She tucks the slices of pumpkin pie into her satchel. She drains one last vial of spring green elixir. She watches the skies darken to the comfort of the night. The stars whose names she knows, and the stars whose names she does not know, and the stars for whom she has more than one name. The stars that Hestu named, and the stars that Urbosa named, and the stars that the girl with the golden hair named, and some of them the same stars but under different names and bearing different stories.

Someday, long after she has returned to dust, the people of the wilds will look upon the stars. Someday, long after the names have faded to dust, the people of the wilds will name the stars anew. Someday, long after the stars themselves have faded to dust and others have taken their place, the people of the wilds will lift their hands up to the skies and cup the starlight in their palms.

Such is the promise of the Golden Goddesses. Such is the promise of Their breath of the wild. No matter what happens on the summer solstice, the world will live on. The wilds will heal. As long as the sun, the moon, and the earth exist, everything will be all right.

The dawn tips over the rim of the sun's cooking pot and spills its golden aether of will over the skies.

Wetting the mouthpiece of the ocarina, she brings the instrument to her lips. The final verse that Kass ever taught her.

"In a realm beyond sight
"the sky shines gold, not blue.
"There, the Triforce's might
"makes mortal dreams come true."

The summer solstice pours gold into the ravine of the Tanagar Canyon. The summer solstice. The longest day of the year. The longest day of her life.

She slides down to where she and the Champions gather for a final embrace. She embraces Riju; Amali embraces her and Riju; Yunobo embraces her and Riju and Amali; Sidon embraces her and Riju and Amali and Yunobo; and all of them embrace Fi.

"I don't have a speech or anything," she tells them, "but I've got me, and you've got you, and you've got me, and we've got this."

Riju gives her a small ice-box to take with her: Faronese banana, hydromelon, sand seal butter, sand seal milk, sand sparrow eggs, safflina, saffron, voltfin trout, prickly-pear voltfruit, zapshroom. "Gifts from Parapa. If you end up needing to cook in the middle of the battle like you did on Savah Naboris." While Link smiles sheepishly, Riju curls her hand into a fist. "Then, after we come home, we'll have a five-way bump."

"Six-way," Link says gently. Riju tilts her head. "I'm bringing back an old friend, too."

"And when you and your most wonderful old friend return," Sidon bursts out, "we shall cook for them a most delicious paella, as my most wise sister would have loved!"

"If you bring back your friend, then we will have to celebrate with you," Amali agrees. "We can bake fish pie for them."

"And if your friend eats rock, they'd love some rock roast, right?" Yunobo taps his index fingers against one another as he glances at Sidon, who has had a very personal experience with Yunobo's cooking. "A-actually, I'll j-just make them s-some jewellry or something."

Riju touches her hand to her chest. She closes her eyes in concentration for a moment. "I can't think of a single recipe I'd make." She lifts her eyelids. "Then, I'll just have to prepare everything I know. And I'll have the time and peace to do that, thank the Goddesses. We can prepare them together, Link. All of us, together." She looks upon each one of them in turn. "Yunobo, Amali, Sidon, Link." Riju meets Link's gaze; here the sky of Link's eyes and the earth of Riju's meet to form the infinite horizon all around them. "...and Fi, too. Thank you. Thank you all. The Goddesses are with us. We have the power, and the wisdom, and the courage to seal the Calamitous One. We have the Divine Beasts. We have Fi, the Master Sword. We have the blessings of the Goddesses, the Golden, and the Seven, and every Goddess or Spirit of Light or Dragon or other being that has ever protected the lands and the people of Hyrule.

"And most importantly of all, we have each other. We shall not fail. When we leave the Sacred Realm again, we won't leave as the Champions. We'll leave as just people who can live the rest of our lives in peace. I love each and every one of you, you know." Riju takes Link's lightning-strike hand in her right and Sidon's right in her left. Link reaches out to take Amali's left wing in her right hand, and Amali takes Yunobo's in hers, and Yunobo takes Sidon's, until they have joined together in a circle of five. "Now, come on. Hyrule needs us."

They embrace one final time.

"See you later,"

she signs, and she stakes her life on every word.

As she strides step by step towards the far end of the Temple, Link glances back over her shoulder at the armies of Hyrule who have come from all over the land. They speak their own languages; they pray to their own gods; they eat of their own foods. Yet they do not need a word for Hyrule to know that home is something to be defended.

And she can hear the people singing. She listens to their song, to the faint strains of a most familiar accordion she can hear marching at the heart of the armies: the Ballad of the Sealing War. The melody. But the lyrics sound different, not just in language, but in meaning. Through jumble of dialects of Eldic, Lanayrish, Faronese, Tabanch, Parapan, Akkalan, Hebric, Necluda, she makes out the words in those languages she knows. She listens to the song they have spun into their own. She can hear them singing:

"The Princess with her Knight and Champions four

"awaiting fate's predestined Sealing War.

"When Malice strikes, its hate will shade the sun,

"yet bright with Hope, Hyrule will stand as one."

She gazes at them all. At all of the armies of land once known as Hyrule—no, at all of the armies of Hyrule come together as one. Gerudo and hylians, sheikah and rito, gorons and zora, and at least one very excited and very joyful korok who bounds up and down on Link's shoulder. At those who have pledged their lives to Hyrule, as have the Champions, as has she.

The leaders of Hyrule—Queen Riju from the Divine Beast Vah Naboris of Parapa; the King Zora from a mobile pool of water, having laboriously moved from the throne pool for the first time in nearly two centuries, of Lanayru; Chief Kaneli and the other chiefs of the mountain villages, including Rouru who inclines his head at Link, of Tabantha; the councils of elders of the volcanic cities of Eldin; the various figures of Faron and of Necluda and Akkala and Hebra; and more Sages and Oracles than Link can count amongst the stars—speak to their people to give their final orders, to give their people their final speeches and words of encouragement, to tell their people that no matter what happens, on this day they will end the Calamity once and for all.

One by one, the speeches die away. One by one, the armies crowd into the forgotten Temple of the Golden Goddesses—those that can—with the remainder preparing themselves out of the Temple, spilling out into the canyon. One by one, the Champions enter their Divine Beasts.
The Champion of Zola, the Hero of Lanayru, the Divine Beast Vah Ruta's Pilot, O Wise Sidon. The Champion of Sageru, the Hero of Parapa, the Divine Beast Vah Naboris's Pilot, O Courageous Riju. The Champion of Erito, the Hero of Tabanha, the Divine Beast Vah Medoh's Pilot, O Powerful Amali. The Champion of Goro-goro, the Hero of Eldin, the Divine Beast Vah Rudania's Pilot, O Powerful Yunobo.

And she. The Champions of Hylia, the Heroes of Hyrule, Her Majesty's Knight and Blade, O Courageous Link and Fi.

With her crescent-moon right hand, Link holds the mirror, the pearl like a moon set into its handle. She hovers her lightning-strike left palm over the silver. And then she touches the surface of the mirror. It glows gold, deep and clear.

The shard of the mirror begins to hums. The resonance spreads to the obelisk. The mirror. The mirror, reflective. The shard of the mirror soars from the handle, leaving the ring as empty as the rim of the cooking pot. Link watches the shard glide into the chipped edge that she saw months and months ago when she came to activate the shrine.

The mirror stars to glow. The symbols of the Golden Goddesses glimmer within the obsidian. The wind of the Goddess Farore. The water of the Goddess Nayru. The fire of the Goddess Din.

In the game of wind-water-fire, Link has always favoured the circular symbol of the wind, fashioning her hands as she might hold a cup to drink or a bowl to eat.

And then, as she looks upon the obelisk that reflects not a sky of blue but a sky of gold, she feels like she must call upon to favour the Goddess Farore again. Courage. Courage, now, more than ever. She sinks to her knees in reverence of the Golden Goddesses, the only Goddesses that she has ever known. O Din, the Goddess of Fire and Power. O Nayru, the Goddess of Water and Wisdom. O Farore, the Goddess of Wind and Courage.

"The breath of the wild," Link prays, and even if she does not remember all the words just right, she remembers the placement of her hands and the beating of her heart, "shall whisper over the world, long after you and I have returned to dust, and shall breathe life anew. Such is the promise of the Goddess Farore. Such is Her wind, that She carries the seeds of life, and such is Her courage, that we bear the will to live."

The golden triangles of the centre of the mirror shine in their golden light. As Link watches the mirror reflecting her own eyes—the dark grey of the coming storm—she observes the golden triangles shift over the mirror. They emerge from the edges, spinning and tilting, until they come together in perfect harmony at the heart of the mirror in the mark of the Golden Goddesses.

The mirror shines gold. Link draws herself up. She touches Fi on the hilt. And then she extends her left hand, with its lightning-strike mark of the wind and the courage of the Goddess Farore, towards the shimmering surface of the mirror.

For one brief and brilliant moment, Link believes in the hope beyond hope that everything will be all right.

Chapter End Notes
Author's notes: One of Zelda's reasons for having asked all of the soldiers for their names is that, as I've mentioned in previous chapters, one of the Parapan/Faronese faiths in Sageru holds that people do not truly die until the very last time that their names are ever spoken.

The phrase "Triforce of the Goddesses" is taken from the Japanese title of A Link to the Past, which is The Legend of Zelda: Triforce of the Gods. I admit that the English titles tend to be better for the games themselves (for most things it's the other way around), such as Link's Awakening before the superior title to Dream Island. It's a pun and it doesn't spoil half the story! I was tickled pink by the title A Link Between Worlds.

The shard of the mirror is meant to resemble the Magic Mirror from A Link to the Past that allows Link to return from the Dark World to the Light World. The pearl decorating the handle is in reference to the Moon Pearl recovered from the Tower of Hera which grants Link the ability to retain human form in the Dark World. In A Link to the Past, the Magic Mirror is described as such: "This mirror is blue, clear and beautiful... You feel like it is going to absorb you into another world..."

Poor Link. Don't worry. This isn't her having lost all of her curiosity for the world; you've seen it in action. But she's also expressing her it goes when people depend on you to save them.

Regarding Zelda fragmenting the mirror, that's taken from the lore of Twilight Princess, wherein the Twilight Mirror can be broken into shards by someone else, but which can only be shattered by a truly powerful force, such as the queen of the Twilit people.

I imply in this chapter that someone set up the guardians in the forgotten temple, presumably the same group as the ones who stole the mirror in the sanctum in the first place. You can probably figure out who did it. If not, then read on. Speaking of which, I implied this during the sixty-fourth chapter, but it's the Yiga who moved the mirror from the sanctum to the canyon temple and dragged all of the guardians there (much like what I mentioned Purah doing). The white cloak that Link found in the sanctum? Left behind by the Yiga who had used such fabric to help protect themselves from guardians. That's why Glepp was in the Shrine of Resurrection, looking for the mirror; as one of the Yiga's outside agents, she was not privy to the knowledge of where the mirror has been kept but was searching for it half-heartedly. By the time Link came to talk to her, however, you can see that she's understood about giving up. Oh, and the mark of the Yiga isn't based on Sheik. That symbol—the eye and the droplet—was originally the symbol of the old ruling family of Hyrule, which the original Yiga turned upside-down to mark their working against the ruling family, being originally a noble organization that sought to work against the corruption of the aristocracy at the time. Thousands of years later, when the Great Calamity came to light, the Yiga name and symbol were resurrected for a different and much less noble purpose; the symbol of the once-ruling family has (after ten thousands years) become the symbol of Sheik. The Divine Beasts, slate, etc., bear that mark because it was the royal family's mark at the time of their construction.
Remember the obelisk I mentioned way back when? Yep, the mirror's been there all along. Pretty nice, isn't it?

Hey, remember the thing about guardians not being able to see (or rather, ignoring) white? That's a thing that exists! The reason it wasn't too common of knowledge is that people don't normally wear white, and those that do are unlikely to go near guardian-infested areas. But of course some people, like the man whom Link met, suspect.

By the way, if you were curious, though I've mentioned some of this throughout Delicious in Wilds: the main dialects of Tabanch, Faronese, and Parapan are read right to left; Akkalan, Hebric, Eldic, and Central Hyrulean are read left to right; and Necludan and Lanayrish are read top to bottom, the former right to left, the latter left to right.

The original lyrics to the Ballad of the Sealing War (at least, my rendition of them) are located in the ninth chapter.

I mentioned Link's encounter with Chief Roura in the sixty-fourth chapter.

The golden triangles spinning on the surface of the obelisk are a reference to the very impressionable title screen of A Link to the Past.

Up next: a memory, and nothing more.

Beta reader's comments: Zelda! She's here! Link gets to talk to her! We've waited 76 chapters for this, and it's so cool to finally get to read it.

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef and the people of Hyrule have gathered at the mirror in the forgotten temple in Tanagar Canyon. Now, as the chef makes the mirror whole and activates it with a touch, the chef remembers the eve of the Great Calamity. As does the girl with the golden hair.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Link and the girl with the golden hair knelt together upon the floor before the hearth baking pumpkin pie. They had finished preparing, already, the apple pie, which Link had shown the girl with the golden hair how to wrap in wax for the journey ahead. "I know you have to fast until Mount Nayru," Link explained, something close to a smile ghosting over her lips, "but as soon as you get out of there, I'm rescuing you. I mean...it's my duty to watch out for you, isn't it?" The girl with the golden hair rolled her eyes yet played along as Link thumped her fist against her chest. "Including rescuing you from the most deadly enemy of all: hunger!"

"The rules are the rules," the girl with the golden hair said. Her head drooped.

"But you haven't eaten for a week. I know I don't know much about the Seven..." Link shook her head. "This just seems cruel. Isn't one of the virtues something like...happiness?"

"The Goddesses each have Their own virtue. Last time I checked, I've not grown leaves and bark." The girl with the golden hair giggled at her own joke; Link found herself laughing alongside her for the infectiousness of the girl with the golden hair's mirth, before the peals of her laughter faded into a solemn contemplation. "It is the way of those bearing the burden to suffer, so that we might know against which evils we bring our holy might...or something like that." The girl with the golden hair laughed drily. "Mother told me that the Goddesses suffer for the sake of Their people. It is a woman's duty to suffer. I should be grateful to bear it."

"Do you think that you'll...unlock that sealing magic stuff?" Link signed.

The girl with the golden hair spread her fingers over her knees, then clenched her hands tightly into fists, her knuckles pressing into the fabric of her dress. "It does not much matter what I think. It matters what I do. I must, Link. If I don't..." When she drew in a breath, her body shuddered. "...then you won't get the chance to eat pumpkin pie afterwards, now will you?"

"But we made ap—"

"Yes. And we should also make pumpkin." The girl with the golden hair rose from the floor, her dress trailing the floor. "I requested some with last year's harvest. I thought that you would enjoy them."

Link shivered. She wanted to leap up and embrace the girl with the golden hair, yet she kept herself low upon the ground as the girl with the golden hair left the chamber and returned, arms laden with the darker and harder Ordon pumpkins than the sweeter and more orange ones imported from Necluda or Faron. "Pumpkin pie? I'm very ready to crimp, you know. I've been practising my hand motions—" She flexes her fingers and wrists. "—while praying all day." She giggled again. "Don't tell Impa that."

Pumpkin pie. Together, they carved the pumpkin and scooped out the inner pulp and the seeds. They baked the remaining goo in the oven until it became tender and soft enough to remove with their hands. Link demonstrated how to strain the goo through a cloth.

Together, they ground out fresh flour from wheat and boiled sugar from cane. While Link blended the pumpkin goo that they had prepared together with cucco eggs, cow milk—from Lon Lon Ranch, Link noted with satisfaction—rock salt, and spices of nutmeg and ginger, cinnamon and pimenta, the girl with the golden hair whisked the flour they had ground and sugar they had boiled alongside rock salt and goat butter. She gradually added icy water from a basin in-laid with sapphire until the dough ceased to crumble. To prepare the crust, they rolled the dough through flour; Link cleaned off the rolling pin that they had used for the apple pie. After Link buttered the bottom of the pie tin, the girl with the golden folded the dough inside and sealed the corners of the dough under the rim of the tin with a pressing-in of her fingers. As the girl with the golden hair began to crimp the crust, a smile gradually grew upon her lips, crinkling her eyes and smoothing her brow.

Together, they poured the pie filling that Link had mixed into the crust that the girl with the golden hair had crimped and slid the pie into the oven. The girl with the golden hair made carefully incisions in the crust of the pie—allowing steam to escape and not explode the pie—incisions in the shape of the symbols of the Golden Goddesses, her motions exceedingly slow and exceedingly precise where Link would have briefly slashed some holes and then stuck it into the oven.

For Link, all that mattered was the taste of the food. For the girl with the golden hair, a certain satisfaction came from the perfection of settling everything just quite right. Link cooked out of intuition; the girl with the golden hair, out of science. Link did not know the names or the wherefores of what she put into the food or how the food became itself; the girl with the golden hair studied so that she could prepare food all the better. The girl with the golden hair opened Link's eyes to the possibilities she might not have chanced on by herself; Link opened the girl with the golden hair's eyes to the ability of calming down and focusing the food that was instead of on the mistakes or the what-could-have-been. Together, they made something truly wonderful.

Impa poked her head in and inquired solemnly when the girl with the golden hair planned to sleep, yet even Link could tell that Impa's expression had softened on this, the last night before the trek to Mount Nayru.

Together, they baked the pumpkin pie. As they waited together by the oven—the girl with the golden hair kneeling, Link seated cross-legged upon the floor—the girl with the golden hair started, from the silence, to speak.

At first, Link did not register her words as words but merely as sounds, as if she were singing. Then the words washed over her. Link tilted up her chin towards the girl with the golden hair.

"...and I still don't know much about you. I know the things that you've shown me. That you're a glutton who can't resist a delicious meal. And that you truly care for Epona...so much so, that you have helped me cultivate a better relationship with my own little one, Storm. I...I've been trying to do better, you know." The girl with the golden hair glanced down at her hands and then back up at Link. "I've been trying to do what I've seen you do. To soothe, to brush Storm's mane, to be sure to have carrots and salt on me, always. But you've seen that, of course. You're...much more attentive than I am, to the little things." The girl with the golden hair made a strange little breathy noise in the back of her throat that brought Link to focus on her more closely for a moment before returning to staring blankly at the oven. "I...I've told you a lot about myself, too. And you've told me some things about yourself, but...it's always been about others. The little I've learned are the things that you've been forced to tell me when you talk about Ilia, Marin, your sister, or the villagers that you grew up with—the blacksmith's name was Rusl, wasn't it? I'm sorry if I misremembered—but I still know precious little about you."

Link opened the oven to check on the pie. Not quite done. She closed the door again as the girl with the golden hair continued to talk.

"Link...I don't know what's going to happen when we arrive at Mount Nayru. I don't know if the Divine Beasts will function, and I don't know if I'll be able to...I don't know. Everyone thinks that this is our moment. I should have hope, shouldn't I?" The girl with the golden hair closed her eyes. "Link. I have a secret to tell you. I...I did something very bad." She scooted closer to Link, to cup her hands around her mouth, and then stopped.

Instead, lifting her hands and reaching out, the girl with the golden hair brushed her fingers against Link's palms, silently singing into her hands. "You have to promise not to tell anyone." Link nodded.

"I broke off part of the mirror in the Sanctum." The girl with the golden hair glanced left and right prior to resuming speaking. She hunched over Link's palms, hiding away her words from prying eyes. "I...I have a hypothesis that the mirrors I was doing research about really do exist, and that the mirror in the Sanctum is that mirror, the one that was kept by the royal family. I didn't break it permanently! But I just thought that I could...if anything goes wrong...I'll be able to confirm my theory if the mirror works."

Link nodded again, more steadily this time. The girl with the golden hair rolled back onto her knees with a small smile halfway between anxiety and a strange sense of self-pride. Then her features sharpened to solemnness.

"Link. You don't have to tell me if you don't want to. That said, I think that I understand. I think I understand, now that I'm...a little older, and now that I've tried to be more...more attentive to people than I have been in the past." The girl with the golden hair laced her fingers together. "You remind me of Urbosa." Her cheeks reddened slightly before the girl with the golden hair cleared her throat. "You don't want to burden anyone with your feelings. You don't think that you're...worth it, do you? I don't want to say that you hate yourself or something. Yet, you don't feel like you have a right to burden others. So you stay silent..."

She trailed off. Link could sense her looking directly at her as though checking whether Link herself had finished baking in the oven of the girl with the golden hair's expectations.

"Am I...am I right, Link? You know that you can be honest. Ever since Urboa's been opening up to me, she's been a lot happier, and so have I. And, well, y-you know how our friendship's been like."

Again, the girl with the golden hair blushed. She held her hands up over her cheeks until the redness passed. "You can talk to me."

"Everyone else has more problems than I do," Link signed, and as soon as her fingers began to form the shapes of the words, the girl with the golden hair fell silent. "Everyone's got a bigger burden to bear. The...the sword chose me. All I have to do is walk up to the Calamitous One with it, and it'll do all the work for me. The Champions had to fight for their positions. All of them...Daruk, Urbosa, Mipha, and probably most of all Revali...have had to fight more than I have. And you most of all. They all chose to do what they did. I chose to pick up the sword. You didn't choose to be born the one with a destiny. That's all. I don't want to burden anyone else more than necessary." She closed her fingers against her palms as though snapping shut the lid of a cooking pot forever.

The girl with the golden hair opened her mouth to respond, then closed it again, then opened it, then closed it again, and then turned to look into the oven. "I'm sorry." Silence.

"I'm sorry. I've never been good at knowing what to say to people. Even with Urbosa, I just...sort of nod and listen, while she talks, and sometimes she asks me to stroke her hair. I'm not good at comforting people. I shouldn't even be apologising now." Silence.

"...thank you for being honest with me. I promise that your problems wouldn't burden me. It's...it's after I found out, about your parents a little, that I thought to myself that maybe I could trust you after all."

Link blinked at her. Their positions had switched: now she stared at the girl with the golden hair, while the girl with the golden hair stared at the oven.

"I think the pie is done," observed the girl with the golden hair. Link could hear in her timbre the slightest tremble of tears.

They cut the pumpkin pie into slices. They wrapped the pie up in wax. They put away their belongings for tomorrow. The girl with the golden hair took her harp down from the wall and invited Link to play alongside her for a time.

"I know that we've given up on music bringing out the ability to seal the darkness," she said, her voice kept even, as if stretched out to a timbre so thin that Link could see through its translucency. "I simply wanted to teach you something. A last song. I've already taught you the songs that Mother taught me of all of the other Goddesses. But...I haven't taught you the one that I asked for most. She sang all of them to me as lullabies when I had trouble going to sleep—including that nocturne to the Goddess Sheik that scared me as a child; that's a little trivia for you—but I haven't taught you the lullaby that she sang.

"She told me that...that that lullaby has been known with the name of the princess stretching back generations. It's custom to name every firstborn princess the same thing, you know, until they grow up to be queen, just in case our mortal incarnation of the Goddess Hylia is called on again, after the name of that...first princess." The girl with the golden hair laughed to herself. A sad, sad little laugh, like a dry susurrus of leaves about to catch fire. "It's funny. When...when Father first started calling me by that name, it represented the greatest freedom in the world. I felt like I was seeing the outside world for the first time. Now, when he calls that, I feel nothing but confinement. I can see outside, but only through the prison bars closed around."

The girl with the golden hair hesitated. She dipped her head. "Here it is, then. Without further ado. The...the lullaby I was named after."

She played the song upon her harp, and Link followed on her ocarina, back and forth, and back and forth, until Link memorised the notes, until the song that she drew through the wind of the ocarina matched the song that the girl with the golden hair strummed upon the harp.

Lowering the harp to her lap, the girl with the golden hair looked up at Link, and Link looked back at her, meeting the gaze of her fire-light blue eyes.

Blue eyes. Always in the songs about the Princess of Hyrule, whether the princess of distant eras or the princess of now. Always she had blue eyes. Sometimes she had golden hair, or hair as brown as the earth, or even hair as scarlet as a gerudo girl's.
And, too, in Link's memories, the girl with the golden hair looks upon Link with eyes the same colour as the blade of evil's bane. With eyes the same colour as the guardian's fire-light. With eyes the same colour as the blue of the Sacred Realm. But can people have eyes that shade of blue?

"Link...thank you for believing in me. In me. Not in my bloodline, but in me." The girl with the golden hair wiped her eyes despite the lack of tears; Link could see a redness to the whites. "It has meant more to me than you could know."

"Is it all right if I go see Aryll before I leave?" Link signed.

"Yes, of course." She touched the golden and violet charms she wore at her throat.

"I want to hug her before we leave."

"With my blessing."

Link left. Upon her return, she looped her little sister's scarlet telescope into the belt at her left hip. "If you see a white bird on Mount Nayru," she told the girl with the golden hair, so seriously that than even the girl with the golden hair drew out a notebook to record Link's words, "we're going to name it the Arylloftwing."

"That's preposterous. We haven't seen any recorded sightings of loftwings. I don't think that they exist at all, and naming a real bird after them would—" Link looked at her. The girl with the golden hair's tone dropped. "—not confuse anyone, seeing as loftwings aren't real. Consider it done."

They prepared themselves for sleep. When the dawn came, they would rise to embark upon the journey overland, guarded by soldiers and knights of Hyrule ensuring their safe arrival to Mount Nayru. Link lay on her back on a mat upon the ground at the foot of the girl with the golden hair's bed. A familiar ceiling. She closed her eyes.

In the darkness, just as Link had begun to drift beyond the veil of dreams, she could hear the girl with the golden hair's voice.

"...Link," she whispered. "Do you remember that verse I read you?

"Cowards die many times before their deaths.

"The valiant never taste of death but once."

Though the girl with the golden hair could neither see nor hear Link, she nodded anyways.

"Do you think...do think that that's true, Link?"

Link kept herself perfectly still, flattened down against the mat, her gaze fixed upon the ceiling overhead.

"I guess you're asleep, aren't you? Well, good night, Link. Thank you for everything. I'll try not to disappoint you, too. I know you'd never say it, but..." Her words faded to a muffled murmur that Link could no longer make out.

They trekked to Mount Nayru. They reached the River Hylia. Link gave Impa her slice of pumpkin pie. She fasted together by the side of the girl with the golden hair. She, and the girl with the golden hair, and Mipha, and Urbosa, and Revali, and Daruk, and Impa. The Champions encouraged the girl with the golden hair in whatever ways they could. And then the Great Calamity struck. From the castle, first, and then everywhere, as though the earth itself had begun to bleed malice, everywhere and nowhere at once, monsters crawling over the land. They watched the Divine Beasts awaken in the distance. The Champions mobilised.

Impa could see—the Sages could see—the Oracles could see—the king could see—everyone but the girl with the golden hair could see that the Goddesses had answered their pleas at last. The girl with the golden hair's nineteenth birthday coincided with the very eve that the Calamitous One spilled unto the world; after so many years the Divine Beasts awakened and responded to the slates of their pilots; the girl with the golden hair, everyone seemed to hope, would pray at the Spring of Wisdom, and then she would become the Goddess Hylia incarnated.

The girl with the golden hair turned nineteen the day that they stepped foot at the banks of the River Hylia on their journey, and Link herself turned eighteen the day that they arrived in the foothills of Mount Nayru. They observed the Divine Beasts alive and awake in the distance, the signs of the Great Calamity all around them.

The girl with the golden hair prayed at the Spring of Wisdom to the Goddess Nayru, the last of the three Golden Goddesses whom she had not yet supplicated. The girl with the golden hair begged. The girl with the golden hair pleaded. The girl with the golden hair wept. The girl with the golden hair screamed. The girl with the golden hair emerged from the Spring of Wisdom to see the Calamitous One that had welled up in violet from the very earth, the veil between her world and the Sacred Realm.

The ambush by the Yiga. Epona's death. The guards' massacre. The second ambush. Storm's death. Impa's wounding. The girl with the golden hair assuring Impa that she had a plan, that she would rely on the mirror in the sanctum, that she had hope. Link and the girl with the golden hair, escaping down the mountain.

The Divine Beasts in the distance with their eyes glowing in violent violet. The guardians that had travelled with the guard, now razing their own forces. The girl with the golden hair and Link, battered, and weary, and cold, and dirtied, and bloodied, and ever so slowly bleeding out.

The monsters. The malice. The Yiga. Link fought them off, protecting the girl with the golden hair, as they travelled on foot, swift as the wind. In a forest grove at the base of the Naydra Snowfields, the girl with the golden hair collapsed to her knees.

"How...?"

Link turned towards her. She sheathed Fi, her blade not glowing, her sheen merely a dull and softened white.

"How did it come to her? The Divine Beasts...the guardians...they've all turned against us.” Her fingers, already caked in dirt and in mud, tore through the earth as if seeking the malice that would swallow her whole. "It turned them against us. The Calamitous One."

Link knelt beside her. She tried to rouse the girl with the golden hair, but the girl with the golden hair could only raise her head, her features wrenched into an expression of grief and pain older than any Link had ever seen. Link could not tell if the wetness under her eyes came of her tears or of the rains that had opened up overhead, the Goddesses Themselves weeping for what had come for Hyrule.

"And everyone...Mipha, Urbosa, Revali, and Daruk..." The girl with the golden hair's eyes..."
glistened wetly. Tears. "They're all trapped inside those things. Their eyes...that violent violet..."

On the final sound, on the phrase violent violet, the girl with the golden hair's voice shattered so brokenly that Link would never forget those words. Violent violet.

"It's all my fault. Our only hope for sealing the Calamitous One is lost. All because I couldn't...I couldn't harness this cursed sealing magic. It was...everything. Everything I've done up until now." She closed her fingers around the golden charm she wore at her throat. "Everything we've done done up until now..."

She buried her face into her palms. The mud on her hands imprinted the contours of her palms and the rings of her fingers into her cheeks.

"...it was all for nothing. So I really am just a failure. I'm no daughter of Hyrule. I'm nothing. I'm nothing." She crawled forward through the dirt towards Link, who could only stare vacantly at her, who had nothing resembling words to say. Tears streaked salt down her cheeks. Her features twisted, her eyes reddened, her mouth curved into the shape of the void itself. "All my friends...the entire kingdom...Impa, who has spent her entire life with me...and Father most of all...I tried...I tried, and I failed them all. I've left them all to..." The girl with the golden hair shuddered, like malice had burst open in her chest, eating her alive from the inside out. "I've left them all to die."

Link attempted, again, to rouse her to her boots, but the girl with the golden hair merely clung to her like a child, tears streaking down her cheeks in thick and dirtied globs, snot trailing mucus down her face. Link could barely make out her words.

"I really am a failure."

"What about the mirror?" Link tried to ask. "Didn't you have—didn't you tell Impa—?"

The girl with the golden hair buried her face in Link's chest, and Link could feel the hot wetness of her tears through the fabric of her tunic.

"She's dead. Don't you get that? I could see it—!" The girl with the golden hair choked down a sob. "I could see it in her eyes. She's dead. She would've beg me to abandon her if she didn't think she was going to die. I just wanted...I just wanted to give her hope that her death wasn't in vain. That everything she's worked for...that what she died for...that it wasn't in vain." The girl with the golden hair trembled against her. "But there's nothing. All of my research means nothing without the sealing magic. If I'd only done something more. If I'd only stopped treating everything like a game. This...this is all...this is all my...

"This is all," whispers the girl with the golden hair, her voice as distant as the wind over the seas, her toneless timbre as deadened and numb as the snows that blanket the living and the dead, standing before the world that she has wrought, the Sacred Realm and the mortal world one and the same, the consciousnesses of mortals and monsters merging, the boundaries of their bodies dissipating into vapour, the earth itself bleeding malice from the Calamitous One that has burst forth from the heart of the realm where the golden pyramid of the Sacred Realm and the Hyrule castle of the mortal world have melded into one, the Divine Beasts' eyes glowing with a violent violet, the screams of soldiers and civilians alike visceral in the pain rippled through the aether of the Sacred Realm, Link dropped to her knees beside her, Fi fallen from her lightning-strike hand as she faces the Great Calamity arisen once more, "once more, my fault."

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: I started this chapter at 21:01 on the eighteenth of August, and finished writing it at 01:57 on the nineteenth of August.

Thanks a million for all of the support you have all given me over these past few months! We're nearly there. And thanks to my beta reader, Emma, for pushing me beyond my limits, and reminding me that infinitives are not the only way to write.

My, what a short chapter this is. Actually, surprisingly, the last really long chapter is the eightieth, and everything after that is fairly short. Well, fairly short. But this is the first such short chapter we've had in some time! I realised I had to push myself to the limits.

By the way, a woman's duty is not to suffer. This is something I disagree with.

Zelda's comments about Link being a glutton who can't resist a delicious meal and Link having aided her cultivate a relationship with her horse are pulled directly from Breath of the Wild, from Zelda's diary in Hyrule Castle and from the memory "To Mount Lanayru", respectively. The name Storm for Zelda's horse comes from the name of Zelda's horse in the Valiant Comics adaptation of The Legend of Zelda and The Adventure of Link. Likewise, Zelda's comments about Link not wanting to burden others and saying little are directly based on the comments she has about Link in her diary in Breath of the Wild.

Previous incarnations of Zelda have had different hair colours, and yes, there have been official arts of Zelda with reddish hair before (though it's usually more orange than red, with the exception of a few rare official arts from the early era when designs weren't solidified and everyone drew what they wanted).

The lines from the play that have come up repeatedly throughout the fic are from a real-world play, written by someone whose writing I do not much enjoy, but in the world of the fic, they are from a play about an ancient Parapan king ousted by the Parapans, which I've spoken about before. I should note that the reference to a Parapan king rather than queen is a result of the mistranslation by Central Hyrulean scholars, as I have mentioned in previous author's notes.

I basically just synthesised everything together here. I tried to summarise/skip over what Impa and the others with whom she has spoken have already told Link.

And the memory here is an adaptation of the sixteenth memory that Link can discover, which I've kept as similar to the one in canon as possible.

You'll notice that Zelda only has a golden charm at her throat during the scene in the grove, rather than both the golden and the violet. That's because the violet charm is the bracelet that I mentioned she gave to Impa. It all comes together!
If the ending of the chapter was confusing, I tried to do a transition from the past to the present. The second-to-last paragraph ends in the past, with Zelda about to say (as she does in Breath of the Wild) "This is all my fault." The last paragraph is entirely in the present, as Zelda says, "This is all, once more, my fault." Because in activating the mirror, with all of the armies of Hyrule gathered in a single location, Zelda had to take her concentration from Calamity Ganon. And now Calamity Ganon, having bided its time all this while, has broken free from its chains.

Zelda has, naturally, been wracked with guilt the past century. That's why she says, "This is all, once more, my fault."

Pumpkins I've associated rather heavily with Ordon (sorry, Kakariko!); apples are by contrast associated with Hyrule at large. I mentioned the pumpkin pie in the previous chapter, but it's here that I put it properly, since it's here that Link actually baked it. With silent princess, since Zelda enjoys the taste so.

Now it's time for them to confront the Great Calamity. Stay tuned, because the next chapter will be pretty fun—and the chapter thereafter, the eightieth, is my personal favourite.

We're really at the promised day now. Just a few chapters left. Thank you all for accompanying me on this journey.

Up next: three scales; a pinch of fairy dust; a fragment of a star.

Beta reader's comments: This is one of the most interestingly constructed chapters in the series. I really love it as a major change of pace.

We're headed into endgame now. The next few chapters are a doozy.

Chapter Summary

The Calamititous One has brought a second Great Calamity upon Hyrule. Now the people of Hyrule must hold on to their hope, and the travelling chef must hold on to that which lies at the bottom of the chef's cooking pot: a fragment of a star.

Chapter Notes

As usual, notes that did not fit in the end: The golden pyramid at the centre of the Sacred Realm is inspired by the pyramid from A Link to the Past. As you can tell, many of my ideas for Delicious in Wilds were inspired directly by A Link to the Past and The Adventure of Link. If Breath of the Wild is The Hyrule Fantasy in the same sense that The Legend of Zelda was, then Delicious in Wilds was adapted from The Adventure of Link, complete with Link journeying to the same cities as in The Adventure of Link (Kasuto, Darunia, Medli, Nabooru, Ruto, and so on). Funny, that it's the black sheep of the Zelda franchise. And, you know, I didn't really like it for a long time. Then I replayed it while writing Delicious in Wilds, coming back to it for inspiration of the feeling I was trying to evoke, and listening to its OST during the entire time that I was writing Delicious in Wilds, and I've come to adore it once I made peace with its difficulty.

I know I'm going on and on about these old games. I don't mean to say, "Wow the old games are better than the new games!" because Breath of the Wild from a gameplay perspective is my favourite of the 3D titles, and I think that both A Link Between Worlds and Triforce Heroes are marvellous. Rather, when it came time for me to write a love letter to the Zelda franchise, I realised that, more than anything, this was about Link's adventure. This isn't like previous 3D instalments in the series where Link is guided throughout the adventure upon the urgency of a companion and a linear story pushing Link through. Rather, what drives Link—and the player—forward is some measure of curiosity. Even those players who followed the guiding path set out for them (i.e. going first to Kakariko) were still choosing to be guided. And I felt that Breath of the Wild and by extension Delicious in Wilds could be split into two: the world before the Great Calamity, which was The Legend of Zelda, and the world after Link's awakening (ehehe), which is The Adventure of Link.

The Adventure of Link is certainly a linear game, unlike the more open nature of its predecessor The Legend of Zelda and the 'open air' of Breath of the Wild. Yet for all of its linearity, it retains a sense of the player's own curiosity driving the player forward, perhaps from the lack of guidance given within the game. I could not say. But I disliked it for what I viewed as its obtuseness, for what I say as excruciating difficulty without much purpose. I still like that there are aspects of The Adventure of Link that are very, very flawed, as there all in all games. Yet I have made my peace. I accepted its difficulty, its mysteries, its demands both intentionally programmed and unintentionally left. And I can say that, more than anything, writing Delicious in Wilds has allowed me to love The Adventure of Link. This isn't immediately relevant to the chapter at hand, but we'll return to it once I come to the eightieth chapter. For now, let me just say that you might want to listen to the Dark World OST from A Link to the Past (or the Lorule Overworld remake from A Link Between Worlds) when you read this chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

They should have known. For over two years, the Calamitous One has gathered its strength from the onslaught of the armies of Hyrule. For over two years, the Calamitous One has breached the veil countless to spew out monsters or malice, to keep links between the guardians and the Sacred Realm that they use as a source of energy, to maintain control over the Divine Beasts that Link and her friends had not yet calmed.

For over two years, the Calamitous One—for reasons that no one understood—declined reaching through the veil and backing back the Divine Beasts that it has already hacked once before. For over two years, the girl with the golden hair and her armies believed the Calamitous One weak, believed victory close at hand.

For over two years, the Calamitous One has played them all.

And now, as the armies of Hyrule conveniently wait in a single crowded Temple with the four Divine Beasts directly beside them—and now, as the girl with the golden hair loosens her attention from the Calamitous One and focuses on activating the mirror—and now, at the very moment of the hope of Hyrule, the second Great Calamity has come, and the Sacred Realm and the mortal world have begun to merge as one.

The singing of the armies has given way to screaming. The monsters that surround the Temple. The Divine Beasts that once again open the sacred shining of their holy hearts and raze down beings of blood in fire-light, leaving nothing but ash. The malice that wells up from the ground as though the earth itself were bleeding.

"This is all once more, my fault," says the girl with the golden hair. Link can hear her laughing, a laugh as dry and barren as the wastes of the Hebric north. "It really is, isn't it. As long as I can't seal the Calamitous One away, we have nothing."

Link kneels upon the floor that has almost ceased to be the floor. She feels the pressure of her palms on the very real ground of the Temple, and yet she can simultaneously feel the boundaries of her body evaporating into the mist of the Sacred Realm. The pain of those who have fought against the Calamitous One for one hundred years. The pain of those who have entered the Sacred Realm for the first time. The pain of those who find themselves unable to die despite the agony of their bodies twisted beyond the mortal pale.

The pain of her friends. Sidon, Riju, Amali, Yunobo. The pain of the malice against which they fight. The pain of the malice that coats their bodies. The pain of their skin dissolved away. The pain of the union of a being of blood and a being of will. The pain of a union never meant to be. The pain of the union of the Realms of Blood and of Will.

Only the aura of protection offered her by the shrine near the mirror she has activated keeps her, for the moment, from succumbing to the same.

Her consciousness spreads over the whole of the Sacred Realm and the mortal world. She can sense everyone around her, all at once. She kneels in the heart of a crowd. A crowd, again, with voices too loud all around her, and bodies pressing in too close, and too many people, too many people, and all of their thoughts and feelings and expressions and complexities and agonies, too much, too much, filling her ears and her mouth and her nose, choking down her throat convulsing around the thickness of their tears, her vision blurred to gold and violet, her hands over her ears, and she has no one to cling to, and she has no one to hold on to, and she has no one to guide her, no friend to take her hand, no friend to let her close herself off while someone else drags her along, no friend to let her narrow her focus and her world to the things that she wants to see, no friend to let her ignore all that is around her.

In this half-merged state, Fi remains motionless on the ground as only the sword. In this half-merged state, the girl with the golden hair wisps in and out of her existence like a mirage. In this half-merged state, Link is alone.

She wants nothing more than to escape. She wants nothing more than to flee into the land of grass and hill and wind. She wants nothing more than to live alone in the wilds that call her name.

Except not only the wilds call her anymore. She feels the telescope at her left hip. She feels the ocarina on its loop. She feels her own fingers that have formed the whistle. She touches the slate of the girl with the golden hair. Link closes her eyes. And then she opens them again.

Rising to her boots, Link grasps Fi's hilt in her lightning-strike hand. The whorls of gold spiral over her fingers down over the violet that has inked her own history into her skin. The scars that mark her body mark, too, the tales and trials of Hyrule.

Living proof of what they have gone through. Living proof of all that they have done. Living proof of the burden that the girl with the golden hair has had to bear. The burden that the Champions long passed—Daruk, Revali, Urbosa, Mipha—have borne. The burden that the people of Hyrule long passed have borne. The burden that the Champions of now—Yunobo, Amali, Riju, Sidon—still bear. The burden that the people of Hyrule now still bear. The burden that all of the wilds and the people that make something out of them bear.

No matter what happens, she must do her part. No matter what happens, she will not run away. No matter what happens, she will seal the Calamitous One. And when she returns, she will cook for the whole of Hyrule a meal as infinite as the horizon of their future.

All of the wilds combined cannot sit at a campfire and share stew from a communal cooking pot.

Her fingers close around the hilt. The violet wings unfurl. The jewel in the pommel shimmers. The mark of the Golden Goddesses glows softly upon the blue of the blade.

Link shifts towards the girl with the golden hair, less a person and more a disembodied voice, everywhere and nowhere at once. "Even if the Calamitous One has broken through, we can seal it for ten years. That’ll give us enough time."

She can sense rather than hear the girl with the golden hair's unspoken words: yet, if one hundred years was barely enough to heal, what will ten years give?

"But this time it’ll be truly sealed, not just distracted. The past hundred years have seen monsters anyway, and malice, and..."

She can sense rather than hear the girl with the golden's hair unspoken words: yet the first few decades after the Calamitous One struck had no monsters or malice. What difference will this make? This time, they have the knowledge of the Sacred Realm. This time, they have the Divine Beasts. This time, they have Fi with one hundred years of power, not drained after over ten thousand long years, and ten years will not make much of a difference except that Fi will have long drained again her power, and they will no longer have a plan, and the people of Hyrule will have long lost hope that they can do anything against the Calamitous One if even all of the nations within Hyrule working together instead of relying on the King and Divine Beasts and the Master Sword and Hero and the Princess can do nothing.

At this moment the people of Hyrule are more powerful, more wise, more courageous than they have ever been. In ten years, they will only have lost everything that they have and gained precious little.

"There has to be something. There has to be something we can try. It doesn't matter how far-fetched it is. Wasn't there something that you told me once? That weird times call for weird measures? I can't remember what it is you said. There's a lot I can't remember. But I do remember all of the things that you've told me about the world. There has to be something."

She can sense rather than hear the girl with the golden hair's spoken words: "There is...there is one thing that we can try. But I don't know if it'll just make everything worse or not. I don't know if it's still possible. I don't even know if it's worth it."

She can sense rather than hear the girl with the golden hair's spoken words: "Not even Mudora believed me when I asked him to write about it in case my research was never brought to light."

She can sense rather than hear the girl with the golden hair's spoken words: "No one believes me. I don't know if I believe me. It seems like something to hope beyond hope. Like something that people just made up to give themselves hope. To make sure that their heroes could always have a happy ending. I..."

She can sense rather than see the girl with the golden hair looking at her hands. At the violet that stains both. At the crescent-moon red of her own blood in the palm of her right hand. At the lightning-strike gold of her own will in the palm of her left.

Link gazes up through the translucent ceiling of the Temple to the skies above, a blur of mortal blue and sacred gold. She lifts up her hands to catch the skylight in her cupped palm. And, with those lifted hands, she tries to speak.

She, once and again in her life, does not know what to say. She, once and again in her life, does not have the words. She has never had the words.

Except she does not need her own words. She cannot blow her own wind, but she has the wind of all of her friends at her back, and she has all of their words at her fingertips.

Kass's song: "Mudora believed you more than you think he did."

Sarie's joy: "We can’t run away from what has happened. We can’t run away from our pasts. But that doesn’t mean that we have to see them only as tragedy. We can look to the future. No matter how many times we fail. No matter how many times things go wrong. We can try again."

Sidon's faith: "I have the utmost faith in you. I know you can know it."

Riju's kin: "I don't know if you heard everyone singing before I touched the mirror, but they were singing for you. We've all pledged our loyalties to you. Whatever you need us to do, we will."

Amali's voice: "I know that you've been asked to be just the Princess your entire life. I know that everyone's only expected you to just use the sealing magic. I know that everyone's just looked at you and seen someone to take the burden. But that isn't all you are. And you know that. And I know that. Even if everyone was just expecting one thing out of you..."

Yunobo's pride: "I'm not expecting anything. But I am asking for something else. I'm asking you to take pride in what you can do. I'm asking you to take pride in your accomplishments, in your abilities, in your research."

Paya's truth: "...you're not acting like yourself. I don't know about this prophecy. I don't know about the blessed bloodline. But if anyone can...if anyone can figure out what to do, it's you. I know it. I just know it. Please. For the people of Hyrule. We have to try again."

The girl with the golden hair's hope: "Everything around us will die if we don't do something. Let us have hope. If we fail, then at least we have failed in something we can hope for. Please. You have spent your entire life trusting me. Now, please, it's time that you trust yourself. It is Hope, or it is death. And, like we've had to choose again and again in both of our lives, let's once again choose hope."

Her own understanding: "We have to try. If we don't try, then who's going to share stew with me in my cooking pot?"

She can sense rather than see the girl with the golden hair stopping. She can sense rather than see the girl with the golden hair lifting her head. She can sense rather than see the girl with the golden hair nodding, clenching her hands into fists, raising a hand to her collarbones, closing her fingers around the golden charm she wears at her throat, staking her life on doing whatever she can for her people.

She can sense rather than feel the courage in the girl with the golden hair's trembling hands. She can sense rather than feel the power in the girl with the golden hair's long-researched truth.

She can sense rather than feel the girl with the golden hair's wisdom. Not only her education. Not intelligence. But the fire-light blue of her wisdom.

"You said that there was a way to go anywhere in the Sacred Realm." She can sense rather than see the girl with the golden hair inclining her head. "How do you do it?" She can sense rather than see the girl with the golden hair extend her hand towards Link.

The slate. The girl with the golden hair brushes her hand over the slate. The surface glows alight with runes that Link knows all too well: the blue of the explosives, the red of magnesis, the yellow of stasis, the light blue of cryonis, the green of the pictobox.

And then the girl with the golden hair reaches over the smoothness of the flat of the slate's back. Link watches her curl in her fingers; suddenly the surface of the slate changes.

The runes have vanished. In their place, Link can see a map of the land of Hyrule. Not quite the Hyrule that she remembers. Not quite that Hyrule at all. Still the snows in the northwest, and still the mountains in the northeast, though Akkala does not appear to exist, but she notices tracks upon tracks of forests and grasses and hill in the southwest, and desert along the southeast below which she can see a great gulf dotted with islands that mimic the highlands of eastern Faron.

A map of the land of Hyrule from ten thousand years ago. And here and there, blinking in fire-light blue, she can see tiny stars. She does not need to count to know. One hundred and twenty shrines. Fifteen towers. Seven strange points that she does not recognise, four of them congregated near the Temple and steadily moving away.
The girl with the golden hair glides her fingers over the surface of the slate. The map of Hyrule moves with her motions, scoping in and out like the telescope of the pictobox.

Link cannot read the characters upon the map, characters written in a language that she does not know, but she can name that which she knows. She can name the land that she has ridden over. Though ten thousand years have changed the face of Hyrule, as these past two years have changed her own face, she still knows the wilds better than she knows herself.

The River Hylia, not then a river but a path down from the volcanic mountains. The Hyrule Field, not then a field but the shores of the bay. The the castle, not then a castle, but a tower. And in the highest floor of that tower: the fire-light blue of the shrine.

Link and the girl with the golden hair raise their forefingers together. At the same time, together, as together they poured the filling of the pumpkin pie into the crust, as together they slid the pie tin into the oven warm as her embrace, as together they wrapped the slices into wax to take with them on their very, very long journey to the summit, together, they touch the blue of the shrine in the heart of the castle. In the heart of the tower. In the heart of the golden pyramid that rises above the Sacred Realm.

She cannot describe the feeling. She feels herself come undone in a blaze of fire-light blue, and she wonders if death, too, carries this strange sensation of all of her dissipating at once into mist, of her consciousness shifting through the wind as though carried on the back of a great red bird that answers only to her own call, of herself abruptly reforming from the fog.

Link gasps. Dropping to her knees, she scrambles against the floor for something solid, for anything solid. The world around her swathes in darkness, yet everything around her glimmers in the scarcest of golden luminescence that grants her just enough light to make out a pool of water in front of her.

She glances back and forth: a small chamber, about the width of five Links if they lay head-to-toe from wall to wall.

She does not know if she now rests within the Sacred Realm, or if she remains in the mortal world, or if the distinction matters anymore. She still has the cooking pot affixed to her back. She still has the telescope and the ocarina at her left hip. She still has Fi sheathed over her shoulder. And she knows that the girl with the golden hair kneels beside her.

Together, the two of them look upon the girl with the golden hair's slate, which has fallen to float in the pool of water.

"If we're going to do this," says the girl with the golden hair, "then we have to hurry. Right now, the two realms are still separated, if only slightly. The shrines are gateways between one and the other, and if any being of will tries to come near, it'll be reverted back to the Sacred Realm unless it has enough willpower to stay. That means that all of the people across Hyrule who are near the shrines should be safe, for now. The only thing that can come near the villages are the guardians..."

"But Central Hyrule has no villages anymore, at least not any near the guardians," Link signs quickly. "We have time."

The girl with the golden hair nods. "Then let's do this. Before the veil is breached entirely. No more talking. We have to go." The girl with the golden hair closes her eyes for a moment, then opens them again, in a mannerism so reminiscent of Riju that Link feels her innards twist inside-out for her friends trapped in the Divine Beasts, like her friends one hundred years ago.
She has to believe in them. They will do all that they can. And she will do all that she can.

The girl with the golden hair rises from the ground in her traveller’s outfit, the tunic blue and gold, the trousers black as pitch. She strides away from the pool of water. Wobbling herself to her own feet, Link looks beyond the girl with the golden hair. She sees except for nothing a great blank wall, which the girl with the golden hair tests with her hands. Somewhere behind that wall: outside.

Link fishes the slate from the water. She blinks not at the runes, but at the map of the land of Hyrule. The girl with the golden hair demonstrates how to return the slate to its previous state.

No matter what else happens, no matter what weapons have broken or what arrows she lacks, she has always had her own trusty back-up: bombs.

Link conjures a spherical explosive in her hand. Spinning it on her forefinger, she throws it at the wall. She detonates the bomb. The wall of the pyramid cracks. She forms a second explosive, this one cubic. The crack widens. Then, a third. She counts: the courage to throw the first; the wisdom to recognise she needed a second; the power to blow the pyramid to sky-high smithereens with the third.

The wall shoots outwards. The girl with the golden hair falls into step beside Link. The two of them walk, then run, then sprint out from the inner chamber.

"And on the highest point of the pyramid, the Calamitous One has been trapped all this time. If—if my research holds true," the girl with the golden hair pants out while they run down the long corridor, "then the Calamitous One should be hiding the power of the Golden Force of the Sacred Realm. Oh, it's all folktales and legends, but if the ones about the mirror can be true, then—"

They clear the crack in the wall, skidding out onto a thin walkway just beyond, on the lowest level of the pyramid a single story above the ground. Malice coats the outer edge of the walkway and flows downwards towards the earth. The tips of Link's boots burn away as she just stops herself from falling face-first into the violet. She inhales from the pain suddenly burning her palms: the slate in her hands begins to leak malice. The abruptness brings her to drop the slate into the sea. Link looks down at the roiling waves of malice, at the slate that floats on the waves, the first not-Link thing that she touched since awakening in the chamber of the Shrine of Resurrection, the companion that she has carried with her for over two years, four Divine Beasts, fifteen towers, one hundred and twenty shrines.

The girl with the golden hair's slate. All of the pictographs that Link has taken. All of the pictographs that the girl with the golden hair has taken. Gone to the Calamitous One taking the slate over as it has taken over the slates of the other Champions. Yet she has not time for a eulogy. Not with the world breaking apart around her.

Instead she lifts her head. Link can see—in the double-vision blurring between the ruins of the castletown in the mortal world and the deadened sea of malice of the Sacred Realm upon which the pyramid floats—the Divine Beasts in the distance, their lights gone dark. Overhead, the sky shines gold and blue.

"—the Triforce makes mortal dreams come—oh no."

Link swivels around on her heel so swiftly that she nearly topples over into the girl with the golden hair. But the girl with the golden hair barely pays her attention.

She looks skyward. Link follows her gaze towards the crown of the pyramid.
She has never seen, in waking memory, the Calamitous One. Nor does she remember how the Calamitous One looks. She does not know what she expected. A monster. A giant boar, like in the legends. A man who has lost himself to the power, like in the stories.

Not this.

Not a roiling maelstrom that curls and coils like a twisted halo over the crown of the pyramid. Not clouds of violent violet and sacred gold that meld into one another, that spark and blaze and hail, that pour malice from their innards like the Calamitous One were weeping, or bleeding, or retching up its stomach.

In that instant, Link understands why the Calamitous One has raged in hate and malice for over ten thousand years: the Calamitous One cannot eat like this.

Like this. Not a person, or a beast, but a force of nature. And deep within the eye of the storm—beyond the veil of violent violet that roils and writhes and rages beyond mortal comprehension, its undulations as sickening as seeing the malice that desecrated the bodies of her friends in the Divine Beasts, bulging just beneath the skin like parasitic worms burrowing and breeding in the flesh, eating away not only a body but the very heart of the land of Hyrule from the inside out—faintly glows a golden light. Link cannot make out the details. Yet she can sense rather than see the golden light split into three.

She swings her head right towards the girl with the golden hair. But the girl with the golden hair does not look upon the crown of the pyramid. The girl with the golden hair looks upon the sides.

The Calamitous One bleeds its malice upon the pyramid, malice that slithers over the entirety of the sides, that coats pyramid from base to crown, that oozes down to coalesce into the sea that covers the land of the Sacred Realm. Concentrated power of will.

Only the overhang of the upper level of the pyramid prevents the malice from dripping down onto Link's own head where she stands. The remainder of the pyramid, including the outer edge of the walkway, suffocates beneath half a metre of ten thousand years of hate.

"There has to be a way to get up there." Link looks out over the sea of malice that spills over the ruins of the castletown, steadily dissolving down, ruined not only by the passing of one hundred years, but eaten away by the malice that surges over the earth. "The Sacred Realm and the mortal world aren't 'one' yet, are they? Can't I just walk up there in the mortal world?"

"Look at the tips of your boots. Look at the castletown. The malice is as real to you as it is to me. It's crossed the veil, again." The girl with the golden hair clenches the collar of her tunic, her fingers digging into the fabric. "There has to be some other way. Oh, you have Impa's paraglider, don't you? Perhaps we could burn something to create an updraft—!"

The girl with the golden hair intakes a breath sharp enough for Link to feel it against her own lungs. She can sense the girl with the golden hair's heart begin to beat for the first time in the years since she has given herself up as a being of blood and grown used to the Sacred Realm. Now, with the two merging—Link can sense the twisting in her chest and the churning in her stomach—the girl with the golden hair has realised something. Something that Link cannot put her finger on. Something that sharpens her irises and shallows the breaths that she has not taken in years upon years.

"I can't carry the destiny that you've been burdened with, Link," she whispers, her voice suddenly older than Link has ever heard, as if echoing down ten thousand years of pain, "but I can carry you."
"You can't. Won't the malice—?" Link shakes her head. "I can go myself if that's the case. You don't need to hurt yourself any more than you already have."

"You can't hurt yourself. If you die here, and come back as a being of will, then you won't be able to use the Golden Force. No being of will can. I've already died in the Sacred Realm, remember? It doesn't matter if I get hurt. What does matter is that I get you up there, here and now." The girl with the golden hair turns towards Link, clenches her hands. "Oh, I don't know if I can pick you up. I've not done enough research on how the Sacred Realm and the mortal world interact. I—"

Link holds up her left hand, fingers together, palm directed towards the girl with the golden hair. With her right hand, she signs: "Remember this?"

"Oh. The...Akkalan gesture, wasn't it? And I'm to touch my hand to yours." The girl with the golden hair raises her own left hand. Link can sense rather than see her bring her hand, slightly shivering, towards Link's; she can sense rather than feel the warmth of the girl with the golden hair's palm against hers.

The girl with the golden hair curls her fingers in the valley of Link's own. She nods decisively.

Kneeling down upon the walkway, the girl with the golden hair opens wide her arms. "Please, lie down. I'll carry you up there through the malice. Or as far as I can. Link...please. If you die in the Sacred Realm, you'll come back partially as a being of will, and no being of will can use the Golden Force or the Master Sword. Mother told me that the burden of women is to suffer. I don't believe that, but if the world is going to suffer either way, then at least I'm going to do my part in making sure that we never suffer again."

The determination glinting in her irises brings Link to her own knees. The girl with the golden hair gathers Link in her embrace, one arm supporting Link's upper arm, the other arm supporting the bend of Link's knees.

The girl with the golden hair stands up. She lowers her eyelids. Out of seemingly nowhere, a tarp appears, draping protectively over Link's head and body.

"As long as I keep my focus, that should shield you from the rain of malice." Link feels the girl with the golden hair walking even if she cannot see under the tarp. "Goddess, be with me. It's about time I returned this favour."

As the girl with the golden hair emerges from under the overhang, the first plinks of malice drop onto the tarp. Link watches the thinning of the fabric before her very eyes, yet the girl with the golden hair reforms the tarp over and over again in layers beneath the first.

She strides into the sea of malice. The girl with the golden hair gasps the softest gasp that Link has ever heard, and then she does not cry out again. Yet Link senses the girl with the golden hair's agony through the aether of the Sacred Realm as the malice eats away at her flesh up to the line below her hips, as the girl with the golden hair focuses her attention on keeping her legs and the tarp intact through the malice that burns the two away, that seeps into her skin, that gnaws away at her muscle, that marrows her to the bone, even as she pushes onwards, one step at a time.

In the sea of malice, Link finds herself helpless. In the sea of malice, if she dies in the Sacred Realm, she will never again return to the mortal world. In the sea of malice, if she dies in the Sacred Realm, she will no longer be able to touch the Golden Force.

Link shivers. But she has to trust the girl with the golden hair. She has to. And she does.
She has nothing but hope for the girl with the golden hair. Even now, with her kingdom and her people drowning in ten thousand years of hate, the girl with the golden hair pushes on, hope beyond hope. Step by step.

Link can no longer feel the armies of Hyrule and the monsters waging war against one another. She can no longer feel the Champions and the malice fighting within the Divine Beasts. She can feel the monsters crawling over the Divine Beasts. She can feel the monsters entering the Divine Beasts. She can feel their own pain as they wade through malice that burns their flesh, so much more concentrated than even a fellow being of will can withstand.

She does not want to feel the monsters’ pain, yet she cannot push it from her mind. She shudders against the girl with the golden hair. The girl with the golden hair who has felt the monsters’ pain for one hundred years.

The girl with the golden hair stumbles. Link flinches, but the girl with the golden hair lifts her trembling arms, keeping Link above the flow of malice even while she herself nearly plummets to her knees. Malice splashes over her chest. Link recoils from the agony she feels through the aether of the Sacred Realm, of the girl with the golden hair's flesh sloughing from her body as she stitches herself back together on the sheer force of her willpower alone.

"Don't worry about me, Link," she manages to grind out, never once making another noise of pain after that first soft gasp. "This is nothing compared to what you've been through. I'll make it just fine. I'll make it just fine, I swear."

Link tries to raise her hands to sign something, anything, before it dawns upon her that she cannot reach the girl with the golden hair. She cannot protest. She can only lie as still as she can to avoid burdening her further.

And then she feels the girl with the golden hair ceases to move. She hears the girl with the golden hair murmur under her breath. "Oh no. We've come this far, and this is what you give to me."

Link looks up through the tarp. In her double-blurred vision—the tarp blocks the Sacred Realm, yet not the mortal world—she realises why the girl with the golden hair has stopped. Though the pyramid continues forward, the girl with the golden hair has run into the castle's belltower. The belltower wall blocks the path forward in one world where the path in the other remains clear.

She senses the girl with the golden hair endeavour to inch around the wall, seeking one of the entrances to the sanctum to continue. But the stairs of the pyramid drop away on either side. The girl with the golden hair grinds her teeth together.

"It isn't going to end like this. I'm not going to let this end like this." Her voice grows louder until she shouts at the skies. "I've carried her all the way up the pyramid. I'm waist-deep in your own malice. What more do you want from me!? What more am I supposed to give you!? How am I supposed to do this alone!?"

And then Link senses presences approaching them, very hard and very fast, speeding towards them, the tell-tale sensation of beings of will rather than beings of blood. She hears the girl with the golden hair snap her head back over her shoulder at the approach of monsters. Link curls her hand around Fi’s hilt, yet she knows that if she tears off the tarp to fight, the malice will burn her away until she can no longer use the Golden Force.

"Monsters? No. No. No!" Link feels the tremors coursing through the girl with the golden hair's body as she twists herself back and forth, searching for somewhere, anywhere to go.

"Please. Please. Don't let me this end here. I am the Princess of Hyrule and I will not let my people suffer any longer."

The sound of wings all around them. The sound of feather and the sound of leather, like a murder of crows and a murder of dacto in one.

Pricks of pain along the girl with the golden hair's collarbones and under her shoulder blades, pain that Link senses through the aether of the Sacred Realm. And then pricks of pain on her own body: around her arms and around her legs.

Something lifts them, both herself and the girl with the golden hair. The girl with the golden hair clutches Link tightly against her chest, refusing to let go. Link cannot see what has grabbed her in the Sacred Realm through the tarp that blocks her vision of that world, but she can see flashes of green and red and bluish white at the corners of her vision of the mortal world, all bathed in a golden light.

Whatever-it-is uplifts her and the girl with the golden hair into the skies. And then—suddenly—Link does not feel the plinks of the malice on the tarp any longer. She hears nothing but the symphony of wings all around them, feels nothing but the wind that blows up from the sea of malice below them in an updraft from nothingness. Whatever-it-is takes them higher, and higher. The girl with the golden hair never lets go. Up, up, over the wall of the bell tower, up, up, above the sanctum, up, up, to the crown of the pyramid, up, up, to the highest point of the castle on the roof of the bell tower far above the sanctum, and then Link senses rather than hears the soft pomf of the girl with the golden hair's boots against solid ground.

Wings. Wings all around them. Wings above them. And a humming resonance that Link has heard before, in a voice that reminds her of a Necludan erhu, vibrating its strings through the air and the aether alike. A singing that she has heard before.

The pricks release her. The girl with the golden hair presses Link into her chest. No plinks of malice onto the tarp. Link struggles to sit up against the girl with the golden hair's embrace.

She senses rather than sees the girl with the golden hair willing the tarp to the void. She senses rather than feels the girl with the golden hair drop to her knees. She senses rather than hears the girl with the golden hair saying her name.

"Link. Link. Please, answer me. Please."

Link opens her eyes. She cannot see the Calamitous One, not in either world, because overhead swarm more flying monsters—more flying beings of will—than Link has ever seen before in a single place. A cloud, a storm, an entire sky enough to blot out the sun, feather and skin and scale, a tumult of every colour that Link can picture and some that she could not without sensing them through the aether: dacto and furnix, takkuri and hrok, kargarok and ache, chasupa and vire, moby and keese, bubble and guay.

Not attacking. Not attacking, but soaring overhead. Link can feel through the aether the pain of those in the topmost layer as the malice burns away the part of their beings made of blood even while they reform themselves through their will.

The monsters. The beings of will. Forming a protective aegis between her and the Calamitous One that bleeds malice upon the earth.

And that humming resonance. The girl with the golden hair kneeling. Link lying upon the crown of the pyramid. The aether vibrating with the dragons' speech. The dragons all around them.
She senses rather than hears the girl with the golden hair's murmured words of awe. "...Farosh...Naydra...Dinraal..."

Sitting up, her eyes wide, Link looks upon the dragons around her, slowly circling the crown of the pyramid, their long bodies unfurling through the air, a trio of silken scarves. The amber red of the Dragon Dinraal. The bluish white of the Dragon Naydra.

And the golden green of the first dragon that Link ever saw, as a horizontal lightning bolt, as a flash of bright yellow, weaving in and out of the clouds, resembling a serpentine scarf billowing in the wind. The Dragon Farosh, who looks upon her now, the dragon's single horn rising up from the brow like the blade of a sword.

Fi vibrates upon Link's back, humming in resonance to the dragons' song against Link's ear. Link unsheathes Fi, holding her to her left ear. She touches the shoulder of the girl with the golden hair—who before Link's own eyes has willed her legs back into existence, the black fabric of her trousers covering her limbs—and bids the girl with the golden hair to sit at Link's left side. So that Link can sit at her right and hold Fi between them.

The Dragon Farosh's jaws part. The Dragon Farosh's throat vibrates. The Dragon Farosh sings, and Fi harmonises with the dragon, translating for Link and for the girl with the golden hair.

"The veil between the Realm of Will and the Realm of Blood," sings the Dragon Farosh, "has never lain so thin. For the first time since the Realm of Will and the Realm of Blood were sealed away from one another, the beings of will can understand the pain that they have inflicted upon the beings of blood. Now, grant us your cooking pot, being of blood. Accept our gift."

Link senses rather than hears the girl with the golden hair whisper: "Cooking pot!?” But Link has already bounded one step ahead of her. She swings the cooking pot from her back, setting it down with a resounding smack against the crown of the pyramid.

The Dragon Farosh snaps shut the maw. The dragon brings a claw against that one terrible horn extending from the brow. A shard of green submerged in gold cascades into the cooking pot and sparks its brilliance against the bottom.

The Dragon Dinraal adds to the Dragon Farosh's melody as the dragons continue to spiral: "For one hundred years, that abomination of will has spread malice over the Realm of Will, destroying any semblance of our brethren beings of will that contain within some measure of blood. For one hundred years, that abomination of will has thrown our brethren beings of will into the Realm of Blood without explanation. Cut off from our fellow beings of will, and not understanding the rules of the Realm of Blood, our brethren thought that they could only remain alive if they proved their will and so fought against these strange beings of blood whose presences they could not sense as they had our brethren, whom they took as demons no longer alive. Now, accept our gift."

The dragon brings a claw against those two terrible horns, curved like those of a ram. A shard of red submerged in gold that cascades into the cooking pot and sparks its brilliance against the bottom beside the shard of green.

The Dragon Naydra circles in, the dragon's one remaining eye clear and bright, as the dragon sings: "That abomination of will and blood has existed as a blight on both of the realms for ten thousand years. We promised you that we would fight to protect our home. So will our brethren beings of will, for here, we are all as one. Already, our brethren and your people fight as one against the guardians and the malice that would ruin our realms. Our brethren and your people—we will do what we can to weaken that abomination of will and blood, so that you may fulfill the final trial set out by the Goddesses. Now, accept our gift."
The Dragon brings a claw against that terrible crown of horns. A shard of blue submerged in that cascades into the cooking pot and sparks its brilliance against the bottom beside the shards of green and red.

"Oh oh oh! Can Sarie do this one!?"

Link and the girl with the golden hair whirl around at once: koroks. Hundreds and hundreds of koroks twirling through the air upon their leaves, surrounded by small glittering violet lights like fireflies that twinkle with the hue of hope. The koroks from the Kokir Forest. Hestu.

Sarie. Sarie, who holds in their palm a violet-glittered light. Sarie, who whirls in towards Link and the girl with the golden hair. Sarie, who Link can see, in her double-vision, in the Sacred Realm: a girl with the greenish hair curled up to frame her face. A girl with a smile older than the earth. A girl who remembers very much.

"Grandpa asked the Great Faeries to chip in, too. I asked Grandpa to let me be the one to give it you. She's a faery, blessed with the dust of the Great Faeries, and she'll bless your cooking pot, too."

Beyond that leafy mask, Link can see Sarie smile. No, not Sarie. Saria.

"So this is from Grandpa, and Cotera and Mija and Kaysa and Tera, and all of us!" She open her hands. Drifting down, the faery spirals around the cooking pot, her wings fluttering. The powder dispels into the cooking pot and sparks its brilliance against the bottom with the shards of green, and blue, and red.

"You can leave if you have to, Link. I won't forget you. The memories that I have of you, even in ten thousand years, will bring me sadness...but also joy. The fate of destruction is also the joy of rebirth. After the Calamity, Hyrule—whatever name her people will give her—will rise anew." Saria reaches out her hands towards Link, her fingers curling into the valleys between Link's as their little korok hands touch Link's palms. "I won't forget you. And if anyone ever asks, I'll tell them that you tried your best to make loam for me."

Link sniffles. Saria smiles. Letting go of Link's fingers, she moves to rejoin the other koroks, but not before Link grabs her hand again and pulls her her in for an embrace. She has not the time to hug Saria as long as she'd like to. A brief embrace, a squeeze of the arms, and nothing more.

"If anything happens to me, take care of our family at Romani Ranch. Watch over Cremia and especially Romani for me, all right?"

Saria dips her head. "And Miyu."

"And Miyu."

"I believe in you more than I've ever believed in anyone else. You're not her, and I'm glad, because you're you, and this Hyrule needs you."

Saria whirls back to soar with the other children of the forest and their faeries. Link turns back to the cooking pot, meeting the girl with the golden hair's gaze across the rim.

The girl with the golden hair raises her head towards the dragons and the koroks. "What do these gifts have to entail?" she whispers.

Fi sings the girl with the golden hair's words to the dragons, and the dragons answer: "A gift of something precious, that bears the mark of your earnest blessing and protection."
The girl with the golden hair inclines her head. She gazes upon Link, and Link gazes upon her. She closes her fingers around the golden charm that she wears at her neck. She lifts the golden charm up and over her head. She holds up the golden charm.

Golden, and spherical, and many-pointed, like a bit of rock candy that waters Link's mouth and grumbles her stomach despite the severity of the situation.

"Mother gave this to me before she passed away. Mother...told me that it was a fragment of a star that fell onto Hyrule on the same night that I was born. She told me that it struck in the side of Mount Nayru, and she saw it as a blessing of the Golden Goddesses for...for me. Ever since I was twelve years old, I've held onto it more tightly than ever before. Oh, I thought that it was a symbol of me. The firstborn Princess. The one destined to go to Mount Nayru. I've kept it with me all this time."

The girl with the golden hair shudders in a breath. "Whenever I didn't know what to do, and whenever I thought I'd lose hope, I just...remembered the lullabies that Mother sang to me. I remembered that I was Princess of Hyrule. I remembered that if no one else, I had to carry on the torch of hope." She cradles the golden charm in her palm over the cooking pot.

"So this is my gift to you. I can't give you power, or wisdom, or courage, or kindness, like the Dragons or the Great Faeries, but I can give you the gift of hope, and I hope that that will be enough."

"That's the greatest gift that you can give," Link signs, and the girl with the golden hair's eyes glisten wetly with the tears that she has not allowed herself to shed. She lets the star fragment float into the cooking pot and spark its brilliance against the shards of green, and blue, and red, and violet.

Link gazes down at the cooking pot. At the colours iridescent within. Green, and blue, and red, and violet, and gold.

The cooking pot starts to move by itself. Link ogles it while—without her even adding water, or oil, or butter—the ingredients begin to cook themselves, bouncing up and down within the cooking pot and splashing in a liquid of aether that seems to form spontaneously around the cooking pot. The dragons sing a short melody that crescendos to its peak of a single note that sees the shards of the dragons' horns, the faery powder, and the fragment of a star leap up one last time.

And then the ingredients in the cooking pot coalesce into a single vial of elixir sitting at the bottom of the pot, an opaque pink liquid in a glass that has sprung from thin air—from thin aether, rather—in a spherical shape, decorated by a thin handle reminding her a pair of butterfly wings.

Reaching into the cooking pot, Link removes possibly the strangest thing that she has ever cooked in her entire life, something so strange that the meal not only cooked itself but also provided her with something to keep itself in. Holding the elixir in her palms, she feels its warmth within the glass, and she sees it in her double-vision as the same in both the mortal world and the Sacred Realm.

She hopes that she never has to cook like this again. For all of the magic, Link has never felt less satisfaction with a meal.

Then air and aether resonate together at once, and Link looks up, thoughts of food—for once in her life—momentarily put aside. "We, as beings of will, cannot be with you in the final trials set out by the Goddesses. Yet, when you have need of us most," the dragons sing at once, and not only the dragons but all of the faeries, and not only the faeries but the entire world, "quaff the tonic of blood and will, and regain your will to live."

The dragons curl up through the skies. The dragon Farosh intones their final judgment, Fi vibrating her translation to Link and to the girl with the golden hair: "Now, move to the centre of the pyramid, beneath the eye of the storm, and accept the gift of your people."

Link rises to her boots. She sets the elixir into her satchel and closes the top. Fixing the cooking pot to her back, she tilts down her head. She holds out her hand to the girl with the golden hair.

The girl with the golden hair rubs her forearms. "I can't come with you, Link. Oh, I told you. Only a being of blood can interact with the Golden Force."

"You said that there would be a last trial. I mean, they said that. I don't know much about this being of blood or being of will stuff, but I want you to come with me for as long as you can." Link holds out her hand again. She cocks her head to the side. She does not need to sign for the girl with the golden hair, like Ilia, to read her words from her fingers.

The girl with the golden hair's hand shakes. Her fingers quiver. She brushes her palm against Link's, and Link curves her fingers around the girl with the golden hair's.

Link lets her stand on her own two feet, and then the girl with the golden hair pulls her in for a hug.

"Then I'll be with you until the end. I can do that much."

Together, with the wind at their backs, clenching each other's hands across the veil that separates them—Link in the Realm of Blood, and the girl with the golden hair in the Realm of Will—they take one step after another towards the heart of the pyramid.

The flocks of beings of will overhead—dacto and furnix, takkuri and hrok, kargarok and ache, chasupa and vire, moby and keese, bubble and guay—part. The rain of malice crashes down around them onto the pyramid, leaving a circular opening in the eye of the storm less than a Link's-height in diameter where she and the girl with the golden hair stand, like a curtain of malice the same size and shape as one of the curtains of blue light.

Looking up, Link realises what causes the eye of the storm: an inverted spire. A great inverted spire jutting out of the clouds of the Calamitous One, spiralling upwards into the mass of violet, only the very tip visible where the stone emerges from the underbelly of the Calamitous One.

She senses rather than hears the girl with the golden hair gasp. She senses rather than sees the girl with the golden hair tear her gaze from the inverted spire and stare at the horizon. She senses rather than feels the girl with the golden hair draw her hand towards the world around them.

Link glances down to follow the girl with the golden hair's gaze: the Divine Beasts. The Divine Beasts, their eyes glowing fire-light blue rather than violent violet, at the corners of the Sacred Realm and the mortal world at once. The Divine Beast Vah Rudania of the northeast. The Divine Beast Vah Medoh of the northwest. The Divine Beast Vah Naboris of the southwest. The Divine Beast Vah Ruta of the southeast.

All of them having cast off, for the second time, the Calamitous One's grip of malice. All of them having moved from the Temple to carry the armies of Hyrule to safety. All of them prepared for this moment.

Link does not need her trusty red telescope to make out the faces of her friends who stand atop the Divine Beasts with their slates. Link does not need her trusty red telescope to make out the beings of will that wave back at her from the backs of the Divine Beasts, the beings of will—the moblins and the goriya, the daira and the lizalfos, the bokoblins and the octoroks—who have fought back alongside the beings of blood against the malice and won, as she has waved at them so many times. Link does not need her trusty red telescope to feel the Yunobo, Amali, Riju, and Sidon all cheering her on.

She has felt their pain through the aether of the Sacred Realm, and now she feels their power, their wisdom, their courage, putting their hope onto her and the girl with the golden hair.

And the behemoths four, whose hearts do shine with holy power, open those very hearts as one and crest their fire-light blue through the skies over Hyrule towards the Calamitous One.

The lights breach the Calamitous One all at once with a brightness that makes Link close her eyes, a brightness that sparks the white and blue of the silent princesses even behind her eyelids, the pride and the voice and the kin and the faith of her friends whom she loves and the people of Hyrule and the beings of will of the Sacred Realm all united in the holy power of the Divine Beasts.

The Calamitous One screams. The Calamitous One gnashes its jaws of sable rage. The Calamitous One shrinks away under the onslaught of the Hope of Hyrule standing strong as one.

The rain of malice ebbs. The maelstrom closes in on itself. The spire emerges more fully. And there, there: Link notes, at the spire's inverted base, a doorway leading down into the inky depths.

The dragons circle around her. They sing their songs, and Fi resonates in her ear. "Go. For all of us, Princess and her Knight."

"Ah," says the girl with the golden hair, wiping at her eyes that remain dry from the tears that she has held back for one hundred years, "you have Impa's old paraglider, don't you?"

Link smirks up at the girl with the golden hair and nods. Wrapping her arms around Link's shoulders, the girl with the golden hair links her fingers behind Link's back, rests her chin on Link's shoulder, touches her cheek to Link's. Link opens the paraglider—passed down from Impa, given to her by the girl with the golden hair, repaired by Riju—and the paraglider catches the wind at her back.

The dragons spiral up with Link and the girl with the golden hair, singing their song that resonates the very air and the very aether; the dragons' combined updraft sings them up towards the inverted spire.

Closing the paraglider, Link lands her boots onto the platform jutting from the doorway to the inverted spire. She lets down the girl with the golden hair, whose footfalls die to silence.

"When all this is said and done," says Link, gazing at the fire-light blue barrier marked in the symbols of the Golden Goddesses, the curtain partying before though as if sensing their presence, "I'd like to make you your favourite food. Like I promised you I would all those years ago."

The girl with the golden hair lifts her hand to her mouth, and then lets slip the tiniest sound, and then throws her arms around Link. Link embraces her back just as tightly. Link feels her breathing against her chest, and that is enough, and this is enough. They do not have the time to stay that way for a long, long time. When they part, Link offers the girl with the golden hair her hand. "Together."

The girl with the golden hair nods. "Together."

Together, they reach the doorway of the keep.
Together, they watch the barrier of fire-light blue die away.

Together, they pass through the hallway of nine columns, three to each of the Golden Goddesses. Fire, then power, then Din Herself. Water, then wisdom, then Nayru Herself. Wind, then courage, then Farore Herself.

Together, they enter the golden-light curtain of the lift.

Together, they descend into the keep.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: I technically wrote the words "They should have known." at 16:04 on the nineteenth of August, but I didn't seriously begin to write until 18:02 on the nineteenth of August, and finished writing it at 19:01 on the twentieth of August.

Thanks a million for all of your support, for everything that you all have given me, for every single person who has read this. Yes, you! Reading this right now! Thank you for reading it; I hope that you're enjoying it. And if not, then I hope that I can make it better for you. And thanks a million to my most beloved beta reader, Emma, for everything that she has done.

Even during the seventy-sixth chapter, Link had Fi to guide her through the Sacred Realm. But you know how far she's come from the first chapter, now that _she's_ the one being her own guide.

Places can change a lot over ten thousand years. The Hyrule that Link sees on the map? That's based on the Hyrule from _Spirit Tracks_, with the waters slowly receding further after the Great Flood.

The place where they end up in the pyramid and having to bomb their way out is in reference to _A Link to the Past_ and the crack in the wall where Link receives the Silver Arrow capable of defeating Ganon.

This chapter showcases my earnest attempt at describing what the "fast travel"/teleportation from shrine to shrine would feel like.

Zelda did warn Link that activating the slate during a calamitous event would allow Calamity Ganon to hack it, and so he has.

As said in _Skyward Sword_, only mortals can use the Triforce.

Farosh is indeed the first dragon that Link saw, way back during the Parapan arc, chapters upon chapters ago.
The faery and the Great Faeries have been in the Sacred Realm all this time, as opposed to just hanging out as they did in Breath of the Wild.

The ingredients cooking as the dragons sing is a reference to what cooking looks like in Breath of the Wild, with the ingredients jumping up and then making something to hold the meal with. Suffice to say that this Link is not much impressed by such cooking.

The Divine Beasts lasering Calamity Ganon at once is taken directly from Breath of the Wild, and several lines in the text here reference the lyrics to the Ballad of the Sealing War.

The inverted spire and the Triforce being kept within a dungeon as a final trial of mortals was also inspired by Sky Keep from Skyward Sword; in The Adventure of Link, only the Triforce of Courage is found in the Great Palace, which wasn't designed by the Goddesses. Here, just as in Skyward Sword, the Triforce awaits in Sky Keep. I spent that entire game waiting for when we would return the missing gem into the loftwing statue's eyes, lemme tell you.

I'm very curious to know how many of you have played The Adventure of Link. For those who have, the eightieth chapter should be a pleasant (or maybe unpleasant) familiar surprise. Of course, no familiarity with The Adventure of Link is assumed, nor is any at all required. If anything, I expect that none of my readers has played it (and my beta reader certainly hasn't).

I suppose, since one of my issues with Breath of the Wild was the replacement of aspects of the world I found more interesting (such as the three Golden Goddesses over the singular deity Hylia), that I—without meaning to—looked back to the oldest games to draw what I could.

At any rate, those of you who have played The Adventure of Link might recognise the disappearance of the curtain of light and the nine pillars through which you have to pass in order to enter the first lift, descending into the Great Palace. And that's right! Link still doesn't remember Zelda's name.

Finally, to clarify the effects of the fairy tonic: you can think of it as working akin to one (1) touch of the "goalpoint" within a shrine. In other words, if someone gets gravely injured, it'll help them, but it can only be used once. This was inspired by the effects of fairies to revive upon death. Just keep that in mind.

Up next: the Great Palace; the Princess and her Knight; Thunder, but a very Delicious in Wilds spin on it.

midna's ass. 16 November 2017.

Beta reader's comments: Delicious in Wilds spin on a second Calamity and the confrontation of Ganon is kinda terrifying. The Sacred Realm is portrayed in such a way that the implications of an attack like this are horrifying.

Having Zelda and Link together at last is so nice, despite all that's happening around them. They play off of each other well, and I think the author does a great job of building them up as a duo despite only having a few chapters to do so.

Chapter Summary

The people of Hyrule have united. The beings of will and beings of blood alike stand as one. The Champions the travelling chef knows well—the Lanayrish prince, the Parapan food enthusiast, the Tabanch housewife, and the Eldic youth—have retaken their Divine Beasts and wage war on the Calamitous One. Now the travelling chef and the girl with the golden hair, carrying the gift given to them by the Dragons, the Great Faeries, and the girl with the golden hair's late mother, enter the keep, in search of the Golden Goddesses' promise to the mortal world.

Chapter Notes

This chapter is a doozy, clocking in at 25536 words. Please take care of yourself and take breaks when reading if you need to.

Please be warned that this chapter has intermittent bursts of violence throughout. I'll mark the ones that I consider particularly bloody, but as a rule of thumb, any time you see the word "loftwing", be careful.

The first begins at the paragraph starting with "Springing forward, she knocks the girl the golden hair to the ground" and ends just before the paragraph beginning with "While Link sheathes Fi and rushes towards the girl with the golden hair."

The second begins at the paragraph starting with "Link dives to the floor—she hears the girl with the golden hair intake a breath of shock" and ends just before the paragraph beginning with "Link senses the strap of her satchel tautening as the girl with the golden hair combs through her belongings."

The third begins at the paragraph starting with "A flash of red and gold parts from behind the statue" and ends just before the paragraph beginning with "Except for Fi, who in turn can dissolve even the concentrated malice."

Finally, the entire chapter climax has mentions here and there of blood, although it's not nearly as gruesome as something like the lynel fight in the fiftieth chapter. However, I'll note it down here: it begins at the paragraph starting with "Fi resonates very suddenly against Link's palm" and ends with the paragraph beginning with "The altar of blue gives way to gold."

Author's notes as usual: I technically started writing this chapter as "energising egg pudding" at 17:49 on the twentieth of August, but I didn't seriously begin to write until 19:00 on the twentieth of August, and finished writing it at 11:19 on the twenty-second of August. I wrote the first draft of this chapter over twenty hours straight (finishing at 15:18 on the twenty-first of August), then immediately passed out, then spent quite a bit of time revising it before moving onto the eighty-first.

I recommend listening to the Great Palace OST from The Adventure of Link for this chapter, because that's also what Zelda and Link are listening to (the "melody, distant Honestly, thanks a million, million, million for everything that you have all done for me all this time. I couldn't have done it without you. For you all readers, I am forever grateful for granting me a chance to take you on my own Hyrule Fantasy, and thank you for giving me a chance. It has meant the world to me. And thank you to my beta reader, Emma, for all that she herself has done for me.

Here we are. My favourite chapter in the series. The most fun to write. Just adventure, and action, and a fun time until the end. And the longest chapter in the series. For this chapter, I actually played through and recorded myself going through the Great Palace. I then carefully studied my own playthrough and made this chapter mechanically accurate to what I did in the game, including my fuck-ups (such as getting stuck in the pit with the bots), since I wasn't using a guide. So when you read this, this was based on what I did, step by step, exactly as I traced my own path through the Great Palace of The Adventure of Link, just adjusted for the world of the fic! I could have skipped or summarised, but instead decided to write it all out.

Link looping her thumbs into her belt and listening to Zelda is in reference to Link's "in conversation with an NPC" pose from Breath of the Wild.

Freezing blisters is one way to get rid of them (it's commonly used for warts, for example). But please don't do what Link did! Rely on a qualified medical professional for cryosurgery and the like. That said, you gotta do what you gotta do to be able to protect Hyrule.

The line about jamming the blade into a pumpkin is a nod to how, in Skyward Sword, Link can jam the sword into a pumpkin and just walk around with it.

"It's a secret to everybody" and "well, excuse me, princess" are lines I couldn't get away with not including. I didn't force them in though. They fell in naturally.

The talon-mark on Zelda's chest does resemble the mark on the hylian shield from previously Zelda games. I thought it was pretty cool how Skyward Sword took something that's been on the shield for a long time and explained where it came from. But then there's so much that Skyward Sword didn't do with it, such as give Link's loftwing a name, use the Sky and flying for more than a single boss battle, or provide some meaningful story or sense of companionship (after the opening) as they did with Epona in Ocarina of Time, Majora's Mask, or Twilight Princess. As well, Link getting a "special" red loftwing made me damn near roll my eyes out of my head. But that's just me griping. I'm fond of shoebills, so I like the loftwing design!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The lift reminds Link of the lifts that she has passed through countless times when she descended down into the depths of the earths to uncover the mysteries of the shrines. Except that the lift of the keep, of the temple, of the palace in which she and the girl with the golden hair stand, descends more smoothly and more quickly, the curtain of light golden instead of blue, the sensation overall somehow different, as though—

"Incredible," breathes the girl with the golden hair as she lifts a palm to the curtain of light. "Oh, look at this, Link! It's sliding down almost without friction. Or maybe truly without friction! I feel like I've seen something like this before. But where was it?"

"The shrine?" Link suggests. Glancing at the curtain of light, she notices her own face reflected back at her. The vertical scars across her cheeks. The teardrop-shaped mark under her left eye. The diagonal mark from the corner of her eye to the vertex of her jaw. The scratches along her brow. The mangle-healed flesh of her lower lip. The crooked nose.

The girl with the golden hair claps her hand into her palm. "That's exactly right! It's just like the shrine. Oh, I wonder if whoever made the shrines all those thousands of years ago...I wonder if they were emulating what we see here. I wonder what we could learn from this. Oh! Oh, that reminds me!"

The girl with the golden hair swivels excitedly towards Link. "There's so much more I need to tell you that I've gleaned over the years!" Link raises her eyebrows, looping her thumbs through her belt, listens to her companion's words. Even if she does not understand, she can sense the passion radiating from the girl with the golden hair's speech. And even if she does not comprehend, she can ask, and slowly, ever so slowly, she can know. "Did you know that the mark of the Goddess Sheik might have actually been the original mark of the royal family, and that the sheikah descriptive of the sheikah towers and slate is a misno—"

The lift ceases to move, and the girl with the golden hair inhales. The curtain of golden light hangs in the aether for a moment longer than Link has felt lifts hang in the shrine. Then the lift opens into a golden corridor shaped roughly as a great triangular prism, the walls tapering up from the flat base into a point, the tiles of the floor up to the ceiling tessellated in triangles. The passageway itself resonates with a strange melody, distant and far, as though echoing from across a sea.

Link steps out from the lift first. The girl with the golden hair follows a moment after, then stifles a gasp. Link glances her direction. "Those marks...those marks on your neck, Link. Are they from—are they from the malice outside—are they—"

She looks down at herself, then claps her hand against her forehead. Rolling up the sleeves of her undershirt, Link demonstrates the whorls of violet snaking up her arms, which merely causes the girl with the golden hair to stagger back and cover her mouth with her palm.

"It's not what you think!" Link bursts out. "I promise! I got these back in Ruto, nearly a year ago! The Malice kind of hugged me, and I almost died and the usual, you know—" The girl with the golden hair's eyebrows fly towards the crown of her head; Link hastily continues: "—but I'm fine! The healers skinned me and all that—" Her companion's eyebrows crawl further up. Link speeds her motions. "—and and and after they were done, it was all good! There's no malice left in me, just these patterns. Same ones you see on those silvery-white monsters—beings of will, I mean—that hang around the castle with the guardians. Anyways, see? It's all good. Your tarp protected me out there. And thank you for that, by the way." She scratches her cheek. "I guess we've been so caught up in other things that you didn't notice."

The girl with the golden hair nods steadily, as Link would if she were concerned she had eaten something entirely dubious. "And then...that golden...?"

"Oh, this?" Link waves her left hand. Her companion dips her head. "I got that catching a metal boomerang during a thunderstorm. It's from lightning. That was pretty fun after I stopped convulsing in the mud." The girl with the golden hair's eyebrows, which just returned to something resembling normal, shoot up again. "Hey, you know, Kass—you don't know him, but I think you'd like him—said it's supposed to be a good thing! It's like a mark from the Goddess Farore, since lightning and wind are Her thing, right? So it's a mark of courage."
She flexes her left arm. Her companion leans against one of the passage walls. "Link..."

"But we can talk about that later, when you and me are back in the mortal world. And speaking of getting hurt..." Reaching behind her back, Link offers the iron pot lid and the mirrored pot lid to the girl with the golden hair. Her companion opens her mouth for a moment, then exhales and takes the latter gift.

"The patterns on the rim remind me of Urbosa," the girl with the golden hair explains. She does not blush. She does not look away. She speaks in a voice level with acceptance. "Also, given that the surface is transparent, I think it would be useful to be able to see what I'm cowering from." Link tries to reassure her, but the girl with the golden hair shakes her head. "Link. Please, protect yourself more than anything. Oh, it's fine if I die, because I'm already...I'm already a being of will, like this." Link observes her reflexively reach a hand up to her throat, except her fingers close around nothingness. "...but if you die, then we won't be able to use the Golden Force." She coughs into her palm. More and more, Link notices, the girl with the golden hair has ceased to act like an unblinking being of will. More and more, Link notices, the girl with the golden hair has begun to act like herself again. "Or...it's sometimes called the Triforce in the legends, which I like better as a name, but whenever I tried to tell people they said I was being silly."

"I think you're less a being of will than you think. I mean, I don't really get all this." Link waves a hand around the golden corridor, whose walls and floor and sharp-pointed ceiling luminesce. "Look, you've been allowed into here, haven't you? And I don't think the name is silly at all. It sounds better than a golden force." She scratches her cheek. "Though, uh...how would you sign that?"

"Oh, I don't know." The girl with the golden hair tugs at the hem of her jacket. "Why won't you come up with something, Link? I've always liked to see what meals you come up with. Why not words?"

Link touches her hand more firmly to her chin, and then her other hand joins the first. Snapping her fingers, Link leans against the girl with the golden hair—the girl with the golden hair strains not to let Link drop—as Link stretches her head down and bends up her left leg, struggling to bring her foot to her chin.

"Link—" The girl with the golden hair has started to laugh, little giggles that snort air rapidly from her nose. "—what are you doing?"

Dropping her boot back to the floor, Link rubs the back of her head. "It helps me think if I touch my chin. I don't know."

"Like how poking your tongue out helps you concentrate?" the girl with the golden hair suggests; Link nods enthusiastically. "Well...you are a very physical person. I suppose that makes sense."

"So I thought, maybe I could think even better if I touched my foot to my chin." Link shrugs, though she can feel the upwards curve of her own mouth. "But I guess I'm not flexible enough to that."

"Link..." The girl with the golden hair shakes her head. "Oh, I missed you so much, you know."

She grins. "I missed you too."

They peer up and down the corridor, which runs left and right from the lift, the floor and walls and sharp-angled ceiling extending seemingly endlessly. In both directions, the corridor slopes gently upwards in stair-like steps towards the ceiling. She can just make out columns depicting the Golden Goddesses. To one end of the corridor, she spots two rows of columns; to the other, also two. No, three. No, more than that, though she cannot discern how many, in perfect rows down to the end.

Too much gold. Her eyes have begun aching, and she has not stayed there for longer than a few minutes at most. Her gaze alights on something reddish at the far end of the corridor with more than two columns. Glancing at the girl with the golden hair, Link gestures in that direction with her head.

The girl with the golden hair and Link walk down the corridor towards the red thing lying in wait. The girl with the golden hair names the statues of each of the Golden Goddesses: first Farore, then Nayru, then Din. The final row of columns depicts something else altogether: tall bird-like loftwings perched in gold, their ruby-like eyes glaring at Link and the girl with the golden hair.

The red thing perches between the columns. Feather, Link observes. Red and white. As soon as Link and the girl with the golden hair pass by the statue of the Goddess Nayru, the red-feathered loftwing stirs and twists. A large head on a long neck, with a bill that juts out golden from their red and white face, their wingtips framed in the violet and gold of the Sacred Realm, the long feathers of their tail spreading outwards like a fan of flame.

Link snaps her arm towards her left shoulder, her palm against i's hilt. The girl with the golden hair extends her arm across Link's chest. "Wait. I think...we're looking at a loftwing. They're friendly. They serve the Goddess Hylia. Or, I guess if they're here, the loftwings must also serve the Golden Goddesses. I'm...I'm going to try. To talk. To the loftwing."

The girl with the golden hair steps forward. She brings her hands together in front of her. When she speaks, she does so in a language that Link has never heard before.

No. No, she has heard this language. The language spoken in the shrines. The language of all of those instructions, accompanied by all those pictures, in that tongue Link has never understood.

The girl with the golden hair's accent sounds wrong. Her speech does not flow as well as the speech that Link has heard in the shrines. She stops. She stutters. But she speaks nonetheless to the crimson loftwing, which steadily unfurls their wings and raises their head, gazing gaze at them with Goddess-golden eyes ringed in fire-light blue and violent violet.

Resonating on Link's back, Fi translates her words. The girl with the golden hair's supplication of peace. Her explanation of the Great Calamity. Her request for the loftwing to assist them, to guide, to help them. The creature cocks their head, the feathers on either side unfurling; the girl with the golden hair nods at the loftwing.

Link watches the creature's movement. The tensing of their legs. The angling of their wings. The tucking in of their neck.

Springing forward, she knocks the girl with the golden hair to the ground at the same time as the loftwing charges into the sky. Link feels the fwoosh of air under the creature's wings as they pass overhead. The girl with the golden hair curls in on herself on the floor. Link unsheathes Fi and twirls the swords that seals the darkness over her head, pointing the blade towards the loftwing, which lands light on the ground and whirls around.

The creature charges again. Now they spiral through the air so rapidly that the dervish of aether around them blows the blade of evil's bane down. Throwing herself back, Link accidentally lands on the girl with the golden hair, who remains on the ground, the mirrored shield held over her chest.
Link hastily picks herself up from the girl with the golden hair's body. She readies Fi in the loftwing's direction again, the creature perched on the edge of the higher step, taking the high ground. The girl with the golden hair scrambles from the floor.

Gripping Fi's hilt so firmly that she can feel the criss-cross patterns left in her palm, Link approaches the loftwing on the higher step.

The creature silently flips out their wings. Link can almost see the gust of aether emanating upwards from the tips of their glowing violet-golden feathers. Rolling forward under the wave of aether, Link attempts to thrust upwards into the loftwing as she did the lizalfos on the beach of the castle moat. The creature leaps backwards. The sword hits the void.

A sudden pain against Link's back, like thirty tiny papercuts across her shoulders, spine, and the backs of her legs, gives Link pause: the wave of aether somehow boomeranged back. She has to keep moving forward.

The loftwing flips out their wings once more, sending out another gust of aether. This time, Link does not roll forward just once, but again, and again; the creature jumps backwards every time. Sudden footfalls to her right bring Link to glance at the girl with the golden hair, who runs up the steps by Link and the loftwing's side. When the creature leaps back yet again, the girl with the golden hair slams the mirrored pot lid into their head.

"Ahaha—oh n—!"

Immediately the loftwing retaliates, kicking the girl with the golden hair back, their sharp-tipped talons clawing into her chest. That second of difference lets Link swing forward the sword that seals the darkness. Fi burns fire-light blue; the blade of evil's bane cleaves through the creature's torso. Their essence does not spurt forward in blood but dissipates into golden dust that drifts away in vapour as Link slices the loftwing in half. The gold fades away into the darkness.

While Link sheathes Fi and rushes forward towards the girl with the golden hair, who has sprawled spread-eagled on the step above, she feels the cuts on her back dampening the fabric of her tunic.

The girl with the golden hair slowly sits up. "H...huh." The front of her blue jacket has slightly darkened with blood. Eyes embiggening, Link crouches down beside her companion. "I can't stop the bleeding. This is still clearly in the Sacred Realm, but it's like there's something stopping me from just...pulling myself back together. I wonder if this is something to do with—"

She winces. Link helps her yank up her tunic. The creature's talons have etched a crimson mark into her upper abdomen. The girl with the golden hair traces the wound with her finger. "It looks a little like a loftwing, doesn't it?" The girl with the golden hair looks up at Link, bearing a smile that does not quite reach her eyes. "They said that the knights of old bore loftwings on their shields to grant themselves the courage of the First Hero. I guess this is a sign, then. I'll be your shield, Link. It's what I can to help the people of Hyrule, to protect you safely to the Golden Force." The girl with the golden hair coughs.

It dawns on Link that she cannot sense the girl with the golden hair's pain reverberating through the aether. But she does not need to feel her companion's pain to make out the contortion of her companion's features, despite how the girl with the golden hair hides her face in the crook of her arm.

And she does not need to feel her companion's pain to take gauze from her satchel and wrap it around the girl with the golden hair's abdomen.
"I just don't understand." The girl with the golden hair shudders while Link tightens the gauze, tucks in the end, and rips off the hanging edge. "Shouldn't the loftwings be on our side?" Link listens to the girl with the golden hair's timbre drift into the tone she uses for musing out hypotheses. "Are the Yiga right? Maybe...maybe the Calamitous One is meant to purge this world."

"The monsters...the beings of will, I mean...outside said something about the last trial set out for us by the Goddesses. That's what this is. Just a trial. We're being tested." The girl with the golden hair mmfms in response. Link tucks the gauze back into her satchel. She brushes against the ice-box that Riju gave her. When they hunger, she'll make them food. She has her cooking pot, after all. "Now, come on. We should hurry." Link looks the girl with the golden hair up and down. "Maybe you should stay here. If you can't bring yourself back together in here, then what happens if—"

"Link...I'm more serious than I ever have been." The girl with the golden hair again reaches up to clench the golden charm that she no longer bears at her throat. Her arm drops to her side. "Let me be your shield. It doesn't matter what happens to me."

"It matters to me," Link answers stubbornly.

The girl with the golden hair narrows her eyes. "And sometimes we have to sacrifice ourselves for the people of Hyrule. I'm not just going to let myself needlessly die. That wouldn't help anyone." Breathing in and out, she audibly evens her voice. "Right now, you getting hurt matters a lot more than me. My job is to get you there safely, Princess." Link blinks at her. "Let me be Your Majesty's own appointed Knight."

The girl with the golden hair lowers herself to her knee. Link stares at her. The girl with the golden hair gestures to Fi, and Link unsheathes her from her back. She touches Fi first to the girl with the golden hair's right shoulder and then to her left. When she sheathes Fi again, Link notices the girl with the golden hair's irises glisten.

"Thank you. I won't let you down." The girl with the golden hair starts to rise from the floor. Link holds out her hand. The girl with the golden hair watches her for a moment before she accepts. Link grips her fingers.

The girl with the golden hair—her Knight—pulls herself up.

When they pass through the fourth row of columns, decorated in statues of loftwings, Link and the girl with the golden hair exit into an apparently empty corridor. Together, they climb up a short set of steps and continue forward through the same-looking triangular hallway down.

"I can't sense any presences in here. I think it's empty. Oh, what if we get lost?" asks the girl with the golden hair, walking one step behind Link, the mirrored pot lid at her side, ready to go at a moment's notice. "What if that other way was actually the right one? Is this some sort of labyrinth?"

"We'll figure it out," Link responds. "I'm sure that—"

The floor beneath her boots suddenly gives way. The girl with the golden hair stops short of the sudden edge while Link lands on her rear end—her back against the wall—in some sort of pit below. A violet—some sort of monster that resembles a chuchu—stares beadily at her before leaping forward. Link stabs into its gelatinous form. The chuchu replies by swallowing the sword. Link waves Fi frantically around to dislodge the monster from the blade.

"Behind you! Watch out!"
Link swivels around on her heel, noting another chuchu-like monster blobbing towards her. As it oozes onto her already-damaged boots, she realises that the violet eats away at her boots like malice. Malice. Malice.

Jumping backwards from the second blob, Link lands right into a third. The pain that shoots through the bottoms of her feet brings back to leap away again. With one final arc of the sword, she forces the living malice from the blade and into the wall.

Lying down at the edge of the false floor, the girl with the golden hair extends her arms down. Link lunges towards her, cartwheeling over the blobs of malice that slither towards her. Springing up from the ground, she grabs the girl with the golden hair's hands. She hears the girl with the golden hair grunt. Link tries curling herself up, tucking her knees to her chest to avoid the malice that bounds towards her. Then she senses the girl with the golden hair start to slip.

Blinking rapidly, Link tries to loosen her hands from her companion before the girl with the golden hair can fall and drop into the pit with her, but the girl with the golden hair grasps her wrists more tightly in response. Nails dig into Link's skin. The girl with the golden hair cries out, and then Link feels herself swinging through the air.

She sails through the aether. Her legs pivot up over her as her back goes from facing the floor to facing the ceiling. The girl with the golden hair topples backwards under her. Her hands slip from Link's. Link's half-eaten boots connect with the ground first, and then her knees against the girl with the golden hair's shoulders, and then the rest of her, cushioned by the girl with the golden hair.

She rolls off of her companion. Gathering herself up and catching her breath, Link squats down by her companion to ask if she's all right. The girl with the golden hair simply responds with a wheeze of laughter.

"See?" she manages between pants. "That was pretty neat, wasn't it? I...saved you, huh?"

"Thank you," signs Link. She looks up at the corridor that spreads relentlessly forwards. In the dim glow of the gold around her, she cannot quite tell if the chamber ends at a flat wall, or if the corridor merely goes on forever. "I'd ask if you want to rest, but you'd just scowl and say we need to hurry."

"And I agree. We've got a promise to Hyrule. If you can stand, let's keep going."

This time, Link uses Fi as a cane, testing test for the false floor. Taking the girl with the golden hair's hand, she carefully jumps over the gap. Her companion does not quite make the leap: her right foot slips from the edge and she tips backwards, but Link catches her and spins her around onto solid ground.

While the girl with the golden hair woozily regains her balance and thanks Link, the latter taps Fi against the floor. The rest of the ground appears real.

"Still, the existence of an illusory floor like that...is a little discomforting. We'll have to be careful." The girl with the golden hair pauses. "I know! I'll keep track of this weird whatever-it-is that we're in." She opens up her hand and, closing her eyes, pokes her tongue from the corner of her mouth. Link tilts her head. The girl with the golden hair opens a single eye and peers down at her empty palm. "Ah...right. It doesn't look like willing things into existence works in here. Of course! If this place won't let me pull myself back together by will, then naturally it wouldn't let me will things into existence, either. We play by the mortal world's rules here. Link, do you have any paper?"

Link unfurls the map of Hyrule that she has drawn for herself over the past two years and three months since she awoke in the Shrine of Resurrection. The girl with the golden hair runs her fingertip over the map; she requests that Link name the villages whose labels—in Link's cucco-scratch scrawl—she cannot read. Link coughs gently. She motions to the corridor around them. Her cheeks reddening, the girl with the golden hair flips over the parchment and throws herself into drawing out a map of all that they have seen so far.

With that, the girl with the golden hair and Link continue onwards, tapping Fi against the floor as they go. The end of the corridor proves to contain another lift. The girl with the golden hair furiously scribbles out the map while they descend into the depths of the keep.

The lift deposits them in a hallway almost identical to the first. The girl with the golden hair sketches out the two corridors: one with two columns, the other with four. "Why don't we try proceeding through the two-pillar passage this time?" the girl with the golden hair suggests. Link shrugs. At some point, they'll take a break, and Link will have a chance to take a look-see at what Riju has left her in the ice-box. The thought of the meal keeps a spring in her steps as she trails the tip of the sword over the floor.

For once in her life, Link is grateful that she stands too short to keep Fi at her hip, because that allows the blade to extend well to the floor without her stooping over.

At the end of the second row of pillars, a sudden swelter of heat gives them pause. Link ogles the thin, rickety golden bridge, made out of conjoined tiles of gold with thin gaps in-between, swaying over a pit of malice that churns below. Boiling malice, somehow, an updraft of heated air billowing up from the bubbling surface of the violet sea.

As Link watches, the bridge abruptly twists down the middle from the hot puffs of malice. Link glances at the girl with the golden hair; her companion is already looking back at her. The narrowness of the bridge forces them to single file.

"I don't think it's safe for both of us to be on the bridge at the same time," the girl with the golden hair observes while the bridge untwists. "I don't know if it will hold. So, I'll go first."

Link extends her hand to insist that she go first, but the girl with the golden hair has already taken off. Gripping the thin golden cords of the handrails, she sprints across the bridge. Link, unable to look, covers her eyes with her palms. She hears the bridge creaking in its back-and-forth swaying. Listening to the pff pff pff of the girl with the golden hair's boots alighting on each golden plank of the bridge, Link inhales at the advent of sudden silence.

"Yoohoo! You can come on over!"

She lowers her hands from her face. Blinking, Link stares at the girl with the golden hair, now wheezing on the other side of the pit of malice. Behind her, Link notices a second bridge extending over a second chasm of malice, her companion panting on a two-pace-long block of gold between the pits. The girl with the golden hair gestures for Link to follow.

Link swallows. Sweat—from the heat, or from her own fear—beads on her brow and sticks the fabric of her undershirt to her back.

"Just run right across it! Keep your hands on the rails and push outwards to keep the bridge from flipping over. Oh, here. I'll help." The girl with the golden hair leans over and takes hold of the rails on her end. As she pushes them apart, Link notices that the bridge does, indeed, sway less. "There's nothing to be afraid of."

To hear such words coming from her companion forces Link's feet forward. She grasps the cords herself, breathes, and dashes across the bridge. Keeping her gaze fixed on her own boots, Link hits each plank squarely in the centre. And then she feels her right boot slipping and her leg dropping downwards. Her left leg bends at an awkward angle while her right plummets through the divide between two planks, her torso hitting the bridge hard enough for her to bite back a groan of pain. The bridge oscillates around her in a vertical wave that carries her nearer and nearer towards the sea of malice with every bounce. When she tries to retract her leg, the bridge twists up and down even further.

At its nadir, the bridge brings Link low towards the sea of malice, so close that the heat rolling off of the sea bursts boiling malice over her right heel and burns the bottom of her foot. The abruptness of the agony leads Link to yelp.

The girl with the golden hair arches backwards, pulling up the bridge. Link slaps her palms against the planks on either side of the divide. Grunting, she pushes herself up. The planks scrape against her leg, but she picks herself back up and tries to put weight on her right heel. As soon as the pad touches plank, a pang of pain nearly petrifies her on the bridge. Link exhales. She tucks her right leg up, then hurries across the second half of the bridge, hopping frantically on her left foot. The uneven bridge steadily rotates to the left.

Link throws herself forward the last three planks. The girl with the golden hair catches her while the bridge twists noisily behind her. Her companion lets her down onto the floor.

Together, they examine her foot. Blisters of violet cover the bottom of her right heel, rising up in pulsating purple pustules from her skin. The girl with the golden hair bites her lower lip. "You can't walk like this, can you?"

Link reaches behind her for her quiver. She withdraws a sapphire arrow and flicks a finger against jewel-inlaid tip. The girl with the golden hair starts to shake her head, yet Link shrugs off her own tunic. Folding the fabric into a gag, she bite down hard on her tunic. The scent of dried blood slshs copper over her tongue. Slamming the arrowhead into the floor, Link breaks the shard of sapphire within, then drives the icy point into the blisters to pop and freeze them at the same time.

The agony of the sharp arrowhead piercing her sensitive stretched skin and frosting over her flesh chokes her around the fabric stuffed into her mouth. The blister freezes over. Loathe to dirty her cooking knife, Link scrapes the dead skin from the pad of her heel with the edge of the sword that seals the darkness, exposing the raw flesh underneath. She wraps gauze around her heel repeatedly until, when she puts weight on her leg, she senses merely a mild ache throbbing against the pad of her foot.

"Oh, I wish that I could tell you to rest." The girl with the golden hair looks on towards the corridor ahead. "But, as you eloquently put it earlier...we don't have the time."

They take the second bridge more carefully so as not to fall down into the sea of malice. When Link reaches the solid ground on the other end, she flops down and kisses the golden floor. She licks experimentally at the gold, except she discovers that it has no taste. Frowning to herself, Link runs her tongue over the ground again.

Rocking back up, she sits on her heels. "What kind of monsters would've designed this?"

"Many, many years ago, the aristocracy of Hyrule used to include golden flakes in their meals, as proof that they could afford to even eat a precious metal." The girl with the golden hair rests her left hand on her hip. "Of course, I don't think that this is made out of the metal. It's too solid for that and luminesces, as well as having a high resistance to heat and even concentrated power of will—"
Link snaps her fingers: she refers to malice. "—without harming beings of blood like you. Remarkable, really. If only we could emulate its construction."

"When we both get out of this, we can come back and do all the research we want."

The girl with the golden hair makes a hn sound in the back of her throat. "If we do. Now, come on."

As they walk away from the pits of malice, the swelter of the air dies down into a comfortable coolness. Link slips the feathered blue tunic onto her body once more, though she notes that her own blood—from the loftwing's razor-sharp attack of aether—has partially stained the back a brilliant red. Somehow, her blood has taken on a more vivid hue in the glittering gold of the keep.

Two rows of columns greets them. On the far wall, Link observes a curtain of light signaling another lift. A statue guards the lift, perched on a small overhang which protrudes out from the flat of the wall. The statue resembles a golden loftwing in shining armour, their beak longer and crueler than that of the crimson loftwing that she and the girl with the golden hair have already fought, more like a blade than a beak. Nothing else exists in the corridor beyond the ever-present golden walls. Just an easy path to the lift.

The girl with the golden and Link approach the lift warily. The former raises her mirrored pot lid over her head. For once, Link acquiesces to the use of a shield: she wields her cooking pot as she would a hat.

They near the lift. When they pass under the overhang, Link removes the cooking pot from her head. The lift, less than three paces away. The girl with the golden hair breaks into a run. Link throws her arm out to stop her.

"What if the lift's a—"

A touch of nail on floor behind her makes Link whirl around and draw Fi in a single motion accompanied by the clatter of the cooking pot onto the ground. Another crimson loftwing flips out their wings at them. Link reaches for her slate, then realises that she lost the slate in the sea of malice outside of the pyramid. Something whistles through the air beside her. The creature leaps back, but the mirrored pot lid that the girl with the golden hair has thrown thumps the loftwing in the chest. While the creature shakes off the blow, Link sprints forward towards them, intent on thrusting Fi into their breast. The loftwing charges Link at the last second, flaring out their wings, and Link skips to a halt. She grips Fi in both hands.

The thud of the creature's beak against her sternum knocks her back and clamps down on her heart hard enough that for a second she cannot feel her own heartbeat. But the loftwing's charge impales the creature on the blade of evil's bane. Raising her arms—the loftwing's form surprisingly light despite its size—Link swings Fi down. Momentum cracks the creature against the floor. She jerks Fi out from the loftwing's body. The creature stretches wide their beak and slithers over the ground to snap it over Link's leg. Link brings Fi down onto the loftwing's skull. The blade pierces through the jelly of their eye; the impact of the strike forces the creature to a standstill as they shriek out their agony, beak opening and closing around Link's ankle, wings spasming, golden fluid bubbling up from their ruined eye socket. With a sickening squelch, Link forces Fi through the gristle at the back of the loftwing's eye and plunges the sword into their cranium.

The creature dissipates into golden dust. Link heaves her breaths in and out until her lungs calm. Picking up the mirrored pot lid, she returns it to the girl with the golden hair, whose eyes have widened, her gaze fixed on the spot on the floor where Link dispatched the loftwing.
Link presses the mirrored pot lid into her hands. For a moment, the girl with the golden hair does not seem to acknowledge Link's presence. Then she comes to, her knuckles paling on the rim of the pot lid.

Link sheathes Fi. "Let's descend."

"Yes," the girl with the golden hair breathes. "Let's descend."

They descend down into the lift. The corridor does not offer them a choice this time. The two move forward in the singular accessible direction and come across a wall of partially cracked golden blocks. The girl with the golden hair runs her palm over one of the splintered blocks. "How curious. I wonder if there's some sort of pattern to these, if perhaps we need to locate some kind of..." The girl with the golden hair exhales. "...or that works too, I suppose."

Link bangs Fi against the nearest block. It crumbles to golden dust from the impact. She bangs out another block, and something shoots out at her with such speed that she falls backwards onto her rear. The girl with the golden hair cowers behind the pot lid while Link tries to make out the rapidly soaring whatever-it-is. When it darts by her, Link brings down the sword that seals the darkness, but the whatever-it-is merely slices a claw or a talon across Link's abdomen and flies off. Link pushes into her her stomach with her right arm. Readying another strike, she observes the whatever-it-is blast towards them. Then girl with the golden hair whaps it over the head with the mirrored pot lid.

The whatever-it-is hurtles into the floor. Link slices down immediately, bisecting the whatever-it-is in half. For a second before it dissolves into dust, Link observes something like a decapitated loftwing's head, the feathers on either side serving as wings.

"Thanks," she signs to the girl with the golden hair, who shakes her head.

"Thank you, Link."

They excavate the blocks one by one. Some of the blocks contain more of the darting whatever-they-are; the girl with the golden hair and Link fall into a rhythm, where Link thrusts into each block and the girl with the golden hair swings down her pot lid at the same time.

She and Link break through one row of blocks, then walk down a cramped passage to face another. Shrugging at each other, Link and the girl with the golden hair use the same strategy, whumping the whatever-they-are as they emerge from the blocks.

"Well, now, that wasn't so bad, was it?" The girl with the golden hair brushes golden dust from her jacket. "I can only hope that the rest of the temple is—"

Another whatever-it-is shoots directly into her face. Link tries to crack it down with the cooking pot, but the whatever-it-is flies off and the metal connects with her companion's brow. The girl with the golden hair tumbles backwards. While Link ogles her cooking pot in disbelief, the whatever-it-is comes hurtling back. Now the cooking pot slams into the whatever-it-is, crashing it hard enough against the floor that it immediately dissipates into dust.

Link drops the cooking pot and crouches down beside the girl with the golden hair. Scooping her hand under her companion's head, Link tries to lift the girl with the golden hair up, tries to poke her cheek, tries to gently pap her face in hopes of awakening her.

"Just...give me five more minutes..." she murmurs, her head lolling. "...then I'll...go pray again..."
rouse her; if the girl with the golden hair resembles Link in any way, the weapon will work just as well. Link rummages through her satchel. She withdraws a slice of pumpkin pie, now slightly crushed in the wax, and unwraps it.

She brings the pumpkin pie towards the girl with the golden hair's face. Her companion's eyes snap open. "Pumpkin," she says.

Link nods encouragingly. The girl with the golden hair snags the slice of pumpkin pie from Link's hands and stuffs herself with the sweet. She gulps down each mouthful almost without chewing. Only once she has polished off three-quarters of the slice does the girl with the golden hair slow down enough to roll a bite over her tongue.

"There's—mm!—so much things I missed—nn!—about you, Link, but your cooking—" The girl with the golden hair lowers her eyelids. "—is—mmfm!—one of the most important. I should write a book about that. Catalogue all of your recipes." She delicately wipes her mouth on a kerchief while Link offers her a second slice. The girl with the golden hair seizes the offering with both hands.

Link answers honestly: "That's the greatest compliment you could give me. And I mean that. I missed you too."

"Then it's decided." The girl with the golden hair practically inhales the second slice as Link prepares for her a third. "Oh, I've always wanted to write an epic. If we both come out of this alive, I'll record your travels through Hyrule and include all of the recipes that you've made. I know that, traditionally, the heroes of Hyrule have had their exploits recorded in song, but...well. I wouldn't say that you're a traditional hero." Link rubs the back of her head. "Not in a bad way!"

"You're not wrong."

She clears her throat. "More importantly, I don't know much about music, I'm afraid."

"I know someone who does." Link snaps her fingers. "His name's Kass."

"Oh! You mentioned him earlier. When you were discussing the golden scar on your left arm."

Link bobs her head. "I think you'd like him very much." Link touches her chin. "He knows a lot about local legends and verses passed down in this region. Not this region, specifically, but you know, regions in general." She loops her finger around. "Anyway, you'd have a lot to talk about, I think." She pauses. "And stop saying if. It's when, because we're both going to get out of here."

"In that case, if we do...I'd like to meet him."

The passageway beyond the chamber with the crumbling blocks constricts claustrophobically. When Link's head just brushes against the sharply-angled ceiling, the tapered triangular walls force her and the girl with the golden hair to hunch over and walk single-file through the long hall, Link leading, the girl with the golden hair following. "I think I see it widening up ahead," her companion remarks. Link lets go of a breath she didn't realise she was holding just as she spots something crimson ahead. Her eyes embiggen. If a loftwing charges them here in the tunnel—

Link dives to the floor—she hears the girl with the golden hair intake a breath of shock—and rolls herself forward, engaging the loftwing head-on. She thrusts Fi up and out at the red only to hear the clang of the blade against metal.

She looks up: an armoured loftwing. An armoured crimson loftwing clad in gleaming gold so brilliant that Link can barely keep her gaze on the metal. An armoured loftwing sporting a beak long and cruel as the blade of evil's bane. An armoured loftwing who glares at her with sharp golden eyes ringed in fire-light blue and violent violet.

The loftwing rears up their head. Link scrambles backwards, yet the suddenness of pain in her right shoulder reddens her vision. Vaguely, she feels herself hit the floor as her right shoulder bathes in a wet warmth. Vaguely, she hears the girl with the golden hair shrieking behind her. Vaguely, she sees the creature lift their head to strike again.

Fi vibrates in her hand. Closing her eyes against the blurring of her vision, Link lunges to the side; the loftwing hacks at empty aether with their beak. The creature pelts after her. Link swirls on her heel to carve Fi into the loftwing's torso as she did the ones before. Yet the blade only rings against the armour, the vibrations racing up Link's arms and jellying her bones. Her right shoulder throbs in pain. The creature strikes down their terrible beak. Link thrusts upwards, meeting the blow. The collision bounces her back. Stumbling away from the loftwing, she seeks purchase against the ground, her right heel pulsating in pain. The creature lunges for her. This time, Link drives Fi forward not from the front but from the left side, wedging the blade into the crack between the armoured loftwing's upper and lower beak.

The impact tilts the creature's beak to the right. Instead of sundering Link's skull, the beak punctures the flesh of her right shoulder even further, but Link pushes Fi deeper into the loftwing's mouth until she feels a wet resistance. With a resounding grunt, Link punctures the back of the creature's throat, a moist tearing accompanying the sickening crunch of the bones of their neck. The loftwing gurgles up a vicious golden fluid that seeps down their beak into Link's shoulder. The droplets burrow into her flesh like malice, like parasitic worms crawling under her skin, like needles driven into the meat of her shoulder. She wrenches her wrist.

The creature's throat twists around her blade as though she were carving a cucco, but the loftwing replies by digging their their beak deeper into her shoulder. Wincing, closing her eyes, Link throws the weight of her body into forcing the sword deeper in.

A sudden squelch. Abruptly the pressure releases. Fi slips from Link's hand as her knees buckle beneath her. She listens to the wet sounds of iron against bone and the beating of metal on meat, over and over again. The iron rings out a final time, not against bone, but against the floor. Link claws at her own shoulder, her hand slipping over the bareness of her skin where the fabric of her tunic has dissolved away. Her fingers come away wet with the blood that runs in rivulets down her side and pools in the dip between her hip and her leg.

"Whew. All right, I think I took care of the loftwing. Link? Link! Link, Link, is there anything I can do? Oh, she probably still has some of that pumpkin pie in her satchel. I bet that'll do the trick."

Link senses the strap of her satchel tautening as the girl with the golden hair combs through her belongings. Pressing her left hand as far into her throbbing right shoulder as she can manage, Link fishes through her quiver of arrows. She draws out one tipped in ruby. Gripping the hem of her tunic between her teeth and fingerling the arrowhead to check its wholeness, she cracks the ruby shard against the floor. Then Link shoves the burning arrowhead into her own meat and cauterises the wound in her shoulder.

The next loftwing she encounters will eat a topaz arrow to the face if she has anything to say about it.

When she comes to from the darkness, she smells: pumpkin pie. Lunging forward, Link snaps her jaws shut around the sweet. The succulence of the gooey pie filling combined with the earthy flavour of the pumpkin all balanced by the crumbly crunch of the crust drifts Link onto a warmth paradise. In the afterglow of the slice of pumpkin pie, she opens her eyes and looks up at the girl with the golden hair, in turn, looking down at her.

Link lies in her companion's lap, her head supported by her companion's right hand; she holds the remainder of the pumpkin pie with her left. Link rolls her right shoulder. She can still feel the tightness of her skin around the burn scar, but at least she senses little pain, merely discomfort.

The girl with the golden hair's usually braided-up bangs have fallen into her eyes. "How are you feeling?"

"Very full," Link responds, shutting her eyes again and resting her head against her companion's chest. The girl with the golden hair shakes her. When Link raises her eyelids, she notices her companion's eyes slightly narrowed, her brow creased, the corners of her mouth twitching downwards.

"Link," she says softly, "we have to get to the Golden Force, remember?"

Link sits up so quickly that she knocks their foreheads forward. While Link rubs her brow, she manages an apologetic smile to the girl with the golden hair. "Sorry about that."

"It's what I get for having such a large forehead, I might as well call it a fivehead." The girl with the golden hair stops. Link tilts her head. "G-get it? Because five is...it's one more than four. It's funny! It's a pun. A play on words." Link blinks. The girl with the golden hair exhales. "One hundred years is a long time to be fighting a battle of will in the Sacred Realm." That brings out a shake of silent laughter to Link's shoulders.

The girl with the golden hair and Link pick themselves up and walk on. Jogging up a set of stairs, they skirt a blob of living malice oozing after them and trudge up a long corridor until they face a dead end.

Link touches her chin. The girl with the golden hair sits down and marks the spot on her map, and then Link hears her inhale. "Look down."

She does. At her boots lies a single fragmented block. Link shrugs. "I guess if things have already gone south, then we might as well go south, too."

The girl with the golden hair snorts. "That was absolutely worse than my fivehead joke. South isn't even down!"

"Well, when you've got the paraglider, the enemy's always down." Positioning herself on the edge of the block, Link pierces it to golden dust with Fi's blade. No darting dervishes dash from the dust. Nevertheless, she spots another block below the first, this one deep enough in the ground that she would have to lower herself into the hole if she wanted to break through the next block.

"What if it's a trap?" The girl with the golden hair mns worriedly.

Link runs her fingers through her ponytail. "But there's no other way through."

The girl with the golden hair looks back at the stairs: the living blob of malice steadily but surely globs towards them. "Oh, maybe we could go back, and try one of the other corridors." Taking the paraglider from her back, Link hands it to the girl with the golden hair. Her companion looks down at the fabric, her brows knit together, her timbre voicing her puzzlement. "This looks...a little different from Impa's. I don't recall hers having—topaz? amber?—at all."
"One of my best friends had it fixed up for me after I managed to nearly lose it in a thunderstorm." The girl with the golden hair makes a noise in the back of her throat; Link waves a dismissive hand. "I'll tell you all about it when we get out of here. You hang out onto that. After I boom-boom right through these blocks, you can glide down with it."

"I don't think—"

"Trust me."

Link hops down into the hole. After the first block that she has already broken through, she pierces eight more—nine blocks, like the nine columns she passed through to enter the keep—and then she jams Fi into the floor. With a hurried apology to Fi, who resonates warmly in her hand as though to reassure her, Link looks up. The girl with the golden hair perches at the rim of the vertical tunnel and peers at her. Link curls up her forefinger and thumb in the symbol of being all right.

Opening the paraglider, the girl with the golden hair steps in. Link listens to the few _nns_ of fear that her companion lets slip as she drifts down the shaft. Abruptly the paraglider collides with the wall and snaps shut. The girl with the golden hair drops like a stone. Without thinking, Link opens her arms.

The girl with the golden hair's weight sends her into the floor. Her companion's knee ends up in her face; her companion's elbow digs into her stomach; her companion's head bonks against the cap of her knee. At least she cushioned the girl with the golden hair's fall.

"Oh no! Link, I'm so sorry. Are you all right?"

Link flicks up a finger and boomps the girl with the golden hair's nose. Blinking, she tries to focus on Link's forefinger. The cross-eyed look brings Link to laugh. "You've let me fall on you twice now. I'm just returning the favour."

"Thank you for catching me, then." The girl with the golden hair returns the glider. "And...it looks like you were right about going down. Oh, I mean, going south. Going both?"

"Both," Link agrees. "Both is good."

Again, they have no choice in corridor, but they find another lift a little ways away. As they descend once more into the depths, the girl with the golden hair traces out their journey, while Link notices part of the wall shimmering more than the rest. She tries to extend her hand through the curtain of golden light; to her shock, her fingers pass through the wall. Yet the lift continues down swiftly. Her palm smacks against solid gold; she withdraws her arm. The wall no longer shimmers. Her shoulder throbs, as does her heel. The girl with the golden hair inquires of what caused her to yelp.

When the curtain of gold light parts, the girl with the golden hair glances up and down the corridors leading away from the shaft of the lift. "Which way should we go this time? Two columns, or four—Link! Loftwing!"

Link sees the loftwing, sees the _loftwings_: one charging them from the passageway lined with two columns, the other spiralling towards them from the passageway with four. She grabs the girl with the golden hair and dives to the floor; the two creatures crash into one another. The spiralling loftwing cleaves through the charging one's body like it were gutting a cucco. Link stares, eyes wide, as the second creature's body bursts apart into dust from the vortex of aether spiralling around the first. When the loftwing lands, talons clacking against the golden floor, Link leaps to her boots, Fi clenched in both hands. Mirrored pot lid held out in front of her, the girl with the golden hair accompanies her. The creature extends their wings. Link rolls forward under the arc of the aether and then rolls again to evade the boomerang whirlwind. She slices wildly at the loftwing, forcing the creature back. The loftwing jumps away from her, flipping out their wings every time they land. Yet Link advances mercilessly until the creature's feet hit the steps behind them. Squawking—in surprise?—the loftwing stumbles backwards. Link seizes the moment of weakness to lunge forward, Fi piercing the aether and plunge her sharpened tip into the creature's white-feathered throat.

Golden fluid spurts outwards, splattering Link's chest. The pain blooms alongside a counter-current of numbness outwards from her sternum. Twisting her wrist, she slits the loftwing's throat from base to the softened skin under their jaw.

The creature arches their head forward. Though Link tries to recoil back, the sharpened hook of the beak drags across her chest and slashes a diagonal furrow from her left shoulder to her right hip.
Warm wetness slicks her tunic against her skin. The loftwing draws their beak back up, making an X across Link's chest. As soon as the creature retracts their head, the golden fluid dripping down to gild the feathers of their chest, Link throws herself backwards. She jolts Fi free of the loftwing's throat with a terrible wet squelch that sloshes golden fluid over the floor.

The creature takes a single shaking step forward towards Link, rasping out a breath of aether. The skin of her chest burns. Link swings Fi parallel to the ground. The edge of the blade bites into the loftwing's neck. A second of resistance, and then the creature's neck buckles in a spray of golden dust. Their head dissipates into dust before it hits the ground.

Link examines her chest. Ripping off her tunic and undershirt, she inspects her injuries. The blood seeping from the diagonal cut has dyed the fabric a deep crimson instead of Parapan-sky blue.
Squeezing shut her eyes against the pain, she scrapes the thin film of golden fluid from her flesh and leaves the reddish rawness of the layer of skin underneath. The girl with the golden hair offers her gauze. She wraps it carefully around Link's torso, hip to shoulder, over the chest and around the back, her fingers brushing lightly over Link's skin. She tucks in the end, then tears off the hanging edge.

"At this rate, we'll run out of gauze before we get halfway through." The girl with the golden hair has angled her eyebrows at Link in admonishment, yet Link can see the worry and affection behind the heavy set of her brow. "Please, at least try to take care of yourself."

Link grins at her. "That's why I have you with me, my Knight."

The girl with the golden hair stamps her boot against the floor. "That doesn't mean you don't have to take care of yourself, too, Princess."

She raises her eyebrows. "Now you've sounding like Impa."

The girl with the golden hair pouts. "Don't tease me like that, Link." Link flicks her finger against her companion's nose; the girl with the golden hair responds with a flick of her own, harder than Link's, enough to water Link's eyes. Link's hands fly to her already crooked nose. "O-oh. I didn't mean to hurt you!"

"You weren't kidding about not teasing you."

"I'm so sorry, Link."

Link grants her a smile. "I'm just kidding around. If a loftwing shoving its beak in my chest couldn't knock me out, you booping my nose isn't going to do much."
The girl with the golden hair shakes her head incredulously. "You've gotten a lot more talkative in the past hundred years, Princess."

"Only because I learned from the best." Link nods towards the two passageways and their columns. "So, two or four?"

"Shame there's no third route, so we could take the middle." The girl with the golden hair forms an approximate triangle with her hands. "You know, since three is in the middle of two and four?" Link cocks her head. The girl with the golden hair sighs. "Let's see...if given the choice between two slices of pie and four, you could split the difference and take three."

Link scratches the crown of her head. "I'd just take four though. I mean...why wouldn't you take four instead of three?"

"But there are only three Golden Goddesses," the girl with the golden hair insists, "and we're looking for Their Triforce."

"Sure! That's why I'd pick four. One for each Goddess, and one for myself." The girl with the golden hair claps her palm over her own face. "Sorry for not getting the joke."

"I don't think I get my own joke anymore." The girl with the golden hair thumbs behind her. "Come on."

They climb the steps, and the triangular passageway opens up around them. Link and the girl with the golden hair pass statues depicting various emblems of the Golden Goddesses and perched loftwings that watch them from behind crimson-jewelled eyes. Strange coiled ropes litter the floor here and there. The girl with the golden hair leans over one and studies it; the rope uncoils into an eyeless wyrm with a void of a mouth lined in rows upon rows of teeth down into the churning abyss of its gut. The girl with the golden hair slaps the not-rope with the mirrored pot lid, then catches its body between the rim and the floor. She crushes its head under her boot.

"It just had to be snakes." The girl with the golden hair rubs her forearms. "Oh, I guess it's better than boars."

"This is definitely more exciting than bores," Link tries.

The girl with the golden hair giggles. "That one was pretty good."

Channelling her friend Sidon, Link strikes a pose and flashes a thumbs-up. "That's my first victory today."

One of the flying whatever-they-are dashes into the small of Link's back. The impact leaves a cut in her skin. Link catches the whatever-it-is in her open cooking pot when it next comes around and slams down the pot lid. The whatever-it-is dervishes inside, smacking smack against the sides of the cooking pot. While the girl with the golden hair holds the pot, Link steadies Fi over the pot lid. Her companion flicks up the lid. The whatever-it-is shoots out just as Link stabs down, severing it into golden dust.

Link holds out her hand. The girl with the golden hand slaps her palm against Link's. They grin at one another.

Together, the girl with the golden hair and Link advance quickly through the open corridor. Coiled ropes spring at them from behind statues; Link slices open those that attack the girl with the golden hair, and the girl with the golden hair decapitates those that attack Link. The whatever-they-are lunge at the two from the aether, but a whap with the mirrored pot lid or bamth with the cooking pot knock each whatever-it-is into the floor long enough for the other to grind the whatever-it-is into dust under her boots.

At the far end of the open chamber, another statue upon an overhang greets them, a lift curtained in gold visible beyond. Link and the girl with the golden hair exchange a glance. They speak and sign at the same time:

"The statue must hide an enemy."

"There's something behind the statue."

They look at one another.

"Do you think we can make it to the lift?"

"If we run really fast."

"What are our chances?"

"Maybe if we run really, really fast."

"We could stand and fight."

"Or maybe if we run really, really, really fast."

The girl with the golden hair cocks her hip. "Why are you so keen on running?"

Link rolls her shoulders. "If it's another one of those loftwings in armour, I'd rather not get both shoulders pecked off."

"The previous lift was guarded by a regular loftwing. I doubt this one will be any different. The Goddesses do like Their patterns, after all." The girl with the golden hair brandishes her pot lid. "Now the corridor tapers into the lift. If we can trap the loftwing between the lift and our present position, then...the loftwing shouldn't be able to leap around and all that. Does that sound like a plan?"

After a moment, Link dips her head. Unsheathing Fi and gripping her in both hands, prepared for a spiral or a gust of wind, Link rivets her gaze on the golden statue.

"Now, the last loftwing did not leap out until we had passed under that statue," the girl with the golden hair speculates out loud, "so this one should not emerge unt—"

A flash of red and gold parts from behind the statue and spirals towards the ceiling. Link strings her bow with a topaz-tipped arrow—Fi fallen to the floor at her boots—but the loftwing has angled themself down to charge the ground. The topaz sparks its electricity against the ceiling. Snorting air from her nose, Link whips out another topaz arrow and takes aim, but the creature breaks from the spiral in mid-air to change course.

The girl with the golden hair raises the mirrored pot lid over her head as the armoured loftwing drives their beak into the glass. Riju's gift holds firm. The creature's beak screeees down the mirrored surface. They reach their long serrated-clawed limbs around the rim of the pot lid and slash at her companion.

As the girl with the golden hair turns to run away, the loftwing sinks their talons into her shoulder. The creature rakes furrows down her back from shoulder blade to just above her hips. The three scarlet lines that form on either side of her spine spur Link into a sprint. Dropping the bow, Link closes the five-pace gap between herself and the loftwing. She grabs the creature by the tail that pokes out of a gap in their golden armour and drive the topaz arrow directly into their rump, the arrowhead fragmenting inside of the loftwing's flesh.

The resulting shockwave of electricity throws Link backwards. Her boots skid along the floor. She lands on all four and snaps her head up, observing the creature convulse from the shocks running through their system. The girl with the golden hair seizes up as well, but at least she has fallen to the ground free of the loftwing's talons.

Link's gaze fixes onto her companion: the creature has shredded six rows into the back of her jacket and tunic; the fabric around the furrows has sunk into her flesh, stapling the rest of the jacket onto her body save for the mangled red-blue-white vertical lines irrigating her back in blood.

As her left hand flies to Fi's hilt before it dawns upon her that Fi remains on the floor across the chamber, Link pounces towards the armoured loftwing that still spasms on the ground and bring the cooking pot down onto the creature's head. Like the lizalfos on the beach of the castle, but without the distance afforded her by magnesis. Her own two hands grip the sides of the cooking pot. Her own two hands brings the cooking pot up over her head. Her own two hands hurl the metal into the loftwing's skull.

Once, for the crack of the cranium. Twice, for the slosh of the juice. Thrice, for the squishing of flesh against shattered skull.

Four, five, sixes time. Seven. She loses count. Her fingers numb. The tendons of her wrists ache. She caves in the loftwing's skull like she would tenderise a raw cucco in anticipation of making poultry pilaf for Impa, her gaze caught on the girl with the golden hair who shudders on the ground, limbs trembling, the blood from her back forming a thin pool around her. Link notices flecks of the white of her raw meat in the rows raked by the creature's talons, and she brings the cooking pot down again on the loftwing's head.

When the metal bangs against floor—when the creature shrieks their last—when the armour and body alike dissolve into a golden mist, the abandoned cooking pot rattles against the gold.

Link drops herself to the floor the last half-pace, sliding her knees towards the girl with the golden hair. Her blood oozes thickly from her wounds, coagulating around her on the ground in congealed ropes that hang from the edges of the injuries over her torso to the golden floor below. Link delves into her satchel for the elixir of star fragment and faery. The glass warms her palms. Just as she lifts the vial from her satchel, she hears the girl with the golden hair rasp out her words, her timbre breathy, as if every motion of her lungs pulsed more blood from her back.

"Caut...cauterise them." The girl with the golden hair quakes against the ground, her knuckles slipping over the tessellated triangles of gold. "I don't care how much it works. Cauterise them. Don't you dare waste that elixir on me. I'll never forgive you if you do."

For a second looks down at the girl with the golden hair. Then she rips off her own tunic—the blue almost entirely stained to red—and scrunches it into a gag. Lean sover, Link presents her companion with the tunic. The rawness of the blood, a mixture of dried and fresh, almost boils up bile from her belly. The girl with the golden hair sinks her teeth into the fabric. Link's blood rings her companion's mouth in red.

She cracks a ruby arrow against the ground. The arrowhead blazes in fervid flame. Kneeling over the girl with the golden hair, Link rests a hand against the first furrow, intent on picking the shredded bits of tunic from the wound.
But when she so much as brushes against the cloth with her finger, the girl with the golden hair arches her spine and moans into the gag. Link digs her nails into her own palm.

Gripping the fabric of the tunic to the girl with the golden hair's Grasping writhing and flailing of limbs, Link rips the cloth free from the wound with a noise more sickening than any Link has ever heard, as though she herself were tearing apart her companion's veins, gripping the vessels from the meat of her body and pulls them apart until they burst to spray her in blood. She runs the red-hot arrowhead over the wound from the shoulder to the base of the spine. The girl with the golden hair stils. Her head lolls into the ground; her limbs noodle against her deadened torso. Link seals the injury. A long scarlet scar trails down the girl with the golden hair's back.

She repeats the procedure until she has notched the girl with the golden hair's back six times. The remainder of the fabric of the jacket and tunic remain in place, however weakened, so that solely the six furrows stand out from the blue, like a dress made for a zora with lines cut out for the zora's fins.

Gathering the girl with the golden hair into her arms, Link embraces her tightly. She withdraws the final slice of pumpkin pie and wafts it in front of her companion, cradling her companion in her lap.

"So the Goddesses...knew that someone like me would come along, didn't They...? Someone who expects patterns..." The girl with the golden hair haahs out a dry laugh. "You got me good there; You really did."

Link swings her head from side to side. "Don't blame yourself. Does it hurt?"

She feels the girl with the golden hair shift against her thighs. "A little. Not much. It feels...dead."

"You might not be able to feel from those anymore. From where you got burned. See this?" Rolling up the sleeve of her undershirt, Link demonstrates the patch of burnt skin near her elbow from the guardian's fire-light in the Divine Beast Vah Naboris. She raps the knuckles of her left hand against the scar. "I can still feel the pressure on the under layer of skin, but I can't feel touch anymore. Like if you just put your hand on it? I couldn't feel it."

The girl with the golden hair mms in response. She extends her arm towards her own shoulders. Link helps to prop up her upper back while she traces one of the furrows with her fingers. "It's like a mountain range on the old globe I had. It feels...so strange." Her fingers patter against the floor. "I'm fine enough to move. Let's continue."

"Are you sure?"

The girl with the golden hair nods. "I'll be more careful in the future. I've not so foolish that I won't take a lesson from this." She fidgets out of Link's lap. Her companion stands and stretches out her arms. "It's like I've got stitches in my skin. Oh, you know. I feel like I can't twist my body as well as I could."

"You'll get used to it," Link tries, though her scars still taut and tug on her skin. "And it'll heal over time."

"At least I'm still alive, and that's what matters. Six scars, isn't it? One for fire and one for power. One for water and one for wisdom. One for wind and one for courage. I know that signs don't really exist, but I'll take it as a sign anyway." The girl with the golden hair stoops down to pick the fallen Fi from the floor. Walking towards Link, she lowers herself to one knee and present Link with the sword. "As long as I'm still alive, I can be your Knight."
Link’s hand hovers over the hilt. Then she inclines her head and accepts Fi. She returns Fi to the sheath over her shoulder. "Then let's go on."

Once again, they descend into the lift. The humming resonance of the walls around them has grown steadily louder and deeper. A song of some sort. As they dive into the depths, Link takes the ocarina from the loop at her left hip; she attempts the song. The girl with the golden hair watches her puzzle out the melody through trial and error. She just has figured out—possibly—three of the notes when the curtain of golden light parts and deposits them in yet another same-looking golden corridor.

"More of those fractured blocks." The girl with the golden hair marks down the spot of the lift and sketches out their trek, noting down the armoured loftwing that raked across her back. "I feel like I'm going to run out of space before we're through. I hope that we're not just wandering around in circles."

They take up the same strategy as before. However, instead of those whatever-they-are, Link and the girl with the golden hair come upon living malice in the crumbling blocks. Link discovers that several slices of Fi's fire-light blade burns away enough of the malice to render it dull and inert as it bursts into golden dust. While they work their way through the rows of blocks, carving out a small chamber about three blocks wide—enough for the girl with the golden and Link to stand inside next to one another—Link breaks through the seventh in the row to find herself staring into a pair of golden eyes ringed in fire-light blue and violent violet, the feathers a vivid blue, the armour a shimmering silver.

Link ogles. The blue armoured loftwing croons out half a song before rearing backwards. Their beak glints silver, reflecting an aura of golden luminescence, and then the creature thrusts outwards. The silver light soars off of their beak. Link dodges to the left. The silver arrow whistles past her, radiating a pulse of energy that shatters the nearby blocks.

Her eyes embiggen. She presses against the inner chamber of blocks, flattening herself against the wall and looking looks up frantically at the girl with the golden hair, similarly squished up against the far wall. "What do we do?" she whispers urgently.

Link listens to the armoured loftwing croon. Their talons click and drag against the floor. She pictures those scythe-sharp silver talons raking into her skin. Or, worse, into the girl with the golden hair's.

The blocks one row above their heads suddenly crumble to dust from one of the creature's silver arrows, somehow loosed from their beak. The light filtering in from the ceiling leaves Link's breath caught vulnerable in her throat.

She reaches across the divide. She grabs the girl with the golden hair's hand. She runs.

Link races forward as swiftly as her legs will carry her, hauling the girl with the golden hair forward. Her companion clasps the mirrored pot lid behind her back. The armoured loftwing tenses down and then spiral-charges towards them in a flurry of silver aether. Link throws herself to the ground and drags her companion with her. When her chin thuds against the floor, she bites off the tip of her own tongue. The crack floods her mouth in copper and vibrates her teeth up to her skull in a migraine. The lofting soars overhead; they crash into another row of crumbling blocks up again. Their razored beak detonates the blocks to dust.

She brandishes Fi in front of her, flailing the blade wildly at first, and then forcing her attention to narrow down into the thin sliver of fractured gold before her. Propelling the sword forward over and over, she pierces the rows of blocks while the creature springs back to their feet, talons clacking on the triangles.

Link listens to the armoured loftwing begin, again, to sing. She stabs frantically through the blocks, not even waiting for the first to dissolve into the aether before jabbing forward to the next. Her companion's hand twists in hers; Link clings to her fingers with a firmness bordering on desperation, digging her nails into the girl with the golden hair's flesh.

Then the sound of the silver arrow. Something hard and hylian-shaped smacks into Link's back, stumbling her into the blocks. The girl with the golden hair gasps. Link senses her ripping something off of Link's back. "Link! Hurry!"

Link hurries. She plunges Fi into the seventh block. It vanishes into dust. The loftwing sings. The silver arrow whistles. The girl with the golden hair slams into her again. Yet this time Link can pull her onwards through the cramped passageway beyond.

The wave of heat hits her abruptly, but but she does not stop for even a second. Another pit of boiling, bubbling malice, this one accompanied not by a rickety bridge, but by a rail-thin walkway of golden triangles extending over the pit, no handrails, no cords, nothing but a tiny catwalk as wide as one and a half of her feet, not enough to step her boots together.

Swallowing hard, Link attempts to stop at the edge of the bridge, ogling the abyss of malice into which she could fall.

Her momentum carries her forward another two paces and suddenly she senses herself soaring. No. Not soaring: the girl with the golden hair has scooped her up into her arms. She rushes across the walkway. Behind them, the creature sings. The girl with the golden hair anchors Link to her chest, pressing her face into Link's abdomen. Link senses her jump over the silver arrow that blitzes under them. Link looks back over the girl with the golden hair's shoulder and notices the walkway disintegrating into golden dust beyond them the second that the girl with the golden hair's boots touch block.

The loftwing leaps after her and Link, their wings spread wide, their momentum swooping their body towards the two. The creature starts to sing again, their beak beginning to glint.

Link senses herself shift up. The girl with the golden hair lets out a half-grunt, half-cry as she physically chalks Link across the last gap of the bridge. Her back slams the solid ground first, the breath knocked from her lungs. Spine cracking out in pain, Link bounds to her boots. She draws the bow and notches a topaz arrow into the string. The girl with the golden hair pelts over the bridge. The loftwing arcs down, spiralling towards her. Link lets loose the arrow.

The arrowhead pierces the creature's brow just above their left eye. The sudden writhing of electricity singing through the loftwing's nerves convulses their body and forces in their wings. The creature bashes their torso against the walkway. Link hurls herself towards the edge of the walkway and catches the girl with the golden hair at the same time that the final step of the bridge disappears beneath her boots. The girl with the golden hair scrambles her nails against the tessellated triangles of the floor; her legs flail through thin air while her torso plummet downwards. Grabbing her hands, Link reels her arms up. She hears the wet crunch of her companion's abdomen hitting the sharp rim of the golden floor.

Link yanks the girl with the golden hair onto solid ground. Beyond the edge, she observes the loftwing plunge into the boiling sea of malice. Screeching, the creature attempts to flap out from the chasm of violet, yet their feathers melt in the blistering heat to congeal against their dissolving wings. Their skin fuses together. Their meat sloughs off of their bones. The golden fluid of their innards spills silently into the malice to vanish into the violet. The loftwing opens their mouth, but no sound escapes as they sink below the sea.

Her mouth waters. She wonders how if loftwing would taste like cucco. Probably more similar to Eldic ostrich. Shaking her head, she watches the creature loose a final desperate silver arrow. The glittering fire-light sparks against the ceiling in a light show that dissipates to nothing.

The loftwing merges with the malice and is no more. The malice. Such concentrated power of will that even beings of will dissolve away, for what little blood they have.

Except for Fi, who in turn can dissolve even the concentrated malice. Link glances over her shoulder, at Fi upon her back. The girl with the golden hair's panting catches her attention. She observes her companion gingerly touch her hand to her own stomach. "Well, nothing's broken. That's good, at least." She angles up her head towards Link. "Thank you for saving me."

"Thank you for saving me," Link replies. "I can't believe you were able to jump those bursts of light or whatever they were. That's amazing."

The girl with the golden hair wipes her eyes; only then does it dawn on Link that the girl with the golden hair has streaked a thin line of salt down her left cheek. One tear, slipped past the girl with the golden hair's defences.

"Link." The girl with the golden hair sniffs. "Oh, please don't be angry. I mean, I don't think I've ever seen you get angry at anyone, but..." She withdraws from her inner jacket two rings, one vaguely jewelled, the other in iron. Rings, about the same diameter as Link's old pot lids, the centres hollow, the inner rims of the rings curled inwards to silver-gilded perfect circles. "I managed to protect us from that loftwing with your pot lids. I...hope that we can honour their sacrifice."

Link runs her palms over the rings. She takes the rings into her hands. The coarse texture of the iron and the jewelled texture of the mirrored. Dipping her fingers onto the inner gilded rim, Link traces the all-too-smooth silver.

She sinks down to her knees. The girl with the golden hair murmurs horrified apologies. Link shakes her head. She lets the rings rest upon the ground at the rim of the golden block that juts out from the sea of malice.

Link touches her hands together. She prays quietly over the pot lids, thanking them for everything that they have ever done for her: the mirrored pot lid that joined her party most recently, which Riju made especially for her in a gift of friendship, which has protected her in the castle and the forgotten Temple alike, which has granted her the ability to peer at the food that she cooks and prepare pumpkin pie without popping up the lid; the iron pot lid that joined her party in Darunia, which has helped her cook more meals that she can count, which has faithfully kept with her all this time since the first Divine Beast she ever calmed.

And she still has, of course, her very first pot lid of all: the wooden one that joined her party back on the Great Plateau in Mudora's cabin. She does not know of the her of whom Sarie—of whom Saria—spoke, but unlike the wooden ocarina, Link will never abandon her wooden pot lid. She pats the pot lid now, and the pot too. Good pot. Best friend.

Link takes the empty rims with her. "When we leave here, I'll give them a proper burial," she explains to the girl with the golden hair. "And by that I mean I'll give them to someone who can melt them down and make something out of 'em."

"You're not...upset at me?"
Link halts. She turns to look at the girl with the golden hair, whose hand has again closed around her throat despite her no longer wearing her golden charm. "No. You saved your life! Oh, and mine too, I guess, since you're my Knight and all. There's no nobler sacrifice for those pot lids than saving the life of one of my closest friends." The girl with the golden hair rubs her eyes on the heels of her hands. Link runs her palm over the back of her head, bouncing her ponytail up and down. In Mipha-like fashion, she signs, "Can I hug you?"

The corners of her mouth curve upwards to crinkle her eyes. "You don't have to ask." Link embraces her. She presses her face against her companion's shoulder. Warm, and soft, and smelling of home.

The girl with the golden hair breaks the hug first. She gestures down the corridor; together, she and Link walk on. Another small pit of malice boils away before them. No bridge, no walkway, just a short gap about a five paces long. Link just makes out something bright gold whizzing back and forth in the short gap between solid ground and solid ground. Opening her paraglider, Link lets the girl with the golden hair cling to her, and then they glide down over the gap.

Another lift. They descend once more. The music swells around them. The girl with the golden hair marks down their journey and furls the scroll up again.

The corridor into which the lift deposits them has but a single path to go. Link notices some nasty-looking glowing sphere floating ahead of them, and a crimson loftwing perched in the centre of the chamber beyond that.

And something else: a strange blue curtain of light extending from the ceiling, shimmering faintly in its undulations. "I don't like the look of that glowing thing."

"Perhaps we should take a leaf from your book," the girl with the golden hair suggests, "and book it."

They book it. The glowing thing swoops towards them; Link dodges to the side, and the girl with the golden hair slides the whatever-it-is. The loftwing extends their wings. Her companion thwacks them over the head with the wooden pot lid.

The two run forward. The chamber shrinks to a cramped passageway; once again Link hunches. The girl with the golden hair suggests that they ready themselves for whatever awaits beyond.

What awaits: a blue armoured loftwing. Link and the girl with the golden hair hurl themselves onwards; the creature sings after them. Rolling, Link leaps out of the way of their silver arrows. The loftwing gives chase. When the creature spiral-charges, Link flings herself to the ground. The loftwing bonk their head against the far steps, giving her companion and Link enough time to race up the stairs that taper into a thin passageway. Link and the girl with the golden hair have to enter in single-file, the undulating curtains vanishing into the ceiling.

Another one of the glowing spheres rams towards Link but impales itself upon Fi. As though she had jammed the blade into a pumpkin, she simply keeps the spherical blob stuck on the blade as she and the girl with the golden hair race onwards, escaping the armoured loftwing attempting to fit through the constricted hallway. Her shallow breaths hurt her rawed throat and lungs; her heart pounds against her ears; her legs shake from the constant running.

At the top of the steps, Link reaches almost another dead end. Now she looks down immediately. Just as she expected: another column of fractured blocks. Throwing the paraglider towards the girl with the golden hair, Link whacks Fi against the blocks—signing apologies with her right hand into the hilt as she goes—and counts from one to seven. "They're still chasing us!" the girl with the golden hair cries down the shaft. Link jabs Fi into the blocks as rapidly as she could wolf down some rice-balls at this second.

Her boots hit the ground. She bursts out of the corridor, rolls forward, and promptly thons her head against a raised step of gold. The girl with the golden hair grasps her hand, waves Fi around to dislodge the glowing spherical bubble—which shoots off towards the vertical shaft and crashes into the descending silver loftwing's outstretched beak—and then hauls Link feet-first into the golden curtain of the lift.

"Move! Move! Please hurry up and move!" The creature spirals towards them. Link jumps backwards in the lift, flattening her companion against the back, raising Fi up to hold the blade in front of her chest. The loftwing jerks their head inside of the curtain of golden light, their beak glinting silver as they sing——and then the descending lift decapitates them.

Their head drops with a spurt of golden fluid to the floor of the lift. Link peels herself from the girl with the golden hair, observing the silver light die away and the head dissolve into golden dust. The girl with the golden hair sinks to her hands and knees in the lift. Squatting down next to her, Link pats shoulder.

"Oh, I think this is the part where I'm supposed to say that I never want to adventure again," she wheezes. "And I think I'd rather live a normal life after this. Yet, I have to admit, that I would rather run away from a murderous loftwing than sit around praying all day."

"Playing the harp was pretty fun," Link observes.

"With you, it was." She inhales for a long moment, then huffs out her breath. "Oh. I've run out of room on the map. I suppose I'll just keep going on the left-hand side of the page. We've been going nothing but right, you know."

"We've been going right?"

"Oh, well, I just had to pick a direction. I suppose we could have been going left." The girl with the golden hair studies her own map. She hangs her head. "I hope that everyone is all right." Her timbre deepens. "We've been taking a lot longer than I would've liked, and I'm afraid that the Calamitous One could have turned the Divine Beasts against them yet again."

Fi vibrates against Link's palm. Eyes narrowing in alertness, Link's gaze darts back and forth, seeking out whatever danger Fi has sensed, yet Fi's resonance feels...lighter, warmer. She unsheathes Fi and places the blade down on the floor of the lift.

"Are you...trying to reassure her that everyone will be all right?" A beat. Then: two blinks. Link grins at the girl with the golden hair. "That means yes."

The girl with the golden hair's features relax. "Thank you, Fi. That means a lot to me." Fi blinks in and out. The girl with the golden hair studies the pattern. She lowers her eyelids. "I'm sorry, Fi, but I don't know dot-and-dash that well."

Link stares at the girl with the golden hair while Fi vibrates warmly, as if she were trying to tell her companion that not knowing something, too, is all right. Even though the girl with the golden hair understanding Fi's communication would have benefited them both, Link feels nothing but a surge of relief for the girl with the golden hair, too, not comprehending.

"I don't know exactly what Fi's saying." She touches her chin. "But I bet it's something about how resilient people really are. And monsters too. Beings of blood and beings of will. I can't believe that they're—that we're—somehow working together, but if all of us are coming together against the Calamitous One, then there's no way we can fail.

"So let them protect everyone. We've got to focus on getting to the...the thing that I still don't have a name for. The Golden Force.

"Is it something like that, Fi?" Fi does not respond immediately, and Link tilts her head to the side. "Don't worry about probabilities. You can just say yes or no. Nothing everything you say has to be completely right all the time."

A pause. The wall behind Fi shimmers for a few seconds before the lift passes by. And then: two blinks. Link beams broadly. The girl with the golden hair nods. "Then, let's go."

The lift opens up into a long and all-too-warm corridor that yawns in two directions. Link removes her scarlet-stained tunic in the sweltering heat and leaves herself in just her undershirt. One corridor, Link notes, leads to a staircase of crumbling blocks. The other corridor, she realises, leads to a series of columns covered in small globs of living malice.

"You said that you didn't have more room on the right side of your map, right?" The girl with the golden hair nods. "Then let's go left this time." Link looks up and down the corridors that stretch from the lift. "...which way's left?"

The girl with the golden hair points her in the right direction. Link snorts at herself: the left direction.

"Right. Towards the malice. 'Course." As they approach the columns packed with living malice, Link feels the scorching heat radiating from the pit of boiling malice below. Pillars dotted with living malice jut out periodically from the sea of roiling will, each one taller than the last. The girl with the golden hair and Link look at one another. She makes an effort at gauging the distance. "We should be able to leap that, if we're careful," the girl with the golden hair announces before Link has finished her gauging. "Just...please do be careful." Link rolls her shoulders, stretches, and steps up to the edge. The girl with the golden hair taps her shoulder. "Let me go first. Again, if anything happens to me, it's not nearly as vital to the people of Hyrule."

Link lifts her hands to protest, but the girl with the golden hair has already walked back towards the lift. She crouches down—Link sees her wince when the curve of her spine tugs the scars on her back and her abdomen—and breaks into a run. As she nears the edge, she springs forward, clears the pit of malice, and lands neatly on the first column.

The glob of malice starts to ooze towards her. The girl with the golden hair ogles it for a second prior to rearing her leg back and punting the malice into the pit below. Wincing, she grabs onto her boot—presumably partially eaten by its brief contact with the malice—and hops on one foot.

Link horse-whistles for her attention. The girl with the golden hair looks back. "I've got Fi, remember? You need me to chop up that malice!"

Her companion's cheeks redden. "R-right."

Link follows her in leaping the gap. They work their way across, taking their time to jump carefully, over a total of seven columns before Link finds herself kissing solid ground again. Link raises her head and gets a bearing on her surroundings. What she sees lifts her to her boots as though pulled by an unseen force.

"We're saved! We're saved!" Link seizes the girl with the golden hair—having just landed from her seventh leap—by the shoulders and shakes er until her head lolls up and down, then releases her; she stumbles backwards, hands on her head. "Don't you see!? All of our troubles are over! We're saved! Oh, but we're saved! Don't you realise what this means!?

"Link, what are you talking ab—"

Link plummets to her knees, her eyes watering, and throws her arms out. "Finally, I can make food!"

There, in the centre of an otherwise empty chamber, walks a single cucco. A trough of water and a trough of feed line the far side of the wall. The cucco, a comely specimen sporting spotless white feathers and a handsome red comb, struts back and forth, tail feathers raised. Link's stomach rumbles. Her mouth floods with saliva. Crooking her fingers, she approaches the cucco carefully.

"Link, wait." The girl with the golden hair fiddles with the collar of her tunic. "This could be another trial. Doesn't it seem suspicious to you? A strange cucco wandering around in the middle of a dangerous temple. Who would be supplying it with food or water? I can't say that I like this. I think we should abandon it and keep going right."

Link does not need even a second to answer, her gestures swift in her enthusiasm: "I've never been tricked by food!" She pauses. She touches her chin. She considers: the lynel. She considers: Glepp's banana in the woods. "I've rarely been tricked by food! And right now, that cucco could trick me if the Goddesses wanted, but I'm hungry!"

"Link, wait!"

She rolls forward towards the cucco. The cucco squawks shrilly and makes a break for it, but Link catches the cucco with both hands. The cucco tries to pecks her face and hands; she simply giggles at the cucco's antics.

She ponders what to make. Pilaf, though she has no carrots; or possibly she could cook the cucco whole, roast cucco right in the flames like she did the ostrich in Eldin; or perhaps a zappy-bird with the mushrooms that Riju gave her in the ice-box; or maybe rice-balls, which she has not had in months.

Link tucks the struggling cucco under her arm. Most of the ingredients that Riju gave her would cause a slowing of the nerves. She cannot afford that, not here, not now. But she can bring the cucco with her for when the fighting at last ends. "Let's go. To the right."

The girl with the golden hair rubs her eyes. "You're just taking it with you?"

Link grins. "Sure! Don't you know it's dangerous to go alone?"

"Pray tell, what do you intend to do with a cucco?"

Winking, Link pats the cucco's comb. "It's a secret to everybody!" At her companion's unamused expression, she scuffs her boot against the floor. "Just gonna make some food later. You don't have to be jealous or anything. You're still my top priority, my Knight."

"Well excuse me, Princess, for being suspicious." The girl with the golden hair rubs her temples. "What if...oh, I know I can't dissuade you. Just don't let it interfere with your jumps."

On the way back, with each column now lower than the first, the girl with the golden hair takes the paraglider and safely glides from one to the next. When the girl with the golden hair fusses about how to best throw the paraglider back to Link, Link merely holds up her faithful white cucco ad steps off the column. The cucco's frantic flapping emulates a paraglider.

The girl with the golden hair ogles her. "What? You can use cucco to glide?"

Link bobs her head furiously until her ponytail comes undone and she has to reach back to re-tie it. "Ilia and I used to do it all the time when we were kids growing up in Ordon. Bremen used to yell at us for taking cucco like that." She fiddles with one of her sidelocks. "You've never gone cucco gliding before?" The girl with the golden hair shakes her head. "Then when we get out of here together, I'll have to show you."

"If," she responds quietly, her features suddenly set as though carved in stone. "If."

"When," Link corrects. "Now come on."

They return to the lift with the intention of proceeding to the right, but the golden curtain surrounds them again. The lift descends down further into the bowels of the keep. Beaming at the girl with the golden hair and holding the now-calming cucco in her hands, Link waggles her eyebrows as Urbosa would do.

"That cucco did not activate the lift again. Don't be silly." Yet she can see the faint smile ghosting over her companion's lips. "Or maybe it did. The Goddesses have made this place specifically to mess with me." She covers her bemused smile with her hand; Link regrets her lack of pictobox. "Fine. Do you want to go left again, since that worked out so well?"

She and Link go left. Another corridor with four pillars: one for each of the Goddesses, and a loftwing at the end. Link easily dispatches the pool of living malice on the floor. The crimson loftwing that awaits them proves slightly more unruly, especially after their presence frightens the cucco. The same cucco attacks the loftwing out of nowhere, clawing out out their eyes. Link and the girl with the golden hair take the opportunity at the same time, the former cleaving through their neck, the latter cracking their skull with the cooking pot.

"See? Already done us a favour. Haven't you? Good future dinner. Gooood future dinner." Link croons over the cucco and pats it on the head. "I'll make you into the tastiest meal ever for everything you've done. Promise."

The girl with the golden hair claps her palm over her face.

Onwards they go, past the fourth pillar, to yet another confining passageway that they squat and crabwalk through. A sudden series of fractured blocks on the floor slows their progress: Link has to dig through each one with Fi, while the girl with the golden hair wards off darting whatever-they-are with the cooking pot and the pot lid. Link counts: one, two, three, four, five, six, seven—she blinks when the blocks do not stop at seven—eight, nine—she blinks twice when the blocks do not stop at nine—ten, eleven, and suddenly the ground beneath her boots no longer exists.

Yelling out her name, the girl with the golden hair lunges to snag Link around the middle. Link hears her dig her knees into the edge of the golden floor, yet the fabric of her trousers slips. Abruptly Link—the girl with the golden hair's arms wrapped around her waist and the cucco trapped under her left arm—plummets towards the abyss.

Sheathing Fi, Link grasps the cucco and wields it over their heads. The cucco's wings catch wind. Instead of dropping like stones, they drop like slightly less aerodynamic stones. The girl with the golden hair buries her face into Link's spine.

They glide downwards through a lengthy vertical shaft glowing fire-light blue. The vertical shaft is very, very long. And Link's arms are very, very tired.

At some point, the girl with the golden hair suggests that she take over holding the cucco. After several heart-pounding seconds of passing the cucco from girl to girl, Link merely focuses her efforts on hugging her companion like a vertical hammock.

When they land at last on golden floor, Link does not remember how to walk anymore. Instead she lies there on the ground, face flat against the gold, limbs sprawled, feeling the needle-static in her muscle and the cuccoflesh spread over her skin, trying to come to terms with no longer floating down.

The girl with the golden hair, who has held the cucco for Goddesses know how long, stretches her arms and kneels down beside Link. Her companion strokes Link's hair. "Well. I think that that took us probably nearly all the way down. I can't imagine that it'll be much further. Nor can I ever begin to estimate how far we have fallen."

Link shrugs. She tries to pick herself up from the ground, yet noodles back down like a limp pile of soggy bread. The girl with the golden hair wobbles to her own boots.

"Take my hand, Link. We don't have much more to go. I can feel it in my...well, I don't know if I can call them bones anymore, as I'm not entirely certain that, when I've reformed myself repeatedly from my own will, I've accurately replicated the material and layout of bone." The girl with the golden hair lifts her hand to her mouth and giggles at herself. "But I sound a little bit too much like Fi when I say it that, don't I? No offence to you, Fi. I appreciate your dedication and precision."

Fi hums on Link's back. Link rubs her face against the floor. She listens to the girl with the golden hair scuff her boot against the tessellated triangles of the ground.

When Link emerges from the keep, she never wishes to see another triangle again, except in the context of Faronese baklava, or maybe those spinach-stuffed pastries from southern Hebra, or perhaps those twisted soft breads that Vish and Malon have baked for her at Romani Ranch.

"Link...I promise that when we reach the end, before we touch the Golden Force, I'll let you cook something for us. How's that for motivation?"

Link weakly slides her palm against her companion's. The girl with the golden hair intertwines her fingers between Link's. She does not yank Link up but rather waits patiently. Link takes a deep breath, then forces herself to stand.

She almost falls over. The girl with the golden hair thrusts the cucco into her arms. The poor fowl has gone afoul, falling asleep from the exhaustion of having kept its wings spread for the duration of their fall. The girl with the golden hair pets the cucco on the comb. "Left or right?"

The apparently arbitrary corridor that the girl with the golden hair designates left reveals nothing but a few pillars of fractured blocks that Link digs through to a dead end. The girl with the golden hair claps her palm with her fist. "Left or right?"

Another cramped squeeze of a passageway leads Link to ready Fi in front of her chest for the inevitable loftwing or armoured loftwing or strange glowing thing floating through the air that might attack them when she and the girl with the golden hair emerge. Yet, as Link comes to the end of the thin corridor, she sees nothing at all beyond save for a gust of hot air in her face and what looks like another narrow walkway of disintegrating golden blocks. Link shrugs and steps forward into the open chamber.
Fi vibrates; a flash of violent violet at the upper rim of her vision just barely gives Link enough time to stab Fi upwards before the enormous glob of malice drools from the ceiling like the blood of the heavens. The cucco drops from under her arm. The blue fire-light of the sword that seals the darkness radiates outwards as would the silver arrow of the armoured loftwings, shimmering a pulse of blue in the heart of the living malice. For one moment that spans nothing and everything at once, the malice glitters in the aether, an iridescent dome of amethyst ablaze with an inner core of gleaming blue diamond, the cucco hanging just beside her knee.

Then, as if from nowhere, violent violet lightning the same colour as the sash that Marin once wore around her sash strikes the blade.

Fi sings, and sings, and then the violet pulses out so bright that for a second Link's entire vision whites. The malice vanishes into golden dust while the cucco pomfs against the floor, squawking in terror.

Link stares at Fi. Setting her onto the ground, Link gestures wildly at her while she glows with something Link might call pride. "I didn't know you could do that! I mean, I saw you do that back during the congregation at Ruto, but I thought that was just for show! I didn't realise that you could actually use that! That's...that was amazing!"

"I wonder," breathes the girl with the golden hair as she gazes up at the ceiling in wonder and fear alike, picking up the frightened cucco from the floor and patting its comb, "if the Calamitous One takes the malice from this temple instead of making its own. The Calamitous One was once a being of blood, right? Then I don't know if it could produce will this concentrated."

"What do you mean?"

Her companion brushes her fingers against her throat in search of the absent golden charm. "Oh, I don't know what I mean. It's a little too much for me to think about. But maybe you could more accurately call Fi the sword that seals the will. The blade of will's bane." The girl with the golden hair taps her fingers against one another. "Of course, that doesn't sound nearly as cool."

Link nudges her in the side. "I've got no idea what you're talking about, but you'll have to tell me all about it later. I missed you so much."

"We keep saying that to each other." The girl with the golden hair seems to smile despite herself. "Let's hope that we don't keep missing each other in life, then."

"Let's go on, then." Link walks further down the corridor, then pauses and looks back. "Say, do you know what that was? You know, the purple light thing? It's happened before, with the lightning."

The girl with the golden hair claps her hands in glee. "I thought you'd never ask! Let's see. According to my research," begins the girl with the golden hair. Link instantly turns towards her; she squats down, sets her elbows on her knees, and props her chin up in her hands. The girl with the golden hair peers at her. "What are you doing?"

"This is my listening pose."

The girl with the golden hair giggles; Link counts that as her second victory. She launches in with her usual full fervor: "According to my research, when the wielder of the Master Sword is at their full strength, they are capable of expelling a burst of sacred energy from the blade, much like you did."

Suddenly, the girl with the golden hair erupts in laughter, her peals of mirth so loud in her boar-like snorting that the calmed cucco in her arms writhes and threatens to fly away again. Link retrieves Fi from the ground. The girl with the golden hair tries to resume speaking, yet her own laughter continuously interrupts her; her words jumble into chaos.

Despite herself, Link feels her own mirth bubbling up from her belly. Not a moment later she joins the girl with the golden hair in laughter until her mouth aches and her stomach hurts. Link lets herself fall onto the floor to continue her laughter curled up on the ground. To her surprise, the girl with the golden hair clammers down on the floor on Link's right side, curving her knees up to her chest, facing her, reaching out for Link's hand.

Like she reached for Link's hand on the pillows all those years ago, on the night after they played their instruments together.

"Oh, I know what you want to ask," she whispers, a mischievous glint to her eyes. "I was laughing because, well, expelling the energy takes a tremendous amount of strength and vitality. So the cucco—hehe—must've gotten you into such high spirits that you could even—ahaha—perform the skyward strike." Shaking her head, she giggles again, her shoulder shaking in silent laughter. "Oh, Link, you've changed so much, but despite everything, it's still you."

The girl with the golden hair's fingers curl into the valleys between Link's; her fingertips softly brush against the skin of Link's palm. Her laughter fades to a warm smile, to an affectionate gaze, to glistening irises.

They lie there together upon the floor in comfortable silence until Fi vibrates and the cucco crows directly in Link's ears. The girl with the golden hair snorts. She grips Link's hand more tightly. Together they rise from the ground. Though Link finds a crink in her neck from having lain on the floor for a while, she would lie back down right this second if it meant she could simply exist in a peaceful quiet beside the girl with the golden hair. But the wilds, too, call her name.

Link and the girl with the golden hair proceed forward towards the pit of malice beyond, the rail-thin walkway extending over the boiling violent violet.

"Is it just me, or is the...the music getting a bit loud here? I can't tell where it's coming from. It sounds like it's coming from all the walls at the same time. Maybe it's a little louder near the ground?" Link nods; the song has gone from a faint hum that she can barely make out to a persistent melody, almost loud enough that the song starts to overpower her companion's normal volume of speech. "I hope that means we're going the right way." Link watches the girl with the golden hair's throat bob as she gulps down a breath of air. "And not that we're running out of time. So." The girl with the golden hair opens her arms. "I should carry you again, shouldn't I?"

"I can walk, you know."

"The floor disappears as soon as someone touches it. If one of us goes first, then the other one will be stuck forever." The girl with the golden hair taps her right shoulder in emulation of Link's, where the loftwing's beak gouged out her meat. "And I'm in better shape to be carrying you than you are to be carrying me."

Link allows the girl with the golden hair to scoop her up; she wraps her arms around her companion's shoulders and traps the sleeping-again cucco between their chests. The girl with the golden hair tenses herself. She breathes, and then she sprints. Link closes her eyes. She senses the girl with the golden hair's heart thudding against her side, feels the frantic inflating and deflating of her lungs, hears the resonance of the walls around them growing in volume he further the girl with the golden hair runs.
And then the music starts to ebb. "Wait—!" The girl with the golden hair stumbles backwards until she stands where the music plays most loudly. Link snaps her eyes open.

She feels them dropping. The girl with the golden hair snatches the cucco with her left hand as she continues to hold Link with her right. "Link—the paraglider—!"

Link grasps the paraglider on her back. The second that she forces the wooden supports apart, she lands with a hard thud against solid ground. The tremor courses up the base of her spine and rattles her skull alongside the roar of the music that vibrates strongly enough to shake the floor. Her ears ache. When her vision focuses, she glances hastily around her: the girl with the golden hair similarly sprawls out on the floor beside her. She holds up a trembling thumbs-up to Link.

Shaking off the pain, Link looks up. A vertical shaft extends above her, apparently parting the sea of malice in exactly the middle of the walkway. The girl with the golden hair must have seen the tunnel beneath the walkway as they crossed. Or heard the music's cue.

Link snaps her head back and forth: to one side of the long corridor that extends in both directions, she witnesses more of those crumbling blocks; to the other side, she notes the hall opening into a circular chamber circumscribed by columns depicting the Goddesses and Their attributes alongside red-jewelled loftwing statues. In the heart of the circle of pillars, she can just barely make out a strange fire-light blue something. A pedestal of sorts. Not a terminal like in the shrines or the Divine Beasts, but a triangular pedestal whose central triangle erupts from the ground to form an altar of some kind. She parts her lips; the aether tastes of electricity.

When she looks at the floor between herself and the girl with the golden hair, she discovers that the cucco has not survived the short journey down. Perhaps by the snapping of its neck, or perhaps by an attack of the heart from surprise, the cucco lies still and warm against the gold. The girl with the golden hair murmurs a brief eulogy and a prayer. Link sets down her cooking pot.

"...Link..."

"We can't let it go to waste. I promised I'd make it into a meal." Link thumbs behind her. "And I think that we're about to run into something big. Can't you feel the crackle in the air?"

The girl with the golden hair looks past Link towards the blue altar. She breathes out. "Oh, all right. I think you're right about the something big. Just...try to hurry, please."

Link beams. "I won't let you down."

"And I have to admit that..." The girl with the golden hair clears her throat. "...I find it hard to say no to your cooking." Link's grin extends so far it nearly splits her face in half. She hugs the girl with the golden hair, who giggles against Link's cheek. "How can I help?"

Flipping out her knife, Link swiftly defeathers the still-warm cucco as the girl with the golden hair sorts through the wooden boxes of elixirs that Link has with her, removing all of the empty vials and replacing the full ones into the silver box Link obtained in Ruto.

They use the wooden box in place of firewood to heat up the pot. Lacking dried seaweed, Link opts make the rice-balls on flavoured rather than plain rice. Link skins the cucco and removes its bones, then folds both into a cloth. She adds in onion, peppercorn, rosemary, bay, and the few celery tops that she has remaining in her box of ingredients, then ties off the cloth bag. Link prepares a broth on the water from her water-skin, dipping in the cloth bag of cucco and herb, as well as almost the last of the salt, Eldic seasonings, and Parapan spices. Once the broth has simmered, she removes the cloth bag and leaving behind the thick flavoured stock. The girl with the golden hair helps her scoop the broth into empty vials before moving on to the rice.

The girl with the golden hair melts fatty-yellow sand seal butter courtesy of Riju, then mixes in rice from Link's own personal stock. From Riju's ice-box, Link chops up electric safflina, saffron, and garlic to flavour the sautéing rice.

She pours in a vial of the broth while the girl with the golden hair stirs and blends. More and more vials of broth, until Link—using Fi as a makeshift spoon to draw out small bits of the rice, to the girl with the golden hair's simultaneous dismay and amusement, or dismaymusement, a word that she'll have to save for Romani—determines that the rice has attained the perfect texture: slightly chewy and resistant, but also soft and pliant.

Link removes her tunic; it'll serve as a plate. As she regards the fabric—the blue having nearly entirely darkened to a deep crimson, as if she had exchanged tunics—she changes plans, instead relying the top of the metal ingredients box. Lifting the cooking pot from the fire, Link requests that the girl with the golden hair grate a small slice of cow milk cheese that Malon and Vish gave her and blend it into the still-hot rice alongside salt—probably a little too much, yet both she and the girl with the golden hair having a liking for salt—and two sand sparrow eggs from Riju's ice-box. Link overturns the cooking pot onto the silver elixir box, forming a mound of rice.

Next: the meat. Again, the girl with the golden hair butters the bottom of the cooking pot. Together, they tear up or cut the cucco into the smallest pieces possible, discarding the drier breast in favour of the juicer thighs and wings. Link demonstrates how to fillet voltfin trout from Riju's ice-box, removing the bloodlines with a fluid motion of the knife, then cubing the fish into tiny squishy pieces to whisk with the cucco. The girl with the golden hair's filets do not come out as perfectly. Crooked, and a bit dented, but just as delicious.

Link mixes in more of the grated cow milk cheese alongside the succulent meat of prickly-pear voltfruit, bay leaves, grated zapshroom that leaves her fingertips tingling, chopped tomatoes, and more salt. Never enough salt.

When the cucco and trout have browned it out, Link removes the cooking pot from the heat. She douses the fire of the wooden box that once contained her elixirs, now a misshapen charred blob. Link pats the box. "Thank you for your sacrifice, my friend."

Link shows the girl with the golden hair show the formation of the rice-balls themselves. Just as she taught Sidon, she teaches the girl with the golden hair how to mould the semi-spherical base, depress an indent to the centre, pack in the filling, then cover the indent with the cap and smooth the rice together until the outer layer forms a perfect coating. The broth helps make the rice stickier, so that the halves of each coating more easily form a single ball.

While the girl with the golden hair takes care in sculpting almost perfectly spherical rice-balls, scraping off individual grains of rice as best she can, Link sets the wooden box of elixirs on fire yet again. Crumbling the crust of her last bit of bread, she whisks the crumbs together with sand sparrow eggs and ground flour.

Link sets sand seal butter to frying in the cooking pot. As the girl with the golden hair dips each of the almost-perfect rice-balls into the bread-egg-flour dip, she hands the rice-ball to Link, who tosses it into the pot. The rice-balls gild into a hue as golden as the keep around them. Link fwips up the still-hot rice-balls from the cooking pot and juggles them until each one has attained a deliciously golden outer shell, like a locket hiding a most exquisite secret within. In the end she juggles seven rice-balls at once, which proves one too many. The rice-balls fly out of her hands to plop down onto the floor. Link apologises for deforming the rice-balls that the girl with the golden hair spent so long circling to perfection, but the girl with the golden hair shakes her
If there's one thing I've learned over the last hundred years, it's that the taste's more important than the sight." The girl with the golden hair's features soften as she helps Link gather up the runaway rice-balls. "Thank you for letting me cook with you."

"Thank you for cooking with me! See? You can help with more than just crimping." Link taps the girl with the golden hair's temple just to the side of her left eye. "You've got an attention to detail that I don't. Together, we can make something amazing."

"Oh, I guess I do think a lot about the science of cooking..." The girl with the golden hair looks away, a soft smile just crinkling her eyes. "...though I always have more to learn, of course. At any rate, thank you." The girl with the golden hair beams. "All right. Let's dig in!" She reaches for a rice-ball, but Link grips her hand.

"We can't."

"...what? But we just—"

"No, really, we can't." Link gestures to the rice-balls. "They have enough shock-resistant things in them that they'll mess with our movement. It makes you slow and sluggish." The girl with the golden hair's mouth drops open into a circle. "I just wanted them prepared so that we can eat them immediately after we do whatever we have to do over there."

The girl with the golden hair's expression falls, her shoulders sloping downwards, her lower lip protruding out. Affecting the tone of sulking child, the girl with the golden hair mutters out an all right.

Link arches an eyebrow. "You like my cooking that much?"

"It's good!" she cries out defensively, folding her arms over her chest. After a moment, she drops her hands to her sides. "It really is good. That's another thing I've learned. To be honest when I like something, and not try to keep up such proper appearances." The girl with the golden hair rests her hand against her cheek. "I don't mean to sing my own praises."

"It makes me happy that you've figured out so much about yourself," Link answers, the words on her fingers sincere as those in her heart. "And that's something that I've learned. To say what I feel, and not just hope others read my mind." The girl with the golden hair touches her hand to her cheek.

Link stuffs the rice-balls into her satchel. She lifts herself from the ground and regards the girl with the golden hair. "Shall we, my Knight?" She extends her left hand. The lightning-strike hand.

The girl with the golden hair's eyebrows slope downwards. She grips Link's hand with a vice that whispers don't let go. "We shall, Princess."

The song that plays all around them, that swells up like Fi's vibrations on her back, that crests to a single peak and then dies to silence. Silence, and then a sound of feathers.

A sound of feathers that brings both of them to gaze up at the being hovering nearly noiselessly overhead. A great crimson mass of too many wings, a transient halo of sparkling lightning curled around their top half where their head should be, a featureless void of red scooped out as someone had torn their face from their head and left nothing but a pulsating ooze of meat and a gaping abyssal void of something approaching a maw, like a twisted scarlet version of a statue of the Goddess Hylia with Her wings behind Her back, larger than any monster that Link has ever seen, larger than the hinox, larger than the dragons, a moving mountain of feather and flesh beating their wings. The vibration of their feathers through the aether resonates with a familiar hum.

The silence gives way to song. The song. The being sings the song that they have heard humming through the walls and the floor and the sharply-angled ceiling of the keep.

The being beats their wings, long and low. They sing, and Fi translates. Letting go of the girl with the golden hair's hand, Link unsheathes Fi and places her between herself and the girl with the golden hair. Never once does Link lose sight of the being hovering before them, but neither does she lose sight of the girl with the golden hair in the periphery of her vision.

The being beats, and beats, and beats, and waits for Link to move Fi towards the girl with the golden hair. Only then does the being sing again. Like a massive crimson loftwing. Like some massive amalgam of crimson loftwings conjoined into a single quivering being of blood and will alike.

Fi resonates. For a long moment, Link can hear no words at all in the hum. For a long moment, Link can hear nothing but the beating of the wings and the humming of the blade. And then the being speaks.

"To you who have come in search of the Golden Force: have power, have wisdom, and have courage."

Fi resonates very suddenly against Link's palm. Link grasps her in both hands; the girl with the golden hair brandishes the wooden pot lid in front of her; and the giant loftwing-like amalgam spreads wide their scarlet wings, their feathers bursting out in alternations of fire and ice, their entire form sparkling in an electricity that courses golden over their flesh. As the amalgam starts to flap their wings with a greater strength than before, their feathers sharpen and glint. Like the scales of the dragons, like arrows tipped in ruby and in sapphire, the feathers loose from their form to hurtle towards the ground. Fire and ice.

A sharpness of pain in her left shoulder nearly leaves her to drop Fi. Link keeps firm as she glances left: one of the flaming feathers has bit into her flesh. The roiling fire would set her tunic ablaze if not for its dampness with her own blood. Link grins. She looks up at the amalgam.

Though she cannot sign with Fi occupying her hands, she prays that the amalgam can read her thoughts. That even here, the most powerful of wills cannot lose to her own blood.

The beat of their wings whirlwinds aether at the altar. Link rolls to the left and escapes the dervish. She hears the girl with the golden hair let out a yell. The amalgam sings so loudly that the song drowns out the sound of the girl with the golden hair, so loudly that Link's ears ache, so loudly that the headache threatens to split her skull in half. While the amalgam approaches with the lower half of their feathered form, a thousand tiny wings beating below and around the two giant wings that span nearly the entire width of the circular chamber, Link tenses herself down like one of the guardian's springs, Fi held nearly flat against her chest. The moment that the amalgam reaches their nadir Link springs and thrusts Fi up.

The Master Sword looks so comically small in comparison to the sheer size of the amalgam, as though Link were attempting to thrust a needle into the whole of Mount Nayru, into Mount Blizzeta, into Death Mountain, and hoping that that tiny needle could somehow bring the summit to crumble. Yet the sword that seals the darkness glows fire-light blue. Link senses the surge of will that thrums through her limbs, that electrifies her blood, that sings her own soul skyward. Link raises Fi to the heavens. Lightning strikes the blade. The fire-light blue brightens and blooms to the violet of the most concentrated power of will.

As the crimson amalgam showers her with a flurry of feathers in flame and frost, Fi unleashes the force.

The violet pulsation radiates outwards from the blade. The lightning crests outwards into a sphere that reflects away the feathers which cascade into dust of red and blue, a whirlwind of the colours of the Goddess Nayru and the Goddess Din swirling around her. In that moment, the ruby and sapphire lights glint in the air, mirroring her face, mirroring the violet of the blade of evil's bane, mirroring the skyward strike. In the next, the violet pulse reaches the amalgam——and the lightning emanating from the amalgam reflects the skyward strike back at Link in a shower of purple that presses the pain over every fibre of her flesh.

Like the dual-pronged topaz arrow of the lynel, but worse, worse. She does not remember hitting the floor but she must have at some point, because now she writhes and convulses against the gold, the tessellated triangles digging into her cheeks, her moist tunic riding against her own flesh, Fi’s own energy feeling as if the Hilted Singer had taken hold of Link's skin with a thousand hands, raked into her flesh with a thousand fingers, and forced her meat into a thousand directions, her muscle and skin shredded apart like pulled cucco meat, patches of her flesh burning in heat and patches of her flesh numbed to deadened cold, her blood soaking her tunic, every single nerve in her entire body screaming with agony all at once that her mind goes blank and she feels nothing, sees nothing, hears nothing, smells nothing, tastes nothing, is nothing.

Except for a vice around her wrist. Except for a sensation of dragging at her back. Except for the girl with the golden hair hauling her to safety from the amalgam. Except for the girl with the golden hair gathering Link into her arms. Except for the girl with the golden hair hiding in the narrow passageway while Link rides out the last of her spasms and convulsions.

She senses but cannot stop herself from kicking and slapping at the girl with the golden hair until the lightning relinquishes its hold. As her vision unblurs and focuses, Link realises that the girl with the golden hair is speaking to her.

Her fingers twitch from electricity. Still Link curves them by force into the shape of words: “I can't hear what you're saying. That thing's song is too loud. It's like it's right in my head.”

The girl with the golden hair flexes her own fingers. Link sits up. Her companion inhales a breath, and then she starts to sign. The gestures do not flow quite right. Link does not recognise some of the words. Her companion stutters, and stops, and then forces herself to start again, but she signs nonetheless. "I don't think that we can hurt the guardian, not like it is right now. If not even the skyward strike can hurt it, what chance do we have?"

Link touches her chin. A stray bolt of static drums her fingers involuntarily against her jaw. "Maybe we just have to wear it down, somehow. I could use up my arrows against it."

The girl with the golden hair grimaces. Link draws out Amali's bow. Carefully, she creeps towards the end of the passageway. She observes that the amalgam has once more returned to hovering at the ceiling of the circular chamber. Notching an arrow, Link pulls back the string, aims carefully for the amalgam nearly noiseless overhead, and looses.

The topaz arrow flies straight and true, only for the lightning to repel it down into the ground. Link tries an arrow of ruby, and then an arrow of sapphire, and then one of the shoddy wooden arrows that she herself carved out of a tree, which curve to the side and scarcely fly straight.

"I don't think this is working," the girl with the golden hair signs, and Link sadly puts the bow away. "Yet if not even Fi can hurt it, I don't understand what we would have to use. Something...something doesn't make any sense here. Was there something else in the temple that we missed? Should we go back and carefully scour every centimetre? In all of the ancient legends about the heroes, the evil masters of the dungeons would hide away an artifact that the heroes could use against them. I know that's silly, because why would you put the artifact you're weak to in your own dungeon, and I don't know how true the stories are. But this place was designed by the Goddesses! So, maybe..."

Link shakes her head. "Think about how big this place is. It's very, very vast, and we're very, very small. And we've nearly got ourselves killed already more times than I ever want to remember. What if we missed one of the jumps? What if the lifts don't go back up?"

The girl with the golden hair hesitates. "But we are going to get ourselves killed if we just keep hitting our heads against this!" The girl with the golden hair motions violently towards the amalgam. "We can't hurt that guardian. Link, this is not like cooking, where you can keep trying the same recipe over and over until you figure something out. If we—"

Link grabs her hands, her eyes wide, her smile broad. She does not need to hear her companion's words to see her mouthing something about Link not getting any funny ideas.

"We can't hit it because it's covered in electricity. So we just have to do something that'll get rid of its electricity, don't we?" Link pops open the satchel. The girl with the golden hair stares at her as she whips out a rice-ball and cradles it in the palm of her hand. "So let's feed it these."

The girl with the golden hair touches her fingers to her temples. "And how," she signs after trying to speak out loud, "do you intend to feed those rice-balls to the guardian?"

"Well, it's got a face." Link traces a circle around her own features. "Its face is just kind of scooped out. But it's got a mouth at least. So we can just throw these things into its mouth."

The girl with the golden hair shakes Link like she were shaking a cocktail for one of the Lanayrish. Link's head bumps against the wall when her companion lets her go. "Link, please. This really is—"

"Won't you trust me?"

Her companion lowers her hands. Link repeats her words: "Won't you trust me? I know that you haven't been around the past two years. More than two years now, I guess. But I can't tell you how many times cooking saved my life and everyone else's. I actually managed to get the Divine Beast in Ruto to calm down using my cooking pot! And I ended up using food to beat the Malice in the Divine Beast near Nabooru! And the only reason I even got all the way here is because of all of the food that I've made, and all of the meals that I've shared. Do you know how many times I thought to myself that if only I could share a meal with the monsters, maybe we wouldn't have to fight after all?

"And after years and years of fighting against them, it turns out that I was kinda sorta on the right track! So let me give this thing a meal. Please. That's all I ask." Link scoots up to her until their noses touch. "Trust me. Trust me, please. I know that you've trusted me a lot, and I know that that trust hasn't always paid off." She looks down, then back up to meet the girl with the golden hair's gaze. "I'll promise you this. If it doesn't work, then...if it doesn't work, I'll do what you wanted. We'll go through the rest of the whatever-this-place-is in search of whatever secret weapon you think will work against the guardian."

The girl with the golden hair closes her eyes. Link does not dare breathe. Then her companion lifts her eyelids again, and Link can see the determination gleaming in her irises, darker and deeper than the fire-light blue of Fi's blade.

"All right. I will trust you. We will do this like you said." The girl with the golden hair bites her lower lip. "You just want to throw the rice-balls into the guardian's mouth?" Link bobs her head. "I trust you more than I have ever trusted anyone in my entire life, Link. I hope, for the sake of all of Hyrule, that your plan works. It is hope or it is death, and again in my life, I am going to choose hope."

They split the seven rice-balls into two groups of three, tucking one spare into the narrow passageway just in case. With the other six rice-balls, Link and the girl with the golden hair exit the hallway to find the amalgam waiting for them. Now the amalgam gives no preamble; instantly they extend their wings and loose arrow-like feathers towards the ground in patterns that undulate over the floor. The girl with the golden hair seems to recognise the patterns enough to dodge them as they change into spirals, then triangles, then strange snowflake-like shapes for which Link has no name.

Link simply shoves her cooking pot over her head and runs towards the amalgam. She feels the feathers that slam into the cooking char the iron black or chill it over in ice. Lifting the cooking pot-helmet slightly, Link tries to make out the amalgam's gaping vortex of a maw, but the amalgam floats too high above the ground for her to chuck the rice-ball all the way at their mouth.

A sharp pain in her left hand drops drops the cooking pot back over her head with a bonk against her skull. A stray feather of frost has embedded into the membrane between her thumb and forefinger. The dribble of blood freezes from the cold. Link smacks her hand against her hip, knocking off the frost.

Raising the cooking pot again, Link looks around: the statues. She sprints towards one of the statues and squirrels up. Behind her, she senses something tugging at her back. "I'm sorry!" the girl with the golden hair shouts, barely audible above the roar of the song closing in around them. "I'll be borro—!" She snags something free of Link's back while Link continues to scale the statue of the Goddess Farore.

Link slaps the Goddess Farore in the face—apologising mentally—and continues hosting herself up to the top. As she clears the rim, Link finds herself standing on a pillar a single pace in diameter. She balances herself carefully, then lifts her chin.

She observes that the amalgam has turned their attention towards the girl with the golden hair—Link's paraglider, or rather Impa's, strapped to her back—who leaps up and down and whistles at the amalgam. The amalgam swerves in the aether towards her companion. Link rears back her hand as though she were holding one of the slate's explosives and then pitches the rice-ball in an arc towards the amalgam. Unlike the spherical explosive, the rice-ball plummets rapidly. It break against the floor. Link watches the girl with the golden hair dash in zig-zagged lines towards the column on which Link stands.

Cocking her arm again, Link waits for the amalgam to swoop by before chucking the second rice-ball with all of her might. One of their flaming feathers hits the rice-ball. It explodes into a flurry of fire, the rice toasting in the air to spread its delicious scent throughout the chamber. Link inhales deeply. Her mouth floods with saliva; drool strings from the corners of her mouth. She regards the rice-ball in her hand. Still warm. The inside meat and fish calling her name. The crispy-fried outside begging for her to bite through. And the rice, her beloved rice, waiting for her within.
Yet she will resist. This rice-ball holds the key to overcoming the amalgam. This she believes more than anything.

Link draws out her bow. She remembers: the stories that she has heard Kass sing to her, the stories that Riju has told her, the stories that the girl with the golden hair halfway dismissed and halfway believed. The stories spoke of the secret weapon against the Calamitous One. Of arrows of light and arrows of silver. Of magic glowing upon the string of a bow. Of the Knight, or sometimes the Princess, loosing a final blow into a waiting golden eye. But she has her own secret weapon.

She flitches out one of her own arrows. One of the arrows that she has carved from a tree herself and notched with feathers of the pheasant she cooked into a pleasant pilaf.

Link jams the rice-ball onto the arrowhead. She twists and squeezes down to pack the rice-ball tightly as she can. Notching the bow, she yanks back the string, her fingers still despite her body's trembling. She takes aim for the amalgam's mouth. Then she waits for the right moment.

The amalgam beats a whirlwind of aether towards the girl with the golden hair as they chase her companion around the chamber. The girl with the golden hair opens Link's paraglider to catch the wind; though the dervish spirals her dizzyingly around, the aether does carry her upwards into the air. Link ogles: the girl with the golden hair uses the height in lieu of scaling a statue and tries tossing a rice-ball towards that gaping maw. The amalgam blocks the first throw by twisting away their head so that the rice-ball toasts against their electrified halo.

The amalgam's movement reveals patches of bareness. The more feathers that the amalgam has ripped from their own skin, the more the amalgam resembles a throbbing and pulsating mass of flesh hovering in the aether, like a whale skinned down to its meat.

The girl with the golden hair spirals down while the amalgam whips up another dervish. She relies on the updraft of air—Link can see the aether, like the gust from the crimson loftwings, slicing into the girl with the golden hair's flesh in so many tiny cuts which her companion takes head-on in her efforts to near the amalgam—and glides even closer to the amalgam than before. A stray fiery feather that she does not have time to dodge catches the side of her jacket aflame. Link chokes on her own breath. The girl with the golden hair, apparently ignoring the flame that spreads over her torso, hangs onto the wooden supports with her left arm and gears up another rice-ball. Nearer to the maw than before. She pitches the rice-ball towards the amalgam's gaping void and Link prays to the Goddesses that the rice-ball connects.

The amalgam drops in the air. The amalgam drops so rapidly that they plunge towards the ground. As they hit the floor, Link listens to the sickeningly wet squish of the fleshy mound that seeps over the golden floor, as though the crimson amalgam itself had wept into gelatin.

When the amalgam rise up again, Link witnesses how the skin of their bottom half has broken open, like an overstuffed piping bag of pie filling now leaking its contents, or an overripened fruit bleeding its juices. Malice, or blood, or something in-between drains from the gaping wound of their base, theirragged skin undulating like the curtains of fire-light blue in the earlier hallway.

Link stares. If the amalgam would injure themself so to avoid the rice-ball, then her plan must be able to work.

The girl with the golden hair has but a single rice-ball remaining. Link waves to her companion. She lowers the bow to the ground and signs: "Get it over here! I'll get this into its mouth!"

Her companion glances in Link's direction; Link repeats her command. Angling her body, the girl with the golden hair begins to float towards her while the amalgam, shuddering and quivering with the steady exuding of their own bloody malice from their ruined body, follows.

The girl with the golden hair lets herself fall to the floor. Link watches her roll forward, putting out the inferno that has ashen most of her jacket and part of the tunic underneath. The fluid dripping from the wound of the amalgam pools over the altar and spills onto the ground towards the girl with the golden hair. Her companion rushes forward, the third rice-ball still clenched in her grasp, towards Link. Her flailing movements serve to maintain the amalgam's attention.

When the liquid reaches the boots of the girl with the golden hair, even Link can hear her scream over the noise of the amalgam's song. Malice. Just like malice, boiling away, and the girl with the golden hair stuck below. Link watches the rice-ball fall from her spasming hand, watches the girl with the golden hair cry out and pounce to catch it, watches the rice-ball dissolve into the malice, watches the girl with the golden hair abandon the rice-ball, watches the girl with the golden hair throw herself towards the pillar and scream for Link to "take the shot, take the shot!"

Link forces her gaze upwards towards the approaching amalgam. She cannot miss. She will not miss. She tightens up every fibre in her body. She becomes as the stone. No. As the gold around her. As the gold that makes up the keep, the temple, the palace.

She aims. At the amalgam. She lets go. The shaft pierces through the aether. The rice-ball stays on the arrowhead. The pheasant feather trails true.

The arrow sings towards the amalgam, directly into the gaping maw where no electricity courses. Link breathes out with the arrow's journey. A second that hangs with the maelstrom of ruby and sapphire all around, reflecting the violent violet of the malice below—— —and then the golden crimson of the amalgam, the colour of the Dragon Dinraal, flashes the same bluish white as the Dragon Naydra, and for a single second a terrible face curves up out of the maw, beading blank eyes ringed with fire-light blue and violent violet, a long hooked beak shining in silver and shut tightly close, the rice-ball impaling itself on the beak to break itself apart.

In the next second, the amalgam's face has vanished again to nothing but a gaping maw, and Link has sunk slowly to her knees on top of the pillar of the Goddess Farore, and she has looked down at her own hands, at the crescent-moon scar of her right and the lightning-strike scar of her left.

She clenches her fists. Peering down at the floor below, Link seeks the girl with the golden hair somewhere in the sea of malice that has spread almost to the periphery of the circular chamber. They can take shelter in the passageway. They can hunt for whatever they need to defeat the guardian. They can work together. They will not lose hope.

And then she sees her. The girl with the golden hair. Holding aloft the paraglider. Her hands lashed and tied to the wooden supports. The final rice-ball—the seventh—in her mouth. Hope. The hope of Hyrule, contained in a single rice-ball.

The amalgam's song thrums through the air as they flip out their wings, as they summon another gale of aether, as they flurry forward feathers of flame and frost, as the girl with the golden hair stands in the sea of malice with the violent violet eating away at her own feet until the paraglider catches the wind, as the girl with the golden hair sails forward towards the amalgam clenching the rice-ball between her teeth, as the girl with the golden hair passes through the aether that scrapes away her flesh and skins her like the mists of the lost woods, as the girl with the golden hair ignores the fire and the ice that strikes against her chest and arms and legs to leave her skin red-raw and frost-bit and ash-charred, as the girl with the golden hair glides up to the amalgam's own face, as the girl with the golden hair nears closer than ever before, as the girl with the golden hair's limbs spasm from the electricity that lightnings over the pulsating form of the amalgam, as the girl with the golden hair's arms twist and her legs writhe but she keeps herself affixed to the wooden supports by the lashes made out of her own tunic, as the girl with the golden hair crosses through the transient halo of lightning around the crown of the amalgam's head, as the girl with the golden hair—

—glides towards the maw itself, and suddenly Link understands her plan, and Link screams wordlessly out, and Link can do nothing but watch——and the amalgam flashes bluish white, and the rice-ball drops from the girl with the golden hair's mouth into the gullet of the amalgam, and the rice-ball enters the amalgam, and—

—the amalgam crimson gives way to blue—

—the face emerges from the maw—

—beading blank eyes ringed with fire-light blue and violent violet—

—a long hooked beak shining in silver and shut tightly closed——and the girl with the golden hair impales herself on the beak to break herself apart.

That terrible hooked beak pierces through the girl with the golden hair's belly and erupts out of her back. That terrible hooked beak gleams red with the girl with the golden hair's blood. That terrible hooked beak protrudes through the girl with the golden hair's torso like Link's sword would protrude through a pumpkin stuck on the blade.

The girl with the golden hair does not move.

But the face remains, and the amalgam does not revert back to crimson. The electricity that haloes their form dies down from the effects of the rice-ball.

Link closes her fingers around the hilt of the sword that seals the darkness, the blade of evil's bane, the Master Sword. Her expression stone, she lifts Fi skyward. Her muscles stone, she feels the sacred sword resonate in violet. Her heart stone, she brings down all of her pain and all of her grief and all of her blood in a single strike.

The skyward strike wheels lightning through the aether in a single impossibly thin disc of violet. The edge bites into the amalgam's flesh. The wheel does not stop. The skyward strike carves through the amalgam's head. The amalgam's face parts from their body. The beak, and the girl with the golden hair, and the golden eyes clouding over part from their body.

The amalgam hangs in the air like a great crystal of flesh. And then the amalgam, and the sea of malice, and the song that has hummed through the keep, gild into golden dust. Ashes to ashes, dust to dust.

The altar of blue gives way to gold. Something shimmers within, but Link could not look at the gold if she wanted. Her gaze fixes on the girl who has sacrificed herself for her Princess, for her people, for her Hyrule.

The girl with the golden hair—the remains of her body—drift down to the ground. The cloth of the paraglider crumples over her form, like the cloth Link found in the sanctum months ago, a funeral shawl over the dead.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: I replaced the fokkeru with loftwings; the bots with chuchu; the lava with "malice" (concentrated will, which isn't exclusive to Calamity Ganon); the red ra with flying loftwing heads; the fokka (who are motherfokka to deal with in-game) with armoured loftwings in both blue and red varieties (the former capable of using attacks I call 'silver arrows', made of the same fire-light as the guardians' lasers but much more concentrated, the name silver arrow being a nod to The Legend of Zelda for the Famicom/NES); ropes as, well, snakes; and the guardian of the Great Palace with the thunderous being that they fight in the chapter's climax.

Just to let you know how dedicated I was to accurately depicting the Great Palace, in the first room, the fokkeru moves as soon as you pass by the second column; I captured this with the loftwing moving once Link and Zelda passed the Nayru statue. I also did my best to adapt the attacks that the enemies can do: the fokkeru's projectiles are now razor-boomerang wind-like attacks, and the fokkeru's jumping is based on the loftwing's ability to charge forward (the fokka, on the other hand, can perform a spiral charge) in Skyward Sword.

Loftwings in Skyward Sword have golden eyes with blue and purple rings. Since those are the three colours I chose for the Sacred Realm (everything related to it is purple, gold, or blue, the gold being related to the Golden Goddesses while the blue is the colour of the Sacred Realm's energies in general).

Being within the Great Palace prevents Zelda from using the typical concentrated power of will.

Likewise, the loftwings disappearing into puffs of golden dust is what it looks like when enemies perish in The Adventure of Link; they're not 'beings of blood', so they don't leave corpses either way, just cease to exist and revert to energy.

The shimmering part of the wall that Link finds in the lift is a hidden passageway that you can enter in The Adventure of Link. I chose not to go down that way though.

As for the pot lids remember the two times that Zelda "bumped" against Link, and then the other thing that Zelda took from Link's back? The first bump was the loftwing destroying the mirrored pot lid, then Zelda took off the iron pot lid, which was destroyed in the second bump.

In The Adventure of Link, the corridor to the left contains a Link Doll, granting Link one Life; in Delicious in Wilds, I've replaced this with a cucco.

In The Adventure of Link, the guardian of the Great Palace can only be defeated using the spell Thunder. The use of Thunder reveals the guardian's face (turns it from red to blue), allowing the otherwise invulnerable guardian to be damaged. I replaced this with the 'amalgam', which uses electricity to protect itself and its face. Since I established that electric resistance works by disrupting the body's own ability to channel electricity (including through the nervous system). I realised that it was absolutely perfect for me to replace the use of the Thunder spell with food.

The fire and ice motif of its attacks was adapted not only from the fireballs that the guardian of the Great Palace hurls at Link (which can only be dispatched via use of the Reflect spell, which is part of what the skyward strike does in Delicious in Wilds), but also from the use of "fire and ice" theming for bosses throughout the Zelda franchise, such as Twinrova in Ocarina of Time, Oracle of Ages, and Oracle of Seasons and Fraaz in Spirit Tracks.

I mentioned I would get Link to go through green, then blue, then red. Here's her red tunic: reddened by blood.

Oh, Zelda...

Up next: Link makes a meal, yet the meal goes uncrimped. But such a sacrifice will not be in vain.

Beta reader's comments: This chapter is so good! It's so great to spend the longest chapter in the series with Zelda, which lets the author really establish her and her relationship with Link in the present day. It's also super cool to have a super long chapter that's more focused and condensed in terms of time, compared to chapter 64, which was a long chapter spread out over a long period of time.

Zelda's fate at the end of this chapter is brutal and horrifying.

Defeating an important enemy through food is Delicious in Wilds in a nutshell.

Chapter Summary

The guardian of the Golden Goddesses' final trial has mortally wounded the girl with the golden hair. Now the travelling chef makes a decision, receives a key, and goes on alone.

Chapter Notes

As usual, author's notes that did not fit in the end: I technically started writing this chapter at 08:44 on the thirtieth of July, but I didn't seriously begin to write until 11:19 on the twentieth-second of August, and finished writing it at 16:16 on the twenty-second of August.

Thanks a million to each and every one of you. As we reach the very end, I have nothing but gratitude and warmth to everyone who has taken the time to read Delicious in Wilds. I wrote it primarily for myself. My beta reader coaxed me to release it; I haven't participated in anything resembling the Zelda fandom ever in my life, and haven't participated seriously in any kind of fandom since I was very young. Sharing something like this with all of you has been a wonderful experience. So thank you. And thank you to my daring beta reader, Emma, for suggesting I post this, and for being the one to pull me through, time and time again.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Link throws herself off of the pillar of the Goddesses Farore. She lands heavy on all fours, her arms buckling beneath her, her knees cracking against the gold, her palms scraping against the tessellated triangles. She half-runs, half-crawls towards the girl with the golden hair, towards her beloved companion, towards the Knight that has protected her after all of this time.

She does not move the paraglider. She will not look at the ruined body. She cannot look at the ruined body. Rather Link concentrates entirely on the girl with the golden hair's face, on her nose and her mouth and her eyes, on the scars over her cheeks, on the gashes over her brow, on the burns that have spread over her face both of flame and of frost, on the rawness of her flesh that the aether—like the mist of the lost woods—has scraped away from her skin, on the tears that have pooled around her eyes, on her irises that have clouded to white, on her mouth that quivers, on the soft blood and vomit that trickle out from the part of her lips.

The girl with the golden hair trembles. Half of a breath deflates her chest, a breath that almost sounds like Link's name.

Link can barely see for the tears that blur her vision, but she does not need to see to open her satchel, nor to scour for the vial in a spherical shape decorated with a thin handle that resembles a pair of butterfly wings.

She seizes the elixir. The elixir of green, and blue, and red, and violet, and gold. The elixir of the shards of the horns of the Dragons Dinraal, Naydra, and Farore, and the faery dust of the Sacred Realm, and the star fragment that crashed into Mount Nayru on the night of the girl with the

The girl with the golden hair's eyes no longer focus. Yet Link notices her, just barely perceptibly, shake her head from side to side as though begging Link not to use the elixir. Holding up the girl with the golden hair to rest her head in Link's lap, Link forces open the girl with the golden hair's mouth, the elixir heavy in her palm, and tips the vial over.

She pours the opaque pink liquid into the girl with the golden hair's throat. Pink. The hue of hope, for the hope of Hyrule.

The pink elixir mixes with the dark brownish-red of her blood and the greenish-yellow of her vomit. Link closes her companion's mouth and shuts her nose until the girl with the golden hair involuntarily has swallowed down the elixir. Sensing the girl with the golden hair strains around the glob of blood-vomit-elixir in her throat as it threatens to come back up, Link presses her mouth against the girl with the golden hair's. She forces her breath through the girl with the golden hair's lungs. She repeats the process, tipping in the elixir, making the girl with the golden hair swallow, and breathing in for the girl with the golden hair, until she has drained the last of the opaque pink elixir from the vial. The vial clatters to the ground.

When she feels the girl with the golden hair writhe—her organs regrowing in her body, her veins proliferating through the muscles that pulsates over her reforged bones, her skin stitching itself together—Link tears off her undershirt, stuffs it into the girl with the golden hair's mouth and lets the girl with the golden hair grab her hand. The girl with the golden hair grips her hand so hard that Link winces at the pain of her own bones grinding against one another.

But even if the girl with the golden hair were to break her hand, Link could not bring herself to care. In this second the girl with the golden hair comprises her entire world.

The girl with the golden hair breathes in. The girl with the golden hair breathes out. The girl with the golden speaks, Link's undershirt falling out of her mouth to sprawl over her chest: "Link, you...you idiot."

Link blinks at her. The girl with the golden hair pushes the heels of her hands into her eyes. She weeps. The sound of her crying wracks through her body. Link can only gather her into her arms, can only embrace her, can only hold her, can only stroke her the remains of her golden hair, some singed off by the flames of the amalgam's feathers, the rest falling out even as Link runs her fingers through her locks from the frosts that have deadened the base.

Yet the girl with the golden hair lives, the girl's golden hair can grow back. Like Kass's crest, which Link herself saw grow back over the months that they travelled together over the whole of Hyrule, the girl's golden hair, too, can grow back.

Link does not lift the cloth of the paraglider, but after a few moments the girl with the golden hair does. Although Link averts her gaze, she catches a glimpse of the patchwork scar that covers most of her companion's chest and abdomen, the mark left by the crimson loftwing lighter than the rest of the skin that the girl with the golden hair has healed. Link can picture the burns of fire and the burns of ice that run over the girl with the golden hair's form. She can picture the violet whorls over the girl with the golden hair's feet from having stood for so long in the sea of malice. She can picture the girl with the golden hair's body bearing the tapestry of the history of Hyrule, of the final battle, of the ending of the Calamitous One.

"I can't...I can't believe that you wasted that elixir on me." The girl with the golden hair's tears wet her cheeks; she sniffs back the snot on her upper lip. "What if there's another trial? What if something awful happens? What if there's just—what if you die, Link? What if you die?"

"Why would there be another trial?" Link gestures to the golden altar; the something-or-other shimmers atop the highest triangle in the altar's heart. "We did it. You did it. You said that you're protect me all the way to the Golden Force, and you have."

Link glances back down at the girl with the golden hair, who herself now gazes at the altar. "Is that...?"

"I think it is."

The girl with the golden hair cries again. She buries her face into her hands and shudders against Link. "The long war is almost over," she mumbles, voice barely coherent. "Mother. Father. I hope that you'd be proud of me."

"You're the best Knight that I could ask for, and the best Princess that Hyrule could ask for, you know that?" Link squeezes her hand before letting go and continuing. "I mean that. Not just because I know you. It would've been so easy to just magically have those powers and then—" She snaps her fingers. "—just will the Calamitous One away like that. But you didn't have that. And you didn't run away. You stayed with your people, you protected the people and the wilds and all the meals anyone's ever made, and you've hurt more in the past hundred years than I think anyone else has."

"I wouldn't say that..."

Link presses on: "I don't really...get the whole thing about women suffering or whatever. I don't think it's my duty to suffer, and it's not Amali or Ilia or Koko or Cottla or Riju or Cremia or Romani or Malon or anyone else's duty I know, and it's definitely not your duty to suffer. You didn't have magic, but you had your own hands. You figured out all this stuff that no one else ever did!"

"Well, part of that is merely because as a member of the royal family, I have had access to more than anyone else has," the girl with the golden hair offers in qualification.

"But there've been lots and lots of people in the royal family over ten thousand years. Even over the past few hundred years! I dunno when we forgot all the things about the Divine Beasts but there have been lots and lots of people in your position who haven't figured out the stuff that you have." Link shrugs. "I don't know much about the royal family. But I do know about you. These hands aren't just good for praying." She touches the girl with the golden hair's wrists, runs her fingers over her companion's palms, maps out the once-smooth skin now roughened by scars. "They're good for reading, and they're good for researching, and they're good for fighting the Calamitous One for one hundred years, and they're good for going through this whole temple palace thing with me, and they're good for nearly sacrificing yourself to take care of the guardian thingy that's not one of the pew-pew eye guardian but like the kind of guardian that guards something which by the way you shouldn't have done I mean thank you for doing it but you shouldn't have had to sacrifice yourself and I don't want you to put yourself needlessly in harm's way again and I know that you felt like you had to do it for your people but that doesn't mean you have to hurt yourself like that..." Link's wrists ache. "...and they're good for crimping, and they're very good for hugging."

The girl with the golden hair wipes at her eyes. She clothes herself in Link's undershirt, her own jacket and tunic having mangled and torn in the battle. As Link always wears her undershirt loose, the cloth fits the girl with the golden hair as well. She tugs up the collar of the tunic, drying the tears on her cheeks and inhaling the scent of the fabric. "I hope you don't mind me borrowing this."
She hiccoughs.

Link shakes her head and smooths out her own tunic. The blood has mostly dried by now, although the inside of the tunic feels sticky against Link's skin. "It looks like I'm wearing red now. I walked in wearing blue. It's actually been a really long time since I wore anything except blue."

"You wore blue back then, too."

"Only after I drew Fi." Link rubs the back of her head. "Back in Ordon, I was always wearing brown, and green, and colours like that. Same ones I started wearing when I woke up again. Then, when I got through half the Divine Beasts, I got banged up really bad, so I ended up getting a new tunic there. Or, no, wait, actually it was after the Divine Beast in Tantari, wasn't it?" Link nods at herself. "That's right. I got banged up really bad, and I couldn't just stitch and patch up my old tunic. So I ended up getting a blue one there. The same colour as the sky. You remember the Parapan sky, right?" The girl with the golden hair inclines her head. "And then...I kept wearing blue for a while. It's a nice colour. It reminds me of you. You're...the bluest person I know. I think I'm more of a green."

The girl with the golden hair giggles. "Oh, you sound like you're losing it, Link. You're not too injured, are you?"

"I feel fine." Her stomach rumbles. Link rests her hand against her belly and smiles sheepishly. "Almost fine."

"And we don't have any rice-balls left." The girl with the golden hair sits slightly up. She folds up the paraglider. Link observes that the wooden supports have torn, that the struts have buckled, that the paraglider can no longer function. Yet she can mend it. She can repair it. She can heal it anew, as she has healed over and over. "I...I did promise you a meal after we finished, remember? If you want—" Link leans in, eyes wide, head bobbing energetically. "—you can make something before we face the Triforce." She vibrates her entire body up and down. The girl with the golden hair snorts out a laugh. "You look like you're about to wag your tail."

"And speaking of meals!" Link snaps her fingers. She unsheathes Fi, laying her down upon the floor and bowing her head at her old friend. "And Fi, thank you. Thank you for that whatever-it's-called."

"A skyward strike."

"A skyward strike. There's a 100% certainty that I'm grateful to you." That elicits a laugh from the girl with the golden hair and a mild glow from Fi. "Thank you so much, Fi. I wish I could tell you that I'll make you a meal after this. But I hope that you'll be all right with the one meal that I made you." The girl with the golden hair quirks her eyebrows quizzically at Link, who continues to talk to Fi: "I don't think I'll be able to make you any more. I'm sorry. I hope you can forgive me." Two blinks. "Fi...you know what I'm talking about, don't you?" Two blinks. "And you think it's a good idea?" A pause. Then two blinks—a beat—and two more—another beat—and two more still, as if Fi were very much agreeing. "Thank you for being at my side all this time." Link moves to pick Fi up to sheath her again, yet the girl with the golden hair touches her wrist.

"Wait, Fi." The girl with the golden hair scoots forward. "How much energy do you have left? I know you said that you hadn't recharged as much as you want, and...it sounded like Link didn't know how to do a skyward strike before this."

"She did it once before, but it was more pretty than powerful. Other than that, she's only been going all blue sometimes when I've been fighting." Link winces. "I just realised how many monsters I've killed over the years. And they didn't know what they were doing."

"Neither did we. The best we can do is move on and hope that our descendants don't forget that beings of blood and beings of will need no animosity between one another." The girl with the golden hair brushes a hand over Fi's hilt, as though she were moving a lock of hair from a loved one's face. "Fi. Oh, what's a good yes or no question here?" She shuts her eyes. "Fi...do you think that you still have enough power if there's another fight up ahead?" Fi does not respond. Then she blinks five times. "Five?"

"Is that supposed to mean maybe? Both yes and no?" Fi blinks twice. Link grins. "See? I get her. And she gets me. Wait. What does maybe mean?"

"It means," the girl with the golden hair reasons, "that she may or may not have enough power. That means that there's some things that she doesn't know about this. Fi, do you know if there's another challenge ahead?" Three blinks. "There isn't?" No response. The girl with the golden hair tilts her head. "You don't know if there is?" Two blinks. "So there could be one. Two blinks. "But I think you're right, Link." The girl with the golden hair looks up again at the golden shimmer on the altar. "I don't know what else there could be. We've passed the final trial set out by the Goddesses."

Link rolls her shoulders. "If there is one, then we'll deal with it together." She rummages through her satchel, taking another look at Riju's ice-box as well as what she herself has. "We don't have any more meat, and I used up most of my vegetables and herbs on those rice-balls. So I hope you don't mind me making dessert."

"I think," the girl with the golden hair answers softly, "that after all that we've been through, we deserve some dessert as a final send-off, don't you?"

Link dips her head. "I don't think I have enough flour to make an entire egg tart, but how does some egg pudding sound?"

The girl with the golden hair smiles gently. "Can I help?"

Together, Link and the girl with the golden hair set fire to the wooden box of elixirs yet again, or what little remains of it. Link estimates that the wooden box will last no longer than fifteen minutes, if that, and gets to work. The girl with the golden hair announces excitedly that she already knows how to caramelise: "Oh, just leave it to me!" She caramelises the bottom of the cooking sugar with the small pouch of distilled cane sugar that Link has remaining. While the girl with the golden hair spreads the sugar and sets the cooking pot onto the fire, Link repurposes the large vial that once held the opaque pink elixir as a makeshift bowl. She mixes together sand seal milk, sand sparrow eggs, more sugar, and a few droplets of vanilla extract given to her by Amali. Link pours the mixture into the cooking pot; the girl with the golden hair covers the top with the only-very-slightly-singed wooden pot lid.

Link props her chin up in her hand. "Want to play wind-water-fire?"

The girl with the golden hair blinks. "Eh?"

"Wind-water-fire." Link makes the gestures. "While we wait for this to cook and then cool down."

"I haven't played that since I was a child." The girl with the golden hair brings her hands together, stroking her left palm with the thumb of the other hand. "I don't think I'm very good."

"Great! Then we can both be bad together. It'll be fun."

Both of them prove terrible at the game. The girl with the golden hair appears to stick herself into a rotation of various patterns as if more concerned with keeping a perfect symmetry of one-to-one-to-one than actually playing the game, and Link—as always—prefers the gesture that lets her fashion her hands into a bowl to eat or cup to drink. The girl with the golden hair teases Link that she knows that Link will draw next; Link replies mildly that no matter what she chooses, the girl with the golden hair will simply pick the next one in the pattern she has created for herself. The girl with the golden hair blushes. Link waggles her eyebrows.

They transfer the finished egg pudding to the ice-box. While they wait for it to chill, Link plays songs for the girl with the golden hair on the ocarina, showing off how much she has remembered. The prelude to the Goddess Hylia, the minuet to the Goddess Kokir, the bolero to the Goddess Goro-goro, the serenade to the Goddess Zola, the nocturne to the Goddess Sheik which Link reminds her scared her as a child—the girl with the golden hair puffs her cheeks out, and Link giggles—the requiem to the Goddess Sageru, and the aria to the Goddess Erito.

"I remember playing that one for Urbosa," the girl with the golden hair notes, gazing off into a distance somewhere behind Link's shoulder. "She said that I didn't have the rhythm quite right. I asked her if she could show me the right rhythm instead. She laughed and said that she was joking; she told me that she'd only heard the song a few times in her life. It was something about...how in their Temples of the Golden Goddesses, they use the song to...what was it? Mark the passage of every seven years or something like that? Oh, I can't quite remember. It's been a very long time." The girl with the golden hair hums. "Or maybe it was the Temple of Sageru. The one in Nabooru in particular, I think. You should ask for me, when you go back topside."

"When we go back topside," Link tells her, "you can ask for yourself."

"Mm," replies the girl with the golden hair, and she says nothing more.

Link plays other songs. The mountain-song that the Hebric people taught her; the song sung by travellers through the Hyrule Field that she remembered from having passed by time and time again on her courier duties; the song that the musician in Ordon used to play, standing by the river with her instrument case open; Epona's song that Marin taught her; Ilia's whistle that Ilia taught her; the song of the sea that Aryll made up and insisted that her big sister learn and remember; the jaunty tune that Sarie likes to sing; and the song sung by the amalgam.

The girl with the golden hair clears her throat. "I'd rather not listen to that one, if you don't mind."

Link rubs the back of her head. "I think the pudding's done."

The pudding jiggles deliciously. Link pours the last of the honey from the final pot she saved from Romani Ranch over the top and sprinkles a touch of salt. Without spoons, Link and the girl with the golden hair eat from their hands, plucking off small blobs with their fingers to cup in her palms and lick up.

"Throw it in my mouth." The girl with the golden hair peers down at the egg pudding. Link opens her mouth wide and gestures for her companion to attempt tossing it in. The girl with the golden hair carefully aims a small blob of pudding; it lands on Link's chest. A second try hits her eye. The third proves the charm: sweet pudding melts on her tongue, tempered by the salted honey, the mixture of textures and tastes bringing Link to close her eyes until the sweetness and salt ebbs from her tongue. "You should try it yourself, too"

She tosses a bit into the girl with the golden hair's mouth. The girl with the golden hair lifts her hand to her mouth; nonetheless she lets slip a small moan of pleasure from the deliciousness of the dish. Link beams as the girl with the golden hair rolls the pudding over her tongue. "Good, isn't it? You should feel proud. You did most of the work."
The girl with the golden hair touches her palm to her cheek. "I wish I could've made something for you something from scratch. Just by myself."

"But I like cooking with you."

"I like cooking with you too." Leaning over, the companion wipes her thumb over Link's nose; her finger comes away with a dab of honey. "Still, you've made me so many things. I'd like to return the favour." She hesitates. "I would have liked to, I mean."

"Then you will. When we go back up, you will. It's what I told Fi. She said that since she's a being of will, our world isn't hers. But it is, isn't it? Just like the ones that gave us their horns for the elixir. They've made it their home. So Fi can too. And so can you, even if you're a being of will now, or however you said that." Link shrugs. "I'm not smart enough to know all this stuff! But I believe. And that's enough."

"I...hope that it is enough, then." The girl with the golden hair looks up at the altar. "So. That's the last of the egg pudding." Link nods. She has just begun to clean up when the girl with the golden hair speaks again. "Oh, Link, before you go. I don't know what we'll see on the other side, so I want to say this now. Thank you."

Link cocks her head.

The girl with the golden hair digs her fingers into the collar of her own tunic. "Thank you for being the reason that any of this happened. For giving me back my hope all those years ago."

She cocks her head still further until she feels like her neck will break.

"Oh, you don't have to be so modest." The girl with the golden hair reaches out her right hand to brush her thumb over the scar under Link's left eye. "Wait...you're being serious. You don't remember, do you?" Link shakes her head. The girl with the golden hair's eyebrows angle downwards, her frown wrinkling her brow, and Link wants nothing more than to find what to say to cheer her up again.

"I'm sorry. There's a lot that I've forgotten. But I promise I haven't forgotten you! Look at all the things I remember. I remember us baking pumpkin pie, and apple pie, and carrot cake, and egg tart, and—" Link rattles off everything that she remembers making alongside the girl with the golden hair. "...but there's a lot that I've forgotten too. It's really silly, actually, but..." Link taps her index fingers against one another as Yunobo might. The girl with the golden hair arches an eyebrow.

"I don't actually remember your name."

"And don't want me to tell you..." The girl with the golden hair inclines her head.

"Even if I don't remember, I do remember you. The good and the bad. I remember how badly you treated me at first." The girl with the golden hair winces. "And I remember how close we became later." Her expression softens. "I'm glad I met you."

"I'm glad I met you, too." The girl with the golden hair hesitates. "Do you want to hear what I was going to say about the Great Calamity, or do you want to try to remember that, too?"

Link swings her head from side to side. "You can tell me." She emulates putting her hands onto the manuals of an imaginary accordion. "Without further ado...!"

The girl with the golden hair lowers her eyelids, her lashes brushing against the curves of her cheeks. "I thought that everything was lost. You're the one who...who just picked me up and started carrying me. Oh, I asked you what you were doing. You put me down for a second, I think. It was right before we left those woods near Fort Hateno. You told me that you wanted to try the plan with the mirror. Even if the plan failed...at least it would be something to try, and we wouldn't lose anything. I..." The girl with the golden hair sucks in a breath. "...I remember telling you that no one believed me about my research. Everything about the Sacred Realm, everything about the mirrors, everything about this magical Triforce that could grant anyone's wishes. But is that really stranger than the idea that Hylia—the Goddess—could reincarnate into a person?"

Link begins to reassure her, but the girl with the golden hair folds Link's fingers into her palms.

"You told me that you'd listened to everything I'd ever explained to you. You told that you didn't really get all of it, yet you believed that I knew what I was talking about. And not merely because I used large words that you didn't understand, but because the things that I said made sense to you. Or at least made more sense than some of the things that you'd heard about the Goddess Hylia.

"Oh, I don't remember exactly what you said, and I wish that I did. I'm afraid that one hundred years is a very, very long time.

"You said that even if I didn't believe in myself, that I should listen to my own words. Hope or death, I had said. I choose hope, I had said. You told me that that gave you hope, and now you'd give that hope back to me. You said that you couldn't carry my destiny or my research or my smarts—I don't think I'm smarter than you, or clever, and certainly not wiser, simply more educated—but that you could carry me."

The girl with the golden hair smiles warmly at Link, her eyes crinkling, her lashes wettening. Link rubs the back of her head; the girl with the golden hair brushes her palm over the back of Link's free hand. The touch trails warmth on Link's knuckles.

"It was the most I've ever heard you speak in one moment, actually. That's how I knew you were being honest. That this meant so much to you, that...oh, well, not to imply that when you don't talk I distrust you, or that that means you don't care! Foot in mouth, foot in mouth. I meant that since you did talk, it..." She makes a vague gesture with her hand, then hangs her head. "Oh, I hope you know what I mean."

"I think I do." Pausing, Link glances at the cooking pot. "Also, if you're so hungry that you'd put your foot in your mouth, I can just make another meal for you. Why foot in mouth when you could food in mouth?"

The girl with the golden hair breathes out in a silent laugh of shivering shoulders. "No, foot in mouth is something like...where you say something that you didn't really mean, or something that can come off in the wrong way."

"What does that have to do with eating?" Link tilts her head.

The girl with the golden hair bursts out laughing, snorting like a boar as she tries to get herself under control only to erupt in further laughter. When at last she calms down, after Link has laughed alongside her, the girl with the golden hair fusses over Link's bangs, brushing them out of Link's face. Link peeks up at the girl with the golden hair's hands, the left palm darkened by a burn, the right lightened and roughened from the scars of regrowing skin. "I suppose it's time, then."

"Are you sure I can't make another egg pudding?" Link jokes. She feels the girl with the golden hair's fingers start to tremble. Her companion retracts her arm, but Link catches her hand. Interlacing their fingers, she squeezes her hand. Beat-beat-beat.

With her companion's help, Link gathers her belongings. She cleans the cooking pot in whatever way she can. She tucks everything into her satchel. She touches the trusty red telescope at her left hip and the ocarina that hangs beside it, and then the empty pouch that once held the slate at her right hip.

If she could recover the slates of the other Champions, then surely she can recover the girl with the golden hair's slate. Her slate. Their slate, combined.

Link shoulders her belongings. She offers the girl with the golden hair her left hand, and the girl with the golden hair grips hers tightly in her right. Together, they approach the altar. Together, they step up towards the gold of their goal.

The altar. The symbol of the Hyrule royal family. The mark of the Golden Goddesses. Three golden triangles, arranged in a larger triangle, with a hollow heart. Except that the hollow heart has risen up into a triangular pillar, on top of which in glowing gold awaits: a key.

The girl with the golden hair's brow furrows. "A key?"

Link plucks the key from the altar. A small golden key, small enough to sit in the heart of her palm without touching the sides, sporting a three-pronged crown of a bow that reminds Link of the Hyrule Cathedral, three jewels set into the side: one red ruby, one blue sapphire, and one green topaz. Link turns the key over. Something nudges her in the rib; she looks over to find the girl with the golden hair pointing past the altar, to the far end of the circular chamber opposite where they entered. The walls have slid apart, uncovering a passageway.

"That must be the way. To where the Triforce is. That's the key, I think. Actually, according to my research, there are two accounts of such a key, one with a bow in the shape of a lion's head—" The girl with the golden hair claps her own hand over her mouth. "Oh, now's not the time for this."

"It's always the time for me to get to see how passionate you are about your research," Link replies, signing awkwardly with just her right hand. The girl with the golden hair's cheeks redden.

"Well, maybe, if your hope is right, there will be time after we secure Hyrule's future." The girl with the golden hair turns towards the passageway. "...come on, Link."

Together, they walk across the circular chamber of the amalgam, of the guardian of the Triforce. Together, they enter the passageway and come upon a golden door with a single lock. Together, they slot in the key. Together, they turn. Together, they——face a barrier that glows in gold, that ripples iridescently with the faintest of fire-light blue. Link observes, beyond the veil, a further corridor lined in gold, dimmer than the luminescent hallways through which she and the girl with the golden hair have travelled, and somehow reflecting violet from the hearts of the tessellated fingers. Splaying her fingers, she touches her palm to the barrier. She feels nothing. Her hand goes through without so much as a crackle of static. Link turns her head towards the girl with the golden hair—who gazes, her brow heavy-set, at the barrier, her eyes slightly narrowed, her teeth worrying her bottom lip—and grins.

She steps through the barrier. She steps to the other side. She steps towards the Triforce that awaits her, and then the girl with the golden hair lets go of her hand.

Link stops. She looks back over her shoulder to find the girl with the golden hair standing on the chamber-side of the barrier, her hand against the gold. Link tilts her head.

The girl with the golden hair presses her palm on the barrier, and then it dawns upon Link that her companion did not willingly let go: she cannot pass the barrier.

"I...I guess that I can't go any farther than this." The girl with the golden hair laughs faintly. Link can see the dampness gathering at the corners of her eyes. "Oh, I'm a being of will now, after all. I'm not allowed to touch the Triforce, remember?" She retracts her empty hand and lowers her arm to her side. "You'll have to go on without me. Oh, don't worry about me. The dungeons of the legends always have some way out at the end."

Link can feel the stinging behind her own eyes. She approaches the barrier; the girl with the golden hair shakes her head furiously.

"You have to go. Go to the Triforce. Link...make sure that you wish for an end to the Great Calamity. Make sure that you wish for peace. Make sure you..." The girl with the golden hair curls her fingers inwards. "I don't need to tell you these things. More than anyone, I know that the wish in your heart will bring Hyrule to peace. More than anyone I've ever met, you love the land and the people—and the food, can't forget the food—" Link smiles sheepishly. "—more than anyone that I've met, Link."

The girl with the golden hair's tears gleam, and then spill over her eyes, rivulets down her cheeks and dribbles from her chin, as would the juices from an apple just ripe enough. Link would give almost anything to share an apple with her, right now.

"If we never see each other again, then...I love you, Link." The tears glisten on her cheeks. In that moment, dressed in Link's bloodied undershirt, much of her hair fallen out, her face torn and scarred and burned, trembling like an autumn leaf battered by the Goddess Farore's wind, she looks more beautiful than anything that Link has ever seen. "I really do love you."

"I love you, too," Link signs, but that does not feel like enough. She lowers her arms. The fingers of her left hand brush against something at her hip, coarse in its creation and smoothed by time and love: the ocarina.

Link fits the ocarina to her lips. The girl with the golden hair gazes at her. Link inhales, and then she plays upon the ocarina the lullaby that bears the girl with the golden hair's name, the name that she still cannot remember.

The girl with the golden hair's eyes glisten wetly. "Link...I know that you don't have all of your memories back yet. Oh, but remember that, no matter what happens, the world will one day heal. This, too, shall pass. Such is Her wind, that the Goddess Farore carries the seeds of life..."

"...and such is Her courage, that we bear the will to live." Link's own fingers have begun to tremble. "The breath of the wild shall whisper over the world, long after you and I have returned to dust, and shall breathe life anew. Such is the promise of the Goddess Farore."

"Even if you don't remember everything that has happened, there is no one better to wish upon the Triforce, because..." The girl with the golden hair takes lifts up her hand to Link's cheek, yet the barrier stills her arm. Link steps back through the barrier enough for the girl with the golden hair to reach her face, to cup Link's cheek in her palm, to warm her face in three gentle presses of the hand.
...courage need not be remembered, for it is never forgotten.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: I noted in a previous author's note exactly how the faery tonic works.

While the other songs Link plays on the ocarina (which Ravio gave her, if you don't remember) are from Ocarina of Time, the aria to the Goddess Erito is based on the "Song of Soaring" from Majora's Mask. The Nocturne of Shadow scared Zelda because, well, it's the creepiest-sounding of the songs, presumably since it's meant for the Shadow Temple.

Remember Zelda's line about the "returning the favour" from the seventy-ninth chapter? It was in reference to this "I can't carry your destiny, but I can carry you," which by the way is unintentionally a reference to a line from a series I don't like very much.

The key that they take from the altar is based on the description of the magical key from The Adventure of Link; the version in The Legend of Zelda bears the shape of a lion's head. Actually, when I first played the latter game as a child without access to the manual, I freaked out upon my realisation that the key number in my inventory had changed to the letter "A"; I thought I had borked the game. Turns out that just means you can get into any locked door now. Whups!

As usual, the "I love you"s in this chapter are not romantic. That said, Link and Zelda have been through so much together. I wrote this chapter as much for a cool-off for myself as it is for you after the eightieth.

There's a lot more I could say right now. But I really do think, more than anything else, that I want to thank each and every one of you. I know I thank you a lot. I'm unfamiliar with the proper etiquette. That said—and I should note that I do not expect anyone else to think the same way that I do; this is merely my personal thoughts—just as a game only truly lives when it is played, or as a meal only truly lives when it is eaten, so does a story only truly live when it is read. You, in reading Delicious in Wilds for all of its hundred of thousands of words, have brought something utterly irreplaceable to the story. You, in reading Delicious in Wilds for all of its hundreds of thousands of words,

I should remark that, when I was writing the ending of Delicious in Wilds and this chapter in particular, I was inclined to have Zelda die. However, upon writing the chapter, I realised that (1) not only would it not make sense, given that I had provided Link with the tonic, but also (2) it felt unceremonious and rather in poor taste, and most importantly (3) having Zelda die here would bypass the bigger issue: the fact that she has already died in the Sacred Realm. The real question is whether or not Zelda will be able to return to the mortal world, or whether she will be trapped forever in the Sacred Realm. And that, well...that's something that you'll have to see. I've left a pretty significant and obvious clue in this chapter, though.

I'll take the time now to say that I personally find it ridiculous that in Breath of the Wild they offered no explanation of how Zelda has just remained seventeen years old all this time. Like, come on. How did Zelda just turn into a disembodied voice for one hundred years and then reform her body at the end? Oh, well, it's not like Nintendo has internal consistency. At least I provide an actual reason for why her appearance hasn't changed, at least until she unfortunately gets mangled in the Great Palace, and tie it directly to how in the world the Sacred Realm works.

But now not the time for this. Now's the time for facing forward, to the Triforce.

The final line of this chapter is my favourite quote from Breath of the Wild. It was reading those words that made me realise I needed to write Delicious in Wilds.

Up next: what lies beyond the veil. And, if you're so inclined to know, you should be aware that the chapter recipe is dubious food.

Beta reader's comments: I was so incredibly nervous going into this chapter. Have you ever gotten to a point in a story where everything changes, and you're terrified of the future? That was how I felt going into this. I was so scared for Zelda. When I saw that she was okay, I let out what must have been a dozen sighs of relief.

I know I gush about how these chapters end all the time, but this is yet another truly incredible ending.

Chapter Notes

Author's notes that would not fit in the end: I technically started writing this chapter at 08:46 on the twenty-second of August, but I didn't seriously begin to write until 23:59 on the twentieth-second of August, and finished writing it at 05:06 on the twenty-third of August. That's right! I literally wrote this chapter by staying up all night because I was running out of time, since I wanted desperately to finish writing Delicious in Wilds prior to my medical school exams. Wew me!

I recommend all of you listen to the music that plays against the fight with Link's shadow in The Adventure of Link, but that's just me!

Thanks a million for being such thoughtful, considerate, and devoted readers. And thanks a million to my beta reader, Emma, for everything that she's done for me, both as a beta reader, and as a wonderful friend.

I didn't just write this to be nostalgia bait for myself. I heavily disliked The Adventure of Link as a kid, and it's only going back to it now that I've realised my feelings on it, in part because I was determined to pull from it for Delicious in Wilds. But I only decided to return to The Adventure of Link in the first place because I felt like the ending fit the story I was meaning to tell with Delicious in Wilds, and for no other reason.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

She walks forward through the barrier to the chamber beyond, the tessellated triangles of gold all around her. She does not walk alone: she walks with the wind of her friends behind her. She walks with the hope of Hyrule no longer a loftwing around her neck, but a loftwing beneath her, carrying her forward. She has walked into the mists of the lost woods, and she has walked into the aether of the Sacred Realm, and now she walks from the golden temple to splish her boots into a pool of water.

The golden corridor has opened into a chamber stretching out to the distant horizons. Not a chamber: the open sky above shines golden. The endless water below quietly gleams, not golden, but blue, as if reflecting a different sky than the one spanning endlessly past the edges of her vision. In the far distance, the sky and the sea blur together into a thin golden-blue line extending into the blind eternities.

Nothing but endless blue water, about up to her ankle. Nothing but endless golden sky, far, far above her.

The world is very, very vast. Yet she has never felt vaster herself.
She does not turn around. She does not look back. She gazes straight ahead of her, to the future of this world, to the future of Hyrule, to the future of herself.

In the heart of the world of blue and gold shimmers a single white-moon of an isle rising from the sea, crested by a tree spreading her boughs over the water. Link knows that isle, knows that tree, knows those boughs with a nostalgic familiarity that she could not put to word. All of the winds of the wilds that have ever caressed her hair, all of the trees in whose boughs she ever slept, all of the stones on which she has rested, her head tilted back, her eyes closed, her body relaxed into the wilds that call her name.

Yet she does not approach the isle for the wilds alone, but for the people who make something out of them. All of the wilds combined cannot sit at a campfire and share stew from a communal cooking pot.

She approaches the isle. She approaches the tree. She approaches the heart of the world. Her boots almost touch the sandy stone of the isle. She lifts up her hand to the tree.

And then, just as she would step foot on the isle, just as her palm would rest against the tree which calls not only her name but the name of everyone who has ever lived and will ever live in Hyrule, the golden skies above give way to a violent violet, and she can see what the waters were reflecting after all.

Her reflection shifts beneath her. She glances down at her own shadow stretching from her boots to the isle, at the reflection dark in the water, at the violent violet the same colour of the Calamitous One, the same shade as the sash that Marin once wore around her shoulder. Almost the same hue as the hope of Hyrule.

She watches her shadowed reflection reach for something at their left hip. She watches her shadowed reflection bring their ocarina to their lips. She watches her shadowed reflection play a song upon the ocarina that does not sound like an ocarina, but like some instrument she has never before heard, its voice of static and grinding and the sound of the guardians' fire-light.

Then her shadowed reflection emerges from the water. Link does not step back. Her reflection rises from the seas to the skies, standing at her own height, facing her with her own features, gazing at her with her own eyes, confronting her with that blank expression of longing for something that people take as her wishing for rewards when she wants nothing more than to share with them a meal.

Link removes the cooking pot affixed to her back. She sets it down between herself and the reflection. Fi vibrates upon her back, but Link merely signs at herself with her own hands.

"Hi, me. I know you're probably upset at me, and for real good reasons. I haven't really been the best hero I could've been. Not much of a hero at all."

She hesitates. "I don't know what made me lose my memories. I don't know if maybe I lost them myself. I know if that I'd just been a little more...you know...I could've gone quicker through the Divine Beasts, and I could've gone quicker to get Fi here, and maybe I could've prevented a lot of people getting hurt, and a lot of people having to give up their homes, and a lot of people...passing away."

She dips her head. She signs a prayer for the departed. She speaks on: “And, you know, I could've done this one hundred years ago, if we'd known what the Sacred Realm was like. We could've done this.” Link smiles at herself, at her own reflection looking back at her, their arms to their sides. If she glances down at the water, she can see neither shadow or reflection, because the flesh and body that she witnesses before her is her own reflection.

"But, despite everything, I think that we've done pretty well for a girl who really just likes to cook and to eat. We've helped calm all of the Divine Beasts, meeting people over the rim of our cooking pot. We've wandered all over Hyrule and activated all the shrines, helping Kass get back home. I wish we could've seen the moment that Amali and Kass saw each other again. I wish we could've seen the moment that Kass's daughters saw their father again!

"And we've helped Dorian, and maybe we managed to help Glepp, too, and we've done a lot of little things for lots and lots and lots of people, and we've seen so much, and we've met so many, and we've made all of these recipes, and we've eaten more meals than I ever thought that we could, and we even figured out how to cook bugs and how to cook monsters and how to cook guardians and we haven't figured out how to eat rock roast yet but you can bet that by the time we're done we'll figure out something for that too and maybe I could sneak that in when I go make my wish for the peace of Hyrule, and everyone's said that we united Hyrule just with our cooking pot. That's a lot for a girl who just loves to cook waaaaaaay too much, like would say.

"You know what I mean? And, you know, for everyone that I've met sharing food in my cooking pot...there's just one person I still haven't connected with. Not all the way. Isn't that right, Link?"

Link glances up at her own shadowed reflection, who looks vacantly at her.

"If you want, I can cook you something, here and now, and then we can touch the thing that I don't have a sign for together. The Golden Force and all that. You're...the part of me that hates me or something like that, right? I've never seen you, but I've known you enough, every day of my life. Well, you're not just a part of me I could throw out, huh? You're all of me. You know what I do with myself all the time? Eat. So why don't we just...enjoy a meal together?"

Her reflection's features seem empty of expression. She cannot read her own face. An alien looking back at her. The same emptiness that she has seen over and over again in the mirror.

For all of the funny faces that she can make at herself in the lake of the Great Plateau or the blade of the Master Sword, she has never been able to force a smile.

"We don't have to do this. Come on." Link gestures to the cooking pot between them. "You know that you want to eat, don't you? You've never been able to resist a meal. If something's keeping you from eating, that must be pretty serious. I'll make you whatever you want. I wish I could bake you some apples. I know that's your favourite because it's my favourite. Even when I hate myself, there's nothing more Hyrule than a baked apple, you know?" The shadowed reflection returns a blank expression. "What do you say, other me? Let's get cooking."

The shadowed reflection lowers themself towards the waves and crouches in front of the cooking pot. Link feels her shoulders relax. Even here, at the end of the everything, she can simply cook.

She kneels down by the cooking pot across from her shadowed reflection. Reaching for her satchel, Link browses through her ingredients. She could simply prepare more egg pudding, except she no longer has honey, and she no longer has eggs, and she no longer has sugar. She could simply simmer together zapshroom, and hydromelon, and make herself a fruit and mushroom skewer like the one that she ate on the Great Plateau over two years ago. She could simply throw what she has into her cooking pot and see what that will give her. She could simply cook what she has and worry later. Just one stew of everything she's got.

She could, as the girl with the golden hair asked her to do for research, try to eat a hot-footed frog, or a tireless frog, or both at the same time.
Link scoops the violent violet waters of the sea into her cooking pot. She dips a finger in to taste. Like fresh, clean, pure water. Almost too pure. No taste at all. She prefers the water of the rivers of the wilds, with its harder blend of mineral and salt, with its occasional metallic tang of fish, with all of its mud and silt. But this will have to do do.

She has nothing more to burn, but she has the remainder of her ruby arrows. Link hopes that that will suffice. Placing her quiver down between herself and her shadowed reflection, she removes the ruby-tipped shafts.

With a flip of her knife, Link chops up the prickly pears of voltfruit; and the squishy inner gills of zapshroom once she has carefully covered the more-shocking caps; and two different strains of safflina Riju has left for her, half reddish and half yellowed, and both just as delicious as the other once steamed and softened and cooked to perfection. She scoops out the sweet succulent saccharine syrup sugaring the insides of the hydromelon that Riju has sliced up and wrapped individually for her, setting aside the hydromelon rinds to flavour the water.

To heat the cooking pot, Link breaks the ruby arrowheads against the bottom of the pot one by one. She puts down the silver box of elixirs; the rim just barely rises above the waters of the sea. Then she peers at her own quiver.

Snagging the rest of her arrows one at a time, Link breaks each shaft over her knee: the topaz, and the sapphire, and the wooden she has carved from trees herself, and the arrows she has filched from monsters. From beings of will. She piles together the wooden shafts, discarding the useless arrowheads, and sets them ablaze.

Link simmers the fruit and the herbs and the mushrooms over her cooking pot, and she regards the girl with the golden hair whose name she still cannot remember, and she regards the frogs that the girl with the golden hair requested she try eating, and she regards herself crouching in the water across the rim of her cooking pot.

"When we go back to our world...when we go back topside, like how she said...we should do that experiment for her. Just try eating a frog." Link laughs a light little laugh to her own reflection. "What do you say?"

She cracks the rest of the ruby arrowheads except for one—a single arrow left in her quiver—against the cooking pot. Her shadowed reflection neither moves nor shifts expression. Empty. Longing. Hungering.

"I'll take that as a yes. We'll both wish on that Golden Force thing, and we'll ask for a future for Hyrule, and we'll make sure that something like the Great Calamity won't ever happen again. That's what I mean when I say that we'll ask for Hyrule's future. Hyrule's peace. Because after we wish...I mean, plenty of bad things can still happen in Hyrule. People are people, you know? But no matter what happens, it'll be in our hands, now." Her shadowed reflection's expression remains blank.

The stew simmers down. She can smell the finished soup from the vapours creeping up through the cracks in the wooden pot lid, battered and bruised from the greater-than-two-years that she has carried the lid everywhere in Hyrule, from the Great Plateau to Necluda, from Necluda to Eldin, from Eldin to Tabantha, from Tabantha to Faron, from Faron to Parapa, from Parapa to Lanayru, from Lanayru to Akkala, from Akkala to Hebra, from Hebra to Central Hyrule, from Central Hyrule back to the Great Plateau, from the Great Plateau to the Sacred Realm.

She pats the wooden pot lid. "Thank you for everything, my friend. Our journey's almost over. I already know where Fi will sleep, and I already know that me and Ilia'll have a stall of hay waiting for us at Romani Ranch." Link rubs the back of her head. "Though I guess Malon'll insist I sleep in an actual bed. I'd rather be out in the hay, I think." She looks up at her shadowed reflection. "Wouldn't you agree, Link?" Her shadowed reflection's features stay empty.

Link lifts the wooden pot lid. She looks down at the inside of her cooking pot. Blinking, she finds herself staring not at the tasty soup of leftovers that she thought herself stewing, but instead some green and violet mass of something, as though the Calamitous One had retched into her cooking pot. From within the cooking pot emerges a burble of a croak, like she had let slip a hot-footed frog into her cooking pot without noticing. She glances up at her shadowed reflection, who looks vacuouly upon her.

"I'm sorry. This isn't something delicious. It's downright dubious." She shakes her head. "I'll try to make something else for you. I—"

Her shadowed reflection's expression does not change, yet she senses something off. They lift their ocarina again to their lips. Her shadowed reflection plays a song; in the melody, Link listens to the truth: "You can't cook without me. I am you. Without me, you're nothing. Not even the girl who loves to cook."

Her shadowed reflection vacantly regards the cooking pot containing all that is dubious in the wilds. They let the ocarina fall into the water below. They close their fingers around the sword as their back. They raise their blade: a mirrored image of Fi. Just the same as Link. Just the same. Her own reflection. Her own self, gazing blankly at her. Her shadowed reflection brings the sword down upon the cooking pot Link has carried with her for two very, very long years. The blade glows fire-light blue, then sings to the violet of a skyward strike.

Link watches her mirrored reflection cleave her beloved cooking pot in two.

Link watches her mirrored reflection course all of the energies of the Sacred Realm that Fi herself has spent one hundred years gathering into her beloved cooking pot.

Like the mirror in the sanctum the girl with the golden hair could break but not shatter, the cooking pot has broken time and time again, and always the cooking has mended, has repaired, has healed. And now Link watches her mirrored reflection shatter the cooking pot into a thousand tiny fragments that resonate with the song her reflection played upon the ocarina before her beloved cooking pot dissipates into flecks of golden dust.

For the third time in her life she senses something rise within her, bubble up bitter as wormwood and sharp as the blade upon her back.

Anger.

That, here, the very centre of the Sacred Realm, with the Triforce waiting just beyond the veil, with the hope of Hyrule almost in her own hand, with the sacrifices and pain that everyone she knows has suffered through to carry her to the heart of the world, her own self-loathing could do her in.

But her own self-loathing has miscalculated, because she has never been good at maths. Because she loves the wilds and the people who make something of them more than she hates herself.

Her fingers close around the hilt of the sword that seals the darkness. The blade of evil's bane. The Master Sword. Fi.

The wings have retracted. The gold of the jewel has dimmed. The fire-light glow has given way to softened white, and Fi herself has given way to nothing but a simple blade. Link grips that sword with everything that she has.

Her reflection rolls forward towards her. She leaps to the side in anticipation of her own upwards thrust. She circles her reflection, half-walking and half-jumping to the right, as her reflection circles around her. She knows herself too well: when her reflection lunges she crouches for a stab, yet her reflection predicts her motions and swings in from the side, yet she predicts her own motions and somersaults back, yet her reflection predicts her motions in response and rolls forward, yet she predicts her own motions in response and jabs down before she has even landed back on her feet, yet her reflection predicts her motions in response to the response and angles themself to the left, yet she predicts her own motions in response to the response and moves her sword in a diagonal arc that cracks against the ground beneath the sea.

Her reflection rises up from the water again. She regards her reflection; her reflection regards her.

Her reflection charges. For once, she does not flip away; instead she uses the charge to thrust her own blade outwards. She catches her reflection's sword on the edge of her own. Planting her feet against the ground, she pushes back on her reflection's blade. She can feel the resistance tremble up her arm, can feel her reflection pushing back with just as much force, can feel them evenly matched in muscle and might. She attempts twisting her wrist and flipping the sword out of her reflection's hand, yet they seem to anticipate her motions—of course—and wrench their own wrist. Grunting, she lessens the pressure for a second. Her shadowed reflection continues pushes; she lets herself walk back a step. As she expected, her reflection's stumble forward, and she swings her left leg outwards to swipe their limbs out from under them.

In that moment, she predicts their own response: her shadowed reflection uses their forward momentum to drive the sword towards her. In that moment, she realises that knocking their legs out will not come soon enough. In that moment—in that moment—in that moment, she tries moving backwards, yet the inertia of her leg swipe keeps her mostly in place until she feels her leg connect to theirs and the tip of her reflection's blade enter just below her ribs. The sword sinks in downwards on the right side of her torso, carving a thin line into through her abdomen and piercing through the other side.

Her leg finishes its outwards arc. She looks up at her own reflection. They begin turning their wrist as they fall onto their side in the water. She lets herself plummet in the same direction, keeping the angle of the sword parallel in her abdomen.

Fi falls from her grip and submerges beneath the waves. As her hip hits the ground, water splashing up in her face, she fights through the pain that fogs her vision to clench her hands around the hilt of the blade stuck through her body.

She digs her nails into her reflection's hands. She senses herself tearing through her reflection's flesh because she can feel the same pain on the backs of her own hands. She senses the dampness that warms her hands, that dribbles down the curves of her skin, that trickles away and plinks into the waters below. She pushes her reflection back. Her reflection pushes the sword in.

She cannot rely on Fi in the fight against herself. She predicts herself too well. She knows herself too well with the blade that has always protected her.

But she has, too, her own hands. Rearing back her free right arm, she balls her fingers into a fist. She throws a punch at her reflection's face. When the knuckles connect with their nose, she feels the impact of her own bones against those of her face, feels her nose break yet again from the force, feels the agony of her head thrown back so far she wonders if she has not broken her own neck. The punch knocks her reflection back. She grabs the hilt of the sword skewering her abdomen.
If she removes the blade, she could bleed out, but if she leaves it in, her reflection could use it against her. If she bleeds out, then her reflection will too. A battle of wills. One she will not lose.

She touches her hand to the hilt of the sword and both she and her reflection seize up at once. Her reflection rushes her; she closes her eyes—she has not time to prepare herself as she did removing the spear the bokoblins jammed through her torso in the castle—and drags the blade out of her body, the friction of the metal against her internal organs spasming her limbs and curling her inwards on herself, the blood that sprays out of her abdomen clouding the waters, her upper teeth biting through her scarred lower lip, heat trickling down her chin. The red-dark blade reflects the violent violet of the sky, the violent violet scars whorling over Link's own form.

Her reflection's knees buckle beneath them. She throws the sword as far away from both of them as she can. Her reflection lifts their head towards the blade. When she sees her reflection make a break for the sword, she throws herself at them. Her hands drag down her reflection's shoulders; her knees slams into the small of their back. She senses the pain pulsating in her legs, and then her left hip, and then her chin and the insides of her cheeks bitten down by her own teeth as her reflection plunges into the water. Her reflection rolls over and struggles to knock her off. She lets her reflection onto their back before she digs her knees into their hips and her elbows into their arms.

Wielding the agony she feels reflected onto her own form, she locates the sensitive veins on her upper arms. There, over the tender patches about halfway down from her shoulders, she jabs in her elbows, hard. The pain shooting up and down her arms forces her reflection into stillness, keeps them from writhing.

She wraps her hands around her reflection's throat. Her nails sink into the soft flesh on either side of her reflection's jaw. She chokes herself.

Like the lynel, like the Malice, like her own parents, she chokes herself, and she presses in, and she chokes herself, and she cannot breathe, and she chokes herself, and she occupies her own hands in choking herself so that she cannot speak, or cook, or do anything but enact the violence behind her own stinging eyes.

She chokes herself, and she senses her reflection starting to go limp beneath her weight. Darkness pools at the corners of her vision. The wound in her abdomen drains out blood until she can smell nothing but copper; the split of her lower lip trickles blood down her chin like the juices of an apple just ripe enough until she has nothing but the taste of iron on her tongue. The sky above blurs in violent violet.

And then Link lets go.

She will not fight herself out of anger. She will not fight herself out of rage. She will not fight herself out of hate.

Link will fight herself for the peace of Hyrule, as she has fought herself every step of the way, as she has fought herself to take charge of her own past, as she has fought herself to accept her own title, as she has fought herself to accept herself.

And now Link accepts this side of her, too. The side of her that hates her. The side of her that cannot deal with people. The side of her that does not know so much about the world. The side of her that does not always have the words she needs to say. The side of her that would throw herself into danger despite her responsibilities for want of a meal. The side of her that would close her eyes and let herself die. The side of her that nearly did, one hundred years ago. The side of her that nearly did, a few months ago. The side of her that is also her. The side of her. Her.
Her reflection sinks down into the waves, her fingers loosening to into the sea, and becomes her own shadow again. Link collapses into the water. The waves ebb over her face. The wind ruffles her hair. The scent of the wilds settles in her bones.

A sound rumbles up from her stomach. It erupts from her throat as a laugh. She lies face-down on the water, body aching, muscles hurting, regarding her own dubious food smelling of frogs, and she cannot stop laughing. Her shoulders shake. Each time the mirth subsides, she doubles up again in laughter. The edges of her mouth curve upwards in a grin that crinkles the corners of her eyes. While she laughs, a ticklish wave of water breaks on underside of her nose; she sneezes with such force that she laughs all the harder.

Link lives. She breathes. Her heart beats. Her body moves. She is alive. No matter what else, these remain true. And one day, when she no longer lives, the breath of the wild shall whisper over the world, and the world will live on. As long as the sun, the moon, and the earth exist, everything will be all right.

By the time her head has ceased spinning and the laughter has left her with a goofy smile, Link notices the sky that has given way, again, to gold, the waters that have given way, again, to blue.

She crawls through the water to Fi into her arms. Fi, who has long exhausted her power. Fi, who has kept her safe all this time. "I don't know," she signs, Fi lain across her lap, "if you can hear me like this, but I hope you can. Thank you. Thank you, Fi. I love you. I love you." Link cradles Fi as she rocks back and forth, kneeling in the water before the isle with its tree. And there, from the skies above, and the seas below, and the infinite horizons that call her name, come the lights. Golden lights.

She observes them rotate as they glide inwards towards the isle and the tree that bears upon its boughs all of the wilds at once. She watches them spin through the aether in spheres of gold, like the depictions of the Golden Goddesses Themselves, comets across the golden sky.

Far, far larger than she anticipated. Each one about her own height. When they approach her from the skies and from the seas and from the distant horizons, they rotate more slowly, until their shapes coalesce into——golden triangles. Golden triangles which meet before the tree. Golden triangles which touch touch at the corners in perfect unity, in harmony, in resonance.

The hum. The hum that sounds like the girl with the golden hair's own lullaby. The hum that she has heard so many times in her own dreams.

The Triforce.

"Hello," she says to the Triforce. "My name is Link. I don't think that we've met before, but I know the song you're singing." She wets the mouthpiece of the ocarina, then plays the lullaby of the girl with the golden hair. Her wounds ache. The blood warms her bod while it trickles down her torso and limbs to pool crimson in the water, like a shadow of scarlet beneath her. "I don't know how much you know about me, or about my friends. There are so many people I could tell you about. But I don't think that we have time." Her heart, she can feel, has started to slow, squeezing down in her sternum.
So, together, let's wish for Hyrule's peace. Together...let's wish for Hyrule's future. Together...let's go home, Triforce.” Link signs the word to herself, touching her hand to her cheek, to her eye, to the centre of her chest, a path she has shaped over and over in her life. And then she draws on her chest a triangle. Triforce. From the word home. She raises her hand. She extends her arm. She feels the resonance against her palm. Home.

And then the Calamitous One forms around her hand. The Calamitous One separates her and the Triforce by a veil of malice. The Calamitous One in all of its maelstrom malice spreads over the entire sky and the entire sea to split the world in two, like the golden barrier that split her and the girl with the golden hair into a being of blood and a being of will.

She has never before seen the boar-like head of the maliced monster congealing from the aether around her. Yet she recognises the violent violet all the same: she stands at the very heart of the Calamitous One, once a man who touched the Triforce, once a man who wished for the peace of Hyrule, once a man who bore deep in his heart a different wish he could not bring himself to face. She does not know that much about this world. She does not even know how much she does not know. But she knows herself. She can discover. She can learn. And even if crowds terrify her into curling up on the ground, she would never, ever trade away the people whom she could cook for, the people who could gift her their stories and their smiles and their bellies, the people who can sit at a campfire and share stew from a communal cooking pot.

She knows her own flaws. She knows that she hates herself. Yet she knows, too, her own courage.

Link reaches with her lightning-strike hand into the whirling vortex of the Malice. The Calamitous One gnashes its sable jaws around the flesh of her arm. Nonetheless she reaches with her lightning-strike hand. The tip of her fingers passes into the veil of the Calamitous One, and then her first knuckle, and her second, and her third, and the whole of her hand, and her wrist, and her forearm with the red marks of the lizalfos bite she has borne for over two years, and her elbow, and her upper arm, and her entire limb just up to her shoulder.

She feels the malice eating away at her skin, eating away at the rawness of the layer beneath, eating away at her muscle, eating away at her tendons, eating away her ligaments, eating away at her veins, eating away at her bones, eating away at her marrow, eating away at her spirit, eating away at her will to live.

Pain whites her vision. She deafens herself with her screams. She cannot sense her legs or her torso or her heart. Her entire world has narrowed down to the skeletal remains of her arm as agony deadens the rest of her body, rendered a trembling mass of flesh.

Yet despite the pain, and despite the agony, and despite the fear that hums through every fibre of her form, Link gathers the courage in the pit of her belly, and she will live not for herself but for all of the people who have ever shared a meal with her, and she reaches with her lightning-strike hand.

She breaches the veil.

The tip of her forefinger, marrowed down to a sharpened point of white bone, a thin needle on the verge of fading into the malice and hatred incarnate, touches the Triforce, and she wishes.

She wishes.

She wishes for the beings of blood and the beings of will to recognise one another as they already have, for the beings of will to share the realm that she calls home.

She wishes not for the Sacred Realm to seal itself again away. The veil of the Sacred Realm, no matter how well sealed, could always tear once more, could always rip, could always thin. Even if the mirrors shatter. Even if the royal family forbids the knowledge from being taught. Somewhere, someone could learn that magic again, could breach the veil again, could wish upon the Triforce again.

She wishes for peace and a future for Hyrule, for the wilds and the people who make something of them: Ilia, Yunobo, Amali, Riju, Sidon, Lami, Maggi, Hestu, Impa, Paya, Lasli, Claree, Dorian, Cottla, Koko, Calip, Kyrtta, Doreli, Balin, Symin, Purah, Kass, Gaile, Rogor, Ozunda, Elisa, Blaryd, Jibo, Kragg, Tumot, Frillo, Donte, Fernok, Misan, Glepp, Voji, Barguron, Amali, Kotts, Notts, Genli, Kheel, Genli, Teba, Harth, Saki, Tulin, Kaneli, Maron, Maryll, Malon, Vish, Cremia, Romani, Miyu, Eltah, Nissa, Rotana, Rhiaru, Dyeri, Nadyne, Vaike, Luavan, Pleiade, Dilani, Ahni, Buliara, Sarie, Igli, Frash, Muzu, Lanzu, Oshen, Laflat, Shalot, Rutala, Finley, Sasan, Ravio, Hilda, Zeffa, Luda, the other Ilia, and all of the travellers and all of the strangers that she has met and all of the people of Hyrule that she could meet yet, and the girl with the golden hair.

She wishes.

She wishes for the Great Calamity to vanish to golden dust.

She wishes for the Sacred Realm to vanish to golden dust.

She wishes for the Triforce to vanish to golden dust.

She wishes.

She wishes for Hyrule to live by her people's own hands.

And she hears, just faintly, in a voice choked with ten thousand years of dust, in a language she should not know:

"Thanks a million."

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: In The Adventure of Link, the final trial Link must face before obtaining the Triforce of Courage is Link's shadow (also known as "Shadow Link" or "Dark Link", but I prefer the original term "Link's shadow"). Perhaps it's a bit cliché for the final trial to be facing oneself and one's own issues, to be battling one's demons, but as a child it left a profound impact on me, particularly with how unexpected it was. Besides, I've spent much of Delicious in Wilds showing Link battling her own issues. What better way to go about it than to have that battle be personified?

For the aesthetics of the scene, I chose to utilise Ocarina of Time's version of the isle on the water, because I've used themes of one's reflection and Link looking in the water before. However, I admit that I was more inspired by a moment in a completely different franchise: the encounter with Rom the Vacuous in Bloodborne, wherein the veil between the planes are broken for the player, and which similarly features the use of water as a bulwark between a 'mortal realm' and a realm beyond. Given the technical limitations of the Famicom/NES, it's understandable that the final fight against Link's shadow did not feature something of that sort. But, for me as a child who had only ever known graphics on par with the NES and later SNES, it was breathtaking, particularly the music.

When I mention that Link "knows that isle", I'm not talking about some reincarnation thing; I'm referring to the fact that it reminds her of the wilds.

The spinning golden lights, as I mentioned, come from the title screen animation of A Link to the Past, which depicts the Triforce coming together, the individual pieces of the Triforce spinning as they fall into place.

The list of names at the end is just the names that I could remember off the top of my head and is not an accounting of every character I've ever mentioned in Delicious in Wilds.

If you haven't figured it out yet, Delicious in Wilds was very much, in part, about Link (and Zelda) coming to terms with her self-hatred. The reason that I used the Sacred Realm I did was because Zelda would have had to choose every single second to remain alive on virtue of her own willpower. Just as Link told Zelda about the quote from the play about the Parapan king, living takes courage. Obviously the Sacred Realm isn't a perfect metaphor for struggling with suicide, but it's apt enough. Before the Great Calamity, Link was on the verge of just letting herself die, and Link has been on the same verge a few times throughout Delicious in Wilds, most notably when Fi finally chose her to bear the Master Sword again. And here, while Link isn't magically going to recover in a single day, I've taken how much she has gotten better over the past more-than-two-years (it's been about twenty-eight and a half months I think). It's been a journey for her, a journey of character development, a journey of really struggling, but she's come so far.

And, I'll be honest: I'm glad that I could finally cash in the symbolism of Link having the lightning-strike Farore's-courage scars on her left hand.

As for Link's wish, I'll let it speak for itself. But that's been another theme throughout Delicious in Wilds. And it's something I've brought up time and again. Even go back at previous chapters and look at Link's words to Fi in the eightieth chapter regarding her last meal.

At the ending of The Adventure of Link, the player is left with the message: THANKS A MILLION. I enjoy it when developers thank players for play, and I likewise enjoy thanking readers for reading. In Delicious in Wilds, in case it wasn't obvious, the "thanks a million" Link hears is from Ganondorf, Link having freed him from ten thousand years of rampaging without the ability to control himself, destroying the very land he had sought to help. After all, once upon a time, he, like Link, wished upon the Triforce. And the "thanks a million", as I have said and said again in my author's notes, is also to you, the reader, without whom Delicious in Wilds would not be alive.

Up next: the aftermath; a favourite food; saying her name.

midna's ass. 18 November 2017.

Beta reader's comments: This is the climax of the story, and it is everything I could have ever dreamed that it would be. Having the "final boss" of the series be a reflection of Link herself. Making a very big concept into a very personal story. It's absolutely incredible.

I don't think I can really put into words just how much I adore this chapter as the resolution of the series' central conflict, so I'll just leave you with that.

Thanks a million.

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef has fought against the chef's own shadow and wished on the Triforce, to entirely do away with the Sacred Realm and Triforce. Now, as the Sacred Realm collapses around the chef and the people of Hyrule, the chef remembers a name.

Chapter Notes

Author's notes that wouldn't fit in the end, for the final time: I started writing this chapter at 05:59 on the twenty-third of August, and finished writing it at 14:03 on the twenty-third of August.

I cannot express in words how much you all have meant to me. My dearest, most sincerest and heartfelt thanks, my deepest gratitude, my most genuine well wishes to each and every one of you. We've ridden out the entirety of this journey, and I couldn't have done it without you. So thank you for opening your heart to Link's story. Thank you for reading. I hope that you have enjoyed Delicious in Wilds as much as I enjoyed my romp around Hyrule. It's been an honour. And, tomorrow, Delicious in Wilds will be over. And thank you to my beta reader, Emma, who has been with me all this way, since I first decided that I was going to write Delicious in Wilds back in April, all those months ago. It's been a ride in the best way possible.

With respect to Link's wish, I think, ultimately, that decoupling the mortal world from the Sacred Realm is for the best. It's sad to see the magic go, sure. And there are still going to be plenty of problems, just as there are in the real world, and very real problems. Yet now the land will be made of the people, rather than from the whims of power beyond mortal reckoning. To me, personally, the most driven stories are those that come from the people and not from the deities. Perhaps that's why both Ocarina of Time and Skyward Sword failed to have an impact on me in the ways they were intended to, because fate and destiny do not a compelling story make in my eyes, and why The Legend of Zelda has stuck with me all this time, with its hero who saved Hyrule because Link was the one with the courage and skill to do it. Link could have died. Link could have failed. But Link succeeded, by Link's own hands. And that's meaningful.

She falls through the darkness.

She falls through the darkness until she opens her eyes. Only then does Link realise that the ground itself has given way beneath her. The keep overhead has opened up into a spiral. The gold has started to crumble away.
She falls through the air and through the dissipating aether. She can see, beneath her, the whole of the Sacred Realm aglow, as the entire world begins flaking away into golden dust that shimmers through the air like rice thrown at a wedding. She can see, beneath her, one hundred and twenty fire-light mirrors open at once, gateways to the mortal world, through which the beings of blood and the beings of will alike pass to the safety of the Realm of Blood from the unravelling Realm of Will. She can see, beneath her, the golden pyramid that has risen gleaming out of the malice. In her double vision, she makes out the tower of the castle which has started protruding from the crown of the pyramid where the pyramid melts away into the mist.

She falls, and she dares not close her eyes for these final moments. No matter what happens. The whole of the Sacred Realm resonates. A swan song. A final good-bye. Without further ado, but with further adieu.

She falls, and she has no paraglider, and she has no cucco, and she——hears the voice above her as someone brownish-green floats before her face. "Link! Grab on!"

Link lifts her right hand towards her mouth and clenches Fi's hilt between her teeth. She closes her hand around Sarie's tiny body. Her fingers brush over the roughened bark of their skin. The korok leaf whirls above them, yet their combined weight—just as in the Divine Beast Vah Ruta—proves too greater, and they float together through the air and through the aether, albeit now more slowly and wheeling in circles. Her right arm bends at a strange angle. Her eyes water. She feels her fingers slip.

She plummets downwards again. Throwing her head up, Link searches the skies, desperately, not for Sarie but for her companion who has passed through the entirety of the keep-temple-palace with her, her companion willing to sacrifice herself so that Link could pass through the guardian of the Triforce, her companion who has spent the last hundred years in pain, every single moment of every single day clinging on to that thin thread of hope that Link would awaken, that Link would meet Fi, that Link would come to seal the Calamitous One.

She finds the girl with the golden hair plunging just as swiftly through the air, through the aether, her eyes closed, her head lolled back, the undershirt billowing up over her bruised and battered body.

Link throws out her right arm. As they fall towards the tower, she reaches out towards the girl with the golden hair, the fingers of her right hand straining so far her knuckles ache, just barely managing to brush against the girl with the golden hair’s violet-whorled heel.

Pinpricks of pain at her collarbones and at the crest of her shoulder blades. Without her undershirt, she senses the sharpness of the talons all the more. And above her head: the sound of wing beats.

Her limbs' momentum at the sudden stop of her fall swings her legs out. A blue-green feather lands on her nose. She does not need to look up to know who has caught her, but she does so anyway, just to see Amali's smiling beak.

Link smiles back at her; she notices the wetness of the feathers beneath Amali’s eyes. Though she can scarcely move her right arm with how Amali has clench her shoulders, she signs anyway, one handed, in Central Hyrulean, for she does not know how to sign one-handed in Tabanch: "I'm sorry, but I guess you'll have to get another tunic after all. I'll make you something in exchange, though. I'll make you a meal."

The tears darken Amali's cheeks even further, and Link looks out beyond her, to the golden skies above. She observes, above her, in her double vision, the stars of the Sacred Realm quietly wink.
And she hears, on her left side, another beat of wings that she knows all too well. Kass. Kass, who carries the girl with the golden hair in his talons. Kass, who grins at Link, his full feathery crest regrown and proudly puffed over his head. Kass, whose own cheeks have darkened and dampened in his own weeping, who raises his voice above the hum of the Sacred Realm.

"So we meet again, traveller. I'm pleased to see you well," he sings; then he drops the even tone to a timbre trembling with tears. "I don't know what you did, but the Calamitous One is gone now, and everyone's going back to our world. Thank you, Link. Thank you."

Sarie catches up to Link, hovering beneath their korok leaf. "Everyone's waiting for you! For both of you! For you and—" Sarie turns their body towards the girl with the golden hair. "—your old friend?" Link dips her head.

Amali and Kass glide downwards, together, towards the castle visible in Link's double vision, the worlds yet merged while the Sacred Realm fades into oblivion. They sail inwards through an opening—in the back of the castle and in the back of the pyramid both—leading towards the shrine in the heart of Hyrule, in the heart of the Sacred Realm. The shrine that now glows the blue of the sky of the mortal world. The shrine that has saved Link twice over and now will save her again: everything comes in threes.

In front of the shrine await Yunobo, and Riju, and Sidon, all of them in various states of shock and awe and happiness. Yunobo calls when he sees her, and Riju yells, and it takes Sidon a moment to realise what has happened and then he, too, waves in the wrong direction. Tears well up behind Link's eyes. She feels her boots touch the ground in front of the shrine.

"Our Link!" booms Sidon, his voice rumbling the rafters of the castle, rumbling the remaining gold of the pyramid. "None of us ever for a second lost faith in you."

"W-we've already gotten everyone else out of the Sacred Realm," Yunobo cuts in, "and we wanted to see you off ourselves. Huh? Link, y-your arm..."

Amali releases Link; Kass gently sweeps his wings over the unconscious girl with the golden hair. Sinking to her knees, Link curls her right arm around the girl with the golden hair's shoulders, struggling to hold her up. Overhead, Amali is signing, inquiring of what in the world has happened to Link, of the blood everywhere, of her oozing shoulder, of the girl with the golden hair, of both of them needing medical attention immediately, of how proud Amali is of Link. Then Kass touches Amali's shoulder, and Amali drops her wings to her sides. Link hears Sidon asking what has happened, and she hears Yunobo explaining in a hushed whisper of their injuries and of the girl with the golden hair. Sidon embarks on introducing himself to the Princess until Yunobo elaborates of the girl with the golden hair's unconsciousness.

Link feels Amali and Yunobo and Sidon all trying to embrace her at once, or trying to tell her about the Calamitous One which vanished into golden dust, or trying to do anything that just makes it that much more difficult for Link to keep the girl with the golden hair's head up with her right arm alone.

Riju drops down and kneels beside Link. Steadying the girl with the golden hair in an upright positioning, Riju helps hold her. Link meets Riju's gaze, her brow knit together, her brown eyes warm as a stew that Link so desperately wants to stuff into her mouth this very second, her stomach rumbling, the last thing she ate half a cup of egg pudding. "Is this...your old friend?"

Link nods. She can feel the warmth trickling down her left side, can feel the pain stabbing through her shoulder, can feel the numbness accompanying the blurring of her vision.

"Thank you," Riju murmurs to the girl with the golden hair. "The long war is over, thank the Goddesses. Link, Princess, are you ready to go home? Together. Let's all go home."

"Home," Yunobo repeats. "And then we can make all the meals you ever want, right?"

"We'll make the most delicious meals! Another feast, in honour of us having at last bested the most vile Calamitous One!"

"I only hope that my home is large enough to hold all the festivities," Amali signs.

Kass spreads his wing over her shoulder. "I'm sure it will be."

But Link is shaking the girl with the golden hair. She touches her ear to her companion's chest: her heart beats; her lungs draw breath. Link's own breaths grow shallow as she attempts and fails to rouse the girl with the golden hair.

Kass scoots in beside them, his accordion in his lap. "This may be a little loud, Link," he warns. Then he squeezes down on the bellows so suddenly that Link jumps and the girl with the golden hair's eyes snap open.

Link inhales. The girl with the golden hair's eyes dart all around at the Champions, Sarie, and Kass looking upon her. "Where...? Is the Calamity...?"

"The bwig bwad bwoar," Sarie announces, "is gone gone gone bye-bye-bye!"

The girl with the golden hair blinks while her eyes focus; Link watches her fix her gaze onto Link, a question half-formed in her irises.

Link allows Riju to take hold of her companion so that she can sign to the girl with the golden hair. "Not just the Calamitous One. I wished for the Sacred Realm and the Triforce—" She motions through the gesture she made for herself and prays that the girl with the golden hair understands. "—to disappear, too. I don't want anything like this to happen ever again. Hyrule's in our hands now. Now and forever."

The girl with the golden hair exhales. "Thank you. All of you. You must be the new Champions." She relaxes down into Riju's arms. "I don't... I don't have the words that I want to say right now, but thank you. I... I've kept my promises, and walked my paths, and now I can sleep." The girl with the golden hair begins to lower her eyelids, and Link makes a desperate strangled noise in her throat. "Link, I told you. I've died in the Sacred Realm. I can't... I can't go back. Don't put your friends in jeopardy. If the Sacred Realm is fading away, then you all need to go before you fade away with it. Please."

Link looks up at her friends the Champions, all of whom talk at once, pushing back against the girl with the golden hair's words. She raises her right hand. The crescent-moon hand. The hand that bled out from the force of her own nails in the lost woods.

"Please...go on ahead. I need to talk to her myself." Yunobo whispers to Sidon what Link says; he and everyone else speak over one another at the same time. Too many at once for her to comprehend what they say. She repeats herself. "Please. We don't have time. Please, please, I won't forgive myself if I end up getting all of you in trouble over me."

Riju interrupts: "And what about you? What if you get yourself in trouble?"
"I promise I'll leave before the Sacred Realm disappears completely. The shrine is right here. I promise." Link touches her right hand to her chest. "You can trust me."

Riju glances up at Amali, at Kass, at Yunobo, who continues explaining to Sidon the goings-on. The Champions argue with one another while Link turns her attention back to the girl with the golden hair. Her companion has closed her eyes and smoothed her own brow as though she has already passed away. If not for the movements of breath from her nose, Link might fear that she had.

Riju yells at everyone to stop. "Thank the Goddesses," she shouts, "the Great Calamity has finally met its end. Let us put our trust in Link one last time." She looks down at Link, who looks up at her. "But you have to promise us something."

Yunobo adds in: "That she'll make us a meal?"

Kass hums in amusement. "There would be no more fitting promise that she could make."

Riju nods decisively; Link senses her mouth break into a smile. "I promise. I'll come back, and I'll make all of you your favourites. I won't say good-bye. I'm saying see you later, because I will see all of you later. Kass, Sidon, Sarie, Riju, Amali, Yunobo...thank you, all of you." Her eyes crinkle. "I'll see you topside."

Her friends each give her a final hug—Sidon's so firm that Link for a second forgets how to breathe—and prepare themselves by the mirror of the shrine.

Riju presses something into her right hand. Link glances down to find herself looking at a slate. "I think it's yours, from what you told me," Riju explains. "We found it on the floor, here, thank the Goddesses. I mean the original one you had a hundred years ago." Link inclines her head. "Then, I'll see you on the other side, Link. You can't sleep here. You have a promise to keep."

With a note of pride heating her chest, Link watches her friends gather at the mirror together, as a group that trusts one another beyond measure, as a group of not merely people brought together by circumstance but people truly friends with each other. Together, Sarie, and Kass, and Yunobo, and Amali, and Riju, and Sidon step through the gateway. Link observes them vanish into fire-light.

As soon as her friends return to the mortal world, she hears the girl with the golden hair speak. "Link...just go." The girl with the golden hair lies upon the ground of the castle. "Please. I told you. I've died. Even if I go back to the mortal world, my body isn't whole anymore, and I'll just end up dying there again. If I have to pick, I think I'd rather go here. At least I don't think that I'll feel pain here. It'll just be like...going to sleep." She laughs drily. "I guess I shouldn't be trying to escape pain. But you're the one who said that a woman's duty isn't to suffer. Just go, Link. Save yourself." She closes her eyes again. "I can't go back."

Link gazes at the girl with the golden hair. The very aether around them has begun to flake to gold. She needs to say something.

She needs to say something. She has no cooking pot to fall on. She has only herself, and she has her hand, and she has her constant inability to say anything, ever. She needs to say something, and she remembers: the girl with the golden hair's voice. She remembers.

"Cowards die many times before their deaths."

"The valiant...never taste of death but once." The voice of a girl with golden hair sitting across from her, holding a skewer of fruit and mushroom over a campfire, studying a sheet of paper, hand closed around the golden and violet charms at her throat, raising her head. Looking directly at her. Saying a word.

Saying her name.

"..."

Saying her name.

"...Link..."

Saying her name.

"Link."

Asking her that question. "Do you think...do think that that's true, Link?" Laughing lightly to herself. "Oh, never mind. I shouldn't be bothering you while you're training with the sword that seals the darkness." Curling up into herself. "After all, the blade of evil's bane did choose you."

Link raises her chin up. The girl with the golden hair. Again, curling up into herself. Again, pulling away from her. Again, trembling. She rests her right hand against the girl with the golden hair's cheek. Link brushes her thumb under the girl with the golden hair's eye. The pad of her finger comes away dry. The girl with the golden hair does not cry. Like she did at her mother's funeral, the girl with the golden hair remains as stone.

"There's not much time left, Link." The girl with the golden hair's breaths come ragged and rasped. "Please. You have to go through the mirror. I can't anymore. I can't."

Link presses gently in with her thumb. When the girl with the golden hair does not open her eyes, Link traces the characters into the scarred skin of her cheek.

"A long, long time ago," she signs silently into the girl with the golden hair's skin, "you asked me about a quote that you read from a book. It was a play, I think. You asked me once when I was awake, and then immediately you took it back, because I was practising with Fi and you didn't want to bother me, and I didn't know how to talk to you then. Then you asked me again, just before the Great Calamity. You thought I was asleep, and you didn't ask me again. We didn't have time. 'Cowards die many times before their deaths,' I think is how it went. The valiant never taste of death but once.' You asked me if I thought that that was true. I didn't say anything, because I didn't know how to answer. I didn't have the words. And I still don't have the words. But now, when I don't have the words, I've learned to try anyway, and sometimes I say things good. It's like trying out a new recipe for the first time."

She senses the girl with the golden hair shiver under her thumb. The Sacred Realm around them gilds her vision like honey spilled from the rim of a cooking pot.

"I don't think it's true. I don't know that much about being valiant, or being a coward, but. Living takes more courage than most people think. I've told you that before, when you asked me about that prayer, remember? You've had to, every single day of your life, every single moment of your life, keep choosing, over and over, to live, to stay alive, to will yourself back together. In the Sacred Realm, sure, where you had to keep yourself together. But in our world, too.

"We've both felt so tired a thousand times. We've both died a thousand times. We've both given up a thousand times. The thing that makes us courageous, the thing that means we have courage, is that every single time that we die and give up and lie down, we get back up again. We choose to live again. We choose to cling onto that very, very thin little thread of hope. We choose to keep fighting. We choose to live to see another breakfast, another dinner, another supper, another midnight snack. We choose to live.

"We choose, over and over and over again, to live. That's what makes us valiant. If that makes us cowards, too, then fine. We're cowards. We're afraid. But we're also valiant, because no matter how scared we are, we keep fighting, for ourselves and for everyone else.

"That's my answer. That's the answer I wish I'd given you a hundred years ago, but I don't think I could've." The words dawn upon her as she maps the characters into the girl with the golden hair's cheek. "I couldn't have. I told you to have hope on the eve of the Great Calamity, but I didn't know what it was like to realise it's...it's all right to feel like you want to give up, or that you want to die. Because even if you feel like that, you still keep fighting, and you get up, and you choose to live, again and again. That's more than just hope things work out, or hope in a better tomorrow. It's the courage to fight for that tomorrow, day in and day out. The courage to choose to live so that you can see that tomorrow, and the next one, and the next. And I couldn't have said that a hundred years ago. Because it's been these last two years that've taught me that. It's been these last two years that've changed me. Even if I don't have words, even if I want to give up, even if I want to die, I have promises to keep, and paths to walk before I sleep, and so do you."

The stars have long gone out, and the corners of the world have faded away. Where the Sacred Realm has dissipated into golden dust, Link sees neither the black of the void nor the white of the abyss she expected, but rather nothingness, pure and utter nothingness, steadily creeping inwards to the very heart where she and the girl with the golden hair kneel beside the first shrine that the girl with the golden hair ever awakened and the last shrine that Link awakened, at the beginning and the end, together again.

"Come with us, and I'll make you your favourite." Link closes her own eyes until her lashes rest against the curve of her cheeks. "I'll make you fruitcake. I'll make you fruitcake with apples, because that's my favourite fruit, and I'll make you fruitcake with bananas, because that's Urbosa's favourite and you always wanted me to include them, and I'll make you fruitcake with silent princess, and you'll tell me that I shouldn't use up such a rare flower that only blooms in the wilds, and I'll tell you that there's plenty more out there in the wilds for us to find and that if you love them and think that they're delicious that we should accept no substitute, and you'll tell me that I shouldn't do things so frivolously, and I'll tell you that I've used the Master Sword to cook before and I don't see anything at all wrong with that, and you'll tell me that that's exactly what you mean, and then I'll do that thing where I run my hand over my hair and sort of smile, and you'll laugh, and then we'll bake the fruitcake together just like you like it, like we've done so many times before."

The song of the Sacred Realm has started to fade; the world around them has coalesced to just this tower. Brushing the girl with the golden hair's cheek with her thumb, Link wills into existence a silent princess into the palm of her right hand.

She touches the soft velvet of the petals to the girl with the golden hair's face. Her companion accepts the silent princess into her own hands and holds it there, trembling against her chest.

"So please. Please come with me. We have to try. It is hope, or it is death, and I know that I'm asking so much of you, and I really really understand just how much I'm asking, but I want you, like you have every second of every day of your entire life, to choose hope once again. Please. Please. Just try. I love you."

"Oh, I don't know if I have the hope," she breathes, "but I can try. That's all I can do."

"That's all I ask. Take my hand."
"Wait. Not here." The girl with the golden hair shakes her head. "If we do it here, then we'll end up in the docks of the castle. I don't know if we'll be able to get out easily without the opening from the pyramid, and you need treatment for your arm." Link tilts her head. The girl with the golden hair brushes her hand against Link's slate. "I guess we'll never need to use these again," she whispers. "I don't think they'll work without the energy of the Sacred Realm. So we might as well...I think...it would make for a better ending, don't you think...? When I write down your story, and all the meals you've ever cooked."

She scrolls over the map of Hyrule. The pyramid itself has nearly faded away, Link's double vision ghosting gold over where the walls once towered immutable. The girl with the golden hair passes over the shrine at the heart of the tower, drifting south, south over the Hyrule Field. Not one hundred and twenty mirrors, Link realises, but one hundred and twenty-one.

"When I touch here, I think we'll end up in the portal immediately. Oh, that means we'll go right to the mortal world." Her words shiver; her breaths shudder. The girl with the golden hair lifts herself to her own feet. Link rises with her until they stand together. The girl with the golden hair holds up the slate in her right hand, her fingertip hovering over the fire-light mark. "Take my hand," she murmurs, her timbre saying not see you later but good-bye. "I love you, Link. Please, don't ever forget that. I love you."

"I love you, too," Link signs into her cheek. She grips her companion's left hand with her right, and then the girl with the golden hair touches her fingertip to the fire-light mark of the Shrine of Resurrection.

Once again Link feels herself come undone in a blaze of fire-light blue; she wonders if death, too, carries this strange sensation of all of her dissipating at once into mist, of her consciousness shifting through the wind as though carried on the back of a great red bird that answers only to her own call, of herself suddenly reforming from the fog.

Once again Link gasps into existence again, no longer in the thicker and more viscous aether but in the thinner air of the mortal world. She teeters on her own feet for a moment as she adjusts to a lack of double vision, as the afterimage of the gold of the skies of the Sacred Realm fades from her view, as she staggers forward in the grass and topples to her knees into the soil.

She senses her chest hit the earth, followed shortly by her chin. She hears the scampering of squirrels and the buzzing of crickets, the chirping of birds and bounding of bunnies. She smells the fragrance of flower and aroma of grass, the richness of earth and openness of sky.

Her left shoulder throbs. The warmth oozes from the wound left behind. Extending a shaking arm towards her satchel, she withdraws a piece of flint taken from the stone talus of the Great Plateau. She cracks the flint against the grass beside her and sparks a tiny flame, barely smoking. Link puffs breath onto the tiny ember until it roots into a steady fire. She glances around. A stick. A twig. She reaches for the branch she has had looped at her belt since Miyu presented her with it all those months and months ago. Lighting the tip of the branch in the flames, Link closes her eyes, bites down hard on the collar of her tunic which floods her mouth from the taste of her own dried blood, and cauterises the gaping wound of her left shoulder where the malice has eaten away her lightning-strike hand.

Her sword arm. Gone forever.Scarred over with a burn from the fire Link hurriedly puts out. The branch slips from her fingers. With Hyrule at peace, she need never raise a sword again.

She slopes down into the soil again. She lies face-flat in the dirt. The grass pokes at her face. The wind ruffles her hair. The scent of the earth settles in her bones.
An insect buzzing near her ear prompts her to turn her head and open her right eye. A grasshopper, hopping through grass. Its wings flicker from its back. She observes the grasshopper near her. Its antennae twitch. She puffs out a breath towards it and the grasshopper becomes absolutely still for a second prior to speeding away with all the haste that its tiny wings can give it.

She digs her right elbow into the grass. She props herself up on her arm. She recognises this hill: in the earth below her sleeps the Shrine of Resurrection. She inhales the scent of the wilds. And all of her memories come flooding back to her at once.

Link springs to her feet, falls over from the disorientation of only having a single arm, and lifts herself up from the ground again. The girl with the golden hair. The girl with the golden hair.

The girl with the golden hair who lies still on the earth upon her back, her head resting in the grass, her lashes brushing against her cheeks, her eyes closed, her limbs sprawled over, her legs at strange and awkward angles, her brow smooth, the silent princess Link gave to her flat against her chest.

Link throws herself to the girl with the golden hair's side. She can feel the tears that press in behind her eyes. When she tries touching her left hand to the girl with the golden hair's chest to sense her heartbeat, it takes her a moment to realise that she no longer has a left hand. Instead, lowering her head, she buries her face in the girl with the golden hair's chest.

Still warm. Yet she does not hear anything at all. Worse, she does not feel anything at all. And then she turns her head and rests her left ear against her companion's sternum: beat-beat-beat.

Link senses something against the knuckles of her right hand. Opening her eyes, she sees the girl with the golden hair having curled her fingers into a fist, gently bumping against Link's. Tears drip from Link's chin. She forms her own fist and bumps bump back against the girl with the golden hair's. "Link," the girl with the golden hair exhales, and for a second Link herself forgets how to to breath as she races to comprehend the words she hears, "are we...?"

Softly shifting side the girl with the golden hair's fingers, Link signs into her companion's open palm, painstakingly tracing each character with her one hand: "We are."

They bump knuckles again. "I promised you I'd do that, eh...?" The girl with the golden hair's eyelids flutter. Link watches her slowly open her eyes and gaze up at the blue, blue skies overhead. "Oh, I can't...I can't feel my legs at all." She breathes out out a quick-air hhhh of a laugh. "I can't feel anything below my hips." Link observes her struggling to sit up on her own. Swiftly, Link scoops her shoulders up in her arm. The girl with the golden hair looks down at her waist, at her legs. She reaches for her hips, thighs, her knees, her ankles, her feet, running her palm along her flesh. "...the Calamitous One cut me in half. The Calamitous One killed me. But I guess that my upper body remained intact, and I only reformed the lower half. I...I don't think I'll ever be able to walk again." She draws in a shuddering breath. Link feels the curve of her companion's back shaking against the crook of her arm; she holds the girl with the golden hair more tightly. "Despite everything, I'm still alive. You were right, Link. It was hope, or death. And in choosing hope, I...oh, who am I kidding?" She shakes her head. "I talk too much. This isn't the time for talking. This is the time for—"

Link feels the girl with the golden hair's arms sliding over her shoulders into the tunic's sleeves, her companion's palms brushing over her skin under the tunic, her fingers resting against Link's shoulder blades. The girl with the golden hair buries her face in the left side of Link's throat, her tears wetting and warming Link's skin. She lets slip all of the grief and the relief alike that she has held back for one hundred years. With only one arm, Link tries her best to balance while also embracing her companion back. She wobbles on her knees. Together, they topple into the earth.
Together, they rest in the dirt. Together, they laugh until their mouths hurt and their bellies ache. Together, they roll onto their sides, Link on her left, the girl with the golden hair on her right. The girl with the golden hair reaches out her left hand towards Link's right. Link does not flinch back; the girl with the golden hair catches her fingers and intertwines them.

They lie in silence on the bed of grass, Link listening to the girl with the golden hair's breathing deepen, and her pulse slow, and her warm fingers curl more tightly around Link's.

The girl with the golden hair gazes warmly at her, her eyes soft. In the light of the new dawn, Link looks more deeply into her irises than before; she realises with a start that the girl with the golden hair's eyes do not shimmer fire-light blue.

Green. A deep, deep green. The colour of the grass. The hue of spring. In all of the legends and in all of the stories and in all of the songs, the Princess has always borne eyes of fire-light. In all of her memories, Link recalled the girl with the golden hair those same eyes that she has heard. In the Sacred Realm, too, she swears that she saw her companion in fire-light blue, yet she considers, too, that the Sacred Realm bathed everything in gold, or in violet, or in blue.

She must have misremembered. She must have misremembered the colour of the girl with the golden hair's irises. The girl with the eyes as green as spring. Spring green.

The girl with the golden hair disentangles their hands. Her absence leaves Link's hand strangely cold. Reaching behind Link's shoulder, her companion grasps Fi's hilt. The wings retracted. The gold of the jewel dimmed. The fire-light glow given way to softened white, and Fi herself given way to nothing but a simple blade.

The girl with the golden hair touches her lips to the hilt as though kissing Fi's brow. "Thank you, Fi," she whispers. "Thank you. In the end, you've protected our world. I hope you know that, wherever you are." She meets Link's gaze. "With the Sacred Realm gone, I don't know if...I don't know if she still lives. But I hope she does. I'll hope beyond hope."

Link writes characters into the back of the girl with the golden hair's palm. "We'll put her back in the Kokir Forest. I don't know...I don't know either. But we'll hope. Maybe in the years to come, she'll return. She's watched over us all this time."

"I wish we could have spent more time with her. To know her story. Yet everything happened so quickly, I..." The girl with the golden hair kisses Fi's brow again. Curving her own arm blade, Link very carefully hugs her, just in case Fi still lives in the sword, so that Fi does not feel guilty if Link cuts herself upon the edge. "Thank you, Fi. That's all that I can say. Thank you."

While Link embraces Fi to her chest, the girl with the golden hair withdraws something else: the slate. Link lifts her head up from the grass and observes the girl with the golden hair make an effort to use the slate, yet the surface remains dark and transparent. The girl with the golden hair tests her fingers over the whole of the slate: nothing.

"You know, Link." The slate pomfs onto the grass. The girl with the golden hair rolls onto her back, facing the skies. "Since you...disappeared the Sacred Realm, the Triforce, and all of it, all of my research's poofed too. Going back ten thousand years, and far before that." Extending her arm skyward, she splays her fingers towards the sun as though cupping sunlight into her palms. Link rubs the back of her head. "Oh, it's all right. It's over now. No one is ever going to have to pray for years of her life just to access some sealing magic that doesn't exist. No one is ever going to have to worry about someone stealing away into the Sacred Realm only to corrupt himself again. No one is going to..." The girl with the golden hair shakes her head again. "Oh, I guess we'll have to learn to live alongside the beings of will now. That'll be strange in its own way. And...we won't have the shrines anymore, or the Divine Beasts, or the guardians. Oh, it's what you said. Hyrule will live by her own hand. That's...that's really nice."

"I promise I'll help you with your research," Link swears. The girl with the golden hair raises her eyebrows. Link smiles sheepishly. "I'll eat all the hot-footed frogs you want me to."

The girl with the golden hair stares at her. She snorts, and then she giggles, and then she erupts into laughter that crosses between the bleating of a goat and the snorting of a boar. Link scoots forward, resting her forehead against the girl with the golden hair's until her wheezing laughter subsides.

"Link." She glances up at the sound of her name. "I'd like to meet your friends. But please.
Don't...don't call me the Princess. Hyrule Castle is gone now. The royal family...is gone now. I'll not bear the name Harkinian any longer. Oh, whatever happens to Hyrule..." The girl with the golden hair touches her hand to her chest. "...she doesn't need a royal family anymore. I'm not the Princess. I'm just...me." She lowers her gaze to the grass. "I hope that that's enough."

Link tips up her companion's chin until they look into one another's eyes. "I know that everyone called you the Princess, but, well, you know that I never really got that prophecy stuff. You've never been the Princess like that to me. You're the girl with the golden hair. You're smart, and you know how to play an eight-stringed harp, and you love fruitcake, and you love silent princesses, and you have the whole wide world to explore, and you're determined, and you're hopeful, and you're one of the most courageous people that I've ever met."

Her companion's cheeks redden. She clears her throat. "Oh, I don't know if I'd say all that. Well.
Well then. Well. Anyways. Ahem. Then." The girl with the golden hair boops Link's nose with her forefinger. "We should probably rejoin the others. I think both of us need to see a healer. Oh, and we should make sure that they know we're alive." Link nods. "However, before we do that, you have a promise to keep." The girl with the golden hair hesitates. "If you can." Link tilts her head to one side.

"You promised me fruitcake." The girl with the golden hair's smile broadens until the entirety of her face has lit up brighter than the Triforce. "If you have the ingredients, I'd like you to make it for me. The fruitcake that you said I liked."

Link pauses, and then she grins. "That's perfect. That's perfect! I can't wait to cook you food! I can't wait! I don't have a cooking pot but we can go to the cabin! I have most everything I need already. We just have to get some apples. And then...and then...!" She bounces to her boots.

Then she stops and looks down at the girl with the golden hair, who strains to sit up. "I can't carry destiny," Link signs very solemnly, "but I can carry you."

The girl with the golden hair throws her arms around Link's shoulders. Link swings the girl with the golden hair's legs up over her left shoulder, then cradles the girl with the golden hair in her right arm. They set off.

With Link relying upon just her right arm, and the girl with the golden hair no longer in control of her legs, they slip and fall and pick themselves back up over and over. They laugh at the grass staining their clothing green. They giggle at the insects that buzz away from them, at the birds that flutter off, at the rabbits that bound away. They poke fun at one another and at themselves as they lope across the Great Plateau, stopping by a creek to drink, pausing by a bush to pluck off a few berries.

They come to the cliffside that Link knows all too well. The wind that caresses their faces and runs through their hair. The trees swaying under the same caress. The fragrance of the world.
They pant as one and every lungful brings them closer together. Further. At the edge the entire earth falls away beneath them to slope down in an endless sea of green. Trees. A lake further beyond. And there, in the centre of their view, the heart of the world. No longer imposing, no longer immutable. At peace.

Their heads spin. To the right rise a spine of mountains piercing the heavens. To the left, in the distance, wait fields of golden wheat that give way to the endless snows. Below them the plains roll forward in the gentle wind.

Link has not words enough for all she sees. but one burns at the tips of her fingers. She signs the word to the girl with the golden hair, touching her hand to her companion's cheek, to her companion's eye, to the centre of her companion's chest, a path she has shaped over and over in her life.

Home.

Hyrule.

They stand on the cliffside for a long, long time.

The rumble of their stomachs leads them away. They spot a tree heavy with apples down the hill. The same tree, Link realises, from which she harvested apples in that first spring of her awakening long, long ago.

They tumble through the grasses towards the tree. The apples prove too high up for Link to reach. She, unaccustomed to climbing with one arm, falls repeatedly. A sudden blowing of a horn whirls her around: she ogles a troop of bokoblins at the top of the hill. They wave at her. She gestures towards the apples. One of the bokoblins squirrels up the tree and shakes the apples from its boughs. The girl with the golden hair and Link thank the bokoblins profusely. The bokoblins dance around them. Link, the girl with the golden hair, and the bokoblins struggle to communicate using body language alone, but the bokoblins end up assisting Link in carrying the girl with the golden hair across the Great Plateau to the cabin.

Digging through the cabin, Link comes upon and pans with which to cook. For the bokoblins, in gratitude, she roasts their boar for them, stuffed with hylian shroom and spicy peppers. The bokoblins thank her in their own way—with snorts and shuffling of feet and a strange little dance—and then carry the boar off.

Link and the girl with the golden hair set up shop around the firepit that whoever once lived in this cabin—Mudora, and Mudora's son; Kass's mentor, and his mentor's father—built. They heat up a baking tin in the hearth inside of the cabin. The girl with the golden hair butters the bottom of the tin with sand seal butter. Clapping her hands together, Link prays in thanks to the Goddesses for sending her Riju, who understood better than anyone else exactly what Link would need to face the Calamitous One.

In a bowl, she beats together distilled cane sugar, nutmeg, ginger, clove, and cinnamon with aerated salt, rock salt, softened sand seal butter, eggs collected from nests on the Great Plateau, and a drop of vanilla extract from the vial Amali gave her. While the girl with the golden hair holds the bowl still for her, Link mixes in the very last of the flour, not enough for egg tart but enough for a small quantity of fruit cake. The batter becomes too thick for her to stir properly, and the girl with the golden hair takes over; Link props her up.

Together, they puree some of the apples, bananas, and silent princess—the girl with the golden hair winces on the latter, but Link points out that they have already plucked the silent princess and that the silent princess came from the Sacred Realm and thus could not grow here—and chop up others into small chunks with which to layer the cake. They blend the pureed fruit and flower into the batter.

The girl with the golden hair and Link pour the batter into the tin together. The girl with the golden hair smooths the batter over the top. "You're supposed to sprinkle on sugar, right?"

"We could do salt instead," Link suggests, still getting the hang of signing with a single arm.

Her companion puts her hands on her hips. "Really?" Link nods. "I hate to admit it," she responds morosely, "but, oh, I couldn't say no to salt if I wanted."

They compromise with a sprinkle of sugar and salt, of science and intuition, of prim-and-proper and whatever-tastes-good. Link prepares butter-cream icing while they wait for the loaf of cake to bake in the hearth. When the cake finishes baking, the girl with the golden hair takes Link's trusty cooking knife. Poking her tongue out of the corner of her mouth in concentration, she proceeds making extremely even cuts in the cake and spreading icing extremely evenly on each of the layers. Link slides in slices of apple and banana between the layers, topping the cake with the petals of the silent princess, the blue standing out against the white of the icing.

At long last, they take the finished fruitcake outside to sit at the campfire and share the fruitcake from a communal baking tin with all of the wilds combined.

The girl with the golden hair cuts each of them a slice. Link holds hers in her lap while she leans in and observes her companion's reaction. Raising the dessert to her mouth, the girl with the golden hair bites down and lets out nearly a moan, which does not surprise Link anymore, but rather brings out a grin from ear to ear.

"It's...it's so moist," says the girl with the golden hair, muffled around the fruitcake; she blushes hard enough that Link can see the pink on the light brown of her cheeks. "A-and delicious. I mean no insult. It's really good."

"Food tastes best when you help cook," Link answers. "Thank you for helping."

The girl with the golden hair does not duck her head this time. Instead, she smiles warmly until her eyes crinkle, the tears long since dried. "Oh, and...I forgive you." Link cocks her head. "For wasting that elixir on me. The one that the Dragons gave you." The girl with the golden hair rubs the back of her own head in emulation of the gesture that Link has done so many times. Link finds herself smiling softly back. "...thank you. So. Go on. Try the fruitcake. Tell me what you think."

Link takes a bite. The sweetness of the icing melting on her tongue interweaves the fullness of the cake crumbling pleasantly in her mouth; the delightful contrast of the tartness of the spring apple, the sweet roundness of the banana, and the mild bitterness of the silent princess serenade her tongue; the fragrances of the fresh fruit and flower between the layers—the crunchy apple, the yielding banana, the velvety petal—run their juices down her chin.

She swallows. The fruitcake warms her belly. She inhales; the aroma waters her mouth and she takes another bite. She has smelled this scent before.

"Link..." The girl with the golden hair, her features soft, her voice gentle, her fingers interlaced. "...do you really remember me?"

A gesture. The gesture of the girl who has kept her promises and walked her paths sitting across from the girl with the golden hair, holding a slice of fruitcake over a campfire, studying the lines of the face she knows so well, regarding the hundred years that they have struggled and fought and lived for the people of the land known as Hyrule. Looking directly at her. Signing a word.

Signing her name.

The girl with the fruitcake, signing her name.

Zelda.

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: I already talked about this last chapter, but it bears repeating. I don't mean to preach here, mind, just talk about my subjective experiences and feelings. Living takes more courage than most people think. To have to choose to live day in and day out...that's something I've learned. There's more to it than having hope. Well, I'll be a bit personal with all of you, for those of you who might take comfort from my story. When I was in my nadir of my life, sometimes unable to rise out of bed, culminating in a brief period of boundless energy once I began planning my own suicide, the first step to climbing back out was the hope that things could change in the future. But hope wasn't enough. I could lie there at the bottom of the lake, staring at up at the sky above the surface of the water, hoping that one day I would float skyward. It took immense courage to even dream about confronting my flaws in constructive ways —instead of just "haha this is another reason why I should die; I'm a monster; I'm horrible and should never interact with people"—and to ever so slowly better myself as a person. I'm not saying that I'm some sort of saint. I have days of immense difficulty, and I have hurt a great many people (although I do not suffer from the same issues that Link does, as I do not enjoy that sort of self-insertion when I write, rather preferring to pull on my life experiences). But, with courage enough, I have slowly gotten better, and will hopefully continue to do so, especially with my supportive friends and chosen family beside me. My point to you, the reader, is that things can and do get better. It's hard. I know it's hard. But getting better requires immense effort on your part. I believe in you.

The ending of Breath of the Wild was disappointing for me. The four guide characters (Riju, Teba, Yunobo, and Sidon) had no role in it, and neither did Impa. Link just shows up alone and gets it done. The Champions—who are supposed to be dead—play a massive impact. We never receive any kind of information on how or why Calamity Ganon came about. Zelda magically reforms in her seventeen-year-old state with nary a word of explanation. She then somehow uses the Triforce to just dissipate Calamity Ganon, in a process I don't understand, and that's it. Is Ganon dead forever? Did she use the Triforce? How did this happen? Where did she suddenly get the ability to do so? How did she reform? It left a sour note in my mouth, although I will say that the final scene made me realise for the first time that the flower in the Breath of the Wild logo is a silent princess. That's right! I literally did not realise that until the very last few seconds of the game! So there's that.

In the true ending, Zelda mentions that she's lost her sacred powers again and then talks about restoring Hyrule to its former glory and beyond. I'm not a fan. Here, in Delicious in Wilds, Zelda very purposefully decides that, regardless of what happens next, the Harkinian royal family of Hyrule is done. She's not the princess. It's over. She'll just be herself, and that will be enough.

Zelda and Link's disabilities are not meant to be punishments. They are what they are, nothing more and nothing less. As I've mentioned before, I originally intended to have a tragic ending that ended with Zelda having to remain in the Sacred Realm forever, but then I realised that that not only unfair narratively and that I had a better idea. Because living with yourself is more important than having a downer ending. I'm glad I went with the decision I did.

Zelda's line, "Do you really remember me?" is from the ending of Breath of the Wild. As for the ending of this chapter...if you don't recognise it, I recommend rereading the ending of the very first chapter. It's been nearly three months, but...suffice to say that there's no other bookend I could end it on. After all, Zelda was in the very first memory, giving Link back her name. I couldn't think of anything better to end it on, than Link giving Zelda back hers.

Up next: desserts in wilds.

Beta reader's comments: Such an emotional cooldown. I don't really have words for how it makes me feel. I'll leave what words I do have for next chapter.

Chapter Summary

Life goes on. Meals are shared. The people endure.

Chapter Notes

Author's notes: I technically started writing this chapter at 05:49 on the twenty-eighth of July (it ended with the word Zelda), but I started writing at 17:58 on the twenty-third of August, and finished writing it at 22:19 on the twenty-third of August.

I'm not one to ask for reviews. That said, given the sheer length of Delicious in Wilds, I'm curious to know how many people have read this to the end. Thus, even anonymously, if you're reading this, please drop a comment below (as simple as "yeah I read this") to satiate my curiosity! I wrote this primarily for myself, so thank you so much for reading through it. It means the world to me. You likely won't see much from me again, at least not for a while. Just in case you don't hear from me, I do receive email notifications and plan to try to respond as soon as I can to each comment.

With respect to the work I put into this fic: at my maximum, I write 1200 words per hour, so the total writing (including author's notes) took $\frac{749730}{1200} = 625$ hours, and I can proof 3000 words an hour, so total proofing took $\frac{630494}{3000} = 210$ hours. Posting each chapter took about half an hour, for $\frac{84}{2} = 42$ hours. Thus, at minimum, I put in 877 hours of serious, continuous work into Delicious in Wilds, and it's been worth every second.

As of this time of writing, I have clocked 2498 hours on my copy of Breath of the Wild for the WiiU. Despite its many, many flaws from both gameplay and narrative perspectives, I can (still) honestly say that Breath of the Wild brought back my love for video games in a way that I have not felt for eight long years. As for the rest, I'm going to let the afterword that I wrote back in August speak for this chapter.

So, one more time. Thanks a million, to my beta reader and best friend, Emma. And thanks a million to you, dear reader. I mean every word.

Up next: the rest of our lives. Without further ado...!

Beta reader's comments: I've kept my comments pretty short over the course of this series. I've had more to say than I have said, but have been really anxious about writing it out - after all, who cares about the opinions of the beta reader, who can't even really offer insight into the series beyond "I liked this"? I still think that's true - who really even cares - but I'm gonna write all of this out anyway.
It's hard to put into words how much Delicious in Wilds means to me. This series has been months and months of my life. It's been there through good times and through bad. Mostly, it's given me the good times. This series is directly responsible for my life being a lot better now than it was before it began. I owe it so much.

I'd like to carve out a section here to do something I haven't done in my comments before - thank the author. The author is my very best friend in the whole world, and has made me a better person, and given me so many of the best moments of my life. Working on this series alongside my best friend has been one of the most incredible experiences of my entire life.

For months and months, Delicious in Wilds has been a centerpiece of my life, a true constant. I don't know the shape of life to come with it finished. It's bittersweet. I'm sad that it's over, but so very glad that it's out there in the world, so that you, who's reading this, can experience all the ups and downs, just as I have. You the reader can experience the joy of Link laughing in the woods and petting Ilia, the heartbreak of her remembering Marin and Aryll, the bittersweet nostalgia of honouring the past, the companionship of sharing a meal with friends.

I made so many great memories over the course of this series. Bawling my eyes out at the chapter where Link talks to Maryll, cozying up at the beach reading the Medli chapters, listening to a song on repeat reading the chapter in which Link finds Ilia again, sitting inside on a rainy day while proofing chapter after chapter alongside my best friend, the author of this series.

I hope that you've made as many memories reading this series as I have.

And if you've made it all this way, and you're sad that this series has come to a close - if you're feeling the heart pangs that accompany the bittersweet ending of something truly great - then I leave you with some advice that the author gave me over a year ago, which I have kept near and dear to my heart: Don't be sad, because it's never truly over. Link, and Zelda, and Ilia, and all the rest, will still be there, waiting for you to return.

My name is Emma, and I'd like to thank you from the bottom of my heart for taking this incredible journey with the author and I.

Thanks a million.

Hyrule is very, very vast, and Zelda and Link travel very, very together.

They meet with a party searching for them in the Hyrule Field, their bodies battered and bloodied and bruised almost beyond recognition yet—with Fi upon Link's back—unmistakable. They see again their friends: Yunobo, and Amali, and Riju, and Sidon, and Sarie, and Kass. They embrace. They weep. They cook a meal.

Zelda does not introduce herself as the Princess, but as merely Zelda, nothing more, and nothing less. The Princess has eyes of fire-light blue and the sealing magic of the Goddess at her fingertips; standing tall with the blessed bloodline that runs through her veins, the Princess glows with beauty and with grace. Zelda has eyes of spring green and too much knowledge of the world at hers; covered in scars and in burns, perched in a wheelchair, Zelda glows with passion and with love. She asks everyone about everything. She carries with her scrolls furled up in her pack to record as much information as she can: history, fauna, flora, songs, cooking, whatever people will tell her.

Link's friends do not call her the Princess. They call her Link's old friend, and they call her their own friend, and they call her Zelda.

In Ruto of Lanayru, the people of Hyrule—those who can—gather for a feast in honour of Hyrule, saved from the brink. They do not ask Link to speak; the King Zora allows her to sit not at the head of the table but instead with everyone else, alongside her friends and Zelda. She wolfs down every manner of food until she passes out on the table. Zelda names to herself every person who has fought with her these past hundred and two years, many of whom may not have made it from the Sacred Realm. Link suggests she honour them in the most intimate way possible: a meal, cooked and eaten for them. Zelda acquiesces. They spend the rest of the festivities in the royal kitchens. When her friends join her, Riju at the forefront, Link's heart threatens to thunder out of her chest.

The people of Hyrule bury their dead; tend to their wounded; inscribe the histories of those who knowingly sacrificed themselves and those whose lives were unwillingly cut short. The people of Hyrule work to heal the scars that ten thousand years of dust and one hundred years of passing have inflicted on the land. All of the people of Hyrule, beings of blood and beings of will alike.

Link and Zelda travel the world. Steadily, Link becomes used to having only her right arm. She learns better how to balance herself; she learns how to eat and to write with her non-dominant hand. She jokes to Zelda that her writing was cucco-scratch before, that this changes nothing. Steadily, Zelda becomes used to her wheelchair, becomes used to that which she can do and that which she cannot, makes light of the fact that she can at least fit the wheelchair with all sorts of useful pouches in which to hold her paper, her pens, her ink, her maps, her books.

They bring Fi again to the lost woods. The mists have long vanished, and the woods have become forest, nothing more and nothing less. Together holding her hilt, Zelda and Link sheathe her in stone. They tell her see you later. Link cooks for the nine hundred and one koroks a meal of loam which Sarie rates as actually pretty good, and she leaves nine hundred koroks in the woods.

Sarie has decided to see the world for themselves. "Sarie will come to visit," they say cheerily, "but Sarie has spent much too long hiding and forgetting and losing their joy. Like her, Sarie will go across Hyrule, and then Sarie will come home to Link and Zelda!"

"You don't have a nickname for Zelda?" Link inquires.

Sarie laughs, a sound like wooden blocks. "Zelda's too good a name for Sarie to call her something else!" They bid Zelda and Link see you later. "I won't forget either of you, you know."

Link and Zelda travel the world. They travel to Eldin, and to Tabantha, and to Parapa, and to Lanayru. They say their good-byes to the people they have loved and lost, to Daruk, to Revali, to Urbosa, to Mipha, with gifts of their favourite meals: deliciously grilled rock roast, and fish pie, and fried bananas, and seafood paella. They witness the efforts of reconstruction. Zelda records their histories. Link bites down into a deliciously grilled rock roast Yunobo prepared for her. She chips her teeth and ends up with difficulty relieving herself for a solid week, but damn if she doesn't eat the rock roast.

Delicious. "In wilds," she adds. Zelda tilts her head; Link tells her about how Sarie said that once, for reasons that Link does not quite understand, but which somehow feels right.
Her satchel filled to the brim in honey, Link introduces Zelda to her family at Romani Ranch: to Maryll, to Malon, to Vish, to Cremia, to Romani, to Miyu. When Link hears Romani yell "Grasshopper," she can feel in the marrow of her bones that she has come home.

They accept Zelda as one of their own. Link introduces Zelda, too, to her beloved companion Ilia, against whose forehead she rests her own. "A horse and her girl," remarks Zelda, her smile warm as the sun, "like Urbosa would've said."

Along the eastern border of Central Hyrule, Link runs into a caravan she knows all too well. Misan. And Glepp. And other former members of the Yiga rehabilitating to a world in which they were wrong. Glepp apologises profusely to Link; she explains that she and the others like her whom she has met along her journey have dedicated themselves to providing reparations and support in whatever way they can to those whom they have harmed. Misan has not quite forgiven her, and Glepp can foresee a long, long time before Misan can trust her again, if she ever does. "Yet this is my chance to make things right, no matter how long it takes," Glepp signs, her gaze towards the skies, towards the horizon, towards the future. "And I want to make things right. Not only for Misan, though I do love her, but also for the people I have hurt. Thank you for giving me another chance."

Misan claps her hands together and thanks Link for the belated wedding cake. Link suggests that someday they should all go to Ruto, so that she and Sidon and Misan can sit together, so that she can fulfill the joke that Sidon made years ago. Misan agrees. They go. Sidon roars with laughter.

When Zelda and Link return to Romani Ranch, Link describes the experience to Romani, who whaps Link over the head with a branch for the terrible jest but finds herself laughing all the same.

They journey to Mount Nayru to bid good-bye to Epona and to Storm, their most valiant companions who passed away. They cook for the horses a steamed pumpkin of fruit and vegetable, like the kind that Link and Ilia used to make. Zelda clasps her hands together. On the route back, they reminisce of their horses, of Epona whom Marin gave to Link and whom Ilia raised, of Storm whom Zelda only learned to trust too little too late.

Link and Zelda trek to Telma Ranch, where they learn that Ilia and the other villagers took refuge across the river in the hidden shrine by the Hickaly Woods. Link cries into Ilia's lap while Ilia strokes her hair; Zelda bows her forehead to the floor in gratitude for Ilia having helped Zelda and Link all those years ago. "You take good care of her, Zelda," Ilia signs, resting her hands against her in hips, "or she'll get herself killed trying to cook something one of these days, or get her head stuck in her cooking pot and lose her humanity to stew-manity."

Link proudly indicates her once-buttered neck. "I already did that last bit, thank you very much!"

Ilia arches an eyebrow to Zelda, who tries and fails to hold back her laughter. "See what I mean? She's hopeless and I love her for it."

Link cries again. "I love you too."

While Zelda elaborates to Ilia on what happened after they parted in the Ash Swamp during the Great Calamity, Link thanks Ravio profusely for having made good on his promise. Yet Ravio, pulling up his hood, explains that Ilia herself moved everyone for safety. She returns to Ravio the ocarina, but Ravio tells her that she can keep it, that "the old lady made me one 'erself'n that's cooler'n somethin' she took from ya."

Before they leave again, Ravio clears his throat and inquires if Link wouldn't mind stopping by more often. With a light little laugh, Link answers that, after she has seen to the world, she will.
In Darunia, they watch Yunobo put on a performance portraying a somewhat embellished version of Link's journey from the Shrine of Resurrection to the Sacred Realm, with beings of will taking on the place of monsters and of allies alike, the first joint stage production in the known history of Hyrule. He calls the play Saving the World and Other Joys of Cooking; the staff has for the theatre-goers regular samples of food so that they may try out the meals named on-stage, an innovation that brings Link to tears. Link hands the silvered iron and mirrored pot lids off to Eldic smiths, who melt them down and forge them into pot lids anew, carrying on the tradition of cooking. Afterwards Link meets, at last, Yunobo's father, who sweeps Link into an embrace so tight Link's body retains braces for a week thereafter. Yunobo's father raves about his pride in his incredible son while Yunobo—instead of hiding away in embarrassment—puffs out his chest. Link shows him how to fist-bump; though her knuckles hurt for days, she does not forget his smile.

In Medli, Link finds Amali and Kass returning to the life of taking care of their daughters, who have had to grow up far too much in the past several years. Link cooks meals for her extended family; Zelda records the songs that Kass and Amali know. While Zelda enthusiastically interrogates Medli surveyors about their collaboration with Hebric frost tali to grow jewels within their hearts as oysters grow pearls, Kass procures for her and Link an eight-stringed harp and a six-stringed ages. The next time Amali and Kass host a music night, which is every night, Link and Zelda join in, playing alongside Amali's windchimes and Kass on accordion and voice. Amali has a new soft-feathered tunic fashioned for Link, this one in green. "If it had to happen a fourth time," she says while Link presses her face into Amali's chest and Amali holds her tight, "then, I think it's most appropriate to dress you in green. You are the greenest girl I know, and I mean that in the best way possible."

In Nabooru, Link introduces Zelda to the other person in the wilds of Hyrule who understands the importance of food just as much as she: Riju. Riju, who travels the countryside to every village and town, ensuring the livelihood of her people as they repair, as they mend, as they learn to live and work alongside the beings of will that cohabit the world. Riju, Zelda, and Link cook up every meal that they can imagine. Riju inquires a thousand questions about Urbosa, and Zelda responds a thousand answers. In turn, Riju introduces Link and Zelda to her own friends and beloved, both those Link has seen before—like Buliara—and those whom Link has not had time before to meet; they spend many days beneath the bluest sky that Link has ever seen and many nights beneath the stars. Riju's voice swells when she speaks of her people: the Parapans have returned to their homes, their efforts of tree-planting reverting the reach of the sands; the Zuni people have retaken their hospitable Tantari again; and many former whalers have devised new work ferrying people and goods on the backs of the molduga they once hunted. Link confesses that Riju reminds her so much of Aryll that she could weep, and Riju repairs for Link the trusty red telescope with glass forged of Tantari sand. When Link thanks Riju for the ice-box, Riju invites Link to come by whenever she wants so that they can cook together. Link promises she will. "Don't forget that I love you, Link," Riju whispers, hugging her around the middle. Link whirls her around as they laugh together. "I love you too. And your cooking."

In Ruto, they witness Sidon preside over the first diving competition with beings of blood and beings of will alike. Finley takes the junior division; a daira takes the newly-formed being of will division; and a blue-scaled zora named Gruve takes the senior division from under Sidon's nose. Sidon pumps Gruve's arm so enthusiastically that he nearly throws Gruve off of the cliff. He demonstrates to Link how to fish and prepare shark. Zelda and Link learn how to fish properly now that the latter no longer has use of hylian bomb fishing. Link thanks Sidon profusely. She opens up her old bar at the East Reservoir again, however briefly, and welcomes customers old and new, while Zelda assists in taking orders, steaming fish, mixing drinks, and changing lives. Link parts from Ruto with another fishing pole and the knowledge of how to use it. She thanks Sidon, who calls her one of his most treasured friends.
In Hateno, Link finds that the laboratory has transformed from merely trying to emulate guardians to partnering with Inpaz College and creating new technologies using the electricity from topaz. Several representatives of Uruda and other Parapan schools exhibit the benefits of topaz over the benefits of the energies of the Sacred Realm, namely that the latter no longer exist at all.

In Kakariko, Zelda sees Impa again for the first time in one hundred years. "You still have," Zelda breathes, "the bracelet."

"And I have for one hundred years." Impa's voice shivers. "I missed you, Zelda. I am sorry I could never say this before, but the Goddesses have granted us the time now for me to respect my own Goddess's virtue of truth." She closes her eyes. "I loved you then, and I love you now."

"Impa." Zelda's shoulders shake. "Even when we were at our lowest low, I never stopped loving you. My first and oldest friend."

Impa and Zelda gaze at one another, and they break into tears, and they embrace. Zelda whispers that she has never seen Impa cry like this. Impa apologises for everything that she ever through. They speak to one another without the king's shadow blanketing them for the first time in their lives. They speak like they spoke years and years ago when they were young, when Impa did not yet understand the gravity of her role as the Princess's shade, when Zelda did not yet understand the gravity of her role as the Princess. They talk honestly.

While Zelda and Impa reunite, Link spends time with the people of the village, including Dorian, Koko, and Cottla, who have settled back in to Kakariko. Dorian notes that they travel regularly to see Koko and Cottla's friends in Medli. Link finds Paya standing just slightly straighter of spine and just slightly stronger of speech. Together, they cook all sorts of foods, Kakariko specialties, sheikah cuisine, and meals from outside of Necluda. Snapping her fingers, Link presents to Zelda her own dossiers and the king's journal. Zelda reads through them. She cries. She dries her tears. "Thank you, Link. Thank you. I..." She shivers. "I...don't think I will be able to forgive him, and never again will I call myself Princess Zelda Satoru Miyahon Harkinian," she says at length, gazing beyond the Pillars of Levia into a distant past, "but at least I know he believed in me after all."

In the Hyrule Field, Link prepares a bowl of creamy heart soup in the remains of Lon Lon Ranch. She does not weep, for she knows that Marin rests far, far away near Mount Satori, but she takes the moment to speak of Marin to Zelda, who speaks to her in turn of Urbosa. They travel north. Link bakes a carrot cake that she and Zelda share in the quiet of the castle, in the ruined chambers where Link and Aryll once slept, far, far away from that house. One day, these wounds, too, shall heal. Link tells Aryll about her journey. She tells Aryll about all of the birds that she has seen and about the Aryloftwing. She tells Aryll of how the trusty red telescope has saved her life over and over again. She tells Zelda about Aryll, and she promises that next time they visit Telma Ranch, she will have Ilia tell Zelda about Aryll, and Zelda swears to record it all. They eat the carrot cake for the girl with the pigtails who can no longer eat it herself. Zelda holds Link as she cries out the tears she has kept within her for one hundred years. Aryll, Aryll, Aryll.

At the end of their long journey, Link and Zelda return to Romani Ranch. Miyu barks at their arrival amid the fields of wheat. Romani grins and informs Link that she has not seen Them since the ending of the Sacred Realm. "Wow wow wow! Maybe the Them were just will-people that wanted some Chateau Romani." Romani claps her hands. "I hope the Them come back so I can make Them some!" Cremia paints Zelda into a portrait of the family all together. Malon and Vish announce that they seem to happen upon a new daughter every year. Zelda smiles sheepishly, and Link makes fruitcake to celebrate.
Zelda and Link alternate between the two ranches. They return to Romani Ranch to assist to the harvest and the foaling, and come back to Telma Ranch for Link to see Ilia as much as she can and to Kakariko for Zelda to see Impa as much as she can. Ilia passes away in the spring—her favourite season—and Link readsies catfish stew in a pumpkin gourd for the funeral. Hilda and Ravio and Link say the rites. They scatter her ashes to the wind. Impa passes away at summer's end.

Clutching the violet bracelet to her chest, Zelda weeps as she did not weep at her mother's funeral. Not tears of grief, but of joy. For having been able to see Impa again after all. Not tears of tragedy, but of looking on to the future. Towards the peace for which Impa fought and won.

Paya sets off to see the world. Link offers her of the location of Romani Ranch. "Come by, and I'll make you some papaya again. No insects, I promise."

"Actually, Link, I wanted to thank you." Paya beams. "You he-helped me acquire a taste for bugs." Link grins. Zelda raises her eyebrows and inquires if Link wouldn't mind bestowing upon her the wisdom of insect-eating.

Link and Zelda move in to Romani Ranch to live with their family. With Maryll, who passes away a few autumns on, and with Malon and Vish, and with Cremia and Romani, and with Miyu of course. Yet they travel just as frequently, sometimes alone, sometimes with Cremia and later Romani, sometimes with other travellers. They travel to all of the places that Link has ever known, to Kakariko, to Darunia, to Medli, to Nabooru, to Ruto, to Kakariko, to all the others. And travellers come to them: Paya, and Sarie, and Sidon, and Riju, and Kass and Amali, and Yunobo, and so many others with whom Link can share stew from her communal cooking pot.

When they come home to the ranch, Sarie plants the golden gift Hestu gave Link by the house; it sprouts into a tree bearing the most succulent spring apples leaved on gold. The world changes. The world heals. The wilds of Hyrule and the people who make something out of them grow, and flourish, and stand strong as one.

Time passes. The seasons turn. Link names Ilia's first filly after Epona and her first colt after Storm. Sometimes, in the summers, Link dons a simple white sundress while she sits with Cremia and Romani on the porch eating the cool hydromelon Riju—and, far later, her wife—brings on her visits. Zelda compiles research on the wilds and on Hyrule's history; Link assists her in determining and quantifying the effects of certain critters and herbs, including the hot-footed frog. With the assistance of Ravio, who proves a knowledgeable gardener, she develops a strain of silent princess bearing similar taste and effects but capable of proliferation in captivity. She dubs it the sneaky scholar. "After all the times I sneaked out to do my own research," Zelda explains, her smile shy; Link beams and asks if she can cook with it. "Oh, Link. Do you really think I'd make something you couldn't cook with?"

Together they bake a thousand fruitcakes of sneaky scholar, though Link only uses bananas very sparingly, Marin's advice on her mind. Zelda helps her crimp the fruitcakes, and Link could not ask for a better happiness. Although, there remains one thing.

Link asks for Zelda a single favour: a strain of sea lily's bells capable of growing and thriving far away from the shores of Lake Hylia. Zelda works tirelessly day in and day out; Cremia and Link together have to drag her away from her books and force her to eat. At last, in the earliest days of springs, Zelda presents to Link a flower, the petals red, the centre gold. Link brings one, trembling, to her nose: the same sun-kissed scent.

Romani, and then Lon Lon, undulate in seas of gold and scarlet, in memory of a girl who wore a violet sash around her hips and carried Link's heart in her hands.

Zelda finds her research accepted in academia across the land; more importantly, she finds her research accepted in cooking pots and kitchen tables, where the people of Hyrule who matter cook her research into the reality of their meals.

She tells Link excitedly of her findings. Link listens. When she comprehends little, she asks; Zelda sits with her for hours on end explaining and educating until Link understands.

The years slip by. Zelda scribes a long, long story of Link's adventures—and her own—starting from the moment that Link awakened in the Shrine of Resurrection. Unlike the stories of other heroes that scarcely mention their exploits beyond the heroic, unlike the Champions known only for their being pilots of the Divine Beasts, Zelda takes pains to mention Yunobo's acting, Amali's daughters, Riju's cooking, Sidon's diving. She takes pains to describe many of strangers and travellers and extended family whom Link met upon her journey, Sarie and Kass and everyone else. She takes pains to centre every chapter around a recipe, to reveal the truth of Link's cooking having brought together Hyrule, to speak earnestly and honestly of Link's failures as well as her successes, to make Link not merely a hero but a person. A person before everything else. Link. Just Link. The girl who loves to cook.

The chapters start small. She expects to finish, she informs Link, in about one hundred and fifty thousand words. Link does not know just how much that is, but she nods and sits with Zelda night after night, recounting her experiences, answering her companion's questions, detailing what she cooked and when and how. Little by little, as Link moves from when she travelled by herself to when she travelled alongside her companions, the chapters balloon. Every time that Zelda sets down her pen in the belief that she has written her longest chapter yet, another sneaks along even longer to surprise her. The eightieth chapter turns out the longest of all, in part because Zelda includes her own experiences within the keep-temple-palace. Then the egg pudding, and the dubious food that Link cooked for her own reflection, and the fruitcake that Link and Zelda baked upon their return to their world.

Zelda leaves the last page blank for an epilogue.

Malon helps Zelda bind the book in cowskin. Zelda elaborates on her plans: the engineers of the Eldic town of Zubora have innovated a printing carve which automates the creation of their metal books, and already many more inventors from all over Hyrule have worked on emulating the miraculous device into their own people's respective styles of print. In particular, the printing press currently in the works as a joint effort between Parapan, Necludan, and Faronese engineers has caught her eye. Zelda translates the book into every language that she knows with the intention of sending it off to print: one of the first prototype books to pass through the system. At first, Link balks at the thought of everyone in Hyrule knowing her story, when she wants nothing more than to relax over her cooking pot.

"But this way, all of the people who've helped you will be remembered, too," says Zelda, "and the recipes I'm including at the end of each chapter will help people who have never cooked those things before learn how to cook! I didn't know that you could make wildberry cannoli at all until you told me, and the same with so many other recipes. And if people know you, you'll be able to share stew with them from a communal cooking pot." Zelda raises her eyebrows. "See? I can see you smiling. You like the idea, huh? You can say no. I won't be upset at all."

Link sniffs. She agrees. "Tell everyone to get their own cooking pot if they read it. I mean, once you get the cooking pot, there's no reason not to cook every dish in Hyrule."

"Oh, Link," murmurs Zelda, the hand that holds the pen trembling as she writes Link's words of wisdom onto the back of the volume, "I love you so much."

"I love you too."
Link reads the description of the novel: All of the wilds combined cannot sit at a campfire and share stew from a communal cooking pot. And once you get the cooking pot, there's no reason not to cook every dish in Hyrule.

She grins. "It's perfect." Zelda's cheeks redden, which widens Link's grin even further. "Thank you. Have you picked a name for it? The book, I mean."

Now Zelda smiles, a mischievous twinkle in her spring green eyes. "I think you'll like it. You love people, and you love the land, and I wanted something that would reflect both sides of you. I was thinking about what you said once—what Sarie said—and I decided. I'm going to call it..." She laughs a light little laugh ending with a very Zelda-like snort. "...Delicious in Wilds."

Link throws her arm around Zelda. Zelda throws her arms around Link. They hold one another. Zelda weeps, and Link brushes away her tears even as she herself cries, too. Zelda sends Delicious in Wilds out, with the blank page left for the epilogue.

Hyrule heals.

People walk the paths again. Every town and village bustles with new life ad with people moving in from across Hyrule to share with one another their bounties and their knowledge and their meals. Seasons change. Time passes. Link keeps her promises and walks her paths, and she and Zelda cook every dish in Hyrule they encounter.

And Link looks out to the infinite horizon where meals upon meals await her, meals that she has never tasted, meals untold that span the eternities, and the very thought that she will never cook all the meals in Hyrule excites her beyond measure.

Always something to discover. Always something to cook. Always something to share from a communal cooking pot.

And then, one morning, long after Link has said good-bye to one Ilia and then to the other, she stands amid the golden-scarlet fields of wheat and sea lily's bells beneath the summer-set sun, the wind caressing her face, and she realises that the scent of the earth no longer settles her bones. She can smell on the wind a fragrance and a call she has felt before.

She asks Zelda what lies north. Zelda looks up at her from her shuffle of papers. According to her research, she says, there once lay another kingdom across the ice and the rock, yet the formation of the mountains and their badlands long ago has ceased any communications. "For all we know, we will come across nothing but a wasteland of frost."

"We 'will' come across...?" Zelda raises her eyebrows, and Link realises that there was never a question at all.

They gaze northward.

They pack their belongings. They bid their family see you later with a promise to send back letters as long as they can. Cremia, Romani, and the rest at the ranch wish them all the protection of the Goddesses, a swift journey and a safe return.

They travel with the dawn. Injured, yet healed. Broken, yet mended. Shattered, yet whole. They travel beside one another; they travel as one; they travel with a communal cooking pot in which they cook all that is delicious in wilds.

On the day before they leave the world they know for the first time in their lives, they bake the apples of Hyrule over an open flame. They bid see you later to Akkala and Parapa, Eldin and Faron, Hebra and Necluda, Tabantha and Lanayru, to Central Hyrule and the Great Plateau where they awoke in the Shrine of Resurrection. They bid see you later to Hyrule, who lives now by her own hand.

They travel north. They return again bearing gifts of meat and drink. They live a time with their family all across Hyrule, and then they find their way onto a ship, and then they sail over the sea.

Someday, long after they have returned to dust, the people of the wilds look upon the stars. Someday, long after the names fade to dust, the people of the wilds name the stars anew. Someday, long after the stars themselves dissipate to dust and others take their place, the people of the wilds lift their hands up to the skies and cup the starlight in their palms.

Someday, long after they have returned to dust, the breath of the wild whispers over the world and breathes life anew. Such is the promise of the Goddess Farore. Such is Her wind, that She carries the seeds of life, and such is Her courage, that the people of Hyrule bear the will to live.

And sometimes She carries, too, the faint strains of an accordion, or an ocarina, or a voice, singing the words written long, long ago by a travelling minstrel who recorded the ancient verses long passed down through generations of people of our Hyrule, a song of cooking pots and communal campfires, a song of mushroom skewers and fruitcakes, a song that mentions only at the very end the calming of the Calamitous One and the passing of the Sacred Realm. Sometimes She carries, too, the faint strains of an instrument, singing the words written long, long ago:

"Let us sing of the six who saved Hyrule from the brink,

"of Riju's white lightning; of Amali's great gale;

of Yunobo's protection; of Sidon's healing grail;

"of the legend of Zelda: the adventure of Link."

Chapter End Notes

Afterword

Hello there, dear reader. I hope that you enjoyed the journey behind you as much as I enjoyed my journey through the vastness of Hyrule.

I write this afterword on the final day of my summer break, immediately after having written the final words of the final chapter of Delicious in Wilds. Instead of studying for exams as I was supposed to, I wrote my Hyrule Fantasy. I cannot say that I regret a single moment.

I wrote Delicious in Wilds over the course of eighty-four days, averaging about one chapter per day. I anticipated before I began that Delicious in Wilds would take me about fifty chapters at approximately three thousand words per chapter. No, really. That was my goal. As you can see, the story and the characters took on lives of their
I did very minimal planning for Delicious in Wilds, partially because I did not anticipate the scope of the story. I wrote this from the first chapter to the eighty-fourth by the seat of my pants, never knowing what the next chapter would bring until I wrote it. Not until the very end, really, did I realise how everything would come together. Yet, like an "everything but the kitchen sink stew," it somehow did.

I hope, sincerely, that Delicious in Wilds has taught you at least one recipe possible in Breath of the Wild that you did not know. I gathered all of these recipes myself. I did not account for criticals or for RNG (such as the monster extract). I put in the ingredients once and went with what I got. In fact, prior to every chapter, I sat down with a cooking pot in approximately the same area as Link in the story and threw together ingredients until I made something Link wanted. Sometimes, I realised what Link wanted to cook immediately. For certain chapters, it took me upwards of an hour. For certain chapters, it took me upwards of an hour.

I did not cover every unique recipe possible in Breath of the Wild, and for good measure: those extra recipes afford me the chance for additions and extensions in the future if I choose to write them. If not, then they represent a mere smattering of the many, many recipes that Link has yet to try in the wilds of Hyrule. She will try many, I'm sure. I believe in her. After all, once you get the cooking pot, there's no reason not to cook every dish in Hyrule. And so I did.

As of this time of writing, I have clocked 1591 hours on my copy of Breath of the Wild for the WiiU. Despite its many, many flaws from both gameplay and narrative perspectives, I can honestly say that Breath of the Wild brought back my love for video games in a way that I have not felt for eight long years.

Sitting here with the WiiU controller in my hand, running my thumbs over the buttons, I still cannot believe that Nintendo released a game like Breath of the Wild in 2017. I look forward to what adventures Link will have next. And speaking of adventures of Link, I patterned the ending of Delicious in Wilds after The Adventure of Link, because I felt that the story one hundred years ago comprised The Legend of Zelda, the legend of the Princess. And this Hyrule Fantasy, one hundred years later, comprises The Adventure of Link and her cooking pot.

There are parts of Delicious in Wilds of which I am immeasurably proud, and parts that I would do differently if I could write Delicious in Wilds over again, just like any playthrough of Breath of the Wild. In the end, though, I wrote Delicious in Wilds thus. Now I can sit down, belly full. When Ballad of the Champions comes out later this winter, I might write a sequel set during the final chapter: Desserts in Wilds.

Over the next few months, I will steadily post each chapter with editing assistance by my beloved beta reader Emma, who has been with me every step of the way like my own cooking pot. Over the next few months, I will record briefly notes and thoughts about each chapter as I post them. Over the next few months, I do not really expect many people to read Delicious in Wilds given its niche appeal. However, I wrote Delicious in Wilds for myself, first and foremost, as a love letter to The Legend of Zelda I love so dearly.

Dear reader, thank you. I mean this from the bottom of my heart. Thank you for accompanying me on this journey, on this legend of Zelda, on this adventure of Link. I love you as much as Link loves food. And that's saying a lot. I hope that you enjoyed Delicious in Wilds. And if you did not, then I will strive to do better in the future. I hope, even more so, that you and I will both enjoy the many, many journeys through the many, many Legends of Zelda and Adventures of Link in the years to come. Now, the Hyrule Fantasy awaits.
