Delicious in Wilds

by midnasass

Summary

All of the wilds combined cannot sit at a campfire and share stew from a communal cooking pot. And once you get the cooking pot, there's no reason not to cook every dish in Hyrule.

A novelisation and significant rewrite of The Legend of Zelda: Breath of the Wild, inspired by Dungeon Mashi, with a focus on world-building, character development-driven plot, and a recipe for every chapter.

Note to readers: In this fic, Link is mute, a trans girl, and a lover of food. If any of those things doesn't sit well in your stomach (I can understand how a heroine loving food might put you off), there's no need to leave your vitriol in the comments.

Notes

Foreword

Hello there, dear reader. I hope that you enjoy the journey ahead as much as I enjoyed my journey through the vastness of Hyrule.

The full foreword, which I have curtailed, can be read at https://docs.google.com/document/d/1t7wLaoF03OsFO8RGwjCjWOyTOIwRipH8nIstbJPkpNw/edit

The following forward is entirely optional and is mostly composed of my long-winded, unedited musings on why I am going to write Delicious in Wilds. In fact, I am writing this forward prior to doing any work on Delicious in Wilds, including any form of planning. These words represent my thoughts, my hopes, my expectations, and my fears, and for the sake of those curious about what will go into Delicious in Wilds (or what went into it, since you will be reading this after the fact), here they are. I am going to sit here and write this without breaks until I finish, and so you have here my unfettered thought process. Spoilers ahoy! I recommend briefly glancing at the FAQs on my profile page before continuing.

Delicious in Wilds is inspired by and named after Kui Ryōko's Danjon Meshi Delicious in Dungeon, a manga that follows a group of adventurers in a tabletop-inspired world as they must quickly descend into a dungeon without the time or funding to purchase supplies. Instead, the adventurers learn to eat the monstrous wildlife of the dungeon as they go. Delicious in Wilds takes this concept and runs with it: Every chapter of Delicious in Wilds will involve and provide a recipe for a meal. I intend to take liberties with the cooking system present in Breath of the Wild. Most if not all of the recipes will be based on a real recipe in Breath of the Wild, which will be provided to the reader at the end of each chapter.

The in Wilds epithet comes from the "of the Wilds" set of clothing, being the tunic of the original legendary hero provided by the monks. As the title of the game is Breath of the Wild and its key experience the exploration of the wilds, I felt Delicious in Wilds an appropriate moniker.

In Breath of the Wild, [...] the few moments in which Link emotes revolve around the cooking and consumption of food; small victories such as during the sand-seal race; and when it comes to the attainment of rupees, at least according to the item description of rupees. Link also emotes when alone, responding to temperature changes and so forth. Link's greatest beats of emotion, however, come from the aforementioned cooking: The interest with which Link observes the pot, the absolute glee upon a successful meal, the literal jumping for joy and celebrating upon a new recipe, the excitement at eating a meal, the satisfaction derived from delicious food.

I had thought myself simply reading too far into something that was central to the game and thus had had attention lavished upon the animations, but then I encountered Zelda's diary. In this diary, Zelda records Link's explanations for silence, as I noted above. Upon speaking to Link, Zelda comments that Link is a "glutton" who cannot turn down a delicious meal. Other than the explanation of Link's stoicness and desire not to burden others, this is Zelda's only comment on Link's personality. My, my. You can see where Delicious in Wilds began to form in my mind.

[...]

For me, The Legend of Zelda is about the gameplay. Please, go play Breath of the Wild if the gameplay appeals to you. Now when I turn to novelise the game, I cannot put the gameplay to word. So, instead, I must face the story and, finding it lacking, will change it to suit the tale I wish to tell.

In particular, my intentions for Delicious in Wilds are: to expand upon and improve the worldbuilding of various races and settlements; to give more backstory and significance to the Champions; to resolve the question of Zelda's sealing magic in a more interesting way than a deus ex machina of the highest calibre; to strip Breath of the Wild of its reliance upon fate and provide an alternate take on destiny; to make death meaningful instead of having ghosts wandering about who can apparently interact with the physical world but who couldn't be assed to try to beat up Ganon in the intervening hundred years; and, of course, to showcase as many delicious recipes as I physically can.

[...]

I hope that you enjoy Delicious in Wilds. And if you do not, then I will strive to do better in the future. Now, the Hyrule Fantasy awaits.

Fruit and Mushroom Skewer

Chapter Summary

A certain food enthusiast awakens in spring. Using the "tablet" found in the chamber of awakening, our travelling chef awakens a strange tower, looks down at the world to realise the chef stands on a great plateau, and remembers a name: Link.

Chapter Notes

A brief note to those reading after the seventh of December, 2017: Breath of the Wild's expansion, Ballad of the Champions, has released and given us quite a bit of new information regarding the Champions. Among other things, none of which is reflected in Delicious in Wilds, the expansion confirmed Urbosa not only significantly older than Zelda, but also the previous Gerudo Chief. As this information was not available during the writing of Delicious in Wilds, it is notable that Urbosa is only two years Zelda's elder in Delicious in Wilds and not the previous Parapan queen. If that makes the story uncomfortable for you to read, I understand and do not blame you. However, I promise that I would have no intention of supporting a pairing between an adult and a minor; had I been aware of this this prior to writing, I would not have included a relationship between the two in Delicious in Wilds. Because the relationship cannot be removed without rewriting a significant chunk of the story, I have chosen to leave it as is. Similarly, other content from the expansion will not be included in Delicious in Wilds. Thank you for reading!

midna's ass. 07 December 2017.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Floating in warmth, she waits.

A faint sound resonates somewhere under her. A body. Her body. Something soft yet firm beneath her, supporting her head, her upper back, her rear. A breath of chill whispers over the top of her chest and radiates down her form. Her heart beats.

She lives.

The darkness brightens steadily, and then gives way to light; her eyelids flutter up of their own accord. A blur of blue and white above. She flexes her fingers, wriggles her toes, pushes against the now-hard material underneath her to sit up.

The sudden ache in her head closes her eyes for a moment as she adjusts. The blueness throbs behind her lids. Her palm splashes liquid. She registers the water receding. The air feels cool and dry. She breathes in and the somewhat stale scent causes her to cough.

The pain subsides as the last of the water drains. She opens her eyes. Her vision focuses.
An unfamiliar ceiling.

She sits up on some sort of—the word does not come easily to her—altar. The material slips enough that she cannot find purchase on its surface, no imperfections that she can detect as she runs her fingers over the side. Above her glows a blue crystal that dims as she watches. To her right: a featureless blank wall. To her left: the rest of the chamber. Two pedestals, inlaid with the same faintly gleaming orange pattern, though the pedestal closer to the door appears to lack the middle of its face. On the far side, she notices the wall broken up by a complicated mechanism.

Door.

She scoots herself to the edge. The muscles of her arms protest slightly at the motion. Her legs hang out. All ten fingers, all ten toes. She hops off and the impact on her feet nearly sends her into the floor.

Her legs shiver as she stands with her left hand on the altar for support. She tightens and relaxes her muscles until the quivers ebb. One step. Another. She approaches the first pedestal to rest on her way to the door.

The moment her palm makes contact with the pedestal, the pattern on its face shifts to blue. The pedestal hums. Instinctively she retracts her hand, but the surface of the pedestal begins to open as a flower blossoming. The centre of the pedestal, inscribed with a strange symbol resembling an eye, rises.

Sounds. No, words. A voice.

"...masurr..."

Leaning on the pedestal she tenses and listens. The syllables jumble, the words incomprehensible. The voice falls silent for a moment, then starts again. The voice continues without pause, seemingly emanating from everywhere and yet nowhere at once, as though the sound resonates through the very walls of the chamber.

She turns to look back at the altar. Then at the door. The second pedestal. The missing piece of its face has the same dimensions as the proffered rectangle of the first.

As the voice goes on without ceasing, she carefully takes up the rectangle. A stone tablet. Not stone, but of the same perfectly smooth material as the altar and the pedestal. It fits almost perfectly in her palm between her thumb and fingers. The pedestal returns to orange.

When she inserts the tablet onto the second pedestal she does so symbol-side-down. No response. She flips the tablet over, and it slots neatly within. Not a second later the pedestal gleams blue. The voice cuts off.

For a moment she hears nothing but the hum of the pedestal and the huffs of her own breaths. Then the door grinds out a noise and shifts to blue as well. The tablet rises up from the second pedestal. She picks it up without hesitation. After another brief respite by the second pedestal she pads to the immense door rising nearly twice her height. Two doors, with a split now visible down the line.

She pushes on the doors. They swing open with surprising ease. The sudden light blinds her; she lifts a hand over her eyes, squinting through the brightness. Dampness and freshness roll over her at once. A tunnel. And there, at the end:

Light.
She steps out. Water pools on the ground. As her vision adjusts she spots a wooden table in the centre of the cave alongside a wooden chair. Moss grows over the surfaces. On the table sits a metal container. A chest.

She raises the lid. Softness. Fabric. A shirt and trousers. A leather strip with a cupped pouch along its length. A pair of boots. She becomes aware of her own nudity and takes the time to slip on the clothing. She fashions the strips into a belt about her hips. The tablet, she finds, matches the pouch perfectly. The clothing and her body form another story: the shirt and trouser sag over her skin. The fabric stinks of mustiness; the hems have torn or unthreaded; patches seem to have gone amiss; the boots have cracked.

They cover her.

She removes the boots and tucks them under her arm for now lest the water from the tunnel floor creep inside.

She moves forward through the tunnel. Abruptly the land slopes up to a steep wall. She looks around: no other path forward, except perhaps dragging over the table to use as a stepping stone. Though in places the rock gleams damply, she finds purchase on the slippery stone. Digging her fingers in she hauls herself up. The muscles in her limbs threaten to go out. Bracing her elbow against the edge she pushes up and rolls herself onto the higher ground. Her heart thuds heavily in her chest as she catches her breath.

The light. Green along the ground. A peek of blue.

She half-walks, half-stumbles out from the innards of the cave. The clearness of the air overtakes her. She finds herself running, invigorated, nearly soaring over the ground. The enclosed tunnel above her gives way to the vastness of a blue sky. Her bare feet touch grass. Blades of grass, poking her to tickle the bottom of her feet, to cushion her footfalls. The wind that caresses her face and runs through her hair. The trees swaying under the same caress. The fragrance of the world.

A cliffside.

She pants and every lungful frees her further. At the edge the entire earth falls away beneath her to slope down in an endless sea of green. Trees. A lake further beyond. And there, in the centre of her view, a massive structure looming over the horizon, quiet, immutable, imposing upon the heart of the world.

Her head spins. To the right rises a spine of mountains piercing the heavens. To the left, in the distance, waits something like a massive thunderhead that does not move. Below her the plains roll forward in the gentle wind.

She has not words enough for all she sees but one burns at the tips of her fingers. She signs the word to herself, touching her hand to her cheek, to her eye, to the centre of her chest, a path she has shaped over and over in her life.

Home.

She stands on the cliffside for a long, long time.

The rumble of her stomach leads her away. She spots a tree heavy with spring apples down the hill. As she walks she scoops a fallen tree branch from the ground. Absentmindedly she strips the branch of twigs and leaves to leave something resembling a wooden stick. Her left arm goes through familiar motions, horizontal swings, vertical arcs, a forward jab.
Something to practise daily.

She fits the boots onto her feet. Standing, she taps the toe of her left boot against the ground. Something jingles by her hip. The trousers. Pockets. She reaches within the right to find a thin blue band. Her fingers move instinctively, to tie back her hair into a ponytail behind her head, secured with the band. Within the left she finds two hard blue circles and again her hands rise up automatically to open them and clip them in the lobes of her ears.

She faces the tree. The leather belt includes a loop at the back in which she slots her stick. She scales up to catch herself on the lowest branch.

She stretches out. The apple, round and red, sits in the curve of her palm. Dropping down from the tree she bites down and the sweetness brings wetness to her eyes. She eats in shade of the apple tree. The juices run down her chin.

The tree runs short of spring apples and her stomach runs short of room. She wipes her mouth on the back of her hand. Presently her throat burns. Somewhere close must reside the lake she spotted earlier.

Viewing her surroundings from the top of the tree she notes where the woods thin. She sets off in that direction down the hill. A stump—or rather, the long rusted handle of the axe embedded in the stump—gives her pause. From the handle hangs a satchel, the material softened by time but still usable. She unties the satchel and slings it over her shoulder.

As she walks she watches the ground. The tracks of animals reveal the existence of boars. Birds flitter by in the trees. When she follows one such bird on its flight to the next treetop her gaze alights on the mushroom growing by the roots.

Not poisonous. She harvests it from the ground and places it in her satchel. Onwards. More mushrooms along the way. Another apple tree fills the remainder of her satchel.

As she continues her downwards hike the forest levels out and then abruptly ends. Just beyond: the lake, broken up into several large ponds. On the other shore a strange domed structure protrudes upwards, decorated with a similar pattern to the tablet she carries. Closer to her a golden spire sticks from the ground, holding up the entrance to some kind of cave. To her right, on her side of the lake but a fair walk away, looms a building. The outer surfaces crawl with ivy. Strange weathered statues litter the walls and nearby.

She kneels by the lake. Her knees sink into the yielding soil of the bank. Cupping her hands, she drinks. Fish dart beneath the mirror of the lake. She lunges for one and splashes into the water. Collecting the mushrooms and apples that float out of her satchel takes her enough time to teach her not to catch fish with her hands.

The building draws her. She trots off to it. The statues reach long arms up to the sides of the building. Most of one wall and half of the roof have broken, leaving the insides to the elements. She enters through the broken wall. The weathered white stone within yields little information. At the end of what once must have been a massive chamber she sees an altar. Three depressions line the front of the altar, the scratches within indicating that three things must once have decorated the altar and been pried out. Beyond the altar stands a circle of seven statues, at its head a winged woman. One wing has broken off. The weathered face shows a kindly smile yet, matching the long gazes and wise smiles of its sister statues. Further behind that, a broken wall reveals a second chamber, seemingly empty save for a vacant crater in the floor.

She traces her finger over the inscriptions on the altar below the carved-out depressions. Symbols, letters. Blowing the dust from them she struggles to make them out. For a moment she simply stares at the characters to make sense of them. Then—as if struck by a flash of clarity—the inscription resolves itself into words.

Hyrule, protected beneath the Light of the Golden Goddesses,

Farore - Nayru - Din

and held in the loving embrace of the Seven,

Hylia - Sageru - Sheik - Kokir - Goro-goro - Zola - Erito

we are Your People, and we thank You for our lives and our peace.

Below the inscription lies a golden triangle with the heart missing. Gazing at the gold, she lowers herself to her knees.

She bows her head. She stills her breaths. She waits. She listens to the faint beat of her heart. She prays without words or thought.

The moment passes. She rises. Placing her palm against the golden triangle, she nods to the Goddesses and Their broken altar. When she turns back around she observes a metal chest waiting between the rows of pews.

Its contents reveal a wooden bow with a brown-tan quiver of arrows alongside a pouch of flint. She straps the bow to her back and finds space for the quiver below. The pouch of flint slings across her hips.

Further investigation turns up a collection of parchment and a tube in which to hold them, rolled up, on her back. Another satchel, small, containing lead pencils, ink, nibs, and a short ruler. She takes those along with her.

She quits the temple. On the journey back to the lake she notices a sword wedged in a gap of one of the statues. Grasping the hilt with both hands she pulls. She lands on her rear, sword in hand.
Though the hilt has rusted, the blade seems sharp enough to function for now.

Approaching the lake from another angle brings her close to the golden spire. Not a cave at all. A landfall appears to have collapsed onto the inside of the small spire, blocking access save for one side. She peers down. The floor of the spire extends about a metre and half into the ground. And there, in the centre: another of those pedestals like those in the chamber where she awoke.

The blank space on the face.

She crouches on the edge of the hole, then swings her body down. Her boots smack heavily on the ground; a hollow sound rings through the structure. She knocks her knuckles against the rocks wedged into the open space between the platform and the roof of the spire. They seem steady.

The tablet slides into the open space. No reaction. She moves to slip it back out when the pattern along the surface flashes orange, then a blue bright enough that she stumbles backwards, eyes stinging.

The structure shakes. She catches herself on the pedestal, desperately floundering to rip the tablet up from the pedestal before the spire sinks her into the earth or collapses entirely.

A sudden force throws her to the floor as though an invisible hand had slammed into her chest.
Gasping she stares up. The spire rises. Grass to sky. Clouds passing at an alarming rate.

The ascent slows. As soon as she can move she scrambles to her feet. When the spire stops, the impact jolts her a half-centimetre from the floor. Lights blaze blue over a great black crystalline structure just above the pedestal. Symbols shimmer on the facets of the crystal, though not in a language she can read. Liquid gathers at the point.

It drips onto the tablet. The tablet lights up. It rises up from the pedestal, and she can see the underside glowing as well. Hesitantly she picks the tablet and flips it over in her palm.

The tablet goes dark, then light. Symbols unrecognisable to her blink on the surface. The tablet makes a noise and darkens once more. She returns it to the pouch at her hip.

When she lifts her head to look out at the world around her with the spire raised, she faces a multitude of orange towers in the distance. High above the land, carved into the clouds. Her mouth opens involuntarily.

She backs away from the edge. She forces herself to breathe. Then she looks, again.

High up. Ridiculously high up, so high that leaping from the structure would take her minutes to descend to the ground, and there to splatter into blood and bone. Yet she spies strange platforms dotting the sides of the tower at regular intervals, spiralling around.

From her vantage point she surveys the land around her. A vaguely oval-shaped plateau. She unfurls one of the lengths of parchment from the tube. In the centre she sketches the plateau and begins to fill in what landmarks she can stop from her present viewpoint. Mountains, there, icy. A river. Something that resembles a cabin, possibly. The strange structure on the other shore of the lake, and similar structures scattered throughout. She marks four. The woods. The chamber where she awoke. The lake. The temple with its broken altar.

Curling the parchment up again she pauses to munch an apple. Then she begins her descent. Carefully she drops off of each platform. The material down the sides of the tower consists of a metal—possibly metal, though not cool to the touch, but the same temperature as the palm of her hand—grating that she can climb down. The exertion leaves red marks deep in the flesh of her fingers.

She rests. Another apple. She tries a mushroom. Earthy, she finds, yet satisfying. She pats the satchel. Half-empty.

Onwards, and onwards. The sun moves down with her as she drops from platform to platform. Eventually she can spot the end. A few more. A few more. Ten to go. Nine, eight, seven, six, five, four, slip.

She misses the third platform from the bottom. Her hands slap the edge as she flails but her fingers bounce harmlessly off the curved surface. She falls.

The impact knocks the wind from her lungs and slams her knees into her chin. Her jaw sings out in pain along with her head. Woozily she starts to rise to her feet, discovers the migraine throbbing at her temples, and lies back down.

She holds her head in both hands, face-down in the dirt. At least her body cushioned the fall of the items on her back and the satchel at her hip. The grass pokes at her face. The wind ruffles her hair. The scent of the earth settles in her bones.

An insect buzzing near her ear prompts her to turn her head and open her right eye. A grasshopper, hopping through grass. Its wings flicker from its back. She observes the grasshopper near her. Its antennae twitch. She puffs out a breath towards it and the grasshopper becomes absolutely still for a second prior to speeding away with all the haste that its tiny wings can give it.

A sound rumbles up from her stomach. It erupts from her throat as a laugh. She lies face-down on the ground, body aching, muscles hurting, regarding the grasshopper's escape, and she cannot stop laughing.

Her shoulders shake. Each time the mirth subsides she doubles up again in laughter. The edges of her mouth curve upwards in a grin that crinkles the corners of her eyes. As she laughs a blade of grass rubs the underside of her nose, and she sneezes with such force that she laughs all the harder.

She lives. She breathes. Her heart beats. Her body moves. She is alive.

No matter what else, these remain true.

By the time her head has ceased spinning and the laughter has left her with a goofy smile, she notices the sun dangerously low in the sky. Gold sinks through the forest and ushers liquid light over the lake.

A place to sleep.

The rusted axe. She embarks up the hill to locate the stump. Near the stump lies an overturned log with a protective overhang jutting out above it: a place to spend the night.

She struggles with the heft of the axe, her muscles unaccustomed to its weight. Still she chops down three smallish trees and breaks them up into variously sized pieces of firewood. Her arms ache. She drags them towards the overturned log. When she fumbles with the flint found in the temple no fire catches.

Grass. Blades of grass, sprinkled in a dry heap. This time, when she strikes the flint with the flat of the blade, sparks dance over the snippets of grass and take hold. She puffs breath onto the tiny ember until it roots into a steady fire that wards off the encroaching dark.

She slips the stick from her belt. Holding the branch and the blade at awkward angles she sharpens the tip of the stick and taps it against the log. From her satchel she produces mushrooms and apples. Using the flattened top of the log, she cuts them into thick, uneven chunks. By her fourth mushroom her slices have become somewhat passably even. She slides the chunks onto the tip of the stick, alternating mushroom and apple.

Her first attempt at holding the stick over the fire leads to the chunks burning to a crisp. The second attempt goes more smoothly. Those at the tip still burn, but the remainder has gone soft and juicy. She bites, chews, swallows. The sweetness of the apples balances the earthy, savory taste of the mushrooms.

The combination warms her belly. She inhales; the smell waters her mouth and she takes another bite.

A voice. The voice of a girl with golden hair sitting across from her, holding a skewer of fruit and mushroom over a campfire, studying a sheet of paper, hand closed around the golden and violet charms at her throat, raising her head. Looking directly at her. Saying a word.

Saying her name.

She blinks and shakes her head. The memory dissipates. When she finishes eating, she piles on firewood, trying to estimate the lengths of the flames and the night. Then she curls herself up by the fire with the satchel under her head.

The stars shine a path to the land of slumber. She follows.

The girl with the golden hair, saying her name.

Link.

—

Fruit and Mushroom Skewer (two hearts) - apple, hylian shroom

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Thus begins Delicious in Wilds, which was written from 01 June 2017 to 24 August 2017. Eighty-four chapters in eighty-four days. I would like to thank my marvelous beta reader, Emma, for having dealt with me over the past eighty-four days and continuing to deal with me now.

I originally intended to plan Delicious in Wilds chapter-by-chapter, yet I ended up beginning to write shortly after wrapping up adrift, based on Link's Awakening. As such, Delicious in Wilds was written by the seat of my pants, with me not knowing what the next chapter held until I sat down to cook a meal for it. Perhaps partially due to adrift's influence, as well as Link's own memory-less awakening, I adopted a somewhat dreamier style. I strove to differentiate this Link from those I have written previously. I chose to make Link left-handed instead of right; thus, Link carries the slate on the right hip rather than the left.

It may appear strange that the chests left near the shrine seem untouched despite their age; however, I do have an explanation prepared later in the story.

Seeing all of Hyrule for the first time left quite an emotional impact on me, which I wanted to accurately capture. Link signs the word for home, based partially on the ASL sign, which involves lifting your hand to your mouth and eye to indicate where you eat and sleep. Dialogue spoken out loud is recorded in unitalicised text; dialogue signed, in italicised text.

I patterned the Temple of Time after that in Ocarina of Time, notably not my most-beloved Zelda title. This chapter introduces the Delicious in Wilds cosmology. While the Golden Goddesses Farore, Nayru, and Din are worshipped in some form or fashion near ubiquitously, different parts of Hyrule have their own local religions and faiths. Many worship of the Seven Goddesses, who are regarded as the progenitors and patrons of the seven major races of Hyrule.

Regarding the names of the Goddesses: Hylia comes from the franchise directly; Sageru comes from the "Goddess of the Sand" worshipped by the gerudo in Ocarina of Time, as well as the prefix "sa" common to the language spoken by the gerudo people in Breath of the Wild; Sheik comes from Zelda's disguise in Ocarina of Time;
Kokir comes from the "kokiri" who became the koroks in the backstory of The Wind Waker, the latter being seen in Breath of the Wild; Goro-goro refers to the gorons' tendency to end their sentences with "goro" in the Japanese, as well as referencing the onomatopoeia of gorogoro (ゴロゴロ) for rolling rocks; Zola comes from the mistransliteration of "zora" in the English manual for The Legend of Zelda; and Erito is a phonetic portmanteau of "air"/"airy" and rito.

Link has been compared or linked, no pun intended, to grasshoppers throughout the franchise, such as Romani's nickname for Link in Majora's Mask. I thought it appropriate, therefore, to have a green grasshopper indicate Link's aliveness.

The first food I cooked was a fruit and mushroom skewer. The first memory Link remembered would have to have impact, and you'll see us return to the memory a few times to expand upon it. Note, too, the golden and violet charms around the speaker's throat; those will come into play at a later date.

Link remembers here the first clue to an identity: a name. Names, as you'll find out, become a crucial aspect of Delicious in Wilds, with one particular name held off until the very end. The journey, I hope, will be well worth it. Thank you for reading; see you topside.

Beta reader's comments: Looking back now, it strikes me how different this chapter, and the few that follow it, are from the rest of the series. It's so much more lighthearted and meandering (not at all in a bad way, mind you) than the rest of it, which ended up very character-driven. It's actually that which makes it a really fun chapter in my eyes. It's really relaxing. The rest of the series is my Final Fantasy, and these first few chapters are my Rune Factory. I love it, but I also love what the series develops into. I think the fact that it starts off so meandering but becomes more focused is a very good thing; it's a great tonal shift that's paced really well.

Fun fact: The memory at the end, the very first memory in the series, is my favourite memory. Its abruptness makes it stick out really clearly to me. It feels really significant in its short length, if that makes sense. The scene with the grasshopper and the "home" scene are also some of my favourite scenes. Odd that a chapter I definitely wouldn't consider an absolute favourite has so many of my favourite little bits.

Spicy Pepper Steak

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef visits four strange orange structures that lead the chef through curious puzzles and appear to unlock powers the "tablet's" powers. The chef remembers a girl who smelled of horses. After venturing towards icy mountains to the south and stealing a bokoblin's furred clothing, the chef comes upon a cabin in the wood and falls asleep within.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

A loud snort shudders her awake. Link springs to her feet to come face-to-face with a boar rooting through the grass by the ashen remains of the fire. The boar ceases in its motions, its ears pricked upwards. She draws her blade, the knuckles of her left hand whitening with the severity of her grip. Then the boar continues its rooting.

Gathering her satchel, Link carefully backs away from the campsite and the fallen log. She unfurls the map drawn from the top of the tower. A nearby tree serves as a perch while she marks her area.

As she passes by a berry bush, she stops to pick a handful. She pops them one by one into her mouth. The sweet-tart juice slides stickily down her throat.

Link drinks again from the lake. The structure across the water gleams yellowish in the light of dawn. Another tower could steeple from the earth, with no guarantee of a way down.

Though now the structure glows where before the patterns lay inert. She fills up her satchel with mushrooms, apples, and berries gathered from the nearby woods, tests the sharpness of her sword, and picks up a branch to serve as a suitable club.

She walks along the bank. Fish flip through the water. A bird flies off when she nears. The structure appears larger on this side, about thrice her height. Hands on her hips she looks it up and down. A short overhang; a pedestal to the right identical to those she has seen before; and beyond that a circular pattern on the floor.

The action of slipping the tablet from its pouch and sliding it into its spot on the pedestal comes more easily to her now. The patterns blaze blue, the circular pattern on the floor shining most brightly of all. The structure hums; she grabs the tablet and bolts to tumble onto the grass. From this safe distance, she observes.

A transparent blue curtain surrounds the circular pattern. The structure does not move.

Link waits. She counts the time passing with the repetitive caws of nearby birds.

She approaches. The tablet in her hand hums, warm against her flesh. Testing the curtain of light with the back of her hand, she detects no heat. When she pokes the tip of her sword into the curtain nothing occurs, except that the blade reflects the light.

Faintly smiling now, Link enters the curtain of light. Abruptly the platform rumbles and she jumps up, startled. She turns to step back out but then faces forward again, briefly clenching her hand. The platform descends. Darkness and silence, broken solely by the faint curtain of light around her. The platform moves along. She tracks its movement with her sword against the circular wall, the upwards pull a signal of her continual descent.

The platform slides into a brightly lit room. A small chamber. To the left at the back: a pedestal with a black crystal above. A metal square occupies the centre of the floor. The platform slows, stops. The curtain around her dims into nothingness.

Link steps out.

A voice—though not the same voice as the one in the chamber in which she awoke—greets her, everywhere and nowhere at once. It resonates through the floors, walls, ceilings. The words pass by beyond her understanding.

The pedestal, however, does not. Again strange characters flash over the crystal, and again a droplet splashes into the eye at the heart of the tablet. When she plucks the tablet from the face of the pedestal, the tablet surface continues to glow. She regards the tablet. A curved red symbol appears. She touches the symbol with the tip of her finger. The surface blanks out, then flashes back on to display the floor as if that rectangle had been cut out from the tablet, save for the translucent overlay. Link tilts her head to one side. She lifts the tablet up and about. No change that she can see: the rectangle has become akin to a window. She passes the tablet over the square in the floor. The metal viewed through the tablet glows a lurid pinkish-red, yet remains dark grey when she looks around the tablet to look at the metal with her own eyes.

Something flashes for a second on the tablet. Link blinks at the rectangle she holds. She swings it about in an effort to get the flash again. When she orients the crosshairs onto the metal square it flashes again, the crosshairs becoming a red circle that blinks.

She waits. Nothing. Gripping the tablet tightly in her right hand she taps the circle with her left. The metal square glows yellow. She can hear the square clank quietly, but otherwise nothing occurs.

When she moves her hand up to relieve her wrist of cramps, she finds the square rising into the air. Bewildered, she steps back; the square follows, floating. The tablet. She rotates it about and the square responds to her movements. Link sets the square down carefully on the ground beside the hole. She wriggles the tablet to stop the function, and the metal square grinds along the floor. A few experimental taps later she discovers that touching the crosshairs renders the metal pink again, and the square inert.

The shenanigans have revealed a square-shaped hole in the centre of the floor. The sound of running water beneath prompts her to drop carefully down the ladder. She walks forward. A metal board serves as a ramp up to a higher platform, then as a bridge to the next, and then the next. Something about the steady progress forward to a pair of metal doors along the far wall feels out of touch with reality—with the world of stone and grass above—yet her curiosity spurs her onwards.

A whirring somewhere behind her snaps her to attention. She looks over her shoulder to spot a strange creature scuttling towards her on many legs, an overgrown arachnid half her height. The size prompts her blade to leap to her hand.

The creature's eye—or something like an eye—shines white-blue. A spark of blue fire shoots outwards towards Link's feet, where it leaves a singed mark in the material of the platform.

Link stares at the creature. When its eye beams again she swings the metal board in front of her in lieu of a shield. She takes steps towards it. The creature pings uselessly against the thick metal.

If she can trap it on a corner of the platform she could leave it on the other side of the board, or crush the creature entirely if need be. A sudden skittering. She listens: a splash, a buzz. Carefully she peers over the edge of the board.

The creature, now obviously of a mechanical nature, lies still in the running water. A loose screw floats. Link cautiously leans over the edge to scoop the screw up. She holds it up. A screw, but not metal. Nor stone nor wood nor any material save for the smoothness of the tablet, the spire, the chamber in which she awoke.

In anticipation of other such creatures—perhaps guardians of whatever treasure waits ahead, or perhaps guardians of the treasure already obtained for her tablet—she hurries on. The metal doors open.

On the other side she can see a great cube-shaped curtain of light similar to the circular one from before. The voice returns. Slow and steady. She approaches the curtain. A barrier prevents her from simply walking forward. When she reaches through the curtain it does not allow her fingers through but shatters entirely.

The voice continues. Images—flat, like mirages—flicker on the platform formerly surrounded by the cube-shaped curtain. A figure holding up a tablet not unlike her own. She observes the figure move the tablet up and about. Another picture indicates the crosshairs. The figure lifts objects made of metal, but shakes its head at rocks, at trees, at living beings, at one of the mechanical guardians, at a block made of something she cannot identify. Perhaps the size, or the weight.

Instructions for what she has already figured out.

The images repeat. She turns away, and the voice changes, says a few more words, and quiets. Part of the floor glows. She steps onto those tiles, and the platform moves frictionlessly over the ground. In awe she watches it go until it takes her back to where she entered.

Link steps onto the circle of light. It takes her up.

The instant she can taste fresh air she runs out to stretch her legs. Lake water soothes her throat. She splashes it over her face in wonder for all that has happened.

She takes an apple from her satchel and nibbles on it as she sits idly at the shore. Something in which to carry water. Perhaps if she could empty a pouch, or find another somewhere on the plateau.

Perhaps if she left the plateau.

Link takes a peek over the cliffside to find a steep drop farther than her body might safely take. Perhaps elsewhere a gentler slope exists. For now she turns back.

She leaves the structure now glowing blue on the shore. With tablet in hand she wanders around the ponds, seeing what she had lift out of the waters with the tablet. She grins to herself every time she fishes something out, useless iron boards and all. In the distance a thin line of metal, on the far side of the temple she visited earlier—she has seen another, smaller lake there, with a high hill above it—takes her away from the lake. Her smile widening further Link lopes up the hill with an easy stride.

Nearing the temple she spots another one of those structures. From the top of the spire she saw it in the labyrinthine remains of the walls of a complex that must have once stood proud by the temple.
She clambers over a wall towards the structure, then hops another.

Orange.

Confidently she awakens the structure with the tablet and descends down on the platform. Another black crystal.

This time, alongside the red symbol appear two blue ones: a circle and a square. She taps the circular one first, and atop the surface of the tablet a blue sphere appears.

She starts backwards. The sphere drops to the floor and rolls away from her. The surface of the tablet retains the three symbols, though now the blue circle has lit up and blinks at her. Below the symbols a larger white circle has appeared, this one blinking more rapidly.

Link walks one step at a time towards the ball. She picks it up and it sits, shockingly light for its size, in the palm of her hand. She taps the blue circle and the sphere vanishes, the white circle fading with it. Another tap. The ball and the white circle reappear.

She tries the white circle.

The impact slams her into the floor. Her nose cracks; the stench of blood fills her mouth. Her left shoulder and hip—which took the brunt of her fall—throb agonisingly. She curls inwards on herself. Her vision smears and doubles. She lets the waves of pain crash over her again and again. When it settles into a dull rhythm on her nerves, she sits up and waits for her head to cease pounding. Lifting a hand to her nose she wipes the wet blood from her upper lip.

Though the apples and mushrooms in her satchel remain in one piece, she cannot say the same about the berries, which have smooshed against the sides. She takes the time to scoop out what mush she can and slurp it up.

She'll clean the inside later. The repetitive motion clears her vision and settles her stomach.

When Link regards the tablet now she throws the ball to the opposite side of the chamber. She races to the other side. She touches the white circle.

An explosion. A bomb.

Her nosebleed continues, unabated, as she finds her way through the maze comprising the inside of the structure. The circle produces spherical bombs that roll; the square, cubic ones that stay flat on the ground. The final chamber, again, rolls through instructions in a language she cannot comprehend.

She takes the lift up.

When she exits she notes a massive rock wedged in-between two walls of the complex. Link places a cubic bomb at the base of the stone and walks back towards the structure. She detonates the bomb.

The rock cracks. The explosion pushes it away, clearing a path. She gazes at the statue visible through the opened wall, similar to the statues around the temple. The tops of the statue look like they should spin in the wind, she notes to herself with a smile, and makes her way out.

When she passes by the statue, it hums. Link turns her head towards it.

Blue.
A single blue eye.

Link sprints towards the nearest wall. Her knees smack painfully against the edge as she throws herself over it. The bolt of blue fire arches over the top of the wall. She flattens herself against the wall, panting.

The statue whirs and chirps for a few seconds more. Silence. Link wheezes, her hand over her chest.

She sets off towards the lake, where she dumps the contents of her satchel out and scrubs the insides.

A grey pigeon lands near the apples and mushrooms on the bank. The bird lazily picks at one of the apples. As quietly as possible, her movements deliberate and steady, Link draws the bow from her back and notches an arrow.

She looses it.

The arrowhead pierces the ground. The pigeon has flown off. She plucks the arrow from the earth and, checking it for defects, slides it back into the quiver.

Link studies the map, glances at the other two locations she marked on the top of the tower. Both of them in the snowy mountains that ridge the plateau. She runs a finger over the parchment, nods to herself, and gets to walking.

She takes her trek at a leisurely pace, stopping frequently to jot down the boundaries of the woods, the places of particularly tall trees, the existence of a seemingly animated boulder that she stumbles upon, watches awaken, and avoids. When she spies a campsite surrounded by strange red creatures with an assortment of shields and weapons beside them, she encircles the area on the map and sneaks around them. The creatures burst out cheering, or roaring, or both. Link looks back to see two of them carrying a boar over their heads. Another red creature pulls a horn from its belt and blows it, which summons the attention of the entire aggregate. After some preparation the creatures lash the boar to a massive spike. She squats down behind a rock and peers at them. They set the boar up over a fire. Two of the creatures rotate the boar about in unison while the others dance around the pit. One of them flings a wooden pot lid in its excitement. It lands near enough to the stone behind which Link hides that she risks peeking out for a second to nab it. Solid enough to serve as a shield. She continues to watch. When they take the boar down and rip into the meat, her own stomach grumbles.

Stuffing her face with an apple, she faces the mountains once more.

The air grows colder the higher she hikes. In a gap between two great mountains rearing up into the clouds she finds a pass, long and thin. Her boot crunches snow. The chill raises cuccoflesh along her skin. Her teeth chatter; her muscles shiver; the ice sinks into her bones.

Red catches her attention. A clump of plants near where the snow begins. Peppers. By some inkling deep in the recesses of a foggy bank she can almost taste the heat contained within. She strips herself of as much weight as she can, then runs across the white with only her satchel. Sweat breaks out on the back of her neck. The immediate cold freezes the slope of her shoulders and down her spine. Her fingers stiffen. She harvests as many of the peppers as will fit.

On the race back down Link grabs her things. The warmer clime down the mountain does little to ease the chill embedded within her skin. She finds her way back to the campsite from the previous night. The axe remains where she left it, leaning against the overturned log.
Shaking hands let go of the flint. On the second try the newly cut grass catches fire. Link plops herself cross-legged before the fire. The warmth radiates. She leans forward.

Closing her eyes, she soaks up the heat.

When the shivers subside, she spills the peppers onto the bed of leaves beside her and regards them. Link picks one up from the pile. She sniffs experimentally; her eyes water. She licks the surface, pauses, and bites down.

The race to the lake leaves her breathless. She skips at the bank and drops to her knees. Without stopping to inhale she dunks her entire head into the water and drinks.

She gasps for breath. Her bangs and forelocks plaster to her face. She splashes water over herself. The front of her shirt sticks to her chest.

Link breathes out.

She pats a rhythm on her knees with her hands while she considers how best to prepare the peppers. She glances at her reflection in the water. Brown hair frames her features. A slightly downwards sloping nose sticks crookedly—not yet healed from the earlier strike—beneath her eyes, the lashes thick and dark. She grins at herself. She touches her hand to her face, cocks her head to one side, pokes out her tongue, makes faces. She laughs at herself until she starts coughing from her own uncontrollable laughter.

Picking herself up from the ground she starts back up to her campsite.

Link pauses at the edge of the clearing.

On the log near the campfire perches a fat pigeon, facing away from her for now. The bird does not move. Her gaze flickers onto the bow near the other end of the log. She crouches down onto the leaves. She tries not to breathe. Her hand reaches for the upper limb of the bow. She winces at the rustling of the leaves as she drags the bow—and the quiver hooked to its lower limb—towards her.

Now she aims more carefully.

Though the pigeon breaks into a flurry of movement, the arrow strikes through its throat. Link springs up, takes two long strides, and grabs the bird with both hands as she snaps its neck to ensure a quick death.

She holds the bird in both hands. She seats herself by the fire. Then, thinking better of it, she carries the pigeon into the woods a far distance from the campsite. The feathers come out easily from the still-warm body. Wielding her sword as an awkward stand-in for a knife, she slits the pigeon vertically to remove the intestines, the crop, the bony windpipe. She leaves them in a fleshy pile for now. Wrinkling her nose she skins the remainder of the fowl and drains the blood onto the grass.

Link comes back to the campsite. She rests the pigeon onto the log momentarily while she quarters the peppers and removes the remaining seeds with a fingernail. Link stuffs the fowl with the peppers and closes the bird's meat as best she can. She glances between the stuffed fowl and the fire.

Branches, branches.

She uses the axe to chop down some of the branches from the nearby trees. Finding some of an appropriate thickness and length, she sets up something resembling the spit that the red creatures had. A sharp, thinner branch becomes the skewer. Link tests the weight of the branches stuck in the ground, and they stay mostly upright.

She stands by the spit and rotates it. The red creatures swirl behind her lids when she closes her eyes.

"Bokoblins." A girl smelling of hay. Golden-brown hair curls up over her forehead. A cube of sugar in her hand. Green eyes wet in lamplight. Her arms moving to form the words on her fingers. "Some of the bokoblins have been taking the horses, Link, since the last time you were here. Be careful when you're out delivering, all right? I wish I could travel by your side. My father..."

Her gesture blur until Link can no longer make them out. She shakes her head.

The scent of fowl fills her nose. She inhales deeply. Her belly aches. Link lifts the spit up from the branches. When she looks down she notices that the sticks in the ground have leaned over. One falls unceremoniously.

She stifles a snicker. The meat steams up. Her stomach claws in emptiness. Link takes a plunk down onto the log. Putting one boot over the other she bites into the fowl. The heat of the peppers warms up her body. The flame rises up her back, her neck, her face. She exhales and almost expects smoke to billow up out of mouth. Blood reddens her cheeks and the tips of her fingers.

Link leaps, slams a foot onto the log, and whips out her sword to point it towards the mountains. Onwards, she signs to herself.

It takes her a moment to realise that she has set off in the wrong direction.

She brings the fowl with her and nibbles on the trek up. The heat continues to course through her. Though the snow chills her skin the peppers stave off the worst of its effects.

She makes her way upwards to she spotted the first of the structures. A better name for them. As she walks she collects more peppers that sprout here and there amid the ice. Snow lines her boots and melts around her feet.

Screeches to her right alert her to the existence of leather-winged keese. They track her with long ears and almost longer fangs hanging from their grotesquely wide maws. The sword makes quick work of them. She leaves them in the ice.

The fowl can only last her so long.

The sight of orange propels her forward. Onwards she hikes, up and up.

The tablet brings the lift to life. She descends. The warmth buoyed her and she steps out.

 Appropriately enough the symbol on her tablet, a light blue in the shape of a snowflake, allows her to create pillars of ice from water. As the surface freezes over and floats up, the water directly below freezes as well, into a sizeable column. She scales a waterfall, faces down another of the strange guardians of the symbols, and takes her leave at another panel of instructions.

As the lift returns her to the surface the cold air curls around her. Her eyes widen. Unprotected from the chill Link rolls off of the platform into the snow. Ruins on the side of the mountains. She could take shelter there, could attempt to cook another dish.

A pillar of ice becomes her support up. Link climbs in through a cracked window free of glass. The second her boots hit the floor she hears grunts from the floor below. The wooden door of the room has partially rotted away and fallen from its hinges. She pelts down the hallway only to find a lone blue bokoblin, dressed in furs, at the top of the stairs.

It looks at her. She looks at it. It fumbles for a horn at its belt, the same kind of horn she saw call bokoblins at the boar feast earlier. She charges headlong into it and tackles it down the stairs. They tumble downwards. Her fingers close around the horn. Its claws hook into her skin. Her shoulders and hips pound against the stairs repeatedly. Its head slams into the steps. She wrests the horn from its grip just as they spill out onto the main floor. Holding it up over her head like a prize she laughs to herself.

Her grin freezes as she finds herself looking at the dozen bokoblins ogling her. One, in the middle of eating, drops its skewer of meat.

Link grabs the collar of the furs of the unconscious bokoblin by her feet and yanks it off of the bokoblin.

Then she runs.

The bokoblins mob after her. She pelts down the corridors of the ruins, head snapping left and right as she seeks a way out. Grabbing her satchel she overturns it behind her. The yells of bokoblins behind her brings a lopsided grin to her face despite the danger. A puff of cold cause her to veer right from a closed doorway. She hears bokoblins smash into the door.

There. There, light, white. Freedom.

Link snags the pot lid affixed to the strap of the satchel. She counts her strides forward. Just as she passes the threshold she leaps up, bending her knees up towards her chest, and slips the cord attached to the pot lid's back over her boots. The impact nearly knocks her forward but she throws out her arms to balance. The pot lid holds.

She speeds down the icy hill quickly enough that it takes all of her concentrated efforts not to capsize herself into the snowdrift.

The bokoblins scream at her. She turns her head to wave at them. An arrow strikes the rock scarcely half a metre from her right, and she faces forward again, crouching down to go as rapidly as she can.

She leans into the bends. The frigid wind would water her eyes if not for her tears freezing on her own face. The pot lid tips. She crashes face-first into the snow. Spitting it from her mouth and sticking her tongue out, Link tugs the furs she took from the bokoblin out from under her arm. She wriggles inside. A touch small, the sleeves too short, but serviceable. Rubbing her hands together, Link stands up. She pauses to admire her handiwork, a thoroughly Link-like shape in the snowbank, her arms flailed out, her legs awkward and spread-eagled.

Link adjusts the furs over herself. She collects the pot lid, slings it over her shoulder to slide onto the strap again, and pats herself on the back. Still cold, and uncomfortably so, but not shivering so badly that lying down in the ice appears a better option than carrying on.

She taps out a rhythm with her boots as she walks. Occasionally her boot sinks into a snowdrift and she has to pull herself out. She finds herself turned about, but by now night has fallen. Her breaths whisper out in clouds as she leans against a rock. She whips out her map to consult it.

She traces an arc around the sky with her hand until the fixed star of the north sits on her open palm. Aligning her body properly Link nods to herself, touching her chin.

Furling the parchment back up, Link tramps through the snow towards the fourth structure marked on her map from the top of the spire. The adrenaline fading from the bokoblin chase leaves her weary. She presses on.

Her arrival marks the appearance of a fifth symbol on the surface of the tablet. Yellow. She snaps her fingers: lightning. The tablet indicates a moving gear in gold. To turn the machinery on and off. She waits for the plank to make smooth land from one platform to the next. Strutting over it, Link busies herself with puzzling out how to proceed to stave off the fatigue beginning to weigh her down.

Then she comes upon a boulder, clearly not machinery, but indicated in yellow nonetheless. Perhaps inside. Link touches the boulder on the tablet and waits patiently. No reaction. She scratches the back of her head. Her ponytail bobs.

In frustration she lightly hits the base of the boulder with the heel of her boot. When the tablet displays an arrow her mouth opens.

She looks around. Her eyes narrow: a heavy sledgehammer against the wall. She grips the handle with both hands. Freezing the boulder in stasis again she rapidly shoves the tablet into the pouch and takes a swing.

When the stasis breaks the boulder flies off.

Link pumps her fist into the air. For having no understanding whatsoever of what the voices try to tell her, she hasn't done so shabby for herself.

The fourth structure glows blue. The moon rides overhead when she finally makes it back to the grassy woods.

The darkened skies bring her difficulty in reading the map. She considers making a fire by which to see but exhaustion leadens her limbs. Up ahead an oddly regular something or other blocks out light.

A cabin.

She trudges towards it. Dust clouds rise up when she tries the door and finds it open. She coughs. The dim light through the window reveals the shape of a bed. Without bothering to remove the furs Link collapses down.

The rest will come in the morning.

—

Spicy Pepper Steak (three hearts, low cold resistance for 03:00) - raw bird drumstick, spicy pepper

Chapter End Notes
pulling through in proofing this chapter and pointing out some early installment weirdness that I believe I have fixed. As Delicious in Wilds rooted in my head like a weed, the ideas in it changed and grew over time, so that some of the characters in their introductions are a bit different than they end up being.

This chapter was a blast to write. After writing the first chapter, I recall thinking to myself, "Am I really going to do this?" Then, after I wrote the second chapter, I thought to myself, "Oh hell yes I'm doing this." I adore adventure-y chapters. I sought to stress Link's natural inquisitiveness and interest in the world around her. Though Link is not well-educated and often conceives of herself as not very intelligent, she's very clever and exemplifies a certain worldly wisdom alongside a curiosity that makes her very fun to right.

One important note I have to readers is that this chapter introduces a character in a flashback who is actually lifted from a previous game in the franchise. Just as a "Beedle" exists in The Wind Waker, Phantom Hourglass, Spirit Tracks, and Breath of the Wild, or a "Malon" exists in Ocarina of Time, Oracle of Seasons, I believe Four Swords Adventures but could be wrong, and The Minish Cap, I pull characters from other Zelda games to flesh out the world. However, just as all of those "Beedles" and all of those "Malons" are separate characters (like every "Link" and every "Zelda" minus those obviously linked like The Legend of Zelda and The Adventure of Link), these characters in Delicious in Wilds are their own characters, i.e. if I were to include a Malon of my own, she has nothing to do with the Malon from Ocarina of Time or The Minish Cap except for her superficial appearance and other such traits.

You also do not need to have played the games to know the characters. I purposefully wrote them under the assumption that the reader has only played Breath of the Wild, if that, though I hope that Delicious in Wilds can stand alone.

I was not able to think of an adequate way to represent the Spirit Orbs in Delicious in Wilds (you can take a look at adrift for a story in which I do account for how heart containers work), so instead I made the shrines have instructions. Of course, they're in a language several thousand years old.

I sought to make the bokoblins cute but threatening, similar to their depiction in Breath of the Wild.

You'll note here that Link snaps her fingers. She does a few times throughout the story, and it's a mannerism she picked up from a certain someone.

Finally, this chapter is where I really started to develop the slapstick style of humour that comes to dominate Delicious in Wilds. I have a liking for good-natured slapstick that I was worried wouldn't work as well in text. I suppose it's up to you to determine how well I ended up translating the images in my head to the word.

Thank you for reading, and I hope you enjoyed.

midna's ass. 27 August 2017.

Beta reader's comments:

With this chapter begins a semi-recurring joke about spiciness, which makes me laugh every single time.
We first see a certain girl who smells of hay in this chapter. The evolution of her story is one of my most treasured parts of Delicious in Wilds, and this memory along with a later one are my very favourite parts of her story, for similar reasons to why I love the memory in chapter one so much.

I really love this series when it goes to cold places. That's kind of a weird specific thing, but I feel like the author nails the atmosphere. Plus, the scenes in the cold in this chapter are just so damn fun.

Emma. 27 August 2017.
Salt-Grilled Greens

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef finds that the previous owner of the wooden cabin left a letter intended for someone who happens to share the chef’s own name. Since the chef has nothing to do, the chef resolves to deliver the letter to the intended recipient in Kakariko Village. The chef takes the cooking pot from the cabin and sets off. The chef travels to the town of Kasuto, where a kind woman informs the chef that the chef speaks with the slang and mannerisms of an elderly person. The chef leaves Kasuto and begins to travel to Kakariko.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Yielding softness beneath her. A crick in her neck. Her left leg askew, hanging off of the side of the bed. Her right arm seemingly nonexistent. The second she lifts her head, feeling roars into her limb full-force, the prickle of static bringing her to flail her arm repeatedly until something resembling normal sensation returns.

Her gaze sweeps the room. The cabin. Everything covered in a thick layer of dust. Two windows, facing north and south, through which she can see the pale pink sky of early morning, already deepening to blue. The bed pushed up against the wall. A table with a chair, the top covered in papers, some of which have fallen to the floor. Another axe, similar to one she found near what became her designated campsite, leans against a wall beside a pair of sturdy boots. Clothing folded neatly on a dresser catches her eye, and Link sits up on the bed.

She checks around the cabin for signs of recent activity. Coughing from the dust, she opens the door to let in fresher air. Outside she finds a wooden bench, knocked-over, and nothing else. Nothing in the cabin appears to have stirred for some time.

When she picks up the clothes—several shirts, undergarments, trousers, gloves, socks, hoods—both on top of and within the dresser, she discovers the vast majority riddled with holes and others eaten away entirely. From the bottom-most drawer she pulls an iron chest. She salvages a dark blue hood that she wraps around her shoulders; a white undershirt; a quilted green tunic, thick and warm; and a pair of sturdy leather gloves lined with wool.

Despite the stale scent of the fabric, they smell better than the rotten-meat stench emanating from the bokoblin furs and fit her better besides. Link opts to leave the furs outside the door to the cabin so as not to stink up the small room within. She investigates further. Various tools line the walls, many of whose uses she could not name. She pockets a hunting knife and notes the location of a metal pot. Under the bed Link makes another discovery: a relatively flat locked safe. The lock has rusted enough that a swift kick snaps it off.

Setting the safe on the bed, Link lifts the lid. A jumble of red fabric and wood greets her. She takes the whatever-it-is from the safe and unfolds it, marvelling at its size. Wooden supports line the undecorated underside of the fabric, while the top presents a white-painted symbol she has seen somewhere before. A hard cylinder falls from the whatever-it-is and Link catches it: a thin telescope the same red colour of the whatever-it-is's fabric, with a string-and-wooden attachment that loops through rings in the supports of the whatever-it-is.

When folded up the whatever-it-is takes up little space. A cord running between the supports suggests she carry the whatever-it-is about her shoulders for easy access.

The incessant rumbling of her stomach puts on hold her attempts to figure out the whatever-it-is's function. Link takes the whatever-it-is with her outside to gather, to hunt. Berry bushes by the woods near the cabin provide a snack. Climbing a tree for a better look at her surroundings yields a nest of eggs that she carries to the cabin.

Link hauls water from the lake in the pot. Her efforts at preparing the birds' eggs result in barely edible, over-boiled nonsense. Nonetheless she scarfs them down with gusto. A less delicious meal merely grants her the strength to cook a much more delicious one later, after all.

After responding her body's most immediate needs, Link rifles through the papers on the desk. A bound book contains a variety of handwritten songs and poems. She flips through a few, then sets the book aside and turns to the papers strewn about the desk and the floor. She finds that she cannot read the majority for want of words she does not understand; the handwriting, cramped and personal; and the fact most of the papers have been eaten away by time. Some proceed in a language she does not know. Many of the pages she can read detail the daily life of whoever lived in the cabin previously. Thoughts on hunting boars and fish. Where to find various insects, herbs, spices. The author describes the bokoblins and their behaviours, their habits, where they make their camp, how they have proliferated in number of late. Strangely, she sees the same phrases repeated over and over again, set apart at the beginning or end of entries. No activity today. I wonder when this 'hero' wake up. _ _ for you, I will stay here for as long as you need me to. The more recent entries, marked by their prominence on the desk and the comparative lack of yellowing and damage, take on a more somber tone, and the careful dates marking the start of each entry become less and less regular. The author asks She won't, will she? at the bottom of one page, and then the author ceases mentioning the mysterious 'she' altogether.

The oldest sheet she can find—judging by the date marked at the top, if she can assume how the author has written the date, and by the half-eaten nature of the parchment—lies hidden away in the bottom drawer of the desk.

Link stares at the words, or at least those that she can piece out.

I've checked on some of the gifts left for the 'hero' around the Great Plateau. The bokoblins mostly stay in certain areas and avoid others. I've seen none in the Temple of Time, and none in the immediate vicinity of the Shrine of Resurrection. Whatever sacred power compels them stay away will prove instrumental, I'm sure. I haven't yet thought of the best way to ensure the 'hero' receives the doublet, that dratted telescope, or the paraglider. I could put the paraglider near the Tower as _ _ suggested in the letters, but I've seen the bokoblins about, and there's no evidence they will still function, especially if the last sheikah slate defects as well.

Though I cannot get into the Shrine of Resurrection, I've done my part in leaving some clothing for _ _'s oh so precious knight. The last thing I want to see is the so-called Hero of Hyrule running around buck naked.

An entire paragraph here is scribbled out, illegible. Link's gaze drops downwards, seeking words she can read.

I have no idea what _ _ was thinking. I trust _ _, of course I do. But this all seems so incredibly silly to me. I could simply give the 'hero' all these instruments of heroism myself. But _ _ told me that _ _ voiced concerns about disorientation; it has been years already, and still the supposed hero has not awakened. A controlled environment is a must, so _ made me promise, so as not to overwhelm the Champion. Pah, if this could overwhelm our 'hero', then what chance has the Champion to defeat the Calamity? I don’t suppose that our great 'hero' gotten a smack on the head as well as all those injuries.

What if the supposed chosen hero wakes up and simply falls down a cliff? What if the supposed chosen hero is beaten to death by the reddest of red bokoblins? What if the supposed chosen hero fails to be the chosen hero at all? Would the blade of evil's bane forsake all of Hyrule for a single ranchhand? Has the sword that seals the darkness abandoned us on _ _'s wishes?

And yet, I cannot break my promise to _...

The remainder devolves into a scrawl. Link sets the paper down. The metal chests. The bow, the satchel, the ink and quills.

She sits on the edge of the bed and munches an apple.

The fruit does much to restore her balance. Link takes another look at the safe that held the paraglider and the telescope, still open on the bed. A black envelope. She opens it with the hunting knife to find a letter in a slightly different, loopier handwriting, though significantly easier to read. The letter seems written with different characters than the others, though Link finds herself able to comprehend them.

Champion of Hylia, Hero of Hyrule, Her Majesty's Knight, Courageous Link—

You will have found your paraglider in the same shape as that which you left it. I have taken the utmost care with it. It will see you safely from the Great Plateau.

Her Majesty has entrusted you with the last sheikah slate. If the slate responds to you, attempt to commune with the Great Plateau Sheikah Tower, and the four shrines. I have left a map on the back. Ensure that no monster ever touches the slate, nor does it fall into malice.

An unsteady hand has stricken through the next few paragraphs. Instead, in handwriting and with characters identical to those of the first pages Link read, a new paragraph scrawls in the margins:

Head to Kakariko. If you have never been to the plateau before, head east from the Tower and through the Dueling Peaks. Ask for a woman named Impa. She or her descendants will explain what has happened in the intervening time.

The letter resumes in the loopier, easier handwriting.

Do not tell anyone of your existence. Do not tell anyone who you are. This is of utmost importance. No fanfare surrounds your awakening for Her Majesty's request of secrecy.

Go quickly, with all of the courage, wisdom, and power that you may muster. Precious little time remains. Her Majesty needs you.

May the Golden Goddesses light your path, and may Our Goddess watch over you.

Link turns the letter over. Two maps on the back. One of the plateau, with the tower and the four shrines—the structures that she's seen—marked, alongside several major landmarks. The other, a far less detailed map that shows vague arrows pointing eastwards, a sketch labelled The Dueling Peaks, another sketch of what appear to be needles labelled Pillars of Levia, and a large circle near Lantern Lake labelled Kakariko Village. Link copies the names of the landmarks from the back of the letter to her own map. She rolls the papers up.

The hero's paraglider.

She must have mistaken the girl from her memories, the girl with the golden hair and the skewer of fruit and mushroom. Link refers to someone else, someone for whom these words, these weapons, this task is meant.

She knows nothing of any of this.

Yet she has seen no one else on the entirety of the Great Plateau, and even this cabin—the first sign of life she has witnessed besides the buildings in ruins—has filled with the dust of ages unattended.

No one will come to claim the paraglider nor the telescope if she doesn't.

But Link. Surely not her name, except by way of coincidence. Yet she has nothing else to call herself, and so Link will do for now.

At the very least she can bear the news to this Impa at Kakariko Village. If nothing else that gives her something to work towards beyond the ache in her belly and the dryness of her throat.

She finishes sorting through what she can glean of the cabin. Flint, always useful. She exchanges her boots for sturdier ones, replaces the threadbare clothing with those in the best shape that she can find. The shirt and trousers she select hang somewhat loosely from her frame, their previous owner clearly bulkier and taller than she, and she ties off the sleeves at her wrists and the pants' legs at her ankles. A whetstone. More ink and blank parchment. Rope. Threads, a needle. More arrows, which she slots into her quiver. A water-skin that makes her grin. Several pouches that she sews onto her belt. Somehow her fingers go through the motions automatically: akin to the act of picking up an apple, the sewing simply comes to her hands despite no recollection of ever doing it before.

The metal pot, which she affixes to her back. The heaviness weighs her down, but for delicious meals on the road she would do most anything.

Link collects the paper and the book of poems and places them safely into the iron chest, where they might keep longer. She smooths out the covers on the bed. She glances around, tidies the cabin and the mess that she has made.

She stands in the doorway. Inhaling the mid-morning air Link steps a step east. The door closes.

Off she walks.

As she takes the journey to the eastern edge of the plateau, she collects herbs, mushrooms, apples, berries, acorns, whatever she can grab. In the meantime she reflects on how to best prepare birds' eggs for the next time she happens upon a nest.

The cliffside comes into view. As if the cliff were the end of the world, the land drops away. She detaches the telescope and ties the cord of the thin cylinder through the loops of her trousers to rest at her left hip.

Link unfolds the paraglider.
She should have practised, on the roof of the cabin or elsewhere. Yet she pushes forward. Walking towards the edge, then jogging, then running. She springs up, leaps.

The paraglider catches the wind. The draft breaks her fall, and also possibly her arms.

Suddenly supporting the entire weight of her body, the clothing, the sword, all of the various doodads she's stuffed into pouches, and the beloved metal pot with her spindly arms, still weak after rising from the chamber in which she awoke, does not seem like the best idea that she's ever had.

Link closes the paraglider. She hurtles towards the ground. Her eyes, already watering from the wind, widen further. By force she manages to open the paraglider again. Her arms burn. Her shoulders threaten to pop.

She tumbles to the ground into a patch of grass. The pot smacks the back of her head as though admonishing her. Link lifts herself up from the ground, rubbing where the pot hit her. The sight of the green grass smeared over the knees of her trousers makes her laugh. The laughter stops as she realises the implications of her fall.

In a frenzy she checks on the most important thing that she carries: the satchel of food.

Most has remained in one piece, barring a few unfortunate berries bumped by apples. Safe. She grins to herself.

Link re-ties her ponytail. Glancing up she looks eastward with the sun as her compass. A mountain rises up in the distance. Squinting, she makes out the split in the centre. Not one mountain, but two, curving into one another. As though a single peak has been cut down the middle.

The Dueling Peaks.

A massive river curves around to her left. Far off in the distance, by the left mountain of the Dueling Peaks, another of those spires pierces skywards.

Link trots forward. The ruins of destroyed buildings litter the ground, most inhabited by monsters. Mostly bokoblins, but she spots some of the larger moblins as well, sleeping in patches of sunlight. She avoids them as best she can. After some time she notices a long road—trampled out from the grasses surrounding it by the passage of travellers—that winds up to a bridge over the river. She marks the road, the river, and the bridge on her map and moves forward towards the Dueling Peaks.

As she crosses the bridge, she notes someone approaching her from the other side. Not a monster. A man with short brown hair, a sword at his hip and a shield at his back, walking with the relaxed gait of someone not expecting danger. He waves at her.

"Mornin', friend," he calls once she comes into earshot. "Haven't seen your face 'round these parts. You new?"

Link nods.

"Wha'cha lookin' for, buddy?" He stands with his hands on his hips. "I know these parts like the back of my hand, y'know."

She signs out the name of the village letter by letter: "Kakariko Village."

The man looks at her, frowning. She repeats the motion, more slowly this time, and he snaps his fingers. "Aw, sorry there, but I don't know my signs like I should. You might find someone up at Kasuto who knows, though. Lotsa folks do. Let's see here...just go 'cross Proxim here, and keep on following Squabble River." He points her in the right direction. "You'll wanna go through the Dueling Peaks. On the other side, you'll see a pair of bridges. The short one's the Little Twin, and the long one's the Big Twin. On the other side of the Big Twin Bridge you'll find Kasuto on the road. Got all that, buddy?"

Link bobs her head eagerly, grinning at him. "Thank you," she signs before remembering he can't read the words off of her hands. Instead she touches her thumb to her index finger, making a circle in the common gesture for approval.

The man blinks at her, features contorting in confusion. Then he shrugs. "Take care of yourself out there, buddy. Hope to see 'round sometime."

The more she closes the gap between her and the Dueling Peaks, the more her feet twist in the direction of the tower. The tablet—no, the Sheikah slate—on her hip bobs with every step.

She veers off the path and wades into the river. Ascending the tower takes significantly longer than descending, but curiosity drives her up and up. The air grows cold though the doublet staves off the worst of the chill. Her body grows weary. But she can see the last of the climb.

Up, up. Finally she slaps her right palm onto the top platform of the spire. Link scrambles, pushing herself up, and tumbles onto the viewing platform, wheezing.

She sets the Sheikah slate into the pedestal. While the black crystal distills a droplet, Link sits down by the edge to rest. She looks over the world.

The tower glows blue. She pulls out her map. Dueling Peaks Tower. From this height she sketches out what she can see below her and the names that the man on the bridge gave to her.

From her vantage point orange specks draw her eye. Shrines, on top of the Dueling Peaks. And not only there, but scattered about. Even one beside the bridge, that she hadn't paid attention to earlier.

After she delivers the news, she'll investigate. Perhaps she can find a translator for the strange language in which the voices of the shrines speak.

Lifting herself back on her feet, Link takes the Sheikah slate from the pedestal. She could climb back down as she did before. Or—the muscles of her arms scream at the notion—she could kick off and glide down in style.

This time she braces herself and the initial weight on her arms shocks her less. She glides through the heart of the Dueling Peaks, tracking the river down to the twin bridges. Changing her course with the tilt of her body and the sweep of her legs, she aims for the centre of Big Twin Bridge.

She crashes into the river.

Several minutes of frantic swimming later, she crawls onto the shore and collapses, gasping in breaths in-between trying not to laugh.

No matter what misfortune may befall her, as long she is alive, as long as she can laugh, so too will she be all right.

As the man on the bridge told her, a small village nestles along the road and spills out to the banks of the river, with plowed fields visible further beyond the wooden buildings with their thatched roofs. Link picks herself up to limp up the path to Kasuto. Scents mingle: cooking rice, meat in smokehouses, fresh straw, carved wood, that of horses and goats, the mixed smells of the lives of people. A simple sign by the edge of the first building reads Welcome to Kasuto. A woman in light armour leans by the sign. An outdoor cooking area of sorts in the heart of the village draws Link’s attention immediately. The people of Kasuto sit at large round tables, chatting amicably, while many more stand around the several large cooking pots and grills in the area, preparing meals. Near the pots she observes a long table covered with massive dishes of raw ingredients that the chefs take from. She observes a man approach one of the cooking pots with a basket. He removes handfuls of different berries from the basket and places them into the appropriate dishes, then selects other ingredients before picking a pot.

Communal cooking. Each person bringing ingredients and then taking the ones that they need. Link pats the satchel.

The guard clears her throat as Link enters Kasuto. "State your business, traveller."

Link blinks. "I'm hungry," she says honestly.

The guard slams the butt of her spear against the ground. Link cocks her head to one side. "State your business, or leave Kasuto."

Link touches her chin, her brow knitting together in thought. After a moment she beams, her memories in order. "I brought ingredients with me, so don't worry."

The guard's eyes narrow. "Do you take me for a fool?"

Link blinks again, twice. Perhaps the woman does not know signs either. "I'm delivering a letter to Impa, in Kakariko. The man on the bridge told me to come here because it's on the way."

The guard's expression does not change as she stares Link down. Link calmly gazes back at her, disturbed only by the rumbling of her stomach. The guard shakes her head. "I'm keeping an eye on you. If you do anything suspicious, you're out."

"Thank you," Link signs. She jogs up to the communal table, her path straight as the keese flies, and overturns her satchel, leaving just enough mushrooms and apples for the road to Kakariko. The residents of Kasuto turn to stare at her as she unloads the contents of the satchel. She glances around. No meat, but she does find salt and spices. She sets herself to one of the unattended stone grills and gets to grilling. The Hyrule herbs she picked on the plateau make for a fine bed on top she adds salt and every spice she can see, liberally shaking entire handfuls over the herbs. The fragrances of the spices make her mouth water: some sharp, some tart, some hot, some bitter, some tangy, some slightly sweet, each a unique flavour to add to the chewy herbs. She adds a smidgen of butter from the communal table. The butter melts over the herbs into a coat of glistening gold.

Delicious.

Link sweeps the herbs from the grill into her own personal cooking pot in lieu of a plate. She seats herself at one of the round tables. No utensils, but no worries: she eats with her bare hands. The freshly grilled herbs burn her palms yet she cannot resist the fragrance of salt, spice, salt, seasoning, and more salt. She stuffs her mouth.

An olive-skinned woman with long black hair braided into two loops on either side of her head takes the seat across from Link. She brings her own plate boasting an omelette and a baked apple. Link looks up from her pot of herbs to the woman.

She moves her hands in a gesture Link does not recognise. "You sure caused a stir, going in for the Link does not pause eating but nods. The woman raises her brows over her red eyes. "We don't get many travellers in the springtime. Where are you from, stranger? I don't —" Another word that Link does not know. "—you've been to Kasuto before."

Link munches down the last of the herbs. The tender exterior coupled with the still-crunchy heart; the myriad of every spice under the sun giving each bite its own explosion of tastes, some better than others; and the butter melting on her tongue have brought a smile to her mouth and leaked the tension from her shoulders.

She places the pot on the ground to free her hands.

"My name's Link. I'm headed to Kakariko," she answers, spelling out her name and the village's character by character.

"Seems like you haven't been there either. It's called—" The woman makes a gesture, which Link replicates. "That's how you sign Kakariko."

She cautions Link that while the residents of Kasuto speak Central Hyrulean, those of Kakariko tends towards the Necludan tongue, though most know enough Central Hyrulean to get around. When the woman switches to Necludan signs to prove her point, Link finds that she can read the words off of the woman's hands with almost the same accuracy as she could Central Hyrulean. Moreover her body knows to form the words.

Eventually the talk turns to Link and the woman. She introduces herself as Lami and apologises on behalf of the guard. "Maggi's new to the force, and she's trying her best." Link shrugs. Lami attempts to wheedle information from her, though Link can say little but "I don't know." to most of Lami's questions. She cannot recognise some of the gestures that Lami makes, and the overall speed and angles of Lami's movements make communication slightly difficult. Occasionally Lami interjects to inquire what certain words of Link's mean. Link asks of the meaning of Hyrule, and Lami's eyebrows threaten to shoot off of her own face. "It's where we live, I guess. The dynasty fell one hundred years ago, but we still call this land Hyrule. Not like anyone's taken up the castle since. Wait, where are you from if you don't know that? You're—" A missing word. "—aren't you?"

Link's utter perplexion spurs Lami to explain. The Seven Goddesses, she says, that created the Seven great races of Hyrule, or so goes the legend. Some residents of the village sport the pointed ears of those blessed by the Goddess Hylia; others, the red eyes characteristic of the blessing of the Goddess Sheik; though most have both, such as Lami herself, a dual blessing for a dual lineage.

"Seeing as you're certainly not from around here, and seeing as you don't have any rupees," Lami observes, "I'll pay for a night at the River Beetle." The local inn, Link gathers. She shakes her head at the offer. "Oh, but I insist. By the way, what's with the talking like an eighty-year-old? Is it part of your character or something? You seem like a pretty humble kinda person so I can't say I understand what's up."

When Link tilts her head to one side in response, Lami explains further. The signs Link employs and the manner in which she speaks resemble those of an earlier age. "The way my grandma talks," Lami clarifies. For the first time Link finds herself consciously reflecting on her own movements. She emulates Lami's gestures increasingly as the conversation draws on. After some time Lami insists on the offer of an inn again, and Link stands from the table.

"Thank you, Lami. I'm off to Kakariko."

Lami props her chin up in her palm. "If you ever come by again, try not to scare the locals so much, y'know?"
There, that last gesture. One that Link has just learned.

"I'll try," Link responds with a sheepish smile. The cooking pot on her back, her belly full of warmth, and the strangeness of her speech weigh on her in different ways. Still she takes the path forward.

To Kakariko she goes.

---

Salt-Grilled Greens (two hearts) - Hyrule herb, rock salt

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Rereading this chapter, it blows my mind how much I fucked up between writing chapter one and writing chapter eighty-four. At least I can fix issues of early installment weirdness; while there haven't been any major continuity errors, there were a few things left more ambiguous than I thought. Another thank you to my wonderful beta reader, Emma.

Regarding the letters, I'll note what languages they were written in. You won't know what these terms mean just yet, but those who come back after chapter sixty-eight or so will have a better idea. The letters that Link cannot read written in the looiper handwriting are in an eastern dialect of Faronese; the letters that Link cannot read in the most cramped handwriting are in the Medli dialect of Tabanch; the cramped letters that Link can read are in the Dueling Peaks dialect of Necludan; and the final letter that mentions Kakariko is written in Central Hyrulean, albeit with parts in both the looping and the cramped handwriting. Hm! Interesting!

Kasuto, which is in the same place as the Dueling Peaks Stable in Breath of the Wild, was named after the town in The Adventure of Link; while Breath of the Wild has only seven villages, I decided to give the world of Delicious in Wilds many more, just as I have expanded the size of Hyrule to take a few months to pass from one end of the country to another. Lami and Maggi were partially named after Mila and Maggie from The Wind Waker.

I thought it unfortunate that Link in Breath of the Wild does not seem to have any difficulty adjusting to culture or language despite the hundred-year absence. To that end, I've made Link has to adjust to the various languages. Necludan in its various dialects is spoken, well, in Necluda; Central Hyrulean used to be a lingua franca before the fall of Hyrule one hundred years ago. Link can read, write, and sign both. Link will not be so lucky with other languages; Link cannot read Faronese or Tabanch.

In Delicious in Wilds, gerudo, sheikah, and hylians are all human. Their patron Goddess or Goddesses are noted by specified phenotypic markings: pointed ears for the hylians, red eyes for the sheikah, and red hair for the gerudo. Therefore, someone with both pointed ears and red hair would be considered both hylian and gerudo, for example. To this end, I did not give the sheikah white hair and red eyes as in Breath of the Wild, but only the red eyes; Lami, for instance, has dark hair. I'm not really sure why the developers chose for everyone to have pointed ears in Breath of the Wild, since traditionally only the hylians did, but it has the unfortunate effect of hylians being "the default" while sheikah and gerudo have very characteristic phenotypes. We also don't see any mixed-race individuals despite seeing interracial couples. Therefore I took some liberties. The traits of the markings of the Goddesses are hereditary; a child of a sheikah-gerudo couple could be sheikah, gerudo, or both. In the legends, the Goddesses Sageru, Sheik, and Hylia worked together to jointly create humanity and then blessed a third with each of Their respective markings.

Although Link is implied if not outright stated to seventeen in Breath of the Wild, Link is eighteen as of the first chapter of Delicious in Wilds; Zelda, too, was eighteen rather than seventeen at the time of the Great Calamity in Delicious in Wilds. I should note that there will be no sexual content in Delicious in Wilds. I'm simply more comfortable writing the violent combat scenes with characters who are eighteen or older rather than minors.

Thank you for reading.

midna's ass. 28 August 2017.

Beta reader's comments: Rereading this chapter now, it blows my mind how well the author carefully constructed things in later chapters and connected back to these early chapters, despite not planning ahead. The letters Link reads in these chapters get elaborated on later, and it all ends up making sense in a really great way. Things like that make Delicious in Wilds feel like such a cohesive whole.

I really like Link's encounter with the man on the bridge who doesn't know how to read sign language. That's a cool detail, that not every person in this world knows how to read it. Link leaping off the edge of a cliff with zero paraglider practice is the most Link thing in the world, and I love it. Lami is a solidly underrated minor character. This series has really great small characters, characters that just pop up for a chapter or two, but are still really well realized. The fact that Link talks like, well, like someone from a hundred years ago would talk is an awesome detail to me. Things like that make the world feel so real and alive.

Emma. 28 August 2017.
Chapter Summary

On the road to Kakariko, the travelling chef assists a tree-person in retrieving their maracas from bokoblin. Once the chef arrives at Kakariko, the chef discovers that the matriarch of Kakariko appears to have mistaken the chef for a hero named Link. The chef passes out from hunger and learns about the village from a young aspiring cook and her father, a village guard. A strange memory returns to the chef, of two girls arguing about someone chosen by some "sword that seals the darkness," by some "blade of evil's bane."

Chapter Notes

There is a brief combat sequence in this chapter; however, it's not bloody at all and does not fit the "Graphic Depictions of Violence" archive warning; later combat sequences warranted the warning. For those who do want to skip it, it starts at "With that Link sets off." and ends at "Link shakes her head and continues up the hill."

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The path to Kakariko winds long through the mountains. She burns the daytime hiking and sleeps in the boughs of roadside trees. Occasionally travellers on horseback pass her by, in both directions. Most pay her no mind; a few slow down to chatter briefly about the coming spring weather or inquire why she has no horse. She asks instead about the names of landmarks to write them on her map.

"If you're clever about it, you can catch your own steed," advises a man on a brown and white horse. "There's plenty of 'em near Kasuto. Or you can buy one from the stable there, if you're scared of a li'l filly. Speakin' of buying things, you seem in sore need of some..."

By the time Link can see the Pillars mentioned on the back of the letter jutting up into the clouds, like some deity had thrown stone darts into the earth, her thighs burn from the week-long uphill hike. A lone tree by a bend in a path serves as a place to rest. Link drops her things beside her and then plops herself down at the base of the tree.

She leans against the trunk. The wind up the cliffs shifts her bangs and lifts her sidelocks. The leaves rustle a lullaby overhead. Steadily she lowers her eyelids.

A mournful cry awakens her from her nap. Rubbing her eyes on the heels of her hands, Link finds herself staring at something like a human-sized, human-shaped tree with a patterned leaf for a face, who stands not a half-metre away from her. The tree-like person blubbers loudly, their branch-like hands covering what amounts to their eyes.

Link checks her supplies but nothing seems amiss. Shouldering her satchel, she glances between the crying tree-person and the upwards road.
She shakes her head at herself and touches the person on the shoulder.

They leap up into the air at the contact; Link flinches back. She raises her head. The tree-person hovers high above her. If she squints, she can make out a spinning green something or other in their hand, not unlike a maple seed.

She watches the tree-person return slowly to the ground. Link takes the opportunity to nibble on a mushroom she steamed last night, timing the tree-person's descent with how much she has eaten.

When they float about a metre about soil, the tree-person cries out—their voice high-pitched as steam from a kettle—something in a language she does not know. Link shakes her head. The tree-person says other things, and still Link does not know. At last, accented by a sound like tumbling blocks of woods, the tree-person speaks words she can parse: "You can see Hestu!?"

At that Link nods.

The tree-person alights in front of her, one and a half times her height, though with a demeanor and timbre more suitable to a child. "I did not know your kind could still see mine! Oh, oh, oh! Shalakah!" Abruptly the tree-person grabs Link and pulls her into a hug tight enough to squeeze the breath from her lungs. They swing her this way and that, yelling "Shakalah!" as they spin, before letting her go. Link stumbles a few steps backwards and then stands, swaying in a daze.

"Hestu says hello!" the tree-person proclaims, pointing at themself. "And Hestu is overjoyed to meet you!" Hestu reaches behind their back, then stops. The leaf over their face—or making up their face—droops. "Hestu's maracas!"

Link blinks.

"Oh, friendly friend, could you help Hestu!?" Hestu clasps their hands before them. "Hestu must return to Grandpa, but Hestu lost...Hestu lost Hestu's precious maracas! Shookoolooh..." Now Hestu's entire form slants towards the ground. Link nods in response, if only to stop Hestu from flopping into the dirt. Immediately Hestu springs back up and twirls around in dance. "Thank you, thank you, thank you, friend! The boko-bokos took them. Hestu can still hear them from over here! Kookoo..."

Link gazes at the direction in which Hestu points. A plume of smoke from the other side of a small hill reveals the location of the bokoblin camp.

She leaves her things by the tree for Hestu to watch over. When she draws her blade Hestu grips her arm.

"Do not hurt them, friend! The boko-bokos just want music. Oh, oh, a gift of friendship!" Hestu produces a giant leaf from behind their back. "Hestu thinks your kind calls these korok leaves!" They dance excitedly.

Link takes the leaf in hand. She turns it over, then swings it horizontally in a sword-like motion. To her surprise, the shape and size of the leaf blow a powerful gust of air from the slice.

She grins.

With that Link sets off. The letter to Impa will wait. She climbs up to the top of the steep hill and crouches down. Below, three bokoblins sit about a fire. One of them bangs a large red bulbous thing against the ground. A maraca, Link supposes.
She pulls the slate from her hip and readies a bomb. Then she stops: that could break the maracas. Exhaling she dismisses the bomb.

She reaches for her bow before she recalls that she left everything with Hestu. Then Link scans the campsite for the other maraca and spots it hanging from the belt of the same bokoblin banging the first one.

Link launches herself from the top of the hill. She glides downwards and closes the paraglider to land on the same side as the other two bokoblins. Before they can react, she winds up her arm.

The sheer force of the korok leaf's gust knocks them over and pushes the furthest bokoblin entirely off of the cliff. The maraca bokoblin struggles to its feet. Barking a battle cry it rushes her. She tries to snag the second maraca from its belt but merely succeeds in having the first maraca crack her in the head.

Link narrows her eyes at the bokoblin that hit her with a maraca. Hestu told her no blade: She punches the bokoblin in the face. The impact burns her knuckles, and she flaps her hand to get the pain out. The bokoblin topples backwards to the ground. Link squats over its body to wrest both maracas away. Triumphant she holds them up to the sky.

Shuffling behind her alerts to the second bokoblin. She spins around to find the bokoblin brandishing a spear, the tip aflame. Link jumps back. The bokoblin chases her while she drops the maracas for the korok leaf. It swings too slowly. The bokoblin thrusts the spear towards her. She dodges to the left and rolls forward, snagging a maraca with her right hand. The bokoblin readies another thrust. She chucks the maraca at its head.

The bokoblin falls backwards. Link snags the spear from its relaxed grip and breaks it over her knee, then tosses the pieces over the cliff. She looks: both bokoblin appear unconscious.

She catches her breath with her hands dangling at her sides. Picking up the maracas and slotting them into her belt, Link begins the climb upwards.

Something sharp and rock hits her in the small of the back. She glances over her shoulder. There, on the edge of the cliff, the third bokoblin roots for a rock to throw at her.

Somehow it must have climbed back up the cliff. Link shakes her head and continues up the hill.

On the other side she returns Hestu's maracas. They reward her with another hug. While Link gasps for air Hestu tells her to come visit the Korok Forest, that their grandfather would love to meet her, that the other koroks would be delighted to learn of the hero that saved the maracas.

"Take care of yourself. And your maracas," Link signs.

Hestu beams. "Twee hee! See you later, little hylian!" With that they skip up into the air. The giant green maple seed-like leaf they wield propels them down the mountain.

Link watches them go.

She slaps her cheeks with her palms to awaken. With the excitement passed, Link gathers her supplies.

Her satchel feels oddly empty. Hastily she opens it, only to discover her deepest nightmare come true.

All of her food.
Gone.

Link yelps at the mere sight of the absence. She closes the satchel, waits three seconds, and opens it again.

The food does not reappear.

In that moment Kakariko transforms from a mere destination from a letter to a holy beacon of a prospective hot meal. Adrenaline seeps through her entire body. The fire in her stomach rises to energise her until she can feel the heat at her toes and fingers. She propels herself up the side of the mountain, windmilling her arms and legs as if to catch the wind.

A series of carved gates line the inner passage. She stops by the first to catch her breath. Removing the slate from its pouch, Link glances between the design on the back and the symbol, in red, at the crest of the gate.

The same single eye with a teardrop below, though the eye on the door bears wooden arrows pierced through it. The sheikah slate. The sheikah symbol. The Goddess Sheik, of whom Lami spoke, and whose name resides on the plaque of the altar of the Temple of Time.

The sheikah towers, and the shrines.

All roads lead to Kakariko. Link proceeds through the gates. She can hear music. A live performance of some sort, of strings and wind. The crackle of fire. The lively speech of a discussion. A pair of guards waiting at the entrance to the village, sporting loose armour painted white and curved hats with red rims.

They bear the red eyes and light brown skin that Lami did, yet without the pointed ears of a hylian. Sheikah.

The guards peer at her suspiciously as she approaches. Mindful of Lami's comments on her speech, Link signs slowly: "I am here to deliver a letter to Impa of Kakariko."

The guard on the left frowns, while the guard on the right raises his eyebrows. "May we see this letter?"

Link nods. She reaches into her satchel. Her hands close around empty space.

Whoever stole the food from under Hestu's nose—in fairness to Hestu, she did not explicitly ask them to keep watch—also took the letter. She lifts a hand to her chin. "...I don't have it anymore."

The guards look at one another, then back to Link. The guard on the right lifts a hand towards the one on the left. "Do you have any manner of identification?"

Link pats herself down for anything else that she might have brought with her. She shows the guards the paraglider, which they decline after a brief conversation of didn't Lady Impa say she had one of those years ago?; the red telescope, which they also decline; and the doublet she sports, which they—to her surprise—decline. At length she removes the satchel strapped around her shoulders, lifting it from her right hip, to investigate its contents more thoroughly. The guards inhale in unison.

Link takes a step backwards. Her stomach growls. She hasn't eaten since she met Hestu, countless hours back.

"Excuse me, but from whom did you obtain the slate you carry on your hip there?"
"...it was just there when I woke up." Link touches her chin. The two guards continue to stare at her. "I don't really know much, but there was a pedestal with the slate on it. I picked it up and went out. I think it was called the...the Shrine of..." She does not know the word resurrection in Necludan. "...bringing back to life or something like that?" She smiles sheepishly at them, shrugging her shoulders in apology. "There was a name on the back of the letter."

The guards whisper amongst themselves for a few seconds.

"What do you know of Lady Impa!?" the guard on the left barks.

"...nothing, but I found a letter addressed to her, in a cabin in the woods that no one had used for a while. I wasn't doing anything else, so I thought that I'd deliver it to her. Well, no, the letter wasn't addressed to her, but it was telling someone else to go find her, but since the letter was collecting dust, I guessed the 'Link' it was addressed to never picked it up." Link pauses. "Though maybe that other 'Link' really did read the letter and go to see Impa already. But then the paraglider and stuff were still there..." She scratches her head. Somehow her story carries far less impact, yet, when she stood in the cabin with letter in hand, her logic had seemed sound to her.

The left guard's jaw opens. The guard on the right sagely inclines his head. "We will have to blindfold you first, but we will take you to Lady Impa."

Link nods. Her stomach rumbles again. Perhaps after she explains the contents of the letter to Impa, they will reward her with food, or at least a chance to prepare a meal. The guard ties a red blindfold around her eyes. She feels them take her either hand. They lead her. As she walks, she listens to the music that grows louder when they enter the village proper, to the snippets of conversation she hears that hush when she nears, to the whispers of "Who's that?" and "Why're they blindfolded?" in the voices of children, to the clucking of cucco, to the splash of a nearby waterfall, to the creak of herself and the guards passing over a wooden bridge and then the steady footsteps over a stone path.

She tastes the air: the smoky scent of torches; the fragrance of apple and peach; the mild stench of farm animals; a savoriness so familiar that her mouth fills with saliva, yet that she cannot name. Link senses the odd lightness of her own body. Her stomach rumbles out its emptiness.

"Hey, walk straight," one of the guards snaps.

She wobbles nonetheless.

"Careful of the steps." She walks up one, two, three steps, and almost trips when she expects a fourth one. The waterfall sounds closer now, and the music farther. A sudden departure of warmth indicates that she has come under the shade. "Wait here." The guard on her right side lets go. She hears creaking, and then muffled conversation. The creak returns. "Come in. Kneel."

Link kneels down. A hard floor. A slight pressure on the back of her head foretells the removal of the blindfold. As Link adjusts to the sudden change in light, her vision focuses on the person kneeling before her upon a thick red cushion, their face more a mass of wrinkles than features, their silver-grey hair even whiter against their brown skin, small and shrivelled upon the cushion, clothed in robes of white and red. An elderly woman. Her breaths rattle. Her withered hands shake with intensity as she raises them, a violet bracelet curled around her right wrist.

"I cannot believe my eyes. Is it really you, Link?" The woman peers at Link. "I know it must surprise you to see me in this state, Link, but bear with me. I am just as surprised to see you...as you are." She lowers her voice. "...unchanged."
Link shakes her head. "I know that our names are the same, Lady Impa, but I'm not the Link from the letter. I just took the name because I don't have anything else to call myself."

Lady Impa's fingers sprawl over her knees. "...what?"

Link explains briefly, about awakening in the Shrine of Resurrection, whose name she signs character by character; about finding the cabin; about uncovering the letter; about the resolution to bring the letter to Lady Impa to let her know that this 'Champion of Hyrule'—or whatever the epithet was—had not received the letter and would not come to receive the message from Lady Impa; about losing the letter to theft while attempting to recover a tree-person's maracas.

She finds that her gaze cannot focus; her arms move a touch too slowly; and the constant ache in her stomach hastens her to speak quickly. When she finishes, she bows to Lady Impa and prays that the guards lead her away so that she can sink her teeth into the apples and peaches she smelled outside.

Lady Impa kneels in silence for a lengthy moment. Link's stomach threatens to devour itself. Then Lady Impa speaks. "Link. What do you remember before you awoke?"

"Before I woke up today?"

"No, Link...before you awoke in that shrine you mentioned. The Shrine of Resurrection, you called it."

She raises her hands; they fall to her knees again. Her first memories arise from the moment she opened her eyes. Those, and the brief flashes of the girls, the one with the golden hair and the one who smelled of horses. "...nothing."

"Link. Do you not recognise me? Have you lost your memories?" Tears well from the corners of Lady Impa's eyes. "Champion of Hylia, Hero of Hyrule, Her Majesty's Knight, Courageous Link. Now, more than ever, we need you."

Link blinks. Once, twice. Her head circles around itself.

She tips forwards into the dark.

A heavenly fragrance rouses her. She sits up, but Lady Impa and the others have gone. Instead she faces another unfamiliar ceiling. An unfamiliar bed with unfamiliar covers, and a very unfamiliar little girl sitting on a stool by her left side, with a more familiar man resting his hand on the little girl's head.

The heavenly fragrance emanates from the bowl that the girl holds.

"Can Koko give it now!" the girl yells, more a statement than a question, and pushes the bowl towards Link. She seizes it in both hands.

"Wait, it's hot," cautions the man—the guard who had stood to the right, who had argued to let Link in—but the pain in Link's palms is no match for the force of her determination.

Tipping her head back, she drinks the stew. Hot, too hot, burning her tongue and her throat at once, yet so delicious, thick and creamy with the taste of carrot and just enough salt that she licks her lips afterwards. While she wolfs down the soup as if she may never see another speck of food again, the little girl jabbers on eagerly.

"Koko made it herself! First Koko warmed up some hot water and put the swift carrots in it! Then Koko let the carrots simmer for a long, long time, so long that Koko almost fell asleep, but Mama always said that Koko gotta be patient, so Koko was patient! Then Koko grated the carrots until they were real tiny, and then Koko grinded them up real good with a...what was it called? Oh yeah! A mortal 'n' pest...and then Koko heated up milk and added a pinch of salt, like this much salt, just like how Mama taught Koko. See? This much 'xactly. And then Koko stirred and stirred and stirred till her arms got all tired, and then Koko added all the grinded up swift carrots and kept stirring and stirring and stirring and stirring and stirring," the girl says, repeating and stirring for some time before she continues, "and now Master Link's eating it! It'll make Master Link go super fast, since Papa told Koko that Master Link was all woozy and wobbly and stuff!"

The guard moves his hand to the girl's shoulder. "That's enough, Koko. Don't be overwhelming."

Link surfaces from the bowl of stew. She licks her mouth and collects stray droplets from her chin in the palm of her hand to lick it.

"Do you want more, Master Link?" Koko asks, and Link nods more vigorously than she ever has. "Papa, help me!"

Obediently the man hefts a pot from over a fire. Koko takes the bowl from Link and scoops up more soup. This time the man offers Link a spoon, which she accepts and then ignores entirely in favour of draining the stew directly from the bowl, as swiftly as the soup can flow down her throat.

"Link." The man pulls up a chair beside the bed as Link eats her way through the pot. "I understand that that was a lot to bear. You must have fainted from shock." More from hunger, really, but Link does not dare take her palms from the bowl to interject. "Please, feel free to consider my house your own. My name is Dorian. This is my daughter, Koko. My other daughter, Cottla, is asleep." Link nods again. "I have a few questions for you, both from myself and from Lady Impa." Link nods again. "Do you remember anything of Lady Impa, or the Princess?"

She shakes her head.

"Do you know of the Great Calamity?"

Another shake of the head.

"You awoke in the Shrine of Resurrection, and you remember nothing from before."

She nods.

"You go by Link?"

Another nod.

"And, as Lady Impa told me, you're a girl."

Once more a nod.

"I see." Dorian sits back slightly, running a hand over his lower jaw. "Link, once you have eaten, I'd like to ask you to tell me about everything that has happened since you awoke in the Shrine of Resurrection. Lady Impa has decided not to see you for now. She worries that her appearance may cause you great distress."

Link shrugs. Koko fills up her bowl again.
"Link, you have lost most of your memories, and I do not know when you might recover them, if ever. Yet Lady Impa has for you a task. A task which, thank the Goddesses, you have already begun to fulfill. Perhaps we are not as lost as we feared." Dorian quits the stool. "Please rest here for as long as you would like, Link. When you are ready, come find me so that we may talk. Koko, please take care of her."

Link dips her head in affirmation. The instant Dorian leaves the house, closing the door behind him, Koko launches into a verbal tour of all that Kakariko has to offer. Link tries to listen but her thoughts drift.

Unable to remember anything before the Shrine of Resurrection.

Before Lady Impa spoke to her, before she suggested that Link ought to remember something, Link has never considered her lack of memories. A non-issue since she awoke in that blue-lit chamber. And now, now she understands how much must be missing from her head, the girl she may have been before the Shrine of Resurrection, all of the people that she must have known and now forgotten, all of the meals that she must have eaten and now cannot recall.

Yet Champion of Hylia? Hero of Hyrule? Her Majesty's Knight? Some mistake. Some quirk of fate. Some coincidence of another who shares her name. Prior to meeting with the woman in Kasuto, she had no knowledge of Hylia or of Hyrule. Lost memories or not, she does not feel too heroic.

Link scrapes the bottom of the bowl with the spoon, having finally slowed down enough to make use of the utensil. She lifts the remains of the carrot cream soup to her mouth. She sniffs.

A memory. Half a memory, of two girls arguing at the base of the stairs, one tall and thin, hair cut short save for a single strand that hangs over her face, clothed in black save for a sash of red around her middle, the other a head shorter, red hair tied back to a thick ponytail with a band of green, golden earrings glinting in evening torchlight, robed in a dress of blue and gold. Link herself held a bowl of carrot soup as she watched from the top step.

"There is no reason for the sword that seals the darkness to have chosen that wielder. We need find another, and you—as one of our own Champions—know it as well as I. That scrawny thing, the Champion of Hylia? The Hero of Hyrule?" The face of the girl in black contorted into a grimace; she spit out her next words. Link tries to place her voice, familiar, so familiar. "Her Majesty's Knight, when I have trained my life for this very moment? And what do they call me, in turn? The Princess's shade."

The other girl, of dark brown skin, her scarlet hair framing her sharp features, tipped back her head to laugh.

"The blade of evil's bane chooses who She wishes to choose. The Goddesses have decided. Your envy means little, and I suggest that you accept Her judgment. The only one you're harming is yourself."

"But why? Why choose someone who has scarcely held a sword before? Why did it pass over the hundreds of knights, of Her Majesty's own attendants, for some wanderer who has no knowledge of the destiny that Her Majesty bears?"

the girl with the green hairband turned the top step. Link tried to back up, but the girl with the golden earring met her gaze. "Link," she said with a smile, and the taller girl fell silent. "I thought I smelled soup! Come on down here to join us."
Link felt herself begin to walk down the stairs. She leans forward, but the girls blur, the hallway fades, the stairs dissipate like mist in the morning sun. The memory falls through her fingertips.

"...and then there's the arrow lady, Rola," Koko continues. Blinking, Link desperately attempts to nod along to the rhythm of Koko's words as if Link had not just lost herself in thought. The speed of her nodding and the rapidness of her heart make her fear that her chest will burst open. She recalls Koko mentioning something about swift carrot. She prays that the hasty carrot soup will not hasten her to her own demise. "Koko thinks you'd like her! She's not from around here so people sometimes treat her funny, but her husband left her a while ago, and she's sad. Koko thinks you two could get along! She's hylian too!"

The past remains the past. For now, Link has a present. So long as she lives, everything will be all right.

She lets Koko tell her about Kakariko. The fullness of her stomach and the sound of Koko's stories lull her back to an uneasy sleep.

—

_Hasty Veggie Cream Soup_ (two hearts, low movement speed boost for 03:20) - rock salt, fresh milk, swift carrot

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Another big thanks to my beloved beta reader Emma, for her herculean effort at pointing out where poor readers might wallow in confusion. It's easy for me, as an author, to think I'm being clever, when really I'm just being needlessly obtuse. It should be hopefully clear to those who have played _Breath of the Wild_ the identities of the two characters in the memory, but for those who might be lost, the girl with the green hairband is Urbosa.

Right, another note on character's ages: At the time of the Great Calamity, Zelda was eighteen, and Urbosa was two years older at twenty. "But wait!" you say. "Urbosa is so much taller and seems like an adult!" That appears to be due to the fact that all gerudo models in _Breath of the Wild_ are ridiculously tall, extremely muscled, etc. Even Riju, who is supposedly a child, is sexualised with much more wide-set hips and whatnot than expected of a literal child. This is not to say that children cannot have such features (early sexualisation of those who develop precociously is another matter), but these design decisions are deliberate on the part of the Zelda team. I've altered the Champions to, honestly, better fit with the actual worldbuilding present in _Breath of the Wild_ as well as to further narratives and give them development that they sorely lack.

Impa's design in _Delicious in Wilds_ takes notes from her portrayals in other games of the franchise, most notably her recurring role as Zelda's guard and her depiction in _Skyward Sword_. In _Breath of the Wild_, we don't see younger Impa in any of the memories and know little about her except that she was a researcher on the Divine Beasts; it's unclear how she obtained a frame of the final photograph that Zelda took, and her entire relationship with Zelda is unclear. Therefore, I've opted to switch things up a bit. While Impa's sister Purah was indeed a researcher on the Divine Beasts, Impa herself worked as Zelda's bodyguard, thus known as "the Princess's shade," as in a shadow that follows the Princess about. This not only allows me to give Impa an more active role in the story but also allows me to better elaborate her relationship with Zelda.

Note that Impa seems rather surprised to see Link like this, nor does she immediately know the name of the Shrine of Resurrection. Hmm!

Since the koroks are literal plant-people, I opted to refer to them as they/them, because as far as I know trees don't really have genders. They tend to refer to themselves in third-person, in the tradition of child-like characters. Note, too, that Link does not the koroks' native language.

Foods and elixirs still have effects just like in Breath of the Wild. I have endeavoured to make these effects have both pros and cons. We don't really see much of the swiftness in this chapter as it's mostly counteracting Link's own exhaustion, but in future chapters, we'll see more impact. The "hasty" effect is essentially a dose of epinephrine.

On my playthrough of Breath of the Wild, I preferred to run around in the wilds than to wander around the villages and towns. It was Emma who gave me a newfound appreciation for the towns. The added focus on Koko and her family is directly a result of Emma's influence, which I think has added a lot to the story overall. I'm grateful that I could have someone with whom to discuss the game who had and has such different experiences from myself. Delicious in Wilds, as well as my own opinions, are all the stronger for it.

Finally, while Breath of the Wild Link simply accepts the saving of Hyrule set out before her, I wanted to treat that a little more realistically. She'll get there, but it'll take a while.

Thank you for reading. We'll be sticking in Kakariko for a little bit, and then it's off to adventure in chapter six and particularly seven.

midna's ass. 31 April 2017.

Beta reader's comments: This chapter introduces one of my favourite (relatively) minor characters in the series, Koko, who the author has told me was given focus specifically because of my love of her in Breath of the Wild, which makes me feel all warm and fuzzy.

This chapter has my second-favourite Hestu-related scene. My favourite is yet to come.

The memories Link gets at the start of the series are all very jumbled and short and vague. There's something I enjoy about that. It's really fun going back afterwards and piecing it all together.

Emma. 29 August 2017.
Hot Buttered Apple

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef stays for a few days in Kakariko, activating the village shrine, meeting the townsfolk, and acquiring a new set of clothing in green. The wise matriarch of Kakariko requests that the chef deliver a letter to Hateno, then venture to the Eldic capital of Darunia and report back on how fare the gorons and other peoples of Eldin. Agreeing, the chef sets off with a pumpkin gifted by the sister of the village's aspiring cook.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Worries of fate, of lost memories, of whatever happened before the Shrine of Resurrection—of whoever had awaited her in the cabin only to vanish and leave the letter drowning in dust—of the flickers of remembrance that pass through her, of whispers of names and words and motions she has forgotten, or never known at all.

She relinquishes the slate to Lady Impa on request. Lady Impa and her council of guards bid her to stay in the village for a few days while they determine what to do. They tell her not to panic, not to distress herself, but she does not miss the wrinkles of their brows, the shifted glances, the fear and anxiety.

Yet she keeps her head down. Whatever Link they knew from before the Shrine of Resurrection, whatever Link they expected, has been replaced by the Link that kneels before them now, a Link whose greatest achievement revolves around eating an entire pot of stew in less than half an hour.

In the peaceful days that she spends in Kakariko, she allows Koko and Cottla to show her about. In return she aids Koko with the daily cooking; the girls' mother, she gathers, has been away on a trip for some time. In the meantime, Koko has taken over as the family chef, trying desperately to recall the recipes left by her mother. Link helps her gather ingredients, prepare dishes, and—of course—eat the meals. Koko and Cottla introduce her to nearly everyone in the village, so many people and faces that Link cannot recall them all. The kind woman who runs the market. The man who tends to cucco. The bored-looking woman who runs an arrow shop and perks up when Link enters. The travelling painter come briefly home to put to canvas the landscape of his homeland. The carrot farmer and the pumpkin farmer, ever at odds with one another. The elderly lady who tends to the peach trees blossoming even now, who picks one for Link. Ripe and round, the spring peach resembles a full moon as it sits in the curve of Link's palm. The juices run down her chin when she bites in. Koko exclaims happily at Link's enjoyment while Cottla stomps her feet and demands a peach of her own.

Two of the women from the village—Lasli and Claree—offer to fashion her new clothing, as those taken from the previous owner of the cabin scarcely fit her frame. She agrees. Guiding her to their tailor shop Enchanted, they take her measurements, ask her for her favourite colours, and stitch together an outfit of brown and green with accents of blue.

"How can I repay you?" she asks, smiling, as she admires the tunic in the mirror they offer her.
Claree waves a dismissive hand. "Nonsense, darling. You'll repay us all enough when you save Hyrule."

Link does not realise how tightly her nails have dug into her palms until warm wetness slicks her palms.

Lasli clears her throat loudly, and Claree winces. "...that is, please consider it a gift. Besides, as a firm follower of the faith of fashion, I could not merely stand by while a lost one struggled through this world in such ugly rags!" She hefts up the clothes taken from the cabin. "I swear these must be a century old!

Lasli glares at her again, but Link merely bows and takes her leave.

When she exits the boutique, she inquires as to the location of her things. Koko shows her where her father has kept Link's belongings: the blade, the korok leaf, the cooking pot, the paraglider, and the rest. She takes up the sword, no longer for its own sake, but to improve.

Her body remembers what she does not. She practises with the blade alongside several of the swordsmen from the village. Even if the terms have fallen from her memory, her legs take the stances and her arms the motions. She loses the first handful of fights resoundly, and then some inklings in the back of her head awaken. She strikes the swords from their hands; she clashes against their blades and thrusts her own forward; she hovers the tip of her sword not a centimetre the hollow of their throats.

Dorian and the other guard return the slate to her. "Lady Impa has requested that you try to activate the village shrine," the second guard explains brusquely, and Link looks up towards the top of the hill.

While the lift takes her back up, she considers the mechanical creature that she fought, the slow and calculated manner in which it continued to swing its weapons in such repetitive motions until she ceased trying to attack and instead dodged. The mechanical creature went through an axe, a lance, and a sword before simply shutting off. The lift opened thereafter. This time she studied the images: of how to best dodge or parry certain types of attacks in combat, though she could not discern several of the more complicated pictures for lack of understanding of the language in which the shrine-voice spoke.

Instructions, but for what, she cannot say.

Standing in front of Lady Impa's home, Link relays the information to Dorian, who strokes his chin and nods. A sudden gasp from afar makes Link glance towards the house, to find a sheikah woman of about her age staring at her. When the girl notices Link's gaze, she gasps again and covers her eyes.

Dorian chuckles. "Don't mind her. She is Lady Impa's granddaughter, and she believes greatly in the old stories that Lady Impa has told her, of the time before the Great Calamity."

"The old stories?

His expression darkens. "I'll need to talk to her about that later," he mutters. Then Dorian smiles at Link and claps her on the shoulder. "That you could activate the shrine is proof that you carry the blessing of the Goddesses yet. May Sheik's own Truth guide your path." He pauses. "Or rather, may Hylia's. My apologies, I haven't spoken to a non-sheikah in quite some time."

Link shrugs. "I'm happy with whichever Goddess wants to guide me. That I made my way here without getting lost is a miracle, you know?"

Abruptly Dorian's hands clamp around her shoulders. She flinches; he draws himself up and forces her to meet his crimson gaze. "Link. Do not sell yourself short. Whatever has happened can be undone, and already you've proven yourself a capable girl."

Link nods dumbly. Dorian releases her, and she sinks to her knees.

"Sorry, Link. Listen, when we come to a decision about what to do, you'll be the first to know." He glances left and right, and Link tilts her head to one side. "Now, if I could have the slate again, so that we may investigate it further...?"

As Link removes the slate from its pouch and drops it into Dorian's outstretched hand, she hears a voice from the house. The girl. Paya. "U-um, Do-dorian," she stammers, her fingers nervously drumming the banister, "Grandmother said that you could lea-leave the slate with Ma-Ma-Ma-Master Link."

Dorian's smile stretches a little too thin over his mouth. "Oh, is that so? Thank you for letting me know, Paya." He holds the slate out. Link accepts the slate. His fingers close around empty air, and he clicks his tongue. "Well then, Master Link..."

"Please don't call me that."

"...I believe that Lady Impa will have a message for you soon," Dorian finishes. He wipes his brow with a red-lined kerchief. His posture relaxes, and his hands settle loosely on his hips. "Thank you for taking care of my daughters, Link. They've been much happier the past few days. If nothing else, you could consider staying here. I don't think it would be a bad life."

Link rubs the back of her head and laughs uncertainly.

"Well, whatever you decide, you always have a home here, sheikah or no."

With that Dorian leaves Link to her own devices, and to her own device: the slate, which she now regards with some suspicion. Still, she looks up towards the Pillars of Levia that pierce the skies.

She spends the afternoon hiking among them, gathering herbs, roots, and seeds as she does so, alongside a collection of tart spring apples. She brings them back to Koko in the evening only to discover that Koko once again has neglected to bring together all of the ingredients needed for supper. With the apples Link has gathered and the great tub of goat butter that Koko purchased from the marketplace, however, they piece together Koko's mother's old recipe for buttered apples. Link aids Koko in heating the butter in a small pan, to which they add sprinkles of sugar, cinnamon, and a hint of salt. They bake the apples in the sauce over a low fire. The fragrance of caramel and warm butter spreads through the entire house. Link and Cottla perch cross-legged, staring at the apples,licking their lips in unison, while Koko keeps tracks of the time that the apples have baked.

The apples come out soft and sweet, the pinch of salt adding exactly the right amount of offset for Link to tear up. Cottla seems to relish the idea of something so sugary. "Dessert for dinner!?!" Cottla yells. "Link's the best big sister ever!"

Link grins sheepishly at Cottla; Koko's slight frown vanishes the smile.

As night falls, Link gathers several of the buttered apples into a bowl. She inquires to Koko of where she might find Lasli's home. Koko hmms to herself, but Cottla leaps up and eagerly waves an arm. Grabbing Link by the hand, Cottla drags her around the village to the other side, to a small house at the periphery of the insulated scoop of the valley that protects Kakariko from the elements. "Ja-ja! There it is!" Cottla twirls around in an impromptu dance. Link laughs good-naturedly.

She raps on the door to Lasli's home with her knuckles and steps back. After a moment the door creaks open. Lasli stands in the doorway in a white nightgown, her hair loose around her shoulders.

"Link! I didn't expect you," she signs, and Link runs a hand over the back of her neck. "Do you want to come in?"

"It isn't much," Link says, cradling the bowl of apples in the crook of her arm, "but it's at least a small token of my thanks."

Lasli makes an oh sound in the back of her throat. She takes the bowl and motions for Link to follow her inside. She does so, closing the door behind her. Within the house, she finds a simple room, with a small mat for a bed pushed into the corner; a nightstand-like item with a tea kettle, cups, and various wooden instruments on the top; and several articles of clothing neatly folded on a stand. Lasli lays out a mat and gestures for Link to take a seat. She complies.

Lasli kneels on another mat across from Link. Lasli splits some of the apples into a second bowl, which she slides towards Link.

"Thank you, Link. At least share the meal with me."

They eat quietly, although Link, as always, wolfs down her portion with gusto. She sets the bowl aside.

Lasli finishes more slowly. "Thank you. I haven't had good buttered apples like that since Umi...never mind. My apologies for making you wait."

Link shakes her head, partially confused on why Lasli would apologise for eating of all things. "If there's anything else that I can do for you or..." Her wrists go limp, and she ducks her head, her cheeks flushing. "...I forgot the other woman's name."

"Claree?"

She bobs her head. "If there's anything that I can do, please let me know."

"You don't need to do anything, and I'm sorry for what Claree said in the shop today." Lasli sighs. "We've been told about the great hero for so long that we weren't expecting you to show up like this."

Link gazes at the floor. The slate carries the power to generate apparently limitless bombs. If she were to climb up to the peak of one of the Pillars of Levia, then perhaps...

Lasli swings her head fervently from side to side, her eyebrows nearly flying from her face. "That's not what I meant, Link, not at all. It's not fair that we've placed so many expectations and burdens on you. You're just a person, like any of us." She giggles to herself, and Link cocks her head to one side. "When I was younger, I thought of myself as a great adventurer. I romanticised the notion. If I could make the trip down to Kasuto, why, that was the same as going across the entire world. I used to catch the sunset fireflies to light my way at night, oh...I miss those days." Her shoulders slope downwards; the corners of her mouth tug towards her chin. "Nowadays, especially of late, there are too many monsters around to travel safely, and I can't say I know my way around a sword. But what I wouldn't give to see the fireflies again..." She covers her mouth with her hand. "Oh, but listen to me rattle on about things. Tell me about yourself, Link. You, not the hero
They talk. Link recounts all that she remembers, recounts the inner workings of the shrine at the top of the hill, recounts how the tower rising up from the ground on the plateau nearly killed her from shock alone. Lasli answers her questions about the village, or at least some of them. "I'm sorry, but...there are some things that Lady Impa has asked us not to tell you."

She talks about the feud between the pumpkin farmer and the carrot farmer, about the sacred burial grounds towards the other exit to Kakariko, of how Lady Impa came to lead the village. Once a retreat for monks that served the Goddess Sheik, a century ago Kakariko transformed into one of the largest sheikah villages left.

"Left?" Link repeats.

"After the Great Calamity," Lasli says and then curls her fingers inwards. "Ah, sorry, I wasn't supposed to..."

At length Lasli bows to Link. Thanking her again for the buttered apples, Lasli returns the bowl and sees her off.

Link practically skips on the way back to the house, a smile lighting up her lips and a mischievous twinkle in her eye. Though Koko and Cottla have already fallen asleep, Dorian has not yet arrived home. She finds the girls sleeping on mats by the bed. Scooping Koko up with her left hand and Cottla with her right, Link gently places them on the bed and covers them, then takes her own spot on the mats.

She can hardly sleep.

The second the rooster crows, she springs out of bed. After downing a breakfast of leftover buttered apples, she inquires of the possibility of procuring a bug net.

A bug-lover in the village, the son of a rice-growing couple, allows her to borrow his. She sneaks up to the hill to the woods behind Kakariko. Link hops up into a tree and settles between its branches to wait. Her leg cramps. She slides out to find a more suitable tree in which to nap until nightfall.

A strange circular base across a fallen log causes her to quit her search for the ideal tree. The lights glow the same orange as the shrines and the towers. She touches her chin in thought. The circular depression in the base does not respond to her sitting in it, nor waving the slate over it, nor setting the slate down in the depression, nor her stepping on it, nor her jumping up and down, nor her signing somewhat rude comments in its general direction, nor her tapping her foot as she looks about. Nothing in the general vicinity speaks to the secret in unlocking the mysterious whatever-it-is on the ground.

She crosses her arms and launches a more thorough investigation of her surroundings.

Instead of the key to the orange whatever-it-is, she finds a patch of flowers, white and blue, of a particular star-like shape whose petals appear to glisten. Link crouches down beside one of the flowers. The underside of the petals feels fuzzy against her palm. She sniffs.

The fragrance of the petals brings her to close her eyes.

She remembers: the girl with the golden hair, on her elbows and knees in the grass, her blue tunic bunched up around her waist, her spring green eyes wide, the pupils nearly swallowing the irises whole. "A silent princess," she breathed out, while Link squatted beside her, attempting to make out the flower that had captivated the girl so. Her words slur in the memory. "They're endangered, and are seen as a symbol of the blessing of Hylia, but none of our botanists has managed to grow them in captivity. Only in the wilds do they thrive..."

Link leaves the silent princess alone in the quiet safety of the oak above. She discovers the perfect tree and so curls up in its boughs.

She awakens to the buzz of fireflies. When she tries to twirl the bug net as she would her blade, the air catches in the mesh and she topples headfirst from the tree. Link stifles her snorting laugh as she picks herself up.

Bug hunting.

Losing her boots so that her bare feet make less noise against the soft earth, she sneaks silently towards the fireflies. She misses her first few swings. Soon she gets the hang of the bug-netting art. One, two, five, ten. She bottles the fireflies up—with holes poked in the cork—and starts the trek into Kakariko proper.

Link makes it to the base of the hill, stops, and runs back up to grab her boots.

She creeps towards Lasli's house. The slide-closed window marks the perfect opportunity. Link wedges her blade into the thin crack between the window and the wall and jiggles it until the window slides and she can squeeze her fingers in. She opens the window just enough to fit the mouth of the jar through. Then she reaches over, uncorks the bottle, and shakes it. The second the last firefly buzzes out, Link slides the window shut again. She hides behind the house and waits.

Just as she starts to nod off, she hears the door slide open and closed. Link presses her ear against the wall.

She hears Lasli gasp.

Her grin could light all of the torches in Kakariko at once.

Without revealing her presence, Link stealths through Kakariko towards Dorian's home once more. Cottla rolls around demanding supper, while Koko bemoans what an awful sister she herself is. Link prepares her newly crafted two-minute root-'n'-herb stew from the leftovers of yesterday's gathering to quell Cottla's stomach and Koko's nerves.

"You really are the best big sister ever!" Cottla squeals, and Link pats her head. Koko turns in earlier for the night.

Morning brings with it summons to Lady Impa's home. Link arrives flanked by Dorian and the other guard whose name she cannot recall. Once more she kneels before the old woman on her cushion.

"Link." Lady Impa inclines her head. Before she can speak again, she coughs violently, hacking at her own breath. Paya kneels by her side to offer her a cup of water. Link waits patiently. A droplet of sweat rolls down the back of her head. "I will not beg you to be someone that you have no desire to be. It does not matter who you used to be, but who you are now. However, if you will listen, I have a request." She lifts a hand and faces her palm towards Link, the fingers splayed. "But first, I can sense the questions burning in your eyes. Please, ask me anything that you want."

"...what happened?" she signs immediately. "I know that I lost my memories, but I must have known people beforehand. Who is Her Majesty? Who..."
Lady Impa does not respond for enough time that the droplet of sweat slides down the crease of Link's spine. "Link, I do not believe that the answers you seek will come easily, but I have faith that you will recover your memories in your time. I see that you are unsatisfied still. Then, allow me to ease one burden. You need worry not about the people whom you knew then."

Link tilts her head, blinking twice in quick succession.

Impa sighs heavily. "Link..." A storm of emotions too complex for Link to decipher storm over her features, and then the tension bleeds from her face. "All that you would have remembered, save for perhaps the zora, and perhaps those as ancient as I, will not recognise you, nor do I know those that you have left behind. Do not worry of them for now, Link, until you yourself can recall them and seek them out."

Link numbly nods. The words pass over her without sinking in, as if someone had thrown her into the air so violently that her feet still felt planted solidly on the ground.

"Now, I have a favour to ask of you. To the northeast of here lies Eldin and Death Mountain, the homeland of the proud gorons. I ask that you travel to their capital of Darunia and see how they are doing, then report back to me. Worry not, for you will not go as a hero, a champion, or a knight, but merely as an envoy. Can you do this for me, Link?"

Another nod, fainter and number than the first.

"Thank you, Link. As you begin your journey to Eldin, I suggest that you head further east, to the village of Hateno. I have a letter for you to deliver."

Link takes the sealed red envelope in hands that could not form a single word if she tried.

When she bids the villagers good-bye, Cottla thrusts a full pumpkin into her hands, insisting Link take it with her as thanks. Link takes the pumpkin with a stranger's touch. "What's wrong!?" Cottla cries out, loud enough to wake the village.

Link ties the pumpkin to her back and turns away.

By noon, Kakariko faces her receding back.

—

Hot Buttered Apple (two hearts) - goat butter, apple

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Delicious in Wilds has a bit of a slow start due to the shortness of the chapters, because I kept trying to contain myself to 4000 words or less per chapter. Things pick up once we hit Eldin with chapter ten and I gave up. As the famous meme goes, "Why contain it?" It's quite wild to me how meandering the early chapters are in comparison to the greater focus towards the second half of the story, though I suppose that that reflects Link's character development and mental state to some extent.

Each of the Seven Goddesses (Hylia, Sheik, Sageru, Kokir, Goro-goro, Zola, and Erito) has a particular "virtue" associated with that Goddess. Sheik's is Truth: Throughout the franchise, the sheikah are associated with items that literally reference truth (including the lens of truth and the mask of truth), and Impa herself is oftentimes given the role of a truth-dealer, from her informing Link about the Triforce and Princess Zelda in the original The Legend of Zelda, to her role in aiding Zelda uncover the truth of Hylia in Skyward Sword. And, of course, Breath of the Wild Impa serves to coordinate Link's quest and assist Link with recovering Link’s own truths via the memories.

In Delicious in Wilds, I play with Impa's characterisation and role, as I play with larger themes of faith. This will become magnified in later chapters, but for now, she seems to be more truth-hiding than truth-dealing.

The boy who lends Link the bug-catching net is a reference to how Link obtains such a net in A Link to the Past.

Those who have played Breath of the Wild might have an inkling as to Dorian's strange request for the slate.

You'll note that I describe Zelda's eyes as green here; this is Link's original memory of her. That becomes a minor point later, as one of the minor themes of Delicious in Wilds is the fallibility of memory.

I named the capital of Eldin Darunia after the town from The Adventure of Link and the Sage from Ocarina of Time; indeed, the Divine Beast Vah Rudania is named after Darunia, so I felt the moniker appropriate. Fun fact to those who have never played the underrated The Adventure of Link: All of the Sages from Ocarina of Time were named after the villages from The Adventure of Link! The only missing village is Kasuto, although there is some evidence in the game that Kasuto was originally meant to be a character and the seventh Sage, to follow in the footsteps of A Link to the Past's seven "Dark World/future" dungeons, but that Rauru and "Kasuto's" dungeons were cut for time. But that's just speculation with minor evidence. At any rate, it's fun to note.

More time has passed than you might think. Going from Kasuto to Kakariko took roughly a week; from the Great Plateau to Kasuto, about double that length. Since Link stays a few days at Kakariko, I would say that nearly one month has passed from the first chapter. At any rate, we're off to Hateno, and then Eldin. That'll be fun. I might speed up my chapter posting so that we can move through these early chapters (given their shortness) and progress into the great wide somewhere.

Finally, another thank-you to my most wonderful beta reader and partner-in-crime.

midna's ass. 30 August 2017.

Beta reader's comments: I really really really really really love Koko.

I also really love Kakariko in-game, so it makes me super happy that the author basically devoted a whole chapter just to exploring the town I’ve spent so many hours in.

Emma. 30 August 2017.
Fried Wild Greens

Chapter Summary

En route to Hateno, the travelling chef befriends a horse who responds to a whistle that the travelling chef remembers from a youthful memory about a certain girl who smelled of horses.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

She walks the southern road. Though she has existed, awake, in the world beyond the Shrine of Resurrection for less than a month, already she has grown in strength, her stride longer, her time spent resting from the walk shorter.

No one will recognise her, as Lady Impa said, save for the slate that she carries on her hip. This time—mindful of the theft—she folds the envelope in half and tucks it between the slate and the inside of the pouch. The slate sticks up at an odd angle from the added tension of the paper.

Another set of directions, noted on a piece of fine parchment she inspects with her tongue poking out of the corner of her mouth, instructs her to take the eastern fork in the route back to Kasuto. Dorian's looping handwriting angles down the page, until she can see the words of the final line curve to scrawl up the margins of the paper. Creasing the paper into quarters, she leaves it on the top of her satchel.

To Kasuto.

To the communal cooking pots.

To the stables that she ignored on her first trip.

She glances east, at the long road that she can observe from her current vantage point, curling around the swamplands into a far-off pass, and whatever lies beyond.

Then she glances south, towards the grasslands sandwiched between swamp and forest, towards the grass rising nearly waist-high that sways in the leisurely wind not unlike the ripples of a calm lake, towards the small herds of horses that traverse the sea of green. Black and brown, tan and white, full-bodied and speckled, white socks and white markings on their long faces.

She steps away from the road. Her left boot sinks down into the wetland mud. She grips the hem with both hands.

Link pulls.

Her left hand ends up with the boot, and the girl ends up on her rear.

Crossing the swamp with her boots tucked under her arm, Link lets the cool mud squelch between her toes. When she reaches the drier ground of the grasslands, she cleans off her feet as best she can and ties her boots back on.
She could have simply taken the walk down the road to Kasuto and then veered off to the plains, but then she would have missed the shorter route of cutting straight through the swamp. Although, considering the amount of time it took her to tramp through the wetlands, the alternate path would have proven shorter after all.

Link fixes her gaze onto the grasslands themselves. Slabs of stone cloaked in ivy rise from the ground here and there, ruins that could pass for tilted gravestones if not for their size and whiteness. The horses graze idly at the grass, ears flicking to and fro, tails swishing over their backs. A black horse with a white mane trots apart from the rest of their herd to peruse an apple tree growing between two of the slabs, the roots cracking through the stone.

She crouches down until the waves of grass cover her. Link creeps forward on her knuckles to position herself behind the horse. She looks up at the horse, their physique far stronger and larger than they appeared at a distance, so powerful that a single well-aimed kick could well knock off Link’s entire head. Their ears tip backwards. Link stops. When the horse relaxes, Link readies to spring.

The horse's tail swishes over her nose and she sneezes.

Not a second later her head hits the ground and her lower chest throbs in a hoof-shaped ring of pain. The horse whinnies loudly. Link watches the horse rear and scrambles backwards, shuffling like a crab on her back. The horse's hooves slam into the dirt.

They paw at the ground, then launch into a trot. With a gasp Link rolls out of the way. As the horse passes her, not yet galloping, she leaps onto their back, smacking her abdomen into the curve of their spine. She swings her leg around and grabs the horse's mane, pulling back. The horse shakes their entire body. Link squeezes their sides with her thighs.

The horse rears.

Her muscle move where her conscious thoughts blank. She coos from the back of her throat, running her hands over the horse's neck, tightening the grip of her thighs just enough not to fall from their back. Her limbs strain as she fights to stay on.

Her efforts reward her with a faceful of earth.

The horse gallops off while Link pulls herself into a sitting position on the ground. She wipes the dirt off on her sleeve and bursts out laughing at herself, swinging her feet out as she presses her arms into her stomach. She checks her chest under the tunic. Nothing broken, though a welt of bruises in the form of a hoof has marked her chest as property of the black horse with the white mane. At least her head has not lopped off.

She plots her next move: the apples that the horse so covets. Link scales the tree the horse from which the horse sought fruit to pluck every apple she can reach. The final apple hangs infuriatingly far on a thin branch that wobbles beneath her weight. She drops a bomb at the base of the tree and detonates.

The impact flings her off; she lands on her back a few metres away. The fallen tree and the apple remain intact. She snags the final apple from the thin branch and tosses it into the air.

When the apple smacks back into her palm, Link shields her eyes with her left hand to scan the grasslands for the black horse. She spots the horse not too far away, rolling one of the detonated tree branches with their nose. Link squats down. She sneaks towards the horse, calm, quiet, so as not to spook the animal. Link balances the apple in the centre of her hand: a sacrificial offering.
The horse's nostrils embiggen. They swivel their ears about. One step at a time the horse approaches Link.

Link does not breathe.

The horse nudges the apple with their nose, then folds their upper lip over the shiny red fruit. They crush down the apple and snort.

Moving with excruciating steadiness, Link lifts a second apple to the horse. She watches the horse's eyes. They meet her gaze, as if the horse were studying her face. The horse accepts the second offering as well.

Link begins to coo softly at the horse to soothe them while she continues to feed them apples. When the horse bends their neck to take a fourth or a fifth—Link has long lost count—she turns up her palm to touch the horse's nose. Their ears flick forward, but the horse does not trample her.

Not yet, at least.

The supply of apples runs low. She inches her way to the horse's side. Gradually she rises up from her crouch. The horse's lips tickle the palm of her hand. Their warm, slippery tongue seeks another apple not forthcoming. When she senses the horse's hot breath over her fingers, Link seizes the moment.

She lands astride the horse. Within an instant the horse has reared again. Their hooves leave imprints in the ground so sharp that Link swallows heavily, and then the horse begins to buck. Link coos as before in their ear. This time her endurance wins out over the horse's desire to rear, and instead the horse launches into a full gallop.

The wind pushes Link's hair into her face. She lowers her head to the horse's neck, clinging to their body for dear life. Wherever the horse takes her, Link will powerlessly follow.

The horse's muscles bend and bulge beneath Link's form as they cross from grass to swamp, the transition audible in the sudden splash of water that accompanies each stride.

Link holds on.

Her arms ache. Her fingers, tangled in the horse's mane, have grown leaden. Her thighs threaten to fall off entirely.

She holds on.

She feels the horse slow beneath her, down to a canter, then a trot, then an unsteady walk, and then the horse comes to a pause. She dares not open her eyes yet. The horse shuffles their hooves and whips their head back and forth. She leans herself back at the motion.

She lifts her eyelids, blinking the wind-watered tears from the corners of her eyes.

The horse waits on a fairly dry patch of grass in the midst of the swamp. Amid the ruins sinking into the mud she can see the same statues as those she noticed at the Temple of Time, seemingly frozen in mid-crawl. The horse snorts out. They step forward, then back, then turn themselves around and around on the patch of grass.

Link allows the horse to proceed as they will. She sits up straight on the horse's back. Curling and uncurling her fingers, she massages her own hands to ease the coiled tension.
The horse has evidently forgotten of her existence, or else has gone mad.

She strokes the horse between the ears, pats them along their neck, makes soft noises to them.

The horse stops once more.

As gently as possible, Link presses down with her thighs. The horse responds by shaking their body to and fro. Another light press, and the horse moves forward, then halts at the edge of the patch of grass. Link looks around the ruins again, for tracks of predators, for signs of a storm on the horizon, for anything that might spook a horse.

She cannot make out anything of note, neither with her eyes nor with the telescope.

Link squeezes again. The horse neighs plaintively. A fourth squeeze proves the charm: the horse walks forward.

A sudden sharp noise pierces the calm. And then another. And another. And another. And another.

Six or seven crimson dots speckle Link and the horse alike. Six or seven single glimmering eyes—a flash of violent violet that gives way to the same blue as on the plateau—brighten immeasurably. Six or seven bursts of light and sound rid Link of all of her senses save for the feeling of the horse beneath her moving with the wind.

She wraps her hands in the horse's mane. The pounding of the horse's limbs push away Link's legs. Sensing herself tip left, she twists her body to regain her position. The statues loose their arrows of holy fire—or whatever they radiate from their singular eyes with the brightness of the sun—in great arcs that burn up the grass and smoke towards the sky. The statues' lines of fire blaze towards them, catching up to the horse's galloping. Link pulls the horse's mane left. After a moment the horse responds to her. The bolts of fire miss to the right. She tugs the mane to the right; the horse changes direction again. Racing in zig-zags, they outrun the statues until Link hears nothing but her own breaths, the splish of hoof in water, and the croaking of wetland frogs.

The horse does not halt, yet their speed no longer has the potential to toss Link off like a bag of meat. She relaxes her grip. The horse continues their canter across the field. A lone tree sprouts at the top of a small hill.

The horse pauses by the tree. Link strokes their neck. Unlike before, the horse neither bucks nor rears.

She slides off. Her boots contact soil. Her legs shiver up to her hips.

Her knees buckle.

Link lets herself fall to the ground. She lies down with her right cheek in the dirt, glancing at the horse through blades of grass with her left eye. The horse steps towards her body. They nudge her in the side with their nose.

She lifts her right hand, palm out. The horse sniffs her fingers. Their upper lip protrudes as they taste Link in some sort of test. The horse licks her between the fingers.

A ladybird lands on the bridge of her nose. She crosses her eyes as the speckled insect explores the tip of her nose and then crawls onto her cheek. She puffs air gently in its direction. The ladybird flutters off.

Link grins.
The horse steps away from Link and lowers their head into the sea of green. Link pinches a blade of grass between her thumb and forefinger.

She holds the grass up to the sky. The strip of green curves over her vision. In that moment the grass dwarfs even the sun.

Something so tiny, yet so vastly vital, from the angle at which she looks.

The wind whispers over the grass and over her face alike. It lifts the hem of her tunic and the sidelocks of her hair. She splays her fingers, still wet from the horse's mouth. The skin facing the wind cools with a sensation of such simple pleasure that she cannot help but laugh at the giddiness of life.

Since she awakened in what she now calls the Shrine of Resurrection, she has spent such time merely lying in the grass, marvelling at the act of being alive.

Whatever she used to be and whatever she chooses to be now, she can always stretch out on the green, can always listen to the song of the breeze over the hills, can always live in awe of her own living.

Her belly rumbles. She rests her hand on her stomach, patting herself. Food. Right, food, which she hasn't had any of since she fed all of those apples to the horse.

Food, the other simple pleasure that brings bliss and meaning to her existence.

With the increasingly dulled blade from the Great Plateau, Link cuts down the tree. Within a circle of stones that she lays out for a pit, she starts a fire. "Stay here," she says to the horse, who grazes contently by the campfire. She looks around for any sign of the river that runs near Kasuto.

When she makes out the woods in the distance, at least a day's ride away, she nods to herself and puts the pot back down. She opens her satchel instead: apples from Kakariko, slightly smooshed; endura and swift carrots crushed and partially juiced against the sides of the satchel, given to her by Koko as thanks for helping with dinner; a few odds and ends of Hyrule herbs and blue nightshade picked in the woods behind the village. And the pumpkin that Cottla pushed into her hands.

She allows herself to fall down onto her rear by the fire with the pumpkin in her lap. Link carves off the cap of the pumpkin. She flicks the cap off with the edge of the knife. Picking it off from the ground, she gives the inside a lick.

Pumpkin-y.

She quarters the apple and carrots, then slices the pieces, then dices them further. Into the pumpkin they go. She repeats the procedure for the herbs, cutting them from one end to the other into thin rings of vaguely similar thickness. Some end up about four times as thick as others, but variety's the greatest spice in life. Or so she tells herself.

After quitting her gloves, she wipes off her sweat-caked hands as best she can. She empties half of her water-skin in her efforts to scrub her skin.

She smiles at her own fingers, as clean as she can get them without a trip to the river.

Link mixes the insides of the pumpkin with her bare hands. She scrapes the pumpkin goop from the inner rind, the seeds pressing into her palms. She wriggles her fingers and squishes the goo between them.
Half-giggling as she works, Link thoroughly blends the vegetables and fruits within until she can no longer find pockets of just one ingredient. Satisfied, she pulls out her hands. She cleans her fingers off with her own mouth. The fusion of bits of herb, apple, carrot, flower, and of course pumpkin makes for a guessing game of what flavour will she taste next.

She scoots herself to the stump of the tree that she has converted to firewood. Carefully she cuts away a rectangular if uneven plank of wood roughly twice the dimensions of her open palm. She thins it down with the knife. Link empties the contents of the stuffed pumpkin onto the stump, leaving the mostly vacant rind, and sets the rind onto the fire upside-down. While the pumpkin cooks, Link spreads the mixture of chopped fruits and vegetables onto the thin plank. She holds the plank out over the fire, not close enough for the flames to catch onto the wood, but enough that the goop becomes tender. She cooks about half of the stuffing to softness and leaves the other half just undercooked enough to provide a bite. As she sits about and patiently waits, she leans forward into the fire to smell the baking pumpkin. The scent alone could feed her for a month. Her stomach yawns in its emptiness like a dog begging for a treat.

Link removes the pumpkin rind from the fire. She checks the inner edge with the back of her hand: warm, heated.

She stuffs the pumpkin full again with the raw ingredients and mixes the two sets of stuffing: half baked and half uncooked. A sudden weight at the crown of her head startles her into nearly letting go of the pumpkin. She looks up to find the horse, which has now wandered over to her again, browsing through her hair.

Link returns her gaze to the pumpkin she has cared for so meticulously. Sitting for so long that she has lost some of the feeling in her rear, and she shifts around to sit straighter. She inhales the smoky, tender scent of the stuffed pumpkin. Scooping out a handful of the mix into her mouth, she swallows the sweetness that moistens her throat on the way down.

The scent of the pumpkin. A scent she has come across before.

She remembers: the yellowish-brown-haired girl who smelled of horses, cross-legged on the ground beside her. Leaning on the wall of the stable, though she cannot recall the colour of the wood. A pumpkin between them, nearly stuffed to the brim with chopped fruits and vegetables. Celery and carrot, apple and lettuce, yam and pumpkin, leftover watermelon rind and even a banana that Link had brought with her from her travels to town. Link and the girl who smelled of horses sat there—in the dusky evening—dicing treats for the horses.

The girl who smelled of horses paused to flex her knife-wielding right hand and scoop up the yam she had prepared. "Thanks for helping."

Link wiped stuck bits of lettuce from the knife into the pumpkin gourd. She shook her head. The least that she could do, for the girl who smelled of horses, who took care so fondly of Link's horse.

Link's horse.

Link's horse.

She had a horse.

"You're one of the kindest girls I've met. I'm sure—" She cannot remember the word that followed. "—will love it. Can you call her over?" The girl who smelled of horses glanced at her own palms. "My hands are all sticky."
Link lifted her hands to her mouth. She wets her fingers and curled them into a instrument. She whistled. A dark mass cantered towards them, with features that blur and melt to the edges of her recollection.

The girl who smelled of horses laughed. She leaped to her feet to greet the horse.

Her horse. Link's horse.

The name of the horse. The name of the horse. She strains to sift her fingers through the fog of memory. She inhales the scent of the warm stuffed pumpkin gourd.

A jumble of words float to the surface of her mind. She seizes one.

Ilia.

Emulating the gesture over her mouth from the memory, Link whistles, loud and low. Abruptly the horse gallops barrelling after her. She sprints out of the horse's path, tumbling down into a roll. The cooking pot, at least, did not bear the brunt of the horse's fury. The horse comes to a stop not half a metre away and twists their head to gaze at Link with gentle eyes.

She backs up some twenty paces away from the campsite and whistles again.

The horse launches themself at Link. This time Link holds her ground, and the horse rides by her right side to another half-metre distance before halting.

She ogles the horse, already trained by someone else to come at the command of a whistle.

Unless the twisted threads of fate have somehow brought her to her own horse, she has found herself someone else's horse, turned out to the wild. A horse taught to respond to the same whistle.

The ranch, the girl who smelled of horses, the place where she sat in the dusky evening to dice leaves of lettuce could lie somewhere nearby. Somewhere near the swamp, near the plain, near Kasuto, or somewhere close enough that a traveller could have ridden their horse here and then left them.

Link rests her palm on the horse's nose. "Ilia." The gesture ends on a curve in front of her chest not unlike a horseshoe. The horse's name.

If one day she remembers of the girl who smelled of horses, if one they come face to face, maybe by then she will catch another name from the fog of her memories; maybe the whistle will send the name running into her arms.

"Ilia," she says, solemnly facing her horse, "will you accompany me to Hateno?"

Ilia swishes her tail. She huffs warm air into Link's face, then pushes her nose further into Link's hand. Her ears slope downwards. Ilia whinnies.

Link leads her horse to the campfire. With some difficulty she half-cuts, half-breaks the pumpkin into two halves. She sets the smaller piece in her lap and the larger at Ilia's hooves.

Ilia sniffs the warm innards of the pumpkin. She licks experimentally and then munches. Snorting out a laugh to herself, Link pats Ilia's neck soothingly as the horse eats. She scoops the insides of her own half of the stuffed pumpkin into her mouth. The symphony of sweetness and tartness, the tender warmed fruit combined with the crunch of vegetables not fully steamed, brings her to lick the goo from her palm and fingers.
When Ilia finishes, she browses the inside of Link's pumpkin rind, then turns her attentions to Link's hands, which she inspects to cleanliness. Link cannot help but shake her shoulders in silent laughter the proceedings.

"Am I a cleany-clean enough girl for you now, Ilia?"

The horse grazes in Link's hair in response.

The following morning, together, they set off east. A horse and her girl.

—

Fried Wild Greens (three hearts) - apple, fortified pumpkin, swift carrot

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Speaking of infallibility of memory, I just noticed that I've been erroneously reporting my comments for previous chapters as written in April instead of in August. I have since fixed them. All of these comments are being written immediately prior to uploading each chapter.

The sixth chapter introduces Link's horse, whom I chose to name Ilia; Epona is the name of the horse that Link rode prior to the Great Calamity. Ilia is the name of the horse that Link rides now, based on my own horse in Breath of the Wild. The name "Ilia" comes from the girl associated with horses from Twilight Princess; the reader is not expected to be familiar or have played Twilight Princess to appreciate the "girl who smelled of horses," especially as I have changed her significantly from her original appearance. See my note for the second chapter for more information on characters lifted out of other games.

I wished to introduce for Link a "childhood friend" character without resorting to OCs—not that there's anything wrong with OCs, mind, but I prefer to use canon characters for such important roles when possible—and Ilia from Twilight Princess was the most appropriate candidate I could think of.

Horses do indeed like stuffed pumpkin, and I believe that all of the ingredients I listed are safe for horse consumption. If you do know a horse, please be sure to check before relying on anything I write!

Interesting that Link somehow met a horse who knows the same whistle as Epona recognised prior to the Great Calamity.

I really enjoyed the horse affection feature from Breath of the Wild. Slowly having to "teach" a horse and watching the horse learn to trust you more and more warmed my heart. Here's out to you, Ilia, for guiding me throughout Breath of the Wild and taking me along many a scenic road.

"A horse and her girl," of course, reflects Link's conception of her relationship to Ilia and to Epona. While Ilia is "Link's horse," in the sense that the girl who smelled of horses would be "Link's friend," Link does not see herself as her horse's master, but as her friend and companion.

midna's ass. 31 August 2017.

Beta reader's comments: We meet Ilia in this chapter! Ilia is one of my very favourite characters in this series. She's adorable and I love her.

The pumpkin is important. Its use here is a detail I love.

Emma. 31 August 2017.
Energising Glazed Mushrooms

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef meets a local historian who tells the chef about a famous hero of a century ago who defended Fort Hateno from guardians; a local archaeologist who inevitably clues the chef in on a nearby shrine; and the curious researchers of the ancient technology laboratory in Hateno. The head researcher not only helps to repair the apparently corrupted the slate to allow the chef to produce incredibly accurate illustrations known as pictographs, but also directs the chef to the town shrine.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Maybe Ilia warms up to her, or perhaps Link better understands the horse, or some combination of the two. Whatever the reason, Link finds that she merely needs to gently squeeze her thighs for the horse to set off at a trot. Travellers on the road fall over themselves to sell her everything she might need for her horse, from hay to sugar cubes to horseshoes to saddle to brindles to charms of the Goddesses to strange mechanical contraptions that Link does not recognise but which a man on a blue horse assures her would be absolutely necessary for the continued well-being of her horse.

Contraptions aside, Link does consider horseshoes and a saddle, to protect her horse. Yet she does not have the rupees. She scratches her head at these mysterious rupees, evidently exchangeable for goods and services, as Ilia canters forward.

She passes through mossy ruins of stone cracked and crumbled. "The remains of Fort Hateno," a local historian of sorts jabbers excitedly, the pale skin of his pointed ears reddened with sunburn. Over a vegetable stew medley of whatever both of them can bring to the cooking pot, he regales her with the tale of a great hero from a century ago who defended the fort on his own from the menace of the guardians.

"In the end, he was overwhelmed, his body spirited away by a beautiful Sage of Hylia, her hair gold as the radiant sun and her eyes blue as the heavens above," the man observes, pouring himself a generous second sampling of their joint soup, "but the records show that he slayed hundreds of those things himself." He tears up; his voice cracks. "His sacrifice gave everyone enough time to evacuate. W...what a hero. If I could just be a smidgen like him, why, I could do anything..."

Link drinks her fourth or fifth helping of stew. "Is that what those statues out there are?"

"The guardians?" The man nods. "Most of 'em have broken after so many years. It's said that the guardians were the army of the Calamitous One—" Link ogles him. "—but it's also said that the monsters are the army of the Calamitous One. Why, maybe it's a little of column one and a pinch of column two, eh? Dunno why they're called guardians. My research hasn't turned up much."

Link nods slowly.

"Why, it's funny, really. You see, I was sure that a full century would have been enough for all of them to shut off." He pulls on his own nose. "But I've seen a couple working ones this past month."
I'm still investigating whether they have somehow repaired themselves over the century, or if some of them have been working all this time. Or those monsters are repairing them. Ooh, I hadn't thought of that possibility before." He crosses his arms over his chest. "And I'll need to investigate how the Hero of Fort Hateno could have taken them down. If they're coming back alive, then the world will need a new hero, won't it?"

Link checks that her satchel neatly covers the slate on her hip.

When she takes her leave, he shakes her hand so vigorously that her shoulder aches. "Thanks for stopping by. Come on back whenever you want."

She passes through the woods on the other side of Fort Hateno. The horizon has darkened with a brewing storm that hastens her towards Hateno: as the spring warms up, the frequency of summer thunder grows. Yet the buzz of a nearby beehive prompts her to leave Ilia by a tree, with her satchel, Dorian's instructions, and Lady Impa's letter safe on the horse's back. She plans her escape route: a pond in the heart of the forest. Plucking a long stick from the ground, she snaps off its twigs for a makeshift spear. Link locates the hive nestled in the boughs of a formidable tree. She practises throwing once, twice, thrice and then hurls the stick like a javelin.

The second the pointed end connects to the hive, Link turns to make her escape. The loud buzzing behind her pushes her legs faster in her efforts to reach the pond. She half-dives, half-rolls in to the water. Flattening herself against the sandy bottom, she tries to focus on the bees swarming over the surface of the pond.

Her lungs burn. Her body propels itself up for a breath. She inhales rapidly and plunges back into the water before the swarm can descend.

Eventually the bees give up. Link breaches the surface of the pond. She pants to catch her breath. The drenched fabric of her clothing sticks to her as a second skin. She checks the slate, which flashes at her and displays its symbols without indication of a lick of damage.

When Link returns, whistling, to the beehive tree, she finds a mob of animals fighting over the honeycomb. She wheezes in laughter at herself.

Next time she will snag the honeycomb before she runs for the water.

She takes the opportunity to browse the woods for mushrooms, herbs, fruits. Walking around the trees with Ilia—after shoving Lady Impa's letter back into the slate pouch—she pats her full satchel.

The storm breaks out when she has hiked halfway up the hill. A light shower transforms into a heavy downpour in the span of thirty paces. Link pulls her hood up over her head. Ilia shies to a trot. Link leans forward to listen: so long as the hoofbeats clip with the road and not the muddied grass on the sides, Link and Ilia continue towards Hateno.

A far-off thunderbolt spooks Ilia into a gallop. Link tugs back on her mane, cooing into her ear, until Ilia calms down enough that Link can hear the splash of mud beneath her hooves.

Mud, not well-worn path.

Leading Ilia cautiously back and forth, Link attempts to find the road again. The curtain of rain keeps her reliant on her ears and on the distinctive contortions of Ilia's muscles over damp terrain against which the horse struggles to lift her sucked-in hooves.

Lightning rends the sky. Ilia freezes rather than spooks. In the brief glimpse of light, Link spots the dark strip of road off to her right, with a solitary figure standing in the middle of the path. The afterglow blinds her. She leads Ilia towards the right.

The squelch of muddied hooves gives way to the hard clops upon the beaten path, and Link releases her breath. She squints into the unceasing torrent. Ilia walks forward through the rain. Despite the curtain of rain, the crackle of electricity in the air lifts the hair on Link's arms and the back of her neck.

Link reaches for the blade that she has kept with her since she left the Great Plateau. She hurls it towards the clouds, as far as she can throw it.

At the highest point of the sword's arc—prior to the blade even hitting the ground—lightning strikes it in a blaze of light and thunder that sends Ilia rearing.

"He-e-e-e-elp!" someone screams. The figure, now close enough that Link can make out their human shape, thrashes their arms upwards. Steadily she pushes Ilia forward. Lowering her arm towards the road, Link feels around the air from around the height of Ilia's shoulder with her hand until her palm makes contact with something solid, who shrieks. If not for the rain, Link could reassure the screaming figure or could at least sign her words—character by character if need be—into the person's hand, yet whoever-it-is continues to yelp out loud until Link simply lifts them bodily onto Ilia.

"Are you kidnapping me!" the whoever-it-is shrieks directly into Link's ear. Without acknowledging their shrill cries, Link turns Ilia about to trek back to Fort Hateno.

The rain lightens up before she can make it to the fort. The dissipating clouds and emerging sun reveal her unruly passenger as a pallid and balding man with dark grey hair, pointed ears, and the bushiest eyebrows that Link has yet seen.

"Well, well, well," the man says, once Link has named herself as a traveller and temporarily a courier of sorts, and once Link has established that she has no intention of selling the man for his body parts, "you have made the acquaintance of the esteemed Doctor Calip." He points to himself: an archaeologist, local historian, and expert on the nearby ruins.

Link inquires if he's met the other local historian, the aficionado of Fort Hateno, and Calip scoffs at the mere implication that Fort Hateno has any meaningful history.

"No, no, my boy," Calip corrects her with the air of someone who refers to anyone in his vicinity as my boy regardless of sex or age, "I am wounded that you would put the field of archaeology anywhere near the woefully insular local historians. While they consider the span of a few years, we archaeologists consider the world on the scale of aeons. And I am Necluda's leading expert in the ancient religions! Before the faithless of our era abandoned the old ways—a cause of the Great Calamity, I tell you—our people lived directly in the skyward paradise of the Goddesses, communing with them on a daily basis." He goes on and on. Ilia flicks her ears. Link retrieves a mushroom from her satchel to bide the time. "...indeed, I know of one such site of communion myself. When I finally complete my research, then you will find me at Inpaz where I belong."

Link asks where she can drop him off, "Doctor Calip?"

Calip cleans his spectacles repeatedly, though the lenses appear to become dirtier with every wipe of the rag. "Oh yes, Doctor Calip...I quite like the sound of that..." He nods to himself. "Well, now, now, allow me to extend a gift for saving me from that dreadful storm. I will let you see this very site of communion!"
Link tries to ask again where she can drop him off. Calip gives her directions that send her wheeling in circles around the area.

"Ah, to the left. No, no, the other left. Or was it that left after all? No, my boy, just over there, past that tree. Oh no, by Nayru, it wasn't that tree, but this other..."

At long last they arrive at the site of communion. Link glances around a rocky clearing flanked and protected by cliffs that slope inwards to a natural bowl of the earth. Here a sea of small weathered statues rise from the ground: a third of them winged women with pointed ears; a third with flower blossoms in their right hands and teardrops carved under their left eyes; and a third with stars upon their chests and with six-stringed harps resting in their upwards-turned palms. Most have broken. Arms and heads lie partially buried in the ground. Time has swallowed some of the statues whole. Slightly in front of the semicircle of attending statues sits another with a drawn brow, its circular head and scowl setting it apart from the repeated motif of three.

Calip draws a bound volume from his coat. He clears his throat. "You will notice that this statue in front, albeit made of a similar material, was crafted after all of the others." Link has difficulty noting anything other than the earthy taste of the green mushshroom in her hand. Calip begins to pace about the clearing. As he talks of distinctive archaeological techniques that he has pioneered in the study of these statues, Link returns to Ilia, saddling her up. "No, no, my boy, archaeology is not merely the study of the stone, but the study of the mind, as well. Allow me to translate from Old Hyrulean." He stops. "That is to say, Loftean. Of course, this book is so old, that I must translate it from Loftean." Another pause. Link can feel him staring at her as if expecting a reaction, but the word Hyrulean means little to her, much less Old Hyrulean and much much less Loftean. "The inscription says, 'When a dark light resides in the cursed statue's eyes, pierce its gaze to purge the seal from the shrine.' Well, well, well, such a poetic translation, no?" Calip continues on to describe his heroic feats of translation; Link's gaze fixes upon the scowling statue.

Shrine.

Link drops her hands from Ilia. While Calip speaks of how the religious ceremonies must have gone, if these statues of the Goddesses now known as Sageru, Sheik, and Hylia could have represented early versions of the Golden Goddesses—or if the Golden Goddesses and the Patron Goddesses of humanity were once one and the same—she crouches down beside the scowling statue. The spiral patterns along its sides resemble those of the shrines, the spires, and the slate. Link turns the words over in her mind: dark light.

Dark light.

"...and say, you'll take me back now to my home, won't you? After all that I've done for you? Shown you the site of communion and all that?"

Link looks at Calip over her shoulder. Night has encroached as she stood wondering at the statue and at the promise of a shrine.

"You simply must pay me back for how I've lavished you with secret knowledge," Calip pleads.

Link allows him onto Ilia's back. After another all-too-long period of running about in circles, Calip shows Link the way to his cabin. He dismisses her at the door without offering her a place to stay or even a meal.

She narrows her eyes: a meal, a meal.
Bidding Ilia to stay put near Calip's cabin, she sets out into the wood under the darkness of night, with only the pale crescent moon curving into the sky like a lynel horn.

A lynel. The word plinks into her memory without an image.

She listens; she sniffs; she looks. Before long, she comes upon another beehive, this one quiet with the blanket of night. She circles the tree in search of the pond. Thirty paces, she estimates.

Link inhales sharply. She pulls the slate from its pouch at her right hip to take careful aim, lining the golden cursor just so with the beehive.

The hive locks in place.

She leaps up towards the hive and just manages to snag the bottom curve with her fingers. As gravity propels her downwards, the hive rips from the branch of the tree. She starts to pelt towards the pond. The slate beeps to warn her of time running out. The beeping intensifies. Link kicks her right foot into a rock. She tilts forward. The hive leaves her grip. She senses more than watches the beehive curve through the air and land in the water with a thunderous splash as she herself drops into the grass.

The slate beeps a final time and makes a tone like the breaking of chains.

Link crawls forward to the edge of the pond. She sticks the hive underwater to drown the bees within. Digging up the pebble on which she tripped from the ground, she dashes the rock into the beehive until it cracks open. Dead bees float out from the inside. She takes off her outer tunic, leaving on her undershirt, and uses the tunic as a net in which to keep the honeycomb. Link breaks the hive into the tiniest chunks that she can. She shakes each chunk to rid it of bees. Then she lifts up the tunic to drain the water.

Link considers her handiwork. Surely she must have a better way to harvest honey than destroying an entire productive hive. She scarcely knows what to cook with so much honey.

For now she takes the washed honeycomb and carries it back to where Ilia waits.

Her legs aching in fatigue, Link finds a leafy tree under which to make a campfire. Ilia browses the grass while Link sets to work on the handful of mushrooms she collected earlier, not the lovely red mushrooms plentiful on the Great Plateau, but small green affairs that thrives between Kakariko and Hateno. She removes the honey from the comb as best she can. Too much honey, far too much. A pot of liquid gold. She adds the last of the rock salt from Kasuto and stirs, then dips in the mushrooms. Skewering the mushrooms on the tip of her knife, she holds them out over the fire until the honey warms to a thick glaze.

Link bites down. The honey spreads sweetness through her mouth. Her eyelids lower of their own accord as the scent of the honeyed warmth overtakes her.

She has eaten glazed green mushrooms before.

A medley seated around a campfire. The girl with the golden hair, the golden and violet charms at her throat. The dark-skinned girl with a red ponytail tied back in a green hairband and golden earrings. A great blue falcon. A scarlet girl with a shark on her head—or was the shark her head? An orange mountain of a rock-like man. And the woman in black with the single strand of long hair and the teardrop tattoo under her eye, leaning against the tree. Several horses grazing at the periphery: one brown—Link's horse; one white and standing out against the night; one light blue with a saddle that sported patterns similar to those on Link's armbands. Beyond the dark edges of the campfire, Link could see a small sea of tents. She remembers: the rock-like being clapping Link on the back for her ingenious efforts in smoking out enough hives to gather golden honeycomb. The blue falcon scoffing.

The girl with the golden hair ignoring the rabbit glazed with honey that Link was preparing. She paced about the perimeter of the campfire. "I just know it. The poem speaks of the time when the light and darkness meet, and I believe the phrase they use has connotations of twilight. The piercing might refer to reflecting the light, or...piercing by a blade or an arrow. If we can simply wait here until dawn, or maybe tomorrow's dusk—"

The woman in black narrowed her eyes. "We have been given very specific instructions. We have no time for loitering. We are to see the spring and return immediately to continue your prayers."

"Your father did give us a stern talking-to," said the girl with the green hairband as she helped herself to a honeyed leg of rabbit, "as much as I'd pay to see your smile—" The girl with the golden hair's cheeks faintly reddened. "—when you finally figure things out."

"She speaks the truth," the shark girl chimed in. "We don't know how much more time we have.
The sooner we reach the spring, the better."

The girl with the golden hair turned on the party, her hands clenched into fists, her shoulders squared, her jaw set, her mouth so thin that Link could see blood beading on her lower lip.
"But this could be our chance to make a breakthrough! We still don't know how the guardians and the Divine Beasts work! We still don't know to turn them on! I know that the shrines haven't responded, but perhaps there's a shrine that activates the others, or perhaps all of the shrines have some sort of triggering mechanism to their activation. Perhaps it has something to do with the towers. This is the closest we have to finding such a trigger, and the shrine described in the text—"

The woman in black narrowed her eyes. "We have been given very specific instructions. We have no time for loitering. We are to see the spring and return immediately to continue your prayers."

"Your father did give us a stern talking-to," said the girl with the green hairband as she helped herself to a honeyed leg of rabbit, "as much as I'd pay to see your smile—" The girl with the golden hair's cheeks faintly reddened. "—when you finally figure things out."

"She speaks the truth," the shark girl chimed in. "We don't know how much more time we have.
The sooner we reach the spring, the better."

The girl with the golden hair turned on the party, her hands clenched into fists, her shoulders squared, her jaw set, her mouth so thin that Link could see blood beading on her lower lip.
"But this could be our chance to make a breakthrough! We still don't know how the guardians and the Divine Beasts work! We still don't know to turn them on! I know that the shrines haven't responded, but perhaps there's a shrine that activates the others, or perhaps all of the shrines have some sort of triggering mechanism to their activation. Perhaps it has something to do with the towers. This is the closest we have to finding such a trigger, and the shrine described in the text—"

The woman in black narrowed her eyes. "We have been given very specific instructions. We have no time for loitering. We are to see the spring and return immediately to continue your prayers."

"Your father did give us a stern talking-to," said the girl with the green hairband as she helped herself to a honeyed leg of rabbit, "as much as I'd pay to see your smile—" The girl with the golden hair's cheeks faintly reddened. "—when you finally figure things out."

"She speaks the truth," the shark girl chimed in. "We don't know how much more time we have.
The sooner we reach the spring, the better."

The girl with the golden hair turned on the party, her hands clenched into fists, her shoulders squared, her jaw set, her mouth so thin that Link could see blood beading on her lower lip.
"But this could be our chance to make a breakthrough! We still don't know how the guardians and the Divine Beasts work! We still don't know to turn them on! I know that the shrines haven't responded, but perhaps there's a shrine that activates the others, or perhaps all of the shrines have some sort of triggering mechanism to their activation. Perhaps it has something to do with the towers. This is the closest we have to finding such a trigger, and the shrine described in the text—"

The rock being grunted. "Come on. It's our first foray out as a team. There's no need to—"
The falcon barrelled forward, pointing to each of the people around the fire in turn. First, the rock being: "He could level a mountain." Next, the shark girl: "She could leap a hundred waterfalls and arrive in time to heal an army." Third, the red-haired girl with the golden earrings: "And she could level that army again in half the time. And your shadow over there could have that army's general murdered before he could realise what's happened to his army and the mountain it was standing on. But who's the chosen hero?"

The girl with the green hairband clapped her hands onto her knees. She twirled the rabbit leg. "Better silent than spouting nonsense."

"Shut up! I'm serious. Who's the chosen hero here?" The falcon lifted his right wing, his feather-like fingers curling inwards until his index feather points directly at—

She can't remember.

"Fate's unfair," the falcon repeats, crossing his wings. "The sooner you get with the program, the easier it'll be on everyone."

The girl with the golden hair's expression twisted, a grimace contorting her mouth and wrinkling the edges of her eyes and nose. She whirls around, nearly trips, and storms off into the trees. The others rise partially from their seats around the campfire, Link quickest of all, her hand already on the hilt of her blade.

But the woman in black takes off first, shadowing the girl with the golden hair.

"Nice going, fish-for-brains," the girl with the green hairband snaps, and the falcon returns a rude gesture.

The shark girl has covered her face with her eyes. The orange rock being shakes his head. "It will be a long, long trip."

The taste of honey fades from her mouth. When her stock of mushrooms runs out, she licks the honey out of her palm to fill her stomach. She cannot so much honey carry in her satchel, and so she gorges herself now.

Her belly warns her of fullness at the halfway mark. She continues to eat through the burgeoning pain. By the time she has emptied the pot, her stomach aches enough that she curls up on the ground, her satchel a makeshift pillow, tucking her knees under her chin. Yet her body has other plans: her exhaustion has fled; her heart races so quickly that she can scarcely sleep.

The sheer quantity of honey consumed leaves her ill but not tired even in the morning. To avoid Calip, she spends most of the day restocking her satchel from the forest. Towards evening, the pain ebbs.

She hops onto Ilia's back. Up the road. When they pass by the entrance to the clearing with the cursed statue, Link checks the position of the sun in the sky.

Twilight soon.

She directs Ilia towards the sea of statues. Dropping down from the horse's back, Link examines the statue from every side.

She waits to dusk, and waits, and waits, and just when she gives in, she notices a violet glow upon the statue's brow.
Pierce. By blade or arrow.

Link notches her bow. She looses the wooden arrow.

The ground rumbles. From the depths of the earth, upon a grinding mechanical lift, rises a shrine that gleams orange. Ilia neighs. Link runs a hand over the horse's shoulder to soothe her.

She signs a thank you to the girl with the golden hair from her memory.

Link descends into the shrine.

When she returns to the waking world, the moon greets her. She does not bother with a campfire but simply sleeps against the side of the shrine.

With dawn Link and Ilia resume their journey to Hateno.

They reach the village by midmorning.

The guard at Hateno—calling himself more of a greeter than a guard—lets Link through without much hurrah. The residents here speak the same Necludan as did those in Kakariko, though they tilt their vowels in a differing dialect. The village sprawls over the mountainside. From the base of the village, she craness her neck towards the fields of rice and other crops terraced up the mountain. From the peak protrudes a short white tower—a windmill, she decides. Shops of every sort line the main street, from a smithy, a fabric dyer, a tailor, a shoemaker, a butcher, a grocer, a candlemaker, a jeweller, to a stable offering a special on horse training courses. She enters something advertising itself as a trading post. Within, shoppers examine shelves of rarities: gems shimmering in every colour, pickled monster appendages, ancient books, exotic wares from faraway regions. A brown rock-like being nearly steps on her foot on her way to the counter. The being rumbles out an apology: "Whoa there, bud. Almost didn't see a li'l hylian like yourself."

The red-eyed man at the counter looks her up and down.

"You not from around here? Most 'venturers in these parts get their rupees off of looting old treasures or from selling monster parts. That said, I think most places've been stripped clean by now. The number of 'venturers's dropped like a rock since I took over."

Link thanks him for the information. She exits the trading post and sets about the task of inquiring as to the whereabouts of the intended recipient of Lady Impa's letter, someone named Purah, as written on the red envelope. Villagers glance at one another, shake their heads, tell her that there's no one in Hateno with that name. At length, a red-haired woman, introducing herself as Kyrta and studying the outside of the envelope, snaps her fingers. "You could try the laboratory on the summit." She thumbs towards the mountain. "Whoever lives there likes to be secretive, but I've seen this eye-like mark—isn't that the symbol of Sheik?—on their front door." The woman presses her lips together as she looks Link up and down. "You should be careful with that horse of yours."

Link tilts her head to one side.

Kyrta rolls out an easy laugh. "Folks would prefer manure in the fields, not the streets." Blushing at the implication, Link directs Ilia up the mountain road. Kyrta calls out after her: "If you don't know where else to stable your horse, I could help you out."

Link waves back, nearly bumps into a merchant with a cart of cabbages, and resolves to pay attention. As she nears the peak she looks again at the white windmill. Though the tower does have the spinning blades of a windmill, she notes the torches at the front burning with blue fire, and the eye-like symbol of Sheik on the door.
Link raps twice in the centre of the symbol. A sliding click reveals a panel of glass within the red iris of the symbol of Sheik, and a large yellow eye with a slit pupil peers at her.

She waves a hand. The eye does not blink. She produces the red envelope and lifts it up. The slide clicks again, and Link regards the letter in her hand akin to a foreign appendage.

The door opens. Link raises her head to meet the yellow gaze of what looks like a giant green stingray on a human body some two and a half metres high. The stingray wears circular red glasses that give them an owlish appearance. Their white and red robes resemble those of the sheikah in Kakariko. Somewhere in her inner gut churns a flash of recognition.

"Welcome to the Hateno Ancient Technology Research Laboratory," the fish creature rasps out. A strange reddish membrane wipes horizontally over their eyes. "You can call me Doreli. May I help you?"

"I have this letter to Purah." Link holds the envelope towards Doreli, who takes it between her webbed fingers to inspect it.

"Wait here."

Leaning against the now-shut door, Link waits. She yawns. She wipes the sweat from her brow. She finds half of a carrot in the bottom of her satchel and feeds it to Ilia.

By the time the door opens with Link still leaning on the frame, her legs have fallen asleep. Link tumbles backwards, banging the back of her head on a hard floor. She looks up to meet the crimson gaze of a woman who appears somehow older than even Lady Impa. The woman wears a long white robe, her spectacles thick enough that Link can see rainbows dancing in the lenses.

Or perhaps she's hit her head a bit too hard.

"You are Link."

Link nods. The light from the torches forms a blue halo around the woman's head.

"Hello there," the woman says, now in Central Hyrulean, evidently unfazed by Link lying on the ground. She scribbles something down in the notebook she carries and flips the page. "Thank you for delivering my sister's letter." Link listens to her mutter under her breath in Necludan as she writes: "Subject...appears to...lack knowledge of...properly entering door. Possible...social memory loss?" She raises her voice. "Symin, put the tea on, would you?"

"On it, ma'am," comes a voice from the other end of the room. The woman—Purah, Lady Impa's older sister—tours Link around the inside of the facility. Mechanical marvels glow with the same blue light as the slate. Purah dodges any questions that relate to the contents of the letter. Occasionally Purah pauses to jot something in her notebook.

"Do you...know who I am?" Link asks at last.

Purah chuckles at her. "My sister trusts you and has pleaded that I assist you. I need know nothing else."

She introduces Link to her two assistants. Doreli, a zora engineer from the apparently-destroyed village of Rutela, and Symin, a sheikah mechanic from Kakariko. She has a third assistant, a rito from Hoskit, currently on surveying duty of the guardians. "They've been on the move lately," Purah says vaguely. "Now, Link, hand it over."
Purah sighs. "Subject...fails to...grasp implications...of speech." It takes Link a moment to realise that Purah has switched, abruptly, to Central Hyrulean. "The slate, Link. Let me see the slate on your hip there."

She complies. Symin takes Link's attention while Purah works. He strikes up conversation over tea. "You're going up to Darunia next, eh?" Link nods and Symin launches into a thorough test of her knowledge of the Eldic tongue. Again she knows the language, from some deep recess of her memories, though Symin corrects her outdated slang.

Eventually Purah retrieves the slate for Link. "I believe that I may have fixed some of the corrupted elements. Go down to the shrine in Hateno. You'll find it behind the general store. What's called, Symin?"

"East Wind," he remarks.

"East Wind," Purah repeats, wrinkling her nose. "Just ask for Pruce or Ivey's place and go 'round the back."

Symin adds in: "If it helps, the shrine is near some dread 'model houses' or something like that."

Link inspects the slate. She arches her eyebrows at a newly appeared green symbol; now all six—red, two blue, yellow, light blue, and green—run fully from left to right.

"Subject...refuses to follow orders...until intellectual demands are met..." Purah mutters in Necludan as if not expecting Link to understand. "The slate is capable of making incredibly accurate drawings of whatever you point it towards. We refer to this as the pictobox function, and the resulting illustrations as pictographs. I am quite certain it will be an immeasurable asset, particularly as far as your memories go." Link starts to ask what she means, but Purah grips her by the wrists. "Now off you go. To the shrine. Chop chop, Link."

Link rubs the back of her head. "Thank you for...all of this?" She hesitates. "Do you have anything for me to take back to Lady Impa?"

"Hm? Oh." Purah tears a leaf of paper from her notebook and scrawls out a brief note. She folds it up. It crumples into Link's open palm. "That'll be enough for her, I should think. Now go on, shoo. If you need any help with the slate, or if anything about the slate changes, do come back. Not another moment wasted now. Go!"

She goes.

—

Energising Glazed Mushrooms (five hearts, four-fifths stamina vessel) - courser bee honey stamella shroom

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: The story of Fort Hateno refers to the hero as a man; this is a reflection of the expectation of the Knight to be a man, as the legendary stories of the Knights passed down usually refer to the male Knight and female Princess. I won't say much about it for now, except to note that we'll be coming back to this topic later, of the expectations inherent in the prophecy versus what actually happens.

I included Calip! He'll come back later. When my beta reader was reading this chapter, she asked me what Inpaz means; just wait until chapter seventy-seven or so. The language spoken in the shrines that Link does not know is referred to as Loftean by Calip, but was not actually the language spoken in Skyloft, if Skyloft existed. Take Calip's worldbuilding with a grain of salt; he was speaking to impress Link.

We don't spend much time in Hateno in Delicious in Wilds, and I don't have Link get the house here. There are a few reasons for that, namely that Link thinks of herself as a traveller and that she doesn't actually have any rupees. Given the sheer size of Hyrule, it did not make much sense for me to tie Link down to a specific place this early in the story. Link does get a home later on, around the tune of chapter thirty or so, though it may not come in a form that you'd expect.

Regarding Purah, it does not make much sense for the ancient guardian technology to include an age regression beam, nor for said age regression beam to conveniently leave Purah at about six years old. As I don't care for her strange sexualisation in Breath of the Wild with the thigh-highs and randoseru, I just made her an elderly woman.

The zora, such as Doreli, have a third eyelid, also known as a haw, akin to sharks and some other aquatic species; this is known as the nictitating membrane and evolved to protect their eyes while swimming. The rito also have one, though it is much less noticeable and nearly transparent. The village of Hoskit is named after the rito guard on Dragon Roost Island from The Wind Waker; the village of Rutela is named after Queen Rutela of Zora's Domain from Twilight Princess. Interestingly, while Queen Oren from A Link Between Worlds has a bridge named after her, Rutela, from a more prominent title in the franchise, does not have any landmarks named after her. There are some landmarks named Rutala, which may be a misspelling of her name. If so, I wonder if the misspelling was intentional or not, or if perhaps this came as a result of some mistranslation.

Pictobox and pictograph also come from The Wind Waker. I like these terms better than camera or photograph, words which arose from our development of these items rather than the Breath of the Wild understanding of the slate as producing incredible accurate illustrations since there is no native developed camera.

Another thank you to my most beloved beta reader, Emma, for helping me proof and fix a minor continuity quibble.

midna's ass. 1 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: I love this chapter because I really love, in-game, the stretch between Dueling Peaks and Hateno. The walk there is so cozy.

Calip is definitely a character. He's hilarious, and I love the author's take on him.

Emma. 1 September 2017.
Spicy Meat and Mushroom Skewer

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef is arrested for crimes of defacing the Hateno shrine, but the researchers of the laboratory bail the chef out. After cleaning the laboratory kitchen and preparing a meal in thanks, the chef heads off for Eldin.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

The shrine resides on a hill above Hateno, high enough that climbing up takes a full minute of exertion. The platform at the front of the shrine nearly bursts with the number of offerings upon it, from bowls of rice, to carved wooden dolls, to sketches, to feathers, to leafy flowers, to smooth painted pebbles, to pearly star-shaped objects that gleam in the afternoon light. Despite the attention given by such offerings, some clearly recent, no one guards the shrine.

Link retrieves the slate. The shrine glows blue. She steps forward. Gasps from the main street accompany her descent into the ground.

The curtain of blue light parts and she steps into the bowels of the earth. A now-familiar voice welcomes her. The instructions float over her head.

If Calip knows of Old Hyrulean, or of Loftean, of whatever that language the shrines speak, then she may have to enlist his assistance after all.

She walks up the stairs from the lift. A pedestal awaits her at the end of a raised platform. Affixed to the crown of the pedestal is a set of three thin rings attached at different points to one another, such that one ring sits horizontally, one vertically, and one perpendicular to both. A flat rectangular box—one side perfectly level, the other marked with tiny fences—hovers in the centre of the rings.

Link looks past the pedestal.

A giant version of the same box, with the fences in the same places, floats out in the void, with an orange sphere in the centre. She follows the path through the fences to a platform to the left of the box that juts out into the space below. This platform feeds into a long slope that ends with a bowled depression perfectly sized for the orange sphere.

And on her left, in a straight walk down the stairs and forward from the lift, she notes erected bars in the wall, beyond which she can see the cubic blue curtain of the goalpoint.

She touches her chin. She considers: to move the sphere from the box to the depression in the ground to open the bars.

For nothing else to do, Link places the sheikah slate onto the pedestal.

The rings, the little box, and the pedestal all burst into life at once. When she moves the slate off of the pedestal she discovers the box within the rings moving in tandem, along with the giant version floating beyond the pedestal. The rings rotate.
Simple enough, then.

She sets the slate flat on the pedestal; the positions of the box, the rings, and the giant version reset. Link begins to guide the orange sphere through the fences. She tilts downwards and the sphere rolls. When it reaches the mouth of the next corridor she tilts right but the sphere continues forward by momentum and falls.

She stares at the box. "Only one shot?" she says to herself, placing the slate onto the pedestal to speak.

She can hear a mechanism grinding below her. After a moment the sphere—or another similar sphere—drops from the ceiling into the heart of the box again.

Again, she tries.

Again the sphere falls.

Again and again. She manages to direct the sphere into the second corridor. Just as she begins to celebrate the sphere shoots off of the end. The sphere drops from the ceiling.

Again and again and again.

Falls and falls and falls.

She bangs her head against the pedestal. The impact leaves her forehead pounding. Link runs a hand through her hair, brushes her chin, taps the toe of her boot against the ground.

When the sphere falls yet again Link leaves the pedestal. She walks back down the stairs over the walkway to the bars. Squatting beside them, she inspects them and the goalpoint every which way that she can in search of some trick by which she could bypass the impossible puzzle.

Nothing.

Link returns to the pedestal with a newfound deliberateness to her step. She holds the slate with both hands. She can sense the magic of the moment in her very bones. This time, with her hands steady and her mind clear, she cannot fail.

She fails.

Her left hand rises to her face to pinch the bridge of her nose. The slate dangles limply from her right.

The sphere falls again. Link lowers her hand from her eyes. Because of the position of her right hand, the box had turned ninety degrees counterclockwise. When the sphere dropped from the ceiling, she had assumed the sphere would end up perfectly in the centre of the box, but no: the sphere lands slightly left of centre. In the counterclockwise orientation, the sphere drops directly into the final corridor.

Link does not breathe. She manoeuvres the slate into its previous flat position. Cautiously, cautiously, her touch gossamer, she tilts the slate to the left to roll the sphere onto the platform.

She keeps her gaze riveted on the sphere. It picks up speed down the slope. The sphere overshoots the depression; the bowl-like shape keeps it from flying off, and it rolls around the perimeter, spiralling downwards.
Into the depression it goes.

She has never felt such relief and joy upon a change in colour.

Link ignores the instructions entirely in her exhaustion. She allows the lift to take her back up from the inside of the shrine. As the lift hums, Link devises her plans: to have dinner at the laboratory if she can, to rest for the night, to begin her journey to Darunia in the morning. To inquire about the path to Darunia, as she has no full map and no direction of where to go except vaguely to the north and to the east.

Sunlight and fresh air wisp around her. She breathes in, steps out of the blue curtain of light, and finds herself surrounded by half a dozen spears.

The village guards march her down the main street. The residents of Hateno eye her with a mixture of suspicion, fear, and simple curiosity. She keeps her head level. They push her up the steps of the tallest building in the village, painted a light grey, five intricate statues visible on the roof to reach for the clouds. She enters to find a long, wide hall of pews and an altar on the other end with two great figures, some two metres in height, flanking either side. On the left, a winged woman. On the right, a woman with a blossom in her hand. A row of five small statues runs between these two large, exquisitely detailed carvings of Goddesses, each with heaping of offerings at their feet. Behind the two statues, a circular carving takes up the majority of the far wall, three Goddesses depicted curled around the arc of a wheel, their arms and hands making up the spokes. One breathes out wind; another weeps rivers; the last brandishes fire in her palms.

In front of the altar stands a pair of older women, both robed in highly decorated fabrics that swirl with green, blue, and red. Each has her eyes closed. The pale woman on the left wears a pair of feathery white fabric wings upon her back. The ochre-skinned woman on the right bears a pink blossom in her hand.

An attendant to the side announces the presence of the accused as Link enters. The guards push down Link's shoulders until she kneels before the two women.

"Sage of Hylia, Sage of Sheik," the attendant intones, his booming voice radiating an aura of formality, "we leave the faith of the Goddesses to your courage, the judgment to your wisdom, and the sentence to your power, Your Graces."

The Sages open their eyes at once and fix their gazes upon Link, who meets them blankly, more confused than worried about the proceedings.

Then the Sages accuse her of defacing the ancient Shrine of Sheik that has watched over Hateno since the establishment of the village. They demand to know of her origins. Link replies honestly, of how she lost her memories, of how others have informed her that she is a hylian, of how she might, possibly, know Central Hyrulean better than other languages.

"The accused may bear the mark of Hylia, but the accused is no hylian if the accused would deface a shrine of another Goddess. The Wars of the Seven have long passed," the Sage of Hylia spits. The attendant and guards nod approvingly.

The Sage of Sheik resumes the inquiry. They interrogate her on the defacement of the Shrine of Sheik. Link tries an explanation, of how she has visited other shrines, of Purah directing her to activate the shrine—she does not mention the slate—and of the contents of the shrine in the form of a simple puzzle rather than anything one could take for a measure of faith.

Her words ringing in the open chamber of the temple, the Sage of Hylia answers first. "The recluse of the windmill that the accused calls a laboratory has systematically refused to heed our summons, and the summons of the Sages before us. They do not believe in the jurisdiction of the Goddesses, though we have beseeched them in the names of the Seven and in the names of the Three."

The Sage of Sheik responds next. "That the accused would come before us and willfully claim that the Shrine of the Goddess Sheik has no measure of faith says volumes of the accused's moral calibre."

"Please, try to talk to Purah. She'll explain things." Link hesitates. "I think."

The Sage of Hylia wrinkles her lip. "We have no need for the words of one who disrespects the Goddesses."

But the Sage of Sheik raises her free hand. "I see no reason for us to judge arbitrarily, particularly of a foreigner whom we do not know well. The accused may be telling the truth."

"Even if the accused were telling the truth, the Shrine of Sheik would be yet defamed!"

The Sage of Sheik shakes her head. The beads in her hair twinkle quietly. "If the accused speaks truth, then the Goddesses would wish us to see the accused innocent, for the accused did not intentionally defile a holy space. Did not the heroes of old enter temples far more sacred than a shrine to fulfill their destinies?"

"The accused is no hero."

"The accused defers to the Goddesses and did not intend to cause harm. If the village hermit did intend to cause harm and the accused was aware, then my view will change. Remember that the greatest wisdom of Sheik is that of mercy."

The Sage of Hylia looks aghast at her counterpart. "Yet it is not a Shrine of your Goddess that has been defaced?"

"Indeed, and so I should hope that you will defer to my judgment on matters concerning Sheik the Truthful." Link bows her head in thanks. The Sage of Sheik continues. "While we investigate, take the accused away. See that the accused does not escape."

Link lifts her arms to protest. The guards drag her from the temple and around the back to a village prison comprised of six entirely empty holding cells of metal and wood. They strip her of her belongings and leave her in an unfurnished cell just wide enough for her to stretch out yet not tall enough for her to stand. Though the prison has no windows, the guards leave a candle on the floor.

She recognises the guard who greeted her on her way to the village, who now regards her with a gaze of hate and hurt. Link lowers her head.

They slide the metal bars down. She hears the turn of a key. Without sparing her another glance the guards leave her in silence.

The dust on the floor of the cell speaks of its relative disuse. Link lies down on her stomach. Propping up her chin on her hands, she resolves to waiting.

She sneezes.

And here all she wanted, upon leaving the shrine, was a hot meal at Purah's.

She tells the time by the drip of the candle's wax. When the candle smothers out and darkness snuffs her thoughts, Link allows herself to sleep.

Noise, light, and the incessant squabbling of her own belly rouse her from her dreamless slumber. She blinks the sleep from her eyes to see a fire bobbing in front of her. The fire resolves to a lantern's flame, and the lantern's flame resolves to a lamp held by the guard who served as a greeter.

After her, a pinkish-feathered bird-like creature almost twice her height ducks through the door to enter the prison. Link recognises the white and red patterned robes, clipped together by a pin in the shape of the sheikah eye, though the bird's version of Purah's uniform seems streamlined for easy movement.

The bird—the rito, that familiar word of which Purah reminded her—brushes the air with a wing. "$Link? Purah told me to come get you." He speaks with a jerky quickness. "$If you will follow me."

The guard—the greeter—hands the lantern to a fellow guard. The click of the key makes Link leap up so suddenly that she smashes her head against the ceiling of the cell.

"Thank you," she answers, rolling out of the cell before rising to her feet.

He shrugs. "$Just doing my job, kiddo. Come on."

The rito has to fold himself practically in half to squeeze through the door of the open cell. The guard pats Link on the back as she shuffles her feet on the dusty prison ground. "$Sorry 'bout that. The Sages take their jobs seriously."

The other guard coughs loudly. "$Let's take the accused—that is, the innocent—up already."

Warmth on her shoulders causes Link to look up. The rito, walking by her left side, has extended his wing to cover her like a cloak. She faces forward.

The hue of the sky matches the rito's feathers. She must have slept until morning. When the guards motion for her to re-enter the temple, she steps back, and the rito brushes his feathers over her shoulders.

"You're good to go, kiddo. They just want to apologise."

Link steps in to find the Sages, Symin, Doreli, and Purah waiting, the latter on a cushion instead of standing. The attendant proceeds through the announcements.

Purah sighs. When the Sages do not react she sighs again, more pointedly. "$Can we get on with this? The stuffy formality's going to crush these old bones, and then you'll have the murder of an old lady on your hands."

The Sage of Hylia narrows her eyes, but the Sage of Sheik bows her head. "$In the justice and mercy held sacred by the Goddesses, by name of the Goddess Sheik, the Seven and the Three, the Sage of Sheik..."

"...and the Sage of Hylia," the other Sage finishes, "$find the accused innocent of the defacement of the Shrine of Sheik."

"You are free to go, Link," the Sage of Sheik says kindly, and Link thanks them until her hands grow numb. The attendant retrieves her things.
Link lets the sheikah slate weigh down her hands once more.

Doreli and Symin lift up Purah on the cushion and carry her on their shoulders. She salutes the Sages, then gestures towards Link. "Subject...appears to...not understand that religious shrines...can be important to the people around them...even if they were not meant to be religious...they can acquire such a status due to the historical importance."

"How was I supposed to know?" she asks in return. She keeps up with the procession on the left, while the pink rito takes the right.

"Subject...believes that ignorant...makes the subject innocent..."

Link exhales. "Thank you for explaining it to them."

Purah dismisses her with a flap of the hand. "They kept telling me to come down to the temple. Unless Farore wants to send over Her wind, these bones aren't going to go anywhere by themselves, I tell you, and they wouldn't come up there." She scoffs. "Besides, if they really think that the Goddesses want their priestesses playing dress-up and calling themselves the Sages, then it's no surprise they'd label someone like me...what was it they called me?"

"Disrespectful?" ventures Symin from underneath the cushion.

Doreli tries her hand, or fin, as well: "A nonbeliever?"

"A traitor to the Goddesses?" the rito suggests.

"Ah, thank you, Balin. A traitor to the Goddesses. It's got a nice ring to it. I should put that on a sign to the lab. Then we'll stop getting so many solicitors. Now, Link. There's not much else for you to do in Hateno at the moment, is there?"

"What if I wanted to enjoy the town for a few days?" Her stomach rumbles. "And try some of the local cuisine?"

"You've got a date with the gorons," Purah insists, "and I don't think that sticking around town will be the brightest idea. Even if you've gotten your name cleared, people will look at you funny for having been the one to turn the shrine blue and all."

Link stops walking. "Did you put me up to this so I would be kicked out of Hateno?"

Purah chuckles, and Link resumes, now shaking her head. "I'll give you directions. You can copy one of my maps. I don't know much about local cuisine, but I'm sure that I can whip you up something. And by I, I mean that Symin can."

"Of course, ma'am," Symin answers. Balin the rito snorts back a laugh.

They return to the laboratory. While the others bundle Purah inside, Link runs ahead of them, nearly tripping over herself. She covers her mouth with her hands and whistles, loud and low. For a second she hears nothing, sees nothing. Her heart drops out from her chest to thud against her heels.

Ilia rounds the corner of the laboratory. She barrels towards Link full-gallop. Link throws open her arms. Ilia knocks her over into the grass and licks her face until her cheeks soak in horse saliva.

Link doesn't stop laughing until her mouth hurts.
Once satisfied with Ilia's condition, Link opens the door. This time Link takes a better look at the inside, at the various sheikah contraptions that resemble those from the shrines, at the guardians in different states of disassembly, their gears and springs wobbling on the tables spread out with every possible size of wrench and ratchet. Link watches as Doreli descends into the basement. Balin sates her curiosity: In the cellar of the laboratory, Doreli investigates the ability of the ancient materials to withstand high heat and pressure, such dangerous work relegated downstairs.

"Will she be all right?"

Balin snickers. "Dori? Now that's the million-rupee question." He brushes imaginary dust from his robes. "Theoretically, Doreli shouldn't be working downstairs by herself, but nothing's ever gone wrong, and Purah's fine with it." He glances left and right. Purah sits at her desk; Balin turns so that his back faces her. "Kiddo, Purah and her sister don't see eye to eye too much. If Impa ever asks you 'bout how Purah's doing, just say she's fine."

Purah clears her throat. The feathers on Balin's head flare up. "Right, well, I've got some guardians to survey. See ya 'round, kiddo!" He dives for the door while Purah calls Link over.

"Your slate isn't fully repaired." Purah taps her pen against the notebook. Her crimson gaze fixes on Link, who blinks at her. "You know, I have my doubts about this technology truly being of the sheikah, despite the prominence of the eye motif in both. Something catastrophic must have happened for such technology to have been lost after ten thousand years. The sheikah people as we know them may not even have existed back then."

"...ten thousand years?" Link echoes.

"Oh, you didn't know? Yes, the guardians, the slate, the shrines, those great towers that rose from the earth not long ago..." Purah flips through her notebook. "Signs, both historical and scientific, point to their construction approximately ten thousand years ago, within the span of a few centuries. The towers are the oldest, and the shrines the youngest." She clears her throat. "Regardless, if you could harvest parts from guardians, I could finish repairs on the slate. Unfortunately I don't have all of the parts here, even with all that Balin's salvaged. Just keep that in mind. Rare parts, mind. Their cores look like this." Purah thrusts a paper with an illustration into Link's face. "I have enough gears and springs to last a lifetime. Speaking of which." Flicking the illustration away again, Purah demonstrates how to make use of the realistic pictograph option, which she refers to as the pictobox rune, as the other symbols on the slate are stasis, magnesis, bomb, and cryonis runes. The paintings that the slate makes appear indistinguishable from the real world. Link twirls around, snapping pictographs of everyone in the laboratory. Symin acts positively giddy over the development and tasks Link with taking pictographs of as many different things as she can.

"I'll pay you for them. Animals, plants, every which thing that you can. Monsters, too. We can built an entire collection of data." Symin claps his hands together. "It'll be an enriching experience for everyone!"

"Symin, I believe I asked you to make Link something of a local specialty," Purah calls from her work at the desk, where she writes so furiously Link fears her notebook may catch fire.

"Right away, ma'am." Symin bows to Link. "Please excuse me, miss."

"Can I help? I like cooking."

Symin's eyes widen as though Link had asked him to set his own body aflame. "If you want to, miss."
"Make her something simple, will you?" Purah adds. "Something...oh, of course. Hateno's famous for its sunshrooms. Make her a sunny-bird."

"One sunny-bird, coming right up."

Symin shows her the kitchen. A cramped affair of a single washbasin, a repurposed tank full of dirty bowls, plates, and utensils, a pantry of things vaguely emulating ingredients, long past the point of throwing out. Link's stomach threatens to turn inwards on itself from the sight alone.

"Don't mind the mess. I'll have you a sunny-bird soon. Now, let's see. We should still have that bird from last week..."

That people could subsist on such a kitchen, when food comprises the first, second, and third most vital aspects of everyday life—and fourth, if one counts snacks—boggles her so badly that she has to sit down for a few minutes. Then Link stands up, inhales, and removes her tunic. She rolls back her sleeves to the elbows.

While Symin watches she cleans the entire kitchen from floor to ceiling, dusts and washes every countertop to a point of proper cooking ability, tosses out the vast majority of the encrusted shlock in the pantries, and sorts the remainder.

She turns on her heel.

"What do you need for the sunny-bird?"

Link walks out with her satchel, her bow, and a written description of the appearance of sunshrooms. Retsam Forest becomes her home for the better part of the day. She returns by mid-afternoon with her prize of several pigeons alongside a satchel bulging with yellow mushrooms and acorns.

Symin guides her. She oils the bottom of a saucepan while he cuts up the sunshrooms. "Feel them, miss," he offers. She picks up one of the chunks and gazes in amazement at the warmth radiating from the piece of fungus. "If you ever go somewhere cold, these things can heat you right up."

Link fries the mushrooms with salt and pepper. She chops up spicy peppers, hearty radish, and hearty garlic, some taken from Retsam, some from Symin's stores, frying them as well. Honey melts with salted butter, then steeps with sunshroom to soak in the warmth and flavour. She adds a sprinkle of cinnamon for a kick.

She sets aside some of the fried vegetable and mushroom mixture with honey sauce for Balin upon Symin's gentle note that followers of the Goddess Erito do not consume poultry.

The pigeons have cooled too far for defeathering, and so she skins them. She stuffs the innards with fried sunshroom mix. Holding the birds upright she drizzles in honey sauce. She crushes in acorns for a nutty hint. Link whisks bird egg, oil, and vinegar together into a thick cream-like substance that she smears over the outside of each bird. She sets the birds to bake in the hearth. For dessert she glazes acorns with salted honey sauce and roasts them into candied shells. She wipes her forehead.

Crossing his arms over his chest, Symin whistles. He brings her a stool. Link drops herself heavily onto the stool and only then recognises that she had been swaying from hunger.

Symin serves dinner. Balin praises her relentlessly for the candied acorns. Doreli jokes that she was right to open the door for a stranger. Purah arches an eyebrow at her. "Make sure you have problems with the sheikah slate more often, Link." She takes an entire stuffed pigeon to herself.
"Though how in the world am I supposed to go back to Symin's cooking after this?"

Link rubs the back of her neck and grins sheepishly at them.

After dinner Link helps Symin wash the plates. She roasts and salts the leftover sunshrooms and acorns, as many as will fit into her pack for the journey ahead. She goes to Ilia with a handful of salt that the horse licks greedily from her palm.

Link swings a leg over Ilia's back. She unfolds the map drawn on the parchment from the Great Plateau, copied from one of Purah’s atlases.

She could venture up the road, from village to village, but the quicker route—less distractions, less shenanigans—lies in the wilds of wood and creek, valley and mountain, stone and grass. North, she goes. North, to the wilds of Eldin.

—

Spicy Meat and Mushroom Skewer (four hearts, low cold resistance for 03:30) - acorn, raw bird drumstick, sunshroom

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Well now, that was a fun chapter!

I really like the apparatus shrine in Hateno. Link figuring out how to do it and accidentally realising that you can use a ninety-degree rotation to bring the ball right to the entrance is exactly how I solved it. This shrine fascinates me in how many people solved it different ways: some flipped it over and let the ball roll underneath, while others climbed into the apparatus itself and used stasis to physically push it around. Marvellous. There are so many shrines that I solved the "wrong" way; of course, there is no "wrong" way to solve any shrine.

In Breath of the Wild, there are naturally no consequences for players who choose to enter shrines, as befits gameplay. I thought to myself that, given the nature of the shrines, it would make sense for many shrines to be regarded as holy or at least culturally significant objects. Some foreign hooligan with a slate will be regarded with suspicion.

High priestesses or monks of the Golden Goddesses are known as Oracles, such as an Oracle of Farore; this, of course, is a reference to Oracle of Seasons and Oracle of Ages. High priestesses or monks of the Seven Goddesses are known as Sages, such as the Sage of Sheik and Sage of Hylia noted in this very chapter; this is a reference to the Seven Sages from A Link to the Past and Ocarina of Time.

In ages past, there was a single Oracle of each Golden Goddess and a single Sage of each of the Seven Goddesses, but since then, most villages and towns have their own Oracles and Sages for whatever religions/faiths are prominent there. Hateno is mostly comprised of worshippers of Sheik and Hylia, so they have a Sage of each.
The shrine is regarded as belonging to the Goddess Sheik due to the existence of the symbol of Sheik (the eye-like mark of the sheikah).

Link's blank stare is something that we'll come back to. I'm sure that anyone who has played Breath of the Wild has noticed Link's rather...blank expression during the memories and so on. Link has some difficulty in properly expressing emotion on the face, which causes people to misinterpret Link's intentions.

Future chapters will explore Purah's line of thought regarding the origins of the "sheikah" technology from ten thousand years ago.

Followers of Erito, the Patron Goddess of the rito, do not consume any birds, as birds are seen as messengers of Erito. Legends say that Erito Herself designed the rito after the loftwings that serve the Golden Goddesses. On the other hand, followers of Zola, the zora Goddess, do indeed consume fish.

Another great thanks to my marvellous and extremely talented beta reader, Emma, for proofreading the chapter. And another most wonderful thank you to all of my readers. I hope that you have been enjoying.

Next chapter is the first really fun one, in my opinion, of Link's adventure. If I remember correctly, it also features a fight scene gory enough to warrant the archive warning, so please be advised. I'll include another warning at the front of the chapter.

Beta reader's comments: I really love the author's representation of this shrine. This shrine fascinates me because so many different people solve it in different ways (if you're curious, I, a stupid woman, did it the hard way and got the ball through the whole maze). I also really like how the implications of going into an important thing like a shrine are explored.

The laboratory's messy kitchen involves one of my favourite jokes in the series. You'll see.

Emma. 2 September 2017.
Fireproof Elixir

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef begins the journey to Eldin. After dispatching a quartet of lizalfos attempting to eat the chef's food, the chef travels northwards, where the chef learns how to trade in monster parts for rupees; hears of the zora seeking a strong hylian for some strange mission; and arrives in the foothill town of Medigo to hear the Ballad of the Sealing War from a certain travelling minstrel. The chef assists a local stablehand with the brewing of fireproof elixirs in exchange for the boarding of the chef's horse.

Chapter Notes

To all readers: Please be advised that this chapter features a rather gory fight scene. If you wish to skip it, it begins at the paragraph starting with "She breaks a branch over her knee" and ends at the paragraph starting with "Link remains in her stance."

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The northwestern path takes her in the direction of Kakariko. She takes her time, now, unburdened from the sensitivity of time. Link veers from the road in the Ginner Woods in pursuit of an apple tree. The crunch of a fresh apple, the first bite that sprays juice over her mouth, never fails to bring a smile.

She bathes in Nirvata Lake. Scooping sand from the bottom of the lake she scrubs herself down. For the first time since she awoke in the blue chamber, she has a moment to regard herself. Scars criss-cross her abdomen in raised ridges that she traces with her fingers. Some long and thin that curve through her flesh like a road; others, patches of bumpy skin in mottled red and violet like points of interest on a map. She carries someone else's lifetime on her skin. A spirit taking shelter in an abandoned shrine that bears yet the marks and burden of its previous deity. Like the monkey from the fable who, upon stealing the clothes of the Knight, struts about in his image until the moment the Calamitous One awakens.

She wears someone else's skin.

When she swims to the edge of the lake, she hears a peculiar chirping by the shore. A band of hunched-over lizard-like beasts her own size have gotten into her things. One wears her shirt on its tail; another uses her trousers as a wind net; a third has pulled her undergarments over the horn on its face. The light armour over their green hides, and the slight violet tinge to their eyes, reveals them of the same maliced monstrous breed as the bokoblins.

Suddenly the monkey of the fable has grown scales.

Engaging the lizard-beasts in the nude without even her sword—which the shirt-wearing lizard swings about, bumping it into every rock on the shore—seems like a death wish waiting to happen. If she sneaks away now, whistles for Ilia, and regroups, she stands a better chance.
Then she notices the fourth lizard-beast rooting through her satchel. It lifts its head to reveal a mouthful of dried and roasted sunshrooms in its open maw. Its jaws snap shut. Link watches the lizard swallow, run its long tongue over its teeth, and then dive into the satchel for more.

She breaks a branch over her knee. Scaling a nearby tree, she crouches in its boughs, startling a squirrel that scurries down the trunk. Link eyes the shirt-lizard using her blade as a stick with which to poke the soil. She inhales. She springs.

The thick of the branch crashes down upon the shirt-lizard-beast's head. It twitters, stumbling for a few steps, and then flops backwards while she whips the sword from its limp talons. Laughing to herself, Link twirls the sword in her hand; abruptly her palm feels empty and damp.

The lizard wearing her undergarments as a mask has wrapped its tongue around the hilt of the sword. It retracts its tongue and succeeds in smacking the flat of the blade against its companion digging through the satchel. The food-thief-lizard chirps at the undergarments-lizard. Ignoring Link entirely, the two engage in a slap fight, whipping one another with their tails.

Link rolls forward to grab her satchel from under the food-thief. With her most vital possession back in place, she glances over the campsite. Ilia, nowhere to be seen, presumably ran away at the sound of danger. The fourth lizard, holding her trousers, squawks at her presence while she twists around the squabbling lizards to try to wrest her sword from the undergarments-lizard still wielding the blade with its tongue.

She closes her fingers around the blade and pulls. The sudden pain in her palm from the undergarments-lizard's twitched motion of the tongue forces back her arm and brings her to drop the branch. The trousers-lizard spits a glob of saliva towards her. Ducking behind the undergarments-lizard nibbling on her sword, Link cracks her elbow down on the lizard's spine. It coughs up the sword. While she dives to catch it, she feels something curl around her ankle. Trousers-lizard snags her leg with its tongue and knocks her to the ground. Link twists around. Something thin and green slices towards her from the right. She barely has time to lift her sword. Warm blood sprays her face as the food-thief-lizard cuts off its own tail on her blade. The still-wriggling severed tip of tail slams into her face. The scales drag across her skin. A bolt of pain cracks diagonally across her back. Eyes stinging from the blood trickling down in rivulets from her scratched brow, Link grips the slimy tongue around her ankle with her right hand and drives her blade in with her left.

The food-thief-lizard shrieks. Another bolt of pain criss-crosses her back.

Link scramble to her feet. Wiping the blood from her face with her right arm, she spins around to face the three lizards that remain. The food-thief-lizard kneels on the ground spitting blood from its ruined mouth. The second lizard struggles to rip Link's undergarments from its head. The trousers-lizard picks up the heavy branch. It lunges at her, talons outstretched.

She flips backwards, allows the trousers-lizard's momentum to carry it forward into tripping, and brings the blade down on the back of its neck just under the lower edge of its helmet. The blade sinks into its flesh. It spears through the trousers-lizard's throat. The lizard-beast's body writhes around the sword.

Link pulls back to rip the blade from its body in an upwards arc.

The blade snaps off inside of the trousers-lizard. The impact thunders through Link's arm to send her flying backwards. Landing with her rear end on a hard rock, Link stares at the unevenly broken stump of metal that remains, twisted and warped around the edges. She crouches down to snag the branch from the trousers-lizard's hand. She readies a swing. The other two lizards hiss at her. She observes them: leaping side to side. Movements erratic. Limbs telescoping back and forth.

The undergarments-lizard rears back its head to spit saliva at her. She dodges to the left only to notice the food-thief-lizard rushing her. The branch rises on its arc to ram into the food-thief-lizard's abdomen. It flies backwards. Link steps forward. The undergarments-lizard attempts to spit at her again, but she sidesteps the projectile and cracks the branch across its head.

Too slow.

The undergarments-lizard ducks. Its jaws open wide around her arm. She reels her hand in but all too late; although she pulls her arm in enough for the undergarments-lizard not to bite off her limb entirely, its teeth tear through her flesh. She punches it in the eye with her weaker right hand. A second later the agony of the bite burns through her muscles. Her left hand spasms. She controls herself enough to flex her wrist and smash the branch into the undergarments-lizard's face.

Pushing her elbow into its already bleeding eye, Link drops onto its body. Her weight knocks the undergarments-lizard to the ground. Its teeth loosen from her skin as she grinds the point of her elbow into its throat and lower jaw. She springs backwards. The skin of her arm has broken; several thick holes reveal her red muscle to the open air, throbbing in pain.

Yet the wound does not reach her bone.

She lets her left arm dangle limply at her side. Wet heat spreads from the epicentre of agony. Blinking tears from her eyes, Link stands to thrust her bare foot into the undergarments-lizard-beast's throat. She brings the branch down on the lizard-beast's face with her right hand again and again, grinds in her foot, until it gurgles wetly and she can no longer feel its breaths.

Clutching its stomach, the final lizard—the food thief—lifts its head up to her as Link raises the bloodied branch, the wood oozing with some clear fluid from its former companion's head. It chirrups at her, flicks out the bloodied leftovers of its tongue, turns tail and vanishes into the brush.

Link remains in her stance for another few moments. She pants. The flame-sharp rush of the fight licks up her chest and dries out her mouth. Her arm pulsates. She stumbles forward and drops to her knees on the ground. A convulsion worms up her spine. With her right fingers she grips her left upper arm.

She forces herself to collect her clothing and sling them over her right shoulder. Weakly she whistles.

Ilia comes racing towards her. Her nostrils flare. She whinnies: at the sight or smell of blood, or the corpses of the lizard-beasts, or at Link's own bedraggled body. Link coos soothingly until the horse nears her, neighing softly. She drags herself onto Ilia's back. With her free right hand, she directs Ilia down towards the lake.

She cleans her clothes first, scrubbing blood and lizard-beast saliva off the fabric as much as she can manage. The warm afternoon sun keeps away the chill when she tugs the wet clothing over her body. Then, gritting her teeth, she sinks her arm into the water.

The wounds sting so deeply that for a half second she can see a mirage of the lizard-beast's fangs breaking her flesh once more. She cleanses her arm in the water. She wraps her tunic around the bite marks and ties off the ends, not too tightly.

Herbs. Medicinal herbs. Even if their names have drifted from her knowledge, she can envision their petals and leaves. On Ilia's back, she returns to the campsite to regain her strength with the remaining roasted sunshrooms. The grove flanking the lake of the shore yields little in the way of medicinal plants, but she works with what she can gather. Chewing the leaves and roots up in her mouth, the bitterness dredging bile to set her inner throat aflame, she spreads the salve into the bites.

The pain splotches black at the corners of her vision. She removes her cloak and slips on the tunic. The cloak serves as substitute gauze for now.

At the next town, she'll need to stock up on medical supplies, trading with the rupees that she does not have.

Rupees.

Trading.

Monster parts.

The words flash into her fingers with such speed that she performs the gestures automatically. The red-eyed merchant at the trading post in Hateno who, somehow guessing she was a traveller, had advised that she take up hunting monsters for their coveted horns, their scales, their tails.

She takes her hunting knife to the lizard-beasts. She washes out the parts that she harvests and folds them up in her paraglider, which she closes. No matter how much she scrubs or how carefully she packs the horns and talons into the paraglider, the stink of monster blood radiates from her.

Link dries her eyes. She could return to Hateno, but instead she pushes forward. She passes villages in the distance that spot the mountains, but she cannot climb up the hillsides with Ilia.

She hikes the Peak of Awakening, skirting the actual mountain peak for the sake of Ilia, who shies from the increasingly steep cliffs. Even if she wanted to, she could not make the climb. She rinses her left arm whenever possible and reapplies the makeshift salve. No infection sets in, and ever so slowly the wounds close in on themselves.

Crossing the reservoir between the Lanayru Bluffs and the Phalian Highlands, Link observes—and with the red telescope, confirms—a tunnel winding under the waterfall. She opens up her paraglider and, taking a branch from a nearby tree, set in a wooden support to force the paraglider to stay open.

She leaves Ilia on dry land to investigate.

Her left arm aches. The tendons bunch and spring. She can feel the wounds stretching and reopening from the strain, and so she drops down instead, holding the paraglider by the middle. The wooden strut holds as she drifts towards the tunnel. She passes into the waterfall.

The wooden support snaps under the pressure.

The paraglider closes.

She falls like a rock onto the jutting platform of the tunnel. Twisting through the air, she smacks her right side on the hard stone. Her wrist creaks audibly in pain. The right half of her face, having kissed rock, stings. Link sits up and takes stock of her body.

At least she landed in one piece.

Link ties the paraglider to her back. She follows the tunnel down into the darkness. The dampness of the cavern ceiling drips moisture onto her shoulders, her head, her arms. Her boots slosh in the thin layer of water. Here and there her foot slides on a patch of moss.

The tunnel curves upwards and to the left. An orange gleam light her path. A shrine.

To her relief the puzzle of the shrine takes little effort to solve, and she works at it one-handed. This time when she touches the cubic curtain of blue light at the end of the shrine, her left arm tingles. The skin near the wounds begins to itch, then burn. She jerks her hand away from the blue light but the sensation continues, as though a million tiny needles had burrowed beneath her skin and begun to crawl towards one another.

Link steps backwards. Her foot expects another step to the stairs, but instead she feels empty air. Gravity takes her down. She clutches her arm to her chest. Frantically she claws off the cloak to stare at the horrors unfolding on her bare skin.

Her flesh puckers visibly inwards towards the holes where the lizard-beast bit through her arm in furrows that mark where her skin has stretched. The bites themselves have capped with angry red-brown scars that radiate thin lines, starring her flesh with the memory of the agony. She counts the starry scars on the left and right sides of her arm in arcs of ten apiece.

The burning diminishes and then halts. The voice of the shrine takes on a different tone, and she looks up at the glittering shards of blue that have broken from the curtain.

The shrine must have healed her.

"Thank you," she signs to no one in particular. She runs her fingers over her arm, to feel the texture of the irregular bumps, like inverse craters over her flesh.

Her own scars, that speak of her own experiences, that tell of her own survival, that affirm her own existence. Not the scars of someone else's body whose skin she has stolen.

Her own.

And she has the lizard-beast to thank.

Link breaks out into laughter. She rocks back and forth on the floor of the shrine. The sides of her mouth ache; her stomach hurts; and she thanks the lizard-beast over and over until her arms weary.

She emerges from the shrine, from the tunnel, from under the waterfall. Climbing up the slick walls on the other side of the falls leads to her slipping downwards more than once, but she accompanies every fall with a laugh. She perseveres. When she passes beneath the waterfall, she tilts her head back to drink of the fresh water flowing over the cliffside. The clean water washes the sweat from her body and the salt from her face. Her hair and the fabric of her clothes stick to her frame.

Soon she has hooked her arm over the top of the fall once again. She pulls herself up into the grass. Link draws her face near the earth and smells the scent of life.

Ilia cycles more readily through her gaits now, walking to trotting to cantering to galloping and back again with the slightest touch. Link directs her left and right with a tuft of her mane. She could fashion a brindle for her horse herself if she has not the rupees to buy one. Then again, a mishandled brindle could cause her horse pain and grief.

Link continues on the western border of the Lanayru Promenade. She picks bananas and durians from the trees that sprout here and there, though she gives up on the durians after her first effort at eating them without prior preparation. The bananas, however, she can eat one-handed, flipping up her chin to thrust the banana further into her mouth for the next bite.

When she approaches the forest outside of Kakariko and the mystery of the depressed platform on the hill, she takes time to prepare for the road ahead. She fletches arrows from wood; the dove she catches for supper supplies the feathers.

The arrows she carves do not fly as far or as straight as the arrows taken from the Great Plateau.
She could make the trip to Kakariko to stock up; with Link's reputation as the hero, the shopkeep of the Curious Quiver—Rola, as Cottla and Koko called her—would give her as many as she asked terribly for free.

For that reason alone, Link busies herself making her own arrows.

She wraps the Great Plateau arrows with a strip of fabric torn from her cloak. She tucks them deep into the quiver for a spare stash of true-flying arrows. Her misshapen arrows will work well for now.

She moves to the northeast, then follows the road west around Quatta's Shelf. She stops by a fishing village inhabited mostly by sheikah and zora, where she attempts to trade in the lizard-beast —lizalfos, the zora at the counter calls the beasts—parts for rupees.

The zora's head/tail swishes about. He chastises her for bringing in such sloppily prepared horns and talons and attempting to trade a severed tail too short to bring much use. When she ducks her head and admits her ignorance, he softens.

She leaves the village with three boons: first, the knowledge of how to better select, prepare, and preserve the parts of monsters; second, a new wooden strut for her paraglider that she carves by hand; and third, a belly full of hylian bass.

As she passes the Rabia Plain the sound of an accordion reaches her, but when she turns in direction the music, the song of the accordion fades. Link marks the spot on her map and continues her journey north, and north, and north.

The Lanayru Wetlands bring with them their own share of woes. Insects buzz around her at alarming densities. She awakens in the middle of the night to bitemarks welting up her arms. For want of a sword, she accepts a rusted halberd sticking up from the half-sunk ruins of the islands near the Millennio Sandbar, the name gleaned from a passing rock-being in a wooden boat who stands a full metre away from the water's edge at all times. The rock-being helps her record the names of local landmarks in exchange for half of her flint pouch. She shares her bananas with the rock-being, but he merely rumbles out a chuckle and offers her a fancy supper of inedible rocks.

The orange glow of a shrine brings her to wade through the waters toward a rocky outcropping called—she checks her map—Shrine Island, appropriately enough. A blue-scaled zora sunbathing on the warm rocks on the island shore dives into the water at her approach. She lunges towards Link, who starts to sprint in the other direction, gripping the halberd tightly in both hands. The zora catches up to her.

"A hylian!" the zora yells. "Finally! I was starting to think my fins would fall off!!" Link stares at her, her fingers easing off of the handle of the halberd. The zora arranges herself in the shallows and explains herself: the Prince Zora of the Lanayrish capital of Ruto has sent zora to recruit a strong hylian adventurer to come to the aid of the Lanayrish, for a mysterious mission she cannot disclose, but which threatens the whole of zorakind.
Link pries the zora's webbed hands off of her wrists. Smiling apologetically, Link backs away one step at a time. "You must be looking for a hero. I can't be that."

The zora pouts at her but swims away. Link watches her jump up from the surface of the lake, her body glittering with droplets of water, and then dive back in.

She approaches the shrine on Shrine Island. The challenge involves using the magnesis rune—she grins at herself for remembering Purah's name for it—to scoop orange balls from pools of water. She finishes easily enough; as she works, she wonders at the strangeness of these puzzles; at the strangeness of these shrines ten thousand years ago that toy with her and make her physically put herself through tasks of the mind; at the strangeness of the voices and the instructions that she does not know. Whoever made the shrines must have built them for a reason. Yet she cannot see how playing a game of fetch with a piece of metal would assist anyone, hero or no.

Then again, perhaps not comprehending the shrines marks her as not the hero and frees her from such a burden. She pats the shrine in gratitude.

Her journey continues northward through a series of isles. Goponga Island hosts ruins, while Linebeck Island boasts the waterfront of New Goponga, not on the isle but around the isle, the houses floating on great wooden rafts. On Kincaen Island, Link observes the reason for the rafts' existence: a giant rotund being, like an overinflated balloon, that she mistakes at first for a tent or a decoration prior to noticing the giant monster breathing. When it rampages, the villagers cast off the shore to float safely in the deeper waters the monster cannot reach. Link takes the villagers' wisdom to heart and goes around the island, for Ilia's safety as well as her own.

Link dispatches a crowd of three lizalfos on her path to Mercay Island. She preserves their body parts somewhat properly this time. At the very least, she manages to confirm the still-twitching movements of the tail of the bluish-purple lizalfos who seemed to serve as the squad's leader. She takes the forked boomerang that the blue lizalfos wielded and the bony shield. The afternoon sees her practising aiming, throwing, and catching the boomerang repeatedly until she can wield the weapon with confidence.

She rivets her gaze on the orange-tinted golden spire at the peak of elevated rock. Leaving Ilia at Boné Pond in a lush grassland, Link sneaks her way past the camps of bokoblins and lizalfos that infest the base. To her amusement, she catches them fighting amongst themselves at times, over fish or fruit. Link can understand the motivations for such quarreling. She hides behind a crate of arrows—which rapidly fill up her quiver—and uses the forked boomerang to bonk one of the blue bokoblins on the head. Squealing loudly, the bokoblin wheels about, its clawed fists up. It seizes the nearest lizalfos and suplexes the green monster over its head into the water. The lizalfos tongues the bokoblin's snout in response. The bokoblin throws a left cross at its supposed ally's mouth, and suddenly the two wrestle one another in the mud. Another bokoblin joins in to pull on the lizalfos's tail. The commotion draws the attention of other bokoblins and lizalfos who leap into the fray for apparently no reason but their own bloodlust.

Link covers her mouth with her hand to keep her laughter in as she sneaks from crate to crate towards the tower. She watches one bokoblin grab a flammable barrel. The lizalfos shriek at it, but the bokoblin rears and slams the barrel on the head of the nearest monster: a napping red-skinned bokoblin. The resulting explosion sets half the camp aflame.

She ascends the tower. She places the slate into the empty rectangle on the pedestal. As she waits for the black crystal to distill a droplet, she sketches the land to the east on her map, a view of glittering blue-black stone cascading like ripples frozen in time, and farther beyond that, a ridge of mountains snowed at their caps.
To the north the volcano—the pulsating forge of Hyrule—takes up the skyline. It belches smoke into the heavens. Death Mountain.

The slate buzzes to catch her attention. She slides the slate back into the pouch at her right hip. Her hands hold the paraglider tightly as she kicks herself off of the rim of the tower. Below her, bokoblins and lizalfos panic. Some ready their bows, yet she glides too far above them for their arrows to reach.

Link lets go of the right support to waves at them. The paraglider nearly rips from her hand as the wind knocks up the right side of the paraglider. The earth rushes to meet her. She scrambles for the wooden support again. Her right fingers barely reach the strut, and she breaks her fall just before crashing into the ground.

No longer high above the bokoblins and lizalfos, she breaks into a sprint, whistling the entire way down. The monsters give chase. She rips the lizal shield from her back. Throwing the shield down to the ground and wedging the toes of her boots into the handguard, Link attempts to surf down the rocky path. She can hear the shield disintegrating under her feet. She whistles, whistles, whistles until her throat scorches and Ilia's neighs reach her ears.

She twists her body up to maintain speed as the path curves skyward. The shield launches her into the air. Ilia gallops towards her. Before the peak of her rise, she frees her left boot from the handguard and swings down her leg.

Bracing herself for impact, Link lands astride on Ilia's back. The sharp pain of contact thunders up her skull. An arrow cleaves the air by her right ear. She squeezes in her thighs as hard as she can. Ilia rears. When the horse's hooves crash down to the dirt, Link speeds her forward.

They leave the monsters and the tower far, far behind.

Ilia and Link cross the river. A travelling rito hawking rare insects informs her that she walks the Tierno Trail. A group of gerudo and rock-being jewel traders coming down from the mountains share a meal of hot curried rice with her, courtesy of the special goron spice on which they have loaded up. The rice steams her body and reddens her face. Goron spice. The rock-beings. She remembers: not rock-beings, but gorons. Thanking them profusely, she tries to pay them back in monster parts, but the red-haired woman in charge of the group shakes her head.

"A pleasure, instead, to hear of your travels," the woman says in a lilting tongue Link recognises as Eldic. The jewel trader concludes every sentence in the phrase goro; Link recalls what Symin told her, of goro indicating the end of each phrase.

Peppering her speech with goro, Link regales the jewel traders with a story of her tricking the monsters into fighting one another. They share a hearty laugh to accompany the hearty meal. She asks about the monsters, about the violet violence in their eyes, about how they continued to pursue her with ruined mouths and ruined limbs as though unafraid of death.

One of the gorons grunts. Despite the silliness of their actions, he growls in explanation, the monsters pose a threat to people over the land once known as Hyrule, for their tendencies towards destruction and chaos, for their hate that brings them to attack on sight, for the malice that courses through their bodies, their forms animated by magic rather than flesh and blood alone. While the monsters murder one another in cold blood, the same lust for violence chases them towards villages, and they replenish their numbers at such rates that more always rise on the horizon.

The woman in charge of the group nudges him. "You can kvetch down the road. For now let's commemorate another sunrise we've gotten to see."
At the fork in the road, Link bypasses a village that better resembles a fortress. She has had enough of guards and proving herself.

The path grows steeper as she ascends into the mountains, and the air hotter. She removes her undershirt to ride in the sleeveless tunic. Plucking broad leaves from the trees that line the trail, Link fashions herself a fan.

Faint strains of an accordion carry over the mountainside. The sound murmurs an eerie familiarity, caressing her ears with the promise of mists forgotten. Link presses gently on Ilia's sides to quicken her. Over the next hill, the village at the base of Hyrule's spine comes into view. She examines her map: the foothill town of Medigo. The stone buildings give the village an appearance of a pile of pebbles organised by a child playing house. As she approaches Medigo, the carve of individual houses and flowers painting the ground breathe the village into life.

Her gaze settles first on the bulky orange-brown rock-beings that she recognises now as gorons. Other denizens of the village look more familiar: a smaller quantity of sheikah and hylians of varying tones of skin, and many zora bathing in the warm waters of the lake below. She faces no guards on her entrance. If she cranes her neck up, she can observe a goron at the top of a stone guard-tower.

The sound of the accordion pulls her onwards.

A blue- and gold-feathered rito stands in the village square with a sky-coloured sash around his chest. The fountain behind him sprays a fine mist to the air; the rainbows glittering in the droplets pale in comparison to the colourful green-blue-red-feathered adornment the rito bears on the side of his head. The accordion in his hands seems to move of its own accord. The bellows rise and fall. The tones mingle from clear to resonant as the rito, his eyes closed, gradually shifts his hands along the manuals. Passersby toss rupees into the open instrument case by the rito's feet.

Link pats her pockets, but no rupees have spontaneously generated while she looked the other way. She rummages through her satchel, seizes the pouch of candied acorns from Hateno, and drops that into the accordion case. The noise of the nuts tumbling into the case seems to rouse the rito, or perhaps by coincidence he opens his amber-green eyes.

"Greetings, traveller." The rito's rich baritone soothes her exhaustion with the euphony of his voice alone. He speaks with an unplaceable accent that tilts the corners of his words just so, as though his song could rise into the clouds at any moment, as though the rito could take to the heavens without a single look back. "Would you care for a song, passed down by generations in this land?"

Link dips her head in acceptance.

"Excellent. I apologise for any mistranslations on my part; all errors are mine own. The Ballad of the Sealing War has passed through the mouths and memories of nearly every people in the old kingdom of our Hyrule. You hear, now, a reconstructed verse thought to closely resemble the original, translated from Old Hyrulean, to Faronese, to Tabanch, to Eldic. Without further ado..."

He lifts his right wing from the accordion. The singer regards the skies with a gaze so heavy that Link expects the clouds to fall. He hums a low, low note that vibrates visibly in his chest. Singing up the octave, he raises his hand in tandem until he holds the highest tone, feathers outstretched. His voice thrums to harmonise with the very air. Even the passersby still their course to listen.

He sings:

"O Din, grant me Your Power, truths I seek."
"O Nayru, may Your Wisdom freely ring;

"O Farore, Your Courage lets me speak;

"O Erito, lend me Your Voice to sing!"

The final note dies down. The singer bows his head as his wings return to the manuals.

The melody lifts her from her feet. Once more the bellows rise and fall with the whisper of the wind, the song of the heart. Humming with the melody, the singer waits, and waits, and then lends his voice to that of his instrument until both sing as one.

"O Our Hyrule, O Kingdom blessed by Three,

"the Golden Light of Earth, of Sky, of Sea,

"the shadowed Malice chokes Your sacred lands,

"so ravaged by Calamity's dark hands.

"Yet Hope survives: the Princess and her Knight,

"two souls of Courage sent by skyward light.

"whose Goddess-blesséd blood and sacred sword

"repel the vile Malice and its horde.

"I sing of Wisdom's song and Power's blade.

"O Goddess, may their Story never fade!

"For Heroes ours, I sing that you may know,

"the Sealing War, ten thousand years ago.

"O Our Hyrule, O Kingdom blessed by Three,

"long lived in peace and in prosperity,

"yet Seven knew that Malice would arise,

"and so prepared for War against Demise.

"The Seven raised an animated force

"to aid our Heroes on their destined course.

"To match the monsters spun of Maliced spawn,

"they forged an army of automaton

"and built behemoths four whose hearts did shine

"with holy power, named the Beasts Divine.

"To guide each Beast, a Champion pledged his life
"to guard the Kingdom through this darkest strife.
"The Princess with her Knight and Champions four "awaited fate's predestined Sealing War.
"When Malice struck, its hate eclipsed the sun,
"yet bright with Hope, Hyrule stood strong as one.
"The Guardians turned back the monstrous blight,
"as Beasts Divine unleashed their holy light.
"Though Malice gnashed its jaws of sable rage,
"Hyrule's own heart became its curséd cage.
"With sacred sword, the Knight struck towards the skies.
"With blesséd blood, the Princess sealed Demise.
"For Heroes now I sang, that you may know,
"the Sealing War, ten thousand years ago.
"O Golden Light of Earth, of Sky, of Sea.
"O Our Hyrule, O Kingdom blessed by Three."

The accordion and the singer resonate together on the final tone. The crowd that has gathered around the singer bursts into applause. The singer bows. While the audience disperses, he offers Link a warm smile.

"Thank you ever so much for listening, traveller. Well met." Kass dips his head. "I am Kass, travelling minstrel. I collect songs and stories from the old kingdom of our Hyrule over, so that they may be remembered when all who know them have passed. Even if Hyrule no longer survives, its memories live on in song" Link thanks him, to which he responds with another smile. "If you should care to hear another song, seek me out, traveller. I hope that we will once more cross paths along the road." He rests his hands upon the manuals once more. "Take care, and may the light illuminate your path."

The waves of the crowd sweep Link away from the minstrel. She allows the passersby to carry her forward through the large town. Shops on street corners advertise every kind of product she could think of and many more that she could never. The words, the bright signs, the merchants yelling of their wares, the excited shoppers bartering back just as loudly—

Link uses Ilia's bulk to carve herself a path out of the throng. Her heart has grabbed her ribcage and started to shake as though attempting to free itself of a prison. The blood roars in her ears.

She closes her eyes the instant she extracts herself from the crowd. She breathes.

She trots Ilia to the stable at the edge of Medigo. A woven horsehead with great painted discs for eyes makes the building stand apart from the rest of the town. Link lets her loose to munch on the grass outside while she rests her legs in the shade of a weathered tree.
With the sun dipping down in the horizon, she begins to consider what to have for supper. She makes a grasswhistle in the meantime. Its tinny sound brings a smile to her face as she fails to produce any meaningful music.

"Ho there. I don't suppose you're planning to take your horse to Death Mountain."

The grasswhistle fizzes out with a noise like a deflating balloon. Link spits the blade of grass from her mouth and sits up to stare blankly at the woman who stands over her with crossed arms. She wears the white-hatted uniform of the stable workers, her pointed ears lifting up the sides.

"I also see that you have neither registered your horse nor gotten her fitted for a saddle."

"Can I register here?"

"Sure. It's only twenty rupees, you know."

"Ah," Link responds, "that's why I haven't registered, then."

The woman arches an eyebrow. Link explains her lack of rupees, and the woman—Gaile, she says; Gaile of Medigo—suggests that they also deal in monster parts, jewels, and alcoholic milk if necessary.

"Alcoholic milk...?" she echoes.

Gaile shakes her head. "Never you mind. C'mon. Let's get you set up."

The stable workers fit Ilia with a fine leather saddle and a durable brindle. They affix horseshoes to her hooves. On a wooden table outside of the stable at which Link and Gaile sit, Gaile sorts the monster parts Link has brought. "This'll be enough to board her here for a month or so if you've got business on the mountain."

Link nods.

"Well, you know. If you want to go to the mountain, and don't like to spend a month burning alive—I can never tell with folks these days—you'll want to pack a couple of fireproof elixirs." Gaile enters the stable for a moment. She returns with a box full of large glass vials, swirling with a dark reddish concoction. "They'll keep your body sweating and free from flame, guaranteed as long as the effects last, and they don't come cheap."

"Could I...cook for you instead?"

Gaile's eyebrows, already in a perpetually arched state from Link's ignorance about seemingly every aspect of horsekeeping, threaten to bend so much that they break. "Are you tryin' to flirt with me now?"

Link touches her chin.

Gaile rubs her temples. "All right. I don't want your death on my hands, and I can see you're going up whether you have the elixirs or not." Link bobs her head. "If you help me cook up the next vat of elixir, I'll give you some for free, but only because I can tell your horse likes you."

Link leaps to her feet. She assumes a stance as though about to launch into a race.

Gaile frowns. "Just...come on."

She gestures for Link to follow her into the stable. The stench of horses rolls over her all at once, thick enough to make her eyes water. The hay, the feed, the warm bodies of the horses, the manure, the faint trace of milk.

A flash whirls through her vision. A girl with red hair. A girl in a sky-blue dress with a violet sash around her waist, who holds a basket of cucco eggs half her size, her blue eyes sparkling, her brown skin almost golden in the light of afternoon. A girl who sticks out her pinky, who makes Link promise, promise to...

"Ho there. You planning to help, or should I take back my generosity after all?"

Link snaps from her reverie. Gaile pushes her through a beaded curtain into a tiny galley taken up by a massive pot and two great wooden crates. In front of the pot sits a platform on a spring, with a dial showing three colours in order of green, blue, and red; the thin metal needle points at the base of the green. A glass hourglass that reaches to her knee rests by the platform. The stink radiating from both crates—one of ash and smoke, the other of rotting meat—could keel her over then and there.

"Here's what you gotta do. First: fill up this pot with water. There's a couple'a buckets here, and you can get the water from the spring out back. Second: skin the black lizards from there." She indicates the first crate. "Weigh them there. You want to enough that the arrow reaches red. Load them up five times and put 'em in the pot." She demonstrates how to skin a lizard. Link watches her discard the guts into the second crate of rotting meat, leaving only the outer layer of skin. Vomit wells up in her throat; she swallows it down. "Third: weigh out three loads of talons or horns. Doesn't matter which. They're behind the pot. Don't put them in yet." Gaile points to the hourglass. "Fourth: steep the lizards in the pot until the hourglass is done. Then put in the first load of monster bits. Turn the hourglass over again. Do that for the other two loads. That'll take all night, so I hope you rested up. Did you get all that?"

Link blinks.

Gaile exhales. "Listen. You mess this up, and you have to pay for all of the ruined product, you hear me?"

She bobs her head.

"Good. I'll see you in the morning, Din help us all. And don't come crying to me if you go up in flames."

Link scribbles down the instructions as best she can remember in whatever language comes first to her hand. Not Central Hyrulean or Necludan, but something for sure. Wielding the bucket over her shoulder, she makes the run from the spring to the pot ten or twenty times. Skinning the fireproof lizards takes far longer than she expected. Without practice of the deft motion with which Gaile bisected the lizard in a final slice, Link struggles to flip out the guts. By the final batch of five, however, she wields the knife nearly as quickly as Gaile did.

She turns over the hourglass, which weighs—she feels—heavier than herself.
The night draws long.

Whenever the fire runs low, she adds in a log of wood from the tall pile behind the pot.

Perched on the edge of a short stool, Link plays games with herself to keep herself awake. She accounts for the scars on her abdomen, her limbs, her back where she can reach and pictures a story for each. She closes her eyes to re-envision the snatches of memories that have whispered through her, brought on by scents she knows.

And then, the one memory that stands clearest in her mind.

The woman in black, whom someone in the memory of that party of six named Impa. Impa must be a common sheikah name, she notes to herself, reflecting on the other Impa she knows, of Kakariko. Her thoughts drift to the rest of the party. The hylian girl with the golden hair, with eyes of green—or maybe blue; she doesn't remember—and skin of light brown. The blue-feathered rito, the brown-rocked goron, the dark-skinned gerudo girl with the green hairband, the red-scaled zora, and then herself: Link. The talk of the shrines, of the duty of the girl with the golden hair, of fate isn't fair.

Perhaps not a memory at all, but a dream. A dream that she has conjured up for herself.

She nods off. She slips from the stool. At least banging her head against the floor bids her rise again.

When she adds the final batch of lizalfos talons she notices the firewood running low. She pokes in another log to be sure, then bolts out from the stable.

The sky has begun to blush with dawn when she returns with armfuls of hastily gathered firewood gathered through the miracle of sheikah slate bombs. The last few grains drop in the hourglass.

She lets the fire die.

Curling up on the floor of the galley, Link lowers her eyelids, and the darkness takes her.

—

Fireproof Elixir (low fireproofing for 03:10) - fireproof lizard, lizalfos talon

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Another thank you to my most wonderful beta reader, Emma.

Thus begins the character arc of Link feeling like a stranger in her own body. With regards to the combat sequence in this and later chapters, I really want to drive home why Link, well, is one who ends up everything that she does in Delicious in Wilds; I don't know about you, but I would be unable to accomplish half of what Link does.

Completing a shrine in Breath of the Wild brings Link's hearts to full, so I represented this in Delicious in Wilds by the natural healing of the shrine. Don't worry; there's an actual explanation for the healing later, which ties into something already implied about the shrines.

Because the King of the Zora was known as King Zora in A Link to the Past, I have rendered Dorephan's title as the King Zora, and Sidon's as the Prince Zora.

In the Japanese, gorons tend to end their sentences with the word goro. For the Eldic language (Eldic being the adjectival form of Eldin, as Tabanch for Tabantha or Lanayrish for Lanayru), I decided to have this reflected by making Eldic speakers literally end their sentences with goro. The followers of Goro-goro view this as a constant and gentle reminder of their deity's influence on their lives. Since I "translate" all language to English, I don't include the word goro at the end of every line, but there it is. For the curious reader, goro in Eldic sign language is rendered by bringing your right hand up straight at around chin level, the thumb pointed towards the signer, and quickly curling your fingers into a circle twice.

The town of Medigo is named about Medigoron from Ocarina of Time and Majora's Mask, and replaces the Foothill Stable from Breath of the Wild.

Regarding Kass's song, the English lyrics to the song in Breath of the Wild are terrible (I'm not sure if they're better in the Japanese, but I hope so): they lack rhythm or flow, and some of the rhymes are insulting. Therefore, I chose to rewrite it from scratch in iambic pentameter. I'm sure that someone out there could do a much better job than I. Feel free to say it out loud in rhythm; I actually have a melody that goes along with what I wrote, but there's no place for me to record it in the fic. Of course, I also adjusted the lyrics to better fit with the changed lore of Delicious in Wilds, but many of the lyrics are simply rewritten versions of the appropriate lines from the original in Breath of the Wild. Though Kass uses the word his for the Champions, note that this is from the assumption that heroes ought to be men, just as we saw with the story of the hero of Fort Hateno.

The virtue of Erito is Voice, not as in literal voice, but as in self-expression.

Alcoholic milk, of course, is an old Zelda stand-by, as seen in the Milk Bars of Majora's Mask, Phantom Hourglass, and A Link Between Worlds. Breath of the Wild even had a joke with Link asking for milk in the bar at the Noble Canteen. I couldn't not include alcoholic milk. Of course, alcoholic milk is a real-life thing: I've personally purchased kumis (I'm not actually sure how to write it in English?) at my local deli. It's usually only about 1-3% alcohol; the Delicious in Wilds version can be significantly more alcoholic.

I wanted to make the process of elixir-brewing significantly different from the process of cooking meals, and I hope that I succeeded.

Ah! And with regards to Zelda's design in Delicious in Wilds, I was bothered by the world of difference between the design of Zelda and her father. Obviously, some children do not resemble their parents, but the degree to which Zelda does not resemble King Rhoam is truly incredible. In particular, while King Rhoam is rather brown-skinned, Zelda herself is incredibly pale; even if her mother were the palest of the pale, Zelda herself should have darker skin by genetics. This reminds me of similar issues in The Wind Waker, wherein Tetra's skin becomes pale upon becoming Princess Zelda. In Delicious in Wilds, I have opted to make Zelda more resemble King Rhoam; she has facial features similar to his, including a wide nose, and shares a more similar skin tone, which I describe as light brown.

To everyone who has read this far: thank you from the bottom of my heart. I'm glad to have you along with me on this journey. Next: to Eldin!

midna's ass. 3 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: The fight scene here is both really funny and really good as a fight scene.

I really love Kass. He's the best. The song rewrite is really impressive.

Emma. 3 September 2017.
Poultry Curry

Chapter Summary

Leaving the horse in the stable at Medigo and fireproofing the chef's belongings, the travelling chef begins the trek towards the capital city of Eldin. Along the way, the chef saves a young couple from lizalfos and travels with the couple to the village of Zubora, where the couple rewards the chef with gifts of food: rice, spice, and everything nice.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

A weight on her shoulder. Undulating, as if pushed and pulled by waves breaking over her back. Then the sting of a slap.

Link's eyes open to an unfamiliar ceiling. The stench of the stable galley fills her nose all too readily. Two people look down at her: a goron with a tattoo of an equine figure over his abdomen, and a dark-haired man of crimson eyes and pointed ears. The goron extends a beefy hand to help her up. The dark-haired man thanks her for her help in making the batch of fireproof elixir. "...even if Gaile was supposed to do it herself, but I will honour her agreement to you."

They call themselves Rogor and Ozunda, co-owners of the Foothill Stable. Ozunda, the man with the red eyes and pointed ears, grants her a waxy-red wooden box of fireproof elixirs. "You'll want to take one every twelve hours."

Rogor bumps the palm of his left hand with his right fist. "That clothing you got: is it fireproof?" the goron booms; his words take up the entirety of the stable interior. Link hears one of the horses neigh. "I can't help but take pity on ya. The elixirs'll keep ya body from burnin' up, but ya clothes'll still catch fire if they're not sealed with fireproofing paste. I'll get ya some, on the house."

"I can pay," she insists, yet Rogor shakes his head.

"One of my own stablehands pulled a fast one on ya. A night's pay in the stink's worth way more than a box'f elixirs. Lemme help ya out." He produces a pot of a thick red wax. "Here is it. One jar'f fireproofing paste. Homemade." Rogor instructs her to coat the outside and inside of all of her clothing and items with the paste to form a waxy seal. The paste will not last forever but will need to be re-applied about once a week, he warns her, and will wash away at the slightest hint of water or dampness. "Yeah, the paste won't feel too cozy when it hardens, but it'll keep ya stuff from burning up 'till ya can get some fireproofed threads, ya get it?"

She gets it. Link excuses herself to the woods outside of Medigo. She removes her clothes, one article at a time, to smear a thin layer of red wax over every square centimetre, digging the paste into the hems and stitches with her nails. Stretching the fabric, she lifts her clothing to the light to check for gaps in the fireproof seal.

After the wax hardens, she slips the clothes back on and grimaces. The waxy coating rubs uncomfortably against her skin, like the uneven surface of an unfired clay pot. Instead of moving with her limbs and settling on her frame, her clothing—undershirt, tunic, undergarments, trousers, and socks—now retains its shape as firmly as ceramic.

Link coats the inside and outside of her satchel, the paraglider, the telescope, the quiver. She regards the wooden arrows that she spent so much time carving and waxes them over as well. She smears paste over a handful of apples and bananas to wash off and eat on the road, except for one. Then she finishes off the remainder of the unwaxed food in her satchel.

With preparations complete, Link returns to the stable. She finds Ilia's stall at the very end. When she approaches the stall, Ilia whinnies in her direction. Cooing, Link extends the apple to her.

She commits to memory the feeling of Ilia's soft lips browsing her palm for the apple.

Her own memory.

She strokes Ilia's forehead along the white spot against her black coat. "I'll be back for you, I promise. The stable owners here will take good care of you."

Ilia's ears flick downwards. Link rests her forehead against Ilia's for a moment.

Then she shoulders her burdens once more.

She avoids the centre of the town and instead takes the long way around the outskirts of Medigo. She inhales sharply at the all-too-familiar sight of a shrine on a hill behind Medigo. Carefully she nears, but unlike the shrine of Hateno, this shrine has no offerings at its base and no signs of worship or use. Link glances between the shrine and Medigo. Sweat beads down her shoulder blades, and not merely from the heat of the climbing sun.

Link enters the lift. The shrine proceeds smoothly. The challenges teach her another set of skills to use with the magnesis rune. She marvels as the rune's usefulness. When she quits the shrine and takes the lift up, she holds her breath, but no one rushes to arrest her.

She sneaks off away from Medigo before anyone notices the change in the shrine's appearance.

The volcano of Death Mountain takes up the majority of the sky as a constant fixture by which to orient herself. As she passes along the cliffside overlooking Cephla Lake, the shimmer of something orange down below gives her pause. Link cautiously nears the edge of the cliff and looks down.

Another shrine.

The second shrine she has found today.

Opening up the paraglider—taking effort to avoid breaking the hardening seal of fireproofing paste—Link glides down towards the lower level of ground. She keeps close to the wall of the cliff in case the paraglider breaks again; a sudden dip in the waters of the lake would not spontaneously give Rogor enough compassion to give her a second jar of free paste.

The fireproofing proves more immediately useful than expected. The entire shrine appears to hold a theme of fire, with every puzzle or challenging forcing her to reconsider her assumptions of how and for what she can use flames. Magnetising a metal lantern hanging from a cord at the ceiling, Link attempts to swing it into a bed of dried, flammable material that covers the obvious entrance to the next chamber, alongside most of the floor. Yet no matter how she times her swings, the lantern does not quite reach the flammable. After enough tries that Link has started to smack her forehead against her palm, she manages to bump the metal against the flammable material.
Except only the metal bumps; the fire does not catch.

She sets the slate back into her pouch and stands back. The lantern pendulums back and forth. The cord's angle grows smaller until it hangs still once more.

Link touches her chin. She taps the toe of her boot against the floor. Then she grins to herself.

Notching her bow, she looses a waxed arrow into the cord.

The arrow hits but does not cut the cord.

Link steps forward to pluck the arrow from the floor. She scrapes the waxy coating of fireproofing paste from the head and runs a finger over the point. The prick of blood on her fingertip confirms its sharpness.

She notches the same arrow.

The cord breaks. The lantern falls. The impact sets the flammable material ablaze.

Link pumps a fist into the air right as the fire spreads to the material directly beneath her feet. She scrambles backwards. At the safety of the periphery, she checks her boots: no fire, no ash, no smoke, only the orange coating of dried fireproofing paste.

Whenever she comes back from the mountains with entire barrels full of monster parts, she will have to pay back Rogor a hundredfold.

The flammable material burns quickly. The ash gives off a strangely pleasant fragrance. She scoops up a handful of soot and takes a closer sniff.

By the time she finishes coughing out the inhaled dust, she finds herself face to face with a mechanical creature. A guardian.

The words of the Medigo minstrel's ballad whirl around her: the army of automata. The Divine Beasts. The shrines, ten thousand years old. The instructions in a language she does not know, despite having understood most of the languages she has come across, from Central Hyrulean to Necludan to Eldic.

And the slate, built of the same material as the shrines and as the guardians, too smooth to climb.

Instructions for a hero. For the hero of ten thousand years ago. Trials for him to overcome.

The guardian's beeping grounds her. It attacks her not through the blue bolts of fire-light that she has seen from the other guardians nor with the strange blue weapons, but with a nozzle from which it spews forth fire. She makes short work of the guardian, circling swiftly around the automaton and slicing through its limbs with the halberd. The guardian plops over with an almost comically exaggerated motion. She stabs the pointed tip of the halberd head through the automaton's eye.

The guardian ceases to move. The lights fade.

She takes the guardian's body apart. Purah's description of rare parts leads her to shift through the inner workings. At the heart of the guardian glows an orange sphere about size of an apple. She reaches inside, mindful of the gears that could crush her fingers, and tries to rip it out.

It does not budge.

Link braces her boots against the guardian's chassis. She grips the heart with both hands, inhales, and pulls upwards as she pushes down with her legs. She can feel the muscles of her back strain up and down.

The heart begins to shift. One by one the cords leading out from it sever. She strains harder.

It pops out, and her momentum pops her entirely off of the guardian to land on her rear.

Link bursts out laughing. She lifts the heart—bits of grey cord still emerging from the spokes—up as if to show the glowing orange sphere to the world. Then she drops the automaton's heart into her satchel and moves on to the end of the shrine.

She watches the instructions at the end of the shrine. Though she cannot understand the voices, she can see figure demonstrating the many uses of fire.

Perhaps the shrines meant to teach the hero of ten thousand years ago. Or perhaps the shrines meant to teach others, not merely a single hero. The song that Kass sang—the Ballad of the Sealing War—could be nothing more than a song.

After all, she has passed through the shrines. And if the Seven from the song, whoever those people were, had built the shrines for the hero, then she—not the hero, never the hero, even if she has inadvertently stolen the former hero's body—could never have completed even the first.

She may as well give up on the shrines entirely.

Yet the shrines do change their colours from orange to blue, and the writer of the letter—and Lady Impa, and Purah—have all tasked her with overcoming as many shrines as she can.

That reasoning would not suffice. Yet, more importantly, to her, the shrines are...fun.

For her enjoyment of the puzzles alone, for the smile she bears upon rising up to the challenge, she resolves to continue seeking out the shrines whenever she comes upon them.

Climbing back up the face of the cliff exhausts her. She lies down in the sparse yellow grass for a brief respite. Her eyes close, just for a moment.

She awakens at night. Her head pounds for dehydration, and she drains her water-skin. Link shakes her head at herself.

By the light of the gibbous moon, she treks towards the maw of Death Mountain. She fills her water-skin with the warm water of Lake Intenoch, careful not to let the lake wash away the fireproofing paste on her clothing. When she tastes the water, her features contort and she spits the liquid back up. It carries the stink of sulphur and the metallic tang, thick as blood, of iron and copper.. But she has no other water to drink. Squeezing shut her eyes, Link forces the sulphur-warm water down her throat.

The inside of her mouth tastes like she had sucked on an old metal brooch. She licks the back of her hand in a failed effort to rid her tongue of the bitterness.

Link rubs the back of her head. She has a long, long journey up the Eldic mountains ahead of her. Yet Lady Impa asked her to report on the gorons, on their capital of Darunia, and she has nothing else to do with her existence but disappoint for wearing a hero's skin.

She sets herself up the trail. No sooner has she passed under the second arch of stone beyond Medigo than a lurid beeping speeds her up into a run. Link looks over her shoulder to the right only to see a giant guardian—stretching some eight metres into the sky and thirty paces wide—scuttling about on far too many leg. It twists its head this way and that with a sound like grinding stones.

Its singular eye comes into view. The guardian ceases to move. Then, all at once, the automaton hastens towards her, its too many legs a flurry of chaotic movement that tears up the rock beneath it.

Her mouth dries.

Link sprints forward on the trail. Behind her she can hear the guardian gaining in its rampage of claw on stone. Snapping her head right and left, she sees only water on either side: Lake Intenoch falling away beyond the right-hand cliffs, Gero Pond gushing steaming hot spring water up on her on her left. She nearly trips over herself as she veers left off the trail. Link shakes off her belongings as she runs, tears off her clothes to leave them behind, and dives into Gero Pond.

The heat of the water rips a scream from her throat, not enough to boil away her skin but enough to punch hot needles of pain through her flesh. She forces herself to stay under the cover of water. Link tracks the guardian's movements by listening to the sounds of its beeps and the clangs of its steps, distorted from the liquid around her ears. It scurries back and forth along the shore of Gero Pond but does not step into the water.

Just like the guardian from one of the first shrines, which broke down when it fell into the water, the automaton cannot pursue her into the pond.

Her lungs throb from lack of air. She waits as long as she can bear. When darkness eats away at the corners of her vision, she rears up. Her head breaks the surface of the pond. She inhales.

She dives back down.

After some time, the beeping fades. Silence. Link surfaces again. She climbs out onto the shore. Her skin has turned a violent red from the steam bath, and she lies down, panting, by the pond. She does not have to wait long for her body to dry: the water vaporises almost immediately in the scorching arid air of Eldin.

Link finds her discarded clothes and belongings and slips them back on. She notes with satisfaction that nothing has caught on fire yet.

Along the path, she meets a pair of fellow travellers besieged by a fire-breathing lizalfos. She aims her boomerang. The metallic blade slices into the lizalfos's skull and shatters into shrapnel. The lizalfos shrieks as the very air ignites the unprotected flesh of the open wound. She rushes the lizalfos as the monster stumbles about—its talons grasping the sharp piece of boomerang still sticking out of the crown of its head—and pulls the metal out in a thin mist of vaporised blood. Link skids to a halt beside the lizalfos. She chops into its left thigh with the blade of the halberd. The lizalfos lets out a guttural cry. It flails a hand at her. Link blocks its arm with the handle of the halberd and carves out its throat.

Crouching beside the body, Link works rapidly to cut off its tail. The flesh of the stump sizzles. She coats the open wound with fireproofing paste and wraps the tail in her cloak. Before the flames can burn up the fleshy inner parts of the lizalfos's horns and talons, Link covers those in fireproofing paste as well.

At last she shoves the cloaked bundle of monster parts into her satchel, closes the satchel, and exhales. The hot air stings against the inside of her lungs.

The travellers thank her profusely, one a burnt umbre goron with a cap of white crystals growing from the centre of his head like a six-fingered hand, the second wearing a barrel of blue armour that covers the traveller's face. After draining a vial of fireproof elixir through the holes in her helmet, the traveller removes the face-plate to reveal herself as a tall hylian woman of pale skin and thick golden hair. Elisa, of the village of Mutoh at the base of Ulri Mountain, and her spouse, Blaryd of Zubora.

"As our deepest thanks," Blaryd says, in Necludan rather than Eldic, "allow us to do something for you, stranger."

Link shakes her head. Elisa insists, and Link relents to Blaryd's offer of making her a proper Eldic meal at the next village over. She walks with the travellers up the dusty road. Whenever the heat of her skin begins to rise from uncomfortable to physical pain, she downs another elixir. Elisa gently suggests that Link should consider investing in fireproof armour as Elisa herself has.

"I don't have the rupees for armour."

Elisa thumps towards northern Eldin. She speaks in Necludan as well, although her words lilt with the rock-rolling rumbles of an Eldic accent. "It's expensive in the Eldic Foothills, but much cheaper in Darunia. Cost of transport and all that noise."

Blaryd pounds his palm against his thigh. "And those in Medigo know that they can force people going into the mountains to buy either elixirs or armour. It's no wonder that they sell it so high. Bunch of thieves."

"Now, now, sweetie." Elisa pats her spouse's shoulder. He beams at her. "So tell us about yourself, stranger."

She tells them about herself. Link, on the road to Darunia to see how the gorons—and other inhabitants of the city—are doing, sent by Lady Impa of Kakariko. Elisa arches her eyebrows at Link's mission.

"Just to see how the people of Darunia doing?" she inquires.

Link bobs her head.

Blaryd claps her on the back so strongly that she flies forward into the stone. While Elisa chastises her spouse, Link picks herself up, rubbing her cheeks and feeling the scratch-marks the road has left against her face. Elisa apologises on her spouse's behalf but Link shakes her head.

"It's okay. I don't mind."

Elisa explains the purpose of their own journey. Though the couple lives in the not-hot-enough-for-the-air-itself-to-combust village of Mutoh for Elisa's sake, the two have wanted a child for some time. Blaryd's blush reddens his rocky cheeks; he hides his face with his hands as Elisa speaks, which causes Elisa to smile for some reason Link cannot fathom and stroke her spouse's shoulder. Elisa elaborates: gorons craft their children of molten stone, forming them with their own hands and breathing life into them with the blessing of the Goddess Goro-goro. The process can only take place in the volcanic forges of Eldin, guided by the watchful eyes and skillful hands of the Goddess. "So we're going to my sweetie's home village. A dream come true, isn't it?"

Blaryd shuffles his feet nervously. "You don't need to tell that to everyone we come across, cutie-pie."

"Oh, but I want the world to know, sweetie!" Elisa turns towards Link. "You understand me, don't you?" Link looks back at her with an unsteady blankness of gaze. "You see? He gets it!"
"I'm a girl," she signs in response, still sporting that unsteady blankness.

"Oh!" Elisa claps her hand to her mouth. "I'm so sorry. I'm used to Eldic too much. Call all people he in that language, you know." She twitters a laugh to herself. Blaryd coughs. "You looked so scratched up that I couldn't imagine a girl putting herself through that..." Her voice trails off. Blaryd coughs again, more loudly this time. "But I'm not sure how I made that mistake, looking at you now."

Link stays blank and quiet on the remainder of their journey together.

The village of Zubora overlooks Medingo Pool. The village sprang up around a vein of luminous stone, as Blaryd explains on the path to his family's home. Mostly gorons live here, alongside a few aspiring sheikah and hylian miners, and a pair of zora geologists who live at the northern end of the village investigating the quality and growth of the vein. "Or something like that. I don't know much about rocks myself."

Blaryd introduces his brother Jibo and father Kragg, who embrace Blaryd with tight squeezes and carefully pat Elisa on the head. Link stands in the doorway of the house carved into the hillside and taps the toe of her boot against the ground. Despite the overbearing heat, her chest aches with a strange empty cold.

The family welcomes her, hails her as a hero who saved the couple's life, and asks her a thousand and one questions. Blaryd defends her from their prying inquiries; he takes Link to sit in the kitchen at stone table.

"And time to make you what I promised." She offers to help cook but he denies her. "You can watch if you want. I'll make the meal myself. You've done enough help for today."

Link props her chin up in the palm of her right hand. From the open window of the kitchen, she can see Medingo Pool itself. A lake of lava, bubbling up so bright that her eyes hurt to look at it. She fingers the case of fireproof elixirs in her satchel.

Blaryd cooks this and that. She cranes her neck but can barely see snatches of the stove over his broad shoulders. A red-feathered bird. Rice on fire. A pot of crimson powder.

A heavenly fragrance hot enough to bring tears to her eyes.

When Blaryd finishes at last and gifts her his meal, Link holds the bowl of ostrich rice curry with both hands. Blaryd provides a fork. Yellow rice, lightly salted, mixed with roasted slivers of poultry that somehow does not burst into flames, and a red-brown sauce—a curry—that brings the scent of a burning fire. Not the smoke or the ash but the fire itself, like the crackle in the air just before a lightning strike.

The first mouthful of curry jolts through her. She has eaten this before. Someone has made this for her—

A goron. A goron, tall and broad, wearing a sash of blue. She recognises his voice from the dream by the campfire. She stood beside him on a cleared brown field marked with white chalk. He swung around a giant two-handed grey something that could break a boulder in a single thrust.

"Now, li'l buddy, don't feel bad if you can't get the hang of it. Soon you'll wield it like a champ, eh? Everyone'll see you and say, 'That girl's the hero for sure.'"

Link extended a hand to take the weapon. The rocky handle scraped the insides of her already calloused palms. The instant the goron let go of the handle, the weapon dropped to the ground from which she strained to lift it.

"I fail to see the purpose of this," injected the blue-feathered rito, having leaned against the fence surrounding the training court. "She's got the sword. She never has to use anything else. Just swing that sword around a couple of times and the incarnation of evil Calamitous One itself runs away with its tail between its legs. You know, I don't even know why we're here, seeing as she can chase away all the big baddies by herself." Giving the rito a sharp look, the goron grunted. Link looked on blankly, the rito's words soaring far over her head. The rito shrugged his wings. "I'll be here all week, folks."

The goron rested his hand on Link's shoulders, his fingers alone stretching the span of her shoulder blades. "Don't listen to him. Hey, I know what might make you feel better, lil' buddy. You ever had some proper Eldic curry?" Link shook his head. The goron rumbled out a chuckle. "You're gonna love this, lil' buddy!"

"I don't...think that she's listening to you."

Elisa's voice focuses Link's gaze onto the hylian wife and goron spouse sitting across from her at the table, the former having joined during Link's reverie.

Blaryd shrugs. "I was just asking you if you liked it. It's my cutie-pie's favourite recipe." Nodding enthusiastically, Link raises the bowl to her mouth and shovels in curry at the speed of fork. Blaryd snorts. "Don't choke on it."

She licks her lips, the fork, and the bowl free of curry before giving them back. Blaryd covers his face with his hands at her stream of compliments about his cooking.

"You'll make him erupt like a volcano if you carry on like that," Elisa jokes. Link thanks them again for the meal.

Blaryd gives her a parting gift of hylian rice in a fireproof pouch. "If you're ever in Zubora again, feel free to come by. My father and Jibo said they'd be happy to see you."

When Link leaves Zubora, facing to the south for the first time since she embarked onto the spine of Eldin, she sees the orange-golden tower spiralling up into the clouds on the other side of Medingo Pool. Closing her eyes, she tips her head back to drain another fireproof elixir. Not even the taste of smoke can overpower the delicious fire of the curry.

She breathes in the air of the mountainside, itself on fire, coursing through her body to set every muscle, tendon, and sinew ablaze with the promise of adventure.

Adventure.

Link whoops out loud. She laughs at the joy of it all. She takes the first step of every step thereafter.

—

Poultry Curry (four hearts) - goron spice, hylian rice, raw bird drumstick, rock salt

Chapter End Notes
Gaile pulled a bit of a Tom Sawyer on Link. Fireproof elixirs shouldn't be that expensive. When I first went into Eldin, I spent the journey eating food every few minutes on my poor three hearts.

Although it makes "sense" (in the magical, fantasy term) how fireproof elixir might render one's body fireproof, it does not appear like fireproofing should extend to clothing, especially as Breath of the Wild specifically has wooden weapons and so on catch fire. As a result, I introduce fireproofing paste, which hardens into a temporary fireproof seal. Note that this is vulnerable to dampness, including sweat!

We never see how gorons reproduce in Breath of the Wild as far as I'm aware. I decided to make the gorons quite literally fashion their own children from stone and eat rocks to embiggen themselves.

The village of Mutoh is named after the leader of the carpenters from Ocarina of Time, Majora's Mask, Oracle of Ages, and The Minish Cap, as well as King Mutoh of the Cobble Kingdom from Phantom Hourglass. The village of Zubora is named after one of the smiths of the Snowhead Mountain Smithy from Majora's Mask, where they take their time to make a good point.

The Eldic language has three main sets of pronouns. Firstly, there is the set of pronouns for all inanimate objects, including non-animated rocks, which is translated as the equivalent of "its/its" in Central Hyrulean; secondly, there is the set of pronouns to refer to elevated beings and spirits as the Golden Goddesses, which is translated as the equivalent of "she/her" in Central Hyrulean due to the usual hylian depiction of the Goddesses as female; thirdly, there is the set of pronouns for all animated beings, which is translated as the equivalent of "he/him" in Central Hyrulean, since some hylian scholar had to make a decision about how to refer to gorons.

Incidentally, something similar happened to the gerudo of Parapa (the Gerudo Desert), who have a single cultural gender rendered as "she/her" because the outwards expression more closely resembles hylian expectations of how women rather than men should appear. Speaking of the gerudo, the Parapan tongue itself has a complicated weave of pronouns indicating different levels of formality. They have one set of pronouns referring to deities such as the Goddesses, and they have another set of pronouns exclusively used to refer to their current leader, known as the Makeela, traditionally translated as King but nowadays as Queen. Because early hylian scholars used "she/her" to refer to the average gerudo person, they took to using "he/him" for the ruler of Parapa, which led to the misconception that the only man among the gerudo is their king. This is entirely untrue. As for why I renamed the Gerudo Desert, I don't really like to say: the zora of Lanayru, the gorons of Eldin, the rito of Tabanthy, and the gerudo of, uh, Gerudo. Therefore, I substituted the name Parapa, which comes from The Adventure of Link. But we'll talk more of the gerudo once we get to Vah Naboris.

Necludan does have gendered pronouns (or, more accurately, gendered words, so that Elisa was more saying "[that] boy" than "he"). Elisa is used to speaking in Eldic but switched to Necludan to speak to Link, since Link seemed to her and Blaryd like a foreigner. I think too much about language. It's irrelevant to the story which is why I don't mention it much in the fic, but oh baby, do I think a lot about language.

Link is mistaken for a boy for in this chapter due to her, well, bloodied and soot-covered appearance. She doesn’t much "dress like a girl should" while travelling. Though, as you can see, it does unfortunately dampen her mood for obvious reasons.

I changed Daruk's nickname for Link to li'l buddy to avoid, you know, having Daruk call Link a man.

Another great thank-you to my readers. Next chapter we have another interesting flashback coming up, this time with another pre-Great-Calamity friend of Link's, who was actually mentioned briefly in the ninth chapter. Note that since the mark of Sageru is red hair, everyone with red hair is gerudo, which is why that certain character has brown skin in Delicious in Wilds rather than pale as in her initial appearance in the franchise.

midna's ass. 03 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: Fun fact: This chapter was the thing that got me to try curry for the first time.

The author manages to do an incredible thing in this series, making me genuinely enjoy Eldin. Quite a feat, since I DESPISE it in Breath of the Wild.

Emma. 03 September 2017.
Curry Rice

Chapter Summary

Continuing through Eldin in search of somewhere to cook the rice and spice received from the couple the chef assisted, the travelling chef comes upon an abandoned village destroyed by monsters; helps defend another village from a rage of lizalfos and furnixes; and gains employment as a sellsword protecting two merchants' wagon of sapphire on their trek to Darunia. The fog of memory parts to reveal name of the the girl with the violet sash whom the chef recalled earlier: Marin.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

As Link sets the slate into the face of the pedestal, her mouth already salivates at the prospect of a meal atop the Tower of Eldin with Death Mountain as her companion.

Cooking in temperatures so high that the air itself combusts does not come easily. If she had paid attention to Blaryd's recipe of curry, she would have already fixed herself some food, instead of sitting in the approximate shade of the cliff—though being in the sun or in the shadows makes no difference when the very ground beneath her feet threatens to melt her into a puddle of flesh—tapping her middle and forefingers against her chin.

Her iron pot and its accompanying pot lid hold no match to the boiling heat around her. Yet somehow non-gorons live in Eldin, and with living comes eating.

Gently she opens the carved jar of rice Blaryd presented to her. Almost immediately she catches the scent of burning rice and closes the container just as speedily, sealing the rim so that no air can flow in or out.

Link unties the fireproofed band that holds her ponytail in place. She runs her hands idly through her hair.

She dare not check her map, which remains safe from combustion, furled in the fireproofed cylinder. Instead she stands at the edge of the tower. Shading her eyes with a lifted hand, Link gazes out onto the world. The spire juts into the sky, and yet the mountains of Eldin—the spine of the world—rise even further, culminating at Death Mountain that towers over half of the heavens.

Lava flows down channels along the sides of the mountain. Pools and lakes of liquid fire and molten rock sear her vision, and she looks upwards to the sky. To the peak of the mountain. She squints. Something seems to move along its surface. Not a plume of lava, but brown and gold, shifting horizontally.

She leans out.

The whatever-it-is moves again, blurred by the heat rising from the land and the sparks of fire that cascade through the air. She can just make out what look like projectiles of some sort spewing forth from the brown and gold mass.
Link follows the downwards arc of the projectiles. They disappear behind the other mountains of Eldin. Her gaze snaps back up to the whatever-it-is, which continues its horizontal path winding about Death Mountain.

She leans out further.

Her boots, waxed with fireproofing paste, slip.

She hurtles through the air towards solid rock. With great effort she manage to snap open the paraglider. Link spirals around the tower until she lands on one of the platforms dotting the sides of the spire. She tumbles forward. Spreading her limbs out on solid ground, she takes a moment to laugh at herself.

And then she climbs back up the entire tower to retrieve the slate.

When she kicks off of the tower for the second time, she glides over uneven cliffs and mountains. She aims for the highest structures that she can reach to walk across plateaus or climb up to a higher hill before launching herself into the wind again. Down below she can make out ruins of villages and camps of monsters. Fire-breathing lizalfos. Strange brownish seals with blue bulbs upon their heads. Hunched crocodilians—not the lizalfos, but scurrying about on four legs—with armour of stone covering their bodies. Toad-like creatures that rear up from the rivers of fire to spew rocks into the sky at her. Spinning turtles that carry crawling maggots of flame upon their backs. Hard-shelled centipedes with long jaws and singular beady eyes ringed i blue and violet. Great birds her own size that loop through the air above the camps and breathe out flame. She avoids the monster camps whenever she can, but one of the flame-birds pursues. Link looks back at the beast: gold and scarlet with four wings that flare out in vibrant feathers of tyrian and blue, and a tail that blooms like a blossom of fire.

If not for the flames that burst from its throat—flames that not even her fireproofing paste may withstand—she would stare in wonder at the bird's iridescent beauty. But as the bird gains on her, she notices the sharp blades of its outer wings, the talons tipped in serrated steel, the whip-like undulations of its tail whose hollowed end could serve as a noose.

Not a natural thing. Not a natural creature that could heave magma from its belly, but a monstrous thing animated by an ancient power. In its glazed eyes lurks the violent violet of malice.

She shuts the paraglider and whips out her bow in a single motion. As she falls, she pulls the bowstring back.

The paraglider opens again at the same time as the arrow pierces the bird's breast, just below the juncture of its body and its wing.

Link watches the monster long enough to see the bird dropping through the air. It flaps wildly to slow its ascent, but with its wing disabled, the monster swiftly approaches the ground.

She twists her body northwards. Taking out the bird caused her to fall further down than expected, and she nearly crashes into a cliff. As she climbs up, the skin of her hands starts to sting, as if she had plunged them into scalding water. The effect spreads over her flesh. The stinging grows worse by each passing second.

Link pulls herself up to the top of the cliff. She downs another fireproof elixir, and the blessed cool showers her from her stomach outwards. She wipes her mouth.

From the precipice of the tall cliff, she surveys the land about her. The river of lava below her flows smoothly south, though she knows not the river's name without the map she cannot check. Far along the river she spots villages and towns, most of them set next to great tunnels or caverns bored into the earth, the caves' mouths large enough that she can make out their innards from where she stands. Massive quarries dug up from the ground lie down below the cliffs. For every mine on the surface, she can count three or four entrances to underground tunnels. Stone bridges cross the river of lava. She observes movement along one bridge. Gorons? She squints. The beings scurry too quickly and too jerkily for gorons.

Lizalfos, on the move.

Link continues north. She follows the river from the relative safety of the high clifftops. Occasionally the scree of a fiery bird or the cry of a lone lizalfos draws out her halberd, the head of which shatters halfway through the day, embedded in a lizalfos's shoulder. She takes its weapon—a forked metal spear—and walks on.

At least she will have plenty of monster parts to sell in the future, if ever her horse Ilia needs anything.

When she notices a village on the next hill, she glides towards the settlement for the possibility of cooking a meal that will not instantly erupt in fire. Link looks up at the homes carved into the mountainside and down at the quarry hewn from the base. Gemstones glitter blue and red, white and yellow in the eye-searing brightness of the lava. Link lands on the terraced hillside below the crag on which the village sits. Eagerly she starts the trek up the vertical cliff.

When her head clears the rocky edge of the cliff, she looks out at the village, at the people, at the potential warm-yet-not-ablaze meal.

A lizalfos squatting in the middle of an empty village square greets her.

First its left eye turns its pupil towards her, and then its right eye follows. Chirruping, the lizalfos stands on its tiptoes. Other lizalfos crawl out of the broken doors of the village houses, chirping at one another, their eyes cold despite the heat.

Link ducks her head back and climbs a half-metre down the cliff. Flattening herself against the rock, she feels her chest rising and falling, her skin broken into cuccoflesh, her mouth drier than the volcanic stone around her.

A village in ruins. Run over by monsters. And whoever once lived there—

Link drops to the lower level of the crag. She walks around the summit of the cliff to avoid the lizalfos. The ground litters with small bones, discarded weapons, broken pottery, misshapen metal pieces she cannot identify, and here and there half a larger skeleton, the bones charred to black, partly smashed from the impact of having fallen from the village on the cliff.

The bile rises in her throat. She swallows down and the acrid stench of her stomach contents exhumes her mouth. Link removes her water-skin. She makes a seal of her lips around the throat of the water-skin before she takes off the cap.

The hot sulphurous water from the lake only churns her stomach further. She chokes for breath. Her knees hit rock. Her spine hunches over until her shoulder blades threaten to rip through her skin.

She gasps. Her tongue feels too swollen, her lungs too shallow, her throat constricting in on itself.

She vomits over the ground. The taste of curry smokes up her tongue, twisted from a pleasant spice to an inferno of disgust that keeps her heaving. The vomit sizzles upon contact with the too-hot rock. The stench of its vapour miasmas from the stone. She stares at her hands. The edges blur; her fingers double. Under the protective gloves she can picture the scars that rake across a stranger's flesh, a stranger's body, a stranger that once had the sword—

Link covers her face with her hands. She trembles. She has nothing left to throw up and so she rocks back and forth in the fog of the scent of her own vomit.

She kneels there for a very long time.

The ache in her knees and the aridity in her throat lift up onto her feet. She rivets her gaze onto the peak of Death Mountain. She trudges forward.

She does not look down.

Link hikes up an arch of stone that crosses half of the river of lava. From her perch she spies another village on the waterfront of a hot spring. The hunched homes excavated from stone drops her to her hands and knees again. Like the village overrun by monsters. Like the village the hero could have protected. Like the village from which she could only turn away.

She dry heaves.

When her limbs cease fluttering, Link claps her palms against her own cheeks. At the very least she can refill her water-skin in the spring.

Her stomach grumbles but, despite her desire to try every meal that the great wide world has to offer, she does not have the physical capability of consuming literal fire. Although, if she chips off the fireproofing seal from one of the apples she still carries in her satchel and shoves it into her mouth with sufficient deftness, she could choke the fruit down before it catches too much on fire. Link dips her hand into the satchel to feel around for one such apple.

Focusing on anything but the village.

Her fingers close around something spherical. She picks out the apple. With the knife taken from the cabin on the Great Plateau, she peels off the fireproofing paste.

The fruit blazes. The apple burns to ash in her hand.

Link stares at the pile of grey dust in her palm. She pokes her tongue out and licks the tip against the ash.

Dust.

Paraglider in hand, Link pushes herself off of the arch of stone. She glides towards the village under the indigo sky of the coming night. The darkness of the sky does little to lessen the blinding glare of the molten rock.

She lands near the hot spring on the far side of the village. Something large and dark moves in the water and she whips out her fireproofed bow faster than she can even process the whatever-it-is waiting in the spring.

"Who's there?" grunts out a voice with the rolling pace of a goron. Link lowers her bow. "I said, who's there, 'less you want my fist in your skull." Link kneels down on the side of the hot spring. The goron strides through the water towards her. A fire sparks to life in his hand—a lantern, she realises—and his silhouette melts into the sight of a goron in a coiled-rope loincloth. "Who're
"Just a girl," Link answers honestly, her brow furrowed at the goron's odd question. She lifts up her water-skin. "I stopped to get some water, and also maybe food."

The goron scratches the crown of his head. "What're you doing in Gabora, Justagirl?"

Link tilts her head to one side. "I'm here for water." She crouches beside the water and fills the water-skin. Quitting her gloves and cupping her hands together, she drinks from the spring until the parchedness of her throat has lubricated with the oily water.

The goron shrugs his broad shoulders. "Don't do any funny business, and don't creep 'round Gabora at night. We've been up swimming up our necks in furnixesandyiga as is, and I don't like that look on your face."

Link nods. The word furnixesandyiga means nothing to her. He grunts and splashes back into the hot spring. She scoots away to keep her fireproofed clothing dry. A sudden sound—a chirp—to her right sends Link's head in the direction of the noise.

Something thin, red, and swiftly bobbing its head up and down from the hot spring.

The spear finds its way into Link's hands. The goron in the hot spring yells something at her, yet her world has narrowed down into the red thing, the lizalfos, the whatever-it-is.

She grips the spear tightly. Her arms bunch together in preparation for a thrust.

The whatever-it-is raises its head, too fast for her to process in the darkness. It twitters at her. It lunges.

She stabs forward but the whatever-it-is speeds off away from her. As it runs in panicked circles around the periphery of the spring, she lowers her spear.

"You got a stone loose in your head, Justagirl?" the goron roars. "Don't scare me like that! Nearly jumped outta my shell. You've never seen an ostrich before?"

She stares at the bird that abruptly shoves its head downwards, flaps its stubby wings, and continues to sprint in circles.

An ostrich.

The goron approaches her again with the lit lantern. "What's wrong with you? Look, I don't know who you are or what you're doing, but if it's up to me to chase some loony away from Gabora then by Din I'll gladly take things into my own fists." He punches his other forearm for emphasis.

"It's been a long day." Link's gaze sweeps from the ostrich to the village across the water. "Is there a place I could rest at...the village?"

"Don't think we got an inn. And if you think you're gonna go tunnel to tunnel you got another thing coming." The goron frowns at her. He punts his fist onto his hip. "What're you doing out here? And if you say getting water one more time..." He makes a crunching noise in his throat.

"I don't know what you're asking." Link pauses. She touches her chin. "I'm hungry. I wanted water. I'm going to Darunia on a task for Lady Impa of Kakariko."

"To Daru-darunia?" The goron pats the crown of his head. "I dunno who this Impa-imp, is but if you know what's good for you, you'll want to stay outta Daru-darunia. That blasted lizard's been driving them outta here."

Link blinks.

The goron sighs. "Fine. Doesn't take a scholar to see you got no clue what's going on around here.
Enjoy getting mauled by the first lizalfos you come across, Justagirl." He extinguishes the lantern and wades back into the hot spring. "Hylians. The whole lot of them, thinking they can go anywhere. Former royalty my foot."

Link tucks her gloves into her satchel and removes her shirt. She rubs her face clean with the water of the hot spring, careful not to let the water drip onto her trousers. She slips the undershirt and tunic back on. The surface of the water reflects lights from above; someone at the village must have lit torches against the dark. Her fingers slide into the gloves. She flexes her hands to settle them back in.

The goron yells again and she looks up. This time, however, he runs not at her but towards the Screams from the village. The goron breaks into a roll. Link can just see dark figures crawling in the pandemonium of the blaze.

Gripping the spear she took from the lizalfos, Link sprints forward around the hot spring. The village: far, too far. As she draws near, the scene unfolds before her, of lizalfos against goron in the streets, the fire-breath of the monsters hot enough to melt the very mountainside rock into lava.
Overhead, birds soar to spit molten globs down below. The denizens of the village—gorons and not-gorons in barrel-shaped armour alike—have formed a barricade in front of the entrances to the tunnels. To the homes. They tear through the lizalfos with axes and blades, lances and gauntlets, drillshafts and hammers meant for breaking rock, but for every lizalfos that falls, two take their place. Burning insects—no, slugs, oozing burning oil as they go—crawl forward between the legs of the villagers. One villager notices and shouts out an alarm. Everyone dashes madly away.

The slugs explode into an inferno.

Link skids to a halt a distance away from Gabora. She notches her bow.

Her first arrow misses. Her second hits one of the flaming birds. She looses an arrow at a third monster only for someone else's arrow to shoot the bird from the sky in a burst of lightning that makes Link stop and stare for a second. She focuses again. Together with the other archer's arrows —theirs somehow ringed with lightning—the arrows she filched from the bokoblin camp make quick work of the birds.

Just as she scans the heavens for any birds she might have missed, a trio of lizalfos terrorising the village notice her with a war-cry of screes. They rush towards her. One lizalfos falls to an arrow through its throat. The next arrow rips through the lizalfos's thigh but does little to slow its run. Its untouched companion reaches her first and she flips backwards as she fumbles for the spear. It thrusts its own spear at her but the point merely grazes her left arm. She rolls forward under the next jab to slam her spearpoint up between the segments of the lizalfos's armour. The spear pierces its belly. The lizalfos leaps back; the motion tears the spear from her hands. The shaft sticks out of the monster's stomach, the point embedded in its innards. Link hastens to notch another arrow.

An abrupt pain in her left shoulder knocks the arrow astray. She feels warmth soak into the fabric of her arm. The lizalfos with the arrow in its thigh catches its boomerang and throws it again. This time Link ducks the first sweep. She swivels about to track its arc and catches the boomerang on the return. She turns back at the arrow-thigh-lizalfos and grins at the monster while it jumps up and down shrieking at her and thrashing its limbs. She chucks the boomerang at its head.

The arrow-thigh-lizalfos catches it.

Link squints at it. Before she can respond, she hears the spear-lizalfos charging her and leaps forward. The whistle of the boomerang brings her to roll forward thrice. Her head spins but she comes out unscathed as she springs back to her feet. The arrow-thigh-lizalfos has just thrown the boomerang again, while its companion strains to pull out the spear embedded in its stomach. The spear-lizalfos succeeds only in snapping off the handle. Link pelts behind it and grabs the still-together spear the monster holds in its other hand. The spear-lizalfos pulls back. They engage in a pulling contest over the spear until Link dips her head at the approach of the incoming boomerang. The forked edge slices through the spear-lizalfos's face at the level of its eye sockets. The monster releases the spear. She stumbles backwards yet catches herself and jumps forward to drive the spear down into the spear-lizalfos, clawing at its ruined eyes. The point of the weapon deflects off of the spear-lizalfos's armour and slams into the rock. She rips the spear from the ground. The lizalfos writhe beneath her. She straddles the lizalfos while its arrow-thigh-companion races for the boomerang that has skidded off the cliff. Wedging her fingers under the lizalfos's helmet she rips it off. The spear-lizalfos meets its end under the sharpened spear-point.

She flips backwards off of the spear-lizalfos. The arrow-thigh-lizalfos grabs the boomerang at last and does an impromptu dance with the weapon. She sprints towards the distracted lizalfos. It turns towards her with a questioning chirrup and she punctures the spear into its lower jaw. The spearhead sinks through its flesh. She meets the resistance of bone.

The arrow-thigh-lizalfos flails the spear around in its jaw. Its talons rake furrows into her chest. She senses it lifting a leg. The kick to her chest knocks the breath from her lungs but she stays firmly upright. She twists the spear around to drive it deeper. Bringing up her knee she slams the lizalfos in the stomach. The impact lifts up its spine. She knees it again. A crunch emanates from its upper back. The lizalfos droops.

Link throws the lizalfos to the ground. She braces her boot against its chest and pulls out the spear. For good measure she takes the monster's boomerang as well.

When she looks back up at Gabora, the villagers seem to be winning. The forces of lizalfos have thinned out, and the bloated corpses of already exploded fire slugs dot the ground. She hefts up her spear as she approaches the village square. She watches a pair of gorons physically tear a lizalfos in two. One of the strange seal-like monsters inhales to spew lava, but Link stabs the spear through the top of its nose down to its lower jaw, effectively clamping its mouth shut. It breathes fire into its closed maw and writhes until she hacks through its head with the boomerang—silencing the monster—and joins the fray with the villagers.

The monsters do not flee but continue to fight until the villagers and Link have driven every last one into the dirt. The victory rings hollow: Link can see the still-molten surfaces of houses reduced to lava. Other homes have cooled down into misshapen blobs.

She exhales and drinks another fireproof elixir.

She stays out of the way of the villagers as they begin the process of accounting for the damage done by the attack. Instead she sits down on a spread-out glob of stone in the middle of the square that might have been a statue or bench before the monsters' rampage.

Her stomach rumbles. Link tries the trick with the apple once more, except this time she pops the fruit into her mouth to remove the fireproofing paste with her teeth. The saliva washes the paste
The wax fills her mouth with an acrid taste and she grimaces, but at least she can eat something to quell the storm in her belly. As long as the fireproofing paste does not contain poison, the sweetness of the fruit makes the bitterness worth the swallow.

A goron seats himself next to her. Link glances at him. A dribble of juice runs out of the corner of her mouth and evaporates against her skin. The goron slaps his knee. Link scoots a centimetre away.

"Name's Fernok." The goron grins at her. The hair-like white crystals cap his head in a small pyramid. A tattoo of a lizard stretches across his chest. She swallows another chunk of the whole apple in her mouth, her cheeks bulging. The goron pats her knee. "Figured someone oughta thank you for taking out those furnixes." He gestures to one of the downed corpses of the flaming birds. A furnix. "Nasty little buggers, they are."

Link notes the quiver at his hip and the metal bow gleaming on his back. "Were you the other archer...?" she signs, still crunching on the apple. "The one with the—"

"What's that?" She repeats the question, more slowly this time. Fernok pounds his palm against his chest. "Me, the lightning archer? Nah. I'm an archer, but you can't get topaz arrows easy 'round here. But I do know who the lightning was. And, you know, speaking archer to archer, you're not a bad shot yourself."

"So what's a lone ranger like you doing out here, swooping in to protect this little ole village of ours?"

"I might know someone who can help you out there, lass." Link can't help but smile slightly at him calling her lass. "You did some first-rate arrowing. Hey, I know things look bad, but Gabora's been through worse."

Link looks out at the destruction of the village, at those kneeling in the street, at those weeping, at those digging through rubble. She could offer to help, yet she only passes through. A traveller. A lone ranger with barely a name.

What would she have to offer the mourners who have had their livelihoods destroyed while she sits by and struggles to eat an apple?

Fernok drums his fingers on his chest. He rests a hand on Link's shoulder. She can feel the pressure on her right collarbone.

"I'll be straight with you then, lass. Donte asked me to keep an eye on you, said that there was some hylian mucking around the hot spring who didn't seem all there in the head."

"So, I figured I would check in on you. Say, lass, you're not Yiga—"

"I don't know what that word means. I promise I'm not lying."

He releases her. Gingerly she runs her index finger over her collarbone to sense the outline of the already forming bruise. When she moves her arms to sign, her shoulder stings. "I don't know what that word means. I promise I'm not lying." She explains briefly about her amnesia, about not even knowing what the word Hyrule meant. Fernok hums in response.
"You say you don't know who the yiga are. Yiga. They're murderers, is what they are, and serve as the leaders of vile armies of monsters." Link cocks her head. Fernok goes on: "I'll be straight with you: We've seen some evidence of Yiga activity 'round these parts the last few days. Now I'm not saying it was you. But I'll ask you to leave, lass. Nice and sweet. Say, you wanted to meet that other archer, right? I got some folks who would be willing to leave with you and take you to Darudarunia. Some jewel merchants that arrived a couple'a days ago and should be off'n the morning." He hums again. "And if you stir up trouble in Darunia, there'll be plenty of people to take care of you."

"I really didn't do anything." She tries to give Fernok something of a smile, yet her mouth feels frozen in a thin line, her gaze dull and vacant.

"I'm sure you didn't, lass, but we can't ever be too safe nowadays. I trust you understand." He raises his hand and she flinches, which prompts him to chuckle. "Long as you leave town, lass, it'll be right. Thanks again for taking care of the furnixes. So. How about you follow me, lass?"

Link stands up to do so. She stretches her arm behind her back to rest her hand on the iron pot. She lowers her gaze to the ground.

The apple churns in her stomach. She winces but swallows herself down, down again, down again, down to lie in the bowels of the earth.

"We're here. You see," Fernok says, while Link continues to stare at the stone with the silent prayer that the ground open up and swallow her whole, "there's some merchants passing through down. They're headed up to Darudarunia. Lass. Yo, lass." He slaps his palm against her shoulder and she raises her head.

A particular home, not carved into the mountain, but sitting by itself on the periphery of the village. On metal wheels, she realises, staring at the sloped wagon.

Fernok knocks on the door with the back of his knuckles. From within Link hears: "Coming right away." A shuffle and a banging. A hiss of air. Another loud bang. A second hiss of air, and the door slides open to reveal a tall figure in barrel armour with a helmet obscuring their face. The person wears a metal bow on their back, the limbs glimmering with polish, a sight affixed to the front. "Yes?"

"Evening, Glepp. Thanks for helping us wrestle off those buggers. Dunno what we would've done without those topaz arrows of yours. All the way from Parapa, weren't they? Wew lass, must be expensive." Glepp says nothing. Fernok thumbs at Link. "Lass, this is Glepp. Glepp, this is...

"Link," she signs.

Glepp signs back: "Hello." Then she returns to speaking audibly, her voice low and almost careful. "Yes?"

"The lass here needs a ride to Daru-darunia."

Glepp makes a sound in her throat.

"She's a sellsword. Just took out some furnixes and a pack of lizalfos without breaking a sweat. Says that she doesn't have anything to do and that she's been sent by someone from Kakariko."

The door behind Glepp opens. A second barrel-armoured character steps out. "What's going on here?" the second person asks.
Link crouches down on the ground while the three talk to apparently decide her fate. Fernok does not seem to know how to speak in Eldic sign, and so Glepp translates for her companion who, Link gathers, is deaf. The companion introduces the inhabitants of the wagon: Glepp and Misan, travelling merchants who run the circuit of the sapphire trade, loading up in the frigid tundras of Hebra and shipping the ice-infused sapphire out to Darunia and the rest of Eldin. However, the sightings of monsters have grown significantly worse of late, making the road that much more dangerous. "Aw, and our previous guard," Misan bursts out, "left us stranded in Gabora. Said that it was too much for him! Even after I promised to up his commission!"

Glepp pats her on the shoulder.

"So, Link, come on in. Make yourself at home and we can hash out a plan."

"I leave 'er in your care." Fernok glances at Link while Glepp translates for Misan's benefit. "You make sure to get on out of here, lass." Fernok's eyes narrow slightly. "And you merchants should get goin' too now that you've got a guard and no reason to hang around."

Link dips her head in acknowledgment and thanks. Misan extends a hand to her, still crouched on the ground, and pulls her up. Glepp opens the door to the wagon.

The blue from the inside of wagon—coated in sapphire—shines directly into her eyes. The sudden chill from the wagon's bowels washes over her at once if she had suddenly run onto a bank of ice. She takes a step backwards but Misan hurries her forward. The cold.

The cold.

The floor, the walls, the ceiling—cold, cold, icy cold. She drops herself to the ground to hug it. The glittering rock cools her cheek. She rubs her face over it affectionately.

Cold.

Something nudges her shoulder. She opens her left eye. Misan, who has removed her helmet and armour, stands over her: a black-haired sheikah woman in a green and gold tunic. She winks at Link.

"Nice, isn't it? The sapphire here exudes cold. We run a trade circuit from here to Hebra. It's a long trek but mighty worth the profit, eh? The sapphires absorb the power of ice in Hebra and then—badda bing badda boom—exhale the cold out here, where it's way too hot! With spring just ending and everyone thinking about how active the volcanoes get in the summer, business is booming! Then in Darunia we load up the exhausted sapphires and ship 'em all the way back to Hebra to get nice and cold over the winter again." She flashes a thumbs-up. "And all you have to do is fend off the monsters that could try to attack us on the trip up and back. You'll only have to take us back to Medigo or about there. Nice and—"

Link's stomach rumbles. Loudly. Misan's hands freeze and Link's face reddens even against the icy chill of the sapphire.

"Aw, you want some food, there, Link?"

Link sits up. The pot on her back clangs against her other belongings. "Do you mind if I cook in here?"

Misan claps her hands together. "Ooh, no need to talk so formal. We're all friends here." Link rubs the back of her head for her century-old style of speech while Misan shows Link to the galley in the back of the wagon, similarly inlaid with sapphires. Link takes the pot from her back to set it onto the counter. At last she can open the container of hylian rice without the grain erupting in flames. At last she regards the little red jar of goron spice in her satchel. At last, at last she realises that she has no poultry of any sort.

If only she speared the ostrich earlier.

She might not have poultry, yet she does have acorns. And rice. And spice. And all those things are really nice.

With Misan's assistance and Glepp's silent watchfulness—the latter a purple zora with some resemblance to a koi fish—Link heats milk in a saucepan. She sprinkles in goron spice and stirs. Misan has little in the way of vegetables, but she produces what she can: ginger, red pepper, onion, garlic, and Hyrule herb. Link fries them lightly in oil and adds them to the curry alongside crushed and roasted acorns.

She steams the rice as she stirs the curry to a thick consistency, until the very fragrance makes her stomach pound against her innards in its desperation to have some of that. When the rice finishes steaming, she divides it into three bowls provided by Misan. Link pours a generous portion of curry for herself; Misan takes some as well, though Glepp declines the offer of curry and has her rice with a sprinkle of seeds from her own pack.

Link sits on a mat on the floor; Misan and Glepp kneel. The cramped space in the wagon, Misan explains cheerily, means that they set up and put away the beds every morning and have as little furniture as possible. Link nods throughout Misan's words, although she focuses more on the welcome weight of the spoon in her left hand and the bowl in her right.

"Have a good meal," Glepp says.

Link practically shoves her face into the bowl to shovel the curry rice into her mouth and swallow the meal down. The first mouthful of rice goes down easily, but a second later a fireball follows it down. The mixture of goron spices burst over her tongue as though she holds a literal flame in her mouth, the warmth sliding down her throat to heat her belly. Her nose clears. Her eyes water. The tensions in her temples and the ache of her head relax and ease like the morning sun clearing away the fog gathered over the night.

Curry and rice.

Rice and curry.

Not with these exact ingredients, but the weight of the bowl and the spoon remind her. She closes her eyes: a party of four. First, the goron from her memories, the one who called her li'l buddy. Second, the older girl with the green hairband she remembers arguing at the base of the stairs, for whom Link made a bowl of carrot cream soup, with the red hair tied back with a band of green and gold, a dark blue dress garbing her well-toned body the golden earrings framing her sharp features. Third, the girl her own age, also with red hair, in the sky-blue dress with the violet sash. And fourth, herself. On a horse, the brown horse with the white mane—Ilia? Ilia. Her horse, Ilia, after whom she has named the black horse currently resting at the stable in Medigo.

She remembers sitting behind the girl with the violet sash atop the horse with the white mane, her cheeks slightly flushed at the rocky road that bumped Link against the girl with the violet sash. The goron walked next to her, and the older girl with scarlet hair tied back by a green hairband rode astride a blue horse beside Ilia, a bowl in her grip. Ilia's reins in hand, the girl with the violet sash led the horse forward. Link cupped a bowl in her right hand, a spoon in her left. A bowl of curry rice.
The goron and the older girl with the green hairband laughed alongside the girl with the violet sash while they ate. The girl with the violet sash opened her mouth for Link to feed her, and Link took turns giving herself and the girl spoonfuls of rice. She cannot recall the trail they followed, but the horses walked slowly. The party of four spoke of life, of raising horses, of a woman—who lived in the village of the girl with the violet sash—determined to raise cucco despite her own allergy to them.

They came to the edge of a village golden with fields of—of something. Not rice. Something else. Link could see a pond atop a hill below the boughs of a tree. The girl with the violet sash hugged Link good-bye and then did something else—something that Link cannot quite recall—that prompted Link to bury her face in her hands.

Link watched the girl with the violet sash's back recede into the distance of the village. One of her other companions—the older girl with the green hairband—ruffled Link's hair. "You have good taste in friends, Link," she said, a mischievous quirk to her lips.

"Yeah, li'l buddy," boomed the goron. "Thanks for letting us meet Marin."

Marin.

Link does not know whether to cling to that name like a life-line or to banish it away. Marin, who must have known the previous occupant of Link's body. Marin, who would not recognise Link as she is now. Marin, who must have...meant...something...to...

Movement startles Link from her thoughts. Misan has stood up to gesture to her. Link blinks. "So what do you say? You protect us on the way up and down, and we get you into Darunia." Misan cocks her hip. "Or Daru-darunia, like the Eldic call it. While in Eldin do as the Eldic do, eh? And if you can cook like this for us the way there, I'll throw in enough fireproof elixirs for you to last a year."

Glepp crosses her arms over her chest. The zora's red-membraned third eyelid slides horizontally over her eyes. Misan pouts at her companion, who sighs and shrugs, acquiescing. Clapping her hands together, Misan grins at Link.

"So, whaddaya say, eh?"

Despite the slang not making a lick of sense to her, Link attempts to nod and spoon another mouthful of rice into her mouth at the same time, which lodges the spoon into the roof of her mouth. She chokes on the curry. Glepp slaps her webbed hand onto Link's back and the spoon flies from her mouth to land in the bowl.

"Aw, no need to get that excited." Misan winks at her.

Link rubs her throat. She bobs her head.

"So you'll do it?"

She nods again and picks up the spoon.

Misan claps her hands. "Great. How much do you charge?"

Link swallows more rice. She lowers the spoon. "How...much do I...charge?"

Glepp and Misan turn their heads towards one another and back to her.
“You're not going to do it for free, are you?” Misan signs, and Glepp rubs her temples with her hands.

"I just want passage to Darunia. Or is it Daru-darunia?” Link tilts her head to one side. "I don't mind doing it for free."

Misan looks at Glepp, who shakes her head. "Can't say I'm comfortable with you doing it for free,” Misan signs. "Gotta make sure you'll have some incentive to bring us out there in one piece, eh? Better to rest in peace and not in pieces." Misan scuffs her boot on the floor. She claps her hands together. "We'll give you a two-point-five percent commission on all the sapphire we sell. That's zero-point-one-nine above average for a job of this calibre, you know! How's that?” Link does not know the meaning of two-point-five or zero-point-one-nine but nods anyway. "I promise it'll be more than worth your time."

Link inclines her head in gratitude. She polishes off the curry rice and prepares herself a second bowl, just as creamy and spicy and sweet as the first. The coolness of the sapphire house washes over her like a spring shower. When Glepp rolls out a bed for her, the blankets interwoven with sapphires, Link crawls into the cocoon of coolness.

For the first time in her very, very long day, Link rests.

—

Curry Rice (three hearts) - acorn, goron spice, hylian rice

Chapter End Notes

Author’s notes: A thank-you to my most wonderful beta reader, Emma, for assisting me with figuring out the costs of living in Hyrule! And thank you to you, the reader, for continuing to read. I hope that you're enjoying yourself as much as I am.

Link feels sick from seeing the remains of the destroyed village, and also guilty. To some extent she feels responsible for "stealing" away the hero, since she herself is not a hero.

The village of Gabora is named after the other blacksmith from the Mountain Smithy of Majora's Mask.

Breath of the Wild has limited enemy variety, so I decided to expand. Enemies seen in this chapter include: dodongo, furnix, heatoise, magtail, pyrup, spume, torch slug, and winder.

Here's our first mention of the Yiga! Rumour has it that the Yiga have magical powers and can actually lead around monsters, which isn't true at all (though the Yiga are capable of provoking monsters).

Misan is deaf. Glepp can speak out loud out signs when Misan is around. Topaz arrows are expensive and life on the road is dangerous; hiring a sellsword or two is what most merchants do.
In Breath of the Wild, the description for topaz reads, "This precious yellow gem contains the power of electricity." That for sapphire reads, "Sapphires contain the very essence of ice." I took this concept and ran with it for Delicious in Wilds. Basically, gems are capable of absorbing and then giving off certain elements. Sapphires stored in the cold of Hebra slowly absorb the essence of ice; they can then be transported to the rest of Hyrule, where they function as a coolant to slowly release cold until they're exhausted, at which point they're transported back to Hebra (or other cold regions) to absorb cold again. Ice arrows use a shard of sapphire that, when broken, rapidly freezes whatever it touches. For people in Eldin, this is vital, because homes lined with sapphire are cold enough that non-gorons don't need to don protective armour or rely on fireproof elixirs. Misan and Glepp can hang around in their regular clothing in the cold wagon. Similarly, topaz can absorb lightning and electricity from thunderstorms common to Parapa (the Gerudo Desert in-game) and Lanayru, which are then used in the crafting of shock arrows and can even be utilised as batteries. For the curious, rubies are indeed used to make fire arrows as well to warm and heat homes.

Marin is someone else that Link knew from before the Great Calamity and was originally from Link's Awakening. Because Marin has red hair in Link's Awakening, Marin is of gerudo descent in Delicious in Wilds.

Now, regarding Link's commission and being a sellsword. Staying at an average inn costs about twenty rupees a night and an average meal of about three non-specialty ingredients costs around thirty to forty rupees. Three meals a day at forty rupees plus twenty rupees a night comes out to 140 rupees. I factor in another twenty to sixty a day for living expenses and round up to 200 a day as the cost of living as a sellsword in reasonable comfort. A job of this calibre (the trip across Darunia takes around a month and a half) should be able to keep a sellsword for about a month, so we can expect around 6000 rupees. Sapphires are worth 260 rupees a piece, and Misan and Glepp expect for 1000 units of sapphire to make it to Darunia. 1000 * 260 * 2.31% = 6000 rupees, so the average market wage for a sellsword is 2.31% of what makes it to the destination. Misan and Glepp are offering Link a hefty 2.5% commission, which is a shiny 6500 rupees. For perspective, a keese wing is worth just two rupees, so Link would have to slaughter 3250 keese to get the same amount. Lynel guts are worth 200: 32.5 lynel right there. Of course, this doesn't take into account gathering and hunting and so forth; that commission could well keep a sellsword capable of doing such things alive for several months stretching out.

A bigger issue is where Link is going to keep all of that money, if she gets it.

As always, thank you for your support. Next time: to Darunia!

midna's ass. 04 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: Misan and Glepp get introduced here! I love them a lot, especially Misan. They're adorable and really fun to be around. The chapters involving them and their road trips are really really comfy. Especially now, with their wagon full of sapphire.

This chapter's memory is my third (probably?) favourite individual memory in the whole series. It has an amazing atmosphere to it, and I love how scrambled and vague it is with regards to its place in the timeline. Plus it's cute as heck. Marin and Link are really really cute.
Emma. 04 September 2017.
Herb Sauté

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef arrives in Darunia, witnesses the destruction wrought by the Divine Beast Vah Rudania, is admitted into the city, and does some exploration in anticipation of fulfilling the request tasked her by the matriarch of Kakariko.

Chapter Notes

To all my readers: Sorry for the relative lateness of this chapter; I had some personal issues come up. Chapter thirteen might be relatively late as well depending on how much time I'll have to fix formatting issues (it's a long story but for some reason AO3 doesn't like how my word processor did the italics, which means manual fixes), but I should be back after that. There is no plan to cease working on the fic. I do plan to let you know ahead of time for long chapters (such as chapter sixteen, actually) that might	take me a few days to fix up, but if worst comes to worst and I really run out of time, I can always post without the formatting fixes (or just link to the public google docs folder I have all the chapters uploaded to). So, please don't stress about the fic not being complete!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Link spends the majority of the month-long trip on the roof of the wagon of sapphire, scanning for monsters. When she asks whether she ought to look for these strange Yiga as well, Glepp assures her that she need only worry of monsters. Glepp and Misan take turns directing the Eldic ostriches that pull the wagon forward, which squabble with one another, but their constant cries signal that the ostriches still live.

Every once in awhile Link clambers into the wagon, affording herself a breath of sapphire-coldness to keep cool.

She keeps vigilant. About once every half an hour, she looses an arrow to shoot a furnix from the sky or a torch slug from the road before it can become a problem. Once an hour or so, she stops the wagon momentarily to toss a bomb at a seal-like pyrup or lizard-like dodongo or living rock igneous peblit or—on one occasion—a rock octorok that inhales stones to spit them out back in molten blobs. She tosses a bomb in its direction. The octorok attempts to chew the explosive down, and she taps the button on the slate.

About a week into the trip, Link spots a strange monster that appears to form and reform from a flock of keese; every waxed-wooden arrow of Link's merely prompts the monster to fly apart into keese, too many keese for her to tackle. Here Glepp intervenes to loose one of her expensive topaz arrows. The impact of the arrowhead in the heart of the flock crushes the shard of topaz within—as Glepp explains upon Link's curious inquiry—and the electricity leaps wing to wing and keese to down the entire flock at once.
Only once do they come across lizalfos, in the form of four lizalfos tearing apart a discarded wagon at the side of the road. Link picks off half of them with arrows from afar and heavily wounds a third. She meets the remaining one-and-a-half with the spear. She walks away with prepared tails, horns, talons, and the long cut of a clawed hand reopening the wound left on her shoulder from the Gabora-lizalfos's boomerang.

Glepp takes her inside to apply red medicinal salve from a jar to the injury. Washing away the blood with cooled water, she cleans out the inside of the wound, meticulously picking out rocks and bits of debris caught in her flesh with a needle. Link stifles her yelps of pain as the needle plunges into the open wound. Afterwards Glepp bandages her shoulder.

Link thanks her profusely. Glepp shrugs.

Misan procures needle and thread; Link stitches up the tear in her tunic and undershirt. "You should consider getting some actual armour, eh? You can get some nice chainmail commissioned in Darunia."

She dips her head in gratitude. She downs a fireproof elixir once every twelve hours. When they stop to give the ostriches a rest, Misan teaches Link how to catch fireproof lizards from underneath Eldic rocks; Glepp gives her pointers on how to carve truer-flying arrows and how to better her aim.

They ride on in the wagon. Three weeks into the trip, they pass by a group of travellers in the opposite direction with their own sellswords, a pair of burly gorons with laughs as large as their two-handed clubs. From the traveller—a goron buyer and seller of gourmet rock—Misan, Glepp, and Link learn that matters in Darunia have gone from bad to worse. The Divine Beast's rampages have grown worse, and the Council of Elders have spoken of evacuating the aboveground portion of the city. On the bright side, the barrages have kept the monsters at bay.

"Those monsters aren't natural," the merchant rasps, steepling his twitching fingers under his chin. "Those things don't have an instinct to survive. They'll get themselves killed if it means they can take someone's life. When they attack, you either stamp out every last one or you still have a problem. You know how many times I've seen one of those things dragging themselves forward on one arm just to clamp their jaws 'round someone's leg?"

Glepp pats the merchant's shoulder.

Link lifts her hands to ask about the words Divine Beast, but her question ties on her fingertips in the chaos of so many people at once, and instead she excuses herself to lie down in the wagon of sapphire.

They carry on. A month after setting off from Gabora, with the summer sun high in the sky, they enter the trail up to the southern mines of Darunia to the south of the city. The wagon passes the checkpoint at the entrance to the mine; Link emerges from the checkpoint with a red bracelet around her left wrist to indicate approved clearance. Misan comes to sit with Link on the wagon's roof. She tells Link of the region's history as they trundle through the mine. The mine spreads in a vast network below the surface of the mountain in pursuit of different veins, from metals such as iron and copper to rarer precious gems of topaz, diamond, sapphire, and ruby, the latter of which represents one of Eldin's most prominent exports. In the forges of the volcano, the ruby jewels capture the essence of fire and heat, for use in weaving into clothing to ward against the cold; for the preparation of fire arrows, rods, and weapons; and as emergency firestarters in times of need. Traders from other regions gather spent and exhausted rubies to bring them back to Eldin, where the miners pack them into emptied mine veins. Years down the line, the rubies reignite their spark—having absorbed heat from the land—and can be used once more.
Most of the explanation flies over Link's head. She focuses more on the steady bump of the wagon wheels over the road, on the luminescent stone torches that shadow the insides of the mines in blue, on the silhouettes of gorons wheeling barrows of metal and hefting drillshafts their shoulders, ever continuing their excavation of the earth, down and down and down below.

The heart of Death Mountain plumes magma up from the centre of the world and, with it, casts wide its net for bringing up metals and gemstones. Mines build on top of older mines when the older tunnels plug up. A cycle of destruction and rebirth.

At some point she nods off despite her efforts at vigilance. She awakens again to Misan shaking her; lifting her head, Link stares at the great golden gates of Darunia that arch over the entrance to the city. Giant stone statues—portraits of gorons Link does not know, except maybe for one particular face that Link forces herself away from to look instead at the ground—gaze down upon those entering Darunia from either side of the gates that span a full twenty metres across and some ten metres high, their intricate designs of loops within loops running from top to bottom in a cascade of gold interwoven with gemstones that stand in for the eyes and hearts of animals and monsters side by side. The centre of the gate opens up on the jaw of a dodongo with two massive rubies for unseeing eyes.

They wait in one of two lines outside of the city. Individuals or families on foot pass through with relative speed. Those come to the city on business face a more stringent and thorough process as border guards inspect contents of wagons, demands documents for verification, and interrogate purposes for the visit. Link observes the guards strip down a barrel-armoured non-goron—after giving the dazed sheikah man a fireproof elixir—to pat him down prior to allowing them inside.

From here in the line, Link watches Death Mountain. The brown and gold whatever-it-is on the mountainside resolves into the appearance of a lizard squatting over the ground. If she had no point of reference, she would assume the volcano were relatively close to her and the lizard about the size of the black fireproof lizards that scurry over the rock. But Death Mountain carves into the heavens, and the brown and gold lizard spans the entire horizontal curve of the volcano.

As large as an entire village. A monstrosity upon the mountain. Link ogles the still and silent beast.

The line crawls forward. Link curls up on the roof. She yawns. Just for a moment, she allows her eyelids to lower.

The next sensation she processes: flying through the air. Then she hits solid ground on her knees and rolls forward to her feet. A boom deafens her. She clamps her hands over her ears as another impact knocks her from her boots. The creak of a nearby wagon—the patted-down rito's wagon—falling over prompts Link to crawl quickly away to avoid broken limbs. A choking fog of spreads out through the golden gates.

Her hands fly to her throat. She coughs, sputters, heaves. The smoke dissipates as tears roll down her cheeks. Squinting past her blurred vision, she lifts her head towards Death Mountain.

The gold and brown lizard on the mountainside. Its head has sunk into the flank of Death Mountain. From holes on its back, the giant lizard issues forth molten rocks that soar with agonising slowness over the city of Darunia, hang in the air for a breathless second, and crash down upon the land. Every impact vibrates through the ground; the projectiles nearer to the gate bring people to their knees or make them topple over entirely. Smoke billows from the cracked and molten stones.

The gates close with a resounding clamour above the din of rocks falling into the city. The lines scream and riot but the guards tell them to shove off and to take cover.
Some people in the lines run for safety. Others, including Glepp and Misan, take the opportunity to skip much of the line. Dragging their wagon forward to near the front of the gates, Misan and Glepp step from the wagon's bulk to wait beside Link, their barrel armour preventing them from sitting down. Another earthquake tips the wagon over. They stand by the side of the road and watch it fall. Link sits between them, blankly flicking her gaze from Glepp to Misan to the wagon and back again, trying to discern what she should do. Glepp and Misan both seem entirely unconcerned.

None of the rocks drop outside of the gates, but some come dizzyingly near, so close to the gate ringing Darunia that the ground threatens to fracture beneath their feet.

When the giant lizard on the mountainside pulls its head out of Death Mountain, it leaves a gaping wound that sprays out lava like blood from a mortal injury. The holes in its back close. As the lizard scuttles forward to disappear behind the far side of Death Mountain, Link's ears continue to ring and her eyes continue to water.

The gates remain shut.

The evening darkens to night. Those still in the lines take stock of one another. A goron and a sheikah work together with Glepp, Misan, and Link to right the wagon. In return, Misan and Glepp go to assist the helpful merchants, gathering their wares that have scattered over the ground after the earthquake broke the merchants' barrels. Link joins in. The repetitive motion of picking metal craftwork—cutlery, jewellery, springs, gears, various bits and bobs for which she has no name—calms her.

They spend the night inside of the sapphire wagon. Misan assures Link that the gates will open once more in the morning. "And we'll bang bang right through since most people left. But earthquakes can't do much when it comes to sapphires, eh?" She knocks on the walls.

Link nods. "I'm going to cook," she announces, to give herself something to do if nothing else, and Misan claps at the prospect.

"Make enough for all of us!"

As she passes into the galley, she notices Glepp, seated on a mat on the floor with a book in her hands, looking at her. She returns the glance. Glepp closes her eyes and gives Link a nod.

Link moves to the galley more confused than ever. Here, in the tiny squeeze between the sink and the counter, she feels at home. Whether the cramped space of the galley or in the open ranges of the sky, she feels better alone, with only her shadow at her side, the clamour and heat of other people melting away into the calm silence of her own motions.

Alone.

She prepares to sauté Hyrule herb; sunshrooms; strange blue mushrooms that she has not seen before but which crisp icily when she bites in; onion; ginger; another sort of blue flower that she has not seen before but which comes apart into tiny blue nibs in her palm; and a single brown-yellow squash that Misan, wandering in briefly to rummage around the kitchen for Link, finds at the back of the pantry. She dices them into bite-sized chunks. She shimmers goat butter at the bottom of Misan and Glepp's saucepan. The stove has no spot for wood but instead a small compartment of ruby shards that erupt in flames when she breaks them open with metal tongues. The air in the tiny compartment heats up immensely to the point of combustion—as Misan explains, having perched on the counter to watch Link cook supper—and this warms up the thin metal top on which the saucepan sits, thereby heating the saucepan.
Link listens to her speak on about the many applications of gemstones that the world has yet to crack. She cannot help but smile at Misan's infectious enthusiasm even as she focuses her attention on flipping and stirring the vegetables at regular intervals. As they near the perfect crispiness, Link adds in salt, dried pepper, and more of that delicious goron spice.

She attempts to twirl the pan when she takes it from the fire. Her efforts land vegetables all over the galley and into Misan's hair. She stands there with the empty saucepan, butter still sizzling at the bottom, and bursts out laughing.

After a second, Misan starts to laugh with her.

As Link cleans up and helps Misan wash the vegetables from her hair, their laughter builds on one another's until even Glepp checks in to see what has stormed up in the galley. Link's eyes open wide as Glepp begins to guffaw more loudly than Link and Misan combined. With a mmph, Glepp withdraws.

Link fries up another round of vegetables. This time she does not twirl the vegetables, but takes them from the rubies' heat to pour them into a bowl.

She carries the bowl out into the main room of the wagon. Link seats herself by the low table. Misan badgers Glepp into showing off "that thing you do," and with some restraint Glepp spins three plates and the bowl on her fingers, juggling them to pass them out. One plate lands squarely in front of Misan, a second in front of Link, and a third in front of Glepp herself before she lets the bowl come to a rest between all three of them.

Misan claps wildly. Link whistles in appreciation and takes the bowl of sautéed vegetables into her own hands. She inhales. Without the rice as a base, the dish has a less layered feel; nonetheless she practically inhales the vegetables. The spices firecrackle on her tongue. The pleasant warmth brings her to close her eyes as she crunches through a vegetable medley, the next bite—tangy or sweet, bitter or hot—a mystery until she takes it.

She knows this smell.

The smell of these vegetables, of these mushrooms, of these herbs, fried in goron spice.

The goron. Link beside him. On a cliffside overlooking a sea of lava. Below them fell away a city of bridges over the sea, intersecting one another in measureless layers that span ten or fifteen stories from sea level to halfway the height of Death Mountain. The details blur in her memories, but she had a plate. A plate of vegetables and mushrooms and herbs. She faced the city below as she ate. The goron beside her had removed his blue sash to lounge freely on the edge of the cliff. Not a cliff, but one of the statues of goron heroes. On his own plate, twice the diameter of hers, sat a partly molten rock with a stone skewer sticking out from its centre. "How're you liking Darunia, li'l buddy?" The goron picked up the skewer and took a bite of the rock. She listened to the crunch. "It's Goro-goro's blessing to us. Speaking of blessings, I'm blessed you came out all this way to spend some time with me." He wiped the fragments of stone from around his mouth. "I'm the second of us you're visiting, huh?"

Link said nothing. She ate slowly as though attempting to occupy her hands.

"Once we get the ole lizard up and running—we really gotta name 'em something, y'know?—not even the big bad boar will stand a chance against us." He punched his left palm with his right hand. "We'll be ready to roll against anything that comes our way. You can count on me, li'l buddy."

Link shivered, ever so slightly. She dug her nails into her palms to still herself but the goron's eyes
"You know, li'l buddy, I want to be your friend." The goron bit off another chunk of the stone. "Fate has brought us together, true, but that doesn't mean we can't also get to know each other." She stared blankly at the floor as she continued to shovel spiced herbs into her mouth. The goron rubbed the back of his head. "Not one for talking, are you? The li'l lady isn't gonna come up here to observe, I promise." Link's fingers twitched. "Look, I heard a little about what happened in Parapa. This time, s'just you, me, and my family. No court swordsmen, no Impa, no interruptions, no Impa, no li'l ladies glarin' at you, and did I mention no Impa? You can take it easy. Relax. I hope a couple of days away from things will help clear your head. So, how's about it?"

She said nothing, and the goron exhaled.

"Say, I know a little secret a certain fried-banana-loving—" She nearly choked on her food; the goron winked. "—girl we know told me: how's the food, li'l buddy?"

At that, Link could feel her mouth curve up, and the goron grinned at her. "Now that's what I'm talking about, li'l buddy. Told you I heard about what happened in Parapa. And I gotta hand it to you: you know what you're doing with that cooking of yours." Link could sense the blankness of her expression shifting into something resembling a smile; the goron muttered half a prayer under his breath. "All right, so feel free to jump in any time if you've got somethin' to say about the food. The thing about Eldic food is..."

She finishes eating the spiced vegetables and herbs in silence while Misan gives her a verbal tour of Darunia. Link cleans up. She sleeps. In the morning they pass through the checkpoint. The goron guard who pats her down stares suspiciously at the slate, but the screen remains dark and she responds with complete honesty of her intentions in the city. Not a Yiga, she assures the guard, just a sellsword looking for a hot meal and a request for Lady Impa of Kakariko.

Crossing his arms over his chest and pressing a bare foot against the ground—to check, as Misan later elaborates, through the vibrations of the earth whether or not Link is lying—the goron nods to her.

They enter Darunia not through the main gates, which remain tightly shut, but through a side tunnel packed with other travellers and merchants granted passage into the city. When they exit out into the open air once more, Link blinks at the light that floods her vision. The ground criss-crosses with patterns of dark and light with the spans of bridges overhead.

The Eldic capital of Darunia spirals up through the hollowed-out core of a mountain as though a giant the size of the moon had drilled into the earth. Far below the city seeps the sea of lava that emanates from Death Mountain, ever-flowing waves that lap at the rock base of the city rising up from the lava. Tunnels extend down into the ground, away from the city and towards the solid rock of the surrounding mountains: the second underground half of the city that meets with mines both to the south and north of the city.

Despite the recent attack by the giant lizard, the city bustles with life. Gorons roll along the bridges. Skylines wire upper and lower levels of the city, some thick enough for carts loaded with people to roll across, other skylines smaller for the transport of goods in metal crates. Several skylines have broken, some with boxes of cargo still hanging awkwardly from the bent edges. Now that Link has a chance to look more carefully, she can make out where the bridges that stretch over the city have fallen to the lower layers, where the regular patterns of dark and light twist into fragments, where the once-densely-populated regions of the city seem surprisingly bare save for the ruins of pooled metal and shattered stone.
The lower level of Darunia—through which the guards of the city usher the sapphire wagon—hosts the city's marketplace. Fireproof fabric billows in the updrafts of the smouldering heat from below. Stone stalls, both the permanent, and the temporary like the sapphire wagon headed by Misan and Glepp. The merchants sell everything under the sun, including fireproof lizards, molluscs, and tiny pebbits as pets; parchment-like paper and accompanying ink that does not burn; metal clothing in every size for hylians, sheikah, gerudo, gorons, zora, and rito alike; street food for gorons in the shape of stones and for non-gorons in meat and vegetables dusted with goron spice, evidently fireproofed; pure ore of gem and metal pulled from the mines; shining metalwork of every possible material, shape and size from adornments to cutlery to weaponry to tools of the trade; glittering gemstones of sapphire, ruby, diamond, topaz, opal, and amber; books made of metal and stone with the raised-dot written Eldic language a symphony for the fingers; dice and sticks with which to gamble; increasingly detailed stonecraft from furniture to statues to piercings to street paintings made of pouring lava onto stone and letting the heat sink into the rock to form pictures of lighter and darker stone, all crafted from every manner of rock, many of the names completely unknown to her; elixirs and salves promising everything from healing to nearly immortal life; organs and other assorted parts harvested from monsters; and more still, more than she could browse in a lifetime. Services offered in the bazaar range from tattoos to oil massages to sapphire cooling chambers to inns to tours of the city to personal training sessions of every kind imaginable to haircuts to rock chiselling to street entertainment to lessons on investing in the goron mining market to restaurants—these prompt Link to pause and stare—to this and that that spins her head.

Link watches Misan park the wagon in the midst of a large circular plaza next to other merchants selling gemstones and rarities. She helps Glepp and Misan set up the stall to advertise their genuine Hebra-cooled sapphires, limited supply, willing to barter. Glepp gestures to Misan, who turns towards Link.

"We'll be in town for a few days. So you can do your thing, whatever it is you gotta do, eh?" Misan counts on her fingers. "You've got five days. Come back here on the morning of the sixth. You got that? We'll be right here. That's when we'll give you your commission. Two-point-five, as promised."

Link nods. She gathers her belongings. As she turns, her gaze already fixed on the skyline that leads up into the city, she feels a tap on her shoulder.

Glepp. Holding a box. She opens the top. "Fireproof elixirs. Please, accept them," she says out loud, her voice firm. "Otherwise you may run out, without an advanced payment on commission."

When Link lifts her hands, Glepp presses the box into them instead of letting her speak.

"And good luck with whatever you need to do. Keep out of trouble. If you hear anything about the Yiga, run the other way to keep safe."

Link bobs her head. She takes the box of fireproof elixirs and replaces the empty vials in her pouch with full ones, placing the empties into the box to give back to Glepp.

Lady Impa tasked her with checking on the gorons, but as she stands on the centre of a metal bridge looking up at the checkered skies above her, her feet could go anywhere in this city and still not come to a rest.

She walks. Without a sense of direction she drifts higher and higher along the spiralling city. She peels the layers of Darunia away one by one. As she explores the city from the bottom to the top, she finds evidence of devastation and vacancy, the layers more and more empty the higher she goes, until she climbs onto the highest flat ground in the city: a single metal bridge near the gates with a rough semicircle torn out of the middle as though a giant beast had taken a bite. Her gaze sweeps over the city of Darunia and up to the summit of Death Mountain behind it, to the reptilian nightmare lying in its shadows.

She is not the hero. She has never been the hero. She will never be the hero.

Closing her eyes, Link lifts up her arms. The wind kisses her skin. The warmth embraces her as an old friend.

She steps to the edge of the bridge where a falling rock has ripped clean through the metal. She breathes in. She leaps.

Link glides across the city from the bridge, straight as the guay flies. She lands on the other end of Darunia below Death Mountain, at the precipice of the gorge that falls away into the sea of lava. Spires of stone from the sea spear the skies.

For now she steps away from the cliff. On the abandoned upper edge of the city, she rests her boots at the mouth of an orange shrine.

When she emerges from the shrine she will fulfill Lady Impa's task. She will ask every citizen of the city if she must.

But first she will enter the shrine, for that she knows how to do.

—

Herb Sauté (two hearts) - Hyrule herb, goron spice

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Another thank you to both my beta reader, Emma, for helping me make sure that the timeline of memories is consistent throughout the story, and to you, the reader, for reading along. I hope that you're enjoying the journey.

Journeying across Eldin takes a little over a month! I based these calculations on how long it takes to cross countries in Europe on horseback. Hyrule is really a big place, you know?

The monster that Link mentions which can form and reform from keese is a vire.

Of course, passage into Darunia is very carefully controlled to try to minimise the influence of Yiga, as well as to help keep the monsters out. The statue of the dodongo on the gate is a reference to the dodongo from Ocarina of Time's Fire Temple, which "sees red."

The Divine Beast Vah Rudania doesn't just make up projectiles from nothing; instead, Vah Rudania uses its drill-like head to bore into the earth and "eats" rock to pack it into projectiles and shoot out of its back.

As a reminder, Parapa is what I have supplied for the name of the Gerudo Desert, so the girl who loves fried bananas is Urbosa. Note that they don't have names for the Divine Beasts yet; you'll actually get to see how they ended up picking 'em. For the memory, I suggest coming back here after about chapter, hm, forty-one or so?

"Straight the guay flies" is a reference to the idiom "straight as the crow flies" which is "an idiom for the shortest path between two points (on a map, disregarding the vagaries of intervening terrain); the geodesic distance" (thanks, Wikipedia!).

And we will see "what happened in Parapa" in a later chapter.

I want to emphasise Link's (current) preference for solitude over people. That'll be something that she struggles with in the future.

Another thank you to you, the reader, for accompanying me so far.

midna's ass. 05 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: I love the call-forwards to what happened in Parapa during this chapter's memory. It gives the memories a sense of scrambled-ness, and makes them SUPER fun to lay out and timeline and decode as chapters go by and we learn more and more information.

Daruk is a really great guy. He's not my favourite champion, but I love him nonetheless.

Emma. 05 September 2017.
Tough Fragrant Mushroom Sauté

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef asks the citizens of Darunia, capital city of Eldin, about their lives and about the Divine Beast that menaces them; the chef learns a little about the mysterious Great Calamity, which seems to have occurred some time ago. After a surveyor suggests that the chef help out in the northern mine, the chef travels to the Isle of Rabac only to find the mine apparently abandoned and broken down. However, the chef does meet a particular Eldic youth in a blue shawl who appears to be searching a "Champions' slate" just like the one the chef has.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Link stands on the shrine platform looking down at the city of Darunia. If she can best swinging flames and mechanical beasts, then she can surely ask the inhabitants of the city about their lives.

She claps her palms onto her cheeks to wake herself up. She stretches out her arms. She rolls her shoulders, massages her neck, holds a hand over her chest and breathes in and out.

Enough procrastinating.

Link glides into the more inhabited parts of the city, tightly packed with life except for the sites of the freshest wounds of the attacks. Gold-robed Darunia officials gold endeavour to clear debris or to raise new bridges to compensate for those that have fallen. A single team works on the vacant higher levels, not to fix the abandoned into a habitable condition, but to place protective struts over key open areas of lower levels. Few workers have the time or energy to spend on the inquiries of a hylian half their height, but Link gleans what she can.

The Divine Beast Vah Rudania.

The monster on the mountainside. Not a living being. A mechanical marvel from an ancient age that supposedly once protected Eldin. Since the Great Calamity—that phrase, that phrase again, which she attempts to ask of but only receives looks of incredulity, of kids these days and vague descriptions of a catastrophe two generations ago—the Divine Beast has lain mostly dormant on Death Mountain for years, for the entire lifetimes of the Eldic citizens with whom she speaks. When one goron refers to four Beasts Divine, Link recalls the ballad of the minstrel of Medigo, of the fantastical automata, piloted by Champions to protect the Princess and her Knight against the Calamity. The Divine Beasts of legend, the Eldic tell her, had been forged by the Goddesses Din and Goro-goro Themselves to aid in the Sealing War against the Calamity, that had served as a guardian of Eldin since its unearthing around a century ago. A century ago? "Yep, since the Great Calamity," reckons one goron, carving a chair from a block of white stone veined with red, "but I don't know anyone who was alive back then, so all I've heard are stories passed down from my fathers' fathers' fathers of war and strife and all that. Maybe it was kinda as scary as all these attacks." Occasional sightings of glowing eyes or subtle movement and then stilling once more have gossiped through the city over the past several decades, dismissed as the tales of bored foreigners with little else to do but wag their tongues instead of take part in the holy act of creation.
Yet about two months ago, in the middle of spring, the Divine Beast awoke. At first the Divine Beast simply crawled around the mountain while the city dwellers observed it with curiosity but little fear.

Then the barrages began, and ever since death has rained from above.

Some worry about how the attacks have grown more frequent. They fear that the barrages will turn into a daily occurrence. That soon they will become a ceaseless discharge, that the inhabitants of the city, permanent and temporary alike, will have nowhere to hide but to abandon Darunia entirely. That between the rising tides of monsters that threaten the villages without and the Divine Beast that has turned on the city within, the whole of Eldin may fall. Others remain optimistic or steadfast, that the Divine Beast will run out of energy. "Just look'it at how many monster bits they got down in the bazaar," one goron argues to her with a metal beam over his shoulder. "They've gotta be on their last legs. Those things got no sense of preservation. Doesn't matter how fast those buggers breed. There's an end to 'em."

But people have died, and with every attack the resources for repair and rebuilding grow thinner.

Some round on Link and demand to know why she asks. Others tell her to leave them to their mourning and their pain, that an outsider has no business sticking her nose into what does not affect her at all.

She asks a trio of workers—two gorons and a sheikah in barrel-armour—on a high bridge surveying and cataloguing damage to the city, carving their notes into one of the metal books she saw at the marketplace. One of the surveyors, a goron red mountain range adorning his abdomen, slams his foot into the ground with enough force to unsteady her; she just barely catches herself to avoid falling off of the bridge. "If you're so concerned about us, little hylian, why don't you go make yourself useful at the northern mine?"

The others nod their assent. Link tilts her head to one side, blinking at the workers.

"If you really want to help," the goron repeats, his motions deliberate and slow as if speaking to a child, "go up to the northern mine and help them clear it out, bud." He gives her directions. With the tunnels blocked, she should go across the lava of Lake Darman. "It'll be a win-win situation for everyone. Sate your curiosity and—" A word that she does not know. "—us at the same time."

The sheikah in barrel armour snickers. The second goron's features distort in something approaching concern, but his companion elbows him.

Link dips her head. She could return to Kakariko now, to see what else Lady Impa would have of her, but she has four and a half days left before Misan and Glepp leave. If she could pitch in to help the Eldic, even a little, then already her hands have purpose.

She climbs to the top of the city once more. With the sun having ascended and more people emerging into the streets of Darunia, a handful of officials along the path inquire as to her business in the more dangerous rafters of the city. The goron in the village of Gabora—Fernok, is that his name?—accused her of being Yiga, accused her of bringing about the attack on the city. But as with asking others what Hyrule might mean she leaves aside the matter of Yiga until she can return to Kakariko. The ore merchant called them murderers. She need know little else.

Link walks up the spirals of Darunia to the shrine she activated earlier. Where before the orange blended into the red-gold-brown of Eldin, now the blue acts as a beacon amid the heat. She clears the final step and stops in her tracks at the swarm of people around the shrine.
A team of gorons and a single rito inspect the strange blue glow. They poke; they prod; they record notes. She does not catch their exact words yet the aura of fear and worry fogs thick enough to choke.

Link presses her palm into her face and shakes her head at herself. She skirts around them with the weight of the sheikah slate burning at her hip.

She orients herself north by the position of the sun. Giant stone pillars rise from the lava. Twisted rock and iron supports cover the surfaces of the pillars, too distorted and warped for her to even hazard a guess as to what once stood. As she gazes down at the pillars over which she needs to travel, she observes monsters swarming. Fire-breathing lizalfos and torch slugs, vire and pyrups, heatoises and chuchu, octoroks and keese, dodongo and deadrocks. Several sets of rails run from this end of Darunia over the pillars towards the northern end of the sea of lava. Link notes where the tracks emerge from tunnels in the city proper and extend to disappear into caverns on the Isle of Rabac—the island that the surveyor mentioned—which holds the northern mines. She tracks each rail from Darunia to yonder shore only to find holes and breaks in every set of tracks but one.

Link glides down to the mostly-collapsed tunnels from which the rails emerge. Metal barricades block the few tunnels that have not collapsed inwards on themselves. Discarded carts pile beside the barricades. Touching her chin, she glances between the dense cluster of tracks and the Isle of Rabac across the sea.

The magnesis rune serves to set one of the mine carts onto the single surviving rail. She takes a moment to drain another fireproof elixir, pushes the cart to accelerate it on the tracks, and leaps inside just before the cart clears solid ground over the sea of lava.

The cart rushes forward. She grips the sides and ducks inside of the cart as it flies over the rails. It nears a bend. She can feel the cart begin to tilt as it moves into the curve and responds by shifting her own weight into the bend. The cart accelerates. She hears the roars and cries of monsters on the pillars, hears the tell-tale horn summoning reinforcements. Link hazards a look back to see flaming arrows hurtling through the air towards her. The cart tilts again, slowing, and an arrow whistles less than half a metre from her right ear. Link shifts her weight into the bend again to counteract the heaviness of the cart; it accelerates forward so quickly that the dry-hot air shuts Link's eyes.

Eventually friction and the level rails bring the cart to a halt. She tries to push the cart forward with her own hands—despite also standing in it—but the laws of physics refuse to yield to her. Link slides to the bottom of the cart. She taps on the surface of the slate.

The yellow stasis rune glows.

She locks the cart in place, then unstraps the spear from her back to thrust repeatedly into the front of the cart. The transparent window on the slate indicates an arrow nearly parallel to the track. When the stasis breaks, the cart shoots forward so rapidly that the wind waters her eyes and the inertia crashes her into the back of the cart.

Eventually the cart slows down again; she repeats the stasis procedure, and again. In the meantime Link looks around as best she can to find the location of the northern mine, somewhere on the Isle of Rabac. She notices the giant signs—written in a language she cannot read—in front of a yawning maw in the largest pillar just as she passes it, the cart hurtling forward.

While she stares forlornly at the receding pillar, the cart speeds along the rail. A sudden shadow brings her attention forward. Before she can react the cart enters a tunnel, still flying at high speed, and the tracks abruptly end at a massive molten rock of orange lava. Link scrambles backwards. She grabs for the slate to stop the cart with emergency brakes yet the stasis rune has yet to recharge. Bracing herself for impact, Link grips the sides of the cart tightly enough for pain to splinter through her knuckles as the cart smashes against the rock and her hands rip from the metal and she soars through the air like a loftwing of legend towards the molten rock——and slams into the cool surface of a shrine.

Not a molten rock at all.

A shrine.

Link smacks her face against the ground. Her legs fall to the earth shortly thereafter. She sits up in wonder at her lack of having burned to a crisp and, rubbing her aching nose, looks up at the shrine whose orange gleam resembled lava.

Her shoulder shake in silent laughter at her own worry. As she wobbles to her feet to set the slate into the pedestal and trips into the lift, Link welcomes the relative chill of the inside of the shrine.

The lift descends into the bowels of the earth. She lies down on the floor of the shrine to soak in the coolness for a few minutes before beginning on the puzzle before her, which involves the passing of blue fire. Not the blue fire-light that the guardians loose from their eyes, but the same odd blue fire-torches that she witnessed in the southern mines of Darunia. And then, because of course she would, Link comes upon a guardian that spews the same odd blue fire, the flame burning hotter than any she's faced elsewhere in Eldin. Despite the longer distance she has to keep from the guardian to keep from burning alive, she dispatches it with relative ease: a well-aimed toss of the spear pierces its chassis to disintegrate the guardian into a finely polished pile of wire.

Link collects its core. Her satchel bulges. She makes an effort to repack the items inside for more room.

She completes the shrine. The instructions explain the effects of blue fire. She stands back to follow along. She has already learned from the puzzle itself the first few lessons, simple enough to communicate over image; the more complicated instructions pass through one ear and out the other in the melodious tongue she cannot understand.

Shrugging, Link exits the shrine and returns to the sweltering light and heat of the outside world. She pushes the mine cart back towards the pillar of the northern mine with the stasis rune, this time more slowly so as not to overshoot the mine again. She nears the pillar and guides her cart onto the proper set of tracks. The cart begins to vibrate. The metal of the cart tracks creaks so loudly that she pokes her head out from the side of the cart to see what has happened: the rails themselves bend under the weight of the cart, groaning as though about to break in two.

And then the tracks snap.

The cart plunges down. Link leaps off of the falling hunk of metal and flails for the rails. Her hands close around the tracks. Pulling herself up, she finds herself on hands and feet, spread-eagled, awkwardly stretched between the rails that hang just barely close enough her to reach if she extends her limbs as far as they will go.

She inches her way forward on the tracks. Before long her limbs ache and her back muscles strain from holding herself up on the rails. She perseveres onwards. Not ten paces from the entrance to the northern mine, the sweat slicking the back of her neck begins to tingle with heat.

Link reaches the shade of the mouth of the northern mine. The solid ground beckons her. She releases the rails—her wrists and ankles bump painfully against the tracks as she drops down between them—and allows her body to plop dustily onto the rock.

Lying on her stomach, Link tenses and relaxes her arms and legs to gather the feeling back into them. Satisfied she stands up and drinks a fireproof elixir for the rising pain; the sense of coolness spirals through her from her belly to her fingers and toes.

She glances around the entrance to the northern mine.

The maw of the cavern looms around her, dwarfing her in its size. About a dozen tracks—nearly all of them broken—run outwards from the mouth. Carts filled with ore gather dust in the wings. Huge pipes line the walls, their mouths towering over scooped-out ramps of earth piled high with ore of varying shape and dimension. Metal plates bearing the raised-bump carving of the Eldic language decorate the walls. Tunnels lead further into the mine, although the majority seem to have collapsed, and iron boards covered in writing Link cannot read block off the other tunnels. Link blinks.

No signs of life.

No signs of life that she can see.

She cups her hands over her mouth and yells out a wordless hyaa.

No response.

Link paces back and forth to return the flow of blood to her legs after having crouched in the mine cart for so long. She touches her chin as she regards the apparently abandoned mine.

The surveyor did tell her to go to the northern mine to assist in efforts to clear out the mine, didn't he?

Perhaps she spent so long in the shrine that those working in the mine have left for the day. She walks towards the blocked off tunnels. The signs feel dusty under her fingertips. So do the rocks in the mouths of most of the collapsed tunnels, except for a looser pile of rocks in front of one of the smaller tunnels along the periphery. She estimates the tunnel about two metres in diameter in a roughly rounded square shape. When she brushes her hand against those stones, they fall further downwards to press more tightly against one another. Recent enough to not have yet settled. Not more than a day old.

The team—the surveyor told her there would be a team—must have worked on this tunnel before departing. She touches her chin. Though setting off an explosive in the middle of a mine smacks of trouble, she calls up a bomb from the slate anyway.

Link sets the cubic bomb by the tunnel. She takes cover behind a metal barrel full of some manner of metallic ore. The explosive detonates.

The rock blockage in the tunnel shatters into a thousand fragments. The explosion kicks up a cloud of dust that sends Link into a coughing fit until it settles. At least the rest of the northern mine does not come crashing down on her head. She wipes her bleary eyes and looks forward into the tunnel to spot blue light shimmering from within the mouth. Perhaps another shrine, she reasons, albeit one already active.

Link grips her spear just in case. Readying herself to thrust at a moment's notice if necessary, she creeps out from behind the barrel towards the tunnel. The blue light resolves into a torch—lit with that odd blue fire—along the walls leading inwards. Not a shrine. She exhales.
Someone must have lit the torches, perhaps if the team were here earlier, and the tunnel became collapsed only after they left for the day. Mindful of the ceiling above her with layers upon layers of thick rock that could crush her bones with ease, Link creeps forward into the tunnel.

More torches line the walls. Irregularly. Not all of the holders glow, unless some have gone out.
The recent attack on Darunia—by the Divine Beast—may have brought about the collapse. But then the surveyor would have had no reason to send her out here, unless he did not know that the team had not yet passed through after the attack, unless...

Link shakes her head. If she can help out in the mine, regardless of circumstance, she'll do so.
That's enough for her.

She continues onwards. The lack of monsters bolsters her movement. The tunnel winds further and further. Regularly spaced iron supports allow her to pace her progress. The air feels cooler here, if more stagnant. When she rests her hand against the wall her fingers, come away cold.

She hears nothing but the sound of her own boots against the floor alternating stone and metal, the rustle of her fireproofed clothing, the faint clang of the metal pot upon her back, her slow breaths, the infrequent drip of water, and from far beyond in the tunnel a shuffle-whisper.

The latter brings her to a halt in her tracks. Readying the spear, she scoots forward.

Something yelps.

In the faint blue light of the scattered torches she cannot make out the form of the whatever-it-is.
She listens to it racing away from her with a speed like an animal on all fours. Link chases after the whatever-it-is for fear of an ambush the instant she turns her back. She hears it scrambling, to the scraping of rock on rock—a dodongo or kodongo, or something with a shell—and then a loud thump as the beast halts or falls in the shadows between two torches. She raises her spear.

"D-d-don't eat me p-p-please!"

The Eldic speech tenses her arms. She steps back, spear still lifted and in line to strike.

The—not a monster—sobs openly. The whatever-it-is sits up. The scarce light halos around the silhouette of a goron.

Link lowers the spear.

The goron's weeping slowly dissolves into sniffing and choking. Link watches him rub his eyes, then peel his hands away from covering his face, then sob again. After a time the goron hiccoughs.
He sniffs again. He squeaks out a few words, once, twice. On the third try she catches what he says: "Y-y-y-you're n-not going to eat m-me, right?"

She shakes her head.

"H...hello?"

Link blinks. She taps the slate; the light of the surface serves as a makeshift torch to brighten her face, which sends the goron rolling away from her, yelping in terror. Startled she jumps back before following him. When he settles down again, sitting on the ground, he takes out a hand-held lantern and lights it. The bright yellow glow casts the inside of the tunnel in sharp relief, and she looks at him for the first time.

A somewhat pudgy goron, young, with a rotund face and white crystalline hair that curls over his forehead. Around his shoulders he wears a blue shawl or cape of some fashion. His dark eyes widen as she nears, holding out her hands as though approaching a frightened horse.

"Y-y-you're not a m-monster."

She nods.

"You're a h-hylian."

She nods again.

"Oh! I kn-know what to g-give a hylian." The goron seems to count something on his fingers. He lifts the lantern over his head as he beams at her. The strange gesture complete, he rummages about in the pack strapped to his back and pulls out a mushroom made of metal. "Th-this is for you, I guess! I th-think that h-h-hylians like these, right? I-it's an ironsh-shroom." She knits her brow. The goron shakes his head. "I s-seen hylians eat th-these before! Y-you just r-remove the metal cap. I know that hylians can't eat metal or r-rocks, and..." He trails off.

She crouches down beside him to take the ironshroom. The outside of the cap does feel hard as metal beneath her fingers, but she can stretch and squish the inner gills. She quits the pot from her back to nestle it in her lap.

The goron watches her in silence while she works. She removes a corked skin of oil to pour some into the bottom of the pot; she has less than anticipated even after she turns the oil-skin inside out to shake out the last few drops. Cutting up the ironshroom becomes an art that she strives to master, as the outside refuses to yield to her knife.

"May I?"

She bobs her head.

The goron rips the ironshroom into chunks with his bare hands. He clamps down tightly on the stalk. The pieces with which he presents her appear of nearly the same thickness.

"Thank you," she signs. She sets them into the pot and gestures for his lantern, which she places under the pot to warm the oil until it begins to sizzle. She watches cautiously as the chunks of mushroom cook. The goron pops the metal cap of the ironshroom into his mouth; she listens to the crunch of his rock-like teeth fragmenting the iron apart. The tip of her cooking knife serves as a poker of shroom undersides to test their tenderness. She adds a pinch of rock salt and goron spice. The jar that Blaryd gave her has started to run low.

Link stirs the mushrooms into the salt-and-spiced oil. She removes the lantern from underneath the pot and tilts the rim towards the goron, who pushes his palms towards her to decline.

"I'm m-more of a stone person. Eating l-living th-things just s-seems...you know." Link tilts her head. The goron taps his index fingers against one another. "B-but don't worry about me! I had plenty to eat earlier, and I j-just had the c-caps, so I'm f-fine." His mouth twitches into a smile and she shrugs in response.

Not even the strangeness of finding a goron in an abandoned mine could shake her desire to eat. She digs in with gusto. The heat has leeched the hardness from the caps. Despite the name, ironshroom brings a tangy, crispy crunch, slightly slimy, with an almost nutty aftertaste that prompts her to noisy chow down.

The taste—and the scent—whisper with familiarity. The goron from her memories, showing her the city, his family, his father, his brothers, his sons, all of whom accepted Link wholeheartedly in the days she had spent in the city, even if her memories of the exact events remain hazy at best, even if she had done nothing but stare vacantly at them or shy away from too many at once, even if she said nothing to them except ask what they wanted to eat. "When the long war's all over, li'l buddy," the goron boomed at her, wrapping her shoulders in a bear-like hug that forced the air from her lungs, "you should visit more often. Whenever you want. And if you ever—"

She rubs her temples. The goron spice eases a headache she hadn't known she'd developed. Her nails draw against the bottom of the pot; she polishes off the final chunk of ironshroom.

"...s-so, um, wh-what are you d-doing here, hyl-lian?" the goron asks at length. He pauses. "P-p-papa d-didn't send y-y-you h-here for me, r-right?"

"A surveyor in Darunia sent me to help the team clearing out the northern mine," she answers.

"Oh." The goron stops. Starts again. "H=huh? What t-team?"

Link blinks at him. He stares at her. He explains in-between bouts of sniffling; she busies her hands pretending to scrape out the last bits of ironshroom. No one has gone to the northern mine since its abandonment over a month ago. The Divine Beast Vah Rudania has torn apart the entire mine and the surrounding area of processing facilities to such a point that the pillars outside look more like garbage than a previously highly advanced processing line; shortly after the beginning of the barrages, monsters moved in. "And if w-we don't do something, I'm w-w-worried the c-city's going to..." He sniffs. "B-but that doesn't involve you. I m-mean, I'm s-sure you h-have your own p-problems, h-hylian."

"Link."

"Huh?"

"Call me Link." She does not know how to read Eldic, but she spells out her name in Necludan and in Central Hyrulean and in another language that comes so easily to her but whose name she does not know. He recognises this last tongue, calls it the language of the eastern lands.

"L-l-l—" The goron clears his throat. "Link. Link, r-right?" She nods. "I'm Yunobbo. Yunobo. Yunobo." They settle into silence. She could leave and return to the city to continue her task. "You're p-probably wondering why I'm here th-then. Well...I thought that Vah Rudarudania had to have a reason t-to...attack this place first, right?" He puffs out his chest slightly as he speaks. "They've sent out men to try to quell Vah Ruda-rudania. The only thing that w-works is hitting Vah Ruda-rudania with everything we've got until She g-goes away, but...we can't hold Hher off forever. But no one can actually board Vah Ruda-rudania. You can only open Vah Rudarudania with a Champions' s-slate." Yunobo scratches his jaw. "Have you ever seen one of the s-shrines along the sides of the r-road? There's one in the c-city." She nods. "They have these little th-thingies in front of them with a part m-missing." The pedestals. "The Ch-champions used to have these things c-called the Champions' slates that th-they could use to...h-how should I say it?...interact with the thingies in f-front of the shrines. It's been a r-really long t-time—"

Yunobo reaches a hand to the blue shawl around his shoulders, and his voice firms. "—but I think Lord Daru-daruk had one."

Her breath catches in her throat.

Yunobo continues to speak but her gaze sees past him, past the silent corridors of the abandoned northern mine, past the lava of Lake Darman, past the gates to Darunia, towards the carvings of gorons that she noticed upon her arrival to the city.
Though she cannot see the carvings through the wall, she remembers all too well the one statue she recognised, the statue of a goron who once wore a blue sash.

Lord Daru-daruk.

"Papa t-told me to stay c-clear, but I can't just s-sit by while m-my p-p-people are in danger!" He seizes the corners of the blue shawl just prior to breaking down into sobs again. "I'm not the b-best at this, I kn-know that! I j-just have to try! So I've b-been looking everywhere at any p-place that Lord Daru-daruk m-might have been. He worked in th-this mine before he b-became a Ch-champion, and I know h-he had a room here, so I thought m-maybe his s-slate could still b-be here..."

Link shifts the satchel at her hip. She unclips the slate; she holds it up. Yunobo goes on. Link listens to his elaborations, to how he has sought out the city over, to how no one believes that the Champions' slates could still exist.

"...r-right?" he says, and looks at her, and at the slate she holds in her hand, and his eyes widen.

—

Tough Fragrant Mushroom Sauté (one heart, low defense boost for 03:20) - goron spice, ironshroom, rock salt

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: As always, a thank-you to both my most wonderful beta reader, Emma, and to you, the reader, for sticking through. I hope that you've enjoyed the journey.

The "proper" way to use the mine carts in-game is to put a spherical bomb in the little thingy in the back of the cart, then detonate it; Link will be protected from the explosion. However, I didn't realise this at first and instead used stasis to go-kart around, breaking many a weapon. The bit about having to lean into carts is a reference to the cart gameplay from Skyward Sword in one of the most fun heart pieces of the franchise.

It's hard to tell the orange glow of the shrines from the surrounding lava! No wonder Link thought she was about to crash headfirst.

The gorons double-up the first two syllables of someone or something's name to indicate respect, i.e. the one goron referred to Lady Impa as "Impa-impa," and Yunobo calls Vah Rudania "Vah Ruda-rudania" and Daruk "Daru-daruk." You can even see this in the name of Goro-goro! As mentioned in my author's note a while ago, gorons refer to deities and so forth with special pronouns that are usually translated as "she/her," hence Yunobo calling Vah Rudania "She" and "Her" instead of it, as Vah Rudania is viewed as a living being. Other gorons might instead refer to Vah Rudania as a non-living being depending on their point of view (and might just call it Vah Rudania instead of Vah Ruda-rudania), just as gorons who don't want to show respect to the capital of Darunia might call it Darunia instead of Daru-darunia. Note that Darunia being the capital of Eldin is due to being a cultural/financial hub rather than some organised structure; while Lanayru and Parapa do have organised kingdoms with a monarch, most of the rest of what was once Hyrule is scattered. Darunia is more of an informal than an actual capital; Impa sent Link here because of Vah Rudania.

This is as bad as Yunobo's stutter gets. It'll get better over time, and it's worse at the beginning then lessens as he gathers his confidence. I know that it can be a touch annoying to read, so I wanted to clarify that this is as bad as it gets. For my readers who stutter out loud, I feel your pain entirely, and I understand. I plan to expand upon Yunobo's character beyond what we see in Breath of the Wild. Time will tell if I succeeded.

Ironshrooms suck up iron from the ground to form protective caps; they're found in places with lots of iron and come in different varieties (coppershroom, etc). As a result, they're farmed for their iron, which the gorons remove and typically leave the actual mushroom intact. Followers of Goro-goro are not allowed to consume living beings unless lack of consumption would threaten their lives (so the non-gorons that follow Goro-goro do, indeed, eat things, but typically are expected to only eat things that have died of natural causes and so on). Yunobo happened to find the mushroom in question in the tunnels he's been examining.

The Eldic word for "east" is aka; "west" is def or deph. The Dephlian Badlands come from the Eldic Defla, meaning western lands. I wonder how they might say eastern lands.

And ohoho Link is finally getting hints about her past she will not be able to deny.

midna's ass. 07 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: We meet Yunobo here! One of the things I most adore about this series is the author's take on both the four champions of the past, and the four pilots of the present, and this is where that begins to truly shine.

The Ironshrooms being tough is one of those tiny details I really love. Those hints of realism and detail make this series really shine.

Emma. 07 September 2017.
Roasted Bird Thigh

Chapter Summary

As the "courier of the slate" the travelling chef accompanies the Eldic youth towards Death Mountain, facing trials and tribulations on the way. They come upon a small sentry shack and, with the Divine Beast currently too high up the mountain to reach, decide to wait there until the Divine Beast begins to crawl downwards for another attack on the city of Darunia.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

As Yunobo leads Link through an alternate exit from the northern mine that takes them atop the pillar; as Yunobo explains the route to the Divine Beast Vah Rudania that the two youths will strive to board; as Yunobo elaborates on his plan to calm the Divine Beast himself, Link's movements take on a certain slipperiness like the uncertainty of a fever dream.

Lord Daru-daruk.

The carving on the golden gates.

Her own speech like an old woman's.

Impa's words about her looking just the same.

The gleaming Darunia drifting in her memories and the destroyed Darunia seared into her retinas.

The suspicions sink her stomach further down. She says little as Yunobo gestures for her to climb into a larger, flatter mine cart on a straight shot towards the side of Death Mountain. He clambers in behind her. Link can sense the jerkiness of his movements and how his entire frame trembles. She does not know what to do with her hands. She could say something; she could embrace him; she stays silent and still.

He sets the mine cart in motion by fiddling with something on the back. The cart hurtles forward at a reasonable pace. Link dizzies. The lava below swirls into a single pool of sweltering brightness, and the spiced ironshroom weighs her down as though she had swallowed a block of lead.

The cart arrives safely on the survey post on the ring of pillars just outside of Death Mountain. A tiny rock affair that has escaped destruction for being unassumingly perched on what Yunobo calls Lake Darman. From here, Death Mountain looms so close that it swalloweth up the entirety of the world. The largest mountain in Hyrule, a volcano that pumps the blood of the heart of the earth, surrounded by stone claws like the many-fingered hand of the Goddess Din protectively grasping the world fires in her palm.

The view takes her breath away.

In the meanwhile, Yunobo wrings his hands. The usual track he would take has broken from barrages, "so w-we'll have to g-go across the B-b-bridge of Eldin," he notes and leads her on another set of rails cascading downwards to the large mass of land that makes up the majority of Eldin. She can just barely make out the blue of the shrine she activated at the upper levels of Darunia. And there, across the gorge of impenetrable lava so hot that not even gorons can survive indefinitely, affixed to a cliffside of Death Mountain itself, rises a massive stone and metal pillar into the heavens themselves. Despite Death Mountain dwarfing the Bridge of Eldin in width, the Bridge of Eldin spans as long as the peak juts high. Between where they stand and the side of the mountain, the valley of flooded lava stretches on for eternity.

"That's the bridge. The Elders r-raised it so Vah Ruda-rud-dania c-couldn't cross into the city...but we'll n-need to set it r-right, right? You kn-know how much that means, to t-t-take something built by your own p-peoples hands and h-have to take it ap-part to prot-ect them." He frowns. His body, nearly twice her height, shivers. "Do y-y-you really th-think that th-this is a g-good idea, Link?" His voice threatens to break. "Can—c-can we—c-c-can we r-really d-do it ourselves?"

She is no hero. No matter what memories she might regain—no, those memories do not belong to her, but to her body—no matter what memories her body might regain of its previous occupant, she is no hero. Link returns his glance with her own concern.

Her features smooth into blankness.

Somehow, instead of being put by the vacancy in her eyes, Yunobo nods. "Y-yeah. Y-you're right." Link stares at him. "W-we got this." His voice strengthens as he wraps the shawl around his fist. "You've got the Champions' slate and I've got Lord Daru-daruk's protection."

Link raises her hands. The words do not form immediately but she forces them from her fingers. "He's alive?"

"Huh?" Yunobo ogles her. "L-lord Daru-daruk? H-h-he...he...h-ee's been with the G-goddesses for years now. I w-wish I c-could've known him."

"How long?" she asks, no longer looking at him but keeping her gaze on the line of the horizon. The bridge on the other side of the gorge blurs at the edges.

"Huh? How l-long...?" Yunobo scratches his jaw. "Um, s-since the G-great Calamity. Decades ago." He counts on his fingers. "A hund-dred y-years or so, right?"

Link dips her head very slowly. "What was the Great Calamity?" She flattens her hands in the insides of her pockets.

Yunobo scratches his jaw more furiously. "You d-don't know? Huh? Oh, is it a l-l-language thing? I don't know h-how to say it in Central H-hyrulean, but you know wh-what happened a century ago." She shakes her head and Yunobo scratches his jaw so fervently that Link wonders if his fingers won't carve a furrow in his rocky skin. "H-h-h-huh? Do hyl-lians not care about it anymore? I g-guess that it happened a l-long time ago." The fingers of his free hand twitched around the shawl. "I th-think my g-great...great?...grandpa was a little k-kid then, so it's not l-like I know what things w-were like before that...b-but that's when H-hyrule fell, and Lord Daru-daruk passed on to the Goddesses" Yunobo offers her a small smile. "I heard that the C-calamitious One w-wasn't really stopped, just sealed a-way like it'd b-b-been before. But w-with any luck it'll be another t-ten thousand years, right?"

Link nods and says nothing else. If she moves even a single step, the ground will fall out beneath her.

"I know I'm n-not Lord Daru-daruk's descendant by blood, b-but..." Yunobo grips the corners of the shawl. "...I feel like w-we were hewn of the s-same rock. Have you ever f-felt like that? I guess it's kind of silly t-to feel like you c-could be a hero from legend, but—" He curls his right hand into a fist, a corner of the blue shawl caught between his thumb and forefinger, and then looks at his own hand as if he'd never seen it before. "—I think we can do it. Let's go, Link."

Without a word Link follows behind him. He directs her attention to a giant metal cannon that once stood as one of three, its brethren having since been reduced to scrap. Link watches Yunobo aim the cannon, curve himself into a ball, and spontaneously drop into the chase of the cannon.

She rubs her eyes.

After a few moments Yunobo pokes his head out to call for Link. "F-fire the cannon. I'll be fine; I p-promise! This is the only way to l-lower the B-bridge of Eldin, right?" He ducks back down, then pokes his head out again. "Unless you d-don't have anything to f-fire it with...? I d-don't know much about h-hylians."

The slate—the sheikah slate, or maybe the Champions' slate—provides a circular bomb that fits into the cannon's explosive chamber. Closing the cover, she seals it with a turn of the knob and detonates the bomb.

With a boom loud enough for her to automatically cover her ears, Yunobo shoots from the cannon's muzzle to crash into the rock struts at the base of the Bridge of Eldin. The impact sends him recoiling back the same direction. Link throws herself to the ground to avoid the bouncing ball of rock that rolls to a stop some five metres behind her. The Bridge of Eldin groans. She raises her head to stare at the bridge.

For the longest moment the bridge remains upright, visibly swaying back and forth, before gravity beckons it down. She watches it fall. Slowly at first, its inertia keeping it aloft, and then more and more quickly.

Just before impact Link spreads herself out flat on the earth and braces her body.

The ground itself seems to wave, bend, break as metal contacts stone. Its weight splinters the cliff. Link feels herself lift from the rock into the air a full centimetre by the sheer force of the bridge smashing across the gorge.

When she can breathe again, she checks her belongings, checks the pouch of fireproof elixirs. A single vial has broken, which she drinks down to ward off the liquid sloshing away when she least expects.

Her legs wobble up into a position approximating standing. The wind across the Bridge of Eldin brushes the sidelocks from her face, and she looks outwards and upwards towards Death Mountain, over the truly massive bridge that has fallen and yet not broken, a beast of steel and stone, wrought of the finest metalworkers that Eldin has to offer, which has withstood the test of time and the barrage of a Divine Beast.

"L-link?"

She turns her head, then her entire body towards Yunobo, who grips the hem of the blue shawl. The breeze ripples the fabric behind him and it spreads slightly out like half of a cape. With the shawl unfurled, Link can see the sewn together tears, the patches of a slightly different colour of blue, the age of the shawl.

"Are you r-ready? W-we should h-hurry. They'll c-come to investigate why the b-bridge came down." Yunobo taps his index fingers against one another. "A-and if we don't calm down Vah Ruda-rudania soon, th-they'll have to r-raise it again. Th-the bridge, I m-mean. N-not Vah Ruda-rud-dania."

The unspoken hangs in the air. Link nods decisively.

They walk the bridge. With its sheer length, the journey takes them no small amount of time. By the time they reach the other end, Yunobo requests a brief respite, and they take shelter under a rock arch.

While Yunobo rests, Link stretches and practises with the spear and the boomerang. She knows how to use a sword, yet the lizalfos from which she has filched spears mostly prefer their own particular weapons. The usual tricks she can pull with a blade do not necessarily translate to a spear, which has its own advantages. Link finds the unanticipated centre of gravity a detriment to the flips and jumps on which her body relies to keep herself mobile.

She should have taken up Misan's advice on commissioning chainmail.

Fighting lizalfos one on one or knocking keese from the sky with arrows comes a far cry from whatever may lurk in the Divine Beast. Then again what could she possibly accomplish with a simple metal spear and a forked boomerang against a being of that magnitude, where a single toe of the Divine Beast spans two or three times her size?

She does not play hero, merely escort. If not for the slate in her pouch necessary for Yunobo to enter the Divine Beast, she would wait with Glepp and Misan. Yet the author of the letter on the Great Plateau urged her to keep the slate with her, and so she will follow Yunobo to the ends of the earth if it would mean helping the people of Eldin. She will unlock the gate for Yunobo, and then Yunobo will become the hero that he wishes to be.

She has no such wish but to retire to a comfortable existence where she can prepare delicious meals for herself every evening, and perhaps to find those faces she has seen in her memories.

Her memories.

Her stomach tightens. She narrows her world to adjusting her stance, to learning to control the shift of her weight in line with the spear.

Yunobo begins to tell her what he knows of Death Mountain. With any luck the Divine Beast will not commence another attack during their mission, as it has only moved every few days. Men sent to the Divine Beast, he says quietly, folding and unfolding the shawl repeatedly in his hands, have reported strange mechanical flying beings that the Divine Beast can release from its form that can blaze through even the thickest of armour with sufficient heat. The Divine Beast spends most of its time inside of the actual caldera of Death Mountain, where the overwhelming heat dispels even the approach of gorons, much less a hylian with fireproof elixirs, yet the Divine Beast crawls up onto the exterior of Death Mountain several hours prior to making its move.

"S-so...if we can c-catch it during that c-crawl, we can h-h-hit it where it h-hurts, and have some time to f-figure out a way to shut it off." He scratches his jaw. "Do y-you think we can do it?"

Link simply meets her gaze again, her expression blank as she struggles to fish for something to say.

Yunobo beams. "I-if you say so." She has said nothing. "All r-right! We sh-should probably go, right?"
Link starts to tilt her head in confusion, then simply stands up without further ado. Yunobo verbally traces the map, of travelling counterclockwise around the caldera to the further half of the volcano in order to wait. Along the route they will have to cross lava falls, but plenty of bridges and supports should exist. "Assuming th-that Vah Ruda-rudania hasn't b-broken them all."

They start the trek. This close to the hottest temperatures in all of Hyrule save for the fierce blaze of a lightning bolt, she breaks out in a sweat, fireproof elixir or not. The prospect of liquid against her clothing—and its implications for the layer of fireproofing paste—makes her sweat further. She quickens her pace. The first lava fell does indeed sport a single intact strut arching over it. Link and Yunobo cross it cautiously; the strut holds.

They exchange glances, Yunobo smiling nervously, Link grinning broadly.

A whirr brings Link to a halt. Yunobo walks into her back and bumps her forward. "Oh! S-sor—"

She hushes him with a finger over her lips. Dropping her belongings at Yunobo's feet, she climbs the stone cliff to their left up to try to catch the noise of the whirring. There, over the bridge of the next lava fall, hovers a strange circular thing with a glowing blue eye. It casts a pool of sapphire light beneath it and patrols back and forth along the bridge.

Link notches an arrow, yet she cannot find a good angle to aim at the eye on the automaton's underside from her higher vantage point. She glances around. A half-fragmented rock with a diameter of a metre—perhaps one of the projectiles, or a piece of one of the projectiles, of the Divine Beast—close by. She checks magnesis.

The boulder has enough iron content to be magnetised.

She grins to herself. Lifting the rock with the slate, Link guides it over to the hovering bird-like automaton. She positions it ever so deliberately above the guardian, inhales, exhales, and slams the guardian into the ground.

The guardian shrieks loudly in response as she raises the rock and sends it crashing down yet again. The automaton breaks into mangled crushed bits and bobs. Link drops the rock on the bridge beside the guardian's corpse. She looks about: the automaton's cries for help have not summoned anything nearby, at least not yet.

She glides down to land beside Yunobo, who stares openly at her with an expression she does not know how to read. Admiration? No, that can't be. Who would admire a ghost of the shell that once held the hero, before she awoked? "J-just who...wh-who are y-you, Link?" he whispers in awe, and she gazes at the ground.

"...it doesn't matter," she signs. She does not check whether he has read her words but simply goes on ahead with a steady gait. The sentry guardians patrol each bridge, some in clusters. They do not appear to have much intelligence. The automata investigate noises, she notices, but do not see anything outside of the pools of light cast out from their undersides. When she strikes down one with another guardian hovering nearby, the second attacks her by spewing forth that odd blue fire she learned of in the Darunia shrine. She barely escapes with a well-aimed arrow directly into its eye, blinding the automaton, and a bomb thrown that she happens to detonate at the right second. Link collapses to her knees afterwards to catch her breath and drink another fireproof elixir, less for the protection and more for the moisture in her hyperventilation-parched throat.

Still panting, she gestures for Yunobo to follow her.

She tests the radius of each sentry she comes across to lure them away one by one with noise, then bash them to death with magnesis-lifted rocks or stasis-kicked boulders. Yunobo cowers in the face of monsters and automata alike. Instead of forcing him to accompany her into the eye of danger, she whistles for him whenever she clears the path.

They go slowly.

The higher they climb up Death Mountain, the more monsters swarm. She discovers to some alarum that she has fewer arrows than she thought left in her quiver, and so furnixes shift from a minor nuisance to a major threat. They breathe out fire so hot that it burns more blue than red, and she dispatches them with well-thrown bombs. Packs of lizalfos hunt her down. Heatoises nearly spin her off of the precipices of the volcano. Winders turn the very ground into a hazard. She unties the red telescope from her left hip and learns to scope them from afar. She picks them off with arrows from a distance whenever she can and retrieves the arrows from their heads, praying that none breaks.

Some of the bridges and struts over the lava falls have gone out. Link's paraglider cannot hold Yunobo's weight. In place of gliding over the gaps, they rely on the unbroken cannons scattered here and there, previously used for gorons travelling rapidly around Death Mountain prior to the descent of the Divine Beast; Yunobo's explanation cuts off abruptly when Link shoots him from the cannon and then races to meet him. The journey goes long into the day. The spear that she has carried breaks, but she simply picks up another from the very lizalfos in which the spear shattered.

She leaves her fights with scraps and scratches of her own. The first time a lizalfos talon tears apart the skin of her lower leg she screams for the agony of heat, of the fire that cauterises her very flesh. But the scars she gains tell her own story in her skin.

At length, with the sun halfway down its descent into the night, her companion halts in front of a rock that Link recognises as a stone shack. "H-here it is." Yunobo exhales. He taps his index fingers against one another. "N-now, when the Divine B-b-b-beast comes down t-to attack, we can t-try to use that Ch-champions' slate and f-f-follow in Lord Daru-daruk's footsteps."

"Why do you sometimes double up words, like Daru-darunia or Vah Ruda-rudania?" Link asks as Yunobo begins to slide open the door.

"Huh? Oh. Oh, I g-guess a h-hylian wouldn't know...but it's respectful! Like how we call Our Goddess Goro-goro, so we can say Daru-darunia when we talk about our city as...as you know, our city." He speaks with an unusual confidence, his words firmer than before; Link nods. "If I became an important figure—and I w-won't, s-so don't think I'm putting on airs—p-p-p-people would call me..." His voice trails off again. "Sorry, i-it f-feels too arrog-gant to say."

"Yuno-yunobo?" Link completes.

Yunobo blushes fiercely, as if his cheeks were molten. Hiding his face from Link he opens the door.

A squawk from within has Link lifting up her spear forward through the doorway before she registers the noise. Something thumps; the resistance of the spear jolts up her arms. It takes her a moment to become aware of the Eldic ostrich impaled onto the tip of the spear.

The wounds sustained by the bird have already begun to smoulder and smoke, if not as swiftly as she had anticipated. Her eyes widen. She can hear in the back of her mind a voice dredged from a memory:
"Ah!" A blink of eyes, maybe green as spring, or maybe blue as the guardians' fire-light. A smile, a clap of the hands, a wriggle of carving her observations into a metal tablet. "The Eldic ostrich must eat the fireproof lizards and smotherwing butterflies that inhabit Death Mountain freely and thus gain some measure of protection from the fire-resistant secretions of their scales and wings. It's brilliant!"

Link stares at the red-feathered bird that writhes on the spear. Before Link takes the bird out of its misery, she removes one of her fireproof elixirs. She squeezes the spear between her thighs to free her hands. Grabbing the ostrich by the neck—it pecks at her fingers but she moves out of the way—she stuffs its beak into the neck of the bottle and forces the fireproof elixir down its gullet. Yunobo covers his face with his hands as she lights the torches on the inside of the stone shack. She observes her reflection in the walls inlaid with sapphire. Yet the gems do not give off cold, the essence of ice trapped within them spent.

When she defeathers and skins the bird, it does not burst into flames thanks to the fire-resistant secretions of the fireproof elixir coursing through its system at the moment of death. She opens the door to set the raw meat onto the hot ground; she crouches down and watches it cook.

As she turns the bird over and over, she imagines a song to time her wait. The music swells; the meat cooks to well-done: though she would prefer medium-rare, she takes no chances in the middle of a volcano where her source of heat comes from the very volcanic rock.

Link brings the roasted bird back inside. Now that she has a chance to look about the small stone shack, she can see it as a sentry post of sorts, with chairs, desks, files upon files of metal books and the utensils to write in them. She plucks herself down on the floor next to Yunobo, whose eyes have grown to mirror the dimensions of her fist.

She blinks at him as she half-cuts, half-tears one of the bird's thighs. Her teeth crunch into the crispy outside skin that gives way to the layer of fat on the underside, deliciously chewy, and then into the meat of the dish. She digs in to delight in the textures of sinews and tendons, of the disparities between the more corded muscle and the more tender, sweeter meat. She bites the softened ends of the bones where they connect to the rubbery-in-texture-yet-delectable joints. Licking her lips for the taste of ostrich, she cracks open the bones and carves out the marrow with her knife. She sucks the flavour from the bones where they grow too hard to cut apart. Finished with one leg, she feasts upon the next.

Yunobo shakes his head. "I don't know h-how you eat living c-c-c-creatures like that. I'll s-stick with my rocks, I th-think. B-but that's n-n-not an insult!"

Link laughs. She wipes her mouth before continuing to chow down. While she eats, she notes Yunobo stand to gaze out the window at the western end of the survey shack.

"...Vah Ruda-rudania w-will come down soon. I j-just feel it in m-my gut. Y-you know what I m-mean, right?" She asks her gut: her gut wants more roasted ostrich, and Link obliges. "I don't know when exactly, b-but it's been c-coming down more f-f-frequently over the past t-two m-months, so it'll have to c-come down at some point, right? Once every f-f-few days so far, so it'll be tomorrow o-or the day after, right?"

Link shrugs. They agree to take turns on watch. When the Divine Beast comes down, she and Yunobo will face it.

For now, for this moment, cross-legged on the stone floor, a warm meal in her lap, a roof over her head, and the starry night above, she's alive, and nothing else matters; she's alive; she's alive.
In the distance, the mountain rumbles.

—

Roasted Bird Thigh (two and a quarter hearts) - raw bird thigh

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Link isn't going to be able to deny herself for long. She's kind of putting it off for now, but oh baby, once life calms down a tad and she gets the chance to reflect on this.

At the moment, Link sees herself as a courier of the slate. Yunobo needs the slate to activate Vah Rudania, and she can't give him the slate, so she'll walk over, use the slate to activate Vah Rudania, and then let Yunobo in. She's not seeing herself as the hero, just the person who happened to pick up the slate.

Note that Link doesn't exactly find out about the Great Calamity here, and also note that people don't actually know exactly what happened to Calamity Ganon. Yunobo mentions that with luck Calamity Ganon will be sealed another ten thousand years. Hmm!

If it's not clear, the girl in the memory is Zelda herself.

The little thing about Link hearing the music as she cooks until the meat becomes well-done is a reference to cooking in Monster Hunter.

I actually wrote this in response to a review on the FFN cross-posted version of this fic, but I'll add it here for the curious reader: "The shrines carry different meanings in different places. The gorons are less outwardly religious inclined. Goro-goro is all about the holy act of creation, of making something new, whether that's something physical or more of a performance. For the gorons, taking a statue or carving that someone else made, breaking it up, and making something new of the same stone is "better" than preserving something just because. As a result, gorons are less worried about older monuments and instead more concerned with religion "in the here and now," if that makes sense. While the shrines are notable for being really old things that no one understands (you saw the team investigating why in the world the Darunia shrine suddenly turned blue in the previous chapter), they're not viewed as religious items or sanctuaries here. Yunobo knows about the slate due to his own research into Daruk from his hero worship; he's trying his best to become like his hero, and we'll learn some more about why he took Daruk as his personal hero many chapters down the line, once Link is a little more emotionally equipped to ask people questions.

As for what Link was thinking, the description of the Champions' slate seemed to match the sheikah slate. And even though Link doesn't want the responsibility, she also has a sense of justice strong enough that she can't just walk away when she has the very tool the gorons need to do something about Vah Rudania. But note that she doesn't suggest they go back to the city for help. She's not ready to be recognised as a hero, or even to call herself that. She's just "the courier of the slate" for now."

You can indeed cook just by dropping food down in Eldin! I recommend the roasted mighty bananas; you cannot cook everything however, i.e. you can't cook silent princess. Another thank-you to my beloved beta reader, and another thank-you to you, the reader, for having journeyed with me so far.

midna's ass. 08 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: This series is really great at ending chapters, but this is actually probably one of my low-key favourite chapter endings.

Emma. 08 September 2017.
Omelet

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef and the Eldic youth weaken the Divine Beast by temporarily paralysing its joints, then prepare to board the Divine Beast with the intention of figuring out some way of calming its rampage.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

The ground shivers in short bursts. The tremors strengthen second on second, amplifying their effects with one another. Link moves in the brief windows of time between each burst. She need not wake Yunobo; he already sits up, wide awake, his eyes have grown dark and wide with anxiety, anticipation, the gathering of courage—she cannot say for sure.

When they exit the survey shack, Link looks up. The Divine Beast Vah Rudania perches at the very lip of the summit of Death Mountain, crouched halfway over the outer side and halfway still on the inner edge. Its segmented head points straight towards them and she meets its multi-eyed gaze.

Moving three alternating limbs of its six at once, the Divine Beast lifts its appendages, carries them forward, and sinks them down into the ground with such slowness. Wherever its feet land, the rock fractures. Magma once held within the volcano spurts out between its toes. Each step curves its frame to the left or to the right as it sweeps down the mountainside in a great undulating line.

The ground trembles. Or maybe her body trembles. Perhaps both.

"Y-y-y—you don't h-have to d-do this," Yunobo says suddenly from behind her. Link glances at him over her shoulder. "Y-you..." He clenches his fingers around the blue shawl, then relaxes his fingers. "I-d-don't know who you are, L-link. You h-have a Champions' s-slate somehow, and you've been d-dutiful—" He clears his throat. "—in b-b-bringing me here. You've d-done everything while I cowardly hung back and l-let you. G-g-goro-goro must've b-brought—" Another second of calm. Link's gaze flicks up to the Divine Beast continuing its steady descent, though Death Mountain protrudes high enough into the heavens that she could not reach it now if she latched onto the cliffside and climbed half the day. "—us tog-gether, right? And the Hyli-hylia, t-too, s-sorry, I d-didn't mean t-to f-forget your Patron G-goddess." Link cocks her head; she does not know who Hyli-hylia is or what her Patron Goddess might refer to. "Th-there's no other explanation, that Th-they brought us t-together...but y-you don't have to do this." His voice continues to shake, yet Link can see Yunobo struggling to steady his words. "I w-would've been fine just to borrow the Champions’ slate. Once y-you get me up there, you c-can leave."

Link returns her gaze to Yunobo, who stares earnestly at her. She opens her palms yet no words gather at her fingertips.

"Th-though I'm n-n-not even going to force you to get up th-there. I c-can't promise I'll c-come back with the s-slate in one p-piece...but I'll t-try!"
The letter in the cabin of the Great Plateau told her not to give the slate away to anyone, and Link suspects Lady Impa wouldn't want her to hand it over to someone she met less than a day ago, even if that someone did give her an ironshroom. "We should go," she manages at last, and Yunobo's fingers dig into the shawl to furrow the fabric.

"Yeah. Y-y-yeah, let's go."

They stand there another minute to watch the Divine Beast crawl down the mountain. Link turns questioningly towards Yunobo.

"We n-n-need to stop it, right?" Link nods. "All r-right. All right. We can d-o this." Sinking to his knees—she stares blankly at him—he clasps his hands together. "Goddesses, if Y-you're out there, please, we n-n-need Your help. O Din, grant me the power to...to do s-something about Vah Ruda-rudania bef-fore She d-destroys the city. O Nayru, g-grant me the wisdom to know h-how to do something about Her. O F-farore, grant me the c-c-courage to...to d-do it once I know what to do and that I can do it! Grant m-me the courage to g-go through with it! O Goro-goro...grant me Your p-pride in m-my abilities, Your b-b-blessing of creation, so that I m-may yet c-cease the end this destruction."

The next quake of the ground booms significantly stronger than the previous; it catches Link off-guard and she nearly wobbles into a fall, but stops herself.

"All right. All r-right." Yunobo mumbles to himself. Link squats down to better prepare herself for subsequent quakes. "We've k-k-kept Vah Ruda-rudania at b-bay in the p-past by l-launching into th-those purple things on Her shoulders." Link looks up at the Divine Beast straddling Death Mountain; its shoulders do indeed have violet-gleaming domes. "They're sensitive, or s-something. I think..." She can hear the fear and confidence simultaneously waver and bolster his words. "I th-think if we wait until V-vah Ruda-rudania is at the l-l-lowest point and we l-l-launch m-m-m-me, then w-we can stop Vah Ruda-rudania a-and board. Then we j-just need to use the Ch-champions' slate to t-take control, right?"

For lack of a better plan, Link inclines her head. Abruptly Yunobo extends his hand. Link looks vacantly at him.

"C-come on, Link. Take m-my—" Yunobo breathes in. "Take my hand."

She has heard these words before. She has heard someone, standing over her with an arm outstretched, a mild smile parting their lips, the gentlest eyes she has ever seen. Come on, Link. Take my hand.

She takes his hand.

Together they wheel out the cannon kept safe in the survey shack. The Divine Beast has completed nearly half of its vertical journey down. Whirling about, Yunobo grips Link's hands in his much larger ones, and for once—not hunched over—he seems to fill his comparatively giant frame. He speaks slowly, carefully. "Vah Ruda-rudania is m-moving. I'm going to t-trust you to aim that c-cannon, Link. M-my life is in your hands." He squeezes her fingers. She has never seen such genuine and honest trust as she does in the openness of his features. The blood roars in her ears. Her muscles have locked in place in reams of frost; the inside of her mouth ghosts with the aridity of sand.

Yunobo squeezes again and nods. "W-we—" He touches the blue shawl. The vibration of the ground and the rush of air accompanying the Divine Beast's descent unfurls the shawl. A full cape. "We can do this, Link!"
She watches him climb into the cannon. She cannot move. She cannot play hero. She cannot bear the weight of another's life. The Divine Beast curves to the right; its feet break through the rock beneath. The tremor knocks her onto the ground as though the Divine Beast had cut her legs out from under her.

The ice shatters.

When she rolls onto her hands and knees and brings herself upright again, she sprints towards the cannon. The twin levers that shift the cannon on its base prove heavy. She leans the entire weight of her body against them to propel them forward. Link looks up through the slate. Where each limb connects to the main torso of the Divine Beast, she can see a raised dome of a joint, gleaming dully with a violet as deep as the dark unknowns of the bottom of the ocean. She aims the cannon at the first of six. The Divine Beast moves again. She times the intervals between its regular steps by the thudding of her heart. It moves again. Each step, she measures the distance the joints shift. She sets a circular bomb into the chamber. It moves again. She aims below the Divine Beast, then raises the muzzle slightly. It moves again.

Link detonates the bomb.

She cannot look but she cannot tear her gaze away. Yunobo drops too quickly and flies too slowly: she underestimated the pull of gravity. She grips the lever so tightly that her palms burn against the hot metal. Her heart threatens to leap up her throat and throttle her.

The Divine Beast moves again.

Yunobo slams just off-centre of the left downmost joint.

The Divine Beast's limb spasms. It clings on with the other five but the limb comes to a limp rest to hang uselessly down the mountainside. Yunobo hurtles back towards her. She flings herself out of the way as Yunobo crashes into the ground where she stood not a second ago.

"I knew y-you could do it!" he bursts out, his chest puffed out. "C-come on! Just a f-few more times!"

He extends his hand towards her again. The Divine Beast, having regained some semblance a footing, resumes its journey. She grabs his hand and he pulls her up to stand.

They nod at one another.

She aims and times as she did with the first, purposefully aiming higher and releasing so that the Divine Beast takes a step. Its other front limb: injured. Yunobo speeds backwards and clambers back into the cannon for a third round.

Before they can celebrate, Link notices movement along the Divine Beast's back. Panels slide open. A veritable cloud of guardian sentries pours out. Link's eyes widen. She quickens the aim and fires, then brings out a bomb.

The sentries swarm. Numerous but individually weak, Link abandons the cannon to draw their fire. Instead she summons bomb after bomb from the slate and simply allows them to drop behind her, detonating them once she has run a far distance away. So she circles the sentry shack several times. She zigzags and rolls to clear the sentries' blasts at her back. The bombs pick off the sentries one by one.

When Yunobo crashes onto the platform, she stares at him in horror. He staggers backwards. Yet after a moment he regains his footing and grabs the nearest sizeable rock with which to chuck at the sentries.

The stone lands closer to Link's own feet, forcing her to stumble over it.

Yunobo clenches the sides of his head with his hands. As Link runs past him to continue the circle she signs: "Again!"

He tries again. Now the rock smashes two of the sentries from the air. Link scarcely has a second to flash him a sign of victory prior to returning her attention to kiting the sentries with bombs.

In the meantime the Divine Beast moves. With half of its six legs missing, it presses forward at a sluggish pace. Link disposes of the final pair of sentries with a well-timed bomb and Yunobo rolls back into the cannon.

She aims again. The Divine Beast has now reached its nadir—below them for the first time rather than above—and it starts to turn clockwise along the mountain to crawl horizontally towards Darunia. Link detonates the bomb.

Yunobo does not return in a straight shot. The impact angles him upwards yet not enough Link watches him crash into the cliffside itself. "I'm f-fine!" he yells up at her. "I'm c-climbing back up!"

Link waits. The Divine Beast stills. Again panels on its back open, and the blood drains from her face as she finds herself looking down the empty muzzles of cannons. Seven of them, one situated between each two of the joints.

They seem to aim at random. Rearing its head up, the Divine Beast crashes its face into Death Mountain. She watches its head spin, slowly at first and then with such speed that the segments of its face blur into one, drilling into the side of the volcano.

Yunobo's fist smacks into the level ground. Link crouches at the base of the cliff and reaches out a hand. Yunobo slides his hand into hers, but when he tries to pull himself up his weight brings Link to her knees. He gets himself up while Link's face burns.

"Thank you," he says to her anyway; again his features lie perfectly open, perfectly trusting. "C-come on. T-two more! No." He claps his hand onto his chest and speaks again without a flicker: "Two more."

Link aims yet again. She can spot the glowing red deep within the barrels of the cannons protruding from the Divine Beast's back. Not long now. Link fires at the Divine Beast's hindmost left quarter. Its other limbs dangle. They swing slowly from side to side as pendulums marking time.

Yunobo flies straight and true. Just as he smashes into the penultimate joint, causing Link to pump her fists into the air, the Divine Beast's cannons fire at once.

Seven molten rocks soar from the muzzle. Link paces backwards as she tracks their movements. The lowermost projectiles crash against the cliff; but the five upper ones clear. She dives to the ground. The heat of the rocks sailing just overhead brings a scream from her aching throat. The impact not two metres from her sends her tiny frame flung into the sky. The heavens and earth spin about her.

Warmth. Around her shoulders and her hips. Link's vision continues to whirl for a few seconds until her gaze settles on Yunobo's face.

He carries her in his arms.
"Link? Link, a-are you okay?" he asks, his voice nearly an octave higher. "L-link?"

The pounding in her head dwindles. She manages a nod, and Yunobo exhales as he sets her on the ground. Her knees nearly collapse, but she pulls herself up.

Even with only a single functioning foot, the Divine Beast retains its grip on Death Mountain. Its head bores into the magma within the mountain.

"It's charging again," she signs, hardening her eyes. "You said that we need to take out all six limbs."

He dips his head. Acquiescing he rolls back into the cannon for a final shot. Link aims.

She fires.

The Divine Beast's last joint breaks.

She watches its body writhe back and forth. It slides along its belly down the slope of the volcano. The fall rips its head from the mountainside as she might remove a tick gorging itself on her blood. It descends, more and more quickly, its frame thrashing, its limbs spasming uselessly.

The Divine Beast plunges whole into the sea of lava below. A scant few high points still protrude from the liquid rock here and there. A constellation of metal stars in a blood night sky.

Link downs herself to her hands and knees to look over the edge of the cliff. Her arms shake. Yunobo climbs up beside her. She feels the heaviness of his hand on her shoulder.

"Sh-she'll get out of there before long. Usually w-we chase Her away after t-taking out a few limbs, but I th-think that Papa mentioned h-he got all of H-her limbs out. O-once."

They watch.

The hairs on the back of Link's neck rise with the cuccoflesh that crawls over her skin. She watches the lava.

A dark shadow wavers below the surface. It breaches the surface of the lava: the Divine Beast floats atop the surface on its stomach, its six limbs splayed out.

"I...I think we n-need to get down th-there, right?" Yunobo squeaks, tapping his index fingers against one another. "B-but what if She goes under the l-lava again?"

Link opens the glider. She meets Yunobo's gaze.

"Huh?" And then his expression creases over, and he stoops over to point to the Divine Beast.
"...th-the thingy is there on its back, you see it? Th-that's where I think the Champions' slate goes."

She confirms the pedestal by examining the Divine Beast with the telescope. Slotting the slate into her pouch once more, she turns towards Yunobo. "Can you make it down there?"

He shakes his head, asks her to repeat the question. She signs again. He scratches his jaw.

"...y-you—" The breath hisses through his teeth; his fingers stretch on the fabric of the shawl. "You can shoot me down th-there, right?"

She manoeuvres the cannon as far down as it can go. The Divine Beast floats too far for a clear shot but she approximates; fortunately the Divine Beast's entire back could rival half the span of the Bridge of Eldin, and missing would require an extra level of incompetence, ill luck, or both. She holds her breath as she detonates the bomb and Yunobo flies out at breakneck pace.

Link observes the goings-on through the telescope. He lands roughly on the Divine Beast's back. He waves at her; she waves back and leaps off of the cliff to glide downwards.

The burning hot air rising from the surface of the lava keeps her aloft. Link has to close the paraglider repeatedly to fall and open it again to break the descent. She spirals around the Divine Beast's back. At any moment the Divine Beast could rise again, but for now the violet lights of the joints have gone out.

She angles herself towards the pedestal by which Yunobo stands, having crossed over the back while she made the downwards plunge. The bottoms of her boots touch solid ground. Link rolls forward. She lets her body slump onto the back of the Divine Beast with the paraglider covering her shoulders like a particularly flimsy blanket. Feeling the curve of her chest rising and falling against the Divine Beast, she allows herself to breathe.

"L-link?"

She raises her head to look at him and offers him a grin at her landing, to which he smiles back.

"We d-did it. We did it!" Yunobo claps his hands together. Link nods. Removing the slate from the pouch at her hip, she approaches the pedestal, which differs from those she has seen before. This pedestal looks to have one of the black crystals curving up from the back, not hanging down from the ceiling as in several of the shrines and in the towers. The circular face of the pedestal retains the same depression, the same circuitry, the same orange glow that has come to curl with such familiarity in her chest.

Yunobo asks if he can have the honours and Link offers him the slate. He slots the slate into the face. She can hear whirring within the pedestal, the vibration, the resonance. Blue words shimmer on the black crystal. Rather than distilling downwards the words seem to pour into the black crystal from the bottom up as though the slate were filling the crystal with water.

When the blue words reach the top, the very ground beneath her feet shines as those circular pads on the shrines. Beyond the pedestal she spies motion. Another circular pad of similar design but significantly larger, which before her very eyes opens up like the petals of a flower in bloom to reveal a staircase spiralling down into the behemoth's belly.

The entrance to the Divine Beast.

"Huh...?" She listens to Yunobo stepping forward towards the second pad, towards what beckons them within. "D-do we have to...g-go in there?"

Link removes the slate from the face of the pedestal. Its surface gleams with a cool blue light. She looks down. One blue dot and six orange dots have appeared on the lower right corner. She tries to tap them. Any of the orange dots give her a message in a language she does not understand; the blue dot shows her a display image, a drawing of sorts, of the very pedestal she has just activated.

She forces herself to breathe. The carrier of the slate. Helping out the Eldic. Not the hero. No. No, that's Yunobo. She...merely carries the slate.

When her heart stops squeezing as though about to cave in, Link pats Yunobo's shoulder to get his attention. "I think there are six more down there," she remarks. "Or somewhere on the Divine Beast. I don't know where."
Yunobo bobs his head up and down. "B-but since we have one of the t-terminals, Vah Rudarudania isn't g-going to wake up again, right?"

Link squats down by the staircase. The inner workings of the Divine Beast lay in silence and darkness save for the faint light from the entrance. Though Yunobo carries his lantern at his hip, she does not relish dropping into the gaping maw of shadow.

She lifts her head again to the pedestal, to the black crystal that towers over it, and something brown at the very top gives her pause. Where everything on the Divine Beast sings of blue or black or gold, a rock has lodged at the peak of the crystal.

Link returns momentarily to the crystal while Yunobo inquires after her actions. She attempts to climb, but the material of which the Divine Beasts consist—as with the shrines, as with the slate itself—proves too slippery for her to grasp a clean hold.

"Could you throw me up there?"

"Huh? Up...up th-there?"

Yunobo tosses her up. The power in his strike transforms her into a hylian-shaped javelin. Link breaks open the paraglider and drifts towards the pedestal to land on the very top.

She lands in a deep bowl of a birds' nest of stone and red and yellow feathers, complete with a pair of round brown eggs nestled in the softness blanket of down, and a third egg that has broken and fried inside of the bowl.

Eggs.

Birds' eggs on the peak of a pitch black crystal on a glowing orange on the back of a Divine Beast that regularly awakens, climbs up and down mountains, and rains devastation from its back.

Birds' eggs.

A nest that has somehow kept the eggs mostly safe for the weeks since the Divine Beast began its assault.

Birds' eggs.

The laughter rolls from her belly. She nearly tumbles backwards off of the crystal but catches herself. Unable to stop laughing at the sheer joy of the resilience of life that, no matter the danger, thrives everywhere, she bends down to scoop the two remaining eggs from the nest: The broken egg suggests that the parents have abandoned the nest, and with the Divine Beast currently in the lava they may never return.

When she stands back up with the eggs in hand she cannot help but grin at them. Birds' egg.

She marvels at the world.

Her boot slips.

She could cling to the rocky nest, but that would involve letting go of the eggs that will make up her breakfast. In that split second she grips the eggs all the more tightly, and cradles them to her chest to protect them when she slams into the ground.

Yunobo catches her for the second time. She bumps into his waiting arms. Link grins at him even more brightly and springs out of his embrace to whip out the cooking pot.

He ogles her.

"Can't adventure on an empty stomach." Link thumbs to the opening behind her. "It's dark in there. We should wait until morning to get the most light we can." She hesitates. "You don't eat eggs...what do gorons eat?"

Yunobo grimaces. "S-sorry, but eating eggs sounds—I don't w-want to call something disg-gusting...b-but I have no idea h-how you eat those!"

Link shrugs. She dusts the bottom of the cooking pot with goron spice and rock salt, mixing them for an evening coating, as the second that she cracks open the eggs the heat from the air alone will cook them through and through.

"Um...we eat r-rock. Not just rocks that you find on the g-ground, usually—" A strange flicker of guilt passes briefly through his features; Link blinks but does not press. "—though I guess in a time l-like this, Goro-g-goro wouldn't m-mind..."

"Throw me up there again," Link answers.

She glides back down with the nest itself and presents it to Yunobo, who blushes as he takes it from her. She grants him the pot first, scooping up the goron spice and salt into her palm while Yunobo cooks the rock for himself. Link licks up salt on her fingertip a touch at a time—surprisingly difficult with how the heat dries her hands immensely; she never realised how much she takes the light layer of moisture on her skin for granted until she came to Eldin—as she watches him carve out the—best?—chunks of rock and cook them with some oil from his lantern. He asks for a pinch of goron spice which she provides. She cannot help but drool at the mere sight of the rock roast even if she could not eat it.

One day, with the help of the Goddesses, she will acquire the ability to do so. That shall become her next quest once she has finished running errands for Lady Impa: to gain the awesome power of tasting all of the cuisine that the lands formerly known as Hyrule have to offer.

After Yunobo finishes, he returns the pot. "I'll w-wait for you to start. I'm not in a r-rush, except I g-guess for the f-fact that Papa and the E-elders c-could be looking f-for us..." Yunobo glances down his own palms. "...and b-besides, I'd rather we eat t-together, right?"

Yunobo, willing to wait her to finish cooking before he eats his own meal. A true martyr, worthy of Sagedom. She wipes the salt and spice from her palm, then cracks the two eggs inside and whisks them with her knife. The eggs cook quickly, though as the goron spice sets, it has a fireproofing effect on the soon-to-be-omelet. She pushes and flips the eggs. Her mouth floods with saliva as she smells the eggs that she failed to make however many days ago.

She stabs the omelet with the knife. Her ravenous stomach clamours for a meal; she shoves the entire thing into her mouth at once.

As she chews and lets the festival of flavour dance over her senses, the aroma of the spiced omelet dredges up an image.

The goron from her memories. No, not her memories, but the memories of the chosen hero whose body she has stolen. The goron with the two-handed club-like thing on his back, now sitting across from her in his home in Darunia on a blue mat that matched the one beneath her own feet. On two plates before them on a short table: an omelet and a rock roast.
The goron spoke first. "How much Eldic do you know, li'l buddy?"

She shook her head. "Only a little bit. My courier duties didn't take me that far into Eldin...just the eastern bit, sometimes, closest to home."

The goron stroked one of the points of his stone beard, then slapped his palms onto his knees. "We can't have that! You gotta have the whole city at your fingertips. What do you say? I'll teach you so we can roll like pals through the whole of Daru-darunia. It's the crown ruby of Eldin, li'l buddy, and I couldn't be happier to let you see all of it."

Her brow furrowed; the corners of her eyes creased; in the reflection of the plate she could make out the purple puffiness of her lower eyelids.

"Shouldn't we be...preparing? Impa...told me that we have to—"

"Li'l buddy." The sudden sharpness of his tone made her bristle. The goron rumbled in his throat. "First off, we got plenty of time. Second off, I know that destiny's decided to drop down on your shoulder like a fall of rocks, but that isn't fair to you. Besides." He crossed his arms over his barrel chest and tapped his temple. "Honing the mind is just as important as honing the body. Just take it from me."

Her fingers curled inwards.

"Please, li'l buddy."

Slowly her head dipped down.

He taught her through the morning. The specifics of the lessons escape the memory, but the lessons seemed to stretch on forever. The goron's brother, likewise mute, showed her the signs with which to speak, and the goron himself how to understand what she hears.

Towards the end of the afternoon they took a break. He brought her a fireproof elixir and asked if she wanted to see the market instead of spending the day practising with her blade.

She regarded him in the reflection of the sword. A bastard sword that she had learned to wield with either one or two hands. A sword with a title. His eyes held nothing but kindness, but she had never judged emotion well.

"...why are you doing all of this for me?"

"Well, li'l buddy, I figure s'a good idea to learn Eldic either way." He winked at her. "And you know, after all of this is over, you could come live here if you wanted."

Her hands took the shape of the words that her ears cannot resolve. "...you want me to live here?"

"Like family." He clapped his hand on her shoulder. She lowered the blade. "I don't know who you've got back home, but if you wanted—"

She pressed her face into his chest. She stood absolutely still. Ever so slowly his other hand came to a rest on her empty shoulder. "Link...it's all right. Of course I want you to live here, li'l buddy, if you want to be here. You can't defend home if you don't have a home, if you don't have people to come back to."

She did not cry. Neither did she move away. She kept her eyes closed, her fingers trembling at her sides. She said nothing, but stood there, still and silent, in his half-embrace.
"...Link?"

Yunobo’s voice. Her eyelids flutter as she looks up at him, his eyebrows sloping downwards, the corners of his mouth creased in concern.

"Are you f-feeling well?"

She nods.

"The s-sun's coming up. W-we should head down, right?"

She tilts her head back. The dawn has rosened the sky, the sunrise the emblem of hope.

"Let’s go."

"Right." Yunobo swallows. "Right."

They go.

—

Omelet (five hearts) - bird egg, goron spice, rock salt

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: I apologise sincerely for any typos and the like. I didn't proofread this chapter as closely as I would have wanted and will probably re-upload in the future, but it's a short chapter and oversights shouldn't affect too much. Thank you for your understanding and patience.

I chose to make Vah Rudania have six limbs instead of four as a reference to the six-legged mythical salamander associated with fire. Also, I think a six-limbed design would just look cooler and more alien, so there's that.

Hey, Yunobo's slowly getting better about the stuttering! And about his own development. Although Link isn't yet at a mental point where she can probe into the people around her, Yunobo is desperate to prove himself to some degree, which is part of why Link knows Eldic because she learned it from Daruk. Obviously this process took several months at least while she was training with him; she's not fluent and she doesn't know how to read the language (as I've mentioned) but she's conversational.

Link's got some implied family issues. Hmm. Wonder what's up with that.

The Eldic have a saying: "Links tempered in the same flame fit together stronger than those forged from the same ore." It doesn't come up in this chapter (you'll have to wait for the fifty-eighth for that), but it means that shared experience (tempering in the same flame) is more conducive to forming a strong bond than happening to be related by birth (forged from the same ore). It's equivalent to our own saying: "The blood of the covenant runs thicker than the water of the womb."

Thanks again to my beta reader for pointing out my many, many, many fuck-ups as a writer and a human being, and thank you to you, the reader, for coming with me so far. Next time: the Divine Beast Vah Rudania.

midna's ass. 09 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: This series continuously finds ways to end chapters in really, really beautiful ways. This is the best example of that so far. This memory and how it leads into the end of the chapter made me cry.

Emma. 09 September 2017.
Deliciously Grilled Rock Roast

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef and the Eldic youth activate the seven terminals of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania. Working together, they defeat the Malice that has blighted the Divine Beast since the Great Calamity. The travelling chef remembers the previous Champion of Goro-goro's promise to the chef as the torch is passed on to the Eldic youth.

Chapter Notes

To all my readers: This one's a bit of a doozy. Buckle up and take your time. It's the longest chapter that's been posted...so far, though it's not the longest chapter in the entire fic. After this, we're going back to short chapters for some time.

Some non-spoilery author's notes that didn't fit in the end notes: Hey, thank you so much for reading this far! That's one Divine Beast cleared out! Just three more to go. And then, you know, the second half of the fic after that.

I use the lower-case-m "malice" to denote the purple liquid, and the upper-case-M "Malice" to denote Fireblight Ganon (or the other Blights).

Wew! So I wrote this entire chapter in one long sitting with breaks just to use the loo. This is the moment where I thought to myself, "Ah fuck, I can't just live with 3600 word chapters, now can I?" I tried rather desperately to shorten the length of chapters after this as I was writing, but...well, you'll see as we get further in the fic.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Together they descend into the belly of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania. The circular opening on its back spirals into a staircase to its dark interior. As Link walks ever downwards the air grows strangely cooler, until the sweat on her forehead and her back feels not burning hot, but cold. She wipes the sweat from her neck. Her hand comes away damp and stays damp instead of boiling away against her flesh.

Yunobo lights his lantern. It casts around them a thin yellow shell of light that barely cuts through the dark except for the area directly around their feet. Even the light from the opening in the ceiling does little to shed the suffocating shadow.

They walk down, down, down.

She looks about as they take the plunge, and her gaze narrows onto the faint glow of orange scattered in various directions of the bowels of the behemoth. Link stops on the stairs to take a glance through her telescope. Yunobo stoops to look as well.

From their present position she can make out three, possibly four of the six: the first somewhat from the bottom of the stairs; the third and fourth on either side, jutting out horizontally rather than vertically; and the possible fourth far in front of them and raised up on a higher platform, but so far and so faint that she cannot resolve the details.

As they go further, the potential fourth pedestal vanishes from view, along with the first. She goes up and down the steps where the first pedestal at the stairs disappears: it seems to go behind a wall.

At length, Link takes another step, only for her foot to crash against the floor. She nearly trips.

The base of the stairs.

Yunobo lifts the lantern. Instead of a wide flat ground, the floor of the Divine Beast consists of something like a labyrinth, the walls high enough that not even Yunobo could merely climb over. Link touches her chin. She reaches her arm towards the the left-hand wall. He follows her as she walks forward tracing the maze with her palm. They dip in and out of a dead end, take a curve, continue to walk. She tracks their progress by how well she can see the two horizontal pedestals.

A splash.

Halting in her tracks, Link glances down. Yunobo bumps into her from behind and immediately begins to apologise, but she squats down and brushes her right fingertips against the floor. They come away wet. She sniffs: water, somewhat oily.

Oily.

She takes a step or two forward, sliding her feet along the ground rather than picking them up to avoid making noise. The oil pools further in a thin layer. Backing up, she gestures for Yunobo to follow her out of the oil.

At the edge of the oil, Link removes a shard of flint from her flint-pouch. She hears Yunobo suck in a breath. She sets the flint down at the corner of the pool, then walks away from the pool even further.

"I d-don't think th-this is a g-g-good idea," Yunobo whispers to her; she can hear the tap tap tapping of his fingers against one another.

Removing the boomerang from her back, Link glances at him. "Better if the oil burns up now than after we've stepped in it." She swings the boomerang. Her first attempt bounces the boomerang off of the wall. The second try strikes against the flint. It sparks.

The oil catches fire.

The brightness fwooms up around them to light up the innards of the Divine Beast as the oil burns. She watches the fire spread up the corridor and swerve left. Something on the other side of the wall explodes so loudly that Link's ears ring. Then another. A series of explosions further down the maze that vibrate the ground. Yunobo drops the lantern to curl up into a protective ball while Link picks it up and puts it out.

The explosions come to an end. The oil burns itself out. She pats Yunobo on the back; he recoils away with a yelp of monster and speeds away down the corridor from her lightest touch. Hastily lighting the lantern, Link jogs after him. When she hears him slam against the wall, she winces.

He sits back with his head in his hands. When she offers him the lantern, he takes it. They look down the leftmost wall. The burned chassis of multiple guardians scatter through the corridor, some still smouldering with residual oil. Link carves each one open to take the cores.
They walk onwards through the labyrinth to a continuous stream of guardians. Repeatedly they pass through dead ends, but they worry not of the charred automata guarding the corners.

A steady drip...drip...drip prompts Link to look down again. No oil on the floor this time. The dripping grows louder.

Amid the darkness that lies ahead comes another light from around the corner. She squints and indicates for Yunobo to put out the lantern. Without the lantern's brightness, she resolves the colour of the dim glow: orange.

Grinning to herself, she quickens her forward pace. Yunobo yells for her to wait. The lantern shimmers a yellow path forward. She rounds the corner with her left hand still against the wall and the maze opens up to a courtyard that fades into black, so large she cannot see the edges from the illumination of the lantern. The floor spirals inwards in concentric circles to another pedestal with a black crystal behind it. Yunobo raises the lantern higher towards the crystal; Link can make out the statue of a lizard. Behind the lizard range a bird of some sort, something with a long neck—a camel—and a third strange beast for which she has no name.

The dripping comes from somewhere nearby. Link approaches the pedestal. The pattern on the face appears blurry. She wipes her palm over. A thin film of the same oily substance. It stings her hand. She shakes her head.

Drip...drip...drip...

A droplet plinks down onto the face of the pedestal. Link cranes her neck upwards but cannot see into the gloom above.

She dries the depression in the pedestal prior to slotting in the slate. As before the pedestal whirs, vibrates, resonates. As before, the blue words rise up from the bottom of the black crystal, but when they reach the top, the pedestal does not immediately give up the slate. Instead the statue of the lizard glimmers. Blue words sink down its surface to coalesce into a drop from the lizard's snout, which drops down into the tablet.

The surface glows. Two of the seven dots have now glimmered to life, though the second dot still retains an orange smaller dot in the middle, and a strange picture approximating a lizard spreads out over the face of the slate. She feels Yunobo's warm bulk just behind her. "On the Ch-champions' slate...is th-that Vah Ruda-rudania?" Link bobs her head. She tries to touch the various parts of the diagram and finds that she can rotate and change the scale of the schematic. Two blue dots and five orange ones dot the model. The blue: one on the back, one in slightly upwards displaced from the centre. The orange: two on the sides that she saw before; one up high near the head; one near the back end; and another one on the underside of the chest. When she touches the new blue dot, seven sky-blue spheres the same colour as the bomb runes flicker onto the screen. Upon a tap, the sky-blue sphere takes the shape of a cannon with aiming by a rotation of the finger or the slate. The ceiling groans. Link's gaze shoots up: the panel slides open to filter more light into the belly of the beast. She holds her finger down on the sky-blue sphere and it begins to pulsate. She releases.

They hear the cannon explode.

Yunobo swings his head violently from side to side. "D-don't d-d-do that again."

Instead she slides open all of the plates. As they open one by one, the light entering grows brighter and her vision adjusts to the brightness. Link can see her own hands, can see beyond the shell of yellow, can make out the courtyard in which they stand that spans nearly the width of the Divine Beast. Above them run gears of complicated machinery alongside numerous ladders and platforms. with which to get around. Strange blobs of purple ooze cling to the walls, to the floor, between the gears. Here and there guardians patrol the interiors of varying shapes and sizes, though she reports no monsters in the fray.

Another drip splashes on the back of her hand and she recoils, wiping it from her hand on her trousers: In the cool inner regions of the Divine Beast she need not concern herself with fireproofing. Link look upwards to pinpoint the source of the constant drips.

Her lower jaw drops.

Hanging from the ceiling overhead: a massive violet thing that throbs in regular time, the pulses arching from the top to the bottom. As her vision adjusts further she resolves its shape.

A heart.

A great tyrian heart that beats and glistens wetly with a primordial ooze. From the bottom of the heart the oily flammable liquid plinks down. She finds herself repeating the words of the minstrel, as best she can remember:

"To match the monsters spun of Maliced spawn,
"they forged an army of—" She does not recall the word.
"and built behemoths four whose hearts did shine
"with holy power, called the Beasts Divine.
"To guide each Beast, a Champion pledged their life
"to guard the Kingdom through their darkest...

Their darkest hour, though neither rhyme nor rhythm match. Their darkest night? She begins again to remember.

"Huh?" Link hears Yunobo's breathing speed up. "That's...that's the s-song about the War of the Seven S-sages, right?"

"I heard it from a minstrel," she offers.

"Papa t-taught a s-song like that to m-me. Well, it went a l-little differently than that...I think. And th-there was a bit in there about the guardians b-being built to last a really long time, like the v-virtue of Goro-g-goro...b-but it's the s-same song, right? Or I think it's the same s-song." Yunobo's voice trails off.

Touching her chin, Link turns the words of the ballad over in her hands. Link hmms for a moment prior to blinking in epiphany: the Eldic sign for heart doubles as the sign for a gesture for a precious gem. She keeps her gaze fixed on the heart, though she can see no holy power shining. If they could shine a light onto that heart somehow, perhaps that would bring out the sacred power from the song.

The violet of the heart and of the ooze scattered through the innards of the Divine Beast calls to her with the same malicious glitter of the eyes of monsters, of lizalfos and bokoblin that have no desire to live or to thrive as do the creatures of nature, but solely to spread as much chaos and destruction as they can in the short window of their lives. She has never seen a hatchling lizalfos or a baby bokoblin.
The heart beats. The oil had built up considerably in the length of the maze, not to mention what must have spread over the courtyard before having burned, and yet the heart drips so slow that accumulating so much must have taken at least a century.

"I think I kn-know what these are," Yunobo says while Link stares at the far-too-organic heart of the Divine Beast. "They're _t-terminals_, and you use th-them to control Vah Ruda-rudania. B-based on the p-plays written about him, Lord Daru-daruk would stand near the h-head of Vah Ruda-rudania and use the Champions' slate to m-manipulate H-her, or s-something like th-that. So the more terminals we activate, the m-more control we'll have over Vah Ruda-rudania, right? And m-maybe we can..."

"_Let's get the others._" Link starts with the left. She cannot from here see the pedestal past the myriad of machinery connecting the joints of the limbs on the Divine Beast's left side, and so she takes to the first ladder to climb up. She hears Yunobo racing and then rapidly climbing to catch up. Lifting herself up on the low platform, she spots the pedestal in the gap between two giant gears that straddle either end of the platform. It protrudes out horizontally below the half-sphere of the middle joint. Strangely the entire left wall has vertical platforms running up and down, as if built so that the Champion would have access to the pedestal—the terminal—while the Divine Beast were itself vertical.

No ladders. She touches her chin. Yunobo, who has managed to clamber onto the platform in the meantime, likewise scratches his jaw at the sight.

"If you can throw me up, I might be able to glide there," Link suggests. Yunobo sends her sky-high. She waits until the highest point of her arc; when she feels herself slow she rips open the paraglider. With this height she might yet reach the terminal. Here and there guardian sentries buzz about but she curves around them and they leave her be. The vertical platforms rush towards her. She tries to land with her boots on the thin topmost face, slips, and smacks herself straddling the platform between her thighs.

The impact makes her wince.

When Link regains her bearings, she perches on a platform four away from the terminal. The pedestal of the terminal itself seems covered by the violet ooze. Shifting herself cautiously with movements small and slow, Link rights herself into a crouching position on top of the ever so skinny face of the platform. She tries to stretch out a leg to reach the face of the next platform; between the platforms run ladders, but scaling a horizontal ladder made of such smooth material sounds like a one-way ticket to falling. Then again, she has little luck at the present.

She makes the leap.

Her right foot misses entirely but the flat of her left boot pushes her up enough for her to grasp the face of the platform with both hands. Slipping, she throws her body forward until she lies physically with the platform pressed into her abdomen. She alleviates the pain in her gut with a mad scramble to get on top of the platform once more.

One final leap.

She looks down. A veritable lake of violet ooze spreads over the floor. One of the larger guardians with too-many legs, almost identical in appearance to the automaton patrolling the maw of Death Mountain.

Link looks forward. She rubs her ankles to release some of the tension and strain, then winds up another jump.

Somehow she leaps so far that she lands on the corner of the platform and nearly tips over on the other side. Catching herself, she rivets her gaze to the final objective.

She sits on the top of the closest platform with the terminal in reach. A white pole made of the same slippery material—she checks via the stasis rune—runs from floor to ceiling. Link merely has to stretch herself over, around the pole, to physically place the slate into the face of the pedestal.

Her arm proves too short.

Link leans further. The fingers of her right arm strain and ache as she stretches, stretches, stretches over the pedestal. The ooze does not cover the depression in the face where she need slot the slate. She could throw it, but she were to miss or if the slate were to bounce off, she might lose it entirely in the sea of ooze.

She glances around for anything else she could use to get a touch more distance. If she had rope, she could tie it to her spear. Link lifts her hands from the pedestal—leaving only her boots flat—to run her fingers through her sidelocks.

She tries the slate—stasis and magnesis—to check for anything around her not made of the impossibly smooth material. A glint of red towards the bottom of the display snags her attention and she tilts the slate down. A metal something or other on the floor. She magnetises the whatever-it-is and finds that while it resists movement horizontally, she can slide it upwards.

Upwards on the pole.

She laughs a light little laugh as she hits the jackpot. Raising the metal up to the height of the platforms, she sees a metal pillar affixed to a wide platform of that slippery material, the perfect size to fit between the platform on which she crouches and the terminal.

Had Link checked out the floor prior to leaping for the vertical platforms, she could have simply stood on the lift and used magnesis to propel herself up to the terminal.

Her mistake merely makes her laugh all the harder. She rolls forward onto the platform and lifts it higher with magnesis, higher, higher, nearly to the ceiling. She walks to the edge and looks down at the terminal below. When she shuts off the slate, the platform begins to fall. Grooved ridges in the pole greatly slow its acceleration as the platform chunk chunk chunks over each grove. Still the platform gains speed.

As the terminal passes by, she attempts to slam the slate into the face but hits the rim of the pedestal instead.

Magnesis resets her efforts to the ceiling. She tries again, and again, and again, and on the fifth try—she does not propel the platform as high as possible but instead brings the platform to a height just above the terminal to keep it from accelerating too much—manages to slot the slate in. The platform starts to drop; startled, she jumps up from it onto the side of the terminal itself. The material slides under her but she claws up over onto the curve facing the ceiling. She wraps her arms and legs around the rounded pedestal. With the ooze coating the base of the terminal, she scoots herself forward to avoid it, her chin touching the terminal in her efforts to cling to the surface. Link can feel herself slipping to one end or the other and so adjusts her weight to keep firm.

The terminal flashes from orange to blue.

Wobbling on the terminal, she reaches for the slate with her less dominant right hand. Her fingers close around the corner. Pinched between her thumb and forefinger, the slate swings back and forth. The moisture of her sweat slicking her fingers could release the slate from her grasp.

Link holds it to her face. She cannot free her other hand without potentially falling. Instead she pushes the newly glowing blue dot with the tip of her nose.

Instead of the seven sky-blue spheres, she can see the three limbs on the left side highlighted in orange, alongside a few larger symbols at the bottom. She boops a limb with her nose and several buttons with varying symbols appear, the same set of symbols as the larger ones. Link selects one of the larger symbols at random.

The machinery within the Divine Beast begins to whir and come to life. The giant gears grind against one another. The whole of the Divine Beast shifts. The left side starts to angle up and the right side down. Link feels herself sliding off of the terminal. Hastily she bites down on the slate to hold it between her teeth as she grabs for the paraglider on her back and accidentally takes off her cooking pot instead. The Divine Beast continues to shift. Grunting into the slate, she straps the cooking pot back and rips out the paraglider just as her chest clears the crystal on the end of the terminal.

Through the open panels at the top of the Divine Beast, she can see the side of Death Mountain, or something that looks similar, moving further into the distance. The Divine Beast crawls leftwards.

The terminal that controls the three limbs.

She glides down towards the rapidly moving gears, the various pulleys, the magnets and blazes of orange and blue light that manipulate the limbs of the Divine Beast. Link lands on top of one of the gears with no hazards on the top face save for a pole that whirls around at high speeds. The gear takes her spinning right round. She dizzies, light-headed, and tries to look down to find a path through the gears.

The Divine Beast starts to tilt the other way, to right itself again. Her boots slide on the surface of the gear. She opens the paraglider in a panic only for the pole to whip into her side and send her soaring off of the gear. Smarting with the bruises that will undoubtedly purple the right half of her body and the slight pain whenever she takes a breath, Link lands on the platform between the two biggest gears on which Yunobo stood before, although she cannot see him now.

The Divine Beast continues to crawl. She spits the slate out of her mouth and presses the same button again. The Divine Beast groans once more; it slows, then ceases to move. Link tries to glide down, but her right side cramps into pain and her right hand lets go of the glider. She drops to the floor to look around for Yunobo. She finds him cowering on the ladder to the platform.

He hugs her tightly, blubbering that he thought she had died and that Papa was right about him not being able to help and that the time of the Champions had ended and that the Divine Beast had risen again and that it would reduce all of Darunia to dust and ash. His arm only worsens the agony in her right side. She apologises quietly. Once Yunobo calms to sniffling instead of openly sobbing—she rubs the back of her head with the search for some words of comfort to say—she indicates the slate.
They examine the controls together. The various buttons move the limbs from side to side as well as forward and backwards, as well as a particular control that appears to cause the limbs to flail erratically, as Link and Yunobo learn after the vibration discombobulates them, and another that causes the limbs to stomp in random order, presumably in event of ensuring enemies cannot scale the Divine Beast. Each individual limb has the same set of controls; the larger buttons control all three limbs at once.

"S-so, the terminal on f-for the right limbs should be j-j-just like that on the left, right?" Yunobo rubs his palm over the crown of his head.

"I think we could make it climb up Death Mountain again. Then we could scale the ladders to the second terminal."

"H-huh?"

Link repeats herself, but Yunobo merely ogles her in confusion. She can see him straining to understand. She muddles through the words she tries to say. "Vertical. We could scale the ladders, if it's vertical."

"Oh. If V-vah Ruda-rudania is oriented v-vertically, we e-could use the ladders." Yunobo slaps his right hand into his left palm; Link rubs the back of her head. "W-wait...we'd have to go back th-through the c-caldera, right? But then the l-lava would flood the place."

Link touches her chin. "We can close the panels on the top."

"Huh? But then h-h-how would we s-see where we're going?"

She can see the plan so clearly in her mind's eye, yet her arms do not cooperate into the gestures she needs to make. Link has to drag every word from her fingertips. "...Yunobo. Take the slate and get on top of the Divine Beast using the stairs. You can use that terminal—" She demonstrates. "—to close the hatch at the top, and the panes. Then have it crawl to Death Mountain. When you're past the lava, open everything again and come back down."

"W-why me?"

Link gestures to her clothes: wet with oil and damp with sweat. The fireproofing paste on the inner layer has all but washed away. "I don't have enough..." She does not know the word for fireproofing. "...no-fire-burn paste to coat the inside again."

Yunobo nods fiercely. "Wh-when we g-get out of here, I'll get you a lifetime's s-supply for free. I swear it! O-or s-some armour!" He slaps his hands against each other. "I won't e-even have to d-d-do it myself! They'll treat y-you like a hero!"

Link shakes her head. "When we get out of here, don't tell anyone I was involved, in any of this."

Yunobo frowns. "B-but...forgive me for the d-disrespect—I d-don't know if humility is Hyli-hylia's v-virtue—" Neither does Link. "—but Goro-goro always w-wants us to take pride in what we do, especially f-for others. It's not right to h-hide bashfully in the shadows. That's...that's why I decided t-to go out and do something." His fingers curl into the shawl. "Not because I want to be a hero...but because I don't want to hide when there's something I could do."

"It's...," she answers, her hands slow. "I wouldn't...know the—the virtues?—if you asked. I j-just..." She lets her fingers tangle limply before she can evoke the feelings into physical form with the motion of her arms. "Please."
"I w-won't tell anyone unless you tell me I c-can, I promise." Yunobo taps his index fingers against one another. "You're not...you're n-n-not one of the bad guys, are you? I m-mean, if you don't even...kn-know about Hyli-hylia even th-though you're a h-hylian..."

The talk of heresy again, as in Hateno. "I lost my memories a few weeks ago." Yunobo makes a noise of sympathy. Link counts: two months ago, give or take a few days. That number feels familiar to her somehow. Like she heard of something else that happened two months ago that she can't put her finger on. "I even forgot what my name was. It's not that I don't believe, but that I can't remember."

Link meets Yunobo's gaze to search for signs of distrust; she finds nothing but that same open genuity. Though the words of the letter from the cabin pounds on the glass at the back of her thoughts, she hands the slate over to him. He accepts it gingerly and practises opening and closing the circular entrance and the panels before beginning the climb up.

She waits.

Sure enough the inside of the Divine Beast plunges into darkness. She sits on the floor by the terminal in the middle as the Divine Beast roars to life. With only three functional limbs it crawls unsteadily. Yunobo seems to have difficulty turning the Divine Beast in the proper direction, but after some time it begins to move in what feels like a straight line. She can detect the differences between when the Divine Beast crawls into lava; when the Divine Beast swim through the lava; and when the Divine Beast begins to emerge from the other side. She starts to slide along floor towards the maze as the Divine Beast shifts to an upright position and slaps her palm over her face for not having gotten herself up to the terminal. She hits her back on the wall of the maze. Her right flares up in pain.

Abruptly all of the panels open. The brightness sends her to duck her face into her knees while her hand massages her right side. After a few minutes she hears Yunobo calling out for her and attempts a wordless yelp to signal her position. She raises her head to see Yunobo having rolled to the wall of the maze beside her.

"I got the terminal," he says breathlessly, his voice fuller than before. "I think we sh-should have Vah Ruda-rudania climb up Death Mountain and try to get access to the t-terminal on Her s-stomach, right? What do you think?"

Link clenches her right side with her hand, pressing down into it and rubbing circles with her palm to try to tease out if something has pulled or fractured. She nods to Yunobo, who grips the hem of the blue cape.

"I'll do it r-right away! You stay here. Y-you're all right with that, right?"

She dips her head. Yunobo's fingers clatter over the surface of the Divine Beast and he rolls away up the incline.

Link lies down on her side. The Divine Beast, now with six limbs working in tandem, moves swiftly up the volcano. She can feel the impact of its body curving left and right with each stroke.
As it crests the summit the floor angles back. She forces herself to stand. Her right leg nearly buckles beneath her. The floor starts to tilt the other way as she half-walks, half-stumbles to find the entrance into the labyrinth. She swings herself inside of the maze. The angle of the Divine Beast pushes her against the opposite face of the wall.

She groans and closes her eyes. The hit of the high-speed pole has done a greater number on her than she anticipated.
She waits there. From the open-air panels she looks out to the magma in the crater of Death Mountain. With the panels slid back the heated air of Eldin and the cool air of the inside of the Divine Beast must mix. Unless the Divine Beast somehow cools its innards, the heat will reach her.

Link squeezes herself into a ball.

She inhales through her nose and out through her mouth. Idly she searches through her satchel full of bits of monsters and the cores of guardians for something to eat. Her efforts bear an apple, softened and bruised by its journey here. She scrapes the seal of fireproofing paste from its surface to bite down.

The sweetness of its juices calms her and seems to alleviate the pain in one fell swoop.

The Divine Beast rights itself. She rotates her paraglider to cover her face from the light shining from the panels open directly overhead. The heart drip drip drips on the face of the pedestal.

Yunobo finds her cuddled against the wall with the drip drip drip so loud in her ears that her heart beats with the same rhythm. He shakes her shoulder gently. "Link?"

She wriggles her fingers. When she sits up he hands her back the slate, with the terminal on the chest now also glowing blue. Two left: one near the head, and one at the tail. Link stands up and almost collapses again. She props herself up on Yunobo's shoulder.

"Are you s-sure that you're f-feeling well, Link?"

"I'm fine. I hit my side is all, and it hurts a little." She exhales a sharp hiss of air as she massages her side again. "Let's get those last terminals."

The terminal near the head, on the higher level, proves easy to reach once they move the Divine Beast to face the bottom of Death Mountain. Link walks up the high platform, using the stasis rune to sneak past the stalking guardians that would become aware of Yunobo's heavier steps in a flash. She slowly pitches the Divine Beast forward until she can simply walk up the previously vertical wall. Once she hops the edge, Link tilts the Divine Beast back and then makes the short simple walk to the terminal. The slate slots into the face. The terminal grants them access to the ability of the head of the Divine Beast to bore into the earth.

As she returns to Yunobo, slightly limping for the pain still gouging out her right, she neglects to stasis one of the smaller guardians for not having seen it. She hears the charge of its blue bolt and ducks into a side roll as the automaton carves a path of fire-light.

With the stasis rune not yet charged from its previous use, Link whips out the boomerang. She swings back her left arm. The boomerang releases. Her side bursts into cramps of agony, but at least the boomerang slices through of the guardian's legs and arcs back to her. The automaton falls onto its side, but not without firing at her again, which she defends against by throwing herself to the floor and scrambling away on all fours. Another hit with the boomerang pierces the guardian's eye. The automaton lifts up a battle-axe of blue light but she rolls under it to thrust her spear through its heart. From there she stabs through its remaining claws legs with the spear and takes it apart. She rips the axe from its body. Yet she comes away holding merely the axe handle, the blade having vanished or broken off. She knocks on the base of the handle. Only when she swings the axe does the axe-blade stream out bright with blue light. Link spins the axe around and grins to herself before strapping the axe onto her back with the spear and boomerang in her steadily growing collection of weapons.
She pants.

She hears a whirr to her left.

The far larger guardian that she put into stasis earlier has come alive.

But Link has a plan!

She blinks rapidly, turns on her heel, and runs.

Pain shoots through her right side with every step. She leaps from the higher platform and glides one-handed to manage her plunge. Link rolls forward to a stop in front of Yunobo, looks at him, and takes off again.

When they manage to lose the guardian at last, they turn their focus onto the terminal at the tail at the other end of the Divine Beast.

Yunobo and Link cross once more through the maze. Every few steps Link winces. "I could c-carry you," Yunobo says quietly, and Link—having become a burden either way—acquiesces. On the other end by the staircase, they face a large gate with flames burning horizontally on the other side. Neither magnesis nor stasis can make an impact on the gate, though Link notes the steam escaping from the chamber beyond. She downs a fireproof elixir for the sake of standing near the gate and touches her chin while Yunobo mirrors her with a hand at his jaw.

While Yunobo takes a more head-on approach—quite literally, judging by his efforts to steamroll the gate with sufficiently fast rolling—she inspects the sides of the gate for anything that could give them a hint. On the far end, away from the flames and steam, she notes something glistening on the ground. Here the steam condenses to water that pools under the gate.

She kneels down beside the water and pulls out the slate. Though shallow, the pool sits deep enough that the cryonis rune can build a small pillar from the water, which forces the gate up. Link crawls inside of the gate to find herself in a long chamber. On the opposite end, the flames boil water to provide energy in the form of steam. She looks towards the wall closest to her: Similar long tubes protrude from the wall to fire their own flames, though these seem eerily silent. By the light of the inferno from the far side, she makes out a doorway leading further in. The fires block most of the entrance.

The fireproof elixir will keep the heat from burning her, but leaping into the flames with her clothing unprotected would likely encompass the last mistake she would ever make.

Link builds cryonis blocks in front of her as she approaches the fires to test how rapidly they melt, and to inch the water closer to the entrance. If she can shield herself with ice, she can squeeze past to access the next chamber.

The flames melt through the majority of an ice pillar in the span of two and a half seconds. She times several rounds of melting, then—pressing down on her bruised right side as tightly as she can—she raises a pillar and dash-rolls directly into the entrance.

She feels heat on her rear and looks back to find the back end on her tunic on fire. Link drops onto the floor to roll back and forth until she puts the flames out.

The right half of her torso feels as though someone had shoved a knife between her ribs and jerked it up to break through the cavity of her chest. She exhales. She inhales. She exhales again.

Link stands up straight. Steam escapes into the dark hallway. Without Yunobo's lantern, she raises the slate to use it as a source of light. The dim blue light illuminates the space barely in front of her. She walks steadily forward step by step, step by step.

The room opens up into a larger chamber based on the light no longer reflecting from the walls. A terminal gleams orange at the farthest reach of the room. Link picks up her pace, but the Divine Beast would not merely have an empty chamber. Something must lurk in the shadows. Something.

She steps forward into the chamber and something glints on the floor. Link looks down to see: sentry guardians. She jumps back but they do not stir. Squatting by the entrance to the inner chamber, she flashes the slate over the sentries. Asleep. Inert.

If she places her weight on one, the automaton could awaken. Or if she runs across them, they could awaken. If they awaken to any weight whatsoever, then running would get her in and out in safety, but if they awaken only to rapid movement and heavy weight, then crawling or slowly walking would keep her from becoming the sentries' dinner.

Her stomach grumbles and she clicks her tongue at herself.

She grips the slate in her right hand, her left arm still wrapped around her torso. One, two, three—and she sprints.

The guardian sentries whirr to life.

They start to lift up beneath her feet even as she runs over them. The whirring grows to a buzz that fills the entire room and bangs against her eardrums until she—half a metre from the terminal—jumps up with the slate now grasped in both hands and dunks it into the face on the terminal. As she falls and her hands slip from the pedestal, she makes out the black crystal becoming soaked in blue words. The sentries directly beneath her lift up to smack into her chest, her abdomen, her legs, her already hurting right side, and only the chaos in the room prevents the sentries from setting her ablaze.

The blue light flicks on and all of the sentries freeze in the air at once, then drop back onto the ground. She flops with them. Their hard round bodies land on her head, her shoulders, her back. Link lets out a groan.

The sentries roll off of her. She lifts herself out of the pile and shakes the remaining ones off of her body.

Link crawls forward to the terminal to wrest the slate free of the face. She rests her forehead against the pedestal to catch her breath.

She's no hero.

Whoever that person was who inhabited this body before she awoke in the Shrine of Resurrection—whoever that hero was that could have borne the destiny of the entire world on her shoulders— whoever that hero was that could have faced the Calamitous One has died.

She lives as a ghost in the shell, a spirit in mortal form, an imposter passing in the skin of a hero. She could never summon the power, nor the wisdom, nor the courage, to do anything befitting of a hero.

All that she may do will lead to disappointment from those who expect a hero.

Link rubs her forehead against the pedestal back and forth. She lowers her eyelids. She has no time to doze off, even though she has slept less than four hours over the past two days since she entered the northern mine and met Yunobo for the first time, since she decided—out of nowhere, out of the need of someone else, out of having nothing to do—to accompany him, since she decided to subconsciously play hero.

The pedestal.

The last terminal.

Anyone could have done this. Anyone able to move and twist and leap could have gone through her same motions, and possibly come out unscathed if they did not repeat her mistakes.

She could never have completed the Divine Beast on her own. Perhaps if she had brought fireproof armour, or if she thought to stock up on fireproofing paste in Darunia, but her short-sightedness and presumption that she would serve as a courier of the slate and nothing more would have left her dead inside of the Divine Beast if not for Yunobo at her side.

The laughter bubbles up in her throat. At herself. At her situation. At the frailty of life. At her existence from one meal to the next. At the pain in her right side that throbs with every shiver of mirth that trembles her body.

She lets herself rise to a stand. Her hands settle on her stomach as she doubles over in laughter. With slate in hand, Link walks back through the chamber. The terminal grants her access to turn off the flames of steam. She opens the gate, crosses, and closes the gate to activate both sets of fire. Yunobo pelts towards her to squeeze her into a hug that cannot stop her overbearing giddy laughter.

No matter what else, at least they have activated the terminals.

"What now?"

Yunobo itches his jawline. "I d-don't know. M-maybe we should g-get back to that main t-terminal with the four s-statues of the Divine B-beasts. You know, um...w-what were their names?" He holds out a finger for each one. "Vah Ruda-rudania...Vah Medo-medoh...Vah Nabo-Naboris...Vah Ruta-ruta..." He slows his words down; the quivers at the corners of his voice ebb as he strengthens his timbre. "I think that that's the four of them. The Divine Beasts."

The dripping heart.

It must shine now with the holy power mentioned in the minstrel's song. Link nods her head and examines the slate. All seven dots glow blue. The dot in the centre of the seven that activated when she received the map still retains the smaller orange dot within. One more activation at the main terminal.

They return through the maze. Before Yunobo enters, Link gestures towards the end of the maze, where they can bypass the twisting innards entirely and simply go around. Yunobo bounces up and down at her brilliance and she shrugs.

"I can't b-b-believe we did this. It feels like...like a dream c-come true! P-pinch me. Pinch me!" She pinches him. He squeals. "Darunia's been under att-tack for so l-long. I can't believe that th-things were just that...they weren't easy and w-we couldn't have done it without the Champions' slate, but we did it ourselves. W-we did it. We did it, Link. And to think that we only met a few days ago. I f-feel like I've known you forever." She can hear the barely contained sob in his voice, and Link rotates her hands about her wrists in blanking on what to say.

The sight of the main terminal cuts her distress short. She and Yunobo stand before the terminal.
Link offers him the slate.

"W-what?" Yunobo starts to push the slate away; Link holds it in front of her. "No, you're the one who has the Champions' slate. It's only fair that you should activate..." The fingers of his right hand worm into the blue cape. "Are you s-sure?"

She nods.

Yunobo gingerly picks it from her palms. She listens to him struggle to even his breathing. He removes the blue cape to sling it over his shoulder as a sash.

He plants his feet firmly on either side of the terminal. Holding the slate up to the statue of the Divine Beast, its eyes inlaid with rubies, Yunobo intones: "Divine Beast Vah Ruda-rudania...with the b-blessing of the Golden Goddesses, under the p-protection of the Goddess Goro-goro, hear my words. I, Y-yuno—" Yunobo stops, inhales sharply, and speaks with a voice as firm and loud as thunder over the mountains.. "Yunobo, son of Bludo, of Darunia of Eldin, summon You. For the good of the land, of the sea, of the sky; for the good of all of the people beneath the light of the Golden Goddesses; for the good of the future and all that it brings: awaken!"

Yunobo slams the slate into the terminal once more.

At that moment Link lifts her head to look at the heart that should awaken with holy power and sacred light. The heart thumps, pulsates, beat-beat-beats.

Drip drip drip.

The insides of the heart thrash and writhe. Link takes a backwards step. Her fingers close around the spear she readies, just in case.

Yunobo is saying something but she cannot make out his words over the roar of blood rushing through her ears.

The heart bursts open. Link whips her beloved metal cooking pot over her head; the liquid splatters over the top and the floor but its wide bottom keeps her dry. Immediately she returns the cooking pot to her back and squints against the light.

Something that dropped onto the peak of the statues. Link steps another step to squint at it. Glistening wetly, the giant mass slides off of the terminal to thud with a splash to the floor.

The gleaming-wet mound does not stir.

Yunobo gasps. "W-what is that?"

She moves towards it. A vaguely round bulk more than twice her height and span. Covered in that ooze that festers throughout the insides of the Divine Beast, the slope of its back rises up and down as though breathing. It rasps.

It lifts itself up. Link's entire frame trembles. Her hands threaten to drop the metal spear; tears gather at the corner of her eyes. She blinks them away.

The whatever-it-is rises up. Ooze slides off of its form. Her eyes widen as its form beneath the violet liquid starts to take shape.

Like a bloated, mutilated blasphemy of a goron's corpse the mountainous monster towers over her. Just beneath the surface of the amber-brown skin of the monster violet ooze pulsates, bulging out in unnatural undulations under its flesh as though crawling with maggots, the ooze barely contained like it could burst free at any second. An overripe, rotten corpse, its features twisted and expressionless, its eyes gouged out, its mouth overflowing with the same flammable oily substance that spills forth from its maw.

In its loose approximations of fists it carries a massive, ornate variant of the two-handed mining tools she has seen throughout Darunia, decorated with symbols of the gorons. Of a particular family of gorons.

The symbols burn in her mind. In her memory. The day that—not she, but the one who possessed this body before—the day that the goron from her memories let her practise with the weapon, the day that the goron had—

The goron.

The goron who taught her Eldic.

The goron who offered her a home and a family once the Sealing War had ended.

The goron that had piloted the Divine Beast Vah Rudania one hundred years ago, who had fallen during the Great Calamity.

The Champion of Goro-goro.

Daruk.

She raises the spear up. The monster steps towards her. Its foot slams against the floor and she watches the ooze expand and then retract.

It raises the boulder breaker over its head. Slowly the weapon comes crashing down. Link jumps out of the way to the side and thrusts the spear into its leg.

She cannot pull it out again.

The monster swings the boulder breaker in a circular arc, and Link flips backwards. She tries to sprint in again to pull the spear from its leg. When her boot comes in contact with the monster's skin as she braces herself, she can see the ooze eating away at the boot.

She jumps away from it. "Yunobo," she signs. "You can't touch it. Do you hear me!?"

Yunobo has grabbed the slate from the terminal. Lifting it up, he desperately stubs his finger against prods the surface of the slate. "Stasis isn't working!" he yells.

The boulder breaker comes hurtling down. Link rolls to the side. She aims the boomerang which sticks in the monster's neck but does not faze it in any way. The monster rears back its head. She recognises the motion akin to a lizalfos about to breathe fire and sprints backwards. The monster projectile-vomits the seeping oil from its maw after her. Then it rears back again, lifting its arms, and slams the boulder breaker down onto the puddle of liquid it splattered over the floor.

The boulder breaker sparks against the liquid, and the fire blazes.

Link makes a mad dash away to the edge of the puddle and begins to race around it. Her abdomen cramps. She reaches behind her for else that she could use.

"Link, catch!"
She whirls around to see the slate spinning through the air towards her. Link nabs the slate out of the air at the same time as she pulls the handle of the guardian's axe. She swings outwards with the axe; the guardian-blue blade curves into existence with its terrible light.

A weapon that cannot stick itself in the limbs or the head or the torso of the monster taken roots in the remains of someone who once was her—of someone who once was the friend of the person who inhabited this body before her.

Kass's voice rings in her ears.

"To match the monsters spun of Maliced spawn,
"they forged an army of—"

—of automaton. Of guardians.

To fight against the Malice, she needs: weapons that will not get stuck in the malice, but which she can jerk free because they do not exist except in the second of the attack.

Link whips her head around searching for the monster. It finds her: she hears its steady footsteps behind her and spins about, dodging to the left with a hop as it crashes the boulder breaker into the ground. She swings the axe in a wide arc. The light blade slices through the monster's leg and Link jumps backwards as malice spews forth from the wound.

The monster staggers with its leg dismembered, but instead of toppling, it lets the malice form a gelatinous structure on which to support itself. It limps towards her now.

She exhales. She can do this. One hit and she will breathe her last, but until that hit comes—no, if that hit comes, which it won't—she will not fail.

The monster slings the boulder breaker over its shoulders to raise a hand. Its thick fingers lengthen and thin into claws. It opens its palm. She watches from a safe distance as she assesses its abilities.

It slams its claws into the terminal. Something slithers up the palm to ripen and inflate the hand to a ridiculous size, like a bloodsucking insect gorging itself. Its hand grows while Link stares, mouth open, brow knit together, until it rivals the span of the monster itself. With its other hand supporting its elbow, the monster struggles to lift its grotesquely disproportionate hand, the size and shape of one of the projectiles that the Divine Beast shoots from its cannons.

Her eyes widen.

The malice of the hand peels back to reveal a giant, gleaming metal boulder.

Metal.

She fumbles for the slate. The monster swings its arm back. Her sweaty palms slip the slate to the floor and she bends to pick it back up with her heart pounding at her throat. She lifts the slate. The monster begins to arc its arm towards her.

In the window of the slate, the boulder glimmers a brilliant red.

Link magnetises the stone.

The monster's hand sprays against the boulder as the metal suddenly ceases to move. Inhaling—before the monster can realise, if it even has a mind, what has happened—Link lifts the boulder up and sends it crashing down onto the monster's own head. The skin of the monster's face and upper shoulders rips; malice issues forth from the upper half of its body. Link raises the boulder and tries to slam it down again, but the monster rolls along the ground in a twisted mockery of gorons curling up into balls. It spins towards her and she sprints out of its range. When it wheels again to dash, she keeps her stance first to ready her axe.

Yunobo screams.

She leaps up to swing the axe below.

The axe's blade lights up the violet and carves through the remaining tatters of the monster's nont-flesh. Malice sprays. She lands on her feet in Malice—the hiss of her boots dissolving alerts her—and flips backwards out of the ooze to face the monster. Nearly bisected in two the monster struggles to keep itself together. The malice bulges and collapses into a formless pool with the boulder breaker in the midst of the ooze. Something that almost resembles a mouth rises from the foul violet fluid to spit oil at her, but she rolls nimbly to the side. The mouth curls its lack of lips yet dissipates into the pool prior to spitting again.

She breathes heavily. Her lungs burn; her arms ache; her right side shrieks in agony.

She adjusts her grip on the axe and stares at the Malice. It writhes and pulses, but without the corpse of the goron cannot take shape.

"Link! Get to the staircase! Right now!"

Yunobo screams from across the Divine Beast. Link half-turns and in an instant understands Yunobo's warning: All of the malice that has languished in the innards here and there on the Divine Beast have begun to coalesce into a singular Malice. The malice drips down from the gears, from the ceiling, from any surface, and oozes along the floor as might a mould, a blight upon the land. Whatever happens when all of the Malice comes together, she would rather not witness.

Link stows the axe on her back and makes a break for the stairs. The fight has exhausted her. Her leaden limbs no longer function as she urges them to. She jumps or sidesteps the incoming blobs of Malice. Going around the labyrinth, she rolls towards the stairs. In her fatigue she ascends the stairs on all fours for speed, her hands pushing her forward as much as her feet. The stairs draw long, too long, but she pushes herself up. Yunobo waits for her at the top. When she sees him, he rushes down towards her to pick her up like a doll and carry her up.

As soon as she clears the top, her clothes catch fire. She rips them off of herself to throw them down into the stairs where she can retrieve them later. The belongings strapped to her back—the axe, the paraglider, the cooking pot, nothing that has touched her sweat-dampened bare skin—she keeps on. She has not the time to rid herself of the undershirt before it vanishes into ash against her flesh, but she saves her tunic and trousers. Yunobo ignores her debacle and stammers something out. It takes her a second to pay attention, to resolve what he says.

"C-close it close it close it!" He jabbers the same words over and over. She reaches for the slate and he snatches it out of her hand. He jabs the screen. The panels and the entrance slide shut.

The adrenaline drains from her body; fatigue sets in instead. She closes her eyes and sprints over the ground. The fireproof elixir that she drank before activating the final terminal continues to course through her body and will for several hours. First she considers the damage to her boots. After surviving her traipe over the entirety of the lava-filled Eldin, the flats of the boots have given way from the bite of malice.
She'll have to get new ones. When Glepp and Misan pay the commission for the sapphires, she will storm the market and buy herself a brand new pair of boots. They'll wait for her, of course. They'll wait for her to return so that she can lead them back through Eldin to continue their merry business.

Link promised them that she would protect them from any monsters. Such is the task that she took on. And that includes taking care of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania. Just another monster, like any pebblit or chuchu.

She covers her eyes with her arm and lets out a shaky laugh.

Yunobo sets the slate down beside her. Link picks it up but does not yet put the slate into her pouch, instead tossing it between her hands. She glances up at him to find him rocking back and forth.

"What do we do? I d-don't know how long that'll c-contain th-that monster, and I d-don't know if it's going to r-retake Vah Ruda-rudania again." He scratches both sides of his jaw with two hands in his desperation. "At least we know wh-why the Divine Beast g-got like this, right...? Th-that monster must've..." He presses his palms into his face to leave imprints of his rock-like nails in his skin. "...oh, L-lord Daru-daruk. Oh Goddess, no."

The name alone shudders Link into action: "We could sink it," she interjects. "Sink it into the lava."

Yunobo grasps the sides of his head with his hands. "But wouldn't that b-break all of V-vah Ruda-rudania?"

"Better to break it than to put the city at risk."

"But She was s-sent to us by the Goddess. Th-there's got to be a w-way to put H-her back together, right? There's g-got to be something that we can d-do."

Link lifts her hands but Yunobo has not finished.

"W-we could come back with an entire army. We could c-c-come back with all of the gorons in Eldin. We c-could..."

"I don't want to put anyone else in harm's way." Link pauses. The words came out so suddenly that she scarcely needed to force herself. "You can leave if you want. But I don't want anyone else to suffer because of something that I did. I don't want to burden anyone else."

Yunobo inclines his head. "I...I just d-don't—"

The terminal on the back of the Divine Beast blazes purple.

It swells up, and up, and up. The black crystal fills with violet. And then the tip bursts into a fountain of malice that spouts outwards. The terminal itself fragments and breaks; malice coats the shards, animating them. It swirls in the air to once more take form.

No longer a shambling corpse of a goron that once carried the sun in his smile, but a mass of hate and malice, a blight in the truest sense of the word, holding the pieces of the shattered terminal like armour around its vile violet innards, and a flare of fire from something approximating—she cannot say a head for the Malice has no head, no discernible features, nothing that would mark it human or even a living being in any sense of the word—and somewhere from four to eight spindly limbs that form and break and reform as it scuttles with surprising speed towards them. From the black crystal, the Malice incarnate fashions the blade of an axe, so much sharper and so much more terrible than the heavy boulder breaker that Daruk had used for his daily work in the mines, corrupted and perverted into a weapon of war by necessity. The axe of the terminal and the Malice craves no purpose but war and carves nothing but blood and death.

The slate fumbles from her grip. Link jerks the guardian's axe from her back. The Malice rushes her with the axe. She tries to jump then attack as before, but this time the Malice's swings—no longer burdened by its corporeal form—come much quicker. Link spins around. Her beloved cooking pot takes the brunt of the blow. She feels it fracture if not break.

The cooking pot.

The cooking pot that has been by her side since nearly the moment that she woke from the Shrine of Resurrection.

Link rounds on the Malice. Yet she cannot let the cooking pot's injury cloud her judgment. While the Malice leaps back and prepares to rush her again, she flicks her gaze towards Yunobo.

She yells wordlessly for his attention. He stares at her, eyes wide.

"Grab the slate!" she signs as fast as her arms will move. "Use the cannons! Use the cannons against it!"

Yunobo's pupils swallow his irises whole. He breaks into a roll and dashes for the slate. She hears the panels open, feels the vibrations of the Divine Beast drilling its head into the ground.

She focuses on drawing the Malice's attention.

It rushes her again. She sprints out of the way, horizontally this time, and watches as the Malice skitters to a halt at the edge of the Divine Beast. If she can lure it out, then she might slide in an attack.

Yunobo screams at her from the sidelines. "Cannons charging up! P-please be careful, Link!"

Link focuses. The Malice does not merely charge at her, but instead scuttles back and forth on a zigzag. Link rolls forward between its legs. It tries to slam into the ground on top of her but she rolls out too quickly. She hears the cannon explode.

The projectile—the ball of molten rock and steel dredged up from the heart of Death Mountain—soars into the Malice. It does not make a sound but for the foul squelch of Malice spurting out from the opened segment of armour.

The terminal armour around its core breaks into pieces. Bits fall to the ground in fragments. Much of the armour. Yet she can see that the Malice will not withstand an eternal barrage.

The Malice grabs the cannon's projectile in maliced limbs and spins it about to throw the projectile at Link. Sidestepping easily, she readies her axe.

They continue their dance. Each time its attacks become more difficult to avoid as it learns her patterns and as she becomes more fatigued. As long as she feints attacks, she keeps the Malice's attention on her and not on Yunobo, who cowers near the head to perform the much more important function of aiming and firing the cannons.

Another direct hit nearly knocks the Malice from the Divine Beast entirely. More of its armour fragments off. As Link twirls the axe in front of its face, the Malice roils. It spews forth flammable oily liquid, farther than before. The fluid sprays against Link's lower legs. The oil stings, burns, and Link yelps and leaps back to shake the oil from her skin.

Fire blazes from the Malice's body. Its entire form ignites along with the oil, and she realises that—even though the Malice moves more slowly than her on foot—the Malice slides along the oil much faster than she could run. Bleeding fluid more from its injured mass, the Malice shortens its own life to ensure that she burns.

Like any of the monsters she has faced that never value their own life but instead attack, attack, attack until spent, to wreak as much chaos as their short lives allow, the Malice will use its own wounds to murder.

The gap between Link and the Malice closes. When Link tries to change direction, the Malice merely glides on the oil to cut her off. Every muscle in her body quakes. Her tendons tauten. Her legs shiver on the verge of giving out entirely.

Another projectile from the cannon smashes into the Malice. Slamming it off-balance, the projectile grants Link a scant few seconds in which to run. She glances up the length of the entire Divine Beast. Her leaden limbs carry her slowly, too slowly.

She cannot keep this up forever. The battle needs to end. Soon. Now.

"Tilt it!" Link signs with motions as wide as she can. "Tilt the Divine Beast down! Get ready!"

Yunobo screams back a what!? yet the Divine Beast starts to angle itself vertically. Link feels herself sliding downwards. She waits for the Malice to pick itself back up and fling the projectile at her. Instead the projectile rolls away from the Malice as gravity takes hold. The oil dribbles towards the sea of magma in the caldera below; Link flings herself down in advance of the fluid's path.

Either this works, or she burns.

The Malice skates towards her on the oil. She turns her head to observe it over her shoulder as the Malice picks up speed. Once more the gap closes at an alarming rate, aided further by the downwards tilt of the Divine Beast. The Malice cocks its arm back to swing towards her. She throws herself to the ground and the Malice vomits out its own guts to spread the oil more quickly down the Divine Beast's back. Oh-so-soon the front of the flammable fluid will reach her. The Divine Beast continues to tilt. It passes the halfway point.

Her feet lift from the ground.

She opens the paraglider.

Shoving the guardian's axe onto her back, she close her hands around the fireproofed wooden struts.

Her right side throbs in pain but she does not let go. Her arms flare in agony but she does not let go. The Malice starts to arc its axe towards her. Link snaps her legs towards her torso; the axe carves through empty air. The Malice slides under her and out of reach. She watches the Malice attempt to skate up towards her.

Yet the Divine Beast has gone nearly vertical, and gravity takes the Malice down.

The Malice clings to the very edge of the Divine Beast, to the slightly raised rim that runs at the back where the Divine Beast transitions into the tail. Link hooks her right arm through both supports of the paraglider and grips the guardian's axe with her left hand.
She has one shot.

Link aims, patiently letting herself glide downwards, and waits until she floats just above the Malice. If she merely throws it, the axe-blade might not spring into existence: only when she swings does the blade emerge. Twirling the axe in her wrist, she hurls it towards the Malice with a twist as though spinning a flatbread dough. As the axe whirls through the air, the fire-light blade shimmers to life.

The axe cleaves the Malice's limbs in two.

Unable to hold on, the Malice—

—falls.

She dares neither blink nor breathe as the Malice descends, not until she sees with her own eyes that the Malice plunges beneath the magma of the heart of Death Mountain.

The Divine Beast begins to tilt back. At the same time it crawls downwards on Death Mountain, moving more quickly than her glide descends. She drifts aloft on the updraft from the burning oil ignited by the Malice until her feet touch down on the dry ground.

Her legs collapse beneath her.

She curls up on the ground with the paraglider as a blanket. When the adrenaline drains this time, the exhaustion sets in that much faster. Yunobo approaches to return the slate to her, to ask if she feels well, to inquire if he could carry her again.

Link wobbles back to her feet.

Barely hanging on to the edge of consciousness, she opens the entrance to retrieve her clothing and dress herself again. Yunobo rolls down to the main terminal; she glides. The Malice has vanished under the magma of the Death Mountain crater.

All that lies left on the ground: the boulder breaker, and a slate much like Link's.

Link sways back and forth. Yunobo falls to his knees to collect the boulder breaker and the slate. "Th-this...this is Lord Daru-daruk's Champions' slate...right?" he murmurs, more to himself than to Link, who fights against the darkness seeping into the corners of her vision. "...Vah Ruda-rudania needs a new Champion."

"Yuno-yunobo," she signs, her head light, her lungs aflame, her mouth wet with the taste of iron.

He shakes his head. "Huh? Me? I...I can't. P-papa's always said I'm n-not...r-ready for..." Link blinks blearily at him. "...a-and there are so m-m-many others who could genuinely be h-heroes, and I'm just..."

"...you're 'just' the one who freed the Divine Beast from the Malice that killed Daruk," she finishes, her fingers sluggish. The bluntness of her words recoils Yunobo back and squelches in her own innards like she had clawed her fingers through her guts. One hundred years. Daruk, dead. "It's up to you, you...know...but if you ask me...there's no one...better..." Her arms limp to her sides.

"D-do you think Papa w-will be proud of me?"

Link tries to nod but her head lolls drowsily to the side. Her eyelids droop. Her breathing slows.
"Link. You've done so much." She feels firmness under her shoulder and her hips, feels the warm bulk at her side, feels his gossamer touch all around her, lulling her to rest.

"I'm going—" She senses his chest rise and fall against hers. "I'm going to get you back, I promise. You just take it easy."

She nods drowsily. Fatigue lowers her eyelids.

Daruk.

She remembers his favourite dish. Rock roast. Deliciously grilled rock roast, he called it, and once he had taught her the recipe for the first time, she grilled a dish of it for him every day that she stayed in Darunia. An unspoken payment for his kindness.

Every time she brought him the deliciously grilled rock roast, he thanked her and told her, over and over, that she need not feel pressured to 'make up for' anything that he did for her, anything that he gave to her, anything that he offered her.

"I want to be your friend, li'l buddy," he explained again and again. "The only payment I ever want to see is a smile. And I mean a genuine one, li'l buddy."

"...why?"

"Because I like you. You ever had someone say that to you? Well you're 'bout to hear it again. Because I like you, Link. You're a good lass." His features open and genuine. "If I could have a daughter I'd want 'er to be just as selfless, just as resilient, just as courageous as you are."

She said nothing.

"You grill a mighty fine rock roast and Goddesses know I won't turn my nose up at a good meal. And Link, you know as well as I that you are, indeed, the Champion of Hylia, Hero of Hyrule, Her Majesty's Knight, O Courageous Link—" His timbre reverently cradled every word. "—as I am the Champion of Goro-goro, Hero of Eldin, Divine Beast Vah Rudania's Pilot, O Powerful Daruk, but that does not mean that I am not also Daruk, son, brother, father, miner by trade. That the Goddesses have blessed me in this Sealing War does not discard that which I am, nor does it that which you are, as the diamond in ore or in jewel remains a diamond."

He sighed as Link remained silent.

"You have said little about your life before the Blade of Evil's Bane chose you. You keep it all inside, like if you wagged your tongue for a second all the evils in the world would come rushing out."

She said nothing still.

Daruk propped his chin up in his hand. "Who were you? A courier, I've heard. What friends did you have? Urbosa's told me a little, sure, but I want to hear it straight from the ostrich's mouth. I would delight in meeting them, Link. Any friend of yours is already a friend of mine. Like a friend of the family, you know."

"...they won't get in trouble? Th-they won't...be used...to..." Her hands twitched as the shudder up her spine spasmed her otherwise vacantly neutral pose. "Impa said that..." Her arms fell limply to her sides. "...that if I waste time again—" The words spill into one another in the fog, and Link can just faintly recall at the edges of her memory a phrase that iced her veins despite the overwhelming Eldic heat: your charge.
"Trouble?" Daruk stared at her before bursting into laughter. "No, no. His Highness isn't that cruel, either, whatever Impa might've scared you with. The li'l bird's safe in the Castle. And if anyone's threatening your friends, I'll—" He punched his left palm with his right fist. "—them myself. You got that? No one hurts my family without going through me."

Link's fingers curled into her palms. Daruk loosened his fist to settle his hand on her shoulder instead. She flinched at the brush of his thumb against her neck and he drew his arm back.

"Li'l buddy, I just want to know what kind of gal you are. I want to be your friend because I want to be your friend, not because we've been swept together by fate. And when it comes to taking down the big bad boar—" Once more he punched his left palm with his right fist. "—I'll be there all the way for you, li'l buddy. You've got my protection to the last. That's what family's for."

Family.

On the final day of her time in Eldin, she brought him the same deliciously grilled rock roast, but this time she left out the goron spice, left out the little tips and tricks that she had used over the past weeks, left out what made her cooking her cooking.

She told him that she had made a surprise. That she had poured her heart and soul into this rock roast. He had raised his brow at that.

He bit down. She watched him chew. She watched him grimace.

"Whoa there, li'l buddy, what is this?" He listed off her efforts: the blandness, the off-timing of the grill, the overall inadequacy of the meal, and then turned to her. "You feeling well, li'l buddy?"

Without another word, she hugged him.

"You've been telling the truth," she said and left it at that. They went to the kitchen together to prepare a deliciously grilled rock roast. Together. Family. She can still recall the aroma of the black stone melting to liquid gold. She can still remember the gentle strength of his hand patting her shoulder. She can still hear his voice, saying her name, brimming with pride.

Pride.

Daruk had cared for her.

No, not for her.

He had cared for that other Link, that other Link who could be the hero, that other Link that died in the Shrine of Resurrection.

She wonders.

She wonders if he would have cared for her, too.

—

Deliciously Grilled Rock Roast (zero hearts) - rock roast

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: I like writing adventure! And I like writing figuring out puzzles. I changed up the interior of the Divine Beast for two main reasons: (1) you can't replay them once you've cleared them, and I didn't want to delete my previous save file, so I was worried I would get minor details wrong, and (2) in Breath of the Wild, the interiors of the Divine Beasts feel very "gamey" in the sense that they were clearly made for the purposes of being, well, a video game. I think that works great because the Divine Beasts are among the best "dungeons" that the franchise has ever had to offer with how many different ways you can solve the puzzles therein! That said, that works a little bit less well in the scope of a fic that aims to be a touch less "gamey" about things. Rather than unlock all of the movement of Vah Rudania at once, I made each terminal grant use of a different part of the Divine Beast.

The malice "eats away" things that it touches. It's how when matter and antimatter come in contact with one another, both are destroyed. So, as the malice "eats away" things, the malice itself goes away. A pool of malice exposed to the air will eventually go away by itself as it eats away at the air.

I thought about how the guardians were intentionally made ten thousand years ago to fight off the malice. So, (1) they're made of material resistant to being eaten away by the malice, and (2) their weapons can't get stuck or eaten away by the malice, but instead will temporarily make a blade out of energy to injure the malice. Since the malice eats away anything it touches, you need to attack the malice with a weapon capable of forming and re-forming the blade over and over again. That's precisely what the ancient/guardian weapons do in Breath of the Wild. As for where the weapons—and the guardians!—draw their energy, I'll cover that in a later chapter.

I really wanted to make the Blights a big deal to fight. They don't have an HP bar and can't be killed through normal means. You have to destroy all of it at once or it'll regenerate, hence them dunking Fireblight Ganon in magma (which is inside the volcano, hence magma, not lava).

My sincerest apologies to Link for making her fight in the nude. That's what happens when you don't re-apply your fireproofing paste! Since the inside of Vah Rudania was cool, the sweat didn't instantly evaporate from her skin, but washed away the paste on the inside of her clothing. Readers, please don't make it weird.

Deliciously grilled rock roast is something that you can indeed cook in Breath of the Wild, as seen in the side-quest "A Brother's Roast." Rock roast has also been known as rock sirloin in previous Zelda games such as Majora's Mask and Twilight Princess. If you're confused, Link was worried that Daruk had been lying to her about all of the family business, so she devised a "test" for him by purposefully making him a crappy rock roast. Fortunately, he was honest to her about her cooking, so she realised that she could trust him.

It's been mentioned in the fic before, but Link flinching away from people touching her neck...hmm.

We don't see that much of Daruk's relationship with Link in-game except that Daruk's protective of Link, so I gave my own spin on it.

Yunobo actually gets to become a Vah Rudania's pilot! That's right. No ghosts hanging around. This is just the first major difference between game and fic.
A round of applause to my beta reader Emma for making sure that I don't fuck up the original pace of the fic with unnecessary additions during revision. Thank you so much, Emma! And a round towards you, the reader, for sticking it through.

midna's ass. 10 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: This chapter was the moment I fell in love with Delicious in Wilds. The length, the pacing, the clever solutions, the fight scene, the desperation, the ending. It all works so well.

Every time Link clears a Divine Beast in this series - and I hope this isn't a spoiler - every time, there's this amazing feeling of catharsis, as she gets to just pass out. It's a really great feeling.

This is probably my favourite ending line to a chapter in the whole series, and that line is easily one of the best in the whole thing, as far as I'm concerned.

This series really conveys the joy of figuring out the Divine Beasts in Breath of the Wild, putting its own little spin on them as it does. It makes these chapters really fun to read.

Emma. 10 September 2017.
Steamed Fruit

Chapter Summary

Awakening in an inn and receiving a farewell letter from the new pilot of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania, the travelling chef reunites with the merchants and begins the journey out of Eldin to return to Kakariko and fulfil the task given to the chef by the wise matriarch. Along the way, the chef experiences a disturbing and vivid memory of the chef's childhood.

Chapter Notes

A big thank-you to every kudos, comment, bookmark, and view that Delicious in Wilds has received so far. With this, I've officially posted one-fifth of the chapters, and we've just hit 100,000 words on the FFN cross-posted version of Delicious in Wilds. Thank you for all of your support, and I hope that you continue to enjoy the journey.

This chapter features implications of abusive parents, although the abuse is not shown "on-screen" so to speak. Please be careful in reading.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Falling.

Her eyelids flutter. A blue coolness caresses her cheeks. Her fingers twitch. Her toes. She tenses and relaxes each muscle in turn. Her neck and right shoulder blade ache from her sleeping position. Gingerly she slides her hand over her right side. The skin twinges with the bruise, and she can sense a slight discomfort when she breathes in too deeply, but no longer does the injury keep her down.

The Divine Beast Vah Rudania. Not a dream, nor a shadow of a memory.

She lies on a pillow, on a mattress, with a blanket over her. Steadily she opens her eyes to find herself gazing at a sapphire ceiling. She draws herself upwards into a sitting position. Her head pounds. Her parched throat and dry lips bring her to sweep the room with her gaze. All inlaid with sapphire, with some odd tapestries or paintings of sunrises and mountain views along the walls. Atop a stone stand by the left side of her bed she sees neatly folded clothing—some hers, some that she does not recognise—and a large jug of water beside a small cup.

Link pulls the blanket off of her to sit on the side of the bed. Her hands close around the base. The muscles of her arms strain as she lifts the entire jug. The rim of the jug proves too thick for her to put her mouth around comfortably but she perseveres. Water splashes over her face and onto her chest. She drains water like she had not taken a drink in years. The water cools her mouth, rejuvenates her tongue, smooths her throat, and rids her of the taste of sand and mud. Her stomach complains with its fullness. Eventually she sets the jug down, half-empty, and lies back on the bed.
She sleeps.

She awakens again to drink the remainder of the water, then slips into slumber yet again.

Upon the third awakening, she dresses herself. She sorts through the clothing left for her: her trousers and tunic, albeit patched up in places; a new undershirt and undergarments, to substitute for those that must have burned up; her old boots, but with the heels replaced and the outside buffed to shininess.

On the floor she notices a set of fireproof armour in sky blue: metal barrels with sapphires along the inner walls. She takes a chance to try the armour on over her non-fireproof clothes. She paces back and forth, leaps up and down, twirls around, attempts a flip that bumps her into the wall. The heaviness restricts her movements to some degree; in particular the heavy metal presses down on her shoulders. Raising her arms takes significantly more effort than without. Yet she would consider the armour manageable, and it undoubtedly would protect her from monsters better than a simple cloth tunic.

Her satchel, the paraglider, and the cooking pot await her. She turns the cooking pot over to see that the entire bottom has been reinforced with a new plate of metal. Glancing inside from the top, she notes the cracks in the bottom that have been carefully filled in, the newer metal of the same material as the old, but less scratched and worn so that she can clearly see the repairs.

She hugs the cooking pot to thank it for saving her life in more ways than she could recount.

She takes stock of her body. She clips her blue earrings back in her place. She ties her hair into a ponytail with the blue hairband that leaves a red mark around her wrist. She straps the cooking pot to her back. And then Link touches her hand to her chest.

When she exits the room, Link stands in a long hallway of similar doors. The welcome mat beneath her feet greets her to room 2-B in a few languages, most of which she cannot read, but the Central Hyrulean at the bottom comes easily enough to her. Another language below that seems more familiar to her, even if she can't quite name the curve of the characters. Shrugging, Link walks down the hallway of the inn, descends a short flight of stairs, and enters the reception area. The same theme of sunrise runs throughout.

Or sunset, now that she considers the decals of the sun halfway on the horizon.

The elderly goron seated behind the counter waves to her. "$Lin\text{-}link?" She nods. "$Wonderful. Just wait here a moment," he signs, pointing her to one of the chairs in the lobby. She takes a seat. A few other guests lounge about the varying tables and couches. A pair of gerudo women—one wearing a long red and yellow dress and the other a rider's outfit—play some sort of game over a checkered board. A brown-feathered rito peruses a book. Another rito snores loudly beside a nervous-looking and rather pallid sheikah man. A red-haired woman with pointed ears and a particularly large hat that reminds Link of a tiered cake chats animatedly to her goron companion, whose round spectacles offset his hawkish eyes.

Link waits patiently. The elderly inkeep passes along a message to another goron, who nods sagely and disappears into the back. He emerges again with an envelope, which the inkeep passes on to Link.

On paper rather than on metal. Link raises her eyebrows to see symbols of Central Hyrulean on paper in the midst of Darunia. The back of the envelope merely reads to Link, with a small sketch of a smile inked next to her name. She opens the envelope with the knife and unfolds a letter worn and creased over, though new enough that the pages remain crisp.
Link,

Thank you for everything that you've done for Eldin, for Darunia, and for me.

A letter from Yunobo. She reads further. His voice differs in word than in speech. He describes bringing her back to Darunia, putting her up at the Rollin' Inn—the name makes her laugh—and patching up her cooking pot and her clothing as he promised, on top of replacing that which she lost. He insists that she not worry at all about paying him back, because all of this is the least that I can do in return. Yunobo—or whoever wrote the letter—has circled and underlined the least repeatedly. She reads on.

On her request he has agreed to keep all that happened a secret. He fears lying, but he will do anything to protect her. No one knows yet, except for the Council of Elders, that Yunobo has done that thing. Once the Elders understand the implications for the city as a whole, they will announce the goings-on to the world.

The thought both excites and worries him. Several weeks ago he had just begun his apprenticeship as a miner as his forefathers before him, and now he may become that sort of person, you know?

Link reads on: his father scolded Yunobo upon his return to his home. His father, Yunobo explains, does not know yet where Yunobo has been, and the Elders whisked Yunobo anyway, but when Papa finds out, he'll be proud of me, right? You said you thought he would. I trust your judgment, Link!

She rubs the back of her head.

Yunobo asks Link to come back once she has finished her travels, once she has completed the task she mentioned to him for Lady Impa, and that he will always welcome her to the city. Perhaps, Yunobo offers, next time she comes, he could introduce her to his father, and we could make rock roast or ruby pie together.

That waters her mouth.

I know in my heart that the Goddesses brought us together. Though we have known one another for such a short time, the Goddesses would not err. Someday we will see one another once more. I don't know when, but someday.

Take care of yourself, and thank you again, for everything. May the fires of creation ever warm your forge.

Your friend,

Yunobo

Postscript. I don't know if you can read Eldic, so a translator transcribed this for me. I hope that it's legible and that my feelings can carry through to reach you.

Another postscript. I know that I have left some things vague, but I hope that you can understand why.

A third postscript. I hope to see you again soon. I can't go see you at the inn right now to avoid suspicion that you helped me, and because the Elders want me in their council. Someday, the Goddesses will bring us together again. Thank you, my friend Link...

She folds the letter up and tucks it into her satchel. Thanking the innkeep, she asks for the bill, but the elderly goron informs her that someone has already paid.

When she steps out into Darunia, the city itself has grown livelier and lovelier all at once. Even if citizens and visitors to the crown ruby of Eldin do not yet know the truth of their own safety from the rampage of the Divine Beast, she cannot help but close her eyes and lean forward on the railing of the nearest bridge to let the warm air kiss her skin.

They can rebuild the bridges, can mend and renew. The time of hiding in fear has come to pass. She need not take on a hero's mantle.

In the marketplace down in the lower levels of Darunia, she finds Misan and Glepp's sapphire wagon. They bid her welcome. Her commission comes out to a tidy sum: more rupees than she has seen in one place in her entire life, and more rupees than she even knows how to carry back. When Misan offers her a timeliness bonus, Link shakes her head and crosses her arms over her chest to decline the gift. If anything, Link asks if she can take a smaller commission, lest she overburden herself on the road.

Misan claps her hands together. "I see someone's been busy cookin' herself up some new armour!" Link shrugs. Glepp notes that they will head out on the morrow and that Link should spend the rest of the day enjoying the city as she has before.

"Glepp thought you'd run off," Misan signs, winking at Link, "but, aw, I just couldn't see you doing that."

Glepp says little, yet Link can spot a glint—of gratitude?—in her eyes.

And a glint of something else that Link cannot place.

With the hours she has in Darunia, she makes a few purchases—namely fireproofing paste—and browses the possibility of adding chain mail to her arsenal. She shops for swords to replace the weapons that she has lost, as well as bows, but none catches her eye. At last she does sell the monster parts that have ripened the satchel. She delights in the merchants beaming at her for the quality of her wares. Once or twice the crowd presses in on her too tight—voices too loud, bodies too warm—and she breaks away to climb to the less populated heights, to take a moment to breathe in the wind, to quell the rapid thunder of her heart.

Every time she glides back down, for she has a mission to her mouth and a destination in her stomach. And then, here, at the end of her road, Link stands in front of the quarter of the marketplace dedicated to food.

She tries everything that she can. She stocks up on so many ingredients that she purchases a box specifically segmented for easy travelling, carrying and sorting, as chefs might bring them with them, and a metal lid for the cooking pot to go along with the wooden one she already has. She takes a respite away from the masses. Then she returns to trying everything, more of street food than restaurants, to understand what makes Darunia Darunia.

Eventually her belly fills. Though the city shines with a thousand lights, the wilds call her name. Once more Link climbs to the upper levels of Darunia to set off. Lizalfos bathe in the midmorning sun of the pillars leading up to the northern mine. Link glides down to the surfaces and sneaks about. She steals one of their metal spears and a forked boomerang. A pyrup wearing a hard shell catches her on the way out and attempts to scorch her into a snack, but she dispatches the monster with a circular bomb rolled into the hole in its shell.

She carries on.
On the other side of Death Mountain she spots a shrine which has apparently become the sacred training ground for a trio of gorons, who scoff at her attempts to access the shrine. They tell her to overcome their challenge of climbing the entire rock face if she considers herself worthy of even existing upon the Platform of Champions. Raising her eyebrows, she simply nods at their request.

When she scales the final few metres and stands atop the cliff, the gorons ogle her. The leader of the trio grants her the platform, calling her a true goron, to which she bows her head and thanks them. Link slots the slate into the face of the pedestal.

The gorons leap backwards at the shrine bursting into blue light. "It's a whole new future for the brothers!" one cries, pumping his fist and flexing. "We've levelled up!"

Link enters the shrine; the gorons jumble into the lift with her. Squished together they slide down in the tiny chamber. Someone's elbow ends up in her face; another goron's knee against her spine. "If this doesn't let up soon," the eldest of the trio grumbles, "we'll end up metamorphic for sure."

The curtain lifts. The gorons and Link fall out. Link shakes her head. The shrine has no puzzle but instead delivers her directly to the goalpoint: she looks at instructions in the language that she cannot comprehend. The instructions speak of the climbing of cliffs, of how to properly select footholds, of pieces of equipment or clothing that she has never seen before. She turns to leave.

The gorons crowd around the images that flash. One of them squeezes her into an embrace for showing them the wonders of the shrine that they have protected all these years; another calls her a messenger of the cliff-climbing spirits.

She laughs and rubs the back of her head, giving them a modest smile in return.

As the sun begins to dip, she glides and climbs back towards Darunia. She passes the Bridge of Eldin again. Here she notes a shrine that she must have previously missed, for the orange and brown of the shrine on the orange and brown of the Eldic ground; the first time that she walked across the bridge she had preoccupied herself with escorting Yunobo, with the Divine Beast's imminent attack. Now she takes her time.

The shrine challenges her mastery of flight and wind. She soars around a pillar. The instructions, as expected, regard vertical flight and the use of updrafts, but once more the more advanced techniques—the ones that she might have wanted to learn—pass her by without imparting their meaning.

The skies have melted into liquid gold of just after noon. A cavern serves as a place to rest, though when she enters, she meets a goron collapsed with a mining pick still in his hand.

She kneels down beside him to shake his shoulders. The goron rasps for her to come closer. She dips her head towards him; his hands shiver and she feels her mouth dry.

"P...please...please..."

"What is it?" she signs, her blood curdling in her veins.

"Please...if I don't get it...I'll die for sure..."

Link's breathing quickens. "I'll do it! Just tell me what it is!"

"I..." The goron's eyes close and he droops. Link's gasp catches in her throat. "...please...get me..." She leans in. "...get me..." She leans in further. "...a rock roast, or I can't go on..."
She sits up straight. Her fingers curl into fists at the indignity, at the unfairness, at the injustice in the world. Tears stream from her eyes only to immediately evaporate.

For a fellow lover of food she would risk her life and then some.

Link sets out to nab her hands on the most delicious rock ore that she can find. Another goron, understanding the plight of a goron without his rock roast, mobilises to assist her. Together they drag the juiciest, most metal-y, most rock-y roast-y rock roast in the vicinity to the tunnel.

While the other goron massages his fallen brother, she uses up the last of her goron spice and salt to grill the roast in her beloved cooking pot.

Deliciously grilled rock roast, just as Daruk had liked it.

The smell alone brings the fallen goron back to life. Link flips the rock roast out of the pot and the goron catches it out of the air.

He bites in, swallows, and roars. "This...this is the greatest rock roast I've ever had!" The second goron asks for a sample. The two dig in voraciously while Link, rubbing the back of her head, ducks down and blushes at their praise.

The goron who had fallen jumps up. He sweeps an arm towards the wall at the end of the tunnel to declare what he has been mining out for the past several weeks in anticipation of the Divine Beast. "The treasure of the hero," he calls it. Link tilts her head to one side. "Yeeeppp. This right 'ere? S'where the old hero buried his treasure! Or that's what I've heard. S'not like anyone listens to a kid like me, but—hey, tell ya what. You believe me, don't you?"

She nods.

"Since you rejuvenated me with that rock roast, I'll split it with ya fifty-fifty." He glances at the second goron. "Forty-thirty-thirty." The second goron flashes him a thumbs-up. "Don't move!" The goron flexes his bulging muscles and whirls up the pick again. "I could mine through a hundred mountains with this baby! Yow! Oooohh yeah!"

The goron rolls forward towards the end of the tunnel. His arms spin like a windmill gone mad. Standing back with wide eyes she watches shards of rock fly off every time he strikes. From the cracks in the stone filters orange light.

A vein of magma?

No—a shrine.

Grabbing the drillshaft leaning against the wall she takes it to the wall to aid him. The second goron, yelling at his own lack of self-control, takes his fists to the wall.

Stone flies out. The wall breaks down into bits. And there—there—yes, there lies the shrine.

With a grin that she couldn't wipe off her face if she tried, she slams the slate into the face of the pedestal. The second goron, paling at the sudden blue light, quickly makes an excuse of having to feed his house or clean his pet pigeon and rolls out, leaving the miner and Link to descend into the earth.

The hero's treasure comes in the form of a hill covered in the rarest of gems. Link and the goron exchange glances with the lustre of jewels reflected in their eyes. She allows the goron to collect the majority.
Then she notices the barrels crashing down the slope of the hill.

Yelping at the goron for his attention, Link uses magnesis and stasis to cover them throughout their journey up. She slumps down to her legs at the top to pant at the instructions that seems to suggest she never take the gems, for the difficulty of carrying them alongside escaping the hill.

The goron exits the shrine with his arms laden and every available pocket absolutely stuffed to the grim with jewels. He thanks Link over and over.

She beams and thanks him for the opportunity to make a delicious roast.

At long last she approaches the city. A young goron wandering around the hot springs just outside of the city limits spots her and demand her to join in on their team of tag; they need one more player. Grinning, she sets her belongings down to join in their game. They roll about at higher speeds than she can run, yet she outsmarts them as they cannot see their paths forward while rolling.

After rounds of tags that tucker them out, the children pester her about the world outside of Darunia. She seats herself cross-legged on the shore of the hot springs. They crowd around her with a million questions. She tells them about her horse, Ilia. She tells them about the stalking guardians that nearly fried her rear. She tells them about Hateno, about Kasuto, about Kakariko. She tells them about the bokoblins wearing furs in the ruins of the mountains on the Great Plateau and about surfing down the snow. She tells them about snow, of ice and cold. She tells them about how she ended up arrested for a night in Hateno. The children ask question after question and her hands cannot move quickly enough to answer but she tries her best to keep up with their curiosity.

As evening falls the children’s parents come to find them. The children introduce their newfound friend with the eagerness that only children can. With the utmost awe and respect in his voice, one of them gestures wildly to Link and crows out: "And she got arrested once!"

The parent gorons stare at her. She laughs nervously and takes the opportunity to make her escape.

She arrives at the sapphire wagon with the cover of night. When she crawls onto the mat that Glepp and Misan set out for her, she falls asleep in the span of a few seconds.

The morning after, Misan and Glepp set back out. Perhaps the Divine Beast's quelling and new Champion have cleansed the land, for the monsters bother them significantly less frequently, only once or twice every of handful of hours. Misan jokes that Link must have cleared them out so efficiently that she has become a one-woman army to eradicate the threat of malice.

She smiles humbly at them, undeserving of their words.

They pass by Eldic villages over their month-long trip. In Zubora, she stops to say hello to Blaryd, who shows her his progress in selecting the perfect ore from which to craft a son. With Misan and Glepp's allowance at a night's stay, Link cooks dinner for gorons and non-gorons alike in the form of meat balls with curry and another deliciously grilled rock roast. The happiness of everyone at the table chowing down on food, the stories that they tell one another, the grins that they share, the communion of mind and hearts through the aroma and deliciousness of food—for that and for that alone does she live another day.

By the time they arrive in the foothills of Eldin, the heat of summer has started to give way to the coolness of the coming autumn. The smells of the approaching harvest lull Link into a sense of security. In Medigo she says her farewell to Glepp and Misan—and leaves with them her fireproof armor for lack of ability to carry it with her—who go west while she goes south to Kakariko, and thanks them for everything that they've done for her. Misan embraces her in return, in a hug with far too much hair for her to breathe. Glepp pats her on the shoulder.

Only when the sapphire wagon has set off does Link realise that one of them slipped an entire golden rupee into her satchel.

She tears her way to the stable and nearly runs down Gaile in her haste to see Ilia again. Shaking her head, Gaile reminds her that the stabling fee carries no refund, and Link has the rest of the month in which to stable Ilia if she so chooses. Link cuts her off from the details.

"I'll be out of your hair. I have no idea if I'll ever even come back here. Please, let me see my horse."

Gaile lets Ilia out and Link's mouth hurts from the size of her smile at the gentle eyes of her horse. She strokes Ilia's face and neck as Ilia whinnies at her and noses her cheek.

Link rests her forehead against Ilia's. Closing her eyes, she writes a promise into Ilia's shoulder to never stable her again for so long if she can help it.

"If you're done," Gaile says, her tone unaffected, "I'll ask you to stop taking up the hallway."

She leads Ilia outside to the grassier areas south of Medigo, stopping briefly to stock up on fresh fruits that she has lacked in her time in Eldin. The ripeness of those sold in the marketplace could not match those she picks by hand, but after a drought the slightest drop of water more resembles an ocean.

The rocky path gives way to green. The coolness of the breeze in her hair and the warmth of her skin, the freshness of the grass and the scent of life on the late-summer wind. She lets Ilia go where she pleases to stretch her legs, and for Link to remember how to ride, how to soothe her, how to work the bridle.

When the sun paints the steppes gold, Link finds herself and Ilia shelter beneath a tree, its boughs spread out as the arms of one praising the Goddesses. To share a meal with her horse she foregoes meat. Instead she collects water from the river, clean, free of the tang of metal and sulphur, and wraps diced apples, watermelon, cantaloupe, green beans, rosehips, and yam in the leaves of thyme and oregano, echinacea and fenugreek. She sets the metal grate from Darunia onto the top of the pot. Tying the rolled chunks of fruit-in-leaves off with string made of hay from Medigo, she spaces them out on the grate to steam them.

Her mouth waters at the fragrance of sweetness that drifts around the campsite.

She splits the meal eighty-twenty for Ilia, who digs into them eagerly, her tail brushing over her back as she eats. Link glides her hand over the base of Ilia's ears and, leaning against her flank, eats her own meal.

The girl who smelled of horses, who taught her the whistle, who knelt in the musty darkness of a closet—or something like a closet—beside her while her heart throbbed a thousand paces. When she was younger, much younger, she can feel in the smallness of her frame and the weakness of her body. Through the cracks of light in the frame of the door Link could just make out her pupils, large and wet in the shadows of the closet. The girl who smelled of horses, who signed into Link's trembling upturned palms.

"It'll be okay," she repeated over and over into Link's hands. "It'll be okay. They won't find you here. I promise."
Her own arms moved stiffly at best and froze with the thickness of her blood at worst, like a marionette left untouched until the wood within warped to rot. "What if something happens? What if something happens while I'm not here to stop it?"

"They're just arguing with each other. It's not about you. It's not your fault."

"But I should be there. I could stop them from fighting. I...if I don't, isn't it my fault?"

"Link." The girl who smelled of horses gripped Link's hands tightly in hers. "You're twelve years old. You shouldn't be a peacekeeper. And—" A word she cannot make out in the memory. "—is with your grandmother. She's not in any danger."

"But—"

"Please. Please, Link. Please, you shouldn't have to..."

The memory twists, contorts, and suddenly she sees herself laughing as her horse noses leaf-wrapped fruits, softened and tendered by steam's embrace, from her palm, while the girl who smelled of horses stood beside her with a basket of freshly steamed snacks hanging from her arm. Older, now, but she recognises the girl in the memories nonetheless.

"You'll spoil her," the girl who smelled of horses said with a grin.

Link, her hands occupied with her horse, merely smiled sheepishly at her. When her palm emptied, she spoke prior to reaching to grab another handful. "She'll have to ride hard tomorrow. It's a last feast before we go."

"You'll only be gone a month this time, right?" the girl who smelled of horses asked, and through the brightness of her smile, the slowness of her gesture hinted at a fog over the bay.

Link nodded. "It's just the delivery of a single sword and shield."

"All the way to the Castletown," the girl who smelled of horses countered.

Link shrugged. "You know how much I usually take. This trip's just there and back."

"I think Rusl could ask you to take all of Death Mountain and you wouldn't flinch." The girl who smelled of horses shook her head. "I don't know how you do it."

"It's not all bad. My parents are nicer when I come back." The girl who smelled of horses's features distorted into a scowl and Link hurried on. "And I come back with stories and recipes. And the pay helps. And I get to see the whole province."

The girl who smelled of horses winked at her. "Say hi to Marin for me."

Her face flushed red and she hid behind the horse, which only provoked the girl who smelled of horses to laugh. "Bring back something for—" The word, the word, lost in mist. "—too. You know how much she likes souvenirs. She asked me to start teaching her how to ride. One day she'll cross the world."

"...keep her safe while I'm gone."

The girl who smelled of horses smiled. "On my life, Link." She raised her hand to her mouth.

"And when I come back," Link said instead of a good-bye, "I'll make you something." She grinned. "Your favourite."
Her greenish-brown eyes twinkled. "Catfish stew?"

Link held out her hand. "In a pumpkin gourd."

The girl who smelled of horses embraced her. The girl who smelled of horses wrapped her arms around her. The girl who smelled of horses did not say good-bye but see you later.

The girl who smelled of horses, who said I love you.

Link looks up into the branches above her, towards the stars scattered in the seas of the heavens that peek out between the gaps of the leaves like so many glimpses into the past.

Not a hundred years. It can't have been one hundred years. Even if she knew Daruk, it can't have been one hundred years. She can picture the loss of memory, but if a hundred years had elapsed, she would barely be alive, much less look eighteen years of age.

And if one hundred years had elapsed, then Marin, and the girl who smelled of horses, and everyone else from her memories, who knew the original inhabitant of the hero she has stolen, must be—

No.

Not a hundred years.

She rolls over to curl up on her right side. The dank smell of the earth; the crunch of early-autumn leaves beneath her weight; the fragrance of blossoms that have begun to swell to fruit ripe with juice to sticky her fingers and run down her chin: these are her world. Her world. That which she can see, and taste, and touch.

Not a hundred years.

—

Steamed Fruit (three hearts) - apple, Hyrule herb

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: This was a fun chapter to write! Link's been unconscious for over a day during her recovery; fortunately, she didn't need to go to a hospital or anything like that (yet), just some good bed-rest after nearly dying. Yunobo's a sweetheart who unfortunately can't see Link at the moment, which is really for the best from Link's point of view: now she can rapidly slip away before she has her own actions as heroic.

Also, I neglected to mention this last chapter, but I definitely went for a more horror-like feel with the actual Blights themselves. Namely, the Blight actually "possessed" the (essentially pickled) corpse of Daruk, using his own boulder breaker weapon, and carried the Daruk's slate with him. Speaking of which, I know that there was only a single slate in Breath of the Wild, but how in the world where the Champions supposed to control their own Divine Beasts without slates? Therefore I opted to give the others slates as well. The slate aren't coded to a specific Divine Beast, hence why Link could activate the terminals yet Yunobo could register himself as Vah Rudania's pilot. And don't worry; we'll certainly see more of Yunobo before the end of the fic, though it might take a very long while to get there.

If you're having difficulty imagining what the "heart" looked like last chapter, I was picturing the "heart" similar to Calamity Ganon's one in Castle Town in-game.

Ah, right, speaking of Castle Town, I refer to it as the Hyrule Castletown (one word) in Delicious in Wilds; a "castletown" is an actual thing for unaware readers, as many castles did indeed have towns spring up around them.

Almost every single moment in this chapter is a reference to a side-quest that you can take on in-game. And, of course, a reminder that Link has been arrested. What fun! So Link spent most of the summer in Eldin, and it's now about two-thirds of the way through the summer. It's been about four months since she awoke in the Shrine of Resurrection.

Link picking up a metal pot lid is a reference to the progression of shields seen in many Zelda games starting from A Link to the Past: first wooden, then metal, and finally mirror. A mirror pot lid? Wonder how she'll get that one.

Link leaves behind the fireproof armour with Glepp and Misan since she doesn't exactly need it and it's heavy and cumbersome to carry around. Yes, I'm aware that in-game Link carries every outfit just like that. However, life is a touch more complicated than that. Similarly, she doesn't take the full commission. There's no such things as "checks," and carrying around a bunch of rupees is actually much heavier and difficult than you might imagine. That's not the last we'll see of the mercantile duo!

And here we see a little snapshot from Link's childhood. Since we know almost nothing about Link's childhood other than that Link's father was a knight, I decided to put my own spin on things.

The catfish soup in a pumpkin gourd is "the girl who smelled of horses's" favourite dish. It's also one of the strangest recipes in Delicious in Wilds. You'll see.

Link's still making a valiant to deny what's going on, sort of. It's a little like depression, where she knows that it's been one hundred years, yet the implications of that are so terrible that she's clinging to any hope that it hasn't been one hundred years. What she needs now isn't just the truth: she needs an emotional boost.

Thank you once again to my beloved beta reader, Emma, for staying with me for so long, and thank you to you, the reader, for enjoying the first fifth of the fic. Now, onwards we go, to explore the remainder of Hyrule. By the way, it's worth noting that red telescope of Link's that she's been carrying around since the third chapter. Does it remind you of anything?

And, now that we've finished the first fifth of the fic, I'd just like to make a moment to thank everyone who has come so far with me. Without your help and support, Delicious in Wilds wouldn't exist. So, thank you, from the bottom of my heart.

midna's ass. 11 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: Like I said last chapter: Catharsis. Link getting beaten to hell and then being able to just sleep for a while after a boss is a really nice feeling.

Here we are: My single favourite memory in the entire series. It's so nostalgic and bittersweet and scattered and feels like home and longing all at once. This series gives you nostalgia pangs sometimes, longing for something you've never even had.

Emma. 11 September 2017.
Chapter Summary

Returning to the village of Kakariko, the travelling chef is tasked by the wise matriarch with delivering a letter to the chief of Medli in Tabantha. The chef spends a night in the village preparing supper for a certain guard's sisters before setting off.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

The journey back to Kakariko winds her down the foothills of Eldin, through the wetlands of Lanayru and past several villages along the banks of the Hylia River. As she rides Ilia along the eastern side of the river, she pauses every here and there to climb up to the tops of cliffs, of fir trees, of sentry posts erected by people and monsters alike to whip out the red telescope hanging at her left hip and sketch the entirety of the land onto her map. She marks the orange points of shrines in the distance, especially at night when their golden fire-light draws her. As she who bears one of the two Champions' slates—or sheikah slates, or whatever they're called—descending down into the shrines marks a reason for her existence.

And if she meets someone, anyone, who can understand the language of the shrines, maybe she could invite them along.

She prays that she never does.

Most of the shrines lie abandoned in the wilderness, between the forks of rivers, hidden away in forests, atop the tallest peaks. Yet nearly every village has a shrine in its midst or nearby. Even those occasional towns that regard the shrines with little religious significance—as she discovers—describe the shrines as having protective influence; most villagers she passes pay careful attention to their shrines: laden with candles and offerings, or watched over by Sages, or crowned at the town square. Nonetheless she finds her way into the shrines under the cloak of night and wrapped in a cloak of fabric to protect her identity.

She has no desire to harm or worry those who live peacefully by the riverside or in the grassy hills that swell into the Dueling Peaks. Yet an inexplicable urge rises in her belly, somewhere between the insatiable curiosity of the unknown and the comforting familiarity of a challenge of the body and mind rather than of the words and heart.

In the coolness of the shrines, with the only sounds the hum of the air and the pace of her own breathing, she can lose the noise of the crowds, can lose the pressures of interaction and expectation, lose herself. Like in the days on the Great Plateau before she entered the cabin, before she entered Kakariko, before Lady Impa's words transformed her from a being simply existing in the wonders of the world into a ghost with weight her frame can no longer possibly bear cracking down her shoulders to splinter her spine. Like when she naps in the boughs of a tree while Ilia grazes below, nothing but the sun and the wind and the leaves brushing her cheeks.

She loops across Proxim Bridge to pass between the Dueling Peaks. Though she purchased so many ingredients in Darunia, the meals taste best with those meats and roots, those herbs and fruits that she hunts and gathers herself. For that very reason, she enters Kasuto to off-load everything from Darunia at the communal outdoor kitchen while onlookers stare at her.

In exchange she takes samples of spices and salts, measuring them in her own palm, given freely by the spirit of communion.

The burden lifted from her shoulders, she leads Ilia up the climb to Kakariko.

She arrives as a messenger of dusk, bearing the banner of night behind her. The stars greet her and she lifts her gaze to the narrow slice of sky she can see between the Pillars of Levia.

The stars, infinite, uncountable, shining brightly, nameless in their glow. She reaches her arm up to open her hand towards them. She catches starlight on her fingertips to pool into her palm.

The eye in the gate of the village weighs down her arm. She slows Ilia down to a walk.

She enters Kakariko once more, and the name Link gains a bitterness under her tongue.

Despite the time of night, Dorian immediately ushers Link to see Lady Impa, whose eyes glimmer with an emotion that Link cannot identify. Lady Impa asks her of the gorons, of Eldin, of Darunia.

She answers of the monsters that she has witnessed crawling over the land, of the ruins of the village, of the threat of towns overrun, of the goron and his wife who desire a child, of the merchants of sapphire, of the liveliness of the marketplace of Darunia, of the many different people she met on her journey, of the sheer tenacity of life to cling no matter what disaster may strike, of the smiles of those in Darunia, of the deliciousness of goron spice. When she begins to recount the recipes that she has learned, her motions become more animated, her gestures more wild. She sits forward. Her hands twitch from one sign to the other in her haste to impart as much knowledge as possible.

"I could cook it all for you if you wanted! It's some of the most delicious meals I've ever had! If I could just share—"

Quietly, Lady Impa inquires of Darunia in particular.

As if words alone could inject hot lead into her fingers, Link drops her hands to the floor. She dips her head to gaze at the wooden boards in the floor, at the thin cracks of darkness between them. "I think that everyone in Darunia will be all right," she answers slowly, "even with the monsters in Eldin. The villages in the rest of Eldin are at greater risk."

The wrinkles of Lady Impa's face deepen. Each syllable shudders out of her frame with the years that have worn her down. "Link...did you...and the slate...?"

Link says nothing. Her hands lie flat against her knees. At the end of the questions, Lady Impa thanks her for fulfilling the request. Link keeps still.

After a moment Lady Impa inclines her head. "Would you take on another task for me, if you have naught to do?"

She nods. Her existence breathes on the mountainside, in the wind rustling the leaves, in the steam rising from the cooking pot. Wherever she goes, as long as she can call the wilds to her name, she can live as she does already.

Lady Impa bids her to check on the largest city in Tabantha—home mostly to the freewheeling rito —far to the western side of what was once Hyrule. The quickest route will take her through the former Central Hyrule and across Tanagar Canyon on the Bridge of Tabantha. Instructing Dorian to provide an atlas and map, Lady Impa asks another attendant to bring her an envelope. The violet bracelet on her right wrist jangles with the movements of her hand over the parchment. And now she has another letter for Link to deliver. A red letter closed with a symbol of thick wax of the symbol of Lady Impa's house. "Asking you to check on the gorons of Eldin without specific instructions was unfair to you, Link. For that, I apologise. This should make things easier for you." Link swallows. "Please deliver this letter to the current chief of the rito," Lady Impa tells her, "whoever that may be."

"You don't know...?"

Lady Impa's explanation comes careful, every word deliberate. Though she softens her voice, Link can taste the edge of sharpness at the blade of every sound. After all that has happened, Lady Impa elaborates, communication has lessened between the scattered villages remaining in the vastness of the land once known as Hyrule. Yes, merchants continue to bring information alongside their wares, but few would make the trek from Medli to Kakariko, even fewer yet than the handful that would make the trek from Darunia to Kakariko.

Though the past decade or so has seen a rise in travellers between towns, the world has grown more isolated and secluded over the years, as comes in times of tragedy, of stress and fear.

"I should know, more than anyone, that peace will not come from isolation, nor from bearing the world on a single pair of shoulders." Lady Impa's voice trails off. Link raises her head; Lady Impa gazes directly at her with a sadness so deep that Link can sense herself slipping in to drown beneath the weight of the years that she does not possess, of the lifetimes that her body has lost, of the emptiness in her head that she fills instead with the robustness of her own heartbeat. Lady Impa closes her eyes. "As before, keep the letter sealed before it arrives, Link. Good luck. Goddesses be with you."

Link bows her head.

Dorian walks her to the stable to put up Ilia, though she shakes her head and pleads for Dorian to let her keep Ilia beside his house instead under the safety of the wooden awning. He acquiesces. They approach his house. Now that she has returned after weeks away in Eldin, Cottla and Koko's mother—Dorian's wife or lover—must have similarly come back from her trip; so Link says cheerily to Dorian.

Dorian frowns ever so slightly and swings his head from side to side. Link lifts her hands to ask; instead of answering Dorian indicates the door of the house.

Removing her boots, she enters quietly so as not to wake Koko and Cottla, but the girls spring to life the instant the floor creaks. They jump towards Link and climb over her in squirrelly fashion while Link laughs and spins them around. She catches Dorian smiling softly at them. Cottla and Koko ask Link a thousand and one questions about the gorons, about Eldin, about Darunia. Cottla leaps onto the bed and starts to jump up and down with her hands on her hips. "Want big sis Link to make supper! Supper! Now!"

"But Koko already made supper!" Koko counters, joining her sister on the mattress. Link stifles the first round of laughter but has no defenses against the second that doubles her over. "You can't have two suppers!"

"Who says there's a rule 'gainst two suppers!" Cottla yells back.

"Everyone knows that you can't have two suppers!"
Link manages to control her mirth just enough to offer a suggestion: "We don't have to call it supper. We could call it a very big midnight snack." Dorian frowns at her and Link rubs the back of her head, apologising with a sheepish smile.

"Cottla! How come Link lets you have two suppers!" Koko bounces down harder than before.

"Maybe if we had more suppers Mama would come back!"

Koko stops bouncing. Her limbs hang limp; her eyes draw downwards at the corners. Cottla jumps one more time yet Koko simply drops down to the mattress. Dorian clears his throat loudly. "Just to celebrate Link's return," he announces with a forced note of cheeriness in his words that makes Link blink and step backwards, curling herself inwards to make her frame as small and unobtrusive as possible, "we'll have another supper, and then it's off to bed with everyone."

Something knocks against the wooden window. A hush falls over the four standing—or lying, in Koko's case—in the house. Link turns her head towards it. Another knock. Not the steady knocking of a person. Link shifts her left hand behind her back to ready her spear. The sash holding the wooden panes closed gives way.

Ilia's head pokes through the window.

She pokes Koko's hair with her muzzle to chew on her hair. Her ears flick back and forth. Lifting her head, Ilia nickers at Link and strains to fit more of herself through the window.

Cottla and Koko squeal in happiness together at the horse. The tensions melt away; Link can breathe again.

Kneeling on the bed, Link rubs Ilia's forehead and brushes what she can reach of her horse's mane. "Are you hungry, Ilia?" she asks.

Ilia whinnies.

Link inquires for a pumpkin. She taps Koko on the shoulder. "Know any good recipes?"

The features of her face, drawn and wrinkled since Cottla's outburst, brighten into a grin so wide that Link could swear the sun had risen spontaneously in Dorian's home. "Koko knows every good recipe that Mama taught her!"

"That's because you're the most wonderful little sister I could ask for," Link tells her, and the motions of the words warms her arms with such familiarity that she goes through them again. "You're the most wonderful little sister I could ask for.

Just as her body knows how to wield a sword, just as her body knows how to ride a horse, so too does her body know how to form these words.

She trembles.

"Link? What's wrong?" Koko waves her hands in front of Link's face. "Koko knows that breathing that fast isn't good for you."

Link claps her palms against her face, once, twice, and wills her heart to slow. "Let's cook," she says and immediately occupies her hands with the cooking pot.

They prepare two pumpkins, one with meat following Koko's instructions, and one with fruit for dessert and for Ilia's supper. Dorian supplies the smoked meat of cucco raised in the village, the leftovers of the earlier supper from a few hours ago. Link chips in the herbs and mushrooms that she has gathered on the path through the Dueling Peaks.

She helps Koko choose fruits, herbs, a touch of spice for flavour, for both sets of pumpkins. As Koko slices the ingredients into fine and regular chunks, Link inspects what she has set aside for the dessert pumpkin to weed out anything that could cause colic or otherwise make Ilia ill. Satisfied, she assists Koko in grinding together the ingredients.

Koko tastes the insides of the meat-stuffed pumpkin so far. She leans back from the pot while Link leans in to face her day of judgment.

"Koko thinks it needs more salt!" she declares with her finger pointed directly at the sky. Koko scoops a towering handful of salt into her palm. Swallowing hard, Link cups her hands under Koko's smaller ones; she teaches Koko to sprinkle pinches in, stirring each time and tasting again rather than throwing in half of the pot of salt. Koko's jaw drops open at the epiphany. "Koko remembers Mama telling her that too! Did you ever meet Mama?"

Link shakes her head. Koko deflates; Link flicks a goop of pumpkin onto Koko's nose until Koko scrunches up her face in giggles.

Together they close the pumpkins, sealing the edges with wax. Link suggests that they in small holes to prevent the pumpkins from detonating from the build-up of steam, yet Koko yelps out a loud "No!" that makes Link blink at her.

Koko takes Link outside to fill the cooking pot with soil, which makes Link raise her eyebrows, but she listens to Koko's instructions of what her mother taught her. Koko mixes the soil in the pot with pieces of charcoal that Dorian gives them; Link can see the twinkling in his eyes at Koko's smile. Link and Koko wrap both of the pumpkins tightly in linen that Dorian provides and pack them into the soil. Covering the top with a layer of charcoal, Koko pours a small dribble of oil over the surface. She holds a candle-flame to it until the oil ignites.

Link on the left and Koko on the right, the two girls kneel in front of the cooking pot as the charcoal catches the blaze.

"Now Koko waits!" Koko rubs her hands together. "Thank you, big sister." She wobble slightly and Link catches her with an arm around her upper back; Koko leans her head against Link's shoulder. The warmth of her tiny frame brings Link to hold Koko more tightly against herself.

Movement at Link's left side opens her eyes. As if on cue, Cottla has nestled into the crook of Link's other arm, her head drooping onto Link's thigh. Cottla murmurs something on her breath that Link does not catch and does not need to catch. She wraps her arms around each girl, stroking their hair with gentle fingers. Cottla dozes off first, and then Koko, the night far too deep for them to stay awake.

Though she has been in the company of Koko and Cottla for less than a week, her absence has made the heart grow fonder. She need not know them long to have seen the goodness in their hearts and the brilliance of their eyes, and she need not know them long to have taken that eminent position of big sister.

A family.

"You look like a mother hen," says Dorian. When Link glances up at him, tidying about the house and the mattress on which Koko and Cottla were jumping, she finds his face bearing the wear and exhaustion that he hides when Cottla and Koko can see him.

"If you start clucking, you're sleeping outside." He raises a hand, palm outwards. "Just kidding. Warms my heart to see that my daughters have taken to you like that. I think they've...needed someone like you in their lives."

"Someone like me?"

"Someone like you," he repeats, nearly inaudible.

The pumpkins finish. Link awakens Koko and Cottla by patting them on their heads and stroking their cheeks. Koko starts up. She hangs her head. "Koko is the worst sister ever," she bemoans. "Koko fell asleep!"

"The best sister ever for making supper for her little sister."

Cottla bobs her head up and down. Squirming out of Link's embrace, she crows: "Koko and Link are the best big sisters ever!"

Cande-light shines in the wetness of Koko's eyes.

With Link's aid Koko removes the pumpkins from the soil and unseals the wax. She slaps her palms against the rind. "They sound cooked, just like Mama taught Koko!"

Link laughs. They cut into the pumpkins, the meat into quarters and the dessert in an eighty-twenty split, to Cottla's dismay. Link carries the bigger chunk of the pumpkin out to Ilia. While her horse eats, Link takes a few moments to brush her coat and mane, to check her for injuries, to ensure that the horseshoes have stayed on properly, to examine where the straps of the saddle and bridle sit and ensure she has worn nothing too tightly. Link embraces Ilia's neck.

"Good girl," she spells into Ilia's shoulder. "Have a good night."

Upon her return to the house, she finds that the sisters have split the entire remaining fifth of the dessert pumpkin between them. Dorian shrugs and Link tells them to enjoy.

The only sweetness she needs is their smiles.

She digs into the meat-stuffed pumpkin. The cucco meat mixed with steamed herbs and pumpkin innards bring out a tender delectability, the meat having absorbed the flavours around it to conduct an orchestra of tones and aromas on her tongue. Link claps her hands together and kneels in front of Koko.

"Koko knows the best recipes," she signs once she has finished bowing, and Koko's cheeks flush as red as her eyes.

Link wolfs down her portion of the pumpkin with gusto and licks her fingers and lips after every bite. The flavours dance around her with a subtle familiarity that sparks recognition.

She closes her eyes.

The girl with the golden hair, who held the skewer of fruit and mushrooms. Sitting in front of the campfire. At dawn, early dawn, with a pile of books beside her. Her tongue poked out of her mouth as she combed through a tome, a pencil tucked behind her ear.

Link, seated across from her, steamed a pumpkin over the fire. She dabbed honey and butter into the quail meat she prepared for their breakfast. A tall, thin figure lay curled up by the campfire with a blanket pulled over her, having fallen asleep while sitting.

"I'm so close to figure this out," the girl with the golden hair said out loud. "The key to sealing away the Calamity might have nothing to do with prayer at all. If we can access the Sacred Realm, then we should be able to strike at the very heart of the Calamity. You'll fight with me, won't you?"

Link stirred the innards of the pumpkin. She nodded.

"At least you believe me." The girl with the golden hair exhaled. She propped her chin up in her hand. "No one in my family has had to play the part of the Goddess in generations. What if the sacred power has nothing to do with prayer? If we can unlock the secrets of the slate and the Divine Beasts—if we can understand the purpose of the shrines—if we can puzzle out all of these folktales about the Sacred Realm—then we could avert the Calamity without ever resorting to prophecy or superstition." Setting the book down into her lap she wet her fingers to turn the page. "I feel like there's just one missing piece to the puzzle, but, oh, I don't know what it could be." Her features twisted into worry. "There's the story about the mirrors, but that seems too silly even for me...oh, I feel like I'm so close."

"I believe in you." Link signed, and the girl in the golden hair's mouth relaxed into a smile.

"If only I could get Father to believe me as well."

The woman in black sprang to her feet. She threw her head back and forth, and the girl with the golden hair laughed. "Good morning. I'm glad you got some sleep."

The woman in black prostrated herself before the girl with the golden hair. "Please forgive me for my lapse in duty. I will not let that happen again so long as I live."

"You don't need to apologise." The girl with the golden hair dismissed the woman in black with a wave of the hand. "You've barely been sleeping since we set out. Link can take care of me just fine, you know."

"...Your Majesty, I would nonetheless prefer to be there for you. Need I remind you that I have been with you since birth—"

"And I appreciate every second of you protecting me, but you're still a human being. You need to sleep. When did you sleep before last night? Three days ago? I worry about you." The girl with the golden hair closed the tome with a soft pomf. "I'll not hear another word about this."

"...of course, Your Majesty." The woman in black's glare bore a hole through Link's back. She focused her attention on the meat-stuffed pumpkin that would bring another smile to the face of the girl with the golden hair, just as Link presently focuses her attention on anything but the words Your Majesty.

With the pumpkin finished off, Dorian sends Cottla, Koko, and Link to sleep. In the middle of the night, rustling near Link's bed alerts her to blearily open her eyes. Sitting up, she sees Dorian going through her satchel. She rubs her eyes. Dorian places her things back. "I thought I smelled something rotting," he explains, beaming at her while she attempts to blink sleep from her eyes, "so I hope you didn't mind me taking care of some of the things in your pack. Say, you didn't lose the slate, did you?"

Link shakes her head. She yawns.
"That's good to hear. Where is it, if you didn't lose it?" Link starts to sink back down into the bed instead. "Link? Ah. Hn. Well. I took care of the rotting—the rotting—the rotting apple, right, that is the thing I thought was rotting, yes—so have a restful night."

Dipping her head, she drifts down into the softness of pillows again. The slate presses into her right hip.

The next morning, with Koko pushing a bunch of carrots into her arms, Link and Ilia set off once more, this time south to Kasuto, between the Dueling Peaks, and to western Hyrule.

Or rather, the western land that was once Hyrule.

Before she leaves the confines of the mountain valley that have protected Kakariko for so long, Link lets Ilia rest in the shade while she scales atop a Pillar of Levia. The morning passes. Her world narrows to the scent of the dew-damped stone, the coarseness of rock beneath her calloused palms, the rhythmic movements of her upwards climb. The sun reaches its zenith when, at last, she breathes in the coolness of the air at this height.

She looks out over the world. At the dips and rises in the land, at the forests of green and rivers of blue, at the paths walked to soil by the feet that have trodden before her, at the flowers sprinkled through the grassy fields that sway under the gossamer touch of the same wind that ruffles her hair as an old friend and lifts the fine hairs on her arms.

She inhales the scent of this world that she calls home.

She raises her hands. Her arms sweep physically through her existence with the beating of her heart and the breathing of her lungs. "It doesn't matter who Link used to be," she says, to the world, to the Goddesses, to herself. "I'm not going to let this haunt me forever. I've had enough of being haunted. I'm what I make of myself. I'm going to live, and be myself, and that is going to be enough."

She says it again. And again. Until her arms tire and her fingers stiffen she repeats herself into the wind so that it may carry the shape of her words. Cupping her hands over her mouth, she yells out the love of life that wakes her every morning and calms her every night.

Her life is her own. As long as she is alive, she is herself.

—

Tough Meat-Stuffed Pumpkin (six hearts, low defense boost for 03:20) - fortified pumpkin, hylian shroom, Hyrule herb, raw drumstick, rock salt

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Wow, here's a comment I meant to make back in the fourteenth or so chapter and completely forgot: I was disappointed by the Bridge of Eldin in Breath of the Wild, so I made the Bridge of Eldin in Delicious in Wilds the much more impressive size of the bridge-of-the-same-name in Twilight Princess. Similarly, I renamed the Great Tabantha Bridge as the Bridge of Tabantha to keep the name-scheme going.

Anyways, as for the chapter: at least one reader has mentioned expecting Link's anger towards Impa. Not quite in this chapter, but you'll see how it goes in the future.

Regarding Cottla and Koko taking to Link and Link taking to Koko and Cottla, similar things have happened to me in the past. It's quite easy for people to get close rather quick, especially for those who are missing people. I wanted to better emphasise the effects of the loss of the mother on the family, hence the (terrifying to Link) moment of Cottla engaging in the self-blaming/bargaining behaviour here.

Speaking of the sisters, hey, you haven't forgotten about that red telescope, have you?

The Sacred Realm (as seen in other Zelda games) is known in folk-tales passed down to the time of Delicious in Wilds, regarded a little bit like how we might regard a story like Santa Claus or Neverland from Peter Pan. There are those who believe in the Sacred Realm as a heaven or afterlife of sorts, or as the realm where the deities reside depending on faith. For the average person, however, the Sacred Realm is a fantastical place lifted from nursery rhymes and not something to take seriously. Zelda, who is of a cold and scientific mind, has turned to anything that might explain her lack of sealing magic. But is it so simple?

My, but Dorian's behaviour was suspicious. Link's too sleepy and naive to really think about what Dorian might have been doing.

And now we have Link's major character breakthrough in terms of how she views herself and who she wants to be. It's certainly a step towards something.

Another most wonderful thank you to my amazing beta reader, Emma, and my amazing readers (all of you). In particular, I'd like to thank Emma so much for much support she has given me almost since the very beginning of the project. Just when I was getting dejecting that Delicious in Wilds was a waste of time, she came on-board as my beta reader to cheer me on. And now, thank you to all of my readers for enjoying the journey so far.

Next: to Tabantha!

midna's ass. 12 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: I love Koko! Her story in Delicious in Wilds is really subtle but really, really well done.

Dorian tries to be sneaky. He's not very good at it.

Have I ever mentioned how amazing the prose in Delicious in Wilds is? Seriously, read this line again: "Lady Impa gazes directly at her with a sadness so deep that Link can sense herself slipping in to drown beneath the weight of the years that she does not possess, of the lifetimes that her body has lost, of the emptiness in her head that she fills instead with the robustness of her own heartbeat." That's some good prose.

We get to go to Tabantha next! The Vah Medoh portion of this series is my favourite part of the whole thing.

Emma. 12 September 2017.
Spicy Meat Curry

Chapter Summary

As the travelling chef travels from Kakariko in Necluda towards Tabantha, the chef encounters two old friends; conquers a cooking challenge like no other; and remembers a certain little girl in pigtails.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

She exits Kakariko to the south. Link has run the path through Kasuto between the Dueling Peaks so frequently that the bends in the road have etched not only into the map she curls up in the tube on her back but also in the map of her muscles. Her body guides Ilia along the path while she takes the time to look about. The lizalfos spear strapped to her back bumps against the back of her head with every hoof-beat.

She continues westward. A sudden low horn indicates a camp of bokoblins on a tall wooden shenanigan that spirals around a thick tree by the side of the road. They screech at her as she passes by. She turns herself backwards on Ilia to wave at them. Their arrows whistle by, missing by entire metres. The glint of a blade in one of the bokoblin's hands reflects her giddy smile. She swerves Ilia behind a bend before dismounting.

Sneaking back towards the camp through noisy bushes, she notices a cluster of blue octoroks floating in the river. She lifts her head towards the camp: the bokoblins have returned to dancing, sparring, and—in the case of the one bokoblin with whom she feels kinship in her very gut—salivating over steaming fish.

Two bokoblins, one blue and one black, squat on the bank of the river and take turns trying to scoop fish out of the water with their bare hands. The black bokoblin carries a traveller's sword on its back. She joins them to fish by the side of the river, albeit from a safe distance away. Crouching, she observes the silver shimmer of fish just below the surface.

With every failed attempt of catching fish, she scoots closer to the bokoblins.

Link watches them to study their technique. The blue bokoblin startles the fish while the sword-bokoblin, anticipating where the fish will dart, coils up its arm just in front of the fish.

She tries the same approach but—like the bokoblins—comes out empty-handed. Frowning, Link readies the lizalfos spear and stands up.

The first few thrusts hit the sandy bank of the river. But the fifth catches a fish's fin. The fish darts away nonetheless, yet the scrap of fin on the pointed tip of the spear propels her onwards.

She readies her spear. A particularly large bass swims lazily downcurrent. She tracks its movement, aims just in front, and strikes.

She spears the fish.

Flipping the spear from the water that sprays her and the bokoblins alike, she thrusts the spear aloft. to show the flopping bass to the world. The bokoblins on the riverbank shriek shrilly. Instead of them attacking her, however, Link finds them dancing and slapping their hands against their bellies.

She drops the fish on the ground in front of them. Their heads snap down from the fish to her and back to the fish again. The blue bokoblin snatches the fish to run back up to the camp with the bass lifted over its head. The sword-bokoblin stares at her.

She waves at it.

Without dropping its gaze from her, the sword-bokoblin swivels about on its heel. She stands perfectly still. The moment it turns its back, she leans forward, grabs the hilt of the sword on its back, and pulls the blade out from the leather sheath.

She sprints off in the opposite direction.

The now-empty-sheath-bokoblin screams behind her. She can hear it lunging towards her while she laughs her way down the river right up until three more bokoblins burst out of the bushes in front of her.

A trap.

She skids to the right. The bokoblins chasing her and the bokoblins from the bushes smack into one another while she pelts forward.

The hiss of an octorok sucking in its breath trumpets the agonising pain that knocks her face-first into the sand under the water. Scrambling to her feet and gasping for breath, she summons a bomb to chuck the explosive at the bokoblins. It detonates in the air and flings the bokoblins away. When the octorok hisses in again she rolls forward between the legs of the empty-sheath-bokoblin whose sword she has stolen. The empty-sheath-bokoblin wheels on her in a frothing rage. She winks at it.

The octorok's rock smashes into its head.

While it slumps forward, unconscious, she wriggles out from under the bokoblin and pauses to shake the leather sheath from its body. The strap catches on the bokoblin's shoulders. She jiggles the bokoblin more vigorously. Its head flops from side to side. At last she gives the bokoblin a final violent shake and the sheath pops off.

With her theft secured, Link runs off into the bushes before the other bokoblins can recover.

As she makes her escape, she bursts out laughing all the way until she smacks her face into something tall and blue. Craning her neck she finds a long snout with a wagging tongue sniffing her.

Link raises a shaky hand to greet the moblin.

With her sword.

The moblin swings its wooden club at her and she manages to flip backwards. Shoving the sword into the sheath, she whistles. The moblin cringes backwards with its palms over its ears. She whistles again and a crop of two or three red moblins poke their heads drowsily from the bushes.

She ogles the moblins. They ogle her.

The neighing of her horse fills her with more relief than even the demise of the Malice of the Divine Beast. Mounting Ilia in a single bound, Link tears up the grass up and away.

Though the route suggested by Lady Impa and Dorian would take her across Central Hyrule around the Great Plateau, she need only take a brief glance across the wide flat plains and spot the swarms of giant guardians stalking the grasses through the red telescope before she promptly turns about, much to Ilia's neighing confusion. Link regards the map she scribbled out from Lady Impa's atlas. To the north she can wrap around Eldin to follow the thin strip of land between the Hylia River and Lake Mekar along the province of Rauru.

Once more she tries to avoid settlements on the riverside, though a pack of bokoblins and other beasties approaching a village gives her pause. Hiding her face in the rider's cloak, she joins the villagers in their defense. She looses arrows from the sloped dome roof of the stable until her quiver runs dry down to a handful, then takes to the ground with her sword. The rusted blade breaks. Link steals a silver longsword from a bokoblin to continue the fight.

When the last of the forces disperse to dust and she tears the sword out from the torso of a bokoblin, she takes a moment to collect arrows from the fallen bodies of monsters. A villager, potentially mistaking her for a monster, lodges an arrow into her thigh.

She tries to flee. To avoid becoming known as a traveller who might step in upon the attack of monsters. To cower from the title of hero. Yet she can only go so far before the archer who shot her catches up to her.

Link spends the night in Japas, a zora-established fishing village with a healthy population of gorons and sheikah, a few of whom also sport pointed ears or scarlet hair.

The village healers—a thin and giggly goron with a shock of white hair and an overly excited zora who closes her wounds with an application of thick red salve—remove the arrow with little effort: the arrowhead, having spared her bone, moves and shifts with ease. She thanks them for their help. They decline payment; Link insists on pushing silver rupees into their hands. The healers ask her name and she shakes her head. As soon as dawn breaks, she saddles Ilia and takes off.

On the road north she takes more frequent breaks to rest the ache in her bandaged thigh and to cool off from the broiling heat of the summer that day by day starts to slacken its hold. The fragrances of harvest come ever closer. The forests she passes burst with the promise of the feast just over the bend as the nights cast longer and longer shadows over the earth. Link travels over the Thims Bridge and crosses the Trilby Plain.

Near another village on the waterfront of the Hylia River, in the heart of the arable land around Pico Pond, she catches the strains of a song she has heard before. No, not a song, but a certain instrument. Music.

Maracas.

Hestu—the tree-person she met on her first journey to Kakariko, which seems like a lifetime ago—conducts a choir of five frogs in the pond with their maracas as conductor's batons. Link approaches on Ilia, who shies at the sight of a living tree. Dismounting, she seats herself at the bank of the pond to listen to the frogs' singing.

"Shakalah! Da na na naaa...!" Hestu shakes their maracas to bring the frogs to lift themselves out of the water for the final note. They open their mouths in harmonising turn: first the grey, then the blue, then the turquoise, then the yellow, and finally the reddish-orange with their highest treble. Hestu bows to them and they to Hestu. Hestu speaks to the frogs in a language of whistles and whispers. The frogs croak back, then disperse into the water.
Link applauds wildly. Hestu leaps up onto their twirling leaf that steadily drifts back down to earth. "Yahaha! Hestu did not see you there, friendly friend!" Hestu claps their stubby hands. Link snorts back a laugh. "Kalalah! Hestu is still on Hestu's big journey to meet up with Grandpa again! But kookooloo..." They sniff. "Hestu wants all of the friendly friends in the world to be happy, and there are so many sad..."

She has little to proffer in the way of making people happy, save for food. Hestu bops their body back and forth while Link starts a fire with a piece of flint from her pouch. She keeps the logs hidden under the cooking pot lest the sight of burning wood upset her companion. Link leaves some of her belongings with Hestu—keeping all of the most valuable things, namely the satchel of food, and the letter as afterthought, with her this time to avoid another theft—and tasks her bow with bringing down a rabbit.

While she finishes the hunt, breaking the animal's neck to put it quickly out of pain, she notes a crop of spicy peppers growing in the shade of a tree. She licks her lips.

In her communion with the harmony of food, Link must brave the deepest forests, the iciest tundras, the most red-hot combination of goron spice and pepper that she can envision.

With the very last handful of goron spice in the jar that she washes out in the pond, she will set her own mouth on fire, or she will forever doff the hat of a food aficionado.

Link sets to cooking. While she produces a campfire with the help of her pouch of flint, she asks Hestu about their first meeting on her initial trip to Kakariko, when she retrieved their maracas yet came back to a vacant satchel.

Hestu responds that some boko-bokos seemed very sad indeed but cheered up when Hestu offered them the contents of Link's satchel. "Hestu doesn't think the boko-bokos liked the wood jerky too much!" Hestu remarks. It dawns upon Link that Hestu refers to the letter from the cabin. Touching her hand to her chin, she shrugs: as long as someone enjoyed the food, that satisfies her.

Even, she supposes, bokoblins.

She occupies her hands with cooking. Hestu tells her the tales and myths of their world, about the forest where their Grandpa lives, about a sword that they have treasured since Hestu can last recall. Link nods to the rises and falls of the stories. Hestu speaks of the constellations, of the fixed star to the north—Anouki, they call it—that tips the stars making up the Sword in the Stone, and its nearby Reflection of the Sword that arches away as if viewed from the surface of a lake. There, the Seven Sages cluster together, one to serve each of the Seven Goddesses who have protected the races since time immemorial. And there, the Hero of the Silver Arrow who wears a sash of three stars, each one a gift of the Oracle of the Golden Goddesses, bestowing the Hero of the Silver Arrow with the gifts of Courage, Wisdom, and Power enough to drive back the Boar of Malice.

"Grandpa tells Hestu so many funny stories like this, shalah!"

Link dips her head. The world of the stars soars above her; her world lies here in the contents of the pot, in the rabbit that has given its life so that she may live hers, in the peppers that she deseedes with a deft hand, in the hylian rice pressed into her palms by a friend on the road.

She leaves the counting and naming of stars to others; for her their light is enough.

At last she completes the spectacle. A bowl of rice mixed with fresh herbs, of wild onion and leek, and meat cooked with pepper to absorb its heat into the flesh, with thick goron curry forged of the powdered concentration of the fiery heart of Death Mountain itself.
Hestu, she gathers only after she has prepared the dish, does not eat meat and moreover seems confused at her slaughter of the rabbit. She nods to herself and sets about making a second supper for them, also of spicy curry, but without the meat. She supplements instead the hard yet sweet carrots that Koko gave to her.

Link cuts up most of the remainder of the carrots, both swift and endura, and steams them with salt and a pinch of Kasuto sugar for dessert and for Ilia, who grazes calmly by the campsite.

At last she leaps to her feet. Dropping to one knee before Hestu, Link unveils her greatest creation yet: spicy curry.

She digs in.

Pico Pond proves her saviour. She gulps down enough water to drown a horse and yet every swallow only fans the flames. Link rolls herself into the pond. Face-down in the water. Hestu plops to the ground beside her and pokes her ponytail, which bobs at Hestus's touch, leading Hestu to giggle happily and prod Link's ponytail further. Her breath burbles up until she feels mildly quenched. Link crawls onto the shore to Hestu's low wail of dismay at the bobbing ponytail cruelly ripped from them.

She lies in the sand a moment longer. Planting her foot in the ground, Link—having left the silver sword at the campfire—whips out the red telescope to jut it into the air in the direction of the camp.

"You shall not best me, curry!" she signs in defiance and marches back to the cooking pot.

If she trains herself on small bites, then Link can build up a tolerance and with that consume all of the deliciousness of the peppered steak. Yes, just as she could build up tolerance to broadswords by stabbing herself repeatedly with a pocket knife.

She begins to reconsider her actions.

Hestu sits down across from her. They take up their own bowl of vegetable curry. All too late Link flails for them to halt, that they cannot possibly control the power laden in the fiery bowels of the bowl—and the fiery bowels that might result from its consumption—and Hestu places their hand into the rice. Link ogles them as their fingers, like roots, draw up the sustenance. She regards them in awe, that they seem entirely unfazed by the curry.

Then Hestu bursts into flames.

The second trip to Pico Pond accompanies Link heaving Hestu bodily over her shoulder. She trips and the two topple into the water together.

Shakily Link offers the steamed sugar-salt carrots as sacrifice. Hestu "shookoolooohs" at her.

"These won't set you on fire, I promise."

With the immense trust that only a featureless leaf mask of a face could present, Hestu takes the carrots in hand. Link leans in to watch their response. They jump up into the air and dance about, shaking their maracas in a song so infectious that Link finds her tapping her feet in rhythm.

"Thank thank thank thank you! Oh oh! Shakalah!"

Link beams at her handiwork. After setting carrots aside some for Ilia, she wraps up the rest for Hestu to take back to their friends and grandfather.
Hestu retires to sleep with the darkening of the sky; they curl up as a flower at night. Link tends to the campfire as she listens to Hestu's snores, which more resemble the rustling of leaves and the tumbling of wooden blocks than breathing.

She faces the trial of the spicy curry once again. Now Link comes prepared with a full water-skin. She nibbles a tiny bite and sets the spicy curry down, waiting for the fire in her throat to clear. Then again. Unlike with the stabbing herself with a pocket knife, she discovers that her tongue and mouth steadily acclimate to the heat.

Though Link has not eaten something this fiery before, the taste brings with it a sense of homesickness, almost. She made this for someone else.

For someone else...

The girl with the golden hair. In a long blue dress that flowed to the floor, in a library lined with windows of stained glass, mythological figures whose names could not roll off of her fingertips. "His Highness the King has promised," she said, her gaze hardened to the sharpest point of steel, "that she will be safe here with us, as recompense for your taking up the great mantle of the Champion of Hylia, Hero of Hyrule—my own Knight—" The girl with the golden hair's eyes narrowed slightly. The golden and violet charms at her throat jingled with her visible swallow. "—O Courageous Link."

Link knelt before the girl with the golden hair. She touched the ground with her forehead. "Thank you."

"...now do your best to stay out of my way. The sword has chosen you, and you are...the Knight..." Her eyebrows angled into a pointed V; their thickness merely contributed to her disdain. "...but you have your own destiny to fulfill, and I mine. At least I'm actually trying to do something besides pretending that we can ape the looking-glass of ten thousand years ago!" She raised her voice on the last part and glared up at a closed door of a study set into the wall of the library. Clearing her throat, the girl with the golden hair turned back. "You are dismissed."

The following minutes of the memory fade and faze. She cannot recall how she left the library, or perhaps it was a temple, but Link was holding the hand of a girl far younger than she, with two short pigtails, her blue dress patterned with red flowers, who ooed and aahed at the castle around them, who sneaked into the kitchen in the midst of the night—with Link's help—to snag sweets, who pestered Daruk into giving up a pot of goron spice though he cautioned her of its heat, who begged Link to make her something to prove to him that she can eat aaaaaaaall of the goron spice in the whole world. The spicy meat curry that Link made, that the girl swallowed down and grinned, that brought laughter to the gathered party: to Daruk, who seemed to make the girl's entertainment his personal mission; to the older girl with the red hair and the golden jewellery, the green hairband and the gently piercing gaze, who spoke softly to the girl with the pigtails and told her stories passed down from ages lost, whom Link caught more than once holding both the girl with the pigtails and the girl with the golden hair in her embrace as they napped against her; to the red-scaled zora whose laugh revealed her shark-like teeth, who taught the girl with the pigtails how to swim in the moat around the castle, and how to identify the multitudes of fish, and how lovely that she could see her again since her appointment as Champion had her with precious little free time to mingle in Ordon as she had before; to the blue-feathered rito who hmphed and tched at the girl with the pigtails, yet indulged her nonetheless, as she threw up pumpkins into the air and called out gleefully when he shot every one from the sky, the arrows fletched with his own flight feathers.

The girl with the pigtails, who climbed regularly to the highest points in the castle, who looked out at the world with a red and gold telescope, who called Link her—
Link looks at her hands. She looks, very carefully, at her own hands, at the creases and valleys that thread along her palms, at the scars that have faded over time; the scars that have tightened to raised white ridges; the scars that have hardened to flat brownish-red splotches, at the fingers that she flexes and the thin rings of dirt beneath her nails.

Her left hand curls around the red telescope at her hip. Red and gold. The scratches in the metal. No, not scratches, but the pictures of seagulls that a clumsy and unskilled hand has tried to etch.

Pulling the cloak over her head, Link sleeps with the telescope nestled tightly in her arms.

Link and Hestu part ways once more in the bend in the road. Hestu points to the fogged island in the centre of the lake. "You should come visit! I think that Grandpa and all of my friends would love-love-love you!" Link shrugs. "I hope I see you again! Twee hee!"

Hestu unfurls the whirling leaf. She watches Hestu fly across the waters of the bay until the fog swallows them.

Link continues the path north. Another golden tower sears her vision orange, in the midst of an oozing swamp littered with monsters that blaze electricity. She keeps Ilia in the safety of the nearby Minshi Woods to sneak through the roving camps of lizalfos bearing lightning from their horns; keese that channel it on their wings; floating red jellyfish that alternate current and quiet and that split into two just as lethal daughters when she attempts to slice them in half; flashing balls of light that cling like barnacles to the wooden struts of the enemy camps in the water and shock her when she unwittingly puts her hand over them; gigantic snail-lobster-things that charge at her when she nears, whose shells serve as perfect stepping stone over the water; flat winged monsters that look like sheets of paper floating on the surface before they jet into the air and ram her in the face, delivering a nasty shock.

Despite the administration of electricity beyond what she imagines to be the recommended dose for a healthy diet, she successfully—perhaps more on the part of the monsters' sleeping than her own utter lack of stealthiness—manages to clamber onto the tower.

If the spicy meat curry did not kill her, then these monsters stand not a lick of a chance.

She scales the climbable mesh of the spire. The platforms on which she can rest, she notices, lie further from one another than the towers she has climbed before. Nonetheless her body has grown stronger, her movements swifter, her muscles more enduring.

At the peak of the world, she watches the spire brighten blue. Link sketches the surroundings into her map, writing down the names that she has heard from travellers and merchants offering her information and wares on the road. The village of Japas that she visited earlier. The Trilby Plains. The fogged island in Lake Mekar. The rolling hills of the province of Rauru. Helmhead Bridge. The Crenel Hills that feed into Mount Crenel. Further ahead to the west where she travels: Elma Knolls. Aldor Foothills. Ich Plain. Mount Drena, around which she will go. The uncharted lands to the north, the mountains to the west.

The north.

Link looks out to the barren badlands to the north, and the mountains beyond. Something might lie yet north of the land once known as Hyrule. The northward wind tugs her a step forward before she catches herself and turns her head western.

She rolls up the map, collects the slate, and peers outwards with the telescope to mark her path. Her palms dampen with sweat the longer she holds the scope. It drops from her grip.
Link dives after it. Grabbing the telescope out of midair, she has barely the time to open the paraglider but not enough for it to slow her fall. She crashes into water hard as stone.

When she surfaces, the wetlands crawl with monsters.

She escapes back up the tower, which they cannot seem to climb or touch. Sticking her tongue out at the monsters, she holds onto the red telescope more firmly and loops the cord around her wrist. She blinks suddenly with the flash of an idea. When she had first encountered the paraglider, she had found the telescope affixed to it with a wooden strut of sorts. Unfolding the paraglider, she experiments with attaching the telescope again.

Sure enough, when she holds the paraglider over her head, the wooden support leaves the telescope firm at the perfect height for her to look afar while gliding.

She glides directly onto Ilia's back, which startles the poor grazing horse; Ilia rears and gallops off while Link tries desperately to untangle her hands from the paraglider to grab the reins. The telescope bonks her in the eye.

By the time she has calmed Ilia down, they have run far west of Lake Mekar. She can sense Ilia's exhaustion latent in the unsteady gait of her trot and the heavy undulations of her chest. Link whoas her, coos at her, slows her down. She dismounts. From her pack she draws out the last of the carrots, which Ilia gobbles up.

Link lets herself breathe and Ilia rest for the remainder of the day. On the morrow they continue their circuitous journey around the moat. She does not near the castle, but in the distance she can make out its foreboding shadow. Great curved pillars rise from the ground around it, like a hand threatening to crush the castle in its maliced fingers. The castle lies quiet, it seems; in the night she can see no lights in the distance.

They pass through Irch Plain. Along the moat she comes across the ruins of a village, or something like a village—the spacing of buildings far too regular for a normal settlement—and finds within gears and springs, the chassis of guardians, emptied and looted by people or time or both. She pats the cores in her satchel.

When she returns from Medli, she will take a detour to Hateno, for Purah to see about the slate, and potentially for her to end up in jail again for violating some other law she knew not about. Link laughs a light little laugh to herself and brushes Ilia's mane.

Purah.

Balin, Doreli.

Symin.

The pictobox.

Link sits up on Ilia's back. She disembarks, pulls out the slate, and taps the green rune. With her hand on Ilia's shoulder, she takes a pictograph of the horse and her girl.

They continue along the grassy hills. Occasionally they run into bokoblins on horseback; she observes them chasing after a boar, but does not bother them until one of them looses an arrow at Ilia.

She returns to Ilia with a satchel significantly weighed by the sum of their horns, guts, and claws.
On the horizon booms the last hurrah of summer thunder, the clap loud enough to scare Ilia. Link soothes her but the storm has not passed by morning. She guides Ilia closer to the storm. Near the curtain of rain she can make out another tower. Link consults the terrain from the highest point she can find—a fir tree that climbs the stars—but the mountains and highlands obstruct her view of villages where she could leave Ilia with utmost safety. She turns Ilia out by a grove of trees, making sure to remove her bridle and saddle, anything that could pose a threat to her. Touching their foreheads together, Link promises a swift return.

She scales the tower. The thunderstorm appears centred in the valley between highland. Fortunately she can simply go around the thunderhead and not worry about the rest. And yet, in the crackling claps of thunder, ever so faintly she can hear the strains of an accordion.

Link touches her chin. She looks back at the safety of the hills. She sighs to herself.

And then glides out directly into the thunderstorm.

She has just enough time to make four strange statues with wide mouths and four strange glowing orbs scattered around the basin before she promptly feels, physically, the pesky trouble with gliding out into a thunderstorm to become the highest thing in the sky.

She crash-lands to the ground and ducks her paraglider into the nearest pond to put out the lightning-sparked fire. When she raises her head, she stares at a pair of large black talons, and then up to a pair of grey trousers, and then up to a blue- and gold-feathered body with a blue sash, and then up to an accordion, and then up further to the face of a most familiar rito.

"Hello there, traveller. Fancy meeting you in a storm as thunderous as this one, I do hope that you're all right," Kass says with a smile. She nods, and Kass's smile widens. "I'm pleased to hear you're well. Say, I happen to know an ancient verse passed down in this region. Would you care to hear it?"

Link blinks at Kass, who regards her warmly, and she nods.

"Wonderful. Once more, any errors in translation from the native tongues to Central Hyrulean are purely my own. And without further ado..."

He hums a note; the accordion follows as his feathered fingers dance over the manuals. Once more he invokes the Goddesses, and then begins the song:

"Farore, Nayru and Din, and Our Sheik:
"theirs are the guides for the light which you seek.
"Statues that hunger for gems to be whole
"open the shrine for a lightning bolt's toll."

The word shrine catches Link's attention.

"Surely the statues refer to the four facing inwards on Thundra Plateau," Kass notes, "and the gems, to those spheres scattered. But how to make the statues whole? And the toll of a lightning bolt?" Kass hrms. "I should say, traveller, that the fourth Goddess in the song was not explicitly identified as Sheik, but with the symbol of the Goddess Sheik upon the statue, I felt it poetically appropriate."

Link thanks him for the song, and he laughs lightly. "No, thank you for allowing me to perform for you, traveller. I wish you well. May the light guide your path."

Accompanied by a swell of heroic accordion music, Link stands to face the thunderous landscape. Four statues, four orbs, and enough lightning to make all of the electric monsters around the tower by Pico Pond put together fry themselves into a tizzy.

She removes anything metal, including the silver longsword, in favour of her wooden bow. The rain makes the statues too slippery to climb; she locates the differently coloured orbs and knocks them from the statues' heads with well aimed arrows. Red, green, blue, and purple. The statues, she notices, have carvings on them, three of which match those that she saw in the Temple of Time on the Great Plateau, and the last of which bears the sheikah eye.

She takes a glance around the statues. Each of the statues possesses a mark engraved upon its chest: Farore, Nayru, Din, and Sheik, in order clockwise around the thundering basin. Yet when she—using stasis and well-timed kicks to launch the balls into the air, which miss more often than not—lodges the orbs into the statues' mouths, nothing happens.

Link touches her chin. She inspects the statues again.

As she stares intently at the statue with the symbol of Farore, a strike of lightning cleaves the night. In the second of illumination she can see another symbol on the statue's left hand. She slaps her fist into her palm.

Kass's accordion crescendos in time to her pumping her fists into the air.

The silver longsword serves as the perfect lightning attractor. Link allows lightning to strike each statue twice as she observes the symbols on their left and right hands; their backs remain clean and unmarked.

The orbs must correspond to the missing symbol.

Now the order proceeds Sheik, Din, Nayru, Farore counterclockwise with the statue of Farore receiving the orb of Din. As she puts the final orb into its place, with the fourth attempt being the charm and also breaking the wooden stick she has been using, lightning strikes the four orbs at once.

The ground quakes. The accordion music reaches a sharp peak and relents as the clouds part and a shrine rumbles in ancient machinery from the ground.

She whirls about on her heel, nearly stumbling over, and grins at Kass, thumbing at the shrine while waggling her eyebrows. Kass arches his at her. "How ingenious," he remarks quietly. "I would not have thought to use the lightning to search for hidden symbols, nor that the orbs might not match the visible engravings. Well, thank you for illumining the true meaning of the song, traveller. I hope to see you once more. May the light guide your path."

Link thanks him once again. "Could I offer you a meal sometime?"

The accordion slows. "Pardon?"

"I like to cook food for people. Could I cook for you sometime?"

Kass chuckles softly. "Perhaps I will take you up on that someday, when I have fulfilled my promises. Until then, I cannot allow myself such comforts except in the rarest of circumstance."

The corners of Link's mouth twitch downwards. "I have promises to keep, and paths to walk before I sleep, and the world is lovely, dark and deep." She tilts her head to one side, and he plays a little ditty on the accordion. "That's from an old poem my mentor's father once wrote. Ah, but let me not keep you."

Link nods at him. If she had the words, she could say something, could convince him to break the fast with her, could ask if he would like to accompany her. Instead she steps up to the shrine to swipe the slate over the face of the pedestal and descends into the darkness.

Merely instructions again, on lightning and thunder. Nodding sagely, Link exits the shrine.

No accordion music greets her. Only the lonely wind. She returns to Ilia to curl up for a nap against the warmth of her horse's flank.

When dawn breaks, she begins the trek to Medli.

—

Spicy Meat Curry (five hearts, low cold resistance for 05:30) - goron spice, hylian rice, raw meat, spicy pepper

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Here we go, off to Tabantha! The city of Medli, of course, is named after Medli from The Wind Waker, who is Vah Medoh's namesake. It's also appropriate as a pun on the word medley, given the singing among the rito.

I had a lot of fun writing this chapter. It's nice to be able to wind down and just enjoy what Hyrule (or the land that was once Hyrule) has to offer. Link's a very fun protagonist to write. I sincerely hope that the humour in this chapter was at least worthy of a wry smile.

You can actually defeat enemies through friendly fire in this game! I've used guardians to take out overworld boss monsters (the first hinox I ever dispatched was with the help of a "friendly" guardian), and I confirmed that you could use an octorok in this manner by killing the red moblin that stands on the banks of Lake Jarrah, near Midla Woods using nothing but dodging/parrying its strikes and standing perfectly in place for an octorok to hit the moblin repeatedly. It's quite satisfying considering the number of times that octoroks have done me low.

Hestu's frog choir is a pretty blatant reference to Majora's Mask and the frog choir therein, down to the same colours of frogs. I picture the koroks as being capable of photosynthesis, though they also require nutrients from the soil as plants do. Since they have no mouths, their limbs (both hands and feet) can split into "fingers" that act as roots.

Hey, there's an answer to that question of who stole Link's food and letter back way back when! You didn't think I'd let something like that go unanswered, did you?

The village of Japas is named after the musician from Majora's Mask, the Indigo-Go's own bass guitarist.
As before, I've included more monsters than those in Breath of the Wild. Monsters described in this chapter include: bari, spark, ampilus, and stinger.

And, of course, the memory here...those of you who have played The Wind Waker already know the girl with the pigtails's name. The thing with the girl throwing up pumpkins while Revali shoots them from the sky is a reference to Fledge's minigame from Skyward Sword. Honestly, the heart piece minigames from Skyward Sword are among the most fun in the franchise (much better than the dumpster fires of Majora's Mask's minigames, ahem) other than that one minigame you know exactly which one I'm talking. I should also note that while I portray Link as a pretty good older sibling here, to any of my readers who have older siblings who have been less than fantastic, just remember that the blood of the covenant runs thicker than the water of the womb. My own older sibling is not one whom I would consider an ally of any sort. You needn't feel bad or guilty.

Hyrule was generally divided into provinces, such as the province of Rauru mentioned here, and another province that'll become relevant later.

In Breath of the Wild, the Trial of Thunder is given to Link by a mysterious voice of the monk in the shrine. Since I did away with monks who have sat around for ten thousand years, I instead gave those tasks to Kass. Additionally, I made the actual trial a little bit different to keep things fresh for the reader. The poem that Kass says is written in dactyls with ten syllables per line, so the beat so "FArore, NAYru, and DIN, and our SHEIK: / THEIRS are the GUIDES for the LIGHTS which you SEEK" and so forth. Since the Ballad of the Sealing War was in iambic pentameter, I thought I'd do something different for a song in a different style.

The poem that Kass mentions is an adaptation of "Stopping by the woods on a snowy evening" by Robert Frost. I'm not the biggest fan of Robert Frost myself, to be honest; however, I do like those selected lines of that poem. We'll learn more about Kass's mentor and his mentor's father later in the fic. And we'll also learn more about Link's efforts to get Kass to have a meal with her.

As always, a round of applause to my beloved beta reader Emma, who pulls through with truly herculean efforts, and to you, my readers. Thank you for cheering me on.

midna's ass. 12 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: The beginning of our journey to Tabantha! This whole arc is so cozy. Seeing Kass again is a joy.

Delicious in Wild does slapstick humour so incredibly well. Hestu being set on fire is one of my favourite things I've ever read.

Here Link begins her incredible tendency of taking selfies.

In this chapter we see one of several reasons why the Medli arc is my favourite in this series: The girl with the pigtails. Her shadow is cast over the entire series, but it's most prominent here, and it makes me cry every time.

Hearty Salmon Meunière

Chapter Summary

Journeying across Tabantha, the travelling chef is turned away from Medli yet manages to sneak in under the cover of night. The chef prepares a late midnight snack for a resident of the city in exchange for information about Medli's chief. While the resident reveals little, the chef is invited to the resident's home to speak to the resident's mother, who might know more. The chef also remembers a certain conversation with the Champion of Erito, a conversation that calls into question the coincidence of fate.

Chapter Notes

Bonus author's note: Hey, this is actually something that I meant to add in to the previous chapter's notes and completely forgot: Hestu's stars! For those of you who have read adrift, you'll recognise many of the constellations. Hestu's stars are versions of constellations from our own world, except that I altered the stories to those that would be thought up in Hyrule, since their traditions and legends differ from our own.

Anouki, the Fixed Star, is our Polaris; the star is named after the northern-polar dwelling race from Phantom Hourglass and Spirit Tracks.

The Sword in the Stone and the Reflection of the Sword are our Ursa Minor and Ursa Major, respectively; just as Polaris forms the tip of Ursa Minor's "tail" (or the Little Dipper's "handle"), Anouki forms the jewelled pommel of the Sword in the Stone. If you take a look at Ursa Minor/Major, you can see that the "tail" looks like a sword and the "box"/"body of the boar" looks like a rock or pedestal, hence the constellation (to me) resembles a sword in a pedestal. This, of course, refers to the Master Sword, specifically when it's found in a stone pedestal of a sacred grove like we see in A Link to the Past, Twilight Princess, A Link Between Worlds, and indeed Breath of the Wild. Ursa Major does look like a reflection of Ursa Minor, at least to me, hence the Reflection of the Sword.

The Seven Sages are our Pleiades, also known as the Seven Sisters, and are a reference to the sages from A Link to the Past, Ocarina of Time (yes, Zelda is the seventh sage), and A Link Between Worlds.

The Hero of the Silver Arrow is our Orion the Hunter, who appears (to me) to wields a bow and to be holding an arrow in his other hand (though most legends regard the arrow as a sword or a club). Orion the Hunter has three very bright stars forming his famous belt. I heard the word "three" and ran with it: the gifts of courage, wisdom, and power. The Oracles of the Golden Goddesses are of course a reference to Oracle of Seasons and Oracle of Ages, while the Silver Arrow is the item necessary to defeat the pig-like Ganon in The Legend of Zelda and A Link to the Past. More modern games in the franchise, including Breath of the Wild, use Arrows of Light or Light Arrows as the ultimate key to defeat Ganon. I'm not really fond of the holy light motif or symbolism, and there's something interesting to me about using silver instead considering its historic implications against things that go bump in the night.

The Boar of Malice, naturally, refers to Ganon/Ganondorf.

Finally, for those confused about last chapter's memory, I'll make things a little explicit. Link had a little sister prior to the Great Calamity whom Zelda and her father agreed to keep safe within Hyrule Castle in return for Link agreeing to wield the Master Sword that had chosen her. I mean, the Master Sword did choose her. You can imagine, however, that Link might not have been too keen on suddenly becoming the legendary hero.

The road to Medli, largest city of the rito homeland of Tabantha, winds high into the windy mountains. The air around her grows steadily colder. In the evening the skies give up their warmth far quicker, while in the mornings the sun takes longer to penetrate the chill that sets in over the increasingly longer night. Eventually the chill takes root and refuses to part, and she begins to cook spicy hot peppers into her daily meals. The heat burns through her veins to keep the cold at bay when even the warm doublet from the Great Plateau fails. As she climbs higher in altitude, Link finds herself increasingly short of breath, but she acclimates over a few days at the same elevation only to once more feel weakness upon ascent.

The strange dark splotch in the heavens—like a thunderhead fixed against a blue sky—that she first noted upon awakening in the Great Plateau becomes clearer with every step. Her curiosity drives her and Ilia forward.

In villages like Hoskit and Ilari along the trail, Link takes the time to observe the speech of their people, the cadence and rhythm, the gestures and signs. Her body knows the shapes and forms of Tabanch where her waking mind has lost the conscious knowledge. Yet she learns the words and phrases, through study and context and occasional blatant inquiring, that have evolved in the tongue since she last walked the land, and unlearns those that have long since passed out of favour.

Her hundred-year-old speech draws attention nevertheless. She simply ducks her head and, rubbing the back of her head, apologises for her non-nativeness.

For all the coldness of the mountains, Tabantha imparts a special warmth on the hearts of those raised under the winds' protective wings. On one occasion a village guard, eyeing the Champions' slate, makes a passing reference to the Yiga, but beyond this incident she suffers no distrust in the many settlements of the region.

Moreover she learns the recipes. The rito, as well as the many sheikah, gerudo, gorons, and others who live in Tabantha, display a remarkable sweet tooth—or sweet gizzard, perhaps, more appropriately—that leads to the popularity and abundance of sugarcane that thrives in the icy Tabanch weather. Link harvest the cane on her travels. When she rests each evening, she boils the cane to distill a thick saccharine syrup. Crushing the cane for powdered brown sugar takes more effort; Link enlists Ilia's powerful hooves to aid her. As a reward, she steams carrot in sugar and salt for Ilia's supper, the homemade sugar that much sweeter.

The hillsides of Tabantha bustle with arable land, and no crop so evident as the plentiful and ubiquitous wheat. She gathers that before the Calamity, Tabantha had exported wheat—alongside other products—to the rest of the land once known as Hyrule, but since Hyrule's fall and the loss of over seven-tenths of the population, wilder and wilder varieties of wheat have overrun hills once used as farmlands.

With sword in hand, she mounts her own autumn harvest. The nutty-sweet scent of wheat widens her eyes and growls her stomach with the promise of limitless possibilities; bread and cakes, pies and pastries, porridges and pancakes.

Link knows precious little about the baking of bread.

But that will never stop her from trying. And failing. And vomiting her guts out when her experiments fail to work as intended. And laughing at herself, at her efforts, at the joys of being able to try again. And then trying again.

After passing by the sister villages of Bisht and Basht on either bank of a lake shaped like a bird's foot, Link realises that she has not found poultry sold or eaten anywhere in the whole of the Tabanch countryside. She has seen birds abound in the open air, with wheat for consumption free on the hills, and yet no one eats it.

She cannot recall who first said to her something along the lines of, "when in Eldin do as the Eldic do," but she phases poultry from her diet in favour of beast and fish.

Fashioning herself a fishing pole of wood, Link sets about teaching herself how to fish. Her arms retain the knowledge of how to cast and reel in a line. Still, the first time she endeavours to fish in the fresh waters of Strock Lake, she inadvertently hooks her own boot to the line instead of bait.

She dives into the water to retrieve her boot and takes the next several hours to climb back out.

Link spends the day feeding her cooked bait to fish, having played herself like a fiddle in her assumption if she just stares at the water hungrily enough, the fish will take mercy on her and leap bodily into her waiting arms and plate. Sadly the fish value their lives more than the clamours of her empty belly.

She keeps doggedly at it. She experiments with different bait, with different lines, with different strategies for sighting the shadows of fish beneath the surface and anticipating where they may dart next. A slightly heavier bob and a gentle side to side motion attracts the salmon of the lake best. When she reels in the big one and holds aloft an entire six centimetres of freshwater fish, Link half-cries, half-laughed at her own exhilaration and at the promise of fish for dinner.

She curls up beside Ilia with a full stomach of fish.

Happening upon a camp of bokoblins, she filches furs warmer than her doublet quite literally from their backs.

Along the route to Medli, Link activates shrines as she goes to leave a breadcrumb-trail of blue that she can see down the mountains at night. She purchases needle and thread in Basht. With her tongue poking out of the corner of her mouth in concentration, Link removes the furs from the smallish bokoblin clothing and uses them to line the insides of her gloves and boots.

More than a month and a half of travelling gives Link plenty of time to appreciate the Tabanch harvest: wheat, blackcurrant, beet, pomegranate, rye, tarragon, kale, barley, sycamore fig, parsnip, mustard. She arrives at Lake Totori with the warm aroma of mid-autumn. Within the natural moat of the lake, the great Pillars of Erito jut from the surface of the water to pierce the heavens to a dizzying height. For those not gifted with the wings of Erito, thin and heavily monitored wooden bridges run between the pillars to lead up to Medli. Ilia shies at the swaying bridges. The guards at the checkpoints demand to know her purpose, to know her station, to understand why she has come. They neither know nor care of a Lady Impa at some village of Kakariko, and they certainly have not the time for a foreigner requesting an audience with their chief in the midst of a crisis.

Something or someone has attacked Medli of late. She can mark the tensions in the guards' shaking pupils and in the harsh corners of their timbres.

They turn her away.

Link rides Ilia around the lake. Monsters of wind and ice alike thrive in the natural conditions of the cold, from slow-flying guays that divert her senses with noxious droppings to giant behemoths of frost, visible only by their twisted multitude of ruby eyes, that hiss freezing breath at travellers that near. Yet for all of these monsters, easily dispatched by paying attention to the road and comprehending their natures, she finds her match in the wolfos that howl with the moon. As though some foul hand had taken wild wolves and grotesquely shaped their forms, for leaner muscles and larger claws, for sharper fangs and crueller thirsts, for the ability to bear a sword or spear or axe between their paws, for the razor tail apt to slice themselves as well as their enemies. She avoids the wolfos when she can, but they ambush her upon the trail.

If not for Ilia she would set off at a glide, but Link cannot leave her companion to die.

The encounters leave a steadily accumulating collection of cuts and scrapes across her body, down her arms, on her abdomen and back. One cuts diagonally along her right cheek from just to the right of the corner of her eye to her jawbone. Again she has neglected to stock up on medicinal salve; the blood heats her face.

The orange glimpse of a shrine leads her astray from the trail around the lake and up another road, this one far less frequently travelled as judging by the snow piling up so high that she can scarcely make out where the path ends and the ground begins. On top of a cliff that overlooks a sudden drop the shrine awaits her.

She climbs the cliffside.

Her eyes widen when she takes notice of a white rito paying respect to the shrine, his head bowed, a splendidly feathered bow curved at his back. Hiding behind a rocky outcropping, Link observes him without interfering. Snowflakes settle on her lashes. She pulls the hems of the hood more closely around her scarred face.

The rito kneels in the snow before the shrine. He places a bowl of something-or-other onto the circular platform, then, laying his quiver across the width, plucks singular arrows from a pile to his right side, dips the arrowhead into the bowl, and fits some spherical cloth-wrapped thing on the arrowhead that he retrieves a basket at his left.

He holds each arrow before the shrine and intones an invocation prior to slotting it into his quiver.

The process goes on for sufficient time that Link's head begins to droop, and the snow weighs down her shoulders with the welcome heaviness of a blanket. She dips down. Her eyelashes rest on the curves of her cheeks.

When she comes to, the white rito has vanished and the moon has risen. Link peers around. The blood from the wound of her cheek has frozen over, as have the other injuries inflicted on her by the wolfos. She has her belongings: the slate, the red telescope, the satchel, the paraglider. She retains the food inside of the satchel and, on a less vital note, Lady Impa's letter, her consciousness, and her unharmed form. Nothing stolen, nothing changed, save for the rito leaving and the moon beckoning her to the night.

Shrugging to herself, Link crouches in the snow and sneaks her way towards the shrine. The rito left an offering of a white substance she cannot identify. The surface of the bowl has frozen over with a layer of ice. Link need not disturb the offering.

She goes immediately to the shrine.

The shrine tests her mastery of the paraglider even more arduously than those shrines that came before. The shrine gifts her with a black bow made neither of metal nor of bone, but of the peculiar slippery material. Discarding her wooden bow at the entrance to the shrine and taking note of it on her map, Link accepts the trial ahead. Here she must also clear small platforms of enemies whilst on her paraglider. She rides updrafts to the highest point of the shrine.

Sure enough, the instructions depict the merits of aerial combat, of how to account for the rush of wind of the fall, of how to nail targets with pinpoint accuracy.

Link stands before the goalpoint, the wolfos's scars still stinging on her face. She braces herself.
The blue curtain of light once more heals her injuries, accompanied by the terrible pain of her skin evidently stitching itself back together. She signs her thanks to the quiet shrine and returns to the world.

Outside: no white-feathered rito.

She exhales in relief. Link returns to Ilia and completes the half-circuit to the other end of the lake.
From here she looks out over the lake, pooled silver by the moonlight, and to the stone pillars around which wrap the vast city of Medli in spiralling multi-storied wooden rings that curve around each pillar, with wide bridges connecting the different districts of the city separated pillar from pillar.

With the darkness around her, Link rests her forehead against Ilia's once more. "I'll be back soon.
Stay safe, girl." Ilia licks her face. Link hugs her neck tightly. Then, warming the metal of the red telescope with her palm, she scopes out the distance between herself and Medli, scales the highest tree in the vicinity, and kicks off towards the Pillars of Erito.

And flies directly into the nearest tree, hidden in the shadows of the first.

When she excavates herself from the snowbank under the tree, she tries again, this time with just slightly more focus. Link spreads her wings over the lake. The wind ripples the fabric of the sail and runs its soft fingers through her hair. She tosses back her head and nearly lets her laughter echo on the water before the sight of motion along the upper rings of Medli silences her.

With the red telescope, she peers through her left eye to watch the movements of guards. She notes a handful here and there patrolling the various decks of the city that spirals up the stone pillars.
Landing in the shadow of the great pillar in the centre, the wind howling through the hole carved out of its heart, she rolls forward under a bench facing outwards.

Link hides beneath the bench while she catches her breath and assesses her plans. She need merely find someone for directions, someone beside the guards that would kick her out of the city or get her arrested again.

She rolls out from under the bench to glance around at her surroundings. The wooden platforms that make up the majority of Medli feature muted paint of murals and symbols along the ground.
Though she cannot read the Tabanch signs on the nearby buildings, Link gathers that she currently stands in in some residential area, with the wooden houses offshooting from the curved path up the pillar—some large enough for two stories, some incredibly small, and most somewhere in-between —being the homes of Medli city-dwellers.

Closing the paraglider, Link sits on the bench and looks at the other Pillars of Erito visible from her perch. Parts of the city, she can see from here, have been closed down, off-limits. Other entire portions of the city contain massive gaps between levels, temporarily patched by rickety wooden ladders that bob in the slightest breeze.

She lowers herself to her knees to pray that a Divine Beast has not affected the people of Medli as the Divine Beast Vah Rudania attacked Darunia.

With that, Link begins her spiralling stroll upwards. She keeps to the shadows and avoids the drowsy guards on their night shift. She asks the first villager of Medli she spots about where she might speak to the chief, for she has a letter to deliver, from Lady Impa of Kakariko. The villager of Medli—a short child, feathered green, squatting at the edge of a pond on the upper decks of Medli—rivets glimmering wide-pupiled eyes upon Link.

"Are you the feather faery?" the child asks.

Link cocks her head to one side.

The child stomps her foot on the ground. She brandishes one of her wings out towards Link and points towards the lower curve. Alongside the downy, lighter-coloured feathers that comprise most of the wing, Link can spot a few longer and darker feathers growing in at the top, and patches of sparser feathers near the bottom. "See? Genli lost these feathers there and Genli needs the feather faery to take 'em so Genli can grow in flight feathers already! You're funny looking for a feather faery though. You're not a rito. And Genli's never seen a gerudo with brown hair!"

"I'm a hylian," she signs. "I think?"

Genli sniffs loudly enough for her nostrils to flare. "And you talk funny. You gotta be the feather faery right? Where's Genli's salmon!?"

"Your salmon...?"

The child kicks the pond water with her foot and trips. Link catches her, hands on the child's narrow shoulders, and helps her up. Genli brushes herself off. "You're one dumb faery!"

"So you've noticed I sign instead of say out loud," Link comments with a smile.

Genli makes a gesture that Link does not gesture, but one which makes Genli snicker. "That's not what Genli meant! Anyways, since you're clearly new at this whole feather faery business, let Genli let you in on some suuuuper secret trade secrets. Ready?" Link nods. "When good kids like Genli lose feathers, the good kids give 'em to the feather faery, and then she makes Genli salmon meunière so that Genli can grow our flight feathers big and strong! So make Genli some salmon meunière and Genli'll forgive you for not knowing anything, and Genli won't snitch on you to the Great Faeries!"

Before Link can even lift her hands to formulate anything aping a response, Genli jumps up and down.

"Genli's hungry," she declares, a feeling to which Link can relate so highly that she bobs her head eagerly at Genli's comment. "If you can make Genli some salmon meunière—there's hearty salmon in the pond; see the red swimmy-swim things!—Genli'll tell you what Genli knows about the chief!"

The promise of a meal and information knocks Link out of even the question of bartering. She uses the fishing pole to snag a pair of hearty salmon—one for herself and one for Genli—from the pond and inquires of the recipe for this salmon moe-n-yeh-r.

Under Genli’s tutelage, Link strips the wheat from the Tabanch hillsides of their kernels. Genli leads her to—Link assumes—a communal cooking area of sorts, currently empty given her nighttime activities, where the rito child points out a hand-cranked grain mill affixed to the edge of a table. Link grinds the wheat into soft white flour by hand. Her fingers ache; she switches hands repeatedly though her right proceeds even more slowly than her left.

Eventually she collects a tidy sum of flour. Link slumps into a chair to flex her fingers, which tense uncomfortably from the grinding. Genli stamps her foot.

"If you want Genli to tell you about the chief, you gotta make it," she says, her feathers flaring out furiously.

"Just one more minute." She cracks her fingers and rolls her wrists. She unties and re-ties her ponytail. Then, with one final curl and uncurl of her hands, she rises to her feet and begins the more fun part of cooking.

Link washes the hearty Tabanch salmon carefully under Genli’s hawkish eyes. Mixing rock salt with a dash of thinly diced red pepper, she kneads the spice into both sides of the fish before spreading out a layer of flour—her paraglider comes in handy as a flat surface—and placing the fish in the flour on both sides. She dabs the salmon repeatedly, shaking it to remove excess flour each time, until the fish has an even coating of white on its entire outer front: juicy meat wrapped in a cocoon of what will become heavenly crispiness.

She sets a rimmed iron lid onto her cooking pot, courtesy of the marketplace of Darunia, to serve as a saucepan. Link butters the bottom and leaves it over the fire until the goat butter turns to molten gold. She adds a touch of herbs for taste and frowns at her own lack of citrus fruit. Instead she sprinkles in a pinch of sugar for an edge to the taste.

At length the outside of the salmon takes on the same sheen as the butter. Link transfers the fish to a plate Genli sets on the communal table and drizzles half of the sauce over the salmon. Then she repeats the procedure with the second hearty salmon, this serving for herself.

Genli perches on a wooden projection that protrudes around the table. Her talons close around the projection and she nestles herself with the table at chest height.

Link watches Genli watch her cook the second salmon. When she finishes pouring the other half of the sauce over the fish, Genli applauds her. "Thank you for the meal!" she crows, less at Link and more at the skies, and promptly grabs both plates of fish.

Link stands at the table with the saucepan in one hand and the cooking pot tucked into the crook of her other arm. Her stomach gurgles pitifully. She gazes blankly forward as Genli proceeds to rip through both places of salmon meunière, without even a chair at the table at which she can sit, and sinks slowly to the ground on her knees.

She licks the drippings out of the saucepan and the cooking pot. If she lowers her eyelids, Link can smell the aroma of that lightly fried salmon, the juicy innards contrasted so perfectly with the crispy skin, an aroma she has smelled before.

The blue-feathered rito, with the face of a falcon, and two red marks beneath his eyes that she mistook for a perpetual blush at first. He strutted around her in a circle. A circle. On a wooden platform, marked with the same symbol as the decorated back of her paraglider. Something like midmorning or afternoon, the sun frozen halfway up or down the sky. She with a plate of salmon meunière, holding it out to him.

"You think that you're better than the rest of us, don't you." Link merely continued to hold the plate while the blue rito circumscribed her with his talons. "You know, my mastery of the air is considered unparalleled of all of the rito." As if to demonstrate he swept his wings downwards in perfect circular arcs and gracefully launched himself metres into the air. Link looked up at him; she covered the dish with her right hand to avoid his gale taking the fried salmon with it. The blue rito called out audibly his control of his own glide downward, his hover, his ability to barely adjust the angle of his wings to change the entirety of his path of flight.

"I ride the wind like a lover." He drew himself down to Link's height to eye her with enough condescension to drop a lesser being through the floor, but Link—entirely missing the disdain—simply offered him the salmon once more. "They say I fly so beautifully that they call me the painter of the winds. I have been regaled," the rito continues, strutting about Link once again, "as one of the greatest innovators of my craft that have ever lived. Not merely as the Champion of Erito, Hero of Tabantha, the Divine Beast Vah Medoh's Pilot in all of her beautiful glory truly worthy of someone such as myself, but as a visionary of flight whose teachings and skills will spread the wings of future generations."

He notched the golden bow with an arrow bearing a long blue banner as its tail and indicated a tree on the other side of the lake. "And none of that touches my expertise in archery. I can't count how many have hailed me as the modern Hero of the Silver Arrow, that when I vanquish the Calamity forevemore, the legend will pass on to use my name. Not that I need to puff myself up with words. Let me demonstrate my skills, something that you haven't been able to do."

Link did not respond. She continued to gaze directly at the rito and proffer the plate of fish.

"Now, do you see that tree?" Drawing back the string, he closed his eyes and spun himself around twice before loosing the arrow. The blue banner fletched to the arrow's end unfurled in the wind. Even from the massive distance across the lake, she could make out the banner fluttering from the very tip of the tree.

"I could annihilate the Calamitous One with my own wings. With enough arrows I could wear it down to nothingness." He smirked. Link held the plate, her expression blank, and steadily the corners of his mouth curved downwards, the slope of his beak hooking down as though he had scented a noxious fume. "I and the other Champions have trained for this our entire lives. Even before we knew we were Champions we rose to the very heights of what Tabantha, Eldin, Lanayru, and Parapa have to offer, and what have you done? No one ever heard your pitiful little name" before you pulled the blade from the stone. Where are you from again?" The rito notched another arrow. "Don't think that I speak from a place of nobility. Oh, no, just like you, I was born in the village of nowhere, but I crawled out on my own talons and put my homeplace on the map. Now the name Ilari sits like gold on everyone's tongue where before they spat it out like dust. What have you done before the blade of evil's bane chose you?"

He loosed the arrow, then another, and another. She watched them soar straight and true across the lake to mark the highest of firs with his blue. When he finished the circuit he turned on her.

"Go on. Tell me. What did you do? Nothing. You lived and kicked mud around in the same dusty nowhere's land while I was training to get ahead. When they chose me as the Champion of Erito, I could hear the Goddess smile down upon me for the work I've done, with my own wings. And you just faffed about. Being a courier for the village blacksmith." His smirk returned. He gusted out a laugh. "Courier, huh? Fancy term for a vagabond.

"You don't have the great skills that the Champions're acclaimed for, and you barely even know how to use the blade of evil's bane. You don't know the first thing about anything. I suspect you didn't even know what the blade was there for when you decided to get your slimy hands all over it." He snickered to himself. "No. But the...oh so esteemed royal family wouldn't let anyone they didn't know touch it. Not anyone who didn't have your widdle pointy ears—" He snapped his fingers against Link's ears. She winced. "—and I don't think they even let anyone with the blessings of Sheik or Sageru near the damn thing. A big parade of their own precious jabby-eared hylians. So you showed up one day. On a job for your courier business. Probably out doing the horizontal waltz with your fellow couriers in the city, eh?" She tilted her head to one side in confusion, and he grimaced for an instant before the leer took hold of his features once more. "So here's my theory: the blade picked you because you're the first person who touched it who wasn't a complete farce. Oh, don't misunderstand me. You're even less skilled than they are. But at least you wouldn't pawn the blade of evil's bane for two rupees like the fools at the Court. So the blade, out of desperation, picked you."

His eyes narrowed, glimmered.

"If you hadn't been a hylian like the Princess's dear old daddy wanted—and if Mipha hadn't recognised you—you would've been arrested. Jailed. Executed publicly." He snorted. Link said nothing, but as her arms had tired, she lowered the plate, which deepened his smirk. "Oh, I know I'm supposed to be imparting my great lessons of the bow onto you, like the other Champions have supposedly done before me." He curled the edges of his beak. "Supposedly. But let's face it. You'll never be this good. Maybe in ten or twenty years if you put yourself through the gruelling work I have. But you? Nah. You're gonna stand there and look pretty with that sword while we Champions—" He slammed his wing into his own chest. "—do all the real work. And when the Calamitous One's gone for good by our hands, I swear on the Goddess that we'd better get the credit or I'll train the minstrels myself! So. Then. O Courageous Link. Great hero, chosen by the blade of circumstance and desperation, whose only point in existence is physically carrying the blade like a pack mule so you can bap the bwad bwoar when we Champions are done ripping and tearing. What do you have to say for yourself, O Courageous Link?"
What she had to say. Link glanced down at the plate. She balanced it precariously in the crook of her arm as she spoke the only words that came to her fingertips. "The salmon's going to get cold."

The rito opened his beak. "Anyone," he spits out, word by word, "could fry some awful salmon so docile you can scoop it out of the water yourself. You get me some carp from the eastern side of Hyrule, on the other side of the world, as far away from me as possible, and then maybe I'll pluck myself for you."

"I thought you would be hungry." Link remembers searching seeking out words. She seized upon Daruk's. "We might've been brought together by fate, but we could be...friends?"

His hands closed around the golden bow; she noted him trembling. "I don't need your pity." He stood erect, spine straight as the arrow he had notched in his bow, towering over Link with the arrowhead pointed towards her. "I don't need your pity." His eyes glazed to sightlessness, and she lifted the plate above her head in a final offering of peace. "Don't give your damn pity!"

He loosed the arrow above her. She felt the impact against the ceramic of the plate, the dish slip out from her fingers, and the salmon meunière she had fished and ground and fried herself scatter over the floor, and the wind whooshing under his wings as he flurried into the skies with a bolt of laughter so forced even she could hear the pain rasped out from his throat.

She sits up. The fragrance of salmon meunière has faded with Genli polishing off the meal. Link observes her licking the fried butter and crumbs from the plate.

Her hands shake just enough that she promises herself a proper supper thereafter. "May you please take me to see the chief?" Link signs.

Genli puts her chin on the table. "Genli's just a kid. Genli doesn't have permission to talk to him!"

Link blinks at her.

"Genli doesn't know what you were expecting...but wow! Genli only said that Genli'd tell you everything Genli knows about the chief. Here's what Genli knows: nothin'!" Genli giggles. "Genli doesn't know what to say. Thanks for the grub. In my gra-ti-tude I won't snitch on you!" Genli hops off of the perch and flaps her wings out. Link stares at her receding back as she moves to quit the communal cooking area.

And a hoard of four other rito children swoop down, fluttering to a fault in front of Genli: red, yellow, blue, purple. The blue one steps out of line to lift her hand in Genli's hand. She calls out in a sing-song voice: "The visitor made you food!" The surrounding rito children nod in approval. "No one else has the patience to do that!"

Genli scowls. "Now what's that s'posed to—"

"We should at least," the blue one adds in, "take the visitor to Mother. Maybe Mother can help the visitor talk to Chief Kaneli!"

"Visitor! Visitor!" The red and yellow children, clearly the youngest, walk and fly towards her in one motion. The red takes her left hand; the yellow, her right. Their feathers warm her palms. "Let's go! To Mama! Notts and Kotts'll take you aaaaaall the way!"

Genli hangs her head. "B-but then Genli will get in trouble for sneaking out."

"We'll all get in trouble for sneaking out," the purple one announces, pointing her feathers towards the sky.
"...that doesn't make it any better!" Genli wails, but the others usher her along.

Almost more confused than relieved, Link lets the rito children escort her wherever they would take her. She would thank them if not for her otherwise occupied hands.

But whatever she faces, she faces with an open heart and an open mind, and an open acknowledgment of the blue rito who haunts her the memories of the person who once inhabited this body.

—

Hearty Salmon Meunière (full recovery, five golden hearts) - cane sugar, hearty salmon, goat butter, Tabantha wheat

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Another thank-you to my most marvellous beta reader, Emma, for her continual efforts, and to you, the reader, for coming along with me on the journey.

All of the Tabanch villages (Tabanch is the adjectival form of Tabantha) are named after rito in The Wind Waker. The fruits of Tabantha are based on those endogenous to Europe and the Mediterranean, where the cultivation of wheat originated. Making sugary syrup from sugarcane is pretty easy, though you need a press (or a heavy horse) to actually make sugar.

Other than the named guays and wolfos in this chapter, I make mention of ice-breathed freezards.

For those unsure about what's going on in the scene with the white-feathered rito, that's Teba preparing bomb arrows for his attempt to attack Vah Medoh. People who have played Breath of the Wild already know that how that ends.

Leaving your horse in the middle of the woods doesn't sound like a good idea, especially with how long Link might be gone. I hope Ilia will be all right.

And here we arrive in Medli! I renamed the pillars in the lake to the Pillars of Erito. Link will find exactly what's attacking Medli soon enough.

We see here my take on Revali. I adopted the showboating and the comment about destiny from Breath of the Wild. We also get a glimpse at how Link obtained the Master Sword, something that we'll revisit in more detail. The "big bad boar" (bwig bwad bwoar) is, of course, a reference to Ganon/Ganondorf being rather porcine even in his original appearance. The world of Delicious in Wilds makes many a negative reference to pigs, including the phrase "treacherous boar" instead of "treacherous snake" which comes from the biblical serpent that doesn't exist in the Zelda world. Well, technically there was usage of Christianity and a literal bible in The Legend of Zelda and The Adventure of Link, but that's since been phased out or retconned in favour of the religion of the Golden Goddesses and so forth.
Note that Link’s time training with Revali took place at a different time than her time training with Daruk, which is why she acts so differently in those two time-spans. Revali’s not entirely wrong about his criticism of the King and their adherence to the prophecy, which in its modern incarnation calls for a hylian and is usually implied to be about a boy. Of course, the prophecy is less a prophecy than people might think and has been changed during the ten thousand years that it was passed down.

I should remind any confused readers that only hylians have pointed ears in Delicious in Wilds; Sheik is the sheikah goddess, and Sageru is the gerudo goddess.

The title of the chapter and the recipe therein spring directly from the side-quest in the game.

Readers will note that I swapped the ages of the rito siblings. Cree is the oldest, then Kheel, then Genli, then the twins are the youngest.

Readers might be slightly surprised at how Medli goes. It’s a pretty significant departure from how the Rito Village segment of Breath of the Wild goes, with quite a surprising twist at the end.

midna’s ass. 13 September 2017.

Beta reader’s comments: So this chapter really shows off a lot of what I love about the Medli arc. Its atmosphere is just incredible - Link flying into Medli in the middle of a cold night is such nice imagery. The entire thing has a feeling I can’t really put into words, but I adore it.

This arc also has Genli and the rest of the kids, who I adore. Plus it has Revali, who ends up being one of my favourite characters (even though I hated him when I first read this chapter).

A little anecdote: I actually read this arc before doing the Rito quests in Breath of the Wild. That ended up being perfectly alright, because stealing into Medli at night and finding Amali and her five kids in person was just magical.

Chapter Summary

The children of Medli bring the travelling chef to their home, where the chef meets a Tabanch housewife who agrees to take the chef to the chief of the city in the morning. Over the baking of carrot cake, the chef finally coalesces memories together to recall the chef's little sister.

Chapter Notes

To all of my readers: my sincerest apologies for that lapse. With this chapter, we're back to our usual release schedule, now that my beta reader isn't busy. I sincerely hope that this sort of delay won't happen again; I've made plans so that even if my beta reader is busy, I'll be able to keep the chapters rolling out. Thank you kindly for your patience. There should not be any more blips.

She learns the children's names on the short path to their house. Cree, the blue one; Kheel, the purple; the inseparable red and yellow whom she cannot differentiate for their constant Notts and Kotts or Kotts and Notts; and Genli, the green, who makes her sisters promise not to snitch on her for having sneaked out in the middle of the night for food of all things.

As they walk upwards, Link listens to the strains of tinkling music. Windchimes, hung nearly everywhere, of various sizes and assortments of wood, different shapes: some cylindrical, some hollowed spheres, some strange twisted helices that she has never seen before. They harmonise with the breeze and Link notices that the children flutter-walk in step with the music. The children's home perches on the wayside of the residential area from what Link can gather, on the very edge of the wooden spiral that juts out over the lake, with the path immediately to its left closed off. The wood that marks the edge of the world has to it a look almost of petrified stone. Beyond the grey border and a hastily erected wooden barrier painted over with large blocky characters, the skies drop into the lake.

Link need not know how to read Tabanch to hazard a guess of keep away or danger or watch out.

The house itself: wooden, as with the others, and painted brightly, mostly in blue, but with a rainbow of highlights. The most prominent recurring symbol, painted not only on the winding path that leads to the house but also displayed over the door to the home, comes in the form of a thick bluish arc, like a crescent moon with the horns cut off and replaced by golden-tan rectangles, and below it a line of musical notes in red, yellow, green, blue, and purple. The roof slopes upwards to a characteristic point similar to its neighbours' roofs.

Instead of a hard door, a curtain of navy fabric hangs from the front of the house.

Notts and Kotts drag Link forward. Cree and Kheel part the fabric to reveal the dark innards of the home, lit by the light filtering through the open windows on the sides.
When the children pull her in, a flame lights in the middle of the foyer room. Link's vision adjusts to the sudden brightness to see a rito woman perched upon a curved wooden branch with a candle in her hand.

The turquoise that feathers her features does not hide the fatigue etched into the violet rings around her golden-green eyes, or perhaps rito simply look like that; Link hasn't seen enough to tell. She has tied back her plume of yellow feathers into a ponytail and sits upon the rito equivalent of a chair—like a bird perched upon a twig—with nothing obscuring the intensity of her gaze as Link studies her studying the children and Link.

Link glances at her escorts for advice and nearly topples over in laughter: all of them have puffed up into nearly unrecognisable balls of fluff and feather, like dandelion puffs standing on pairs of taloned sticks. Genli hides behind Link with Notts and Kotts stepping backwards to emulate their older sister.

Only Cree and Kheel try to stammer something out.

"Th-the visitor made food for us," Kheel explains, her timbre shrill, yet Link can hear the melody beneath her words.

"Meunière," Cree adds, fluffing up her blue feathers. "Salmon meunière."

"And we were really hungry..." Kheel continues.

"...and, that is, er, the visitor wants to see Chief Kaneli, so we said, 'We'll take her to Mother,' since Mother knows everything in the whole world." Cree beams hopefully at the rito woman with the candle, who arches her brows. "The visitor is really nice!"

Notts and Kotts butt in in unison: "C-can we keep it? Please?"

Kheel's feathers flare out further. "You're not s'posed to call people it."

From behind Link, she can hear Kotts leap up and down by the clatter of talon on wood; the child grips the hem of her tunic for support. "But the visitor doesn't look like any gerudo lady or sheikah not-rito I've seen and I dunno what to call it! It's weird!"

Notts agrees: "It's weird! It's weird! They don't have feathers so you can't know what to say! It's weird!"

"I'm a girl," Link offers to alleviate their distress, "and not a gerudo, or a sheikah, but a hylian."

"Ohhhhhhhhhhhhh," the children—save Genli—say together, and then Notts and Kott yelp out together: "What's a hylian!?"

The rito woman brings her free wing to her mouth to laugh softly. She sets the candle down. "Girls, thank you for bringing her here," the woman signs with a flight of feather. "Please go to bed. I'll take care of the visitor."

Notts and Kotts abandon Link first to run off past the fabric door behind the foyer and disappear into the dark. She listens to their muffled jabbering of hylians and what in the world that could mean. Cree hugs her mother good-night, and her mother gives her head feathers a quick preen. Kheel follows in Cree's talonsteps.

Genli scoots a centimetre at a time out from behind Link. She salutes her mother. "Night, Mom."
Her mother signs a wide arc: a word that Link does not know, but suspects represents Genli's name. "Good night. If you want a midnight snack, you can just tell me, you know."

Genli's facial feathers darken to a forest-green and she scampers off.

With the children gone and the tensions relaxed Link allows herself a glance around the foyer, or main room, or sitting room, or wherever she may be. A circle of branches around a decorated floor. Paintings and portraits of the children adorn the walls alongside pictures that—Link assumes—the children have painted themselves. One depicts a family line-up. She recognises Kotts and Notts, Genli, Kheel, and Cree in a row, with their mother on their left side, and a broad blue rito holding some sort of rectangular banana on their right.

The children's mother taps Link's shoulder so abruptly that Link momentarily sprouts wings and jumps backwards. Instead of hitting the door, Link passes through the fabric barrier to smack her rear into the wooden path outside. The sudden chill of evening air hisses just under her skin.

One way to kick out a visitor.

But the children's mother lifts the veil and gestures for Link to come back into the home.

"Wait here a moment," she instructs Link, vanishing into the innards of the house. In the meantime, Link endeavours to learn to perch upon one of the branches that serve as chairs. Her feet cannot curl around the curved top even after she removes her boots. If she attempts to sit normally, the thin branch imprints a painful line into her bottom and thighs, and she falls over either way.

The children's mother returns just after Link has slid off for the fifth or sixth time, her face planted firmly in the floor and her torso in the air. The mother brings a foldable chair for guests.

The children's mother begins making tea. Link could offer her own cheeks to boil the water for the burning flush as she seats herself in the wooden chair.

"Call me Amali," she says. Amali pours tea into two cups and places the pot—green and blue, painted with songbirds—on a stand between them. The wooden cup warms Link's palms. The tea smells of rosehips, of warm cinnamon, of herbs she has scented before but for which she has no name. "Thank you for taking care of Genli." Before Link can react Amali resumes: "I know she asked you for the salmon. Kheel likes porgy, like her father; Cree has a fondness for trout; and the twins like carp." She smiles tiredly at Link. "Of course, they like it because carp sounds halfway to a swear word."

Link reflects her smile for lack of words to say. They fall into quiet. The tea soothes Link's startlingly dry throat. Draining the cup, she rolls it between her palms for the delight of the wood grain texture against her skin.

At length Amali speaks again. "You're more than welcome to more tea if you want it, you know. Now, that is...you wished to speak to Chief Kaneli?"

Link inclines her head. "I have a letter to deliver to him from Lady Impa of Kakariko," she rattles off mechanically, removing the red envelope from her satchel as proof. She notices Amali's eyes widen and then narrow into thin slits of golden-green.

When Amali resumes conversation, Link observes the deliberateness of her motions, the steadiness of the arcs through which her hands sweep, and how her feathers bristle as if prepared to leap away at any second. "If you wished to see Chief Kaneli, you should have passed through the checkpoint, you know."
Link makes an oh noise. "They turned me away!" she explains eagerly, latching onto something to say. "They said he was busy with matters of Medli. Something about recent attacks...?"

The feathers of Amali’s brow arch outwards. "Have you not heard of Vah Medoh?"

She lowers her arms to her lap and shakes her head. Once more Amali studies her under a gaze so heavy that Link defaults to staring blankly ahead.

"Where did you say you were from, and whose letter is this?"

"The letter’s from Lady Impa of Kakariko." Link learned enough from past experiences attempting to justify her actions to elaborate rather than state her basest honest feelings, though she is hungry. "She's been asking me to go to different towns and see how people are doing. She says that since the Great Calamity—" Link touches her fingers to her chin to recall. "—communication has been lacking, is what she said, I think? She asked me to see how they were doing in Darunia, and she didn't give me a letter then. So I went around and asked all the people in Darunia. But I don't think I did a very good job—" Her realisation comes upon her as a storm in the night. "—because this time she gave me a letter for Chief Kaneli directly. I don't know what's in the letter."

"To Darunia, and now Medli?"

Link nods excitedly.

"I suppose you truly have travelled far, you know." Amali’s feathers have settled from their outwards fluff. Fluff. "Who did you say sent you?" Link repeats herself. "Lady Impa of Kakariko..." Amali brings her hands behind her head to fiddle with her ponytail plume. Then in a rush of feathers she flutters down from the perch. "Wait here." She returns within a few minutes with a slitted wooden cylinder, from which she pulls out a long sheet of parchment. A letter or book of some form. Link watches her scan the paper from right to left with a gaze so intense it radiates heat.

After a few moments Amali nods to herself. She returns the paper into the slit and looks up at Link.

"Yes, I've heard of a—Lady, you called her—Impa before. I think my husband..." Amali’s feathers curl inwards; Link blinks vacantly at her. Amali polishes the side of her beak. "Well, that isn’t relevant, you know. I might know why the checkpoint turned you away." Leaning forward, she asks for the envelope. Link lays it flat in her palms. "Do you see the mark upon that envelope?" Amali places a feather against wax seal: the eye with the teardrop. "That is the symbol of Sheik, you know. Yet, if you turn it upside down..." She rotates the envelope so that the tear points away from Link. "...that is the symbol of the..." She signs a word.

This time Link asks directly. "What's that gesture mean?"

Amali spells it out. Yiga.

Link blinks. Instinctively her hand moves to her right hip and Amali inhales sharply, prompting Link to shake her head. "I don't know who they are, but I've been asked before if I'm Yiga."

"You don't know who the Yiga are...?" Amali’s frown etches deeper. "If you speak the truth, then you seem to know very little for a traveller, you know. I mean to bear no insult."

Link rubs the back of her head and smiles sheepishly at Amali instead; the corners of Amali’s mouth hint at an upwards curve.
"The Yiga are...honestly, even I don't know that much about them. They've raided and ransacked villages all over southern Tabantha, and every year they come further north. Some say that they're worse than monsters. Monsters you can hear coming, you know, but Yiga." Amali covers her face with her wings; Link hears her breathe in through the curtain of feathers. "What would possess people to hurt others, to willingly serve the Calamitous One, I don't understand."

Link tries to inquire of the Calamity but Amali pays her little attention. She can see the wet shine of Amali's eyes. In the unsteady jerkiness of her wings, in the way that her words slur and muffle into one another, Amali seems to talk more to herself than to Link. "Since Vah Medoh started attacking things have become even worse, but...few people want to move out, because where would we even go? If we leave, there's no guarantee of safety, but neither is there if we stay, and yet I..." Amali's gestures die away entirely and she hides her face in her wings.

Link continues to sit in the foldable chair with the cup rolled between her palms. Impassively she unfocuses her gaze, the portraits on the walls blurring to a kaleidoscope of colour. She dare not breathe.

Eventually Amali tucks her wings at her sides. Link can see the darker tracks of tears down her cheeks. At least Amali cries no longer. "I'm sorry you had to see that. Recent events have...exhausted me, though that is no excuse, as I know." She flicks out her feathers as if shaking the excess thoughts from her hands. "Would you like more tea?"

Link dips her head.

Amali pours her another cup. "There are those who say that Vah Medoh's attacks are a punishment, you know. They say: if we had not settled down in villages, then our guardian would not have turned on us. They say: the winds that storm from Vah Medoh's wings and the light that burns from Vah Medoh's beak are the Goddess's warning and the Goddess's fury. They suppose that the Goddess should wish us to take to the skies as our foremothers did and keep to a nomadic existence. If I knew more of the world, then I might have my own thoughts, but for me, all I wish is to see my daughters and my husband at peace." She tucks her wings against her boy. Link blinks at her. "I suppose that Lady Impa of Kakariko would be interested in knowing that, you know. If you wanted to write down my words to bring back to Lady Impa, then that would be fine." Her feathers darken slightly in her blush. "Ah, maybe leave out some the things about the daughters and husband."

Link's sheepish smile returns. "Thank you..."

"Now, if this is acceptable, then I will take you to see Chief Kaneli in the morning. I do not suppose that he would find much pleasure in being woken up in the middle of the night, you know."

Link laughs. Amali raises a wing to cover her mouth as she joins in the laughter, up until Link nearly slumps from her chair in a combination of exhaustion and hunger. Apologising to her host, she climbs back into the chair to pour herself another cup of tea.

"Can I do anything to repay you?" Link asks while Amali follows suit on another helping of tea. "I have monster parts." When Amali's features contort she hastily adds: "And rupees."

"Hm? No, no worries at all. I should thank you for making Genli salmon meunière that even she would like." Amali pauses. "The most I could ask of you would be your name, if you were willing to give it. Link? That's a pretty name." Amali sighs. "I suppose I should ask you for another favour. If you wouldn't mind, then could you make a batch of salmon meunière for her?"

Link straightens up in her chair as though the seat had pricked her rear. "I'll whip up anything you Amali relaxes visibly, the tension leaking from her shoulders. "She's been picky about everything lately. Please, let her antics not get to you. It's the anxiety of Vah Medoh, you know."

"I don't mind at all."

"You say that," Amali replies, her eyes slightly narrowed, "yet your face and your words seem at odds."

Link flinches back. She cannot wash her features of that hollow vacancy. Self-expression. Voice. Instead she feels her fingers pressing against her palms.

Then her stomach grumbles loudly, and Amali pushes her hand over her beak. "I've been a terrible host, haven't I?" she signs with a laugh. "Would you like something to eat?" Link leaps out of her seat; the promise of food has chased away her fatigue so thoroughly that she could wrestle the Malice and win. "Did you not have any of the salmon yourself?"

"It'd be enough if you could let me cook," Link answers honestly.

"I'll come with you, then, lest someone happen upon you." Amali rises from the perch. She dons a cloak of sorts and parts the fabric into the cool night. Link follows her. Where before the slight heat of the afternoon had kept the communal cooking area to a reasonable temperature the onwards march of night has sapped away the warmth. Link shivers.

But neither snow nor sleet nor rain nor fog could keep her from a warm meal.

"Let me help you out, at the very least. Have you ever eaten a Tabanch cake?" Link shakes her head from side to side, and Amali brightens. "My husband tells me I bake so well that I make it look like..." She pauses. Before Link can make known her confusion Amali resumes with a smile: "...a piece of cake!" She laughs to herself. The mirth that wears away the wrinkles at her eyes brings Link to laugh as well for the sheer joy of it even if she knows not the joke.

Link browses her satchel. The very last of the carrots that Koko and Cottla gave her. Endura carrots, only, all of the swift carrots having disappeared here or there into Ilia's belly, as the horse seems to prefer their immediate sweetness to the slow release of endura carrots. Amali inspects the long orange vegetables.

"I haven't seen carrots in ages. You brought these all the way from Necluda? Does everyone in Necluda speak as formally as you do? If you wanted to use that, then I don't see why we couldn't." She breaks off the tip of a carrot to nibble it. "Carrot cake it is."

They work by candlelight and rest by moonlight. While Link grinds out another round of flour—Amali insists she need not do so given the already-made flour that she has available, but Link finds the work a calming reprieve from the pressures of justifying her existence in speech—Amali grates the carrots. She boils sugarcane into a thick crust of brown sugar that she mixes into the carrots, which takes enough time that Link finishes the flour far before Amali has completed her task. After cleaning the grain mill, Link picks out acorns from her satchel, washes, and crushes them into tiny bits. In Link's cooking pot, Amali bids Link to beat goat butter, sugar, and vanilla extract—the latter from a small glass vial that Amali produces with a wink, referring to it as Tabantha's own special ingredient—alongside rock salt and a dash of cinnamon. She adds a white powder that she refers to as aerated salt, though it does not taste salty to Link when she tries it on her tongue. Link's arm threatens to fall off. Amali lets her rest as she mixes in the flour as well, to create a thick batter. When her muscles cease aching, Link takes over yet again to combine the grated carrots, as well as the crushed acorns, much to Amali’s perplexed yet approving nod. Link butters, then flours, the bottom of a pan. With a grunt, she hefts up the cooking pot and pours the batter into the pan nearly to the top.

Amali demonstrates the use of the wood-fired oven. She slides the pan inside. "It'll be a few hours or so," she remarks. Without a chair, Link seats herself cross-legged on the floor and slaps her cheeks to keep awake. "I suppose you're not used to cooking at night. If you want, then you nap."

Link shakes her head. Not with the scent of carrot cake slowly enfolding in an embrace of warmth.

While they wait, a city guard passes by. Amali chatters animatedly to him, far too quickly for Link to keep up with her words; the conversation reminds her of her relative lack of fluency in Tabanch. The guard leaves them be.

Amali prepares frosting. Under her instructions, Link stirs together the remainder of the sugar with goat butter. Amali dribbles in drops of vanilla, tasting every few drops, until she nods with satisfaction. A splash of milk completes the white substance. Link beats the frosting; it becomes thick and fluffy. Amali retrieves what she calls a piping bag, into which she scoops the frosting and seals the top.

Then the two rest and await the cake in relative silence save for the grumbling of Link's stomach. Lowering her eyelids, she wonders at the whisper of cold across her skin, in the kiss of wind on her cheeks, in the wash of moonlight over her hair. If she listens, she can just make out a song on the wind, and then she realises that she has not conjured up the music, but that the night breeze conducts an aria in the windchimes.

When the wind dies down, Amali breaks the quiet.

"When my husband was here, we would sneak out to the kitchens at night. I would bake long into the wee hours of the morning while he serenaded me." Amali strokes her fingers through her plume of feathers while Link sits without words. "You've travelled a long way. Perhaps you've seen him on the road."

Link glances up at her to meet Amali's expectant gaze. She blinks at her.

"If you haven't, you don't need to feel bad, you know. He has dedicated his life to collecting folksongs from the world over, so he has gone nearly everywhere. To Parapa, to Hebra, to Lanayru, to Faron, to Eldin, to Necluda...and always he brought back songs. When Vah Medoh began its attacks, he left, promising me to return when he's fulfilled a promise he made." She exhales. "He...he has the gentlest eyes of any man I have ever known. Have you met him?"

Link tilts her head to one side, and Amali blushes.

"And of course I haven't given you anything to identify him with. Ah, he's a rito, of course. Blue and gold, and white too, with a black beak. You might know him by his accordion of trade, if you've seen a travelling minstrel."

She sits up. "Kass?"

Amali buries her face in her wings, only the green of her eyes visible behind the crown of her feathers. She nods, and Link pulls herself up the table.

Her arms become messengers of Amali's comfort. She tells Amali of her first encounter with Kass in the foothill village of Medigo on the other side of the land once known as Hyrule, and again at the Thundra Plateau more recently, far closer to Medli. She tells Amali of the songs that Kass has sung for her and the beauty of his craft both of instrument and voice. She tells Amali of the way that the entire village quieted to listen to him sing.

"...thank you, Link." Amali bows her head. "If you see him again on the road, tell them his daughters and I love him very much."

The cake continues to bake. At some point, Link notices that Amali has dozed off, while the cloak has fallen down to her shoulders. She leans over to pull the hood back up to keep Amali warm.

Link trains her gaze onto the oven. The cake rises up from the pan. She licks her lips.

By the time the cake has finished, the aroma alone has brought tears to Link’s eyes and pink to the edges of the sky. She wakes Amali with a nudge to the shoulder.

They take the cake out together. She wipes drool from the corners of her mouth. Amali decorates the cake with white frosting before they carry the pan between them back towards Amali’s house.

The windchimes meter out a rhythm to their walk, a method to their madness, and Link steps in time.

They barely pass the threshold of the home when five familiar faces pop out from behind the fabric door in a column. They half-fly and half-tumble in at the same time to swarm Link and Amali with demands of cake cake cake for breakfast. Link lifts the pan over her head while Amali bursts out laughing.

"Only after a healthy breakfast," Amali insists. Genli pouts and demands salmon. Notts and Kotts continue to run circles around Link begging for cake, while Cree and Kheel patiently take their perches.

"Can we pleeease practise singing right afterwards?" Kheel asks, puffing up her feathers. "You can conduct us right Mother?"

"I have to take Link to see Chief Kaneli, you know," Amali answers. She sets out breakfasts of seed-and-vegetable salad. "After that, of course, Kheel."

Kheel rustles up her feathers while Genli stamps her foot on the ground. "Genli isn't not not not not eating this!

"Only good girls who have eaten breakfast can have this carrot cake that our visitor made, you know."

Genli glances at Link, who waves at her. "She made it!?" Link bobs her head, and Genli mopes towards the table. "Genli gueeeeeeesssss it's okay to eat salad, if it means Genli gets the cake."

Cree giggles and Genli tries to chuck her spoon a her. Link catches the utensil; she returns it to Genli who exacts her violence on her bowl of salad.

Eventually the salad vanishes into their stomachs. Amali cuts the cake. Link expects none after the fried salmon, yet she finds a plate with a hearty slice pushed into her hands.

If she sobbed for a year, she would not properly express her gratitude.

Carrot cake.

Endura carrot. Link has eaten mixed swift and endura carrots before, but never endura by itself.
She has noticed Ilia quicken her pace on swift and ride longer on endura.

She foregoes the spoon and scoops up the slice of cake in her palm. Her teeth pass cleanly through the sweet frosting that melts in her mouth and dig into the moist flavour of the cake, its mild sweetness a perfect complement to the texture of acorn. Warm cake, cool frosting, sugar and substance all at once.

She has tasted this cake before. She stood—her body stood—on a field pillared with stone. A giant bird-like beast of gold and brown, its eyes a dull orange, perched in the centre of the field, dwarfing the city of tents erected at its feet. She stood there nearby with a plate of carrot cake, while the girl with the golden hair conversed with a sheikah woman in a white robe, the latter eating a slice of the cake that Link had prepared.

"...I still believe that the activation of the Divine Beasts has something to do with the sheikah slate," the girl with the golden hair said. "There has to be some way to link the two together."

"Pah, I know," the woman replied, pausing for a moment to pull her dark hair into a taut bun before resuming her attack upon the cake. "Why else do you think we gave the slates to the Champions? Believe me that we are looking at this from every possible angle. You've been traipsing around—"

"...please me, you've been working hard at unlocking that sealing magic. That's what you need to do."

Furthermore, I have reason to believe that the Divine Beasts are associated with the Sacred Realm." The girl with the golden hair rummaged through her pack to retrieve a bound notebook. "I have with me a report—"

"No need." The woman polished off the cake. The girl with the golden hair looked at Link, who cut the woman another slice. She remembers feeling the girl with the golden hair's mounting desperation thick as the scent of carrot in the air. "We have plenty of evidence of how the Divine Beasts functioned and precious little about the Sacred Realm, if the Sacred Realm even exists. We're working on building a dictionary of Loftean as we speak. That'll give us much more to work with than fanciful folk-tales."

The girl with the golden hair opened her mouth but the woman cut her off: "Maybe if you unlock that sealing magic you'll gain access to the Sacred Realm, and then you can test all of your own theories. And I don't want you to get yourself in trouble—or get me in trouble—with your father."

"But that conversation didn't get me much of anywhere. What did Purah say about her sister?"

Link looked behind her to find the woman in black carried aloft by the blue-feathered rito. He set her on the ground and then dropped himself down to cross his wings over his chest.
The woman in black stepped forward. "Your Majesty." She knelt before the girl with the golden hair, who hid her face behind the notebook. "I apologise, Your Majesty, but you cannot run off from your daily prayers. His Highness has given me these very instructions to guard you with my life. If you do not dedicate yourself to studying the sealing magic before the Calamitous One unseals, I will give my life to protect you but that will not be enough. Please, Your Majesty. You must understand."

The girl with the golden hair squeezed the notebook until her knuckles paled to whiteness. She said something, muffled, against the leather binding. "...like I haven't been trying..."

The rito clicked his tongue. "Tch. That's the problem with destiny. We've got the Princess and her Knight, 'cept the Princess can't do the sacred sealing and the Knight can't do the blessed blade-ing. Whumph."

The woman in black glared at him with a gaze so sharp that Link could feel its edge cutting into her despite the distance. "Revali. One more word and we will have to select a new Champion of Erito."

Revali shrugged. "Right, 'cause you could 'select' another one. S'not like the Princess or the Knight, huh? The King could even 'select' another you, ey, Impa?" The woman in black's face remained impassive as tone, and Revali spat on the ground. "Tch. So, are we getting back or what? The other Champs are waiting for you two walkabouts. See, like layabout, except you two have a tendency to walk off and make me fly around searching for you."

"That's enough, Revali."

The girl with the golden hair sank into the grass on her knees. "He's right. I don't know why we're playing at this farce. No matter what I do, it's never going to work."

Revali clapped his wing onto the back of the girl with the golden hair. "Hey now, cheer up. You've got plenty of time before the bwig bwad bwoar shows up. In the meantime there's tons of opportunity to run away, worry everyone to death, and waste everyone's time."

The woman in black looked to strangle Revali, but instead she narrowed her eyes at Link. "And you. She remembers recoiling from the cut of the woman in black's words. "We have to tolerate you for that sacred sword on your back, but how could you encourage Her Majesty? Are you trying to sabotage us?"

The girl with the golden hair stood back up with the knees of her black pants greened by grass. "Leave Link alone," she pleaded. "I begged her to help me. I ordered her to. It's not her fault."

"She's enabling you. Knight or not, if this happens again, I will be reporting this to the King." The woman in black's mouth thinned into a line. "And may I remind you of your sister's conditional stay at castle. Or would you prefer her returned to your parents?"

The memory fades into the curdling of her blood and the thudding of her heart at the fear of the threat, yet she feels no fright at all at the woman in black's final words.

No, not fright, but hope.

Whatever happened to the silent castle on the horizon—if her little sister could have been sent away—then maybe—

Link licks the frosting from her fingers, counting the names that she has collected like so many scars on her skin. The Champion of Erito, skilled with the bow. Revali. The Champion of Gorogoro, who offered her a home. Daruk. The girl with the golden hair, scholar of the shrines. The Princess. The woman in black, the Princess's shade. Impa. The girl with the red hair, who made her promise—promise something. Marin. The horse with the white mane, who came at her whistle. Ilia. The girl with the golden-brown hair, who smelled of horses. No name. The girl with the pigtails, with the red telescope, with the blue dress patterned in red flowers that Marin had given to her—she remembers this so distinctly that her breath catches. Marin, the sunrise honeying her fiery red hair and dark brown skin, with a box. For your sister. I hope she doesn't mind a hand-me-down.

The girl with the pigtails. Who found the seagull drawn into the lapel of the dress and screamed out loud with her surprise and joy.

Your sister.

She stares at her reflection faintly visible in the ceramic of the empty plate.

A sister.

The girl with the pigtails, who loved carrot cake.

She lifts her head to the children. To Cree, to Kheel, to Genli, to Kotts, to Notts. They poke fun at one another, laugh with one another, insult one another, support one another, distract their mother together to filch more of the carrot cake.

A little sister.

Her lips part into a grin that she could not stop if she tried. She can sense the tears brimming at the corners of her eyes.

Carrot cake.

She helps Amali to clean up. While she stacks dishes and the pan to wash in the basin of the communal cooking area, Amali leaves Cree in charge of the other girls, to Genli's vocalised dismay. Link stifles a laugh. She leans over to Genli to promise her another meal of salmon meunière tonight.

"For a feather faery who doesn't even know what a feather faery's s'posed to do," Genli says with half a grin, "Genli thinks you're not so bad!"

A touch on Link's shoulder makes her turn towards Amali, tilting her head up to look at her. *Come on," she signs. "I'll take you to see Chief Kaneli."

"And then afterwards, I can teach you to bake cannoli." She laughs at her own joke.

Link wonders if her sister would have liked cannoli.

—

Enduring Carrot Cake (six hearts, two-fifths golden stamina vessel) - cane sugar, endura carrot, goat butter, rock salt, Tabantha wheat

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Hopefully next chapter will return to my previous release schedule. The delay actually isn't my fault for once and I have it prepared for release as of the evening of the fifteenth of September, but my beta reader had other plans.

I don't have time for a long author's note tonight, so I'll be fairly brief. Amali is Kass's wife from the games, if you recall. I decided to make her more prominent here than she was in the game. Interesting that Kass has heard about Lady Impa of Kakariko! I wonder from where Kass might have heard that name. Perhaps just on his travels, sure. But perhaps...

The Yiga being around southern Tabantha is a reference to the location of their headquarters, so they would necessarily move from south to north through Tabantha.

Unlike Yunobo, who referred to Vah Rudania with reverence, Amali calls Vah Medoh "it" which is a change of pace.

And hey! It's a younger Purah. The Champions here were selected for merit, and Impa herself is replaceable; the Princess is of course by blood, while the Master Sword chose the Kight.

Indeed, Link now remembers fully about her sister, except for a name, which will have to wait. She does, however, remember Revali's name at last.

Anyways, thank you to you, the reader, for reading along with me this far, and thank you in advance to my beta reader for pulling through whenever she does.

midna's ass. 15 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: This chapter, again, is everything I adore about our time spent in Medli. Amali's five children are written so well, and Amali herself is a wonderful character, and they play so well into the atmosphere of the arc.

Link remembers her sister here. It's so very bittersweet in the most beautiful way.

This chapter has a cool memory, too. Getting to see Purah in the past is really neat.

Emma. 17 September 2017.
The travelling chef delivers the Kakariko matriarch's letter to Medli's chief. After activating the city shrine, the chef witnesses the Divine Beast attacking Medli. The chef, the Tabanch housewife, and the Tabanch housewife's children escape to the flight range at the outskirts of the city to regroup with the city's most renowned archer and warrior. When the archer leaves to collect his wife and son from the besieged city, the chef strives to convince the Tabanch housewife that they need to do something about the Divine Beast now.

To my readers: I thought I posted this twelve hours ago, but apparently AO3 had a hiccup and didn't post it. Well, it's posted now, and the twenty-third chapter will be out within another twelve to fifteen hours.

In the early chill of the morning, Link shivers and rubs her arms. Medli crowds with rito alongside a sizeable population of gerudo and fewer numbers of sheikah and gorons, the latter mostly tourists or merchants from other regions, though most clamour to leave the city rather than to stay. The attacks of the Divine Beast have constricted the city immensely with entire blocks no longer permissible for entry, leading to people turned out of their own homes and the establishment of temporary huts that take up even further space in the already-crowded liveable portions of Medli.

Amid the hubbub, in the jostle of the masses, the heat of bodies pressing in too close and the din of voices rising up too loud, Link loses Amali. She pants heavily and finds the sky spinning around her in wheels of blue and brown. Link sits down in the middle of the street with her knees tucked up her chest to try to catch her breath and quell the heart that thuds so loudly she can no longer hear the windchimes.

Her mouth dries; her lungs ache; passersby crash into her and yell for her to get off the road; she can do little but shake her head back and forth, her fingers twitching and her hands shaking. No words come.

When a warm and feathered hand grips her wrist, she dare not look up. The scent of carrot cake lifts her eyelids.

Amali.

She leads Link through the masses, holding her hand, and Link lets herself drift along, eyes closed.

Eventually the crowds thin out. Amali speaks to guards here and there. Chief Kaneli, they discover, cannot meet with Link right now, for he works on preparations of how to handle the Divine Beast. Link leaves the letter with a messenger who bears resemblance to a secretary bird.
and who promises to deliver the letter post-haste.

On the return trip Link keeps her eyes open. A most familiar orange glimmer catches her attention. With her fingers still wrapped around Amali’s, she drags her companion towards the shrine. She whips out the slate to demonstrate to Amali, taking the rito woman’s wide pupils as a sign of encouragement, and activates the shrine.

When nearly everyone in the nearby vicinity turns to gawk at the now robin's-egg blue shrine, Link covers her face with her hands and considers paragliding off of the side of the city. Even landing in the lake would make for a better experience than all eyes on her.

While she panics, something pushes her into the shrine. She thumps against the inner circle of the lift and turns back to look at Amali, who runs her fingers repeatedly through her plume of hair.

Her fingertips ache to ask yet her arms have leaden and numbed.

The lift takes them down. The lift slows. The lift opens.

Amali steps out to peer about the inner workings of the shrine. "...where are we. Link."

Link hazards half an explanation. That someone she has never met before—someone who wrote her a letter on the Great Plateau—told her to activate as many shrines as she could. That Amali’s own husband has, before, given her a song with which to turn such a shrine to blue. That Lady Impa has offered the same suggestion for her with the village shrine in Kakariko.

Amali shakes her head and gestures to the slate Link holds. "Do you know what that is?"

Tilting her head to one side, Link shrugs. "I’ve heard it called a sheikah slate and a Champions’ slate. Your people should have one of these too, right? I know the gorons did." She pauses and the truth that she has fought down to the pit of her stomach shoots up her throat to dawn upon her. She swallows back the rising bile. "The Divine Beast," her hands say almost without her making the motion. Her fingers tighten around the slate.

"If I may be honest..." Amali exhales a shaky breath. Link can see her frame trembling. "In the Great Calamity, the slates were lost, you know. My husband has told me of the stories passed down from that time. If you have a working slate, then we need to deliver the slate to someone who can access Vah Medoh." She shudders. "Where did you even get it from?"

Link tells the story that she has, by now, oft repeated, of awakening without memory, of finding the letter, of acquiring tasks from Lady Impa. She leaves out any mention of who inhabited her form before she awoke at the Shrine of Resurrection.

"I think the slate was meant for someone else, but I have it now."

Amali paces back and forth. Her feathers ruffle further and further from her skin until she looks more akin to a wall of loose cotton than a rito. Link would laugh if not for the pressures above her head threatening to cave in on her shoulders. "Of course Lady Impa would know about of the slates’ function. If she sent you here with the slate, then she must have meant you to help us." Amali stops in her tracks. "And the letter would have contained that information, you know. But then why would she send someone with no memory?"

She has no answer for Amali. Yet the truth of the events in Darunia—of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania—and of the reason behind Lady Impa sending her, or rather her body, churns within her.

"If Chief Kaneli won't see you, then I have a suggestion." Amali turns around to grip Link by her wrist. Link tries to step backwards and nearly slips down onto the ground instead under the weight of her gaze. Amali releases her. "You will help let us use the slate, won't you?"

Link bows her head. She hears Amali exhale again.

"I'm sorry. You shouldn't be forced into this, you know, but I don't know where we would even acquire another slate." Amali covers her beak with her wings, breathing heavily, before she resumes. "If I'm to be honest, then I don't know the first thing about any of this. But, But I do know someone who can make use of that slate." She starts pacing once more. She ties and re-ties her plumed ponytail. "Come on. How do we return to the surface?"

With the relief easing her nausea, Link focuses on the task of the shrine: a series of windmills that she need activate at the same time. She tests the patterns of each switch, altering them sometimes through careful thought and sometimes by the frustration that brings her to slap the switches about a bit and see what happens. Eventually the slapping-them-about strategy pays off and she lucks into the correct solution.

The cubic light of the goalpoint and the instructions in an ancient tongue startle Amali into soaring a full three metres backwards. Link gestures for Amali to follow her back onto the lift.

"When we return, everyone will demand to know what's happened, you know." The lift hums around them. "If I grab your shoulders, please don't be alarmed."

She's alarmed. The lift opens to the chill of the day, bright and unbearably loud. Abrupt weights on her shoulder coupled with sharp pinpricks around her collarbones and shoulder blades make her yelp. Link's feet lift from the ground. She reaches up to grab Amali around the ankles as the rito woman pumps her powerful wings and rises into the skies.

The yelling of the crowd. The screaming resonating against the open air. Just like Hateno. Just like the village shrines she has broken into. Every time she does this and every time she does not learn; every time she answers the calling of the shrines, more to escape the city than for the shrine itself.

Yet the cries of the city-dwellers do not sound angry, or indignant, or wanting-to-her-arrest-her.

They sound——like fear.

When Amali's shriek rips through her ears, Link opens her eyes to find herself staring directly into the violent violet eyes of Malice.

Of the Divine Beast.

Not the shrine. Not her actions.

But the Divine Beast, who sweeps around the city, agonisingly slowly, the rush of wind beneath its wings knocking back Amali and buffeting the masses below. Link stares at the giant windmill-like structures set into the wings as the Divine Beast's beak folds backwards into segmented joints like the blooming of a flower.

The inside of the Divine Beast's head brightens by the second into a blinding flash of violet.

The heart. Not the twisted heart-like cocoon that held the Malice, but—

"and built behemoths four whose hearts did shine"
"with holy power, called the Beasts Divine."

—at last, Link understands.

She feels herself dropping out of the sky just as a bolt of fire-light emerges from the Divine Beast's core. She observes the bolt cross the skies, the after-image seared into her retinas, and crash into the wooden supports of the city. The wood parts in two. The bolt arcs upwards into the stone pillar.

She ogles without comprehension as the city falls apart before her eyes.

Link continues to plummet. The pressure slackens around her shoulder. Her hands move of their own accord to open the paraglider. Amid the rito diving from Medli into a veritable storm of feathers, she tracks the blur of turquoise diving down to the lower levels to land in front of Amali's home. Amali bolts into the house; not a second later she emerges with the children in a rainbow-coloured cloud of overfluffed feather. She spares Link little time; Link follows closely behind her, nearly tripping over the children's nervously clicking talons.

The wood quakes beneath Link's boots. She can hear the screams from the upper strata of Medli. Amali leads her daughters and Link to the nearest diving platform. Link demonstrates the paraglider and Amali, glancing between her talons and the distant shore on the horizon, nods to herself.

"Follow me," she signs, her hands shaking so badly that Link can hardly make out her words. "To the flight range. Can you make it across the lake?"

Link nods.

"Take Cree and Kheel. If anything happens, they can fly a little themselves." Amali crouches down in front of her children to embrace them one by one. A sudden shudder through the floor makes her stand up again. Gathering Kotts, Notts, and Genli into her arms, she leaps off of the platform.

The spread of her wings resembles the paraglider.

Kheel and Cree, their flight feathers still growing in, their down puffing them into terrified balls of fluff, cling to Link's sides. She steps out the platform. The paraglider catches the wind. She leans forward to accelerate her flight after Amali, dodging other escaping rito and the people that they carry.

She does not look up. Yet from the upper bow of her vision, she can just make out a pulsating purple light.

They glide across the lake. Here: silence but for the whisper of the breeze. Amali lands on the shore near the shrine, where stood the white rito with the arrows. When Link clears the cliff-side she does not close her paraglider as usual for the sake of the children burying their faces into her chest, their talons gripping her thighs and hips tightly enough to draw blood. Instead she hovers down gently.

The flats of her boots touch ground.

Amali helps to peel Cree and Kheel from her sides. Link touches the poked-through holes in her fur-stuffed trousers; her fingers come away wet with blood. She says nothing while Amali checks on every one of her daughters, for injuries, for scrapes, for bruises.

Link rubs her arms. Her breaths murmur out in fogged clouds.
Amali rises. It takes Link a moment to recognise that Amali signs at her. "Link. I don't know what happened between the shrine and Vah Medoh, but we need to get up to that flight range." She points to the cliff above, where Link entered the shrine. "Can you—"

"I'll climb. Take your daughters to safety." Link pauses. "You'll meet me there?"

Amali nods.

Link scales the cliff. With every movement of her legs, she can sense the wounds on her thighs, can sense the slate's weight at her hip, can sense the fate pressing in behind her eyes.

Her eyes sting from the cold. A tremor through her limbs halts her climb. She rests her forehead against the wall of stone.

Every second that she does not move, people die.

For the sake of the person that once inhabited this body, and for the heaviness of the slate thrust upon her before she even knew her name.

She scales up to the shrine and walks the path to a ravine littered with thin needles of stone. Wooden targets hang here and there from the needles. Along the lip of the ravine perches a wooden structure with a tall diving platform that juts outwards, as a tongue from the maw of the flight range.

Atop the platform she spots Amali next to a white-feathered rito. Link hastens her step.

The path ends abruptly at ground level. Triangular supports lead upwards to the flight range with no ladder in sight. She shrugs and sets to climbing.

The strength ebbs from her legs motion by motion. By the time she clambers onto the main deck, she supports herself almost entirely with her arms while her thighs ache and throb.

A series of squawks accompanies a set of warm arms lifting her up. Amali and the white-feathered rito carry her aloft—without Link asking—into the wooden structure. Inside, the white-feathered rito drops her unceremoniously onto a mat. Amali coughs and the white-feathered rito's eyes angle.

Link has scarcely time to sit up and start to pull the slate from her hip when Amali pushes a wooden box at her: a first-aid kit, with medicinal salve and bandages. Before her hands can even form the proper questions, Amali has dragged the white-feathered rito outside.

She can make out their argument—at least, she can hear the white-feathered rito's harsh caws of, "For Farore's sake!"—but she focuses elsewhere to avoid eavesdropping. Link glances around the room. Simple dark wood, without much in the way of furnishing. A pair of mats—one of them of hers—upon the floor, too small for a bed, just large enough for a place to sit. Several curved wooden perches. Bows hanging from the walls. Arrows and quivers in varying styles. A series of carvings into the wood at the front: words that she cannot read accompanied by two sets of numbers. A fabric door leading further in. She listens to the excited-scared jabbers of Amali's daughters beyond the fabric door. Kheel and Cree poke their heads out to apologise for hurting Link, but she waves them off.

Link removes her trousers to inspect her legs. Cree and Kheel's talons have more than torn through her flesh. Quietly she cleans out the wounds, applies salve that makes her wince when her fingers brush against her sensitised skin. She wraps her thighs in gauze.

Her trousers. She turns them inside-out to sew the holes back up, re-distributing some of the furs.
When she pulls them back, she can sense the slightly colder patches where Kheel and Cree's talons poked through.

Link stands up to test her limbs. The sudden pressure on her legs nearly buckles her, but she keeps firm and the pain fades to a dull ache. The shrines have healed her in the past. Perhaps she could return to the shrine outside the flight range and enter to allow that blue healing to stitch her skin together as before.

The argument outside dies away. Amali steps in. The purple around her eyes has set in more darkly than before. Link need not ask: "When Teba comes back...until then, all we can do is wait."

"Teba?"

The greatest living archer of Medli; so says Amali. The man whom Amali mentioned would know what to do with the slate. He and the skilled bowmaker Harth mounted an attempt to disable the Divine Beast several nights ago. Link recalls: Teba, praying at the shrine, preparing strange cloth-wrapped arrows. Though they successfully staved off attacks for this handful of days, Harth came away with a wound so nearly fatal that they fear he may face a permanent injury. Yet for all of their efforts they could not find a method to actually cause damage to the Divine Beast, nor to enter, only the blankly blinking terminal that mocked them with its orange gleam.

Teba has gone, Amali explains with lowered eyelids, to bring his wife and son to safety before he considers the possibility of the slate's existence.

"Can't we do something now?" Link asks, the jerkiness of her gestures bumping her shoulder blades against the walls.

"I..." Amali lowers her head. "If I were an archer, then I would fly out there now. But if we have only one more chance, then I would rather wait for someone who can and has disabled Vah Medoh before, you know."

Link dips her head.

Amali seats herself on one of the wooden perches. She adjusts her plume, then hides her face in her hands.

When the fabric rustles and Notts and Kotts step inside, Link notes Amali forcing herself to smile. Kheel and Cree wander out, and finally Genli. Amali gathers all of them into her arms, takes them protectively under her wings.

Link cannot help but recall Dorian's words. Like a mother hen.

She curls herself up on the mat to substitute her knees for the emptiness in her chest.

Genli breaks the silence to demand a meal. The aggression has left her timbre entirely, given way to terror, the search for something she knows amid the fear blotting her out against the vastness of ten thousand years. Link offers to make something for them, and Amali hugs her children more tightly to her.

She finds an open-air kitchen beyond another set of fabric doors. Pushing the cloth aside she comes onto an open wooden platform. From here she can see the city around the pillars. She pulls the telescope from her hip: no sign of the Divine Beast. That alone sinks her to her hands and knees in relief.

Before the Divine Beast strikes again she will take the slate to its heart. If it costs her life, then at least she can sleep without the weight closing in on her at all sides.

Cake.

She has no carrots left, but she does have almonds. Link checks the pantries for the ingredients that she recalls from Amali’s demonstration. A glass vial. She uncorks the top and confirms the scent of vanilla. The not-salty taste of aerated salt. She spots no grain mill but does find a bag of flour with a clip in the shape of an arrow, the paint uneven and worn down from use. Goat butter, which keeps from melting in the chill of the snowy air. No cinnamon, but she finds other spices: cloves, ginger, nutmeg. She sniffs too hard and sneezes so hard that the jar of ginger almost flies from her hand. Hastily she sets the jars down upon the wooden table.

If she had the time, she would boil her own sugar from sugarcane, yet the sooner she prepares the meal the sooner she can bring warmth to their bellies and smiles to their faces, no matter how transiently. With that in mind, she seizes a bag of brown sugar.

Link whisks the sugar with aerated salt, butter, and flour in her beloved cooking pot. Without milk she adds in a splash of water from her water-skin to break up the batter. She stirs in the spices and the vanilla a dash at a time, tasting the batter as she goes to avoid an overpowering heat—with no lake nearby, except for one at a plunge of several hundred metres, she does not much enjoy the risk of setting someone else on fire with her cooking—and then crushes and scoops in the acorns.

Something—muscle memory, her hands automatically reaching for her belongings—compels her to chop some apples she has in her satchel. Fruit-and-nutcake should do it.

Buttering a pan, she pours the batter in and sets it into the hearth to bake. She breaks up a chunk of flint from her pouch; the spark alights the wood in a blaze of flame.

After a round of clean-up, Link sits cross-legged on the table itself. She props her chin up on one elbow and stares into the flames to chase away unwanted mutters that creep in at the periphery of her awareness.

The frosting. The frosting! Link first prepares the frosting on water, which gives it a blander taste than she had hoped; she discards her first attempt. In the second she simply beats together the butter, sugar, and vanilla. The frosting comes out far too thick. Dribbling in water a single droplet at a time, she adds a sprinkling of nutmeg and cloves to make up for the lack of milk.

She waits.

She waits.

She waits.

She halfway dozes off.

She hears an odd sizzle.

Link looks into the hearth to find the batter having risen up over the sides of the pan to soak into the fire. She rips the pan out from the hearth to save what cake she can.

Fortunately the majority of the nutcake remains edible. She cuts away the crusts on the sides and top that have charred to black. At least she can salvage the cake with liberal application of frosting. She has no piping bag and so spreads the frosting with a spoon instead. To hide the unevenness of the frosting she cuts acorns in half and arranges them in the shape of an accordion, with apple-slice manuals on either end.
She admires her handiwork.

The instant she finishes the second round cleaning up, she wonders at the exhaustion of her all-nighter not yet setting in. Even though she slept the previous day, staying up all night to bake the carrot cake may not comprise the wisest decision she has ever made.

Then again. She ate carrot cake.

With endura carrot.

She snaps her fingers at herself before she takes the fruit-and-nutcake into her arms to bring it inside to Amali and the children.

Genli’s face brightens first, followed by Kotts and Notts, and then Cree and Kheel follow suit once they catch sight and smell of the cake. Link cuts the cake into—she counts on her fingers—ten slices, five slightly larger, the other five slightly smaller. She distributes the larger pieces to the children and one of the smaller pieces to Amali, who declines at first. "You should distribute my piece to the children too, you know. I'm fine. I'm their mother."

Link holds out the plate until Amali sighs and takes the slice.

She observes the children dig in. For not boiling her own sugar or having milk, the cake has evidently come out well, judging from the way that the children lick the frosting from their feathers and try to steal cake off of one another’s plates.

Link smells the warmth of the cake herself, the heady combination of baked apple and roasted almond, the sweet and savory in one.

The morning that she rose to view Medli—larger and vaster then, far larger than the Medli that she knows now, with an entire other two pillars that have broken or toppled or otherwise no longer exist, unless her memory has failed her—from the viewing deck of her host's home. In these early hours her host would wake before her and then chide her when she rose with the dawn instead of in the preceding twilight; every day she awakened slightly earlier. Now she stood on the viewing deck lifting up the bow with which he had taught her. She drew her arm back.

The tree across the lake, where even now Revali’s blue banner soared proudly.

Link loosed the arrow.

The red telescope she had borrowed that morning—from whom, from whom, she cannot recall—confirmed that she fell short of her mark and had missed by a wide margin. Exhaling, she tried again.

Throughout the morning she practised until she heard a flurry of feather from somewhere below. Not the usual smooth glide of a rito. A child practising flight for the first time, maybe. She balanced herself on the edge of the viewing deck to take a glance down as a respite from shooting practise.

Revali. Carrying the girl with the pigtails atop his shoulders. She banged her small fists into his head and tugged on his feathers, propelling him upwards. Revali twisted this way and that in the sky. "Stop, stop, if that brat sees me like this I'm going to lose my cool factor—"

The girl in the pigtails responded by tugging harder.

No matter how hard Link clapped her hands over her mouth, she could not contain her laughter.
She rolled away from the edge before Revali noticed her. In an effort to compose herself, Link lifted up the bow once more.

A few minutes of missing every tree in view passed before Revali strutted in from the entrance to the viewing deck. "Sleeping in as ever, I see. Champion of Hylia? No...more like Champion of Hibernation. Ha, that one's good. I'll have to save that for Urbosa." Revali cleared his throat. "I mean, tch. Still slacking off?"

She tucked the bow carefully under her arm. "Thank you for spending time with my sister," Link signed. "She likes you a lot."

"She does?" Two words, two single words in which Revali's voice lost all of its edge and pretense, and his mouth nearly drew up into a smile—though Revali contorted his beak at the last second into a smirk. "That is to say, of course she would. Who doesn't recognise how amazing I am? After all, there's a reason that I was selected as the Champion of Erito. The Hero of Tabantha. The Divine Beast Vah Medoh's Pilot. O Powerful Revali. More than one reason, in fact. As many reasons are there are arrows in those trees." Revali leaned in. "And how many such arrows have you hit?"

Link returned to her archery. Revali insulted her form but in every comment she could make out the shape of a truth. She widened her stance to that of her shoulders; she moved her right foot just in front of the shooting line; she lowered her chest instead of puffing it out as she had before.

Somewhere by the drippings of the afternoon, she heard Revali breathe in. "Well. I'll be plucked." Link lifted the telescope to confirm that—lower than Revali's arrow, and off-centre, and barely threatening to fall out—the arrowhead had plunged into the bark of the tree. "Now do that again consistently and maybe I'll check if my incredible skills have dusted a feather or two off on you."

That night she baked nutcake as gratitude and another peace offering to Revali. She had learned that the quickest way to someone's heart was through their stomach, and she prayed that the gizzards of the rito had similar effect. Her sister slapped her palms on the table and insisted that Link add apples to the acorns, walnuts, and chickaloo tree nuts she was stirring in.

Link did. Fruit-and-nutcake. Revali arched his feathery brow. Her sister referred to him exclusively as big bird or falcon, although in her young age she clipped the ends of her words, so she more often than not called him bi' bir' or falco', and in return he called her pesky monkey, or annoying ape, or occasionally, as now when the sweetness of the cake—or her sister's inquisitiveness—tempered the gale of his frustration: little lemur.

When she finishes the fruit-and-nutcake, she rolls back on the balls of her feet. Amali and Kass's daughters. Amali, waiting for her husband to return. Koko and Cottla, in the shadow of their mother's absence. Yunobo, the weight of destiny freshly thrust onto his shoulders. Whatever may have happened to her sister—to the Champions—to the woman in black, to the girl who smelled of horses, to the girl with thee violet sash, to the girl with the golden hair—she cannot, and will not, let the same happen to anyone else as long as she has blood in her veins and breath in her lungs.

Link fixes Amali with her gaze. Amali shakes her head. "Teba isn't back yet. I suppose that he may be helping with reconstruction. If he were, then I would tell you, you know."

"I don't know if we have time to wait."

Amali continues to shake her head at Link's words but Link reaches out to take Amali's hands into hers. She does not let go. Her fingers form platforms for Amali's palms, her thumbs pressing down just enough to keep Amali from looking away.
As she cannot speak, she lets her gaze dart towards Amali's daughters. The golden-green of Amali's own irises glints with wetness.

She releases Amali. "It's not fair for me to ask you," Link whispers, her gestures contained enough so that the children pay her little attention, "but I can't fly to the Divine Beast myself. If you can take me there—just close enough for me to glide—I'll do the rest myself."

"It's unfair of me to expect a visitor to do anything like this," Amali counters, "and I would only be sending you to your death, you know."

Link's turn to swing her head from side to side. "Please. Trust me. Do you know how Teba and Harth did it the first time?"

The glimmer in Amali's eyes indicates that she does know. "I can't. I'm not a warrior. I'm only a mother and a wife."

"You can fly. That's all I'm asking."

Her motions stiffen. "If you die, then we won't have a slate." She clips the final gesture with the finality of a sudden-dying wind.

Link hesitates. She curls her fingers inwards; her nails print crescent moons of pain into her palms. "As soon as Teba returns he can join me. Or retrieve the slate from my corpse. But we only need to activate the Divine Beast one time, and then it'll stop to attacking. I don't know how long the peace lasts—you have to purge the Malice, or something—but it'll mean no more attacks."

She studies Amali studying her. No noise but for the chatter of the children gobbling up their cake, the clatter of utensils against plates, Genli and Cree arguing about whether they can help themselves to seconds or for whom Link meant the last three slices.

"...and how do you know this?"

Link's hands flatten against her knees. Not a hero. Not the hero. If the word spreads of her having lent a hand to the Divine Beast Vah Rudania, people might expect things from her. She merely bears the slate. A messenger. Nothing more. She could pass on the slate to any other and they could retrace her steps much more efficiently than she could. Yet if she stands idly by and the Divine Beast attacks once more she will never forgive herself.

"Please. Trust me."

Amali rubs her eyes. "I've known you for less than a day, you know. There's only so far I can trust a stranger."

Link stands up. She sets the plate down on the table. Every second, the Divine Beast takes another life. "Can we talk outside?"

"I suppose." Amali takes the pan of cake with her while Genli squawks in indignation. "Stay here."

Not to the diving platform, but to the open-air kitchen. Here Link feels more at ease as she washes out her already clean cooking pot and once more rinses the pan in water boiled from the snow. Amali perches on a branch and watches her.

She rests the pot and pan on the table to dry. The wind whisks the droplets of water from her wet hands.
Link draws in the cool autumn wind, the scent of the harvest on her tongue. She lifts up her arms. Her fingers take the shapes of the skies.

She speaks. In jittered spurts. In slurred gestures. In fits and bursts that almost refuse to come.

Of the journey to Eldin. Of the shrine in Darunia. Of the surveyors who wisely suggested she try the northern mine; Amali interjects to point out that the surveyors seemed more like they were making fun of her than giving actual advice, and Link pauses, touching her chin, and then dismisses the interpretation. Of Yunobo. Of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania.

Of the Malice.

"You don't have to believe me. I didn't do it because I'm some great hero, but...whoever the slate was meant for, I have it now." She forces the words out from her fingertips. "I could give it to someone but I don't know to who."

"To whom," Amali corrects, and then she blushes. "Oh, I'm so sorry. I'm so used to making sure my daughters are speaking properly that I—"

The juxtaposition of the Divine Beasts and the correction of the children's mother make Link double over in laughter. When she wipes the tears from her eyes, she finds the words flowing from her hands that more smoothly. Administration of the best medicine—at least, the best other than food—has loosened her muscle. "I know that this isn't any of my business. But please, please trust me with activating the Divine Beast. Or at least trying to activate it. If anything goes wrong at all, I'll pull out immediately and give you the slate."

Amali paces up and down the kitchen. Link watches her as she continuously looks up at Medli across the water; Link herself glances down into the lake.

The two missing pillars. She can see their stumps protruding from the surface of the water.

Amali crouches down on her haunches by the edge. She starts to move her wings and Link looks on, but the words Amali signs she means for the stars above.

"O Erito, is this Your voice? O Erito, help me. O Nayru, grant me Your wisdom to make the right...the right decision. O Din, grant me Your fire; Goddesses know we'll need it. O Farore, grant me Your wind beneath my wings. O Erito...please."

She straightens up and tucks her wings into her sides. She turns.

"I'll tuck my daughters to bed," she says, her gaze trained on the skies rather than on Link, "and then we fly."

—

Nutcake (six hearts) - acorn, cane sugar, goat butter, Tabantha wheat

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Sorry, Link, if you thought that you could escape from Vah Medoh.
It's not going to be that easy. And poor Link, who gets taloned up by the kids so scared that they cling to her with everything they've got. Of course, Link isn't going to complain about that; that doesn't mean it's not painful.

Gee, Link sure is spending a lot of time with Amali. We get a brief glimpse of Teba, but he's more concerned with getting his family Saki and Tulin safe.

Link does indeed have a panic attack in the middle of Medli because of too many crowds. She's not that good with so many people around.

Link actually managing to speak to Amali for once is a huge step in the right direction. She prioritises the livelihood of the people around her over her own fear. It's also really hard to talk about her experiences like that.

Aha, and here we see why I've been talking about Link's little sister and Revali in these memories, because they finally meet here. Urbosa has a thing for puns.

We get a little insight on the struggles that Amali has as well. It's a radically different experience from that with Yunobo and for good measure. While Yunobo had nothing but praise and encouragement for Link, Amali will be a different story.

Medli has two fewer pillars in the present than it did before the Great Calamity; the two "missing pillars" were knocked into the water during said Great Calamity.

Another big thank-you to said beta reader for continuing to pull through for me every single day, and to all of my readers. You're all wonderful. You're all incredible. Soon enough: Vah Medoh, though not quite yet.

Beta reader's comments: Revali and Link's sister's interaction is so very adorable.

We've gotten hints at Link's issues with crowds before, but here we get to see them in pretty horrifying detail. Poor girl.

One thing I love about this bit is how, despite the circumstances being vastly different, Link still follows the basic progression of Medli - Flight Range - Vah Medoh.

Emma. 17 September 2017.
Spicy Elixir

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef and the Tabanch housewife brew spicy elixir and set off to bring down the Divine Beast of Medli in the hopes of boarding.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

When Amali invokes Din's Fire in her prayers, Link learns, she means fire.

Literal fire.

The arrows that Amali packs into Link's quiver tip with shards of ruby that shatter apart on impact to deliver a rush of heat and flame. "They can only be prepared in Eldin or Parapa," Amali notes; Link wonders if Glepp and Misan have ever dealt in ruby, "and we don't have that many, you know. If you can, then please be careful and don't waste them."

She instructs Link to pick out one of the crafted rito bows, quick to fire, particularly made just for aerial combat. Her short stature contrasting against bows intended for tall rito, Link runs her hands over them until she finds a bow small enough to strap to her back without bumping against her inner knees.

Amali sketches the Divine Beast Vah Medoh on a sheet of parchment. She taps the piece of charcoal against the back of her feathered hand. Link leans forward on the table while Amali gestures to herself. "I suppose I remember what Saki said. Most of it." Amali draws in the eight rotating fans that Link has seen on the Divine Beast's wings, three on each side, one at the base of the tail, and one at the throat. "If we overheat these areas around the fans...the areas look like window-blinds if you can imagine that..." Link nods. "...then Vah Medoh is grounded until it cools off or repairs itself. I don't really know...but with good aim, Saki told me, each of fans takes one or two arrows to ignite."

Seems simple enough. Link bobs her head. "Vah Medoh circles around. We've seen it make the same circuit over and over until it descends to...to attack." Amali takes a moment to breathe before resuming. "It has small crossbow-like weapons all over its surface, with these projectiles that look like a sunray, if rays were made of solid fire." She frowns at herself. "That didn't make sense, did it?"

Link assures Amali that she understands; she has seen the bolts of fire-light before, and she knows how to avoid them.

"Vah Medoh can also create miniature twisters. I suppose it has to do with turning fans on and off. I don't know that much about its capabilities; the sunray weapons are what injured Harth." Hesitating, she picks the charcoal up again, then stops and sets it down, then plucks it from the table once more. After several such cycles, she sets the charcoal down decisively. Amali folds her hands over one another in her lap. "Before I fly you to Vah Medoh, why don't you practise Link cocks her head to the side.

"You'll need to be proficient at archery to ground Vah Medoh quickly, you know. I...I suppose I can't help you until you've proven some competence, on my conscience."

She can tell—from how Amali brings her hands up to her face—that Amali is biding her time for Teba's inevitable return, that Amali is delaying the flight to the Divine Beast. Yet at the same time Link would appreciate the chance to test her skills and learn the weight of Tabanch arrows. Amali shows her to barrels upon barrels of arrow reserves; she leaves the ruby-tipped arrows on the table and takes to the flight range with those of wood.

Amali tasks Link with shooting all twenty targets in three minutes. Teba's own record, she notes, reading from the markings carved into the wall by the entrance, clocks in at just under a minute. Link swallows at the gap between her and Teba's skills—and at her own lack of wings—but better to discover her inadequacy at the flight range than in the face of the Divine Beast itself.

Wind gusts up naturally from the ravine down below to form a column of updrafts. Opening her glider, she glances at Amali, who holds an hourglass filled with sand.

Amali nods.

Link takes off.

The updraft flings her high up above the needle-like stone pillars jutting up from the ravine like a miniature copy of the Pillars of Erito. She fights to close the paraglider against the strength of the wind. Looking down, she finds wooden targets arranged in approximately clockwise spirals along the pillars of the ravine. The wooden struts of the glider snap closed; she plummets. She closes her fingers around the bow. Lighter than the traveler's bow she bore before, the rito bow draws more swiftly. As soon as she notes the first target at the bottom curve of her vision. she looses the arrow.

Link hears the arrow thunk into the wood: a sound so satisfactory that she finds her bow notched before she has put word to thought.

She twists herself in the air clockwise towards the next target. Link finds that she cannot draw the arrows with sufficient speed to accurately hit every target, but she can—with reasonable accuracy—try for every other. At the bottom of the ravine, she juggles the bow and paraglider. The telescope smacks her in the face.

Two, three, four, five.

The updraft takes her back up.

She drops down in the same location again to pick off the targets she didn't on her first time around. Then up on the merry-go-round again. She struggles with the gliding horizontally when the winds bluster her ever higher.

Eight, nine, ten.

She manages to get far enough to access a new set of targets. Again she takes the plunge, this time setting herself to spin around before she even closes the paraglider. She looses arrows at every other target. Most hit, many close to the centre; others drift afar or miss entirely. She counts them on the ascent.
Fourteen, fifteen.

The longer she stays in the air, the stiffer her fingers become. By the fifth or sixth plunge, her accuracy has dropped to one in three targets. She tries to crack her fingers to loosen them yet she has precious little time between holding the paraglider and gripping the bow.

Eighteen.

Nineteen.

Twenty.

She lands heavily on the flats of her boots only to eat a faceful of wood. Amali puts a wing over her mouth to make a noise halfway to amusement, and Link tilts her head. "Is that a black eye?" asks Amali. Short of breath, Link lifts her hand to her left eye where sits the telescope; the skin around the socket feels tender and sensitive.

"How did I do?"

Amali sweeps a wing towards the hourglass on the wooden table, its sand halfway out. Link grins. Scrambling to her feet, she pumps her hands into the air and attempts an impromptu shuffle that—for lack of balance—sends her back onto the floor.

"You weren't the most accurate, but the targets on Vah Medoh are fairly large, so I don't think that'll be an issue." She fiddles with her plume of hair while Link stretches her hands and massages her aching-iced fingers. "Ah, that's right. We'll be flying up high, you know—" The sloping of her flight feathers betrays her concern. "—and what you're wearing might not be enough. If your tunic were stitched-in with rubies, then I suppose I would acquiesce, but...let me prepare some sizzlefin trout. It'll increase your core body temperature."

Settling her hands on her hips, Link nods. How could she say no to a meal?

"How does fish pie sound? If the stories are true, then the Champion of Erito adored that dish."

Link raises her eyebrows. "Baking a pie would take a while," she signs.

"So it would." Amali glances away. "But what do you suggest, then?"

She touches her chin. The fireproof elixirs she downed as though dying of thirst in Eldin spring to mind. Steeping great vats of them took her all night, but a more manageable quantity should boil quickly.

"Elixirs?" Amali frowns. "If I'm to be honest, I'm not familiar with them."

"Then," Link answers with a grin only possible by the promise of cooking, pausing to roll up her sleeves, "I'll show you."

In the open-air kitchen behind the flight range, Link scoops snow into the cooking pot; the melted water soon begins to boil. Amali digs several iceboxes out of the snowbanks. One contains red and yellow fish—and a third species that seems to give off a faint glow—jammed in together; another, pinkish-red flowers and orange-gold blooms of flowers; the last, green insects with scarlet wings, all three boxes packed with ice. Link ogles the third box.

"Have you never had a warm darner?" Amali inquires. She plucks a darner from the box and crunches it whole. "They're considered delicacies, you know."
Link braces herself. She takes on a stance of shoulder width. A true lover of food has the courage to try anything. Link pinches the body of a darner between her thumb and forefinger. A film of ice glistens on its wings.

Bottoms up.

Emulating Amali's example, she pops the darner into her mouth. The insect's fuzzy body tickles her tongue. She almost sneezes as she pushes the darner to her cheek to bite down.

The way the insect brushes against her tongue almost feels as if the darner were moving. Its legs wriggle. Its wings flutter against the roof of her mouth.

It buzzes.

Her hands fly to her throat. Link spits the darner out to see it take into the skies before very her eyes. Amali catches the insect from the air between her hands.

Link grabs the rims of the cooking pot in both hands and hefts it up. Not even the pain of drinking nearly boiling water could overpower her need to clean out the insides of her mouth. The cooking pot slams heavily back onto the wood-fired stove. She pushes snow into her mouth to rinse out the remains of live darner.

"They're alive," she sputters out once she finishes, and Amali pats her on the back.

"The darners are frozen, you know. It's difficult to transport them here alive, and so I suppose they're a delicacy. But..." She smiles apologetically at Link. "If I'm to be honest, I'm not very fond of them myself."

By now, the children have taken note of Link and Amali's activities. They crowd around asking what Link intends to make next and if it will be sweet and if they could have some more cake, please, pretty please, both the carrot cake and fruit-and-nutcake were delicious although they wouldn't say no to more salmon meun—

Amali proposes that the children practise their singing; Kheel hops up to the plate. She conducts her sisters through practising their octaves and arpeggios while Link and Amali cook.

Link begins with monster parts. The tail of a fire-breathing lizalfos, still twitching in her satchel from Eldin, which makes Amali grimace. She looks briefly over the monster parts she has collected from the Tabanch hillsides, but Link knows little of their effects.

One tail should suffice.

To facilitate the speed of steeping, she dices the lizalfos tail as best she can. The tough scaly exterior and even tougher layers of a fibrous, fireproofed skin make cutting into the tail a heroic feat at best and a mistake at worst. In the meantime Amali crushes or chops up the crimson fish she names sizzlefin trout; the aforementioned warm darners that heat up and wriggle about as she holds them in her hands; and the pinkish-red blossoms she refers to as warm safflina.

The warm darners, Link finds, are pretty cute when they're not actively crawling around on her tongue. She pets one on the head with a fingertip and it flicks its wings at her.

Everything goes into the pot. Instead of a vat large enough to make enough fireproof elixirs to last the stable a month, she pours in sufficient water for a handful. The elixir boils speedily. The collected herb, fish, insect, and monster starts to coagulate into a thick mass at the bottom.

Whipping out the sword she filched from the bokoblin—Amali leaps a full metre back—Link stabs through the mass and awkwardly hacks into the lump to break it up, then stirs with the metal sword.

"That's...certainly one way to do that, I suppose."

Amali's comment brings Link to laugh so hard that she almost knocks over the cooking pot. Instinctively she reaches out to wrap her arms around its rim only to remember too late of the boiling water within.

Link lies face-down in the snowbank for a time while the children push and pull her shoulders and ask Amali if she's died.

Eventually the water turns a bright and opaque scarlet. When she stirs the blade around, she no longer has to hack into the amalgam, instead rotating the sword through a thick consistency.

She lets the elixir simmer down a while longer to concentrate. Then she removes the pot from the stove and inhales. Even if Link would not necessarily describe the mixture of scents that coalesce together as delicious, the smell bears a striking difference from the stench of the stable's galley at Medigo.

That more than works for her.

The children take notice and beg for their mother not to force-feed them the whatever-it-is; Genli assumes something 'healthy' while Cree and Kheel fear potential medicine. Amali assures them that the elixir is meant for herself and Link. Cree puts her hands on her hips. "Is it for adults? C-can Cree have some too?" Suddenly the flood-gates have opened and all the children but Kheel demand a sample.

Link glances at Amali, who sighs, brings a hand to her forehead, and relents. She cools off spoonfuls of elixir with her breath and presents them to each child.

Cree, the first to step up, grimaces slightly and opens and closes her beak repeatedly. "Everything for adults is so bitter," she mumbles, and Amali preens the crown of her head.

Not a minute later her entire body darkens with blush and her breathing jacks up into hyperventilation. Amali pleads with her to know what hurts, what has gone wrong. Desperately Link looks left and right for anything that could cool Cree off. With a snap of the fingers she gathers Cree into her arms—Amali lets out a squawk of surprise—and divebombs herself and Cree into the snowbank.

Cree rustles herself into the snow. Link picks herself back out. A cold slickness trickles down the back of her shirt and she yelps. After she shakes the snow from her clothing, she turns back to the other children.

Who stare at her and at Cree, the latter currently steaming in the snow.

"Uh...Genli has changed her mind! Genli s'poses that might ruin her singing voice and then Kheel would be upset, right?" Genli backs away. So does one of either Notts or Kotts. The other one sticks her wing up into the air for a sip; her twin grabs her wing and forcibly pulls it back down.

The box of fireproof elixirs in her satchel comes to the rescue. By Amali's suggestion, they line the box, inside and outside, with cloth to prevent the metal freezing to anyone's fingers. She picks out the empty vials and scoops them into the pot.

Amali leaves Kheel in charge for Cree continuing to sit in the snowbank. When Teba returns, Amali says—she says if at first and then corrects herself—Cree should let him know where she and have and Link have gone, and ask him to accompany them. The violet-feathered rito embraces her mother. "Kheel will do her best!"

Link promises Amali that the elixir will wear off in less than a few hours, that its potent effects—from what she has heard of the making of elixirs—cannot harm, only make uncomfortable.

She touches her chin and then snaps her fingers. Link brings Cree one of the Eldic elixirs to drink. Cree starts to resist, no doubt imagining the horrors of what this elixir could wreak upon her already overheated body. Yet Link explains that two elixirs, quaffed in a short time, tend to nullify the effects of one another. And if not, then at least she will gain an immunity to fire for several hours, "and isn't that neat?"

Cree drinks the elixir down. Its effects take root more immediately. She slides off of the snowbank to plop onto the deck of the kitchen.

Amali hugs Cree tightly.

Link pulls the slate from its pouch on her right hip and presents it to Amali. "If I fail downing that big bird thing," she says, "then you'll have it. If I succeed, then you'll give it back to me."

Tears wetten Amali's eyes. She tucks the slate away for safekeeping. "...thank you, Link."

"Don't thank me yet."

And then, with preparations complete, they go.

Link and Amali drink down a spicy elixir apiece. Once more Amali grips Link's shoulder blades in her talons. Once more Link's feet lift from the ground as Amali takes flight. With Amali's wings occupied and the pressure of her talons around Link's collarbones and shoulders preventing her from moving her arms, they have little communication. Her skin begins to heat up; she can feel her blood pumping more speedily through her body and her breaths grow quicker. Droplets of sweat coat her brow, her upper back, her entire form as the spicy elixir's effects take hold to a nearly unbearable fever. As if a bobble of bokoblins had captured her and tied her up for a roast, then forgotten about her until morning with the flames licking her from below.

The higher in elevation Amali and Link ascend, the cooler the air. The frigid wind kisses the bare skin of her cheeks and neck; if she could she would tear off her outer layer of clothing to bask in the cold. Higher and higher. The air thins out. She swallows one breath after another.

Link should have made an elixir for high altitudes, if such an elixir exists. Or waited for the fish pie, which would have tasted much more delicious. Her mouth waters—the saliva freezes at the corners of her mouth—as she considers the breadth of what pie could mean, of what other sorts of pie Amali might make, of what pie awaits her when she returns from the Divine Beast.

She notices a hum on the very threshold of her hearing that steadily becomes louder. With difficulty for the muscles kept in place by the sharp points of Amali's talons, Link lifts her head up towards the thrumming.

Above them yet, a good fifty metres away, glides the Divine Beast Vah Medoh.

A bird of gold and brown, its massive wings spreading out from either side of its more compact torso. Its long tail streams behind it and curves flexibly to its circular path. Its head sports four violet eyes, or eye-like jewels: at the top, the bottom, the left, and right. Its beak juts outwards to end in a sharp point; she has seen that beak blossom into a tool of calamity.
Eight windmilling fans. On the underside of the wings she can see metal grating circumscribing the fans in another layer around the same radius as the fan itself. The hot air that exhausts from the grating leaves behind a tell-tale fog that the fans then push down. More violet eyes, or something like them, spot between each of the fans. She can see the darker circles on the eyes rotate and twist about.

She tilts herself back to confirm the weight of the bow at her shoulders and the quiver at the base of her spine.

Amali soars up.

The Divine Beast Vah Medoh nears them at a breathtaking pace. Forty metres away. Thirty. Amali soars upwards to clear its path and then flies higher still. Twenty. Link can feel the pressure loosening around her shoulders and braces herself for the drop.

At about ten metres, the wind rushes up around her and Link lets herself fall.

The Divine Beast passes under her. She clenches her fingers around the wooden struts of the paraglider so firmly that her knuckles could break through her skin. She dare not miss. The Divine Beast continues to pass under her. She makes out the terminal along its spine. The ground rushes up to meet her.

As do the guardian-like eyes on its back.

Just before she slams into the Divine Beast's back, Link breaks her fall with the paraglider. The speed of the Divine Beast's flight and the slipperiness of the floor beneath her boots knock her backwards. She scrambles against the ground to gain purchase. The wind pushes her back; Link lands on her rear and slips rapidly towards the Divine Beast's tail. The dark pupils of the guardians' eyes nearby train on her, but their bolts of fire-light miss for the quickness with which she slides over its back.

If she cannot reach the terminal like this, then she will simply have to down the Divine Beast first.

Link keeps slipping; she rolls left into the Divine Beast's counterclockwise flight. Bursts of noise and sound blaze around her yet Link continues to roll, eyes closed, hands at her sides, until she feels nothing beneath her.

She draws the bow.

She has not the time to pay attention to the eyes that glow with fire-light. Her world narrows down to a thin slice of sky, to the fogged grate that surrounds the furthest fan on the Divine Beast's left wing. As she draws back the arrow, the pressure of the string upon the shaft breaks the fragment of ruby. The arrowhead blazes into the glories of flame.

O Din.

She leads her shot but not enough; the arrow nearly whorls into the fan. Just barely does the arrowhead catches onto the inner rim of the grate to explode in fire. Smoke wisps from the grate. Link notches another as she spins through the air to hit the grate on the other side. Something like a detonation booms in her ears. A scraping noise so loud that she covers her ears with her palms.

The Divine Beast drops a fraction through the air.

She notches a third arrow but the Divine Beast has soared too far away and the arrow misses entirely into the lake. Link opens her paraglider; it catches the wind. As her fall slows to a hover, the sky ceases to move around her. The abruptness of the halt nauseates her.

The Divine Beast glides away.

Link drifts downwards. No matter where she turns her head, she cannot spot Amali. And if Amali has left, Link has no method of flying back up without wings.

The low rumble laughs itself out of her belly. No wings with which to soar to the Divine Beast. Just like the rito in her memories said. Revali.

Perhaps her success with the Divine Beast Vah Rudania comprised nothing but a fluke. The fates granted her one mercy, and now their patience has cut short with her efforts at playing the hero.

The Goddesses have never reached out to her, not can she feel Their gazes on her now. Yet Link does feel something else: a sharpness at her shoulders that makes her look up to see Amali supporting her once more. With a single nodl Amali lifts her up into the air.

They repeat the process, although this time Amali releases her at twenty metres apace instead of ten. The extra distance allows Link to plummet below the underside of the Divine Beast rather than land on its back. The fan that she disabled in the first round has ceased to rotate; the thick smoke that billows outwards swoops into the gusts created by the other fans to blur the grates with grey. She aims for and hits the grate of another fan on the left wing. The second arrow sweeps into the fan and detonates in fire in its midst; the third plunges into the grate and explodes.

Link waits until she can no longer hear the shrill chirping of the guardians' eyes to open her paraglider. Once more Amali does not retrieve her until the Divine Beast has passed a safe distance away.

The third round on the left wing brings her the closest to the centre. The smoke has grown thick enough that Link chokes on it. The acrid stench burns her nose, her throat, the insides of her lungs.

Still the spicy elixir keeps her hands from stiffening, keeps her eyelashes from frosting over, keeps her blood flowing to relax her muscles and keep her focused on the prize.

The third fan gives up the ghost in a belch of smoke.

The Divine Beast begins to lose altitude. Its left wing drags downwards and its spiral around the lake tightens down.

Amali flies her up once more. Link starts to work on the right wing. She lines up her shots to avoid wasting arrows, but the Divine Beast's instability brings her to miss: this time around, Link fails to take out a fan. Only in the fifth round does she polish off the fourth fan.

As Amali takes her up, Link counts the fire arrows she has remaining in her quiver. She has enough to account for two more misses.

Four fans to go.

Link aims more carefully. She tracks the Divine Beast's downwards spiral before she even notches the arrow: applying too much pressure to the shaft could break the shard of ruby on the string instead of against the fan. She dispatches the fifth fan, and then the sixth, with a single missed arrow between them. The Divine Beast starts to plummet so rapidly that her paraglider glides with a barely high speed, and she waits far longer for Amali to retrieve her again.

She lands once more on the back of the Divine Beast. When she slides off, Link twirls herself in the air to aim for the fan at its lower abdomen. Her first arrow hits square in the centre of the grate. She notches another but—with her position behind the Divine Beast—the sudden influx of smoke into her lungs triggers a boll of bile into her mouth. Link vomits; the jerk of her arms releases the arrow and it shoots off to plunge into the cool waters of the lake.

Panting heavily with the mixed tastes of fruit-and-nutcake and spicy elixir—all soured and bittered by its time in her stomach—fighting one another on her tongue, Link opens her paraglider. She stares at the lake below.

No more misses. The next three arrows must fly to their marks straight and true. The spicy elixir courses heat through her form and yet her blood runs as if packed with ice.

Amali carries her into the heavens once more. Link detects the relative strain with which Amali flaps her wings, the latent exhaustion of having to drag Link's bulk up again and again catching up to. Biting her lower lip until the coppery tang of her blood overpowers the nausea, Link resolves herself to finish this.

Her next shot strikes the middle ring of the grate. The fan breathes out its last gulp of smoke; this time Link ceases to breathe until she has dropped out of the grey cloud's range.

Two arrows. One more fan.

The Divine Beast plunges so swiftly downwards, kept aloft by a single fan, that even her paraglider drops more slowly. Yet the same fan continues to propel it horizontally forward just as speedily as before. Staying atop the terminal would prove impossible.

Just one more fan.

Even without the paraglider, she scarcely inches down compared to the Divine Beast's plummet. She and the Divine Beast fall at nearly the same downwards speed. Link lines up the shot with unparalleled ease, needing to lead solely horizontally and not vertically, and her assault on the final fan takes its first hit.

Then Link hears the shrieking of the guardians' eyes as they charge fire-light. The relative speeds of her descent against the Divine Beast's that has protected her—that has caused the bolts the fire-light to hit too high—until now has given way.

The wind whips about her. Her ponytail flails up like a flag above her head. Her clothes billow. Red sights train upon her. Scarlet dots on her chest, her abdomen, her arms, her legs, her own face.

She notches her last arrow.

Even if the guardians shoot her from the sky, Amali has the slate, and Chief Kaneli the letter. Amali will pass the slate on to someone who can use it for the better, who need not play hero but who can be hero. Chief Kaneli will send a response back with a merchant or a messenger to Lady Impa. At most Link's death will burden someone with a trek to Kakariko.

At most, she will fail in her promises to Genli, and to Ilia, and to herself.

Ah.

If only she could have tasted all the flavours of the world once, but maybe her body already has. That she does not remember them consciously, after all, does not mean her body has forgotten.
She remembers fish pie. Baked into a crust. She remembers sitting over the lake with a fishing pole. She remembers catching fish: blue and yellow. Trout, mostly, and salmon. She remembers the fragrance of the oven. She remembers her sister's glee and Revali's silent respect, and the other rito around the table. Someone Revali knew. Parents, or siblings, or friends, or lovers, she remembers not, but she remembers the taste of fish melting in her mouth, of the crispy crunch of the crust, of the crumbs that she licked up from her lips.

She remembers fish pie.

She looses the arrow and the first bolt of fire-light strikes it from the sky in an inferno of heat she can sense on her face. The second bolt of fire-light grazes her left side and her clothing catches aflame.

A third beep beep beeps at her. Link reaches automatically for the slate in her pouch, to conjure a bomb, but her hand slips into the emptiness of the pouch and her fingers close around nothingness.

The slate remains with Amali.

Link should have waited for Teba.

Something crashes into her back and she wonders at the physical impact of the fire-light, braces herself for the inevitable rush of pain that does not come. The abrupt wind at her face makes her eyes water and squeeze shut, and then Link feels that sharpness at her shoulder blades and her collarbones.

She lifts her head.

Amali.

Link hears the fire-light detonate behind them as Amali flies out of range away from the Divine Beast. But if Amali takes her back now, with a single arrow between them and downing the Divine Beast—if Link does not activate the terminal—the Divine Beast will rouse itself once more in a scant few days.

She cannot let this end here. She cannot let Amali take her back to the flight range. She cannot let a single fan keep the Divine Beast aloft.

And she won't.

Despite the pressure of the talon normally keeping her from moving her arm, Link reaches upwards. With Amali's legs tucked behind her, she can just brush her fingers on the hem of Amali's pockets.

Her hand closes around the slate.

Link twists her shoulders until Amali lets her go.

The telescope smacks her eye again when she opens the paraglider, the slate trapped between her left palm and the wooden strut. She glides down. Link can hear Amali flapping beside her, can see her eyes wide with fear and confusion, but she keeps gliding. The Divine Beast makes its course around the periphery of the lake. She glides until she can make out the shape of the final fan through the Divine Beast's chest. Looping her right arm through both of the wooden struts, Link taps at the slate's surface with her left thumb.

Amali lets out a shriek: a circular bomb. Conjured up in Link's palm. And then tossed towards the Divine Beast.

The fan sucks in the air around the spinning blade to direct the bomb into its vortex. Link observes the explosive's journey. The sweat on the inside of her palm freezes in the chill of the air and the slipperiness of the slate threatens to slide it from her fingers.

She twitches her left thumb.

The bomb detonates.

The fan continues to whirl.

She inhales, exhales, and closes the paraglider.

As Link descends in front of the Divine Beast, she prepares another explosive. Amali screams wordlessly above her and Link tenses back her arms. The instant she sees the grate, Link chucks the bomb at it with the entire weight of her body behind her; she drags the korok leaf from her back—still waxen red with fireproofing paste—to send it further.

Just as the wind starts to push the bomb away from the fan, she slams the slate with her thumb.

The bomb explodes.

The fan scrapes to a stop.

Link crashes into the water a few seconds before the Divine Beast smacks into the lake on top of her. Its impact thrusts her down; the icy water drenches her clothing to seep cold into the very marrow of her bones like the spicy elixir had drained from her system. The undercurrent carries her. She clings to the slate with whatever ebbing strength she can muster.

Once the water settles, the breath in her lungs floats her upwards. Her limbs dangle beneath her. Something hard stops her skyward journey. Link tries to twist about in the water but the shadow of the Divine Beast darkens her view.

The shadow of the Divine Beast.

She floats below the Divine Beast.

Already her lungs ache for air; already her muscles throb pain from fatigue and lack of breath. Link replaces the slate in its pouch before starting to pedal her arms out. Keeping her eyes open beneath the waves sends needles of ice stabbing through them, and so she blindly picks a direction and swims.

In the frigid waters the night whorls at the edges of her vision, darker yet than the inkiness of the deep. The lake is lovely, dark and deep, and if she just rests for a moment, just stops her struggle, just releases the breath she has been holding, she can sleep.

But then Link will never again taste fish pie.

She anchors the memory to her chest as a sole ember in the heart of winter. If she stops struggling, then never again will she taste fish pie. Never again will she bake stuffed pumpkin for Ilia. Never again will she candy apples for Koko and Cottla. Never again will she dream of the dishes she has tasted and forgotten, and the dishes that she will taste in the future, and the dishes that people create for the first time even now across the land once known as Hyrule, across Necluda and Eldin, across Lanayru and Faron, across Parapa and Tabantha, across Hebra and Akkala, and across the
She swims on.

The waters lighten. When Link creeps up her eyelids a hair, she can just see the end of the Divine Beast's form. The promise of air grants her a second wind. She paddles up with such fury that she swallows the water she churns.

Link surfaces.

The first wave of breath to hit her lungs hurts but she laughs through the pain because that very agony means that she is alive. She inhales and exhales again and again through her nose and her mouth at once to revel in the delicious taste of the air itself, cool and crisp and letting her survive.

She takes stock of herself. Her legs have jellied under the water and her arms nearly frozen, spicy elixir or no. Her left side—where her clothing caught fire before the wind put it out—pulses out in occasional pain but the water has numbed her sensations. She cannot quite feel her right foot. Shaking her head, Link makes the short swim to the perimeter of the Divine Beast to hunt a place to drag herself aboard. The Divine Beast floats halfway atop the water, and her hands cannot find purchase on its surface.

But a familiar flurry of feathers fades away her fear.

Amali drops her onto the Divine Beast's back. She helps Link lie down on her back. Link cannot even stop laughing long enough to thank Amali, who reaches into Link's satchel to pull out another vial of spicy elixir. The second helping radiates heat throughout her body. Without the frigid altitude of the high heavens, Link feels hot, too hot, like she should dunk herself back into the water. Yet Amali presses her down onto the back of the Divine Beast. The feverish warmth serves to dispel the last of the chill from her dip in the lake.

Link wants fish pie.

She crawls towards the terminal. Amali aids her to stand.

"Link," Amali signs, then stops. "If I'm to be honest." She stops again. Link stumbles forward and nearly falls; Amali holds her up while Link pulls the slate from her pouch. Her hand falters. Amali sets the slate down into the face of the terminal. Link slumps over the pedestal; the black crystal hums. She can picture the words draining down and filling it back up, though she keeps her eyes closed and focuses on her own breathing.

She feels a stroking motion on her back. Amali, gently rubbing her shoulders. She listens for the sound of the Divine Beast's back unfolding to gain access within. Link rouses herself up into something almost resembling a standing posture. She regards Amali with a sheepish smile. "I'm sorry for taking the slate," she says, "but we were only one arrow away from disabling the Divine Beast."

"Link." Amali covers her face with her wings a moment. Link waits patiently. "I don't even have words for this."

"I'm alive, and you're alive, and no one got hurt too much." Link grins. "And the Divine Beast is down. C'mon."

She steps towards the circular hole that has opened in the Divine Beast's back. Squatting on the edge where the staircase begins, Link looks inwards to find that she can spot the reflection from the surface of the water. Instead of diving into a Divine Beast submerged she could sleep. Yet the boost in endurance of the carrot cake continues to kick her exhaustion into orbit. That, or the exhilaration of life.

When she does not hear Amali following, Link looks back to see Amali ogling her. "Do you want to wait for Teba?"

"Yes."

"Do you mind if I go on ahead? I can activate the terminal down there at least. Shine some light on the situation." Link closes one eye. "Literally."

Amali grabs Link by the wrist and drags her from the edge like she were scolding a small child. "Absolutely not. What if we lose the slate? You have to bear that responsibility, you know. We should wait for Teba and Chief Kaneli." She pauses. "I suppose I can fly up to Medli to see where they are." Link sighs but inclines her head. She offers her shoulders; Amali frowns. "I don't think I could carry you up there, you know. I'm sorry, but...would you mind waiting?"

Link shakes her head and seats herself by the terminal.

Amali watches her, her feathered hand covering her mouth, her golden-green eyes searching for something in Link's face. Link rubs the back of her head. She watches Amali dip her her head, to turn towards Medli, to crouch down and then to fly up to the city. Her wings flap slowly, unsteadily. Link tracks her flight away from the Divine Beast until Amali disappears behind the pillar. Link's gaze slips down to the entrance to the Divine Beast.

She shouldn't.

But the maw beckons, and the weight of the slate presses into her hip, and the wilds call her name.

—

Spicy Elixir (two hearts, high cold resistance for 10:40) - red lizalfos tail, sizzlefin trout, warm darner, warm safflina

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: As always, thank you not only to my beta reader who strives to make every chapter and every sentence better, but also to all of my readers who come with me thus far along the journey. You're all wonderful and you make these fics worth writing.

I feel like some readers might not have paid Amali much attention in-game! Amali, indeed, is Kass's wife in-game, and the mother of Notts, Kotts, Genli, Cree, and Kheel. She's not given a major role in-game. But given Kass's importance (I highly recommend that anyone who hasn't done so finish his quest), I thought that I would give Amali a more prominent role here. I find her a frankly more interesting and fleshed-out character than Teba. Don't get me wrong: Teba's great in his own way, being a warrior but also a father, and so on and so forth. However, when I sat down to think of characters with whom Link should interact, I couldn't help but think that Amali might prove a better foil than Teba. I stand by that decision. Of course, it's ultimately up to the reader to determine whether I made the right one.

I didn't realise how quickly we pass through the Vah Medoh arc. I believe that I was still in my "yes this is going to be 40-50 chapters long if that" mental state; if I could rewrite this in full now, I would slow down for more fleshing out and character development, but that's just how things are. I think that I cover Vah Rudania and Vah Ruta a touch better, although that's really for the readers to decide.

I didn't mention in the past few author's notes due to the aforementioned time conflicts and whatnot, but I really wanted to emphasise Medli as a medley of music. As the saying goes in-game, rito grow up to be either warriors or singers. The presence of windchimes lends the city a constant music.

The fact that Medli lacks two pillars in comparison to how the city prior to the Great Calamity was my effort to actually change things up, to actually show the effects of the past one hundred years on the world.

Why does Amali sign? There are a few reasons: firstly, I wanted to include another significant and major mute character, so that Link would not stand alone. Secondly, the "virtue" of Erito is self-expression, usually poetically translated as Voice into Central Hyrulean, although in the native Tabanch it includes non-vocal communication as well; to encapsulate this theme, I wanted to include a mute character, so that voice would be explicitly rendered as self-expression. Central Hyrulean, of course, doesn't have the exact same nuances and connotations to words that Tabanch does; hence why the translation to voice can be confusing. It's a bit like how you might talk about an author's "voice" when it comes to writing; the author is not literally speaking out loud, yet you can still discern their voice.

After all, with Yunobo, Link learned to have pride in her own actions, learned that she can successfully (with help) calm the Divine Beasts. After Amali, and in this arc in general, Link is learning about her own voice and to be honest to herself.

So, why Amali at all? Teba is a warrior and a serious, business-like character who wouldn't serve to challenge Link emotionally that much by himself. On the other hand, Amali, a housewife and a more sensitive character with her husband on the road, fulfilled a perfect archetype of a foil for Link to grow and develop. Teba is also important to Link's development, as you'll see in the next chapter. Yet he wouldn't be able to fulfill that role just by himself. Besides, it helps keep the fic fresh for readers.

Vah Medoh supports itself on a series of fans not unlike the way that a helicopter works. I also gave Vah Medoh four eyes to help keep an alien appearance. For those confused, what Link was doing initially on Vah Medoh's back was checking to see whether she could be able to activate the terminal without bringing down Vah Medoh. When she realises she can't, she switches to shooting arrows at it.

Darners and other bugs are good sources of protein. Rito, being bird-like, eat them frequently.

See you tomorrow for another doozy. Up next: Vah Medoh!

midna's ass. 18 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: I really enjoy how the Flight Range minigame from Breath of the Wild is incorporated in here.

The scene of Link bringing down Medoh is absolutely epic.

This series does comedy super well - the scene of the kids trying spicy elixir is hilarious.

Emma. 18 September 2017.
Chapter Summary

The travelling chef strives to activate the seven terminals of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania. With the assistance of the Tabanch housewife and the Tabanch archer, the chef cleanses the Divine Beast of the Malice and remembers something vital about the previous Champion of Erito.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

She walks down the circular spiral of stairs. As Link wobbles tiredly down the stairs, she pulls from her satchel an apple to munch on. Teba, Chief Kaneli, and whoever else Amali sends will come to her aid—she's sure—before she even sets the slate onto the terminal.

If they select a Champion of Erito, surely they would choose Teba for his skills of archery and flight that Amali described to Link, just as they chose Revali before the Great Calamity.

Link taps her left heel twice against the lip of each step before she walks down another flight. When her boot splish-splashes, she looks down to confirm that half of the Divine Beast's innards submerge in water. She crouches down on the step.

While the frigid water of Lake Totori chilled her to the bone, the water within the Divine Beast feels milder. Refreshingly cool. Link cups her hands, pooling liquid in her palms, and tilts her head back. Her parched throat relaxes. She splashes water onto her face, claps her palms onto her cheeks, and rubs her eyes with the heels of her hands.

Time to wake up.

Link tries to dive into the water to check the depth of the main terminal, yet her body floats up to the surface no matter how much she strain to swim down. It takes her a moment to discover the culprit: the closed cooking pot with its wooden lid, full of air that buoys her up. She opens the cooking pot and fills it partially with water until the pot floats without either rising or sinking. Capping the pot again, Link dives down to the bottom.

The water goes deeper than she anticipated. Still, Link can spot the main terminal's orange glow. The bird, the elephant, the lizard, and the camel, with the long-necked bird facing the terminal side this time instead of the lizard.

The other two Divine Beasts must come in the form of the elephant and the camel. Though she can picture a camel's shape, she cannot do the same for an elephant.

She takes a deep breath and plunges back into the depths.

Link just manages to place the slate into the terminal before her lungs start to burn. Paddling wildly up to the surface, she opens her mouth too soon and swallows water. When she drags herself onto the spiralling centre staircase, Link hacked the water out of her lungs by slamming her hand repeatedly against her chest. She eats another apple to make up for nearly drowning herself, then takes the plunge once more to retrieve the slate.

As before, seven dots appear on the surface of the tablet. She inspects the map of the Divine Beast Vah Medoh. Five terminals remaining. One in each wing; one at the head; one at the tail; and one down on the lower curve of its abdomen. Link spins the map around to look further. By her judgment she cannot access the terminals in the tail or the lower abdomen for the flood of water. The terminal near the head might be outside of the water's range though. No matter how she twists the map, Link cannot tell about the two terminals in the wings, smack dab at the Divine Beast’s middle, the terminals possibly above or below the water-line.

She touches her chin. If she can activate the terminals of the wings, then she could lift the Divine Beast out of the lake. The water would drain, and she would have access to the rest of the terminals.

Link grins to herself and tries to snap her fingers at her brilliance; for her efforts, the slate plops from her fingers. Link dives after it only to realise that the lightweight slate floats.

As she crawls onto the stairs, she regards the ancient tablet in her palm. If the slate floats, then she need not worry about accidentally dropping it. Unless she has fit the slate into the face of a terminal, the slate will simply float back up.

She almost snaps her fingers again at her insight. Link stops herself, sets the slate very carefully onto the dry portion of the stairs, and then snaps her fingers at her brilliance.

With that, she inspects the innards of the Divine Beast. A chrysalis extends from the ceiling where rests the heart of the Malice. Instead of dripping ooze, a flap at its bottom exhausts a translucent purple fog. Similar to those in the Divine Beast Vah Rudania, gears and cords take up either side of the Divine Beast, but Link notices openings into the hollow portions of the wings. Curiously, the upper level of the Divine Beast contains a grate of white lines running horizontally up and down, and left and right. She remembers the white material of the pole with the metallic lift from the Divine Beast Vah Rudania. Sure enough the white grate contains upon it metallic blocks. For now they lie inert. Unlike with the pole of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania, Link can spot no lift, no material affixed to the blocks of metal. Merely blocks on a grate. Counterweights, perhaps.

Link shrugs to herself. She climbs up half a turn of the staircase to glance at the back of the Divine Beast. Although she peers with the telescope, she cannot look at much of the tail for the dark depths of the lakewater.

At least the Divine Beast Vah Medoh does not shroud itself in shadow. The openings of the fans and other slits for air flow over its surface—through which the water of the lake has seeped into its belly—provide some light.

She glances left and right. Sliding the sword she stole from the bokoblin from its sheath, Link spins it through the air. It lands in the water angled slightly to the left. The left wing first, then.

Unlike the slate, her sword sinks.

Once Link has hastily retrieved the blade before it disappears from her reach, she considers the route across the water. The carrot cake has given her enough alertness to stay awake, yet her muscles have tired too much to swim across the breadth of the Divine Beast twice over. Link looks pleadingly at her slate.

The snowflake icon.
Cryonis.

She taps the icon to make a small pillar of ice near the stairs. Climbing upon it, Link makes another, and another. She crosses the Divine Beast to where the gears and cords begin. With the gears immobile, she spots a space between three gears where she could possibly squeeze herself through under the water. First she aims the reticle of the slate between the thin gap of two cords to form a pillar of ice on the other side. Then she steps off of her own pillar into the water.

Checking that her cooking pot and paraglider float without sinking, she pushes them through the opening. Link rises to the surface to take another breath. She dives down and fits her head through the space between the gears. With some struggle she manages one arm, and then the other, clearing her shoulders and waist.

Link gets stuck around her hips.

Not for the span of her hips—she hopes—but for the angle. She braces her hands against the gears and tugs herself forward. The teeth of the gears press into the bone of her right hip. Wincing, she tries to twist herself, only to discover that she has lodged her right hip between two teeth of the gear. Her surprise bubbles precious air from her nose. She tries to back up through the space in the gears. Her lung start to ache. In desperation Link reaches into the spot between the gears and struggles to pull out the slate.

Nothing to magnetise. Stasis would hardly help her. Nor could cryonis.

Ah, but this last rune! Perfect.

Link takes a second to snap a pictograph of herself stuck in the gear.

Then she produces a bomb atop the slate. Tossing the explosive as far as she can in the water, she detonates it at a safe distance. The ripples of the explosion shoot her backwards through the gear. The teeth of the gear scream two furrows of pain on her right hip and side. At least she manages to surface before running out of breath.

Link runs a hand over her hip and abdomen. The gear has ground two bruised rows along her skin, but the thickness of her furred trousers has protected her from drawing blood or eating through her flesh.

The thickness of the furred trousers.

She wriggles herself out of the trousers and squeezes herself through the space, carefully angling her hips to avoid jamming them anywhere they do not belong. On the other side Link strains to put on her trousers in the water. On the bright side, the coolness of the lake helps to take the edge off of the spicy elixir which continues to fever her even though she has long since quit the frigid high heavens.

If she can work the wings into the freezing upper altitudes, then the spicy elixir crashing through her system will find use once again. For now it does little but paint blush on her cheeks and dizzy her head from the heat.

The pillar of ice has somewhat melted. She scampers upon it anyway and fishes her cooking pot and its affixed paraglider from the water via magnesis. Link takes the opportunity to pour the water back out of the cooking pot and lighten her load. Then she continues her journey, one ice block at a time.

More than once she pauses to find a path through the gears and cords that block her. Eventually Link reaches the entrance to the hollow of the wings, marked by circle of light from the opening of the fan on the overside of the Divine Beast and the gentle flow of water pulsing from the underside. She can see a ladder from the floor of the wings down to the floor of the Divine Beast; the water has rendered the ladder useless. She simply tappity-taps the cryonis rune to carve her own path into the wing. To mark the border between the main body of the Divine Beast and the wing, she attempts do a back-flip onto the next pillar of ice. She lands the flip, yet her left foot skids on the slippery ice and she plunges into the water.

She hugs the cooking pot in a makeshift buoy. Something bumps against her head as she surfaces. A metal-like spring. No, not just one spring: a handful of springs and screws.

She follows the trail of mechanical bits to the broken chassis of a guardian bobbing on the water.

The water, she understands, has also given her another boon: everywhere, she can see guardians spritzing out into piles of malfunctioning parts. Had Link not dunked the Divine Beast into the lake she would have needed to fight them. As is, she collects the automata's cores and moves on to the terminal.

According to the map, Link will find the terminal at the very end of the wing. The generators for the fans sit below the water at the floor and connect through cords to the ceiling. She curves her path of pillars to go around the machinery. Simple enough. A straight shot to the end of the wing.

But fate does not give in so easily.

She reaches the wall at the far side of the chamber. No terminal. She raps her knuckles against the wall. No response. Link turns away from the wall, counts to three, and turns back.

The wall remains, stubborn and resolute as ever.

Narrowing her eyes, she sticks her head under the water. The wall runs down into the depths, but by the light of the third fan, she can see a doorway in the middle by the floor. The terminal must lie in a chamber past the fans for safety.

Link touches her chin. She has no guarantee of air on the other side of that entrance, nor can she judge the exact position of the terminal, nor rule out the possibility of enemies she might encounter.

However, with the relatively raised floor of the wing compared to the main body of the Divine Beast, the swim should be shorter. Leaving the cooking pot atop a newly frozen pillar of water, Link attempts reconnaissance.

She dives down to the floor of the wing and frog-strokes her way through the opening. The other side reveals little but darkness in the chamber within, save for the light coming from the entrance. Link swims upwards seeking air. Just as her lungs begin to throb, she surfaces and gasps.

Paddling at the surface of the water, Link looks about. The dim orange gleam of the terminal beckons her further into the chamber. Without a solid surface beneath her boots, she has difficulties finding a good angle at which to make an ice pillar, but she realises that she can use the slate to figure out where the water ends by where the reticle no longer shows freezable water.

The terminal appears to sit on a platform, submerged an arm’s-length under the water. Strangely, sporadic patches near the terminal, as well as on either side, decline cryonis. Link avoids the patches as best she can for safety from the unknown.

A sudden pain at her left heel followed by the rush of water into her boot brings her to a halt. Still stroking with her right hand, Link touches her boot with her left: the back of the boot has been eaten or ripped away, and the skin of her heel burns with raw flesh.

The sensation of the burning. She has felt it before.

Malice.

Link shifts even more carefully through the waters that sludge with malice. Occasional stray droplets of the stuff—like oil, the malice does not mix with water but drifts freely—burrow burns into her clothing or her exposed skin. The thick furs serve as a natural aegis: a single drop can only do so much.

She bumps her knees against the platform and has to paddle away for the abrupt burst of agony. Water rushes against her now bare knees. The entire platform crawls with malice. Angling her body towards the ceiling, Link attempts to swim over the platform.

Carefully, so carefully, she extends an arm towards the depression in the face of the terminal. The slate does not fit and she inhales sharply and turns it over. Again the slate does not fit. Her eyes widen; she turns the slate over a third time to theoretically the same position as the first, and this time it somehow fits. By the light of the blue on the black crystal, she can see the pulsating violent of the oozing malice, the colour of a bruise, or the spread of blood under the skin from a broken vein. It throbs and beats like the exposed organs of a living creature.

The second that the terminal finishes Link snatches the slate from its face. She kicks off of the terminal to dive back into the water.

Back in the main chamber of the wing, Link straps the cooking pot to her back and begins the quest for the terminal on the other side of the Divine Beast. She examines the slate. When she taps the button that has most recently sprung to life, she gains control over the three fans in that wing.

Link considers. Just with this left wing she could lift the Divine Beast out of the water.

She tries to turn on all three fans, but a message she cannot read appears on the surface instead. She does so repeatedly: the fans do not stir. Link hits the buttons in random orders until—suddenly—the entire Divine Beast jerks at once and starts to tilt. Water crashes into her legs and knocks her from the pillar of ice.

The Divine Beast does not rise out of the lake. Instead the fans on the left side of its body push it nearly vertical—the newly activated terminal pointing skyward, and the other pointing towards the lakebed—and force the Divine Beast to move sideways through the lake. The water gushing down from the wing above presents Link with a brisk shower that nearly drowns her. Out of nowhere something heavy thumps onto her—a cone of some material that covers her head and shoulders—that she dredges off of herself after a round of flailing. A guardian chassis. Link uses it as a buoy until the water settles.

And then a wave crashes her into the wall. From the left half of the Divine Beast comes an angry schwa schwa schwa noise accompanied by a scraping loud enough to hurt her ears. When she gasps for breath, Link notices that the inside of the Divine Beast has darkened. The entrance at the Divine Beast's topside has plugged with something.

A message appears on the slate. She turns off the fans; the awful din grinds to a halt. The Divine Beast begins to tip to the left. Link can barely make out a sliver of sky from the entrance at the top. She touches her chin.
The Divine Beast must have smashed into the cliffside at the bank of Lake Totori, the plug in the entrance one of earth and rock.

And this is why she will never become a pilot of one of the Divine Beasts.

With the slate she figures out a method of reversing the flow of the fans so that they expel air from the top rather than the underside; this accelerates the Divine Beast's plunge back into the lake.

Once the Divine Beast has returned to its earlier position of floating half-submerged, Link takes the tried and true method of hopping across pillars of cryonis ice. She pats the slate at her right hip to thank it for the immense help.

Link wonders if the slate that Yunobo carries has the same runic capabilities, or if Yunobo would have to trek to the Great Plateau to gain them from the shrines there. She wonders if Yunobo can activate and proceed through shrines through which she has already proceeded. She wonders if those who constructed the shrines, the slates, and the Divine Beasts ten thousand years ago could have known what would come.

She wonders about the Great Calamity.

Yet she need not understand the details to comprehend how long its shadow has loomed over the land once known as Hyrule.

Again Link squeezes herself past the gears and cords. Again she passes below the fans amid the guardians that have broken. Again she prepares for the dive to activate the terminal on the other side.

A strange chirruping gives her pause. Link looks behind her to find a purple lizalfos bobbing on the water. She stares at the lizalfos, who stares back at her. The lizalfos opens its mouth to flick its tongue at her and she blocks it with an aegis of ice. Through the reflective surface of the pillar, she notices the lizalfos missing a limb.

She must have picked her lizal hitchhiker up by accident in the lake while cruising the Divine Beast into a wall of dirt.

Link considers dispatching the lizalfos with her boomerang but it poses little threat in its injured state, and she has not time to collect monster parts.

With the cryonis Link makes a thick mat of ice. Grabbing the mat, she pulls the ice out from the water and dives. The ice nearly pops out of her grasp but she holds it in place.

In the next chamber she lets the mat of ice go. She climbs onto the mat and sits at the edge: solid ground. Here, too, the malice spreads. Instead of swimming through the sludge and potentially sacrificing her clothing or skin, she hops across pillars of ice that she creates close together. Once more Link relies on the slate as a method of second sight to discern where each pillar lies.

Eventually she reaches the terminal. Link bends down to slot the slate into the face. She watches the black crystal through its now-familiar system of draining and filling.

And now, now she possesses the power to bring the Divine Beast to the skies.

With a grin Link collects the slate from the terminal. Not even the burble of the malice oozing around her could dim the exhilaration of flying. Her excitement bubbles through her and twitches her fingers as she activates all six fans at once.
The Divine Beast shudders. Link crouches on the pillar of ice; the spicy elixir keeps her knees from feeling the effects of the chill on her bare skin.

She breathes in.

"Medli," she signs to herself, "we have liftoff."

The draining water shatters the pillar. Link lands directly in a pool of malefic and yelps, scrambling to leap to the floor and avoid the Malice from chomping at her legs and rear. Quitting the chamber, Link enters the long inner portion of the wing. The fans churn great gales of wind from the ceiling to the floor. The pull of air through the fans nearly pins her against the ground. The Divine Beast's upwards thrust forces gravity down upon her further as it accelerates. The complicated machinery that she could avoid by the surface of the water becomes a deadly trap of spinning gears and heated exhaust. She takes heavy steps as far away from the fans as possible. Yet at the widest horizontal point of the fans there exists barely a metre from its rim to the wall, and Link cannot proceed.

One by one, Link turns off each fan, rolls forward past its vicinity, and then turns the fan back on before the Divine Beast starts to fall through the air.

Two terminals down, and three more to go: the head, the tail, and the abdomen.

When she completes the trek back to the central chamber, Link encounters another issue. The gears and cords rotate as the fans spin. Their teeth grind against one another; metallic pendulums swing to and fro; the cords move at speeds so high she could lose a hand just by grabbing one. She turns off the fans for a second—a sharp scree echoes from the inner body of the Divine Beast—and sprints through the nearest opening before slamming them on again.

As she pants with her hands on her knees to slow her breath, Link lifts her head to see Amali and the white-feathered rito—Teba, Teba his name—on the floor of the Divine Beast, spread-eagled, wind pounding on them to pin them down to the ground. She looks up: the constant upwards flight of the Divine Beast pulls air into the circular entrance on top and slams it into the ground. Hastily she pulls the slate from its pouch. Before Link downed it, he Divine Beast was cruising easily around the lake. It must have the capability to glide at a constant elevation without plunging. She taps buttons, pushes what she can, and the Divine Beast begins to decelerate and then to slow. The white-feathered rito flaps himself to his feet. He helps Amali up, asks her how she feels—Amali wobbles woozily—and then snaps his head towards Link.

He steps towards her with such deliberation and speed that she barely registers his motion before his hands come upon her shoulders. Nearly twice her height Teba stands over her, staring her down with sharp golden eyes ringed in black.

"What in the heavens is wrong with you?" Teba barks in Central Hyrulean. "You put Amali in danger. You could have put all of Medli in danger. You were given direct orders to stay and wait. You promised to wait. By Erito's talons why? Have you not a bone of Nayru in your body?"

Link flinches back. But she has no words, no excuses, no justifications. The truth: she had fun, and she felt confident in her skills, and she didn't see the danger so long as she kept the Divine Beast from far away from the city, and the conceivable goal of activating terminals could overshadow her terror at the unknowns of the future, that she might have to explain to Chief Kaneli of her actions with the Divine Beast Vah Rudania, that the letter to Lady Impa might have revealed she who once inhabited her form, that her life could expand from bearing the cooking pot to the destiny of the entire world once more.
"You can't treat this as a game. I suppose you think you can waltz in here, fix up Vah Medoh, and then waltz away without giving a feather about the people who have lived with Vah Medoh for centuries. Vah Medoh has killed people. Do you understand that? It will take years to repair the damage Medli has experienced. I don't care who you are or what your problem is, but I cannot have you as a liability."

She can't treat this as a game.

For all of her fear at becoming the hero, Link has taken to the part without the promise. To the spirit of adventure without the responsibilities that heavy the burden.

When he finishes speaking, Teba does not wait for an explanation. He releases her, then holds out his wing. "The slate. Give it to me."

Meekly she hands him the slate.

"Show me how it works."

Her fingers have frozen to her sides. No matter how Link tries to lift her arms, her shoulders merely tremble. Her muscles strain. She shakes her head.

The effects of the spicy elixir have begun to fade. The fire of her inner abdomen subsides; ice encroaches.

Teba hisses out a breath. Amali rests a wing over his shoulders. Link raises her head: where Teba glares at her as hard and cold as ice, Amali merely has the look of someone stabbed through the abdomen, with Link's own hands on the hilt of the blade, the hurt and fear clouding her eyes and softening her features. Link looks away.

Teba swings his head towards Amali. She removes her hand to sign: "Give her a little space."

"She's not a child," he snaps, "and I'll be plucked before I let her put anyone in danger again."

"...give her space, and when she calms down, she'll tell you, you know. Believe me. I'm a mother."

"And you're good at that," Teba says, his timbre quieter. "But this is a matter beyond the hearth." He squares his shoulders. "It's already gone beyond the Harth. It's a matter of Medli's safety. Of Tabantha's safety. Now's not the time for mollycoddling."

Amali's eyes narrow; her beak sets firm. "And I suppose you'll figure out the workings of the slate yourself then? No? Give her space, Teba."

Link drops her gaze to the floor as Amali and Teba argue. They speak of her as though she were an unruly toddler, as though she were not standing in front of them. And what has she done, but act the part of an unruly toddler eager to play with a new toy?

She does not let herself cry, not in front of them, not for the truth. Instead Link flattens her arms against her sides. Slowly she flexes her fingers, then her hand, then her wrist, then her elbow, and finally her shoulders.

"Let me show you."

Link explains as best she can about the map of the Divine Beast visible upon the surface of the tablet, about the different runes, about the seven terminals, about how to control the fans, about the chrysalis that hangs from the ceiling that will likely awaken once the terminals have activated, about the registration of a new pilot thereafter with the slate likely to drop from the Malice, about the Malice, about the guardians, about how sorry she is for everything, about how she will keep out of his way.

Teba fiddles with the controls. "Tell me how to stop the fans."

Link takes a look; the slate beeps out its message of errors. "I don't know. I can't read that language."

"I see." Teba rubs his temples. "Amali, watch over her."

Amali nods. Teba flaps off with the slate in talon.

Link sits down upon the floor. The cold sinks into her skin. Her face, her neck, the patches where the malice has eaten through through her clothing. Her eyelids weigh downwards over her eyes, but she keeps herself awake on Teba's words.

She cannot treat this like a game.

Amali sits across from her. "I'm not going to ask you for explanations, you know." They settle into silence. Link digs her nails into her knees. "I don't know what the letter said. Chief Kaneli told us that the letter asked for confidentiality."

Link nods.

"I'm going to refrain from asking who you are." Amali's feathers droop from her wings. "I don't think that you broke your promise maliciously, you know. But if I'm to be honest, I don't understand." Amali pauses to fiddle with her plume. The entrapment of the wind has knocked the tie from her feathers, and she re-ties the plumage. "You took care of my daughters. You ate with us. You helped Cree and Kheel to the flight range at your own expense. You've still got the wounds to prove it too, you know. You nearly died disabling Vah Medoh. I suppose I don't understand what motivates you, or what thoughts run through your head, or how I can predict you enough to trust you. You brought us hope with the slate. I don't understand." She swings her head from side to side. "I don't understand what compelled you to the shrine in the midst of the crowd, you know, and even if I were to sit and think for a year, I don't suppose I would have the slightest clue why you broke your promise."

Link stares at her hands, with which she has gathered apples and hunted pigeons and stuffed pumpkins and cleaned catfish and fried salmon and baked cake and steamed herbs and glazed mushrooms and ground flour and diced fruits and skewered meat and stirred elixirs and embraced so many people and stroked Ilia and revealed all of the colours of her heart. She has no words but three: "I don't know."

Link swallows.

"I'm sorry. I don't know. It felt...it felt right. I don't know. I was afraid the Divine Beast would awaken again. I was afraid...no. That's not what I was thinking about."

She cannot fight the tears that blur the edges of her vision. Her gaze slips past Amali's shoulder; she observes Teba fly down from the head of the Divine Beast. He soars over their heads, headed towards the abdomen or the tail. The rush of wind ruffles Link's hair. She runs her fingers through her sidelocks.

"I don't know," she says at last, and Amali does not reply.
She wants to stand, to stretch, to walk the length of the Divine Beast. Yunobo had to activate on several of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania's terminals himself due to her exhaustion, and he—her own age—had done nothing but waited for her to return when she did activate terminals. Somehow he had trusted her immediately and in full and had never questioned her. Somehow she had not questioned herself. But Amali and Teba—adults, parents, in communication with their people instead of youth her own age working alone in their hero's shadow—have questioned her, and now Link knows not what to do, or what to say.

She could leave the slate in Teba's capable wings. She could apologise to Lady Impa with Chief Kaneli's response. She could never look at another shrine. She could return to the Great Plateau and live out her days on apple and mushroom, on bird and fish.

She could never, ever, so long as she lives, so much as be in a position where she could hurt anyone, where she could disappoint anyone, where she could do anything to cause that look in Amali's eyes ever again.

Perhaps one day she could travel again. To taste the meals that the world over has to offer. But only as a traveller, never staying anywhere more than three days, flitting off before anyone could learn her name.

Link wipes her eyes.

"...I don't know where you'll go in the future," Amali signs after the silence has crept its maliced fingers around Link's throat, "but please don't hurt others like you have me. I trusted you, you know."

Link could form her sorries for a thousand years and that would not change the promise that she has broken, how she treated the guardian deity of the rito as something to puzzle out for fun.

"I'm sorry," Amali adds suddenly, and Link meets her gaze. "I suppose I've already said enough, I think. I can see the goodness in you, you know. I don't know much about losing your memories. Just...please, be more aware of your actions. If nothing else, do that."

Link manages a nod.

Amali turns away. She continues to speak as they wait for Teba's inevitable return, for Teba's successful activation of the other terminals. Link notes that Teba never seems to turn or twist the Divine Beast, but why would he have to? Unlike Link, he can fly to each terminal over whatever obstacles the Divine Beast's design may present.

A better candidate for the slate than she will ever be.

"If you were curious, then I'll tell you that Saki and Tulin are all right. Teba's wife and son, that is. If I'm to be honest, I don't think he believed me about the slate and so didn't want to come back until he had helped in the city with clearing rubble. It seems like there were...only...only two casualties, thank the Goddesses. Even two is too much, you know." Amali sniffles. She lowers her wings, then covers her face with her hands.

Link continues to sit.

Teba flaps back to land between Link and Amali on Link's right side. He crouches by Amali and asks her questions in Tabanch so speedily Link can only make out a phrase here and there. She dips her head.

Teba rises to his feet and regards Link. He clicks his tongue. "Follow me," he says in Tabanch, and then corrects himself in Central Hyrulean: "Follow me."

"I know some Tabanch," Link offers, and Teba's eyes harden.

When he speaks, he does so with a calmness edging to ice. "I would rather communicate with you in a language I know you understand. Now. Follow."

She follows.

Teba leads Link through the maze of gears, pulleys, spinning discs, ropes and cords, strange glittering blue crystals that remind her of the switches she has seen in shrines, and contraptions for which she has no name. At the very end, he shows her to a small circular opening of what she supposes leads to the tail set in an otherwise impenetrable wall.

"The final terminal goes through there. As you can see, I cannot fit inside."

Her fingers twitch. "What about Amali?"

"Amali," he responds frigidly, "is a mother and is not to put herself in danger." Link recoils. Her hands limp to her sides. Teba looks her up and down. "Pay attention. Can I trust you with this?"

Link inclines her head.

"Good. I'll wait here." He holds the slate out to her.

Its once-comforting weight now sinks lead into her hands. She tucks the slate into the pouch at her hip. "I can't fly like you, so I might need to tilt the Divine Beast."

"I see. I'll keep Amali safe." Teba gestures to the opening with his beak. "When you return, do not reactivate the first terminal without me."

She cocks her head to the side and Teba points over his shoulder.

"You said that the chrysalis is likely to contain one of the Calamitous One's elite monsters." She nods. "You also said that the chrysalis will only open after all terminals are active, and the first terminal is reactivated. Is that right?" She nods again. "Then I wish to see if we can destroy it before we reactivate Vah Medoh." She nods for a third time, and now Teba nods with her. "Good. Now, go."

She leaves the cooking pot, the boomerang, the blade, the paraglider, all of the assorted items that she has gathered over the course of her journey, and takes with her the slate and the red telescope. Link could loop the telescope into the belt at her hip but that would enlarge the width of her frame. Instead she tucks it into her left sleeve.

Link inspects the inside of the opening. It burrows away into darkness. Sniffing, she can smell no foul stench emanating from it, merely the dusty-dry scent of the same material that makes up the slate. For the ninth or tenth time that day, she squeezes herself into a tight entrance. Link pulls in her shoulders. Her hips just clear the inner radius, and, though the rim presses down upon her, she fits snugly inside.

She inches her way through the dark. When she feels the tunnel tilt upwards, Link wriggles the slate out of her pouch. She has to crane her neck at an awkward angle to fit her arm around her head, but at least the glow of the slate gives off enough light to confirm no obstruction in the tunnel.
Link scoots her way upwards. The tunnel inclines sufficiently gently that she does not need to move the Divine Beast, at least not yet. Still, the angle grows with every motion. Up and up. She senses herself begin to slide backwards. Link finds that she cannot free both arms at once, and so once more must rely on her nose to push the buttons of the slate.

Teba has granted the slate access to the other fans on the abdomen, she observes. With this she increases the output of the fan near the head and decreases that near the tail.

Slowly the Divine Beast tilts down to allow her to crawl forward again. She cannot tell if the passage narrows: the inner curve seems to put more pressure on her hips and now on her shoulders as well. Nevertheless Link pushes herself forward.

The darkness begins to lighten. She squints. The promise of the chamber ahead. She inches forward more rapidly.

A faint chirp. From up ahead.

Her eyes widen as she recognises that chirp. The twittering chirrup of a lizalfos. A lizalfos, in the tunnel, somewhere ahead of her.

She squeezes herself forward bit by bit. The loudness of the chirrups increase along with the brightness of the light. She feels the sides of the tunnel vibrate on occasion. As she continues forward, she notes the source of the light haloed around an obstruction of some kind.

Something wet and slimy and forked flicks against Link's face. It takes all of her willpower not to yelp in surprise; she scoots herself backwards quickly and quietly as her cuccofleshed body will allow. Link watches the obstruction move as the halo of light shifts. Its chirps grow more anxious and alarmed. She hears its long tongue pamf pamf pamf against the rim of the tunnel in its desperate efforts to find the girl wedged in the same tunnel.

A lizalfos with its head stuck in the tunnel, unable to pull itself out or push itself in.

Link backs up. She conjures a spherical bomb on the slate; it rolls off of the slate and into her own face. Exceedingly cautious not to detonate the explosive on her own head, Link angles the Divine Beast further back, and further back, until the bomb starts to roll away from her. She waits and listens: after a few seconds the lizalfos starts to twitter even more loudly than before. Link moves to hit the button and abruptly something hard and round smacks her square in the face.

It takes a second to realise that the lizalfos has batted the bomb back at her. Not enough tilt. She angles the Divine Beast further; she feels herself starting to slide and attempts to brace her arms and legs against the slope of the tunnel. If she doesn't explode the bomb soon, she'll find her fate in a lizalfos's snack.

She counts to ten and then detonates.

The explosion sends her hurtling backwards through the tunnel. At least the slipperiness of the material keeps her elbows and knees from scraping. She scrambling forward once more.

Much brighter. And colder.

Link tilts the Divine Beast back enough for her to climb without slipping and sliding down, and to give Teba and Amali a break. Eventually she pokes her head out of the edge of the tunnel.

Instead of a chamber, the wild whipping winds of the heavens greet her. The frigid air caresses her cheeks.
She stares out at the clouds and at the tail that curves flexibly behind the Divine Beast. Link pushes herself up further. The cold sinks its teeth into her shoulders, into her left side where the outer layer of her clothing has burned away. The wind pushes her forward and threatens to knock her over entirely if not for her legs still in the tunnel.

The lizalfos stuck in the end of the tunnel must have kept the warm air inside by virtue of its own neck.

The tail, she can see, divides into seven segments connected by a thick cord about a metre long. In the next segment she can see another tunnel entrance.

And the metre cord between them.

Link checks the slate again. The terminal: at the end of the tail. She removes the telescope from her left sleeve and peers through.

When her gaze passes over the very tip of the tail, she spots the black crystal extending outwards from the Divine Beast, with the terminal itself hidden within the final segment of the tail.

Link claps her palms against her face. Her fingers already have become stiff in the barest of the few moments she has spent outside.

The cord between the segments of the tail, at least, appears composed of a material not quite as slippery. Though she cannot stasis the entire tail, she can stasis the metre length of the cord.

Calming herself with a deep breath, she wraps her arms around the cord. Slowly she pulls her legs out from the tunnel—the cold stings against her knees—and then curves her legs around the cord as well. Like an inchworm, Link steadily makes her way across the cord while the wind rushes past her.

She does not look down.

Link can hear nothing but the wind in her ears and the thud of her heart so hard that she can feel her chest pounding against the cord.

She crawls, and she crawls, and she crawls, and she has never felt fear more deeply embedded in the marrow of her bones than in the moment when she comprehends she will have to climb up onto the slippery segment and into the tunnel.

Funny how fear moves her when she faces a monster but freezes her here. She has no paraglider. If she falls, she falls. And she cannot wait for the Divine Beast to land nor can she assume the safety of the ground below.

She gulps down lungfuls of ice.

Link could go back. She could go back, explain to Teba and Amali, and land the Divine Beast, and simply walk to the terminal.

But going backwards terrifies her even more than going forward.

She balances herself. Straddling the cord at the very tip, she senses herself sway with the wind. Link fits her arms first through the tunnel. Pushing as hard as she can against the sides of the tunnel for support, she unfolds her legs enough to lift herself.

Her head clears the entrance, and then her shoulders. The rim of the segment presses uncomfortably into her abdomen. She unfolds her legs further until she practically kneels on the cord. Her boots slip, but with half of her body already inside the tunnel she does not fall out. Instead, as if she were jerking her body back to fit an entire fish into her mouth without using her hands, she shudders her frame repeatedly to get herself into the hole. At least the tunnel slopes downwards; she slides until the tunnel evens out and begins to slope upwards.

She crawls through the sixth segment and repeats the process for the next cord. The fifth. The fourth. In the chill of the high heavens, in the constant danger of falling, in the quiet of herself and the challenge that she faces, she loses herself to the mechanical efforts of traversing the tunnels.

When Link reaches the final segment, a cold pellet of disappointment chills her belly. She wriggles inside. No bright light at the end of the tunnel, but the orange glow of the terminal.

Link sets the slate into the pedestal. Although she cannot see the black crystal from here, she waits for the blue shine of the terminal.

All seven dots on the slate: blue. All except for the tiny orange dot in the blue dot in the middle.

On the route back she encounters her greatest challenge yet: turning around on the cord. Her right foot slides off and Link clings to the cord for dear life. To balance herself out she has to extend her left arm, to dangle herself away. She swings back the other way and clutches the cord with her entire body.

From that moment of clenching the cord with only her right hand and the crook of her left knee, nothing else fazes her.

Nothing at all.

She empties out onto the floor of the Divine Beast and sprawls out her limbs. Link flails her arms and legs to bring back feeling to them, though she can hardly make out the sensation of her hands and feet in the cold. Faintly she hears a voice above her, and then a warm, soft bulk around her.

Link snuggles into the heat.

Something cool touches her lips. Weakly she squirms away; something holds her fast. The coolness gives way to a splash of warm liquid that she swallows down: she did not recognise the aridity of her own throat except in comparison to the wetness of the fluid that she suckles.

The first gulp of liquid goes down dry. And then, a second later, a fireball scorches the inside of her mouth and throat.

Heat.

Fire under her skin.

The fever breaks out. Her whole body sweats for the inferno that has injected in her flesh. Gasping, Link wrests out of the too-hot embrace to shiver on her hands and knees while the first wave of the spicy elixir courses through her.

Her throat constricts. Her heart makes a valiant effort to either punch through her sternum or choke her or both. She claws at the floor, and then all at once the inferno releases its hold on her.

Something soft brushes the crown of her head. She snaps her head up.

Amali.
"Link, are you all right?"

The abrupt sensation pulsing through her limbs, especially through her fingers and toes after the numbing of the frigid air outside, feels like a thousand needles pricked through her skin all at once. She tries to nod and ends up spasming her head, while Amali looks on with concern. It takes Link a second to recall the proper muscle contractions for nodding and nods.

Amali sighs. "You came out of the tube looking blue, you know. I might not be an expert on hylians, but I supposed that that is not how hylians should look."

Not even the cold can keep the laugh from her mouth. She breaks down in laughter, slumping onto the ground and rolling back and forth for her own foolishness and recklessness and stupidity and yet her coming back in one piece as though the Goddesses have guarded her life all this time.

"You really are a strange one," is all Amali can say, and somehow that only makes Link laugh harder. Her stomach aches. The feeling returns to her fingertips and to her face and to her heart.

She wipes tears of mirth from her eyes. Automatically her hands drift down to her hips. Link retrieves the telescope from her left sleeve. Yet the slate has vanished.

Link's eyes widen. As if reading her thoughts, Amali gestures towards the centre of the Divine Beast.

Teba has taken the slate. He circles around the tyrian chrysalis as it beats and exhumes its purple fog. Link observes him land by Amali's side; he starts to cough. "That air is toxic, I fear," he warns them, then resumes coughing. "Stand back."

Link and Amali take to the stairs.

He notches his bow with a arrow. A ruby arrow, Link judges by the burst of sparks that radiates from the arrowhead.

The arrow strikes the heart and explodes. When the smoke clears away, the chrysalis looks exactly the same.

Teba attempts to loose from different angles. Nothing fazes through the thick skin of the cocoon. He endeavours to throw bombs from the slate at the heart. No impact.

"I see." The tips of his flight feathers sweep the floor as he turns. "Can you fight?"

Link nods.

He turns to his right. "Amali—"

Amali raises her wings like an aegis. "There must be something I can do."

"You can keep yourself safe for your daughters," Teba answers, his voice dipped more in warmth than anything. "You said yourself that you are a mother."

"And you are a father," Amali counters. "What of Saki? And Tulin?"

"I'm doing this because I'm a father. If anything happens to me, Tulin has Saki. With Kass abroad, your daughters have no one else, Amali. And you have not trained in combat." Teba frowns. "Don't be selfish now, Amali. Please. I...I don't know how I would face your daughters if I let anything happen to you."
Link glances between Teba and Amali. Amali and Teba study one another with an intensity that drops Link's gaze to her own feet. She wiggles the toes of her left foot, where the malice ate the boot away.

The flutter of feathers indicates for her to once more lift her head. Amali ascends the stairs.

Teba has riveted his gaze to Link. "What are your skills, and what do you know of our enemy?"

She tells him what she knows. About the animated corpse, that could not be hurt except for the weapons of the guardians, and about the living Malice that used the terminal itself for armour.

Teba folds his wings at his sides. "I see. This will be more difficult than I thought. I take it you have no 'guardian' weapons." She shakes her head. "I see. Then we will have to murder it another way." He turns his head towards the chrysalis. "Do you have any suggestions?"

She touches her chin.

The fans.

The fans that circulate. The fans that keep the Divine Beast aloft. She had to take down every last fan for the Divine Beast to fall. The blades spin faster than even the Malice could reform.

She grins. The line of Teba's grimace deepens.

"Actually," Link signs, barely able to keep her arms steady from her excitement, "I do. But you have to trust Amali."

Teba curses under his breath. Link waits; Teba clears his throat. "...Erito help me, but I'm listening."

On the top of the stairs, Link explains the plan to both. Teba works out the logistics in a sort of pained resignation; Amali dips her head in understanding. While Link takes the opportunity to test that she can keep track of the fans at this distance with the help of the red telescope, she catches Teba whispering something to Amali. She turns her head back in time to see Amali's response:

"If I'm to be honest, I suppose that you fail to understand, Teba: if something happens to Medli, then my daughters would have nothing at all. You were right in saying that this has extended beyond the hearth. We have the whole of Tabantha to think of." Teba says nothing. Amali does not look away. "As a friend, as a child of Erito, as a father, I suppose—no, I know you understand. If you did not understand, then you wouldn't be an archer."

Teba strains out an exhalation. "...at least, promise me that you'll keep yourself as safe as you can, for your daughters' sakes if not mine."

"I promise." Amali's shoulders slope down. "...I really do promise."

"Fine." He raises his voice; Link jumps. "I'm going down. Wait for my signal."

A few moments later Link waits—with the paraglider—on the overside of the Divine Beast with Amali gripping her shoulders. The wind would boot her from the Divine Beast's back if not for Amali's slow flapping against its current. Below Teba must follow through the steps of the plan: to place the slate into the terminal; to wait for the signal of the heart; to fly up into the air and to the entrance as soon as he can. And then, the second act of the plan, formless as the clouds around them: to lure the Malice.
Link can hear the measured strokes of Amali's breathing, even and slow, each breath a prayer.

She waits.

They wait together.

From the rim of the entrance she can hear the squelch of the chrysalis bursting against the ceiling.

She braces herself.

Teba spins out from the entrance with the slate in hand. He curves towards Link. Rushing past her, he extends her wing and she snags the slate from him. Not a second later the Malice pursues him.

Link's breath stills in her throat.

The Malice of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania had moved sluggishly, had arced its weapons slowly, had more stumbled about than actually fought her, at least before Link exorcised it from the corpse of the former Champion. But this Malice blitzes through the air. Link cannot make out its form for the blur with which it flies.

She hears the intake of Amali's breath.

The perversion of the corpse of the Champion of Erito, the Hero of Tabantha, Divine Beast Vah Medoh's Pilot, Powerful Revali.

Sharpness pricks her collarbones and shoulder blades. Amali lifts Link up from the back of the Divine Beast per their plan. Link's hand hovers upon the slate over the terminals associated with the fans.

She tracks Teba as he soars towards one of the fans with the Malice close behind.

He trusts her. With this, with this, he trusts her.

Link stops the fan just before he enters. It grinds to a halt and he fwoops through. Immediately she sends the fan spinning again to catch the Malice—

—yet the Malice has already sped itself through, hot on Teba's trail.

Teba arcs through the air to try again.

Monsters will never preserve their own lives, she knows. Monsters will continue to attack, to claw, to maul, regardless of whether or not they themselves bleed out. The lack of fear of death makes them nightmares to encounter, for simply wounding them will never be enough. Until the monsters are taken apart limb from limb and head from neck—and even then their severed jaws will chomp down in their last sap of strength—they will continue to sprint, to run, to walk, to stumble, to crawl, to drag themselves by the remaining stumps of their limbs, to slither their ruined bodies towards whatever life they seek to snuff out.

And yet that same lack of fear of them means that they will never turn back from a chance to attack. Never will they regroup, even if that could lead to further deaths in the future. They attack and die and somehow they rise again to attack in the future.

Teba hurtles through the air into another fan. Link turns the fan off earlier and turns it on earlier to make up for the delay; both Teba and the Malice pass through.

She inhales.
The shorter the time window, the greater the chance that she will catch Teba and not the Malice in its blades.

But Teba left his life in her hands, has left the life of Medli in her hands. Whatever comes, Link will lay her life to protect the city that he would die for.

Not unlike the monsters, yet not for death, but for life.

Teba shoots towards a fan: the third effort. Again the Malice passes too quickly. He swings out his wings to carve a fourth path through the air, and Link sees how he has begun to slow down from exhaustion. She focuses. Teba will not give in; he will fly until his body gives out for Medli and she will not let him die.

She will not get anyone else hurt for her mistakes.

On the next pass through the fans, she twitches her fingers a second before her prior timing. Teba arcs back over the Divine Beast and Link breathes out. Half a second: no Malice.

Before she can celebrate, the terrible violent violet of the Malice oozes over the side of the wing. It catches—the fan screams—and then bursts free. At the instant of its climb, she can resolve the shape of its maliced form: a bird now missing its lower torso, clutching a golden bow in the ooze of its nearly shapeless fingers, its wings exhausting that noxious fume instead of flapping.

Revali.

What's left of him.

Fighting down the nausea and terror that coil up to strangle her at once, Link darts her gaze through the heavens to locate Teba. Not here, not here—there. His movements look more strained, his flaps more lethargic. She looks back at the Malice kept aloft by a cloud of maliced vapours. Teba's increasing sluggishness: not only for fatigue, but for breathing in the toxins that the Malice's body gives off.

But she has ripped off its lower half, and she notices the malice dripping from the gaping wound of its torso. The droplets fly off into the heavens or else slide from the back of the Divine Beast.

The fan that bisected the Malice refuses to move. Gunked with malice, it sits inert. Still, the other seven fans should hold the Divine Beast aloft.

Teba makes for another working fan. Again Link stops-and-starts a smidge early, yet Teba and the Malice both shoot out of the other end. She resolves herself: even earlier.

She tracks Teba's movement. The next fan. Even earlier this time. The Malice flashes by so quickly her eyes don't register its movement——and agony erupts at her left shoulder. She nearly drops the slate. Amali shrieks. Link's flesh ignites. Worms burrow into her skin that eat at her muscle, that convulse her muscle, and the pain blurs her vision until her world becomes a sludge of blue and white and gold and brown. She falls or she rises or she hovers in place: the skies above and below have blurred into a sea thick enough to drown. Never letting go of the slate despite how every throb of her heart pushes fire through her veins and needles of numbness through her nerves, Link reaches for her shoulder with her right hand. Her fingers closed around an arrow. The agony bolts through her gloves into the exposed flesh of her hands. She squeezes her eyes so tightly that her tears freeze on her lashes.

Link wraps her hand around the shaft just beneath the head.
She braces herself.

And then she tears the malice-coated arrow out of her skin.

The arrowhead shears her flesh on the way out. She cannot hear herself scream. For an instant her vision blacks and then lightens again. Something grasps her shoulders.

She clenches the slate.

Link forces her eyes open. The sudden chill of the wind frigidly ice over the corners of her eyes. She blinks through the pain dizzying her head until her vision sharpens. The Divine Beast sways side to side below her. Teba and the Malice dance through the air, he with his bow and it with its own.

She yells.

Teba drops through the air. Towards a fan. She cannot feel her left arm; she grips the slate nonetheless. With her right Link slams the button of the terminal and then again so soon so soon so soon that Teba must have caught into the whirling blades.

The blade shrieks against the rim of the fan. She watches the golden bow arc outwards from the fan, released from that terrible tyrian hand.

Link shakes her shoulders until whatever holds her in the air releases.

She plunges.

The telescope. Her useless left arm dangles. She holds the telescope to her right eye amid the wind that swallows her up. The slate. The slate that falls from the ruined mass of the Malice, as the slate and the boulder breaker dropped from the corpse of the Malice of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania. Not from the Malice's second form, but its first.

Link falls faster than the slate. She catches up. It flits by her face and she catches it against her chest. Folding her limbs inwards, she shoves the slate into her mouth to clench it between her teeth.

She loops her right arm between the wooden struts of the paraglider and forces it open with a bump of her head. The abrupt catching of wind nearly breaks her neck against the wooden support.

Link glides downwards. Slow. Oh-so-slow.

The cold air kisses the injury on her left shoulder. She looks down to confirm that her fingers still clutch the slate, and then she closes her eyes.

She lets Teba and Amali cocoon her in one wing apiece, her body too fragile and battered to accept talons.

Link feels something firm beneath her. The Divine Beast.

Teba curses. "Erito take my voice: look at her shoulder. She needs medical attention, and soon. I know. I know. You haven't noticed that we've been flying in a straight line? I don't know where we are. Mm. Wait, which slate?"

Link lifts her head. She jerks her neck to indicate the one in her mouth. Through bleary eyes she can just make out Amali removing the slate from her teeth. Her jaw unclenches; her bones ache.
"...of course I will do the honours," Teba is saying. "Becoming the pilot wou—hm?"

And then she feels it: the Divine Beast begins to lose altitude. She closes her eyes. They must be landing.

"What was that!?" Teba cries out, and her eyelids fly up.

The generator of the fan that sliced the Malice bursts into a cloud of vapour. A jammed single fan—well, a second fan—should not cause the Divine Beast to drop as it does. Yet even as she watches, the fans on the wings start to smoke.

She ogles the wings for a second, and then observes the flecks of malice that spread from fan to fan, gunking each in turn like a fever, oozing over the gears and cords that link the fans in the machinery to jam the workings of the entire Divine Beast.

Link can smell the noxious fumes of maliced vapour.

The Malice's parting gift.

The Divine Beast slopes forward, its heavier head dropping more swiftly than its lighter tail.

Amali and Teba spring up at once and Link can feel herself sliding backwards on the Divine Beast. Weakly she lifts her right hand. Her fingers curl around something solid, but her arm gives way and the wind overpowers her. Something warm wraps around her.

Something warm.

Her eyelids flutter down. A blur of turquoise into the opening of the entrance. And white around her. On a downy bed of feathers.

Her left shoulder throbs, once.

She wants fish pie.

She remembers the fragrance of fish pie. She remembers the table. Revali's parents, who asked him affectionately how went his training, how went his life as the Champion, how went his life as an archer, how went his search for a mate and about when they could expect grandchildren, and who were these hylians at the table. She remembers Revali warning her not to breathe a word about her being the chosen one, that for the night she would simply exist as a houseguest of Revali's, a friend of a friend that he had graciously agreed to put up.

She remembers his parents inquiring as to whether she had any interest in their son. She remembers Revali looking at the utensil in his hand as though trying to calculate how much carving out his own throat with a wooden spoon would hurt.

She remembers her sister slapping her hands against the table and wanting to know who the big bir' were and what they had to do with her falco'. She remembers Revali gripping her sister very seriously by the shoulders. "For the last time, you annoying monkey: Revali. My name is Revali. My name? Revali. Now that ain't falco', or big bir', or whatever else comes of your little banana-grubbing meathole, but Revali. Do you understand me?"

She remembers her sister's missing-tooth grin. She remembers the reply:

Sure thing, big bir'.
She remembers his parents requesting for Revali to explain why he let an unruly child disrespect him, the Champion of Erito. She remembers Revali slamming his wings onto the table in a storm of feathers just as her sister had done. She remembers his voice, low and rough. "If you don't want to be driven from the home of your precious Champion of Erito, Hero of Tabantha, Pilot of the Divine Beast Vah Medoh, then you will respect my guests. Is that clear?"

She remembers sitting upon a wooden chair at the same table. She remembers how the meat of the fish melted in her mouth. She remembers how she had abused cryonis to bring an icebox of sanke carp from Necluda to Tabantha, from the monastery of Sheik to the pillars of Medli. She remembers, on the night after she baked the fish pie, after Revali's parents had said good night and left, the expression on Revali's face when she elaborated on what she had done.

The night had grown cold, but her feathered coat kept her warm. She and Revali stood upon the landing where she had skipped a week of practise to drag a box of fish across the country, where Revali now stood over her with the curved horns of the silver-lynel moon crested above his head, giving him a pair of rabbit ears.

"You told me you wanted to try some, didn't you?"

"Well," he said, and she detected a trace of a smile at the corners of his mouth, "I'll be plucked. You're even more of an idiot than I could have previously imagined. You know that I thought you'd run away or died. I was about to celebrate. But you know, Aryll said you'd be back. I told the little brat that I'd sooner see my parents again than have you back. Do you know what that snotty lemur did? She found out where my parents live and invited them over." Revali shook his head. "Aryll said she wanted to know what parents meant to me, if what that means to me is the same as what they mean to her, or something like that. What that means, I don't got a clue. You know what else I don't got a clue about?" He threw up his wings. "Why you quit training for a week to bring back some carp that doesn't taste any better than the salmon we got here."

"You called her Aryll."

Revali froze in place. He forced a sneer onto his features but she could see the hint of genuine affection in the trembling of his irises.

"You can hate me if you want," Link told him, "but please don't be mean to my sister."

"Fate's the cruellest and ficklest mistress of all," he snapped in return, "and if the Goddesses have picked someone as useless as you to be the oh-so-chosen one then the hell does that mean about me? If the Goddesses don't owe the world a hero then why should I owe anyone anything?"

"Revali."

He crossed his wings over his chest. "Tch. Don't make me say it."

"I've already seen how you treat her. So thank you." Link hesitated. "I never asked to be the chosen one, or the Hero of Hyrule, or any of those...things that they call me, that I'm not."

"Oh woe is she. The sob story of the century." Revali snorts.

"But if I had to do it again I think I would." Link raises her head to stare Revali directly into his eyes; his wings loosen. "Because it means that Aryll has a better future."

"And what about the rest of the world? You got that through your little rat brain, right?" Revali flicked the back of her head. "If we don't pull ourselves together and beat the bwig bwad bwoar, then Aryll and everyone else will die. You get that, O Courageous Link?"
Wearily she rested her elbows on the balcony around the landing. "Don't call me that. Please."

"You need to step up. That's all I mean." Revali spat out from his beak. "If a future for Aryll means that much to you, then don't blow it."

"I'm training. I'm trying as hard as I can."

"And if you don't want her to die you'll try harder. The Calamitous One could finish popping off that seal any day." Revali brushed imaginary dirt from his shoulder. "And we need to be prepared the second it does. No matter what. Nothing else can come between us and that."

"Revali, can I ask a question?"

"Is it about how incredible I am?" Yet she could hear how the edge had dulled in his timbre. "What is it?"

"Why do you dislike your parents?"

For a second she heard nothing but the windchimes of the city. When Revali spoke again, his voice effected a strange tone that she had never heard before. "You weren't around for what they were like before I became the Champion of Erito. And that's all I'm gonna say."

She reached out. Not with a plate of food, but with her hand, the hand with which she cooked and which more often than not lost the words that she needed, but which now settled on his shoulder.

He returned her gaze with a glare. She kept hers firm on his. "I don't need your pity."

She let go just long to ask a single question: "Do you know what I meant when I said that I want a better future for Aryll?"

Revali said nothing. She continued to gaze into his eyes for the words that would not come to her fingertips but could to her features. Revali continued to say nothing for a few minutes, and then continued to continue to say nothing.

In the deepest recesses she could see his pupils dilate. Though he retained the painted smirk on his beak she observed the softening of his brow, the crease at the corners of his eyes, the slight hoarse whisper of his timbre.

"This crows for a festival. The first time that you looked at me with something other than a totally blank expression. Y'know, even when you were rattling off that little speech you prepped about us being friends—don't think I didn't recognise Daruk's usual spiel—you looked like the whole world bored you. Couple of times there I thought you didn't have any emotions." Revali barked out a dry laugh and somewhere in its aridity she could hear the peal of something genuine, deep down. "Isn't that how the story goes? The spirit in the blade of evil's bane just some emotionless girl?"

Link drew her brow together.

Revali quirked his eyebrows in return. "You don't know how icy you are, huh?"

She shook her head and brought a hand up to her features.

He tipped his head back in laughter. "Well, bud, I don't know much about you and I don't care to. But you've got one thing going for you." Revali clicked his tongue. He tried a smirk but ended up on a smile. "Keeping that little brat of yours safe is something we can both agree on."
She couldn't help but smile back.

"So. Tomorrow, let's get back to training our tail-feathers off. For a better future and all of that." Revali shrugged. "Don't get me wrong, now. I still think you're just about the worst for the job that sword on your back could've picked. And I still think that it's a load of garbage the high-and-mighties at court only let their own people try it out. But you're what we've got for now. If the Goddesses care about anything at all—" He cupped his hands around his beak and lifted his voice to the heavens."—then they'll pick someone else!" He tipped his head back towards Link. "But all right. Life gives you sanke carp and you make sanke carp pie. Life gave me Ilari and I put Ilari on the map. So even if I have to drag you in an ice-box across Hyrule to whip you into shape, I will. I will turn you into a Champion."

Her smile widened, but before she could thank him Revali added hastily:

"But not for you. For Aryll. All right? Just making that clear."

"Clear as day."

Revali looked out towards the moon. "I really thought you'd died, idiot. How was I supposed to face Aryll after that?"

Aryll.

She wants fish pie, but more than that, she wants to hug the girl with the pigtails.

She settles for the red telescope that she nestles in her arms.

—

Fish Pie (seven hearts) - cane sugar, goat butter, rock salt, sanke carp, Tabantha wheat

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Two Divine Beasts down, and two to go. "Wait, midna's ass, if we're only on the twenty-fourth chapter, what in the world is going to happen after we finish the rest of the Divine Beasts?" Don't worry; it'll make sense when we get there.

I should note that Medli was not destroyed in the attack seen in the twenty-second chapter, merely attacked, as Vah Medoh has attacked before.

My heart goes out to those two poor lizalfos who got stuck in Vah Medoh this chapter.

Link gets called out! After her success with Vah Rudania, she started to view herself (rightfully) as skilled enough to take on the Divine Beasts. Yet she refused to take on the responsibility of being the hero. Much like some players of Breath of the Wild, she has been treating things like a game. And this is going to have some pretty repercussions for her.

Teba gets called out, too, of course, for being hypocritical. Amali's struggles with being a mother versus being more than that are something we'll have another look at
The fight was a lot of fun. I sat there thinking about how you could really rip up the Malice all at once, and I figured that you could do so through Vah Medoh’s fans. Once the malice gets gunked like that, it’s not really in a place to form again. That’s Windblight Ganon!

I sincerely apologise for including the "that ain't Falco" meme, but I set it up in the previous chapter and everything! Ahem. I'm not usually one to include memes. I felt it appropriate this time.

There's a reason that Revali cares so much about the fact that he put Ilari on the map. Note that I'm not meaning to say that people with bad parents automatically become surly or what have you; there's a pretty prominent counter-example in Delicious in Wilds alone. I wanted to give Revali more development and explanation to his actions and attitudes than merely being a stereotype/trope of the "hot-blooded rival ace" that he seemed to be in Breath of the Wild. We simply didn't have that much time to spend with the Champions in-game. We do here! So Revali has a bit of a soft spot and a flair for appearances. He's emotionally constipated. He's also very right about issues with how the royal family was going about following the prophecy, about the royal family only allowing hylians to try to pick up the Master Sword and even then only allowing the knights and nobility to do so.

The parent thing is something that Revali and Link can certainly bond over. And, of course, Aryll herself, who has broken through Revali's carefully built up walls.

The careful reader will notice that in the twentieth chapter, Revali mentioned that he would be impressed if Link obtained for him some fish from the other side of Hyrule. Well, Link did just that! In Breath of the Wild, you can easily catch sanke carp in Kakariko. If you recall, I mentioned that Kakariko had been a monastery to Sheik prior to the Great Calamity. In fact, Kakariko was the training grounds of servants to the royal family, termed the "shades" as in "the Princess's shade" due to how they were supposed to act as the royal family's shadows.

In The Wind Waker, Aryll allows Link to borrow her prized telescope for Link's birthday. That isn't far from the truth, as you'll see. Giving Link a little sister was something vital for giving her a grounding in this world and for presenting her with a very personal motivation to be the hero. I've changed Link's circumstances from the game to follow for the telling of a different story, as we'll see in the future.

The astute reader will note that it was Amali who took the slate from Link's mouth. Teba's the one who said that he would "do the honours" of becoming the pilot. But, well, we'll see.

Thank you so much for all of your support, my dear and beloved readers. And thank you so much for all of your support, my dear and beloved beta reader, Emma, especially for having sat down with me the past three hours straight to get this thing edited and ready for all of you.

midna's ass. 10 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: Aryll, Revali, and their interaction are what makes this whole arc of memories my favourite past events in the series. It wraps up so beautifully (I definitely cried at this chapter).
The ending here is my favourite last sentence in the whole series.

This is Link's first big character moment (and probably her second most important in the series), and it takes us to some pretty wild places. Her reactions and development are really complex and interesting.

I like that Teba isn't just a flat "guy who is right". He's a pretty interesting character, even though he has so much less time in the sun here than in Breath of the Wild.

Emma. 19 September 2017.
Electro Seafood Meunière

Chapter Summary

Recovering from injuries, the travelling chef likewise recovers a certain companion: the chef's steadfast horse, last left upon the lake. The chef recalls a vivid memory about the girl with the violet sash: a memory of an ocarina; a memory of a harp.

Chapter Notes

I received a question about the twenty-fourth chapter on the FFN cross-post version of this fic, so I'll include it with the author's notes here. About Teba and Amali chewing Link out: Link wasn't "just" activating the terminals. Remember how Link literally drove Vah Medoh across Lake Totori to crash into the cliff? Imagine if that had crashed instead into the Pillars of Erito. Or imagine if Link had accidentally turned on the whirlwind function of the fans. Why did Amali feel betrayed? Because Link promised her that she only wanted to make Vah Medoh cease to attack (go back and read the twenty-second chapter). Their goal was to go through Vah Medoh safely together. Nothing bad ended up happening, but it sure could have. Imagine leaving a nuclear weapon in the hands of an eighteen-year-old foreign girl who has already demonstrated being fairly reckless (like with the shrine); she promises not to touch any of the big red buttons, but as soon as you leave, you immediately observe her doing so from outside. I don't know about you, but I'd be right terrified if I were Amali. Remember, Amali has known Link for less than forty-eight hours.

Hey, we're about three-tenths of the way done with Delicious in Wilds. Thank you so much to my beta reader, Emma, for all of her help, and to you, the reader, for yours.

To all my readers: Please note that this chapter features a rather bloody and violent combat sequence. If you wish to skip it, it begins at the paragraph starting with, "Ilia strains against the bokoblin riding her but the thief-bokoblin smacks her shoulder" and you can safely skip to the paragraph beginning with "She slides her blade once more into its sheathe" if you so choose. Stay safe!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The softness of the pool in which she lies keeps her in restful slumber. She hears voices over her, feels warm hands on her body, lifts herself up when asked and keeps herself limp when left alone.

She takes stock of herself: the discomfort of her abdomen, from roughly below her armpit to her waist. The pinging pain of her left heel. And, more than anything, the creeping agony of something hard inside of her left shoulder, that seems to swell without end to push aside her muscle and bone and make her cry out. She can feel the bones of her collarbones pushed aside, can sense the constriction of her arteries until her entire arm prickles with numbness and deadens entirely. Sweat beads over her skin. Her body flushes like flame. The fever reaches its zenith, throbs, and begins to subside until she can sense the heat no longer. The pressure-pain at her left shoulder vanishes. The aching fades. She melts into sleep.

Words drift in and out, incomprehensible. Sometimes moisture dribbles into her lips and she drinks deeply down; sometimes the aroma of a hot meal warms her nose and her mouth instinctively knows what to make of it while her consciousness continues to bob along the safe darkness.

When she opens her eyes at last—before even her eyes have adjusted to the light—she hears something scream in her ear.

The stampede of colours and touches and sounds all around flings her off of the bed. She lands on her feet and whirls around, her hand automatically reaching to her back for a blade she does not have. Her left shoulder burns from the exertion that pulls on her flesh. Her fingers clench about nothingness. She looks over her own shoulder.

The paraglider. The telescope. The slate. Gone. Missing. She shifts into a defensive stance. Movement at her left leads her to throw a punch. Her fist connects with something firm, eliciting a gasp.

"Oi." A voice she knows. "Calm down."

Her body goes rigid. She blinks. The figure resolves itself: a white-feathered rito.

Teba.

Link recoils her arm as she looks him up and down. He masses his stomach where she socked him. "You throw quite a punch." Teba turns towards the bed from which she sprang. Link follows his gaze to find Notts, Kotts, Genli, Kheel, and Cree staring at her. "Don't shock her like that next time."

Link looks down at herself. On her frame she wears a loose white-feather robe of sorts: with sleeves, but without pantlegs. The cloth comes down to her ankles and then some. Two unfamiliar rito, one feathered in dark red and the other in pink, stand near the bed, alongside a dark-skinned gerudo woman with crimson hair.

Teba introduces the red-haired gerudo woman and the red-feathered rito man as the healers who have taken care of Link these past three days. "Three days!?" Link echoes, and he nods. She took a battering with the Divine Beast and the Malice thereafter. Teba elaborates on the proceedings: After the fan sliced off its lower body, the Malice did not follow Teba into the fan, but—by intelligence or by chance—attacked Link with an arrow coated in malice, which spread through her shoulder and festered in her flesh. The healers know not of how she acquired the infection, Teba tells her. But they need no justification for saving her life.

"Over the past three days," the red-haired healer explains with a weary smile, "you've successfully fought off malice fever." With no known cure but for removing as much malice as possible, the healers have repeatedly sliced into her shoulder to drain the wound of malice and done their best to keep the infection from spreading.

Sliding her hand under her robe, Link feels her left shoulder. Bandages and gauze surround the wound, which the healers have kept open and exposed with the insert of a thin hollow tube. When she moves her left arm, the tube hurts. Yet letting the injury close would trap the malice within her skin where it could spread at will.

"We'll have to keep you here until we're certain that the infection is truly gone." The healer wipes her forehead. "But thank the Goddesses, we think you're in the clear."
Link thanks the doctors profusely and offers them rupees, monster parts, whatever services she can provide. They decline. When she insists they not treat her as anyone special, the red-feathered rito shakes his head. "I've never heard of paying for healing. Is that what they do in other places?"

The pink-feathered rito thanks Link for thanking good care of her husband. Saki, as she calls herself, appears to have taken on the responsibility for caring for Amali's daughters. During the first few hours of the hospital visit, Link does not notice. But when she tires and the doctors shoo her visitors out of the room, the fear of Amali's absence chokes her.

Genli breaks the news first. "Mom's been picked on a super secret mission that Genli's not supposed to tell anyone about," she whispers loudly, and Cree hides her face in her wings. "What? Genli didn't tell her about it!"

While Saki takes the children out of the room in the healing ward, Teba stays behind to clarify. In the chaos and noise of the Divine Beast Vah Medoh suddenly ceasing to work, Amali and Teba made a break for the slate. Link started to slip backwards from the wind. Teba grabbed her first to keep her from flying off. Without time to discuss plans, Amali—who had by chance taken the slate from Link's mouth and not yet handed it to Teba—dived towards the main terminal. Her activation of the Divine Beast gave her full control of the fans to clear them of malice. "And now Vah Medoh won't accept anyone but her. The Sages believe it would be an insult to the Goddesses to try to transfer ownership of Vah Medoh to me." His voice trails, and then his timbre firms. "I think that Amali can handle things. She wanted me to thank you, and to remind you to take responsibility for your actions." Teba does not quite smile but he doesn't quite frown, either. "And to remind you of your promise to Genli."

Chief Kaneli, resumes Teba, passes on his gratitude. However, in the interest of both Link and Lady Impa's wishes for confidentiality, none will hear of Link's existence in the official story of the Divine Beast Vah Medoh, wherein Teba, Harth, and Amali themselves dispatched the Divine Beast with the assistance of a slate found by Amali, clearly chosen by the Goddess Erito to undertake the mission.

Link asks Teba to thank Chief Kaneli for her, and he nods.

She spends the next few days gathering her strength. Link paces about the inner corridors of the hospital, stretches her limbs, practises flips and rolls to retrain her dexterity up until she trips over the mattress and thwacks her nose on the floor. Though most of the malice has drained, the healers re-open the injuries twice a day and fish out violent sludge with hooked needles that bite into her raw flesh. She clenches rolled-up fabric between her teeth to avoid snapping off her own tongue. The blood drains into a basin made of a guardian stalker's head. Link watches tyrian lumps of malice hiss and bubble as they eat through her own blood.

On the sixth day, no malice emerges from the wound in her shoulder. The healers wash the injury over with warm water. Nor on the seventh, nor on the eighth. Link asks when she can go free and the healers ask back how badly she wants to live.

The children visit her on a daily basis. With Amali busied by the immediate chaos of having the destiny of the Divine Beast thrust upon her, her daughters live with Saki, Teba, and their son Tulin, the latter of whom broke his right wing defending a flightless girl—Molli, her name, according to Cree—from one of the Divine Beast's whirlwinds during its final attack on Medli. Link hears an awful lot about Tulin from Amali's daughters and from Teba: she has scarcely seen a father more simultaneously proud and concerned.

Eventually the famed Tulin swings by to visit as well. A kind boy who dreams of becoming a warrior like the Champion of Erito from before the Great Calamity. Link holds back a laugh; she tells him that she knows a little about Revali. His eyes shine with the twinkles of stars.

"How!? From where!?" Tulin crows out, grabbing her hands in his and bobbing her wrists up and down. After letting go, he blushes. "I-I forgot you're a hand-talker for a second, sorry."

Link does not lie. She tells him that she has heard first-hand from some people who knew Revali themselves and does not mention that the phase some people refers to herself. She skims over Revali's tendency to insult others, his remarkable talent at consistently saying the wrong thing, and his scapegoating of everyone around him except for himself, nor does she expound on his skill with the bow or his talent with the wind. She speaks instead of the Revali she remembers. The Revali afraid of failing, of not living up his selection as a Champion, of not having the backing of fate but having to rely on his own wings. The Revali who let a little girl worm her way into his heart, who gave her rides around the city while she banged her fists on his head, who defended her to his own parents that admonished her for disrespecting him. The Revali who had a taste for sanke carp since his first visit to Necluda, who would never admit it but nearly cried over fish pie.

Genli complains that she prefers the Revali of folktale, who never missed a single shot and could wake the very winds. Notts and Kotts agree noisily. Cree waves a wing and declares that she wants to try the sanke carp, too. With pride welling her eyes with tears, Link kneels before Cree and makes her a solemn promise to make sanke carp pie for her one day; she cannot let down a fellow lover of food. Kheel takes the opportunity to convince her sisters to sing a song of Revali's triumphs that sounds as if Revali wrote the lyrics himself.

Tulin's eyes sparkle. "And even though he was afraid of so much, he was still the greatest warrior ever!" he yells out loud enough for the healer to poke his head in and shush him. Tulin's cheeks flush. He resumes more quietly but no less enthusiastically: "Wow wow wow! You know what this means!? I don't have to be a stern no-nonsense archer. Just 'cause I'm afraid of things doesn't mean I can't also be strong."

"Courage doesn't mean not being afraid," Link says with a warm smile, repeating something that someone once told her, though she remembers not the who or when, but doing the right thing despite your fear."

Tulin bobs his head. "And I understand now." Link quirks her eyebrows. "No, really! I get it now! The secret to his success. I've got it all figured out!" Link leans in. Tulin glances left and right. He cups his hands over his beak and scoots in close enough that Link can feel his warm breath on the outer shell of ear, his voice lowered to a conspiratorial whisper. "Keep this between you and me, will you? I've figured it out." He takes a deep breath. Link listens carefully as he opens his beak. "Sanke carp. The breakfast of Champions!"

Link bursts out laughing until she topples over to wheeze on the floor.

The children keep her entertained. Link inquires of recipes from the doctors and cooks them for the children when they fly over, recipes that she might never have considered eating herself, recipes that incorporate insects and rodents but which she finds taste just as delicious as the dishes she's made for herself. A reminder to try everything new.

She wonders how monsters might taste. Her mouth waters at the entire world of cuisine she could yet open for herself.

And in the moments in-between talking to the children or cooking, Link continues through her daily routine of practise with her body and her blade alike.

Yet her gaze returns again and again to the windows through which she can see the snowy mountain peaks of Hebra to the north.

The wind sings her name and the waters hum in harmony. Her body yearns for the gentle swaying of the grass, for the scent of the earth after a rain, for nothing but herself and her horse in the wilds of the world.

Her horse.

Ilia.

Link convinces the healers to allow her on an excursion, to do some fishing and to purchase a new tunic. They let her go on the condition that Saki chaperones. The instant Saki takes Link outside to the hustle and bustle of a Medli celebrating the new pilot of their Divine Beast—Link missed the public ceremony while unconscious for three days—she rounds on Saki.

"I need to see my horse. Please. Please."

Saki relents. They glide out to the edge of Lake Totori, to the grove of trees near Passer Hill where Link left her loyal companion. She wets her fingers to whistle for Ilia.

No response.

Link finds the saddle and bridle where she left them on the trees, undisturbed over the two weeks she has spent in Medli. She can feel the quickening of her heart and the shallowing of her breaths. Saki yelps for her not to overexert herself. She runs into the wood whistling, whistling, whistling, until her lips chap and her fingers raw, and even then she continues to whistle through the pain of her mouth.

On the other side of the hill she hears a familiar neigh.

She lunges. Saki flies after her, shrieking that Link has lost it. Yet none of that matters: as she rounds the crest of the hill, Link stares down into the grassy wetlands surrounding the mire to find a pack of bokoblins on horses. Five of them. Three on horses, and two sitting beside a campfire fletching arrows.

And one of the bokoblins: on Ilia.

Ilia, covered in sores, legs wobbling under the weight of the black bokoblin that straddles her.

She whistles.

Ilia strains against the bokoblin riding her but the thief-bokoblin smacks her shoulder. The second its palm connects with Ilia's neck, Link closes her fingers around the hilt of her sword, and all that makes up Link gives way to an extension of the blade.

She half-rolls half-sprints down the slope of hill. The pain in her heel, in her side, in her shoulder with the metallic tube still jammed into her bone: forgotten. She hears the bokoblins take notice of her with cries and blowings of the horns, and she vaults her blade at the thief-bokoblin astride her horse as she closes the gap between herself and the thief-bokoblin. The sword cracks the thief-bokoblin on the side of the head. It starts to slide backwards off of Ilia, then digs its claws into Ilia's shoulders. Ilia whinnies in pain and bolts.

She snags her blade from the grass. A second bokoblin on horseback—a hollowed horn hanging from its belt—charges to run her down. She bids her time to cartwheel to the left at the last second and thrust her blade out as she does. The sword slides between the horse's neck and the horn-carrying-bokoblin. The monster slices itself onto the sharpened edge.

The sudden resistance of the horn-carrying-bokoblin's sternum jerks her backwards. The horse continues on without its rider. She swings her arm down to bash the monster hanging from the blade into the dirt. It tries to kick her; she slams her boot over its inner thighs to pin the spotted-bokoblin down. She grinds the boot in, braces herself, and rips the sword from its chest. The monster shrieks. She thrusts the sword down into its open mouth. Once, twice, thrice. It claws at her leg. She angles the blade into the roof of its mouth and lifts her foot from its lower body to press her entire weight into the hilt. She feels the sword crunch slowly forward, then slide with ease, then crunch again until the tip touches dirt.

The horn-carrying-bokoblin gurgles.

A bolt of agony throbs through her upper back just below the shoulder blade. The arrowhead pierces through the feather-warm tunic. She rolls forward, leaps up, tracks the remaining bokoblins. The two by the campfire have taken up arrows. The third bokoblin on horseback has loped to the campsite and dismounted from the horse to root for weapons.

The one on Ilia has ridden away to the edge of the field.

She flicks her gaze at the archers. She watches them watch her. She feints left while her hand closes around the boomerang—the tube in her shoulder grinds against her bone—and curves it through the air at the leftmost bokoblin. The bokoblin ducks and the forked edge of the boomerang wedges itself into the neck of the rightmost monster. The injured rightmost bokoblin drops its bow. Moaning in pain, it wraps its hands around the boomerang to yank it from the wound. The plume of blood from its throat splatters its companion as it rears its arm back to throw the boomerang back.

She tries to feint again but the leftmost archer-bokoblin leads its shot. The arrow grazes her left thigh; a spurt of blood warms the skin of her leg and unbalances her. She bends her knees inwards to turn the fall into a somersault closer to the campsite. She hears the boomerang curve back around and hit the ground. The dismounted-from-horseback-bokoblin rips a branch from a nearby tree and sets it on fire. The rightmost bokoblin, bleeding profusely from its neck, tries to pick up the bow again. She lunges forward to bring the sword down across its wrists.

She senses the splintering of its bones under the weight of the blade and then the edge cuts cleanly through. The fingers of its hand yet twitch as the rightmost bokoblin falls softly to the soil. Its companion screams out and notches another arrow. The now-handless rightmost bokoblin pounces at her, but she thrusts her sword up to pierce through its chest. She spins the monster caught on her blade around, using it as a meat-shield to catch an arrow loosed by the archer-bokoblin.

With a grunt, she swings the sword stabbed through the rightmost-monster's body into the archer-bokoblin to push them both into the flames of the campfire.

The bokoblins screech.

She swivels around for the flaming-torch-bokoblin but the monster finds her instead, with a stabbing pain across her cheek that throws her into the ground. Her hair and the shoulder of her tunic catch fire. She rolls forward through the dirt to extinguish the flames and an agonising weight crashes onto her right hand. Dust stings into her eyes and blinds her. When she closes her eyes the right lid does not fold properly and instead catches against the wetness of her eye. She cannot react to the pain of her eyelashes squirming against her own eyes: the bones of her right hand scream from the pressure. With her hand as a pivot, she twists her entire body to bring her legs up.
Her knees connect to something and the weight relieves from her hand. She jerks her arm inwards and opens her dusted eyes. She rubs the heel of her hand against her left eye until the lid rightens itself. Her eye swells. The middle finger of her right hand has broken at the knuckle. She finds the torch-bokoblin slumped in the grass in front of her. The torch smoulders; the grass catches the fire and the hot air drives the wind upwards.

The torch-bokoblin stirs. She glances at the campsite, looking out through her right eye: the archer-bokoblins have picked themselves from the fire. The handless bokoblin lies still in the dirt but the other lurches to its feet.

She rips the paraglider from her back and opens it. Her broken finger dangles. The stretch of her muscle over the knuckle hisses a breath from her lungs. The updraft from the torch kicks her upwards. She hangs her right arm through both of the wooden supports. With her left, she pulls the slate from its pouch and conjures a bomb.

The first bomb lands on the chest of the torch-bokoblin. The monster grabs the bomb to stare at it, and it detonates to shear off the bokoblin's face and blow its limb from the rest of its body. She glides towards the campfire to drop another bomb but the archer-bokoblin—flesh charred—aims its bow.

She sees it twitch its hand and immediately closes the paraglider. The arrow whistles over her head. The archer-bokoblin notches another.

Her boots connect with its skull.

She lands heavy on the monster's head. The force of the impact knocks her to her feet. Beneath her weight the archer-bokoblin's face crumples inwards to a sick puddle of bone cleaved through the skin and blood. Still it raises its arms to furrow its claws through her leg.

Her sword carves through the monster's throat. The remains of its decapitated head sink into the red earth. Its limbs writhe. She bisects the monster from neck-stump to tail-bone; the stench of its ruptured innards mingles with the coppery ooze of its blood.

She raises her head. The muscles at her shoulder flex over the arrowhead still lodged in her body. Her eyes narrow.

The thief-bokoblin on Ilia urges her across the field. She can see the long metal spear the bokoblin holds in its hand as it charges her.

She reaches for her bow. She lights the tip of the wooden arrow in the campfire. She lines the shot.

Then she tilts her bow up.

The arrow curves through the air. The thief-bokoblin charges and the arrow drops downwards onto its back. Though the arrowhead does not pierce its hide, the monster's clothing catches flame.

Yet the thief-bokoblin does not slow.

Inhaling sharply she throws herself out of Ilia's thunder-hoofed path. She senses the sudden coolness through her lower right leg from the back to the front, a space about a thumb's-length long. She listens to Ilia neigh and rear. The coolness leaves her leg and pain sets in instead. She thuds into the mud. When she tries to scramble to her feet, the agony in her lower right leg buckles her to her right side.
Ilia's hooves slam into the dust. She rears again.

The smouldering archer-bokoblin falls back. It hits the ground with a gasp.

Still curled up on her side, she pushes her hands towards her mouth. The middle finger of her right hand spears pain up her arm.

She whistles.

Ilia's hooves come down on the thief-bokoblin's chest. She whistles again and Ilia repeats the motion, stamping the monster through its cries of agony. She pulls the blade out once more. The trampled bokoblin lies still and silent in the ice-flecked earth. She crawls towards its muddied corpse.

She studies its ruined body, its collapsed chest, its innards swollen from its abdomen, its broken jaw frothed with blood.

Its pupils dart towards her. Its claws twitch.

For the pain through which the monster has put Ilia these two weeks, she raises the blade above her head. Her breath heaves the weight of her form. She plunges the sword between its eyes. The warmth of its spraying blood heats her face and drains into her eyes, but she need not see to hear the burble-slosh of its dying gasp.

It does not move again.

She slides her blade once more into its sheathe. Rising to her unsteady legs, her right foot dragging behind her for the clean slice through her lower leg, she approaches Ilia. The horse shies from her. She raises her arms up to stroke Ilia's neck and jaw. Her hand shakes whenever she brushes her fingertips against Ilia's skin but she does so nonetheless, cooing hoarsely to calm her companion.

She rests her forehead against Ilia's. Ilia whinnies. In Ilia's breathing she can hear her own name.

Link.

Link limps Ilia to Saki, whose eyes have widened. Saki steps backwards when Link approaches.

"Well," she manages to comment, her timbre stiff as Link's cold-numbed limbs, "I can see why Teba trusted you to fight against the Malice."

"...this is Ilia," Link says by way to explanation. She keeps her swollen left eye closed, viewing the world solely from her right. "My companion. They hurt her."

"I know they're monsters, but—"

Link turns away.

On foot Saki and Link escort Ilia to the stable near the checkpoint at Medli. The stablehands scatter when they see her soaked in blood and limping, her horse covered in scrapes and sores. The stable owner inquires if Link means any funny business.

She pleads for them to get Ilia to the stable healer. Link pays for Ilia's care by the stable healer. The healer does not know how to read sign; Link does not know how to write Tabanch. Grabbing the healer's hand, Link drags the healer outside to the bloodied and battered Ilia. The healer chastises Link for allowing Ilia to grow to such a terrible condition until the healer gets a good look at Link herself, breathing heavily, barely tremble-holding herself against the wall, pooling blood onto the stable floor.

Link would stay in the stable through the night if not for Saki insisting she return and physically dragging her to the medical wing. The healers beg her not to do anything that reckless while she recovers. They pull out the arrowhead; dress her leg; set a cast for her finger. Link waits for nightfall. Under the cover of darkness, she glides back out to the cliffs of Lake Totori and sneaks—limping—into the stable to spend the night by Ilia's side.

A horse and her girl.

Like Link, once again plunked into the medical wing after the encounter with bokoblins, Ilia recovers. With a mere handful of days her coat once again shines with health. The sores have all but faded. For the second time in the same week, Link purchases a new feather-down tunic, asking for the same forest-green affair she did the first time around, and the rito shopkeep thanks her graciously for her patronage.

"Like 'em so much you just had to get another, right?" He winks at her. She looks blankly ahead. "I under-know."

Teba, stopping by to thank Link for her words to Tulin and to inquire as to why Saki called the girl terrifying and not someone who should be around the children, mentions once more the promise that Link made to Genli.

The morning thereafter Link checks in with the stable healer, who confirms that Ilia will be healthy enough to ride in another day or two. Link swears to Ilia that she will return as soon as she fulfills her promise.

Link takes the children fishing. Teba, in the process of teaching Amali her skills with the bow, cannot accompany them. Saki does; she keeps her distance from Link. She can sense Saki's suspicious gaze following her back wherever she goes.

Cree and Kheel teach her how to fish with long Tabanch poles. The first time something tugs on the string, Link jerks the pole out too quickly. The fish—a hearty salmon—tears through the line and whomps her directly in the face. With a mouth full of salmon tail Link flops backwards onto her back and nearly chokes on the fish before it slaps her face twice to spring itself back into the water. The children giggle. She curls her thumb and index finger into the circular sign for being all right.

The fish do not bite.

Kotts and Notts fall asleep. Genli gripes of boredom, and even though Kheel tries to sing a song to keep them alert—the Sonata of Awakening, she calls it—Cree takes a nap against Link's shoulder.

Link frowns, touches her chin, and whips out her slate. Saki yips in surprise as Link summons a bomb and chucks it into the water.

The detonation floats up several trout.

Saki admonishes her but Tulin cheers. "Hylian bomb fishing!" he calls it. "I've never seen anything like it!"

The children cheer, yet Saki confiscates the slate from her. "You can have it back after we leave for the day," Saki says with a shiver of the spine, and Link can see the terror shaking in her eyes. She acquiesces without another word.
Back to the fishing poles.

Her efforts of the next several hours net her no salmon; nonetheless the aspiring fishers come away with a bucket of voltfin trout. Genli watches their sleek yellow bodies flip through the water and demands to take the bucket up to Medli herself. Under Saki’s protective gaze, Genli wraps her talons around the handle of the bucket and tries to fly off.

She flaps. Two metres. Four. Six. And then she topples back to the ground. Link and Saki leap forward at the same time: Saki snags Genli from the air, and Link catches the bucket of fish so perfectly that only a single droplet of water splashes over the rim to plink her on the nose.

The kitchen near the stable of Medli suffices for Link to make the meunière. With the help of the children, she harvests the wild wheat from the rolling hills around the stable, then grinds the kernels into flour. Link skins the fish and chops off their heads and tails in preparation for cooking, then removes the less tasty parts of the guts. Saki fries the heads herself and serves them to the children as a pre-supper snack. Link rolls the voltfin trout in flour and dashes of spice. She fries the fish on butter. The bright-gold innards spark with static. The saucepan blazes up in a burst of electricity that stands her hair into a fluffy cloud of brown.

Voltfin trout, Link discovers, means voltfin trout.

She serves the meunière with a splash of lemon that she purchases from the stable. The children chow down.

Link offers Saki a plate as well, and— with some trepidation visibly slowing her movements—Saki accepts. While they eat, Link enters the stable to present two special deliveries of trout meunière: one to the stablehand who takes care of Ilia, and one to the healer who has aided Ilia's recovery.

Upon her return to the kitchen outside, Saki nods to her. "You're not that bad of a chef."

Link smiles sheepishly. She takes the final helping of voltfin trout meunière for herself. The sun setting beyond the mountains has flooded the lake with gold, and the evening breeze rolls across the gentle fields. The cool air pinkens her cheeks above the feathered collar of her new tunic and makes the warmth weight of the plate of meunière in her hands all the more comforting.

The tickle of static gives way to a delectable sweetness like the inner stem of honeysuckle. Though her body knows the taste not as meunière, her tongue remembers who taught her the recipe. The brown-skinned girl with the red hair, with the violet sash about her waist, who pressed the red telescope into her hand. "A gift for Aryll," she said, "to look at the birds she loves so much." Who gave her a wooden charm in the form of a brown-painted horse, and a leather-bound book of myths. "And a gift for—"

The girl with the violet sash.

With the basket of cucco eggs. Whose mother had a farm of wheat and cucco in the hills, who bottled eggnog for passersby, who sang every night for her patrons that joined in with voices that boomed up to the rafters and quaked the floor of Marin's room. Whose other mother ran an adjacent stable to take care of the horses of travellers and to keep a row of stalls full of pregnant mares. With their urine she brewed an elixir as green as spring, which she tried to gift Link for free but which Link staunchly paid for every time.

"I'm glad you're like me," Marin told her one day as Link packed a case of elixirs for the month or two before her courier trips would take her back west.
Link shook her head. "I'm glad I found this place. I never would've...known I could...be a..." She made a wibbly-wobbly circular motion with her hands.

"Well there's nothing else you are 'cept a girl. Well, no, I can think of one other thing." Marin paused and propped her hands on her hips. Link trembled as she awaited Marin's judgment. Marin grinned at her. "Someone who should visit more often, dummy."

In the evenings before her bedtime, Marin would sing. Her voice filled the inn and seemed to bring down the moon and the stars to listen. Her mother strummed a six-stringed harp painted red and blue that resonated the very air with the timbre of her daughter's voice. The night after she first heard Marin sing, Link told her that she had never heard anyone sing as beautifully as Marin did. Marin blushed, and her mother laughed. "If you want to learn to play the harp," Marin's mother signed to Link with an easy smile, "I wouldn't mind teaching you."

So Link set herself to learning. She could stay only a day or two a month, once on her route to deliver blacksmithy goods—the blacksmith, the blacksmith, and Rusl his name, the signs bubbling up in fish-tang under her tongue—and once on the return. Her skills barely improved. On the first day of spring, Marin took her aside with a lump in her throat. "You don't have to force yourself if you don't want to, Link."

Link looked at her, cocked her head to one side.

"I c-can tell you don't really want to learn the h-harp," Marin forced out around the tears beading at the corners of her eyes that made Link want to run away and stick her head in the pond up the hill from the ranch, and then Marin lifted her hands to speak in sign where her throat had failed her. "You haven't gotten any better and I don't have to be a genius to figure out why!"

Link blinked. "I'm only here a little bit every month." Her turn to cry, now, with her eyes stinging for how she'd hurt Marin with her own incompetence. "I forget all the songs while I'm gone. I'm...sorry I'm stupid."

"Link you dummy!" Marin hugged her. "I hope you don't forget me like you forget those songs."

"Never ever," she signed against Marin's back.

On her next visit to the ranch, Marin gave her a present tied with a violet bow. "You don't have to like it," she said with a hint of anxiety behind the smile that crinkled her eyes. Link unwrapped a crudely carved wooden ocarina painted blue as the skies that Marin loved. She tilted her head to one side, and Marin tucked her hands behind her. "It's so you can practise the songs while you're out. If you want to sing with me."

"There's nothing else I'd rather do."

Link played the ocarina on every trek there and back to memorise the songs. She never learned the harp well enough to perform with Marin in the evenings, but she never stopped trying.

A farm of cucco and wheat. Wheat. Wheat must mean: somewhere on the western half of the land once known as Hyrule. She strains to remember where, to see the mountains in the distance, to make out the castle that rises over the moat, any point of reference, but her memories centre on Marin's smile so brilliant that she could rival the sun, on the voice that sang with the songs of the wind, on the reddening of Link's own face as if she had broken out with fever.

They fished in a pond that fogs at the edges of her memory. They had to turn the grain mill together to grind down the kernels of wheat Marin had brought from the farm. She had not goat butter but mare butter to glisten gold on the saucepan strapped to her back. "Buttered trout," she sang in a melody that she made up as she went, "buttered trout, pat in flour 'n' fry it out." Link drew the blue ocarina from her pocket to accompany her. Not in harmony but in cacophony, they failed to guess the next note the other would sing or play. Marin could scarcely sing for laughing at every discordant chord and Link's ocarina took on the sound of a sadly deflating balloon. When the trout had fried to honey-coloured perfection, Link wolfed down her portion in the span of a few seconds, then propped her chin up on her elbow and gazed at Marin polishing off her own fish.

"How'd you make it taste so good? When I try doing it back home it doesn't come out the same."

"The secret ingredient," Marin said, balancing her plate in the crook of her arm, "is lots of love." Link's cheeks flushed. "Or that's what Mama says." She giggles and Link can hear the wind laugh with her. "I think it's the horse butter. Speaking of horses. I know you're goin' tomorrow, so don't forget your promise." She booped Link on the nose and her fingertip thundered electricity down Link's spine.

"I promise," she signed with a sheepish smile. "There's nothing else I'd rather do with my life, I swear."

Marin embraced her so suddenly that she had not the time to register the arms wrapping around her or the abruptness of the warm bulk in her lap. She toppled backwards into the water and they rolled together, shoulder to shoulder, hip to hip, through the shallow end of the pond to the bottom of the hill. When they untangled themselves, Marin laughed and Link covered her face with her hands.

Marin touched her wrists. Her warm fingers rested on Link's wristbones. Lowering Link's arms, Marin leaned in until Link could feel her breath on her nose, on her cheeks, on her lips.

"Don't forget, Link." Her eyes twinkled. "And even when you leave, don't you ever forget me, or I'll never forgive you."

"I promise."

Genli tugs on her sleeve and the memories fade. Link blinks, looks down at the young girl with a question burning on her features. "Genli wanna know! How come your meunière's so good?"

"The secret ingredient," she says, balancing her plate in the crook of her arm, "is lots of love."

Electro Seafood Meunière (four hearts, low electric resistance for 04:50) - goat butter, voltfin trout, Tabantha wheat

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Indeed, just as with Yunobo, Link doesn't have a chance to speak to Amali due to Amali immediately becoming busy. However, Link does spend more time in Medli than she did in Darunia. That's a step up! And yes, before you ask, Link won't be cucked out of talking to the other new-generation Champions/pilots in the
You don't mess with Link's horse. I mentioned that leaving Ilia in the wood for some time was a bad idea. Well, here's why! Link's lucky that some traveller or Yiga didn't steal the horse and just run away with it entirely. I don't really want to say that I had "fun" writing the scene. I don't blame Saki for finding Link terrifying, when Link was much bloodier than she usually is in combat.

"What's that spring green elixir stuff?" In real life, some trans girls (as a reminder, Link is trans in this fic) take oestrogen hormone replacement therapy in the form of premarin, which stands for PREgnant MAres' uriNe (I didn't make that up). While it's not used as much anymore due to better methods of obtaining and administering said hormones, Magic Fantasy Premarin HRT Potion™ seemed reasonable to me. If elixirs can allow people to venture into volcanoes with no real threats to their body, etc., then it's perfectly reasonable for Fantasy HRT™ to also exist. That's what Link was buying from the ranch (Marin is also trans). I suppose that spring is often a symbol of growth, new life, and hope, which are to me associated with the possibility of transitioning. Green is associated with Link and with courage in general throughout the Zelda franchise, and believe me when I say it takes a whole heaping of courage.

"Why does Marin have two mothers?" She's gerudo and as such her mothers are both gerudo women.

"Why Marin, even?" I like Link's Awakening, and of all of the "love interests" that Link has ever had throughout the franchise, Marin's the one that I personally think was the best-written (considering technical limitations and so on). While I couldn't carry the existential themes of Marin in the limited space of Delicious in Wilds, I recommend any interested readers in checking out my other fic, adrift.

The six-stringed harp is a reference to Oracle of Ages. In Central Hyrulean, the Faronese eight-stringed harp is called a "harp" while the Parapan six-stringed harp is called an "ages harp" (pronounced ah-guess), similar to how in real-life, English often refers to the Sahara as the "Sahara Desert" even though Sahara itself already means desert, or how certain speakers might distinguish "tea" and "chai tea" or "bread" and "naan bread" even though chai means tea and naan means bread. Conversely, in Parapan, the six-stringed harp is called the "ages" and the Faronese eight-stringed harp is called the "harp ages" (essentially the inverse). Other languages tend to differ on which word(s) they adopt based on which harp their historical populations encountered first. For example, Tabanch uses "ages" and "harp ages" for the eight-stringed variant, while Necludan adopts "harp" and "ages harp" instead. Other languages have their own words for harp, such as Lanayrish, which uses the word surf to refer to the traditionally-silver Lanayrish fifteen-stringed harp.

While Link thinks that Marin's family was out west because of the wheat and voltfin trout, the truth is...

Up next: moving on to the next arc. Link getting chewed out is going to come back big time.

midna's ass. 21 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: Marin is really, really cute. Link is really, really cute. Link and Marin together are really, really, really cute. This memory is extremely cozy. I don't always like romance in fiction, but it's done so well here.

Wrapping up in Medli is nice, too. Though Amali is busy, it's nice to be able to simmer down with all of the other characters, unlike in Daru-darunia, where we basically left as soon as Link got better.

The fight scene in this chapter is intense. Amazing stuff. You can see why Saki ends up so scared.

Hylian Bomb Fishing is the one true acceptable way to fish in Breath of the Wild.

Link's fond memories of Revali are really sweet.

We follow this, my favourite arc, with what is probably my second favourite. This chapter's memory was important, after all.

Emma. 21 September 2017.
Chapter Summary

After saying good-bye to those in Medli, the travelling chef journeys back to Kakariko. Along the way, the chef remembers the girl with the golden hair, remembers the first contact between her and the chef. In Kakariko, the chef inquires to the wise matriarch about the little sister in the chef's memories. When the matriarch says little in response, the travelling chef makes a decision regarding the slate.

Chapter Notes

To all of my readers: I received a question on the FFN crosspost version of this fic regarding Link being trans, so I'll copypaste the comment I made in response there.

"You're right that Link has always been a girl, just that her body hasn't always matched what she wanted it to, and she hasn't always been out. Her being trans hasn't been a big deal in the story because she came out prior to the Great Calamity, when she was around twelve years of age. It's been mildly relevant at times (i.e. Dorian asking to confirm that she's a girl). In the twenty-fifth chapter, Link reveals that she only came out after meeting Marin, because prior to that—in her home village—Link didn't even realise that not-being-a-boy was an option. Once we get into memories more relevant to Link's early childhood, we'll see a greater impact, and we'll see when Link figured out that she was a girl. The "always been a girl" is more in reference to certain narratives that (while perfectly legitimate for trans people to talk about themselves in that manner) conceive of trans people as "they were originally a boy/girl, and then they had The Surgeries, and then they popped out the other end a girl/boy" which, again, some trans people do conceive of themselves like that and that’s legitimate of course, but it is not a narrative applicable to all trans people and is rather harmful for a number of reasons I don't want to get into on an author's note. If you want to learn more, please PM me.

It's a minor aspect of Delicious in Wilds and not really something to worry about if you don't care. But for those who do care, it is one of the threads that influenced and continues to influence Link's development, especially now that she has the spring green elixir back in hand.

Being trans is more immediately narratively relevant to a different character, as you'll see in this chapter. Again, it's not a big deal if you don't care and the story can frankly be enjoyed (almost) entirely without grasping the situation. If you have any concerns or questions feel free to message me."

Moving on, the ocarina that Marin gave to Link in the memory of the twenty-fifth chapter is actually a reference to Link's Awakening rather than to Ocarina of Time, as Link obtains a blue ocarina from the Dream Shrine therein. Of course, the blue ocarina actually comes from A Link to the Past, where it was localised as a flute (but the sprite is a blue ocarina).

Also, I forgot to mention this but Revali talking about the emotionless girl who sleeps in the sword in the twenty-fourth chapter is obviously in reference to Fi from Skyward Sword.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

By the time Link and Ilia recover enough to travel, Amali has not yet disentangled herself from the duties descended upon her shoulders. She passes on a message with Teba to thank Link for everything, and Teba—giving her a letter from Chief Kaneli to Lady Impa—tells her to come back again in a few weeks.

"She'll want to talk to you beak to beak, or wing to wing in your case," he says and, effecting Amali's upwards lilt, adds, "you know."

"I'll see what I can do."

Rising early on the morning after the stable healer confirms Ilia's health and three days after the doctors remove the metallic tube from her shoulder, Link wishes the children good-bye with a final round of carrot cake. Carrot cake, she notes, the kind her sister loves.

"I think you should bring over your little sister sometime, if she wants to meet us." Cree beams at Link, and Notts and Kotts bob their head to agree. Genli makes some pretend noise about wanting more carrot cake to herself, but even she confesses wanting to meet Link's sister, if for the novelty of seeing another hylian.

"Oh Miss Link!" Kheel tugs on her sleeve, and Link glances down at the purple-feathered girl. "Mother told us that you've been looking for shrines, so I asked all around Medli, and I heard a few songs—"

Link can sense herself leaning forwards to give Kheel the fullness of her attention. For the puzzle of riddling out a shrine and for the prospect of seeing the shrine itself. And then her own pattern of excitement dawns upon her. Her smile folds into vacancy. Link rests her hand on Kheel's head until the girl closes her beak and gazes curiously at Link.

"Thank you for thinking about me," Link signs, her arms curving sluggishly through the air as if Kheel had suddenly dunked her into a vat of honey, "but I promised your mother I wouldn't go hunting after shrines anymore."

"Oh." Kheel tips her gaze downwards. "But..."

The stiffness of her limbs softens. "When I come back from finishing my last errand, you can sing for me. Just to sing. No shrines." Kheel nods. She wraps her arms around Link's torso, and Link hugs her back.

"Promise you'll come back, Miss Link?"

"I promise," she signs into Kheel's back; Kheel snuggles against her.

Link waves to them by Ilia's side. The children bring her gifts before she goes. Cree: a wooden box of goat butter sealed off with wax. Kotts: a pouch of flour that she ground herself—with the help of her sisters, of course. Notts: browned sugar that she boiled herself—also with the help of her sisters. Genli: a glass vial of vanilla extract. Kheel: a skin of fresh milk.

The latter reminds her of the spring green elixir from her memories. Perhaps, after the task, once her life passes from the urgency of living for someone else to tracking her own needs without purpose, Link could find the ranch.

She promises to use the milk before it goes rotten and Kheel covers her face. "I forgot that milk goes bad! I'm sorry."

"I'm glad you thought of me," Link says instead, offering her a smile, and Kheel sniffs but the corners of her mouth curve up.

Tulin comes by with a bundle of wooden arrows fletched himself. Link stuffs her quiver and thanks him. Blushing, he shrugs. "It's the least I could do."

"I'll come back someday. I promise." Link swings a leg over Ilia's back. The children wave to her and she waves back. Ilia flicks her ears back; her tail swishes over her back and brushes against Link's lower spine. Link rubs Ilia's neck. "I can tell you're itching to go, girl," she signs into Ilia's shoulders, "so let's answer the call of the wilds."

She traces the road she intends to take on her map: through the ridgelands of the land once known as Hyrule, up around the curving Hylia River, through the thin sliver of land between the mountains of Eldin and the wetlands of Lanayru, through the Dueling Peaks, and up to Kakariko for one last visit. At the close of the first day, she sets up camp at the base of Thundra Plateau. The clear skies make the basin a spot of safety, though she misses the strains of accordion music. Link considers using a bomb to hasten the process of gathering firewood for her campfire.

Yet when she gives up the slate, she will give up the runes as well.

Link struggles to chop down a tree by thwacking it repeatedly with her sword, which catches in the wood. When the vibration hums up her arm and threatens to shatter the blade, she sheathes the sword again. Instead she scoots herself up the thickest tree she can find to rip off the branches at the top. The tree's crown rewards her for her ingenuity with a nest of dove's eggs.

She has eaten neither bird nor egg in weeks.

Link makes it all the way to Ilia before she realises she completely forgot about the firewood.

Leaving the eggs in a satchel of Ilia's saddle, Link scampers up the tree again. She tears and drops branches to the ground, then chops them into short, manageable pieces. Soon she has a fire going by which to rest and consider what to do with the eggs. She sits cross-legged in front of the fire and touches her chin.

Egg pie. Or egg cake. Something of that sort must exist, and she has the milk to use. Link follows the process of the carrot cake, or the fruit and nutcake: sugar, flour, and butter in the bottom of the cooking pot, whisked together with the—cleaned—hilt of the boomerang. She cracks an egg and finds the batter pleasingly thicker. Next she plinks in a droplet of vanilla extract from the glass vial. Dipping her fingertip into the batter, Link sucks on her finger: sweet and thick, rich and creamy. She has to stop herself from gorging on the batter alone. She continues to whisk and mix until the batter thickens further to a dough that she scoops from the cooking pot to roll to smoothness between her palms. Slightly damp, the dough sticks to her hands. She dusts her fingers and palms with flour. No more sticking. Grinning to herself, Link molds the dough into a round pie shell with her fingers at the bottom of the cooking pot.

Carefully so as not to break the shell, she peels it from the cooking pot and drapes it over her knee. To start the filling, Link simmers a syrup of sugar-in-milk, then removes the cooking pot from the fire and lets the cold evening air cool the thick syrup down. A thin crust forms over the surface.
She cracks the remainder of the eggs into the bottom of the pot and adds another helping of milk alongside a drop of vanilla. Once more her trusty boomerang stirs up the filling until she achieves a smooth and creamy consistency, no lumps, no chunks.

A tad overly sweet. Too much sugar. But perhaps within the shell of the batter the sweetness will even out.

Then she clenches her hand. No oven—and she has not the time to fire her own. "So it's come to this," she signs, and nearly lets the shell slide off her knee.

Link pours the filling into the empty elixir vials she still carries in her satchel so that she can reuse the cooking pot, which she cleans out and pre-heats upside down in the fire. While she waits for the cooking pot to heat up sufficiently, she glances through the different lids she has available before selecting the wooden one.

With the back of her hand she tests the heat of the cooking pot to ensure an even spread of heat. Link flips the pot back over to scrape out the charred bits of leftover filling stuck to the bottom.

She sets the shell into the inner curve of the pot. With her tongue poking of the corner of her mouth, Link adjusts it just so to sit evenly in the centre. Uncorking the vials to pour the filling into the shell, she finds that she has made slightly too much filling. She tries to crimp the rim of the shell—irregular and crudely done, her fingerprints visible in the dough, a personal touch of her relative inexperience with cooking that brings a smile to her lips at how much she has yet to learn—and sets the cooking pot into the flames. Link clamps the lid to stop the escape of steam, albeit not as firmly as she could. If the cooking pot explodes from the built-up steam—not that the entireties of the batter and filling combined have enough steam between them to fill the pot—the lid should pop off first.

Link pours the leftover filling onto the solid iron pot lid. Swirling it about with her finger, she helps herself to a sample. Ilia nickers and pushes her lips onto the back of Link's right hand—the broken-and-healed middle finger remains tender, the base swollen—and Link speedily shoves the pot lid over the fire to prevent Ilia from ingesting raw egg.

She waits for the filling to solidify into a golden brown. When Link pokes it with the tip of the metal boomerang, it appears firm enough, and she removes it from the fire.

It sticks to the inside of the pot lid. Grunting, Link digs her fingernails in to peel it off, but the hands that have brought Malice to their knees lose the fight against the solid filling. She wrings her hand to ease the ache from her fingers. She narrows her eyes at the filling.

Time to bring out the big 'rangs.

The filling proves no match for a sharpened edge. She scrapes it from the pot lid with the help of the forked boomerang. The entire underside has charred to black. Link ogles at her handiwork.

She burned the filling.

She touches her chin. She taps: once, twice. Before she even hits three she makes up her mind.

Burnt filling, she discovers, tastes more akin to soot than anything resembling actual food.

She hacks and coughs the ash from her mouth. Link grabs the skin of milk and tips her head back to wash down what in the name of the Goddesses she just stuffed into her mouth.

Though she will give it one thing: at the very least the burned filling had a nice texture to it.
Crispy.

Link checks on the egg pie-cake-thing more frequently to avoid another mistake, but her makeshift oven seems to work just fine. The shell firms to the shade of freshly baked bread, and the inner filling takes on a brilliant honey tint that promises sweetness.

Removing the cooking pot from the fire, she lets the pie-cake-thing cool off. She leans back against Ilia's flank. Yawning, Link rubs her eyes.

Saki called her terrifying.

Link glances down at her hands, the scars and bruises merging into a history both hers and someone else's. She counts the scars on her body that she can attribute, for sure, to her own actions. The bite marks on her arm. The callus on her left heel. The rigid stripe from the corner of her eye to her jaw. The thin pale line up her lower leg. The fading purple left by having slammed into the bar with her side back in Eldin. The circular scar in her left shoulder, like a cork-plugged cervix of a wine bottle.

But what of the bruises and scrapes she has received without knowing, that blur together who she is and to whom her body once belonged?

Link gazes at a particular row of scars that run vertically up her right forearm, like a monster has sunk its talons into her wrist and clawed down to her elbow. Try as she might, she cannot make out their age: maybe older scars that have healed, or perhaps newer scars that did cut so deep. She could have scratched the skin while climbing sheer rock, or scraped her skin during one of her immeasurable falls, or even splintered it against the wooden struts of the paraglider with how many times she has supported herself on her right arm alone.

She does not know and that sliver of grey—that lack of separation between that which she is and that which she is not—breaks sweat out on the back of her neck and sallows her skin.

Ilia neighs. Link lifts her hand to stroke Ilia's nose. She checks the pot to see that the egg pie-cake-thing has cooled to firmness. When she reaches down it comes easily off of the bottom of the pot. The filling wobbles slightly.

She inhales: the scent of vanilla.

The creamy filling coats the inside of her mouth with sweetness while the crumbly shell provides a base even as it melts to a golden taste on her tongue. The sugary flavour keeps her from eating it too swiftly, and Link sits by the campfire, by her companion, steadily nibbling and licking her way through the delicious dessert.

Egg tart.

The name comes to her in a flash. Egg tart. Egg tart that she baked for the girl with the golden hair. Link remembers. She remembers the ceremony, where the girl with the golden hair read off an ancient text that Link did not understand. Daruk had suggested the ceremony, as the King of Hyrule had not publicly announced her as the Champion of Hylia, Hero of Hyrule, Her Majesty's Knight. Only those who had seen—had seen—had seen something that lies out of reach of the lantern fueled by the fragrance of the egg tart—knew of the identity of the hero.

On the official count, the King declared that the blade of evil's bane had chosen at last a knight, and that for the protection of the prophecy the knight would go anon until the hour of the Calamity drew nigh.
Daruk had proposed the ceremony to bolster their spirits and unite them, yet the same ceremony left Link with more of an aching emptiness and confusion than before. But the girl with the golden hair and the King had promised Aryll a life in the castle as long as Link fulfilled her duties as the hero of legend. And for that alone, she would take up the mantle no matter if it cost her her life.

The King had tasked her with keeping watch over the girl with the golden hair at all times, save for her time training with the Champions, which Daruk and the woman with the green hairband had insisted upon. The woman in black had interjected that she had kept the girl with the golden hair safe since she was a wee babe, and that an untrained courier from the rural countryside would surely fail in the protection of the most important charge in the entire land of Hyrule.

The King had sighed and reminded Impa of the prophecy. "We must do all the same as ten thousand years ago if the Goddesses are to smile upon us. You may retain your duties, but her Knight must protect her as well." He had not hesitated but rumbled on. "And, by the help of the Goddesses, the sword that seals the darkness may awaken something within her. I wish her to be in its vicinity as much as possible."

Not a few days after, the girl with the golden hair had escaped from her daily tutors. To investigate a shrine near the castle. Link had followed her, as the King had instructed.

The girl with the golden hair had whirled about, had screamed for Link to leave, had shrieked for her to stay away. Link had merely looked vacantly at her, puzzled for her anger and puzzled for her actions, and had offered to cook the girl with the golden hair something to make up for it.

When Impa found them and escorted them back to the castle Link had witnessed the King—who met them on the bridge between her room and her study—yell at the girl with the golden hair. No, he did not yell. He addressed her as sternly as one would speak to a hunting dog that had relieved itself on the carpet. He spoke of prophecy, of fate, of the girl with the golden hair's latent blood that carried within it the sealing magic granted by the Golden Goddesses and passed on to mortals by the Goddess Hylia. As the legends went, the girl with the golden hair bore the blessed bloodline of the Goddess Herself. "With diligent study and prayer," the King intoned in his sermonising boom, "you will learn to wield it."

The girl with the golden hair screamed back: "I have studied. I have prayed. I have spent my life praying. In all of our written records no one in our family has demonstrated any kind of sealing magic!" Her shoulders shook; her brow knit so tightly together Link feared her forehead might rip clean of her skull. "At best we have some wishy-washy talk of miracles a few thousand years ago. Do you know what evidence I've found about ten th—"

"Because," the King said in his low timbre, interrupting her to silence with a single motion of his lips, "no one has needed to use the holy protection granted us for ten thousand years. As the sword that seals the darkness only awakes in times of crisis, so will the sacred blood of the Goddess Hylia."

She seethed out her words like smoke from a fire. "The longer you willfully ignore the facts in front of you the less time we'll have to prepare for the Calamitous One!"

"The more time you spend seeking excuses for your own failures—" Though the King had not moved, the girl with the golden hair gasped outwards as if he had hit her in the stomach. "—the more the entire peoples of Hyrule will be in danger for their lives. You are not ten years old anymore, fancifully thinking that a dignitary you considered scary was plotting to take over the kingdom. You are not ten years old anymore, hiding behind my throne while I apologised on your behalf. You have lived your life pampered by all of the pleasures I could afford you as the Princess of Hyrule, but the time has come to feel the weight of the crown you will one day bear."
The girl with the golden hair's face reddened along with the tips of her ears. Link could see the glistening of tears at the corners of her eyes and averted her gaze. "If we do not prepare for the Calamity in ways that do not involve banking on mistranslations of old wives' tales from ten millennia ago," she snapped, her voice breaking on the final syllable, "then there may be no crown for me to bear."

"Enough!"

The girl with the golden hair flinched back.

For a moment the King did not speak. Then he did. Calmly. Word by word, slow and deliberate, with the inevitability of the great glacier rolling across grassland, not a question of if, but a question of when. "All of the daughters of Hyrule have been passed the blessed bloodline of the Goddess Hylia." Link could see Impa's eyes narrow slightly at the King's words. The girl with the golden hair's tears had begun to trail glistening wetness down her cheeks. "Are you or are you not a daughter of Hyrule?"

The girl with the golden hair responded even before he had finished. "Yes," she said coldly, the ice in her timbre rivaling that of her father's, her hand closed around the golden and violet charms that she wore at her throat, "I am a daughter of Hyrule."

"Then you should be able to wield the sacred magic passed down to all daughters of Hyrule. Do I make myself clear?"

The girl with the golden hair did not answer.

"Do I make myself clear?"

"Yes, Father."

They glared at one another. Though she stood less than half his height, her frame all the more petite against his most robust, Link could see the similarities of father and daughter, in the same thick brows, in the same broad nose, in the same light brown skin the colour of the very earth they sought to protect in their own ways.

He dismissed her. The girl with the golden hair turned away.

That night Impa took watch at the door of her chambers. The King ordered Link to spend the night within at the foot of girl of the golden hair's bed. "So that she may sleep beside the sword that seals the darkness and be awakened by the voice within," he said civilly, though Link could think of nothing but the frost that formed and sharpened his words as he had stabbed within into the girl with the golden hair's chest. "I trust you to act wisely around her, for your sister's sake."

She bowed to him.

For her sister's sake she would do most anything, and she knew that the King knew.

The girl with the golden hair cried aghast at the knowledge that Link would share her chambers for the night. Impa calmed her by placing the mat near the door rather than at the foot of the bed, as far away from the girl with the golden hair as possible. "It will be a temporary arrangement, Your Majesty. I am certain—" Impa glanced at Link over her shoulder, the strand of her single long lock of hair swaying back and forth like a pendulum ticking down the minutes to a calamity about to unfold in the room. "—that things will improve once Your Majesty accesses the sealing magic."

"And what if I don't? What if...what if I'm not..." The girl with the golden hair shook her head. "I don't think the powers even exist but that doesn't make me—it doesn't make me hate myself any less—it doesn't make me doubt—!

Link closed the door behind her a tad too loudly, and the girl with the golden hair looked up. She snapped her jaw shut.

As Impa passed the threshold she turned to glare at Link. "If you do anything that displeases Her Majesty," she signed, her arms hidden from the girl with the golden hair's view, "I will personally rip you limb from limb. Am I understood?"

Link nodded.

She expected chambermaids, but the girl with the golden hair, she found out, insisted on taking care of her own room and on preparing herself for her own bed. Link sat cross-legged on the mat Impa had prepared for her with the sword that seals the darkness in her lap, its sheathe violet and gold, the hilt winged, the blade of evil's bane shimmering faintly blue, and her pack against her back. The girl with the golden hair slept in a large circular room that nonetheless felt cramped and constrained for the mountains of books that threatened to topple over every which way. To the right of the door a fireplace—that could easily double as a hearth for cooking, Link observed to herself—carved into the wall, the flames warming the inner chambers. The girl with the golden hair's bed lay on the other side, though the tomes and volumes strewn over its surface gave Link concern about where the girl with the golden hair might actually sleep. On the nightstand stood a sapphire-inlaid pitcher of iced water and an empty glass, alongside a corked glass jug containing a sparkling light green liquid. A white nightgown draped over the nightstand, weighed down by a small stack of books. A golden bow hung above the fireplace for reasons that Link could not fathom. At the corner of the girl with the golden hair's desk she spied a pot full of soil but devoid of life. A golden harp stringed eightfold leaned against a tower of books on the left half of her desk.

Link prepared for bed herself. She checked on the conditions of her satchel, her boots, her travelling clothing. As Her Majesty's Knight she could request armour whenever she wished, but that would burden others, and so she preferred to sew up any tears. She checked upon her more recent injuries—a run-in with an unruly helmasaur had left with a scrap on her right knee—applied medicinal salve, and changed her bandages. She uncorked a helping of spring green elixir from her satchel and tucked the empty vial back into place. She shined and waterproofed her boots, then polished the blade of the sword, though its glowing surface revealed no blemishes.

The girl with the golden hair did not speak a word to Link. She seated herself at the writing desk beside her bed. By the light of two candles that smelled like baked apples, she pored over a volume. Link listened to her alternate flipping pages and writing. Occasionally the girl with the golden hair would leap up, tear through the stacks of books, seize a particular tome, yelp a-ha!, and throw herself back into the chair to scribble furiously.

Link curled up on the mat. Lying on her right side she faced the wall. She closed her eyes.

The candles burned quickly, too quickly for normal candles, unless the nobility used a special brand of candles for the sheer sake of their ability to afford to utilise however many candles they wished. When the candles flickered, choked by their own pools of wax, the girl with the golden hair shuffled to light a pair anew. Rather than the bustling-about with her usual fervor, Link heard her tiptoe softly about the room.

"Your Majesty," Impa said quietly, "the promise was that you would have half an hour to read, no more."
The girl with the golden hair lowered the candles she had retrieved. "How did you know I was cheating?"

"Good night, Your Majesty." Impa took the candles from her and blew out the sputtering flames of the dead. The room cast to darkness but for the barest motes of light from the grate of the fireplace.

"...good night, Impa. You know that you can just call me—"

"Good night," repeated Impa, "Your Majesty."

The door closed once more. Link turned herself over onto her back to sleep. She listened to the girl with golden hair pomf onto the bed. Something thudded—a book?—to the floor.

The girl with the golden hair fidgeted restlessly. Link could hear her rolling from side to side, shifting her limbs, cracking her neck, flipping the pillow over and over, alternatively pulling up and kicking off the blanket. The constant noise bothered Link little. Rather, her own sleeplessness resulted from her spending the first night in the castle without having first said good-night to Aryll. Nonetheless the exhaustion of the day weighed down on her limbs, and she drifted off.

A soft whimpering awoke her. She sat up. Aryll? Her sister, whimpering, crying? Were her parents fighting once more?

Drowsily she lifted herself to her feet and approached the source of the whimpers. But Aryll's voice sounded different. Link blinked back her bleary vision and the chambers of the girl with the golden hair came back to her.

Link stood at the foot of the girl with the golden hair's bed, the girl who presently lay weeping into her pillow. Surely a freezard had breathed upon Link's legs, or an icy-winged keese had headbutted her in the knees, for her feet had fear-frozen to the ground.

A sliver of moonlight crept in from the crack between the blinds to cast the girl with the golden hair in silver.

Link knew not the words, nor the actions, nor the inactions. In that moment a pengator could have chomped her legs out from under her and she could have felt no shorter, no smaller, no more impossibly powerless, than she did listening to the girl cry.

The girl with the golden hair wept. For the sealing magic of which Link knew little, for the King who had treated her so harshly, for the 'courier girl from the rural countryside' who now shared her chambers, for one or more, for none. Link understood nothing at all of the situation.

No, that was a lie. She understood one thing.

She understood that she understood absolutely nothing at all.

She barely knew the girl's name, only her title. Princess of Hyrule.

But she did know something that cheered her up no matter the occasion, that cheered up her sister, that cheered up the girl who smelled of horses and hay. Link turned back to the hearth with its metal grate and set about uncovering a method of lifting the grate.

Her hunting knife served to unscrew the bottom of the grate. She raised the grate up and set it aside to reveal the merry flame dancing within the hearth. Link scooted her pack towards her. Always she carried with her cooking supplies on the road: skillets, baking pans, a variety of ceramic bowls, oil, butter, a wooden box of spices, salt, sugar, pepper, a bag of flour she had ground out with Marin upon her last visit to the ranch, when Daruk and the girl with the green hairband had come with her to meet the girl with the most beautiful voice Link had ever heard. Link examined the contents of her satchel. No meat, few fruits or vegetables, though she did have a nest of eggs that she had collected while tailing the girl with the golden hair to the shrine.

Egg tart. She remembers the same process of cooking, of whisking together brown sugar, mares' butter, ground flour, a drop of vanilla extract, and eggs. Link added pinches of different spices from the wooden box, a dash of this and a sprinkle of that, tasting the batter as she went before thickening it into a dough. She whisked and whisked, and whisked and whisked, and the smell of the dough grumbled her stomach.

"What are you doing?"

Link looked over her shoulder. The girl with the golden hair had climbed out of the bed and now stood there blinking at her, the long white nightgown draped down to her ankles, a white nightcap with a fuzzy pomf at the end tilting crookedly from the top of her head. The girl with the golden hair held a lavender pillow in front of her chest and abdomen: a downy aegis. Link noted how her eyes puffed out red and purple. The girl with the golden hair rubbed her eyes with the knuckles of her right hand as if to pretend that she had not just been sobbing.

With her hands occupied, Link did not respond but instead turned back to the task at hand: the baking of egg tart.

"Oh, are you...cooking?"

Link nodded.

The girl with the golden hair took a step closer. Still clinging to the pillow with her left arm, the girl with the golden hair hovered over Link's shoulder to watch her cook.

Link looked at her again. "Do you want to help?"

The girl with the golden hair crouched down beside. "...can I?"

"If you want to, I'd appreciate it." She did not know what to say and so she spoke the truth instead. At least the girl with the golden hair had ceased to cry, and Link had ceased to want to fling herself out of a window to avoid a situation where she had no inkling of how to comfort. She guided the girl with the golden hair in patting her hands down with flour, in rolling the dough between her palms, in flattening the dough out on the inside of the baking pan, in forming the shell of the tart.

"What about crimping the corners?" asked the girl with the golden hair. The nervousness of her tone cuccofleshed the back of Link's head. "Don't you need to crimp to do it right?"

"I don't know what that is." Link touched her chin; her wet fingers left a mark of white on her jaw. "You can do it if you want to. There's no right or wrong in cooking. If you make something that you love, then that's all you need."

"...oh." The girl with the golden hair dipped her head. She moved her hands over the lip of the shell. Link watched her scoop her fingers in to make little angled furrows that ran around the rim of the shell. Like those cupcakes she had seen sold by street vendors. Every time a furrow did not come out perfectly even and straight compared to its brethren, the girl with the golden hair smoothed the entire section to start anew.

In the meanwhile Link prepared the filling. She added a pinch more sugar than she normally would. Whenever Aryll cried, her sister craved sweets and salts more than anything. Salt. Link nodded to herself. A bit of rock salt.

Link poured the filling into the shell and together they slid the pan into the fireplace.

They waited together. The girl with the golden hair yawned; she nearly drooped against Link a second or two before rapidly sitting up. Link leaned forward to gaze at the egg tart. Egg tart. Egg tart. Unaccustomed to a royal hearth, she checked its firmness with some frequency.

At last the shell hardened while the inner filling remained fluffy. Link and the girl with the golden hair pulled the egg tart from the hearth together.

Link broke the egg tart in half with her hands and gave the girl with the golden hair the bigger piece. The girl with the golden hair stared at Link. "I'm sorry. I don't have any cutlery—oh."

Having already crammed half of the egg tart into her mouth, her cheeks puffing outwards, Link tried to smile at her and merely succeeded in dribbling egg tart filling over her chin. Hastily she swallowed, choked on the tart, and jerked her body backwards to gulp the egg tart down like a bird gulping down a live meal, complete with squawks and seal-honks as the piece of egg tart travelled slowly down her throat.

The girl with the golden hair ogled her wide-eyed. And then the corners of her mouth lifted up, and she tried to stifle her laugh but it bubbled up anyways, and the girl with the golden hair laughed, and Link laughed with her and then promptly choked on the egg tart again.

The girl with the golden hair—Link discovered—knew how to perform abdominal thrusts. Link wheezed out the egg tart.

"So much for protecting me," the girl with the golden hair said softly while Link licked the filling and crumbs from her fingers, "when it looks like you need protecting from yourself."

Link shrugged. "I like to eat."

The girl with the golden hair shook her head. "Oh, do you even know about the prophecy?"

"Something called the Calamity will happen. Wait, no, we're supposed to prevent it from happening? The Knight...has to use the blade of evil's bane to strike the...something One...down, and the Princess has to seal it away again. And the Champions do something."

Link rubbed the back of her head in her efforts to recall. "People just told me to practice with the sword, and I will."

The girl with the golden hair exhaled. She brought her hand up to pinch the bridge of her nose.

After a moment Link raised her hands. "The egg tart is getting cold," Link signed. The girl with the golden hair covered her mouth with her hand.

She stood up to rummage around the room while Link followed her movements. Eventually the girl with the golden hair came back empty-handed, her hands forming the shapes of missing forks and spoons. "I'm not used to eating with my hands." Link said nothing but smiled encouragingly at her. The girl with the golden hair scooped up her half of the egg tart in her palms. "Oh, it'll get crumbs everywhere." But she sounded less anxious now, more observant. Raising the dessert to her mouth she bit down and let out almost a moan, which surprised Link more than anything.

"It's...it's so moist," said the girl with the golden hair, muffled around the egg tart; she blushed hard enough that Link could see the pink on the light brown of her cheeks. "A-and delicious. I mean no "Food tastes best when you help cook," Link answered. "Thank you for helping."

The girl with the golden hair ducked her head.

Eventually they finished eating. Link cleaned up as best she could within the limited space; the girl with the golden hair offered her washbin. "Let me help." Link drew a pouch of sand from her pack. Taking a handful, she showed the girl with the golden hair how to scrub the baking pan clean. The sand collected grease and oil better than did water alone, and soon they hung up the implements to dry.

When she put up the last bowl, Link turned to the girl with the golden hair, who fixed her with a gaze so heavy Link nearly dropped to her knees then and there.

"Please don't ever tell Father when I go out to do research again. Please."

Link looked at her unsteadily. At length she signed a universe in a single gesture: "Aryll."

"What?"

"My sister."

The girl with the golden hair gazed at her for a long time, until Link's eyes started to sting and she had to blink. Then the girl with the golden hair lowered her eyelids. When she broke the silence, her voice had dulled like a blade, meant for battle, used instead to carve stone. "I suppose I understand."

With that the girl with the golden hair went to bed. At least this time she did not weep.

The morning after, the girl with the golden hair still gazed at her with hardened eyes. Link could detect some change, somewhere in the green—or was it blue?—of her irises or the taut pull of her mouth or the set of her jaw. But interpreting what the change could possibly mean went so far beyond her capabilities that she shrugged.

The quickest way to someone's heart was through their stomach, but even the stomach did not work over the course of a single meal.

And sometimes a heart could close that tender bridge between itself and the gut, could sever that connection that made her life worth living, could isolate itself away from everything at all.

This she knew all too well.

But the girl with the golden hair did not seem to have burned this bridge, or at least not entirely. And if Link could mend the bridge by rolling up her sleeves and preparing every dish she could think of and more, she would.

Ilia whinnies in her ear.

Though delicious, the egg tart does not fill her as would the warmth of a stuffed bird or the savory bitterness of roast mushrooms. Link has had dessert enough for a while.

On the journey back east, she harvests wild herbs and roots. The harvest serenades her with fruit and berry at first, yet by the time she reaches Necluda, the trees have all but lost their leaves of red and gold, and the fields lay barren and bare. Link keeps the sugar and flour for a time when she might cook for someone else. In the meanwhile, she stuffs her belly with bird and boar, rabbit and rodent, and occasionally beetles, which she judges make an excellent substitute for recipes that call for nuts. One night she takes shelter in a yawning cave, finds herself face-to-face with a bear preparing for hibernation, and rides Ilia out of dodge.

Ilia.

For her faithful companion, Link selects and steams herbs of all kinds. She holds out palmfuls of salt for Ilia to slurp up. Link avoids giving her companion sugar when she can, but at the end of a particularly hard ride, or when beset by monsters, baked sugar-apple treats and honey—when she can successfully spirit away a beehive—serve to calm her beloved Ilia.

She stops by Kasuto to unload her extraneous wares and to once more stock on bits and bobs of spices and salt. Adjusting to Necludan after so long spent hearing and signing Tabanch leads to more than a few misunderstandings. She runs into Lami once more and bakes fruit-and-nutcake for her, much to Lami’s gratitude.

Then up to Kakariko.

Link arrives not in the middle of the night but in the midst of the day. The guards—not Dorian's shift—let her through. The coming winter has shed the petals from peach and cherry trees alike; a thin ream of ice trembles at the edges of the pond, the usually-energetic sanke carp now slow and lethargic.

With a smile she makes her way to Lady Impa's home. With a smile she greets Paya, who blushes and covers her face, stammering about her honour to meet the hero of legend. With a smile she tells Paya that she need not fluster herself.

No hero of legend.

She delivers Chief Kaneli's letter to Lady Impa, who gazes expectantly at her while she kneels upon the cushion.

"I have noticed," Lady Impa says after the formalities of wonderful to see you back and safe, "that the Divine Beast Vah Medoh no longer hovers on the horizon."

Link replies with raised eyebrows. "Is that what that thunderhead was?"

Lady Impa studies her, but the heaviness of her gaze no longer drops its burden onto Link's shoulders. Like rain on waterproofed wax, the burden slides off.

"Whether or not you wish to admit to me what goes on, thank you for fulfilling your obligations." Lady Impa nods curtly.

"Delivering letters isn't so hard," Link answers. The sticks of incense surrounding Lady Impa's home—camphor and peach resin—burns thick enough to choke. She closes her eyes for a moment to muster her courage, straightens her shoulders, and tilts up her chin. *"Lady Impa, may I ask a question?"

"You may."

"What happened to Aryll?

The winter comes to Kakariko all at once. She watches Lady Impa's mouth slacken. She observes Lady Impa touch her left hand to the violet bracelet on her right wrist. She counts the seconds that pass on the heartbeat she can feel from her fingertips pulsing into her knees. The guards exchange glances with one another. Fearfully, Paya inquires if Lady Impa needs water.

Lady Impa rests her hand over her chest. "I do not know how many of your memories you have regained, Link, but now is not the time for such answers. Although your body has grown stronger, your mind remains frail in this new world. Whatever formless shapes rise in the seas of your unconsciousness, I fear that concrete details could unbalance you."

Link feels her arms shaping the question rather than asking it herself. "Is she dead?"

"Link, what if you were to speak to her, and you remembered nothing of who she was or who you were beyond that you once knew her? Do you not see how much pain that would cause both of you?" Lady Impa leans forward. Her red eyes, sunken deep into her wrinkled face, almost glisten. "It pains me to do this, but I am only protecting you."

No, Link wants to say. No, you think you can dredge the hero out of me. You think that I'll play hero to keep her safe. But she's dead. Isn't she. Instead Link inclines her head. She moves her hands to her belt. On the Great Plateau she looped the belt with its pouch perfect for the slate around her hips, and never has she removed that belt save for bathing. Not even when she gave the slate to Yunobo or to Amali.

But now Link unclips the belt. She clenches it tightly in her fingers, so tight that the rim of the belt imprints lines into her palms, and then relaxes her grip. She rests the slate upon the floor in front of Lady Impa with the belt curled up beside it.

"Thank you for all of your help, Lady Impa." She bows with her entire body. The weight of the incense tries to wrap fingers around her throat, yet she finds the shapes of the words in her fingers. "I resign from being your messenger."

Lady Impa does not respond, and Link cannot stop herself from offering a hint of justification.

"In Medli, I nearly put a great number of people in danger, and I have disrespected shrines that mean things to real people. I have been called terrifying. I have been told that I was treating people's lives and livelihoods like playthings. I do not know who used to have this body before I awoke at the Shrine of Resurrection, but I am not fit to bear the slate. Someone else can take it. Someone more worthy than I."

Lady Impa still does not respond.

Link touches her chin. "I do have one more thing to give you." From the satchel she retrieves the guardian cores that she has collected since she left Hateno. They roll noisily along the wooden floor. "Your sister can use these to repair the slate, I think."

Lady Impa still does not respond.

Link bows again, so low that her forehead touches the ground, and then she stands up. The guards exchange glances. Lady Impa inclines her head.

Link turns. She takes the first step of the rest of her life, and she could nearly float to the heavens for the lightness of her body.

The guards outside take her either side. Link asks, gently, to say hello to her friends, to Koko and Cottla, to Lasli, to the others in the village she knows. The guards whom she can name, the guards whose children she has met, the guards who have welcomed her prior, in silence lead her to her horse.
She saddles Ilia.

"I'm sorry," she signs, though she knows not to whom she speaks, her hands shivering as if the winds had whipped her into the Hebric summits, "but I can't do it. I promised someone I would take responsibility for my actions. That's what I'm doing. Right?"

Neither guard replies. One—Inya, whose husband cares for a grove of cherry trees—looks down. The other—Hirako, whose son once lent Link his prized bug-catching net—glares at her with a sternness tempered by the shock of betrayal.

She does not say farewell.

Link takes the reins in hand to silence herself, wraps the straps around her palms like gauze over a wound, and gently presses on Ilia's sides. Ilia trots forward.

Down the mountains. Down, down, and west.

Though she has no ocarina with which to practise, she taps out on the reins the rhythm of the melodies she has heard in the dreams beyond dreams.

—

Egg Tart (four hearts) - bird egg, cane sugar, goat butter, Tabantha wheat

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Well, people have noted that they expected Link to be angry at Impa or to seek out information on what's going on. Here it is! Link asks Impa what happened to Aryll, who lived one hundred years ago and who meant and means quite a lot to Link. Impa is trying to do the right thing from her point of view. Of course, things aren't going to go so smoothly when your plan mostly involves trying to keep Link in the dark. Impa is rightfully worried that Link might freak out and run if she tells Link that everyone Link cared about is dead. After all, when Link first showed up and Impa called her the legendary hero, Link fainted (partially out of hunger). Impa is trying to avoid the same mistake.

Just as when Link was testing to see if Daruk would lie to her with the poorly-made rock roast, she was testing to see if Impa was willing to tell her the truth. Link is taking Amali's words very much to heart. She doesn't want to be the hero, and if she can't accept the great responsibility, then she shouldn't be wielding the great power of the slate. It's time for a little detour of set-backs. We've still got nearly sixty chapters to go, after all (though I can tell you that we'll wrap up the Divine Beasts around the fifty-fourth chapter or so).

And yes, there you have it as to why Link stopped going after the shrines. Don't worry; this isn't the end. Or is it?

Because the hero of legend was prophesied to be a hylian man from the knights of Hyrule, but the Master Sword chose a girl from the countryside, Link's identity is not revealed publicly. Instead, the official description given out to the general public (to keep hope alive) is the one that matches the "prophecy" from ten thousand years ago. The Yiga don't necessarily know what she looks like, only that she's been sighted with the slate.

The memory in this chapter is an amalgam of two memories from Breath of the Wild: the memory recovered near Tabantha where Zelda becomes angry at Link for following her, and the memory recovered on the walkway outside of Zelda's room, where her father argues with her as he does in this chapter. As a reminder, I've slightly altered Zelda's design to more resemble her father's.

The comment about ten-year-old Zelda being paranoid and convinced that a "scary-looking" dignitary would take over the kingdom is a reference to Ocarina of Time, where a similar scenario basically kicks off the main plot (except that Ganondorf in Ocarina of Time did turn out to be evil).

Zelda's self-hate for being unable to access the sealing magic comes in large part due to disappointing everyone around her as well as fearing that Calamity Ganon will slaughter everyone if she doesn't. But there's also the fear of "if all princesses [daughters of Hyrule] can access the sealing magic, then does not being able to access the sealing magic make me not a princess [not a woman]" which Zelda's own father uses against her to keep her to the regiment of prayer. Ouch.

Pengators are an enemy first seen in A Link to the Past.

So this is the beginning of Zelda being more warm and welcoming to Link, though they have a long way to go. As a reminder, the memories are mostly presented out of chronological order except for the memories that make up explicit arcs; for example, this memory takes place before the memory from "Enduring Carrot Cake" and so on. I'll not say more, since it's up to the reader to piece things together.

Thanks to Amali's guidance with the darners, Link is being more adventurous in her eating! Just look at her substituting in nuts for beetles.

We're headed towards winter, which is appropriate enough considering Link's own emotional state. I actually didn't mean for that to happen; I determined that travelling across Hyrule should take about a month to a month and a half, and I wanted for Link to awaken in the spring. Link leaving the slate just at the onset of winter was a happy coincidence of symbolism. I'm not nearly enough of a brilliant writer to do that on purpose.

Thank you to my most wonderful readers, and thank you to my incredible beta reader. Next up: Link does some searching, both of the land and of her own spirit.

midna's ass. 21 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: This chapter is key in a lot of ways, but in one, really, really big one: This is where Delicious in Wilds becomes, in part, Zelda's (ahem, the girl with the golden hair's) story.

We get shades here of Link being mad at Impa, which boils over later on in the story. We also get hints of Link seeking out Aryll.

Unlike what I originally thought while reading, Link does not, in fact, immediately go back to Impa and get the slate back. She has some soul searching to do.

Emma. 21 September 2017.
Milk

Chapter Summary

Having left Kakariko, the travelling chef journeys throughout the land once known as Hyrule in search of a clue that could lead the chef to Marin, who might, although old, still be alive.

Chapter Notes

Non-spoiler author's notes that couldn't fit into the end notes: Link has a very deep and very disturbing sort of epiphany in this chapter regarding her own discomfort around people and regarding her own adoration of the quiet of the wilds. She does indeed have major issues with anxiety and with agoraphobia when it comes to crowds, but that doesn't excuse her own actions. This will lead into one of the most important character arcs for her in the entire story, something that could only really happen once Link is allowed to exist by herself, without the burden of the slate.

Link gets compared to grasshoppers quite a bit throughout the franchise, including by Agitha from Twilight Princess and, of course, by Romani from Majora's Mask.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The land once known as Hyrule is very, very vast, and she is very, very small.

To avoid the town she defended on her first trip to Tabantha—lest they recognise her, lest they seek to thank her—Link cuts across Proxim Bridge towards the land once known as Central Hyrule. The days grow colder as autumn breathes out the last of its warmth. The winter wind whistles through the flat plains of the Hyrule Field barren save for the great guardians that patrol the area, some scuttling about and locking their fire-light upon anything that moves, others lying dormant until vibrations in the earth or nearby sounds awake them. The field lies strewn with the ruins of what once was. She passes by the remnants of memories. Half of a fence. An privy with a fallen roof. An arrow wedged into a tree. A single stall of a stable, the remainder a broken and rotted shamble of wood.

And then: the houses. The homes. The hearths cold for decades. The broken ceramic. The torn scraps of fabric. The caved-in roofs and shuddered walls. The rotten lumps of wood that once stood as barrels. The metal skeletons of furniture. The faded paintings and torn tapestries yet hung upon disintegrating walls. The stuffed dolls ruined by wind and rain.

First merely in the cold, and later beneath a thin blanket of snow that covers the living and the dead alike.

The guardians do not deter Link. They track her without end, but she learns to deceive them by ducking behind an outcropping or a tree. She discovers that upon losing sight the automata will march in a straight line to wherever they spotted her last, and so she tricks them only to glide away in the opposite direction and summon Ilia with a whistle.
When caught in the more open portions of the field, Link finds that if she rides Ilia in a straight path perpendicular to their movement, the guardians do not lead their shots as well as even the octrooks on the water. She keeps a store of fireproof elixirs and medicinal salves on hand in case she ever miscalculates.

Less for her own sake, and more so for Ilia's. If anything happens to her own body, Link will accept the recklessness of her actions, but she resolves to never hurt Ilia for her own stupidity. Never again.

She learns to travel at night when discerning her motions comes less easily to the guardians. Yet the automatons alone do not prompt the change in her schedule: one night she awakens to find a white wolfos clawing through her belongings, her paraglider, her spare clothing. Link simply lies in the grass for a time to see if the wolfos will retreat without noticing her.

But then it sticks its snout into her satchel and pulls out with a muzzleful of her food.

By the time she finishes excavating the inedible remains of the herb-stuffed whole pigeon from the wolfos's abdomen, Link makes her decision to sleep in the day.

Monsters, more active at night, can no longer sneak up on her—or her food—while she rests. Whenever she tires from riding in the darkness, barely able to see the light ahead, Link need only recall the lizalfos who wore her undergarments over her face and ate the food out of her satchel to set her jaw and tighten her grip on the reins.

She does notice to some measure of satisfaction that few monsters live in the field, and those that do tend to come under the fire-light of the guardians as often, if not more often, than she. The first time she spots a pack of bokoblins attempting to hunt down an automaton, Link bursts out laughing. The guardian makes rapid work of them. The day after, she spots a larger group of moblins and lizalfos that manage to chop off the automaton's spindly legs and turn the guardian over to expose its underside. A lizalfos of white-patterned scales with strange whorls of violent violet—the patterns reminding Link of the golden spiral patterns on the shrines—crawls over the automaton's head to cover its eye with a lizal shield, and strangely the guardian does not pierce it through with fire-light. The monsters hack away at the automaton's innards until they rip out the core and the guardian ceases to flail.

Link trails the monsters their campsite, where the moblins heft the guardian over a fire. She observes them dance and cry out to one another around the flames. Their tongues loll from their mouths. The monsters stamp impatiently upon the ground. At length a lizalfos knocks the chassis of the guardian over with its tongue. A mound of gears and springs topples into the flame and spills out onto the grass.

Another lizalfos snatches up a gear. Link leans in: it flicks its tongue at the gear, chirrups, and bites down.

With an irritated twitter the lizalfos blehs its tongue out to fling the gear away at high speeds. Link snorts back a laugh. The lizalfos immediately spins about, ogles the pile of machinery on the fire, picks up an identical gear, and bites down just as hard as the first.

Link nearly falls from Ilia laughing at their efforts to cook and eat a guardian until one of the moblins grabs a spring and shoves it into its maw. As its jaws clamp shut, the sharp ends of the metal burst the upper face of its snout in a shower of blood. The spray of red stills her mirth.

She tugs gently on the reins and leads Ilia away.
With the guardians seemingly intent on tracking anything that moves, meat comes by scarcely. Link subsists mostly on roots and tubers, on fruits, on occasion berry bushes. Sometimes she spots white doves in the trees. Tulin's arrows fly straighter than any she has wielded before, and even when they pierce through flesh, most require nothing more than a cleaning for reuse.

Unlike in the quieter lands up north—quieter only in the sense that she would sooner meet a bokoblin than a nigh immortal mechanical beast with limitless stamina capable of pursuing her to the ends of the earth—Link passes by a single traveller in the course of her entire trek. A sheikah man of dark skin and bushed brown hair, alongside a ragged-looking spotted horse and an even raggeder-looking hunting retriever, who warns her of guardians ahead.

"They were right," he says, wiping the sweat from his brow, "about never takin' the short way. Lost the whole pack, I did, all of 'em except Fay here. Good girl." Barking, the white-furred retriever wags her tail. "I think it's 'cause they can't see white or something. I dunno. Look, if you're keepin' on through here, take good care of yourself."

They break bread together. She stuffs a pair of mourning doves caught the previous night while he provides a confectionary filled with a semisweet red paste. "They say the mark of Sheik's in our red eyes, but I think the legends've got it all wrong." The man snickers to himself. "I think the real gift's in these red beans. Though hey, your cookin' ain't half bad neither."

When evening comes they part ways.

When Link retires at dawn, she rummages through her satchel for a snack. Her hand bumps something satin-smooth. She withdraws a wrapped red kerchief. Five—and a broken sixth—of those red-stuffed confectionaries within.

The traveller must have slipped the parcel into her pack while she looked the other way. She heads west. West, west, west. The sun follows her. Link keeps the fixed star—Anouki, Hestu called it—to her right and the snowy Tabanch mountains at the centre of her vision.

When she comes upon a field of wheat, Link disembarks from Ilia to kneel in the grain. She lies down amid the swaying wheat; she closes her eyes; she inhales the scent of growth.

She listens to Ilia graze. Her companion wanders nearer and farther. As Ilia nears again, she nibbles on Link's hair; lifting her eyelids, Link hugs Ilia around the neck and pulls herself up.

Link follows the wheat over the hills.

Where the Hyrule Field ends, the threads of villages begin. Outskirts. A house or two here or there. A family that lives off of fish on the river. A tiny village of aging folks, their children mostly moved away in search of safer pastures. She tries to ask. But "a ranch, with horses, and a farm of wheat, and the owners were gerudo, and they had a daughter with red hair who had the most beautiful voice in the world, and she wore a violet sash around her waist, and they sold an elixir green as spring, and there were voltfin trout in the pond nearby" does not much make for much of specific description, particularly with half or more of the people whom she asks themselves sporting hair in various shades of red.

One elderly woman, a hedgewitch of elixir brewery who herself bottles a spring green elixir, asks if perhaps instead of a pond Link remembers the shallower portions of Lake Hylia in the summers when the level of water tends to run low; the brewer suggests that she try the villages near the Faronese grasslands. Link inquires about the elixir. The brewer offers her a sample and Link lets the taste her body knows all too well wash down her tongue.
The brewer trades for the spicy elixirs that she still has from her time in the Tabanch skies. Link pays the difference in the horns of moblins and the tails of lizalfos, the gizzard-stones of aeralfos and the canines of wolfos. She walks away with twice-daily doses for a month in tiny glimmering vials.

She heads south. Towards Lake Hylia. The Bridge of Hylia crawls with lizalfos and other monsters in numbers too large for Link to risk Ilia's life, and so she skirts the cliffsides between the Great Plateau and the lake instead.

Link stops along the path when she spots a cloaked traveller sitting, shuddering, at the side of the road, the pale skin of their cheeks barely visible and nothing else. Pulling up her hood to hide her face, Link inquires if something has gone amiss.

The traveller either does not or cannot respond. Link dismounts from Ilia to crouch in front of them. She catches a sickly-sweet scent. "Are you all right?" she signs again.

They rasp out something under their breath. Link leans in, and this time she catches the traveller's words: "Know you of the slate?"

Link's eyes widen. Rocking back on her heels, she feels her arms form the words. "How do you know about that!?

The traveller springs to their feet and Link catches a glint of silver in their hand as they raise their arm. By instinct Link kicks her left leg in an arc low to the ground. She sweeps the traveller's legs out from them her. Before the traveller can collect themself, Link flings herself onto Ilia and spurns her on.

She does not look back.

The experience leaves her shaking, at the compulsion that would lead one person to hurt another.

But she no longer has the slate.

She no longer has to worry.

Link passes into Faron.

Over the grasslands, a patchwork of ranches stretches out alongside sparser regions where—without the fertility to support agriculture—Link shares meals with nomadic practitioners of pastoralism, marked with scarlet hair or pointed ears or both. She spots them by the great saddlebags of fermenting mares' milk that their horses carry. Link learns handfuls of Faronese, enough to inquire about their cuisine. The nomads explain that the constant motion keeps the milk from spoiling while it liquors. They invite her to taste some. The first sip alone creeps a blush into her face. Hiccuping, she asks about wheat; she asks about a singer of the harp; she asks about a girl named Marin.

She asks. She asks. She asks.

She asks until her hands grow sore. She asks until the words cease to carry meaning. She asks until she fears she will have no one else to ask.

She drifts further south from ranch to ranch, from traveller to traveller, occasionally venturing into towns before panicking and fleeing on Ilia.

The days turn to nights turn to days.
The encroaching cold cloaks her shoulders. The dew beneath the dawn sheathes grass-blades in ice. Her eyelashes frost overnight. She awaits the first snow of the year. She could lie down at the side road. She could—

And then in the village of Koume in the grasslands of Taobab, its rito and gerudo inhabitants living half on the ground and half in the pillars of stone—not pillars of stone, Link observes when she nears, but ancient trees with flattened tops not unlike those she could see in the distance when she travelled to Medli—she happens upon a trail of meunière crumbs, in the very stable where she stops by to have the stablehand check on Ilia.

While the stablehand inspects Ilia’s horseshoes, then the saddle and bridle, then the horse’s general health of eyes and ears and muscle, Link poses her questions yet again in her fumbled attempts at Faronese. The stablehand knows little.

But the master of horses overhears them.

Her lengthy hair entwined in a long braid that she wears clipped on the back of her head, her light green and silver dress worn over sturdy riding breeches, the elderly master of horses asks why exactly Link wants to know.

"I want to see her," Link answers honestly, "but I lost most of my memories, and I don't know where she is."

The master of horses wipes her spectacles on a blue cloth and settles them on the bridge of her sharp nose. She signs in Faronese: "I don't think you know what you're talking about."

"I knew her family," Link explains, her hands trembling in her earnestness, "but I haven't seen her in years. Please, please help me."

The master of horses crosses her arms over her chest. "I'm not like to give away the histories of Koume families to strangers with strange ways."

"Please. Do you...do you have a harp? A six-stringed harp?"

The master of horses raises an eyebrow but produces a harp, an unpainted practise harp rather than the beautiful red and blue instrument that Marin's family has. They move to a further room in the stables, something that looks like a storage shed, that smells of oiled leather and dried hay and horse and the sharp acrid tang of metal and the sweet dust of old wood. Link apologises for her lack of practise. Sitting upon a wooden chair with a raised back that better resembles a carved stump, she strums the harp. The notes jumble. The master of horses quirks her eyebrows higher.

Link inhales. She stills her hands.

She remembers the song from her memory. Not the song that Marin sang in the evenings, but the one taught to Link by Marin's mother. She remembers not the name nor the fullness of its melody. A scant few notes. She plays them over and over. Closing her eyes, she breathes in through her nose and out from her mouth. Her brow furrows; her tongue pokes from the corner of her mouth.

She reaches out past the fogged banks of her memories, reaches out for that which she cannot feel, reaches out.

The memories fail her.

Link squeezes her eyes more tightly shut until her lids strain with the pressure and her teeth grind against one another.
She plays the same few notes over and over but nothing more comes. A single note plinks onto her fingertips but she cannot tell if it has descended as a link to the past or if she conjures her own music.

The harp rests upon her thighs. Her left hand falls away first to her side. She runs her right over the swell of the harp.

"I'm sorry." Link lowers her head. "I don't remember the rest of it. It's been too long and I've..."

A slow clap.

She lifts her gaze up to the master of horses, one leg crossed over the other, who applauds her. "I wasn't expecting you to know any, but I know those opening notes." Link blinks; the master of horses pauses for a moment. "How do you know of their family?"

"I...I remember her. That's all. I'm sorry. I haven't remembered where we met, or how, but...the blacksmith of my village employed me as a courier. I think. I would travel around from..." Link presses her fingers to the sides of her head as though she could squeeze the memories from her temples like juice from a fruit. "I can't remember. Swords and shields, and pots and pans, and sometimes things like horseshoes or big orders like furniture, or bits and bobs. And the ranch where Marin lived was as far west as I would go. And then I had to deliver something to the castle..." Her fingers twitch; the bones of her arms seem to vibrate up from her shoulders to twist her wrists. "I don't." She stops, then starts again. "I don't know. I don't remember. I visited her once or twice a month, whenever I had commissions to deliver. There was wheat, and the cucco, and voltfin trout, and I think one of Marin's mothers had a stable and the other one ran an inn? Or a bar? And she taught me to play the harp, except it was only once or twice a month so I never got too good and I don't remember where it was except the wheat and the horses and the vials of green elixir—"

A weight upon her shoulder. The master of horses's hand. "No need to strain yourself. You say you lost your memories. Have you thought you might have gotten names confused?"

Link blinks at her, and the master of horses leads Link from the stable—Link pauses for a moment to say hello to Ilia and pat her nose for being such a good and patient girl—and into a library; the gerudo lady at the front desk greets them enthusiastically as they enter and gripes to Maron about some trio of long-overdue books. Maron promises to help out later. For now she pulls a dusty tome from the library annals. Maron sweeps her hand over the cover.

"Marin, you said?" the master of horses signs, and Link dips her head. Maron flips slowly through the volume. Link cannot read the characters that run across the pages right-to-left, but from the shapes she can make out records of family trees and genealogies. "...yes, her mother once lived here, but, years before she had Marin, she moved to Central Hyrule with her first wife." Maron curls her fingers in. "Marin’s mother was my grandmother’s older sister."

Link's hands fall to her sides.

"They moved near the village of Mabe with a small group from Koume. Lon Lon Ranch, it says here." Maron flips to the end of the book where Link can see a map imprinted on the yellowing paper, oriented such that Parapa faces the top and right of the page. She traces a path from Taobab to southeast of the castle. Link stares at the map. So clearly she could recall herself riding west to the sunset. But then—her home village must lie east of Central Hyrule. "Here, about." Maron flips back to the family tree. She signs as she reads, summarising the records: "They brought wheat and voltfin with them and sent back money when they could. It says here that she remarried at some point. She assisted several more villagers in the move to Mabe. It seems Lon Lon was a great success." She lowers her hands and Link shakes her head.

"Is that it?"

"No," says Maron, and Link exhales in relief. "The Great Calamity destroyed almost everything in Hyrule Field." The exhalation stings sharp in her throat. "The records say that the family came back to Koume to recuperate, and then left west and north." Maron hesitates. "The last record indicates they went somewhere near Mount Satori. There were once villages all the way from here to there, and...I don't know what's left of them."

"Mount Satori?" Link echoes.

Again Maron indicates the map. Link studies the paper. If she heads north and loops again around the Great Plateau, she can take the path through the Forest of Time, around Lake Kolomo, over the Manhala Bridge, and from there she can explore the shadows of Satori. The names burn bright behind her eyes: Dalite Forest. Safula Hill. Sanidin Park. Nima Plain. Rutile Lake. Somewhere in the fertile valley nested between the Rivers Tamio and Regencia, she will find Marin.

Tears prickle at her eyes, and then she cannot stop herself from weeping. Maron pats her shoulder while Link half-chokes and half-sobs into her own hands at the closeness of an honest life. Then she wipes the tears from her eyes. Link bows low to Maron. "Thank you so much. Thank you so much for everything. Is there anything I can do repay you?"

Maron pushes the spectacles up on her nose. "Would you mind delivering a letter? We haven’t heard from that side of the family in years."

Link spends the day in Ilia's stall while Maron scribes her letter. The sun sets upon Link mounting Ilia for the journey ahead.

Maron lashes a load of saddlebags sloshing with milk upon Ilia's flanks. Link tilts her head. "Ride it all the way to Mount Satori," Maron instructs, "and don't drink it until you get there. Tell them it's a gift, from Koume with love, to whatever they call their new ranch."

Link inclines her head. "Thank you again. Thank you for everything."

Maron adjusts her spectacles. "You're a strange one, to be sure. But you're welcome. Farore be with you. May Her wind quicken your course."

Link rides as she has never ridden before.

She does not dare to push Ilia to the point of exhaustion, especially not in winter's cold. Instead Link obsesses over her map at night to find the most optimal path. When Ilia tires of the burden of her rider, Link disembarks and continues the walk on foot until her legs grow sore. On the trek south to Koume, she meandered about to ask every which way she could. Now Link pushes herself to the limits of her abilities, to keep her eyes fixed upon each landmark she herself has mark on the parchment taken from the chest in the Great Plateau.

As the history of the land once known as Hyrule paints her body with bruises, so too does it paint the roads with ruins.

She remembers the road to the city of Darunia, the long stretches of nothing but rock and monster.
She remembers the loneliness around Lake Totori, the windchimes of villages given way to the howls of wolfos.

She remembers the hills upon hills of wheat goldening the countryside of their own accord. She remembers the groves of fruit trees of the forests sprung from orchards sprawled into the wilds. She remembers the sea of statues of the Goddesses, abandoned to the wind and the rain, and the forests overtaking the stone fort, the roots of the plants cleaving apart the stone, until one day she could brush the leaves of the trees and never know that there had stood a fort at all.

She remembers her own memories, of a time when a girl of twelve and little knowledge of the sword could ride the roads without a second thought. She remembers the towns upon the path, remembers the neatly queued fields of crop, remembers how the only emptiness of space lay in the farmed furrows between homes, remembers how even at the furthest point between two villages she could look over her shoulder and see the one she had left, could look forward and see the one coming up.

She remembers the weights of the gazes of the people of Kasuto. She remembers the awful row of Darunia's lower belly where dwell the people and the wind-song promise of the mountaintops around the city. She remembers herself stranded in the spirals of Medli, blinded, deafened, every tendon and sinew aching, the medley of words—of voices—of people all around her, that lifted her hands to her ears and lowered her to the ground.

She remembers.

Her companions: her horse, her shadow, her own breath. In the openness beneath the skies, in the confinement of the deepest forest, alone, she feels at home.

No one should die. The ruins—the Calamity—

No one should have had to die.

And yet.

And yet.

And yet no matter how she clenches her teeth until her jaws and her temples alike ache, no matter how she grips Ilia's reins until her knuckles whiten and the bones of her hands stand up like the ridges of mountains, no matter how she buries the truth beneath layers of the smiles and the laughs and the meals she has shared—

Without the ruins, the wilds would not exist to call her name.

Saki called her terrifying.

Her vision blurs. Though the sun has not yet risen, she dismounts from Ilia. She stumbles unsteadily on legs she can no longer feel. She pitches forward; the grass kisses her cheeks; she breathes in the wild.

She senses the laugh that has borne her aloft since she awoke in the Shrine of Resurrection bubble from up her belly. The laugh of the joys of living.

She's alive.

She's alive.
She's alive and for the first time since her awakening, she is afraid of what that might mean. But she has given the slate. She has given up the slate. She has given up the slate. She has.

Hasn't she?

Silent, Link rides on.

Over the bridge. Sanidin Park bears the statue of a colossal rearing horse. In the valley below Mount Satori lie patchworks of ranchland and fields of wheat. A small village at the base of the mountain draws her attention.

Its lights guide her home.

She wants them to. She needs them to. She begs them to.

As the moon rises, silver and full as ripened fruit, upon the darkness of the night, Link raises her head to an aurora of blue and green that dances upon the mountaintop.

A thin ember of curiosity swells within her, the same curiosity that led her to take the slate from the pedestal in the chamber where she awoke, the same curiosity that bid her activate the golden spire upon the isolated plateau, the same curiosity that burned her through the laval lakes of Eldin and the snowy mountains of Tabantha, the same curiosity as vast and wide as the horizon, the same curiosity that she squeezes down into a loop small enough to choke herself with.

She rides Ilia into the village. She asks the guard, breathless, her hands numb from the cold of the night, her face red from the warmth in her chest, of a ranch, of a girl with red hair and a violet sash straddling her hips, of a flower—a flower that springs clear as glass into her memories—a flower the same colour as the sash—of the flower that the girl wears in her hair at her left ear. She remembers.

She remembers.

The guard—her own braid scarlet as flame—arches her eyebrows at Link. She thumbs up towards the mountain. "You might be talkin' about Romani Ranch," she says in a Faronese faintly hued in the susurrus of Parapan vowels. "It's where we get all milk. They're up that path." The guard leans to look at Ilia's sides, at the saddlebags sloshing milk. "Is that chateau romani?"

"Chateau romani?" Link signs.

"That's what we call," the guard explains with a wink, "the Romani specialty blend of—" She says a word Link does not know. "Ah, hm." The guard scratches her ear, then winks again. "In your tongue I believe you call it liquored milk."

The guard says the words in Central Hyrulean and yet Link does not know if Central would be her tongue.

Her hands feel to flow the forms of Necludan, their signs shaped most smoothly, but she knows not enough of herself. That other language, that Yunobo called the tongue of the eastern lands, shapes more smoothly still.

Focusing her gaze on the present, Link thanks the guard profusely. The guard waves her off; when Link offers, she declines a saddlebag of liquored milk. "I'm not one to drink, and you look a little young for it, too. Take care of yourself out there, and have a good night."

She thanks the guard again.

With a flick of her wrist Link leads Ilia up the path towards the mountain, towards the aurora of green and blue.

She releases her left hand from the reins to rub the back of her head. Link slides her middle and ring fingers around the tie of her ponytail to bob the hair up and down. The tail whisks against her neck and soothes the tremors shaking her legs from the hips down.

The path winds up the mountainside. Link pauses to glance at a wooden signpost by the road, painted with a bottle of milk and a horse, with blue and purple characters that she cannot read. In small fine lettering beneath she observes the name in other alphabets and syllabaries. At last she happens upon those in Central Hyrulean.

Romani Ranch.

Her heart throws itself so hard against her sternum that the kick nearly flings her from Ilia's back.

She hastens Ilia into a speedy trot. Up the rise Link can see the sloping roof of a stable, the same general shape as that of her memories. Ilia gaits into a gallop as the ranch comes into view: the silo, the barn, the stables, no fields of wheat but instead fields of tall grass and grain for the horses and other beasties to graze, now whitened with snow, and so close that she can almost taste the promise she made to the girl with the violet sash straddling her hips—to Marin—

The barking of a dog, suddenly so close to Ilia's hooves that the horse rears. Link lets go of the reins to stroke Ilia's shoulder.

"You're not gettin' any of our cows!"

She senses rather than sees the arrow that pierces through the air. With Ilia rearing up, Link jerks the reins to twist the horse about, to shield Ilia with her own body. Pain punctures the feathers of her tunic and the flesh of her right shoulder. The impact of the arrow and her own spasms knock her from Ilia's back.

Link rolls forward into the snowy grass and lifts her left hand to the wooden shaft jutting from her flesh, stabilising the arrow to avoid tearing her muscle more than necessary. A tiny dog circles her, tail vibrating, and yips.

Reaching for her blade, Link snaps her head up at her assailant.

Her left hand falls limply to the ground.

A girl. A girl in a white dress. Of around the age of twelve. With red hair that reaches nearly to her feet, her bangs parted over her eyes, framing the roundness of her brown-skinned face, her soft features so familiar that Link's heart seems to have fallen from her chest to pulsate somewhere on the grass. The arrowhead in her shoulder pierces her less than does the steady gaze of the girl who stands over her with her hands on her hips.

Though she bears no violet sash about her waist, and though she appears so impossibly young, Link knows her, knows her, knows her.

Marin.
The girl stares at Link. "What's the big deal? You're not one of Them." She stops. Link ooof out a gasp as the girl's boot connects with her stomach. "Definitely not one of Them!" Cupping her hands around her mouth, the girl whirls around. "Mooooooooooooooooom!" she yells. "There's a giant grasshopper on the lawn!"

—

Milk (one and a half hearts) - fresh milk

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Thank you again to my most wonderful beta reader, and thank you again to my most incredible readers for having come along so far with me.

I've touched here and there on the ruins due to monsters and to the Great Calamity, but the outer rim of Hyrule was left mostly spared relative to the destruction of Hyrule Field. With Link in one of the nadirs of her character, I thought it was a very appropriate time to, well, take the opportunity and hammer in the point about the ruins of Hyrule.

Those strange whorls of violent violet over the silver lizalfos's body might come back to haunt you.

Fay, the dog, is a reference to the character from Star Fox 2, as this chapter was written right around when it was announced that Star Fox 2 would be included on the SNES Mini. Red bean paste is delicious and I recommend you try some if you haven't already.

Link also her first actual run-in with the Yiga! This was based on the travellers that you sometimes see ambushing you around Hyrule. Note that the Yiga didn't know Link, but instead simply asked if Link knew anything about it. Again, the Yiga don't necessarily know Link's description.

Unlike with the big languages that Link has encountered so far of Central Hyrulean, Necludan, Eldic, and Tabanch, Link does not know that much Faronese. She picked up a little from Marin's family from before the Great Calamity, and she's now learning more (over the course of these weeks she's spending hunting clues about where she could find Marin), but she's barely conversational in it. I should note that Marin herself mostly spoke Central Hyrulean to Link.

Because I've been naming all villages after characters from previous Zelda titles, the towns of Koume and Kotake are named after their friendly versions in Majora's Mask. Unfortunately, there are very few named gerudo women in the franchise outside of Breath of the Wild, so I had to get creative with some of the names of the various settlements and peoples related to the gerudo. Western Faron is mostly populated by gerudo, hylians, and rito; eastern Faron is mostly populated by hylians and zora.

Of course, I threw in a little reference to A Link to the Past, and quite literally at that. The librarian is a reference to Maggie from The Minish Cap.
Link misinterpreted her memories: she remembered wheat and voltfin trout and assumed that Marin must have lived out west, when in fact the people who established Mabe brought wheat and voltfin trout with them. Hence what you see.

The ruins of Lon Lon Ranch are present in Breath of the Wild right next to the ruins of Mabe Village. Since Marin (and Tarin) in Link's Awakening were direct inspirations for Malon (and Talon) in Ocarina of Time, who in turn was the direct inspiration for Cremia and Romani in Majora's Mask, I couldn't not make the connection between Lon Lon and Mabe (Mabe being Marin's home in Link's Awakening). Romani Ranch is lifted from Majora's Mask, as is chateau romani, which is a milk-based drink that only adults are allowed to drink in Majora's Mask. And speaking of chateau romani, alcoholic milk is a real thing! It's called kumis. I think I've mentioned this before but I can literally buy it at my local deli. That's right! All of the milk bars of various Zelda titles are actually selling alcoholic milk.

midna's ass. 21 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: There's a moment in this chapter where Link realizes that she's almost sort of half glad that everything is ruins and wild now, and how, well, sort of fucked up that is. That's an important moment - probably one of the linchpins of Link's whole character arc.

The mysterious girl at the end is kind of a brat on her introduction, but trust me, you'll come to love her.

Delicious in Wilds makes western Faron a really great place. I like it in Breath of the Wild, but it feels too much like a collection of small valleys than the large open grasslands that what is effectively "horseland" probably should be. This series rectifies that, makes it feel like the wide open space that it really ought to be.

Link meeting the traveler on the road is one of those small, intimate moments that really make this series shine.

Emma. 21 September 2017.
Chapter Summary

The travelling chef gains safe passage into Romani Ranch in exchange for the ranch's aspiring archer beef stew and learns of an old woman at the ranch who might know something about the girl with the violet sash.

Chapter Notes

More non-spoiler author's notes that didn't fit into the bottom comments:

So, why are we spending so much time at a ranch? Well, for one thing, Link is about to get learned on some things that happened in her absence. But moreover, Link doesn't really have a home. Sure, there's Kakariko, which is sort of a home-base. In-game, Link can purchase a house in Hateno. Yet there's a completely different feeling from coming home to a bunch of weapons hanging on a wall and nondescript photographs (I honestly can't believe that Nintendo didn't give players the opportunity to hang photos they'd taken into the frames) and coming home to a family.

Another great thank-you to all of my readers who have come with me this far, and a thank-you to my marvellous beta reader, Emma, for taking care to ensure that I don't ruin my own story with overzealous editing. Next time: getting acquainted with Marin.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The girl leads the grasshopper into the barn. The warm dank scent of hay and animal rolls over her: stalls of dappled horses on the far end, and speckled cows with curved horns nearer to the door where the girl and the grasshopper enter. The girl gestures for the grasshopper to sit down on a stool that the girl drags out from near the cows.

The closest of the cows, splotched with black and white, moos plaintively at the grasshopper.

The grasshopper's horse pokes her head into the barn. She trots forward to browse the hay, ears flicking back and forth at the company of other animals.

The grasshopper perches on the stool. The girl inspected the grasshopper's shoulder from which extends the shaft of an arrow. She warps her fingers around the wooden shaft and the grasshopper grinds out a stifled noise of pain. "Y'know, Grasshopper, you really shouldn't've been going around looking like one of Them! I gotta keep vigilant." She cups her hands over her eyes as though mimicking a pair of binoculars. "Sharp-eyed! They'll never take another cow while I'm on the job, mark my words!"

The grasshopper's hands lift up to form the shapes of Faronese. "My name is Link," says Link, and the girl shakes her head.

"That's a silly name, Grasshopper! And I don't know how to say it!" The girl taps her fingers against her chin. "Right, I've got it!" She pumps her fists into the air. "Yup yup! You just sit there and I'll pull it out real fast.

"I can take out the arrow myself," Link signs, sweat beading on her forehead.

The girl bobs her head from side to side for a second. Then she seizes Link by the shoulders and shakes her. "B-but do you promise promise not to tell cremia!?"

Link lets the word cremia bounce about her memories of Faronese, but it connects to nothing and sadly spits itself back out. "I promise," she says in turn after raising her hand to her chin, "but I don't know what a whatever-it-is-that-you-just-said is."

The girl blinks at her, her features open and wide in her bewilderment, and then presses her arms into her stomach to double over with laughter. Toppling over she rolls back and forth along the floor of the barn to hoot and howl so loudly that Link observes the cows and horses stirring and startling. The girl coughs out a last few peals of laughter and wipes the tears from her eyes.

Her easy laughter brings a smile unbidden to Link's own mouth.

"With any luck you won't find out or I'm not gonna get sweets for a month." Straightening her back, the girl march-paces from left to right, waggling her index finger. She effects a deeper, sterner tone of voice. "You can't keep accidentally injuring people, Romani. Think about all the trouble that you've caused for the people of Kotake. No one is coming for the cows." She stops, stamps her foot down, and whirls around to face Link. In her normal voice the girl flings her arms up in the air and bursts out: "You know the reason why she thinks no one's coming for the cows? Right, it's 'cause I've been the one protecting the cows from Them this whole time!"

Link nods repeatedly at the girl's speech while its meaning flies so far over her head that she imagines the words sticking in the inkiness of the sky to form a new constellation dedicated to her confusion. "Your name's Romani?"

The girl bobs her head enthusiastically. "Oh wow wow wow! I guess my archery skills are pretty good, but I never thought people'd know me from aaaaaall the way to..." Romani leans forward into Link's face, close enough that Link leans back, and squints. "...wherever in the world Grasshopper's from!"

"I don't know where I'm from."

"Even better! All the way to a place so far that you forgot about it by the time you got here! That's how renowned I am!" Romani claps her hands. She whips the shortbow from her back and Link reaches for her cooking pot for protection. Slamming her foot onto a nearby crate, missing and hitting the floor, scooting the crate a centimetre closer to her, and then slamming her foot triumphantly onto the nearby crate, Romani poses with the bow. Link admits that she has proper form, at the least. "Right, hear me out, Them! My heroic deeds have travelled to the very corners of the world! No one is safe for you to hide, so stop messin' with the cows or you'll get...the horns! Of my arrowheads!" She attempts to spin an arrow in her hand and succeeds solely in breaking the shaft. "G-get it? The arrows...the arrowheads are made out of cow horn. Mess with the bulls or get the...it's funny! I promise it's funny!"

Link smiles despite herself, and then snorts, and then breathes out a silent laugh, and then breaks out in laughter until her stomach aches, less at the horn-arrows and more at the sheer infectiousness of Romani's lease on life. Romani grins widely. She pretends to brush dust from her shoulders.

"I know, I know. Thank you; thank you. Did you know that Sageru Herself's come down to talk to me before? She's the one who told me about Them! That's how important I am to the whole world!” Romani puffs out her chest. "When I'm bigger I'm gonna walk all the way to the big ole castle myself and I'm gonna kick the Calamity Bore—more like Calamity Bore amirite? Amirite? It's funny, I swear!—back to the spirity spirit mumbo jumbo world so hard that all the stuff that happened ten thousand years ago's gonna not...have happened! Right, thaaaaat's how cool it's gonna be!"

The lingering warmth of Link's laughter ices her fingers into shaking claws. When she forces her hands to move, her fingertips have numbed. "Calamity...?" She has no shape for the word bore, only the knowledge of how it sounds.

"Yup yup! Y'know, the bwig bwad bwoar that's trapped up in the castle where all the royals 'n' stuff used to live?" Romani waggles her eyebrows while Link listens on in quiet. "She's told me so many stories though I fall asleep listening to them. Between you and me, Grasshopper—" She lowers her voice. "—sometimes I gotta pretend to stay awake so Grandma doesn't feel bad—"

Romani's grandmother.

Her grandmother.

Someone who might know Marin.

A sibling, or a cousin, or—

Before Romani has even finished her story, Link has leaped to her feet. The surge of agony from her shoulder spasms her right arm and she digs her left fingernails into her skin. Romani stumbles backwards. Link grits her teeth and signs through the bolts of pain that convulse her hands. "Your grandmother?" Romani blinks at her and Link strains the words from the sieve of her fingers. "Can you take me to her?

"Whoa! Did Grandma cheat you at cards too!?" Link stares at her. Romani stares back. When Link blinks, Romani grins at her. "Ha! I won." Link sinks further into confusion; perhaps she knows even less Faronese than she expected, and she knows that she knows Faronese less than Central Hyrulean, than Necludan, than the major languages of the four great capitals where her body trained with the Champions. And she does not even know what she knows of Akkalan or of Hebric. "Well...if you don't rat me out to cremia...then I guess that maybe I could let you meet Grandma. But then you gotta do something for me first! Yup yup, you gotta do something. No freebies in my kingdom! This is Romani Ranch y'know!"

Link tips backwards to land her rear on the stool again. "What do you want?

Romani rhythms her fingers against her chin and hums out half a song. "'Y'know there's so many things I could ask for! So many things. What should I ask for first? What could Grasshopper give me?" While she thinks aloud, Link glances more thoroughly about the barn. She can see little in the dimness of the barn except for the cows and horses. "What could Grasshopper gi-i-ive me? Right! I know!” The girl swivels on her heel to put a hand to Ilia's nose. Ilia snorts but does not shy away. "What's in those saddlebags, Miss Horsey?"

"It's..." Link recalls the shape of the word. Liquored milk. "A woman from Koume told me to bring it here."

"Oh! Oh wow wow wow!" Romani leaps up and down. Her smile crooks craftily, and she wags her index finger at Link. "Well if you lemme have some of that then I'll take you to see Grandma straightaway, yup yup! Since you brought it all this way 'n' stuff!"
Tilting her head Link considers what she has heard from the guard at the village. "I thought that it was made here, too?"

Romani's smirk drops for a second before she changes positions as though physically employing a new argument. "Y'know, I'm the official arbiter of all the liquored milk that passes through here! That's me. Romani of Romani Ranch. It's suuuuuuper official. So lemme try it."

"I met a woman in the village, who said that I looked too young to be drinking it..." Link looks Romani up and down. "...and aren't you even younger?"

Romani puffs out her cheeks. "No fair!" Crossing her arms over her chest, she hmphs and turns her head indignantly away. "If you don't let me have a taste, I'm not showing you to Grandma. Right, I know Mama says that stuff's for adults only buuuuut I've figured it aaaaaaaall out. So you gotta let me have some. Please?" From her huffing she suddenly clasps her hands in front of her chest and sticks out her lower lip. "Pretty please?"

"I can make you some food with milk in it," Link counter-offers.

Once more Romani beats out music against her chin. "Are you a good cook? I don't know if Grasshopper can cook!"

"If you don't like it, I'll make you something else," she promises.

Romani grins. "Will you really? What if I just say that I don't like it?"

"I promise I'll make you something else then."

"If you saaaaay sooo," she sings, and something about the timbre of her voice swells an ache dampness behind Link's eyes. "Right, we gotta be real quiet though! Sneaky sneaky. Can you do that?" Link nods. "Yup, that works! C'mon. And take some of that milk!" Romanin skips forward, then turns back. "Aren't you coming?"

Link gestures to the arrow still jutting out of her right shoulder. Romani claps her palm against her forehead.

A few hasty moments of removing the arrowhead, cleaning out the wound, applying salve, and wrapping around her shoulder with gauze later, Link pulls on her undershirt and tunic. Romani gestures for Link to follow her.

As promised, Link removes one of the saddlebags; she carries its weight in her arms and listens to the slow sloshing of the milk within as she accompanies Romani out of the barn and towards the farmhouse.

The dog yips at her. Now that Link has taken a better look at the animal, the beastie more resembles a cat crossed with a dog, with sharp upturned ears and fur striped in orange and black. Tearing her attention away from the high-pitched barking, Link creeps quietly behind Romani, though the girl seems more concerned with giggling about them sneaking in the dark than actually staying silent.

Link glances up at the risen moon that silhouettes a cucco on the roof of the house. No, not a cucco, but a weathercock, somewhat deformed and dented as if having borne the brunt of multiple rocks thrown at its head, or perhaps the night mist plays tricks upon her. Romani takes her around the back of the house, where she winks at Link and gestures to a glass window set low in the wall.

"Watch. And. Learn."
Romani jiggles the glass pane, then lifts it entirely from the frame and places it in the grass. Picking up her cat-like dog companion, she drops the beastie on the other side of the window before hopping over herself. "Right, you coming?"

Blinking at the secret passageway, Link ducks down to step into the open window. She strains to see anything in the darkness within. A sudden light prompts her to close her eyes.

"Welcome to the kitchen, Grasshopper!" As Link's eyes adjust to the brightness, she makes out Romani standing on top of a table, holding out two pans like a sword and board. "This is where dreams born and die, where girls become women! This is where the Champions of the Divine Beasts will be chosen to accompany the future Knight!" Romani thrusts the pans into the air, then looks down at Link from her position on the table. "That's me, if you couldn't tell. The Knight. Though, y'know, I could probably pilot all the Divine Beasts too! Hey, Sageru, you hear that? I said, I could probably pilot all the Divine Beasts too!"

Link looks around the kitchen. Spacious, she notes first. She spies a wash basin, a hearth, a stove, pantries upon pantries, baskets of fruit and vegetables, something that looks like an ice-box. Small knickknacks and statuettes abound, tucked in corners or displayed on the table. She pokes about some of the drawers. In the ice-box, she finds neat trims of meat individually wrapped in wax.

"Do you like meat stew?"

"Do I ever!" Romani answers back. "Just make it with that milk and everything will be go-o-od."

She removes the cooking pot from her back and sets it upon the stove. Soup, soup, meat soup. Link removes some of the frozen beef from the ice-box, although she has not time to wait for the meat to thaw. Instead she heats water to boiling and plunks the chunk of icy beef inside.

"Don't ever cook like this."

The very act pains her, and yet she presses bravely on through the boundaries of unacceptable cooking. She butters the bottom of the cooking pot, then adds oil, a pinch of rock salt, a sprinkle of crushed black pepper, and a dash of mixed Eldic spices for flavour. While the pot heats up on the stove, Link pulls and cuts the beef—or she assumes beef; she has not had the chance to cook with beef since she can last remember over the past eight or nine months since her awakening—into bite-sized portions to sear in the pot. As the bits of meat sizzle in the oil, Link turns them over and over. In the meantime, Romani paces about the kitchen, sniffing even more intensely than her cat-like dog companion and remarking hungrily the fragrance of beef.

Link sets the saddlebag on the counter. While Romani begins to regale her with a story of her own personal heroism, Link rummages through the pantries and the ice-box. In the coolness of the sapphire-lined box, she uncovers a pitcher of milk to use as the base of the soup. She squats on the kitchen floor to perform the switcheroo. She shakes out the saddlebag into an empty pitcher; the liquored milk gloops out thickly, the scent slightly sour. Pushing the pitcher into the ice-box, Link pours the fresh milk from the ice-box—she prays fresh milk—into the saddlebag.

"I'm adding the milk," she signs to Romani, who claps eagerly. The girl pushes a stool towards the stove to stand over the cooking pot and look inside. Link empties the contents of the saddlebag onto the browned beef. She cleans the boomerang, then uses its edge to scrape up pieces of beef from the bottom of the pot and carefully stir. With Romani's help in using the stove—Link cannot figure out the mechanism by which to lower or raise the heat—she sets the beef and milk to simmer.

Link wipes her forehead.
"Y'know-ow-ow," Romani suggests, poking her tongue out of the corner of her mouth, "if you're thirsty we could wash it aaaaaall down with some liquored milk, yup yup. What'd'ya say?"

"We should make vegetables."

Romani pouts. "Why? Veggies don't taste good."

"They'll taste good in the soup. I promise. And if you don't like it, I'll make something else, just for you." Link snags another skillet from the counter and twirls it. An empty skillet, to avoid getting anything into Romani's hair as she did to Misan all those weeks ago in Eldin. This time Link catches the handle again with an expert flourish. Romani's expression brightens and her mouth drops open in awe and excitement. "Tonight, I'm your personal chef."

"Oh wow wow wow! I never knew how many good things could come from shooting arrows at strangers!" Romani paps her hand against her cheek. "Is this what Mama meant by stranger danger?"

"What vegetables do you like?"

Romani wrinkles her nose. "Is chocolate a vegetable?"

No matter how Link endeavours—and she really does try—to stop the laugh from snorting up her nose, she finds her eyes watering from how much she has laughed tonight. She digs through the pantries. Into the same skillet that she twirled, she chops up herbs from her satchel alongside vegetables from the house: onion and potato, corn and garlic, tomato and rhyme, amaranth and orange-yellow mighty thistle long said to increase one's prowess in battle. Link examines this last ingredient which she picked by hand along the sloping grasslands of Faron.

She looks up at Romani, standing on the table and brandishing a pan as she continues her story of how she alone fought off a pack of Them. She looks back at the mighty thistle. She looks up at Romani. She looks back at the mighty thistle. She looks up at Romani.

"So there I was," Romani crows, stabbing the air with the rounded side of the pan, "toe to toe with five of the nastiest Them I'd ever seen! Light beams shooting outta their eyes like guardians but ten times worse! Claws sharper than the look cremia gives me when I warn her about Them! Slowly...all ten of Them surrounded me." She casts her arm across her face as though aghast. "But did I surrender?" Romani fwips the pan out so quickly that Link ducks under the assumption it will fly from her hand. "No! I summoned my highly trained killer instincts and pounced!" She kicks the air. "Hyah!" She throws a left cross. "Hyuh!" A right cross. "Hyaa!" Romani attempts a backflip only to slip and land on her rump on the table—Link stifles a gasp—but not even this mistake can deter the future legendary Knight. Instead Romani punches the air with the skillet as if she meant to do that. "Hyyyyaaaaaah! And when the dust cleared..." She glances at Link as if to check whether Link pays attention; Link bobs her head and Romani beams. ". . .there were twenty less of Them in the world!"

Link looks between the thistle and the girl panting heavily on the table. Then she shrugs and tosses the thistle into the skillet. She fries the vegetables, adds salt and spice, and simmers the vegetables on.

With that, Link waits.

In the warm lantern-light of the kitchen rather than the dim candles of the quiet stable, Link can observe Romani more readily. Her features differ from Marin's, some more slightly than others, but Link notices now how her ears curve up into long points, the deep blue of her eyes, the more earthen tone of her skin. The higher set of her cheekbones, though just as prominent; the comparative roundness of her nose, though still downturned; the hair straighter and thinner, the red deeper and darker. Not Marin. Not Marin at all. Yet so similar that Link can see the relation with ease. Marin’s family for certain.

Strange, that, since she cannot recall Marin having any siblings, but then again Link nearly forgot her own sister.

Romani launches in on another tale that seems an alternate version of the first. Link listens. Despite her youth, Romani knows how to weave a story together, where to slow down and where to speed up, where to lay on the fear and trepidation.

And in these stories Link knows that no one will die, that the great Romani will always prevail without a scratch, that Link need not fear the similarities to her own tales of monsters.

"...so Mama told cremia to look over me but I kind of ran off to do some exploring myself. Anyways I ended up getting lost—wow wow wow no I don't mean that I got lost; right-o, I was exploring as a brave hero and I knew exactly where I was going yup yup—and then we saw a huge guardian! Bigger than any I'd seen before! It must've seen the size of the whole castle!" Romani pauses. "I've never been to the castle but I know what Grandma’s told me. Right so I thought I was gonna die. But then outta nowhere this dog jumped from the bushes! And then she clamped her jaws right around the hem of my dress and just started dragging me all to where everyone else was. She was practically carrying me while the guardian was just bearin' down and down on us! When I got back, Grandma said the Goddess must’ve sent her so I named her Samiyu but really she's just Miyu. And she's been with me every since. And I love her. Yup yup. Good girl, Miyu."

Link feels herself smile at that. "That's the best story I've ever heard," she says; Romani blushes. The dog in question stretches out luxuriously on the tabletop and lolls out her long pink tongue. Link addresses the dog solemnly: "Thank you for saving her life."

"Thank you for saving her life." Link signs hastily. "Please?"

At length the vegetables simmer down and the beef becomes tender and smooth. Link mixes the vegetables into the creamy broth and stirs. She samples the stew on her tongue: not enough salt. A touch more salt and she lifts up her hand to curl her thumb and forefinger together to signal the soup's readiness.

Romani rubs her hands together. Link splits the stew between three bowls: one for herself, one for Romani, and one for Miyu, who lowers her head to lap up the thick soup, her tail sweeping low.

Suddenly Romani throws her hand up. "Wait we can't eat it like this, Grasshopper! Stay right there. Don't move. Don't even breathe or I won't forgive you!" Link makes a gesture as though tying up her mouth. Romani rushes out.

Link holds her breath. Just when her lungs feel fit to burst, Romani sprints back in holding a pair of hats that—Link ogles—look like the heads of cows. She drags over the stool and clambers onto it to plunk the hat onto Link's head.

Her lungs throb in pain. Darkness invades on the corners of her vision.

"Can I breathe now?" Link signs hastily. "Please?"
Romani tilts her head. "Lemme ask. Romani, can Grasshopper breathe? Uh huh. Uh huh." She claps her hands. "Romani says yes!"

Link exhales. She pants. Romani slaps the second cow-like hat onto her own head and presents herself to the cooking pot. The girl climbs onto the table to sit with the bowl in her lap. "Now we can drink it!"

"What are these?" Link asks, but Romani has already seized the bowl of beef stew in her hands and lifted it up to her mouth. Romani puts her mouth on the lip of the bowl, spwaahs as she burns her tongue, and then immediately puts her mouth on the bowl again. She tilts her head back and drains the entire bowl before Link can so much as take hers. At last Romani smacks the bowl back down on the counter. She wipes her mouth with her hands and belches. Then she closes her eyes.

Link watches her.

Romani peeks open one eye; her pupils darts downwards. She frowns and closes the eye again.

After a few moments the girl slaps her fists on the counter. "Wow wow wow maybe the milk only works if it's fresh. Yup yup, I bet that's it. Maybe if you steam it all the adult-ness leaves."

"All the...adult-ness?"

Romani nods furiously. "Mama says that only adults get to drink it! So if I drink it then I'll become an adult, right!? Isn't that how it works!?"

Link looks at her. Romani looks back. They look at one another.

Just before the laughter can reach Link's mouth, her body stiffens almost prior to her making out the sound.

Footsteps.

By the kitchen.

A voice.

"Romani, are you practising archery at night ag—"

Link turns her head ever so slowly to the doorway of the kitchen.

A man in the doorway. A older hylian man, guays' feet visible around his eyes, with dark brown skin and straight black hair silvering at the bangs, holding up a lantern in his left hand. Link stands frozen in the kitchen with her bowl of stew still in her hands and the cow hat on her head while Romani sits cross-legged on the table.

The man in the doorway opens his mouth.

Romani leaps off the table to skip towards him. The man grabs her protectively and hides her behind him, still staring at Link with wide blue eyes. Her left arm twitches up but she keeps herself still.

The blade on her back burns in its sheathe.

"Papa!" Romani says. "This is Grasshopper. She made me food! Beef stew. Except the liquored milk didn't make me an adult." Romani pouts. "But I promised Grasshopper that I'd let her see Grandma if she made me stew!"
The man straightens himself. He clears his throat and speaks slowly, enunciating his words with care. "Who are you?"

"My name is Link," she signs. "I'm hungr—Lady Impa from Kakariko sent—" That no longer holds true, and she closes her eyes a moment before forcing her hands through the proper motions. "I'm here to deliver a letter from Maron of Koume. She said that she was related to your family."

"Koume?" The man narrows his eyes. "What kind of letter?"

"It's with my horse in the stable." She does not know how to sign Romani's name, nor how to spell out the letters in Faronese, for she knows not the Faronese alphabet. "If you come with me I'll show you."

"Romani." The man kneels down beside the girl. "Why did you let a complete stranger into the house, again?"

Romani scuffs her foot on the ground. "Wееееел I kinda maybe sorta a little bit within the bounds of imagination kinda maybe hit her with an arrow?" She raises her hand to show her forefinger and thumb a centimetre apart. "But it was only a small arrow. So I had to help!"

The man shakes his head. He stands back up. "I'm sorry for my daughter's actions. How far have you come? You don't seem to be from around here." He pauses. "I didn't mean that as an insult. I'm Vish."

"I don't mind," Link answers, and Vish arches his eyebrows. "About the arrow. I've had worse." She stops. "I don't know how to sign your name. I'm sorry."

Vish puts a hand on his hip. "I didn't catch your name either. Could you spell it?" Link shakes her head. "Well, then, do you mind me calling you Grasshopper for the time being?" Link shrugs. "Well then, Grasshopper. As for my name." Vish shows her the gesture, a swooping crooked finger that reminds Link of a fish hook. "Now, Romani, why don't you head off to bed?"

"But I wanna see the letter!" Romani huffs out her cheeks. "Right, you can't send me to bed. Y'know I'm the one who found Grasshopper!"

"Romani..."

The girl sticks out her lower lip. "What if They abduct the cows in the middle of the night?"

Vish crouches beside her and kisses her forehead. "Off to bed, young lady. I'll help you fortify the shed from Them in the morning. How's that?"

"Fiiiine." Romani hugs her father closely, then scampers off with Miyu.

Vish lifts himself to his feet. He sighs and looks over at Link, his gaze slightly hardened, and Link flinches back. "What did you make for her?"

Link holds up the still-full bowl of beef stew. Her stomach rumbles.

Vish takes the bowl and smells it. "Do you regularly come into people's homes and cook with their food?"

"...your daughter asked me to," Link signs back.

"My daughter is also ten years old." He rubs the back of his neck. "There's no alcohol in this, is there?"

"No, I used milk from the..." She cannot fathom for the life of her the Faronese word for pitcher. Instead she makes a round gesture. "...in the ice-box. I promised her I would use milk in the stew." Link hesitates. "I put the liquored milk into the...round thing...that's in there."

"Round thing?" His brow wrinkles. "The pitcher?"

"Yes. That. The round thing."

"...well then, let me impart a piece of advice to you, Grasshopper." He clears his throat. "If you want to deliver a letter, you should deliver it during the day, and not the middle of the night, and you should ask for the woman of the house, not a ten-year-old girl practising archery so recklessly she would injure a stranger."

Link says nothing. Even without the weight of the slate pressing down on her, she cannot step into conversation without actively plunging herself off of a gorge. She demonstrates instead the windowpane that Romani took off to let them inside.

Vish slaps his palm onto his forehead.

She stares down at her boots. Vish replaces the pane. "I'll have to fix that up in the morning." He clicks his tongue. "She's brighter than I'll ever be, I'll give her that, but she's a right handful sometimes." Vish glances at Link as though expecting an answer, and Link balls up her fingers instead. "Well then. Your horse?"

In the stable Link removes the liquored-milk saddlebags from Ilia's flanks and hands them to Vish. He staggers under their weight. She fishes the letter from her satchel to pass on. Vish takes the envelope and reads.

"Maron from Koume..." He nods to himself. "Thank you for bringing this out here. Now, I can tell by the look on your face you're looking for a reward." Link shakes her head. "Oh, is it already paid?"

"The letter was my payment for Maron telling me where this family lives." Vish frowns at her. Link moves on: "I want to talk to your daughter's grandmother."

"Why?" He tucks the letter under his arms. "At any rate, you'll bring a letter back to Koume, I assume. Well then, come with me. My dearest will want to see this." He sighs. "Best to have waited until the morning, but I know my mother-in-law all too well."

"...I think that she might know someone I'm looking for. An old friend. I promise, I mean no harm."

"Well." Vish gestures for Link to follow, and she does. He lets her through the front entrance of the house this time. "Take your boots off by the door." She does, setting her boots beside one small pair and two large; Vish removes his own. "Make yourself at home. I'll be right back."

When Vish leaves, Link does not so much as move.

Though she does breathe. He did not tell her not to breathe.

Link allows herself to explore the foyer with her gaze. Tacked to the walls Link can see hand-drawn pictures done by the clumsy hand of youth. Two small figures with jumbles of red hair beside two taller figures with jumbles of red hair, and a third taller figure with black hair. And Miyu, next to one of the small figures. Another picture depicts a brown horse with a white mane.
Another shows a pasture of cows, with something that looks like a wedge of cheese sticking out of the ground lifting up the cow. As Link squints at this last picture, her stomach grumbles to the tune of the stew in the kitchen yet the thought of Marin Marin Marin keeps Link rooted to the ground.

Purah still lives, however old. And Impa.

Marin could—she might—after all of these years—

Vish returns, holding hands with a heart-faced gerudo woman blinking sleep from her eyes, her frame hidden in loose purple pyjamas, her age—about the same as Vish's—visible in the lines of her face. She yawns. "Oh, I'm sorry. I didn't mean to be rude." For lack of knowing what to do, Link half-bows to the pyjamed woman, who waves dismissively. "You can call me Malon. That's —" Malon gestures through her name, and Link forms the shape in turn. "Thank you for delivering the letter." Link dips her head. "Oh, we haven't talked to our family in Koume in years, huh. All these monsters." Malon opens the envelope. Vish massages her shoulder and she rests her head on his hand. "Her name's Maron...ha! Great minds think alike." She scans the letter.

Link says nothing but waits. She observes the emotions that pass over Malon's features, which resemble Marin's far more than did Romani's: joy, sadness, confusion, contentment, surprise, and then something that Link cannot name, that wrinkles the corners of her eyes and draws her mouth into a line.

After a few minutes of silence, Malon folds the letter again. "My darling told me that you wanted to speak to my mother." Link inclines her head. "If you wouldn't mind waiting until morning comes...then of course you can talk to her. You can have the guest room."

Vish arches an eyebrow. "Do you trust her?"

"Maron trusts her. She says that—" Malon glances back at the letter. "—Link knows Epona's song, or at least part of it. Apparently she lost her memories." Malon covers her hand with her mouth. "Oh, Link, I'm sorry. I didn't mean to talk about you like you weren't here."

Epona.

The name crashes against the inner pillar of her memories and yet for the life of her she cannot draw it free.

"Link?"

She blinks. Malon has taken a step closer. "...how do you know Epona's song?"

"I used to...when I was younger I knew someone from your family. I'm sorry. I lost my memories, and..." Link dips her gaze towards towards her feet to stare at a crack in the wooden floorboards.

"Oh, no, I hope you can remember. It's just that I've certainly never seen you, so I'm worried that you're looking for a cousin or other fragment of our family, not us at Romani Ranch. The name Link does sound familiar..." Link inhales. "Oh, I guess my mother would know the family genealogy better than I would." Malon hmms. "Link...do you mind if I sing to you?"

Link tilts her head to one side. Vish makes nearly the same gesture, and Malon covers her mouth to laugh.

"You only know part of Epona's song, is that right? If I sing the rest to you, that could help jog some of your memories. Since you delivered the letter all the way here, and made supper for Romani—" Vish chuckles and brushes a lock of hair over Malon's ear. "—I could at least do this much for you."

For a moment Link feels her feet lifting from the ground as though the wedge of cheese from the drawings on the walls had mistaken her for a cow. Then the fullness of Malon's words crash upon her. "Thank you," her hands manage to sign where Link herself cannot move.

Malon smiles warmly.

Link's stomach growls. She blushes, and Malon laughs a soft little laugh. "Speaking of supper, let's get you to the kitchen."

Vish, Malon, and Link return to the kitchen, where Link nearly bursts into tears.

The stew.

The stew.

The stew has vanished. Her cooking pot remains, emptied of its contents, but the stew. Oh, the stew-manity! Link runs her hands over the table where the stew once sat before going missing-in-action. She prepares a eulogy and a prayer. For that stew that smelled so wonderfully, for that stew which she did not have the blessing of tasting before it departed, ripped so cruelly fresh, from this world.

Malon hums out a sigh. "I'll put some tea on. Oh, darling, could you handle the tea?"

"Of course, dearest."

She turns towards Link, smoothing the front of her pyjamas. "So, Link, what would you like to eat?"

A blade to the face, though Link does not know the word blade in Faronese. "Anything," she says.

Malon's shoulders shake in silent laughter. "One anything coming right up."

Vish bids Link to sit at the table. While Vish makes them tea, Malon stirs something in a pot and asks Link generally about her life. Link inquires back. About the cow-head hats: a family joke and not an indication of anything resembling what adults wear. About the something called a cremia, the word Link does not know: Malon and Vish exchange glances and burst out together in laughing, affectionately rubbing their shoulders together.

"Cremia is our older daughter," Malon explains, wiping tears from her eyes in a motion remarkably akin to Romani's, "and Romani our younger. There's been a tradition in our family to name our daughters starting with the character Ma for generations...ha! Oh, but my darling and I couldn't think of any good Ma names that hadn't been used. So Cremia and then Romani it was!"

"My dearest thought of plenty of good names," Vish corrects, "but every time we discovered that someone else in the family line already had the name, and my dearest wanted no repeats."

"That's what I already said, darling." Malon touches her nose to his, and Vish laughs, and Link looks down at her hands as her cheeks slowly begin to steam.

Vish sets down three cups of tea, leaves and herbs dark clumps in the bottoms. Link holds the round cup in both hands to inhale the soft fragrance. Beneath the herbal scent she detects a hint of sharpness that drowns her mouth with saliva and rumbles her stomach further.
Malon sets a plate in front of her and Link scarcely has time to register something with meat before she rips and tears into it. Supper at last, no utensils, hands only. Link wrenches the soft beef in half with her own hands and crams entire chunks into her mouth, swallowing the meat down with tea just in time to stuff her cheeks with more. The tender beef falls apart to juiciness in her mouth. The euphony of herb and spice brings her to lick the plate when she finishes until the entire ceramic surface glistens with her saliva.

Her breaths short and shallow, Link lifts her head, wide-eyed, at Malon.

"Seconds?" she asks, and Link has already begun nodding before Malon finishes the word.

Link does not count how much she consumes but soon enough she has a stack of plates beside her taller than herself. She ceases eating more for Malon admitting they have run out of beef in the ice-box than for the filling of her bottomless stomach.

She could still go for more.

"Well then," says Vish, a note of surprise and awe sneaking into his timbre, "I have to hand it to you. I can't remember the last time I was afraid someone might actually eat me out of house and home.'

"Oh, darling, she's a growing girl. Leave her be." Malon winks at Link, who stops licking the last plate long enough to stack it onto the table with the others. "I remember how much I ate when I was around seventeen."

"I'm eighteen," Link notes, "and I can pay if you want."

Vish and Malon shake their heads at once. "Not at all," Vish responds. "You're our guest now. Link, you said her name was, dearest? Right, Link. Well then, Link, if you want to pay for anything, you ought to pay to hear my dearest's most beautiful voice."

"Oh, stop it, darling." Malon's face flushes redder than her hair. "Less flattery, more harp-fetching, if you would."

The harp. Vish carries the harp in both hands. The harp that Link knows all too well. Six strings that he lovingly tunes to the hum of Malon's voice. The swell of red and blue, the paint faded over time but no less beautiful. He strums the harp with a lover's hands, and then nods to Malon.

"I'm ready."

Malon sings.

La na na...la na na...la na na, na na...

The melody carries no words that Link can understand, a tune of far-off harmonies of years upon years of memory, a song passed down from hand to hand and lip to lip, from Marin's mother to Marin to the rest of Marin's family, to Malon who now sings for her.

She remembers the song.

She remembers.

She remembers the village. She remembers the girl who smelled of horses. She remembers the children who looked at her strangely, the boys she did not care to play with and the girls who shunned her. She remembers the whispers to the girl who smelled of horses in the middle of the night, huddling by a campfire in the woods, the secret that she held within her breast for those long years of her life.

She remembers the people of that house. She remembers the loudness of their voices. She remembers her sister, years younger than she, an accident, a surprise, a blessing. She remembers working in the village. She remembers the ranch; she remembers the goats; she remembers the meagre pay. She remembers collecting enough to send Aryll to live with their grandmother, to send Aryll anywhere but in the house with the rafters that shook at night.

She remembers Rusl.

She remembers the blacksmith teaching her how to wield a blade and ride a horse. She remembers the blacksmith offering to make her his courier. She remembers the blacksmith, having gotten himself married, who could no longer make his own deliveries.

She remembers accepting. For the pay. To keep her sister fed. And for no other reason that she could admit to herself.

She remembers.

To Eldin in the north. To Lanayru in the east. To Necluda in the south. To Central Hyrule in the West.

To Central Hyrule.

To the village of Mabe.

The girl with the violet sash, singing to herself in the field, singing to a brown horse with a white mane. She remembers standing, standing, listening for the longest time to the voice of the girl with the violet sash, whose song called the stars to creation and rose the land from the tides.

She remembers delivering something to the girl's mothers. She remembers the girl, learning of her work as a courier, asking her about the entire world, grinning so bright that the sun came in through the window to see what rivalled its light. She remembers the girl telling her of the elixir in spring green.

She remembers.

She remembers the girl telling her her name. Marin. When she signed the name of the girl with the violet sash, she lay her left wrist over her right and curled up her fingers like the wings of a bird in flight.

She remembers the girl with the violet sash gifting her the horse. "Take good care of Epona, will you? What? Why am I giving her to you? You're such a dummy, Link! It's so that you come back quicker with more stories. You're gonna come back for more elixir right? Then you pay in stories. Don't forget to come back or I won't forgive you! Of course I miss you, dummy!"

She remembers the first girl in the entirety of her life save for the girl who smelled of horses who wanted to talk to her, who wanted to be her friend, who wanted her to come back.

She remembers.

She remembers the song.
Mighty Creamy Meat Soup (six hearts, low attack boost for 05:00) - fresh milk, goat butter, mighty thistle, raw meat, rock salt

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Here we see the issues with translating from audibly spoken word to sign language. Link can sign her own name, but she doesn't know how to translate this into audibly spoken word. Usually, Link would get around this limitation by spelling out her name, L-I-N-K, or whatever the alphabet/syllabary of the language allows. However, Link does not know how to read or write Faronese! In the end, Malon learns Link's name by reading Maron's letter, where Maron had to write out Link's name.

Malon, of course, is named after Malon from Ocarina of Time, Oracle of Seasons, Four Swords Adventures, and The Minish Cap, while Romani and Cremia are named after Romani and Cremia from Majora's Mask, which is also the original of the cow's-head mask. Miyu is named after Miyu from Star Fox 2.

Much like how the patron goddess of the gorons, Goro-goro, includes the respectful "doubling" of her name, the patron goddess of the gerudo, Sageru, includes the respectful prefix "sa-" which players of Breath of the Wild will recognise from the gerudo language presented in-game: sa'oiten means good heavens; sav'otta means good morning; and sarqso is a polite way of saying thank-you, among other words presented in-game. In that sense, "Samiyu" is a name that indicates how the family considers Miyu a blessing or sent by the goddess.

In Parapan, the suffix "-do" means "people of" and so "gerudo" literally means "people of (Sa)geru". To this end, the Parapan word for zora is "zolado" and for hylians is "hyiado". The prefix "e-" means "daughter of", and gerudo families in both Parapa and western Faron traditionally use a matronymic, adopting the name of the mother of more powerful or notable rank of status, such that Romani's full name, for example, would be "Emalon Romani", the matronymic being given first. Families and family lines are important to Parapan culture; the virtue of Sageru is the support, loyalty, and love of one's family and friends, which is loosely translated as "blood" or "kinship" into Central Hyrulean. Incidentally, this can lead some children to be very confused when they first learn of goddesses other than Sageru: the name "Erito" sounds like it should mean "daughter of the rito" rather than be the name of their patron goddess! Anyways, ahem, as usual, I think too much about fictional languages.

Writing Romani's dialogue is a lot of fun.

Malon, due to having red hair, is gerudo here, and Vish is hylian. The hylians of Faronese/southern Hyrule generally resemble those from Lurelin Village in Breath of the Wild, hence the dark skin and blue eyes. Cremia and Romani's blue eyes come from Vish's side of the family; Romani and Cremia are thus both gerudo and hylian.

The memories in this chapter give you a bunch of small little glimpses into Link's childhood. We'll explore more of these as we go, but here's your taste of things to come.
Readers who have played Twilight Princess probably already recognise the village that I've lifted to give Link a home. I didn't want to use Hateno, where Link is implied to be from in Breath of the Wild, because 1) frankly I don't like Hateno that much, 2) the location of Link's home village becomes relevant later in Delicious in Wilds, 3) I wanted the village to be something that Link could look for later, rather than right next to Kakariko, and 4) I didn't want Purah right next to it.

Just as I lifted Aryll and Link's grandmother from The Wind Waker, so too have I carefully lifted Link's home village from Twilight Princess. Why that village? Because in my opinion the village from Twilight Princess is the single most grounded and well-developed "birthplace" for Link in the franchise.

midna's ass. 23 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: Romani is really cute! She's kind of a brat but a cute brat.

Her and her family are even more important to the story than they appear.

Link's relationship with Marin is - still - really really nice.

Emma. 23 September 2017.
Chapter Summary

The travelling chef learns of what happened to the girl with the violet sash.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

They offer her the guest bedroom; Link insists on sleeping with Ilia in the barn. The musty scent of hay calms the beat-beat-beating of her heart. She curls up beside Ilia, the tears still fresh on her face, but despite the comforting warmth of her companion beside her the entirety of her frame trembles. The few hours until dawn find her alternating between closing her eyes to try to squeeze out a wink of sleep and staring into the darkness to recall the patterns of red and blue from her memories.

The sound of the six-stringed harp. The call of Marin's voice.

Epona's song. Whatever Epona's song might mean.

Epona.

At last the light filtering through the crack at the top of the barn door silvers, then reddens, then goldens. Link stretches to loosen the tension in her muscles, to crack her spine, to roll her head and shoulders. She rests her forehead against Ilia's.

"I'll be back, girl. Stay safe for me."

Ilia whinnies. Link embraces her companion around the neck.

A young woman about Link's age comes to collect her, bearing the same red hair as Romani and Malon, though the features of her face more closely call to Vish's. "You must be Link," she signs, smiling gently, as though encouraging a filly to take her first few steps into the world. "I'm Romani's older sister, Cremia." Link blushes from recalling her misunderstanding of the word cremia. "Is your wound all right?"

Link blinks.

Cremia taps her right shoulder. Link reaches up to her own and feels the gauze around her skin. She smiles sheepishly. "I've been through much worse, I completely forgot about the arrow."

Cremia brings her hand to her mouth; Link cannot read her expression. "Is tha so? You'll have to tell Romani and Mother of your travels later. They love hearing those stories." She hums to herself. "Would you like to help me milk the cows?"

Link raises her hands to ask about meeting Cremia's grandmother, but she is nothing if not helpful, and the family of Romani Ranch has already given her so much. Cremia demonstrates how to milk. The cows' udders feel damp and slick in a manner that reminds Link uncomfortably of shifting through the entrails of monsters. Where Cremia pumps the teats with an expert hand that splashes milk into the wooden pail at an alarming pace, Link's own efforts reward her with uneven spurts.
and increasingly urgent mooing from the cow. She pats the cow's flank in apology. Link has scarcely finished milking a single cow by the time Cremia has finished off the rest of the row.

"Thank you for your help." Cremia beams warmly and takes the proffered pail from Link, a quarter full. She sets it down near her own three pails, white to the brim. Link glances over at the horses; Cremia nods approvingly. "Would you like to help with them as well? I'd be very grateful."

Link shovels manure out and hay in. Cremia checks on the horses' health as she goes; she goes quietly about her work, meticulous and steady. Occasionally she lifts her hand to her temples and winces. Link could say something, could ask if she needs anything, and yet—as so many times before—Link's hands stay still and silent. She busies herself shovelling harder.

"Has your horse ever been bred before?" Cremia inquires. "She's lovely, you know."

Link tilts her head to one side. "I don't know. I met her in the wilds."

Cremia hums. "You should be careful. It'll be around their mating season soon, and a pregnant mare won't get you far."

"Thank you so much for helping me." Whenever she finishes a sentence, Link observes, Cremia folds her hands in front of her to hold them at rest. "Today is market day, so Mother and Father are out delivering milk. And—" Cremia blushing slightly. "—browsing for this year's studs."

Link could say something, could ask if she needs anything, and yet—as so many times before—Link's hands stay still and silent. She busies herself shovelling harder.

"I'd like to talk to—" Her belly, seemingly at odds with her wishes, reaches up through her throat to throttle her brain. Link hangs her head in defeat. "...yes, please."

Cremia curseys.

Link follows her to the house. Miyu yips at her heels. And where there's dog, there's girl: Romani runs up to Link to jabber about a little of everything in the world, switching topics so rapidly that Link simply bobs her head as the words rebound off of her like rain from waxed leather.

Link offers to help cook breakfast. Cremia rebuffs her. "You're our guest."

Link seats herself at the table and droops her head while Cremia cooks. Romani bounces up and down on the chair beside her. Link catches about one in twenty words—the Faronese too quick for her to understand—but Romani seems to need little encouragement to continue, so long as Link continues looking in her direction.

Without the expectation of having to respond, without the expectation of having to arrange the features of her face appropriately, without the expectation of needing to know just what to say, she can listen and relax into a hylian-shaped puddle on the table.

Cremia produces plates of vegetable curry, not as overwhelmingly hot as those Link has tasted in Eldin, but much meatier and more filling, with a greater variety of spice and a steadier body. Cremia excuses herself with a plate and a cup of tea. Romani wolfs down her portion and continues to chatter at the same time. Somehow she does not choke.

Link whistles her appreciation for Romani's skills at eatery.

Cremia returns after a moment. "Grandmother is awake," she explains, and Link congeals herself back into a person rather than a chuchu absorbing the curry with her face. "Would you like to talk to her?"
Standing up so suddenly that the chair screes out her resounding affirmation, Link nods sharply.

She should have brought flowers.

The same flower that Marin wore in her hair. She has not seen that kind of flower anywhere in her travels but it must exist, somewhere. If the silent princess could yet bloom, then the flower that Marin bore on her left ear must as well.

Somewhere.

Somewhere.

With every step, she can hear the boards of the house creak beneath the weight of a century. With every step, the sweat that dampens the back of her neck clings her undershirt more tightly to her shoulders. With every step, her legs threaten to buckle more and more, until Cremia stops in front of a door at the end of the hall and Link could just about claw off her own face.

The words. The words that have never come to her. Why would they come now if not then, why would she know what to ask, what could she even bring herself to do with the answers? The scent of home has driven her so far, and now, at the end of her journey, she might have naught at all to say, and naught at all to live for after.

Cremia opens the door.

A bedroom. A bedroom with a simple bed taking up the middle of the room, the covers a gentle blue. A window facing north, through which she can see the clouds upon the radiance of the sunlit sky. A nightstand with a pitcher of water and a half-full glass beside it. A pair of fluffed pillows, and the elderly woman sunk into them, her face more a mound of wrinkles than recognisable features, what remains of her hair entirely white, her eyes sunken deep, her pupils barely visible for the refraction of her spectacles, her breath rasping weakly with a sound like rustling leaves.

She has a look about her as though fashioned out of folded paper, or a house of playing cards; that one breath would knock her over and dissipate her ashes to the wind.

Link stands in the doorway. The muscle below her lungs has tautened and she cannot expel her breath. If she stays here, she feels, she might age herself, second on second, minute on minute, day on day, year on year. Century on century.

As though all of the time she has lost would come upon her at once, as though she would drop her blade to rest upon the grass forever more.

Cremia sits by a chair on the right side of the bed. "Grandmother, this is Link. She has come to speak to you. Would you like to talk to her?"

The ancient woman upon the bed raises a trembling hand to adjust her spectacles up on the bridge of her nose. She makes an expression vaguely emulating a smile and Link despises herself for the thread of revulsion that pillars up her throat.

"Link," the woman says, and in that instant of hearing her voice Link knows her not to be Marin. "It can't possibly be."

Link blinks at her.

The woman struggles to sit up. Her skin moves and folds over her frame as though attached to nothing underneath, like a cloak or a bag over bones that shuffles of its own accord. Cremia helps "...do you bear the name—" The ancient woman coughs and Link flinches back. Though age has worn her down, the woman's words bear with them a surprising modicum of strength. "—of a great-grandmother of yours, Link?"

While Link continues to stand, staring, Cremia clears her throat. "Link, would you mind shutting the door?"

Link steps into the room and the sands of time do not crunch their jaws over her spine. Instead she turns to close the door only to find Romani and Miyu looking up at her.

"Can I come in too!? I can right!? Yup yup, bet I can. Grasshopper wouldn't leave the great Romani out of something like this!" Romani skips inside and Miyu pads in behind her.

Cremia lifts her hand to the side of her head to massage her temple. "Link, you can tell her to leave if you want."

Romani pouts. "Oh wow wow wow are you gonna tell me this is some adult-only thing too! Pleeeeaaase Grasshopper? You owe me one!"

For lack of a response Link rolls her shoulders.

"You can come in, then," Cremia tells Romani, who starts to circle the bed, "but please, be quiet, Romani."

"On it!"

The ancient woman on the bed makes a gurgling noise that flinches Link backwards into the closed door. After a moment Link recognises the oscillations in the sound: laughter.

"Romani, Cremia, please leave. Both of you," the woman croaks out, her timbre progressively scratchier, as if a wolfos were raking its claws along her vocal cords every time she spoke. Inclining her head, Cremia rises from the chair and physically hoists Romani over her shoulder out. "Samiyu can stay."

Miyu barks and wags her tail. The ancient woman smiles.

"Come." It takes Link a long minute to realise the woman means her. "Sit down."

Link sits upon the chair warmed by Cremia's back. She says nothing. Her nails dig into her knees through the fabric of her trousers. She looks down upon her feet, her boots left by the entrance to the home.

The woman shifts to look at her. Link trains her gaze even more narrowly upon the floor.

"Do you bear the name of a great-grandmother of yours, Link? Or of someone else in your family?"

Link shakes her head.

"Then...tell me, Link. How do you know of Epona's song?"

She shakes her head again.

The woman stays silent for a moment, and Link's shoulders shake. Then the woman speaks again:
"Do you not know Faronese?"

The back of Link's neck heats up and the fever spreads to her cheeks. Her fingers twitch uncontrollably. She forces herself to count her breaths, in through the nose, out from the mouth.

"I know Faronese," she signs. "A little. I know a little."

"Then talk to me, as you wanted to do."

The tremors up the bones of Link's hands raise the ridge along her inner wrist.

"In that case, excuse an old woman for her rambling." The woman sinks her back into the pillows. "You may call me Maryll." The top of Link's left eyelid twitches; she blinks repeatedly. "My mother knew a girl who bore your same name, and named me after that girl's sister. Mm. I never knew my mother's friend. Ah, but, my mother would tell me so many stories of that friend." Link glances up for a second. The woman has closed her eyes. "It has been...years since I heard my mother's voice. She passed away when I was still young. She had waited to have children, you see, for as long as she could. Mm.

"Ah, not that she didn't want children, but she was waiting for her friend to return.

"She had given her friend many things, and her friend in turn had given her many more. She gave her friend a horse—ah, Link, you're hylian, aren't you? Yes, you must be unfamiliar with the tales of Our Goddess Sageru, who rides a horse spun of lightning, quicker than the wind, stronger than the storm. On Sapona She rides. My mother gave her friend a horse named for the Goddess's: Epona, daughter of Sapona. A tradition in our family handed down, that the horse belonging to the firstborn daughter would bear the name of Epona, and would be taught to respond to our family's song."

Epona's song.

"A song that you know, despite not knowing the origin of the name.

"Our family did not always live in Kotake. Years ago, when my mother was a young girl, they lived in the Hyrule Field, and the ranch was called Lon Lon, after the names of her own two mothers. When the Great Calamity...well, I wasn't born then, but I've heard stories of it. When the Great Calamity burned everything near the castletown, my mother and her family fled and moved here to establish Romani Ranch. Ah, but you already knew that, didn't you?"

Link keeps absolutely silent, absolutely still. Any sound, any motion, any sign of life could wash away the words. She has asked Lady Impa for what happened so many years ago, and only now, months after her awakening, has someone offered to tell her.

"Mm. My mother wanted to know what had happened to her friend, to her friend's sister, to her friend's friend. I know little about the friend's friend, but my mother knew someone in the same village as her. Ordon, I think is what the village was called.

"Ah, but in the chaos after the Great Calamity...no one spoke to anyone. Everyone retreated to the safer patches. The four great cities in the corners of Hyrule had been mostly destroyed, and there was little left of the Hyrule Field but smoulder and ruin. People vanished into villages in shrine-safe valleys that they could defend from monsters.

"Communication from the west to the east side of Hyrule? Unthinkable. Or so my mother told me."

Maryll reaches for the glass of water on the nightstand. She drinks heavily before replacing the glass on the stand.

"Would you be a dear and refill that for me?"

Link springs up in a flash. Her hands shake so badly that she nearly tips the pitcher over, but she steadies herself. She inhales; she exhales; she fills the glass once more, then sits down so swiftly she nearly misses the chair.

"Thank you. Link, no need to fret so. I'm not going anywhere." Maryll rasps out that terrible, terrible gurgle of a laugh. "I've lived this long. Surely I can live another few minutes to ramble on until you've figured what you want to talk to me about.

"Now...where was I?

"Mm. Every year my mother would go back to where the old ranch once stood in the spring. My mother's friend had promised her something, after all, and my mother would wait until her friend could fulfill that promise.

"She waited for years, until her parents passed away. My grandmothers' dying wish had been for my mother to have children and carry on the ranch. And so, my mother married my other mother and had me. She loved her wife and family dearly, make no mistake. Every year, nonetheless, my mother would go back to where Lon Lon once stood, to await her friend.

"For you see, her friend had never come back, yet my mother steadfastly believed to the end that her friend had not perished but would return. She told me that she could almost hear the Goddesses assuring her. My mother marched out to a temple of Hylia—her friend was hylian, you see, though from what I understand her friend bore closer to the faith of the Three than the Seven—and threatened the Goddess with her own two fists that if She didn't protect her friend, my mother would personally see to the Goddess's demise.

"Mm. She was chased out of the temple for that."

Maryll laughs long and loud; abruptly she convulses into coughing. Link stares at her with quickened breath until Maryll calms. The smile the ancient woman has kept up on her lips begins to fade.

"Ah, but the friend...the friend never appeared. And although we worry of the weather, or of monsters, or the natural disasters that may befall, the only inevitability in life is the passage of time. The greediest thing of all, you know. I should think that the Calamity itself is nothing but a manifestation of time.

"...my mother passed away. Even in her final days she held on to that thin thread of hope that her friend would return, and she told me to welcome her friend if this Link ever did. My mother would not believe that her friend had abandoned her, and no matter how much time had passed, she never wanted to lose hope.

"She named me Maryll after her friend's precious sister, and thereafter I named my own daughter Malon after one of my late grandmothers." Maryll winks. "Between you and me, I've never been the creative type. Malon married a wonderful young hylian man from eastern Faron, and she decided that she had had enough of our little 'ma-' tradition, for not finding enough names. And so she bore Cremia, and then Romani, who took on the name of our ranch.

"Mm. What else? My mother told me that her friend...her friend had something important to do. I'm not entirely certain what," Maryll says with a tone that suggests she does know exactly what, and Link stares more intensely than ever at the ground, "but her friend had some sort of destiny to fulfill. My mother believed more than anything that her friend would fulfill this destiny or would die trying. My mother often said that her friend was not the strongest, nor the smartest; she had little in the way of power or wisdom, to be sure." Link blushes to her ears. "But what her friend lacked in the virtues of the Goddess Din or the Goddess Nayru she made up for in her determination and her courage.

"Like an Oracle of Farore, my mother said.

"Even though her friend's birth had not served her friend the best of lives, her friend had done everything she could for my mother, for her own sister, for the friend who lived in Ordon, and never once did she falter.

"Courage, and determination, and kindness. My mother said that her friend was the kindest girl she'd ever met. That her friend could make a new pantheon of Golden Goddesses. Courage. Determination. Kindness."

When Link next makes soup, she'll not need to ask Romani for help with the stove: the flush of her face to the tips of her pointed ears will suffice.

"Ah but the Goddesses are of Courage, of Wisdom, of Power, blessed be Their names. So it goes, and such is life.

"Mm. Quite a story, isn't it? The family history of us here in Kotake."

Maryll nods to herself. Link continues to sit in silence.

"Ah, now, Link. Perhaps you know the answer to the riddle that I've considered all these years. Do you know of whatever happened to my mother's friend?"

The blood that has risen to her cheeks drains to a pale frost. Link sits. The edge of the chair imprints a bow along her thighs. She would weigh words to select those she needs but she has no words to weigh, only the endless chasm across which no words can ever pass.

Marin will never know.

She continues to sit.

Her entire body screams with the need to speak, but all that issues forth: silence.

With Marin, with the girl who smelled of horses, here and there with certain people Link has met on the road, her arms have taken on the freewheeling care of a bird in flight. Somehow, with those people, the words flood from her hands, the riverbanks bursting with all that she need say.

And yet—and yet here, as with the Champions, as with the girl with the golden hair, as with Yunobo in Death Mountain, as with Amali in the Divine Beast Vah Medoh, as with the people to whom Link has desperately wanted to speak, the people whom she has desperately wished to comfort—the words stall, and quiet, and die.

"The friend...was injured. I don't know how the friend was injured, but then...something happened, and the friend went to sleep for a very long time. When the friend awoke, she lost all of her memories." Link hesitated. "And the friend...the friend who lost all of her memories...she didn't remember the promise she had made, and no one told her what was going on. Little by little she remembered, and she...discovered that she had awoke too late. At the moment she awoke, your mother already...your mother already..." She repeats the words again and again until the gestures lose all meaning and she grinds out the repetitive motion.

"...and so the friend could do nothing but realise that she was too late, and that she was no longer the person your mother had known."

"I see. Thank you for telling me your side of the story, Link. If ever you remember how you learned Epona's song, would you tell me?"

Link nods.

Silence.

Her hands shift of her own accord.

"May I ask a question?"

Maryll inclines her head. "Of course you may."

"Her name...was Marin, wasn't it?"

Maryll nods. "Yes, that was my mother. The woman who waited. The villagers would joke that she had become a widow with her wife still alive. My other mother was nothing but understanding her entire life. They had married to care for the ranch and to bear children, and sometimes friendship in such things is enough."

Link repeats the same motion, comforting in that her arms move automatically. "May I ask another question?"

"Of course."

"What...what did the friend promise your mother?"

"Ah, now that's a question, isn't it?" Maryll smiles kindly at Link and Link's heart once more makes a valiant effort at throttling her. "Perhaps you could tell me. What did my mother's friend promise her?"

"The friend..."

A soup. A soup that Marin made for her. Thick, and creamy, and a specialty of Parapa, Marin told her, made from fruit native to the lush greens of northeastern Parapa and the sandier desert of the southwest, that her mothers purchased from merchants passing through Mabe. The family had tried to cultivate these crops alongside the voltfin trout and Tabanch wheat they had brought with them from their home of Koume, yet—unlike trout and wheat—the Parapan fruits had failed to prosper in the milder climes of Central Hyrule, and so the family relied on merchants from Parapa and western Faron. Prickly red pears that sparked with static on her fingertips: voltfruit. Round green fruit that seemed more water than anything else, like natural balloons encased in a hard striped rind: hydromelon. Marin cooked the fruits of Parapa into milk and flour for a creamy, heavy base that warmed Link's belly as little else could.

But the prize of the dish: hearty radish, pink and tender, moulded into the shape of a heart.

A cold soup meant for a hot summer's day. Marin prepared it in the thick of the afternoon heat where the fires of Eldin rolled down the mountains to suffocate the field. In a bowl laden with sapphire around the rim to keep the soup cool.

Link took the bowl in hand and her eyes widened at the sight.

At the pink heart of the radish, a single chunk sliced perfectly thin to float upon the surface of the stew. She raised her head to meet Marin's gaze, and Marin lifted a hand to her blush-heated cheek, a sight in turn pooled all the magma of Death Mountain into Link's face.

They sat next to one another in the shade of the porch outside of the stable. Out in the field Link could see the horses and cows let out for the day, lowing and neighing at one another above the grass green as spring that danced to the tune of the wind.

"Do you remember," Marin whispered, "how we met?"

Did Link ever. The thunderstorm that had raged and the slippery road that ran beside the ranch. How Link had fallen into the lake on foot—this before Marin gave her the horse with the white mane—and the voltfin trout had shocked her into darkness. How she had washed up, unconscious. How she thought she had died for she could hear the choir of the Goddesses, and how the choir of the Goddesses had resolved to the voice of the girl who rescued Link in more ways than either of them possibly could have known.

The girl with the red hair and the blue dress with the violet sash straddling her hips. The girl who spoke of the skies and the seas. The girl whose name resembled a bird in flight.

Marin.

The first girl in the entirety of the world outside of Ordon who had ever loved Link.

"Marin," said Link, with a suddenness that dropped her bowl of stew from her lap. The soup splashed up over the rim to stain her trouser thighs. "Marin."

Marin inhaled. "Are you sick?" she asked anxiously. "Is the soup that awful?"

Link blinked at her, then shook her head. "No, I—I need to tell you something—"

The girl's eyes widened all the more, and she lay her hands on Link's shoulders. "Is the stew so bad you don't want to eat it? I've never seen you not finish eating something."

"No, Marin—" Link shook Marin's hands from her shoulders. "Listen, this is more important than the soup—"

"Something that's more important than food to you!?" Marin covered her mouth with her hand. "What's gotten into you!? Are you dying!?"

Link leaped to her feet. The bowl of stew toppled to the dusty ground and every fibre in her frame yelled at her to pick it up and wolf the soup down but the words had finally come to her fingertips. Closing her eyes to the squelch of stew beneath her boots, Link started to sign with all the speed she could shore up for fear of the rain drying out.

"Marin I've been thinking about this for a long time we met when I was ten years old and it's been years since then so I've been listening to how beautiful your voice has gotten and I know you're always asking me about the places I've been to and I know you want to sing for everyone you can so when my sister grows up and I save up enough money I want to travel the world with you so you can sing to everyone and I'll learn to play the harp better if you want so I'm not useless and I want to see you sing because you light the room so much I keep thinking I'm looking at the sun and I don't know I think that everyone in Hyrule and outside of Hyrule and everywhere should hear your voice and would you travel with me someday I promise I won't be useless I promise I'll do everything I can I promise I'll—"

Warmth.
Arms around her neck and shoulders. The heat of Marin's body pressed against her, shoulder to shoulder, hip to hip, as Marin embraced her tightly, her breath warm on the outer shell of Link's ear as she whispered.

"You really are a dummy. You make me happier than anyone else. I've spent my whole life hopping from farm to farm; all I've wanted is to see Hyrule, and the rest of the world, with my own eyes and walk it with my own feet. And sing for everyone I can. I don't just want to sing for the travellers who pass through here. I want to sing until I make the whole world smile, if that's what I can do for this world that's done so much for me." The corners of Link's eyes welled with wetness. "And you, dummy...you'd be willing to travel with me. And you'll come back home with me after we see the world, won't you?" Link could only nod her chin on Marin's shoulder; she felt the curve of Marin's smile against her cheek. "Dummy, you don't need to make yourself useful to me because you're already everything to me. Do you promise you'll see the world with me one day?"

She promised.

"And do you promise we'll come home at the end of it all?"

She promised, even more fervently than before.

"I'll hold you to that. Even if something happens and you can't make it back for a long long time—don't ever forget me. Or I'll never forgive you."

Link traced the letters into the back of Marin's hand that she could not bring herself to sign, and she could feel the heat of Marin's blush against her own cheek.

"I love you too, dummy."

...who had ever loved Link.

She sits. She sits, and she trembles, and she feels the tears press in at the backs of her eyes, and she cries, and she bawls, and she curls up on the chair by the side of the bed as the understanding of all that she has lost wracks through her in waves.

"Link," says Maryll, her voice so quiet that for a moment Link wonders if she has hallucinated. "...I hope you know how much my mother loved you."

Link presses the heels of her palms into her eyes.

She does.

She knows.

She remembers.

—

Creamy Heart Soup (ten hearts) - fresh milk, hearty radish, hydromelon, Tabantha wheat, voltfruit

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: It has been a very long time since Link first awoke without even a name.

People move on. People die. One hundred years is both a long time and not long enough. While Impa and Purah might have lived longer than the vast majority of people will, not everyone is like that. And while Impa and Purah have kept themselves alive by not doing much of anything except sitting in one spot and letting other people do the work for them, Marin would never be that kind of person. Marin prefers quality of life over quantity of life. And she did have a good life. She may have never been able to achieve her dream of singing for everyone in the world because she had promises and obligations, and because the world crawled with monsters that destroyed the Hyrule she longed to sing for, but she did have a good life.

And now Link has found Marin's family again. She did promise, after all, that she would come back home to Marin after she finished her adventures.

Epona is a very common name for horses in southwestern Hyrule! It's kind of like naming your dog "Spot" or "Buddy" (where I'm from, the most popular name for a dog is "Шарик"). Similarly, the most common name for pet birds is Etori (Sageru's hawk in the legends is named Satori, which Mount Satori was named after, and is associated with wisdom, benevolence, and protection). Indeed, this association with protection and wisdom is so well-known in Hyrule that Princess Zelda's full name (Zelda Satoru Miyahon Harkinian) includes the middle name of Satoru, with the "-ru" ending, like at the end of Nabooru's name, being a declension indicating a girl's name, not unlike the real-world "-ko" in Japanese.

Of course, the out-of-universe reason for Zelda's full name is that I wished to pay homage to Satoru Iwata, after which Mount Satori was named. Miyahon, for those curious, comes from Shigeru Miyamoto's name in the credits of The Legend of Zelda, where he is credited as "S. Miyahon"; being credited under a pseudonym was common in those days to avoid talented employees from being stolen by other companies. In-universe, "Miyahon" is a sheikah name, being a famous historical orator from Necluda similarly associated with wisdom, in this case of rhetoric. But, uh, that's not relevant to the current chapter. Whoops, got away from myself there. Ahem.

Aryll from The Wind Waker was originally going to be named Maryll. Hence, the name Maryll, named after Aryll. Marin had other daughters, not only Maryll, but those have moved away per tradition and are the "cousins" that Malon mentioned in a previous chapter.

Marin's family brought various crops with them when they went to the village of Mabe. The idea of Mabe was to attempt to bring various Faronese, Tabanch, and Parapan crops and animals closer to the heart of Hyrule for easy shipping and transport. Some of these things worked, like wheat and trout; others, like hydromelon and voltfruit, did not. Creamy heart soup is a recipe that in-game Link learns in Gerudo Town, so I thought it appropriate to make the dish a Parapan specialty in Delicious in Wilds.

Link rambling when anxious is something that you've already seen a few times and something that you'll see again in the future. Poor girl has a bit of an on-off switch when it comes to talking: either she struggles with saying anything or the floodgates come out all at once.
Marin calling Link the kindest girl she's ever known is a direct reference to Link's Awakening. Kindness being a virtue is also a reference to Majora's Mask, where you have four virtues referenced: courage, wisdom, power, and kindness.

I don't much like writing chapters where it's just someone telling Link a story. Sadly there are a few chapters like that throughout Delicious in Wilds because I couldn't conceive of a different way to divulge the information, and there's something very important about the act of sharing stories anyhow. I hope that I've made the chapter interesting enough despite it being mostly people talking. We'll get back to the adventure soon enough!

I'm being light-hearted, but this chapter took quite a bit out of me. If you've ever experienced loss, I truly and honestly wish you the best.

Next time: Link becomes a ranchhand.

Thank you kindly for reading, and thank you to my beta reader for everything that she has done for me.

Beta reader's comments: This is one of my favourite chapters in the series, perhaps my single favourite. I'm not sure what I can even say about it that isn't just felt. It made me bawl my eyes out, and feel nostalgia and loss for something I never even had. It's special.

Emma. 24 September 2017.
Energising Honey Crepe

Chapter Summary

The no-longer-travelling chef winters in Romani Ranch. The snowy months give the chef much time to think and to feel. When a certain guard from Kakariko chances upon the village of Kotake, the chef faces a decision of destiny.

Chapter Notes

As with some of my other chapters, here's some non-spoilery author's notes that couldn't make it into the author's notes at the end, because I write too much:

Sea lily's bells (Marin's favourite flower), of course, is a reference to one of the Instruments of the Sirens in Link's Awakening.

Tantari Desert is named after Tantari Desert from The Adventure of Link.

Ingo, the man to whom Maryll nearly lost Romani Ranch through too much gambling, is a reference to Ingo of Ocarina of Time.

Takkuri (the monsters that Link and Romani fight) are enemies from Majora's Mask, Oracle of Seasons, and The Minish Cap.

Postman's tendon is the Hyrule version of the Achilles tendon, named after the constantly-running postmen of Majora's Mask, Oracle of Ages, The Minish Cap and Twilight Princess.

She does not leave Romani Ranch.

She cannot know if Maryll spoke to Malon and Vish, or if they themselves draw patience from a well as bottomless as her stomach for food, yet somehow she slips between the cracks of having to deliver a letter back to Koume. She prays to whomever might hear her—whatever Goddesses, Three or Seven, that she has forgotten—that Maryll not tell Malon and Vish of her identity.

If Maryll knows.

Vish and Malon give no indication. They call her a friend of the family on Maryll's word and say little else.

She helps around the ranch instead, with whatever the family needs. As the winter ever so slowly begins to die down and the spring ever so slowly begins to bloom, with planting and mating seasons swelling, the blossoming flowers in the field sweetening the air with their saccharine scents, their whispers of come to life, their intoxicating promise of new life, the ranch grows busy. She learns to milk the cows without spending the entirety of the day. She learns to collect how to collect the urine of horses. She learns to gather the eggs from the henhouse without disturbing the careful pecking order established by the cucco. She learns how to facilitate in calming the horses during mating; she discovers that oftentimes while the chosen stud takes the mare from behind, they bring in another horse—a horse the mare knows, a horse from the ranch rather than a stranger —to caress the mare from the front, to set the mood as Malon calls it and to keep the mare tranquil.
She prefers the afterwards: the cleaning of the horses, the mixing of feed, the soft wordless praise, the brewing of spring green elixir, the preparation of liquored milk in saddlebags tied to horses' backs to ferment.

She buries herself in the manual nature of the work over the entirety of winter. Her wounds heal.
Her muscles strengthen. She carries boxes, cleans out stalls, does the lifting of hay, assists with the plowing of the fields. One morning upon Vish's comment she strips the paint from the entire outside of the stable then repaints it from top to bottom. In the slow even strokes of the brush, she need not be herself. She could be anyone. And in that moment her self rests upon the back and forth of the paint.

She does not speak.

She cooks. Day by day over those months she spends at the ranch, she takes over cooking for the family. They teach her recipes and she takes them to heart. If she has precious little memory for anything else, she knows the cooking of food. Curries and risottos, pies and stews, skewers of meat and the sweetest of desserts. She cooks for the cows and horses as well. Treats of oats, honey and molasses, of carrot and apple, of steamed fresh vegetables lightly salted.

She has no pumpkins. If she did, she would even them out and roast them as the girl in her memories—

The girl in the memories of the person whom no longer exists.

Romani poses question after question of her travels, but she stays quiet. Without a hint of discouragement, Romani merely continues to regale her with stories of her great triumphs against Them, who visit the ranch every once in a while in a great swarm to take the cows. Romani enlists her aid. In the afternoons she practises archery with Romani until the two of the tire and she cooks supper. No longer does Romani stay up at night to use strangers as target practise but goes to sleep after extracting a promise for more practise against Them on the morrow.

"Finally!" Romani crows over dinner, while Malon asks Romani how her day has gone. "Someone believes me about Them!"

After Romani has marched off to her room, Malon stops by the kitchen to help clean the dishes and to thank her.

She says nothing.

Her body weighs with the burden of her mistakes and her sins.

The physical exhaustion of constant work from morning to night keeps her busy. Her muscles ache.
The fatigue keeps the fog steady over her eyes. The instant she lies down upon the mat in the stable by Ilia's side, her body craves sleep. No time to gaze upon the ceiling and remember wisps of a stranger's life, or even to consider her own since she awoke in the Shrine of Resurrection.

Somewhere under the surface she can hear the faintest of voices, the blurriest of words, characters in a language whose name she does not know. Her horse's name. Not Ilia, but Epona. But then who was Ilia?
She closes her eyes and a dreamless sleep takes her.

When she does dream, she dreams of food and little else, food that she makes herself the day after. She does not experiment. She does not try out something new.

She makes the same foods day in and day out, the dishes and platters asked for by Vish, by Malon, by Cremia and Romani, by Miyu lounging at her feet, by Maryll when one of the others pass on the old woman's wishes.

Maryll has nothing but kindness for her. She avoids the old woman as much as she can yet no one bothers her of it; the rest of the family spends frequent time with Maryll, talking, laughing, playing games, speaking of the family's history, enjoying the time that they have.

She turns away. She cooks. She eats. She sleeps.

She remembers nothing but what happened the day before. She remembers nothing but the basest strenuous connections of the people around her. She remembers nothing of herself.

If she could melt away to become a faceless character in the story of the family of Romani Ranch—a stagehand dressed in black, fit simply to draw the curtains and arrange the props—she would.

She tries, very hard, yet her facial features greet her every morning in the lake.

She takes her existence one day at a time. She awakens early, early in the morning, to take Ilia on a morning ride and to bathe herself in the cold waters of the lake in the nearby forests upon the rise of the mountain. She rides Ilia back to prepare breakfast, oftentimes alongside Cremia, or Malon, or Vish, or whoever has decided to start before she comes, more often Cremia than the rest. She and Cremia work in the easy space of silence. Sometimes Cremia will grip the counter, will lift her hand to her temple, will wince fit to break her concentration, and then she will take step in to take over whatever Cremia was cooking at the time.

She turns out the horses, the cows, the cucco to graze the fields. She assists with the daily routines of eggs and milk and the cleaning of the henhouse and the barn. She weeds and waters the field of wheat. Exactly which she does changes day by day with the needs of the family. She takes on most any task assigned her. When her hands idle she asks, and she asks, and she asks, and they give her work, and she works until her eyes blur and her head spins and her bones ache to the marrow.

At night, on occasion, she observes the aurora over the mountain. At night, on occasion, that murmur of curiosity casts her gaze upon the mountaintop. At night, on occasion, she cleans the stalls of the barn over again despite the lack of need, sweeps the floor of the barn, exhausts herself to the brink of fainting.

She sleeps, and she forgets, in the nepenthe of her own fatigue.

Vish invites her to help with the market. She goes, once. The villagers of Kotake treat her warmly and kindly: mostly gerudo of Parapa and Faron, with sizeable minorities of Faronese hylians and Tabanch rito, and many who bear both red hair and pointed ears. She aids with setting up their weekly stall to sell their wares: elixir and milk, butter and eggs, the last of the wheat from the previous harvest, offerings of foals and calves in preparation for the mating season.

While Malon minds the stall, Vish goes shopping. Malon bids her to rest in a stool at the back to heft up barrels and crates as necessary, to bring out boxes from the back. Malon introduces her—not by name, which brings her to relax her shoulders in relief—as a friend of the family who has come to help out at the ranch. Malon fields any questions and diverts customers instead to the promises of spring. "You know we rear the very best young cows—and horses—in the whole valley. You might as well reserve one now. We've never had an ill batch."

Still the villagers display a certain curiosity about her. Less of her foreign appearance—Kotake has plenty of hylians, though of the darker complexion of southern Faron than the lighter more common to Necluda and Akkala, according to Malon—and more of the scars and bruises that criss-cross her body as rivers do the land.

The scratches and burns that have permanently marked her face bring her to draw up her hood to avoid attention, but those on her bare hands attract questions nonetheless.

Despite the discomfort of curious gazes, she sinks herself into the process of being useful to someone. Malon thanks her. The customers thank her. She pulls up a barrel of milk for one, pours some into a jug for another, brings up a small box of vials of spring green elixir for one young girl who blushes at her, and a crate for rito who winks at her and tells her much obliged.

When the afternoon grows warm, the marketplace closes for an hour or so. Malon treats her to an icy glass of sweetened milk. "Oh, Link, could you mind the stall for a few minutes? I'm going to check up on my darling."

So she sits at the back of the stall with the glass of milk. It leaves a white froth upon her upper lip that she laps up with her tongue. Passersby converse to themselves. She tries not to eavesdrop; nonetheless she catches snatches of conversation.

Someone planning birthday festivities for a parent. Another concerned about what the more recent encroachment of monsters might mean for the harvest. A recent wedding, and talks of what to gift the brides. The best kind of saddle for a horse with a slightly weaker heart than their siblings. What to make for dinner. A love triangle involving some rito boy who has caught the attention of nearly every girl and boy in the village, evidently more out of a spirit of competition than from wanting a relationship. A merchant passing by with fish from Lanayru and whether they can trust her wares. A travelling musician spotted upwards on the road who might make his rounds to Kotake. Two women discussing rumours of a Divine Beast. The Divine Beast Vah Medoh, she hears, flying around Medli, once more under the control of the city's inhabitants. One of the women worries a bruise onto her lower lip. At the spread of the Tantari Desert; at the family the woman has in southern Parapa, possibly in danger; at the thunder-sand storms that have raged across Parapa for the better part of the last year with no signs of abating.

The Divine Beast Vah Naboris.

Malon finds her sitting behind the stall, her knees tucked up under her chin, her spine curved to the point of pain.

She more senses than sees Malon crouch down beside her, more senses than feels Malon's arm around her shoulders. "Link? Oh, Link, did something happen?"

She shakes her head.

She does not help with the market again.

The winter continues to loosen its hold over the earth. She helps in soothing the studs come to bred the mares; milks the cows and carries the great wooden buckets from barn to house; churns butter until her hands ache; cleans the stalls of droppings and rotted hay; cooks every morning and every night; rises with the downwards curve of the moon and beds herself at the zenith.
On the first night that sees the pond not freeze over with the drop of the sun, Malon catches her before she piles into the hay by Ilia's side. The straw leaves scratches on her bare wrists and weaves into her hair at night. Sitting her down on a stool in the barn, Malon takes a brush to her hair to work out the sweat-caked knots and comb out the hay. Though Malon works carefully, she feels the comb-tugged hair pull painfully on her scalp.

"Oh, Link. You know that you don't have to sleep here in the barn, don't you?"

The brush susurrures through her hair. The crown of her head tingles and twinges.

"...maybe I should hold my horses...ha! Do you like it better here? Or are you worried about your horse?"

The slightest downwards tilt of her chain.

"Oh, Link, are you worried about being a burden on us?"

Her fingers tense against her knees, the nails leaving marks through the fabric of her trousers. The brushing does not slow. The slow rhythm of Malon's hands matches the even breaths of her words.

"You're not a burden, Link." The lulling softness of Malon's voice washes over and over the distant shore. "You think I haven't seen you working harder than anyone else? You think I haven't seen you bottling up your pain? I know you were in mourning, but it's gone past that, hasn't it?"

Despite her biting the side of her tongue and trying to tighten her muscle, her shoulders have started to shiver. Malon says nothing, and then continues to say nothing for a moment so long that the silence wraps its fingers around the hollow of her throat to choke ther, to strangle her, to squeeze the very last and dying breath—

"Oh, Link. I'm probably completely wrong about you. I can only think of about how I was when I was younger." Her spine arches forward, her shoulder blades rising up as if to protect her own throat. She hears Malon humming behind her. Every syllable tightens its hold around her throat with the grace of a song. "...when I was younger, I never talked about myself because I didn't want to burden others. I saw what my mothers were going through after the Great Calamity; I thought it was best if I stayed quiet. I never reached out, because I felt like I never knew what to say, and saying nothing at all was better than saying something wrong.

"I thought that if I lived my life in helpful silence, the people around me would accept me."

Malon's speech remains as soft and lulling as ever, her fingers continuing on the same rhythmic pace that her heart has started to match in its slow and and steady beats. "They wouldn't leave me. When people left anyway, I couldn't understand why. Then I realised..."

Malon starts to unweave a knot of hair, the motions tugging on her scalp. The suddenness of the pain makes her wince.

"I said to myself: 'But that's selfish, too, isn't it? You tell yourself that you won't reach out for the sake of others. You're afraid of being a burden, not because you don't want to burden people, but because you're afraid that they'll hurt or leave you if you do burden them. You can't just be an island.' Well, of course I couldn't be an island: I've never even seen the ocean...ha!"

Malon slackens the knot in her hair to move down further. She senses the vibrations of Malon's lilting singer's voice resonating against the back of her head.

"Oh, but you've had enough about me blabbering on about myself I'm sure. Mm. You know, Link. This world will not fall into place for you, yet if I've gleaned anything about you at all, you don't seem the sort of person satisfied with letting life slip uneventfully past you. You've an adventurous streak." The stiffness of her back threatens to snap her own spine in half. "Oh, Link, I don't think you could sit still for too long if you tried. What do I know, though? You haven't said a word to any of us." The bones rooting her to the stool ache in her tautened trembling, like a metal coil shivering from being wound too tight. "You don't have to. Oh, Link, you know that we're not going to kick you out, even if you decided to spend all day lying in the straw, don't you? If you do want to talk, and if you feel like you can, you should. That's all I wanted to say. Oh, but listen to me go on and on about my own life! You needn't pay attention to the prattle of an old woman like me...ha!"

She feels Malon smoothing out the locks of her hair, the brush tucked under Malon's arm.

"Your hair's a very pretty colour, Link. I think you'd look nice in a sundress. Well, thank you for all of your hard work. You're welcome here any time, whether you work or not. And we have a spare room in the house I've already prepared for you. Oh, you can sleep out here if you like. Just don't let it be because you think you're a burden." Malon pats the back of her head. "There. That should do the trick. Thank you for letting me disturb your sleep."

As Malon moves away from the stool, she watches Malon take a moment to comb through Ilia's mane and brush a palm over Ilia's forehead.

She can feel a ghost of the velveteen fur Malon must sense in her hand.

"Thanks for taking care of Link," Malon whispers, "from me, and from Mother, and from Grandmother, too."

For a moment Malon stands silhouetted in the doorway to the barn.

"Good night."

Then the door closes quietly behind her, and once again she is alone, adrift.

She withdraws the blue hairband that she has kept with her since the Great Plateau. Holding the band in her mouth, she reaches behind her to collect her hair into a ponytail save for the sidelocks that fall over her ears.

When she curls up beside Ilia, her companion licks her freshly brushed hair. She closes her eyes and rubs her shoulder against Ilia's hoof.

What would Marin have seen in her? What would...

The hay pokes into her cheek.

Maybe if she sticks her head in the straw again, Malon will brush her hair. Maybe if she asks, Malon will brush her hair, straw or no.

Maybe she could ask.

Days turn to weeks. Malon's voice settles through the sediments of her skin to cement into her bones. The mares and cows swell up with new life, and she works ever more diligently to keep the stable clean and warm, to keep the mothers-to-be safe and fed.

Weeks turn to months. She learns of Vish's childhood in Lurelin, of how Vish sends back rupees to his parents every month and visits them twice a year, of how Vish as a lad wanted to see the world and became a courier only to recognise that he did not have in him the violence necessary to walk those dangerous roads, of how Vish delivered a letter to Kotake on what would have been his last trip and recognised that he also did not have in him the ability to never see Malon again, whom he had seen time and time again on his courier duties, with whom—he recognised—he had fallen in love. She learns of Vish's earlier struggles to assimilate into Faronese gerudo culture. She learns of him learning the harp initially to impress Malon yet taking to the instrument as an art in due time. She learns of Vish's fear of insects and of Vish's delight in cows, his favourite animal; she catches him mooing to them in communion one winter morning, and she learns of how he swiftly adjusts his collar and fixes his hair when embarrassed. She learns of Vish's adoration of the simple pleasures in life: "Nothing like a slice of beef on bread. What more could a man ask for?"

She learns of Maryll's deftness with card games and with horseriding, of how Maryll became the local gambling queen in her youth, of how Maryll once lost the ranch to a man named Ingo in a stupor of drunken betting but won it back the following night. She learns of the tension between Malon and Maryll in Malon's youth, a tension that has tempered to tenderness as Maryll ceased her wilder escapades.

She learns of Malon mostly taking care of the ranch herself as a child, of Malon's younger sisters marrying out of the family and moving away, of the checkbooks balanced and the finances accounted for. She learns of Malon shouldering every burden, of Malon terrified of speaking to people, of Malon more concerned with keeping the dilapidated ranch to the family's name than ever confronting her own feelings. She learns of Malon's realisation in morning—nineteen years of age and without a single friend—that life could not go on. She learns of Malon's steady fight against herself to furl outwards instead of inwards, to study how to communicate with people, to learn to love. She learns of the wide-eyed courier boy who came to see Malon sing every time he stopped by Kotake, of the romantic idealism in his eyes that could take the pond by the ranch and drew it out into an ocean vaster than the horizon, of Malon marrying later than most but no less happily. She learns of Malon's thrice-daily ritual of prayer that Cremia, too, follows. She learns of Malon's adoration of song and of music, of the way Malon tucks her hair behind her ears before she starts to sing, of that same singing that kept Malon's heart beating those first nineteen years of her life. She learns of Malon keeping not merely the records of songs about the ancient heroes—popular as those ballads are—yet also those about the histories of the world. She learns of Malon writing her own tunes, adaptations of stories picked up from book-peddlers, that speak not of heroes but of farmers and herders, of sailors and tailors, of bakers and candlestick-makers. She learns of how gently Malon scoops a handful of earth into her palm to breathe in the fragrance of the coming spring. She learns of the tenderness with which Malon cares for the pregnant mares and cows. She learns of Malon's fondness for baby cucco and of her tendency to jump at thunder. She learns of Malon's worries that she has not raised her daughters as well as she could, of Cremia's anxiety and own sense that Cremia must shoulder burdens to ease Malon's. She learns of how much Malon loves her family; she learns of how much Malon loves the people of this world; she learns of how much Malon loves her cooking.

She learns of Cremia's secret room into which Cremia disappears for hours at a time, which Cremia makes her promise never to enter without Cremia's permission. She learns of Cremia's frequent migraines, worsened in the cold of the winter months. She learns of the way Cremia seems to know everyone in the village—of how Cremia prepares birthday gifts and holiday pies nearly every week, of how Cremia keeps a calendar of weddings and births and celebrations—yet prefers to stay with the cows and the horses, to whom Cremia signs out the stories of her life. She learns of Cremia's love of darners. She learns of Cremia's fear of causing trouble for anyone, of Cremia's worry of bothering people. She learns of Cremia's stutter as a young girl, so anxiety-inducing that Cremia switched to using sign language and never looked back. She learns of Cremia's terror at the sight of human blood. She learns of Cremia's laughter at the sight of Romani's antics, even if Cremia would never let Romani know that. She learns of Cremia's secret anxiety in the dead of the frost-feathered night when the family stays awake to nurse a Romani fallen ill with fever, "Sometimes I think I need Romani more than she'll ever need me." She learns of Cremia's horse, not named Epona, but Elsi. "Since I wasn't named in the 'ma-' tradition of the rest of the family," Cremia explains, gaze averted, "I hoped it would be all right for me to name Elsi outside of tradition as well."

She learns of Romani, who reads voraciously every book from every peddler who comes by Kotake, who shares with her all of the stories she glean's from the pages in Faronese, in Parapan, in Tabanch. She learns of Romani's love of language, of how many late nights Vish has spent with his daughter teaching himself and her the tongues of the world. She learns of how her own heart clenches when she sees Romani lick the tip of her forefinger to flip the page of the book—some left-to-right, most right-to-left—for reasons that she cannot fathom. She learns of Romani trying her darndest to make Cremia see her as the adult Romani feels she is, of Romani wanting nothing more than Cremia's approval, for everything that Cremia has done for Romani. She learns of Romani's belief in a mysterious entity known as Them comes to abduct the cows, who practises her archery in anticipation of the arrival of Them. She learns of Cremia's assurance that no such Them exist, that the family has never noticed tracks of any sort near the cows, although some do go missing in the winter months. She learns of the very real murder of gleaming-eyed takkuri that roosts on the Satori mountainside which swoop down at night to carry whole cows aloft. She learns of Romani's very real skill with the bow. She learns of Malon and Vish's worry when she and Romani take an excursion to the mountain. She learns of how takkuri nests smell when lit ablaze, and she learns of Romani's whole-body laughter as the girl stands, arms outstretched, amid the inferno, shouting to the heavens that Romani knew They existed! She learns of Cremia, Vish, and Malon's grace in admitting their errors, in apologising for not having believed Romani, and she learns of Maryll's bemusement. "Mm. Well, you should always listen to the young."

She learns, more than anything, their favourite dishes. She learns of Romani's favoured pancakes and voltfruit muffins, of Cremia's favoured honey-glazed calf, of Maryll's old-age-favoured bread soaked in milk, of Malon's favoured clove-spiced buttered apples, of of Vish's favoured blueshell paella—a little taste of home, he tells her.

She learns how they like their meats cooked, when they take their meals, how frequently she should serve sides and what sorts. Day by day she prepares more of their food; day by day she takes over the kitchen; day by day she becomes not merely a guest but a fixture of the home. "The quickest way to someone's hearth is through their kitchen," Malon jokes. "I'd say the quickest way to someone's heart is through their stomach, but you've already got that part down pat."

She says nothing in response. "I can see you smiling, you know."

Months turn to seasons. When the last of the snows have melted into the earth; when she rises and the water in the washbasin no longer reflects a thin skin of ice; when the farmers she can see in the fields behind and beyond the ranch break up the cold soil to furrow the spring wheat; when the sharp-dry crispness of winter's scent gives way to the earthy-sweet wetness of spring; when she feels the northward wind quicken the beat of her heart with the promise of adventure that she chokes down into the thick of her belly; when the spring merchants come from the eastern realms of the land once known as Hyrule, Vish brings home a jar of honeycomb. "Worth every rupee," he says as Romani dances around the kitchen and Cremia beams, "just to see how bright my girls look tonight. Should help with your headaches, too, Cremia."

Cremia's smile fades. "You don't have to worry about me, Father."
"Well then, what should we make with it?" Vish inquires.

While the family talks, the 'family friend of the ranch' quietly moves to the counter and begins to wash out dishes, pots and pans in preparation for whatever lunch they intend to make. She listens to Romani demand pancakes, and she listen to Cremia agree. "Would you mind drizzling them with honey, Link?" Cremia asks of her.

She nods and chalks up a victory to herself: Marin's family acquiesces to her cooking.

"...and, would you mind if I help?" Cremia offers her a smile. "I don't want you to do all the work yourself, Link."

She nods. She whisks cucco eggs while Cremia removes a pan of dried sugar—having been boiled and cooled from sugarcane several nights ago—to add in. Then a splash of cow's milk from that morning’s milking. A pinch of rock salt to temper the sweetness, and a hint of oil. And, last but not least, sufficient flour ground from Tabanch wheat to thicken the batter and two spoonfuls of aerated salt.

"Is it called aerated salt because the rito use it?" she asks.

Cremia raises her eyebrows. "I think that's the first time I've heard you say so many words in one sentence since the first day I met you." She feels the heat rise in her cheeks. She starts to shake her head but Cremia touches her wrist. "No, no. I'm glad to hear you talking. I hope you talk to me more in the future, if you would like to. Aerated salt...is that so? I didn't know it had anything to do with the rito."

"They seem so...air-y...I thought it was..." She shakes her head again and goes back to making the pancakes. Whisking. Whisking, whisking, whisking, until every muscle in her body primes its focus on the motion of her hand. Whisk, whisk, whisk.

She shows Cremia how to make a piping bag as Amali showed her in Medli. She packs in a small amount of the batter; Cremia watches her curiously all the while.

"...trust me," she says, and Cremia nods.

"I do. You're the travelling chef, not me."

She has heard Cremia speak more to her in the past few minutes than she has in the preceding week, and for the first time in that week the corners of her mouth could almost, almost ghost an upwards crescent, to paint the warmth in her chest onto the features of her face.

Food, more than anything, brings people together.

Pouring another splash of milk into the remainder of the batter, she whisks away until her hand feels fit to fall off, then sets the batter aside. She cuts off the tip of the piping bag and proffers it like a religious sacrifice to Cremia.

"Could you...draw a dog's face?" Cremia stares at her. She rubs the back of her head and nods at Miyu, curled up around Romani's shoulders. "I'm no artist." Link has heard Cremia speak, once or twice, of a certain artistic inclination, but nothing more.

"Is that so? I wouldn't call myself an artist either. And certainly not a painter. I'm not that good. Still, if it's for Romani's sake..." Cremia takes the piping bag. Her eyes narrowing in her concentration, her shoulders set as though off to face the most terrifying of Malices with her own two hands. On the cool metal of the saucepan Cremia draws in the face, grimaces to herself, wipes it off, and tries again. She leans over to watch Cremia work. Slowly but steadily the form of the cat-like dog takes shape. "Would you like me to draw in the ears too?"

She signals Cremia a negative. Instead she lights the wood-fired stove to heat up the pan. The batter sizzles. Once the batter from piping bag has begun to golden, she pours in some of the batter set aside, the batter with a higher content of milk, to make a roughly round face for the pancake-Miyu. With a spoon she curves the edges into a longer, more angular face to fit the dog's snout, and paints the shape of Miyu's long upturned ears. When the pancake dimples, she flips it over for the other side. Miyu's face gazes up at her from the saucepan.

She removes the pancake. While Cremia draws another, she whisks cow's butter together with milk, adding in the milk drop by drop, until the icing beats clean and smooth. Cremia stacks three pancakes on each plate: for herself, for Romani, for Malon, for Vish, for Maryll, for Miyu, and for the travelling chef.

She draws a snout of butter onto the first pancake of each plate, then fits a piping bag with honey. The honey does not flow as thickly as the whipped butter and she squanders more pancakes than she paints, but eventually she manages to figure out how to grip her wrist and constrict the opening of the piping bag just so that the honey squeezes out in a somewhat controlled manner. Upon the pancakes and the white butter, she draws in Miyu's stripes with honey.

Cremia powders sugar over the dog-pancakes' ears and the whites of their eyes. She curves her middle and forefinger to show her appreciation.

Together, she and Cremia present the pancakes. Malon excuses herself to bring a platter of pancakes to Maryll. She and Cremia wait for her return. Miyu barks and wags her tail. She spins the plates on her fingers. Vish lifts up his hands as if expecting them to fall, but no pancakes end up on anyone's head. With her tongue poking out of the corner of her mouth, she flips the plates up and slides them spinning along the table, to Malon, to Vish, to the empty seat for Cremia, to the empty seat for herself, and to Miyu, who snaps up the pancakes and swallows them down.

She holds the final plate in her hand. Romani, sitting in a higher seat than the rest, slaps her palms on the counter and puffs her cheeks out at her.

She grins at Romani.

"Mama, tell Grasshopper to stop bullying me!"

Malon's shoulders shake in silent laughter.

She spins Romani's plate, rotates it about on her finger, and then dances it along the rim of the table until it slows to a stop just off centre of Romani.

Romani looks down at the plate.

She leans inwards to watch the girl's expression carefully.

Romani's pupils dilate, the blue of her irises darkening to black; her nostrils flare out; the colour rises along the brown of her cheeks; her mouth drops open. Romani's head snaps up.

She and Cremia glance at one another with accompanying smiles.

And then Romani bursts into tears, taking her aback. Malon reaches out a hand to comfort Romani but Romani shakes her off. "How am I supposed to eat Miyu!?" the girl wails. "I love Miyu! I can't eat her! Miyu's the best and how am I supposed to eat her! Waaaaaaaah!"

"Romani..." Vish stands from his seat to cross around the table towards his daughter. "It's only a pancake. Look, Miyu ate hers."

"Buuuuuut what if Miyu thinks that I'd eat her, then!" Romani sniffs. "I don't want her to hate me! Oh wow wow wow I'd die if she hated me! Y'know Miyu has feelings too!" Still bawling, Romani grabs her dog around the waist—Miyu chokes on her pancakes in shock—and holds her tightly. Malon extracts Miyu from Romani's fingers to set the battered dog back on the floor, where Miyu hacks out the choked pancakes.

Cremia has covered her face with her hands. She has no words of comfort, no gestures, no motions. But she does have food. She regards the piping bag on the counter. Quickly she swipes it into her hand. Leaning over Romani, she draws a new face onto the pancake. The ears become tusks, and the snout a single glowing yellow eye. She turns the plate upside down and adds a mouth to transform Miyu into a monster.

Sniffling, Romani stares at the pancake on the plate. "What's th-that supposed to be? It's so...ugly."

"You're going to be the hero," she reminds the girl, "so this is practise. That's the Calamitous One."

"Is it really!? Oh wow wow wow! But Grandma said that they called the Knight's friend called it the bwig bwad bwor! And this looks more like...an ugly thing I'd pretend to be to scare Cremia!"

"Then you'd better give it an all-out attack, to spare the world of such ugliness," she signs, and Romani's squiggle of a mouth opens up into a massive grin.

"Right!" The girl grips the plate in her hands to lift it to her mouth. Opening wide, she shoves all three pancakes into her mouth at the same time. Romani chokes the pancakes down. Vish extends an arm to slap her back but Romani swallows them down. "Pwaah!" Romani gasps for breath. The girl scrambles onto the table to puff out her chest. "I did it! Oh wow wow! I did it! I beat the Calamity Boar! See, Grasshopper!? See, Mama, Papa, Cremia, see—if I could eat the Calamity Boar then I can definitely take it down!"

The antics around the table continue while the family eats. With the tragedy averted, she settles down to eat for herself.

The honey glides smoothly over her tongue. She closes her eyes. The pancakes that Romani asked for—

She's made them before.

Marin loved the sea, and she loved the lake along which she had lived when she was young: Lake Hylia, before her parents took the long journey from Koume to Mabe. Along the shores a flower bloomed, the petals red, the centre gold.

Sea lily's bells, they were called, for the bell-like shape before their blossoming.

Link begged Rusl for an assignment south. Rusl sighed at the schedule of his orders, and at how far Lake Hylia lay from the province of Ordona, "but I can't say no to a lovely lass like you, Link," he said. Not a week later she set out for Lake Hylia. She spent less than an hour in town and the rest of the day along the beach on her hands and knees.
Up to Mabe she rode on her horse's back, with a bouquet of flowers. Sea lily's bells. She asked Marin to close her eyes. The girl did, and stood there with her hands behind her, giggling, swaying her hips back and forth, trying to guess at the surprise.

Link withdrew a single flower from the bouquet to tuck it behind Marin's left ear, smoothing the petals over the side of her head.

"Wait..." Marin's voice trembled, and Link grinned to herself. "...that smell..." Her eyelids fluttered. She gasped.

"For you," Link signed, while Marin pressed her hands to her face and covered her mouth, her eyes sparkling in her surprise, "and enough to plant by the pond. I don't know if they'll grow but—"

Marin tackled her to the ground to thank her, pressing her cheek against Link's, and held her close. "Thank you," she whispered. "Thank you."

She cannot recall if on that day or another Link and Marin made pancakes, but she remembers sitting by the shore. She remembers splashing her feet in the coolness of the water, remembers the voltfin trout that darted through the water, remembers the wheat rolling over the hills.

"I've moved around so much. Kotake, Koume, Mabe. I know home isn't just somewhere physical. I know it's where the heart is. Still, still, if I could just...have one place all my own in this wide world..."

She remembers the sea lily's bells that had begun to bloom around the pond.

"But this...it's like a little piece of home, come to Mabe."

She remembers smiling at Marin, remembers smiling at Marin lifting her hand to the flower at her ear, remembers smiling at Marin smiling at her. "...I'm glad to hear that."

Marin met her gaze, her expression soft as the silken petals of the sea lily's bell. "...and you, Link. Being home means you, too."

Link's shoulders loosened down.

"Link, I know...I know what you've told me about your parents in Ordon. A house, but not a home." Marin rubbed her thumbs over her fingers. "I know I don't really get it all the way, but she was like that, too, before Mama remarried and we moved here." Her gaze flicked down for a moment. She remembers trying to find words that dissolved to dust at her fingertips. "Just—no matter what happens, don't forget who you are, or what you're capable of." Link could see how wetly her eyes glistened. "And someday we'll travel the world together, with Aryll, and with—" The word warps into the wharf of her memories. "—and we'll never worry about this again. And we'll pick out somewhere to call our own. As long as we have a home to come back to, we can travel the world as long as we want." Marin lifted her hand to her mouth. "I guess that doesn't make much sense, does it?"

Link shook her head. "It makes perfect sense. I...I feel like that, too."

"Then, as long as you have me to come back to..." Marin's eyelashes trembled against the curves of her cheeks. "...I'll pay you back for the flower. If you can't have a home in Ordon, I'll just have you make you one here."

She eats the pancakes and hides the tears behind the ceramic of the plate.
Malon and Vish compliment her and Cremia on their talents, both in the realm of art and in the realm of cooking. She blushes; Cremia beams. Suddenly Malon snaps her fingers. "Oh, Link! Vish told you're from Kakariko, is that right?" Malon beams at her. Before she can respond Malon continues on: "I hope you'd like to know that there's a man from Kakariko in the village right now. Said he was just passing by on this way south, but someone recognised his Necludan accent. Let's see...what did he say this name was, darling?"

"Mm. Sounded like a fruit, I think." Vish scratches his ear. "A hearty durian?"

Dorian.

"A hearty durian...ha!" Malon laughs. "If you want to talk to him you should go fast as Sapona, Link."

"I don't think I..."

"Nonsense, nonsense. Oh, I know you're worried about being a big help around here, but you've already done so much for us." Malon gently shakes her shoulder. "It's good to see the people you know, isn't it? I could tell your recognition by that look on your face, you know."

She says nothing.

Malon raises an eyebrow. "...something wrong, Link?"

She shakes her head. "...I'll go talk to him. Thank you."

Her legs have stiffened to joints of wood. A wasting disease. A puppet-plant taken root in her toes that has crept upwards to slowly taunt her skin until she can hardly move.

Perhaps she could become a tree person, like Hestu, and then no one would have expectations for her. Or a dog, like Miyu. She could eat, and sleep, and occasionally chase her own tail. Destiny would pass over her without noticing. She could only disappoint if she relieved herself indoors, and she suspects herself of sufficient willpower not to do so.

She takes Ilia. Down to Kotake. The villagers here and there recognise her from Vish and Malon's stall and greet her. She turns Ilia round and round in the square of Kotake, but she knows not where to search for Dorian.

"Time to head home, right?" she signs to Ilia, who flicks her ears back. "I looked for him, but I don't know where to find him, girl. What more can I do?"

She starts to walk Ilia back up the road to Romani Ranch. The winter has finally closed her eyes, and she can smell the spring all around her in the fields and in the skies and in the people.

And then, faintly, faintly, as though carried on a whispered breeze, she hears the strains of an accordion.

She turns her head. A small crowd has gathered at the far end of the main street, just past where the last of the stalls of the market end and give way to the homes of villagers. Upon Ilia's back she can see over the heads of the people that would normally tower over her.

A blue-feathered rito with an accordion.

Kass.
He sings the Ballad of the Sealing War, not in Eldic, but in Faronese. She marvels at how the lyrics have changed but the meanings, by and large, have not.

When Kass's voice resonates the air with the destiny born of the Calamity, she grinds her anxiety into Ilia's reins. Kass bows low. The passersby applaud; some toss rupees into the case, others various foodstuffs. Kass quiets the accordion and the throng disperses. He shifts his hands on the manuals. The bellows creak as he launches into a practise of arpeggios.

She moves to lead Ilia away. Abruptly the accordion stops and she looks back to find Kass gazing directly at her. He gestures for her to approach; she does so, still on Ilia.

"Well met, traveller!" Perhaps she has forgotten how he originally looked, as she has forgotten much, but it seems to her that his frame has grown thinner since she last him, his feathers droopier, his voice a touch less rich for the exhaustion audible in his timbre, like cords stretched too far. "It has been a while since I last saw you. I am grateful that the Goddesses have carried you safely here." Kass smiles to her as though he had known her all his life, and she stays silent. "I'm grateful, as well, that my suspicions were proven right."

She tilts her head to one side, and Kass plays a chord upon the accordion.

"They say that where there's smoke, there's fire, and where there's slate, there's surely the traveller most appreciative of my music. I see that you travel now with a companion!"

She ogles him.

Kass raises his eyebrows at her. "...I know a song passed down in this region, if you would care to hear it. Perhaps you could unveil its mysteries for me as you did the song of the Thundra Plateau, but even if not, I would adore the chance to share a song with you. Music, like a meal to be eaten, only lives in the moment of its performance."

"...why did you think I would be here?" She swallows down the acidic panic that has begun to foam up the hollow of her throat.

"I saw your companion bearing the Sheik-marked slate you wore at your hip."

She asks. She asks where. With Amali yet in Medli, and Yunobo yet in Darunia, without a sign of either of the Divine Beasts about Kotake, whoever holds the slate—and whoever travels with Dorian—must have the slate that she held for a time. At last, at last Lady Impa has passed on the slate to another; at last the weight has lifted from her shoulders.

Kass packs his accordion. Together they walk. She does not recognise the building—nor can she read the name in light blue and red lettering beside the painting of a horse lying on a bed—but Kass opens the door of the inn for her.

An inn. A set of stairs along the left side of the foyer seems to lead up to the rooms. To the right Kass leads her into a small bar that smells of baked bread and fermented milk. The rito behind the counter wipes a glass and dips his head at them as they enter. A hylian woman has fallen asleep on one of the tables. A gerudo lady nurses a drink over a book. And a sheikah man sits in a corner with his back turned, evidently poring over a map, yet she knows the frame of his shoulders.

Dorian.

With the slate at his hip, with the pouch still on the same belt that she has worn from the Great Plateau.
"Is this not your companion, traveller?" Kass inquires, his voice soft.

She does not reply. She feels her hips moving; she feels her legs swinging; she feels her feet taking the steps towards the man who wears the slate that no longer burdens her.

She touches her hand to his shoulder. Dorian flinches and she recoils her arm back.

He turns his head towards her. For a moment neither of them moves, and then Dorian launches himself so rapidly from his seat that the chair explodes into her gut. The gerudo woman with the book jumps up from her own table to assume a defensive position. The rito bartender loudly clears his throat.

Dorian watches her as if she had transformed into the Calamitous One herself, his face paling, his eyes wide as an hunted wolf's, his shoulders drawn back. The fingers of her left hand close around the hilt of her sword. She does not draw the blade consciously, but through the instinct of the wilds she observes in how he curves his spine, in how he tenses his legs, in how he sweeps the stance of his feet.

"So you found out, did you." His timbre rasps over sandpaper. She holds her blade before her as an aegis. She has not heard Necludan in some time, and the familiarity of the speech shakes her hand. "And you've come to collect. I thought that you left the slate. Don't tell you went crawling back to Kakariko after all. Did Impa put you up to this?"

Her free arm twitches into the word for affirmation but she cannot speak with her left hand occupied by her sword. Instead she watches him.

"This does not concern you any longer, so stay out of my way."

Something wrong. Something amiss. Something. Dorian speaks not with the disappointment she might expect from her declination of destiny, but with the desperation of a dance with death.

The bartender clears his throat again. "Uh, I don't know what's going on here," he declares in nasally Faronese, "but you two need to knock it off. No fighting in the—oi! Oi!"

She throws herself to the left before she even registers Dorian's movement. The thunk of metal into wood rings on her right; she glances back to see Dorian having plunged a blade of his own into the back of the bar.

The hylian woman drops out of her seat to snore on the bar floor.

Dorian rounds on her, his blade longer and sharper than hers. She hears Kass moving behind her. She glances left and right, grabs the mug from the gerudo lady's table, and chucks it at Dorian's chest.

When Dorian sidesteps left, she rolls forward to slam his leg with the flat of the blade. He leaps upwards; she catches his foot and unbalances him. He lands into a roll and she kicks a table into his path. He takes the blow on his shoulder. Twisting about, he lunges towards her; she readies her knee to deflect him back, but the lunge proves a feint. He whirls himself towards the door.

The doorway where Kass now stands.

She inhales a breath sharp enough to cut the inside of her throat. Dorian charges Kass with the sword. Her right hand grips the lizal boomerang; she spins it low, nearly towards the floor.

When the metal edge cuts into the back of his right foot, she winces for the smear of wetness she feels as she catches the boomerang in her palm. Dorian lurches forward. The blade comes down.

The accordion case.

With a noise like a wet balloon exploding, the edge of the sword lodges into the case of the accordion. Dorian drops to the ground and she throws her weight onto him. Knees against the back of his thighs, though he can walk nowhere with his severed postman's tendon, her elbow grinding into the wrist of his right hand while she wrests the sword from him. He socks her in the left hip with his free hand. She grabs both of his wrists to pull his arms behind his back until his shoulder blades bunch up under his shirt.

She glances up Kass, who stands there with the accordion case, the front ripped and feathered where the blade pierced through the thick fabric.

Dorian bucks under her, but she holds him firmly pressed downwards on the floor. The bartender squawks at them to leave, for someone to call the guards, for anyone to help. The gerudo lady tells him to stuff his beak.

The hylian woman continues to snore on the floor.

After a few minutes, Dorian goes limp. He mumbles against the floor. Without releasing her body weight, she lowers her head towards him to hear his muffled speech.

"Please. Please let me go. If you care about Koko and Cottla at all—if you care about their lives at all—you have to let me go. Please. Please. I'm doing this for them."

Not the Calamity. Not the burden of the hero. Not Lady Impa passing on the slate for Dorian to calm the remaining Divine Beasts. Something else has happened and she knows not what.

"Please, oh Goddesses, please, I never meant to hurt anyone. Please."

He continues on, his words slurring into one another, and she can feel how he quivers, and how jerkily his lungs rise and fall as if punctured, and how the fear has plunged him to incoherence. She holds onto his wrists with her right hand. Undoing Dorian's belt proves difficult with her single free hand but she manages to open the buckle, to thread the belt over her hips.

Only when she once more senses the warm weight of the slate at her right hip, balancing the red telescope on her left, does Link rise to her feet once more.

Still panting, Dorian lifts his head. His hand flies to his hip. His empty hip.

Once more she bears the slate.

Link gazes at him; the terror in his eyes could make him attack, could make him flee, could make him do anything.

Yet for once she finds the words.

"Tell me," signs Link, that northward wind welling up in her belly no matter how she might try to snuff it out, "what happened."

---

Energising Honey Crepe (thirteen hearts, two-fifths stamina vessel) - bird egg, cane sugar, courser bee honey, fresh milk, Tabantha wheat

Author's notes: A wonderful thank you to you, the reader, who has stuck with me thus far in my romp across Hyrule and Link's psyche. And a wonderful thank you to my most marvellous beta reader, Emma, who regularly pulls feats of wonder to keep me on schedule with releases and with proofreading.

Having a family to come to (whether blood or found family, as Link has found in this case) is important. As Marin says in this chapter, you can travel the entire world and never feel lost as long as you have somewhere to come back to.

We've seen that northward wind before, the one that calls for Link to adventure, and we'll see it again. What does lie north of Hyrule anyway? I'm not sure why I associate the northward direction so much with adventure, but this isn't even the first Zelda writing I've done where adventure is correlated to a northward wind.

This chapter was rather difficult to write. Several times in Delicious in Wilds I have referred to Link solely with pronouns to represent moments of lost identity. However, in the vast majority of scenes or chapters like that, Link was (and will be) alone for all or most of the chapter. In this chapter, Link was constantly interacting with people, nearly all of them girls other than Vish. I was tearing my heart out at times trying to keep things straight. I hope that I've mostly succeeded, but let this be a lesson: just because you can do something narratively, doesn't mean you should.

Link needs time to heal. She's not exactly fully healed, but she has something to fight for now that isn't just guilt: a family, both the good and the bad. I didn't want to portray some idyllic fantasy family, instead a well-meaning and functional family that also has its realistic issues and doubts. They'll be okay.

The bit about how horse breeding works is accurate as far as I know.

I mentioned back in the twenty-seventh chapter that one of Marin's mothers remarried. Here you see what Marin was talking about, where one of her biological mothers (since all gerudo are women, according to Nintendo) wasn't really the best person, as happens. Her stepmother was much kinder and loved Marin very much, no need to fret.

At least Link has learned much about Faronese in the meantime, enough to be able to communicate to some extent.

The line about Link being "alone, adrift" is an accidental reference to another fic of mine, adrift. I must've been thinking about it subconsciously due to the Marin connection.

Link has accumulated very many scars over the course of Delicious in Wilds. While Link in Breath of the Wild keeps a pretty face throughout the game, minus the scars that Robbie scars but which the player never sees, I prefer for Link's trials and tribulations to be physically manifested. Though I never actually wrote down Link's steadily growing catalogue of scars, and thus I just sort of remember them as I go. As a reminder, Delicious in Wilds was entirely written by the seat of my pants.

It's rare for people to go toe-to-toe with monsters as frequently as Link does, not to mention her recklessness that has gotten her into trouble repeatedly. As a result she carries with her many, many scars now, certainly enough to turn heads.

And here we meet up with Kass again! As well as Dorian, who has been rather busy during the past few months. Hmmm. Writing Kass's dialogue is always fun to me, and the bar fight is a slightly different kind of action than we've seen before, since Link was purposefully trying to disable Dorian rather than to injure him as she would to monsters.

Up next: Link finds out what in the world has happened while she wintered in Romani Ranch. It's funny that we have a word for spending the winter somewhere—wintering—but not something similar for spring, summer, or autumn.

midna's ass. 25 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: This is one of the coziest chapters in the series. It's nice to take a break from adventure and heartbreak both, and just sit back for a while. We also delve even deeper into these characters than we do many others, which is really cool.

The final scene, with Dorian, Link and Kass at the bar, is one of my favourites in the series. It has a really cool atmosphere to it, and is super well written.

Emma. 25 September 2017.
Carrot Stew

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef and the guard from Kakariko discuss the Yiga; the guard's past; and the chef's future. In determining how to best keep the guard and his daughters safe, the chef comes to some personal conclusions.

Chapter Notes

Author's notes that didn't fit in the ending note: This chapter is, in my opinion, one of the worst chapters in Delicious in Wilds. I didn't like writing it and I don't like reading it. There's too much exposition for my liking. That said, there wasn't something else I could really do and this was vital information that Link needed to know, in addition to finally booting Link onwards in the adventure. Kotake is directly on the road from Necluda to Parapa, so it makes sense for Dorian to pass through.

I'm actually quite tired while writing this, so I'll probably forget to mention something and then have to include them in notes in the future.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The bartender kicks them all out and tells them to stay out until they can pay for damages. Dorian retrieves rupees from his satchel; he glances once and again towards the slate on Link's hip, and Kass steps in smoothly to stand between them.

At Dorian's request and Kass's hesitation they take Ilia up to the fields of wheat. For privacy, says Dorian. By some unspoken rule, Kass accompanies them, though he waits at a respectful distance.

"I'll not eavesdrop, traveller," he tells Link, "but I do worry for you."

On the short walk-ride there Link watches Dorian collect himself. He stinks of sweat and exhaustion. Leaning upon his blade-turned-walking stick, his right foot—the postman's tendon severed by Link's boomerang—in the air, he hobbles forward until the budding stalks of spring wheat surround them. She waits for him to speak.

"...if I do not bring the slate to them," Dorian begins, his voice even, level, oddly soft, "they have promised to take my daughters' lives, as they took my wife's."

She has not the slightest response. The words float around her without clinging, as when Lady Impa had told her of her body's identity. Still Link lifts her right hand from the slate. ".I thought your wife was on a journey somewhere?"

"...how was I to tell my children that their mother had perished from my own failures?" Link stares at him. Dorian casts his gaze upon the earth. "Link, have you...heard of the Yiga?"

Between fits of silence Dorian explains, his shame and guilt evident in the alternations of hardened and sloping features even Link can read, in the curve of his upper back, in how a tremor ripples through his shoulders here and there. The wheat has scarcely grown to their ankles. The wind sways the tips of the plants to rustle against her trousers. Her boots leave imprints in the soft furrowed ground.

She listens to him speak.

When he was younger, Dorian tells her, he believed in the message of the Yiga. They saved him as a child, gave him life and purpose in an age of drifting between villages too preoccupied fending for their lives and their children's lives to care for a youth on the road. But when he travelled the world on the missions the Yiga tasked him, Dorian came to know, little by little, of the truth of their actions.

The blood on his hands of his earlier years stain him yet.

At long last he could no longer bear to continue. On a routine mission he escaped instead to Necluda, as far away from the Yiga's fortress as he could without arousing suspicion, to where a simple sheikah man could blend into the valleyed villages hidden from the eyes of monsters.

When he tried to settle in Kakariko, Lady Impa—younger then—inquired of his past. In the end Dorian told her; he expected her to run him out at best, and to execute him at worst.

"But she told me that people change, and she herself was living proof of that." Lady Impa trusted Dorian and took him in to Kakariko, where he would find shelter from the Yiga. He met a wonderful woman who would become his lover, his wife, and the mother of his children. Dorian lived and served in the village, his skills honed under the Yiga's tutelage serving him well to defend Kakariko from monsters and interlopers alike.

The Yiga found him anyway. It had taken them years and Dorian hoped beyond hope that he could keep his daughters safe—but they found him, in the end. And debts must be repaid.

He begged them to take his life. They took his wife's.

"The first time you came to the village, I...knew that if I did something as important to the Yiga as the capture of the Hero of Hyrule—as the capture of the slate that the Yiga thought could be used against the Calamity—I could bargain for them to never touch me or my daughters again. I...I only wished for my daughters' safety. Believe me, I know that everything I've done was wrong. Yet what is a father to do?" Dorian's voice breaks and fades. He roots his feet to the ground; his body shakes, the makeshift walking stick nearly slipping from the earth.

She says nothing, but waits.

Dorian invited Link into his house. To Lady Impa, he meant a show of loyalty and gratitude for having taken him in; to Link, he meant to use his daughters to gain her trust. During those first few days Dorian tried to take the slate from her upon her first visit. Paya intervened—Link widens her eyes in recognition of Dorian's odd request for the slate—and he did not have another opportunity until she returned from Eldin.

"After your actions in Darunia, the Yiga learned about your existence. That the Hero of Hyrule had returned and that he—" Link does not flinch; nonetheless she can feel the sudden cold of her blood-drained face. Dorian coughs. "—that she; sorry, Link, but the Yiga don't know that much about you, and the hero is traditionally a man—had come through Kakariko. They...they sent for me. They told me to find a way to bring them the slate, or they would take my daughters' lives as well.
"I...I feared that if I told Lady Impa the truth, she would—rightfully, as if I were in her position, I would not put the lives of two ch-children over the fate of all of Hyrule—not wish to take the chance. She would surely run me out of the village. Perhaps she wouldn't have; perhaps she would have protected me. Nevertheless, the risk of leaving Koko and Cottla without a home and at the mercy of the Yiga..." He shakes his head. "I'm a coward. A coward, a fool, and a liar."

When Dorian failed to take the slate a second time, the Yiga's agent informed him that there would not be a third chance. Either Dorian would obtain the slate upon Link's return from Medli—or else assassinate her—or the Yiga would murder his daughters.

As it happened, Link gave up the slate. Kakariko fell into internal turmoil as Lady Impa sought to reconsider her actions, sought to trust someone else with the slate to fulfill the destiny that Link left behind, to calm the Divine Beasts Vah Naboris and Vah Ruta.

Link touches her left hand to her chin. Vah Ruta. The first time Link has heard of that name.

Amidst the talks Dorian promised the Yiga he would convince Lady Impa to allow him to become the new bearer of the slate. His skills in combat and his sharpened wits would naturally give him talent at activating shrines, at solving the mysteries within, and at finding and calming the Divine Beasts through whatever means that took. His knowledge of languages—thanks to Yiga training around the land once known as Hyrule—would allow him to pass through lands beyond Necluda with ease, and former contacts in Parapa would surely assist with safe entry to the city of Nabooru.

Lady Impa passed him over.

For his own sake, she told him. The Yiga know of his appearance, while they do not of Link's, except for the descriptions handed down the past century. And the descriptions of the Knight as revealed by the King of Hyrule, who did not let anyone see Link herself, do not match the girl who bears the slate. They speak of a man of nobility, tall and strong, with golden hair and sky-blue eyes, and not of a girl from Ordon, short and skinny, her hair a light brown, her eyes more grey than bright.

Link can go unnoticed save for the slate on her hip, a slate that she should ideally wear elsewhere and keep concealed. But if Dorian were to go, the Yiga would know him.

Thus, Dorian had no recourse but to steal the slate at night and leave.

En route to the Yiga fortress he passed through Kotake, and the Goddesses once more threw him into the dust.

Link rubs the palm of her hand against her chin.

"...what are the Yiga?" she signs, spelling out the Necludan characters of their name. "I know that they hurt others. I think I might have been attacked by one on the way here. But I don't understand.
Why would they want the slate...?"

"The Yiga...the Yiga worship the Calamitous One. The Purifier, they say." To the Yiga, he explains, the Golden Goddesses themselves have sent the Calamitous One to rebirth the world anew. Of late the Golden Goddesses have been more and more forgotten, while the Seven have risen in prominence; nowadays most every temple takes for the Seven rather than the Three. "Most Yiga do not believe that the Seven look after our world any longer, if ever the Seven did exist." That ages ago, the royal family that established Hyrule had lied, had fabricated the story of being the incarnation of the Goddess Hylia. The family may have known a powerful magic, or may have had access the fabled Sacred Realm, if such a realm exist, or may have simply amassed an army numerous enough to conquer the land. But regardless of the source of their influence over Hyrule, no holy power flowed through their veins.

And to punish the people for their sins of worshipping a false Goddess of the Seven over the rightful Golden Goddesses that created this world, the Golden Goddesses sent the Calamitous One to purify the land.

"To usher in the new age of paradise, the Yiga believe the Calamitous One must cleanse this world. And they believe that, if they help in this sacred purification, the Golden Goddesses will spare them." Dorian's breath shakes upon its exhalation. "When I was younger, shunted from place to place, it was so easy for me to agree. The world had turned its back against me, and I turned my back against the world. The world was wicked, its inhabitants cruel. I wished nothing more but than to burn it all down. Or, at least, all of the people who had hurt me so." Link shivers; it takes Dorian a moment to compose. "And yet...then I truly started to look at the world. I...I still think that the world needs to change, for even without the Calamitous One there are evils in this land born of human hands, but to destroy everyone would only hurt the innocent."

Link knows not what to say. The heaviness of Dorian's gaze slides off of her towards the earth beneath them.

"I know how selfish I am. I know how vile. I know that nothing I've done can ever be forgiven—"

And then she finds the words. Not the best words, but words that will have to do. Link gestures for him to look up. When Dorian raises his head, she lifts up her hands. Her arms move with a conviction as wide as the caldera of Death Mountain, as tall at the Pillars of Erito, as vast as the skies of the wilds from which she could never turn away for long. "I'll go myself."

Dorian stares at her.

Link repeats herself: "I'll go. You said that the Yiga either want you to bear the slate or to murder me."

"That's true, but—"

"Then I will go to them myself."

Dorian's head swings from side to side. "This is madness. I cannot let you risk your life like that. And even if you went, how are you going to prove that you're the Hero of Hyrule? And what if they want the slate any—"

"You would hand over the slate that can be used to calm the Divine Beasts and save lives upon lives, but you wouldn't let a single person die?"

Other slates exist: the slate that controls the Divine Beast Vah Rudania; the slate that controls the Divine Beast Vah Medoh. Yet she knows not if those slates can still activate other terminals—being now tied to a Divine Beast—nor does she expect the Eldic or Tabanch people to potentially risk the lives of their Champions to calm other Divine Beasts.

"If you die..." Dorian wipes at his eyes. "...then there's no hope anyway. Only the Champion of Hylia can wield the slate. The Goddesses might choose another to bear the burden; by then, however, it will be too late." He clasps his hands before him; the blade he uses as a cane falls and he nearly goes with it, but Link catches him and rights him again. "If I give up the slate, we will still have hope. Well, not me. Hyrule will still have hope."

"No." Her words have never felt firmer on her fingertips. "There's no such thing as the chosen "Hero."

"Link. No matter how you try to run from your—"

"I'm not even the only one who can use the slate. In Eldin and in Tabantha I couldn't have calmed the Divine Beasts without the help of others, others who not only could use the runes, but who could themselves activate the terminals." Link senses the curve of her own smile as she speaks. "I don't know why I was chosen, but you know that others can use the slate too. It's never been about me. It doesn't matter if I die."

Dorian hangs limply onto the blade, its sheathe wobbling in the dirt. "The prophecy..."

"The prophecy doesn't mean anything. There's no princess anymore either, and no Calamitous One. We only need someone to calm the Divine Beasts because they are a threat in the here and now, and I don't want anyone to have to suffer." Link pauses. She flexes her wrists, aching after the days of disuse, and then continues. "Someone needs a slate to activate the terminals, but that's it. No special person.

"Keep the slate. Help the Divine Beasts. I'll go to them myself to keep Cottla and Koko safe, if you can promise me you'll pass the slate on."

"Link..." His voice has hoarsened to an apologetic whisper. "If the Divine Beasts continue to awaken, the Yiga will know I failed anyway."

Link shifts her weight between her feet. "Even if the Yiga know, how would they find you? Are the Yiga everywhere? Can't you find somewhere safe? What about Darunia? What about Medli?"

Dorian shakes his head. He no longer knows, he says, the extent to where the Yiga operate, but he could not take such a risk to Cottla and Koko's Ivies. "Anyone could be a Yiga. Do you know how many passing merchants or couriers bear some connection to the Yiga, because no one else wants to take the risk of travelling between villages through countryside infested with monsters? The Yiga are just normal people, like you and I. Yet they've spread rumours that they can commune with the monsters, and the people of Hyrule believe them." Link recalls the goron in the village of Gabora in Eldin, who suspected her of being Yiga, who suggested she herself might have caused the attack, and now her eyes widen in recognition. "Some know about Yiga travellers. Nevertheless, since the Yiga truly do moonlight as merchants and couriers, those who know tend to look the other way. They are convinced no one else could travel the monster-infested roads. And if just one of the Yiga found out where I was..." He cuts a finger across his throat.

Link gazes at him. She holds in her right hand the lives of Koko and Cottla whom she herself has known and in her left hand the lives of those beset by the Divine Beasts that have awakened. The Divine Beast Vah Naboris, in Parapa; and the Divine Beast Vah Ruta, wherever that Divine Beast may be.

"I have friends in Medli and in Darunia. You can be protected. I promise." She rubs the back of her head. "It's not my place to make a decision like this. What I do know is...if the slate's destroyed, then...the people of Parapa and of wherever the other Divine Beast is won't have another chance."

"I know how selfish I am," Dorian echoes. "I know. If you had children, Link, you would understand."

She remembers Amali; she glances at Kass, some fifty paces away, watching carefully of the goings-on.
"Please, trust me." Link does not look away from Dorian again. "Cottla and Koko matter to me, too. I think...I think that if you just told Lady Impa the truth she wouldn't turn you away. And if she does then Amali or Yunobo will take you under their protection. I know Chief Kaneli, kind of. I could get in contact with the elders of Eldin." She pauses. "Amali'd help for sure. I can feel it in my gut."

Dorian raises a hand to the side of his head. "Link, I don't know about this. I'm afraid that any move I make will jeopardise my daughters' lives."

"Then...then maybe we could get tackle the Yiga together. We could go there. You said that you know where it is. Their hideout. Fortress. Whatever you said it is." She bobs her head to herself. "You could pretend to keep me prisoner. Then, when they've accepted us, we could fight our way through." She touches her chin. "No, that would be too difficult. But if we were to sneak in, we could try to get at—the Yiga have some leader right?"

"What?" He ogles her incredulously and she lets her hand fall to her side. Is she playing hero once more? "I...I'm sorry, but I find it...difficult to believe how naïve you're being. Do you honestly think that you could traipse in and defeat the Yiga yourself, that you know better how to sneak in than adult men and women who have trained their entire lives to defend the fortress with their lives?"

"I..." The words die away, and Dorian's head begins its pendulum swing, like ticking down the seconds to a judgment.

"Link...you're highly skilled. More skilled than I am, I would say. But you are not a one-woman army. You could enter the Divine Beasts where no one else could because you happened to have the slate, and—most importantly—because the Divine Beasts were meant to be used by people. The Yiga stronghold is so well-defended that even though people have tried multiple times, they haven't been able to do it because they couldn't amass a strong enough force. To break through the Yiga stronghold would require raising an army."

"If they believe in the Golden Goddesses, then can't I...I don't know." She considers the stories she has heard, from Marin, from the girl who smelled of horses, from the Champions, from the girl with the golden hair, from the travellers she has met along the road. "Maybe I could offer myself. Since I'm the chosen hero, then...then maybe I could convince the leader duel me one on one. Wouldn't that prove on whose side the Goddesses rest? Surely They'd help Their own chosen one? I think I could..." She reaches down to her right leg where the bokoblin in Medli stabbed her through with the head of its spear. Under her boot Link feels the faded wound. Her fingertip traces the thin spine of mountains that marks the scar, but no longer does it weaken her leg. "I think I could do it. Defeat someone one-on-one."

"And by what Goddesses' wish would the leader of the Yiga ever agree to that? They are faithful, not foolish. Even if we could somehow assassinate the head, the Yiga wouldn't suddenly disperse or stop existing, Link. They're people, not body parts that will die out without their head. They have chains of command and they have been doing this for hundreds of years. Again, to break through the Yiga would require raising an army."

Yet Link has had enough to hiding and of backing down. She knows not the virtue of the Goddess Hylia, but she does know that of the Goddess Farore. "Then we will raise an army."

"We—what?" Dorian rubs his eyes and blinks.

Link nods again. "Then we will raise an army. The Yiga are hurting people, too. When we calm the Divine Beasts, when we help rid the land of monsters, then people won't have to fight by themselves. Then people will be able to travel again. Then we could have a coordinated

Then people will be able to travel again. Then we could have a coordinated effort." She shrugs. "I'm not too smart or too strong so I don't know how this all works. Maybe I'm being naive again. But I really do think we could work together. Once...once the Divine Beasts have calmed. Once people don't have to think about their own worries and can start looking out.

And to calm them..." She considers the women in Kotake worried of the Divine Beast Vah Naboris, raging in the sands of Tantari even at this very second.

Link need find someone else to carry the slate, for she remains no hero. Yet she need not be a hero to escort the slate safely to the Divine Beasts.

Touching her hand to her chin, she considers the span of time her journey would take. "I need to head south to deliver the slate to, what did you call it?"

"Nabooru," Dorian answers quietly, evenly, his features firm. He shows Link the gesture—in Parapan, he tells her—and she signs the name. "The Parapan capital."

“To Nabooru. I don't want anyone else to be get hurt. Do you know how to write in Tabanch?"

He nods once.

"I'll write you a letter. To Amali, the...I forgot what the big fancy title is." She tugs on her ponytail. "But she's the pilot of the Divine Beast in Medli. And she's a mother. She'll understand, and she knows me. I'll write you a letter and she'll take you and Koko and Cottla under her wing."

The fear that quickens Dorian's breath and sinks in his eyes starts to manifest in the trembling of his frame. "...Link, I can't—"

"Please trust me. Please. Amali will keep you safe for now. I'll bring the slate to the south. I'll make sure the Divine Beasts are calmed. The Yiga—the Yiga will know you failed but Amali will keep you safe—and then I'll...I'll..." Her own hands tremble now; still Link resolves herself. Alone she can do little, but if her friends can pilot the Divine Beasts against the fortress, then the Yiga should pose little challenge. "We'll raise an army. With the Divine Beasts there's no way we can lose. And when this is all over—" She steps forward. "—when this is all over you can come back to Kakariko and I can make Cottla and Koko and you buttered apples again."

Dorian's expression softens. Link clenches her hands.

"I know I'm not wise enough to think through things, and I know that I've been reckless before. I know I still think like a kid. But I don't have to be a genius to understand what'll happen if the Yiga get the slate."

"...so this is all I can get." He pinches the bridge of his nose. Link waits, and watches him, and holds her breath. "All right. All right. I'll put my faith in you, Link, because I have no other choice.
I hope that this friend of yours will keep Koko and Cottla safe." He clasps his hands together before his chest, his pupils darting upwards towards the skies above, his timbre lowering to a humble murmur. The weapon he uses as a cane falls. Dorian drops to his knees.

"Goddesses...please do not let my sins wash to my daughters. They deserve none of this. Take me if you must, but...oh Goddesses, please..."

When Link hears the tears in his voice, she steps away. Her arms have frozen to her sides. She could reassure him again, could tell him that everything will work out, could remind him that Amali herself has children and will not let innocent girls perish for anything that their father might have done, but her hands can do little but hang uselessly.
"I trust you," Dorian repeats. "I trust you. All right. Link, if you're going to Nabooru, you should keep that slate safe. The Yiga are more numerous around here. Just...keep that in mind, and don't let them find out who you are. I fear that with you wearing that so prominently on your hip that you've already given the Yiga what they need to know to track you. Hylians are less common in Parapa than in Eldin." He runs his hand over his jaw. "Though I suppose they're not that common in Tabantha either."

She has usually kept the slate hidden under the weight of the satchel at her right hip, although that does not excuse her keeping the slate so in the open. Link ducks her head.

"We should go back. For the letter."

"...can you help me up?"

Link saddles Dorian onto Ilia once more. Kass inquires if anything has gone amiss, and she shakes her head but thanks him for worrying about her.

They return to Kotake. Link invites Dorian up to the ranch, for the bartender will not allow him back into the bar of the inn to write the letter, and also because her stomach has begun to gnaw itself open. She invites Kass as well.

"...as payment for the song." She rubs the back of her head. "You said that you knew a song from around here, didn't you? A song passed down...?"

For a moment Kass simply looks at her, his head tilted, and then she can see the grin that spreads his beak. "Why thank you, traveller."

"You should sing for the rest of the family, too. That's why I'll make you dinner. As thanks."

"I will have to pass on the dinner," Kass notes, "but I will certainly sing for you."

Link frowns. "I won't make anything with poultry in it."

"Ah, thank you for thinking of me, traveller. However, I have my promises to keep. Worry not of me." Kass gestures towards the village. "Shall we, then?"

Link, the wounded Dorian upon the horse, and the minstrel with the ripped accordion case arrive on the doorstep of Romani Ranch. Vish opens the door for them.

He stares at the trio on the doorstep. Link smiles sheepishly at him. "...you brought your friends."

She nods. "Well then." Vish looks over his shoulder. "Dearest, we're having company for dinner!"

Link asks if Dorian has brought anything from Necluda. "I suppose you could smell it on me," he remarks as he unfolds carrots from his pack, wrapped in velvet, swift and endura alike. The sight of the orange and green socks made Link in the gut for not having had a chance to say good-bye to Koko and Cottla. But next time she stops by Medli, next time she can greet Amali's daughters and listen to them sing and make for Cree the sanke carp pie she promised, she'll be able to see the Cottla and Koko again as well. "You can take some for your horse as well. Goddesses know that you'll need it."

"How do you feel about carrot stew?" Link inquires.

Dorian shrugs.

She makes stew. Romani insists on trying one of the carrots, crunches down into it, and swears off weird orange vegetables that look like fingers for the rest of her life. Link shows Cremia how to cut the carrots, and she prepares them, endura and swift both, while Link starts the base of the stew on a stock of flour and butter, thick and creamy for the journey ahead.

No eggs, of course, for Kass's sake, but a spoonful of honey, for Cremia's.

The carrots simmer. She stirs them, and stirs them, and thanks Cremia for all of her help, and stirs them.

"You're leaving, aren't you."

She nods. Cremia bows her head.

"...that's so, then. Would you..." Her fingers shiver. "...please don't forget about us, Link."

With the pressure of tears just behind her eyes, Link sets down her spoon to face Cremia.

"I promise I won't forget." She hesitates. "And even if I do, it will only take me some honeyed pancakes, or a glass of cold milk, and I'll remember you all again, I promise."

"...I hope that you'll always retain that spark of strangeness that makes you, Link." Cremia touches the back of Link's wrist. "And I hope you'll come back." Link dips her head.

The carrot stew finishes.

The table has not enough room for all of them, and besides, Maryll requests to meet Link's guests. They hoist chairs into Maryll's room to pile around her bed and share heated bowls of carrot stew.

"A true fusion of Kakariko and Kotake, I see," Maryll jokes. Malon sits by her side and steadies her mother's trembling hand to spoon in the soup.

They eat, save for Kass, who declines a meal on some principle of his. Nonetheless he compliments Link and Cremia on their presentation and the scent of the soup. Dorian says little, but Link can see how his features lose their tension when he spoons stew into his mouth; that alone brings her to smile and to bring her own bowl up to her mouth.

No matter what happens to her, no matter how many injuries she receives, no matter how many truths threaten to rip her innards from her gut and her bones from her spine, Link can always rely on the comforting warmth of a hot meal, on the refreshing chill of a cold one, on the promise of something delicious.

She drains her portion of soup down in the space of a few seconds and dips her bowl into the pot for seconds. Link estimates herself about to eat half of the stew herself, and Romani the other half. Between them, the girls wolf down some twenty bowls full of soup, until Link's belly aches and her throat tastes of orange.

Carrot stew.

She made this once. On the road. On the road to a spring, a spring of something, for the girl with the golden hair to pray once more. The King had asked Link to ensure the girl with the golden hair spent her days in prayer and fasting in preparation to offer her body, mind, and soul to the Goddesses that might hear her.

Link had nodded and had promised to do her best.

The girl with the golden hair spent every break and every night reading the books that she brought with her, recording notes in her notebook, speaking out loud of her research to Link, occasionally snapping her head up to ask Link a question and then answer it by herself, thanking Link for helping her out.

On the evening before they arrived at the spring, Link cooked her carrot stew with the flour she brought from the castletown and the carrots Aryll loved so much. Over stew the girl with the golden hair told her eagerly of her research. "I think—mm, this soup's really good!—that I might be close to figuring out how to access the Sacred Realm—is this cinnamon? Oh! I love it!—from the Castle, though I'm not—it's so creamy!—entirely sure—!"

Link grinned. "I'm sure you'll figure it out." She reached behind her to rest a hand on the hilt of the blade of evil's bane, and the girl with the golden hair managed a smile back. "If I can just get that last piece of evidence I'm sure Father will listen to me, if the Goddesses won't."

The day thereafter they visited the spring. The Spring of Power. Before a worn statue of the Goddess Din, the girl with the golden hair knelt in the water. She lit a candle. She waited for the evening breeze to pick up, and then she prayed.

Link stood back in the shadows so as not to disturb her; she could hear the girl with the golden hair begging the Goddesses, begging for the Goddess Din to have mercy on her, begging for the Goddess Hylia to tell her what she need do to access the sealing magic that should run through her veins.

"Please," she pleaded, and the tears in her voice bid Link to close her eyes and consider instead what to make for supper to cheer the girl with the golden hair up. "Am I not a daughter of Hyrule? Am I not worthy, O Our Goddess, O Our Hylia? Please...my father does not believe me when I tell him that no actual records show any sort of sealing magic, except the old legends. Please, Goddesses, if You can hear me, we need You more than ever. If Yours is the prophecy, then grant me Your Wisdom, Your Power, Your Courage. Grant me the Wisdom to understand Your will, the Power to enact it, the Courage to see it through no matter the hardship. For Hyrule I would do anything, but I know not what to do."

Her voice broke. The girl with the golden hair choked on her own tears, suffocating on the weight of ten thousand years of dust. She lifted her arms instead to sign to the Goddesses, her hands carrying her on where her throat had failed.

"If You're out there...please grant me a sign. I don't know what to do. I don't know if I should keep praying when nothing comes or if..." She weeps. "It's no use, isn't it? I have spent years praying and giving myself to the worship of the Goddesses, yet They remain as silent as ever."

Link made her carrot stew once more, this time sweetened with honey that she took from a beehive, the sweltering stings on her wrists and on the back of her shoulders sparking in pain where they rubbed against the fabric of her undershirt. Link poured out two glasses of spring green; she tried to clink her vial against the girl with the golden's hair before downing hers in a single gulp. The girl with the golden hair swirled her own glass around in her hand.

"Link," she said, her timbre softer than the susurrus of the whispered wind through the red-leafed Akkanalan trees, "thank you. For believing in me. I don't blame Impa for not believing me. She's been there since I was young, taught to protect me, taught that I was the Goddess reborn since I first told her I was a girl. But still. Link. Thank you for trusting me." The girl with the golden hair scooped a spoonful of stew into her mouth, and the blush rose in her cheeks. "And thank you for the soup."

Link comes to when she hears Kass open the accordion case. To Link's own relief, the accordion has not sustained damage, and he withdraws the instrument to settle his feathered hands upon the manuals. "Would you care to hear a verse passed down in this region?" he inquires. "I promised my fellow traveller—" He indicates Link. "—to sing her a song, but I do not wish to disturb the rest of you."

"I live on music," Malon answers, and the rest of the family nods after her. "By all means, minstrel. Sing away."

Romani races around him begging to know what exactly kind of instrument he carries. When Kass extends the bellows, she erupts into laughter at the sound of the wheeze. Yet once he runs his fingers over the manuals; once he adjusts the accordion to its proper position; once he hums a note, her laughter fades into a gasp of awe.

Kass beams at her.

Nearly everyone in the family, Link notices, leans forward to listen. Kass thanks them for allowing him to break bread with them. Once again Kass apologises for any errors in translation, and once again he invokes the Goddesses before he sings.

"To begin, a song passed down in this very region. My apologies if I do not do it justice. Without further ado..."

He sings.

Link closes her eyes to listen.

"When the tip of the peak meets the lights of the seas,

"the great king of the mount shall sing 'neath the trees.

"On his head ride the antlers of knowledge asleep,

"the crowned key to his throne that awaits in the deep."

By the requests of Vish and Malon's family, Kass sings his rendition of the Ballad of the Sealing War, and once more it differs in Faronese than what she has heard of Eldic. He transitions smoothly into other ballads, into other songs, into other histories and legends forgotten by time but kept alive by the careful reconstruction of his research: of the Hero of the Skies, of the Four Heroes as One, of the Hero of the Picori Blade. Fanciful tales of cities in the sky, of people splitting into four, of a mysterious cap that could transform the hero into a miniature being to speak to the fae of the wilds. The evening draws on. Vish takes out his harp to join him, and Malon warms up her voice. She and Kass take turns telling the stories in song, rhymes in rhythm. They improvise and sing together, sometimes on-key and sometimes off, in undulating melodies that sometimes speed away from one another but then always come back to twirl around one another in a dance of delicious discord.

A Kotake-Medli medley.

When the moon has created her zenith, Kass packs his accordion once more, "Thank you all for having me. Take care, and may the light illuminate your paths, all of you." Malon offers him a room to stay; he declines with utmost politeness. "I do not stay longer than needed to collect songs in any village—I've a promise to keep—but your offer has touched my heart. May others always show you the same kindness you have shown me."

Link meets him at the door. Kass rests a hand on her shoulder, and she looks up at him.

"Your wife has a message for you," she says. She can feel Kass's fingers tighten their grip ever so slightly. "I chanced by Medli."

Kass responds after a moment of quiet; Link can just barely make out the tremor in his timbre. "What does she have to say?"

"She wanted me to tell you...if I see you on the road, to tell you that she and your daughters love you very much."

Kass inclines his head. Link senses more than sees the tears that sparkle in his eyes, and when he speaks again his voice fractures into an arpeggio of warmth. "Thank you, traveller."

"Have a safe trip. I hope that we'll meet again."

He embraces her, suddenly. Wings around her shoulders, her face pressed into his chest, feathers and softness and kindness wrapping her up in the promise of friendship. Link knows not what to do with her hands, and then she does, reaching out her own arms to hug him back. "I hope to see you once more, traveller, and thank you for the meal." Kass releases her. She brings her arms up to her chest as if to trap the warmth. "May the light illuminate your path. Take care of yourself, traveller."

Link returns to the main room. She thanks Maryll for everything that she has told Link. She thanks Malon and Vish for all that they have done for her. She thanks Cremia for being her companion in so much, and she thanks Romani for training her to fight Them and wishes her the best of luck with one day taking down the Calamitous One, and she thanks Miyu for saving Romani's life.

She faces the family. Malon indicates for her to speak; Link bows to them all. "I have to leave. There's something that I need to do, and I do not know how long it will take, or if I'll ever be able to come back. So thank you all again. For everything." She puts her hands together. "I can't tell you how much I needed this time here with all of you. I'll come back if I can, and if you'll all have me. Thank you, and good-bye."

To her surprise everyone rushes towards her at once. To embrace her. To hug her. To take her hands into theirs. To thank her.

Link gathers what little of her things that she has left in the kitchen. Her cooking pot. Her pan. A soup ladle that Cremia insists she take.

Everything else she brought with her remains on Ilia, ready to go at a moment's notice. That curiosity and that wanderlust never left her. For better or for worse, for good or for evil, Link cannot silence the wilds that call her name.

Yet neither can she silence the desire to cook for others, not only for herself.

They all give her something to take with her on the journey, Cremia and Malon and Romani and Vish and Maryll, wheat and trout and milk and dried beef and spring green elixir. Miyu brings her a stick in her mouth.

With utmost solemnity Link kneels down on the floor and accepts the stick in both hands. She tucks it into her belt loop.
"Thank you, Miyu."

Miyu's tail wags.

Before she leaves, Link and Dorian retire to the kitchen. He transcribes her words into Tabanch. He rolls up the letters to Amali and to the chief. She wishes him good luck and a safe journey.

In the doorway Dorian taps her shoulder. Link turns around. The pain in his expression steps her backwards; her heel nearly slips off of the stair and she barely tips herself forward.

If she could make a question mark with her arms, she would.

"...Link, there's one more thing you should know." Dorian inhales. "I don't know how to say this, so I'm sorry. I've never been to Parapa myself and I hope that I'm wrong." Link tilts her head to one side as she listens to what Dorian has to say. "But I've heard from people around their capital...they only allow in women, and the gerudo aren't like hylians or sheikah." Link takes another step backwards. The words crash down upon her ears as a gust of wind that presses her down into the ground. The bones of her legs have melted into carrot stew. "Sorry, I...hadn't meant to startle you. Lady Impa told me you were a girl when you came to the village, is all. And I'm not saying that you're anything but that, but I don't know much of Parapan culture and I don't know how they...define being a woman." He clears his throat and raises his voice. "Anyways, I'm sorry, Link. I—"

"—what in the world are you talking about?" A voice in Faronese. Link and Dorian turn their heads at the same time. Malon. Malon stands on the front step with a basket of laundry at her hip. She shakes her head at them. "Oh, I didn't mean to be rude. Perhaps I misheard; I don't know much Necludan beyond what my darling has taught me. I know you're from the other side of Lake Hylia, and maybe over there you don't learn much about us over here, but that's no excuse for ignorance.

Link keeps her gaze fixed on Malon. Amid the tornado of Dorian's words, Malon has walked in with the eye of the maelstrom on her tongue.

Dorian bows his head. "Forgive me my ignorance," he says in his unsteady Faronese.

"For one thing, Link's a girl as any other, as much as I'm a girl, as much as my mother and my grandmother were women. Not that she needs me to tell her that." Malon smiles at Link, who does not know whether she should faint from relief or smile back, or maybe both at once.

Dorian nods as Malon speaks. Link can hear the murmured apologies rolling off of his tongue.

"But even if you—" Malon taps a finger onto Dorian's chest. "—wanted to come traipsing down to Nabooru, 'course they'd let you in. Just because we gerudo don't distinguish between—" She makes a looping gesture with her hand. "—this sort of thing for ourselves doesn't mean that we're some women's-only club. Though..." She laughs lightly to herself. "...they might not let you in for being such a stick in the mud...ha! Oh, you don't have to look so crestfallen. Do they not have jokes in Kakariko?"

"Of course, ma'am. Thank you." Dorian bows to her.

Malon dismisses his concerns with a nonchalant wave of her hand. "It's all right; you didn't know, and now you do. Now then, you two are going, aren't you?"

Dorian dips his head. "Link, thank you again for the letter...and I hope that one day you can forgive me. I will pray that Cotta and Koko be safe."
"I know so!" Link grins at him. "Amali'll help you in every way she can. People are better than you think they are."

"...I hope so. Ma'am, thank you again for letting me loan a horse."

Malon smiles. "You paid your money. No need to thank me. Be safe." She and Link watch him lope off towards the barn, still limping, still walking upon the weapon turned into a cane. "I hope that friend of yours will be all right, and that he didn't take my stick-in-the-mud joke to heart. Oh, they really don't know much about much in Kakariko, do they?"

"I'm sorry."

"Oh, no, you don't need to apologise for anything. I'm glad I cleared that up for you." Malon squeezes Link's shoulder. "Y'know plenty of folks change their bodies when they don't feel right with them, but that's no different than folks who decide to train their muscles, or lose weight, or trim their hair, now is it? It doesn't make them any less of who they are. Don't you beat yourself up." Link dips her head. "Oh, Link, but don't let me keep you. You should go. You've got a long ride ahead of you."

Link turns back towards Malon, who carries on her lips a smile born of affection and trust, and she blushes. "When the time comes, say hello to the foals and calves for me."

"I sure will." Her expression softens. "Oh, Link, if you're ever around here again, feel free to come by. A friend of the family's a friend of the family forever, no matter how long it's been. More than that: you're family, too. You're our kin, now, in the eyes of the Goddess. You'll always have a seat at our table, and a pot on our hearth." Malon's hands fly to her hips. "Oh, and next time you come back, little lady, you are not sleeping in the stable. You've a bed under our roof, you hear? It's your roof too."

Link blinks at her. Perhaps Malon suspects of how she knew Marin; perhaps Maryll has told her after all; perhaps Malon means something else entirely.

But, whatever the reason behind Malon's affections, Link does know, now, that she has something, something that she has not had since she first awoke in the Shrine of Resurrection.

She signs the word to herself, touching her hand to her cheek, to her eye, to the centre of her chest, a path she has shaped over and over in her life.

When the Divine Beasts have calmed, when the Yiga no longer trouble the world, when she can lay down her blade, she has a house to come back to, a people to call family, and a place to call home.

—

Carrot Stew (eight hearts) - courser bee honey, fresh milk, goat butter, swift carrot, Tabantha wheat

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: So, here's where Dorian is actually a Yiga (a plotline from Breath of the Wild; apologies for spoilers) comes in. Breath of the Wild introduces the Yiga but then doesn't do much with them. We don't learn much about their motivations at all beyond having split from the sheikah for ? reasons, and they desert their hideout after Link defeats Master Kohga. Really activated my almonds. At any rate, I think it's silly for a single person (even a legendary hero) to be able to waltz into the hideout of an organisation that has apparently eluded efforts over at least a century (we see the Yiga active prior to the Great Calamity in that one memory of Breath of the Wild), face down their leader in a one-on-one duel, and basically

So the Yiga believe that the Great Calamity is an act of purification; it's also notable that they feel support in their claims given that the royal family of Hyrule is now dead. Interestingly, Link herself doesn't know much about worship of the Seven; if you've paid attention throughout Delicious in Wilds, you'll have noted that Link only really calls upon the faiths of the Golden Goddesses rather than the Seven (Hylia, etc.). We'll explore this more! But my point is merely that just because people worship the Golden Goddesses (also known as the Three) doesn't mean that they're Yiga or bad necessarily. Just that there are different faiths.

The Yiga do in fact moonlight as merchants and travellers. Many people put up with them as necessary evils, and the Yiga do not always attack villages (although obviously many of them do, depending on what it is that's going on or what their mission is). They oftentimes recruit otherwise abandoned children for indoctrination, as they did to poor Dorian. But this isn't the end for Dorian by a long-shot; this is a beginning for him.

Link is still not quite yet seeing her worth. This is something that she'll struggle with for some time. She's ever so slowly getting there. At least she's letting herself have a family for once.

The ballads mentioned in this chapter refer to Skyward Sword, Four Swords and Four Swords Adventures, and The Minish Cap.

Kass's song, which I made up, is in reference to the Lord of the Mountain from Breath of the Wild. Kass's steadfast refusal to accept food or a home is a contributing factor to him looking so much more haggard than before.

While most hylian and sheikah have two cultural genders (man and woman), the gerudo have a single cultural gender (which is what Malon was getting at). Gerudo are just regular humans though; the difference is cultural, not biological, because the depiction of gerudo in-game sucks.

Sageru's virtue, as I mentioned in a previous author's note, is translated as "blood", or "kin", or "loyalty" because the word in Parapan doesn't have a clear and singular translation to Central Hyrulean; it's sort of like "family" but encompassing friends as well as family. Kin's the closest I could come up with.

The sign that Link forms is the sign for home, as I noted in the very first chapter. It's been quite a while since Link last signed home. But now she has a home. Just like she promised Marin: a home to come back to.

A dear and darling thank-you to my beta reader, Emma, for helping me make this chapter less eye-clawingly awful, and a dear and darling thank-you to you, the reader, for bearing with this chapter. Up next: beginning the journey to Parapa, and Link getting a taste of the character development to come! I think either the next chapter or the one after that contains the quote that made it into the Delicious in Beta reader's comments: I love the author's decision to have Kass be here. His inclusion seems sort of random, but it works so well, sets up a bunch of stuff later, and the intersection of him, Link, and Dorian is a really cool setup in my mind.

This chapter is, unfortunately, mostly a bunch of much-needed exposition. It has to be done, after all! But the author makes it work, and the exposition is, luckily, never boring, and even gives us some cool character moments.

Plus, Link leaving Romani Ranch is a super cool and emotional sort of watershed moment (plus it's just, really sweet).

Emma. 25 September 2017.
Monster Curry

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef journeys from Kotake to the Parapan Canyon Pass. Along the way, the chef receives a gift of monster extract from a merchant and recalls a memory of fighting, both the real and the imagined.

Chapter Notes

As usual, author's notes that didn't fit into the end: As always, a warm thank-you to all of my readers who have supported me this far, and a warm thank-you to my beta reader, Emma, who is always there for me, even when I don't feel much up to snuff as a writer or a person myself. You're all wonderful and I wouldn't be here without you.

Back on the road at last! It feels so good to get back into the adventurous spirit after Link's winter of soul-searching, and I think that Link would be inclined to agree.

She rides south. The moment Link clears the gates of Kotake—Ilia leaps over the fence and lands heavy upon the other side—the laughter that she has bottled up within her comes pouring out of her all at once. Closing her eyes, she lets the sound roll over her, shoulders shaking, stomach curling inwards, and every time she thinks the laughter passed and tries to pull in her mouth she smiles again and laughs again. Her mouth hurts and her belly aches and the corners of her eyes sting with tears nothing short of life.

Alive.

Alive, with the wind at her back and the world before her.

On the road again. Beneath the embrace of the sky above her and the welcoming of the land below her. Every scent upon the horizon, every touch of the wind, every noise of wildlife or the clopping of Ilia's hooves upon new terrain—Link laughs until Ilia runs over a sleeping lizalfos in the middle of the path. She watches the lizalfos arc through the air, screeching at its severed tail, and then plant its face in the dirt.

Link takes blade in hand. In return she trades in her dulled boomerang for one newer and sharper and slightly larger, bearing a more forked design than the last. Experimentally, she tosses the boomerang to observe the wideness of its arc. When she lifts her right hand to catch it, Link feels nothing but coolness across her palm, and then a bolt of pain through her hand. Retracting her arm, she stares at her palm, at the boomerang that has grazed right through the base of her fingers while the boomerang itself clatters in the grass behind her.

Link wriggles her fingers.

Still attached.
Good enough for her. She grins and applies gauze around her hand, then goes back to practise with the boomerang, this time wrapping a leather belt around her palm to protect herself. Link throws and catches it repeatedly until she discovers the trick of sandwiching the flat between her palms to avoid ever touching the sharpened edge. She continues to practise. When she catches it consistently ten times in a row, Link figures out a way to strap the boomerang to her back for easy access, and without stabbing herself in the neck or the lower back.

She tilts it just so, takes a single step, and stabs herself, not in the neck or back, but in the top of her left hip.

Once she has finished falling and then rolling back and forth on the dusty path, Link lurches to her feet and adjusts the boomerang again.

Another step, more careful this time.

She winces as one of the serrated tips scrapes against her jawline. Touching her chin, Link glances between the boomerang she has kept throughout her journey, and the new boomerang intended for a monster twice her size.

Link takes both. She wraps the larger boomerang's blades in gauze and straps it to Ilia's saddlebags.

She rides. In Dalite Forest Link stops briefly to gather fruit, root, and nut. The budding spring coaxes squirrels from their hidey-holes and bears from their hibernations. Deer bleat and snuff through the sprouting bushes. Link feasts on the velvety-soft meat of spring fawn. The wooden struts of Manhala Bridge find her looking back over her shoulder, towards Mount Satori.

Someday she will return. Someday she will listen to Kass sing the song once more. Someday she will puzzle out mysteries of the ancient verse.

But not today.

Today she rides. She passes a village on the waterfront of Aquame Lake and consults the map that she drew from Maron. Link dismounts Ilia by the Digdogg Suspension Bridge to climb atop the nearby hill and check her surroundings. To her right across the water rise mountains of ice, the farthest summit so high into the sky that the peak breaches the clouds.

She cranes her neck up to look at it.

One day, she decides, she's going to climb it.

As Link turns back towards Ilia, a hint of orange on the ledge below her catches her eye.

A shrine.

She inhales. She touches the fingertips of her left hand to the fingertips of her right, then brings both hands to her jawline for a thinking-session twice as intense as her usual.

Link shrugs.

She sets the slate into the face of the terminal, and down she goes.

Somehow Link has nearly forgotten the fun of solving the riddles of the shrines. Twin switches, she notices; a depression and a bright orange orb that should fit perfectly inside; and rotating platforms that close one door or another to obstruct her path to the goalpoint.
A platform in the centre slams upwards at even intervals. She attempts to climb on top to let it launch her into the air only to remember, all too late, that a thing known as a ceiling exists. A ceiling that greets her with a physical smack to the face. Her body curves downwards. Her shoulder blades hit the ground first, and her heels shortly thereafter.

Link coughs.

She sprints out and whirls around to squint at the switches. Link rotates the platform and observes with a light laugh that the new 'ceiling' of the platform contains an opening. She puts her hand on the platform. It slams upwards before she has had the chance to clamber on.

Her arm nearly rips out of her socket.

Link shakes her head at herself. Perhaps the instructions at the goalpoint will teach her the art of patience.

The instant the platform returns to ground level, she flings her entire body weight onto it, landing on the flats of her feet. The platform accelerates her up. The speed lifts her bodily from the floor to transform her—however briefly—into a particularly non-aerodynamic and very hylian-shaped arrow.

As she feels herself slowing down, Link opens the paraglider to steady her descent. She glances downwards.

The goalpoint.

She drifts down towards it. With a mischievous grin Link closes the paraglider and allows herself to drop to the earth. She falls, and falls, and the ground rushes up to meet her, and at that thin final metre-second between the sky and the floor she extends her arm once more.

She opens the paraglider just fine.

But the impact in her feet wobbles her bones into chuchu jelly. Link staggers left and right. Her knees warp this way and that.

Her shoulders hit the floor.

Somehow opening the paraglider at the last second before landing, by itself, does not slow her fall to a safe speed.

She bursts out laughing at her own recklessness—again—for as long as she has hurt no one else but herself she can tolerate her mistakes. Better to learn from her errors here by herself than to repeat them on the Divine Beast.

Link has lived now for nearly a full year in the time after her awakening, and nonetheless she understands so little of the world. And what a world she has to look forward to: to learn it all.

When she emerges from the shrine, a sudden roar of thunder startles her back into the lift. The shrine takes its cue to sink her down into its depths again. When she emerges for the second time, Link observes the thunderstorm that has brewed in her absence and the wind that whips rain into her eyes.

For a second she can make out something like a horizontal lightning bolt amid the darkness of the clouds. Link cups her hands over her eyes, squinting, and then claps her palm against her forehead. She retrieves the red telescope at her left hip.
A flash of bright yellow. Weaving in and out of the clouds like a serpentine scarf billowing in the wind. Link cannot make out the details for the rain that blurs the telescope's lens.

She glides down to where she left Ilia, spooked and shying away from the bolts of lightning that spear the horizon. Link coos and rubs her cheeks and strokes her neck and shoulders and retrieves a carrot from her satchel to calm her companion. Without shelter from the storm, she takes Ilia down the bridge. They walk at a steady gait. Link listens for the difference of her companion's hooves on the grassy ground to her hooves on the wooden bridge, and then again on rock. Beneath the arch of the bridge, she makes out a glow that looks like a campfire. She leaves Ilia on one of the round rock islands that the bridge connects with a blanket over her head to shield her from the rain.

"Don't go anywhere, girl. I'll be right back."

Not a campfire, but another shrine. Link grits her teeth. To her relief the shrine proves to have only a single guardian, a small scout that she dispatches with ease. She takes the guardian's spear. As with the axe she held in the Divine Beast Vah Rudania, the spear only comes alight in the instant of the thrust and otherwise remains hidden in its dull orange shaft. She examines the spear every which way but cannot ascertain the source of its power, nor does her ignorance bother her, but excites her instead at the possibility of one day finding out.

Link returns to Ilia amid the downpour.

"Thanks for waiting for me, girl."

Ilia noses her cheek and Link laughs a light little laugh at the warm wetness of her companion's breath.

They ride onwards over the bridge. A strike of lightning to the cliffside across the water brings Ilia to rear. Link shushes her, soothes her. Yet Ilia does not budge. She steps backwards, ears flicking back, neighing at the lightning. Link squeezes her thighs to usher Ilia onwards.

Ilia shies again. She scrapes her hooves along the ground. Link dismounts her companion to take the reins and lead Ilia on; her companion plants her hooves firm on the rock and does not go on. In the darkness of the thunderstorm, Link can see little for the curtain of rain that obstructs her vision, but she cannot leave them out in the open like a pair of sitting kamonano waiting for the inevitable strike of lightning.

Link turns around to stare at her companion.

And then she makes out the faint noise of two rocks rubbed against one another, and beneath that, the rasp of a breath.

Ever so slowly Link swivels around on her heels. Ever so slowly she can make out the silhouette amid the curtain of rain. Ever so slowly she reaches for the sword at her back.

Lightning parts the darkness for a flash and she can see, clear as her own face in a lake's reflection, the one-eyed monster that towers over her with saliva drooling from its parted jaws.

Link vows to never distrust Ilia again.

She can see the monster's shadow rear back. It roars and in the stench of its breath she can smell rotten fish. A sludging ooze of saliva splatters her face. She chokes on the odor. A thread of the saliva splashes into her mouth. The slimy texture, the stench of decay, and the boil of pus that slicks the inside of her mouth leads her to pitch forward. Link vomits out her guts on the rock.
The massive monster lifts its hand and she throws herself out of the way. The rain at least washes the sludge from her face. Hastily Link reaches into her pack. She scrambles for the loaf of bread Cremia gave her. Opening the bag she crams dampened bread into her mouth and swallows it down until the taste of ooze and vomit clears from her throat.

The monster lurches unsteadily towards her. With its size it cannot move as swiftly as she can. A bolt of lightning once more reveals its form.

The eye.

The single yellow eye enveloping most of its face like a glistening tumour.

But in the dark of the storm Link cannot make out just where to strike, and she has precious few arrows to guess. Still she removes the bow and notches an arrow, walking backwards as the monster lumbers towards her, trying to estimate the monster's head by the pattern of the rain.

She notices the sparks around the metal curve of the bow a second before she fires. Link takes another step backwards away from the void. Suddenly her left foot continues to drop past where the ground should have caught her. Link feels herself falling backwards. With her breath snapping in her throat, she senses the bow skid out of her hands as she scrambles to grip the edge of the cliff. Lightning strikes the bow. She stares at the electricity that bursts the metal to light.

The monster thumps back from the bolt of lightning. Its rear hits the ground with such force that the vibrations nearly knock Link from the slippery rock. She pulls herself up.

Metal.

Metal.

She unstraps everything metal from her. The cooking. The blade. The monster starts to gather itself back to its feet. Thunder booms.

Her eyes widen. A flash of lightning goes off above her head, and Link whips out her slate. Magnesis washes the area in red and pink. She snatches up her cooking pot from the ground.

Her trusty, trusty cooking pot.

When lightning cleaves the skies once more, she memorises the monster's height and moves the cooking pot towards its head. The cooking pot bumps against something squishy-wet. The monster roars and tries to swat it out of the way. Link pokes her tongue out of her mouth as she concentrates on keeping the pot in contact with the monster's eyeball.

Lightning blitzes the heavens.

It strikes the pot, white and hot, and the monster with it.

The electricity spasms the monster's limbs. She swings the pot away and then slams it back; the monster topples and skids over. It slips on the rainwater. She brings the pot down upon the monster's head and lightning strikes the metal yet again.

The monster falls over and off of the cliff. Link listens for the tremendous splash of its massive bulk hitting the water below.

Ilia rears. Link sprints towards her to check her for injuries, but fortunately the Goddesses have left her in one piece. She hugs Ilia tightly, then pauses to run her hands over the saddle and bridle for anything metallic.

Safe.

Link breathes. She looks out over the thunderstorm that rages on, and then remembers the sacrifice of her beloved cooking pot. With a gasp Link uses magnesis to search for its rounded form. There: nearly teetering on the lip of the cliff. She races towards it, slips, and ends up sliding the last half-metre on her backside.

Despite the lightning, the cooking pot remains whole as ever. She exhales a sigh of relief and wipes her forehead. With that, Link gathers all of her metal items. Swinging her leg over Ilia, she forces her companion into a gallop over the remainder of the bridge to find shelter before the storm fries her as badly as the monster.

Fried monster.

She marvels at how monster meat might taste. True, her previous efforts have yielded nothing but toxic dishes inedible to the stomach and unpalatable to the tongue save for elixirs made of extracting juices, but one day—with care—Link might yet uncover a method to prepare monster meat as food.

Eventually the rain lets up. On the other side, the great arms of the Parapan Canyon Pass welcome her. She enters the narrow pass, entrapped by walls of sheer cliff on either side, sedimented in layers of orange, tan, and light brown. The wind picks up dust and sways the bushes that thrive along the sides of the road. A hare hops out from the bush. Link aims her arrow at the animal's head but then considers the heat that would spoil the meat quickly. Instead she rides on. Around the bend she comes upon a caravan of merchants beset by bokoblins on horseback. Between her bow, her blade, and her boomerang, she bangs the bokoblins to the bone alongside the owners of the caravan.

The rito and gerudo that head the expedition thank her, while their third party—a goron with a tattoo of a horse painted upon his abdomen—hangs back and crosses his arms over his chest. "I can tell by that expression of yours alone that you're expecting some reward for chipping in, eh? Well we're not paying for that," he grumbles, and Link shakes her head, trying to clarify that she does not want any reward at all. The goron ignores her frantic efforts: "And we're taking all the monster parts."

The rito rolls his eyes at the goron and asks Link if she does want recompense, to which she declines. The gerudo woman bows politely to Link. She explains their identity: jewel merchants, carrying sapphire from Tabantha and ruby from Eldin, as well as topaz exhausted of its stores of electricity. "Would you at least take a meal with us, traveller?" she inquires.

Link's entire body responds at once.

They carry goron spice and hylian rice and Link has not had curry for so long that she begs them to have mercy on her. She offers to cook her own portion, to pay for the ingredients; the goron nods and tells her to pay, and the rito and the gerudo shush him. Nonetheless Link insists, and when the rito discovers that she carries with her saddlebags of fermenting milk from Romani Ranch, all talks of whether or not Link can eat with them vanish at once.

Malon and Vish left her, she realises, not only with fresh milk, but also with the liquored milk that she left in the pitcher in the ice-box in the kitchen. She hands over all of her fermented milk. The merchants toast her.
Link retires to the outskirts of the merchants' campfires with a bag of rice, a pouch of spice, and half a litre of water graciously provided by the jewel traders to make herself a proper hot meal. Sitting cross-legged in front of a campfire in a circle of pebbles she has arranged, Link boils the water with the pot lid clamped tightly on the cooking pot to keep the steam inside. Then she adds in the rice and examines her satchel for what ingredients she would like to curry.

Infinite bowls of infinite sorts of curry exist all around her. She need only extend her arm and grab one to warm her stomach.

And for Ilia, of course, Link plans to steam carrots with salt and sugar in the water along with the oats Vish and Malon gave her.

As she rummages through her belongings, she hears a slight cough. She looks up. The gerudo woman—an expert in topaz, as she introduced herself—stands before Link with a vial of violet elixir in the crook of her arm. The merchant arches her eyebrows. "I was wondering. Have you ever tasted monster extract?"

Link emulates the merchant's gestures. "...monster...extract?"

"Made from monsters. You'd be surprised at how it tastes."

Link's jaw drop open and she can feel her mouth flood with saliva. So she can eat monsters after all, and without even finding some special power or magic, simply with the right preparation. Perhaps someday she will discover a similar method to prepare ore so that she can herself try deliciously grilled rock roast.

Smoothing the front of her long dress, the merchant sits down across from Link. "Trust me. You can have a bottle on me if you like it!"

Link could not stifle the grin that brightens her features if she wanted to. She snags the bottle from her saviour with such speed that the other woman flinches back. Smiling sheepishly, she apologises. "...thank you so much," she signs.

The merchant giggles. "You've got an appetite! I can respect that. Besides, fellow food lovers should always help one another out! Wouldn't you say so?"

Link bobs her head eagerly. At the merchant's instruction, she uncorks the vial of monster extract. It smells like danger in a manner that raises the hairs on the back of her neck and cuccofleshes her skin. Something between savory and sweet, with a hint of sweat-like salt and almost the metallic tang of blood, although not unpleasant, more akin to the fresh coolness she tastes while sliding on her shield down the side of an icy mountain, or the exhilaration of the wind pushing up upwards on the updraft of a flame.

"Whoa there!" The merchant waves her hand in front of Link's face. "Don't add too much all at once, champ. Try a little and see how strong you can handle it! And I mean that. Just put in a drop or something. Don't hurt yourself!"

Link snorts. She rolls up her sleeves. Taking the vial in hand, she gently lifts the lid of the pot, and just as gently she flips over the vial to pour out its entire contents.

The cooking pot explodes.

The force of the water and rice sends her physically flying backwards. Her lower back smacks against something long and hard and she flops forward into a bush, her face in the brambles, her arms sloping over the leaves as her hands hit the dusty ground.

The pot lid lands on her rear and slides down her back to bonk her on the head.

Weakly Link lifts her gaze, her head swaying with its heaviness and how hard she must work to hold herself up. She glances over long enough to see that her beloved cooking pot remains in one piece, even if the pot lid has flown clean off.

The merchant takes a step towards her, her concern evident in the furrow of her features.

Link wriggles the fingers of her left hand to confirm their existence, then flashes her a thumbs-up. She plops out of the bush on her right side. The pressure on her right hand—still injured from the boomerang incident earlier—makes her wince. "I'll...pay for more water and rice and monster extract," Link signs to the merchant, who snrrks back a laugh and then gives in to the fit of giggles.

Eventually, with the merchant's help, she adds in a single drop of monster extract and watches how it purples the rice, even more so than the goron spice could redden it. She pours the rice into a bowl and mixes in the extract and spice alongside steamed and chopped vegetables and a hint of salt. Link holds the bowl in her palms.

She has no spoon but the soup ladle she took from the ranch, yet Link needs nothing else. She scoops the ladle high with curry rice. Her mouth can barely fit around the width of the ladle. Her cheeks bulge with rice.

Link chews. The monster extract pushes her heartbeat higher, her breaths shallower, her limbs quivering with the need to attack or flee or both at once. The essence of danger spilling over her tongue with the heat of the spices and the deliciously uneven texture of rice and vegetable she pushes against the roof of her mouth.

The richness of the flavours clashing and uniting and clashing again as rice more concentrated in spice or in monster extract slides under her tongue. The spice warms her skin with spice and the extract with the instinct of fight or flight.

The instinct of fight or flight, the scent of curry—

She remembers the skyline of Eldin. Standing back to back with the woman in black—with Impa. Link herself wielding that blade just faintly glowing blue, Impa bearing a sword, long and curved, that cleaved the wind more sharply than a korok leaf. Around them in circular waves lay the corpses of monsters. Bokoblins and furnixes, magtails and moblins, chuchu and dodongos, lizalfos and pyrups, a single silver lynel that had taken all of their combined efforts to finally bring down.

Between them cowered the girl with the golden hair, hiding under a book she held over her head.

Impa knelt beside her to examine her for injuries. Link circled the perimeter of the area to check for any other monsters approaching—at least monsters would not run and hide as creatures with any sense of self-preservation—and then returned to where Impa soothed the girl with the golden hair.

"...Your Majesty, as long as you have your guards with you, you have no need of such things."

The girl with the golden hair was shaking her head. "But what if something happened? What if I'm not with you or Link—"

"...and why would that happen, Your Majesty?" Impa exhaled. She took the girl with the golden hair's hands into her own, her fingers nestling between the knuckles. Link began to pick up their belongings to avoid exerting her presence any more than necessary. "Please, you need to focus on the—"

"—on the sealing magic. I know, I know, Impa." The girl with the golden hair closed her eyes. "I know that that's all I'm good for."

Impa stifled a breath. "Your Majesty, that's not—"

"You don't have to say it for it to be true." The girl with the golden hair stood. With the supplies gathered, Link began to carve into the monsters to take what they could for the brewing of elixirs. Impa had told her to leave them, that they could obtain ingredients of higher quality from the King's suppliers, that they need not brew their own elixirs. Yet the elixirs that have worked best she has brewed herself. Not for her skill, but for her own knowledge of herself. And if Link could focus herself on elixirs and monsters, on talons and horns, on tails and eyes, then she could avoid eavesdropping on matters that did not concern her. Still she could hear the girl with the golden hair's trembling timbre. "It's fine. It...it doesn't matter."

"Your Majesty..."

"Oh, would it kill you to call me by my name, Impa?" Impa recoiled as though the girl with the golden hair had punched her across the face. The girl with the golden hair flinched back herself. "...I'm sorry, Impa."

Impa knelt before her and pressed her forehead to the ground. "Forgive me, Your Majesty."

"You didn't do anything wrong, Impa." The girl with the golden hair rubbed her arms. "I know my own failures. This doesn't matter. Oh, we've got to get back to the Castle, don't we. To report to Father that I've messed up again and that praying at the holiest sites of Eldin has yielded nothing." She lowered her voice to a mutter. "As expected of me."

Impa inclined her head. "...as you wish, Your Majesty."

When they camped for the night, she remembers, she made curry with the goron spice they had purchased in Darunia. Link had stuck by very close to the girl with the golden hair. The noise of the crowd in the marketplace had pushed her hands to shaking as if beset by monsters, but she could not cut down those around her as she could bokoblins; the people of Darunia posed no threat but that which her mind conjured up, a threat of colour and sound and all too much at once.

The exact mixtures of spices differed from that Link eats now from her bowl, the popular tastes having changed in the last hundred years. No monster curry. But she had tasted that metallic tang, that salt of sweat, that flicker of the quickening of the heart and the breath that accompanied the dredging of some instincts from deep within that moved her body and arranged her limbs and shifted her weight and thrust out with the blade and transformed her into an extension of the sword in her hand.

She made curry.

The girl with the golden hair ate. Link sat beside her eating her own while the girl with the golden hair told her of the research she had done in Darunia. Though Link said nothing she listened, and nodded, and smiled at the girl with the golden hair's excitement, at her joy, at the passion with which she spoke of her research. Link did not need to understand a single word the girl with the golden hair said to know of the sparkle in her eyes and the fire in her voice.

Impa's mouth thinned into a line. When the girl with the golden hair finished her curry Impa gestured towards the sleeping bags. "Your Majesty, we have a long road ahead of us tomorrow. You should get some rest."

"—and so we have five distinct references to a mirror from five distinct sources—"

"...Your Majesty."

"—and though two of the references seem to refer to something compact and the other three talk of something much larger, it seems clear that there's a consistent link between a mirror and this other world, which I believe to be the Sacred Realm." The girl with the golden hair held up an index finger. "Now, one might suspect that these accounts merely refer to the usual sorts of stories about the world beyond the looking-glass—"

"...Your Majesty. You should get some rest."

"—but the world that they describe on the other side of the mirrors appears identical, or at the least very similar within reason! One of the accounts indicates that such a mirror shattered, while the other account, seemingly written far later, indicates that the mirror was passed on to the hero of that age and later to the royal family—"

"Your Majesty." Impa lifted herself to her feet. The girl with the golden hair leaned forward to speak more rapidly, and Link followed suit to listen to her.

"—which makes me think that the entrance to the Sacred Realm may have required a mirror and that multiple of such mirrors existed—"

Impa placed a hand on the girl with the golden hair's shoulder. The girl with the golden hair took in a breath to continue and Impa squeezed her shoulder.

"...Your Majesty, forgive me my impudence, but you should rest. Your father the King wishes for you to do so."

The girl with the golden hair dipped her head. "Of course, Impa."

After the girl with the golden hair had fallen asleep, Link stayed up to clean the plates and tend to the fire. Impa seated herself across from her, and Link kept her gaze trained on the flame to avoid the harshness of Impa's watch.

"You have improved."

Link blinked into the fire. She cleaned her ear out with her pinky finger.

"...I meant that. You've improved since you first drew the sword." Impa folded her hands into her lap. "I am honest about my remarks. As I told you at the beginning that you lacked the proper technique or training, so now I tell you that you have improved. You have yet a long way to go." Her words fell to silence.

Link had nothing with which to respond, only the aching void of not knowing what to say.

"You need to stop encouraging her."

She ducked her head.

"...it will only lead to tragedy."

A cough brings her back. Link looks up. The merchant perks up her eyebrows. "So then so then,
Link grabs her hands and wildly bobs her head, grinning at her in thanks. The merchant giggles and nods back. When Link releases her hands the merchant gestures to the vial of violet. "You can keep the rest of the vial! And if you want more, we're selling them pretty cheap."

Link thanks her again. Plunking puts the cooking pot into her lap, she shovels the remainder of the rice into her mouth and wolfs it down. The cooking pot empties. She scrapes the bottom. Her heart continues to pound long from extract after she has finished eating.

The caravan sets off again. Link travels alongside the jewels merchants, on foot rather than on Ilia, for if she sits now her heart might beat entirely out of her chest. For a few hours she feels like she might die.

But then again, if Link dies now, at least her final meal will have been a delicious one. Not the worst fate of all.

Dying from food: the dream.

Eventually the effects wear off. In the evening the caravan stops for the night. She waves them farewell and rides onwards herself until Ilia tires. Link lets her rest in the safety of a rock overhang while she herself scales up the cliffside nearby. Perched on the higher elevation, she consults her map.

There, on the other side of the canyon: a shrine.

She glides across the canyon beneath the silver crescent of the moon, curved like a white lynel's horn, and lands upon the face of the cliff. Her hands take to the rough surface of the rock, her feet to the fissures and uneven juts of stone. Link climbs. She lifts her head to the stars above.

The stars of which Hestu told her.

And the stars of which Hestu did not, that carry their own stories she may never know, but that she loves nonetheless for their light and for the promise of what she may one day discover.

When she exits the shrine and raises her head up, another glow lifts her gaze ever higher. In the mountains to the north and to the west, rising up over the canyon of Parapa.

A golden spire.

A tower.

Link glides back down to where rests Ilia. She feeds and waters her companion, leads her beside a pond in the crook of the bend, and touches their foreheads.

"I'll be back in a day or two, girl. Stay here."

Ilia whinnies. She nudges Link's cheek with her nose, and Link embraces her companion.

She sets off.

She climbs. She scales. She rests along thin wooden struts set here and there in the cliffside. She fends off the attacks of bokoblins, of lizalfos, of keese, of massive birds that fling their faeces at her, of strange monsters that mix cacti and cats to prickle her hands with their spines.

Every step takes her closer to the tower.

When she reaches the base, her hands stuck with quills, her boots chewed through by monsters' talons, a fresh cut running across her cheeks and over the bridge of her nose, she curls up to sleep in its shadow.

She rises with the sun. From her satchel she crunches on acorns and tree nuts, feeling the blood rush once more through her veins. She withholds her gloves from her belt loop to protect her hands.

Up she climbs.

Up and up and up.

The air grows colder and thinner. She pauses more frequently to rest, to inhale and exhale, to ease the aching tension in her muscles for lack of breath. The feathered ruff of her tunic and the constant motion upwards keep her warm.

Her left palm flattens against the platform at the top of the tower, then her right arm, and she pulls herself up, the muscles taut on her shoulder blades and the backs of her thighs, until she has sprawled out on the tower.

She lies there with her limbs spread out and the tower cooling her cheek. She feels her chest press against the floor as her lungs expand and contract in the slow cycles of life. Her eyelids flutter and weigh down. Languidly she blinks at the sliver of the sun she can see beyond the pedestal.

She lifts herself. She stands on her own feet. She touches the slate she has worn at her hip and the destiny she has worn around her shoulders.

Someone else tied that fate around her neck, but she tied the belt—and the slate—to her waist.

She looks out at the snowy mountains that crest to the northwest. At the grasslands that give way to desert to the southwest. At the forests that slope down to the sea at the southeast. And to the northeast: at the isolated plateau, and beyond that, at the castle, awaiting her in the silence of one hundred years.

She looks over the land once known as Hyrule, the land that before that must have been known as something else, the land that needs no name but the breath of the wild whose whisper she has known all her life.

She needs neither destiny nor fate nor wyrd to do what she can for the people of this land that she loves. To walk the land step by step on her own two feet. To help as many as she can with the slate that coincidence and chance have given her. To seek communion around campfires; to split stew with strangers; to hear the tales of lives she will never live over a bowl of curry rice.

And someday, to try everything, to taste every dish, to learn every recipe that she can, to strive for all that is delicious in the wilds.

She sets the slate into the depression in the pedestal, and she laughs to the same melody as sung by the wind that calls her name.

—

Monster Curry (five hearts) - goron spice, hylian rice, monster extract

Chapter End Notes
Author's notes: The giant boomerangs in Breath of the Wild always seemed so unwieldy to me! It seems rather difficult to catch them considering how sharp the edges are, and it looks too big to be able to carry. I mean, some of the weapons in Breath of the Wild are laughably oversized. Hell, the Master Sword—which itself must be some sort of bastard sword, and I wish that you had the option to wield it two-handed as you see Link do in the memories—is so ridiculously long that it actually clips into the ground! And you wonder why Link doesn't wear it at the hip as one would with most swords (it's very hard to get a sword out of a hilt when it's on the back unless only the tip is in a true hilt and the rest is in a 'holster' meant to be ripped of and flung away upon drawing the blade).

I faced the hinox on the Digdogg Suspension Bridge in a thunderstorm. As it happened, I had an axe on me and decided to try to use magnesis to slice at the hinox's eye with the axe. Lightning struck the axe, which proceeded to OHKO the hinox. I used a similar trick for the stalnox in the Trial of the Sword, which by the way is one of the favourite parts of Breath of the Wild hands-down and doing it on Master Mode took me countless hours but damn if it didn't feel good.

"Cuccoflesh", by the way, is the Hyrule version of gooseflesh (also known as goose bumps), and "sitting kamonano" is the Hyrule version of "sitting duck" (named after the kamonano ducks from, ahem, Freshly-Picked Tingle's Rosy Rupeeland, which I would not personally recommend to anyone interested in playing other games in the Zelda franchise); speaking of which, the line "guay's feet" from a previous chapter was the Hyrule version of "crow's feet", but I'm a dummy who neglected to write it in the author's note for that chapter. As expected of me!

Hey, there's more jewel merchants! You surely didn't think that Glepp and Misan were the only ones, did you? We also note Link's 'icy stare' that Revali mentioned. More than once in Breath of the Wild you have people commenting that Link has an expression of one expecting a reward.

Monster extract provides a pounding rush of epinephrine which emulates that sense of danger; this is sort of what monsters feel all the time, and it cues in a memory of Link having fought against monsters. Of course, the memory in this chapter is lifted in part from a real memory in Breath of the Wild. In Breath of the Wild, monster extract is a gamble that can either enhance the food you make or make it heal only a quarter-heart. I made every single recipe that I give at the end of each chapter, and I wrote down faithfully the effects I got. For this chapter, I received a bonus!

While Impa might seem unduly harsh on Zelda, I would like to gently reminder the readers that she does so with the best of intentions. Of course, the road to hell is paved with good intentions, and this does not excuse her actions.

Throughout the Zelda franchise, mirrors or mirror-like items are often used as portals to other worlds. In this chapter, the two accounts that reference compact mirrors are The Adventure of Link and A Link to the Past, while the three accounts that reference larger mirrors are Four Swords Adventures, Twilight Princess, and Skyward Sword.

Climbing up a tower and activating it to reveal the map was always one of the most exhilarating moments in Breath of the Wild for me. There was nothing I wanted to do more than try to capture that feeling, as well as how Link is ever so slowly accepting her position as the bearer of the slate. In both Eldin and in Tabatha, Link had the ulterior motive of doing tasks for Lady Impa. Now she's bearing the slate to Vah Naboris of her own accord. She's come so far.

midna's ass. 27 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: Link is herself again! It feels really good to see her being more like her after an arc of her being very much not that. Her personal growth was good, but what would we do without all of her great quirks and tics and bits of personality?

The trick with the cooking pot and the hinox is really awesome. Delicious in Wilds was what taught me that I could do that in Breath of the Wild. It's an important trick for later, too!

This is around where you start to hate Impa. She's a great, complex character who definitely had reasons for the things she did… But that doesn't make her any less easy to hate.

Emma. 26 September 2017.
Chapter Summary

Arriving in Aveil, a town on the Parapan border, the travelling chef waits to gain permission to enter Parapa and remembers something about the chef's past: Ordon; letters; taking the chef's little sister to the castle without alerting the chef's parents.

Chapter Notes

As usual, author's notes that don't fit into the ending box: I name all of the monsters in-chapter here, so I'll just comment that the bari in A Link to the Past that split in twain can heck off, especially the ones right next to the fairy fountain in the Palace of Darkness and the ones on the conveyer belt hell-room in Thieves' Town. You know who you are. Damn you! The comment on peahats being an excellent form of travel via hookshots is a nod to the various games in which such travel is possible, such as Twilight Princess and Skyward Sword. Fun fact: peahats were introduced in The Legend of Zelda as "p. hats" which may have stood for "propeller hats" considering their resemblance in their original appearance.

Just as we saw more rito and zora in Eldin than gerudo due to the proximity of Tabantha and Lanayru compare to Eldin (and more gorons and gerudo than zora in Tabantha), so too we see more zora and rito in Parapa than gorons.

In Breath of the Wild, the entire Gerudo Desert is one huge hostile desert in which the gerudo live. I think that it's nonsensical at best and a harmful stereotype at worst. Parapa does have deserts in the south, in the rain shadow of the mountains, but much of Parapa is fertile steppe, with lush Faronese forests in the northeast. It's a habitable place. Deserts are habitable too, populated mainly by pastoral and/or nomadic peoples.

The canyon swarms with bokoblins that raid travellers and caravans from on high. Arrows tipped with ruby, with sapphire, with topaz, and even with explosives rain down upon the innards of the mountain pass. With the canyon as the only still-existing route to Parapa—seeing as neither horses nor wagons can float over the snowy mountains on either side of the pass—Link finds travellers few and far-between. Those that she does encounter come heavily armed. A zora she passes attacks her in the middle of the road, mistaking her for a Yiga due to the hood that she has pulled over her face. A trader of rock salt from the sea extols the many uses of her wares, from seasoning food "as you have never tasted it before, dear customer!" to exfoliating her skin "for that lovely sparkle and shine that'll make you a hit with all the gerudo ladies, you know!" A great train of ice merchants, transported in crates encrusted with sapphire, bustles with sellswords employed to defend from monsters and Yiga alike. One offers Link a commission after watching her make short work of an electric lizalfos that drops nearly upon her head from a nearby cliff to attack her out of spite. As she slices off its tongue and skewers its soft throat upon the tip of her blade, Link shrugs at the merchant. She assists a gerudo woman and her hylian-sheikah wife, on the road to their hometown, in escaping from a pack of floating cacti that bear down upon them. And then she continues on.

Not all monsters come in vaguely humanoid shape. She learns of their Parapan names from travellers. Keese lit up the night with their electrifying yellow wings. Link need only watch a traveller's horse fall to the earth as though struck by a bolt of lightning to learn to dispatch the yellow keese first. Giant centipede-like geldarm crawl up from holes bored into the ground to wave with the wind. She comes to know the floating cacti from earlier as peahats; they apparently make for an excellent method of transportation with special hookshots crafted in the Parapan region. A single bomb—or the impact of Ilia's hooves—retreats the peahats into the rock. Floating red monsters that Link initially mistakes for lanterns—bari, as the travellers call them—generate fields of static that zap her through the metal of her blade or her cooking pot. She remembers these from the tower on the wetlands near the Thundra Plateau, but there, months ago, she simply executed her master plan to defeat them: running away at all costs. Here, she notches her bow and cleaves the bari in two.

Both halves reform, throbbing with electricity, into twice the trouble as before.

Link touches her chin, nods sagely, and returns to her previous master plan.

Running away at all costs.

At the end of the pass, within a bowl of the mountain protected by guards stationed around tall pillars that serve as sentry towers, Link reaches the town of Aveil. A massive steel fence laced with topaz to deter monsters runs around the border of the settlement. A similar electrified gate spans over the archway between the pass and the whole of Parapa.

The guards at the checkpoint examine all those who pass through for suspected Yiga activity. The line of merchants and other visitors stretches on. At the front of Aveil sit tables and umbrellas for shade from the rising heat of the afternoon; locals sell food and drink for those queueing up.

When Link arrives at the gate, just over a fortnight since she set out from Kotake, a guard hands her a slip of paper with some writing. She glances down, then glances back up at the guard with an unsteady smile. "I can't read Parapan," she signs.

The guard looks at the paper. "Your number's, let's see, fourteen-oh-one-eighty-seven. Wait until you're called to be checked." She pauses; the corners of her mouth curve up and Link finds she can breathe again. "Relax, kid. No one's going to bite you. Is this your first time in Parapa?"

"...that I can remember."

The guard pats her on the back. "Enjoy yourself. May the Goddess guide your feet."

Link takes a seat beneath one of the umbrellas. Her stomach rumbles. She glances around at the tables of other travellers, some asleep, some fanning themselves, some conversing of their destinations. Her gaze alights on a young girl selling ripened slices of hydromelon.

"Do you take monster parts?"

The girl does. Eltah, she names herself, who picks hydromelon from her own garden to sell during the afternoon and invests all profits back into her garden. She speaks shyly. Link has the impression that Eltah would rather run off to dig herself up to the neck in garden soil, and so she gives Eltah double the asking price.

Eltah's entire expression lifts up all at once. The girl raises her hand to her cheek to pinch herself. Link finds herself laughing a light little laugh; she chips in another red rupee's worth of bari jelly.
Link watches Eltah walk off, arms laden with keese wings and geldarm antennae, to show her sales to an older woman who watches over the young girl from beneath a parasol. Eltah beams and the older woman smiles at her. The latter lifts her gaze towards Link, who steps backwards as the hairs on the back of her neck stiffen, but the woman merely shows her a gesture of appreciation.

Link bites into the hydromelon and the icy sweetness makes her eyelids flutter. She retrieves rock salt from her satchel to sprinkle onto the flesh of the fruit, making the melon all the sweeter by contrast. As she eats, she listens to the numbers called.

"Twenty-one-oh-two-eighty-six!" yells out the guard, a curved rock-hewn cone serving to amplify her voice.

Link considers her own number on the sheet of paper she cannot read. Ye twenty-one-oh-two-eighty-six does not count like fourteen-oh-one-eighty-seven.

She eats, and she listens, and she waits. Link removes the feathered tunic and rolls up her undershirt's sleeves. When she polishes off the hydromelon, she sucks the last of the juice from the rind, then finds another hawker to purchase not a slice but an entire fruit. The afternoon draws on. Sweat drips salt over her skin. The queue piles up. As the sky heats up from the sun bearing down upon Aveil, more and more exit the queue to take shelter in the shade.

Link observes that the travellers tend to wear thin, loose robes that cloak them from head to toe. She considers the possibility of desert, the hot wind and tossed up sand. Still, others wear clothing more casual.

The travellers around her discuss the rising and falling supply and demand of their various wares. They talk of family in Parapa, of the villages and towns to which they return, or of those to which they have never been. They talk of the outside world, of the never-ending torrent around Zora's Domain that blocks their travels, of parties of hunters attempting to bag the lynels that roam the Hebric snowfields, of a new trader's town forming in Akkala. "Akkala?" spouts one zora, folding her arms across her chest. "I don't buy it. Who's gonna make a hub tucked up in a corner like that?"

"You'd be surprised," answers the sheikah who bears the news. "These guys are tough. They're architects by trade, I think, but they could sell back Zola Her own flipper, and She'd call it a steal." The zora glares at her. She lifts her hands in self-defence. "Just saying. I think they're trying to develop the land since no one's lived up there in nearly a century."

"Akkala was," murmurs a goron with a softness that brings the conversationalists to look upon him for the first time since Link sat down near them, "the hardest hit outside of the Great Field. May my extended family be hewn anew."

Some mutter their sympathies; others clear their throats and endeavour to move on. They talk of the monsters more recently sighted out in Parapa, of not even how the stone-closed mountain tunnels and the topaz-electrified gate have successfully kept most out. They talk of how the monsters have migrated over the mountains regardless of the best efforts of the guards, though—as one rito trader of Parapan pottery notes—Parapa appears to have a smaller monster problem than the other regions he has visited.

They talk of the River Sageru that cascades from the icy mountains of the Parapan highlands down through the fertile land below. They talk of the river polluted with water octoroks and other monsters that have travelled down from the snowy peaks. They talk of the prospects for the coming wet season and whether the river will flood enough for them to grow enough crops until the next wet season comes.
They talk of lighter things.

They talk of music styles becoming more popular in Parapa, of the return of the traditional six-stringed harp known as the ages to more frequent use after having fallen out of favour with the last generation. They joke of how the pendulum of culture swings so easily back and forth, of how every daughter wants to do something separate from her mother and ends up doing the same as her grandmother. They talk of the upcoming celebration of the new year; two red-haired sisters—traders of potion and elixir—express anxiety about how long their travels have taken, how they may not return to their home village in time for the spring festival. They talk of weddings and feasts; a sheikah man takes suggestions on what gifts he could present to his gerudo fiancée's family. They talk of family and birthdays; a gerudo woman relays the story of having thrown a birthday bash for a goron friend of hers only to realise all too late that gorons do not eat cake. They talk of all of the foods that they long to try back home—so say the returning—or for the first time—so say the visitors. Here Link listens in closely. She withdraws parchment on which to scrawl down names of foods or snatches of recipes. Even if she cannot write in Parapan, she can approximate names and ingredients in Necludan.

Then a different conversation catches Link's attention: Nabooru, she hears from a woman with red hair and pointed ears, has closed off its borders to everyone not expressly from the city for fear of the Divine Beast and from frequent attacks by the Yiga. "And at such a time, too!" she bemoans to those sitting nearby. "If any of you know some way of getting into the city, I'd be grateful."

A gerudo woman, looking up from her glass of cool voltfruit juice, props her chin up on her hand, then sets the glass down on the table. "What're you trying to go there for?"

The first woman opens and closes her mouth. "Is it so wrong to want to visit a capital once in your life? I long to see the famed golden palace!"

"If you don't have a reason, you might as well wait for this sandstorm thing to blow over." The second woman chuckles to herself. "No pun intended, but I'll take what I can get. It's been, what, a year? It'll calm down. Until then it's a deathtrap. Can't recommend trying to be an Oracle of Farore here. Right, Nissa?"

Another gerudo woman—a green headscarf shielding her head from the sun—chimes in, her voice soft and melodic. "Savah Naboris has been moving ever closer to the city. I...cannot recommend visiting unless you absolutely need to go. They have shut the gates for a reason. You know as well as I that Makeela Riju—" It takes Link a second to infer that makeela means queen, or something close. "—may Her Majesty live long by Her Grace, would never do so without reason."

The woman with the pointed ears slumps backwards in her seat. "Yadda yadda. Look, I don't mean to disrespect Her Majesty, but even a queen's wrong sometimes. She's only human."

"What'd you say about Queen Sariju!?" A woman on Nissa's other side has leaped to her feet. The one called Nissa rests a hand on the angered woman's arm; with a huff she returns to her chair. "Don't let me catch you with Her Majesty's name in your mouth ever again."

Nissa puts a finger to her lips. "She's not wrong. Even Her Majesty is fallible. That said, I do not think she has erred."

"Yeah, listen to your girlfriend," snides the woman with the pointed ears.

The barely-calmed woman springs up again, hands clenched and fists raised. Before the situation can escalate further, a red-scaled zora stands up. He clears his throat and claps his webbed hands. "Ladies, ladies, there's no need to fight. You're all pretty."
The woman holding the glass of voltafruit juice snorts out a laugh. "Pretty dead if you go near Nabooru, that's for sure."

The one named Nissa once more convinces her short-tempered companion to sit. The woman with the pointed ears does not comment on the city instead; she slinks off with her hood pulled up over her face.

They talk of the desert that has spread. Once confined a small portion of the southwest of Parapa known as the province of Tantari, the homeland of a pastoral gerudo people called the Zuna. Yet the Divine Beast Vah Naboris's storms of sand and thunder have spread the Tantari Desert further and further with each passing day. Already the border villages have evacuated, and raids by the Yiga have grown alarmingly more frequent.

An enterprising merchant attempts to use the opportunity to hawk his sand boots, "ideal for waltzing on the dunes!" The glances of others less amused lead him to gather the boots in his arms and sulk like a cat denied dinner.

They talk of the city of Nabooru closing down. They talk of the marketplace having moved outside Nabooru to an almost completely unprotected location out of desperation of visiting merchants to find a place to peddle their wares. They refer to the marketplace as the khara khara bazaar, though from the snickers in their mouths and the manner in which one gerudo mother holds her hands over her daughter's ears brings Link to suspect that khara khara may not reflect the marketplace's true name.

They talk—

"Fourteen-oh-one-eighty-seven!"

—and Link lifts herself to her feet.

By now evening has washed the sliver of sky visible from the canyon in hues of blue and violet. The orange sandstone cliffs of the mountains wind upwards towards the sparse white clouds overhead.

Link has never seen a bluer sky, not in all of the land once known as Hyrule, than the skies of Parapa. She memorises this exact shade of blue. A tint of the sky that she wants to wrap around herself like the wind.

Someday she will find fabric of that hue, or a method of dyeing, and someday she will wear that sky around her shoulders as she wears the loftwing around her neck.

"Once more: fourteen-oh-one-eighty-seven! Going once! Going twice!"

Link shakes her head, clapping her palms against her cheeks to awaken herself, and walks towards the guard that calls her name; the guard directs Link to a pair that stand before the topaz gate, one holding a clipboard, the other some sort of squirrel-like beastie with a long snout.

The border guards ask her for her name, for her place of origin, for her destination, for her purpose, for all that she plans to bring with her. The volume of questions slams against her like a tidal wave or a too-spicy bite of curry. Link sways back and forth. She can no longer feel her hands attached to her wrists. Her The woman holding the long-snouted creature notices first. She calls over a chair for Link, who sits down heavily, and then the guard asks the questions again. More slowly this time.

Link answers them one by one with a smile halfway of gratitude and halfway of exhaustion. The long-snouted beastie sniffs all of her belongings as well as everything she carries on Ilia.

When she remarks that she has no destination but the Divine Beast Vah Naboris, the guards exchange glances. "How's that again?" asks the woman with the clipboard, now tucked under her arm.

Link touches her hand to her chin. If she tells them now of the slate, they could either suspect her of being Yiga, or of faking, or of a thousand other possibilities, or they could herald her as a hero when she wants nothing more than to deliver the slate to capable hands that can calm the Divine Beast without her potentially running it into Nabooru as she nearly the Divine Beast Vah Medoh into Medli.

She has no words but three: "Please believe me."

"Do you have some kind of death wish?" inquires the woman with the long-snouted creature; the beastie sneezes.

Link shakes her head. "Not at all. I've got Ilia to take care of, and many promises to keep."

The woman with the long-snouted creature raps her knuckles against her jawline. "I don't know about this."

"Is this your first time in Parapa?" asks the clipboard woman, seemingly less interested in Link's well-being, or possibly trusting Link to not commit suicide against the flank of the Divine Beast, and Link nods. "Steer clear of the sand. Not only do we have a monster infestation on our hands, but you don't appear to have the proper attire. It's hot in the day and cold at night, and if you think you can strip yourself bare to escape the heat, you're asking for a sunburn and a sandburn at once."

Link swallows.

"If you're some tourist intend to going sightseeing to Savah Naboris out in Tantari, you'll only end up injuring yourself and others. If you insist, get used to the desert and hire an expert." The woman with the clipboard peers down at Link from half again her height. "Is that understood?"

She touches her chin again, more firmly this time, as though gripping the bone of her chin could flex more blood to her brain for thinking. "I'll be at a safe distance," Link says. She does not lie: "I have no intention of dying." She grins at them and snaps her fingers. "And I've already gone sightseeing at the Divine Beasts of Eldin and Tabantha!"

The two guards look at one another again. The long-snouted beastie makes a blepping noise as its tongue lolls from its jaws.

The woman calling out numbers yells at them to know the nature of the hold-up. The woman with the clipboard shrugs. "I don't see any rules being broken."

Her companion's brow knits. "...Goddesses help me, all right. State your name, age, and origin one more time for the record, please."

The woman with the clipboard dips her brush into ink and raises her eyebrows at Link, who takes a moment to rehearse her words in her head before she lifts her hands. "I am Link, nineteen years of age—" She does not remember her birthday, but she has been eighteen for more than a year now. "—of Romani Ranch of Kotake, near Mount Satori, south of Tabantha and west of Central."

The woman with the clipboard nods decisively. The guard with the long-snouted creature pins to Link's chest a folded yellow sheet of paper bearing writing that she cannot read, alongside a stamp that looks like a tiny camel.

"Don't lose that. It's a sign that you've been checked in; it states where you're going, and for what purpose. If anyone stops you and asks, you have to present your pass." The woman with the long-snouted creature narrows her eyes until Link starts to bob her head. "Without that pass, you can't purchase anything from merchants, and people will report you to the authorities. Am I clear?" Link continues to bob her head. "Now go to the waiting area up ahead."

She reaches towards Ilia to stroke her companion's forehead. Then: "...thank you."

"Wait." The woman with the clipboard, tucking it under her arm once more. "You've got anxiety problems or something?" Link pales. "I'm talking about when we were asking you questions. If you're going to start panicking like that in the middle of a crowd, folks might not get what's going on. Tensions have been tight lately with the Yiga on the rise. You get me? Just be careful."

Link nods without understanding, and the woman with the long-snouted creature gestures her forward.

The waiting area up ahead, she discovers, consists of a smaller lounge of tables beneath umbrellas, this time of merchants and visitors checked in and found sufficient to pass. Unlike the gates of Darunia which allow travellers throughout the day, the topaz gate opens only at sunset to let everyone through at once, in that thin sliver of twilight when daytime monsters have ceased their activities and the night is about to start bumping.

Link waits, and waits, and waits some more. The sun begins to sink. Her head droops; she paps her own cheek to keep herself awake. Standing up from her seat, Link smacks her cooking pot onto the table.

The other travellers stare at her as she steps out from under the umbrellas' shade to feel the rocks with her hands. With the evening only having just arrived to sink the world into blue, the stones retain their spring-sun warmth. Link nestles the pot on top of a domed stone. She whistles for Ilia, who trots over to lick the crown of Link's head. Her bangs stick upwards from her companion's saliva.

Link bursts out laughing.

Once she has finished doubling over, she retrieves the milk from Ilia's saddlebags. Link opens the cloth skin and sniffs: not rotten at all, though she detects a slightly sour scent, albeit not the same sourness of spoilage. She shrugs and pours the milk into the pot, alongside flour and butter for a thick stew. Link has nothing in the way of meat, but she does have a vial of monster.

She uncorks the vial. The savory-salt-sweetness rolls over her and she closes her eyes, simply inhaling the elixir for a time. Then Link adds a single drop to the stew. The violet spreads out like a corruption of malice.

If only she could eat the malice with equivalent gusto. Then she could take on the entirety of the Divine Beast herself. Fighting the forces of Malice with the forces of her stomach.

Perhaps then Link could believe herself the chosen hero, on account of her bottomless void of a belly. Perhaps then Romani could take over for her, having a stomach so bottomless that she may even one day surpass Link.

While she waits for the stew to simmer down, Link retrieves a vial of spring green elixir from Ilia's saddlebags and tips her head to down it. She returns the now empty vial into the wooden box she acquired months ago in Medigo. Link wipes her mouth, then licks the back of her hand to lap up the last few drops, then licks the back of her hand again as though emulating a cat lapping up slightly salty taste of sweat on her skin.

When she realises what she's doing, she slowly lowers her hand, her tongue still poking out of her mouth.

Link lifts the lid a crack and inhales the steam that vapours up from the cooking pot. She wafts it towards her. Already she can sense the cuccoflesh riding the line of her spine and stretching outwards across her shoulders to her hands. Her legs shiver restlessly. Her body curls inwards as the cool evening air chills the sweat that slicks the back of her neck.

Link lifts her beloved cooking pot to her lap. Its curved bottom warms her thighs and abdomen, and she embraces the pot protectively.

Then she regards the other travellers.

"Does anyone want stew with monster extract?" She pauses. "No poultry or meat."

The travellers shift in their seats. Link holds up the pot. She uses the soup ladle—the one Cremia gave her—to scoop out a portion. Tilting her head back she drinks deep, then pwahs out her satisfaction as the heat rises up her body.

A woman sitting not a chair away—Link recognises her by the green headscarf as the quiet one earlier named Nissa—politely holds out a bowl. "If you wouldn't mind...I would have some."

Link ladles the thick purple stew into Nissa's bowl. The woman in the green headscarf brings the bowl to her mouth and sips experimentally. Link can hear the collective held breath of everyone in the waiting area, leaning forward, eyes widened of those that can see, hearts pounding in anticipation of the inevitable judgment.

No one stirs.

Link can hear the roar of her own blood in her ears.

Her greatest challenge yet: convincing others of her cooking.

The corners of Nissa's lips wobble. The crowd leans in.

A smile.

"It's wonderful!" she cries out, and her companion slaps her knee.

"Goddess Din burn me up, that's the loudest I've heard you talk since Miurah proposed, Nissa!" Nissa's companion guffaws while Nissa herself drains her portion of stew. Suddenly everyone has produced a bowl or a cup, reaching their eager hands towards Link.

She gives every outstretched hand she can find a ladleful and then begins upon seconds once everyone has had some. Link leaves the very last portion at the bottom of the pot for herself. Most thank her; some do not thank her vocally but express their gratitude with the grins on their mouths and the joy-angled tilt of their eyes.

For that brief moments beneath the umbrellas the motley medley of merchants and travellers, of the homeward-bound and the starry-eyed, come together as one to taste of the stew. In their smiles and their glances at one another, in their sharing of bowls and utensils, in the spices and salts passed around, she can see a thousand promises.

And as for Link: she has her own portion, and with the fragrance of danger comes the remembrance of another danger.

Not monsters.

But a fear that reaches far deeper into her gut. A danger that she cannot quell through application of blade.

The faint stirrings of memory do not come in all at once but in snatches. The royal escort to the village of Ordon and her begging to enter the sleepy village alone, to hide from the fanfare, to avoid the swarm of people, to go as quiet as she can.

Her creeping into the house, into that house. The three letters that she had written with hands shaking so badly she could scarcely hold the pen long enough to complete them.

The first letter left on the kitchen counter.

The second for the girl who smelled of horses, and the last for the blacksmith who had given her the ticket to freedom. To the latter she added an apology for having failed the final courier task Rusl set out for her: sword and board to the castle. To the former she tucked in a small carving of wood painted light blue. She had not time to wake them. She had not time to explain what had occurred on her seemingly routine visit to the castletown. She had not time to say farewell.

She would, later. Or she wanted to, at least.

But now the escort had given her less than an hour to do what she must and then return to once again take up her position as she, chosen by the sword that seals the darkness.

She remembers the thunder in her chest, the gale in her lungs, the monsoon in her veins.

She remembers: her sneaking into the bedroom she shared with her sister.

Her scooping Aryll into her arms along with the blanket, along with Aryll's most precious things, clothing and stuffed dolls and the red telescope Marin gave her and the book of birds the girl who smelled of horses gave her, everything that Link could fit into a satchel to carry with her.

Aryll's eyelids fluttering. Aryll stirring in Link's embrace as she crossed the shadows of Ordon with the blade of evil's bane's weight burning at her back.

The movements of Aryll's hands. Reaching up to touch Link's cheeks, to stretch her ears, to poke at her nose.

Herself, pausing at the boundaries of the village, sitting Aryll down upon the cool ground and crouching beside her. Waiting for the drowsiness in Aryll's eyes to fade just enough to catch the spark of recognition.

"Aryll," Link signed, the trembling in her hands shuddering her words, "you're the most wonderful little sister I could ask for."

Aryll rubbing at her eyelids with the heels of her hands. Aryll answering back in the sleepy swaying of a child aslumber: you're the best big sister I could ask for too.
And then.

I love you big sister!

And then.

It's cold.

Link wrapped the blanket more tightly around her. "It won't be cold for much longer," she whispered with her fingers against Aryll's chest, tracing the words into her sister's pyjamas. "It won't be cold ever again."

"All right, ladies and non-ladies, welcome to Parapa." The woman with the long cone shouts so loudly that the fragments of memory flicker once more into fog. Link looks up to see the woman attentive before the topaz gate. "Open it up, girls! All of you, present your papers, please."

The travellers shuffle forward into a queue. This line proceeds much more rapidly than the last as each traveller presents their respective yellow pass. Link holds out hers in the palm of her hand like a paper bird. The guard opens it, reads it with a squint to her eye, and stamps it firmly in orange. "Welcome to Parapa," she says.

Link beams.

The topaz gates lattice the entrance to Parapa in silver and gold. As she cranes her neck upwards, she watches the crest of the gate open first: a sliver of light passing through the crack, a sliver that cascades downwards into a torrent as the gates part in two.

The bluest sky that she has ever seen stretches onwards beyond the gate, rippling with bands of violet to blue to scarlet with the faint lingering whispers of the day, a last wave farewell before the moon rises for her nightly watch.

Link lifts her hands to the faint scattering of the early stars. Here the stars differ than those of which Hestu told her. Here the constellations warp their angles; here the constellations of the north fade away to darkness; here new constellations she cannot recall with her conscious mind but which her body remembers rise from the southern sands.

Yet no matter the names or the count of the stars she feels their warmth upon her skin, and when she holds out her hands, her palms catch starlight all the same.

As with the smiles of the people around the campfire, seeking communion in the warmth of a meal and one another's eyes.

She could wander the world and find a home wherever she sets down her cooking pot. She need not know a word in a stranger's tongue to know the melodies tasted on their tongue. Every region, every village, every being with their own preferences, with their own tastes, with their own stories conducted in the passing of meal to mouth.

For all of the stars in the sky combined, they shine their light upon the land that rolls in green beneath her feet, a gently sloping flatness across to the seas far on the horizon. From here the view encapsulates an entire world in the cradle of the white-crested mountains and the white-crested waves alike, bisected by the river of their Goddess that carries life in Her waters, curving greenery where She bends, emptying Her arteries into the oceans that surround the land known as Hyrule.

Link bends her left knee. She presses her foot down upon the rock of Parapa, and the heel of her boot clicks against the stone.
"What do you say, girl?" Link lifts a hand to her companion's cheek, to stroke the tender skin on the underside of Ilia's eye with a gossamer thumb. She speaks not with her arms but with the gentle cup of her hand, the soft motions of her fingers, the warmth of her palm. "How many delicious things are we going to find here?"

Ilia pushes her wet warm nose into Link's cheek, and the horse's girl bursts into a laughter that brings tears to her eyes.

So long as she remains alive; so long as she has blood in her veins and breath in her lungs; so long as the sun, the moon, and the earth exist, everything will be all right.

—

Monster Soup (one-quarter heart) - fresh milk, goat butter, monster extract, Tabantha wheat

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: So this is a bit of a different chapter, since most of the chapter is spent Link simply sitting around waiting for the gate to open while she observes the sorts of people who are trying to Parapa.

Proper attire for going out into the desert: light, loose, and long robes that cover your body entirely. They shield you from the sand and the sun, and the loose robes keep air circulating over your body to cool you off. Contrary to Breath of the Wild, going out mostly-naked is a surefire way to get yourself seriously injured if not killed.

The border settlement of Aveil is named after the gerudo woman whom Nabooru leaves in charge in Ocarina of Time and her Terminan counterpart, Aveil, pirate queen of the Great Bay in Majora's Mask.

We find out in this chapter that the city of Nabooru is closed to outsiders. That'll be relevant later!

The comment about the zora goddesss Zola's flippers is a reference to the zora flippers that Link can obtain in a variety of games, including A Link to the Past, Link's Awakening, Oracle of Ages and Oracle of Seasons, The Minish Cap, and A Link Between Worlds.

The "Great Field" is another name for the Hyrule Field, since different regions of Hyrule can refer to things differently.

The numbers called out by the guards reference dates. The number called before Link (21 February 1976) is the release of The Legend of Zelda. The number assigned Link (14 January 1987) is the release of The Adventure of Link.

"Makeela Riju" is how Riju signs her name in Breath of the Wild, so I extrapolated that "makeela" is her title. Riju also prefers to be called Riju, but some of her bigger fans like the woman here elevate her to godly status by calling her Sariju.

The joke about Kara Kara Bazaar ("khara khara") is just an amusing bilingual throw-in. Given how much the gerudo in-game are racially fetishised caricatures of Middle Eastern women, particularly Arab women, one would have expected the writers of Breath of the Wild to at least make sure that their major named gerudo settlement outside of Gerudo Town wouldn't mean something rude in the language of the people they're fetishising, but that would mean that they'd have to do the tiniest bit of research instead of just drawing a group of sexualised brown women whose entire culture is built on them having to seek foreign husbands whom they literally refer to as mates. Really makes me think. Really activates my almonds. Ahem.

Link really does consider Romani Ranch her home. And yes, it's been over a year!

The memory might seem a bit confusing. We'll go more in-depth later, but essentially, after acquiring the Master Sword, Link goes to retrieve her little sister Aryll to bring her back to the castle.

The Zuna (pastoral people) are named after the Zuna who dwell in the Desert of Doubt in Four Swords Adventures.

The sand boot merchant, of course, is a reference to the sidequest wherein Link can obtain sand boots and snow boots.

The city of Nabooru, of course, is named after the Sage of Spirit from Ocarina of Time as well as the town of the same name from The Adventure of Link.

As always, a warm thanks to my marvellous and wonderful beta reader Emma for being patient with me as I frantically cross-referenced twenty other chapters to ensure that I haven't been tripping up my own world-building! And thank you to you, the reader, who has stuck with me all this way.

Next time: Link's first foray into Parapa—and our (not really first) look at Urbosa. As a reminder to the reader, in Delicious in Wilds, Urbosa is two years older than Zelda (i.e. when Zelda is eighteen, Urbosa is twenty).

midna's ass. 27 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: This is such a cool chapter to me. Its pacing and setup are so completely unlike pretty much anything else in the entire series. How often is a chapter comprised mostly of dialogue, but also features mostly characters who don't recur? Not many - maybe not any, outside of this one. Plus this chapter has some really great bits of dialogue. As a whole it's a very unique bit of Delicious in Wilds, which is something I really enjoy.

This chapter's memory is really sweet and, due to stuff that happens later, made me cry on reread. Aryll deserved better.

Emma. 27 September 2017.
Chapter Summary

Exiting Aveil, the travelling chef begins the journey through Parapa and reminisces about the previous Champion of Sageru.

Chapter Notes

As usual, notes that can't fit into the ending box: By the way, while I describe some characters as wearing headwear or headscarves, it's notable that those are for protection against the sun and as traditional in some parts of Parapa (similar to say headscarves worn by certain Eastern European groups) and is not meant to be reflective of real-world religious beliefs (i.e. those worn by some Jewish and Muslim women, etc.), except that such traditions could have sprung from somewhat similar circumstances.

The bows with strange mechanisms mentioned in this chapter are in reference to those such as the duplex bows, which let you fire two shots with a single arrow (a savage lynel bow with five-shot burst can loose fire shots with a single arrow). The radiant shield is an in-game item, although here I have also included elements of the mirror shields from A Link to the Past, Link's Awakening, Ocarina of Time, Majora's Mask, Oracle of Ages and Oracle of Seasons, The Wind Waker, and The Minish Cap. It's important to note that, while in Breath of the Wild, you can parry any attack with a simple wooden pot lid including guardian lasers, I find that silly. Parrying guardian lasers required a specific kind of shield with a mirrored surface inlaid with diamond, which is capable of absorbing the laser energy (diamonds are utilised to craft in-game items that provide anti-guardian defense, after all). Because the mirror shield is associated with the gerudo in Ocarina of Time, I opted to give the making of such shields to the gerudo, who are known to creatively work with jewels in Breath of the Wild.

Scimitars are indeed intended for use on horseback rather than in hand-to-hand combat, at least as far as I know. The lizalfos mask and pheromones are in reference to the lizalfos mask that Link can purchase in-game.

Oh, right, the River Sageru mentioned in the previous chapter is a complete fabrication, but it's akin to the River Hylia and the Zora River from Breath of the Wild. It runs from the snows of the highlands down through Parapa into the ocean. Speaking of the ocean, instead of having insurmountable mountains that Link can't climb for no reason, I expanded the size of Hyrule and opted to make Hyrule its own continent. It's surrounded by water, except to the north.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Over the flatness of the land Link can see, to the south, the gently sloping dunes of the open Tantari Desert shadowed grey by the distance. From the boundless sands protrude columns and shapes that she cannot make out. And beyond that: the great yellow-grey cloud of sand and dust. Her fingers brush against the red telescope at her left hip.

She brings the telescope to her mouth, touches her lips to the etchings of seagulls drawn in Aryll's scratchy hand. As a thank-you. As a promise to see her again. Then Link lifts the scope to her eye.

Into the bowels of the storm just visible in the horizon she peers, adjusting the telescope, to divine what may lie beyond the curtain of thunder. Nearly constant bolts of branching lightning strike green, like a forest of trees that grows and dies in less than a second. The piercing light aches her eyes, but she looks on and tips the telescope higher.

A shadow.

A shadow that rises from the heart of the cloud to a height she cannot grasp.

From the darkness at the base of the cloud through which Link cannot see, a tower—a spire, albeit taller than most spires she has climbed—sails upwards to the slightly less dense crown of the storm. No, not a tower: it moves. Steadily, so steadily that from this distance she nearly took action for stillness, but it moves. A dull violet light shines from the very top. Not one violet light, but two. She adjusts her scope still further to watch.

The head of the spire drifts. Does it rotate? Link watches the second glow come into view from its far side.

And then the tower-not-a-tower is gazing directly at her.

Two glowing points of that violent violet she has come to know with the intimate familiarity of a life-long lover, with the familiarity of a chef that has carved down of the hunt and made riceballs of its meat and stew of its marrow and gelatin of the bones.

Link drops the telescope. The red telescope falls softly into the grass and Ilia whinnies. Link dismounts her to take the telescope up once more and peer more closely, but already the head has turned past its zenith and continued to swing about, the two lights once more turning to one.

Not meant towards her.

Not meant towards her at all.

The topaz gate of Aveil closes once more. Parapa greets her with a series of booths in the shade of Taafei Hill: a veritable marketplace for some merchants to unload their wares and others to stock. They sell clothing more fitting to the hotter areas of Parapa and those more fitting to the colder; guidebooks for travellers in nearly every language Link can think of; paper and ink; stations for writing letters to be passed to the other side of the topaz gate for the occasional volunteer couriers that brave the trek; weaponry and armour built to survive the monsters that inhabit the land, from grotesquely expensive radiant shields mirrored to better reflect the fire-light of guardians, to arrows and spears tipped with gems claiming to dispel enemies of fire and of ice in a single blow, to wood or steel bows fashioned with a unique mechanism of cleaving an arrow in two to strike the enemy twice, to the curved scimitar for use on horseback and when riding camels or sand seals, the latter of which brings Link to raise her eyebrows; boots made for walking upon sand; boots made for walking upon snow; boots made for walking, in general; colourful elixirs of every sort lined up in thick cylinders of rainbowed light: light red for resistance to heat and greyish-blue for resistance to cold and a vivid gold for resistance to shock and more colours beside than she could hazard a guess; masks that resemble lizalfos along with bottles of a product called lizalfos pheromones which advertises to hide its wearer in the scent of real lizalfos; maps of the region; electric fans that give Link pause. The owner of this last booth, a gerudo woman approaching the age of the elderly, beams at Link when she pokes a finger towards such a fan. The contraption better resemble a propeller made of wood rather than the enforced paper fans Link has seen before. Link lifts her head to the merchant.

"Caught your eye, did it?" The woman speaks in a Central Hyrulean lightly susurrused by a Parapan accent. "No matter the danger or the trouble, we are innovators if nothing else." Link can hear the tones of speech practised for foreigners. "The fan you see here harnesses the electricity stored in topaz. Observe!" The merchant picks up the small wooden fan. A propeller affixed to a cylindrical handle, about the size of her palm. On the back of the propeller Link observes thin wires of metal looping around a circular shenanigan. Indicating a raised panel on the back of the handle, the woman holds the handle in such a way that her hand depresses the panel. "And...watch this."

For a second: nothing. Then a spark runs over the circular shenanigan and the fan breathes into life. The propeller begins to turn, more and more quickly, until the circular shenanigan starts to hum. From the centre of the rotating blades a column of air starts to flow.

Link's eyes widen.

The merchant chuckles. She brings the fan up to Link's palm; the coolness flows over her skin. The woman lifts it to Link's face. The propeller chills the sweat that has gathered on her upper brow.

The merchant shuts off the fan and the slightly uncomfortable heat returns.

"What do you say?"

Link bobs her head with a grin, and then the woman names her price.

Wiping sweat from her brow with the back of her hand, thankful for the chill of the evening air that has lapped the remaining flickers of heat from the day, Link walks onwards to her next stop: clothing meant for the desert. Of linen and cotton, loose and flowing, though sturdy enough to offer protection from the wind. She finds the inner thighs of riding jodhpurs for riding reinforced. Some fabrics dye lightly, others dark. The merchant assures her that the dark fabrics, despite Link's intuition, do not transfer any more heat than do the light, "and the darkness around your eyes can help in focusing your vision without glare, miss." Link runs her hands over the offerings, their softness and lightness, and picks out a set of forest-green and sky-blue: a long dress-like robe as outerwear, jodhpurs—loose around the thighs—meant for riding, and headwear to protect her face.

"Pardon me, miss, but I hope you're aware that you won't need that unless you plan to go deep into the desert," the vendor remarks politely. "There's no need to waste your rupees. It's a common misconception."

"Thank you," Link signs almost automatically and only then do the woman's words reach her ears. "No, I do plan to visit the desert. Can you ride horses there? In the desert. I don't remember...I don't know if they can ride on sand."

"...I have to say that I don't know," she admits, fiddling with the bracelet on her left wrist. "I'm no expert on horses, but you could consider renting a sand seal or camel, depending on your needs. There's a stable down the road where you could ask."

"Thank you," Link responds again. Sand seals again. She pays for the robes. The vendor rolls them up for her and slots them in a wooden cylinder for safekeeping.

"Have a safe trip, and may the Goddess guide your feet."

At the far end Link finds a stable. Travellers trade in their horses tired from the journey through the pass to obtain fresh ones for the road ahead. Link takes a moment to solemnly assure Ilia that she will never trade her in; Ilia licks Link's bangs until they flare up above her forehead.

Without a letter from Lady Impa Link has no excuse to enter the city of Nabooru, yet that does not matter. She would not trust herself to pace through the Divine Beast, for several reasons that she counts to herself on her fingers while Ilia browses through her hair: Link knows little about Parapa, having forgotten much of what the person who once inhabited her body must have known; she knows little about the layout of the land and could well crash the Divine Beast into an occupied area; and if she dies within the Divine Beast, then the slate would be lost, and she has no method of tracking how long activation of a terminal might last for someone else to make an attempt. Link cannot bear the chance of losing the hope that the Parapans and the people of wherever the Divine Beast Vah Ruta—and any Divine Beasts besides that, though Kass's song specified four—have.

The slate that she covers with her satchel digs into the skin of her right hip.

Link should have recruited a rito who could—in event of emergency—fly up and out. Perhaps she still can.

Perhaps Revali should have become the hero after all, unless the hero counts among their necessary qualifiers an ability to prepare delicious food.

As the hour draws long, the crowd of shoppers thins, either to inns for the night or out towards their destinations. One zora, evidently inebriated by his swaying and reliance upon a hylian companion as an arms and upper body-rest, croaks that the guards of the topaz gate must specifically allow visitors in solely at the evening to extract a toll of a night's pay at Aveil's inns.

Link saddles Ilia and trots off into the night.

Parapa does not wait long to introduce her to the infestation of monsters. She first spots an odd collection of moving rocks, vaguely tan against the green of the steppe. As she rides closer, she notes the red insect-crab-things affixed to the shells, each monster approximately the size of Ilia, with long feelers that twitch through the air. Link slows Ilia to a steady walk. Yet the instant she passes through some invisible barrier the feelers of the monsters closest to her spring upwards. She has not time to breathe when the monsters have whirled around her.

Link flicks the reins and squeezes Ilia's thighs to force her into a gallop. Her companion neighs at the suddenness. Link whips her head around to track the monsters only to find them rolling—sparking with lightning—towards her, outpacing the stride of Ilia's hooves. Link jerks Ilia to the left. The monsters, coiled up like gorons, roll past her, but just as Link looks back, another beast begins to speed towards her.

She cannot outrun them on Ilia, and she cannot stand on foot to fight so many at once unless she suddenly sparks an interest in breaking every bone in her body.

As strange as it may sound, Link has a vested interest in the exact opposite.

She does, however, have one tool at her disposal that holds the key to any puzzle she cannot solve.
Bombs.

The spherical bomb apparaets atop the slate and she rolls it behind it. She waits for the bomb to pass the monsters before detonating. The explosion launches the shells into the air. She observes the red insect-crab-things that flop out of the shells' grooves. Notching the glitter-black ancient bow gifted in the Tabanch shrine, Link contracts her arm.

The bow—perhaps weakened by time—shatters in her hands.

With a breath sharp enough to cut her throat Link grabs her other bow: the one that she took from the flight range, the one Amali gifted her.

With a one, a two, and a three, she picks off a trio of the monsters. The impacts of the arrows bounce the shells away from her; the monster skid through the grass.

Before she can celebrate, another wave of insect-crab-things launches towards her. No, not one, but two. This time Link throws a spherical and a cubic bomb at one. The circular bomb rolls farther past the shells; the detonation knocks the further wave away and the closer wave towards the cubic, which explodes to spike them back. The insect-crab-things disintegrate from the burst of energy and heat.

She feels Ilia tiring beneath her. Link rubs her flank as if to say not long now, girl: by now she has razed through most of the monsters. Only six or seven remain, rolling towards her with reckless abandon, going faster, faster, faster faster faster. She tries the trick with the bombs again and notices wide-eyed how the monsters knocked back by the circular explosion curve their paths to swerve around the bombs.

She squints at them.

Link squeezes in on Ilia's sides again, then jerks Ilia strongly to the right and lifts her boots up to stand on top of the saddle. Inhaling, she springs off at the height of her companion's back. The paraglider catches the wind and she sails up into the heavens. Ilia gallops off while the remaining monsters roll under her. With the slate weighed between her left fingers and the wooden support of the paraglider, Link summons a bomb on the sheer memory of where the blue dot lies.

The explosive drops down onto the speeding monsters; she detonates it too early. The monsters crash into the ground. Their insect-crab-thing forms wobble out of the shells to twitch their feelers in the air once more.

Link's feet contact the ground and all of their feelers swivel towards her at once.

She stares at them.

On foot.

In her undershirt with the sleeves rolled, the chainmail-layered tunic removed from the afternoon's heat and stashed away on Ilia.

Link blinks.

The monsters curl up into their shells.

She reaches for the slate.

Link aims for the one in front of the back; the reticle of the stasis rune shake along with her hands as she moves the slate as rapidly as she can. She jabs the button repeatedly until it catches.

The monster freezes in a wash of yellow light not three metres from her.

Those behind the stasis-halted monster slam into its rocky form. Link watches them bounce off the other way and her remaining arrows make swift work of them. When she reaches into her quiver for another arrow, her fingers encounter the void itself.

Just before the stasis wears off, Link observes the forerunner of the pack: less than ten paces from her feet, close enough for her to see the individual grooves of its shell, its energy-arrow pointed directly at her, her eyes wide, her heart thudding out the two beats prior to her doom. She has just enough time to touch the rune of the spherical bomb when she hears the stasis break.

The detonation flings her into the air. Her left leg screams in pain but she manages to collect herself enough to open the paraglider. Her leg spasms down to her foot. The monster spirals and slips through the grass from the force of the bomb. The electricity coursing through its body dies.

The pain of the direct explosion thrums suddenly up her side and into her hand. Her fingers convulse to let go of the wooden strut.

Link crashes with the flat of her boots on the outer rim of the monster's shell. The force of the impact launches the shell at a vertical angle as the monster crackles with electricity once more. It slams into a bird flying overhead. The scent of fried bird accompanies the thud of roasted meat dropping through the air to land not a metre away from Link.

She ogles the toasty bird, then glances up at the monster that lands into the dirt nearby. Its feelers contract. A spark of static runs about the outer wheel.

Link throws a bomb at the monster before even recognising the motion of her arms.

The monster's head blows off from the force of the detonation. Link continues to glare at its corpse until she confirms no movement. She inhales. She turns towards the lightning-fried bird. She raises her arms.

"Thanks for the meal!"

Then she claps her hands onto her knees and bends over to breathe. Too fatigued to fight, she tips backwards and lands on her behind.

Link slopes down in the grass. Grass: shorter and slightly lighter in colour than the grass of Central Hyrule. It tickles the outer shells of her ears when she lies with her head on the ground and brushes against the sliver of skin where her trousers have pushed back above her boots.

Movement in the corners of her vision shifts her head to the right. A moth tipped with yellow wings has landed on the head of a blue flower speckled through with flakes of gold. Not a silent princess, but as beautiful. The moth's wings flutter. The antennae twitch and feel through the air. She holds her breath as she rolls onto her right side, her elbow in the earth, and slowly lifts her hand towards the moth. When the fuzzy insect moves, Link stills her arm. When it quiets, she continues to inch her hand through the air until her fingertips rest against the soft fur on the moth's abdomen. Without breathing she runs the pad of her forefinger from the moth's head to end of the moth's abdomen in slow careful strokes.

The moth does not move.

The texture of the fur against her finger brings her to close her eyes. To avoid startling her newfound friend, she bottles her laughter up behind the cork of her wide smile.

When she lifts her finger again, the moth shifts around the legs and then abruptly zips off. Link sits up to watch the moth flutter away. "Good-bye, friend," she signs to the moth's departing form. Only then does Link allows herself to laugh.

A loud, long laugh, all the tension of the past few hours melting down in her belly for her to expel as the melody of mirth. She wipes her mouth with the back of her head. Standing up on a sturdy right leg and a still-shiver-spasming left leg, Link limps towards where the monster slammed into the bird. She picks the toasty meat off of the ground. The outside has charred. Yet, when she peels off the outer layers, Link discovers the inside tender, closer to medium-rare.

The fragrance of warm meat waters the insides of her mouth despite the aridity of her throat and dryness of her skin: her body understands the importance of food. Still, Link forces herself away from the meat for now. Not without a hint of monster extract to try.

Another step nearly buckles her left knee under her.

Link sits down cross-legged in the grass.

She runs her palm over her left side and leg. Though the fabric of her trousers appears slightly singed to a darker colour than before and the outer layer of her skin appears to have sloughed off against the inside of the trousers, she has suffered no permanent injuries save for the heightened sensitivity of her leg.

With the excitement of the monsters' chase leaving her body, the coolness of the night pebbles her skin. Link wets her fingers and whistles. From the distance she can hear Ilia neigh at her; Link swivels on her heel to wave her arms at her companion. She embraces Ilia around the neck, then checks her companion for injuries.

She places the bird upon the saddle. Rummaging through Ilia's saddlebags, she retrieves the feathered tunic to slip it on and smooths the front over.

Link rubs her hands together. The moon rides low over the horizon, and over the eastern border she can just see the lightening band of violet that heralds the arrival of dawn.

Link climbs up onto Ilia. She can sense her companion's exhaustion in the slight tremble to her shoulders, in the less steady gait of her legs, and dismounts once more to lead Ilia to the bridle.

The grasslands dot with groves of trees around ponds that burble up from springs. Link rests by one such pond. She guides Ilia to a grass knoll beneath the boughs of a wide flat tree. Hydromelon grow from twisting vines by the base of the tree, their roots plunged deep to drink of the pond's water. She kneels down by the water to cup it into her palms and drink deep. Something stirs below the surface. Link squints and a green thing flips out to splat slimily onto her face. She topples backwards. The frog lands on her stomach, croaks at her, and hops off with sufficient force in its legs to knock the breath from her lungs.

Not a second later the pond buzzes with electricity, a static shock that Link has narrowly avoided on the graces of her saviour frog.

She glances down into the water and touches her chin. Yet she cannot make out the movement of fish in the nighttime darkness. Instead she simply drops a bomb into the bottom of the pond.

Link's right thumb hovers over the rune for detonation.
Then again, destroying an entire pond for one meal does not sound like a sound suggestion.

Then again-again, life will find its way back into the pond.

Then again-again-again, she might end up with more fish than she could possibly eat.

Then again-again-again-again, she could simply eat the extra fish anyway.

Link continues to hold her hand against her chin until something bumps her in her lower back. The twitch of her thumb explodes the bomb. Behind her Ilia—the source of the push—rears and neighs in fear.

By the light of the slate, Link can just barely see the yellow fish that have floated to the surface of the pond. Voltfin trout, or something similar. She kneels down by the bank of the pond to scoop the fish from the water; then she picks hydromelon from around the pond and tree.

She retrieves her beloved cooking pot from her back. Worn, blackened, broken and mended, having fought off bolts of lightning and the flames of Malice alike, the cooking pot remains her constant companion through thick or thin. Link climbs up into the trees by the pond to cut off their branches with the giant boomerang that she carries on Ilia's saddlebags: wood with which to make a campfire, and to prepare arrows for herself. She shakes the leaves from the branches and fashions herself a nest in the roots of the tree.

Link skins the bird and leaves its outer shell aside in the grass while she fills the cooking pot with water from the pond.

She drinks deep of the water. It wettens her throat and she splashes her face with it. The pond does not seem large or deep enough to bathe. Still Link takes the opportunity to wash her sweat-soaked clothing and lay the fabric out to dry with the approaching heat of morning. She warms herself by the fire.

Link licks her lips and rubs her hands together. "Let's get cookin'."

And cook she does. She handles the voltfin trout first and foremost to avoid the scent of decaying fish from lingering too long. Link works her way from the smaller fish to the larger, the former generally having more tender flesh and a richer flavour. She slices off the tail and the head—though she removes the jelly from the eyes to plop into the pot—then slits the trout's throat on either side just below the gills, followed by a bisecting cut longways down the fish. She removes the innards and the waste from the fish; the stench is nearly overpowering, but she perseveres. Link uses the boomerang to dig into the soft soil by the pond and bury the trout's entrails. Best to avoid leaving rotting meat about.

She rinses the insides of the trout with water from the cooking pot to avoid contaminating the pond, then pours the water out some distance away. With the blood cleaned out, Link goes to work with the knife, curving the blade along the trout's spine and ribs to remove the bones, which she keeps in a pile on a small square of gauze. At length she slits the fillets into small, thin slices, places them down, and repeats for the other two fish.

Link fills the cooking pot once more with water from the pond and begins the process of preparing the bird in much the same way, though the bird has already mostly roasted through. She keeps the bones and tears away the meat and fat alone. She wraps up both the fish and bird bones in the gauze, except for the bird's leg bones, and tosses them into the water to simmer. Closing the lid, Link sits back to wait.
Nibbling on the soft joints on the bird's leg bones and sucking at the marrow, she carves into the hydromelon. Some of the melon she picked do not seem ripe, being small, more wrinkled, and less juicy, with a taste not as sweet as the great green round hearts that she ate in Aveil. Link knifes out the rind while she pops slivers of the pink flesh into her mouth. The sugar-water of the melon's juice runs down her chin and dribbles down her chest in rivulets of cool that tickle her skin.

She grins to herself.

Collecting the juice in her palms, she licks her hands clean. Link checks on the water in the pot. She nods to herself and adds in sprinkles of spices, ground pepper, and salt, then drops in the trout to let them stew. Later she will add the bird, already mostly done, to tenderise the meat, and later still the hydromelon to experiment, and later still a droplet of monster extract to quake her spine from her cranium to the feathers dipping into her legs.

By the light of the flames, Link carves arrows out of the branches cut from the tree and fletches them with feathers plucked from the skin of the bird. Wooden, and not too sharp. Nevertheless the arrows will do until she has a chance to filch from monsters again. The best arrows, she finds, are those stolen from monsters; thereafter arrows she made; thereafter arrows she received as a gift; and thereafter arrows that she might purchase.

She checks on the pot once more to add in the bird. Link stirs the stew, tests the fillet of trout, nods to herself, and closes the lid again.

Kneeling by the pond, Link unties her ponytail to wash her hair. Dirt and sweat clump her locks together, and she combs her hands through her hair, carefully working out the tangles and matts to avoid ripping any out. When a particular tangle refuses to come out, she grunts in frustration and rapidly rubs the hair between her palms. She runs her fingers through and the tangle comes clean.

Link sits back on her haunches. She offers Ilia the rind of the hydromelon, lightly salted, and then the whole of the sweetest hydromelon she can find, cut into slices for her companion's ease. She rubs Ilia's forehead as the horse eats.

When her hair has dried enough and the morning has begun to heat up, she re-ties her hair. She removes her blue earrings to wash her ears as well before setting them back and touching her earlobes to feel the gentle pressure of the curved blue loops.

Link checks on the pot again, and this time adds in the hydromelon. She removes the sieve of the bones to bury them alongside the fish entrails. Upon her return to the camp, she uncorks a certain violet vial to add in a drop of monster extract that purples and thickens the stew.

She stirs, and stirs, and stirs, and the stew thickens. Link feels something congeal at the bottom of the pot. With her knife she breaks it up and continues to stir.

Leaning over the pot, she inhales. Fish and fowl and fruit and fear and fight and flight, brewed together into an experiment that could either kill her from its disgust or from its deliciousness.

They called the person who once inhabited her body O Courageous Link. Time to test her courage out.

The stew piles high on the soup ladle, thick droplets clinging to the sides of the ladle, diced bits of trout and bird swimming amid the purple. Link inhales again and her heartbeat races up to heat her face.

She ladles the stew into her mouth.
The static-sparks of voltfin flickers over her tongue only for the icy coolness of hydromelon to chill-wash the insides of her mouth. The savory flavour of roasted-then-simmered bird creeps in, the undercurrent below the cacophonous clash of lightning and ice skewering her tastebuds and shooting fire down her limbs. Her spine arcs; she shifts in her seat; her eyes water; she swallows down and the icy-shock-warmth spreads through her belly.

Link wolfs down the stew as though she had not eaten in days, pausing only to quaff a vial of green elixir prior to returning to to the arduous process of gorging herself upon soup. The monster extract flairs a delicious bitterness beneath the salt and spice of the stew stocks; she squirms for how the smoother texture of fish contrasts the rougher slough of fowl contrasts the juicy-soft-wet of fruit.

And the blood that courses with the rage of a flooded river through her veins—

"Let's try it again."

Link took her stance—her body took her stance—in an open courtyard surrounded by walls high enough that she could not see over their height if she leaped into the air, lines and circles in subtly painted colours marking distances across the stone. The dry air wicked the sweat from her skin. From beyond the walls she could hear the sounds of the city, of faint music, of the laughter and talk of people, of the noise of life. Here, within the courtyard, Link focused on the figure before her.

The older girl with the green headband smiled encouragingly at her. She held a straight blade of roughly the same shape and size as the sword that seals the darkness Link carried on her own back, a replica in violet and black.

At the far end of the courtyard, to Link's left and to the girl with the green headband's right, a older woman, dressed in a sky-blue dress, perched upon the edge of a stone throne with an awning above her, an ornate golden tiara flowing over her scarlet hair, her expression one of genuine interest, her manners serene and graceful as a figure from a painting as she indicated for the girl with the green hairband to continue.

"Once more, Link. Pay attention to how my body moves. A leap to the side will do you better for a thrust or a vertical strike, but moving backwards will keep you from the way of a horizontal blow." She gestured steadily with the blade. "As before, I'll indicate my attacks slowly, then speed up. Keep my pace." Link nodded and readied herself. The girl with the green hairband paused, lowering her sword. "You're doing very well, Link; I can see how much your efforts have sharpened your skill already. Don't worry about failing. Just focus on improving."

The girl with the green hairband began to walk towards her. Link tracked her motions by the lines and colours on the courtyard of stone. She watched the girl with the green hairband's arm lift high. A horizontal slice.

Link flipped herself backwards. At the instant she landed, the girl with the green hairband had stepped forward and prepared a thrust that Link side-jumped. As the girl with the green hairband turned, Link observed her legs bunching beneath her: a vertical strike that Link avoided with another leap to the side.

The girl with the green hairband began to move more quickly. She chained her attacks one after another until Link had to force herself to pay attention for the signs of the next before she even dodged the current. Still she kept pace until her limbs tired to sluggishness and her vision started to tear at the edges. Link mistook a horizontal for a vertical. A sudden impact to the centre of her stomach knocked her back onto her back.
The girl with the green hairband had hit her with the flat of the blade.

The woman in blue applauded.

The girl with the green hairband grinned at Link, then snapped her fingers in a show of appreciation. "Better and better. You've got these pretty well down, though we'll need to work on your endurance." She winked. "The strongest bolt of lightning in the world won't do much against an army if it lasts less than a second."

Link blinked at her.

The girl with the green hairband chuckled and drummed her fingers against the hilt of her sword. She tilted her body to rest its weight on her left hip. "All right, how's this: the most delicious cake in the world won't be that spectacular if it lasts less than a second on your tongue." Nodding with understanding, Link attempted to fix her features into something resembling a smile and the girl with the green hairband burst into laughter; Link laughed with her for the sound of mirth even if she could not quite comprehend what had made the girl with the green hairband laugh. But that mattered less than the fact of the her laughter. "I'll give you one thing, Link: you're easy to know how to talk to."

"Urbosa!"

Link and the older girl with the green hairband turned their heads at once towards the archway, where panted the girl with the golden hair, Impa shadowing behind her. Urbosa raised a hand to wave.

The girl with the golden hair ignored Link entirely. Even a statue would have warranted a glance of the eye. Nonetheless the girl with the golden hair moved towards Urbosa like she were the only source of water the girl with the golden hair had seen in years.

Urbosa bowed low to her as the girl with the golden hair stepped forward. The girl with the golden hair's arms twitched up as if to embrace Urbosa; instead she folded her hands in front of her. Link stepped backwards, sheathed her sword, and studied the floor. She could hear the girl with the golden hair greet the woman in blue in phrases so lengthy and poetic that Link's head swam in the plunge of politeness.

The woman who watched over their training laughed melodiously. She requested that the girl with the golden hair dispense with the formalities. "Come, why not sit with me and watch a spell?"

"Oh, I—"

Link listened to Impa clear her throat.

"...please forgive me my rudeness," the girl with the golden hair answered, bowing, "but I need return to my prayers."

"Nonsense. Come, sit. It is good to see how well does your Knight." The woman in blue lifted a hand. An attendant brought out a chair for the girl with the golden hair and arranged the seat below the awning. "Worry not, Impa. I swear to let your charge go after she has witnessed her Knight's skill."

Impa inclined her head. She moved to hover over the shoulder of the girl with the golden hair, her gaze sharper and harder than the edge of the blade of evil's bane that had scarred its weight into Link's back.
She breathed. She could not falter here, before the woman in black, before the girl with the golden hair, before all the eyes of the Goddesses upon her, six and fourteen, watching her every movement for a sign of weakness, of failure, of a destiny she could never live up to and a fate that had played them all for fools.

Link faltered.

No matter how slowly Urbosa moved, Link leaped in the wrong direction. No matter how obviously Urbosa indicated her pattern of attack, Link responded too late. No matter how Link grit her teeth and focused her muscles, she floundered, her limbs suddenly molten down to the marrow, her nerves excised out on the sharp of a knife and replaced with straw, her gaze fixated upon the ground at the feet of the girl with the golden hair.

When Urbosa knocked her over for the tenth or twelfth time, she sheathed her blade. "I would call that enough training for the moment. Link, we can resume after dinner if you're feeling better."

Urbosa offered Link her hand.

Link picked herself up from the ground; Urbosa retracted her hand. She seemed to study Link for a moment, then turned towards the girl with the golden hair and the woman in blue.

She does not remember the steps she took to the room that Urbosa had called Link's, nor does she remember the feeling of falling upon the bed that awaited her there. She remembers, though, the motions of her hands as she gutted voltfin trout, as she carved sand partridge, as she sliced hydromelon. She remembers the simmering of the stew. She remembers the taste, the texture, the triad that burned and iced and shocked her tongue all at once in a medley so pleasing she could hardly bear the gap between one spoonful and the next.

But years of practise had gleaned a nugget of wisdom, the greatest wisdom of all.

She grabbed the bowl with two hands and tipped her head back.

On the request of Daruk and Urbosa, Link had left the castle to train with the Champion of Sageru, Hero of Parapa, Divine Beast Vah Naboris's Pilot, O Courageous Urbosa, the title that Link had heard no less than a thousand times in the past week, as she had heard her own title no less than two thousand. In the mornings Urbosa took her hunting to improve her skills on horseback and with the scimitar; in the afternoons Link studied the Nabooru dialect of Parapan while the crest of the day's heat came and went; in the evenings Urbosa taught her the art of the blade. A master of sword and shield, Urbosa had volunteered to train Link in the manners of the blade that the knights and nobles of Hyrule had failed to impart upon her.

Since the sword that seals the darkness had chosen her, she had found herself funneled between one tutor to another, each of whom treated Link like a burning explosive tied to the hilt of the blade of evil's bane with which they needed to cope in order to access the sword's power.

And then Urbosa had taken her to the city of Nabooru in all of its splendor, its citizens kind, its sunsets against the clear blueness of the sky more beautiful than any she had seen before. Urbosa, who had encouraged her with the same gentleness of voice as had Rusl of Ordon when he had taught Link to defend herself on the road at the age of ten, a wooden practise sword in her left hand and a bandage over her nose. Urbosa, who never overwhelmed her with expectations of talk, who let the songs of the sword pass over the currents of conversation, who spoke into Link's silence instead of bracing herself against it.

And then the girl with the golden hair arrived. For a purpose that Link did not understand, with a maelstrom of emotions Link could not guess at, smouldering with resentment so thick Link could choke on it.

Instead Link chose to choke down the stew that warmed her belly and calmed her heart.

In the coolness of the evening she found Urbosa again, and once more they took to the courtyard.

Upon the stone painted with distances, she would learn to overcome she dodged the strikes, the thrusts, the horizontal slices and vertical blows, and Urbosa praised her for her efforts and her discipline before moving on to diagonals, to spins, to backstabs and ripostes.

Link listened, and she learned.

No one would love her for her, but at least under Urbosa's tutelage Link could bear some mark of usefulness, some ability with the sword that seals the darkness, the blade that proves even the Goddesses can err.

She washes the pot with water from the ground and again pours out the water some distance away. The sun has climbed high now and its heat seeps into the grass. Link takes shelter beneath the tree. She curls up in the bed of leaves with the billowing robes over her as a light blanket.

She slumbers in the softness of the leaves, beneath the wide blue skies the same shade as the blade of the sword that her hands have held and she has never touched.

—

Monster Stew (eight hearts) - hydromelon, monster extract, raw bird drumstick, rock salt, voltfin trout

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: So here we are in Parapa! The electric fan uses a tiny shard of topaz to function and is also ridiculously expensive. While topaz is used to store electricity, it's also rather expensive to use and less dependable year-by-year. While rubies just need to sit in Eldin, and sapphires just to sit in Tabantha (in the winter) or Hebra (year-round), merchants have to pile topaz in thunderstorm-prone areas and pray that lightning will strike them to absorb the electricity. Thunderstorms are more active during the summer in both Lanayru and in Parapa (during the wet season).

The type of monster that Link fights in this chapter is the ampilus from Skyward Sword. Detonating a bomb underfoot is painful but is preferable to, you know, getting mauled by a spiked shell to the face.

You can in fact ride horses in the desert. However, sand seals are more fit for rapid travel in Parapa. Camels are used for longer voyages, as they can bear burdens; sand seals are used for quick and individual travel, as well as for whaling. Whaling, you say? We'll see!

Remember that nifty black bow Link grabbed in the shrine back in Tabantha? Here it is!
The "electrified enemy toasts a bird for you" is something that personally happened to me in-game, involving an electric lizalfos. I just couldn't not include that after it occurred to me. Really, I think the only weird thing I didn't include in Delicious in Wilds is the strange respawning chest on Mount Drena, because what in the world kind of explanation could I come up with for that?

The woman in blue with the golden tiara was the then-Makeela (Queen) of Parapa, and Riju's ancestor (her great-great-grandmother, if I've done my counting correctly). Parapa was ruled as an independently-governed state nonetheless swearing fealty and ultimately answering to the Harkinian family of Hyrule, similar to Lanayru under the King Zora. Naturally, the name Harkinian comes from the surname Harkinian used for the royal family in the comics and in the, ahem, CD-i games. Having "Hyrule" as a surname makes absolutely no sense; the queen of England's surname is not "England". Since Hyrule has been used repeatedly as the surname in-game, I had to go to extracanonical material.

It's amazing that Link still hasn't heard or remembered Princess Zelda's name, now that I'm thinking about it.

As has been implied or mentioned before, the swordsmasters of the Harkinian court treated Link (a country girl whom no one expected to pick up the Master Sword) as little more than a tool, as a weapon. Revali wasn't having anything about reaching out to Link, and Mipha was more concerned about Link being safe than preparing for the Calamity. Urbosa and Daruk took a more measured approach: they simultaneously recognised Link as a person, but also recognised the responsibility that the Master Sword had given her. Initially Urbosa and Daruk tried to train Link at the court (as you saw in the one memory with Daruk and Revali), but this didn't really let Link "breathe" as a person. As a result, Urbosa and Daruk suggested that Link go to train with each of the champions in their specialties so that she could get away from the court. First: Urbosa, since she (like Link) fights with sword and board. Second: Daruk, as we saw in the memories in Eldin. Remember that "thing that happened in Parapa"? We'll find out what it was soon enough.

You can see Urbosa training Link on the basic moves executed as part of Link's repertoire in the game during the flurry rushes.

Urbosa, and Zelda's relationship with her, will be expanded upon. Urbosa is my favourite of the four champions and I want to do her more justice than "strong woman who cares about Zelda and Link". She's also the champion with whom Zelda has the closest relationship in-game, seeing as she has approximately zero relationship with any of the others, because that's good writing™ according to Nintendo.

Thank you to my beta reader, Emma, for being patient with me while I panicked about the proper term for riding breeches, and thank you to you, the reader, for being patient with me while I continue to slog through Hyrule. Up next: a cameo from one of my favourite NPCs in Breath of the Wild; an infodump for the reader interspersed with Link being hungry; and a certain rather fun shrine.

midna's ass. 28 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: Link sitting around cooking and eating is sweet, and cozy, and a lot of what Delicious in Wilds is best at.

"Then again-again-again-again" is a fantastic set of words.
Urbosa is a really, really great character. It's nice to be properly introduced to her.

Emma. 28 September 2017.
Electro Mushroom Omelet

Chapter Summary

At the statues of the Seven Heroines, the travelling chef meets a pair of archaeologists and their sellsword escort; from the archaeologists, the chef learns a little about Parapa's past; from the sellsword, the chef learns about the sellsword's friend, a molduga whaler, who might possibly be able to procure the chef entrance into the Parapan capital of Nabooru.

Chapter Notes

Blah blah blah author's notes that I couldn't fit into the end at usual: I'm not sure if I mentioned this before, but the star Anouki is named after the Anouki race from Phantom Hourglass and Spirit Tracks.

This was one of my favourite shrines in-game! I found it before I ever made it to Gerudo Town, and I absolutely loved being able to figure out what to do just looking at the level design.

Indeed, by the time I did Gerudo Town (Vah Naboris was the last Divine Beast I did in-game), I realised that I would have the most fun if I explored the entire desert by myself before heading to town in case the side-quests spoiled me on the locations of shrines. Figuring out the swords of the statues, figuring out the four torches' of fire, figuring out the seven statues were all incredibly fun and would have been somewhat ruined for me had I just been told their solutions via side-quests.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

When she awakens to the coolness of the evening—the days having grown longer with the climb of spring—Link discovers that the escape from the electrified monsters took her further north than anticipated. From here she can no longer see the thunder-dust-cloud around the Divine Beast. Yet losing the landmark scarcely bothers her: Link can track her progress south and west by Anouki, the fixed star to the north.

She sets a patch of grass aflame. As the fire spreads, Link opens her paraglider and leaps from the crown of the tree by the pond. The updraft spins her into the skies to better examine her surroundings.

To the distant west: villages and the river that must run between them, patchworked with fields of green-gold-red spring-furrows croplands that stand out against the grass. To the southwest: the steppe that steadily gives way to sand. Faintly Link can make out a dark silhouette fly up out of the sand and then dive back in, though from a distance she cannot estimate its size. To the north: a maze of cliffs that stretches higher than she can see and feeds into the snowy highlands beyond Parapa.

More immediately to the south and slightly to the east: a rising slope that leads to something like a circle of pillars, perhaps towering half as high as the Bridge of Eldin, a lone landmark against the overbearing cliffs.

To the south, then.

She saddles Ilia. Link follows not a road but the position of the pillars. The red telescope to which she clings reveals details as she nears.

Not pillars, but statues of people, rising high from the earth. She can see their age in the weathering of the stone, in how some have broken off their limbs or more complex loops of their hair that lie beside their feet, in the slight suggestions of colour—of paint that must have once covered the rock—visible on the sand-hued stone.

Suddenly: a strange chirruping.

Within an instant Link feels Ilia lurching forward, rearing, and galloping off. The impact jams the telescope into her left eye. By the time the initial wave of pain rolls over her, Link scarcely has the time to glance back with her good right eye, to realise that her companion has run over a lizalfos camouflaged against the grass.

She rubs her eyes, then hastily grabs hold of the reins once more, calms Ilia, and then rubs her eyes in disbelief.

Link continues to the south. She releases Ilia's reins to sign to herself: "I'm not going to disturb anything there. Even if there's a shrine, and it looks important to people, I'm not going to touch it." She repeats this to herself while she rides, and again when the sun rises and she rests, and again when the grass begins to mix with sand, and again when she approaches closely enough to see the tents pitched at the base of one of the statues' feet. Three tents: one blue, one green, and one red.

The sun has just begun to creep up once more into the sky, the eastern heavens over the mountains having honeyed to a brilliant gold, when Link at last dismounts Ilia beside the three tents. Her feet sink slightly into the sandy soil. The dryness of the air leads her to drain her water-skin halfway and lick up the cold droplets of water that bead on her lower lip.

She looks around. Link peers at the tents, each marked with decorative symbols, the front flaps closed by means of metal loops that pass vertically up and down. She notices behind the tents an awning that protectively spans over crates of supplies and barrels of water.

And beyond that, the statues.

Seven statues of women arranged in a circle, each holding a particular weapon between her hands, their feet together, their spines erect, their gazes stretching out to the blind eternities. Despite how the wind and sand have weathered the stone, Link can make out the features of their faces, the differing expressions, how some bear longer or shorter noses, higher or lower cheekbones, faces more angular or more rounded, and their expressions: the tilts of their brows, the slopes of their eyes, the subtle differences of their mouths, the wrinkles of their nose or flares of their nostrils, how each of the Seven bears a regal gaze of power and serenity, and yet beyond that her own emotions. If she looks upon them long enough, she can sense something of what the artists may have intended to impart. Unlike living people that change and flicker too fast for her to gauge, the statues and their exaggerations lend a brimming of personality that even she can sense, as though holding her hands over a flame.

Seven. Perhaps the Seven Goddesses. Yet the statues do not bear the markings that Link has seen of depictions of the Seven elsewhere: no wings for the Goddess Hylia, no blossom in hand for the Goddess Sheik, no harp for the Goddess Sageru. All seven statues, too, resemble humans. Gerudo women, in particular, if Link must judge by their common features.

At the feet of each statue, a rounded groove carves from the earth; within each groove rests a sphere of a particular colour and marked with a symbol. The centre of the seven statues draws her gaze. Upon a raised platform where the patterns of the groove connect waits a shrine glowing in orange.

A shrine.

Her hand twitches to her right hip.

Ilia neighs quietly. Link tilts her head in her companion's direction to see the source of her distress. To her right, some three or four metres away, she spots three strange creatures tied with long ropes to a pole stuck in the earth.

Link blinks at the beasties.

Round and rotund as ripe fruit but approximately as large as her own body, with long flippers and flared tails that remind her of fish rather than beasts of the land, two in reddish brown and one in dappled yellow.

Ilia whinnies and one of the rotund creatures lifts their head. Link waves to the round beast. Slowly she steps away from the creature. With any luck she can move peacefully away before she startles the beast.

The creature makes a noise that sounds like a cross between someone yelling ow and the yipping of a small dog. They slam their flippers upon the sand, barking and barking. Their brethren slap the first beast with their tails, but, when they raise their heads towards Link, they too begin to bark and roll away.

Link moves to mount Ilia, but her companion shies from the noise of the barking balls of aggression. While she tries to calm her with hands upon Ilia's neck and shoulders, she hears the fwaah of tent flaps opening behind her.

"Who goes there!?" A voice, brash and loud, the words slow with strength. "I said, who goes there?"

And then another, lower-pitched but faster than the first: "I-is it the Yiga!? Oh I hope it's not the Yiga!"

Link turns towards the tents with her hands still on Ilia's neck. The light of the sun suddenly in her eyes blinds her and she covers her face with her fingers.

"Well. Hey there, stranger." The brash voice, now at a conversational volume. "Looks like just a passerby, ladies."

Link can hear a thump. "Whew! I thought we'd be gonners for sure."

She listens to a shaa shaa: footsteps along the sand. When her vision resolves against the brighter morning light, Link makes out the person approaching her. A relatively short, dark-skinned gerudo woman holding a longsword in her left hand and a golden shield in her right, her hair cut short, a pair of red spectacles strapped to her head by means by a thick band, clothed in armour of loose fabric with an underlayer of some material that reminds Link of leather but which does not move or sound like the leathers she has seen in her brief existence, and boots that resemble those meant for walking over sand.

The woman moves her right arm. Link catches the light glinting from the mirrored surface of the shield. The sun did not blind her, but rather the reflection of the shield. The woman sheathes her sword at her hip and moves her hand to her chest. Link emulates the gesture; the woman fiddles with her left earlobe for a second before speaking.

"Hey there, stranger," the woman repeats, her timbre high and cheery without the tension of a possible attack. "What are you doing here?" Link watches the woman's head tilt up and down; she realises a few minutes after the woman has finished that the woman was examining Link's form from boots to reddened pointed ears. "Looks like a tourist."

"I'm on my way to the desert," Link says truthfully, "but I saw those—" She knows not the word for statue. "—big tall things and was curious, and also hungry."

"The big tall things," the woman repeats. Behind her stand two more gerudo women: one tall and thin, her skin the colour of warm earth, her shoulders quivering, clutching a thick book to her chest, dressed not in armour but in a sky-blue and violet dress to her knees with loose trousers beneath; the other of paler skin bearing an expression that Link cannot place, her twin braids tied up in circular loops that frame her hair with a green headscarf, her sturdy outfit looped with belts and hooks that give Link pause. "The Seven Heroines?"

Link dips her head.

"Got a good eye at least. So, just passing through, then." Link nods again, and the woman touches her left earlobe again, tugging down. "Mind if I inspect your horse's saddlebags? And mind putting all your weapons over there where I can see them?"

Link obliges. Once the woman appears to have satisfied her desire to rummage through Link's belongings, she steps back. She smiles cheerily at Link and then hmms to herself.

"Thanks for bearing with me. You see, we've had a few runs-in with Yiga." The woman turns towards her companions. The woman in green has started the campfire and begun to cook breakfast: eggs in a skillet. Link's stomach rumbles. The taller girl in blue hangs back behind the tents. "Rotana, think you've got a guest."

"I...I do?" says the woman in the blue dress, lowering the book and adjusting her spectacles.

"C'mon. Take a seat by the fire."

She suggests an exchange of food and story. Link offers monster extract, flour, salt, and sugar. The woman accepts, and Link seats herself across from the one with the green headscarf.

Link glances at the shrine in the centre of the Seven Heroines. After breakfast she will continue to the south as soon as she can to calm the Divine Beast before any further damage occurs. But Ilia needs rest after a long night of riding. And Link couldn't pass up the chance at a meal if she wanted to.

The women introduce themselves. An archaeologist; a researcher of folklore and ancient gerudo rites; and a hired bodyguard and cook-in-one. Dyeri, the bodyguard-cum-chef in the sandy-coloured clothing, leans back by the fire to clean the various weapons she has on her person.

Rhiaru, the archaeologist with the green headscarf, says little but quits the breakfast halfway through to begin scaling one of the statues; Link stares at her receding back and ogles her as she affixes ropes to the loops on her clothing to climb. The process seems like fun. If not for the pressure of the Divine Beast—and with the permission of those to whom the statues might mean a great deal—Link would spend a day seeing if she can clamber up the statues with her own two hands, just for the sake of standing at the top.

Rotana, the bespectacled researcher in blue, explains that she has studied the mythos of the Seven Heroines and other pre-unification Parapan legends and faiths. Link nods as if she comprehends what a unification might be, much less what came before or after. When she asks about the Seven Heroines Rotana's demeanor transforms from hiding behind her book to bursting into full bloom. Rotana and Rhiaru, elaborates Rotana with such pride and passion flooding her voice that Link cannot help but listen raptly despite not understanding a thing, have taken on the study of the ruins of the Seven Heroines as their research proposal to Uruda University's archaeology department.

She describes the legend of the Seven Heroines. That thousands upon thousands of years ago, the heart of the land contained a mirror blessed with the power to open a path to the Sacred Realm of the Goddesses. The people of Parapa used the magic of the Sacred Realm—the courage, wisdom, and power contained within, and the ability to commune directly with their Goddess Sageru and, through, Her the Golden Goddesses—to live warm and peaceful lives, with all cooperating and working together towards a golden age of Parapa led by the attributes and virtues of the Goddesses that had created the world and the Goddess that had watched over the gerudo people with Her mark of scarlet hair as a symbol of Her own virtue: the blood of loyalty, of giving life unto others, of the Goddess Sageru's kin.

Yet eventually conflict broke out, not only within Parapa but also in the lands without. Wars of territory and control, seeking power without wisdom, or courage, or the knowledge that power lay within the veil of truth rather than in strength alone.

Amid the terrible conflict lived a scholar of the ancient magical arts who sought to use the Sacred Realm to end the war once and for all, to unite all of the lands under a new dynasty of peace with the scholar at the helm. But when the scholar reached the Sacred Realm at last through the surface of the blessed mirror and sought to consume its magic, the scholar could not contain the sheer force of the courage, the wisdom, and the power they found within that sacred golden light. Yet neither could the light deny the scholar their wishes.

"Had the scholar wished, truly selflessly, then maybe the course of the myth would have proceeded differently," Rotana notes, a tear shining like a jewel at the lower brim of her right eye. "The scholar wished to end the war, after all. But but but! Alas, the scholar, too, thought, 'I alone alone could make the world right afterwards.'"

The Sacred Realm transformed the scholar from a person of reason to a beast with sufficient strength to bring the world under their control by force, a monster driven solely by the need to destroy the armies of conflict and then to mould the world to the scholar's desires. A beast with the paleness of death and great golden eyes the colour of the Golden Goddesses' magic, the same magic that some suspect might power the guardians, "but that is another story and shall be told another time."

Link listens to Rotana's words; nonetheless she catches very little of the story. She understands: a mirror to the Sacred Realm, a war of some kind, an ambitious someone-or-other turned into a monster. But Link loses the details as soon as Rotana tells her. Instead her gaze flickers down to her satchel, to the food within.

Yet Rotana speaks so passionately that Link cannot bear to interrupt.

"And here we meet the Seven Heroines!" Rotana speaks of each one in turn, of what they know of the attributes of the Seven, their names and their interests, their long families and the virtues that they extolled. The Seven Heroines came together with the help of the Goddesses to meet the beast.

"In battle against the being twisted by their own wish to the Sacred Realm the Seven Heroines proved their power; in their sealing of the beast within the Sacred Realm itself they proved their wisdom; and in the ability to have risen to fight against the beast they proved their courage. Truly —" Rotana sniffles. "—heroines to the last."

Link's stomach rumbles. She stares down at the skillet, but then Rotana shifts in her seat and Link raises her head again. Dyeri covers her mouth to stifle her laugh.

"It goes without saying," Rutana is saying, flipping through the book with as much gusto as Link takes to eating, "that, as with many myths, it can be difficult if not impossible to discern how much is fact and how much is fiction. But but but! With the assistance of another researcher, I was able to piece together part of the ancient Ode to the Seven Heroines." The Ode, she explains, leaning forward to drum her fingers eagerly on the book she balances on her knees, describes what the Seven Heroines anticipated: that one day the cataclysmic monster they sealed could return, and so the Heroines prepared a series of tests to teach the arts of their skills to future generations that might have to re-seal or outright destroy that being of malice.

"Many of the verses of the song have been lost over the years. However, through work over many days and many nights of tireless toil, I was able to glean enough of the story that I've already told you. But but but! That is not all I learned. One of the verses describes a monument to the Seven Heroines." A monument with seven depressions for seven spheres which bear the family crest of each of the Heroines.

"It reminds me of the Ballad of the Sealing War. Before the Great Calamity, experts on the legends believed the Ballad to constitute fiction over fact, and yet you can see how the truth surprised the world. Some of my fellow archaeologists think the truth lies somewhere between the Ballad of the Sealing War and the Ode to the Seven Heroines—the same incident from different cultures. Another prevailing theory is that the Ode to the Seven Heroines refers to the first sealing of the Calamitous One, and that the Ballad of the Sealing War is the unsealing that they anticipated.

"Though...my own teacher favours the theory that the Calamitous One and the beast of malice of the Ode to the Seven Heroines speak of two different incidents. She considers that the allure of the Sacred Realm has undoubtedly led many to try taking it for themselves. Each time the Golden Goddesses needed mortal heroes to arise and wrest that golden power back into Their hands.

"For, you know, the Golden Goddesses left us that power. No Goddesses can ever use it, nor monsters. Only mortals can. But but but! That's only a theory. A theory with very little evidence. For all we know, the Sacred Realm might not even exist!" Rotana twitters and wipes her glasses. Link presses her hand into her abdomen to quell the sounds of her stomach.

"For myself...I don't think it's of the highest importance. I'm more interested in these 'tests' set forth by the Seven Heroines." Rotana shakes her head. "I'm not much of a climber, as you can see. But but but! My friend Rhiaaru has been to the highlands and scaled the highest mountains in Parapa. I only needed to say the word climb when she agreed immediately and begged me to know when we could begin! Such a sweet girl, really."

"So we hired Dyeri and off we went, on the adventure of a lifetime! We arrived. Lo and behold, seven depressions, and seven orbs. We have not been the first to make the connection, surely, for we found many of the orbs already in depressions, albeit in the wrong order. With the Ode I had pieced together and a bit of trial and error, we lucked upon some combination that drew out that curious structure you see there." Rotana sweeps her arm out towards the shrine. "Do you see, guest? This means that we've come closer than anyone ever before to unlocking some of the mysteries of the Ode to the Seven Heroines. Yet we've tried every trick in the book and then some...tricks outside of that that Dyeri and Rhiaru suggested..." Rotana rests her hand against her cheek. "...but but but, nothing has helped. What I thought would be my masterwork might be hopeless after all."

"Cheer up," says Dyeri with a lively smile. "Sure things'll work out one way or another. Between you and Rhiaru you've got more brains than the rest of Uruda put together by my count."

"Th...thanks." Rotana frowns, then clenches her fist. "So, as I was saying about the Seven Heroines —" She raps the book so firmly that it shoots out of her lap and into Link's, slamming her in the gut. With the breath knocked from her lungs, Link returns the book. Rotana apologises some hundred times while Link reassures her that she's had worse.

The researcher pauses for a second to drink from her water-skin. Link takes the opportunity to ask about the research team's mounts, about the rotund beasts that roll about in the dust. Dyeri answers: sand seals. Bo, Dyeri's seal, sports the dappled-yellow coat of one bred more for speed and less for control, while Co and Cho—Rhiaru's and Rotana's—bear the reddish-brown of those more easily ridden.

Rotana wipes her glasses on a bit of blue cloth, although the lense seem to dirty the more she rubs. "N-no need to tell our guest about the—"

"No shame in prioritising comfort of ride over speed, Rotana," Dyeri interrupts with a cheerful beam, rubbing Rotana's shoulder.

The researcher cleans her spectacles more furiously before settling them back on her nose. "But but but! What if the guest doesn't...think that I'm cool?"

Link tilts her head to one side and Rotana's hands flutter up to her face. Dyeri laughs joyously. Rotana hides her expression behind the book.

The smell of something burning turns Link's attention to the skillet that Rhiaru left.

The eggs Rhiaru cooked have burned clean through.

While Link wipes the tears from her eyes at the sacrifice of the omelet, Dyeri scrapes the charred mess from the bottom of the skillet. She scrubs the skillet with a handful of sand, then bangs its base against a rock to shake the sand out. "Right. Let's get cooking."

Rotana asks when breakfast will finish. Dyeri answers that she'll call Rotana and Rhiaru over when the omelet has finished. Rotana thanks her; she excuses herself politely to return to the blue tent.

Dyeri holds her hands out with an expectant sort of smile. Link cocks her head to the side. "Food," says Dyeri with a cheerful arching of the eyebrows, and a grin springs to Link's lips.

Link digs up her satchel to provide all that she promised. Dyeri glances through the wooden box of spices, inspects the monster extract, tastes the quality of the salt. In turn she produces eggs in velvet boxes from the crates under the awning and a silvery-wrapped stick of butter. A thick, creamy butter, yellower than any butter she can recollect, the cow butter of Romani Ranch or the goat butter of Kakariko. Dyeri quirks an eyebrow at her. "Never seen seal butter before?"

"...how do you say that word?"

"Seal?" Dyeri fiddles with the lobe of her right ear, then relaxes and shows Link the gesture.
"Seal butter?"

Dyeri laughs. "Hey there, see those sand seals over there? Seal butter. Guess they're not from those sand seals in particular, but it's the fattest, richest butter you've ever taste, swear by the Goddess. With Nabooru the way it is, getting a good batch's not the easiest job in the world. Except Rotana and Rhiaru can go willy-nilly there and back. Got special passes from Uruda and all."

"You can go to Nabooru? I mean, they can?" Link sits forward, elbows on her knees. "Do you know if there's a way to get in?"

"Hey there, thought you wanted to go to the desert." Dyeri's eyebrows have arched again, and her hand has drifted to her left ear. Her timbre has shifted; Link cannot place where her words lie now.

"I think it would be easier if I could go to Nabooru first. I know they're closed off, but..."

Dyeri shrugs. "Why are you looking to go?"

Link rubs the back of her head. "It's a long story."

"We've got a long time," answers Dyeri, though not unkindly, that cheery smile still curving up her mouth. Link tries and fails to gauge whether Dyeri asks the question of suspicion—as have others before—or of genuine curiosity.

"...I want to see the Divine Beast."

"Savah Naboris."

By now Link has noticed that the Parapan greetings, too, begin with the syllable sa. Perhaps like the Eldic double up to demonstrate their respect, so does sa mean something, as in the name of the Goddess Sageru.

To Dyeri, Link nods. Dyeri's eyebrows quirk still further up. Link has the sense that the future of Dyeri's eyebrows rests on her fingertips: another strange answer, and her eyebrows will rip off from her forehead to float up above her face to arch still further. "Got an obvious question for you. Why?"

"...I think I can do something about it. About the Divine Beast."

Dyeri lifts her hand to her left earlobe and tugs. "Can you help chop up those zapshrooms? Careful with your hands. Sting, those babies do."

Link follows to where she points. A crate marked with labels she cannot read. She opens the top to peer inside: mushrooms. Yellow as yellow can get. While the sunshrooms of Hateno sported a shade closer to the orange of a sunset just begun, the zapshrooms blister with the brightness of their hue.

She sticks her hand in.

When Link comes to a second later, face-down in the sandy dirt, Dyeri holds back a laugh. Rotana emerges from her tent to inquire about the yelp she heard.

Dyeri grants Link a pair of gloves made of a slippery squeaky material that carries a scent entirely different from leather. A dull scent. A scent that sneaks her a headache when she inhales too long.

"Rubber," Dyeri notes, her voice lilted up. "Faronese rubber. It'll protect you from electric shocks."
Just don't let the caps touch your bare skin. The rest of the mushroom's fine."

Link takes her knife to the zapshrooms. The thick rubber of the gloves limits her usual nimbleness of fingers, but she removes the caps nonetheless and places them in a container that Dyeri indicates, a wooden bucket with a tiny shard of topaz at the bottom. "Dice 'em up. We'll stick 'em in the omelet."

Link nods. She cuts thin slices of the zapshrooms' stalks, then ribbons the tender ribbed flesh exposed with the caps cut off. She dices through multiple rounds until she can balance the pieces of zapshroom on her fingernail.

"Whoa! I said to dice 'em, not grate 'em. Gotta say this is pretty great, too." Dyeri chuckles to herself and Link laughs with her despite not understanding the joke. Dyeri wipes the bits of shroom from the cutting board into the skillet, where the eggs have started to firm into omelet. She salts and spices the omelet, then flips it over. Link can see the golden sheen of seal butter on the newly exposed half of the omelet. Globules of fat congeal around the edges, which Dyeri knocks off with the spatula before smoothing the rest of the butter into a clean yellow shimmer.

"You're probably wondering why we'd go to the trouble of bearing zapshrooms like that, eh."

"...because they're delicious?"

Dyeri looks at her, and Link tries a small smile. Dyeri bursts into laughter so loud that a nearby sand sparrow launches into the air with a series of alarmed chirps. "You've got the right idea. That's part of it. Other part's that having their insides in your system keeps you safer. They absorb static like nothing else. And with monsters around that's becoming a higher priority than ever, swear by the Goddess."

Link nods. The protection from electrocution sounds like a pleasant minor boon from a tasty dish.

On the other hand, she has never been the best judge: she expected deliciousness in exchange for electrocution, and would've happily made that bargain to boot.

"Almost done. Here, stranger, you get the first portion." Link tilts her head, but Dyeri has already cut off a quarter and set it onto a plate. She proffers the plate to Link.

Link takes the plate without a second thought. She holds it up to her mouth. The omelet radiates heat and the double-savoriness of cooked egg and fried mushroom, the spices lending a sharp sweetness that runs her tongue over her upper lip. She tries to grab the omelet with her hand and winces from the heat. Bringing the plate to her mouth, Link grips the omelet directly between her teeth.

She jerks her head back and flings the omelet up into the air. Opening her mouth wide, Link catches the omelet whole in her mouth. It burns against her tongue and the roof of her mouth but she chokes it down anyway. Sparks of static course over the insides of her mouth, crackling the tip of her tongue down to her throat, like the burning sensation of a touch too much cinnamon. The outer layer of fatty seal butter provides a protective coating that lessens the impact of the shocks from painful to pleasant. And the richness of the butter slides the omelet down her throat. Almost too rich. She fights to keep it down. The sting of salt lingers on her lips as she licks it off.

Omelet.

Sand partridge eggs. The taste slightly sharper and slightly richer than cucco eggs, the white more watery and less firm, the yolk fattier, with a tendency to burn if left on the skillet for too long.
Urbosa taught Link to watch for the bubbles of air at the rim between the yolk and white to know when to flip the omelet over. In the shade of a stone pillar, the girls sat with the morning's hunt strung up on their horses. Whatever they did not eat, they would bring back whole. Link had learned that the Parapan queen kept a store of food for any civilian, particularly those on harder times. At sunset, from the roof of the palace, she watched wagons of produce quit the city to travel during the cool night to distribute to villages with poorer harvests than usual from the recent influx of monsters.

Since the girl with the golden hair had arrived in Nabooru, Link's training with Urbosa had taken a steady dive in pace. Urbosa ushered the girl with the golden hair and Impa alike away from their sessions; once alone, Link's skills improved. Yet under the heaviness of Impa's judgment and the girl with the golden hair's resentment, the sword slipped from her palms as if made of buttered ice.

Urbosa, Link noticed, had taken on a slightly different air. More stressed than usual, though she kept it from her expressions and her words. But Link had learned to detect that faint difference in atmosphere as she had learned to detect the crackle in the air just before the storm.

And Urbosa's change in demeanor which Link could not place made her tremble at what it could bring.

Urbosa stretched her legs and massaged her shoulders. "So, Link, how are you enjoying Nabooru?"

Link did not reply. She kept her gaze trained on the omelet in the skillet, on the rim between the white and the yolk.

"If you don't like the city crowds, Link, we could always move elsewhere." Urbosa smiled at her. "My home village's quiet compared to Nabooru's bustle. I think you'd like Rovah."

Link kept quiet, patient. Urbosa rested her hand on her hip. "...what do you think of the food? That's what I remember from my first visit to Nabooru way back when. The way everything smelled. All the vendors on every corner, with food I'd never heard of. I'd never even had hydromelon before. Doesn't grow in Rovah."

The omelet bubbled. Link flipped it deftly; Urbosa flashed her a signal of approval.

"Nicely done. You've learned well. So, Link. What recipes have you learned?" Urbosa continued to probe. Link's stomach started to rumble from the images of hot and cool meals dancing through her memories. She lifted her hands to answer Urbosa's next question: "And the hydromelon?"

"They're delicious. Icy and sweet." Urbosa snapped her fingers and then fell silent. Link's hands faltered; she gazed at the Champion of Sageru's face to read her features, to check for resentment, to anticipate a blow across the face or hands around her throat, yet Urbosa's expression held nothing but warmth. "...if it's not too much trouble I want to bring some melons back to my sister."

"Your sister?"

Link snapped herself back to the skillet. She flipped the omelet over again. From the edge of her vision she could see Urbosa shift.

"You should tell me about her, Link. I've an older sister myself, and some younger cousins besides." Urbosa speaks of them briefly, of her mothers, of growing up in Rovah and learning the ways of the blade from the village swordsmith. She took to the blade as Link had taken to the preparation of food and soon outstripped her mentors. Her mothers proudly sent her to Nabooru to train further in the Queen's own garrison. When knowledge of the Calamitous One's return had spread and the Queen had taken on the call to appoint a Champion of Sageru, Urbosa had proven her mettle in a tournament of strength and then another of wit. The Oracles of the Temples of the Goddesses had run her through gauntlets of trials.

She had entered a girl and emerged the other end a woman prepared to take on the fate of the world on her shoulders.

Since then her life had busied, and Urbosa had found little time to visit her family. "But once we bake that boar, I look forward to taking a nice long rest with my folks. You and your sister are invited to come visit. I'll show you my mother's own special recipe for fried bananas if you do."

Link lifted her head slightly at that, and Urbosa laughed.

"I mean it, Link."

The omelet had cooked through. Link slit the omelet into two pieces, one larger than the other, and offered Urbosa the larger half, which she accepted. "This is delicious, you know. You've got a way with food. Maybe you're the Sage of an eighth Goddess with a virtue of food. Mmhm!"

Link could feel her cheeks heat up in a blush. Urbosa patted her shoulder.

"I don't know much about you, Link, but we'll be stuck together for some time. We should enjoy it. And if you like talking about food, then we'll keep talking about food. Link, how do you feel about boiled goose eggs? Have you tried them yet?"

Despite herself Link could sense her hands rising up to reply. So the conversation went. Urbosa asked about food and Link answered; Urbosa inquired of recipes and Link responded; Urbosa shifted the conversation to any other topic and Link fell silent until the talk turned once more to food.

Even so, she listened.

She listened to the stories of Urbosa's childhood, of Urbosa having fought tooth and nail to become the Champion of Sageru, of Urbosa's sister and mothers and cousins.

She listened.

That night Link unfurled the map that the King had given her. She searched the whole of Parapa for Rovah but could not find its name no matter how long she searched. Without meaning to, Link fell asleep with her face on the parchment.

In the morning she awoke to a plate of omelet, speckled with zapshroom, and a bright red dot inked into the atlas near the southeast of Parapa. An elegant hand had written a name beside the dot in looping Parapan script.

She needed not to know how to read Parapan to understand the name Rovah.

Link licks the last of the salt from her lips and wipes her mouth on the back of her hand. She rubs the corners of her eyes. She catches Dyeri eyeing her over the skillet.

Dyeri nods to herself.

"Hey there, stranger." Dyeri folds her arms across her chest. "You said you could do something about Savah Naboris. What do you plan on doing? Goddess doesn't take kindly to ritual sacrifice."
Link touches her chin. "Can you keep a secret?"

"Depends on its nature."

"I can activate that shrine."

Dyeri's eyebrows rise up once more into points. "The shrine?" Link points to the shrine in the centre of the statues, and Dyeri nods slowly, keeping that lively grin curling the corners of her lips. "A shrine, eh. And you don't want me to tell Rotana or Rhiaru how you did it, that right?" Link dips her head. "If you can do it without turning out to be Yiga, I'll see what I can do about Nabooru, swear by the Goddess."

Link blinks at her.

"What, you expected some fanfare? Hey there, if you figure out a way to stop Savah Naboris, be my guest." Link blinks again, and Dyeri exhales, her cheer slipping for a moment to a look of seriousness that makes Link take a step back. "Only a matter of time before that thing gets close enough to a town that we can't just evacuate. Already hit Dhoruf. Don't worry about me, though: my family got out just fine. Like I said, the Queen's been evacuating everyone weeks before they're in danger." She shrugs. "But there's only so much we can do. You think you've got something no one else does, go for it. I've seen enough people try to play the hero that I'm not buying it until someone does something. Someone passed through wielding a legendary 'master torch' or something like that. Told the traveller things were only going to end in misery. Insisted anyway and I got the traveller a lift. Goddesses know where the traveller is now. So. You see that sort of thing happening all the time, and hey there, you don't have time to care about everyone trying to throw herself into the halls of legends. But I'm nothing if not optimistic. I keep at it and someone's bound to get lucky." She coughs. Her wrist blocks her eyes from Link's vision, and Link stares down at her own boots. "...so." Dyeri's timbre has regained its earlier brightness. "Go on. Show me your magic and I'll get you out there."

Link swallows.

Dyeri tends to the omelet approaching finished deliciousness upon the skillet. Link sneaks towards the shrine at a crouch. She glances up to discern Rhiaru's location with the red telescope; Link spots the woman with the green headscarf sitting on the head of the northernmost statue, facing the highlands.

She steps onto the platform of the shrine.

The same as all the others. The depression in the pedestal. The platform piles high with scraps of weighed down paper and varying tools for which she has no name. She skirts the materials so as not to disturb the archaeologists' work.

Leaning over, Link slots the slate into the pedestal.

The blueness of the glow. Like the fire-light of the guardians. Like the shimmer of the blade that once weighed upon her body.

She returns to the fire and Dyeri's eyebrows have all but disappeared from her hairline. "Hey there. What do you know. Well, I swore by the Goddess." Dyeri leans in, propping her chin up on her elbow. "You'll be gone before I call Rotana for breakfast, understand?"

Link nods.

"So, stranger. What do you know about whaling?"
Electro Mushroom Omelet (three hearts, low electric resistance for 06:20) - bird egg, goat butter, rock salt, zapshroom

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Wew and now you understand why I put my worldbuilding in the notes instead of in the fic proper! Thanks for enduring this, dear reader, and thank you for reading along despite how dry Delicious in Wilds can get at times. And thank you to my beta reader, Emma, for bearing with me as well.

Sand seals are cute! In-game, the red ones are both faster and better behaved, which I don't think is a fun trade off. So, in Delicious in Wilds, the yellow ones are faster but wilder, and the red ones are better behaved but slower.

Rhiaru's outfit is based on the climbing outfit in-game. The three archaeologists, of course, are colour-coded after the Golden Goddesses for good luck.

Rubber is mentioned as being some ancient material in Breath of the Wild, but I simply stuck rubber trees in Faron.

The mentioned unification is the unification of Hyrule and the establishment of the royal family (though it's unclear if the royal family has actually been the same one the entire time; after all, ten thousand years is a very long time, and the family name is Harkinian, not Hyrule) from the collected nation-states that composed the land now known as Hyrule, the southern half of the continent. Pre-unification myths and legends are ancient. Many of them existed before the establishment of the Seven Goddesses as a religion.

The legend of the Seven Heroines in-game was interesting to me, so I wanted to expand upon them and their role in Parapan legend. Who were they? Could they be the gerudo version of the tale of the Seven Sages? Were they someone else, given how often the number seven repeats over and over again throughout the franchise? We just don't know.

There's also, of course, the matter of infodumping on you regarding the mirror (remember what Zelda was talking about?). A civil war, and a scholar who wanted to end the fighting, but who became instead a beast...what a strange story. How much is fact, and how much is fiction? And what real relevance does it have to the backstory of Delicious in Wilds? After all, we don't actually have much backstory on Calamity Ganon or even on the original construction of the Divine Beasts.

Take the names of Dyeri, Rhiaru, and Rotana's sand seals, and try to rearrange them a little bit. You might see a name of a certain other mount from a different franchise.

Rhiaru is a bit of Link's counterpart in a certain sense; she just silently walks off to go climbing places, which is why I put her in as green.
Because of locations named after characters from previous titles in the franchise and my own running out of previously named gerudo characters (thanks Nintendo), I started to turn to other gerudo-affiliated characters. Therefore, Rovah is named after Twinrova, and Dhoruf is named after Ganondorf, with appropriate corruptions of those names.

We get some rather painful hints about Link's past here, alongside more choking metaphors. That's been coming up here and again in the fic.

I wanted to give Urbosa something resembling an actual backstory and a family. She's trying her best to get through to Link, but as you can see she's having difficulty with getting Link to say something, much like how Daruk was doing. But it's notable that Link is also terrified of doing anything to make Urbosa angry in any way, while she wasn't with Daruk. This isn't because Urbosa is scarier than Daruk; this is because of Link's own past. Urbosa's the one who helps Link moves past that when it comes time for Daruk to take over.

Rotana is one of my favourite NPCs in Breath of the Wild. I adore how excited she is about her research; it makes me happy that they actually modelled glasses for her; and I wanted her to be the one to solve the shrine in Delicious in Wilds. They had everything but the slate.

Next time: molduga whaling and other joys of cooking!

midna's ass. 30 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: But but but! The entire scene of Link dealing with Rotana and her excitement while dreaming of food is one of the funniest bits of this series. Plus we get some great worldbuilding out of it.

Sand seals are so cute!

Emma. 30 September 2017.
Electro Elixir

Chapter Summary

Following the archaeologists' sellsword's suggestion, the travelling chef travels to the town of Ache's Veil, participates in a whaling excursion, and convinces the leader of the whalers to take the chef to the Divine Beast Vah Naboris.

Chapter Notes

As usual, non-spoiler comments I couldn't fit into the end: As always, thank you to my beta reader, Emma, for assisting me with this chapter, and thank you to you, the reader, for being with me all this time, and also for reminding me to post my chapters on time.

Much like how sapphires are used to keep cool in Eldin, sapphires are used (albeit more sparingly) as a form of air conditioning in the hot summers of Parapa. Conversely, rubies are used during the colder winters.

The sky-blue statue of the Goddess Sageru that Link sees in Nabooru is meant to resemble the Goddess of the Sand from Ocarina of Time and more notably Twilight Princess, albeit with a seven-pointed star upon her chest, which is a more recent addition to her mythos that was added to her design after the Seven became a unified religion.

I finally completely ran out of gerudo from previous games after whom to name the villages, so Ache's Veil is another reference to Aveil and also serves as a reference to ache, the monster from The Adventure of Link; there's a brick-joke. You know, if you're reading this and has never played The Adventure of Link, I recommend looking into it.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Link leaves the shrine for Rotana and Rhiaru to solve. With Dyeri's map opened in her hands and the ex-whaler's letter of recommendation tucked carefully in her satchel, she follows the sun to the west.

She has not read the letter, sealed in wax and stamped with the imprint of Dyeri's ring, a mark of a triangle emerging from wavy lines. For all Link knows Dyeri could have fooled her, could have sent her on a wild cucco chase. And yet the people of the land have done nothing but help her, from the first gorons who bid her to explore the mine in which she encountered Yunobo, to Amali's endless kindness in believing her and aiding her.

Link passes abandoned villages, sparse and far-between, smaller than she anticipated for a village. Not in ruin, ancient and inert, like the villages on the sides of the road through Central Hyrule, but recently abandoned, windows still paned with glass, inner layers of sapphire still cool to touch, the paint over the top of the doors still vibrant. Those further to the south that she observes through the red telescope swarm with monsters, which have not reached those further to the north through which she travels.

The settlements in the more arid parts of the desert congregate around oases. When she veers slightly to the north, she understands why the villages appear so small: only a few structures immediately surrounding the water seem permanent, made of stone and brick, painted white alongside brilliant hues of decoration. Tents and other fixtures make up the rest. Link watches from afar the evacuation of a village north of her camp. Within the span of those few hours that she can see the village, she watches over half of the settlement bundled up and carried away on the backs of its people, taking their animals with them.

Link rides on.

The robes purchased beyond the topaz gate of Aveil save her from the wind and the sand alike. Their billowing looseness keeps a current of air flowing over her skin where bareness would welcome in the heat. At night, the fabric serves to warm her, and she dons her feathered Tabanch tunic.

When they reach the windswept dunes, Link does not allow Ilia to gallop. They take the journey at a slower gait; she keeps watch for rock beneath the surface of the sand or for deeper sandbanks. The first time they encounter the latter, Ilia nearly drowns.

Only with an application of stasis and injuring her own horse does Link save her.

She takes water from the oases of vacated villages and catches what food she can. Birds and small creatures when she can have them—desert hares and strange squirrel-like creatures for which she has no name—and lizards and snakes when she cannot. Link learns to dig in the banks of oases to uncover frogs that provide both water—in the form of their urine—and meat. She acquires a taste for their legs smothered in fat. Over spots of water Link snags darners and butterflies from the air and cooks them down—as Amali taught her—to serve as substitute nuts.

To feed Ilia, Link breaks into stores of the villages in search of hay and dried grass, and any vegetables or fruit that she can gather up. Her first run-in with a cactus leaves pulling spines out of her abdomen and left arm for hours, but she retrieves their pear-like voltfruit for her companion to eat.

They rest wherever Link can find higher ground: pillars of stone, slopes of rock. She aids Ilia in climbing them and in leaping back down. Ilia shies and whinnies; Link can feel her companion's heart thudding with the fear.

Yet she has no recourse except to risk Ilia's life, for the sands contain their own dangers.

Link does not need to know their name to learn to avoid them. Where monsters she has faced on foot die to a blade through the throat, the monsters of the sands slip away into the ground only to re-emerge under her own boots. In banks of deeper sand lie great pincered monsters with suctioning mouths large enough to swallow her whole. They hide in wait beneath the surface of dunes. She watches a sand grouse waddle over such a bank of sand. Within an instant, a funnel like a whirlpool has opened up, the monster's pincers jutting from the dunes as a pair of sabres. Squawking, the grouse scrambles to escape, yet the downwards force of the whirlwind leads the bird directly into its waiting circular maw. The grouse disappears.

The monster slips back into the sand.

The deserts bring more than sedentary perils. Some monsters she mistakes for a plant, only to reach out and nearly have her hand cut off when the monster begins to spin. They emerge and descent from the sand like gambling tops, spined and spiked. Fearing for Ilia's life, Link avoids them at all costs: a single broken leg would spell the end for her companion, and she could not forgive herself for that. Other monsters resemble sharks, with tall fins that signal their approach and rock-like bone protrusions over their heads that act as half-helmet and half-battering ram. Though she successfully escapes one at a time, Link spots them more often in groups of three, patrolling around their territories. They leap out of the sand to crash into anything that moves in their abyssal jaws. She learns that whistling will prompt them to jump up and out, much to poor Ilia's confusion. A dose of bomb to their softer undersides drops their innards over the sand and leaves them to rot.

The rock pillars, Link discovers, do not guarantee safety. She falls asleep on top of such a pillar; she awakens to Ilia's neighs of distress.

Something crawls over her body.

Link yells, jumping back on the stone. Inside her clothing. On her bank, under her shirt, too many legs, too many legs. She rolls over the rock to crush them against her body. Their ooze slicks her skin; their squashed corpses cling to her flesh. She tries to scrub them off in a bath of sand and uncovers their identity: one-eyed scorpions capable of expelling fire from their tails.

From then on Link inspects every pillar before she sleeps to cleanse it with her blade.

The malice seems to have spread to the sand itself. In the distant deeper Tantari Desert of the south, she witnesses the sand merge and rise into monsters with outstretched arms that speed across the dunes before disintegrating a few seconds later. She swallows at the prospect of passing the sand-beasts en route to the Divine Beast.

Steadily, steadily, the sand give way once more to steppe.

When she sees a scarlet-striped lizalfos for the first time, she exhales in relief. The lizalfos breathes flame and Link knows just how to dispatch it. A yellow lizalfos gives her pause: from its horn the monster discharges a shock sufficient to convulse anything within a metre radius.

But Link can control the discharges too: the impact of an arrow to the horn triggers a bolt of electricity. The yellow lizalfos become her unwitting second companion to eliminate groups of monsters from afar and then ride on past before the surviving lizalfos can leap to their taloned feet. She turns around on Ilia to sign her thank-you at the lizalfos's spent body.

When she first smells water—about a fortnight after leaving Aveil—she considers the scent a hallucination. But the red telescope reveals densely populated line of villages and towns in the distance. Her mouth opens. Link can feel the saliva dripping from the roof of her mouth, thick and tasting of mud.

The River Sageru.

Wide, so wide that she cannot make out the other bank, some three kilometres across. As the Hylia River feeds Hyrule so does the Sageru River feed Parapa. Link rides Ilia to the point of exhaustion. Her companion's legs tense and shiver; the muscles of her back ripple with fatigue; her head sways. At the bank of the river, Link dismounts her.

She drops to her knees in the mud by the water.

She dips her hands into the river.

She drinks.
It flows over her fingers, and Link dives headfirst into the river.

The water stings in her newer wounds, the scraps on her back and stomach from the scorpions, the angry red welts where a lizalfos's talons hooked into the skin of her right leg, the thick cut across her left palm from the spinning-top plant that leaves her barely able to hold her sword without wincing in pain. She drinks as she bathes. Stripping away her clothing, she allows the sand, the salt, the sweat to wash from her skin. She scrubs her body with the softer sand from the riverbed and digs her nails into her scalp to draw out the sand ingrained to the roots of her hair.

She drinks too much.

On the bank again, she vomits. Mostly water, with a greenish hint of bile. The acid burns up her throat.

She passes out by Ilia's side.

Link awakens under the warmth of midmorning. She drinks again, this time more carefully, and snacks on the leftovers of frog fried the day before. Wiping her mouth on her tunic sleeve, she inspects Ilia. No wounds, no injuries. Her companion walks normally.

"Only a little farther. I'm sorry for how far I pushed you yesterday." She caresses Ilia's cheek. Her companion pushes her nose into Link's hand. "I'll be more careful in the future. You mean more to me than my own life does, you know that, don't you, girl?"

Ilia whinnies. She snuffles Link's chest; Link embraces her.

They do not follow the river exactly. Travellers avoid her on the road until she remembers to pin the yellow pass from Aveil to her chest. When Link comes too close to the towns on the waterfront, guards demand to know her purpose, pass or no. She recognises the tall white-sandstone walls of Nabooru from her memories and—intent on avoiding trouble—skirts the Parapan capital by a wide margin. Even from here Link observes the rise of the statue of the golden-and-sky-blue Goddess Sageru; a fountain of water pumped from the river flows from the seven-pointed star upon the statue's chest, double-crescent mark of the gerudo curving over either breast. Raising the telescope to her eye, Link can discern the details of the three statues surrounding that of the Goddess Sageru: the heads of the Golden Goddesses in green, in blue, and in red.

All else falls within the walls.

Down south. Link rides on past Nabooru, past other villages and towns, until she reaches the final settlement along the river not yet evacuated, slightly further north than Dyeri's map indicated.

Ache's Veil.

A series of metal struts around the village perimeter spark with topaz. Unlike the topaz gate, tall and thick enough to deter monsters even without the sparks, Link notices the fragility of the thin weaves of metal, more like a cobweb than a fence. Some struts lean forward or back instead of standing straight up: a temporary measure, hastily erected.

Link arrives at the northern gate of the village. The guard within the greeting booth—a metal box similarly covered in topaz shards—inquires about her purposes for visiting Ache's Veil. Link reads the words from the guard's hands via a thin, lower-chest-level window in the steel shutter. She slides Dyeri's letter through the shutter. The guard repeats her question.

"I'm hungry," Link signs immediately, and then stops herself. "...Dyeri told me that I should sign up for a position whaling here."

Since Link cannot see the guard's face, she watches the guard's fingers drum on the desk. "You know Dyeri?"

"Is...is she from around here?"

The guard does not reply for a moment. Her hands vanish from the shutter. Link hears footsteps, then the shuffling of papers, then a few noises that she cannot identify. Link waits. The heat climbs along with the mid-spring sun. The wet season should start soon, from what she has heard. From late spring to the harvest. Idly considering what she has learned from passing, Link taps her boot against the dirt. One, two, ten, twenty, one hundred...

At last guard's hands return to the window. She passes over a sheet of parchment. "Here's the whaling contract. Are you familiar with what whaling entails?" Link is not familiar; she nods anyway. She can learn on her feet, as she has before. "Read this, then sign your name here if you agree. If you have any questions about the rules and regulations, feel free to ask."

Link looks at the paper written in three different scripts: in Parapan, in Faronese, and in Tabanch, none of which she knows beyond the recognition of their characters. Nonetheless she signs her name in Central Hyrulean at the bottom.

Anything less might jeopardise her passage into Nabooru.

The guard takes the paper, then pushes an envelope towards Link, who \textit{flips} it into her hand. "Please come around to inn at the southern entrance. I am...very sorry about our lack of hospitality, but I hope that you understand." Her gestures tinge with an apologetic steadiness. "The last time we allowed someone in with such a letter, she revealed herself to be Yiga. Boss trusts you, so I've been told to show you to the inn." Trust, for the stamp of Dyeri's ring.

Then again, a Yiga could have stolen the ring from Dyeri.

Link dips her head in understanding, thanks the guard, and comes around the other side of the town. An inn awaits her. Beneath an awning of a miniature stable, she notes a trough of water. Link leaves Ilia there and enters the undulating-cloth curtain of the inn's doorway.

A sandstone-skinned woman in the midst of the foyer sets down the broom in her hands to greet her. "Welcome to Tune on the Dune, Ache's Veil premiere inn. Oh, are you the guest?" The inkeep moves her hand to her chest; Link repeats her motion. "Please accept my apologies for the dust. We haven't had visitors around here in months. I certainly haven't been here until I was called in just now. It's a pleasure to meet you. My name is Vaike and I'll be hosting you while you're here." Link hands her the envelope from the guard. The inkeep flicks it open, scans it from right to left, and closes the envelope once more. "...you signed a whaling contract." Link nods. Vaike's timbre affects a more professional edge, and Link sets her boots together. "I see. Take the bed upstairs, first door on the left, if you have no objections." The inkeep produces a silver key which Link takes and pockets. "Get a good night's sleep. Be careful out there. Monsters have been known to get in. If you need anything, there's a bell next to the window. It'll alert me and I'll come see what's going on in a few minutes, but if monsters come, you signed the waiver that you're in charge of your own life." She exhales and returns to her normal tone. "I hope you enjoy your stay."

Link blinks. "I left Ilia...I left my horse outside. I hope that's all right."

After a few moments of Vaike's silence and Link's panic, the inkeep explains that she does not know how to read sign from her fingers. She \textit{does}, however, know how to read Central Hyrulean.
As Vaike fetches Link paper and quill, Link struggles to write legibly enough for Vaike to read.

"That's what the water-trough's there for," Vaike answers agreeably, noting Link's words from the paper. "I'll feed and water your horse while she's here."

Link writes: "Is Ilia going to be left out there?"

Vaike grimaces. "I'm afraid so. We used to able to bring them in but...there have been incidents. Yiga forcing their horses to swallow explosives." Link pales. "But I haven't lost a horse yet."

Link bows in gratitude. "How much do I have to pay...?" Vaike quirks an eyebrow; Link blushes from her forgetfulness and writes down the question instead.

Glancing over the paper, the inkeep shakes her head. "Didn't you read the contract?" Link smiles nervously, but Vaike seems to pay her little mind. "A night's stay is included. You only have to pay if you desert, though deserting in the desert doesn't sound like a plan much blessed by Nayru." She laughs gently to herself. "Make sure you dress in layers. Don't worry about armour; dress light and make sure you can move. If you can, I suggest a hasty elixir."

Link nods.

"And most of all...unless you decide to become a whaler full-time, it's a once in a lifetime opportunity. You might as well enjoy yourself."

Vaike takes her leave once she has shown Link to her room and provided her with dinner in the form of a creamy stew on seal milk. Globules of fat bubble at the edges of chopped voltfruit and Parapan radish from the richness of the milk. Link glances at the inside of the offered room, at its neatness and tidiness, at the pitcher of water on the nightstand, at the candles arranged artfully, at the softness of the bed. She takes the pitcher and then lopes down the stairs to sleep with Ilia under the awning.

The morning after she bids Ilia a temporary farewell. Her companion noses her cheek, and Link brings their foreheads together to comfort her.

Then she meets her employers: five gerudo women in robes the colour of sand, and a sixth dressed in dark green, her hair dyed emerald. The leader—an athletic woman of obsidian skin and practical gaze, her hair drawn back in a series of braided locks, her stature shorter than the others to just a few centimetres above Link's own height—introduces herself as Nadyne. Nadyne provided a pair of sand boots; Link gratefully puts them on. "Ho there, traveller. You have a name?"

"Link."

Nadyne emulates the gesture. As Link cannot write Parapan, or Tabanach, or Faronese and Nadyne knows no Central Hyrulean, they seem to come to an impasse, until one of the other women ventures that she knows a little Necludan. "Link," says Nadyne, and Link inclines her head. "Welcome aboard. I take it you've never been whaling before, so allow me to introduce the team. Ahni—" She indicates the dark-skinned woman who knows Necludan, her earrings glittering with amber; Ahni shyly raises her hands to her mouth. "—and Luavan—" Nadyne indicates a short-haired woman of sand-coloured tone and green dye at the tips of her locks, who gives Link a smirk and a salute. "—are the harpooners. They're in charge of bringing down the molduga whale itself."

"Molduga whale. Dyeri taught her the sign for the word molduga, which she now repeats to herself.

"Pleiade—" The tallest and palest of the assembled women, her mouth a stern line, a golden armlet coiled up her left arm in the shape of a sand shark. "—and Dilani—" The woman bows gracefully to Link as though performing a move in a dance, before lifting her head so that Link can see the golden triangle tattooed under her right eye, vibrant as the sun against the warm onyx tones of her skin, its brilliant matched by the easy smile upon her lips. Her long hair fluffs around her head, her curly bangs dyed blue. "—are our spotters. They're the ones who risk life and limb to get our harpooners close enough to spear the molduga."

Dilani smiles. "You don't need to go on and on about us, Boss."

"Oh. It's the least I can do for how much courage you all have. I can tell you that much." Nadyne grins warmly at her team. "You'd make the Courageous Champion of Sageru herself proud." She turns back to Link. "And this, may Her winds bless us all, is our Oracle of Safarore." The woman in the green robe and the green hair dips low, and Link bows back to her. "Listen to anything that She tells you, for She comes with us to bring our Goddess Safarore's wind and our Goddess Safarore's courage. She can read Her Courageousness's will better than anyone and so tells us where to move to always catch the wind."

Link inclines her head at the Oracle, who offers her a smile as she strums a note upon the three-stringed lyre she holds in her hands painted green with circular markings that remind Link of the symbol on the back of her paraglider. Link blushes though she cannot quite tell why.

"And you, Link, will come with me. Got any questions about what you're supposed to do?"

Link shakes her head. She has no questions if she does not know the first thing about her assignment.

"Then I hope that your courage is well up to the task, because you'll need it." Nadyne brings her right hand to her mouth and whistles. "Let's get whaling."

The team moves outside to where sit sandships of bone hull and linen sail. Four such ships, one smaller than the others. Link's arms fall in surprise to her sides.

The Oracle of Farore brings out four giant leaves painted over with blessings in red, blue, green, and sky blue, symbols of the Goddesses. Korok leaves, Link realises. The women fan out. Dilani and Ahni take one of the ships, and Luavan and Pleiade another. Link watches them lash themselves to the masts with woven lifelines. Upon her left wrist, each spotter ties a rope looped around the mast, which can open, close, and twist the sail; to her right each spotter fastens the korok leaf. The harpooners carry with them massive hooked harpoons bladed with gems of sapphire crackling with frost. Each one carries a supply of four.

The Oracle of Farore takes the smallest ship. Nadyne ushers Link onto the last of the larger sandships and loops a belt around Link's waist with a rope attached. Link observes that the rope does not immediately tie around the mast of the sandship like the other lifelines, but rather winds itself over and over and over around a strange contraption affixed to the lever. Nadyne turns the lever repeatedly and the rope tightens, then locks the lever into place. "Don't worry, Link. There's over one hundred metres of rope in this thing. You're not going to get dragged around the sands."

Nadyne reaches up to fiddle with her right earlobe as she saw Dyeri do. "Oh, right. If things do go north, though, and you suddenly feel yourself getting dragged, don't panic. Calm down. The clothing you're wearing will protect you from the worst of the sand, and it'll keep you from becoming molduga chow. You'd rather get a sand-burn than end up a molduga's lunch, I can tell you that much."

Link rubs the back of her head.

"Thanks for coming along with us. Wait here."
Nadyne leaves her ship. The Oracle of Farore's sandship sits a valley of the dunes in front of the other three. Together, the Oracle and Nadyne invoke the Goddesses, Nadyne asking for Nayru's wisdom, Din's power, and Sageru's protection of Her kin, the Oracle asking, at length, for Farore's courage and Farore's wind.

"O Our Goddesses," the Oracle of Farore intones, "may our whaling please You, and may You bless us with success." The Oracle removes a green ocarina. Raising the instrument to the Oracle's lips, the Oracle sings a long note, then tucks the ocarina back into her robe to withdraw again the emerald lyre.

Nadyne takes her place with the korok leaf beside Link again, and the sandship lurches forward.

The ships slip slow over the sand at first. Yet, as Nadyne, Luavan, and Dilani keep the paces of their korok leaves to the song that the Oracle of Farore strums, the sandships quicken over the waves of sand until they fly over the dunes. Clinging to the mast, Link looks out over the desert through which they speed, at the golden light reflecting from the pale sands, at the clear blueness of the sky, the bluest sky that she could imagine, stretching out to the infinites of the world, a sea in the heavens.

Link laughs. For the exhilaration of the wind that billows her robes, for the beauty of the expanse of sand and sky and the line of the horizon where the two blur together into the sea, for the joy of riding a ship over the sands of a desert—

She laughs, and laughs, and when she thinks that she cannot laugh anymore another wave of mirth crashes over her, and she can hear Nadyne snickering, and then chuckling, and then breaking out into laughter so infectious that Link catches the laugh back from her and Nadyne from Link until she has doubled over with her aching stomach against the mast and her mouth threatening to split in half, and the sinew on the underside of her tongue throbbing from the stretch of having laughed for too long—

The Oracle of Farore's lyre-song shifts.

Nadyne's laughter stops with such abruptness that Link gasps out another few seconds and then claps her hand over her mouth to halt her own.

They arrive to a flat expanse of barren sand, lone and level. The other two sandships break away from the formation, and the Oracle of Farore's ship slows to a halt. Only Nadyne and Link's proceeds forward.

"Oh. It's almost showtime, Link. Don't worry about us," Nadyne instructs softly, her words just audible above the soft whisper of the bone ship over sand. "We'll make our ways towards it ourselves. Just focus on luring it out. If you hear me whistle, run straight towards me in a line. Otherwise, zigzagging is your friend. I know you know this already, but first-time whalers can get their nerves in a bundle, so just focus on what Dyeri taught you."

What Dyeri taught her. Link knows how to sign the word molduga. And nothing else.

"Get off the ship, Link. And good luck." Link forcibly uncurls her fingers from around the mast. Nadyne steadies the ship. Link takes a step off. "Stand still until I'm out of range," Nadyne calls softly over her shoulder, "and don't make a sound."

Link gulps down air. The sand boots keep her from sinking into the sand, and she spreads her Feet wide to her shoulders to firm her stance. The sandship speeds away. Link watches the rope fixed to her waist unwind and trail off over the dunes.
She hears the song of the emerald lyre.

Link turns her head this way and that. The ships wait along the periphery of her vision. The sun reaches its zenith to bear its heat upon the sands. She blinks. A strange fatigue of confusion paints the inner curves of her eyelids dark.

She should have asked. Asked someone, anyone.

For want of what better to do, Link takes to pacing back and forth. The rope around her waist wriggles back and forth on the sand.

The sand vibrates.

Link pauses. The ground continues to shake, with increasing intensity. She looks around her for monsters, her hands reaching automatically for her paraglider, but no pincers emerge from the sand and no outstretched arms race towards her.

And then she notices the furrow of sand behind her.

A long, long furrow that collapses ten metres after the head rushes towards her at an alarming speed. As it nears, she can hear the noise of something digging out the sand beneath the surface.

Like one of the sand sharks, but larger.

Far larger.

Far, far, far larger.

Link whistles but the giant sand shark does not respond, perhaps too far away. She shoves her hand into the loose robes to remove the slate from its pouch and rapidly summons a bomb that gets stuck inside of her sleeve. Hastily she scrambles to stick her other hand down her robe to recover the bomb. The vibration of the earth knocks her onto her knees. She struggles for the bomb.

The rope around her waist tugs and suddenly Link skids along the sand at breakneck pace. The bomb rolls around down her sleeve to tumble around her torso and between her legs. As she slides, she shoves her hand down her trousers and grasps hold of the spherical bomb, pulling it out and holding it aloft in the air. The furrow charges towards her. She throws the bomb over her head at the sand shark. No matter how gigantic the monster, enough explosives should take care of it.

The wind blows the spherical bomb away from her. Before her very eyes, the furrow angles towards the bomb. She stares at the furrow's form, wider than Ilia's length from head to hindquarters, the immediate collapse indicating its massive depth.

It reaches the bomb.

Link sees the thing emerge from the sand a second before the impact of its breach reaches her and the shockwave of sand tosses her up into the air. The rope around her waist slackens; she opens her paraglider to float above the sands and witness the monster that has leaped from the bowels of the earth.

Larger than the coalesced Malice of Eldin, larger than the stalking guardians with their fire-light, larger than ten sand sharks put together, like a moving mountain of muscle and meat, a whale of the sands with a mouth carved halfway down the entirety of its body, its jaws opening as a flower blooms and snapping shut around the bomb.
The molduga twists through the air. A great whale shadowing the dunes. For a single squeeze of Link's heart that stretches into an infinity of numbness in her chest, its bulk blocks out the very sun.

More by instinct than by thought, Link's left forefinger slips along the surface of the slate.

The bomb explodes inside the molduga’s mouth.

She hears its roar resonate through the air as the detonation splurts blood from the corners of its massive maw. When the molduga topples to the ground, the storm of sand kicked up chokes Link’s nose and coarsens her throat. The monster writhes. Its weight sinks steadily into the dunes. The beast flails its mouth open and closed, and a pearly-clear liquid begins to drain from its jaw, liquid that moistens the sands with its pale sheen.

Link slowly floats down on the paraglider.

Only in the stillness of the air can she hear her own heartbeat pounding so painfully against her eardrums that they might burst. The other sandships race towards the downed beast. She watches—Ahni, with the amber earrings—drive a harpoon into the molduga's left eye. The monster roars out again. The sapphire of the harpoon must have broken inside the jelly of its eye; the monster spasms against the sand until the entire beast trembles at once into silence, the ice frigiding its muscle and stilling its motion. The sandships slide away and then curve backwards to return just as the molduga starts to stir again. Pleiade readies a harpoon of her own.

Suddenly pain explodes at Link's left side, harsh and sharp enough for her fingers to rip from the wooden struts of the paraglider. Blue and white and sandy-tan spin around her. Agony strips meaning from her left shoulder. Her left hip catches her wrist and then her right knee smacks against her left, the impact of her boots landing in the dune slightly knocking up her head.

She rolls woozily onto her stomach and lies there with her face in the sand. Her left side throbs. When she breathes in, a line of agony sears just under the skin at the base of her lung.

Link buries her face into the sand. A hiccough runs through her that pulls the skin over her left ribs and shoulders in a blaze of pain, and then darkness overtakes her.

When she comes to, the agony in her left side has ebbed and the sun has lowered. The mountainous corpse of the molduga lies still and quiet, its face around its eyes torn through with a series of eight harpoons. Hands over her side prompt her to turn her head to her left. Her vision resolves: Pleiade, kneeling beside her. Link finds herself on one of the sandships on a stretch of fabric with the whalers around her. Pleiade presses a compress to her left side while Luavan checks the wounded area with the practised hand of a healer. She confirms that Link has neither broken nor fractured those ribs, only bruised them heavily. "Microfractures, maybe. I'd believe that." She frowns. "You'll want some pain relief."

"...what happened?" asks Link, blinking blearily through the pain.

"The molduga's tail hit you," Lauvan replies with a sympathetic wince. Link nods blankly at her words. When Pleiade quits her hand, Link presses her own pain into her ribs; the pressure keeps the edge off of the pain.

At this Nadyne arrives. Link attempts a vacant smile at the whaling of the molduga, and Nadyne shakes her head. "For Goddess's sake, when you heard me say that you need courage, you really took it to heart, didn't you?" Link retracts herself back. Nadyne's frown deepens. 'I'm blacklisting you from ever whaling for anyone again at your blatant breach of protocols, and you really should have warned me that you were packing anything explosive. There's a reason we sapphire instead of topaz or bombs: a convulsing molduga's one of the most dangerous things on the sands.

Link lowers her head.

"...but whatever kind of explosive you used didn't make it spasm nearly as much as what I've seen before. You've got moxie. I can tell you that much. I have the feeling that you don't know how to properly whale—" Nadyne's eye widen. "—you don't know Parapan. Oh. Oh." Link blinks down at her own two hands. "You didn't read the contract. Did Dyeri even tell you what whaling meant?"

Link pauses, then shakes her head.

"For Goddess's sake," Nadyne says, more to herself than to Link, and then repeats the phrase again. "You didn't know the first thing about whaling; you signed the contract without reading it; you obviously aren't here to hunt molduga. So why did you take on the contract at all?"

Link hands shake at how badly she has once more messed up, at how her fears and anxieties have brought misfortune on those around her.

By herself she can act as recklessly as she wants. But she cannot continue with the assumption that others will dredge the answers out of her, that others will sit with her and talk to her about things like food as did Urbosa and Daruk.

Instead of bowing her head in silence and relying on her skills, she needs to speak, and so she does. Link explains: of how she met Dyeri by chance, of how she inquired a path to Nabooru, of how Dyeri suggested she take on a whaling contract in exchange for safe passage to Nabooru, of how Dyeri had told her that the whalers of Ache's Veil could guarantee her travel on the basis of their prized molduga oil. As she moves her hands, Nadyne's eyes widen further and further, until the whaler grasps her head in her hands.

"Oh. For Goddess's sake." Nadyne presses her fingers to her forehead. "Link, I can't take you to Nabooru. The city's shut tight as a moldworm trap since the most recent raid. I don't know who Dyeri's friends over at—what'd you say, the statues of the Seven Heroines?—are, but even if they're from Nabooru, they're likelier to sprout fins than they are to get back into the city for a good long while. They'll be stuck out there. I can tell you that much."

Still pressing her palm into her injured side, Link simply looks at Nadyne, panting, her fingers curved in between her ribs, her wrist aching, her knee shuddering with the effort not to drop to the ground.

Nadyne breathes out. "But I'll do you one better, Link. I can't take you to Nabooru, but Goddess curse me if I don't keep my word, and that goes for Dyeri. What did you want from Nabooru? I might be able to arrange something."

"...I wanted to go to the Divine Beast. But I was hoping that I could...get someone from Nabooru..."

Nadyne's throat makes a strange crrk noise and Link's hands still. "You 'want to go to' Vah Naboris."

"...you didn't say Savah?" Link tilts her head as she asks the obvious.

The whaler blinks back at her, then laughs quietly. "You think that piece of murderous junk deserves the Goddess's respect? I can barely stand referring to it with vah and for Goddess's sake you want me to add the sa. No, that damned camel can go—" She says a word Link does not know.
"—itself. Doesn't deserve to carry Nabooru's name. But if you've got a death wish for going there, I'll take you, Link. I'll do that much."

Link grins widely. "Thank you thank you thank you—"

"No need to thank me yet." Nadyne reaches up to her right ear in a gesture that again reminds Link of Dyeri. "Though if we're going out there, we'll need some protection. Have you ever made elixir?"

Link nods, and Nadyne beams.

"Attagirl. If you forego the right to molduga organs from your contract, we can use those parts to mix one for electric resistance. We'll want it for Vah Naboris. I can tell you that much."

They sail back to Ache's Veil, Link sitting cross-legged rather than standing on the deck of the sandship. She watches as the team lashes the molduga's corpse to the four ships' masts. They fan out to begin the slow trek, the wind of korok leaves steadily pulling the molduga across the sand. For the molduga's massive size, it does not weigh nearly as much as Link anticipated; then again, the molduga whale could leap out of the sand and thus must be less dense than it looks.

When they arrive again in Ache's Veil, the Oracle of Farore tucks the emerald lyre under her arm; she touches the green ocarina to her lips. Its song opens the gate and out flood the villagers of Ache's Veil. Link observes from the shade of the awning as the villagers take the molduga whale apart, slicing into its flesh to remove its bones and teeth, draining oil from its thick skin and from lumps in its head, cutting off the stretchy material of its fins, removing the twisting innards of its guts. She watches them set up giant vats of boiling water over great open flames in which they drop the fat, the oil, the guts, alongside powders from massive barrels, closed over with huge lids and stirred with ladles that require two or three to move at once.

Nadyne clicks her tongue. "So, what say you and I make like camels and get that elixir?" Link blinks absently at her, and Nadyne laughs. "Silly joke. C'mon, Link."

Under Nadyne's instructions, the two weigh out zapshrooms, voltfin trouts fished from the river, and electric darners that Link herself has caught and which Nadyne notes makes for an excellent ingredient of high potency. They simmer in Link's cooking pot, dwarfed by the giant vat of elixir right next to it. Nadyne handles the molduga guts with thick gloves. The stench of the molduga's innards nearly knocks Link unconscious: acrid and burning, the stink stings her throat and waters her eyes. She dry-heaves but has nothing in her stomach to vomit out. Instead she holds a voltfin trout close to her nose: the overpowering fishy scent smells better than the rot and decay of decomposing molduga entrails. Nadyne lays a thin film of fin sail—nearly translucent, tinted lightly in a reddish pink of the blood vessels that run through the skin—over the top of the cooking pot, and Link shuts the lid. A webbing of sail sticks out from under the rim.

The elixir simmers, and simmers, and simmers. As the other vats near completion for their own simmering—to congeal soap out of the molduga's fat and wax from its oil, to brew its guts into elixirs, to condense its thick and slimy meat into a distillation of monster extract, to prepare an acidic cleanse for the bones removed from its corpse—the air thickens with clouds of stench that settles down into her lungs and fills up her throat. Link drinks; the water does not drown out the smoke that clogs her nose and stuffs her mouth.

At some point the corners of her vision darken. She blinks her eyes to stay awake, to fight the current, and she hears—as though from the water—Nadyne speaking to her.

She closes her eyes and the darkness swaddles her in its comforting warmth.
The scent of soap. The fat boiling away to leave a cake of soap behind. The fragrance of flowers and herbs added in to sweeten and soften the scent.

In the dark cover of the night, after Urbosa had dismissed her from another session of training in which Link had taken her own blade against the Champion of Sageru, Link remained in the courtyard to practise. To go through the stances. To measure out her vertical strikes and horizontal swings, to practise the thrusts and jabs, to examine how rapidly she could twist her limbs to parry, to begin going through the forms of diagonal strikes.

The scent of soap had drifted down from one of the balconies above. Above the aroma of simmered fat, she could smell voltfruit and aloe. Link had explored little of the palace; she charted the course from the kitchen to her own bedroom to the courtyard and back again. She knew of the stables where Urbosa took her to select sand seals for the morning's hunt, and she knew of the grasslands to the north and the sands far, far to the south, in the landlocked stretch of Parapa in the shadow of the mountains.

Beyond that, Link had spent the majority of her waking hours training. Practising. Learning the blade not as a tool of self-defence on the road but as a weapon of war.

The sun had long set; the moon had taken her place to crest into the sky as though frowning upon Link's efforts. The cool air of the young night left the back of her neck cold with sweat, the hairs sticking uncomfortably to her skin. She wiped off her neck with her hand. When she blinked, she strained to lift her eyelids again.

She sheathed the sword. Where the blue glow faded, so too did the last of her energy. Her body's exhaustion led her to quit the courtyard. Spent, she wobbled through the archways and up the stairs to her room.

The scent of soap. Stronger, here. Blearily she rubbed her eyes on the heels of her hands. From her door Link could smell the fragrance of voltfruit and aloe more strongly than from the courtyard. She swung her head with her eyelids closed towards the source of the scent. She padded forward with her worn feet aching in her boots to the balcony at the end of the hall.

The clouds beneath the moon obscured her view of the balcony, yet she could hear—Voices.

Link paused, her hand on the wall, as she listened to that particular timbre she knew well and yet not at all.

The girl with the golden hair.

Speaking, softly, about the Divine Beasts, about the shrines, about the slate that she carried at her hip though her father had threatened her with taking it away if she did not comply to her studies. Of her research into the sacred power supposedly passed down her bloodline, of the revelation that her blood may not harbour any power at all, of something she has seen repeated in folklore again and again, of another realm, sacred to the Golden Goddesses.

Of Impa's insistence on her prayers. Of how the girl with the golden hair had adored and depended on Impa all her life, and now knew not how to expel the resentment burning inside her chest. "I know it's not Impa's fault. I know that Father is forcing her to force me. It's not fair to her, but oh, whenever she's around I know I can't do anything—" She sniffed. Urbosa murmured something Link could not catch. "...I don't want to blame her. But it's so hard to separate these emotions..."
The clouds shifted. In the smile of the pale moon, Link could just make out Urbosa reclining back upon an arrangement of pillows on the balcony, her arms wrapped softly around the girl with the golden hair who clung to her with her head against Urbosa's chest and her body stretched across her lap, her legs tucked up beside Urbosa's. Link could see how her golden hair glistened wetly as Urbosa ran her fingers through it, the scent of soap undoubtedly from a recent bath.

The girl with the golden hair glanced up at Urbosa. Her green irises—green, weren't they? Link can't remember, green or blue—reflected the moonlight and the brown of Urbosa's eyes. "You're the kindest anyone has ever been to me," she whispered.

Urbosa turned her head towards the skies. "Only because I can be."

"But you believe me, don't you?"

"...you've worked your entire life for this, praying to no avail, pushing yourself past the point of exhaustion. If the royal bloodline does carry some magic, then more prayer won't ever unlock it."

Urbosa rolled her shoulders. "And if you don't, then I would rather know we can best the Calamitous One on our skills than waiting on the whims of a Goddess. You are many, many things—" Urbosa laughed lightly and the girl with the golden hair pouted. "—but a Goddess is not one of them. You're human. I don't know about you, but I wouldn't have it any other way."

Link stepped backwards. Her hand retracted from the wall; she nearly toppled over but caught herself. She shook her head, returned to her room, lay down upon the bed and attempted to sleep despite the thickness of the scent of voltfruit and aloe and soap.

Not a conversation meant for her.

Not a friendship meant for her.

Not a life meant for her.

—

Electro Elixir (three hearts, high electric resistance for 12:30) - electric darner, molduga fin, molduga guts, voltfin trout, zapshroom

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: The enemies described in this chapter include: devalant first introduced in A Link to the Past; geldman first introduced in A Link to the Past; leever first introduced in The Legend of Zelda; malgyorgs first introduced in Spirit Tracks; and aruroda first introduced in The Adventure of Link.

Link whistling in order to disorient the malgyorgs (sand sharks) is a reference to how in Spirit Tracks, Link can use the train whistle to prompt the sharks to jump and then fire at them using the train's cannon.

The bit about Ilia nearly drowning in a sandbar was inspired by a similar scene in The Neverending Story: the death of Artax in the swamp. Fun fact: you can actually force your horse into the Gerudo Desert (I did so by putting my horse onto a metal crate and then utilising magnesis) but the horse becomes stuck in a single pose and the horse cannot be ridden without being teleported out.

The inn is meant for visitors such as Link to stay, since they're not allowed in Ache's Veil proper due to concerns about Yiga attacks. Why are the Yiga attacking places like Ache's Veil? If the hero of legend were to come through to the Divine Beast, the hero is likely to pass through the village nearest to Tantari. At the moment, that's Ache's Veil.

Vaike's silver key is a nod to the silver keys used to open locked doors in dungeons throughout the Zelda franchise.

While most people do know how to read sign language (at least many more people than know how to read it in the present day, due to the higher usage of sign language in Hyrule), not everyone does. We've seen bits and pieces of this before, such as the man on the bridge whom Link met back during the earlier chapters, and I've mentioned it here and there with travellers Link has met.

Molduga whaling was a lot of fun to thinking through logistically. I really liked the molduga in-game, and it saddens me how often the overworld bosses were merely left as that instead of being interwoven with the worldbuilding. Even though we don't get to spend much time with Nadyne's team, I took some time to sit down and design them. Of course, the songs that the Oracle of Farore plays on the lyre are none other than the molduga tracks from the OST, with the different songs meaning different signals for the whalers. Although the instrumentation in Breath of the Wild wasn't a lyre or anything close, since the main instruments used in the song are strings, I felt the lyre an appropriate enough approximation. While I use the word lyre to refer to the instrument, it's not quite a lyre. Sadly I can't show it to you all visually.

"Going north" is the Parapan equivalent of saying "going south", as in, "if things go south" (meaning, if things go bad).

Farore is invoked with an ocarina because the ocarina is the instrument traditionally associated with Farore. The lyre, however, is traditionally used for big game hunting in Parapa, not to mention that its sound carries farther than an ocarina.

By the way, this is actually in relation to the harps, but I was reminded by the lyre. Parapan harps (the ages) are six-stringed because the harp in Oracle of Ages has six strings, while the harp that Zelda play is eight-stringed from Skyward Sword has eight strings. The lyre here has three strings because the mark of Farore has a circle and two crescents.

Electric darners are one of the ingredients with the highest potency in-game, while other insects tend to have low potency, despite their difficulty in being caught. Preparation of the molduga's various parts is inspired by what actual whales were used for during the heyday of whaling.

Instead of an elixir, today's memory has been brought up to you by the smell of: soap! Please do remember that Urbosa and Zelda only have an age gap of two years here. We do not actually have an age for Urbosa in-game, and all of the gerudo are ridiculously tall and modelled as being 'mature' (look at poor Riju, who is supposed to be a child, and yet is sexualised), so I don't think that the liberties I took with her are too far-off.
midna's ass. 30 September 2017.

Beta reader's comments: Whaling! I really like this very specific thing that happens in fiction where there are ships that sail on sand. I don't know why, it's just a really neat concept to me.

The ending of this chapter is really devastating. Poor Link.

Emma. 30 September 2017.
Gourmet Spiced Meat Skewer

Chapter Summary

The molduga whaler aids the travelling chef in arriving at the Divine Beast of Nabooru, whereupon the molduga whaler remains at a safe distance while the chef attempts to board and ends up meeting a Parapan food enthusiast and fellow Divine Beast delver.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

They go by sand seal. Nadyne provides Link with a sturdy plate of molduga bone. "It can double as a shield, too. Keep it as part of your contract payment." She ties a rope around Link's waist and gives her a crash course on steering the sand seal with careful tugs on the rope and how to balance out the seal's movements to avoid tipping into the sand. "It's the second-fastest way across the sand, and unless you want your horse drowned in a sandbar, the fastest way. I'll tell you that much."

Link's first effort at controlling a sand seal catapults her headfirst into a nearby dune. Her second leads the bone shield to flip up from under her boots to crack her hard enough against the forehead that her hand comes away damp with blood. Nadyne cautions her but Link just grins toothily, bandages the wound with a gauze around her brow, and tries again.

Her third and fourth and fifth and sixth attempts go just about as well as the first two. But each time she controls the sand seal for a few minutes longer before capsizing.

On her seventh try Link curves smoothly around the track set out for her and returns again in front of Nadyne. Nadyne folds her arms across her chest. "Do that five times in a row and I'll declare you fit enough for an emergency run across Tantari."

As Link completes each circuit, Nadyne sets out obstacles for her: metal gates studded with topaz—though Link discovers, upon slamming directly into one steel strut, that the topaz has spent its reserves and does not shock her—and large boulders, alongside Nadyne's own sand seal skills.

In the distance, the Divine Beast Vah Naboris pierces the heavens with its shadowed form amid the greenish cloud of sand and silt. As the violent violet of its eyes ebbs and flows, the Divine Beast circles the perimeter of the barren wasteland born at its feet, a wasteland that grows by the day.

"I'm only taking you close to Vah Naboris," Nadyne cautions Link while they saddle up for the journey ahead. They stock up on supplies in their satchels, brimming with water-skins waxed and curiously studded on the inside with opal, enough to last the week's-long journey and come back again. "For Goddess's sake, don't kill yourself. I've seen enough tourists die the past year."

At Link's request—and begging, and offer to pay—Nadyne convinces the owners of the Ache's Veil stable and the rest of the village to allow Ilia within. Link catches herself almost referring to her companion with another name. She nuzzles Ilia a farewell. "This time you'll be safe here. I promise, girl, that nothing like what happened last time will ever happen to you again, as long as I'm alive."

Ilia neighs warmth into her ear. Link touches her own eyes; her fingers moisten with tears.

When the bottom of the sun touches the horizon, they ride.

To the south and to the west, towards the land once green by the banks of the River Sageru, but which the Divine Beast has trampled and driven to ash.

They wear the long billowing robes with headwear of cloth that wraps around the whole of their faces, leaving nothing exposed but a band around their eyes. Nadyne hands Link a pair of goggles to strap around her head: protection for her eyes. The lenses may scratch and cloud, but better to obscure her eyes than to scratch them permanently.

They run into monsters, but Nadyne eliminates them with a proficiency at archery—about on par with Link's own skills, she suspects—and a familiarity with the beasts—far and away above Link's own. She studies from Nadyne's methods of dealing with the beasts. Many of the monsters of the sand, Link notices, fall prey easily to weapons of sapphire. Or, at least, those that breathe flame. Nadyne avoids or hits the electric beasts with bone-head arrows that cause the same exhaustive bolt of discharge that Link has seen from the lizalfos: keese to their talons, those shelled monsters that she comes to call ampilus directly on the tips of their feelers. Link practises and discovers that her aim while surfing behind the swiftly-moving sand seal could use significant work.

When the water in the skins runs low, Nadyne shows her how to roll the skins between her palms to crush the shards of opal and reveal the water within, effectively doubling or tripling the amount of water that the water-skins can bear.

The sand seals sport a remarkable stamina. Though they cannot maintain high speeds for very long, they can continue at a slower pace for lengthy hours. "To stop moving this deep in monster country is death," Nadyne warns, and so she teaches Link to sleep on top of the bone shield, her body tied to it and to the sand seal. "I'm a light sleeper. If you get knocked off, whistle and I'll wake up."

Link cannot sleep the first day, yet by the second fatigue wins her over. The steady motion of the shield up and over dunes of sand, the wind flowing over her body as she curls up on the shield just large enough to fit the core of her form, lulls her to slumber.

They approach the Divine Beast Vah Naboris. The winds pick up and the monsters thin out. From this distance, she can hear the thunder that rumbles from the lightning, louder and louder the closer they near, until that rumble becomes the entirety of her world, greater than the sound of the shield over sand, greater than the pounding of her heart in her ears, greater than the noise of her own yelling.

The only proof that she still lives comes in the sensation of her blood thudding against her eardrums, in the mere pressure against her sternum, in the pain she feels when she digs her nails against her palms.

Nadyne indicates for her to drink a vial of the yellow elixir. When Link signs that she can no longer hear Nadyne's words over the storm of the Divine Beast, Nadyne gestures to her instead. "For Goddess's sake, only drink one every half-day. One at sunset, and one at sunrise. Oh. It doesn't matter if you think it's wearing off. Those things are high potency. Drink more than one and you're apt to die then and there. I can tell you that much." Link quaffs it down; the elixir seems to suck the very static from the air and still the resonance of her body. Her movements become more sluggish, her muscles less responsive to her efforts to move, her breaths shallower, her heart beat slower. The sensations of her body dull: the colours less vibrant and prone to blurring; sound distorted; the pain of the sand that enters through the shutter of her headwear lessened to a numb throb. The disorientation frightens her and yet the fear does not seem to affect her body's lethargy. Her pulse does not quicken and her breaths come no faster, which terrifies her all the more. When she tries to swallow from her water-skin, she—unaccustomed to the longer time her throat takes to push the fluid down—nearly drowns herself.

Nadyne asks if she wants to turn back.

Link curls the fingers of her left hand into a fist.

They go on.

When lightning strikes the sands not forty paces away, Nadyne slows her sand seal to a stop. Link does the same. Over the roar of the thunder, Nadyne signs her words in Parapan, her gestures slowed by the effects of the elixir: "This is as far as I go."

Link raises her head to the Divine Beast Vah Naboris. The Divine Beast towers on four cylindrical legs, its hoofed feet spreading out in spinning discs wide enough to balance the Divine Beast's weight upon the sands. Even if she cranes her head nearly to the point of breaking her neck, she cannot see up to the Divine Beast's head. It moves away from Nadyne and Link. Its approximation of a tail hangs down and swings like a pendulum from side to side. The swings come slow, slow, marking out the time of its steps. As she watches, the limbs on its right side lift up together, and the discs contract and lower, like the extendable telescope, brought closer together by the force of gravity. The limbs rise and bend with a steadiness befitting their massive heft. While the pendulum of the tail swings to balance the Divine Beast's weight, its feet crest and then descend. Crashing heavily into the sand, the discs spread out to grip the earth. The pendulum swings the other way. The Divine Beast begins to lift the limbs on its left.

She lowers her gaze back to Nadyne.

"Thank you," Link signs back.

Nadyne's mouth thins into a line. "What are you doing to do?"

She touches her chin. Her sand seal opens their mouth but she cannot hear the noise over the hiss of the wind and the clash of the thunder. "I'm going to climb it."

Frantically Nadyne waves her arms. "You're doing to die. Not even a possibility, but a fact. You can't climb it."

"I have a...a thing that lets me fly."

"I know. I saw you use that paraglider during the whaling, but you must be daft if you think lightning won't strike you from the sky."

Link raises her head to the Divine Beast Vah Naboris. The Divine Beast towers on four cylindrical legs, its hoofed feet spreading out in spinning discs wide enough to balance the Divine Beast's weight upon the sands. Even if she cranes her head nearly to the point of breaking her neck, she cannot see up to the Divine Beast's head. It moves away from Nadyne and Link. Its approximation of a tail hangs down and swings like a pendulum from side to side. The swings come slow, slow, marking out the time of its steps. As she watches, the limbs on its right side lift up together, and the discs contract and lower, like the extendable telescope, brought closer together by the force of gravity. The limbs rise and bend with a steadiness befitting their massive heft. While the pendulum of the tail swings to balance the Divine Beast's weight, its feet crest and then descend. Crashing heavily into the sand, the discs spread out to grip the earth. The pendulum swings the other way. The Divine Beast begins to lift the limbs on its left.

She lowers her gaze back to Nadyne.

"Thank you," Link signs back.

Nadyne's mouth thins into a line. "What are you doing to do?"

She touches her chin. Her sand seal opens their mouth but she cannot hear the noise over the hiss of the wind and the clash of the thunder. "I'm going to climb it."

Frantically Nadyne waves her arms. "You're doing to die. Not even a possibility, but a fact. You can't climb it."

"I have a...a thing that lets me fly."

"I know. I saw you use that paraglider during the whaling, but you must be daft if you think lightning won't strike you from the sky."

Link touches her touches to her chin.

Nadyne presses her fingers into her forehead. "For Goddess's sake, turn back. I haven't the slightest clue why you're so desperate to get up there, but whatever it is isn't worth your life."

At that Link shakes her head. "I have to try." She pauses. "Nadyne, I have one more request."

She watches Nadyne exhale, watches Nadyne wipe sweat from her brow, watches Nadyne tug at her earlobe like Dyeri did. "You're killing me here. What is it?"
"I have. This." Link holds up the slate. The wind buffets her hand to scratch the skin of her fingers even through her gloves, and she lowers her hand into the sleeve of her robe once more. "I don't have time to explain everything right now, but if I die, could you recover this for me and pass it on to someone in Nabooru, or someone else you trust?"

Nadyne's eyes threaten to pop from her skull as she ogles Link incredulously, her mouth open, her tongue pushed against her lower teeth in bewilderment so clear that Link cringes back. "What in the Goddesses' realm is that?"

"...a slate." Link says the word slate in Necludan for lack of the gesture in Parapan. "It's the only thing you can use to calm the Divine Beast. If anything happens to me I can't let the slate be lost. Please. If I die then you can have everything that's on my person and on Ilia."

The paleness of Nadyne's wide eyes stands out starkly against the dark of her skin and the deeply-hued cloth of her headwear. She rolls her earlobe between her fingers, pushes her hand against her brow, and allows her arms to fall to her hips. Link watches her say something to herself. Then Nadyne tilts her head back. "Fine. I'll wait here on the periphery. If anything happens, I'll try to recover the slate." Nadyne's emulation of Link's motions better resemble the word book than slate but Link understands her meaning. "I'm not making any promises and I'm not going into the cloud. There's a difference between courage and needless recklessness, and it's one I've learned well." She rests her hand on the left of her abdomen and Link cocks her head to the side, but Nadyne offers no explanation. "Here." Nadyne reaches into her quiver to produce a bundle of sapphire-tipped arrows. Link can feel the cold radiating from the arrowheads. She blinks at Nadyne, who throws a hand up, fingers splayed, palm facing outwards. "I can do this much for you. I don't know you that well, but I can tell that this is something you're going to do whether no matter how much I tell you it's a terrible idea. I don't know a thing about this slate of yours or 'calming' that piece of junk, but just in case you're not delusional, I can offer you this help. That's about all I can say. Now, if you're going to go, just...go already."

Link's grin surprises even herself and she dips her head low. The movement unbalances her enough to topple her into the sand. As she wipes sand from the band of skin exposed around her eyes, she glances up to see Nadyne offering her hand.

She takes it.

Link unties the rope around her waist. The sand seal flips their tail at her but remains in place, their pudge spreading out over the sand, apparently unaffected by the whirlwind of lightning and dust not fifty paces away.

She kneels down for a moment in the sand and lays her palms flat against her knees. If anything happens to her—if anything causes her to lose the slate—

She's sorry.

With that, Link stands.

With that, she begins to walk.

Her feet burn hotly in the boots she wears, although they do keep her from sinking into the loose sand deposited by the storm. The Divine Beast walks with lengthy strides, and yet it moves so slowly that she can keep up with it if she runs. A loud crack and a sudden sharp agony in her right foot shudders her into the sand: a piece of glass. Wedged into the arch of her foot, having sliced through the skin. Wincing, her cries silent to the roar of the rolling thunder, Link gingerly touches her fingertip to the flat of the glass.
The pain hones itself against her muscle, against her bone, slicked with the blood that runs in rivulets down its transparent surface. She grips the shard of glass in her hand. The corners of her vision blur. Link inhales, and then she jerks the shard out of her foot.

With the lethargy in her limbs she cannot rip it all out at once. The glass catches against the inside flesh of her foot as she pulls and she doubles over herself, ripping the headwear from around her mouth just in time to vomit up something more mud than stomach contents into the sand. The wind claws across her cheeks. Her mouth fills with sand that stings in the cracks of her lips.

The glass comes free and the emptiness in her foot twinges and pulses.

Her head swims. Link throws the shard behind her as far as her arm can toss. Gauze. The gauze from her satchel. She cannot wash the sand from her wound; instead she wraps the injury with the grit still inside. Lifting herself to her boots, Link tests her right foot. The pain could drop her to her knees.

But she can stand.

And if she can stand, then she can walk.

And if she can walk, then she can still calm the Divine Beast.

Glass.

Link glances at the thunderstorm; she nods to herself. Where lightning strikes, the sand melts into glass. As Link hobbles along, the wound on her foot throbbing as though stabbed through with a knife at every step, the sand within grinding mercilessly against her raw flesh, she pushes herself to keep pace with the Divine Beast.

Even if the lightning strikes her, the elixir should protect her.

Or something like that.

She pulls the fabric of the headwear more tightly over her eyes until she scarcely looks out through the thin slits. Even with her eyes protected by the lenses, she can feel the force of the sand scraping her skin.

Link retrieves the paraglider.

No sooner has she opened it than has storm lifted her feet from the ground. The winds whip her upwards. Link can sense the crackle of static in the air that speedily dies down and then starts back up in fits and spurts. The elixir, or else the intermittent lightning, or else something else that she has no time to consider. She climbs up upwards to the heavens. The silt and ash block out the sun above. In the darkness, she cannot make out where the entrance terminal could be.

But Link can see the maliced tyrian of its eyes on the head that swerves as the Divine Beast changes its course.

If the Divine Beast Vah Naboris has a build similar to the Divine Beasts Vah Rudania and Vah Medoh, then the terminal must lie somewhere upon its back.

She closes the paraglider to lower her height back down before opening it again. Too high and the lightning will strike her. Even if the elixir will protect her body, the cloth-and-wood paraglider would go up in flames, and the paraglider has proven one of the most vital companions she could have brought with her, almost on par with her beloved cooking pot and her sister's trusty red telescope.

Link drops down again and then back up, then down and up and down and up, attempting to avoid the upper banks of the cloud. A strike of lightning hurtles towards the ground near enough for her to feel its heat against her skin even through the fabric of the robes.

The paraglider catches fire but the winds put the flame out again not a second later.

Her arms ache. She notices her limbs tire much more rapidly than usual, and she hastens her glide towards the Divine Beast's torso.

When she can see the shadow of the behemoth's bulk beneath her, Link closes the paraglider. She drops downwards. Thunder booms in her ear and lightning blinds her. She opens the paraglider in time to soften her landing. Tumbling forward along the spine of the Divine Beast, Link scrambles to find purchase on the too-smooth material.

Instead of the flat back of the Divine Beast Vah Medoh—her falling-off caused by the wind of the Divine Beast's flight rather than the shape of its back—or of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania, the torso of the Divine Beast Vah Naboris slopes gently downwards on either side. She senses herself sliding to the left. As her vision clears from its brightening by the lightning, Link whips her head back and forth to seek the terminal.

Yet the terminal eludes her.

Either facing away from her, or else hidden from view by the darkness of the storm, or else not on the Divine Beast's back at all.

Just before she slips off of the Divine Beast entirely, Link looks up to its neck. No orange glow. Perhaps on a side, or somewhere else she cannot—

She falls.

Link forces the paraglider opens but a sudden impact on her legs kicks her high into the air. The pain in her bones tremors up her spine to seep a migraine into the back of her skull. A crash of thunder lowers her eyelids. The wind knocks her back around until she opens the paraglider once more.

And then the loudness of thunder so close to her head spins her to startle. The white-hot streak of lightning sears her eyes. Pain burns against her palms. In the next second her fingers close around the avoid.

For a heartbeat that stretches impossibly long, Link hangs in the air with her hands still in the shape of the wooden struts her fingers curled around. Her world narrows into the emptiness of her palms and the sudden lack of strain upon her arms and the muscles over her shoulder blades.

She feels herself falling.

Down, down, impossibly down, the winds' effort to keep her aloft straining against her body, pushing her up by her stomach, forcing back her limbs until she falls spread-eagled, scraping sand on her downturned face.

Link closes her eyes.

Abruptly two hard rods slam into her body from below and break her fall, one across her stomach and one across her thighs. They knock the breath from her lungs and buck up her hips. Her eyes
The agony numbs to a breath of the night, lovely, dark and deep.

And then: the smell of food.

Of meat. Poultry. The smoky, savory scent floats down over her in heavenly ways that bring her to inhale deeply. Her eyelids flutter.

She can smell the cooking of the fat, the roast of the meat, the hint of spice—a medley of those both known and unknown; she detects the sourness of sumac and the bitterness of turmeric but cannot identify the rest by name though she has certainly tasted them before—clinging to the roof of her mouth. And above that notes of a nutty flavour. Roasted. Not nuts that she can name but nuts that her body knows. Acorns, she realises, and something else beside that.

Food.

Food that her body knows, food that melds together the fog beyond her memories into figures.

The girl with the green headband and the dark blue dress, the hoops of gold in her ears and the pride in her features, the kindness of her hands and the deftness of her blade.

Urbosa.

Gradually Link’s skills with the sword improved, as the girl with the golden hair ceased to attend her training sessions and instead split her time between investigating the great royal library of Nabooru and the Divine Beast Vah Naboris that Urbosa would one day pilot. Urbosa informed Link one day over a breakfast of honey-glazed crepes that the Queen of Parapa considered the library of Nabooru—the largest in the land, with the library in the Castle of Central Hyrule itself only the second most extensive—one of the most brilliant jewels of her rule.

Link inquired if the kitchens of the palace comprised another of the crown jewels of Parapa; Urbosa laughed long and loud. "Sadly, no, but I would agree with you that the kitchen's one of my favourite places in the palace. Nothing beats a good meal, you know." She ruffled Link's hair and Link looked vacantly at her.

Vacantly, but not in terror.

Occasionally Link would overhear the girl with the golden hair and Urbosa speaking, or discussing, or sometimes arguing, late at night where she could not avoid listening from her room.

The night before the interruption to her daily schedule, Link returned from training in the courtyard to see Urbosa and the girl with the golden hair once more on the balcony, the former with her arms across her chest, the latter with eyes reddened from tears.

"You're only two years older than I am," the girl with the golden hair snapped, voice quivering, "so I don't see why you're getting high and mighty about this."

"Is this about becoming an adult?" Urbosa answered. Through the coolness of her voice, Link could detect a hardened edge. "If you just want to be in a relationship because you feel it will make you feel more mature than your eighteen years—"

The girl with the golden hair's timbre had all but cracked over itself. "H-how could you say that? It's—it's because—" Whatever she said next, Link could neither make out nor desired to make out. She buried her face under the pillow, yet the strains of the argument reached her nonetheless... through the thin door to her chambers. "And yet you don't want me. Am I not good enough for you?"

"No. No, that's not..." Link could hear fabric rustling as Urbosa moved. "There's much to like about you, but not this childish attitude of yours. I know that your father has placed unfair burdens upon you, yet demanding things so selfishly from others..." Urbosa's voice lowered to a whisper. "...isn't who you truly are, is it? This is coming from a place of fear. A fear of...abandonment?"

"Don't...don't try to analyse me." The girl with the golden hair stopped herself. "You're doing that thing again. Where you try to hide what you're worried about in your concern for others. Where you reassure them in what you're hoping someone would tell you. What is it? Are you worried about a fear of abandonment? Or of abandoning others?" The girl with the golden hair's timbre cracked so audibly that Link herself recoiled. "You can tell me, Urbosa. I...I want to—"

Urbosa exhaled a hwoo of air. "I'm worried about you seeking fulfillment in places you can't get from destiny."

"What!?" Link listened to a sound like footstep on tile, and then another. The girl with the golden hair's voice comes from closer nearby: she must have stepped away from Urbosa. "You...you wouldn't—"

"You're afraid of not living up to fate. You're afraid of what the Sages and Oracles whisper—wrongly—about you behind your back. And even though you logically know that they're full of it, you can't help but be afraid." Urbosa paused. "Am I wrong?"

The girl with the golden hair breathed more quickly now. Urbosa went on: "So if you can't find fulfillment in fate, you're clinging desperately to anyone you think could be stable, anyone you know won't abandon you. Anyone." She emphasised the final word with a heaviness in her voice.

The girl with the golden hair's words burst from her in spurts and fits. "What? No. No no no no. I know I've got—I know I have my own—but my feelings for you are—!

"What would you do if something happened?" Urbosa asked, and the sudden softness of her tone brought Link to cling to the pillow. "What would you do if I...left you?"

"Fine. Fine! If you don't want me, just say so. I'll go."

The girl with the golden hair did not stomp down the hall. That would have alleviated Link's worries. Instead she could scarcely make out the whispered padding of the girl with the golden hair's steps over the tile.

Behind her Urbosa spoke out once more: "Until you take hold of yourself and hold yourself accountable for your own emotions...no matter how I personally feel, I can't let this happen."

The girl with the golden hair stopped at the end of the hall. Link could hear the trembling of her body in the resonance of her voice. "Then just answer me this: why?"

"Because it would be unprofessional," Urbosa responded, and in her steadiness her timbre shook, ever so slightly. "A Princess and one of her Champions. And because of this attitude you have. I don't know why you've prickled it against me, too. Is it because I'm actually training Link?"

The girl with the golden hair snorted in frustration. Now she stomped off as if attempting to sound out her anger and hurt in the beats of her heels. When the pads quieted down the hall, Link listened to Urbosa mutter to herself on the balcony. "Oh, Goddess, help me. Does she not realise we've a war on? Does she not understand the fight in which we will find ourselves? Does she not understand that I could...?" Link could not catch her words that murmured off to silence. Instead she buried her face in the pillow.

At last Link could go to sleep.

Starting the day thereafter, Urbosa devised a thousand excursions to other parts of Parapa, to better teach Link the language, to expose her to various blades and weapons, and to pit her skills against a diverse array of swordsmen with their own styles. As they rode their horses across the land, Urbosa taught Link the kinds of plants from the wilds that one could feed a horse, the importance of salt on the road, the signs of a horse's exhaustion and how long to allow a horse to rest. "Most travellers trade their horses for fresh ones instead of riding single horses, but...I think you share my feelings on this, hm, Link?" Urbosa winked at her and Link glanced down at her hands.

Marin and the girl who smelled of horses alike had shown Link over the years how to care for her horse—for Epona, her white mane caressing Link's cheek as her horse nosed her ear—but neither of them travelled frequently. Where they could instruct her on how to best care for a horse's injuries at a stable, Urbosa demonstrated what to do on the road. "Be careful," Urbosa told Link one morning over skewers of meat they prepared on the road, "for if a horse breaks her legs, she will never be able to recover. At that point the most merciful thing to do is to simply put her down."

She went on. Link helped her prepare a sand grouse that they had trampled by chance with their horses and which they could not leave by the side of the road. As the Goddess had given them a meal, so they would eat. Urbosa inquired if Link had any nuts; Link brought out chickaloo tree nuts from Lanayru and acorns from Necluda, which Urbosa roasted with pepper and then embedded into the meat tendered and tempered by the heat.

"...because the process of healing the injury...just inflicts more harm on the horse," Link finished for all the times that the girl who smelled of horses had berated her for pushing her horse too hard.

Urbosa nodded. "If you love your horse, then take well care of her. Consider yourself not a girl and her horse, but a horse and her girl." Leaving the skewers of meat to Link, Urbosa stood up. She turned towards her own trusted companion to rest her forehead against her horse's and close her eyes; the light blue horse whinnied. "Care for her, and she will care for you."

Link glanced back at her own horse, who neighed as Link reached up to stroke her nose. Her darkly lashed eyes held nothing but the kindness and trust Link had known from her the past five years of her companionship. Urbosa asked the name of her horse, and Link told her.

Epona.

"E...pona. As in Sapona's daughter?" Urbosa inquired, eyebrows raised.

"My...friend Marin named her. Epona was her horse before Marin gave her to me." Link rubbed the back of her head. Epona rested her head on Link's shoulder.

Urbosa mmed. "And this Marin is the girl who taught you about horses?"

Link shook her head.

"Then...?"

Between bites of food Urbosa coaxed the story out of her, question by question, encouraging smile by encouraging smile. Link's hands jerked and flinched. The story of her gestures coalesced: how she and the girl who smelled of horses had one day ventured to the neighbouring town of Rofare with the permission of the girl's father, to bring back a case of liquored milk for the harvest feast, how on the way home she and the girl who smelled of horses had taken shelter from a thunderstorm in the autumn-warm woods alongside her—Link's, and the girl who smelled of horses's—their horse; how they had spent the night huddled by a campfire; how their horse had spooked from lightning and nearly run herself into a tree and how the girl who smelled of horses had cried out and how Link had whistled as the girl who smelled of horses had taught her; how the horse had stopped just before the collision; how the girl who smelled of horses had wept and how she and Link had held their horse together.

How the girl who smelled of horses had gently stroked her thumb along Link's eyes to wipe away the tears that Link had not even noticed.

How she had not seen the girl who smelled of horses since the moment she had drawn the sword that seals the darkness from the stone.

And with the blade of evil's bane burning at her back, she did not know if ever she would see the girl again.

"I'd like to meet her one day," Urbosa said. Link—as though seeing for the first time her audience—stilled her hands. She started to shake her head, more and more violently, and turned away to huddle to herself. Link could not feel Urbosa's gaze upon her back until she saw Urbosa's eyes reflected in the plate in her lap.

"I'm sorry," she signed, barely keeping her hands from trembling. "Please...don't be mad at me."

"Not at all, Link. You've done nothing wrong." Link watched Urbosa's gaze drop momentarily to the fire between them. "Here, to put you at ease, let me tell you a story in exchange. A tale of your childhood traded for a tale of mine," she offered. "You know, they say that the exchange of talk and tale is the real economy of Parapa. All the rupees and all the trade come second to the sharing of stories."

Urbosa continued to skewer more meat. "When I was a little girl," she began, her voice measured, "I fell ill, and the healers told my mothers that I would not survive." Bit by bit, the scent of the grilling meat brought Link to turn back around towards the fire. Urbosa handed her another skewer. Link glanced up between the skewer and Urbosa. Very carefully she extended her arm to wrap her fingers around the bone and brought the meat to her mouth. Bite by bite she listened. "The healers told my mothers that if the Golden Goddesses had determined that my fate was to pass on young, that all they could do was to make my passage as painless as possible." Urbosa laughed out loud. She lifted a hand towards Link. Link cringed back, and Urbosa lowered her arm. Her voice softened. "But my mothers believed in me, as did my best friend. Not everyone did. My own sister thought I would die for a time; she believed in what the healers had prophesied.

"Well now, you already know the end to this story." Urbosa laughed once more and offered Link another skewer, which she took, her fingers clinging to the shaft so hard that the skewer imprinted the inside of her palm. "I survived. Because I had my family and my friends cheering me on, I struggled on despite the pain. Before I fell sick I had been somewhat of a timid girl, too shy to speak her thoughts. Yet the illness instilled in me a determination to claw my way through life if I had to. Of course I couldn't have done it alone, but...with my loved ones behind my back, I persevered.

"After healing up," Urbosa continued, "I took a fancy to the sword. You know the rest of that story, too. The experience taught me a few things. Even the Sages and the Oracles do not always know what the Goddesses have in store."

Almost instinctively Link reached behind her—curving her arm around Epona's neck—to touch the hilt of the sword that seals the darkness as if to check that it still lay across her back. The warmth of the sword alone, even though the sheath, gave her a constant reminder scarred from her left shoulder to right hip. Nonetheless she wrapped her hand around the hilt to confirm its presence.

Urbosa leaned slightly backwards and Link could sense the sudden shift in the pace of her words. She settled her hand back into her lap. The heat of the blade stayed in her palm for a few seconds before fading.

"You know...the Goddesses Themselves, may Their blessings guide us, don't have Their plans set in stone. I'm not sure if the legends are the same where you grew up or here in Parapa, but here..." Urbosa effected a tone of a storyteller, of a teacher, of a tome worn with age. The kind that the girl who smelled of horses would have liked to read. "They say that when the Golden Goddesses first created the world and then soared into the heavens, at the point where They touched, They left for Their people a Golden Force—a sacred light to watch over us—that could grant the wish of those who touched it, but only if their hearts could balance the power to understand the truth beyond the golden light, the wisdom to know what to wish for, and the courage to take responsibility for their own wish." Link nodded. She dared not question Urbosa, though Link could not see where the Champion of Sageru's words might lead. Instead she stuffed her mouth with skewer. "When the Golden Goddesses created this Golden Force, They made it such that only a mortal could wield it, and never any Goddess: neither the Golden Goddesses, nor the Seven that would create the people of the land."

Urbosa resumed in her normal timbre of speech. "The Golden Goddesses left us with that ultimate light. In our hands, not in Theirs. Time and time again, when malicious forces have threatened Hyrule, the Golden Goddesses have given us the tools to save ourselves. The blade of evil's bane. The Golden Force. The Golden Goddesses have taught us to strive for the power in our own hands, the wisdom in our own heads, the courage in our own hearts.

"No matter people might tell you of the Goddesses' plans—and that includes all your Sages and Oracles—They have given us the ability to shape our own fate as we will."

She glanced at Link and smiled. Link's mouth squiggled; she shoved the skewer of meat deeper into her throat. At least between Epona nuzzling her cheek and the food in her mouth, she had enough sensations to fasten herself to. "...you don't need to worry about not living up to your destiny, Link." Link's hand twitched but she did not touch the sword that seals the darkness again. "The Goddesses do not wave Their hands and spin Champions of nothingness. They have judged us worthy to bear that heavy mantle of fate, for They have already seen what we can accomplish. The blade of evil's bane chose you because the sword believes in your abilities. The Goddesses did not judge you worthy as a Champion for something innate about your destiny that you have to live up to, but for the effort that you've already put in. Whatever we will need to fulfill our destined victory against the Calamitous One, you already have."

Urbosa reached out a hand and Link flinched back. The Champion of Sageru continued as though unaffected, and yet Link could hear the thin sliver of hurt in her voice below the sea of warmth. "I know some of the rich brats in Hyrule Castle have been naysayers. I've heard them say that you'd never be able to wield the sword that seals the darkness. But look at you." She nudged Link in the ribs. Link stared blankly ahead. "You've come so far even though we've only been training for so little time. I know it's hard not to worry, Link. I understand. I have felt that way. Back then the Sages warned that I would not survive, and now there are who consider me too young to be a Champion, or claim that I might bring us to perish in the coming battle. And yet. I fought to stay alive then, and I will fight for Hyrule now. The Goddesses chose me to become the Champion of Sageru, as They in all Their guidance chose you to become the Champion of Hylia."

Urbosa gestured to Link, who tucked herself smaller yet. Though Urbosa conversed to her, Link could sense that she had long left the topic of the conversation. What Urbosa said in her words and what she said on her hands and in the bow of her shoulders and in the tilt of her jaw clashed blades against one another and drove Link further into silence. "And you're every bit as deserving of the mantle as I, or any of the other Champions. The blade of evil's bane chose you because the sword knows that you can take fate into your own hands."

Link could make out now, a strange desperation beneath the soothing cheer of Urbosa voice, almost as if Urbosa were speaking more to herself than to Link.

"Don't forget that. For that matter, you don't need to worry about performing in front of Impa or...or the Princess." Urbosa momentarily set her jaw before she cleared her throat and went on. "I hope that our time training away from Nabooru will air you out a tad."

Link lowered her eyelids. She dared not ask if Urbosa had also arranged the training to, for her own sake, take time from the girl with the golden hair. Instead Link simply sat silent, and still, and barely breathing.

She listened to Urbosa sigh; Link tucked herself inwards at having disappointed her companion.

When Urbosa resumed, she spoke slowly, with a certain deliberation about her words. "I understand your feelings, Link. I haven't had a chance to visit Rovah for some time. I miss my friends and family more I could say. There have been times when I've been afraid that maybe...I'm undeserving of being the Champion of Sageru. Maybe...I don't have the courage to pilot a Divine Beast. Maybe...the war will take my life before I'll have a chance to see my loved ones again."

Urbosa gazed down at her own hands. Then she clenched her hands and snapped her fingers."

"And yet...I know that when this is over, when we have beaten back the Calamitous One, when we have fulfilled what I know the Goddesses have granted us the ability to do, I'll have a chance to see my beloved ones again, in a peaceful future without the threat of the Calamity over our heads. And thinking of them helps me to fight on, to give me something concrete to protect. So, I understand your feelings, Link. I really do. Having courage doesn't mean you can't be scared of failing, or of not seeing your friend again. Yet I promise that these fears are only shadows on the wind, and the lightning that lies ahead will brighten them away."

But Link once more started to shake her head. Urbosa asked of what was wrong; Link drew in on herself. Epona whinnied in her ear.

"Please. I promise I won't be mad at you. I just want to understand." Urbosa's hand lifted from her lap and then she folded her hands again. "You said that you missed this friend of yours, didn't you? You'll be able to see her again after we emerge victorious against the Calamity, and we will emerge victorious. You needn't be afraid of not living up to your destiny. The sword wouldn't have chosen you if you couldn't do it, you know."

"It's not that. I can't ever go back. Not even after the Calamity. I...if I go to to the village, then my..." She snagged the remaining skewers from over the fire and shoved them into her mouth violently enough to nearly stab the back of her throat. Link swallowed them down through the pain that watered her eyes. When the skewers all but vanished from this world, she rose to her feet and moved to check on her horse.
Epona. Warm and calm, smelling of wind and hay and sun.

"...I suppose we should get moving then." Urbosa cleaned up. Link crouched down by the fire to assist her. "Thank you for sharing the meal and the stories with me, Link."

She said nothing in return, though she kept one of the skewers to smell for the rest of the day on the road.

That fragrance.

The scent of meat and nut, of spice, of turmeric and sumac. She understands: in this final moment of falling through the sky, her mind has conjured up for her a delicious meal to ease the pain of her last few moments.

A warm meal that rouses her from her slumber and melts away the pain.

She does not crash into the ground.

No storm.

No wind.

No sand.

Thunder rolls near enough that she recoils back. Something soft beneath her head, and something hard beneath her shoulder, the lower slope of her back, her heels. No boots.

When she hears the sizzle grow louder, Link raises her eyelids fully to yet another unfamiliar ceiling. To her left glows a welcoming orange light; to her right slopes a comforting darkness that whiles away into hues of green.

The loose robes cover her as a blanket. Her left foot remains wrapped in gauze. Beside her feet stand her boots, upside-down.

And close by, to her left: a paraglider.

Not her paraglider—not the red and blue cloth marked with the symbol of the Goddess Farore—but rather a light sky-blue paraglider with a marking in gold. A marking that she has seen elsewhere in Parapa, a symbol she has seen in the Temple of Time upon the Great Plateau, the same symbol that she saw on the chest of the statue of the Goddess Sageru in Nabooru: two golden triangles facing up and down, with a pair of circles connected and circumscribed by a crescent-line between them.

The mark of the Goddess Sageru.

The material of the paraglider shines dully. Not cloth, not linen, nor leather, but a thin layer of that rubber substance, like the gloves that Dyeri allowed her to wear. Link observes shards of topaz studding the rubber in a regular lattice over the paraglider. Instead of wooden, the supports and struts of the paraglider appear made of sandy-coloured molduga bone with a stretch of rubber over them.

She turns her head to the right. A long hallway that exits out into the storm, long enough to protect her from the wind and the sand. She flexes her hands on the floor; her fingers glide over the slippery material beneath her palms.

Link glances to the left.
A girl.

A girl who kneels before a flame contained within an iron cage. Over the top of the metal, she holds skewers of chunks of meat glistening with sauce and laced with spice that she turns by hand. She checks each skewer by poking it through another, and when the meat has softened, she sets the skewer onto a plate at her side.

A girl wearing earrings of topaz that glint in the light of the fire and a sturdy outfit of deep blue fabric, a rolled-up set of loose robes beside her feet.

A girl with dark red hair that she wears in a long braid upon her back and in two thick loops at either side of her head, the sharpness of her nose standing regally against her profile, striking as the centre of her rounded face, her prominent eyes the piercing dark brown of glittering onyx, her arms decorated in bands of gold and topaz, her mouth a steady line, her lips painted blue, her tongue peeping from the corner of her mouth as her eyes narrow in concentration.

Upon the ground beside her rests a strange domed golden thing set in with six gems the same green shade as the thunderstorm's bolt on the back and a wheel of lightning decals on the front.

Link blinks.

The girl raises her head. When her gaze meets Link's, her mouth curves up into a tense little smile. "You're awake," the girl murmurs in Parapan, her voice gentle, and Link nods. "You aren't injured, are you?" She shakes her head, and the girl's shoulders slope down, some of the tension in her brow releases. "Thank the Goddesses. Then, are you hungry?"

Link bobs her head eagerly enough that the girl smiles and covers her mouth to laugh.

"Then, here. Take some."

She does. And with gusto. The skewer, she finds, consists of bone and neither conducts heat well nor burns as might wood. The molduga bone, instead, imparts upon the meat a curious flavour: not quite salty, and not quite bitter, but a tone all its own, like the underlying percussion of a song. As soon as Link takes a bite, the layer of spice and sauce over the meat settles on her tongue like messengers of coming royalty. Alongside those spices she has already identified, Link tastes the sweetness of nutmeg offsetting the less immediately palatable notes of sumac and turmeric into a perfect storm of flavour that blazes down her throat. The meat comes apart in her mouth to reveal the even more tender flesh within and to offer up the roasted nuts embedded inside. The crunch of the nuts and the softness of the meat strike a delicate balance of textures that lowers her eyelids in the sheer pleasure of the sensations on her tongue and her teeth. She scarfs down the first skewer far too quickly, and then grabs another skewer from the girl to swallow it down. Only on the third skewer does she slow down enough to indulge in the song sung by the skewer.

Link licks her lips and wipes the corners of her mouth on her hands to get as much of the sauce and spice off of her skin as she can, then sucks on her fingers. She slurps at her palms and the backs of her hands. Running her tongue on the valley between her fingers, she licks up all of the flavour that she can from her hands.

She swallows repeatedly; the heat of the nutty meat slides down easily and she draws the skewers through her lips to extract the sauce-and-spice clung to the bone.

At long last she drops the completely bare skewers in front of her. Link shifts herself to her knees and bows before the girl, her forehead touching the floor, in her eternal gratitude for the meal that has saved her very life.
The girl holds her own skewer, half-eaten. A chunk of meat falls from the end onto the metal grate.

"You...like it, don't you?"

She can hear in the girl's voice a measure of not quite fear. Uncertainty, maybe. Unease. Link meets her gaze and smiles widely at the food. "It was delicious!" she comments, her motions free and light despite the effects of the elixir. She launches into a robust review of the dish, of how the spices and nuts complemented one another, of the difference in texture between nut and meat, of the crispy outside and the tender inside that melted in her mouth, of how—if she would improve the dish in any way—she would slightly adjust the ratio of spices to lower the amount of nutmeg and allow the others to shine, and to add salt for the missing flavour. The meat and nuts provide the savory; the spices the sour, bitter, and sweet; but without the salt, the meat skewers miss just the thing that could take them from delicious dish to complete masterpiece.

The girl covers her mouth to laugh as Link continues on her review. "...so thank you so much for the meal. I'd love to know everything that you put in it because that was one of the tastiest sauces I've ever had, and embedding the nuts in the meat is something I never would have thought to try in my life!" She pants at the exertion of her muscles and lowers her hands to her knees. Sniffing, Link cocks her head to one side.

The girl copies her gesture, tilting her own head.

They look at one another for a long moment, and then the girl makes a slight noise in her throat. "Thank the Goddesses. I never thought I'd meet someone else who appreciates food as much as I do."

Tears well up in Link's eyes. "Neither did I."

The girl tips up her chin. "Then, may I ask your name?"

Link blinks. "Link," she signs. In the brief scramble that follows, Link discovers that the girl knows how to speak Central Hyrulean even better than Link knows how to speak Parapan, and so Link spells out her name in Central Hyrulean.

"Link," the girl says; Link's name rolls easily off of her tongue, the lightness of her tone bringing a measure of serenity to the name that Link has not before heard except in her memories, in the way that Marin said her name.

Link.

She dips her head.

The girl smiles again. That hint of unease.

"Ah, you can call me Ri—" The girl purses her lips together, closes her eyes, and opens them again. Link blushes slightly for not having asked the girl her name herself. "—Ruboona."

"...how do you sign that?" Link asks, cocking her head, and the girl blinks at her, and she blinks at the girl. Once more Ruboona closes her eyes and opens them before going through a series of motions that Link emulates. "Like that?"

"Yes." Ruboona smiles, this time more genuinely, her shoulders easing. "That's my name. Ruboona. I hope I didn't startle you. I've come here regularly for some time now, but no one else has ever shown up in the storm. I noticed you...gliding out there in the storm. I was scared you could be...one of the..." She looks away for a moment; then she returns her gaze to Link. "When I saw you fall, I could not simply stand by."

"You saved me, with your paraglider," Link signs in realisation, and Ruboona dips her head. Link bows to her again. "Thank you. Thank you so much for saving my life."

"I'm not sure what happened," Ruboona admits. "Your paraglider might have been hit by lightning, though I would hope that the Goddesses be more forgiving than that, may Their wisdom always guide us."

"Even if my paraglider did get hit," Link says in turn, "at least I got to meet you and your delicious meat skewers."

Ruboona covers her mouth to laugh at that. When she smiles, the blue of her lips curves upwards with a motion like a wave over the seas. "You're too kind."

Link inhales suddenly. Her hands fly into her robes to feel for the items she carries at her hips. The red telescope at her left, and the slate at her right. Her satchel, too, remains in place. Her gaze darts frantically around the room. Ruboona tries to ask her for what she searches but Link jumps to her feet—despite the weakness in her muscles—to tear the hallway apart. Until she finds what she seeks, safe and sound and in one piece.

Link slumps to the floor with her face down. She listens to Ruboona kneel beside her. A hand upon her brow tilts Link's head up. Her gaze meets Ruboona's eyes, deepened with concern, her expression one of soft worry and sharp alarm, her fingers gentle against Link's forehead. "Link...?"

Link raises a shivering hand to point to her beloved cooking pot beside the metal grate.

"I...I thought I had lost...one of my most precious possessions..." she signs over her head, and then Link breaks down into laughter that shakes her shoulders and quivers the rest of her body from her belly to her toes, to her fingers, to the tip of her nose that boops against the floor, at the frivolity of life, at the beauty of someone who has regularly come to the Divine Beast Vah Naboris—perhaps to try to find a way inside—who would notice someone like her floundering in the storm, who would risk her life to save her.

Ruboona simply continues to kneel beside her for a long moment. Then she, too, bursts out laughing. She hides her mouth in her hands but cannot contain the mirth in the gate of her fingers. "Ah, I—I thought that something had gone wrong—yes, your cooking's pot just fine, Link." That makes Link laugh all the harder. Every time Link's mirth seems to die down, Ruboona's laughter spills out another wave, and every time Ruboona tries to control herself by thinning the line of her mouth, she snorts air from her nose and pffts and pshahas and then laughs again until she has tilted back her head and her shoulders bump her braid of hair and the two of them laugh their way into a comfortable familiarity brokered over a shared meal and a shared mirth.

The taste of meat and nut in both of their mouths, the warmth of skewers in both of their bellies, their unification around the cooking pot.

If the Golden Goddesses sent the thunder, sent the lightning, sent the storm to burn her paraglider so that Link might find her way into the Divine Beast Vah Naboris, then she might well thank Them.

But even if the Golden Goddesses have never looked upon Link in her life, or even if she were to discover that They did not exist at all, then that would not change all that has transpired. All those who have helped her, and all those whom she, in turn, will try to help.
As Urbosa could take her life into her hands, so too will Link. Though not for fate, as Urbosa might have, but for her own sake.

Ruboona closes her eyes. She brings her hands together as if in prayer, then raises her eyelids once more. Her irises glimmer with something like the thunder on the distant horizon. "Then, Link...if I may ask...why were you in that storm? Why have you come to Savah Naboris? Why have..."

But even as Ruboona speaks, Link notices something behind the girl. A glow. A glow of orange.

Link sits up more fully. Beyond Ruboona and her cooking grate: the terminal at the entrance to the Divine Beast Vah Naboris.

She rises to her feet. Ruboona blinks up at her.

Link moves her hand into the looseness of her robes. From their depths she withdraws the slate, and Ruboona's eyes widen to darkly shining discs.

"Ah, that's..."

Link takes the slow steps around the cooking grate towards the terminal. She reaches out her hand with the slate weighing down on her fingers and sets the slate into the terminal.

She knows, by now, all too well the passage of the terminal from orange to blue along the black crystal, filling and draining, to open the door beyond the terminal: a circular opening that radiates out in a spiral into the vastness of the Divine Beast.

Below her feet the floor ceases to quake. The Divine Beast Vah Naboris takes its final step and then falls still. Another clap of thunder rolls outside.

The storm drizzles out.

From the entrance Link can see, in the way that she casts now a shadow upon the door, that the mid-spring sun sings high in the sky and shines its light upon the Divine Beast.

Behind her she hears Ruboona mumbling. "Who...what...?"

Link turns halfway towards her. "I've come to calm the Divine Beast," she says, "and also, thank you for the meal."

In a single fluid motion, Ruboona springs to her feet and holds out her hands. "Then, you've come to calm...Savah Naboris," Ruboona repeats. For a moment she closes her eyes, then opens them again with a determination so strong and deep that Link can feel her own feet slide back. "So, allow me to help you. As—as a daughter of the Goddess Sageru, I cannot stand by." She gestures to herself. "Since the reawakening of Savah Naboris, I have nearly every day here attempting to divine some method of entry." Link listens to her whisper something under her breath, something she cannot quite catch, something of I hope Buliara is well. Ruboona notches up her voice. "And you...you have come to calm Her. Then, allow me to join you. Please."

Link hesitates. Ruboona looks young—older than Romani, for sure, but younger than herself—no matter how the girl tries to draw herself up. But the girl has a paraglider with her, and the girl saved her from the storm, and the girl has trekked to the Divine Beast same as Link, without even a slate.

She bows her head, and Ruboona's eyebrows slope downwards as she whispers something under her breath, somewhere between a prayer and a murmur of gratitude. Thank you, Golden Goddesses, for heeding the prayers of our Parapa.
Link gazes into the shadows beyond the heart of the Divine Beast Vah Naboris. The light of the sun that passes through the parting clouds illuminates the Divine Beast's innards shade by shade. As she walks forward, she comes to stand at the very edge; she looks downwards.

There, on the bottom of the Divine Beast, at the floor of the cylindrical torso.

The map terminal.

And there, above, hanging from the ceiling to pulsate and throb: the heart.

The heart of the malice of the Divine Beast Vah Naboris.

The heart of the Malice that, if this Divine Beast follows the pattern of the Divine Beasts Vah Rudania and Vah Medoh—

The heart of the Malice that contains within it the corrupted, desecrated corpse of the Champion of Sageru, the Hero of Parapa, the Divine Beast Vah Naboris's Pilot, O Courageous Urbosa.

Link sets her jaw.

Whatever else happened in the Great Calamity one hundred years ago, she knows this: the Divine Beasts were lost, and the Champions passed away, and nearly all of Central Hyrule was destroyed alongside much of the rest of the land, countless lives passed beyond the veil of death. Whatever else happened in the Great Calamity one hundred years ago, she did not die. She lived, and healed, and slept, within the Shrine of Resurrection or otherwise, for a hundred years until she awoke.

And with her awakening, awakened once more the Divine Beasts.

Whatever else happened during the Great Calamity, she survived, and survives.

And for the future of all of the delicious meals that she may ever eaten—and for everyone that has ever helped her, for her sister Aryll, for the girl who smelled of horses, for Marin and all of Marin's family from Maryll to Romani, for Impa, for the shark-girl, for Daruk, for Revali, for Urbosa, for the girl with the golden hair, for Dorian and Koko and Cottla, for Yunobo and Misan and Glepp, for Amali and Kass and their daughters and Teba, for Dyeri and Nadyne and Ruboona, for the people of this wide wide land—Link will place her life upon the line.

—

Gourmet Spiced Meat Skewer (eight hearts) - acorn, chickaloo tree nut, goat butter, goron spice, raw gourmet meat

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: The electric-resist elixir works by flooding your body, essentially, with capacitors that take up extra electric charge. Because your nervous system (assuming that you, the reader, have a nervous system typical of humans) works on passing signals through action potentials, the elixir slows down your nervous system and makes it much more difficult for your signals to get through. This works both ways, so that your sensations are dulled, and so are your movements. The higher the resistance of the elixir, the worse the effect.

Sand is used to make glass and lightning striking sand can indeed produce glass.

If it's unclear, the paraglider was struck by lightning and thus Link lost her grip on it. And also the paraglider might have burned up. Whoops!

Urbosa is the champion with whom Zelda interacts most in the memories and the one who displays the most genuine caring about her, since Urbosa's own memory is really about Zelda, unique among the champions.

I should note that there's nothing actually wrong with trading out your horse for a fresh one at stables. It was and is common practise for people who travel frequently.

Unfortunately, what I say about horses in this chapter is also generally true: a broken leg pretty much spells the end for a horse's life, especially back then, because methods of restraining the horse would only lead to more suffering. Be careful with your horses.

Urbosa's horse is light blue, just the light blue horses you can catch in Breath of the Wild. The "Epona" naming tradition is common to Faron; Urbosa's horse is named Rivure, meaning "like a bird"/"one who is like a bird". "Vure" means "bird" in-game; incidentally, "ju" means "dawn".

Rofare is named after the village of Rofare from a different story of mine, the name produced by rearranging the characters making up the name of Farore.

The Golden Force about which Urbosa speaks is of course the Triforce, although the name "Triforce" is no longer known to the people of Hyrule.

Daruk, Revali, Urbosa, Mipha, and of course Princess Zelda all have their own views of fate. None of them is wrong and none of them is right. Different characters also have different ways of referring to the Master Sword; "sword that seals the darkness" is more common in eastern Hyrule, while "blade of evil's bane" and equivalent translations are more common in western and northern Hyrule. Thus, Urbosa says "blade of evil's bane".

The mark is of course the gerudo symbol, which I describe poorly, but the two triangles are the ones that appear above and below the symbol. I'm just very, very bad at descriptions, restaroni in pepperonis.

"Ruboona" comes from rearranging the characters of a certain rather significant Parapan name and is not the character's actual name, if that isn't clear.

So, instead of taking a single chapter to wrap up the entirety of Vah Naboris as I did the others, Vah Naboris is going to take several chapters. Why? Because, unlike with Amali and Yunobo, Link doesn't get the chance to meet Ri—I mean, Ruboona—prior to coming to Vah Naboris. I wanted to establish their relationship, and to do so I broke Vah Naboris up into several chapters. It's also a consequence of the memories in these chapters being longer and more involved, since—while I'd like to pretend that I don't play favourites—I really, really wanted to do Urbosa right.

Ruboona and Link hit it off right away due to their shared love of cooking. While Amali does cook (for her daughters), I wouldn't say that cooking is her passion in the way that Link and Ruboona share it.

And a big character moment for Link: though she's been intent on passing the slate off to someone else, and though she's felt like a ghost in her own body all this time, she's really starting to come to terms with her destiny in ways that she hasn't before. Not just bearing the slate for someone else to take over the Divine Beasts, but doing so herself.

As always, thank you for reading, for supporting me, and for enjoying yourselves. And as always, please take a moment to thank my beloved beta reader, Emma, without whom this never could have come to fruition in its current state. Up next: we start on the Divine Beast.

midna's ass. 01 October 2017.

Beta reader's comments: The journey to Naboris is really neat. Sleeping while being transported by sand seal must be a super weird feeling.

RIP the paraglider, you served us well.

Link is really, really excited about cooking, and it's really cute.

We get to meet Ri-I mean, Ruboona! She's a really fun character that makes this Divine Beast a joy to get through.

Emma. 01 October 2017.
Salt-Grilled Gourmet Meat

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef and the Parapan food enthusiast begin the process of calming the Divine Beast and capture one of the terminals; the chef recalls more about the previous Champion of Sageru, including a conversation wherein she inquired if the chef fancied anyone.

Chapter Notes

To all of my readers: thank you for your patience. I've since gotten a new hard drive and will hopefully return to my regular schedule, barring any other sudden computer issues. I will note that as these chapters are getting lengthier, I may switch to an every-other-day schedule for the longer ones just to give myself sufficient time to fix any HTML formatting issues and proofread for spelling mistakes, etc. But we'll get there when we get there. For now we're back to our usual. Thank you so much for reading!

Also, as usual, author's notes that couldn't fit in the end: As with Sageru, Ruboona refers to the deities as "Sadin", "Sanayru", and "Safarore", which follows with what I have mentioned before.

Ruboona refers to the slate as the "Hero's slate" (contrast with Yunobo's "Champions' slate" and Amali just calling it "the slate" because that's what Link called it).

Remember, Link agreed to become the chosen hero so that Aryll would be protected in Hyrule Castle. But...what area was hardest hit by Calamity Ganon?

You'll find out what happened to Link's paraglider soon enough. I can tell you for sure that lightning struck it.

Link's finally found a fellow food lover.

While I use the word lute to refer to the instrument Urbosa plays, it's more like an instrument related to the real-world lute or oud than an actual "lute", per se.

As mentioned before, Parapan has three grammatical genders for people: the grammatical gender for the average person, which is usually translated as 'girl/she/her'; the grammatical gender for their leader, which was previously translated as 'king/he/him' but which has since been corrected as 'queen/she/her'; and the grammatical gender for deities, translated as 'Goddess/She/Her'.

Also, if you read the thirty-third chapter (Monster Soup) after the second of October, then this doesn't apply to you, but if you read it before that, I just reuploaded it because I realised that I made a slight continuity error due to copypasting my notes incorrectly. It's nothing major.

As usual, thank you to my beta reader and thank you to you, the reader, for bearing with me.
Ruboona and Link gather their belongings in preparation. Link shoulders her cooking pot, Ruboona her backpack and the paraglider. Momentarily Link peers out of the tunnel to squint at the ground in the Divine Beast's wake, to try to spot the red of the paraglider against the yellowed-white of the sands, but the Divine Beast rises too far up for her to see.

Behind her, Link hears Ruboona pray to the Golden Goddesses. "Safarore of wind...Sanayru of water...Sadin of fire...now, more than ever, please, grant me Your courage, Your wisdom and Your power. Sageru, now, more than ever please, grant me Your kin, Your loyalty, Your blood. Grant me the never-ending faith that courses through Your river. Grant me the endless winds that blow over Your dunes. Now, more than ever, Parapa needs..."

Link turns around. She waits for Ruboona to finish, at which point the two of them step through the doorway to examine the inner workings of the Divine Beast Vah Naboris.

The torso of the Divine Beast stretches into a wide cylindrical corridor, longer than it is wide, though the diameter of its width stretches the same span as the Divine Beast Vah Rudania. The walls curve into a perfect cylinder. Along the sides, Link notices terminals extending radially inwards towards the centre of the cylinder, as well as various strange boxes and domes that may within house machinery or wiring.

Droplets of malice ooze from the walls, congregated around the terminals, and lubricate downwards to pool around the map terminal on the floor in a long line down the Divine Beast's spine.

Holes in the walls lead out towards each of the four limbs, with the usual mess of gears and ropes visible outside rather than within the holes, evidently sheltered by the existence of adjoining chambers affixed to the main room. Further away, Link spots where the head extends forward, up on top of a high platform. A ladder leads down from the platform, but the bottom of the ladder has twisted off and broken. Link gazes at the damage.

She cannot recall the inside of another Divine Beast broken this way.

Along the ceiling and at the sides run loops of metal along the wall, metal currently inert, metal which marks a long straight line from the rear of the Divine Beast to the head.

At the bottom: the terminal that contains the map, with the four statues of animals. The lizard: the Divine Beast Vah Rudania. The bird: the Divine Beast Vah Medoh. The elephant, and then the camel, facing forward to the terminal.

Ruboona gestures towards the central terminal. "It can't be as simple as putting the Hero's slate into the pedestal there, is it?" Link shakes her head, and Ruboona nods slowly. "So, what else?"

Link explains, briefly. The map. The seven terminals, including the entrance and the map. Thereafter the return to the map, which will trigger the final defence of the Malice from the violent violet of the chrysalis that pulsates overhead. The only effective weapon, she cautions, comes in the form of the blue fire-light arms she has filched from guardians. Link reaches behind her to draw out the spear that she took from the guardian, and yet she finds only the hylian-sized boomerang and the blade from the bokoblin upon the shore of the lake.

She lowers her eyelids.
The spear. Packed away into saddlebags. Near the giant boomerang.

On Ilia.

A week's ride by sand seal.

She covers her face with her hands. When Ruboona inquires of what has transpired, her worry genuine, Link can only begin to explain how foolish she must be to have forgotten almost all of her equipment.

"You can't be that much of a fool," Ruboona counters. "A fool wouldn't have been able to realise that I forgot to salt the meat."

Link pauses, and then the corners of her lips curl up unbidden, and then she cracks out a laugh. "You got me there," she signs, and Ruboona grins cheekily.

She shows Link her own weapons: a radiant shield inlaid with regular patterns of gems around the edge—exhausted ruby, and sapphire, and topaz, and opal, to absorb flame and ice and electricity and water, and sporting a heart of mirrored diamond, the best material known to reflect the fire-light of guardians—and a curved blade with slight hooks along the outer edge. "It's thin enough to slide between the plates of guardians' armours, and the hooks help to tear and catch the wiring inside. Then, the curve lets you try to pry the armour off." Ruboona rubs her nose, her brow wrinkled, and Link observes how despite her best efforts the tip of her tongue pokes out from her mouth. Ruboona snaps her fingers. "Ah, and it hooks well into the guardians' legs as well."

Link whistles.

Ruboona's smile ebbs away at the corners. Link silences her whistle with her tongue between her lips. She scrambles to draw back that smile.

"...not everyone has access to these kinds of weaponry, nor armour." She folds her hands behind her and tilts herself slightly forward as if bowing to an unseen force. "Ah, but I do. Then, I have to do my part."

Link nods.

Standing at the lip of the precipice, Link looks straight down: another ladder, similarly broken, as though someone or something wrenched it from its hinges. Ruboona nudges Link and points towards the centre of the chamber, where a twisted ladder-like object of the same slippery tan material as the ladder and the rest of the Divine Beast rocks back and forth.

Ruboona kneels down. She touches her hand to her chest, then retrieves from her pack a compact harp strung from a single point with six strings, like the red and blue harp of Marin's family, and unlike the golden harp of eight straight vertical strings that Link's body has seen in the chambers of the girl with the golden hair.

She lifts her head towards Link. "Do you mind?" Ruboona asks, and Link tilts her head. "Ah, I...wished to sing a prayer for Lady Urbosa, may her spirit forever ride the winds. I do not know if it would be offensive to a follower of Sahylia."

Link snorts out a laugh. "I don't know if I'd call myself that. And if I did, no, I can't say I'd find it...whatever that word was."

When Ruboona's lips curve up into a smile so small that Link has the distinct impression Ruboona sought to keep its existence secret, Link just grins back at her. Ruboona strums a chord.
She begins to sing.

Ruboona has not the most melodious voice, nor the sweetest timbre, nor the heavenly euphony that she has heard from Marin. But instead Link can hear in her tones the measured hours of practise that she has spent honing her range and her prowess, the quiet determination of bringing to its fullest potential that which life has given her, and so her timbre takes on a wholeness all its own.

Her notes harmonise the air to resonate the very fabric of the Divine Beast.

She sings of Lady Urbosa. She sings of the Champion's triumphs and failures alike. She sings of the Great Calamity, of the malice emerging to swallow the castle whole, of the monsters that fell from the skies, of the land covered in violent violet, of the Champions flying to their Divine Beasts to prepare for the decisive battle against the Calamitous One, of the Champion of Sageru, the Hero of Parapa, the Divine Beast Vah Naboris's Pilot, O Courageous Urbosa trapped within the very Divine Beast the Goddesses had chosen her to guide, of the Calamitous One fading away, of the Divine Beast ebbing cold and still and silent with Lady Urbosa and her slate vanished into its depths, with the Divine Beast closed off to any that might venture to enter its innards to retrieve the body of Lady Urbosa, of the funeral along the river where—without the ashes of Lady Urbosa to scatter to the water—they had scattered the ashes burnt of Lady Urbosa's favoured meal and of her favoured horse so that she might have them in the divine wilds watched over by the Goddess.

The harp strikes with the chords of lightning and flows with the scales of water. The final note vibrates on the lip of the precipice, like the crackle of static just before the thunderstorm, and then fades to drizzle out into silence.

When Ruboona finishes, Link finds wetness upon her cheeks and wipes the tears from her face with her palms.

She reaches down to the red telescope at her left hip. She closes her trembling fingers around the cool metal. Against her skin she feels the roughness of the sketches of seagulls marked into the metal.

The view of the castle of Central Hyrule. Of the violet claws around its perimeter, like a hand about to close, to crush what remains of the lifeless stone.

Link squeezes the telescope tight.

Though she knows not how long she and Ruboona exist in the stillness, at long last she senses Ruboona set away the harp and stand. "Then, let's not waste any time."

Link nods.

Ruboona instructs Link to grip her around the shoulders. Link acquiesces. She wraps her arms around Ruboona's shoulders and braces her legs against Ruboona's waist and thighs.

Ruboona steps off the edge with the paraglider opened above their heads.

With their combined weight—or perhaps Ruboona's paraglider flies differently than Link's own, still somewhere along the sands, and certainly not destroyed by the lightning, absolutely not—they drop heavily. Link lets go to crash first into the ground. Her shoulder blades and the back of her head bump against the hard floor. A sudden heaviness on her abdomen knocks her limbs up: Ruboona lands with her feet on Link's stomach. She bows to Link and starts to apologise a thousandfold, but Link merely breaks out into laughter and shakes her head.

"I'm fine. I'm fine."
"Then," Ruboona offers, her fingers intertwined, "if there's anything I can do to make it up—"

"You could promise to make me more meat skewers," Link interjects before she has even felt the path of her arms.

Ruboona stares at her. Link blinks back. Then Ruboona covers her mouth but cannot cover her mirth.

"Then, I promise." The corners of her eyes crinkle. "I'll even salt them just for you." Link winks at her and she raises a hand to her cheek, then stoops down to fold the paraglider away. "So. The first step is getting the map."

No sooner has Link stepped forward towards the terminal some twenty paces away than she hears a scuttling upon the floor.

Link twists herself back just in time to see Ruboona throw herself between Link and the guardian stalker that crawls out from under the broken ladder. The automaton's eye blazes. The fire-light sings outwards. Even as Link raises her arms to push Ruboona out of the way, the girl hefts her shield. She holds it before her.

The fire-light refracts from its surface and ignites the air to Link's right.

The guardian's line of sight—a bolt of red—centres on Ruboona's face. It lifts itself upon its too-many legs and Link can see how Ruboona's limbs have locked in place and her spine has frozen as if all of the frost of the Hebric mountains had curled into the marrow of her bones. Link rips the boomerang from her back. Staring at the advancing automaton, she draws back her arm to aim for the guardian's single fire-light eye.

She releases.

Link hears the ping of metal. The guardian rears back. Without looking away from the automaton's legs, Link reaches back for her blade. Her hands close not around the hilt of the sword but around the sharp edge of her boomerang.

Link looks up at the guardian to find the blade broken in its head, the lower half jammed into the eye and the upper half having clattered to the floor.

The automaton twirls around on its legs. Ruboona, still iced into the ground, keeps her shield in straight in front of her, even though the guardian bears down over her. Whipping out the boomerang, Link sweeps Ruboona's legs out from under her. The girl falls backwards; the impact rouses her into action while the automaton flails above. It streams fire-light from its sparking eye that crashes at random into the ceiling and walls.

"The legs!" Ruboona yells, scrambling to her feet, dropping the shield with an explosive schwing against the floor to pull the hooked sword from the sheath at her hip. "Cut off the legs!"

Link sprints towards the guardian. The legs—each one thicker than her own head—spasm as the automaton seeks to find purchase on the slippery floor. The guardian continues to spray its bolts of desperation like lightning into the sky. She strikes the nearest leg with the boomerang. Where metal hits automaton, the resonance vibrates up Link's hands to turn her bones to chuchu jelly.

She stumbles back, the guardian unscratched, the boomerang wobbling in her grip.

Ruboona springs out from behind her. As Link propels backwards, she notices Ruboona leap forward with the hooked sword. Unlike the boomerang that bounces immediately off, the curve of the blade slides over the automaton's legs, and the hooks latch onto the raised rim where one segment of the leg connects to the next.

Ruboona pulls back.

Link angles herself forward. Grabbing Ruboona about the waist, she tugs the girl back and the girl tugs on the sword hooked into the limb. Her arms strain. Her palms slick with sweat and threaten to loosen her grip.

The guardian's leg shears free.

The stump convulses. The longer end of the limb writhes another second and then falls still. Link flashes Ruboona a smile as the latter meets her gaze over her shoulder.

The next leg. And the next. And the next. The automaton topples over and its fire-light streams towards the walls, so close that Link can feel the strange cold heat radiating from the beam of light.

Ruboona screams for her. Link swivels herself around quickly enough that she loses her balance and has to perform an impromptu jig of thrashing limbs to keep from tipping backwards into the fire-light.

Something catches her right wrist before she careens herself into the veil beyond.

Ruboona. Her left hand tight around Link's wrist. Pulling her back up. Her eyes wet with worry and burning with a determination that balls Link's own hands into fists.

Never before has Link seen the exposed underside of the guardian, all whirring gears and coiled wires, great shimmering cores and whirling screws. Under Ruboona's request, Link holds the automaton steady—and then does her one better, locking the guardian in place with the golden light of stasis. Ruboona slices across with the blade. The hooks clip into wires and cling through the teeth of gears, tearing the automaton's innards asunder in a rising wave that follows her arm in a wake of destruction.

The guardian chokes out a final blast of fire-light in a wide arc from one side of the Divine Beast to the other. As the fire-light scours through one of the lines of metal driven into the ground, the floor beneath Link shudders. The metal hums, sparking like shattered topaz. The automaton stills. The Divine Beast rumbles, and shakes, and then begins to tilt forwards.

Ruboona's head twists towards the terminal that contains the map. Link pelts forward in the direction of Ruboona's gaze. The quaking beneath her feet shakes her out of balance, but she rolls forward on the ground until her head smacks against something hard.

The terminal.

The Divine Beast starts to sway back when she slams the slate into the depression on the face of the pedestal. While the black crystal with the quartet of animals brightens and darkens in turn, Link slumps over the terminal. She drops down onto the ground. Her knees hit the hard floor as the rim of the pedestal presses against her belly, and then her stomach slumps onto the floor while her arms slide off of that pedestal for her fingers to flatten against the ground, and at last her chin thumps against the floor hard enough for her to bite her own cheek.

The pang of copper in her mouth accompanies the slowing of the Divine Beast Vah Naboris, and thereafter its stillness.
Only then does Link allow herself to breathe.

She wriggles her toes—all ten—and then her fingers—also all ten—and then reaches up to touch her ears—two, pointed, and pierced with blue—and her nose—very sniffy—and the cooking pot on her back— in one piece, alongside the repairs that have left the stories of Eldin and Tabantha onto its metal as her scars have left the regions' tales upon her skin—and the red telescope at her hip— bearing her sister's masterpieces of art—and her ponytail—bobbing away on the back of her head without the knowledge at all that she who bears the ponytail might have well died a hundred and one years ago.

The laughter that bubbles out of her belly carries with it feeling to her extremities, loosening her muscles and flowing the tension from around her eyes. She stands up, swaying, and removes the slate from the pedestal.

Seven terminals.

Two on either side; one at the tail; one near the chest; and one near the very crown of the head of the Divine Beast Vah Naboris.

She hugs the slate to her chest in thanks.

When she turns around, Link finds Ruboona not quite standing but not quite bowing. In her arms, Ruboona burdens the shield, and the boomerang, and the broken half of the blade, and the hooked blade in the shield.

"Ah..." Ruboona dips her head. "Thank you for saving me. I apologise for—for the mistakes that I have made—for thinking I could do it but being too scared to—"

Link shrugs. "Thank you for saving me. The guardian would've burned me alive if you hadn't leaped to my rescue."

Ruboona's mouth thins into a line and Link blanks her expression, her hands before her chest. Her voice has tautened as a bone pushed too far in, on the cusp of fracturing. "...you're too kind. Then, I promise that I won't make the same mistake I again." She inclines her head still forward, inclines her upper body, inclines herself to speak to someone beyond Link's shoulder. "Oh, Goddesses forgive me mine errors and mine pride."

Link lifts her hands, lowers her hands, and lifts them again. She has not the words that she needs. And where Yunobo could talk himself into reading her silences as the encouragement she wanted so desperately to say, Runooba only crumples further in on herself.

Words.

"...we're in this together, and that's what matters," Link says. "We're in this together, and...no matter what, we got out alive. That's what matters. Not how we got there, but that we did." She tilts her head to the side to implore Ruboona with her downturned eyes and slight smile. "You know?" Link slaps the terminal with her open hand to punctuate her final gesture. The Divine Beast rumbles and both Link and Ruboona ogle the pedestal in horror.

Then: nothing.

Link collapses back to her knees. Ruboona wipes the sweat from her brow. They glance towards one another.
Link laughs. Ruboona doesn't. Link's mirth deflates like a popped octorok balloon.

Ruboona closes her eyes. Link listens to her breathe: in through her nose, out with her mouth, her inhalations shaky, her exhalations steady. Then she lifts her eyelids. "Then, as you said, we are alive. Ah, I think this calls for a little celebration," Ruboona offers, and Link bobs her head.

"Here," signs Link, withdrawing the rock salt from the metal ingredients box in her satchel. "You can use this." Ruboona blinks at her. Link smiles sheepishly. ".I thought you wanted to make more meat skewers."

"Oh!" Ruboona hides her mouth with the back of her hand; her shoulders shiver in silent laughter. "You do think about food a great deal, don't you?"

Link rubs the back of her head. "Is that a bad thing?"

"Just a thing. I feel much the same." Ruboona smooths the back of her trousers as though expecting a skirt as she seats herself down upon the ground and removes the metal grate from her satchel. Link crouches across from her, flat on her heels, and leans forward.

"Teach me."

Ruboona clears her throat. Her voice takes on a slightly deeper and more solemn tone. "As you wish, my young apprentice." Link watches her remove a shard of ruby from her pack alongside a thin skin of oil that she drizzles over the bottom of the grate, then lights by dropping and—with a utensil that resembles a nutcracker—breaking the fragment of ruby. Ruboona removes a dressed whole bird from a container inlaid with sapphires. Upon a mat that she rolls out over the floor, Ruboona kneads and pounds the meat to tenderness, then chops nuts of various assortments with Link's help and embeds them in irregular intervals into the poultry. As she works, Link notices the gradual formation of looping Parapan script drawn in the meat.

"Mm? Ah. The nuts read stay strong," Ruboona translates. "Then, you do not know how to read Parapan?" Link shakes her head. "But you can speak it—can understand it." A nod. Ruboona dips her head and does not ask more of Link. No questions of her origin, or her motivation, or how she came upon the slate. "We'll eat and then continue. A small snack, nothing more."

"Are you worried about the time?" Link probes.

Ruboona's palms flatten out against the meat. She closes her eyes, then opens them again and resumes her efforts at patting the bird into chunks. "Yes and no. Yes, We should hurry, but...no, not so quickly that we break ourselves open."

Link dips her head.

To start preparing the sauce, Ruboona indicates how to mix the spices with a red paste that she produces from a ceramic jar. Link adds salt. Together they smear sauce over the meat before stabbing each rolled ball through with a skewer of bone. Her palms feel damp and sticky with the thickness of the sauce. The scents of spices over the folds of her skin dizzy her head with delight.

Just two skewers. One for her, and one for her companion. As Link holds the skewer over the fire, Ruboona examines her shield. The mirror-like surface has fogged somewhat, and Ruboona purses her lips. Link listens to her prayers to the Golden Goddesses, asking for the power of reflex to reflect the guardians' 'arrows of light' as she calls them, for the wisdom to know just when to move her shield, for the courage to try and not simply to make as a turtle would, for the—Ruboona uses the word Link has come to know as kin, although Link feels like she does not understand the nuances of its definition—to believe in her own capabilities.

"The skewers're done," Link announces. Ruboona, having closed her eyes, continues to pray. Link raps her knuckles against the ground to catch her companion's attention. "Do you want one?"

Ruboona does not quite smile but the lines of her grimace smooth out. Link counts that her first victory today. Ruboona takes the skewer. Leaning in, Link observes her reaction as the girl takes a bite.

First a drawing together of the brow, then a sloping downwards of the eyebrows, then a lowering of the eyelids, then a tilting upwards of the chin, then a squeezing of the mouth, then a little mm of satisfaction that brings the widest grin she's upon her lips today.

Ruboona brings her hand up to her mouth. A tear glimmers at the corner of her left eye.

Link could cry herself, for having found someone who understands. Taking a skewer for herself, she bites down. As before, the textures of the tender meat and crunchier nuts light firecrackers in her mouth, and the added flavour of the salt to the sweet and the bitter, the sour and the savory, waters her eyes with tears of joy.

She remembers meat like this, on the road with Urbosa. She remembers how, during one of Urbosa's sharings of stories, Link let slip she knew a little of how to play the six-stringed ages. She remembers of Urbosa procuring such a harp for her, albeit painted light green and marked with symbols of the wind and the thunder rather than red and blue like the ages passed down through Marin's family.

Link declined a tutor but she could not decline the harp. The first week the instrument gathered dust as Link threw herself deeper into training with the sword. The second she started to clean wooden to polished smoothness. The third she plucked chords from its strings and asked Urbosa of its tuning.

Urbosa knew little of playing the harp—though she could tear up the strings on a lute in playing the sorts of songs that might chase her out of politer company, alongside the court music that she had learned at the palace academy as a youth—but she passed Link along to one of her friends: a court harpist by the name of Enja, who spoke softly but with a precision and brevity of word that made Link hide behind the harp. Yet Enja did not expect answers from Link, nor notes of the harp. She responded to questions and returned to her playing, and in doing so left Link to her own devices in understanding the harp.

From Enja Link learned to tune the harp. She took the harp with her on Urbosa's training trips to play while riding her horse, as she had played the ocarina before drawing the sword that seals the darkness from the stone.

In her memory, she realises, she had not the ocarina anymore. Or perhaps she did have it and she has forgotten.

Perhaps none of these memories happened at all.

She played the songs Marin taught her. When she saw Marin again, she would show off her skills, would let the strings sing out, would weave the music into the smile parting Marin's lips.

She played the songs the girl who smelled of horses had shown her on the grasswhistle, back when she and the girl who smelled of horses had had no responsibilities but those to one another, when they could spend the hot summer evenings fashioning instruments from leaves and blades of grass.
The songs that she had played the girl who smelled of horses on her blue ocarina, the songs that she had played with notes out of tune and rhythm uncertain at best, but songs that she played nonetheless for the girl who smelled of horses's soft smile.

When she saw Marin again—when she saw the girl who smelled of horses again—when she saw again the people who she loved, then she would rest. But she had promises to keep.

Their names buoyed her on.

"So, Link," Urbosa remarked one day, leaning back against the flank of her horse, the mischievous glint in her eyes drawing Link back from the campfire where they grilled skewers in salt, "is there anyone you've got an eye on?"

Link balanced the harp in her lap. She blinked at Urbosa, and Urbosa raised her eyebrows at her.

"Is there anyone you fancy, Link? Anyone that's caught your eye?" In the Parapan language the words she used meant any girl rather than anyone, but Link could not tell if Urbosa meant any girl, or if the confines of the languages tricked her ears more suited to the genders tied up in Necludan or Central Hyrulean.

She turned the question over in her mind.

Anyone she fancied.

Urbosa's gaze darted down. To the harp in Link's hands. And then up. To the sudden fury of scarlet in Link's face.

She could not recall the word for no but she knew how to swing her head from side to side to negate any and all and everything that could have passed through Urbosa's mind or mouth.

In response Urbosa laughed, though not unkindly.

Link felt her hands moving before she could stop herself. "Is there anyone you fancy?"

"A question," Urbosa noted. "Answering a question with a question. Now that's the Parapan art. Well, now, I should honour it, then." She lifted her hand to her chin. Link observed her expression of serenity pass over behind the shadow of a storm. "...forgive me, Link. It was unfair of me to ask you that when I can't even answer it myself." Link's fingers curled inwards and she recoiled back, but And yet simply returned to tending the skewers. She kept her voice level. Yet behind the evenness Link could just hear the edge of something broken, of something splintered in two. "Well, if you ever figure out the answer, you should tell me if you want."

Link responded with a scale up and down the harp. An invocation she and the girl who smelled of horses had heard from the Oracles at the village shrine—painted in the spiralling gold of—of Ordona? but what does Ordona mean? she cannot remember—and thereafter taught themselves to play on the grasswhistle. She strains. The name of the invocation. She remembers: Farore's Courage.

Perhaps the song prompted the pain in Urbosa's constricted features, or perhaps not. Link let the harp die down. And yet the silence yielded no voice.

"Link."

Her eyelids flutter.
Ruboona.

"Are you all right?" Ruboona asks, and Link inclines her head. "Are you certain?"

Link polishes off the skewer. "I was just...remembering something."

Ruboona's eyes mist over; she lowers her lashes as a curtain of warm darkness. "Ah, I understand. I do that too."

Link sets the skewer in her lap.

"We should go."

"Mm." Over the point of the bone skewer, Link watches Ruboona gaze into the fire. "Yes. We should."

—

Salt-Grilled Gourmet Meat (eight hearts) - acorn, chickaloo tree nut, raw whole bird, rock salt

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: The inside of Vah Naboris, being a big cylinder with the terminals all pointed radially inwards, was really impressionable on me!

The ladders were broken in the original fight between Urbosa and Thunderblight Ganon as Urbosa attempted to escape, since unlike the big spiral staircase present in Vah Medoh and Vah Rudania (in Delicious in Wilds), Naboris's exits are reached by ladder. Why? Because the entire torso rotates, so it's not feasible to have the exit from the back. Instead, the exit is at Vah Naboris's rump, under the tail.

Link did indeed leave a bunch of her supplies on Ilia back in Ache's Veil! While you can carry pretty much everything on you in Breath of the Wild and have very few options for actual storage other than the three bows/weapons/shields you can store in Link's house, other games where you have actual storage options can lead to cases like this. Seems like Link will have to find a different weapon with which to defeat Thunderblight Ganon.

Ruboona isn't that good at singing, but it's the thought that matters, you know? It's also the same harp that Link knows how to play: the ages. Since her prayer is intensely devoted to Sageru, Ruboona worried that a devotee of Hylia might not want to hear it, like how some people in real-life could be uncomfortable in the religious temple or other sacred location of a faith different from their own.

The radiant shield is mirror-like and will refract away the guardian's lasers (dubbed "fire-light" by Link). However, diamond can only absorb so much energy at a time, and the jewellers have not yet figured out a way to harness the energy stored in the diamonds properly instead of having that energy be immediately refracted back out. That immediate refraction also damages the diamonds precisely due to this incomplete nature, much like how people don't know how to get rubies to release all of their fire at once except by breaking them.

Instead of throwing the boomerang at the guardian, Link threw the sword at the guardian. That's what happens when you don't pay attention to what you're grabbing.

Unlike Link, who is used to carrying swords at her back instead of her hip even though that's a very poor method of sword-carrying, Ruboona properly carries her sword on her hip.

Just smacking a guardian's leg with a boomerang isn't going to do much. They're armoured for a reason! The weapon that Ruboona has was based on the ancient bladesaw from Breath of the Wild as well as my own thoughts on how one could effectively fight against the guardians. The purpose of the many hooks is to tear as many wires as possible and damage the internal structure with each thrust. It also makes cutting off the guardians' weak legs much easier, since it can hooked into the tiny gaps between the segments of the legs and then pry them off. I had a lot of fun designing weapons and determining how they would actually work.

In the faith of Sageru, followers are taught to question all that they see around them, to be sceptical, and to seek truth through debate and interpretation. The words of the faith are likened to the water of the River Sageru, pliable and moving. The idea is that following a faith and believing because someone told you to isn't how you cultivate true love or sense of duty; you have to struggle and to decide for yourself to have faith in Sageru, because then your faith is genuine; of course, that's only the faith of Sageru, and the other patron deities have their own views of such things. Incidentally, this scepticism is precisely what you saw in Urbosa's view of destiny and fate as something that people take into their own hands. Hence, answering a question with a question is tongue-in-cheek called a Parapan art.

Farore's Courage is a reference to the song from Skyward Sword. If you want to know what the invocation sounds like: there you go.

Wew, is there anyone Urbosa fancies? Well...

midna's ass. 02 October 2017.

Beta reader's comments: Ri-I-mean-Ruboona is really great! Link has one of the best connections with her out of all the characters in the series, and seeing their relationship evolve over such a short time is a great experience.

Ruboona being a really religious character is a cool thing to see - while all characters we've seen have been religious to some extent, having a super devoted character is a cool thing to explore.

Link continuing her relationship with music in the past is kinda super sweet.

Emma. 02 October 2017.
Energising Glazed Meat

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef and the Parapan food enthusiast tackle the Divine Beast, while the travelling chef continues to remember about the previous Champion of Sageru.

Chapter Notes

As typical of me, comments that couldn't fit in the end: As always, my deepest thanks to you for reading Delicious in Wilds, and my deepest thanks to everyone who has helped me along the way, most notably my beloved beta reader, Emma.

Basically, what happened in the previous chapter is that the guardian fired its laser into the wiring which runs through Vah Naboris, which provided enough electricity for the wire to briefly take effect on the body of the Divine Beast. In this case, the electric pulse make Vah Naboris assuming the "kneeling" position (the same position you see in Breath of the Wild).

Topaz, if you haven't figured out by now, stores electricity, just like in Breath of the Wild. Green topaz is the most high-quality topaz for storing electricity; the normal yellow topaz is serviceable.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"So," starts Ruboona, "which terminals should we tackle first?"

Through paraglider reconnaissance outside of the Divine Beast, Link and Ruboona learn that shudder and tilt of the Divine Beast from the guardians' fire-light has lowered it to its knees in the sand.

The inner torso of the Divine Beast, Link notes, has little in the way of guardians. Small sentries wait, inert, upon the circular walls, but she cannot say if they have broken over the past century or if they will bring into action when neared. The front and back of the Divine Beast tell a different story. The arched entrance that leads into the tail echoes with the scuttle of guardians' legs back and forth. Link cannot comment on the terminal near the chest area, nor the head.

"This place seems safe," Link points out. "And these terminals probably activate the legs."

Ruboona nods. Her braid and looped sidelocks bounce with the motion of her head. "Then, let's get those first."

The map terminal has brought with it control over the central cylinder of the Divine Beast. The torso, Ruboona and Link discover, splits into three rings: at the front near the head, in the middle, and at the back near the tail. She can rotate the rings of the torso around, but the metal bands upon the floor remain lifeless even when aligned.
After closing her eyes to ponder, Ruboona pulls out a shard of topaz. "I have an idea. Stand back." She shoves the golden thing with the green gems and wheel of lightning decals onto her head. Not a thing, Link realises, but a helmet, with the green gems—green topaz—she thought embedded in the back actually facing front.

Ruboona steps forward towards the metal band and crouches. With a pair of nutcracker-like tongs, she breaks open the topaz upon the metal.

A spark of green electricity runs up and down the band. The Divine Beast groans. The floor quakes; its curved slipperiness sends Link onto her back like a flipped-over beetle. Something on the back end of the Divine Beast rumbles.

When the electricity runs its course, the something in the back of the Divine Beast rumbles again, more quickly this time. Through the floor, Link can feel the hard thudding of something impossibly heavy slamming down.

"So, there has to be some...way of operating Savah Naboris." Ruboona presses her hands together. "If the topaz providing the electricity is spent, I have some in my pack." Link nods at her. "Though I wonder how She's remained operational all these years, before you placed the Hero's slate into that terminal." A tilt of Link's head brings Ruboona to elaborate: "I thought the Divine Beasts like Savah Naboris worked on electricity. Ah, you're not from around here, are you? We use topaz to store it. It's...a rare commodity, but it has uses beyond measure. Not anything on the scale of Savah Naboris, though Parapa's brightest have come far." Link tilts her head further, and Ruboona clears her throat. "Sovah Naboris is wired—" She points to the metal bands, "—but the rest of Her continues to operate even in the absence of electricity. I can't imagine what else could power Her." Ruboona glances at Link with a small nervous smile. "Do you happen to know, with the other Divine Beasts...?"

Link shrugs. "I haven't thought about it."

Ruboona lowers her eyelids. "Ah, you're...here to calm the Divine Beasts. That makes sense." She opens her eyes once more. "Let's go."

"I'm sorry," Link signs, tapping her boot twice against the floor to shake off her excess worry. "I'm not that smart. I just happen to...I just happen to be the one who found the slate."

Her companion claps a hand over her own mouth. "I didn't mean to—!" The horror on her face makes Link lift her hands and twitch her fingers to claw words, any words, from the fabric of the air. "I didn't say you weren't smart, and I didn't mean to imply it. I'm sorry."

Link shakes her head. "I said that about myself."

"...you shouldn't insult yourself like that," Ruboona says softly. She bows towards Link. "Thank you already for what you've done bringing the Hero's slate here, and for saving my life."

The silence that follows squeezes down upon Link's hands and screws her fingers straight, chokes her nose and tightens her throat, drops her down into tension thick enough to muffle her screams. She wants to thank Ruboona for saving her life, and twice now; to thank Ruboona for her kind selflessness to a complete stranger; to thank Ruboona for trusting her.

Instead the only words that Link happens upon grate against her bones before she has even said them. "...thank you for the meals."

Ruboona looks at her, and Link looks blankly back, and then Ruboona laughs with a dryness that socks Link in the gut. "Then, the terminals."

The terminals.

One terminal on the head-end third of the cylinder and one on the tail-end third. The former currently at the leftmost wall, and the latter on the right.

A sudden warmth at her side makes Link turn her head: Ruboona looks over Link's shoulder while they examine the slate. Link blinks at her companion, who steps back. "Ah, my apologies; I didn't mean to make you uncomfortable."

Rolling her shoulders, Link indicates for Ruboona to come forward again, and the girl does. Link sits cross-legged upon the floor with the slate held in her lap. Ruboona, just below Link's height, crouches behind her. She rests her chin on Link's shoulder. One of her sidelocks brushes against Link's cheek.

Almost involuntarily Link touches the red telescope.

Though she cannot recall the difference in age between herself and Aryll, the barely-felt weight of Ruboona's right hand on Link's back between her shoulder blades, balancing herself, brings a curve to Link's mouth.

With her free hand, Ruboona reaches around Link's shoulder; her fingers brush against the surface of the slate. She rotates the head-end, frontmost ring. Link notices how the movements of the ring alternatively open and block off the entrances that lead to the Divine Beast's joints. The guardian sentries stationed on the cylinder do not fall, even when upside-down on their platforms, apparently held in place by some mechanism around their feet.

The terminal on the front ring—visible as a dot upon the map—sits inside of a tall topless box made of the slippery material, tall enough that even when Link lifts Ruboona up on her shoulders and Ruboona leaps, she cannot quite reach the rim of the box without sliding off of the edge.

They devise a plan. Link stands back with the bow given to her by Amali and Teba, the flimsy wooden arrows she made ready at a moment's notice, and the slate in hand. She rotates the front ring around until the terminal protrudes from the left wall and a box-like platform juts out from the bottom.

As soon as Ruboona steps onto the ring, the sentry on the box-like platform glows. She raises her shield. Its singular eye begins to blaze. Link blinds the automaton with an arrow. While Ruboona rolls out of the way, the sentry shoots fire-light from its broken eye. Link's breath dies in her throat: she ogles nervously how Ruboona dodges the guardian's blitzing fire-light to reach the automaton's head, which she skewers with the hooked sword.

When she has ripped its armour free and torn off its legs, Ruboona squats down on the floor. She flashes Link the sign for being all right, her thumb and forefinger curved into a circle. Link rotates the ring counterclockwise. As the ring moves, the terminal in the box comes to a rest on the bottom, while Ruboona perches on the platform now extending from the right side.

Unfolding her paraglider, Ruboona hangs on the edge of the platform, breathes, and jumps.

She glides into the box, and Link pumps her fist into the air.

Ruboona's voice echoes from the inside of the box. "...Link? How are you going to get me the slate?" Link lowers her hand. She touches her chin. Arching her arm back, she chucks the slate at top of the wall.

It hits the edge and bounces back.

Nursing the new bruise on her forehead, Link touches her chin again. Carefully she rotates the ring one quarter-turn clockwise; she hears Ruboona squeak as the box tilts on its side. Link steps forward onto the ring to clamber onto the platform. Ruboona, now on her stomach between the side of the wall and the black crystal of the terminal pointing radially inwards, her head poking out of the box, peers at Link to ask what in the world is going on.

"I'm going to rotate the platform back and toss the slate in," Link explains. She taps the bruise on her brow. "Be careful of it smacking into you."

Ruboona holds the shield over her head. Link rotates the ring up and around. When the terminal once more protrudes from the bottom, Link gently tosses the slate down into its top face.

She listens to it bang off of the shield, then hears Ruboona shuffle around for it. "Thank you! Ah, how do I...oh! Wait. Oh, I see, thank the Goddesses. It's the other way. Then, like this?" Link can see from her position the reflection of the blue light shining out from the top of the box. "We did it!
Link, we—we really did it. We can...we can do this."

The earnestness in her voice reminds her so strongly of Yunobo that Link raises her right hand to her cheek and her left to the red telescope looped around the belt at her hip.

Ruboona rotates the ring back clockwise. At her request, Link stands below the mouth of the box.
Ruboona drops down the slate first which Link fails to catch; she plucks it from the ground to slot into the pouch at her right hip. And then Ruboona herself: without enough room to open up her paraglider, she wriggles herself out from the thin space between the terminal and the wall.

She drops down.

Hands reaching for the girl falling through the air, Link catches her, one arm around her shoulders, one arm under the bend of her knees, and Ruboona half-jumps, startled, in Link's embrace. Her sidelocks have come slightly undone and curl around her face in a cloud of puffed red.

Link remembers gathering Aryll into her arms. In the nights that followed the day she drew the sword that seals the darkness from the stone. When she returned to Ordon for the first time since her hand had first touched the blade of evil's bane, when she left the letter for the blacksmith and for the girl who smelled of horses and for—her parents, on the kitchen counter of that house.

When she held Aryll in her arms as she now holds Ruboona.

Bending over to set her companion on the floor, Link lets Ruboona stand on her own two feet.
Ruboona smooths her frazzled hair. She stoops down to pick up the golden loops that fell from her hair to set them once more into her sidelocks, then ties the sidelocks back into loops.

"Thank you for catching me," Ruboona says, her voice betraying her dizziness. Clapping her palm against her cheek, she repeats her words more firmly: "Thank you for catching me." She fixes up her braid. Link shrugs, then snaps her fingers and smiles back at Ruboona, who returns the gesture.
"Then, that should take care of the front legs." Link confirms with a glance at the slate. She blinks.
For the other Divine Beasts the terminals have controlled the legs—or wings—in left-and right-fashion, but here the controls go front-and-back. "You said that the back legs should be on the other ring, closest to the tail."
Off to the other ring. As before Link and Ruboona, together, clear the ring of guardian sentries. None of them offers any fire-light weapons. Link wrenches her arrows from their eyes. Some shafts have broken beyond repair, but others she can reuse with a bit of sharpening.

This time Link gives Ruboona the slate. While Link stands guard from the main terminal, Ruboona cycles through the various platforms in her efforts to find a perch from which she can glide down into the box.

Yet nothing on this side seems to work.

Link observes Ruboona fiddle with the slate, then look around the innards of the Divine Beast, then snap her fingers.

"I'll be moving it!" she shouts. Link ogles at her: moving what? Not a second passes and the ground begins to slide away under Link's boots. Link's right knee hits the ground first, followed by her hip and then her shoulder and upper arm. Her body starts to roll downwards on the curved surface; she smacks onto a platform. The back of her head aches. As she thrashes her limbs to find purchase on the surface, she rolls off of the platform and thumps back heavily onto the ground. The ring continues to rotate. On the relative flatness of the floor, Link springs to her feet.

At last.

And then a sudden pain on the crown of her head drops her to the ground. Woozily she lifts her chin to find herself hallucinating a broken hive of honey on the floor at her boots. The inside litters with dead bees, but the honey has kept, and the thick golden syrup ooze from the broken halves of the hive.

Link glances up.

The inner cage of the main terminal overhead reveals the waxy signs of where the beehive once hung, nestled between the four statues of animals, over the neck and back of the lizard, the bird, the camel, the elephant.

Some enterprising bees, she realises, must have made a hive here during the Divine Beast's century of dormancy. Its reawakening must have killed the bees but left the hive; when Ruboona rotated the central ring, the stem of the hive—unable to support its weight—must have fractured and let it fall.

Even in such a place that a century ago witnessed the murder of Urbosa and which now bore the evacuation of villages and the transformation of steppe to desert, life goes on.

Link stops.

She stares.

She erupts into laughter, incredulous and joyous and thankful at once.

Ruboona calls down from the upper platform of the middle ring on which she now perches: "Link? Link!? Ah, I'm sorry; I thought I'd warned you I was about to move the middle ring! Are you injured?"

Link cannot call back, and neither can she turn off the flow of the laughter from the steadiness of life. No matter where she goes, to the never-ending thunderstorm of Tantari, or to the icy reaches of the heavens of the ridgelands, or to the fiery bowels of Death Mountain, life goes on.
In the face of the Great Calamity, life goes on.

When Ruboona, on her hands and knees, peers out from the platform above, Link signs to her: "I'm fine. I'm fine." She gestures wildly towards the honey, holding up one half of the hive, and spins around in a shuffle of celebration. When she lifts her arm up to show the honey to the world, she feels the hive leaving her hand entirely to fly across the inside of the Divine Beast. Gasping, Link throws herself onto the floor. She slides along the ground with hands outstretched.

The hive misses her ready palms and lands, instead, on her head.

She wipes honey from her hair.

"I'm going to have to rotate the rings again, so stay on the furthest one!" Link listens to Ruboona count down from ten and—gathering the hive—moves to safety. Ruboona rotates the middle ring, then the ring to the back. Link observes her glide down into the second boxed terminal.

While she waits for Ruboona to return, she busies herself scooping the honey from the hives and picking out bees. She finds Ruboona's pack of supplies by the central terminal. Drawing out the portable sapphire ice-box of meat and the caged metal grill, Link begins to prepare another round of skewers, this time with a drizzling of honey to glaze the sauce alongside the spices and salt.

She hears Ruboona scream.

Link jumps up but she cannot see the inside of the terminal. She cups her hands over her mouth to yell wordlessly as the ring begins to move once more.

She notices the terminal move up and up, clockwise. It passes the halfway mark on the wall and begins to climb to the ceiling. Link's eyes widen. She sprints forward even as the floor beneath her feet threatens to slip her. Ruboona falls out from the open end of the box. Her arms flail to open the paraglider. One of its wings cracks Link across the jaw but nonetheless she catches the girl for the second time that day.

Her right arm around Ruboona's shoulders, her left in the bend of Ruboona's knees.

The slate crashes into the floor beside her.

The paraglider closes again. Ruboona trembles. Link lets her down and watches her kick off her boots. The footwears skid along the floor. Her knees hit the ground. Her spine curved, her hands on her thighs, her breaths thick and fast.

Link crouches beside her to rest a hand on her shoulder, but Ruboona pushes her away. No, not away: towards the central ring, out from under the terminal. Ruboona scrambles herself over as well.

Link need only look up to see why: a droplet of malice splashes down from the terminal onto the ground.

Before Link can react, Ruboona has lifted herself again to her feet. With her gaze fixed on the ceiling, Ruboona dashes through the back ring under the malice-leaking box, picking up the slate along the way, and smacks her palm over its surface.

The ring begins to move, to tilt the terminal and its malice-flooded box back onto the right side of the cylinder, and then the bottom.

With that Ruboona collapses onto the ground to breathe.
Link takes to her side in a flash. She examines Ruboona's torso and legs for signs of malice, but, other than the threadbare singes on the bottom of her trousers, she seems to have escaped the worst.

Her boots, on the other hand, have half-dissolved, eaten away by malice.

"I—" Ruboona coughs as her panting interrupts her. Link raises her head to meet her gaze; sweat beads on Link's brow and on the back of her neck. "—got the terminal, Link." Her companion smiles weakly. Gingerly she reaches down to feel her own feet. "...ah, and I got out in one piece, thank the Goddesses. Thank You, Sadin, Sanayru, Safarore, Sageru, O our Goddesses."

Link hugs her.

Moving without her thoughts, her arms instinctively wrap Ruboona in the safety of her embrace as so many have hugged her. She senses Ruboona stiffen, and then relax; her hands press into Link's back below her shoulder blades, her fingers digging lightly into Link's skin.

"I'm fine, I promise. You seem to worry a lot about me for someone you just met a few hours ago," Ruboona whispers her timbre halfway tense and halfway touched, and Link pulls away just enough to speak to her.

"We'll be more careful in the future." Her movements follow her solemnity. "I promise."

"As long as Savah Naboris is calmed," Ruboona responds, her voice distant in its sudden detachment, "it does not much matter what happens to me, Link."

"I don't know you," Link admits, "but it does matter. I..." She has said those very words before, the words Ruboona speaks. "I have said those very words before, the words you're speaking." But that doesn't mean she doesn't matter. "But that doesn't mean that...that you don't matter." And it matters what happens to her. "And it matters what happens to you."

"Why do you care so much?" Her inflection has not a trace of accusation or vitriol, only confusion.

"...you remind me of someone I knew once." Link hesitates. "And you've come all this way to calm the Divine Beast yourself. You think that the only thing you can do is...be useful to someone, or live up to some fate, don't you?" She does not know from where the words have welled up, but they fall from her fingers. "I don't know your story but I know you."

Silence.

Link rises to her feet.

"Come here," she says. Where her words fail her food will not. Ruboona follows her. From her pack, Ruboona withdraws a second pair of shoes. Not sturdy boots meant for walking in the sands, but round and comfortable flat-footed shoes. She slides them on. Link salvages the skewers of meat that she has made and proffers them to Ruboona.

Ruboona takes one. "Ah, More food." Link nods. Ruboona looks at her, and Link looks at Ruboona, and then Ruboona lifts her hand to her mouth as a little laugh escapes her lips. "...thank you."

"The quickest way to someone's heart is through their stomach," Link signs, and Ruboona's smile takes on a certain shade of fondness.

They toast one another with a touch of the skewers, and then they bite down.
Glazed meat skewers.

Where the nutmeg sweetened the skewers made before, the honey offers a different kind of sweetness. A certain roundness, a wholeness not present before. And the scent of the honey wrapped around the salt and nutmeg and sumac and turmeric and the other spices for which she has no name and below it all the meat made tender by her hands and tempered by the heat—

Urbosa.

Urbosa, who gave her the harp. Urbosa, who struggled with her own burdens, onto whose shoulders the burdens of the girl with the golden hair and the burdens of supposed chosen one both fell, for her being slightly older, for her seeming so calm, for her kindness and courage in the face of the Great Calamity.

But she had her own burdens and no one to fall back on.

Link can only see these truths from the reflections of visiting the past through the hallway of mirrors. At the time, she had little knowledge of Urbosa but for a well-instilled fear. Not of Urbosa, but of those who held power over her, of those who reminded her of the people in that house—

Link continued to learn the harp. They went to and from the village of Dhoruf, where Link spent several days honing her skills against a master of dual scimitars. Where Urbosa favoured a shield and a scimitar for combat upon horseback, Rhibonne preferred a more aggressive approach. Link fought not only with the blade of evil's bane but also with a scimitar herself, "to diversify your toolkit, Link," as Urbosa explained. They covered their horses in protective armour filled with a green-coloured fluid so that Link could learn to keep her horse safe in the field. Every time Link checked on Epona and noticed the emerald liquid staining her armour, she sucked in a breath through her teeth.

"I'll do better next time, girl," Link promised Epona, who calmly nosed her chest until she gave in and stroked her loyal companion's forehead. "I won't let anyone hurt you, I swear. Besides..." She giggled into Epona's mane. "Marin and—" The fog scatters through the handful of names she has remembered. "—would never forgive me. And I'd never forgive myself, girl."

Epona bumped her nose against Link's chin as though trying to keep Link in high spirits.

"A horse and her girl," Urbosa remarked; Link blushed. The Champion of Sageru watched over their practise as a referee. Though Urbosa kept up her usual cheer and confidence, Link could detect the brewing of a storm beyond the horizon, in the occasional glances to the left and right, in the twitching of her eyes, in the occasional quick flex of her fingers as if trying grasp something hidden from view.

In the night Link lay sleepless. She listened to Urbosa's breaths deepen and slow as she fell into slumber. Link could not shake the sensation that a single wrong word would turn Urbosa against her, that Urbosa's fury—or whatever emotions lay behind the flicker of grimace and downturn of the brow—could in an instant crash down upon her. As lightning agitated by the clouds would strike the tallest in the vicinity regardless of blame, so too would the storms of distress.

Urbosa, who had been so kind to her since she drew the sword that seals the darkness from the stone in the courtyard of the royal castle. Urbosa, who could surely not be kind forever. Urbosa, who would surely one day get annoyed and fed up and then—

She'd seen it happen before.
Link ran her fingers so frequently over her own cheeks that in the morning she would find reddened tracks where she had stroked her skin raw.

At dawn she turned her attention to Rhibonne's lessons.

Link found that she fared better with scimitar and shield than scimitars alone. She would hang back for fear of injuring Epona, which would only result in green blooming along the sands. Rhibonne came at her hard and fast.

She drank a glass of cool mares' milk in the shade of the stable while the horses rested for the next round.

"Courage, my friend," Rhibonne told her, hands returning to her hips after each sentence, peering at the supposed chosen one over her dark-tinted glasses. "You lack courage. You should not be foolish, but neither should you be cowardly." She sniffed and ran her thumb under her nose. "Sometimes you should know when to quit and when to flee. True, those are aspects of any battle, whether physical or not. However...you should choose when to fight and when to flee and not allow your cowardice to dictate your emotions."

Link merely studied the geometric shapes in blue and white upon the stable floor.

Rhibonne sighed. "I can hear your thoughts, my friend."

She snapped her head up to stare at the master of dual scimitars, who winked at her. "True, I'm no psychic, and you have expressions so guarded you'd be a natural in the card parlor. However..." Rhibonne stepped forward to jab a finger into Link's chest. "...I know the thoughts of one who loves her companion so. If it were just you in danger, you could charge at me without a second thought." Link nodded. "However, because it's the horse's life at stake, too, you can't." She nodded again, and Rhibonne flicked at her upper lip. "Protecting the horse means being aggressive, too. Take care of the enemy before they have a chance to go on the aggressive themselves."

Link dipped her head, her expression still blank.

"Now, let's get back to it!" Enthusiastically Rhibonne clapped Link on the shoulder. "Show me what you've got, my friend."

Urbosa raised her eyebrows at Rhibonne's speech. "Courage, eh," she repeated.

Rhibonne threw her arms out towards Urbosa. "O Courageous Urbosa, you of all should understand the need for courage, even if it involves the lives of other people. Especially when it involves the lives of other people."

"Mm," said Urbosa. "I'll be back. Good luck with the training."

Urbosa left and Link prepared herself for the trials to come. She stroked her horse's mane before saddling her. Link focused on aggression and every sssh of fluid streaming from the armour around her horse's torso made her wince. Rhibonne chastised her: not foolhardiness, but planned aggression.

The days came and went. In the early morning—before the sun's rise, for practise of fighting in the dark—and during the afternoons Link honed her courage for riding upon her horse. In the heat just after noon and in the evenings she practised the six-stringed harp. The ages.

With the harpist Enja's comments in mind, Link focused less on the songs and more on the technique. The sounds she drew from the strings steadily improved, or at least stopped sounding like she were torturing a dog.

A sound behind her froze her body and locked herself in place. She curled herself over the harp to hear Urbosa enter the room.

The atmosphere of distress thickened the air. Link's throat constricted.

Urbosa simply sat down by the hearth of Link's room with a plate of skewers of meat and a pitcher of gold. Bee honey. As Link regarded her, shoulders stiff and limbs curled in, Urbosa held the skewers over the fire, turning them over and over, and drizzling them lightly with gold.

The savory scent of cooking meat and sweetness of honey thinned the air once more. Link resumed the harp.

When the empty ache in her belly had just begun to grown unbearable, Urbosa proved her saviour. Link accepted the skewers offered to her; she swallowed them up.

Urbosa took a seat upon the bed next to Link. She set her own half-eaten skewer down in her lap. "The other day you asked me if there was anyone I fancied."

This conversation again.

Link looked blankly ahead while either the spiced meat or a sudden fever steadily heated her cheeks. She let her hands drop from the strings of the harp.

Urbosa folded her arms over her chest to drum her fingers against her inner arms. "So I've thought about it. I suppose there is someone I fancy. I'll tell you of her if you tell me of the one you fancy. She—" Again Link could not tell if Urbosa meant she or if, in another language, the word would follow he or they. "—has got to be one of the most stubborn and pigheaded people I know." Link blinked. "She can be terribly immature and selfish when she becomes self-defensive. She can be pessimistic and, worse, start to consider all of the woes of the universe only her own." Urbosa snorted, and Link wondered if she had misunderstood the question entirely. Maybe fancy didn't mean what she thought. Maybe Urbosa was asking about why Link seemed so scared of her. Maybe — "Sometimes she gets so fixated on a single thing that it's less about missing the forest for the trees and more missing the forest for a single leaf."

"But."

The softness of the but struck a harder blow than if Urbosa had screamed the word.

Link observed: the dark glimmer of Urbosa's irises. The subtle opening of her palms. The slight smile that grew second on second until she grinned with the whole of her body, a smile so wide it reached her nose to flare her nostrils and then her eyes to crinkle the edges. "But she's also...incredibly sweet, and loyal, and brilliant in ways I can hardly imagine. No matter what she does, she does it with passion, and she'll let neither fate nor tradition stop her. You could put a thousand sand seals in front of her with ceremonial candles strapped to their heads and she'll figure out some, oh, 'optimal path' to avoid 'em all. She understands reason without cutting away her heart, and she can follow her emotion without throwing out her reason." Urbosa shook her head and her hair bobbed from side to side. "She has trouble showing it, sure, but she cares deeply for those around her. And when she's not on the defensive she has...a selflessness that frightens me, sometimes. But when I see her smile, or I hear her laugh, it feels like something I didn't know was missing from my life has come home at last."

Link listened to Urbosa speak and yet she listened, more closely, to the songs Marin had sung for her that rose from the sea of memories, lighthouses upon the rock. The strings of the harp tingled the tips of her fingers; she closed her eyes for the sensation, like that of stroking her hands along Marin's summer-scented hair.

"Link," said Urbosa again, though Link could barely hear her over the roar of blood rushing to her face, "is there anyone you fancy? You don't need to say anything. Look at how you hold that harp, Link." She winked and Link could substitute the fire with her own face. "With the touch of a lover's hands. Who needs honey when we've got that sweetness in your gaze?"

Link covers her face with her hands. Behind her palms her cheeks flush. Her honey-fuzzed tongue pushes against her lower teeth; the slightly angled teeth on either side of her jaw push back.

Ruboona puzzles out the slate. "I've figured out how to guide Savah Naboris's walking," she says eagerly, and Link nods. Her movements graceful, Ruboona kneels down next to Link and demonstrates how to input a sequence of motion using the two terminals, the head-end handling the two front legs, and the tail-end, the back. "So, be careful and be ready. I'm going to walk Her south."

"South?"

"Away from Nabooru. I've—" Ruboona's timbre deepens; the rims of her words tremble. "—that is to say, we've already been forced to relocate so many people who have lost their homes from Savah Naboris's rampage." She looks down and away, then up to the heavens. "Thank the Goddesses, we won't have to run anymore." Her fingers dance nimbly over the slate. The Divine Beast shakes but does not tilt this way or that, instead rising all at once: the upwards acceleration momentarily pins Link to the ground. Then the Divine Beast starts to move. Link resumes eating the honeyed skewer, and Ruboona closes her eyes. Her left hand strokes repetitively along the curves of the golden helmet. "Link, you...told me that if we activate all of the terminals, then the guardian Malice will emerge to fight against us." Link nods even though Ruboona does not look at her. "So. We have...no need of Savah Naboris's powers. Perhaps against...those who seek to hurt us...but I believe that with Savah Naboris no longer hurting m—our people, that we are more than capable of mobilising against those who would hurt us, ourselves.

"Then, perhaps we could leave Savah Naboris as She is. With the Hero's slate, we could control Her to stay far away from people, and we could move Her to avoid interrupting the people of the sands as well. So...do you think that that's possible, Link?"

Ruboona opens her eyes. She gazes at Link with the strangest mixture of confidence and anxiety, or perhaps Link has simply lost the little ability to read people she has struggled to acquire.

Link's hand rests upon her chin.

"I don't know for sure how long the slate's control lasts over the Divine Beast," she replied honestly, "but I can't leave the slate with you. There's another Divine Beast that needs the slate." Ruboona's expression shifts and Link flinches back. "I'm sorry. But the Malice should have Urbosa's slate. If we can take the slate from it, then we can register a new pilot for the Divine Beast...or something like that. I'm not smart enough to get the specifics." Link scratches her cheek. "If I left it with you...without a pilot, I think the Malice could take over again."

"Ah, you...didn't call her by her full title," her companion remarks, her timbre level. "Lady Urbosa, that is."

Link rubs the back of her head. "Sorry."

Ruboona gazes at her; Link cannot place her expression. She closes her eyes, then opens them again. "In any case, it seems we'll have to activate the remainder of the terminals and register a pilot, as you said. So, how many more?"

Link holds up three fingers.

As they finish eating, Ruboona pauses to pray under her breath, to invoke once more the Golden Goddesses and the Goddess Sageru, for their protection, for their speed of calming the Divine Beast, for the Malice that they will inevitably have to fight.

Link removes the sheath that once held her blade before it broke. Her hands—when they belonged to another—have borne a sword that softly, so softly, glowed in the gentlest blue.

In anticipation of the Malice, she need search for a blue sword once more. Not of metal, but of fire-light.

The sweetness of the honey fades to a dull acridity. Yet she need only look up to see the girl with the scarlet braid sitting across from her, poring over the slate, her tongue poking out of the corner of her mouth—like a certain girl with pigtails Link knew so long ago—to remember why Link has come here, and why she fights yet.

—

_Energising Glazed Meat_ (twelve hearts, two-fifths stamina vessel) - acorn, chickaloo tree nut, courser bee honey, raw whole bird, rock salt

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Ruboona's comments about "how has Vah Naboris been operational all this time" is in reference to the fact that she doesn't where they draw power. But you do get a clue: the "blue light" that of the guardians' lasers, the blue of the shrines, the blue of the slate, the blue of the Master Sword, and the blue of the Divine Beasts' terminals all relate to one another. In fact, we've already _heard_ about where this blue comes from, though not explicitly. They sure don't run on electricity.

Poor Link really has issues connecting. She's certainly more vocal about responsibility now, thanks to what she learned from Amali, but Link doesn't know how to comfort people. And while Yunobo and Amali have their own esteems, Ruboona (as you can see) has some issues and anxieties of her own.

I've purposefully drawn comparisons between Ruboona and Link's relationship and Link's own relationship with Aryll. Their closeness is not meant to be read as romantic, in any way whatsoever, and I hadn't even thought about that until my beta reader pointed out that readers most used to reading romance fics might misinterpret, so here's my _explicit_ notice.
Ruboona couldn't tell if Link were laughing or crying, which is why she asked.

Truly this chapter is a comedy of errors.

Link lifting up new items throughout Delicious in Wilds is an ongoing reference to Link's tendency to do so throughout games in the franchise. In A Link to the Past, the merchant from whom Link can buy a bottle even asks that Link lift up the bottle as advertisement.

The armour filled with green fluid is meant so that they can keep track of being hit, i.e. if Rhinon slashes Link's horse on the flank, Epona won't be hurt, but the flank will 'bleed' green.

So, Urbosa was struggling with a few things with regards to her relationship to Zelda, as well as herself. She's the youngest of the four champions (Mipha looks youngest but she's at least several decades old due to the much longer life-span of the zora), and while Revali was chosen for already having been determined to be the greatest archer in Tabantha to a point of putting his hometown Ilari on the map, and while Daruk was chosen in part due to his having been head of the mine of Darunia (i.e. already having attained significant positions), Urbosa was chosen in a tournament and a series of trials that anyone could have entered. In other words, she wasn't picked up specifically but had to win her way in on her own skill. On the other hand, having not already attained a position of prominence means that her ability to be a pilot and to protect Zelda are called into question more often. To this end, if it was discovered that she and Zelda share any sort of relationship, the rumours would fly that she only become champion due to Zelda liking her or some such. And it is considered unprofessional, because that would mean that her interests could be in conflict and compromised, if she would make decisions in favour of her relationship rather than decisions that needed to be made for the good of Hyrule.

The other big issue is that Urbosa is afraid of leaving her loved ones, of dying considering that (as she says) there's a war on. But she's also known Zelda for a while. It takes courage to be honest with your feelings. Sometimes love isn't the answer. But sometimes...

Urbosa and Link have a certain special connection. After all, they're both labelled "Courageous" (Revali and Daruk are the "Powerful", while Mipha and Zelda are the "Wise").

I really didn't want to reduce Ruboona to "flawless perfect queen" nor make her so flawed that Link would have to save her all the time. Instead, I went for an equal balance of her helping Link and Link helping her.

I'm not sure which chapter my beta reader is referring to as the wew chapter but if I had to guess it's the forty-first.

midna's ass. 03 October 2017.

Beta reader's comments: Link learning how to talk with people better is a really sweet moment.

Links sees her sister in Ri—I-mean—Ruboona, which somehow makes everything all the more bittersweet.
I lied to you last chapter - this chapter wasn't the wew chapter. But it's coming up, I promise!

Emma. 02 October 2017.
Energising Honey Candy

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef and the Parapan food enthusiast continue through the Divine Beast; the chef continues to recall the former Champion of Sageru.

Chapter Notes

Notes that wouldn't fit: As always, a warm thank-you to all of my readers; take care of yourselves. And thank you to my beta reader, Emma, for being so incredibly patient with me as I discuss the finer points of Hyrulean rock-paper-scissors.

Wind-water-fire, of course, is the Hyrule equivalent of rock-paper-scissors. It's played by making symbols of the golden goddesses with both hands: for Farore's, you curl your left hand into a fist and cup your other hand around it; for Nayru's, you put the backs of your hands (your palms facing left and right) together and slightly curve your fingers in. For Din's, you touch your wrists together so that one hand faces you and the other hand faces outwards, then curl your fingers into loose fists. It helps if you look up the symbols of the goddesses and try to emulate them. It might sound confusing, but I did sit down and work out how to make those with the hands.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Three terminals left.

Ruboona stands by the entrance at the tail of the Divine Beast; she walks it into the Tantari Desert. Only once she has satisfied herself with its distance from anywhere currently occupied by people do she and Link consider which terminal to tackle next.

After a few moments of discussion and a round of wind-water-fire—water puts out fire consumes wind moves water, as indicated by the patterns of their hands; Link grins at the fact, even that one hundred years down the road, the old standby of decision making remains relevant as ever—the terminal in the chest wins out. Together, they make the trek to the head-end ring, where they remove the remaining sentries affixed to the platforms, and ride the platform up to try to glide into the opening of the Divine Beast's chest.

As before, Link clings to Ruboona while the latter opens the paraglider. And yet—regardless of where they rotate the platform—the opening stands too high. Link and Ruboona bring their hands to their chins at the same time.

"The tail it is," Ruboona announces, and Link snorts back a laugh. "Then, do you have another idea?"

She shakes her head; Ruboona giggles.

They go to the tail. From there run two different entrances: one halfway up and just below the tail that leads into the spot with the first terminal, where first Link awoke to see Ruboona cooking food—and what better way to meet someone than over the most important thing in the world, really—and another higher than that, above the tail, past which Link can hear the scuttling of guardian legs. They ready themselves on top of a platform. Link sets the ring to rotate, granting them an extra dose of height and momentum. Just as her boots start to slip off of the platform, Ruboona glides off.

Ruboona clears the entrance while Link smacks into the edge by her upper stomach. She senses herself sliding down, dragging Ruboona with her, until Ruboona grabs her wrists and tugs up. But Link's greater weight pulls them downwards still. Hastily Ruboona reaches over Link's shoulders to snag the slate from her hip; Link scrambles her feet up the wall to slow her fall. Ruboona holds up the slate——and in the next second Link flies up in an arc to smash down upon the entrance to the tail. She sways swoozily. The tunnel around her spins in circles.

"I'm sorry about that. Ah, here's...here's the Hero's slate." Link's vision swims. Two Ruboonas carry two slates in their four palms. Link reaches out double to grab both, and her left hand closes around the slate, twice. "I had to use the...the gold one. The golden mark."

"Stasis."

Ruboona blinks at her, lips pursed, and Link repeats the gesture.

"The yellow rune. It's called stasis."

"What's a..." Ruboona emulates the motion for rune; Link rubs the back of her head. She fishes out Purah's explanation and relays it to Ruboona in a garbled mess that seems to leave her companion more perplexed than before, but nonetheless Ruboona nods. "Thank you. Then, let's continue."

Continue they do. Upon the inner walls of the entrance stripe white poles with metallic blocks that appear to connect different sets of the wiring together. Beyond the end of the hall, Link can see the Divine Beast's tail open to the afternoon sky, long yet flattened, with a metal strip bisecting the surface from base to tip, like a lengthy horizontal plank affixed to the rear passage of the Divine Beast, wide but impossibly thin, so that if Link lay down near the edge, she could hook her arm around the side and touch the bottom face. The base of the tail stretches some ten paces across; the tip narrows into a point. Most alarmingly, a series of seven turrets, spaced along the tail, whirr as their gazes draw loops around their perimeters. Unlike with the small sentries, a lid of clear material protects the eyes of the turrets.

Not scuttling that she heard earlier, Link realises, but the rock-grinding noise of the turrets' heads rotating around.

And if she or Ruboona falls off the edge of the tail, only the lone and level sands stretch far below. Ruboona hefts her shield on her left arm. "Ah, I..." Uncertainty bathes her voice in a distinct quiet. "...should be able to deflect their arrows of light." Her gaze dips onto the floor. "O our Goddesses, please lend me Your strength."

Words.

Link's words would lose her to the emptiness, and yet the creases in Ruboona's brow and around her eyes breaks through the ice around Link's fingers.

"I could try it," Link suggests, "if you're afraid."
"I'm not—" Ruboona presses her hands together. Closing her eyes, she pushes up the bridge of her nose with her index and middle fingers and breathes out. Link runs her fingers through her ponytail. Again she has said the wrong thing. Again the words that she plucks from the void would have better served her in silence rather than in speech. "I apologise for the outburst."

For want of words, Link simply rests her hand on Ruboona's shoulder and squeezes.

Ruboona demonstrates the flick of the shield that should deflect the fire-light back into the guardian's sensitive eye, and Link marches with the shield before her to try out the first turret headfirst. She takes the first.

The guardian turret chirps at her.

She holds up the shield. The automaton's eye blazes. She waits, preparing to flick her arm, and the fire-light crashes directly into the centre of the mirrored shield. The beam of fire-light streams off to the left to bolt through the sky; its heat leaves a crackly scent in the air as of a candle aflame.

Link glances at the shield. The surface of the diamonds has occluded still further. She holds it up again.

More quickly this time.

When Link angles the shield forward to catch the guardian's fire-light, she hears the click of its attack—only after her wrist has moved. A sudden force on her legs collides her face with the floor. The pain in her nose precedes a wet stickiness in her nostrils that dribbles onto the ground. She hears the fire-light sear the air just above her downed body.

Suddenly a broken nose seems preferable to a cauterised hole in her own stomach.

The turret charges up another beam. A vice grips Link's wrist to haul her up: Ruboona.

Ruboona, who takes the shield, who holds it in front of her and Link, who backs rapidly away, pushing Link behind her, until they escape from the automaton's gaze into the safety of the tunnel with the metal blocks on the wall.

Link bows in apology. Ruboona reassures her, and yet Link notices her take a worried look at the fog-gemmed shield. "Ah...another few direct hits, and we won't have a shield at all. O Goddesses, how I've failed You." Her eyelids lower. Link touches her shoulder once more. "...yet, I didn't see a terminal out there."

"You didn't?" Link pauses. "I didn't either. Huh."

She consults the slate. Ruboona leans on her shoulder to look on. "So, according to the map, the terminal looks like it's on the underside of Her tail. There should be a way to rotate or lift the tail." She closes her eyes. "Earlier, when I demonstrated with the topaz...I think that the electricity might activate a mechanism to raise it."

She cracks a topaz at the base of the wire. As expected the tail lifts up, but in its vertical state, the tail blocks the passage to the outside until electricity dies down and the tail falls. Link touches her chin.

Ruboona presses something hard into Link's free palm.

A shard of topaz.
Ruboona's timbre trembles as she explains her plan: while Link remains by the metal strip, Ruboona will work her way through the gauntlet of guardians to its tip. At her signal, Link will lift break the topaz, charge the metal with electricity, and thus lift the tail up. "If the terminal is on the underside...then, when the tail faces the vertical, the terminal should point out horizontally, shouldn't it?" Link cannot quite picture what Ruboona means, but she trusts Ruboona's judgment beyond her own. From the tip, Ruboona explains, she can glide down to stand on the horizontal terminal, and from there she can set the slate into the pedestal. Before Link has even started to sign her approval, Ruboona raises a hand. "When the tail goes back down, the terminal will point down again, and...there'll be nothing for me to stand on. So, I'll have to be fast." She touches her own chin, and Link cannot stop herself from mimicking the motion. "If the tail descends faster than I fall while gliding, I should be able to open the glider, wait for the tail to drop, and then land on the top face, Goddesses willing."

"If all else fails," Link says, her hands defrosted, "I'll catch you."

Ruboona arches her eyebrows. "Just that? No offer to make me a meal afterwards?"

Link bursts out laughing. "$I promise that too."

With the magnesis rune, Link moves the metallic blocks to form a circuit connecting the metal strip on the torso of the Divine Beast with the metal strip of the tail. In hindsight, with the topaz, she need only crack the jewel over the metal strip that runs through the tail. But something feels so right about completing the circuit that Link does so anyway.

Ruboona moves towards the edge of the tail with the slate and the paraglider opened. Taking a breath she starts to sprint forward along the edge. One by one the turrets stationed around the tail awaken to train their sights upon her. Link waits with the topaz held in the tongs. Her hands vibrate with the desire to crush the gem down to release its collected lightning, but she stays her hand. Only when she hears Ruboona yell her name does Link break the shard.

The topaz sparks. The electricity runs through the metal block into the strip. She hears gears below her feet groan. The resonances vibrates up her legs to shimmy her spine.

The tail rises up.

The guardians' fire-light shings around Ruboona, but the girl dodges them and leaps from the rising edge of the tail. The paraglider spreads. Through the increasingly small space between the tail and the wall of the passage, Link watches her glide downwards.

And then the tail thuds against the base of the Divine Beast's spine, now pointing directly at the heavens.

The entrance closes; the Divine Beast leaves her in darkness.

Link paces back and forth. The green sparks of electricity run their course and fizzle into nothingness. The gears groan again, more loudly this time, as the natural weight of the tail forces them to rotate back.

She pelts forward. The instant the tail has lowered enough for her hand to fit through the space between wall and tail, she shoves her entire left arm in and flails it.

Fingers intertwine with hers. Link reaches her other arm through the gap to grab Ruboona by the wrist just as the tension on her left hand increases a hundredfold. The tail continues to descend from its vertical position to its horizontal; Ruboona hangs off of the edge. With the material too smooth to gain purchase, Link senses herself sliding towards the precipice. She throws herself backwards as far as she can. Ruboona grunts in pain as Link drags her body over the edge. Her inertia sends her form straight into Link's and the two topple over together. Link's body cushions Ruboona's fall.

The latter looks up at Link. Link returns her gaze. The tail shinks into place and the two of them burst out laughing. Ruboona presses her face into Link's chest. Link can hear her companion's muffled words into her shirt: "Thank the Goddesses."

Link reaches up a hand to pat Ruboona's head. This elicits another round of mirth. When Link raises her eyebrows, Ruboona merely shakes her head while she tries to cover her mouth and fails to keep in the laughter pouring out of her.

Strange how two people can have such trust in one another despite not knowing one another for more than a day. For more than a few hours, even.

Strange how danger can bring strangers close. Strange how the cooking of food and the eating of meals can form a bond not of shared experience but of shared eating.

Strange, how—

The sudden chirping of guardian turrets brings both of them to blink at one another, and then Ruboona practically grabs Link—still slightly weakened from the effects of the elixir, brief moments of sprinting aside—and carries her over her shoulders into the tunnel of the tail. Ruboona trips on the crack between the tail and the torso and Link tumbles forward into a half-roll half-splatter. She wheezes a dry laugh out of her crumpled lungs.

"Only two more terminals, thank the Goddesses" Ruboona says between her fast breaths. "Thank you for catching me."

"Thanks for getting that terminal."

Link shifts to crouch upon the floor, balancing on the balls of her heels, while Ruboona sits cross-legged with the slate in her lap. The chest, and the head.

"There has to a way to reach them. If we can't get to them from the inside... then..." Ruboona closes her eyes. Link touches her chin. At the same time they snap their fingers at one another, pause, and then laugh. "Ah, right, where did you pick that up?"

"I don't remember," says Link.

Though she can recall one person whom she has seen snap like this.

A girl two years older than she, who typically wore a dark blue dress, who tied her scarlet hair back with an emerald-green hairband, who favoured a scimitar in her right hand and a shield in her left, who could not strum the harp but who played a mean lute, who unfairly bore the burdens of others upon her shoulders when she had her own burdens already pressing down on the back of her neck.

The terminal.

Ruboona and Link blurt out their ideas at the same time. To ride the tail up and try to walk over the Divine Beast's back to its head.

Link raises her hand, palm facing Ruboona, fingers outstretched. Ruboona looks at Link's hand and blinks, so Link carefully picks up Ruboona's arm by the wrist and presses her companion's palm against her own.

"I don't remember what it's called, but it's something you do when you've thought of the same thing, or agreed on something, or...or done something neat." Link shrugs. Ruboona nods. She holds out her hand, her expression level and grave. Link snorts. "It's supposed to be fun."

"Ah," says Ruboona. She closes her eyes and opens them again, then reaches with her hand so speedily that Link barely has time to react. Link taps her hand against Ruboona's. "So, like that?"

"Like that." Link smiles sheepishly at her. "I guess it's not a thing anymore, is it?"

"Not a thing anymore?" Ruboona echoes.

Sweat moistens the back of her neck. Link shakes her head.

Ruboona studies her. "Then, here's something that I've...seen." She giggles to herself as if laughing at an inside joke. "I don't have anyone to do it with usually, but. Here." She curls her fingers into a fist and presents her hand to Link. "You do the same and bump against my knuckles."

Link follows her lead. As soon as their fists connect, Ruboona spreads her fingers. Link emulates her. Ruboona catches Link's fingers between her own; she squeezes gently thrice, and Link squeezes back.

"So, it's like that."

Link nods. Ruboona's tight nervous smile has returned. Leaning back, Link gazes unsteadily at her companion to puzzle out what she has now said wrong.

Instead Ruboona ducks her head. "Sorry, it's...pretty silly, isn't it?"

Link swings her head from side to side. "I like it." She holds out her fist.

She watches Ruboona's gaze dart between her face and her fist and her eyes again. Then Ruboona brushes her knuckles against Link's. Link intertwines their fingers.

Ruboona hiccoughs a little noise in the back of her throat. "...thank you." She closes her eyes.

After a few moments of silence, Link stands up and Ruboona follows suit. They glance out at the tail.

"How are your legs?" Ruboona asks. Link tilts her head. "Ah, I didn't mean it like that. I noticed you've been limping a little. Did you get injured in the storm, or is this...?" Link explains about the elixir and the glass shard in her foot; Ruboona dips her head in understanding. "It did save your life from that lightning, if it hit you." She presses her hands together. "So, do you think you could run past those turrets? If we can get to the other end of the tail, we could raise it up."

Link touches her chin. "I think I can."

Ruboona glances her up and down. She retrieves the shield from her back. The once-shining surface has clouded over. "Then, hold this while you run. Just in case."

Link takes the shield in her hands. Cool and smooth to the touch. She brings the shield onto her stronger left arm and whirls around with it to see its weight. The metal and jewels weigh more than the pot lid she has used as a shield before. The effects of the elixir have lessened yet her legs still twitch and her limbs still move more sluggishly than her usual speed.

"I'm ready."

"Then, let's go."

Ruboona places a shard of topaz next to a cubic bomb on top of the metal wire. Link snaps her fingers appreciatively at her companion's insight. With the slate in hand, Ruboona squats into a runner's crouch at the base of the tail. Link does the same.

"On my count. We'll go up the right edge. Three...two...one."

They run.

The turrets awaken as soon as they near. Link holds up the shield. The fire-light of the guardians blazes behind them. The heat radiates in waves from the beams and the vaporisation of air sucks them back. She notices how Ruboona slows her pace to match her own; Link attempts to quicken her run yet she can feel how her heart thumps in straining to keep up with the demand of her aching muscles. She senses herself lagging. Her stride shortens and the pendulum swing of her legs decreases as if counting down to her final moments.

A sudden warmth at her right hand.

Ruboona's fingers between hers. Pulling her forward. Keeping their paces together. Link concentrates on her legs. When Ruboona throws her right leg forward, Link does the same; when Ruboona draws her left leg back, Link does the same; when Ruboona breathes, Link does the same.

The first row of guardian turrets. The second row. The third. And then the single fourth automaton, which awakens earlier than the others, while Link and Ruboona have yet seven paces to run. Its protected eye blazes. Inhaling, Link pushes the shield into Ruboona's arms to reach for her bow.

She lets go of Ruboona's hand.

Ruboona continues to run. From the corner of her vision, Link can see her slow and start to turn. The sapphire-tipped arrow from the quiver. The turret's eye shines more and more brightly. Fitting the arrow onto the string of the bow. The increasingly loud chirping of the turret's charging. Drawing back the string despite the weakness in her arms that shiver with the threat of snapping entirely like harp strings wound too taut. The blue fire-light the same colour as the sword that her body once carried on her back like a loftwing around her neck.

Her fingers uncurl.

She looses the arrow.

And suddenly the noise fades. The light darkens. The automaton falls still and silent.

So this is death.

The sapphire arrow sings forward. It arcs towards the ground and crashes against the turret just below the eye. The crackle of sapphire freezes water from the air itself. The ice spreads like a spilled bowl of soup or a violet ribbon upon a blue dress worn by a girl who lives on only in the memory of yesterday.

A yell.
A shout.

A scream from ahead of her.

"Run. Run! Run!"

Not death.

Not death, but stasis.

A force on her wrists drags her into motion. Without quitting her gaze from the guardian, Link pelts forward. Slowly. Far too slowly. Her marrow molten lead. Her joints fractured wood. Her blood ice and the crystals within her veins press against the inner walls.

They burst.

"I'm gonna detonate the bomb!" Ruboona yells. "So get ready to climb onto the top!"

Link starts to slide backwards. A vice around her lower jaw forces her head forward instead of back. Towards the future.

Link throws her arms forward onto the upper overhang at the end of the tail, a flat about two paces long. The edge bites into her armpits and chest. She pushes herself up to roll onto the end of the tail. Her entire body throbs with every beat of her heart. Her vision has blurred the sun into a vague yellow blob across half the sky. She closes her eyes.

Beneath her shoulder blades, the tail continues to move. The tail rises and flattens out, and then she feels it come to a grinding halt.

Her shoulders shake. No. Something else shakes her head.

"Link. Come on. We have to get off the tail before the electricity runs out."

Her eyelids flutter up to reveal Ruboona gazing down over her. Dipping her head, she extends an arm to grasp Ruboona's offered hand.

The overhang of the tail sits perfectly level with the top of the Divine Beast. By Ruboona's grip, Link pulls herself off of the tail to flop onto the Divine Beast's back.

Behind her the tail starts to churn downwards. While Link sways from foot to foot in exhaustion Ruboona clenches her fist. "I can't believe that worked, thank the Goddesses." She wipes her brow. "Link?"

Link nods wearily.

Ruboona draws herself up to her full height. Far from a scared young girl, she exudes an aura of—something—that makes Link straighten her back.

An aura she has felt before.

An aura of one forced to take on weights beyond her age, beyond her time, beyond her capabilities.

"Don't scare me like that again, Link." She exhales. "Please."

Link smiles sheepishly at her; Ruboona reaches up a hand to her forehead, to brace her thumb and forefinger against her right temple.
Link stands on the back of the Divine Beast. The sun has lowered, and the afternoon light—warm and gold as the rest of the honey currently bouncing around the inside of the cooking pot still strapped to her back—pools over the desert that the Divine Beast has treaded in the wake of its hooves. The sands stretch on to seeming infinities, though in the curves of the dunes Link can see where once lay ponds of water and bends of rivers. To the south, where the dunes give way to the sea that laps at the white. To the west the snowy mountains on the coast of the land once known as Hyrule stretch up to the clouds; in their shadow formed the original Parapan desert that the Divine Beast has tracked further and further to the north and to the east.

The gentle sands and the dance of the wind and the sand upon their crests, bathed in the light so golden she can imagine cupping her palms and dipping her hands in the troughs between the dunes to drink the sunlight, harbours a beauty of its own.

Yet the promise of grass and plant, of beast and fowl, of the people once more inhabiting the land, would bring something even more beautiful.

For all of the wilds combined cannot sit at a campfire and share stew from a communal cooking pot.

Two gold domes in the semblance of a camel's humps rise from the back of the Divine Beast Vah Naboris. The door opens by a press of the appropriate button on the slate, unlocked with the map terminal. Ruboona and Link step through into the circular chamber that resembles a lift. Immediately the shrill call of a guardian sentry from overhead prompts Link to look up. An arrow through the eye and Ruboona—turned into a gerudo-shaped spear by virtue of Link's powerful toss—thrusting her sword to cut the sentry in twain leave them alone in the lift.

A metal crank on the side lowers and raises the lift by use of the magnesis rune. As they pass by the central layer of the hump, Ruboona points out a strange metal sphere. Link steps forward to puts her hand on it.

The resultant shock blows her backwards into Ruboona. Link elbows her in the stomach. Rolling off of her, Link apologise profusely until her hands hurt; Ruboona laughs it off.

"So, you should take sphere with us. You never know when you'll find use for it. The Goddesses don't just let things like that lie around for no reason, you know."

Link brings the metal sphere onto the lift with magnesis but keeps it on the other end of the lift. When she magnetises the crank once more, the metal attracts the sphere. With a loud scrape along the bottom of the lift, the sphere snaps to the crank.

A sphere affixed to the crank by magnetism, in turn, makes pulling the crank difficult, if not impossible. Link jerks repeatedly on the crank. The sphere bangs against the floor of the lift. Ruboona covers her ears with her palms.

Finally Link bangs the sphere enough times that it dislodges and flies off. Throwing herself to the floor, she finds Ruboona ducking as the sphere collides off of the wall of the lift and crashes back onto the ground.

Ruboona shoves the golden helmet onto her head. She reaches for the metal sphere and Link yelps, but when girl's palms connect with the steel Link sees the green gemstones in the helmet start to shimmer; the sphere does not shock her as it shocked Link.

While Ruboona holds the sphere in place, Link downs the lift all the way.
And then: a splash.

The bottom of the lift splishes down onto something liquid. The crank ceases to turn. Link breaks the slate's magnesis-connection to the crank and instead turns it onto the metal sphere.

"Ah," Ruboona says; Link glances at her. She has closed her eyes, her lips pursed, her eyebrows bunched together. "I can't imagine that there's enough topaz in there to have kept that—" A word Link does not know. "—electrified for so long. I don't understand. Has someone been in Savah Naboris all this time? There has to be something going on here. Could She not run on electricity after all?"

Link asks for the word and Ruboona answers: battery, a word Link has not heard before, but which designates a store of electricity. Link nods. While Ruboona, thinking, sways back and forth on her feet and folds her hands over one another, Link takes a step into the hallway beyond the lift. Her boot splashes down into the liquid about a thumb's length deep on the floor.

Ruboona steps after her. Link hears her gasp and looks back. Her companion has folded her hands behind her. With a hint of embarrassment in the duck of her head, she nods at her own feet, at the more comfortable shoes—which replaced her waterproof boots, eaten away by malice—that have now bloated with water.

Link offers to carry her, and Ruboona politely declines. They shuffle on through the hallway, though they cannot locate the apparent source of the water. Nor do they spot anything resembling guardians or other security.

Halfway through the hallway, Ruboona and Link find two identical circular depressions approximately the same diameter as the metal sphere; beyond that, covered in wiring, waits another lift that appears to lead up into the second hump. Link nudges Ruboona and grins. Her companion smiles back, and Link takes note of the spark of pride in how she carries herself. She sets the sphere down into the first impression.

They cross the hallway to the second hump and its lift.

Link opens the door.

A single glowing blue eye greets them.

Link closes the door.

She and Ruboona exchange a glance.

Link speaks first. She waves her hands around so violently that the slate ejects from her grip to smack into the ceiling. Ruboona catches it in her palms on its way down. "I don't think there's another route to the terminals."

"Then," Ruboona answers with a huff as she takes her left hand from the surface of the slate, "we should prepare to fight that guardian." She glances down at the slate. "The blue runes summon remote explosives. The yellow causes something to suspend for a brief moment. The pink...red...whatever colour this is serves as a magnet, I think. What about the white and the green?"

Link demonstrates the function of the pictobox to Ruboona. She takes a pictograph of the two of them together, Ruboona smiling despite the guardian in the chamber beside them, Link looking slightly more slack-jawed and blank-eyed. She has never been able to force a smile.
And yet, then she considers the calming of another Divine Beast beside someone with the same understanding of the importance of food as she, considers the girl who reminds her of Aryll—and of Yunobo, and of Amali and her daughters, and of Malon and of Vish and of Cremia and of Romani, and of Koko and of Cottla, and of the girl who smelled of horses, and of the girl with the golden hair, and of every person she has ever met who has taken to life with that same earnestness and passion and love—who has come so far to calm the Divine Beast that she would go without slate.

The corners of her lips curl upwards and the second pictograph catches her in the middle of her light little laugh.

When the four Divine Beasts have calmed at last, she will take a journey to Tabantha, to Medli, to see Amali and her children and to check up on Koko and Cottla. Then, to Eldin, to see Yunobo. Then, perhaps to wherever Hestu lives, to see Hestu, to prepare for them a meal that will not set them on fire. Then to Hateno, at last, to turn over the parts of the guardians to Purah, though she will have no need of the slate by then. And then to Romani Ranch.

When her journey to calm the Divine Beasts ends, her work will begin. To piece together her body's history. To understand what came of those fragmented names and faces that dance through her memories. To start the process of determining where her body ends and she begins.

But for now she has two more Divine Beasts to calm and a guardian to dispatch.

When Link breaks herself from her reminiscence, she observes Ruboona browsing through the other pictographs stored on the pictobox. Link looks on, her chin on Ruboona's shoulder, at the album of pictographs that she has never noticed before.

She remembers taking some of these. The pictograph of herself and Ilia, and of Amali's children and Tulin, and of herself stuck in the underwater hole in the Divine Beast Vah Medoh. Ruboona inquires about the last one and Link blushes from her toes to her ears; her earrings could melt for the heat of her flushed skin.

And alongside the pictographs that Link herself has taken, she discovers finds a flood of others that she has never seen. Pictographs of scenery, of flowers, of frogs in the pond and of beetles on trees, of ruins, of ancient books scripted in looping characters with the pages flaking off, of the Divine Beasts—inert—and of guardians in various states of repair, of villages that Link has never seen, of towns that she cannot recall, of the castletown that she knows from her memories, of Aryll, of Impa, of Daruk, of Revali, of the zora girl with the shark teeth, of Urbosa.

Many, many pictures of Urbosa.

In some of them, Urbosa smiles. In others, she has a more neutral expression as she demonstrates something: a lute, a shield, a doohickey for which Link has no words. Several of the pictographs appear candid: Urbosa cleaning out her horse's stable. Urbosa—blurry—in the midst of a jump with her sword drawn. Urbosa examining a map on a table. Urbosa with her head tilted back, laughing, her lips parted in a grin. Many of those, in fact.

And there, at the very end, a few pictures of—Herself.

Ruboona says nothing of the pictographs except to return the slate to the seven runes. She jabs a finger at the last icon. "And the white rune?"
Cryonis.

Link focuses. On cryonis. On the guardian. Yes. Those things that currently and materially exist. From the water at the bottom of the hallway, Link raises a pillar of ice to protect herself and Ruboona.

Ruboona prepares her sword and shield. Link readies a sapphire arrow. She keeps the slate in her left hand, flat against the limbs of the bow. With her thumb, she taps open the door.

The guardian.

An automaton wielding a long blade of fire-light in one of its rotating not-quite-metal limbs and a shield in another.

Sword and board.

Link looses the arrow. It does not hit the guardian in the eye but forms a sheet of frost around its head. The automaton responds with a blast of fire-light that breaks the ice and simultaneously knocks it backwards.

Water pours into the lift.

She scrambles over the column of ice while the guardian rights itself and proceeds to sear through the centre of the shield. Her hands steady. Link aims under the automaton's legs. The resultant pillar of ice knocks it over. Its limbs thrash. Ruboona hups over the destroyed fragments of ice. As Link continuously makes pillars of ice to trap the guardian, Ruboona reaches the hooked sword in between the columns to claw off its legs. Link laughs at how effectively they've corralled the automaton——and then part of her right forearm goes completely numb as though entirely ceasing to exist.

The fire-light has passed between two of the pillars. She can smell the crackle of the air in its wake. Through the feathered tunic, through the undershirt, the upper layer of her skin of her lower forearm, near her elbow, has ceased to exist.

In its place Link can see the red raw fury of her own muscle beneath the skin. She stares at the blood that begins to ooze out from the patch of her—not skin anymore.

The air makes contact with the meat of her bone; the screams rips through her entire body.

She drops to her knees. The water splashes up onto her lower legs. The guardian becomes two, swims and blurs and fades at the edges.

Link bites down on her own lower lip.

The sharpness of the pain of her front teeth and the tang of copper in her mouth focuses her attention. She keeps her left hand in position, propping up her elbow against the floor. The slate. The automaton. Drawing up barriers of ice to protect Ruboona. To protect Ruboona. To protect Ruboona.

Over and over and over.

Without any gaps.

Without any breaks.
Until she has ripped the guardian limb from limb from limb from limb from limb from limb. Until she has torn its entrails from its innards. Until she has stabbed through with that terrible hooked sword to its very core.

Until the automaton falls still.

Then, and only then, does she allow herself to give in to the darkness.

Agony in her right forearm.

The pain sears up her arm and down her spine to convulse her limbs and spasm her head. Her teeth grit together. Her jaws clamp upon something in her mouth, something that tastes strangely sweet. A round sort of sweetness that softens the blow of the agony.

Her eyes shoot open.

She lies down on a hard surface. A figure kneels over her, a figure with two bunches of hair on either side of her head, a figure with a gaze so gentle and full of softness that Link finds the peace to close her eyes.

Aryll.

Her sister bears something light in her palm that she runs over Link's arm. Slowly the pain fades, and Link slips back into the darkness.

When she comes to once more, she leaps to her feet. Her left hand flies to her forearm. Between the blackened edges of her undershirt, she feels a thick layer of gauze.

"Link?"

She twists around towards the voice.

Ary—Ruboona. Ruboona seated by the iron cage with the fire. And a skillet over it. The scent of something caramelising.

Next to the main terminal.

The map terminal.

Now on the floor, with the four statues. The lizard, the bird, the camel, the elephant.

Her eyes widen.

The terminals could not have been a dream—

"Link. Thank the Goddesses." Ruboona closes the half-metre gap between them. She skims her palm over Link's arm. Link tracks the sensation until it ends—a abruptly—near her elbow and then reappears—just as abruptly—lower on her forearm. "I cauterised the wound. Can you..." She hesitates. "You can move your arm, can't you?" Link tries to flex. Her arm follows her motions, though the skin around the wound aches when it stretches, and Ruboona presses her fingers against one another. "O our Goddesses, thank You for keeping Link safe." Link listens to her murmur out a prayer to the Golden Goddesses and to the Goddess Sageru. Then her breath hitches and Link flinches back. Ruboona pats herself down for a water-skin that she presents to Link, who guzzles it down with gusto.

She did not feel the parchedness of her throat until the lubrication of water. Ruboona asks a thousand questions about her injuries, about how Link feels, about how much she remembers. When her companion seems satisfied that Link is, in fact, alive, and will not, in fact, perish, Ruboona sits back.

"Thank you for...for saving my life. Ah, even—even injured as you were, you..." The tremors in her voice crack the edges of her syllables, pitch the low of her vowels. "...you still kept me safe with cryonis. So thank you. Thank you, and...

"And I'm sorry."

The water-skin plummets from her mouth into her lap. Link tilts her head to one side.

"Ah, I should have kept watch over you while you were asleep." Ruboona looks down upon her own two hands. "I made sure you were stable. Then, I went to activate the last two terminals myself. I thought about what you told me...about how knowing how long Savah Naboris would keep calm, and I did not want to test Her patience." She grimaces at herself. "I understand if you would not forgive me."

Link rubs the back of her head. The ponytail bobs in a slightly different position than usual. Her hair must have come undone; Ruboona must have re-tied it. As Link unties her hair to fix her ponytail, she raises her eyebrows at her companion.

"There's nothing not to forgive," she signs in a jumble of motion. "Thank you for saving my life. For fixing up the wound and everything. For being able to take care of the guardians like—" She rummages for a suitable analogy. "—like you took care of those meat skewers. Delicious, I mean." Link stops, and then her fingers commence moving once more. "The guardian's not delicious, though if there's a way to cook monsters, then there's probably a way to cook guardians, too. But what you do with the guardians is. Well. It's not delicious but it's sort of the same kind of sort of if you squint—" She makes looping gestures as if trying very hard to conjure a wheel out of thin air.

Ruboona lifts her hand to her mouth. Link recoils, but then her companion breaks out in laughter.

"Link...I don't know where you came from, but thank you for coming." She smiles, and Link grins toothily back. "And thank you for lending me the Hero's slate." Ruboona reaches behind her. She presents Link with two orange objects of the slippery material: the first a rounded triangle of sorts, and the second the hilt of a blade. "These were recovered from the guardian, thank the Goddesses. You mentioned that we needed our own weapons of light, didn't you? Then, I considered it best to bring them for you."

Link accepts the two. She tries out the sword; Ruboona scrambles backwards as she makes a wild swing. Next, the shield, which Link cannot figure out how to make apparate from the rounded-triangle-thingy and thus abandons. Besides, she has her trusty pot lid, and if she cannot deflect her foes with the same thing she has used as an impromptu plate for her suppers before, then why even live at all? As Ruboona observes, Link flourishes the sword into the sheathe. And then, just as her fingers have uncurled from the hilt, her stomach rumbles.

Ruboona covers her laugh with her hand. "...then, do you want some?" She lifts the saucepan from the grill cage and holds it out to Link. Within its depths, Link peers at several golden-brown chunks of something melty and reflective, something in-between caramel and taffy. She reaches in. "Ah, careful. They're hot."

A square of heated honey, mixed with something else that she can neither name nor care to name. In her mouth the crunchiness of the candy gives way to a melted smoothness that coats the inside of her mouth. The warmth and richness of the taste drain the exhaustion from her body and the fatigue from her mind. Her vision clears. Every sound sharpens. She could heft the Divine Beast over her head and suplex the entire height of Death Mountain. She could, in this very moment, crunch down a deliciously grilled rock roast.

Honey candy.

Honey candy.

Honey candy on a ceramic plate.

She heard Urbosa weeping, once.

In the dark of the night. By the campfire. En route between one village for training and the next. Link awoke in the darkness beneath the ripeness of a nearly waxed moon with the need to urinate. And there she heard Urbosa whispering to herself. A dialect of Parapan that Link could only half-understand. Of promises she had to keep. Of the people she had to protect. Of the strength she needed to keep her heart pumping through the apocalypse. Of the endurance to mediate the tensions of the Princess, the Knight, the Champions, the King, and the Princess's shade, and whoever else the Goddesses might send.

"I trust You," Urbosa murmured fervently, "but sometimes I can't see how You expect us all to work as a team when we can't even figure out what to eat for breakfast."

Link simply closed her eyes as though asleep, or dead, or both. She had not the words. And yet— Link vowed to herself that when she did, she would return all of the favours Urbosa had given to her.

And where she could not bring words, she could bring food.

During their final match with one another, Link had come her closest to besting Rhibonne. Afterwards Rhibonne gave her a final few tips and thanked her for the chance to be her teacher.

Link thanked her, in turn, for the chance to be her student.

And then, she asked of the food eaten in Rovah. If Rhibonne was familiar.

Rhibonne knew little of Rovah, but she inquired up the food chain. The information travelled slowly until Link added that she wanted to cook something for Urbosa.

Suddenly she had recipe upon recipe at hand. Everyone, it seemed, loved Urbosa. And how they spoke of her, stars or mist in their eyes, and of the deeds they had witnessed at her hands—from the cessation of conflicts to the bringing-down of entire molduga that had terrorised a village—marked her, more than Link had ever before imagined, as the Hero of Parapa in the realest sense.

Here she could see the people that Urbosa had aided. Not just in song, or in legend, or in official documentation heralding her as a Hero and a Champion, but in the faces of the people who lived in the here and now and who passed on the deliciousness of Urbosa's childhood to Link's hands.

Recipes of salted durian, of creamy seal's milk stew, of fried banana: Urbosa's favourite, though she ate it as an infrequent delicacy.

And of candied honey.

Link made candied honey. With banana vinegar and vanilla and nutmeg. She boiled the banana vinegar and the honey into a thick syrup and tested its readiness by spinning a thread of syrup between her thumb and forefinger and dropping the thread into a bowl of cool water. When the threads became brittle, she quit the pan from the flame to add a touch of nutmeg and a few droplets of vanilla, then stored the covered pan in a sapphire ice-box. She waited. The sun set; the moon rose; the candy broke apart in her hands to bite-sized segments.

Crunchy candy that would turn chewy in her mouth and then melt away entirely.

Honey candy on a ceramic plate.

On the evening of their last night in the village Link rapped on the door of Urbosa's room. Urbosa opened it, her features arranged in her easy smile, her baggy blue pyjamas slightly bedraggled, her mass of hair loose around her shoulders.

Without a word Link held up the plate.

Arching her eyebrows, Urbosa held one of the honeyed chunks between thumb and forefinger. Link watched her take the candy into her mouth on her tongue. She started to ask if something was wrong.

Then Link observed her swallow.

Oh-so-slowly Urbosa's eyebrows lost their angular slant, and the thin line of her mouth curved upwards, and her lips parted in an exhale that gave way to a laugh. Her shoulder shook, and then her upper torso, and then her entire body. She laughed and she laughed and she laughed and the sound of her letting go brought Link to laugh alongside her for the sheer joy of being alive. "You know, Link," Urbosa managed between fits of laughter, "the quickest way to someone's heart is through their stomach. You don't need me telling you that though. You've got it down to an art."

Link smiled sheepishly at her.

"Link, can I ask a question?" She nodded. Urbosa exhaled. She lifted her hair to run through the hair cascading down her shoulders. "Why...are you so afraid of me, and the other Champions?"

She remembers—

"...Link." Ruboona's stare fixates upon the space between her knees. Link glances at her, dispelling the weight of Urbosa's gaze. "You said that you don't know how long Savah Naboris will allow us to guide Her. But I won't let this last year repeat. I apologise for asking even more of you when I barely know you, but would you be willing to—" Her eyelids shutter down. Her lashes rest against the curve of her cheeks. "—to cleanse the malice from Lady Urbosa?" She spreads her fingers on her knees. Her lashes glisten wetly. "Walking Savah Naboris to somewhere where I could draw upon those with expertise in arms might take too long, and as qu—and I fear She could return to Her rampage close to the lives of the innocent. I—"

Link tests the strength of her right arm. She flexes. She lifts up her cooking pot. She rotates her wrist.

Her arm has grown weaker; too-sharp movements throb a dull pain into the base of her muscle to shudder a sensation of static down to the quick. But beyond that, she retains nearly her full range of motion.

Lifting her gaze towards Ruboona, she nods decidedly. "I'm here to calm the Divine Beast. That includes fighting the Malice." For an instant Ruboona's features remain smooth, and then her expression collapses inwards like the Divine Beast had tossed her into the thunderstorm with Link's own hands controlling the slate. "...to cleanse the malice from Urbosa. I-I mean, Lady Urbosa. I'm sorry."

Ruboona inclines her head. "Ah, I suppose you did not know her as Lady Urbosa." Link hides her mouth in her right palm. "I believe that...if we cleanse this malice, then her spirit, at last, will be free. I hope that she would look on us proudly."

"She'd have no reason not to be proud of you," Link signs. The words come to her so swiftly that she recognises she has said them before.

Her companion raises her chin. Her dark eyes glimmer in the light of the flames from the iron cage. By now, Link realises, night has fallen over Parapa, and the inside of the Divine Beast lies dark save for the glow of the pedestal and the flicker of the fire.

"Together," says Link. "We'll cleanse Urbosa. Lady Urbosa, I mean."

Ruboona closes her eyes again. Her shoulders quiver; a thin film of tears shines on her cheeks. "Together."

When Link brings her hands to her own eyes, dampness gleams on her own fingers.

And above her, like a sword hanging over her head, pulsates the chrysalis.

—

Energising Honey Candy (two hearts, two-fifths stamina vessel) - courser bee honey

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Link gets stasis used on her! It was the only way that Ruboona (who is lighter than Link given their relative ages) could hoist lift over the edge of the platform.

Remember in a previous chapter how Link heard something impossibly heavy crash down at the back end of Vah Naboris? Yep, it was the tail!

The thing that Link tries to get Ruboona to do is, of course, a high-five.

Hey, this is that chapter! Here's Link's big realisation/character moment thanks for Ri —I mean Ruboona! The wilds are great and all, and Link does indeed have big issues with communication and with people, but what Link really loves doing is cooking for and eating with others. It's her way of talking to people. All of the wilds combined...

Hey, it's all of the pictographs that Link has taken in Delicious in Wilds so far, including the one of her getting stuck in Vah Medoh. Ruboona's masterfully graceful at trying not to make Link feel awkward.

Really, Link hasn't done as much exploring of the slate as one would expect, since she mostly just uses it to access the runes and doesn't really know how to "work it" so to speak; she hasn't looked at the map, since she's been drawing her own on parchment, and before Ri—I mean Ruboona opened the album containing the pictographs, Link wouldn't have ever seen the pictographs Zelda had taken.

And Zelda took pictures of everyone! Including many of Urbosa, and also some of Link, which surprises her given that Zelda has been mostly negative towards Link in the memories Link has remembered so far, although not entirely. The bit about Urbosa looking down at a map on the table is a very minor reference to Twilight Princess and Telma's bar, which is one of the coziest locations in the game.

You can actually flip guardians over in-game by using cryonis to put up pillars of ice beneath them. Try it in one of the pond areas during or just after it rains (which changes the elevation of water), like those in Ash Swamp.

The ancient (guardian) weapons activate in the moment of the strike. The guardian shield activates in the moment of detecting something approaching. Think about it this way: since the malice can eat through pretty much anything (the material that the Divine Beasts and slate are made of is resistant but not entirely), so the best thing to do is to create and re-create temporary shields that will eat the malice.

Link receives quite an injury here! The guardian's laser only just grazed her right arm, but that still took off her upper layer of flesh. Ouch! It's no wonder that she fainted from the pain.

Link becoming rejuvenated by the honey is the effect of it being energising honey candy! Mechanical accuracy and all of that!

Languages have many dialects. For example, France had a wide variety of dialects prior to the efforts at unifying the language and teaching everyone what was then merely the Parisian dialect of French. Similarly, Link learned the Nabooru dialect of Parapa as it was the most 'commonly' understood; Urbosa slips back into her native northeastern/Rovah dialect, which Link can understand due to similarity, but which much more difficulty.

Ruboona prefers to use the terminology "clearse the malice" from Urbosa's body rather than fight Thunderblight Ganon, since she wishes to release Urbosa's spirit, which under the tradition of Sageru can only occur with the burning of the body to release that which is within (contrast: Teba discussing murdering the Malice).

Up next: the big bad malice, and a doozy of a chapter.

midna's ass. 05 October 2017.

Beta reader's comments: I love pictographs! Link taking them is always really cute, and here seeing pictures of Urbosa taken so long ago is a real emotional kick to the shins, especially given what's coming.

This chapter begins the "oh my god that must really hurt" train for Link.

Link getting stasis used on her is one of my favourite moments in this series.

The chapter I've been talking about is finally about to arrive - next chapter is a doozy.

Emma. 05 October 2017.
Cleansing the Divine Beast at last, the travelling chef aids the Parapan food enthusiast in becoming the new Champion of Sageru, as the chef recounts the story-of-the-chef’s-life that the chef told to the former Champion of Sageru.

To all my readers: please note that the fight against Thunderblight Ganon is somewhat more horrific than has been in other chapters. If you wish to skip it, it begins at the paragraph starting with "The Malice collides with the floor." and ends with the paragraph starting with "The pieces of terminal and turret clamour to the ground in a crash so loud that Link's ears ring the bells of victory." I'm not sure how much you can safely skip, but my beta reader informed me that the fight is more graphic than the fights against Fireblight or Windblight, so I figured I would throw in a warning.

As usual, notes that didn't fit in the end: I had to flex my horror muscles to properly convey how horrifying Thunderblight Ganon is. As Link says, Fireblight and Windblight were also horrific and repulsive to her, but it's only when she sees what the malice has done to another human being (Urbosa) that she really gets it.

Of course, the most effective weapon against the malice is guardian weapons, and what better than the guardians' own lasers? Pew pew. They were built for destroying malice after all.

I wish that Gerudo Town had been more colourful and lived-in as far as the actual walls of the city go, and similar with the other locations in the game. Since I made the Parapans more religious in Delicious in Wilds, albeit religious in a different way that the spiritual Lanayrish, I thought that they would express their deep ties to their history and faith through the arts, including music and art.

I love describing marketplaces. Each one's unique.

Link finds it easier to express herself around kids because of a lesser sense of judgment/fear of retribution if she gets something wrong.

Here we get that big backstory for Link! Not only do I provide new information here, but I've also strung together what we've learned so far about Link's childhood, since this (well, technically the chapter after this) is the halfway point of the story.

No, the title doesn't refer to the Yiga. Rather, the Yiga's association with bananas has to do with where their hideout is, straddling northeastern Parapa/western Faron, which is precisely where bananas grow the most and also why Urbosa is familiar with it. Though there actually is another banana-related chapter name that is in fact and indeedy-do about the most wonderful Yiga.

The "name that Link hasn't used" is referring to Link's name from before she chose the name Link for herself when she came out as a girl, i.e. the name that Link's parents gave her (her "deadname", in transgender parlance). Mipha knew Link before she came out. How? We'll answer that in future chapters.

Urbosa and Zelda are pretty cute together; so is Link and Urbosa's friendship.

As always, a kind thank-you to my beloved beta reader, Emma, who has valiantly endeavoured to continue to work with me even as she had to move around. And a kind thank-you to you, the reader, for bearing with my various computer delays and the like.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Together Link and Ruboona stand before the main terminal. The statue of the camel submerges them in its empty gaze: she who has stolen the body of the former chosen one to riddle it with delicious food and terrible scars, and she who has chosen to trek over the expanse of the desert forged in the wake of the Divine Beast to calm it for the sake of her beloved Parapa.

Together they stand.

Link glances at Ruboona at her left, who has closed her eyes and entwined her fingers. She murmurs prayers to the Golden Goddesses. Inclining her head in respect, Link kneels down herself upon the floor in front of the terminal. She withdraws another crackle of honey candy from her pocket. Out of her sincerest wishes, she offers the sweet up on her palm to the Goddesses in supplication and in thanks.

"Then, do all followers of Sahylia," Ruboona whispers with a hint of a smile in her timbre, "place so much importance on food?"

Link breaks the candy in half. Ruboona accepts one of the pieces. "Don't you?" she asks. Ruboona laughs around the candy in her mouth.

Her companion extends her arm. Link gazes at the palm in front of her face, at the creases and wrinkles of her skin, at the slightly lighter and redder tone of brown on her palm compared to that on the back of her hand, at the layer of callouses on her fingertips and along the inner rim of her forefinger and thumb, though not as calloused as Link might have expected from the hands of an adventurer. The skin soft, the nails neatly clipped and painted blue; the polish has chipped and cracked, and yet the blue remains.

Link slides her fingers over Ruboona's. Ruboona grips her hand tightly. Curling the fingers of her right into a fist, Link offers the gesture of celebration to her companion.

Ruboona laughs. "Isn't it a little early for that?" With her hands occupied, Link cannot respond in word, but she makes a motion with her head and with her eyes. Then Ruboona's pupils dilate in understanding. "Then, once we have cleansed Lady Urbosa, I promise I'll return it. Keep me to that."

Link nods.

And then: the slate.

Link holds onto the right edge with her left hand, Ruboona onto the left edge with her right.
Three.

Two.

One.

Together they slot the slate onto the terminal. Together they watch as the black crystal begins to fill with blue. Together they listen to the chrysalis above pulsate, and throb, and then burst open like a rotten fruit.

Link and Ruboona jump—Link to the right, and Ruboona to the back—as the innards of the heart shower them and the floor with purple fluid. Eyes widening, Link moves into a sudden jig to flail her limbs and get as much of the liquid off as possible before the malice can burn through her flesh; it takes her a moment to realise that not only has she remained unharmed, but also the fluid carries a different scent than the oil spewed by the Malice of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania. The liquid sticks to her skin and her clothing; she notices the residue of small white crystals forming here and there on her flesh. Like saltwater.

She blinks.

From the centre of the unfurled heart, the cocooned Malice swings, back and forth, as the pulsing arteries that support the chrysalis break off one by one to spray their fluid in cut-jugular fountains. Ruboona brings out her sword and shield; Link draws the guardian's fire-light sword to hold in two hands.

As the Malice continues to swing over their heads, Ruboona shoves the sword back into its sheathe. "Link! Link—your arrows!" Link drops the swords to grasp her bow and notch a sapphire area while Ruboona rolls forward, lunging for the pedestal. Link leans back, takes her stance, and then fires the arrow into the heart of the Malice.

The ice blossoming around the Malice slows the speed of its swing. Ruboona's hand closes around the slate. She jerks it from the terminal so roughly that the slate flies up towards the ceiling. As she fumbles to catch it from the air, Link looses another arrow, maintaining the blanket of frost. The heart of the Malice has almost entirely ceased to move and hangs downwards, rotating in place.

Ruboona clutches the slate in her hands.

Link looses an arrow one more time just as the final artery connected to the tattered chrysalis rips in half. Fluid showers from its stump. The Malice falls. Link yells. Ruboona swivels around and rolls out of the way. Her feet smash against the floor. The comfortable shoes slip against the ground. As Link watches her companion's body angle forward, she prepares to sprint—arms readied to catch—but Ruboona picks herself up.

The Malice collides with the floor.

Its corpse splatters up against the ground. Limbs writhing, it stretches its head up at an angle that would have broken its neck if not for its malevolent form. It rises slowly to its feet.

Link can feel her stomach lurch. The skewered meat, the salted encore, and the honey candy shuttle up her throat at once. The acrid acid stings at the bottom of her mouth; the vomit suddenly floods her mouth as though a boil of pus had burst on her tongue. She retches violently onto her own boots.

She has seen gorons, and she has seen rito, and the Malice of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania and the Malice of the Divine Beast Vah Medoh bore forms that twisted and desecrated the bodies of those whom she had once kept among her counsel of allies if not friends. Yet she does not know gorons and she does know not rito as she knows humans, as she knows hylians and sheikah and gerudo. The bloated body of Urbosa—of the first Champion of Sageru with whom she ever trained, of the Hero of Parapa who taught her to wield the very sword that seals the darkness, of the Divine Beast Vah Naboris's pilot who broke through the thorny silence that she had wrapped around herself as an aegis—brings another round of vomit to her lips.

The body's skin has stretched almost to the point of breaking to accommodate the malice inside. The pale papery stretch of flesh bulges and recedes with the movements of malice within, spread so thin that at any second—Link fears—the malice could break free and splatter over. The way that the malice crawls just under the surface of the skin reminds Link of a cluster of maggots that have eaten away the inside of a rotted corpse, that could come burrowing up through its flesh to emerge, wriggling and writhing. Its arms bulge, not with the natural toned musculature of a swordmaster's, but repulsively, like thick beads upon a cord rather than human arms. Its legs flow unnaturally downwards as thick columns into wide feet that squish outwards against the floor. Its limbs have grown too long and its body far too short, the hips nonexistent and the shoulders too small, the waist simultaneously bloated out, like a gas-filled corpse, and yet too thin, like a malnourished skeleton. The outline of the cadaver's ribs presses in against the skin stretched so tight. The gut-like malice bulges forward as the stomach to hang and to swing from the space between the ribs. The Malice stands taller than Urbosa did in waking life, slender and elongated. Its face melts and reforms in turn. From the tips of its long fingers, the saltwater-like fluid drips to the ground, splashing on the floor in sticky rings. A human corpse starved of food and then filled with writhing maggots, its limbs stretched out until the bones pop out of their sockets and pull apart, until the sinews rip and the tendons tear and the malice plugs up the chasm. Eaten away from the inside out. The Malice crawling into the spaces of organs, submerging the blood and entering through the arteries to the lungs to bathe the very breaths with violet bubbles mixing in with the blood gushing up from a heart and stomach and liver and intestines dissolved away, the spine compressed in to the point that it folds inwards and breaks through the ribs to protrude out as the stomach, as though something had stabbed the corpse through from the back to the front.

Link wonders, suddenly, just how the Champions met their end. She wonders, suddenly, if the death came upon them all at once, or if—

Ruboona screams. The tail. The exit at the tail. Their only chance. Link looses one more sapphire arrow directly into the Malice's feet. Ice forms around its ankles, although, with the moisture already sucked from the air by previous arrows, the effects have lessened. The shards of frost puncture the Malice's papery skin, and the violet malice beneath floods the icy prison. Even in the split second that Link looks back, the Malice begins to eat the ice away. She grabs the hilt of the fire-light sword—coated in the slime of her own vomit—and follows Ruboona.

They run towards the tail. Abruptly, something flies in an arc in front of them; Ruboona and Link both stop at the same time. Heart clenched, Link glances over her shoulder. The Malice catches the spinning shield—the one it just threw—in its left hand.

The shield.

The shield that Link knows so well. The shield and the scimitar favoured by the Champion of Sageru, the Hero of Parapa, the Divine Beast Vah Naboris's Pilot, O Courageous Urbosa.

Link draws her sword. When she slices down, the fire-light blade springs out, bright enough to set her vision aflame.

The Malice opens its malformed toothless mouth, and violet fluid strings from the roof to its tongue. It roars. Threads of purple saliva spill forward from its maws to coat the ground. Ruboona's hair has plastered against her scalp and face with the saltwater-like fluid dredged up from the Malice's innards. The Malice spits out another wave.

Ruboona and Link exchange glances.

Link nods and she nods back.

Rolling to the Malice's right and then forward, Link leaps into the air and cleaves down with the fire-light blade. The Malice dodges to the left, but Link has already started to spin on her heel: the sword bites in through the Malice's ribs. The blade hits bone. Malice gushes from the wound; Link jumps back to avoid the spray, but a sudden pinprick of pain on her right leg indicates a droplet of Malice.

Ruboona brings out a bomb from the slate. She shouts for Link to move. The Malice lifts its arms above Link. Link flips backwards over herself, but the Malice dashes too quickly towards her. The tip of Urbosa's scimitar impales a strike of pain through Link's left foot and slams into the ground by her left side.

Caught by the flesh of her stabbed-through foot, Link falls.

Her head smashes into the floor. Her spine aches against the ground. Her vision swims. Her foot burns. The Malice looms overhead. It brings Urbosa's shield down upon Link's head; Link jerks her entire body to the right. The strain pulls the scimitar stuck inside of her leg, and she cannot help the scream that rips out from her stomach at the tearing of skin and the cleaving of her muscle.

She grips the fire-light blade in her left hand. Ruboona yells something at her. Suddenly the Malice lurches forward. Its back takes the brunt of the explosion of Ruboona's bomb and she hears the splatter of malice on either side. While its claw-like fingers shudder over Urbosa's shield, Link thrusts the sword up to catch the Malice's melting face. The fire-light blade slides into where its throat would have been and carves upwards.

She has not time to sign her apology to Urbosa, but she says sorry with her eyes as the fire-light of the blade bisects the Malice's head.

Then Link realises what she has done.

Inhaling, Link curls herself up as rapidly as possible. The violent violet fluid once kept within the Malice's now-split head pours out onto the floor behind her, as if the Malice were retching out the contents of its stomach. Droplets of malice ping onto her lower back. Her spine arches from the localised pain that sinks into her flesh.

The crown of her head bumps against the Malice's protruding gut. If the skin breaks here and now, the malice will drench her face and body.

Link has never been more sure of her imminent death.

A thread of agony at her left upper leg indicates the spread of the pool of malice upon the floor.

She has not time.

Abruptly her foot shrieks once more in a gouging of pain like someone pulling off all of her nails at once in bloody chunks.

When she regains consciousness, Link focuses her vision on Ruboona standing behind the Malice, trying to drag its body away on the hooked sword that she cannot pull free from its form. The Malice, seemingly dazed, arches back. Thick purple fluid runs from its back and slithers down its body to cover the floor. She hears Ruboona yelling her name; Link leans over to grab the scimitar embedded in her flesh. The saltwater-like fluid from the Malice's hand flows over its surface. When she touches the blade of the scimitar, her left foot throbs. The pain waters tears from her eyes and seizes her sinews. Ruboona's hooked sword keeps the Malice angled away from Link. Gingerly she tries again. At the second touch, she notices movement from above her.

The shield.

The Malice does not roar or breathe out or make any indication that the it has come undazed but for the abrupt upwards lift of Urbosa's shield in its left hand.

It brings the shield down. Despite the pain that cracks up her leg and reverbs through her sides, Link throws herself to the left out of its way. Her foot tears around the scimitar lodged through her flesh and into the ground. The shield cracks on the floor. She watches the force dent the material of the Divine Beast.

Her eyes embiggen.

The shield comes down again. She hears Ruboora screaming as her companion strains backwards with the hooked sword lodged into the Malice's not-flesh. Again Link jerks herself to the side. The shield catches her hair in mid-motion: one of her sidelocks. The sudden pressure against the side of her hair makes her wince and twist until the shield lifts up again.

The Malice has grown—if not smarter, then better able to track her movements.

She catches the Malice feint to the left; she throws herself to the left as the shield cracks down on the right. A spark of malice from the downwards blow splashes on her cheek. She senses the droplet burn through her skin in the wake of how speedily her flesh grows numb, so swiftly that she does not feel the pain until the malice has eaten itself away and fresh air stings inside the pockmark left behind.

Link closes her eyes. As the shield rises, she does not wait for it to come down. Instead she braces herself.

She bends her right knee.

Holding her hands over her mouth, she kicks the scimitar blade lodged deep in her left foot.

The blade cleaves her flesh in half and she can feel the pain of every single sinew and tendon and layer of skin through which the edge cuts. The shield does not come down. She slams again, and again, and one more time, and then she senses the curved scimitar pass between her toes.

Link rolls backwards. Her head presses against the floor and she senses her neck nearly snap before she finishes the roll. The two halves of her foot—sliced by the scimitar—flop against one another. Only a centimetre or so down from her toes. Yet the blood that spurts out of the gap in her boots stains the Malice crimson. It mixes with the violet. The malice and blood steam up to evaporate together. The fumes smell of iron, of death, and of decay.

She wants nothing more than to die.

Link puts the foot back down. Her foot spreads out. The pain of the raw meat of one half touching the other buckles her left knee.
Ruboona's sudden shriek snaps her head up. The desecrated body of the Malice, with its head split in two like a blasphemy of a flower, with its entire back open and the malice draining out onto the floor, with its left hand deformed by the shield that it has again and again crashed into the floor, its fingers congealed together into a formless mass, with its right hand a shapeless blob that drips malice—the scimitar tossed far back away by Link's kick—and its papery skin curling over its front half.

And Ruboona. The hooked sword still caught in the Malice's back. The malice hissing through her shoes, about to dissolve her own feet. Link grabs the boomerang strapped to her shoulders. She runs forward with it. Release.

The boomerang cracks directly into the hooked sword. The sharp edge sinks into the Malice. Yet the force of the impact alone dislodges the hooked sword from the Malice's back and Ruboona falls backwards into the pool of malice.

She cries out. Link sucks in a breath but Ruboona rolls out of the puddle to pick herself up.

The Malice rears up. On its elefantine legs. The upper portion of its body has broken entirely in half except for the arms slowly draining of malice. With the last of the waning strength in its upper limbs, it lifts the shield up with both of its hands. Its arms quiver.

The shield releases.

Ruboona twists around to sprint away from the Malice; her foot slips on the saltwater-fluid-dampened ground and she tumbles to the floor.

Link attempts to leap to the side; the agony of her left foot's wound drops her to her knees. The shield grazes her right thigh. The metal leaves a band of bruised and tender skin as it spins past her to smash into the wall behind her.

She hears the groan of the Divine Beast Vah Naboris denting.

Ruboona has torn off her malice-riddled outer layer of clothing. She looks to Link, who looks back at her. The Malice lurches forward. Its legs drag the rest of its body behind it in the spreading pool of malice, already stretching some five paces across. The boomerang has toppled from its torso to splash in the puddle, hissing as it dissolves, as has the hilt of the fire-light blade.

The Malice stumbles. The Malice trips. The Malice falls and its legs flail. Spasming against the floor, the Malice kicks so hard that one leg and then the other ruptures against the floor.

The Malice breaks apart with a final gush of saltwater-like fluid. The papery skin sinks into the violent violet to dissipate. She listens to the plink of a slate dropping down into the malice.

Ruboona exhales. When she speaks, her vocal cords have slightly torn. "Then, is it...is it over? And that...that must be the Hero's slate. Lady Urbosa's slate."

Link shakes her head. She hears Ruboona cry out what do you mean and how could it not be over and then Link feels the ground tremble. She hears the hiss of Malice slithering across the floor.

"The tail," Link signs.

Her left foot pulsates. She cannot run.

Link removes a sapphire-tipped arrow from her quiver while the malice pools together in the centre
She grips the shaft in her teeth. Bending up her leg with her right hand, she grasps the arrow in her left. And then, biting down as hard as she can on her own shirt sleeve, she stabs the wound with the ice.

The fragment of sapphire in the arrowhead shatters. The blood in her veins hardens to ice and after the initial burst of pain the top half of her foot goes numb. Link can no longer feel the injury, nor her toes, nor her skin, nor anything. When this is over, she may have to remove her foot entirely.

But at least in this very second she can run.

At least in this very second she can fight.

Carefully Ruboona has crossed around the bank of the lake of malice towards Link. The pads of her feet track blood.

"Can you run?" Link asks.

"Of course—!" Ruboona takes a step and winces. She hesitates. "I don't know."

Link’s gaze flicker towards the exit above the tail with its gauntlet of guardian turrets. "Is there another way we can get to the roof from here?"

Ruboona nods. With the slate now under her control to guide the Divine Beast, she explains, they can walk there from the front-side entrance.

"Then I'll carry you."

"But you're even more injured than—"

"If I die, nothing bad happens. If you die then the Divine Beast will no longer have a pilot, and I will never forgive myself." Link pauses. "There's no time. Hold onto that slate. If anything happens, use it to calm the fourth Divine Beast."

"The fourth...?"

Yet Link has already scooped Ruboona up into her arms. While she runs for the front of the Divine Beast—her left foot slaps numbly against the ground; she cannot sense its presence at all but she can move her legs—Ruboona jitters her fingers over the slate. Behind her, Link listens to the crash and push of the malice feeding into the terminal to break it apart, to serve as protective armour, as did the Malice of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania, as did not the Malice of the Divine Beast Vah Medoh.

She wonders what form the Malice will take.

The front legs of the Divine Beast bend, and everything tilts down. Link realises with a long laugh that they could have done this from the very beginning instead of going through the tail. Ruboona whispers if Link has lost her mind.

If she hadn't, then she would never have left the Great Plateau chasing down a letter addressed to someone she didn't know.

She runs.

The wall and the higher platform touch to form a triangular point. Link sprints up the slope, holding Ruboona to her chest as she once held Aryll—as her body once held Aryll—as...as she once held Aryll. Leaping over the vertex, Link lands on both feet on the other half. Her soles slip downwards towards the entrance into the Divine Beast's neck.

The lift.

She hears scuttling behind her. Again with the too many legs, with the hiss of liquid, with the sloshing of the malice held inside of the armour broken from the terminal. Link jumps into the lift; Ruboona flicks the slate to activate it down. Down into the hallway below, the passageway with the twin metal spheres.

Ruboona stops the lift. It screes to a halt, the opening between the ceiling of the hallway and the platform of the lift barely big enough for Link to have squeezed herself through. That should hold off the Malice for a few seconds at least.

Maybe. Maybe.

The Malice of the Divine Beast Vah Rudania, Link submerged into the magma of the caldera of Death Mountain. The Malice of the Divine Beast Vah Medoh, she could dispersed through the fans that would scatter it into a thousand tiny pieces spread by the wind.

Yet nothing of the Divine Beast Vah Naboris suggests such a path to victory.

The lift continues downwards. A noise overhead brings her to look up.

The Malice—bound up in the terminal armour—hangs on the lip of the precipice. And then it springs into the lift's shaft.

Ruboona raises the slate and taps the stasis rune, but the Malice does not glow yellow. The bottom of the lift passes the opening to the hallway. Still holding Ruboona, Link plummets herself off of the lift towards the ground; she rolls into the water. The Malice crashes down not a second later.

She makes out a buzz. Like static. A sparkle of green emanates from the crack between the lift and the floor covered in water.

She can barely see the inside of the tunnel for the darkness of the night, and yet the electricity sparks clearer than the daylight sky.

"Ah. It's electric." Link listens to the fear in Ruboona's voice, observes her companion make a mad dash for the golden helm in her pack. Shoving it onto her head, Ruboona looks at Link with a many-eyed green glare. "Link. Link. The elixir."

From her satchel, Link grabs one of the yellow elixirs. Her muscles, already fatigued by all that has happened, grow more sluggish still. Her limp arms roll out. She hears Ruboona plssh into the water. She listens to Ruboona force herself to her feet, listens to Ruboona murmuring a prayer to the Goddesses, listens to the Ruboona pleading for them not to die here.

A spray of pale violet fluid bursts from the slit-opening of the lift. The Malice squeezes through one leg, then another. Link watches its limbs slam into the hallway.

The electric current that runs through the water leaves only a mild tickling sensation in her body.

When she gets out of this alive, she will owe a million thanks to Nadyne.

Yet she has not time to think. Every second the Malice forces itself further and further into the hallway. Ruboona summons a bomb and throws it but the detonation only agitates the Malice. It courses its electricity through the water again; the bottled lightning affects neither Ruboona nor Link.

The Malice ceases to move. Link lifts her head. She listens to it shift within the shaft.

Blue.

The blue of a single guardian eye, glaring at them from the tiny opening.

She stares: the Malice has taken the armour of not only the central terminal, but also the guardian turrets from the tail.

As the eyes begins to blaze, Link grips the radiant shield on Ruboona's back and crouches down behind her companion. She holds the shield in front of her companion, her arms protecting Ruboona's sides. The Malice's fire-light crashes through the heart of the shield.

"The shield can't survive another blow like that," Ruboona mumbles, her shaking body pressed against Link's chest. "It can't."

It will have to.

Then—

—her abdomen.

The left of her abdomen, just between two her ribs. One of the Malice's legs—curving around the shield—pierces through the fabric of her tunic to pucker into her flesh. The impact knocks her backwards into the water. She cannot feel the tingling of elixir-numbed electricity for the pain that thunders through the bending-to-breaking column of her spine.

The eye comes alive once more with blue, and the shield has clattered to the ground, and Link cannot move.

But Ruboona has already taken her shield anew.

She hears Ruboona scream; her voice condenses to a single word.

"—courage, courage, courage—"

The fire-light, speeding towards them.

"—courage—"

Ruboona's arm, moving.

"—courage—"

The shield, angling just so.

The fire-blight reflected back into the eye. That burns through the eye. That cleanses the Malice.

The Malice melts away as snow in summer's heat.

The pieces of terminal and turret clamour to the ground in a crash so loud that Link's ears ring the bells of victory.

The Divine Beast Vah Naboris falls silent.

She did it.

Ruboona. Ruboona did it. Ruboona deflected the fire-light.

Ruboona...

Link collapses in the water, arms pressed into her abdomen. Ruboona begs her to move. To come with her. To put the slate into the pedestal of the main terminal.

The Divine Beast will walk to Nabooru. They will get help there. For both of them.

And if Link goes—if Link goes—then Ruboona promises that she will make Link a meal of her absolute most favourite dish.

At that Link's eyes spring open.

Through the pain of both of their injuries, Ruboona and Link drag one another to the lift. They pant as the lift takes them up. Link nearly falls asleep from fatigue and agony alike; she keeps herself awake speculating on the mystery of Ruboona's favourite dish. No, not just favourite dish, but her most favourite dish.

The journey seems to take hours upon hours. Ruboona taps the slate to speed them along; the Divine Beast tilts back. With the bottoms of Ruboona's feet raw and Link's left foot ruined, they crawl. They drag themselves forward. On the slippery material still wet with the saltwater-like fluid but free of Malice, they slide freely until they reach the main terminal.

Urbosa's slate.

Cradling the precious artifact to her chest, Ruboona weeps. She promises Urbosa that she will guide the Divine Beast Vah Naboris to help the people of Parapa. She asks for the blessings of the Golden Goddesses and of the Goddess Sageru.

Link helps to hold her up.

The slate falls from her trembling hand, but she picks it up again.

Ruboona slots it into the depression on the face of the pedestal.

And the Divine Beast Vah Naboris comes alive.

"It is done," she says, and then she cries again, and Link takes her hand into hers, and Ruboona wipes her tears, and Link woozes down towards the ground.

Link and Ruboona lie upon the floor.

Her entire body aches, and she wants nothing more than another round of honey candy, but she lives.

She lives.

When Link tries to laugh to celebrate her triumph, every second of mirth pushes pain against her ribs. She wheezes and gasps for breath until the agony ebbs.
Ruboona squeezes her hand.

"Ah, it looks like...my new year's prayer came true, thank the Goddesses." Link attempts a smile at that. "We have to..." Ruboona's words cut off with a groan of pain. "...we have to get outside. So I can see the direction. Please. To guide Her."

Back to the lift they crawl. This time Ruboona takes them up instead of down. She shows Link how they can emerge from the head onto the back of the Divine Beast.

In the time of their crawling, Link realises, the night has nearly ended.

Ruboona sweeps Tantari with her gaze.

Her fingers dance over the slate.

The Divine Beast begins to walk.

Ruboona and Link sit beside one another, shoulder to shoulder, hip to hip, leaning on one another for support.

The sensation in her left foot has begun to return, along the pulsing agony. The burn in her right arm remains without feeling. Where the shield hit her right thigh will surely blossom into bruises of green and purple in the morning. Already the stars have given way to a band of pink upon the horizon.

But she is alive.

Alive.

Alive.

Alive.

She laughs. She throws back her head, and the hole in her abdomen and the pockmarks in her cheek and leg burn with pain, but she laughs nonetheless because the pain means nothing less than that she remains alive. That she exists.

Link removes her hand from her abdomen to speak; the lack of pressure brings with it a pulse of agony. Ruboona rests her own hand against Link's stomach. "Ruboona, when we go back," she signs without a thought of where back might mean except somewhere where she can set down her cooking pot and have it repaired once more, "I want to make you some fried bananas. You'll still have to make me your most favouritist meal. But I'll make you fried bananas too. The recipe...it just came to me. With the slate, and the scimitar and shield from Urbosa." Her fingers twitch. "Lady Urbosa."

"Is that the first time you've used my name?" Ruboona inquires. Link looks at her; the crinkle around her eyes seems more amused than anything else.

Link smiles sheepishly.

"Then, if the Goddesses have granted you the wisdom to make the fried bananas and the power of the truth of their importance," Ruboona starts; she loses Link with her words, but Link clings on to the yes she hears in her companion's timbre, "allow me to give you the courage of having someone to share the meal with."
Link grins at her. Yet Ruboona's expression has sloped into something solemn, and Link's mouth thins. Ruboona's hand slides from her abdomen. The ache worsens; Link's nails clawed into her own palms.

"And speaking of my name...I apologise for lying." Ruboona's tone carries a ghost of pride, a ghost of sadness. Link glances at her companion, at first from the corner of her vision, and then turning her head entirely to face Ruboona properly. The wind brushes her left sidelock against her nose.

She sneezes. Ruboona smiles with a certain fondness. Even like this, sitting on the floor, she draws herself up to the fullness of her height, and even though she stands shorter than Link herself, Link feels as if Ruboona has grown a metre.

"Link," says Ruboona, and the world itself falls still to hang onto her every word. "My name...is not Ruboona. An alias, written backwards." Link attempts to reverse the characters in the name but without knowledge of Parapan she sputters. "Ah, it's Nabooru, Link. The name of...of my city. Of the capital of my people."

As Link watches, the band of gold that trumpets the sunrise has bloomed to wave below the pink banner of dawn. From behind her companion—from behind the Champion of Sageru, the Hero of Parapa, the Divine Beast Vah Naboris's Pilot—rises the golden disc of the sun to wash Parapa in honeyed hues, now buried in sand but which will one day heal, as is healing the rest of the land once known as Hyrule.

"I—" The sun rises behind, to weave a shawl of light upon her shoulders, to form a halo to frame her face, and then, at last, to set a crown of gold upon her head. "—am Queen Eursa Riju of Parapa." She lowers the lids over her eyes, and then lifts them again. The determination and the strength and the love glimmers in her dark eyes.

"Link," she says, and her voice comes faint as if from the stars above. "Thank you."

The sun continues to rise. Link's head tips back by itself. She senses something warm around her wrists, and something soft at the back of her head, and a whisper somewhere above her.

Do the stars sing?

She does not remember them singing, but she does remember the playing of a lute to the time of her own harp. Urbosa had little in the way of a singing voice but she sang nonetheless, for the joy of it, as Link had little in the way of a talent to play the harp but played nonetheless, for its own end. And the music that rang out from the strings of the harp, as the voice that sang out from the lips of the girl with the green hairband, brought happiness to the girls playing the instruments.

As Link had once, many years ago, had little talent in the cooking of food, but who had made—or more accurately burned—dish after dish after dish. Dishes that she would not share with anyone. Dishes that she would not foist onto anyone for fear of becoming a murderer, but dishes that she tried herself with gusto.

So Urbosa and Link played together. Not for an audience, but rather for themselves. Link demonstrated to Urbosa the songs Marin had taught her. A few, Urbosa knew, but, for many more, Urbosa had never before heard the song and Link knew no lyrics but some from the choruses.

They made up their own.

They sang and they played and Link offered to make her meal after meal from the recipes she had heard of from Rovah. Urbosa corrected her cooking. Over campfires Urbosa taught her how to properly mix honey, the ratios of spice used more often, when to switch the heat. In the next village, she purchased ground almond to serve in place of flour, although they could not find bananas this far to Parapa's west.

Urbosa asked her: "Why are you afraid?"

They returned to Nabooru and to the sword lessons from Urbosa. Now Link leaped and jumped and sliced and stabbed and parried with much more ease. Not as well as Urbosa. But improving.

Improving.

One day she bested Urbosa. On every subsequent day for the next month, she failed utterly, but then—again—Link bested her. Steadily her skills grew.

Steadily, and slowly, but growing nonetheless.

Link could hear them in the night sometimes. Urbosa and the girl with the golden hair. Talking, quietly. And yet, now as she listened, Link heard more talk of Urbosa's worries than before. She heard more talk of Urbosa's interests, of Urbosa's childhood, of Urbosa's thoughts and of her feelings and of the girl with the golden hair comforting her and of the girl with the golden hair thanking her for opening up and of the girl with the golden hair saying—saying those words. Those words that only three people have ever told Link in the course of her life.

She did not hear Urbosa say those words back. She heard Urbosa exhale. She heard Urbosa murmur that no matter what they wanted, the Princess and her Champion could never publicly consummate anything, that the Princess of Hyrule would need to marry—as tradition—into a noble family to continue the line, that her father would have Urbosa's head mounted on a plate.

"It doesn't have to be public," whispered the girl with the golden hair. "You can say no. All I want is to know your feelings, Urbosa. Your real feelings."

Although Link could not hear Urbosa's response, she could hear the girl with the golden hair weep in her room.

Link paid ever more attention to her lessons in Parapan. Diligently she studied until she became comfortable enough to speak and to understand the spoken language, at least the dialect of Nabooru. The writing could wait.

Other matters could not wait.

Urbosa had said that the quickest way to someone's heart was through their stomach. Then Link could at least do one thing—two things—as thanks for everything that Urbosa had done for her and everything that Urbosa had given to her.

In the courtyard where she practised with the sword that seals the darkness, she could hear the shouting and the laughter and the talking of the streets of Parapa. When Urbosa finished the daily training, Link stayed behind to run her drills, as usual.

But this time, once Urbosa had left, Link shimmied up the wall.

When she dropped into the streets on the other side of the wall, the—mostly women, though some non-gerudo men mingled here and there in the crowd—gasped as she tumbled to land face-first on the sandstone.

The suddenness of the noise and the bodies pressing in and around her brought her to her knees.
She closed her eyes; the world spun around her and the blood drained from her head until she could no longer tell the skies from the floor.

What a fool she was.

A tap on her shoulder. Light, timid.

A little girl. A little girl in a dress the colour of spring green. A little girl asking her hello miss and is anything wrong miss and are you lost miss and I like your brown hair miss and that's a pretty sword miss.

Link practically seized her hand and led her around Nabooru. A city of a thousand colours and sounds and lights. Walls of sandstone formed a labyrinth of painted walls and floors in geometric shapes that dazzled Link's eyes. She could not believe that people could paint such patterns until she watched street artists armed with straight-edges and strange curved implements they used to trace circles extend a pattern in green, blue, and red along a less busy street. The walls of Nabooru came alive with murals of birds and beasts, of the sun and moon, of the Golden Goddesses, of the people of Parapa, of heroines and heroes from legends past, of the stories passed down, of the Goddess Sageru upon Her horse, or with Her hawk on Her arm, or playing Her harp Sanidin, or holding Her seven-pointed star of peace upon Her chest, or smiling down on a mural depicting the history of Parapa's queens.

Musicians played music on the street. Six-stringed harps and lutes and lyres and ocarina and drums and larger instruments for which Link had no names and horns and fiddles and great upright fiddles whose strings the musicians strummed with their fingers and flutes and every manner of singing she had ever encountered and then some. Some solo singers, others in groups of three or four. One entire choir—some twenty women—stood on raised platforms in the centre of plaza before a fountain to belt out a song of various gerudo heroines of the past, that ended with a verse about Urbosa herself and a note that the stories of the heroines were yet being written with ink still fresh. Some songs Link recognised. Most she didn't. The music calmed her where the noise of the crowd had brought her to the ground.

But most importantly: the smells.

Of perfume and ink, of sand and soap, of rock in the sun and stone in the shade, of a thousand spices—some of which she knew and some of which Link had never smelled before—and ten thousand more combinations, of flowers and herbs, of sand seals and camels, of horses and leather, of linen and silk, of brewed elixirs and cooked meals, of fruit and fowl, of meat and fish, of baking bread and steaming rice, of iron and copper, of gold and silver, of boiled eggs and buttered yams, of almond cookies and marinated olives, of sweet liqueur and sweeter smoke, of drying paint and dyed horses' manes, of freshly opened voltfruit and just-pared hydromelon, of a thousand more fragrances she could not name that washed over her and made her hunger to try every food in the city.

And so she did. They offered samples and she ate voraciously of them. The food burned then shocked then iced her mouth and she could not get enough. The little girl giggled as Link gorged herself on fish that froze her lips and then turned around to down an entire iced smoothie of voltfruit that sparked electricity over her tongue and brought her to grab an entire bundle of steamed safflina to shove into her mouth which caused her to belch smoke and prompted her to scarf down a stack of herbed flatbread that slid down her throat and let her breathe long enough to dive anew into a dessert of icy hydromelon and nuts and honey in thin layers of ground almonds.
When her stomach began to hurt, she asked the little girl to show her to the marketplace. As the little girl navigated the entirety of the city with ease, Link had to close her eyes. She prayed to the Golden Goddesses in gratitude of the light spirit they had sent down to save her.

The little girl introduced herself as Boori. Her hands would sometimes get ahead of her when she spoke, her gestures running into one another, but Link could understand the intent if not each individual phrase. The daughter of an arrow fletcher and a librarian who tended to the royal library of Parapa. She asked what Link planned to make with so many bananas, imported from the northeast of Parapa near Faron where the bananas grew natively.

Link demonstrated.

Following the recipe that Rhibonne's sources gave her, she sliced the bananas with the blade of evil's bane in a flourish that left Boori gasping and clapping her hands. With Boori's help, Link smothered each slice in butter and in honey mixed with cinnamon and nutmeg and a tiny hint of salt. She spread out the slices of banana on the sword that seals the darkness. The not-quite-metal material of the blade of evil's bane heated in a flame to fry the slices in fatty seals' butter. A flick of the wrist flipped the bananas stylishly over her head. Link caught them on the other edge of the sword that seals the darkness.

Yes. Her lessons had paid off more perfectly than she could ever have dreamed.

The sweet scent of the bananas caramelised. She gave half of the fried bananas to Boori in thanks. Grinning widely to herself, Link marched out of the kitchen with the other half of the fried bananas in her arms.

It took her a moment to realise that she had absolutely no sense of direction.

After Boori walked her to the same street she had found her, Boori hugged Link tightly. Then she scampered off. Link watched her skip and twirl and sign her joy at the world at having met someone so strange and so funny and so good at cooking.

Link climbed back over the courtyard wall. Sneaking up the stairs to her room, she tapped her knuckles against Urbosa's door.

Urbosa opened the door. Link could see how she arranged her expression from a grimace into something neutral as soon as she saw Link. Though every muscle in her body screamed for her to run, Link rooted herself down and held out the plate of fried bananas.

If anyone could convince her that the Champions would not hurt her as had—as had some people in her life—that would be Urbosa.

Link observed: the way that Urbosa's lowered her eyelids and the corners of her eyes crinkled and her mouth curved up into smile that could lit up her chamber as if the Goddess Sageru Herself had shimmied in through the window.

Urbosa thanked Link over and over and Link could only blush and smile sheepishly and rub the back of her head with both hands for double the embarrassment.

She tried the fried bananas herself.

Delicious.

Absolutely delicious.
Only with her iron willpower alone could she keep herself from wolfing down the entire plate ceramic and all: Link would let Urbosa have them.

Urbosa more than deserved all of the fried bananas in the world.

When the two of them had scraped the last of the honey-butter from the plate, Urbosa asked her once more: "Why are you so afraid?"

For once in her life Link could not say that she had no answer, for she had an answer, an answer engraved on a tiny ember that she had tucked away in the deepest recesses of her innards, that had smoldered and smoked and burned away at the coils of her entrails for all of these long years, an ember that would someday—no matter how deep she pushed it—erupt into an inferno that would consume her from the inside out.

She did not cut open her stomach. She did not reach down through her intestines. She did not pull out the ember that lay hidden.

And yet she found something resembling words. Found a mirror to swallow down her throat, to reflect the ember in her stomach, and another to show Urbosa the reflection of the first.

Link spoke in fits and starts. A word or two, half of a phrase, sometimes nearly an entire sentence before her hands would falter and she would press her palms into her knees. Urbosa merely sat there in the silence to let her gather her strength again.

If Urbosa had apologised, or asked if she were all right, or—worst of all—reached up a hand to comfort her, Link would have crumpled into herself and never spoken again.

But Urbosa kept still and silent, gazing at Link with nothing but warmth in her eyes the comforting colour of the nighttime sky.

The vaguest of words. Someone who had, possibly, not quite hurt her, but arguments that someone had had with another someone, arguments for which those someones would blame her, the constant need to mediate, the burdens of the constant fighting, the hiding, the consideration of running away, the thought of even taking her own—

Her sister.

Her sister's birth.

And then Link could not run. Running would subject her sister to the same fate. Running would simply offer up her sister as a sacrificial goat upon the altar.

She would stay, and she would fight, and she would protect her sister.

When Link mentioned the possibility of making money enough to send Aryll to live with their grandmother, the blacksmith took pity on her. His own wife had become with child, and he could no longer travel the countryside delivering his goods. If he would teach Link to defend herself from the few dangers along the road, then she would return the favour by becoming his courier.

And so she did. So she took to the road. The girl who smelled of horses—her best friend and the only friend she had in childhood and the first person in the world who had learned of Link as a girl—sought to give her a horse but the girl who smelled of horses's own father reacted too stringently to her talking so frequently to a child that they did not see as...as a girl.

Link curled her fingers inwards. Urbosa's eyes narrowed at that, her eyebrows bristling, but she let
So she walked. With the jumble of pots and pans and swords and armour and horseshoes and this and that that would need smithy. She walked on foot to Necluda in the southwest and very occasionally to Faron in the south, to Lanayru in the southeast, to Akkala in the northeast and very occasionally to Eldin in the northwest, to Central Hyrule far, far away. As she went, she picked up the languages. From the language spoken in the province of Ordon, to the Necludan and few strains of Faronese she learned to the southwest, to the Central Hyrulean she heard everywhere and the Lanayrish of the southeast that she—she remembers a zora—a red zora she knew then. Now under the tutelage of her mentors in the Hyrule castletown, Link had learned to read Central Hyrulean, and under Urbosa's hand she had learned to speak Parapan.

She gathered money. In retrospect, the blacksmith gave her too much money. In retrospect, the blacksmith proved far too patient with her. In retrospect, the blacksmith could have chosen a true courier at a far lower wage, but he chose Link and for that she would and will forever be grateful.

With the money, she sent Aryll away to live with their grandmother. She cannot remember the name. An island. An island off the eastern coast where their grandmother had lived before their family had moved to Ordon in search of better work. Link could have run away.

She considered running away. But she had learned not to speak of what happened behind closed doors. She had learned—and so her grandmother could not know—and so instead she kept her sister and their grandmother in safety and in comfort and mailed toys and books and trinkets. Of birds.

The birds that her sister loved so much.

Someday, she promised Aryll, she would take her to Tabantha, to Medli, where lived the rito. The followers of the Goddess Erito whose messengers came in the form of birds.

Aryll laughed and clapped her hands together and asked if they too could become followers of the Goddess Erito. Link tilted her head to one side. She knew next to nothing of questions of the Seven other than their existence. Aryll prayed to the Goddess Farore, the Goddess of Courage and the Goddess of Wind, to one day grant her wings that she may fly as did the seagulls that soared and looped through the skies of the island on which their grandmother lived.

If this Goddess Hylia whose statue Aryll had seen in books could bear wings, then why not the people called hylians?

Link laughed and ruffled her hair.

If anyone could do it, she told her sister, then Aryll could. The best little sister in the world.

During the holidays, their grandmother could send her sister back, and Link would have to keep up the charade. To bring the money back to—those who may or may not have hurt them—and to keep them more at peace for the few scant days of festivals. The celebration of spring and its new year; the feast of the harvest; the festivals of the Golden Goddesses and of the spirit Ordon, sent by the Goddesses, said in those days to watch over the province.

Many then prayed to the Seven but many more that she met along the road prayed to the Golden Goddesses or prayed to spirits.

Here, a hundred years later, Link has seen none who does not pray to the Seven.

At some point on her trips between Central Hyrule and Ordon, Link met a girl singing in a field of wheat. She slipped and fell into a pond of voltfin trout which she had never seen before. Their electric shocks had knocked Link unconscious. The girl had rescued her from the water and had awakened her with the voice of the Goddesses themselves.

The girl who sang taught her too that she need no longer hide. The girl who sang, the girl who wore a violet sash around her hips, the girl who showed her the elixir in spring green that her mothers brewed.

And, to Link, the rest of those next several years felt a constant spring.

The girl who sang—Marin, her name, signed with one wrist over the other and fingers fluttering as the flapping of a seagull's wings—gave her a horse and gave her an ocarina and gave her the beat-beat-beating of her heart.

At this, Urbosa smirked slightly; Link's face flushed. She hurried on with her story before the words escaped her. The river had opened but at any second it could shut itself again.

And then, one day, the royal family sent out orders to every blacksmith that they could reach. For the forging of swords, and of lances, and of spears, and of armour, and of the articles of war.

A sword and a shield the blacksmith forged to indicate the quality of his work. Link would take the sword and board to the castle, so far away from Ordon. And so the girl who smelled of horses had wished her the best of luck and Link had promised to return. And so Marin had told her to come back to Lon Lon on her voyage back and Link had promised to return. And so she had come to the castletown as courier for the first time in her life. And so Link had delivered the blacksmith's sword and the blacksmith's shield. And so Link had seen the blade of evil's bane set within the stone. The royal family, unable to pull the sword that seals the darkness from the sacred ground where it lay, had excavated the entire rock in which the blade of evil's bane waited. The rock that they had taken from the sacred ground now rested in the centre of the courtyard of the castle, where a parade of royal knights and nobles from across the land would come to try their hand at removing the sword that seals the darkness from the stone.

She does not remember quite how it happened. She does not remember that intoxicating liquor of curiosity and recklessness that had driven her to hop the barriers around the blade of evil's bane. She remembers the fatigue. She remembers the exhaustion. She remembers the smiles that she presented to Marin and to the girl who smelled of horses and to Aryll.

She remembers those who may or may have hurt her, and she remembers being tired, so tired.

She does not remember why her fingers curled around that hilt but she remembers the warmth. She remembers the strange sensation of her strength ebbing from her limbs as she drew up the sword that seals the darkness. She remembers how the fatigue spread through her body and how the exhaustion filled her and how her heart slowed and how her mind fogged and how she was tired, so tired, and how she continued to pull, and how when she lifted the blade of evil's bane from its stone and the strength rushed back into her body with a feeling like static, she could not quell the disappointment that coiled around her neck but not tightly enough to choke.

She remembers the sound. The sound of the sword that seals the darkness, the blade of evil's bane. The sound like windchimes, the sound like an ocarina, the sound like a harp, all at once.

And that soft blue glow, for just a moment, so fast that she thought she had imagined it, and that sound like the far-off laughter of a girl.

She does not remember the chaos that followed thereafter. She remembers Daruk, and Revali, and Urbosa, and the zora girl with the shark-tooth smile, who stood, and watched, and saw for the first time the scrawny girl with the purple bags under her eyes who would become the Champion of Hylia, the Hero of Hyrule, Her Majesty's Knight. She remembers the guards. She remembers the blades surrounding her, the threats of execution. She remembers the zora girl yelling out the name that Link had not used in years. She remembers the intervention that saved her life.

She remembers the girl with the golden hair. She remembers the promise of her sister's safety if Link would be silent and hide and follow every order.

She remembers the training under the royal swordsmasters. She remembers how she flinched back. She remembers how they declared her entirely unfit for duty and yet the blade of evil's bane had somehow chosen her.

She remembers Daruk and Urbosa forcing the King's hand. She remembers coming to Parapa.

She remembers...remembers Urbosa. Urbosa who opened a door that Link had kept closed shut save for three people in the entirety of her life.

At the end of her story Urbosa nodded, once, and asked Link if she could reply to any of that or if Link would rather she stay silent. Link shrugged. She folded inwards on herself.

Urbosa chose to answer.

To say that one day, Urbosa would like to meet Aryll. That she would like to meet the friend Marin. That she would like to meet the girl who smelled like horses. That she would like to meet the people who have brought together the kind and courageous girl in front of her.

Link did not say anything. But she ducked her head, and she more sensed than saw Urbosa's smile.

Then Urbosa reached out a hand to ruffle Link's hair. Her ponytail loosened. She re-tied it and Urbosa ruffled her hair again.

"You know, Link," Urbosa remarked, her voice light even as Link could hear the thudding of her heart softening and heavying the words, "they call me and you O Courageous. There's O Powerful Revali, and O Powerful Daruk—funny, how they picked the two men for that, but that's another story for another time—and you and I the embodiments of Courage. I thought these to be nothing but monikers: three attributes and six people. I'm surprised that they didn't spiffy it up and round to Seven, but I suppose we have seen no children of Kokir in centuries, if still they exist.

"O Courageous Urbosa and O Courageous Link. O Powerful Revali and O Powerful Daruk. O Wise Mipha, and, of course...the Princess of legend." She laughed and shook her head. "There are those who say that the Princess and her Knight from ten thousand years ago...that they saw one another as lovers." Link cocked her head to the side. Urbosa laughed to herself again. Raising her hand to her brow, she closed her eyes. "We all have worries enough that the oceans could form from our tears. But at least this is one less thing to worry about, and one more thing to be brave in. Thank you, Link."

Link blinked. Urbosa smiled.

"I mean it."

The sun rose and fell, and Link lay on her back in bed resting her aching body after hours upon hours of drills.

From outside of her room, she heard a gasp, and a yell, and a muffled sound, and weeping, and a sharp inhalation. Link slid open the door. Just a crack. She poked her head outside and gazed in the direction of the balcony.

There: framed by the fullness of the moon in her silvered glory, Urbosa and the girl with the golden hair; the girl with the golden hair standing on her tiptoes, her arms around Urbosa's shoulders and her fingers entangled in her hair to draw Urbosa closer to her; Urbosa smiling and tilting down her head, her arms around the girl with the golden hair's upper back with her hands on either side of the girl with the golden hair's jawline to support her up; the sliver of silver between their mouths fading until their lips briefly touched and the girl with the golden hair's eyes closed while Urbosa's twinkled more brightly than the stars above.

Courage.

Link slid the door shut again. She lay back down on her bed. She hugged the pillow, tucking the corner between her thighs and the side under her chin, curling up around it.

Perhaps someday.

Perhaps someday when she fulfilled her promise.

Perhaps someday when she could take Marin across the world, so that she could sing for everyone, so that Link could catch the starlight glimmering from her smile.

Perhaps someday when she and Marin could come home again to a house meant for them.

Then perhaps, she and Marin could, as Urbosa and the girl with the golden hair did...

...but she will never do so, now.

Never will she hear Marin sing again. Never will she hear Marin laugh again. Never will she hear Marin say those words to her.

Those words that meant, and mean, almost everything to her.

Yet.

Yet after the Divine Beasts and after the Yiga and after she has fulfilled the promises that she has made, she will come back.

She will go home.

To Romani Ranch that calls her name.

A place to lay down her sword.

A place to rest.

A place to be.

—

_Mighty Fried Bananas_ (six hearts, low attack boost for 03:10) - cane sugar, mighty bananas, Tabantha wheat

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: I can finally say it! Riju! Riju's my favourite of the companions from Breath of the Wild, and I feel like the developers put the most effort into her (and Sidon), especially with her daily schedule that includes praying to her mother, playing with Patricia, etc., and the sand seal plushies in her room. It's unfortunate how sexualised she is in-game though, especially given that she's a literal child.

The scimitar went through Link's foot and into the floor. As a result, Link was trapped. Like a fox chewing through their own leg to get out of a bear trap, Link kicked the scimitar out of her foot. She hasn't cut her entire foot in half, just about a centimetre or two from her toes, but that's still pretty significant and pretty painful.

The sapphire arrow to the foot served as a temporary anesthetic, essentially, numbing the pain so that Link could run around. Pretty hardcore of her. I certainly wouldn't be able to say it.

Learning to parry the guardians for the first time can be very scary, especially since—while you can just try again and die repeatedly only to try again in-game—a single failed parry means real and significant pain. Riju had a shield with which to parry and the skill to do so, but lacked the confidence in her own skills to try for it. When Link fails to parry the guardian correctly, Riju realises that it's now or never. She's gone this far to protect her people, and she's not stopping now.

Poor Link really got a number done on her this time, to a point where she faints from it.

As I suggested in a different note, "Riju" means "(one who is) like the dawn". The scene of Riju in the dawn is one of my favourites.

I really wanted to humanise Urbosa more so than she was in the game. Zelda is eighteen at the time of this and Urbosa is twenty. They're pretty cute, I think.

We'll see more about Ilia's father, but you get a taste for what Link had to deal with as a child. While Hyrule is much more accepting of trans people than many cultures today, Link's village is small enough and was tucked away enough in the country that there weren't a lot of trans people around, resulting in ignorance; Link didn't even know that being a girl was an option until she met Marin.

The islands off the coast refer to Tingel and company. Link's grandmother, who wasn't aware of the abuse, is based on the character from The Wind Waker.

As mentioned before, the new year in Hyrule is celebrated in the spring, although Link has already missed the celebration since it happened while she was travelling around Parapa.

Link delivering the sword and board is based, in part, on the opening plotline of Twilight Princess, which is a pretty good way to get Link to the castle. By the way, have you figured out where the province of Ordona is yet? Link's entire childhood is basically an amalgam of her childhoods from The Wind Waker and Twilight Princess, with the relatively bad childhood of Ocarina of Time thrown in for good measure, alongside my own special twists.
The royal family couldn't pull the sword from the stone, so they literally excavated the rock in which it lay. Say, have we seen a certain place that looks like a rock was ripped out of it? In fact...it might be from one of the first few chapters.

We'll find out more about why the sword chose Link later. Perhaps even from the horse's mouth. But that won't be for many, many chapters. After all, Link doesn't even have the sword yet.

midna's ass. 07 October 2017.

Beta reader's comments: R I J U! No more Ri-I-Mean-Ruboona. Probably not much of a shock, but hey.

The scene of the sun rising behind her is beautiful. It's one of those scenes where I can just hear the music.

Speaking of music, "Do the stars sing?" is one of my favourite lines in the series.

When I said a chapter was wew, I mean this one. Between the descriptions of the Malice and Link getting her foot chopped in half, it has probably the most amount of squick in the series.

As the author noted, this chapter is decidedly not about the Yiga. On my first readthrough, between Riju mentioning thinking someone else might have been in Vah Naboris and the chapter's title having bananas, I was sure it was Yiga. Of course, I became paranoid about the Yiga on every single situation after this, a paranoia which, as I like to constantly remind the author, I was completely justified in.

Emma. 09 October 2017.
Resting after the cleansing of the Divine Beast, the travelling chef discovers the truth of the Parapan food enthusiast as the Queen of Parapa, who strives to tell the chef more about the Great Calamity and the possibility of the Calamitous One's reappearance. However, the chef recalls something about which the Princess's shade warned the chef over a century ago.

Chapter Notes

As usual, extra notes: So this is the halfway mark in terms of the chapters, and we've cleared three Divine Beasts so far!

The lights in the room are actually powered by topaz—early electricity!

If you don't remember, the spring green elixir is basically Magic HRT™.

And "yet" vs. "and yet" are meant to showcase the different sides of the internal argument that Link has with herself.

Link's coming to terms with her body being her own. Not the body that she stole. But her own body. She's been in it for more than a year at this point.

In case you haven't figured it out, the word that Riju has difficulty saying is Yiga, because they're the ones who assassinated (one of her) mother(s).

Also do note that I occasionally capitalise things in character dialogue that are not usually capitalised! For example, Revali referred to the capital-C Court, while Impa refers to the capital-C Castle (contrast Urbosa saying lower-case-c castle), while Link's narration does not.

This chapter explains the seeming disparity between Urbosa breaking through Link's silence to her newfound silence and fear with Daruk.

As always, thank you so much for your patience with my computer issues, and thank you for reading. I hope that you've enjoyed the journey so far, now that we're at the halfway point in the story in terms of the number of chapters, though not in terms of the length of the story. The longest chapters are yet up ahead. And thank you so much to my wonderful beta reader, Emma, who has done so much for me.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Her left foot: a slice on the upper half between her toes. Her right thigh: in a band just below where her hip meets her torso. Her abdomen: on the left side, in a strange winding tunnel. Her right arm: on the forearm close to the elbow, in an irregular patch. Her right cheek: a dotted mark closer to her nose than the scar long left by a Tabanch wolfos. She can feel the entirety of her body, save for these injuries.

Light dusts her vision. She groans and buries her face further in the warmth of the darkness. Sensations move over her body. Sometimes dry, sometimes wet. Water drips down into her mouth; she swallows. Another kind of liquid—slightly sweet and slightly bitter at once, with a taste so familiar to her—accompanies the water on occasion. Something smelling of food nears her, and she lifts up both hands to grab and shove the whatever-it-is into her mouth indiscriminately until she has scarfed it down with gusto before drifting back into the darkness.

Steadily her consciousness comes back to her.

Beneath her: bed. Or something like a bed. But a bed woven of the hands of the Goddesses Themselves, softer than any bed in which she has ever slept before, yielding enough to swaddle her in a cocoon of comfort, and yet firm enough that she does not feel the fear of falling.

When she lifts her hands, she feels a tug on her left arm. On the crook of her elbow. Her fingers find a cord leading from her skin upwards. She cannot find where the cord ends.

She examines her body with her right hand. She lies under the blanket, nude save for a loose robe. Bandages and gauze cover her skin. Her flesh feels surprisingly smooth, as if someone had scrubbed her outer layer clean. No dirt, no residue of salt, very little sweat.

The scent of food springs open her eyes.

Link sits up so speedily that her head seems to crack open and the cord embedded in the crook of her left elbow sings out in pain.

Her surroundings: a clean room decorated in the calming colours of blue and green. Dark but for the light of candles. No, not candles, but strange orbs of light set with topaz. A bed upon which she lies, set with a dark burgundy and navy blanket. A pair of gerudo women carrying various implements look at her.

One of the women inhales, then quits the room.

Before Link can begin to panic and jump out of her seat, the other woman—a healer in a dark brown healer's robe a shade lighter than the tone of her skin, her short hair curled on either side of her head to resemble a nesting bird—sets a tray by Link's hands. A tray of food. Bread and meat and a bowl of soup and curried rice and another bowl of diced fruits with a sprinkling of salt and several small fried fish and almond cookies and so many things that Link almost plants her entire face into the plate.

After she eats, then she can consider panicking.

But eating first.

Eating always first.

With Link preoccupied by the food, the healer explains. Of Queen Riju who brought Link in a few days prior. Of how Queen Riju, herself injured and battered beyond belief, and thank the Goddesses that Her Majesty had not fared worse, asked the healers to do whatever they could to save the girl who had braved the thunderstorms of silt and sand to carry the Hero's slate to the Divine Beast Vah Naboris.

Link cannot stop herself from eating but neither can she stop her hands from shaking at the healer's words. Last autumn, the healers of Medli did not know what she had done.

But this woman does.

Yet the healer signs for Link not to worry. "Her Majesty has given us explicit instructions to keep this confidential. Your secrets lie safe with us. We do not even know your name." She taps the fingers of each hand together. "So we have been referring to you as 'the girl' for not having a name." That would bring a smile to Link's face if not for the constant stream of food from the tray to her mouth. "Her Majesty did instruct me to show something to you. Please look over here."

The healer walks around the bed towards Link's right, stopping by the wall. She raises her hand to the curtains over a window that Link did not notice on first glance. The sudden influx of light closes Link's eyes but does not for a moment slow the intake of food into her mouth.

When she looks out again, Link can see a stretch of a city—of Nabooru—before her, though the sandstone walls do not exactly resemble those in her memories. The Divine Beast, or the past hundred years, or some combination, must have destroyed them. And yet the rebuilt walls carry their own murals and their own stories and their own beauty far exceeding that in her memories.

For these walls exist, and for these walls bear upon them those who are alive.

And beyond the walls—

The Divine Beast Vah Naboris. Its head rising up into the clouds. Its eyes no longer glowing with the violent violet, but the softer blue of the blade of evil's bane that her body once held.

Safe.

Link slows her intake of food long enough to ask a single question: if Ruboona has recovered. Then she stops herself at the healer's visible confusion to laugh at herself, to explain of Riju's alias, to explain that she has not the faintest clue whatsoever of how to sign the name Riju.

Riju.

The Queen of Parapa.

"Ruboona...Nabooru..." The healer closes her eyes. "Her Majesty has a way with words, does she not? Queen Riju...some of us refer to her as Sariju, but she herself has asked us not to, for she does not consider herself worthy of such idolisation." The healer glances back at Link. "But a queen who would risk her own life for the safety of her people, and at so young an age after passing of Her Majesty's mother...others may regard that poorly, but I would call that courage. In such times we need rulers who will take matters into their own hands and not trap themselves in their palaces to gorge themselves like parasites while the countryside falls to peril.

"Though I do not know the full story." She smirks wryly. "I am, after all, merely a healer."

Link shoves a piece of bread into her mouth. She chews, and chews, and chews.

She has done acts that others would consider courageous. But she has also—and continues—to do acts that she herself would consider reckless at best and potentially malicious at worst.

To say that someone should always risk their life...

Calming the Divine Beasts does not require needless sacrifice. Had Ruboona—had Riju—thrown herself in front of Link, or had Link in front of Riju, then both would have perished shortly thereafter. To cleanse Urbosa's spirit needed them both at their fullest, needed them to fight for their lives. And had they brought reinforcements they, perhaps, could have avoided injury altogether.

Yet that would have endangered the lives of others.

And yet if they had had a prepared team and a plan of attack, then no one would have gotten injured.

Yet Riju and Link came out alive.

And yet they could have died. Yet Riju could have died.

Yet Riju, Queen of Parapa, went out to the Divine Beast entirely by herself, with no guards and no entourage, for fear of endangering others' lives.

And yet the assistance of a rito or a zora could have massively simplified the process of accessing the terminals.

Yet that would have taken significant time to recruit, time that they might not have had.

And yet they only defeated the Malice on virtue of Riju's incredible skills with the shield and on the courage to swing.

Yet...yet...yet...

Link has never been the wisest or the most powerful. Instead she picks up another chunk of bread, dips it in the steamed vegetable soup, and plunks it in her mouth.

Yes.

Eating is simple enough for her to understand and to execute.

The healer asks her a few more questions about how she feels, if she can wriggle her toes, if she can track the healer's wagging finger with her gaze, if she can walk, if she can flex, if she can hear in both ears, if this hurts or if that hurts or if what about over here hurts or if yes I can get you more food after this just stay still for five minutes, please hurts.

The healer inspects her eyes, her ears, her mouth, her hands and feet, and the injuries. She removes the cord from her patient's flesh. When Link looks up, she observes the cord leading to a sealed container that dribbles fluid.

The healer declares her with a clean bill of health. She gives Link a set of herbal compresses—to change the bandages on her foot twice daily—and some small round seeds to chew on to kill the pain that she might continue to experience for the next few days.

"There was only so much that we could do. I apologise." The healer makes a gesture Link recognises from her memories: a sign of respect and of sorrow. "The burn on your right arm is unlikely to ever fully recover sensation."

Blinking vacantly at the wall behind the healer's shoulder, Link nods at the big words in Parapan that she does not know. The healer pauses. Her features soften, and she repeats herself in simpler terms.

Link runs a hand over the burn on her right arm. When she applies pressure, she can sense
"But the rest of you should recover just fine." At this Link grins. The healer nods at her. "We were worried about that foot of yours—showing evidence of frostbite—but the rapid medical attention saved you." The healer bows her head. "You must have curried favour with the Goddesses Themsevles."

The healer returns to Link her items. The cooking pot; and the satchel with the wooden box of spring green elixir that Link almost immediately downs before the healer notes that they have given her regular doses twice a day; and the broken halves of the boomerang recovered from the Malice; and the snapped hilt of the fire-light sword. The healer also provides Link with a mirrored shield, a long straight sword, and a curved scimitar, the latter for fighting on horseback. Gifts from Riju, in case Link must leave before they can see one another again.

She ignores the gifts to hug her beloved cooking pot instead. Link notes the curve of the pot that faced her right side at the time of the guardian's attack: the fire-light that carved her arm also disintegrated a portion of the metal. But the metal has been filled in, and the entire inside of the pot re-coated with the same new metal to ensure an even conduction and heating. The pot has healed, as the pot did after her adventures with Yunobo, as it did after her adventures with Amali, and as it has now, after her adventures with Riju.

Her body and her beloved cooking pot both bear the scars of her stories, those she remembers and those she does not yet.

Link shakes her head.

No, no. She cannot claim all the scars for her own. For whoever...whoever owned this body before her.

The slate, which remains in one piece, and the red telescope, which she holds to her chest. Aryll. Aryll. Aryll. The girl for whom she—the former she, not she, or she?—

Her little sister. And Marin, and the girl who smelled of horses. Link keeps the red telescope close to her heart, the red telescope that she remembers all three touching at one point or another.

As a final gift of parting, a messenger adorned with serpentine tattoos up her arms enters with Link's own paraglider, the symbol of Farore still visible on its heart. The top of the struts no longer consist solely of wood but of a material laced with topaz; a thin layer of rubber reinforces most of the underside. Around the tattered fabric that bears the mark of Farore, patches of sky-blue and gold mix in with the original dark blue and red of the paraglider to form a mosaic.

"Her Majesty wishes to extend an apology. We recovered your paraglider. Unfortunately, the lightning had destroyed part of it, or so she told me to tell you. We repaired the paraglider as best we could. Unfortunately..."

Nonetheless Link thanks her. Like herself, wounded and injured and battered and torn and broken over and over and over yet patching herself back together each and every time, the paraglider has healed of its damage and grown all the stronger for it.

Taking the paraglider into her embrace, Link runs her hands over the fabric, to feel the difference between the old and the new, that now come together as one to allow her to continue to glide. She notices the lines of topaz that run through the patches of fabric.

"On the bright side," the messenger signs with a wink, "you can glide in thunderstorms now" without worry. Or at least not as much worry."

The messenger ushers Link away from the healer and out the door; another woman carries her belongings. While Link tries to protest, the process overwhelms her, though she manages to avoid curling up on the floor. She allows the messenger to lead her on wherever the messenger wishes for her to go.

First, to fit new clothing, she discovers. The tailors have patched to the best of their abilities the feathered tunic, as well as her old undershirt and trousers from Kakariko. They offer to prepare an alternative tunic, which she accepts: although she adores the Tabanch tunic in the cold, the feathers make it much too warm to wear south of Central Hyrule away from the mountains. They measure her and have her select fabric.

Link almost immediately grabs for the forest-green, but then she notices another swatch of fabric, the same colour as the sky.

That light, clear sky-blue.

She moves her hand between the two. She touches her chin with her left hand, then with her right, then with both, and then one of the tailors politely suggests that they make her two tunics.

When Link tries to thank her, she finds that the tailor cannot read sign; another tailor, plucking a needle from her mouth, intervenes to translate and to explain that they have prepared for her, in addition, another set of clothing meant for desert travel. Billowing robes to aid with the sand and with the heat. They fit the blue tunic first, along with a matching cloth sheathe for the straight sword. Link finds that the blade runs too long for her to wear it at her hip, and so she affixes the sheath to her back.

"While the tailors put the finishing touches on your clothing—after which you are free to leave, of course—" the messenger informs her, ",—would you like to have a meal?"

Link's grin could stretch from ear to ear. "Would I!?"

The messenger guides her up to the upper floors of the palace. "We've been given explicit instructions to blindfold you in preparation. You'll eat the meal without looking at it. That all right with you?"

Link blinks. Then she shrugs. "Anything for food."

The messenger winks at her. She ties a heavy cloth blindfold around Link's eyes. Alongside a second messenger who can speak aloud, the messenger with the serpentine tattoos guides her up a curved set of stairs.

Abruptly Link feels the heat of sunlight and the whisper of the wind over her skin. Outside. The second messenger asks her to sit down, and to wait.

She waits.

She nearly falls asleep.

An insect of some sort lands on her knee. Its legs tickle her skin as it crawls about. When she crooks her fingers to pet her newfound friend, the furred moth buzzes away.

"Link?"
Link twists around towards the source of the voice; the disorientation brings her to flop on her stomach. Riju laughs as Link pushes herself up into a sitting position.

"I promised I'd make you my most favouritest food. Then, keep your hands at your sides. I'm curious to see what you'll think about it afterwards. After all...ah, you're an honest judge of cooking, aren't you?"

Link bobs her head.

The blindfold tickles the bridge of her nose, and she sneezes. She hears Riju's hand-muffled laugh. "Ah. You should smell it first." Something warm radiates close enough to her face that she can feel the heat on her lips. Link repeatedly wrinkles her nose to adjust the blindfold.

She sniffs.

The scent: fishy, very fishy, and honey, and spiced with turmeric, and cumin, and other things that she has eaten before but cannot identify. Desperately she opens her mouth and pokes out her tongue for a taste of the fish. The tip collides with spiced honey and butter, not unlike the outer coating of Urbosa's favoured fried bananas, but, instead of nutmeg and cinnamon, the spice flares hot and sour and bitter. And breading: a coating of crumbs.

Riju laughs again. "Ah, I didn't ask you to beg for it. It'd be cruel to keep a food lover like you waiting too long, wouldn't it? Then, here you go."

Link snaps her jaws shut around the offered morsel. She feels the fingers holding the food recoil away as she crunches down on the bite.

All at once the fire and the ice and the shock burst on her tongue. Not like the meal that she had a week ago where every bite led into one or the other, but all at once, barely muted by a fourth flavour that seems to pack down the other three.

She—remembers. Long after Link had left Parapa. When the Champions and Impa and the girl with the golden hair travelled together in efforts to the springs of the Goddesses in the efforts of the girl with the golden hair to unseal the sacred sealing magic supposedly in her bloodline. When the monsters had grown so frequent that villages and towns across Hyrule begged the Champions and the King's armies for assistance.

She remembers Urbosa's words. To the girl with the golden hair. She remembers watching over them with the blade of evil's bane drawn and ready. Not to attack, but to go through her drills. She remembers Urbosa telling the other Champions that she would take Link for training and wished the girl with the golden hair to come watch. She remembers Urbosa asking Impa to stay with the others for the sake of Link's anxiety.

She remembers Urbosa thanking her.

She remembers the girl with the golden hair never once looking at her.

She remembers Urbosa's words.

"You've heard this before, Link, I'm sure. Sometimes these things bear repeating, though." She remembers Urbosa's laugh; she remembers the snap of Urbosa's fingers whenever she thought of something, the same snap that Link picked up from the Champion of Sageru. "Power isn't about being strong, but about seeing the truth even though you want to cling to the things that make life easy. Wisdom isn't about being smart, but about making the best decisions with what knowledge you have. And courage...well, O Courageous Link, courage isn't about being reckless, and it isn't about not being afraid. Courage is about doing things even though you're afraid." She remembers Urbosa embracing her. "So thank you. For reminding me that courage isn't just about fighting monsters. Sometimes it's about being honest with yourself."

Hands around either side of her head. The blindfolds lifts. The light bathes her.

Her eyes adjust and from the brightness of the open sky before her—the clearest, bluest sky that she has ever seen—Link blinks her vision into focus on the girl. Her companion.

Riju.

Riju, who offers Link her hand, her fingers balled up into a fist.

"I promised you," she says, her eyes twinkling more brightly than the stars at night, "didn't I?"

Link raises her own fist. Their knuckles touch. Their fingers intertwine.

"So, so, how did you like it?" asks Riju. "My four favourite kinds of trout, glazed with honey and fried. You don't fry them separately; you mix them together into fishballs, so that you have every flavour in every bite. A constant explosion of flavour! Ah, what do you think?"

Link finds herself responding honestly: the dish tastes incredible on its first bite, much better than if she had fried them separately, but becomes repetitive and dull in comparison after a time. Instead, Riju could consider making the fishballs out of larger chunks, so that each bite would have more than one of the types of trout with their unique flavours, yet not all of the flavours at once. That way she would never know whether the next bite would burn her, or freeze her over, or shock her, or whatever that fourth slightly subduing flavour held.

For a moment her companion says nothing, merely ogling her with widened eyes, and Link considers tossing herself off of the palace roof. Then Riju bursts out laughing. "Thank the Goddesses that you met me as Ruboona. Do you know how hard it is to get actual feedback on your cooking?"

Link flinches. "I meant no disrespect, Your—"

Riju lifts her hand, palm facing Link, to stop her. "Please, Link. Just Riju is fine. I'm not one for ceremony. You know, when you first awoke, and were signing to me with such formal speech like the eldest of my advisors, I worried that you already knew who I was. Then, I realised that you must have learned Parapan from books written before the Great Calamity." Link feels the blood drain from her face. To her relief Riju moves on: she gestures towards the glazed balls of mixed fish meat on the plate in front of Link. "So, aren't you going to finish?"

"With pleasure."

Even as she signs, she has already reached for the plate; she swallows down the miniature explosives.

Holding her hand in front of her mouth to subdue the continuous giggling, Riju sits down beside her. Link lifts an arm and slings it around her companion's shoulders almost instinctively, as she—as her body—as she has done so many with Aryll.

Riju relaxes against her shoulder.
"It's nice," she murmurs, "to be able to take the crown off sometimes."

Link hugs her.

"Ah, that's why I went to Savah Naboris, you know. As a child, I am hardly fit to rule. Then, I thought, if I could prove myself to my people..." Riju's timbre fades off. "Yet, I succeeded in worrying everyone instead, especially Buliara..." Link pokes a bit of fish into Riju's mouth; the Queen of Parapa giggles and accepts it. "You're right. Let's focus on the here and now. We were successful, thank the Goddesses, and that's what matters."

When she polishes off the plate, Link gazes out at the city of Nabooru and at the Divine Beast watching from above. Perhaps her memories exaggerated its size, but the city—like Darunia, concentrated mostly on the lower levels where once the city had extended upwards into the heavens; like Medli, which has lost entire pillars in the lake and whose villages has only reached halfway up the pillars from the Medli she saw before—seems so much smaller than before the Great Calamity.

She sucks the bread crumbs and honey sauce from her fingers.

"Ah, I know that you have to leave soon, Link," Riju begins, folding her hands in her lap as if holding a cup of tea, "but...you still have to make me fried bananas." Link raises her hands, but Riju halts her with a glance. "I can take a rain check on that. Besides, the legends speak of the trials that the chosen hero has to undergo. The researchers at Uruda have identified and verified the existence of such shrines across Parapa." Riju raises her eyebrows. "Then, shouldn't you look at those before you go?"

Link laughs and her nerves tremble her throat. "The shrines? You said they're for the chosen hero."

Riju returns the mirth, her mouth hidden behind her hand. "And whom might I be speaking to, then?"

The laughter stops.

"You've mistaken me for someone." Link stares blankly ahead at the sky. "I'm not the chosen hero. I'm only a messenger with the slate. The chosen hero lived a hundred years ago. I've just...been asked to clean up the scraps."

Riju's eyebrows arch further. "Then, do you have no intention of endeavouring to—to understand what has happened? To fight against the Calamitous One?"

Link tilts her head to the side. "The Calamity? Wasn't that a hundred years ago? I don't know what happened, exactly."

She watches Riju's eyes widen, and Link hastens to explain:

"I...lost my memories of all that happened to me, a few months ago." Over a year, now. "I don't know much about the Great Calamity except that it happened."

Riju inclines her head in understanding. To Link's relief, she does not press about the memory loss. "Then, allow me to explain. One hundred years ago, on the eve of the Great Calamity, the guardians and Beasts Divine turned against us. Untold destruction. Lives lost, so many that it will take centuries to ever return. Nabooru...I never knew the splendors that my beloved city once held, but the archivists tell me that the rebuilt Nabooru has scarcely reached a fifth of the space that the city once occupied. The records indicate that somewhere between three-quarters and nine-tenths of Parapan towns were outrightly destroyed. Then, when all hope seemed lost, the Calamitous One was sealed away again. A victory most pyrrhic, for the Princess, her Knight, and the Champions had perished, as had most of the armies of Hyrule.

"Since then, we have had one hundred years of peace. Monsters that existed were few in number, and the Divine Beasts and guardians had fallen silent. Slowly we began to recover. I...am too young to know what the world was like, then." She smiles distantly, and then her smile deepens into one of pride. "Ah, yet my people of Parapa are nothing if not resilient. We have one another, as the kin granted us by the Goddess Sageru. And we have the power, the wisdom, and the courage of the Golden Goddesses. Our ancestors persevered. They cleansed the land of monsters. They rebuilt and repaired. They healed, thank the Goddesses. Then, we thought that the storm had passed. We'd even begun to re-establish trade routes with other cities. Only a few travellers, and we still had to deal with the..." Her voice trails off. "So, life was not perfect. Yet the world was looking up. Thank the Goddesses, we could see peace within our grasp."

Riju closes her eyes. "Then, a few months ago...our world once more spun into turmoil. Overnight monsters teemed from everywhere. Savah Naboris awoke. She devastated the peoples of the desert and carried it with Her wherever She walked. My mother was assa—my mother passed away. And I..."

The taste of honeyed fish. The fish that she and Urbosa honeyed together on their last night in Nabooru before the trek back to the Castle. As Link's training with Urbosa had finished, she would travel next to Eldin, and then to Lanayru, and then finally to Tabantha to complete her circuit of learning from each of the Champions. Daruk insisted on his training next: he and Urbosa had, after all, been the ones to convince the King to allow Link to quit the castletown and go elsewhere to train.

The Queen of Parapa had offered to throw them a feast; Impa had intervened to remind the Queen that Link was not to be shown to the people at large, for the mismatch between the official description of Her Majesty's Knight—as specified in the legends and the prophecies—and the scrawny brown-haired girl currently stuffing herself with herbed flatbread.

Urbosa invited Link to her quarters where the two now sat on the floor around a ruby-fired grill with a sapphire ice-box of bass and a green jar of honey. To Link's left side, her ages rested against Urbosa's lute.

It took Link some ten minutes of mentally going over the gestures to finally force the question from her fingertips. "Don't you want to...spend time with the Princess?"

Urbosa spun the spatula in her right hand. "Hey now, I'm allowed to want spend time with you, too. And it's your last night here. She and I will have plenty of time afterwards. Tonight, I'm cooking with you."

That brought the slightest of smiles ghosting over Link's lips as she drew a pinch of fenugreek from a red pot by her left knee to sprinkle over the skillet on the grill.

"You know," Urbosa mentioned, flipping over the whole Hyrule bass in the bottom of the skillet, the honey slowly deepening its gold in the oil, "you've come really far, Link."

Her gaze riveted on the fish, Link could only cock her head to the side.

"The first month you spent here, I didn't hear a peep from you. You just stayed quiet and went through your drills. I could see you getting physically better, sure. Yet that's not the sole reason behind Daruk and I wanting to train you outside of the castle." Link forced her chin up. Urbosa's warm smile crinkled her eyes. "See? You've come so far. Daruk and I figured that being around all those expectations in the castle was weighing down on you. I still don't know that much about you. Mostly about your friends, whom I'm grateful to have heard about."

Link could sense a thread of heat rising in her cheeks; Urbosa's smile only deepened as she tilted back her head, her eyes catching a mischievous glint of light.

"It took a lot of food—" Link rubbed the back of her head. "—but I finally figured out the ticket to getting you to talk. So thank you for everything that you've told me about yourself. And, hey, maybe you could come out to meet my family one day." Urbosa's features softened. "I'm taking her out to Rovah tomorrow to meet them. You should come sometime."

Link returned her gaze to the skillet. She could see Urbosa grimacing from the corner of her vision, just for a second before that smile returned.

"You don't have to if you don't want to, Link," she said gently. "Do you want to talk about it? Well, I guess that's an empty question, isn't it? Hm, is it something about the Princess? No? Something about Marin?" Link stared blankly at the fish. "Something about Rovah? About my family? About your family?"

Despite her efforts to keep very, very still—her muscles so taut that her tendons had begun to ache, her sinews shivering from the exertion—Link sensed the tiniest of tremors quiver up her spine to twitch the features of her face.

Urbosa's mouth thinned into a line.

"My family life isn't perfect either, you know, though I do love them very much." Another twitch of Link's facial features. She listened to Urbosa hiss her breath out between her teeth. "I'm sorry. That wasn't the right thing to say. Link, you know you can talk to me about anything. Even if I haven't been through the same things that you have, I'd still like to be here for you." Urbosa started to lift a hand towards Link's face, but, when Link curled her shoulders away, Urbosa retracted her arm down to her lap. "As you have been here for me. Thank you again for helping me find the courage to admit the things that I'd been keeping away from myself." Link kept her gaze trained very intensely on the honeyed bass. She flipped it over again in the skillet. The oil sizzled the frying fish's vapours to waft around Urbosa's chamber. The tangy-coppery scent of the fish and the round sweetness of the honey, sharpened by spice and tempered by heat, loosened Link's hands.

"I didn't do anything," she signed after a time. "All I did was make food."

Urbosa tipped her head back to laugh, though not unkindly. "There's a lot you can do just by listening without judgment. And there's a lot you can do just by giving someone a warm meal when she feels alone. Especially with how much work you put in getting those recipes. Don't think I didn't notice. Is that a blush I see? Hehe. So let me return the favour to you, Link. You don't have to feel alone. You can always talk to me about anything. I'm your friend."

Link scooped the fish from the skillet into a plate; she bisected the bass down the middle for two portions of fillet, half tender and flakey, half drenched in honey and butter.

"Let's not ruin tonight with it." Urbosa ran her tongue over her lower lip. Nodding her head ferociously, Link licked her own lips as saliva welled up in her mouth from the crispy sound of the fried bass dripping in oiled honey. "Instead, let's dig in."

By the time Link emerged from Urbosa's quarters with a belly full of food, a head full of music, and a chest full of warmth, the night had shadowed the inner corridors of the palace in a blue as deep as Urbosa's favoured dress. Link tucked the ages under her arm as she crept towards her own chambers. In the morning, Link would pack her belongings for the long trek across Parapa, Faron, and Central Hyrule towards the northeast. For now, she would bury herself in blanket and pillow to sleep off the feast she and Urbosa shared.

Link rested her hand against the door of her room. As she began to slide the door open, she observed a second shadow next to hers. An all too thin and all too tall shadow that she knew all too well.

"You."

Even though Impa had not so much as twitched a muscle, Link felt as if Impa had sunk a sapphire-bladed axe into her abdomen to freeze her limbs down to her feet, the bottoms of her boots iced against the ground.

She turned her head. From her left eye, Link watched the woman in black, the tattoo of the teardrop under her left eye in the symbol of the Goddess Sheik, the single strand of hair lifted up from the short cut of the rest, the red sash around her waist like a mortal injury—like the Calamitous One itself had clawed her in half from hip to hip.

"You," Impa hissed again. Even in the darkness of the hallway, Link could see the narrowed eyes, the wrinkles of the brow, the sharpness of the taunted mouth, the angry angled furrows of skin between the bridge of her nose and the corners of her eyes. "Do not think that I do not see what you are doing. Do you not understand the gravity of the situation?"

Link said nothing; she could only stare vacantly ahead at the wall beyond Impa's silhouette.

"The sword that seals the darkness—which you carry upon your very back even now—has chosen you. You, and not anyone else. When the Calamitous One descends upon us, you alone will wield that blade. Her Majesty will rely upon you to hold that sacred sword; her blessed blood cannot suffice to seal the Calamitous One. Do you understand that? You are here to train. You are not here to make friends. The Champions are not your friends. The Champions are not your family. The Champions are the pilots of the Divine Beasts and the protectors of this realm. We do not have time to spend getting to know one another and cooking."

Biting down the syllable with a twitch of the lip, Impa spit out the final word like a rotten fish. Link flinched back; her shoulder blades hit the door to her chambers.

The sudden snapping of something against the floor recoiled Link back.
"May I remind you," Impa whispered, every words as precise as a sapphire-tipped arrowhead driven into the soft flesh just above Link's own collarbones to choke into the base of her throat until she could no longer breathe, "that only as long as you fulfill the role of the Knight is your charge boarded safely in the Castle."

Impa's tone iced her veins and sloughed her skin from her body, marrowing her to the leaden bone.

If Impa had taken the blade of evil's bane and wrenched it through Link's spine to force her erect, Link would have felt less pain than the clenching of her heart—so hard that Link lifted a hand to her own chest—at the implication of Impa's words.

Her charge.

Her charge.

Aryll.

"Do I make myself clear?"

The muscles of her neck ground together like rocks as Link forced herself to nod.

"And do you not understand what you have done to Her Majesty? Do you take me for a fool? I have spent my entire life assisting Her Majesty in assuming her predestined role as Incarnation of Hylia, Princess of Hyrule, the Blessed Bloodline's Vessel, O Wise Her Majesty, and I will not allow you to interfere. This is not about your happiness or your belonging. This is not about her happiness. Impa's voice tightened to a pitch uncharacteristically high. "This is not about my happiness either." She hacked out her own timbre. "This is about the future of Hyrule and all of her people. Do I make myself clear?"

Again Link forced herself to nod.

"If you cannot stop treating the pilots of the Divine Beasts as your family instead of the powerful allies whom they are, then the Calamity shall only end in grief for all of Hyrule."

Link dugs her fingers into the chest of her tunic, sprawled her hands over her sternum, cupped her thudding heart in her palm. Yet she could do nothing but continue to look forward with her features neutral and her eyes vacant.

Impa did not curl her lip. Impa did not shift the chiselled hardness of her expression. Impa continued to speak as icily as she had before. "The Champions do not care about you. They merely pity you. Take it from me, who has spent her life in service to Her Majesty: harden your heart, sharpen your blade, and focus on the destiny that the Goddesses have placed upon your shoulders. Do I make myself clear? If you cannot, then lay down the sword that seals the darkness, and let it choose another. You can do that much, at least."

Her voice washed the taste of honeyed fish from Link's mouth to leave the metallic copper of the cheek she had bitten through.

And now Riju's voice washes the taste of honeyed fish from Link's mouth to leave the metallic copper of the tongue she has bitten through.

"...I suspect that the Calamity was never destroyed."

Opening her eyes, Riju fixes Link with a gaze as heavy as all of the sands of Parapa over her head at once. "I suspect that the Calamitous One was sealed away, yet I do not know how permanently. Ah, there have been sightings on occasion reported of the malice within the castle that once belonged to the kingdom of Hyrule. Then, it could be that the Calamitous One has—or will—return." She does not cry, but her eyes have wetted. "And I don't know if Parapa could survive another onslaught." She paused. "...Link? Link, you're bleeding."

A dribble of wetness beaded at the corner of Link's lips. The warmth trickled down to her chin. The pain of her own writhing tongue focused her enough to dredge the words from her fingers.

"...I'm sorry, but I'm not the chosen one." Link shakes her head.

Riju's lips part. "Link—"

Link shakes her head more violently. A droplet of crimson flecks Riju's cheeks, and her shoulders fall.

Link keeps herself signing the words that she marks with her own blood. "After I bring the slate to the fourth Divine Beast, I have...a few promises to keep. And then I'm going home."

"Home," Riju echoes. Link inclines her head. The bead of blood on her chin drops to redden her trousers. "Wait, Link. You said...the fourth Divine Beast. You've calmed two of them, haven't you? Then, which ones?" She takes a step forward and Link cowers behind her hands. "Please, Link."

She forces the words out one by one. Each motion of her arms feels like taking a knife and pressing it against the hollow of her throat, pushing inwards, and inwards, and inwards. "...Eldin. Darunia. Vah Rudania. Tabantha. Medli. Vah Medoh."

Riju reaches out. Her fingers close around Link's wrists. "How can you not be the chosen hero if you've done so much for—"

Link jerks her arms away, flinches back, senses how desperately her body tries to plummet. "I'm sorry." Link rises to her feet. "I'm sorry." She gathers her belongings. "I'm sorry." She turns away.

The present Champion of Sageru speaks but Link cannot hear her above the silence of her own tears, above the roar of memory in her ears, above the dust of ten thousand years.

—

Glazed Seafood (twelve hearts) - chillfin trout, courser bee honey, sizzlefin trout, stealthfin trout, voltfin trout

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: We begin with a cataloging of the injuries that Link received at the hands of Thunderblight Ganon. Remember that she has a scar across her right cheek (from the corner of her eye to her jawbone) back from the twentieth chapter.

What she has connected to her arm is a rudimentary IV drip.

The healer is a pretty big fan of Riju; opinions on Riju vary, as some think that she's much too young to rule and that someone else should inherit the throne, while others consider her a beloved ruler if a possibly tragic figure.
Burn injuries often do not recover sensation if the nerves have been too burned; the skin there is now permanently scarred over, although the deep pressure sensory nerves still work, below where the scar is. Link's foot will be fine as long as it doesn't get infected. The seeds that Link was given are poppy seeds, used for pain relief.

There's the paraglider! Like the cooking pot, it's been recovered and repaired. It did indeed get hit by lightning, but now Riju has fitted it with rubber and topaz, so it's much more lightning resistant. That'll sure in handy in Lanayru!

She's officially upgraded to a blue tunic now from her original green, at this the halfway point, similar to other titles where you acquire the blue mail or blue ring around the halfway point (for most players, although this varies given that you can do things in different orders). Now, how about that eventual red tunic?

Like our modern "They're coming for lunch—we're in a jam!/Keep cool—just open a can of spam!", Riju is an adherent of the Parapan saying, "When in doubt, cook up trout."

The fourth flavour is stealthfin trout, which serves to "mute" other flavours and thus is used to temper flavours that would otherwise be too strong. In this case, Riju tries to throw in a bunch of different flavours at once, including many different spices that aren't necessarily used together, in order to create a "symphony" on the palette. To avoid overwhelming the eater, she also included stealthfin fin trout. Imagine that you were mixing a song composed of many different instruments. You could ask the instruments to all play at their loudest, but there's an upper bound on how much noise someone listening can stand, even if all of the individual instruments are playing well. By lowering the volumes across the board, you can actually allow more variation of individual instruments (in this case, flavours) to come through without being overwhelming. Actually, if you're interested about this sort of thing in music, I recommend looking up the loudness wars; it's a fascinating concept.

Remember what Link said to Tulin about how courage is doing something even though you're afraid of those things, all those chapters ago? Why, it was Urbosa who told that to her!

Urbosa uses some of the "training time" to have alone time with Zelda to continue their relationship, which she obviously can't do in public. Link is happy to oblige. Zelda does not know about Link's involvement.

Riju's comment about Link's speech, of course, is another nod to her "talking like a grandmother". Even though Link has improved in other languages, she (prior to talking to Riju) hasn't had much of an opportunity to improve her Parapan, as she's spent most of her time just wandering around.

I won't say much about Impa in this chapter as it requires context you'll get later, but please note that she doesn't just exist to be antagonistic. Link talks about her friends being threatened with Daruk because Impa threatened Aryll here.

Zelda's full title is the Incarnation of Hylia, the Princess of Hyrule, the the Blessed Bloodline's Vessel, O Wise Zelda Satoru Miyahon Harkinian.

While Link is okay with becoming the bearer of the slate, she's not yet ready to accept the pressure of having to deal with Calamity Ganon ahead. She doesn't even really know if Calamity Ganon exists (neither does Riju). When Riju tries to press her into becoming the true chosen one, Link flinches and runs. She needs to cross this last hurdle. But Link doesn't leave Riju behind as abruptly as she did Amali and Yunobo! At least she got to talk to Amali, rather than just not seeing her.

Up next: towards Lanayru, and towards Link's home.

midna's ass. 09 October 2017.

Beta reader's comments: Link leaving Riju behind is so incredibly sad. She's so close to a breakthrough, but just not quite quite there - she needs that final nudge. Soon.

The "yet, and yet" scene is a really cool bit of writing.

We, sadly, have to abruptly leave Riju behind, as abruptly as we left Amali and Yunobo. Don't worry; we'll see her again.

Emma. 09 October 2017.
Creamy Seafood Soup

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef once more travels through Parapa and arrives in Aveil to see some rather familiar faces.

Chapter Notes

As usual: Well now, check out this incredibly short chapter, about the size of the very first chapter! After so many rounds of excessively long chapters that took me significant time to write, I wanted a day's break, and so tried to curtail the chapter length. We'll see how successful that actually was (not very). This is also when my girlfriend was visiting me this summer, which funk'd up my writing schedule quite a bit (along with the fact that the chapters were getting longer).

Link's adventures in Parapa have taken her throughout the spring.

The imprint of the camel on the pass, by the way, was in reference to Vah Naboris.

Link has been forever blacklisted from modulga whaling. However, she hasn't been blacklisted from sand seal racing. One of the places in which Link emotes the most in-game is with regards to the sand seal racing (see my author's notes first written back in April with the foreword). My interpretations of Link's animations were confirmed when I looked up the Japanese version of Breath of the Wild, where Link comments on how fun sand seal racing is, while not saying about other minigames.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

She paraglides from the roof of the city down into the grass that surrounds the stone walls of Naboooru. Without the ability to enter the city, Link cannot rent a sand seal, and, perhaps more worryingly, she has lost the slip of brightly-coloured paper that held her Parapan pass with the imprint of a camel.

Link has with her the cooking pot, the repaired paraglider, the red telescope, and the long straight sword in the blue-cloth shield. Yet she has left behind the shield and the scimitar carried by the messengers. She has her satchel with the spring green elixirs. And the yellow elixirs—resistance to electricity—that she could sell if she needs to. She wears the blue tunic and trousers provided by the tailors. But with the rapidness with which she soared off the roof has left Link without the loose robes meant for the desert.

And yet she has no intention whatsoever of trekking through the sands to locate the trials meant for the chosen one.

She will bear the slate. This much, Link can do. She will go to where the last Divine Beast may yet rampage upon the world, and she will calm the Divine Beast, and then she will go to Medli, and then perhaps to the Yiga as she promised Dorian, and then to Romani Ranch.
When she returns to Romani Ranch, Link will have to sit Romani down, to ask about the bwig bwad bwoar, although she has only heard one other person use that particular phrase: Revali.

Link must have relayed that to Marin, and then Marin to Maryll, and Maryll to Malon, and Malon to Cremia and Romani.

No, not Link.

But the one who once inhabited her body.

For now, she has a horse to find and to somehow scale over a series of mountains and highlands and then to the Divine Beast Vah Rutoh. Vah Ruti. Vah Ruda. Vah Rudoris. Vah something or other.

The River Sageru runs past the city of Nabooru, not close enough for the flood during the rainy season to reach the sandstone walls. Through some mechanism of pumping, the city brings the water up from the river to the palace, from where it flows in covered troughs throughout Nabooru for all to enjoy. Link remembers Urbosa explaining the mechanism to her in more detail while she stuffed candied dates into her mouth, but now she can recall only the vaguest of impressions. These same troughs extend down from the city walls to run back into the river. Waste not, want not.

She follows the troughs to the river and then follows the river down to Ache's Veil on foot. In the river's water LInk attempts to catch fish without a fishing pole. Tulin's nicknamed hylian bomb fishing does not work well with the speed of the water swelled by the approaching onset of the rainy season. She notes on her cheek a purple scar left where the malice pockmarked her; when she lifts her undershirt sleeve, her left shoulder—where the Malice's arrow pierced her—bears a similar swirl of violet.

Upon arrival in Ache's Veil, Link returns to the inn outside of the village. She rings the bell, and the innkeep Vaike—who suspected Link might have died—emerges to return Ilia to Link. Link finds Nadyne asleep at one of the chairs in the inn. Vaike whispers to Link that Nadyne has worried for her day in and day out, though Nadyne herself would never admit so. When Link pokes Nadyne's cheek, Nadyne shakes her head and asks for five more minutes. When Link pokes her cheek again, and again, and again, she hears Nadyne murmur, "You're persistent...you find the heart over the ocean...Lover's Pond...I can tell you that much..."

Link pokes her cheek a final time and Nadyne jumps. Instinctively Link leaps back; she finds herself holding her pot in front of her as an aegis. Rubbing her eyes with her hands, Nadyne stares at Link, then chides her for not having returned to Ache's Veil in so long, for having told Nadyne to pick up the slate in case anything happens, for having made Nadyne pace back and forth and follow the Divine Beast around for hours while the damned piece of junk wandered from here to the coast and back again. Only when Nadyne noticed that the Divine Beast eyes had changed colour from purple to blue did she finally return to Ache's Veil.

And then Link had not come back for several more days. "I thought you were dead. We all thought you were dead. What was I supposed to do with your horse? I don't even ride horses." Link listens to her go on and on. She smiles sheepishly. "For Goddess's sake, you'll have to tell me all about whatever in the world you did to that hunk of garbage. That's all the payment I need."

"I thought you said that I don't owe you anything by the contract..."

"Contract shmontract. Sageru Herself could come down right now and tell me to can it and why I'd..." Nadyne sighs. The volume of her voice lowers. "...probably hup to the ground in reverence. Kiss the ground on which She walks and all that. For Goddess's sake, sorry there, Goddess." She brings her hands up to her face. "You know, people who live in grass houses shouldn't chuck torches at their own walls. Or however that saying goes. For Goddess's sake you've got me all tangled up over a stranger, girl!"

Vaike snkts a snort of laughter.

Writing on a sheet of paper for Vaike's benefit, Link explains that she lost her Parapan pass in the storm. Vaike goes off to speak to something she calls the proper people to inquire about a new pass.

Nadyne disappears into Ache's Veil. Link bounces on the balls of her feet. Ilia. Her companion. Her friend.

Over these past few months Link herself has become, she feels, Ilia's shadow. For all of the times that she has had to leave Ilia for a day or week, she always returns.

And, when Ilia emerges from the door to Ache's Veil, Link hugs her tight and feels as though she could never let go.

She waves Nadyne and Vaike good-bye with her companion beside her and a new pass in her hand. Nadyne cups her hands around her mouth to shout that Link will forever remain blacklisted from molduga whaling, but that she should come back anytime if she wants to participate in the sand seal races held every full moon. "I'd like to see you end up headfirst in the sand, I'll tell you that much!"

Link brings with her, from Nadyne, a container of sand seal butter and a carton of sand seal milk. The greatest gifts Nadyne could have given her.

On the road she passes travellers full of news about the Divine Beast Vah Naboris, about the sudden ceasing of the storm, about *are you coming from the west and have you seen the Divine Beast? and isn't Nabooru going to be open now? and say, traveller, can I interest you in some extremely rare insects that you'll never see 'round these parts going now for the low-low price of—? and what? You want some of my soup? I don't see why not; nothing like sharing food on the road with a fellow wanderer. The soup tastes marvelous and Link notes the recipe for herself.

She gathers herbs and flowers along the way. Her efforts at removing voltfruit come slightly better than before: she only gets spines in her right arm rather than in both and also in her chest. An improvement. Perhaps next time she will only have to pick spines out of a single hand!

Link raises her eyebrows at Ilia, who whinnies at her. "Don't look at me like that, girl," she signs. "Unless you don't want the voltfruit."

The half of voltfruit that Link almost proffers to Ilia sparks with electricity. Link glances at the fleshy yellow-pink interior of the fruit, notes the static that emanates from its core, and on second thought eats it herself.

Passing by a pond, she pauses to fish: voltfin trout, as expected, and another sort of fish, deep blue in colour and with a face so funny-looking that Link snickers out a laugh and then laughs more loudly and then holds the fish up to Ilia to show her how ridiculous the fish looks. Her companion neighs; Ilia bumps the fish with her nose, then rears from the sudden scent of fish clinging to her face.

Laughing all the harder, Link helps to wash the fish-scent from Ilia's nose.

For the fatigue of the constant trek to the east, Link opts for stew that she can simmer without paying it too much attention. She removes the flowers from the safflina she has picked and tosses them into a cooking pot of seals' milk and diced voltfin trout—the insides of the fish nearly shudder static up her hands until she places the spent topaz of the paraglider near enough to draw their electricity—and the blue fish with the funny face, which she can barely cut with her knife. Gritting her teeth, Link brings out the big swords.

Literally.

She stands up, draws the sword Riju gave her from the sheathe, raises it up and up above her head, and brings it down upon the fish. The strike vibrates up the blade to turn her arms into chuchu jelly.

It takes three or five or ten strikes to cleave the armoured skin away from the meat of the fish. But oh does the taste make her efforts worth all the while.

Then Link waits for the stew to simmer. Chewing on a blade of grass, she fashions a whistle.

The first few attempts choke and die, but she perseveres. To recall the melodies from her memories, both old and new. That Marin—who loved her—sang for her, and that Malon—who loves her, in a different way—will sing for her when she next returns to Romani Ranch.

Epona's song.

Link wipes the tears from her eyes just in time for her to check in on the other love of her life: cooking.

She laps at the stew; her mouth fills with seal milk. The creamiest, fattiest milk that she has ever tasted.

Link cannot get enough.

Picking up the cooking pot in her hands, she slots her mouth around the rim. Like the Eldic rock octoroks sucking in stone to feed, Link opens her mouth wide to inhale the litres of thick, thick stew that nearly chokes her on its route down her throat in its fishy-flowery-salty-spicy deliciousness.

As she wolfs down the soup, her throat constricting in her gulps, Link considers the existence of the fourth Divine Beast.

A flash of memory comes to her, clear and hot as the stew in her mouth en route to her gut.

The party. Travelling together. To Nabooru once more, for the girl with the golden hair to undergo a trial held by the Oracles of the Goddesses Farore, Nayru, and Din in the great golden temple at the very heart of the city. The Champions taking turns attempting to give the girl with the golden hair advice on how to tap into the magic of her blessed bloodline. The girl with the sharks' teeth suggesting that she think of someone who matters to her, someone she loves romantically. Daruk proposing that she try to bring up all of her feelings for the sake of Hyrule and the people she tries to protect. Revali snorting and spouting out something rude enough for Impa to silence him with a glare. Urbosa saying something about how she could try to channel her passion for research into the quest for the sacred sealing magic.

Around the campfire the Princess, her Knights, the Champions, and the Princess's shade sat. Link cooked them a hearty stew on the milk they had picked up from ranches along the road, the safflina that she had gathered while the girl with the golden hair prayed, and the fish that the girl with the sharks' teeth had caught from a pond.
Suddenly the girl with the golden hair clapped her fist into her palm. "I've got it!" she cried out, and all of her features seemed to smile at once with the flash of insight. Urbosa snapped her fingers in appreciation. Revali arched his eyebrows, muttering something about being plucked under his breath. Daruk made an ooh! noise and slapped his hands together. The red-scaled zora girl with the sharks' teeth clapped politely.

"You did?" Daruk boomed out. "Congrats, li'l lady! How—"

"I've got what we'll call the Divine Beasts!"

The party gathered around the campfire fell silent. Impa's expression remained impassive as ever. The girl with the golden hair did not appear to notice the disappointment and confusion. She continued onwards at a barrelling speed, her words flowing out of her mouth almost more quickly than she could finish speaking them. "We don't know how to read most of Loftean, but there are a few things that we strongly suspect. We think that the name Vah, as in the name of the great sorcerer Ti of legend, indicates something or someone that commands high respect in its use of magic.

"Since the Divine Beasts are supposed to have some form of sacred power themselves—something to do with the Sacred Realm, I think, not simply advanced technology or what have you—it would make perfect sense to refer to them as Vah, wouldn't it?" The girl with the golden hair bounced up and down on the upturned log. "Wouldn't it?"

Daruk opened his mouth and Urbosa placed a hand on his shoulder, prompting him to close it again. Revali yawned. Link watched him fluff himself up and tuck his head under his wing.

"There are four Divine Beasts, each in a corner of Hyrule: Lanayru, Eldin, Tabantha, and Parapa. At first I thought that we could name them after the regions, or perhaps the Goddesses. Yet as I started to look deeper into the archives, I found a suggestion that the names of the four great capitals of Hyrule have come from names of former Sages of their respective Goddesses. We'll use the declensions of each of the ancient forms of the languages most commonly spoken in those regions. Oh, I cross-checked against a variety of sources—" She tapped her fingers on the satchel around her shoulders, with its platoon of volumes marshalling a veritable army of coloured bookmarks. "—and have come up with the following names. For Darunia: Vah Rudania. For Medli: Vah Medoh. For Nabooru: Vah Naboris. For Ruto: Vah Ruta.

Link found herself dozing off. She understood nearly none of the girl with the golden hair's speech, yet the girl with the golden hair's sheer enthusiasm kept her awake. She rested her chin on the winged violet hilt of the blade of evil's bane.

When she squished her cheek against the wing and her ear against the cylindrical hilt, she could almost hear, faintly like a reverberation of a song far, far away, a light little laugh from the voice of a young girl.

The girl with the golden hair spoke without running out of steam. Link watched Urbosa gaze at her with an expression of genuine fascination, her chin propped up on her palms, her elbows on her knees, the fondness of her smile reminding Link of how often she had caught Marin looking at her pay that same curve of the lip. The girl with the sharks' teeth seemed to paid attention half out of interest and half out of sheer politeness, while Daruk rubbed his hand on the crown of his head. After a time, Daruk fell asleep. After a slightly longer time, the girl with the sharks' teeth tipped forward. Her torso plopped into the dust of the ground.

Urbosa picked the girl with the sharks' teeth's unconscious form up to learn the Champion of Zola against her own shoulder. The girl with the golden hair scarcely noticed. Now she had begun smacking her research notes against her own knees. She vibrated fit to shatter apart into a thousand fragments that could take off into orbit from the sheer enthusiasm with which she went on.

"—and so I believe that what we refer to as Loftean may not actually have originated at the time of the Era of the Sky, but much later than that. Oh the true Loftean could be a language still older than that, perhaps the ancestor of the language we currently refer to as Loftean. On the other hand, some sources indicate that—"

At length Impa stood up. She collected the discarded plates from the slumbering party. "Your Majesty." The girl with the golden hair ignored her to continue on about the differences in various kinds of Loftean—that was the topic as far as Link could tell, though she did not know what Loftean even meant—and Impa gripped her shoulder.

"Your Majesty."

The girl with the golden hair's jaw snapped shut. She stared down at the ground between her knees. She apologised, quietly, and Urbosa thanked her for telling them so much, which in turn caused Impa to narrow her eyes at the Champion of Sageru.

Link offered to take the first watch, seeing as everyone else appeared asleep or close to it. The girl with the golden hair fell to slumber soon—after Impa caught her attempting to read a book in her tent, which the Princess's shade confiscated—and left Link, Impa, and Urbosa yet awake.

She remembers Impa snapping at Urbosa, who merely raised her eyebrows. The Champion of Sageru remarked, in a calm and even voice, that the girl with the golden hair not only deserved their fullest attention, but also that her speech provided the best soporific imaginable in times when waking nightmares robbed them of their sleep.

Impa did not laugh. Urbosa wagged her eyebrows at her and Link stifled back her own laugh to avoid awakening the others while Impa and Urbosa continued their dance of expressions. Eventually Impa bedded herself down to sleep.

Shaking her head, Link sticks her face into her cooking pot to lick up the last few droplets of the creamy stew.

When she tries to pull her head back out, she finds her chin stuck against the neck of the pot. She attempts to touch her chin to puzzle out a way for exit the pot without breaking her neck only for her hand to bang against the rim of the pot. She gasps.

How can she think if she cannot even touch her own chin with her hand?

Sand seal butter. The seal butter that she still has. Groping around for the cake of it in her satchel, Link rubs butter around her neck as best she can. When her own body heat does not melt the butter swiftly enough, she sets the pot—with her head still stuck in it—on the fire.

sweat drips from her forehead. The metal heats more rapidly than she anticipated. Grabbing the cooking pot-turned-deathtrap with her bare hands, she struggles to either free her head or else cook herself to death in soup.

Though Link cannot think of a better route of losing her humanity than becoming stew-manity.
Yet the butter works its fatty magic and her head pops out of the inside of the cooking pot with such vigor that the ground comes up to greet the back of her head.

She spreads out her limbs in the grass. The warm cooking pot bonks onto her stomach and rolls off to rest by her left side. Link inhales, pauses, and then with howls with laughter until her stomach hurts as much as the bruised-and-buttered band around her neck.

But for once the memory has proven more immediately useful: Lanayru. Ruto. The Divine Beast Vah Ruta.

Lanayru, somewhere south of the province of Ordona, and east of Necluda. From Necluda—from Kasuto—she need go east. East of Hateno, perhaps.

East, and east, and east, to find where rises the sun.

Link steams safflina for Ilia to eat. Warm safflina and electric safflina. Link tests them to ensure that the fire and shock will not hurt Ilia: heat-tempering the herbs together seems to reduce their elemental properties. Ilia slurps them up. Link rests her head against her companion's shoulder.

"It's good to see you again, girl," she signs. Ilia's ears flick back and forth. When she finishes off the safflina, she browses through Link’s hair, and Link unties her ponytail to give Ilia more hair on which to chew.

They travel onwards. From sand to steppe to grass, from just after the ides of spring to just before the start of summer.

At the topaz gate of Aveil, Link shows the altered pass—the new one that Nadyne and Vaike gave—to the guards. She explains honestly about the storm in which she found herself caught and the loss of her pass. The guards almost turn her away regardless.

And then another woman vouches for her.

Dyeri.

Dyeri, who has finished the contract with Rotana and Rhiaru. Dyeri, who has come to Aveil to work as hired muscle for some merchants in the gem trade. Dyeri, who has saved Link and Ilia's lives.

"Hey there, stranger," Dyeri says cheerily, tilting up her chin. "Don't know what you did with Savah Naboris, but I could swear by the Goddesses that you did good." She says nothing more on the matter and for that alone she has Link's eternal gratitude. "So. Want to come meet the folks I'll be travelling with? Depending on where you're going, we could walk together for a time."

Link nods her head. She feels for the slate at her right hip and the red telescope at her left, and she falls into step—or into hoof—beside Dyeri.

The sight of the wagon alone nearly brings her to tears, and of the sheikah and the zora women who await her within.

—

Creamy Seafood Soup (eight hearts) - armoured porgy, fresh milk, rock salt, warm safflina, voltfin trout Author's notes: Link forgets the name of Vah Ruta for a moment there.

In The Adventure of Link, there's a location called Nabooru Town. There's a certain slumbering ache—normally an enemy—that, if awakened, will offer Link advice: "YOU ARE PERSISTENT/FIND HEART OVER OCEAN," referring to a heart container. In this case, Nadyne is mumbling about Lover's Pond, a location in Breath of the Wild, which is in southeastern Hyrule and can be reached by taking a boat from the ocean off the coast of Parapa to the coast of Faron (which is quicker than going overland). It's just something I threw in. Nadyne tried to go there once in search of a true love as is promised by the lore in-game (the pond is shaped like a heart in Breath of the Wild), but it didn't really work out for her, so she's resigned to being single.

Nadyne tries her best not to care but she got invested in Link's goings-on, not to mention that she did indeed end up following around Vah Naboris, since she promised she'd pick up the slate in case Link died. "To the coast and back again" refers to Riju walking Vah Naboris away and then eventually back to Nabooru.

Vaike can't read sign language, if you recall, hence the piece of paper.

Back to Ilia again! Link promised that she wouldn't leave Ilia by herself in the woods again, and she hasn't. It's to a stable for Ilia now. Very well taken care of and all.

The fish in question is an armoured porgy, which I think has a very amusing face (google porgy). The armour's pretty hard to get off, especially since the porgy are among the best ingredients for getting high-value effects.

The advice given by the Champions to Zelda is reminiscent of their advice to her in one of the memories of Breath of the Wild. Here's why the names of the Divine Beasts fit with the names of the villages, because Zelda did indeed name them.

The great sorcerer of legend that Zelda mentions is Vaati from Four Swords, Four Swords Adventures, and The Minish Cap. While his name is "Vaati", mistranslations over the years have rendered it "Vah Ti", which causes Zelda to mistake the "Vah" for a title of respect or power. Funny how language works eh? I should note that there's no actual magic in Delicious in Wilds, although there is access to the Sacred Realm, which is basically where stories of "magic" come from.

Poor Zelda. She has difficulties with "reading the atmosphere" when she gets excited about her research. She also has difficulties communicating her ideas in a timely fashion. Even the dossier that she gave to her own father is full of irrelevant information. She writes much like I do: far too much instead of getting to the point with simplicity. I wouldn't be surprised to know that no one has read this far, given that we're past two hundred thousand words of content. Perhaps Zelda should read up on Miyahon (the famous sheikah orator previously mentioned).

Each of the names of the Divine Beasts are essentially respectful declensions of the ancient versions of the languages.
Impa's title is indeed "the Princess's shade".

The whole sequence with Link getting her head stuck in her cooking pot is truly a comedy of errors.

You'll note that the faith of the Golden Goddesses has been kept the most alive in Parapa, as well as in the more remote areas like Hebra and Akkala, as part of the older faith before the Seven came to be, while Parapa has always looked more towards their past and history through the Sageru virtue of kin.

And hey, it's some people we haven't seen in a while! Remember a certain duo of travelling gem merchants? Yep. It's Misan and Glepp!

As always, thank you for reading and for supporting me all this time. And a round of thanks and appreciation for my beta reader, Emma, for endeavouring to communicate clearly with me. Next time: to Faron, and then to Lanayru!

midna's ass. 10 October 2017.

Beta reader's comments: The scene with Zelda ranting about things is hilarious and adorable.

Link getting her head stuck is a prime bit of comedy. Truly, a comedy of errors.

Ilia is okay this time! No more of last Divine Beast's horse-related heart attack.

Emma. 10 October 2017.
Monster Rice Balls

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef, the jewel merchants, and the ex-whaler begin the journey from Parapa to Lanayru, while the chef recalls a fateful encounter with the former Champion of Zola, far before the Champion became the Champion.

Chapter Notes

As usual, comments that didn't make it into the box at the end: As always, the warmest of thank-yous to my readers at large and to my beloved beta reader, Emma, for everything that you and she have done for Delicious in Wilds and for my life, personally.

I normally don't do much self-insertion into my characters, but I did exaggerate my own love of rice (a staple in my favourite dish of all time) for Link.

As a reminder, when I use the words "communal" or "communion", I am not referring to the real-world religious connotations of "Communion", but rather using it in the literal "commune" sense.

Link is mute and thus her voice cannot carry words. She's capable of producing noise, however (we've seen her grunt and yell wordlessly before).

Hey, remember that monster extract? She's still had it all this time! Time to put it into good use.

Monster extract pumps you full of adrenaline and cortisol, so the memories that Link remembers from them tend to be action-packed.

You'll note that travelling with Glepp and Misan from Parapa from Lanayru will take over two months total, partially because it's slower than Link travelling in a straight line via horseback, since the wagon has to travel by roads.

Link really does see everything through food in terms of her connections to the world.

As a general reminder, Glepp is not mute; she uses sign language when Misan is around, because Misan is deaf.

The Zora River in Breath of the Wild has been renamed to the Zola River, as the patron deity of the zora is named Zola.

Monsters featured in this chapter include: mad scrubs from Ocarina of Time (deku are not sapient here); deku baba from Ocarina of Time; quadro baba from Skyward Sword; and snapdragon from A Link to the Past.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Glepp and Misan have for Link a thousand questions and she has for them a thousand recipes. The two seem similar to how Link left them, except for the matching opal earrings the two have taken to wearing. After bringing their load of sapphires to the Hebric cold to sell back to those sapphire farmers who waited for the jewels to once more infuse with the essence of ice, Misan and Glepp took a second load of sapphire; by Glepp's suggestion, they elected to try their hand at the road to Parapa instead of to Eldin. When Link asks if they have seen a travelling minstrel—a blue rito with an accordion—Misan claps her hands. Glepp notes that his music sounded wonderful, while Misan comments on his infectious enthusiasm for local history. It takes Link a thoroughly embarrassing second to remember why Misan says nothing of Kass's singing.

Now, in a wagon laden with spent topaz, the jewel merchants have begun to undertake the journey to Lanayru, where a particular stretch of monster-infested land has become the prime spot for foolhardy traders such as themselves to try and fail to capture some electricity in a much shorter time period than the usual method of waiting for Parapan thunderstorms to brew up.

Misan clenches her hand into a fist to pump it high into the air. "And we are nothing if not foolhardy traders!" A strand of her dark hair curls up over her head, and Glepp reaches over to smooth it down.

They inquire about the scars that Link has gathered in the months since Glepp and Misan saw her last. Link rolls her shoulders. She keeps herself clothed from the neck down, yet she bears a slash across her nose and above over her cheek alongside the pockmarks left behind by contact with the malice in Parapa and the long scar on her right cheek from the wolfos in Tabantha. Her hands show the signs of similar damage, the skin burned and scarred and molted, the fingers of her left hand slightly clawed from how tightly she has gripped the hilt of the blades she has used since leaving Eldin.

Link attempts to pull up her hood only to realise that she left her cloak behind in her escape from Nabooru. Glepp kindly grants Link one of her own.

When Link attempts to protest such a gift, Glepp shakes her head. "Make it up to me by cooking myself and Misan a delicious dinner."

Now that Link can certainly do. Not the chosen hero of the land once known as Hyrule, but its chosen chef.

To her eternal credit, Dyeri has absolutely no questions whatsoever for Link about the Divine Beast Vah Naboris. Instead Dyeri trades recipes with her. Link inquires about the fate of the two researchers—Rotana, who reminded her of the girl with the golden hair, and Rhiaru, squirrely and spry, who reminded her of herself—and Dyeri notes that they returned to Nabooru after the city's slight re-opening. Not fully, not yet. But, with the Divine Beast no longer rampaging to its south, the Queen of Parapa has started the process of renewal and of healing. And, it seems, she has opened Nabooru enough for researchers registered at the university to return.

Misan claps her hands in appreciation. "Aw, I hope Parapa will do better in the future!" She grabs Glepp's hand, squeezing down, and Glepp simply smiles.

Instead of living in a wagon of cool sapphire, they have rented one of wood and sealed in rubber, with the topaz waiting in a separate wagon from the one in which they sleep. Rather than Eldic ostriches, a pair of horses paws at the ground. Link touches her chin to consider how to handle Ilia. Misan suggests that Link can ride alongside them; Glepp remarks that they could hitch Ilia up to the wagon as well.
Link leads the two outside of the wagon to meet the horse in question. Misan embraces Ilia all over and wonders at her striking figure. Glepp hangs behind her in quiet contemplation.

Link rests her hand on her chin. If she could once more bring out Glepp's guffawing laugh, then that would be her first victory today.

Glepp proposes a compromise. Hitch up Ilia to the wagons now to ensure that the horse keeps apace with them while Link makes them all a meal—Link flushes at how readily they accept her presence as a cook: that alone coming from Glepp keeps her feet buoyant for the remainder of the day—and thereafter Link can ride Ilia if she so wishes.

Dyeri quirks her eyebrows. "Can't imagine anyone I'd trust more with the food." Giggling, Misan practically leaps into a sitting position around the table set out for the day, which will fold out into a bed at night.

"Go ahead; go ahead." Misan motions towards Link with an outwards wave of the hand. "We'll get moving after you finish making us something, eh?"

With a flourish of a salute that nearly lands her fist into Dyeri's face, Link apologises profusely and then moves towards the galley at the back of the wagon.

A touch on her shoulder. Glepp leans forward to whisper in her ear: "I mean no insult at all, but please...be more careful and less flashy."

Link blatches up to her ears. "I won't get any more food in Misan's hair. I'm sorry."

Glepp nods in understanding. She takes a step back, raising her hands to sign for Misan's benefit. "Thank you for the meal."

"Of course."

The zora woman follows Link into the galley to point out their supplies as Link touches her chin to consider what to prepare. When she notes a woven basket of rice, she seizes it with both hands. Rice. Rice. That delicious staple of the eastern realms of the land once known as Hyrule, used in everything from dishes with curry to risotto to pilaf to rice-balls. Her mouth waters with saliva; her eyes, with tears.

Oh rice. Precious rice.

Link hugs the woven basket to her chest. She twirls around the galley with it in her arms. She lifts it up to the heavens.

And then she sees Glepp's expression of shock.

Glepp plucks the basket from Link's palms. Opening a drawer, she brings out an entire sack of rice. "Feel free to use this to your heart's content. But please, leave that basket there be."

Link glances at the basket. She cocks her head to the side, and Glepp sighs.

"If you must know, that's rice that was thrown at a certain...wedding." Link notes the violet of Glepp's cheeks darken across her nose. "Misan and I collected some of it afterwards, to serve as a bulwark of memories. A keepsake of one of the happiest days of our lives."

Link blinks. "Whose wedding?" she asks.
Glepp brushes one of the opal earrings and says nothing. Link blinks again. With the tiniest smile Link has ever seen on the bow of her lips Glepp bids her the best of luck with making supper.

After travelling alone from Nabooru to Ache's Veil for the better part of a the late-spring month, Link can think of nothing better than sharing a communal meal.

Link raids the pantries. Her nose knows: what has spoiled and what she can still use, what has rotted away and what she could salvage through application of heat. When she uncovers two flat wrapped packages—she mistakes them for kerchiefs, but they unfold into black dried seaweed and dried strips of fish meat—she claps her hand into her palm.

Rice-balls.

Dyeri helps her fill the cooking pot with water from the pond. Link boils and condenses the water—cleansing it of impurities—before adding a pinch of rock salt. She washes the rice in the galley's washbasin just in case—not that she does not trust Misan and Glepp in general, but she trusts their abilities to keep the galley clean and tidy about as far as her voice could carry words—and then steams the rice in her cooking pot.

Once the rice has simmered for long enough; and once Misan has poked her head in to inquire if Link has drowned herself in the rice water or eaten so much rice that her stomach has exploded or suddenly found a lizalfos hiding in the pantry that has eaten her head off; and once Glepp has entered the room to pull Misan away by her ear, then Link removes the cooked rice from the pot. She pats the rice into circular balls and splits them in half. Forming depressions in the halves with her palms, she tears the strips of fish into small bits and bobs to sprinkle into the rice. Link fills each rice-ball, then finds the vial of monster extract in her satchel to dribble a droplet of violet into the very heart of each.

She could just make rice-balls. But this should make an impression to say the least.

With a flick of the hand that knocks at least one rice-ball to the floor—but not into anyone's hair! She's learning! She's learning!—Link presses the halves together to keep the filling within. She shapes each rice-ball into the form of a rounded pyramid. Wetting the tip of the seaweed with the salted water, she wraps a length around each of the rice-balls and smooths the damp end with the flat of her hand.

Link tries and fails to find seeds to add as garnish, and so she brings out the plate of rice-balls to the others. Misan grants her a standing ovation; Dyeri beams at her.

"You haven't tried it yet," Link protests after she sets down the tray.

Misan hoots in laughter, and Dyeri joins in, signing for her employer's benefit: "Don't need to. Swear by the Goddess, you've got one mean pair of cooking hands."

The tips of Link's ears go red.

She invites them to dig in. Before Link has even lifted her hands, Misan has snapped one up. Glepp follows suit, and then Dyeri. They praise the texture, the flavour, the construction. Link watches, and waits, and when the monster extract kicks in and her companions begin to sweat and Dyeri quietly inquires if Link has soughted to poison them, Link grins.

"Now that's a kick, eh?" Misan manages, following Link's explanation. She has started to jog in place. "I feel like I could suplex a whole moblin!"

Glepp excuses herself outside for some fresh air, and Misan follows suit with a mischievous grin.
Smirking, Dyeri sits back as sweat beads over her forehead to pop another rice-ball into her mouth.

"So then." Dyeri quirks her eyebrows. "Gonna try some yourself, trickster girl?"

She does.

Link raises the rice-ball to her lips. With the rice as a most delicious base to the savoriness of the dried fish and the hint of salt from the seaweed, the rice-ball would balance the perfect blend on the see-saw of texture to flavour if not for the monster extract body-slamming the fulcrum to flip the entire plate over.

That sudden jolt in her entire body, that need of fight or flight—

She remembers the smell of rice-balls. The scent of seaweed and raw fish and sticky rice and something slightly strong and salty and savory at once. Link followed the fragrance from her home at the outskirts near the woods to the heart of Ordon over the river that bisected the village. The village folk had emerged from their houses and come in from the fields to witness the seeming parade passing up the river, a parade of ships in a dazzling array of colours, populated by people with heads that resembled fish. She does not remember if she had before seen a zora, but even if one or two had passed by the village comprised mostly of hylians, she had never witnessed them in such quantities. The zora stood on the decks of the ships so wide that they could barely squeeze through the river and waved to the Ordoners. As the boats passed by—slow in the water—the zora handed out scales of fish and flowers of the water and all sorts of foodstuffs as presents.

Her sister had not yet entered the world, and Link had not yet abandoned her post at the house where the people in that house had set her to cook dinner, but nonetheless she could not stop herself from staring at the boats alongside the crowd. The food. The smell of food. Her entire world had squished itself down into a single primal thought that consumed her body and spit out a five-year-old beast of limbs windmilling to push through the crowd: food.

She wanted to try it all.

The other children in the crowd rode on the shoulders of adults or were carried in their arms. Not Link, who pushed and shoved and fought and clawed and carved up a trail between the stampede of legs, utterly lost in the forest of people far taller than she, tracking her promised land solely by the fragrance of food. She sprinted through an opening in the masses to pop out the other end.

Her momentum carried her forward into the river.

Into the space between one boat and another.

As she paddled in a panic to keep her face afloat, the water splashing into her mouth to choke her with the weight of five years of desperation, Link could see the boats closing in one another with herself caught in the middle. Her shout gurgled pathetically in her throat. She who had fought so hard just to try the food——suddenly felt something warm wrap around her. An arm around her middle, pressing her up against a slippery bulk that coiled and bunched with her rescuer's powerful strokes. She looked up.

A bright red shark swam just above her head.

Link screamed.

Water flooded her lungs. She kicked and she clawed and the whatever-it-was only held on more tightly.
The shore.

The shore of the river.

She shot out of the whatever-it-was's grip to crawl onto the shore and retch water from her stomach. She could not breathe.

She could not breathe.

Wet hands pumped at her chest. The water squirted up her throat and out of her nose. She started to cry.

And then Link smelled something delicious just under her nose. Salty and warm-y and fishy and rice-y.

Still sniffling she opened her eyes to find herself staring at a zora girl. A zora girl with scales of red and white, her too-wide mouth full of sharks' teeth, her frilled silver and scarlet suit clinging wetly to her skin. Link flinched away.

Then her gaze settled upon that which had drawn her nose.

A rice-ball.

The girl with the sharks' teeth held a rice-ball in her webbed hands. "Here," she said. Link blinked at her, hesitantly reached out an arm, and then recoiled back. Her gaze darted between the girl and the rice-ball.

"I won't hurt you. I promise."

Grabbing the rice-ball with both hands, Link stuffed it into her mouth. She swallowed it down all at once; the pain in her throat brought tears to the corners of her eyes. The girl with the sharks' teeth smiled kindly at her.

Link ogled her.

Her and that kind smile, a smile that Link carried with her in her heart through the days and the nights that followed.

She does not remember the chaos, not entirely. She remembers someone yelling out a name or a word that forced the girl with the sharks' teeth to bid Link farewell. She remembers the crowd pressing in on her, loud and hot and much too much. She remembers curling up on the ground.

She remembers—while the girl with the sharks' teeth gave her the rice-ball—the girl who smelled of horses watching her with narrowed eyes. Not from the crowd, but from the window of the mayor's house in the heart of the village. An expression as hard as the stone beneath Link's feet. And then the curtains closing over the window.

She remembers...

The girl who smelled of horses. The girl who smelled of horses, who had not always been her friend.

Link finishes the rice-balls. She washes off the plate and swears up and down not to ever cook with monster extract again without the express permission of her companions.

When Glepp and Misan set off, Link opts to ride on Ilia. Her most precious companion, for whom she brings out the remainder of the rice, lightly salted. Ilia's ears flick back and forward as she eats. When she finishes off the rice-balls, she tickles Link's face with her tongue while Link laughs and embraces her, burying her face in Ilia's mane.

Ilia.

The girl who smelled of horses.

And her horse...her horse from a century ago who had borne a different name. Epona. Daughter of Sapona, the legendary horse of the Goddess Sageru.

"Who did I name you after, girl?" Link inquires. Ilia snorts her warm breath at her girl.

They ride. To the east and to the south rather than to the north. Link spends as much time outside of the wagon as she can to survey the land that she has not seen since she lost her memory. The grasslands give way to forest and then to a thick, lush jungle that has grown over the road. Spring showers have thickened to summer thunderstorms. Between rainier days, the sweltering heat that mounts day by day clings Link's clothing to her body and glistens Ilia's flank with sweat. The wagons' wheels stick in the mud. While Misan and Glepp work the wagons out, Dyeri and Link defend them from chuchu and keese, lizalfos and bushes that pop up out of nowhere to spit explosive seeds at them. Here and there grow blue or red plant-like monsters whose buds suddenly part into mouths split two or four ways to vomit out their acidic innards. At the very least the carnivorous plants stay rooted to the earth and can only snap at them from afar. Link waves at a far-away one of these flowers, the bud paler with a violet ruff of petals around its stem. The monster's jaws part. Link flashes the monster the curved-finger symbol for being all right.

Abruptly the monster leaps up on cucco feet to sprint right towards her, white-dagger teeth protruding from its maw.

Not all right.

Not all right at all.

A topaz-tipped arrow pins the monster to the earth. A second volley jolts it into stillness. Glepp lowers her bow; Link thanks the zora archer for her life.

The western shores of Lake Hylia bring Link to her knees in the sand. Along the shores a flower blooms, the petals red, the centre gold. The summer wind whispers waves over the waters of the lake and tinkles the blossoms into an undulating sea of gold and scarlet. She gathers the sea lily's bells into her arms. The sun-kissed scent she will never forget.

That evening, while they wait out the night on the lakeside, Link makes for Dyeri, Misan, and Glepp a creamy stew of voltfin trout and hearty radish, the sea lily's bells decorating their pic-a-nic on the shores. "Aw, Link, do these flowers mean that much to you?"

For once Link manages not a blank expression but a smile. "There was...this girl who adored them. And I...I love her very much."

Misan glances at Glepp, then back at Link, her features softened in fondness. "I understand."

Plucking one of the sea lily's bells, Dyeri leans over to tuck it behind Link's left ear. Link keeps herself from flinching back as the former whaler's wrist brushes against her neck. Dyeri beams cheerily at Link and winks. "Hey there. You better go back to this girl of yours when you're done then."
Link wipes her eyes on her undershirt sleeve. "She'd be furious with me if I met her again before I kept all my promises."

At that Glepp reaches over to take Misan's hand in hers, and Dyeri whistles appreciatively.

Link keeps the flower in her hair until it wilts away, as Marin once did years ago. The wilting does not bother her, but instead brings another promise: to come by Lake Hylia again, to smell the flowers, to remember.

As they travel, Link occasionally slips away to seek out a tower or a shrine. Each time she proposes to give up her commission, but Misan excuses her. "Aw, you've already proven yourself. Dyeri here's getting the bigger commission anyway. We're mostly paying you for the food."

Her gaze riveted on Link, Glepp puts a webbed hand over her mouth. Her shoulders go up as if to laugh.

And Link goes off.

She has no interest in the supposed trials of the hero; even if she were, she does not remember ever passing through the curtains of blue light prior to the Great Calamity: they cannot be meant for a hero. Yet the shrines intrigue her for the sheer delight of puzzling herself physically through whatever strange games the creators intended for her, whether honing her skills with attempting to hit moving targets—she frustrates herself to a point of cheating with stasis instead and laughs to herself all the way up the lift at her brilliance—or pacing herself through a genuine marathon of magnesis-pushing-and-pulling that leaves her desperately attempting to divine where the wagon has gone by the time she emerges, sporting a brand new scar on her left hip from a fire-light spear.

Upon each return, Misan asks excitedly of where Link has been, and Link speaks of the jungle and the streams and the monsters on her way there and back again.

Glepp raises her eyebrows to inquire about the contents of the shrines themselves. Dyeri shrugs and shovels food into her mouth.

They ride east.

Another jewel merchant they pass on the road—an enthusiastic if fumble-tongued goron—asks Link about her odd manner of speaking, about her outdated slang and archaic vocabulary. Dyeri pipes up that she's considered the same. Blushing, Link tries to stammer out a response; Glepp covers for her: "She speaks like one from before the Great Calamity, does she not?" The merchant nods; Dyeri touches her earlobe. "It stands to reason that she was taught to speak Central Hyrulean from the proper books scribed before then, does it not? She signs with the movements of a northeasterner, not one from Central." Dyeri and the merchant seem to accept her explanation. Link scratches the back of her neck: she has heard something like that before, and fairly recently, too, though she cannot quite remember where.

The sunrise sees the merchant depart. Link thanks Glepp with a bowl of carp fished out from forest rivers. Glepp nearly declines, her features oddly drawn, but Link protests until Glepp gives in.

They ride towards the sunrise that comes earlier every morning.

Only on the eastern half of Lake Hylia do Glepp and Misan begin the journey north. Past the Dueling Peaks, Misan explains with an energetic grin that Dyeri mimics in a beam of her own, and then up to the wetlands, and from there they will follow the Zola River. Link inquires if they plan to travel to Ruto. Glepp makes an X of declination with her arms crossed over her chest. Misan bursts out laughing while Dyeri quirks her eyebrows. Tilting her head to the side, Link asks. Glepp coughs rather loudly for her usual quiet. Barely able to contain her mirth, Misan starts to assure Link that she need not worry at all, but Glepp places a hand on Misan's shoulder.

"I'm afraid that we will not. We will go as far up the road as where the electric monsters flourish, and then we will head back down before anyone who might be from Ruto recognises me."

Link blinks.

Misan eyes Dyeri. "Aw, you're not gonna ask, eh?"

The former whaler puts up her hands. "Not like it's any of my business."

They ride north.

The night after they run out of rice and Misan spends time reassuring Link—crying out that a lack of rice just isn't nice—that they will surely pick up more once on the eastern side of Hyrule, Link takes the shift upon the roof of the wagon while Glepp leads the horses. In the wee hours of the morning of the summer solstice, just before the end of her shift and her inevitable slip into sleep, she finds herself gazing at Lake Hylia, barely visible over the canopy of Faronese trees. She squints at a rain cloud that appears to move too rapidly for the wind. Lightning branches through the clouds. The rain splashes down upon the surface of the lake.

A liquid thunderbolt—a golden fluid—pours out of the rain cloud and into the lake. Just as suddenly the rain vanishes, and the night resumes its quiet slumber towards morning.

Link watches the lake a moment longer. Nothing emerges. She tips back her head back to gaze up at the new-moon sky, dark but for the stars. Some of the names come readily to her now, yet those stars account for less than a hundredth, no, less than a thousandth or a millionth or a some-big-number-th of the breadth of the universe.

The skies are very, very vast, and she is very, very small.

Yet the skies change ever so slowly in their annual dance across the heavens, while she can ride across the land once known as Hyrule in far less the time. Already in the past year-and-a-quarter since she has awoken in the Shrine of Resurrection so much has changed about her life that she would not recognise herself.

Though for all that has changed, the core of Link's being has kept, like a vase of honey that never goes foul: food.

No matter what happens, or where her feet take her, or where she rests her sword to sleep, the promise of breakfast that awakens her in the mornings and the warmth of a full belly that slumbers her in the nights will keep her moving forward. A meal alone or a communion with others; to share with her companions or to broker peace between strangers; hot or cold, sweet or sour, savory or bitter, salty or spicy, delicious or a work in progress.

Food.

Something that ties together everything that lives and breathes and thrives. Everyone has to eat, and everyone has their own feelings in their heart that they pour out in the food that they make. Link has never understood more of a person than she does in seeing what food they eat, and she has never felt closer than she has when she shares a meal with someone with someone across a communal cooking pot.
Cooking the ironshroom given to her by Yunobo—Yuno-yunobo, she signs to herself—or deliciously grilling rock roast with Daruk. Baking carrot cake by Amali's side—she prays that Koko and Cottla will find safety in the windchimes of Medli—or dragging an ice-box of sanke carp across half the kingdom to stuff fish pie for Revali. Grilling salted skewers with Riju—her nails dig into her palm until she feels a warm wetness staining her fingers—and frying bananas from Rovah for Urbosa.

All of the travellers on the road who have ever shared with her a meal or a recipe or even a scrap of food—travellers that she may meet once again or travellers that she will never see, merchants and traders and companions of dogs and riders of horses and everyone else with whom she has ever spoken.

The supper in her belly—monster rice-balls with the last of the rice and the last of the monster elixir, just as on the first night—warms from mere food to the laughter of life.

Link reaches up her hands to cup her fingers around the chalice of the moon. If one day she can cook monster and consume rock roast, then one day, too, will she drink silver light from the freshly squeezed moon. Perhaps the land was once known as Hyrule and is Hyrule no longer. For all of its names—Tabantha and Eldin, Parapa and Lanayru, Faron and Necluda, Akkala and Hebra—the land continues the tradition of deliciousness. And in the hundred years that she has slept, the people of the land have continued to innovate, have continued to cook, have continued to eat, all the foods from before and new ones besides.

She does not recall ever tasting the extract of monsters, nor does she remember all of the spices that she has had in her trips to Eldin or Tabantha or Parapa. The world has changed.

So has she.

The Divine Beasts, they can calm. The monsters, they can fight against. The Yiga, they can put to rest.

And then she can eat to her heart's content at the table of Romani Ranch with Miyu begging for scraps.

When she goes to bed after her shift, Link hugs the telescope to her chest, warming the engravings of the seagulls with her tear-dampened cheek.

—

Monster Rice Balls (fifteen hearts) - chillfin trout, hearty salmon, hylian rice, monster extract, rock salt

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: You'll see what the opal earrings mean, though I'm sure you can guess based on what you already know about the jewel merchants. I'm mentioned the topaz thing before. That said, there might be another reason why Glepp wanted to go down to Parapa.
Note here that Glepp and Misan indicate that they know about Kass and also know that Link knows about Kass. Misan, if you don't remember, is deaf. Misan and Glepp have never met Ilia before, since she was in the stable at Medigo during Link's first round of travelling with the merchants.

Time for Link to go on a pantry raid. Thank you; thank you; I'll be here all week.

The bulwark of memories is an accidental reference to Bloodborne.

Hey, I think that this is the earliest we've seen in Link's childhood. This is a memory from when she was five years old. I continue to use "she/her" pronouns for her, because Link has never exactly felt like a boy, and I have no interest in either misgendering or deadnaming Link. However it's notable that at this point in time Link hadn't yet come out as a girl, and that she was not yet using the name "Link". It's also notable that this is a memory from before she and Ilia became friends.

Because zora (like many aquatic creatures) have internal genitalia zora living in zora-majority areas typically wear clothing for decorative and comfort purposes (i.e. heating) rather than for modesty, which can lead to certain areas (such as the chest or groin) being uncovered. However, because all of the other races of Hyrule except for the koroks do not share this characteristic (the rito do not have breasts and do not cover their chests, but do have cloaca and thus cover their lower torsos), zora who live in non-zora-majority areas or who travel into non-zora-majority areas tend to adopt more covering clothing. In this case, the zora (Mipha) was wearing a red and silver dress somewhat resembling a scuba-diving suit (or an old-fashioned swimsuit meant to cover the body rather than to show off).

Remember that zora are extremely long-lived. Mipha was already an adolescent at the time of Link's childhood. This is supported in-game, by the way, during the memory about Mipha, wherein she says that she was surprised to see hylians grow up so fast. In Breath of the Wild, Mipha indicates that she knew Link as a child (saying that she would want to spend time with Link again as they did when Link was younger). Since zora grow very slowly (see Finley, who still resembles a child despite being older than most hylians), and since she expresses surprise at Link growing to adolescence, it would not make sense for Mipha to have also been a child.

Notably, Mipha is also bigger in Delicious in Wilds than she was in Breath of the Wild. Most of the zora are much bigger than Link, so I'm not sure why they made Mipha so small except to serve as one of Link's love interests. In Delicious in Wilds, zora continuously grow as long as they remain in water. This means that zora that spend their entire lives in water (such as King Dorephan) can grow to gigantic sizes with enough resources, because water allows bodies to counteract some of the size-limiting effects of gravity (this is why the largest animal on the planet, the blue whale, is aquatic rather than land-dwelling). Therefore, zora who have spent most of their lives away from water, such as Glepp, are in size more comparable to average human height; zora who spend more time in water, such as Sidon, will grow larger. Mipha is indeed smaller than most Lanayrish zora, but we'll see why later.

Link is so close to remembering the girl who smelled of horses's name (Ilia), but she just hasn't connected that memory yet.

Link's letting herself do shrines again, although she's notably avoiding those that are in villages and things like that.
I wonder why Glepp doesn't want to be recognised in Ruto.

We'll see more about the dragons later, though for Link just keeps seeing them in the distance.

Up next: the second half of the journey, and arrival to Lanayru.

midna's ass. 11 October 2017.

Beta reader's comments: A road trip episode! This chapter is really cozy and fun. It kinda reminds me of the intro to episode three of Tales from the Borderlands, which is a good thing.

This chapter delivers two of the series' best funny moments, in "She's learning!" and "a lack of rice just isn't nice".

Emma. 11 October 2017.
Mushroom Risotto

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef, the jewel merchants, and the former whaler complete their journey to Lanayru, where the chef parts from the merchants to pursue the chef's own course.

Chapter Notes

Ahem, as usual, comments that don't fit: Thank you kindly to my most marvellous best reader Emma, for continuing to assist me with Delicious in Wilds despite life bearing down all too hard, and thank you to you, the reader, for sticking through.

You'll notice that the forty-fourth chapter was written on the fifteenth of July while this was written on the seventeenth. I was certainly having some issues.

The road-trip chapters are among my most favourite to write. One of the most fun chapters in the entire series (the sixty-fourth) is halfway one long road-trip chapter.

Stamella shrooms and endura shrooms assist with keeping up stamina, as they do in-game, with which makes them popular additives for labourers. It's somewhat similar to how coffee in the real-world is essentially a legal drug that enhances productivity (not only legal, but also expected).

Being able to tell what other species apart can be more difficult than you think. Research in human children in real life has shown that a "critical period" of learning facial features sets familiarity for minor variations in such features, such as the exact width of the nose or the relative height of the eyes. Then, the further that other human features are aware from this "familiar", the harder it is to distinguish them. This is comparable to, for example, the weighing of objects: one can tell the weight difference between an apple and ten apples, because these weights are within a "normal" range. But one would find it difficult to tell the weight difference between one bacterium and ten bacteria, or between one planet and ten planets, because the former is very very tiny, and the latter would crush one's hands. Regardless, this is part of why people growing up in homogenous environments find it more difficult to tell the difference between people of different ethnicities without practise (the other part is bias and discrimination). Thus, Link finds it more difficult to distinguish (by facial feature) zora compared to hylians, so she typically relies on major features such as scale colour, the shape of the head, and so on.

Link also has minor facial blindness, so she tends to rely on specific things (such as hair colour ["golden hair"] or hairstyle ["pigtails"], specific clothing like a green hairband or violet sash, or a particular characteristic like being associated with horses).

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Up through the Finra Woods, then over the Farosh Hills and skirting around the Popla Foothills to pass along the shores of Deya Lake. The ruins of the village in the shallower waters of the lake—the wood rotted away, the stone covered in moss, decaying tatters of fabric still waverling from the metal skeletons of flagpoles—draw her eye. Link lifts the red telescope to her eye. She watches several scavengers rummage through the remains of the village to pick out the innocuous: arrows and cutlery, plates and children's toys, what rags they can carry out. As they emerge from the village, Link notes the scavengers abruptly looking back, screaming, running.

She removes the red telescope. Her eyes widen.

From the heart of the village rises a living mountain of rock not unlike that which she encountered in the Great Plateau.

Link glides down from the roof of the wagon to inform Glepp, who looks over to the village with her hands tangled in the horse's reins. Her reddish third eyelid slides horizontally over her eyes. "Ah yes. The stone talus of Deya. What of it?"

"Will those people be all right?" she asks earnestly. "Should we go help?"

"The treasure hunters? They've already escaped."

So they have.

Already the stone talus lurches through the water to return to its resting place. It jumbles itself once more beneath the surface of the lake. Link rubs her eyes. Glepp chuckles softly.

Later Link inquires about the stone talus to Misan and Dyeri; Dyeri indicates she has only seen them by accident and with the Goddess's help she intends to remain that record. Misan giggles. "Aw, I prefer my adventurin' in the form of new food and new people. Not so much getting my face kicked in by a stone, eh?"

"Stone cold," Glepp says in turn; Misan nearly breaks down in laughter. She strokes Glepp's cheek with her knuckles. Glepp catches Misan's hand by the wrist, and the mirth softens to an affectionate smile.

Dyeri clears her throat. "I'll uh. Take the next shift," she says, then repeats herself in sign language. Link waves her good-bye and settles down at the table. Glepp and Misan look towards Link at the same time, Glepp's brow ridge raised, Misan batting her eyelashes. Link scratches her knee.

Dyeri, currently waiting in the doorway, coughs loudly. "Want to join me, Link?"

Link blinks. "But aren't you...?" She pauses. She glances at Misan and Glepp, who have scooted so close together that Glepp nearly sits in Misan's lap.

She blinks again, and then she stands up to follow Dyeri out. As soon as Dyeri closes the door, she doubles over in laughter, then stands up and sniffs back her mirth. "Swear by the Goddess, should've seen your own face, Link."

Link tilts her head. "I don't get it."

"Probably for the best." Dyeri reaches for the horses' reins, and Link takes watch from the roof.

The wagon shakes.

They continue north.
When Link—sitting on the bench beside Glepp, who leads the horses—once more recognises the slope of the land around the Squabble River, she wipes her eyes with her sleeve. Glepp pats her shoulder. By Link’s request, the well-travelled jewel merchant continues to name landmarks. Link records the names on her hand-inked map, unfurled from the parchment gifted to her over a year ago on the Great Plateau: Nabi Lake and its sister, South Nabi Lake, named as if some enterprising cartographer had wanted to break early for the day—though if the break were for food, Link could understand. Batrea Lake. Owlan Bridge and Horwell Bridge, which would take them to Central, and Eagus Bridge, which continues them further up east of the Floret Sandbar. Link excuses herself from the wagon to inspect the shrine visible on the sandbar.

Flowers upon flowers ring the shrine. As Link approaches, she notices a pale-skinned hylian woman walking the spiral with a watering can. Link steps towards the shrine only for a sudden shrill shriek to nearly jump her bones from her body. She twists herself around to find herself looking at the watering-can-woman nearly in tears, who begs Link not to step on her precious flowers.

Link rubs the back of her head.

She walks around the spiral more carefully. Yet the path between the flowers runs narrow. Stumbling into the flowers, she accidentally crushes one beneath her boots. The woman shrieks again. Link proceeds ever more cautiously, sliding her feet along the ground instead of lifting her legs.

She slips.

The tip of her boot brushes against a flower's stem.

In that second she hears the exact noise of the Great Calamity, the trumpeting of the end of the world, the sound that accompanies the apocalypse itself.

When she wakes up, Link finds a bruise in the shape of a watering can welting on her face. The woman brandishing the can in question towers over her and berates her for her despicable lack of care for plant life. Link sits up, then stands. She removes a piece of flint from her flint-pouch. While the woman continues to chide her, Link cracks the flint open on a patch of grass nearby.

The woman makes a choking noise in the back of her throat. "What by Hylia's wings are you doing?"

"Not stepping on the flowers," Link answers. She opens the paraglider and lets the updraft tosses her up into the air.

She glides to the shrine, enters, takes an easy ride down a current of water that becomes significantly less easy the instant she observes the waterfall that drops away into the abyss of the earth, ignores the instructions in a language she does not understand, and takes the lift back up with the screeches of the Great Calamity itself still ringing in her ears.

Link’s greatest challenge yet awaits her: navigating the spiral of flowers out without cheating through an updraft.

The Malice of the Divine Beasts could not end her. The Yiga attacking her on the side of the road could not end her. Not even the weight of one hundred years of the passage of time could end her. But here and now she has met her match: a woman with a watering can.

Under the hawk-like gaze of the hylian woman, Link attempts to shimmy up the shrine, yet the slippery material eludes her.

She lands with her rear end smack dab in the middle of a patch of flowers.

Her life flashes before her eyes.

Huh. She really ought to eat meat that's neither fowl nor fish more.

When she wakes up for the second time, Link sports a second watering can-shaped welt on the other side of her head. At least the woman has dragged her outside of the spiral. The watering-can-woman starts to inhale, her reddened face an alarum for the yelling to come.

Before the woman can even begin to shout, Link grabs her belongings and makes a mad dash for the river.

She catches up with the wagon by a whistle for Ilia. Glepp merely arches her brow at Link's mirrored bruises. Around supper-time Misan, barely holding back her mirth, asks Link of which hot meal she fought for to receive such a walloping.

Link replies morosely that—for all of her scars—she has not even wrestled out a single ingredient.

They purchase goat butter from a travelling goron merchant in a particularly stylish hat and a strange violet mushroom from a rito woman who throws in a sudden performance of dance to sweeten the deal. Link pokes the purple mushroom with its star-shaped cap and white spores that reflect the light. Dyeri chips in: rushroom, that quickens the heart and shallows the breath. Not unlike monster extract, really, but while extract prompts a burst of stress and fire-or-flight, rushroom simply stimulates the body into quicker motion. Link sets the rushroom alongside those fungi that she herself has picked: red and orange speckled mushroom that grow through Central and Necluda, and pointed green-capped ones that she gathered in the Faronese forests.

Link touches her chin. Butter and rice and mushrooms.

She snaps her fingers.

Link prepares a thick savory broth on a pigeon that Dyeri caught that morning. Buttering the bottom of her cooking pot, she picks out rushrooms, stamella shrooms, and hylian shrooms of approximately equal size, then slices each in half. Link scoops the mushrooms into the melted butter. She stirs until the mushrooms softer. Chopping up onion and garlic for taste, she butter-fries them in a shallow saucepan, then adds rice. Link watches the rice absorb the butter in its slow transformation from nearly translucent white to a light-tinted yellow, and then she pours in a fraction of the poultry broth. She stirs, and stirs, until the broth has seeped into the rice to stain it a darker gold, and then adds another fraction of the broth until the softened rice cannot hold anymore. Then Link strains the remaining broth from the rice. She drinks the leftover broth down herself; the fatty-salty liquid proves too rich for her, and she struggles to keep it down, but a spoonful—by which she means three giant handfuls, but handfuls in which she traps a spoon between her thumb and forefinger—of rice helps settles her stomach. Adding the fried garlic, onion, and rice into the cooking pot alongside the buttered mushrooms, she stirs again. A sprinkle of salt and a touch more butter gives the mushroom risotto a loving golden sheen. She arranges the mushrooms to form a smiling face in the food. Touching her chin, Link admires her own handiwork.

But the smiling face would leave the risotto less well-mixed.

Besides—she reflects to herself as she stirs the mushrooms back into the rice—the important smiles are not those that she could represent with her lack of artistic ability, but rather those that the meal draws out from the people who eat it.

Link brings the risotto out to the others. The wagon comes to a screeching halt as everyone piles on in to feast on the mushroom risotto. Even Dyeri, who admits that mushrooms beyond zapshrooms do not exactly constitute her favourite food, notes that, in the butter and rice, the heart-quickening sparks of the rushroom and the low enduring burn of the stamella shroom make for something delicious.

Controlling her initial instinct to simply eat out of the cooking pot with her own two hands, Link scoops some out into a bowl for herself with the ladle Cremia gave her some four months ago. She sits cross-legged on the floor. No cutlery, no problem: the salty-spiced butter leaves her hand all the better for the licking.

Mushroom risotto.

She has prepared this before. For herself. In the dark of the early morning when she alone lay awake in the house on the outskirts of the village.

Not on rushroom, but on stamella and on golden endura, to help her with the fatigue of her work.

The butter of the goats that they purchased from the goron cannot compete with the butter of the goats she recalls from her body's...from her childhood. The Ordon goats, with their horns curving upwards into a connected halo over their heads. Before becoming a courier, she worked as a child in the ranch, herding goats some three or four times her own size. The owner of the ranch hesitated at hiring her, but she begged despite her six short years.

The other ranchhand, a stout lad of sixteen years, asked her: why not play with the other children her own age? She kept her reasons to herself. The girls who shunned her and the boys with which she had no interest. The desire for something she could do with her hands during the day to sleep instantly at night. To bring back something to the house to avoid that word.

That word.

Burden.

That word.

The girl who smelled of horses came often by the ranch though—Link gathered—her father wanted her to do anything but. She would pet the horses—sometimes the goats as well, but mostly the horses—and offer to help with the work, which the owner of the ranch always had to refuse. "You gotta stop coming here, miss," the owner said, lifting up a towel to wipe sweaty from a glistening brow, "or your papa'll have my hide over his fireplace in two shakes of a goat's tail."

The girl who smelled of horses glared at Link whenever she happened to approach, and Link learned to stay as far away as she could when the girl who smelled of horses swung by with carrots or pumpkin or salt. Link would hide in the field with the goats or at the back of a stall or up in the rafters—she would need the help of the ranchhand to get down from how tightly she clung to the wooden rafter—and watch the girl who smelled of horses stroke the horses, brush and clean their manes, feed them fresh foods that she herself had steamed.

When the girl who smelled of horses caught Link in the stable, she would turn around and push Link into the mud, if Link were lucky, and the manure, if she were not. The girl who smelled of horses would fold her arms across her chest, would glare at her, would thrash out her arms to make her words. "You don't know how good you have it!" the girl who smelled of horses would yell. Her hands would tremble at her sides in fists until she clawed her fingers back to form the words Link could barely read off of her hands. "Papa won't even let me—"

She remembers the girl who smelled of horses's father stalking the path up the ranch with fury hardening his expression and his hand raised.

She remembers looking away.

She does not remember exactly where and when Link and the girl who smelled of horses had become friends.

Before Aryll. Before Aryll was born, the girl who smelled of horses and Link had become friends, and after Aryll was born, Link had met Marin.

She does not remember how they became friends, but she does remember realising that the girl who smelled of horses had never played with the other children of the village either. She remembers the girl who smelled of horses apologising to Link, with her forehead against the floor for how foolish she had been. She remembers herself stepping back, her hands covering her face, shaking back and forth at the suddenness of the attention.

She remembers sneaking into the girl who smelled of horses's room at night through the window of her house, quiet as she could to avoid the attention of her father. She remembers waiting for the peddlers to come by the village with books and scrolls hidden among their rags and utensils and ink and wax and various doohickeys so that Link could line up and purchase or trade for the books that the girl who smelled of horses's father had forbidden her. She remembers the girl who smelled of horses hiding with Link in the closet, signing in one another's hands in the darkness, while the house quaked beneath the weight of the anger and desperation that pressed against the walls and exploded from the windows to swallow the house and all of its inhabitants whole. She remembers cooking.

She remembers cooking.

She remembers how frequently they cooked together. Breakfast and dinner and supper. Yes, she cooked for her household, and the girl who smelled of horses for her father. But mostly they cooked for themselves. Mostly they cooked for the fragrance of food from the skillet or saucepan, for the deliciousness of the recipes and techniques they learned from books, for the new recipes that they would make up and try out and make funny faces at each other and laugh and laugh at the joy of life.

The girl who smelled of horses taught Link how to shrug off the blows of life and she taught the girl who smelled of horses how to laugh at the simplest pleasures. The joys of cooking and other methods to cope.

She remembers—

Her name.

She had not known herself as a girl then, and the villagers had called her a different name. Not Link. Link, she came up with on her own.

Well, almost on her own.

The girl who smelled of horses. The girl who smelled of horses who had listened with eyes wide when Link returned from Lon Lon for the first time to tell her of the elixir in spring green. The girl who smelled of horses who had encouraged her, who had rebuffed her fear, who had told her—if it could make her happy, then that mattered, and not what those who already pushed Link to the ground might say. The girl who smelled of horses who had broken out all of the books that she and Link had collected together in their search for a different name than the one that they—the people in that house—had given Link, the name that had never sat right on her body, wrapped around her form like the papery shell of a corpse around the Malice instead of her own skin.

The girl who smelled of horses who tossed out the name of every heroine who appeared in any story. The girl who smelled of horses who offered the names and epithets of the Goddesses, of the stars, of characters of fiction and folklore. The girl who smelled of horses who lay patiently under the blanket with her the entire night, signing their words into one another's palms.

The girl who smelled of horses who told her that she linked Ordon to the rest of the world, that she linked the people of the village to the forests of the wilds, that she through her kindness had linked herself and the girl who smelled of horses together. That one day the girl who smelled of horses would accompany her—when her father no longer watched over her as a hawk watched the fieldmouse—to see the entire world—

"Link," signed the girl who smelled of horses.

And she, the girl with no name, blinked in confusion in the darkness.

"What about that name? What about...Link."

Link.

She remembers intertwining her fingers with the girl who smelled of horses's. She remembers hugging the girl who smelled of horses so tightly that Link herself could not breathe. She remembers clinging on to her, the one anchor Link had in this world in those early years in Ordon.

She remembers the girl who smelled of horses laughing and hugging her back and signing the I love you into her back and the but you'll come back right? and the I'll be waiting for you, Link and the you're my best friend, you know and the there's no one I would rather be with than you.

She remembers. When she promised Marin to take her around the land once known as Hyrule, when she talked of Aryll coming with them, she spoke, too, of the girl who smelled of horses.

She remembers that. She remembers the girl who smelled of horses who gave Link her name, and yet she cannot remember the name of the girl who smelled of horses.

She cannot remember.

No matter how desperately Link treads the water of her memories, no matter how desperately she pushes herself through the lake, no matter how she—no matter how she—she cannot—she cannot remember—she—

Her wrists sink into the cold wetness. The water splashes over the backs of her hands.

"Link? Hey there, Link. Hey there."

Dyeri.

Dyeri's form resolves in the centre of Link's vision. Misan and Glepp flank her on either shoulder.
Glepp's hands. Glepp's webbed hands around her wrists.
She glances down to find her fingernails smeared in blood. Excusing herself to the galley, she washes her face with water. In the light pink swirl of the washbasin, Link can see the marks along her either jaw, the three deepest just under her ears, one smaller along the centre of her cheek, and the mark left by her thumb tracing a curve down the side of her throat.

Already the shallow wounds have ceased to bleed.

Link turns to leave the kitchen. Misan leans against the frame of the door. "If you ever want to talk about anything, you can tell me, eh?"

Link rubs the back of her head. She bows the upper half of her body to gaze at the ground. She waits.

In the slight reflection of the polished wood of the wagon floor, Link can make out Misan signing words of comfort and encouragement. Link does not move.

Misan quits the galley.

Link does not, but begins to prepare another meal. Not risotto.

Not anything with rice.

The day after, she inspects her face in the water of the basin, in the circular rim of her beloved cooking pot. The marks left by her thumbs and her little fingers have faded, while those of her ring, middle, and forefingers have scabbed over. Link busies herself making a breakfast of eggs stuffed with mushrooms.

Neither Dyeri nor Glepp nor Misan question Link about the outburst; she does not hurt herself again, intentionally or otherwise. Instead she spends her time on Ilia's back, whistling, whistling, whistling, as though that thousandth whistle could dislodge something in her head to let her remember the name she seeks.

She met Ilia—Ilia, who responded to the sound of the whistle that the girl who smelled of horses had taught her—in the plains near Kasuto. Somewhere there. Link could travel to Ordon as she did to Romani Ranch. She could ask. She could—

She does not know what she might find, but no longer does she feel that slow thudding of terror at what might lurk in her memories.

After the Divine Beast. After the Divine Beast Vah Ruta. While she finds herself on the eastern half of Hyrule, before she returns to Medli, Link will try, and she will see, and, no matter what she finds, she promises herself that she will carry on to Medli as she promised Dorian she would. No matter what.

They ride on.

A few zora here and there on the trail ask Misan where the wagon intends to go—Glepp always hides whenever they pop up—but leave them alone after Misan introduces the party as a group of merchants. Link possibly recognises one, but she cannot recall for certain where. And so she shrugs and continues sitting on the roof in anticipation of monsters.

They come to the mountains of Lanayru that, somewhere up in the heavens, lead to the snows of Mount Nayru, named for the Goddess of Wisdom Herself. Glepp tells Link that some say the Goddess Din rose the mountain from the land in honour of Her fellow Goddess, while others believe that, when the Goddess—having flowed the water into the oceans—soared up into the skies, the water followed Her and froze in the chill to form a summit of ice. Still others hold that the Dragon Naydra, messenger of the Goddess Nayru, slumbers within the mountain as Her chrysalis.

It begins raining.

It does not stop raining.

The wagon teeters on the thin band of land between the darkly glimmering mountains to their left and the rushing rapids of the River Zola on their right. Link closes her eyes to listen to the rhythmic roar of the water swollen by the constant rain that has followed them for days like a persistent shadow.

She lets go of Ilia's reins to allow her companion to take the lead.

Link trusts Ilia more than anyone to keep her safe on the road.

At the fork between the road towards Akkala and the path towards Lanayru, Misan stops the wagon. Link continues to trot forward on Ilia for a few paces before hearing that the ground beneath Ilia's hooves has become much rougher. Looking forward, Link ogles the rubble that covers the path to the ornamented blue-grey bridge across the river, as if an entire chunk of the mountain peak had cascaded off down the mountainside to crash into the road. She spots—across the river—a team of zora working to clear the rocks. Her red telescope reveals a particularly tall zora sitting on top of the bridge with an expression she cannot place. Red, with a head that reminds her of a shark.

A zora with sharks' teeth.

For a moment her eyes widen, but Link wipes the rain from the lens of the telescope and looks again. Then she shakes her head. Not the girl with the sharks' teeth. A different zora, albeit one that bears a great resemblance to the girl with the sharks' teeth. Or perhaps Link simply has difficulty distinguishing zora if not for their colour and shape of head.

She backs Ilia up to the wagon to find that Misan, Glepp, and Dyeri have all exited the wagon to look at the rubble, although the taller Glepp has squatted down to hide behind Misan with a rubber umbrella in her webbed hand.

"Aw." Misan sneezes into her scarf. Glepp holds the umbrella higher. "This here's the only path until we have to go straight over the mountains. And we can't caulk the wagon across the river either, eh? Not with it going so fast."

"And with the constant rain," Glepp observes, "transport over said mountain would be even more difficult than usual." She shrugs. "I suppose we have to turn back."

"Aw," Misan repeats. She claps her hands against her cheeks. "Dyeri, Link, any ideas?"

Dyeri tugs on her right earlobe. "Still get commission even if we can't bring the topaz all the way?"

"Your commission would be zero then, eh?" Misan answers with a grin. Dyeri leans back, tapping her fingers against inner forearms, and Misan deflates. "Aw, I'm not that cold. It won't be the full commission, but I can pay a little to compensate. Or you can come with us to Parapa and help us with the topaz there, eh?"

Dyeri beams cheerfully at that. They begin to strike out their terms. Amid the hubbub of bartering for commission percentages, Link gathers her few belongings. In exchange for the ingredients that she has provided from her own satchel and gathering, she considers it fair to pour for herself out a small portion of rice. She has so many rice-balls and curries and risottos and thick stews yet to make. Link could eat rice for every meal of every day and never tire of the texture over her tongue, the most incredible stock for virtually any dish.

Most compare innovation to sliced bread. But she, to cooked rice.

She checks on her stores of spring green elixir. Enough yet for two months. After that she'll need to head back west, or find someone else who knows the recipe.

But two months should comprise enough. A month, perhaps, to reach Ruto—or less—and then a day or two to find the Divine Beast Vah Ruta and to attempt to discover to whom she can give the slate.

Though already Link feels in her gut that she has evolved from a mere escort to the slate to she capable of calming the Divine Beasts herself—or at least physically aiding the pilots.

Or perhaps she always already was.

And if the Golden Goddesses smile down upon her, then maybe the Lanayrish, too, have their own such elixirs, spring green or otherwise.

And if the Golden Goddesses smile down upon her, then for certain the Lanayrish will have their own dizzying array of meals and dishes and snacks and appetizers and desserts and beverages; Link practically falls over at the mouth-watering thought of cuisine in all of its glory.

A creak at the doorway prompts her to turn around; she finds Misan leaning against the frame. "Aw, you're going up to Ruto, eh?"

Link nods. "Do you have plans after that?" Glepp inquires, poking in her head from behind Misan. "Perhaps, one day, we could yet travel beside one another again."

Link taps her index fingers together as Yunobo would have. "Have you...heard of Ordon? In Ordona? I'm looking for it."

Glepp can only shake her head, her gaze strangely distant. "If I discover anything of its location, I will be sure to pass on the message if I can."

Link nods in gratitude; Misan nudges her in the ribs. "Ordona, eh? You sure are a mobile traveller." Her gestures carry nothing but kindness. "Take care of yourself, eh? If you're so banged up next I see you I'll have to put you to bed for a week!"

Link smiles sheepishly. Misan pretends to box her around the ears. She searches through the pantries to offer Link a thousand and one ingredients to take with her on the road. Rice and dried seaweed and flakes of various fish and vanilla extract and sugar and dried fruit less common in this part of Hyrule and Eldic spice carefully preserved from their last visit to Darunia and various spices that they picked up in Parapa and flour from Tabantha and cool safflina from Hebra and even some frozen crabs in an ice-box if Link wants them. "Well, it doesn't provide as much companionship as its unfrozen variety," Misan notes with a smile, "but at least it won't spoil or run away."

Link considers the weight that she has already put onto Ilia and politely declines the extra companion, though she accepts the rest.
She says good-bye with her own variant of Symin's sunny-bird on rushroom rather than on sunshroom. The trio of companions praise her once more. When Link's face flushes at the compliments, Dyeri, beaming, leans into to say that although the topaz trail proved a bust, she doesn't regret signing on to the wagon one bit for the sake of eating Link's cooking.

"Not the most professional I've ever had," Dyeri admits, while Glepp translates for Misan. "But swear by the Goddesses, your cooking's got a touch of the wilds themselves."

Link steams so hotly that she could keep the rushy-bird warm on her own cheeks. Retiring to the kitchen to avoid setting herself on fire—no curry needed this time—she chops up and steams a similar meal—without the meat—for the horses as well. "Fly fast and fly safe," she signs to them as they crunch on stamella. "Keep Glepp, and Misan, and Dyeri safe, and yourselves, too."

The horses neigh at her. Ilia neighs back at them. As Link extends an arm to pet one of the horse's ears, Ilia intercepts with her nose in Link's palm. Her companion lowers her head so that Link's fingers slip to Ilia's ears. Link hugs her companion fiercely.

"Don't you worry, girl. We're going up to Ruto together. I'm not leaving you behind. Not this time."

Link fashions a grasswhistle. She tests the notes along the blade of grass, then whistles Epona's song for Ilia. Ilia flicks her ears forward. She whinnies along the rhythm of the music; Link wraps her arms around her beloved companion's neck.

Misan hugs her before they part ways, and Glepp asks Link where she plans to go in Lanayru and how long she plans to stay, her Lanayrish advice helpful as any Link has received. Dyeri offers Link a spot at her table in Ache's Veil whenever she wants—as long as she promises to cook—and Link, tapping her index fingers against another as Yunobo would, remarks that Nadyne blacklisted her from ever going whaling again.

Dyeri snorts back a laugh. "Not everyone in Ache's is a whaler."

"Sorry."

She pats Link on the head. "Take care of yourself, kiddo."

Standing beside Ilia and leaning on her flank, Link waves to the wagon as Misan leads the horses back down the path. Misan and Dyeri, sitting on the roof, wave back to her until they disappear out of sight. She turns herself back towards the fork in the road with the rubble strewn across the path.

The carved stone sign sparks within a light blue glow, so similar to the colour of the guardians' fire-light and the sword that seals that darkness that Link takes a step back. She reads the inscription carved into the luminescent stone: Inogo Bridge, marked with an arrow to the right, and Ternio Trail, marked with an arrow to the left.

"Ready to start climbing over rocks, girl?" Link inquires, reaching up a hand to stroke Ilia's chin. Ilia noses into her palm with a warm exhalation, and Link smiles. "Always ready, aren't you?"

She looks back at the sign to avoid dragging Ilia across half of the land once known as Hyrule only to discover she has gone the wrong way the entire time.

She blinks at the sign she knows how to read.

Not in Necludan, or in Central Hyrulean.

In Lanayrish.
She can read Lanayrish.

---

Mushroom Risotto (four hearts) - goat butter, hylian rice, rock salt, rushroom, stamella shroom

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Since most of the actual treasures have been stripped, treasure-hunters generally look for anything that they could peddle or sell; rag-peddlers strip off whatever fabrics, curtains, rugs, etc. they can to sell to those making clothing and so forth.

Link's not too good at reading the atmosphere, but she's also not naive. The "I don't get it" was in reference to Dyeri's comment, although Dyeri mistook what Link was asking about. Glepp and Misan are indeed a couple.

The flower lady here is a character from Breath of the Wild, who is similarly obsessed with the flowers in the side-quest "Watch Out for the Flowers". Try to step on the flowers three times and see what happens! There's a tree right nearby the shrine from which you can glide down, if I remember correctly, or you can make your own updraft as I did.

I had quite a few issues with the shrine here as Link ended up in the water on a quarter-heart (I was playing on three hearts and did not let myself eat just anywhere), so it was a heart-pounding few moments of frantically trying to use cryonis to stop Link from dying.

The goron merchant in a stylish hat is a reference to such merchants from The Wind Waker. The dancing rito merchant is a reference to myself pulling things out of my ass.

Link typically eats rice with her hands. Many people do, although it isn't too common in the United States, for example. I find it rather convenient myself.

Poor Link. "It's fucked up for a six-year-old to have to work." Yes, that's so. It does happen though.

Ordon goats, again, are from Twilight Princess.

As we saw in the previous chapter, Link and Ilia haven't always been friends. Ilia doesn't know Link's story. From Ilia's point of view, getting to work in the ranch near the horses she loves is a fairy-tale-come-true; Ilia doesn't realise (she's six years old) that Link isn't exactly volunteering by choice. Ilia's anger at Link isn't justified in the slightest. Well, her anger at her father is justified, but certainly not her lashing out at Link. Ilia does apologise, as you can see.

Link and Ilia were both outcasts in a sense; Ilia, as the mayor's daughter, was forbidden books about the outside world because she was to be groomed to lead the village, a position she did not want. The mention about the hiding while the house quaked is in direct reference to the memory in the seventeenth chapter ("Steamed Fruit").

Here’s how Link got her name! "The people in that house" refers to Link’s parents, of course.

The cold wetness, of course, is Link’s own blood. She, well, kind of had a miniature breakdown here, I suppose, about not being able to remember something so clearly important to her and clawed her nails down her face. I suppose it’s not something easily understandable unless it’s happened to you before.

The zora merchant whom Link recognises is the zora that Sidon sent out to try to find a hylian, who has since defected under the assumption that such a hero will never come, to become a merchant.

And hey, it's Link's first contact with Sidon!

Link informs Glepp and Misan about her intentions to go to Ordon, although Link doesn't actually know where that is. And the fact that such well-travelled merchants have never heard of Ordona...

Misan's comment about the frozen crab as providing less companionship is a nod to the actual in-game description of a frozen crab.

The "rushy-bird" is Link's renaming of Symin's sunny-bird that Link learned back in Hateno.

Ilia was jealous of the attention Link was giving to the other horses. Even horses have personalities, you know. Compare and contrast Epona, who is calmer and quieter in the memories, while Ilia is flightier and more skittish.

Being able to read Lanayrish is significant because while Link knows how to speak conversationally in many languages, she does not know how to read or write that many. She knows how to read Necludan, Central Hyrulean, Lanayrish, and one other that you might already be able to guess, because these are the languages that she has spent actual time with.

Up next: meeting Sidon! I've altered him slightly from how he is in-game. Will you be able to see the difference?

midna's ass. 12 October 2017.

Beta reader's comments: More roadtripping! Did I mention that I love that?

The flower lady is hilarious, both in game and here. I'm so glad the author decided to include her. This chapter also illustrates yet another thing I love about Breath of the Wild, which is how many different solutions there are for things - I got into that shrine a totally different way than is depicted here.

Emma. 12 October 2017.
Crab Omelet with Rice

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef meets the Lanayrish prince, who requests that the chef undergo a trial of an electric gauntlet to pave the way to Ruto.

Chapter Notes

As usual, that which would not fit: Thank you to you, the reader, for your truly incredible ability to power through my long-winded chapters. No thanks given to my beta reader on this particular chapter.

This is a slow chapter mostly spending time on introducing Prince Sidon and on expanding the memories. The next chapter's a lot more fun (and rather painful for poor Link).

It's Prince Sidon's first actual appearance!

You can actually get your horse up to Zora's Domain in-game. Specifically, you can get your horse up to the long bridge, where the horse won't want to walk, so you'll have to force your horse forward. Then there's an invisible wall right at the steps leading up to the city proper that you can't cross. But you can bring your horse all the way up to there. I did it by following the river up to the Bank of Wishes, felling trees to make bridges across the water, since horses can actually walk along trees if you're careful.

The epithets "the King Zora" and its spin-off "the Prince Zora" are references to A Link to the Past. In Breath of the Wild, the king is named Dorephan. However, Lanayrish zora culture prefers the whole over the one, as in that the community is more important than the individual. To that end, zora who ascend to become the king/queen are stripped of their personal name and simply referred to with the title "the King Zora"/"the Queen Zora". "The Princess Zora" and "the Prince Zora" do not necessarily have to give up their names, and the title of "the Prince Zora" and "the Princess Zora" have arisen from people trying to mimic "the Queen Zora" and "the King Zora" by convention rather than from the "community over individual" tradition.

As I made the rito more bird-like, so too did I make the zora more fish-like, capitalising on the stark differences between humans and fish. In doing so, I without really meaning to made the zora much more monstrous than they are in-game, what with the giant mouths and all of that.

Cultural concepts of personal space differ from culture to culture. In the real world, for example, Slavic cultures tend to have much smaller "bubbles of personal space" than does white middle-upper-class culture in the United States. Even in the United States, different social groups in different locations have different concepts of personal space. Not all zora share these ideas of personal space, but Lanayrish zora from Ruto are very touchy-feely.
Hand-signing is similar but slightly different from regular sign language, as hand-signing cannot rely on locations compared to the body or in movements of the arms. Now, why might Sidon require Link to hand-sign?

The messengers of the Goddesses are depicted as winged birds most of the time, called "loftwing" or "fokka", among others, depending on the legend and the people at hand. According to the Erito faith, Erito shaped the rito in the image of these heavenly messengers and blessed them with aspects of all traits of courage, wisdom, and power; for this, the rito do not consume other creatures that resemble the messengers. The zora have no such creation myth and have absolutely no qualms about eating fish. Indeed, they are omnivores with a high preference for meat; the most devout zora have their own dietary restrictions of only eating that which is harvested from the water, for the water gives them life.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Ilia does not budge.

Taking her over the rubble cascaded from the mountains of Lanayru—the rock glimmers in the darkness as though spun of the night sky—becomes a greater challenge than protecting the wagon from monsters. Not that monsters do not delay the voyage: blue-green octoroks floating in the river despite the quickness of its current peek out from the water to spit rocks dredged up from the riverbed at Link and Ilia; small greenish beetles with carapaces the same light-speckled dark of the stones shoot out from under loose rocks to knock Link from her feet. Fortunately a single dose of the most popular medicine for such monstrous maladies—a swing of the sword—makes short work of the beetles, while a well-aimed rock or—when she loses her patience with the octoroks' seemingly prescient abilities that far outpace even the advanced technology of the guardians—a single arrow rids her of her frustrations. Link leads Ilia forward step by step. Her companion neighs and paws at the ground and stamps her hooves down every time she slips on the wetted stone. Slowly they make progress forward. Then clap of thunder scares Ilia back, and Link pinches the bridge of her nose.

She does find an abandoned bird's nest amid the rubble. One of the eggs has cracked, its contents already picked clean by animals, but the other three remain intact. She slots them into the ingredient box in her satchel.

Link hurries on.

Though the journey takes time—and bruises, and occasional cuts where Link trips or slips or is felled by a beetle onto the rough rock that skins her left palm and part of her cheek—she can see the far end of the pile of rubble, just before the bridge.

The zora attempting to clear the path call out to her. Link waves at them. She wets her fingers—shaking her head at herself, since the rain has already dampened her skin far beyond what her mouth could do—and whistles.

When she finally convinces Ilia to cross the last few paces, two of the zora in the cleaning party approach to meet Link. One—dark cyan with the head of a ray—inquires if she has come to answer Prince Sidon's summons. The second—yellowish-green with the head of a koi fish—invites her to the bridge.

Link stares at them. Overhead, thunder booms. Retrieving her paraglider, she sets the rubberised fabric upon Ilia's head, halfway between a parasol and a hat. The paraglider hangs off of her companion's head at a tilted angle. Link laughs. The zora ask her again.

"Prince Sidon?" she repeats, emulating the motions of the koi-headed-zora. The two rubble-cleaners glance at one another.

A prince.

A prince.

Link reflexively touches the slate at her right hip, curling her fingers around its form.

"O most courageous hylian youth," the dark-cyan-zora intones, and Link steps back, "have you not come to answer the summons of our brave the Prince Zora, Sidon, who has cast his net far and wide to search for a Champion of Hylia such as yourself?"

"O most courageous hylian youth," begins the other, though Link has some difficulty determining the exact words he uses for the hundred years' lapse during which Lanayrish has continued to develop, "have you not risen to answer the call of the prophecy, that only a son of Hylia may calm the Divine Beast Vah Ruta?"

Link rubs the back of her head. "That's one problem." The Lanayrish comes easily to her. "I'm not a son of Hylia. I'm...a daughter of someone for sure."

The zora glance at one another. They speak privately to one another, the greenish-yellow one seemingly worried of something, the dark cyan nodding vigorously, before they turn back towards Link. "Son or daughter does not matter," the dark-cyan-zora declares, "as long as you bear upon your ears the mark of Hylia." Without asking Link, she reaches forward to lift up one of Link's sidelocks and tug her pointed right ear. Link flinches backwards from the suddenness of the motion and the pain. "Good. Then you carry the torch of the Champion of Hylia of one hundred years ago!"

The greenish-yellow-zora pipes up: "Though the prophecy says that—"

"Prince Sidon would be most honoured to meet you," the ray-zora goes on. With one hand over her chest, she bows low to Link, who rubs her offended right ear. The koi-zora and Link look at one another. Shaking her head, Link pats Ilia on the shoulder to keep her from rushing backwards. "Come, O courageous hylian youth. His Highness the Prince Zora awaits."

The two zora whirl around. Link resumes the arduous process of convincing Ilia that no, she need not neigh at every single rock on which she puts her hoof, and no, she need not spook at that lone lightning-struck tree in the distance, and no, she need not gallop all the way back to the other end of the path when this end is so much closer, and no, especially not, she does not need to dash headfirst into the River Zola.

"Say," Link hears the ray-zora whisper to the other as she walks, "is it just me or does that girl look familiar?"

The koi-fish-zora bats the ray-zora's head. "You know hylians don't live nearly as long as we do. And it's rude to imply that they all look the same. Zola take you but you can't be rude to the one from the prophecy!"

"They kind of do," the ray-zora answers, twiddling her webbed thumbs, "except for the colour of their scales and sometimes their fins."
"Hylians don't have scales. They have skin," the second zora corrects, waggling the tip of his fishy head tail, "and they don't have fins, but hair."

The dark-cyan-zora droops her head. "Next you're going to tell me that they don't lay eggs."

The yellowish-green-zora waves his arms frantically about. "Because they don't! They have live pups!"

The ray-zora smooths her hand over her pectoral fins. "Now you're just yanking my tail."

The koi-zora seethes out into a long and fiery discussion of the finer differences between humans—hylians, and sheikah, and gerudo—and zora. The ray-zora nods along his explanation and occasionally asks a particularly ignorant question which brings the yellowish-green zora to stamp his foot on the ground and shake his fists at the air as though attempting to emulate a character in a storybook. The dark cyan zora smirks mischievously behind the webbing of her right hand.

Link takes the opportunity to observe both the audible and the signed word, the former for understanding and the latter for learning how to sign the words in Lanayrish that have just so slightly altered over the century.

At long last, Ilia's front hooves touch the solid ground. Her companion practically bucks and throws herself forward on the ground. She hops; she springs; she prances around kicking her hooves up, her tail flicking up onto her back to sprinkle Link with raindrops. Link laughs. She leans up to hook her arms around Ilia's neck and walks forward, keeping pace with her companion's movements. The trotting gait lifts her boots repeatedly from the ground. Link nuzzles her cheek against Ilia's neck.

Her companion who can make her walk on air.

The two zora continue to argue as she leads Ilia to the bridge. The koi-zora grows increasingly frustrated until he has started to shake the ray-zora scarcely able to able to keep from chortling. Link tilts herself back in her own laughter until something bright red swooshes through the air above her to thud onto the ground behind her. The reverberation echoes up from her feet all the way to her head. She shudders.

Ever so slowly Link turns around, one hand on the hilt of her sword, her other hand reaching for her cooking pot to provide protection.

A zora.

Prince Sidon.

Close.

Far too close.

So close that she can feel the coolness radiating from his skin.

"O courageous hylian youth!" Link cranes her head up to look at the zora man—at Prince Sidon—who towers some two and a half times her height. Bright red and white, with the head that reminds her of a shark, his eyes a dark gold somewhere between butter and olive oil—Link's stomach rumbles, and she rests a hand against her belly—and a mouth wider than the set of his eyes that seems to split open the entirety of his head in half to reveal rows upon rows of shark teeth.

Her first thought upon seeing his head revolves around wondering how good shark might taste. Her second is to stifle her laughter at herself, and her third is to make a mental note to try her hand at fishing for sharks later and to not consider cannibalising another person.

Link wonders if the followers of Zola disdain from the consumption of fish as much as the followers of Erito disdain the consumption of poultry. Or winged things in general. No, wait, not winged things.

She can still remember the defrosted darner that crawled over her tongue.

Tasted pretty good, though.

Link runs her hand through her ponytail. Prince Sidon does not appear to notice her preoccupied mind.

The two zora that accompanied her rush over to flank her either shoulder. The dark-cyan-zora woman earnestly notes that Link signs rather than speaks, and Prince Sidon immediately bows in understanding. Before he can crush Link with his broad chest the yellowish-green zora pulls Link out of the way, and Prince Sidon flashes them a thumbs-up. He presents the whites of his palms to her, fingers outstretched, the webbing so thick that she cannot see through the film.

Link blinks.

The dark-cyan-zora nudges Link with her hand. "Do you know how to hand-sign Lanayrish?" she whispers, and then hastily adds: "O courageous hylian youth, I mean."

Link tilts her head to the side as she looks up at Prince Sidon, who beams brilliantly at her. "O courageous hylian youth!" he booms in a voice that could shake the stars from the night sky like bananas from Faronese trees. "At last our Goddess has answered our prayers to the prophecy of yore!" He throws up his arms—the back of his left hand smacks Link's chin up and she physically feels her boots clear the ground a centimetre—before pausing and clearing his throat. "My apologies. May I ask for your name, O courageous youth?"

He holds out his massive hands. Each one could curl into a fist the size of Link's head. Hesitantly Link raises her own arms. Stretching out her own hands, she finds that her fingers just barely reach across the breadth of his palm. As with the girl who smelled of horses in the darkness of the closet, she signs into his hands.

"Link," she signs, and Prince Sidon's grin widens until she fears that the bottom half of his jaw will fall off entirely for how little connects the halves of his head together.

"But of course, and a most fortuitous name!" He squeezes her hands. Her knuckles do not go like that normally. "A name worthy of a Champion of Hylia!" He clears his throat. Link sees the other zora staring at her, not only the two who led her to the bridge, but others, and from the corner of her eye she notes an entire tent city sprung up on the bridge, brimming with zora that now gaze at Link between triple-lidded eyes. "Come, let us celebrate! A Champion of Hylia has appeared! Bring this Link—" Link blinks at his already knowing how to pronounce her name out-loud, despite her only indicating the gesture. "—a champion's sash!"

Sudden music blares just behind Link. She twists her neck to find a small symphony swelling out a heroic accompaniment to Prince Sidon's words. A purple zora with the head of a salmon ties a sky-blue sash around Link, shoulder to hip. Link's skin breaks out in cuccoflesh for the coolness of her hands and how much the zora seem to touch one another. Hylians, she has noticed, tend to keep their distance, while others such as the gorons tend warmer and more sociable, but the Lanayrish zora feel no shame in running their hands uncomfortably over her body. With so many around her, she struggles not to curl inwards in on herself.

She remembers the woman with the clipboard and the woman with the long-snouted beastie in Aveil, who advised her as much; Link holds herself fast by picturing the sorts of foodstuffs that she might yet consume in Lanayru.

"Now then, O courageous hylian youth!" Prince Sidon grins once more at her. "To prove yourself as a Champion of Hylia capable of undertaking the cleansing of our Divine Beast Vah Ruta, our Goddess Herself has prepared for you a trial of the hero along Her banks!" Prince Sidon gestures towards the other end of the bridge. Another zora man, this with the head of a sea turtle, unfurls a map. Link recognises the fork between Tierno Trail and Inogo Bridge at the very bottom of the map. A path criss-crosses the Zola River, winding repeatedly across on a series of bridges and crossings, and coils through the mountains like a serpent with its jaws gaping open around a circular body of water in the heart of the mountains. Around this centre of Lanayru—marked as Our Beloved Ruto with a shining crown and a poorly drawn heart—Link can see other villages and towns marked and crossed-out in the mountains, but no more on the river, in a strangely empty stretch of land.

While Prince Sidon continues to speak Link removes her own map from its curled tube in her satchel. She sketches the river and surrounding area from the the Lanayrish map and traces out the path from the bridge to Ruto.

A trial of the Goddesses.

Prince Sidon gesticulates wildly. One of the zora women near Link pushes her down to make her duck one of his wide swings as he settles his hands in front of himself once more. "O courageous hylian youth! From here to our great city of Ruto in the heart of our Goddess Zola’s Domain, the Goddess has manifested the monsters deadliest to our own kind: they that command the thunder at their fins!" Link blinks. Monsters of fire in Eldin and of ice in Tabantha...and of lightning in both the desert and in the most watery place in the land once known as Hyrule this side of the ocean. She kneads her thigh for something to do with her hands. "To become a Champion of Hylia worthy of O our Divine Beast Vah Ruta, you must brave the gauntlet of our Goddess and emerge victorious! From here to Ruto, you need only follow the trail between the mountains with your head held high! Yes, by the prophecy, in every age of strife, a Champion of Hylia shall rise to deliver us from the evil that poisons our waters!" Prince Sidon smacks his palm with his fist. Link jumps back. The symphony builds to a crescendo in the music. "Now come! Test your faith and your power, your wisdom and your courage!" He claps his palms against one another; the rain responds with a roar of thunder that nearly jumps Ilia off the bridge if not for Link clenching the reins. "We shall follow your progress by the riverside. Falter not! Have faith in our Goddess who has brought you before Her! In Ruto shall we meet—in Ruto shall we greet—"

A trial. A trial of a trail. Sidon expects her to fight her path through a gauntlet of monsters in the rain for the sake of proving her skills in order to risk her life further to calm the Divine Beast Vah Ruta.

And here she simply wished to hand over the slate.

Link ogles Sidon but he—evidently ignoring or unable to read her expression—simply grins again and flashes her a thumbs-up. And flashes, quite literally, as his teeth seem to shine so brightly that they literally catch the light to flash into her eyes. "—in Ruto," Sidon concludes amid amid the symphony's cacophony of horns, "shall we feast!"

She perks up. Link raises her arms to sign into his palms. "Feast?"
"But of course! Where would we be without a feast for our most courageous Champion of Hylia, in thanks to our Goddess who has chosen for us such a Champion!" Sidon grins widely. His shiny teeth glitter. Link nearly slips on the rock bridge beneath her feet but catches her balance. "Come, have you any questions, O most courageous future-certain Champion of Hylia?"

Link swings her head from side to side. Sidon continues to hold his hands out expectantly, and the zora who nudged her earlier nudges her again. She hand-signs a no.

Sidon claps his hands on her shoulders. Link's knees nearly give way as Sidon quite veritably squishes her into an embrace that smushes her face against his torso and leaves her gasping for breath. When he releases her at last, her shoulder blades ache and her arms fill with static.

"Now! Take as much time to prepare for the trial ahead as you need, O courageous hylian youth! Never give up, for I and the rest of the world believes in you! May you always swim with our Goddess's flow!" Sidon bows again—two different zora pull Link back at the same time—and then he flips backwards off of the bridge. Link sprints towards the edge just in time to hear a hearty splash in the waters below.

Some of the other zora follow in an entourage of rainbow colours. Others remain with the tent city. The dark-cyan-zora woman that aided in clearing the rubble slaps Link on the back. "Best of luck there, O courageous hylian youth!" Link glances at her to thank her only to find her features more measured than Prince Sidon's enthusiasm. "May you find more favour with the Goddess than the other Champions of Hylia, hmm?" She pats Link between the shoulder before excusing herself to resume clearing away the rubble.

Link blinks at her receding back. Whistling for Ilia, she leads her companion far enough away from the tents to gather her breath and pinch herself. She does not awaken.

She pinches herself harder.

Still not asleep.

Shrugging, Link touches her chin. To prepare herself for the task ahead. She checks her supplies: the sword given to her by Riju; the fire-light spear; the giant boomerang still wrapped up in Ilia's saddlebags that she perhaps does not remember how to catch. Unfurling the wrapping around the boomerang, Link hefts its weight in her hand. She tosses it up and down. She arches her hand back and throws the boomerang.

It comes back at her fast, too fast, and she ducks. With a light little laugh at her own expert dodging skills, Link stands back up to dust herself off.

Then something thwacks her in the back of the head and she drops like a stone.

The giant boomerang, having returned a second time, clatters onto the ground. Rubbing the back of her head, Link fervently prays her thanks for the boomerang having hit her with the flat rather than with the edge.

A Champion of Hylia without a head without be a sight indeed.

Link practises with the boomerang until she can catch it ten times in a row without slipping up. She wraps the weapon up once more.

She leads Ilia across the bridge. On the other bank of the river, she crouches by the water to examine the possibility of catching fish or possibly river shark, if such a beastie as river shark exists. Link glances at herself in the water. A welt on either cheek in the shape of a watering can. Scratches down her cheeks of her own hands. And now a bump on the back of her head.

Truly, the picture of the Champion of Hylia.

She looks up the path. A gauntlet of electricity.

She still has in her bag the box of electric elixirs, yet those elixirs also slow her movements, and the monsters have claws and teeth. Even if they cannot shock her through electricity, a talon through her jugular would be no less shocking.

Besides that she has Ilia to worry about, and Link would sooner eat her own foot than do something as terrible as leave Ilia alone on the side of the river with nothing in the way of food.

She ponders how she might cook her own foot. Blinking at herself, she slaps her palms against her face.

Her stomach rumbles.

Right: river sharks. The current flows too rapidly for her to fish. Yet Link catches crabs that scuttle here and there on the river's edge and snails that glow yellow in the coming dark.

Once the sun sets, she will brave the gauntlet, to sneak past as many monsters as she can. For now she has the chance to seat herself down and enjoy supper.

Link finds two different colours of crab along the river: the first blue, with eyes that twinkle luminously, perhaps to resemble the stone that makes up the path to Ruto, and the second with claws so sharp that Link nearly loses the fingers of her left hand snatching one from the water. She snips off the heads of the crabs with her knife to rid them of their lives as swiftly and mercifully as possible. Snapping off one of the pincers of the second crab variety, she need only brush it against her palm to draw blood that pools in the creases of her hand.

She makes a campfire by chopping down the nearby trees—she attempts to use the fire-light spear but succeeds only in smacking the hilt of the spear repeatedly against the tree trunks—and then cracking open a piece of flint.

With branches that she drives into the ground, Link forms a roof over the fire and the cooking pot to keep the flame lit; the rain drains over the rubbery underlayer of the paraglider to drip from the sides. Link pats the paraglider in thanks. Had her paraglider remained spun of cloth, the rainwater would have dripped through. She sits back, grins at herself, and snaps her fingers as Urbosa would have.

She sets water from the river to boil in the cooking pot. While she waits, Link prepares the crabs, removing first the apron of each crab, and then the shell—the innards still attached—and the gills with careful presses of the hand. The bright-eyed crabs break open easily to reveal their meat within. The crabs with the sharp pincers have slightly stronger shells, and she takes her knife to them.

Link rinses the guts from the meat with the not-yet-boiling water, then cuts the crab meat into bite-sized pieces and sets the meat aside.

From her satchel, she withdraws green onion to dice, cooking them in the buttered bottom of her cooking pot for lack of a skillet. Once the onion has turned soft and yellowed from the butter, Link adds in the crab meat and stirs. She dices herbs picked along the road to Lanayru for flavour. Into the pot they go in a sprinkle of green and yellow, red and blue, along with a dash of salt and a mixed palmful of Eldic spice.

Probably too much, really, but since when has she feared setting herself aflame?

At last she opens up the closed-off package of rice. Licking her lips, Link pours the rice in with another layer of butter to properly fry the rice. She adds finely diced tomato for a sweeter note. Stirring and stirring with the hilt of the fire-light spear that—she finds—does not conduct heat, Link moves the fried rice and crab meat mixture onto one of the wooden boxes for lack of a plate.

Next: the omelet.

She could really use a bowl or a skillet. Touching her chin, she removes one of Ilia's saddlebags. She snaps her fingers at her own innovation. Link uses the leathery bottom to crack open the eggs and whisk them in boiled water. She butters the cooking pot—her store of butter has started to run low, and she makes a mark on her inner wrist with ink to pick up more—and waits for the butter to heat up before adding the whisked eggs. The omelet spreads out and begins to bubble. She tests the bottom of the omelet with her knife. When it starts to firm, Link scrapes the fried rice from the top of the wooden box into the omelet and spreads it over the centre half of the omelet with her knife. She flips up the two edge quarters of the omelet over the middle. To keep the rice inside she presses down on the fold.

After she transfers the hot omelet to her hand—whatever the pain, the promise of deliciousness wins out—Link considers that she should have made something in the way of sauce to decorate its surface.

Yet the lack of decoration does little to deter her from the tastiness that the rice omelet hides within.

Before she brings herself to eat, however, she has Ilia to consider. Fortunately her companion has already moved to graze in the wet grass near the trail of the trial. Link merely sets some vegetables and herbs to simmer with salt-and-sugar to give Ilia a treat for how well she crossed over the rubble; she covers Ilia's head and body with a blanket to help keep her out of the rain. In the meantime, the omelet cools to no longer leave a raised red welt in her skin when Link holds it.

Then she seats herself down to dig in.

A rice omelet with crab. The onion tickles her throat, and the two different sorts of crab meat carry a certain tang absent in other kinds of meat. The tomatoes toss in enough sweetness to offset the more bitter meat of the two. The omelet dilates her veins; she can feel the renewed blood flow alongside the faster pace of her heart.

Crab.

Crab meat, in an omelet with rice. Though she does remember sometimes eating rice in Ordon, the province of Ordona grew less in the way of rice and more in the way of pumpkin, and corn, and squash, and nearly anything that goats from make from butter, to milk, to buttermilk, to cheese, to whey, to cream, to frozen milk of all sorts, to yoghurt. The single pub in the town served mostly liquored milk. She remembers working in the pub in some of the evenings in the winter and early spring when the ranch had less work, though she could not drink. The patrons treated her with some kindness, or at least politeness. Link learned to mix drinks, to serve food with a flair of flicked wrists and tossed. Mostly she enjoyed the preparation of meals over that of liquor.

During the harvest season—when she sought work in other places—the pub served pumpkin wine as well in a special recipe crafted by the daughter of the pub's owner. This the girl who smelled of horses told her, for her father kept a close eye on the establishment.

Her father.

Her father, the mayor of the village. Her father, who kept his daughter inside the house. His father, who feared what the world could do to her.

She does not remember—she does not remember—she does not remember the girl who smelled of horses's mother.

But she remembers the girl who smelled of horses and she remembers the soft smile and she remembers that bright fire in her eyes whenever she spoke of the adventures she longed for and the horses on which she one day ride to the ends of Hyrule and the promise to walk the trails of the earth together, and she remembers enough.

The river ran through Ordon, coursing through the province of Ordon. In the river the villagers occasionally fished in the water to draw up tiny greengills to fry or feed to their cats, but the waters offered up almost nothing in terms of seafood beside. No crab, no lobster, no shrimp, no snail, except for one hardy species that tasted foul at best and could outright poison the unwary at worst.

This she knew of her own experience.

Yet she has before tasted crab.

She could not have tasted crab this fresh in Ordon. Ordon. The province of Ordon. Southeast of Eldin and northwest of Lanayru, wasn't it? The Eldic had their own master blacksmiths and better ore than ever could hope those of a village as small as Ordon, and so she travelled infrequently to Eldin, so infrequently that she had not the opportunity to learn to read their language. But she had learned Necludan—she had learned Necludan?—and she had learned Central Hyrulean, and she had learned Lanayrish.

Lanayrish.

The Lanayrish had their favoured weapons of carved stone and of silver. And yet the zora people, with their relative sensitivity to heat, oftentimes relied on non-zora blacksmiths, both local and abroad, to keep up with the necessities of integrated life.

And so Rusl, in the province of Ordon close to Lanayru—close to Lanayru?—had his workshop filled with the delicate craftsmanship expected by the Lanayrish. The local Lanayrish blacksmiths, Rusl told Link, worked tirelessly to provide the smithing for anything that could see use in a religious festival or day-to-day spiritual task, so that Sages of the Goddess Zola could overlook their creation. "But everyday things—too much demand and not enough supply for 'em to make it all 'emselves." Rusl winked at Link. "And I hear some of the zora got a thing for pointy ears, if you're into that."

Link cocked her head to the side.

Rusl chuckled to himself. "When you're older, kiddo." Kiddo. She had not yet called herself Link.

And so she would walk, and later ride, that long road to Lanayru.

She would arrive in an odd hour of the day. In the morning, Link would begin her rounds with all of the orders that had piled in the past cycle of the moon. Sometimes to Ruto, though more frequently to the smaller villages throughout Lanayru, whose patrons knew Rusl personally from Rusl's own time as a courier.
Yet, since she arrived in an odd hour of the day, she would take a room for the night.

A room. She remembers a room. Not quite a closed room, but a chamber open to the night air. The walls of a silvery-white stone that stretched into a reservoir. A wide bed—once meant for those who had built the dam but which she had repurposed for herself—on which she slept curled up beneath a warm blanket in the Lanayrish chill. On either side of the bed, two long silvery counters curved like the horns of an Ordon goat. Piled high with glasses and with bottles and ingredients and an ice-box set into her face of the counter.

Link found the room on her first visit to Ruto, when her deliveries to such a large city—even with the help of a local—had tired her so badly that she needed a place to rest, and a place far, far away from people. The local—she cannot remember the face, or the name—told her of the dam’s existence, of the silvery-grey room with the hylian-style bed that had served to house human workers. Link cooked for the local a meal as thanks.

And from then on, she slept on that bed each time she came to Ruto.

And then, somewhere along her visits, when the local would come by to say hello and she would show her gratitude in the form of a meal, others from the city began to come by, too.

She remembers: mixing drinks.

She remembers the zora—mostly girls, mostly older than her by far as she could tell by their casual manner of touch and of talk, although determining the age of a zora fell so far beyond the scope of her abilities that she could only hazard the barest guess at the approximate range—who would giggle and ask for hylian-style drinks and inquire about Link’s own work as a courier. Link would deflect the questions by keeping her hands busy. She did not particularly care for the mixing of drinks, but she indulged herself in the preparation of food that accompanied the liquor. Her visitors would bring her ingredients, and she would relish the chance to try her hand at them.

Sometimes her experiments proved a hit. Other times Link left everyone with grimaces at best and retching out their guts at worst. And yet this, in turn, led another crowd to her that wanted to play what they called Hebric roulette with her newest creations. The ingredients they brought with them for Link to try would range from that legitimately used in Lanayrish cuisine—as explained to her by the few Lanayrish, zora or otherwise, who took pity on her—to the most bitter of herbs and foulest of fish that no one in their right mind would consume but which Link accepted out of ignorance.

The attention of so many asking for meat and drink made her uneasy; Link came on rely on a handful of visitors that would calm the more touchy-feely of her guests. Yet she kept at it for the opportunity of new ingredients, even if some of those ingredients left her unable to sleep for the remainder of the night for how violently ill she became.

The food...she would do it for the food.

Over the years, as she became a bimonthly fixture in Ruto, the flow of more malicious ingredients ebbed away and then stopped entirely. Instead, more and more patrons would come by for the food she prepared and to speak with their fellows in a comfort away from the main city of Lanayru, but not as far as the neighbouring villages like Rutela and Tijo. Some would bring their instruments to liven the atmosphere; others would come to practise in front of a small audience everything ranging from singing, to their religious rites of adulthood, to their stand-up comedy routines.

Sometimes her experiments cooking with Lanayrish ingredients still landed her in bed for a day: the zora, Link gathered, were capable of gulping down even rotted fish with nary an adverse effect, while her hylian stomach proved far less resilient.

But as she figured out which types of fish and flower the zora could ingest while she could not, those days, too, became infrequent.

Among those who visited her—among those on whom she could rely to help keep the orders, well, orderly—came a zora girl with scales of red and white, whose head reminded Link of a shark, who mostly kept her mouth closed in a thin line with the very centre painted red to emulate much smaller lips, but who—when Link managed to make her smile or, better yet, to laugh—would parts the full span of her jaws to reveal the sharks' teeth within.

The local who had helped her on her first visit to Ruto.

The girl with the sharks' teeth.

Despite her quiet demeanor, the girl with the sharks' teeth commanded a presence that fell the others silent with her merest word. She volunteered little information of her life in Ruto; Link did not intrude. She knew of the girl with the sharks' teeth as kind, and as gentle, and as soft-spoken, and as determined and firm when she needed to be, and as having sufficient knowledge of medicine to help those who lost the Hebric roulette, and as the bearer of the absolute best ingredients that Link received. From the girl with the sharks' teeth, Link learned to fashion rice-balls, to cook squid and octopus, to brew tea with gooey beads of pudding at the bottom.

As the moon began her downwards arc, the crowd would thin. The girl with the sharks' teeth would help pick up the glasses, would clean the counter of stains of drink and meal, would chatter with Link about her duties as a courier, would never say a word about herself. Eventually Link could no longer pretend to buff the same square centimetre of the counter attempting to tease out a nonexistent spot, and she would retire.

"Good night...my Link," the girl with the sharks' teeth would say, long after only she and Link remained in the room open to the night air, when night would constitute a scarce handful of winks of sleep before the sunrise would see Link off to complete her circuit as a courier. "Rest well."

Link would endeavour to smile gratefully at her yet manage merely a look of vacancy. "Good night, Mipha."

Mipha.

That name alone she carried with her, and the fact that the girl with the sharks' teeth lived in Ruto. Everything else that she knew of the girl with the sharks' teeth, Link knew only of her personality, her actions and her words.

Mipha.

Link closes her eyes.

Mipha...the girl with the sharks' teeth.

A Champion she had known before ever drawing the blade of evil's bane.

She finishes the crab meat rice omelet. By the time she cleans off the inside of her beloved cooking pot, the sun has set; the curtain of summer rain prevents her from watching the stars. Link arms herself with the spear on her back, the sword at her hip, and her wooden pot lid on her left arm. She checks herself and Ilia for anything metal other than the cooking pot, with which she refuses to part, and the sword in its sheathe.
Crab Omelet with Rice (eleven hearts) - bird's egg, bright-eyed crab, hylian rice, razorclaw crab, rock salt

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: I should note that the epithet "son of Hylia" is not about the zora misgendering Link (you can actually see that the two zora in question have not had enough interaction with hylians to be able to differentiate them), but about the hero of legend stereotypically being a man. Just as the legendary princess (Zelda) is usually called a "daughter of Hylia" in the legends, so is the knight (in this case, Link) termed a "son of Hylia". I should also note that I am not narratively treating Link as a man: Zelda is also trans (as has been noted in previous chapters, such as in the twenty-sixth) and the role of princess is stereotypically given to a woman.

Just as zora have difficulty telling zora apart, so do zora have difficulty telling humans apart.

In Twilight Princess, the zora armour is weak to both fire and ice. The zora are cold-blooded and thus are usually room temperature, although their skin (like metal) has a coefficient of thermal conductivity such that they feel cool to the touch, compared to other warm-blooded creatures that typically feel warm (rito actually feel downright hot due to their higher metabolism to provide sufficient energy for flight, which is part of why Link feels so comfortable hugging Amali; gorons also feel cool to the touch, as their outer skins are made out of rock-like secretions).

Sidon's quite big! As mentioned, the more time zora spend in water, the bigger they get, and, conversely, the less they're able to be on land.

Zola's Domain, of course, is an adaptation of Zora's Domain.

Naturally Link would be motivated by a feast.

Link is not special. Sidon has been asking for Champions of Hylia since Vah Ruta awakened. Link awakened in the early spring; it's currently one and a half months into summer, so it's been sixteen and a half months since Link's awakening (heheh) In that time, countless hylians have attempted the gauntlet, and countless hylians have given up or, well, failed. The champions’ sash is just like the one worn by the champions in-game.

The crabs mentioned in this chapter are the bright-eyed crab and razorclaw crab. The apron of a crab, for those unfamiliar with the terminology, is the soft shell on the abdomen.

The pub that sells pumpkin wine is the Lumpy Pumpkin, based on the pub of the same name from Skyward Sword. Working as a bartender does not mean that Link was drinking, although I should note that plenty of societies have had young children drink because the available fermented beverages (of low alcoholic content) were much safer than unclean water.

The chamber open to the night that I mention here is in reference to the East Reservoir dam in-game, which has a hylian-style bed (which Link can sleep in) and is surrounded by various bottles and beverages. If you go to that area in-game, it very much looks like somewhere that could have been a bar.

Hebric roulette, of course, is a play on the real-life "Russian roulette", referring to lethal games of chance. In this case, they would play roulette based on whether or not Link's latest creation would be good or terrible. Since zora physiology is much different than the other races' (the humans are all, well, human; the gorons digest rock; the koroks, as we have seen, eat soil and are very susceptible to effects of their food; and the rito are similar enough to humans)

Rutela is named after the zora queen from Twilight Princess, and Tijo, the Indigo-Go's drummer from Majora's Mask.

"My Link" is not a continuity error. Link did not yet go by the name "Link" at this point. Mipha is actually saying "my link", which you'll find out later what that means.

Up next: the gauntlet of electricity, and Link gains a new travelling companion (who isn't Sidon).

midna's ass. 13 October 2017.

Beta reader's comments: Prince Sidon! I really like the author's interpretation of his character. He adds a fun element to the series; he acts with a certain cadence that other characters don't.

Now we get to run through what the author (and I, thanks to the author) affectionately refers to as "the gauntlet". It's a really fun trial of sorts.

Seafood Fried Rice

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef proceeds through the gauntlet of the Lanayrish prince, receives something of a blessing from the Goddess Farore, and meets a new travelling companion, whom the chef agrees to help take home.

Chapter Notes

Author's notes that didn't actually fit in ao3's box at the end because the author talks too much: As always, thank you to my beta reader, Emma, and to my readers, for coming with me this far.

I'm sure that many a reader attempted to sleep through the gauntlet to wait for the rain to let up. I didn't do so because I actually like the rain, but my beloved beta reader Emma mentioned herself doing so, and I snapped my fingers.

If you don't remember, Link got her arm bitten through on the way up to Eldin, the first time that she healed via a shrine.

Note for readers: embarrassingly enough, I somehow neglected to name the chapter the first go-around. This has been fixed as of 23 October 2017.

Chuchu jelly, like gems, is capable of storing elemental effects, although much less so than precious jewels. Much like with gems, which slowly give off their elemental effect over time but which can break open to release all of it at once, chuchu jelly will slowly give off its effect unless much pressure is applied at once. Chuchu are capable of rapidly contracting the outer layer of their bodies to discharge the elemental effects by killing their own cells and thereafter require some time for their internal organs (which store high concentrations of elemental effects) to distribute the effects back into their outer layer. A chuchu cannot generate fire/ice/electricity itself but instead gathers and stores them in its body. This means that chuchu cells can store anything, even those already differentiated. In fact, you can try this at home: just pick up some chuchu jelly of any sort in-game (blue, white, yellow, or red), put it on the group, and hit it with an elemental weapon.

The monsters referenced in this chapter include moldola, from Phantom Hourglass; parasitic tentacles from Ocarina of Time; and biri from A Link to the Past.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Link could hop across the river on pillars of ice, yet Sidon's words indicate that the Lanayrish will watch her brave this gauntlet. More importantly, Ilia cannot balance her hooves on the ice, and Link would sooner give up eating entirely than risk the life of her companion.

She pauses. She touches her chin.
She shakes her head.

Yes, Link really would give up eating entirely than risk Ilia's life.

Though forcing Ilia up the trail of trial in the cold of the storm harbours its own risks.

She considers waiting out the rain. Link could sleep for several days straight if she needed to, arising simply to cook herself a meal, eat, and go back to sleep.

But some feeling in her gut whispers that the rain will continue to fall, for the dampness over the ground spreads the effects of electricity, and Sidon would never refer to the trail of trial as a gauntlet if she could easily walk through it.

And her gut—with its treasure trove of delicious food—has not yet led her astray.

Well, except for the time when her gut brought her to break her promise to Amali, or the time when her gut suggested that she had visited Marin far in the Tabanch west when in fact Lon Lon Ranch had existed in the east of Central Hyrule, or even the time when a group of lizalfos had stolen her clothing and her gut had pressured her to swoop in for fear of them eating through her satchel.

Then again, she had rescued the food, bite arms still scarring her arm or no.

Under the cover of night, Link enters the gauntlet of thunder. The curtain of rain obscures her vision for anything farther than a pace or two out. The slippery ground forces her to walk with an infuriating slowness. No matter the pace she sets, Ilia spooks at every bolt of lightning; though Link would never find frustration with her companion, she senses a long and difficult night ahead.

At the very least she has faced most of the monsters on the trail of trial before. Yellow-winged keese roosting on overhangs fall to spherical bombs that Link rolls across the ground and detonates at a distance, carefully gripping Ilia's reins carefully so as not to send her companion galloping straight into the rushing rapids of the river. The first time that she sets off a bomb, Link underestimates how the shock could travel through the rainwater slicking the path. The electricity tingles up her spine to rattle her skull. She slides backwards onto her rear. For a moment she swears she can see Amali and Kass's daughters float above her head. Then Link feels Ilia's warmth breath the back of her neck. Her companion noses her cheek as if to worry of her.

"I'm fine, girl," Link promises. She hooks her arms around Ilia's neck to pick herself back up. "As long as you're with me, I'll never not be fine."

Ilia whinnies into Link's neck. The rush of air tickles a giggle out of her.

She takes that as an excuse to sit back and roast herself the crab legs left over from the crab meat rice omelet. The legs of the bright-eyed crabs taste sweet and tangy, with a low-burning aftertaste that eases her muscles and clears her vision. On the other leg, those of the crabs with sharp pincers teeter just on the edge of too bitter. Link discovers that careful application of cold rather than heat—as evidenced by jamming a broken-off fragment that sapphire that she finds within her quiver right into the meat—softens the flavour just enough to bring out the unique texture and notes of the sharp-clawed crabs without a bitterness so overpowering her eyes water.

Licking her lips, Link procrastinates by slurping the insides of the crab shells. Her tongue touches entrail firmly enough to burst them open. She snaps back at the abruptness of faeces in her mouth.

"Right, girl," Link signs to Ilia, propping her chin up on her palm, "I don't mean to be crabby—" She snaps her fingers. "—but that's enough crab for now." She snaps her fingers again, then slaps her own knee and winks. "Get it? Get it? I know. I should save that one for Romani when I Ilia flicks her tail into Link's face. She sneezes, then erupts into a fit of laughter.

With her spirits and her stamina rejuvenated, she continues on. Chuchu spring out from the ground, too close for her to safely use a bomb. Link waits for them to exhaust their stores of static before crouching down and popping their fragile outer membranes with her sword. She kneels down to scoop out the jelly that comprise their innards, which she squeezes in her palm. The jelly squishes out through the cracks between her fingers, and she giggles to herself for the coolness of the slime in her hand.

Then Link squeezes a touch too hard, and the electricity convulses her on the ground. When her head stops spinning and her limbs stop flailing, she reflects that if ever she needs to best someone in a competition of dance, she could merely slip a sample of chuchu jelly down her own back.

Link stuffs the jelly into an empty elixir vial and corks it. She shakes it around. The material of the vial—glass, or something akin—does not conduct the shock that easily, and she feels nothing but a tingling in her palm. Still, the shaken vial glows a brilliant gold like a jar of lightning bugs.

Lasli. The sunset fireflies that Link collected from the hills overlooking Kakariko to bring to her house, to see that smile upon her face, to share with her the hot buttered apples that she had candied for Koko and Cottla.

Koko and Cottla.

Koko, trying her hardest to replace her own mother, and Cottla, trying her hardest to act even younger than she is to keep her family's spirits high.

Link senses her own heart clench inwards. Her chest closes in on herself. She folds her arms across her chest, her shoulders shaking. The rain overhead dampens her cheeks.

She hear Ilia neigh behind her. Glancing back, Link looks at her companion, drenched from the outpouring shower; this time her shoulders shake from mirth.

"I'm all right, girl. You don't need to worry about me."

Instead Ilia worries the hem of Link's tunic. Her ears flick back, and Link can feel the velvety softness of her companion's skin over her cheek. She scratches Ilia behind the ears.

With that, they continue forward. A sudden *hruk*ing from the water leads Link to peer downwards to the river in search of some strange new octorok to populate her nightmares, only to spot a dark shadow in the water surface. She steps forward with the slate clenched in her hand. The silhouette of a lizalfos—black as burned bread—arches its head out of the water to hruk its spit at her. The slimy mess coats her face. Stumbling backwards, Link attempts to wipe the saliva from her eyes. Another gurgle webs her fingers. Blindly she poofs a bomb into her hand and chucks it into the water, but the detonation does not accompany the typical screech of a lizalfos tossed away by the blast.

Instead yet another hruk glues her hands to the slate. Link steps back and back. She listens to the lizalfos chirruping increasingly close to her. Stasis. Stasis. Unable to see, she waves the slate about, randomly tapping the button to initiate the yellow rune.

Then pain blooms along the centre of her abdomen through her tunic, as of a lash of a whip. Sudden warmth from veins breaking blossoms beneath her skin.
The impact pitches her backwards. Another lash across her chest catches the lower edge of her throat. The suddenness of the wound at the base of her neck along her collarbone seeps heat into the collar of her tunic.

Link reaches behind her for the fire-light spear. When she hears the lizalfos chirp again, she thrusts forward to the centre of the noise. Something hot and slippery slaps her face, then drops into the crook of her arms to writhe before plunging to the ground: the lizalfos's severed tongue.

Her eyes pop open.

The lizalfos raises its talons to its mouth. Blood from the stump left slithering in its throat cascades from its jaws. Link barely has time to make a ha noise in her throat when the lizalfos whirls around. Its tail whips into the side of her head. To avoid breaking her neck, Link lets herself fall. The skin of her elbow scrapes on the rock. Rolling forward under the dancing lizalfos's legs, Link thrusts the hilt upwards. The fire-light emerges into a spear to slice into the lizalfos's underside. Its foot slams her in the face; her nose cracks against her skull, pushing the back of her head into the ground. Warm fluid drenches her face and chest. Squeezing her eyes shut, Link jerks her arm up. The spear bisects the lizalfos through its spine to the base of its neck.

With a final cry the lizalfos gurgles into silence. The halves of its body—still connected from the neck up—slump downwards onto Link's face. Pulsating meat smothers her mouth and nose.

Dropping the spear, Link claws at the lizalfos's corpse pressing down on her. The body slides downwards, heavy in her lap. She breathes. Through the coppery tang of blood sucked into her lungs, she inhales fresh air.

She exhales.

Rain washes the blood from her face. Link kicks the corpse off of her. She hears it splash into the river. Opening her eyes, she blinks up at Ilia, who has pressed her ears back, her hooves trembling as if about to bolt.

Link cleans the blood off of herself as best she can before she approaches her companion again.

They continue on.

She spots more lizalfos in the water. Instead of attacking them directly, she uses cryonis to form pillars of ice in the rapids just in front of them. Inevitably the current breaks the columns; heavy pillars of frost crash into the lizalfos. While they struggle to swim back towards her, Link hurries on, Ilia at her side.

Strange worms that blaze with electricity inch their rotund bodies along the rocks. Link attempts to dispatch them with the fire-light spear and with the boomerang, but the monsters continue to inch along. Perhaps not truly monsters at all. Something else entirely.

Out of curiosity she extends a hand towards one. Her efforts reward her with Ilia licking her unconscious face. Link rubs her head. As she sits up, she spots the electrified worm inching away from her, having evidently knocked her out. On the bright side, the same shock has apparently seeped into the river, because the nearby bank drowns in lightning-cooked fish washed up on the shore.

Link rubs her hands together.

She kneels by the side of the water to collect as many fish as will fit in her satchel. Those that have simply died but not roasted, she tosses back to the river, but those that have fried through she slots into her box of ingredients, all the way from Darunia. Link brings one such roasted fish, mottled a glittering blue and with shining yellow lips and a face so amusingly fishy that Link snorts out peals of laughter, to her lips to try a bite.

Opening her mouth, she crunches down.

Did she say fish, when she meant rock roast?

The pain jolts through her teeth up through her skull. Tears stream from the corners of her eyes. She grips the fish between her thumb and forefingers, pulls the stone-hard not-quite-meat from her mouth, and gingerly tests her aching teeth and throbbing gums.

None broken.

Though one of her front incisors has chipped.

She wriggles her tongue through the V left behind in her tooth. When she whistles, the gap brings a high-pitched resonance to the sound.

Ilia answers her call nonetheless.

No matter how damaged, Link remains Link.

She walks on to loop over another bridge and continue on the other bank of the river. The constant patter of rain on her skin grows maddening. Link keeps herself apace on the regular clattering of Ilia's hooves on the stone and on the gathering of mushrooms that sprout up in the rain.

The higher she climbs through the mountains, the more monsters she encounters. Lizalfos with spears and with bows. Occasional moblins wielding spears that she dodges to the side prior to catapulting herself forward and thrusting the gold-hilted sword directly into her stomachs. More keese, which by themselves constitute minor annoyances, but which nearly fell her when paired with monsters that require the brunt of her concentration.

Not only Link she see monsters that she has fought before.

Here: strange seaweed-like growths that stretch across tunnels and sputter static at her. Link stabs through them with the fire-light spear after the metal sword given to her by Riju sends a shock through her arm.

And there: creatures like bari, but blue with violet tentacles instead of the simple red and white-blue that she has seen in Parapa. These do not split when she cleaves her boomerang through them, nor does their electricity course for long through the metal. Link shrugs. Her boomerang makes quick work of them until an entire platoon splat down upon her at once and their tentacles reach for her wrists—and for Ilia.

Her eyes narrow. Her features harden. The fire-light spear slices through their jelly, and she collects it as she did the chuchu.

The chuchu jelly.

Touching her chin, Link nods to herself. She scopes out camps of moblins and lizalfos with the beloved red telescope that once belonged to Aryll. Then she smears an arrowhead in chuchu jelly. Drawing back the string on the bow Amali gave her, Link looses the arrow.

She watches its arc into the camp, where the jelly explodes into a bolt of static that leaves the once-feared monsters writhing on the ground. Link need only squeeze her thighs inwards on Ilia's flanks to bring her companion forward. The weight behind her hooves crushes through the monsters' skulls.

Link offers Ilia hugs and cooing and salt in thanks.

Then she waltzes into the camp to take the monsters' carved arrows and—much more vitally—their gathered ingredients: mushrooms and herbs, flowers and seeds. Sometimes they have roasted fish or meat for themselves; these she parks herself by their covered fires to eat while Ilia browses crates of apples and grasses in the campsites.

Link continues on, spirits renewed by the ease of chuchu jelly. The lightning continues to branch through the clouds and occasionally crash into the ground. The paraglider that she keeps tied over her cooking pot seems to keep the metal lid from attracting the storm, and so onwards she goes. Up and up and up. The trail of trial broadens as it curls around the hills that lead to the heart of Lanayru. She comes upon such a bend to find a wide muddy expanse overlooking the River Zola far below. Once upon the hill must have rested a village, for in the mud lie metal doors and bits of cutlery and weapons and shields and cooking pots and saucepans and skillets and windowsills and jewellery and candle holders and a thousand small bits and bobs, all coated in rust and sparking with static that draws the lightning.

And then: singing.

She hears singing.

No, not quite singing, but a resonant humming, alongside a sound like wooden blocks tumbling over one another. Tilting up her chin, Link spots someone—a rito child?—skipping through the air, clothed in a long white and gold robe. She brings her hands to her mouth to whistle. Ilia whinnies into her ear. The rito child ceases their flight. They turn their hooded head towards her.

A pair of glowing golden eyes and a single silver zig-zag of a mouth greet her, set in a featureless void of a face. The jaws part to reveal rows upon rows of glimmering teeth.

Link steps back. The monster waves a gnarled hand towards her. In its clawed fingers, it clutches a thin yellow rod pointed with a yellow crystal. A long and pointed shard of topaz.

The monster draws up its arm. It windmills its limb around and around as if it had neither bone nor joint, and then the monster flicks the slender rod towards her.

From the topaz tip strike circular balls of lightning.

Instinctively Link leaps to the left, and yet Ilia remains behind her. She whistles again. Perhaps from the spooking of the balls of sparks floating her way, or from the whistle, or from some combination, Ilia gallops towards her. Link dodges, but one of Ilia's reins tangles around her right arm and drags her forward. Though she scrambles for purchase on the slippery rock, her boots slide; Link senses herself tipping backwards. The rein snags her right arm at an angle that strains her shoulder. Her heels scrape against the stone. Ilia gallops around the perimeter of the village ruins. She trips and begins to slope off of the hill entirely but catches herself to canter onwards.

Agony tears through Link's arm where the rein digs into her flesh and through her heels and lower legs where the rocks bite into her skin. The stress on the bone of Link's right arm worsens. With her other hand Link scrambles for the rein to untangle her arm. But the tugging only rips the pain harder through her right.
And all the while the monster hums its resonating song.

Link feels the crack more than she hears it. The sudden giving way, the numbness in her arm followed by a pain that shudders itself through her body. Her knees hit the ground first, then her left hip, then her left shoulder, and then her head, and only then do her ribs follow. Something rubbery flops across her abdomen; it takes her a moment to recognise her own right arm devoid of sensation.

She remembers—

She remembers the girl who smelled of horses, face reddened and smeared in tears and snots, hands trembling with fear—

She remembers of how easily horses can spook, of how easily their limbs can break, of how easily they can trip or fall or slip, of the only remedy for a horse with a broken leg—

Link whistles.

She whistles, and she whistles, and she does not dare stop whistling until she hears Ilia return to her, until she feels the vibrations of Ilia's hoofsteps in the ground beside her, until she laughs from the ticklish sensation of Ilia's nose on her face.

And then Link hears, once more, that humming.

The monster.

The monster that skips through the air.

But Link has already before fought a monster in the thunder. A bolt of lightning, something metal, and her personal secret ingredient of magnesis say hello.

She reaches for the slate at her right hip.

Her fingers close around empty air.

Her eyes widen so far that they threaten to fall out of her head. Link lurches to her feet. Her useless right arm hangs limply at her side while she digs through the pouch at her right hip. The red telescope—thank the Goddesses, as Riju would say—remains affixed to her belt: the constant dragging on the ground must have knocked the slate from its pouch.

She looks up at the monster.

The monster waves at her.

Link reaches for the giant boomerang strapped to Ilia's saddlebags.

Stepping away from her companion, Link holds the boomerang in both hands as far above her head as she can reach. She can sense the sudden static in the air from the metal pointed up at the sky as an offering to the Goddesses.

The Goddesses. Farore, the Goddess of Courage and the Goddess of Wind, under whose domain also falls the roar of thunder.

O Farore.

Link angles her arms backwards. She watches the monster skip. One skip, two skips, three skips, and then the monster stops to once more flail the rod in the air.

She throws the boomerang.

It spins through the skies. Lightning does not strike its metal surface, yet the sharpness of the blade slices through the monster's shoulders to lop off its head in a spray of blood that soaks the white and yellow robe in red. She watches the head and the torso plummet separately down; they burble-sink in the mud. The thin topaz rod glops into the cold earth.

Lifting up her left arm up, Link catches the boomerang in her palm at the same moment that lightning strikes.

Her entire body raises itself from the ground towards the lightning that branches through her limbs. Every muscle spasms and convulses at once to contract and loosen and contract and loosen with the rhythm of the lightning that winds her and winds her and winds her and then abruptly cuts her strings.

She splashes into the mud.

She does not move.

For a single teetering moment her heart has stopped and does not start. Then its beat radiates through her. The pulse carries pain along its wave from her heart from her extremities.

She breathes. In through her nose. Out through her mouth.

Alive.

Alive.

Link lies face-up in the mud. The slimy coldness chills her ears, the back of her neck, and her lower back where her tunic has bunched up around her waist.

Lifting up her arms, Link opens her eyes. The sleeves of her undershirt fall down to expose her limbs.

She marvels at her left arm that caught the lightning in her palm.

Golden scars rise up from her skin to map where the lightning burrowed through her flesh. They spiral down her arm to branch outwards. Roots. A tree's roots painted into her skin down to her shoulder. Somehow the lightning branching around the scars of the lizalfos that bit into her arm upon her first trip to Eldin—twin arcs of ten brownish-red puckered circles amid the molten gold drizzled over her skin—bubbles laughter from her belly.

Lowering her eyelids, Link lets the laughter roll through her. Not even lightning can fell her so long as she has a reason to live, to breathe, to fight. With laughter on her lips, she traces the lightning lines with her right fingertips, her arm not broken so much as strained to the point of any movements causing pain. Exactly on the welts she cannot feel the touch of her finger, but she can feel the pressure on the lower layer of her skin. Just like the burn mark near her right elbow. Link extends her arm and splays her fingers. She cannot help but admire the handiwork of the lightning on her flesh.

Link pulls her sleeves back down. She keeps her gaze on the lightning-strike scars as she picks herself up shakily from the mud that shlps around her, as she plucks the fallen topaz rod from the earth and slots into her belt where once she held the branch that Miyu presented to her, as she leads Ilia through the muddy remains of the village on the bank to hunt for the slate, as she sifts through the mud, as her fingers close around the slate near where Ilia first tangled Link's arm in her reins, as she tests out the magnesis rune upon the massive metal doors that have sunk into the mud, as she hears the sound of wooden blocks tumbling together and a sudden spuf from below one of the metal doors she magnetises.

A korok.

A korok, like Hestu, but much smaller, so little that the korok could stand on Link's palms, with two leafy branches that curl on either side of their head. The korok places their tiny hands against one another. The stiffness of their tree-like form does not allow them to bow, but they curve their spine. As they speak, their leaf-like mask—or face, or something of the sort—quivers back and forth. "Yahahaha!" they call out in whatever language the koroks speak. Link tilts her head. And then, in Lanayrish: "You found me!"

Link blinks. She sets down the door carefully away from the korok, who twirls towards her.

The korok claps their hands together. "This means Sarie can go home now!" Link stares at the korok, who taps their tiny hand against their face, or mask, or leafy...whatever-it-is. "But it's been so long that Sarie doesn't remember where home is..." Sarie whirls their leaf towards Link. "Do you know where Sarie's home is?"

Link shakes her head, and Sarie croons out a mournful koolooloo. She reaches out her lightning-struck left hand to touch the crown of Sarie's head. Far from leaving the korok alone she offers them the most important aspect of life: "Do you want some food?"

Sarie tilts their head to emulate Link's own movements. "Food?"

Fried rice.

The simplest dish that she can imagine at the moment. Nothing but rice, buttered with the last of her stock and sprinkled with chopped carrots, garlic, onion, and mushrooms collected from the rain, as well as the roasted fish from her earlier experiment with the electrified worm. Link cracks open the funny-faced armoured blue fish with the sword Riju gave her and the less armoured red fish with her knife to toss into the rice.

She fries the fish and rice under an overhang of rock farther up the hill, where an overturned log becomes her—and Sarie's—seat.

They eat straight from the cooking pot. Link scoops the hot rice into her palm to chow down, while Sarie reaches in their hand.

Rice with fish. Rice with fish. Someone, someone must have shown her how to prepare rice with fish.

The girl with the sharks' teeth. Mipha. The girl that Link knew from her childhood, from her trips to Ruto.

The first trip to the villages of Lanayru, populated mostly by zora, with smaller numbers of sheikah throughout, populations of gorons to the north and numbers of hylians to the south. Less frequently would she spot gerudo and rito among the towns. She remembers a gerudo geologist who would routinely ask for new strange metal instruments with which to measure the rocks outside of that village perched on a crescent bow in the River Zola, who would smile at her and greet her with a plate of freshly roasted almond cookies and a giant furled list of schematics to bring back to Rusl.
The almond cookies crunched crisply in her mouth. In the centre of each golden-brown biscuit the geologist would press a single almond, roasted and salted. Never before had Link considered the presentation of food to have such a profound impact on its taste, but she could not look away from that single perfect almond.

She remembers a rito crafter of toys—the wife of a zora woman—who relied upon Rusl's blacksmithy to prepare moulds and gears and other small pieces of metal. From gerudo and goron jewel merchants the rito toymaker would pick up shards of topaz which she would snap into the backs of the toys to make them twitch and move. Whenever Link came by with the most recent order, the rito toymaker would have for her sandwiches smeared with cream and dotted with bright red salmon eggs that would burst into tang when Link bit down. From the rito's wife Link heard that every time around the spring festival the toymaker would dress herself in the traditional blue and white of the local river spirit said to bring gifts to well-behaved children and sour slugs to those less well-behaved. Rather than slugs, the toymaker would simply gift small toys to those whose parents could not afford her usual make, and in return those parents would share with her a meal.

Communion through food.

Others, too, but none that Link remembers as well, for the lack of a food with which she could associate.

Link beats her palm against her head. The first trip. The first trip when she did not yet know of anyone, when she followed a smudged map inked on a sheet of parchment Rusl had pressed into her hand, when Uli—Rusl's wife—thanked Link for taking on Rusl's courier duties so that he could remain in Ordon to care for their soon-born son. "Like your little brother," Uli had told Link, her hand on her swollen belly.

The girl who smelled of horses had seen her off that morning with fried greengill from the river that ran through Ordon and a wrapped package of pumpkin biscuits. "For good luck on the journey," she told Link, who could not stop the grin that stretched from ear to ear, "and to help you come back safely."

Link hugged her tightly. Her best friend. The girl who smelled of horses blushed and embraced Link back.

So off Link went. Off Link went to Lanayru. Among the villages she introduced herself as Rusl's new courier. Some of Rusl's patrons wondered at her young age, while others asked for proof of Rusl trusting her, and still more simply accepted her presence with little fanfare. She continued down the road that winded across the River Zola along which resided many of the waterfront villages, or at least the portions of those villages that lay above the water, for she could see from the surface of the water the houses that extended down into the depths where hylians could not tread.

Link arrived in Ruto burdened with packs upon packs of blacksmithy goods. She does not remember the chaos of the crowd but she remembers her own panicked breathing, remembers her body curling up on the ground, remembers her own foot sliding off of the edge of the silvery-white stone of the lower level of the city, remembers the plunge into the water of the River Zola below, remembers the weight of the commissions dragging her down into the murky depths, remembers the all-too-familiar warmth behind her.

She remembers gasping on the bank of the river.

The girl with the sharks' teeth, who looked nearly identical to when Link had last seen her holding a rice ball in her hands—if slightly taller—who oohed at how quickly Link herself had grown. The girl with the sharks' teeth, who rested her webbed hand upon Link's back even as Link shied away from her touch, who asked Link if she could help in any manner, who offered Link a warm meal if only Link would follow her.

Link followed her.

With the pack of Rusl's commissions weighing down her back, Link let the zora girl led her on, her hand cold and damp and smooth on the palm but rough on the back. The girl with the sharks' teeth —Mipha—made her rice, fried with fish; Link perched on the edge of a balcony overlooking the city of Ruto to feast upon the seafood rice.

The warmth of the meal calmed her, and Mipha began to ask her questions, of where she had come from and why she had arrived alone at such a young age. Link kept silent on most. And yet she told Mipha of her duties as a courier, of the commissions that she had brought with her, of how she had promised the girl who smelled of horses that she would return home as soon as she could.

"Then let me help you, little one," offered Mipha, her voice soft, her lips barely parting with her words. "Ruto must be larger than the villages you've visited before, and you'll lose yourself without a guide. And...then, you can hasten back home. Isn't that right?" She smiled yet its corners did not reach her eyes. Link merely looked at her.

Home.

Years later Link would come to recognise the sadness in Mipha's voice, but then and there, with her cheeks bulging full of rice, she simply nodded. Mipha took her hand and walked her through Ruto delivering commissions. At the close of the day, Mipha promised to aid her once more if ever Link would return. When Link nearly dozed off against her shoulder, Mipha suggested Link take a night at the inn, but she balked against the thought of so many people.

Mipha's mouth thinned into a line. Link started to recoil, panic trembling her frame. Yet Mipha once more took her hand; the Ruto girl showed her to an unused bed in the East Reservoir dam.
"You can use it for as long as you like. I'll make sure no one bothers you."

The next morning Mipha remained there when Link awoke. Link made her breakfast as thanks and shouldered her satchel.

Mipha patted her head, ruffled her hair.

"Now go on back home, little one."

Home.

Link raises her chin. Sarie has placed their hand into the cooking pot of rice. As with Hestu's, their hand has split into finger-like roots that absorb the food. Unlike Hestu, Sarie does not burst into flames but instead sways from side to side humming a looping little ditty that brings Link to consider a walk through a shrouded wood.

Somewhere, somewhere, she has heard this song before.

She asks.

Sarie explains with a cheerful lilt of the voice. That they and their friends split up to play hide and seek, and that they chose to hide under a rock. Someone moved the rock to build a house and so they hid beneath the house, and then that house fell and so they hid beneath the big black thing that toppled in the mud. The door, Link realises.

"But Sarie's friends didn't find Sarie! Though another friend did!" Sarie announces, pointing at Link. "Now Sarie can come home but Sarie forgets. Sarie's forgotten a lot. Sarie doesn't have a good memory anymore!" They knock their hand against the side of their head, or maybe their torso: Link cannot tell where one ends and the next begins. "But if Sarie doesn't know, then how can Sarie go home?"

Link's hands form the words that she wishes someone could have formed to her when she awoke in the Shrine of Resurrection.

"I'll help you go home."

Sarie lifts their own head towards Link. They do not smile for they have no mouth yet somehow Link detects something resembling a smile, somewhere in how they hold their body or in the timbre of their voice. "Help Sarie go home?"

"I'll help you find your way home." Link offers her hand. Her left hand, spiralled in lightning scars. "I think we all need a way home, sometimes."

Below the overhang she sits on the edge of the overturned log. On her left side Ilia noses her hair; on her right Sarie perches on her knee; in the middle Link closes her eyes and thinks of home.

—

Seafood Fried Rice (six hearts) - armoured porgy, hylian rice, mighty porgy, rock salt

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: "On the other leg" is a little joke Link makes to herself; she physically waved around a crab leg. Romani likes puns—like the "get the horn"—so Link has been saving up puns for her. Romani Ranch is home for her now, after all.

The spit of a lizalfos, when thick enough, acts as a glue to hold down their prey. The "whip" that Link feels is, indeed, the lizalfos's whip-like tongue, which Link manages to cut off.

Link fights a wizzrobe in this chapter. I was rather impressed by their depiction in Breath of the Wild, though I think my favourite version remains The Wind Waker's bird-like mages.

Link gets struck by lightning! If you're having trouble picture the scar on her left arm, I recommend googling lightning strike scars so that you can get an idea. Farore, although the goddess of wind, has also been associated with thunder in previous games, since she's really more like the goddess of the skies in general which includes weather (for example, in Skyward Sword, the three dragons were likewise themed with fire, water, and lightning), just as Nayru is variously associated with both ice and water, and Din with both fire and rock. In the folklore of some people of Hyrule, lightning is seen as a blessing of Farore; one who has been struck by lightning and lived is said to have been blessed by the goddess of courage. Note that it's her left arm here that's been "blessed" by lightning, which is her dominant arm/sword arm. That will become thematically relevant later.

I think it's telling that Link looks at the scars and just goes "hey that's cool".

Hey, it's a korok! I told you that they would become relevant. As for the korok in question, I've included a major character from each of the 3D Zelda titles (a certain someone already hinted at from Skyward Sword, from Twilight Princess, Aryll from The Wind Waker, and Romani and Cremia from Majora's Mask) and realised that I hadn't included anyone from Ocarina of Time except arguably Malon. I should observe that I personally don't believe in a unified Zelda timeline, regardless of whatever timeline Nintendo threw together for Hyrule Historia, and treat games (outside of directly stated in-game connections) as their own entities. This provides a hint about that timeline; another subsequent chapter (the seventieth, if I remember correctly) will basically directly state which game this follows, albeit with a gap of ten thousand years.

Ruto is the capital of Lanayru, the replacement of Zora's Domain, and named after Ruto Town from The Adventure of Link and thus Ruto from Ocarina of Time.

The almond cookies are based on almendrados. The bread with roe is based on a food that I don't actually know the name of but which my parents made when I was a child; it isn't with expensive caviar.

Because zora are capable of both breathing out of the water and in the water (they have both lungs and gills), there are plenty of settlements that are partly or fully underwater.

Mipha was using Link as an excuse to get out of doing her princessly duties, as she doesn't want to become the Queen Zora (as you'll see). Zora scales, like shark skin, is rough on the "outer" parts (like where Sidon is red) and smooth on the "inner" parts (like where Sidon is white).

I provide here information on how the nine-hundred koroks in Breath of the Wild came to be. Unlike with Breath of the Wild, most of the koroks have already been found by people other than Link; Sarie is, in fact, the very last korok to not yet return to the forest.

Link having heard the song before is not supposed to be some reference to reincarnation, by the way (and the song that Sarie hums is Saria's song from Ocarina of Time), but instead is a song that she learned from Zelda.

Link will get to go home, too.

Up next: a very long flashback, and Link preparing for her meeting with the King Zora.

Beta reader's comments: Poor Ilia. She's so scared and confused. I feel so bad for her whenever I read this chapter.

Much like Sidon, the author has a really interesting take on Mipha, which is really cool to see unfold over the course of the story.
In this chapter, Link receives what may be the most badass scar in history.

Crab Stir-Fry

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef crosses the Bridge of Lanayru; is greeted by the Lanayrish prince; and gains entry to the city of Ruto—and an audience with its king.

Chapter Notes

Author's notes that didn't fit into the end: As usual, thank you to all of my readers for keeping with me so far, and thank you to my beloved beta reader Emma, for pulling through.

Just as the massive bridge in Eldin is known as the Bridge of Eldin, I renamed the bridge to Zora's Domain the Bridge of Lanayru. Speaking of which, in a previous chapter, I renamed Mount Lanayru to Mount Nayru, because you wouldn't expect the tallest mountain in say, Chad, to be named Mount Chad (indeed, it's Emi Koussi).

The various instruments of the Lanayrish symphony are a reference to the Instruments of the Sirens from Link's Awakening.

The triple swirl sigil of the zora is meant to reflect the sapphire from Ocarina of Time, which in turn resembles the mark of Nayru.

"Waves" is a unit of time measurement, owing historically to the Lanayrish use of water-clocks before their replacement by pendulum clocks when the advance of technology (yes, water-clocks are a real thing!).

See the end of the chapter for more notes

On the other side of Luto's Crossing, Link, Ilia, and Sarie cut through the last several bends in the road with a combination of magnesis on her giant boomerang—wriggling the metal thing in the middle of a campsite of monsters while they chirp and poke at it; then the lightning strikes—stasis to sneak past more difficult enemies; cryonis to block octoroks and lizalfos from spitting at her in the river; her old and faithful stand-by of bombs; and the pictobox, which with Link snaps a pictograph of herself and Sarie exchanging a slap of palms, one of the topaz-rod-wielding monsters floating in the background of the pictograph with the boomerang just halfway through cleaving its torso.

Link takes the one, two, three steps around the final bend. Suddenly the skies open up before her, and she stands at one end of the Bridge of Lanayru.

She emerges from the gauntlet of thunder with a sprained and throbbing right arm that pulsates in spiralled patterns where Ilia's rein wrapped around her and a left arm welted in golden-orange roots that branch over her flesh. The blue sash tied around her waist has dirtied and torn over the past several days of her struggle through on the trail of trial. The sky-blue hangs on a thread from hip to shoulder. Her trousers cake with mud; her tunic stiffens from dried blood; her undershirt sticks to
But the fish and rice warms her belly. Link will never let anything puncture the aura of fullness that carries her forward, to the ever-many delicious meals that await her.

The Zola River widens into Ruto Lake in the bowl-like heart of the mountains of Lanayru, either named for the capital or the capital named for the lake. The red telescope reveals cascades of waterfalls feeding the lake from the icy mountains further up climb into the heavens to the peak of Mount Nayru beneath the silver moon.

The Bridge of Lanayru spans over the lake, longer the Bridge of Eldin, though not quite as wide. The silvery-white stone glimmers even beneath the dark curtain of rain; great archways carved with symbols of the Goddess Zola spaced every three paces or so along its length. Stone struts drop away into the abyss to hold the span up. Beyond the bridge, Link can just scarcely make out the layered city of Ruto, half above water and half below.

She hears Sarie, sitting atop Ilia's head, gasp and shakannah in awe.

Link looks down at the Bridge of Lanayru itself, and her hands drop to her sides.

Sidon awaits her some five paces in. Beaming widely, he rests a hand over his own chest, his gaze settled blankly on some indistinct point in front of him. Beside him waits a light blue zora woman with the head of a long-whiskered catfish, wielding a small curved horn in her hand. And there, in two long rows spanning the entire remainder of the Bridge of Lanayru, Link ogles flagbearers lofting banners aloft and musicians clutching instruments in their finned hands. Cellos and horns, bells and harps, marimbas and musical triangles, hand organs and drums, and undoubtedly more beyond that she cannot see for the storm.

The rain pours on.

The agony inflicted on her from the monsters and the lightning ebb away as Link takes her first step upon the Bridge of Lanayru. Sarie makes noises of wonder and awe at the Lanayrish symphony awaiting them. The light-blue-zora in front leans towards Sidon, whose grin widens and teeth glint, and then lifts the horn to her mouth.

Her head-tail twists back and forth; she blows into the instrument.

The musicians carry the sound down their ranks in a wave-like fashion—Link would laugh at that if not for the gazes chaining her in place; perhaps stasis works in the same manner—and flagbearers raise their flags—inscribed with the triple-swirl sigil of Zola that resembles all-too-well the mark of Nayru—to the heavens.

Ilia trots forward. The movements of her hooves keep Link walking forward while Sarie bounces up and down upon Ilia's head.

As she nears Sidon, she hears the central hornist change her tune. The prince extends his arm forward towards Link to snatch her once more into a bone-crushing embrace. She can very physically feel the difference between his slippery white skin and his much rougher red scales that leave her lower back scraped and bloody. When he releases her, she wobbles on her jellied legs.

"O Champion of Hylia," booms Sidon, "but of course, you have conquered the trial set forth by our Goddess Zola! I believed in you, and you—O Champion of Hylia, O most courageous Link—" A hushed murmur wavers over the crowd. Link pales as the gazes upon her sharpen. The weight of so many eyes upon her back dizzies her head and bows her shoulders. "—in whom I had absolute faith, have proven yourself worthy a thousand times over! Welcome, O Champion of Hylia, to the heart of our Goddess Zola's Domain, our great city of Ruto!"

Link teeters back and forth on her feet. She hears Sarie makes noises by her ear, and she hears Ilia whinny, and she hears Sidon continue to speak, and yet the words wash over her ears as sound and fury without meaning.

"And as the Champion of Hylia, we shall welcome you into this great city as a hero, as the chosen one sent by our Goddess to bestow upon us a saviour from the Divine Beast Vah Ruta! Come now, O Champion of Hylia, O Hero of Lanayru, O most courageous Link!"

The gazes of the Lanayrish. All upon her at once. Sidon, his grin so expectant. All upon her, the girl who did nothing but cross over a patch of rubble for all that they know.

Courage.

Courage.

Courage.

She'll show them courage. She'll...she'll...

She'll tip backwards and give in to the darkness.

Link awakens to the smell of crab meat and fried vegetables. The scent curls around her nose to lift her up from slumber. Her hands shoot out from her body to grab a bowl. Her nose identifies the food: crab stir-fry with a healthy blend of ELdic spice—and how!—with herbs, seaweed, and vegetables of different assortments, all served over rice.

She shoves her entire face into the bowl. Without a utensil and far too impatient to wait for the travel of her hand to her mouth and back, Link eats directly from the bowl until her stomach practically threatens to pop like an overinflated octorok and her mouth burns with spice.

Only then do her eyes open.

Link jolts up on a bed that sloshes her around, in the nude. A dark burgundy zora—his head like a trout—greets her with a respectful bow at the foot of the bed. Before she can panic, the messenger indicates her clothing beside her on the watery mattress, which Link rapidly tugs on while the messenger continues to look calmly at her, seemingly oblivious to his own presence.

The messenger explains, briefly, of the situation. Of Link's fainting upon the bridge. Of Sidon carrying her bodily over the threshold to Ruto. Of her horse, Ilia, currently stabled safely in the charge of the royal family. Of her belongings waiting for her to place them back on, including the red telescope—which Link speedily snatches from the messenger—and the slate. Of the royal dress prepared especially for the occasion, for the young lady—O Champion of Hylia, Master Link—to wear in her presentation to the King of Lanayru.

Link chokes on a crab leg. She thumps her hand against her chest hard enough for the leg to shoot out of her throat and into her own lap. The impact claws the leg across her inner thighs. Plucking it from the bed, she wolfs it down whole.

The messenger purses his lips. "Quite. His Majesty, the King Zora," he elaborates with a flourish of his fins, "wishes to see you personally, O Champion of Hylia, Master Link, to discuss matters of the Divine Beast Vah Ruta. If all goes well...and you are the first Champion of Hylia to make it this far, so I extend my sincerest congratulations by the grace of the Goddess, blessed in Her faith...then we shall return to you your weapons as well." The messenger bows. "If you have no need of me, O Champion of Hylia, I shall allow you to time to awaken. In ten waves hence I shall return to lead the audience of His Majesty, so please prepare yourself."

She blinks. The messenger does not repeat himself and instead turns away. Shrugging, Link decides to play a game of determining just how much stir-fry she can forcibly ingest before she passes out again for however long ten waves might mean. If the King of Lanayru has any sort of moral character, he will understand and forgive her for prioritising the consumption of crab stir-fry over her meeting with him.

The messenger leaves. Link focuses her full attention on the crab stir-fry.

Mm.

Crab stir-fry.

She knows how to make this dish. She could make it here and now if she had the ingredients, as she did make it for someone. As she did make it for Mipha.

Twice.

At least twice.

They say lightning never strikes twice in the same place, but the deliciousness of her own cooking strikes her thrice a day.

Link gathered over the brief years of visiting Lanayru that Mipha's father expected her to follow into the family business, whatever that business may have entailed. She gathered over the brief years of visiting Lanayru that Mipha wished for something else, though what that something was she would not—or could not—say. She gathered over the brief years of visiting Lanayru that when Mipha finally announced her departure, the fear in her features gave way to a secretive relief.

Mipha spoke increasingly softly over the years. Link does not remember when she first began to redden the small line of her mouth, but Mipha would purse her lips and part as little of her jaws as she could. Link could not ask her of why. Rather she kept her mouth shut and simply complimented Mipha on her smile whenever she did beam fully.

Her grin—when she smiled widely—stretched nearly across the entirety of her face. Her sharks' teeth would not quite slot together, and Link would see the rows of even sharper teeth beyond waiting to replace those worn down. Mipha could, if she wanted to, likely snap off Link's head in a single bite.

And yet Link, who had seen Mipha carefully trap flies under an overturned glass and release them outside, would sooner bet that she could learn to breathe underwater than Mipha could ever hurt her.

She would look over the edges of the bottom-most layer of Ruto that lay above the water to admire the other half of the city submerged in the lake, where farmers harvested seaweed and kelp and raised fish to support the massive population of Ruto, and where most zora attended their twice daily religious services: once at the rising of the moon, and another at its setting. The Temple of Zola that protruded in its silvery splendor from the lake contained a complicated mechanism to drain or fill with water, so that non-zora guests and Lanayrish residents could enjoy the more prominent services; during normal hours, the entirety of the temple waited beneath the mirrored surface of the lake.

Back in Ordon, Link dunked her head for increasingly long periods of time in her efforts to learn how to breathe underwater. Yet, despite her supplications, the Goddesses did not provide her with gills. When Mipha heard of her adventures, she giggled gently, covering her mouth with a small silvery fan. Always so polite that Link would feel dirty just from existing in her presence, except for her aura so inviting that Link could let herself relax.

The years went on. Steadily Link grew in height and in strength, while Mipha seemed, mostly, to stay the same. Link mentioned once of her little sister, of her precious Aryll, whom she had sent to live on an island with her grandmother; Mipha let slip the existence of her own little sister, far younger than she. Only twenty years of age, Mipha noted.

Link blinked rapidly at her.

"Oh." Mipha's cheeks darkened in her blush, as she linked her slender fingers together. "I so often forget how brief live hylians in comparison to us. You've grown so much in the blink of an eye. I remember when I first saw you, and you stood no taller than my sister..."

Link rubbed the back of her head. "Do zora live forever?"

Mipha flattened her hands against one another. "No, not at all." She hesitated. "Yet we live longer than do most others."

Link counted on her fingers. "Hylians, sheikah, gerudo, gorons, rito."

"Yes." Mipha inclined her head. The fins on her face fluttered. "Longer than do most others. I have heard that the children of the forest are immortal, but I have never heard of anyone meeting a child of the forest."

Link tilted her head to the side, but Mipha did not elaborate on the children of the forest. Instead she seemed to draw inwards on herself; the tender membranes of her fins and webbing paled. Link offered her a blanket for the cold.

"Hylians only live some sixty, seventy years, don't they?" Mipha murmured to herself. Link wrapped the blanket around her. She could feel the roughness of Mipha's scales catch on the underside of the fabric meant for hylians. Absentmindedly Mipha's fingers dug into the blanket to pull it over herself.

She continued to gaze ahead, without looking for even a moment at Link.

If she had cut out Link's legs from beneath her, Link would not have felt any smaller than she did in that room open to the night air, Mipha huddled over the counter, the blanket scarcely covering her upper back from their difference in size.

"A bird could love a fish..." Mipha's third eyelids fluttered horizontally over her eyes. Link blinked uncomprehendingly. She took a step from the counter. "...but where would they live?"

Link raised her hands to her own face. She sensed the crescent pricks of her nails on the skin of her cheeks just below her eyes.

She busied herself making crab stir-fry with the jar of orange-red spices that she had purchased from the foothill towns at the border of Akkala and Eldin before looping around to Lanayru.

With her hands laden with as many different species of crab as she could fit into a single pot, Link served the stir-fry over a bed of rice. She pushed the plate across the counter to Mipha.

She watched the third eyelid slip over the corner of Mipha's eyes to reveal the gold of her irises, her diamond-shaped pupils shrinking in the sudden light.

"Oh...is this for me, my Link?"

Link nodded.

She observed Mipha eat politely, observed Mipha open the tiniest smidgen of her mouth so that only her red-painted lips would part and not the remainder of her jawline, observed Mipha dab her mouth with a napkin. When Link turned her head away to pretend to polish the counter, she could watch Mipha in the reflection of the glass she held: the girl with the sharks' teeth brought the entire plate up to her mouth and swallowed the stir-fry whole.

Link rested her hand against her chin. How to convince Mipha that she could act as she wanted to, even around Link. How to...make Mipha feel as safe around her, as she felt around Mipha.

She set the glass down. It spun around its base before teetering onto its side.

Mipha thanked Link for the meal and bid her good night. Picking the discarded blanket from Mipha's seat, Link turned it over to see the interior shredded, the fabric cool to the touch from the chill of Mipha's skin.

Link slept beneath the blanket anyway. The linen shed on her. In the morning she found puffs of white clinging to her skin and fluffing in her hair.

The years stretched on.

Mipha never changed. Always the same kind and gentle aura, always the same softness of her timbre, always that same small smile, always that same laugh with her mouth carefully covered, always that same serene face that she put on when she thought Link could see her.

Link changed. Step by step Link changed, and grew, and just when her own form had started to make her cover mirrors and shy away from the edge of the water, they chose Mipha.

She did not learn until years later who they were. For all she knew they existed as mysterious shadows in the corners of the world, as strangely flitting in and out of reality as Them against which Romani fights.

When Mipha finally announced her departure, she did so late at night, on Link's last night in Ruto before her return journey to the province of Ordona to once more pet the round-horned goats and feast on slightly sour Ordon cheese.

When Mipha finally announced her departure, all of the other patrons had long since left after spending the evening increasingly reaching across the counter to pat Link's head or to rub her shoulders, and only she and Mipha remained.

When Mipha finally announced her departure, she wept without tears. Link had never seen Mipha cry tears. Instead she simply covered her face with her hands, the fingers splayed, the thin membrane of webbing between them glistening wetly in the light of luminous stone lanterns. "I...have been chosen as the Champion of Zola."
Link stared at her without understanding. Zola, the Goddess. But a Champion of Zola. "Is that the same thing as a Sage of Zola?"

"May I touch your cheek?" Link dipped her head, and Mipha reached over the counter to rest her hand against Link's jawline, to cup her fingers over the curve of Link's cheek. The coldness of her palm could shy Link away but she tensed herself against the counter. "I will have to leave, to somewhere far away, to train to defend Lanayru...and the rest of Hyrule." A Champion of Zola. One of four Champions, or something like that. To defend and protect the kingdom of Hyrule and all of its sovereign states and inhabitants.

Four great sovereign states under Hyrule had given forth their own Champion: from Eldin, from Tabantha, from Parapa, and, now, from Lanayru. Link did not venture to ask why not Faron, or Necluda, or Akkala, or Hebra, nor did she inquire from what the Champions had to defend the kingdom of Hyrule.

Perhaps, just as Link never spoke in confidence to Mipha, neither did Mipha speak in confidence to her.

"And...I have been chosen, as the Champion of Zola. They have a title for me now." Mipha smiled faintly and Link leaned in. "The Champion of Zola, the Hero of Lanayru, the Divine Beast Vah Ruta's Pilot, O Wise Mipha."

Link bobbed her head.

"I don't know how I feel about all of this. O Wise Mipha..." The fins arrayed around her face opened and closed. "I don't feel very wise at all."

Link could have said but I think you are, and yet her fingers froze around the shapes, around the possibility of disagreeing with Mipha, around what that might entail even from someone as gentle as the girl she had known for these long years, and rather she folded her hands in her lap.

"I...wish to tell you that I was chosen for my skills in the art of the spear, or in healing." Mipha splayed her fingers. "But...the real reason I was chosen..."

Her voice trailed to silence.

Link did not press. Instead she asked if Mipha wanted anything to eat.

As she cooked, Mipha asked Link of her life in Ordona, of the village of Ordon, of the goats, of the girl who smelled of horses, of her employment as a courier, of whether she would continue to return to Ruto.

"My Link," Mipha told her with that odd mixture of relief and fear—relief—fear—in the lower curve of her tone, "I do not know when next I'll see you. Will you...will you be all right here, in Ruto, on your own?"

Link had no answer. Rather, Mipha read a different question off her hands: whether Mipha's new position would bring her happiness.

"You needn't worry about me, my Link," Mipha responded, her voice even quieter than usual, her lips scarcely vibrating with her words. "For once...for once, maybe I don't know where my path will lead in the future. That has its own happiness, doesn't it?" She lowered her gaze. "Oh...I know of the river of fate." She affected a certain solemn timbre that stilled Link's hands. But only for a moment. Then Link busied herself making the meal once more. Crab stir-fry, just as Mipha liked it.
"When the Golden Goddesses created our world, the Goddess Nayru, Goddess of Wisdom and Goddess of Water, set flow the current of time, so as to provide a logic and a meaning to a world once embroiled in primordial chaos."

Mipha's voice deepened. Link stirred more swiftly. A piece of crab meat flew from the skillet to smack her across the nose. Stifling her yelp of pain at the sensation of burning, she stuck out her tongue to let the bit of meat fall directly into her mouth. Of course the meat burned her tongue too, although least it tasted great while setting her mouth on fire.

"And, as the Goddess Zola elaborates in Her faith in the Golden Goddesses, the river of time may bend and flow, but always will the water it carries lead to the ocean. The circumstances of fate may seem cloudy to an observer in the river who cannot see where its mouth leads, yet the river will pour out its waters into the ocean nevertheless."

She hesitated.

"But then...if the river runs straight and a fish can see the ocean, the fish may decide not to swim again, for no matter how it swims, the current shall carry it forward. Yet if the river bends and loops in upon itself, the fish instead will swim with all of its might to reach what it cannot see."

Mipha raised her head again to lock her gaze onto Link's, who hastily covered her burned nose with her hand and held the skillet with the other. "The Goddess wishes for us to swim with all of our might and to have Faith that our efforts shall see us to the ocean. Before...before I became Champion, I thought that I could see the ocean. Now I feel as though I can swim again. That is its own kind of happiness. I hope that that...that that made any sense to you, my Link."

Here Link nodded, her hand still over her nose; her breath came out as a nasally whistle.

Link had heard, from the festivals held in Ordon, of the story of the Goddess Nayru, but never of the Goddess Zola. She merely dipped her head.

In time, she can believe. But in fate, she dares not. For the moment that she might consider her life etched in stone, she may as well lie in the grass to perish.

"I'm happy that you'll be happy," Link signed, and Mipha's eyes narrowed. Link sensed her breath freeze in her own throat as she stepped back. Her bare foot slid in a spot of something slippery—oil, or butter, or her own sweat—and she felt herself falling backwards.

"May I—?" Mipha reached for her.

Her cold fingers closed around Link's left wrist.

Link continued to slide downwards another half-second, but Mipha caught her fast. With her other hand Mipha wrapped her fingers around Link's right elbow to pull her up. When Link regained her footing Mipha let go immediately. Clasping her hands together Mipha bowed low to Link.

"My sincerest apologies, my Link, for not asking permission first."

Link shook her head. "Thank you for saving me." Her fingers trembled. "Please...please don't hurt me for asking this, but are you angry at me? For saying that you'll be happy?"

"Angry?" Mipha stared at Link and she shuddered back to cower behind the counter. "No, I...noticed the burn across your nose. Here, let me heal you, my Link. May I touch your face?"

The blue healing salve smelled vaguely of chuchu jelly as Mipha ran her fingers over Link's nose.
Closing her eyes, Link squirmed under the tingling sensation of Mipha's fingertips until Mipha retracted her hand to her lap. She looked down upon her own palm where pooled flecks of the salve she herself had concocted.

Mipha ate of the stir-fry, and Link watched her wide grin in the reflection of a glass. "My Link to the world beyond Ruto...I'll miss your cooking as much as I'll miss your smile."

Link blushed though she knew not why.

The moon drew up, reached her zenith, and began to climb back down through the darkness of the sky. With the closing of the night came the stirring of the city, of followers of the Goddess Zola rising to begin the migration to the Temple of Zola for their morning prayer.

And then Mipha had to slip away back to her own home, to prepare for her journey to Central Hyrule.

She promised to send Link letters, if she could. She hoped that one day they would see one another again. She waved, and then she started to turn away, and then Link's own heart flipped over itself.

"Mipha..." Her hands shuddered. "...may I hug you?"

Mipha smiled.

For a second she beamed from ear to ear, and the full breadth of her sharks' teeth zig-zagged across her face. In the next Mipha had thinned the line of her mouth to only show Link the tiniest smile of her painted lips.

But for a second—for a second—for a second Mipha showed Link the truest happiness, as true as the deliciousness of the crab stir-fry Link made her.

When Link hugged her, Mipha embraced her back; the rough scales on the backs of Mipha's bare arms scraped through Link's tunic to scratch her skin to blood. Cheeks darkening with her blush, Mipha offered to heal her back as well.

She remembers the sensation of Mipha's palms, smeared with salve, upon her skin.

Link carried Mipha's smile with her all the way back to Ordona. When she told Aryll of the smile, Aryll clapped her hands together and drew a picture of a giant shark with a grin that took up the width of three entire sheets of parchment which the girl who smelled of horses helped her tape together. They could not hang the drawing in the house, but the girl who smelled of horses affixed it to the wall of the ranch. The owner of the ranch ruffled Aryll's hair before telling the girl who smelled of horses to return to her house for fear of her father's retaliation.

"Like the girl with the golden hair."

The girl with the golden hair. The girl who smelled of horses. Neither of whom had taken warmly to Link at first.

But the quickest way to someone's heart is through their stomach. The quickest way to someone's heart...

Link glances again at the dress laid out upon the bedside. When she attempts to push herself off of the water-bed, the mattress sloshes back and knocks her onto her spine. She tries to swing herself up by rocking back and forth. Her efforts reward her with sliding her further and further into the centre of the bed. Link flails her limbs like a beetle turned onto its back.
She lets her arms and legs drop to her sides; the impact of her limbs against the bed launches her from the mattress. She smacks against the opposite wall. Stumbling back, Link rubs her nose, already broken by the lizalfos's foot. Her bare left arm retains the golden scars left behind by the lightning, while her right reddens with the spiral of where the reins bit into her flesh.

A dress.

A dress that reminds her of a goldfish's frills and which seems to consist of the fins of giant fish carefully sewn together. In a deep, deep blue. Link runs her hands over the material, cool to the touch, with a texture not unlike candlewax, ticklish to the undersides of her fingers.

She slips on the dress over her undershirt and trousers. Link starts to remove her trousers; suddenly she finds a sensation as if she had abruptly lost her legs. Despite the sweat, dirt, and mud caked into the fabric—though someone must have washed her clothes, for they carry a fresher scent of soap—Link pulls up the trousers again to smooth the dress over her legs.

With that, she almost sits on the edge of the bed before recalling how the water-bed flopped her onto her back. No need for that repeat performance.

Rather, then, Link settles herself upon the floor to sniff her hands still smelling of stir-fry.

And then she waits. For the messenger to return. To bring her to the King of Lanayru. To introduce herself.

She lifts her hand to her chin.

The Goddesses have not sent her. Link happened upon the slate, as she happened upon the blade of evil's bane, through chance. Had she not taken the slate from the depression in the pedestal in the Shrine of Resurrection—had she not found the wooden cabin or read the contents of the letter within—had she not chosen to deliver the letter to Lady Impa of Kakariko—someone else would have eventually taken on that burden.

And yet, with the weight of the slate burning upon her right hip, she has aided in the calming of three Divine Beasts.

Chosen hero or no, Link has the ability and the courage to calm the last.

No, not her. Once upon a time, before she lost her memories, the titles weighed down upon her shoulders like a loftwing around her neck.

And yet now Link has chosen her own path. Not in swimming with all her might to the inevitability of an ocean she cannot see, but in crawling up onto the bank of the river towards that sweeter scent she senses in the grass.

When she takes the slate in hand, her hands do not heavy with obligation. Instead her fingers close around the promise of what she has decided for herself.

And when she has calmed the Divine Beasts, and when she has found a path to Ordona, and when she has ensured the safety of Koko and Cottla, and when she has come back to Romani Ranch, and when she has seen about Romani's bwig bwad bwoar, then she can rest, and she can cook, and she can eat, and she can walk her own trail.

But first, she needs to prepare some food.
Crab Stir-fry (nine hearts) - bright-eyed crab, goron spice, fleet-lotus seeds, ironshell crab, razorclaw crab

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: The pictograph Link takes is a mistake; she doesn't really enjoy violence like that.

The city of Ruto has a complex mechanism by which it can be raised or lowered, so that the water level will change based on the needs of the residents. This mechanism was inspired by the Zelda dungeons that require you to change the water level, such as the Swamp Palace from A Link Between Worlds.

That ceremony was a little too much for Link, especially with having just braved the entire gauntlet; with the fatigue of how long that took, as well as her social anxiety, Link just conked herself out. I should note that the journey towards the Bridge of Lanayru took several days, as I mentioned in the fact that Link was taking opportunities to rest at different campsites and so forth.

In Breath of the Wild, the Seabed Inn offers Link a zora water-bed. Here's that water-bed.

Mipha's mouth in Breath of the Wild bothers me. It looks like the modeller initially forgot to give her a mouth, panicked at the last second, and slapped on the tiniest two red lips imaginable. Instead, in Delicious in Wilds, the "tiny red lips" syndrome is explained by Mipha putting on lipstick on a small part of her mouth and learning how to barely part her lips when she speaks, to give the illusion that her mouth is much smaller than it is. This, to keep non-zora from being scared of her in her own self-consciousness. She feels similarly about her size and tries to stay out of the water.

Mipha mentioning a little sister is not a mistake. I realised that although I had included quite a few trans women in the story (Link, Zelda, Marin, Malon, off the top of my head, with every unspecified character being open to reader interpretation), I hadn't included many prominent trans men other than Vish, and I wanted to do something with Sidon anyhow.

"A bird could love a fish, but where would they live?" is a reference to Fiddler on the Roof, where the quotation is "A bird may love a fish but where would they build a home together?" In this case, Mipha is not referring to romance; rather, she's talking about the inherent difficulties of desiring both zora and non-zora lifestyles at once.

Mipha's departure is in reference to her being chosen to become the Champion of Zola and the pilot of the Divine Beast Vah Ruta, so she is excused from her expectations of becoming the Queen Zora. Her departure is also why she wasn't around for Link coming out as a girl.

The comment about covering mirrors is in reference to Link's growing dysphoria at the onset of puberty.

Unlike the other zora, Mipha is always careful about asking Link, since she noticed that Link is uncomfortable with the touchy-feely zora culture.

The comment about Nayru and water is based on the description of the goddesses from the manual of A Link to the Past and the deku tree's words from Ocarina of Time.

As with Urbosa, and Revali, and to a lesser extent Daruk, we get to see Mipha's thoughts about fate. And we also get to see Link's thoughts, Link who somewhat rejects fate, although not out of the same reasons that Revali does. Rather, for Link, she propels herself forward on the thought that she can change her fate, especially since she doesn't want to accept "defeat" at her fate to have to deal with her parents. You also see hints of Link's abuse in this very chapter in her conversation with Mipha.

She's almost there. She's so close to her real break-through about being a hero, although her character development won't end there.

Link's much better about keeping and taking responsibility now (i.e. even though she ran away from Riju, she also has decided to try to find out about Calamity Ganon after she takes care of other more pertinent stuff), but she hasn't lost that playfulness that makes Link Link, like with the stuffing her mouth with crab legs.

Up next: making food; not chatting with the king. And in the chapter after that? Why, what's that monstrous beast you have to fight on your way to Vah Ruta?

midna's ass. 16 October 2017.

Beta reader's comments: Link using the camera rune never ceases to be both funny and adorable.

Poor Link. Lanayru culture doesn't mesh well with her own anxieties.

We're very near the first apex in Link's character development, which is exciting. She's a wonderful character to watch unfold.

Link in a dress is really cute.

Emma. 16 October 2017.
The travelling chef prepares for the meeting with the Lanayrish king by making a meal of crab legs and meets some very familiar and long-lived faces.

Author's notes that didn't make it to the end etc etc.: Of course, a warm and from-the-deepths-my-heart thank you to all of the readers who have supported me so far, and an equal thank-you to my most marvellous beta reader, Emma, who continues to help me remind to post chapters on time and not twelve hours later.

One moon is approximately the length of a month; twelve hundred moons is a century. Because the moon is tied to the ocean, I figured that it was appropriate for the zora to use it as a unit of measurement. Why do the zora have the most markedly different units of measurement and things like that in the whole of Hyrule? Because zora live for much longer than all of the other races, so they're the most resistant to picking up new standards.

The dress slithers uncomfortably around her limbs as she steps out of the room with her mouth tasting of spring green elixir. Glancing left and right, she does not spot the messenger, but rather peers down a long windowless hallway illuminated by luminous stones.

Link sniffs.

Something fishy—and not the fishiness of her intention to sneak around the palace. Something crabby—and not the crabbiness of the messenger once he discovers that his charge has vanished from the room. Something salty—and not the saltiness she will experience if the messenger or someone else catches her before she can enact her master plan.

She lets her nose lead her through the quiet and empty hallways. Crouching down on the floor, Link sneaks forward step by step, step by step, step by step. Occasionally she hears conversation, which brings her to hang back until the talk passes. Here and there a door slides open in her face, and she leaps back into the shadows until the occupant—she has seen nothing but zora since her arrival, she realises—leaves or returns to their room.

The fishy-crabby-salty scent grows stronger. Link wanders on, and other fragrances join in: frying herbs, salt-grilled fish, smoked meat. She licks her lips.

The hallway abruptly widens into a large circular chamber with a pool of water in its centre and several other hallways leading out. In the pool relax various zora: some chatting with one another, some lying back in the water, some playing a strange game involving red markers at the bottom of the pool, some snacking on a tray of shrimp that floats in the water, some evidently using a game of wind-water-fire to decide who will bring over another tray of shrimp from the kitchens, some discussing the Divine Beast Vah Ruta while another swimmer shushes them. "Whatever the Goddess has in store for us," the shusher explains, "She will have in store for us. Relax."

"To have faith is to have faith in your own abilities as well," the other argues hotly, "and the Goddess would never have us sit back and wait for fate to come to us."

The shusher frowns. "Perhaps this is a sign from the Goddess Herself."

"Oh, and what sort of sign could that be?" the other responds, now sitting up from the water.

"A sign of our behaviour these twelve hundred moons—"

"I suppose it's simple for you to say so, with little danger of Ruto being swept away," observes the zora who won the game of wind-water-fire while his companion dejectedly picks up the tray of shrimp crumbs. "Have you forgotten the Calamity, or were you too young to remember it?"

The sudden silence in the chamber comes so quiet that Link can hear nothing but her own heartbeat. The zora in the pool turn towards the one who invoked the Great Calamity, who has folded his hands in his lap to gaze coolly back at them.

Link keeps herself towards the end of the hallway; she considers how best to enter the chamber. Then, while the inhabitants of the pool have occupied themselves glaring open-mouthed at he who spoke of the Calamity, she shrugs to herself and starts the walk to tail behind the zora who lost the game of wind-water-fire.

At least wind-water-fire remains popular enough to have lasted the Great Calamity and the century of chaos that followed. Truly nothing could ever defeat that manner of determining who goes first. The land known as Hyrule's national pastime.

Well, not quite. From what Link has remembered of the time before the Great Calamity, Hyrule's national pastime was in fact cucco dodging.

She follows the zora woman with the tray. Up and up, up and up, through the winding hallways that radiate outwards from the pool like the limbs of an octopus, a river of water coursing downwards about two centimetres from the floor.

Link slides her feet along the ground to avoid sloshing the water loudly enough to wake the entire city of Ruto at once.

The dueling scents of fishiness, crabbiness, and saltiness grow even stronger, until Link finds herself wrinkling her nose for their overpowering nature even as her mouth continues to water. She can faintly hear the pitter-patter of rain over the roof of the winding tunnels. Suddenly the hallway opens up to the air.

The zora woman with the tray passes through the brief open space without a care to the roofed hallway. Glancing upwards, Link can see neither the sun nor the stars.

Only the endless blanket of grey and the maddening rain rivuleting down her skin.

Lifting her hands above her head, Link hurries on after the zora woman with the tray. At length the hallway widens again. The zora woman veers to the left into an open door illumined with luminous stones through which Link can see nearly nothing but from which wafts the savory aroma of fish, and crab, and salt, and herb, and seed, and all manner of foodstuff. Even if the Lanayrish catch her in the act, by the Golden Goddesses Link will enter the kitchens and she will try her hand at preparing food in the kitchens and she will cry over her own meal if she has to.

She steps through the doorway.

The column of scent hits her like a boomerang to the face.

The rot of fish.

Link forces her eyes open.

The kitchens. Not like the tiny galley of Misan and Glepp's wagon, or even the open-air communal cooking area of Medli, but a massive chamber longer than the Temple of Time and as wide as the Bridge of Eldin, stretching outwards past where the glow of luminous stones allows her eyes—less suited to the darkness than the eyes of zora—to see.

Zora. Some ten or fifteen zora that she can see at the counters preparing a variety of meals, from soups in rounded pots, to rice-balls rolled together in their hands, from shrimp fried in oil to fish-shaped pastries baked on a sheltered flame.

Link looks past her fellow food-lovers to examine the kitchens proper.

Long silvery-white counters. Stone pantries and cabinets set between counters. Pots and pans of every size and shape hanging from the backs of cabinets or arranged upon the counters in regular rows. Baskets of ingredients—fruit and vegetables, herbs and spices, mushrooms and salts—ready and waiting. A long ice-box wrapping around every other counter. She can scarcely hold herself back from flinging open the ice-box to indulge in what might await within.

And, hanging from the ceiling on long cords: the fish, and the crab, and the shrimp, and the snail, and the lobster, and the turtle, and every sort of seafood, entirely raw, some partially rotting from the cords.

Before Link's own eyes, one of the zora working at the counters reaches up to grab a carp from a cord and tosses the half-rotted fish whole into her mouth prior to returning to the pot of stew she prepares.

Link takes a step forward. Water sloshes around her ankles; several of the zora nearest to her raise their heads towards her.

She stares at them.

They watch her not head-on but from the corners of their vision. One by one they turn back to their own tasks, and Link exhales.

With the dress floofing around her and splashing the water more loudly than before, Link marches towards an unoccupied portion of the counter. From here she can see the vast majority of the kitchens lay silent and unused. Only the very front row of counters feels the hands of chefs. The remaining nine-tenths of the long chamber has not even baskets of ingredients. When she chances to prop open an ice-box, she feels that the sapphire on the inside has long since exhausted its cold.

Link takes a spot on the further end of the front row counters. The zora man a pace to her right is rolling some form of crepe or pancake made of rice. Link waves to the zora, who ignores her.

Shrugging, she turns to her life's work: the cooking of food.

The counter comes up to her chin. Rubbing the back of her head Link clambers on top of it to perch on the edge. She finds a space for fire set inside of the counter itself. Instead of wood, the inner chamber for the flame stocks with small black discs that remind her of the goat chips sometimes used in Ordona. She brings a disc to her nose to whiff, and the oily scent of packed fish nearly knocks her unconscious. Eyes watering, Link sets the chip back.

She touches her chin. Her gaze roams the chamber, seeking inspiration. Here: an abundance of fish, trout and carp, those with the funny-looking faces and bass. There: snails with shells curled this way and that. And by her left hand: a cord of two different crabs set in some pattern she cannot discern.

Link reaches for the cord. Her fingers close around the void. Too short. Clambering up onto the counter, she balances on its slippery-wet surface, to paw for the cord. As she stands up on the tips of her toes, her fingertips just manage to catch the very end of the cord. The arches of her feet cramp. She perseveres to push herself higher and higher until she wraps her hand around one of the sharp-pincer crabs at the base of the cord. Grunting, she jerks her arm back.

The crab goes free.

Its momentum swings her arm outwards, and the crab begins to fly from her palm when Link twists the entire weight of her body around to flop her arm against her own chest. The crab smacks her lower jaw, then topples to the counter.

She senses the sliding of her own heels. The swing of the cord clears her boots from the surface of the counter. Breath hitched, Link grips the cord with both hands as the pendulum propels her forward onto a neighbouring counter.

The cord digs into her skin but she does not let go. Her swing reaches its zenith, and she starts to swing the other way. As she passes over her own counter, Link strains to touch the surface with her feet but cannot quite reach.

And then she does. All at once she lands on very edge of the counter; the pain of the sharp corner against the arches of her feet—even through her boots—tips her backwards. The floor rushes up to greet her backside. The impact thunders up her tailbone through her spine. A breath later her legs accompany her fall to the floor.

Her head smacks against the cabinet between her counter and its neighbour.

Her lap fills with crab on a cord. The cord drizzles over her shoulders and around her head to make a crown of crab. The final crab on the cord plops onto the back of her neck to plunge downwards into her dress. Its hard outer shell scratches her back along the spine. Leaping to her feet, Link launches into a dance of desperation until the crab shimmies off her back and onto the watery ground.

Link exhales. She bends down to pick up the cord she has ripped off of the ceiling from the floor only to see that the current has started to carry her precious crabs away.

Once she has rescued the crabs from the current, Link claps her hands against her cheeks to awaken herself. "All right, crabs," she signs at the cord spiralled on the counter, "thank you for aiding me in making a delicious meal."

The crabs do not reply. She pats the closest one on the head.

When Link removes the shell of the first, she finds the insides partially rotted and the entrails having burst over the crab's innards. Swallowing down her vomit, she closes the shell as if setting down the lid of a box. She checks the legs of the crab instead.

Perfectly safe. Not rotted. Smelling clean and relatively fresh.

With a grin Link sets about removing the legs from the crabs until she has a sizeable mountain of crab limbs piled up upon the counter. She takes a moment to arrange the crabs into a rough approximation of a horse. Link removes the slate from her hip—an affair of attempting to flip up the dress before giving in and simply pulling her arm in through her sleeve—to snap a pictograph of the likeness of Ilia to later show her companion.

Then Link goes on: crab.

Though she just manages to open one of the pantries, she discovers that her hands do not reach the top of the cabinets. She squirrels up the stone, wedging the corner of the cabinet between her thighs, and removes a stick of butter that she holds in her teeth on her way down. Rummaging through the pantries and cabinets that she can reach, Link grates Hyrule herb, garlic, red pepper, and parsley into a fluffy mountain of green, white, and violet. She heats butter in a saucepan and adds the herbs alongside a pinch of salt and a dash of ground black pepper.

She taps her fingers along her jawline. Climbing onto the counter to physically walk between the large pots of ingredients, arranged not unlike the communal kitchens of Kasuto, Link uncovers chickaloo tree nuts. She takes a handful back to her own counter.

The other zora, if they pay her antics mind, keep quiet. No one speaks. Not a single sound, or a single sign, save for the sss of saucepans and skillets and their contents, spiced or salted, seared or sautéed.

Far too short to reach her food from the floor, she crouches on the counter over the saucepan. While the butter sauces away, Link tunnels a small hole through the centre of each crab leg to smoosh the meat onto the sides. She cracks the tree nuts into tiny pieces. Tasting one, she closes her eyes to enjoy the nutty, wooden flavour that laps over her tongue, slightly stronger than the taste of acorns, and with a much meatier base. Link drops the shards into the salted butter sauce. After they have cooked about halfway through, she dredges them back up, burning her fingertips in the process, and stuffs them into the crab legs to the brim before plugging the hole with a packing of crab meat and a generous cork of sauce to function as sealing paste. She smears oil onto the lip of each crab leg with her thumb, then pinches the ends together and folds them over as though sealing an envelope.

Meat stuffed with nut. Like Riju taught her.

Link turns the crab legs over to set the corks directly against the heat of the saucepan. The butter sauce bakes; the oil fries to seal the skin of the legs against one another with the salted-butter nuts inside.

She brings a crab leg up to her ear to shake it and listen to the nuts rattle inside. Link can feel through the rumble within just how many nuts she has packed into the leg.

Perhaps she could lead a choir of frogs with these as readily as Hestu with their maracas.

Hestu.

Koroks.

Sarie.
With any luck Sarie remains with Ilia. Link expires out a breath and rests a hand against her chest.

She cracks the crab legs, then rubs rock salt over the meat on the inside. Link brushes butter sauce over the outer layer until the legs glimmer. Then she rolls her shoulders and dumps the crab legs directly into the saucepan—removed from the heat—to coat them thoroughly. She adds another layer of salt on top of the butter before starting the process of grilling the legs. The utensils used by the zora stretch just slightly too large for her palms, and Link needs to use both hands to flip the crab legs over with a spatula. She presses them down onto the barred metal grill until the meat chars just enough to leave darkened stripes along the meat.

Link shakes her head. In a kitchen made for a people half again or twice her height, she feels like a child. But a child that can make food good.

She laughs to herself. The zora man making rice crepes shushes her; Link stuffs a leftover chickaloo tree nut into her own mouth to serve as a cork.

As she finishes grilling each crab leg, she flips it up onto a plate. Her first attempt at the flip lands the crab leg in her hair, and her second sends it spinning off to orbit where she cannot find it again. Link offers the missing crab leg a eulogy: "So long, little crab."

By her third flip, she misses the plate by only about a metre, and her fourth lands on the edge. Before long Link has compiled a veritable Death Mountain of crab legs. She finishes flipping the final crab legs onto the plate. Wiping her mouth—saliva leaking from the corners at the smell of grilled crab legs and at her own stomach yearning for more despite having eaten the stir-fry not an hour ago—Link pinches a crab leg between her fingers.

She inhales. The peculiar tang of crab, the savoriness of roasted nut within, the nose-tickling garlic butter sauce, the slight acridity of just a touch too much salt.

Link bites down.

She crunches the chickaloo tree nuts between her teeth while the buttered crab meat slips around the shards of nut to coat the inside of her mouth in parsley and garlic, spicy pepper and Hyrule herb. Link tilts back her head to swallow. The crab butters her throat on its way down. The salt stings her tongue and the inner curve of her throat, but the rich flavour of the crab mixed with the woodiness of the nuts fuses the sky and the sea, the deepest catch from the waters and the highest gathering from the treetops.

Crab legs grilled in salt.

She remembers grilling these in the royal kitchens, late at night, hiding in a corner while the other kitchens workers stared at her but would not speak a word against her for the gold and violet sheath upon her back.

She remembers meeting Mipha again. She does not quite remember the pulling of the sword that seals the darkness, but she can still hear the shouts of the guards, the screams of the assembled crowd, the thumping of her own heart convinced that they would either shackle her wrists or slit her throat—or, if the Goddesses favoured her, both. She remembers Mipha's voice. She remembers Mipha who knew her, who recognised her despite the years of difference and change since the last time that they had seen one another.

When she explained to Mipha of herself being a girl, Link lowered the lids over her eyes for fear of Mipha's expression. Instead she heard Mipha ask, in her gentle voice: "May I hug you, my Link?"
Link noted how Mipha only touched her with her inner arms now instead of the rougher outer. The embrace did not leave her skin raw. Yet Link could sense, too, the hesitation and the carefulness of the arrangement of Mipha's limbs that kept the hug from its usual...from its usual something-or-other that Link could not quite name.

"I suppose when I call you my Link now, I am referring to your name, not simply you being my link to the world outside of Ruto." Mipha inclined her head. "I will take the burden of correcting my mistakes to the other Champions. I'm...I'm sorry for how I introduced you to them, my Link."

She remembers bringing the tray of grilled crab legs to Mipha. Not stuffed with chickaloo tree nuts, but simply grilled through. When Mipha tasted of the butter sauce, of the spicy pepper of the Lanayrish mountains mixed with the Hyrule herb of the lower grasslands, Mipha did not weep, but her diamond-shaped pupils expanded to fill the whole of her eyes.

"Thank you, my Link," she whispered, her hands trembling around the tray.

She remembers herself dipping her head. "You're the one who...saved me."

Link crunches down the remainder of the leg. Between the spicy pepper and the salt, her mouth burns with a most welcoming aftertaste. She runs her tongue over her lips to lap up the last of the salty butter sauce.

She cleans up after herself as best she can. Link tucks the cord ripped from the ceiling around her waist as a spare belt, taking the tray of crab legs with her.

Link taps the shoulder of one of her fellow food-lovers on her way out. She balances the tray of crab legs on the crook of her arm.

"Do you know where I can find the king?" she asks, blinking at the zora boy, who takes a look at her, covers his eyes with his horizontal third eyelids, and returns to his work.

She tilts her head to the side. She can respect the dedication to his food.

With tray in hand, Link quits the kitchens, but not before bidding them a tearful good-bye and a promise to return.

She exits with the crab legs and starts the trek back up the hallways in an attempt to return to her own room. When the roof goes out and the rain patters in, Link covers the plate with her own body. The dress smears slightly in butter sauce in the process. But the crab legs make the journey just fine, and she grins to herself.

Link returns to the chamber with the pool of zora. Only when she pokes her head out to look at the hallways leading out from the chamber does she realise that she hasn't the foggiest on where to go from here.

Abruptly: a gasp from the pool. Not a second later everyone has turned their gaze towards her.

Link blinks at them. They stare at her. The zora girl who lost the game of wind-water-fire rubs her eyes.

At length one of the swimmers draws herself up from the water. Link cranes her head back at the zora woman who stands nearly twice her own height looking down upon her from behind the hood of her head fins. The zora woman opens her mouth. Her sharks' teeth glimmer in the dim light of the luminous stones. Link feels her heart shudder against the insides of her ears.

The zora woman leans forward.
"So...are those for us?"

Link shakes her head. The mountain of crab legs on the tray teeters. Once more she balances the tray on the crook of her arm to reply to her interrogator. "I made these for the king. He wanted to meet me and I thought I'd bring a gift."

The zora woman leans back. She loops her hand through the silver sash that straddles low on her hips. "So...the King Zora, eh. Right. And I'm the Goddess Zola Herself, don'cha know?"

"Wait, Frash...isn't that the...?" Another zora man rises from the water. He steps closer to Link, who shrinks back, alternating between holding the tray in front of her as a makeshift shield and attempting to shield the crab legs with her body. "Aren't you the Champion of Hylia? The new one." He looks at the others. "Isn't she? Am I wrong?"

Yet another zora girl claps her hands and Link glances at her. Her eyes have widened. The fins along her face and down her sides have flared up and out. "Link? Link...is that you?"

Link looks at the zora, up and down. Dark green, with a head that resembles the funny-faced fish that have made Link laugh so hard, her head tail fwwipping back and forth, her lips slightly parted in her shock.

Link blinks slowly. Frash. She remembers. She remembers Frash, far younger then, too young to drink but old enough to worry about her sister who wanted nothing more than to become the Oracle of Nayru. She looks at the other zora in the pool. There: a woman who would come in closer to the end of the night for a serving of liquored milk with a single bowl of plain rice, nothing more. Here: a disliker of crab and lover of sanke carp who would pay her extra for bringing in a catch from Necluda. There: someone who would always tredge up a bucket full of blueshell snails for Link to cook in this recipe or that. Here: a girl who would ask Link to stuff pumpkins for her with a glass of wildberry wine on the side. There: a player of Hebric roulette with a preference for cocktails made on spicy pepper, who would take a sip, wait for the fireball down her throat, and then drain it down with a glass of icy water before repeating the process, claiming that she intended to build up a tolerance to the pepper until she could drink them pureed. Here: an aficionado of liquored milk mixed through with squash-sweetened brandy Link kept in a casket of wood under the counter from the province of Ordona. There: one who would gift Link an entire shark or sea turtle pulled in from the coast to cook, who would stand and flex her muscles while everyone oohed and aahed over her in thanks for having brought in the catch of the day.

She does not know all of the zora gathered in pool, but she does know many for whom she has mixed drinks and cooked meals.

And even though the noise of their speech and the chaos of the bodies surrounding her hasten her heart and compress her breath, Link can feel something like—relief.

Not quite like coming home.

But like coming back to a friend after a very, very long time away.

"Your...favourite was the salt-shrimp soup, wasn't it?" Link signs to Frash, whose eyes continue to widen until her pupils and irises have comparatively narrowed for how much of the whites she shows. "The salt-shrimp soup. You...talked about your troubles with your sister..."

Abruptly everyone seems to emerge from the water at once to crowd around Link. They yell her name. They ask where she has been for the past hundred years. The stuffed pumpkin girl inquires how she has lived for so long when, to her knowledge, hylians do not last longer than perhaps a hundred years at most, "and those hylians look like wrinkled boiled potatoes, not like people."

Link backs and away from the masses that surround her. She keeps her hands around the edges of the tray. The corners dig into her shaking palms. She focuses on the crab legs.

"Look! She's still even got that same blank stare! I used to think she was asking for something with that look, a reward or summat," shouts one of the zora men above the din of the masses, "before Rafeau set me straight."

She focuses on not dropping the crab legs into the water.

"Oi, put a trout in it. 'Course she was asking for something when we would sidle up and make her cook for us day in and day out."

She focuses on not spilling a single leg.

"Well then what's she asking for now?"

She feels their cold hands over her—

"I don't know! I read hylian faces 'bout as well as I read Hebric!"

—touching her as they might another zora—

"But you don't know any Hebric!"

—rubbing her back, patting her arms, nudging her hips—

"That's the joke."

—and she steps backwards, and backwards, and her shoulder blades hit the wall, and she flattens herself against it, and—

"Please move yourselves, if you will. Master Link has duties to attend to."

The crowd parts like two halves of a sea suddenly split down the middle. The messenger—dark burgundy, with the head of a trout—steps forward. Pursing his lips, the messenger devours Link with his gaze and spits her back out. "Quite. Follow me, if you would, O Champion of Hylia, Master Link."

Still holding the tray of crab legs, Link inches towards the messenger. The bottom of the dress drags in the water.

"You're no fun, Igli," notes the woman who would ask for liquored milk; the messenger ignores her.

The crowd trails behind Igli and Link. She can hear the zora capable of audible speech chattering amongst themselves. In the reflection of the tray she watches them embrace one another, sign to each other, mimic the cooking of food or the drinking of fluid in their stories, perhaps about her. Link stares blankly ahead.

Perhaps not blankly. Perhaps with an expression that seems to long for something.

Not in the mass of too many at once. Yet when she has calmed the Divine Beast Vah Ruta, she would. She would like to talk. To talk to them. To talk to the people that she knows, and that know her.
That knew the her from before the Great Calamity.

No.

That know her.

Igli leads Link up through the endless hallways. She narrows her attention to the steadily cooling crab legs. She should have brought with her a plate inlaid with ruby or something of that sort to keep the crab legs warm. By the time she will arrive at the hall of the king, they will have cooled down entirely.

The king.

She does not remember how long the king has been king for but she remembers, too, Mipha telling her about him. Once he had been called Dorephan, but since assuming the position of king, he had become the King Zora in the convention of the Lanayrish.

Something about giving in fully to the responsibilities, to the losing oneself for the greater good, and in doing so, losing one's own name. No longer himself, but the king of his people. King Zora, with no room for anything but remaining the king.

The dress feels that much heavier upon her shoulders the lower Link climbs with the masses of zora behind her. Guards become more frequent, as do the open areas of the hallways; suddenly they have exited out of the gloom entirely to the open sky of the lowest levels of the city of Ruto, shaped not unlike an inverted cone, with higher levels spiralling around the palace at the city's heart. Like a lotus flower opened to the heavens, or a lily surrounded by its pads.

Here the water reaches her chest. Link raises the tray above her head. Igli clicks his tongue. She feels the water level lowering even as she struggles to walk through the rapids.

Igli shows her under a veranda, where he signs to the guards who lower their silver spears to allow the congregation through. Link walks on; the tray of crab legs shudders, though she retains her grip fast. She moves through the silvery arch to find herself staring at a massive whale-shark—no, a massive zora that towers three or four times her own height, far larger than any other that Link has ever seen, reclining in a giant pool of water. Behind him range guards with silver weapons. A small symphony plays a relaxing melody of tinkling bells and a resonant water-horn.

By either side of the giant zora in the water, Link sees Prince Sidon, who does not seem to notice her, and a shorter zora, hunched over, his age visible in the droop of his fins and the squint of his eyes.

Link glances between the tray of crab legs and the whale-shark-like zora in the water.

As Igli clears his throat, a zora man seated at an organ sits up suddenly to press his fingers onto the keys. Link has before heard the song that he plays, but not well enough to place it. Something she listened to in the gardens, standing behind the girl with the golden hair, the eight-stringed harp upon her lap.

"O Zola, by Your faith, the Champion of Hylia has come!"

The massive zora lying in the pool rouses up.

Link watches him shift his great bulk to sit up in the water. His breathing seems to quicken until he has once more settled in the lake. Other zora beside him splash him with water, and one rubs a shiny oil over his skin. His third eyelid slides over his golden eyes, and his pupils constrict. Link observes the silver crown gracing his head. After a moment he focuses his gaze upon Link.

He blinks.

Link blinks back.

She steps forward while the man on the organ introduces the King Zora. She steps forward while a Sage of Zola—playing a cello that glitters silver as a full moon—invokes the Goddess Zola to watch down over them. She steps forward while Prince Sidon perks up and waves, first at the entrance to the chamber and then at her, tracking her as she trudges through the water in the buttered dress. She steps forward while the hunched over zora narrows his eyes at her and curls his fingers against his palms.

She steps forward, and she lifts the plate of crab legs above her head towards the King Zora. He regards her blearily. The guards near the King Zora instantly raise their silver spears towards her, but the King Zora lifts his wobbling arm.

A hush falls over the throne room. Igli's mouth drops open. The guards move away, weapons lowered.

Link makes a motion with the plate, determined not to spill the crab legs, and holds it still higher. The King Zora reaches down towards the plate. She can sense the vibrations through the silver as he selects one of the legs from the top of the pile.

She watches him raise the crab leg to his mouth. She watches him part his jaws into a maw large enough to wolf her down whole. Or whale-shark her down whole, as she has never witnessed a zora with much resemblance to a wolf. She watches him carefully place the crab leg on his tongue, and then to chew, and then to swallow.

And then the King Zora smiles. He scoops half of the entire mountain of crab legs from the plate to stuff into his mouth. He labours in his breathing; his attendants rub his back.

The King Zora regards her, standing there with the water up her chest, arms trembling, fingers clenched around the edges of a tray too large for her, and his smile widens.

"It really is you, isn't it, O Courageous Link?" The King Zora's gaze bears down upon her. "I would know that cooking anywhere, hoo hoo!" Though the blade of evil's bane no longer weighs upon her back, Link can feel the slate at her right hip, the red telescope at her left.

In Darunia, and in Medli, and in Nabooru, she could pull up her hood and wash away the dust of her years. But here she remembers the people of Ruto, and they remember her.

Here Link can no longer run from the scars that weave her past into her body.

But then...

She realises, with a sensation like biting directly into the spicy peppers that grow on the Great Plateau, that she no longer wants to run.

For to run from her past would be to run, too, from the people she has loved and the people who have loved her.

All of the wilds combined cannot sit at a campfire and share stew from a communal cooking pot.

And all of her fears of herself combined cannot outweigh her love.
She, who has a little sister named Aryll, the most wonderful little sister she could ask her. She, who has a best friend in the girl who smelled of horses. She, whom Marin loved, and loves, and would have travelled over the world with, if not for the passage of time. She, whom Daruk invited to his home, to his family, once they had won the long war. She, who has carried on her back an ice-box full of sanke carp to bake Revali a fish pie, whom Revali admitted in caring about. She, whom Urbosa trained in the art of the blade, who witnessed Urbosa's own courage lead her to happiness. She, who met Mipha as a child though never as the daughter of the King Zora, who for her mixed drinks and changed lives. She, who drew the sword that seals the darkness.

She, whom the blade of evil's bane appointed as the Champion of Hylia, as the Hero of Hyrule, as the Knight of the girl with the golden hair, as Link.

She knows little of fate. But she knows much of her own abilities. Since awakening in the Shrine of Resurrection, she has, with her own boots, travelled the land once known as Hyrule; she has, with her own hands, calmed three Divine Beasts, and soon a fourth; she has, with her own cooking pot, taken communion with strangers and with friends; she has cooked for the pilots of the Divine Beasts; she has tasted the wilds.

If she can carry the slate, with its ten thousand years of dust, and the red telescope, with its hundred years of passing, then she can carry the title bestowed upon her for her deeds.

"The Champion of Hylia, the Hero of Hyrule, Her Majesty's own appointed Knight, O Courageous Link." The King Zora bows his head. The ripple of water that cascades from the motion could knock Link backwards, but she holds firm.

"O Courageous Link, I welcome you, not only the Champion of Hylia, the Hero of Hyrule, and Her Majesty's Knight...but as mine own daughter's friend."

Link closes her eyes.

"Welcome home."

—

Salt-grilled Crab (five hearts) - chickaloo tree nut, goat butter, ironshell crab, razorclaw crab, rock salt

Chapter End Notes

Author's notes: Link spends most of her time in Delicious in Wilds wearing outfits appropriate for travel, much as many of the women in Breath of the Wild (the sexualised and exoticised gerudo women who stroll through the desert in high heels and midriff-wearing 'outfits' aside) wear riding outfits with riding britches. Because of the demands of her rigorous life as a courier; then the chosen one; and now a traveller, she's not too used to wearing dresses or robes. The "strange sensation of being unable to find your legs in a dress rather than pants" is something that I only learned fairly recently is not an idiosyncrasy but a somewhat common symptom among various groups. As I was writing, I felt (given Link's other divergences from 'typical' neural behaviour) that it was appropriate for her to experience this as dress itself is weighed down with silver and pearls in order to keep it from obstructing the swimmer. The specific gravity of the dress is almost exactly the same as water (or as close as possible) so that it neither floats nor sinks.

The virtues of the goddesses, as I've mentioned before, that we've talked about so far have been: Sheik: truth; Goro-goro: pride; Erito: voice (as in self-expression); Sageru: kin (also translated as blood or loyalty); Zola: faith. We've yet to hear about Kokir or Hylia, though I've already heavily, heavily, heavily implied one.

Cucco dodging is in reference to the mini-game played at the Cucco Ranch in A Link Between Worlds. It's not actually Hyrule's national pastime, but used to be (and still is in, in parts) a festive part of rural communities.

Because zora live for a long time, they also have very low reproductive rates, especially in the face of the Calamity (they are K-selected rather than r-selected). Their population has heavily fallen without yet the means to rebuild, so the kitchens are mostly unused.

Link is short! She's short for a hylian (in-game, Link is literally shorter than every single adult hylian in the game, including all of the women, unless there's someone I'm forgetting) and she's doubly short for a larger species like the zora. We don't actually see many effects of her height in-game, other than her

The plural of zora is zora; "zoras" sounds strange to my ear.

The joke about being able to hear nuts in the crab legs is a nod to the "number of ice cubes in a JoyCon with HD rumble" during the reveal of the Nintendo Switch. I played Breath of the Wild on the WiiU.

So, to clarify: Link grabbed the Master Sword and was able to pull it somehow, then—being some country courier—ended up in hot water until Mipha recognised her (unfortunately introducing her as the child whom she had known years ago, rather than Link the girl). Because Mipha recognised her and vouched for her, Link was able to not be executed but instead be accepted as the chosen one.

Tredge is a combination of trudge and dredge that I didn't realise wasn't a word until just now.

Zora, like many fish and lizards, don't really age but keep growing with age until they die; old zora have droopier fins and hunched backs, but do not wrinkle like old humans do.

The melody that Link recalls Zelda playing for her is, of course, the Serenade of Water.

Dorephan is massive, and, due to spending most of his time in the water, cannot actually survive for long outside of his throne pool. When he sits up from the water, he has difficulty breathing due to the effects of gravity. For more information on this effect, look up the beaching of whales.

This is it. This is the chapter where, after forty-nine very long chapters and three hundred thousand words, we finally arrive to Link's great realisation. Welcome home, Link. Welcome home to accepting who you are, both in the past and in the present. There's just one big hurdle left for her to cover: obtaining the Master Sword.
And, of course, figuring out what to do about Calamity Ganon. I think that the final decision that Link makes regarding the future of Hyrule is one that is going to surprise my readers quite a bit. But we have a great deal many chapters to get here.

Up next: a chat with the king, and a chat with a lynel.

midna's ass. 16 October 2017.

Beta reader's comments: This chapter is such a cool part of Link's character development. We're finally at the apex of (this part of) her development, and it's really great to behold.

Link coming out to Mipha is really cute.

There's a lot of personality to very brief snapshots of Zora characters, which I find super neat.

Emma. 16 October 2017.
Hearty Salmon Risotto

Chapter Summary

The travelling chef speaks with the Lanayrish king regarding the Divine Beast and the Great Calamity; then, the chef and the Lanayrish prince set off to collect topaz arrows for the coming assault on the Divine Beast.

Chapter Notes

To all of my readers: please note that this chapter contains the most or second-most scene of graphic violence in all of Delicious in Wilds. If you wish to skip, the main fight starts at the paragraph "She listens to the twang of a bow. Link looks up overhead to see the faint yellow spark of the arrow hurtling down directly towards her, too small and too fast to even attempt to catch with stasis," and ends at the paragraph "She lets herself lie in the mud on her side. When she opens her mouth, the mud seeps into the lower curve of her right cheek, but she sucks in breaths stenched of earth and blood and rot through her raw throat that bubbles up blood." However, even after that paragraph, there are continuous mentions to the injuries as well as talk of blood until the end of the chapter. If you choose to skip it, I'll provide a brief summary at the beginning of the next chapter. Please take care.

And now, author's notes that would not fit in the end: As usual, thank you so much to all of my readers for all of the support that you've given me so far. We've thirty-four chapters away from the end now, about six-tenths of the way through the Delicious in Wilds. As I've mentioned here and there, the chapters are growing longer (the longest chapter in the story is just over twenty-four thousand words), so it's probable that I will need to take one or two days to tackle the longer chapters (thus far, I've been proofreading/fixing the longer chapters without complaint because they've been fairly sparse, but it's getting to crunch time).

Another thank you to my beta reader, Emma, for her perseverance in assisting me despite the inherent busy-ness in our lives.

In Breath of the Wild, Sidon has the "flash" effect when he grins; in Delicious in Wilds, Sidon polishes his teeth to achieve that effect, although he's not actually aware of how much of an effect it has.

Dorephan was around before Hyrule fell, so he still refers to it as Hyrule even though it no longer exists.

Zora are unable to cry, as they have no tear ducts! Sharks and related species have salt glands near their recta, which explains what Link was seeing.

Shed some silver on the situation is a Lanayrish-ism equivalent of shed some light on the situation.

Eel in the reef is the Lanayrish equivalent of letting a snake into your garden, except that Hyrule does not have the latter phrase, as it has no Abrahamic religions.
Zola is typically personified as a river, hence the comment on her banks.

Link doesn't quite have complete faith in herself yet. She's getting there. Fragile state.

There's too much talking in this chapter!

Link has achieved a growing understanding of the effects of monsters on the people and world around her. They're not just things she has to deal with; they're things that everyone would have to deal with.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The cheer that wells up from the crowd threatens to bowl Link over entirely. Abruptly, hands are all around, covering her limbs, touching her skin, tugging on her dress, stroking her hair. She squeezes shut her eyes. Link struggles to breathe as the bodies close in around her, and yet, now, not even this can sway the joy bubbling up from her stomach with the taste of crab legs and stir-fry. Not vomit, no, but rather the sensation of wholeness.

Besides, Link hears the Lanayrish around her take crab legs from the tray. She listens to them crunch down upon them. She leans in to their soft moans of pleasure, to their cries of the crab legs' deliciousness, to their delight from the food.

When the tray empties, she feels a pair of hands wrap around her waist, crinkling the dress; suddenly her boots rise from the ground. She wriggles her legs yet her feet do not reach the surface of the water. Link blinks her eyes open to see Sidon physically lifting her above the crowd. He grins at her as he looks ahead to the King Zora.

Sidon sets her down at the edge of the King Zora's pool. Link bows to the King Zora, who barely bows back with his neck, evidently unable to much move the swell of his body.

"We must call an assembly to introduce you as the Champion of Hylia, the Hero of Hyrule—" Link nods her head to the rhythm of the full title she has heard so many times. "—Her Majesty's Knight, O Courageous Link. Many of my people have known merely the hero of propaganda, but have not known you as yourself." She continues to bob her head, and then the words wash over her, and she starts to swing her head from side to side. "No? You would rather not?"

She bows to the King Zora again. "I...I don't want that many people looking at me at once."

"At least you're honest, my lass, hoo hoo!" The King Zora lifts a hand. Link hears the masses behind her walk backwards in unison. "Clear the throne pool."

The Lanayrish shuffle out, along with most of the guards. The waves from the crowds' movement thump Link into the water. Sidon picks her up and holds her like a stuffed animal, his hands around her armpits. Link's legs dangle helplessly; her boots splash the water when she kicks.

At length the masses disperse to leave only herself, the King Zora, Sidon, a lithe purple zora who stands next to Sidon, and the green zora with the drooping fins in the quiet throne room. She corrects herself: that is, the throne pool.

Sidon sets Link back down. The heavy dress submerges once more into the water. He claps her on the back and leaves his hand there, drumming his fingers against her spine enough to vibrate her body.
The King Zora beams at her. He lifts his arms. "Link, it is most wonderful to see you again...though I see that you no longer carry the blade of legend: the sword that seals the darkness. You have surely picked our Champion well, my lad!"

Sidon flashes his father a thumbs up. His polished teeth sparkle and shine. "She picked herself." Link feels her smile curve up. "Our Goddess does not err! I believed that we would find someone." He pumps his fist into the air. "And I have never seen someone take on the gauntlet in such a record time as our Link!"

Our Link. Link inclines her head. The pressure of that our could have crushed her spine beneath its weight several months ago, but not now. Not now. Now she stands erect, her spine straight, her hands at the dip in her hips to feel the slate at her right and the telescope at her left, the twin aeges that carry her forward step by step, right and left, left and right.

"Tell me, my lass." The King Zora flourishes his wrist. "What has happened since the Great Calamity? We heard that you and the Princess both perished...and the Champions as well." He starts to shift in the water though his breathing hoarsens and she can see his gills flapping in the water to keep up.

She can hear the concern in Sidon's voice. "Father, you needn't push yourself too—"

"Is there a chance...is there a chance that my daughter could live yet?" The King Zora forces himself up in the water. The waves wash Link against Sidon but he holds her carefully against the current that threatens to overpower her. "If you could live...then she..." Link feels the blankness return to her gaze, and the King Zora slumps back. The wave splashes into her mouth. She can feel herself drowning down. From the water and perhaps from something else. "I see."

"I'm sorry," Link signs. She hears the purple zora who stands next to Sidon whispering into his ear the same words that Link says. "I don't know exactly what happened. I...lost my memory of everything. " The King Zora's eyes widen. His third eyelids flicker in and out of his eyes. She explains: how she awoke a few months ago in the Shrine of Resurrection, how she picked up the slate without understanding its significance, how she walked the land once known as Hyrule—the King Zora remarks that in Lanayru they still call it Hyrule, for most everyone knows it as Hyrule—how she calmed the Divine Beasts seemingly by chance at first and then more deliberately, how she has gradually regained some of her memories, but not many, and not of the events. "I haven't seen..." She pauses. "The only person I know who was alive then—the only two people—are Lady Impa of Kakariko and her sister Purah of Hateno. But neither of them has told me much of what happened. Lady Impa has refused all of my questions, and...I never asked Purah. I didn't know anything while I was with her. They might be able to answer your questions, though."

"I see," the King Zora repeats. He does not speak for a moment, and when he does she flinches back. "Since the Great Calamity...we have kept to ourselves. Regretfully. We have received few visitors, as we have no villages on the border." Link nods, although most of his words go over her head. She glances at the empty tray of crab legs, of which she only had one, and her stomach rumbles. "Many of the other people in Hyrule may live their lives short and bear as many offspring as they can, not unlike fish that migrate each spring to spawn—" Link blinks at that, but he goes on. "—yet we do not." He beams. "We live long, hoo hoo, yes we do. The Goddess Zola has blessed up with lives as long as the rivers run. Yet..." His features contort. "Since the Great Calamity, most of us have moved inwards to the city of Ruto, to consolidate those that have survived. I have heard that the other people of Hyrule have proliferated well in the absence of the Calamitous One since then, and I pray to their patrons the Seven that the monsters which have reappeared in Lanayru have not spread elsewhere."
Link considers the burnt town in Eldin, the empty lakeside in Tabantha, the evacuated villages in Parapa.

"But few children have been born to us in the interim. Certainly some fear that we may never recover, but I have faith in the most wonderful Goddess Zola."

Sidon snatches a fistful of air. "We won't just recover! We'll surpass! All the way to the stars! I believe in us! With faith and our Goddess at our sides, there's nothing we can't do!"

"I'm afraid we have a wide sea to cross yet, my lad." The King Zora begins to emulate stroking his chin once more. "Regardless, my lass, you have seen for yourself that few in Lanayru live outside of Ruto now. Over the past seventeen moons, the last of the villagers have abandoned their homes to journey here for protection. The awakening of Vah Ruta may wash away the last of our history...if She has not washed them away already. Mm." The King Zora slopes further back into the water, and again Sidon lifts Link up to keep the waves from knocking her prone.

"I can help." Link fishes the slate from its pouch at her right hip. "This slate can activate shrines and the terminals in the Divine Beast. And not just I can use it, too, so if there are any terminals underwater..." She glances at Sidon, who continues to grin as though nothing has gone amiss.

The King Zora's smile returns, if only for a moment. "Most wonderful. We have a shrine in the very Temple of Zola that I would have you activate by the slate. And afterwards..." The King Zora cannot touch his hand to his face for its weight outside of the water; rather, he moves his arm as long as he can and mimics the stroking of his chin as though by a habit from an age long past. "What know you of Vah Ruta, my lass?"

Link rubs the back of her head. "It's a Divine Beast, and it...exists. Yes."

The King Zora erupts into laughter, bellyfuls of mirth that rock the water. Sidon picks up Link to avoid the inevitable drowning of the bearer of the slate.

"Then let me shed some silver upon the situation." He hrms; his timbre grows solemn once more. "Several months ago, Vah Ruta awakened following a twelve hundred moons of dormancy. I had never thought to see Her moving again."

"...when She awakened, She remained in the East Reservoir where She was left after those days of woe. We feared that She would attack directly as She had during the Great Calamity. The Goddess spared us that, hoo hoo. Rather, Vah Ruta lifted Her trunk and began to spray water." He clears his throat. "I see the seeming ridiculousness in the idea of too much water spelling trouble for us who can breathe within."

Link cocks her head to the side; she has had no such thought, nor any thoughts at at all, save for when she can eat next and why she neglected to stuff herself with crab legs while she had the chance. Not that she has no compassion for the zora. She has borne the slate, and she will calm the Divine Beast.

That does not stop the hunger creeping into her belly.

"The current now moves too swiftly. Already we have had to drain more of our city than the reservoirs can hold...and, may their spirits swim swift to the seas of the Goddess, we have had some of our own washed away in the tide."

The King Zora's third membrane covers his eyes.
Link looks down upon her reflection in the water. If only she had moved more quickly. If she hadn't spent the time she did in Romani Ranch.

"At first She let off rain infrequently throughout the day, and we had no fear. Of late She has poured the rain continuously and with a faster pace each time. Three moons ago—" Link counts on her fingers: around the time when she scaled Vah Naboris. "—the rain has become such a torrent that the East Reservoir is draining much more swiftly than we can divert water back to it. In due time even Ruto shall sweep away under the deluge.

"Yet the Goddess have sent to us the Champion of Hylia that She promised." The King Zora bows his head towards Link again, his breathing belaboured once more. "I shall put my faith in Her, and in you, my lass."

Link lifts her chin. Her stomach gurgles again but she pushes down her hunger momentarily to seek answers. "I'm sorry to ask this, but...could you tell me what happened in the Calamity, exactly?" She elaborates on what she has already gleaned, and the King Zora inclines his head.

"There is not much more that I could tell you. The Divine Beasts, as far as I understood, never moved, no matter how the King of Hyrule's researchers sought to understand them. The Champions, the Princess, and yourself were on an expedition to Mount Nayru at the time when the first signs of the Great Calamity—the violet malice that began to seep up from the ground itself, it seemed—awoke, and the Divine Beasts with it. We took this as a sign that the Goddesses were on our side, and the Champions made to their Divine Beast to prepare. But...no sooner had my daughter entered Vah Ruta with her slate in hand did the Divine Beast turn against her. We could only watch in horror as Vah Ruta sealed Herself away, dripping in Malice, and tore through Lanayru with nothing but death in Her wake."

The King Zora's voice falls silent.

He does not weep. She wonders if perhaps the zora cannot weep.

"But you have the destiny to turn back the tides, O Champion of Hyrule, O Hero of Hylia, O Knight of Her Majesty, O Courageous Link." The King Zora coughs. "Forgive me for saying the title wrong. Ahem." Link rubs the back of her neck. "The Champion of Hylia, the—"

"By the Goddess Zola, I cannot allow this farce to go on."

Link notices him signing from the corner of her vision. She and the King Zora turn their heads towards him at the same moment: the elderly green zora, his fins drooping limply from the sides of his head.

"Whatever do you mean, Muzu?" the King Zora inquires, his head fins twitching but evidently unable to rise.

Muzu slaps his hand onto his own chest. The fins quiver. He swims forward through the water. "Does Your Majesty not see that you have allowed the eel to slither into Your Majesty's reef? It is this Champion of Hylia that took our Princess Mipha from us!"

"...our Link did no such thing, Muzu." The King Zora's eyes narrow.

"Your Majesty, have you forgotten that it is this Champion of Hylia who by the Princess Zora Mipha's own admission swayed her in becoming a Champion and leaving us without a future queen!"

His eyes narrow further into thin slits, the diamond-shaped pupils barely visible. "I myself chose her as the most worthy representative of Lanayru. Dare you criticise my judgment, Muzu? This was no fault of Link's."

Muzu clenches his hands into fists. "Princess Mipha herself told me that she never protested becoming Champion, for her supposed 'love'—including of this Champion of Hylia—that led her to sacrifice herself."

The King Zora coughs. "You would blame Link for my daughter wishing to protect people? You would blame my daughter for trusting in my judgment that she would best represent the Goddess?"

Muzu pulls on his facial fins. He wrings his hands. "Then consider this, Your Majesty. The supposed Champion of Hylia mysteriously vanished with the Princess of Hyrule the moment the Calamitous One struck. The Champions...including Your Majesty's own daughter, might I add...perished in the Divine Beasts. A century passes. Then, as the Divine Beasts awaken once more and monsters begin to intrude upon our land, the Champion of Hylia returns to 'calm' them, but now with the Champions and the Princess of Hyrule out of the way. Does not this seem awfully convenient?"

The King Zora makes a noise of disbelief in the back of his throat. "...by Zola's banks, what are you suggesting, Muzu?"

"I know not the truth, Your Majesty," Muzu signs, "but something smells beastly here. Much too convenient for my liking."

Link draws herself inwards. "Enough! Not convenient, Muzu." The King Zora lifts a hand. "It makes perfect sense that the Goddess would send the Champion of Hylia at the reawakening of the world's woes. The Calamitous One vanished twelve hundred moons ago. Perhaps the Goddess thought best for the Champion of Hylia to vanish as well, until the world needed her most. And now the world has need of her. If the Calamitous One returns, she will face it with courage, wisdom, power, and—you notwithstanding, perhaps—faith."

"If Muzu doesn't believe in her," Sidon adds in, digging his fingers into Link's back with his thumb beneath her left shoulder blade, "then I shall believe in her twice over to make up for it!"

"Thank you, my lad. Now, Muzu, would you tell our Link what you know of Vah Ruta?" The King Zora sits back. "She will need preparation to quell the storm."

"Your Majesty may believe in this false saviour, but I do not." Muzu turns away. Link observes a strange pearly fluid seeping from pores at his throat and the backs of his thighs. "I will not forgive the one who stole our precious Princess Mipha from us. I will not forgive a hylian."

"Muzu—"

Muzu dives into the water. He swims from the throne pool even while the King Zora calls after him. The purple zora by Sidon's side frowns. Link moves backwards to shrink further into herself. She would not trust herself either.

Muzu quits the chamber, and the water grows far too still.

The King Zora sighs. "My apologies, my lass. Muzu was my daughter's mentor when she was younger and in training to become queen. He...was very protective of her. My lad, you were too young to remember then." Sidon nods decisively. "Forgive him, my lass."
Link dips her head.

"My lad, go with her to fetch Muzu. I am certain that he will calm down once he understands that you hold the only key to quieting Vah Ruta, whether he wishes to trust you or not." The King Zora coughs. His breath comes up full of water. "And for the matter, I swear by the Goddess Zola, may I never touch water again if I lie, that I have nothing but the Goddess's own faith in you, my lass."

Link bows to him. "Thank you," she signs.

When the purple zora finishes whispering in Sidon's ear, he pats Link between the shoulder blades and leads her out from the water. By now the water has drained further, to only halfway up her chest. Link finds it easier to swim after Sidon than to attempt to walk in the dress, the fish-fins weighed down with silver heavy enough to stay submerged rather than float on the water.

Sidon takes her to something of a central square. The Lanayrish milling about gape at Link as she swims by, but Sidon keeps her safely wedged between his torso and his right hand. He calls out to the other zora to say hello, and they call back to him or sign—the purple zora repeats their messages—and occasionally Sidon signs to them, presumably to those who cannot hear. Sidon seems to know each and every one of the residents of Ruto; he inquires about their lives and their days with a knowing intimacy that boggles Link.

From the heart of the square rises a statue that catches Link's breath and chucks it back down her throat to choke her. A statue of Mipha carved of silver, holding a trident in one hand and a medical implement in the other, gazing down kindly upon the city. In front of her, on a small platform raised out of the water by her feet, lie offerings of flowers and food left by others. Link observes rice-balls seeded with fleet-lotus and smiles faintly to herself.

The same rice-ball that Mipha held when she rescued Link from the water for the first time, back in the province of Ordona, in the village of Ordon, in the river that ran through its heart.

Muzu himself stands in front of the statue, his gaze riveted to just below the silver Mipha's face as though turned slightly away in respect. Sidon and Link approach. Muzu does not break eye contact from the statue of Mipha.

"What would you have of me?"

"Father asked you to tell the Champion of Hylia—"

Link rubs the back of her head. "Please...I would prefer to be called just Link."

The purple zora whispers in Sidon's ear, and he nods, clinging tightly to Link. "—to tell our Link what she needs to know to quell the storm of Vah Ruta and to bring our Goddess's favour upon Vah Ruta once more!"

Muzu's gills flare up and down. Then he bows his head. "Very well." He flourishes a hand at her. "Prince Sidon." The purple zora by Sidon's side speaks more rapidly. "You offered this...churl a trial."

"That I did! A trial that our Link cleared effortlessly!" Sidon grins and claps Link on the back so strongly that Link nearly tumbles forward into the water.

"Would you allow me to give her a trial of my own, to further test her worth?" Muzu coughs. "You have given her a trial of power. Allow me to present a trial of wisdom."

Link rests her hand on her chest. "I will do anything."
"Good, good." Muzu pulls on the rightmost facial fin that flops from his face. "We have observed that a strike of lightning quiets Vah Ruta for a time. To quell Vah Ruta, we need to gather a method to administer electricity to Her sources of power from a safe distance. Thus, I considered the concept of a cannon, or perhaps topaz arrows."

"Most clever of an idea!" Sidon cuts in. "As expected of the King's chief advisor, Muzu!"

"Yes, thank you, Your Highness. However..." Muzu touches the back of his hand to his forehead. "To my most deepest regret, we have no such arrows, nor sufficient charged topaz for a cannon."

Link tilts her head to the side. She heard from Glepp and Misan that merchants have come from near and far to recharge topaz in the gauntlet of lightning monsters, and yet the Lanayrish royal palace itself has not sufficient topaz to even make arrows?

Muzu continues on: "There lives on Ploymus Mountain a terrible monster. The lynel, a beast of lightning eyes and thunder hooves. One of the most intelligent spawns of malice, the lynel crafts his own blades and fletches his own arrows. If you are careful and quick, you can surreptitiously filch enough arrows to quiet Vah Ruta for a safe approach. By my calculations you will need two hundred. You will need two hundred. It is the only way that you may near Vah Ruta without fear, lest you intend to swim to the East Reservoir yourself."

She touches her chin. "Has anyone else tried to get the arrows?"

"Yes. We are far too..." He curls his lip. "...fragile to electricity to make the trip. His Majesty the King Zora and His Highness the Prince Zorabe believe deeply in the prophecy: the Goddess Herself shall send to us a Champion of Hylia to deliver us from Vah Ruta. Then, O Champion of Hylia, won't you be the one to bring us the topaz arrows that we need so desperately?"

Link nods. She salutes Muzu. "I will."

"But of course! As expected of our Champion of Hylia! I believe in your most impressive abilities, Link!" Sidon fists the air. "And I will accompany you, Link, to show you the way to Shatterback Point!"

Muzu jumps. "Ah, Your Highness, there is no need for you to trouble yourself so."

Sidon slaps Link heartily on the back, which launches Link into Muzu. Muzu shoves Link away from him, and she stumbles backwards back into Sidon's waiting palm. "Then I shall inform Father! Worry not, Link! Father will send someone with you!"

Muzu clears his throat. "On second thought, it would be best if Your Highness went with the...Champion of Hylia. Most certainly, do not gather the arrows for the Champion, and please stay far from the lynel for fear of your life, Your Highness."

"But of course!" Sidon squeezes Link on the shoulder. "Come, Link! Let us take to the mountaintop, where your trial awaits! I have utmost faith that you will ace this trial with flying melodies! Ah!" Sidon turns towards the purple zora to embrace her. "Thank you kindly for your assistance, Lari! You have my eternal gratitude!"

"Anything for Your Highness." Lari bows and takes Sidon's wrists in her hands. "This is a dismissal, I take it."

"Indeed! Link, you and I will travel up to Ploymus ourselves!" He turns so speedily towards Link that she wobbles to stay upright in the waves. "Link, if you've need of me, a tap on the wrist will catch my attention!"

"Your Highness..." Lari compresses Sidon's wrists together. "Is this wise? She who cannot speak, and he who cannot see..."

"Ah! I suppose that you're right!" Sidon grins at her. "We need someone who cannot hear to complete the trifecta, and then no evil shall we done by us!"

Lari frowns. "Your Highness, that is not what I..."

"Now come, O Champion of Hylia!" Sidon shakes his wrists from her grasp; he thumps his fist against his chest. Lari lowers her hands to her hips. "Link, please follow me."

Link thanks Muzu and Lari before falling into step beside Sidon, who takes her hand in his much larger one.

Muzu's gaze follows her as they leave. She glances back for a second, towards the statue, just to see Mipha's face once more.

A strange emptiness hollows her belly: she has ever so slightly misremembered Mipha's features.

Link removes the fish-fin dress. She tucks it over her arm to place into her saddlebags. At some point in the future, maybe when the world has settled down again, she might learn to wear dresses without trousers underneath. She asks for Sidon to show her to wherever they keep Ilia to adequately prepare herself; Sidon complies. When Link spots the deep black horse with the white mane that she has knocked all this time, she runs towards Ilia to fling her arms around her companion's neck and hug her tightly. She turns around towards the nearest stablehand and launches into a long explanation of what exactly to feed Ilia, what sorts of foods she prefers, how to stuff pumpkins for her if possible, when to exercise her and how to walk her, how long to let her sleep, how much sugar and salt intake Ilia can receive, where to best scratch her behind the ears, how to make the honeyed biscuits that Link sometimes gives her as treats. Sidon has to lead her away from the harried stablehand, who has taken out a stone notebook to scribble down everything that Link has told her.

Sarie, on the other hand, appears to have poofed into thin air, or perhaps they have shied away from the number of people about. Link notes to herself to find Sarie at a later point, if Sarie has not elected to strike out on their own. For now she need worry of this lynel.

Retrieving her satchel, Link places it over her shoulder, then withdraws the fire-light spear and the sword given to her by Riju. And the topaz rod that she slots in her belt, just in case that proves handy. She pats herself down to ensure she has everything she needs. For a moment she panics, but then: there's her metal ingredient box, still safe in her satchel.

Link gives Ilia a final pet on the head, thanks the stablehand, promises to later cook her a meal of gratitude, stretches down to touch her toes, and asks Sidon to lead the way.

Sidon instructs Link to climb onto his back, to take hold of his shoulders, to not let go. He crouches down in the water and positions his hands behind him to give Link a leg up. By Link's request, Sidon covers the rough scales of his back with a layer of leather he affixes to himself by a series of belts. Under his commands, Link wraps her arms around his neck and attempts to hug his back with her legs, although he proves too broad for her to quite hook all the way around. Snapping her fingers, she removes the length of cord from the kitchens and lashes herself to Sidon's back.

"But of course! How clever you are, Link! I can see why my sister admired you so! Now, please,
"Take a deep breath!"

With that Sidon leaps off of the edge of Ruto. Link screams all the way down until the plunge into the water corks her into a chilly silence. She swallows water; it ices down her throat and she winces, clawing her fingers into the softer flesh of Sidon's throat.

Sidon pops out of the lake beneath Ruto. The second her mouth touches air Link coughs water from her lungs in her desperate bid to inhale fresh air.

"Are you well, Link? One tap for no, two for yes yes yes!" Link waits to catch her breath, then taps twice. "Most wonderful! Up the waterfall we go!" Sidon turns towards her to show off his grin. From this close to his face, Link can see how his golden eyes have clouded over in a foggy silver, and a shard of topaz goes off over her head. "Please keep your limbs on me at all times and don't stretch them out too much! I'd rather you break a limb in the figurative sense than the literal! And let me know if anything's amiss! Just...do whatever it is that you just did with your hands!"

Link nods against the back of Sidon's head. The curve of her cheek catches the patch of rough skin above the leather; she feels the warmth of blood welling up on her face.

"Take a deep breath!"

Sidon points up towards the waterfall overhead, and Link senses the wound on her cheek pucker up as the blood drains from her face and the rain overhead mats down her hair.

Either this will kill her or she will get to see a truly incredible view. And if she gets to see a truly incredible view, then she will have to make herself a meal fit for the occasion. And if that happens—the meal makes itself worthwhile.

She holds fast to the consideration of what meals to make, holds fast to the fish she could fry or the crab she could roast, to the tree nuts she could salt or the mushrooms she could grill, to the butter she could butter or the salt she could salt, to the infinite possibilities available to her, all atop some bed of rice so that she can scarf down the very ingredient that makes her believe in the Golden Goddesses, for only a sacred divinity could have made something as wonderful as rice.

Sidon leaps into the waterfall.

By some force, she could not explain—or perhaps by his determination and his faith alone—Sidon begins to propel himself up the waterfall, accelerating himself against the current, skimming himself out of the water nearly vertically to slam into the cascade once more before launching himself out again. Slowly he edges his way up the waterfall with his hylian-shaped cargo in tow.

Still gripping him firmly with her arms and her legs alike, Link twists her neck to look down below them. Both the rain and the waterfall slick down her back. Her undershirt sticks to her skin. The spray chills over her eyes, and she closes them against the rising splash of water.

Sidon launches himself from the crest of the waterfall into the air; by instinct, Link lets go of his throat to open the paraglider with its rubberised underside and inlaid topaz top. Her paraglider, changed and exchanged by her travels, just as she has been.

She hears Sidon yelp as the paraglider catches him from his dive. "Link? Link, what is that!?"

Swallowing hard, she closes the paraglider again. Sidon pitches forward into a dive. He rolls through the air to cleave into the water of the lake.

Link wraps her arms around his neck again.
They swim up the next waterfall, and then the next, and then still further up the next, until Link has lost track; she hangs on by the dish that she has decided to cook. Salmon risotto. Or trout risotto. Some sort of fish risotto for sure over rice. With roasted mushrooms. And a small bowl of salt-salmon soup with crackers.

Salmon risotto. Salmon risotto. Salmon risotto. Even when the water fills her throat and she chokes on it—even when the chill seeps through her clothing to submerge the underside of her skin with ice—even when the rough scales on the back of Sidon's neck scrape her forehead and nose—she murmurs the words to herself over and over.

Salmon risotto.

Salmon risotto.

Salmon ris—ing up out of the water to land on the shore.

"We're here!" Sidon announces with hands at his hips. He unties the cord around their waists. Link slips off of him into the mud, which sticks coolly to her trousers. Whipping around towards Link, he extends a hand to her, though he does not quite face her, and his hand does not quite point towards her. "Since we're out of the water, Link, it's a little hard for me to tell where you are! So, will you hold my hand until we arrive at the lynel!" He offers his palm.

