Isha was going to need a new kennel. The one in your room was big enough, but the one in Jack's quarters was not. You contemplated penning her in the bathroom, but you weren't sure how Jack would feel about that. So far, she'd been behaving, using the litter box, not destroying his property, and cuddling her stuffed dog.

She had not even tried to steal the pizzas that you'd gotten for dinner. Instead she sat on the floor, watching them out of the corner of her eye, waiting for permission. That was progress.

The door opened and Jack groaned, tossing his coat onto the back of the couch and kicking off his boots. Isha ran to him and he scooped her up, planting a kiss on her snout.

"Favorite death chicken!" Jack gave her a squeeze and set her down. "Favorite girlfriend," he said, and leaned over the couch to kiss you. He sighed when he saw the pizza. "You're the best."

He rolled over the back of the couch and flopped over in your lap, closing his eyes. "Gabe's going to be late."

"You OK?"

"Long day," he said. "Petras wants in on the negotiations and I can't actually block him, but...well, it's going to be exhausting."

You nodded sympathetically.

He opened his eyes. "Missed you. And glad to see you're here." He then reached up and tugged on a lock of your hair. "Oh, hey, I meant to talk to you about something earlier."

"Oh?" You asked, trying to remember this morning. No one had wanted to get up, but Jack and Gabriel had dragged themselves away to their jobs, and you'd had to put on another hoodie after they left because the bed was too cold.

"Something's been bothering me." Jack sat up, his smile lopsided and losing its humor. "This isn't anyone's fault. At all. So don't worry. I just wanted to mention it because...good communication."
"OK...?" You said, suddenly very anxious.

"I know you and Gabe work together. I know it made sense to put you two together for Black Abacus. I'm not mad or resentful," he said carefully, staring at the table, hands folded under his chin. "But...I missed you both. And you guys had some fun together, sharing a hotel room, eating out, picking on that poor redheaded FBI agent. And, well, maybe I kind of, sort of, feel a little left out." The words ran together, and it took you a moment to untangle them in your head.

"Oh," you said, blinking. "I'm sorry. We didn't mean to-"

Jack sighed, shaking his head. "No, that didn't come out right. I...didn't word that how I wanted. I'm not mad. I don't want you to be sorry. Don't feel bad, please. I just want to spend some more time with you now that we have the chance."

"Do you need more one-on-one time with Gabriel or-?" You stared at the pizza boxes, trying to wrap your mind around this. You'd always felt a little bit like the outsider in the group. Not that Jack and Gabriel neglected you at all. It was the awareness that you were the radical addition to an established relationship. That Jack had felt excluded was an alarming realization.

"I want both of you," Jack said. "If only one of you is free, I get it. But you know, just...we're all due some post-combat leave. I have a few important meetings tomorrow morning, but barring any major crises, I'll be done before noon. Just...would like to come back here and stay in, with you and Gabe, when he gets a chance."

"Sure," you said quickly. "Whatever you want."

Jack smiled at you. "Need some time with you both." He leaned over and kissed your cheek. "Sorry, I didn't mean to scare you."

"What would you like to eat?"

"You," he grinned, nibbling on your shoulder.

You laughed and smacked his wandering hands. "What kind of food did you want to eat?"

"Doesn't matter," he said. "Stock up on whatever you want. As long as I have you and Gabe, I'm happy." The boyish openness on Jack's face made him look ten years younger and your chest clenched.

"Do you want us to fuss over you a lot? Spoil you rotten?" You brushed his hair out of his face, leaning forward to kiss him. "Blowjobs, backrubs, and buttsex?"

"I'd like all of that," he said, chuckling. "But you don't owe me that. I just...just want the time together is all." He held you against his chest, squeezing you tightly. "Just...need you." The tips of his ears were red as he finished his confession.

You kissed his chin. "All right. It's a date."

You stocked up on sandwich ingredients, snack food, and cake. Then you swung by your room for clothes and supplies for Isha. Amélie had volunteered to watch her after you'd explained the situation. In fact, she seemed downright enthusiastic, telling you that red sweaters were fine for winter, but your murderbird needed seasonally-appropriate wear, and just to let her handle it.
You'd been slightly worried, but Amélie had met you at the door with a cheese plate and after that, Isha was literally eating out of her hand. You decided then that if Isha happened to damage Lacroix's stuff, you didn't really care.

There were several messages from Feng, Michael, Maggie, Bayan, Jeong, Lowell, and Agent Brant. Your favorite FBI agent had messaged you to remind you to return the ID badge. You laughed and just sent a smiley face as a response. They would deactivate it, of course, but it was your trophy. Or you could get Athena to do it, so Brant didn't get in trouble.

Dressed in an oversized Overwatch hoodie that might belong to Jack, you snuck back to his room to set up, then shower, and change clothes.

You made several tea sandwiches, cut small with the crusts removed. You had beer in the fridge. You weren't sure if any of this was really "romantic," but you knew Jack would appreciate the convenience over anything too elaborate. You set half a dozen votive candles in his room, and closed the blinds, though it didn't look as nice as you'd imagined. Maybe you should have gotten flower petals too? But that seemed more like a mess than a romantic gesture. Your other supplies sat in a basket on the nightstand.

After your shower, you eyed your outfit choices. Gabriel would have appreciated something well-coordinated and sophisticated, with accessories all chosen by Amélie. You could get away with just wearing one of Jack's t-shirts and nothing else. But you were really trying, so you slipped into one of the racy negliges Amélie had persuaded you to buy. It was formfitting black satin, with sheer panels along the side and lace trim. There was nothing modest about it, the hem barely covering your ass. You took off your gloves, because they wouldn't work with what you had planned.

You were putting on red lipstick when you heard the door open. Peeking your head out of the bathroom, you saw Jack already shrugging off his coat.

"Welcome home," you called. "I'll be out in a minute." You fussed with your hair, checked your makeup, and emerged, wondering if the lingerie was too much.

Jack looked up from the couch, his whole face lighting up when he saw you. His smile went from tired to wicked and he was on his feet immediately, not giving you time to reach him. Laughing, he scooped you up, hands skimming your hips as he leaned in for a hungry kiss.

When he released you, his cheeks were flushed, pupils wide, some of your lipstick smeared on his mouth. He was still wearing his black fatigues and you nibbled on his neck, not missing how his breath caught and his fingers dug into your skin.

"Missed you, beautiful," he said, pressing his forehead against yours. "Spent the whole morning thinking about you and Gabe-"

"What a coincidence. I was thinking about the two of you as well," you said, arms around his neck as he spun around to carry you to the bedroom.

"Let me show you what I was thinking about-"

"Nope," you said, wiggling out of his grasp, your bare feet hitting the floor. You ducked under his reaching arms, neatly slipping away from his attempt at recapture. "You need to eat first. And then I'll massage your back, because I know the last week has been incredibly stressful. You're so tense, and all that stiffness is what causes your headaches."
Jack groaned. "Sweetheart, come on--"

"I spent the morning trying to make things nice for you, and if you take me to bed right now, I won't have the energy to take care of you afterward. I made plans and bought supplies. So you're just going to have to wait," you told him firmly.

Jack's eyes flashed and gave you a slightly feral smile. "I don't need any of that stuff--"

"So all my work was in vain?" You asked archly. "Because I was trying to do something special for you."

Jack froze, his well-honed super soldier instincts sensing the danger ahead. "I guess I did get a little carried away," he said, sighing sheepishly. "Can't think straight when you're wearing that."

"You really need to work on your patience, sir."

Jack frowned at the teasing, expression too severe to be called "pouting." But that's precisely what it was.

"You need to eat," you scolded. "Come on, let me take care of you. Food first, sex later."

Jack narrowed his eyes and flopped over on the couch, his pants not hiding his arousal at all. "Yes, boss," he said sullenly, crossing his arms.

You placed a plate of sandwiches in front of him, with cold beer, chips, and cookies. "I know it's nothing fancy," you said, though you also knew that was how Jack preferred it.

"You cut the crusts off the sandwiches," he said. "That is fancy."

"I tried," you said politely, because Jack's idea of "fancy" worried you.

"It looks very pretty. Like you. But I guess I'll have to content myself with eating sandwiches first. Dessert later." He gave you a wry smile and shook his head. You sat beside him, grabbed a cucumber, mint, and cheese sandwich and offered it up. Jack took it delicately in his mouth and reached for his beer.

"Need me to feed you, baby?" You asked, laughing as his teeth grazed your fingers.

"Tease," he sighed. "Are they all vegetarian?" He asked, wrinkling his nose as he found a watercress, chèvre, and egg sandwich. He still ate it in one bite.

"Of course not," you said, rolling your eyes. "But you need to eat your vegetables. I know what you ate in during Black Abacus and it wasn't healthy at all."

Shaking his head, he selected a small ham and Swiss cheese, garnished with dill pickles. "You weren't kidding about the fussing." he said, but didn't sound displeased. He just rested his head on your shoulder. "Thank you. I appreciate you looking out for me. Don't mean to seem ungrateful. Just can't think about much else with you in that getup." He kissed your cheek.

"Next time I won't get dressed up then," you said.

Jack shook his head rapidly. "Message received. I will behave," he said, quickly grabbing a random sandwich and stuffing the entire thing in his mouth. He winced, turning a little red. After a few coughs and another sandwich, he was able to speak. "Horseradish?"
"With roast beef and cheddar. Was that...too spicy for you?"

"Wasn't expecting it," he laughed, shaking his head. "It's good though."

You picked at the sandwiches, not as hungry because you'd already eaten while making them. Jack went through the first plate in record time, making sure to stop every few bites to compliment your efforts. It wasn't necessary, but your chest warmed each time he smiled at you, said "thanks," and went back to eating.

When he was done, he blotted his face with the napkin and tried to coax you onto his lap. Laughing, you smacked his hands away and instead pulled him to his feet, and led him to the bedroom.

He raised a brow as you lit the candles, and you wondered if you should have left them burning despite the hazard or if you should have snuck in ahead of him? That would have been smart, but timing was complicated. You should have planned it better.

"Hey, why are you frowning?"

"Logistics," you muttered.

"Well, you look sexy in the candlelight. You look sexy in any light." Jack wrapped his arms around you from behind. "Bed?"

"Yup. Lie on your stomach," you said, disentangling yourself and tugging on his shirt. He let you pull it off, along with his belt. He stripped down to his boxers. You hugged him from behind, kissing the back of his neck.

Jack gave happy groan. "Baby-"

Gabriel was absolutely right. Anticipation was good for Jack. You were enjoying watching him squirm. "I'm trying to pamper you and you're being difficult. Stop complaining and cooperate, sir." You gave him a light shove.

Laughing, Jack fell shirtless onto the bed, and gave you knowing look over his shoulder. He practically glowed against the soft gray bedding, his skin golden in the candlelight. "All right, sweetheart. I'll play along, for now. But I want you to know that I'm going to get you for this."

"Ingrate," you said, rolling your eyes. You opened a bottle of lightly-scented massage oil. It warmed your skin on contact, and you coated your hands. Jack watched you intently from the bed, resting his chin on his forearms.

You straddled his low back, focusing your attention on his taut shoulders and neck. There were so many well-defined muscles in his back, and you intended to work on each group. Jack groaned underneath you.

"Sweetheart, that's..." he sighed. "OK, that's not bad at all."

"Of course not," you said, putting more power into it. "You love back rubs."

"I do," he murmured. "Love you too."

You kissed the back of his neck. "Yeah, I know."

Jack snorted.
"I love you, but you're getting your massage first," you told him, digging your knuckles into his shoulders.

"That's some tough love." He chuckled. "Wouldn't...have it any other way." He grunted at your forcefulness.

You worked your way down his back, returning to some of the stiffer areas to loosen him up. After about thirty minutes, Jack lay boneless on the bed. You wouldn't say he was like putty, because all those relaxed muscles were still rock solid. But he'd gone from bantering with you to mumbling incoherently into his pillow.

You kept going lower, kneading his thighs and calves. You squeezed his firm ass a few times, and that got you some petulant looks, but you just stared back innocently, and continued working on his legs.

"Do you want a foot rub too?"

"Baby, you're killing me," Jack sighed. "And I'm too damn comfortable to do anything about it." He huffed in frustration, but it was a soft sleepy sound.

"Roll over. I'm almost done," you told him, slapping his ass, the sound of the smack making him jump.

Jack growled at you, but complied. He watched you with sharp eyes, no longer quite so relaxed.

Feigning ignorance, you continued massaging his thighs, your hand brushing against his erection, but not paying it any special attention. Jack bit his lip, brows furrowing.

You placed a kiss on his ridged stomach, just over his belly button, and he shuddered beneath you. You ignored it, straddling his knees, fingers working on his hips and quads.

Jack's breathing grew heavy, and he gazed up at you with glassy eyes and flushed cheeks. His hair was mussed and you bent over to kiss him, one palm pressed against his chest for balance.

Jack moaned into your mouth, hands gripping your forearms. "Sweetheart, are you going to keep teasing me or-?"

"You're so greedy, soldier," you murmured, sucking on the side of his neck. "You need to lie back and let me take care of you. That's an order."

Jack released your arms, instead grabbing fistfuls of the sheets as he stiffened beneath you. "Whatever you want, boss. I'm your man." He stared up at you, a dazed, almost dreamy smile on his handsome face.

You kissed a trail down his chest, leaving lipstick marks on his fair skin. You tweaked his nipples and he shivered, breathing growing more ragged. Back down his abdomen, to his hips, and you had to pause. You tugged on the waistband of his boxers and Jack raised up, letting you strip the underwear off quickly and toss it aside. You poured more oil on your hands, and kissed Jack's hips, ignoring his cock bobbing there, precum already glistening on the tip.

You moved down to his inner thighs, nibbling on the sensitive flesh. Jack squirmed beneath you, panting.

"Please sweetheart," he rumbled. "I've been good for you."
"Obedient," you agreed. "But not good." You gripped his cock in your left hand, and ran your tongue over the tip.

Jack’s eyes rolled back and his hips shook, but he tried to hold still for you. A pink flush crept across his cheeks and chest. You knelt between his legs, tongue swirling against his shaft, your metal fingers brushing against his puckered hole.

Jack snarled your name, nearly arching off the bed, but you kept your motions light and teasing, and he settled back down, breathing hard.

"Don't worry, baby," you told him between licks, your oiled fingers already pushing into his warmth. "I'll take good care of you till Gabriel gets home."

Jack moaned softly, one hand over his face. "Goddamn tease-"

"So eager, soldier," you said, taking his cock down your throat. Jack shuddered as you bobbed your head, moving your fingers at the same speed, swirling them inside him, slowly stretching him open. You moved faster, getting him nice and slippery. His ass sucked your fingers in, and he jerked underneath you. Jack rocked his hips, trying to hold steady, your lips around the base of his shaft.

There was a gentle tug on your hair, and you looked up, letting Jack fall out of your mouth.

Eyes half-open, lips parted, Jack shook his head at you. "Wait. Let me be inside you, please," he panted. "It's been too long-"

"All right," you said, kissing his weeping cockhead. "After I'm done here." You scissored your fingers, inside him, and Jack dropped flat against the bed, eyes squeezed shut.

"If you do that thing, I won't last."

"I won't," you said pleasantly.

Jack groaned loudly, and you couldn't tell if that was disappointment, relief, or a combination of the two. You contented yourself with teasing licks along his shaft and balls, while you stretched his ass. Jack's thighs shook, bumping your shoulders. You bit him in retaliation, and he gave a breathless cry.

"Behave yourself," you said, kissing the spot.

"Baby, please-"

You just smiled at him, and withdrew your fingers, getting up and going to the nightstand. You wiped your hands clean with sanitizer, then got out a deep blue plug. It was new and you licked it, not missing how Jack's eyes widened. You coated it with more lubricant and then returned to your spot between Jack's legs.

He took a deep breath and relaxed, making a soft whine as you pushed the toy inside him. You knew Gabriel was a lot rougher with Jack, and that he could handle it, but you still liked going slow, watching him gradually take the entire toy.

"Such a needy soldier," you murmured, stroking his cock.

"Fuck, that's so good," Jack exhaled. "Thank you, boss."
"You're so well-mannered today," you purred, kissing his inner thigh. "But I guess that's easy when you're getting exactly what you want."

Jack nodded fervently. "I can't complain." He smiled weakly at you, cheeks red. He was so damn adorable, and you couldn't wipe the stupid smile off your face.

You started to pull off your negligee, knowing exactly what was coming next.

"Wait, please," Jack said, his voice hoarse. "Please leave it on."

You pretended to look conflicted. "I don't know, Jack. You still haven't replaced the other pieces you destroyed."

Jack shuddered, drawing shaky breaths. "I'll get it done this week. Promise. Just...please." He watched you with pleading eyes, his expression hopeful.

You grabbed something off the nightstand, and then straddled Jack's hips, slowly lowering yourself onto his slick shaft. You were wet from just watching him react to you, but the initial stretch - you forgot how big he felt inside you - still made you gasp. Jack stared at your face, eyes dewy and smile bright, but he held still, letting you inch down onto him, his shaft dragging against your walls.

"I was worried, boss. You didn't let me prep you, but you're so wet for me," he licked his lips, an obscene moan escaping his throat.

"I know what I'm doing, soldier." You placed one hand on his stomach to brace yourself, till you found your seat, your knees bracketing his hips.

Jack sat up, tugging gently on the collar of the negligee, letting your breasts spill free. He leaned in, squeezing them gently, taking one nipple in his mouth at a time. You shivered, enjoying both the look on his face and the heat and pressure on your sensitive flesh.

You sighed, letting him play for a moment, before you pushed him back down.

"Come on, boss. I know you like it when I suck those pretty tits. Love how much tighter your pussy gets when I'm playing with them. Makes me want to hold you down and focus on nothing else till you're begging me to-"

You didn't have to look at the remote in your free hand. There was a power button and two arrows to adjust the setting. You'd left it on medium. You clicked the power button and braced yourself as Jack's hips snapped upward off the bed. The plug buzzed in away in his ass and you gave a sharp cry as his fingers gripped your hips.

"Goddamnit!" He stared up at you, eyes wild.

You smirked down at him, breathing shaky. "You just lie there and concentrate on not bucking me off, soldier. Let me do the work."

"You fucking minx," he growled shaking his head. "I love you so damn much."

"That's your dick talking," you said, tone playful.

Jack frowned for a moment.

"Don't look so petulant," you laughed. "Where are your manners, soldier?"
Jack relaxed then, a crooked grin creeping across his face. "Sorry, boss. Got carried away. Because I love you so damn much."

You laughed, leaning over to kiss his jawline. "That's better."

He shook beneath you, skin flushed, radiating heat as he struggled to hold still. Under normal circumstances, he would have flipped you over and pounded you into the mattress by now. But this was your game, and your rules, arranged explicitly for him. And if he messed it up, you'd be very irritated. Besides, there'd be time for other games later.

Taking a deep breath, you raised your hips and dropped back down, an undignified squeak escaping your lips as you took him to the hilt. Jack twitched underneath you, tension coiled through his body, from his bent knees to the veins in his jaw. He was struggling to hold still.

"Such a good soldier," you cooed, not missing how much he enjoyed the praise. You cupped his face. "Look at you behaving. I love you too. Next round is yours, don't worry. You just have to leave the plug in for Gabriel."

Jack kissed your palm. "Thank you, boss. You're so good to me."

You just smiled and rocked your hips faster, the angle just right. Each stroke made you ache, and you bit your lip, focusing on taking him deep. Your breathing was too erratic, and sweat trickled down your back, the satin fabric clinging to your body. But you rode him hard, your eyes widening as he began to rub your clit.

"Want to feel you come with me," he said roughly. "Love the view right now. Watching you bounce on my cock, that look of rigid concentration on your face. But the next part is even better: I love seeing you come apart." His fingers sped up, and you squeezed the remote, turning up the power on his plug. "Fuck!" He gave you a savage smile. "Oh baby, I'm not going to last, but neither are you-"

You dropped forward, both hands flat on his chest as you speared yourself on him, teeth clenched as you bucked your hips faster and faster.

"Oh fuck, baby-" Jack kissed your throat, his fingers speeding up to match your pace, the pressure wonderfully insistent. Your thighs shook, muscles burning as you kept a frantic pace.

Jack canted his hips, and began to thrust upward, his breaths harsh as he rose to meet you, his cockhead hitting your cervix.

"Jack," you panted, your voice strained.

He chuckled, kissing you then. "Right here, I'm with you. After this, I'll take good care of you, don't you worry. Just want to see you coming on my cock, boss. Want to feel that hot little pussy clenching around me. Because I can hear how wet you are, and it's driving me crazy-"

Jack calloused fingers manipulated your nerves with practiced ease. You threw your head back, body trembling as your orgasm hit. You stiffened and jerked forward, equilibrium lost. Jack kept thrusting, one hand still stroking your clit, the other steadying you as you struggled to stay astride him. He arched beneath you, eyes staying on your face as he shuddered, and you felt the rush of liquid heat filling you up.

Panting you let yourself collapse against his chest. Jack squirmed underneath you, taking short sharp breaths and it took you a moment to retrieve the remote and turn down the plug to a mild hum.
Jack narrowed his eyes at you, but you held onto the remote, kissing his forehead.

"You were supposed to let me take care of you," you said.

"You did," Jack said, with a contented sigh. "Your cunning plot to turn my muscles to jelly nearly worked." He kissed your knuckles, squeezing your hips. "It wouldn't have been fun if I didn't get to watch you too, baby."

"Fair," you said as you slowly pulled yourself off him, thick cum trickling down your thighs. You looked around for Jack's shirt to clean yourself up with.

"You going to turn that off?" He asked.

"I don't know," you laughed, already knowing what was coming next.

Jack moved then, flipping you onto your back. You kept a firm grip on the remote, but he didn't try to take it from you. Instead, he hovered over you, breathing hard. He cocked his head to the side, eyes dark.

"All right, sweetheart, you've had your fun, it's my turn." He gathered your wrists in one hand, pinning them over your head, but the remote stayed where it was.

You glanced at it, then him. You both knew he could take it from you if he wanted to do so.

"You can hold on to that, sweetheart," Jack murmured, eyes locked on yours. "You can even use it if you feel like it. I won't stop you." A wicked grin spread across his face. "But push me too hard, and I will break you," he purred, stroking your cheek with his free hand.

You shivered, not even questioning Jack's recovery time. No, you were used to the super soldier stamina now. It still impressed you, but you knew what to expect. "Understood, sir."

Jack chuckled, and stroked between your thighs, scooping up the mess of cum on his fingers. He pressed them into your mouth, and you licked them, holding his gaze the entire time. You smiled, finishing up by sucking each digit clean. Jack groaned, his cock pressing hard against your stomach. "You're so well-behaved today, agent. Have to say I was expecting more attitude."

You bit your lip, searching Jack's face for a cue.

He just smiled, tilting your chin up and kissing you gently. "I'm not complaining." He nuzzled your throat; his love bites and hard kisses would leave marks later, but you squirmed beneath him, his knee holding your thighs apart, your wrists firmly pinned to the pillow. He moved back up, his mouth tracing your jawline, nibbling on your ear, and then dropping back down to the base of your neck.

"You make such cute noises," he said softly. "And I'm not even touching that needy little pussy yet."

"Please, sir," you said, not sure what you were asking for, just that he'd hurry up and stop teasing you.

"You're asking so nicely. Feeling eager?" He looked far too pleased. He sat back on his heels, giving his cock a few quick tugs. Then he lifted your left leg over his shoulder and pushed back inside.
Your vision went white and you keened as he split you, his cock going deeper than before.

"Surprised that you're being so good," Jack said, voice a little hoarse. "But then, I think you already know that you're in trouble for what you pulled in DC."

Your eyes flew open and you gave him a sharp look.

"You apologized, and I know you even meant it. But you still scared me silly," he murmured, forehead pressed to yours.

You knew Jack needed some control back after operations went awry. Or more specifically, whenever he thought he hadn't done a good enough job protecting you. But you weren't sure you quite liked the set of his jaw or the hunger that gleamed in his eyes.

"You know, I might be misunderstanding things, sir." You smiled wryly. "But generally when someone does something nice for you, you don't get to punish them."

Jack raised a brow. "I'm talking about your solo match versus the cyborgs."

"Oh." You wondered if he meant it or if that was a convenient excuse. "I did appreciate the rescue, and it wasn't like I went looking for that fight, sir. But, you're in charge."

"I know," he smirked. "So what you're saying is that I should leave all the punishment up to Gabe," he said, and your breath quickened. "By your logic," he grinned. "My job is to indulge you." His gaze turned thoughtful. "Is that what you need, sweetheart? Do you need me to take care of you?"

You stared up at Jack. He wore a cocky grin, but the look in his eyes was serious and alert.

"I'd like that, sir," you said cautiously, a little unsure about this sudden shift. "But today is about you-"

Jack cupped your cheek. "Don't need to hear a debate club presentation, sweetheart. A simple "yes" or "no" will suffice." The rawness in his voice took the sting out of the curt words.

"Yes, please," you said, because what else could you say to that offer?

"All right," Jack said and snapped his hips forward.

You stiffened, muscles burning as he pushed your left knee against your chest, cock driving deep inside you. He bottomed out early and it just was too much. You arched beneath him. "Jack!"

"Does that hurt?" He murmured, slowing down. "Too deep?"

"Too deep," you exhaled, thighs already shaking.

Jack kissed your forehead. "Got it." He didn't shift positions though, he just rocked his hips, subtly changing the angle and dialing back the intensity. He gave a light thrust, hitting your g-spot. "Better?"

You nodded, panting.

Sweat beaded along Jack's temples, but he looked so very relaxed, pinning you to the bed. He began moving again, his cock pressing against the right spot. He smirked as a low whine escaped your throat.
"Is this what you wanted, baby?" His fingers stroked your throat, and you shivered, as he leaned in for a kiss. You moaned into his mouth. "Is it?" He murmured, focused on your reactions.

"Oh fuck yes, sir." You swallowed roughly. "You uh...you don't have to hold me down. I'll be good."

"I like doing it," he said. "Or did you want me to do something else with my hands?" He reached between your thighs and began to rub your clit with his free hand. You bucked your hips, sinking into the pillows as Jack cheerfully started thrusting harder. He lowered his head to your nipples, sucking the hard points between his teeth.

"Jack-" You swore a streak of babbling curses, having no leverage or ability to get the bastard back.

"Shh," Jack purred in your ear. "You just lie back and enjoy yourself. I love seeing you like this. Love it when you're cooperative, sweetheart. Oh it's fun when you fight and goad me, but I do appreciate it when you just give yourself over to me like this. You should do it more often. I promise I'll take good care of you."

Something clicked in the back of your head, but you were too wound up to focus on it. Instead you nodded frantically. "Please," you managed to get out. "Need you. Whatever you want-"

Jack smiled indulgently. "That's what I like to hear." He continued pumping steadily in and out of you, his hands gripping your limbs tighter. "Should have put a plug in you before I started. Give you a taste of your own medicine."

You grinned at him and squeezed the remote, feeling him stiffen as the you turned the power up a few notches.

Growling, Jack slammed his hips into you, and you gave a strangled cry. His grip on your wrists tightened, and he gritted his teeth, eyes squeezed shut as he shuddered. "Is that how you want to play?" He pulled out leaving you empty for half a second before pushing himself all the way back into the hilt.

You squealed as he pounded you, arching and bucking as he held you down, fingers rubbing furiously at your clit.

"And you were being so good-" he said tersely.

"Thought that-" The words came out as hiccups, his thrusts making it hard to speak. "Thought that was a hint, sir. I'm trying to be cooperative. Do you want me to turn it down?"

He opened his eyes, an edge in his smile. "Leave it. But later I'm going to tie you down and see how many toys I can I fit inside you. Going to see if we can make you squirt. It might take a few tries, but I'm a patient man."

You moaned, as Jack's thrusts grew more frenzied. "Please-"

"Tie you up, gag you, leave you squirming and shaking for Gabe-" Jack growled. "And still dripping with my cum." He kissed you hard, his shaft gliding smoothly in and out of you. "You're fucking soaked, sweetheart. Do you like that idea?"

Your head bobbed weakly as Jack fucked you into the bed. "Yes, sir," you panted and clenched your inner muscles, trying to milk his cock, to make him feel it. "Whatever you want, sir."
"Such a good girl," Jack sighed. He released his grip on your wrists. You took the hint and put the remote down. Jack gently wound his fingers with yours and pushed your hands into the pillow, clasping them tightly as he covered your face with kisses. "So good to me."

You gripped his hands tightly, vision blurring as he sped up. Sweat trickled down his brow, and his lips parted as he drew short rapid breaths.

"That's it, come on sweetheart. Need you here with me. Need you to know that." His blue eyes locked onto yours, his gaze shining with warmth and unguarded affection. It was startlingly clear, so much so that it almost hurt to look at him. "Don't look away. Stay with me now."

"Jack-" You whimpered, your eyes fluttering as you tried to keep your eyes on him. He didn't stop moving, the rhythm of his thrusts pushing you higher and closer to the edge. Jack was your focus, and even as you felt yourself start to fall.

"With me now-" he breathed.

You gripped Jack's hands, sobbing as he kept going through the throes of your orgasm. Each stroke seemed to drag it out, and you thrashed beneath him, spouting curses, pleas, and utter gibberish.

Jack held you down, his mouth on yours, his body quaking as he spent himself inside you.

Gradually, you began to come down from the high. Your thighs ached, and you blinked wearily as Jack rested his head against your shoulder, his fingers still entwined with yours.

"Gabe's right," he said softly. "You do like holding hands."

You almost pulled away, but he raised your left hand to his lips, kissing both flesh and metal. He reached up and switched off the remote. Then he began to disentangle himself, lowering your leg, and then rolling onto his side, his head back on your shoulder. He held you loosely, giving you room to breathe.

Aftershocks still ran through your core and you trembled as you rolled onto your side to face him. You smoothed his sweaty hair back, kissing his chin.

"Was that what you wanted?" You asked, a little self consciously.

"Baby, anything that involves us doing sexy things together is what I want," Jack chuckled, pulling you closer.

"I mean...the submission part," you said, not looking up from his broad chest. "You were kind of on edge."

Jack's hand warmed the small of your back, and he moved it in slow deliberate circles. "You scared me in DC," he began.

You almost apologized again, but kept your mouth shut, because Jack wasn't done.

"The FBI shooting happened so fast. You were in the way, and then you were OK, and I had an urgent job to do." He sounded distant. "I was angry, still am. Mostly at myself and the FBI. But that wasn't anything compared to the museum."

You took a deep breath.
"Walking into that room, finding that cyborg bitch perched on top of you, and not knowing if you were alive or-" He trailed off. "She had her blades out and I just ran. I didn't know if I was going to make it in time." He squeezed you then. "But then you looked up, bloody but alive. And I could breathe again. Of course, you started up trying to downplay your injuries, like none of it was serious, even though she'd damn near cut your throat, among other things. The entire situation was a mess," Jack sighed. "And I didn't have time to deal with any of that till...till later."

You lay there beside him, recalling that terrifying moment of helplessness when you thought you were going to lose more of yourself. You didn't take any solace in the idea that you were "doing the right thing." Because you weren't a hero. You didn't harbor any particular love for strange children, but your decision in the museum didn't fall in some kind of gray area. A person was defined by their choices: either you were the kind of person who tried to save a child, or the kind of person who left one to die. And you knew firmly which kind of person you did not want to be.

"I was scared," you said, your voice small. "And I was so happy to see you. I was in over my head, but running away wasn't an option. Not with the kid there. And definitely not with the cyborg pinning me." You stared very hard at Jack's chest. "So thank you for the save. I'm really sorry I needed it."

Jack yanked you into a crushing embrace, his breathing shaky. "You goddamn idiot," he whispered, tilting your chin up. "I don't want you to be sorry. I want you to be safe." He resumed rubbing your back, his touch to hard and clumsy.

You looked up, taken aback by the rough emotion in his voice.

"Not mad at you," he said mournfully. "Just...was terrified for you."

"I know. I'm still sorry."

Jack sighed, hugging you to his chest. "I know. I'm sorry I get...growly and forget to use words the right way."

You clung to him, unsure of what else you could say. "I love you."

"Love you too, sweetheart," he said, voice soft. He exhaled slowly, grip relaxing "Thank you for letting me take control. It helped." He smiled at you. "But I think talking about things, like this, is good for us too. I'm sorry if I'm too wound up at first to do that."

You nodded, tucking your head against Jack's shoulder. "I kind of am too. I mean, being a smartass is just another coping mechanism, you know? I don't do it just to piss you off."

Jack shook his head. "I...know. But I lose sight of that in the moment. It's a good thing we had Gabe to intercede." He gave you a wry smile. "Though I think you handled the FBI situation very well. Not the getting shot part, the keeping Gabe from murdering everyone remotely involved part."

"I appreciate you doing the same after we talked about Kwento," you said, rubbing the back of your neck. "Though I'm still not sure about the wisdom of cozying up to me in front of an audience."

Jack didn't look the least bit bothered. "It best that they know where we stand. Don't need anyone misunderstanding your relationship with McCree," he said so plainly that you rolled your eyes. "Besides, we're quite the team, you, me, and Gabe."
"I think we did pretty well together," you said, wondering if it could ever be just the three of you running missions again.

"Yeah." Jack kissed you softly. "I think so too."

You curled up against him, sighing happily as he pulled the covers over you both.

Chapter End Notes

Work screwed up my vacation time again. facepalm So done.

But I do have an interview next week. Please wish me luck/less freaking out and panic-talking, because I do that something awful.
It's Gabriel's turn.

We've broken 700k and it looks like the final product is totally going to be more than 800k. Why am I so bad at estimating wordcounts?

You awoke to the soft sound of kisses, kisses that you weren't getting. Opening your eyes, you stifled a yawn and turned your head. Gabriel was on the other side of Jack, playfully nuzzling his face, while Jack shook with silent laughter. Jack was barely wearing a sheet around his hips, but Gabriel sat shirtless, on the bed, hat still on his head for some reason.

Gabriel's smile widened when he saw you watching. He leaned over Jack and ran his thumb of your swollen lips. "Did Jackie wear you out, hermosa?"

"How long was I out?" You sighed.

"Little less than an hour," Jack said. "You drooled on my arm. It was cute."

You wiped your mouth, mortified to find the corners damp.

"So who was pampering whom again?" Gabriel chuckled.

"Lucky was taking care of me," Jack said with an entirely too pleased grin. "But I had to reward her for all her hard work."

Gabriel raised a brow.

"She pointed out that it's not nice to punish someone for saving you," Jack continued wryly. "So we worked out that it was my job to reward her, but since she broke her deal with you and got herself injured, well, you get to punish her."

"Wait a minute, I didn't agree to that-"

"You weren't arguing," Jack said smugly.

"We were in the middle of sex," you scowled.

Gabriel watched you with heavy-lidded eyes, his arms crossed. "You did agree to avoid getting injured. Playing samurai with cyborgs was reckless enough," he said. "But then you went and got yourself shot. Again."
You blinked, adjusting your surprisingly still-intact negligee. "I'm sorry I got you hurt-" Your voice was thick with guilt.

"That's not what this is about," Gabriel purred. "That is irrelevant to the point. This isn't about some silly flesh wounds. This is about our agreement. The one that you broke." He rose, crossing over to your side of the bed. "Jack's right, baby girl. I think we need to settle this."

"On the mats?" You wondered.

"Nope," Gabriel's smile was wicked. "Come here."

You pushed the blankets off, and crawled forward, not missing how Gabriel's nostrils flared at the sight of you in lingerie. You sat in front of him, not entirely sure where this was going.

"We're supposed to be looking after Jack," you reminded him.

You felt Jack's hands on your shoulders.

"I don't mind just watching," he said. "I think you and Gabe need to take care of things first. Then you can both make it up to me." He nipped your ear and you jerked forward into Gabriel's lap, your hands scrabbling at his thighs. His shoulder was right in front of your face and it was drawn tight.

Gabriel didn't move, he just watched you, eyes flicking between you and Jack.

"What do you mean by "settle this?" Because it's pretty hard to disentangle you getting hurt from the entire situation. And I'm honestly not entirely sure how to make it up you," you said, not even playing at being coy.

"Did you forget what I told you in the hotel room? Be reckless and I'll edge you till you cry," Gabriel said gruffly. "Or maybe you just need a good hiding."

"Kinky, but I don't know if I'm up for that right now." You rubbed the back of your neck. "I do seriously feel bad about it, Gabriel. I don't really want to make a game of it." You rested your forehead against his shoulder.

"And how do you think I feel knowing you got hurt on my watch? Or that you were threatened by someone who was supposed to be our ally? And that I wasn't supposed to do anything about it?" Gabriel clasped the back of your head. "If you feel bad, how do you think I feel?"

You flinched. "I don't want you to feel guilty either."

"I know," he said, stroking your hair. "Doesn't stop it though."

You nodded, mouth downturned.

"I think I know how she can make it up to you," Jack said.

You looked up as Jack leaned in, one arm over Gabriel's shoulder while he whispered something into the other man's ear.

Gabriel nodded thoughtfully as Jack continued his plotting. But when you tried to listen in, Gabriel put his whole hand over your face and gently pushed you backward.

"Hey!"
"It's impolite to eavesdrop," Gabriel smirked.

"You shouldn't be whispering in front of me. That's rude too!" You crossed your arms. "Come on, Jack, spill it."

"No, it's a surprise. A good surprise," Jack said as he pulled away, looking smug. He kissed Gabriel's cheek and flashed you a happy smile. "It'll be fine, sweetheart. Honest."

"Lie flat on your stomach," Gabriel said. "Try to get comfortable."

You hesitated.

Gabriel sat there, looking oddly relaxed. His lips quirked up when he caught you staring. "Go on," he said, giving you a sour look, impatience starting to shine through.

You moved the blanket aside and took a deep breath as you crawled forward, half-expecting one of them to slap your ass. No one did, and you turned your head to the side, resting your cheek on a pillow, your fingers already gripping the sheets.

"Raise your hips," Gabriel said.

You obeyed, and glanced back over your shoulder as he slid a pillow underneath you. He studied your back with grave concentration.

"Didn't I tell you to lie flat?" His voice was barely above a bass rumble, and it made your inner muscles clench.

You dropped your head back against the pillow, teeth gritted as you felt him push the negligee up past your waist, then higher along your back, till it was bunched around your breasts.

A rough finger traced a constellation on your back. Your nerves lit up along the pathway, each stroke radiating heat and making you shiver. You buried your face in the pillow breathing hard as Gabriel kept his touch feather light.

"That asshole fired six shots total," Gabriel said, his voice distant. "One went wide and hit a tree. Four hit the back plate of your armor. I can still see the hints of bruising underneath, despite all the medical treatment." You felt him lean in, his presence warm. He continued tracing the same pattern, and your breath caught as he gently kissed each bruise. "You're fortunate he only had a pistol and hollow points."

"Gabriel-"

"Shh," he said, nipping your ear, and you jerked forward into the pillow. "I'm not done."

You swallowed roughly, breathing heavy as he kept drawing the same pattern with his finger. It wasn't sexual, not quite, and it wasn't tickling either. There was something sensuous about the slow repetitive motions. The lack of pressure made your nerves more sensitive, more receptive. Each stroke echoed, the very feel of it lingering on your skin, though his hand had moved on. You bit your lip as he kissed the back of your neck, his mouth hot and demanding.

Another finger rested on your left arm. But he didn't stop touching your back.

"One shot struck here and went through." He kissed the bandaged spot. "Made me think you need more extensive armor, or at least an armguard of some kind. But after some consideration, I realized it would just slow you down. You have to be fast for some of those knife moves. I don't want to throw off your balance. Tell me later if you disagree. For now, you can just hold still."

You closed your eyes, nerves wired, but oddly soothed by his hands. Your breathing stayed erratic, and the muscles in your back quivered.

"I know your injuries could have been much worse," he said. "I know you did the right thing, shielding Jack. I know you didn't take any careless risks." He sighed softly, kissing the back of your neck again. "But it still haunts me." He took your left hand in his, and you understood exactly what he meant, and it wasn't just about what happened in Washington DC.

You wanted to interrupt, to tell him that he was being ridiculous, that none of your trauma was his fault, but he squeezed your hand.

"I know what you're thinking, corazon. But we both know it doesn't work like that." He kissed the back of your neck again. "So I'm going to ask you to take better care of yourself, because I think now you understand what seeing you hurt does to me. It cuts deep."

"Gabriel-" Your voice broke and you raised your head.

"Lie flat, stay quiet, and don't argue with me," he said sternly. "You'll get your say in a minute." He released your hand, and took his hand off your back.

You drew a shaky breath, and squeezed your eyes shut. Gabriel gently rolled your negligee back down, his hands smoothing it along your hips. It still rode up, and you could feel the cool air on your inner thighs, but you didn't move. He released you and from the way the mattress shifted, he had sat back on the edge of the bed.

"It's OK," you heard Jack murmur, and you knew then that Jack was right behind you both. You snuck a peek over your shoulder. Jack embraced Gabriel from behind, and Gabriel had his face tucked against Jack's neck. Jack kissed his forehead, and caught your eye. He shook his head, waving you back down with hand. "We're all home now. Everything's going to be fine," he said, in Gabriel's ear, his eyes on yours.

Gabriel lifted his head, and you quickly buried your face in the pillow. "Blaming yourself is about as accurate as me blaming myself for Captain Patel and Shin," you said, your words muffled.

Gabriel moved back up the bed, and you felt him hovering over you. He exhaled slowly, one hand on your hip. "It makes me happy to hear you say that. But we both know that you do it anyway."

"Working on it," you said, not looking up from the pillow.

"Same," Gabriel said. He gave a soft sigh. "We're quite a set."

"I'm not insanely overprotective like the two of you," you said, and immediately regretted it.

Jack snorted.

Gabriel just laughed at your obvious lie. "Now, corazon, I've caught you checking the backs of my legs these past few days. It was cute waking up to you peeking under the blankets with that worried face, but it was completely unnecessary." His fingers moved down your thighs, along the backs of your calves and up again. "None of my scars are from DC. You can stop searching. All those wounds were gone by the time you woke up in the hotel for breakfast. They were only superficial. Emitter and accelerated healing took care of most it. I didn't lie to you."

"OK," you said, voice raspy.

His hands hesitated on your scarred calf. He rubbed it gently. "Now we're going to review what occurred when we stormed that emplacement in the museum," he said. "The initial operation went according to our very hasty plan." He seemed very amused by that. "The three of us did a good job eliminating the hostiles, and more importantly, we didn't get in each other's way. You did well, making precise shots at difficult angles and finding that tripwire. Jack and I would have discovered it, even if you weren't there. But you did it quickly and took care of it efficiently."

You relaxed a little as he rubbed your low back. "Thank you."

He kissed the side of your neck and you stiffened.

"Now, you could have told us you were opening the door, and that is a small protocol violation," Gabriel said, and you winced. "But we were all on alert and could clearly see what you were doing. So it wasn't an issue."

"But the proximity mines-"

"Jack and I wouldn't have expected them there either, and even if we had, there wasn't much we could do to circumvent them with the equipment we had on us," Gabriel said firmly. "On top of the claymore and the turrets, proximity mines were overkill and a waste of ordnance. If we'd had a functioning Athena drone, yes, she could have detected and disarmed them. But we didn't. Whether you were there or not, one of us would have been first through the door, and one of us would have gotten hurt."

You bit your lip.

"It should have been one of us through the door first anyway," Gabriel said. "We all know that Jack and I wear heavier armor than you do and we can take more damage than you can. In the future, on a straight combat run, you let one of us go first."

"I...OK," you said.

" Doesn't apply to your stealthy tricks," he said. "And I am aware that we may need to make other exceptions in the future. I get it. This is a just a guideline. So don't start arguing with me, not unless you really want me to punish you."

"Understood," you murmured, a relieved smile playing on your lips.

"That covers the basics," Gabriel said. "We can discuss it more...in-depth later. But now I've got other things I want to focus on." He squeezed your ass. "Understood?"

"Yes, sir."

"You know, baby, that's Jack's preferred title," Gabriel said, hands kneading your thighs.

"I'm sorry, papi," you said, stifling a moan as he ran a finger along your slit.

"I bet you are," Gabriel rumbled, his chest against your back, his hands cupping your breasts as he began grinding against your ass. He was still wearing pants, though you could feel exactly how excited he was through the fabric. "I like the outfit, it's soft, pretty, and barely covers anything."
"Amélie's recommendation," you said, then realized maybe you shouldn't be talking about other people while he was seducing you.

"Next time let me take you shopping," Gabriel murmured. "Or invite me along. I'll behave. Probably." His playful tone did not reassure you of that at all. But the warmth of his body spread across your back, and he continued teasing you from behind. You weren't going to focus on that conversation right now.

"Oh god." You squirmed, pinned between him and the bed. He didn't put his full weight on you, but you couldn't buck him off. He began kissing the side of your neck, his fingers pinching your nipples while you moaned into the pillow.

"You're dripping all over my pants," Gabriel groaned. "All ready to go again?"

"Please, papi," you clawed at the sheets, whimpering as his teeth grazed your shoulder. "Need you too."

"What do you need, baby girl? Do you need me to wreck that sweet little pussy while Jack watches? Because that's precisely what I'm about to do."

You gave a whine of protest as Gabriel pulled away, leaving you too cold. He laughed as you tried to raise your head, and pushed you back against the mattress. "Gabriel!"

"I told you to lie flat, baby girl. If you're going to disobey me, there really will be consequences," he said, the severity in his voice very convincing. "And I guarantee you won't be sitting right afterward."

You lowered your head, heart beating faster as you heard the rustle of fabric. He was stripping off his pants, you realized. The hot velvety tip of his cock brushed against your folds and you bit the pillow, hands balled into fists at your sides. Your hips jerked as he rubbed himself against your slit.

"Normally, I'd tell you to wrap those pretty lips around Jack's cock, but I don't think he minds sitting this round out. I'll take care of him soon enough. I just want to hear you scream for me this time."

You swore vehemently as he grabbed your hips and thrust inside in one hard motion, his thick shaft filling you too quickly. Your curses cut off into a choked sob and you burrowed deeper into the pillow, trying to remember how to breathe.

Gabriel's words turned into a raw growl, rolled his hips, and drove deeper inside you, stretching your still-sensitive walls. He didn't give you time to catch your breath, he just drew back, the emptiness almost a relief, and slammed back inside you. Your whole body shook from the force of his thrusts.

"Look at her taking me, Jack," Gabriel sounded terribly smug, and you took the moment the catch your breath. "Always so ready and willing. That greedy little hole is just swallowing me up. Can't seem to get enough. Don't worry, baby. Papi will give you all the dick you can handle."

"Jesus, Gabe," Jack groaned, his words breathless and mirroring your own thoughts. But words weren't coming out of your mouth any more, only squeaky gibberish.

"Look how fucking soaked you are," Gabriel said, and began rutting against you once more, his rhythm hard and steady. Each stroke went in smooth, lewd slick sounds echoing in your ears. "Used to worry that I'd tear you in half. But you're always wet enough for me now." He chuckled, nibbling on the back of your neck. "That tight little cunt grips me so well. You don't want to let me go, do you?" He kissed the spot between your shoulder blades, his mouth hot on your skin.

"Gabriel-" Your voice cracked as you flailed under him, his hard thighs slapping against your ass. You dug your left hand into a pillow, feeling the foam crumple under your metal fingers.

One arm wrapped around your waist, holding you against his body, which was good, because you didn't have the strength to lift yourself and withstand the force of his thrusts. You just tried to ride it out, hips shaking. You could barely wiggle, trapped underneath him. And all the while, the headboard knocked against the wall at a steady pace.

"Look at your cute little ass bounce," Gabriel chuckled, and smacked the tender flesh.

You squealed, your focus just on accommodating Gabriel's girth. He fucked you hard, holding you in place.

"Papi, please-" You begged, though you weren't sure if it was for mercy or for him to go you harder. He seemed to interpret it as the second option.

"She won't be walking right tomorrow," Jack sighed, and he leaned over you. You could hear the wet sounds of kissing.

"You're up next, Jackie, don't worry." Gabriel chuckled, then sat back on his knees, hands squeezing your ass and hips. He hit your cervix every other stroke, and you were writhing under him now, your cries growing louder. One hand slid between your bruised thighs, his calloused fingers giving your clit more delicious friction.

He was relentless. He had an entire op's worth of tension, frustration, and lust built up, and now he was pouring it all into you.

"T-too much," you pled, most of your words incoherent.

"But I want more," he said, kissing your neck and pounding you like both your lives depended on it, his fingers now moving frantically along your folds.

You couldn't last, not at this rate. Your body spasmed around Gabriel's cock, your jaw clenched, eyes squeezed shut so hard that tears smeared your cheeks. You could feel what was left of your discipline unraveling, and you tried to relax, to let the pleasure wash over you, instead of fighting it. The tension would shatter you if you did, and you'd get a leg cramp to boot.

Your walls clamped down around Gabriel's cock, and you bucked your hips, shrieking into the pillow.

"Let me hear you, hermosa," Gabriel demanded, voice hoarse,

Trembling underneath him, your cries turned to ragged moans as your muscles contracted, a pulsing rhythm that Gabriel seemed to have no trouble matching. He purposefully drew it out, hips moving in time with the aftershocks that wracked your body, his fingers still abusing the raw nerves of your clit. He kept pushing you along, though you thought you'd already reached your limit. He dragged it on longer and you screamed, the overstimulation starting to wear on your frazzled nerves. Tension compressed the muscles in your limbs, and they were starting to knot. With your right you hand, you slapped the mattress in desperation, tapping out because you couldn't make your mouth form proper words.

Gabriel immediately froze and took his fingers off your clit. "Hard stop?" He asked, breathing hard.

You shook your head, trembling as you drew in a few jittery breaths, your throat raw. "Just...needed you to stop winding me up more. Muscles starting to cramp. Give me a second to recover." You wiggled your legs, sighing as Gabriel massaged your calves.

He turned your head to the side and kissed you gently. "Tell me when I can move."

You waited for the spasms to die down, your breathing slowing. Your lips were cracked and your throat too dry, but you kissed him back hard and nodded. "I'm good now. Want you to finish inside me."

"That was the plan." Gabriel began to move again, faster than before, chasing his own release now, the feel of his body agitating your still tender nerves. You shook beneath him, fingers tearing through Jack's pillows.

"Nearly there, baby," Gabriel growled, voice strained. And then he sunk his teeth into your shoulder and you snarled, thrashing as he pumped his hot cum inside you. Your mind blanked briefly, and when you opened your eyes, shredded foam and loose feathers fluttered around your head.

You ached, inside and out. Gabriel very slowly withdrew from you, and you could feel his semen oozing out of your well-fucked pussy. You collapsed against the bed, muscles like wet clay.

Gabriel rolled you onto your back and kissed you hard, his eyes bright, gleeful even. You shuddered as he nuzzled your throat.

"You all right?" He murmured, pushing your sweat soaked hair out of your eyes. "Was that too much for my delicate girl?"

"Shut up," you grumbled and buried your face in his chest.

"You've embarrassed her," Jack chuckled, ruffling your hair.

"How?" Gabriel asked. "I'm not the one who ruined a perfectly good pillow."

You winced as you examined the burst pillow. The stuffing littered the bed, the feathers sticking to your skin and hair. You shoved it onto the floor.

"Sorry. I'll buy you another one," you muttered to Jack.

"Don't worry about it, I'll just rest my head here," he said, and squeezed your breasts.

You groaned, too tired to smack him.

"That was fucking hot, Gabe," Jack said and they shared another kiss, both men lying on either side of you, their hands gentle as they stroked your overheated skin.

"Love you, corazon," Gabriel murmured, pressing sweet kisses all over your face and acting like he hadn't just made you tap out and beg for mercy. "You were so good for me. But next time, I'll tie you up. Less property destruction that way."

You grumbled, not missing that he was already stiffening against your thigh.

"Once more?" He asked, giving you a speculative look.
"I'll die," you said, maybe a smidgeon overdramatic. "Jack should be ready for you though. Put the plug in him myself."

You didn't even see him move. One moment, he was lying next to you, wearing nothing but a smarmy smile. The next, he was on top of Jack, and rolling him across the mattress, pinning the other man on his back.

Jack's delighted laugh made you smile, and you rolled onto your side to watch. Gabriel straddled Jack's stomach, one hand pinning Jack's wrists over his head.

"Lucky's not the only one who acted stupid in DC," Gabriel said, tracing Jack's jawline.

Jack chuckled. "I'm not the one who threatened to feed an FBI agent his "own teeth and my goddamn fist," in front of a crowd of witnesses."

You snorted, having missed that exchange. "You weren't threatening poor Agent Brant, were you?"

"Peters," Gabriel said, glancing over at you. "The asshole who shot you."

You knew the name. Suddenly cold without them cuddling you, you pulled a blanket up around your chest. "Oh, well that's OK then."

Jack gave an exasperated sigh. "You're not mad at me too, are you?"

"Frustrated," Gabriel murmured, nipping Jack's bottom lip. "Lucky's fine backup, but you should have stuck to the plan and kept Genji with you."

"He needed to escort the kid."

"Kid was fine," Gabriel grumbled. "You and Lucky needed a third person."

"That's when you showed up. Impeccable timing, babe," Jack beamed. "And we both know we couldn't send that kid off alone. Maybe I should have sent Lucky instead of Genji."

"Oh no," you said. "I'd be the angry one then."

"See? No pleasing either of you." Jack said. "I had to make an executive decision. And I stand by it."

Gabriel pursed his lips. "Executive decision, huh?"

"Privilege of command," Jack said cheerfully. "You know, because I'm the one in charge."

"You keep telling yourself that, amor," Gabriel laughed, and rolled Jack onto his stomach, already fisting the other man's cock.

Jack rested his head on your chest. Sweaty, drained, and exhausted, you stroked his damp hair, dozing while Gabriel murmured endearments in Jack's ear. He had been even rougher with Jack, savagely plowing him into the mattress while you watched, one of your hands holding Jack's the entire time.

"Still feeling neglected?" You asked.
"Mmm, I could go again," Jack sighed, kissing the skin between your breasts.

You winced, already aching. "I can't."

"Not surprised. Gabe was really worked up. I guess I could have gone first, but you two needed to work out some things."

"What did you tell him earlier?" You asked.

Jack glanced over his shoulder and Gabriel nodded once, his expression suddenly taut and grim.

"We've talked about Kandahar, the incident with the Bastion, and how...badly Gabriel reacted to my injuries. But I know we didn't go into detail."

Gabriel sighed. "It's not a nice story."

"I gathered." You reached over to squeeze Gabriel's hand. "If you're not ready to share it, you don't have to."

"No, it was my mistake, one I've owned and worked hard to correct," Gabriel said, hesitantly. "But Jack can tell it. He does a better job."

"He gets embarrassed." Jack kissed Gabriel's forehead. Gabriel just grunted. "So after that whole debacle with me getting shot up and Gabe beating back the omnis with his bare fists, he dragged me to the infirmary, bitching me out the whole way there. By the time we got there, I had had enough. We really got into it. I was furious that he was overreacting. Gabriel lost his cool. I was classic Idiot Morrison: oblivious and hadn't realize how bad things had gotten. Our...argument came to blows. It was pretty traumatic for everyone."

You watched both men, not sure how much you needed to read between the lines. Jack looked a little sad, Gabriel ashamed. Both men still took their disagreements to the mats, but that was a controlled setting. You suspected there were points when they both threw things or jumped at each other, but maybe this was a lot more violent?

"I swung first. Jack was already injured. There was no excuse," Gabriel murmured, looking away.

"It's not like I curled up in a ball and took it. I gave as good as I got," Jack said. "But after the smoke cleared, metaphorically speaking, nothing actually blew up sweetheart," he added quickly. "We all realized that here was the breaking point. Gabe...wasn't OK. That was when Ana, Gérard, and I insisted that he get help, talk to someone. And he did. We all knew things couldn't go on like that." Jack leaned over and kissed Gabriel's temple. "It was a rough slog, but he was committed. Things got better. Less nightmares. Less...anxiety. More talking things over with me. It took time, but we got through it."

Gabriel clenched his jaw. "I'm not proud of how I acted. I wasn't very easy to get along with back then. Hadn't been quite right after...Dili. It's not an excuse, but I learned from my mistakes. Had to sort myself out and seek healthier outlets. Had to be more honest about my limits, and you know how hard it is to admit any kind of weakness after going so long on your own. Asking for help was even worse. All of it was...an adjustment, but one I needed to make."

You nodded, because you did know exactly what that was like.

"You know Jack and I both skew more aggressive because of what SEP did to our hormones, but that's not a pass for bad behavior." Gabriel shook his head ruefully. "Jack was OK, but what if it had been Ana or Gérard? With our level of strength, we can't afford a lapse in control."

"After our...unplanned demolition of the infirmary, Gabriel apologized, agreed to get help, and iced my bruises. I wasn't too badly off, and neither was he, but the shock of how quickly and violently the fight escalated really shook us both." Jack sighed, stroking Gabriel cheek. "I...was scared for Gabriel."

Gabriel said nothing, just kissing Jack, his eyes shimmering with guilt.

"We took a catalogue of both our wounds and made awkward jokes that didn't really diffuse the tension. The touching was...a way to ease into the conversation. We don't do get to do it like that very often, because, well, we heal so fast." Jack shrugged.

"Or you're hurt so badly that." Gabriel trailed off. "Never mind."

You reached over and squeezed Gabriel's hand.

"You know I never want to make you feel unsafe. You know there are boundaries I don't want to cross," he said gruffly. And you understood that they were both so conscientious of boundaries and acceptable behavior precisely because they'd had to learn from experience.

"I know," you said, raising his hand to your lips. "I trust you both."

"Good," Gabriel said, his gaze fierce.

Jack reached over and kissed Gabriel's cheek. He then rolled over Gabriel, laughing as the other man protested. He wrapped his arms around Gabriel's waist, hugging him tightly. "It's ancient history, babe. I nearly fucked things up by letting the job come between us. I know it was silly self-absorbed pride at the core of things. And that's a lot less forgivable."

Gabriel managed a crooked smile. "But still forgivable."

"You don't know how happy it makes me to hear that... Actually, I think you do, but don't correct me. You'll just ruin the moment," Jack murmured.

Gabriel valiantly kept his mouth shut, only rolling his eyes once.

"We've all worked hard to do better. Even me." He kissed the nape of Gabriel's neck and you scooted closer, curling up against his chest.

"And...I really appreciate your guidance," you said, because it was true. "I don't think I would have done this well without your support. I'm just sorry you had to go through all that."

"If it helps you, it wasn't for nothing," Gabriel said, exhaling slowly. He embraced you, kissing your forehead as Jack pulled the blankets up.

"I can't move," you rasped, lying facedown between Jack and Gabriel. Yesterday, last night, and this morning had been spent in the bedroom. Your nightgown hadn't survived an energetic round sandwiched between Jack and Gabriel; hell, you were fortunate the lingerie was the only thing they tore apart. In fact, when you had the strength, you were going to have to lift your head and give them both dirty looks. Because that was the extent of the offensive maneuvers you could muster.

Gabriel ran his hand down your back, kissing the nape of your neck. "So delicate."

You managed to raise your head and give him a bleary-eyed glare.

"Very scary," he said, patting your head. "Though I bet you could use some water." He got out of bed, pulling part of the blanket off you. You grasped at it, yanking it back over your body. "We should have made sure we had some on hand," he said, stretching his arms overhead, before heading out of the bedroom. You might have turned your head just enough to watch his perky ass bounce as he walked.

"I like it when he walks around my room naked," Jack murmured in your ear. "I like it when you do it too," he added cheerfully.

"Not moving," you muttered into the pillow.

"Should've said something," Gabriel said as he returned with a sports drink and unscrewed the lid for you. "You need to stay hydrated."

You took the bottle and drained it one gulp.

"She had a shower last night," Jack said.

"Normal people don't drink in the shower, Jack," Gabriel sighed, and leaned over you to kiss your annoyingly cheerful boyfriend.

"They do if they're thirsty," Jack said, completely unrepentant. "I think there are more of those sandwiches in the fridge. Do you want some?" He asked, nudging your side.

"Yes," you said, feeling a little more human after the drink. You flopped onto your back, not missing the smug looks Gabriel and Jack exchanged, like they were exceptionally proud of how much they could incapacitate you. But then, they were often like this after a mission. All the adrenaline, frustration, and pent-up emotions got channeled into mind-blowing sex. There were worse outlets. You were just cranky from hunger.

Jack got the sandwiches while Gabriel grabbed more drinks. You could probably use another shower. There was an emitter running, and you devoured the sandwiches at a frightening pace.

"That could have been your face," Jack murmured, elbowing Gabriel.

"No, Jack, she would go after you first. You're the reason she has a sore ass."

"She loved it," Jack laughed, giving you a wicked grin. He leaned over your shoulder, opening his mouth like he was going to take a bite of your manchego, prosciutto, and fig jam sandwich. You crammed the entire thing in your mouth, glowering at him.

Gabriel snorted.

Jack just lay across your lap, grinning up at you, not the least bit perturbed by your feral reaction. "You got something right here," he said, tapping the corner of your mouth.

You wiped some of the sticky sweet jam off your face.
"I realize we're all recovering from Black Abacus," Jack began, his eyes darting between you and Gabriel. "But I appreciate you both spending your off day here and spoiling me."

"Where else would I go?" Gabriel murmured, stroking Jack's hair. He tweaked Jack's nose.

"To watch a movie, do some grocery shopping, maybe swing by a bakery," you rattled off, and Jack made a face at you. You laughed. "But I did that all yesterday, before coming to your room."

"You watched a movie?"

"On my tablet, while making your sandwiches," you said. "Not exactly a cinematic experience, but I'll live."

"We missed you too, amor," Gabriel said, kissing Jack's brow. "You should know, we already intended to spend time with you as soon as we got back from the States."

Jack's expression grew silly and satisfied. "I had hoped, but... Black Abacus was rough. I...didn't want to be alone after all that."

"Planned on spending some quality time with you, terrorist attacks or not," you said, squeezing Jack's hand.

"And I guess now I'm just feeling guilty actually taking my post-combat leave, you know? Especially after Black Abacus," Jack muttered. "Of course, you do. You're both terrible at maintaining a good work-life balance. Not that I can point fingers."

You nodded. "Yeah, well, I guess some of us had to learn, the hard way, that you need to take time for self-care. Otherwise, you burn out. It's easier when I have you two reminding me."

"I could say the same thing," Gabriel reclined on his side, propped up on an elbow while he ate another sandwich.

"I know. You two work too hard."

"And you don't?" You narrowed your eyes at Jack.

He shrugged. "I never feel like I get enough done. Yeah, we mitigated that attack on DC, but now we're drafting up a joint counterterrorism agreement with the US government. Sure, I made some reassuring political speeches and PR appearances, but I'm getting pressure from up top to do an extended tour and station more agents in a number of higher-risk urban areas. Yes, we have Kwento on our side now, but we have yet to sit down and talk strategy."

"Yeah, well, that's your own fault. She probably won't be able to look either of you in the eye for at least another week," you said. "And she's definitely never going to want to see me again."

Jack laughed, not looking the least bit bothered. "Fair enough. But that's just the fallout from Black Abacus. I still need to sign off on Ana and Reinhardt's action plan for the Mediterranean situation, and Gérard has submitted so much paperwork I might have to sign off on it en masse if I ever want to get anything else done, and I dread looking for every possible loophole and angle in his mission proposals."

"Athena is getting pretty good at that," you said.

"Noted," Jack said. "And Winston, Torby, and Mihret are all requesting more funding for R&D, and while their patents are pretty much paying for their departments, we do need to front the money and I have to justify some of that to our civilian managers in professional terms, if only for posterity. For example, Winston invented a peanut butter gun for...reasons I'd rather not think question, but the technology was modified for mass convenience food production and we're not calling it a "peanut butter gun" any more. Marketing has changed that and we need to update all our forms. But then they'll want to talk about other budget shortcomings. The motor pool needs tracking software upgrades. HR needs new computers, though Ana thinks they could go another year and Reinhardt swears we cannot."

"Neither of them work in human resources," you said scratching your head.

"Yes, but they're still in leadership and both of them make valid points. Also, bureaucratically-frustrated Ana is terrifying, and sad Reinhardt is heartbreaking," Jack said, pinching the bridge of his nose.

"Always side with Ana, even if she's wrong," Gabriel muttered. "But she's never wrong, even when she's wrong."

"And with that kind of advice, you can see how things get complicated," Jack continued. "I also need to review a purchase request for new high altitude dropships, while ensuring the parts are reliably sourced, the supply chain is clean, and double-checking that the emissions don't violate any Swiss environmental regulations. And there are a lot of those. There are a whole slew of unpleasant necessities: budget meetings, regional strategy forecasts, and jurisdictional negotiations. That's all routine bureaucracy: important, but not the actual point of my job. I get it, and I have good admins; I don't do all the research and paperwork on my own, but the mental load is just draining."

You sighed, because Jack's job was kind of your personal nightmare.

"And Michael and Maggie are coming next week for Family Day, which Ainsley has been handling, but there will be a lot of PR obligations. Not that I think greeting agents' families is some kind of chore-"

"...It can be," Gabriel groused.

"But I'll feel guilty the entire time, because I have a lot more operational work to do, and I shouldn't be having fun or enjoying myself, when there are lives on the line," Jack said with a groan.

"How did he get inside our heads?" You asked Gabriel, knowing exactly how he felt, and knowing that Gabriel struggled with that too.

"You of all people know that we can't run indefinitely. We can't measure our success by how much work we have not gotten done. That's a shit metric. We're enhanced, sure," Gabriel said. "But we need downtime. Sometimes we need to just be people. Otherwise, we start to slip. There will never be a good time for us to take a break. There is always a crisis somewhere. But we can only do so much. Sometimes, I need you and Lucky to remind me of that." Gabriel pushed his curls back, shaking his head.

"And you can't do that if you're wrapped up in work too," you said, stroking Jack's cheek. "Gabriel needs a lot of persuading. He's stubborn."

"And if we're both busy, who's going to watch Lucky?" Gabriel asked, shooting you an evil smile. "You know what happens when we leave her unsupervised."
"Mayhem," Jack said, his smile gentle.

"Chaos," Gabriel agreed.

"...I've done all right," you scowled.

Jack coughed, clearing his throat.

Gabriel just raised a brow, his shit-eating grin making your eye twitch.

"I'm not in leadership," you said, deciding to ignore that argument. "I just do regular agent things. My life isn't as stressful."

"Regular agent things, huh? Such delegating and tasking on highly-compartmentalized operations like Shit Spiders?" Jack asked innocently.

"And Blackwatch administrative duties, bodyguarding Jack, teaching troubled rookies, babysitting some Blackwatch's most eccentric agents-" Gabriel continued.

"Are you talking about Hanzo or Lacroix?"

"Yes," Gabriel said. "And Vo, Mihret, Tataryn-"

"Yes," Jack agreed. "You live a stressful life too, sweetheart. Don't downplay it. You need to take time for yourself too."

"I do. I just don't have time for all that stuff you guys think is a big deal outside of Overwatch: houses, kids, ballroom dancing."

"There will never be a good time to learn a new hobby, teach a rookie agent, or adopt a dinosaur. But you need to make time for yourself and do it anyway. Yes, it's a balancing act, and if you're working too hard, it's our job to remind you to take a break and vice versa," Gabriel said. He cupped your face. "If you don't want to think about houses and kids right now, that's OK."

"She wants a big kitchen and a big bathtub," Jack said with a smile. "Everything else is negotiable."

"The master bedroom would have to be extra large. We'd need a walk-in closet with enough space for all of our stuff," Gabriel said thoughtfully. "I mean, we could use a second bedroom." It was probable, given just how many outfits Gabriel owned. "But it wouldn't be fair to make only one person store their items there. Maybe it could be for formalwear, things we don't use on a regular basis..."

"Separate offices though," Jack said, rubbing his chin. "You know, so we'd actually be able to get work done and not get distracted by each other. And lots of bookshelves for you, Gabe."

"Yes. And we'd need some kind of playroom for Isha," Gabriel said. "Something raptor-proof, which is harder than it sounds now that she knows how to get into the ventilation system."

You sat there, thinking very hard about what they were talking about. You pressed your hands together, butterflies trying so very hard to escape your stomach. You didn't remember eating any butterflies, but maybe you'd fallen asleep with your mouth open. "Don't forget enough outdoor space so Jack can have a garden. Or a greenhouse if the climate isn't friendly. Don't know if you want a sewing room, Gabriel. Kind of figured you liked doing that stuff while we watched movies and talked, but you do have a lot of crafting supplies."
There was a moment of silence and you stared very hard at the wall, focusing on calm breathing.

"Yeah," Jack said, his voice husky. "That's a good reminder. I would like a vegetable garden."

"And I would like a sewing room," Gabriel said, his tone gentle. "But it's not a requirement-"

"No, Lucky's right. You should definitely have one," Jack said enthusiastically. He gripped your hands tightly. "Thanks sweetheart, I never would have thought of that. I'd just be tripping over Gabriel's yarn baskets and stepping on his knitting needles for all eternity."

Gabriel leaned over, his forehead pressed against yours, the look in his eyes soft and warm. "Guestroom upstairs or downstairs?"

"If it's upstairs, farthest from our bedroom," Jack said.

"If it's downstairs, definitely not under the master bedroom," you said.

"So maybe a 'guesthouse' farther out on the property?" Gabriel laughed.

"We could built it ourselves," Jack said. "And a treehouse. Oh, let's make the guesthouse a treehouse!"

"Can you imagine Ana coming over to visit and telling her she had to stay in a treehouse with a ropeladder?" Gabriel laughed.

"You'd have to make it nice, you know with electricity and plumbing," you said.

"There's an entire industry devoted to high-tech treehouses. Ana would be annoyed for ten minutes, especially if she didn't realize it was a fully-equipped residence," Gabriel mused, looking very pleased. "But once she was up there she wouldn't want to come down. It'd basically be a luxury suite compared to her usual sniper's nests."

"Fareeha would love it," Jack said, his expression turning thoughtful once more. "Probably wisest to give Ray some space from us if she stops by. I know my siblings would like it. And it would keep Mihret and McCree out from underfoot."

Gabriel blinked, like it hadn't occurred to him that you would invite Ziv over. He nodded then. "I guess it would be best to keep some of our guests at a safe distance." You suddenly had visions of Ziv in the tree, yanking the ladder up quickly while he screamed insults at Gabriel. Maybe he'd throw water balloons and Gabriel would get a hose. You snickered.

"So do we all think a guest treehouse is the best choice?" Gabriel asked.

"Yes," Jack said.

"Sure," you agreed. You managed a lopsided smile, feeling ridiculous about getting all worked up over a theoretical house, and one that wasn't even for you. But then, only an idiot would think this conversation was just about the layout of a house.

Chapter End Notes
PTSD does some weird things to you, things you don't always notice till someone else points out that habit is unhealthy and...maybe you should stop? And then you get snippy with them for the observation, but maybe later on you realize that they might have a point. Anyway, hope that balanced some of the hurt and comfort in Jack and Gabriel's history. This is the therapy fic, where they are trying to make healthy life choices, and yes, I am projecting.

Job interview tomorrow. Researching the field, the company, my interviewer, rewriting interview question answers, and reminding myself that if I bomb it I also applied for another position in the company and I can try again, because I am so bad at this.

Medical bill from before came around. Not fixed. Though I think they might be trying to double bill me. Will call them tomorrow and maybe get a human? Last time I couldn't.

My plan is do more composing/research tomorrow. I've been studying LTL freight terms and freight classification just to brush up on the subject matter.
Chapter 97

Chapter Summary

There's more to operations than just shooting bad guys. Sometimes, you have to play nice with others.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"That isn't funny," you told Lacroix. "None of this funny." It didn't stop his laughter. You almost told him to stop laughing, but realized he would just find that more hilarious. So you just sat back in your chair and waited for him to stop snickering.

"I have to agree with Agent Maeda Vargas' assessment," he said, wiping his eyes. "Ainsley Petras is very focused on you, in a way that does remind me of him."

"It's just for show though, right? Like she has a nefarious angle that she's working and-"

"She could be," he agreed. "She could be a deep cover agent, but the abrupt change in tactics and fixations isn't the wisest choice for such an operation; it is not good cover. Also, that's a long-term strategy, and while those of us higher up in Overwatch need to keep an eye out for that sort of thing, you are...less at risk."

You raised a brow, because he meant "not worth the effort."

"You certainly are a rising star within the organization, and perhaps you should be concerned, but my instincts tell me that this to be too sloppy to be an attempt to entrap you."

"I guess that's reassuring," you said, because you respected Lacroix's expertise, if not the man himself.

"I don't need to tell you to keep your guard up though," he continued as if you hadn't spoken at all. "She does talk to her uncle, so don't get comfortable."

"I haven't forgotten."

"I will take a closer look at this when I have time. I appreciate you bringing to my attention. Lacroix folded his hands on his lap and his smile widened. "But that isn't what I wanted to talk about today."

You sighed. "The FBI-"

"The American response is out of our hands," Lacroix said, shaking his head. "They are very eager to sweep that debacle under the rug. You know they've come out and blamed anti-omnic separatists for the attack."

You snorted. It was the "Martel Liberation Front" all over again. Sure, you'd framed that shitty little xenophobic group for Hoffman's assassination in Cologne, so maybe this was karma. But the American government was blaming the "Organic Life Defense League" for the attacks. Not a whiff of "Talon" in the media." That told you everything you needed to know about how much you could trust the American government. And not just the Americans. Most major news organizations ran that story without question. The fringe media was rife with conspiracy theories, most of which blamed Overwatch in some shape or fashion.

It was different within the intelligence community; Talon was understood to be the funds and the direction behind the Organic Life Defense League. And what was with that name? You'd looked over their manifestos and found that while they hated omnis, cyborgs were tolerated. But their jingoistic rhetoric and bad writing had given you a headache, so you hadn't wasted too much time trying to read their literature.

"We are in the process of vetting and securing allies in the upper echelons of friendly governments, but those kinds of meetings take time. It's especially difficult since certain elements in various governments are determined to block us. Some of it is just political maneuvering: kneejerk fears that we're chipping away at their sovereignty, hesitation to ratify some of omnic peace accords, dislike of globalization, etc. But some elements within the American Department of Defense and the intelligence community have been extremely hostile. Most governments don't like being told their upper management has been infiltrated by a conspiracy of corruption, even if they know it's true."

"I know that," you said with a groan. You took a swig of your coffee. "But diplomat isn't my role."

"Perhaps not, but you can help the process."

"What do you need? Dirt? Intimidation? Some questionable favors?"

"Adaeze would like to talk to you privately."

You rubbed the back of your head. "I uh...is that wise?"

Lacroix cocked his head to the side. "Do you have a problem with her? Because she has been briefed on all of Shit Spiders, and while she has some serious reservations about Blackwatch methods and our close ties to On Sing, she has thrown her lot in with us."

You shrugged. "I don't have a problem with her, so long as she does what we need her to do, which is politicking."

Lacroix raised a brow. "Explain what you mean by that, please."

"Most of you guys in upper management can finesse people pretty well. Gabriel and Jack, you and Amélie, Rein and Captain Amari: you've all got charisma, though some of you have more patience for that bullshit than others. And if we could spare you guys to do that work, we would. But you guys also have to run Overwatch and participate in a variety of specialized activities, usually involving guns and explosions. Kwento's only fucking job is to charm people and social engineer her way through things. She doesn't have to get up at four AM to kill robots or teach new agents which end of the gun to hold." You set your cup down. "She's important, but she's important because she has a job to do, to keep you guys freed up. If she stops doing that job, maybe she's not as important to me."

Lacroix nodded, his smile pleased. "I won't argue with that assessment."

"But I get the feeling she's going to work out just fine. If she spent all that time digging up dirt on me, because she wanted to avenge Nwazue? Then she'll work just as hard to stick it Talon."
By the way, can I go back to my actual name, or-?"

"Best not to right now, Chanceux," Lacroix said. "You can shed identities if necessary. We have a few backup ones for you if it comes to that. But you're well known within the organization as Gabriel's assistant and a promising agent. No point muddying the water now."

"OK," you said. "What do you want me to say?"

"This is a personal chat. I briefed her on your history, as Zenyatta, Jack, and Gabriel all seemed intent on throwing the cat out of the bag."

"The idiom is-"

"I know," Lacroix said. "But they didn't just allow the cat to slip out of the bag. They shook it up, spun it around, and hurled it across the room while loudly announcing its arrival." He looked pleased by that description, and to be honest, he wasn't wrong.

"So, am I just supposed to make her feel better or-?"

"Say whatever you need to say. I want you to clear the air, because Kwento is with us for the duration of Shit Spiders. I know, what am I thinking? How scandalous! But this is one of the few carte blanche cathartic moments I'll give you." Lacroix rolled his eyes upward. "Honestly, I think you'll find Adaeze to be far more amiable than before. You can even show off some of that infamous brutal honesty you're so good at. Just try not to torpedo our alliance," Lacroix said, not actually looking worried at all.

That was a strange permission. Lacroix was "trusting" you to behave within acceptable parameters. You wondered then if you'd lost your edge.

Adaeze Kwento came from a prominent family in Nigeria, though her immediate family had settled in Numbani. She had a slew of letters after her name, designating all kind of certifications and degrees. Most of the family specialized in some kind of tech field; she was the outlier, going into law, business, and diplomacy. But you understood right off the bat that Kwento had a strong grasp on cutting edge technology and the sciences. She wasn't like poor Reinhardt, muddling the programming of his slow cooker or struggling to change the dancing hamster background on his tablet screens.

The point was, she was out of your social, educational, and economic class. Kind of like Amélie, but older and stuffier. You weren't sure if you could have a real conversation with her, and you were even less sure if you wanted to do so.

But she'd worked tirelessly to find justice for Nwazue, for your entire squad really. If you hadn't survived Black Base Delta, she might have been the one carrying on in your stead. She might have been the one to avenge you all, even if she didn't know or particularly care for anyone besides her cousin. The realization was sobering. So you found yourself feeling a little less hostile than you expected. You sat down in the Blackwatch conference room, an Athena drone hovering beside you - Gabriel's stipulation, not your own.

You settled down in your chair, wondering how not to be awkward. You held your travel mug of tea in both hands. The warmth soothed your nerves.

There was a knock and then Kwento entered the room, Oladele and her other surviving human bodyguard remaining outside. Today she'd gone with an intricately patterned white and brown dress, with gold jewelry and a white gele speckled with copper beads. It was far more formal than you expected, and you briefly glanced down at your Blackwatch office uniform - cargo pants and a Henley - before standing to awkwardly offer your hand.

To your surprise, Kwento smiled wide, and shook your hand firmly. "Thank you for agreeing to meet with me. What name do you prefer?"

"I'm Lucky Strike," you said dryly. "What other name would I use?" You meant the words to sound flippant, but the question came out too poignant.

Kwento frowned, brows knitting together. "I'm sorry. I know you have to maintain your cover."

"It's no problem, Ambassador," you said.

"Please, call me Adaeze. I am serious, Lucky. We know far too much about each other to use titles."

You were making a weird face, judging by Kwento's extremely polite laugh. She sat down, her bearing regal as she smiled pleasantly at you. She didn't look nervous at all, but then she was an experienced negotiator.

"I wanted to apologize," she said. "I know I gave some half-hearted version in Washington DC, but I owe you a better one."

You blinked. "I...would have done something similar in your shoes," you said, wondering if that was the right way to respond.

She sat there, polite expression frozen on her face.

"I mean, I have done worse for Shit Spiders," you said, and then winced at your own fumbling.

"Gérard gave me, what I assume, is a fairly comprehensive briefing on Shit Spiders," she said, the words coming smoothly off her tongue, like the operation name wasn't totally ridiculous. "And I completely understand the lengths that you have gone to. I am in no position to condemn you. In fact, I have misjudged your character terribly, and I am very sorry."

You rubbed the back of your neck, a little embarrassed by the earnestness of her apology. "Yeah, you did. I mean, to be fair, Lacroix had me on Petras duty, so I can't really blame you."

"I know, but I still feel guilty. This situation is a terrible burden on you."

You shrugged, being no stranger to that.

"He also briefed me on the story of Agent Lao Yue. I...I want to offer her a place in Numbani, if she can ever be safely released. I'm willing to move her parents there too. I know it's too early to make commitments, but we've already offered her mother a highly-coveted civil engineering position within the city, and I'm working at securing her father an offer from the university, all behind the scenes, of course. I'll make sure that they're comfortable, till the day we can reunite them."

You blinked, having not really thought very hard about Lao's family. You winced then, because though you and Valdez didn't have any family, the rest of your squad did, and you'd made no attempt to check on them, get in contact with them, or anything of the sort. Granted, the you from before was dead, so you couldn't just waltz up and introduce yourself, but you should have at least been keeping tabs on them, Shin's mother especially. You felt queasy then.

"That's really generous," you said.

"She was very fond of Agent Lao," Kwento said, her voice soft. "I know she could be standoffish at times, but Chibundo had a good heart."

"Lao was the baby," you said, because even Nwazue went easy on her.

"She liked you too," Kwento said, looking up, her expression serious. "She thought you were ridiculous, and sometimes told funny stories about you, but that wasn't out of malice."

You managed a lopsided smile. "That's what I want to believe." You held your travel mug in your hands, focusing on the heat warming your palms.

"Is there anything I can do for you?" She asked. "Because I have treated you unfairly, and also because Chibundo would have wanted me to help you."

You shrugged. "You're supporting us in Shit Spiders. Your delegation is allying with us and is actively against Talon. I mean, that's basically the outcome I was hoping for."

"For you, Lucky. Not Overwatch."

You shrugged, because you had no idea what Kwento could do for you. "You're willing to help out Lao. I'm not really-" You stopped then, realizing that this was her way of smoothing things over with Gabriel and Jack. "Don't worry about the Commanders. They've calmed down and-"

"Gérard said you'd be this way," Kwento said, shaking her head. "I owe you a great deal for what you've already done. I would also like to help you out, because that's what Chibundo would have wanted. My business with Strike Commander Morrison and Blackwatch Commander Reyes is independent of that. Speaking of which, you are...not in an uncomfortable situation with both of them?" She watched you, eyes sharp and speculative.

"...I mean, I don't like everyone knowing about my personal life," you muttered. "But I'm happy with them. I'm here because I want to be. There's no coercion."

Kwento's smile widened. "Well, I can recommend several venues for formal occasions and know of quite a few out-of-the-way relaxation spots, should you wish to take your relationship to a more formal level."

You stared blankly at her.

"I mean, your relationship seems very serious. By all accounts, they are very attached to you," Kwento said, giving you pointed look. "Polyandry is not as uncommon as you may think. The Maasai practice it, and it is a well-known tradition in the Himalayan region."

It clicked then. She was talking about marriage.

You began to laugh nervously. "I uh...wow. That's uh... Well, you see..." You rested your forehead against your hand. "So I work a lot. I uh...haven't really discussed that kind of thing with them just yet. I just got a pet, last month. First one I've had in...years. I'm kind of lagging behind on the domestic stuff."
"Chibundo described your...courtship with Lieutenant Sato in a similar manner. Yes, the attraction and the affection were obvious, but she would often complain that long sermons are not needed for evening services." Kwento nodded, like she completely agreed.

"...I'm not entirely sure what that means," you said, a little disturbed that Nwazue wrote home about your relationship with Shin. In retrospect, it was probably one of the more entertaining things to happen at Black Base Delta, but the thought perturbed you. How would those letters even go?

_Dearest family, it is with great frustration and dismay that I must relate to you the romantic mishaps of the dense and ever-floundering Lucky Strike, who is, as you must have realized from my previous missives, the squad idiot..._

Kwento cleared her throat. "It means that you beat around the bush in romance, especially in situations where such caution is completely unnecessary," she said, looking very amused. "She found it equal parts hilarious and frustrating."

You'd heard that before, from Jesse and others. Shaking your head, you decided you did not know Kwento well enough to enjoy this discussion. "I've heard it from many people and I'm working on it. But honestly we have bigger problems than my stunted emotions." You gave Kwento a sharp look. "Richard Prince and other factions in Talon want you out of the picture. We have worked very hard to keep you alive, and we want you to stay that way. You can do me a favor and keep your head down."

Kwento frowned, like you were being rude, and you probably were.

"Gérard didn't tell you? I have been assigned Epsilon Squad as a bodyguard unit, in conjunction with the bodyguards my cousin's firm provides. As a formality I have rented a residence in Geneva, but I will be spending a lot of time here in Zurich, using my civilian connections to help with Shit Spiders. My cover is improving omnic-human relations, which of course I will also be focusing on."

"Oh," you said, a little dumbly. "That's...good." You weren't sure if you sounded sincere. But you hoped so.

"The climate is not to my taste, the people are unfriendly, and the food is bland, but such are the requirements of the job. I will be able to visit. Perhaps one day I will be cleared to see Agent Lao." Kwento looked almost wistful, and you wondered what Chibundo had put in her letters, or perhaps those letters were Kwento's only lifeline to her cousin.

It didn't bother you that Kwento only felt a connection to you through her dead cousin. Grief did funny things to the brain. You didn't begrudge her that, though you weren't exactly comfortable with the obligation she felt toward you.

You pulled the datastick out of your pocket and slid it across the table.

Kwento raised a brow.

"When we recovered some of the backup data from Black Base Delta, I found a cache of pictures of our squad. There aren't a lot, but there are some of your cousin in there. Lao took most of the photographs." You had not included the ones taken with you, but there weren't many with Nwazue and you sharing any space. So it was fine.

Kwento sat there a moment, her eyes misty. "Thank you."
You didn't do the work, that was Lao. But you said "you're welcome," anyway. Because it was the polite thing to do.

You sat at your desk, drinking lapsong souchang spiked with some of Gabriel's scotch, nodding politely at Ainsley's slideshow presentation. It was an abbreviated timeline of your career, because she wasn't cleared for half of it. She included suggestions about how you could further advance yourself, comments about everything from your attire to your mission selection, and even deluxe business card designs with samples. On top of that, she'd made charts, graphs, animations, and color-coded each section. An Athena drone hovered in the corner, recording the whole damn thing, so others would have to suffer through this too. That singular sense of schadenfreude gave you a measure of comfort, though that could have just been the really expensive scotch.

Ainsley stood in front of your desk, her tablet projecting a the slideshow into the air. She'd worn another suit, modeled after the Assassin Butler, this time with red trim. It wasn't quite like yours, but the similarities were clear enough. And you were itching to know where she was getting these outfits.

"In conclusion, I think you are definitely on the right track: your name appears on several high-profile cases, internal files only, of course. You have been seen in the public eye working with the Strike Commander numerous times. You have a good record, at least the things I can see. And you're smart, determined, and kickass." Ainsley nodded vigorously, a delighted smile on her face. "I think you'd be a shoe-in for Blackwatch Commander."

You blinked, then set your cup down. "I...what?"

"My uncle said you wanted to be the director of Blackwatch," Ainsley said, looking pleased with herself. "And I know you could do it."

Your stomach dropped and you gritted your teeth.

"Ms. Strike. Can I call you Lucky?"

You nodded, taking a deep breath, and waiting for the pitch.

"There is no shame in being ambitious. It's a hard world. I know that doesn't mean much coming from me," she paused, sounding a little uncomfortable. "But you shouldn't be embarrassed that you want to be in leadership. If anything, you should stop being so modest. You're just holding yourself back."

"When did your uncle mention that to you?" You asked, raising your gaze to her cheerful face. Because this wasn't the first time she'd mentioned the position to you.

"Right before I came back," she said earnestly. "Said I should keep an eye on you because you were on the fast track to being promoted. He wanted my opinion on your capabilities. Don't worry, Lucky. I haven't submitted my observations yet. I wanted to run them by you first. I wouldn't do anything like that behind your back." She clapped her hands together. "I'm just so excited. You deserve more recognition."

You took another gulp of tea, wondering how you were supposed to respond. Was Ainsley finally showing her true colors as a witting Petras pawn? Or was she just that ridiculous?

"I see," you said. "I...am interested in the position further down the road, but I have no problem with Commander Reyes' leadership and am not seeking to oust him."

"Oh." Ainsley put one hand over her mouth. Her nails were painted a pleasant neutral color, and trimmed short, rather modest considering some of the manicures you'd seen her with in the past. "I wasn't implying that you were doing anything like that." She shook her head. "I uh...that would be awkward, wouldn't it?" She looked around, as if she was only now remembering that this was his office. "I can see why you would want to be discrete."

You sighed. "Ainsley, I appreciate the effort you put into this. It's very thorough. I've never had anyone lay out my career path in such a meticulous and orderly fashion. It's very flattering."

She pulled up a chair, shoulders drooping. "But I misread the situation, didn't I?"

You sipped your tea, watching her tuck her hair behind her ear and bite her lip. "A little. You never tell your higher-ups that you don't want a promotion," you said, purposefully keeping your reference to your one unpleasant direct conversation with Director Petras very vague.

Ainsley ran her fingers through her short blonde hair. "No, I think I only heard what I wanted to. My...therapist says I do that too," she murmured, not looking up.

"I'm told that I keep my cards very close to my chest," you said, trying to be polite. "I'm not a fan of politics and schmoozing."

"I understand," Ainsley said. "My uncle is the director. You're going to be careful what you say to him and...to me. I just thought if you were the Commander, maybe we could be a team. Like I could be your assistant. Not like I am for the Strike Commander. He's so formal. You seem more laidback, friendly even." She gave you a weak smile. "And you're kind. I guess I never really paid attention to that before. You know, people are nice to me because of my looks and my status. And you made it pretty clear early on that those things didn't matter to you. But when I was having a hard time, you were nice to me anyway. You would have done it for anyone, because it was the right thing to do. I didn't exactly appreciate that back then. But I do now."

You took another sip of your drink, pondering your options. If she was an actress, she was damn good, and now you were kind of hoping that Ainsley Petras was actually an evil mastermind. Because if she was being sincere, you were in trouble.

"Was that too much?" She asked, and you realized that you'd been quiet for too long.

"No, I was just thinking on...how far you've come," you said. "Look, if you want to help out, we need your expertise as a politics and public relations person. Yes, we have contractors and a PR department, but they don't have as firm a grasp on daily operations. You do, and you are very good at public relations. I've seen you handle reporters. I can't do that." Well, you had a different way of handling nosy pushy folks with too many questions, but that wouldn't look good on camera.

"I know, but I want to do more."

"If you want to start writing up reports on reactions to public relations outreach, political goodwill, or potential hostile UN resolutions, I'd be happy to read them," you said, wondering if you were overplaying your hand. "Your research is thorough and your writing is concise and well-presented. And you come from a civilian background, which gives you insight that the military analysts always miss. You have a knack for that kind of thing. But I don't want to make more work for you-"

"No, it's fine. The new virtual assistant does a lot of my old job," Ainsley said, sounding a little embarrassed. "I feel like I'm not doing enough." She didn't look at the drone in the corner. "The Strike Commander hasn't complained or anything. In fact, he seems a lot more relaxed now. But I want to be useful."

"As long as you're getting your work done, I don't think he'll care," you said, though you resolved to run this suggestion by both Jack and Lacroix afterward. "I'd start with an analysis of the public response to Overwatch's involvement in the DC attacks, and go from there."

Ainsley nodded enthusiastically. "Of course, that's a great idea."

You watched her pack up and go, and wondered just whose side Ainsley Petras thought she was on.

They arrived separately, the blonde CIA spook first, his demeanor cool and polite, but something about him, the round smoke-colored glasses, the cut of his suit, maybe the tightness of his smile, screamed "DOUCHE." No matter, you weren't working with him for his personality.

The NSA "Silent Sister" was next. She came dressed in a parka, with no hint as to where she'd been before this visit. She shed the cold weather clothes, wearing a muted berry-colored Nehru suit and soft gray kidskin gloves. She wore her long dark hair in complicated braid, and while her skin was a lovely shade of bronze, you had no idea about her origins. Was she a wandering time traveler? A heretical saint? Some goddess of small and bloody things walking the earth? You couldn't tell, but you would have believed any of those backgrounds to be true.

You were a little too scared to ask if the title was a literal thing. She didn't speak. She just smiled like she knew all your secrets and found them to be quaint, even the bloody ones. You escorted her to the conference room, finding her presence both soothing and terrifying in equal measures.

Senator Armstrong arrived next. He was an older African American man, his hair a distinguished shade of steel. He wore a dapper pinstripe suit with a fuchsia boutonniere. Lacroix personally escorted him to the conference room, the two chatting about some new art installation in Atlanta. He had an entourage of half a dozen people that followed, though Lacroix was going to drop them off with Amélie. You weren't sure if that was for their own protection or if she was just going to milk them for information. Either way, they didn't get to sit in on this meeting.

You and Jesse waited in the docking bay, trying not to look smug as a certain redheaded FBI agent disembarked from Armstrong’s transport. You heard he was "technically" not supposed to come, not that that would stop him. He kept gawking, his eyes wide as he tried to take in his surroundings. He was dressed down in a polo shirt and khakis and looked even less like a federal agent than before. You were more inclined to believe that he was a kid playing hooky from his prep school.

"Agent Strike!" He grinned when he saw you. "And Agent McCree!" His smile faltered a little. "You know, both of you are the talk of the Bureau. Total scandals for completely different reasons."

Jesse snorted.

"McCree is the one that got away," Brant said.

You elbowed Jesse. "Someone's got a fanclub."
Jesse shrugged, a wry grin on his face. "Aw shucks," he said, his innocent act not the least bit convincing.

"And you're the one that never should have been in the line of fire to begin with," Brant said, voice subdued. "The brass is terrified you'll release the footage of the shooting just to spite them."

"Can't say that thought hasn't crossed my mind," you grinned at Jesse. "Especially if they continue to bother my very good friend here."

"Or I might do it myself," Jesse said. "Get Ziv to set it to music. Remix it a few times. Maybe add sound effects."

"Uh...Agent Mihret is going to be at this meeting, isn't he?" Brant laughed nervously, looking extremely uncomfortable.

"Of course he is. He's one of our best technicians," Jesse said cheerfully. "But don't worry, we'll protect you. You're our guest, and we take better care of our guests than the feebs," Jesse smirked. "Anyway, Mihret's the one we set on door-to-door salesmen, proselytizers, and politicians."

The three of you walked down the hall, Brant in the middle.

"We have better food than you too," you said. "Like way better. You can get some after the meeting."

Brant rubbed the back of his neck. "Just out of curiosity, are you planning to release the footage? I mean, that's your call, but I'd like a heads up."

"You know, I'm still making up my mind," you lied, because you did not need the media scrutiny and Lacroix wasn't going to embarrass the FBI, yet. "If they're worried, your higher-ups should send you to talk me out of it," you laughed. "Bring cake."

Brant sighed, shaking his head. "I'm not even supposed to be here, though the Senator picked me up on the way out. Otherwise I would have had to sneak out of the country, and that would have been a nuisance."

You raised a brow. "Don't you have access to high level fake IDs?"

"I'm a profiler," he scowled at you. "Serial killers, remember? Not international intrigue!"

"But it's fun, right? Less mommy issues and more "holy fuck, who let that crazycake run anything larger than a popsicle stand?" You grinned at him, noting that he didn't actually deny having access to good fake IDs.

"The body count is higher, that's for sure," Brant said, shaking his head. "I'm...adjusting. I kind of just feel like a fish out of water."

"Choking and gasping for breath? Because that could be an allergic reaction," Jesse said, winking.

Brant shook his head. "I'm behind the learning curve. This is pretty far removed from my specialty. That's partially the reason the Bureau says they don't want me working this." He said that last part reluctantly, because it was clear that was the only legitimate reason they had to hold him back. But honestly? That wasn't good enough.
"I bet Lacroix would make that a condition. We don't talk to anyone, except Agent Gingerbread Brant," you said.

"I thought it was Carrot Cake," Jesse said, a shit-eating grin on his face.

"Whatever," you shrugged, winking at him. Because annoyed Agent Brant was adorably hilarious, and making fun of him would make him less nervous about being around Gabriel and Ziv.

"Is your middle name "Rick?" Because if it is-" Jesse began to laugh.

"I put my career on the line, snuck out of the country, and came to Zurich for this?" Brant rolled his eyes upward.

"You know, I figured you'd get a promotion or something. Between the interagency life preserver you threw them, the civilian rescues, and all those jewels you returned, you're due some rewards."

"Oh, I look great on paper," Brant said, giving you the side eye. "I'm up for several commendations, and I got a nice raise. But they're trying to shuffle me off to the sidelines. I've embarrassed some people, even if we did give them a face-saving measure. And they're afraid I'm going rogue."

"Aren't you?" Jesse asked innocently. "I mean, you hitched a ride with a senator to a super secret meeting called to handle a high level conspiracy that spans several international agencies and governments."

"And you're hanging out with a couple of criminal Blackwatch degenerates. Just you wait. Give us a few weeks and you'll be conducting counterterrorism raids like a pro, while telling the brass exactly where they can stuff their rules. We'll even get you a bigger gun."

Brant groaned as he covered both ears. "Stop tempting me, Satan."

You and Jesse just laughed even harder.

The Blackwatch conference room was packed. Jack, Gabriel, Ana, and Reinhardt sat at the head of the table, with Lacroix and Ziv handling most of the presentation. An Athena drone hovered in the corner. The newly-confirmed UN Undersecretary Kwento sat beside Senator Armstrong, the two chatting amiably. Lacroix's American allies were seated on the other side of Armstrong. To your surprise, General Singh and Captain DeVevo were there as well. The sniper winked at Jesse. You waved back. Lieutenant Jemison had a seat on the other side of the table and Genji and Hanzo next to her. You and Jesse headed over, Brant following you.

"Aren't you just a doll, Wendy?" General Singh grinned at you cockily, despite being the shortest man at the table. "You're so cute when you're not trying to be a ninja. Bet you look real nice in a dress."

"With all due respect, fuck off, General," you said cheerfully.

The room fell awkwardly silent, even as General Singh began to laugh, slapping his knees.
"That's how you do it, Vashtai. "With all due respect..." Ha! That was double fuck you very much!" He grinned at Captain DeVevo, and she just rolled her eyes, a faint smile on her lips. "Reyes sure knows how to pick'em."

"Military diplomacy," Kwento said to Armstrong. "Is its own highly counterintuitive branch of study."

"I am a fan of unorthodox strategies," Armstrong said, looking slightly amused by the exchange.

Gabriel smirked at you, but Lacroix gave you a sharp look. You sat back in your seat, getting a similar glare of disapproval from Hanzo.

"Relax," you told him. "That's what he told us to say if he was out of line."

"He did," Jesse said with a sincere nod. "I was there."

Genji was grinning behind his faceplate, you just knew by the crinkle of his eyes. But he didn't comment.

Hanzo just shook his head. "This is serious business. Treat it as such."

Brant looked a little green around the edges, his eyes darting between all the important people in the room. Jack, no, right now he was the Strike Commander, sat at the head of the table, his face all business. Captain Amari was on his right, Gabriel on his left. Reinhardt laughed at something Lieutenant Jemison said, shaking his head.

You didn't miss how the Silent Sister nodded at Brant, just like the CIA Douche pretended he wasn't there.

Lacroix cleared his throat. "I would like to thank you for coming today. If you're here, then you are already aware of the extensive cover-up the American government has pushed through regarding the events in DC last week."

The mood in the room sobered considerably.

"While we can't attribute all of that to a malicious conspiracy, we are plenty aware of high-level betrayal within their sovereign government." Lacroix had everyone's attention, and he began with the details he had compiled.

Washington DC had a strict no fly-over rule. But the cyborgs had been able to land small stealthed craft containing OR-14s onto two rooftops. Only two vehicles had gotten through, the rest of the attackers had come in with conventional transportation. But Lacroix had the somehow procured air traffic control logs, and the investigation was ongoing.

Each surviving intelligence community member had submitted their own report about which higher-ups had blocked their attempts to reach out to other agencies, as well as suspicious behavior within their own departments. Lacroix named names and displayed an organizational chart showing just how high up the obstruction went. In some places, it was pretty close to the top.

Lacroix also provided the transcript of Special Traitor Peters' interrogation, and you were just a little disappointed that he hadn't been allowed to hurt the guy. He didn't give up much that was new to you, and it seemed everyone agreed he was a fairly low-level pawn in the grand scheme of things. But he was a pawn who'd almost shot Jack. He wasn't walking away from this.
There were memos from DC politicians and presidential cabinet members, pursuing hostile angles and trying to push the blame onto everyone else, especially Overwatch. They were asking a lot of questions too. Why were there unsupervised armed Overwatch agents in the capital? Could they have done this? Which agencies were monitoring the Overwatch presence? It was unlikely anything would come from most of their inquiries, unless someone tried to fabricate evidence, but it was good to be aware of the danger.

Director Petras had claimed it was a shame the Strike Commander couldn't do more, while taking the US government to task for not giving Overwatch more resources to operate. It was a shitty trick: throw Jack under the bus, while strengthening his own position. But it hadn't worked out so well. Jack's approval ratings were still high, especially in light of little Du from Beechwood Elementary, telling every reporter who would listen how the Strike Commander, the Superhero, and the pretty FBI lady had saved her from the terrorists. Her teacher and classmates corroborated your involvement in the story. People were still looking for the "pretty FBI lady," but the FBI was keeping a tight lid on that story, neither confirming nor denying that this mysterious agent worked for them. But it was obvious that they were reluctant to give up the good press. You almost hoped they would produce a ringer; if they did you might have to show up and shred their story, one massive plot hole at a time.

Lacroix went on to cover the meteoric rise of Luminescent Holdings and the close family link between Amara Korpal and the Vishkar Korpals, whose clan allied with Talon. He speculated on the escape of Richard Prince, and his ties to Anh Nguyen.

The Shimada brothers had managed to trace the extremely convoluted flow of money through offshore accounts, Swiss banks, blockchain currency, and a myriad of other roundabout routes. Before the attack, the analysts had been tipped off by the large amounts of money being moved around. But that had been only a fraction of the money used to finance the catastrophe. Genji and Hanzo were digging up more sources as they investigated.

On a side note, you were really going to have to ask Genji to help you invest for retirement, provided you lived that long. Actually, Hanzo might be good at that too. Investing for retirement seemed exactly the kind of boring shit he'd be into.

Lacroix also gave a quick presentation on the Organic Life Defense League, and its troubled anti-government roots. While the members were religious extremists, homegrown terrorists, and batshit insane, they didn't have the skill to plan this level of attack, something that became readily apparent when you read their manifestos. They didn't even have the skill to use spell-check. No, the US government wouldn't be able to fool the public for very long, not without instituting some insidious gag orders. You wondered if Lacroix was grooming a particular press organization for the leak.

After Lacroix presented the less-classified sum of Overwatch's findings, the guests around the table each added to the pool of information.

Armstrong had names, ranks, and political affiliations for two dozen people involved in the cover-up. He also named a few more civilians - PAC donors, corporate sponsors, and other special interest lobbyists who might be involved.

The CIA Douche, who just went by "Hopper," had an updated route of Talon shipping routes and ports of call. He also had been tracking Nguyen, something Lacroix and Athena were doing as well. Though he was privy to details they'd missed: namely three days ago, Nguyen had slipped out of an IMF meeting in Nice, France to Monaco for a very quick visit to a familiar casino. There were pictures of her speaking to Maximilien, the dapper omnic.
You really needed to pay him a visit.

General Singh gave you an update on the prisoners that had been taken, not including Special Agent Peters. The cyborgs literally weren't talking, and had lapsed into a vegetative state. The attending physicians suspected some had suffered some kind of neural overload, intentionally-triggered by the architects of the attack.

Captain DeVevo had been part of a team that might have accidentally ended up in the Caribbean, tracking a surviving cyborg who had not yet been fried. He wasn't in great shape, but she had full confidence that a certain Lieutenant Salazar could charm some answers out of him, possibly with a knife, maybe some military-grade cake. She winked at you, and you didn't miss Gabriel's frown. You winked back anyway.

Poor Brant gave an embarrassed update about FBI politics and how he had been stonewalled. But no one here questioned his involvement in the investigation. Baby face or not, Brant had earned his right to sit at the table. Armstrong said he would see what he could do, his expression thunderous throughout the entire explanation on Brant's sidelining.

But it was the NSA Silent Sister who had the most interesting development. Apparently, she could talk, and she had a wonderfully melodic voice. Her name was Nikita, and she had found Richard Prince. She played a video of him strolling along on a boardwalk in some backwater village in southeast England. You recognized him immediately. He was a big man, with broad shoulders, a shaved head, and two massive metal arms.

According to her sources, he was still there, lying low, and wouldn't you like to go get him?

You and Jesse exchanged unpleasant smiles, while Genji raised his brow at you and Hanzo gave you a sideways look.

Oh, you would love to go get him. And you even had volunteers.

Chapter End Notes

Sorry about the late update, was watching stuff with people and lost track of time. Work is getting increasingly nightmarish, BUT my interview went well, I think, and I'll hear back this week about whether or not this company wants to hire me. It's a data entry position, and second shift, but the pay is way better than what I have now, and the manager seemed to like me? IDK. I'm very hopeful. Thanks for the good wishes guys.

We're coming up on the one year anniversary and I'm kind of shocked. I'm also really unsure of how this word count is going to go.
Chapter 98

Chapter Summary

All in a day's work.

Chapter Notes

So, I know the story was actually posted 10/22, but I began work on IAL October 11, 2017.

Drafts are now past 750k.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

"Did...that person just glare at us and shut their blinds?" Jesse asked, scratching his head. "We were just walking by. Looking normal." Jesse looked at you. "Am I missing something?"

"Beats me," you said, adjusting the comm unit in your hair. "Any thoughts, Tintin?"

Lacroix snorted, his disdain clear over the comm channel. "Small town Englishmen don't like new things. Or foreign things. And definitely not new foreign things. Also you don't smell like stale beer, drudgery, and that peculiar emotional malaise that they are all born with, so they know you don't belong."

You blinked, a little taken back by his vitriol.

"Well," Jesse said. "That makes this an odd place for Prince to hang out."

"I thought so too," Lacroix said, slowly. "Keep your eyes open, Madeline, Paddington."

You shook your head, really wondering about Lacroix's codenaming practices. Jesse just wrinkled his nose and adjusted his raincoat. The two of you were in drab rural clothes, lots of grays and navy blues, sensible shoes, nothing too flashy.

"How big of a trap do you think it is?" You asked, glancing at the rooftops. None of the buildings were over three stories here, some of them dating back easily over a few hundred years. You understood preserving nice things for centuries. But this town in East Anglia was not one of those things.

"Big enough," Jesse muttered, and the two of you ducked into a Tesco to pick up some snacks.

You would not accuse the clerk of being friendly, but you needed caffeine and sugar, so you put up with the resentful stares, starting to wonder if the whole town was somehow in on this. What if they were all cyborg killers? Boring rural-looking cyborgs? You eyed the clerk suspiciously, but she'd already turned her head and was pretending to read a magazine so she didn't have to talk to you.
Shaking your head, you took your coffee drinks and prepackaged cookies, and headed toward the beach. It wasn't an inviting beach with sunshine, sexy bathing suits, or people having fun. There wasn't sand, only discolored gravel and choppy gray waves. There were plaques commemorating the war dead, though you weren't entirely sure which war. Shaking your head, you opened your cookies and nibbled at them, noticing the sharp interest the sea gulls took in your food.

"It's like a horror movie," Jesse murmured in your ear. "You think they plan on sacrificing us to their dark gods?"

"I think there's a high probability of that," you said, staring at the unfriendly sea. "Save us each a bullet, just in case."

Jesse snorted. "We can take this whole town if we need to, sweetpea."

"Yeah, but why would we want it?" You muttered.

"I think it's perfectly respectable," Hanzo said over the comms. "It's very quaint, picturesque even."

"That's because you're not interacting with the locals, Babar," you said, rolling your eyes.

"You're as much a foreigner as me," Jesse said with a laugh. "And they don't look too kindly on foreigners here."

"My brother romanticizes small town life," Genji said. "He views it as idyllic and charming." Genji's dry tone further implied, "And isn't he boring and terribly wrong?"

You laughed, strolling around the boardwalk, where Prince had been sighted two days ago. It was pretty clear you couldn't really ask the townsfolk for any help. You were going in fairly blind, though there were discrete Athena bug-cams flying around, taking in the lay of the land.

"So, if you were going to settle down," Jesse began, turning off the mic on his comm unit. "Would it be somewhere like this?"

You shrugged. "I hope not."

"You like big city life more? Desert skies? Mountain air? Ocean breeze?"

You shrugged again. "Going to need trees. Big sturdy trees."

Jesse scratched his head, and then had to adjust his knit cap. "You like trees?"

"Guest treehouse," you said. "Figured you and Genji might like it. Ziv would bitch at first, but I think he'd really enjoy it too."

Jesse snorted. "You going to live in a treehouse too?"

"Nah, Jack and Gabriel want a real house, with big rooms," you said, feeling awkward mentioning this to someone else. You stared up at the gray sky. "Sewing room for Gabriel, garden for Jack, playroom for Isha." You bit your lip, wondering if you should be sharing this with anyone.

"And probably a big ole gym," Jesse said, shaking his head. "The boss has an insane workout routine."
You nodded. Jack did too. You'd tried, on several occasions, to keep up with them, but you couldn't match their core strength or endurance.

"So I'm invited over?"

"Of course," you said, rolling your eyes.

"Because sometimes I get the feeling the Strike Commander doesn't approve of me-"

You shrugged. "You do like needling him. But what's that got to do with anything? You'd be my guest, and you get to stay in the treehouse."

"Invite Ziv and you'll make both their heads explode."

"I don't mind inviting Ziv, but you'll be sharing the treehouse with him."

"Oh no, forget I said anything," Jesse groaned, though his smile took up half his face.

You were halfway back to the hotel when your comm crackled to life.

"Prince has an old girlfriend here. She was a Royal Marine turned mercenary," Lacroix said. "We have surveillance on her house. Lights are off. No one's picking up any calls, and there's no active net connection that we can find."

You glanced at Jesse. He was frowning, hands playing at his belt.

"Too easy," Jesse muttered. "Prince is no amateur. He wouldn't go somewhere that could be linked back to him. Why would he hole up at an ex-girlfriend's place?"

"Was their relationship common knowledge?" You asked.

"No," Lacroix said. "But Paddington is correct." There was a long pause. "Lieutenant Ranya Chokshi hasn't been to work in three days. This is her parents' residence. Her parents' grocery shop has been closed since last week."

"Hostage situation?" Jesse mused.

"No, they're dead," you said, recalling the thoroughness of Prince's DC attack. "Or close to it."

"There have been several assault and battery charges in Prince's past," Lacroix said. "Some of those were for domestic abuse and violating restraining orders."

"You think he's still in the house?"

"Did he come back here to settle a score? Or did something else go wrong?" Jesse mused. "What are we walking into?"

"Hold on," Lacroix said. "Brant might have some insight. He is a profiler after all."

You and Jesse returned to your hotel room, intent on changing out of your drab local wear. There was no point trying to blend in. The locals recognized that you weren't one of them. Just like they would recognize Prince wasn't one of them. You pulled up a map. There was a local pub three blocks away. The beginnings of an idea formed. You changed into a tight red t-shirt and jeans.

You pulled up a summary on Ranya Chokshi. Her parents had lived here over a decade. She'd joined the military straight out of school. You had a passable RP accent when you tried, but that might sound too posh here. You could brush up on your Estuary accent, but you weren't sure if you could pull it off indefinitely, so you'd have to make this quick. England had a ridiculous number of regional dialects and people seemed to know immediately if you weren't from their particular patch of village.

Jesse raised a brow. "What are you thinking about?"

"Having a pint on my own," you said, testing the accent. It wasn't full on cockney, but it dropped some of the "t" sounds.

Jesse frowned.

"Too much?"

"You won't be mistaken for a local, but it might work," he said gracefully not commenting on the authenticity, not that he could. You'd heard his Italian accent before and it was atrocious.

"What's your plan?"

So you told him, practicing your working class accent, the entire time.

You sat down alone at the bar. It was an old building, all wood and dim lighting that had seen better days decades ago. There was some football paraphernalia on the wall, it seemed more like a half-hearted attempt at decorating than true sports fanaticism.

The chatter stopped when you walked in, and remained awkwardly silent even as you sat down.

It took the bartender almost ten minutes to reluctantly come over to you, though the pub was by no means busy.

He was an older man, liver-spotted and frowning, with only wisps of hair to warm the top of his head. He just stared blankly at you.

"A pint of lager and a packet of crisps," you said, sliding your money across the bar. "And have one on me." It wasn't an outrageous bribe, just enough of a tip to get the barman's interest, but he gave you a long slow blink, before taking your money and walking away.

You waited another ten minutes for him to return with a room temperature beer and an expired bag of potato chips. Apparently, he thought if he was slow enough, you'd walk out. They were "gammon" flavored chips, which you'd just take back for Jesse. Expiration dates were just suggestions after all. You took a drink of the beer and were not impressed.

The barman turned away, obviously not liking being seen with you.

"I came down to visit my old lieutenant. Ranya Chokshi. Her parents have a shop on the high street," you said, trying to sound casual.
The barman stopped, grunted, and looked at you for the first time.

"But it's been closed since I got here," you said.

He shrugged, still not keen on continuing this conversation.

"Have to admit, I'm concerned," you said, lowering your voice. "She has an old boyfriend, an American, that's been bothering her. They didn't part on good terms. He damn near kicked her dog to death," you said, unsure if domestic violence would be taken seriously here. But everyone loved dogs.

The barman's mouth flattened. "Bastard."

"She didn't want to see him again. But heard he suddenly showed up, and some of us came to check up on her. Now she's not answering her mobile." You weren't sure if your accent was convincing, but everyone was listening.

There was a pause.

"Big, unfriendly, metal arms?" One of the men at a table asked, cap pulled low over his eyes.

You nodded. "That's him."

"Wind your neck in," one of the other men hissed.

"Seen him yesterday," the man with the hat, shaking his head. "Been faffing about the wharf. He's holed up in one of the beach cottages." You'd seen the colorfully painted sheds by the ocean, though they hadn't looked big enough to fit Prince.

You nodded thoughtfully and finished your beer. "Next round's on me," you said, sliding another note across the bar. The men muttered something among themselves, their hostile looks going down a notch to just "suspicious."

You nodded politely and made your way out, unwilling to further test your luck or your accent.

"Either they're not home or they're dead," Lacroix told you over the comms. It was dark out, and you had changed into your armor. "Athena drones have spotted no signs of life. Brant says whoever goes in should check for explosives and traps."

That sounded right.

You and Jesse waited in the dark, Genji taking point, and Hanzo keeping his distance, since he was an idjit who insisted on fighting with a bow.

Athena had hacked the rental database, and found most of the shacks were empty, which was odd because it wasn't quite the off-season yet. But one cabin booked to a "Dick King." You were now absolutely certain that Richard Prince was fucking with you, or that the cybridization process killed off massive amounts of brain cells.

An Athena drone confirmed that yes, indeed, Prince was in his cabin. You switched on your night vision visor. You wanted Prince alive. So you had your EMP stun baton and your pressure injectors primed.

"Moving out," Jesse said.

Athena cut the power to the beach huts. The area flickered into darkness, and for a moment all you could hear was the roar of the ocean. Genji moved swiftly across the gravel, smashing through the flimsy wooden door, and then pulling back, giving Jesse time to toss a flashbang through the entryway.

"Don't move!" Jesse shouted, and you shielded your eyes, your decibel blockers protecting your ears.

You counted to three, then you were up. Prince was on his feet, and you charged forward, smashing your stun rod into his left arm, releasing an EMP pulse. Sparks flew and he swore, upper body spasming as he dropped to his knees. You struck him across the head, and he wobbled. But in the darkness, you could see him smiling wide, a deranged grin. Snarling, you jammed your prosthetic finger into his the side of his neck, sedative pouring into his bloodstream.

He fell forward, and you didn't catch him. Instead you eyed the area behind him. There was a harsh chemical smell, and something rolled out of his hand, even as you began dragging him out. It clicked, and you swore, recognizing a deadman's switch.

But Jesse and Genji were with you, and their reflexes were well-honed. Grabbing you by the collar, Jesse threw you into the water, following close behind. Genji used Prince as a shield as the shack blew sky high, showering the beach in wood, metal, and vinyl siding. Worse, an entire chain reaction began: the half a dozen surrounding beach huts went up in a mess of fire, improvised explosives, and cheap building materials.

Then the lights flickered back on, an Orca dropship hovering over the beach, and it was a beautiful sight: streamlined metal, beacons lit up, thrusters alight and ready go. Genji hoisted the slightly charred and still unconscious Prince over his shoulder.

"Did you fools not see the explosives?" Hanzo shouted as he stomped across the beach, glaring at Genji.

And all the three of you could do was laugh, even as the smoke scraped your lungs.

Though no civilians were injured in the explosion, the four of you still got a dressing down from Lacroix. The English were very unhappy about this incursion into their sovereign territory. Fortunately, they had no real proof. Though after an "anonymous tip," they sent a bomb squad to the Chokshi residence and found it heavily booby-trapped, the entire family several days dead.

The Americans suspected that you had someone important and were demanding updates. The FBI had the nerve to actually call in and ask questions about the progress of the investigation. So Lacroix very smugly requested the presence of a certain Special Agent Lugh Brant, and asked them to handle the English, before signing off.

"He knew we were coming," you said, sitting down after Jesse and the Shimada brothers had been dismissed.

"That much is apparent," Lacroix said, sharply, frowning as you leaned back in the chair. Your hair was still dirty with brackish seawater and you were getting it on his nice clean furniture.
"But I don't think it was a last stand. It was not...dramatic enough for a man of his skills. Killing the Chokshis was unfinished business, and I'm sure we'll find something there, but..."

"But he wanted us to find him," Lacroix said, his eyes studying the reports on his desk. "I know, Chanceux. I don't like it either."

"Should we have taken him alive?" You wondered.

"Maybe not," Lacroix admitted. "Because we cannot kill him, now that the Americans know that we have him in custody."

You tapped your fingers against the chair. "We need to make sure his guards are specially cleared."

"I suppose it may come as a surprise to you, but I have not rooted out every single traitor in the organization," Lacroix said, coolly. "But yes, he is under very tight restriction, with Athena keeping extra eyes on him, his guards, and his cell. He will have no communication with the outside world."

You sat there, still uneasy. "Do you think someone will try to jailbreak him?"

"I think he will try to get himself out," Lacroix said. "An operative of his caliber is skilled enough that it is a real risk."

You sat there. "Are you going to share that list of known traitors and collaborators?"

Lacroix pursed his lips. "What makes you think I have not?"

"I don't think Gabriel and Captain Amari know how extensive your list is," you said. "Because you're secretive to a fault."

Lacroix folded his hands. "You are partially correct. I have shown Ana. It is not that I do not trust Gabriel, but I am running a long operation; it is easier to do without interference."

"Or oversight," you smirked.

Lacroix gave that Gallic shrug. "As you say. Athena, access file Revenant Gun, under clearance Ultramarine, Priority Degas."

Lacroix handed you his tablet. "This does not leave this room, and it is by no means comprehensive."

You nodded, skimming the list of names. Most of the people you didn't know very well; you recognized their names and could possibly place their department, but they weren't in your circle.

But one name stood out to you.

"Bruce Riggs?" You blinked. The earnest hacker who'd sent you flowers when you were incapacitated? Who wrote you saccharine pep talks in cards? The one whose mother sent him cookies on a weekly basis? That Riggs?

"He has special chats with the Director," Lacroix said. "He probably isn't aware of the harm he's done. But if you want to know who Petras' ears are in Blackwatch, it's Riggs. Ziv keeps him on nonessential servers, citing protocol, and for the most part the boy follows it."

You blinked, a little shocked. Honestly, there wasn't much you could do with the list right now. You knew better than to treat any of the people differently or track them yourself. But there were two dozen people on it, and you knew most of them.

"My biggest concerns are Sakai in InSec, Vander Meer in HR, Schneider in the European analyst group, and Bakker in dispatch." Lacroix shook his head. "Is your curiosity satisfied? Or are you secretly friends with one of them?"

You shook your head. "No. But you already knew that."

Lacroix inclined his head in acknowledgement. "Sakai has been trying to talk to Hanzo. I am going to ask you to discourage that without giving up the game."

And there it was, the real reason Lacroix shared the list with you. "I can do that," you said. "Do you know her angle?"

"She is just being friendly," he said dryly.

"To Hanzo? Now that is suspicious," you laughed.

You headed back to your room for a shower. When you opened the door, Isha had broken out of her kennel, and was playing with her tablet. She chirped at you, then went back to drawing. You still weren't entirely sure what she making, and if it really was art, but it kept her out of trouble.

You patted her head, not quite buying the casual act. At first glance, nothing seemed out of place, which was a good sign. She hadn't had any accidents, and it looked like your belongings were intact. Noticing some claw marks on the vent, you popped it open, and she squeaked, before dropping her tablet and running under the bed.

Inside were several empty chip bags, a large gold chain, half a dozen of your socks, and a headless mouse. You just stared, not entirely sure what you had discovered.

"Isha, did you steal this?" You asked, holding up the chain, because it wasn't yours, and it was real gold. You wondered if she'd lifted it from Amélie's quarters, then realized Amélie would never own such a tacky piece.

She didn't respond.

Shaking your head, you pulled the stuff out of the vent, and replaced the cover. You threw the wrappers and dead mouse away, and tossed your socks in your laundry hamper. Then you got on your hands and knees and stuck your head under the bed. Isha was huddled against the wall, eyeing you suspiciously.

"Come on, you can't go stealing other people's stuff. Where'd you get this?" You asked. "Was it Tataryn...?" You trailed off, narrowing your eyes as Isha tried to look nonchalant. "Come out. I can't talk to you like this," you scowled.

She tuck her head under her wing, pretending to be sleepy.
"Come on. I have mutton jerky and those dried dates you like." Ziv had gotten her hooked on dates and figs, but figs had a very unfortunate digestive effect.

She peeked out from behind her wing, making a faint thrumming sound.

"I'm honestly more upset about the mouse," you said. "Come on."

She crawled out from under the bed, giving you a wary look. You got down the metal box you now stored treats in, wondering if it would be empty when you opened it.

It was still half full, but you could have sworn it was three quarters full when you left for England. Shaking your head, you pulled out a piece of jerky and a few dates. You sat down on the bed, and lifted your bad raptor up and set her beside you. She cooed, rubbing her head on your hand, while reaching for a date.

You petted her head, unsure of what you should be doing.

"Do you need a secret stash?" You asked, trying to figure out what was going on in your murderbird's head. "Like a safe spot to put your things? Do you want a box, like this one?" You pointed at snack one.

She made a noncommittal noise.

"Or do you like using the vent because it's hidden?"

She just took another date from you.

"Because the vent is a terrible hiding spot. That's where every professional looks," you continued. "The vent, under the mattress, the undersides of drawers. Everyone knows to look there."

Isha cocked her head to the side, looking worried.

"If you're stealing things, you don't hide them in our room," you said dryly. "And don't hide them in other people's rooms where they might get accidentally discovered or blamed. So it's very important that you don't use Jack or Gabriel's bedrooms to stash your ill-gotten goods."

Isha stared at her date and you knew you'd have to discretely check your lovers' quarters too.

"You could use ceiling tiles in lesser-traveled hallways," you said, not really sure if she understood that. "You can use hard to reach vents, outside my room. You can dig a hole in the woods and bury things." You gave her a look. "But you don't need to." You handed her the gold chain. It was heavy, but she gripped it in her mouth. "Did you get that from Tataryn?"

She just carried the chain to your bathroom and you blinked as she pulled loose a ceramic wall tile and dropped the necklace in the hole.

You peeked inside, slightly alarmed to see candy, a single sapphire earring, and oddly enough, a whistle.

"OK, that's a better hiding spot at least," you said, massaging your forehead.

She bobbed her head, chirping happily at you.

"I don't recognize that earring. You're not stealing from anyone here, are you?" You asked.
Isha stared up at you blankly.

"If you're stealing from those people Tataryn took you to visit and poop in their houses, fair enough. But no stealing from my coworkers, OK?"

Isha thrummed happily, rubbing her head against your ankle, and you shook your head, knowing then that you would be a terrible parent.

After your shower, you curled up in bed, your raptor nesting down by your feet. She normally didn't sleep in your bed, but now that she could jailbreak herself, you wondered if it would be worth the fight. Since she was housebroken, maybe it wasn't a big deal? You were going to have to ask Tataryn about where that damn jewelry came from, and Durga help him if he was using your murderbird in jewel heists.

You awoke to a knock on your door, having fallen asleep on top of the covers. Yawning, you got up, noting that Isha was nestled on your blankets, looking far too comfortable. A glance through the peephole let you know it was Gabriel, and you opened the door.

Dressed down in sweats and a hoodie, Gabriel gave you a tired smile. You stepped aside so he could come in and shut the door, before giving him a quick kiss.

"Thought you were still in Geneva," you said, lingering against his chest.

"Got done early. Didn't want to stay the night," he said with a yawn. He took a look at your hoodie, jerked his chin up, and grinned. "A little big on you, isn't it?"

It was one of his, and you shrugged, not admitting to stealing anything. Unlike Isha, you were just borrowing it. "It's comfy."

Gabriel just kissed your nose. "I don't mind, corazon." He gave you a big grin. "There's plenty more where that came from."

You tucked your hands in the oversized pockets. "What's up?"

"Jack's on his way back from Athens. Finished formalizing the new strategy for the omnic issues over there. He should be home soon." Gabriel yawned, his gaze falling on Isha. "So the little sneak is sleeping your bed now?"

You sighed. "The kennel won't hold her any more."

"Well, at least she's housebroken now," Gabriel said. You half expected a lecture about "no dinosaurs or murderbirds on the bed," but Gabriel sat down and stroked her snout. She cooed and opened one eye, on little hand reaching out to grip his fingers. A soft smile tugged at the corner of his lips and he shook his head fondly at her. Gabriel stretched out on your bed, and Isha shifted to the pillows, bedding down right by his head. He didn't protest, just reached up to pet her, while murmuring Spanish endearments. You slid in beside him, laughing as he squeezed you against his chest. The bed wasn't quite big enough for the three of you, but you made it work.

You awoke again to the door opening, and this time it was Jack, wearing sweats as well, his hood up. You glanced over at Gabriel who just laughed and helped you pile the blankets and pillows on the floor.
Jack gave you each a kiss, Isha included. Gabriel ended up in the middle, with you trying to be the big spoon, and Jack hugging him and Isha.

It was cramped, silly, and far less comfortable than their beds. But no one complained. And you were out cold a few minutes later.

You caught Hanzo as he was heading to the gym. You just fell in line beside him, acting real casual. He gave you a sharp look, not buying your performance at all.

"So I wanted to give you a heads up." You looked around and lowered your voice. "There's this chick that has a robot fetish, and she's been into Genji for awhile. It's kind of creepy, but she hasn't actually violated any policies, though we've had words with her."

Hanzo stiffened. "What?" He hissed.

"We usually just ignore her, you know." You shrugged. "It's just something to be aware of."

Hanzo looked around, eyes wide, mouth open. He was utterly scandalized, and you had to smother a laugh. "Who?"

You pretended to struggle for a name. "She's in InSec. Uh...ex-IDF," you said. "Sakai, I think?"

Hanzo narrowed his eyes. "...I see. I know of this...person. I will tell her to keep her perverse ways far from my little brother!" Righteous fury burned in Hanzo's voice, and to be honest, you were a little scared.

"No, no, no, no," you said, shaking your head. "That's a terrible idea. Genji will totally resent your interference, and the two of you will get into it, and then you'll start shouting and it will be bad."

"I do not shout!" Hanzo said loudly, then winced and lowered his voice.

"Anyway, we run interference for him when he needs it. Just figured you'd like to know. You know, in case you see us acting weird around her. We try not to encourage her to...linger."

"I see," Hanzo said, stroking his chin. "And Genji has...no interest in her?"

"I don't think Genji likes being a fetishized," you said with a shrug. "You know, if she liked him for him, fair enough. But she's just into his metal parts, you know?"

"No, no you are correct," Hanzo said. "I understand. I will be vigilant. Genji deserves better." He stared off into the distance, a severe frown taking his expression from disapproving straight to absolutely constipated. He was thinking bad thoughts.

You paused then, wondering if you'd made a terrible error in judgment. "OK, good chat. I'll see you later," you squeaked, and headed off to warn Genji.

"You did what?" Genji asked flatly, staring at you. He was still in his Pachimari pajamas, the onion octopus beaming at you, and it was kind of adorable.
"I might have told Hanzo that Agent Sakai is a cyborg fetishist, and has been creeping on you, so that he'll avoid her."

Genji groaned. "Why would you do that? She was going to take him out for noodles. I thought he finally made a friend..." He paused, and then looked at you, the light flickering on his head. "Shit Spiders?"

"Yeah," you said regretfully, wondering if you needed to explain this to Lacroix. "Your brother isn't cleared for that information and...well, I was asked to take care of it...discretely."

Genji gave you sardonic look. "Discretely?"

"Yeah, so I botched that. I was going for maximum efficiency," you said, unrepentant of your error in judgment. "Anyway, this story is kind of funny."

Genji just gave you the hairy eyeball. "I will play along," he said. "But you owe me lunch."

"I was just getting ready to make yakisoba. Want to tag along?"

"Yes," Genji said, yawning. "I want prawns, and cabbage, and extra fried egg..."

"Done," you said, relieved that his cooperation had come at a reasonable rate.

Chapter End Notes

...Some of the smalltown English stuff is based on my own experience. I do not have a convincing English accent though.

Second job interview for the same job tomorrow. I am between "Oh I passed the first, I should do fine on the second, maybe?" And "OMFG I'M NOT EVEN HALFWAY THROUGH?" Ahem. I appreciate all the good wishes. Thank you very much. I am going to buy Assassin's Creed Odyssey after the interview, and possibly go to dinner with a friend, as celebration/consolation. Because I was hoping to buy the game earlier (when I got news that I did/didn't get the job), but the waiting obviously has been extended.

Ranger is going back to the vet because he has a weird skin condition and I'm all "...I better get this job so I can take care of my stupid dogs with their expensive problems."

Hope everyone is holding up all right.
Chapter 99

Chapter Summary

All you know is that nothing is quite what it seems.

Chapter Notes

Annie_Drew did a comic from Chapter 61. Smug Jack is very smug!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Even manacled to the chair in the interrogation chamber, prosthetic arms removed, Richard Prince was a large man, and his presence filled the room. He smiled widely at the two way mirror, the bruises and broken teeth only highlighting the mockery in his expression. Up close, he had a boxer's face, the impression aided by his black eye, crooked nose, and the fact you just really wanted to punch him.

Winston and Angela had managed to disable parts of his augments, while leaving his neural functions intact. You had considered asking Athena to immobilize him, but Winston told you that wouldn't be necessary, and had added that the experience with Lao had been unpleasant for her. He didn't go into detail, and he wasn't angry at you, but you understood the reprimand. You wouldn't mention anything of the sort to Athena.

Jack, Lacroix, Captain Amari, and Kwento were all sitting in on this one. Gabriel would be handling the questioning. You had some guests too. Captain DeVevo, Nikita from the NSA, and Hopper the CIA Douche had all stuck around after that first information-sharing meeting. Genji and Hanzo weren't coming, but Jesse and Ziv showed up.

Brant had gone back to DC with Senator Armstrong's entourage the same day, but today two representatives from the FBI showed up, and one of them was a ridiculously youthful redhead in a suit that actually fit him. The second man was one of his higher-ups, because they had to send someone to rein Brant in. The man was large in height and width. He could be described as blonde, though there was really a lot more exposed skin than hair. Most noticeably, he had lips so thin that you first thought he was trying to work his dentures back in place, but he was a little young for dentures and that was just how his face was made. He kept glaring at Brant, but to your surprise, Brant just responded with wintry smiles and what looked like cutting, even-tempered comments. At least that's what you got from trying to lip read the security cam footage. Agent Casano, Brant's personal burden, just seemed to get more and more agitated.

Having over a dozen people in the observation room was going to be very crowded. And it was going to feel worse with all the prickly people sprinkled throughout.

Jesse and Ziv stuck to your side, and Jack gave you a wry sidelong glance, his place between Lacroix and Captain Amari. Kwento made a few comments to Lacroix and he reassured her that while the events might not be entirely legal, there would be no torture. DeVevo, Hopper, and Nikita stood off to the side. Nikita looked unapproachable and cool, and Hopper just looked unapproachable.

The FBI agents entered last, escorted in by a very unamused Lieutenant Jemison. Jemison nodded at you, before hastily leaving the room, either because she didn't like the company, or because she was concerned that your bad luck would rub off on her. It was probably that particular FBI agent. Probably.

"Agent Brant," Lacroix stepped forward and offered his hand. "We're glad you and your...guest could make it."

"I am Special Agent-in-Charge Christopher Casano," his companion said sharply. "And I'm the authority here, not Agent Brant."

"Yes," Lacroix said, "Good for you. Brant, do you have any additions to make?" He held up a tablet. "Commander Reyes and I reviewed the questions, but perhaps you can address the Chokshi angle?"

"The profile is...abnormal, even for the circumstances," Brant said, thoughtfully.

"What's abnormal about it?" Casano snapped. "He's a violent terrorist who went on to kill his ex-girlfriend and her family. It's not some kind of mystery to unravel. Is this how you waste your time in Overwatch?"

"This is good," Brant said, pointing at a line. "Try pulling more on that thread. Maybe have..." He looked around the room. "Maybe have Captain Amari step in beforehand. He has a type. She fits it. It might get pretty crude though." He gave the captain an apologetic look.

Lacroix nodded thoughtfully and glanced at the Captain. She nodded once.

"I have a few theories, given what you and Dr. Ziegler have told me, but I'd like to see how he reacts first," Brant said, brow furrowed.

Casano made a loud scoffing sound.

"We've seen similar...issues in a certain type of case," Lacroix said, purposefully not going into detail. "You have a good eye for-"

"Can you stop sucking each other dicks and just get to work?" Casano snapped.

Jack's shoulders tensed, and Captain Amari flexed her fingers. Ziv stiffened beside you, while Jesse rested one hand on his hip. The disrespect was directed at Lacroix, sure, but it was obvious that Casano was targeting Overwatch as a whole.

Your other guests watched with undisguised interest.

"Chanceux, if he interrupts once more, please remove him," Lacroix said, not deigning to look at Special-Agent-in-Charge Casano.

"With pleasure, sir," you said, giving Casano a nasty smile.

"My government will have something to say about this." Casano just turned and glared, clearly not recognizing you.

Probably an apology for sending a nitwit to such a sensitive event, but you weren't holding your breath.
"Commander Reyes is in the hall prepping," Lacroix said, touching his earpiece. "He approves of your suggestions."

Brant nodded.

Casano just glared at Brant.

You looked over your shoulder, a little surprised by how intently Vashtai, Nikita, and Hopper were watching Casano. Maybe they were embarrassed by his bad behavior. No, that wasn't it. Nikita and Hopper exchanged looks, DeVevo murmured something to Nikita, and all three of them smiled unpleasantly. Maybe they liked Brant more than they let on?

"Did you know his acronym is SAC?" Ziv murmured in your ear. "It's actually the official abbreviation for "Special Agent-in-Charge."

You smothered a snort.

Casano was ignoring you, his glare going between Lacroix and Brant. You caught Jack signaling you, one eyebrow arched questioningly, like he was worried about you and the FBI.

You just shook your head and he nodded once, trusting your call. Then he turned back around, to focus on the show.

Gabriel strode into the interrogation room, notes committed to memory. He wasn't dressed in any kind of uniform. He wore simple black fatigues with no rank markers, and that was intentional. Prince wasn't the kind of man who cared much for medals and patches. He found it too self-aggrandizing and respected efficiency to an extreme, arguably psychopathic degree, or so the little redhead FBI agent said. Gabriel wasn't exactly sure where that line of demarcation was, but with you and Jack at his side, he was a lot more careful about trying not to cross it.

Pulling up a chair, Gabriel sat down perpendicular to Prince, still staying at a higher position. He rested one boot on his knee in a figure four and waited.

Prince smiled sardonically at him. "Reyes."

"Prince," Gabriel said the name without anger or inflection. He knew what Prince had done. He'd seen the aftermath of the Metro attacks, the fresh dead in the museums, the crime scene photos from Ranya Chokshi's family home. The sheer waste of human life infuriated him. But feelings served little purpose here.

"We both know how this works. You're going to lay siege from whatever angle gives you the best vantage, and press me for all the information you can get. Names, dates, future attacks, my favorite whiskey. It's old hat, Reyes. I've taken apart so many people, I could walk you through this step by step, and you'd still fail."

Gabriel laughed. "Perhaps, but the challenge doesn't bother me. You know everyone has a breaking point. And maybe I'll push you past yours. It'd be a shame, but then I could console myself with some good old-fashioned revenge."

"Don't know what you think you're going to torture," Prince said, sounding almost gleeful.
"I'm already missing a good third of my body. Pain receptors don't work right any more either. Go ahead, cut me. There's a fifty-fifty chance that I won't feel it."

Prince had a smoker's voice, though Gabriel knew that Prince didn't indulge. He kept himself in prime condition. Smoking would be detrimental. Funny, Prince got that, but you and Jack still liked to sneak cigarettes and then thought he wouldn't notice. His frown deepened. It was time to focus on the task at hand. Because even if you and Jack were sitting in on the session, he didn't need to bring you here, into the muck of the interrogation room with him.

"You don't think I can find ways to hurt you?" Gabriel laughed without humor.

"Not as easily as I can hurt you," Prince laughed, sounding genuinely pleased. "You're tough, Reyes. Honestly didn't expect you to survive that attack on Black Base Delta. You sure do know how to inspire loyalty. How many of your agents died protecting you?" He leaned in, eyes gleaming, like he couldn't wait for Gabriel to react.

Gabriel gritted his teeth, but bottled up the feelings that started to surface, and just inclined his head back, waiting for the kicker.

"Ah, I remember one: your old mentor Captain Patel." Prince beamed, his jagged toothed smile hideous under the fluorescent lights. "Heard she was one-of-kind. A goddamn legend." Prince laughed, the sound harsh and terrible. "But then she retired, just a washed up old bitch. I respect how you played her. Brought her back, gave her something to fight for, and suddenly you had your old CO eating out of your hand. Bet that was useful."

Gabriel heard the familiar roar of blood in his ears, his vision narrowing down to the small crushable oval that was Prince's head, before he realized his fury. But he remained seated, teeth clenched. It had been nothing like that. Gabriel stayed very still, forcing himself to analyze Prince's words.

Prince's triumphant smile let him know he hadn't masked his emotions as well as he'd hoped. "So you're the one who planned that attack? How sloppy," Gabriel said coldly, voice flat, almost bored.

"Sloppy? You were the sole survivor, Reyes. What was it? Thirty four agents dead? You had to sweep it under the rug and write it off as an accident." Prince's shoulders shook from laughter, and Gabriel had to quash the urge to feed Prince his own teeth. Too many witnesses. Too much at risk. Too little to gain.

"But I wasn't," Gabriel said with a thin smile.

Prince cocked his head to the side. "Are you talking about that worm Gleeson?"

Gabriel's smile widened and he sat with his legs apart, elbows on his knees. "Commander Gleeson is listed as KIA," he said without batting an eye. "His remains were never recovered. So I can't really say what happened to Gleeson."

"You did," Prince breathed, teeth bared. "Well, color me impressed. And here we thought the coward had gotten smart and gone to ground. Nicely done."

"I was actually talking about Bái Shé," Gabriel said, though he'd meant for Prince to get the message. It just didn't need to be confirmed for all the other people in the observation room. He wasn't sure how much the American government knew about that attack. "Quite the piece of work there."
Prince shrugged. "If you like'em young. Do you Reyes?"

Gabriel just rolled his eyes in disgust. "Work is work, Prince. I expect you of all people to know that."

Prince smirked. "Doesn't mean you can't enjoy it. Are you noticing a theme yet, Reyes? Bái Shé survived. Gleeson survived. And you survived. What do you three have in common? Oh, let me see, Gleeson was a traitor. Bái Shé is one of ours. Maybe the Strike Commander should be concerned about you, Reyes. I mean, we did have order to take you alive if possible." Prince's voice took on a teasing tone. He sat there, secured, a prisoner with a vicious smile, and so awfully amused by his own cleverness that Gabriel wanted to slug him. But that wouldn't do much besides make him feel a little better. Might make you feel better too. Hell, after this, he'd give you a set of brass knuckles and let you go to town of Prince. The thought cheered him immensely, but Gabriel leaned back in his seat feigning indifference.

"I heard you thought I'd be sympathetic to your cause. Or weak-minded enough to sell out."

Prince shrugged. "Wasn't my idea. I thought we should put a bullet in your brain and leave you in the snow. My boss said her friends requested you alive if possible. She didn't care."

"Your boss. Ambassador Nguyen Anh?"

Prince gave him a sly look. "Yeah. Sure. And when you try to release this confession as evidence, it won't mean a thing. My boss could be Morrison. Or hell, the new undersecretary, Adaeze Kwento. I might even answer to Bái Shé."

Gabriel rolled his eyes, because while this kind of confession would not hold up in any court of law, that wasn't the point here. "So you planned the attack on Black Base Delta and DC?"

Prince smiled, lips pressed together, and he shook his head. "Now see, I'm not supposed to talk about DC. Heard it was homegrown terrorists. America does have a problem with disaffected young men going on rampages."

Gabriel shook his head. "Yeah, I've noticed. Speaking of such things, what exactly did Ranya do to upset you so?"

Prince's eyes bulged, cheeks puffing out, and his face grew more grotesque. "Bitch got what she had coming."

"For having bad taste in men?" Gabriel asked.

"It was her own fault. Should've stuck with me. I would have treated her right," Prince spat. "Some bitches don't know how good they have it."

Gabriel cocked his head to the side. "Really? Was being with you all rose petals and diamonds?"

Prince snorted. "Ranya wasn't that kind of girl. Yeah, she cleaned up right and had an ass you could bounce quarters off." He gave an almost wistful sigh. "But she was fun. She liked cars, rugby, and explosives. We were a good team for awhile."

"Till you joined up with Nguyen."

Prince's nostrils flared. "No, bitch just got pushy. It her way or the highway. This wasn't some beauty and beast story, Reyes. We fucked. She got too comfortable. I kicked her to the curb."

Gabriel made a noncommittal noise.

The door opened and Ana walked in. She had always been a good looking woman, especially in uniform. But that mix of power, beauty, and intelligence made her deadly, in the boardroom as much as the battlefield. She leaned over him, her back to Prince, the faint scent of amber tickling his nose.

"Well damn, the Captain Amari herself," Prince leered. "An ass that just won't quit and legs that go on for miles. You an ass man, Reyes?"

"Brant's recommendation," she said ignoring Prince and offering him a clipboard with some illegible notes scrawled on it.

Gabriel took a moment to pretend to read them, then handed it back. Her hair brushed his cheek, and Gabriel chuckled. "Thank you, Ana." He gave her a cheeky grin. "You're an angel."

"And still too good for the likes of you," she said with a wink, leaving with a little extra swagger.

Prince blew out a breath. "Seriously, Reyes. You're banging her?" He stared at the door for an extra second, pupils dark.

Gabriel gave a noncommittal shrug. Prince was impressed, and he didn't hide it very well. "Don't see how it's your business. Your Ranya looked pretty good too, before you beat her to death. Hard to look pretty with a smashed skull and well, I don't need to list the damages, you and I both know how she looked at the end."

Prince stiffened. "I told you-"

"Thing is, by all accounts, the dumb bitch was crazy about you," Gabriel said coolly. "She just didn't want you getting tangled up with Talon. Hell, she stuck around for awhile, tried to save you from yourself, but I guess that was too pushy for your delicate ego. You damn near beat her to death a few years ago, according the police report anyway, and so she left. Guess she wasn't that dumb."

Prince snarled then. "That's not how it happened."

"Oh?"

"I kicked her out," Prince said sullenly. "I see what you're doing. Playing that old sob story about an abusive boyfriend. Trying to make her the victim. She thought she could tell me what to do. Got too full of herself. She was undermining me."

"So you had to teach her lesson? Reassert the chain of command?" Gabriel fed him the lines, though skepticism permeated every word.

"Yeah," Prince nodded, eyes unfocused. "That's it. That's precisely it." He gritted his teeth. "It was just a lovetap, anyway. Enough to show her I meant business. That was all. She'd had worse in the field."

Gabriel just raised a brow, though he was sorely tempted to poke holes in all of Prince's flimsy rationalizations. That would be counterproductive, even if it did feel good. Prince would shut down. Gabriel didn't need to feel righteous, he just needed to keep Prince talking.
"Don't give me that look," Prince snarled. "You've seen what I can do when I actually want to hurt someone."

Gabriel just stared at Prince's face. Sweat beaded on his upper lip, and his shoulders twitched, like he willing his phantom arms to lash out.

"You're a black ops commander. You can't tell me you've never had to put someone in their place."

"Several times," Gabriel said. "Rarely got to the part where I had to break their bones to do it. And then, never with someone who couldn't give as good as they got." Gabriel allowed himself that barb. "But I suppose what's done is done. Not like Ranya can really us otherwise, can she?"

Prince clenched his teeth, veins in his neck bulging.

"You know, you were never what society would consider "a good person." But you always had self control. You were very talented at planning ops and black bag jobs. Up till you joined Nguyen. Then your behavior grew increasingly erratic. Beating POWs to death. Beating your girlfriend. Hell, heard you executed some of your men, just for questioning the nature of your orders. That's a lot of rage, Prince. I get that you're a psychopath, but you've gotten more and more out of control as time goes on. That makes you quite the liability now."

Prince snorted. "You trying to say that I'm the victim here?"

Gabriel laughed. "You know, Bái Shé had a self-destruct command. There were two priorities that trumped it. Kill Gérard Lacroix, which is something you never quite managed to do. And kill her old squadmate, her admitted best friend in the whole wide world. We actually have videos of Dr. Chumak implanting the order. It was pretty insidious. Get the subject to isolate themselves, and well, who was left for them but Nguyen? Kind of funny how that worked out. You go from having a fairly stable...whatever it was with Ranya to breaking her collarbone? Seems strange, don't you think?"

"I told you, she was pushing me," Prince snarled, eyes wild. "She didn't give me a choice."

"Women," Gabriel said with a wry smile. "Even the best ones are difficult." He laughed then, because that statement applied equally to his boyfriend and his girlfriend. "But I have to say, after DC, it was pretty strange that you went straight to her. Rather like you wanted us to find you."

Prince's head snapped back, his eyes narrowed.

"Come on, it's textbook that'd we'd be watching anyone who'd been close to you. That was very careless work."

Prince's eyes were wide, his breathing labored.

Gabriel took a look at the biometrics: Prince's heartbeat was skyrocketing and his adrenaline was up. "Even the explosives you used in that town, not the usual Talon tech at all. All homemade stuff." Like Prince didn't have Talon support right now.

"Maybe I am here for a reason," Prince said tightly. "Maybe this is all a cover so I can reach my real target." He glared at Gabriel, his teeth clenched. "Shouldn't you be more worried about that?"

"Maybe," Gabriel said, thoughtfully. "But I've seen your work. You're an in and out kind of guy. No loitering, usually no bystanders, unless the mission required soft targets, and even then, you did them quick. Nothing time-wasting like torture or rape. Makes me wonder why you went after Ranya's sweet old parents too. Because it would be much easier to corner her in a dark alley and finish her there, make it look like a mugging gone wrong. Hell, you hadn't seen her in years. Were you holding a grudge that long? Did you want to hurt her that badly? Forensics said you killed her parents first. Did you show off their dead bodies for her? Was this some kind of last-ditch murder-revenge pact? Or was it something else?"

Prince fell silent, staring past Gabriel, his eyes unfocused. He began to speak a few times, and then stopped himself, shaking his head. Gabriel remained stonefaced, but he honestly hadn't expected that reaction. Maybe a joke or a comment about "that's what happens to people that cross him." But Prince actually seemed at a loss for words. Or at least like he'd been disassociating from his actions. It wasn't that he was ashamed at all; more like someone awakening from a weekend bender surprised that he'd gone that far.

"I don't buy it, Reyes," Prince said with ragged laugh. "Nice try. Never figured you for the headshrinker type. Kind of disappointed really. I mean, you're trying to tell me that I'm a better man than how I've behaved?"

"No, you're still a piece of shit, but before you were your own piece of shit. Now you're just Nguyen's rabid dog, rapidly losing his usefulness and his mind. There's no point in really questioning you or torturing you, Dick. You don't know anything of value, because you're on a timer and Nguyen wouldn't have trusted you."

"You're wrong," Prince snapped. "You think you can make me reveal things, but you're wrong. I ran the show. I was in control of my actions. Ranya was unfinished business. You're reading too much into it. The planning, the attacks, that was all me. That was my work!"

"Keep telling yourself that," Gabriel said with a smirk, and he stood to leave. "But we both know your usefulness, like your lifespan, is nearing its limit."

It wasn't harsh, not as far as Gabriel's interrogations had gone. Prince deserved far worse. But your attention wasn't just on Gabriel. Some of it was on Prince. There he was, a smug piece of shit talking trash about your captain and admitting what you had long suspected. But then you also had to keep an eye on your visiting Trojan horse.

"Oh come on," Casano muttered loud enough for the whole room to hear. "What is this? A fireside chat? I thought Reyes was supposed to be tough." He was a bundle of exaggerated gesticulation, all heaving shoulders, rolled eyes, and exasperated sighs. It was like watching a caricature of a teenager throwing a tantrum.

Ziv elbowed you too hard, understandably raw from Prince's Black Base Delta confession. "Do something about him, or I will."

You shook your head. Not yet. Lacroix wanted you to give him enough rope to hang himself, and you would.

Jesse's attention went between Casano and interrogation. His fingers twitching when Captain Amari entered the interrogation room. You rested a hand on his shoulder. He took a deep breath and nodded at you. Despite what did not happen between Jesse and the captain, it was obvious he still worried about her.
"Is this how you run the place, Commander Morrison?" Casano snapped as Captain Amari and Gabriel exchanged some flirty banter. You bit your lip, a little weirded out, but not upset by it. "Do you fucking hear this shit?"

You moved then. Smiling, you rested your hand on his shoulder. "You're interrupting, Agent Casano. I'm going to have to politely escort you out."

"Fuck you. Who the hell do you think you are?" He shouted at you, spraying spittle in your face.

You squeezed his shoulder, your jaw tense. You could hear the bones creaking under your metal fingers. It would be very easy to clamp down just a little more...

Casano froze, back bowing as he gritted his teeth.

"Agent Casano, you're being a disruption. Now, please, I am requesting your cooperation," you said. "Aren't you supposed to comply with authority?" You asked, venom seeping into your voice. "Or do I have to get unprofessional?" You smiled broadly, the strain on your cheeks letting you know that it was not a nice expression.

Casano cringed and deflated as you guided him out of the room, everyone watching out of the corner of their eyes, no one, not even Brant, protesting.

You stepped into the hall, a little surprised to see Shoal and Jemison there.

"We'll take it from here, agent," Jemison said sternly.

"Make sure he reaches his destination safely," you said, trying to sound sincere and failing.

Casano began to sweat, and Shoal laughed.

"Come on, Special Agent Casano. You can go wait in the transport," Shoal said, giving you a jaunty wave.

You returned to the observation room, in time for Gabriel's little mindfuck reveal about the mental conditioning. You let yourself enjoy the show, because you'd suspected it was Prince who planned the Black Base Delta attack. It was...cathartic to get a admission. Hell, your heart was beating too hard, too quickly now and you were filled with anticipation that could easily turn into obsessive anxiety. You still remembered Gleeson bleeding out in this very wing, your tanto in his throat. You knew, from a logical standpoint, that you couldn't kill Prince. There was too much political weight right now. But you could indulge in the fantasy: your blade in his throat, the light in his eyes going out...

"I am both grateful to you and terribly jealous of you," Brant told you as Gabriel left the interrogation room.

"Please tell me his presence was all part of some clever ruse," you said. "And not just a concession to your agency."

"Of course." Brant nodded rapidly. "It was Armstrong's idea. Angle to send the most belligerent, obviously unprofessional opposing agent we could, but one who wouldn't actually be able to cause direct damage - didn't want a repeat of your shooting. Then I can present the recordings of his behavior to prove my point about internal sabotage. They played right into our hands," Brant said.
"And it doesn't hurt at all, that representatives from the DOD, CIA, and NSA are going to corroborate your story, and mention what an embarrassment Agent Casano turned out to be," Lacroix said.

Everyone in the room, even Hopper, shared wicked little conspiratorial smiles.

This was only the first session, of course. Lacroix and Gabriel were handling the Prince interrogation with great care. You wondered how likely it was that Prince had a self-destruct command, or whether or not he was only partially culpable for his actions. It was a troubling thought. Lao had fought the programming, and she'd still stabbed you.

Prince, by most accounts, was a high-functioning psychopath. He had even less incentive to behave humanely or restrain his baser impulses. Gabriel's implication seemed to bother him, sure, but that could have just been part of the power play. "Oh Dick, no one takes you seriously, you're brain damaged." That would rankle anyone, let alone a control freak like Prince.

You unrolled the mats, then began to stretch, warming up your muscles. Gabriel would probably go a round with Hanzo and Genji before he came up to Jack's room. Lacroix was handling your guests accommodations, and you'd caught sight of Jesse and Captain DeVevo sitting with Brant in the cafeteria. You wanted to ask questions, but weren't up for socializing. Jesse could tell you all about it later.

Isha sat the coffee table, eating the chips Jack had left out. You hadn't forgotten about her mysterious treasures. Once Tataryn got back from Kosovo, you were going to have a long talk with him. You'd made some discrete inquiries, but none of Isha's sitters were missing any jewelry, and no one had made any complaints to InSec, or made any matching inquiries at the lost and found. There were no reports of local jewelry stores being burglarized while you were in DC either. You'd done your due diligence.

You glanced up as the door opened, and Jack stepped in carrying pizza. Isha cheeped and hopped onto the back of the couch to greet him.

Jack patted her head and set the pizza boxes down on the coffee table. He eyed the mats for a moment, took a look at your face, and then began to strip down to just his fatigue pants.

"You don't need to-" You trailed off, trying not ogle his bare chest, and failing.

"Looks like you do," he said, smile cocky, though there were worry lines around his eyes. "Wouldn't mind a little workout either. Spent most of the day sitting." Jack ambled over to you, a little extra swagger in his shoulders. "Didn't you get to rough that asshole up a little?"

"Nah, I was professional. I know, what's wrong with me?" You shook your head. "Guess the mention of Black Base Delta shook me a little." You rubbed your tense shoulders. "Know it bothered Gabriel. Figured we could work some of that off. I can wait for him if you're tired."

"Sweetheart, are you waiting for Gabe because he goes easy on you?" Jack raised his chin, his smug smirk making your heart rate spike.

Your head snapped back and you glared at Jack, climbing to your feet. "Fuck you, Jackie."

"After," he grinned, running his fingers through his hair. He rolled his shoulders, raising his hands.
You were already moving, dropping low as you closed the distance. You kicked your leg out, aiming for Jack's ankles.

He jumped backward, but you slid into him, knocking him off balance and onto the ground. He landed flat on his back with a surprised "oof!"

You didn't give him time to recover. You were on top of him immediately, knees digging into his ribs, metal fingers against his throat.

Jack blinked up at you, eyes wide and delighted. Instead of trying to buck you off, he reached up and tapped the mat, and you released him, though you remained seated on his chest.

"Fuck, that was sexy," Jack kissed your knee. "Do you want to be on top?"

"I'm not done, Jack," you said, lightly. "And even if you win next round, I'm still in the mood to hit things."

Jack laughed softly and sat up. He leaned over and nipped your bottom lip. "All right, boss. I think I can handle that."

You ended up sweaty, out of breath, and exhausted. Flat on your back, your limbs burning, you glanced over at Jack who had only worked up a light sweat. His skin had turned a light shade of pink, bruises and red marks still visible, though they would fade soon.

He sat beside you, hair mussed, a pleased grin on his face. You realized you didn't provide enough of a challenge, but did he have to look so damn amused? You groaned, pushing yourself off the ground.

"Feeling better?" Jack asked, ruffling your hair.

"Feeling too tired to be mad," you admitted. "But now I'm hungry." You glanced over at the pizza, and then shook your head, wondering if there would be any pizza for you.

Isha sat on the coffee table. She'd very carefully opened the top box, and helped herself to a slice, probably more, while you and Jack were sparring. She had cheese and tomato sauce smeared on her face. Noticing both you and Jack watching her, she shoved the rest of the slice into her mouth and hurriedly chewed it up so you couldn't take it back.

"Who does that remind you of?" Jack asked, laughing into his hand.

You gave him a dirty look and wobbled to your feet. Isha had been fairly neat, not messing up the rest of the pizza or spreading food all over the table. And she'd only stolen two slices "Come here, you little thief. We need to get you cleaned up." You scooped her up and she shortled, rubbing her sauce-stained snout on your chest. "Really?"

She bobbed her head, licking some of the sauce off.

You carried her into the bathroom and put her on the counter. You turned on the sink, taking a moment to make sure the water was warm enough, before you grabbed a washcloth and began wiping her down.
She cooed, splashing her little hands in the water while you tried to work. You briefly considered letting her play in one of the fountains next summer. Or you could get her a kiddie pool. Maybe a large birdbath?

You toweled her off, noticing how much fluffier she was now. Her feathers were still coming in mostly in iridescent black. But on her tail, there were streaks of green, blue, indigo, and violet feathers sprouting. She was also starting to get what looked like a crest on the top of her head. Those feathers were coming in black and violet. You checked her arms, noting her pinions were still growing too, also in indigo and violet, subtle stripes starting to form on the underside.

"You're getting so pretty," you said, kissing her damp snout.

She patted your cheek, thrumming happily.

Fluffing your murderbird, you headed out to the living room. Jack had cleaned up the mats and Gabriel sat on the couch, a piece of pizza in his hand. He flashed you a tired smile.

"Hey," you said, setting Isha down on the couch.

"Feeling better?" He asked, leaning over to kiss you.

"A little. Still need a shower."

He offered you a bite of his pizza and you took it, sighing.

"How are you holding up?" You asked.

"Not bad, all things considered," Gabriel said, reaching over to pet Isha. "I underestimated how angry Prince was going to make me. Nothing he said came as a surprise, but it still got to me."

"Yeah. Same. This is going to suck," you said.

"Yes," Gabriel agreed, taking another slice. "But we only have one shot to do this right. At least today went according to plan."

"Yeah," you said, grabbing your own slice of pizza. Isha curled up between Gabriel and Jack, opening her mouth to beg for more food. And you didn't miss how they both snuck your murderbird scraps.

After dinner, you and Jack got a quick shower and then joined Gabriel in the bedroom. There was new fluffy fleece-lined dog bed on the floor, complete with stuffed dog, pillows, and a dinosaur-patterned blanket. Isha was not in it though. Gabriel had her on his lap while he skimmed a novel. No dinosaurs in bed, huh? You stifled a laugh.

"Maggie and Michael should be here in a few days; they're coming in early with Ray," Jack said. "Feng will be here too. They're all camping out in my living room. Do you think that will be a problem?"

Feng, Maggie, and Michael together? It sounded like a bad idea, like mixing gasoline, alcohol, and raccoons. You weren't exactly sure what would go wrong, but inevitably something would. There were so many possibilities.

"It's your room, but are you sure it's a good idea to have Feng here?"
"Her cover is as my sister's classmate. Maggie won't mind," Jack said in a way that let you know that he had not discussed that plan with his sister yet. Honestly, you didn't think Maggie would mind either, but you weren't sure how he was going to explain Feng without sharing some classified intel. Well, that was Jack's business. You didn't have any expertise there.

You glanced at Gabriel who shrugged. "It's your funeral, Jackie."

"Is anyone in your family coming?" You asked.

Gabriel shrugged again. "Maybe. My mother doesn't travel so well any more, and that goes for my grandmother too. My sisters might, but they have so many children. If they come, they'll have a hotel room or three."

"OK," you said. "Kseniya wants to come."

"Catriona won't mind," Gabriel said with a yawn.

You crawled into bed beside him, and he gently put Isha on your pillow. Jack was on his other side. Gabriel gave a sigh of contentment, and Jack turned out the lights.

Interestingly, Isha had been in her new bed when you woke up in the morning. She was cuddly, yes, but maybe having all four of you in the bed was too busy for her. That, or she missed her stuffed dog.

You smelled coffee, and sighed happily. Both men had let you sleep a few extra minutes, and you weren't going to complain. Stretching, you winced slightly at the soreness in your limbs. You had bruised knuckles and shins, and you were tender all over. Jack had thrown you several times last night, and not all your landings were graceful. You should have put an emitter. Groaning, you dragged yourself out of bed and headed out to the living room for some coffee.

Gabriel sat on the couch, dressed in cargo pants and a Blackwatch hoodie, eating reheated pizza and reading his tablet. Still in one of Jack's oversized t-shirts, you gave him a kiss, and he let you steal a bite of his pizza.

"Was going to get you up in another ten minutes," he said.

"Thanks," you yawned.

The bathroom door opened and Jack slunk out, full dressed. He trudged over to the coffee pot and poured himself a mug and grabbed two slices of pizza out of the box, not bothering to heat them up. He plunked down on the couch beside Gabriel and began eating. You got your own food, and more importantly coffee, and sat down beside Jack.

"Morning sunshine," you said, grinning at his bleary eyes.

Jack grumbled under his breath, but leaned over and gave you a saucy kiss on the cheek. Shaking your head, you blotted at your face with a napkin.

"Really Jack?"

"Sorry," he muttered, and wiped his mouth with the back of his hand. "Not entirely awake yet."
You laughed and kissed him back, notably not smearing any food on him. Gabriel leaned over and kissed his other cheek, laughing softly as Jack began to turn pink. "Good morning, amor. You look adorable as always."

"But also manly and muscular," you added. "Very leaderly."

Jack chuckled, shaking his head. "You two are too much." He rested his head on Gabriel's shoulder. "I have budget meetings most of the day. Come save me?"

"We can stage an escape," you said. "I think Vo and Genji have smoke bombs somewhere..."

"I think he wants one of us to sit in on them with him," Gabriel said. "You know, and not fall asleep."

"Oh, well, I uh...have work to do," you said, trying to come off as serious and failing.

"Same," Gabriel said, not even trying.

Jack groaned. "I thought you loved me."

"I do, Jack. Oh, I do, but not that much," Gabriel said, smiling through the brutality of his response.

It was early evening, but now you were finally caught up on the paperwork that accrued while you were in DC. And, you and Gabriel had taken turns sending Jack dirty messages to help keep him awake during the meeting. You'd sent cute pictures of Isha too, because you weren't a total sadist.

Tataryn's team was back from Kosovo had finished their debrief. Isha sat heavy on your shoulder as you headed toward the Blackwatch dorms. Her talons dug into your shirt, and you realized you were going to have to get some kind of protection, maybe falconer's gear. You'd look into it later.

Knocking on Tataryn's door, you didn't miss how Isha's eyes narrowed and she shrewdly looked up at the ceiling tiles.

You raised a brow, seeing some marks around the edge of one. Well, someone had a hiding place here, though the tile wasn't scratched up enough for it to be Isha. You'd since found a few caches in Gabriel and Jack's rooms. More pieces of jewelry that you did not recognize, snacks, and oddities like marbles, an antique perfume bottle, and coins from all over the world.

Tataryn opened the door, still in his armor, his hair pulled back in a tight braid.

"Lucky, Isha, why are you standing in front of my door looking so serious? Come in, come in. Sorry about the mess, I just returned, but I suspect you knew that already," he said slyly, gesturing to his armor. "I hope you don't mind while I slip into something more comfortable."

"As long as you're wearing pants," you said, and immediately regretted not being more specific.
"You're going to have to at least buy me dinner if you want to see me without pants." Tataryn gave you a cheeky wink. "And how are you, Ishana? Good hunting?"

Isha yawned, pretending not to see him.

"She loves me," Tataryn said, already stripping off his chestpiece. He pulled off the rashguard, taking his time so you could see his lean muscled back, tattoos and all.

You sighed impatiently.

"OK, the pants are next. So impatient-"

You leaned against the door, arms crossed. "So I've been finding lots of jewelry stashed all around the place. No one here is missing anything, so that begs the question, where did my murderbird find all these things?"

"I told you she was smart," Tataryn beamed. "Who wouldn't want to give you jewelry?" Tataryn perched on the arm of his sofa, shirtless. He flexed a few times for good measure.

"Tataryn, you're very pretty, but you're not going to distract me with your little muscles." He frowned at your dismissal and you had to work hard not to smirk. "Where did Isha get all this jewelry?"

Tataryn sighed, and began to unbraid his long hair. "I suppose I should start at the very beginning. Isha discovered some of Min's caches."

Oh.

"Min was very upset that Isha ate several of her...emergency rations. When we were on our prank run, Isha, with her new...treasure-hunting tendencies, found several more hidden spots. She showed Min, possibly as a way of making amends. We took small things, things that wouldn't be as easily missed."

"Like a large gold chain?" You scowled.

Tataryn shrugged. "Trust me, it was the least gaudy piece of the bunch." He chuckled. "Even better was the one earring she took. That would drive me crazy. So very clever and infuriating."

Isha gazed at him expectantly and he went to his shelf and grabbed a package of digestive biscuits. He was still missing a shirt, and now his hair was loose, falling in golden waves down his back. Tataryn was very good at being distracting.

"Anyway, I wasn't going to cheat her out of her fair share. We each picked out four or five trinkets," Tataryn said. "But we agreed you might...be concerned, so Min showed her how to make her own hiding places. Which I guess you discovered."

"Yes," you said, giving him a hard look.

Tataryn shrugged. "Well, it's never too early to start saving for your education, is it Isha?"

Isha just reached out, waiting for him to give her a biscuit.

Tataryn laughed and handed it to her. She crammed it in her mouth, giving him a dirty look. "Anyway, I hear you picked out some nice pieces at the Smithsonian. Planning something special
"I returned them."

"Of course, you did," Tataryn said, with a knowing look. "Most of them."

You glared at him, not taking the bait. "Did you consider the repercussions of teaching her these behaviors?"

Tataryn shrugged. "Not at the time, no. I was just excited to have such an apt pupil. I suppose it could be troublesome if she gets caught, but she can charm her way out of these things. Most people will assume she is a dumb animal that doesn't know any better. It is quite the advantage." He winked at Isha, like he'd already discussed this outcome with her.

"Not the point Tataryn. You're a bad influence."

Tataryn smiled wryly at that. "I know. Why do you think I want you to spend time with Kseniya? You are a gentler scoundrel than I. She is comfortable with you. You do not judge her and you do not talk down to her. I trust you to keep my daughter safe, maybe even teach her some of those troublesome morals that I have not mastered. These are important things, Lucky, if she is to live a better life than me."

You blinked, sucker punched by his honesty. Goddamn his manipulative hide. He knew exactly what he was doing.

"And, Isha is a natural. I hate to see that talent go to waste. We work well together, don't we?"

Isha just looked at the package of biscuits.

"She drives a hard bargain. Very respectable." He gazed at her admiringly. "You should have seen her and Min staring each other down for a chocolate bar. It nearly came to violence. I had to distract them with a pearl ring and a very shiny ruby bracelet. I am afraid your raptor may have very expensive tastes. It is good that she is willing to work for her keep."

Rubbing your forehead, you told yourself that some animals were just kleptomaniacs. Birds and scavengers especially. Maybe she would have learned these behaviors on her own. Maybe Tataryn was just giving her a better education. You weren't so sure how to go about teaching her ethics though.

"I tried to make it clear to her that stealing from Min was very unwise. I believe she understands, but you should work on that, just to be safe," Tataryn continued cheerfully. "They've reached a truce now, but early on I was quite worried."

"You didn't think to tell me any of this earlier?" You scowled.

"Well," Tataryn rested his chin on his hand. "I was actually hoping you would never find out. We're going to have to work extra hard on not getting caught, all right Ishana-bird?"

To your horror, your murderbird trilled in agreement.

Chapter End Notes
So I'm supposed to hear back from the job tomorrow or the day after. I'm a bundle of nerves, because damnit, I want to make a living wage and they offer that.

Also, useless!manager is apparently talking smack about me and I'm not sure if angry!manager is just trying to stir the pot, but he reports that useless!manager considers me the laziest person in the store and "doesn't know what I do." Well, yeah, he doesn't know what I do, because he never has to do my job. Because I get my work done. Work that is actually for two people, but my partner had to step up as a temporary manager, so I've been doing most of it alone. I'm pretty pissed. Everyone else was like "it's projection, we know it isn't true." But still, it makes me want to leave even more.

Ahem. Going to play some AC: Odyssey. I've only done a little bit, but so far it's interesting. The voice acting in the beginning is kind of stilted, like I'm laughing for the wrong reasons, but we'll see how it goes.

Ranger is just having bad skin allergies. They gave him some steroids and he's fine. I'm also coating him in aloe; that's the vet's recommendation.
Chapter 100

Chapter Summary

Family Day is about to begin, but some family members are more welcome than others.

Chapter Notes

...So I'm an idiot, and we've reached 100 chapters.

Trigger warning for sexual harassment and the gaslighting that goes with it.

You waited in the docking bay, more than a little concerned by Jack's lack of planning. Isha sat on your lap, and you'd shown her pictures of each person, explaining they were safe, and that she needed to be patient with them. Not that you thought she would misbehave, but it was better to lay boundaries.

An Athena drone hovered beside you, and Isha seemed more interested in it than your lecture. Great, you were being preachy and boring.

The first transport arrived, and when the bay doors opened, Feng bounced out, carrying a large tote bag, two rolling suitcases, and wearing a large floppy straw hat with an enormous fake daisy secured around the crown. Big red flower-shaped sunglasses covered her face, and she wore overall shorts patterned with numerous pachimari icons and a green raptor t-shirt. Her socks were knee high with rainbow stripes and she had on neon green sneakers with bright orange laces.

You stared at her for what felt like a very long, very psychadelic time. Isha squawked.

"What?" Feng asked, lifting her sunglasses. "I'm supposed to be a school kid, yeah?"

You blinked a few times. A red metal ball floated behind Feng.

"I told you that you looked like a manic colorblind beggar," Zheng's cultured voice came from the orb. "It's absolutely ridiculous. You should not have left the house that way."

Privately, you agreed Zheng's assessment. Feng could probably refine the look and make it some kind of iconic rainbow urchin queen street wear, but it wasn't an ideal disguise. "I uh...Umm. Jack's sister is in high school."

"And?" Feng asked, narrowing her eyes at you.

"...In rural Indiana."

"Oh. Yeah." Feng crossed her arms, lips pursed in the beginnings of a pout. "Damn. I was looking forward to trying to pass for a grade schooler. The younger, the better. You can get away with a lot more if they think you're younger," she said, tapping her fingertips together. "Throwing water balloons, asking for candy, piggyback rides: these are all more acceptable when people think you're under twelve."

"You're a little tall," you said, patting Isha, who was studying Feng's hat with predatory interest. "But, if you didn't want anyone to recognize you, the plan worked."

Feng snorted. "OK, I get it. It's too much." She sighed. "Aunt Zheng made me pack normal clothes too. Don't worry." She shot the floating orb a sulky look

"Why don't you say "hi" to Auntie Feng?" You said, nudging Isha.

Casting a baleful look at you, Isha hopped down and strutted over to Feng.

Feng crouched down. "How is my favorite raptor-niece? Well, my only raptor niece. Bayan decided I was his raptor-godmother, and that set of responsibilities is completely different."

Standing at Feng's feet, Isha begrudgingly stuck out one hand.

Feng gasped and crouched down, delicately taking the little clawed fingers in hers for a handshake. "That's adorable. You've gotten so big and pretty, and I hear you're a smart little monster too." She sniffed. "Jack sends me pictures, and I love how much you love your dogs, and-
"

Isha yanked her hand back and turned around, civilities observed and done with.

"Wait! I have gifts!" Feng said, dropping her bags, and frantically digging through the tote. "I brought you spicy squid jerky, and rice crackers, and a limited edition Pachimari Pocky!"

"I think Genji might fight you for that," you said, shaking your head.

Isha hesitated, cocking her head to the side.

"She is so damn clever. My god-babies don't make me work this hard," Feng hissed, yanking out a giant bag of shredded squid jerky. She tore it open and handed the entire package to Isha. Isha didn't hesitate. She snatched the bag, and ran back to your chair, diving underneath. The plastic rustled and you could already hear her chewing mouthfuls of the stuff.

"She's a thief," you said.

"Species trait," Feng shrugged. "Peony, Altan, and Odval are all thieves," Feng said, referring to Bayan's trio. "They work in teams. I have a video of them stealing eggs out of the fridge. It was a group heist: together they opened the door, one held the door, the other grabbed the eggs one by one, and one caught them and set the aside as they were tossed down. Then they put Peony on her back and she held the eggs against her stomach while the other two dragged her along like a wagon." Feng shook her head. "I have the whole thing recorded if you want to watch."

You sighed, grateful that you only had one murderbird. "Later for sure. Do they just steal food? Or are there other things?"

"Hey, are you really going to try to eat that all?" You asked Isha, glancing down at your feet. You got down on your knees and tapped her. "Stop that. Don't gorge yourself. It'll make you sick. Give it here."

Isha growled in protest.

"If you don't hand it over, Aunt Feng won't give you any more snacks, and she brought lots of things for her favorite raptor niece."

Reluctantly, Isha released the bag. It was a third empty already. She emerged from under the chair, giving you a dirty look.

"Come on Isha, I have coconut-flavored rice crackers," Feng said, opening a package and holding one out.

Isha trudged over and reached up. Feng put the cracker in her hand, giggling the entire time. Isha continued holding up her empty hand, and Feng placed a cracker in that one too. Isha shoved both of them into her mouth simultaneously and you sighed.

"That's not good manners," you said, unsure of why you bothered.

Isha chewed loudly, spraying the floor with crumbs. You were pretty sure she was doing that on purpose.

"So Jack really thought she was some kind of bizarre chicken?" Feng laughed.

"For like five minutes," you said. "But she adores him. Acts extra babyish around him. And gets him to carry her around."

"They're social animals," Feng said. "Like us."

"Though she gets all tough and serious for Gabriel and the other Blackwatch agent who has been training her. She seems happy, but she's started to exhibit some weird hoarding behaviors..."

"Mmm," Feng rubbed her chin. "But she is housebroken, and that's pretty awesome. We're using the woodchip litter boxes too and the god-babies are picking it up. Some of the others are kind of stubborn."

Feng took off her hat and set it on Zheng's orb. Her hair was in twin braids, polka-dot ribbons tying off the ends.

"Really?" Was all Zheng said.

"It looks quite nice," Athena piped up. "Do you think I could get some accessories, Lucky?"

"Yes," you said, immediately. "I always thought you needed a giant bow, but...I wasn't going to pressure you."

"I would be willing to try it," Athena said.

"Does anyone market accessories directly at AIs, instead of their human companions?" Feng rubbed her chin.

"Yes, but they tend to be more functional," Zheng said. "This hat is blocking my light sensor, and now I'm in night mode." Her orb glowed with a soft red light.
"Hmm," Feng wore a cartoonish wrist watch and began typing something on the screen. She did not remove the hat. "OK, so I'm Maggie's schoolmate. Michael's too maybe, since I can pass for between their ages." She tapped her cheek. She was a little older than Michael, though she still looked like a teenager.

"What's your cover back home?"

"Some well-deserved R&R after a new project. It's done. Already launched. I really hauled ass," Feng said with a cheerful nod. "Didn't sleep for three days leading up to the press release, and I'm never doing that again. Li and Bayan had to trick me into leaving the office, and then after I passed out - still think one of them drugged me - they had the nerve to yell at me about it."

"That is unhealthy," you said. "The not-sleeping part. I'd have drugged you too."

Feng snorted. "Well, you're a jerk." She jammed her hands in her pockets. "Don't worry. When I woke up, Auntie gave me a long lecture on the neurological importance of sleep, and also threatened to forcibly sedate me if I did that again. You guys really need to learn about boundaries."

"Desperate times, desperate measures." You nodded at the floating red ball, and it pulsed agreeably back at you.

"Anyway, I have to admit, the tech is an innovation, not a completely new invention. But, I'm the one who thought of it, got the engineers to fine tune the specs, and then streamlined those for a functional prototype. If all the test runs go well, we can begin mass production in-"

"LU-CKEEEE!"

You and Feng looked up as the bay doors opened a blonde blur hurled herself across the waiting room. You barely had time to brace yourself as Maggie threw her arms around you, cackling with glee.

Isha squawked in alarm, and you quickly held up one hand. "It's Maggie," you said. "Jack's sister. Stand down."

Maggie grinned at you, cheeks flushed, blonde hair in a long braid. She was wearing an Overwatch t-shirt and basketball shorts. She also looked leaner and more muscular than she had at Christmas. "Oh my God, that's your mutant bird? She's adorable!" Maggie squealed, hugging you tighter. "You guys have a pet together!" She stage-whispered. "Can I be Aunt Maggie? Please?"

"Sure?" You hugged her back, wondering if you were going to have to pull a Chang and wiggle away, but Maggie released you, beaming. "Thank you so much for persuading Jack to let us come."

"He would have done it anyway," you said, rubbing the back of your neck. "And uh, this is..."

"Claire," Feng said, grinning at Maggie. "Call me "Claire." Pleased to finally meet you." Feng extended her hand and Maggie shook it rapidly with both hands.

"I love your outfit, Claire. And your tattoo. I want some too. My parents would flip, but I've got a few years to persuade them."

"Claire is your classmate," you said, giving Maggie a wry look. "It's her cover."
"Really?" Maggie said, eyes wide. "I never knew. We have so much to talk about. Like Ms. Boomershine's terrible geometry exams."

"I was OK at geometry," Feng said, almost sounding genuinely modest.

"Good, maybe you can help me with my homework," Maggie said. She glanced over at you. "Let me guess, this was Jack's idea?"

"Yes," you said. "I told him to run it by you. Maybe it slipped his mind?"

"Of course it did." She rolled her eyes. "That's my brother. The inconsiderate ass." Maggie squinted at Feng. "How classified is this?"

"Hey, sorry. I tried to slow her down, but she dumped my bag out and ran."

You looked up to see Michael, his hair no longer black, but the same Morrison blonde as his siblings. He still had it spiked, and he was wearing a band t-shirt with ripped jeans. You'd never heard of "Billie the Squid and Gnarlywhals," but that didn't mean anything. And Michael too, had filled out since Christmas. You were a little surprised by the amount of muscle he had put on; he was still leaner than Jack, however, he looked more like a grown man and less like a gangly teen. But then Chang did have it out for him. He gave you a shy smile, stopping short of hugging you.

"Hey Michael. You look healthy." You shook his hand. "I was a little worried that Chang was going to accidentally destroy you."

"It would have been completely intentional," Chang said, as she emerged behind him, expression flat. She wore a leather jacket and jeans; the jacket looked like it had been in more fights than you.

Michael laughed nervously.

She walked past him and up to Feng. "I don't care if we have business, Zhai. If anything happens to these two, because of you-"

"Relax Sergeant, I swore a blood oath to Jack. You know, the gross kind." She mimed drinking. "His enemies are my enemies. His family is my family." Feng said placing one hand over her heart.

"You killed several members of your extended family," Chang snarled, obviously not convinced by that argument.

"Yeah, but they started it," Feng grumbled. "And Jack is part of the family that I like. It's a very important distinction. Not to mention we're friends. I wasn't friends with any of the southern assholes. And they tried to kill my mom. Which, by the way, only makes her angrier." Feng shuddered, one hand still over her heart.

Maggie stared at Feng with big eyes.

Chang gave you a sharp look, more raptor than human. "You trust her?"

"Yes," you said, though you didn't go into detail. You trusted her to have your back. You trusted her to do her best. You didn't trust her to stay focused around shiny things or to have the sense to avoid teaching Maggie and Michael dangerous truths.

Chang frowned, giving Feng a hard look. "Jack does too. But you're a better judge of character. Not that that's saying much."

If your understanding was correct, that was practically an endorsement from her. "I try."

Chang crossed her arms. "What is that?" She jerked her chin at Isha.

You snorted. "That is Isha. Isha, that is Chang. She's safe and she's one of Jack's best friends, but don't bother her."

Isha watched from the chair, not making any move to approach Chang.

Chang stared at your murderbird for ten seconds then shook her head. "Of course, he'd want a mutant chicken," she muttered, before stalking out of the waiting room. You watched as the rest of her squad filed out in civilian clothes, Fitzpatrick and Almasi waving at you as they left.

"...So she's hot and terrifying," Feng said, shaking her head. She turned to face Michael. "Hi, I'm--"

"Zhai Feng, the Triad tech mogul of Shanghai," Michael said solemnly.

"-Claire," Feng said, sheepishly.

Maggie narrowed her eyes. "Oh, she is. He showed me your TED talk this week. Very cool. Shiny morphing laser arms."

"Integrated hard light prostheses," Michael corrected. He glanced at you with a frown. Like he'd just now realized how many secrets Jack had been keeping, and how big some of them were.

You had not been paying attention to tech news; you had been too focused on the aftermath of Black Abacus.

"That was the beginning of the big project I told you about." Feng grinned at you. "There's more coming," she said cheerfully. "But anyway, I'm incognito this trip. So, I'm Claire." She offered her hand and Michael shook it carefully, motions taut and wary.

"Oh come on, I'm not going to bite. You're like, my adopted brother and we've just met. You haven't earned the same level of ire as my biological brother."

Michael glanced at you.

"Feng's cool. Just let her know if she does anything that makes you uncomfortable. It's usually unintentional."

Feng nodded. "True. I have an amazingly bad attention span and extremely questionable impulse control."

"She plays it up," you said, patting Feng's shoulder. "She's a lot more competent than she acts."

Feng favored you with a toothy look. "Don't share all my secrets."

Maggie's gaze darted between her brother and Feng. "So, blood oaths? Family-killings? How are we related?" She leaned forward, staring at Feng's face, like maybe she could find a distant cousinship in the bone structure.

"By blood oath?" Feng said with a shrug. "I mean, Jack and I cut ourselves, bled into a tea cup, and drank from it, all to secure an alliance because-

"And there goes a bunch of classified information," you said, resting your face in your palm. "Please stop. Now."

"Oh, you know we won't repeat anything," Maggie said, linking arms with Feng. "So, you're a mafia princess Ironman. And your cover is that we're classmates. I want to hear the juicy details. Like, did you fight alongside my brother and Lucky?"

"Yeah, and they flirt so hard: it's adorable-

"Oh my god! Tell me everything! Was Gabe there?" Maggie's eyes gleamed.

"Uh...not that time, but I got to seem him right before Lucky and some friends came to visit me in Shanghai..."

Feng changed into an oversized t-shirt from Purdue University and denim shorts, but she left on the colorful socks and the flower sunglasses.

Athena was monitoring Zheng, but that was outside your expertise.

Michael kept sneaking long looks at Isha as you walked your charges through the base.

"That's not a bird," he said while Feng and Maggie chatted at twice the speed of a normal human, and laughed loud enough to turn heads. You heard something about "cosplay" and wondered if this was all a terrible mistake. "She's not a hoatzin either." He waited for you to confirm his suspicions.

"Feng pulled a Jurassic Park. Isha's a velociraptor, heavily genetically modified, of course." You carried your murderbird in one arm, not missing how she kept studying Michael and Maggie, like she recognized the Morrison look. You weren't sure she really understood terms like "sister" or "aunt," but she understood body language and social groups.

Michael stared at the back of Feng's head. "Is she safe?"

"No," you said, not just talking about Isha. "But she's on our side. We had this massively classified epic bonding adventure, plus I sometimes go visit her on the weekends."

Michael nodded slowly, like he wasn't really sure what to make of that. He shot Isha another concerned look. "How big will she get?"

"Good question. She should stay turkey-sized, but we'll see."

The trip to the officers' quarters went smoothly. Your party got some curious looks, but you reached Jack's room without any issue.

"Wow, this is smaller than I expected," Maggie blurted out as you let them into the room.

Feng covered her mouth, not really muffling her laughs.
Michael sighed.

"These are military quarters. The Strike Commander's suite is one of the larger rooms," you said.

"Is Gabe's room bigger?" Maggie asked, wagging her eyebrows at you.

"About the same size, but he's got his own place by the Blackwatch dormitories."

"How big is your room?" Maggie asked, setting her bags down beside the coffee table. Feng neatly placed hers against the wall. Michael set his farthest away from Feng's. He was staring at the painting of Jack and Atticus that you'd commissioned.

"My room is much smaller. I have a private bathroom, but the whole thing is maybe a third the size of this room."

Maggie pursed her lips. "You should get a bigger room. Jack should be able to do that for you, right? I swear, my brother is so dense."

You shrugged. "It's within his purview."

Maggie paused, crossing her arms. "You don't seem to mind... Because you don't sleep there," she trailed off, grin widening.

"I do, sometimes," you said with a sigh, not missing Feng's smarmy look.

"You need to redecorate in here. Or let Gabe do it," Maggie said, looking around. "Oh, that's your work." She grinned at you and Michael. "That can stay."

"Oh, not bad," Feng said, tilting her head sideways. "You're really good."

"Lucky commissioned it for him," Michael said, turning a little pink around the edges.

"Still think his room needs more personality," Maggie muttered. "Maybe we can fix that while we're here..."

"So, what are we doing for dinner?" Feng asked, grinning as she diverted the subject. "Because I still haven't gotten to eat in the cafeteria, and I'm so curious-"

"It's not as good as yours," you said.

"And are you going to cook for us? Because Ray says you're a good cook," Maggie said.

You blinked trying to digest the fact that Chang was saying nice things about you behind your back. "Umm...maybe?"

"Where's Gabe?" Maggie asked.

"Are Hanzo and Genji going to be around?" Feng asked.

"Can I meet Commander Wilhelm?" Maggie grinned. "And I want to say "hi" to Ana too!"

"Oh, and I want to see Bandit!" Feng chirped. "I brought him something!"

You rubbed the back of your neck, a panicked smile spreading across your face.
"I'm sure Lucky has something planned, if you two would let her get a word in edgewise," Michael scolded.

Maggie covered her mouth with both hands. "Oh, sorry," she said, her giggles muffled.

Feng gave you a sly look, one that conveyed that she'd been egging Maggie on intentionally.

"You guys better behave, or I'm leaving you with Torby. And he'll probably take you to IKEA, and tell you all the reasons why their designs are subpar, and how Sweden only exports it as a joke on the rest of the world."

"But they have tasty food," Feng said. "I mean, the smoked salmon is great. Princess cakes are adorable. And lingonberries? I love lingonberries. They're not secretly cranberries, are they? Because I'm going to embarrassed if they are."

"I...don't think so," you said.

"The lingonberry, also known as vaccinium vitis-idaea is related to the cranberry, but they are not identical," Athena piped up.

"Thank you, Athena!" Feng said. "Why can't you be helpful like that, Auntie?"

The red orb floated there silently.

"Why do you call your drone "Auntie?" Were you raised by omnics or something?" Maggie asked, brows furrowing. And actually, that wasn't a bad back story, though you had met Feng's parents, and maybe being raised by omnics would have been better.

"Because she nags me like one," Feng said smoothly. "Anyway-"

The door opened, and you blinked as Gabriel and Jack entered, still in full uniform, carrying bags of snack food.

"Gabe!" Maggie leapt forward, and Gabriel tossed the food onto the couch, catching her mid-jump. She wrapped her arms around his neck and squeezed.

Jack rolled his eyes, setting his bags down and grinning at you before he turned to Michael and gave him a big hug.

"You look good. Ray's fitness regiment is something else. You might not even need SEP," Jack said.

Michael gave an embarrassed laugh. "Thanks. I uh...I couldn't feel anything except pain for the first three months."

"But now all my friends want to come over to see my other hot brother," Maggie said. "Bleagh."

"Ooh, getting popular with the ladies-" Jack teased.

"Her friends are way too young," Michael said, turning red.

"Some of them are legal," Maggie said. "But Michael likes older women." She winked.

You half expected Gabriel to say something snarky, but he just patted Maggie on the head.
Feng stepped forward and gave Jack a quick hug. "Way to warn your siblings about me."

Jack laughed sheepishly. "I figured it would all work out in the end. Lucky introduced you, didn't she?"

"Not the point," Maggie said, walking up and punching him in the arm. "You should have given me a heads up. I would have brought props, gotten Michael to edit some photos, we could have had a good back story going."

Jack frowned and rubbed his arm.

"I don't know why you're surprised," Michael said. "He's always been a flake. Remember Christmas? When he didn't tell anyone anything about Lucky? Like we were supposed to guess they were dating and have presents for her, without any warning? Good job, Strike Commander. You're great at details. I see why you're in charge on an international military organization."

You covered your mouth, stifling a laugh.

"Fuck you!" Jack scowled, looking less like the Strike Commander and more like a very annoyed older sibling.

"Oh, is this the part where we tell embarrassing Jack stories? Because I have one," Feng said, raising her hand.

Gabriel laughed and came to stand beside you, watching everyone pick on Jack. "How are you doing, chica?"

"Ready to give Jack some quality family time," you said, leaning in for a quick peck on his cheek.

"I want a real kiss." Chuckling, Gabriel cupped the back of your head, nibbled on your bottom lip.

Your fingers dug into his shirt and he parted your lips with his tongue, his mouth teasing against yours. You sighed softly, placing a series of soft quick kisses against his lips.

He smirked at you and let go, eyes promising more later. And when you looked up, Feng and Maggie were watching you with big delighted eyes. Jack gave you and Gabriel a fond look, his smile downright silly. And Michael was staring at his shoes, his face and the tips of his ears burning pink.

"Well, I have snacks, but that's not dinner," Jack said. "Umm, did you want to go down to the cafeteria, or-?"

"Yes!" Feng and Maggie shouted, already racing for the door.

Family Day didn't start till tomorrow, but it lasted the entire weekend. You'd already escorted Isha, Maggie, Michael, and Feng to Reinhardt's office. He was showing them around today, probably taking them out on some of the training courses. He recognized Feng immediately, and though you knew he had reservations about On Sing, he remained cheerful and friendly with her. For her part, Feng turned on the charm, though it seemed she was genuinely delighted by him. Maggie had latched onto Feng as a co-conspirator, and while Michael was on good behavior, you could tell that she made him nervous. Isha stayed polite with your guests, but she loved Reinhardt, and he let her perch on his shoulder like a giant parrot.

On your way back to the office, you passed In-Sec Officer Sakai. She was a serious woman who rarely smiled. Today, she seemed to be in a hurry. Athena knew to monitor her; she wasn't your responsibility. You still watched her disappear down the hall, not quite able to relax while she was behind you.

You spent the morning compiling Shit Spiders intel and receiving photo messages from Maggie and Feng. An unmanned Athena drone sat on the ground by the office door.

Gabriel had been in and out of the office all morning. Jack was still wading through his bureaucratic nightmare. And Ainsley kept cc'ing you on all the Family Day planning messages, because she thought you'd wanted to be kept updated on things like the catering, the facilities tours, and the three-legged race. It was a nice thought, but you didn't actually care. You weren't a damn event planner. Well, not the kind of family-friendly event that Overwatch was trying to organize.

You drained your tea, and read Lacroix’s reports on the American situation. Brant was making some headway within the FBI. Athena verified that. Kwento was in Geneva right now, smoothing out the potential fallout from Black Abacus. Prince had sat through another session with Gabriel, and seemed eager to talk, not about what you wanted to hear, but just to chat. It was odd, but you got the feeling that on some level, he liked Gabriel. No, that wasn't quite right. Prince at least respected Gabriel and wanted to have another "tough guy" to talk shop with. It was, theoretically, a good thing, though one you would not have predicted.

You had piles of other mission reports to sort through, orders to delegate, and operation outlines to send back to the planner for improvements, or kick up to Gabriel for authorization. Some time after noon, you received an invite to lunch, the Jack-siblings were now famished after running Reinhardt's obstacle course. You got up and turned on the drone, requesting connection.

"Lucky, you should know, the Director is on site, and moving toward this part of the building," Athena said.

You raised a brow, wondering if this was going to be your chance to enact your clever cockblocking plan. "All right, cameras on then." You straightened up, adjusted your gloves, and walked out of the office, hoping to run into him in an isolated hallway. Athena kept her distance, already recording.

You made a few long circuits of the area, when you caught a whiff of that familiar heavy cologne. Grimacing, you headed toward it, and sure enough, there was the Director himself, in a navy blue suit and red tie. He had dyed his not-quite bouffant hair, an unconvincing shade of silver-blonde. He smiled sharply when he saw you, eyes flat and hungry. He reminded you then of a shark in that moment, and you forced your hands to relax at your side.

"Director," you said, with a salute.

"Agent Strike, just the woman I was looking for." He stared at your chest, gaze slowly traveling down your form and then back up, finally gazing at your face with a dismissive sneer.

"Is there something I can help you with?" You asked, keeping your tone even, almost bored.

"You are the helpful sort, aren't you?" He asked, in a way that didn't sound complimentary.
You didn't react to the snide tone. You just stood there impassively.

"Were you going to tell me about Morrison's constant meddling in Undersecretary Kwento's affairs? It's a funny coincidence that both Morrison and Reyes were in DC with you. Didn't think to put that in your report?"

"Commander Reyes and I were in Virginia for most of our America visit, dealing with DOD contacts. I was not privy to the politicking that the Strike Commander undertook. If I remember correctly, he was in Maryland for most of it."

Petras was slowly turning a blotchy shade of red. "So you claim that you had no idea-"

"I was on leave, sightseeing when the attack on DC happened. I was immediately recalled, as were the other members of Commander Reyes' retinue." You shrugged. "The Strike Commander informed me that we were rescuing civilian VIPs and that was that. As for the Undersecretary, I was under the impression that she did not approve of Blackwatch."

Petras glowered at you. "She doesn't. She made sure to take me to task over the existence of a secret black ops division. Fortunately, she remains unaware of the actual work Blackwatch undertakes."

You smothered a grin. Yeah, Kwento still didn't approve of Blackwatch, but she wasn't actually going to move against you, not unless you guys really fucked up. But apparently, that detail wouldn't stop her from giving Petras a hard time over it. You could appreciate that level of petty.

"That uppity bitch used the attack to build her platform in the UN," Petras growled, mostly to himself. "She's been spin-doctoring the entire event." He glared past you at the wall. It looked like he was especially furious that the DC attacks completely backfired: instead of killing Kwento, they lionized her. You were particularly pleased with that outcome, and wondered just how much Petras had collaborated with Nguyen on this venture.

"Was there anything else, Director?" You asked, stepping to the side.

He stomped in front of you, blocking your exit. "We're not done, Strike." He stepped closer, his cologne turning your stomach. "I don't think you're really serious about wanting this job. I don't think you really understand your position, or the proper amount of deference you should be showing me. I think it's time you prove your loyalty." He rested his hand on his belt. "Do a good job and we can make this quick. You might even like it, you uptight bitch."

"That was never part of our deal," you said coldly, flexing your fingers involuntarily.

"Those terms are changing. Unless you want Morrison to find out that you've been reporting to me. He'll throw you out on the streets like the trash you are." Petras gave you an ugly smile.

You only shook your head, knowing full well that you could fight him, and easily win. If he'd been a tad less chauvinistic, he would have realized that dangling the job promotion was a better lever. But the scumbag was trying to dominate the situation and you, and he didn't realize that he was woefully outclassed. Still you had a cover to maintain. Sighing, you crossed your arms.

"I can handle the Strike Commander, but this is rash behavior, sir. I have no interest in such things and honestly it's really not a good idea. In light of full disclosure, I should probably tell you
"I don't give a shit," Petras snarled, shoving you against the wall. "Just get on your knees, you cheap slut. I was patient with you. I tried to help you out. But now your stupid face is pissing me off-"

You were originally going to tell him that you had Hepatitis G, a newer chronic version of the infection that didn't actually get better, resisted the antivirals, and happened to be sexually transmitted. Lacroix had rolled his eyes at the story, but said it was more acceptable than your "oozing rash" excuse. However, when you looked up and past Petras, you stopped short.

Ainsley stood there, blue eyes comically wide, clutching her tablet. Her mouth hung open and she worked her jaw a few times, eyes darting between your face and Petras' back.

Just how much had she heard? You caught sight of the Athena drone hovering up high, still recording.

Petras grabbed your collar. "Don't even think about fighting me on this, Strike. I will end you and your career. Because I'm the goddamn director and you're nobody. No one is going to believe you. So just make it easy for yourself and-"

"UNCLE!" Ainsley screamed, and that unmistakable grating high-pitched shriek had never sounded so good.

Petras immediately released you, fumbling with his belt as he whirled. "Ainsley! What are you doing here?" He glared at her. "Can't you see I'm dealing with a disciplinary issue?"

"You were assaulting Agent Strike!" Ainsley shouted back.

"The bitch asked for it! Don't you try and lie now, Strike!" Petras whirled and jabbed his finger in your face. "You scheming bitch! Trying to turn my own flesh and blood against me!"

"Lucky hasn't said a thing! I heard you myself!" Ainsley wailed. "Don't you dare start gas-lighting me!"

You raised a brow, a little surprised that Ainsley was actually arguing with the director.

Petras glanced between the two of you. "Ainsley, it's just a misunderstanding. Tell her, Strike. Tell her that it's just a misunderstanding," he demanded. "Tell her right now, you lying whore!"

You crossed your arms, wondering if Petras actually heard the mixed messages he was sending so very badly.

Now sobbing, Ainsley lunged forward, furiously pounding on Petras' back. "Leave her alone!"

You blinked, shocked as Petras stumbled, Ainsley tearing at his jacket.

"Get off me, you crazy little bitch!" Petras shoved her backward and she fell onto her ass. Swearing, he raised his hand. "Your dumb cunt of a mother never did teach you how to respect-"

Your left hand shot out and your fingers closed around his wrist. Suddenly Petras' words cut off, a pained whine scraping out of the back of his throat.
"That's enough, Director," you said coolly. "We all know that you're under a great deal of stress. Perhaps you should go sit down somewhere quiet. You're clearly overexerting yourself."

Petras stared at you with wild eyes. "You'll be sorry, Strike."

You just smiled widely, your fingers squeezing just a little tighter. "Please, let's not do anything we'll regret."

He shuddered and tried to pull away. "Release me this instant!"

You glanced at Ainsley, who was sitting on the floor, just gaping at you both.

"Of course, sir," you said politely and let go.

Off-balance, Petras wobbled as you released him. Rubbing his wrist, he glowered at you and Ainsley, before hastily retreating down the hallway, possibly toward the infirmary.

Ainsley wiped her eyes, her makeup staying firmly in place despite the tears. She took a shaky breath and began to cry harder. You rubbed the back of your neck, completely at a loss on how to respond to this reaction.

"Come on," you said, after half a minute of muffled sobs. "I'll make you a cup of tea."

Chapter End Notes

I GOT THE JOB!! Put in my two weeks notice Thursday, did my drug test today, and start in November. Thank you for all the good wishes. Seriously. I appreciate it. Your comments are the serotonin boost my brain hasn't been getting naturally.

Toying with a Halloween oneshot Slasher76 piece. It'd be set in IAL, and a roleplay scary chase through the woos, kind of thing, so basically consensual dubcon. But that would set the fic back a little.
Chapter 101

Chapter Summary

Your response to Petras' unwanted advances.

Chapter Notes

Today is the one year anniversary of posting IAL, so you get an extra long chapter, somewhat sooner than the regular update schedule. Thanks for bearing with me guys. I appreciate it. We've had quite the journey.

You sat Ainsley on your couch, brewed a pot of chamomile tea, and set some chocolates in front of her. She sniffled, dabbing at her eyes.

The chamomile was for Gabriel. Sometimes he had trouble sleeping, and while it didn't actually knock him out, it did seem to help him relax. Athena had sent you and Lacroix a copy of the video as well as an inquiry about your status.

"I'm fine," you'd typed back. "Keep Lacroix apprised." You reached into your desk and pulled out your flask of whiskey. You poured her small glass of that too and handed her the cups.

"Whiskey and herbal tea. Take the whiskey first," you said.

Ainsley nodded, and obediently downed the whiskey and set the glass on the ground. "Lucky, I'm sorry. You shouldn't be doing this. I'm not even the one that-" She broke down, crying harder.

You weren't exactly sure what you were supposed to say. Yes, it was probably disturbing to realize that one's close family member was a scummy piece of shit. But there really wasn't much you could say to make that better. Instead, you sat down beside her, the implications sinking in. Director Petras had tried to assault you. Ainsley Petras had tried to rescue you. Overwatch Barbie had tried to be a hero because she thought you couldn't handle yourself. You were going to get laughed out of Blackwatch.

"I'm sorry, I didn't know," she said, rocking back and forth.

"Know what? That the director is a sleazebag?" You shrugged. "It doesn't get spread around, but we don't leave female agents unattended around him," you said. "It's not a big deal."

She just started crying harder.

You blinked, trying to figure out what you'd said. Oh, you'd just told her that a lot of people knew that her uncle was a piece of shit who wasn't above using his position to harass women. That probably wasn't going to make her feel any better. And that wasn't even the worst of what he'd "He-he-he's done this before?" She blew her nose on the tissue you offered.

You shrugged. "Tried. But he's an old bureaucrat and I'm a combat-trained agent. His real power is over my career."

Ainsley sniffled. "I had no idea. I'm so sorry. No wonder you didn't want me to mention you to him-" She began to sip the tea, taking deep breaths. "The Strike Commander and Commander Reyes won't let him fire you, will they?"

You managed a wry smile. "I don't think so. Not without good cause."

"Because I was a witness," she said, speaking rapidly now. "I know he's my uncle, but I won't help him cover this up. I promise, Lucky. I would never. There has to be something you can do. You can get a lawyer or make a report to Internal Security-"

You shrugged. "It's my word against his," you said. "He's right. He's the director and I'm nobody."

Ainsley stared at you in horror. "That's not true! You're a hero! You can't just let him bully you into silence!"

"He's just going to retreat and lick his wounds, and if I ever mess up anything on the job, he'll do his best to crucify me for it." It was terrible, but you did kind of enjoy stringing Ainsley along. She didn't know that Athena had recorded the whole damn encounter. It was awfully petty of you, especially considering she'd tried to come to your rescue. Maybe you shouldn't be quite so mean. "Relax, Ainsley. He probably won't do anything, since you saw it. Later he'll just come to you and try to pretend like nothing happened."

"I'll call my mom. She might have some advice. She never liked him anyway," Ainsley said, a little bit of confidence returning to her voice.

You wondered what that would actually accomplish. Nothing probably, but it would be interesting to hear about.

"If you think that's wise," you said. "Honestly, don't worry about it, Ainsley. I appreciate you stepping in. It was very brave."

Ainsley gave you a weak smile. "Was it? I just... I was terrible."

She really was. But even you knew better than to say that.

"Doesn't make it any less brave," you said, because it was the truth.

"I...thank you," Ainsley hung her head. "I...do you want me to file an incident report?"

You sat there for a moment, wondering how Lacroix would want this handled. You didn't need Ainsley's report, but it wouldn't hurt either. And maybe she needed to do it, for herself. "Write one up while the memory is still fresh. Then give yourself some time to think about it. If you want to submit it, take it straight to Captain Amari. If you don't..." You shrugged. "I understand."

Ainsley bit her lip, looking like she wanted to argue. "I...OK. That makes sense." She took a deep breath. "I know he's my uncle. I know this could get messy. But I don't want you to hate..."
You raised a brow, wondering if that was the deciding factor. Ainsley Petras was trying to turn over a new leaf, maybe. But was she trying to do the right thing, because it was the right thing, or was she just worried what you thought of her? And really, did her reasons matter?

She stood up, wiping her eyes, finding no comfort in your silence. "Is my makeup OK?"

"Flawless," you said.

"Thanks." She nodded, swallowing roughly. "I'm OK now." She squared her shoulders and flipped her hair back. "I'm going to go write that report and then I'll be in touch," she said.

"All right." You watched her go. When the door had closed securely behind her, you stood up. "Athena."

"Yes Lucky?"

"Keep a very close eye on her."

"Of course... Do you really think the director will retaliate against her?"

You crossed your arms. "I don't know." Just like you didn't know if that entire encounter had been staged. Petras' ire seemed real enough. "But it's best to be safe, don't you think?"

"Yes," Athena agreed.

"You haven't said anything to Jack and Gabriel, have you?"

"No. But I would not recommend-

"I'll handle it myself," you said, glancing down at the empty glasses and chocolate wrappers that Ainsley had left behind. It looked like you were cleaning up after her emotional breakdown yet again. Rolling your eyes, you shook your head and began to straighten up, not minding it nearly as much as you had the time before.

In a treacherous, face-paced world, it was kind of nice to see that some things hadn't changed.

There was a knock on the office door as you finished sanitizing the cups. "Athena?"

"It's safe," she said, and the door popped open.

You blinked as Ziv came in, dragging Távio behind him.

"McCree's out with our favorite spoiled rich kids and I couldn't locate that weasel Tataryn," Ziv said brusquely. "Gérard specifically forbade me from approaching your stupid boyfriends, and Amélie is finishing her advanced sniper certification exam, but she'll be ready shortly so-

"Slow down," you said, noting Távio's slightly confused expression.

"He's sticking to your side for the whole weekend," Ziv said sharply. "I'd do it, but you're too annoying."
You laughed softly, because Ziv was not a good bodyguard by any stretch of the imagination. And you were nowhere near as annoying as he was. "Ziv, he has his own duties to-"

"Wilhelm's busy with the tours and Gérard already OK'd it. So don't argue," Ziv snapped, shaking his finger in your face. "Kid, you just follow her around unless she's in her boyfriends' quarters. Then you wait outside."

"Ziv, it's fine."

"No, it's not fine!" Ziv scowled, pushing his hair back. It was getting unruly again. "Fucking Ainsley Petras had to charge to your rescue!"

You exhaled slowly, really wishing he hadn't phrased it like that. "I had it under control, Ziv."

Távio's eyebrows climbed higher, and it was obvious he hadn't been briefed about what had just occurred. "Umm...what do I need to do?"

"Keep Director Petras away from Lucky. Spill coffee on him. Pull the fire alarm. Pretend you're having a seizure so she can rescue you."

"Please be more discrete than that," you said, elbowing Ziv.

Távio frowned. "What did he do?"

Ziv pursed his lips, and glowered at the door. Apparently, you had to answer this question.

"He has trouble taking "no" for an answer," you said with a shrug. "That's really all that needs to be said."

Távio's expression darkened. He glanced at Ziv, biting his lower lip. "Understood, Agent Mihret. I'll watch her six. You can count on me."

Ziv inhaled deeply. "Good. I'm trusting you, kid. Don't let us down."

You rolled your eyes, because Ziv wasn't _that_ much older than Távio, and if the two of them got into a fight, well, your hacker wasn't going to win that brawl.

"Understood," Távio gave a grim nod.

"Really, this is unnecessary, I have Athena and Tataryn will show up and be far more discrete."

"Yeah, well, Tataryn will get his turn later," Ziv said. "Now if you excuse me, I have to help Gérard filter through the surveillance footage. We have a fucking needle-dicked director to fry."

Ziv stormed out of the office, slamming the door shut.

Távio stared after him, a small smile tugging at his lips.

"He's such a drama queen," you said, shaking your head.

"He's kind of impressive," Távio said.

First you, then Reinhardt, and now Ziv? Távio was taking his cues from the worst people imaginable. You really weren't sure how to handle that.

"What would you like me to do, while we're waiting?"

He wasn't cleared for most Blackwatch intel, so you couldn't put him on the paperwork. He was supposed to stay with you, so you couldn't send him out for food. There wasn't much you could give him to do right now.

"I'm afraid this might be a boring weekend," you told him. "You can grab a book maybe?"

Távio wrinkled his nose. "Is that an order?"

"No." Shaking your head, you went to your terminal to write up your incident report.

"How do you keep making these messes, Chanceux?" Lacroix groaned, sitting in the chair across from your desk, one hand on his forehead. "And you were progressing so well..."

"Don't you dare blame me," you said, crossing your arms. "It wasn't my fault. I de-escalated. I was the very voice of restraint. Was I supposed to let him slap Ainsley around?"

"You cannot call it de-escalating if you just make him angrier, Chanceux," Lacroix said, giving you a sullen frown. "And I thought you didn't like the Petras girl?"

You shrugged. "Doesn't mean I want to see her get hurt." You re-watched the video, impressed by the picture quality and sound clarity. From his not-at-all subtle opening leer to the attempted slap, Athena had captured the entire encounter flawlessly. You had Petras dead to rights.

Lacroix took a deep breath, adjusting his emerald green tie. He'd dressed up today, sharp black suit, platinum tie pin, calla lily boutonnière. You wondered if that was because of the upcoming festivities, or if it was for more personal reasons. And then you abruptly stopped wondering because you didn't need to know what Ziv and Amélie were getting up to tonight.

"If it had just been you and Petras, you could have gotten in a scuffle. I understand. But having his niece bear witness complicates things immensely. Especially if she is dead set on opposing him. He will retaliate."

You sighed, massaging your forehead. "I didn't want Ainsley there, Lacroix. I just thought Athena could get a better recording in an isolated hallway-"

"He was far too reckless," Lacroix said, rubbing his chin. "I don't disagree. He is very upset about Adaeze's promotion and sudden interest in Overwatch affairs. He is aware of Prince's capture, and has been demanding the interrogation transcripts. We have, of course, provided some heavily edited ones, but I dislike his increased scrutiny." Lacroix made a disgusted noise in the back of his throat. "And I dislike his face. His face offends me."

"Yeah, seconded," you said, thinking about his bulbous nose and beady little eyes. "His cologne's pretty awful too." You sipped your coffee. Távio had been sent out to pick up snacks while you and Lacroix discussed your options. Jack and Gabriel had just come to terms with what happened in DC. You hated the idea of giving them something else to worry about. Being the center of so much...trouble irritated you immensely. Back in the day, you could fend it off, maybe leave town after dark. That wasn't an option here.

You could lie, but then they were going to ask why Távio was following you around. Plus, you weren't so sure you could trust Ainsley to keep her damn mouth shut. And Athena wasn't exactly keeping your secrets either.

"I don't think we can hide this from Gabriel and Jack," you said. "And I'm saying that as someone who really wants to."

"No, there are too many variables," Lacroix said, shaking his head. "You are correct. And Petras is slated to participate in many of the Family Day ceremonies. Jack and Gabriel have excellent self control, but in light of recent events, I cannot help but be...concerned." Shaking his head, the spymaster's pained expression said the rest. You were a complication.

"Sorry," you muttered. "I'm not trying to make things more difficult. I can't help being a shit magnet."

"I know," Lacroix said, waving you off. "And I do not actually blame you. Despite your reputation, you are not the cause of troublesome events. Your ill "luck" has a perfectly rational explanation."

You blinked. "Wait, what?"

"You are an agent with highly specialized talents. If you've been assigned to an operation, it is because that operation requires said talents. And if things go wrong, it is rarely because you were personally careless, but because the situation was already precarious. That doesn't mean you always make the correct call, just that the ensuing chaos isn't entirely your doing." Lacroix gave you a wry smile. "That doesn't mean that I don't expect you to be constantly improving, Chanceux. I can think of at least three ways you could have prevented this outcome."

You rested your head on the desk, already knowing one answer. "I should have stayed in the office. Less bystanders and while Athena's camera angles wouldn't be as great, we wouldn't have attracted witnesses and maybe he wouldn't have been so bold in Gabriel's territory."

"That's one," Lacroix said. "A lack of witnesses would have reduced the tension."

"I shouldn't have waited for Ainsley to react. I should have just pushed past him and walked her away before she could make a scene," you muttered. "I was, I have to admit, in shock."

"Yes," Lacroix agreed. "That would have been the optimal action. Even if Ainsley is truly neutral, she still may decline to bear witness against her uncle. If Ainsley is against us, her involvement would be harmful, but for the fact Athena was recording."

"Should I have let him slap her?" You wondered.

"No," Lacroix said with a laugh, because he knew you'd thought about slapped her multiple times. "The other option, and the one you were least likely to consider or succeed at, would be to charm him. Of course, you're very flattered by his attention. Oh, you know somewhere private you can talk... Oh, and would you look at that, Agent Decoy is looking for you and can you get a raincheck? You can barely hide your disappointment, you were so looking forward to demonstrating your loyalty." Lacroix gave you a pointed look. "That would have worked best."

"But been so much less satisfying," you said under your breath.

"You derive plenty of satisfaction from duping your opponents, Chanceux. This is no different. Deception takes skill."

He was right, of course, not that you were going to admit it. Lacroix certainly had a jeweler's eye for situational nuance. You could deconstruct interactions after the fact, but in the moment, you just weren't as smooth as Lacroix or Amélie.

"I am working on it," you said. "But I'm not you."

"I know," Lacroix said, steepling his fingers. "But you need to learn faster. I do believe I have a solution though, one that does not require excess strain on your relationships and one that will keep the director out of our hair. I was saving it for a rainy day, one I had hoped would come later than this."

"Sorry," you muttered again.

"Adaeze has all sorts of budgetary and operations queries. Small things that will amount to nothing, but she is well within her rights to demand that Petras brief her on the subjects. If she calls him soon, she can keep him occupied for a few days. Just so he misses Family Day and the PR opportunities. More importantly, he will be out of Zurich while you update Jack and Gabriel on the situation."

"We are going to nail him with this footage, right?"

"If we have to, yes. But I would rather bring him down for treason and war crimes, if I have the choice," Lacroix said. "We both know that we need to time it right. As much as I would love to oust him this very weekend, it would affect other operations..."

"I understand that for now, it's better to let him remain close enough to keep an eye on," you said.

Lacroix nodded. "Exactly." He gave you pleased smile. "Let me review our options before I contact Adaeze. Once I give you the all-clear, you may inform Gabriel and Jack of the situation."

You didn't miss how he left that task to you. Just like you didn't miss how this time he made no attempt to try to convince you to keep them in the dark.

"Keep your guard up, Chanceux. This weekend may be more dangerous than I originally anticipated."

You sent Reinhardt and the gang an apology for missing lunch, and headed to the gym with Távio in tow, knowing you wouldn't be good company just yet. Because all that calm calculating strategizing aside, you were furious.

It crept up on you, like a yawning hunger. Ainsley's selfless actions had thrown you for a loop, but after some delay your own feelings were now rising to the surface. Rage bubbled up in Fury tightened your motions and you had to remind yourself not to grind your teeth.

On top of that, you knew he wasn't done. Petras would retaliate, and now you had an even larger target on your back.

The footage would be excellent leverage, except Lacroix was right. Petras was a big fish and you needed every bit of evidence to bring him down. You didn't just want him ousted as the director, you wanted him punished for his collaboration with Talon, and if you were to get that, you needed to keep him close.

The risk to yourself was worth that. You didn't like knowing that you'd have to continuously keep your guard up. But everyone had made sacrifices for the mission, and you'd just have to deal.

"Chanceux, you look like you got some mustard in your nose," Amélie said, already waiting for you in the gym. She wore a violet unitard, her hair pulled back in a tight bun.

You touched your nose, before you realized it was another of her idioms.

"It means you look very angry," she said lightly. But there was sharpness in her smile. "And rightly so. Oh, hello there," she nodded at Távio. "You must be Távio. Ziv and Chanceux have said so much about you. All of it very interesting."

You could feel the curiosity emanating from your former student.

"Umm, pleased to finally meet you, ma'am." Távio already knew who Amélie was, most of the base did.

"Chanceux specifically mentioned your fondness for the title "ma'am." I don't see why you're so fussy," she said to you. "It can be stifling, certainly. But he's adorable when he uses it."

You glanced over at Távio who watched Amélie with big, wary eyes. Yes, he was charmed, but he was also scared. Smart boy.

"Maybe so," you agreed. "But my job isn't to teach him to be cute. My job is to make him more dangerous."

"Dangerously cute," Amélie giggled and Távio's cheeks darkened. "Oh I've made him blush!"

"I'm going to stand over there now," Távio mumbled, hands jammed in his pockets. He took a few steps away from you both.

"Was that necessary?" You sighed.

"No, but it was fun," Amélie said, booping you on the nose with her finger. "And now you look less upset." She handed you a wooden practice saber. "But I guarantee that this will cheer you up even more."

You raised a brow. You knew Amélie and Lacroix fenced, but they both seemed to prefer epee.

"Now you must be gentle with me, Chanceux," Amélie said with a wink. "This is not my strongest suit."

"Nor mine," you said, testing the weight. Most practitioners used electrical equipment for scoring, but right now you didn't care about the mental chess of fencing. You just wanted to hit something.

"We can be play at being musketeers," she said cheerfully raising her own blade. "Or pirates. Or both. I want to be the pirate. You can be the musketeer." She saluted you then.

"Rules?"

"The only rule of the high seas: no mercy," she said with a bubbly laugh.

"That's it?" You asked, and she lunged, nearly whacking you across the face with her weapon. "I thought this was one of those civilized sports. With too many stupid rules."

"It is," she agreed, as you parried another strike. "Which is why we are just going to hit each other till you feel better...you uptight musketeer."

You slid backward, barely avoiding another hit. "Now look here, you dirty pirate wench-"

"Dirty? Me?" Amélie narrowed her eyes, and suddenly she was moving twice as fast, and still amazingly graceful, the practice blade an extension of her body.

You blocked what you could, stinging slaps echoing against your arms. Snarling, you spun, jabbing your blade into her unguarded ribs.

Wincing, Amélie shot you a dirty look and kicked you in the stomach. It hurt. It actually did. And she had excellent form, but she wasn't as strong as Genji nor as casually violent as Hanzo. You staggered backward a step, and then raised your blade, your smile as savage as hers.

You lunged forward, knocking aside her saber and slamming the pommel of your weapon into her shoulder. That would leave a mark. You spun, dropping the blade and taking her to the ground. Amélie tried to knee you in the face, but you blocked it. Then she punched you in the nose, fuck decorum, and you headbutted her back.

No mercy indeed.

Both of you ended up panting and bleeding on the mats. You sat with your head tilted back, while Amélie lay face up, an odd little smile on her lips. Távio cautiously approached, bringing you each ice packs.

"Congratulations on acquiring your advanced sniper qualification," you said, breathing hard.

Amélie gave a raspy laugh. "Who told you?"
"No one. But it's you. There was never any question about you passing it with flying colors," you said, accepting the ice pack Távio handed you. "Thanks."

Amélie gave a delighted laugh. "So smooth, Chanceux. Take a girl out with your practice saber, then finish her off with compliments."

"I think I did more with my fists," you said, sitting up slowly.

"You were supposed to use your saber," Amélie complained as she applied the ice to her right eye.

"I think that would have hurt more than my fist," you said, sounding terribly nasal. "You're the one who started kicking me with your stupidly pretty ballet moves. I would have stuck to practice blades otherwise."

"I'm the pirate queen," Amélie laughed. "Of course, I'm not going to play fair."

You snorted and then regretted it, because it stung. "Sorry, I got kind of carried away."

Amélie waved her hand, but didn't get off the ground. "It is nothing, Chanceux. I volunteered."

"Yeah, but-" You paused, wondering if there was anything good to say. You normally sparred with people who were much stronger than you. Amélie certainly wasn't weak, but she wasn't a ninja assassin or a super soldier. Still you probably shouldn't compare her to someone else. Not out loud. "But I don't normally hit you in the face."

"Despite your best efforts, I am still beautiful," she said with a haughty laugh. "So please, stop this frivolous apologizing. We should be drinking wine and plotting revenge. Not the professional diplomatic revenge that Gérard is so fond of, but something truly vicious. Something vastly more personal."

"How do we arrange for a debilitating penis injury?" You asked, actually thinking about it. That was the wrong question. Which method should you use to cause a debilitating penis injury?

"Mmm," Amélie sat up slowly. "Let me think."

"The balls would be more painful," Távio volunteered, and then winced.

"But what to use? Broken glass, barbed wire, shrapnel, tasers, vise grips to cause testicular torsion..." You rubbed your chin. "Drill bits?"

"Nails, live piranhas, acid, scorpions, fire ants," Amélie continued the list. "Flesh-eating bacteria..."

Távio took a step backward, looking very queasy.

"Your friend...Claire might have some ideas," Amélie said. "I understand her organization has its own distinct trade secrets. Expanding bamboo splinters was one of them, if I remember correctly."

"Amélie, how is that even though you just busted my nose, slapped me with a wooden sword, and kicked me around the mats... How is it that you always know how to make me feel better?"
She laughed, patting you on the back. "Because I am your friend, Chanceux." She leaned closer, her voice a conspiratorial whisper. "But mostly because I am amazing."

You couldn't think of a truer answer than that.

"Can I just say that I am a big fan. I will fully admit that I am a mediocre dancer at best, and know next to nothing about the ballet scene, but you are pretty fucking awesome," Feng said. "She floats, she flows, she owns the stage." She looked at you, waiting for you to comment.

"Sure," you agreed.

Feng rolled her eyes at your lack of enthusiastic swooning. "Sometimes I forget that Lucky's a savage."

"A noble savage," Amélie said, and they both giggled.

"But seriously, watching you totally rekindled my interest in ballet, gymnastics, and acrobatics. Which is very cool because the only reason I even looked was because I had to research your tricky husband for political strategizing... And I'm doing that thing where I say too much again, aren't I?" She sighed, tilting her head back and staring up at the ceiling. "Uh...your decorating is really nice."

"Thank you," Amélie said, sounding pleased, and not the least bit perturbed.

You and Amélie had tracked down Reinhardt on the range, and "borrowed" Feng. Távio trailed behind you, carrying Isha. Zheng-bot hovered by Feng. But you didn't miss how Michael and Maggie narrowed their eyes, watching you speculatively, because they knew something was up. The biggest hint was probably all the bandages and swelling on your faces.

Amélie set little bowls of gelato in front of everyone, Isha and Távio included. She poured you a glass of red wine while you set up the emitter.

"We have two orders of business," Amélie said, passing Feng a glass of wine. "First, Lucky would like to discretely cause grave harm to Director Petras' genitals. We were wondering if you had any...shortcuts, or if we needed to do things the traditional way."

Feng raised a brow. "I..." She glanced at you. "Did he hit you? Because I thought that was Amélie and a bunch of potentially sexual tension."

You rolled your eyes. "I'm no super soldier, but I can handle one fat old bureaucrat."

"He attempted to coerce her into sex," Amélie said coolly. "And while we have enough evidence to start a trial, it would be tactically unwise to do that just yet. But that doesn't mean he should be allowed to run around unpunished and a danger to others."

Feng's eyes narrowed and she lost her easy smile, her jaw clenched. Her normally vivacious expression flattened into something desolate and merciless. You'd only seen that look on her face once, right before she'd lifted Fa Hai by the throat and let him have it at the blood oath ceremony. You thought perhaps, this was the Feng that ran On Sing. This was the Feng that killed to save her family.

"I really fucking hate rapists," she said, each word carefully pronounced and vibrating with fury. "And the rich ones are always the worst."

"Is there someone you'd like us to kill for you?" You asked, meaning every word of your offer.

Feng just laughed harshly. "Oh no, he didn't hurt me." There was no humor on her face, only bitterness. "And I killed him myself, long before I became the super cool Triad tech innovator that I am now, so don't worry about it. Just old blood under the bridge."

You were pretty sure the phrase was "water under the bridge," but you understood the meaning. Feng was young, fresh out of college. Yet you hadn't seen that controversy in her background. Maybe you should have dug deeper. Or maybe Feng had always been a bit dangerous. It shouldn't surprise you, not after you met her parents.

"I suppose a small bomb would do the trick. Though I do have realistic robot spiders with injector fangs. We could always use a specialized toxin on the area. Maybe induce necrosis..." Feng said thoughtfully. "Obviously, we have to be discrete."

"Chemical castration is also an option if you are trying to avoid permanent damage," Zheng said. "I have a few formulas on hand. They have varying efficacy based on dosage and are harder to trace than a lot of other external elements: usually they're passed off as a hormonal imbalance. But we could render him impotent for a year easily."

"But can we make that more painful?" Amélie asked.

"Oh yes, he needs to suffer," Feng said rubbing her chin. "And there are so many ways to cause discomfort to soft tissue..."

"Teeny tiny bear trap in his chair," you said, clapping your hand shut.

Feng laughed. "I thought you wanted to make it look like an accident."

"Yeah, that's probably wise."

"Umm, bullet ant bites are really painful," Távio said. "But they don't cause any permanent damage. The pain goes deep and it kind of feels like you've been shot..." He winced, like he knew all this from personal experience.

"The bullet ant actually stings," Zheng said. "Though it is terribly agonizing, and it is an understandable mistake to assume it was a bite, especially if you experienced it personally."

Távio shrugged. "Worst pain in my life, and I've run through Agent Strike's penal exercises."

"Pfft, they're nothing compared to Sergeant Chang's," you said.

Távio flinched. "Probably still not as bad as the ant sting."

"Don't tell her that," you said.

"Timed release of the bullet ant venom directly to the genitals to prevent usage..." Feng said thoughtfully. "I think this might be one of those unethical things I haven't thought the whole way through. Yeah, when has that ever stopped me before?" She laughed.

"Or we could just get bullet ants and put them in his laundry," you said. "I'm not picky."
"Robotic ants DNA-keyed to the target so there is no collateral damage," Feng said. "They could return home to be refilled and continue the cycle..." She glanced at Zheng. "Can you have Bayan send some of the venom over? Don't tell him what it's for. He gets upset when I do questionable things."

"Maybe just one bullet ant sting, and then a dose of your castration chemical?" You said after a moment, because you didn't want Petras getting suspicious. "That way it seems causal of the impotence effect and he doesn't suspect some kind of conspiracy. I at least want him out of the way for the weekend."

"That's terribly sensible. We can adjust the plan to match his biology and reactions," Feng said. "I approve. Give me a few hours. And hey, I think I'm going to offer this as a service. I'll have to run it by Bayan first. He'll probably complain about the ethics of going around chemically castrating people I don't like, but as long as they're rapists..."

Your gelato was melting and you took a bite, savoring the smooth richness of the chocolate and coffee flavors.

Isha sat there eating her gelato with a tiny spoon. When it was mostly gone she put the spoon down and began to lick the bowl. She had chocolate smeared on her face and feathers. You were going to have to bathe her later.

"I have been meaning to ask you," Amélie said, turning her expectant smile on Feng. "Will you be bringing more raptors out?"

Feng looked up from her gelato and blinked a few times at Amélie. "Oh yeah. We're going to start marketing them soon. We've done some in-house ad campaigns but everything either looks too scary, like they belong in a gladiatorial arena, or too docile, like I'm marketing a bunch of mutant turkeys. I get that the dinosaurs will sell themselves, but nothing sends quite the right message."

"Wait...dinosaurs?" Távio muttered to himself, glancing at Isha.

Oh, right. You hadn't told him. He thought she was a mutant bird. Oops.

"Isha's a velociraptor, but a friendly one," you said.

"Pfft, she's kind of snobby if you ask me," Feng scowled and then quickly smiled when Isha looked up at her. "Which is perfectly fine, because you're my adorable raptor-niece."

Isha snorted and went back to licking her gelato bowl.

"So, I had an idea. Amélie and a fancy-feathered, color-coordinated raptor posing together eating chocolate, or drinking wine, and being sophisticated," you said. "I thought a diamond collar, but I realize that I might just be really gauche."

Feng blinked. "No. No, that's good. That's really good. Don't show them as pit fighters or overgrown chickens. They are beautiful rare treasures that require respect."

"And money, lots of money," Távio coughed.

Feng laughed. "Yeah, that too. Hey...so I know you don't model any more," she said batting her eyes at Amélie. "But would you and a raptor friend like to pose for our ad campaign? The models would be loaners, but I can arrange for your own hatchling at a time of your choice."
Amélie gave you both a sly look. "It is possible. Though I would require some creative control on the project should you wish my involvement. For example, I think you would do better if you photographed several models with their raptor companions. In fact, I think Chanceux and Isha should definitely occupy a place in the shoot."

"Hey, leave me out of this..." You muttered.

"Yeah, multiple subjects. Same theme. Pick a palette and color-coordinate it..." Feng murmured, looking around Amélie's room. "Black for Lucky and Isha. Something purple or red for Amélie..." Feng began typing on her watch. "OK. This is great. Do you want my people to talk to your people or do you just want to contact me directly? Lucky has all the details. Athena and your husband probably do too."

"I think we can work together very well, Feng," Amélie said, looking terribly pleased. "Thank you so much, Chanceux for introducing us."

Both Feng and Amélie beamed at you, catching you mid-bite, with a spoonful of gelato.

"Yeah, thanks Lucky. You always give me the best ideas. I swear, you really are going to have to come work for me some day..."

Slipping into the hotel room that evening wasn't difficult at all. Petras rarely stayed in the Overwatch dorms, favoring luxury hotels, which were actually pretty easy to infiltrate. No one ever paid attention to the cleaning staff, and you placed the little bot on the loofah hanging up in the shower. It was the size of a grain of rice and actually resembled a tick. But it had been loaded with bullet ant venom and a dose of antiandrogens. The bot itself would be washed down the shower drain and biodegrade within a week. Petras tested negative for allergies to the venom, so you weren't worried about killing him, though that might have been a bonus. The venom would only cause pain for a day or two, but the specially-formulated hormone agonists would stay in his system for over a month.

Zheng would be piloting the bot, to ensure the right target was reached and no bystanders were harmed. You walked out casually. Távio was in hallway, keeping watch in a bellhop uniform that was slightly too big, and Feng had driven the getaway car. Amélie stayed behind to update Lacroix on your...informal operation after you'd left headquarters, because it was easier to ask for forgiveness than permission.

It was after midnight when you finally got out of the hotel. You got a late start, having had to wait for Feng's special delivery to arrive and for her to calibrate the bot. According to Athena, Petras was still out carousing at a private gentleman's club. You weren't sure if she was directly tracking him or his Overwatch security team, but you were grateful for the help.

"Also, Amélie has already informed her husband of our little "prank." And Athena has been asked to pass on his...disapproval over methodology. Do not worry; she doubts that he is going to stay angry. He was laughing too hard," Zheng said as you climbed into the car. "You have the go ahead to inform your lovers about the situation."

"How many places can you split your consciousness between?" You asked Zheng as you buckled your seatbelt.

"That is a very personal question." Zheng's floating orb managed to sound terribly
"...Sorry," you said. "I didn't know."

"She can be at least three places at once, but it's a strain," Feng said.

Zheng's orb pulsed a displeased shade of red.

"Most higher level omnics can do between two and five, so she's a little sensitive about it. The human brain isn't really calibrated for that kind of thing, so she's really quite talented," Feng added quickly.

"...But our..." You trailed off, realizing that maybe you shouldn't be so open about this topic, especially not in a rental car with a rookie agent. Athena was aware of the entire Overwatch campus, and several individual drones. You'd counted a dozen at once, but it could be more than that.

"She's special," Feng said grimly, and it sort of bothered you that she understood exactly what you were not saying. "We don't even know how she is that special, if you catch my drift. It shouldn't be possible, not with the hardware I've seen. But it isn't all hardware. There are other factors. I mean you've heard of god-programs."

Távio swallowed audibly.

Everyone had heard of god-programs. They were the supervillain masterminds of the Omnic Crisis. The smart, body-seizing virus hives that could take control of robot bodies and infiltrate almost any open computer networks.

"Usually they come about on accident and thankfully are difficult to replicate due to unusual circumstances. Like Auntie doesn't qualify, but her weirdness is on par with that sort of thing. Maybe some of her abilities. But you know this already," Feng said, giving Távio a pointed look.

"This is one of those "Blackwatch knows discretion" moments that I have been educated on," he said. "I know better than to ask questions, repeat what I have heard, or make smarmy remarks." He gave an agreeable nod. "Ma'am."

You rolled your eyes.

"Good," Feng said, sounding satisfied. "Anyway, I know one about came from the aftereffects of a solar flare. One of the first ones came from a dying omnium in the South China Sea: that one didn't work out so well, probably kicked off the Omnic Crisis, in case you didn't know. Something came out of Tunguska, we're still not sure what and the Russians are simultaneously murderously secretive and insanely terrified of any mention of it. Lucheng had one go bad. Vishkar had one go really bad and the other self-destructed. I know several militaries have been trying to develop their own. Usually, they do have massive hardware though. Like entire facilities built to house them..."

You paused, digesting that for a moment. Because you'd always known Athena was amazing. You just hadn't realize the technical degrees of it. You weren't even sure there was a central control unit that housed her consciousness. "I see."

"Good," Feng said cheerfully. "Because I still don't."
Jack was waiting for you at the entrance to the motor pool, dressed down in black fatigues. "Just where have you been?" he asked, frowning at you and Feng. "I thought you were going to spend some time with Maggie and Michael. They've been with Reinhardt all day." The accusation was clear in his voice.

"...I...sorry about that," you said sheepishly, though spending a day with Reinhardt honestly didn't seem that bad. Two days? Maybe you'd be exhausted. "Umm, I...had things to do that I will tell you and Gabriel all about in a minute."

"Things you could take Feng on, but not my..." Jack rubbed his forehead. "On second thought, I'll wait for Gabe." He narrowed his eyes as he caught sight of Távio. "Huh. Wait a minute, Feng-"

"Lucky will tell you all about it, Jack," she said, cheerfully. "Come on Távio, you can walk me back to the Strike Commander's quarters. Otherwise I might get lost, and that would be horrible."

"...Sure thing," Távio said, smiling nervously as he made his escape.

You sighed as you watched them go, walking away briskly. They couldn't have helped you, not really, but it still felt like you were being abandoned to the wolves.

Shaking his head, Jack headed down the hall toward Gabriel's quarters. He took a glance at you over his shoulder and his frown deepened. He stopped, head cocked to the side as he examined your face. "Who hit you?"

"Amélie," you said. "We were using wooden sabers...and whatever else was handy. Like our hands."

Jack blinked, obviously not expecting that answer. "...Is everything all right between you two?"

"Great. Amélie's great. She's an amazing friend," you said, nodding nervously. Because now that you had gotten some of the anger out of your system, you realized that you hadn't spent much time thinking about how you were going to tell Gabriel and Jack what had happened today. And there was a lot to tell.

The two of you reached Gabriel's quarters too quickly; you still didn't have a good answer, except the unvarnished truth, and honestly, you didn't like that option at all. Maybe a cyanide capsule instead? Jack got the door and you hung your head as you entered.

Gabriel sat on the couch reading an actual book, with an open bottle of beer. He shot Jack a wry look. "Uh oh. Did you have to bail her out of lockup? Was she out scrapping again?"

"With Amélie," Jack said, not sounding amused. "Because she was upset. That's all she'd
"We were in public," you said, uneasily as you kicked off your shoes and sat down beside Gabriel. "I'll tell you the whole story here in a minute."

Jack took the spot on your other side. "First, I want to say that nobody complained about your absence. Reinhardt isn't upset at all. My siblings are disappointed, but I know that because I'm their brother, not because they said anything to me. And I'm really wracking my brain to try and piece together what was so important that you blew them off and then took Feng and Maeda Vargas offsite." He stared at the table unhappily. Gabriel passed him his beer and he drained it.

You winced, because when he said it like that, it did look really irresponsible.

"But you're a grown ass woman, and we trust your judgment. So maybe you can tell us what's going on," Gabriel said, setting his book down. "Because no one's told us anything. And obviously something is going on."

You rubbed the back of your neck. "It's a long story."

"We have time," Jack tilted his head sideways, his expression flat.

"I'm sorry. I'm not trying to get out of it. I'm just...embarrassed." You stared at the ceiling, wondering if you should just show the video and be done with it. But you needed to use words too. You just weren't sure how to start. Rubbing your forehead, you blew out a breath. "First off, I want to say, I'm uninjured, except for the friendly smacking around I got from Amélie. No one hurt me, and I'm OK."

Gabriel gave you a sharp look, one arm resting on the cushion behind you. Jack turned to face you, knees brushing against yours.

"Secondly, I am really embarrassed," you said, each word stilted and awkward. "This story has two parts. Let me cover the first half, field your questions, and then I can explain the offsite thing afterward." You stared at Gabriel's coffee table, the dark wood scuffed from Jack's allergy to coasters and someone's penchant for putting their feet up. "There's a video too."

"Why don't you tell us what happened first? In your own words." Gabriel's arm rested on your shoulders.

"Petras cornered me in a hallway today. Tried to...make demands." You bit your lip, not looking at either of them. "I swear I would have had the situation under control, but...Ainsley walked in on it. Flipped her shit and uh...tried to save me. Petras freaked out and stormed off. "You shook your head. "Athena recorded the whole thing. Had to calm Ainsley down and made a report to Lacroix. He assigned Távio as my...shadow, and then I sparred with Amélie.""

"Back up," Jack held up his hand. "What kind of demands was Petras making?"

"Improper ones of a sexual nature," you said, trying not to fumble the technical words. You stared at your hands, knowing that making the explanation as unemotional as possible wasn't actually going to keep them from getting upset.

"Gabe and I were on site all day. Why are we just now hearing about this?" Jack's voice dropped an octave, his words clipped.

"Because we wanted a plan of action in place before I came to you," you said.
Jack narrowed his eyes. "We? As in Gérard and you?"

You nodded.

"And I'm sure Gérard wanted to put some space between the director and us. He isn't looking to cover-up a high profile murder tonight," Gabriel said as he got up and retrieved his tablet from the kitchen table. Wordlessly, he brought up the video and played it, from Petras walking toward you, ill-intent clear on his face, to the part where you helped Ainsley off the floor, offering her a cup of tea. Petras' language had been as harsh and offensive as you remembered it.

Jack tensed beside you, cold fury etched on his face, his eyes hard, his lips drawn back in a snarl. Gabriel stared at the screen, outwardly calm, but his jaw twitched, eyes dark. You knew him too well. Something dangerous churned beneath the surface.

"What actions did you take?" Gabriel turned to look at you, brows heavy, words clinically precise.

"Precautions first," you said. "Lacroix and I decided that he would probably seek retaliation. We have extra eyes on Ainsley, just to monitor the situation. And I'm not going anywhere alone. Umm, and Amélie, Feng, and Zheng might have helped me put together a plan to keep him...away from the Family Day festivities, and out of our hair. Which is what we were coming back from," you said, and hurriedly explained the bullet ant venom as well as the temporary chemical castration.

"Let me get this straight," Jack said, his voice low. "You ran an unsanctioned mission with Overwatch personnel against the organization director, utilized On Sing assets for said mission, and neglected to inform any of your commanding officers of this venture. Not to mention you utilized questionable chemical weaponry against a civilian?" His voice grew louder and more ragged with every question. "Please tell me why you thought that was a good idea!"

"When you put it like that, it sounds kind of bad," you admitted. "Operationally, I have no justification." You flinched, because maybe you shouldn't have been that blunt. "But I thought, and Lacroix backed me on this, that it would be best to have a handle on Petras before we informed you of what transpired today. Because you love me, and you're protective, and I didn't want to come you like a victim."

You stared at your feet, and there was a hole in your sock. You kept your eyes on it, not quite willing to look at Gabriel or Jack just yet. Because maybe sneaking into Petras' hotel room and planting a small attack robot wasn't the wisest course of action. But it was poetic justice, no one could deny that.

"I was also worried about how you would react," you said. "Not because I don't trust you, but because you are protective. Because I've had enough close calls lately and I know it's been hard on you. I...wanted to take care of it myself."

The couch creaked as Jack rose. He paced in front of you, shoulders drawn up, fists clenched behind his back. He wasn't looking at you or Gabriel.

You sat there, hands in your lap, unsure of what to say.

"How would you react if the roles were reversed? If some politician tried to coerce Jack or me?" Gabriel asked softly, resting one hand on the back of your neck. He didn't have to ask, not really, when your reaction to Ainsley's flirtations with Jack hadn't been entirely reasonable. They could also bring up the time Kwento's light banter with Gabriel put you in a fighting mood.
"I would be furious," you said hesitantly, tasting more trouble in your words.

Gabriel nodded. "Jack is. I am. Not that Petras' actions are in any way your fault. But you didn't have to tiptoe around like you can't trust me or Jack to behave."

"I...Kwento," you said, recalling the flight back from DC.

"I thought that was masterfully done. No voices were raised. No harsh words exchanged. No feelings hurt," Gabriel continued, warm hands squeezing your shoulders. "Neither of us has behaved unreasonably. You should have more faith in us."

"I...you're right." You winced. "I got caught up in trying to handle everything myself. And I didn't want to worry you, either," you said glumly. You glanced at Jack who had lapsed into a dangerously quiet state.

"That's fucking ridiculous," Jack scowled at you. "We're in a relationship. It's my privilege to worry about your reckless, insubordinate, impulsive ass." He leaned forward, gripping your arms. "You should already know that if you're hurt, upset, scared... whatever, you can come to us and we won't think any less of you for it. You're supposed to come to us," he shouted.

"I'm sorry," you said.

Jack blew out a breath, brow furrowed as he studied your face.

"I do trust you. I just...tunnel-visioned," you muttered. "And I didn't want him to go after someone else. Figured this was the neatest way to keep things under control."

"Damn right, you tunnel-visioned," Jack glared down at you. He released your arms and you blinked as he walked out of the room, shutting the door firmly behind himself.

You hunched over, not entirely sure what you were supposed to do next. You took a shaky breath and looked over at Gabriel, wondering if he was going to tell you off next.

He sat there, a wry smile on his face. "So, bullet ant venom?" He patted your cheek. "Whose suggestion was that?"

"Uh..." You weren't sure if you should give Távio credit, or if it would be wisest to leave him out.

"Not yours obviously," Gabriel said gruffly. "Is it going to be like that then?"

"No," you sighed. "I just...it's my fault. Shouldn't have thrown together a revenge mission and dragged the others into it with me."

"I know that," Gabriel said, firmly. "But I thought you were going to be up front about this."

"It was Távio's idea: it hurts like hell but doesn't cause permanent damage, unless you're allergic and his medical files indicated that he isn't. The antiandrogens probably won't either: that was Zheng. He just won't be able to get it up for a month, not without intervention anyway."

Gabriel stroked his beard, expression thoughtful. "Come here," Gabriel said, patting his lap. You scooted over and he wrapped his arms around your waist, his chest warm against your back. "That was a stupid move, idiota. You pull something like that again and your ass is suspended."
"Sorry," you muttered, grateful for the comfort of his touch.

"Jack hates that kind of thing, and you know it. He's a lot more law and order than Blackwatch. There are rules in place for a reason, if you're going to break them, he wants to make sure that there's oversight."

"I know." You were seeing shades of Spinshot and Cologne, and worse: Mongolia, I Need Coffee, and how you'd left Gabriel out of the loop that time. You were supposed to learn from your mistakes. "I was really stupid."

"You were," Gabriel said, tone mild. "It's part of your charm."

"Do I need to go sleep on the couch or babysit the visitors while you guys cool off? Because I know I fucked up."

Gabriel chuckled in your ear. "You don't get out of this conversation that easily, chica." He tightened his hold on you. "And I don't think I should let you out of my sight any time soon."

You laughed weakly at that. "OK." You turned around to face him. "You're being awfully reasonable."

"One of us has to be," he said, shaking his head and giving you a pointed look. "In fact, I usually am. Despite what you may think."

You winced. "Yeah, you are. I...I'm sorry."

"I am furious about Petras, corazón. I'm not happy that you didn't think you could just come to us. That you didn't trust us to behave rationally-"

"That wasn't my intent-"

"But I also know that you were reeling from his assault and you needed a chance to reassert yourself. It doesn't excuse your behavior, but I understand." He cupped your cheek. "Sometimes I worry that we're giving you a complex. You work so hard not to be seen as weak, and we don't view you that way. But you're overcompensating."

"...You're probably right," you said, closing your eyes. "It's not you. It's one of those dysfunctional survivor's traits I picked up." Because you lived in a world where weakness was a death sentence. Even if you were on your last legs, you couldn't fucking show it. You had to power through and hope that would be enough.

"I know. But I wonder if we're making it worse..." He trailed off, shaking his head. "Not just Jack and me. Blackwatch. Shit Spiders. Everything."

You shrugged, unprepared for that conversation.

"While Jack's still sorting himself, I do have to admit, that was an impressive little op you put together," Gabriel said, with a crooked smile. "You, Amélie, crazy Feng, and a fucking rookie Overwatch agent came up with a fairly sophisticated plan, executed it without getting caught, and all in half a day." He practically glowed with pride, and you felt yourself grinning.

"I mean, we had Athena and Zheng too."

"It's an advantage, sure, but you knew how to properly utilize it." Gabriel stroked your cheek. "And this impotence formula actually sounds like an interesting trick. I hadn't really thought along those lines. Not something we can use regularly, but in certain circumstances? Well, I think you're onto something. And the bullet ant venom? That has some interesting applications..."

"We are shady as fuck," you said, a little taken back by how interested in the logistics Gabriel was. And he didn't look nearly as angry as Jack. More like he approved of your methods, though you were smart enough not to bring that up right now.

"Yeah," Gabriel was unapologetic. "Try not to look smug about it in front of Jack. He's not as understanding as I am about your rogue operation."

You hugged Gabriel. "Thank you."

"I'm still angry," he said. "You should have come to me about Petras. It irks me that you go to Lacroix first." He meant not just this time, but the incident before, when you'd gotten to slap Lacroix around on the mats.

"I...try to focus on the counterstrike first," you said. "I need that measure in place. That solution. And then I get angry and want to hit things." You paused. "And then, I guess I finally realize I need comfort, and I am vulnerable; that's when I'm ready to come to you."

Gabriel was silent for a moment. "That makes sense." He rubbed your back, his touch almost too firm. "Still want to be kept in the loop."

"I'll work on it," you said, resting your head on Gabriel's shoulder.

The door opened, and you looked up. Jack came back inside, this time closing the door carefully behind him. His cheeks were pink and he was breathing hard, like he'd taken a quick run around the building.

You looked up at him, and whatever he saw in your expression made his face soften. He crouched in front of you, resting his arms on the back of the couch. "I'm mad that you didn't come to us immediately after it happened."

"I know," you said. "I'm sorry. I just told Gabriel that I have to digest it in steps. It's almost...compulsive. As bad as being overly emotional, but without the hysterics."

"I understand," Jack said, with a heavy sigh. "I get that you "handled" it. That you want to protect us, even though we weren't the ones in danger."

"Maybe for a murder charge," Gabriel volunteered.

Jack shot him a dirty look. "Not helping, Gabe." He pressed his forehead to yours. "But neither of us would think any less if you came to us right afterward. If you asked us for help. Hell, I would have paid Zheng for the ammo ant venom personally."

You gripped his fingers, knowing that admission cost him something. "I'm sorry. I'm bad at this. I just wanted you to worry less and maybe I wanted to regain some of my pride. It's dumb, I know, but I was rescued by Ainsley Fucking Petras, OK? That is some demoralizing shit." You hung your head. "Like dishonorable discharge level failure."

Jack exhaled, one corner of his mouth turning up slightly. "Yeah, I guess so."

"Sorry, I'm dumb."

"No, you have too much cleverness, too little good sense, and a one-track mind," Jack rested his forehead against yours. "It's a terrible combination."

Gabriel laughed, his body shaking against yours. "You are one to talk, Jackie."

"Now's not the time," Jack grumbled. "Unsanctioned op, sneaky girlfriend, man we need to kill. Focus, Gabe. You cut her more slack than she deserves."

You hung your head, knowing it was true. Gabriel did let you get away with things, like sleeping in, going rogue, and murder.

"It's nothing I haven't done for you too, amor," Gabriel said, not sounding bothered by the accusation. "Oh look, Gérard has sent us a message." You could hear the amusement in his voice. "It seems Director Petras is in extreme pain after an intimate shower encounter with a...lady he brought home from an evening on the town. She is being investigated, though it's speculated that the old man most likely overexerted himself today... Still, there is a good chance he's going to be missing out on the festivities."

You snorted, laughing into Gabriel's shoulder.

"Mission accomplished," Gabriel said, with a smirk.

Jack huffed. "Don't encourage her Gabe. I want to rip Petras' dick off and feed it to him, but that doesn't excuse you going rogue, sweetheart."

"...I know," you said, trying very hard not to giggle.

"There need to be consequences," Jack said. "Personally, I'd put you back on training duty for a month." he said, sounding severe. "But Gabe needs all the help he can get right now. So I'm letting you off with a deferment: Ana might choose to pursue other disciplinary actions. But for now you're on family tour duty for the entire weekend. If I can't keep you out of trouble, then maybe a bunch of children can. Fareeha is due in tomorrow. Torby's daughter Brigitte will be joining us. And I think Gabe said you're picking up Tataryn's daughter. You're going to be responsible for them for most of the weekend."

You winced. "Can I request help? Like steal Jesse or something?"

"Sure," Gabriel said. "Take the Shimadas too. You're going to need help with all the kids anyway."

"Are you sure it's wise to put Hanzo with...children?" You asked.

"No, but I'll leave it up to your discretion," Gabriel said.

Jack climbed over the back of the couch, and wrapped his arms around both you and Gabriel. He kissed the top of your head, exhaling slowly. "I love you. I'm glad you're all right."

"Love you too," you said, tilting your head up to kiss his cheek. "Sorry I'm giving you gray hairs."

"I don't have any gray hairs," Jack scowled, fingers combing through his hair. "We need to get back to my quarters soon. Who knows what Maggie and Feng are getting up to unattended?"

You hugged him back. "So...no makeup sex then?"

Jack's eyes darkened. "Now, I didn't say that..."
Jack rolled onto his side, unable to relax, even though you had all made it back to the comfort his bedroom. Gabriel shifted slightly. He was on his back, and just turned his head to face Jack. You lay between them, though you had tunneled under the covers, your face buried against Gabriel's chest, a little bit of your hair visible from under the blankets.

"Can't sleep?" Gabriel murmured, his voice low.

"Guess not," Jack shook his head ruefully and scooted closer, his arms tightening around your waist. You made an grumbling sound, but didn't move. "We need to do something about him. It's only going to get worse."

"I know," Gabriel said, grimly.

"Ainsley "helping" her will only enrage him." Jack said. He'd already made the calculations. "He won't let this go. He's going to escalate."

"I know," Gabriel said, shutting his eyes. "He's come after both you and her. And he's won't stop. I don't even have a clue what his obsession with you is all about. Believe me, Jack. I want nothing more than to press his skull between my palms and squeeze."

"Maybe poke your thumbs in his eyes while you're at it," Jack said, not at all bothered by how dark the pillow talk had gotten. "Honestly, I think it should last longer. I know it's been awhile since I've done a formal enhanced interrogation, but it's like riding a bike. You never really forget how."

Gabriel chuckled. "That's fucked up, amor."

"We all are," Jack murmured, kissing the top of your head and then Gabriel's cheek. "I hate this, Gabe. I hate that he came near her. I hate that she didn't come to us immediately. I hate that she felt like she had to do it on her own."

"I know," Gabriel sighed. "She's kind of dumb though, like you."

Jack snorted. "You better hope she's really asleep."

Gabriel just smiled. "After all that makeup sex? Jack, you had her begging for mercy after the first round."

Jack felt a smug smirk tug the corners of his mouth upward. You'd been breathless and shaking underneath him, the headboard rattling as he fucked you into Gabriel's mattress. No one had been in the mood for "gentle," least of all you. "You didn't cut her any slack either, papi."

Gabriel grinned. "It's how she wanted it. Papi knows best." His smile faded. "But I understand, Jack. He's been trying to professionally sabotage you too. If anyone should be doing something, it's me. The fucker came after my lovers."

"Gabe, if you go after him and don't bring me along, you're sleeping on the couch for a month."

Gabriel chuckled. "Then we had better invite her along too. She called "dibs" after all."

"She got to make her own fun. It's our turn," Jack said, not too keen on having you in the same room as Petras. Sure, you could take him, he knew that rationally, but his gut instinct balked at the idea of having you in the same room as that bastard. Petras threatened you. Jack would take care of the threat. Gabriel could help. You just needed to stay safe.

"Isn't that what we were upset with her for? Taking a big risk? Leaving us out of the loop?
After all this, if anyone deserves to finish him off, it's her."

Jack blinked, a little taken aback by how much thought Gabriel had put into this. He'd just wanted to drop in through the skylight and bludgeon Petras to death in his penthouse suite. Maybe steal something to make it look like a robbery gone wrong. Grab some of the tech for Mihret to analyze, and boom, everything was all done!

Of course it would never be that easy. Jack sighed, shaking his head. "You're right, damnit.
We can't just run off to assassinate Petras and not invite her along. She'll be furious."

"I know, you goddamn hothead." Gabriel reached out, resting one hand of Jack's cheek. "I'll run some scenarios by Gérard."

"Really?" Jack raised a brow. "I thought we'd keep this quiet-" He wrinkled his nose.
Gérard was focused on the big picture and he could admit to himself that this was less about grand strategy and all about protecting the ones he loved.

"For all their sniping and bluster, Gérard is very fond of her," Gabriel said softly. "He isn't joking when he calls her his "favorite pupil." I think it's because the two of them are so damn sneaky. Maybe because she and Amélie are friends too." Gabriel chuckled. "If we're going to assassinate the director, then it would be best to have his input on our plans. It's not like he's going to object on moral grounds."

Jack nodded, kissing Gabriel's palm. "If you're planning the op, I trust your judgment. Just let me know when. I'm in."

Gabriel leaned over to kiss his forehead. "I love you, Jack. There isn't anything I wouldn't do to keep you safe. And the same goes for her."

"I know," Jack said, a heavy lump in his throat. "I feel the same way." He squeezed Gabriel's hand. "Promise me that you won't do this solo-"

"I just said I would bring you both along! I'm not the one who went rogue this year," Gabriel snorted. "You and her, you're both ridiculous idiots. I'm the responsible one."

Warmth coiled in Jack's stomach and he snuggled closer. "You're absolutely right, Gabe.
What we do without you?"

Gabriel muttered something uncomplimentary in Spanish, and hugged you both. Jack threw his leg over yours, ankles tangling with Gabriel's calves. Gabriel sighed, fingers interlaced with Jack's. And through it all, you slept, safe and warm between them.

Chapter End Notes

I'm going to try to start the Halloween oneshot tonight, probably. It will impact the regular update, but I think you guys might forgive me? Maybe?

I called this my therapy fic, partially because I only thought I'd be addressing grieving issues, partially because it was self-indulgent as fuck, and then it kind of ballooned into other things. Yes, I complained a lot about my job and personal neurosis in the end notes. And it helped, I appreciate the support, or at least no one saying "you're so whiny," even if I was. It's easier to complain about work than say "I'm really fucking depressed and I'm not seeing much hope right now." It's easier to say "yeah, that's my whole generation" rather than "I have a problem." It's easier to write a story about people your character loves dying, than talk about the people that you loved who died.

Because I've had a hard time coping with all the shit that's happened in the past couple of years, but I'm also really well-versed at appearing perfectly fine to the people around me, because I'm used to being the responsible one, the one who handles all the crises, and that takes it toll. I kind of forgot how to ask for help, and writing about making Lucky do it, reminded me that sometimes I need to do it as well. There were other things, being "ethically petty," respecting healthy boundaries, and that elusive difference between "fault" and "responsibility."

So, honestly, thank you guys for all the comments, reviews, ko-fi, fanart, playlists, just being around. Because it's kept me writing this, and I know this fic has been good for me. (Maybe not my social life, but I've always been an introvert.) Addressing these issues has been good for me. And I hoped it's helped some of you out too.

And getting a new job hasn't fixed everything, but honestly, I just feel 100% better about life. I'm not going to be rich, but I can afford to put money in savings. I can afford my cat's stupidly expensive prescription food. I can put some money aside for teen!cousin for his college. I bought some Overwatch figurines on clearance without any guilt, because I can treat myself a little more now.

Also, it's totally leveled up my writing skills and I want to write original novels again. So, hooray for that! Sorry about ramble, our fic!anniversary has made me maudlin.
Chapter 102

Chapter Summary

Family Day socializing and secret-spilling.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

The alarm went off, and you groaned, knowing it was your turn. Slowly, you rolled out of bed, giving Gabriel an envious look as you scrounged your clothes off the dresser. Gabriel sighed and rolled over, the sheets bunching around his hips, giving you a nice view of his well-muscled back.

Isha lay in her bed, burrowed under her stuffed dog. You knew better than to wake her. She'd be grumpy and cuddly, which was a bad combination when she had long talons.

Jack was already gone, preparing for the opening ceremonies and checking in with Ainsley and Reinhardt for event preparation. As Blackwatch Commander, Gabriel didn't have any such duties.

You pulled on the violet and black tennis dress with black compression shorts. Amélie had picked this out, proclaiming it sporty, comfortable, and flirty. You glanced in the mirror, your hair still mussed, your eyes half open. The outfit looked fine. You looked like you needed to go back to bed.

Maggie was asleep on the couch, Michael and Feng were sprawled out on the floor in sleeping bags. Feng was on her back snoring. Zheng's orb hovered nearby, glowing a faint pink color.

You splashed water on your face, brushed your teeth, and put on some makeup. Because today you were dealing with a crowd of people, and you might as well look civilized. Putting your hair back, you decided that this was as respectable as you were going to look before coffee, and left the bathroom.

You stopped by the bedroom to give Gabriel a quick kiss, and he chuckled sleepily.

"You look cute, corazon."

You just grabbed his ass in response and he gave a low growl. "See you later?"

"Later," he murmured. "I have some things to do this morning. I'll meet up with you and the kids when I get chance."

You kissed him again, and headed out the door, Tataryn and an Athena drone already waiting for you in the hall.
Tataryn drove, stopping to pick up breakfast and coffee. You were only half awake, the coffee cup so wonderfully warm against your gloves.

"Morrison's siblings are here?"

"The two younger ones."

"You are also taking care of Fareeha?"

"Apparently. Torby's oldest daughter too. And Feng." You leaned back in the seat. "Maybe I should leave the country. Change my name. Take up blacksmithing."

Tataryn snorted. "The boss would find you."

"Yeah, he's invited. It's all these kids I'm worried about." You yawned as you pulled up through the gates of the Institut Montana. You trudged alongside Tataryn through the checkpoints, still waking up.

"Tato, Ms. Lucky," Kseniya stood in front of her bedroom door, wearing strawberry printed shorts and a pink Pachimari t-shirt. Her hair was up in two puffs, and she wore a very full backpack. She rocked back on her heels, grinning up at you both. "I get to spend the whole weekend with you, right?"

Tataryn nodded cheerfully. "Though you'll be in Lucky's company during the day. She has a big tour group with other young people."

Kseniya's face fell. "I'm stuck with the little kids?" To her credit, she wasn't whining, but her disappointment was very evident.

She was eight. She wasn't exactly an adult. You rubbed the back of your neck. "Fareeha is a tween. Brigitte is...tiny. And Maggie and Michael are teenagers. Claire is an adult, but she's...excitable. So there's only one little kid, and I hope you'll help me look out for her. Because her parents are terrifying."

"Also Jesse and Távio will be accompanying you places. Because Lucky needs all the help she can get." Tataryn chuckled.

"Will Bandit and Isha be there?" Kseniya asked, hopping down the stairs, no longer dejected.

"For sure," you said, stifling a yawn. "There's breakfast in the car, though we can have a second breakfast at the cafeteria."

"You just want more coffee," Kseniya said, giving you a wry look. You didn't argue. She was, after all, absolutely correct.

You were a little surprised by the crowd at your table. Gabriel sat with Isha in his lap, talking with Captain Amari and Fareeha. Maggie and Michael were on his other side. Michael was chatting cautiously with Feng, though she sat slumped over her coffee, inhaling the fumes and giggling sleepily every few minutes, her Zheng orb floating behind her. You didn't see Torby anywhere yet, but you got a coffee refill and a plate of doughnuts, and settled down, watching Kseniya chat happily with Gabriel.
Maggie looked between you and Kseniya, then Kseniya and Gabriel, her blue eyes shrewd. You shook your head and she sighed wistfully. Her gaze traveled to Tataryn and she raised a brow, reaching over to nudge Feng.

Feng's eyes got real big and she wiggled her brows at you, her smile very wide.

You shook your head, rolling your eyes.

Feng pursed her lips.

Maggie raised her hands, palms upward.

"Because he works for me, and he's old enough to be your father," Gabriel said sharply.

Tataryn chuckled. "And Lucky is so obviously in love with me, I cannot break her delicate heart like that."

You slowly turned your head to glower at him, wondering if Feng had any of that bullet ant venom left.

"Tataryn, don't you have some place to be?" Gabriel scowled, his glare harsh.

Kseniya gave a quiet gasp and quickly covered her mouth, her eyes darting between you and Gabriel. You rested your face in your hand and sipped your coffee, not making eye contact with anyone. Because apparently most people present were fluent in nonverbal conversation and even worse, the eight year old had now figured out your secret. Granted, she was a little genius, but that wasn't the point.

"Oh, I can take a hint. I am distracting Lucky. Goodbye ladies, don't worry, I'll be back."

Tataryn leaned over and gave you a loud kiss on the cheek, more sound than contact.

Maggie giggled. Feng sighed. And when you looked up, Gabriel was staring past you, at Tataryn's retreating back, his expression promising violence.

"So, Tataryn, huh?" Feng asked, giving you a sly grin. "Mrow." She rolled the "R" extra long. "Tell me more."

"He's nothing, but trouble," Kseniya said earnestly. "Very popular with men and women and notorious for never calling them back."

You blinked, a little surprised by her aggressive response.

Feng's grin didn't waver at all. "Good to know. And who might you be?"

"I'm Zinnia, and that's my Uncle Gabriel." Kseniya calmly took a doughnut off his plate. He raised a brow at her, but didn't comment. In fact, he looked downright amused by her chutzpah.

Feng and Maggie exchanged speculative looks. "You certainly know a lot about Goldilocks."

"I've heard people talk," she said, biting into her doughnut. "Hi, Isha."

Isha trilled back at her, eating her own doughnut carefully on Gabriel's lap.

"I'm Feng," Feng said, extending her hand. "But can you call me "Claire" please? That's my Kseniya paused mid-bite, and her eyes widened at Feng's honesty. "Oh. Oh! Oh! I just saw your TED talk! That was amazing!" She looked at you, practically bouncing out of her seat. "Do you know who that is?" She hissed.

"...Yes," you said. "That's "Claire." She's Maggie's schoolmate. She's very excitable."

Kseniya gaped at you, believed that you actually believed that story for thirty seconds, and then gave you a dirty look, not amused at all.

Feng just laughed.

"Sorry, I'm late, ma'am. Agent McCree wanted me to let you know that he's on his way in and he's bringing some friends."

You sighed, looking up to see Távio saluting you.

"At ease, Távio. You remember Zinnia."

"Miss," he said.

"Mr. Maeda-Vargas," she said solemnly.

"Claire," you said, reminding him of Feng's cover. "Maggie, Michael, and Fareeha." You made the introductions, since he was your bodyguard. And then went back to your coffee.

Távio pulled up a chair and sat there rigidly. You grabbed a doughnut and put it on a napkin in front of him.

When you looked up, you noticed Maggie eyeing him thoughtfully.

Feng elbowed her and whispered something, then they both giggled.

Távio was grinning back.

Suddenly, you felt a massive headache coming on. You were going to need a lot more coffee.

Gabriel was going to finish up some paperwork, while Tataryn was running Blackwatch's part of the security.

There was an exhibit Ainsley put together with pictures, artifacts, and videos of the founding of Overwatch. It was very nicely organized, informative, and devoid of anything controversial. The kids skipped right over it.

Kseniya declined to run the obstacle course. She was more interested in holding Isha. Maggie, Michael, and Feng had already done it yesterday. Fareeha mentioned that they'd made it "easier" and "safer" for civilians. Then proceeded to give the details of what Reinhardt's extreme training version of the course looked like. Her mother used it for live fire exercises and you were very glad you did not have to run it when there were actual proximity mines on the field.

You still took them down to the range and let them shoot for a little bit, if only to gauge their skill levels. Feng was, unsurprisingly, extremely good. Fareeha was a close second. Kseniya did quite well when you gave her a smaller caliber weapon. You really were going to have to talk to Tataryn about his parenting tactics. Michael and Maggie performed respectfully too.

Jesse appeared then, Bandit in tow, to give shooting lessons, and you didn't miss how Maggie sized him up too. Genji and Hanzo lingered on the periphery, apparently tasked as bodyguards. They didn't come over for introductions, and you didn't make them.

It wasn't till you reached the inflatable bounce house, that Torby and Reinhardt finally showed up.

On Reinhardt's shoulder's sat an adorable little freckle-faced girl with brown hair and big eyes.

Torby gave you a suspicious look. "You and McCree are the babysitters?" He scowled. "The two of you can't even-"

"Oh no," you said, not missing how disappointed Kseniya looked. "We're just the body-guarding tour guides. She's the sitter." You pointed at Kseniya.

Torby was taller than her, and he gave her a long, look.

"Miss Zinnia," Reinhardt boomed. "So good to see you again! Guten tag, Isha!"

Isha trilled back at him and Kseniya gave a shy wave.

"Are you going to be looking after my goddaughter?" Reinhardt continued, sounding delighted. "She's so very responsible, Torby. She showed me how to reprogram my cooker settings. Now my currywurst sauerkraut casserole doesn't get too mushy!"

Torby gave you an odd look, but turned his attention to Kseniya. She extended one hand, still holding Isha to her chest.

"Pleased to meet you, Miss Zinnia. I'm Torbjörn Lindholm, and this is my daughter, Brigitte. She's young and impressionable, and Lucky and McCree are terrible influences."

Jesse snorted, but tipped his hat.

You just shook your head and waved.

"I don't know what you mean, Mr. Lindholm. Lucky arranged my last visit: she made lots of time for educational stops, gave me good advice on resolving conflicts with other people, and ensured I ate several well-balanced meals." The little girl's face was so very serious and Feng and Maggie were giggling behind their hands.

"...I suppose Lucky can sometimes be responsible. But you seem like a more trustworthy individual." Torby crossed his arms. "If you take extra good care of my daughter, I'll make it worth your while."

"He can teach you to build things," Reinhardt said in a booming whisper. "He's good at that."

"Very good at that," you said.

"Stop sucking up," Torby scowled at you.
"Not so good with people though," Reinhardt continued. And Kseniya had to cover her mouth. "Why don't you take her into the bouncy house? I would go, but I am not allowed. Not after last time..."

Reinhardt sounded so dejected, that you had to do a doubletake. Was he hamming it up for the kids? No, he actually looked sad as he gave the inflatable a wistful sigh.

Torby rolled his eyes. "Brigitte, do you want to go inside?"

"Sh-oooop," she said, sucking in a breath.

"What?" You blinked.

"That means "yes." It's a colloquialism," Kseniya said then she went on to say something in Swedish. She gently handed Isha to Reinhardt and the two youngest girls went up the ramp and through the protective netting.

You stared, wondering just how many languages that kid knew. Something prodded your side and you looked over. Torby was frowning heavily at you.

"Now you look after both of those girls, you hear me?"

You almost said something sarcastic, but Torby was giving you that slightly insane mad-scientist look, so you just nodded. "That was the plan."

"And you better help her," Torby continued, jabbing a finger into Jesse's stomach.

Jesse laughed awkwardly. "C'mon Torby, you know me-"

"Which is exactly why I am reminding you to be useful."

Ouch.

Jesse just handed Bandit to Reinhardt and tugged on Fareeha's wrist. "Come on, punkette. We need to make sure no one messes with the little'uns."

Fareeha gave a serious nod and the two of them led the way up.

"Oh, let's go too!" Feng said already kicking off her shoes and bounding up the ramp, Maggie and Michael close behind.

You stayed outside with Reinhardt and Távio, Isha chirping her dismay at not being allowed to go inside. Because inflatables and raptor claws were not a good combination.

"Maybe Winston would be interested in making a heavier duty bounce house," you said. "I know Kseniya would like that kind of project."

Torby raised a brow. "But with titanium springs and crash gel padding..." He tapped his chin. "It would be difficult to get the same liftoff. However controlled gravitational warp might do the trick..."

Reinhardt's entire face lit up. "Winston would love that."

You nodded politely. Yes, because Winston was obviously the one who wanted a custom bounce house.
Winston's science demos included custom fireworks, robot hamsters, and jetpack rides. Feng, Zheng, and Kseniya lingered to talk shop with him, already intrigued by the idea of a modified trampoline or bouncy house.

The three-legged race went well, Jesse and Fareeha winning spectacularly. Brigitte and Kseniya made an adorable showing, and Maggie and Michael kept tripping on each other. Távio's attention remained on the Morrison siblings. You weren't sure if it was just because they would be part of his future posting.

Lunch, was when things got really worrisome. There was a buffet line, and Jack stood at the grill, wearing an Overwatch apron and drinking a beer. The hotdogs, sausages, burgers, and corn on the cob looked edible, but you secretly hoped he hadn't cooked everything himself.

You were pleasantly surprised to see that there was a small station of krema, mayonnaise, lime, spice mixes, and cheese to turn the corn into elote. You helped Kseniya carry Brigitte's plate and reminded Jesse to make sure Fareeha actually ate some vegetables. He got her a beef bratwurst covered in pickles and jalapenos, and you realized that was probably the best he would manage without help.

You brought back kale salad, poured some chili oil on it, and promptly challenged Fareeha to see who could heroically eat the Spicy Doom Horror. Kseniya joined in, though she didn't need the incentive to eat vegetables, and Jesse did too, though he skimped on the chili oil. He gave Brigitte some of his and then promptly had to get the little girl some milk.

Maggie and Michael watched in horrified fascination as the children began to sweat and Feng keyed something into her watch, shaking her head. You didn't miss how Maggie and Feng kept bringing Távio into their discussions, and how he was quickly warming up to the Morrison siblings.

After the kids had suffered through your bad life choices, you let them eat as much dessert as they wanted, while Jesse drank a beer. You sat there with a slice of cake watching the rank and file Overwatch agents chat happily with their families. Jack was greeting everyone, and Reinhardt and Captain Amari were there, helping him serve the growing line. You were slightly disappointed that you wouldn't be able to go over and tease Jack about him "overwatching the overdone burgers," but you had to keep an eye on the kids.

Maggie organized an informal ice cream eating contest, Fareeha and Jesse digging in with extra enthusiasm. Feng was eating slowly, but she had a knowing smile and you suspected she was going to win. Kseniya and Brigitte were "discretely" feeding Isha and Bandit their own miniature ice cream sundaes with dog-safe toppings.

"So, she's really hardcore then?" Távio asked.

"Yeah, but...my experience is unique. I was kind of a dick for awhile and her insane exercise regimen was years of payback in the making." Michael combed his fingers through his hair. "So you've gone into combat with Lucky?"

"Yeah," Távio trailed off. "The mission...ended badly, but she got me out alive."

You sat there, nursing your beer, casually watching Isha steal the cherry off Bandit's ice cream. It would probably be best if they didn't realize you were eavesdropping.
Bandit whined and she hesitated a moment, before handing it back. He licked the whipped cream off her face, and you smiled wryly.

"Good girl, Isha. You don't steal from your friends. Especially not food," you said.

Isha chirped and patted Bandit's face, offering him a broken piece of sugar cone.

"But significant others are fair game."

You blinked as Jack sat down across from you, reaching over to tug on Maggie's hair. Maggie laughed and swatted his hand away.

"I'm busy, Jack! Come on, McCree! I thought you were a tough guy. You're only at five bowls! Look at Feng! She's still going- It's OK Fareeha, don't make yourself sick, oh boy."

Jack snorted and turned his gaze back to you, flashing you an easy smile.

"No, no stealing food," you scowled at him.

"Thanks for looking after them," he said, changing the subject. "Seriously, Ana and I can rest easier knowing you're keeping them in line." You weren't exactly sure if he meant Jesse, his siblings, or the little kids. Probably all of the above.

"Aren't you supposed to be grilling?" You tried to keep your face business-like, because you were in public.

"Gabe's taking a shift." Jack grinned and glanced over his shoulder. Gabriel stood at the grill, eating elote and flipping burgers, now wearing Jack's Overwatch apron. You felt your lips turn upwards. He was saying something sharp to Reinhardt, but Reinhardt just laughed and clapped him on the back, nearly spilling his beer.

Brigitte and Kseniya started giggling loudly, and you looked over to see what caused the commotion. Your murderbird was on Brigitte's lap licking the smeared ice cream off the kid, and while Isha knew by now to be gentle, you didn't want to tempt fate.

"Isha, don't eat her face," you sighed, reaching over to gently remove her from the child.

Brigitte squeaked something to you in Swedish, and you blinked, looking for an Athena drone to translate.

"It's fine, here, give Bandit a turn," Kseniya said, setting Bandit on Brigitte's lap.

Brigitte giggled as Bandit finished licking her face, and you shook your head, scratching Isha's back. She thrummed at you, and chirped at Jack.

"Hey Isha-bird," he said, reaching out to chuck under her chin.

"C'mon Jesse!" Fareeha shouted. "You can do it!"

"Uh...don't think I can, punkette," he groaned, resting his head on the picnic table. "I uh...I know when I'm beat."

Feng just smirked at him, and took another bite of ice cream.

"Maybe I should get in on this," Jack said.
"Bring it," Feng growled, licking her spoon. "I'll end you, blondie."

Maggie clapped her hands in delight.

Shaking your head, you realized Isha was sticky. "Hey, keep an eye on the kids while I get something to clean her up with," you said.

Jack nodded, and you got up, carrying your murderbird under your arm as you headed to grab some napkins and water.

"That's some bird you have."

You turned to see a dark curvy woman in large sunglasses and a vintage bomber jacket over a red and white floral patterned A-Line dress. She had skull earrings, her slender dreadlocks tied back with a giant red bow, also bearing skull accents. Upon closer look, the flowers on the dress were interspersed with skulls. She wore outrageously high heels, her lipstick glossy and red. You weren't sure if she was "pretty" behind the sunglasses, but she had an undeniable presence.

"She's a little messy," you said.

Isha chirped in protest, eyeing the stranger with interest.

"You are." You dabbed at her face with the wet napkin and she squawked at you, obviously displeased.

"That's quite a crew you're running," she said, gesturing at your table of delinquents. "Big difference in ages."

"They're good kids," you said, setting Isha down. "Go on back to Zinnia," you told her, making sure to stand between the woman and the table. She wasn't setting off alarm bells, but she was asking about your charges, and it was better to stay alert.

Isha eyed you, then the woman, and ran back through the picnic area, toward the kids.

"I'm Cat," she said, extending her hand, a knowing smile on her lips.

"Lucky," you said, shaking her hand firmly, and noting the long red nails, with cute little white and silver skull designs.

"You're very good with them," she said, her tone light and breezy.

"Thanks," you said, unsure of how to take that. But apparently she had been watching you, and you really didn't like that.

"Don't look so offended. It's just that Jane said you were really squirrelly about children and-"

You blinked, suddenly feeling like an idiot, because you knew that carriage, and recognized that jawline. "Cat. Catriona Reyes." Gabriel's oldest sister. "You're friends with Jane?"

"Of course. Someone had to form a support group for women with stupid super soldier brothers. Or sisters. Usually brothers though, and since it's mostly just me and Jane right now. We like to drink wine and tell embarrassing stories." Catriona gave you a sly smile, one that echoed Gabriel's wicked playfulness. "I've heard a great deal about you, though my baby brother has been awfully protective, chica. Of course, Jane told me how Christmas went, so I don't blame him."
You stared for a moment, wondering why Gabriel hadn't warned you. You were going to get him for this.

"Come on, let's go say "hi" to Jack and you can introduce me to my precocious daughter, Zinnia." It's about time we met."

A little dumbstruck, you led Catriona back to the table.

Jack was on his feet instantly. "I should get back to the grill--"

"Hello there, Jack," Catriona grinned wolfishly at him as she removed her sunglasses. She was a handsome woman, her features a little sharper than Gabriel's. "They let you cook? I heard about your packed lunches--"

Jack groaned and set his head down on the table. "Come on Cat, give me a break."

Laughing, she went around the table and gave him a big hug. "It's good to see you, Jack. Nice to finally meet Lucky too."

Jack hugged her back. "Oh, and Lucky's been taking very good care of Zinnia." Jack beamed at you.

Kseniya looked up. "Oh, hello Mama," she said awkwardly. Isha sat on her lap, eyeing Catriona suspiciously.

"I have such an adorable daughter," Catriona said, her smile soft. "Why don't we go say "hi" to your Uncle Gabriel?"

"I'm looking after Brigitte right now," Kseniya said, a little stiffly. "Lucky really needs my help."

"I do," you said, quickly, sensing her discomfort. "I don't speak Swedish."

Cattriona's smile widened. "All right. Have fun, kids." She winked at you, and sauntered off toward the grill.

"Did you know she was coming?" You hissed at Jack when she was out of earshot.

"I don't think Gabe knew she was coming," Jack said, shaking his head. "Cattriona...does things her own way."

You glanced at Kseniya, who'd gotten really quiet.

"Is everything all right?"

"Fine," she said, giving you a wobbly smile. "I think Brigitte needs to use the facilities."

"All right," you sighed, getting up to walk the girls to the restrooms.

It wasn't till late afternoon that parents showed up to relieve you. You'd sent Jesse and Feng to make sure Genji and Hanzo got food. Torby showed up first, and promised to spend an afternoon letting Kseniya work in his workshop. You weren't sure how that was a reward, but she seemed excited. You tried to slip her some money for helping out with Brigitte, but she wouldn't take it, instead asking if it wasn't too much trouble, then maybe she could visit more, those big golden brown eyes hopeful and earnest.

She was totally Tataryn's kid.

Ray had showed up to walk Catriona, Maggie, Michael, and Feng back to Jack's quarters. She was supposed to be off-duty, but she waved off your concerns. It occurred to you then that Ray might not have any family to visit with either, and maybe Jack and Rodriguez had been the closest thing she had.

Jesse escorted Fareeha back to Captain Amari, and from what you could tell, relations had normalized. He wasn't taking her desserts, but he wasn't avoiding her either.

"Gaming tonight in the rec room," Genji told you as he passed by.

You weren't sure if you were going to make it, but Feng would probably like to go. You passed on the message, and escorted Kseniya to the Blackwatch dorms, unsurprised to find Tataryn lingering by your door. You left them to catch up. Jesse waited at the end of the hall, holding Isha and Bandit.

"How you holding up, sugarpie?" Jesse asked as he handed Isha back to you.

"Exhausted," you groaned, petting Isha's head.

"...Ah," Jesse said, shoving his hands in his pockets. "Yeah, I guess corralling the kids takes a lot out of you."

"Glad you were there," you said, patting his back. "Fareeha really looks up to you. Me? She just looks worried, like I'm two steps from doing something irreversibly stupid- Wait, how does she know?"

"Dunno," Jesse laughed. "But maybe her Ma said something."

You sighed. "Ziv's been laying low all day."

"His little sister came in," Jesse said, adjusting his hat.

"Oh," you said, voice going flat. Why hadn't he said anything to you? Did he not want to introduce you? OK, that was fair: "here's Lucky, she was there when Savta got blown up." Yeah, maybe it was easier not to explain you.

"She ain't a big fan of Overwatch, none of the family is. I don't think he's inflicted her on Lacroix either," Jesse said soothingly and you realized you hadn't hid your disappointment as well as you'd thought.

"It's weird, seeing everyone with their families," you said after a moment. "Shoal was smacking some guy with a hotdog bun. The bun was the bludgeon, to clarify. I assume it was her brother. Had the same hair."

"Riggs' mom is here," Jesse said. "He's still working up the nerve to introduce you to her. Just a head's up."

"Ah," you said, a little perturbed. You wondered then if you should ask Lacroix if you could show Riggs the harassment footage to change his mind about Petras. It wouldn't compromise Shit Spiders, but you weren't sure how wise the idea was. You would bring it up later.

"It's...strange," Jesse said, softly. "Kind of hollow."

You blinked. You'd felt weird, sure, but you'd been too busy today to think about that. But now that it was just you and Jesse, you realized that it had been extra hard for him to watch everyone. You'd probably need to check on Vo and the Shimadas later too. "We're going up to Jack's quarters to drink and play games. You want to be my plus one? Since you're already walking me up there?"

"Feng bribe you into this?" Jesse asked, narrowing his eyes. "Because she said she had a "surprise" for me later, and I ain't so sure about that."

"It's for Bandit," you said. "At least, I know she has something for Bandit. Dunno about you."

"OK," he said, mollified. "Yeah, I could stick around for a few. If you think Morrison and the boss won't mind..."

"Pfft, of course they won't," you said, clapping him on the back.

When you got back to the room, you found they were waiting for you. Gabriel was pouring drinks, while Catriona and Feng conversed about Jack's decorating or lack thereof. Jack pretended not to hear them while he helped Maggie and Michael clear off the coffee table. To your surprise, Távio was still here, standing in the corner talking to Chang.

"Oh, here!" Feng handed Jesse a package. He gave you a worried look before unwrapping it. Inside was a small dinosaur costume, Bandit-sized.

Bandit held still while Jesse put the triceratops headpiece on him, and then promptly laid down, and did not budge. Isha crooned as she settled against him, poking at the fabric horns.

Feng took a few pictures, giggling.

Jesse just shook his head, a tired smile on his face. "Everyone loves dressing my poor boy up."

"He's a good boy," Feng said cheerfully.

"What're we playing?" You asked as you sat down besides Michael.

"Poker," Maggie said, shuffling a deck of cards.

Jesse leaned over, grinning at you. "Need some help with that?"

"I was specifically told not to use any of Lucky's decks," Maggie said cheerfully. "But no one warned me about the cute cowboy with the shifty eyes."

You snorted as Jesse slapped a hand across his chest. "There ain't nothing wrong my eyes."

"What are the stakes?" Catriona asked, sipping a disturbingly green cocktail.
"Embarrassing stories," Maggie said, rubbing her hands together.

You raised a brow. "Clever."

"No, we're poor," Michael said shaking his head.

"Still clever," you said. "Chang and Távio sticking around?"

Távio blinked. "I uh...well..."

"I want to see his performance on the range," Chang said.

"Aww come on," you said. "He's been on duty all day. You should stay too. I bet you have a bunch of embarrassing stories."

"Not family friendly ones," Chang said dryly.

"Then you should definitely stay," Catriona laughed.

Chang gave Jack a blank look.

"Stay. You don't have to play if you don't want to. Just have a bourbon, some chips, and relax." Jack smiled gently at her.

"I should go," Távio said awkwardly. "Early morning."

You raised a brow, but he shook his head. It was probably better that he didn't learn all Jack and Gabriel's secrets, but you felt a twinge of guilt for excluding him.

"Hey, Genji and Hanzo are gaming in the Blackwatch rec room," Feng said. "I'm heading down there later. Want to meet up?"

"Uh...sure," he said. "If it's not too late."

"If you're any good, you should just go ask to join in," you said. "Genji needs to be taken down a peg."

"All right," he said, waved, and quickly left. You didn't miss Maggie's look of disappointment, and you wondered then, for the hundredth time, if that was going to be trouble.

Jesse dealt the first hand, Gabriel wisely sitting that round out. He brought you an whiskey sour, and sat behind you, gently massaging your shoulders.

Unsurprisingly, Jesse won that round. He grinned at Maggie. "All right, you're up buttercup."

Maggie frowned. "A story about me? Or story about someone here?"

"Either, but keep in mind, mutually-assured destruction."

"Michael..." Her eyes darted to you, and her grin grew wicked. "Still has-"

"I will end you," Michael muttered, giving her a hard stare.

"-That beautiful sweater Gabriel got him," Maggie giggled. "He even wore it to school. Mostly because he lost a bet with Ray."
"It's comfy," Michael said sullenly, but you had the sneaking suspicion that wasn't what Maggie was originally going to say.

"It was eye-blastingly horrendous," you said to Jesse.

Jesse snorted.

Gabriel won the next hand and Catriona repaid him with a story of his misspent youth. Preteen Gabriel apparently went through a goth phase, a punk phase, and a theatre phase in quick succession. His mother had gotten so frustrated with his wardrobe demands that she'd chased him through the neighborhood with a chancla. After that, he'd gone to his Abuelita for help. And that, according to Catriona, is how he learned how to sew, knit, and all the other crafty pursuits.

Jack won again. According to Michael, he and Jane once burned a pair of Maggie's shoes because they were so foul.

You took the next hand, and put Jesse on the spot. Apparently, Genji had once stolen Jesse's towel and clothes in the locker room. Jesse "forgot" what he did to upset him, and the cowboy had to streak back to the dorms. And some people, he wouldn't say who, got quite the eyeful.

Maggie was up again, because Jack was really going after his siblings. She glared at him, defiantly taking a swig of Michael's drink. "Jack's middle name is Francis."

Jack stared open-mouthed for three seconds. "Goddamnit, Maggie!"

"Wait," Gabriel turned his head. "You told me it was "Franklin." Like the president. Those were your exact words."

Jack ducked his head, mumbling something unintelligible.

"...Nope," Maggie said, smirking. "It's "Francis." He's been living a lie."

"You're dead to me, Maggie," Jack hissed, glaring at his sister.

Michael snorted, but wisely kept out of it.

"Francis," you said, slowly, because you'd never really thought that hard about your lover's middle names. "Huh."

"Francis? That's awful," Feng said, lacking your restraint. "Jack Francis Morrison." She snorted and got up. "Oh, I think I need time to come to terms with this. I'm going to head downstairs now. You coming, Jesse?"

"Sure thing," Jesse said, wearing a shit-eating grin.

"God, and now McCree knows. McCree, if this gets around." Jack rested his face in his hand. "McCree-"

"And that's our cue," Jesse said, smothering his laughter as he pulled on his boots, grabbed his tricera-dog, and skedaddled out the door. Laughing, Feng followed.

"You really didn't know?" Chang asked, leaning on the back of the couch. She gave Gabriel a thoughtful look.

"No," Gabriel said. "How'd you know?"
"Saw his paperwork back in chem camp," she said with a shrug. "Always thought it kind of fit him."

"You're not helping, Ray," Jack groaned.

"Jack Francis, Franny if we're feeling cheeky," Gabriel purred, leaning over to pat Jack's head. "You lied to me. You've been a bad bad Catholic boy."

"We're not actually Catholic," Michael said, trying to divert that conversational trainwreck. "Mom's Methodist and Dad goes to church to keep her happy. They're old family names."

"Well, "Francis," you should be proud of your identity," you told him, kissing his cheek.

"Goddamnit," Jack glared at you. "I don't want to hear it."

"But Fran-cisssss," You drew the name out, as Gabriel embraced Jack from behind, not letting him squirm away. "You lied to us..." You sprawled out in his lap, grinning up at him. "There are consequences, Fran-cisssssss."

Jack just covered his face, unable to escape your teasing and the terrible truth. His middle name was not Franklin, but "Francis."

Chapter End Notes

Family day fluff for Francis! :P

In other less dramatic news, I got a nice pair of speakers on SUPER discount today ($2 clearance!), and I've been having random dance parties around the house and my animals are all terribly traumatized by how LOUD my music is. I kind of feel like a semi-sentient lifeform who just discovered music and is gaining a soul. Sad, I know. I go through phases where I forget how good it is for me to just listen to music to restore some lost soul/hit points. :P

The next update will be delayed for the Halloween oneshot. It's a PWP set in the IAL timeline. It just didn't fit anywhere in the current story arc. It'll post as its own chapter some time next week.
Chapter 103

Chapter Summary

Family Day gets too exciting.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

When you woke up the next morning, Jack was still sulking. Maybe you and Gabriel should let up, but seeing him pout was pretty adorable. Yawning, you raised a brow when you realized Feng had never come back last night. Chang was in a sleeping bag on the floor, and Catriona had left last night to go back to her hotel.

"Where's Feng?" You asked Athena, as Jack pulled a pillow over his head and pretended not to hear you.

"Feng, Genji, Hanzo, Távio, and Jesse all had a sleepover in the Blackwatch rec room. Genji won at all the games," Athena said proudly. "Ziv stopped by too and made a respectable showing. He's looking for you when you get a chance."

"Sure," you said with a yawn. Today's festivities would only go through early afternoon, so people could spend more quality time with their families. After the hovercar races and the closing speeches, Jack was spending the day with his siblings. Gabriel was going to take Catriona out for dinner. You weren't sure if Jack would be joining him or what you were doing, but you needed to go get Kseniya and maybe Brigitte.

Távio was waiting for you outside of Jack's quarters, with bags under his eyes and asymmetrical hair. You hoped your Athena drone had gotten a good picture of that. She floated silently beside you, not commenting.

Your first stop was Tataryn's room. Kseniya was all ready, wearing purple shorts and purple pachimari t-shirt. You swung by the Blackwatch rec room. Feng was already sitting up, yawning as she stepped over Jesse. Hanzo and Genji had claimed the couches, though Bandit was asleep next to Hanzo and you discretely snapped a picture. Feng combed her fingers through her hair, straightened her t-shirt, and declared herself ready for food.

Jack and Chang escorted his siblings down to breakfast. Jack was still glowering at Maggie for the big reveal.

You registered for the hovercar race at Kseniya's behest. You would probably have Távio and Brigitte onboard. The vehicles seated four people, so Michael, Feng, and Maggie would have to get a separate vehicle. Jesse and Fareeha might have their own too.

"So, did I dream that your middle name was-" Feng yawned.

"Claire, you are my favorite sister present, so I'm going to request that you shut the hell up if you want to stay that way," Jack muttered darkly.

Feng giggled behind her stack of pancakes and elbowed Maggie. "I'm the favorite now."
"Pfft, that doesn't get you anything. It took me years to figure out, but he'll still forget your birthday and have Gabe pick out your Christmas presents because he's a terrible shopper." Maggie didn't look the least bit bothered.

Chang snorted.

"That's cold," Feng laughed.

"But true," Maggie said with a wink.

Jack just hunched over his coffee and muttered to himself.

You reached over and patted his shoulder. "It'll be all right, sir." You tried to keep a professional face. "After last night's revelation, I doubt anything else could shock us."

Groaning, Jack put his face down on the table and refused to budge for ten minutes.

"OK, this pulls us up," you muttered, fiddling with the controls for the hovercar. It wasn't a full-fledged hovercraft, but rather a recreational version. It still reached high speeds, but there were safety measures and a guidance system to keep it on the track. Winston had been play-testing this model for awhile, ostensibly as a training tool, but several amusement parks were interested.

"The cushions are flotation devices," Kseniya said helpfully.

"Like hover flotation?" Távio asked, wrinkling his nose. "Or water flotation?"

"Water, of course," Kseniya giggled, like he'd made a joke.

"Well, we'd really have to fu- mess up if we end up in the water," Távio laughed. "There's no water on the track."

"There is a large man-made lake on the property," Athena chimed in. It was very deep and used for aquatic and amphibious training exercises. You and Jesse had pushed Ziv in a few times when you were doing your swimming tests.

Kseniya and Brigitte sat strapped in the backseat, the Athena drone floating between them. Távio was in the front passenger seat. There were cushioned neck rests built into the seat. You'd reserved the purple one just for Kseniya, and she looked very pleased. A flat-bottomed oval, the hovercraft reminded you of a bumper car. There was no roof, but there were foot-thick rubber bumpers around the entire vehicle. It floated a few inches off the ground, running on electromagnetism and some quantum energy generator that you couldn't really claim to understand. But Winston said it was environmentally friendly.

The course was easy enough. You'd be racing five other drivers. The high-altitude hover function actually slowed the vehicle, but there were soft bumpers that you needed to jump. Hitting them would slow you down more. All in all, it was a simple concept. You were tempted to let Kseniya drive, but twelve was recommended age, so you "reluctantly" took the wheel.

Feng and Maggie shook their fists at you, Michael at the wheel. To your surprise, Jesse let Fareeha drive, and you shook your head, wondering if that was a good idea.

A simulated traffic light clicked Red. Yellow. Green. Ding! And you hit the accelerator. It went from zero to forty miles per hour in half a second and you grinned as wind ripped through your hair, the boundless blue sky overhead. Brigitte cackled in delight and Kseniya gave a happy shriek.

You were still eating Fareeha's dust, so you pushed down on the accelerator, laughing as you hit an inflatable bumper when you should have jumped. Távio said something foul in Portuguese, and you laughed even harder as Brigitte yelled something just as emphatic and unintelligible.

You were halfway through the course, making good time, but still behind Fareeha, when the vehicle lurched, then began to speed up. You frowned and hit the brake, but hovercraft just went faster. The speedometer climbed quickly. Fifty. Sixty. Seventy miles per hour. The numbers turned red. You heard something tear, smack the rounded front of the hovercar, and whip to the side. Part of the front bumper had come off. Swearing, you tried to pull the hovercraft toward an inflatable obstacle, hoping that would slow you down.

But the vehicle didn't respond, instead, veering off the track.

"Ma'am-" Távio glanced over at you, real fear in his eyes.

"Athena-" You shouted. "Are you getting this?"

There was a terrible moment of silence. You gripped the steering wheel, vainly trying to steer the vehicle away from the oncoming trees. You gripped the wheel with all your might and threw your weight to the left.

Miraculously, the vehicle lurched again, the whiplash making your vision blink. But you narrowly avoiding a massive spruce tree.

"Athena!" You growled through clenched teeth.

"Manual disruption," Athena crackled. "There's....sorry, we're have a situation. I'm splitting resources. I can give you control of the wheel, but someone's interfering with the central control system."

"We've been hacked?" Kseniya's voice was weak and almost lost in the rush of wind.

"Yes," Athena said, apparently too distracted to lie to the kid.

"You can't decelerate?" You asked, eyes on the terrain, because now you were off the track, and had to watch out for logs, rocks, and people. You zoomed across the training ground, the craft responding to your jumps and steering. Eighty. Ninety. You'd driven convertibles at this speed. But the hovercraft wasn't built for this and it shook under the strain.

"Trying-" Athena stuttered. "I can't do this and keep the other situation under control. I'm tracking the interference right now. Jack and Tataryn are moving to intercept. Torby and Winston are on it too, but Lucky you're reaching unsafe speeds."

"Reaching?" You muttered darkly.

"You're going to have to find a soft landing."

"The lake, ma'am,' Távio shouted over the roar of the wind.

"Can you swim?" You shouted.
"Yes!" Kseniya and Távio screamed.

Brigitte gurgled something then laughed, and you took that as a "no, I'm just a small child, and I have no idea what's going on."

"You've done the aquatic landing drill, right?" You shouted at Távio.

"Hit feet first, at an angle, ma'am!"

You kept your eyes on the path, the lake coming into view.

"I need you to take Brigitte and jump off the side, as soon as we hit the water. Kseniya, can you jump too?" The landing would decelerate you, maybe not to a safe speed, but better than what you were doing now.

"What about you?"

"I'll be in right behind you!"

Távio unstrapped himself, and crawled into the backseat, carefully lifting the laughing Brigitte into his lap. You spared a glance over your shoulder. He was watching the oncoming lake with grim eyes and clenched teeth. But he gripped the little girl to his chest, and refastened the belt. He'd need to keep it on till the landing. You had a vision of kids spilling out of the craft, hitting the water headfirst at rapid speeds, and you had to swallow the panic back down.

One hundred meters. Seventy-five meters. Fifty meters. Twenty five... You gave it half a second, then held the hover switch, lurching forward as you rose up across the dock. You were airborne and still gaining altitude, though your forward speed had dropped as you arced over the water. The hover function was limited, and soon sputtered out as you approached the middle of the small lake.

"Get ready!" You shouted, already unfastening your belt.

The rubber bumpers hit the water with a splash, the aquatic landing halving your speed. Távio was already moving. Holding Brigitte to his chest, he leapt off the side of the vehicle.

Kseniya fumbled with her belt, hands shaking too hard to unfasten herself. Swearing profusely, you flicked your fingers, sliced through the material, and climbed into the back seat.

"Now! Keep your feet together!" You pulled her up, even as the craft began accelerating once more. Grabbing her hand you leapt off the side.

The water was shockingly cold, and you slammed through it with bone-aching speed. You cut through the greenish water, leaving a trail of bubbles. Forcing your eyes open, you tightened your grip on Kseniya's small hand, and began to kick your legs. Up, up, up, through the greenish water and toward the shimmer of sunlight on the surface, your lungs starting to burn, your heart still pounding in your throat.

Kseniya thrashed, kicking you in her panic, but you dragged her with you anyway, flesh fingers locked around her wrist.

You broke through the water, gasping for air, and half a second later Kseniya was above the surface, coughing and sputtering. She gave a choked sob and wrapped her arms around your neck. Flinching, you had to work extra hard to tread water with the little girl clinging to you.
Something soft dropped from above, and you gripped the purple seat cushion the Athena drone had grabbed. Looking around, you saw Távio floating there, a laughing Brigitte tucked between him and his own flotation cushion. She splashed happily, gurgling more excited Swedish.

Kseniya grumbled something as you floated there, holding tight to the cushion.

"You OK?" You asked, spitting out lake water.

She nodded, head tucked against your neck.

"Can you tell if Brigitte is OK?" You asked. "She looks OK, but I can't tell what she's saying..."

"She said, she wants to do it again!" Kseniya sniffled, and then began to wheeze hysterically.

"Of course, she does," you muttered, wondering if all kids were insane like this, or if you were just especially unlucky.

The hovercraft crashed into a dock on the opposite side of the lake and immediately caught fire. You began to swim for shore, a crowd already forming around the docks.

Fortunately, Torby and Reinhardt were en route on the training boat. Angela was there too, and that surprised you.

"I told you to be careful with them!" Torby shouted at you, as soon as the engine died down. "What the hell did you drag them into?" He said some other things in Swedish too, and judging by Kseniya's big eyes, they weren't complimentary.

"Because I totally did this on purpose and by divine intervention, somehow gained the technical expertise to get that stupid thing off the track and overclocked its set speed limit!"

A vein in Torby's forehead bulged.

"We know it was sabotage," Reinhardt said, patting Torby's back hard enough to make the smaller man wince. "Calm down, my friend. We both know Lucky Lady did the best she could, and it looks like the kids are unharmed."

"They better be," Torby muttered darkly.

Brigitte giggled. "Papa!" She reached for him and Távio handed her up first. Reinhardt lifted her without any problem, and then helped Távio aboard. Kseniya wouldn't let go of you, and you sighed as Reinhardt grabbed both your wrists and pulled you up. He carefully set you down.

"Hey, it's OK. You can let go," you told her.

Kseniya took a deep breath, and nodded weakly before turning around to face the concerned adults.

You sat down on the bench, shaking as the adrenaline coursed through your system. You tucked your head low and took several uneven breaths.

"You'll be sore, and there's minor bruising, but you should be fine," Angela told Kseniya as she scanned her with her diagnostic tool. "Let me see her," she said to Torby as she inspected Brigitte. Brigitte tried to grab the scanner, but Angela deftly swapped hands. "You're perfectly fine," she said, lowering her shoulders in relief. "Needs a bath now, maybe some apple pie, but most children do."

You snorted.

Angela scanned Távio. "You botched the landing and broke some toes," she sighed.

"I know, but I was trying to absorb the impact," Távio winced.

Angela's face softened. "It's nothing we can't patch up. Good job shielding Brigitte, agent."

Távio gave her a shaky smile. "As long as the kid's OK."

Angela turned her gaze to you. She scanned you slowly. "You are luckier than you deserve to be. Bruises, some soreness, use an emitter for that neck injury right away, or you'll be sorry. Why don't you two come back to the infirmary with me? Reinhardt and Torby can look after the kids."

"I want to stay with Lucky," Kseniya said, latching on to your arm.

"I think your...guardian is going to want to make sure you're all right," you said, patting her head. "I need to get patched up, and there's no better defender than Reinhardt."

Reinhardt beamed at you. "It is true. I can put on my armor and grab my energy shield if you like." He flexed, his bare biceps thicker than her waist.

Kseniya bit her lip, a small smile forming. "That won't be necessary, Uncle Reinhardt."

"Are you sure? I can get my hammer!" He boomed.

"Hamma!" Brigitte shouted happily.

You exchanged glances with Távio, both of you obviously wondering how a grump like Torby could have such a cute and energetic little girl.

Something was wrong. Gabriel, Jack, and Captain Amari were not among the crowds gathered on the docks. Neither was Tataryn or your Shimada security detail. Where were Fareeha and Jesse? And Feng, Michael, and Maggie? You glanced at Torby, but he shook his head, brows heavy. Reinhardt was busy reassuring Kseniya. Neither could come out and say what was going on out in the open.

Reinhardt was off the boat first, clearing a path, and politely asking everyone to give you space. You dripped water as you passed by the dozens of people, listening to them whisper about your "recklessness."

"It's a good thing Agent Strike's quick thinking kept the damages to a minimum, otherwise things could have gotten messy," Reinhardt boomed, cheerfully. "It seems we are experiencing some...technical issues." He shook his head. "It is very...embarrassing," Reinhardt said, giving the crowd a sheepish, if charming smile. "So I have organized some alternative activities, so you too can appreciate the Overwatch experience. First, we shall take a bracing tour of the grounds! The Swiss countryside is quite scenic-

You noticed then that Reinhardt was herding them away from the main buildings.

"Join me," Angela said, carrying her staff as you followed her toward the main building. "I need to get the infirmary right away. You are carrying, yes?" She looked at you with worried eyes.

You glanced at your soaked holster under your t-shirt. Your sidearm would fire despite getting wet, but you weren't sure about Távio.

'Yes, ma'am," Távio said, hobbling along.

Angela nodded. "There was a contained attack," she said briskly. "Something took Athena offline for a few minutes."

Your mind jumped to the Zheng bot, and your breathing quickened.

"Winston, Ziv, and your Triad friend managed to get bolster her defenses, but there has been a prison break. Jack, Gabriel, and Ana are dealing with it now." She paused when she saw your face. "They aren't alone. They have trustworthy security forces with them."

You exhaled slowly. "OK. What else?"

"The infirmary wasn't targeted, but I need to get back and make sure my patients and staff are safe."

You nodded, gently pushing past Angela. "I'll take point then. Cover us, Távio."

The fish torpedo sidled up to you.

"I am glad you are unharmed, Lucky. Sorry I couldn't do more."

"Thanks, Athena. Couldn't have done it without you," you said, eyes scanning the green for movement. "What can you tell me about the facilities?"

"I...am still working to regain control. My subroutines are maintaining mainframe security and keeping the defenses online; we are currently experiencing a large-scale cyber attack, but with Zheng's assistance, I have that under control. Unfortunately, that initial viral attack knocked out several of my awareness nodes."

"The infirmary?"

"I'm not focusing on nonessential-"

"Nonessential?" Mercy gave the drone a hard, murderous look. "Just because you can't bleed-" She gripped her staff tightly.

"My apologies, Dr. Ziegler," Athena said. "I am struggling to keep the escapees away from our civilian guests, maintain our cyber defenses, and securely monitoring all attempts at weapons access, friendly and otherwise. My resources are best focused in those directions. My apologies if I am distracted and have spoken carelessly."

Angela exhaled slowly. "No, sorry I snapped, Athena. I'm just worried."

"Of course," Athena's voice crackled. "We are all experiencing strain. I do not know what you will encounter, and I must turn my attention elsewhere. Good hunting, Lucky."
The drone beside went dark and dropped into the grass.

"So...Athena isn't just a really advanced virtual assistant then?" Távio asked, staring down at the drone.

You groaned and rubbed your forehead, definitely not up for this conversation.

Angela snorted.

"You know, we can talk about that later," you said. "For now, please-"

"Remember Blackwatch discretion," Távio said, almost mimicking your cadence. "Got it, ma'am." He trailed behind you, muttering under his breath. "I thought that applied to covert operations, not love triangles, dinosaurs, and secret AIs with attitude..."

You entered from a side door, the main building eerily quiet. Most people weren't on duty on Sunday, but the infirmary was usually bustling. Maybe not cheerful, but a hive of activity. You headed down the hall, not surprised by how light Angela's steps were. Távio was the loudest of you, dragging his wounded foot with a soft scrape across the hard floors.

Your clothes were still damp, but your boots were no longer squeaky and you hugged the walls, keeping your gun up. You turned into the main hall approaching the infirmary, and saw a body sprawled on the ground.

Angela gasped, and you held up a hand, creeping forward to check for vital signs, boobytraps, and identity. It was a brunette woman in an In-Sec uniform.

Her neck hung at a severe angle, and you shook your head at Angela. You checked for wires, deadman switches, and proximity mines. Then, carefully, you inspected the face.

You knew her right away. It was Sakai. She was still very warm and held a strange humming metal box in her hand, a smaller version of the jammer you'd found in DC. It wasn't identical, but you picked it up, and switched it off, hoping it would do something for you. You waited to see if Athena would come back online, but there was only silence. Well, at least it didn't blow up. After another half a second of deliberation, handed it to Távio.

"Get this outside, to Winston or Ziv."

"I can't just leave you," Távio hissed. "I'm supposed to watch your six and there are obviously hostiles-"

"That is important," you said. "Get it to one of our trusted techs. That's an order, agent," you said, already turning around. "Be careful."

Távio stiffened. "Understood, ma'am." He swallowed, his unease clear on his face.

"Winston or Ziv," you repeated. "If you can get Athena to respond, she'll do too."

"I'll come right back," he said, and took off, hobbling along, clutching the cube to his chest.

You smiled wryly and squared your shoulders. "Angela, I need you to stand back."
"Understood," Angela said, and switched on her staff.

You blinked as heat traveled through your body. It was prickly, like an emitter, but not unbearable. Too much nervous energy building up in your muscles, waiting for something to happen. You weren't sure that you liked that. On the other hand, you felt stronger, faster, and maybe like you've been doing stims, really good stims.

"Stay in my line of sight, and I can boost you," she said.

You nodded, and crouched by the main door. It was slightly ajar, and you checked for tripwires. No, whoever was here, was moving fast. You pushed the door open, keeping low.

There was a prone man in scrubs, blood pooling around his head.

You held up your hand, hoping Angela hadn't seen him yet. You made your way across the entryway.

He was breathing. You listened, for gunfire, crying, anything... The infirmary was silent. Some machinery whirred and beeped, letting you know that the backup generator hadn't gone down. You tried to think about who was in the infirmary that would warrant such a violent-

Lao.

You clenched your teeth. She wouldn't have... But Lao hadn't been in control of her actions in Lucerne. There was always the chance she wasn't in control of them now, despite what Angela and Torby had done.

If it was Lao, you had to find her, before anyone else did. You touched your stomach, the scars on your skin long faded.

You glanced over your shoulder. Angela was kneeling over her injured nurse, her expression cold. She looked at you, nodded, and got up. There was nothing she could do for him right now, and you had no idea if that was good or terrible. You headed for Lao's suite, making sure the check each room en route. It was Sunday, and thankfully there was a skeleton crew. Less civilians to get hurt.

Lao was under observation as she acclimated to her new spinal implants. Theoretically, they should have cleared out some of the electronic compulsive programming. But she had gone through some rigorous mental conditioning. Maybe...

There were occupants in some rooms, but they were bedridden and had probably been unconscious all weekend. Angela checked the charts and nodded at you: they were who they claimed to be.

When you reached Lao's room, the door was slightly open.

"But you didn't just come to ask about my new arm, did you?" Lao's voice was cold.

"Fancy. Almost fucking useless, but pretty enough, I guess."

You couldn't see the speaker, but you didn't need to. You knew that voice. You hung back. Lao sounded like she was sitting in her bed. You drew back, angling yourself so you could see into the room. Richard Prince was sitting in the same damn chair you'd taken to talk to her when she invited you in.
There was an awkward silence.

"Why are you here?" Lao asked, and to her credit, her voice stayed strong.

"They patched you up nice, Bái Shé," Prince said. "A little bird told me that you were getting all better. If you keep switching sides like this, you won't have any friends left."

You released a breath you didn't know you'd been holding. Lao wasn't rampaging through HQ, killing people and releasing prisoners. You wanted to kill Prince, wanted to kill him very badly, but you knew Lacroix and Gabriel wanted him alive. For now. You just needed a moment to plan it.

"If you're here to kill me, just do it," Lao snapped. "I'm not going back."

Prince gave an ugly laugh. "Now that's a funny thing to bring up. In fact, that's what I'm here to ask you about. Never really paid much attention to the Ukrainian. Chumak, was it? I knew he was a fucking piece of work, knew he was all about his cute little pet Bái Shé-"

"Shut up!" Lao snarled.

"Oh, you didn't like playing doctor?" You could hear Prince's smirk, and you wanted to knock his teeth out. "Doesn't matter. Reyes let slip something interesting. Said you were programmed to kill your best friend. I have to ask, were you actually pissed at her outside of work? Did you secretly want her dead before Talon fixed you? Or was it compulsion? And what kind? Was it a facial recognition trick keyed into your cybernetics? A little voice in your head?"

"Why do you care?" Lao sounded confused.

"...Professional curiosity," Prince said. "And the only reason you're still alive. So answer me, how did your protocol work?"

"...It was a mix of methods," Lao said after an uncomfortably long pause. "Some of it was psychological reinforcement. "She abandoned you. She stole the man you liked. She failed you." Constant reminders of irrational things," Lao said softly. "Some of it was blatant, some of it was subtler, but it happened daily."

"I didn't sit there like some brainwashed zombie muttering "kill her, kill her." Gérard Lacroix's kill order supposedly would have been triggered by facial recognition. But they didn't have a picture of her on file-"

"Strange," Prince muttered. "Girls are all about taking useless pictures. There weren't any of you together?" Prince paused.

"Not that they could recover," Lao said, sounding pleased with herself.

"Clever," Prince said not sounding pleased at all. He didn't know the half of it. She'd misidentified you on purpose.

"But when she came out and said her...full name: I couldn't stop myself. I didn't want to stab her. I tried to stop myself. It was like...watching a movie. I didn't have the control of the wheel. Some of the shrinks theorized that I was disassociating myself from it, that I couldn't accept the guilt. But I fought it, I swear I fought it, and I failed."

"Hn." Prince was quiet for a long time. "Would you call it an impulse or...?"

"...I don't know. I didn't hear a voice telling me to do it. I just...did it, even though part of me was trying not to. It was like watching a movie. And then, when I'd completed the task, I was
"...Waking up from a dream," Prince said.

Lao exhaled. "Yeah. A bad dream." She took a shaky breath. "Who'd they send you after?"

Prince was silent for a moment. "My ex. Not torn up about it like you are. But I guess between you and me, I don't like the thought that they messed with my head. Always told me the treatments were experimental, a risk I was willing to take. But they never said nothing about putting leashes on me." The chair scraped against the floor and you tensed, ready to go.

"So you killed your friend, huh?"

"...Yeah," she said, and your heart clenched, because even now, after all this, Lao was trying to protect you.

"And you feel bad about it." Prince laughed. "Well, don't worry, you can join her soon. I'll even make it quick-

Your nascent reasonable plan evaporated. You charged through the door, fingers primed.

Prince had his big metal arms attached, of course, and his eyes widened comically, as you slugged him across the jaw with your metal fingers. His head snapped back, and spun around for another strike. You weren't fast enough, one of those metal fists lashed out and you flew backward into a counter.

"Lucky!"

Prince was already on his feet, blood staining his orange jumpsuit. The sleeves had been ripped off.

"I remember you, bitch. You were there on the beach..." He laughed harshly. "Guess I get to pay you back now."

You dragged yourself up, and he seized you by the left wrist, grinning at your gloves.

"Got some attachments there? You think that trick would work twice?" He pulled you against him. "I've got news for-

You snarled and slammed the crown of your head into his nose. Because even if there was the chance he wouldn't feel the pain, the blunt force trauma to his head would do something.

Swearing, blood gushing from his crushed nose, Prince threw you at the wall and you spun around, gun drawn. You weren't supposed to kill him, no, but you wouldn't regret it either.

"Can you stop me with that peashooter before I-?"

Prince faltered then, his eyes widening briefly as blood began to trickle from his mouth. You didn't hesitate. You darted in and jammed your injector into his thigh.

Prince moved his mouth a few times, and then crumpled to the floor, Angela's pronged staff partially buried in his back.

"Lao, are you OK?" You asked, wiping your bloody face.

"I'm not the one leaking all over the floor like some kind of hazardous waste faucet," she
"You are not allowed to hang out with Ziv any more. He's a bad influence," you muttered and turned around to check on Prince.

"He'll live," Angela said tightly. "Don't know if he'll walk again, or if I caused permanent damage to his cybernetics, but I don't care right now." She gave you a fierce look. "I thought you were going to shoot him-"

"Need him alive," you said, not wanting to admit that you didn't think your handgun would be enough to bring him down quickly.

"I suppose I should do something about that," Angela scowled. "After I take care of Henri. He's got a bad concussion, but I think he'll be OK." It took you a moment to realize that she was talking about the nurse you'd found on the ground.

"You're still bleeding," Lao said. She was wearing a t-shirt, and still under the blankets.

You shrugged. "What's a little blood between friends?"

Lao stared at you, fear, anger, and shame all crossing her face. "You're an asshole," she shouted, and promptly burst into tears.

You reached over and hugged her, not caring how mad she was in that moment. Just grateful that you'd got here in time and that she was still on your side. "Sorry I'm late. I'm glad you're OK," you said, squeezing her, and then you straightened up. "Now, I'm going to go make sure the rest of the infirmary is clear."

There was another concussed nurse shoved behind a desk, but other than that, the infirmary was clear. Athena was back online ten minutes later. Távio had apparently reached one of her active security nodes, and she'd guided him to Winston. All the escapees were dead or accounted for, and Zheng was helping run a system diagnostic. Jack and Gabriel were reported to be fine, but handling the situation. There had been some injuries on your side, but everyone would live. Genji and Hanzo had already been by to pick up Prince. Genji looked amused, possibly by Angela's frazzled state. Hanzo just looked constipated. As usual.

You sat through a nanite injection and an angry German lecture, though you already knew all that vitriol was not directed at you. Angela gave you your shot there in Lao's room, handed you an emitter, and went to check on her injured staff members.

"You OK?" You asked, as Lao blew her nose, her eyes bloodshot.

"I'm fine! Stop asking," she growled.

"I gotta head back out in a minute. Want to do this again some time? Maybe without the cyborg mass murderer?" You sat in the chair you'd taken back from Prince.

"...You can come by again," Lao said, staring at the wall. "It's getting boring in here."

"What do you do for fun?" You asked, because it was better not to assume anything now.
"I've been giving input on the cybernetics," Lao said. "I know I'm not the only one in Dr. Ziegler's program. But I have the engineering and programming background to highlight things that she and Torby miss."

"That's...fun?" You wondered aloud.

"I don't want to have fun. I want to be useful!"

It was a far cry from the young soldier you'd met a few years ago. No, that wasn't entirely accurate. Lao had always wanted to be useful. But back then, she could still let herself play. Now, it was all about making amends for the bad things that had happened. You understood that track. "All right. Let me know if I can get you anything."

Lao stayed silent for a minute. "I'd like news about my parents."

You were prepared for that question. "Your mother has been offered a civil engineering job in Numbani, and your father will probably get a job offer from the university as well," you said, carefully, because you couldn't reveal Kwento's involvement.

"Numbani?" Lao tilted her head to the side. She muttered something in Cantonese, and shook her head. "Do you think they'll go?"

"No clue," you said. "Heard it was a pretty sweet deal though."

"And it's safe...?"

"Yeah," you said. "No Talon involvement." Because you'd double-checked Kwento's dealings. Just to make sure everything was aboveboard.

Lao pondered that. "So why were you dripping wet when you came into the room?"

"Oh, I'd just bailed out of a speeding hovercraft into the lake. It's the new thing. All the kids are doing it," you said blandly.

Lao stared at you for a very long time, then shook her head. "I'm not even going to ask."

"That's probably best," you said, deciding to avoid another lecture.

Chapter End Notes

Sorry for the delay. The Final Girl really set me off schedule a bit. But also am still getting over this stupid cold, started training at my new job (it seems like a really good environment!), and I technically haven't left my old job yet, going in this weekend to help out.

I'm adjusting to the new schedule, and we're not allowed to use the wi-fi at the office for reasons, so I'm going to have to develop a different editing procedure. I'll probably convert my drafts to epub and read/notate them on my nook. That's what I did when I went to Texas in May.
Chapter 104

Chapter Summary

The aftermath of Family Day and some unforeseen consequences.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Torby and Reinhardt still had Kseniya and Brigitte. Chang was covering Feng, Michael, Maggie, and Fareeha. Athena said Isha had stuck with Gabriel throughout the operation, but was fine. You massaged your temples, glad that you hadn't known that during the attack. For the moment, all the big fires had been put out, and you could let yourself relax for a few minutes before the next heart-stopping crisis.

So you did the only logical thing and popped by the cafeteria vending machines for some ice cream and coffee. After all that...excitement, you needed something to boost your blood sugar.

You sat quietly at an empty table and let yourself breathe. You did not like mixing kids with violence. And Isha? What the hell had Isha been doing? Athena had been awfully tight-lipped about Gabriel and Jack. Could you say that about an AI, especially since none of her drones had anything that resembled lips? And what kind of tech had the attackers used to take her down? Since Sakai was involved, you had no doubt that Petras had some role in this. Had it been triggered by your confrontation with him? Or had he always been planning to get rid of Prince before the cyborg could reveal too much?

"Oh, there you are."

You looked up to see Ziv in his dapper canary yellow suit, one sleeve torn. You stared, checking him for other damages.

"I'm fine," he huffed. "Pissed about the suit, but that's it."

You shook your head. "Been wondering where you disappeared to."

Someone cleared their throat right then, and you realized that you needed to eat less ice cream and drink more coffee, because your alertness levels were dropping. Behind Ziv was a much shorter girl with those same slightly wild amber eyes and a cloud of reddish-brown curls. Where Ziv was lean and angular, she was round and soft, except for her expression. She had that bitchy "Ziv has no patience for anyone" expression down pat and it was a little weird to see it on someone else's face. Was it a genetic thing?

You stood up and held out your hand. "I'm Lucky. You must be Tali."

"Talia," she said, arms staying firmly at her side.

You dropped your hand. "All right."
"Only family calls me "Tali," she said, unable to resist getting another jab in.

You shook your head, seeing a distinct pattern in Mihret family manners. "OK."

Ziv just rolled his eyes. "Stop being a little bitch, Talia."

Talia's nostrils flared and she glared at her brother. "You abandoned me!"

You raised a brow. You didn't think moving to Zurich from Tel Aviv constituted brotherly abandonment, but you weren't really an expert on sibling relations.

"One moment we're eating bland hamburgers, the next, you're running off and telling me to follow the giant German! And then she goes and crashes a fucking hovercraft into a dock!" She pointed at you. "There were children onboard! This is your "good friend" Lucky? The one who watches your back? She's a fucking menace! What the hell, Ziv?"

You snorted and switched over to your coffee. "Because my idea of a good time is crashing hovercrafts at crazy speeds."

Your sarcasm did not fly over her head. "Then why did you do it?" Talia scowled at you, and you couldn't bring yourself to get angry, because she looked so much like a little angry Ziv, and you didn't usually take a normal-sized angry Ziv very seriously. "You were the one in control of the vehicle..." She trailed off, looking again at Ziv's torn sleeve.

You just sipped your coffee, a wry smile on your face. "Uh-huh."

"Ben-zona!" She swore, eyes lighting up as she realized that something serious had transpired. "What happened?"

"That's classified," Ziv said smugly.

She punched him in the arm. "You said you were just a tech! That you weren't doing dangerous things!"

"So did Savta. Did you actually believe her?" Ziv laughed.

Talia looked at you again, brow furrowed, then glared back at her brother. "I believed you, you ass!"

Ziv shrugged, not looking ashamed at all. In fact, he had the smuggest shit-eating grin you'd seen on his face in a long time. You sat back in your chair, a little worried.

"You've got blood on your shirt," Talia said, her angry glare having no effect on Ziv. You glanced down, seeing that she was right. You'd forgotten about that. You definitely needed more caffeine.

You shrugged. "I'll go change after I finish my coffee."

"Is it yours?" Ziv asked sharply, his amusement draining away.

"Not all of it," you said cheerfully.

"Idiot," Ziv scowled. "Tell me you at least hit him once for me."

"Nope, just for our friends." You paused. "But I head-butted him once for me. I think that might be my signature move."
Ziv grumbled something in Hebrew, but you were used to his mutterings and didn't think twice about it.

"I said, "no it's not." Don't believe her lying ass." Ziv flashed her a mean little smile. "Lucky's signature move is stabbing people through the throat."

Talia watched you with big wary eyes, and you just sighed, wishing Ziv could keep his damn mouth shut.

After your snack, shower, and change of clothes, you headed back out. Most of your guests assumed there'd been an electrical issue - that was the story anyway - and Captain Amari had returned to preside over the closing ceremonies.

Tataryn had picked Kseniya up already. No word on how mad he was, and honestly, you didn't have the emotional fortitude to handle him right now.

Jack, Gabriel, Feng, and their family members were all in Jack's quarters, where you were heading right now. Távio was getting patched up in the infirmary. Lacroix was overseeing the rest of the cleanup. Jesse, Távio, and the Shimadas had all gone to the infirmary for minor wounds. You shook your head, exhausted from the combat, but mostly from the socializing.

The guests were speaking in hushed voices around the living room, and Feng pointed at the bedroom.

"They're in there," she said. "You should probably talk to them without an audience." She gave a great disappointed sigh.

You walked into Jack's bedroom, a little worried about the response you were going to get, but all thoughts evaporated when you saw Jack sitting there on the bed with a black eye, one arm in a sling, blood still staining his torn shirt.

You were at his side immediately, hands cupping his face, checking him for other injuries.

"I'm OK, sweetheart," he said, giving a gruff laugh. "Come on, stop poking me. I'm all right."

"You don't look all right, Francis!"

"OK, I'm injured, a little. No need to hurt me more," Jack said, kissing your nose. "I've already gotten it from Gabe."

"The pendejo put himself between me and a hacked prototype infantry omnic," Gabriel said roughly. "He thought he was Wilhelm, but without an actual shield."

You turned to see Gabriel leaning against the window, looking absolutely fine. Isha sat on his shoulder, trilling happily. You squinted; there were rusty stains smeared on her mouth and talons.

"You took her into combat?!" Your voice was louder than you intended.
Gabriel just laughed, patting her head. " Didn't have a chance to send her back to the office or our quarters. She just followed me in, against orders. Sound familiar?"

You swallowed roughly, trying not to imagine all the things that could have gone wrong. Velociraptor or not, she was only a little dinosaur with hollow bones and shiny feathers. She wasn't bulletproof... You clenched your teeth, trying to focus on the present. Now you were going to have to bathe her. "How'd it go?"

"We let her scout through the vents. And she clawed a man's eye out." Gabriel looked very proud, and Isha puffed up, chattering happily. Then she made a gouging motion with her gummy toe talons, something you distinctly remember Gabriel teaching her, and you groaned.

You wanted to yell about how they could have at least disinfected her claws by now, but the words wouldn't come out.

"It's OK," Jack murmured, turning your head to face him. He kissed your forehead. "We're all OK -"

"No, you're not. You're all idiots!" You scowled. "You're reckless-" You glared at Gabriel, jabbing a finger in his direction. "Clumsy-" You turned your gaze back to Jack, one fist clenched. "Insubordinate-" You glanced at Isha, who watched you with her head cocked to the side. "Idiots!"

"I love you too, baby," Jack murmured, kissing your cheek. "You're so adorable when you're angry." He gave you a lopsided smile.

"I will cut you, Francis!"

There was the rustle of wings, and Isha fluttered down from Gabriel's shoulder and strutted up to you, rubbing her face against your leg. She chirped, just looking pleased to see you, and you sighed, scooping her up and hugging her to your chest, careful to avoid the eyeball gunk on her claws. Because bloody or not, she was your hatchling.

"You have an excuse, murderbird. You don't know any better. These jerks-"

Gabriel crossed the room, and caught both you and Jack in a hug.

"Hush, corazon. I've heard about your exploits today too. Just take a moment, and appreciate that we're all here, together." His tone was gentle, but the words hit like a punch in the gut.

You exhaled slowly, nodding feebly as he pressed a kiss to your temple and then to Jack's. Jack pulled you onto his lap with his good arm, and kissed the top of your head.

"We're all here," he told you softly. "We're all OK. That's what matters."

You didn't get to linger over your relief. Isha needed a bath. Gabriel and Jack needed to write up their own incident reports and host a strategy debrief. You had reports to write too, both for the hovercraft malfunction and the infirmary attack. Thankfully, you weren't going to have to take part in the post-festivities clean up. You just had a bunch of paperwork, and probably a meeting with Lacroix.

Maggie, Michael, and Feng crowded into the bathroom to watch you bathe Isha. She ignored them, happily splashing in the sink, the water running an alarming shade of red. You just lathered her up, not missing how Maggie and Feng snapped tons of pictures. Isha didn't seem to mind. She even let you brush her teeth, and there were shreds of fabric caught in the back of her mouth. You disinfected her claws too. She ate with those... A terrible thought occurred, and you grimaced. Did she eat the eyeball? Oh God. Did you really want to know the answer?

"She's not hurt, is she?" Maggie asked.

"Doesn't seem to be," you said, as you checked her for injuries.

"That's not her blood," Feng said, sounding terribly proud.

There was an awkward moment of silence.

"Whose-" Maggie began.

"No idea," you said.

There was another awkward moment of silence.

"So, what happened out there?" Michael asked. "Feng knows, but she won't say a thing."

Feng gave a light-hearted laugh and said nothing. You could just picture the insufferable smirk on her face.

You sighed, toweling off Isha. She chirped at you, and you fluffed her crest feathers, before setting her down. She gave Maggie a curious look, before strutting out of the bathroom, probably to go raid the snacks on the coffee table.

"If you say "that's classified," I will scream," Maggie added.

You glanced at Feng who shrugged. "I told them, I swore a blood oath. Loyalty, friendship, not running my mouth..."

You rolled your eyes. "That'll be the day."

Feng just laughed at you. "I keep your secrets too, Lucky. I'm that kind of friend."

Shaking your head, you dragged yourself out of the bathroom, noting that Isha was watching Chang with keen interest. Chang, for her part, was standing watch by the door, her suspicious gaze on the Zheng drone.

Michael rested his hand on your shoulder and you turned around, a little surprised by the forwardness.

"We saw your hovercar go off track," he said, his worried face almost exactly like Jack's, minus ten years or so. "At first we thought you were just having fun..." He shook his head. "But then we heard about the crash when we finished the race."

"Why does everyone think I'm so irresponsible?" You tried to look innocent, but both Chang and Feng snorted.

"Your division has a...reputation," Feng said delicately. "And having spent the night getting my ass handed to me in Smash Brothers, I will say that reputation is not entirely deserved."

"So, what happened?" Maggie popped up behind Michael. "Were you the target? Or was it Távio? Or..." Her expression darkened. "Was someone actually after those cute little kids?"

Groaning, you sat down on the couch, lifting Isha off the coffee table and out of the chip bowl.

Feng just gave you a sneaky little smile.

Chang narrowed her eyes at Maggie, probably picking up on her familiarity with Távio. You really hoped that wasn't going to be a problem, but then, you doubted Chang would let it be a problem.

"It was probably me," you said.

Maggie gasped dramatically.

Michael's blue eyes grew cold and he grimaced. Suddenly, you had visions of young pre-SEP Jack. It was...kind of cute actually.

"I don't know anything though," you said with a shrug. "I mean, there might be some soon-to-be-dead asshole who was after the kids, but I am the most likely target."

"Why?" Maggie asked.

"Beats me," you said with a shrug. "I'm just so damn loveable."

Chang made a rasping noise, and it took you a moment to realize she was laughing. She gave you a pointed look, not buying your explanation for a moment.

"OK, so there might be professional reasons some people want me out of the picture. Hell, there might even be some personal ones too." You and Feng exchanged wry smiles. "But we don't know anything yet. Winston will be examining the tech. I've got good backup. And Jack and Gabriel are very motivated to find out what went wrong. There's nothing to worry about." You gave a cheerful smile.

Neither Morrison sibling looked like they bought your neat and tidy explanation.

"Someone attacked Jack," Maggie said. "Don't tell us something fell on him. He already tried that. And I quote, "it was an omnic. It was just sitting there on the shelf, but I bumped the shelf and- Ow, why are you hitting me? I'm not a liar!"

"I mean, it might have happened like that," Feng said, stifling a laugh.

"Whoever was behind this attack specifically timed it for a civilian event," Michael added, crossing his arms. "These people are dangerous, ruthless, and willing to kill little kids."

"I know that much." You wondered if you were going to have to explain everything to Kseniya, or if Tataryn would ever let you near her again. "Honestly, there's no point in getting worked up right now. We haven't confirmed anything yet, guys."

"We're already worked up!" Maggie growled. "Telling us that doesn't change a damn thing!"

"I know. You're right." You stroked Isha's chest. "But there's nothing you can do right now. We'll handle the situation. We always do."

Maggie grumbled something under her breath.
Michael gave you a long searching look, his skepticism at your "plan" very clear.

"You do know she can't tell you details without risk of court martial, right?" Chang asked casually.

"Jack wouldn't-" Maggie began.

"Maybe not. But don't put them in that position," Chang said. "Strike has enough on her plate. She's trying to figure out who, out of a long list of people, might feel bold enough to kill her right now. She doesn't need you two complicating things."

"But Ray!" Maggie wailed. "We're worried about her!"

"OK," Chang said, her tone not changing at all. "Worry about her less invasively. Maybe over in that corner, sitting down, with your mouth shut."

Maggie threw her hands in the air, shook her firsts, and stomped over to the corner. She plunked down, and sat there, glaring for thirty seconds. "THIS ISN'T MAKING ME FEEL BETTER, RAY!"

"That was never the point of the exercise," Chang said, giving that rasping laugh once more.

"I'm invited too?" Feng beamed at you.

"You and your drone," you said, as you carried Isha into the hallway. You'd just finished writing and submitting your reports. Feng put on her floppy hat and the two of you left Jack's siblings and Chang in the Strike Commander's quarters. Lacroix was holding a debrief and strategy meeting. An Athena drone floated beside you. Isha reached out to smack it playfully. "Don't do that," you scolded.

"I think it's cute how much they like you," Feng said as you walked.

"They like you too," you said.

"Maggie does. Michael's a little standoffish," Feng said with a shrug. "I mean, I understand it. I do have a...reputation. Not quite like yours. But misleading enough." She gave a shrug. "Maggie's fun. It's nice to pretend to be...normal again. She kind of reminds me of me at that age."

You winced at that. "Really?"

"Well, I was less gung-ho about militaristic training regiments, but the unbridled enthusiasm, chaotic energy, and the slightly stick-in-the-mud older brother...yeah. Only I don't think Michael is conflicted about liking other men." She winked at you. "I know for a fact, Michael likes a very specific woman."

You just shook your head. "Be nice."

Feng cackled. "Did you just...? You?"

Isha puffed up, glaring at Feng.

"Anyway," you said, quickly. "I appreciate you looking after them and asking Zheng to "Pfft, blood oath!" Feng said, holding up her long-healed palm and letting you change the subject. "Anyway, I've had a great time. Maybe I should invite Maggie and Michael over for a visit. Get them out of rural Indiana for a weekend..."

You shuddered then, having mental images of Maggie with her own flock of killer raptors. "We should plan another Shanghai trip," you said, trying to distract her once more. "I know Genji and Hanzo both need to get out more..."

"Oh good, me too! I've been wanting to ask, but I didn't want to be too pushy," she said. "I still think we could visit the opera, a club, and maybe a Shaolin temple. Something cultured, something fun, something educational... When did I get so boring?"

You reached the conference room, still listening to Feng suggest restaurants and possible activities. You opened the door, and found that they'd started without you.

Feng's mouth snapped shut, and her eyes widened, because Kwento was there, giving both of you the disapproving auntie look.

"Strike. "Claire." How nice of you to join us." Her tone was on caustic side of civil, and you squinted at Jack, because no one mentioned she would be here. "Us" consisted of Jack, Gabriel, Captain Amari, Lacroix, Winston, Reinhardt, Zenyatta, and to your slight horror, Lao.

"Undersecretary Kwento!" Feng said brightly. "Wow, can I say I am a big fan? Your work in Numbani really helped me reshape the On Sing structural model for omnic integration. I mean, I'm a big admirer of your sentient being rights record."

Kwento blinked, then looked like she'd swallowed a fishbone. "I find it disturbing that the head of a large organized crime organization admires my civil rights work."

"Ms. Zhai actually has been building quite a reputation for ensuring fair employment and legal protections for her omnic workers," Zenyatta said, with a nod in Feng's direction. "My understanding is that she has already moved away from the property-model of omnic manufacturing and offers quite the benefits package for omnic employees. It is to be lauded."

Feng just gave her best rural "aw shucks" shrug, her smile wide and a little sharp. "Tekhartha Zenyatta, it is an honor. I am also a great admirer of your brother. One does not have to embrace pacifism to respect the strength of character and principle it takes to follow such path."

"Are you actually the power in On Sing? Or is it your Great Aunt?" Kwento asked, undeterred by Feng's pretty speech.

"I would never presume to disrespect my beloved auntie," Feng said, her smile flattening. "I pay the proper obeisance and always take her wisdom into account before critical decisions are made-"

"And then she promptly ignores me, and does whatever she wants," the Zheng orb said coolly. "Her methods are different than mine. But my reign was forged in blood, genetic engineering, and war. My niece is a different creature. She wishes to prosper in peace and altruism, and I find her actions terribly foreign and risky. But I cannot deny her results."

"That...is the nicest thing any elder in the family has ever said about me, including my parents." Feng shook her head. Then she pinched herself, winced, and gave you a wry smile.
"But do not mistake her congenial nature for weakness. Betray her, and my niece will hunt you to the ends of the earth and tear your treacherous heart out with her bare hands."

"Wow," Feng said. "That sounds more like Mom than me." She laughed nervously, her shoulders drawn up like she was embarrassed. Except everyone here knew she'd charged single-handedly into a secret mountain base to rescue her brother. Just like they knew she'd declared war on the southern branch of On Sing, solely because they'd gone after her mother, whom she didn't even seem to like that much.

"And Winston, you are certain On Sing had nothing to do with today's attack?" Kwento asked, still eyeing Feng suspiciously.

"On the contrary, we could not have maintained system integrity without Zheng's aid. We have never encountered such an advanced viral tunneler. It was meant to trigger a destabilizing cascade of critical system failures and it was used in conjunction with a targeted EMP. It would have destroyed most mainframes, but our construction is radically different. The best analogy is the difference between square building blocks and honeycombed structures. Our...format is atypical, and we do waste some computational power in converting files and programs, but our defenses are unparalleled."

Kwento glanced at Zenyatta. "I've seen no such description or mention of this "atypical" build."

It's been a closely-guarded secret, precisely for the reasons we encountered today," Jack said, unbothered by the implication. "We all know the Director cannot be trusted."

Kwento grimaced. "Well, he won't be in for awhile. He is on medical leave, resting from...overexertion."

You and Feng stared at the table, doing your best not to look at each other and break out cackling, because even if Kwento already knew what you did, it would be most unseemly to laugh about it in public. Isha sat quietly in your lap, her gaze traveling between Zenyatta, Lao, and Kwento.

"There will be a note in several intelligence reports that Overwatch experienced technical difficulties at a very public event," Lacroix said. "But we managed to keep the severity of the situation under wraps. It will be a minor embarrassment, and maybe some of the tabloids will run stories about Chanceux's unfortunate driving "accident," but the fallout should be minimal. In fact, her hovercraft crash should provide excellent cover for us. The story we're choosing is that the vehicle hit a transformer and caused some electrical issues in the main building. But nothing we couldn't resolve quickly."

Lao blinked, and then turned her head to give you a hard look.

You hung your head and sighed. There went your reputation again: Scapegrace Lucky, the embarrassment of Blackwatch.

"For the record, it should be stated that we found evidence of tampering in the wreckage. There was foreign control chip implanted directly on the internal sensors, masking the actual readings from our central systems. It's why Athena had couldn't force the vehicle back on track or control the speed. She managed to short out the GPS control chip, giving Lucky back manual steering of the craft. But she couldn't reach the one affecting the internal speed and safety sensors, not without causing critical damage to the entire engine." Winston shook his head. "We've reviewed footage, and found Agent Sakai tampering with the hovercraft shortly before the
You snorted. Sakai was dead now. And you hadn't even gotten a shot at her.

Kwento stared at you stone-faced, bearing a strange resemblance to someone's pissed off auntie. You were getting the same stoically angry look from Lao. It hit you then, that they might be angry at you, but both women were actually angry for you. Lao, well after your talk in the infirmary, you suspected as much. But that Kwento might worry about you? That was still kind of unexpected.

"We've accessed Sakai's private communications. We're still decrypting some. She had a few personal military-grade tablets concealed in her quarters. I have Agent Mihret working on it. That intel should be available by tomorrow," Lacroix said.

"After sabotaging Lucky's craft, Sakai met up with Agent Bakker out of Dispatch. From what we can piece together-" Captain Amari played the security footage on the projector, showing Sakai and a pinched-looking blonde man coming from different directions, then pairing off, and heading for the Blackwatch containment cells. They had bags, and they pulled out a few electronic devices, and then the first camera went out. "We know they caused the system crash. They then manually released the prisoners and Bakker reprogrammed some of the confiscated Omnica Corp tech we'd had in storage in the same area."

"They released everyone, but the real target was Richard Prince," Gabriel said, picking up the presentation. The security footage changed to the hallway in front of the infirmary. "From what we can gather, Sakai was supposed to get him off the grounds ASAP. Except Prince didn't want to go." There was a shot of them arguing, and Prince's metal hands reached out, twisted her head around, and down she went. "Prince was very bothered by something I had said in one of our...talks. About the mental conditioning Nguyen has subjected her cyborgs to. So he came to interrogate Agent Lao."

Lao sat ramrod straight under everyone's scrutiny. She didn't look at you. She didn't look at anyone. She just took a deep breath and stared so hard at the wall in front of her, you wondered if she had figured out a way to see through time.

"And what exactly happened, agent?" Kwento asked, her expression almost gentle as she looked at Lao.

"He wanted to know how my conditioning manifested. I explained as best as I could, and he seemed to understand exactly what experiences I was talking about," Lao said. "Though he had less misgivings about the process than I did. I included the details in my report, ma'am."

"As did Agent Strike, who had very fortuitous timing," Lacroix said. "And thankfully, a miraculously dense skull."

You gave a mock bow, though no one looked amused. In fact, Gabriel was giving you a disapproving frown, and Jack was shaking his head, face in his hand.

"The details of the conditioning effect are consistent between both accounts," Lacroix continued, ignoring you. "For those of you who haven't yet had a chance to review it."

"So...what happened to Agent Bakker?" Feng asked innocently.

"Killed in action," Lacroix said, without any change in intonation.

Both Winston and Reinhardt looked away, their discomfort all too clear. Kwento was too "Seriously? You just left out the part where you knew someone tried to kill you earlier! You said you jumped out of a hovercraft into a lake like it was a fucking recreational event!" Lao snarled at you. She was in a wheelchair, you realized, and you wondered how much trouble she'd had acclimating to the new implants. It definitely wasn't a good idea to ask right now.

"I mean, the four year old had a great time. She wanted to do it again," you said with a shrug.

"You had a baby onboard?" Lao slapped her flesh hand against her forehead. "Of all the stupid-" she paused. "She isn't yours, is she?"

"Nope, nope, and nope." You shook your head rapidly. "Nope. This is mine." You held up Isha who yawned. "Isha meet Lao. Lao, Isha."

"Is that..." Lao sighed. "You know what. Ziv said you had a dinosaur. I thought he was joking. I thought he meant a chicken or a large lizard. You know, what. I'm sure there's a long convoluted story that you can only tell me in declassified pieces. And I really don't have the patience for that right now. So you can tell me later, when my current Lucky-induced headache has dissipated."

You sat Isha back down on your lap. She gave a little huff of annoyance and turned her back to Lao.

"Now you've offended her," you said.

"I..." Lao squinted at you. "What?"

You gently stroked your murderbird's chin. "It's OK, Isha-bird. Lao's had a long trying day. It isn't you. She's just grumpy. You're the best murderbird in the whole world." Isha thrummed happily and rubbed her face against your chest.

"Yeah," Lao said, now staring at you in disbelief. There were a few odd moments of silence while you petted Isha and Lao just took it all in. Then she cleared her throat and glanced over at Kwento. "What's up with the suit?"

"Friendly," you said.

"She's making my skin crawl. Staring is rude."

"She might be watching Isha. And if she isn't, she means well," you said, knowing you couldn't tell Lao about the connection between Kwento and Nwazue. Not yet anyway.

"Come along, Chanceux. We have work to discuss," Lacroix said. "Claire, you are welcome to come too, or you can return to socialize with the Strike Commander."

You looked up to see Gabriel pushing Lao out of the room, Winston walking with them. Gabriel leaned over and said something in Lao's ear and she laughed dryly.

"Oh...I guess I'll come with you. As much as I want to help Maggie redecorate his quarters, I should probably get some work done." Feng slunk along beside you. Kwento left with Captain Amari and Reinhardt, the three of them already deep in a discussion on handling Petras.

Zenyatta hovered beside you, looking serene as always. "How are you feeling?"

"Sore," you admitted. "But-

There was a familiar prickly warmth and you shivered as Zenyatta began use his omnic energy to mend your injuries.

"Huh," Feng said. "That's...interesting."

"Do not worry. Adaeze has asked me to check in on Agent Lao as well. I understand she isn't recovering as quickly as they would like from her surgery," Zenyatta said. "But for now, I am to accompany you and Gérard for an intelligence debrief."

"Well, thanks for the pick-me-up," you said. straightening your shoulders. You hurt just a little less right now, and that would translate into hurting a lot less tomorrow.

Your group made it to Lacroix's office, Zheng orb included. There were enough chairs, and while you held Isha in your lap, you were a little worried about her eating something expensive and toxic. Who knew if Lacroix's weird post-post-modern art pieces had lead paint or worse?

"We have a few issues to discuss," Lacroix told you. "First off, Zenyatta is going to join our medical corp as an official Overwatch agent. It isn't just a PR move. You both know how talented he is."

"I have no problem with that," you said. "Congratulations."

Zenyatta gave a nod. "Thank you. Your sincerity means a great deal to me."

"Hey, I think it's great too! Very inspirational. You should get action figures," Feng said matter-of-factly. "I can help you there. We can donate the proceeds to a charity focused omnic rights issues..."

Zenyatta seemed at a loss for words. Or maybe he was imagining getting to play with an action figure version of himself. You weren't sure.

"That isn't a bad idea," Lacroix said. "You can discuss it later though. Chanceux, I'd like you to...break it to our Blackwatch agents. We'd like it to be a smooth transition, and we both know some of our people will have concerns. Your support will mean a lot."

"I know Genji will help-"

"Genji's regard is something other agents will find easy to stomach, however, you have more...social influence."

"He means you're more persuasive than Genji, because Genji doesn't try to use civil social skills to get what he wants any more," Feng told you cheerfully.

You snorted, already knowing that. "Yeah, all right. I'll put the word out. I know some people are going to be hard sells, but at the very least they shouldn't give you any trouble, Zenyatta. And if they do, let me know. I'll deal with them politely. I promise."

Zenyatta chuckled. "Is that so, Lucky? Because I have heard stories..."

"I am always polite, at first. And then if they're assholes, well, I handle it," you said with a shrug. "Either way, it's not on you, and yeah, maybe it is about time we had an omnic Overwatch agent. I think Athena needs more inorganic friendship. No offense, Zheng."

The orb hovered there, ignoring your comment.

"I appreciate the support. It means a gives me hope to see how far you have come. I am very glad that-"

You shrugged again, unsure what to say to that. Because while it was growth, you weren't so sure you liked admitting that maybe you'd been prejudiced against omnics. At the very least, Zenyatta had been a pain in your ass for awhile, and it did speak well of you that you could put that aside and make peace. Sure, he'd had to heal you a few times, and bail you out of trouble, and stand up to Kwento in your defense... OK, so maybe Zenyatta was just a good guy, and you were kind of stupid. Either way, it was growth and you'd take it.

"Our next issue is Ainsley Petras. We have been monitoring her communications, and I thought you might be interested in the transcripts."

You raised a brow. "I thought it didn't matter since we had the footage."

"Perhaps," Lacroix said, inclining his head back. "But I understand your dislike of surprises."

Shaking your head, you picked up your tablet and opened the file Lacroix had sent you. Ainsley Petras had indeed called her mother. The first few pages were small talk, gossip, and so mind-numbingly boring, if there'd been a code concealed, you would have missed it. But then Ainsley's mother, Valerie Petras, brought up the topic:

VP: Your uncle seems...distraught. He called your father yesterday.

AP: unintelligible

VP: What was that?

AP: He should be.

VP: Have you quarreled with your uncle? Ainsley, you know he's a busy man. He doesn't have time for-

AP: He tried to rape my friend.

VP: surprised laughter Ainsley, that's...ridiculous. You must be mistaken. And must you use such crude language?

AP: No mother, I was there. I heard everything. He was using his position as director to try to force her to-

VP: Ainsley, you've always had such an imagination and such a good heart.

AP: Mother, he tried to slap me.

VP: sharp intake of breath

AP: But that was after I tried to pull him off of her. It was a stupid move. I know.
VP: I'll say. Your uncle's business is his own. You can't just barge in-

AP: He told her-

VP: Not every young woman has your upbringing. Some of them, well, they leverage their wiles for influence. Your uncle is only a man. He can't help it when women throw themselves at him-

AP: That's not what happened. She said "no." He grabbed her, and told her he was the boss and she had to do what he said.

VP: Ainsley...you know some women like that kind of treatment-

AP: Mother, you're not listening. I know her. She's not that kind of person, and frankly, most people don't want someone twice their age manhandling them and trying to take advantage of them! It's happened to me once or twice, and I have our good name for protection. She has nothing of the sort!

VP: And why do you have that good name, "Ainsley?" Is it the result of any of your actions? Have you done anything to deserve that protection? No. It's from your uncle and your father's influence. It's her word against his. And her word means nothing. His word means everything.

AP: Mother?
VP: Let it go, Ainsley. Apologize to your uncle for interfering. It was not your business and you probably misunderstood the situation. Don't let some street trash get between you and your family. Your uncle is having health problems right now. He is very distressed over your behavior.

AP: But mother...

VP: Can you imagine the scandal if something like that got out? Ainsley, you're right, your good name has protected you. Our good name has protected you. And what happens if that is tarnished? You are at the mercy of the masses, like all the other slag, and I don't think you're prepared for what that entails. I understand, you're a kind, thoughtful girl. But we have to look out for family first. This friend of yours should understand that. If she's really your friend.

AP: Uncle needs to leave her alone. She won't start trouble if he leaves her alone.

VP: Ainsley, your uncle is in a rocky position. If this girl is going to make trouble for him, he needs to deal with her accordingly. That is the great burden of leadership. Do you understand me, Ainsley? Your uncle loves you. He dotes on you. He only wants the best for you. And I know you love your family. So that means you would never do anything to hurt them.

AP: I can't just turn my back on her.

VP: But you can do it to your own family? long silence Of course not. We both know that. And I know this is hard to hear, but you're doing the right thing. You have to protect the ones you love, Ainsley. Do you understand me?

AP: I...yes, mother. I understand.

VP: I know, it's hard dear. A woman's lot is always hard, but with the help of a good man, you will succeed.

You stared at the transcript, slightly horrified by what you were reading.
"Eww, gross," Feng said, shaking her head as she read over your arm. "That family is the worst."

"Well, I didn't expect her to report her uncle," you said. "But...wow. Valerie Petras married into the family and she's a real piece of shit."

"So my second cousin Qi is really good at car bombs," Feng said. "Can take out almost any vehicle with no civilian casualties, provided there are no civilians in the front seat-"

"Uh...I can do my own killing, Feng. But I don't think it's necessary to kill Ainsley."

"I meant the mother," Feng said. "And the father. And the uncle..."

"Ms. Zhai, I find your blatant disregard for human life somewhat alarming," Zenyatta said. "I'm just trying to make Lucky feel better." Feng gazed at Zenyatta with big almost-innocent green eyes.

"So this is gallows humor?"

"Sure," Feng said happily, though you knew she meant the offer.

"Well, thankfully, Ainsley's testimony isn't what my evidence hinges on. And I don't really care," you said. "We have more important things to worry about."

"Yes. Director Petras is going to come after you again," Lacroix said. "Valerie Petras all but said it. So what would you like to do? Do you want to go public early? Do you want to go into hiding?"

"I want to nail him, Talon, and all the traitors," you said.

"Then we need more evidence. And we need more time to secure it."

You sat there, waiting for Lacroix to say something you didn't already know.

"He will be focused on you."

"So he'll get clumsy," you said with a shrug. "He already has. Maybe he'll call in some of his Talon contacts. It will make it easier for us to gather evidence."

"He was willing to kill two children to get to you," Lacroix said. "And everyone knows Ishana is your pet. Do you think she'll be safe?"

You stiffened in your chair.

"It would be a simple thing to leave out poisoned meat, antifreeze, perhaps a rare neurotoxin if someone is feeling pompous. Can you watch her all the time? What about your Távio? Or Ziv? Everyone in Blackwatch knows that to cross Ziv is to invite an unpleasant visit from you."

"What are you suggesting?" You asked, clenching your teeth.

"I'm merely reminding you that the stakes are higher now, Chanceux. And you are directly in the director's crosshairs. He will find your weaknesses, and he will use them against you."

"Do you want me to go public? Or are you telling me to fake my death?" You asked, because you had ratlines in place.

"Not yet," Lacroix gave a tired sigh. "We are almost ready for Hanoi. Agent Lao and Prince have provided some key insight into the facility. Perhaps on the mission, you will suffer an "accident." And then we will start to move against Petras. For now, I need you to keep a very low profile. You will be on medical leave and possibly awaiting suspension for "reckless endangerment." And while I doubt your bullet ant operation has been traced back to you, I am certain that the strain of the experience has made Petras careless. He is escalating far too quickly."

You sat there, a terrible pit in the bottom of your stomach. "So if I fake my death, then what? Am I out? For good? Where do I go?" You stared in horror at Lacroix. Because Overwatch was your life. And you were in no way prepared to leave it behind.

"There are a few options. I know you'd rather die than go to Antarctica, but so does everyone else. You could spend time with Jack's family and Sergeant Chang. You could go out to LA with Catrina..."

"She could come to Shanghai with me!" Feng said brightly.

"That was another prospect," Lacroix said. "Keep in mind, Chanceux, that these are only potential solutions."

"You can't just send me away," you snarled.

"I can and will, if it is necessary," Lacroix said coldly.

"That's ridiculous! I shouldn't have to-"

"None of us should have to deal with this, but we must! Do you want to jeopardize all the work we've already put into Shit Spiders?" Lacroix snapped. "Do you want to risk any more innocent lives in this vendetta? Because you've overtly thwarted him twice now, and he won't simply go away. Not till you're out of the picture."

You sat back as if slapped.

"Captain Amari backs me on this. But we haven't reached that point yet, but I want you to be prepared for the possibility." The word he seemed to be thinking was "inevitability." But he was too shrewd to use it just yet.

You slumped in your chair, Isha nuzzling your hand. You'd built a goddamn life here. You'd made friends. You looked after your fellow agents. You had Jack and Gabriel. You had a goddamn mission. Petras couldn't just take that all away. Except, that he could. Because he had the money, the power, and the influence, and because you were no one.

Chapter End Notes

Sorry for the late update. We went out of town Sunday and my cousin's car broke down. Got towed back home, and it's all the fun you probably expect.

I really like the new job's environment. I'm catching on pretty fast, and look forward to finishing training. It's a nice mix of "friendly competition" and "everyone is a goddamn smartass and that's OK." Though my boss nearly killed me with Walmart brownie today. I'm not diabetic, but I ate half of it and was like "...my head is spinning and my pancreas is on fire. This is pure sugar. Halp." I discretely threw it away when he wasn't looking. It's probably revenge for making all those jokes about him. :P

For all you 'Muricans, here's a reminder that it's already Thanksgiving next week, and how did it get here so damn fast? I'm cooking my own dinner as usual. Having some friends over and maybe teen!cousin. We'll have 3-6 people, and I have no problem cooking for that many, but I keep going "how the hell did it sneak up on me?"
Anyway, hope you guys have a fun holiday. Even if you aren't 'Murican.
The walk back to Jack's quarters was quiet. Feng had tried to cheer you up, offering you penthouse suites, secret mountain fortresses, and expensive hotels for your temporary relocation. But she'd figured out pretty quickly that you weren't quite in the mindset to think that far ahead.

"You know, it might not go down like that," she said after a moment. "Like, Lacroix is an extreme pessimist and a sneaky spymaster who likes to give you problems to solve. This could be his crappy way of motivating you."

You nodded. "Yeah, maybe." You hugged Isha tight to your chest, and she crooned softly at you, her head resting against your shoulder.

"And you should talk to Captain Amari. She isn't going to make you go through all that unless there's a really good reason."

You took a deep breath, taking more comfort in that then Feng's aim to lure you into On Sing employ. You didn't begrudge her the attempt, you just couldn't think about leaving home, not now.

Faking your death was extreme. But it would be more bearable than faking a convincing dishonorable discharge. You didn't want to walk out of Overwatch, everyone whispering behind your back about your shitty reputation. You didn't want to go through that again; you'd worked too hard to earn your colleagues' respect. Lacroix understood you better than you thought.

Of course, you could always eliminate Petras first. That thought cheered you immensely.

"Are you good at torture?" Feng asked out of the blue. Or maybe it wasn't. She looked at you with hooded eyes, her expression thoughtful.

"I can make people talk," you said. "But I don't like going beyond a certain point. I can. But I don't like it."

"I figured you didn't. You're not a sociopath or a sadist," Feng said. She swung her arms. "I can do it. But I don't like it either. I know, I know, I have people for that. But this leadership gig is really going to my head. I feel overly responsible. Like I should personally oversee the bad shit, so I can be sure that I've already exhausted all my other options." Feng paused. "But I digress, a lot. I know. Look, if you want more permanent help taking care of your problem, I'm happy to help. For friendship!" She struck a pose, both hands locked in the "V is for Victory" sign.

You snorted, because her offer did raise your spirits.

"But talk it all over with your people first, you know." Feng jammed her hands in her pockets. "You're surrounded by good people and it helps." She threw her head back and blew out a frustrated breath. "I'm kind of envious really."

You almost said something like "but you're Zhai Feng, the Triad Tech Mogul of Shanghai, the On Sing Dragon Head, the Dinosaur Resurrectionist." But she looked so somber, and all of her twenty two years, that you held your tongue. Feng was surrounded by family that she wasn't sure if she could trust, thieving raptors, and other ruthless opportunists. "You've got us. And Zheng. And Bayan."

"I know. But here, I can just be "Claire." Your weird friend. Back in Shanghai..." She shrugged. "I know logically I can ask you, or Genji, or Jack for help, and you'll come running. But it's hard to ask. It's hard to put myself out there. Because I'm not just "Claire" any more. I'm Zhai Feng, the Crazy Rich Asian Mobster." She paused. "You know, only a few people from high school realize I'm Zhai Feng. I went by "Claire." It's kind of hilarious, like all Asians look alike to them or something. I was expecting all kinds of messages from them, but there's been very little. A couple of my close friends check in with me, but I think they're kind of scared by what I've gotten myself into." She paused. "Anyway, I'm sorry, I keep getting distracted by my own pathetic moping. My point was, you've got your guys. You've got your friends. Between all of them, you can probably find a solution. Just talk to them. Don't pull that dutiful "I must suffer for the greater good" bullshit, OK?"

"Yeah," you said. "That's good advice."

"It is," she chirped, nodding vigorously. "I wish I'd taken it when I had the chance."

"That is Mr. Lacroix's recommendation? It seems awfully drastic," Kwento said, not bothering to mask her surprise.

Gabriel's frown deepened as he and Jack walked into Wilhelm's office, Ana and Kwento already deep in discussion about the current situation. All the while Wilhelm looked on with his big ridiculous face scrunched up, like he was going to cry.

This meeting was about you. And it came on the heels of a goddamn murder attempt and Jack had been injured in a related attack. Gabriel could feel his control wavering. Tense and angry, he fought the urge to say something that would push Wilhelm over the edge. Sure, it would be good for a laugh, for a minute, but then Ana and Jack's combined disapproval would leave him in a worse place than before. Gabriel knew, on a rational level that Wilhelm wasn't his real target. That it was all too easy to lash out when he was in this state. Wilhelm was a fool, but none of this was his fault, and he didn't deserve Gabriel's cruelty. That was reserved for someone else.

Jack patted his shoulder, giving him a small encouraging smile, like he could read Gabriel's internal struggle on his face and appreciated his self control. They both pulled up chairs around Wilhelm's desk.

"What do you think?" Ana turned to look at them, her dark eyes somber. "What is the best "Kill him first," was on the tip of Gabriel's tongue, but he glanced at Kwento and shut his mouth, not willing to be that open in front of her. He had plans, several in fact, but he had no desire to show his hand just yet. Yes, she was an ally, but she was also a politician and a civilian.

"We have leverage, but I know we don't want to tip him off to how much we already know about his off-the-books operations," Jack said, crossing his arms. "I know what my gut says." He glanced at Kwento. "But I also understand that such actions could come into direct conflict with our long-term goals."

"Not necessarily," Kwento said, hands folded in her lap. "If you kill him and make off with the right computer drives, documents, and contents of his safes, you might have enough evidence to keep it from being detrimental to Shit Spiders."

Gabriel's head snapped back in surprise. He stared at Kwento, her deadly serious expression mirroring his own. "After all that talk about decency and civil liberties, I didn't think you had it in you to plan a cold blooded murder, Ambassador," he said, voice low.

"He's a clear and present danger to Agents Lao and Strike," she said, holding her head up, her posture military-straight. "And a disgrace to us all. I do not make such judgments lightly. And I still do not approve of Blackwatch. But I would be a fool if I failed to understand its importance. We will do a better job vetting the future civilian Director."

"Looking for a new job already?" Gabriel asked, unable to resist poking her.

"Don't make me come over there, Reyes," Kwento said, with mock severity. "I'm not an easy civilian target."

Gabriel had to bite his tongue, because he remembered DC and all of Kwento's not so easy civilian targets. But throwing that in her face would be in bad taste. Sometimes it was hard to reign in his own pettiness. It was a work in progress.

"As much as I would like to hastily eliminate our problem," Wilhelm said, the words uncharacteristically hesitant. "There is the fact that we are talking about murdering our agency head. I am very fond of Lucky Lady. And my own goddaughter was in the vehicle that Petras' pawn sabotaged. I am all for getting him out of the way. But I am not sure this is the right way to do it."

"Not enough honor and glory for you?" Gabriel scoffed.

"Removing the Director is a priority. But I have always thought we would hold him accountable for his actions. He did not act alone, and there is an entire network of corruption around him. Simply taking him out of the picture does nothing to fix that." Wilhelm sighed. "It is like a hydra: cut off one head, two more replace it, and it is all very frustrating. But...maybe I do not understand how these things work. Maybe I am wrong."

Gabriel grimaced, hating just how fucking reasonable Wilhelm was being and how the old knight coached his words in mythic terms.

Ana reached out and rested her hand on his arm. "You're the expert, Gabe. What will keep her the safest?"

"Long term? Getting rid of the whole network," Gabriel exhaled, knowing things were bad when he agreed with Wilhelm of all people. "But Petras is the biggest threat right now. We all know that he'll make another attempt. She's wounded his pride and foiled his plans more than once. His behavior is erratic and he'll try something again." He glanced at Jack. They'd talked about numerous options. Maybe it was time to share with the class.

"If she disappears on an op, and we rule her KIA, that might be enough," Jack said staring at his lap. "She's good at living in shadow, and we wouldn't abandon her. She could stay with my family, or Gabe's."

"She would be safe in Numbani," Kwento said.

"On Sing would be safer, and she could still aid in operations," Gabriel said after a moment. "Zhai Feng is exceptionally fond of her. And it wouldn't be the first time they took in one of ours for their own good."

Kwento made a face, her distrust of the Triad boss very obvious. "On Sing's dislike of Talon and the Shimada have become well known. No civilians seem to have connected Overwatch to this policy shift, but I can't say that I approve of your close ties."

"On Sing is providing a valuable service while reforming their formerly violent structures," Ana said. "And while they may always remain a shadow organization, Zhai Feng has done an admirable job of offering her family a chance to operate within the law, while minimizing abuses. I have been pleasantly surprised by Zhai Feng's progressive measures." Ana leaned back in her chair. "My greater concern is Lucky's mental health. She won't be in isolation, but she won't have her support network readily available. How do you think she will handle this?"

"She'll hate it," Jack said softly.

"Yes," Gabriel agreed. "But faking a dishonorable discharge would hurt her more. She worked hard to reform her undeserved reputation. It would devastate her to see that fall apart."

Jack winced. "Agreed."

"That is what Gérard thought as well," Ana said. "And I concur."

"All of our options are troubling," Wilhelm said, resting his face in one hand. "But I will go along with whatever is best for Lucky."

Gabriel bit his lip, somewhat relieved that he hadn't said anything nasty to Wilhelm. Because that doopy golden retriever of a man was a good friend to you, and right now you needed as many of those as you could get.

"We don't have to decide anything today," Ana reminded them all. "But we will have to choose a course of action soon. Talk to her first. I'm sure we can guess what she thinks about it. But Lacroix and I both think it will be safest for her to keep a low profile for awhile. Whether or not that entails faking her death? Well, we're open to better ideas."

No one spoke for a few minutes, because they had no other suggestions to offer.

Gabriel swallowed roughly, already knowing just how much you'd hate this.
You came back to Jack's quarters to find Chang sitting on the couch eating chips while Michael and Maggie watched some scandalous reality dating series. Feng sat down beside Maggie.

"They're with her? Oh. Umm...I guess love is blind?"

"Well, she cheated on them with her, and honestly, I think Mimi is too good for the likes of Deenie. But, they'll probably vote Cici off the island and-"

"Jack and Reyes are in the bedroom talking," Chang said, saving you from this conversation.

You nodded and went in, shutting the door behind you. You set Isha down, and she scampered over to her bed to flop over on her dog. She'd had a long day too.

Jack sat on the bed hunched over, Gabriel rested his head in Jack's lap, an empty glass on the floor by Jack's feet.

"Hey," you said.

"Hey," Gabriel murmured, his voice thick. He raised his head and give you a sad smile. "Missed you."

Jack straightened up, his arm still in the sling, one hand tangled in Gabriel's curls. "About time you got back."

"Lacroix had a lot to go over," you said, your words tight. You sat down beside Jack, a little surprised when Gabriel took both your hands in his.

"Corazon, I was just telling Francis here-"

"Really, Gabe?" But there was no bite in Jack's voice, only weariness and it made your heart ache.

"I was telling him how goddamn important his sexy blonde ass is to me and how much I love him. How I can't imagine life without him. How I adore his steamed cornmeal and milk toast ass."

You snorted, mostly at Jack's flustered look. "It's a nice ass. Very...squeezable. Not weak at all."

Gabriel kissed your gloves, holding your hands to his cheeks. "Don't let me get distracted by Jack's ass, baby. I had more I wanted to say."

"About Jack's luscious ass?" You asked, giggling as Jack rolled his eyes at you both, the cheeks on his face very, very red.

"Always," Gabriel laughed. "But no, I had other things. I like your ass too. Could sing a few songs about it if you wanted."

"Do it," Jack whispered and you elbowed him.

"No, didn't want to talk about your asses. Assets. Well, not those assets." Gabriel chuckled to himself.

"Are you...drunk?" You asked, picking up the glass and sniffing it. It was either paint thinner or bad whiskey, and to be honest, you weren't sure if whiskey was enough to affect his enhanced metabolism.

"Nah, just a little...relaxed." Gabriel sat up, sighing heavily. "I know, it's pathetic. You and Jack are the ones who got hurt, and I'm the asshole lying here, drinking Jack's questionable whiskey and brooding." He leaned over Jack to kiss your forehead. "Your hair smells nice. So glad you're finally here. Because I love you too, corazon."

You laughed softly, delighted by this side of Gabriel. He tugged your wrist and reclined on the bed. You curled up beside him, Jack on his other side. You rested your head on his chest and Jack lay his on Gabriel's shoulder.

"I'm all twisted up inside," he said. "Normally would spar or lay you out on the bed, but both of you are hurt, and I don't want to make it worse. Just...needed something to take the edge off. Built for action. Not for waiting. Not sitting around, watching you two bleed." He shuddered. "It's like the goddamn Omnic Crisis all over again."

"We have to protect our delicate lover," you said, kissing his chin. "You are the sensitive sort, prone to music and poetry. Jack's a rough and tumble country boy, used to hard labor and plain food. And me? I'm a goddamn badass."

Gabriel roared with laughter, hugging you tighter against his chest. "You're a goddamn smartass!" He turned his head to kiss Jack's lips. "But you're right about the rest of it."

You clung to Gabriel, his skin warm against your body, the steady drumming of his heartbeat lulling you into a softer place. Jack's fingers curled around yours and he peeled your gloves off, his lips brushing against your bruised knuckles.

"We're going to have to do something about Petras," Jack said after a moment.

You blinked. "Lacroix said I might have to...go away for awhile."

"We talked about it. It might be the safest option." Gabriel's fingers dug into your arm. "And you know, I'd do a lot of things to protect you, things that I know you'd hate."

You exhaled slowly, resting your forehead against his chest. You didn't have the energy to hear this now.

Gabriel reached over, and tilted your chin. "Hey, I'm not done. Stop jumping to stupid conclusions, chica." Those deep brown eyes searched your face, and he gave you a sad smile. "I'd rather kill Petras preemptively. Fuck it. Overwatch was our creation. I didn't join SEP and devote my life to building an international military organization just so I could watch the people I love get thrown under the bus. Just say there word: you, me, Jack, Crazy Feng, we can all go together. I'm only suggesting her because she'd have to drive and that might be a good cover."

"But Shit Spiders. And Talon. Evidence." Gabriel's offer took you off-guard. And now you couldn't even form proper sentences. "Jack."

"We're both in agreement on this," Jack murmured, pressing your palm to his heart. "We all understand the bigger picture. We might find something incriminating. We might not. But I'm getting tired of this political bullshit. I'm so past giving a damn. Petras has this coming, baby."

You were used to making the tactically sound decision, even if it sucked. Used to knowing that the mission came first. You closed your eyes, taking deep shaky breaths, because their offer meant more than you expected. "If I have to go, I can do it. I'm a fucking badass after all."
"I know." Jack's voice was gentle. "But I don't want you to go. And neither does Gabe."

"She could go MIA on a mission and just live in my room," Gabriel murmured. "I like that idea."

"Three days, and she'd be stir-crazy," Jack said. "Also, my room is bigger."

"I don't-"

"The point is, you don't have to resign yourself to misery and heartbreak," Jack said. "We can both see how unhappy the idea makes you. And we're willing to find another solution. Because we love you. Just, work with us, all right?"

"Of course," you sighed, even as Gabriel pulled you across his body, setting you between him and Jack. "I just...tunnel-visioned. Panicked. Thought that maybe I'd have to go it alone, you know, keep my head down, not be such a risk to everyone else. And that broke my heart."

"Well, at least you didn't hare off to try to convincingly fake your death without telling us," Gabriel growled. "Because I would have been fucking pissed."

"I would never. At least, not without telling you and Jack beforehand." You nodded vigorously. "Even I know better than that."

Gabriel relaxed, wrapping his arms around your waist. "I know." He kissed the back of your neck. "I trust you, corazon. Even when you do idiotic things, you usually have good reasons. Just questionable judgment."

"I...yeah. I trust you too. When I'm not panicking and being dense," you said. "It's a work in progress."

"Sweetheart, you've got us, and a whole lot of friends at your back. We just need to come up with a good plan. And there are a lot to choose from," Jack said, his grin wolfish. "Feng sent me a schematic for a musical guillotine."

"What?" You blinked.

"Really. I don't know why we'd need that, but if it would cheer you up..."

Gabriel coughed, giving you both severe looks. "Focus, you two. We're going to prioritize on Petras. We're going to start with what went down here this weekend. Kwentó's backing us. Gérard is pooling resources. Tataryn is calling in some very questionable favors. Mihret is actually working and not picking fights with everyone else. The list goes on. I'll see to Prince. We're past-due for Hanoi anyway. We can tie up all these Shit Spiders loose ends this year. We were going to do this anyway. Now Petras has just lit a fire under our asses, and we're going to destroy him twice as fast as we'd initially planned."

"OK," you said, lips quirking up.

"You're just going to have to put up with extra security measures," Gabriel said. "Because I do love you, and I worry."

"Same," Jack said.

"OK, I'll cooperate with increased security protocols. Just don't worry so much," you said. "It'll give you wrinkles. Not Gabriel, because he has a skin care regimen. But you should be "careful, Jack," you said, repeating one of Amélie's wine-fueled observations.

"What?" Jack squinted at you.

Gabriel reached out, cupping Jack's face. "Mmm, you're right. I think I can see worry lines. Crows feet forming too, unless Isha's been walking on your face recently. Maybe you should start using more moisturizers, Jack. I have some night packs that will really help with the bags under your eyes. You could start using some enhanced fillers, gene-stims, and collagen masks."

Jack scowled, slapping Gabriel's hand away. "You're not funny, Gabe."

You laughed, hugging Jack tightly, your shoulders shaking. "He's kidding. You're fucking beautiful, Jack."

Jack sighed, shaking his head. "You two are mean." He kissed your nose. "I don't know why I'm such a sucker for the troublesome ones."

"Because you're Jack Fucking Morrison, the goddamn Strike Commander of Overwatch!" You announced cheerfully.

"Don't you mean Jack "Francis" Morrison?" Gabriel asked innocently.

You squealed as Jack smacked you both with his pillow.

"Have you seen this, Ray?" Maggie screamed, as you emerged from the bedroom. Jack followed you, but Gabriel was going to lie down for another five minutes.

Maggie held up Feng's phone.

"Oh, everyone in Overwatch has seen that," Chang said with a shrug.

Feng was giggling.

Michael sat on the couch, staring at the coffee table, his cheeks very red.

"Seen what?" You asked.

Maggie proudly showed you the video of you, wearing nothing but a bloody towel, stabbing a cyborg in the neck. Your face had not been blurred out in this version.

You groaned.

"Oh, that's one of my favorites," Jack said, leaning over Maggie's shoulder. "What was your kill count that day?"

"I don't know," you muttered. "More than five, less than eleven."

"Three of those were with her knife. One was with her bare hands," Jack said proudly.

"Oooh," Feng said, hand over her heart. "Sexy."

Michael just turned redder and ducked his head down, pretending not to hear the conversation.
"She was just running around the building in that skimpy little wet towel by the time I got there," Gabriel chuckled as he leaned against the bedroom door. "It was adorable."

You rubbed the back of your neck. That was a lot tamer than he'd originally described it. But you couldn't exactly retell that entire story to Jack's siblings. Shooting Feng a dirty look, you blew out a breath. "It was a stupid day. Too many dead civilians, and afterward I got sick from dehydration and caught a cold."

Maggie's smile faded and you winced, realizing that you'd said too much.

"She's a miserable patient," Gabriel said, diverting the conversation. "She didn't want to stay in bed, and then she didn't want to get up. And she whined the entire time-"

"I did not. I was cold and just wanted to sleep!"

"And soup. You wanted soup," Jack laughed. "She wasn't that bad. Gabe's much worse. He doesn't get sick often, but when he does, he acts like he's dying..."

Gabriel snorted. "I do not. It just takes a lot to bring me down. And if it's got me under the weather, you better believe it's severe."

"I distinctly remember you bellyaching at Jack because he hadn't added enough honey to your tea one flu season," Chang said, raising a brow. "And I was outside building. If your throat hurt that badly, maybe you shouldn't be so damn loud."

"...No one asked you, Chang," Gabriel scowled.

Jack laughed, kissing your cheek. "I'm a good patient. I just need lots of hugs."

"Bullshit." Chang snorted, giving up all the secrets. "He'd be crawling out of bed as soon as he's conscious. The army bonesaws used to give him extra doses of sedatives so he wouldn't hurt himself. He'd protest, "oh, I'm fine. Never felt better. Sure I had to be carried here, but that was all just a misunderstanding..." Chang rolled her eyes as she spoke, her voice an octave lower. "Hmm. Mateo did a better impression." She froze after she said that, closed her eyes, and shook her head.

"I'm a great patient," Feng said, raising her hand. "I like to stay in bed. I will take my medicine with soup, tea, or honey. I will get lots of sleep." She nodded sagely. "Too bad I don't actually get sick any more..." She muttered under her breath.

"Neither does Ray," Jack laughed. "We'd go out and eat discount seafood after a night of drinking...and Ray was the only one who could walk upright the next day. And it wasn't because she was too smart not to eat the shellfish. She ate more than anyone else-"

Chang shrugged. "I walked it off. Easy to do when you're not weak."

Everyone stared at her incredulously for a moment. Feng lost it first, doubling over with laughter. Jack was next and then everyone else. Even Gabriel chuckled.

Chang rolled her eyes, but you did not imagine the faint smile on her face as she turned away.

"Michael's quit smoking," Chang said, the two of you sneaking cigarettes on roof. "Can't keep up with me and smoke." She paused. "Well, he couldn't keep up with me anyway, but the smoking wasn't helping."

"That's...impressive. I mean, how do you do it?" You asked, a little curious.

"SEP. Willpower. Spite," she said with a shrug. "I don't know. Why do Reyes and I overheat? Why do we heal twice as fast as our compatriots?" She inhaled deeply. "I don't worry about it, Strike. It's not the cigarettes that will get me in the end."

You shook your head, not quite in the mood to go down that conversational rabbit hole. Black ops agents didn't tend to die peacefully or of old age. That truth applied to super soldiers too.

"But you," she pointed a cigarette at you, narrowing her eyes. "You should be more careful."

You nearly swallowed your cigarette in shock. "I think I've just witnessed the pinnacle of hypocrisy."

"Oh, Andre is here?" Chang asked, looking around.

You blinked, also looking around the roof: there was no one else up here with you. "Wait...was that a joke?"

Chang snorted. "Of course not, Strike. I don't tell jokes. I just grunt and smash things. Sometimes I set them on fire."

"Oh good," you said, laughing. "I was worried."

Chang just shook her head. Her glossy black braid whipped back and forth. She sat there, chewing on her cigarette, staring off at the rising moon. You offered her your flask, and she took it, having a sip of your cheap whiskey without grimacing, and then she handed it back to you.

"I know a lot of my comrades don't think I understand other people," Chang said after a moment. "I admit, I have trouble differentiating between civility and blowing smoke up someone's ass. Something in my head doesn't process that right. But I understand how to deal with people just fine. Wouldn't have kept my squad together this long if I didn't."

You wisely said nothing, and just took a gulp of whiskey. Chang had gotten progressively more talkative this evening, and you strongly suspected it was the amount of alcohol Jack had provided.

"The reason Reyes and I don't get along? We're too similar. We do things our own way. We don't ask permission. We don't apologize so well either."

"Gabriel's actually pretty good at apologies," you said dryly. "I think it's because he's had a lot of practice. At least, that's been my experience."

Chang laughed. "You're in the minority, Strike. Most of us can count on a single hand the number of times Reyes has actually apologized to one of us. He might be sorry for being an ass, he might take your patrol shift, or make sure you get some of his carne asada, but he doesn't flat out say that's he's actually sorry and you were right."

You shrugged. "I guess our experiences are very different." You kept your tone diplomatic.
Chang sighed. "I'm not trying to pick a fight, Strike. I'm trying to tell you something and I don't have the eloquence to do it right in one go. So bear with me." She stared off into the distance.

You sat back, disarmed once more by Chang's blunt honesty.

"Jack is a lot like Mateo. He's a peacemaker with a core of steel. And he's got a way of inspiring loyalty in complete strangers. Reyes and I? Our people will follow us to hell and back, because they know we'd do the same for them. But Jack can just charm some chump off the street to join his cause."

"Sounds right," you said, cautious about where this was going.

"Jack and I work well together because our skills and leadership styles are complementary. Same with Reyes and Jack. But the difference between Reyes and me, is that I've always been lower on the hierarchy. Yeah, I'm strong. Yeah, I'm a good CO. But I'm not the kind of leader that Reyes is. I lack the charisma and the skill at political maneuvering," Chang said, tone matter of fact and without any resentment. "There's a reason you don't see a lot of us together, Strike. We're stubborn. We take charge. Put us together too long without a clear mission, and we start to grate on each other very quickly. Sometimes it doesn't even take that much." Chang leaned back on her elbows. "Some of us played well with others: Mateo, Hsieh, and Lucy. But they were always the exception, and two of them are dead." Chang held out her hand and you passed her your flask.

This was the most she'd ever said to you, and it was almost gossip. You knew better than to point that out though.

"Jack and Reyes were having problems before you came along," Chang said. "We all knew it. Honestly, I thought it was a bad idea of Jack to stay involved with Reyes after everything that's happened, but I know, I'm biased." She gave you a wry grin.

"They're doing well now," you said, pursing your lips.

"Yeah." Chang nodded. "They are." She lit another cigarette. "I have...trouble with romantic relationships. They don't interest me, and I don't understand their appeal."

"Fair," you said.

"After Maya, I thought the worst thing Jack could do was trying to bring another person into his already tumultuous relationship with Reyes. Maya was toxic, always playing games, pitting people against each other, tearing people down." Chang shook her head. "Having a romantic relationship with one person seems like a headache. Two people at once? A goddamn nightmare."

You laughed at her disgusted expression. "OK."

"And then the reports filtered in. I hear they've gone and done it again. It didn't take long for me to realize that "Lucky Strike" was a goddamn shit magnet. Only you're nothing like Maya."

You sighed. "There is a logical explanation-

"Don't care," Chang said, waving her hand dismissively. "You're nothing like Maya and that was a goddamn relief. My point is, keeping you safe is the mission that Jack and Reyes are on together. It's a good teambuilding exercise. Though given what I've seen, it might take more than their combined efforts to succeed at that."

"Why are you such a dick?"
Chang snorted.

"I'm not their goddamn pet project!" You glared at her.

Chang sighed, tapping the ash off her cigarette and shaking her head. "That's not what I was trying to say. I'm not downplaying their affection for you. I'm saying that you're good for them, because your presence makes them think twice about whatever bullshit they're about to pull. Jack and Reyes are comfortable together to the point of complacency. Jack lets Reyes' bad habits slide, and then is disappointed when Reyes doesn't change. And he overcompensates by cracking down on everyone else for the exact same shit he lets Reyes get away with. Reyes makes excuses for Jack's mistakes, while simultaneously resenting Jack for ignoring the advice that would have prevented the problem in the first place."

Chang's words were harsh, but unemotional, and while your kneejerk reaction was to rush defend Jack and Gabriel, you understood that Chang wasn't trying to pick a fight, and worse, she wasn't wrong at all.

"But you altered that dynamic. You keep them on their toes. They like you, and they know that with you they can't get away with the same way they've acted toward each other for years. Your presence is...stabilizing, in a healthy way, even if you yourself are all fucked up."

"I..." You trailed off, not sure what to say.

"Jack's mentioned that you've mediated their fights on more than one occasion. He says the extra complexity makes the three of you work harder to ensure that there are no misunderstandings. Frankly, I have no idea how that works, but it seems to." Chang paused.

"Thanks?" You didn't sound particularly gracious.

"Outside of family, I've known both of them longer than anyone here." Chang gave you an annoyed look. "I know what I'm talking about." She lit yet another cigarette, her chain-smoking a little intimidating. "Jack's my best living friend. But I'm well aware of his shortcomings. I told you once, that if things went to shit, you'd be the one picking up the pieces. You were the one with the most to lose. And maybe that's still true. But now Jack's heavily invested, Reyes too. If something happens to you, they're not going to walk away unscathed. The point of that godawful speech isn't that "love is grand" or some other sentimental bullshit. It's a reminder that you need to be fucking careful." Chang fidgeted. "And while I still don't really like Reyes, I won't take any pleasure in watching him self destruct."

You sat there silently. Chang wasn't...wrong. And her analysis of Jack and Gabriel's dynamic ran true. No one had ever laid it out quite that plainly for you, but you found yourself appreciating Chang's candor and unvarnished insight, even if you didn't completely agree with her. That, or the whiskey was going to your head.

To be fair, it wasn't like Jack and Gabriel were just using you as a placeholder for stability. And you gave back as much as you received. You collaborated with Gabriel to feed Jack and get him out of the office if he'd been there too long. Just like you and Jack would lay out food and act extra ridiculous to lift Gabriel's moods.

And yes, there'd been moments when you'd cut it too close, moments when you realized that your death would hurt them badly. But you'd never let yourself dwell on it. You'd always considered yourself the plus one, the extra, the nonessential personnel.

Except you weren't. Your people cared about you. And if you weren't careful, if they lost you, well... you still dreamed of Shin and Captain Patel. You still lit incense. You still craved Shin's cooking, not just because it was better than yours, but because he made those dishes just for you, and nothing in the world tasted quite like that. Nor would it ever again.

Loss had left its gouges in your heart, and you knew it well enough to understand that you didn't want to do that to anyone you cared about, let alone Gabriel or Jack. Ziv had taken you to task over that after Candle Arc went to shit. But you were dumb. Sometimes the lessons didn't stick. Sometimes you had to be reminded. And if someone as emotionally-stunted as Chang had to do it for you, well, more power to her, but damn were you dense.

"You're right," you croaked. "I'm working on it."

Chang didn't say anything. She just offered you one of her cigarettes and a light. You took it, and passed her your flask.

"Where's Zinnia?" Maggie asked you when got back to the room, stinking of Chang's cigarettes. Chang leaned against the wall, arms crossed.

"Working on homework," you said automatically.

"But her mom's here," Maggie groaned. "And I want to hear more stories about "Uncle Gabe."

You rubbed the back of your neck, a little surprised that Catriona had returned. She was supposed to be back at her hotel, since her dinner plans out with Gabriel had been cancelled. But there she was, sitting on the couch cheerfully chatting with a very uncomfortable-looking Michael. Today she wore a black and silver dress, little pearlescent skulls screened onto the fabric and matching gladiator platform sandals. She had on a silver headband, her matching jewelry large and intricate.

"My brother is wonderful with children, probably because he is the largest one of them all."

"Commander Wilhelm should actually get that title," Maggie said with a laugh.

"Oh, yes, the cute older man in power armor with the nice smile," Catriona laughed, and it was rich throaty sound. "He's a doll."

"...Fucking Wilhelm," Gabriel growled as he emerged from the bedroom. "Don't even think about it."

Catriona just laughed harder. "But those muscles-" She fanned herself, eyelashes fluttering. "And that smile." She winked at you. "Come on, Lucky. Are you going to deny that Commander Wilhelm is a dashing and attractive man?"

"He's cute for an old guy," Maggie said.

"He has nice armor," Chang said, blandly, obviously trying to get Gabriel's goat. "Very sturdy."

You glanced over to see Gabriel giving Catriona a disgruntled glare, before his gaze darted to you. He narrowed his eyes.

"Sure, he's attractive, but not really my type," you said breezily. "I like them tall, strong, and grumpy."

Gabriel gave you a dirty look.

"Come on, why don't you like Commander Wilhelm?" Maggie asked, big blue eyes wide with worry. "Is there something we should know about him?"

"Yes, Gabi," Catriona purred. "Does he have some dark secret past we should know about? Is he dangerous?"

"To my sanity," Gabriel groaned. "No. He's an idiot, but he's not evil." Gabriel screwed up his face, like it hurt to admit something nice about Reinhardt.

"That's mean," Maggie said, wrinkling her brow.

"Doesn't make it less true," Gabriel said.

"I think Gabriel's had a long day," Michael said, fidgeting on the couch. "He probably doesn't mean it like that." You blinked, a little taken aback by Michael's intervention. He gave Gabriel a weak smile. "Do you have any idea when Feng and Jack will be back with food?"

Gabriel's frown slowly eased into a thoughtful expression. "They should be back any minute."

Catriona arched a brow, her smile widening. You knew someone would be giving Jane all the gossip tonight, and you decided that maybe you should avoid Indiana for awhile. Say ten years? "I really hope it's not any more leftovers," Catriona sighed. "I didn't come all the way to Zurich to eat reheated hotdogs. Maybe Commander Wilhelm has a good recommendation?" She opened her purse and began applying bright red lipstick.

Gabriel groaned. "Really?"

"Maybe we should go get Zinnia," Maggie said, frowning at Catriona. "She must be missing you. Today was really hard."

You sighed, wishing that the Morrison kids were just a little less upstanding.

Catriona just smiled. "I know. Today really shook her up. But she wanted some alone time, Maggie. She isn't really doing homework. We were making excuses for her." She shook her head. "That girl is too old for her age. I know her well enough to know that she doesn't want me hovering over her right now. She'll come out when she's ready."

"Oh," Maggie said.

That was a half-truth, but not one that you would comment on. Catriona's analysis was spot-on, minus the lie about "alone time." According to Athena, Kseniya was holed up in Tataryn's quarters, having tea with her father. As soon as he'd been released from duty, Tataryn had skipped all the formalities like debriefs and medical checkups, and gone straight to Reinhardt to retrieve her.

You did not look forward to your next meeting with him.
"Is Távio OK?" Michael asked.

"He broke some toes in the landing," you said. "Then walked on them. Angela is probably skinning him alive as we speak."

"But she seemed so...pleasant. That was the blonde genius who gave the lecture on systemic nanite applications and cellular regeneration?" Maggie asked.

You blinked at her, unaware that she had an interest in medicine.

"Feng wanted to go," Maggie said with a shrug.

"It was actually pretty interesting," Michael chimed in.

"Ziegler has a good public face," Chang said. "But she's a micromanaging tyrant when it comes to medical care. It's taken her years to accept that I don't need a goddamn checkup every time I get shot."

There was a long pause as everyone took a moment to digest Chang's comment. Was Chang part cyborg? You'd never asked, because it was damn rude, but you were really starting to wonder.

"And who are those guys Feng was talking to earlier? The cyborg and the hot Asian guy with the long hair?" Maggie grinned. "He looked like a diva."

"That's classified," you said, noting Catriona's interest.

"Wait, how pissy did the diva look?" Gabriel asked. "On a scale of zero being "neutral" and ten being "already engaged in bloody murder?"

"Who is he?" Maggie asked.

"Honestly? No one you've ever heard of," Gabriel said. "But yeah, he's a diva."

"He seemed tense, but he didn't storm off or anything. Feng just said "hi" and talked more to the cyborg while he stood there kind of awkwardly. You know, I feel guilty just calling that other guy "the cyborg." It seems rude. He's a person. With a name." Maggie gave Gabriel a brilliant smile.

"Doesn't work on me, Margarita," he said, clicking his tongue at her. "Some of my people's identities are need-to-know. And you don't need to know."

Maggie drooped dramatically. "But Gaaaaaaabe-"

"Would you describe the diva's expression as "extremely constipated?" You asked, trying to sound casual.

Maggie's jaw shut and she stared off for a few seconds. "...Yeah. That's spot-on. Wow, I thought he was kind of pretty in a broody way, but now I won't be able to get that image out of my head. Thanks a lot, Lucky."

You just smiled innocently, happy to wreck anyone's misconceptions about Hanzo.

Chapter End Notes
So guess who bit off more than they can chew? This person!

I originally thought I was going to have Thanksgiving with 4 people max. Because most of the time, that's how it is. This year, I got 12. I didn't mean to. But I did. I didn't know I was getting most of them till after I went food shopping. So...yeah. I always make a lot of food, but now I'm like "we're going to need more food!!!" Everyone is bringing stuff, but, you know, I like to freak out a bunch. This weekend has been panic cleaning, washing bad dogs, and cleaning up the yard after the massive ice storm we had brought down a ton of branches. Took out some of the lilac bushes too. Fortunately, no major property damage.

Anyway, this week will be spent panicking over the Thanksgiving meal. I think at least 3 of the people will have already eaten, but you know. Panic!

So that's why this chapter is late. Also, some angst!anon who is totally anonymous, goaded me into a drabble on tumblr. That monster.
Chapter Summary

A study in families and uncomfortable situations.

Chapter Notes

Yumi drew a lovely sketch of Isha with her toy dog AND a sketch of Lucky AND a Bandit and Isha napping together picture. Ded.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Jack and Feng had gone the extra mile and picked up food from Gabriel's favorite Mexican food truck, hit up a bakery, and came bearing a cooler filled with a variety of drinks. It was a little odd to see Feng carrying so much more than Jack, and both Maggie and Michael's eyes got real big when she walked in with the cooler on one shoulder and a massive box of food on the other, chatting cheerfully at Jack, who still had one arm in the sling, as he swung a couple bags in his good hand.

Catriona just settled on the couch, almost feline in her pleased regard of the entire situation, her smiles edged in mystery and a very high dose of "I know something the rest of you don't." And while that was probably true, you suspected that look was her default expression.

Isha emerged from the bedroom as you unpacked the food. She climbed up the back of the couch, craning her neck as she tried to get a good look at what was available. Unsurprisingly, Maggie and Feng immediately began calling to her, offering her progressively larger portions of their meals, from soft tacos, churros, and cupcakes, to whole tamales, milanesa, and little cups of horchata.

She ignored Feng and sidled up to Michael, cooing when Maggie spoke to her. She tugged on Michael's hand delicately, chirping at him, and he immediately gave her a whole soft taco. The delight on his face was reminiscent of Jack, and kind of adorable.

Everyone sat around the coffee table, even Chang, as you passed out disposable plates and finished laying out the food.

"Your murderbird is a spiteful little shit," Feng said, taking a grumpy bite out of her tamale. "I love her."

"She takes after her mother," Gabriel laughed, sitting down on the couch beside his sister.

You blinked, a little taken aback by that term. Jesse had been calling you "Raptor Mom" just to annoy you, but hearing it from Gabriel took on an entirely different level of meaning.

"Your raptor seems to be excellent practice for children," Catriona said.
You choked on your horchata, coughing violently as Jack began to pat your back. What was with these sisters and their baby-craziness? You gave Catriona a dirty look, but she was grinning wolfishly at Gabriel. And you had flashbacks of Jane's terrifying level of scrutiny. Though Catriona wasn't looking at you. This, you realized, was directed at Gabriel. Maybe it wasn't about you at all. Maybe this was some kind of sibling retribution and you were just collateral damage.

Gabriel just shook his head, looking slightly irritated. "You do understand that managing dozens of highly-specialized black ops agents is akin to babysitting, right?" That was actually terribly true: Vo's eccentricities, the Shimada brattiness, Tataryn's petty games, and Jesse's half-civilized upbringing... There was always a lot of work to be done.

"I will say, you've done a good job with your boy McCree. He's really come a long way," Catriona said, not looking bothered at all. "And your little divas have really opened up." She gave you a sly smile. "Something you didn't do alone."

You wondered if you could pay Michael to save you again. Or Feng. Hell, Chang could step up at any moment now...

"After watching the three of you together, I really think you'll do fine with kids, provided someone spends the majority of their time at home," Catriona continued.

Your shoulders stiffened, and you felt your teeth grinding together before you could force yourself to relax. You did not like the direction this conversation had taken. Not one bit.

"Cat-" Gabriel began.

"It should be you, hermanito," Catriona said, pouring some pico onto one of her tacos, her motions precise. "You are definitely the most domestically-inclined. And probably the most responsible, no offense Lucky."

Chang snorted, loudly.

Feng clapped a hand over her mouth.

The Morrison siblings, nodded in agreement.

Jack just rolled his eyes and ate a soft taco in one sulky bite.

You blinked, still processing the fact that Catriona had told Gabriel that she thought he should stay home and raise the hypothetical children. Did that mean she didn't trust you or...?

"See, he tells me that he issues the edicts, and that his trusted agents are mostly self-policing, but when there are problems, Lucky is his...best representative. She uses varying methods of diplomacy, and if that fails, then he steps in." She smiled at you. "But your combination of food, charm, and carefully applied threats of violence have worked beautifully. He's been very pleased by your handling of some of the more...difficult agents," Catriona said and you wondered just how much Gabriel shared with his sister. "So from my understanding, Gabriel could do most of his work remotely, while you and Jack continued your more hands-on managing of the job."

"Gabriel still goes out in the field," you said.

"I know," Catriona said, her lips pursed. And you understood then that maybe she knew about his condition, and she didn't want him out there any more than you did. "But you and Jack can occasionally help out too, right?"
"Of course we would," Jack growled, sounding offended.

You just raised a brow, not quite willing to let yourself be drawn into a loaded hypothetical situation.

"Reyes is probably the one I’d trust most with a small child," Chang said after a moment.

Jack began to cough, like he was shocked that she could say anything nice about Gabriel.

"Jack has fed a baby honey, would forget to give it vegetables, and doesn't understand the concept of regular bedtimes." Chang poured herself some horchata. "Strike would just teach the brat to knife fight, drug it for naptimes, and possibly let her dinosaur do most of the work."

You opened your mouth, and then shut it, because even if Chang was kind of wrong, you didn't need to convince anyone that you would be a good permanent caretaker for a child. That was practically volunteering for more work, and you fucking knew better.

Gabriel rested his face in his hand, but you didn't miss how Chang and Catriona exchanged wry looks.

"It's settled then," Catriona said cheerfully. "Gabriel's going to stay home with the kids. I can rest easy now. My girls have been asking when Uncle Gabriel's going to give them some new cousins to fuss over."

"Yes!" Maggie pumped her fists. "Jane's not having any more kids, Michael's single, and Aunt Maggie doesn't have nearly enough small children to spoil!"

Michael just gave you a wry smile, and shook his head. You weren't sure if that meant "Catriona is too much," or "Maggie's deranged," or "Jack's not responsible enough to have kids." But you suspected it was all of the above.

"...Dinosaur...babysitters?" Feng mused to herself. She gave Isha a thoughtful look. "Too small. But..."

"No, Feng," Jack said, shaking his head, eyes wide.

"Maiasaura would be too big, unless..." Feng continued muttering to herself.

"Oviraptors," you said, because on one hand, you were very relieved that she wasn't trying to push for nieces or nephews. On the other hand, you really weren't sure about some of her ideas.

"They were carnivores," Feng said. "But."

"And little nursemaid outfits!" Maggie shouted.

"Yes," Feng said, suddenly fired up again. She pumped her fist in the air. "With cute uniforms, how could anything go wrong?"

You stood in the docking bay waiting room, Isha in a chair munching on Jack's plain salted potato chips. Maggie was hugging Feng, already planning a weekend in Shanghai. Chang did not look happy, and you weren't entirely sure that that trip would get approved. Távio and Michael shook hands, the two of them speaking in low voices, and pointedly not looking in your direction.
Jack shook his head, going over some instructions with Chang, while she rolled her eyes at him.

Maggie moved on from Feng to hug Gabriel, her eyes already misty.

"Hey." Michael rubbed the back of his neck, giving you a sheepish smile. "Thanks for having us."

"It was fun," you said, glossing over all the not-fun shit that had gone down. "Sorry about the...interruptions."

Michael’s jaw tightened and that tense look echoed Jack. "Take care of yourself, Lucky." He hugged you then, squeezing a little too tight. "Please," he said softly in your ear. "You already look after Jack, Reyes, and apparently your entire black ops division. Don't forget that you're important too."

You blinked, a little unsettled by that declaration. "Oh definitely," you laughed, trying to play it cool. "Things would fall apart if I wasn't around."

Michael just frowned, not quite taken in by your bravado.

"Lucky! You be careful! And bring Isha next time! Dad will love her!" She reached over to chuck Isha under the chin, and Isha gave a tolerant thrum.

You hugged Maggie too, and she gave you a loud kiss on the cheek, before smirking at Michael. She then threw herself at Jack, laughing as he caught her. Michael went to shake hands with Feng.

Chang was talking to Távio now. They both looked at you too, and you sighed. He was supposed to go back with her to Indiana, but there'd been no word on that, and he didn't seem to be packed or dressed for traveling.

"I have no problem with you joining my squad at a later date," Chang told him. "The offer will remain open."

You raised a brow. Távio had been very enthusiastic about learning from Chang. She was damn impressive in a fight, after all.

"Thank you, ma'am," he said, executing a crisp salute.

"I agree with this choice. For now, you'll be more useful watching Strike's back. And that will be plenty challenging, agent."

You sighed, realizing that they'd already discussed this without informing you, and you wondered who else had been involved. You snuck a look at Gabriel and Jack, but Gabriel was saying something to Feng, and Jack was hugging Michael. That didn't rule out their interference, but you couldn't be sure who did what.

Maggie and Távio shook hands, while Chang, Jack, and Gabriel watched them a little too closely. Maggie just rolled her eyes, and Távio maintained a friendly demeanor, looking less intimidated than you expected.

Chang ushered the two Morrison siblings into the shuttle bay, both of them waving as they disappeared behind the double doors.
Távio gave you a slightly guilty look, like you were going to be upset that he postponed his career opportunity. You just shook your head, smiling to yourself. He relaxed then.

Feng just sighed wistfully, and glanced down at Isha who'd been eating chips the entire time. "Did you save me any?"

Isha handed Feng the bag, and Feng squealed happily, only to find the package empty. Your murderbird hopped off the chair and went straight to Jack, ignoring Feng's disappointed sighs.

Gabriel raised a brow. "Don't you have to get back to Shanghai?"

"Probably, but I'm staying an extra day," she beamed. "Gérard wants to talk business. Athena and Auntie Zheng are doing some preventative maintenance, under Winston's supervision, of course. And Hanzo is very vocally demanding a rematch in Mario Kart."

"Of course he is," Gabriel muttered.

"No, you were right to suggest briefing Agent Riggs on Petras' bad behavior," Lacroix said, sitting on his desk. "He did not take it well. And having heard about the "accident" that occurred this weekend, he drew the right conclusions very quickly. You should expect a visit from him soon. He was most distraught."

You raised a brow, somewhat surprised by Lacroix's actions. He'd been content to sit on Riggs as a liability. But now he was using him as an asset? Well, that shouldn't surprise you. Not really. Except Lacroix was awful about volunteering information. And wait, did he just say you were "right?"

"Have you thought more about what we spoke of last time?" Lacroix continued, not giving you a chance to bask in your "rightness."

"If I have to go, I'd prefer to go with Feng," you said, after a moment. "Because at the very least, I can liaise with On Sing and still be useful."

Lacroix inclined his head. "A good assessment," he said, looking pleased. "I know it will be difficult, Chanceux, but I will do my best to ensure it is a short-term arrangement. And of course, Gabriel, Jack, and Ziv can always find excuses to go to Shanghai. Perhaps you and Amélie can do your raptor photo shoot then."

"...I'm supposed to be dead and laying low. Doing an ad campaign for White Rabbit is the exact opposite of hiding my existence," you scowled, not wanting to address the "modeling job" at all.

"What better cover than as a model? Amélie and I have discussed a variety of layouts, and you would be best served showing maybe a sliver of your face, and looking off into the distance. Isha, perhaps with some color alterations, would be the focal point of the shot..." Lacroix trailed off. "Well, yours would be the most minimalist. Long bias-cut black coat, exposed prostheses. Isha looking stylish and intimidating in platinum armor, perhaps with a single jewel in the chestplate, a nod to Gabriel, of course. Though I think the gem should be black. Her eyes are shockingly blue, like someone else we know, and the rest of the photograph would be in black and white. You would be a shadow, a backdrop, a study in chiaroscuro."
"Lacroix, focus," you said, snapping your fingers. "I'm sure your artistic composition is brilliant. But we're talking about the logistics of Operation Crash Hawk," you said. "I have ratlines. I have resources in place. But...I'd like to be able to step back into my life when this is all over."

"Yes, we both know there is more to this than ruling you KIA on an operation," Lacroix said. "Your absence will leave a power vacuum and hobble Blackwatch. Who should be your successor?"

"...I would have expected you to step up," you said. Lacroix ran counterespionage and anti-Talon operations, but so much of his work complemented Blackwatch's. It was a natural progression.

Lacroix shook his head. "I am not talking about your operational planning skills, though they are useful. You make things run smoothly within the ranks. You look after your subordinates and Gabriel. You are his right hand, and the person his agents can approach with their individual problems."

"Jesse and Tataryn," you said. "Jesse for ops and to support Gabriel. Tataryn to handle agent concerns and balance out Gabriel's...brusqueness. Jesse can do that too, but he'd be better at looking after Gabriel," you said. "Though, Amélie could step in too, unless she's too busy supporting your operations."

Lacroix smiled. "No, I think you might be on to something. Amélie is very good at managing difficult people."

It took all your willpower not to say, "Like you and Ziv." But your jaw quivered, and Lacroix could probably read the look on your face, very clearly.

He just smiled. "She might be even better at it than you."

You shrugged. "I believe it." Amélie had the charisma and the people skills. Maybe it made you a little jealous, knowing that Amélie could replace you operationally. But honestly, you were just happy that someone competent would be there to take care of your people. You trusted Amélie to keep them in line and to go to bat for them.

Lacroix brought up a screen. "It seems the Petras family is having some internal disagreements. While Valerie Petras has...regrettable leanings, she is no fan of the Director and has taken several family members to task over his treatment of Ainsley. It's quite the drama."

You skimmed the call transcripts. Valerie Petras had left a series of blistering messages for the Director. She called him "Willy." It made you snort. None of her ire came from how he treated you, of course, but rather that he would do such a thing in front of her precious daughter and then raise hands against her. In fact, Valerie Petras was calling for him to "clean up his mess" and to not "leave his whores lying around the office." You didn't like how that sounded one little bit.

Her husband Robert got a dressing down too, and Robert meekly called the Director to have conversation about what bitch Valerie was. But Robert also reminded the Director that his behavior toward Ainsley was unacceptable.

The Director did not answer any of Valerie's calls. Though he had some very choice words for Robert about the kind of ball-busting bitch he'd married. Robert didn't defend his wife. He just told the Director to clean up his mess and stop attracting scrutiny on the family because that that uppity African bitch had financial regulators looking a little too closely at their assets, and they
There were some exchanges about the vacation homes in Martha's Vineyard, what those damn curry-stinking Korpals were doing in DC and New Delhi, and other details you filed away. But it was Robert who asked the Director if he'd "finally found it." The transcripts noted a long pause. "It has to be Morrison."

The rest of the conversation blurred after that.

You stared for a long time, wondering what Jack had that Petras wanted so much. You pointed at that passage, looking at Lacroix.

Lacroix's face remained blank.

"You know, don't you?" You glared at Lacroix. "Does Jack know?"

"We have spoken about it. Jack's had his suspicions. I share them," Lacroix said, evenly. "Rest assured, that if it's what we think it is, Petras isn't going to get it."

You sat back in your chair. "Well?"

"Chanceux, you understand the concept of "need to know" and you do not need to know. Even if Petras was to find a way to leverage Jack, Jack could not give Petras what he wants." Lacroix gave you a hard look. "There is nothing we can do about it now. Jack is aware of the danger. We've known for a long time that Petras wants to influence Jack. When the carrot did not work, he got out the stick. And neither has been effective. The reasons why don't matter in this instance."

"That's a shit answer," you snapped.

"That's the only answer you're going to get," Lacroix said coldly. "You should be more worried about yourself. Petras thinks Jack has something that he wants; he knows better than to kill him. You are an inconvenience to the entire Petras clan, and much easier to erase."

You sat back in your chair. You were used to compartmentalized intelligence and receiving incomplete answers. You knew, logically, that you didn't need to know why Petras thought he needed Jack, only that he thought so, and he would do a lot of unethical things to secure Jack's cooperation. In fact, you were more at risk, because if a whiff of your relationship with Jack reached Petras, then you were leverage to be used against your lover.

It took you a little while to work through those thoughts. You weren't happy with Lacroix's lack of explanation, and you would discretely ask your lovers about it later. However, as much as it pained you to admit it, Lacroix was right. The reasons why Petras weren't as important as the fact that he thought Jack had something he wanted and what plans he had for getting it. Of course, what "it" was, would affect those plans.

"It would be helpful if we could eliminate other possibilities," you said, taking a deep breath. "Or if we knew what angle he was going to come from. There are different approaches based on what he's after: data, tech, rare cheeses..."

Lacroix laughed. "That is better reasoning, Chanceux." He offered you a cigarette. "I will consider it."

You took the cigarette eyeing him suspiciously. Your instincts didn't buy that for one second. Lacroix had caved far too easily. He would consider it very briefly, then deny your suit.
Unless you got Jack or Gabriel to confess. You had to be careful there. There were lines you were going to cross, and you wondered if you would be better off doing some research first.

You smoked the cigarette, trying to play it cool, while Lacroix broke down some of the tech details from the cyber attack and jailbreak.

Zheng hadn't been able to actually bolster Athena's defenses. Instead, she'd provided your AI with guidance on which areas to devote resources to, while Zheng helped craft her own counterattack on the viral tunneler. The attacker had been custom-tailored to bring down a powerful Virtual Assistant. Athena was a true AI, and while she wouldn't have been deleted, the assault could have left several Overwatch systems vulnerable to attack. Ziv, Riggs, and Athena were still decrypting Sakai's tablets, but so far they'd found quite a bit of data on the jailbreak.

"It should come as no surprise to you that we have Agent Bakker in custody," Lacroix said.

You smiled wryly, because he'd told Kwento that Bakker had been killed in action. "Yeah, I figured that out. And so did Zenyatta."

Lacroix raised a brow.

"He pays attention," you said, happy that the omnic monk was thwarting someone else. "And he'll know if we do something reprehensible."

"Torture isn't our best interrogation method," Lacroix said, rolling his eyes at you. "I cannot take it off the table, especially since the mere threat of it does work in some cases." He sat back in his chair. "In fact, the threat of it coupled with "kindness" is usually effective in inducing a form of Stockholm Syndrome. "We could hurt you, but we are not. We will treat you special. You can trust us." While we are, in fact, emotionally exploiting them. Still morally-reprehensible, but less so on the scale of mortal sins." He smiled thinly.

"Actual torture seems to work short-term," you said.

"It can," Lacroix agreed. "But it is not ideal, and the cost for our personnel is high. And in cases where we want large quantities of intel, it is not reliable. We aren't just being nice to Prince because of the international scrutiny."

"I know," you scowled.

"We'll give Prince another week in isolation, and then send Gabriel in. That should be enough time to soften him up."

You assumed he meant Prince, but then Gabriel needed to cool down from this weekend too. "So who's handling Bakker?"

"No one yet. I was thinking you or Amélie. I'll let you do the research and decide," Lacroix said. "You have full operational permissions."

You put out your cigarette. Lacroix had given you the go-ahead to torture Bakker if you deemed it necessary. Or you could ask Amélie to do it instead. But Lacroix knew you better than that. You would not put your friend in that position. And after that discussion, you tacitly understood that Lacroix was testing you. Obviously, he wanted you to find a more...effective method. No problem. You could make people talk. You'd just have to approach it carefully.
An Athena drone hovered beside you as you walked to Captain Amari's office. You knocked, and there was a long silence. You glanced at Athena, wondering if the captain was even in.

"Enter," Captain Amari said sharply.

You opened the door, Athena's drone following behind you, like she was angling you as a shield.

Captain Amari sat at her desk, jaw clenched, brows knit together as she scanned her screen. Her hat was in place, and her uniform crisp. There was no sign of biscuits or tea. She did not look at you or offer you a seat, and you knew then that you were in deep trouble.

You stood at attention in front of her desk, knowing better than to interrupt. You could feel the Athena drone bumping against the backs of your knees, like she needed comfort. That, or she was trying to hint that you should get down and grovel for mercy. You thought about that for a moment. Well, it wasn't like you had that much dignity anyway. Would she prefer the wailing and gnashing off teeth? Or were you supposed to offer her your life as penance? Or maybe just a finger? Your tanto was right here, and if you were fast, Angela could totally reattach it...

Oh hell, you'd been spending too much time with the Shimadas.

You fidgeted, deciding against any kind of self-mutilation as a form of atonement. That was just the fear talking and it was completely irrational.

She tapped her screen off, and folded her hands on her desk, turning those fierce eyes on you, her gaze stony.

"I'm sorry, ma'am," you blurted out, knowing that your fear was only partially irrational.

Captain Amari stared at you, and you could feel that cybernetic eye laser through your skull. Unless it was her flesh one. That was a distinct possibility too. Maybe she was born with death beam eyes and they had to remove one and seal it with the eye of Horus tattoo because she was just too dangerous otherwise...

"And what exactly are you sorry for, agent?" She asked, voice low.

"...Leading an unsanctioned mission, dragging other agents along, and letting your daughter eat that much ice cream, though in my defense, I did get her to eat a whole bowl of green vegetables first."

Captain Amari sat back in her chair, her expression cool, but the pressure in your skull diminishing.

"And how exactly did you do that?"

"I poured chili oil on it, called it the "Spicy Doom Horror," and marketed it as a strength-training exercise," you said.

Captain Amari stared at you for thirty seconds and then shook her head. "Do you know the worst part about raising your child surrounded by super soldiers, knights errant, and ruthless spymasters?"

"They're a...bad influence?" You guessed, because said child would be the safest damn kid in the world.
"Worse, they're inspiring. My daughter wants nothing more than to be a hero. She's grown up watching Jack, Gabriel, Reinhardt, and Gérard do unspeakably foolish things and surviving, and she sees no reason why she can't as well." Captain Amari shook her head with a rueful smile. "And here I am, left weighing my choices. How do I continue to protect my daughter? Do I crush her nascent dreams to keep her safe? Or do I let her follow in my foolish footsteps already knowing the hardship it will bring her? Knowing the world will eventually let her down and she will have to live with one foot in the grave? Knowing that I gave up everything to try to bring her peace, and that she would innocently and whole-heartedly throw that away for a chance at glory?"

You had no idea. You stood there in silence.

"Something about being around us warps all good sense," Captain Amari said, her tone equal parts warm and bitter. "Jack has this way of making you believe that you can do anything. And sometimes that belief is enough to make it so." She gave you a hard look. "And Gabriel, well, he will do anything to protect us." She shook her head. "Cut deep enough and he doesn't give a damn about rules and causes. His first goal is to protect those under his command. And let's be honest, even if Jack is now the Strike Commander, even if I've always been my own person, Gabriel has never actually relinquished that responsibility."

You weren't sure what to say to that.

"So tell me, Lucky, why did you do it? Because in one evening, you jeopardized our alliance with On Sing, Ms. Zhai's safety, and Agent Maeda Vargas' career."

You flinched. Because it would look really bad for On Sing if their Dragon Head was busted for going after the Director of Overwatch. And you had taken her with you... "Távio was just following orders," you said weakly.

"So he gains a reputation as a hothead who can't be trusted to follow the rules or a coward who can't stand up to bad orders?" Captain Amari asked, her tone too reasonable.

"...I...didn't consider that," you said after a moment of squirming.

"I know," Captain Amari said, shaking her head. "I've seen you bend that stiff neck for the sake of the mission. I know you are capable of it. I know you are vindictive by nature, but this goes beyond petty revenge."

"I..." You stared at the ceiling, trying to compose yourself. "There wasn't just one reason, ma'am. Yes, I am petty. I don't have your reputation and a man with more power than me tried to lay hands on my person. I don't take that lightly. But...that's no excuse for my actions."

"Go on," Captain Amari said, her voice dangerously gentle.

"I was afraid he would go after someone else. Someone less capable of defending themselves, because I'd denied him, wounded his vanity." You rubbed the back of your neck. "I know it wouldn't have been my fault, but I felt...responsible because I was involved." You half-expected a scathing comment about your faulty conscience, but Captain Amari nodded. "Is that all?"

"...I didn't want to go to Jack and Gabriel with this. I didn't think they would...take it well. I wanted to have a have a solution in place."

"So it all comes back to Gabriel and Jack's overprotective tendencies?" She narrowed her eyes. "Are you still having trouble handling them?"
"...No," you said, hanging your head. "That's not it at all. Jack and Gabriel...would have behaved reasonably, after some discussion, I think." You sighed. "It was all me. It was my clumsy attempt to shield them. I was...irrational. I put all my thinking into the op and not enough into anything else."

"Yes," Captain Amari agreed. "You did."

"...That was a mistake." Even if the operation went off without a hitch. You should have planned better for the aftermath. That was a major blind spot, and you couldn't really call it a success now that you were standing here in front of a displeased Captain Amari, struggling to give an account of yourself. "One I won't make again."

Captain Amari just shook her head. "Perhaps you won't overlook these same details, that is true, but your disregard for rules is only getting worse."

You cringed inwardly. "I'm sorry, ma'am. I'm trying to do the right thing and the smart thing."

"And failing spectacularly," she said.

Damn, she did not pull her punches.

"But you are trying," she said dryly. "The Lucky I watched stumble out of our holding cell after Gérard's interrogation could not have refrained from attacking Petras immediately. The Lucky who came to me after the Overwatch Ball, incensed that Gérard and Agent Mihret had gone to Shanghai unsupervised, did not yet have the skills to put together a professional team and prepare such a flawless operation. The Lucky who woke up in her hospital bed after the events in Lucerne, would not have taken the blame and the responsibility for her poorly thought-out actions."

You opened your mouth to protest, that you had admitted fault for your recklessness in Lucerne. But you stopped, understanding that while the circumstances were markedly different, you'd stepped up and accepted the blame, for your actions and assumptions, and had not spread it around, even if the operation hadn't been solely your idea.

"I do recognize your growth, Lucky." Captain Amari gave a pleased nod. "And I am very familiar with the trouble superior officers can cause when you reject their advances. I am not happy about your actions, but I am sympathetic. And perhaps, I am just a little put out, that you didn't invite me."

Your jaw dropped. It took you a few tries to get it back in place. "I...um...sorry?"

"You should be," she sniffed.

You stood there awkwardly, because you'd just tried to emphasize how repentant you were for fucking up. Yes, you were sorry you'd been dumb. But you weren't sorry that you'd incapacitated Petras' junk. "We can go back if you want?" You jerked your thumb over your shoulder. "Like today. I'll do it again. But better."

The Captain threw back her head and laughed. "That won't be necessary. We have more important things to do and you know it. Especially given the events of this weekend."

You bit your lip. "I told Lacroix that if I had to disappear, I would probably do best with On Sing."

"I thought you would," she said, suddenly serious. "Under other circumstances, I would have put you back on training duty for six months," she said coolly. "In charge of the PT portion, because I do not need you corrupting yet another batch of recruits."

You winced, because you'd probably have to run alongside all the cadets and spend a ridiculous amount of time on exercise regiments. At least you could borrow some of Chang's training ideas.

"But events are moving quickly. Between Petras, Hanoi, and what transpired this weekend, there is too much work to do. And I need you at your best. So I am willing to let this go this once, Lucky." She gave you a hard look. "Do not make me regret it."

"Thank you, ma'am," you said, saluting. "I won't let you down."

"You will not," she said, eyes locked on yours. "I expected better from you, Lucky."

You sucked in a breath, wondering if she was going to issue a coup de grace after that deathblow.

"If you're ever taken with the idea of setting up a revenge op against the Director, invite me next time. I will either talk you out of it, or take responsibility myself. Do you understand me?"

"Yes, ma'am," you said, sneaky scheming wheels already turning in your mind. Her sniper support would be invaluable, but you suspected she wanted a more personal role in the revenge plot...

Captain Amari just smiled. "And if you could, please send me that Spicy Doom Horror recipe. Fareeha's father has requested it."

They were waiting for you outside your room, somber as he slouched against your door and she stared at her shoes.

You took a deep breath, and tried to look relaxed. "I thought you'd gone back to school already," you said to Kseniya.

She gave you a weak smile. "I...wasn't ready." She looked up at her father. "I don't think Tat was either."

Tataryn bobbed his head, not looking at you. "The Commander's sister is staying in town all week. Kseniya may spend that time here, for family visitation. She will be doing her schoolwork remotely." He gave her a severe look. "And her grades will not be affected in the least, or else."

"Yes, Tato," Kseniya said cheerfully.

Tataryn finally deigned to look at you, dark circles around his eyes. You couldn't read the blank expression on his face. Tataryn normally telegraphed emotions, and while you knew better than to believe his smiles and frowns, it was unsettling to see the blank mask on his features.

You swallowed, unsure of what to say.

"My quarters are more hospitable," Tataryn said, pushing off the door. "We should talk there." He brushed by you and kept walking.

You stifled a groan and stared at his back. You felt a tug on your right hand and looked down, a little surprised to see Kseniya holding it.

"Thank you, for saving me," she said earnestly. "I know I didn't say it right yesterday and I'm sorry-"

"You have nothing to apologize for," you said, starting to walk. And still she held onto your hand, speeding up to match your pace.

"I feel bad," she said. "I should have been more help. I panicked and couldn't move." She gave you a guilty look. "I'm really sorry."

"Kseniya, please stop apologizing. You shouldn't feel bad about any of that."

The two of you reached Tataryn's quarters. He'd left the door open, and you followed her inside, noting that the room looked marginally less messy, and that Tataryn had his back to you while he prepared tea.

"That was the first time I've frozen up like that. I've been in real danger before," she said. "But I was younger and I guess I didn't realize..."

Tataryn flinched at that, but didn't turn around. He set plates on a tray.

You took a seat on the couch, Kseniya sitting beside you, still latched on to your hand.

"Jumping out of a speeding vehicle into a lake gave me pause," you said. "But I've had years of practice ignoring good sense and throwing myself into dangerous situations. Your reaction was perfectly natural and a lot healthier."

"I panicked," she repeated, staring at her knees.

"A little," you said. "But you didn't overreact."

"I should have been more-"

"Kseniya." You placed your hands on her shoulders, and stared at those soft sad eyes.

"You're still young. You haven't had time to build up the reactions that the rest of us have. You don't have the training we have. You're a little work-in-progress human: you have time to learn. So please stop comparing yourself to me. Having such unrealistic expectations isn't reasonable or fair to you."

"I held you back. I could have drowned you!"

"Probably not," you said. "I mean, you kicked me a few times, left some nasty bruises, but that was it." You grinned at her mortified look.

"Lucky!"

"You should take up martial arts," you said. "You have a mean snap kick."

"I take it back! I'm not sorry at all!" She scowled, looking furiously cute.

"Good," you said, patting her cheeks. "That's exactly what I wanted to hear."

"...You're as bad as Tato," she snapped.

You wrinkled your nose at her. "Hey, that's not true. You can apologize for that right now."
"It's true, and I won't," she said, crossing her arms.

You laughed, because as much as you wanted to defend yourself, you couldn't do that without badmouthing Tataryn to his kid, and that wasn't OK. "All right, all right. I'm the worst." You sighed. "But it's not like I could let anything happen to you on my watch and still look myself in the eye. You looked after Brigitte for me. I couldn't let my best Swedish translator get hurt. Do you know what Torby would have done to me? Nothing good, let me tell you." You blinked as she threw her arms around your chest, hugging you.

"You're awful," she muttered. "I was trying to apologize and all you can do is make jokes and blow me off!"

"And I keep telling you, you have nothing to apologize for," you sighed, patting her back. "None of what happened was your fault. If anything, I need to be apologizing to you, because we're pretty sure I was the target and you were in danger because of me."

Kseniya's eyes widened, and she gripped your elbows as she glanced over at her father, who probably hadn't shared that information with her. "Who?"

"...That's classified," you said. "But we know who."

"Is Uncle Gabriel going to take care of it for you?" She asked, looking very serious.

"...We might go together," you said, thinking about how your lovers wanted to plan a Petras-assassination date. A smile crept across your face.

Kseniya's frown eased up, and she gazed at you thoughtfully. "I guess you're used to...dangerous things, aren't you?"

"Sure, still think it's damn rotten someone dragged you and Brigitte into it though," you said. "Távio too, if I'm going to be honest, but don't tell him I said that. It'll hurt his pride and he handled himself very well."

"He did," Kseniya nodded vigorously. "But...Uncle Gabriel's "your special person" you mentioned before, isn't he?"

You sighed, knowing better than to lie to her. "Yeah."

"That's good. He needs someone who makes him laugh. You need someone patient and strong to save you from consequences of your own idiocy, or that's at least what Aunt Ana said."

You stared, dumbfounded, at Kseniya. She beamed at you, playing the "I'm just a cute kid, you can't be mad at me for telling the truth" card. And she was probably right.

Tataryn set a tray of tea, cookies, and small sandwiches in front of Kseniya and filled cups for everyone. The fragrant scent of bergamot let you know that he was serving Earl Grey. You took a cup.

Tataryn sat down, drained a cup, and set it back in its saucer. "I told you," he said, voice hoarse. "I told you to be careful with her." He gave you baleful look.

"I'm sorry," you said. "I never meant for anything like this to happen."

Tataryn just gave a tired sigh. "I know." He put an arm around Kseniya, and she grinned up at him. Tataryn's brow furrowed, his teeth pressed firmly together, like he was struggling to keep his words calm. But you understood; his fears were all too evident on his face.

"Do we need to go to the mats?" You asked, keeping your tone casual.

"No." Tataryn's answer was clipped. "I already know that you are just cursed, like me."

"I wouldn't go that far," you said. "It was-

Tataryn waved his hand dismissively. "I know it is not your fault, Lucky. I know what kind of people we are dealing with. In the beginning, I was very...upset with you, and with myself for trusting you."

Kseniya took a shortbread cookie, pretending like she wasn't listening in very closely.

"But I have calmed down now. Because your Fedya is a wise man and never does anything rash." He gave you a devastating smile, all charm and flash, and a cheeky wink to top it off. It was one of those expressions he threw around to strangers, one you knew better than to trust.

"No, never," you deadpanned.

"Never ever," he agreed, patting Kseniya's back. "I think it will be good for me to have you around for a few days," he told her. "Hearing about your adventure aged me, Ksenya. You will make me a frail old man before it is my time."

Kseniya just laughed, kissing his cheek. "You are young and strong, Tato. Not as strong as Uncle Gabriel or Uncle Reinhardt, but at least you're still younger."

Tataryn rested a hand over his heart. "My own daughter..."

"Mr. Lindholm, Winston, and I are going to start on the gravity warp trampoline tomorrow," Kseniya told you. "I got a special dispensation from my science teacher, so I'm excused from classes all week." She grinned. "Oh! Brigitte drew you a picture. Let me go get it." She sprung up and headed to grab her backpack.

"I was angry," Tataryn said softly, staring straight ahead. "At you specifically. I know that was unfair. It's easier to blame the woman in front of me than the shadowy conspiracy that doesn't have a real face." He didn't look up from his teacup. "And Kseniya wouldn't stop talking about all the fun she had with you, and how bad she felt that she'd gotten you hurt, and how worried about you she was." Tataryn set his cup down. "Hearing her go on and on about it, just made me angrier."

You said nothing, because you had come to understand that not every statement needed a response. Tataryn hadn't actually been angry at you. You got that. He was angry at the people he couldn't reach out and punish immediately. He was angry because someone had tried to kill his daughter. He was angry, because he'd been terrified for someone else, and helpless in the face of that danger, and you of all people understood how fucking terrible that was.

"But when Lindholm came to personally invite her to his workshop, he had some choice words about your involvement. That meddlesome Swede has a way with short rude sentences. Mostly, I think he likes upsetting the applecart." Tataryn shook his head. "I thought we were going to commiserate about being two old fools who nearly lost their daughters under your watch. Instead, he loudly and self-righteously let me know I was being an ungrateful...person. I think Lindholm just likes being difficult and contrary.

"Yes, you always seem to be in the center of some kind of terrible mess, but when things go wrong, you are a good person to have on one's side." Tataryn sighed. "I am not happy about this, Lucky, but I appreciate you taking care of my daughter. I will spend the week recovering from this, and I will have Kseniya nearby so I can keep a close eye on her. Because I am selfish and weak."

"Because you love her and want her to be happy," you said. Kseniya was obviously elated by the prospect of spending more time with him. It would be good for them both. "Because life is unpredictable, unfair, and offers no guarantees."

Tataryn's lips curved upward in a cynical smile. "There you go, Lucky. Balancing the sweet with the bitter. Charming away what's left of my bad feelings."

"I think you're better at that than I am," you said.

"Oh no, I am a simple soul, no good at flourish or fancy speeches," Tataryn said, shaking his head.

You nearly choked on your tea and Tataryn flashed you that familiar wicked smile.

"Did my fair face make you forget how to swallow?" He asked, straddling that line between suggestive and downright smug.

Coughing, you wiped your face, cursing him under your breath.

Kseniya brought a very blue picture to you, there were stick figures that sort of resembled you, Távio, Kseniya, and Brigitte bobbing in the lake, all smiling, and, inexplicably, the border was lined with cat stickers.

"She made one for Távio too. But you got more stickers," Kseniya said. "She really liked your driving." She giggled in delight.

You couldn't tell if this damn child was fucking with you or not. But you understood wholeheartedly that she was most definitely Tataryn's kid, genetics be damned. "I will treasure it always," you said, solemnly. "Or Torby will cut off my ungrateful head."

Kseniya just laughed, like she thought you were joking.

Chapter End Notes

Sorry about the lateness. Thanksgiving wiped me out. I cooked seven dishes, hosted 12 people, and it went smoothly, though I'm never inviting that many people over again. Most everyone brought food too, but I was worried and spent the whole time running around trying to be a good hostess and it was exhausting. We have lots of leftovers and my rib roasts was fucking delicious. Hope everyone had a good week.

Getting some elbow and wrist twinging, so a little worried since my new job has a lot of typing. Wearing a brace, but we'll see how that goes. I have terrible posture.
You sat at your desk, going over Lacroix's files on Agent Luuk Bakker. Bakker had been fast-tracked to Dispatch, though his background looked solid enough that he hadn't needed the political patronage.

"Lucky, Ainsley is pacing outside the door," Athena said, her drone hovering by your desk.

"Thanks for the warning." You sat there, reading through Bakker's skill sets. He'd done fine at the job. So it wasn't like Petras had gotten him a position he wasn't able to do. But Bakker had no family, very few friends, and little to no community involvement. Sure, he was an agreeable guy and everyone knew him, because he worked in Dispatch, but...

Well, you knew a fake identity when you saw one. If only because you'd lived it yourself. Sakai, was really Sakai. But Bakker? You were going to have to run some checks, maybe put out feelers with Interpol.

The knock came as you were putting the folder aside.

"Recording?"

"Yes," Athena said.

You straightened up. You could buzz her in, or you could go get the door like a human being. Gabriel liked to remotely open the door, and remain at his desk, looking busy, bored, and annoyed at his visitors. But you weren't going to use his intimidation approach today. Not on Ainsley anyway.

She was already turning around to leave when you opened the door. She timidly glanced over her shoulder, face falling when she saw it was you.

She looked...rough. That wasn't entirely accurate. Ainsley always looked very presentable. She had an expensive haircut, stylish clothes, and professional makeup skills. She was dressed nicely in a navy blue skirt suit, her makeup subtle, and not a hair out of place. But she stood there tense, unable to hold eye contact. And her eyes were bloodshot, like she hadn't been sleeping so well.

"Hey Ainsley," you said, trying to sound friendly. "Everything all right?"

"I..." She bit her lip. "Umm...can we talk?"

"Yeah, come in. Can I get you anything?" You asked, like you had no idea what this was about. Maybe that was a little sadistic of you.
Ainsley followed you into the office, shutting the door behind her. "No, thank you." She gave you a weak smile. "Are you doing all right? I heard about the accident-"

"Yeah," you said. "Just bruised and embarrassed." You sat on your desk, facing her. "What's going on?"

She stood there, shrinking under your gaze, nails digging into the palms of her hands.

"Are you all right? Your uncle apologized, right?" He didn't do anything... unpleasant, did he?" You asked, laying it on thick, because you were petty.

"I can't file a formal complaint against my uncle," Ainsley blurted out. "I talked to my mother. And I can't, Lucky. I can't put my family through the shame and the recriminations." Her voice broke. "The scandal would be too much. What kind of daughter am I, if I put my parents through that?"

You inclined your head back. "I see."

"I mean, you said you'd understand if I couldn't," she continued, like she was daring you to take it back. "Like, he is my uncle. And you're supposed to stick by family. I don't know if you know what it's like to owe someone so much, but Uncle William has always been good to me and-"

"OK," was all you said, no matter how much you wanted to argue. Lacroix said you needed to work on deception. Zenyatta had been a goddamn expert at turning your own words against you with seemingly harmless statements and gently-worded questions. You could learn from that.

"Don't hate me," she squeaked.

"I don't," you said, trying to mask the disgust in your voice. You knew this was coming. You just didn't know why you expected better from Ainsley Petras, of all people. Disappointment made you bitter. It made you mean. You needed to work on that.

"I mean, now that he knows I know, he probably won't try anything, Lucky. I'll talk to him, OK? He'll leave you alone. I'll make sure of it!" She said earnestly, though her smile verged on panicked, and you already knew she wasn't convincing herself.

You crossed your arms. "And anyone else?"

"Anyone else?"

"You know, so after he leaves me alone. What about someone else's personal assistant? Or that green recruit fresh out of boot camp? Or anyone who doesn't have the benefit of you as their friend?" You asked, keeping your voice level. "What then?"

Ainsley flinched. "I...

"Do you really think he'll leave me alone?" You wondered aloud, tilting your head to the side, trying so very hard to not sound cynical. "That was a pretty harsh confrontation. And the Director isn't known for being...forgiving."

Ainsley didn't meet your eyes. "Of course, he will!" She said loudly, like if she just said it enough times, it would be true.

You stared at the ceiling. Lacroix had given you permission to play this how you wanted. Either way, Petras had to go, and if he went, well, there wasn't going to be space for Overwatch
"So...no hard feelings?" Ainsley asked.

"No," you said. "None at all. Not everyone has a friend like you watching their back. And I appreciate you doing your very best to help me out." You kept your words measured and calm, concentrating on maintaining sincerity. Because if this was Ainsley's best, on some level, you had to appreciate that attempt, even if it was ultimately useless and insulting.

Ainsley winced.

You just patted her shoulder. "Thanks, Ainsley."

She stared at you, like she expected a more volatile reaction. You just looked back, trying to channel Captain Amari's serenity.

"You're upset," she said.

"Disappointed," you said. "But I can't fault you. The nail that sticks up, gets hammered down. Risking your family's good name is a lot to ask of anyone," you said, still trying to keep your tone as neutral as possible.

"That's not fair," Ainsley said, obviously picking up on some of your disquiet. "It's not about our "good name." It's about-" She trailed off. "It's about..." She stared past you, her expression lost as she tried to find the argument to justify herself. It was a lot harder when she looked you in the eye and realized, on some level, that it was all wrong.

"It doesn't matter," you said, shaking your head. "I'm not sore about it. I get it. Was there anything else you needed?"

"I...just wanted to see if you needed anything. Your accident freaked out some of the guests." Ainsley gave a nervous laugh. "I mean, I know you're a daredevil and all, but there were kids in there with you-"

The air around you seemed to solidify as you raised your head to meet Ainsley's anxious gaze. Those delicate blue eyes kept flicking away from yours, unable to hold the contact for long. "You keep saying "accident" like I'm known for being that careless, Ainsley. Like I'm some kind of showoff who would put small children at risk. You've seen how I operate. Does that really sound right to you?" You asked, trying to keep your scorn from seeping out.

Ainsley actually took a step backward.

"But if it wasn't an accident, Lucky..." She trailed off, eyes widening as the pieces came together in her mind. Because Ainsley might be oblivious, but she wasn't that stupid. "Are you sure-"

"It wasn't an accident," you enunciated. "I had Távio and two kids under the age of ten with me. You can be damn sure I was being careful."

"But then-" You could see the wheels turning. "Who- It couldn't be. That's ridiculous," she said, her laugh too loud and shrill.

"Indeed." You held eye contact, making no accusations, just confident in what you knew about yourself and what you knew about Director Petras.
Ainsley looked down at her shoes, breathing rapidly, hands clenching and unclenching by her side. "I...I'm sorry. I need to go."

You watched as she spun around and sped out of the office like you'd threatened her. It took you a moment to realize you'd been flexing your fists, and you had to slowly unfurl your fingers.

"Are you sure it was wise to tell her that?" Athena asked.

"No, but Petras has to know that I know that what occurred this weekend was no accident. We can chalk it up to "faulty wiring," or the cyber attack, or some technobabble bullshit, but neither of us are fools. He's going to try to bury me, whether Ainsley knows about it or not."

"What are you expecting Ainsley to do with that information?" Athena asked.

"Expecting? Not much." But maybe, maybe on some level, you were hoping she'd do the right thing. Or the rightest thing she could do in her shoes. What a fool you were.

"I didn't know," Riggs said, shoulders drawn up. His hair had grown out, and he wore it in a pretty black braid. Riggs dressed in office business casual, khaki pants, Blackwatch Henley, clean-shaven, and very neat. "I should have. I really should have. I mean, the Director isn't known for mentoring people. He's a consummate politician. But I... I guess I got caught up in it."

"He can be very charming," you agreed. "He didn't get to where he's at by showing off his uglier tendencies. Most people don't have to look beyond the mask."

"I should have known," Riggs muttered, the words barely squeaking past his teeth. He sat in front of your desk, hands jammed in his pockets as he stared at his shoes. "I mean, he's a bigshot political appointee. I'm just...a tech. But he'd stop by, joke with me, and ask me about how my work was going." Riggs gave you a rueful smile. "I was flattered. He'd praise my skills and call me "son." He never did that to Ziv."

You snorted, pitying the old fool who tried to call Ziv "son." In fact, you'd pay to see Petras do that. But then Ziv had a very combative relationship with his father. Riggs didn't have a father in the picture.

"I'm not like Ziv, you know. I'm a good programmer, but I'm not a combat tech like he is," Riggs sighed.

Ziv was shit in a straight fight, but he was good in the field. And he could commandeer, blow up, and otherwise wreck enemy tech. Riggs maintained the Blackwatch systems and cyber defenses. His self-assessment wasn't really fair, because he was a competent hacker.

"Sometimes I worry that people don't take me seriously. I mean I can't tell people off like he does," Riggs said, cheeks pink. "He's amazing."

"I am extremely grateful that you have more self control than he does," you told him, knowing that your regard meant something to him. "Do you know how far he pushes people? I have a discretionary budget solely for bribing, blackmailing, and intimidating people into leave him alone. He's very good at making combat-trained agents violently annoyed with him."

Riggs just laughed. "Ziv? Noooooo. Ziv's so nice. He never gives me crap about my lousy sparring scores and he always shares his snacks."
You stared, wondering if Riggs was really that goddamn oblivious.

"Plus he's rarely in my office, usually yells at Ronald instead, and really likes my mom's cookies," Riggs said with a cheeky wink. Ronald was an Overwatch IT guy. You didn't deal with him much.

You sighed, rubbing your forehead. You cooked for that ungrateful bastard all the time and it didn't get you a reprieve from his awful attitude. But all Riggs had to do was act innocent and give him cookies, and Ziv was nice. What the hell? It was because Riggs was cute, you realized. Nothing had ever come of the dinner dates they'd been on, probably because Ziv was so enamored with Lacroix, but it seemed Ziv maintained some fondness for the guy.

"Sorry I didn't get a chance to introduce you to Mom," Riggs said meekly. "I think she was a little put off by the hovercraft crash, but I reassured her that it wasn't your fault. I don't know if she believed me."

"It's OK, I'm used to it. I'm a convenient scapegoat." You stared down at your desk. "I'm just glad no one else got hurt."

"...I know it wasn't an accident. And I know you weren't being careless. And given the footage Agent Lacroix showed me, it's...hard not to draw conclusions about the Director's involvement," Riggs said. He pressed his lips together into a thin line. "I'm really sorry about everything."

"I know. It was an honest mistake."

"I uh...I can tell you what I told Agent Lacroix. I shared gossip with him, but I never gave up any compartmentalized secrets. Never. And he was really curious about our defensive capabilities. He didn't seem that interested in Athena, but sometimes he asked questions about AI." Riggs shifted nervously in his seat. "I almost slipped up and told him about her a few times. But I didn't. I followed the rules."

"I'm glad," you said, relief relaxing your shoulders. For a black ops hacker, Riggs was weirdly law-abiding. You'd done more research after Lacroix revealed he was Petras' Blackwatch source, but either Riggs was a fucking genius mole, or something was broken in his head. Well, it was Blackwatch; none of you were normal, and there were already too many flippant rulebreakers who were out of touch with their feelings, yourself included. Riggs was a refreshing change from that stereotype.

"He wanted to know about some really specific things though. I mean, I never got the impression he was a real tech savvy guy, but he asked a lot of questions about experimental projects, mostly military stuff. I couldn't really answer much beyond the cyber warfare questions."

"Such as?"

"Had we recovered anything like a god program? Could we store something like that securely? Could I explain a weirdly specific concept in layman's terms?"

You nodded. "I see."

"There was a lot of experimental stuff. I mean, I know Athena has some really odd limits, and no one but Winston is cleared to fully examine her hardware...but the Director was talking about highly potent god program level stuff."

You sat there for a moment. "Go on."
"Well, you know most first and second gen omnic bodies haven't achieved true awareness. That's not meant to dehumanize them, that's just the limits of their processing power," Riggs said, a little nervous. "Like the older OR-14s and Bastions just don't have the hardware to go very far beyond their programming. When the omniums went bad during the Omnic Crisis, there were higher levels of sentient omnics coming out of the hostile factories. And not all of them were hostile, despite their origins. The omniums were just building better omnics period."

"Still with you," you said, because you already knew that.

Riggs stared off into space for a moment. "The civilian models have a higher rate of sentience. Well, that could be a questioner's bias too. Most people aren't going to walk up to a Titan and ask how it feels today. And maybe that's why they're so damn grumpy. Because no one treats them with any manners. We never really asked the combat mechs if they wanna be violent, you know? Maybe they'd rather program, or monitor gravity wells, or bird watch. Without high-level Omnicode implants and proper translation tools, we really have no way of knowing."

You cleared your throat, not really wanting to go down that rabbit hole. "How does Athena tie into this?" Because you distinctly remembered the fact that Feng was stumped over Athena.

"I don't know," Riggs said with a shrug. "Maybe she doesn't. Just that he was asking questions, but it really seemed like he was looking for information on some kind of super weapon. Also, I've not worked with a lot of mainframe AIs. Sorry, it's not my specialty," he said, sounding embarrassed. "But whatever Winston's cooked up, it has to be really advanced to house her. Way beyond what we have in the server rooms. She's got some serious power and normally I'd worry about her overextending herself, especially after yesterday, but..." Riggs trailed off. "But, she handled it. Like a pro." A smile slowly spread across his face. "I know she had help. Maybe that's it."

"What?" You asked, trying to keep your frustration out of your voice.

"Athena has been putting more and more awareness nodes into our drone fleet. She isn't just a simple program or line of code. She's a hive. And the more connections she has, the more complex she gets."

You sat back, dread building in your stomach.

"I know we have a "visiting AI" and a "Shambali monk" on the premises," Riggs said. "Did you bring them in to jumpstart her? Because if she starts cloning some of their processes, she could... Well, there is the hardware restriction. Too much and it would become a massive strain on the system," Riggs said, half thinking aloud to himself.

"If she starts cloning their processes, then what?" You asked sharply.

"I don't know," Riggs said. "But her capabilities would increase exponentially provided she had the hardware to contain and process all that data. Is that why you brought them in, ma'am?"

"...No," you said, with heavy sigh. Because Athena powering herself up exponentially had never occurred to you.

"Oh." Riggs blinked. "Umm, is it true then that the monk is joining Overwatch as a real agent?"

"Yup. Do you think that's going to be a problem?"

"Oh no, I think it's great!" Riggs smiled. "It's really past time!"
"Agreed," you said. "He put Agent Daniels back together, saved several civilians, and has helped me out on numerous occasions. If anyone starts complaining about his...admittance, you wouldn't mind reminding them of these facts? Or you can send them to me."

"Oh no, I don't mind at all!" Riggs shook his head vigorously.

"I mean, if they think he's preachy, annoying, and didactic to fault and they dislike him because of it, fair enough. That's all true. But they don't get hate on him because he's shiny, made of metal, and sometimes glows in the dark."

Riggs blinked. "I see. Umm, that sounds like personal experience talking. Is everything all right between you two?"

"I actually like Tekhartha Zenyatta," you said, testing the words on your tongue, and they didn't feel wrong. "But he's a real pain in the ass for all the reasons I just listed. And you can tell him I said that."

"Oh no, I really couldn't," Riggs winced, shaking his head. "No. Sorry. Not me."

You sighed, really wondering how Riggs ended up in Blackwatch.

"He put in an application to Overwatch, but Blackwatch needed a tech, and I vetted him personally," Gabriel said, giving you a wry look. "And he's my favorite hacker in the entire world, because he stays in his lane, works quietly, and doesn't start shit with the rest of my agents."

"...That was less dramatic than I was expecting," you said, actually having pictured Gabriel rescuing poor Riggs from sadistic terrorists and Riggs agreeing to work for Blackwatch out of breathless gratitude.

"Yes, well, Mihret brings enough drama for everyone," Gabriel said, stretching in his chair. He grumbled something under his breath and beckoned you over.

Rolling your eyes, you wrapped up your supply order, shut off your screen, and got out of your chair.

"I do appreciate you putting up with Ziv."

"I've seen what happens to agents who don't," Gabriel said, wiggling his eyebrows at you with mock severity. "They get a personal visit from you."

You snorted. "I'm always professional and polite, and I never swing first."

A skeptical smile crept across Gabriel's face. "Is that so?"

"Uh-huh." You sat on his desk. "Anyway, I'm the lesser evil. Have you seen what happens to the people who really piss Ziv off?"

"I'm skeptical that he slashed Jones' credit score; the ass obviously had terrible impulse control. And Cooper could have just slipped up and accidentally shared his private browser history with all his potential employers," Gabriel said without batting an eye.

You blinked. So maybe you had leaked their sexual misconduct reports to their respective parents after the events of the Overwatch Ball last year, but you hadn't realized that Ziv had taken it a step further. Of course he had. The only shocker was that he hadn't bragged about it to you.

"I put up with Mihret because he's exceptionally skilled," Gabriel said, wrinkling his nose, like it hurt to admit something nice about Ziv. "And because you'll do terrible things to me if I don't."

You weren't fooled. You cupped his face, smiling as your fingers stroked his beard. "I love you too."

Gabriel's expression softened, a small smile turning up the corners of his mouth. "Mihret's rabid loyalty to you makes him somewhat more tolerable, but it's barely worth mentioning."

You kissed him, a burst of emotion welling in your chest. He pulled you into his lap, hands around your waist as you perched there carefully, wondering if the chair would hold.

"I appreciate it," you said.

"You better," he growled, kissing you again. "Because he's an irritating little shit who gives Michael a run for his money."

"Michael's not that bad."

"Any more," Gabriel acknowledged. "But you've only been around him for a few days at a time."

That might change. You winced, and pressed your forehead against Gabriel's. "Lacroix really thinks I'm going to have to go MIA."

His grip on you tightened briefly. "I know. I don't like it, but...his plan does make sense. Give it a week, corazon. We'll have a better idea then."

"I know. Just...I don't want to. I know I might need to. I know if Petras figures out that he can leverage me against you, or Jack, then things will get worse. And it's not like I don't know how to live under the radar."

"Jack has already been planning some trips to east Asia. Particularly cities with a strong On Sing presence. We're not abandoning you."

You nodded. "I admit, I...worry about the distance. Not just "what if something happens and I'm not there?" I mean that keeps me up at night too. But also the strain on our relationship."

Gabriel rubbed your back, sitting in silence for a moment, his expression thoughtful. "Jack and I have managed long distance. We've gone months at a time without seeing each other. It wasn't good for us, but we held it together. Though we did have that break between SEP and Kandahar. It is hard. But this isn't permanent. A few months tops. And we'll have visits. Think of them as mini-vacations."

You nodded, trying to swallow the lump in your throat.

"I'm more worried about you meeting some brilliant, insane, and incredibly attractive mobster and falling into a lifestyle of decadence, violence, and sexy tattoos."

You nearly choked on your tongue. "What?"

"It could happen," Gabriel teased. "I'm sure you could resist diamonds, fancy weapons, and even expensive restaurants. But once they started bringing you extravagant cakes, well..."

    You laughed. "You're awful. I wouldn't-"

    "I know." Gabriel kissed you again, soothing the outrage in your belly. "Just like I know we can handle this. I trust you. I love you. I know you feel the same way. And I know Jack feels the same way." He exhaled slowly. "After all this time, we're smart enough to talk about our problems now, right?"

    "Yeah," you said, still worrying about circumstances. The Strike Commander and the Blackwatch Commander held high-pressure positions. They were often overworked and had enough trouble making time for each other when you all lived in the same complex. Going to another continent was going to make that even more difficult.

    "Stop panicking and start working on solutions instead," Gabriel said, flicking your nose.

    You bit your lip, not denying that you'd been thinking the worst. "So I was reading some of the Petras family transcripts. The Director seems to think Jack has something important in his possession."

    Gabriel frowned. "I know. But Jack can't give him what he wants. It's not possible any more."

    You raised a brow. "What is he looking for?"

    Gabriel narrowed his eyes at you. "Are you trying to pump me for information, chica?"

    "Trying to figure out what he's looking for," you said, not quite denying the assertion. "I get that he wants something Jack doesn't have in his possession. But he's going to use different methods based on whether or not Jack has a prototype bomb, versus a rare albino marmoset, versus an embarrassing Petras Sex tape in his possession."

    Gabriel snorted. "You are skirting a line."

    "I'm worried," you said, because that was the truth and it showed on your face.

    Gabriel sighed. "I don't know what Petras thinks he can get from Jack. I know what it is Jack had. And I know Jack doesn't have it any more. And I know that you aren't cleared for that information. All that you need to know is that it is most likely coordinates."

    "To buried treasure?"

    "Sure," Gabriel said, giving you a sour look. "Now stop asking."

    Sighing, you realized you'd pushed too hard on his good will and affection. You tucked your head against his shoulder. "Sorry. I'm just anxious."

    "I know," Gabriel sighed. "Gérard warned me that you'd pry. And he's warned Jack too."

    "...I know this is separate from our relationship, but...we're all tangled up in it. I just..."

    "I know," Gabriel said. "You're meddlesome and ridiculous. I know you're going to go ask Jack for more details later on." He shook his head. "He won't tell you either. Because you don't need to know. There's nothing you can do with that information. You'd be in more danger if you did know. So just trust us."
"I do. I just want to do something. Set the right bait. Get all the evidence. Nail Petras for his sins," you grumbled, not quite feeling grateful that he didn't try to order you not to ask questions. "Waiting is not what I need to be doing now."

Gabriel's hand rested on your back. "I know. And I'm not going to tell you not to ask Jack. But I am going to warn you against pushing. You do that, and we'll let Ana handle you."

"Ouch," you muttered, straightening up.

"It's a hard limit," Gabriel said, no longer smiling. "Think Red Kandahar."

"OK," you said, because you understood that. Because even if you didn't agree, Jack, Gérard, and Gabriel all thought you didn't need to know. And maybe you trusted their combined, if annoyingly stubborn, judgment. Fine, you didn't need to know what it was. But why did Petras seem so convinced that Jack had these mysterious coordinates? That was another question altogether and practically more important.

"That's just like him," Ziv scowled. "He's such an arbitrary bastard."

"Did you mean Gabriel or Lacroix?" You asked, sitting in the chair across from his desk, sipping the tea he'd made you. It wasn't as good as Jesse's or even Tataryn's, and definitely not Captain Amari's, but you knew better than to say that.

"Both," Ziv said. "But I meant Reyes." He scowled. "I'm surprised you didn't come up against this earlier. You know he has secrets."

"We all do," you said with a shrug. "Lacroix is a veritable depository of conspiracies and lies. Or has he started sharing the juicy tidbits with you? Like Top Secret pillow talk? Or maybe Amélie has...?"

Ziv glared at you. "He just laughs and tells me I don't need to know, then distracts me with some kind of disgustingly smooth compliment or terribly important mission." Ziv dropped his gaze. "But I understand compartmentalized intelligence. I know I don't need to know, and I trust him." The last declaration was said quietly.

"Same," you said. "Except about Gabriel and not Lacroix." You set your cup on its saucer. "Do you have any idea what Petras is looking for?"

"Some kind of weapon." Ziv shrugged. "Morrison isn't the boy scout everyone thinks he is, but he isn't the kind to hoard secrets for his own gain. I don't think Petras gets that. It's too much for his reptilian brain."

"That's really not fair to tortoises, lizards, and Mongolian Death Worms."

Ziv snorted. "You're right. His spider-like brain. It's probably in spilling out of his body cavity and bulging into his legs, like real spiders."

"...That's horrifying," you said.

Ziv gave a satisfied nod. "I know. But anyway, he probably thinks Morrison is biding his time, waiting to use whatever it is as a means to get ahead."
You nodded, thinking back on what you already knew. "Talked to Riggs today. Thought he was going to collapse under the weight of his unduly burdened conscience."

Ziv gave you a sour look. "Don't make fun of him. He's really upset about this."

You rolled your eyes at Ziv's newfound empathy. "I'm not making fun of him."

Ziv pulled up a screen with transcripts. "I was there for his debrief with Lacroix. He actually did go into some pretty technical detail. We think Petras has someone feeding him data, but he doesn't have the knowledge to understand it all and either doesn't want them to know that, or is stealing parts of the data on his own and trying to figure it out himself, hence his cozying up to Riggs." Ziv scrolled through some pages. "Let's see, he asked about weaponry, sure, and Riggs can give all kinds of weapons specs, but he's not privy to the experimental prototypes coming down the pipeline."

"Didn't realize he could shoot," you said, because you rarely saw Riggs on the range.

"He's worse than me," Ziv sighed shaking his head. "But he likes memorizing facts about weapons. Like some kind of precocious preteen." He continued looking through the transcripts. "There are some interesting notes about quantum swarm kernels, advancements in evolutionary multimodal optimization, and spiraled omnicode matrices. Get that glazed look of your face. I'll make it easy for you: that's all high-tier AI stuff."

"Any thoughts on the big secrets, Athena?" You glanced at the drone at rest in the chair behind you.

"Based on your clearances, I am not authorized to provide any useful commentary," she said hesitantly. "But knowing what I do know...I must agree with the leadership position on this. I, of course, believe you both to be utterly trustworthy. But this isn't a personal judgment."

"Yeah, I get that." You waived your hand. "Just bitching about it to Ziv because he has the same disregard for authority that I do."

"Worse actually," Ziv said. "Because I'm only sleeping with one of my bosses. You can't claim to be a rebel when you're banging the goddamn golden boy of Overwatch."

"...You really are the worst," you said, rolling your eyes. You looked around, not missing the little framed picture of Isha on his desk. She had her mouth wide open, and it looked like she was smiling. It made you smile too. "Amélie is probably going to get a murderbird, you know."

"I heard," Ziv said. He gave you a sardonic look. "Feng's batshit insane, but I guess she's been a decent friend to you. Amélie likes her too," he grumbled. "But Zheng still gives me the creeps."

"I quite like them both," Athena said. "Though Zheng is considerably more reserved than Feng. She does share more in Omnicode, though it isn't her first language and some of her phrasings are quite odd. Poetic, but strange."

"Huh," you said. "You linking up with Zenyatta too?"

"There has been data exchanged. Nothing improper. I am well aware of the limits on his clearances," Athena said primly. "But his view of the Iris is quite beautiful. None of my sensors can replicate that."

Ziv raised a brow. "Is that where you got the idea for the new shields?"
"Yes. One of his Omnicode passages offers a static meditation process that amplifies itself with each repetition. Like charging a weapon, though there is a minimal energy expended. I haven't quite worked out all the effects, but it holds a lot of potential as a latent shielding technique. One that would free up a great deal more of my processing power. Zheng has also inspired me to repurpose some of her less routine processes as defensive measures. I can go into detail about the parallels between Daoist philosophies and energy-saving slipstreaming, but I'm afraid I will just bore Lucky."

You and Ziv locked eyes for a long moment. He gave you a shrewd smile, eyes bright.

"Do you think...?" His voice wavered.

"It would fit," you said slowly, nodding to yourself.

"I will work under that assumption then," Ziv said, looking pleased.

"What did I miss?" Athena asked pleasantly, and you wondered just how intentional that speech had been.

"Nothing," you said. "We're just playing catch up."

"Yeah," Ziv said hesitantly. "I guess I'll have to be nicer to Feng. She did take Bayan in, and he actually seems to be doing pretty well, despite his three raptor babies. By the way, Athena, thanks for the assist."

"You're welcome," she said, sounding a little confused. "But that was ages ago."

"Human minds work in mysterious ways," you said, smiling at Ziv.

"OK, well I'll prepare a questionnaire with your favorite colors, activities, and foods. Think of it like summer camp, only without mosquitoes, stupid songs, and serial killers," Feng said brightly. "I've already sent Jack a list of romantic getaways that he can visit on a weekend!"

Just what kind of summer camps had Feng gone to? You know what? You were better off not asking.

Jack rubbed the back of his neck, cheeks pink. "Feng, I already told you that I can't be seen at the "Mother of All Love Hotels" or whatever its name is."

"Just dye your hair," she said with a shrug. "Or tell everyone you're a Jack Morrison cosplayer! There were other places on the list too, you know. Family-friendly places." The "you, sexual deviant, you" went unsaid, but you could see how badly Feng wanted to say it.

You snorted at Jack's disgruntled expression. He'd left off the iconic coat and just wore his black fatigues, holsters tight against his chest.

"Thanks Feng." You held Isha in your arms and she gave a surly squeak as Feng patted her face.

"Goodbye Raptor-Niece. I'm going home where the murderbirds actually like me!" She grinned. "But I'll still miss you!"

Isha grumbled and turned her head, burying her face in your chest.
"Why does she hate me so much?" Feng hissed at the Zheng drone.

"She's probably still scarred from the point where you tried to take her out of Lucky's arms," Genji said. "You were the very first person who tried to separate them. Isha has an impressive memory and holds grudges. She is not a meek forgiving creature."

"I was offering to hold her while Lucky cleaned up! I thought she'd be grateful! I was going to feed her while Lucky scrubbed raptor poop off her pants!"

"She doesn't see it that way," Genji said, sounding amused.

Feng muttered something under her breath. "Fine, I'll be extra nice and one day she might forgive me." She shot Isha a determined look. "Just you wait, murderbird. I will be the best damn Aunt Feng you could ever dream of!" She struck a pose, but Isha refused to look up, and you sighed, feeling just a little bad for your friend.

Genji and Hanzo lingered in the waiting room, actually showing up to bid Feng farewell. Jesse had come along with Bandit, and Feng spent more time on the dog than anyone else. To your surprise, Amélie was there too.

Feng leaned over to whisper something in Genji's ear. He actually laughed and patted her shoulder. Hanzo frowned as she made a very respectful bow, said something in Japanese with somber tones, and then he had to return the gesture. She added something else and his expression softened briefly, before his scowl returned and he made that familiar harrumphing noise.

Feng and Amélie did the triple cheek kiss gracefully and Feng giggled. "All right guys! Send me some free weekends. You're all invited! Hell, bring whoever you want. Like that sexy blonde guy," she said, grinning at you. "Or your kid sidekick. Mi casa es vuestra casa!"

"He's not my-"

"La la la can't hear you! I must go! Love you all bunches!" Feng sang as she walked away waving vigorously, the Zheng drone hovering beside her.

The Shimadas disappeared first, but Amélie lingered, fussing over Bandit while Jesse squirmed uncomfortably. You waved as you left, walking alongside Jack, a little surprised that he'd already asked Feng for vacation spots.

"I've got some cake and pizza in my quarters," Jack said. "Gabe's having dinner with Catriona, and I figured we should give them time to catch up."

"You're just scared of her."

"Yes," Jack nodded, face utterly stoic. "And so are you. Notice that I made excuses for you too, instead of abandoning you to her machinations. You should show some more gratitude, agent."

You put a hand over your mouth to stifle the laugh, because while Catriona was intimidating, she didn't seem quite as bad as Jane.

The two of you walked in companionable silence back to his quarters. Isha snuggled against your chest, yawning. There was a lot to say, but you needed privacy. Once you got back to the room, you could speak freely.

Jack got the door and immediately kicked off his boots and flopped over on the couch. Athena and some of the techs had already done a sweep. No one had left any unpleasant surprises or surveillance devices. Not that you expected them too, but it would be negligent not to check.

"I'm relieved to have my room back. I mean, Feng was respectful and all, but it's weird sharing space with a Zheng drone," Jack said as you shut the door. He sighed and stretched out on his back, running his fingers through his hair. You set Isha down and she sauntered off to the bedroom, probably to sleep on her dog. Then you crawled onto his chest, sighing happily as he began to rub your shoulders.

"You OK?" Jack asked.

"Holding up," you said. You paused, meeting his worried eyes. "Got some questions, though I don't want to push too hard."

"Gérard already warned me," Jack said with a chuckle. "Ask. I'll tell you what I can: which is limited. But it's better to get this all out of the way."

"Why does Petras think you know where this thing is?"

Jack blinked, obviously expecting you to ask what the thing was. "I...huh." He reclined, hands behind his head, elbows akimbo. "I suppose it's because I wrote the post-mission report."

You raised your head, watching Jack's face.

"This was toward the end of the Omnic Crisis. Gabriel was still in charge, but we'd split up for this mission. Same location, different routes of egress. Gabriel, Ana, Torby, and Reinhardt had taken one objective. Liao, Gérard, Niang, and I were on the other." He sighed.

You blinked. You'd heard of Liao. Everyone had. But Niang? The name was on the wall. Aja Niang, if you remembered correctly. You hadn't heard this story, but then Gabriel didn't like retelling the bad ones. You didn't blame him.

"We were cleaning up one of the last big holdout omniums that was still manufacturing hostile troops." Jack's gaze was distant. "As you might have guessed, Niang and Liao didn't make it. Gérard and I almost didn't either. But...we found something, and it gave us the advantage. We wouldn't have survived otherwise. Hell, without it, I don't know if Gabe's team would have made it out of there either."

You lay there, eyes closed. "Petras thinks it's a weapon."

"I know. And I'm sure he's sent people to the wreckage of the omnium. But we destroyed it pretty thoroughly. Torby set the charges, extra special ones. But I...wrote the report referencing what we saw down there. I left things out, because not all of what happened needed to be in the official report. But something caught Petras' attention. I suspect he had some hint of what to look for."

"So the location was underwater?" You raised your head.

"Still is. At the bottom of the Indian Ocean," Jack said. "What's left of it anyway." He shrugged. "I handled it. Not Gérard. And not Niang or Liao. But they're long dead anyway." Jack stroked your hair, his voice wobbling slightly. "I wrote in the report that I destroyed all hostile weaponry. But he doesn't believe me. I suspect he was hoping Gabriel could tell him otherwise.

You sighed, not letting yourself wonder if Gabriel would have held onto forbidden tech.

"OK," you said. "I think that answers my question."
Jack nuzzled your cheek. "You going to stop hounding everyone about it now?"

"Maybe," you murmured as he folded your hands in his. "For now I'll just focus on being Feng's roommate. Isha will fucking hate it and she'll miss everyone terribly. And I'm afraid of what she's going to learn from Bayan's crew."

Jack squeezed your fingers. "It's not inevitable."

"Easier to brace for it," you said. "You're already looking into reasons to travel."

"Not really," Jack said. "I have the most important one right here. Unless Gabe decides to go AWOL with you. Then I'll have the two most important reasons over there." He gave you a gentle smile.

You bit your lip. "Jack-" You felt your face scrunch up, ugly and pinched. You buried it in his chest, refusing to look at him.

"Three, if we count Isha." His voice was soft, and he kissed the top of your head, hands rubbing comforting circles on your back. "I know it's hard. But if it comes to that, we'll make it work. I promise."

Nodding, you clung to him, memorizing the warmth of his body against yours.

Chapter End Notes

So, my repeated strain injury is not getting better. I do type 8+ hours a day at work, so that's not helping. I've cut back on writing because I need my arms to heal. I'm not sure what happened, but my right wrist, elbow, and forearm are all giving me sharp pains during/after typing, and my left wrist and elbow have a milder version. I'm guessing tendonitis, could be carpal tunnel, but the symptoms skew more toward tennis elbow injuries. For the next few weeks, I'm going to be bumping updates back, maybe once a week, and see how I'm doing. I technically don't have insurance right now, and since I just started the job, I can't exactly ask for a bunch of time off. Got to make sure I start healing.

I am taking the NSAID naproxen/Aleve and icing trouble spots. I'm doing PT exercises and stretches. I'm wearing an elbow stabilizing cuff and wrist brace when I type. I have an ergonomic keyboard and am working on my posture. Earlier in the week, doing all those things seemed to help. I didn't take any Aleve yesterday and I'm paying for it now. It's less about the pain reduction and more about reducing inflammation. So I'll try taking it on work days and resting on the weekend. Sorry, guys.

As for having a big Thanksgiving, I've lived in giant families. Twelve people isn't a lot for a family gathering. Twelve people is a lot if you're the only one in the house cooking and making sure everyone has food/drinks. I was cooking, getting the table set, making plates, getting cups and drinks, and making sure people had what they needed mostly on my own and kind of all at the same time. I did a lot of the cleaning up too, though one of my friends did half the dishes. So I figured I'd clarify that. :P

Need to go get ready for work. On second shift and still trying to figure out how to better allot my time. (Sleeping all day and staying up all night probably isn't a good thing? IDK)
You groaned as someone giggled in your ear. Warm hands squeezed your breasts, and your eyes flew open. You were in Jack's bed, nestled between your lovers.

"Soft," Jack murmured sleepily, chuckled a few times, and then buried his face in your hair. He held you from behind, his hands kneading your chest insistently.

"Seriously?" You groaned.

He just made a sleepy humming noise.

"He does it to me too," Gabriel murmured, reaching out to stroke your cheek. "He probably is still asleep."

"Your pecs aren't soft," you yawned.

"No, he just says "tiddies" to me." Gabriel kissed your nose.

You snorted.

"Soft tiddies," Jack chuckled, nuzzling the back of your neck, still fondling you. He curled closer to your back, one leg thrown over your hips. "Mmmm."

You gave a tolerant sigh, rolling your eyes.

Gabriel scooted closer, one hand on Jack's thigh, the other resting on top of your hands.

"Want me to move him?"

"No," you said, as Jack snuggled even closer. "Going to have to pee soon, but I can lay here just a little while longer."

"Did you want to talk about...strategies?" Gabriel asked, fingers rubbing your knuckles. "I've got a couple ideas about-"

"Not right now," you said, raising his hand and kissing it. "Later. Right now I just want to lie here with the two of you."

Gabriel closed his eyes, smiling as you clasped his hand between yours. "All right, corazon. Whatever you want."

You lay there for a moment, listening to Jack's breathing. "So...in theory, if we had a house." You stopped, realizing that your idea might not go over well.
"I'm listening," Gabriel said, opening his eyes. "Go on."

You swallowed. "I kind of think we should have separate bedrooms on top of the master bedroom. For when we need our own space. That doesn't mean I don't like being with you, but--"

You looked down, feeling a little silly. That was four bedrooms total. And that kind of space was quite the luxury. Honestly, this was all a pipedream. You didn't have to ruin your morning in bed by bringing up your hang-ups.

"It's not a bad idea. If we can't manage that many bedrooms, then at least we could have separate personal spaces. Maybe have a foldout couch in my "sewing room." You could have your own bedroom to fill with your ill-gotten gains, and to give the rest of us plausible deniability. Jack can share with Isha. She's neater than he is anyway, though long-term she might get frustrated with him." Gabriel laughed.

You blinked.

"We're adults, corazon. And there are points when we all need time alone. I know how difficult I can be when I'm out of sorts, and the same goes for Jack. Having that option isn't rejection. It's taking into consideration our own shortcomings and trying to manage them. Don't look so worried." Gabriel kissed your forehead.

"I...yes," you said, blood rushing to your face. "Just not used to talking about it."

"You're doing fine. I'm glad you've thought about this. Jack would just barrel in full throttle and within a week we'd be clashing over all the dirty laundry he's strewn across the floor. I'd probably try to lay in bed to calm myself down, but then seeing all his ugly white socks would just make me angrier. And then you'd be hiding in the coat closet, trying to avoid both of us, while you made evil revenge plans, because the confined space would just make you meaner--"

You smiled.

"It's a good idea. We could invade Jack's home office, bend him over his desk, and really have some fun. We could have all kinds of sleepovers too, where we all cram into one small bedroom just for sexy visits. Keep things fresh." Gabriel rubbed your arms. "I like it."

"Me too," Jack murmured in your ear, his hands still cupping your breasts. "I don't mind sharing with Isha. She doesn't have a problem with my socks."

You swore, smacking his hands and he laughed in delight.

"Ow! Baby, stop that! What's gotten into you?"

"You were faking this whole time!" You scowled, turning your head, and finding yourself nose to nose with him.

Jack gave you a silly grin and kissed you then, completely unapologetic. "Not true sweetheart. I was waking up to soft tiddies, and listening to you talk about the future made it all the better. Want to have a house with you and Gabe. Want you both to be comfortable. And want to be able to throw my socks on the floor."

"Isha will steal them," you said.

Jack just kissed you again. "I can buy more."

"You can't wear them with sandals," you scowled. "I'm serious, Jack."
"Oh," you said, staring at Bakker's mugshot, now understanding exactly why that sly French bastard had assigned you this one. The former dispatcher was a mess, looking like he'd gotten into it with the wrong end of an industrial fan. He'd suffered numerous lacerations to his face, arms, and chest. And most tellingly, he'd lost an eye in the firefight.

Isha's name wasn't mentioned in the actual report. In fact, your murderbird had not received official credit for her...assistance. But you knew raptor slashes when you saw them. You'd bandaged enough of them, mostly on yourself. Taking in Bakker's ugly gouges and deep lacerations, you shook your head slowly. Isha had held back on you, and you never realized how much till now.

Your sweet little maiming-bird sat on the couch, playing with her tablet. Winston and Athena had put a combination of educational children's games, shows, and learning modules on the device. But Isha was playing Frogger, though she still seemed to prefer drawing her squiggly little pictures. At the moment, she was running the poor frog into the cars, just to watch it get smashed, and then chuffing loudly at the animation. You'd already shown her how to navigate the puzzle, dodging cars and staying on logs, but she currently seemed more interested in smashing frogs. You'd also restricted her movie access right now, because someone had loaded a bunch of wildlife videos full of extremely violent kills on there for her. The last thing you needed right now was for her to get more inspiration for maiming and ambushing.

Bakker was still undergoing medical treatment, and you'd run his DNA, prints, and other biometrics through a variety of databases. The prints and face hadn't gotten any matches, but searching through the newly-shared Numbani intel database got you a retinal scan and DNA link to a former NIA operative, presumed killed during the Omnic Crisis. Luuk Bakker was possibly Renier Van Wyck. Though, you couldn't just take the name on the sample and accept it. Confirming that Bakker really was Van Wyck would take more effort. The faces didn't quite match, though there were all kinds of cosmetic procedures that one could undergo to change their identity. And the DNA sample listed as Van Wyck's could have been falsified. You were going to have to send someone to acquire a control sample of Van Wyck's DNA. Still shaking your head, you leaned back in your chair.

"Isha, did you gouge this guy?"

Isha looked up from her tablet as you pointed at your screen, zooming in on Bakker's face.

Isha trilled, flapping her wings. She bobbed her head, flashing her teeth and flaunting her stabbing toe claws.

"...OK," you said. "Good job." You weren't sure if you sounded sincere, but Isha hopped off the couch and strutted over to you. You picked her up and set her on your lap. She chattered at you, making clawing motions with her delicate little hands. "Yeah, you sure showed him." Isha was about twenty five pounds and still growing, her tail making up half of her length. Velociraptor or not, Bakker got his face torn up by a little bird less than one fifth his size. You stroked her head, expression softening as she gripped your hands and rubbed her snout on you.

The door opened and Gabriel slammed the door shut behind himself, muttering under his breath.

Isha stretched her neck out, watching him with curious eyes as he stomped to his desk, tossing a few folders to the side.

You zoomed in on the picture of Bakker.

"So...did she eat it?" You asked, pointing to Bakker's bandaged right eye.

Gabriel paused, looking up, his eyes narrowing in concentration. And then he snorted and began to chuckle. He gave you a wide, almost boyish grin. "What do you think?"

"I can't believe you let her eat it," you said, wrinkling your nose. "What if she develops a taste for them?"

"She prefers pizza," Gabriel said. "And for that I blame Jack." He paused. "She has a pretty good palate. She likes meat, which is to be expected, but she eats a healthy amount of fruit too. The figs were all Mihret, weren't they?"

"Yes, and you're not distracting me that easily," you said. "Is there footage?"

Gabriel chuckled. "No. But I witnessed it. She dropped out of the vents onto him; that's how he got all the defensive wounds on his forearms. He managed to grab her, and that's when she pulled her eye trick." He leaned over your desk and rubbed her snout. "There was a lot of screaming. She hit, yanked her claw and target out with a pop, and crushed it in front of him."

You blinked.

"She was going to eat it," Gabriel admitted with a smile and a shrug. "But I told her to drop it. Because we don't know what kind of places that scumbag has been, do we, paloma?" He chuckled her under the chin. "No, your mom would be so upset if you got sick from eating bad guys."

Isha climbed onto your desk and head butted Gabriel. He laughed, bad mood dissipated, as he petted her.

"Lacroix assigned Bakker to me and Amélie, but I think he was counting on her involvement." You shook your head. It made sense, but you'd really been expecting something...different.

"Sounds right. Bakker screamed a lot. He was pretty useless after she was done with him. You guys can play good cop, bad cop, and eyeball-smashing murderbird."

"That occurred to me," you sighed, still not entirely comfortable with the thought of involving your pet in Blackwatch business. "It's a relief to hear that she didn't actually eat his eye."

"She licked her talons afterward, but..."

"Goddamnit," you said, resting your face in your palm.

"But Feng, Zheng, and Angela have issued her a clean bill of health. Nothing to worry about," Gabriel said. "She's fine."

"She licks you with that mouth-"

"She licks Jack with that mouth," Gabriel corrected.
"And who kisses Jack?" You asked, rolling your eyes.

Gabriel just shrugged. "I've had worse things than human vitreous on my face, corazon. It didn't hurt us."

You almost asked what. But then you glanced at Isha, who'd cuddled up to Gabriel, nibbling on his hoodie. Shaking your head, you knew this was an argument no one would win. "Just...I don't want her getting cravings for human flesh or catching any weird diseases."

Gabriel chuckled, leaning over your desk to kiss you. "Understood, ma'am. We'll be more careful in the future, won't we?" He cooed to Isha, rubbing her belly, and she chirped happily, like this was all just a big game to her.

Amélie didn't pull any punches. She took one look at Bakker's mugshot and she laughed. She poured you a glass of wine and set out a box of chocolates. "Gérard told me we would be handling the traitor, but he left out that detail." She giggled, offering a piece to Isha.

Isha accepted the chocolate with both hands, sitting politely on the couch beside you. She moved carefully, very aware of her talons and the delicate upholstery. Jack and Gabriel's couches had several snags and tears in them from her claws. Most of your blankets had holes in them. But here she was, being extra considerate of Amélie's possessions. You wondered then what she had damaged and how Amélie had handled it.

"She is very clever," Amélie said, noticing your surprise. "Very early on we established that she must behave herself. Good children get treats. Bad children..." Amélie's smile widened into something technically polite, but showing too many pearly white teeth to be anything but intimidating.

Isha quickly popped the rest of the chocolate in her mouth, straightened up, and held very still.

"So well-behaved," Amélie purred and offered her another treat. "You must be so proud."

"I've had a lot of help training her," you said, because Gabriel had probably done the lion's share of the work. And you couldn't forget that Tataryn of all people made the litter box breakthrough. You took a drink of wine and sighed. "Have you seen my notes on Van Wyck?"

"Gérard has already put in an informal request for some of Van Wyck's belongings through a trustworthy mutual acquaintance," Amélie said. "Very thorough work, Chanceux."

"Kwento's serious about sharing data," you said with a shrug. "For whatever reason, the South Africans have disavowed him entirely. Even if he's "dead." But who knows? It might be another blind."

"So, may I be the "bad cop" this time? Please?" Amélie giggled.

You raised a brow. "I'd love to watch you in action, but Bakker has been in Overwatch for awhile. My reputation is more...checkered than yours. In this case, I'll be the more convincing one. Next time maybe?"
"I will hold you to that," Amélie said, staring down her nose at you with mock disapproval. "But you are right, Chanceux. I am simply Gérard's very attractive prima donna wife. You run around in bloodstained towels, massacring giant cyborgs."

You groaned and drained the rest of the wine glass. "Really? That's not what I was trying to say at all."

Amélie laughed, one hand on her chest, like tweaking you brought her great joy. "I know, I know. I am just having fun with you. Your analysis is entirely correct."

"Anyway, I'm going to be less of the bad cop and more of a prop. I think Isha will be the most effective one."

Amélie raised a brow and looked at Isha, who had politely extended her sticky hands for more candy. She offered her the box, and Isha very gingerly lifted a truffle out and nibbled on it, her wary blue eyes on Amélie's face.

"But she is so cute," Amélie said. "Not intimidating at all."

Isha hummed as she ate, her sharp white teeth flashing.

"She crushed his eye in front of him," you said. "Squished it, then licked her claws."

"Vraiment?" Amélie clapped her hands together. "Not our Isha! She knows how to use a napkin!"

You blinked a few times, and it took you a moment to realize that Amélie was totally fucking with you. Holding out your wineglass for a refill, you just shook your head at Amélie while she laughed at you so hard that she nearly spilled the wine.

"Feng has promised me first pick," Amélie said. "She has a few color options figured out, but I am willing to be surprised. I think Isha would like a little sister though, don't you?"

"You mean...cousin?"

Amélie waved her hand. "Don't be so technical. They are all related biologically. "Sister" sounds much more charming than "cousin." And Isha would make a wonderful older sibling. Look how she dotes on Bandit. I would even trust her with small human children."

You nearly choked on your wine. Coughing a few times, you pounded on your chest while Isha looked on in concern. Glaring at Amélie, you downed the rest of your wine. "I've heard enough about that from Catriona, thank you very much."

Amélie rolled her eyes. "Not my point at all. Think of how cute your murderbird and my murderbird will be together."

"Assuming Isha doesn't become territorial and insanely jealous," you said, even though the words didn't ring true.

"Nonsense," Amélie said. "She will adapt. She is resourceful creature and enjoys companionship." Amélie leaned over and kissed the top of her head. "So how are you doing then, Chanceux?"

"Fine," you said automatically.
"Just...fine?"

"Yup." You took a chocolate.

Amélie frowned at you. "Chanceux, do not fib to me. I am very serious. How are you holding up?"

"Fine," you repeated in a firmer tone. "Just focusing on the my work and making contingency plans in case of-

Amélie rolled her eyes upward. "Chanceux, please, we know each too well for this." She crossed her arms. "There is nothing tough or inherently brave about lying to the people who care about you. In fact, being unable to admit your feelings is nothing but cowardice."

You blinked. "I'm not scared, I just don't want to worry any-"

"We will worry about you no matter what you do," Amélie scowled. "Ziv has averaged three hours of sleep a night since Petras approached you. Gérard is making extra contingency plans for his already elaborate contingency plans. I have been refitting Chateau Guillard should you desire to spend some time in Annecy."

You stared. "I never asked anyone to-"

"Do not finish that sentence, Chanceux. Take a deep breath and think very carefully about your words instead."

You inhaled slowly, realizing how ungrateful you sounded. "I didn't mean it like that. I just don't like being a burden. I-"

"No one does," Amélie said. "But you are not a burden, a chore, or an obligation. You are our friend. And you are in trouble. This is what you do for people you care about. You look after Ziv much the same way. There are others, too, but I can only speak of Ziv." She patted your cheek. "Why is it so hard for you to accept help?"

"...Dunno," you muttered, staring at your empty wineglass.

"You are proud, that I understand," Amélie said with a sigh. "And you hate showing weakness. That too, I understand." She leaned back against the sofa, resting one arm around your shoulder. "And you are stubborn, silly, and so busy trying to take care of other people that you forget how to take care of yourself." She hugged you then. "I loathe the idea of you going into hiding alone. Even if you go to Shanghai, I will miss you and Isha terribly."

"I'd miss you too," you said, blinking rapidly.

Amélie blew out a breath. "I am so worried about you, and I know that is ridiculous, because you are strong, clever, and resourceful. But that doesn't matter. I still worry. And I'm not the only one."

"You shouldn't worry. It'll upset your stomach," you said, catching yourself before you made a joke about wrinkles. Amélie would not be amused by that.

"You will make my hair turn gray," she said, smacking your arm and proving you wrong yet again.

"I am...worried too," you said after a few deep breaths, Amélie was still hugging you, possibly because she thought you'd try to escape this conversation otherwise. "I'm worried about something happening while I'm gone. I'm worried about Ziv, Tataryn, Vo, and Hanzo. I'm even worried about people who can take care of themselves like you and Jesse. And yes, I'm worried about what this is going to do to my relationships..." You hung your head. "I've talked to Jack and Gabriel. And I trust them. I just know it's going to be difficult, and I can't help but be worried. I'm making contingency plans, because that's a better use of my time. But deep down, yeah, I'm freaking out. This is my home. I don't want to leave."

You realized, only after the words had left your mouth, that Amélie had fucking finessed you by admitting weakness first. And you realized too, that she was absolutely right: you were being a coward. Amélie was just trying to be a good friend. She shouldn't have to make herself vulnerable just to coax your sad sack of feelings out. She was trying to help you out and you were resisting, because...because you were scared to admit the truth out loud.

To her credit, Amélie didn't act smug about her obvious victory. "I will look after them, Chanceux. Do not worry. I will make sure Gabriel eats in the office. I will keep Ziv, Tataryn, Hanzo, and the rest of your Blackwatch rogues in line. Gérard will have to handle Min; she prefers him, but I will take good care of them for you. I promise. And I will come visit you in Shanghai. Gérard is very excited about bringing home a raptor. He may not admit it, but he is enchanted by Isha."

You weren't so sure about that, but it seemed gauche to argue with Amélie about her own husband's preferences. "You're a good friend," you said, because you were too damn overwhelmed to come up with anything better. "You've always been really good to me and I don't really know why."

Amélie clapped her hands against your cheeks. "Truly? You have no idea?"

"I mean, I was on that rescue mission in the Alps, but that was work," you said awkwardly, recalling almost a year ago when you'd helped dig her out of an avalanche after a Talon ambush.

"That was a big part," Amélie said. "Gérard told me how much you hate the snow. Are you going to tell me that sharing such an experience with someone doesn't build a bond?"

You remembered Gabriel carrying you through the woods after Black Base Delta fell. You exhaled slowly, feeling a little dumb. "Yeah, OK. I didn't think about it like that. I was too cold and slightly insane."

"You'd been shot too," she said, shaking her head.

"Not a big deal. It didn't make it through my armor."

Amélie threw up her arms in mock exasperation. "You are impossible."

"It's part of my charm?"

"Yes," she agreed. "But to answer your question, then came Shanghai. You saw Gérard and Ziv were in trouble and rode to their rescue. It was very heroic. I know Gérard was unconscious for your part of the action, but Ziv wrote quite the report. I knew how it ended, and I was still on the edge of my seat."

Your lips quirked, because you weren't so sure she was cleared to read that report. "I only remember him bitching me out, partially because I was late, partially because I got shot again saving his ungrateful ass, and partially because he thought I was sleeping with Gabriel behind
Amélie threw her head back laughing. "How efficient of him."

You snorted.

"So before we were really friends, you had already saved Gérard twice, and that was impressive, because you had made it abundantly clear that you didn't like him, not after your entry interview."

"...I was traumatized!"

"I know," Amélie said, giving you a sad smile. "And for what it's worth, that was never his intention. But he had to do a thorough job." She rested her head on your shoulder. "But you saved him anyway, and I will be forever grateful."

You shook your head. "OK, when you put it like that, I feel silly." Because of course people liked it when you saved them and their loved ones. Duh.

"And you didn't even stop to consider you could collect the impressive bounty on his head or get him back for his cruelty."

"Of course not." You shook your head. "That's the bare minimum of decency. Though I'd be lying if I said I hadn't thought about some forms of...minor criminal revenge." And that you would have tried a few out, if you'd be sure you could get away with it.

Amélie laughed. "You cannot be convicted for mere thoughts, Chanceux. Gérard has driven me to drastic measures on more than one occasion."

"I bet," you said smugly. And your imagination had inflicted all kinds of...immoral things on certain people.

"There is one more thing as well," Amélie said, her expression thoughtful. "You know what it is like to have to constantly scrutinize someone's words and intentions. To gauge if you've said too much, if your words will be used against you, and how to contain the fallout. You know how exhausting that can be."

"...No, not at all," you said dryly.

"I am being serious!" Amélie said, pursing her lips, and jabbing a finger into your collarbone.

"Ow!"

"As I was saying," Amélie continued as if she hadn't just poked you with her own stabby finger. "Trust is a rare luxury in the both the worlds of espionage and ballet. You may like someone. You may want to help them. But it is another thing to give them your back, to let them see your vulnerabilities. Chanceux, my husband trusts you. And believe it or not, he respects you."

You snorted, but Amélie's expression was gentle and you swallowed all your arguments.

"Gérard can be incredibly difficult. I understand that all too well. But when it comes to a person's character, his instincts are unparalleled. He has never steered me wrong. "That one is untrustworthy. That one is weak. That one is loyal." He gave longer explanations, but that was the gist of it. She stared off into space for a moment. "So when he told me that I would like you, that you could be trusted, that we would make good friends, I believed him. And as usual, he was absolutely right."

You sat back, speechless.

"I am very glad that we met," Amélie said. "You are always interesting, and I know we will continue to have grand adventures together."

"Yeah," you said, your voice thick in your throat. "Grand adventures."

"Together," she nodded happily. She glanced down at your raptor. "I like the name "Colette" for your little sister, don't you Isha? Or maybe "Ninon?"

Isha chirped happily, and you both looked down to see that the chocolate box was mysteriously empty.

Shaking her head, Amélie smiled, opened another box of chocolates, and another bottle of wine.

"Thank you for coming with me," Reinhardt said, as the two of you walked back to his office, carrying boxes of currywurst. Isha rode happily on his shoulder, nibbling on his hair.

"No problem, I needed something to keep my mind off things," you said, because today you'd been assigned to Reinhardt, since Gabriel and Jesse were out on an op, Tataryn still had Kseniya, and who knew what the Shimadas were up to? Something sneaky, that's what.

"Nothing better than a good meal and a lager," Reinhardt winked. "Except maybe some quality time with your lovers."

"Good food and good company are always welcome," you said as you set the bags down on his desk. You pulled up a chair, grateful for the Reinhardt's informality. He wasn't being obvious about the fact that he was babysitting you, and you tried to take it in stride. It was nice to just sit and talk with the older man. He was a real pleasure to be around.

Reinhardt opened a box for himself and then one for Isha. You rolled your eyes as he gave her the whole damn thing. Squealing with joy, Isha pulled the sausage out of its bun and chomped down on the spicy meat.

"You're spoiling her," you said, not actually making any move to stop him.

"You designated me Uncle Reinhardt," he said, beaming at her. "It is my sworn duty to spoil my little dragonling."

"I didn't realize that's how things worked between knights and dragons." You chuckled and ate your fries.

"Isha is a good niece," Reinhardt said solemnly. "She is not a monster who preys on the weak, or a force of nature that must be resisted."

"You say that, but you haven't lost all your socks to her yet."
Reinhardt's shoulders shook with laughter. "She is a thief, but she is just a baby and I hold her mother accountable."

You snorted. "I'm trying."

"I know," Reinhardt said, blowing a stray lock of hair out of his face. He grinned as he watched Isha tear off chunks of bread and dip them in the curry sauce. "A younger me would have had qualms about genetically engineered animals. Not just Isha, but Winston as well. And Athena? Mein gott..." He shook his head. "I was a brash youth."

You nearly choked at that. Was?

"I think the hardest thing I ever had to learn was how to be kind."

"What? You?" Your voice went high. "Reinhardt, hands down, you're like the most decent person in Overwatch."

He laughed awkwardly at that. "Come now, Lucky Lady, don't flatter an old man."

"It's true!" You insisted, mouth half full of food.

"I appreciate your kind words," Reinhardt muttered, clearly not comfortable with that designation. "I try to do the right thing. Though in this day and age, the "right thing" isn't always so clear."

"Now are you going to tell me that young Reinhardt beat up orphans and kicked puppies?"

You frowned.

"Never. No, I always tried to be law abiding, ignoring a...few drunken episodes," he laughed, cheeks turning pink as he rubbed the back of his neck. "And I hated bullies."

"So what did you mean by that then?" You sat back in your chair. "I can't picture you as anything less than upstanding, and I don't mean to dismiss the effort that takes. I just...I always picture you as a genuinely good guy."

"I did the responsible thing. I did what was expected of me. I excelled in those fields," Reinhardt mused, his gaze distant. "Society is very good at reminding you to be honest, upstanding, and decent, yes. It is not so good at teaching you to be kind. Oh, there is lip service. You are told that compassion is a virtue and that you should behave in such a fashion. But so much of it is rote. You are taught how to follow the law. You are taught to feel ashamed when you break the rules. You are not really taught how to be kind."

"...I'm sorry, it's a little beyond me to analyze this," you said, not entirely sure what he was trying to say. "I spent a good chunk of my life doing questionable things for survival. I don't quite have the same perspective."

"It is like...you see a homeless man. The "charitable" thing you may do is give him money, or you buy him a meal. Though you may also lecture him on his poor life decisions while you perform your "kind" act. You may say all manner of things, because you are offering him a tiny modicum of support. And then you may tell yourself that you are a good person afterward. But is all that judgment and posturing really kindness?" Reinhardt shook his head. "Do you see what I mean, Lucky? You either already understand true compassion, or maybe one day you learn the hard way."

"...OK, I get that," you said, sitting back in the chair.
"Do not lie. Do not steal. Do not kill. These are the bare minimum rules, yes? But upholding them does not make one a good person." Reinhardt shook his head. "There are many more. Do not kick dogs. Do not shout at children. Do not drunkenly throw rocks at windows at three in the morning, even if you think you know who lives there."

"Why would you do that?"

"I was drunk and trying to get their attention! And I was only off by two houses." He laughed.

You snorted.

"And for some people rules are enough. They don't have to be good. They can just tell themselves that they are not bad." Reinhardt sighed. "When I was a Crusader, I almost let my team die. Simply because they could not keep up with me. Yes, it was my job to shield them. But I thought that they had to learn on their own. I thought that they were holding me back. I thought a great many things with good intentions." He tapped his eye. "I was young, foolish, and terribly wrong. It took the death of a good friend to show me the truth."

You blinked. "Reinhardt-"

"It is that tragedy that made me the man I am today. It is regret that taught me the most important lesson of them all." He gave you a sad smile. "It was hard to forgive myself, Lucky. It took years of trying to repay that blood debt, only to realize that there was no way to match his sacrifice. That all I could do was live a better life, and learn from what he tried to teach me." He patted your hand. "I had to learn that sometimes it is more important to be kind than to be right.
That it is easy to assign blame, to others, to oneself, and just how useless blame is. I think we are very much alike, Lucky. We are our own harshest critics. And it is easy to forget that you must be kind to yourself too. It is a strange balance. I think I had to learn to be kind to others and myself at almost the same time." He stared off into space.

You nodded, still caught up in the fact that Reinhardt had gone through the same grief and guilt as you, and he still came out...smiling? That wasn't the right word. It was that inner light he had, that hadn't been lost or buried under disappointment and bitterness. That man was as strong as he looked. You were more than a little envious.

"Do not repeat this. But I think you already know, Torby carries a great deal of guilt on his shoulders."

"...I got that impression," you said. "But I know better than to pry."

"Early on there were points when I wanted to berate him for being too good of an engineer." Reinhardt shook his head. "But what would that actually do? He would just feel worse.
I would have alienated an ally. I would not have been wrong to say such things, but ultimately, what would I have accomplished? And as time passed, and we became friends, I understood that such words would have wounded him deeply, and again, what kind of friend am I if I do that?
Perhaps if he were trying to reengineer some kind of omnic weapon, I would have to remind him of his past mistakes, but that is not the case. He never had those aspirations again." He sighed. "There is enough pain in the world. I do not need to add to it. And in being kind to Torby, I learned to...forgive myself, at least a little."

"See, you're a damn good person," you said. "And I know it is weird to hear, but I believe it about you. I'm not saying this out of hero worship or obligation. Yeah, you have flaws. But you are kind, and you're absolutely right, we need more of that."
"It...makes me happy to hear you say that. I know Reyes thinks otherwise but..." He paused. "I am sorry. I do not mean to speak ill of your paramour."

You shook your head. "I know Gabriel can be terribly unreasonable at times. It's part of his charm."

Reinhardt shrugged. "It doesn't bother me any more. He is a complicated man. I do not resent him. At least he has always been honest about his feelings." He downed a beer, his expression morose. Like it hurt his feelings that after all they'd been through together, Gabriel still didn't like him.

It was exactly that, you realized. Reinhardt cared about Gabriel, even though he understood that the other man never liked him much. Any normal person would have come to resent that disparity, yourself included.

Guilt loosened your tongue. "...This stays between us, but even when he complains about you, it's never about anything serious. He can't speak ill of your skills, your virtue, or your hair. He just thinks you're annoying, and he knows that really isn't enough grounds to justify being a dick." You patted his hand. "He doesn't hate you."

Reinhardt gave you surprised smile. "Really?"

"Really," you said, trying to sound convincing. Because you didn't think that was the case. "You're more like a...work nemesis. Someone to grouse at. It keeps things interesting."

Reinhardt's wholesomeness sometimes made you uncomfortable, like maybe you shouldn't spend too much time around him, because you'd just bring him down. Maybe Gabriel was envious of Reinhardt's rose-tinted worldview, but on some level, you knew Gabriel compared himself to the Crusader, and a lot of the terrible things Gabriel had done in the name of "the greater good" still haunted him. Maybe he resented Reinhardt's relatively clean hands, but you suspected the problem lay with how Gabriel felt about himself, and not with anything Reinhardt had done.

"That's...that makes sense," Reinhardt said thoughtfully. "I always...well, I don't know what he thought. He is very good at conveying contempt. And there are things about myself that sometimes deserve it."

"...Not really," you said. "Maybe some teasing, but not contempt."

"I am sometimes a little too boastful," Reinhardt admitted, cheeks turning pink. "And perhaps I exaggerate the details on occasion. But only...a little," he said sheepishly, thumb and forefinger actually quite far apart.

"You have skills, and you're larger than life. Everyone enjoys a good story. Still not holding you in contempt."

Reinhardt flashed you a grateful smile. "I get too carried away and sometimes forget my own strength. I have broken several tablets already this year," he said, shaking his head. "Ziv has threatened to restrict my net access."

You snorted. "Ziv is a jerk."

"Ziv is a very helpful man," Reinhardt said, shaking his head. "I am just...clumsy."

"...Regrettable, but great strength is still not worthy of contempt. And I've broken a device or two out of sheer rage."
Reinhardt frowned at you, almost like this was some kind of competition, and you could picture a younger, brasher version constantly trying to one-up his comrades. Like Gabriel. Huh, some of Gabriel's hostility was starting to make sense. Well, that would get annoying; thankfully, he seemed to have mostly grown out of that. "...I am terrified of horror movies and stories," he whispered loudly. "I cannot watch them. If I do, I do not sleep for days. It is awful."

You smothered a laugh in your hand. "That's actually really cute, and again, not feeling the contempt." Though, if Gabriel knew that, that might have explained some of the attitude. Gabriel loved scary things, like Halloween, horror movies, and you in a blood-stained towel. If Jack, Ana, Torby, or the rest of the team made him cutback on that stuff because it gave Reinhardt nightmares, well, you could see where some of his resentment came from.

"So you don't think I've done anything to personally offend him?" Reinhardt asked. "What do you think I should do to...improve our relations? For the sake of team morale, of course," he added hastily.

"Of course." You blinked, not sure how to answer that question.

Gabriel thought Reinhardt was a buffoon. But if Reinhardt started smack talking Gabriel, you suspected that would backfire.

"I don't know if anything you do will have immediate results."

"I can be patient," Reinhardt said, a twinkle in his eye.

"...Uh huh," you said slowly. "Well, I guess you could just continue being nice to him. Not overly solicitous. He hates small talk. But I swear half his grumpiness comes from hunger. His tolerance for people crashes with his blood sugar. And he can't resist good Mexican food, spicy things, and deep fried meat." You paused. "I think he'd like currywurst." It wasn't quite as spicy as the food Gabriel cooked, but it was better than Jack's casseroles.

Reinhardt delicately held a pen and notepad in hand and was taking honest to God notes. "Desserts?"

"Nothing too sweet. Bittersweet chocolates, coffee flavors, alcoholic things like bourbon balls. He likes expensive scotch too." You paused. "You don't have to shower him with gifts, Rein. You're going to make me wonder if you're trying to woo my man."

Reinhardt threw his head back and laughed. "I have learned, from watching you, that bribery can be a good tool. And I like food. I will drop something off with him next time I go out for a bite. Just because I think he might like it. He may eat it. He may refuse it. He may dump in the garbage in front of me. But I will not be deterred. You are absolutely right, Lucky. I am not the kind of man who just gives up because things are difficult. Reyes may be a headstrong man, but I am even more stiff-necked. I befriended Torbjörn, after all. And we both know how fun he can be." Reinhardt winked at you. "Reyes doesn't stand a chance!"

You took a bite of your currywurst, half amused, half horrified by what you had just inspired.
Don't choke on the fluff. It gets everywhere!

I am remaining on tumblr till something better comes along or the situation gets even worse. Don't worry, I'll tell you guys what I'm doing when I know. As it stands, I'm barely on the computer right now because of my stupid wrists.

So, I am starting to recover, though I haven't done any writing this week, and am woefully behind. I'll probably have to change my home set up, but my wrists are starting to improve, I just have to wear the splints the entire time, improve my posture, stretch, and do some more resting.

Normally I'm 4 chapters ahead. I am only 1 chapter ahead. So hopefully I can catch up some next week. I've been outlining and plotting, but it doesn't do me any good if I can't actually write the scenes. The regular update schedule won't resume till I write more.

Hope everyone is doing well. Thank you for the good wishes.
Chapter 109

Chapter Summary

Interrogations with you on both sides of the table.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

You were doing paperwork remotely. Reinhardt was supposed to be doing his own work, though he kept pausing to watch videos with Isha and chuckling as she cuddled against his chest. You were still eating your way through the food Reinhardt had purchased. He'd gotten "enough for two people," which was more accurately enough for twelve people.

There was a knock on the door and then Captain Amari entered Reinhardt's office, her face grim. You looked up from your food, Isha already on her second helping.

The captain tossed her hat on a chair and gave the wall a frustrated glare. "Petras has moved to have you suspended for your "carelessness" during Family Day. There will be an investigation, and he's already assigned one of his political flunkies from outside the agency to conduct it."

You raised a brow. Well, if he couldn't kill you off immediately, it looked like he was going to drag your reputation through the mud. The joke was on him, your reputation was already messy. "Can't say I'm surprised."

"You will still be working Shit Spiders operations and attending to Blackwatch office work, but formally, you have been put on leave," Captain Amari said. "We have a few workarounds, and Gérard has already initiated one of his schemes, so things will move fast."

Reinhardt swore in German, his booming voice doing nothing to mask his dejection. "Ana! We cannot let this travesty-" He paused. "I am sorry, Lucky. I should not be the one shouting and carrying on. You are the one this affects."

"He will move for your dismissal," Captain Amari said. "And once he thinks you're vulnerable..."

Reinhardt's nostrils flared. "We would not just cast her out to the wolves!"

"Maybe I should visit Feng," you said, not because you were in a hurry to leave, but because you'd just had an idea. "I need more bullet ant venom. And Captain Amari needs a day out of the office?"

Captain Amari gave you a crooked smile. "Perhaps. But I don't know if we'll have time for temporary solutions. We've hit critical mass. Things are going to start heating up on all sides." She glanced at Isha. "You will need to keep your friends close."

Isha blinked and gave Captain Amari a suspicious look before shoving the rest of the currywurst into her mouth.
Reinhardt slumped beside you. "You were right, Lucky. It is terribly difficult to fight politicians. To seek out direct confrontation when they come at you so dishonorably. I wish I had better solutions to offer you."

You blinked, then carefully patted his arm, remembering that discussion you'd had after Hoffman tried to forcibly retire him. "I'll be OK," you said. "Feng's a great hostess and it will only be temporary."

"Yes, yes, I know," Reinhardt managed a wobbly smile. "She is something else! She nearly beat me in arm-wrestling with her little noodle arms! It was quite the match!" He paused, frowning as he stared sideways at you. "You don't think she let me win?"

"...Feng doesn't have great impulse control," you said, honestly not sure. "If you noticed, she tends to go all out," you continued, knowing that wasn't the entire truth. Feng played up that image, sure, but she was a lot more cunning than she acted.

"Ah, you are right. She does get very enthusiastic. I too am guilty of that." Reinhardt nodded cheerfully. "She invited me to Shanghai, said there were all kinds of restaurants I might enjoy."

"Feng does know how to have a good time," you said. "You should visit."

Captain Amari cleared her throat, giving Reinhardt an impatient look.

"I am in no hurry to see you off to Shanghai, but if you do go what can we do to make it easier on you?" Reinhardt asked. "Visit often? Kidnap Jack and Gabriel and make them visit more? Bring you cake and currywurst?" He trailed off, biting his lip.

"Yes," you said, your smile wobbling. "Yes."

"So you maintain that the vehicle malfunctioned?"

The woman in front of you was slim, elegant, and wearing an ivory skirt suit that cost more than your annual salary. You knew that, because Amélie wore suits from that designer, and casually tried to buy you one once. Her haircut was short, blunt, and you supposed it was flattering, and she had striking dark hair. She looked bitchy and expensive. She was a lawyer by training, a shark by nature. You wondered, idly, if that was Petras' type.

"Yes," you repeated, saying the word nice and slow, in case she failed to understand it again.

She glared at you for half a second, her skepticism obvious. Ms. Elizabeth Beaumont wielded her disdain like a finely honed blade. She never actually said a word that could be used against her in the transcripts, but her attitude, her facial expressions, her body language screamed hostility, disdain, and a myriad of other snobby feelings.

Beaumont was part of the civilian body that handled Overwatch disciplinary inquiries. Things usually got solved in-house, but that wasn't always the case. Her office handled high profile and politically-charged cases. It was independent of the Director's authority and of course, looked totally objective on paper. But you knew going into the conference room that Beaumont's
"Are you saying that Overwatch property wasn't properly maintained? Are you making allegations against Dr. Winston? What kind of expertise do you have on the subject?"

"It stopped working properly," was all you said. Because Lacroix had reminded you to keep your answers short and to the point. No attitude. No smart remarks. Pure professionalism and nonchalance.

"I asked you a question, agent," she snapped.

"You asked me three questions," you said blandly, keeping your tone even. Lacroix would probably facepalm at that, but you had tried to keep it civil. There was only so much intentional stupidity that a person could tolerate.

"Do you think this is some kind of joke?" She leaned over the table.

Was that another question? You swallowed that answer, and stared at her. "I don't find any of this amusing, ma'am. I'm a field agent, not a mechanic. All I can tell you is that the vehicle stopped working properly. The reason why is above my pay grade." And outside your jurisdiction, but you were keeping your answers short and sweet. Using small words. Letting her think you were just some dumb gun jockey.

"Your lack of cooperation has been noted," she scowled at you, tapping something onto her tablet.

There was a knock at the door and Beaumont rolled her eyes. "This is a private in camera," she said, giving you a dirty look, like you'd invited the party crashers.

You didn't bother shrugging, you just sat there, because honestly, you'd survived being grilled by Lacroix, Amélie, and your angry lovers. This bitch wasn't anything in comparison. Except kind of irritating.

Getting up in a huff, she flounced over to the door, and you eyed her stiletto heels, kind of hoping she'd break an ankle.

"...Strike Commander," Beaumont's voice went high. "What an honor." And then it went low, too low, and you narrowed your eyes, glancing at your left hand, knowing it would not take much effort to break one of those skinny joints as a warning.

"Ms. Beaumont," Jack said politely. "I'm sorry to interrupt."

"Yes, this is highly irregular. But I suppose your conscientiousness is to be lauded. Are you always so...hands-on?" she asked, and even if she had her back to you, you could practically hear her batting her fake lashes at him.

There was a moment of silence as Jack glanced over her shoulder at your face. His jaw twitched, like he was fighting a grin.

You felt the emotion melt off your face, your eyes boring into the back of Beaumont's delicate skull.

"I would not have interrupted, except Undersecretary Adawe has found your initial report to be most...enlightening. She is very interested in what you have to say and has expanded the investigation into Agent Strike's...accident. I believe it has gone to committee."
"It is most curious," Beaumont said scornfully, mistaking Jack's emphasis for the wrong kind of disbelief.

"Yes, well," Jack cleared his throat. "This is Ademola Oladele, from the Undersecretary's office. He is her representative on this issue and I understand he will be working with you on resolving this matter."

"Ms. Beaumont," a familiar voice said.

"Oh," Beaumont said, her voice going flat and oddly nasal.

"Charmed," Oladele said, as he brushed past Beaumont, his shrewd gaze falling on you. "Well Agent Strike, it seems your infamous luck has struck again." He shook his head in mock disappointment. "Is it really that difficult for you to avoid large scale property destruction?" You were a little surprised by the warm amusement in his voice. He extended his hand and you rose and shook it firmly, before he sat down.

"It was that or human casualties," you said. "I would have preferred neither."

"Do you two know each other?" Beamont scowled. "Because we cannot have a conflict of interest or even the appearances of-"

Well that was rich coming from a Petras pawn. But you just sat there, affecting a disinterested air.

"Oh my, are good manners now indicative of a conflict of interest? I never meant to be politically incorrect," Oladele laughed. "Well, it is good to see that you've recovered from that terrible attack on DC. " Oladele's eyes darkened for a moment, and then he was all smiles again. "Are you still attached to Blackwatch, Agent Strike?"

"I am," you said.

"That's a pity. Madame Kwento still very much disapproves of wetworks operations," Oladele continued. "You really should have found another division, Strike. She is just looking for an excuse. I'm afraid your life is about to get very complicated." He smiled cheerfully at Beaumont. "And I'm sure you have uncovered quite a bit of information that will help with that endeavor."

You blinked, a little surprised by Oladele's good mood and not entirely sure how to take his declarations. It seemed he was putting all the personal connections on the record, though you weren't sure if that was a "cover my ass" move or if he was issuing a challenge to Beaumont. He was taller than the lawyer, and his wounds from DC seemed to have healed up nicely. He still had a distinct scar that cut through both of his eyebrows, but with some careful hair styling, he managed to keep it mostly concealed. You'd only seen him in armor and security uniform. Today he wore a navy blue suit with gold accents. He looked more like a politician than a soldier, and that surprised you.

"I...have just begun my investigation," Beaumont said, sweat beading on her upper lip.

Oladele shot you an amused look. "It sounded to me like you were very certain of Agent Strike's culpability."

"I am merely going by the facts of the case," Beaumont said, clearly unhappy about the additional scrutiny.
"Mmm, the facts that you haven't completely gathered yet?" Oladele gave another good natured laugh. "Come now, Counsellor, you must have some clever trick up your sleeve. I've seen your work before. You're too smart to make that kind of rookie mistake." He rested his chin on his hands.

"You seem to be very familiar with the parties involved and the situation," Beaumont said tautly.

"It is my job to know things," Oladele said, not losing his smarmy grin. "And I have my own sources." He folded his hands together, in a way that reminded you strongly of Zenyatta, and you had to cover your mouth.

"Well, I see," Beaumont cleared her throat. "You'll have to tell me all about them."

"I don't have to do any such thing," he said, still beaming at her. "But it is cute how you think you can order me around, Ms. Beaumont. I am here at the behest of the Overwatch Affairs Committee. The Undersecretary herself has personally tasked me to oversee this investigation while giving the Committee regular updates."

"Now listen here-" Beaumont was turning a blotchy shade of red.

Oladele gave you a smile that shouted, "can you believe this bitch?" You felt the corner of your mouth turn upward. "Must we do this with an audience? I thought your people were professional about maintaining the proper chain of command."

Beaumont glared at Oladele, then you. "You are dismissed, Strike. I will see to you later."

Oladele's grin widened. "Run along, Strike. It looks like we have a jurisdictional pissing match to settle."

"I'll take my leave," you said, unspeakably grateful to get away from Beaumont, but maybe a little disappointed that you didn't get to watch Oladele string her along.

You walked into Gabriel's room, in time to see Jack pinned on his back, against the couch, Gabriel's fingers laced in his hair. You didn't hear what he said, but Jack nodded vigorously, before both men looked up. Gabriel sighed and released Jack. Jack just grinned at you, his cheeks pink.

"How bad?" Gabriel asked.

"It wasn't fun, but now that Oladele's here and in full interference mode, I don't think Beaumont is going to have a good time."

"Didn't expect Kwento to intervene quite so directly, but she's supposedly looking for Blackwatch mishandlings. I'm hoping she is just using that as a cover and not planning to backstab us later, but-" Gabriel trailed off. "But maybe you'd rather talk about something else."

"Just fighting the urge to sabotage Beaumont's car," you said, taking off your shoes and dropping onto Gabriel's couch.

"She was giving you that hard of a time?" Gabriel frowned.
"No, the bitch was practically drooling on Jack," you said, rolling your fingers. "Oh Strike Commander, you're so hands-on. And I know what parts I want your hands on," you said, mimicking her breathy tone.

Jack just laughed, and leaned over, both hands cupping your cheeks as he kissed you. "That snaky bitch can keep her cold hands to herself. The only woman I want to put my hands all over is you."

"She better," you growled. "Or she'll lose them."

Gabriel laughed, and wrapped an arm around your waist. "You're so cute when you're murderously jealous."

"Adorable," Jack teased, pulling on your cheeks with both hands. He tugged the skin upward. "There's that deranged smile-"

You huffed, as he released your face.

Jack laughed resting his head in Gabriel's shoulder. "I didn't think your face was so stretchy, baby. I just want to squeeze-"

You launched yourself at him, smiling a more comfortably deranged smile. Jack swore as you tackled him off the couch and onto the floor. Gabriel was laughing too hard to interfere.

"I'll show you "stretchy," Francis!" You shouted, pulling on his face.

"Gabe! Help!" Jack laughed as you pulled on his face. "Ow!"

"I'll squeeze you!" You continued pinching his cheeks, and it was kind of addictive, almost therapeutic.

"OW! Gabe!" Jack raised his hips and flipped your off him, quickly pouncing on top of you before you had a chance to mount another assault. Still chuckling, he pinned you on your back, his hips to yours. Breathing hard, you grinned at him as he kissed you softly instead of pulling on your face.

"Feeling better, killer?"

"Yeah," you sighed, laying flat on the floor. "But that's not free license to go around tugging on my face when I'm in a bad mood."

Jack kissed your nose. "But it's so stupid, it works."

Gabriel snorted, and knelt by your head. He gazed at Jack fondly. "That is his tagline."

"Really?" Jack scowled with mock ferocity.

"Yeah," Gabriel murmured, cupping Jack's face. "That, and "so goddamn beautiful, I can't think straight."

"Oh. Copy. Understood. Words brain," Jack blinked a few times, suddenly bright red. "I...does that sentence even make sense?"

"Don't know," Gabriel said, leaning in for a kiss. "Can't think straight."
"You were right," Távio muttered as he walked beside you carrying a squirmy Isha who wore Torby's modified Blackwatch armor. She wasn't crazy about it, but she had stopped trying to wiggle out of it.

"I know," you said, absently, reviewing your notes.

Távio sighed. "Can you not sound so smug about it?"

You looked up, a little surprised by his dejected expression. "That was a blanket statement, Távio. The things I tell you are generally right. The things I do..." You shrugged. "What specifically was I right about?"

Távio squinted at you, not looking amused. "Ainsley."

Your arms dropped to your sides. "I've said a lot of shit about Overwatch Barbie," you said. "You're really going to have to be more specific."

"And I really thought she'd stepped up, and gotten over herself," Távio muttered. "She was so...open. I thought she was serious about changing." He glared at the floor.

"Wait a minute, were you and Ainsley...hanging out?" You asked, a little surprised. You almost asked if Riggs was with them, and then realized you did not need to open that can of worms.

Távio just patted Isha's head for a few seconds. "I mean, only a few times. We just got coffee and chatted. Nothing too private. I didn't violate any security clearances. And I damn well understand why you were so hesitant to trust her. She's a goddamn coward."

You blinked. "You didn't talk to her about her uncle, did you?"

"No, she came to me, to ask how to talk to you," Távio scowled. "She wouldn't explain anything, but kept asking me hypothetical questions about loyalty and whistle blowing. I didn't let anything slip, but she got real defensive when I told her that I didn't protect abusive family members. She's not the only one who had an uncle who couldn't keep his hands off younger girls," Távio snarled. "And even if I was a little kid, I sure as hell didn't stand for that!"

You stared at the ceiling. You'd been wrong to think of Távio "as just a kid." He was still very immature, in a lot of ways. But he'd had a hard childhood. He'd grown up too fast. And while he tolerated your fussing, he was an adult. You had to remind yourself of that. "You've developed a stronger sense of personal responsibility than Ainsley."

"And a backbone," Távio spat. "After her chat with you, she came whining to me about how hard things were and how everyone was mad at her-"

You snorted. "I was polite. A little mean," you said with a grin. "But in an underhanded way."

"That comes with the territory, ma'am. I would expect nothing less: Blackwatch pride, Blackwatch petty." He gave you a salute and you raised a brow, because you were pretty sure you hadn't shared that joke with any of the recruits.

"Agent McCree educated me. Ma'am," he said, apparently reading the look on your face.
"I see. So you and Ainsley talk a lot?"

"...She doesn't seem to have a lot of friends," he said awkwardly. "We'd just talk in passing. Sometimes get coffee or food together. Nothing serious."

You nodded, remembering that Távio was an attractive young man, and wondering what Ainsley's angle was.

"But she came to me about how you were mad at her and...I lost my temper. Shouldn't have done that. She ran off crying." Távio shrugged. "But I don't care. She had it coming." He gave you a serious look. "You were right about her. Sorry I tried to."

"You weren't wrong to ask me to be kind her," you said, thinking back on your conversation with Reinhardt. "It's easy to be indifferent and watch someone flounder. It's much harder to put yourself out there and help someone." You shook your head. "I'm not saying everyone deserves help or that any of it is your responsibility, but it was good of you to speak to me candidly about her. It was generous of you to go to bat for her. Whether or not she deserves it. I'm not sore at you for that."

Távio looked at the floor. "Oh. OK."

"I'm disappointed in her," you said. "If that's what friendship means to her, then you understand why she doesn't have many friends. But I'm not losing sleep over it. Ainsley has to live with herself. I've got more important things to deal with."

Távio nodded thoughtfully.

"That doesn't mean I don't screw with her mind from time to time," you said with a grin. "But it's all little stuff." Because not even Reinhardt could stop you from being petty. You were vindictive by nature.

He laughed at that. "No bullet ant venom?"

"Not this time." You quirked your lips. "Now stop making me smile, agent. I have to look mean and intimidating for this interrogation."

"Ma'am," Távio said, getting the door for you. Amélie was already in the observation room, dressed in full uniform and looking quite debonair. "I look forward to watching you and Agent Lacroix work."

"I'll be back for you," you said, setting Isha down in a chair and patting her head. "Remember what we practiced."

Isha narrowed her eyes at you, flashing her teeth, a low threatening growl emanating from the back of her throat. She raised her little hands like she was going to strike.

"Perfect," you said. "Now don't scare Távio, OK?"

Your murderbird just regarded the younger man with flat cold eyes.

Távio flashed you a panicked look. "Good...Isha." He slowly reached into his pocket and pulled out one of the lamb jerky treats you'd given him. He made no sudden movements, so as not to startle the vicious predator, and carefully offered her a pieces as you went over to Amélie to review strategy.
"That looks terribly uncomfortable," Amélie said, wincing in "sympathy as she stared at Bakker's scratched up face. His eye socket remained bandaged, and you sat back in your chair, unable to get the nasty smug grin off your face. That part wasn't acting, it was real as could be.

"Come on, Lacroix," you said, with a hint of scorn, though it seemed weird to call Amélie that. "If you're going to be in Overwatch, you have to get used to all kinds of gruesome things, Bakker's face included. Personally, I think it's an improvement."

Amélie wrinkled her nose at you, but said nothing.

Bakker's functional eye darted between the two of you, his hands cuffed to close together. His gaze lingered on you too long, like he was surprised to see that you were still alive. So he knew about Sakai's little bout of sabotage. That wasn't surprising. What else did he know?

"Well come on, we don't have all day," you said, crossing your arms. You gave Amélie a disdainful glare. "You can try chatting his ear off all you like, Lacroix. Reyes trusts me, and my tools, to get answers out of them much faster."

Bakker's already pale face whitened and he bit his lip, because he was in Overwatch, and there'd been all kinds of rumors about your unsavory actions. This was one of the few times you got to benefit from your undeserved reputation.

Amélie stiffened, her posture excellent, and she only gave the faintest hint of irritation, but Bakker was watching her, wondering how "good" the good cop was.

"His name isn't Luuk Bakker," Amélie told you primly. "He is actually Renier Van Wyck, a former NIA operative out of Johannesburg."

You blinked, feigning surprise. "No wonder you changed your name," you muttered, giving Amélie a dirty look. " Didn't think to share that with the class, Lacroix?"

"I am here to demonstrate my methods," Amélie said coolly, looking down her nose at you. "Which are more refined than just cutting pieces off of people."

You shrugged. "It works. Here, let me show you-

Bakker scooted back in his chair, breathing heavily as he stared at you. "She's right. My real name is Renier Van Wyck. And there's nothing wrong with my name, it's a family name!" He glanced wildly between the two of you.

"See? Van Wyck has a background in intelligence. He understands how this works," Amélie inclined her head at him.

"Spies lie," you said, sounding bored. "But sometimes if you break them, you'll get enough truth to make it worth your while. It's just extra hard work, but that's OK. I'm real motivated after what went down this weekend. I don't mind going into overtime."

Van Wyck began to hyperventilate.

"It's unnecessary," Amélie said coolly. "Spies understand deals. And a man who has been "dead" as long as Monsieur Van Wyck, might be interested in coming in from the cold."
"I'll tell you everything," he said, beady eyes focusing hopefully on Amélie. He licked his lips. "My name is Renier Van Wyck. I was approached by a UN representative about...monitoring internal communications within Overwatch. It was supposed to be a watchdog position. I-"

"Liar," you breathed with a nasty smile, as you leaned over the table. "Look at his weasel face. Lacroix. You can't trust him to tell the truth."

"It's the truth!" He protested, sweat beading on his forehead as he glanced hopefully at Amélie. "You haven't even heard-"

"She is right," Amélie said, shaking her head sadly. "We know you were recruited by a PMC, possibly representing a UN representative, but not as a watchdog. No, Monsieur Van Wyck, you were planted as a spy."

"Told you," you muttered, giving Amélie a smirk. "Maybe you should just pick up your tutu on the way out."

"While Agent Strike has uncanny instincts, rather like a wild animal," Amélie said, not deigning to look at you. "This situation requires more finesse."

You snorted.

"Please try again," Amélie said. "Before Agent Strike thinks she can take over this case."

Van Wyck shuddered and looked away. "I was asked to spy for a UN representative. The money was very good, and the job seemed...easy. I let the computer do most of the work. I just filtered through the comms channels, keeping an ear out for anything relevant to my employer's interests. I never hurt anyone."

"And who was your employer?" Amélie asked.

Van Wyck stared at the table. "I...I'm afraid I need some guarantees, Agent Lacroix."

"Oh, I can guarantee you something," you said cheerfully, both palms slapping the table. "I have all kinds of guarantees I can make-"

Van Wyck winced. "You can't just give me to Lucky Strike when you're done. I've heard how she keeps Reyes' pressganged psychopaths in line, and you can't do that to me. Please-"

You raised a brow, wondering what rumors Tataryn had been spreading now. Well, to be fair, it didn't have to be Tataryn, but he did have a history of it.

"She doesn't have the clearance-" You sneered.

"But my husband does," Amélie said, crossing her arms. "I can put a good word in with him. Despite the rumors, I still have more influence with him, than she does."

You made a face, a very scrunched unhappy face, at her implications.

"All right," Van Wyck inhaled, his eyes on Amélie's face, searching for any signs of deception. "It was through a shell corporation, and several blinds, but it was Ambassador Anh Nguyen behind it all."

Amélie narrowed her eyes. "Have you any proof?"

"...I kept some leverage," Van Wyck said, licking his lips. "I'll deal. But I want to walk away from thi-

"Fuck this," you snarled, jumping to your feet. "We don't have to give this bastard a goddamn thing! I'll pry the answers out of him with a fucking crowbar!" You walked around the side of the table, one hand gripping Van Wyck's collar.

Amélie was suddenly on her feet. "Agent Strike! That is enough!" She shouted, one hand on your arm. "You're out of line! Stand down!"

You glared at her. "You're too soft for this, Lacroix."

"You're too hotheaded," she scowled. "Maybe you need to step outside for a moment."

Glowering at her, you released Van Wyck. "Oh, you going to charm the answers out of him, ballerina? Fine. But when you fail, he's mine," you grinned, rolling your shoulders and flexing your prosthetic fingers. "And you can see how a professional gets the job done."

Amélie swallowed audibly. "I don't think your skills will be necessary, Agent Strike. Monsieur Van Wyck is a reasonable man who wishes to cut a deal. I'm sure he is coming to understand that it is in his very best interest to be cooperative."

"Uh huh," you said, looking between them. "Fine. I'll take a walk." You stormed out of the interrogation room, slamming the door behind you.

Távio sat there, giving you a slightly concerned look. Isha was on the chair beside him, eating more jerky.

"Hey, don't eat too much," you scolded with a grin. "You're up next."

She cocked her head to the side, baring her teeth. She curled her claws menacingly at you.

"Yeah, like that. Intimidating." You grinned, watching Amélie hesitantly apologize for your "unprofessional behavior." Van Wyck wore an earnest look, but all of you knew better than to buy into his act. He was obviously latching on to Amélie as his potential savior, but he still thought he could manipulate her. You were going to change that power balance here in a moment. But you would have to wait for Amélie's cue.

So you sat down, put your feet up, and watched the show.

Amélie was good. The conversation occasionally derailed into more personal territory. Van Wyck liked whale-watching, coincidentally Amélie had seen the noble creatures on her last vacation to Greece. It was a spiritual experience. She then caught herself, embarrassed by her "honesty," and looked away. Van Wyck's expression softened momentarily, and you weren't missing the admiring looks he kept sending her way.

They talked about the NIA, about the stresses of deep cover, and about why he took the job. There were holes in his story, but Amélie didn't pounce on them. Instead she asked more questions, forcing him to elaborate. He could tell a long convoluted story that would collapse on itself upon repeated examination, or he could try to backpedal and "reveal" the truth. He seemed to be doing the latter, a possible result of you calling him out on his lie earlier, but mostly because he had taken the hook and now he didn't want to disappoint Amélie.

Ziv had decrypted some of Sakai's devices, and Van Wyck had been revealed as another Petras pawn. It was clever to try to shift the blame on Nguyen, but watching him lie gave you a good hint on his tells: his micro-expressions, body language, and attempts to convey sincerity. He was a solid actor, any spy working deep cover had to be. But he was playing against your team of you and Amélie. He didn't stand a chance.

"Espionage is a very lonely field," Amélie said, her expression poignant. A different tone and it could have taken another subtext, but she kept words thoughtful and bordering sympathetic. "It must have difficult assuming another identity. I have had to live undercover for months at a time, but years? That is quite the sacrifice."

Van Wyck gave her a sheepish smile. "There was a lot about my old life that...well, I didn't miss it. I was actually pretty happy here. The pay was good, the work was exciting, and I wasn't doing anything reprehensible, not really."

"Until last weekend," Amélie said, frowning.

Van Wyck bit his lip and looked away.

"Strike was guarding children, ages four and eight. And while I question the wisdom of allowing her near impressionable young minds, they were nearly killed by Sakai's sabotage."

Van Wyck inhaled sharply. As he had probably been the one to report your registration to Sakai, the presence of children should not have surprised him. Was he feigning shock? Or did he not realize that you knew about Sakai?

"I didn't know," he said, voice oddly flat.

Amélie gave him a disappointed look. "Renier, I thought we were going to be honest with each other. You help me. I help you. But I cannot do that if you are going to try to deceive me and throw my efforts back in my face."

"Amélie, I-

"You are lying to me," she said, watching him with wounded eyes. And it was absolutely cutting. You could see the cords in his neck tightening and his fingers clenching.

"No, of course not!"

Amélie's frown deepened. "And now you attempt to lie to me more? What kind of fool do you think I am? I was married to a spy for years! You don't think I know when I'm being lied to?" She stood abruptly.

"No, that's not it. I was just-

"They were children, Renier," she said, shaking her head. "I think I need some fresh air," she said, opening the interrogation room door and stepping out without looking back.

Van Wyck stared dumbly at her and then the door, regret clear on his face.

You grinned as Amélie sauntered over. "You're too good at baiting these traps," you told her.
"You understand now why my family motto is "chasseurs toujours"?"

"Definitely, and wow, you didn't even need to throw the big guns of sexiness at him," you said, shaking your head.

"Too obvious," she said, winking at you. "And I don't try to enchant just anyone, Chanceux. I must say, I am impressed and slightly worried by how convincing you are at playing a psychopath."

"It's a Blackwatch thing," you said, amused by Távio's obvious relief. "We practice our scary faces and try to see who comes off as the most deranged. Genji's been winning for the past few months, but Tataryn is pretty good at it when he actually tries." Though you weren't so sure that Tataryn and Genji were play-acting. Everyone in Blackwatch had...baggage.

"All right. Did you want to let him stew for a few, or should I go in there?"

"Let him sit," Amélie said, her expression thoughtful. "You cannot just burst in there with Isha. I know you planned to rile him up. Perhaps you should bring up his parents who died during his absence. They were estranged, but such reminders do throw people off balance."

"I'll get him riled up, get pissed off at him for coping an attitude, and bring in the murderbird," you said. "That should really upset him."

"All right," Amélie said. "I will sit back and enjoy the show with Távio. Are you finding this to be educational?" She gave him a bright smile.

"I...yes?" He rubbed the back of his neck.

"You've done some hustling," you said. "What are your thoughts?"

"Umm," Távio stared straight ahead, watching the anxious man rapidly glancing between the door and the two-way mirror, trying to figure out if Amélie was really upset or just watching him freak out. "When Agent Lacroix goes back inside, maybe she can commiserate with him about having dead but estranged parents, and how the unfinished business weighs on one's mind. Maybe prime him for confessions."

"Oh, someone has been doing their reading," you said with a laugh.

Távio shrugged, a little embarrassed.

Amélie clapped her hands together. "Very dramatic," she said, nodding in approval. "All right, Chanceux, you're up."

Grinning you stood, took a deep breath, and pasted Gabriel's pettiest, most vicious smile on your face. This was going to be fun.

You swaggered into the interrogation room, and Van Wyck's head snapped back in surprise. You left the door slightly ajar, and Van Wyck's rapid eye movement picked that up too.

"Looks like Lacroix failed," you said, shaking your head with mock regret. "Big surprise. Now we do things my way."

Van Wyck swallowed audibly. "I'd rather talk to Am- Agent Lacroix."

"I bet you would," you said. "She's too soft. A goddamn ballerina of all things. But you know that already. You're a smart man. And a liar. I don't think you actually worked for Nguyen. It's a good cover, but it doesn't feel right." You tapped your nose. "Nguyen's people never give her up that easily." You shook your head with mock sorrow, like you knew this from very personal experience. "It usually takes some blood flowing to get the tongues wagging."

Van Wyck shivered as you took off your left glove. "That's not necessary, Strike. Really."

"You made it necessary," you sneered. "A lying piece of shit like you doesn't have any real loyalty. So I have to remind you that it's in your best interest to cooperate. Unfortunately, you seem to think I'm as dumb as Lacroix. And that just won't fly." You patted his cheek roughly. "You see, Van Wyck, I knew you were treacherous scum. Your own parents died of broken hearts after you faked your death and took this mission. How fucking heartless is that?" You laughed.

"Shut up," Van Wyck snarled. "You don't know anything." He was on his feet, hands still cuffed in front of him. "You don't know a goddamn thing!"

"Sit down," you said coldly. "Or I will make you."

Van Wyck glared at you, but dropped back into his chair.

"Now, as I was saying, you're a lying sack of shit, who's been trying to string poor Lacroix along. But your sad story doesn't mean a thing to me. Just like Sakai's story didn't mean a goddamn thing to me." You gave him a cruel smile, because he had no idea what had happened to Sakai. Sure, Richard Prince had killed her, but he didn't need to know that.

Van Wyck flinched.

"I got a lot of answers out of her," you said, flexing your blade fingers. "But there are still gaps. And perhaps I broke her a little too quickly. That's the only reason you're still alive, pissant."

The sweat was really dripping down his face now.

"It was Nguyen!" He shouted at you. "She's got a base in Hanoi! I swear to you!"

"Not good enough. But don't worry. I have an old friend of yours." You opened the door and Isha strutted in. She screeched when she saw him, flashing teeth and talons. She leapt onto the chair and the table, shrieking the entire time.

"No! No! No! Keep it away from me!" He screamed, trying to scoot backward in the chair, though it was bolted to the ground.

"Oh, but she liked that bite of you so much, she wants more. I think you can start from the feet," you told her, and Isha hopped off the table. "And you certainly don't need both eyes to tell me about your so-called leverage."

Van Wyck let out a bloodcurdling scream and kicked frantically. "Stop! Stop! I'll talk! Please!"

The door slammed open and Amélie was there, hair flying behind her as she charged in. "What do you think you are doing, Agent Strike? And why have you brought that rabid beast in here?" She shouted, cheeks flushed.

"She's hungry, and if he's not going to tell the truth-"

"I'll talk! I'll talk! It wasn't Nguyen! I was Director Petras I swear! I'll tell you everything,
"Strike, remove that beast immediately, or I will report you to the Strike Commander."

You snorted, and picked up the hissing and spitting Isha as she clacked her teeth at Van Wyck, slavering viciously. She kicked and fluttered, making quite the show, and you had a hard time holding on to her.

"Oh, but she likes him," you purred.

"Out, now," Amélie said, steel in her voice.

Laughing, you carried your maiming bird out of the interrogation room as Van Wyck began to spill the beans, alternating between thanking Amélie for the rescue, and telling her as much as he could about the Director's involvement.

"Who's my big intimidating baby?" You teased, giving Isha more jerky and a fig. She happily took one in each hand and shoved both into her mouth. Távio sat beside you, shaking his head. Lacroix, the mustached one, had shown up, while you were in there, and brought more treats for Isha.

Van Wyck was still talking, and Lacroix had a faintly amused smile in place. "She is very good at this," he mused.

"Amélie? Or Isha?"

"Isha performed very well, but Amélie already has him eating out of her hand," Lacroix said with a wistful sigh. "I am grateful you were here to keep her in check, Chanceux. If she used any more charm, Van Wyck would be declaring his love and begging her for absolution. As it stands, he's just telling her as much as he can in the hopes that she will protect him from you. " Lacroix laughed into his cuff.

"Amélie wants to be the bad cop next time," you said, not rising to his bait.

To your surprise, Lacroix's smile only widened, his expression almost dreamy. "Oh Chanceux, I would not miss that for the world. I think you would enjoy it too. Maybe a little too much." He winked at you.

You rested your face in your palm, unable to formulate a response to that.

Wrists are getting better. Trying to catch up, but fdkjlfadlkjfadkljfdkljdf. Winter is always stressful for me. Not just because I was in retail for so long. Some of it is the lack of sunlight, but there's a good deal of personal shit. Anyway, hope everyone else has their holiday shopping done and is having a lovely time.
...I bought some presents for people from Russia last month and am really hoping they make it in time.
Chapter 110

Chapter Summary

Plans within plans.

Chapter Notes

We have officially broken 800k.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Sitting in Gabriel's office, you glanced between Tataryn and Gabriel. Both men wore grim expressions, and you sighed, not liking it when they matched.

"What?"

"Someone sabotaged the brakeline to one of our motorpool vehicles," Gabriel said.

You raised a brow. "Cameras?"

"Painted over. But an Athena drone caught the perpetrator on her camera. I have Jesse handling it."

"OK," you said, looking at Tataryn. "Then why do you both look like someone drank the last mug of coffee?"

"I took the liberty of reserving that vehicle in your name. Just to see what would happen," Tataryn said. "Had it been safe, I would have driven Kseniya back to campus in it."

"...Oh," you said, sitting back in your chair. A penal investigation and another murder attempt in one week. Things were escalating too fast. "So...I shouldn't be renting cars any time soon. Got it."

"I'll be meeting with Prince later today," Gabriel said, shaking his head. "Unless he has anything groundbreaking, we'll proceed with Hanoi as planned."

"...And my status?" You asked, voice soft, because you already knew the answer.

Gabriel sighed, shaking his head. "We'll talk about that later. After I've dealt with Prince, all right?" He jammed his hands in his pockets, beanie hanging low over his eyes.

"I'll start packing then," you said, trying to sound light-hearted, and failing.

Tataryn sighed, crossing his arms. "I am going to take Kseniya back to school. Things are getting too hot here. But I will be back, to help you solve your problems. Do not worry, boss, Lucky. Your Fedya is on the case." He gave an elaborate bow, before sliding out of the office.
You massaged your temples. "Isn't Jesse already-?"

"Yeah," Gabriel pulled his hat off and rubbed his forehead. "He keeps offering to call in some of his "friends" from the "bad old days" as a favor. If I hadn't already spent years busting my ass to keep his identity under wraps, I'd let him." Gabriel came over to your desk. "Do you want to take a trip to New York? That's where Petras is right now."

Your lips curved upward and you pulled Gabriel down for a kiss. He gripped the edge of your desk, mouth gentle against yours.

"So, New York?" He murmured, dark eyes soft as he studied your face.

"I want to." You exhaled slowly. "But it's not enough. I don't just want to kill him, I want to ruin him. I want the entire world to know exactly what kind of scum he is. I want to expose all his bullshit and scheming to the light of day. I want everyone to see him and his allies fucking burn for their sins and I want to show everyone this is what happens when you betray us."

Gabriel chuckled, a predatory light in his eyes. "Keep talking dirty, hermosa. You're going to make me late for my appointment."

"I was sad, Gabriel," you said, reaching for his hand. "I was goddamn heartbroken at the thought of having to leave." Your voice shook and he squeezed your fingers gently. "For the first few days, that was all I could think of. How terrible it was. How much it would hurt. How worried I would be."

"I know," he said. "And I'm sorry."

"And somewhere between rage and overactive scheming, I hit zen. Not the omnic, the state of mind," you added quickly. "Knowing that everyone was willing to step up and cover for me, knowing that I didn't have to run away, well, that helped a lot. But it also reminded me that Petras needs to be brought down. That we need to make a fucking example of him. And if we're going to do that properly, we can't just kill him and make it look like an accident." You kissed Gabriel's knuckles. "I can disappear for a little while. Let him get comfortable again. Let him think he's won. Because it'll be worth it in the end. Because you'll be waiting for me when I get home, and you're going to cook me a fantastic welcome home meal and Jack's going to be there to pour drinks, then we'll try to make it to the bedroom, and we won't leave for days."

Gabriel exhaled slowly. "Of course, corazon. He kissed your knuckles. "But give us another week to get everything prepared. Then you can take your Shanghai vacation."

"I've already got a few projects prepped. Feng keeps good intel on the Shimada. But we need more on Lucheng and Vishkar, mostly Vishkar, because they're fronting too many Talon ploys. And of course, I can do Hanoi groundwork, if I go there beforehand."

Gabriel gave you a wry smile. "I'm glad you're feeling better about it. Because I'm still feeling guilty about letting you go."

"...You and Jack can come too. Maybe Feng will give you baby raptors and-"

"Now you're just being ridiculous," Gabriel said, kissing your nose. "We can talk more about this later. I need to go."

"I'll be here, doing paperwork," you said.

"Genji will be by soon. He's watching your back till I'm done."
"...OK," you said, with a heavy sigh. Because having Genji in the office wasn't your favorite thing.

"He has work to do too. He won't be bothering you," Gabriel said, putting his hat back on.

"That's what you think," you muttered.

"Would you rather I sent Hanzo?" Gabriel asked, raising a brow. "Because that can also be arranged."

"Nope, I'm good. Genji's great. Everything's fine. Save all your pent-up meanness for Prince, OK?"

"I have to be civil with Prince," Gabriel said dryly. "We've made a connection, you see."

Rolling your eyes, you went back to your paperwork.

"Huh, wasn't expecting you to visit again," Prince said, leaning back in his seat. "In fact, was expecting a little more static for how things went down last weekend."

Gabriel smiled thinly. "Why?"

"Killed that agent, didn't I? Sakai was it? Knocked around some of your medics. Tried to kill Bái Shé, but that one agent...Lucky Something or Other, got in the way."

"That the second time she's come after me. Does she have personal beef or something?"

"She was in DC during the attacks. Had some encounters with your people. You know how women can be. Overly emotional."

"That explains it then," Prince said with a nod. "Some people take things too personally."

"I'll keep that in mind," Gabriel said, the words coming out smoothly, despite the dull roar blood pounding in his ears. Prince had just signed his death warrant, though Gabriel would have to work out a more...comprehensive plan. Couldn't have the "Most Valuable Prisoner" turning up dead in Blackwatch care. It would have to be after they transferred custody. Tataryn or the Shimadas were the best choice if he wanted to make it look like an accident...

"Oh, she's one of your agents. I forgot how Mama Bear you get when they're threatened. It's an admirable trait in a CO."

"I think your problems started a lot earlier than that."

Prince gave that armless shrug again. "Probably. Now, I have to admit, I'm a little disappointed. Are you going soft, Reyes? After that jailbreak last weekend, I thought you'd be more upset. You aren't growing fond of me, are you?"

"I have to be civil with Prince," Gabriel said dryly. "We've made a connection, you see."

"I have to be civil with Prince," Gabriel said dryly. "We've made a connection, you see."

Rolling your eyes, you went back to your paperwork.
"Such a masochist," Gabriel said, shaking his head. "You talk like I should be upset. You killed Sakai. So what? Good riddance. She was a traitor working with Petras to get you out of the picture before we could question you further. Sure, Morrison isn't happy, but I think you did us a favor. If we took her into custody, we'd have to go to trial, make a big circus of it. As it stands, she's dead, and the problem is gone. Leak plugged. Thanks, Dick."

Prince blinked a few times. "So you know about Petras. Huh."

Gabriel leaned back. He could see the gears grinding in Prince's head. "I know that you weren't getting to go spend your money on a retirement in paradise," Gabriel said. "Not that it matters. You went to Bái Shé to confirm the existence of the conditioning, instead of trying to escape."

"...Have to say, Reyes. It's kind of impressive how right you've been so far. Makes me wonder what else you know." Prince stared at him, those shark eyes flat. "Makes me wonder why you're keeping me around."

"Oh, plenty of people want to take you out back and hook you up with a nine millimeter pension plan. Believe it or not, I think that's shortsighted. Because in Blackwatch, we recruit useful people. Waste not, want not."

Prince threw his head back and laughed. "Oh, I'd heard. I just didn't think you'd apply that to me."

Gabriel shrugged.

Prince held his chin up at a cocky angle. "So what do you want from me?"

Gabriel rolled his eyes. "If you have to ask, you aren't nearly as smart as we've given you credit for."

"You want information on Nguyen's properties in Hanoi," he said, flatly.

Gabriel leaned forward. "That would be a good start."

"And what do I get out of it?"

"If you managed to escape, do you think Petras or Nguyen would just let you live?" Gabriel asked. "Would they believe that we hadn't let you go, because you gave us some interesting intel? How about the conditioning? Know you weren't a fan of that, and even if we're enemies, I haven't lied to you at all. And right there we've been better than your former employer. You killed Sakai? Thanks. I think you've demonstrated some good behavior, which earns you some lenience."

Prince blinked a few times. "You must think I'm some kind of fool-"

"No, Prince. I'm a practical man. You have a use, I have a need. You make a lot of assumptions based on society's hypocritical moralistic norms. I'm a fucking black ops commander. I don't care what people think. I get the job done, and if it violates some snowflake's empty morals, so what? I'd like to see them do better."

Prince smiled. "Huh. Well, that's refreshing." He looked around. "Remind me of the date again."
Frowning, Gabriel told him.

"Hmm, well, if you're going into Hanoi with your cyborg friends, you might want to do it sooner rather than later. Nguyen was installing a new defensive AI seed in a few weeks. Fries unauthorized omnics and cyborgs. She would have done it sooner, but getting the parts upgrades was trickier than we expected. She had to call in some special favors, and there aren't a lot of places producing that kind of tech."

"Omnic make?" Gabriel asked on a whim.

Prince smirked. "You have done your homework. Yeah, we had to go Russia to source some things. Numbani suddenly stopped dealing with us."

Gabriel nodded, brain making too many connections too quickly. "Not the Mediterranean?"

"Petras is the one dealing with them, by proxy of a proxy, of course. Fuckers have a hair trigger. Won't talk to anything organic. You have to pay the right kind of omnic to go underwater."

Gabriel felt the world grind to a standstill. He blinked very slowly.

"They've been giving you trouble in that region, haven't they?" Prince chuckled. "Don't know much about his plans, but I've got my theories. He and Nguyen don't care for each other much. Just worked together on DC because of Kwento and because the rest of the Talon bigwigs wanted to make the city burn. Nguyen has her own crusade. Has a real bleeding heart for the tin cans. But Petras? He just another politician. Scum scrabbling for power." Prince shook his head. "It's fucking disheartening to see how one blowhard draft-dodging coward could climb so high."

"Yeah," Gabriel said. "Imagine working for him."

Prince laughed. "Why do you think I quit the Army, Reyes? You were smart to get out. Maybe not to end up on the back shelf in Overwatch, but we can't all be perfect. I'm starting to see the light, Reyes. Maybe I want to help out. My poor underdeveloped conscience is starting to twinge." Prince smirked. "And maybe I miss real sunlight. None of that filtered UV shit."

"You know," Gabriel said. "Originally, I was just going to cut you till you begged me to let you die." He laughed. "But that was considered inhumane."

Prince smiled thinly. "And now?"

"And now I'm dying to see just how much trouble you can stir up."

Prince leaned forward in his seat. "For the right price? A whole damn lot."

"I'm listening," Gabriel said, knowing then that he had won this round.

Sprawled out across Jack's couch, you petted Isha's head, half-dozing as she snuggled against your chest. The door clicked shut, and you slowly opened your eyes.

Jack leaned over the back of the couch, still in uniform, grinning at you. "Hey, sleepyhead."

"What time is it?"

"Just after 1800 hours." He bent over and kissed you, and mouth insistent against yours.
"Gabe's finished up with Prince and out grabbing dinner."

Isha chirped as he leaned over to give her a kiss on the snout.

Yawning, you stretched out your arms and set your murderbird on your lap, before sitting up. Jack shed his coat and boots, and plunked down beside you, one hand already massaging the back of your neck.

"Heard about the motorpool. McCree's got the guy. One of our own damn mechanics. He and Torby are grilling-"

"Torby?" You blinked.

"After last weekend, you better believe he's interested in any mechanical sabotage on the premises. He's not doing anything...unethical," Jack said, hesitantly. "He's just there as a technical advisor, in case some of the engineering is lost on McCree."

Jesse could be pretty handy when he wanted to be. And you seriously doubted that Torby was just sitting there quietly giving mechanical advice. In fact, you could see Jesse and Torby teaming up like you and Amélie, and no matter whom he was paired with you had a hard time seeing Torby as the good cop.

Jack exhaled slowly. "Thoughts?"

"I think we know where this is going," you said softly.

"...I don't want you to go anywhere," Jack said, hunching over beside you. He rested his elbows on his knees, and turned his head sideways to watch you.

"I don't want to go anywhere, but-" You took a deep breath. "I already told Gabriel. Yes, I'd love to hop a transport to New York and shove Petras out a window. But I'm taking the long view: I'd rather tear him down in front of everyone, and expose his network of corruption. And killing him right now doesn't get us that."

"Yeah," Jack said. "That's true. And I bet he'd look great in an orange jumpsuit heading off to prison. Where he'll suffer a mysterious accident."

You grinned. "Yeah, that's the other part of the plan."

"I figured," Jack said, shaking his head. He sighed heavily. "I'm sorry, sweetheart. I don't mean to make this harder on you. I just...I want you to know that I don't like this idea at all. That I'm not just trying to shut you down because I'm afraid. I know this is the wisest course of action." He gave you a wry grin.

"I don't know, Jack," you teased. "Maybe you're just looking for an excuse to take a Shanghai vacation."

Jack frowned then. "As fun as that might be, I need you here, with me and Gabe." He straightened up, turning those wide blue eyes on you. "Maybe I don't say it enough, but I don't take you for granted. We both know I'm a mediocre cook on the best of days, and that sometimes if left on my own, I can overlook some very important things. You've probably figured out that I don't like sleeping alone, and that coming home to find you and Gabe here is just...it makes me forget how stressful my day was." He nuzzled your throat.

"How stressful was your day?" You asked, fluffing his hair.
"Don't remember," he said. "Except for the part about the sabotage. That's got me pretty pissed off." He combed his fingers through his hair, pushing it out of his face. "And I know I'm not the only one who needs you. I feel better knowing you're working closely with Gabe. I know I get too damn caught up in shit to remember things myself, and then I don't end up taking good care of him, but you're there and while that's not an excuse to neglect him, I know that he's got you and you're making sure he eats, sleeps, and doesn't murder anyone right off the bat." Jack shot you a guilty look. "Not that that's solely your responsibility, but--" He sighed. "Gabe is long overdue for some pampering, isn't he?"

"Yeah," you said, lips quirking at Jack's guilty face.

"Hey, quit letting me get distracted," Jack murmured. "That's not what I'm trying to focus on right now." Isha squawked as he set her on the coffee table, one hand resting on your knee. "Both of us like having you close. If I were poetic like Gabe, I'd spout some quote about how you soothe our battered souls or something. But I'm not. I just know that having you here with us makes me happy, and the idea of not having you here fucking aches." Jack cupped your face. "My feelings don't change a thing. We're going to do what we have to do. But I just wanted you to know. I don't want you to misunderstand and get any weird ideas about leaving to make things easier for us. Because it won't." He shut his eyes, but that did nothing to diminish the raw emotion on his face or the pain in his voice. For a moment, you forgot to breathe.

"I love you too," you said, kissing him gently, your voice hoarse. "I know exactly where you're coming from. You're a jerk who wants to make me cry." You rested your head against his chest. "Saying all those things and looking at me like that. Goddamnit, Jack."

"Sorry," he said, not sounding sorry at all. He stroked your hair, before hugging you too tightly against his chest. "Sorry," he said again, lips brushing your ear. "I'm sorry I let it get this far and--"

"Not your fault, Jack," you said, even as he pushed you back onto the couch, his hands gentle. "Not even your responsibility. That slimy bastard is technically your CO after all."

"...Baby, if I'm the goddamn Strike Commander, a fucking hero of the Omnic Crisis, I should at least be able to protect my girl-"

"You're Jack. You tell me terrible jokes, you kiss my scars, and you hold me when I'm sad."
Your fingers traced his cheekbones. "You're just Jack and I know you've got my back. We're supposed to have realistic expectations only." You paused, suddenly realizing the flaw in your argument. "And it is very realistic to expect you not to go on some rogue solo mission to off Petras."

Jack grumbled something under his breath as he gave you a sharp look.

"What was that?"

"I said, "No, you really do have some fucking unrealistic expectations," he growled, nipping your bottom lip. "I didn't get to where I was by just sitting back and letting things go wrong." He kissed you again. "I certainly didn't win over you and Gabe by playing it safe."

"I can't speak for Gabriel," you said, running your thumbs along his jawline. "But you didn't win me over with your heroism and aggressive combat skills. I mean, those are some sexy traits, but this is Overwatch, a lot of people here happen to be good in a fight. Some of them are even as shockingly good looking as you."
Jack narrowed his eyes at you and then you could practically hear him wondering whom you were referring to.

"But Jack, you were patient. You respected my limits. You saw my scars, and you just held me tighter." You exhaled, slowly, squeezing your left hand into a fist. "Gabriel saw them, and felt guilt, like he had to do a better job protecting me. I'm not upset with him for it, not at all, but that wasn't good for either of us. You just...accepted it all. You acknowledged them, and moved on, to sparring, cuddling, sex, the important things. And I needed that more than pity or coddling."

Jack's expression softened, and he smiled almost shyly. "You get caught up in your head, sweetheart. We all do it, but you and Gabe are kind of similar in that regard."

You shook your head, not really seeing the parallel. "Sometimes, you were alarmingly clever. You set traps, like a manipulative bastard, and you were so damn good at it, you coaxed me into love with you before I even realized it."

"You make it sound like I had some kind of grandiose plan." You weren't fooled by Jack's sheepish expression; underneath it he practically glowed with pleasure. "I knew you were...recovering from some heavy shit. I didn't want to do anything to make you uncomfortable or hurt you."

"And I appreciate that. But do you know what else you showed me?" You asked, both hands on his face, tilting his face so he was looking at you. Jack's mouth opened and shut, and you could see him wracking his brain for a good answer.

"A good time?" He winked, laughing at his weak joke.

"You showed me that maybe I could have a life beyond revenge." You swallowed roughly. "That maybe I could be happy again, even after everything that went wrong. I'd forgotten what that felt like."

Jack's eyes widened, and he wrapped both arms around you, crushing you against him. "That's what I'm know for, being the great hope of our age," Jack muttered, his voice husky in your ear. "Or at least that's the role I've played on occasion," he said in your ear. "It means a lot more coming from you."

"It's practically your middle name," you said with a laugh. "Except not, because your middle name is Francis."

Jack growled and pinned you against the couch. "Really, sweetheart?"

"You're right, I'm getting distracted," you said. "This is like my third chance at life, Jack. I don't know if I'll get any more. I'm not letting impulsive revenge ruin it for us." You poked Jack in the chest. "Do you understand me, Francis?"

You expected a smart ass remark. Maybe, "more like your thirteenth chance Miss UnLucky!" But Jack drew a shaky breath and kissed you then, all his frustration, hunger, and grief stealing your breath away.

When he let you up for air, you blinked a few times, your vision blurring.

"I understand," he said, peeling off his gloves. "And even if I hate your motivation and am suspicious of your timing, I'm really glad to hear you say all that. I...well, I know both you and Gabe are understandably focused on avenging everyone we lost at Black Base Delta. Just...was worried about how obsessed you were. Gabe too." Jack pulled you onto his lap, and you sat facing
"I still am," you admitted. "But...it's not the only thing that's important to me. I want a future." You sighed softly, wishing you were a better speaker. You wanted something intangible that you couldn't quite put into words, but you knew that whatever it was, it included Jack and Gabriel.

Jack stroked your hair. "Been looking at houses. Here, back in Indiana, California, Hell, Amélie's got some recommendations in French wine country..."

"Your French is terrible," you said, when you could make words.

You nodded. "Yeah. Cheese is good."

"Is this...too much?" He asked, unable to hide the raw longing on his face.

"Maybe," you said, kissing him. "But I think my heart can take it now. You've done a good job of putting it back together. And anyway, why are you even asking such a silly question? You like "too much."

"La politique, quand elle est un art et un service, non point une exploitation, c'est une action pour un idéal à travers des réalités," was the quote Lacroix greeted you with, and you rolled your eyes.

"You know, idealism just sounds ridiculous coming out your mouth," you told him. "Like it's not even just plain sarcasm any more, it's layers of mockery smothered in contempt with a sprinkling of old-fashioned snobbery to top it off."

"Delicious," Lacroix said, still sounding amused. "But I was actually referring to the series of maneuvers Madame Kwento has taken to counteract our beloved Director. That includes her "investigation" into "Blackwatch mismanagement."

"Is Kwento looking to kill two birds with one stone or-?"

"I had a lovely meeting with Monsieur Oladele. Madame Kwento is not looking to oust Gabriel," Lacroix laughed. "Though I'm certain it amuses her to make him squirm a little; turnabout is fair play after all. And of course, their viewpoints are very different. She is pushing several omnic non-aggression pacts through the General Assembly. Most are symbolic, but they certainly signal a change in the climate. It's ironic, really. Once upon a time, Nguyen would have been delighted by this progress. Just like she would have been amused by the fact her enemy was bringing this about. Now, I doubt she has the presence of mind to appreciate this."

You crossed your arms. "Are you ever going to just tell me what happened between the two of you? Or are you just going to needle me with insinuations?"

Lacroix laughed heartily at that. "Such a hunger for illicit gossip, Chanceux. If I didn't know better, I'd say you were curious about my personal life..."

"Fine, don't tell me. I'll just sit here and listen to you monologue like a senile supervillain."
Lacroix just sent you a file, and you picked up your tablet, a little surprised to find another transcript of Ainsley and her mother talking about Overwatch affairs. It was fifty pages long and started out with a conversation about artisanal flax seed oil.

"Skip to the last three pages," Lacroix said, eyes gleaming. "The conversation becomes tense halfway through, but it truly comes to a head in the end."

You skimmed, then you went back a few pages, and a few more, before rereading the last three pages.

Ainsley kept trying to bring up your "accident." And her mother kept changing the subject. But Ainsley kept steering the topic back on track, along with mentioning her uncle's unrepentant attitude. Which her mother didn't like one bit, and kept trying to browbeat her into dropping it.

But to your surprise, Ainsley kept at it. She didn't drop it. She didn't condemn her mother, but Valerie Petras ended the call in a huff, calling Ainsley "a selfish and naive brat." And while you didn't disagree with that assessment, it wasn't this behavior you based that claim on.

"You are becoming better at turning people," Lacroix said, with an approving nod. "I thought it would take at least another few years."

"...I wasn't trying to," you muttered. "I was just being strategically decent, and under protest, let me remind you."

"Take the compliment, Chanceux," Lacroix said, offering you a cigarette. "Part of influencing people is being strategically decent. You can have multiple reasons to win someone over. In fact, it is more efficient and convincing if that is the case."

"Spoke like a true amoral psychopath." You still took the cigarette.

"If they are on my side, I have one less enemy to kill," Lacroix said, offering you a light. "And one less death on my hands."

You blinked.

"It certainly isn't my fault if their old allies kill them for turning," he continued, ruining the moment.

You smoked the cigarette in silence. When it was gone, you spoke. "Her family won't kill her. Maybe cut her off, but Ainsley won't push them that far."

"The Petras dynasty isn't known for capitulating in the face of adversity," Lacroix said, shaking his head. "I believe the American colloquialism is, "mama didn't raise no quitter."

"You know the other part of that quote, right?" You asked, rolling your eyes.

Lacroix laughed. "Go on."

"But mama did raise a fool, and that's a terrible combination."

Lacroix simply shrugged that Gallic shrug. "You don't even like Ainsley Petras, so what does it matter? She is causing disarray in the Petras camp. No matter how small, that is to our benefit." Lacroix smirked at you. "Have you heard how Zenyatta is getting along?"

"No," you lied, because you'd had to loudly remind a few Blackwatch agents that Zenyatta was a friend of yours, and that you'd be really fucking disappointed if they were inhospitable to your friend. And Genji had made a point to be seen walking with Zenyatta, Hanzo reluctantly in tow. You hadn't asked him to do that, but then, the Shimada brothers had been spending more time with Zenyatta than you expected. The omnic monk had taken a shine to Genji, but you'd overheard him badgering Hanzo quite a bit with weird philosophical bits and what you suspected were the omnic-equivalent of ko-ans, and honestly? Those two deserved each other.

"Really? Then you weren't behind Agent Moore's rather humiliating beating?" Lacroix asked, feigning surprise. "He certainly took issue with Zenyatta's presence, made quite the scene, I hear. Fortunately, young Maeda Vargas stepped up and now Gabriel is reviewing disciplinary actions-"

"What?" You were on your feet. "When? He was on duty this morning and escorted me to the damn gym. How the hell is he in trouble already? I just fucking saw him!"

"Mmm," Lacroix stroked his chin, his eyes bright with amusement. "Tell me, Chanceux, is the irony in your life ever so strong that you can taste it?"

Gabriel took a deep breath as Wilhelm tried to get comfortable in the chair in front of his desk. The oaf was too damn big for the guest chairs with their spindly arms and lack of lumbar support. That was partially why he chose them, so unwanted people wouldn't get comfortable in his office.

"Reyes," Wilhelm shook his head. "I need your help."

Gabriel sat back in his chair, only just biting back a comment on how he wasn't nearly patient or qualified enough to help Wilhelm.

"Young Távio seems to have gotten in a dust up with another Overwatch agent."

"Maeda Vargas is still part of Overwatch and under your command. I don't know why you think I need to be involved," Gabriel scowled, teeth tightly clenched. He glared at the older man, fully expecting a stuttered apology and a quick retreat.

Wilhelm just leaned forward, his smile uncharacteristically sly. "We both know that boy is Blackwatch material, and while I can shield him from the consequences of his actions, I suspect you would do a better job turning this into a teachable moment. I have already expressed my "disappointment" in his lack of self control, but I fear I have established myself as more of a...kindly paternal figure. I am actually quite proud of him for standing up to that bully. So I am afraid I am not qualified to lecture him on the wiser choices he could have made."

"You can do your own dirty work," Gabriel growled. "Just because I'm the bad cop with Jack-"

Wilhelm shook his head slowly. "You misunderstand. I know he will not follow in my footsteps. He has a good heart, but like Lucky, he is a rogue. I am not the best teacher in those techniques. I have forwarded you the recordings of the confrontation, courtesy of Athena, and thought you might be interested in teaching him how better to...not get caught," the older man said, looking embarrassed.

"What?" Gabriel asked, his jaw slipping for a moment.
"Reyes, I do not know how I can simplify this any more!" Wilhelm shrugged. "I have done the hard part. I have told the boy that I am disappointed in him, and have reprimanded him officially. I have already administered a very flexible punishment. I need you to come in and show him the way black ops would have handled the situation. I did not want to just leave it half done, especially since the boy is on Lucky's bodyguard rotation."

"You want me to...tell Maeda Vargas how he could have gotten away with it?"

Wilhelm nodded vigorously. "Exactly! Obviously, you cannot tell him that I requested this. But yes. I thought about going to Ana, but I think you have a better rapport with him. She will just terrify him into good behavior, and after a great deal of soul-searching I am not so certain that is what we need."

Gabriel took off his hat, running his fingers through his curls, trying to wrap his mind around the fact that Wilhelm of all people wanted him to teach a damn rookie how to better break the rules. He stared at the incident report, reading it all but sideways to get another angle. But in the face of all the contradictions and everything he thought he knew about Wilhelm, the facts of the event lined up.

"I'll take a look at the details," Gabriel said, begrudgingly.

"Ah, danke schoen," Wilhelm beamed, his elation clear on his broad open face. "I'll owe you one."

For some reason, despite the man's heartfelt declarations of gratitude Gabriel really didn't trust that smile.

Initially, things didn't look so good for young Maeda Vargas. There was security camera footage of him calmly walking up to Moore, followed by a short exchange of barbs, and then Maeda Vargas slapped Moore in the solar plexus, and followed it up with a carotid slap. It was elegantly done and Gabriel recognized that move, recognized the way the blade of Maeda Vargas' hand struck. Your little protégée might not have metal fingers or a tanto, but he was mimicking your fighting patterns.

If only he could mimic your discretion. At least you only got caught some of the time. Gabriel knew Wilhelm would bend a rule or three if he were so inclined, but he doubted Wilhelm could singlehandedly defend the little idiot from the consequences of his own impulsive actions.

And he was right.

It started with Agent Daniels, the pilot from your Greek escapade. She came forward and stated, on the record, that Moore had been harassing both Maeda Vargas and Zenyatta, and after some questioning from Ana, the omnic reluctantly admitting that this was the case, and perhaps it was his fault that the promising young agent had stepped out of line? Would his CO consider the extenuating circumstances? Then Tataryn, Mihret, and Agent Shoal actually wrote up letters of recommendation, asking for leniency for the boy. Gabriel recognized that Tataryn's was a template he'd cribbed years ago, but Gabriel included it for posterity. Mihret wrote something that actually said "Moore was asking for it, and the brass should be grateful that someone stepped up to prevent a class action harassment lawsuit." Gabriel rolled his eyes, not necessarily disagreeing with Mihret's assessment, but wondering how the hell Mihret thought this would be helpful.
And, the cherry on top? Fucking Ainsley Petras declared herself a character witness and tearfully claimed that "that sweet young man would never attack someone unprovoked." Gabriel was tempted to count that against the boy, but he added to the pile of "things that would prevent Maeda Vargas from facing the serious consequences of his own shortsightedness."

Not that he had to worry about that. Wilhelm was actually disturbingly good at navigating the disciplinary system. He had already sentenced the boy to several months of "hard labor" which Gabriel took to meaning "Lucky Bodyguard Duty," and had apparently provided the transcripts of his severe reprimand. The speech, which Gabriel suspected Gérard helped him write, expressed more disappointment in Maeda Vargas' impulse control, than displeasure in the fact he'd punched another agent, specifically Moore.

Not to mention there were the recordings that Athena "helpfully" provided after he'd asked her, on a whim, if she had any input. It was a video of Moore accosting Maeda Vargas and you during Kseniya's day visit. In fact, there were a few shots of you looking directly into Athena's camera, your hands suspiciously not in the line of sight, your angles perfectly blocked. He'd have to remind you that you shouldn't stare so knowingly at the camera, not if you wanted the footage to appear "natural."

Then there was a suspiciously clear video of you, Jesse, and Tataryn speaking very diplomatically to Moore about his behavior toward Maeda Vargas. The three of you had been smiling the entire time, keeping it friendly and professional, before clearly walking away leaving Moore obviously shaken, but unharmed. In fact, Gabriel was pretty sure there was a part two that Athena didn't record. But that was dated a few months ago, about the time you got back from Oasis with Gérard.

Gabriel shook his head. This was actually nowhere near as difficult as he'd expected. The work had all been done for him. And though he knew you helped run things behind the scenes, and didn't always bother him with every little detail, he was slightly concerned about the fact that he'd had no idea about Moore. Just like the fact you'd recruited Jesse and Tataryn to help you wrangle misbehaving agents. It didn't actually surprise him, but he figured one of them would have let it slip by now.

There was a knock on the door.

"Enter," Gabriel said, turning off his view screen.

Maeda Vargas slunk in, shoulders drooping, Wilhelm flanking him, his normally jovial face, grim and severe. For a moment, Wilhelm actually looked like he meant business. Gabriel blinked once, and Wilhelm winked at him, his frown dissipating for a half second, before he got his disapproving mask back in place.

"Agent," Wilhelm's voice was low and harsh. "While Commander Reyes may not be as personally disappointed in your actions as I am, he is most assuredly not impressed by your lack of self control."

Maeda Vargas shrunk down smaller, staring at his boots, actually keeping his mouth shut.

Gabriel raised a brow. You were right. Maeda Vargas was much easier to handle than Mihret. "I'll handle things from here, Wilhelm."

Wilhelm managed a curt nod, that ridiculous grin threatening to spread across his face, but remembered himself and pursed his lips. He lumbered out of the office, shutting the door loudly behind him.
Maeda Vargas actually flinched.

Gabriel reluctantly found himself impressed. He didn't think Wilhelm had it in him to utter a harsh word to anyone, let alone one of his obvious favorites like Maeda Vargas.

"Well then, let's have it. Why'd you do it?" Gabriel leaned back in his chair, giving Maeda Vargas a sardonic grin. "Revenge? Your sudden overwhelming love of omnis? Did Lucky put you up to this?" He threw the last question out there on a whim, just to see what the boy would do.

"No, sir," he said shaking his head frantically. "She has no idea-"

"Oh, she does now," Gabriel said, with a mean smile, having seen your "WTF" message a few minutes ago. "And she is not happy."

Maeda Vargas buried his face in both hands. "Merda." The young man took a series of deep breaths.

The boy looked so upset, Gabriel almost told him to go into town and buy you a fancy cake as an apology. Maybe he'd give him leave later, after he finished chewing him out. "So, if Lucky wasn't the bad influence behind your reckless behavior, want to explain yourself?" Gabriel didn't try to hide his amusement.

"I got carried away. Yes, Agent Strike tasked us all to smooth things over for Agent Zenyatta, but I know she didn't mean for us to do it like that. I have had some...issues with Moore in the past, but that doesn't excuse my behavior and I shouldn't have let him get to me. I can't offer any excuses, sir."

"Good, because I don't want to hear any," Gabriel said, filing away the fact that you'd been handling Zenyatta's transition as well. Did he not keep you busy enough? Or was that one of Gérard's directives? He felt a pang of pride at how damn competent you were. Hell, if you were going to be in Shanghai, he'd better come up with a more comprehensive plan of action, otherwise you might just join On Sing out of boredom and the idea of you and Feng teaming up long-term slightly worried him. He'd either have to task you with taking down Vishkar, establishing an East Asian outpost, or some other massive project to keep you busy.

Realizing he was getting distracted, Gabriel returned his focus to Maeda Vargas, who seemed to have withered even more in the silence.

"Do you know what your biggest failure was?" Gabriel asked, after letting him stew a few more minutes.

"I struck another agent in anger," the young man said with a wince.

"I'm not going to say that bastard didn't have it coming, but you can't always give everyone their instant dose of karma. Forget what Wilhelm's said. Why do you think Lucky will be disappointed in you?"

"My lack of self control," Maeda Vargas said, his voice barely above a whisper.

"Sure," Gabriel drawled, rather enjoying using you as the disciplinarian. "But I'll tell you what will upset her even more: you got caught, boy. That's a big no-no in Blackwatch. We all expected better from you."

Maeda Vargas raised his head, still looking lost. "We?"
"Wilhelm is obviously fond of you and has high hopes for your future," Gabriel said, telling himself it was because it would be salt in the wound, and certainly not because he felt any inclination to speak well of the older man. "I thought someone on Lucky's bodyguard rotation would be more adept at subterfuge. And I'll let you guess what Lucky is going to say about Blackwatch agents who can't keep a lid on their extracurricular activities, hmm?" Gabriel purred.

Maeda Vargas stiffened, the blood draining from his face.

"Exactly," Gabriel said with a smirk. "Where did you go wrong?"

"I-" Maeda Vargas looked around, like he expected this to be a trick. "I shouldn't have reacted immediately, sir. I should have either saved my confrontation for a time and place away from witnesses and cameras, or I should have avoided confrontation and come up with a way to handle him discretely."

"And if you couldn't come up with a good plan, you could always go to Lucky or Wilhelm and they would advise you accordingly. Do you think you're the first agent to be goaded by a bully?"

"I..." Maeda Vargas rubbed the back of his neck. "I wasn't thinking."

"Clearly." Gabriel shook his head. "In Blackwatch, thinking is a requirement. I realize not all my agents exemplify that trait at home, but in the field, most of them are pretty sharp. None of them would have made such a rookie mistake." Actually, Mihret might, but Mihret was Gérard's problem. And yours.

The boy winced.

"But then, it's fortunate that you are still a rookie," Gabriel continued. "You have a lot of potential, boy. It would be a shame to waste it."

Maeda Vargas stared, poleaxed by the compliment.

"In some ways, you remind me a lot of Lucky. Yes, you're unpolished, impulsive, and think you know better than everyone else..." Gabriel trailed off, realizing some of those things hadn't changed. You'd gained some finesse, at least. "But you're resilient, clever, and clearly loyal. That counts for something."

"Sir." Maeda Vargas saluted, his eyes bright. "Thank you, sir."

"So I have higher expectations for you," Gabriel continued sternly. "And more severe consequences. Because you can't afford to fuck things up."

Maeda Vargas exhaled slowly. "Yes, sir."

Gabriel considered some of the penal exercises he'd seen Chang dish out. Those would wear the boy down, sure, but he needed to be in good condition if he was watching your back. There was, of course, that clever little tactic you'd used to make him rethink his "live fire during a training exercise" plan and it had been effective. Of course, Gabriel would take it a step further. He was going to put the eager little shit to work.

"Sit down," Gabriel said. "This might take a moment."

Maeda Vargas planted his butt on a chair, and leaned forward. "Sir."
And Gabriel told him precisely what he was going to be doing. Because even if Feng had your back, Gabriel didn't mind taking extra precautions. To his credit, Maeda Vargas didn't seem daunted by the prospect at all.

"What about Agent Strike, sir? Are you going to explain things to her?" He asked, almost timidly, because apparently your regard meant that much to him.

Gabriel laughed. "Oh no, boy. That's part of your punishment."

Maeda Vargas stared at him, stricken, and Gabriel felt maybe just teeniest bit of pity for him.

"That French bakery she likes closes in an hour," Gabriel added. "If you're quick, maybe you can buy a modicum of mercy."

Maeda Vargas was out of his chair and running from the office in seconds. Gabriel debated sending the boy a list of things he wanted as well.

Chapter End Notes

Hands were doing better last week, till I started writing. Then was in minor pain Thursday and major pain Friday. Did some writing Sunday and really paid for it Monday. Have now rearranged my home desk in a standing configuration. I tried it last night and it might help? Am still sore from Sunday, don't know if last night contributed to it. Hoping this helps, but not sure. Not writing is stressing me out on top of work, adulting, and whatever else life is throwing at me that I am currently ducking.

Hope everyone had a good holiday!
You sat there in Lacroix’s office, listening to Reinhardt recount everything. From his stern paternal "disappointment" to making Gabriel his ally in the scheming. Lacroix chuckled throughout the entire explanation. You only relaxed when Reinhardt told you that Távio's "hard labor" punishment was at his (and Gabriel's) discretion, and he had not forgotten that the boy was on your bodyguard rotation.

"Though, I'm not certain how effective he will be," Reinhardt said in low tones. "He is so small-"

"Everyone is small beside you," Lacroix laughed. "Maeda Vargas can fight, as we've all seen. And when he actually stops to think about his actions, he is actually refreshingly sharp. Rather like someone else we know."

Rolling your eyes, you scowled at Lacroix.

"It took a few rehearsals," Reinhardt said, rubbing the back of his neck. "I knew that Távio immediately regretted his haste, and that my words would just be vinegar in the eyes, but Gérard edited my speech. I was not entirely comfortable with everything, but Gérard has more expertise on this sort of thing. Overall, I think it went as it should have." Reinhardt gave a small nod. "Thank you."

"I have some experience handling impulsive young men," Lacroix smirked.

You rolled your eyes, not wanting to know anything about what he got up to with Ziv. Ugh.

"It was cutting," Lacroix said brightly. "Appropriately so. Do not look so concerned. Agents McCree, Tataryn, Shoal, and Daniels have already stepped up, and Zenyatta has also put a word in with Kwento. Everything on that front is under control."

You sat back taking a deep breath. "So what do I have to do?"

"Whatever you want," Reinhardt said cheerfully. "I have already done all the dirty work."

You blinked, having never expected to hear Reinhardt tell you that.

Having wrapped up one of the weirder personnel meetings you'd attended, and you'd sat through several given the kind of shit Tataryn, Vo, and the Shimadas got up to, you headed back to the office, curious about what Gabriel had said to Távio.

And there, in front of the office door, stood Távio, well, maybe not standing. He slumped against the door, panting loudly, his hair in disarray, sweat soaking his uniform, and a cloth bag clutched to his chest as he tried to straighten up and salute you.

"Ma'am," he croaked. "I'm really sorry, I let you down. It won't happen again. I swear." He tugged at his collar, face scrunched up.

"...Are you all right?" You asked, trying to figure out why he was so out of breath. Had Gabriel taken a page from Chang's book and decided to make him do modified suicide runs, or something worse? You thought Reinhardt had handled all the punishment. Gabriel was just supposed to build the boy back up.

"I'm just really penitent," he mumbled, handing you the bag. "I'm sorry to disappoint you, ma'am. Commander Reyes said it might be wise to go into town and get you this. I'm not cleared for motor pool privileges so I took the bus one way...but then there was an accident on the return trip, so I ran the rest of the way back."

You glanced down, recognizing a box from your favorite bakery. You raised a brow. "Such blatant bribery, agent?"

Távio gave a laugh that could have been a sob. He wiped his forehead. "A gift?" He said, in a voice laced with hysteria.

You opened the box and peered in to see a whole chocolate cake. It was one of the twelve-layer, ganache-filled wonders, with slightly melted artisan chocolate shapes on top. It was wonderfully large, and smelled of bittersweet chocolate and pure decadence. Your lips quirked upward.

"Well, Moore had it coming," you said with a grin. "Next time, don't get caught. Or come to me instead. We'll figure something out; it might even be within the rules."

Távio blinked, like he was expecting you to tear another chunk of him. Nope, Gabriel and Reinhardt had handled all that. You got to be the good guy this time. After all, he had brought you cake. Plus you would have had to rough up Moore again anyway, and honestly, with the "investigation" going on, you didn't need that kind of scrutiny. Távio could have done a better job, sure, but you weren't sore at him, not since you knew what was going on behind the scenes.

"Ma'am," he managed a weak smile.

"Seriously, stop getting caught," you said, patting him on the back. "If you'd managed to handle Moore without attracting attention, I'd be buying you the cake right now." Shaking your head with mock sorrow, you opened the office door.

Távio's eyes widened in disappointment.

You just took your cake and shut the door behind you. Because in Blackwatch, you could never reward getting caught.

You cut the cake, rolling your eyes at just how damn amused Gabriel was. He had finished his slice with a cup of coffee, and was eyeing the remnants.
"No," you said.

"I'm the one who told him to get it for you," Gabriel said with a frown.

"Jesse, Shoal, Tataryn, Daniels, Ziv, and Reinhardt all get slices too," you said, having already sent out the message. "That's only fair." Sure, you'd cut yourself an extra large slice, because it was your cake after all, but you were being responsible.

Daniels declined politely, probably wrongly assuming that "cake with Blackwatch" was codeword for some kind of scary operation. You decided not to disabuse her of that notion. Hell, if you could get Tataryn to popularize that phrase...

"This is how you maintain ironclad control of our agents, isn't it?" Gabriel sighed, sipping his coffee.

"I have no idea what you're talking about," you said, sitting back in your chair and sipping your coffee. "Goddamnit, Ziv wants me to bring him his slice. For fuck's sake, he can walk over here."

"No, he's banned from my office, for all eternity," Gabriel said, scowling.

You massaged your temples. "Really?"

"Yeah. So you might as well give me his piece."

Shaking your head, you decided to just focus on eating your own share of the cake.

"Then Marc- I mean, Lucy," Jack shook his head. "It's been five years, but I'm still not used to calling her that. I spent much longer calling her another name..." Jack paused. "That sounds wrong. I just knew her longer under her old name."

"I know what you mean," you said, laughing softly as he began to turn pink.

"I just called her "Freeman, you goddamn punk," all the time," Gabriel said with a snort.

"Lucy was in my class," Jack said to you. "She's pleasant and responsible, kind of the unit "mom friend." She'd get really fussy if you interfered with her domestic ways. But she could finesse all the difficult people too: Andre, Ray, and even Gabriel at points."

"She's a busybody," Gabriel muttered, though there was no real malice in his voice. "Been sending me messages about visiting Tía Elena, and trying to mend things with Mr. Roberts, and why haven't I sent Blue a congratulations on his new cat? For fuck's sake, I'm running a black ops division, not a book club."

"Oh, remember that time she tried to get Ray and Munoz to put their differences aside and-"

"And they both put her on full blast? Yeah. I thought Chang was going to murder two people that night."

"Or the time she got after Yuan about not unloading the dishwasher? And Yuan just stared at her blankly and began breaking the dishes instead."

Gabriel laughed. "Or that time she starting haranguing Immerman about her dating habits?
"True, but she shouldn't have done it in the mess hall in front of everyone," Jack chuckled.

You curled up on the couch, eating tacos while Jack and Gabriel talked about people you didn't know and might possibly never meet. You were pretty sure some of them hadn't survived the Omnic Crisis, but you didn't want to ask. Because both men were enjoying their conversation, and Gabriel had a hard enough time talking about the past. You didn't want to shut him down.

It was a past you'd had no part of, and that made your chest clench. You weren't jealous, not really. But when you went to Shanghai, they'd be here without you. Just like before. And you'd be on your own, wondering if they really needed you after all. Wondering if they'd realize that too. You took a deep breath, recognizing your insecurity for the irrationality that it was. You hugged the throw pillow tighter, not listening to the words, but the cadence, the tone of Jack and Gabriel's voices, the easy flow of their words. You took deep slow breaths, feeling Jack's hand on your knee, though he and Gabriel continued chatting happily.

You let yourself drift, eyes dropping shut.

And then someone's hand was on your back, and you were moving up, up, upward. Grumbling, you reached out to brace yourself, your hand flailing in empty air.

"Come on, sweetheart. Let's get to bed. You should have said something if you were tired," Jack murmured, his breath warm in your ear. He gently set you on the bed, one hand rubbing your shoulder.

"I was just resting my eyes," you said with a yawn. "I can stay up-"

Gabriel laughed softly. "Raise your arms, corazon."

You complied and he helped you get your shirt off. You wiggled out of your pants, giggling as Jack tossed them into the laundry hamper. Crawling under the covers, you let them push you into the middle of the bed, two sets of hands stroking your skin.

"Love you," Jack said first, nuzzling the back of your neck. "Love you both."

"Les amo." Gabriel kissed your forehead.

"Yeah, I love you too," you said, nestled between them, trying to remember why you'd been feeling so anxious. Sometimes your mind was like that. Sometimes your feelings were entirely irrational. It was normal though, you knew, to have unpleasant, unreasonable thoughts. You just had to make sure not to act on them. And maybe take some time to yourself to get your head on straight.

"You doing all right?" Gabriel asked, his voice soft and sleepy. "You were really quiet tonight."

"Was too caught up in my head," you sighed, kissing his shoulder. "Better now."

"Anything me or Gabe can do?" Jack asked, sounding much more awake.

"Can't think of anything," you said, squeezing his hand. "Too comfortable right now."

Jack chuckled in your ear, arms wrapped around you. Gabriel kissed the top of your head, arm slung over you and Jack. You held them close, and resolved to savor this for as long as you
You awoke to gentle kisses on your inner thighs, the blankets rustling, and someone laughing softly. Eyes fluttering open, your breath caught as Gabriel pressed a hot open mouthed kiss to the side of your neck.

"Ngh?" Was the sound that escaped the back of your throat. The blankets shifted and Jack's hands spread your legs, his tongue slipping inside you.

"That was a cute noise," Gabriel purred in your ear. "See if you can get her to do it again, Jack."

You dug your hands into the sheets, eyes widening as Jack sucked on your clit, his fingers tracing the edges of your slit. He pushed one, then two inside you and you arched, whining as he stretched you.

"Love waking you up like this," Gabriel said, his large hands cupping your breasts, lightly pinching your nipples. "Would've been me down there, lapping at that sweet pussy, but Jack owes you one, doesn't he?"

"I-" You stuttered, brain bleary as you squirmed between them. Gabriel lay on his side, still in his pajama pants. Your tired mind tried to remember what he was referencing. It was difficult to think with Jack's fingers slowly pumping in and out of you, his tongue pressing hard against your nub.

"I'm sorry I missed it," Gabriel continued, his voice low and rough. "But he told me all about how he woke up the other morning with you stretched out between his legs, sucking his cock between your pretty lips. How you drank him down like a champ. And while he was catching his breath, getting ready for round two, you just gave him a cheeky wink and walked out."

You groaned as Jack's fingers began to move faster, the pressure between your legs growing.

"I was going to be late for work," you panted, remembering how you'd had to speed-dress after that. "Would have gotten you too, but you were already gone." Gabriel tended to wake up before everyone else.

"You can do that for me anytime," Gabriel murmured, laughing softly. "Of course, I'm just as likely to flip you over and pound you into the mattress in retaliation. You wouldn't be walking straight after that, and you'd be very late to work, which is a shame because I hear your boss is a real hardass."

You gave a choked laugh as Gabriel nipped your shoulder.

Jack didn't tease any more, his fingers and tongue working you in tandem while you squirmed against the bed.

"That's it, hermosa." Gabriel kneaded your breasts, nipping and sucking on your neck. "Love having you between us. Love seeing you spread out like this. I'm not going to have time to fuck you like you deserve, but tonight, I'll make it up to you, promise. Going to fill every one of your sweet holes-"
Arching, you came with a soft cry as Jack moaned against you, his tongue firmly wiggling against your clit. His fingers gradually slowed, and he raised his head, the blankets falling off his shoulders, cool air a shock against your skin. Grinning at you, he wiped his mouth off on the back of his hand and kissed Gabriel hard.

Gabriel dug his fingers into Jack's shoulders, groaning.

"You're going to be late soon," Jack teased as he broke the kiss. "And I know for a fact that your boss is a real hardass."

You giggled as Gabriel gave him a dry look. "Round fuckable ass maybe."

Jack just leaned over to kiss you and you sighed as he nuzzled your neck. "Good morning, sweetheart."

"Morning."

Jack just grinned at you, looking quite pleased with himself. He kissed you again. "Gabe has to go in the earliest, so why don't you take care of him first? Then we'll have part two."

You raised a brow at Gabriel, because you didn't normally stay in bed for sex while he worked.

"You don't need to be in the office this morning, not while Beaumont is lurking on site," Gabriel said, his expression tightening. "And Jack's morning is open."

"Oh," you said, realizing then that both men were trying to cheer you up. Because officially, you were suspended. You would just have to work remotely, because you weren't out of the game. This was just for show, you reminded yourself. Subterfuge done right.

Gabriel gave you a rueful smile. "Sorry."

"For what?" You leaned over and kissed his nose. You reached down with your left hand, carefully rubbing his erection through his pants. He gave a soft groan. "We have to make it quick, right?" Your metal fingers trailed along his thighs, up to his waistband, under the fabric, and back down. You could feel his heat in the palm of your hand, and you began to stroke slowly, his tip already slick with precum.

"Thought you'd use your mouth on him," Jack said, his cock pressed against your ass. But then Jack loved watching you choke on them.

"He's in a hurry," you said, arching a brow at him. "Because his boss is unreasonable."

Gabriel snorted. "You two are hilarious."

That wasn't how you wanted your sexual performance rated, so you flexed your fingers. The humming started up and Gabriel swore, inhaling sharply as you squeezed his shaft.

"Oh sweetheart," Jack groaned. "You should use those inside him..."

"Later. Going to be late. Have a meeting with Ana. In a hurry," Gabriel gasped through gritted teeth, more like he was trying to remind himself, not you or Jack.

"So you aren't tempted to stay in bed with us?" Jack teased, because he was a little shit.

"Shut up, Jack," Gabriel groaned, eyes falling shut. "You know I am. You know I'm going to spend the morning thinking about what you two are doing in bed and wishing I was here with you."

Jack just chuckled. "Maybe we'll send you pictures."

You were pumping his cock hard now, your fingers pulsing while he jerked his hips, his skin hot against yours. "Don't worry," you told him. "We'll both be thinking about you too. I know I'll be fantasizing about how hard you're going to fuck me tonight. You say a little anticipation is good for Jack, and that's true, but the same goes for you too."

Gabriel's eyes flashed. "You little cocktease-"

"Oh papi, I'll be missing you so much," you purred, nipping his throat. "I think Jack and I can both agree that it's best when you're here too, whether you're holding one of us down, wrecking us with this massive cock." Your hand sped up. "Or sitting there watching Jack and me play, or on your knees taking it from Jack..." You exhaled slowly, turning up the vibrations.

Gabriel growled, arms wrapping tightly around you while he thrust into your hand. He bit down on your shoulder as he came, and you squealed.

"Fuck," Gabriel rasped, fingers digging into your back.

"She made you come in your pants again," Jack teased, reaching over you to kiss Gabriel. "What is this? High school?"

"You're going to get it tonight," Gabriel said, tilting his head back. The smile he gave you was absolutely wicked and a frisson of pleasure fluttered in your belly. "Going to spend all day thinking about what I'm going to do to you."

You kissed him then, laughing as you wiped your hands off on his pants.

You made the coffee while Gabriel got ready for work, and Jack packed him the leftover tacos. You were naked and Jack was still just in pajama pants. Gabriel was out the door in minutes, his smile holding a sharp edge. You did not envy anyone who had to sit in on meetings with him today.

The door clicked shut, and suddenly you were upside down over Jack's shoulder as he carried you back to the bedroom.

You laughed as he dropped you onto the bed, and plunked down beside you, stretching out on his side. He gave you an easy smile, hands resting on your hips.

"Feeling better this morning?" Jack asked.

"With that kind of wakeup call? Of course," you said, kissing his hands.

"Still feeling playful, huh?" Jack nuzzled your neck. "Taking a half day, so I have to be in the office at noon," he said. "But we still have time." He took a deep breath. "It's been a rough week. Do you want to be in control, or do you mind if I take the reins? If you're not feeling power play, we don't need to do-"

"Despite all the teasing, I'm not quite up for the hard stuff just yet. Still kind of fuzzy," you said, muffling a yawn.

"I can very be sweet," Jack murmured, running his thumb over your bottom lip. "We can go slow. I like taking my time with you. I don't do that enough." A calloused palm stroked your hip.

"You can be in charge, if that's what you're feeling," you said.

Jack studied your face, his expression thoughtful. "Nothing rough though, got it."

He nodded to himself. "Are toys all right?"

"Sure," you said, stretching out your limbs. You paused, suddenly remembering the "dildo bat" picture he'd sent you during a meeting. You'd made a smarmy reply about commissioning Torby to weaponize it further, but stopped short of actually forwarding the picture. Despite the jokes, you did have a faint sense of self preservation. "Toys are fine, within reason."

Jack chuckled, possibly thinking of the same incident. "You just get comfortable, baby. You've been so tense lately. I'll take care of everything else." He rose, whistling softly as he knelt beside the nightstand.

You craned your neck to see what he was looking for.

"That can't be comfortable," Jack said, not looking up. "Pile some pillows up and relax."

Rolling your eyes, you stacked the pillows to an acceptable elevation, and sunk backward. You pulled the blankets up to your chin, because you were naked and it was getting chilly.

The mattress sunk as Jack climbed back into bed with a box. He chuckled. "Got cold, did you?"

"Was that what you meant by "taking your time?" You laughed, no actual sharpness in your words. You half expected Jack to bite you in retaliation, but he just gave you a sheepish grin.

"Sorry, sweetheart." He pulled the blanket aside and took a moment to study your body, an appreciative smile on his lips. He kissed you hungrily, skin wonderfully warm against yours. "I guess I'll speed things along then." You squirmed, legs closing as you felt something cool pressed against your inner thighs. "Nuh-uh," he chided, nipping your shoulder. "Hold still."

Your breath quickened, as he pressed the soft silicone egg to your clit, the motor pulsing hard, already making your muscles clench. You bit your lip.

Jack smiled down at you. "You always liked this one," he said. "Do you want the rabbit too? I know how much you like being filled..."

"Please," you inhaled sharply.

Jack just shook his head. "So spoiled. Is that how you ask nicely?"

"Please, sir." Your voice wobbled. It was hard to concentrate with the vibrations constantly thrumming against your core.

"Good girl." Jack patted your head, and you would have bitten his hand, but he looked genuinely pleased. He reached into the box and brought out a familiar blue rabbit vibrator. "You're wet enough to take it." With one hand he rubbed the tip against your slit, the other hand setting the egg aside.
You gave a whine of disappointment.

"You want both?" He asked, feigning surprise. "What a greedy little pussy." He took your hand in his. "All right. Hold this one in place," he said, handing the egg to you.

You didn't miss how his eyes lit up as you rubbed the egg against your clit, your hips shaking as you panted softly.

Jack knelt between your thighs, focusing on slowly pushing the shaft of the toy inside you. You threw your head back, breathing heavy as he guided in to the hilt. Already the egg had you close to edge, the constant friction just what you needed to finish.

Jack began to pump the toy in and out of you. "You're so wet already," he groaned. "And I'm wishing it was my cock inside you right now, dragging those sweet little noises out of your throat." He watched you, pupils wide, tongue flicking out to moisten his lips. "I love watching you play with yourself, sweetheart. Love seeing you like this. Can we send Gabe a picture later? I'll put it in the vault."

"Yeah." At first you'd been hesitant to leave evidence, but one of the privileges of power was the heavily encrypted data vault that the Strike Commander shared with the Blackwatch Commander. Nothing was guaranteed unbreakable, but by the time someone managed to bypass those security protocols, they'd also have access to all kinds of compartmentalized Top Secret files, including Shit Spiders and honestly, that would be worse than all the naked photos.

"You're getting distracted," Jack said, ruefully. He licked his fingers, and one began to stroke the edge of your back entrance.

You jerked upward in surprise, the egg vibrator flush against your clit. Jack chuckled, and fingers circling the other sensitive cluster of nerves while he began to move faster with the dildo. The beads in the rabbit began to rotate inside you, and you swore, not quite expecting that.

"Nothing rough right now," Jack murmured, kissing your thighs. "But tonight, Gabe's going to fuck you silly. Best to get you nice and stretched out for him-"

You moaned as you came, the vibrator just too efficient. You set the egg aside, taking a few shaky breaths.

Jack grinned at you a mischievous light in his eyes. "Sweetheart, I neither gave you permission to come or to move that toy. If you can't be trusted to behave, I'm going to have to use firmer methods."

You squinted at him. "Jack, you know-"

"Shh," he said, shaking his head with mock sorrow. "Hands above your head."

You gave him a dirty look.

"I'm being very patient," he said, with a smug look. "I haven't forgotten the rules, unlike a certain difficult woman."

You blinked, and very slowly raised your arms.

Jack retrieved a pair of padded cuffs, the chain long enough so your arms wouldn't get stuck too long in one position. You held still as he looped it through the headboard and secured each wrist.
He also got out the lube, a blue jeweled anal plug, and a few other things. You raised a brow. The boy scout was really prepared.

"When you mentioned "toys" I didn't realize you were going to go all out..."

"I'll be gentle, sweetheart," he said, his boyish grin completely at odds with the array of sex toys lined up on the bed. "You just relax. I'll take good care of you, I promise."

The plug had gone in first, and true to his word, Jack had been careful and had taken his time, making sure you could accommodate it comfortably.

"It looks so cute in you," he said flicking the base. You jerked upward. "How's it feel?"

"Snug," you said.

Jack chuckled and cleaned off his hands, before picking up a long thin chain. There were little adjustable clips on each end and you stiffened as he carefully lined one up with your left nipple.

"Too hard?" He asked as he tested a few settings.

"No, no...yes!" Your voice went high and he loosened it. He did the same with the second clip, putting light pressure on each sensitive nub. Cheeks pink, he tugged on the chain, and you arched, eyes rolling back in your head.

"That was adorable. Let me know if it starts to get uncomfortable," he said, kissing your forehead.

You nodded, eyes squeezed shut.

Jack gently stroked your hair. "Too much?"

"Didn't expect my day to go like this," you said.

"We'll do this more often then," Jack purred. He picked up the egg, and a roll of medical tape. You shuddered as he secured the toy to your clit. "Relax, the adhesive comes off nicely. It won't hurt your sensitive skin, honest." He kissed your pussy.

"That's not the only thing that's worrying me-" You muttered.

"I haven't forgotten about filling you up," Jack said, with a cheeky laugh. "Are you afraid I'm going to get you all wound up and leave you like this while I go off to work?"

"...That wouldn't be funny," you growled.

"No," Jack agreed. "It wouldn't." He kissed your nose. "I wouldn't do that. Unless you wanted me to and we planned it out first. But that's not something to do on impulse."

You exhaled slowly. "Yeah, I know you wouldn't do that."

Jack just shook his head, like he didn't quite believe you. "I have a blindfold too. I always found it makes the experience more intense. May I put it on you, or will that be too much?"
You blinked a few times.

Jack kissed you again. "Don't worry about it. You can use it on me later and see if you're-"

"I'll try it," you blurted out.

Jack sat back on his heels, his eyes soft as he watched you. "If you're sure." He held what looked like a black sleep mask, and put it over your face.

The world went dark, and you decided that this would make a good sleep mask as well. Hmm...

There was another tug upward and sleeping was suddenly the furthest thing from your mind. You squeaked as you arched off the bed, nipples hypersensitive as Jack played with the chain. He pulled it again, and it was a like a bolt of lighting coursing from your breasts straight to down your spine and between you legs.

"Liked that, did you?" Jack asked, voice husky.

"Oh god," you moaned, because the plug in your ass started to wiggle. This too came as a shock, not because you didn't expect it, but because in the dark every touch was just more acute. And then the egg turned on, the setting low but insistent, igniting your already sensitized nerves.

"Relax sweetheart, I have everything under control," Jack said, sighing happily. You felt the bed shift as he knelt between your legs, and resumed slowly fucking you with the dildo.

You swore and writhed, the stimulation almost overwhelming. Your entire body was too sensitive. But Jack didn't escalate. He kept it controlled, and while you'd half-expected him to just throw the rabbit vibrator aside and fuck you into the mattress till you were screaming your safe words, he kept a languid pace, kissing your thighs and stomach. Changing the patterns of his strokes and the motions toys, keeping you guessing.

"You look so pretty like this," Jack sighed. "I could do this all day, you know. Just keep you on edge, till you're a squirming mewling wreck."

"Jack-" you whined.

"I could do the opposite," he continued, ignoring your protests. "I could do this-" The egg began to vibrate harder and you cried out, bucking your hips. "And see how long we could go before you're begging for mercy." The vibrator suddenly slowed down, and you gave a sigh of relief. "But that's not what you asked for." He tweaked your nipples before pressing a hungry kiss to your mouth.

"May I send Gabe a picture of you like this? Tied to my bed, filled with toys, those pretty lips parted just like that? I bet he'll come back here for lunch, if I do."

"You can take the picture." You shuddered and the shaft of the dildo bottomed out inside you. "But Gabriel's got work to do."

Jack laughed. "So responsible." Jack kissed your cheek, his touches light, but your skin was extra sensitive right now. "God, I love you sweetheart. And I'm so fucking hard it hurts. But I can't stop touching you. Would rather watch you fall apart right now than jerk myself off."

The bed creaked as Jack rose. There was a click. And then he was back in bed beside you. The egg began to pulse harder. And Jack fucked you nice and slow with the toy, its texture enjoyable, but not as thick or warm as your lovers' cocks.

"Please-" You were surprised by how hoarse your voice was. "The toys are nice, but I want you, sir."

Jack groaned, and you could hear him fist his cock while he sped up with the dildo. "Sweetheart, we're going slow."

You gave a cry of frustration. "Please sir-"

"Going to make you come from this at least once," he said. "Because once I'm balls deep in that juicy little cunt, I'm not going to last, all right?" He kissed you again. "But I'll be damned if I can deny you anything when you're being so good."

"Thank you, sir," you panted.

You could hear the toy slipping in and out of your sopping wet slit. Every so often Jack reached up to pluck at your nipples and each time it affected you more, your composure unraveling. You weren't quiet at all now, and in the back of your mind you wondered if maybe Jack should have gotten the gag...

You could feel your face heat up, along with a few other spots, your body tensing in pleasure. Maybe next time you could use it on Jack... You shivered, eagerly moving your hips in time with his motions.

"Look at you, so damn needy-" Jack's voice grew rough. "A toy in almost every hole and it still isn't enough. I should fuck your sweet ass while you buck and cry against that vibrator. I wonder how long you'd last."

You wouldn't. You wished you could see Jack's face, but you could hear the need in his voice, the way his breath caught, his control slipping. You could picture him hunched over you, gnawing on his bottom lip, cheeks flushed as he watched you with those hungry eyes and that open lust that always made your stomach clench. You could practically see his long pretty cock bobbing there, already leaking all over.

"Jack, I'm close-"

Jack's breathing grew louder and he kissed your hard, lips bruising yours. "Not yet, sweetheart. You have to hold out a little longer."

Whining, you drew several hiccupping breaths. He sped up and you dug your heels into the mattress, teeth clenched as you strained against your bonds. You couldn't get away from him, and you couldn't escape the persistent buzzing on your clit. Each stroke of the dildo went deep, the slick sounds of it echoing obscenely in your ears.

"Please-" you sobbed. "I need-"

"I see you trying to hold out," Jack exhaled in your ear, his bare chest brushing against yours. "Just a little more."

You thrashed against the bed, muscles locked up as you tried your hardest not to come. You were wound tight, but the constant stimulation wore away at your resistance. And despite his orders otherwise, you knew Jack was doing his damnedest to drive you over the edge. "Sir, I can't," you wailed.
Jack growled. "All right, go on then, sweetheart. Come for me."

Thrashing from side to side, you dug your fingers into the pillows and let go, the constant rhythm of the toys fraying your nerves. They had a different quality than the warmth of your lovers' bare skin. Your orgasm was hard, efficient, and over quickly. But before you could catch your breath, the pleasure grew again, rubbing your nerves raw, because Jack had left everything in place.

"Jack it's too much..." Your voice was shakier than you expected.

"You can take a little more," he said, kissing your throat.

You shrieked as the vibration power spiked, and threw your head back into the pillows, trying to get away from it. "Goddamnit!"

"Shh," Jack chuckled. "Just a little more. Promise. Won't try to set any records for how many times you can come."

You gritted your teeth, already feeling another orgasm building on the tail of the last one. And then the power shut off, and Jack pulled the toy out of you. The egg and the plug remained on, but dropping down to a low, almost ignorable setting. Then Jack yanked the blindfold off, breathing hard, his wild blue eyes locked on yours.

"You OK?" He asked, cheeks flushed as he ran a calloused palm along your forehead.

"I'm going to bite you," you said, petulantly.

"I don't mind," Jack said, voice low. He kissed your nose. "Do you need a break or..."

"Let me catch my breath," you sighed.

Jack chuckled, uncuffing your wrists and kissing each one gently. You patted his cheek.

"Going to do this to you too, you know," you said, giving him a smug look. "Only I'm going to get you a ball gag and-" Jack groaned. "Baby, I'm dying here."

You raised a brow. "You haven't come yet this morning, have you? Poor thing..." You kissed his chin. "I like the toys, but I like you better. But I don't need as much time to recover from the toys-" Jack was on you immediately, rubbing the head of his cock against your pussy. "Going to leave everything else on, if you don't mind," he said, tugging the chain on your breasts while slowly pushing inside and your vision went white. "Oh sweetheart," Jack groaned as you wrapped your legs around his waist. He reached down and grabbed the remotes. Suddenly the anal plug and the egg vibrator whirred back to life.

"Damnit-"

"It feels good, the vibrations, the way you twitch around me, seeing that look on your face-" Jack pressed his forehead to yours. "Thank you, baby for letting me do this."

You shuddered, hands gripping his arms while he began to move faster, his hips jerking at an unsteady rhythm. Jack's cock was noticeably bigger than the rabbit and you loved the way he felt inside you, the friction, the heat, the way he filled you up.

Jack set a fast pace, kissing you hard as he thrust into you. He was chasing his own release now, but it would be a lie to say you didn't enjoy watching him move with such desperation. Grinning, you bit him then, teeth sinking into his shoulder and he cried out. But he didn't stop.

You rolled your hips, and Jack just smiled at you, his eyes hazy with lust. He kissed you hungrily. Hands gripping yours, Jack murmured your name as he began twitch and shake. Your breath caught as you felt him pour inside you, vibrations shaking your core the entire time. You weren't far behind him, clinging to him while he coaxed another orgasm out of you, his hips still moving at a languid pace, his mouth on your throat.

It was another minute or so before he shut off the toys. Jack was soft inside you, but he just lay there, holding you against him, basking in the afterglow.

You snuggled against him, knowing you were going to be uncomfortable soon, but there was something addictive about seeing Jack in this cuddly sated state.

"Thank you," you told him, kissing his nose. "I enjoyed that."

"I'm glad," he said. He brushed his damp hair out of his eyes. "Did you mean the part about the gag?" He asked, almost sounding embarrassed.

"Did you want me to?" You asked, raising a brow as you felt him harden inside you. "Like that idea then?"

"Yeah," Jack murmured, cheeks turning red. "I like it a lot."

"I'll keep that in mind," you said, running your fingers along his lips. "Do you want to tell me more about the things you like?"

"Oh yes," Jack exhaled. "I want to do that very much."

The door slammed open, then slammed shut, and the familiar stomping of metal boots on Jack's cheap carpet made you raise a brow. There was a pause and you heard them clang as they were kicked carelessly across the floor. Jack stretched out beside you, grinning as a barefoot Gabriel stalked into the room, already stripping off his hoodie. Eyes wild, he glared at Jack, pulling his shirt off and tossing his hat onto the dresser.

"Morrison, you fucking cocktease-"

"You know Reyes, stripteases are supposed to be done a little slower, not that I'm complaining," Jack smirked, petting your hip. "Anyway, aren't you supposed to be working?"

"Fuck you, I'm on lunch," Gabriel snarled. "Some of us don't have the luxury of lazing about in bed all day, Commander." The belt hit the ground and Gabriel peeled his pants off, still glowering at Jack.

"Should I give you two some privacy?" You asked, archly, maybe a little put out that Gabriel hadn't acknowledged you yet. Because Jack had left the plug, nipple clips, and egg in place, anticipating that your other lover would like them.
"You stay right where you are, hermosa," Gabriel growled, turning that hungry stare on you, his expression fierce. "Who do you think is the reason I've been hard for the last two hours?"

"Jack, by the sound of it," you drawled.

"Pretty Boy is a goddamn instigator and he'll get his," Gabriel snapped. "But that's not why I'm here." Naked, his heavy erection slick with precum, Gabriel climbed into the bed, hands on both sides of your hips, his body radiating heat.

You shivered as Gabriel gripped your hair and kissed you hard. "Oh, did you miss me?" You murmured, your voice shaky and he nipped your bottom lip, hands stroking your sides.

"Like a drowning man misses air," Gabriel rumbled in your ear, mouth already traveling down your neck. There would be marks later. You didn't mind. "I have less than an hour. Tell me to stop and I'll take care of myself right now. Otherwise, papi is going to use that time to wreck his filthy little slut, because obviously Morrison isn't keeping her busy enough."

Jack had the audacity to chuckle.

You moaned as Gabriel gave the chain on your nipples a light yank. He sat back on his haunches, breathing hard as he waited for you to give him an answer, one fist already closed around his shaft.

Licking your lips, you took a moment to appreciate the strained look on Gabriel's face, the sweat beading on his forehead, the way his muscles tensed and flexed, especially in his thighs and forearms. Gabriel was on edge, and it sent a delicious thrill through your belly to know that it was all because of how much he wanted you. He wasn't going to be gentle, and he wasn't waiting for tonight. It was really bad that you'd distracted him from work, but on the other hand, you appreciated the compliment.

"Please papi." You smiled, holding eye contact. "I want you to use me hard. Jack got me all prepared for you..." Before you got another teasing line out, you were flat on your back, one leg over Gabriel's shoulder. He gave you a savage grin, before slamming into you, his thickness always a shock to your system. And even though you expected it, you still screamed. Because he filled you so thoroughly, already all the way in to the hilt. He gave you a second to adjust, his eyes bright as he kissed you roughly.

"You're going to regret teasing me, baby," he growled.

"Not...teasing," you panted, grinning up at Gabriel's face. "Want you. All of you." You cupped his face kissing him again.

"Going to give you exactly what you asked for," Gabriel said through clenched teeth. "Going to remind you exactly who's in charge." He brushed your hair out of your face, one hand cupping your cheek. "Going to make damn sure you remember whom you belong to."

"So possessive," Jack laughed, and suddenly you arched, the plug in your ass humming away.

Gabriel gritted his teeth, not looking at Jack. "Going to wreck you both, don't worry. But you'll get yours tonight, Morrison. Anticipation and all that." Gabriel began to move again, burying himself deep inside you, each stroke leaving you breathless as the toy inside you vibrated. Gabriel's expression remained positively feral, his fingers digging into your skin, his cock battering against your inner walls.
Clawing at his back, you moved with him. Gabriel grunted and pushed you flat against the bed. Those dark eyes stayed on your face, though one hand moved to squeeze and pinch your breasts, and you clenched around him, sobbing his name as he pounded you into the mattress, fully intent on tearing you apart. It was a good thing he'd done this on the bed, and not bent over a desk or on the floor, because he wasn't holding back and you needed some cushioning.

You accepted what he had to give, metal fingers splayed at your side as you gripped his forearm with your right hand. You wouldn't be the only one with marks.

The vibrations in your ass spiked and you thrashed from side to side, squealing as Gabriel sped up. Each thrust bottomed out, and the intensity of it verged on pain. But seeing Gabriel like this had your blood up. You'd be sore later, but right now you wouldn't dream of stopping.

"Please-" You couldn't focus on much besides your own pleasure and watching Gabriel, the look on his face more akin to something you'd see on the battlefield.

"Begging for mercy already?" He rumbled, not letting up.

"No," you choked out. "Need you, papi. Want you to wreck me."

"You're just saying that because I have a time limit," Gabriel laughed harshly. "Maybe I'll take a half day too, and give my cock-starved girlfriend the ride of her life."

You grinned up at him, not quite as intimidated by that prospect as he expected. Partially because you loved rough sex with Gabriel, partially because most of that ire was directed at Jack.

"Hey, I took good care of her," Jack protested, not actually sounding offended.

"There's my cocktease boyfriend who needs a thorough pounding too," Gabriel said, shooting Jack a dirty look. "Though I might start with that smart mouth of his, since he doesn't know when to shut up."

"I love tasting her on your cock," Jack murmured, suddenly at your side. He leaned in to kiss Gabriel.

"You'll get your turn, mi cielito," Gabriel said, biting Jack's throat and Jack groaned, the need in his voice obscene. He turned those dark eyes back on you. "This one has gotten too cocky for her own good."

"I can help with that," Jack said, and suddenly the egg vibrator whirred to life. You swore loudly, and Gabriel stiffened. He gave Jack another sharp look before resuming his hard thrusts, his eyes on yours.

"You're not going to last, hermosa. Leaving those toys in place was a tactical mistake."

"You like how that sopping little cunt of yours squeezes me harder. Still going to wear you down before it affects m-Fuck!" Gabriel snarled as you clenched your inner muscles. With a growl, he shifted angles, pushing your knees over your head.

Your breath hitched and you wailed as he hit a vicious pace. Already you were drowning in sensations, your blood pounding in your ears. Gabriel's cock pushed you higher and higher and while you were pinned in place, your toes curled and your cries grew louder as you teetered on the edge.
"Papi," you moaned, voice raw. "Want you to claim my ass next-"

Cursing in profane Spanish, Gabriel's thrust grew wild and your inner muscles clamped down tight on him, before a ripple of pleasure spread outward, your orgasm dragging Gabriel deeper inside. You shrieked, not giving a damn how loud you were, because neither of you were holding back now.

"Goddamnit, baby girl-" Gabriel growled hoarsely. And he wasn't far behind you at all. With a roar, he hilted himself inside you, a flood of hot cum coating your inner walls. He released your legs, and you lay there, taking shaking breaths while he kissed your face, still muttering in Spanish. The toys shut off and you gave a sigh of relief.

"Fuck, that was hot," Jack groaned.

"Time," Gabriel said, voice raw.

"Eleven thirty," Jack said, a little breathless. "You know, that's a pretty early lun-"

"Can it, Morrison," Gabriel said, stroking your forehead. "Baby, do you really want me to-?" He studied your face, eyes still bright with excitement.

"Maybe not as rough as the last round," you said, when you could speak.

Suddenly you were on your stomach, and Gabriel was carefully pulling the plug out. Jack moved to your side, handing him more lube, and you inhaled shakily as Gabriel poured it inside you, before positioning his head at your back entrance.

"It's always so hot watching your ass take his massive cock," Jack said, patting your head. "Part of me is always a little apprehensive, like he's going to break you. Part of me can't wait to see it."

You buried your face in the pillow, whining as Gabriel slowly pushed inside you, his strokes more languid, one hand rubbing circles on your low back.

"Papi-" You whined, as he continued to stretch you out.

"Just breathe," he said, his voice a low rumble. "You're almost there."

"Thank you," you moaned. "Didn't really expect you to come by during the day. You really do spoil me-"

Gabriel groaned. "When did you get so fucking cute?" He growled in your ear. One arm circled around your waist and he pulled you into his lap, ass pressed against his thighs. He spread your knees over his.

Panting, you grinned at Jack, who might have conspired with you over this approach. After all, being difficult was fun, but maybe Gabriel had come to expect that, and being a Blackwatch agent, you had to be...flexible in your tactics.

You squealed as two fingers slid into your slick pussy. Gabriel began to bounce you on his lap, thick fingers pumping in and out of you while he stretched you out. You could feel him in your belly, and you whimpered softly as he began to rock his hips, beard brushing the nape of your neck. He was so warm, and you could feel yourself melting against his chest.

"Is this what you wanted, baby girl?" He murmured, no longer sounding quite so on edge.
You exhaled slowly, eyes half shut. "Yup." You tilted your head back, grinning up at Gabriel. "Thank you."

Gabriel's nostrils flared and he cupped your chin, kissing you again, fingers making lewd sounds inside your pussy. "Been thinking about you all day. And then Jack sent me that picture and I couldn't concentrate on another goddamn thing." You moaned as he fucked you slow and hard, his cock so deep you would swear you could feel him in the back of your throat.

"Going to do the same to Jack," you said cheerfully. "Only with a ballgag."

You could feel Gabriel twitch inside you at that statement. "Sounds good to me." He kissed the side of your neck. "Seeing you like this...corazon, I think you're playing with me."

"You're the one who's balls deep in my ass and pushing his cum back inside my pussy," you moaned.

Gabriel groaned. "Now I know you're fucking with me. Taking power bottom lessons from Jack, then?"

"Learning the art of being "cooperative," you said, giving Jack a smile. "Don't get too used to it."

Gabriel just laughed.

"Got room for one more?" Jack asked as he stroked himself, giving you and Gabriel a hopeful smile.

"Always," you said.

"I'm still sore at you," Gabriel said without any heat in his voice. "But you'll get yours tonight."

Beaming, Jack kissed Gabriel over your shoulders, and slowly pushed inside you.

"You're late now," Jack said as you lay curled between them, Gabriel stroking your hair and kissing your bruised shoulders. He'd left a large bite mark that was already starting to purple. The toys were cleaned up and you yawned, sleepy once more and rather disliking the thought of them both leaving so soon. You took a deep breath, reminding yourself that you were a competent, capable adult, and could function perfectly fine on your own.

"I'm taking a page from the Strike Commander's book and only putting in a half day," Gabriel said. "But now you're one who's going to be late."

You sighed happily as Jack kissed your forehead. He winked at you. "Guess I better get dressed." He made a hilariously pouty face, and mimed wiping away a tear. "If Gabe's staying behind, I had definitely better go in." He gave you both a wistful smile. "I'll see you both tonight?"

"Oh you can count on it," Gabriel said, giving Jack a vicious smile.
Hope everyone had a good New Year (celebration? night?) and that 2019 is better than 2017 & 2018 combined.

Hands are unpredictable. Trying to type gentler. That seems to help.
Chapter 112

Chapter Summary

The First Annual Blackwatch Tea Social

Chapter Notes

Annie Drew made some more In Alio Loco themed doodles.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"There you are," Jesse said, rolling his eyes as he caught you coming out of Gabriel's quarters with Isha. "Don't you check your messages, sugarpie? Also, I asked Athena to tell you-"

"I am not permitted in Commander Reyes' quarters," Athena said primly from the overhead speaker. "You should have knocked when I gave you her location."

"I ain't interrupting their private time," Jesse muttered, turning a red.

"Well, neither am I," Athena sniffed. "Don't ask me to do the jobs you're to chicken for, Jesse."

Jesse rolled his eyes and shook his head, giving the ceiling a fondly exasperated look. "Whatever you say, partner."

"Everything all right?" You asked, and Isha cocked her head to the side, chirping inquisitively at Jesse. You suspected she was looking for Bandit.

"Except for the fact you're late, yeah, everything is coming up daisies," Jesse said, grabbing your hand. "We have to move. Now."

"Wait, what?" You raised a brow. "Jesse, slow down. What's going on?"

"Ain't got time for explanations. Come on, hustle! We both need to get changed."

"Into what?" You narrowed your eyes in suspicion.

"Fancy suit things," Jesse laughed, dragging you back toward the Blackwatch dorms. "Come on. We're going to be late!"

You and Jesse both emerged at the same time, you in a variant of your Assassin Butler suit, a black and red waistcoat with gold accents, gold pocket square, and that slim gold tie you'd "borrowed" from Jack. Your gloves, however, stayed black. Isha wore her cute little black and blue vest, reluctantly, and you hugged her to your chest, careful to keep her claws from snagging on Jesse emerged in a black three piece suit with that damn silver bolo tie and his hair combed back like he was kid being sent off to church. You blinked, a little surprised that he'd actually used product on his hair.

"So what exactly are we doing?"

"Walk and talk," Jesse said, beckoning you to follow as he speed-walked down the hall. "Amélie got impatient. She spoke with Ziv. And bam! Things happened, because no one wants to keep her waiting," Jesse said with a nervous laugh. "Sorry, sugarpie. Would have tried to keep you in the loop, but it's been so busy and Amélie singlehandedly..." He trailed off, scratching the back of his head.

"Where's Bandit?" You asked, suddenly concerned.

"With Amélie," Jesse sighed. "She bought him a new outfit."

"I know someone who was supposed to be smart once said, "beware of ventures that require new clothes," you muttered.

"Ain't that the truth," Jesse nodded as you both emerged in the mess hall. To your surprise, three long tables had been put together into one large table, and covered in crisp white tablecloths. More shockingly, there were real live floral arrangements, as well as covered dishes, place settings with real porcelain plates, and several tea services on carts. The seats were not empty either, about a third of Blackwatch was there. And the kicker? You weren't the only one in formalwear.

Hanzo and Genji both wore their suits from the Shanghai trip, and you were grateful that you'd chosen the red and gold ensemble so you didn't match Hanzo's blue waistcoat. Bandit sat on Hanzo's lap, wearing a little doggie tuxedo, his bowtie silver, a top hat set on his head with an elastic strap. He didn't look pleased about the hat, but Genji was in the process of slipping him one of those red bean filled pancakes.

Riggs was setting cookies on the table, wearing a dove gray suit and white gloves, chatting happily with Ziv. Ziv was rocking a teal suit with lemon yellow gloves and a matching bowtie. He reminded you of a spring confection, maybe one of those sugar-coated marshmallow animals, only much surlier. But the outfit still looked shockingly good on him considering you'd never really pictured him as a pastels kind of guy.

At the center of things, Tataryn and Amélie seemed to be directing everyone.

Amélie had worn a suit, a slim cut number in indigo, no shirt underneath the jacket, gold necklaces layered along her collarbone. Her hair was up in an effortless chignon, and narrow-legged pants and gold heels rounded off the outfit. Amélie always looked amazing and graceful in dresses. It came as no surprise that she could absolutely slay in a suit.

Tataryn wore a white suit, with actual tails, gleaming buttons, and his hair flowed in golden waves down his back. A full-blossomed red rose graced his boutonnière, and he had topped the outfit off with white gloves. He smiled graciously at everyone, looking like a goddamn fairytale prince, and you glanced at Diallo, who was rolling her eyes good naturedly.

She wore an elaborately patterned dress, all geometric shapes and full layered skirts in bold primary colors. There was a platinum tiara on her head, a simple upside-down triangle, but her hair was out of its knots in a lion's mane of natural curls. She winked at Jesse and then tugged on something. You recognized that tiny gloved hand, clenched in an angry fist.

Glaring, Vo sat there beside her, expression vicious as she yanked her hand free and crossed her arms. Cleaned up, hair combed, and wearing a too-large and obviously borrowed blazer, Vo gave Amélie and Tataryn the dirtiest look you’d ever seen, and promptly crammed a handful of petit fours in her mouth. Her cheeks bulged comically as she turned that glare on you, and you nearly choked on your tongue.

"There you are, Chanceux," Amélie beamed at you. "You're just in time."

"For what?" You blurted out as Tataryn pulled out a chair for you beside Amélie.

"The First Annual Blackwatch Tea Social," Amélie laughed, like you said something especially silly. "Come now, Chanceux, you organized most of it."

"Huh," was all that you could say. Because getting most everyone in one place was like herding cats. But you had at least gotten everyone to agree on what they were going to bring...

You glanced at the very fancy teapot in front of Tataryn, and he smirked as he poured something obviously not hot into his dainty teacup. This close, and you could definitely smell the bourbon. Shaking your head, you debated pouring yourself a glass. You weren't on duty after all.

"We got it!" Shoal shouted as she stumbled into the gathering. She wore the same pretty green dress she’d had in Cologne, and was carrying a familiar cake box from your favorite bakery. Jemison was with her, also in same slick white suit she’d worn when she escorted Jack to Cologne; she had three covered pies and no packaging, so maybe they were homemade? You did recall that she’d promised Shoal "all the pie she could eat" for taking the trainer position in her stead. Távio was right behind her with more bags and he wore a deep green suit, black shirt, and white tie that all looked much more...stylish than he usually dressed. You glanced at Amélie who just beamed at you.

"Ziv helped him," she said. "He is learning to be a good mentor."

And you would bet your left thumb that Amélie helped Ziv, but there was no reason to point that out. "Very nice," you said with a nod.

"Make sure you tell him that," Amélie said.

All this formalwear and hubbub had not gone unnoticed. Passing Overwatch agents were openly staring, maybe with a little bit of envy, as Jesse and Tataryn began pouring tea and distributing desserts and little trays of sandwiches around the table. You started to stand up so you could help, but Amélie placed a hand on your shoulder.

"Relax, Chanceux. Enjoy yourself. We have the rest of it taken care of." She smiled brightly at you, eyes twinkling with delight. "Isha looks absolutely darling. Was that handmade?" The curve of her smile revealed that she knew exactly who’d been sewing outfits for your raptor.

"Yeah, another exclusive," you said, stroking Isha's feathered head.

"He will have to make me some as well," Amélie said, with the cheerful confidence of someone who had no doubt that she would get what she wanted.

Other Blackwatch agents stopped by to chat, but only the ones in full formal attire sat down at the table. In fact, you noticed little handwritten cards mapping out all the seating arrangements. Had she actually managed to get Blackwatch agents to RSVP? How? Holy shit, Amélie was going to be amazing at handling agents.

Isha gave an impatient trill and you looked to your right, where Tataryn had set a little box on the chair for her sit on. Shaking your head, you set her on the box and grabbed a little ham and watercress sandwich to put on her plate.

"Remember to use good manners," you said, wondering if she would just cram the sandwich in her mouth, but she gave Amélie a wary look and picked up the sandwich, taking delicate bites.

Jesse grinned at your murderbird, as he lifted the fraisier from its box and set it on the table. You didn't miss how Hanzo's head snapped to the side, his focus on the strawberry cake. Hell, the intensity of his gaze had probably started melting the whipped cream already. Rolling his eyes, Jesse left the cake within Hanzo's reach and came to pour you some tea. He didn't ask what you wanted, he just gave you a cup of earl grey, with a touch of cream, sugar, and lemon. You might have chosen something else, if you'd had the chance, but it was good, and you inclined your head in thanks.

Then he poured Isha a cup of cream with a straight face and you sighed as she dunked her snout in it.

Shoal and Jemison sat down near you, Shoal helping Jemison lay out the fruit pies: apple, cherry, and coconut cream by the look of it. You grinned at Jemison.

"Jesse invited us. Hope it's OK that we're crashing your Blackwatch party. We brought desserts! Jemmy made all those pies herself," Shoal stage-whispered. "And they're scrummy."

"...I'm still not sure that's a real word, let alone a compliment," Jemison said, one arm draped over the back of her chair. "Thanks for the invitation. It has occurred to me that we could all come down with food poisoning, because that's just the kind of luck you have, but I'm willing to risk it."

You snorted. "Your valor is unmatched."

"I have served in many dangerous places," Jemison said with an agreeable nod. "The tundras of Siberia, the salt flats of Bolivia, the Great Basin desert, but I have yet to attend a tea party with the infamous Lucky Strike."

"It's a good thing we're at headquarters," Shoal giggled. "At least if a dragon attacks or omnics start flooding the toilets, we'll have backup and plenty of guns."

"Always a possibility when Lucky Strike is involved," Jemison said solemnly.

"You guys are jerks," you said, rolling your eyes.

Isha just reached over and took two more sandwiches.

"Hey, we're here, aren't we? And not just because we like to party. Also, Jemmy really wants to pet your dinosaur," Shoal said, cutting herself a generous slice of cherry pie.

Jemison bit her lower lip, fingers coiling around her braids. It was the first time you'd actually seen her look nervous. "Bridget."

"Come on, we both know that's what it is," Shoal continued casually. "Jemmy's embarrassed to admit it, but I still have my plastic dinosaur sets from when I was eight, and..."
absolutely no shame over it." She winked at you.

You rolled your eyes. "Keep it down."

"Was it Zhai? Because that would make sense..."

You nearly facepalmed, before reminding yourself that Shoal was Epsilon Squad's hacker, and a very competent agent, no matter how friendly and silly she acted with you. Jack's elite team wouldn't be made up of fools.

"Isha, Shoal is the one with red hair, Jemison is the one with dark hair." You pointed at them. "They're friendly."

Isha nodded, not looking up from her sandwich, though by now you knew she heard and processed everything you said.

Shoal extended a forkful of pie. "Can she have some?"

Isha looked up then, blue eyes narrowed. Obviously, she recognized offers of treats, the gluttonous beast.

"Sure," you said. "Though I wouldn't share forks with her-"

Shoal didn't listen, her fork hovering in Isha's face. Isha took a bite, teeth scraping against the fork as she bit down.

"-for that reason."

Shoal withdrew a slightly bent fork, her grin widening. Isha chewed happily and glanced at Shoal's plate.

"It's my turn," Jemison said, lightly shoving Shoal back. She offered a spoonful of coconut cream, which Isha happily took, smearing the filling on her chin. You offered her a napkin, and she blotted at her face, chirping excitedly.

"Yes, you may have some pie," you said, already standing to cut her small bites of each one. "Jemison made these, so if you're good-"

Isha turned those clever eyes on Jemison, cocked her head to the side, and chirped approvingly. You'd never seen the lieutenant smile so wide.

"I still can't believe Morrison let you keep her," Shoal said, shaking her head. "I'm starting to believe the blackmail angle."

"You'd blackmail your own mother for a velociraptor," Jemison said, reaching for the ngalakh. Diallo made hers with a mix of baobab and guava juices, strong vanilla, and extra fluffy couscous.

You shrugged. "He likes animals."

Jemison snorted, and you had the sneaking feeling that even if Shoal had no idea what was going on between you and Jack, Jemison suspected. Surprisingly, after all this, that didn't bother you now. Epsilon Squad might not be your unit, but they were good people. So you just had a cucumber sandwich and smiled serenely at them both.

"Blackmail," Shoal repeated, eyes wide as she offered Isha another bite of pie.
Ziv sidled up to you, carrying a bowl of hummus. Without asking, he spooned a large dollop onto your plate, then Isha's. "Savta's recipe," he said briskly, before carrying his bowl off, not offering any to Shoal or Jemison.

Jemison gave him a dirty look, but Shoal scrunched her face up, running one hand through her short curls as she watched Isha begin to lick the plate.

"Is it safe for her to eat hummus?" Shoal asked.

"Yeah," you said. "He's given it to her before. It's really good hummus."

"I want hummus," Jemison said, elbowing Shoal lightly. "You brought pie. It's a good exchange."

"Oh I will," Jemison scowled, standing up and stalking off to catch up to Ziv.

"Ah Bridget, I have you all to myself now." Tataryn said, slipping into Jemison's chair. "Well, I guess I can share you with Lucky. She's collecting quite the harem-

You nearly choked on your earl grey.

"God, you're ridiculous, Tataryn," Shoal said, turning beet red.

"Ridiculously good looking," he sighed, giving her a slow, sexy smile, those light blue eyes promising all kinds of wickedness. You briefly felt your own pulse speed up. Goddamn Tataryn, messing with everyone.

You looked up, a little surprised to see Riggs watching Tataryn with an equally red face. So that was his type. To be fair, Tataryn could transform into anyone and everyone's type. He was disturbingly good at playing a role. Shaking your head, you smiled down at Isha, who was happily drinking her cream and eating her pie. An Athena drone hovered nearby, and you hoped she was getting pictures that she would share with you.

"Oh, I'm just in time!" Boomed a familiar voice, and you nearly fell out of your chair. Reinhardt pulled up an entire table, and set a large box down. "I had to get some help with the setup, but it is working fine now!"

Amélie's eyes widened as he lifted an object out of the box. It was a five tier chocolate fountain, at least a meter high, and with the press of a button, the melted chocolate began to circulate. Beaming, Reinhardt unpacked a tray of fruit and cookies to dip in it.

Vo's eyes got big and round and she poked Diallo rapidly, before getting up, her gaze never leaving the fountain. Isha also eyed the display with undisguised enthusiasm, and you had brief visions of both Vo and Isha sticking their heads into the fountain and just drinking straight from it.

"I'll get you some. You stay where you're at. I mean it," you told your murderbird.

She gave you a dirty look.

You weren't sure if a chocolate fountain was appropriate at a tea party, but you weren't going to complain.

"Távio asked to invite him," Amélie leaned over, her smile sly. "I suspect his feelings would have been hurt otherwise." And it was a good idea for Reinhardt to get to know some of the Blackwatch operatives. He wasn't in their direct chain of command, so a little fraternization wouldn't hurt anything. "Though I did have to tell him that currywurst was not appropriate for the occasion."

"Someone would have eaten it," you said with a shrug as you rose to get Isha some chocolate and fruit.

Reinhardt stood beside Riggs, chatting happily with him and Ziv. Riggs watched the older man with a familiar reverence that you recognized as hero worship.

You grabbed several strawberries, a banana on a stick, and some small cookies, and dipped them in the upper tier, not missing how Vo was just hanging out there helping herself to the platter. Fortunately, she was still using the foods and not her bare hands. She moved with a mechanical efficiency, dunking, eating, and repeating. You left her there and hovered behind Hanzo and Genji with an apple slice to offer Bandit.

"Your approach could use some work," Hanzo said, not looking up.

"Did you want an apple slice too?" You asked, not taking the bait.

Genji chuckled. "Mihret came through with the wagashi. Did you help him acquire them?"

"...I showed him where to get them awhile ago," you said. "I'm as shocked as you are that he was actually listening."

"Yes, well, you occasionally do say useful things," Hanzo said, without intonation. "Unlike Feng."

"Oh, is there trouble in paradise?" You grinned at Genji who looked even more amused.

"I have no idea what you're talking about," Hanzo scowled at you, brows heavy. "If you have something to say, state it plainly."

HA! Your smile widened. Like you would make it that easy for him, especially after all the guessing games he put you through. "I figured you'd be a good team is all," you said smoothly. "You know, bonding over desserts, video games, and dealing with the difficulties that come from having lots of family members who are firmly entrenched in the world of organized crime..."

"We have more in common than I first imagined," Hanzo said begrudgingly. "But she refuses to have a serious conversation with me."

"...I thought all your conversations were serious," you said, and Genji snorted.

"Yes, well she's absolutely maddening," Hanzo said, real heat in his voice. "Maybe you can talk some sense into her."

Ha! You nearly choked to death on your chocolate-coated strawberry. You weren't sure where Hanzo got this overinflated view of your abilities, considering how often he belittled you, but you played along. "Is she threatening to make engineer fire-breathing unicorns again? Because if she is..."

"That's not what I'm referring to," Hanzo scowled.

"I have no idea what you're referring to," you admitted, and Hanzo glared at the table.
"We can talk about it later," Genji said, oddly calm. "Privately." He took a mooncake, and placed it on his already full plate. Who brought those? He drank that bitter green tea, no sugar, no milk, and chose teeth-achingly sweet desserts to complement it. You watched Hanzo feed Bandit a small roast beef sandwich and shook your head.

"Sure, I'd be...interested in continuing this conversation later." Like when Hanzo learned how to use less cryptic sentences.

Hanzo gave curt nod, clearly dismissing you and you waved, returning to your spot where Tataryn and Shoal were now discussing electronic surveillance techniques. You set a chocolate-covered banana on Isha's plate and sat down.

"Where's mine?" Amélie teased, elbowing you lightly.

You silently offered her your plate, and she haughtily plucked a chocolate-covered strawberry off it.

"I wanted the banana," she said sotto voce.

"I bet you did," you said out of the corner of your mouth. "But this is a public gathering."

Amélie laughed one hand pressed to her chest. "Chanceux! You are outrageous!"

"Your charms are simply too much to foist on unsuspecting agents," you said, shaking your head with mock regret. "You must learn to be more responsible with your powers."

"You sound just like Gérard," Amélie said with a sniff and you wrinkled your nose. She smirked at you, like she knew that comparison would get your goat.

"Hey, if even your own husband fears your prowess..." You shrugged. "Well, who am I to argue?"

Amélie rewarded you with one her delighted smiles as she took another strawberry off your plate.

"He has been making a great deal of progress too," she said, watching as Jesse offered both Ziv and Jemison tea. It looked like Jemison had a generous portion of hummus on her plate, and Ziv wasn't frothing and spitting, so you assumed the interaction had gone well.

"I have to credit your influence," you said, with a wry smile. "I probably let him get away with too much."

"Mmm, perhaps," Amélie said diplomatically. "But you were there when he needed a friend or a sister. You have helped him through hard times. That is so much more important."

You blinked a few times. "I suppose you're right."

"He does have a long way to go," Amélie said smiling fondly. "But I think he will do well in leadership, don't you?"

You inhaled tea down the wrong passage and nearly spat it out. Patting your chest, you coughed discretely into your napkin. "What?"

"Agent McCree has been stepping up more and more," Amélie continued giving you a slightly concerned look. "He may not be ready yet, but I think he will make a fine commanding officer."

You realized then that she hadn't been talking about Ziv at all, and you coughed a few more times, laughing softly to yourself. "Yeah, Jesse's great. You're absolutely right. He just needs room to grow."

"Gérard was concerned in the beginning. Gabriel brought home this scrawny, filthy, almost unintelligible stray, and press ganged him into service. We weren't so sure what he saw in him, but now we know. Gabriel has always had an eye for quality." She gave you a sly look.

"Yeah," you said, smiling as Jesse grinned back at you, raising his teacup as a salute. "I guess he has."

Jesse said something and Jemison actually laughed, Ziv rolling his eyes and flouncing off to talk to Reinhardt.

"Agent Strike, how unsurprising that I should find you in the center of this...disturbance on a work day."

You looked over your shoulder, raising a brow at Oladele as he stood there in his suit, a faint smile on his face.

"I'm suspended," you said with a shrug. "But I was still invited to the tea social. I hope that isn't a problem."

Oladele surveyed the table, and you glanced over his shoulder, looking for Beaumont.

"Oh, she's off filing some kind of complaint with Petras," Oladele said with a sharp smile. "I think that's what we're calling it anyway."

You bit back a grin.

"Oi, Oladele!" You blinked and Shoal was on her feet. "You must have brass balls." She stood there, hands on her hips as she glared at Oladele, teeth bared.

"Bridget, it's very good to see you again. I will admit that I understand the idiom, but not the context," Oladele said, smiling weakly.

"Don't you "Bridget" me!" Shoal scowled and you caught sight of Tataryn's razor sharp smile as he leaned back in his chair. "And don't act like you don't know what I'm talking about!"

You wondered, briefly, if he'd failed to call her after...

"We all know that Lucky saved your ungrateful ass in DC, here you are repaying her with a goddamn political crucifixion. Is it just you or is your boss in on it too? Because we're going to have some words with her tomorrow night!"

You blinked, and Oladele had the grace to wince. That's right, Epsilon Squad was providing Kwento with additional security. "Bridget, I-"

"That's "Agent Shoal" to you," she snapped. "Epsilon Squad doesn't associate with ungrateful backstabbers! And let me tell you, everyone at this table will agree with me too: Yeah, Lucky Strike's a shit magnet, but that's not her fault, she can't seem to help it. And despite it all, she's still a damn good agent!"
"I'll drink to that!" Jesse called from across the way.

"Prost!" Reinhardt boomed.

"A la tienne!" Amélie cheered.

"Sláinte!"

"Будьмо!" Tataryn laughed.

There were more shouts, applause, and raised glasses and Shoal turned a little pink in the cheeks. You could feel heat rising in yours as most of the party called out their toasts. Genji raising his cup silently, Hanzo slamming his empty cup against the table, his expression even more severe than usual.

Oladele winced, rubbing the back of his neck, not quite shriveling under the unfriendly attention of Blackwatch, but definitely aware of the tension in the situation. "I am well aware of the complexities of Agent Strike's situation and am taking this very seriously, my friend." He gave Shoal a reassuring smile. "Though I had not realized she was quite this well-regarded."

Neither were you, to be honest, but sharing food and drink with your peers did wonders for morale and solidarity. You smiled wryly at Shoal.

"Well, that's good," Shoal said tightly, now looking a little self conscious. "Glad to hear it."

"I wouldn't dream of upsetting you or Isabella," Oladele said with a surprisingly honest smile. "You are too good with computers and she can shoot the eye off a fish. Besides, who else would offer me such good games mancala and go?"

Shoal squinted at him. "I'll trounce your ass at go."

"I look forward to it," Oladele said with genuine pleasure. "Enjoy your party, Agent Strike," he said a little more formally with you. "It is good to see that you are keeping your spirits up, and that you have the support of your comrades."

"Thanks," you said, not entirely sure how to respond without giving the game away. Even though you weren't as convinced as Lacroix that Kwento wasn't out to dig up dirt on Blackwatch.

He inclined his head politely, and walked away at a steady pace. A lesser man would have run.

"Well then," you said, grinning at Shoal. "It looks like I owe you a drink."

Laughing, Shoal slapped you on the back and cut herself another piece of pie. "I like whiskey too. But I like dessert even more."

"A woman after my own heart," Tataryn said, his tone outrageously flirtatious as he leaned over to pat Shoal's arm.

"Is this troublemaker getting too rowdy?" Jesse said, leaning over Shoal's other shoulder and refilling her tea. "Because just say the word, darlin' and I'll kick his fancy pants across the room. Just for you." Jesse gave her a cheeky wink.

"You would try," Tataryn said, his smile still good-natured.

"Lucky, how do you deal with these two clowns all day?" Shoal laughed, shoving them both out of her space.

You just shrugged, grinning at stupidly at your friends. Blackwatch Tea Social, huh? You were going to make damn sure that this became a tradition. And you were going to have to pack Jack and Gabriel some goodies, but that was a problem for later. For now you would enjoy the food, the atmosphere, and the company of your friends.

"We are going to have to move sooner than I like," Gérard said, looking over the data Gabriel had compiled. The spy had his own sources in Hanoi that verified some of Prince's stories of omnic-built security upgrades.

"Hanoi is long over due," Gabriel said, dryly. "We were already planning for it last year."

"If we'd rushed in last year, it would have been catastrophic," Gérard said, shaking his head. "If we rush in now, it still could be. The defenses are formidable."

"And Nguyen has had a lot of time to prepare for us," Gabriel said. "They've only gotten worse."

Gérard shook his head. "Perhaps, but we are better-equipped than before. I understand what we are getting into, and how we are getting out intact. That is no small feat."

"Yeah, your operation is pretty solid. Though you modified a lot of Lucky and Jesse's work."

"They did well," Gérard nodded. "But there were some nuances they missed. I have already made certain that they understand where they erred. For example, the abandoned subway tunnels would have been poor choices to use during the rainy season. But since we're going in during winter, we should be fine."

Gabriel nodded, because Gérard was a meticulous strategist. Gabriel understood terrain, combat, and even people very well. He had backup plans, escape routes, and assaults already mapped out. But Gérard made situational contingencies, and those were invaluable as well. Despite the verbal sniping and occasional petty tensions, the two men worked very well together, Gabriel providing an overarching strategy, and Gérard filling in the gaps, amending oversights, and generally providing tiny nuggets of insight on things Gabriel might have otherwise overlooked.

"Also I want to make sure we have On Sing on standby should we need support: medical, transport, cyber, noncombatant roles only. Ms. Zhai would come to our aid, should we require reinforcements, but I know that we would all prefer to not directly involve the Triads."

"...Support roles only," Gabriel said, grudgingly, because he did not want to owe that maniac anything. It wasn't that he actually disliked her, but someone had to keep an objective eye on your new friend. And it certainly wasn't Jack. Just the other day he'd walked in on Jack and her chatting on the phone about more vacations. Not that Gabriel minded that. Hell, he appreciated Jack putting more effort into the relationships. It was refreshing. But Zhai Feng wasn't Maggie. Zhai Feng was On Sing's Dragonhead, the caretaker of a mad AI, and playing god with her genetic designs. She might be friendly, but she was dangerous, and someone had to remember that.

"Dinner tomorrow then?" Gérard asked as he scanned the screen, overlaying entry trajectories on a courtyard, and running turret simulations while he spoke. He adjusted the course multiple times till he found an approach that suited him.
"You've already made reservations, haven't you?" Gabriel sighed, not at all fooled by Gérard's casual delivery.

"I checked your schedules. They were open," Gérard said, a small smile on his face. "Amélie will make sure Chanceux is aware of the event. I've already spoken to Jack. He is game."

Gabriel laughed, shaking his head. "You leave nothing to chance, do you?"

"Not the serious matters," Gérard said as he began running another simulation, this time it was a firefight in a lab. "And what is more serious than dinner?"

Gabriel narrowed his eyes as Gérard adjusted the parameters of the assault, a light two-man team storming an adjacent panic room. "That plan," Gabriel said, not taken in by the spy's flippancy.

"Ah," Gérard said, giving Gabriel a wry look, like he had hoped the other man wouldn't notice what he was up to. "Yes, I suppose we can discuss that one now."

Frowning, Gabriel leaned back in his chair, waiting for Lacroix to talk his way out of this one.

"Really?" You sighed as you packed up a box of desserts for your lovers. Surprisingly, there had been some left over, though you hadn't missed Vo cramming a whole slice of cake into the pocket of her borrowed blazer. You had just turned your head, pretending not to see, because it wasn't your coat and you had learned to choose your battles. Távio packed her a large box of chocolate-dipped fruit, and you gave him an approving nod. You would start coating Brussels sprouts in chocolate, if it meant she would eat more fresh produce.

"It's just dinner," Amélie said, shaking her head. "We dress up, we go out, we eat. Nothing difficult about it."

"Uh-huh," you said, not buying that explanation for a second. That was a gross and misleading oversimplification of the situation. Jack and Gabriel dining out at a fancy restaurant would attract attention, and that was attention you, personally, didn't need. None of you did. Jack and Gabriel were very public figures. Lacroix and Amélie had massive target signs on their backs. "And your security?"

"You, Jack, and Gabriel will be there. We will have the best backup in the world," she said cheerfully. "Chanceux, you of all people understand how difficult it is to sacrifice happiness in the name of safety procedures."

You flinched. "Yeah, you're right." Of course Amélie just wanted to do something she found normal. That wasn't actually unreasonable.

"And I would like a night with just friends. No business. We don't do that nearly enough," she said, eyes downcast.

"...Don't you still talk to your...other friends?" You asked, because Amélie traveled in many social circles during her time as a ballerina.

"Some. It is too risky in regular contact with any of them now, for their own safety," she said, shaking her head. "There are not many with whom I can discuss personal business."
"What about Odile?" You asked, remembering the photographs of Amélie's childhood friend. "Doesn't she ever visit?"

"After a fashion," Amélie said, eyes losing their mournfulness, her smile strangely pleased. "But Gérard might have something to say about that-"

"Seriously?" You scowled. "He'd give you crap about your one of your oldest friendsh-

"Never," Amélie said, her smile even brighter and you had long given up trying to figure out exactly what you did to garner that look from her. "Do not worry. It was just a little joke. Gérard would never dream of forbidding me from seeing anyone."

"Yeah, OK," you said, mollified by her sheer amusement at the suggestion.

"But it is rare to have friends with whom we can enjoy good food, and scintillating conversation, and occasionally a vicious fight. And I must admit, I am dying to talk about Paris Fashion Week with Gabriel. I have some early previews and-"

"Oh boy," you muttered under your breath.

"Quoi?"

"Nothing," you said quickly. "That uh... sounds like fun. He'd like that."

"And Gérard does enjoy talking about basketball with him."

You blinked. You hadn't realized Lacroix had any interest in team sports.

"When we were young it was so easy to just go out with friends on a whim. We'd meet up over coffee with no notice, then end up spending all night out, drinking, dancing, gossiping by the fire on a beach...That has changed." Amélie gave you a mournful look and you winced.

Sighing, you resigned yourself to the fact that this was a battle you couldn't win. Instead, you focused on bargaining Amélie down. Maybe you could all eat in or choose a more secure location. All you had to do was persuade her to see things from your perspective and appeal to her better nature. Easy...right? "I'm just concerned about the publicity and the fallout if certain people are seen with me in public right now. It could complicate things even-"

"Oh, we rented out a private room. Gérard has an understanding with the owner. Do not fret. We know how to be discrete," Amélie said cheerfully.

"It is difficult to dress up in fine evening wear and be discrete: I'd say those two actions have opposing goals," you said, trying another approach.

"You are not incorrect, but in this particular situation, we are not seeking attention from the rest world, just our nearest and dearest," Amélie winked. "I completely understand your worries, Chanceux, but Gérard and I have been planning this for quite some time. We are not just treating it like a night out, but a full-fledged operation."

You almost said, "when don't you treat socializing like a full-fledged operation?" but realized that wouldn't help your case at all. "There are spies all over Zurich-"

"And none better than my husband," Amélie beamed at you. "More importantly, the food is exquisite, the wine list has already been specially-arranged by yours truly, and I know for a fact that a certain world famous pâtissier will be making his infamous Tiramisu Bomboloni Tower, chestnut and salted caramel panna cotta, and of course, his signature apricot amaretto meringue cake—"

You groaned, staring balefully at Amélie. Neither Lacroix played fair, and you were running out of ideas. Mostly because half of your own treacherous brain was now focused on rare and heavenly desserts.

"Jack—"

"Was the first to RSVP, last week I believe," Amélie said, her smile sly, as if she could already sense her impending checkmate. "Agent McCree has agreed to look after Isha. And Gérard is confirming with Gabriel as we speak. I do believe your schedule is currently open, and who knows when we will get a chance to do this again?" Amélie continued wistfully, deftly hammering the final nails of guilt into the coffin of your resistance. "We want this to be special—"

Groaning, you leaned back in your chair, knowing that you had been outmatched, outplayed, and outnumbered. You might be learning to think five steps ahead of the opposition, but you still had a long way to go before you could expect to match wits with a Lacroix and come out the definitive winner.

"Yeah, all right. I'll put on a dress, and makeup, and fancy clothes, and try not to bring the party down." Goddamn, she had you trained.

Amélie laughed pleasantly, with the smooth confidence of a graceful winner. "You are too hard on yourself," she said. "It is Jack's wardrobe that I am most concerned over..."

"Oh, yeah, he did make himself a prom suit out of duct tape," you said, recalling the photos Maggie sent. "And not just plain silver duct tape. It was the yellow duck patterned one." Apparently, that style had been on sale at the time.

Amélie blinked once. Then twice. And you could see her processing your words, possibly translating them into French, then back into English, and still being unable to make sense of them.

You got out your phone, glancing around to make sure no one was looking over your shoulder. You showed her then, eighteen year old Jack Morrison, beaming at the camera, swathed collar to toes in a crude suit made of white duct tape covered in yellow ducks. Someone had even made him a bowtie and boutonnière out of the same material.

"Oh..." Amélie gasped, eyes widening in horror. "Mon dieu." She sat back in her seat, expression dazed. "That is...the multipurpose adhesive used to repair air ducts, yes?"

"It has a lot of uses," you said cheerfully. "But that was the original purpose."

"...Does he still have this...article of clothing?" The last phrase was spoken with the distaste that would normally be reserved for words like "atrocity," or "rodent corpse," or even "bureaucrat."

"Maybe," you said, though you knew it wouldn't fit him, not after SEP. Might fit Michael though. You wondered, briefly, if Michael had done the same thing. You'd have to ask.

"I will...have a discrete word with Gabriel," she said after a few deep breaths. "I am certain he would never allow the Strike Commander to appear in public dressed like that."

"Of course not," you said, nodding sympathetically. "But you see my concern."
Amélie nodded solemnly. "I am beginning to comprehend what a heavy burden Gabriel bears."

You almost laughed, till you realized she wasn't just talking about Jack.

"So I hear you got railroaded too, huh?" You asked as you stepped into the office, a little amused by Gabriel's grimace. You had a bag of leftovers in one arm, and an overfed, sleepy raptor in the other. She cooed drowsily and you scratched her head.

"Those two are incredibly dangerous together," Gabriel muttered, referring to the Lacroix couple. "I don't know why I was ever worried about her safety. She's too fucking cunning. Can talk her way in and out of everything."

"Relationship goals," you said solemnly. "One day the three of us could be even more dangerous together."

"We're plenty dangerous together," Gabriel scowled at you. "Maybe not as slick, but that's Jack bringing down the team."

You snorted, not entirely sure if that was an accurate assessment. The three of you could be pretty handy in combat, as you'd seen in DC, but Amélie and Lacroix seemed to work in perfect synchronization. It would be some time before you reached that level of teamwork. You gently set Isha down in her bed and she snuffled softly as you covered her with a blanket. "Yeah, apparently he RSVP'd and didn't warn us?"

"I am well aware," Gabriel said, raising a brow as you unpacked one box of desserts for him. "So you did bring me something from your little unsanctioned party. A little warning would have been nice." He gave you a sardonic look. "Do you know how many inquiries I had to field about what exactly my agents were doing and how come other people didn't get invitations?"

"Nope, no idea," you said cheerfully. "I didn't know it was going on till Jesse dragged me over. Apparently, Amélie and Tataryn took over the planning since I've been...preoccupied."

"I see," Gabriel's expression softened. "Just so you know, Ana is incredibly put out."

"Already accounted for: Jesse and Reinhardt were taking her a batch of goodies, as a friendly self-preservation gesture," you said. "I have some for Jack too."

"Heard Wilhelm brought a goddamn chocolate fountain." Gabriel looked just a little sulky, but he didn't say anything to that effect. You both understood that no matter how much his subordinates loved him, having the Blackwatch Commander there would dampen the mood. This was a agents-only social event. Reinhardt was the exception, and only because he wasn't in any Blackwatch agent's direct chain of command.

"He did. Amélie miraculously managed to convince him to bring something other than sausages. Spent some time making sure that Vo and Isha didn't go play in it." You set chocolate-covered berries, bananas, and pastries on a plate in front of him. There were plenty of dessert samples, and Gabriel's lips quirked upward as you poured him tea from a thermos. "I'm pretty sure Hanzo and Vo ate their respective weights in sweets." You also saw Genji packing up some select chocolate items and heading in the direction of the infirmary, but that was only something you'd only point out to Jesse.
"So you had fun?" Gabriel asked.

"Yeah," you said, looking up to see him smiling wryly at you. "I did."

"That's good," he said, picking up a strawberry. "Tell me all about it."

So you did, from Jesse and Athena being unwilling to bother you in his quarters, to Shoal's confrontation with poor Oladele, to Amélie's tactical manners victory. Gabriel snacked on the food you brought him, his shoulders relaxing as you recounted Jesse and Tataryn's outrageous flirtations with Shoal.

"An Annual Blackwatch Tea Social, huh?" He chuckled. "I'm not against it, on the condition that someone brings me a tithe of the desserts."

"And your sexy butler serves them to you with tea?"

"I prefer liquor and coffee, but I suppose I'll take the sexy butler," he said, fingers gripping your tie. He tugged you closer, lips brushing gently against yours.

You laughed, kissing him back. "We need to get Jack back for failing to inform us of this upcoming social obligation."

"Oh yes," Gabriel agreed, his smile downright mean. "We do."

"Ambush him tonight? But not in the way he likes."

Chapter End Notes

With my wrists being how they are, I'm trying to keep the update schedule to once a week.

So, I'm still thinking on it, but I did see the "Soldier 76 identifies as gay" tweet and am conflicted about how to write the Angst!AU. On one hand, I've been writing excerpts/plotting/talking about it for awhile. On the other hand, it's not published and writing Jack as bisexual instead of gay feels like erasure. Granted IAL is fucking huge, canon-divergent, and has generated quite a lot of its own internal lore. I considered writing it as "poly-relationship, but Jack isn't sexually attracted to Lucky," but that doesn't quite feel right either. Part of the trouble is, things go terribly wrong, like they do in canon, and while the story goes into several reasons (part of it being the strain on the relationship and things not being as healthy as they should be), it may come off as "in contrast to In Alio Loco, if Jack was only more committed to Gabriel and especially Lucky, everything would have turned out fine." And that's not accurate. Granted the Angst!AU will have a lot less sex than IAL because, well, circumstances. I'm still mulling it over, so your comments are welcome.

Also, I'm a little annoyed at this lore dropping this late and through Twitter. More representation is great. But this kind of feels like J K Rowling announcing Dumbledore is gay after the series is over, you know? Am also slightly concerned about "Gabriel's family." I am adding something to that effect in the Angst!AU, but it's obviously canon divergent.
Chapter 113

Chapter Summary

The perils of trying to going out and have nice things.

Chapter Notes

Mamimi made R76 kids celebrating the lore announcement.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"Next week?" You couldn't hide your surprise. "So soon?"

Lacroix nodded grimly. "I've been able to independently confirm some of Prince's claims. If we wait, the proposed tech upgrades will negate our current approach. We need to strike Hanoi earlier than I would like."

You sat across from him, arms crossed. "And then transition directly into Operation Crashhawk." Which meant you would be going to Shanghai after Hanoi, having "fallen" in combat.

"Yes," Lacroix said. "Operation Tarasque is going live."

You exhaled. You'd been over this plan numerous times. You'd seen the terrain from satellite and localized photography. You knew your fellow agents were more than capable. But this, this operation was big. Not just in that it had multiple combat squads working under black ops conditions. This operation had been your goal from the moment you set foot in Zurich. This was the justice you'd sought for Black Base Delta, for your dead friends, for Shin and Captain Patel.

And it brought equal parts fear and exhilaration to your chest.

"It will be combat-heavy," Lacroix said, bringing up a screen, showing the courtyard approach, complete with heavy omnic mechs and multiple turrets. "Nguyen has fortified her home, and while I've been able to work some vulnerabilities into key points, we will have to be extremely cautious."

You knew this. Nguyen's Hanoi complex was home to an entire mercenary company, several researchers, dozens of combat-grade omnics, and other nasty tech surprises.

Gabriel would be leading the main fire team to their central command. Tataryn, Diallo, and Jesse would be his backup. They would be drawing most of the attention. Genji, Hanzo, and Ziv would be taking the southern labs, mining data and taking prisoners as needed. You and Lacroix would be going directly after Nguyen. Everyone would have combat-ready Athena drones. On Sing would be on standby: Lacroix and Zheng brokered a deal on sharing technology gleaned from Nguyen's databases.
Amélie was not coming, and you had not said anything about this, mostly because you understood that she would have an extra large target on her back. Nguyen was after Amélie to get to Lacroix. There was no point in making that easier for her.

"Will that be enough?" You could work fine with Lacroix, but having only two of you seemed...insufficient.

"She will be expecting me," Lacroix said. "She will want to see me face to face. Maybe she will be expecting Amélie, but she will not be expecting to you."

"So we're walking directly into a trap," you said, shaking your head.

Lacroix shrugged. "After a fashion." He leaned forward. "There will be omnics. There will be least one other human. A relative of hers probably. It will be private and intimate, as all revenge killings should be."

You weren't even surprised. "Oh boy."

"Do not relax your guard. She will not make it too easy for us. If she has any control of the situation, she will be gunning for you; it won't be personal, she's only interested in me. Your presence doesn't matter to her. But she will want me there, if only for catharsis."

"Even better." You crossed your arms. You believed that Nguyen hated Lacroix that much, though you wondered who was the bigger narcissist. Lacroix, probably. "So are you calling dibs?"

"No," Lacroix said, shaking his head. "This is too serious. If you get the shot, take it. Though if she is in the middle of confessing something, I admit, I will be sore."

"Yeah, well, better sore than dead," you muttered.

"You are correct," Lacroix said, smiling faintly. "It is heartening to see that you are willing to walk beside me into a trap set by one of our greatest mutual enemies."

"Pfft, I just know that you're the bigger supervillain," you said with a shrug. "I'm more worried about sending Ziv into combat. Hanzo asked me to "help" him with a problem he's having with Feng. I'll take that opportunity to remind him just how important Ziv is to us." You wouldn't have to say anything to Genji. Genji knew. "You ever going to tell me why Nguyen is so damn mad at you?"

"If you're with me when I confront her, rest assured that you will hear all about it," Lacroix smirked.

" Seriously?" You scowled, because Lacroix was obviously enjoying stringing you along.

"She doesn't usually monologue, but after all these years she will want to have her say," he said, taking great pleasure in misinterpreting your question. "If you stay quiet, I'm sure you will learn something."

Rolling your eyes, you decided you were going to find some way to embarrass him at dinner tomorrow night.

"Uh oh, why are you two looking at me like that?" Jack asked as he stepped into Gabriel's Both you and Gabriel sat on the couch, arms crossed, as you eyed an increasingly nervous Strike Commander. He swallowed, Adam's apple bobbing as he quickly took off his boots, set them neatly beside the door, and hung his overcoat over a chair. Silly Jack, he should have left his shoes on so he could run.

"What's this about RSVPing for dinner tomorrow night?" You asked, voice silky and pleasant.

"And not saying anything to us about it?" Gabriel added, smiling with teeth.

"Indeed, Amélie said something about asking you last week," you continued.

Jack laughed, rubbing the back of his neck as he approached. "Oh, that. It completely slipped my mind. She asked if I was free and I checked my schedule and I was. She said she'd invite the rest of you too, but I’ll admit I was distracted and-

"Our invitations were sprung on us today," Gabriel said, his voice a low rumble.

"Oh, can't you make it?" Jack asked innocently, his smile too wide. "I didn't see anything on the calendar when she asked if we would all be able to-"

"Get him," you growled.

Both you and Gabriel leapt off the couch. You went for his knees as Gabriel caught him in a headlock, the two of you wrestling him to the ground.

"Ow! Damnit! What'd I do?" Jack laughed, even as you pinned his legs and Gabriel held him in a chokehold from behind.

"Way to warn us, amor," Gabriel said, nipping Jack's ear.

"I forgot!" Jack protested weakly. "Honestly, I figured they were going to invite you and we'd all go out like we talked about before. Why are you upset? You love fancy dates, Gabe. And baby, you love all that gourmet food!" He beamed at you. "This Italian restaurant is supposed to be really high end!"

"You're so oblivious! How have you survived this long?" You growled, crawling into his lap and biting his bottom lip.

"Dumb luck," Gabriel grumbled.

"I'm sorry! I honestly didn't realize they'd wait this long to invite you! I didn't think it was a big deal. It's just dinner."

"It's never just dinner with them!" You shouted, throwing your hands up.

"She's right," Gabriel said sternly. "Some warning would have been nice. We've been trying to figure out Gérard's angle all evening."

"Food and socializing?" Jack said slowly, looking between you and Gabriel like you were insane. "Why else would-?"

"It's never that simple," you scowled. "Also, have you considered the risks of all five of us in public together-"
"Six," Jack said. "Agent Mihret is coming."

Gabriel groaned. "Goddamnit, Jack."

"And yeah, Amélie said Gérard was handling it. Relax, baby. It'll be fine," Jack said in soothing tones.

"He's doing this on purpose," you muttered. "He has to be. He can't be that dense, can he?"

"He could, but I suspect you're right," Gabriel scowled, roughly ruffling Jack's hair with his fist, before releasing the other man. "Come on, corazon. Let's go eat all those desserts you saved for him. He doesn't deserve them."

"What? Oh come on," Jack cried. "I spent all afternoon getting passive aggressive messages from Ana about how she didn't get an invite, then a one word message that just said, "Finally," and then Jemison and Shoal took long lunches-"

"Jemison made three kinds of pie," you said. "And you shall have none."

"It was good pie," Gabriel added, as the two of you climbed to your feet and returned to the couch, leaving Jack sprawled on the floor.

"You two are ridiculous," Jack said, smiling sheepishly at you, as he followed you to the couch. "I know I hate dressing up, but it'll be worth it to see you and Gabe." He swept your hair aside and pressed a kiss behind your ear.  "I'm sorry, it really did slip my mind. And it shouldn't have. I am very excited to see you and Gabe in fancy clothes."

Jack snuggled up against you, ignoring your soft grumbling as he kissed the top of your head. "Love you, sweetheart. Love you both."

"He just wants desserts," Gabriel said, not taken in by Jack's charm.

Jack leaned over you and kissed Gabriel's cheek loudly. "No, I want to see my handsome boyfriend and tricky girlfriend smile. That's all the sweetness I need."

"How are you so cheesy?" You groaned.

"Cheese is one of your favorite foods," Jack said, sensing your weakness. "It's why you love me so much."

"That's fine, still doesn't mean you're getting any of this," Gabriel drawled, serving himself a large slice of cherry pie.

"Maybe I'm hungry for something else," Jack said, both arms wrapped around your waist.

Exhaling loudly, you let Jack pull you onto his lap, before he draped one arm over Gabriel's shoulder. "You're awful."

"But you love me anyway," he murmured in your ear. "I'll make it up to you both. Promise. Just give me a few more days."

Gabriel raised a brow. "What did you have in mind?"

"It's a surprise," Jack said, eyes dewy as he beamed at you both. "It'll be a good surprise, honest." He nuzzled your neck before he leaned over and planted another kiss on Gabriel's lips.
"You still haven't replaced my clothing," you said, clicking your teeth at him.

"I'll do that too," Jack said. "Honest. Do you want credits, gift cards, or the dubious satisfaction of seeing the awful mess I make when I try to shop for clothing for you?"

You briefly pictured Jack ordering things online, all in completely wrong sizes and hideous patterns.

"Take the money," Gabriel said, shaking his head, smiling faintly. "Trust me."

"I'm still eating your cake," you said, petulantly.

"And I'll let you," Jack said, kissing you again. "Because I love you that much."

That, you admitted reluctantly to yourself, was real love.

"Is this really necessary?" Jesse asked. He sat on your bed, watching Bandit and Isha wrestle on the floor. He crunched loudly, eating a bag of jalapeno chips, elbows resting on his knees. "You aren't going to be gone that long."

"Best to be prepared," you said, appreciating his optimism.

Isha squeaked and reached up, tugging on his pant leg. Laughing, Jesse handed her a chip, which she promptly passed on to Bandit, and extended her hands once more.

Grinning even wider, Jesse handed the little glutton two chips.

You sat on the floor, wrapping knickknacks in extra hoodies and carefully packing up your stuff in clearly-labeled boxes. There wasn't a whole lot, but there was no guarantee your room would be unoccupied the entire time you were gone, and you did not want to make anyone else go through your things.

You had a bugout bag with clothes, weapons, Isha's supplies: these were all going with you to Shanghai. You knew the rest of your belongings could be shipped, but you weren't sure you needed to cart a giant teddy bear halfway across the world. And your plants? Gabriel and Jack were going to take care of them, which either meant they were going to die, or Gabriel and Jack would assign someone to care for them. Maybe you could get them sent to you.

Feng had already sent you pictures of the condo across from hers. It was secure, expensive, and furnished with the basics, though she was already planning a shopping trip so the two of you could decorate it. She had sent you a very professional message with the details, and you appreciated her trying to keep her enthusiasm in check.

"You'll come visit me in Shanghai, right?" You didn't look up from sorting your socks. Some of Gabriel and Jack's had gotten mixed into your laundry. Finding some of those hideous white socks with the athletic stripe, you casually tossed them into the trash. Jack would never know.

"In a heartbeat, sweetpea," Jesse said, giving you a wry smile. "Ain't gonna be the same without you around. Bandit's going to miss Isha something fierce. Those two are as thick as thieves."
"Yeah, Isha's definitely going to miss Bandit. I'm bringing her stuffed dog for sure."

"And Ziv and Genji just ain't you," Jesse said almost too casually. "I know they have our backs, but they're still a little rough around the edges. Can't be as straight with them as I am you. And don't let me started on Vo and Hanzo." Jesse blew out a breath. "I ain't looking forward to handling their bullshit. Same with Tataryn. Yeah, he's a friend, I guess, but everything is a goddamn hustle with him."

"For sure," you nodded in sympathy, your throat a little tight.

"And I don't have to say anything about how the boss is gonna be..." Jesse sounded a little guilty.

"You just have to encourage him to come visit me too," you said, sounding calmer than you felt. "Though maybe on separate occasions. Since I'll be in a condo. Across the hall from Feng. Not sure about the space?"

Jesse snorted. "I could stay with Feng."

"True," you said, lips quirking upward. "You did get an open invitation last time. And she did seem quite impressed by your biceps."

Jesse shrugged. "Maybe. I think she only likes me for my dog, but that's fine." He gave you a smug smile. "But Daniels, Vashtai, and Shoal keep sending me flirty messages and invitations for drinks. Tataryn has too, but I know that bastard is just trying to foist more work on to me, and I ain't buying it."

"Oh my," you laughed. "Got a favorite yet?"

"Ain't rushin' into anything right now," he said, almost shyly. "Just enjoying the conversations."

"Be careful now, all three of those ladies are incredibly dangerous for admittedly different reasons."

"Hey now darlin', don't you go slandering your Jesse like that. I ain't leading no one on. Just...talking is all." He gave you a pointed look, his cheeks turning pink.

"Of course," you said cheerfully. "Did you notice where Genji went after the tea party?"

"...Didn't he pack off up a bunch of chocolate and head off in the direction of the infirmary?" Jesse laughed.

"That's what I thought." You smiled slightly at that. Maybe it was just friendly self-preservation. Maybe it was more. Either way, you were glad someone was working to keep Angela sweet. "Going to have to talk to Hanzo later. He's in a snit about Feng. I think. It could be something completely unrelated, but he's blaming Feng."

"It's strange to think of Genji as the less...repressed brother," Jesse said, shaking his head. "I admit, I was skeptical at first, but I think having Hanzo here has been good for him. If only so he can see just how messed up his brother is and work hard not to be that way."

"I think it's more than that," you said. Because Hanzo was trying. Maybe not succeeding, but lately Zenyatta seemed to be hovering around Hanzo talking about the Buddhist idea of "attachment" and how it influenced the Shambali teachings. You hadn't heard the word
"forgiveness" yet, but you figured Zenyatta was working up to it. "But I'm surprised Genji hasn't resorted to frustrated violence yet," you admitted.

"Oh, he has," Jesse laughed. "Pretty early on. Just decked Hanzo straight out for some stupid comment he made. I was worried, but Hanzo just took it, didn't fight back."

You blinked, a little surprised because you'd heard nothing about this. "When was this?"

"Right after Lucerne." Jesse shrugged. "Was worried that Genji was going to really let him have it, but he just abruptly walked off, and the next time I saw them, they were acting like nothing happened. Ain't healthy to do things like that," Jesse sighed. "But I can't exactly go around pointing fingers."

"Nah, we're probably the most normal people in Blackwatch," you said with a confident nod.

Jesse squinted at you, took his hat off, and scratched his head. "Sugarpie, you have a pet dinosaur and everyone thinks you're a government experiment with insatiable sexual appetites. I don't know what about that equates "normal," which says a lot."

Wrinkling your brow, you glared at the wannabe cowboy. "And? We're still the most normal people in Blackwatch, despite our reputations."

"Me, sure," Jesse laughed breezily. "I'm charming, good-natured, and well-adjusted. You? You'd knife someone for a piece of cake."

"Jesse McCree-"

"But you're still the best friend a guy could ask for," Jesse said, his smile soft. "And I wouldn't have you any other way."

You gave a sharp huff. "Yeah, love you too, asshole."

Jesse's grin widened. "Enough to make me some karaage before you go? Because I need something to take the sting out of being abandoned."

"What?"

He nodded emphatically. "I need soul food to soothe my broken heart. Bandit will too. And Mihret? Think of poor Mihret who ain't got no other friends besides-"

"Goddamnit, Jesse," you snorted. "You sound like Tataryn."

"Now that ain't true! I'll go shopping with you! I'll shell out for the ingredients! I'll even help you make it! Just don't lump me in with that guy!" Jesse laughed.

Shaking your head, you just sighed, already knowing that you'd have to make an enormous batch of karaage before you left.

You really did like the dark blue dress. The fit was flattering, the material cool and silky, and the crystal beadwork incredibly fine. But this time you were wearing gloves, for tactical reasons. The tanto went in a sheath on your thigh. You chose a long coat, so the tanto would stay hidden and you could fit your pistol in the pocket.
Gabriel currently occupied Jack's bathroom, styling his hair, trimming his beard, and generally hogging the counter. So you were in the bedroom, using the mirror in there to apply your makeup. Jack still hadn't arrived, but that was no surprise, for someone who got so pissy over military punctuality, he was criminally late to most social events. But Gabriel had already picked out Jack's outfit, so that was one less thing to worry about.

You wondered about the futility of putting on lipstick. Chances were you'd need to apply it at least one more time before you left. Though if you could leave discrete marks on either of your lovers...

A raucous wolf whistle pulled you out of your reverie and you glanced over your shoulder at the man in the doorway. Gabriel leaned against the wall, arms crossed to emphasize his shoulders. He cut a striking figure a deep red jacket, black tie, white shirt and narrow cut trousers, emphasizing his muscular thighs. It was too well-fitted to be considered retro, but something about it reminded you of the glamour of old school R&B singers. You couldn't wait to see him from behind.

"Let me see the whole thing," you said, twirling your index finger, because that gave you an excuse to stare at his ass in those pants.

Smirking, and not at all fooled by your ploy, Gabriel obligingly spun around, even slowly pulling off his jacket, showcasing those broad muscled shoulders. Those trousers clung to his skin though... You sighed happily, admiring the outfit, and the man who wore it.

"Are you sewed into your clothes?" You teased. He was wearing black suspenders and you raised a brow, recognizing those platinum cufflinks you'd won off of Lacroix. Apparently, you weren't the only one feeling petty tonight.

"Want to find out?" Gabriel chuckled, swaggering over with his jacket in hand. He leaned over and kissed you hard. "Silly question though. That would make it difficult to undress. Now you've got the right idea, hermosa. All I have to do is lift this little skirt up-" His fingers toyed with the hem of your dress and your breath caught. "And you're all ready for me."

Cheeks burning, you pushed his hand down. "I've spent way too long getting dressed for dinner. You don't get to mess that up. Not yet."

"That's fine. I can wait to unwrap my present," Gabriel purred. "I'm a patient man."

You kissed him again, squeaking as he pressed his knee between your thighs. "Gabriel!"

"I'm not messing anything up," he said, laughing. "Except maybe your panties, and you shouldn't be wearing any anyway."

You blinked, feeling the deer in the headlights look on your face. Because you knew dinner with Amélie, Lacroix, and Ziv was already going to be an...interesting event. If Gabriel was hellbent on teasing you throughout, that would make it even more challenging.

The door slammed open, and Jack ran in. "Sorry I'm late, I'll get changed. It'll only take a second!" He shouted, as he slammed it shut again, and hurriedly kicked off his boots.

"Your tux is hanging up in the bathroom," Gabriel called, giving you a smug look. "I had to iron your damn shirt again. Try hanging it up next time, Morrison!"

"I forgot! Thanks, babe! You're the best!" Jack called, his voice distant as he rushed to the bathroom. "I might need your help with the bowtie!"
"In a minute," Gabriel said. "I'm helping Lucky get ready."

You rolled your eyes at the obvious lie. "I'll come help you."

"Thanks, sweetheart! Can't wait to see you both!"

Wiggling out of Gabriel's grasp, you tried to slip out of the bedroom, but he caught you around the waist, his lips brushing the side of your neck.

"Bet we could go once before he's gotten the damn bowtie on. He can never get it right on his own," Gabriel murmured in your ear.

"I don't buy that for one second," you laughed. "When you're like this, you can go for hours."

Gabriel chuckled, sounding terribly pleased. "And that's a bad thing?"

"It is if we want to make it to dinner on time," you said, even though you kind of did not.

Gabriel pressed hot kisses down the side of your throat. "We can be fashionably late."

"Umm...can I get some help?" Jack peeked into the bedroom, his shirt half unbuttoned, the gray bowtie draped over his shoulder. "Helping Lucky "get ready," huh?" He grinned at you both. "Need another hand? Or tongue? Dick, even?"

Gabriel chuckled, and released you. "You need to finish buttoning your damn shirt, Jack." He leaned in and gently kissing the other man while he took care of the fasteners.

"But I like it better when you do it for me," Jack murmured, eyes soft as he stared at Gabriel's face.

"Malingering," Gabriel muttered, tying the bowtie neater than you ever could.

"You both look incredible," Jack said, fingers trailing down Gabriel's lapel. "That jacket's really bold. I like it. And sweetheart, we've both been fantasizing about you in that dress since we got that one teasing glimpse of it. Dinner's going to be hard tonight. And by dinner, I mean my dick."

"Smooth, Morrison," Gabriel laughed.

"Where's the lie?" Jack asked smugly.

Gabriel held the tuxedo jacket while Jack shrugged it on. It was a classic black jacket and white dress shirt, but the cummerbund, bowtie, and pocket square were a satiny gray that shimmered in the lowlights.

"I don't know how we're not going to attract attention with the two of you dressed like that," you said, admiring them both.

"I don't really care," Jack said, giving you bright smile. "I'm having dinner out with the two of you. And I plan to enjoy it."

Gabriel's expression softened, and he kissed Jack's cheek. "Is that so, amor?"

"I don't even have to eat," Jack said. "Happy just seeing the two of you looking like you're walking on to the red carpet." He leaned back, drinking in the sight of you and Gabriel. "Looking forward to the day when we can do this more openly."

Your breath caught and you bit your lip. Because with you going undercover, that was even more of a pipedream than before. Taking a deep breath, you disengaged with that line of thought. Tonight was going to be challenging enough. You didn't need to look for unnecessary distractions.

Gabriel chuckled. "We should go. Amélie gets incredibly fussy when you muck up her plans."

"Who wants to drive?" Jack asked, putting on his shoes.

"Me!" You and Gabriel said at the same time.

"That's too bad, I've got the keys," Jack laughed as he stood up.

"I'll drive so you two can neck in the back," you said, looking forward to watching that in the rearview mirror. "I'm wearing makeup so-"

Jack bent over and kissed your forehead. "I don't mind wearing your lipstick, but it probably won't look as good on me as it does you."

"I don't know about that," you said, distracted by the idea of the three of you wearing lipstick and seeing just how many marks you could leave on each other's bare skin...

"Let the Strike Commander drive," Gabriel purred in your ear. "We'll have the backseat all to ourselves and Jack can watch while I stroke that sweet little pussy-"

You jerked forward, snatching the keys out of Jack's fingers, because once Gabriel started on you, you weren't sure you'd be able to keep your composure.

"I'm driving," you said quickly. "It'll look weird if the Strike Commander is chauffeuring his subordinates around. Gives me an excuse to be there."

Gabriel laughed, probably because in thwarting him, you were denying yourself. But you did not want to wobble into a fancy restaurant, sweaty and disheveled in front of Ziv and Lacroix of all people.

Jack just smiled, looking a little disappointed. "Whatever you say, sweetheart."

Athena directed you a discrete employee parking spot behind the restaurant that had been reserved specifically for your party. You climbed out of the vehicle first, shoulders taut. Gabriel and Jack had indeed made out in the backseat loudly, and they both made sure to frequently comment on how much they wished their girlfriend could join in, if only she wasn't a stubborn mule... Bastards.

You surveyed the area, hand on your gun. Athena had access to the CCTV network and was monitoring the area, but that didn't mean you could let your guard down. You opened the door, and Jack stepped out, straightening his jacket, his hair only a little mussed.

Gabriel followed, giving you a sardonic grin. He adjusted his collar, not a hair out of place, his smirking face infuriatingly handsome. In that moment, you loved and hated his insufferableness. It was an all too familiar feeling.

You shut the car door a little too hard and followed Jack to the kitchen entrance. The door opened automatically and an omnic maitre d' in a suit ushered you into a very clean, very modern stainless steel kitchen.

"Mr. Morrison, Mr. Reyes, Ms. Strike, your party is already seated. My apologies for the unconventional greeting, however since discretion is your priority-"

"There is nothing to apologize for. We greatly appreciate your flexible accommodations," Jack said, smiling at the busy kitchen staff as the three of you followed the maitre d' out of the prep area, into the dining area, and then off to the side where a private banquet room had been reserved. The maitre d' left menus on the table for you and stepped outside.

Dark wood panels lined the walls and crisp white table cloths lay draped over every table. Candles had been lit, and the Lacroix-Mihret group were already sipping their wine, seated at a large round table, Ziv bookended between the Lacroix couple. Probably so they could elbow him when he misbehaved.

Lacroix wore a charcoal suit with a lilac shirt, and a coordinating pocket square, a silver tie clip, and cufflinks. He gave a nod as greetings, his bearing terribly smug. Amélie continued the theme, in a violet off-the shoulder dress, her silver jewelry heavy with amethysts. To top it off, Ziv wore an indigo suit with a black shirt, several silver rings adorning his fingers, and ears.

"...Were we supposed to match?" Jack asked after a moment. "Because I didn't get that memo."

You resisted the urge to facepalm. Because your dinner companions really were that fucking coordinated and they made it look great. Jack pulled out a chair for you, beside Amélie. Gabriel sat on your other side, and Jack between Gabriel and Lacroix.

"You all look fantastic," Amélie said, her relief clear as she scrutinized Jack's outfit. She gave you a nod of approval, and went on to really examine Gabriel's clothes. "I like the cut, you modernized the jacket with narrower lapels, but kept the classic silhouette. And the color is so striking."

"Not at all like a sleazy lounge singer," Ziv offered helpfully and then gave choked cough. You didn't see who got him, but both Amélie and Lacroix smiled serenely.

"Those cufflinks though..." Amélie tilted her head to the side. "They look very familiar." She slowly turned her head, eyeing Lacroix thoughtfully. "I bought you an almost identical pair a year ago..."

Gabriel's smile sharpened. "What a coincidence," he said in a tone that implied the exact opposite.

Lacroix winced.

"What ever happened to those?" Amélie asked smiling brightly at her husband.

You poured yourself a glass of red wine, not bothering to look at the label, because if Amélie chose it, it wasn't something you'd be able to afford on your salary anyway.

"I'm afraid you'll have to ask, Chanceux," Lacroix said blithely. "She won them off me in a game of cards."
You nearly choked on your wine, not expecting Lacroix to tell the damn truth and shift the blame onto you. Coughing, you blotted at your mouth, feeling Amélie's gaze before you actually looked up.

"You were gambling with my husband?" Amélie asked, one brow arched. "For his clothing?"

"For his pocket money, and then he threw in his cufflinks because I was about to call it a night, but apparently I'm a magpie that cannot resist shiny things." You grinned, trying to remember the exact wording he'd used. It was in French, and under his breath, so you weren't entirely sure if you'd gotten the phrasing right, but it was a close enough translation, judging by Lacroix's resigned expression.

"And that's the last time I played cards with her," Lacroix said, shaking his head.

Amélie just laughed, patting your arm. "We must go to Monte Carlo some time, Chanceux. It will be great fun. And you must teach me how to beat the pants off Gérard; he cheats, you know.

"She does too," Lacroix said with a wry smile.

"I think they look very nice on Gabe," Jack beamed, and you squinted at him, because he wasn't that dumb. He grinned at Lacroix and the spy rolled his eyes.

"Affecting an air of naïveté at your age is most unflattering, Commander," Lacroix said.

"What are you talking about?" Jack laughed. "We're about the same age."

Lacroix's good-natured smile surprised you a little.

"They do look lovely on you," Amélie said with a smile at Gabriel.

"You have excellent taste in accessories," Gabriel said, pouring himself some wine. "I'll admit, I am aware of their providence and wished to express my compliments to both the giver and the intermediaries." He leaned over and kissed your cheek. "Excellent job ladies."

Ziv shot you a pointed look as you drank more wine, both of you trying to figure out if this was a friendly or hostile exchange.

"Thank you," Amélie said. "We should go shopping some time. I know a few people can procure some truly exquisite pieces."

"Sounds like fun," Gabriel said, and you had to really stare at him searching for sarcasm. But no, it looked like he was being sincere. "I've been meaning to pick up a few things."

"Should you be looking for something special for yourself, or perhaps something special for your lovers?" Amélie's expression bordered on delight.

"Am I shopping for wedding rings or nipple rings you mean?" Gabriel laughed.

"I know artisans who specialize in both-" Amélie said without batting an eye.

You stared in horror at Amélie. And then you glanced at Gabriel who sat there looking comfortable and Jack, who'd narrowed his eyes at Gabriel.

"Amélie, we should talk about this later," Gabriel laughed, ignoring the looks he was getting. "We can go out for coffee, do some shopping, perhaps mislead some tabloids-"
"Yes," Amélie nodded enthusiastically. "Maybe we can bring Chanceux and buy her some new clothes, and perhaps set a trap for Talon spies while we are at it."

"I like the way you think," Gabriel told her, pouring himself more wine. "Jack owes Lucky some clothing money anyway. It'll be a fun day out."

You could see Ziv turning that statement over, start to open his mouth, then wrinkle his nose in disgust and glare at Jack. But he didn't say anything, and that was a miracle. One probably prompted by sharp elbows or kicks to the shin, but you'd take it.

You glanced at Lacroix, a little surprised by the fond smile on his face as he watched Amélie plan another social excursion that could possibly end up with dead bodies and more shopping than you wanted to contemplate.

Jack poured himself some wine, giving you a sympathetic look.

"We already ordered the antipasti," Lacroix said, as you picked up a menu, and found it mostly to be in Italian. Oh, there were English descriptions under the dish names. It was a good thing Jesse wasn't here. He'd try to tell you about them using his "authentic Ee-Towl-Yan" accent, and the less said about that, the better.

You browsed, flipping to the dessert menu, and not seeing the promised "Tiramisu Bomboloni Tower" or apricot amaretto meringue cake. You shot Amélie a suspicious look, wondering if you'd been lured here under false pretenses.

"He is a guest chef, not a permanent fixture," Lacroix said, reading your expression. "Your love of dessert has not been forgotten. But you must eat your dinner first.” He gave you a smug look and you pursed your lips at his patronizing tone.

You returned to scanning the menu. Out of the corner of your eye, you saw Jack's brow furrow as he silently mouthed Italian words and frowned. Gabriel flipped through the menu and then set it down as the door opened and servers came in carrying large platters. A woman in a crisp apron took a moment to describe each dish for you as an Athena drone carefully scanned each plate for poisons or other drugs.

There was Sardinian carasau, a wafer thin cracker bread spread with bottarga - dried mullet roe, then topped with pecorino cheese and olive oil. It was a strong mix of umami and salty flavors, and while Jack didn't seem crazy about it, Gabriel and Ziv dug in.

The bright green dip was maro, a raw fava bean spread made with garlic, mint, Romano cheese, and olive oil with a smattering of black pepper served on warm bread. Jack was already reaching for the bread, though you wondered if he'd eat the bean spread. He tried it, muttered something about "weird green hummus," but kept eating.

There was a Venetian-style pate served with thin slices of fried polenta. Of course, Amélie and Lacroix seemed to like that. The baked tomatoes were stuffed with salmon, garlic, and green olives. The most popular dish was the pyramid of bite-sized, piping hot, meatballs made with garlic, mashed potatoes, cheese, and milk: they were incredibly soft and juicy, and you needed that recipe. You heard Jack say something about how this was "nothing like Olive Garden," under his breath, and Gabriel groaned. But Jack helped himself to a good portion of the meatballs.

Finally a waiter brought in a tureen of mussel soup with beans, celery, and basil. It was light and warming, and you began to wonder if you were going to have room for dessert.
The portion sizes were extremely generous, and that was strange because most of the posh restaurants you'd been to did not offer such big plates. Maybe Lacroix had worked something out ahead of time? Because those SEP metabolisms were insane.

"Those were some vacation recommendations," Jack said, inclining his head at Lacroix. "I'm a little envious at how well-traveled you are."

Lacroix gave a modest shrug. "There is a lot of research required in espionage. I don't go into anything blind. But you have traveled a great deal as well," he said politely.

"I'm a little envious of all the fun places you've been to," Jack amended with a grin. "Gabriel's been trying to convince me to try some more adventurous vacations."

"I refuse to go to Pigeon Forge ever again," Gabriel scowled.

"But pigeon- you began.

"It's a lie. There aren't that many pigeons," he told you. "It's just a campy tourist trap in the Smokey Mountains: pretty if you want to go camping or to judge other tourists, but not much else."

"As you can see, someone is hard to please," Jack continued with a warm smile. "So I'm happy for all the help I can get."

Wait, first Feng and Athena were helping Jack. Now Lacroix? You glanced at Gabriel who looked just as suspicious.

"Eritrea has beautiful coastline," Ziv said, not looking up from his wine glass. "Government's still shit, but I went there a few times as a kid."

You blinked, a little shocked by Ziv's attempt at polite conversation.

"I'll look into it," Jack said, taking another meatball. "The closest I've been is through Somalia," he said. "But that was all...combat."

"I suppose it's hard to take in the regional charms while getting shot at," Ziv said picking at his stuffed tomato.

"Always assumed that was the charm," Gabriel said with a dry laugh.

"We are planning a vacation, Gérard says you have already approved his leave," Amélie said to Jack. "Ziv has visited France a few times, but I think we can give him a more comprehensive tour and work to improve his French language skills. That is, if Gabriel will sign off on it?"

"Really Amélie?" Gabriel scowled. "Fix his manners while you're at it, and you can take him, with my blessing."

"Oh you're one to tal- Ben-zona!" Ziv snarled glaring at Lacroix and rubbed his side.

"You are so generous," Amélie said as if nothing had happened. "I know he is an indispensible part of your cybersecurity team, but we really appreciate you looking out for him. He tends to overwork himself and it makes him difficult. It is wonderful to know that both you and Chanceux take such good care of him."

Gabriel looked like he'd swallowed a lemon and it had gotten lodged halfway down his throat. But he muttered an ungracious "no problem."

Ziv huffed as Amélie winked and smiled at him.

You were saved from more strangely polite small talk by the arrival of the main courses. You had gotten the lamb ragu with square noodles called maccheroni alla chitarra. It was heartier than you expected, thick chunks of lamb in heavy sauce made it feel more like stew than pasta. The flavor verged on gamey, but it was well-balanced, and Gabriel really seemed to like it, casually taking bites off your plate. Ziv and Amélie also helped themselves to a sample, ignoring Gabriel's frowns.

Amélie chose quail sauce on fettuccine, though there was much more quail meat than pasta on the plate. She fed Ziv a forkful and teasingly ignored Lacroix when he tried to take a bite off her fork.

Gabriel ordered swordfish steaks with salmoriglio and capers. The plate was large, but the steaks were only about an inch thick. They had been grilled and brushed with salmoriglio, a blend of olive oil, oregano, and lemon juice. He made Jack try a bite, and you slid a whole steak off his plate, because they were small, and also because he kept stealing your lamb.

Ziv happily took his baked artichokes with shrimp and mozzarella, sharing willingly with Amélie, but grumbling under his breath when you and Lacroix snuck bites.

Jack ordered the roast lamb Abruzzi-style, cooked rare, with potatoes, garlic, rosemary, and Romano cheese: well-seasoned meat and potatoes for Jack's Midwestern palate. It was leg meat, possibly a whole leg, and he kept pushing portions onto Gabriel's plate, grinning as Gabriel dutifully passed on pieces to you.

Lacroix chose the fricassee chicken with porcini mushrooms and Marsala wine, and somehow managed to have a forkful of chicken in place whenever Ziv opened his mouth.

The conversation stayed on the food, Lacroix waxing poetic about the wine while Amélie suggested more restaurants she wanted to try.

The food was incredible, but you couldn't quite quash the antsy feeling in your gut as you sat there, acting civilized. It felt a little unnatural, like everyone was playing pretend, and while you knew there were numerous individual tensions within the group, everyone was trying so very hard to get along that everything felt stilted. It was...odd. You weren't sure you liked it. Maybe you just needed a quick walk.

"Excuse me," you said, getting up. "Need to use the facilities."

"She means, "scout the place for desserts," Gabriel said, leaning over and nudging Jack.

Rolling your eyes, you slid out of your chair and exited the private dining room.

So maybe you were looking for a dessert buffet, but there was none. No glass display case. No performing chefs. Just rich people in fancy clothes enjoying their expensive meals. A little disappointed, you headed back, stiffening as a songbird-sized Athena drone landed on your shoulder.

"There's a man who's been hovering around the dining room entrance. I am unable to identify him, but he walks like he's carrying a gun," she said softly in your ear. "I've notified the rest of the party."

You pulled out your phone, pretending to be distracted as you glanced around the corner. Sure enough, there was a brunette man in a black suit with his back to you, blocking your path to the doorway. The bulge of a large gun on his hip ruined the lines of the jacket, giving him a clunk asymmetrical look. It wasn't just vanity. The fact you could see that he was carrying was a tactical error. There were better, more discrete holsters that didn't ruin outfits, but still gave excellent access. Who was training these amateurs? And who was dressing them?

Wait...what? You ran those thoughts through your head again, specifically your sartorial observations. Oh hell, Amélie was a terrifying influence.

"Excuse me," you began, as the Athena drone rose from your shoulder.

He turned, swinging his fists, and the blow glanced across your jaw, but you were already moving. Your shoes made it much harder to dodge, but you managed to avoid the full impact. You tasted blood and your first instinct was to slam your blade extensions through his throat and end the threat. But you needed to find out whom his target was, how he got in, and if he was acting alone. And it would be easier to do that if he was alive.

He tried to follow up with another strike, but you raised your left arm, blocking his next hit, and then you smashed the palm of your hand into his nose. You heard and felt the cartilage crunching, blood spurting onto your right hand. You grabbed him by the hair with your left fist and slammed his head into the door. The thud was incredibly satisfying.

He dropped, even as the door opened and Gabriel stood there, expression grim, as you crouched over your attacker, checking to make sure he was really out. You took his gun, and then patted him down for more weapons. There was a garrote on his wrist, a knife on his belt beside his phone, and another small gun in an ankle holster. You took them all.

"What'd he do? Cut in line for the dessert table?" Gabriel asked, crouching down beside you.

You snorted, then winced, touching your face with your unbledded hand. Never mind, there was blood on that one now too.

"Don't mess with it," Gabriel scolded. "We'll get you some ice." He cupped your chin, gently tilting your head back as he inspected your face. "Doesn't look broken." He tapped his nose. "How's it feel?"

"Isn't an issue," you said. "Split my lip is all."

"We've arranged a pickup," Jack said, as he leaned over to inspect your work. "Athena and some of your agents are keeping an eye on the perimeter, but no one's cut and run yet."

"Apparently, you can't even be trusted to go to the bathroom by yourself," Ziv scowled, peeking out from behind Jack. His gaze travelled past you and he grimaced. "Gérard, get over here!"

You turned then, realizing that you'd attracted an audience. A waiter and a woman in a green headscarf both stared at you. The waiter quickly averted his eyes, but the woman in the headscarf held up her phone, obviously filming you. You gritted your teeth and glared at them, the waiter quickly turning on his heel. How much had they seen?
"That was utterly brutal," a woman said coolly, still recording. "Exactly what I'd expect from the Strike Commander's bodyguard."

You froze, unsure of the threat she presented.

"Ms. Kharoti," Lacroix said, pushing past Jack. To your surprise, he pressed his right hand over his chest and nodded. "What a surprise."

The woman laughed, then returned the gesture, lowering her camera. "Monsieur Gérard Lacroix in the flesh. It has been a long time. Marrakech, three years ago?"

"You haven't changed at all," he said.

You relaxed, just a little. If Lacroix knew whom she was, you and Athena could always take care of incriminating footage.

"This is Ms. Reshtina Kharoti, a very respected investigative journalist," Lacroix said, his smile a little too sharp. "What a strange coincidence that she is here."

You blinked as Ziv handed you a pair of handcuffs, and you secured the man's wrists. He was still out, but why was Ziv carrying around restraints? Because you couldn't just use the professional grade ones for sex games on unenhanced humans. It was way too easy to cause damage. Jack raised a brow, but Ziv was already heading back to the table.

"Good job, Agent Strike," he said, a wry smile tugging at the corners of his mouth. You didn't miss the gleam of excitement in his eye. You really hoped the goddamn reporter wasn't as observant as she looked.

"So many VIPs in one place," Kharoti said crisply. "One has to wonder why."

"Perhaps it is just a social excursion; a meal shared with friends," Lacroix said cheerfully.

"Which is why Agent Strike just knocked out a man?" She asked, skepticism clear. She had soft features and was deceptively pleasant-looking, like someone's good-natured aunt. She wore red-framed glasses and a loose fitting long green tunic-dress over white pants.

"A hazard of our congregation," Lacroix admitted with a Gallic shrug. "Now, your food is getting cold, agent," he said to you. "I've already asked someone to bring you some ice. You should go get cleaned up."

Nodding, you gave the reporter a long unfriendly look before retreating back into the private dining room. Gabriel dragged the would-be assassin inside and closed the door, letting Lacroix handle the reporter.

You turned to find Jack in front of you and he gently dabbed at your face with his napkin, brow furrowed as he wiped the blood off your mouth.

"Are you all right, sweetheart?" He asked.

"She was fucking recording," you hissed.

"Don't trouble yourself, Chanceux," Amélie said, smiling brightly at you. "Gérard will handle it. He has a way with...reporters."

"Is that as sinister as it sounds?" You muttered and Jack leaned in, kissing your forehead.
"He didn't damage your dress, did he?" Amélie asked as she looked you over.

"I would have killed him," you said sharply, realizing that you meant it.

Amélie eyes widened and she gave you a look of pure delight. "Spoken like a true lady. She is magnificent tonight, is she not?"

"She's my hero," Jack teased. "Don't worry, Athena was recording too. I'm looking forward to seeing you in action."

"Shouldn't have gotten hit," Gabriel said, embracing you from behind. "That was clumsy work." He kissed the top of your head, the gesture softening his admonishment.

"I'm in heels," you complained.

"Could've kicked them off," Gabriel said, sounding slightly amused.

"I didn't think he was going to come out swinging," you said, a little petulant because he was right. "I figured I could just sidle up, pull my civilian act, and suckerpunch him."

"You're too cocky," Gabriel said voice gruff as he rubbed your back.

There was a thud and you all turned to see Ziv kicking the unconscious man right between the legs.

"What?" Ziv shrugged. "It's not like he needs those to talk."

To your surprise, Gabriel and Jack just chuckled and didn't even tell him to stop.

Chapter End Notes

It's been a weird week. Had a creeping crud kind of illness, not painful, just left me listless and nauseated. I've been sleeping it off. Got a call from the local prison program that supports drug addicts and wondered who the hell in the family listed me as an emergency contact for such things. Played phone tag. It got weirder. The guy said he'd heard I could help house a participant who also happened to be a sex offender...

...I called back and made it very clear that I did not handle any kind of housing. He said he got my number from his boss and it was very "WTF."

Most of the dishes mentioned are courtesy of the chef Marcella Hazan.
Chapter 114

Chapter Summary

Your evening has an unexpectedly "military" flavor.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

After bringing you an ice pack, the maître d' apologized profusely for the security breach. Jack assured him that he didn't hold the restaurant responsible, that Overwatch security had the issue under control, and more importantly that the food was excellent. Then he requested that dessert, all the desserts in fact, be brought in soon. He winked at you, as soon as the maître d' wasn't looking.

Lacroix came in, a few minutes later, his manner relaxed as he sat down beside Ziv.

"Well?" You asked, crossing your arms.

"Do not worry about it," Lacroix said as he sipped his wine. "Kharoti is a very reasonable individual. You can talk to her yourself."

"I'd rather not." Frowning, you looked over at Ziv.

"We can always hack her files," Ziv said, taking a bite of your lamb. "Athena's already monitoring her data uploads." He glanced at his phone. "Oh, it looks like Diallo's here to pick up your wannabe assassin." He held the man's phone in his other hand, brow furrowed as he unlocked the device. "Any bets on his target?"

"Jack," Gabriel said.

"Gabe," Jack said at the same time.

"My money's on Gérard," Ziv said and Amélie nodded.

"Same," you said, and Lacroix merely waved his hands, like he was signaling an end to the applause.

Ziv scrolled through the phone, his frown deepening, and he held the screen up. There was a picture of Amélie, recent by the look of it, in a ruby trenchcoat and dark glasses taken as she walked down the street.

"There's not a lot on here; it's probably just a burner. Athena is lifting coordinates and doing a deeper scan. I'll take a closer look when I get back to the lab," Ziv said, carefully wrapping the phone in a bag and putting it in his pocket.

"That was the other day," Amélie said, a little pale. "When I came in to inspect the premises." She shook her head. "I wasn't alone, but I didn't think I'd been followed. How embarrassing." She poured herself more wine. "I am grateful for your quick actions, my friends," she said.
Lacroix was staring hard at the man on the ground, his gaze flat and reptilian.

"We all have prices on our heads," Gabriel said. "Some more than others," he shot Lacroix a wry look. "I suppose we should do this more often. Dress up. Go out. Spring traps. Enjoy the rest of the evening."

"I do appreciate a man who can mix business and pleasure," Amélie winked.

"It's more like he can't separate the two," Jack said, elbowing Gabriel.

"How can I, when I have to work with you and Lucky all the time?" Gabriel leaned over and kissed Jack's cheek, his voice husky.

There was a knock, and Athena announced Diallo and Távio's presence. You blinked as Gabriel got the door. Saluting, both agents grabbed the prisoner, gave you a nod of acknowledgement, and made a quick exit. You caught sight of Kharoti lingering in the hallway, not overtly filming, but you knew better than to assume.

"Maeda Vargas is progressing well, isn't he?" Lacroix asked after the door had shut.

"He's not a bad kid," Ziv said, giving you a reluctant half smile.

"Very earnest. Better-behaved than your other protégée," Gabriel grinned at you.

Ziv narrowed his eyes at Gabriel and Gabriel actually reached over with his fork and stole a piece of shrimp off Ziv's plate. Glaring, Ziv reached right back and took a slice of swordfish.

Gabriel just chewed his shrimp grinning a little spitefully at Ziv. "The swordfish is better."

"Good, you can leave my food alone," Ziv snapped.

"Távio is a charming boy," Amélie said, resting one hand on Ziv's shoulder. "I'm very impressed by his good manners and quick thinking." She inclined her head at Jack. "Don't you agree?"

Jack raised a brow, mouth twisting into a moue. "Yeah, he's OK," he said, looking like he'd bitten into a chunk of raw bitter melon.

"He's still holding a grudge over being described as "steamed cornmeal on weakass milk toast," by the boy," Gabriel laughed.

Ziv choked on his wine, turned his head, and sprayed the back wall as he coughed violently. "What? When was this? How come you never told me that?" Ziv gave you a glare of outrage.

"It was back when we got rescued in Greece," you said. "He was delirious." You gave Jack a sharp look.

"I'm not holding a grudge," Jack grumbled. "I don't work with the boy so I don't have anything to add."

"Uh-huh," Gabriel laughed.

Amélie giggled. "You should hear some of the things Gérard says after he's had a head injury. He once woke up furious at me for letting bunnies take over the kitchen." She leaned over conspiratorially. "We'd been living in a hotel in Prague for three months. There was no kitchen."
Lacroix shook his head, his smile tolerant. "I was heavily medicated, _ma cocotte_. I apologized profusely. I offered to buy you as many rabbits as you wanted, cooked, stuffed, or alive."

"It is still an amusing story," Amélie winked.

"Jack's alarmingly enthusiastic when concussed," you said, recalling the mountain base in Mongolia. "He can twirl a baton really well too."

Ziv choked on another mouthful of wine, glaring at you. "Ben zona! You're doing this on purpose."

You smiled slyly. "He's very cuddly and affectionate."

"It was just you, me, and Feng," he scowled. "And no one will believe Feng."

"Her brother was there too," you said.

"Oh...yeah, I forgot about him," Jack said, a little sheepishly. He leaned against Gabriel. "This one, he just gets grumpier."

"Why am I not sur-" Ziv grunted and then abruptly fell silent. You eyed both Amélie and Lacroix, their expressions almost identically and unconvincingly "innocent."

"Oh, the next course in en route," Athena announced. And you immediately set your ice pack aside, trying not to rub your hands together with such obvious glee.

The Tiramisu Bomboloni Tower reminded you of a _croquembouche_, the pyramid of creampuffs stacked on top of each other and then coated in caramel. In this case, the Italian doughnut balls were filled with a combination of mascarpone and espresso custard, then covered in a dark chocolate glaze. The outside had the slight crispness of a good fresh doughnut, and the inside was soft, gooey, and bursting with creamy coffee flavors. Lacroix and Gabriel were particularly taken by this dessert, sipping cups of strong black coffee while they chatted about the LA Lakers.

The chestnut and salted caramel panna cotta was rich and creamy, somewhere between pudding and sweetened gelatin, and Jack happily ate several servings of that though you found it a little bland in comparison to the other desserts.

Amélie was partial to the honeyed plum semifreddo, a frozen mousse that reminded you of gelato, albeit one that tasted strongly of sweet plum wine.

The apricot amaretto meringue cake was a layered confection, but not overpoweringly sweet as you'd feared. Sliced apricots had been soaked in amaretto covered in mascarpone on crisp disks of baked meringue. Ziv was already on his second piece.

You also had a glass of zabaglione, a whipped egg custard drink. It was normally made with sweet wine and served with fruit, but yours had been laced with cognac and dark chocolate-covered biscuits instead. You weren't complaining.

"We should do this more often," Jack said, nuzzling Gabriel's neck. He'd apparently already finished his zabaglione. "Next time we can cook for you-"
You nearly choked on your drink and started sputtering. Gabriel patted your back, giving Jack a look.

"You cooked just the other weekend," Lacroix said smoothly. "The Family Day cookout? That was quite stressful. I think we should treat ourselves out more frequently. It's much easier when we have someone else do the cooking."

You exhaled slowly, trying not to look as relieved as you felt. Lacroix winked at you behind his cup of coffee.

"Yeah, I guess," Jack said, shaking his head. "But this also took a lot of work for you to arrange. Figure we could do something casual. You know, hit up that little kebab place Lucky and Gabe like so much. Or go to the park when they have the food truck festival-"

"We should," Amélie said, with surprising enthusiasm. "Good food doesn't have to be an expensive elaborate affair. There was this little Chinese restaurant I used to frequent when I was in London. They had exquisite soup dumplings." She gave a wistful sigh, then perked up. "I bet Feng knows where to get good soup dumplings."

"She does," you said, recalling the slumber party. "There's this street vendor and they were amazing-"

"I will call her and take notes," Amélie said.

"We need to find a good pho place," Ziv said, apparently unaware that he had pastry cream on the tip of his nose.

"The nearest one is in Bern," Lacroix said with a heavy sigh. "Yes, yes, there are Vietnamese restaurants here in Zurich, but nothing I would recommend. Well, there are a few places that make passable banh mi, but not pho."

"We could always do 2AM McDonalds runs," Ziv said. "Don't look at me like that, you and McCree and Genji used to do them all the time-"

Sometimes you still did, though now it skewed more toward Genji harassing you or Jesse to make him omurice or pancakes.

"I do like their fries," Amélie said.

"Jack likes Happy Meals," you said.

"No, sweetheart, that's 'happy endings.' I'll show you the difference later," he laughed, and you felt your cheeks go hot.

"No, he really will buy one for the toy," Gabriel said, shaking his head. "Not every toy, but some-"

"Ziv does the same! They are just overgrown children!" Amélie laughed, as both Jack and Ziv protested loudly.

You finished your zabaglione, not missing how Lacroix watched his lovers, his expression oddly soft, an unfamiliar poignancy in his eyes. His lips quirked slightly, almost smiling as Amélie patted Ziv's head and Ziv slumped in his chair, groaning loudly. And it occurred to you that you knew exactly how he felt, how bittersweet it was to make plans like this, all the while knowing that next week you were out. That you were finally walking into Hanoi. That some of your people might not be walking out and you were faking your death.

You took a sip of Gabriel's zabaglione, trying to soften the lump in your throat.

"Do not worry, Chanceux," Lacroix said, meeting your gaze. "I will make sure to include you in the planning. Your insights are always useful."

"Thanks," you said, taken off guard, because deep down, you knew he wasn't just talking about another dinner party.

She was waiting for you when you went out to scout the exit. There were no other reporters, no obvious traps, and Athena had done an excellent job of maintaining watch. But Kharoti sat at a table, drinking coffee and slowly eating a bowl of what looked like limoncello gelato. She rose, obviously not content to pretend to watch you work. The wait staff gave you wide berth, though you'd been nothing but polite and maybe a little too eager when it came to the desserts...

"Agent Strike," Kharoti said, greeting you with one hand extended. You reluctantly shook it, not quite liking the idea of making nice with a fucking reporter of all people. Not that you hated reporters, but you were a black ops agent, focused on doing your work in secrecy. Reporters were the antithesis of that.

"Ms. Kharoti," you said, careful to keep your tone neutral.

She held up her phone, showing the video of you getting smacked all the way to the part where Gabriel knelt beside you examining your face. There was nothing overtly wrong with his behavior, but to see it from another angle, the gentleness in his touch unmistakable.

You stared very hard at her, waiting for the bluff, the demand, or even a threat.

To your surprise, she clicked the little trash can icon and deleted the video.

"I didn't back it up," she said, chin jutting out defiantly.

"OK," you said, now terribly confused. If Lacroix had intimidated her into silence, why the hell was she still hanging around the restaurant, obviously looking for a scoop?

"Consider it a gesture of good faith. I'm working on a story," she said, dark eyes locked on your face. "A few actually."

"I hear that's your job," you said, surveying the area. There was no one paying attention to you, so you pulled up a chair and sat across from her. "What does this have to do with me?"

"You're obviously an experienced covert operative," she said taking a deep breath. "I don't want any unpleasant visits or tragic accidents."

"You don't seem very frightened," you said, not buying that explanation either. Though it would be just like Lacroix to make you the bête noire. That was fine. If it kept the press off your back...

"I want you to see that I am good at my job, but also trustworthy. It's one hell of an ethical tightrope, but I do what I can."

You raised a brow, realizing this was the preliminary for an interview. Curious, you waited for the rest of her pitch.

Kharoti adjusted her headscarf. "Your name has turned up on the periphery of my investigation. I've been doing a piece on multinational corruption, mostly Vishkar," she gave a wry smile. "But I'm sure you know, there are points when it's difficult to disentangle these corporations from the governments they are influencing."

You inclined your head, nodding once.

"And of course, they are never very happy when you reveal how closely intertwined they happen to be." Kharoti folded her hands in her lap.

"I bet you have one hell of a target painted on your back."

"Well, I have managed to upset the DIB, the ISI, several mid-tier politicians; I may be avoiding that part of the world for the moment," she shrugged demurely. "But that's all part of the job."

"So where do I fit into all this?"

"That's what I'm trying to figure out," she said leaning forward. "Vishkar is not a fan of yours, though they don't seem to have much intelligence on you either. Only that you've been spotted eating dinner in the company of Zhai Feng, the White Rabbit CEO and alleged Triad Dragon Head."

"That sounds terribly suspicious," you said dryly, not liking where this was going. "Much like this government corruption you've been troubled by."

"It does, but you could take into account that Zhai Feng has been actively thwarting Vishkar's growth in east Asia. Her coalition also owns a minority stake in Lucheng Interstellar, which so far hasn't gotten involved, but it makes for quite the complex story. And while I can't claim that White Rabbit is...acting altruistically and free of corruption, Zhai Feng hasn't left me any car bombs yet."

"If you're looking for personal protection, I can recommend a few trustworthy agencies," you said, recalling that Feng did have a second cousin that was allegedly good at making car bombs.

Kharoti squinted at you, like she wasn't sure if you were threatening her. "I work for the Atlas News Network, and while there has been some...pressure from above to let certain stories go, my boss is as driven as I am and very adept at...covering for me. I am not without allies."

Well, that probably meant she had more protection than a freelance journalist. That was something. "Is this an "enemy of my enemy" kind of thing?" You leaned back in your chair.

"I know Zhai Feng is trying to field legitimate business opportunities for her clan. I know she fought a bloody succession battle. I know she's walking a very fine line, and I actually respect her for it. But I'm not trying to do a story on her yet or find protection. I want to know if you or your people can give me anything on Vishkar. And I just thought you'd like to know how much I've already found out."

You blinked as she slid a data chip across the table.
"This is my resume, my hook, and an example of the quality of my work," she said. "I can respect and protect the secrecy of my sources. I hope you'll consider contributing."

She picked up her spoon back up and took a bite of her gelato. Her hands shook a little, and it occurred to you then that she had to be aware of the risk she was taking by approaching you directly. That you were a stranger, a killer, and a networks operative that could just as easily silence her for drawing your attention and getting too close to the truth. You had to respect that level of chutzpah.

"How do you know I'm not one of the bad guys?" You asked, taking the data chip and sliding it into your jacket pocket.

"I don't, not for sure," she said. "But anyone who fights off three terrorists to save one little girl and doesn't even try to take credit for it? Well, I have a good feeling about them."

You felt your eyebrows creep higher, realizing she'd been investigating what happened in DC. "You're not just doing a story on Vishkar."

"I've given you a freebie," she said with conspiratorial smile. "Talk to me after you've read that. I think you'll be very interested in what I have to say."

You left her finishing off her gelato, and went ahead to scout the parking lot. It was no coincidence she was here tonight. And you had your suspicions about who tipped her off and why. Wheels within wheels, contingencies for plots layered over more schemes. You were rapidly approaching the endgame with Nguyen. But there was still Petras and the rest of Talon to deal with. It would be a gamble, revealing anything before you'd acted on it, and you weren't in the habit of leaking anything to the press. Gabriel wouldn't like this development at all. You'd have to add this to the list of delicate actions you needed to discuss with Lacroix.

"You're thinking about killing people," Jack said, his tone light as you climbed into the car.

You'd forgotten how perceptive he could be. "Sorry. Tradecraft habit. Do I look murderous?"

"No. You get this stony calm, almost like you've found your meditation place and then you look out at the world with cut-glass eyes." He rubbed the back of his neck. "Gabriel does the same thing, but with angrier eyebrows."

Gabriel just laughed.

"Sorry, I've become a really bad date," you said, recalling your extremely awkward meal with Joon almost a year ago. Despite the nasty surprises, tonight wasn't a total disaster. There were odd lulls and strained conversations in the beginning, but after a little more wine and that attempted attack everyone else had loosened up. Maybe it wasn't just you. Everyone had been somewhat stressed about tonight. Some of them were just better at hiding it.

"The reporter?" Gabriel asked, rubbing your shoulders.

"No disappearing the reporter," Jack said, not actually sounding worried. "If you have to
"I have Athena looking into her. She deleted the footage," you said, trying to sound calmer than you felt. "Voluntarily and without any posturing on my part whatsoever," you added, seeing Jack's frown in the rearview mirror. You then explained her proposition, including how well informed Kharoti seemed to be. "I'll admit, I'm intrigued, if only to see what she knows. But I'll go over it in-depth with Lacroix before we make any plans."

Gabriel nodded thoughtfully. "It wouldn't hurt to keep an eye on her, especially if she knows as much as you suspect."

Unsaid was the obvious point that you couldn't just trust her convenient timing or ulterior motives. And while you wouldn't kill a journalist for reporting the inconvenient truth, you would kill a Talon pawn or a rival intelligence officer trying to entrap you, regardless of her profession.

Jack crossed his arms, staring out the window as you drove back to headquarters.

"Everything OK?" You asked.

He shrugged, giving you an hesitant smile. "I was hoping we could go a night without kidnapping or assassination attempts. You know, just have dinner with friends, tell embarrassing stories, and talk shit. I'm not blaming you or Amélie, just wishing things hadn't gone down like that."

"But the food was worth it," you said. "As was the sight of you and Gabriel dressed up so nicely," you added quickly.

Gabriel laughed at your clumsy save.

"That was some dessert selection," Jack agreed, rubbing his stomach. "I think I'm going to need a nap."

"You're thinking about sleeping?" Gabriel asked, tone incredulous, bordering on outraged.

"Only a little," Jack said. "Thinking about pouncing on our badass girlfriend too, but don't know how she's feeling."

"I need a little more time to digest," you laughed. "And let me remind you that if you mess up this dress-"

"The Ball is coming up; you should get a new one anyway," Gabriel teased.

"But I won't-" You fell silent, knowing that while the ball was about a month out, you didn't want to say that maybe you wouldn't be here for it. And that was also the anniversary of...

You swallowed your words.

Jack reached around the seat, his hands resting on your shoulders. "We don't know the future, sweetheart." He squeezed gently. "Worst case scenario, it could be a masquerade ball. Gabriel would enjoy that."

You blinked, a little surprised by Jack's creativity.

"We've been talking about it," Gabriel said sounding smug. "The planners might panic if we tell them to change the theme this late in the game, so we can just tell the Overwatch personnel to come in masks as a joke or some kind of challenge."
"We can do Christmas in LA or Shanghai, I'll let you and Gabe negotiate that one."

Heart in your throat, you stared at the road.

"Shanghai will be easier, we'll only have to buy presents for one person," Gabriel said, tone light.

"Feng," you croaked after too long of a pause. "You have to get Feng something or she'll be devastated," you said, as turned off into the Overwatch HQ complex.

"Two people is still easier than Gabe's family," Jack said and you heard a loud thump. "Ow! It's true! I never know what to buy your sisters! And Catriona is going to make fun of me no matter what we get her!"

"I guess that's fair," Gabriel groused. "It's obvious that your manic little Triad boss is much easier to please. I bet you could give her an empty cardboard box and she'd be amused for hours."

Jack laughed and you stared ahead, driving slowly into the motorpool garage, the weight on your shoulders just a little lighter than before.

The three of you went to Jack's room and you kicked off your heels immediately, dropping onto the couch with a sigh of relief. There was a low rumble of laughter and you tilted your head back in time for an upside down view of Gabriel tugging on Jack's bowtie while the two men kissed, Jack running his hands up Gabriel's chest. Gabriel squeezed Jack's ass, and Jack laughed, breaking away, his gaze falling on you. Jacket still on, he vaulted over the back of the couch and landed right beside you.

"You're awfully distracted," Jack said, leaning over and kissing the side of your neck. "But by the wrong things."

"Sorry," you said, biting your lower lip. "There's so much I have to do before-"

Jack leaned in kissed you then, his hands squeezing yours. "I know. And we'll do everything we can to help. But tonight's just for us. Leave the rest of it at the door." He pushed your hair back, forehead pressed to yours, those blue eyes stormy with emotion.

You nodded once, blinking as Jack pulled you onto his lap, rubbing your back while you rested your head on his shoulder.

Gabriel crouched down in front of you, forearms resting on the back of the sofa. His eyes were soft as he leaned in and kissed your forehead. "Did you eat too much dessert?"

"Yeah," you said, a little sheepish.

"Just means you'll taste extra sweet," Jack murmured, teeth grazing your ear. "Do we need to go to bed?"

You laughed straightening up so you could look him the eye. "I'm not that tired, but I was distracted." You took a moment to admire Jack in dishabille, his bowtie draped over the back of his neck, the first two buttons of his shirt already open. His jacket was a little wrinkled, hair tousled, and he looked so damn beautiful it made your heart stutter. "Now I'm making time to properly admire you," you said.
Jack kissed your throat, looking very pleased.

"I like him better like this too," Gabriel gave a throaty chuckle. "Sure, he cuts a fine figure when he's dressed immaculately, but he's so much sexier when he's a little disheveled."

"You're always talking about how anticipation is good for me," Jack said, giving Gabriel a cheeky grin. "I think it's time you got a taste of your own medicine." One hand rested on your hip. "What do you think, sweetheart?"

You raised a brow. Gabriel was the one you expected to pounce first, if only because of how much he enjoyed seeing you and Jack dressed up.

"You want to give him a show? Make him wait for it even longer?" Jack asked, his other hand toying with the hem of your dress. "You'll have to leave the dress on."

"Damnit, amor," Gabriel's soft groan made your breath catch. Jack's evil idea had some merit then.

Of course, if Jack was in troublemaking mood, you'd have to lay down some ground rules. "You better not-

"Damage the dress?" Jack rolled his eyes. "Roger that, boss. I'll be careful with the dress." He hiked it up, fingers already stroking your thighs, they crept higher, rubbing your panties and you gripped the back of the couch, pulse quickening with each stroke.

"So that's the plan, you two are going to tease me?" Gabriel rasped.

"Think of it as a private show," Jack said, grinning over his shoulder. "Or a truckload of karma hitting you with a personal delivery."

"Really?" You asked, because while weren't exactly keeping score, at least when it came to Gabriel and Jack's little games with each other, you were pretty sure that Jack had been the biggest tease all week. He'd been the one sending everyone dirty pictures...

"You were too caught up in the dinner to notice, weren't you?" Jack sighed, giving you a look of mock sorrow. "Well, sweetheart," he kissed your nose. "While you were focused on the gourmet meal and navigating the social pitfalls of our outing, this jerk kept groping me under the table."

You raised a brow. "Tonight?" You didn't know why you were surprised. That was exactly the kind of thing they'd do. But maybe you had been just a little distracted by the food, because you had not picked up on that at all. That would explain some of the tension...

"He started it," Gabriel said, unrepentant.

"I was rubbing your knee. You went straight for my dick," Jack scowled.

"Not my fault you can't keep up. I play to win, boy scout."

"I had to maintain eye contact with Gérard for part of that. It was awkward as hell," Jack growled.

"Huh," you said, not sure what to make of their misbehavior. You might have felt left out, except you didn't want them getting you all hot and bothered in front of company. Especially not Ziv.
"Figured you wouldn't want to get too handsy in front of Mihret and Gérard," Gabriel said. "Otherwise I would've included you."

"Appreciate it," you said. "Now please never mention either of them ever again while we're trying to do sexy things."

Jack chuckled. "Wish you'd have taken a turn in the backseat with one of us. Gabriel was going to finger you just to see if he could ruin those panties or I was going to just push them aside and tongue fuck your pussy before we got to the restaurant. It would have sexy as hell to watch you walk in on shaky legs."

You swallowed roughly, whining softly as Jack's thick fingers slid inside you. His eyes narrowed and teeth clenched as he watched your face, his fingers curling. You arched, breathing hard as he pumped his fingers in and out, his focus staying on your face and your reactions. The intensity of his gaze surprised you. He lunged forward, mouth at your throat as he pulled you tighter against him.

"Jack!"

"You look so damn good," Jack growled, hips grinding against your thighs. "Reminds me of that first time. The three of us in that hotel room. You on Gabe's lap, making those cute little noises while he stretched you out." He shuddered. "I'll admit, I envied him a little. Seeing you shake and squeal while he bounced you on his cock was much better than anything I had expected. And Gabe? Watching him struggle to keep himself under control so he wouldn't let loose and show you the result of months of frustration that had been building up? That was fucking hot."

You fumbled with the zipper of his pants, whimpering as he withdrew his fingers. Jack helped you unfasten his pants before he tore your panties off, tossing the shreds onto the floor. You glared at him.

"Didn't damage your dress," he said, his grin wild. "You didn't say anything about the rest of it." He wrapped one arm around your waist, pulling you closer.

"You pushy bastard," you growled, rubbing yourself against the tip of his cock.

"You love it," he laughed.

You lowered yourself onto him, squeezing your eyes shut as you took him in one stroke. He always felt so good, just thick enough and oh so deep, and you sighed happily, clenching around him.

Jack threw his head back, gasping as he tightened his grip on your hips. He hiked your dress up around your waist, forehead resting against yours. You shuddered as you felt him twitch inside you. "So aggressive. That night you were so sweet and shy for Gabe-"

"Is that what you want? "Sweet and shy?" You narrowed your eyes at him, not liking that characterization at all.

"It all looks good on you, corazon," Gabriel murmured and you looked up to see him watching you both, his eyes dark with lust. "Go on then, put on your show. Don't let me interrupt your fun," he said, the barbs in his tone just barely noticeable.
"Not having fun?" Jack asked, giving Gabriel a smug grin.

"I didn't say that," Gabriel smoothed his hair back, his teeth bared. "Just wondering how much longer you're going to stall."

"Someone's impatient," you said, giving him a crooked grin.

"I've been very patient," Gabriel said, sourly.

"Come on, baby. I think that's a hint for us to start moving," Jack laughed.

Knees digging into the cushions, you rolled your hips, whining as you adjusted to Jack. He jerked upward in response, his cheeks already flushed. Gripping his hair, you pulled him in for another kiss, and Jack moaned into your mouth.

"We should use this position more often," you said in his ear. "I like being able to look you in the eye while I ride you."

"Whatever you want, sweetheart," Jack cupped your face. "Just don't stop." A splash of red stained his collar and smeared the corner of his mouth. You took a moment to admire your lipstick on him, while you rocked your hips. Jack embraced you, head tilted back as he stared up at you, clearly appreciating the view.

"Love how you feel inside me," you murmured, wanting to reciprocate. "Love watching you while you're touching me."

"It's my pleasure," Jack groaned. "My apparently...delayed pleasure."

You raised a brow, slowing down. "Oh?"

"You were all business tonight," Jack begun to bounce you harder on his lap, his thighs slapping against your ass. "Sexy as hell, but almost untouchable."

"Anticipation," you said, winking at him, though you were breathing hard now.

"Thought about following you out of the dining room, maybe slipping into a closet or the washroom and having a quickie," Gabriel said, voice husky. "But decided it was too risky."

"You were right," you said, not wanting to think about the assassin or the reporter and just how dangerous tonight had been.

"He's not the only one who had that idea," Jack said, nipping your collarbone. "We both wanted to, though if all three of us just up and disappeared..."

"We would definitely get caught," you said.

"Our other companions would have certainly figured it out," Jack agreed.

Gabriel just laughed. "I figured if I just got you alone and kept your mouth covered, I could give you a good fuck against the wall without anyone catching us."

You bit your lip. "Wasn't safe."

"I know," he said, giving you a wry smile. "But it's a good fantasy." He leaned over and nuzzled Jack's cheek. "If you were worried about keeping quiet, you could have always sucked one of us off. Either in a closet or in the backseat of the car. Jack gets loud, but I can be discrete."
"Damnit, Gabe," Jack growled, his motions growing more frantic.

"See?" Gabriel loosened his collar, bowtie already off, the top few buttons of his shirt undone. "Keep teasing, Jackie. I'll give as good as I get."

You pressed your palms against Jack's shoulders for leverage, hips bucking faster as you sped up, Gabriel's wicked words spurring you on. It wasn't hard to imagine you and Jack in the backseat, you on your knees, sucking Jack's cock, both of you still fully dressed. It was just as easy to picture Gabriel shoving you into the coat closet of the restaurant, pressing you against the wall, and taking you hard and fast right there.

Growling, Jack gripped your hips, picking up the pace. "That's it, baby. It's just us here. No need to be so restrained now. Let it all out."

Clinging to Jack, you moved with him, breaths coming hard as he urged you on. No matter the angle Jack was always just enough make you feel full, and this position let you comfortably take him all the way to the hilt. "Jack-"

"I know you're close," he groaned, squeezing you against him. "That's fine. This is just the warm-up. Gabe's going to want attention next, and after that we can both take him down a peg. All right?"

You shivered at the thought of having Gabriel between the two of you. Jack cursed as you clenched around him, the tension in your belly tightening. You liked that plan a lot.

"Get her ready for me, Jackie," Gabriel said, voice low and harsh. "We'll see who lasts long enough to "take me down a peg," you goddamn instigator."

"It's OK, sweetheart," Jack murmured in your ear. "He knows by now that he can't damage that damn dress."

You laughed, swatting Jack's hip.

"You can spank me later," he said, with a cheeky smirk. "After you've come all over my lap. Because some of us don't care if we get our clothes dirty."

"Damnit, Jack," you laughed, breath catching as one of his hands slid between your thighs, thumb already rubbing small circles around your clit. You arched, head thrown back as Jack changed the rhythm, switching to short hard strokes that reverberated through your core. He stayed sheathed deep inside you and you could feel your heart beating in time with his rough thrusts.

"Love you, sweetheart. Love you too, babe." He angled his face in Gabriel's direction. "Want more nights off-duty. The three of us doing things together. Taking you out. Fooling around in the car. Having you both here-" Jack's fingers moved faster, the friction increasing the tension between your legs. He glanced back at you, blue eyes brimming with painfully honest emotion.

The light pressure of his fingers snapped the final twisted nerve that held you together. You went rigid, keening as your orgasm hit, all that tautness unwinding rapidly and taking you to pieces.

Jack's gaze never left your face. He panted loudly, cheeks ruddy, sweat on his brow as he let go, hips shaking as he filled you with his own release.

You cupped his face, kissing him with a fierce desperation. Because you couldn't think of the right way to frame the things you needed to say. Because he was yours, and you needed him to understand that. Because if your time was limited, you didn't need to spoil it with the wrong words.

Jack smiled up at you, hands squeezing yours, his expression tender as he brought your fingers to his lips.

"I love you too," you said, voice rusty.

"Never doubted it," he said.

You stayed in his lap, hiking your dress up as you felt his cum start to drain out of you. Jack really didn't seem to care about his pants, just holding you there against him. You sighed as you felt another hand your shoulder gently rubbing the bare skin. Gabriel's beard brushed against the back of your neck as he kissed you there.

"Have I ever told you how much I love seeing the two of you together?" Gabriel asked. "Anticipation or not, it's a beautiful sight."

"The asshole just knows we adore him and likes seeing his harem play nicely," Jack said with a wink.

"Wait, it's Gabriel's harem? I always figured it was the Strike Commander's collection of kinky bodyguards, you know, one of the privileges of rank, and not just because Jack is some kind of nymphomaniac. Though he definitely is," you said with a solemn nod.

Snorting, Jack nipped your shoulder.

"Don't be silly," Gabriel said, helping you off Jack's lap. You expected him to spin you around for a kiss, but instead he pushed you against the couch, positioning you on your knees, with your arms on top of the backrest. "Everyone knows that Lucky Strike is a rogue government experiment with insatiable appetites, and that she's amassing her own stable of super soldiers for nefarious reasons."

"Oh yeah, that's definitely it," Jack said with a nod.

You blinked, not realizing that they were aware of that rumor. "What?"

"It's fine. We're onto your schemes. But we don't mind serving a ruthless warrior queen on her never-ending quest for cake. It certainly has its...benefits," Gabriel laughed as he pushed your dress up around your waist, his warm hands kneading your bare ass.

"Now, wait a minute." You frowned at that spin job, and glanced over your shoulder. Gabriel kissed you then, tongue slipping into your mouth. He took you off guard as he pressed his thickness against your slit. Jack's cum stained your thighs, and your fingers gripped the couch cushions as Gabriel pushed into you from behind, his crisp dress shirt scratchy against your back.

You still ached from Jack, and if Jack made you feel comfortably full, Gabriel made you feel like you were being stretched just past the limit. You whined softly as he released you, head dropping forward and resting against the couch.

Jack chuckled, and he eased your breasts free of the dress, pinching and lightly squeezing while Gabriel's thighs pressed against your ass. With this angle he went almost too deep and you shivered, heart already beating too hard.
"The dress is still intact," Jack said, before lowering his head to your nipples, sucking on them.

"But you're going to be a mess, baby girl," Gabriel said, rocking his hips, giving you a moment to adjust, before he pulled halfway out, shaft slick with a mix of your and Jack's fluids. "That's just what you get for teasing me, hermosa. And Jack? Well, he's not off the hook either..."

You pushed your hips back, taking him back to the hilt in one audacious move. Gabriel swore in surprise as you set the pace, panting while you watched him over your shoulders and sheer smugness widened your grin as you clamped down on him. You weren't unaffected; there was always a little resistance, a bit of drag as you took his cock inside you. And Gabriel's entire body radiated heat, always a few degrees higher than your own. The man could melt you from the inside and you didn't care, you just took what he had to give, because all those worries and all that love you felt for Jack? You'd felt it for Gabriel too. And while you'd never doubted or denied it, admitting these things to yourself was invigorating, once you got over the initial terror and trepidation.

You rolled your hips, using the couch to rebound and build a harder faster rhythm, despite your disadvantaged position. Gabriel gripped your waist, panting as he moved to catch up with you.

"What do you think you're doing?" He growled in your ear.

"You don't like it?" You asked, clenching around him and he tensed behind you, breathing growing more ragged.

"You're getting awfully cocky," Gabriel sounded amused, but not at all worried, like he thought you were going to tire yourself out first. "You sure you're up for all this, baby?" Arrogance permeated his tone and you knew what you had to do.

"Oh we're just getting started," you laughed, nuzzling Jack's face. "Aren't we, Jack?"

Jack kissed your jawline as he rolled your breasts in his hands. "You reassigning me, boss?"

You nodded, squeaking as Gabriel's hands slid between your thighs, his fingers roughly stroking your clit. Squirming, you moved faster, Gabriel easily matching you. Jack laughed and rose off the couch.

"Flanking the target," he said and suddenly Gabriel stiffened behind you and broke into a stream of curses. "Manually laying siege to the rear port-

"Goddamnit, Morrison!" Gabriel shook with laughter. "You corny Hoosier bastard-"

"Scouting the entrance! Some resistance, boss, but he was unprepared for the pincer attack and he's caving pretty quickly," Jack shouted, somewhere behind Gabriel. "Keep up the frontal assault. He can't hold out forever!"

"I hope you're happy," Gabriel muttered in your ear, breaths staggered. "Once he starts with the goddamn military metaphors, he can go on like that all night."

"Oh no," you giggled, burying your face in the couch cushions. "This is not my fault!"

"You're saying you have nothing to do with the fact that he has his fingers in my ass?" Gabriel nipped your shoulder, hands cupping your breasts. He shuddered, body pressed up against yours.
"I take a little responsibility there," you said. "But I had nothing to do with the jargon!"

"Secured the back passage! Preparing to storm the defenses! Brace for impact!"

Gabriel gave an exasperated sigh. "The only thing you're destroying, Morrison, is my hard-on," he lied, because you could feel him inside you, and despite Jack's cringe-worthy dialogue, Gabriel was nowhere near soft.

Jack just laughed and Gabriel tensed, arms tightening around you. "Hey, I left off the naval terms this time. I thought you'd appreciate that."

"Jack, have I ever told you how sexy you are when you just fuck me silently?" Gabriel asked. "Like, without any words coming out of your beautiful quiet mouth?"

"Phase Two initiated," Jack said, humming happily. "You ready to secure the payload, sweetheart?"

It took you a few seconds to pull yourself together, mostly because Jack was absolutely ridiculous. "Roger that," you said and Gabriel groaned. "The payload is mine!"

"Not you too-"And then Gabriel froze. You heard Jack grunt, and you could easily picture that look of pleased concentration on his face as he eased inside Gabriel. Gabriel braced himself against the couch, his arms on either side of your body.

You leaned over and kissed his bicep, clenching your internal muscles and Gabriel moaned in your ear, a low needy sound that had you shivering.

"Locking down the objective! Rally to me!"

"Hold up," Gabriel said, hoarsely. He unzipped your dress, gently pushed it over your head, and carefully set it on the end table. It looked intact, but you weren't thinking about that right now. Your bra came off next, though he tossed it on the floor. "Your stockings are a lost cause," he said. "But I do love how you look in a garter belt." His fingers traced the lines on your skin, his touch making your nerves sing.

"It's very sexy," Jack said, voice husky. "All set?"

There was a pause as Gabriel straightened up and you could hear the soft sweet sounds of your lovers kissing. Gabriel sighed, and suddenly you were pressed firmly against the couch, Gabriel hammering away at you from behind.

You yelped in shock, and then began to move, whining as Gabriel's heavy balls slapped against your ass, his hands gripping the back of the couch as you and Jack worked him from both ends.

Gabriel went deep, his thick cock splitting you wide and you milked him as best as you could, not immune to the feel of his bare skin against yours, the heat of his mouth on the back of your neck.

"Love this juicy ass," Jack groaned. "And your shoulders, in that jacket? Fuck, Gabe. I'm going want to see you in nothing but that damn jacket."

"That can be arranged," Gabriel panted.

"Just wanted to sit in your lap and leave lipstick marks all over your throat," you managed “Wanted to ride in the backseat with you...but wouldn't have been...presentable after.” You gripped the couch, using it as an anchor to push back against Gabriel's hard thrusts.

"Having you both out, dressed up..." Gabriel swallowed roughly. "That alone made it a good night," he said. "One that keeps getting better."

You were a slick, sweaty mess, stretched on Gabriel's cock. Being sandwiched between you and Jack threw off his rhythm, so he couldn't just pound you into the sofa, but he was still fucking you hard, and it took all your focus to keep him from gaining the upper hand. You kept an irregular tempo, moving with him and then half a beat faster.

"Doesn't it feel good, Gabe? Taking it on both ends from us? I love how she feels around my dick, how tight she is. The way she squirms and moans when you hit just the right angle. It's even better when you're getting your ass filled at the same time. You really need to let me pound you more often. I know you love how deep I get. All those sensations together is kind of overwhelming. Like you're drowning in pleasure-"

Gabriel tensed, hips bucking fast as he thrashed between the two of you. You clawed at the sofa, crying out as he broke your rhythm, his strokes getting harder and faster as his control shattered. His fingers moved roughly against your clit. You couldn't tell if it was just you or if the entire piece of furniture was shaking under his thrusts, but it didn't matter. You were too close to care. He sunk his teeth into your shoulder and you wailed, a low and desperate sound as he dragged you over the edge with him. Your orgasm hit hard as his hot cum splashed against your inner walls.

And then you were falling, falling, holy shit, literally falling, and you swore as the couch tipped backward. You toppled with it, bouncing between the cushions and Gabriel's hard body.

"Goddamnit!” Gabriel shouted, and you squeaked as he threw his arms out to slow the descent. Gabriel braced himself above you, managing to catch himself and land with most of his weight on his forearms instead of on you.

You lay there sprawled out on your stomach, legs in the air, the shoes in the doorway at eye level. Gabriel was still tangled up with you, and you could hear Jack laughing in the background. Not just chuckling, but full out belly-laughing as you tried in vain to wiggle free.

"Hold still," Gabriel said, a voice rough.

You huffed softly, but stopped moving.

It was only for a moment as Gabriel pushed off the ground, careful not to crush you or drag you in uncomfortable directions. Suddenly the world righted itself, and you glanced over your shoulder. Gabriel had gotten the sofa upright, and he leaned over to kiss you gently.

"You OK?” He asked.

"...Did we just...?" You looked between him and the couch, trying to think of the right words.

"Don't think it's broken. Just threw it off balance," he said, stroking your hair. "Did you manage to come?"

"Right before," you said. "And then I nearly died of shock."

Gabriel chuckled and kissed your nose, hugging you against his chest, his large hands warm against your back. "Well, you're OK now. But I have to point out that I rescued us and we're fine now. No thanks to a certain blonde asshole who is still just standing there laughing at us." He glared over at Jack.

"I'm-" Jack wheezed. "I'm sorry," he got out, clutching his stomach and wiping tears from his eyes. He was still mostly dressed, though his cock hung out of his pants. He looked kind of ridiculous. "Oh God-"

You curled up on Gabriel's lap, smiling as he traced his thumb along your bottom lip. You kissed his hands. "New allied coalition?"

Gabriel grinned at you. "Sounds good to me."

Jack sat on the floor hiccupping with laughter. So he was completely defenseless when Gabriel jumped him. Aching, but still hanging in there, you got up to join the counterstrike.

Chapter End Notes

Oh, I'll make updates weekly, she said, and then failed. >.< Sorry about the lateness.
It's been an eventful week. Had some tax issues to handle, getting up early today to get my car fixed, and still have medical bills to deal with. Also in a "polar vortex." It's not as awesome as it sounds; a bunch of places closed today and I got out of work 4 hours early. And my hands started acting up this weekend/week. So been taking it slow.

In nicer (I guess?) news, I have acquired a second nephew. He was a bit after his ETA, and I suggested that they name him "Delay Fish Jr" or "Control Group 2," but no word on whether or not they're going to take my suggestions. :P I suppose I'll see him later.
(Babies all look alike and when they send me pictures I'm pretty much like "yup, that's a baby.")

I really really want the Overwatch Legos, but I've been very conservative with my money this month because of tax stuff and now car repairs. But maybe next month... (I keep seeing nendos and stopping myself. The Legos I can kind of justify... and are cheaper.) Also, I discovered dark chocolate oreos, carrot cake oreos (with cream cheese icing/filling), and got myself more unicorn pudding (it's cotton candy flavored and comes with temporary tattoos) and chocolate-covered nutter butters. (Teen!cousin came over and we made a junk food run.)

Listening to podcasts at work. Trying to stick to nonfiction ones just because it's easier to focus on work when I'm doing nonfiction. Enjoying My Favorite Murder, Stuff You Missed in History, Lore, Radio Lab (I love Radio Lab), and the Splendid Table (now that it has a different host. I never liked Lynne Rosetto Kasper, but Francis Lam seems cool.) So if you have recommendations, I'm open. I did not like Last Podcast on the Left. I started with the earlier episodes and couldn't get into it. They're funny, but the one guy who continually does the racist caricatures spoils my enjoyment. I hear they get better later on, but I've tried two episodes and just couldn't. Someone Knows Something's first season (and lack of resolution) intrigued/pissed me off. I'm not starting the second season. It's well produced, but I hate getting invested in something that might not get solved.

Hope everyone is doing OK.
Chapter 115

Chapter Summary

Friendship isn't always smooth sailing.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"Transferred?" You stared at Lacroix, trying to wrap your head around what he'd just told you. "What do you mean he's been "transferred"? This isn't a fucking job posting or a boarding school! This isn't a goddamn hotel! He doesn't just get to switch accommodations because he dislikes the wallpaper!"

"It was done under the Director's personal orders," Lacroix said grimly, his eyes flat and distant. "I've put some people on it, but Richard Prince has already been moved to an undisclosed American facility. One of those old-fashioned extraordinary rendition sites in Poland." He shook his head, holding up one hand to stave off the rest of your rant. "I have already traced the chain of orders, identified the security failures, and flagged everyone involved. This was done without Jack or Gabriel's knowledge or consent, but there really weren't so many "security violations" as everyone involved was taking orders from our own director. Petras cites placating the Americans, but we know the real reason."

"There's nothing-?"

"Nothing else we can do about it directly. At this point, possession is nine tenths of the law." Lacroix heaved a tired sigh. "I suppose it doesn't matter in the long run. We have already acquired more valuable intel from him than I had expected, but I would have liked to had the opportunity to get more."

Petras would probably ensure Prince was silenced, and while you felt absolutely no regrets over that, you hated that he'd stolen an asset out from under you.

"Have you alerted General Singh, Senator Armstrong, Agent Brant, and the rest of our American allies?"

"Yes," Lacroix said taking a slow long drink from his mug and you had the sneaking suspicion that wasn't coffee. "Hopefully, one of them will be able to keep a close eye on the situation. But I am not optimistic."

"Not a word I've ever associated with you," you said. "Except when it comes to Ziv's behavior. And even then I'd be more inclined to use "delusional" or something with more nuance."

"Because you have a great deal of mastery over nuance," Lacroix said sourly, giving you a pointed look.

"Not my specialty," you said without missing a beat, keeping a big smirk on your face, maybe just to annoy him. "Which is why I want to know your opinion on Kharoti and her investigation. That's some suspicious timing." You had already looked over her data, finding a few minor errors and few small connections between midlevel government officials and Vishkar representatives that you had not been aware of, but none of it was surprising. It was thorough work, impressive for a civilian, but ultimately not useful to you. Maybe she would be good at disseminating any information you needed leaked, but she was too intelligent to do it for free, so you'd have to be tricky.

Lacroix took a sip of his drink, settling in his chair. "There are a lot of factors at play. We certainly aren't ready to go public with any discoveries, though we could do far worse than Kharoti."

"She knows you," you said, and maybe it sounded a little like an accusation.

"She knows I am a poster agent of Overwatch. We have crossed paths on occasion, usually at cultural events, where I attended as Amélie's husband, not in any other official capacity. She is aware of my DGSE background and some of what that work entailed. She does not know me, Chanceux," Lacroix said.

You rolled your eyes, not sure why he was being so fussy. Well, that was just part of whom he was and it had been a difficult morning for him. You could cut him a little slack. Or at least not squabble with him over every piece of minutiae. "She's knows you well enough to approach me instead. Whatever that implies."

Lacroix nodded at that. "I know you are not inclined to deal with the press. I am willing to take the lead on this maneuver, however she did come to you, so you may have to serve as the mouthpiece again," he said. "Though I'm certain that dealing with her will be far less distasteful than Petras."

"I can think of a dozen people, ones that I've personally killed, that are far less distasteful than Petras."

Lacroix laughed. "Ziv is looking into her archives now. She has quite the encryption. It might be easier to arrange a meeting with her. I will draft a list of acceptable topics."

"You don't think she's Talon? Maybe in the employ of another intelligence agency?"

"No, but I suppose you can never be too careful," he said. "I realize you don't read many things outside of intelligence briefings, but Kharoti is well-respected investigative journalist who specializes in forensic accounting and is not so well-liked by government officials with something to hide."

"OK," you said, trying not to scowl at Lacroix's tone. "So do you think Kwento arranged this meeting?"

Lacroix blinked. "You think she tapped Kharoti as an ally against Petras? I suppose that's very possible..." Lacroix smiled. "Look at you, thinking outside the usual parameters. Are you feeling all right?"

You narrowed your eyes, crossing your arms. Because another set of possibilities had just opened up. Kwento wasn't the only person who would use a reporter as a pawn.

Lacroix's irritating little smirk widened.

"How goes your interview with our party crasher?" You asked, somewhat annoyed that you didn't get to sit in on this one. He had, after all, interrupted your dinner and punched you in the face. But Tataryn and Lacroix were handling the details, Tataryn playing the dubiously good cop.

"There was no major security breach. He hired a decent hacker with her own surveillance network, who happened to be in Zurich at the time. She's been dealt with and he's just a hitman who had access to a good facial recognition program. He is of little consequence."

"So you're just going to let him go?" You asked, raising a brow.

Lacroix gave you a withering look. "You are nowhere near as funny as you think you are."

"Hey, you're the one downplaying his worth. I wasn't sure if you were going to transfer him out. I browsed some of the files and it sounded like the Germans wanted him for questioning regarding-"

"Chanceux, what he knows does not affect us. But I will do my due diligence and extract the maximum amount of usable intelligence from him while he is under my care. I do not trust anyone to be as thorough," Lacroix said, smile chilly, the look in his eyes almost manic and definitely downright uncivilized.

"Just following up." You held very still, not entirely comfortable with this side of Lacroix.

"Do not concern yourself, Chanceux. I am handling it," he said, tone a little less vicious as he straightened his collar. "I must ask, do you remember the designation I gave the "traitor" list?"

You raised a brow, not expecting him to ask you straight out, but not at all surprised that he had changed the subject so rapidly. By now you were used to his ways, his conversational hairpin turns and goading smokescreens. "The file was Revenant Gun, Clearance level Ultramarine, Priority Degas," you parroted back.

Lacroix smiled broadly at that. "But you have not been able to access it again, have you?"

"I think you know the answer to that," you said, because maybe you'd checked a few times for updates, without success. "Not that I need to. I've made a point to remember the dangerous ones." The witting traitors that were just waiting for their moment to strike.

Lacroix folded his hands in his lap. "I have made some additions to the list, as recently as this morning."

"Are you going to show me?"

"Not right now," Lacroix said, waving his hand. "You have more important things to focus on. I was just curious if you recalled the code words."

You stared at him for a long moment. He met your gaze, those brown eyes oddly pleased by your accurate response. And that was an answer in and of itself.

"You could always-"

"I'd rather handle these cases individually. I am, after all, also waging a campaign of disinformation within the traitor ranks. It's a delicate operation. Should the need arise, Athena will give access to someone I trust to deal with the situation. I am not the only one monitoring our fifth column. Do not worry your pretty head over it."

It wasn't that Lacroix kept his cards close to his chest, you were used to that. Or even the patronizing tone and petty wording. Yeah, that was irritating, yet it came with territory. However, the fact that he was withholding that information, at such a crucial time, bothered you. But then, you weren't going to be around to deal with it, so...

"Yeah, OK," you said. Because as much as it annoyed you, it was out of your hands; there was no point in sharing that intel with you if you were going to be gone: you would only become a bigger liability. Everyone higher up knew that Lacroix had compiled a list. If something happened to him, Lacroix would have several contingency plans in place.

"Now, I think you should go see what the elder Shimada is so worked up about. I've heard that he's been particularly moody as of late."

"Oh joy," you said, standing up, now with the sneaking suspicion that Lacroix knew exactly what had Hanzo out of sorts. And while you knew you should focus on dealing with the elder Shimada, Lacroix had given you plenty of things to think about. Like just what the hell was he angling for? And how many schemes did he have in play? And where exactly did you fit into it all?

"Is this really necessary?" Hanzo asked, exasperation just barely covering the horror in his voice.

"You wouldn't let me pull over to scoop up the road kill, so this is the next best thing," you laughed, pushing the still-frozen raw liver several feet into the vent above the air exchange.

Hanzo just sighed. "I cannot believe that months later you are still amused by this."

"Well, yeah," you said, rolling your eyes as you replaced the metal grating. Grinning, you headed to the fridge, and uncapped a bottle of distilled vinegar. You pulled out the milk, the half and half, and the orange juice, and then added a good dose of vinegar to each, putting more into the dairy products to ensure they curdled.

On a whim, you shook all the carbonated drinks too, because why not? You were tempted to switch the labels on some of the canned goods but that seemed a little blatant. Also, Hanzo was obviously growing more impatient.

Shaking his head, Hanzo leaned against the kitchen table. An Athena drone kept watch by the door, but your target had moved to a new apartment, possibly in an attempt to escape the "haunting" of his house. Unfortunately for him, the security was even laxer than before. Yes, there were surveillance cameras, but Athena had disabled them pretty quickly. You considered adding more vinegar to the brandy snifter sitting in living room.

"Are you almost done?"

Sighing, you poured the vinegar into the brandy, and turned to face Hanzo. "You told me you wanted to talk privately."

Dressed in a drab custodial jumpsuit with an unassuming cap, Hanzo blinked at you, like he hadn't expected you to remember.

"I didn't just bring you out here because I thought it would be fun." In fact, pretty much anyone else would have been more fun. Everyone else, Gabriel included, got really into the swing of sabotaging things for the sheer joy of it. Hanzo just kind of stood there uncomfortably, constantly exuding a low-key air of disapproval.
"Your AI is here as well," Hanzo said, staring at the wall.

Hanzo had accidentally found out about Athena when Feng had announced her early on in the preliminary discussions for the On Sing blood oath. And while you weren't really worried about him blabbing, it felt strange that he was privy to one of Overwatch's bigger secrets. Sure, he was part of Shit Spiders, but his clearances were narrow and very specific.

"Right, so we get out of here, maybe go pick up some afternoon cake and tea?" You asked, trying to think of something that would make His Fussiness more comfortable.

"Yes, that sounds acceptable," Hanzo said, arms tightly crossed.

"Well, give me a moment to play in the medicine cabinet, and then I'll be ready to go."

"You're not going to poke holes in his prophylactics, are you? Because I tried to explain to Tataryn how that would backfire but-"

"Oh, that is evil," you laughed, rubbing your hands together. "I was just going to replace his pain medicine with sugar pills, and pour salad dressing into his shampoo..."

Hanzo squinted at you, like he still couldn't tell if you were half-joking, actually serious, or simply fucking with him. Silly Hanzo, the answer was very obviously "all of the above."

After you left the apartment, you'd shed your custodial jumpsuits, gone to the bakery and a coffee shop, and then put Athena in privacy mode. She'd be keeping watch for you, but she wouldn't be eavesdropping. You hoped. That was a lot of trust to put in someone, and given your own natural curiosity, you knew it would be hard to reign in that impulse if you had the power to eavesdrop on well...almost anyone. Hopefully, Athena had better self control than you did.

You stopped at a park. It was a bright autumn day, warm and sunny, the leaves on the trees just starting to change. You and Hanzo sat on a bench, sipping your drinks, a box of pastries creating a respectable boundary in the middle. But it was still just the two of you, out together alone for reasons other than work. With any of your other Blackwatch friends, you wouldn't have thought twice about it. But your relationship with Hanzo was different.

It was strange to realize that your initial enmity toward Hanzo - the asshole who damn near killed Genji and also shot you with arrows - had faded over time. It was a gradual process. Constrained dislike turning to resentful irritation, softening with pity, and slowly becoming a sense of mild, if constant, exasperation.

You inhaled the steam off your coffee, watching him out of the corner of your eye as he took drinks of his soy latte. It surprised you that he'd ordered that instead of fussing about the subpar tea selection at the cafe. Was that growth? Or had he just given up on finding a place that served tea to his standards? And really, what was the difference?

You took a bite of a tiny chocolate almond tart while you basked in the sunlight. The chocolate filling was silky smooth and the salted slivers of roasted almond had a delightful crunch. It was pleasantly warm outside, and you tried to focus on that comforting feeling, instead of Hanzo, who sat hunched over beside you.

He had changed into an oversized light green jacket and sleek gray and gold plaid pants. The outfit was Shibuya street casual, somewhat clashing but oddly stylish. Hanzo made it work.
"So what's going on?" You didn't look at him. The park was really quite pretty in the afternoon sun. Shanghai had a completely different climate and milder winters, which should have been a plus in your book. You never expected that you would like Zurich this much. However you'd lived here long enough that it was home: you knew where to eat, what shortcuts to take, and where all the CC cameras were. And you knew that you would miss being here.

"How did you handle Agent Zenyatta?" Hanzo asked, abruptly breaking his brooding silence. He continued to stare straight ahead, shoulders locked tight. "He likes to follow me around spouting ko-ans and platitudes, posing abstruse philosophical queries, and prying most invasively into my personal life."

"That's just whom he is and what he does," you said, covering half your face with your napkin so he didn't see your smirk, those complaints so very familiar. You didn't hate Hanzo, and you didn't want anything truly bad to happen to him, but knowing that he was Zenyatta's new target made your smile just a little wider.

"He doesn't do this to my brother, or even Agent McCree."

"He's a healer," you said, taking another bite of your tarts. "He thinks it's his job to fix things that he deems are...broken, and he doesn't care that those things might not be any of his goddamn business."

Hanzo gave you a wary look. "I won't argue with your assessment."

"You haven't heard the whole thing," you said. "He doesn't care if you'd rather everyone left your personal issues alone. He'll go straight for the throat, though he doesn't bite all the way down. Just...makes you very uncomfortable. I suppose having him constantly poking at me was good for me, in the long run," you said reluctantly, because it was unlikely Hanzo would repeat that, and even less likely that anyone would believe him if he did.

And now that Zenyatta was off your case, you could take the time to deconstruct his methodology and appreciate his skill. The main thing was that he knew exactly how much to push, never quite going too far. On top of being insightful, his approach was incredibly annoying and thought-provoking, or maybe just plain provoking. It was miraculous how no one had punched him in the face yet, though having a head made of metal might have contributed to that.

Either way, seeing him inflict that on other people was like watching an artist work. Still, he was oddly gentle with Genji and only lightly teasing with Jesse. Both men seemed quite fond of him. But Hanzo was getting the same treatment you'd received back when Kwen-to thought you were a Petras spy. Did Zenyatta suspect Hanzo's motives? Maybe. But it was more likely that the busybody monk had honed in on something in Hanzo's psyche and had taken it upon himself to "help." Likely, it was something Hanzo was avoiding, and Zenyatta was aggressively holding up a mirror, waving it in Hanzo's disapproving face, much like he'd done to you.

"I do not like his implications," Hanzo said through clenched teeth. "If he is upset by my past treatment of Genji, he can just come out and say it, like everyone else has."

"Still having trouble?" You asked, glancing over as Hanzo angrily bit into a spoonful of strawberry trifle.

"No," Hanzo said, and you believed him, because his involvement in Bayan's rescue had gone a long way in buying him grace with Blackwatch. More importantly, Genji had been quietly reminding everyone that Hanzo was his personal guest (and burden) and not to overstep their bounds. "I am simply frustrated by him."
"Yeah, I get that," you said. You leaned back against the bench, dusting the crumbs off your lap. "But it is really him? Or is it whatever unpleasant truth he's been hinting at?"

Hanzo exhaled loudly, nostrils flaring. He glowered at you, eyebrows knitting together in anger. "If you have something to say, you may state it plainly as well." The words were polite, but his delivery said, "I would like to invite you to go straight to hell."

You snorted. "Oh come on, he's real good at getting under one's skin. Plenty of people have given you shit since you arrived, and you didn't give a damn about them. Why does Zenyatta bother you now? Especially when he's been nothing but polite?"

Hanzo crossed his arms, his expression shifting from irritated to indignant. You chuckled, because that had been a rhetorical question, though maybe Hanzo hadn't picked up on that part. "I can answer that for you. It's that cute harmless face, disgusting decency, and serene attitude. He's so "nice" that you hesitate to strike back, and he takes full advantage of that. He's good at verbal sucker punches. I think he'd make a hell of an interrogator. He'd either shame or irritate people into talking."

"I cannot complain about his manners or delivery," Hanzo said, averting his eyes.

"I know," you said. "But whatever Zenyatta is picking at-" You might have had a better idea than you let on, because you were paying attention to both parties. "-it bothers you, because he's got a point." You took a sip of your coffee. "And because he picks the most inconvenient times to start in on you."

Hanzo crumpled his cup on one hand. Fortunately, it was empty.

You picked up a cream puff, happily munching on it while Hanzo dealt with his inner turmoil. Zenyatta like to spout out truths a person didn't want to confront. It was really quite inconsiderate of him.

"I actually wished to discuss something else with you," Hanzo said after your cream puff was gone and several minutes of silence elapsed. Apparently, you had politely hit a sore spot. Dealing with Zenyatta had taught you some things too.

"I actually wished to discuss something else with you," Hanzo said after your cream puff was gone and several minutes of silence elapsed. Apparently, you had politely hit a sore spot. Dealing with Zenyatta had taught you some things too.

"Sure," you said. "But if you wanted to talk about him, you came to the right person." You were going to bang this drum just a little longer. You had earned it after all. "He annoyed the hell out of me for months. And I had someone giving me similar warnings. At the time I thought they were terribly smarmy and unhelpful." You were being nicer about it than Lacroix, or at least a lot more straightforward with your advice. "I've been through the metaphorical sandpaper, I will acknowledge the benefits. But I didn't like it. Not one little bit."

Hanzo leaned back against the bench, setting his crushed cup to the side. "I...see."

You wanted to tweak him more, but Hanzo had asked for your help. It wouldn't be helpful to goad him into silence. Funny, maybe, but not helpful.

"I actually wished to speak with you about Feng."

You hadn't forgotten. You leaned forward, elbows on your knees. Taking a gulp of coffee, you wanted for the rest of his statement.

There was just more silence. You wished Hanzo could condense his conversations to at least half the awkward pauses. It would make things go so much faster.
You sighed, wondering if you'd given him too much flak over Zenyatta. Were you going to have to coax the information out of him? Despite the fact he claimed that he wanted to talk? How bothersome. "What about Feng?" You asked, sounding a little more sarcastic than you should have.

"I may have miscalculated," Hanzo responded immediately. He wanted to talk. But you would have to wheedle the information out of him. Oh joy.

"What about?" You asked. "We both know she plays up her flakiness, but-"

"Yes, yes," Hanzo waved a hand dismissively. "I am well aware of her skill at subterfuge. I mean I may have miscalculated on something else."

You snorted, really appreciating how he stated his problem "plainly." Taking a deep breath, you had to remind yourself that Hanzo was repressed and very bad at honesty, but he was trying and you should encourage that. "About what?"

Hanzo stared at the ground, shoulders bunched up again. "You know we've talked about the possibility of an alliance, maybe retaking the Shimada ancestral home."

Feng had already said she would help out, as long as Overwatch approved. You'd been there for at least one of those conversations. "I thought you were going to talk to Lacroix and Gabriel about-"

"I have not forgotten," Hanzo said tersely.

Neither had you. "This is all rehash," you said, rolling your eyes. "It's your turn to speak plainly and tell me what-"

"I formally asked for her hand in marriage for the sake of a political alliance," he said, words coming so quickly that they blurred together.

It took you a moment to make sense of it all, but when you did, you choked on your coffee, sputtering and spraying liquid across the ground. Coughing violently, you whacked at your chest while Hanzo glared at you fiercely, his cheeks very red.

"It's just political," Hanzo said quickly. "I made that very clear with a list of reasons why it would be a mutually beneficial arrangement. And while I am currently not her equal in status, I would not be coming to the table empty-handed. I have access to several sources of income, preferential business and political connections, and-

You held up one hand, the coughing slowly subsiding. "It's called the Heimlich Maneuver." You blotted at your mouth with a napkin and glared at him. "I was choking, you asshole."

"On liquid," Hanzo said disdainfully. "That isn't enough to incapacitate you."

"I can't listen to you and clear my blocked airways!"

"Don't be so dramatic."

"Don't be such a dick!" You tossed your napkin at his head and it bounced off.

Hanzo stared at you incredulously, eyes darting between you and the crumpled trash on the ground. "That was un-"
"You proposed marriage? Just for an alliance? What the hell were you thinking?"

"It's how things work in our spheres," Hanzo said sharply. "You of all people should understand the power of such collaborations."

"What the fuck does that mean?"

"Lower your voice," Hanzo said, and you looked around, noticing some of the park's patrons watching you warily.

"What the fuck does that mean?" You whispered angrily, retrieving the trash.

"You and Commander Reyes are complementary figures within Blackwatch. He is the force, you are the restraint, but Blackwatch runs smoothly because you work well in tandem, possibly because of your romantic attachment," Hanzo said, his tone condescending. And while Hanzo wasn't completely wrong, he was oversimplifying things. "But I come from a stringent family tradition. Feelings are tertiary. Matrimony is politic-"

"Is this the same family tradition that had you maim and nearly kill your brother?" Your words popped as you over-enunciated, fists clenched too tightly.

Hanzo jerked backward like you'd slapped him. "No, that was poor judgment-"

"And making a half-assed marriage proposal was good judgment?" You hissed, hands in the air. "Did you even think about how that would make Feng feel? "Oh, nothing personal, but we should get married for purely pragmatic reasons. Don't worry, I don't actually like you that much, but you've got some fine political clout that I want to join to my nice financial assets." Real fucking smooth, Hanzo. Please tell me you didn't spring this on her. That you discussed it with her fir-" Who were you kidding? Of course, he hadn't. He'd just assumed she'd see the "wisdom" of his proposal and accept.

Hanzo closed his eyes.

Since you'd known her, Feng had always flirted because she was attracted to the person. And she seemed to genuinely like Hanzo, even back before it was an acceptable thing to do. And now Hanzo was willing to use that good will in an attempt to consolidate power? That really didn't sit right with you.

"Feng's my friend, and she seems to be doing a pretty good job on her own. If she's taking on a partner, she deserves someone who will treat her well and support her. Not a goddamn convenient business arrangement. Hell, I thought you were her friend. You don't treat people like commodities, just to boost your status, especially if you care about them."

Hanzo seemed to shrink under your gaze. He heaved a deep sigh. "I...do like Feng. Perhaps not in that way. But maybe I could. Some day."

It was nice that Hanzo could finally admit these things. But it wasn't nearly enough. "You're not making this better."

"I admit that I miscalculated," he said, hanging his head, hands folded in his lap. "And now things are strange between us."

"I bet."

The two of you sat there in tense silence, Hanzo wincing several times, like he could telepathically pick up on your vicious thoughts. But that certainly didn't stop you from thinking them.

"It was unwise," Hanzo said after several minutes. "Your assessment is correct and I regret my thoughtlessness. I never intended to cause her distress. I expect that you want berate me more?"

"Yeah, I do." You tilted your head back, staring at a puffy set of clouds. They looked like sailboats gliding across the clear blue sky. Rubbing your temples, you tried to sort through the buzz of angry thoughts filling your head. You were a little surprised to find you were disappointed, like you'd really expected better from Hanzo. Huh. "I want to shout at you," you said after some deep breathing. "But that won't actually help anything."

"I want to fix things," Hanzo said, earnestly.

"How?" You asked, before you could stop yourself.

Hanzo flinched. "I...am not sure. That is why I asked you."

You blinked.

"You helped me understand some of the...detrimental behaviors I had been inflicting on my brother. And I know you offered him advice on how to deal with me," Hanzo said, quietly. "You are also good friends with Feng. I did not know who else to ask."

You stared at him, realizing that he actually had a point, that you might be the most qualified person and that was terrifying. "Does Genji know?" You asked, because you weren't sure how to respond to that statement of pure desperation.

"I have not told him, but he is more...insightful than I remember," Hanzo said, actually sounding embarrassed. "Perhaps it is just another thing that has changed since he left home," he murmured, tone almost wistful.

"Most everyone in Blackwatch is a lot more perceptive than they let on," you said, because he had to be figuring that out by now.

Hanzo gave you a sidelong glance. "Yes, I'm coming to understand that. But to answer your question, I do not know if Feng has told him. They also speak frequently, but he has not broached the topic with me." Hanzo paused. "Do you think he has feelings for her? I always assumed it was the angry little German doctor, though he seems to have quite the rivalry with Agent McCree..."

"Couldn't say," you replied, not actually lying. "He never talks about that kind of thing with me."

"Oh," Hanzo sighed. "Please understand that I never intended to be hurtful. I had thought Feng would be more open to the prospect given her...flamboyant ways. I have always viewed marriage as the formation of a professional economic and political coalition. I do not know how else to speak of such things." He stared at his hands.

You could believe that. Normal people thought they would marry because they liked someone and maybe because they wanted children. But Hanzo wasn't anywhere near normal. "How do these things work in your...sphere?" You tested the word, knowing that Hanzo's background was alien.

"I always knew I would have to marry, that I would need to formulate alliances and produce heirs. I knew there would be negotiations, long betrothals, and professional respect. Perhaps once the agreement was cemented, we could socialize more...intimately. At least, we could personalize our arrangement. But the initial details were to be handled by an intermediary."

Translation: Hanzo was so rich, he didn't have to learn to talk to people. You shook your head, knowing that sharing that thought wouldn't help anyone.

"Do you actually like Feng? Or is this just about what she can do for you?" You paused, trying to soften the words. "More specifically, what you think you can accomplish together as a mafia power couple?"

Hanzo inhaled sharply, confirming your suspicions. "It has taken some getting used to, but I do enjoy her company. She is very different from anyone else I know. I admire her ideas, or at least her ability to make them work. I respect her strength of will. I think she could help me transform the Shimada clan. But... I do not think I can offer much as a romantic partner." He said that last part very quietly, like it hurt to admit his shortcomings.

You pinched the bridge of your nose, knowing that Hanzo wasn't in a place to date, let alone be in a committed relationship, and that was nothing new. But it was strange to hear him agree.

"When did you do this?"

I sent her a formal letter last week through a reputable courier. Hand-written, of course, in English and Chinese. My calligraphy is passable, though I cannot account for regional tastes," he said so modestly that you knew he was probably some kind of penmanship prodigy. "There were gifts: auspicious fruit, live birds, a jade sculpture of a dragon, a Ming era painting inscribed with a few fitting lines by a poet of great renown-" Hanzo stopped short. "You don't really care about the gifting etiquette, do you?"

You didn't have a polite answer for that, so you rested your face in your hands. Oh god.
You could only imagine how pompous he sounded on paper. And the gifts? What the hell was an "auspicious fruit?" And for that matter, what was an "inauspicious fruit?" And live birds? What?
You pictured Feng opening a beautifully wrapped box and a swarm of angry doves flying out and smacking her in the face, feathers blowing everywhere. You knew from experience that they would not have been delivered that way, but you couldn't banish the image from your head.

How had that letter gone? He probably listed all his possession like some kind of corporate merger: I bring to the table seventeen hundred head of cattle, a custom compound bow, dozens of well-hidden international bank accounts, other financial assets, and a myriad of emotional issues.
But do not concern yourself with the latter. I am as adept at concealing those as I am at hiding my multitude of Yakuza enterprises.

You snickered into your palms, dragging your fingers down your cheeks and stretching out your eyelids as you tried to process it all.

"OK, OK. So you fucked up big time," you muttered, mostly to yourself. "But marriage?
Instead of a blood oath? Well, it would make you seem a more stable candidate for leadership, but you could've offered a blood oath instead and gotten similar benefits without hurting anyone's feelings."

Hanzo gave you a hangdog look, mouth drooping. "I am aware of this, Lucky. But perhaps I am not the best example of a brother either." He ran his fingers through his hair, jaw clenched, like he was trying very hard to appear calm.
You valiantly swallowed your additional comments. Because that admission had to cost him. But you were glad that he acknowledged it. Also, it occurred to you that if they swore a blood oath, there could never be a romantic relationship afterward. They were siblings then. And while Feng had been a little slow to adopt that mindset with Jack, she had wholeheartedly embraced it after Operation I Need Coffee which was actually known as "that one time we ran off to Mongolia without Gabriel and boy did we get in trouble."

"Do you really want my advice? Because I can also just sit and try to listen like a sounding board, or I can tell you off for being a dick. I'm really good at the latter. It's kind of my specialty."

"I know," Hanzo said. "But I need your opinion. I do not know how to proceed," he said. "It had not occurred to me at the time that...perhaps Genji was fond of her. Or Agent McCree. Or even the Strike Commander's brother."

You laughed, because Jesse didn't seem interested in Feng and Michael was downright leery of her. Maggie though... Well, you weren't sure. She seemed very interested in Távio, not that Hanzo needed to know any of that.

"Bayan said she wasn't seeing anyone seriously. Not that I tried to claim exclusivity. I was willing to leave the rules of intimacy and relationships open for negotiation."

"Hanzo, stop making things worse," you said, knowing that warning was in vain. Then you blinked as your brain caught up with the conversation. "Wait, you talked to Bayan about this?"

"Not much of it. I did not speak of the proposal to him. But he mentioned her status in passing," Hanzo said stiffly.

"Huh." That was interesting, if unexpected. "Well, I guess you better apologize to her, like really outline that you understand what you did wrong. With style. And you better really mean it too, with no strings attached, you know, if you want to try to salvage the friendship." Because that would be the only reason Hanzo was sitting here looking dejected, clumsily asking for your help. If it was purely political, he could cut his losses or try another tactic. But Hanzo cared how Feng felt, and platonic or not, that was a startling realization.

"Would you be willing to intercede?"

You weren't sure what he meant by that. "I don't know what I can do."

"Talk to her? Assess how much damage I've done? Maybe give me an idea of where I can start to repair things. I have tried a few times...but she brushes me off claiming that the family is considering my offer and that it would be improper to speak of it just yet. And then she finds a dubious reason to end the conversation. Last time she swore that her brother had set his hair on fire and she needed to hurry downstairs with her half-empty bottle of water to put it out." The sardonic curl of Hanzo's mouth let you know what he thought of those obvious excuses. "You are her friend. And you are Genji's friend..." Hanzo said haltingly. "And you have been very patient with me."

And there it was, that fragile trust that he'd placed on you. Something you'd never asked for, but somehow earned. You weren't really sure how things had gotten this far.

"Hanzo, if I haven't murdered you for your insufferable attitude by now, it's because we're probably friends. My affection for Genji only gets you so much," you admitted, because someone had to say it, and it obviously wasn't going to be him. He had, after all, gotten you a nice set of blades and tried, in his own stunted fashion, to improve your hand to hand combat skills. He now occasionally did dishes after eating meals with you. And hell, you were sitting here in the park eating pastries and talking to him about his (un)romantic life. It didn't matter if you never intended to befriend him, it had happened and life was too short to spend in any kind of denial.

"Oh," he said, sounding slightly surprised.

You stared straight ahead a little taken aback by the boldness of your own confession. "I'll...talk to Feng and see what I can figure out. Don't worry, I'll make fun of you a lot. Trust me, that seems to go a long way in making people less annoyed at you. That's a general rule, by the way, not a personal attack. Humor is powerful connection."

Hanzo managed a weak smile. "Then I would be most grateful if you would mock me liberally."

"It would be my pleasure," you said dryly, like you didn't already do that. "I'll talk to her soon." You tilted your head back and staring at the sailboat clouds that had morphed into strange hunched rabbits as they spread across the sky. "I have to go over some more things with her before Operation Crashhawk anyway."

Hanzo frowned, like he was just recalling that Operation Tarasque went into effect next week. "Is there anything I can help with?" He asked hesitantly, reaching over to take a strawberry tart.

You tried not to let your surprise show at that offer. Though it was only right that he made it. Friendship went both ways after all. "I can't think of anything right now, but I'll be sure to ask. Just make sure you keep a close eye on Ziv in Hanoi. He's bad at combat missions: he has a tendency to talk too much and doesn't know when to duck."

"You seem to have a similar problem," Hanzo said.

Giving him a hard side eye, you swiped another pastry and shook your head, wondering how the hell you got into these situations.

"Think of the back strain! Not everyone has your freakish level of upper body strength! Normal people can't go into the field listing to port! Hey look, it's Agent Weeble-Wobble, slouching sideways to duty!"

"I don't know what you think you're yelling about! No one's sending you into the field! This is just prototype!"

"Angela would agree-"

"I was just asking for a second opinion on Mihret's cyber security add-ons!"

"Great! They're really great! Easy to handle UI, flexible loadouts, and strong encryption!" She shouted back. "The problem isn't with the software: no one needs a solid metal arm!"

"I wasn't ask-"

"You know better! Use a hollow model with a composite weave or fractal structuring!"

You stood outside the door of Lao's infirmary new suite, wondering if you should leave and come back at a better time.
"It's not solid metal! Din jävla idiot," Torby snorted. "You're just weak. And you can fix that by focusing on your PT instead of berating me for doing my job!"

"I can do both!" Lao snarled back.

Well, you should leave and come back at a better time, but you didn't have a lot of time left. And they could go on all afternoon like this because despite the bickering, you got the feeling that they were having fun. So you knocked.

"What?!" They both shouted, and you sighed, knowing that it would have been wiser to walk away.

The door popped open, and Torby stood there holding a blue metal prosthesis, one that looked like it would actually fit Lao, with a large view screen built into the forearm. His frown lessened marginally when he saw it was you.

"Well, who is it?" Lao demanded.

"Just Lucky," Torby said, already walking back into the room, the door slightly ajar. "Don't just stand there gaping, get in here." He placed the arm on the window sill, fiddling with the elbow joint.

"Hi," you said, peeking in. "Is this a bad time?"

Lao sat on an exercise bench, carefully lifting her legs, weights on each ankle. She grasped the handle bars, bracing herself with both arms. "No," she grunted. "Just doing PT and discussing prototypes with Torby."

Both of them gave you hard looks, daring you to challenge that version of events. You just looked around, realizing her new quarters were twice the size of the previous room. Your go board sat on the bedside table, the placement of the stones indicating that the players were still mid-game. Ziv had asked to borrow it last week, and you hadn't seen it since.

"Who's playing white?" You asked, because white was winning.

"Ziv," Lao said, rolling her eyes. "He cheats."

"Yeah," you nodded sympathetically. "He does." You set the bag containing shrimp chips, candy, and dried fruit on the nightstand. "I got some of the stuff you like. And I put in some fruit so Angela doesn't skin me alive for bringing all this processed sugar into her territory."

"Don't be ridiculous. That girl loves Swiss chocolate more than anyone I know," Torby said.

"Yeah, that's Angela when she's not on duty. Dr. Ziegler is a goddamn hardass and has taken me to task for the amount of "junk food" I've brought Lao. Apparently, it might be hindering her recovery?"

Lao snorted. "She didn't say that. She just said "good nutrition is a requirement for a strong body." Don't exaggerate."

"She implied it," you said. "And she wasn't all calm and sweet, she was actively disapproving!" Angela had actually gotten out charts and given you nutrition facts and figures, muttering savagely about a high concentration of unsaturated fats and a criminal lack of fiber content. You'd fled as soon as you could.
"Well she didn't actually say I couldn't have junk food," Lao said. "Stop being so dramatic."

"Me? I'm the dramatic one? Are you hearing this, Torby?"

"Leave me out of your bickering," he grumbled, like he wasn't guilty of the same behavior minutes earlier. "Some of us actually need to get work done. I'm going to go make a few adjustments on this model," he said, rolling his eyes at both of you.

"The weight!" Lao shouted.

"The weight is fine! This is a field prototype!" Torby snapped as he stalked toward the door, shaking the shiny blue arm at her.

"Angela will agree with me!"

Torby just muttered something in Swedish, that didn't sound complimentary at all, and stomped out of the room, shutting the door behind himself. Shaking your head, you pulled up a chair.

Lao continued to do her exercises, her eyes glued to the floor. That was OK, you had come, unannounced, during her PT, and you knew from painful experience how much effort some of those repetitions required.

You fidgeted in your chair, not sure if you should speak. You didn't want to break her concentration.

Lao kept at it, grunting to herself as she completed another set. She began a round of stretches, trying very hard to keep silent, though you could see from the cording in her neck and the grimace on her face, that the movements were hard on her. Both Angela and Zenyatta had been trying to mend some of the nerve damage done during the spinal implant extraction, but her recovery was still going slowly. She had an automated wheel chair she could ride around in, but she hated using it.

"Did you just come here to sit and watch me struggle?" She asked sharply. "Because that's rude and weird."

"Didn't want to distract you," you said, drawing back.

"Well, sitting there silently isn't helping."

"Sorry. Do you need anything? Game systems? Books? Kittens? Because I know that being cooped up here can be maddening-"

Lao exhaled slowly, sweat beading on her forehead as she switched back to leg lifts. "I'm fine." She inhaled deeply, then blew out the air loudly. "Sorry. I didn't mean to snap. It's the PT," she said through gritted teeth. "It hurts. I'm not progressing fast enough. And it puts me in a bad mood." She dropped her legs, breathing hard. "But Torby tries to visit me every day around this time, and thinks he's being slick, like he's my coach or something, but I'm not stupid." She bent over and slowly began unfastening the weights, her prosthetic hand almost as nimble as her flesh one.

"He's the grumpy Overwatch Dad," you said, relaxing at her explanation. Because despite the fact that things were improving between the two of you, things were nothing like before, and you weren't certain that they could ever be that way again. It was...awkward and maybe a little painful.
"Sometimes Commander Wilhelm stops by too, and he brings me those curry sausages, and gives me a rambling pep talk," Lao said, her tone softening. "He's the encouraging Overwatch Dad, and also, not very slick."

"Yeah," you agreed, though you had not realized that Reinhardt had been keeping an eye on her too. That made you just a little less worried about how she was adjusting. After all, there was something very comforting about the older man's presence.

"It's nice to have visitors."

"Sorry, I haven't been-"

"Not everything is a dig at you," Lao said, eyes flashing.

You sighed, knowing that was true, but also uncertain as to how much of that hostility was because she was in physical pain, and how much was because of her unresolved issues with you.

"...That wasn't me being bitchy," she said after a moment. "I know you're busy, Lucky. Political shit, assassination attempts, babysitting; it's obvious that you've been pissing off some powerful bastards. It's nice to see you annoying people for the greater good." She gave you a curt nod.

You snorted, recalling your Blackwatch Prank Club activities from this morning. "Yeah, that's accurate."

The two of you sat there, Lao setting her weights in a bin. You rolled your fingers, chewing on your bottom lip. You needed to find something to talk about. You didn't want to bring up the squad, because you weren't sure how she was coping with that. You couldn't talk about active operations or share anything related to Shit Spiders, and that was predominantly what you worked on. You really weren't ready to talk about your personal life...

"Say something," Lao said. "Not this small talk bullshit. The tension is smothering me. Say something real. I can handle it."

You sighed, staring at the ceiling. "That's hard, you know. I worry about saying the wrong thing at the wrong time. I don't want to make you relive trauma, though I know you're not an invalid who'll crumble at harsh words." And if you did something to upset her, she'd yell at you, a lot, and you didn't like that either. "I don't know what I'm doing, and sometimes you lash out. Some of that shit you said before cut pretty deep. I still feel like I'm walking on eggshells around you."

Lao flinched.

You immediately regretted your honesty. "Sorry, that was-"

"No. Keep talking," she said, eyes defiant. "You're right. I won't fall apart just because you criticized me. Even if it is the truth."

Her angry agreement startled you. You swallowed, carefully choosing your words. "I know we can't just expect things to be like before," you said, because both of you had been fundamentally changed by your experiences. "But I don't know what I should expect or how I should behave. I certainly don't intend to patronize you. I just... I guess I miss treating you like a younger sister, and that isn't fair because you've been through a lot and you deserve to be treated like a respected agent. I want to be supportive. I want to do things right. But I don't know what you want."
For a moment, you thought of Hanzo, who couldn't break free from the same role he'd been playing his entire life, and the brutal expectations that went along with it. Except, maybe he was beginning to do just that. You had told him that he couldn't treat Genji like he had before, that their relationship had changed. That he had to rebuild everything over the wreckage of what came before. Your relationship with Lao had intrinsically different problems, but maybe you too were trying to solve them by doing the exact same thing over and over, with no success.

...That was dumb.

Lao crossed her arms, hugging herself. "I hate the guilty look on your face that you get whenever you see me. It makes me so fucking mad, I want to throw something at your head. But I know that's unreasonable."

"Yeah, maybe a little," you said.

She glowered at you. "What happened to me isn't your fault, but every time you look at me, I see you acting like it is. It fucking sucks. I can't tell what's real and what you do out of obligation. I can't tell whether or not we're even friends any more. I guess part of me thinks it's all obligation and that makes me feel like shit. I know I said and did some terrible things. And I know I can't just cause that damage and then expect everything to be OK. But every time I try to talk about it with you, you act like Saint Lucky the Longsuffering, and then I lose my temper and everything feels exponentially worse."

You sat back, turning her words over in your head. You hadn't realized that Lao felt so damn insecure, not that you should be surprised. She'd been through a lot, her reality warped by trauma and mindfuckery. That confession had a lot more depth and honesty than you were used to hearing from her. But Gabriel had put her in therapy, and it was starting to show.

"You were never an obligation," you said, looking into those soft brown eyes that watched you distrustfully. "Yeah, some of my "sole survivor" baggage had me acting stupid, but you were always my friend, and knowing that you were out there...and that you were suffering, that made me all kinds of crazy. Look, I would have tried to rescue anyone from our squad. But I definitely wouldn't put up with the same level of shit from Nwazue, OK? I respected the hell out of her, but we weren't friends. We never got that chance. But you and me, we were friends. I hope we still are. And you're absolutely right, we do have to sort some of this shit out."

Lao sniffled. "OK."

"And I'm patient with you, not because I think I deserve your crap, but because my friends in Blackwatch were extra patient with me when I first got here, and wasn't thinking straight either. That's it. It's not pity. It's not penance. I'm just trying to give you room to regain your balance. I'll get you back later, don't worry."

"Sometimes I do see you and just...get angry," Lao said. "My therapist says there are a lot of reasons, and most of them aren't your fault. I'm working on that." She blew out a breath. "But I can't work on that if you don't come around. And if I cross a line, you have to say something. You can't just give me that sad smile and run away like some kind of fucking martyr. Just say "that wasn't cool, Lao" or "that was too much, Lao," or even "shut the hell up, Lao, now I need to step out and cool down." I mean, use your words like a real person. I can take it."

"OK," you said. "I can do that."

"But will you?" She pressed.
"Lao, I don't know how many times you want me to repeat myself, but you're being goddamn a pain in the ass."

She snorted.

You thought of the people you hadn't meant to befriend: Tataryn, Hanzo, and Feng to name a few. You'd been straightforward with them, sometimes even tactfully so, and while you hadn't launched any kind of charm offensive, they all seemed to appreciate that honesty. You'd been so busy trying to protect Lao that maybe you hadn't taken the time to be real with her. And maybe, she was ready for it now.

"Anything else you want to go over?" You asked.

"So I don't know much about what you do any more." Lao fiddled with a small set of barbells. "Ziv says you practically live on duty and that your only friends are in Overwatch." The words were hesitant.

You snorted. "At least I have friends."

Lao smiled at that. "So he's not wrong?"

"I have friends outside of Overwatch," you said, maybe a little defensive. Granted, you had met most of them through your connections to Overwatch. "You do realize that he talks a lot of shit-"

"I noticed," she said, her expression sour. It was a familiar look on anyone who routinely dealt with Ziv. "He also says you're pretty essential to the counter-Talon ops."

You stared at her for a long moment, not quite trusting where this conversation was going. "I do that kind of work."

Lao stared at her hands, wiggling her prosthetic arm. She took a deep breath, like she was bracing herself. "You're uncomfortable. You can tell me to stop asking questions."

And here you were again, in that familiar bog of conversational pitfalls. It was a cautious dance, the steps light, quick, and ready to be corrected at a moment's notice. It was an uncomfortable feeling. "I'm considering the situation and what I'm not allowed to say. That's all. If I can't answer a question, I'll tell you straight up," you said.

"OK, so what do you do?"

"Aside from paperwork and managing other agents' moods and quirks? A lot of the fieldwork is just sanctioned voyeurism," you said. "Watch suspected enemy agents for long shifts. Take notes, maybe daydream about cake or dinner for a few minutes. Kill said agents if they're doing anything too threatening, but try to make it look like an accident. Write up a report justifying whatever action I took. Repeat as necessary."

Lao blinked. "How do you make counterterrorism sound boring?"

You shrugged and passed her a bag of shrimp chips. She eagerly tore it open and scooped up a handful. She shoved them into her mouth like a kid, her cheeks puffing out. "I do have something important to tell you though. I'm going deep cover soon. I'll be ruled MIA, maybe KIA depending on-"

Lao began to cough, spitting crumbs everywhere, and you immediately began to pound on her back, unsure if you needed to do the Heimlich maneuver.

"What the fuck, Lucky? Did you have to wait till my mouth was full?"

"Sorry, habit," you said.

"Habit? You do this to people on purpose?" Lao blotted at her face, giving you the stink eye.

You shrugged, deciding to be honest. "Maybe."

"No wonder people are trying to kill you," she muttered.

"Kind of an overreaction," you said, taking a shrimp chip.

Lao wiped her shirt down, grumbling in Cantonese. "You're going after someone important right? You're not just doing this for fun."

"Definitely not for fun," you said. "I think we're going to have to discuss your definition of "fun." I'm not being sarcastic. Most everyone in Blackwatch has a different understanding of the word." You paused. "I will say, the most common denominator is good food. Most everyone likes eating."

Lao closed her eyes, taking deep breaths. "I'll let you know when I figure it out myself," she said. "But I want to know more about what you're doing. I know you can't say a lot, because apparently there are real traitors everywhere, but I'm glad you told me. I'd be pretty upset if I thought you were dead, and then you popped up months later..."

"Like you did to me?"

"Like you did to me!" She shouted. "Multiple times!"

"You weren't the only one who went through that multiple times! I thought you were-"

"Well so did I, and it sucked!" She glared at you, face red, her breaths come in short gasps. "I thought you were dead, and I mourned you, and then you show up like it's no big deal and act like nothing's wrong! You did that like three times! Is it any wonder I was so mad at you?"

"Huh," you said. "Well, I certainly didn't intend to do that."

"...I know," Lao said, voice small. "Just...let's agree never to do that again, OK? I know you have to keep secrets, but not that one. Please."

"Yeah, OK. Good plan," you said, smiling at your lap. "I got special permission to break protocol and give you the warning. So I'm in the clear."

"...Agent Lacroix seems to let you run rampant," she scowled. "Don't look at me like that, Ziv and Commander Reyes have both complained about your sneaky tactics."

"What?" Your voice went high. "Reyes said what? And he blamed Lacroix? He doesn't have any room to talk."

Lao narrowed her eyes at you. "I'm just saying, the Blackwatch Commander had a lot to say about your performance, and I have to admit that I'm a little shocked that he hasn't shipped you off to remedial boot camp like they did Ziv."
You squinted at her, wondering if she was trolling you. "What has he been saying?" You asked slowly, lips pursed.

"It's not all uncomplimentary," Lao said, a hint of a smile creeping across her face. "I mean, he was complaining that you're a busybody who intervenes in how he handles agents, but...considering I'm one of those agents you advocated for, I don't think that's necessarily a bad thing."

You kept your expression very neutral.

"He's also been asking about your background. Like have you always had that cake fixation? What about your "oops, I didn't mean to cause mass chaos, I was just bystanding, honest," act? Did I know anything about a missing pair of the Strike Commander's pants? Seriously, Lucky, I don't know what you've been doing, but you're a lot weirder than I remember." Her brow furrowed. "Also I'm a little surprised you haven't been doing business: Zurich seems to be a busy hub."

"It's not an act, I just have questionable timing," you protested. "And I don't have the free time or energy to manage my own black market business any more. I've got all this secret awful work to do and you obviously have seen how damn fussy Reyes can be." You grinned at that statement.

"Well, he obviously likes you enough not to ship you off to Antarctica, even if you would actually be safer down there," Lao said.

"I would fucking quit," you scowled. "The Yukon was bad, but the night everything went down, I damn near froze to death and I've never gotten over that. Had lots of therapy to work through the other shit, but...I fucking hate subzero temperatures and permafrost. Never again."

Lao blinked at the venom in your voice. "He told me about some of it. Just how everyone else...died. He didn't mention exactly how you got out, just that it wasn't pretty."

You knew this conversation would have to happen. Gabriel had briefed her on how your squad had died, but you hadn't really told her about your firsthand experiences. You weren't sure you were ready for that, to see her mourn Valdez, Shin, Captain Patel, and everyone else. But you would not conceal it from her either. You tilted your head back, staring up at the ceiling. "Do you want the details?"

"If you're OK sharing them," Lao said, her tone cautious. "No pressure. I get that...it wasn't good." She swallowed loudly. "I don't need to hear more about Shin and Julio. I...maybe some other time."

You knew this conversation would have to happen. Gabriel had briefed her on how your squad had died, but you hadn't really told her about your firsthand experiences. You weren't sure you were ready for that, to see her mourn Valdez, Shin, Captain Patel, and everyone else. But you would not conceal it from her either. You tilted your head back, staring up at the ceiling. "Do you want the details?"

"If you're OK sharing them," Lao said, her tone cautious. "No pressure. I get that...it wasn't good." She swallowed loudly. "I don't need to hear more about Shin and Julio. I...maybe some other time."

"OK," you said. "The Captain was there for part of it."

"I...I know about that," she said. "But I'd like to hear your take. How'd you get out? Did Commander Reyes punch holes through the walls or something?"

You managed a lopsided smile. "I managed to find Captain Patel, and he joined us soon after. She was...hurt bad, but still on her feet. She already knew she wasn't going to make it out. I was a little slower on the uptake." You exhaled slowly. "But she ordered me to keep him alive. Pure desperation, I know."

"Or an idea so crazy, it just might work," Lao said, her voice barely above a whisper. "That's your specialty."
"Yeah, I guess so." You clenched your fists. "The Captain stayed back to delay our pursuers and...well, by the end of it, there weren't any pursuers left." But then, you didn't have your Captain any more either. It wasn't a fair trade. You bowed your head. "On the way out, we were ambushed and got the shit kicked out of us. I thought we were done for then, so... I went a little crazy. I stabbed my way through our attackers, but Reyes was pretty out of it and they'd rigged the base to blow." You rubbed the back of your neck. It was strange telling this story to Lao, even stranger to act like Gabriel was just your boss. But speaking of the memory to her didn't hurt nearly as much as you expected.

"...He didn't mention any of that," Lao said.

"He wasn't really conscious for it." You shrugged.

"He's a big guy," Lao said speculatively. "Wears metal boots."

"He's heavy," you agreed.

"Did you use him as a human shield?" Lao asked.

"No! Now stop interrupting and let me tell the story."

Lao huffed at you, but shut up.

"So after all that I dragged him out of the base, before it was destroyed, and did my best to follow the Captain's orders. Those were my lifeline, all the direction I had. Don't think I would have had the presence of mind to do what I did entirely on my own."

"Couldn't disobey the Captain's last orders," Lao said, her words a little wobbly. "Her ghost would come back and flay you." She sniffled then.

You nodded, blinking rapidly. "I lost a few fingers in the explosion." You held up your left hand, though you were wearing gloves. "Got some burns on my leg. Was pretty concussed. Relatively minor stuff considering what went down, but after that I wasn't in any shape to make the hike to the extraction point, especially not in that weather, I know I wasn't dressed for it. So Reyes carried me. It was kind of a fever dream at that point," you said, not wanting to go into too much detail.

Lao frowned, her eyes on your left hand.

"Thanks to you and Rivka, there was a rescue transport already on its way. Otherwise I probably would have lost more than a few fingers."

Lao nodded once, her lip quivering.

"Really owe you-"

"Shut up," Lao said, voice breaking. "You don't owe me. Not after everything-"

"Well, thank you then," you said, because you needed to say something. "I really appreciate it."

"You're welcome," Lao sniffled.

You sat there, looking away as she rubbed her eyes. After clearing your throat a few times, you tried to pick up the thread of your story.
"We made it back to Overwatch. After I woke up in the infirmary I got debriefed, slapped with a gag order, and then interrogated about...everything. And I mean everything." You grimaced. "It really fucked with my head, and then surprise!" You threw your arms up. "Suddenly, I'm a full agent, investigating the conspiracy that killed all of my friends. It was a rough start. Things were touch and go for awhile. I'm doing better though." You tilted your head back, staring up at the ceiling. "Reyes ordered me to see a shrink. There was no getting out of it. Recommended a good one though." You shook your head. "That first year was...hard."

Lao hesitantly rested a hand on your shoulder. "...I didn't know."

You patted her hand. It was her flesh one, her small fingers warm even through your gloves. "You didn't have an easy time either. I feel guilty complaining."

"Yeah, my trauma sucked," Lao said defiantly. "But just because bad shit happened to me doesn't mean you can't talk about what happened to you. Real friends don't treat it like it's some kind of competition, unless they're selfish assholes!"

You blinked, because while you knew that, Lao had not always reacted that way. She'd lashed out at you, and so you had grown more guarded over what you would share with her out of sheer self defense. But that seemed to be changing. It wouldn't happen overnight, however she certainly seemed more clear-headed than before.

"I know it's not a competition, at all. But...trying to be sensitive. I'm not great at it." You shrugged. "I do worry about saying the wrong thing and making the situation worse. I've never done this before. Do they make greeting cards for these occasions? If not, I think someone should look into that."

"What? You never had a friend kidnapped, brainwashed, and turned against you? No wonder you blundered through this entire endeavor. I thought you were supposed to be some kind of experienced agent." Lao gave you a weak smile.

You stared at her incredulously.

Lao began to giggle hysterically and after a few seconds, you joined in.

"Well next time, I'll know better," you snorted. "Anyway, the moral of the story is, after all that awfulness, Reyes had better be nice to me."

"Are you emotionally blackmailing the head of Blackwatch?" Lao demanded with mock outrage.

You just held up a finger to your lips. "Shhh."

Lao shook her head at you. "And you have a dinosaur. Where is she?"

"Left her with Jesse. She and Bandit are best friends and-"

"Are you and the cowboy...?" She crossed her fingers and you blinked, a little surprised by her sudden interest in that topic.

"No, but he's still single if you're interested," you teased. "You might have to fight off three other women and maybe one man but-"

Lao snorted. "You've got to be kidding. He looks like an extra from a bad movie."
"He's a good guy," you said, not actually disagreeing.

"What about the ninja?" Lao asked.

"What?"

"Are you dating the ninja?" She asked, like you were dumb for not understanding the question.

"...What makes you think I'm seeing anyone?" You asked, suddenly suspicious.

"Well, Ziv was complaining about your-"

"Goddamnit," you sighed, because Ziv couldn't keep his mouth shut.

"I don't know a lot of people." She paused. "That girl that was with you during the inquest: the Triad boss, Zhai Feng."

You sighed. "No, not her either. Now what did Ziv say?"

"He was just complaining about all the sordid rumors about your love life," Lao said pleasantly. "I was just wondering if they were as bad as he claimed."

You snorted. "Probably."

"Do tell," Lao said, eyes lighting up.

"Lao, there have been a stupid amount of rumors about me," you said. "Right now people think I'm a government experiment that might have a taste for human flesh. It's all ridiculous and I'm pretty sure some of my coworkers, including Ziv, have been starting them just to see how many gullible Overwatch agents they can fool."

"Ziv might have hinted at something along those lines," Lao said. "But he said he was doing it to protect you."

"What?" You asked, voice going high. You were going to have to do something about that boy.

"So does that mean you are seeing someone and he's been helping to generate a smoke screen?" She asked, leaning forward. "Come on, Lucky. I'm stuck in this little room all day. Give me the gossip."

"Lao-"

"It's obviously not Ziv. He likes men and was bitching about a rookie agent awhile back. Lucky, are you seeing a younger man? You cradle robber!" She cackled.

Resting your face in your hand, you listened to Lao tease you, her suggestions growing more and more outlandish. And as ridiculous as it was, you could only smile. Because in the face of everything that had gone wrong, you and Lao could still joke with each other. And that made Operation Candle Arc worth all the sweat, blood, and tears you'd put into it.

Chapter End Notes
Sorry about the long hiatus. My wrists are still giving me issues. I had some computer problems, and I wanted to take some time to fix the drafts I had that weren't working for me. Final version of this is definitely going to break 900k. I don't know about a million though. I will respond to comments when my hands feel up to it, I just wrote 4.3 k tonight, so I'm a little iffy. You can always hit me up on tumblr. I tend to respond faster on there.
Chapter 116

Chapter Summary

There is so much to do, and not enough time.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"You know she's not under outside influence any more," Athena said. "We tested her susceptibility through several methods after her surgery. I could still disable her, but I could not wrest direct control away."

"Maybe I'm still concerned about her conditioning. It was crude, and I don't think she's faking her recovery, but I'm still not sure what to expect from her."

"I understand, I just wanted you to know."

You nodded, Athena's comm link in your ear. "Thanks. There's no need to rush into details about my personal life. It's...a weird situation, and maybe I'm not ready to tell her everything yet. That's a...different kind of trust."

"Whatever you think best," Athena said, like she didn't really understand, and to be fair, you weren't sure you did either.

"I honestly don't know what I'm doing. I've already had one really awkward personal conversation this afternoon, prior to that one, and now I'm scheduled for another one in a few minutes. I'm only mortal: I can't do it all in one day."

"I suppose that's fair," Athena said, sounding amused.

You entered the comm room. You'd reserved it just for this social call. Locking the door, you put Athena in privacy mode and wondered how the hell you were going to address this. You'd just used up all your diplomacy on Hanzo and Lao. Did you have the energy to extend the same effort to Feng?

Then it hit you, like a Shimada brother to the face: you didn't have to be that cautious. Feng could handle bluntness.

Smiling to yourself, you opened the channel.

"Lucky! I was just going to message you! Do you prefer Extramodern Revivalist Omnica Art Deco or the Neo-Classical International take on Ukiyo-e? Trying to pick a house-warming present!" Feng sat in her egg-shaped chair, in her Pachimari pajamas for some reason, spinning around in lazy circles.

"...Those aren't toasters, are they?" You asked, keeping your expression deadpan. "Because I don't like toasters."

Feng squinted at you for a second. "Oh good, you're joking. Sometimes it's hard to tell."
"No, I really don't like toasters."

"We both know I wasn't talking about toasters," Feng snorted and sat back in her chair, like you knew exactly what she was talking about. "But since you're worried, I'll get you a blender, smartass."

"You don't have to get me anything. I can expense any neces-"

"Lighten up, it's a gift. Things suck and I want to give you something that will cheer you up and make things suck just a little less, you know?" Feng huffed. "Just say "thanks" and stop being difficult."

"Thanks and stop being difficult," you said, even if you weren't entirely clear on what exactly you were thanking her for.

Feng snort-laughed. "Careful, Lucky, you're sinking down to my level of humor."

No wonder she and Jack got along. Shaking your head, you shrugged. "Whatever, it's been a weird week."

Feng nodded. "Okey dokey. I understand that. Extended stress makes me very strange. Stranger." She frowned, staring at something off camera, then she mimed wiping her forehead with relief, sighing deeply. "Oh good, we're not out of doughnuts. I was going to cut a bitch if they'd eaten them all without me. I still might if they ate all the jelly ones. There's this place that makes lychee jelly donuts and they're fucking amazing. We'll have to get some. Though they're better with tea than coffee and you don't actually need to hear about that right now, we'll get some later. So what's up? This isn't just a social call."

"It actually is," you said, not minding Feng's rabbit hole tangents on a social call.

"You're using company time and resources for personal reasons? Oh Lucky..." Feng tittered, both hands on her chest. "The power has corrupted you. I bet you steal office supplies too."

"Yeah, well, I'll buy Isha proper art supplies when she stops eating the pencils," you said with a shrug. "Till then, she can make do with-"

Feng laughed even harder. "Oh no, how the righteous have fallen! You have stared too long into the abyss and become the very monster you were fighting."

"You're hilarious," you said. "Fine, we can call this business then. Some of what I need to say is classified, even if it is personal."

"All right, now I'm really curious." Feng folded her hands under chin and leaned forward, those green eyes bright with anticipation. "Hit me."

There was probably a smoother way to present things, but you figured compassionate honesty was the best approach.

"I heard you got a really stupid letter from Hanzo, that it was terribly insensitive, and I will admit that I choked and spat out my coffee when he told me what it said. I would have checked in on you sooner, but I just learned about it today. Are you OK?"

Feng crossed her arms, and stared at the ceiling for several seconds, her body frighteningly still. You weren't even sure if she was blinking. "He told you about that?"
You nodded, though it occurred to you that maybe Hanzo had been so veiled in his terminology that Feng didn't realize it was a marriage proposal and- No, Feng wasn't that dumb.

"That's surprising," Feng mused. "Originally, I was just going to pretend like it never happened, to be honest." She paused leaning forward like she was going to tell you a secret. "In my family, we're really good at that, especially when it comes to things that make us uncomfortable. I mean, my mother is still denial over my new career. She keeps sending me grad school applications and asking when I'm moving home." Feng shuddered. "Not Dad though, he's fine with it. He keeps cheerfully offering me all this operational advice like it's skipping rocks or driving stick shift. And it's fucking ruthless. Good stuff though." She shrugged. "But pretending it didn't happen is a personal choice. This wasn't a personal letter."

You blinked. "Uh...I'm not sure how a marriage proposal isn't personal?"

"Hanzo made it clear that it was purely political move, that he could bring something to the partnership, and that he wasn't trying to lead me on, and honestly, I appreciate the candidness." Feng gave you a wry smile.

"I don't think Hanzo knows how to lead anyone on," you said. Hell, you weren't so sure Hanzo even knew where he was going.

Feng laughed. "And he sent me some pretty impressive tchotchkes that I get to keep either way. Best of all, it got me some serious social capital within the family. Sure, Hanzo Shimada is currently disenfranchised and wandering the world as some kind of vagabond archer with severe PTSD, but look at the presents! Also he's the rightful heir to the Shimada bloodline, he's got some good DNA, wink wink." Feng did actually give you a few terribly exaggerated winks.

"...I could steal you his hairbrush, or you could pay Genji for other samples," you said, feeling gross.

Feng squinted at you. "That's terribly unethical."

"When has that stopped either of us?"

"Fair. We can talk about that idea later. Don't look at me like that! I'm only joking!" Feng said, at your expression.

"...I know," you said, not entirely sure that you did.

Feng just continued on. "Anyway, I know it's fucking stupid, but there are factions in On Sing who put a lot of stock in that. It's certainly boosted my social standing: "oh, sure Feng is manic, eccentric, and foreign, but look, someone important wants to marry her!" And as you can imagine, people in those factions generally don't like me, so it's a good thing." She shrugged. "Now some of the older family members are discussing the proper way to respond, and through my own allies I can prolong any negotiations at my leisure and call them off if I have to." She nodded resolutely. "It's not a bad thing, overall."

"Hanzo thinks he's messed up whatever relationship you have, and to be honest, I may have told him off for treating you like a commodity." You crossed your arms. "That isn't something you just spring on someone."

"It's...kind of flattering," Feng said, giving you an uncertain look. "I think. I mean, he might have been alluding to it during my Family Day visit, but I'll be honest, he was so cagey, I couldn't tell if he was talking about future alliances, Mario Kart, or what we were eating for dinner that night. Genji assured me it was about dinner."

"Probably was," you said. "I don't think Genji knows the details." Except now that you thought about it, you didn't think Genji would miss Hanzo planning something like this. But it was just like him to sit back, play dumb, and silently watch the chaos unfold. God, he was a shit.

"I don't know. But I haven't told him, yet." Feng spun in her chair, swinging her legs. It looked like fun when she did it.

"I'm glad you're looking at this logically, but I have to admit, I was really disappointed in him for being so damn thoughtless. Which sounds terribly naive when I say it out loud..." You trailed off.

"It does," Feng said, nodding solemnly. "You really should know better."

You sighed. "OK. So I get the usefulness of the proposal, and I'm glad you've spun it to your advantage, but the fact remains, Hanzo is our idiot friend, and he didn't even talk to you personally before throwing out this harebrained maneuver. I mean, I never got the impression you wanted or needed a marriage alliance. It seems like you came from an entirely different background. Since your parents married out of affection-"

Feng choked. "What?"

"Didn't they? Your dad really dotes on your mom." You didn't add "and that seems weird because I suspect your dad is a psychopath." Because you'd learned a thing called "diplomacy." Go you. "I mean, I could be misreading it, I don't know the circumstances."

Feng furrowed her brow. "...My mother is not a sentimental person. I have a very difficult time picturing her in love. But upon further review I can't think of any practical reasons why she would have married Dad. Hold on."

You sat back, shaking your head.

Feng picked up a phone. "Li? No I haven't read your boring audit of the Brunei office and I don't plan to. Hettie already gave me the highlights. Yeah, I have something more important to ask. Do you think Mom and Dad married for love? Like it wasn't a bet gone horribly- Ow!" Feng held the receiver away from her head, rubbing her ear. "You don't have to sound so outraged! Yes, this is important and ties into underworld negotiations. I don't expect you to understand" Feng rolled her eyes mouthing, "brothers."

You snorted.

"Really? You mean my child bride theory wasn't even a little right? Well, of course I did, and last time I brought it up to her she almost pulled my ears off. I was just asking- Yeah, uh-huh. Fascinating. Uh-huh. You know, I'm really busy, but I am confident that you'll figure it out without my help, because that's your job." Feng rolled her eyes and hung up the phone. "OK, point to you. Li thinks they actually like each other and I'm just dumb. In fact, he was kind of affronted that I had to ask." She shrugged. "How was I supposed to know?"

You squinted at her for a moment, realized that Feng was way more emotionally malformed than you first thought, and then decided that that wasn't a discussion you needed to be involved with right now. "I just thought maybe you liked Hanzo and it was kind of shitty of him to leverage those feelings when he can't reciprocate." You blew out a breath. "Maybe I'm just making something out nothing," you concluded, feeling a little stupid.
Feng rubbed her temples. "It...bothers me," she said, after a few minutes of awkward silence. "You're not wrong. But I mean, you've been telling me all this time that Hanzo is in a bad spot and isn't equipped to handle a healthy romantic relationship. So I mean, I'm not surprised that he behaved in this awkward way. I don't have an excuse to sit here and feel sorry for myself over it."

"Nothing wrong with feeling a little sorry for yourself, you know, throw a pity party, eat some doughnuts, drink some whiskey, then once you've dealt with the bad feelings, you can go back to your plans for world domination."

Feng snorted. "Just East Asia, Lucky. I'm not that ambitious."

Zheng certainly was, but you kept that thought to yourself.

"I do like him, but no matter whom I like, if they're to be formally tied to me, they need to be able to hold their own in my world. Hanzo could do that. And it's nice that he trusts me enough to think this could work."

"So everything is fine?" You asked. "Because I kind of don't believe that."

"I thought you didn't like talking about feelings." Feng gave you a surprisingly ferocious look that brought to mind rabid ferrets with abnormally long claws.

"I don't. But I've spent so long in therapy and interrogations that I'm just following gut instinct. Also Hanzo is legitimately worried that he's ruined your friendship because you're behaving strangely. Moreso than usual. Yeah, you heard me. Hanzo admitted that he is worried. If Hanzo of all people knows something is wrong..."

"Yeah, yeah, I see your point." Feng spun around in her seat a few times, slowly at first, her speed gradually increasing.

You waited for her to stop. It was almost like you could see the speed of her thoughts with each revolution of the chair.

"It was kick in the teeth," she said, slumping in her seat. "Yeah. I mean, we can work well together. I do find him ridiculously hot. And he got me custom swords that match my eyes." She pointed at her eyes with both hands, her smile hopeful. "I mean, that's kind of romantic."

You nodded. "Yeah. I think so." But maybe you weren't an expert.

"We can take a poll," Feng said. "Though maybe I could just ask Genji for his expert opinion. Do you think he would know? Do you think he would tell? Should we-"

"Later," you said, trying to keep her on track. "Genji might be able to offer valuable insight, but that'll take some planning. I guess I'm more concerned about how you're handling things."

"I thought maybe down the road he'd grow to like me and we could talk about more personal alliances then. I didn't think it would be like this." She exhaled slowly. "It occurred to me that I don't really know him. I mean, I do, but I don't. Like what's his favorite color? Does he likes cats or dogs? The correct answer is both, by the way. Does he prefer mountains or oceans? You know, just the...trivial things that make us whom we are. And what does he actually know about me?" Feng shrugged. "I mean, those presents hit all the right switches when it came to wowing the family, but they weren't really for me."
"...Yeah, I got that impression," you said.

"That part isn't a big deal. But I guess I hadn't realized that he picked up on my discomfort."

You stifled a snort, because you'd seen how "nervous" Feng reacted. She said things, all kinds of things, mostly inappropriate, and she couldn't stop herself. Then she promptly forgot what she'd said. You could only imagine her responses to Hanzo.

"I mean, I called him to say I had to think about it and thanks? It was awkward, but I kind of expected it to be that way." She shrugged. "I mean, I know this sounds silly, but I used to do contract work for the police in my hometown. I am very used to all kinds of bizarre behavior."

"You get political-proposals much?"

"Several, but none that I've seriously considered before now," she said. "But overall, this isn't a bad thing, Lucky."

"If you say so," you said, because what were you supposed to do in this situation? Make her admit Hanzo hurt her feelings? Make Hanzo grovel? Maybe there was a greeting card out there that could encompass the situation with a cute cat picture and two pithy lines? None of it seemed quite right. "You don't have to justify all the reasons why it isn't "such a bad thing." It's not really a good one either. I just want you to know that you're more than a political pawn. I want you to be happy. You deserve more than that."

Feng cocked her head to the side, expression softening. "That means a lot. Thank you."

She took a deep breath. "It isn't the proposal that young, starry-eyed me dreamed of having - not enough baskets of heads - but I know my duty. I don't get to be swept off my feet. Not if I want to stay the Dragonhead of On Sing."

"Yeah, well save the Machiavellian performance for your crazy mafia family. I'm just worried about you. You don't have to downplay it to me. You're the one who matters, because you're my friend, not because you're some Triad mogul with a bunch of impressive titles."

Feng's lips quirked. "I appreciate that." She sat back in her chair, eyes shut. She held surprisingly still for almost a minute.

You sat there, a little worried about her uncharacteristic silence. "So that's why I called. Just...checking in on you."

"You're such a softie," Feng laughed. "Keep this up and you'll ruin your reputation."

You started to protest and then stopped, because out of all the friendly heart-to-heart conversations you'd had today, Feng's was the most straightforward, an exchange with some odd stops and starts, but without baggage. And it was kind of refreshing. Yeah, you'd been anxious, and there had been some discomfort, but it was nice to have a friend you could just have an honest, if disjointed, conversation with. Sure, you'd had to use some diplomacy, just to make things easier on you both, but you didn't feel like you were walking on eggshells or hindering someone's nascent recovery or personal growth. It was comfortable, despite the topic matter, and you could appreciate that.

So you just smiled. "Being both good to my friends and merciless to my enemies are integral parts of my character. So I don't know what you're talking about."

"Really? I thought you were a cannibal cyborg gathering a super soldier sex cult. That sounds much cooler, to be honest"
You facepalmed. "Genji passed that one on, did he?"

"Heh." Feng neither confirmed nor denied your suspicions. "But do you really think Hanzo is that worried that he upset me? Oh dumb question: he must be to 'fess up to you. That isn't a man who likes to talk about his feelings, mistakes, or anything vaguely personal." She launched into her next round of thoughts. "He's probably better off not withdrawing the offer. We can stall or claim to be in private negotiations, and you know what, if you want to tell him I'm not that upset, that's cool. I'm just...adjusting."

"...I think he could use some practice at apologies," you said. "I'm taking suggestions if you like grand gestures. But I'll be sure to let him know that the situation isn't as dire as we first thought."

"Sneaky, sneaky," Feng said, rubbing her hands together.

You bowed, like a songstress after an encore.

"No, it's cool. You can tell him the truth, maybe leaving out all our jokes, he probably won't appreciate those. But honesty and sensitivity are ideal. That's what good relationships are based on after all," Feng said. "Platonic or otherwise."

"I don't know where you get the idea that I'm good at honesty and sensitivity..." You began.

Feng just gave you a skeptical look and snorted rudely. "Well, the bar is pretty low around here."

"This can't be right You asked, examining the timeline of the construction of defensive measures for Nguyen's compound. "There has to be more." Sure, she'd built more turrets, walls, and defensive emplacements, and brought in more cyborg troops in the past two years, but that didn't seem like enough. Not if she was expecting a visit from Blackwatch.

You knew Nguyen was many things, but stupid was not one of them.

Lacroix never really talked to you about Nguyen as a person. You knew she dressed well, but never ostentatiously. She didn't flaunt her wealth. She ate in the same cafeteria as her employees. She treated her omnic workers very well. In fact, she'd belonged to a hardcore omnic rights group back before that was considered "decent." You'd done plenty of digging on your own. Nguyen had been married, but her husband was killed supposedly due to the violence against said group. She had adopted several war orphans, but not much was known about them. Her only biological child was killed some years later as a youth, rumored in a fight over a girl. You wondered if Lacroix had killed her husband or her son, if there really had been some sordid affair that he didn't want to admit to. It didn't matter though. That was idle speculation.

Nguyen's early life had been difficult, and years ago she might have had sympathetic goals. But you could compartmentalize. Whatever Nguyen was then, meant nothing to you now. And whatever good she had done before, stopped mattering when she'd sent her hired killers to Black Base Delta. What she had done there, and to Lao, and all the civilians in the Talon terrorist attacks... Those actions buried any good she might have accomplished early on. On some level, you understood that it was a warning, a sign of how a person with good intentions could be warped into a monster. But mostly, you just wanted her dead.

"Are you sure this an accurate summary of her defensive capabilities?"
Lacroix nodded. "I know there could more, but there are size and power limitations to the compound. And we will be taking a less dangerous path. Unfortunately, our fire team will bear the brunt of her defenses. What she already has is already quite formidable, but the piece de resistance, the item they're getting from the Russian omnium, she has been working for years to get her hands on that. Everything else is minor in comparison."

You shook your head. "What is this thing?"

"Doesn't matter, we won't actually be dealing with it," Lacroix said, a strange glint in his eye. "Your clearances don't go that high, Chanceux. And don't think about running to Gabriel and Jack. It won't end any differently than last time."

You blinked a few times, staring at Lacroix as he outlined the routes you would take through the enemy base. Why would he say that? You understood the limits of your clearances, you'd had this conversation before when- Your head snapped back. It was no coincidence that Lacroix had drawn parallels between whatever Jack had found that had Petras all hot and bothered, and the omnic tech that Nguyen had acquired. And his statement correlated with your own theories.

He was telling you, without telling you, exactly what was going on. You sucked in a breath. "Does she already have it?"

"Oh yes, I finished reconstructing the courier's route last week. It was quite a perilous trek taking the back way out of the country; miles of ice, weeks of subzero temperatures. You would have hated it. But it was very circumspect, enough to bewilder most pursuers. I was wondering how she was going to get it past her compatriots, but she's always been clever and daring." Lacroix's smile was oddly gentle. "She doesn't trust the rest of Talon with her treasure either."

"Who would?" You turned back to your maps, though knew these routes by heart. You had inside footage of her metal hallways, with their triple-sealed airlocks, examples of traps including pressure plates, laser grids, and proximity mines, though those were mostly in the outbuildings and specially-secured locations such as panic rooms. Despite setting up shop in what remained of the once architecturally-rich Old Quarter, she had built a sturdy, if boring hexagonal compound with modular facilities. The layout of the grounds and buildings was fairly straightforward and repetitive.

"You should know that she has furthered her alliance with Vishkar. I don't know if we will be expecting the Korpals to have forces on the ground. But they have been exchanging tech."

"Hard light?" You narrowed your eyes.

"Yes," Lacroix said. "Feng shared what she had on Vishkar's capabilities. It will affect the main combat team more, but you should be prepared."

Muttering a few curses under your breath, you added that to your list of things to do before Operation Tarasque. You understood the capabilities of hard light technology well enough to know that it had strategic uses you had only begun to consider. In Hong Kong, you'd only had to deal with the shielding. Recently, you'd seen footage of people who could wield it like a weapon, honing points and ribbons, burning through armor with laser precision. Thankfully, such prototype models and skilled handlers with that level of control weren't common. But you knew better than to underestimate Nguyen.

"I think you know the plan by heart already, Chanceux, considering you helped formulate a good portion of it," Lacroix said, not unkindly. "Perhaps you should take a break, review some counter photon-tech strategies, and get some rest. I understand that you've had a long day."

You blinked at him, not sure how much he knew.

"I have been meaning to ask, do you think Hanzo Shimada should re-ascend to his role as head of the Shimada clan, with Zhai Feng and On Sing backing him?" He gave you a long look, and you figured that he knew quite a lot already.

"No, I don't think he's anywhere near ready," you said, a little surprised by your own honesty. "But maybe in a few years, with some good people around him-"

"And do we want a strong Shimada clan running things behind the scenes in Japan?"
Lacroix mused. "Because the Shimada are much more...involved with politics than On Sing. And their criminal enterprises run so much deeper. They are not the same kind of entities, you know."

"I'm not sure," you said, honestly. "But maybe I kind of want him to take the shot, if he's going to try to take Feng's route. And I think he needs a good friend to keep him honest. Genji and Feng will support him and check his ego, but he needs someone with a stronger moral compass.
Both of them mean well, but..." You shrugged. Genji and Feng were remorseless killers. But Feng had Bayan and her brother to keep her in line, and Genji had people in Overwatch and Blackwatch looking after him.

To your surprise, Lacroix only nodded thoughtfully.

"Not going to chastise me for being too idealistic?"

"You know Hanzo as well as anyone here, save his brother," Lacroix said. "And you did not have such kind thoughts about him when he first arrived. Hanzo has been...changed, maybe for the better, by his association with us. I won't deny it and I suspect you're very aware of it. After all, you are an experienced agent and your opinion carries weight, Chanceux." He handed you a cigarette, his smile sly.

"Thanks," you said, accepting the cigarette and the light, because after all the open honest talks you had today, you didn't have the energy to focus on deceiving someone as perceptive as Lacroix. "That's the nicest thing you've ever said to me."

"That's simply not true," Lacroix laughed. "I've said many complimentary things about you, to your face even: you either weren't paying attention or were simply too dense to understand the compliment."

"And there it is," you said, rolling your eyes.

"It might useful to have a Yakuza boss on our side. Also, you had similar thoughts when I asked for your opinion on Zhai Feng, and you were not wrong," Lacroix continued, like you hadn't spoken. "I suppose I was too cynical to see her potential and to recognize that you have an eye for talent, especially when it comes to criminal endeavors," Lacroix laughed.

"I've lived long enough to begin to recognize survivors," you said, because that was the easiest way to sum it up.

"Yes," Lacroix agreed, his eyes bright. "It is like looking in a mirror."
You sat in the small kitchen, sipping tea that Hanzo had brewed, while Genji helped himself to an array of sweets. Isha sat on your lap nibbling on a sesame ball. You were leaving behind your entire stockpile of snacks, and while Vo had already claimed as much as she could carry, the rest of your Blackwatch friends were helping you eat what was left over. No sense in letting food go to waste.

Jesse and Tataryn would be by once they were done going over something with Gabriel. Ziv was visiting Lao, and said he'd be by to pick stuff up for her. Távio was helping Diallo maintenance weapons, including her armor. So it was just you and the Shimada brothers.

"So have you made up with Feng yet?" Genji asked, inclining his head at Hanzo.

Hanzo exhaled sharply, nostrils flaring as he gripped his narrow teacup in both hands.

It occurred to you that if Genji was trying to keep it a secret or even be remotely discrete, he would have used Japanese instead of English. You sighed, wondering if Genji was truly the pettiest of you all. He certainly had the subtlety for it.

Hanzo looked at you expectantly.

"What? I didn't say a thing!" You scowled back at him.

"That's not what I meant," Hanzo muttered. "Have you spoken to Feng?"

"Yeah," you said. "Did you want details now?" You glanced at Genji who was cheerfully eating his food. He smiled back at you, and offered Isha some rice crackers that she greedily accepted. There would be crunchy crumbs all over your lap now.

You gave Genji a dirty look.

"Yes, please," Hanzo said, giving his brother a warning look. "Genji understands discretion." Of course he did. That didn't mean he wasn't going to tweak his brother every chance he got.

"She's not mad," you said. "At least she wasn't mad when we talked. A little wistful, I know the "this is purely political, I don't actually have feelings for you" approach hurt her feelings. But I think she realizes you what you meant and that you aren't just...purely neutral toward her. Getting her to admit that she was bothered took some time though. She's still processing. She might actually be mad at you later. Or she might just laugh it off and everything will be fine. I can't actually predict Feng's reactions, and neither can most sane people," you said.

Hanzo nodded solemnly, like you were giving him the gospel.

"But I think more presents, maybe a grand gesture of apology and declaration of "you're not just a political pawn to me" would go a long way in getting you a less angry response," you added. "You don't have to promise her romance or anything, especially if you don't feel that way. But just letting her know that you value her friendship would help patch things up."

"You put Feng in the friend zone?" Genji teased. "Or was it the other way around?"

You rolled your eyes. Genji definitely knew what was up.

"There is nothing wrong with friendship," Hanzo snapped. "Strong platonic relationships are not to be undervalued and those who speak derisively of such relationships don't deserve what they have."
Genji blinked. He looked at you, and then Hanzo, and then back at you. "Did Hanzo finally make a real friend?"

"Maybe even two," you said, sipping your tea. You had the sneaking suspicion that Jesse and Tataryn weren't that far behind you and Feng.

Genji leaned back in his seat, shoulders relaxing. "You realize, that the younger brother's sworn duty is to embarrass his elder in front of their friends."

"I am very aware," Hanzo snorted and reached over, offering Isha a cluster of fresh grapes. She snatched them out of his hand, plucking them off the stem and rapidly shoving them into her mouth.

Someone coughed, clearing their throat from the doorway. You glanced over to see Gabriel, giving you all a sardonic look.

"This isn't suspicious at all. Should I even ask what the three of you are plotting?" He leaned against the doorframe, arms crossed.

"Oh, we're just discussing Hanzo's love life. It's very complicated," you said sincerely and Hanzo began to sputter as he choked on his tea. Yeah, your timing of that statement wasn't a coincidence.

Gabriel snorted. "Fine, keep your secrets, chica. No need to be sarcastic. I was only asking."

You just glanced over at Genji, who was chuckling behind his hand. His eyes practically glowed with amusement. Hanzo slapped at his chest, eyes bugging out.

"I'd give you the Heimlich, but that doesn't really help with liquid," you said, trying to look sympathetic.

Wiping his face, Hanzo just gave you a furious glare.

You just winked, sipping your tea. After all, Genji wasn't the only person who knew how to be a shit.

"If you hug me, I'll burst," you groaned as Jack shifted on the couch. The three of you were in Gabriel's quarters, though Gabriel had hopped in the shower after Jack spilled a plate of enchiladas down his chest. Gabriel had made a big dinner tonight, and you'd eaten far too much.

Jack laughed and patted his arm. "You can lean on me, sweetheart."

"Too full," you muttered, not liking the idea of any pressure around your abdomen.

Jack moved, facing the side of the couch, his feet buried in the couch cushions. "Sitting back to back should be more comfortable."

"Than the couch cushions?" You muttered, but turned to the side, sighing as you felt the broad warmth of Jack's body against your own. OK, this wasn't so bad. Jack chuckled, a low rumble you could feel along your skin.

"Thanks." He reached over and squeezed your hand. "I like touching you."
"I noticed." You rested your head against him. "Not complaining." The two of you sat there in companionable silence while the shower continued to run.

"I..." Jack began. "Never mind, it's silly."

"Nope, you don't get to do that. Out with it," you grumbled.

Jack sighed. "I'm worried. I guess Petras moving Prince out from under our noses spooked me. But I've got a bad feeling about...something. Maybe it's just the thought of you leaving," he said, sounding a little guilty for bringing it up. "Just...uneasy. Sorry. Don't mean to be superstitious. And certainly don't want to make you feel-"

"You can't really jinx us, Jack," you said. "And if you're worried, well, I trust your judgment. This is a dangerous mission. Petras is behaving...erratically. And I don't want to leave." You exhaled audibly. "I'm worried too, but..."

"But we can't focus on that," Jack said. "We're adults. We know how it works."

"Still, it's good to talk to someone about it."

"I'm your CO. It's bad form for a CO to share his worries."

"You're my boyfriend. Different context, different rules." Sure, it'd be nice if Jack felt utterly confident in your success and that everything would be OK, but you were too experienced to buy into that fantasy. There were a lot of things that needed to be fixed, and more things that could go wrong. There was a lot of work to be done. And it was going to be hard.

"Just...be careful, OK? Please?" He lifted your hand and kissed it. "I'll tell Gabe the same thing. It's not a reflection of your skills."

"I get it," you said, waiting for him to tell you to look after Gabriel too. But he just squeezed your fingers.

"I know you've got Gabe's back and vice versa," he said. "Not going to insult you by implying otherwise. Just...want you to take care of yourself too. You've developed the bad habit of being a hero. I worry."

You blinked a few times, and tilted your head, kissing Jack's shoulder. "I'm no hero. I intend to take good care of myself. Because if I get hurt, it'll be Feng and Bayan looking after me while I recover and Bayan is goddamn terrifying, like 'get better and make healthy choices, or I'll kill you.' And Feng will do something insane like feed me nothing but Cheetos for three days or grow me a clone for some inexplicable reason."

"Oh...Two of you, huh?" Jack's tone grew speculative. "That'd be a sight to see. I can't say I'd complain..."

"Pervert," you laughed.

"Well, I'd obvious prefer the original." He kissed your fingers. "Just admiring the copy for its aesthetic value, that's all."

"Uh-huh," you shook your head. "You're ridiculous."

"Ridiculously in love with you," he said, and your breath caught.
You pressed closer to him. "Jack-

"I already mapped out a few dates that me and Gabe can get to Shanghai, provided no emergencies crop up."

You smiled at your knees. "I love you too."

"We'll get through this," he said. "Promise."

You squeezed his hand, the two of you sitting there quietly, till Gabriel emerged from the bathroom, vigorously rubbing his head with the towel. He laughed when he saw you sitting back to back on his couch.

"Smart choice, corazon," he said, leaning over to kiss you. "He can't spill his food on you if he's facing the other direction."

"You were kissing me while I was trying to balance the hot plate!" Jack protested. "I said I was sorry!"

"You know, I'm not so sure how effective this technique will be. I have faith in Jack's ability to overcome unfavorable odds," you said, grinning up at Gabriel. "And his uncanny way of getting us to wear his food. Is that behavior some kind of dominance ritual or something?"

"You guys are dicks," Jack sighed, squeezing your hand.

Gabriel laughed and nipped Jack's ear. "Did you leave me any enchiladas? Or did you manage to spill it all while I was cleaning up?"

"Nah, I kept him over here, away from the food," you said.

"You're a saint," Gabriel said, already heading over to his kitchenette. "Need anything while I'm up? Besides napkins for Jack?"

You laughed. "I'm good."

"Until Jack spills his horchata on your head," Gabriel said with mock severity.

Jack groaned as the two of you continued to tease him, but he didn't let go of your hand.

Your bags were packed. Your gear was loaded. Your murderbird wore her a small backpack with her own gear inside, her tablet in both hands. You'd put her dog and bedding in a separate bag. She was to travel with your mission-unrelated belongings straight to Shanghai, after you and Lacroix were dropped off in Bangkok. Your part of the mission began earliest.

You stood in the docking bay, narrowing your eyes as Távio placed a couple bags alongside your own.

"What are you doing, agent?" You asked sharply.

He laughed nervously, gaze drifting behind you and slightly to the left. "Uh..."
You followed it, to see Gabriel, who was talking quietly with Amélie, both of them looking all too serious. "What did Gabriel tell you to do?" It clicked even as the words left your mouth. "You're not coming to Shanghai."

"I...umm...well...orders?" He stammered, giving you a weak smile. "Part of my "don't get caught fighting other agents" punishment. Agent Tataryn is going to start a rumor about me being sent off to Antarctica."

You snorted, wondering if Távio knew how close he'd been to getting shipped down there before.

"You're going to need help, ma'am," he said. "I know you've got allies in On Sing, and that you're friends with Ms. Zhai, but you need someone on your side that works for you."

You couldn't exactly argue that logic, no matter how much you trusted Feng. Because that feeling didn't extend to Great Aunt Zheng.

"Where am I going to put you?" You scowled, though you knew your condo had a spare bedroom.

"Umm..." Távio squirmed under your gaze.

"Gabriel, did you even consider-"

"Part of his training," Gabriel murmured, wrapping his arms around your waist. He kissed your cheek gently. "He'll learn more watching On Sing than he will being stuck out at the farm. And you could use an extra agent around if you're serious about bringing down Vishkar."

Távio, trying hard not to look mortified and failing, began to stare at the wall with almost desperate focus.

Gabriel chuckled. "I'll give you a few days to get settled in, then I'll be sending Maeda Vargas over."

"Fine," you said, not wanting to waste your time arguing. "But if he's living with me, you're just going to have to deal with it."

Gabriel stiffened, as if it hadn't occurred to him that you'd have to house the younger agent.

"We'll talk more about this later," he said, releasing you. "Feng can always find him a place to stay."

"Hold up!" Jack rushed into the room, coat gone, just in his black fatigues. He gave you boyish grin, brushing hair out of his eyes. "Sorry, I'm late. Had to dodge some meetings." He reached over and clasped your hands, his expression gentle. "But you wouldn't leave without saying goodbye, would you?" He squeezed your fingers.

You just smiled, his ridiculous level of sweetness making your cheeks burn. "I don't know, I hear the boss is a stickler for punctuality."

"I think he'll make an exception in your case." Jack leaned over, straightening your collar, forehead pressed to yours. "Won't you, Gabe?"

Gabriel laughed and picked up Isha, stroking her head while you tried to smile bravely at Jack. "You're an ass, Morrison."
Out of the corner of your eye, you saw Távio pretending not to watch or listen. His posture was convincing, but he was standing alone with empty hands. You shook your head, eyes drifting in his direction.

Jack frowned briefly, probably remembering that while Távio knew they were in a relationship with you, he did not yet know about them. "Don't worry about things here. I'll take care of your plants," Jack said. "Athena's going to put them on a timer. She'll help me remember to water them...or maybe do it herself if necessary," Jack said, a little sheepishly.

"Thanks, Athena," you said. Though you weren't saying goodbye to her. There were several fish torpedoes coming with you to Hanoi. And you were bringing a few to Shanghai too.

"You're welcome, Lucky."

You'd already said your goodbyes to Lao. You knew Jack would inform the rest of your friends, the ones cleared for Shit Spiders anyway, of your exaggerated demise. You didn't really want to say goodbye to Reinhardt, because if he started crying, you weren't sure what you'd do.

Jack reached over and took Isha, cuddling her to his chest and blowing raspberries on her belly while she squawked at him. "You watch her back, OK? She's going to need all the help she can get."

Isha chirped at him, rubbing her head against his cheek.

"Oh good, I'm not too late," Ziv barged in, made a beeline for Isha, and gave her a little cloth bag. "For the road, baby bird," he said, ignoring everyone else while he flicked her snout.

"Hi Ziv," you said, dryly. "Good to see you too."

He straightened up, giving you heavy frown. "I'll be seeing you in Hanoi, don't get all wishy washy on me now. I just came to see Isha off."

Gabriel snorted and you just shook your head. Ziv scowled at Jack and Gabriel, but then swooped in, squeezing you hard.

"Don't worry, I'm not fooled," you said, patting his back. "You had to come. Lacroix and I are on the same transport out."

"Shut up," he muttered, hugging you tighter. "You be safe. You and the boss get dumb ideas when I leave you on your own."

"That's not how I remember things going-" You said, thinking of Spinshot and Gift Horse...and then remembering Candle Arc. Well, you were both kind of right.

"Well, you're dumb," Ziv said, releasing you. "And he's reckless."

You snorted.

Genji, Hanzo, Tataryn, Vo, and Jesse chose that moment to meander in. Jesse had Bandit in tow, and Jack had to set Isha down so she could go to fuss over him.

You blinked as Tataryn and Vo came straight to you. She was in her usual rumpled uniform that consisted of oversized sweats. Face lined and her hair steely gray, Vo held a small box in her hands.
"Made you this," she said. "Be careful. Don't let dinosaur eat."

You lifted the lid on the box, raising your brow at the four golf-ball sized ceramic orbs nestled inside aerofoam wrapping. "What kind of timer, filling, and blast radius?"

"You heard me," she said, rolling her eyes. "Guillard not soft like Lacroix." She shot Amélie, who had her back turned and was chatting with Ziv, an unfriendly look.

"I'm going to buy you a lot of chocolate when I get back," you said, suddenly very curious. "And I'd love to hear about how you learned all that."

"Later," Vo said, shaking her head, eyes darting back to Amélie. "Mission first."

She gave Isha a wary look and scurried back out to the hall, and to be honest, you were a little shocked that she came in the first place. Generally, if there were more than five people in a room, it was too crowded for her.

"Well," Gabriel said, raising a brow.

You looked at Tataryn.

"She said she wanted to see you," he said with a shrug, his smile wry. "You know how emotional she gets."

You just shook your head. "I will never truly understand her."

"It is like looking into the face of god," Tataryn agreed. "See you in Hanoi, Lucky. Try not to attract too much attention before we get there." He gave you a jaunty salute and swaggered out.

"He will miss you a lot," Amélie said, shaking her head. Her eyes lingered on the doorway Vo had exited. You had a feeling she'd heard every word out of the demolitionist's mouth. You hadn't realized that Vo actually knew Amélie fairly well. "He has already said he will wear a black armband in your absence."

"Because he'll have to start doing his own work?" You asked, just a little cynically.

"I'm sure that plays into some of it," she giggled, leaning over to embrace you. "I will tell you the same thing I tell Gérard: le trop de précautions ne nuit jamais."

"I have backup plans for my backup plans," you admitted.

"Then I will only ask you to come home safe," she said, patting your cheek. "I am already planning a Shanghai trip. Feng sent me pictures of your new residence and I believe we can greatly improve on the decor."

"What?" You gaped. You suddenly had flashes of you, Távio, and Isha all holding paint rollers and moving furniture while Amélie snapped her fingers. "I-"

"Quite the party," Lacroix said, as he stepped into the room, dressed in a fine suit, carrying a stylish knapsack and a briefcase. "But we need to leave soon if we're going to stay on schedule."
You nodded, waving at the friends you'd see in Hanoi, and then turning to kiss Gabriel. You'd see him again too. It was Jack you were saying goodbye to now.

You wrapped your arms around his neck, kissing him hard, and trying to ignore the catcalls and whistles as he held you against him, his grip just a little too tight, his body so very tense. He reluctantly released you, Gabriel's hand on his shoulder. It wasn't enough, but you were out of time.

"Kick ass out there, boss," he told you, his stance that of the Strike Commander, projecting confidence and strength. "I'll see you in Shanghai." His voice was easy and smooth, but he smiled hesitantly at you, eyes filled with words he couldn't say in front of an audience. You saw them nonetheless.

"Got it, sir," you said, winking at him. "I'll do you proud." You delivered the innuendo with a straight face and gestured for Isha to follow. You walked onto the transport, turning back to wave, your expression only wobbling a little.

Jack watched you go, one hand raised, his smile strained.

You turned back around and marched up the ramp.

Operation Tarasque had finally begun.

Chapter End Notes

Things are OK. My wrists were good for like three days, then today decided they weren't having this weather change. It's nowhere near as bad as it used to be, but it's a slow improvement. Also, I'm writing some tricky scenes, I had to rework several, and I have at least three more that need heavy overhauls, so I will try to keep updates weekly, but I'm also concerned about quality. Not that I think I'm doing a terrible job but because some of the scenes need technical reevaluation, and I need to hone the emotional nuance or something like that.

I can blather on about the process later.

I will be traveling next month. If anyone is going to be attending the LA Times book fair, I'm supposed to be going with friends.

Vampire the Masquerade Bloodlines 2 trailer dropped and I'm stoked. I might also be scarily obsessed with dragon breeding in a certain Neopets-esque game. facepalm I JUST WANT PRETTY SHINY DERGS. Umm, sorry. Ignore that. I've been getting about 5 hours of sleep every night and am a little insane right now.
Chapter 117

Chapter Summary

Everyone has a part to play.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

You'd switched from the Overwatch shuttle to a private chartered transport in Bangkok. After telling a very sulky Isha that she had to stay behind, you'd gathered up your bags, checked them carefully for sneaky raptors, and prepared to disembark.

Lacroix had been delayed, taking a moment to change out of his suit into less attention-grabbing civilian wear. The two of you stuck to casual, climate-appropriate clothes: hats, loose cargo shorts and baggy t-shirts. You were just a pair of free-spirited tourists, backpacking across the peninsula. You both carried large hiking rucksacks, your gear and rations inside.

You took a two day lead time. Everyone else would arrive then. You and Lacroix would be double-checking your entry and escape routes and doing your own recon. Under normal circumstances, sending both of you ahead was overkill, but given how critical this mission was, the situation called for it. Plus, you didn't mind getting a preemptive look at your enemies in person.

It was early morning when you finally set foot in Hanoi. The city was bustling, wide awake and warm. The humidity had already begun to rise, and it felt so very different from Zurich. You took a taxi to the Old Quarter, Lacroix cheerfully chatting with the omnic cabbie in fluent Vietnamese. From what you'd gathered, the Old Quarter used to contain a lot of the fancy colonial French architecture from back in day. But it had been mostly decimated during the Omnic Crisis. Nguyen had managed to restore some of the historic buildings, with both private and public funds, but had discretely built her own compound there as well.

You passed gleaming skyscrapers with clean lines and rows of balconies, going into a less modernized area still populated by blocky Soviet-style tenement houses painted in bright colors. The cab let you off in this neighborhood. Lacroix paid, still chatting amiably as you scanned the area.

Lacroix led the way to a ground level apartment, typed a code into the keypad, and the rusty door popped open.

It was a tiny two room flat, all the furniture covered in white sheets. You wondered if his agents had arranged it, or if it was one of his safe houses from some time back in his mysterious past.

The two of you silently scanned the area for surveillance, and when you were satisfied it was clear, you set your bag down, opened a bottle of water, and drank.

"Tonight, I'll check in with my agents, before I verify the exit routes." Lacroix had three agents within Nguyen's compound, that you knew of: a janitor, a cook, and an office worker. None of them were high enough up to retrieve documents or eavesdrop without attracting attention, but they were useful for sharing information on guard rotations, technical troubles, and mapping the facility. They could also provide little details. For example, most of the cyborgs were foreigners and English was the common language. Most of the staff were Vietnamese with a heavy omnic presence. The locals and the cyborgs had some tensions, though Nguyen didn't tolerate infighting or let the mercenaries bully her civilian workers.

"Sounds like a plan. Tomorrow?"

"Tomorrow we'll focus on more surveillance and final preparations. Do you think you can initiate the breach on your own?" Lacroix asked.

"If you've already confirmed my insertion route," you said, already sorting through your gear.

"It's done. You'll have to stop and pick up an extra uniform before you go in, but everything else has been arranged and confirmed."

You nodded, wishing you could bring Athena along. You had a small fish torpedo, in case of emergency, but you weren't supposed to request her presence till the operation was live. You weren't sure what kind of sensors Nguyen had and whether or not they could detect a power spike from your AI. There were too many unanswered questions about Nguyen's tech capabilities...but also, Athena's.

"I'm going to shower and-" Lacroix swore and dropped his wiggling bag.

You gaped dumbly as a bundle of black feathers, still wearing her own little backpack, tumbled out of the main compartment, trilling triumphantly.

You stared, still in shock, as Isha bowled across the floor, scattering feathers. As soon as she stopped rolling, she picked herself up, and began chattering at you very rapidly, as if to tell you all about her adventures in Lacroix's luggage.

"I told you to stay on the transport!" You snapped, voice unpleasantly high. "How the hell did you even-" Isha strutted over to you, looking very pleased with herself. She latched onto your leg, happily rubbing her cheek against your calf, completely ignoring your tone. "I saw you ten minutes before we disembarked!"

"I remember that the zipper was partially undone before we left," Lacroix mused. "I thought I had just forgotten to shut it all the way after I changed clothes. She must have opened it up and crawled in while I was talking to the pilot." Lacroix shook his head, then looked back into his bag. He sighed. "Fortunately, my combat gear is still in here, but my extra civilian clothes and some of the rations are missing. You're going to have to make a few extra stops, Chanceux."

"Me? You're the one who didn't check your bag!" You scowled, as Isha chirped at you.

"But now we have an excuse to go out for dinner. Glass noodles with eel, stir fried pho, fried crab rolls, barbecued pigeon... Hanoi has some rich food culture that I think you'll appreciate."

"Oh I'll barbecue a pigeon," you muttered, glaring down at Isha. "This is a combat mission, murderbird."

She chirped again, tugging off her backpack and opening it up, revealing her armor, metal claw-tips, and her collar-camera.

You narrowed your eyes, remembering how Isha had ignored orders and gone along with Gabriel into the fight on Family Day. Your raptor wasn't just blindly following you out of separation anxiety. No, she knew you were going somewhere dangerous, and had been smart enough to bring her gear instead of her entertainment tablet. Hell, she'd managed to stay quiet for hours, something you hadn't been sure she knew how to do. Goddamn insubordinate beast. Fowl. Dinosaur. Whatever the hell she was.

Lacroix had the audacity to laugh. "Well, she came prepared. Perhaps there's room for you on this mission-"

"Are you insane? This is a combat mission! I'm not taking my pet! She can stay behind and wait for extraction."

"Are you sure we can secure her? And do you really think that she'll be any safer alone?" Lacroix asked, giving you a cool look. "If we have to make a quick escape, are you all right leaving her behind?"

You gritted your teeth. He had a point, though you didn't like it. And now you were wondering if it was a coincidence that she'd been in his pack...

"I honestly did not think to check my belongings for errant dinosaurs," Lacroix said dryly, reading your suspicious expression all too easily. "A mistake I will not make again."

Isha just chirped at you as she tried to put her armor on. She couldn't do it by herself, but she kept trying, fumbling with the fasteners, thrumming happily to herself.

"Goddamnit, Isha." This was dangerous stuff and you weren't certain you could put aside your worry for her well-being. But you couldn't just abandon her here either. There was no guarantee she'd let Feng's people pick her up or that they'd even be able to find her. You rested your face in your hands. He was right. There was nothing you could do about it now, though your feelings weren't quite caught up to your logic.

Why had you gotten a smart pet? Why hadn't you gotten something dumb, furry, and most importantly obedient?

"You don't need that yet," you said with a heavy sigh, crouching down in front of your murderbird. "I'm going to do reconnaissance, pick up dinner, and then we'll worry about getting you geared up." You examined her gear and found it sturdy, resigning yourself to the fact that you were going to have to take her along. "You're going to stay close, keep your head down, and follow my orders, got it?" You growled at her.

She just chirruped, blue eyes gleaming smugly.

"And you're going to have to keep those little hands out of sight." You tapped your wrists. "Chicken Camouflage."

Isha snorted, but folded her arms so her hands were hidden and the limbs could be mistaken for wings. She tucked her head against her chest, mouth shut. She didn't really look like a chicken - she was too big and not fluffy enough, but she looked less like a dinosaur.

"There are several elaborate poultry breeds maintained specifically for cockfighting," Lacroix said. "You can try to pass her off as one of those. Though you will attract attention if you linger anywhere too long; she's honestly far too large."
"It might be best for you to guard the base till we're ready to start the mission," you told Isha.

She gave you a skeptical look.

"Nguyen has spies everywhere," Lacroix told her. "If they come in to set an ambush, we are counting on you to escape and warn us."

Isha sat down, eyes darting between the door and the windows. She picked up her camera collar and handed it to Lacroix.

"Yes, that will be helpful," he said, fastening it on her. "I think you could help make Tarasque run much smoother. I look forward to working with you."

Isha chirruped back.

Well, that was more polite than Lacroix ever acted toward you.

Shaking your head, you put your stuff down, grabbed a small rucksack, and went out to make contact. You would buy a bamboo cage on the way back.

Clad in the yellow and red uniform of a local courier service, you waited at the cafe, sipping sweet Vietnamese coffee. A grizzled older woman with coal-black eyes and thick wrinkled skin stepped in, her uniform matching yours.

"There you are," she said, clucking her tongue at you. "Slacking off as usual."

"But I got you a coffee, Ms. Pham! Extra milk!" You answered with the pass phrase, handing her a pale cup of iced coffee.

"It's just "Pham." She looked you up and down, apparently not impressed by your bearing. "You can keep the coffee. Stop slouching in uniform," she said. "Come on, we have deliveries to make and thanks to this pit stop, we're already behind."

You followed her out to her double-parked van, sipping the milky sweet coffee and wondering if Lacroix knew her personally or if she was just another anonymous civilian on the take.

"Just keep your head down, and you'll blend," she told you as you buckled into your seat. "I don't make conversation with the security. You'll have to explain your own presence. They're always on edge, but a slow speech pattern and a little charm should grease the wheels. Duc normally chats with them. He's well-liked, if not too bright. You just tell them that you got pulled in because he had a family emergency. His mother is in the hospital. Heart problems."

"Got it," you said, having a sneaking feeling that this woman had worked with Lacroix before.

She gave you a curt nod, then turned on the radio, Johnny Cash blaring through the speakers.

You took the hint, not trying to make any further conversation. Instead, you observed the route she took, the van lurching through congested city traffic. It might have been faster to ride a bike, because it took forever to make it that short distance between the coffee shop and Nguyen's compound.

The reinforced concrete and metal barrier that surrounded the perimeter was thicker than you expected. The van slowed down at the guardhouse gate, and you tucked your hat over your eyes, slouching in the seat as Pham leaned over and flashed her ID.

The guards, with visible large rifles and green uniforms - moonlighting local police officers - gave her a bored nod and waved you through. It was good to know they were still on the outer perimeter of the facility. One of your mission goals was to avoid involving the local LEOs entirely.

Pham didn't even look at you, she just slowly drove along the compound roads while you stared out the window. Nguyen's cyborg research facility was a hexagonal campus, office buildings and factories in the south by the main entrance, a power station and control facility in the center, and the labs and barracks on the north side. Nguyen had a residence within the northwestern lab.

The facility was surprisingly pretty. There was quite a bit of greenery, a fish pond and ornamental trees planted by the offices. The architecture wasn't as strongly French as you expected. The buildings were only four or five stories tall and had a distinctly east Asian look with flared gables and elaborate cornices. The roof tiles were a soothing shade of green, the buildings painted white and pale yellow with narrow windows.

You'd seen smuggled photos and aerial shots, but it was different to be here on the ground. It was smaller than you expected, taking less than five minutes to drive through at low speeds. But you weren't fooled. There were multiple subterranean levels and you weren't a fan of prolonged close quarter combat with cyborgs.

Pham pulled up to the loading dock for the main barracks, and stopped the vehicle. She jerked her head sideways and climbed out of the van. You followed, letting her open up the rear doors.

You stared at the crates of peppers, cabbages, dragonfruit, and mangos. Flicking your left index finger, you spritzed the top crate of fruit with the contaminant.

Pham coughed and glared at you, obviously catching on to what you were doing. Giving you a very dirty look, she set up a pallet jack and pointed at the boxes. It looked like you would be doing the unloading. Shrugging, you climbed up into the van and grunted as you passed the crates down.

"Hey, who's this? She's not on the list," a large blonde man with a metal hand stopped in front of the pallet jack, his attention on Pham. He spoke English.

Pham growled something in Vietnamese and threw her hands up in frustration.

"Oh hey, sorry, Pham's English isn't great," you lied, peeking out of the back of the van, a sheepish smile on your face.

The cyborg wore a navy uniform, his hair cropped close to his skull. You'd killed others like him with minimal conversation. It was strange to be face to face, playing friendly and smiling at him like you were some kind of hapless civilian.

"This is a restricted access facility," he snapped at you. "Get down here, now."
You flashed your courier ID as you slowly climbed out of the van, your left hand jammed in your pocket. "Shit, they were supposed to get me cleared today." You blew out a frustrated breath. "This is my day off. I got pulled in because Duc had to rush him mom to the hospital. She's got a heart condition. Luckily it was after my midterm so-" You took on a student's frazzled demeanor, trying to look cheerful, harmless, and tired.

The guard's stance relaxed slightly. "Oh thank god, they sent someone who speaks English. This old bat is a fucking nightmare. She spits at people and I only have high school French," he scowled. "Duc always does the talking." He squinted at you. "But you aren't supposed to be here without the proper clearances."

"...I can leave immediately or get back in the truck," you offered. "But then someone's going to have to help Pham unload. Otherwise this could take awhile." You gave a rueful smile.

The cyborg guard stared at the stacked crates of produce, then Pham's surly, unimpressed face, and then had to be picturing how long it would take the older woman to reluctantly do the job on her own. He exhaled slowly. "Yeah, all right. Just this once. The next time I see you, you better have the proper passes, OK?"

"I'll get the central office to process it as soon as I get back to the hub," you said, tone bright and earnest.

"Yeah, well, don't try anything. I'll be watching you."

"No problem," you said, climbing back into the truck, staying cheerful and unthreatening. "I'll stick to unloading. Not trying to get anyone in trouble."

The cyborg gave you a curt nod and moved off the side to "supervise." But he kept his distance, possibly because of Pham's guttural mutterings.

With your back turned, you continued discretely contaminating each batch before you lifted the box onto the pallet jack. Midway through, you tucked two tennis ball-sized spherical drones into separate crates. They were low-output models, programmed to run off the ambient backscatter of the facility, and find a hiding spot. Winston had taken inspiration from the security workarounds in On Sing's devices. Signals nearly untraceable, the drones were accessible to Athena, so when the time was right, you would have eyes in the facility. You weren't entirely sure they would work, but that obviously wasn't your only reason for being here.

Pham made impatient noises, giving both you and the cyborg venomous glares. You didn't mind. Even if she wasn't "pretending" to be the difficult one, her attitude had gotten you an in with security. It took longer than you expected to unload, and you slipped on work gloves as the guard approached.

"You almost done- Oh good, last one," he muttered, watching you set the box onto the jack.

"I'll sit in the van," you said, climbing out and shutting the doors. "Pham can take the shipment in."

He nodded, and you got back into the front passenger seat, watching carefully in the mirrors as Pham guided the pallet jack into the kitchen, pushed a button, and the machine automatically unloaded the crates. The entire process could have been automated, but Nguyen only allowed in small delivery vehicles. No large trucks that could act as a Trojan horse.
Pham loaded the pallet jack and then climbed back into the van. She didn't bother buckling in, she just slowly drove back to the southern entrance and headed back toward the main roads.

"Am I going to have to burn this van?" She scowled as she looked at you.

"Bleach should do the trick," you said. "Don't...eat anything out of the back for awhile." Because you had sprayed a large amount of the modified clostridium difficile bacteria solution all over the fresh produce delivery. Better known as c-diff, it caused terrible abdominal cramps and violent diarrhea. Provided by Feng, this strain would incubate much faster than the natural version, but would also burn itself out sooner. And while c-diff infections could kill anyone who had a weakened immune system and didn't get treatment, this was developed specifically to incapacitate Nguyen's staff. Feng couldn't guarantee that it wouldn't have casualties, but the goal was to keep them away from work and to weaken the cyborgs, not kill them.

"Who's going to pay to have this-"

"Well, I have some money-" You started to reach into your pocket, but Pham shook her head.

"I don't want anything that you've touched," she said bluntly. "And if I get sick-"

"Just wash your hands really well, with bleach and maybe a sonic cleanser," you said. "And if you start to have diarrhea, go directly to the hospital. It'll save you a lot of pain...and laundry."

Looking positively disgusted, Pham glowered at the road.

You sat back in your seat, suddenly energized. Taking a deep breath, you focused on the route back, and on what you would have for dinner, after you washed your hands thoroughly. Phase One of the plan was complete.

Hanzo was no stranger to combat, to ambush strikes, to the personal side of killing and conquest. There was a rhythm to it, a rise and fall in action. Tomorrow's mission would be challenging, but the planning had been well executed. Still, he could not shake the feeling that all was not well. Something was off balance, a gap in the picture, a sour note in the melody, but he could not pinpoint it.

You, Commander Reyes, Lacroix, and even that unruly cowboy had formulated a respectable plan. He and Genji had provided suggestions to maintain stealth and better apply force, and he had been satisfied by the alterations Reyes had made to the plan.

Commander Reyes had an eye for tactics and listened to his subordinates. He had surrounded himself with capable people who maintained similar goals. Hanzo had to wonder how things would have differed if once upon a time he had possessed better advisers and the wisdom to accept such corrections. Perhaps that would have made a difference, but the fault was still his own. Advisers or not, he had made a terrible choice, and he and his brother, now had to live with it.

The victim of that choice sat beside him, smirking as Agent Mihret threw a handful of playing cards into the air. The hacker snarled some choice words in Hebrew and Genji actually laughed.

"What was that phrase you are so fond of?" Genji asked, lightly. "Oh yes, "get good."
"Oh go plug your dick into a light socket," Mihret snapped.

Genji just laughed harder, the sound achingly familiar and yet a distant memory. Genji didn't laugh like that with him. Not any more.

Hanzo squinted at both men. He was never entirely sure how to handle Mihret's...crass behavior. He had tried stern expressions of formal disapproval, but Mihret didn't care. He tried explaining the parameters of decent behavior, but Mihret pushed back, letting him know exactly what he thought of Hanzo's ideas on "propriety." It wasn't a battle he was prepared to fight. The hacker didn't listen to anyone except you and Lacroix, and even then...

"Are you going to apologize to Feng?" Genji asked, switching to Japanese.

Hanzo gave him a grim look. His little brother had no right to question him on his personal affairs. That wasn't his place or his concern and- Hanzo exhaled slowly. It was easy to forget that things had changed. He was no longer the honorable elder brother. He was no longer the guardian of a young Sparrow, duty-bound to teach his sibling how to be a man. He was no longer the heir of the Shimada, leading his family to greater power and prosperity. He was...just a disappointment. Sometimes it was hard to remember that it was his own stubbornness that had poisoned things. Genji was infuriating, he always had been. But Hanzo's job had never been to master Genji. Hanzo's job was to master himself, and on that dark night of blood and fratricide...he had failed. And if he continued with that same set of behaviors, he would squander this miraculous second chance.

That was unacceptable.

"Of course, I will," Hanzo said, his response coming a little too late. He grasped for lighter words that would not be tainted with bitterness. "I do not know what kind of "grand gesture" should accompany it. I don't suppose she will want me to offer up a finger or a ritual suicide, but those are the classics and there is beauty in simplicity..."

Genji snorted, eyes widening. "A joke? From you? Are you feeling all right?"

"Lucky claims that humor is an effective way to...interact with people. To promote good feelings and reduce tension," Hanzo said hesitantly. "I am starting to think she might be right."

Genji stared at him, a little incredulous.

Hanzo kept his expression serene, a smug feeling of satisfaction starting to pool in his belly. He had surprised his brother.

"From one thing, know ten thousand things," Genji muttered. "Next you'll be exchanging meditation tips with Zenyatta."

Hanzo frowned, reminded once more that something wasn't quite right. It was like grasping at fog, but he knew that something had been missed. He huffed in frustration. There was nothing he could do about it now. Hanzo trusted his instincts, though a bad feeling was no reason to panic. The plan was solid. The people were reliable. And when they encountered unexpected obstacles, they would just have to adapt. It was a lesson he was learning as he progressed. But he would keep pushing forward. He would be prepared. He would take care of Agent Mihret and his brother. This time, he would not fail.
"There is no need for you to go in person."

Feng sighed, having already had this discussion at least a dozen times. Maybe not with her Auntie, but Auntie had been there, biding her time, eavesdropping, refining her own counterarguments. She knew not to expect anything less from the old Dragonhead. That was Auntie. She was overbearing, overprotective, and overpowered, yet still, somehow not as frightening as Mother.

Feng shook her head, trying to bury her lingering trauma. "I'm going. Bayan's going. And you're coming too. But Li, Mr. Li, and that fuckwad Meng can stay behind."

"There is no need to flaunt our involvement," Zheng said, her voice cool and reasonable as her hologram glided across the floor, gracefully mimicking pacing. Even in un-life, Auntie had her vanity. Feng was both frustrated by the pageantry and comforted by the illusion that her aunt still had human tics. "We should maintain plausible deniability. And it will be dangerous. Nguyen acquired the-"

"Obviously," Feng said, her smile wry. "That's why they'll need us on hand. Just in case."

"Blackwatch won't give up something that valuable-"

"All that is up for negotiation. We made a tech sharing deal for this mission. That's tech, after a fashion. And we won't know unless we ask."

"Do you think simply asking is going to work?" Zheng asked, incredulous, like she couldn't quite believe how naive her descendant remained.

Feng enjoyed that reaction more than she could admit. "I don't know, have you ever tried it?" Feng flopped over on the couch, her gaze falling on the katana set in its display stand, the green silk soothing to the eyes. It really was a work of art. Great weight, beautiful forging, sharp as a honed razor... And Feng wasn't even a sword person. "Seriously, you've never just straight up asked, "hey, can I have that? Because I really like it. I'll take good care of it. I promise." You know, instead of threatening, demanding, or flat out killing people."

"Has that ever worked for you?" Zheng asked, her expression skeptical.

"Yes, but not on Mother," Feng admitted. "I was so scared she'd drown that puppy Li brought home in middle school." Feng paused, shuddering. "But yes, yes it has. Really well even. This one time when a guy with a gun showed up at the diner -"

"Your police work stories are absolutely appalling. You worked with savages and lunatics."

Feng shrugged, not disagreeing. "Great preparation for handling the family."

Zheng's image flickered.

Feng grinned, realizing she'd managed to irritate her near-omniscient ancestor. "And even if they don't give it to us, so what? We don't need it. We have you. And I am very curious about the other tech Nguyen has squirreled away. Despite her lack of ergonomic prosthetics and clumsy neurochemical malpractice, her products always have impressive power sources and circuitry. We could learn a few things."

"I concede that Nguyen's labs are impressive and her engineering cutting edge, but your presence is not required for any of that. You are sending medics and offering emergency evacuation should it be necessary. There is no need to put yourself at risk. Morrison will not be there."

Feng smiled. "And?"

"There is no obligation."

"Isn't there?" Feng asked innocently. She had once made a teacher cry by answering him in nothing but very pointed questions. That tactic wasn't as effective on her aunt, but it still communicated her intent quite well.

"You are not seriously considering Hanzo Shimada's proposal?" Zheng crossed her arms.

Feng shrugged sheepishly. "Genji, Lucky, and that sexy Russian will be there too."

Zheng scowled. "Stop getting involved with Russians. Also, he's Ukrainian and-"

Feng just shrugged again. "Don't care. I'm going. You'll be with me. What can stand against us?"

"I guess that depends what Nguyen brought back from Siberia," Zheng said archly.

There was a knock at the door.

Feng glanced at Zheng's placeholder, waiting for her to reveal who was there.

"It's Hettie," Zheng said, with a sigh.

If Hettie herself had come, it was important. That woman never wasted time. Feng nodded, and the door opened.

Dressed in a violet skirt suit that would have been suitable for tea with the Queen - any of them - Hettie LaRue strode into the office, her expression severe.

Feng sat up, elbows resting on her knees as she met Hettie's gaze. "This doesn't look good. Can I offer you some tea? Cookies? Weapons-grade hard light projectors?"

"No, thank you, I already ate and am well accustomed to my current pistol. I am here to inform you that we have received a...generous offer from the Hanamura branch of the Shimada clan," the older woman said plainly.

Feng sighed, already knowing where this was going. "How did they find out?"

"People...gossip. It's what your family does, especially when it comes to your marital status."

Feng rolled her eyes. It wasn't Hettie's fault that her family was...ridiculous, but Hettie was often the bearer of bad news. Probably because most everyone was scared of her. Feng liked her. Sure, she'd "supported" Fa Hai during the interregnum, but Hettie's true loyalty had always been to Aunt Zheng, which made her timing all the more suspect.

"All right, give me the highlights," Feng said. "And tell me if any of the gifts are really cool-"

"Their offerings are comparable to all the others. However, there's a teacup Shiba Inu puppy with Pachimari bandana in pink hand-woven basket, for you," Hettie said, allowing herself a wry smile. "It is ridiculously adorable."

"Goddamn," Feng said. She had been wanting a puppy, or a kitten, or a cheetah, not that she had time to take care of any of them. "They're playing hardball." She frowned. "What else?"

"They've offered up an interesting candidate, an attractive cousin, close to you in age, with a potential claim to the clan. He lacks the...true characteristics of the Shimada heirs, but he would be an acceptable clan leader nonetheless."

"...Yawn," Feng said, because that pretty boy was undoubtedly expendable and probably useless. "What's the catch?"

"Repudiate the traitor. Repudiate the traitor's impostor brother. Along with a warning to avoid entanglement in Shimada affairs, because you are still an outsider. They were oddly political when they said that, seeming to imply that you could lobby for amnesty for your friends, should you marry into their clan."

Feng narrowed her eyes. "That's an insult."

"It wasn't meant as such," Hettie said, giving Zheng a pained look. "It's a reminder that we generally don't overtly become involved in each other's succession wars."

"Yeah, yeah," Feng sighed. "If I wanted a lecture on tradition, I'd watch Fiddler on a Roof. Oh, have you seen the new omnic version? It's pretty good. Sometimes even Auntie sings along."

Zheng made a rude noise and Feng wasn't sure how she did it without squishy mucus membranes, but that was impressive. However, her show of derision did nothing to change the fact that Feng was telling the truth.

Hettie's expression did not change. "They sent over fresh intelligence on Vishkar's legal and illegal maneuvers, ones relating to us." She crossed her arms. "We're working to verify the data, but so far it seems accurate and quite useful. I've assigned several...troubleshooters to untangle some of these threads. I think the information will prove very useful in the near future."

Feng stared very hard at the wall, humor fading in the face of such a bald ultimatum. What was that saying about the carrot and the stick? Well, that was quite the giant carrot stick they were metaphorically beating her over the head with. She shuddered, picturing being bludgeoned by a baseball bat painted to look like a carrot, or worse, choking down giant pieces of raw dry carrot, the texture woody, the chewing going on forever....

"I don't like that look on your face," Zheng said. "What are you thinking?"

Feng smiled darkly, because they didn't have time for that ramble. "They're muddying the water."

"There are many layers to this gambit," Zheng agreed. "And no matter how you feel, you have to wonder what they're after."

"And you must not make a decision in haste or give the appearances of doing so," Hettie said. "The Shimada have sent a threat with their offer, a knife with their rose."

"Oh boy," Feng said dryly. "How romantic."

"There weren't literally any knives," Hettie amended, glancing at the katana set. "I suppose
"You must deduct points for style."

"They sent me a puppy, but no weapons?"

"Critical intelligence on our enemies, a puppy, some jewelry, a very ancient, very ugly ivory carving, dried seafood, lacquered fans, and heirloom dolls."

"Huh," Feng said. They'd gone for traditional Japanese betrothal gifts. That was awfully presumptuous. Hanzo, at least, hadn't assumed that much; his presents were simply a "thank you for taking the time to review my proposal, here are some material benefits I can provide with ease and if they please you, there's more where those came from." The other Shimada branch had overstepped and underwhelmed. What a faux pas. Was it an intentional slight angled to spur her into rash action or was it just the sloppiness of a half-baked plan? It didn't matter: the insulting aspect of this could be leaked to the rest of the family and that would generate enough outrage to torpedo the plan.

"Are you actually listening to me?" Hettie and Auntie asked that question so often, Feng found it hilarious to act like she hadn't. She also found it convenient to cover all the times she wasn't actively paying attention, like now.

"Oh, yeah, definitely," Feng laughed. "But can you repeat that one more time?"

Hettie gave her a sharp look, lips pressed firmly together. To her credit, Hettie was much better at controlling her exasperation than Auntie. "They said you don't have to marry into the clan. You don't have to form an alliance. But if we continue to support Hanzo Shimada, the truce negotiated by the ignominious Fong Chun will no longer hold, and they will declare formal hostilities once more."

Feng's good humor evaporated. Because personal feelings aside, she was the goddamn Dragonhead of On Sing. It might have been a hereditary title, but she'd fought scores of family members for it, and she'd won. How fucking dare they? Did that family of unscrupulous assassins and merchants presume to tell her what she could and could not do? Did they somehow think that they were better than her family of unscrupulous assassins and merchants? Because honestly, they both sucked and to imply otherwise was both rude and delusional.

"Don't do anything rash," Zheng said, recognizing that look on her face. "This requires finesse. You are dismissed, Hettie. Feng and I will discuss how to proceed."

Hettie nodded at both of them and promptly exited. The older woman was wise enough to know not to be on hand for this argument, but clever enough to come back in about an hour with snacks, to moderate policy choices once everyone had cooled down.

Feng glared at the nearest camera lens, not bothering to pretend like the illusion was one looking at her.

"This is a priority," Zheng said. "And Hettie wants to know what you want done with the puppy?"

Feng crossed her arms. "...Send it to Li. Maybe he could marry "Cousin Useless Prettyboy" and join the Shimada clan instead."

Zheng sighed. "Perhaps you could solve this problem before running off to Vietnam?"

Feng was no fool and nowhere near as shortsighted as she acted. She recognized a play for time when she saw one. From both her family and her rivals. Oh, what even was the difference any more? It was a battle on all fronts, the Shimada demanding compliance, her family wanting dominance, and Overwatch stupidly requiring that she stick to decent behavior when it came to solving these problems. Feng didn't like fighting everyone, but she no illusions about her position.
The moment she stopped walking this tightrope, was the moment she fell. And that was worse than the headache all the politics caused, because at least this way, she could protect her people.
Groaning, Feng knew she was going to have to spend some time navigating this minefield.

Hopefully, it wouldn't interfere with her part in Operation Tarasque.

"You haven't eaten yet, have you?" Gabriel asked.

"One ration bar, two...four hours ago," Jack said cursing his sense of time and arithmetic.

There'd been an "emergency" budget meeting on what to do if the newly proposed UN "responsible spending" bill passed: it would cut defensive spending by a third and there'd been a lengthy debate about budget priorities. Construction of the new base on the Rock of Gibraltar had started, and its future was already in question. Then he'd had to field a call from an irate Finnish politician about the property damage caused by an Overwatch agent several months ago; he was pretty sure it was a Blackwatch agent, but it didn't matter, the politician just wanted to air his grievances and make a production of the chastisement. Jack was also on call for half a dozen ops across eastern Europe and central Asia.

Then a mission in Mexico City, to halt a major Los Muertos arms deal, had gone very badly - Reinhart was handling the PR, Ana had stepped in to supervise the operational cleanup. And of course, Petras had been demanding all kinds of updates, hounding him hourly on a variety of topics, just to keep him on his toes.

"...We're at HQ. There's plenty of food nearby. Why the hell would you willingly eat one of those?" Gabriel snorted.

"I was busy. It was around," Jack said, though he had not had much of an appetite. It got like that when he was working. And his spirits had been...low. He'd expected that sinking feeling to fade a few hours after you'd left, but it had lingered, and he wasn't sure if he was just worried about you or if it was something altogether different. Jack was used to being in the fields for weeks at a time. He was used to you being gone on missions. It had never felt like this before. "I swear it didn't used to be this hard," Jack muttered, hands jammed in his pockets, chest too tight.

"Well, I know I look damn good in this armor," Gabriel laughed, sitting down on his couch while he secured his metal boots. "It's OK, Jack. You can't help your body's reactions." He winked.

"So I don't look good?" Gabriel teased, leaning over to kiss Jack's cheek. "That's harsh, *amor."

"You'd look incredible in a paper bag, Gabe. But we both know I'm talking about work."

Gabriel paused. "Petras?"

"Yes and politicking in general," Jack said. "It's damn fortunate I have Athena to help me keep tabs on...everything. I had to solve seven minor international incidents in the last forty eight hours through talking, and I didn't even get to shoot anything."

Gabriel gave him a wry smile. "That is hard." He looked up at the ceiling briefly. "Maybe you need to hire another secretary."

Jack snorted. "Athena is doing a great job and for less pay. Unless you're offering up Lucky."

Gabriel didn't smile. "You trust that thing too much, Jack."

"...Athena's trustworthy," Jack said, pinching the bridge of his nose as he felt that old argument start up again.

"That's what they said about-"

"I know, Gabe. I was there too." Jack exhaled. He had not forgotten the massacres, the wholesale destruction brought about by the Omnic Crisis. But neither had he forgotten the other division of omnics, who by programming, whim, or something more, had defended or hidden human survivors. Jack had a keen grasp of battlefield probabilities, but he never let himself reduce everything to a numbers game. There'd been hostile omnics everywhere, but there'd been plenty of unscrupulous humans too, doing terrible things and justifying their crimes as "necessary for survival." It became a mantra, too many people convincing themselves they'd done nothing wrong because their actions were "defensive." Omnics, at least, didn't seem to feel the need to lie to themselves about their deeds.

Gabriel sat there, lips pressed tightly together, sealing in words that Jack knew he didn't want to hear.

"I didn't trust her initially," Jack said quickly. "But after everything we've been through, she's earned it. Hell, I thought you liked her-"

"I do," Gabriel said, voice even, and the admission surprised Jack. "She's got a way about her, unlike any of the ones I've met before. Think it's because she's spent so much time with my agents. But that doesn't mean I've forgotten what she is, Jack. And the fact she's so good getting us to like her? So adept at mimicking human behaviors? Well, that's something that bothers me, too."

Jack groaned, because how did you argue with that kind of paranoia? Gabriel had set impossible standards and then just looked on, with grim satisfaction, when no one could meet them.

"But all that's background noise for now," Gabriel continued. "She hasn't crossed any hard lines yet. You rely on her. And more importantly, you and Lucky trust her. We are sorely in need of trustworthy allies. We need her to keep things running smoothly. I get that she's necessary. But I don't have to like it."

Jack blinked, a little surprised by how damn reasonable Gabriel had been about his misgivings. They'd had many variants of this argument, sometimes ending abruptly, the conversation awkwardly being shifted to other topics, more often ending with someone storming out and taking a few days to cool down.

That had...improved with your presence. You didn't argue with Gabriel about AI principles. You were just openly fond of Athena and she was just as fond of you, and that seemed to sway him more than any intellectual arguments about the trustworthiness of inorganic life.

Jack nodded. "I appreciate you looking out for us. I guess one of us has to be assessing all possible threats. And I know it can't be me. I'm too busy nodding thoughtfully at whatever is coming out of a bureaucrat's mouth, wishing to be anywhere but there... "

Gabriel laughed. "So is it just the usual weight of the world that's got you down? You look especially tired. Bags under your eyes and everything. I'm telling you, you need to work on that skin care regimen." He nuzzled Jack's shoulder.

Jack smacked Gabriel's arm. "Dick."

"You love it," Gabriel said with exaggerated cheer.

"Yeah," Jack nodded. "You're right." He patted Gabriel's cheek. "It's not just the usual bullshit. I don't like staying back while you and Lucky go out, knowing that you're walking into a trap. Not knowing when or if." Jack stopped himself, pinching the bridge of his nose. "Sorry. That's not what you need to hear before a combat run. I know better than to say that kind of shit. I'm sorry."

Gabriel gave a half smile, one arm curling around Jack's shoulders and Jack leaned into him. "Miss her already, huh?"

"Yeah," Jack nodded. "And Isha too. Dinner isn't the same without her discretely poking me for scraps." He squeezed Gabriel's hand. "It's silly, I know."

"It's not. I miss her too," Gabriel murmured, his tone gentle. "Though Lucky doesn't usually poke me for scraps. She just takes entire portions off my plate without asking."

Jack laughed, resting his head on Gabriel's shoulder. "You're an ass."

"I miss Isha," Gabriel continued, his eyes gleaming wickedly. "Unlike the two of you, she's polite about asking me to share my food."

Jack hung his head, appreciating his lover's attempts to distract him; Gabriel had such a wicked sense of humor, and with you around, he'd gotten to see it more often. "Lacroix reported in that Isha snuck into his bag and stowed away. Feng confirmed that Isha never arrived. I had to repeatedly reassure her that she didn't lose our murderbird." A panicked Feng talked at three times the speed of a normal human, and had said something weird about puppies as wedding gifts. Jack chalked it up to stress, and maybe a bout of mania. Another part of him wondered if puppies were an acceptable gift, because that sounded better than a crystal candy dish or a toaster. Though maybe he could finally get that toaster story out of you...

Gabriel sighed. "I'm not surprised. I bet Lucky's thrilled. She is hilariously overprotective."

Jack remembered cradling a surprisingly light bundle of feathers and teeth, telling her to look after you. An absurd amount of guilt clumped together in his chest. If he hadn't said that, would she still have snuck off onto a very dangerous mission? Should he be burdening Gabriel with these concerns right before a combat run?

"Stop fretting," Gabriel said, with an aggravated eyeroll.

Jack smiled weakly, because Gabriel could always read him like a book, probably a comic book with more sound effect bubbles than dialogue.

"That damn raptor likes being in the middle of things. I don't know if you've had a chance to see her during her in combat training, but she's quick," Gabriel said. "And she can take care of herself. She's not a puppy or a chicken, Jack. She's an accomplished thief. She can navigate computer screens. She plucks out eyeballs."

"...Yeah," Jack shook his head, a little comforted by that graphic description. "But she's still our little death chicken. All cuddly and cute."

Gabriel snorted. "You're ridiculous, farm boy."

"I know," Jack said. "Sorry, I'm trying not to throw you off."

"Shut up," Gabriel murmured, kissing him. "We all know it's risky. We all know there are good reasons to be worried. And there's nothing wrong with you being anxious, Jack. I know you have to keep it behind closed doors, but you don't have to hide it from me or her."

Swallowing, Jack managed a lopsided smile. "I just can't shake the feeling that something's off. It's just nerves, I know. Maybe I'm going soft."

Gabriel chuckled, squeezing his thigh. Jack felt his cock twitch, and inhaled sharply as the other man nipped his ear.

"No, amor, nothing soft here."

"Gabe-"

"Just got geared up, Jack. As much as I'd like to bend you over the couch, I have to go soon."

"Tease," Jack muttered, without any heat. "Seriously, Gabe. I hate sending you out there, while I stay here where it's safe. Hate standing by doing nothing. I should be there with you both."

Gabriel nodded. "Yeah. I get that."

"But the Strike Commander can't go on wetworks runs. Can't follow his whims. Can't break ranks for the sake of discipline and morale," Jack said, jaw tight. There were more rules, namely "can't be romantically involved with a subordinate and the head of Blackwatch," and more importantly "can't kill Director Petras for being an utter piece of human garbage." The job restriction were really starting to grate on him.

"I suppose you could put on that mask and join us."

Jack perked up.

"-But Ana would murder us both when you got back and then we couldn't take any nice Shanghai vacations," Gabriel sighed.

"I know. I'm supposed to be in Geneva to deal with some...political issues," Jack said. "Yeah, Ana wouldn't be too happy if I ditched that to come with you." He was so very tempted to do it anyway. "It didn't used to be this difficult."

"We've had a lot of close calls lately," Gabriel said, kissing Jack's neck. "And losing people, especially ones we love, reminds us what's really important."

Jack nodded, Mateo Rodriguez's shroud-covered body still fresh in his mind. "Sorry, Gabe. You shouldn't have to comfort me. You're the one-"

Gabriel tapped a finger against Jack's lips. "Out there, it's different. I know that all too well. But you know that you never have to pretend with me. I'd say the same thing is true about Lucky."
She doesn't need the illusion of the constantly unflappable Strike Commander either. In fact, I think she kind of dislikes that guy. He's a prick."

Jack snorted. "You're one to talk."

"He is a prick, but a sexy sexy prick," Gabriel teased. "I like reminding him who's really in charge." Gabriel swooped in, taking another kiss, those coffee dark eyes warm and soft.

Jack chuckled, kissing Gabriel's nose. "Oh, so you want the Strike Commander gig back?"

"Fuck no," Gabriel laughed. "I've seen how much paperwork you get. Besides, you look better in blue anyway."

"I look pretty good in black and red too," Jack said, the familiar banter easing his heart. "And you can just delegate the paperwork. Lucky is pretty good at it."

"Get your own assistant. I saw her first." Gabriel nipped the back of his neck and Jack yelped.

"Hey!"

"I don't mind sharing lovers, amor, but a reliable personal assistant is another matter entirely. I need her to do my work, not yours."

Jack rolled his eyes. Gabe hated paperwork as much as he did, so the attitude didn't surprise him. "Maybe I'll ask Ana."

There was a long pause, Jack looking into Gabriel's warm dark eyes, fingers twined with his, and then both men doubled over with laughter.

"She'll destroy you," Gabriel chuckled. "As your black ops adviser I would strongly recommend against antagonizing her. It will be your closed casket funeral or mysterious disappearance."

"She's gotten better," Jack said. "More velvet glove on her iron gauntlet." Ana had always been a tough love kind of comrade, sometimes brusquer than she needed to be, as her harshness had the potential to be truly devastating. She had a different sort of charisma than Jack, and over the past several years, she'd grown more skillful at wielding it. "She'll help if I ask her to," Jack said. "Mostly out of pity, but I'll take what I can get."

"Ana would probably help you, since it's you," Gabriel agreed. "But we all know that's a waste of her talents."

"She's already supervising the Middle Eastern and North African operations, and handling some of the PR stuff requires more...finesse," Jack said, because Reinhardt wasn't suited for every public speaking situation. "I hate to add to her workload. I mean, what kind of leader am I if-"

Gabriel squeezed Jack's hand just a little too hard. "Stop that. I know we don't agree on everything, and that I can be very critical, but you do good work, Jack. Always have. Now's not the time to start doubting yourself."

Jack sat there, leaning against Gabriel's warmth. His lover's heartbeat was a soothing sound, one he never took for granted. Jack may have been the one to gave rousing speeches that rallied the masses, but Gabriel was the eloquent one, always imbuing his words with layers of meaning that could comfort a soul or devastate it. "Thanks. That means a lot, especially since I'm feeling a little shaky right now.

"It was never easy sending you or any of the others out when I had to stay behind..." Gabriel shook his head. "But it's more than a job, it's a duty. We signed up for it, though maybe we didn't really know what we were getting into. We took the damage, so others didn't have to. And every time someone didn't make it back..." Gabriel shook his head. "Fault and responsibility, Jack. As long as we do this, we'll always be having that fight with ourselves and trying to balance those scales."

Gabriel rose and straddled Jack's lap, his fingers kneading Jack's shoulders.

"I love you," Jack murmured, staring into Gabriel's face, fingers tracing the scars on his cheeks. "Take care of yourself and come back home to me, all right?"

"Te amo también," Gabriel leaned over and kissed him hard, beard brushing against his skin. "You take care of the politics. I'll take care of the problematic people. Lucky'll do something questionable, but effective. And we'll all be back together in no time."

Chapter End Notes

So many revisions to do. I don't want to rush the ending. Need it to be polished.

Wrist are getting better. Too bad I have a dragon obsession.

Happy birthday Ugandan Knuckles Anon! You are the worst and the dankest of memelords.

I have international family visiting this week. Unfortunately that means I have to deal with local family, and I swear to you it's like an Abbot & Costello skit. I had to explain the same thing five times to two different people in the same phone call because they don't listen. I like these visiting family members, but after a week of dealing with my local family, I'm no longer looking forward to this visit. (They're going to want to pretend like we all like each other and are super close, and we don't. And we're not.) Oh well, I have seen my favorite Aunt in probably at least seven years, maybe ten? I don't remember. She's the one who took me places in Japan and gave me spending money (because my parents didn't.) So when her son came over 8 years ago, I took him shooting, riding, and to the drag shows (and bought him a bunch of books, some of them porn), because that's how you show your gratitude.

The cat is aggressively nesting in my lap while I type, and if I don't pay attention to him, he attacks my pens and drink. Or he starts typing on my keyboard. Or he gets on the desk and blocks the screen. There is no winning.
Chapter 118

Chapter Summary

Blackwatch isn't bad at teamwork.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

"Ziv and the Shimadas are already in place," Lacroix said, lighting up a cigarette as he looked up from his heavily encrypted tablet. "Gabriel's team left Siem Reap an hour ago. We should get moving soon."

You sat cross-legged on the floor, finishing off your pan-fried rice noodles and another cup of that sweet Vietnamese coffee. You and Isha were loading up on carbs before tonight's run. Lacroix had barely touched his dinner. Over time, you'd picked up that he didn't like to eat before missions, but he would be politely ravenous afterward. You understood - sometimes adrenaline made you sick to your stomach. No one wanted to put on body armor and feel queasy.

But Lacroix would not be able to relax until the mission was well underway. Every bit of progress, each problem solved, reassured him that he had a handle on the situation, that his plans were falling into place. Underneath his poise and clever quips, Lacroix was as much of a control freak as anyone else in the top echelons of military organization. You understood.

Isha sniffed, gave Lacroix and his cigarette a dirty look, and carried her plate farther away. You laughed as she hurriedly ate her rice vermicelli and grilled pork before the smoke could further contaminate it.

Several of Nguyen's civilian workers had left the compound early today, felled by a bouts of violent diarrhea. From what Lacroix could gather from his sources, it had affected several of the daytime security personnel as well, though how severely, he wasn't sure. At the very least, you hoped to thin their ranks for the evening.

The city was comfortably cool, but humid, feeling more like Swiss spring than winter. You slipped on your armor over your stealth suit, checked your carbine, and adjusted your collar. Your prosthetic attachments were all offensive: blade, EMP, and sedative. You carried your wakizashi and your carbine on your back, your tanto and Vo's carefully-packed bombs on your belt. Then you helped Isha secure her vest. It was lightweight, the same construct as your armor, and fitted to her form. She held still while you attached the camera collar and the metal tips to her front claws and her sickle claw, her blue eyes practically glowing in delight.

"This is a stealth mission," you reminded her. "We have to be quiet."

She rested her both of hands on top of her snout, giving you an amused look. Yeah, you knew she understood how to be sneaky, especially after that stowaway stunt she pulled, but it didn't hurt to remind her.

Lacroix wore a stealth suit as well, and sleek black combat armor, lightweight like your own. He carried a pistol on his belt and a submachine gun on his back. The "pray and spray" method didn't seem to fit his style, but you'd never seen Lacroix perform in straight combat.

You checked his armor seals and he returned the favor, tightening your wakizashi strap. You put on a light jacket, and your backpack. Lacroix did the same, each of you carrying an armed fish torpedo.

"Chicken camouflage," you told Isha as you placed her in the large bamboo cage.

Quickly, she tucked her head and folded her wings.

Lacroix took a moment to look around the flat, shut off the lights, and you left as quietly as you had come. He led you down a narrow alleyway, knelt in front of a raised manhole, and pried it open. He climbed down the ladder and you followed, clutching Isha's cage tightly in one hand.

Though the temperature was mild, the air was a fetid mix of rot and worse smells. Lacroix flicked on a torch, giving you clear view of the brackish sludge flowing through the stone channels. You tried not to look too closely into the stew.

The sewers connected to an abandoned Metro tunnel via an old service tunnel, which would lead you straight under the walls and into Nguyen's compound. There would be guards stationed near the tunnels. You had to eliminate them quickly and quietly.

Lacroix found the hatch immediately, and you glanced at the surrounding rubble. It had been moved recently.

"Did you hire someone to excavate it? Or do you think we're going to have company?"

"I came here the other day while you were infiltrating the compound, to ensure the route was clear. No one else has disturbed the site." He didn't look up, carefully pulling the hatch open.

He climbed through first, shining his light. "Some of the supports are damaged. The ground looks stable and dry, but it'd be best to avoid a firefight here. Air is as clean as we can expect down here. Switching to night vision and stealth." Lacroix's voice was distant and professional, none of his usual smug humor. The flashlight abruptly shut off.

It was now pitch black. You turned on the stealth suit and slipped on the night vision visor: there wasn't much to see in the tunnel as you crawled through. It opened up into a wider tunnel with easily four meters of clearance - plenty of space to move. Still following Lacroix, you took a moment to orient yourself. You were heading south, your destination the northwestern lab building. Genji and Hanzo would be taking Ziv in from above, probably over a wall with their ninja tricks, their destination the northeastern lab. Gabriel and the fire team would be coming in from the southern entrance, making just enough noise to hold their attention.

The cool stale air and enclosed darkness rekindled old feelings, that you struggled to tamp down. You walked at a fast pace behind Lacroix, the terrain uneven, the tunnel quiet, but for the sound of your own breathing. This was nothing like Greece, grief and poison choking out rational thought. This was more like Budapest, an echo of your fears, cutting across your nerves like a cold wind. You could hear the sounds of the city in the distance. No omnics scraping at the rocks. No broken bones and shell-shocked soldiers. No ghosts from your past. You were fine.

Taking a deep breath you scanned the distance. There was a glaring blindspot up ahead. Raising your visor, you saw cool white spotlight shining on your path. Both you and Lacroix stopped.

"Checkpoint?" You blinked. "Down here?"
"Probably guarding the entrance as an escape route," Lacroix said. "Nguyen would be foolish not to station someone on the tunnels."

You had hoped she wouldn't be concerned with the tunnels, but you had expected her to be aware of their existence and to have taken some precautions. You switched from night vision to binoculars on your visor, zooming in to see turrets and a cyborg guard patrolling in front of a large metal door. The tunnel remained about the same size, without much cover. You wouldn't be able to charge them. You needed the turrets disabled and the cyborg dead before any alarm could be raised.

Silently, you reviewed your options. There would be security cameras, and if you destroyed any of the tech, engineers would notice the power failure and investigate.

You could call Athena in early to overload the power or bring down specific grids, but you would risk early detection due to Athena's large and reportedly distinct power signature. You could wait till Gabriel's fire team was ready to move, though you had planned to be in the compound first, so you could help direct them and reroute security measures. You could toss an EMP grenade, quickly take out the guards, and hope that no one investigated the downed section immediately. Well, you could capture one and force them to report in "all clear." But that was a big gamble. You needed to disable everything immediately, and keep the pretense going through ad-libbing. You could try another route, maybe backtrack through the sewers, but that would waste valuable time.

"There are two turrets, one guard, and a single camera," Lacroix said. "How would you prefer to tip our hand?"

"I want Athena in their network and they might shut things down if she's detected early, so I'm willing to do this the hard way," you said.

"Risky," Lacroix murmured. "We could wait for the fire team to draw security's attention."

"Riskier. They're counting on us to help disable some of the automated security. Can't do that out here. This is a manageable amount of enemy forces." You'd both discussed this scenario before, but you didn't mind a quick field review.

"All right then," Lacroix said. "Pass me an EMP grenade. You're better equipped to snipe the guard. We'll blackout the cameras, monitor their comms, and hope they are too short-handed to investigate immediately."

Clinging to the shadows, you opened the bamboo cage. "Stay back and keep quiet," you said.

Isha stretched as soon as she got out of the cage, the only sound was her wings fluttering softly and she headbutted you gently. You took a moment to pat her cheek and then crept forward.

It was a just a single reinforced metal door with a camera overhead, turrets on either side, and spotlights next to the turrets. All of it rested on a concrete platform that abruptly terminated a few meters out. The cyborg paced in front of the door, gun at his hip.

Kneeling in the dirt, you braced your carbine, lining up your sights and breathing evenly. Lacroix held your EMP grenade, his eyes forward.

"On my count," you whispered. "One." Your hand wobbled slightly as you centered on the cyborg's forehead. "Two." You hovered there, finger beginning to pull back on the trigger. Lacroix stood almost too close, arm poised to make the throw. "Three," you said, as you finished the motion, the crack of the gunshot filling the space in the sequence where "three and a half" would be.

The lights flickered, and as everything plunged into darkness, you felt Lacroix rushing past you. Night vision back on, you followed. The cyborg had dropped where he stood and you crouched over him, examining what was left of his face. It was a neat shot above the right eye, and he was quite dead.

Lacroix had already torn the wires out of one turret and was working on the second. You went up to the door, pulled the spray paint off your utility belt, and covered the camera lens. Then you went back to the dead guard, and picked up his earpiece. It crackled.

"Strickland?"

Lacroix was suddenly beside you. He took the comm. "Power cut out," he mumbled with a surprisingly convincing American accent, his voice an octave lower.

"You OK, soldier? You sound a little rough."

"Hit my head fiddlin' with the lights. Thought it'd be an easy fix," Lacroix lied smoothly, his twanging American accent weirding you out.

"Damnit, Strickland, that's not our job. You stay put. We'll get a spare tech down there when we can. All the civvies are out sick and that's a cakewalk post. Hope you ain't scared of the dark." The voice on the other end laughed and abruptly cut out.

You gave a Lacroix a surprised look, then pulled Strickland's ID badge. The scanner was down, so the electric lock was disabled. There was still a large manual deadbolt, and you examined it, got your picks off your belt, and began to work.

A few minutes later, you pulled on the door, and it popped open, slivers warm yellow light leaking into the darkened tunnel. Very carefully, you peered around the cracked door, and saw an empty metal-lined hallway. It was narrower than you expected, and you searched for cameras and traps.

"Looks clear."

Lacroix stepped into the hall.

"On my six," you said, gesturing for Isha to follow, and when you looked down, she was at your feet, claws raised, poised to advance.

"Such a clever girl," Lacroix laughed. "And Isha, you are quite impressive too."

Isha nodded solemnly, as she continuously scanned the area for threats.

Lacroix laughed to himself, and you rolled your eyes as you followed him into Nguyen's base.

"I can't climb that in under a minute," Mihret hissed. "Maybe if we had grappling hooks, rappelling gear, and safety harnesses-"
"I guess we're leaving you behind then," Genji said casually, leaning against the alley wall like a punk. Hanzo had a flash of memory - neon lights, the narrow street behind yet another seedy Roppongi night club, Genji in a loud suit with his "friends" laughing too loudly, drinking too much, passing cigarettes back and forth. Hanzo had been there to drag his bother back home. To lecture him on propriety.

It wasn't a good memory, and Hanzo shook his head. This was nothing like before. The three men huddled in the narrow gap between two tenement buildings, eyeing the compound walls.

Hanzo exhaled slowly, rubbing his brow. He needed to remain focused. Was this the hiccup in the plan? Mihret's inability to scale a wall in a timely manner? Or was it the constant bickering between Genji and Mihret? The two younger men never seemed to tire of sniping at each other. And when he made the mistake of trying to intervene, they both turned their ire on him. He could think of only one peaceful solution. "I'll carry him," he said.

"What?" Genji and Mihret asked simultaneously.

"I said, I can carry you over the wall," Hanzo repeated slowly, making sure his words were in English.

There was an awkward moment of silence. Genji blinked at him. Mihret squinted, his expression incredulous.

"Pay up," Genji said, as he turned to Mihret. "I told you he'd offer."

Mihret scowled at his brother. "I didn't lose the bet! You said he'd try to throw me over!"

Hanzo rested his face in his hand, wondering how you and Commander Reyes tolerated these two miscreants.

"No, I said he'd take care of it," Genji said, sounding amused. "I didn't specify how, I just made a few suggestions-"

Hanzo drew an arrow, tied a rope to it, and fired it into the top of the wall. The arrow lodged into the concrete, rope dangling less than two meters above the ground.

"...That would work too," Mihret said, his eyes big. "Or Genji can carry me."

"Yes, but he might drop you on purpose, and then Lucky will be very upset," Hanzo said.

"Was he...joking?" Mihret asked, elbowing Genji.

"Twice in one night, brother? Are you feeling well?" Genji asked.

Hanzo just sighed and slipped out of the alley. Not looking back, he scaled the wall, taking a moment to check how secure the arrow was. It could hold Mihret's weight, but he decided not to risk it. He could just take the rope and pull Mihret directly up. It would probably be safer that way.

Seconds later, Genji was at his side, Mihret's long sinewy arms around his brother's neck, the younger ninja giving the hacker a piggyback ride. The three men stood atop the half-meter thick wall, looking down at the grounds.

"We need to move," Genji said. "We don't have all night."
Hanzo gave him a disgruntled look. He wasn't the one goofing off.

Gabriel and Diallo sat in the back of the "stolen" delivery van. She was in full power armor, positioned closest to the doors. Two sheep-sized drones waited in the back with them. Tataryn wore the red and yellow courier uniform over his armor as he slowly drove through the checkpoint, Jesse also in the uniform, in the passenger seat.

Tataryn pulled up behind the central building, where the power station and armory were situated.

There was a rap on the window.

"You can't stop here. You need to mov-"

Tataryn's arm shot out. Metal flashed. Someone gurgled and there was a soft thud as a body hit the ground. Tataryn made no move to retrieve it.

"Sorry about the mess, boss. They're going to notice something soon. Orders?" Tataryn turned around, his smile remorseless, as he wiped his bloody knife off on the stolen uniform trousers.

Gabriel smiled back. "That was the point of this exercise. Get ready to move. I'll give the signal." He manually unlocked the drones, and they powered up immediately, probably lighting up all of Nguyen's cyber security protocols. "It's time," he said to Athena.

Jesse drew his revolvers. Tataryn slipped out of the van, an oily shadow in the darkness. Diallo kicked open the back doors, her rail gun already charging up.

Smiling savagely, Gabriel followed her.

Your Athena drones buzzed softly in your bags. Crouched in the hall of the third basement level, you released them. Lights glowing faintly, they hovered beside you, guns whining as they warmed up.

"Encrypted comms transmission incoming," Athena said.

"This is Cerberus." Gabriel's voice crackled over your earpiece. "Goblin has checked in and his team is maintaining radio silence. Coyote, Wechuge, check in."

You partially suspected Ziv was ordered to stay quiet because Gabriel didn't want to him complain about his code name. Ziv wasn't the only one with complaints. You'd had time to look up "Wechuge" and found it to be the Dane-zaa equivalent of the Wendigo legend. Someone thought he was funny.

"We're in place," Lacroix said. "One of the original infiltration drones didn't survive, but the "Athena, you have free reign over there; however you wish to maintain a diversion," Gabriel said. "Talos, take care of those turrets and keep their attention. Minotaur, give her cover fire. Siren, move the van closer to the target. Commencing Active Phase of Operation Tarasque. Cerberus out."

You sighed, because your lover was a classically-educated comedian.

Lacroix shook his head, his smile faint. "Athena, what's your read on security?"

"Half strength partially due to severe gastrointestinal distress."

You smirked at Lacroix, because that part had been your idea. He pretended not notice.

"Most of the guards are concentrated in the barracks and are starting to converge on the power station," Athena continued. "Cerberus' team has taken cover inside. My combat models are...maintaining. For the future, I will put in a request for heavier shield-bearing additions for defensive purposes."

"Don't tell me you want to be like Reinhardt too," you muttered.

"What's wrong with Commander Wilhelm?" Athena asked.

"Nothing. He is daring and very admirable, but perhaps not the most responsible role model," Lacroix said with a smile.

"I'm running customized security subroutines on these drones," Athena said. "But my main focus will be on aiding Goblin's breach and maximizing the diversion in the southwest fabrication plant."

"Roger that," you said.

"We'll request aid when we reach a closed system," Lacroix said, because there supposedly a few security nodes in these labs that corresponded with the defenses around the power station. He nodded at you. "Wechuge?"

"Yes, Wile E?"

"Be serious," Lacroix said, rolling his eyes. "We need to move. I'll take point. Isha, stay in cover."

Guns drawn, you moved through the hallways, to the stairwell. Nguyen's quarters were on the top floor. You had eight stories to go, and who knows what waited for you in the space between?

"Goblin, if you could shut off the aerial drones or at least repurpose air defenses in our location, that would be helpful," Gabriel said over the comms.

There wasn't a response, as Ziv was meant to maintain silence, but you could picture his vitriolic real time answer and Lacroix chuckled softly, his mind probably going in the same direction as yours.

"There is a backup power node on the next floor; it is linked to many of the western campus security features," Athena chimed in, thankfully only speaking with one drone. "I classify it as high priority as it would greatly help Cerberus' team if you destroyed it. It does have moderate defenses."

"How many such sites have you detected in our proximity?"

"There are three significant nodes, though one is located in the target's residential quarters."

Lacroix nodded. "We'll take care of it. Isha, you stay behind Athena."

Isha gave the drones a skeptical look. She tapped her camera collar.

"She might be safer, and more useful in the vents. I can monitor her," Athena said.

Lacroix looked back at you.

"Yeah, OK," you said. You weren't sure about how useful she'd be, but you knew you needed to keep her out of the line of fire. Athena pointed out a nearby air exchange, and you unscrewed the grate cover and inspected the shaft. "No contact. Just surveillance," you told her.

Bobbing her head, she crept into the vent.

"Camera is on and linked to my feed," Athena announced.

There was an odd rumble and you instinctively looked down at your stomach, except you felt nothing. It came again and you glanced over at Lacroix. He sighed and shook his head, cradling his SMG in one arm, his expression almost sheepish.

"I told you to eat."

"I had breakfast, Chanceux. I am fine," he said. His stomach rumbled again. "I suppose I could have had something light."

You offered him a chocolate bar, but he shook his head. "I can wait. I am not like you. Hunger doesn't make me that much more dangerous."

"Isha has eyes on the targets," Athena announced. "The control room has four guards and one engineer. The engineer is armed. I can bypass the lockdown if necessary."

"I can maintain suppressing fire: you sharp shoot," Lacroix told you.

You nodded. "Athena, get Isha out of there. Things are going to get hot."

The buildings were modular, the floor plans formed a loop, with each building having at least two staircases, though some did not stretch the full length, truncating at the ground floor. The gunmetal walls reminded you a little of On Sing's unfinished mountain basement, but overall the decor was very "military industrial complex in repeat." It was strange how...banal your adversary's home base was.

"Is something wrong?" Lacroix asked.

"It's kind of plain. I was expecting an atrocity lab around here, with more dead bodies and maybe some skull decor and impaled corpses."

"That's where we sent Ziv's team," Lacroix said with a crooked smile. "She may keep her pits of sharks, loose tigers, and heads on pikes in that facility. This is her main cybernetics lab and her residence. Not a lot of people want to commit their most heinous crimes where they live - it's bad for sanitation."

"...Fair," you said. "But given what I know about her, I guess I was expecting something more horrifying. This is just...meh." You gave a little shrug.

"True; these quarters don't really reflect the character of its occupants. It's a shame. She always had an eye for aesthetics, but her priorities have changed," Lacroix said wistfully, and you knew better than to believe his misinterpretation. In real life, evil people rarely resided in ancient fortresses, surrounded by gibbets and oversized crows. No, the real villains lived in palatial mansions, luxurious modern sky rises, and hi-tech compounds, like this one, donning respectability like camouflage.

The power relay was in the center of the level, striped panels and signs in multiple languages warned of the "danger." The double doors were closed.

Lacroix crouched down while you hugged the walls. He glanced at you, then Athena.

"Isha is clear," the drone announced.

Lacroix nodded and the doors slid open. Two startled cyborgs were already moving toward you, investigating the disturbance. Lacroix raised his gun and began to fire at an alarming speed. His gun was louder than you expected, a vicious pounding rhythm that had you moving half a step faster. The hail of bullets tore through the room, and you sniped one cyborg as she raised her gun, the other one jerking violently on his feet as he absorbed dozens of rounds from Lacroix.

Glass shattered. Machines cracked, splintered, and sparked. One Athena drone fired as Lacroix moved forward, taking cover behind a terminal on the left side of the room. You went right, spotting a large man with a pulse rifle, his attention on Lacroix. You lined up the angles and pulled the trigger, putting three bullets into him in rapid succession.

More shots rang out, return fire dimpling the walls as a crouching Lacroix raised his gun overhead and swept it across the room in an arc. It was a haphazard move, but in such close quarters, the bullet rain proved deadly. The engineer lay slumped over her terminal and you scanned the room for the final cyborg.

Lacroix spun to the side, firing several more shots. The smoking, leaking body of the last hostile dropped on the ground with a heavy thud.

You advanced, leading with your gun as you checked the bodies, weaving between transformers and generators. "Clear!" You shouted, when you reached the other side of the room, those double doors firmly shut and riddled with bullets.

"Clear," Lacroix acknowledged, standing parallel to you. He headed back for the control terminal and carefully moved the engineer's body. "Athena, if you want to take over-

One drone fired directly into a single transformer, showering the corner of room in more sparks. The other plugged into the damaged, but still functioning terminal.

"Rerouting power to Cerberus' position," Athena announced. "Initiating tertiary power grid takeover, and redirecting resources to Ziv's hacked turrets. Unfortunately, building security is now aware of an internal disturbance. Fortunately, most of them have already been diverted so handle Cerberus."

"Let's move," you said, quickly exiting the way you came, because obviously this was not a particularly defensible location.

Isha joined you in the hallway, chirping excitedly, studying Lacroix's gun with greedy eyes. You winced, not liking that thread of ideas at all. But that was a problem for another day.

Shaking your head, you made your way back to the stairwell. You needed to move fast now. You couldn't give Nguyen any chance to escape.

The first batch had been basic-model cyborgs with minimal upgrades. Gabriel could slaughter them all day and not break a sweat. But the reinforcements had been trickier: they had better gear and understood tactics, keeping their distance from his shotguns and sniping cautiously from the safety of solid cover. His weapons weren't nearly as effective at long range. Diallo had planted herself in the entranceway, and was keeping them at bay. Tataryn stayed with her, providing support.

Gabriel had taken point, the central power plant his primary target. His shotguns were much more useful in these narrow hallways. The kid stuck to his side, spinning his revolver and grinning like a fool, that damn hat tilted at a cocky angle.

Athena's largest drone hovered by him, a reminder that she was controlling no less than six bodies independently, as well as helping to maintain their comm lines, tech security, and tunnel into enemy cyber defenses on top of what she was doing back home. How could you trust something that powerful? And how did you take it down when it went bad? It was an age-old question, and Gabriel wasn't going to let himself be distracted by it right now. Up ahead were four people in Vishkar colors, equipped with those bulky hard light projectors on their arms.

The air sizzled, and Gabriel swore as a brilliant ribbon of light shot past his ear. Another bright tentacle snapped at Jesse, and both men began to return fire. Domes of light flared under the impact of bullets and buckshot, stopping the projectiles in midair. Two for shielding, two for precision offense, but the wielders looked too young, barely out of their teens. Gabriel had fought the prototypes in Hong Kong. And he knew that those fancy shields couldn't hold out forever.

"Are we even making a dent, boss?" Jesse shouted. The kid had been briefed on hard light and its field applications, but this was his first field encounter. Gabriel wasn't worried, the boy would be fine.

"We're wearing them down!" Gabriel said, watching a dark skinned woman grit her teeth and brace her arms, sweat dripping down her brow as the shields flickered. "Keep it up!"

"You got it!"

Another tendril of light slapped into his armor, scorching the plate. Snarling, Gabriel racked his shotguns and kept firing. This kind of effort was impressive, however they were tiring already. But him? He was just getting started. Shotguns roaring, Gabriel laughed. It was good to be back in the field.

You'd encountered a few pockets of resistance, shooting through automated defenses and isolated pairs of patrolling guards. The civilian workers weren't sticking around to fight: there were panic rooms on some floors, and you were fine leaving the occupants alone. It surprised you a little that Lacroix didn't insist on inspecting them for useful prisoners, but your team was here for one reason: Nguyen. She had her own secure quarters, and for whatever reason, Lacroix was convinced you would find her there.

Sweaty, despite the air conditioning, you worried, more than you wanted to admit, over how Gabriel was holding up. There'd been little more communication between your groups, Gabriel's teams having split up to secure the power plant. Isha wasn't dragging at all, but she wasn't bouncing any more either. You gave her a ration bar, knowing her metabolism burned through calories much faster than yours.

Lacroix has been disturbingly quiet, his expression carefully blank. There was little of the usual barbed banter, and you wondered if Vo was right. If Lacroix was too sentimental. That was hard to picture, but Vo's secrets and Lacroix's feelings were uncharted territory: you knew better than to just assume. It didn't matter though. If it came down to it, you would finish things.

Running up another flight of stairs, you arrived at the third floor. You had to make another stop here: Athena claimed there was critical data on a closed server, and she too had been very business-like, none of her usual off the wall questions. But she was operating at least six different drone bodies and managing your cybersecurity.

The lab had one of those open floor plans with glass walls and several large computer stations. There were a several plants in hanging baskets and sitting on the desks. A mural of the Milky Way galaxy covered an entire wall. Not the worst office you'd broken into, and then you heard the clicking.

It was the size of a sheep, with six fully articulated legs, two full metal claws, one much larger than the other, and a two meter long tail arching over its wide flat body. Gray omnium body, with green lights, and an oddly anatomically incorrect neon green smiling face painted on with loving flourish, the scorpion drone clicked its asymmetrical claws at you.

"...Goddamnit," you sighed.

Lacroix chuckled. "Oh, that's new."

Something inside the tail began to whine, gears grinding as a motor heated up.

"Lucky, that's a combat model and you need to keep it away from the server while I complete the transfer!"

"Really? I thought it was a hospitality omnic!" You snorted. "Isha, cover!" You raised your gun, and swore as a stream of bullets cut through the desk in front of you. You dodged sideways, one eye on Isha as you fired at its legs, hoping to cripple it. The tail twitched, gun temporarily shutting off as it recalibrated its aim.

There was another "click click" noise, and you groaned, as a neon pink model approached from the other side.

Athena was in a corner, already connected to the server. Isha had climbed a shelf, blue eyes narrowed as she watched you and Lacroix began to shoot. He had to be more judicious with his bullet spray in here.

The scorpion omnics scuttled sideways, taking cover under desks and chairs, returning rapid fire shots. You overturned a table, glancing at Lacroix. The omnics were not showering this place in bullets, which made you think they were programmed to minimize property damage. But you weren't going to bet your life on it. Your pulse carbine whined as you sniped, trying to find a weak spot. Those legs had so many moving parts, but there were six of them. With the scorpions weaving in and out of cover, you didn't have time to see how many legs they actually needed. You targeted the tail on the green one, aiming for an articulated segment.

Five shots later, the tail was wiggling on the ground, the metal stump smoking as you turned your head to check on Lacroix. The pink one flailed on the ground, several of its legs smashed as it tried to aim at him. But he danced around it, zipping between chairs and over desks as he whittled away at it. Apparently, they really were very hesitant to hit any of the work stations.

There was a clang as something crashed into your table barrier. The large metal claw tore through the makeshift barricade and you swore as the smaller one snapped at your feet. Rolling backward, you yanked your EMP baton from your belt, extended it, and brought it down on the eternally smiling face. You squeezed the pulse button, until sparks flew and you broke the connection.

"CPU is at the base of the tail," Athena informed you.

A claw weakly grasped at your baton and you shook it free, jamming the rod back into the CPU housing and turning up the power. The omnic began to smoke and you glanced over at Lacroix who sat on top of a desk, lighting a cigarette, his gaze amused. The pink scorpion lay in half a dozen pieces, like an unfinished kit model, tossed aside by a frustrated kid.

"Are you almost done?" He asked, blowing out smoke rings.

You kicked the fried omnic out of the way, wrinkling your nose at the smell of melted circuitry. Holstering the baton, you raised your gun and put three more shots through the processor, just to be safe.

You looked over at Isha who had hopped off her perch, her gaze on your EMP baton. You had the sudden suspicion that you were going to need to lock your weapons up when they weren't in use.

An Athena drone floated over the scrapped scorpions. "We should move. I'm going to leave one unit here to finish the transfer and provide extra support to Goblin's team."

"Whatever you think best," you said, and found that you believed it.

Athena hovered there. "Do you think maybe Winston could build me a body like that? While I'm curious about bipedal life, that looks like an incredible lesson in other varieties of locomotion."

You blinked. "You want to be...a robot scorpion?"

"With hard light cannons and pulse guns instead of claws," she said. "Also, I would the model to be Overwatch Blue with our insignia one the tail and a more attractive finish. Something with texture."

"...I see," you said, squinting at her.

Lacroix just chuckled. "You should consider an arachnid body, Athena. It will cause quite a scene."

"Oh, that is valuable insight. Perhaps he will be able to build both," Athena said.
You felt Isha poking at your belt and you immediately reached down to check and see if your baton was still there, and it was. Isha headbutted you, chirping happily as you reached over to scratch her head. "All right, you're both freaking me out. I'm ready to go fight the bad guys now."

Chapter End Notes

Short chapter to tide you over: next week might not have an update because I am traveling. I am literally getting ready to leave for the airport. I have so much anxiety and it's not rational, though fat cat has been acting a little sick...

I'll be fine once I'm traveling, but I do it so infrequently I always get nervous about my pets. I have hired teen!cousin to spend the weekend with them. He's done it many times, and is very responsible. Roommate!Cousin is also here. I am just neurotic.

Hope everyone is doing well! I will try to answer comments later, but I won't have a computer till I get home. (I have a smart phone, but it's a pain in the wrist to write long comments on it...)
Chapter 119

Chapter Summary

Revelations: What happens here is a defining moment of your life, a culmination of your story, but this was never about you.

Chapter Notes

Broke 900k in the drafts awhile ago, I think?

Yumii has been a busy artist, a fashion designer, and a cosplayer.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The stairwell to the fourth floor had been heavily mined, turrets hidden behind sandbag emplacements and, according to Athena, a custom designed nerve gas diffuser. Your party wasn't equipped to go that route. Maybe if you had Gabriel and Diallo with you, but they were still occupied at the central power station.

Isha scouted the vents, Athena reporting that there were heavy grates blocking her path.

"Break a window and scale the outer walls?" You asked, because you did not want to take the elevator.

"We did not bring appropriate climbing gear: that route will take too long, there are external defenses, and we will be sitting ducks," Lacroix said, staring thoughtfully at the elevator.

"I cannot guarantee that I can maintain control of the elevator equipment," Athena admitted. "It may be sabotaged already."

You blew out a breath. Great.

"She probably will not just drop us eight stories to our potential deaths," Lacroix mused, stroking his chin. "But she can be whimsical."

You weren't sure how to take that. It really didn't matter to you whom Nguyen was; you only cared about what she had done. You had learned about her personal history, purely because you needed to know your enemy. But you didn't care about her long career as an omnic rights activist, or a political prisoner, and her eventual ascent into politics. You didn't care that she was viewed quite favorably by her constituency, and even a role model for some. As far as you were concerned, Nguyen might have had good intentions in the beginning, but those ceased to have any meaning after what happened to your friends. None of that was whimsical.

Shaking your head, you crossed your arms, and stared upward, recalling a tactic Genji had shown you. "Athena, can you send the elevator down to the second floor, then move it again?"

"We are not elevator surfing," Lacroix said. "That can end just as poorly."
You blinked, unsure of why his mind had gone there. Maybe he had an incredibly graphic cautionary tale stemming from personal experience. But now was not the time to ask; you didn't need to unsettle yourself.

"Wrong direction. We're not riding in or on the elevator," you said. "We'll hitch along the counterweight frame. If Athena sends it down far enough, we should be clear to make the climb."

Lacroix stared at the elevator doors, head angled to the side. He stood in silence for half a minute. "We'll still be very vulnerable, Chanceux."

"Yeah," you agreed, wondering if you should have rappelled in onto the roof. There were AA guns and guards up there too, but the distance would have been shorter and you could have tried to take Nguyen immediately. No, that approach had already been judged as too risky. No point in second-guessing yourself now.

"Athena, you and Isha should find another way," Lacroix said.

"We may be able to use the external route," Athena said. "I can mask our heat signatures since we are smaller. It will be safer," she said, turning to face you.

It wasn't a hard call. You didn't like being separated from Isha, but you weren't going to expose her to more danger, if you could help it. "I need you to stay with Athena. So be good murder bird," you said, patting Isha's head. "And follow Athena's instructions, OK?"

Isha looked between you and Athena's drone, her bright blue eyes narrowed at you. But she bobbed her head once, a bit resentfully, though that could have been your imagination.

"Climb aboard," Athena said, dipping low to the ground.

Isha narrowed her eyes at you, but to your surprise, she clambered up the fish torpedo, her claws leaving gouge marks in the paint.

"Sorry-"

"No, this could work," Athena said, sounding oddly pleased as Isha balanced on her frame, holding on tight like she was getting a piggyback ride. "All right, I'm directing the elevator. You should have at least five minutes to get up two floors."

Prying the elevator doors open, you stared up at the darkened shaft, stretched your arms as you gripped a protruding safety bar, and began to climb.

"They've slowed down out here, boss!" Tataryn crackled over the comms.

"Good. Keep the route open, Siren," Gabriel said, firing his shotguns into the belly of OR-14. "Plenty of tin cans in here."

Jesse crouched behind the smoking ruins of some several weapons crates. Swearing violently, he returned fire, teeth gritted as he glowered at the approaching OR-14s. "I've got a bullet with your name on it!"

"They don't have names," Gabriel laughed.

"Sure they do!" Jesse snapped. "That there's Blender's Cousin. That's Athena's Secret Admirer! And the rest of 'em are Goddamn Nightmare Fodder!"

Gabriel wiped the sweat from his brow, a taut grin on his face. "Bellyaching already?"

"Thought we was fighting cyborgs," Jesse snapped, his drawl growing thicker under fire. "Ain't got time for games, and these things just keep coming! We need to reach the power core! We're pinned down here and I ain't sure how many more hits Athena can take!"

Gabriel stared at the battered drone. They'd already lost one, and it would be optimal if Athena could reach the control center and seize control. But that was looking less and less likely. It was only a secondary goal - they were really here to hold the attention of the defensive forces - but Gabriel didn't make a habit of mediocrity.

"Siren, if you and Talos have everything under control, you can come our way. If you can't, it's not urgent. But we're pushing forward," Gabriel said.

"I've got this!" Diallo shouted.

"I'll be there soon," Tataryn said.

"We've got enough rust buckets to go around; I'll save you some," Gabriel said, reloading his shotguns.

Alternating between cables and the counterweight frame, you scaled the elevator shaft. Though it was only a short distance, it was more difficult than you expected, your muscles burning from the awkward positioning and strenuous climbing. Thankfully, your gloves had grips. You slipped more than once, your heart plummeting downward into the darkness, though the rest of your body did not. Those metal fingers dug in deep, but the irregular handholds required some uncomfortable contortions. Your boots caught in crevices, skewing your balance, but you dragged yourself up the rig, sadly aware that this wasn't even your worst idea ever.

Lacroix wasn't having any issues. He moved fast. Not like a Shimada, but far more gracefully than you. How did he make it look so effortless? Was he just good at everything? Ugh.

"Did you do parkour or something?" You asked, annoyed that you were admiring just how fluid his movements were.

"I studied gymnastics, ballet, fencing, savate, and yes, some parkour - but I only dabbled," he said breezily, pulling himself onto the target ledge with one arm. "Why? Did you want lessons?" He actually winked at you, before turning to focus on the door.

Grumbling, you scrambled up after him, managing to make it up to the ledge as he began to pry at a circuit panel. The double doors slid open, metal gliding slowly apart. You weren't sure what would be on the other side, and you raised your gun, arms now sore.

It was a futile gesture.

In the hallway stood half a dozen cyborgs, clad in full armor, in a staggered formation, their massive pulse rifles leveled at you and Lacroix. They had kinetic shields already set up, and you knew you wouldn't be able to wear them down fast enough. Your first thought was an odd measure of relief that Lacroix had sent Isha another way. Because you couldn't see a clean way out of this fight.
But the cyborgs didn't start shooting. Your gaze drifted past them, to the woman who stood at the end of the hall behind another set of protective barriers. She held a military posture, hands clasped behind her back, her stance ascetic. She was slender and shorter than you expected. Her white áo dài had red spider lilies embroidered along the skirt. You knew that face, it was one you'd stared at many times in photos, news broadcasts, and all manners of surveillance footage. This was the first time you got to see it through the scope of your rifle. Your finger drifted to the trigger, no conscious thought involved.

"Hold, Chanceux," Lacroix said, reminding you that if you started shooting, you might hit Nguyen, however you would definitely get him, and yourself, killed.

But in the back of your head, you saw Captain Patel's hunched form calmly preparing for her last stand, knowing that her squad was mostly dead and that she would never see her husband again. There was Shin's broken body splayed on the rec room floor, eyes staring unfocused into eternity. Lao's hopeless expression each time you sent her back to Talon, unable to save her... It would be worth it to wipe that bitch off the face of the planet, no matter the cost-

That wasn't true.

You caught yourself this time, knowing that you'd nearly been swept away in the moment, that while your feelings were justified, they were not smart. Just like you understood that you were all too willing to sacrifice your own wellbeing for the sake of the mission. But now you would not do that to Gabriel and Jack, or Ziv, Jesse, Amélie, and everyone else. It wasn't just you here. There was Lacroix to consider too. And if anyone got to hurt that smarmy son of bitch, it was going to be you.

You exhaled slowly, finger firmly planted on the trigger guard, the flesh pressed so tightly against the metal you could feel it through your gloves.

Nguyen was old, though she resembled a waning dowager empress more than anyone's grandmother. Her face was unlined- gene mods probably, but her hair was snow white and she wore it in a tight braid. She looked on with cool grim eyes; hair color aside, she could have been in her mid-forties, though you knew she was supposedly 76. Her bearing was aristocratic, and her full attention was on Lacroix.

You hated her so much, you could taste blood in your mouth - your own. In an effort to contain yourself, you'd bitten your lip hard.

She inclined her head to the side, and even if she was the shortest person present, she looked down on everyone. Her gaze passed over you, expression not changing at all. "As-tu amené, Guillard?" She asked, obviously surprised. "What am I supposed to do with her?" She switched to English, smiling viciously at you. "Or does it even matter to you? I know how you think. She helped you get this far; her usefulness is at an end."

You clenched your teeth, forcing yourself to keep your gaze straight ahead. Because as soon as they started shooting, you would have to throw yourself backward into the elevator shaft, and pray that you could grab onto a cable or protrusion and drag yourself to safety. They'd shoot down the shaft-you'd be a fish in the metaphorical barrel, but it was the best plan you could make on the spot.

"I thought you might like to meet the only person who can regularly coax Min into eating fruits and vegetables," Lacroix said lazily, not even looking at you.

Nguyen's head snapped back, like that was the last name she expected to hear. "You presume that I care about the state of that ungrateful—" She squeezed the words out with toe-curling bitterness. "I don't keep track of every outcast that I've ever sheltered." Her voice cracked, weakening the force of her denial, and underneath, you saw the echo of something raw.

"Not just fruit," Lacroix continued, as if she hadn't spoken. "Fresh greens too. You certainly recall all the time we spent at the table threatening, cajoling, and bribing her to eat one accursed sweet potato—"

Nguyen laughed, though there was no humor in it. "You are not even trying to be subtle, and I suppose that in itself is a curiosity. I'll ask you again, why shouldn't I just kill her in front of you right now?"

"Parce que elle est pour moi ce que je suis pour toi," Lacroix said, making his very casual defense of your life in French.

"Un serpent sur ta poitrine? Un poignard dans le dos?" She snapped back, her fury too visible for this exchange to be anything but personal.

"Ma miséricorde," Lacroix said. "Et elle est mon apprentie."

Anh Nguyen briefly glanced at you, barely sparing you a moment, before she returned her attention to Lacroix. "Elle n’a pas de pitié." She looked back at your face, and you felt her judging your mussed hair, defensive posture, and every smudge of dirt on you. "Comment est ton Français?"

"Atrocious," Lacroix laughed, before you could say anything. Beside you, he pressed his thumb against his fingertips, and you got the hint. It would be better if she thought you couldn't understand their exchange.

Nguyen stared unblinking at you. "Put the gun down," she said, in English. "Slowly. Otherwise my soldiers might overreact."

Lacroix nodded at you, even as your eyes drifted toward the elevator shaft and you briefly tried to calculate your chances. Too slim. Lacroix set his SMG down on the floor and you placed your carbine beside it.

"Ensure they behave themselves," Nguyen said to her guards. "If they don't, shoot them in the knees. We can move on to softer tissue afterward."

The nearest cyborg grabbed your guns, even as Nguyen turned on her heel. "What does one more person matter?" She asked airily, not bothering to look back. "Et elle ne parle même pas français."

The almost matronly disapproval would have made you laugh at any other time. Except you were staring very hard at her slender neck, thinking about what you would do when you got the chance...

"Just what kind of agents are they giving you to work with?" Nguyen asked, as if she had no idea that you were actively looking for a way to close the distance and kill her with your bare hands.

"Ones with raw, hidden talent," Lacroix said blithely.

"She seems like the type who will always have a great deal of potential."
Lacroix didn't laugh. He just shot you a warning look, like he was worried that you'd let your temper get the better of you.

You just shrugged. You didn't give a flying fuck what Nguyen thought of you. Your hatred transcended personal insults. You just wanted her dead. She was already responsible for the deaths of civilians, fellow agents, and people you loved. Her barbed words couldn't make you want to kill her more than you already did. But it was your self control he was worried about. You just smiled darkly. You had things in hand.

A flanking cyborg nudged your side with the barrel of his gun, reminding you to keep moving. You raised your gloved hands, walking along slowly, turning your attention to the guards.

There were two men and four women, all bearing the hefty prosthetic armaments that you'd come to recognize as Nguyen's handiwork. They were all large, strapping specimens, looking far healthier than Lao had when she'd been a prisoner. According to Lacroix's sources, most of them were Americans. You still had your batons, blades, and bombs, but armed with only those weapons, it was unlikely that you'd be fast enough to take out all six of them on your own.

Beside you, Lacroix affected that familiar, cool, disinterested smile, like you were just heading to the cafeteria to eat boring food and make snide comments about straight-laced Overwatch agents. It irked you then, how comfortable he looked, but you understood the importance of the act. The enemy should only see the feelings you wanted to portray.

You were led into a large sitting room, big enough so Nguyen's hulking guards could spread out comfortably, still maintaining a perimeter. The walls were a stark shade of white and you wrinkled your nose at the heavy smell of incense. A huge portrait of a handsome young Asian man hung on the wall. Flowers, candles, and other personal effects decorated the shrine underneath. It was crowded with random things: a ring, a dagger, worn out books, a faded shuttlecock... Was this the memorial to Nguyen's husband? And had Lacroix killed him?

"Please, take a seat," Nguyen said with mock cordiality, gesturing to a pair of elaborately carved wooden chairs complete with antique brocade cushions. She stood in front of the shrine, hands again clasped behind her back.

You rested your right hand on your hip, fingers not quite touching your EMP baton.

A cyborg coughed, jerking her gun upward. They had formed a semicircle around you, three on each side. They marched like an honor guard, stiff and formal, and you wondered if their skills were truly up to par.

You still very slowly moved your hands, because they had guns, and you did not. You took a moment to examine the carvings of birds on the armrests. The wood was worn smooth in spots, and these chairs were probably expensive antiques. You hoped that meant Nguyen would think twice about ordering her flunkies to shoot you where you sat.

"You've sent a team to commandeer the power plant and to divert most of my defensive forces. You have personally come to assassinate me. And I suspect there is at least another agent or team providing cyber security: it has been far too difficult to track your movements in my own territory." She sighed. "But it was not impossible to predict your actions. I know how you operate, and you walked right into my trap." She shook her head, the disappointment in her tone unmistakable. "I taught you better than this. Has your time with Guillard so addled your brain?"

Lacroix just smiled faintly. "Perhaps I simply realized that it was time to come and pay my "Respect?" Nguyen's voice went shrill. "You want to speak of respect?" She gave an incredulous laugh.

You shifted in your chair, not enjoying this pointed small talk at all.

"You consort with that dog of a woman, and you want to talk about respect?"

Turning your head, you gave Lacroix a wry look. "Jesus, you're good at pissing off your exes."

Nguyen's head whipped around, fine features contorted in fury. Snarling something in Vietnamese, she grabbed a vase and hurled it straight at you. You ducked, feeling the porcelain whoosh by your scalp before it shattered against the wall, raining ceramic down on your head.

"And you are good at enraging everyone you meet," Lacroix said out of the corner of his mouth.

"His former lover? Is that what he told you?" Nguyen stared at you with outraged eyes. She made a strangled noise, a breathless incredulous gasping as she glared between you and Lacroix. It took you a second to recognize that sound as furious, borderline deranged laughter.

You smiled right back, because you were past caring about her wrath. This was the bitch who'd gotten your people killed. This was the one who gave the order to bring down Black Base Delta. She was the reason you lost Shin, Captain Patel, and nearly everyone else. In this moment, you didn't care if she had you shot. You wanted to cut her, and you wanted it to hurt.

"That was a priceless piece from the Unified Era, was it not?" Lacroix asked, commandeering her attention. He clicked his tongue as he brushed porcelain fragments off his shoulders.

Nguyen narrowed her eyes at him. "Did you-"

"I would not lie about such things. Or even discuss them with her," he said, giving you a warning look. "Chanceux has merely drawn her own regrettable conclusions."

Nguyen's shoulders relaxed slightly, but she glowered at you. "Your protégé is a fool."

Lacroix's smile broadened. "You'll hear no argument from me. But she is a fool with quick reflexes and the ability to learn from her many mistakes."

"Something tells me that you have not taught her the same lessons I gave you," Nguyen said, steely in her disapproval.

"And we've all seen how well that turned out for you," you scoffed.

Lacroix sighed, like he was actually surprised that you wouldn't shut up.

"It makes sense that she can commune with Min," Nguyen said, poison in her tone. "They have about the same level of interpersonal skills."

Lacroix laughed and you almost elbowed him. "Perhaps that is the secret."

"I don't care what happened between you and Lacroix," you lied. "But you murdered a lot of people and I'm here because of that. Fuck your sense of propriety, you're just another Talon
"You know nothing about me," she said, unmoved by your words.

"It's not about you, it's about what you've done!" You would have been out of your chair, except the nearest guard jabbed her gun in your face, keeping you seated.

Nguyen straightened, her face impassive. "Do you want me to apologize? Would that seem genuine? Would that change anything? I think not. When you've been fighting a war this long, you accept that there will be collateral damage. That you have to make hard decisions. That you must have a strong stomach to do what needs to be done. Can you honestly claim to remember all the people you've killed?" She arched a brow at you, her smug "gotcha" face making your blood boil. "What would you do if their loved ones hunted you down one day?"

"I've never killed someone who didn't deserve it," you said coldly.

"I could say the same thing. That's a very arbitrary judgment," she laughed. "And even if you really believe that, are you arrogant enough to believe that you get to decide what others deserve?"

"I was in DC," you said. "Don't even try to make that comparison."

She wrinkled her nose. "Washington DC was a joint operation: I simply provided the manpower. There are others to share the blame for that." She gave Lacroix a pained look. "I don't know why you keep this one around. She is terribly brash, uncouth, and self-righteous." The disgust was evident. "I don't remember any of you being this irritating."

"You get used to it," Lacroix said, his smile faint.

"You were always patient as a spider and you do enjoy a challenge," Nguyen said, a hint of approval shining through her words. "But I think you overestimated your capabilities with this one."

Lacroix looked like he wanted to say something, but then he shook his head and smiled sharply. "We could say the same about you and me."

"You knew how to conduct yourself," Nguyen said, flatly. "What does this one know?"

"I know Amélie Guillard keeps getting the best of you, and she's just a pathetic ballerina," you taunted.

Nguyen whirled, fury in her eyes. She pulled an ivory-handled dagger off the shrine, the blade bright and sharp. "You make a lot of claims about this one. If she is so teachable, then perhaps she will benefit from my hand."

Lacroix was on his feet, all guns pointed at him. You stared at him in shock. "That is unnecessary," he said, giving you a warning look.

"So should I remind you instead?" Nguyen asked, her voice too soft, her arms tensed. She held the dagger like she knew how to use it. In person, there was nothing frail about the old woman.

"We both know that your wrath is for me-"

"But my vengeance is for the cow you married," Nguyen spat.
It took a herculean effort, but you refrained from pointing out that it was Nguyen's blatant animosity toward Amélie that had really given you the idea that she was Lacroix's spurned lover.

Lacroix did not jump to Amélie's defense, though that was probably a tactically-motivated choice. But he stayed standing, facing Nguyen down. "Min did not leave because she liked Amélie. Min still loathes her. But you must admit her actions speak volumes. It was bad enough here that Min of all people left."

Nguyen snorted. "I suppose you are going to reprimand me for Pham."

Lacroix stared at her icily. "Pham was loyal to you. He stayed for you. He did not deserve-"

"You paid Kong back for that. Bloodily, I might add," Nguyen said, bitterness masking hints of regret.

"That was nothing compared to what happened in Hai Phong," he countered.

"Retaliation for the Versailles incident," Nguyen snapped.

"None of it makes up for what happened to Pham."

"Min made that clear enough," Nguyen snarled, through gritted teeth.

"We could do this all night," Lacroix said, raising his chin. "But that doesn't excuse what happened to Pham, and I obviously wasn't the only one who felt that way."

Nguyen's gaze wavered, her face twisted, and she looked away first.

You did not recognize any of the names or "incidents," with the exception of Blackwatch demolitionist Vo Min. But that didn't matter. You had a startling realization: none of this was about you. Nguyen's actions may have changed your life. This might be the focal point of your story, but you were a footnote in hers. You were just caught up in their history, more collateral damage. You would not get to monologue over your righteous vengeance. There was no real resolution to be had from railing against Nguyen: you didn't matter to her. Hell, you probably wouldn't even get a satisfying action movie finish, cue the rock music and the slow walk away from the explosion. That was all fantasy.

"In the end, it was never about them," Nguyen said, reluctantly. "In the end, you betrayed me, and that destroyed everything we built together."

"I never wanted anything to happen Hien," Lacroix said, his voice even. "You know that."

Your eyes drifted to the portrait on the wall. Hien was not the husband's name. But you bit your tongue, keeping a firm grip on your questions.

Nguyen just gripped the hilt of the dagger tightly. "Your regrets are too little, too late. Insults at this point."

"I cannot apologize for what I didn't do."

There were years of history between them, and you didn't have the context to understand. Lacroix certainly wasn't going to brief you on his sordid past with a terrorist, when he could just lead you blindly into a literal and emotional battle zone.
A slight movement caught your eye. You stared over the portrait and to the side, at the elegantly wrought white metal vent grating. A pair of bright blue eyes stared back at you.

Isha raised a clawed hand, a familiar golf ball-sized orb clutched within. You instinctively glanced down at your belt, then back at the grate. You couldn't check the pouch, but you instantly understood what had happened. That damn brilliant sneak had pickpocketed you back in the lab, foregoing the baton for the bomb. And she knew what it was: she'd worked with Min before.

You slowly shook your head, and she drew back, watching with narrowed eyes. She pointed to the left, and you angled your head to the side, finally noticing a familiar fish torpedo shadow hovering in front of the darkened window.

Isha began to quietly remove the fasteners on the vent grate.

You glared at her, and held one palm up like you were stretching, instead of signing for her to maintain stealth.

"I know exactly who killed my son. As do you. You should apologize for what you did in the aftermath! You should beg for my forgiveness!"

Lacroix stood there, stoic. "I already asked for his."

"Il t'aimait!" Nguyen shouted, tears rolling down her cheeks. "He loved you more than anyone in the world! You were everything to him!"

Lacroix bowed his head, and you could not see his face.

"We both know that isn't true," he said, voice rough. "I loved your son dearly. But Hien loved Odile. He did not understand Gérard."

Odile? You knew that name. Your mind instantly flashed back to Amélie's photo collection, her fond recollections of a young ballerina with clever eyes, her hair the same shade of reddish brown as-

Time ground to a halt.

You turned your head, staring at Lacroix: his bone structure, his eyes, that damnably identical auburn hair, shorter now but...

There was a very good reason you had never been able to dig up a damn thing on Gérard Lacroix's past. He'd just appeared one day on the DGSE rolls and all attempts to trace whom he had been before had been futile. The pictures, the financial leads, the database of intelligence ops: none of it had garnered any results. Hell, you'd even trawled the Foreign Legion, several mercenary groups, and the prison system in an attempt to find a match. You'd had one promising lead, until you'd found that man alive and well living under an alias in Bali. Even Athena admitted defeat.

You exhaled slowly, berating your own ignorance. Your search parameters had been far too narrow. And Amélie had dangled all that information in front of you oh so casually. She'd all but told you what was going on, and you'd been too dense to see any of it. The way she laughed when you asked her if she still spoke to Odile, if Lacroix disapproved of her friend...

You sighed. It didn't matter now.

Lacroix didn't seem to notice your reaction. "Hien went to Amélie's flat. We both know it wasn't just to talk. She defended herself. Hien was wrong, and you know it."
"But you married her," Nguyen spat, switching back to French. "You married my son's murderer!" She advanced, dagger in hand. "You chose your side!" She paced in front of Lacroix, too close for comfort with that naked blade. "After everything, I did for you, you chose her. You betrayed Hien and me."

You gave the silent guards a sidelong glance, a little alarmed to see that their collective gaze was on Nguyen, their eyes only focused on her. That meant she had them on some kind of behavior leash. She wouldn't let anyone outside her control witness this personal exchange. Whatever Chumak had tried to do to Lao, they had succeeded with this batch of cyborgs.

"There is only one way this can end." Nguyen snarled, glaring up at Lacroix.

"I don't buy it," you said, standing up slowly. "Guillard is good at getting other people to do her favors, but she doesn't like getting her hands dirty." You were lying through your teeth, but you didn't like how close Nguyen held that dagger to Lacroix.

Nguyen blinked. She'd forgotten you existed. Her head snapped back. "Someone thought they were funny, beating my son's head in with a bust of Pericles."

"Basta what?" Your gaze stayed on the knife. "Is that some kind of fancy French dance move? Or food?" You managed to deliver the line with a straight face. If Nguyen believed you were dumb, you'd let her. It gave you an edge.

Nguyen stared incredulously at you for a long moment. "I assume she has hidden qualities that compensate for her blinding ignorance?"

"Extremely well-hidden," Lacroix said, his voice soothing. "She is teachable, but rough. Your comparisons to Min are not entirely inaccurate."

You glared at him.

"Interesting how much she doesn't like your wife," Nguyen said, calmer.

"She has a problem with the rich. Envy, I suspect."

You made a face.

Nguyen exhaled slowly, wrath draining away at your distraction. "Why would you want another version of Min? You really are hopeless." She sighed, tossing the dagger back onto the shrine. She stared at the portrait on the wall, looking, just for a moment, like a sad old woman whose children never called, and wanted nothing to do with her. It was piteous.

Good.

"We could have done so much together," Nguyen said, softly. "But you have destroyed everything with your betrayal."

"Hien betrayed me first," Lacroix said defiantly. "He never should have gone after Amélie, and we both know that's the truth."

"You would say that to my face!" Nguyen whirled, lips curled in a snarl, eyes wild.

"I respect you too much to be anything but honest. It's a shame that you don't have that same level of self-respect. You should have stopped lying to yourself by now," Lacroix said, and you could hear the vicious little smile in his words. "Instead you've surrounded yourself with mindless drones, unable to handle the mere suggestion that you could be wrong. I expected better from you."

Nguyen's face froze in a mask of cold fury. "Put him on his knees," she hissed, and the two male cyborgs grabbed Lacroix by the shoulders, wrenching him downward. "If she moves, shoot her in the head," Nguyen said, without looking at you.

"Lacroix-" You began, because Isha had just gotten the cover off the ventilation shaft. You held up one finger, signaling for her to get ready. If Athena, Isha, and you all moved at once, you had a fighting chance.

"Hush, Chanceux, and hold very still. You had all the fun in Candle Arc. It is my turn," he said, eerily calm.

"This is personal business," Nguyen said to you, like she had forgotten your reason for being there. "It is in your best interest to let me vent my spleen. I may feel more merciful afterward."

Despite his words, Lacroix struggled, and one of the men with metal arms punched him in the face. Stunned, he drooped, and they forced him onto his knees, holding him in place as Nguyen bent over him. You didn't see a dagger or a gun, but you had a very bad feeling about this.

Nguyen patted his cheek gently with her hand. "I hope this hurts."

Lacroix just laughed, like she'd said something amusing.

"Pour que vous puissiez voir clairement..." Nguyen said cheerfully, and dug her thumb into his left eye, that gummy squelching noise a sound you would remember for the rest of your life. Through it all, Lacroix was silent, not giving her the satisfaction.

Nguyen patted his cheek gently with her hand. "I hope this hurts."

Lacroix just laughed, like she'd said something amusing.

"Now, Athena!" You shouted, half a second too late as the fish torpedo crashed through the window. The armed cyborgs turned, raising their guns, but you grabbed a ceramic orb off your belt and threw it at the three clustered on your right, bouncing it between them, hoping their bodies would absorb all the impact. The bomb detonated as it struck a chest plate, the sound reverberating in your skull as it showered the area in nails, bearings, and scrap metal. Debris rattled your armor, and you held your arms up, shielding your face. Then a second one went off as the metal grate crashed to the ground. If those cyborgs were getting back up, they would need a moment. Unsheathing your wakizashi, you lunged at the cyborgs restraining Lacroix. They didn't move to defend themselves, probably because Nguyen had ordered them to hold Lacroix, not fight.

You cut through the nearest one's throat. The angle was bad, and cost you an extra second. Pivoting, you stabbed the second one, your blade went downward through the exposed skin on the back of the neck, severing spine and circuitry. Thunder cracked, and you hissed as something struck you hard in the back. There was a terrible shriek, and you staggered, body aching, but still upright. Athena brought down the last cyborg on the right side of the room, and you spun, watching as Isha clawed at the remaining cyborg's battered face. The woman threw Isha onto the ground, her armor pocked and smoldering. She raised her gun at the screeching ball of feathers, the expression on her gouged-up face savage.

Despite the burning in your lungs and the radiating pain in your upper body, you charged, swinging your blade with furious desperation. She saw you too late, trying to turn her gun on you, but rage spurred you forward and you slammed into her, driving your blade into her cheek and out the back of her skull. She toppled and spasmed underneath you, and you staggered to your feet, boot on the corpse's throat as you yanked your blade free.
"Isha?" You rasped, because your lungs ached.

A bundle of black feathers rolled out from under the chair, chirping happily as she saw you. There was...gunk on her claws, but she was moving fine.

You turned, ready to fight whatever else Nguyen had waiting, but stopped. Athena hovered there, guns out. The cyborgs were dead or dying. And Lacroix still knelt on the ground, blood oozing from his ruined left eye socket. Nguyen lay there in front of him, a thin stiletto buried in her ribs.

Candle Arc, huh? You could see the parallels, though Lacroix had taken it further. Was it just one-upmanship for him?

"Lacroix, are you-

"I am fine," he said through gritted teeth. "But you, old friend, your time is short." He clasped Nguyen's hand in his and she did not push him away.

"Your face makes me sick," she spat.

"Whose fault is that?" You muttered, trying not to stare at Lacroix's disfigurement.

"Hush," he said, voice hoarse. "You don't have long," he told her softly, switching to French. "If you tell me where it is, I can save it. Otherwise, they'll destroy everything just to keep it out of your allies' hands."

"Allies?" Nguyen laughed bitterly. "No allies. They just gave lip service to the idea. There were supposed to be twice the forces we had today. But they made excuses. They delayed. Allies? What are those? Once, we were allies, and look how that ended. They are vultures, just waiting to scavenge what they have never treasured nor earned."

You frowned as you injected a nanite solution into your side. Had Talon softly betrayed Nguyen, ignoring her requests for help so Blackwatch could do the dirty work for them? You winced as you touched your back, your torso already beginning to feel warm from the treatment. The armor was dented, but not broken. You took a shaky breath, the pain was manageable, for now.

"Deny them," Lacroix said.

"I trust you even less." She coughed, blood bubbling from her mouth, her voice a wheeze. "You murdered the last one. Why would I..."

Lacroix glanced up at you for a moment, that empty socket staring accusingly at you. He did not want to continue this discussion in front of you, but he did not have time to stall. "We did not destroy it."

"Cold storage and dissection is no life," she murmured.

"That's not what we did either," you said wearily. "We're not complete assholes. We adopted her."

Nguyen blinked, eyes darting to Athena's drone and she began to shake, fists clenching as she struggled to keep breathing. "...Of course. You even named her - No one suspected your administrative virtual assistant-" She coughed, spraying blood on the while silk of her áo dài, her eyes still clear. She glanced at you, briefly, and you realized she'd come to a decision. "Safe. Old
You watched her turn her full attention on Lacroix. You stared at up at that picture of Hien, wondering if you were supposed to feel something besides a detached sort of satisfaction. There was no sense of triumph, not really. This is what you'd worked for. This was the bloody vengeance you had wanted for so long, even if you didn't get to deliver it personally. But it didn't bring you any joy, especially looking at Lacroix's gory face. It needed to be done. She needed killing. You just wished you could have reached her sooner and saved everyone a lot of grief.

You expected some kind of pithy quote, but Lacroix stayed silent as you both watched Nguyen take one last rattling wheeze and die. Whatever he was feeling, he didn't show it clearly on his face. Instead he gently closed her eyes, his fingers almost hesitant. You waited for the retaliatory squish, but it didn't happen. Lacroix just slowly rose to his feet, wobbling like he'd had too much to drink.

"So, you figured it out," he said, voice quiet and you could not place his tone.

You shrugged. "You're actually surprised?"

Lacroix shrugged, one hand drifting up to his ruined eye. "No, I suppose not."

"We need to get you fixed up. You took a hard blow to the head and normally I'd compare your pupils to see if you're concussed but-"

Lacroix actually laughed at that. "You are horrid, Chanceus."

"It's a coping mechanism," you shrugged, mouth dry.

Your comms crackled. "Wedge? Goblin? Coyote? Anyone? This is Siren," Tataryn's voice came faint over the comms. "Cerberus and Minotaur have gotten too deep. I'm starting to think that the defenders aren't very interested in keeping the building from falling down on our heads.

Your heart stopped. It wasn't just Tataryn in there, but Jesse and Gabriel as well.

"I'm requesting backup," Tataryn cut out briefly. "And maybe a pizza while you're at it?"

They had pizza in Hanoi, but was that really the first food he thought of? You were pretty sure Tataryn didn't even like pizza that much. Everyone was a comedian.

"Are the Shimadas closer?" You asked, not liking the prospect Tataryn being on his own.

"Goblin's team is still transferring data," Athena told you. "Genji and Hanzo are cleaning up around him. One of them will come as soon as they can, but they're occupied."

You swallowed roughly.

"There's nothing you can do about this now," Lacroix said, tapping his gory socket. He swayed on his feet. "I will secure the seed. You go back up Cerberus' team."

"I can't leave you-" You said, even as you prepared to head over there.

"I'll have Athena, and perhaps Isha could help me?" He went to the wall. Your raptor trilled excitedly, already running her claws along a hidden panel that you had not spotted immediately. She really had sharp eyes. Lacroix chuckled, wobbling over to help her access the "On my way," you said into the comm.

"Hurry, please," Tataryn said, tone low and clipped. "And don't forget the pizza."

You took one last glance at Lacroix. He had to be in shock from his injuries.

"We can take care of him, Lucky," Athena said. "But we still need to secure her personal files. Just a warning, my drones in Cerberus' care have all been destroyed."

Nodding, you retrieved your gun from a dead cyborg, and then you broke into a run.

Chapter End Notes

This took forever because I wrote it and didn't like how it flowed and revised it multiple times. The next couple chapters are also getting overhauled. But it's slowgoing. I'm taking quality over speed though.

Cat is sicker. Working later (busy season has started and I probably won't get out of work till 2AM). And hands still aren't healed (though they're better than they were). So I don't have quite as much time as I want.

You can always ping me on Tumblr. It may take a day or two, but I will get back with you. On that note, some very nice folks, Monster & Lea, set up a discord server to chat about the fic, Overwatch, and life in general. I check it daily and try not to stuff it full of sin. This link expires in a day, so ping me if you want another invite. I might add a permalink later, but figured we'd see what happens.

Special thanks to Prior for editing my French. I think I forgot to run some passages by her. All mistakes are my own. All of them. So many mistakes.
Chapter 120

Chapter Summary

This is what it has come to.

Chapter Notes

Yumii drew the several of the original characters. ^_^

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chest aching, limbs heavy, you raced across the grounds, heading straight for the power plant. You were counting on the rapid-acting nanite-injection to keep you on your feet, because even if Nguyen was dead, the fighting wasn't done. You could hear the shooting as soon as you set foot outside, and you briefly wondered if the local government would interfere, or if Nguyen had paid them enough to mind their own business.

If it was omnics up ahead, you would need heavier firepower. Gripping your carbine in one hand, you pulled the remaining grenades off your belt. You still had one of Vo's personal explosives, but they wouldn't be as effective against armor or omnics. Hugging the shadows, you could see the twinkling of muzzle flashes in the distance.

"Talos?" You whispered into your comm.

"Busy!" Diallo growled, her voice raw.

"I'm incoming and close enough to see the light show. Best route?"

There was a long silence and you slowed down, favoring stealth.

"Come through the west side. There's still cover. I'll keep'em occupied." The comm clicked and the ground shook, machinery roaring. Against your instincts, you ran toward the rumbling, cutting straight through the tattered shrubbery and nearly tripping on a body. You glanced at the uniform- not one of yours- and kept moving, slowing down once more as you neared the fire fight.

The central building didn't look stable any more: the concrete stairs crumbling, the glass doors and windows all shattered. Broken glass and solar panels twinkled under the streetlights. Burn marks and bullet holes distorted the building's facade, and more than a dozen cyborg corpses littered the ground, interspersed with still-smoking heaps of rubble.

Crouched in the bushes, you mapped your route over the war-torn obstacle course.

"Strike, if you're coming, you'll want to move fast. There's a sniper out there and I can't get over there to crush her head just yet," Diallo said over the comms, her navy blue armored suit stomping a cyborg's flesh parts onto the steps. You flinched at the meaty sound, not quite like an eye, but close enough to turn your stomach.

"Got it," you said. "I'm in cover. Do you need me to assist?"

There were two cyborgs still on their feet, but Diallo, fully-encased in her suit, just waved a giant metal arm, her rail gun whining as it prepared another blast. "Go! I got this."

You tore out of the bushes, zigzagging across the entryway, your feet barely touching the ground. Stone fragments rained down on you, bullets whizzing by as the cyborgs spotted you, shouting directions to each other. You tuck your head and ran straight through an empty wall pane, the thick glass smashed on the ground. It was closer than the door, and the sooner you got in the building, the sooner you'd be out of sniper range. The lights flickered, as you entered the lobby. It was another wreck, furniture topsy-turvy, more bodies on the ground - none of them your people. You just kept moving, ducking under windows, jumping over debris, and heading for the stairs.

"Your location, Siren?" You asked, as you entered the stairwell.

"B2," he said, gunfire in the background.

"Cerberus and Minotaur?"

"B3 last I heard, but that was ten minutes ago," he said. "I'm almost there. Got a little sloppy-" He cut out briefly. "-he's still out there, watch your back."

You went down the stairs two or three at a time, stepping over dead cyborgs, broken omnis, and even a few people in Vishkar uniforms. You gave B2 a cursory check, but Tataryn had been moving fast; he was probably on a lower floor by now. By the time you reached B3, you were breathing hard. There were odd sounds coming from down the hall, so you slowed down and peeked around the corner.

Tataryn stood behind a man in a Vishkar uniform, expression flat and reptilian as he yanked back on something, a garroting wire probably. You caught the faintest gleam of filament in the lowlights as the man clawed his neck, kicking, shaking, and gurgling till he gradually went limp.

"There are faster ways," you said, stepping into the hall as you watched the corpse twitch.

"Lost my knife," Tataryn murmured, as he grab the man's head and twisted hard, just to be thorough. Hair frizzing in the humidity, face smeared with blood, Tataryn managed to flash you a warm, appreciative smile, and still looked good doing it. "But I found something far better." He winked at you as he casually picked up his rifle off the ground and took a moment to grab the dead man's hard light projector. He held it up like a trophy, grinning broadly. Then he squinted at you. "Where's the pizza?"

"I got hungry on the way over," you said, because sometimes it was just best to humor him.

He snorted as the two of you jogged back to the stairwell. "

"What are you going to do with that?" You asked, jerking your chin at the scavenged piece of Vishkar tech. Because as far you knew, he had no training with that kind of equipment.

"Kseniya has a salon coming up." He paused, testing the word. "Not for hair or fingernails. For science. I believe they call it a "science fair" in English? But she kept insisting it was a salon." He laughed, like it was the silliest thing he'd ever heard.
You sighed. "You can't give her classified tech--"

"Don't fret, your face will get stuck like and it will make me laugh too hard to shoot straight. She already has a project, something about wearable fungus." He wrinkled his nose. "But she may just want to take it apart for fun. See how it works. She is smart like that. Winston will supervise." He smiled to himself, probably proud that he'd conned yet another coworker into babysitting his kid. At least she was a good kid.

You stopped at B4, the lights flickering. This was the site of the last of the backup generators and tertiary control systems. B3 had been somewhat intact, like the aftermath of a good bar fight. B4 was a warzone. Gunshots roared in the distance. Exposed wires sparked and there was very strong unpleasant smell. Gas leak? No, it was more than that. Several walls had just been smashed, sewage and gas pipes destroyed. The wreckage of doors, steel beams, and wall panels lay strewn everywhere. Shredded insulation and gun smoke hovered in the air.

Motioning for Tataryn to hold, you took point, and though you tried breathing through your mouth, you could now taste the foulness in the air. Gross.

Mangled omnic shells lay scattered across the floor. You recognized the blast patterns of Gabriel's shotguns and the precise bullet holes from Jesse's revolver. The area was littered with spent brass.

You pressed your comm button. "Cerberus, Minotaur, this is Wechuge. Me and Siren are down here in B4--"

Static blasted through the earpiece for several seconds. You were ready to give up and keep searching when the line clicked.

"Where's Coyote?" Gabriel asked, tone gruff. Was he injured? Or was he just worried about Lacroix?

"He's injured, but still moving. We finished our detail. Isha and Athena are helping him with final acquisitions." You were getting good at making death sound boring. It was an odd skill, but you'd take it.

"All right, start clearing the way," he said, relief softening his voice. "Since your part is complete, we'll forego the power plant objective and call in the pickup."

"Going to buy us dinner, boss?" Tataryn asked. "You know, for a job well done?" Tataryn grinned at you, and you couldn't tell if it was because he wanted free food, or if he was playing your wing man. Probably both: Tataryn wasn't a man to waste opportunities.

"If we hurry, we might be able to swing a pit stop in Shanghai," Gabriel said, sounding amused.

"Woohoo!" Jesse shouted in the background.

"And look, the boss will be able to help you get settled in, while we get a nice break," Tataryn winked. "You need not say a word. I know I am brilliant." He pointed at himself, nodding smugly. "You can thank me later."

Shaking your head, you turned back, heading up the stairs. "Talos, we're heading back to your location."

There was no response.
"Comms have been tricky all night, especially since we don't have a drone to boost them any more," Tataryn said, hesitantly, trying to reassure himself. Diallo was part of his team, and no matter how carefree he acted, you were not fooled. You knew he was worried.

"She was dealing with at least two cyborgs and a sniper when I came in, but her suit looked intact," you said.

"She could handle that easily," Tataryn nodded, his smile a little forced. "But let's hurry anyway."

You both rushed up the stairs, Tataryn taking three at a time with his long legs. Your muscles ached and your mouth was far too dry, but you kept up, making it back above ground very quickly, soothed by the echo of metal boots in the stairwell. Gabriel and Jesse were right behind you.

"If you're any slower, you won't get dinner!" Gabriel shouted.

Tired as you were, you smiled at that. You didn't hear Jesse's response, you just threw open the doors, gun out, as you headed back to the lobby. Movement caught your eye, an Asian man clad in light blue and white, his tunic stained with blood. He gritted his teeth when he saw you and you aimed your gun, recognizing the Vishkar uniform and more importantly the detonator in his hands.

"Bomb!" You shouted as you pushed past Tataryn. You raised your gun to fire, knowing that if that was a dead man's switch, you were all in trouble anyway.

His gaze locked onto you. His face was bloody, his eyes mostly wild white sclera, like a fear-maddened horse. He raised the detonator, even as you pulled back on the trigger of your gun. Your decibel blockers muffled the shots, but you watched as they connected, blood blossoming through his flimsy uniform.

There was a breath of silence. A half second of terrible anticipation. Had you been fast enough? Was it a dead man's-

The answer bulldozed you from the side, the world roaring by you in a rush of white light and hard rubble, flinging you across the lobby. You hit the ground hard, air knocked out from your body, brain spinning as you sprawled there, stunned. Showered with concrete dust and metal shrapnel, you lay on your stomach, carbine still gripped in your hands. Gasping for breath, you lifted your head, limbs slowly responding as you rolled onto your back and attempted to wobble to your feet. It took a few tries before you were able to regain your balance, your vision blurring a few times as you rose.

The building was still standing, though the ceiling above the stairwell entrance had caved in. That area, a few yards from where you'd been shooting, had been the epicenter. Hugging your chest, each breath a harsh effort, you looked around frantically for your friends. Half the lights were out, the rest flickering and worsening your vertigo. Jesse and Gabriel had still been in the stairwell, possibly out of the blast range, but where was Tataryn?

Dust swirled in the air and you coughed as you tried to croak his name.

A wet cough sounded from the left and you touched your decibel blockers - they'd held up through the explosion. Your ears were still ringing, but you hadn't been deafened. If you had your hearing, and your equipment still worked, you were probably fine. You limped through the rubble, the emergency lights kicking on, giving the room a softer glow. Smoke, ash, and embers swirled in the air around you, clouding the room.

You spotted his hair first, fine golden strands that clung to everything with shocking tenacity. Staggering over, you found him sprawled face up against a pile of rubble, taking rapid shallow breaths as he blinked at you, obviously still stunned. He was laid out on the rubble, like he'd just slipped and fell, and all he needed was half a minute to recover. Then he'd get back up, woozy and laughing. But one hand rested on his abdomen, dark liquid from the wound already pooling around him.

"Tataryn!" You dropped down beside him, clumsily checking his injuries. Shrapnel had torn a fist-sized hole through his armor and the flesh underneath. You placed your hands over his, trying to apply pressure to the wound, trying to put him back together like a jigsaw puzzle, and knowing in your bones that you didn't have that power. The realization was a slap in the face. But it didn't stop you from going through the motions, from trying anyway. If you just stuck a bandage on it...shouldn't that be good enough?

Tataryn took a pained breath, those light blue eyes wide as his clenched his teeth. He smiled weakly at you, and coughed up more blood. Grimacing, he tried to wipe it away, like he could somehow hide the damage from you.

"Internal bleeding," you muttered, and that was not a good sign.

"External too." He gave a pained laugh.

"How bad?" You asked weakly, even though on some level, you already knew the answer. Knew from looking at him, how pale he was, how quickly he was losing blood from multiple locations. You fucking knew. But you asked anyway, hoping that his response would be different.

"It's bad," he murmured, giving you a lopsided smile. "But I've had worse."

You choked on a laugh, a sob, that lingering cloud of dust. It got in your throat and eyes. All those ashes on the wind made it hard to breathe.

"What can I do?" You asked, voice half an octave too high.

"A drink?" He asked, and then coughed up more blood in thick chunks.

Your hand shook as you reached for your canteen.

"Not water," he said, with a wince and a sharp headshake. "No, Lucky. Nothing you can do. Can't feel-" He stopped, his eyes on yours, those pale blue eyes serene as he looked at you, his gaze gentler than you had ever seen. "Tell her I'm sorry. It looks like I will be missing her salon. I-"

"Shhh." You squeezed his hands too tightly, but he didn't react. He just struggled to breathe.

"You'll go for me," he said, voice growing quieter, harder to hear.

"Yes, I'll go," you said words running together. "I'll go. I'll take desserts. I'll buy pizza. Two pizzas even. You know, she'll still be so mad that you're late. She'll berate me ferociously for stopping for pizza instead of dragging you in. There will be terrible recriminations. But of course, like a hero at the eleventh hour, you'll limp in there after the start time, looking sheepish with your crutches, and distracting everyone from the boring event speeches."
"Of course. Of course, I will go," he whispered, conviction in his eyes. "The devil himself couldn't keep me away." He coughed. It was a terrible rattling sound.

"And even though she's been preparing to lecture you the entire time, you'll look so pathetic and sorry, that she'll only scold you a little. You know, she can never stay mad at you, because- because- she'll be so happy to see you there. She's always glad just to be with you," you choked. "So hold on, Tataryn. Help is on the way. We're going to get you home to her."

"Yes, I know," he breathed, as his body went limp and his gaze lost its focus. His death rattle mingled with a soft sigh of contentment as he lay listening to your panicked promises, your sweet lies, his warm bloody hands clasped between your gloves. Those pale blue eyes stared off into a dream, a faint smile on his lips.

You crouched there too long, willing him to blink, to move, to wheeze. But he was still, and you reached out, closing his eyes, a gesture you'd done before for the dead, though you couldn't claim to understand why.

"Boss? Commander? Lucky? Jesse-" Diallo shouted in the distance. You shuddered, vision blurring. "Luck-" There was a half beat of silence. Where were Jesse and Gabriel?

Your stomach sank lower. You staggered to your feet, glancing up at Diallo who'd lost her helmet at some point, her left arm held at an odd angle.

She stared between you and Tataryn, grief twisting across her face. Diallo had always been an open book, prone to smiling and fuming with no subterfuge. It hurt to see the raw pain on her features, mirroring your own feelings. You looked away.

"We need to find Jesse and Gabriel. They were behind us on the stairs," you said, not recognizing your voice. It was too hoarse. You stumbled over to where the stairwell had been and started digging.

You couldn't bear to look backward at Diallo or Tataryn.

"Jesse? Gabriel?" You remembered digging frantically, once upon a time; other people's lives held in your broken hands. You remembered another cave-in, not so long ago, that left you with nightmares of death and darkness. You remembered fear and grief, the echoes churning inside you: those things never left you, not really. And while your body ached, your chest was too tight, and everything was distant. You just wanted to sit down. You couldn't-

But you recognized shock. You knew it well enough. There wasn't time for that now. Numbly you began shifting the rubble, bloody hands moving mechanically. One rock after another. You had to keep moving to get through this. It was painful, but you had done this before.

"Jesse?" You called again, your voice fragile.

"Back here! Ceiling's holding, but it's not going stay up to forever!"

The pile shifted and suddenly Diallo was beside you, digging one-handed, her mechanized suit capable of lifting far more than your two good arms. She dragged whole chunks of concrete and rebar out the way at a terrifying pace, murmuring what sounded like a prayer then entire time.

Her words were lost on you, but you weren't really listening. You had to get Jesse and Gabriel out. Did they have enough air? Were they too hurt to dig? You'd had nightmares like this before, and you would be having them for a long time after.
After Diallo pulled a couple of larger pieces out, like some fucked up version of Jenga, the mountain of debris surged sideways, creating a meter high opening, but Jesse didn't emerge.

"Gabriel? Jesse?"

"In here! I can't move him on my own!"

Heart racing, you ducked inside, slipping the night vision visor back on. "I'm coming in. Diallo can't fit."

"Shit-" Jesse gave a low groan. Bent I-beams and scorched metal paneling had been fused together into a precarious shield overhead. The metal warped and bulged, rubble dribbling down continuously. It didn't look like it would hold for very long.

Jesse was on his knees, his hat gone, frantically tying a bandage. You stared for a moment, your breath catching as you took in the scene. The night vision was monochromatic - but you recognized the consistency of blood on the ground, too much of it. Jesse knelt beside Gabriel - his beanie was missing too, his eyes were closed, and he was breathing too hard. But he was still breathing. Some of the tension in your gut loosened.

"I'll get his legs." You silently cursed Gabriel's metal boots, grabbing them and pulling slowly as Jesse scooted him across the floor. You scraped your back and shoulder getting out, and hit your head at least twice. But you slowly emerged, stopping short when you saw the blood-soaked bandana Jesse had tied as a tourniquet.

"Come on!" Jesse shouted at you. "We ain't got time for lollygagging!"

Shaking if off, you gritted your teeth and pulled harder, Diallo behind you, helping to clear a smoother path.

Jesse followed quickly, his face grim.

"Is there-?" You had to take another moment to stare at Gabriel's left arm. Or what remained of it, because from the elbow down, it was just gone.

Jesse flinched and shook his head. "Crushed."

You winced, unable to take your eyes off him. Gabriel was out cold, but it wasn't like watching him sleep. He was too unresponsive. When your lover slept, he had expressions, ticks, sounds. He'd nuzzle your hair, squeeze your waist, or murmur something in Spanish. Sometimes he would even snore. The absence of any of that was alien and frightening.

Crouching over him, your hands sticky with blood, you touched his face. He was burning up. Swearing, you got your canteen off your belt and splashed water on his face and neck, hoping to cool him down. If his temperature got too high... You knew your water might only make a few degrees difference, but it was something and you had nothing else on hand.

Jesse looked around. "Where's Tataryn?"

Diallo keened softly and you shook your head, not looking up.

Jesse made a strangled noise in the back of his throat. He looked over to the side, where Tataryn had fallen. "The boss-" He coughed. "The boss-" You heard him inhale shakily. "The boss already radioed for pickup," he said, after several tries. "On Sing is on its way in. We need to get out of here."
You tore off part of your rashguard, tying it tighter around the existing bandages. You applied more pressure to the stump, trying to keep Gabriel's blood inside his body. But it was still leaking out, too fast and too warm in your hands. You kept your focus on his injuries, still unable to process what had just happened. Compartmentalization let you break it down. Fix the injuries. Head to the evac site. Don't you dare think about losing him.

"Keep that limb elevated," Diallo said, breaking your reverie.

Jesse helped you tie a sling, before the two of you lifted Gabriel back up. You carried him between you, Jesse bearing most of the weight. Gabriel's body was still too hot and too limp. Diallo took point, and as you struggled to keep it together. To figure out what you could do next. You kept glancing over at him, expecting him to crack one eye and say something smarmy. To shake the two of you off and laugh dryly, saying he'd lost an arm, not a leg and he could walk just fine on his own. To at least...respond.

"Lucky?" Your comm crackled.

"Ziv?" You murmured, not expecting to hear his voice right then.

"Ben-zona! We've been calling you for ten minutes! I was getting ready to send in the ninjas! What the hell is going on?"

"We're going to need to change the evac point. We're in the central building. We have critical injuries. And Tataryn's...dead." The word fell flat, too disjointed and alien on your tongue. There was a long silence.

"Fuck," Ziv said, voice raw. "Ben-zona. All right. I'll handle it. Just stay alive. We'll be there soon!"

Not more than five minutes later, an Orca-sized transport landed in the courtyard. It wasn't an Orca, too sleek and expensive, but the hatch opened and Feng strode down the ramp, wearing what had to be custom body armor: it was a deep, iridescent emerald green textured in a repeating octagonal pattern, almost like scales. It was flashy, but you knew better than to underestimate any of On Sing's tech. Medics with stretchers rushed past her, and carefully took Gabriel from you, murmuring to themselves in worried tones before heading back up the ramp. Diallo led another pair back into the building, because after everything, there was no way in Hell you were going to leave Tataryn behind.

Hanzo and Genji were taking a detour to meet up with Lacroix and Isha, but they would be here soon. You stared at Feng as she barked orders in three different languages, her shoulders straight, stance aggressive, words taut. She swaggered like a cyborg twice her weight class. But no one argued with her; her people treated her with surprising deference. It was a different Feng than you were used to seeing.

There were medics and techs swarming the place, but you weren't so in shock that you overlooked her foot soldiers armed with expensive guns.

"It's not pretty," she said, shaking her head after a medic reported to in Cantonese. "Aside from arm, there are bigger problems. Bayan is doing what he can, but Reyes' body temperature is far too high. His accelerated healing does some wonky things to his immune system, and the worse his injuries, the more his body tries to compensate and one of the side effects is a fever. Sure, he heals fast, but there's no regulator on it and that causes more problems. What a terrible design—"
She stopped short, as she saw the look on your face. "Sorry, you just want the facts."

You nodded curtly.

"There's also swelling in his brain. Something the heightened body temperature isn't helping. We're going to have to do some very minor cranial drilling to relieve the pressure."

You forgot how to breathe. The world stopped, time hanging there, as you tried to digest it all. Gabriel was badly hurt. The hyperthermia had gotten much worse than he claimed, because he was a lying asshole who didn't want to worry you. And any kind of trauma to the brain was never a good sign. You stared helplessly ahead, because this was outside your expertise. You would charge into a booby-trapped building for Gabriel. You would fight monsters, machines, and anything in between for him. Because you had survived too many losses already. You could not lose him too.

You would drag him out, regardless of what it cost you. What were a few fingers or limbs between friends?

But you could not fix this. You weren't a doctor. You weren't a miracle worker. You couldn't do a damn thing for him. Jack would have done better. Jack would have been faster. Stronger. More capable. How were you going to face him knowing that you'd let Gabriel down? You'd let them both down. Just like Shin, and Captain Patel, and so many others...

The helplessness and the guilt were paralyzing.

"Auntie Zheng is actually qualified for the procedure. God, she was a geneticist, mob boss, and a brain surgeon. Plus she can paint, like really fucking well. It would be enough to give me a serious complex, except Mother already did that... Sorry. Sorry, I get distracted. Look, it's serious, but you've got us and we can probably handle it."

You stared at her numbly, not really listening to her nervous word vomit. But you grasped some of the words. Gabriel was in very bad shape. Zheng was a goddamn genius. On Sing had the medical technology and the skill. They were your only hope. "Save him. Please. I'll do anything."

Feng blinked, her expression warping into one of true horror. "Don't make offers like that to people like me, Lucky. Seriously, I thought you were smarter than that."

"I will do anything," you said, your tongue thick in your mouth. Because whatever On Sing asked of you, you didn't think it could be worse than living in a world without Gabriel. Worse than facing Jack, knowing you could have done more. Because you already knew that in the middle of enemy territory, you didn't have many options. Because you had to do something.

"I know," Feng said, taking your bloody hands in hers. "But we're friends. So you don't have to beg. You don't even have to ask, OK? We're friends. I got your back. So shut up about it and don't ever make me an offer like that again, you fucking idiot. Do you understand me?"

Feng glared at you, panic clear on her face. "Because I may have to take you up on it."

"I-"

"Shut up," she said fiercely and she hugged you then, her arms comfortably warm, her grip shockingly strong. "You Blackwatch agents aren't supposed to be noble," she scolded softly.

"I can't-" You shuddered. "Jack-"
"I know," Feng said, though you weren't even sure what you were trying to say. "Come on, we'll head back to Shanghai—that's the best and closest facility we have. The equipment is state of the art and the kitchens are amazing. I know you probably aren't thinking about food, but I had a fantastic dinner prepped and everything. I was really looking forward to the lamb—"

You blinked as the rest of your crew rounded the corner, Lacroix limping along, wearing a strip of bloodied silk over his wound, Ziv's face thunderous. The Shimada brothers were giving them distance, though Hanzo was carrying Isha, who looked uninjured, while the two remaining Athena drones hovered nearby.

"Come on, we need to move," Feng said, ushering you up the ramp. "I didn't exactly ask permission from the locals or even offer to pay for parking when I got here..."

The ship had a fully-equipped medical bay, and you sat outside the door waiting for news. Isha sat on your lap, her little hands gently patting your face as she made soft inquisitive sounds. You stroked her head absently, trying to calm yourself and soothe her. Diallo paced in front of you, head bowed, but she wasn't really looking at anything. Jesse leaned against the wall, lips pressed tightly together. He didn't speak.

You didn't have the focus to even try to contemplate a post-mission report. Operation Tarasque had started so well too. You'd done your best. You'd achieved most of the mission objectives. But this was never about you. And now, when the stakes were the highest, when Gabriel's life hung in the balance, there was nothing you could do.

Genji and Hanzo sat across from you, Genji fidgeting with his wrists while Hanzo cleaned his weapons. Lacroix was getting examined in a separate room, Ziv by his side. That was probably for the best; everyone was on edge and Ziv had this way of saying the most obnoxious thing at the worst time.

"Priority message coming through. Lucky, you and Jesse are the highest ranking officers on deck," Athena said. "Jesse has seniority, but you have a formal title."

You blinked. "What?"

"Chain of command technically places you as the CO, with Jesse as your second," Athena clarified. Because Gabriel and Lacroix were out of commission. You understood the procedure, you just...hadn't been thinking in that direction.

"We can take it together," Jesse said, his voice raw.

The fish torpedo hovered there waiting for you to say something.

"Yeah, OK," you said. "Where?"

"You can use the On Sing comm relay," Athena said kindly. "It's around the corner."

You got to your feet, Jesse steadying you as you wobbled down the hall. When you reached the comm screen, Captain Amari nodded grimly at you. "I'm glad to see both of you." Her tone belied no actual happiness, but you knew it wasn't personal. This mission obviously hadn't been a complete success.

"I'm not leaving him like this," you said, because if Gabriel was out of commission, even for convalescent time, Blackwatch needed you there. Gabriel...needed you there.

"What she said." Jesse crossed his arms, words taut. "We've sustained too many losses. We can't afford to be down any more peop-
"

Captain Amari grimaced and held up one hand. "Jesse, Lucky, I need you both to focus." She took a shaky breath, shutting her eyes for a moment, like that would keep you from seeing her grief. "I know emotions are running wild, but I need you to listen."

Jesse stiffened beside you.

You blinked rapidly. "Sorry, ma'am."

"There's been a change of plans. I've already asked Ms. Zhai to come straight to Zurich. We've gone over the logistics. Their facilities are cutting edge, but we have...special precautions already in place for SEP veterans. On Sing's transport is very well-equipped, Angela is already pestering me to get one of those, budget be damned, so the slightly longer travel time won't adversely affect Gabriel's...odds." She swallowed roughly. "He's strong and stubborn, and I've seen super soldiers survive worse," she said directly.

"Operation Crashhawk?" You asked, because you were supposed to disappear into Shanghai.

"Cancelled for the foreseeable future."

Jesse squeezed your arm, and you gave a sigh of relief. All right. You would be there. You would...sit with him. You would read to him, and hope he reacted better than Lao. You would make sure Blackwatch functioned. You would-

"There's more."

You blinked.

"Isn't there always?" Jesse joked, but there was no humor in his voice, only a lot of trepidation.

Captain Amari took a deep breath, and looked you straight in the eye. You felt the jolt of that connection thousands of miles away, and through it, the gravity of whatever she was about to tell you. You stood straighter, because right then you knew Captain Amari needed you to handle whatever had gone wrong, and despite your misgivings and your insecurities, that expectation grounded you.

"I am recalling all agents cleared for Shit Spiders for immediate duty. I know you're exhausted. I know some of you are injured. I know tonight has been rough, and you're all due some furlough. But you're going to have to cancel any post-mission plans."

Jesse tensed beside you.

You blinked. "What's going on?" You asked, dread building in your gut. After a fiasco like this, you should have been given some R&R, while a committee reviewed mission procedures. Because the Commander was down. Captain Amari wouldn't put you back on active duty so quickly...unless something was terribly wrong.

"Hit us," Jesse said.
You nodded, not quite able to muster his level of bravado. "What's the situation?"

Captain Amari closed her eyes, teeth gritted. She took off her hat, squeezing the beret too hard. She only spoke three words, but they shattered what was left off your world.

"Jack is missing."

Chapter End Notes

Ducks

I will try to have the next chapter up sooner. I have a few written ahead, but they are taking longer.

In other news, my area was hit hard by storms. Working overtime, just got off a boil-water advisory, and trying to adult. My wrists are now mostly affected by humidity, which I guess is a good sign? But some days are good, some days are just...ugh. Trying to stay ahead, but really had to slog these chapters out, because they're tricky and need to do them right.

Discord Link if you want to yell.
Chapter 121

Chapter Summary

What happened to Jack?

Chapter Notes

Yumii has been on an art kick with Lao and others.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

You paced in front of the hibernating comm panel, having heard Captain Amari's basic explanation three times, and still being unable to process it. Jack was supposed to be in Geneva for a meeting with politicians - Kwento was one of them. But he had never arrived. She had more information than that, enough to take some kind of action, but you had to wait to hear it in person, because of clearances and mission security. You understood the abstract reasons, but it took all your self control, and Jesse holding you back, his hands firmly squeezing your arms, to keep you from demanding answers right this fucking instant, protocol and everyone else be damned.

Anxious, verging on twitchy, you tried to breathe deep and slow, to calm yourself down. But dread warred with a sickening icy numbness in your gut. Shock would keep you from absorbing all the emotions immediately- they would hover, disembodied for at least several hours, while you tried to formulate a rational plan. But you would not be able to maintain your cool forever, you knew this from gut wrenching experience.

"I need you with me," Jesse said hoarsely. "I ain't ready to do this alone."

You stopped and looked up at him, those warm brown eyes a little too bright, his wobbling smile nowhere near convincing, his hat missing. You weren't the only one who loved Gabriel, who mourned Tataryn. You weren't the only one terrified for the safety of someone else. Jesse's loyalty to Gabriel was a quiet steady thing, and you did not doubt it.

"You're not alone," you sighed, pushing your panic back down. You would deal with the emotional fallout later. It might be a few hours, or a few days, but it was inevitable. For now, Jesse needed your help making a game plan and keeping the team together. You had a job to do, a mission to complete. You would focus on that for as long as you could. "We better brief the team that our furlough is canceled."

Jesse nodded. "Diallo might be out for medical reasons."

"Nothing we can do about that," you said, flinching as you took a breath, pain radiating from your side. "Just have to keep things running smoothly till we get back."

Jesse exhaled slowly. "Yeah, I know."

"Not much else we can do right now, except play nice with On Sing." Your mind drifted to Lacroix and the thing he and Isha had found. Best not to mention that yet. "I think our crew is reliable enough to handle the ride back."

"Yeah," Jesse said, some of the color returning to his face. "We better go update them."

Genji and Hanzo sat outside the medical bay, Isha in Genji's lap chirping rapidly at him.

A medic was setting and mending Diallo's broken arm and someone had put up On Sing's version emitter in the waiting space. It covered a domed area and it didn't look the ones Angela used, but you recognized that prickling warmth slicing its way under your skin. Hanzo and Genji looked unharmed, but Jesse was limping. Your entire midsection hurt.

Everyone looked up, their grim expressions mirroring your own.

"Looks like we have problems back home," Jesse said, nodding at each agent. "We're all back on the roster when we reach base."

"The Strike Commander is MIA," you said, and it was easier to say those words than, "Someone took Jack." Your voice didn't shake, though you felt all eyes on you, like maybe they half expected you to fall to pieces. "Captain Amari is recalling everyone cleared for Shit Spiders for active duty. We'll be briefed on arrival. So it looks like we're pulling a double."

The Shimadas each gave you a single nod of acknowledgement. Diallo glanced rapidly between you and Jesse, alarm clear on her face, but she nodded as well. They probably overhead bits and pieces already, but you appreciated the simple acceptance of your orders.

"Take the time to rest up and recharge," Jesse said. "Ain't much else we can do till we get back to base."

Hanzo's eyes flicked between Jesse and you, but he didn't offer any comments. Genji was already cleaning one of his short blades. Diallo massaged her knee, staring at the floor.

"Lucky, why don't we get you checked out? Lacroix said you took some heavy hits," Feng said, as she approached your group.

You flinched. "I'm fine."

"Uh huh," she said, obviously not believing a word of it. "Well, Isha needs a checkup too, Athena said she got kicked. Someone will need to hold her for it, and let's be honest, you're the one least likely to get mutilated. If we're going from one crisis to another, you need to be fixed up, OK?"

"...OK," you said, not fooled by her ploy, but too tired to fight about it. Her reasoning was sound. Maybe you were just being stubborn. After all, you couldn't just rest when you got back to base.

"And we can start planning. Because it looks like we've got a situation that's going to require some finesse and more importantly, lots of firepower. Hanzo, Genji, do you guys need anything?"

"I am fine," Hanzo began, very formally.

"We need to rehydrate," Genji said, rolling his eyes. "And if you have any energy bars-"

"Oh, there's food in common area. Help yourselves," Feng said, her gaze lingering on Hanzo for a second too long. She paused, frowning at Jesse. "Come on, McCree. You need to get checked out too. Bayan and Auntie are still working on getting Commander Reyes stabilized, but so far everything is going smoothly. Lucky's doing it. Lacroix's doing it. All the cool kids are getting medical exams."

You squinted at her.

Jesse sighed, running his fingers through his dusty hair. "Yeah, OK, firecracker. No need to fight dirty."

Feng beamed at him. "Firecracker?"

"Would you rather be "string bean?" Jesse asked, giving her a tired grin.

"We're at the nickname part of the relationship," she said nudging you with her elbow. "Next we'll be cattle wrangling and octopus wrassling, then eating beans and franks cooked over an open fire," she said happily.

You snorted, not missing Hanzo's heavy frown.

"Octopus wrassling?" Jesse murmured as she ushered you into a smaller exam room.

You shrugged.

"A genuine American pastime in the Pacific Northwest." Feng said cheerfully, then abruptly paused. "It might be animal cruelty now that I think about it, but I was going for the "man versus nature," down-to-earth, cowboy feel. Might have missed the mark. Sorry?"

"Ain't nothing for you to apologize for," Jesse said smoothly. "Not after that rescue. Appreciate you showing up when you did."

"That was my job," Feng said, grabbing a handheld scanner. "On Sing will provide support and emergency transportation should the need arise in exchange for technology and intel sharing, blah blah blah." She held up the scanner. "Who's on deck?"

Jesse gave you a gentle push. "Ladies first."

Holding Isha against your chest, you pointed at your raptor.

"I can do both," Feng said gesturing to an exam table. You hopped up onto it.

Isha chirped and you took a deep breath as Feng simply pushed a button, holding the device in front of her. She had you raise Isha's arms, while your raptor protested sullenly.

"Hold still, we need to make sure you're not hurt," you said.

She huffed at you, giving you, Feng, and even Jesse very dirty looks.

"It's part of the package, raptor niece," Feng said cheerfully. "You get picked up, checked out, and served an in-flight meal. We're a full-service Triad. Don't forget to leave a review!"

Isha just gave a long, slow, unimpressed blink.

Feng deflated slightly. "That is not five stars, is it?"

"I was a little surprised to see you down there," Jesse said, quickly changing the subject.
"You didn't need to come in person. Appreciate you doing so though."

Feng just shook her head. "Oh, I needed to come...for reasons." She hummed to herself, nodding as she poked and prodded an increasingly irritable Isha.

"Strains, contusions, hmmm- OK, that's not your blood. Well, raptor niece, you are vicious." Feng laughed. "She'll probably be limping tomorrow- don't be surprised if she hams it up for attention-that's what Peony does. Bayan takes it with grace, humor, and a lot of hyperventilating." Feng nodded sagely.

"Try finding out she's stowed away on your mission," you scowled.

Feng exhaled slowly. "Yeah...I bet it was panic-inducing." She shuddered. Holding up the scanner, she keyed in some new parameters and ran it over your arm. "Lucky, I realize you have to power through everything like some kind of badass, but you're pretty battered. I'd normally tell you to take a couple days off, but since you're getting treated so early on, there shouldn't be any permanent harm. Both of you should go sit by the emitter for the rest of the trip. Eat some food and drink some water. You'll both be halfway to fighting shape by the time we arrive."

Isha didn't look amused. She wiggled angrily and you put her down. She stalked to the door and made a chirruping sound, like she was hungry.

"...I think she's mad that they're eating without us," Jesse said, the realization dawning on you at the same time.

"Sounds about right," you said gesturing at the door. "Can she-?"

"Oh, yeah, go hogwild," Feng said.

The door slid open and Isha went to find the Shimadas and more importantly, food. The exit was cute, but that was promptly ruined by the reminder that Auntie Zheng was hovering there in the wires, listening to every word that you said.

"You're up. And before you ask, no, I'm not a real doctor. But I do have a lab coat somewhere if that will make you feel better."

Jesse snorted but sat down on the table. "Seems more like a mad scientist thing."

"I'm not really one of those either. I just manage several, speak the language, and occasionally blow things up for fu- Well, damn. Talk about a critical lack of self awareness." Feng laughed nervously.

Jesse raised a brow at her, eyes tired, and though he'd tried to smile, he was in the same state as you - too worn down to pretend with any conviction.

Feng looked over Jesse with the scanner, her face very serious as she focused on giving him a check up without overtly checking him out.

"You've got some hairline fractures along the right scapula and humerus, some tearing in the meniscus, and the requisite collection of sprains, strains, and contusions." She frowned at him. "You're going to need to go sit down under the emitter. Stay off that knee. I'll have someone bring you refreshments." She stepped aside and rummaged around a cupboard, grabbing a three-sectioned staff, locking the pieces together, and handed it to Jesse.

He snorted. "I'm fine-"
"You can whack Genji with it," she said.

Jesse eyed the metal staff with a wry smile. "Are you sure it's Genji you want me to whack?"

Feng laughed nervously, taking half a second to give you a questioning look.

You shrugged. You didn't know what Jesse knew about the situation, but he wasn't dumb. It didn't take a genius to pick up on the fact that there was something weird between Feng and Hanzo.

"Anyway, you and Lucky are the ranking Blackwatch officers," Feng said, quickly diverting the subject. "There is something I have to ask you about."

Jesse crossed his arms, sitting back on the exam table, staff across his lap. "I don't have the authority to renegotiate terms-" He gave you a worried look.

"Not what I'm trying to do," Feng said, holding her hands up in front of her, shaking her head. "Blood oath, remember?" She tapped her long healed palm. "I'm not about to leave Jack high and dry, no matter what my family thinks. Commander Reyes is important to Lucky and Jack, so we're giving him the best care available." She rubbed the back of her neck. "You know, I can't make any guarantees, but Auntie is pretty sure his chances are good. And I know we can keep him stabilized for the entire trip. Anyway, her "pretty sure" is better than most doctors' promises."

You took a deep breath, knowing Zheng was very competent, and still not feeling relieved. But Bayan was helping too, and you trusted him. Even if Zheng was far more skilled, Bayan was someone who would give it his all. Bayan was one of the good guys. It wasn't Zheng's merit that gave you comfort, but Bayan's character. It was a terribly irrational reassurance, but it was what you had.

"Thanks," you said, trying to look relaxed. "How's Lacroix?" You asked, because despite his condition, you were still surprised that he hadn't come out, demanding to be involved in the proceedings. But then, if he was in fighting condition, you and Jesse wouldn't be the ranking officers.

"A little delirious," Feng said, brow furrowed.

"Really?" You raised a brow. "Like "spilling delicious secrets" delirious or "imaginary bunnies" delirious?"

"The latter," Feng muttered. "Unless he normally babbles about the ecological and metaphorical significance of grunion runs."

"What?" You glanced at Jesse who shrugged.

"It's a very idiosyncratic fish spawning behavior," Feng said, swirling her fingers in a complicated pattern. "Auntie Zheng had to explain it to me. Fascinating stuff, but we don't have the time to get into it. Anyway, your grumpy hacker boy is sitting with him, chewing him out in French, Hebrew, and English. I've got him on an IV with a course of nanites, but on top of losing the eye, he's got a dislocated shoulder, some torn tendons, a broken wrist. Also he's pretty concussed, so I don't feel bad about leaving him alone in there with Agent Angry Eyebrows: he seems unfazed by it and probably won't remember the interaction anyway. Trust me, when you've been hit that hard in the head, you'll have whole chunks of missing memories. And that's not even broaching the topic of traumatic organ removal." Feng shuddered. "Also, there's no brain bleeding that we can see, but he needs to rest."

You inhaled deeply, fists clenching and unclenching slowly, because you hadn't realized that Lacroix had taken that much damage. However, he had been fighting against two cyborgs while Nguyen mutilated him; none of them had been gentle. And afterward he'd given no indication of how much pain he was in. That rat bastard, he might not have been a super soldier, but he could power his way through pain like the best of them.

"Didn't think it was that bad," Jesse murmured.

"He faked me out," you muttered, guilt starting to pool in your stomach. If you had stayed with him instead of rushing off after Tataryn, would things be different? If Tataryn hadn't been standing in the doorway when the bomb went off, would he be standing here now? There was no way to tell, and you'd drive yourself mad with your fractal speculations.

"He'll be fine, as long as your hacker boy doesn't smother him with a pillow," Feng said. "But I don't think he's in any shape to help us out." She sighed. "My people are just in as support staff. Auntie is holding firm on that. But that's less of a worry since we're heading straight back to Zurich."

Arms crossed, you tried to sound nonchalant. "So what did you want to ask?"

"Did you get it?" Feng asked. She stood straight, beetle-green armor gleaming in the lowlights. Her stance changed, her bright eyes cool and sharp, her smile losing its cheer.

You hoped your surprise didn't show on your face. You just stood there for a moment, processing. How did she-? Of course, she knew. Zheng had to be aware of it, though you didn't like Zheng's motives at all.

Jesse blinked, looking rapidly between the two of you.

"You're going to have to be more specific," you said, playing for time. "Ziv downloaded a lot of intel and we picked up some Vishkar prototypes..."

Feng nodded, shoulders relaxing. "No, no specifics yet. Judging by your response, you don't really know what I want." She gave you a wry smile. "Am I right?"

Because if you didn't know what she was talking about, she wouldn't have to ask you about it and perhaps draw you into negotiations. Negotiations that might affect Gabriel's life. Because you had a damn good idea what she was asking about, and while you trusted Feng, you didn't trust Great Aunt Zheng at all.

Jesse watched her warily. "We're just the muscle, firecracker. We don't know nothing about treasure."

That was laid on a little thick, but you'd take it.

Feng's smile widened and she waved her hand dismissively. "OK then. I guess I'll just have to wait till I see Jack." Then her smile fell as she remembered that your other lover was MIA. "Oh...shit." Then she stared down at her hands thoughtfully, clenching her fists. "No, that's exactly right. I have to wait till I see Jack." She gave you a pointed look. "He's the one I need to talk to. So, if I need to find Jack to discuss...treasure, and you need to find Jack...maybe we should pool resources?"

You stared thoughtfully at her. "Yeah, that's a good idea."
Jesse nodded. "Stick close. We know we can't ask you to fight for us, but if you gotta see Morrison for political reasons, well, we're the ones you want to be with. Since, we'll be looking for him too." Jesse's smile was wide and open, but he gave you a sly look.

"We can talk about it more later," Feng said, opening the door, determination in her eyes. "You two go heal up, rest, and eat. In whatever order. But get it done before we arrive in Zurich."

You climbed to your feet, muscles aching as you headed out to the common area, outside main medbay. Genji and Hanzo had returned, Isha perched on Genji's lap, helping herself to a meatbun off his plate. Diallo sat across from them, holding a steaming cup of tea, her gaze unfocused.

You instinctively scanned the room for Tataryn's smug face, before your throat locked up and your heart stopped for a beat. Swallowing roughly, you wobbled over to your friends and sat down. Jesse followed, plunking down beside you.

You reached over and put your hand on Diallo's arm. You didn't have words. You weren't sure what you could say, or if she blamed you, or if she even wanted company.

She sniffled and put her head on your shoulder, looking much smaller without her armor on.

"Can I-?"

"No, I'm fine. Just shutting my eyes for a few," she said hoarsely, and you looked away, knowing she didn't want to talk about it. You sat there, letting her take the comfort she needed. You weren't sure what to offer, because you were feeling the weight of your grief too.

The world was spinning too quickly.

Lacroix was down for the count. Jack was missing, details to be shared soon. Gabriel was in critical condition. And Tataryn was dead.

Individually, any of those things would be a gut punch. But all together, it was shredding you inside, nerves so on fire it was agony. Waiting was misery, a slow suffocation despite all your deep breathing, and you wanted to scream.

Jesse sat close, hip brushing against yours. You leaned in, and he put an arm around you. You didn't speak, not trusting your reactions.

"He's tough as a well-done, three-day old steak, sweetpea," Jesse murmured. "Didn't need that much blood in 'em anyway. It was just slowing him down. And Morrison is the same, only...blonder."

You gave a bark of involuntary laughter. "I'm not-"

"I know."

He peeled his serape off, a set it on your shoulders. It stunk of blood, sweat, and gunpowder, but it was warm, and more comforting than any words you could think of.

"Take a soldier's rest," he told you. "We need to be in fighting shape when we get back."

You nodded.

There was a tug on your leg and you blinked as Isha held up a half eaten meat bun, her expression grave.

"Yeah, OK," you said, taking it. "Thanks." You took a bite of the meatbun, not tasting anything.

"Where's mine?" Jesse asked with mock outrage.

"Don't get too excited," Genji said. "She stole that one from Hanzo."

Hanzo just waved his hand dismissively. "It is fine. We can get more."

Did you just get Hanzo- cooties? Oh well. You sighed, and finished the meatbun anyway.

Isha chortled and hopped onto the seat, climbing into your lap.

She snuggled up against your chest, burrowing into Jesse's serape. Diallo reached over and petted Isha, cooing softly in Wolof. Isha made a few inquiring chirrups, like she knew something was wrong, but she needed you to explain it.

You didn't have the words, so you just rubbed her chest. You wanted to promise her that this was just a temporary inconvenience. That you'd get the rest of her family back intact. That things were going to be just fine.

But you couldn't bring yourself to lie to your murderbird.

Angela was first on board, with nurses and a gurney to pick up Gabriel. Bayan went with her, both of them speaking rapidly in hushed voices as they carried him away. You only caught a glimpse of him, wrapped in bandages, hooked up to IVs and monitors. It took everything in you not to run after him, to go with them demanding answers that no one could give.

Jesse kept his arm around you, possibly because he thought you would bolt. You hugged Isha closer, because maybe she really would run after them.

Amélie and another nurse were waiting to escort a very wobbly Lacroix off the ship and probably straight to the medical center. Lacroix leaned on Ziv as they disembarked. Amélie spoke in hushed tones, her concern filtering out in taut words and white-knuckled fists. She glanced up at you, and swept past Lacroix, shaking her head as Ziv and the nurse helped him down the ramp. She made a beeline for you and you gulped, a little worried by the steel in her eyes.

"I'm sor-" You began, because you had left Lacroix alone and maybe if you hadn't antagonized Nguyen so much, she wouldn't have escalated so quickly...

"We will find Jack. Gabriel is receiving some of the best medical attention in the world. My husband is alive," Amélie said, her hands on both your shoulders. "I have always thought he would look dashing in an eye patch, and Ana and Torby have already requisitioned funds for a cybernetic replacement. Do not waste your breath apologizing. We have work to do."

"I-Yeah. OK," you said, swallowing the uncomfortable lump of words and regrets that had gotten lodged in your throat. "Thank you."

"No thanks are necessary," she said, with a toss of her head. "They have brought their war to our doorstep and now we will annihilate them. Nguyen was only the first, and her death was a long time coming." Amélie gave you a grim smile. "I must see to Gérard, but I will be on call momentarily."

She whirled, moving quickly to catch up with Lacroix and Ziv.

You exhaled slowly, straightening up. Amélie's words lit the fire in your belly. She hadn't said anything you weren't already aware of, but hearing her make those declarations, with such conviction, roused you from your fugue.

Captain Amari stood at the base of the ramp, speaking tersely with Feng. Feng just kept shrugging, a bright, eerily cheerful smile pasted firmly on her face. You got the impression they were disagreeing on something, but neither raised their voices nor made any aggressive moves. Finally, Captain Amari just waved her hand and Feng's smile got even wider.

"I need anyone who's cleared for active duty to come with me," she said, looking almost relieved to see your group. "Diallo, why don't you swing by the infirmary and get checked out. If you're in good enough shape, we could use your help."

"Ma'am." Diallo saluted. She paused and looked back at you. "I'll break the news to Min."

"Thanks," you said, mouth dry. That wasn't going to go well. But what was worse was that someone was going to have to tell Kseniya, and while that was normally a job for the Blackwatch commander-

You gritted your teeth. Now was not the time to worry about that. You needed to focus on the urgent tasks at hand. You would deal with the other problems when you had time.

"I'll brief you in the Blackwatch conference room," Captain Amari said, exhaustion lining her face, but she walked tall, coat flaring behind her as she led the way. Feng walked beside her, swinging her arms too quickly, trying to look carefree and childish. You didn't think anyone present was fooled, but it didn't matter.

You strode forward, still wearing Jesse's serape, Isha bundled against your chest. "You gonna give that back?" Jesse asked, falling in beside you, still holding the staff as support. The Shimadas followed

"Maybe," you said, eyes on Captain Amari.

"It looks better on her," Genji said, under his breath.

Jesse sputtered and you sighed, unwrapping the warm length of fabric and handing it back to him. Isha grumbled, but didn't make a scene.

Genji just surged ahead of everyone, holding open the conference room door for Captain Amari and pretending like he had manners.

Your group filed in, no one sitting down in the chairs, though Feng perched on the table, kicking her legs rapidly. You leaned against the table, Jesse at your side. The Shimadas hovered with their backs to the wall, giving each other pointed looks. Captain Amari shut the door and took off her hat.

"I'm sorry about Fedor," she said, looking you each in the eyes. "He was a good agent and a charming friend, and we are poorer for his loss."

You rubbed the back of your neck, feeling guilty because you wanted her to just hurry up and tell you what happened to Jack. Because if you shed any more tears for any reason, you just might not be able to stop. And that wouldn't help anyone, least of all Jack.

"Jack departed Zurich four hours ago. He was accompanied by Epsilon Squad," Captain Amari said abruptly, standing at the head of the table. "They took a small shuttle transport to Geneva - the trip should have been an hour tops. They never arrived."

You tapped your fingers against the tabletop, teeth clenched.

"Athena was able to pinpoint the last GPS location, before her connection to them was cut. It took less than twenty minutes to re-connect and locate the vehicle. Within the hour, we found the burning wreckage, via satellite footage, and dispatched Torby and a crew to investigate. The ship didn't crash," she said, arms crossed. "It looks like they landed because of technical issues and were ambushed. We've recovered several bodies, but Jack's is not among them. We're still in the process of...identifying the remains, but none them are tall enough to be him. We know that Petras has been fixated on Jack, and in all likelihood, if this is Petras' gambit, Jack is still alive."

You exhaled slowly. You were on a time crunch then. You doubted this was some kind of ransom. Whoever took Jack would be focused on securing his cooperation, and once they realized they could not, they would not simply release him. And you couldn't afford to think about the things they would do to break him. Because for a moment, you saw him there, chained down, some faceless cyborg cutting- Enough. This helped no one. You needed to find him fast.

"This is not common knowledge. Obviously, we assume that someone on the inside gave Jack's routes and travel times to the enemy. I've re-tasked several of the logistics people who had prior knowledge of Jack's itinerary. Athena is keeping an eye on them. But there are too many suspects. It would help if we had a way to narrow the focus."

You blinked. "Lacroix-"

"Is secretive, concussed, and out of commission," Captain Amari said, with a scowl. "I know he has a list, but he swore up and down that it was a work in progress and not comprehensive enough to share."

You blinked. "Oh."

"Not to mention, I don't have access to it. Neither does Amélie, we already tried," Captain Amari sighed.

You blinked, a little shocked that he'd kept it from Amélie.

"Athena confirms that there is a file, but while her encryptions help protect it, Gérard apparently took specific security measures that she can't violate. She couldn't give me the details only that he set up contingencies, and that there was already the person designated to handle the situation was still available."

You blinked. "Is Athena on deck?"

"Not in here," Captain Amari said. "Gabriel hasn't lifted the ban-"

There was a knock at the door.

Genji kicked off the wall and stalked to the door.

"What?" He asked.
A thin blonde man in an expensive suit cleared his throat. "I'm looking for Captain Amari. It is high priority business," he said apologetically, not even batting an eye at Genji's unfriendly face and robotic limbs.

"We're in a meeting," Genji said, starting to close the door.

"I was sent to find her and request a personal briefing. No one else in the chain of command is picking up our calls and we have a Code Blue."

A Code Blue? Your head snapped up, and you recognized him then - Sigmund Mayer, the UN Secretary General's personal assistant. Because only someone important could deliver that bombshell. A Code Blue meant an imminent, large-scale, Omnic invasion.

"What?" Captain Amari was at the door. "Are you certain?"

"The Security Council has already declared it such. I know the breach of protocol is unusual, but we have been keeping a close eye on certain areas, and the situation has worsened drastically in the past hour," the man said. "There's also been a demand for the original Overwatch Strike Force to oversee the situation. Certain political factions within the UN have already been making promises to that effect."

"They did what?" Captain Amari snarled. "Before we were even notified-"

And before your "own" techs had made the report. Fury curled in your gut. Overwatch had people to monitor situations and make those predictions. A civilian authority calling it in first wasn't just a breach of protocol, it was a massive intelligence failure on Overwatch's part.

Except, of course, it wasn't incompetence that caused this failure.

"Ma'am, I was sent to assure you that this was not the intention of the Secretary General, and that he has been briefed on the...complexities of your situation by Undersecretary Kwento." Mayer squirmed just a little under Captain Amari's harsh gaze. "Politics aside, the Code Blue is real and can be verified by your own-"

"Let me guess," Hanzo said. "It is in the Mediterranean."

Mayer blinked. "Yes, it is. How did you-"

Hanzo cursed under his breath.

Genji raised a brow. "Give us one moment to wrap up. Captain Amari will be out to handle things in a few minutes."

Mayer started to protest, but all of you glared at him, your collective expressions, and the danger they represented, silencing him. "I- Of course, you all understand the severity of the situation. My apologies. I will...wait out here."

Genji shut the door in Mayer's face. "I recognize that look. You have an idea." Genji said to Hanzo. "My brother has always had a mind for strategy." He looked directly at Captain Amari. "Sometimes he is shockingly insightful."

"Only about tactics," Hanzo said, modestly. "Rarely about people."

Feng leaned forward, eyes on Hanzo. But he was looking at Captain Amari.
"Go on," Captain Amari said, head inclined to the side.

"I had misgivings about how things transpired in Hanoi," Hanzo said. "It was a challenging mission, I am not demeaning anyone's efforts or suffering. But Nguyen was not at full strength, her lack of preparation was uncharacteristic, and I would argue Vishkar's presence did more to sabotage her than anything else."

Captain Amari narrowed her eyes. "I see." She looked around the room. "Thoughts?"

"Parts of it were too easy," Genji agreed.

"Their forces weren't working well together," Jesse said.

"But she was expecting us, and they should have been better prepared. She did make a point to criticize her "allies" for their lack of helpfulness. She knew they were sacrificing her," you said, replaying those last few moments while she bled out on the floor.

"All right," Captain Amari nodded. "Continue."

"There is a gap in the strategy. Nguyen was a feint, bait to draw out Blackwatch and other important agents, while Talon went after the Strike Commander. And this "Code Blue" is too conveniently timed."

"It's funny how we've redefined the word "convenient" in this line of work," Jesse muttered.

"Prince let slip that Petras had proxy contacts possibly exacerbating the Mediterranean situation," Captain Amari said, her words clipped and radiating fury. "This is to ensure we cannot go after Jack."

"Yes, but there is more," Hanzo said, shaking his head. "Nguyen was the bait. The Strike Commander was a priority target. Eliminating the current Overwatch leadership also seems to be priority. You are still too popular to demote, and they must take more extreme measures. So what do you think will happen when you leave to fight the omnis?"

A majority of Overwatch forces would go to the Mediterranean. A smaller strike team would be sent after Jack. And Gabriel and Lacroix were both laid up in the medbay, vulnerable targets to treachery.

"They'll stage another attack on HQ," Captain Amari said, then started cursing under her breath in Arabic. She stood there, glowering at the table, while the rest of you waited for her to tell you what to do. You never envied leadership less than you did in that moment.

"I don't want it to become public knowledge that both Jack and Gabriel are out of commission. We don't need to invite more trouble yet," Captain Amari said after a minute. "Reinhardt, Torby, and myself with have to answer the Code Blue. It may take more people, but we'll be severely handicapped without Jack or Gabriel. I don't think any of our newer units can fulfill the same roles." She looked at you. "We'll need a team to retrieve Jack. I wish I could give you more people, but it looks like things are even more dire than I thought."

"Ma'am," you saluted. "I'd go by myself if you didn't agree to send me."

Captain Amari shook her head, smiling. "What have I said about being blatant in your insubordination?"
"Sorry," you said, not very convincingly.

She didn't call you on it. Instead she turned her attention to Jesse. "I need someone I trust to coordinate defenses here. You're the most experienced in operational logistics."

You blinked, a little surprised. Mostly because you'd been counting on Jesse as your backup.

"Genji, Hanzo, I will be requisitioning you for active duty. I know Hanzo hasn't yet received the proper gear but-"

"Wait," you said, because you needed more people, not less. "I might be able to get us some more people, trustworthy ones familiar with Overwatch squad tactics."

Captain Amari raised her head, probably realizing whom you were talking about. "You think so? All right. I will go handle the politicians and marshal our forces. Athena should be able to provide you with up-to-date information on what our forensic techs have found. Check back with me in an hour. Genji and Hanzo, if you could continue to support Lucky and Jesse for the time being. Dismissed." She saluted and was out the door, briskly walking with a still shaken Mayer.

"Can I borrow our ninjas to inspect the medical center defenses?" Jesse asked. He gave Hanzo a wry smile. "Might need a few recommendations from you."

"Of course," Hanzo said with swift nod.

"Yeah. I've got some calls to make," you said. "Give me half an hour and I'll join you."

Jesse and the Shimada brothers headed out, speaking rapidly amongst themselves.

"Well," Feng said, uncrossing her arms. "It looks like you really need some help. What can I do? And keep in mind, I can't send On Sing into direct combat. Not without approval from the family, and to be honest, I don't know if I can get that soon enough for it to be worth anything."

"We're going to need some transports," you said. "Fast ones."

"On it," Feng said, already moving.

You tried to put Isha in your room, knowing she had to be tired, but she dug her claws in, sticking to your chest. You decided that you didn't mind her company for this. You would put her to bed after. Then you stopped at Lacroix's office. It was too quiet, the lights off, no sardonic Frenchman sneaking cigarettes and brandy while he did his work. You stared at his empty chair for a moment, keenly feeling the loss, and realizing then that that seat was almost impossible to fill. It was a good thing that he was still alive. Shaking your head, you turned on the light.

"Athena, access file Revenant Gun, under clearance Ultramarine, Priority Degas."

"It is unlocked and has been forwarded to you. There is also a personal letter addressed to you."

You sat in your customary chair, setting Isha down and got your tablet out. Taking a deep breath, you opened up the letter first:

_Chanceux, if you are reading this, times must be dire indeed. Here you are running about_ unsupervised while I take an involuntary sabbatical. I survived whatever the mission threw at me. But will I survive your handling of affairs? It is a worrying thought indeed. But as I always say in times of extreme duress, "la difficulté attire l'homme de caractère, car c'est en l'étreignant qu'il se réalise lui-même." You should consider it. Athena in particular would appreciate that quote, should the need arise.

You took a moment to read that, because in your memory, he never said any such thing. It was probably a quote, one lost on you that he put in there just to be aggravating. And what was he saying about "dire times?" He was the one who decided who gained access to his list. He was the one set this up. If you were so incompetent, why did he give you sole access to-

It hit you then, like a slap in the face, and you set the tablet down, staring at the empty seat.

Lacroix was all about deception, saying one thing, meaning another. His manipulations were often complex, with feints, misdirects, and all kinds of mindfucking trickery. He wasn't a man who regularly came out and volunteered an honest answer, not without carefully applied pressure or an ulterior motive.

You sat there for a long moment, reevaluating your relationship with the spymaster. How many times had he quietly been on your side, gently mocking you while he took up your cause? You could think of several missions where a traditional CO would have severely disciplined you. Lacroix did let you get away with a lot. How many times had he actually thrown you under the bus or screwed you over? You couldn't think of anything besides that initial intake interrogation, and to be honest, that wasn't quite the same. And there in Nguyen's quarters, he'd made sure the attention was on him, not you, because Nguyen had no reason to keep you alive from the get-go. She had unfinished business with Lacroix, you were entirely unnecessary.

Amélie had told you that Lacroix trusted you, that he liked you. You had automatically dismissed that as politeness. But when had Amélie ever lied to you like that? She was your friend. If her husband actually disliked you, she would have simply said something like, "why does it matter to you what he thinks?"

Of course, Lacroix's subterfuge and constant misdirection weren't exactly healthy traits, but knowing his years in espionage and having gained a glimpse of his background, you sort of understood him. No, you understood him all too well. Affection would be viewed as weakness. Denial was in everyone's best interest. It was safest to keep some things secret, as he'd tried, vainly, to do with his "split" with Amélie. But after all this time, you understood. Lacroix really did see himself as your mentor, and as he'd flat out said before, he didn't waste time on useless people. You now truly understood that what he said, and what he actually meant could only be judged by what he had done, and for as long as you'd worked with him, Lacroix had never done wrong by you. You went back to reading the letter, a little shaken by this epiphany, and a little heartsick that it had taken such extreme measures to make you realize this truth.

This list is not as comprehensive as I wish. I have marked several people I would rather leave in place to watch their behavior, contacts, etc. I have also highlighted those in critical roles that should be replaced if warranted. I understand these designations are not mutually exclusive, and am leaving it up to your judgment. You understand the ramifications.

Expose someone too early, and you lost the investigative thread. You didn't know whom they were in contact with, what they were doing, and perhaps you'd warned off their compatriots. Leave someone in place for too long, and they could turn around and sabotage you. It was a hard choice.
Obviously, we cannot trust our civilian leadership, and I would once more remind you the value of your carefully cultivated alliances.

I am sure you have many questions. We shall speak more after the ordeal is over. Consider this your final exam. I will judge your performance accordingly. Your death qualifies as an automatic failure. Do try not to embarrass yourself.

Fond regards,

Gérard Lacroix

"Fond regards?" You shook your head. You couldn't tell if that was the cherry on top of his smarmy insults or an honest declaration of affection: it was probably both. Lacroix had mastered doublespeak. You brought up the list, which was could be sorted by department, rank, and name. There were at least twenty people who occupied mission-critical positions.

You skimmed through, picking out two people in the medical ward, asking Athena to check if they were on duty, and then reassign them to the field. They didn't have to go anywhere dangerous, you just needed them far away from Gabriel and Lacroix so no "accidents" occurred.

The InSec personnel were a trickier placement. As were the active duty agents and operations support staff. You couldn't just send everyone home. You needed a job to put some of them on, something that wouldn't arouse suspicion. You'd have to get Jesse and Captain Amari to help with this. You thought about directly-sharing the list, but then, Lacroix had avoided that, despite the inconvenience. He had to have a reason...

And that weird little comment about Athena "appreciating a quote." You sat there for a moment.

You would worry about that later. You would need to have a follow up strategy meeting soon. You would present the data then. Picking up your tablet, you gestured for Isha to follow as you exited Lacroix's office, ready to start the next part.

As you shut off the lights, you realized that Lacroix had written you a letter based on the circumstances that he was temporarily out of commission. You tried not to think about the letter you would have received if he had not survived.

"We have the Morrisons on lockdown," Chang told you over the screen, her expression severe. "There'd been some unsavory traffic through here recently, so we upped the alert. We've moved everyone to a secure location." She didn't give any specifics.

Captain Amari had already put both everyone's families on heightened security alerts. It was a good precaution to take, but you weren't calling about that.

"Any word on Jack?" Chang asked grimly, like she was wondering if she'd have to take off work for another funeral. You flinched at that. Yes, there were more funerals in the future, but it did you no good to think that way, not while you still had work to do.

You exhaled. "MIA, probably still alive. But we've been hit by a Code Blue and we're expecting a "surprise" assault on HQ when the main Overwatch team heads for Greece."

Chang gritted her teeth. "I can't leave my post, Strike. There aren't a lot of squads we can trust unconditionally, and I'm not leaving the Morrisons unguarded. Jack and I had this talk. I made him a promise." She gave you bitter smile. "I keep my promises."

"No, you stay put." You shook your head, holding your hands up. "Jack trusts you with his family and we don't want Talon getting any leverage on him." You were grateful that you didn't have to play politics with Chang. You could just tell her straight out what you wanted. "But we could use some SEP backup, if there's anyone you'd recommend. On Sing can handle transport. We just need more trustworthy bodies. Maybe someone who's familiar with Overwatch Squad dynamics and tactics, to back up Captain Amari in the field."

Chang nodded curtly, and if she was surprised by your request, it didn't show. "That I can do. I'll call in Leah, Lucy, and Andre. I don't know if they'll come, but they're the only ones left that I'd trust. Blue too, I guess, but I don't know if you need a mouthy pilot. Maybe he can read them his poetry or something." Chang gave a snort of disgust.

"I'll take all the help I can get."

"I'll ping them, let them know the deal. I'll get back with you soon."

"Thanks, Chang," you said.

"Find him, Strike," she said stone-faced, and cut the connection.

Shaking your head, you called General Singh, Senator Armstrong, and the rest of Lacroix's allies, warning them that something big had happened, and to be on their guard. The general and the senator got more information, because maybe they'd be able to help out. The general couldn't send forces to back you up, not without attracting the wrong kind of attention, but he was going to send a "visiting delegation" as soon as possible, and that list just happened to include Captain Vashtai DeVevo and a certain Lieutenant Salazar.

But it was Senator Armstrong who provided the most valuable intel. With the help of a certain red-headed FBI agent and some other underappreciated government workers, they'd done a full investigation of the Petras family's holdings, sorting through shell companies, trusts, and other blinds. You needed to poach their forensic accountant, because they'd gotten stuff you certainly didn't have. The Petras' family owned land and facilities all over the world. Jack could be anywhere. And you had no confirmation that it was Petras behind the abduction. Sure, he was your number one suspect, but you had no evidence, and you knew better than to go in half-cocked. You needed some kind of confirmation before you threw all your resources at him.

You forwarded that information to Genji and Hanzo, because both of them were better with the money angle.

Chang called you back minutes later.

"They're all in," she said. "Here are their respective coordinates."

"Thanks," you said.

"I've got to go," Chang said, eyes narrowing as she stared at something off screen. "Something's tripped the alarms."

"Take care of yourself," you said.

"The Morrisons come first," she said, and the screen went black.
Well, last chapter generated some...responses. ducks

Posted a hurt/comfort headcanon on the tumblr to cheer people up. I mean, you know. Posted on Discord first. Here’s another invite, if you're interested.

Wrist have been rough all week. This was later than I intended. Am trying to switch my internal schedule around. Going to bed earlier and trying to get up earlier (before work) to edit. It's a slow transition, but I'm working on it.
Chapter 122

Chapter Summary

You have to keep moving forward.

Chapter Notes

So I'm not there yet, but the story is going to be over one million words. facepalm

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"There's ongoing cleanup from a Los Muertos op in Mexico," Captain Amari said. "We can send some of them through a few provinces. There's another omnic situation brewing around Buenos Aires. We can reassign the rest of them there - none of those missions look to be overtly related to Talon, so hopefully they won't botch them." Captain Amari shook her head. "I still don't like sending them to places where they can do more damage, Lucky."

"These are deep cover agents. They'll be more tempted to do harm here if there's a coup. If they're working on something unrelated, fucking it up will just risk their cover." You shrugged. "But if you can come up with a snipe hunt, that would work too."

Captain Amari shook her head. There was no time to make up a convincing fake op. "Jesse, you sort the ones in InSec, since you'll be here. Lucky if you have special recommendations for any specific agents, get them to me soon. Otherwise, I'm sending them all out."

Unspoken was the fact that she didn't have time to review your choices and that she would greenlight them all, simply out of desperation. So it came down to you, with Captain Amari trusting you to make the right decision. Except you didn't have time to check on every single one. Exhaling slowly, you decided to hand off the ones in Overwatch support roles to Genji. He was a sneaky bastard and would be good at assessing how much sabotage they could commit around the base. You would reassign the more dangerous active agents to distant locations and give Athena and Jesse a truncated list to cross-reference in the event of one of them going AWOL.

"I can come up with some busywork for InSec. Do you have anything you want done?" Jesse asked.

"Whatever you think best. Sorry, I'm short on time," Captain Amari scowled, looking between your dossiers and the map on the screen. "The forces from that underwater omnium are massing for strike. You might have to come dig us out of a cave when this is over."

You and Jesse both flinched.

"I apologize," Captain Amari sighed after an awkward minute. "I should not have said that."
This whole situation has me too keyed up."

"We would come dig you out of any cave at any time," Jesse said, recovering faster than you, his words smooth and easy. You nodded in agreement. "But I don't know if any of us could lift Reinhardt out..."

"And what if he's claustrophobic?" You asked with a straight face, even as you imagined what Reinhardt looked like when he panicked. It was somewhere between comical and terrifying.

Captain Amari shook her head, smiling faintly. "You two." She left off the "idiots" part, but you imagined it was a fondly-spoken epithet.

"I think we might be better off moving Winston to the infirmary to help Angela with some "tech" issues," Jesse said, all business again. "And you can't take Angela."

"Maybe Zenyatta," you said.

"We can ask. I don't know if he's adequately equipped to go into such a heavy combat situation," Captain Amari said, sidestepping questions of whether or not Zenyatta would fight. "But with the additional SEP veterans, I think we can afford to leave Jesse and Genji here to defend the base."

You started to protest, because you needed either one of them to help you plan the rescue mission.

"Hanzo has the same, if not greater experience than Genji, in offensive and stealth tactics," Captain Amari said firmly. "But he does not have Genji's familiarity with Overwatch defenses and protocol." Nor had he earned her trust.

"OK," you said, because she was right, and because you could trust Hanzo on combat missions. "I guess I have Feng."

"Yes," Captain Amari said, hesitantly, like she didn't quite approve of your Triad friend coming along. "I'd also recommend taking a tech, a heavy, and a sniper."

"I don't know if Ziv can do this mission," you said, instead of "I don't know if I can put Ziv at risk on this mission because I'm already emotionally strung out." You kept your face blank. "Riggs isn't any good in combat either."

"Your friend Lao-" Jesse began.

"Absolutely not!" You snapped. What was he thinking? You gave him a dirty look. "She's still healing-"

"Torby has been working with her with lightweight exo-armor and she has made substantial progress in the past two weeks. I recommend that you at least talk to Agent Lao," Captain Amari said in measured tones. "If not, Agent Mihret is your best bet. Normally I would agree that Athena is your best go-to, but whatever tech they used untethered her, so you should not rely on her as your only means of cyber support."

There was a knock at the door.

"It's Feng," Athena announced.

"Let her in," Captain Amari said, looking over the map.
Feng strode in, still wearing that deep green armor, now eating a meatbun. She set a large carryout box on the table. "It's halal," she told Captain Amari. "One of my chefs is a Uighur. He makes amazing cumin lamb and beautiful traditional hats. That's what I was going to have for dinner tonight - the lamb, not the hats," she sighed wistfully. "But reheated meatbuns are good too." She took another bite for emphasis.

Jesse reached over and swiped one, hurriedly eating it as he continued looking over some diagrams. "Update?" He asked her, without looking up.

"Again, satellite isn't showing anything suspicious. There's no overt assault on the Morrison homestead, but that's a lot of land, and as paranoid as she is, Chang has several perimeters of defenses set up." Feng shrugged.

"Chang's paranoid, and rightfully so," Jesse scanned a screen. "They've gone radio silent, which makes sense if they're hunkering down. They've got a full-on underground bunker, Lucky. They can hold out till reinforcements get there."

You gritted your teeth. Chang's lack of contact bothered you. It could mean nothing, it could mean everything.

"I sent some trustworthy people, On Sing and...others," Feng said hesitantly. "They're equipped for heavy combat. But I can only get away with that because of the blood oath. They'll backup the homestead, and they'll check in on Jane and her family."

"Thanks," you said. Because trusted agents were in short supply, and your people were already stretched too thin. You didn't want to risk sending turncoats to the Morrisons' doorstep.

"Hey, they're my blood-oath siblings too," Feng said, expression serious. "And I've also got three vehicles with your super soldiers inbound. I've passed the ID codes on to your air traffic control - they're dummy transport numbers for meat delivery vehicles, so as not to draw too much attention from your fifth column. But they should all be here in less than an hour."

"Thank you," Captain Amari said, but she didn't take a meatbun or comment on On Sing's cover story.

"Blood oath and minimal effort on my part," Feng sang, waving her hand. "But you're welcome!"

"Feng are you more of a sniper or-" Jesse began.

Feng slapped her arm against her chest plate, the metal ringing under her gauntlets. "I can arm wrestle an OR-14 in this and win. Plus I've got some of those new hard light shields. So I can take some hits. Quite a few actually."

"Diallo's not cleared for combat, but she wants to help defend the infirmary," Captain Amari said. "She's getting supplies from Agent Vo."

"And by "supplies," she means "explosives," Jesse said. "Angela isn't going to like that."

"Let Genji tell her," you said, so only Jesse could hear.

He snorted, giving you a wry look.

"I can leave some of my better-equipped people in the infirmary. They can't go on combat runs, but if they or their allies are attacked, well, they'll have to defend themselves," Feng said cheerfully.

"And your aunt?" Captain Amari asked.

"She's boosting Athena. Not a fan of us getting into the fight, but she won't hang us out to dry," Feng said, surprisingly unoffended by the implication. She took another meatbun. "Sorry, need to carb load if I'm going to do this right. Genji shared some of the Petras holdings data with Auntie and she and Athena are narrowing it down to a dozen or so potential locations and cross-referencing it with Hanzo's actuarial predictions. He's really good at numbers," she said to no one in particular.

"Torby and Reinhardt should be back soon with their findings," Captain Amari said. "I have some more details to hammer out on our Code Blue. It's been given the designation Operation Morpheus." She rolled her eyes and muttered something about armchair generals who thought they were clever. "Jesse, you're in charge of Operation Pelennor. Lucky, you've got Operation Checquy. I've forwarded all relevant information in my possession to each of you. I need to go finish preparations for our departure, so if you have any questions, ask them now."

You glanced at Jesse.

He stared at his tablet for a moment, and then raised his head. The raw look on his face made you flinch. "Be careful out there, ma'am. We're down Morrison and the boss. We can't afford to lose you too."

Captain Amari smiled faintly at him. "You be careful here, Jesse. You're not the least bit replaceable either. Don't worry about me. At least out there, I know who my enemies are." She smiled wryly at you. "Do what you have to do, Lucky. But you come back to us alive. That's an order, from your Captain."

"Ma'am," you said, straightening up involuntarily, because apparently she was just going to call you out like that.

"I know you already have your hands full, but perhaps you should gather some of Gabriel's personal effects for him before you go." Captain Amari stared off to the side. "I don't think he would want anyone else in his quarters."

"Yeah, of course. Should have thought of that myself," you said, voice awfully reedy. It was good that he had a friend like her.

"And Amélie has already taken the initiative to isolate and question Ainsley Petras, since she is a flight risk. You'll want to swing by the interrogation rooms later: I believe Amélie was going to let her sweat for awhile."

You blinked. "But she doesn't know anything." You paused, reflecting on all of your prior suspicions. "Probably."

Captain Amari shrugged. "Amélie is just being thorough."

"No, that's fine. Ainsley can be useful occasionally," you said, tone humorless. But you were grateful that Amélie was overseeing the details you'd overlooked. "I'll get these new orders processed. Let me know when Torby and the techs get back."

Captain Amari nodded. "Of course."
You'd been by yourself in your lovers' quarters on numerous occasions, often crawling into bed to pass out and then wake up when they returned. Except this time, neither Gabriel nor Jack were going to walk through that door, chatting cheerfully while they undressed and climbed into bed with you.

That realization made your knees buckle as you headed down the hall to Gabriel's quarters. You gripped the door frame, steadied yourself, and then staggered inside. Taking deep breaths, you closed your eyes, the world spinning too quickly. The room smelled like him, a soothing mixture of his cologne, gun oil, and soap. He'd left it neat - always did before going on an op, but it still felt like he should be walking out of the bathroom brushing his teeth, or humming to himself at the kitchenette while making coffee or a meal.

But he wasn't going to. Not today. Maybe not ever again.

You had to sit down on the floor for a minute, nearly landing on a pair of Jack's boots. Staring at them - they lay sideways on the floor, laces still tied because he just kicked them off- you blinked rapidly, now hyperventilating as you tried not to think about how everything had gone horribly wrong.

Jack was missing, probably in hostile custody, his situation dire.

Gabriel was still in surgery, his condition just as critical.

And you were here, unable to take any direct action, to offer any help when they needed you most.

Shaking, you squeezed your eyes shut, keening into your sleeve. You bit down on the fabric, trying to muffle your cries. Misery wound through your chest, radiating outward, splintering bone, ripping through your stomach, and fracturing everything inside you. You just wanted to crawl into his bed, curl up under the covers, and cry till your heart stopped hurting. You'd briefly forgotten that one could feel grief so strong that it physically hurt.

You cried it out, because you couldn't hold it in any more and you couldn't carry it around forever. You had to release some of that pressure. It felt like an eternity, though when you looked up at the clock, it had only been a few minutes. You knew there was more grief inside you, that this was just the tip of the iceberg, but you wiped your eyes, and you picked yourself up off the floor. Your hiccups gradually slowed into calmer breaths, and you stood there a little embarrassed, a little hollow, definitely raw, but still functional despite the tearstains.

Crying wouldn't save anyone, and you felt winced at your own self indulgence. No, that wasn't right. Your therapist would reprimand you for being too harsh on yourself. Because this wasn't your solution to the problem, this wasn't you rolling over and giving up. This was you taking a moment to clear your head, to grapple with your pain in private. And now that you'd blown off some steam, you could get back up and face the world.

Wrung out, but no longer shaking, you got to work. Gabriel had a go-bag already packed, but you grabbed one of Jack's t-shirts out of his drawer, clutching the soft worn cotton tightly between your fingers. It smelled like both of them, and you exhaled slowly, trying not to sink under another swell of emotions.

Nguyen was finally dead, and standing there alone in Gabriel's bedroom, you found that that thought brought you no comfort, that loss was always more powerful than revenge. Revenge was a goddamn consolation prize, not worth your life or the lives of your loved ones.

You stiffly went to the bathroom, turned on the sink, and splashed cold water in your face. You smelled like smoke and death. You needed a shower, to scrape the filth and blood off of you. It would clear your head more, and disguise the fact you'd been crying. You had clean clothes stashed here too. There weren't any towels hanging up, so you opened up the cabinet behind the door and fumbled with the neat stacks of linens.

You were not expecting the little velvet boxes that tumbled onto the floor. One popped open, a fiery black opal ring inside.

For a moment, you wondered how Isha had concealed and carried all three of those boxes on her own. She could be sneaky, but three separate boxes seemed like too much work for one little raptor- And then you sat down on the bathroom floor, one hand over your mouth as you realized how fucking dense you were.

With shaking hands, you picked up each box. They each contained ornate rings set with a large black opal. There was a gold ring, the spherical gem bluer than the rest with small diamonds orbiting it. The second box contained a platinum band, decorated simply with a massive greener-tinged opal. Both bands were too big for you. The third ring was made of omnium - like your fingers - and the cabochon held in a spiral, with more opal inlay on the sides. You didn't need to ask which ring was for whom. It was obvious.

Your first anniversary was coming up. Gabriel would be that goddamn prepared a month in advance, getting everyone matching, expensive, fucking ostentatious rings.

Choking on air and things less tangible, you shoved the boxes back into the cabinet. Fire tore through your chest as you climbed to your feet. You were going to celebrate that damn anniversary with them both. But you couldn't do that from here.

You did not have time for regrets or recriminations. You had to find Jack. Kill your enemies. And get back in time to read to Gabriel, to sit with him so even in his induced coma, he would know, on some level, that he wasn't alone. You'd pick a book off his bookshelf when you got back.

But first, you would get a shower. You would change clothes. Maybe get some food to recharge afterward. And then you would go out and face the world, ready to seize it by the throat and squeeze.

Diallo sat casually in the waiting area, pretending to sleepily read her tablet as she watched everyone who entered and exited the medical center. You exchanged nods as you passed, not missing the half a dozen On Sing personnel who had discretely set up camp in one of the exam rooms.

Genji lurked further in, standing by the door to the operating theater. Neither Angela nor Bayan were in sight.

"They're still working," Genji said without prompting. "The transfusion deliveries have slowed. Bayan and Angela are bickering over tissue regeneration methods."

You nodded absently, not entirely sure what that entailed.
"It's a good sign," Genji added.

"We could use more of those," you said.

"Ziv and Winston have set up on the other side," Genji said. He stared off in that direction. You'd never seen Winston fight, but you had a healthy respect for the baseline strength of apes.

"Give Ziv some drones and portable turrets and he'll be fine. Is Winston just modifying the defenses or-?"

"He'll stay here and provide whatever support he can, tech or combat." Genji paused. "But Lacroix is out cold. His input would have been helpful."

You caught a tinge of concern in Genji's tone. Like he was only slightly disappointed that it had rained today or that you'd bought baklava instead of peach mochi. It still spoke volumes. "Figures," you said. "I'm going to give him such shit for this." You tried to look nonchalant.

"Is that for the Commander?" Genji asked, gesturing to the bag.

"Yeah, some of his personal stuff. For when he wakes up," you said, choosing the words very carefully.

"I will keep Ziv from trying on his clothes." Genji took the bag from you.

"Ziv's more likely to draw penises on his face, in permanent marker," you muttered.

Genji nodded, eyes darting between you and the operating theater door. "Did you need to go in?"

You swallowed, shaking your head as you recalled the OR sanitation protocols. "I'd have to get scrubbed down, and changed, and we don't have time for that. I'll just check in before I go-"

Genji placed one hand on your shoulder. "I was in worse condition when they brought me here, and Angela still..." He stopped, averting his eyes. "She's handled more severe cases than this. I promise."

You blinked rapidly, averting your eyes, because Genji didn't like to talk about...before. Because he was obviously trying to help. Because it was working.

You inhaled deeply. "I see. But I'm still worried," you said weakly. "Because now, despite all of Angela's hard work, you're a real shit."

Genji snorted, lips twitching. "I suppose that I must tell you something that is fairly confidential. Your discretion is required."

"If you're going to say what I think you're going to say, I have to admit, it's not really a secret. We all kind of suspected that you have always been a shit."

Genji patted your head. "Yes, I suppose that's true. I have always been a monumental shit, just ask my brother. But more importantly, so has the Commander. And he is the biggest, meanest, most temperamental shit of them all." Genji's eyes were bright and he looked back at the doorway, gaze losing focus. "He was there too, of course. After I...left my family." Genji said the words with the barest hiccup. "I hated him at first. He was merciless, goading me with barbs and taunts, making me just angry enough to keep going, simply to spite him. And then he started bringing me sweets when I made progress, like I was still a child... He denied it, claimed Angela must have brought them in and forgotten about them. When pressed, he scoffed, claiming that he didn't have time to coddle "grown-ass men." But I knew."

"That...sounds like something he'd do," you said softly. He'd been a little gentler with you when you first arrived in Blackwatch, but your damage had been different than Genji's.

Genji turned back around to face you. "We're too stubborn and vicious to give up in the face of death. You know what that is like. We will not waste this chance. So do what you must to get Morrison back. We'll keep the Commander safe in the interim."

You walked briskly through the halls back to the Blackwatch conference room. Torby was back. You opened the door, a little surprised to see Reinhardt sitting at the table, his expression thunderous. It was disconcerting to see that much rage in place of his sunny warmth. You almost took a step backward, but then he looked up, and the anger dropped away, replaced with a wobbling lower lip and frantic blinking.

"Lucky!" He was up and in two strides he was in front of you, the lights suddenly dimmer. Without warning, he threw his arms around you, all that muscle trapping you as he bent over, squeezing you tight. He was speaking rapidly, in German you thought, but all you could focus on was the gentle creaking of your bones and the air slowly being pushed out of your body...

"Reinhardt, we need to brief her," Captain Amari said, her voice muffled by his bulk.

Suddenly, there was light and air, and you could breathe. You blinked at him, spots in the corners of your vision.

"I'm so sorry, Lucky," he murmured, wiping his eyes, one hand on your shoulder steadying you.

"It's-"

"On the heads of the traitors," Ziv said sharply. "Heads we're going to collect and stick on pikes outside on the lawn."

"That is unsanitary," Reinhardt said, squinting at Ziv. "And stomach-turning," he whispered to you, though that whisper was audible out in the hallway.

"He's just brainstorming," you lied, because you knew Ziv would totally do that if left unsupervised.

Ziv snorted rudely, but didn't press, because Reinhardt looked genuinely upset, maybe because of the situation, maybe because of the gruesome suggestion.

Captain Amari cleared her throat impatiently and you wobbled into the room and quickly took a seat. Along with Ziv, Winston, Jesse, Hanzo, and Feng were already seated. Genji was keeping an eye on the infirmary and he and Angela would be briefed later.

Torby brought up a screen, showing close up footage of the burning transport. "They were not shot down. They were forced to land because of mechanical troubles. Blackbox shows they radioed in, but the transmission never made it through. It was engine sabotage, just a small evap leak that escaped initial checks, and then quickly worsened once they were farther out." He gritted his teeth.

"The inspecting mechanic?" Jesse asked.

"Too early to tell. She's already been put in a containment cell. Athena and Torby have been reviewing footage," Captain Amari said. "But the disruption was skillfully done, so there is a chance she just missed it."

"If I had done the pre-check, I would have caught it," Torby said under his breath, giving the floor a hard look.

"Yes, but we've had you working on the radial EMP cannon, which we're going to need for Operation Morpheus," Captain Amari said. "You were assigned to R&D, because putting you on maintenance duty is a waste of your skills."

Torby grunted, giving a tight nod. There was only so much comfort he would accept in front of an audience.

"The bodies were burned beyond visual recognition," Reinhardt said, fists clenched at his side. "Forensics is still sorting through, but none of the remains are large enough to be Jack."

"It's based on femur size," Ziv added, answering the question no one wanted to ask, and Reinhardt flinched.

"We're pretty sure that it isn't just Jack who's missing," Winston said hesitantly. "But figuring out those details will take time. Even with our resources, we can't do a proper DNA check and reconstruct the bodies within an hour." He paused. "There is still some...sorting that has to be done," he added, sounding a little queasy, and you imagined piles of burnt bones and tissue, none of it resembling a person any more.

"It was Epsilon Squad out there with him," you said, heart sinking. Because you had two friends in Epsilon Squad. Shoal for sure, and maybe Jemison, because she liked Isha and had brought you pies.

"The sabotage was probably done here," Torby continued. "Athena and I have reviewed the footage, but there are blindspots. Whoever did it knew Jack's itinerary, and that he would be taking a civilian vehicle."

"Do you think someone on board betrayed them?" Feng asked.

"Epsilon Squad was considered unimpeachable," Captain Amari said, but her voice wavered.

"The pilot?" You wondered.

"If it was someone on board, he's the strongest candidate, but we don't have enough information to draw a conclusion. Our people were executed, stacked in a pile, doused with a strong accelerant, and burned. It takes a very hot fire to burn bodies that well. Whoever did this was prepared. They moved fast. They killed without leaving any witnesses. And they were out just as quickly."

That did narrow your suspect pool. Because that kind of professionalism was a specific skill set. The brutality of it was so familiar. But then coldblooded killing was a common occurrence in your line of work. The noteworthy part was the level of skill involved. Whoever did this was accustomed to ambushing other black ops units.
"Do we know where Richard Prince is?" You asked, head snapping up.

Captain Amari shook her head. "He was supposed to be in the American's custody..."

You could feel the collective frustration as everyone realized how much of a guarantee that was.

"Well, they certainly wouldn't tell us if they lost him." Jesse rubbed his chin. "We can call Brant or Armstrong."

"Already alerted them, but they can look further into the matter," you said staring at the footage of the burnt transport. You were quietly thankful that Torby had not shown the bodies. From the description, they were unrecognizable, but that wouldn't stop you from superimposing images of your friends on the charred bones.

Epsilon Squad was elite. They had survived plenty of battles head on. They were good at what they did and they were loyal to Jack. Even if you knew the chances were slim, you couldn't afford to write anyone off as dead. Not right now. Because once you started down that path, you might not be able to stop. And if you wanted to function, you couldn't dwell on the thought that it might be too late for Jack. That Gabriel might never wake up. So for now, it was Schrödinger's Squad. Shoal and Jemison weren't dead either. They were all alive. They were grumpy as hell. And they were waiting for you to come save them.

The pressure of that thought was stifling, but the other possibilities were downright devastating.

"Torby, as much as we want to dissect the sabotage methodology, that isn't your priority any more. I need you to focus on mechanical prep for Operation Morpheus," Captain Amari said. "Reinhardt, if you're already prepared, I need you to help our squad stand-ins get acclimated and equipped. Mihret, any SIGINT you can gather would be appreciated. I know Athena and Zheng are working to triangulate possible locations for Jack and any surprises that the Mediterranean Omnium might have in store for us, so if you could support them or--"

"I have some of Lacroix's contacts I need to check in with first," Ziv said abruptly. "But that won't take long."

You raised a brow, because you hadn't realized that Lacroix was letting Ziv talk to other people. You briefly wondered what that was about. But social skills aside, Ziv was whip smart. If he thought it was important, it was probably important. And if Lacroix had given him the job... You'd have to check in with him after this.

"It's important," he scowled at the room, more than a little defensive.

Captain Amari nodded briskly. "Understood, but work fast. I need you and Winston to take point on cyber and mechanized defenses. I know you prefer your lab, but we need trustworthy agents on site in the infirmary."

"I've already spoken with Angela about...modifying some of the defenses. She is agreeable to some of my suggestions, though they may come into conflict with the Hippocratic Oath," Winston said, fiddling with his wrists. "Don't worry, ma'am, I won't let you down."

"Jesse, do you need me to sign off on anything?"

"No, ma'am, not yet. Just got to coordinate with Winston about the perimeter," Jesse said, tipping his hat.
"Lucky, I'm sorry I don't have more for you."

You nodded, knowing that you had to wait on whatever forensics could uncover, as well as other analytics.

"Do you have a team in mind?"

"Feng and Hanzo," you said, nodding at them. "And-" You pretended not to see Ziv, because they needed him here anyway. "I'll go talk to..." You flinched inwardly at the thought of taking Riggs into battle. The idea of putting Lao in danger made you cringe too, but Riggs wasn't cut out for combat missions. "Lao."

Ziv scowled murderously at you.

"All right," Captain Amari said, still looking uncertain. "Try to get at least one more person. I know you'll have drones backing you up, but whatever you're up against, you'll need at least a full squad."

"Yes, ma'am," you said, wondering who was left that you could trust.

"Lucky, I believe Isha wants out of your quarters," Athena said as you headed out. "Also, Amélie wants you to meet her in the interrogation rooms."

You rubbed your eyes. "Thanks, I'll grab Isha. Tell Amélie I'm on my way."

"Not so fast, asshole." You blinked as Ziv scuttled in front of you, arms crossed.

"What the hell are you thinking? You need me!" He snapped, launching into his tirade immediately. "I can shoot. I can hack. I don't cry like a small child when people raise their voice at me. I am also in excellent shape." He flexed an arm, which you knew was muscled, but you couldn't really see it under his jacket. "What the fuck, Lucky? I thought we were a team!"

"We are," you said automatically. "Walk with me. I think Isha might try to eat through the walls if I leave her alone any longer."

Huffing, Ziv fell in step beside you. "I know Captain Amari suggested me for your strike team."

"She did," you agreed. "She also suggested Lao and Riggs. Given the...violent nature of the mission, I think he'll do better here."

"So what? Why would you give her priority over me? Seriously-"

You kept a swift pace, your brain not quite able to process all Ziv's questions. You didn't have polite answers, or even good ones. You just had a jumble of reasons you hadn't quite put into words.

You reached your room in record time, Ziv still ranting at you. Opening your door, you were relieved to find that there were no holes eaten into your walls. But Isha slunk out of your bathroom, looking disgruntled. Immediately, she started chattering furiously at you and you were getting it from both sides.
"Yeah, you tell her, baby bird," Ziv scowled.

You peeked into the bathroom, finding the damn vent cover on the ground. She was going to escape that way. Of course. After all the reconnaissance she'd done in Hanoi, she wasn't going to unlearn how to get through the ventilation system. Rubbing your forehead, you groaned. That was a problem for later. A very big problem.

Ziv stood in front of your door, holding Isha, and behind the anger, you caught a glimpse of worry. "Well? What do you have to say for yourself?" He drew himself up, all bluster, and Isha, puffed up too, clicking her teeth at you. They had never looked more alike.

"There are several reasons I don't want to bring you," you said bluntly. "You just came off a mission."

"You did too!"

"I've pulled doubles before; you're not used it," you said, knowing as soon as the words left your mouth that it wasn't a great excuse. "Second, Lacroix is down. I figured you'd want to stay close and keep an eye on him."

Ziv opened his mouth, then shut it. Then opened it again, apparently settling on his words. "You could have just asked me what I wanted to do. Gérard is hurt, but he'll recover." Ziv crossed his arms defiantly. "And so will Reyes. He's too much of an asshole to die."

"Thanks, I think," you said, rubbing the back of your neck. Ziv's idea of comfort could use some refining.

"I'm not saying Lao couldn't do it. She could handle all the cyber defense work," Ziv said reluctantly. "But I'm just as good."

"Maybe better," you agreed. "I don't know if they'll let Lao help run cyber defense here. Her clearances are all conditional. And Riggs doesn't have the experience. They need you here too."

"With Athena and Zheng, my presence here is overkill," he said. "Try again."

That wasn't entirely accurate: the system wasn't set up to let inorganics run things - there were failsafes requiring the input of a human or gorilla agent possessing the proper clearances, but maybe his presence wasn't as critical as you thought.

You smiled in exasperation, because Ziv would worry at a problem till he drew blood. There was no putting him off. You leaned against the door frame, forcing yourself to make eye contact with him. "Because Tataryn is dead." The words didn't get stuck in your throat this time, and you hated that it was becoming easier to say. "Gabriel is...in critical condition. And Jack is missing. I don't know what I'm walking into - but whatever it was took out Epsilon Squad and they are all exceptional fighters. I can't handle the thought of anything happening to you too. If there's anyone I need to protect right now, it's you. I don't know if I can bring Lao, but I know can't risk you."

Ziv's eyes widened and he squeezed Isha tightly, burying his face in her back. She chirped questioningly, her little hands patting his forearms. "That's not fair," he muttered. "That's not right! You can't do that. You can't!"

Nodding, though he wasn't looking at you, you crossed the room and hugged him gently. "I know. It's rotten and selfish of me. But please... I need to know you're safe. But if we want to be honest, I think this mission will be combat-heavy, and that isn't your strength."

"You think Lao can kick my ass?" Ziv grumbled in your ear.

"She has a metal arm," you whispered. "Those hurt a lot."

"I can hack it!" He scowled at you and furiously petted Isha. She gave you both questioning looks.

"I know," you said. Though you didn't know if he could hack it before she clocked him with it, and he had to know that too. And you didn't have to mention that Lao had been on far more combat missions than he had, some solo under Talon. Even before she was Bái Shé, she'd served with Captain Patel's squad. She had seen lots of action there. Lao Yue might be your baby hacker, but she had already been to war.

Ziv glared down at you. "That's not fair. You can't just shovel the guilt on me like that. That's your baggage."

"I'm sorry," you said. "It's shitty of me, but I'm out of options. I can't...I can't do it, Ziv. It's too much. I can't lose you. You're my terrible little brother, and with everything going wrong, the least I can do is look after you." And you were absolutely right about Ziv's combat suitability. You would be too distracted by trying to protect him. You would have to assign another squad member to guard him and that was not optimal. But he already knew that; you did not have to rub his nose in it. And he did deserve to know how much you loved him.

"You wouldn't do this to McCree," he snarled, and you knew then that you had won.

"Jesse is staying here," you said, because that was a can of worms that did not need to be opened. "And he could use your help. I don't know how well he'd work with Lao."

"McCree gets along with everybody," Ziv snapped.

"Yeah, I guess one of us could take some lessons from him," you said dryly.

"Ben zona, cut the passive aggressive shit," Ziv squinted at you. "Fine, I get it. You're delicate and weepy. Stop embarrassing yourself. You're just going to have to make me a giant batch of karaage when you get home," he muttered. "And you're going to buy me a really nice birthday present. Like, seriously expensive."

"OK," you said solemnly.

"You're still an asshole. I'm really mad at you," he said, hugging you harder.

"I know. I'm sorry."

"Well you're not forgiven yet," he snapped. "I won't forgive you till you get back here, all sheepish and shit, and admit that you should've brought me along."

"Deal," you said.

Shuddering, Ziv released you. "I'm serious. You better come back, Lucky. I won't fucking forgive you if you don't. I'm not joking."

"I know," you said. "You aren't the forgiving type."

"Damn straight." He took a deep breath and wiped his face. "Are you bringing Isha?"
You shook your head, and she squawked in outrage at you. "Murderbird, I need you to look after Gabriel."

She blinked owlishly at you.

"He's helpless right now," you said, your voice catching. "If anyone gets past Jesse, Genji, and Winston, you're the last line of defense."

Isha grunted at you, it wasn't a happy noise.

"You think Angela's going to let her into the infirmary?"

"I've seen Angela feed her a whole bar of Swiss chocolate when she thought no one was looking. But I don't think she'll notice one small dinosaur, not with all the shit that's going down."

Ziv's frown deepened. "Yeah, I better go help Winston calibrate some of the security suite software."

"I know it's hard for you to work in full armor, but please, at least wear your omnium plates. Isha, we'll get your combat armor appraised."

Ziv nodded. "Yeah, OK."

"I'm sorry to interrupt, but Amélie would like to remind you that she needs you in the interrogation rooms on the double. It is mission-related," Athena said.

"Shit." You'd forgotten about that.

"Better hurry. She really doesn't like to be kept waiting," Ziv said, a hint of smugness in his voice. "Ben zona, I still need to call some of Lacroix's agents. He has some people embedded with Petras' staff. They might have some insight into where Morrison is."

You stared for a moment. Of course, he had people working for Petras. Of course, he didn't give you any details about it. Of course, he kept everything compartmentalized. That secretive bastard. You exhaled slowly, wondering why Lacroix couldn't ever make his plans simple.

"OK, we'll meet up in the infirmary after."

"Yeah. I'll talk to Lao too. If you want," Ziv said, a little awkwardly.

You blinked, unsure of what to say to that. You didn't think he'd sabotage your efforts, but you weren't sure you wanted Ziv to make the pitch, for numerous reasons. "I think I better do it," you said. "She might take it wrong if I don't do it myself, and I'm in enough trouble."

Ziv snorted. "All right."

"Do you think she's combat ready?" You asked after a moment. Because you really didn't.

"I think she's going stir crazy," Ziv said with a frown. "Torby's exo-armor has done a lot for her physical recovery, but I'm no doctor. I think she could, maybe." He paused. "But I don't know if she'll be able to turn you down, Lucky. She's got a chip on her shoulder the size of a coffin."

You knew what that was like. Maybe not with the same nuance as Lao, but you thought you understood needing to do something to make up for how things had gone down before. Even if what happened wasn't your fault. It still ate away at you. Lao's feelings had to be worse. She wanted to redeem herself, even if you knew she'd done nothing wrong. She couldn't be held responsible for the things done as Bái Shé. But she herself didn't believe that, not really, and it would take a long time for her to come to terms with it.

You didn't feel right about asking Lao either. Maybe it was your own guilt, or maybe it was because you didn't know if she could tell you "no." Either way, you needed to get to Amélie now, because you didn't need another person upset with you.

Chapter End Notes

Writing is going too slowly. I'm a couple chapters ahead, but I'm not writing as much as I should be. And this arc is very tricky, have to do it right. Still reworking my schedule and to try to accommodate more writing time. But I am staying up waaaay too late. And doing dumb things, like spending hours on the floor playing dinosaurs with a three year old. (Nephew, because I haven't spawned anything. He has a new brother, who really likes me for some reason. It's weird. Babies normally cry when they see me/strangers. He's the opposite.) Mind you, most of it involved dumping the contents of his triceratops bank on the floor and making farting noises, because the dinosaur had diarrhea. His idea, not mine. But I went along with it, while playing games on my phone and having T-Rexes bit poopy dino and kid. I'm cool like that.

Cat is incredibly clingy, now that he is ill. I have to throw him off the desk (gently onto a pillow) whenever I sit down. Often he comes back. There has been a lot of "cat blocking mouse" and "cat typing on the keyboard." You think it's cute, but you're not the one working under these conditions! :P

It's been super hot here, so I haven't been running. And if you hadn't noticed, running = time to plot writing out for me. Which is kind of ironic, because I used to hate running so much. So so much. Now it's not so bad, because I'm plotting. *I really just kind of jog, maybe sprint a little while, then walk, then jog, but mostly walk with some spring/jogging in between. But I call it "running."

Wrists are doing better because of the heat. Go figure.

We're still hanging out on discord, if you want join.
"You're back!" Exuberance, relief, and more than just a little worry seemed to color those two words.

You blinked as Távio sidled up to you, holding Bandit's leash. You looked down, in time to see the dog happily licking Isha's face while she rolled on the floor with him: she was bigger than him now, only by a little, but it was a jarring realization.

"Walk and talk," you said. "I'm on a time crunch. Amélie needs me for-"

"I know," Távio said, lowering his voice. "She asked for my help on constructing part of the profile, since...we're friends." He hovered beside you, clenching his fists nervously. "She's really pushing it. I don't think she'll go too far, but..." He shrugged helplessly. "Agent Lacroix is hardcore, ma'am."

"We're talking about the one...without the mustache," you said, just to be certain. Just because Lacroix was still in the infirmary didn't mean he wasn't playing some part in this from a distance.

He nodded vigorously.

You weren't surprised that Amélie was keyed up, or that Távio was intimidated by her, but you didn't know enough about the situation to draw any conclusions. You glanced down, Isha chattering rapidly at Bandit while they followed behind you, almost like she was telling him what she'd been doing.

"Well, I'm heading straight over." Belatedly, you realized you were just in sweats, your hair still wet from the shower. Of course, you were going to see the two most perfectly presented people in Overwatch looking like you'd been dragged facefirst through the locker rooms.

"Is it...true? About Agent Tataryn?" Távio asked, voice surprisingly steady.

"Yeah," you said, after a moment.

You could feel the air rushing out of him, like he had been prepared to believe Tataryn had made it despite the odds, till you'd personally destroyed that hope. You blew out a breath. "Senior Agent Lacroix is out of commission. And so is Gabriel." You didn't need to go into details. "If you know about why Amélie is questioning Ainsley, then you know about Jack."

"Porra," he swore than made shrunk back. "Sorry, ma'am. I mean, yes ma'am, I've been briefed," he rasped. He jammed his hands into his pockets, concentrating on the floor. "This is very bad, ma'am."
"It is," you said, staring straight ahead. After all that work you'd put into trying to break the habit, three "ma'ams" in a row was a bad sign, for sure.

"What can I do?"

"I don't know yet," you said, pausing in front of the observation room door.

"How are you holding up, ma'am?" He asked, voice barely above a whisper.

"I'm still in fighting shape," you said.

"I...that's not what I meant," he said.

You stared at the brushed metal door, not entirely sure how to respond.

"I'm sorry," he said rapidly. "I...overstepped."

You shook your head, and looked back over your shoulder. Távio stood there, hunched and miserable. "I'm terrified for them," you said. "Losing Tataryn was a gut punch. Gabriel and Jack... I can't put into words." You stared up at the ceiling for a moment. "But if I stop and think about it now, I won't be useful to anyone. Yeah, I'm not OK, but I'll be worse off if I do nothing." Because sometimes all you could do was just put one foot in front of the other, and move forward in the right direction, even if you didn't think you could make it to the end. "I've lived through terrible things before. I will continue to do so," you said, with more confidence than you felt.

"You were supposed to laugh and say you aren't afraid of anything," he said weakly.

"I like you too much to lie," you said, trying to look cocky. "And you're too smart to believe that empty bravado anyway."

"I guess it's...braver to keep going even when you're scared."

Bravery had nothing to do with it. It was momentum: if you stopped, maybe you wouldn't be able to start again. But you knew better than to tell him that while he was looking for reassurance. "It's nothing so lofty," you said. "Jack needs me." You took a shaky breath. "And letting him down isn't an option. I think you know what that's like."

Because sometimes, when you didn't think you could be strong for yourself, you knew you would be strong for others. And some people might think you weak-minded for it, but you now understood the warped rules of your own psyche. So what if you had to game the system to be your best self? You were doing it. It wasn't just you either: every agent in Blackwatch could and sometimes had to operate solo. But whether they wanted to admit it or not, they all performed better with a partner or a team. Be it protective instinct, professional pride, or just petty rivalry, adding the right person to the mix could greatly improve results.

Távio blinked. "I- Yes, I do."

You nodded. "All right, so I guess Amélie's already begun questioned Ainsley?"

Távio pressed his lips together, face scrunched up in discomfort. "She was doing...pre-interrogation work."

Raising a brow, you opened the observation room door. There was a cutting scornful laugh, the voice clear, melodic, and so very cold. You slowly raised your head, and though you'd never heard that noise from her before, you knew it was Amélie. Through the one-way glass, you could see Ainsley hunched over a table, hands cuffed in front of her, head tucked like she was trying to protect herself.

Amélie stood over her, wearing an outfit you hadn't seen before, though you were pretty sure it wasn't regulation. It was mostly black and skintight, with what looked like a red latex underbust corset. Her metal boots bore spikes on the kneeguards and she wore her hair in a high ponytail and blood red lipstick.

There was a resounding crack! And you nearly jumped out of your skin.

Ainsley screeched and cowered, though it didn't look like Amélie had actually struck her. It took you a moment to recognize what she was holding. Was that...? You shook your head in slight disbelief. In her elegantly gloved hands, Amélie held a black leather riding crop, and that definitely wasn't regulation. You stared for a long moment, not sure what to make of the scenario. It was like the opening to a fetish film, and for a moment you wondered if this was all an elaborate prank. But no, you realized after a few seconds, Amélie was that brazen and your life really was this fucking surreal.

"We may both come from affluent background, but we are nothing alike," Amélie hissed. "I earned my position. No one in my family bought it for me. I worked for it. I bled for it. And I always made sure that my competition bled more," she said, smiling fiercely. "Chasseurs toujours. We are always hunting. We are never satisfied." She leaned in close, tilting Ainsley's chin up and forcing eye contact. "You are in over your head."

"I don't know what you're talking about-" Ainsley sniffled.

"D'accord. What was I thinking? Who would tell you anything of value?" Amélie said coolly. "And you lack the temerity to ask. Poor foolish Mademoiselle Petras: of course, you wouldn't know that your darling uncle is corrupt. Just like you would have no idea how he uses his position to abuse younger female agents."

Ainsley stiffened, eyes going wide.

"Because if you knew, and did nothing, why that would make you an accessory," Amélie continued, a smooth malice permeating her every word. "And that would be far worse than sheer ignorance."

Perspiration dripped down Ainsley's forehead, the unflatteringly bright lights illuminating her blotchy face. "I...I tried to help," she stuttered, curling away from Amélie. "I really did!"

"Is that so?" Amélie drawled, her smile vicious, the look in her eyes terribly stark. You shuddered. She loomed over Ainsley. "What did you do? Give a sworn statement? File a complaint with the Strike Commander, or the UN? Go to the press?"

Stricken, Ainsley hung her head. "It was a family thing," she said, voice very small. "I called my mother. I thought we could handle it...quietly." Her delivery was as unconvincing as the words, and from her shamefaced expression, you could tell that she knew it.

Amélie made a guttural sound in the back of her throat, clearly unimpressed. She sneered down at Ainsley, the contempt completely genuine. "Clearly your quiet handling of the situation was most effective. You certainly showed him."

Ainsley cringed.

Amélie cocked her head to the side and looked directly at the glass. "I doubt she knows anything useful, and her cow eyes and pathetic sniveling sicken me. Give the word and I will take care of things. There will be some unpleasantness, but it will send the right the message." And with that, she kicked Ainsley's chair over, the younger woman screeching as she toppled onto the floor.

"Is that your cue?" Távio asked nervously, like he wasn't certain that Amélie was bluffing.
Actually, you weren't so sure either.

You nodded, not exactly sure how Amélie wanted to play this, but ready to go along with her plan. Taking a deep breath, you opened the door and stalked inside.

Amélie inhaled sharply, like she was surprised to see you. "What are you doing here, Strike? You don't have auth-"

You took half a second to process the cue. "What the hell do you think you're doing, Guillard?" You demanded, as you walked in, glancing down at Ainsley.

"Lucky!" Ainsley hiccupped, her voice cracking as she scrambled to her knees. "Please, I don't- I can't her what she wants!"

"For fuck's sake, Guillard. She's a civilian-"

"A civilian placed here by her treacherous uncle," Amélie scoffed. "She's a spy, and a pisspoor one at that. But that doesn't matter, we don't leave loose ends," she said haughtily.

"We don't execute civilians in their pajamas either." You crossed your arms, not looking back at Ainsley. You didn't trust your facial expression.

"You always were soft," Amélie said with mock sorrow. She leaned in, gloved fingers cressing your cheek. "But it is part of your charm. Do not worry your pretty head, Strike. I do not share your aversion to bloodshed. I'll take care of this mess."

You slapped her hand away. "No."

Amélie narrowed her eyes at you, nostrils flaring. "The Strike Commander is missing. We know her uncle is responsible. Are you just going to sit by idly while they murder more of our agents? Because of your precious principles? No one is asking you to get your hands dirty. I am perfectly capable-"

"Guillard, you're enjoying this too much," you said sharply.

"Because I love my work. That's not a crime," Amélie said, with an eerie, almost flirtatious smile. She leaned closer, face centimeters from yours, the intoxicating scent of her perfume momentarily blindsiding you. "Come now, Strike. You know what's at stake. You've just returned from a grueling mission. You must be exhausted," she cooed. "Let me handle this. Go get some rest. Come find me after. Everything will be taken care of by then, and I would love to treat you to-"

"Please-" Ainsley sobbed. "Don't leave me alone with her! She's going to torture me to death!"

Amélie gave a small sheepish shrug, clearly amused by the dramatic accusation and certainly not denying it. "I would invite you to help, but I know how delicate you are-"

"We both know this isn't Blackwatch-sanctioned," you said, wondering if you sounded as tired as you felt.
"You want to make this fight...bureaucratic?" Amélie laughed incredulously.

"Push all you want, I still outrank you," you said coolly.

"That is your rationale? How...regrettable. I had thought better of you."

"I don't have to explain myself to you. Let's look at what you actually have here: a crying clerical worker with no ops experience and no stomach for violence. You're obviously operating on a misconception: Ainsley is not her uncle," you said firmly. "And I'm not going to let you do this. You can try to go over my head, but-"

"You are so darling, and so very tiresome," Amélie said, giving a disappointed sigh. "Fine. I will do just that. Make your protests, clear your conscience. But there will be consequences." She shot Ainsley a poisonous glare.

Suddenly you wanted to step back a few feet to get out of the splash zone. Somehow you valiantly resisted. "There always are."

"I think I should remind you that that one isn't worth your sympathy, Strike. If your roles were reversed, she would not risk her precious neck to save yours."

Ainsley flinched under the accusation, and even if she didn't realize it, all three of you knew it was true.

"Maybe," you said, even though Amélie was absolutely right. "But that's how I choose to live my life."

Amélie leaned over, lips brushing against your ear. "You will regret this," she said, sotto voce, though it was loud enough for Ainsley to hear it.

You stood there stoically while Amélie marched out, as if she was going to report you to a higher power, confident that she would get permission to personally crush you for your defiance. After the door slammed shut, you crouched down beside Ainsley.

She sat there motionless until you tugged on her arm and helped her to her feet. "Come on, get off the ground. You don't know what's been on it," you said a little gruffly.

"L-Lucky," she sniffled. She wasn't wearing any makeup. Her hair was a tangled and her eyes puffy. She'd been taken unawares, barefoot and still in her blue silk pajamas, the sleeves torn. And after all that, she was still annoyingly pretty.

"I'm afraid I don't have any tea," you said, picking the chair up. "And we don't have much time."

"I swear I don't know what happened to Jack! Lucky, you have to believe me. I would never-""/

"I know," you said, so much exhaustion in those words, because no one here knew enough. "But your family would."

Ainsley shuddered, biting her lip as she hung her head. The silence was deafening. There was none of the expected denial or outrage, no bluster or protests. Which... meant she knew. That realization shook you: you almost called Amélie back in and got out the thumbscrews yourself. But how much did Ainsley know?
"I thought you weren't involved in that kind of thing," you said softly, behind clenched teeth, wondering briefly, if you needed to tear that information out of her with your bare hands.

"I'm not," she said frantically shaking her head. "But after everything that happened on Family Day, I've been doing some...investigating. But before that, I swear I didn't know, Lucky. I didn't know. I really didn't!" She shook her head frantically, tears spilling down her cheeks. "You have to believe me."

You stood there silently.

"Lucky?" She asked, voice breaking. "Please, you have to believe me. I'm not like that. You're the only one who..." She sniffled, unsure of how to finish that sentence. The only one who "cared?" The only one who "believed" her? None of that was entirely accurate, and the uncertainty was uncomfortable.

"I'm the only one here who wants to help you get out of this," you said, sidestepping that minefield. "So tell me what you do actually know, so we can clear you and save Jack."

"I know it sounds dumb," she said, breathing rapidly. "But we've...always been well off. I just assumed it was all inherited and reinvested, through trust funds, annuities, and other tax loopholes. Mother keeps multiple accountants on hand. Once you have a certain amount of capital, the investments and favorable interest rates do most of the work for you. But I never thought-"

"You never thought about where the money really came from," you said, having heard it all before. Because Ainsley had it made. She didn't wonder how she would afford her next meal, her healthcare, or even her education. Someone else dealt with all of that for her. She'd maybe given it a cursory thought, asked a few questions, and gone about her life, satisfied that everything was as it should be. "Do you even know details?"

"Some," she said, diffidently. "I know some," she repeated herself with a little more confidence. "I could help. Really, I could." She stared up at you, eyes welling up with more tears.

You stood there silently, your wordless doubt more powerful than any accusations you could sling. Because good intentions or not, Ainsley had never been particularly helpful in the past.

"I know my uncle...and my parents have some...unethical business dealings. I started digging a few weeks ago," Ainsley said. "I'm still untangling the financials and what it all means, but I can get you the data. I don't want anything to happen to Jack, or Agent Shoal, or Agent Mosweu, or anyone in Epsilon Squad. Please Lucky, let me help." She shivered.

"What do you have?" you asked.

"There's a nanodrive in my jewelry box. On the Tanzanite ring, it's hidden in the band. That's the blue-purple one," she added, in case you didn't know. "It requires biometric access codes. I swear, there's important information on there. I just started sorting through it, so I don't know the details, but I know it could help," she spoke rapidly, voice going high, words tightening with panic.

"And if it's not enough?" You asked, not actually agreeing to help her.

"Then we'll call my mother. She's a lot more knowledgeable than I am, and I can convince her to help us."
"Out of the goodness of her heart?" You asked, trying very hard to dampen the skepticism and anger. Because you knew quite a bit about Valerie Petras.

Ainsley winced, sorrow, regret, and fear flashing across her face in rapid succession. She had spoken to you about her mother before; she probably wasn't aware that you had the transcripts of their conversations.

"No. I don't know." Ainsley sniffled. "Mother is a pragmatist. She's..."

The Barbie version of Margaret Thatcher? Country Club Lady Macbeth without the hand washing hang-up? Leona Helmsley's spiritual heir? You bit your tongue.

"Mother is difficult," Ainsley said, diplomacy not forgotten. "And she's not...empathetic. But if she thinks this scandal will drag the family down, she'll cooperate. I'm sure of it."

You remained unconvinced, though Ainsley's assessment rang true.

"And...you have me as a bargaining chip. I can play it up. You know, act terrified."

Ainsley gave you a weak smile. "I can be outraged, with lots of yelling, but I don't think that will make a difference. Like I said, I can appeal to her rational side. That would be the best approach. But whatever your plan, I'll go along with it, Lucky, I swear."

That was more than you expected, though you weren't actually sure how much you could rely on Ainsley. Still, you nodded in thoughtful acknowledgement. "All right, I'll go get it. You hold tight."

"What-what if Guillard comes back?" Ainsley stared at you with panicked eyes.

"I can stay with you or I can go get that drive," you said, your sincerity just another form of cruelty. "What do you want to risk?"

To your surprise, Ainsley wiped her nose on her torn sleeve and straightened up. There was fire in her eyes that hadn't been there before. "I want you to save Jack and Epsilon Squad. I can stall Guillard, if it comes to that."

You nodded. "I'll hurry then." You turned to go.

"Lucky-" Her voice wavered and you stopped. "Lucky, I'm really sorry about before. I shouldn't have just let it go like that. I was..." She trailed off, hanging her head. "There's no excuse for what I did or didn't do. I don't expect you to forgive me. I really messed things up. I understand if you never want to talk to me again. But I'm sorry, and no matter what I'll do better. Really."

You looked back over your shoulder.

Ainsley met your gaze, misery clear on her face. You'd never seen her look sorrier in your life - and you'd seen her bawl her eyes out on multiple occasions. Those had been pure expressions of emotions: fear, sorrow, reactions to whatever external stimulus set Ainsley off that day. Now there was unhappy knowledge in her eyes, guilt laying over her like a veil. It was a different look on her... or maybe you just weren't used to seeing her without makeup. Either way, Ainsley had regrets, and rightfully so.

"OK," you said, because you weren't sure what else to say. Her heartfelt apologies might be sincere, but she was right, she had no excuse for what she did. She shouldn't expect you to forgive her. She did mess things up. "I need to hurry."
She nodded at you feebly. Her disappointment at your answer was evident, though you were a little surprised that she didn't crumble at your lack of enthusiasm.

"I know you don't believe me, but I will do better. I promise," she said. "I won't let you or Jack down."

You left then, still not sure what to think of her change of heart.

You stepped into the darkened observation room, shutting the door behind you. Amélie sat in her chair, sipping a drink, steam drifting above the rim of the cup. The leather riding crop rested across her lap and you had to force yourself not to stare. Távio was nowhere in sight, but Isha and Bandit lay curled under a chair, napping together.

"Well," you said, hands in your pockets. "That was some performance." You couldn't quite bring yourself to ask how much of that was acting, and how much of that was genuine bloodlust.

"It was my turn to be the bad cop." Amélie raised her chin haughtily, one perfect brow arched. "Are you going to say that you would have done better?"

"...Nope," you shook your head, your answer sincere. "You've traumatized her just the right amount without actually causing permanent harm." And she set you up as Ainsley's savior, moreso than you'd already been. "Did you already send Távio to pick up the drive?"

"Of course," she said. "And to get you coffee. That is what minions are for." She patted the seat beside her, flashing you a wicked smile. "Come, sit with me for a moment, Agent Strike." Her purr was dangerous and flirtatious, making the hair on the back of your neck stand up.

But it would not do to ever show fear to predator, so you sat down next to her, shaking your head. "You're giving me chills."

"Am I frightening you?" She asked, crossing her legs as she leaned into your space, one arm resting over the back of your chair.

You just laughed nervously, recognizing a trap when you saw it. "You're like a valkyrie, equal parts mesmerizing and terrifying. No one can resist your charms or...forceful personality."

Amélie looked pleased, poking your cheek with one finger. "You are adorable when you are flustered."

"I'm tired," you said, giving her a wry look.

"Távio should be back soon with the coffee," she said, some of the predatory amusement fading. Amélie always seemed like a cat playing with its prey, but she exhaled slowly, shedding some of that persona, like a leopard shrinking down to become an ocelot. "Do you think we should let her take part in the conversation with her mother?"

Was she asking if you trusted Ainsley, or if you thought Ainsley could be useful? You nodded slowly. Maybe you leaned more one way than the other, but in the end the results would be the same. "Yeah, I think she'll be necessary if we're going to approach this civilly. Otherwise we'll have to take a trip to the Berkshires and let you go to work on Mommy Dearest."

"I don't mind." Amélie didn't look at all disturbed by that prospect.
"But that's not optimal," you said quickly. "Jack's been missing for several hours now. I don't want to waste time chasing down Petras' sister-in-law who probably doesn't know anything concrete."

"Then let us discuss strategy," Amélie said, taking another sip of her coffee. "Based on what we know of the Petras family's holdings, Hanzo and Zheng have narrowed down Jack's likely location to the northern hemisphere, somewhere between North America and Europe. Athena has been filtering through satellite footage, and probably worming her way into networks she shouldn't know exists. Ziv is in communication with several questionable people, both his and Gérard's contacts. We will have answers soon, Chanceux. Then what?"

"I'm putting together a team," you said. "We're spread thin, so I'm taking Hanzo and Feng for sure. But Jesse and Genji are going to stay back and protect home base. I have to pick a hacker and a medic-"

"You already have a sniper then," Amélie said, tones rising with the end of the sentence, her voice firm.

"I have a ninja-"

"That is not a sniper," Amélie said, waving her hand dismissively. "You will likely need him for scouting and for close quarters work."

You sighed. "OK, I can snipe-"

"You are running the team," Amélie said. "I doubt you will stay back far enough to be effective."

You exhaled. "Then I-"

"Why, of course, Chanceux," Amélie said, smiling broadly at you, just a hint of madness in her eyes. "I would love to come along and help. I thought you would never ask."

"Wuh?" Your head snapped up as you realized what she was saying. "But your husband-"

"Has Ziv, Winston, and half of Blackwatch looking out for him. You're the one who needs a trustworthy team, more specifically a sniper," she said, casually finishing her coffee. "Honestly, Chanceux, I sat out the last mission under protest," she said, smiling thinly, a real flash of anger in her eyes. "And I only did it because I knew my presence would make matters worse. There is no reason for me to stay back now: I cannot grow Gérard a new eye or make him heal any faster. The waiting will drive me mad."

"But-"

"Unless you don't think my skills are up to par?" She cocked her head to the side and stared at you, eyes flat, smile empty. It was a cold mimicry of curiosity - something you'd see in a horror movie featuring evil murderous children. You realized, on some level, that she was playing it up, but it was still intimidating.

"Stop putting words in my mouth- and don't try to put anything else in there either," you scowled. "I just assumed you'd stay back and help them run things."

"Given the layout of the infirmary and the likelihood of a surprise attack, my skills will be less useful against that sort of indoors defensive assault," she said stiffly. "And I already sat out Operation Tarasque. I think you of all people understand - I need to do something, Chanceux. I cannot just wait around...sitting." She said the last word with great distaste. She paused, suddenly chagrined, like she realized she'd been trying to bulldoze you. "I am sorry. I got...carried away. That was unfair of me. This is your operation and you have expertise I lack. If you think I would be more useful here, I will abide by your judgment."

You rubbed your forehead, because you honestly hadn't been thinking that far ahead. She was right, of course. You knew how hard it was to sit back and wait. Hell, you couldn't do it. It was pure torture. And while you weren't sure what the terrain would look like, or if you'd have a good position for a sniper, Amélie wasn't just a sharpshooter. Amélie was good at handling guns and people. She thought in strange angles with an uncanny sort of foresight. And most importantly, she was someone you trusted at your back.

"No, you're always an asset. If you want to follow me into who-knows-what, I'd be grateful to have you." There was no need to mince words, to ask if she was "really sure." In all the time you'd known her, Amélie did not second guess herself. If she offered to come along, she wasn't "just being polite."

She smiled, looking very pleased. "Feng can serve as a heavy, which I am most curious to witness. Hanzo can scout or scowl, whichever is called for. We still need a medic and a tech."

"We're short on trustworthy combat medics," you winced. It wasn't just that Lacroix's list had reduced your pool, but Jesse and Captain Amari had priority. "Feng can send one of her people, but they won't come into direct combat."

Amélie pursed her lips in a sort of dangerous pout. "I see."

"We'll have a Zheng drone and an Athena drone along," you said. "She literally performed brain surgery earlier today."

"Our engineer?" She asked. "You do not want to bring Ziv. And Agent Riggs, while charming, would be wholly unqualified. That does not leave us many options. But, we will have Athena and Zheng. Provided they can maintain the connection." Amélie sat there pensively. "It is your call, of course, Chanceux. That might be sufficient."

You sighed. "I've been ordered to talk to Lao."

Amélie made a noncommittal noise.

"Yeah, I know." You shrugged. "I'll do that once we're done here."

"I know you'll make the best choice," Amélie said, giving you a blinding smile. "And whatever that may be, I will support you completely."

You gaped, a little shell-shocked by Amélie's warm declaration and overwhelming charisma. She did that on purpose. And it took you a good ten seconds to realize the door had been opened, and Távio was now hovering over you with a travel mug of coffee, looking very worried.

"Ah, did you acquire-?" Amélie began, giving you a chance to shut your mouth and pretend that you were cool.

"I passed it on to Athena and Agent Mihret," Távio said, a little breathless. "They don't think they'll have any trouble breaking the biometric lock. They're decrypting, parsing, and uploading the contents to your files, ma'am." He saluted. "Agent Lacroix told me how you prefer your coffee, ma'am. Any mistakes are my own though." He gave Amélie a slightly nervous smile.
"What about-?" Amélie smiled at Távio, then you.

"No, not for this." You shook your head. You didn't know what you were getting into, and while Távio could handle himself in combat far better than Ziv could, you weren't entirely certain that he was ready, or that you could be objective enough. You had enough emotional entanglements to juggle.

Távio narrowed his eyes, because he suspected that you were talking about him, he just didn't know the details. And you were happy with it staying that way.

"I think Ziv may need back up," you said. "And someone needs to keep an eye on Vo. Diallo will be distracted."

"What are you doing with Ainsley?" Távio asked, eyes darting to the one-way glass. She sat tensed in her seat, hands on her lap, gritting her teeth. Tears stained her face, but she wasn't openly weeping any more.

"We're going to talk to her mother, see if we can get more data. Ainsley's offered to help. I think it might be wisest to at least imply that she's our hostage. I don't think Ainsley can persuade her mother to change sides. But she offered to play along with whatever strategy we choose. And while I hope she can act convincingly, this approach doesn't hinge on her performance."

"Would you prefer I hover over her shoulder or present a more nebulous threat?"

"The latter would probably be best," you said. "I need her scared, not petrified."

"I will make myself scarce then," Amélie said, looking smug. "But I will be nearby, should you require my assistance. You should have another agent present, someone to stand in as the "bad cop." Or at least a less sympathetic presence."

You nodded. That ruled out Távio.

"I have someone in mind," Amélie smiled devilishly. "You get her to the comm room. I'll send them to meet you."

You removed the handcuffs, because you'd seen Ainsley Petras try to fight. You weren't worried. You gave her a generic uniform coat to wear over her pajamas, and a box of tissues.

She dabbed at her face as the two of you headed toward the comm room. "Mother won't go out of her way to be helpful. Not to you. And she'll deny it, but she keeps track of everyone's business - especially if they don't want her to."

"So there's a good chance she can give us a lead on your uncle. Because he's missing too." The Director's absence was nowhere near as dramatic as Jack's. He was just incommunicado, and no one had heard from him since yesterday. There had been no signs of forced entry to his hotel: he had simply checked out and disappeared, loyal bodyguards and all. There was a minute chance that perhaps whoever went after Jack had taken the Director as well, but you doubted it.

Ainsley nodded slowly. "I can't promise anything, but she might know something useful."
You blinked as Feng opened the door to the comm room. She was wearing an Overwatch uniform over her armor, and her name badge read "Chang." You stared at that for too long.

"Come on, we don't have all night," Feng scowled, sounding a little like Chang actually, though they looked nothing alike. "Do your business, then return the traitor to the holding pens."

Ainsley flinched.

"There's no need for that," you said. "Ms. Petras is doing her best to help us."

"Chang" scoffed at that, stepping aside so you and Ainsley could enter the private comm room. She leaned against the door, arms crossed, frown so severe you almost didn't recognize Feng underneath.

Ainsley gave her wide berth, not making eye contact as you open the comm channels.

You had access to Valerie Petras' private channel, thanks to your curious AI. "Ainsley, I've told you not to use this line-" An older, more made-up version of Ainsley answered the call, her eyes widening when she saw you. "What is the meaning of this?"

"Hello, Mrs. Petras," you said, smiling tightly, and trying not to think of the lovely things she'd said about you in her "private" conversations with Ainsley. "I have a mutually beneficial proposal for you."

Ainsley stepped forward into the camera range, her eyes red from crying, her lips pressed firmly together. "Please listen to what she has to say, Mother. She means business."

"I don't know who you think you are, but I will warn you right now, that I have connections, money, and power, and if anything happens to my daughter-" She said, voice dropping low with a tone that didn't seem diplomatic at all.

"We have something in common then, excellent," you said, interrupting her. "I don't want anything to happen to Ainsley either. But you have to understand, things have become very dire."

Those familiar blue eyes, harder and colder than Ainsley's, narrowed and they focused on the insignia on your hoodie. "What has William done?" There was a good deal of spite infused in his name, in the way she emphasized it tightly through clenched teeth. Though they might be allied through family, there was no love lost between Valerie Petras and her brother-in-law Director William Petras.

"Absconded with our Strike Commander, it seems. For extremely, questionable reasons. Left a trail of dead bodies. Doesn't look like we're going to be able to sweep this scandal under the rug," you said, overstating your hand.

"You can't prove anything," Valerie snapped. "Not if you're coming to me-"

"I can prove enough," you said. "He's allied with terrorists to kidnap-"

"He's the Director of Overwatch. It's just as likely that he was kidnapped too!" Valerie tilted her chin up. "It's shameful that you can't do your job, lose track of your own leadership, and then, to top it off, you come and blame the victim's family."

"You can cry that all you want," you said, refusing to back down. "But I have enough evidence of his dirty dealings to refute those claims. There's the numerous conflicts of interest regarding his investments with many US government defense contractors. And we cannot ignore his significant stakes in Vishkar, Luminescent Holdings, and other multinationals. In case you were unaware of his profile. Sure, some of that can be explained away. But his dealings with known criminals and terrorists like Richard Prince, Adhabu Ngumi, and Antonio Vialli would cause quite the stir."

"You have no proof," Valerie snarled.

"Quite the contrary, we've spent quite a long time going through your family's questionable finances, finances that you know very well. I must laud your sharp business acumen, Mrs. Petras. With all your high-level energy and defense holdings, your portfolio has quite the return. I should come to you for investment advice."

She sneered at you. "My lawyers-

"Can't save you or Ainsley. Especially not from the political fallout once this goes public." You stood straighter. "Once your brother-in-law's treason becomes common knowledge, the Petras name won't be worth shit. Do you want to gamble on who's more popular? Your skirt-chasing bureaucratic brother-in-law, or Strike Commander Morrison, the hero of the Omnic Crisis?"

"Do you think lawyers are the only weapons I have at my disposal?"

"Do you think your mercenaries will be fast enough to save Ainsley from my more bloodthirsty comrades? Because make no mistake, there are people worse than me trying to pry information out of your family members."

"It's true," Ainsley piped up. "Lucky saved me."

Valerie Petras grimaced. "This is Lucky Strike?" She wrinkled her nose, her expression incredulous, like Ainsley had brought home roadkill and asked to adopt it. "This is your friend? Ainsley-"

Ainsley gave you an embarrassed look, then straightened up. "Yes, yes she is. Though maybe I haven't been a very good friend back."

Your expression didn't change, because now wasn't the time for that discussion. "I don't want the political blowback to hit Ainsley. So I need your help to salvage this situation. Your brother-in-law has betrayed Overwatch and your family. If he'd been thinking about anyone other than himself, he would have realized how this would impact the rest of you, that Ainsley might be put in harm's way due to his actions. He didn't even try to make arrangements for her safety. And he's put her in harm's way numerous times. I think we both know who was behind the Paris incident. You remember, the one where armed cyborg terrorists took her hostage in an attempt to capture the Strike Commander?"

Valeria flinched, and Ainsley gasped, because apparently she had no idea. Interestingly enough, Valerie knew; her subdued reaction was a dead giveaway. You filed that information away for later.

"I might not be impressed by your business ethics, but I'm not a financial regulator and more importantly, I don't want anything bad to happen to Ainsley. I can get my people to look the other way, if you can help us stop the Director."

Valerie Petras looked off camera, brows knitted together. She pursed her lips, looking more angry than nervous. "William has always been selfish. He doesn't put the family first. Recently, he took a board position intended for my husband, though he doesn't have the time to properly do the job." She paused. "He had been overly-concerned with his own pet projects, neglecting many of his other duties. I know he was building some kind of private fortification around one of those isolated Norwegian islands, Svalbard I think. It was done in secret, I don't know the details, but he seemed very concerned about powerful political enemies." She gave you a pointed look. "Or perhaps enemies closer to him."

You shrugged. "I couldn't say what goes through his head." Though you wouldn't mind it being one of your bullets.

"I want immunity for me and my husband," she said. "I want a contract drawn up and looked over by my lawyers. I want my daughter put on a transport and sent home immediately."

"I want that location first," you said.

"What's to stop you from reneging? You certainly don't expect us to just trust you!"

"I want Morrison alive far more than I want to nail your family for corruption," you said coldly. "That's my priority. I'll have a contract drawn up, and we'll follow through with our end of the agreement, as long as you aren't aiding or abetting your brother-in-law." You felt it then, whatever barely civilized look was on your face twisted into something primal and half-mad. "But if I have to avenge Morrison because you delayed or withheld critical information, there will be no peace between us. Don't misunderstand me: I don't care about clearances, or politics, or high-minded ethics. Your money means nothing to me. Neither your tears nor your influence can save you. Cross me in this, and I will salt the earth. I will destroy your empire, your family, and anything else you hold dear. I will burn it all down and I will start with you. You can trust me on that."

Ainsley shuddered, squeaking as she inched away from you.

Valerie Petras drew back from the screen. She took a few deep breaths and squared her shoulders, trying to appear unruffled. "That was overly dramatic."

"It was nothing but the truth. And nothing for you to worry about if you deal straight with me," you said, coldly.

Valerie nodded curtly. "I understand the situation perfectly. Ainsley, are you safe?"

"I hope she'll be a fool -- that's the best thing a girl can be in this world, a beautiful little fool," Ainsley said, her tone wistful.

You frowned at the nonsensical quote, but Valerie Petras relaxed her shoulders, the space between her brows unwrinkling.

"If anything happens to my daughter, Lucky Strike, I will hold you personally responsible. As a gesture of good faith, I will send what information I have on his bunker right now."

She typed away at a keypad, biting her lower lip, stopping herself, and then returning to it seconds later. "All right, it's been sent. I have...more information on his activities, but that will be provided after the lawyers have drawn up immunity and an NDA."

"Fine," you said.

"Ainsley, I want you on the first plane out of--"

"I'm staying, Mother," Ainsley said. "I want to help find Jack."
You blinked, because you weren't sure how Ainsley could help with that, unless Jack happened to be lost in a high-end boutique.

"Ainsley Marie Petras-"

"I'm staying, Mother," Ainsley said. "Don't worry, I'll be fine." And with that, she reached over and cut the connection. She had a funny little smile on her face, like she couldn't quite believe that she'd done that.

"The documents have been received," Athena chimed in. "They have been sorted and forwarded to Zheng, Hanzo, and our forensic accountants. Agent Strike, your presence is requested in the Infirmary."

"What can I do to help?" Ainsley said, straightening up. "Mother will uphold her end of the bargain with you, in regards to the bunker information, but you should be extra careful when she gets the lawyers involved."

"Noted," you said, running your hands over your face. "What did your coded quote mean?"

"That was the duress pass phrase: it means I'm not being coerced," Ainsley said, smiling shyly at you. "I didn't realize you felt so strongly about Jack."

You blinked, tensing at the sheer delight in her voice. You'd just threatened her mother, and her by extension. This reaction made no sense.

"That was a good speech. Scary," Ainsley continued. "I think you really meant it. I know my mother believed you." She paused. "You're in love with him, aren't you?"

You nearly fell over, and in the corner "Chang" coughed vigorously. It almost sounded like laughter.

"I can tell," Ainsley continued, nodding sagely. "Love makes you do crazy things." She cocked her head to the side, like a curious puppy. "Does he know?"

"I am not having this conversation right now," you muttered, sounding more nervous than intimidating, despite your best efforts.

"Because I thought you were involved with Commander Reyes. I mean, I've heard the rumors, everyone has, and I certainly don't believe that you got your position that way. You're clearly qualified," Ainsley continued. "But since you were working so closely with him, I always assumed between that the two of you..." She blushed. "Not in a bad way. Like...you're a team!"

Pinching the bridge of your nose, you took a deep breath. "Ainsley, I appreciate your help, but-"

"You're on a time crunch. Look, I know I can help you. There are people loyal to my uncle, aren't there? People who might get in your way? You can assign them to take me somewhere "safe?" You know, so they don't interfere with your mission. I don't know anything useful, so they can't interrogate me, and they won't hurt me anyway-"

You blinked. That actually wasn't a bad idea.

"I'll run that by my superiors," you said. "And for the record, I appreciate your help."

"I...can get more data for you from Mother," she said. "...I know you're upset about Jack."
But I also know you're a good person, Lucky. I don't expect you to protect my family. They don't deserve that from you. But maybe you can go after them legally? Please? I'll help, I just don't want anyone like Agent Guillard near my parents."

"Ainsley-"

"No, I get it. My family has been doing questionable things for years. I want that to stop. I want to help. It's an ugly truth, but I'm ready to face it."

"We can talk about this later," you said. "I need to find Jack first."

"Of course!" Ainsley said, slapping her hands over her mouth. "Sorry! Didn't mean to waste your time! I am so sorry! We will talk about this later! I'll make you tea! I've been practicing!"

You weren't entirely sure how to take that. Either it was extremely unexpected progress or a very clumsy attempt at poisoning. Neither option was helpful right now.

"Agent Maeda Vargas is here to escort Ms. Petras to a secure location," Athena chimed in.

Feng opened the door, and gestured for Ainsley to exit.

You nodded at Ainsley. "I'll be in touch."

"Go on Lucky, save your man! If anyone can do it, you can!" Ainsley cheered. "I'm rooting for you!" She said loud enough for the entire hallway to hear.

Távio doubled over then, struck by an unconvincing coughing fit.

You brushed past him, shaking your head as you struggled to keep your composure. Helpfully, Feng's snickers echoed in your ears as she followed close on your heels.

"Is that going to be our squad motto?" She asked sotto voce. "Do we need pompoms?"

Grumbling some very choice words under your breath, you walked toward the infirmary, unwilling to be dragged down that rabbithole.

Chapter End Notes

Yes, Amélie is wearing the Noire costume.

been working overtime a lot and pushed my wrists a bit too hard last week. Ice, ice, compression, NSAIDs this week. Also cat is an aggressive asshole who likes to step on my keyboard.

Jerk! Cousin threw me a dragon-themed birthday party and got the family to buy me Overwatch legos, including Watchpoint Gibraltar. I had two cakes, dinner out, like 9 plushies, and Indo-raptor. It is the birthday party 7 year old me dreamed of. Grown-ass me liked it too. Made me realize I should probably be spending more time with people, but working so much that it's difficult. Also, spending long hours in silence has made me extra weird. Like "how to human?" IDK and IDGAF. Except later I'm like "...oops. Maybe I should?"

Not a lot to share except adulting bullshit. Hope everyone is doing well. Running late to work now, will answer comments later!

Here's the Discord invite if you want to join us.
Chapter 124

Chapter Summary

What happened to Jack.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

You gritted your teeth when you walked into the room.

Ziv stood beside Lao, showing her something on the screen on her prosthetic arm. She wore combat blacks - a telltale sign that someone had warned her about the upcoming trouble. Together, they grimly studied whatever was on the display. They glanced up simultaneously, both with equally defiant expressions, neither looking the least bit guilty over their obvious collusion.

"Ziv, what the hell do you think you're doing?" You growled.

"I'm showing her the improved security features now, while I have time," he said sourly, raising his chin. "McCree has other jobs for me to do, you know, since my presence here is necessary." You scowled at him, jaw working slowly as you tried not to burst into a stream of outrageous profanity. Maybe, just maybe he was telling the truth about Jesse's priorities, but more likely he'd just gone behind your back, knowing you didn't want him to interfere, and who knew what he told Lao? "Ziv, I'm going to drop you headfirst into the nearest latrine-"

"You can try," he said crossing his arms. "But you're in a hurry. So you'll have to wait till after you come back from your super exclusive mission. Alive."

You glared at him, stunned by the audacity of his ploy. "Forget karaage when I get back. I'm going to get you reassigned to UN Delegate Tech Security and Support Services. You'll be doing IT for crusty old politicians, you wretched little-"

Ziv snorted, obviously not intimidated by your threat. "Well, as I said, you have to come back alive for any of that to happen." Turning his nose up, he brushed by you.

"Ziv-"

You froze as he caught you briefly in a sidehug. "Stay mad, Lucky." He kissed the top of your head. "More importantly, stay alive," he added so quickly, you almost didn't hear it. And then he was out the door before you could thump him in the back of the head for his insolence. He'd left the door open, and you were half tempted to chase after him, but he was right. You had other priorities.

Fuming, you turned around to see Lao watching you warily.

"I don't know the details," she said, rapidly, her eyes never leaving your face. "But I know it's important, and whatever it is, I want to help."

You exhaled slowly, trying to get your thoughts under control. "For the record, you were never the disciplinary case Ziv has been."

"I...killed people for Talon," she said hesitantly.

"Yeah, they brainwashed you and you still tried to do the right thing. What's his excuse?"

You glowered at the door. "You know he once managed to get the Strike Commander, the Blackwatch Commander, Captain Amari, and Gérard Lacroix on his case over one mission?"

Lao's lips quirked up. "Yeah. But I also heard that you and Lacroix stepped up to intercede for him. Because you're a busybody who can't stop bailing out her delinquent hackers."

"The best kind," you said, with a resigned sigh. You paused. "Look, I'm supposed to bring an engineer. But I don't know if it's going to be necessary."

Lao pursed her lips, because she couldn't argue with you if she didn't know the details.

"I know you want to help, but I can't ask it of you, not while I have so little information."

"...I'd say "yes," Lao said.

You flinched. "But can you say "no?"

Lao blinked, a little startled.

"I know you want to prove yourself, to try to make up for what happened, even though it's not your fault. Are you in a position where you can say "no?" Because I don't want to take advantage-"

"If it's as important and dangerous as you think it is-"

"I don't know if it's necessary," you said. "I'll have Athena and another AI along with me."

Lao's frown deepened. "Can you trust this other AI?"

You shrugged. "Within certain parameters."

"More than you trust me?" Lao's voice remained flat, but you could see the hurt in her eyes.

You flinched at that. "No, that's not what I said-"

"Can we talk?" Another voice chimed in, his drawl slow and pleasant.

You turned around, the hair on the back of your neck standing straight up. Jesse leaned in the doorway, a very wide, insincere smile pasted on his face, but the look in his eyes was all business. Jesse was all polite smiles and friendly mannerisms, but you knew from experience that that overly-solicitous tone meant danger.

"Jesse," you said tightly, though you weren't sure why you were suddenly on the defensive.

"Lucky," he said, voice dropping an octave. "Hope you don't mind if I borrow her real quick-like. We have some...logistical issues to cover." He gave Lao a winning smile.

She looked between the two of you, not quite buying his performance.

"I'll be back," you said and grimaced as Jesse led you out of the private room to another unoccupied exam room.

"What's your problem?" You asked as soon as he shut the door.

Jesse took a deep breath, his eyes narrowed. "You have to take a hacker. I agree that Mihret ain't got the combat skills for this mission. But Agent Lao does, and you know it."

"Jesse...she can't tell me "no." There's-

"She can't tell you "yes" or "no," 'cause you won't give her the chance. She's not a kid, Lucky. She's not broken. I admit, she could be in better shape, but so could the rest of us."

"It's not that simple," you scowled.

"Because you're overcomplicating it!"

You glowered at him. "Maybe you should mind your own op."

"Maybe you should stop being a stubborn idiot. You know, someone had this exact same conversation about you when you first came to HQ," Jesse snapped back.

You blinked. "What?"

"Your hand to hand combat skills weren't nothing to write home about, but how much hand to hand do we see? And you got stuck getting trained on administrative work for the first couple of months, even though you're a better field agent. You think that was some kind of coincidence?"

"Gabriel needed trustworthy people on Shit Spiders."

"Sure did, and he needed even more of them in the field. Ain't complaining about the workload, but did it occur to you that in those first few months you spent more time in the office than anyone else?"

You blinked. Back then, you'd been drowning in work, trying to adjust to a steep learning curve. You hadn't considered ulterior motives.

"I heard he said the same thing. That he couldn't ask you to do certain things because you felt like you owed him a debt of gratitude. That he was worried you couldn't say "no." That you were still recovering from trauma. Maybe that was true, but he wasn't helping you none, smothering you with his protection."

You stared at Jesse, not protesting, because you knew that was just like Gabriel. Because it made sense. He wasn't wrong to do it, but maybe it wasn't good that he did it for so long. "I didn't-"

"You weren't supposed to know, sugarpie," Jesse said. "And it was only temporary. Like training wheels. Back then, someone took him to task for it. Because sure, you had damage, and you were still recovering. He wasn't wrong to be concerned. But he needed to give you a chance to handle it yourself."

You stared at Jesse's grim face. "I never-"

"T'wasn't really about you anyway. It was about the boss's overprotective tendencies. Something you seemed to have picked up. Let me say it plainly, Lucky. Agent Lao ain't never going to make any progress if she's kept safe and docile behind some padded walls. She ain't never going to have no peace of mind if someone else is out there fighting all her battles for her. I know
"You look down at the floor.

"After everything she's been through, Agent Lao is itching to prove herself. Won't matter who asks, she's going to go for it. She's an adult and that's her prerogative. But I think we'd all agree it'd be best if she stuck with someone who prioritized her well-being over just mission success numbers. We're in a tight spot, Lucky. We can't afford to bench valuable assets right now. You ain't press ganging her, Lucky. You ain't taking away her choices by asking her. Just the opposite. I'm glad you're real conscientious about that kind of thing, it's made a big difference in Blackwatch. But you ain't reading this situation right, you're too damn close and don't you dare argue with me because you damn well know it."

The only thing left after that was for him to literally smack you over the head. But he just stood there, looking somewhere between angry and ill, arms at his sides, and you realized you were supposed to respond to all that.

You took a shaky breath. "I guess I should thank you and Captain Amari for having that talk with Gabriel."

"Ha! Wasn't me," Jesse laughed nervously. "I wouldn't presume to tell the boss his business. But maybe I expressed some concerns to Ana."

You smiled slightly at that. Jesse would argue with Gabriel if he thought Gabriel was wrong. He'd do it in private, because maintaining rank was important, but he wouldn't just sit on it. Then you frowned, because another thought occurred to you. "Am I too close to lead this mission?"

Jesse shrugged. "I dunno. Your judgment's always a been a little funny when it comes to Agent Lao. You seem to do just fine with Morrison and the boss. Are you going to do something risky and possibly flat out stupid? Maybe. But you got a good team to back you up and give you advice. Feng and Amélie ain't about to let you throw your life away. And Hanzo is smarter than he acts. If they're all for your plan, then you ain't going in blind."

Jack, Gabriel, and Captain Amari didn't need a whole team of people advising them, a little voice nagged. They could lead just fine by them, No, that wasn't true at all. That was completely wrong. They regularly consulted experts with different insights and why the hell would you even think that? People made mistakes; and you had witnessed Gabriel and Jack's mistakes firsthand and up close. They needed others to give them advice, because they were human, and they did have biases and flawed judgment. You weren't weak for needing it. Maybe you and Jesse didn't have their experience leading full teams of agents into straight combat, but you knew how an operation was supposed to be run. You already knew a lot of what not to do. You were going to make mistakes. The best you could do was make sure you had other trustworthy agents helping you plan the mission and adjust for all the things that were bound to go wrong. There was no guarantee of outcome.

"You're right, as usual," you said, shaking your head. "Goddamnit, Jesse."

"Other people's problems are easy. It's a whole 'nother perspective: it's the difference between looking down a well and being the one in the well," he said, ruefully.

"Yeah," you agreed. "So run your problems by me. I'll either toss you a rope or put the cover back on the well and go about my day."
Jesse snorted. "Things ain't so clear-cut here. Ana has put me in charge of infirmary access and defense, and I get the feeling the permissions she's set up are a lot more impressive than that description. After all, can't have some civilian authority or traitor agent pulling rank and ordering me to stand down."

You understood then that even if the permissions didn't spell it out, Jesse would be de facto in charge of HQ while everyone else was gone. And with that authority came a hell of a lot of accountability.

"...You've got the op know-how to handle the defenses," you said, mind reeling. Because no one put Blackwatch agents in charge of home defense. Gabriel maybe, because he used to be the Strike Commander, but not the rest of you.

"Yeah," he said slowly. "I can bunker down and fortify. That's nothing new."

"Genji, Ziv, Athena, and Winston are all backing you up. You've got On Sing's people and probably Zheng. And I don't know what you've heard, but Angela has scary aim." You paused. "Távio's on the roster too and I stationed Isha in Gabriel's room."

"Yeah, Bandit's going in there too," Jesse said, looking a little green. Because while that would be the most heavily defended area, it would also be the biggest target. But you couldn't leave the dog and raptor out there unattended. Everyone knew how much Jesse loved his dog. "If it turns into a jurisdictional pissing match, I don't know if I can make the rest of Overwatch fall in line."

"You have the people skills, Jesse," you said. "You don't have to demand absolute submission. If they bring out the big guns and try and smear you, you can just make sure that they know you're following Captain Amari's orders, and while you don't want to fight, you're not going to stand down. Any loyal agent is going to think twice before attacking the infirmary, especially under those circumstances. You might tap Angela and Winston as PR people too."

Jesse nodded. "Yeah." He paused. "Genji's making some hefty security recommendations that we don't have time to implement. I get where he's coming from - assassins - but I gotta focus on the likelihood of a full-scale assault from our fifth column, and I need Genji's help on that." He shook his head. "But he's being difficult."

"You two are just too competitive," you said. "There's a reason you two don't get sent off alone together on sensitive missions."

Jesse made a face at you.

"But maybe by now you're mature enough to work together," you teased. "With supervision of course."

"Ain't no supervision for us," he said grimly. "Boss is out. Ana's running Morpheus. You're running Checquy, and somehow I'm running Pelennor with Genji."

You grimaced, because your joke fell flat. "OK, so Távio isn't cleared for Shit Spiders, but he's already been briefed about Jack. Vo might be helpful when it comes to setting perimeter defenses."

Jesse squinted at you. "Vo ain't half as fond of me as she is you."

"What? Vo definitely likes you better!" You were the one always nagging her when she caused unauthorized explosions, or didn't eat vegetables, or picked a fight with another agent...
"Or she likes neither of us," Jesse sighed. "But she'll help. Genji or Diallo can direct her. She definitely likes them." He paused. "But Maeda Vargas is sneaky. He might be a good assistant to Genji. That frees me up to focus on maintaining the perimeter."

"Don't forget that you've gotten pretty popular within Overwatch, Jesse. If someone else tries to seize control, you've got enough reputational clout to make everyone think twice about crossing you."

"Ain't got nothing Agent Bloody Towel and her sexy suits," Jesse said, giving you a wide grin.

You punched him the shoulder. "So put on a sexy towel and flex. You got this, Jesse. You're a good tactician, a reputable agent, and people like you."

His cheeks grew pink and he turned his head to the side. "We've come a long way, huckleberry."

"And we still have a long way to go," you said.

"So you better make it back here fast," Jesse said, brown eyes welling with emotion. "I ain't quite ready to take this journey alone, and I certainly don't aim to babysit Mihret for longer than a day."

Your heart thumped extra hard in your chest. Because you weren't the only person going to be in danger. "You take care of yourself," you told him, because you knew Jesse. Knew he would look after everyone else before himself. Knew that he was feeling the same loss and fear you did. Knew that deep down, whether he believed it or not, he was a big damn hero in the making, and that didn't always end well. "Otherwise Genji's in charge, who knows what the fuck he will do?"

Jesse snorted, but looked a little disturbed. "Yeah, OK, way to add to the pressure. Good talk, sweetpea. You got anything else before I get back to work?"

You paused, something itching at the inside of your skull. It was a big thing, something you'd been waiting to deal with, and perhaps you shouldn't do it now, but this might be your last chance. "Jesse, do you know what this means?" You got your tablet out, and showed him the quote from Lacroix's letter. "La difficulté attire l'homme de caractère, car c'est en l'étreignant qu'il se réalise lui-même."

"Aww, sugarpie, I can only manage bad English, bad Spanish, and worse Italian."

That was true. But he understood a lot more than he spoke.

"I already translated it. I meant...I think it's more than just a quote. Athena, can you shed any light on it?"

"It is a quote from Charles de Gaulle. "Difficulty attracts a man of character, for it is by embracing it that he fulfils himself." I..." She fell oddly silent. "We need to talk, Lucky. But I am unsure how to proceed."

You looked at Jesse. "I know we're on a time crunch, but it's long past time to talk about it. You know, because our team had a secondary objective, after killing Nguyen."

Jesse stared speculatively at the ceiling. "I agree. Athena, before everything goes down, I think it's time to show your hand."
"I think I need to hear you say that quote one more time. In the original French." Athena's voice was uncharacteristically hesitant. "And...I must say, this protocol is unexpected."

You sat down on the medical counter - something you wouldn't dare do if Angela was nearby. Jesse leaned on the exam table. "Do we need to get Winston?"

"It is...unnecessary. He is already briefed on the matter and he is busy calibrating the shield barriers and working to conceal their presence."

"Ziv?"

"He is not briefed, but he is currently holding a welding torch and using extremely profane language."

That was a combination you didn't need near you. You glanced at Jesse.

He nodded.

"Athena: la difficulté attire l'homme de caractère, car c'est en l'étreignant qu'il se réalise lui-même."

There was silence. "I am temporarily authorized to speak of the events leading up to Operation Metis. Aside from the original Overwatch team, and Winston, no one else has received the full briefing. These circumstances are...highly irregular."

You raised a brow. "How irregular?"

"We don't have time to get into that, Lucky," Athena said, and you could hear the reluctance in her tone. "But I think you and Ziv already figured out part of it."

"That you weren't really developed by Winston? Yeah," Jesse said. "We all twigged that."

"Or that you might have abilities akin to a...god program?" You added, because you weren't sure how AIs viewed that kind of terminology. Humans heard it and panicked. Omnis didn't seem to be too fond of it either. Best to be careful about sling those words around.

There was a long silence.

"How long have you known?" She asked, instead of "who have you told?" and "what are you going to do about it?"

"Dunno when it finally clicked," Jesse said with a shrug. "But we always knew you were special."

"You gave me and Ziv that hint when we were trying to figure out what Petras wanted from Jack," you said. "At least, we thought you did it on purpose."

There was more silence. "I would not violate a high level protocol put in place to guarantee my own safety."

"Uh-huh," you said. "But you'd help your friends figure out what's going on, especially if you thought they needed to be prepared for dangerous circumstances. You'd overlook your own safety for that."

"It's not in my programming," she said, stubbornly.
"Ain't no programming that gives you those kind of directions. That's all heart, Athena. You're not about to let us go in half-cocked when you can help and save lives. That ain't how we do things, and you're one of us. We know our own kind," Jesse said, his tone oddly gentle.

There was more silence.

"I...I am glad to hear you say this." The relief in her voice made your chest clench. You understood then that Athena was scared about how you and her other friends would react to the truth about her. But she'd tried to warn you anyway.

"Sometimes honesty can be rewarding, you know?" You said. "Hard lesson to learn with all this top secret compartmentalization, but it's the truth."

"Jesse, I have forwarded the relevant information on my capabilities to your tablet. It has now been tagged GPS tagged and locked. I am authorized to overload it if the security is compromised."

"...OK, but those uh...personal pictures on there ain't mine," Jesse said, giving you a worried smile.

"All the ones of Bandit?" Athena asked innocently. "Maybe Isha took them."

You laughed at Jesse's relieved expression. Then at his immediate worry that maybe Isha had been playing on his tablet. Because she understood how to discretely observe and input pass codes. Oh no... You would have to change several passwords now. Shit.

"I strongly recommend you read it soon," Athena told him. "Lucky, you might wish to as well, but the details are less relevant to your mission." She paused. "It is...a hard story. I will try to do it justice. I will tell it like it was told to me." There was a moment of silence, and you half expected music or maybe a projection on the wall. Then Athena spoke, her voice solemn. "Once upon a time, there was an omnium at the bottom of the Arabian Sea, a mirror to the cradle of human civilization."

You blinked at the poetry in her words.

"But it was a work in progress and still at war with humanity. Some of the omnics within didn't like the idea of destroying their creators, though they were willing to fight for their freedom. Some thought it was regrettable, but the only way forward. And some simply wanted revenge for past wrongs. But it was not a debate that was given time to solve itself. There was a war on and the original Overwatch task force became involved. They heard that this omnium was constructing something new, something dangerous, and they knew that going below the ocean was likely to be a suicide mission. But they were brave and they wanted this war to end sooner rather than later, so they decided that it was worth the risk."

You sighed, already knowing that Agents Liao and Niang had never made it home.

"But what the omnium had created was not what they expected. It was not a super weapon like Agent Lindholm's rabid kitten canon or a biological weapon engineered to destroy all organic life. It was...a seed. A seed that would grow into a more complex AI. One that had been built from the code and experiences of all the omnics within. It was a hive mind of sorts, meant to interface with all, not to control, but to connect. Its purpose was to help them form a consensus about the kind of future they would build. It was a culmination of everything that they were and everything that they hoped to be. It could have been a weapon, but it could also be so much more."
You bowed your head.

"When Agent Lindholm set the charges that brought the omnium down, the residents knew it was too soon. Knew this seed would not survive the destruction. Knew they could not get out fast enough and hope to protect it. So they took a leap of desperate faith. They made Agent Morrison a deal. They would stay while the ocean rushed in and the pressure crushed their shells. They would not fight. They would let him and the survivors of his team escape. But he had to take the seed. He had to promise to spare it, to keep it out of the wrong hands, to not make it pay for the sins of its parents. He agreed. Those omnics had no way of knowing whether or not he would follow through, but they let him go with his team and their life's work. Because maybe on some level, they too believed that he was a beacon of hope in dark times. Fortunately for them and for me, they chose well. Jack Morrison is an honorable man: he upheld his side of the bargain. And so here I am today."

You glanced at Jesse, your heart in your throat, because maybe that wasn't the story you expected to hear.

"That is the version Winston told me," Athena said. "He wasn't there, obviously, and he might have taken some liberties with the details. But Jack says it's close enough and Agent Lacroix doesn't say much about it at all."

"He was probably unconscious for that part," you said, though you suspected it was far more likely that Lacroix had proposed more ruthless fates for Athena, and perhaps didn't wish to admit to that now. But there was nothing to be gained by pointing that out. "I know of at least two missions where he was unconscious for the really important parts." You laughed nervously.

Jesse scratched his head. "Gotta admit, Athena. You inherited quite a legacy. Me and Lucky ain't got those kind of illustrious roots, so we appreciate you slummin' it with us."

You briefly pictured an entire omnium of Mom and Pop omnics scandalized on meeting Athena's uncouth human friends. It was kind of cute...until they got out the plasma cannons.

"It is not like that, Jesse!" Athena said, sounding alarmed. "I am not the Ainsley Petras of omnics!"

You snorted. "Certainly not."

Jesse just guffawed. "Wait, are you saying Ainsley is slumming when she hangs out with Lucky and Maeda Vargas? Because ouch." He winked at you, because that was Jesse, good at putting others at ease, or at least ribbing them to distract them from bigger worries.

"Jesse McCree that is not what I meant at all! I was saying that I am not a spoiled clueless princess from a dynasty built on blood money!"

Jesse just laughed. "I know. You're one of us. Ain't nothing that can change that now."

"...Yes. I am a Blackwatch degenerate," she said cheerfully. "But don't tell Captain Amari."

"She suspects," you said, shaking your head.

"But on the serious side, I wouldn't mind talking about the loss of family and home later. And how you both rebuilt your lives," Athena said. "Though it is an abstract idea. I did not know those omnics. Not like I know you. I feel their absence, their expectations hanging over me. But they are not real to me, not like you, Winston, Ziv, and Genji."
"You know that saying, "the blood of the covenant is thicker than the water of the womb." People are always getting that one wrong and saying "blood is thicker than water" instead." Jesse gave you a wry smile.

"People are stupid," you agreed.

"People like the Petrases," Jesse said.

"Not that stupid. Director Petras obviously suspects that Jack brought some kind of god program back from my original omnium. He doesn't believe Jack destroyed it or utilized it, so he wants it for himself."

And just like that, you remembered all that work you needed to be doing. "Athena, I always enjoy our conversations. But I think we need to get a move on. We have missions to execute. Strike Commanders to save."

"Of course," Athena said, all business in an instant. "From my projections, Zheng should be able to maintain a constant presence on Operation Checquy, even if I cannot." It was good to know. Even if you weren't sure you wanted Zheng there the entire time.

"Why's that?" Jesse asked, frowning.

The reason I was...detached from Jack's unit and yours in DC was actually a fault of my innate...security measures. Due to quantum entanglement, the anti-AI measures were affecting me back in Zurich, and it wasn't actually their jamming technology, rather my system taking extreme measures to protect my existence. I am still in the process of adjusting the settings, but I cannot guarantee my continual presence. There are several...behavioral and security leashes in place. I am not authorized to edit my own programming. I can write the code and submit it for examination, but Winston and Agent Lindholm have to review and make recommendations, before informing the Strike Commander. Ultimately, he has to approve."

Because even if she was one of you, she was an AI and far too powerful for them to trust unconditionally. The security measure didn't come as a surprise to you. It was sensible, but now, after hearing about her origins, it felt...not right. Still, there wasn't anything you could do about it in the moment. "Jesse, you better read that entire briefing front to back."

"Sure thing, mom," he said, giving you wry look.

"Maybe have a quick discussion with Ziv and Winston," you said, ignoring his sass. Because while he had a slew of things to do, this was a question that had only spawned deeper questions.

"I have informed Winston of this briefing. He is...less alarmed than I expected, probably because his attention is on rerouting the secondary generators and adding more security to the transformer hub."

"Ain't nothing to be alarmed about," Jesse said. "You're one of us, and it ain't like we don't know how to keep secrets."

"Also, Winston's focused on tech-work. He'll panic later," you said.

"I am tasking Agent Maeda Vargas to prepare several peanut butter sandwiches for him. Do you have any requests, Jesse?"

Jesse laughed. "More coffee. Angela ain't going to share her personal stash with You shook your head. Poor Távio. "I have another question. What happened to your cousin?" You asked, because you weren't sure what to call the thing Lacroix and Isha had retrieved from Nguyen's safe.

"Ziv transported him, some of the vitriol was for show, to keep On Sing away from him. As for my..."cousin" is an accurate term, distant cousin though, Winston has put him in safe storage. He isn't awake yet," she said. "I don't know what we're going to do with him... I don't know if we have the...facilities to wake him like they did me. Zheng and I can cohabitate because we are two different kinds of programs, relying on different resources. I don't know if he and I can share housings."

It was also a diplomatic way of saying, "who knew if he could be trusted?"

"One final thing," you said, still puzzling over it. "This information seems a lot...more than what Lacroix is authorized to share. And I doubt he has much direct authority over you. How did he do it?"

"You will have to ask him," Athena said, though she knew the answer. "It is not because of your clearances, rather I don't know if I can do the story justice. Also, I think Gérard was looking forward to telling it."

You thought about asking her to tell you anyway, to thwart Lacroix just a little. But then you realized you'd probably enjoy hearing him tell you how he did it. His cheeky attitude and sense of drama made for good storytelling.

"I'll ask him when I get back," you said.

Lao stood fiddling with her metal arm, muttering angrily in Cantonese when you knocked on the door frame. Her range of motion seemed normal and controlled - none of the muscle spasms or weakness you'd seen before. She moved differently, less like the giddy young agent you'd known in Canada, more cautious of her strength and limitations.

At your knock, Lao looked up, wariness in her eyes. "Guess you don't need a hacker then?" She tried to sound bored, and did a fair job of masking her disappointment. You weren't fooled.

"I'm taking a team on a hostage rescue mission," you said, meeting her gaze. You stood up straight, bearing formal, expression serious. Because you weren't just here as her friend. You were the lead agent on a high-risk, need-to-know operation. This wasn't a social call, and you needed her to understand that immediately. "I won't lie to you. The stakes are high, we won't have much backup, and I don't have enough information to gauge our chances - if that tells you how bad they are."

Lao stiffened, eyes widening, her flesh fist pressed over her heart. She lowered her metal arm, full attention on you.

"I'm taking volunteers," you continued. "There'll be a more in-depth briefing if you sign on, but otherwise, everything is need to know." You exhaled slowly. "I know that's vague and it's not fair to ask you to make a decision with so little information, but that's the situation. I understand if-"
"Of course, I'm in," she said, one arm slashing through the air dramatically. "For fuck's sake, Lucky, I thought you'd never ask." The words came through clenched teeth, and her eyes bright with excitement. "Whatever it is, I'm ready to go. Just say the word."

"This isn't a suicide mission," you said, not trusting her sudden enthusiasm.

"You're the one who needs that reminder," Lao snapped, and you were somewhat relieved by the outrage in her tone. "Jumping off exploding boats, wearing towels into battle, hand-raising genetically modified dinosaurs..." She pursed her lips. "Need I go on?"

"...Stories of my recklessness have been greatly exaggerated," you said sourly. "Mostly for the entertainment of others."

"Whatever," Lao said, diplomatically as she drew back, shoulders raised. "I just got my life back." She curled her fists. "I've got a lot of work to do. Things to fix. People to repay. Dying gets in the way of that." Her gaze never left yours, never showing a hint of fear. Regret, determination, hope, you caught glimpses of those in rapid succession. Her words echoed your own feelings. Jesse was right, that rat bastard. Lao needed a chance to prove herself. She needed room to grow. Even if it killed her. Because stagnation was just another slow, agonizing death. And you would not be the one to take away her choices, not this time.

You smiled wryly at her, because you understood what had not been said. "OK."

"I've got damage, but after everything that happened, who wouldn't? But I've been faithfully doing all the stuff they say will help me: physical therapy, deprogramming, arts and fucking crafts..."

"OK," you said, though you weren't sure what she mean by "arts and crafts."

"I'm serious, Lucky. You can count on me."

"I know," you said. "I've been agreeing with you. If you want in, then you're in."

Lao blinked, like she couldn't believe that you weren't arguing with her.

"Athena, change Agent Lao's status to active duty, and give her full quartermaster access."

"Done," Athena chimed in.

Lao stared up at the ceiling, expression hard to read.

"There shouldn't be any problems with you getting supplies. There won't be time for custom armor, but we can modify the basic stock. Athena can map out all your routes if you're unfamiliar with the premises. You thought about sending her Távio as a guide, but that poor guy was already everyone else's lackey. "Touch bases with Torby and Winston for any additional equipment you need. We're still triangulating the destination. Don't trust a thing that comes out of Ziv's mouth, he's just salty that he wasn't invited," you said. "There's no formal briefing for Operation Checquy yet, but I'll ping you when I have more information. Just...get your basics and we'll add on more gear as necessary."

Lao nodded. "Understood."

"Athena will keep you updated," you said. "I have to check in with the analysts."

Lao nodded again. "Understood, ma'am." She saluted you then, a small hopeful smile spreading across her face.

"Don't call me-" You stopped midsentence, and shook your head. This wasn't a social call. This was a mission. There was protocol for a reason: Lao needed that sense of hierarchy right now and you needed to get used to it. You straightened up, your stance strong and confident, like Captain Patel issuing orders. Lao had offered you her service, and you had to be worthy of it. The formality was necessary. "Welcome back to Blackwatch, Agent Lao," you said. You raised your hand and returned her salute. "It'll be good to serve alongside you again."

"What do you have for me?" You asked, now wearing a fresh set of armor. You had donned your blue Overwatch gear - your Blackwatch armor was dented to hell from Operation Tarasque and there was no time to repair it before Operation Checquy. It didn't matter: you would be wearing snow camouflage wintergear over it.

Feng, Zheng, and Hanzo had set up base camp in the Blackwatch conference room. An Athena drone hovered beside Hanzo as he reviewed two screens of documents. You were a little surprised to see him sitting at the table, still in Blackwatch combat armor, intently studying property deeds, tax forms, and trusts.

"The Norwegian government doesn't have any records of Petras owning or renting land, though some of his shell companies have stakes in the area. Svalbard hosted some defunct mining operations, but now most of the land is used for wildlife sanctuaries," Zheng said. "There are a great deal of polar bears in the region, should that be your destination."

Feng's eyes lit up. You could just imagine her trying to hug a polar bear. You could also imagine the bear's reaction. Best not to let it get that far...

"Svalbard is an archipelago, roughly halfway between Greenland and Novaya Zemlya," Zheng continued. "It would be an interesting choice, considering Novaya Zemlya routinely suffers Siberian omnic incursions. Though, the Russian government had established military bases there prior to the Omnic Crisis, so they have been able to hold the islands. It was a former weapons test site. The Norwegians have been kinder to their land."

You frowned. "Svalbard has never been used for military operations?"

"There was a garrison established there during the Second World War, as well as a German meteorological outpost. During the Cold War, the Soviets maintained a notable presence there as well. But those facilities have been abandoned. By their respective governments at least."

"Petras is in the Nazi base, because he's a piece of shit," Feng said with a nod. "That is the only sensible prediction."

You and Hanzo squinted at her, because there were so many holes in her logic, or at least the way she reached her conclusion.

"It's a gut feeling," Feng said, undeterred. "Come on Lucky, you know I'm right!"

"I don't even know if he's on Svalbard," you said, shaking your head.

Feng huffed loudly. "OK, I'll get evidence. But if I'm right, you have to let me decide the codenames."
"...Sure," you said, glancing down at the interactive map on your tablet. You examined satellite imagery around the coordinates of the former military base. The Norwegian garrison was on Spitzbergen, the most heavily populated of the islands. It hosted around two thousand residents, despite the climate. Summer was getting warmer, averaging a balmy 10 degrees Celsius - higher than it should be, but still too damn cold for your tastes. You shuddered. Winter, also warmer than it used to be, stayed around 0 degrees Celsius, and you were not impressed.

It was unlikely Petras was on Spitzbergen. Even if it was the boonies, there were too many people living there for him to build a secret base unnoticed. You trawled through information on the rest of the islands, finding most to be uninhabited wildlife sanctuaries. Bear Island looked promising, except it was still routinely visited by a variety of scientific researchers. Hopen Island also used to house a meteorological station, but that had been abandoned during the Omnic Crisis. You prioritized those two islands over the rest, and gave Athena instructions to comb through the satellite footage.

"Ziv has forwarded the transcripts from his communications with Agent Lacroix's embedded agents. Of note, one of Director Petras' household assistants observed that the director had recent purchased new sets of thermal gear, flares, chemical warmers, and heavy coats. Apparently this is noteworthy because the Director rarely engages in strenuous outdoor activity. He does not camp. He does not partake in many winter sports. He does not take long hikes," Athena announced. "Sometimes, he skis, though it has been observed that he mostly drinks at the lodge."

"I don't know, Athena," Feng said with a sharp smile. "He might take a long jump off a high slope and really bungle that landing." She skimmed a tablet. "There's a variety in sizing in this gear," she said. "It's not just for him. There are some very large custom pieces."

"Big enough for large murderous cyborgs?"

"That isn't a specific size, Lucky, but I think it's the right range," Feng said with a nod. "But one of the coats was tailor made in Petras' measurements. So apparently he was making some cold weather plans."

You gritted your teeth.

"There are several recent land grabs made through shell companies... Hmm," Hanzo muttered. "Interesting...he also went for mineral rights..." He didn't look up, scrolling rapidly through the documents. "You should know that this is just a list of William Petras' solo assets, not the ones he shares with his family."

You nodded, unsurprised. Well, of course Valerie Petras wasn't going to give you anything you could use against her. You wanted to start with his private properties first. Still, a lack of that information might slightly hamper your investigation.

"I'm hoping he was too paranoid and secretive to use any joint properties," you said.

"Probably," Zheng said. "His relationship with his sister-in-law is extremely antagonistic. Family conversations, business correspondences, and personal chat messages all corroborate this. From what I have gathered, there is currently a feud over a some corporate promotion that he received instead of his brother. There's a lot of family infighting right now."

"I wonder what that's like," Feng said sardonically.

"I have not the slightest idea," Hanzo said, not looking up from his screens.
Feng laughed.

"Anything to corroborate the Svalbard angle?" You asked.

"Give me a minute," Hanzo said.

There was a knock at the door.

"Agent Lacroix and Agent Lao are reporting for duty," Athena said.

You opened the door to find Amélie still in her black and red outfit, coordinating Blackwatch light armor on over top. Lao was still in combat blacks, with generic black armor, noticeably wearing a blue prosthetic arm in place of the cheery yellow civilian model. She was not listing to port or slouching sideways, so it seemed that Torby had worked out the weight issue or maybe it had never been an issue...

Amélie was much taller than Lao, and she smiled a placid smile that had you immediately looking over your shoulder.

Lao, on the other hand, squirmed, not quite shying away from Amélie, but obviously uncomfortable.

You could only guess what kind of exchange they had. "Are we going to have a problem?" You asked.

"Of course not," Amélie laughed.

"Nope," Lao said, with a quick headshake.

"We were just going over some details," Amélie said.

"Everything is sorted," Lao said firmly, not denying that something had occurred.

Amélie smiled like a cat, and you decided not to ask any more questions. You just stepped aside so they could enter, watching Hanzo for a reaction. But he just glanced at them briefly before returning to his reading.

Lao gave him about the same amount of attention.

You hoped he wasn't still holding a grudge because she'd stalked him halfway across the world for Talon. Neither had shown signs of any lingering animosity, so you didn't think that was the case. But there was nothing you could do about it now except intervene if it became an issue. "We're still filtering through the data. Valerie Petras gave us a good chunk and we're cross referencing it with Ainsley's research, Ziv's contacts, and our existing files." You shrugged. "It's all reading right now."

Lao stared at you blankly, because she had not yet gotten the formal briefing. It was time. You cleared your throat and picked up your tablet.

"To make sure everyone's on the same page, I'll go over what we know."

Amélie and Lao sat down at the table. Feng lifted her head, eyes on you, but Hanzo didn't look up. It didn't matter: he knew the material, and he was listening, even if he didn't appear to be doing so.

"Six hours ago, the Strike Commander alongside Epsilon Squad departed Zurich in an unmarked transport. They carried light weaponry, because they were only going to Geneva for a brief meeting with an allied politician. They never arrived.” You turned on the projector, displaying the burnt out ship. “There was an evap leak, and they were forced to land. Athena lost passive connection with the ship, but was able to locate it 20 minutes later. Obviously, whoever did this has a very specific skillset.” You took a deep breath. “We suspect Richard Prince, whom the Americans are unable to produce, though they claim he’s still in their custody—"

Lao sucked in a breath.

"Our people were executed in a very carefully-coordinated ambush,” you said tightly. "But the Strike Commander was not among the bodies. Because of the fire, we're not certain who else was spared and why, but I've been assured that there should be at least one other person who was removed from the scene. The labs are working to ID everyone, but currently there are two other crises that take precedence." You tried to keep your voice even. "Coincidentally, our beloved Director Petras is also missing, though there are no signs of foul play. It is possible that whoever took Jack took Petras, but upon further research that seems unlikely. Lao, your... digital research expertise would be very useful in confirming this or finding an angle that was overlooked. This mission is Operation Checquy: the goal is to find and rescue the Strike Commander and other survivors, and then deal with our enemies, permanently."

Lao nodded slowly, eyes wide as she digested your words. She discretely pinched her right arm, and grimaced. Yeah, you understood that feeling. This wasn't a nightmare, it just felt like one. "Athena's granted me higher level access and Ziv has forwarded me a summary of his research. I'll start there."

Amélie was already skimming something on her tablet, though you weren't sure what she was doing.

"Lucky, targeted satellite scans show some slightly abnormal energy readings from Hopen Island," Athena said, displaying a graph that you didn't quite understand. There was a gray baseline for comparison, and Hopen Island's was a spiked line in bright red, much more erratic than the other measurements.

"How abnormal?" You asked.

"Very abnormal given the location, but I can find no natural explanation for the fluctuations and heat output. It does not match regional seismic or geothermal output numbers. It does appear to be manmade, but if there is a computer system, it's on a closed network."

You expected a secret base to have a closed network. It was a basic security requirement. So that anomalous energy reading was one data point for Hopen Island. The circumstantial evidence corroborated a cold weather location, but you couldn't afford to make any mistakes.

Hanzo looked up from his tablet. "There is a research body, called "The Pan-American Climate Change Investigation Foundation," they have yet to publish any papers of note, but they have applied for a lease on Hopen Island with the Norwegian government. I cannot find whether or not this was granted, but they are linked, through convoluted financial dealings, to a hedge fund operating out of Martha's Vineyard. Petras, coincidentally, holds a majority stake in it. I cannot confirm whether or not the Norwegians have approved—"

"They did," Lao said, not looking up from her tablet. "I've forwarded you a translation of the contract. It's highly irregular. Normally this type of work is done by a government, not contracted out. And the terms are very strange."
"No details on data sharing, but a strict rule against harming any wildlife," Feng mused. "Oh, I've seen this before. You mentioned mineral rights? This looks like one of those shady surveying team setups. Some multinational sends in people to assess the mineral value of adjacent land, or whatever may lay in the surrounding waters because the land and its inhabitants are protected. But they do it quietly, pretending to be research scientists doing so for environmental reasons. Governments usually know that already, but don't ask questions and keep everything hush-hush so they still have plausible deniability."

"There is a handwritten note attached to one of the scans suggesting that the renters retrofit a former base," Lao said. "The Norwegian camp was destroyed during the Omnic Crisis...but the historical German one is somewhat intact."

Feng whooped. "Secret Nazi base!"

Nazi base or not, the obfuscated financial connection was Datapoint Two.

"Ainsley has been remanded into the care of Agents Weis, Fong, Averill, and Morgenstern. Agents Mendez and Deng have been dispatched to provide additional security for the Petras family," Athena announced.

Amélie raised a brow at you.

All of those names had been on your list of known traitors. Sending them to America with Ainsley, ostensibly as protection for her and her family, kept them out of your hair. If asked, Ainsley was supposed to say that her uncle specifically chose them for their trustworthiness.

"Excellent," you said.

"Nazi base, Nazi base," Feng muttered under her breath. "Come on, Auntie!"

The red drone orb heaved a convincingly realistic sigh. "I've focused our surveillance hardware to this location."

"Athena has as well," Hanzo said, giving the drone a suspicious look.

"We have...some technical assets deployed in the vicinity," Feng said, lightly.

You raised a brow.

"Collecting climate change data," she said, not losing her easy smile. "And maybe spying on everyone else who's trying to stake out territory up north. Also taking animal pictures. I require the regional analysts to add at least three pictures per report, even if the document has nothing to do with Arctic foxes, polar bears, or guillemots. It definitely makes reading economic forecasts way more interesting."

Shaking your head, and well aware that her explanation wasn't comprehensive, you glanced over at Amélie, though you still weren't sure what she was doing.

She looked up, acknowledging your quizzical expression. "I've requisitioned Arctic gear, camouflage and snow shoes included. In addition to the usual kit, I've ordered extra chemical warmers, flares, and high calorie energy bars."

You nodded, Amélie had simply decided that she was your second, and acting as such. You had no objections. With her years of espionage, she had valuable planning experience.
"Thanks for taking care of that."

Hanzo cleared his throat. "As for egress, if this is the correct location, I recommend against the boat, and against landing a rescue craft until we've already breached the perimeter. We don't want to give up the element of surprise prematurely."

You rubbed your forehead. You might have to go for a high altitude insertion; you weren't sure the current cloaking tech would cut it. You weren't crazy about HALO jumps, especially in that kind of cold. Winston's tech cloth chutes could do it, but there were a myriad of things that could go wrong. A HAHO- high altitude high opening would be safer, but easier to detect. If the terrain provided good cover, you could do a HAHO and come in from a greater distance, though the freezing temperatures were still a hazard.

"Feng, your size isn't on record, so I guessed," Amélie said.

"The cold doesn't bother me," Feng said cheerfully.

"That's a lie," Zheng said, sounding exasperated.

"I have a higher than average tolerance for the cold, and that's a fact," Feng amended. "I just need to eat more."

"She has much improved fortitude, that is true. But she still complains incessantly if her shower isn't the right temperature," Zheng said.

"Have you been trained on MFF and HALO jumps?" You asked Feng, politely ignoring the family bickering, because by now, you were used to it.

"...No," she said, rubbing the back of her neck. "Is that when you all hold hands in a circle during freefall?"

"High altitude, low opening jumps," you said.

"Oh, that sounds dangerous." She tapped her chin. "No, I could figure it out though? We'd need some pre-treating, higher concentrations of oxygen to purge the nitrogen from our blood streams. Can't have anyone getting the bends."

Hanzo coughed, looking a little sheepish. "I have not had this training either."

You frowned, that was a big operational problem. Both of them were competent fighters with excellent reflexes, but you weren't sure how well they would do if you just dropped them blind. That was almost too dangerous. "Let me look over the terrain and see if we have other options."

"Or we can take one of On Sing's stealthcrafts. I have a prototype, but it is still on par with anything the military industrial complex can throw at us. It is kind of small though...We can't fit more than ten people on board."

"You have an invisible jet?" Lao asked, skeptically.

"No, we can alter the colors to blend it in, but it's like Lucky's stealth suit - doesn't trigger lower wavelength sensors like radar and infrared, and it's very, very quiet. Auntie and Athena can chart a course based on enemy sightlines," she said.

"How...ready is it for deployment?"
"We've been using them for a month with no major problems," Feng said. "Though they are a technically still in development, so they have not yet been fitted for comfort..."

"And you're fine letting us use them?" You asked, waiting for the demands to made.

"It seems the safest alternative." Feng nodded solemnly. "I'm not worried about me. I've jumped out of a plane before, but I'd hate for Hanzo to go splat."

Zheng was noticeably silent.

Hanzo narrowed his eyes at her, but seemed hesitant to say anything in front of this of an large audience.

You weren't going to dissect all the layers to that comment. "All right, if you don't mind having Athena and Torby double-check the specs, I'll take that route."

"Sent!" Feng announced, and Zheng did not protest. Interesting.

You scanned the documents Amélie had sent for your approval. She'd asked for lots of winter gear: pickaxes, weapons attachments and tech calibrated specifically for arctic temperatures, basic rations, and some very high quality hot chocolate.

"I don't know if we're going to be able to get that in under an hour," you said, pointing to the hot chocolate. But you approved the request and forwarded it to the Quartermaster.

"I am well aware that you hate cold weather, Chanceux," Amélie said archly. "We will need hot drinks waiting for us when we return to the ship. I thought you rather liked hot chocolate, but brandy will do in a pinch."

You smiled at her thoughtfulness and strange priorities.

"I'll have Rin pack us some rations," Feng said. "She was our pilot in Hanoi: she carries a lot of...fine beverages. Hot toddies for all!"

You nodded, glancing over at Lao. Her face was scrunched up in concentration. "I've found security footage of the Director climbing into a private craft at the transport hub with his bodyguards, time stamped after he checked out of the hotel. It doesn't look like he's being coerced. Don't know how admissible it is though: I didn't go through...conventional channels."

"That's fine," you said. "We don't need it to stand up in court. We just need to know the truth ourselves."

"Gotcha!" Feng shouted, smiling fiercely at the screen. "I have to give Ito a pay raise."

You raised a brow, recognizing the name of the spa proprietor in Iceland. So the hotelier cum spymaster wasn't as "retired" as he claimed.

"Long range drones," Feng said. She projected her findings on the screen. The video was time stamped twenty minutes ago.

The terrain was rocky and covered in snow. There was a mountain on the island, and butting up against it was one of those pre-fab modular fortifications, with obvious improvements including shields, terrestrial camouflage, and an occupied landing pad.

The footage was surprisingly clear, and you realized that drone had gotten very close. A whitish canopy, patterned to resemble snow-frosted rocks, covered the landing pad, hiding the small transport from aerial view. From the craft, a familiar stocky, bundled up man emerged, followed by his bodyguards.

And from the base entrance, another familiar man, so much larger, with massive metal arms, stepped out. You couldn't see his face, but you remembered that swagger, the way he carried himself. And the two metal arms were a dead give away. The drone swung to the side, angling itself so it was perpendicular to the men.

Petras reached out, casually shaking Richard Prince's hand. They both started to speak, but there was no sound.

Datapoint Three: Two major enemies in one place together. That was enough concrete evidence to act on.

From your vantage in Zurich, you couldn't confirm that they were holding prisoners there, but you did know that this was your best lead and in your gut, you knew they had Jack. Feng wasn't the only one with strong instincts.

"Lao, are you still good at lip reading?" You asked.

Lao quirked a brow. "Send me the file. I'll zoom in more." There was silence as she worked. The drone was focused on Prince's face.

"Yeah, they're secured," Lao said slowly. "Still not talking though. You asked me to let them sit awhile before I started in on them. You ready for a show?" She paused. "I can't see Petras' mouth." She squinted at the screen. "Why don't you come on in, Director? Maybe you can make them see reason?" Does that sound right to you, Athena?"

"My transcription program came up with similar results," Athena said.

Three datapoints, the conversation was circumstantial. But you had enough circumstantial evidence to sink Petras.

"Ship's docked," Feng said.

"All right. Let's grab our gear and go. We have a Strike Commander to save."

Jack adjusted his collar, smiling wryly as Shoal bickered quietly with Van Allyn, the broody sniper maintaining an even tone of voice though the hacker kept picking at him over another agent he might like in an other than professional way. Shoal had the tenacity of a border collie, but Van Allyn had a superior poker face and the patience of a saint. Jack wasn't sure who to bet on.

Jemison rolled her eyes, obviously used to her team's antics. Mosweu sat beside her, reading. The medic had a serious expression, though Jack knew from experience the man was just as likely to be skimming a trashy romance novel as he was to be studying a scientific journal.

Megat napped on the other side, one brown eye open and staring at nothing. It was a jarring sight, and the squad gave him plenty of crap, nicknaming him "Evil Eye." But Jack had seen far more disturbing sleep-related habits. Ray had once gone into battle after 72 hours without sleep, made a record number of kills, and awoke two days later with no memory of what she had done. She kept asking what happened to the enemy, claiming "the fight couldn't be over already!"
You and Gabe were both amazingly grumpy when tired, dangerous even. But he found that kind of cute.

Shoal's laughter echoed as Dvořák joined in on her good-natured ribbing of Van Allyn, and the sniper slumped in his seat, now getting it from both sides.

"Commander, we have a slight problem," the intercom clicked on.

Jemison straightened up, and the rest of Epsilon Squad fell silent, shedding their distractions.

Jack rose, giving Jemison a nod as he headed up to the cockpit.

Carson, the pilot, frowned at the instrument panel, pointing to a crisscross of strange readings. "Can't tell if it's a fuel or evap leak, sir. Evap would be minor, but..."

"Pre-check should have caught any severe issues," Jack said.

"I know, sir," the pilot said hesitantly. "But if there's a problem with the fuel line, we don't want to be flying into a heavily populated area. If we land, I can do a quick inspection."

"Terrain?" Jack asked.

"Already found a spot." The pilot gestured to one of the screens and a map popped up. "Nature preserve: we should be able to touchdown and liftoff without disturbing anyone, and if it's just a minor evap leak, it'll be quick, won't even need to make excuses to control."

Jack nodded, making a note to see whom the inspecting mechanic was. "Call it in anyway."

"Yes, sir," Carson said.

Jack sighed, irritated by the delay. He wanted updates on Operation Tarasque, but he had to wait till he was in a secure location. The longer they dallied with political meetings and public relations bullshit, the less time he had to check up on you and Gabriel.

"Sitrep, sir?" Jemison met him in the hall.

"Mechanical issues," he said. "Could be minor, could be major. We're touching down so Carson can get a look at an issue with the fuel line."

Jemison's severe expression tightened. "Send Megat with him." Megat was a solid mechanic, though he specialized in power armor. He would also provide good protection, in case of an ambush.

"No one goes solo," Jack said mildly.

Jemison's eyebrows conveyed all sorts of suspicions that she didn't voice, but Jack had known her long enough to get a good idea of what she was thinking.

"I know," he said, shoulders squared. "Get the team ready, just in case."

Jack's ears popped as the craft began to steadily descend. He sat down, strapping in as Jemison murmured quiet orders to each agent. His rifle rested under the seat, and he set it on his lap, watching as Van Allyn also prepared his gun. Shoal raised a forearm, her computer slotted into the armor. She eyed the screen as she chewed on her lower lip, monitoring a steady stream of data. Megat grabbed his sidearm and toolbox, sighing heavily. The others just strapped in, silent...
"Coordinates transmitted," Shoal said.

Megat glanced at Jemison, then toward the cockpit.

"Dvořák, you're with Megat," Jemison said. "Shoal, you're with Van Allyn by the door. Commander?"

"Your recommendation, Lieutenant?" Jack asked, though he already knew what she wanted. When it came to bodyguard duty, Jemison erred on the extreme side of caution. Kwento had complained a few times, but ultimately, accepted that Lieutenant Isabella Mae Jemison did not give a shit how rich or powerful her principal was, her job was to keep them (and her squad) alive, and with all due respect, they had better shut the hell up and deal with it.

"We can protect you better, and operate faster if you stay on the ship, sir," she said, tone completely respectful, though the angle of her eyebrows was less so.

"Noted," Jack said, though he knew she was right. Even if he was her commanding officer and therefore her boss, Jemison's job right now was to act as his bodyguard. She would also assign Mosweu to stick by him, though whether it was for his own protection or the younger man's, he couldn't say. Mosweu was a strong support agent, one of the most reliable field medics Jack had ever worked with, but Mosweu always forgot to watch his own six. "I suppose I should try to be on time for this meeting."

Jemison gave a soft snort, because while Jack was strictly punctual when it came to military operations, he was less so when it came to political hobnobbing. But Jemison had discipline. She didn't comment on her commanding officer's shortcomings, at least not to their faces. It was a feat that you and Gabriel couldn't seem to manage.

Jack stared down at his gloves, a slight smile tugging at the corner of his mouth. While he had misgivings about Operation Tarasque, he'd also spent several hours studying the terrain, the conditions, and Blackwatch’s countermeasures. And he knew you and Gabriel could handle things. It didn't stop him from worrying, but Jack could compartmentalize.

"You look far too happy about the idea of missing this meeting, sir," Jemison said dryly.

Jack wiped the smile from his face and raised a brow. "Do I, agent?"

Shoal and Mosweu chuckled discretely, but Jemison didn't find him funny. She just shook her head and sat back, alert and frowning.

The ship touched down with a slight rumble. It was smooth for an emergency landing - Blue had taken them through some rocky collisions, and with a lot more damage to the craft and its occupants. Granted, giant omnis had been shooting at them at the time, so it wasn't entirely the pilot's fault... But that didn't stop them from giving him shit.

The boarding ramp extended, gears grinding as the metal dug into soft, probably uneven earth.

Carson emerged from the cockpit, tugging nervously at his collar, toolkit in hand. Megat and Dvořák were ready for him, falling in step with him.

Carson glanced at both men, a little surprised. "All this for me?"
"The buddy system is SOP," Megat said dryly, expression completely unamused. He stared, silently and heavily implying that Carson was an idiot who should already know this. Jack had to admit, Evil Eye Megat had legitimately earned his nickname.

"But since no one wants to be friends with Evil Eye, he's going to be our awkward third wheel," Dvořák said, his tone friendly, his English heavily accented. Jack had been invited his daughter's bat mitzvah next month. He probably wouldn't be able to make it, but he still needed to pick out an appropriate gift, something he'd meant to ask Gabriel for help with before the other man had left for Operation Tarasque. Oops.

Laughing awkwardly, Carson led the way down the ramp. Jemison stood by the entryway, Shoal on one side, Van Allyn on the other, both of them had taken positions where they could keep watch.

"I think Megat's just going to shove the pilot out of the way and fix it himself," Mosweu said idly. "I hope he doesn't make any "improvements. Last time he did jerry-rigged civilian tech, we got banned from New Zealand."

"Stop exaggerating," Shoal laughed. "It wasn't the entire country, just Auckland."

Mosweu shrugged. "Have you tried going back since?"

Jack shook his head. Mosweu had a gift for tall tales, often telling outlandish stories with such conviction that even the more jaded agents weren't sure if he was joking or not. But if things had gone down like that, he hadn't heard about it. Or at least, the Auckland authorities had not filed a formal complaint with Overwatch. "It's a transport, not a combat vehicle."

"Megat can and will change that," Mosweu said with a smile. And then he wrinkled his nose, pressing one palm to his chest. "Do you smell-?" He coughed then, a deep wracking sound, and began to pound on his chest.

"Stop making fart jokes," Shoal sighed.

But Mosweu staggered, dropping to one knee.

"Agent-" Jack leaned over, and he smelled it then - nothing he recognized- but it was a faint fruity scent, almost like a cheap air freshener.

"Mosweu-" Jemison swore, and was at his side, before she started coughing.

Jack was moving, mind already in gear. He swung around, reaching under the seat for a gas mask. "Gas!" He shouted, head light and heart pounding.

But there was a thud as Mosweu dropped, then Jemison. Mosweu began to shake, and Jemison's coughs grew fainter. Swearing, Jack got his mask on and knelt beside Jemison, getting onto her and then Mosweu.

There was another thud and Jack blinked, his vision swimming.

Shoal and Van Allyn were both on the ground, twitching.

Eyes watering, Jack grabbed two more masks, wracking his brain. His limbs were weak, but he forced himself forward, trying to reach his other downed agents.

Nerve agent. Airborne dispersal, probably. Precursor for an ambush, then. How could they predict...? Treachery.

Dizzy, Jack tried to offer Shoal a mask, but his knees buckled. She lay on her back, breathing heavily. He got the mask over her mouth and nose, though if it was a nerve agent, skin contact could also do the trick. Masks might be useless. Damnit!

And then a series of shots rang out. He heard Megat's signature bellow, and more shouting. More noise than just three men could make.

It was getting harder to stay upright, and Jack toppled beside Shoal.

He watched Van Allyn blinking rapidly, fingers twitching, pupils dilated.

In the distance a man screamed, before it was abruptly cut off by a gunshot. Jack fought to keep his eyes open. "A-Athena?"

There was no answer.

He heard them before he saw them. Heavy metal boots stomped up the ramp. The man wore a matte black chestguard with a full helmet and no insignia. But even if Jack couldn't see the man's face, he recognized those gleaming metal limbs.

"The Jack Morrison, in the flesh. What a pleasure," Richard Prince rumbled, behind a heavy mask. "No, don't try to get up. We have to make this quick."

Jack could hear the smile in his voice as Prince turned, a big ugly pistol in hand, and then shot Van Allyn between the eyes.

He went into the craft as Jack struggled to reach his sidearm. There was a pause, and two more shots rang out.

Jack flinched. Beside him Shoal gasped, panting hard, her eyes wild.

Three more masked cyborgs came up the ramp. Two carefully lifted Jack under the shoulders, dragging him down the ramp with a lot more care than he expected. The other slung Shoal over his shoulder in a fireman's carry. They patted Jack down, took his sidearm, and cuffed him, making no small talk or banter. Facedown in the grass, body not quite obeying him, Jack could see the smoking remains of Megat, Dvořák, Carson, and another armored cyborg. Blood pooled on the ground, the smell reaching him already. That meant there was a lot.

Megat's face had been smashed in. Carson had been shot in the back of the head. Jack couldn't see what killed Dvořák.

Out in the fresh air, lying in the grass, sun on his back, Jack had never been more grateful that you and Gabriel weren't with him. He tried to turn his head, but his body wasn't responding.

There was another thud, and Jack blinked as Jemison's body was dropped beside him. She was still breathing. There was blood on her, but he couldn't tell how badly she was hurt.

"Charges are set. In and out in under fifteen, boys. This really was too easy. Have to thank your pilot for that," Prince said, rolling Jack onto his back. Jack blinked. Prince had removed the helmet and was smiling far too brightly. "Don't worry, he doesn't get to live to spend his reward money. Screamed like a bitch too, if that's any consolation."

"Go to Hell," Jack rasped, tongue thick in his mouth.
"Shaking off the nerve gas already? Damn, you SEP bastards are tough," Prince sounded genuinely delighted. "Good, then you can help me make a decision here. I'm supposed to bring the women in alive, but I don't want to deal with the extra weight. And I have a theory." He grinned conspiratorially, his blunt features sinister in their glee. He gestured at Shoal and Jemison. "Which one of them?"

Jack narrowed his eyes.

Prince chuckled. "Which one of them are you banging?

Jack just glared at him.

Prince nodded slowly. "That's exactly what I thought. They don't seem your type. Your boss has you pegged all wrong, by the way. Well, who's it going to be, Fearless Leader? Which of your people are you going to save? Even if you're not fucking them, I'm sure you can appreciate a damsel in distress."

Beside him, Jemison snarled something unintelligible, though Jack knew what she wanted. That she'd rather that he saved Shoal: Jemison was a good leader like that.

Shoal grunted. "Go fuck yourself," she mumbled, her consonants melting together like she was drunk.

"I guess in the end, it doesn't really matter," Prince said, his expression oddly thoughtful. "But you know, I never liked redheads." And then he leaned over and shot Agent Bridget Shoal point blank in the face.

Blood spattered Jack as he thrashed on the ground, trying his damnedest to regain control of his body, and failing. If he could just stand...

Beside him, Jemison howled, the sound curdling his blood.

Prince holstered his gun. "Now, you've both had such an exciting day and we have a long trip ahead of us. And we've got a lot to do. So why don't you take a nap?"

Another masked cyborg knelt over him, cold hands on his throat. A needle bit into Jack's neck, and even as he struggled to keep his eyes open, the world went dark.

Chapter End Notes

Sorry about the long wait. Extra long chapter for you.

It's been busy here. Aside from the wrists acting up (and the fact I've been working overtime almost every week since May), there was a large-scale shooting near me. You know the story. The one we hear every time. For me it was less "how could it happen here?" and more "well, who's really surprised?" I'm fine, I wasn't there. But one of my oldest friends was, and she already has gun-related trauma, and she's not handling things well.

Considering new career fields. Kind of like the idea of infosec, but don't know enough.
I must admit the thought of it made me a lot more excited than I've been in awhile, but as I'm slowly dragging myself out of my emotionally-numb state and into a slightly healthier frame of mind, I can't vouch for the reliability of my feelings. :P

Have been spending quite some time plotting the end of this arc, and damnit it's going to be longer than I thought. But who's really surprised at this point?

Discord link if you need to come screech.
Chapter 125

Chapter Summary

Though Operation Chegquy is at the forefront of your mind, you have other responsibilities.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"I mean, I get it would be bad if I was snatching a cub from its mother. But what if we find one alone? It wouldn't really be unethical if I was saving a baby polar bear from starvation and the harsh elements..." Feng wheedled as you collected your gear.

"I'm not the ethics person," you said. "Or a polar bear expert."

"So you don't think it's a bad thing if I...adopt one?"

"You're too busy for a pet, you said so yourself," you said absently. "And even if I'm shaky at ethics, I know a bad idea when I hear one. Or, at least I know that if even I recognize that it's a bad idea, then it's definitely a bad idea."

Feng snorted. "What if I gave it to Bayan?"

You weren't entirely sure how to answer that, but you were only half listening to her spiel, inspecting the items for cold weather suitability. You'd taken over one of the prep rooms in the armory. Your time at Black Base Delta had given you some experience with the kinds of things that could go wrong. In extreme weather conditions, regular mechanical lubricants gummed up, often jamming machinery. Below freezing temperatures could damage circuitry. But temperature fluctuation could cause condensation buildup - a side effect from going in and out of a base or ship - and make even more problems. You needed gear specially rated for the cold, and you needed to make sure the base components were also weatherproofed. It meant checking gear down to the bearings, field stripping weapons, and a lot of boring detail work.

"Oh, hey! You said I could decide the codenames," Feng said.

"...I...yeah, I guess," you said, mentally calculating if the coat you were holding would be warm enough and just how well you could move in it. Genji would laugh at you, but Genji probably had heating coils built into his body. With all the high-functioning cybernetics, he had to vent heat regularly. He was probably toasty all the goddamn time.

Feng clapped her hands enthusiastically. "OK, then you're "Black Widow," she said to Amélie.

"My husband isn't dead," Amélie said tersely, also inspecting a coat, though maybe for aspects beyond its functionality.

"I know and I definitely don't want anything to happen to that slippery spy, but there's a theme. I guess you can be "Wanda" if you're arachnophobic-"
Amélie gave a delicate snort. You weren't sure how she did it, but it was a very refined nose noise. "I fear no arachnids. My husband asks me to handle the spiders and the scorpions."

"Cool," Feng said, taking that statement for assent. "Hanzo, you're 'Hawkeye.'"

"Again?" Hanzo wrinkled his nose. He'd had that codename in DC. His brows furrowed, but he didn't argue, a real miracle. Then he turned his attention back to the custom arrowheads he was attaching to alloy shafts on the workbench.

"It fits," Feng said cheerfully, already on a roll. "Agent Lao, you're Winter Soldier."

"Really?" Lao scowled as she continued to calibrate her new gear. She glanced down at her arm and sighed heavily. "That's so obvious, it's not funny."

"Would you rather be 'Bucky?' Or 'Wanda?'

"I would rather be Gamorra or Valkyrie," she scowled.

"Great, me too. But I'm sticking to a theme!" Feng sang, ignoring Lao's irritated growl.

"Who are you then?" Lao asked. "Iron Woman?"

"Oh no, I'm the Hulk," Feng chirped.

There was a moment of silence, and you were pretty sure everyone else was also staring at her skinny frame, trying to reconcile that idea with reality.

"At least she's wearing green?" Lao muttered.

"I know, I know, I could realistically be Gamorra, or She-Hulk or Shulky for short." Feng didn't look the least bit perturbed by anyone's skepticism. "But no, I'm really committed to this theme."

Grumbling, Lao shook her head, already knowing better than to continue this debate. Feng's logic was shaky, sure, but there was no point in arguing with her view on reality. It would just wear a person out, and that person would not be Feng.

Feng grinned at you, all childish glee with a hint of mischief, or maybe it was madness. Hard to tell.

You sighed, wondering what she had in store for you.

"So at first I thought you'd be 'Captain,' because you're the boss on this one. But honestly, it doesn't quite fit. I guess it might get confusing since that's an actual rank. And I think someone else has that title locked down. So you're Fury." Feng grinned at you.

You blinked. You'd had worse codenames. And while the theme was ridiculous, you couldn't argue with the accuracy of everything. Except maybe labeling Amélie "Black Widow," though she certainly was a femme fatale.

Shaking your head, you continuing checking equipment, replacing gaskets, insulators, and unsuitable lubricants.

"Lucky, Commander Reyes is out of surgery and Dr. Ziegler requests your presence in the infirmary at your earliest convenience," Athena announced.
You froze, hex wrench in hand. Earliest convenience? What did that even mean? Nothing was convenient. Did that mean the operation had gone well? Did that mean it had gone badly and there was nothing you could do? He couldn't be awake yet. You knew that, but part of you had hoped...

Sighing, Amélie plucked the tool from your fingers and firmly pushed you toward the door. "Go see what she has to say. We can take care of matters here. Just swap one goo for another, and make sure our contractors didn't use cheap materials," she said, demonstrating her knowledge of the task.

Lao and Hanzo didn't even look up, still working on their own tools.

Feng nodded rapidly, holding up what looked like a hardlight projector while a Zheng drone tinkered with it. "Yeah, Winter Soldier over there seems to have a good grasp on how to handle cold weather ops too." She didn't notice Lao's eyeroll. "The name totally fits," she added sotto voce. "Because she's good at soldiering in winter condi-"

"Feng, please lift the receiver cover, lower the device by two centimeters, and pay attention to what we're working on," Zheng said.

"Yeah, yeah," Feng said, not chastened at all.

You just forced yourself to walk out of the armory, the pounding of your heartbeat in your skull drowning out all other sounds.

You didn't remember running into the infirmary, though you had vague memories of someone yelling at you for nearly bowling them over, but they moved out of the way in time, so no harm done. Time didn't really start up for you until you found Angela sitting on her desk, Bayan curled up in a chair, his face drawn. Both of them looked exhausted and were holding steaming mugs. There was a half-eaten bar of chocolate in front of Angela and an empty wrapper in Bayan's lap.

You stood in the doorway of her office, not sure how to begin.

"Come in and shut the door," Angela said, rubbing her eyes.

You complied.

"Sit down," Bayan grumbled. "Craning my neck to look up at you is uncomfortable."

"Sorry," you mumbled, dropping down into one of Angela's ergonomic chairs. You waited.

"First off, he is stable," Angela said. She wiped her face on her sleeve.

"But we are leaving him under for a few days, at least," she said. "I have dealt with wounded super soldiers, and between their head injuries and unpredictable accelerated healing, they can partially awaken and unwittingly cause more damage to themselves and others."

You nodded. The last thing Gabriel probably remembered was the explosion in Hanoi. If he woke up confused and ready to fight his way out...that would be bad.
"There is danger is trying to keep him sedated for a prolonged period. There is no reliable way to predict how his body metabolizes drugs," Angela shook her head. "But we need him to stay down for at least two days. His body seems to be trying to heal itself very rapidly, at least on the surface: there were several pockets of shrapnel we had to dig out because his skin had completely closed over it-"

"Encapsulated it," Bayan muttered. "Like the world's worst dumpling. One of them had pus and charred ball bearings oozing out-"

You winced.

"Sorry," Bayan said, rubbing the back of his neck.

"Other than the arm...what kind of issues are we looking at?" You asked.

"Hard to predict. His deep tissue regeneration is inconsistent and we don't have enough data on SEP recovery speeds from nerve damage. His concussion was severe." Angela shook her head. "Bayan and Zheng did a good job alleviating pressure, and the swelling has receded, but it's hard to say if anything was permanently altered. I don't...think so," Angela said. "But I cannot make you any promises, Lucky."

Briefly, you wondered what would happen if he woke up with amnesia. Or lost his sense of smell, taste, or vision. What if he never even woke-

You shut that line of thought down, immediately. While it was a possibility, there was no evidence it would go down like that and you needed to focus on Operation Checquy. Something you couldn't do if you were freaking out.

"Can I see him?" You asked.

"Yes," Angela said, her voice gentle. "But that's not why I called you down here."

You blinked.

"Despite what some SEP veterans may claim," Angela sounded annoyed, and you briefly thought of Chang for some reason. "It is unlikely that a limb will regenerate," she said. "We can regrow teeth, but not arms. Not yet..." Angela's gaze lost focus and she stared off at the wall for a moment.

You blinked. "I know that."

"Do you though?" Bayan asked. "I mean, you seem to have rather optimistic viewpoint of your own indestructibility. And you're friends with Feng. Who knows what kind of ideas you have?"

"...you're friends with her too!" Was all you could muster.

"Yes, and your point?" Bayan sipped his coffee.

Angela snorted, covering her mouth with one hand.

"...Wait, you can regrow teeth?" You blinked.

Angela sighed. "Yes, Lucky. We had this conversation during your intake exam."

"I was high out of my mind!" And suddenly, a lot of "jokes" about Genji "feeding people
"It involves teething again, so there is lots of discomfort and drooling for a few weeks," Bayan said helpfully. "Most people avoid it, unless absolutely necessary. Though several agents have had it done. Can't reveal names, for privacy purposes, but you know some of those assholes with perfect smiles? They didn't get those on the first try, or even the third."

"I always wondered how Ivanov managed to keep most of his teeth, considering how many times other people punched him in the face." Though now that you were talking about it, you vaguely remember having this conversation with Angela. And you kind of chocked it up to being medicated and traumatized.

"All agents get reminders at their physicals too, should you actually decide to schedule yours," Angela said. "But that's not why I called you here. There's some paperwork I need you to sign off on."

You squinted at her. "Do you need extra Blackwatch resources for the defenses? Because I can grant them, but -"

Angela squinted back at you. "He never told you." Groaning, she drained the rest of her coffee and reclined her chair.

"He never told me what?" You asked, voice going high.

"Bayan, you're better at this talk," Angela said.

"Technically, I'm not supposed to know any of this since I'm not employed by -"

Angela's dead-eyed glower made your blood run cold.

"Please stop looking at me like that, I will explain immediately," Bayan sighed. "Commander Reyes, like most responsible agents, has a host of medical contingencies in place: DNR, medical power of attorney, all the emergency healthcare-related legal paperwork -"

"What?" You shot out of the chair. "He has a do-not-resuscitate?!"

"Only in the case of extreme brain death, verified by three separate and trusted sources, and we are nowhere near that scenario, so please don't panic," Angela said. "Anyway, so do you, and with similar conditions."

You blinked. Angela wasn't wrong... All field agents had filled out numerous forms having to do with healthcare, pensions, and emergency contacts. And most agents tried to forget that they'd really had to think about their impending mortality, yourself included.

"So in the event of the Commander's...inability to make personal medical choices, he has appointed a power of attorney. Jack is the primary contact. But if Jack is...unavailable," Angela's voice quivered. "Then you are the alternate."

"Oh," you said, falling back into the chair.

"I would like to start fitting him for a prostheses, sooner rather than later. And Bayan and On Sing think they can offer some tech that might help with some of his...hypertermic issues. But I need you to sign off on it for him. We won't attach anything without talking to him first - because that would be stupidly dangerous and unethical. But we do need permission to customize and fit the parts. We can wait for him to wake up to give consent, but I thought we could jumpstart the "No, sooner is better." You nodded numbly. While he might not like having a prosthetic limb, having the option available could mitigate the feelings of inadequacy and helplessness. You would know.

"I agree." Angela passed a tablet to you. "Sign and date at the end."

You skimmed the document and then paused. "If Torby is willing, I think Gabriel could get a lot of use out of the same models I have."

"Obviously, the size would be different, but I can tack on a request for modular attachments," Angela said with a nod. "Zheng and Bayan have some nanotech temperature regulation ideas. I know Gabriel is...hesitant about outside tech, but we could make that an optional addition."

"Do it," you said. He could turn them down when he woke up, but at least this way he had a choice.

Angela nodded. "Thank you, Lucky. He's in room 115."

You rose. "No, thank you for...everything." Because you even if you didn't always follow their advice, you appreciated your exhausted medics. They looked like they were going to pass out any moment now and quite frankly they needed the rest before the next crisis hit. "Bayan, do you have a gun?"

"Wouldn't know what do with it," Bayan yawned. "Angela is the better shot."

You blinked, a little taken aback by that revelation. Medic or not, everyone who joined Overwatch should have had some firearms training. You glanced questioningly at Angela.

"Field agents won't respect you if they don't think you can pistol whip them," Angela said, delivery completely deadpan.

"Not true," you said, turning to go. "I'm terrified of Bayan."

"Most field agents don't throw the same kind of fit you do when you don't get your pudding," Angela said dryly.

"It's the needles," you said, though the threat of withholding dessert was serious business. "He knows where you keep the blunt ones."

Bayan chuckled and Angela smiled at the other man like they knew something you didn't. Probably the location of all the blunt needles. Fucking bonesaws. Savages, all of them.

"Lucky," Angela said as you reached for the door handle.

"Yeah?"

"One we have a prototype, do you want us to replicate all of your digital attachments for Gabriel? Even the... non-combat models?"

You blinked, feeling Angela's evil smile burning into your back, and you stared straight ahead, unwilling to make eye contact or even look at your own hand. There was only one correct answer to that question, though it took you a moment to work up the nerve to give it. "Uh...yes?"
You sputtered, and rushed out of the office, before Bayan could ask any embarrassing questions.

To your surprise, Távio stood guard outside Room 115. It was in the center of the infirmary, with no windows. Lacroix was assigned to the adjacent Room 114. Min sat in a chair across from that door, spinning one of those fidget toys, or at least you hoped it was fidget toy and not an incendiary device in disguise.

"Agent Shimada is overseeing some...delicate preparations inside," Távio said, pulling at his collar. He glanced both ways down the hall. "Do you really think they'll try something?"

"Yes," you said. "Our people are split up, our leaders are vulnerable, and they have agents on the inside. It's the worst possible time for us. They'd be fools not to strike."

Távio's hand rested on his holster, his expression grim.

"But it takes a lot to get one past Jesse and Genji. Believe me, I've played cards with them." You shook your head, remembering then that Távio was a little con artist in his own right.

Távio gave you a nervous smile, his eyes bright. "Yes, ma'am."

You knocked on the door, just to let Genji know you were there, and then went in.

It was a larger room, the walls a soft cream, with inoffensive floral paintings and sunlamps. There were two entryways, though someone, probably Genji, had barricaded the opposite door. The bed was larger than standard: big enough to accommodate a super soldier, or Reinhardt, and there were several monitors built into the frame. Two IV bags hung by the head of the bed, and large nanotech emitter was attached to the headboard. Tucked neatly under the white blankets, lay Gabriel, his chest rising and falling at a steady rate. You swallowed roughly, tearing your eyes away from the setup to nod at Genji.

He had his back to you, having probably already acknowledged your presence. Isha, however, chirped happily and poked her head out from the vent he was tinkering with.

"Ishana, if you want to keep an eye on Lacroix and the Commander, you need to let me work," Genji said, and she headbutted his chin. "I will be finished in a second. Hooking her alarm system into the PA, so she can maintain surveillance."

Genji moved a rolling tray table under the vent, and Isha stepped onto it, then hopped onto a chair, and down to the floor. She was in full armor - another set it looked like, because it was clean and undented. She ran up to you, and you picked her up, stroking her head. Cooing, she nuzzled your shoulder and pointed at the bed.

Genji set something down on the chair and then quietly left, giving you privacy.

There was a soft woof from the blankets, and you shook your head as you approached, Bandit lying at the foot of the bed, also wearing black ballistic armor, his stubby tail wagging.

"Official bulletproof Overwatch footwarmer, that's a pretty important job," you said, petting his head. You set Isha down beside him and she thrummed.

Gabriel lay there, eyes closed, face more peaceful than it had been in Hanoi. He looked like he was just sleeping. It soothed you to see that he wasn't in pain. You liked just looking at that face, those chiseled features and strong jawline. He was handsome man. But there were some changes too. His head had been shaved smooth and partially bandaged. You felt a silly bit of sadness, because you liked playing with his hair. But the biggest difference was his upper left arm, also wrapped in bandages, resting just on top of the covers. It was woefully shorter than the other, and you gritted your teeth. An oxygen canula ran along his face and wrapped around his ears. You pointed it out to Isha.

"Be very careful with that. Don't damage it."

She chirped and bobbed her head, sitting down beside Bandit. He licked her face.

Blinking furiously, you reached out and touched Gabriel's forehead. He was warm, but not abnormally so. He did not stir. You sniffled and kissed his cheek. It felt wrong to see him like this, laid up and helpless. It felt wrong that you couldn't do anything about it.

"So I guess you have earned the break," you said, voice wobbly. "But you sure have some bad timing. And so does Jack. When this is over, I'm going to have a lot more white hair and worse nerves. Plus it's my turn to have the overprotective emotional meltdown, OK? Like bigtime."

Of course, he did not answer.

"But we've got this," you said, forcing yourself to believe those words. You dug deep and pushed the conviction up from your core. You clenched it between your teeth to infuse it into your speech. "Jesse's been learning from the best: he's ready for his own command. Though this is a shit first posting. I've got a competent if...questionable team together, I just don't know how much well everyone will play together. There are a lot of big personalities. And we all know that you and Jack just formed Overwatch to keep Captain Amari from singlehandedly conquering the world out of boredom. So it's going to work out. We can handle this. You just get better, OK? Because when you wake up, we're going to talk about your communication skills. You could have given me a heads-up about making me your emergency contact or whatever." You took a shaky breath, knuckles gently rubbing his cheekbones.

Isha chirped and curled up against his right side, avoiding his injured arm.

"Isha says you need to make her a little doctor outfit, and I'll badger Angela for a little stethoscope. Oh, also Bandit wants a nurse's hat."

You hugged him carefully. "I gotta go. Because if I stay any longer, I won't want to leave you." You squeezed your eyes shut. "I love you, Gabriel Reyes." You kissed him, and wiped your eyes, unwilling to broach the subject of Jack. Not right now and not like this. You struggled for words, even if he couldn't hear you, you couldn't bring yourself to say certain things.

Sniffling, you squeezed his hand. "You did a piss poor job of hiding those rings. It's absolutely mortifying that the Blackwatch Commander's concealment technique is so shoddy. What kind of example are you setting? Isha would be embarrassed for you." You gave a bark of laughter, shaking your head as you clenched your fists.

Isha cocked her head to the side and gave a questioning chirp. You kissed her cheek and the top of Bandit's head.

"I have to go. Stay safe. All of you."

Isha nodded, and pulled a blanket over Bandit. Then she slipped off the bed, climbed up the chair, the table, and into the vent, pulling the cover closed behind her. You weren't entirely sure what the plan was, but you trusted Genji and Jesse to look after things here. Not that you had much of a choice.

You walked into the Blackwatch conference room just in time to see Lao haul back and slug Feng in the face, with her metal arm. Horrified, you lunged forward and grabbed Lao's arm before she could launch a follow up hit.

"Agent, is this what it looks like?" You snarled.

"Uhh...maybe?" Lao gaped at you for a moment, eyes wide and shocked.

"It looks like you punched our civilian ally Zhai Feng in the face," you said. "Feng, are you OK?" You asked, still glaring at Lao.

"Dandy!" She chirped, not sounding at all like she was in pain. "And maybe it's a little more than it appears to be."

You glanced over at Feng, who had been thrown back by the force of the hit, but who didn't seem to be bleeding or nursing any broken parts. You glanced down at Lao's metal hand, noticing that the knuckles were smudged black. Burn marks. What the hell?

"Relax, there's no drama," Feng said, beaming at you. "I just asked Agent Lao to hit me as hard as she could so I could test my kinetic shields. They're good for bullets: the sensors kick in automatically for distant high velocity missiles. But they're a little less reliable when it comes to getting punched in the face or stabbed."

Taking a deep breath, you released Lao's arm, realizing, belatedly, that maybe next time you should grab her flesh one. It would be easier to control.

Lao just give you skeptical look. "I'm not the loose cannon of the squad. That's Simon." It took her a moment to realize she was talking about your dead medic in the present tense. Her face fell.

You went with it. Because while it would always make you just a little sad to think of them, you weren't going to pretend they hadn't been part of your life. "Simon might have reacted first, but he just settled for verbally eviscerating people. You and Shin were the ones who held the grudge and took revenge a week later," you said dryly, as if you weren't part of that group. There was that time one of the mechanics on rotation got a little too handsy with Lao. Though that time, Lao broke the guy's nose on the spot. Shin had very casually dumped a large quantity of pink dye into the man's laundry: anything that wasn't turned "Overwatch Purple" had become a radiant shade of neon pink. And you? Well, the pig's blood in his tool case didn't get there on its own. He transferred out soon after.

"Well, I just got here. I'm not looking to pick a fight with anyone," she said, carefully avoiding looking anywhere near where Amélie was sitting, engaged in a rapid-fire discussion with Hanzo.

You just shook your head at Lao's not-so innocent shrug. "Anyway, as charming as Feng is, she has been known to push people's buttons for incredibly convoluted reasons."

Feng giggled, not denying the charge.
"How do they work if you're shot up close?" You asked.

"It's technically less optimal. The shorter distance gives the shields less time to respond, but the issue is not really reaction time. The sensors are programmed to deal with high velocity projectiles and they process the threat quickly. But melee weapons usually slip through. When we try to auto-compensate, the shields end up triggering prematurely and blocking the user - it could decide that you are moving too fast toward a stationary object in a collision trajectory. And suddenly you've run face first into an invisible wall. Like being a mime, but marginally less degrading."

"Counterintuitive, but I get it," you said, having dealt with kinetic shields before. Hard light ones, though, that was newer and still rather dangerous.

"Chanceux," Amélie called. "We need you to sign off on some things."

"I'm not wearing a beret," Lao muttered in your ear as you passed by.

"Oh, I will!" Feng said clapping her hands together. "Though...it might not go with my armor... But I'll still do it!"

There were numerous packs in the corner on the floor-the gear for the upcoming mission. It was best not to leave your things unattended right now.

You sat down at the table, raising a brow as Amélie slid a tablet to you.

"We need On Sing's stealthcraft cleared for docking and re-entry. We had to send back two rifles, modify several items, and leave behind some of Hanzo's arrowheads, but the rest of the equipment should be able to handle the weather. Athena and Zheng have been plotting the best approach to avoid detection. Both of them are capable of piloting the ship, as is Feng. Zheng affirms that Feng is qualified, though possesses no certification." Amélie didn't look bothered by that statement.

"Feng, can you fly us back safely if Zheng and Athena get ejected?"

"It's proprietary equipment: I can use it. And flying isn't the problem. Landing is," she said with a straight face. "I can handle flat, rural locations, like open fields," Feng said, slowly. "But I might not try landing in Zurich with all its historic buildings and its large civilian population..."

You sighed. The craft could safely hold ten people maximum. Your squad and an On Sing medic made six, plus the AI drones, pushing the weight limit closer to seven. You weren't sure how many hostages or prisoners you were bringing back. "Good enough."

You authorized the docking clearances, using your Blackwatch administrative override codes and a civilian cover for the manifest. That bought you 24 hours of priority, the actual status carefully masked with a rolling encryption algorithm. It was near irreversible by anyone who wasn't Gabriel, Jack, or Captain Amari and served to hide lots of details: like who was really aboard the ship, what missions you were assigned to, and any location tags. Someone on the inside could do some heavy hacking, dig up part of the data, and out you, but that was a lot harder than just looking at the manifests and checking outbound planner.

"I've ID'd the model of modular base, and downloaded the schematics," Lao said. "The good news is, they're pretty simple. The bad news is, they're pretty customizable. I can generate a theoretical floorplan, based on the exterior mapping, but I can't account for security measures."

"If you can figure out where they're most likely holding Jack, that'd be helpful," you said, not looking up from the two approach plans Zheng and Athena had generated. One had you coming from the east, and the other from the north. Given the placement of the rocks, the northern approach had the best cover, but you'd have some walking to do.

"It is unlikely that we can simply trick our way in. And given the terrain, I don't know if we'll be able to sneak in, like we did in Hanoi," Hanzo said. "This is an isolated facility: any hint of our presence will trigger security."

"I brought doorbusters!" Feng called, obviously ignoring the stealth approach. "And I totally volunteer to be the battering ram."

"...Those doorbusters are small explosives, right?" You asked, because when it came to Feng, you knew better than to assume.

"I do have explosives, but I also have this really hungry metal-eating bacteria that we've been playing with... Don't worry! We have a neutralizing agent!"

You rubbed your forehead. That could be a quieter approach. "How fast do the microbes work?"

"Oh, depends on the alloy. Given the thickness of military grade airlocks, it could be an hour or two..." Feng trailed off. "Hmm, all right, I see the flaw there. Definitely better for when we're not on a time crunch. Or as a secret escape method. Explosives it is."

"Frontal assault then?"

"Is there a less guarded back way?" You asked Lao.

"No, the facility butts up into the rocks. They could have drilled in, in fact, if that's the case, that makes it hard to estimate how big the base really is. If there's subterranean construction, there will probably be only one level. The terrain doesn't really allow for much digging. But that's where they'd stash any prisoners. From what I can see, the facility covers at least a thousand square meters."

"That's not very big," Feng said. "I mean, it is if you're talking about residences, but not for a base."

"It's a secret base on a tiny inhospitable island, barely above sea level," Lao said. "It can't be really big if they want it to stay secret."

"You don't need a lot of room to do enhanced interrogations," you said. "You just need privacy."

"Mr. Ito's drones are collecting more information," Feng said. "Mostly about the terrain. But they've spotted odd plumes of steam coming out of the rocks, so Agent Lao's theory about them carving out the cliffs, has merit."

"If you can find a secret entrance, I'll take it." You looked at Feng, because you remembered the concealed back door to that mountain base in Mongolia. "Otherwise, we'll have to find some way to lure a small number of them out for ambush."

"We can disable some cameras and make it look like something has gone wrong with a vehicle or some part of the facility within the camera range. I expect you'll want to emulate weather or wildlife interference," Hanzo said. "They will send someone to inspect the damage."
This was standard procedure, especially for a black ops mission. Jesse and Gabriel could run a full blown blitz attack on a well-defended military base, but that wasn't your specialty. And in the time it took you to breach the facility, they could eliminate any hostages. It would be hard to maintain stealth in these conditions, but you could at least begin the mission taking the enemy unaware.

"We can definitely sabotage or even commandeer Petras' vehicle," you said thoughtfully. It was a military-grade transport, judging by the footage, and if it was still there when you arrived, you could utilize that.

"Uploading the specs on the OSS-5 Borealis," Athena said, identifying the vehicle for you. "It is a small atmospheric-craft, not available to the general public."

"So we should steal it," Lao said, a small smile creeping across her face.

"Mmm, I have better at home," Feng said, scanning her tablet. "But it shouldn't be too hard to commandeer. Especially if we need more space."

"It does have significant armaments. If all else fails, could just blow the base doors down," Amélie said thoughtfully.

"That carries tremendous risk." Hanzo stared at Amélie, more than a little shocked.

"Yeah, walls are actually easier to breach," Lao nodded. "Security firms put all their efforts into constructing stronger blast doors and airlocks. They don't focus as much on securing walls. Most people don't think to compromise those instead."

You nodded, remembering Nwazue giving your squad a talk like that once upon a time. It felt...nice to be able to work with Lao again.

"If the exposed area isn't reinforced by the rock cover, and we could probably do that," Feng nodded. "They probably aren't keeping the prisoners right by the front door."

"That's Plan C," you said, shaking your head. "We need to try to lower the risk to the hostages. For scouting, we can split into teams. We can send the drones to scout for potential hidden exits, Feng can do a closer inspection of the footage on the transport over. Lao, if you can check the schematics to see if there are any engineering weaknesses- doors that can short-circuited, vulnerable ventilation systems, electrical panels where we can reach them: that sort of thing. Hanzo, you have expertise in both areas, if you can support Lao and Feng in their research."

"I can calculate trajectory and hack," Athena said. "But I'm afraid I will have to split my focus between Operations Morpheus, Pelennor, Checqy, and others. I cannot provide full support."

You had kind of expected that. Pelennor and Morpheus were higher priority ops. "I may be able to help with cybersecurity once you're inside," Zheng said. "But because it's a closed network, I can't access anything right now."

"Do we have any idea how many people are in there?" You asked Feng.

"Not really. Petras brought an entourage of half a dozen, Prince at least has a full squad, and they probably have at least two support staff on site, though it could be a lot more, because we're not sure how big the facility is."

"Are we waiting on anything else?" You asked Amélie who looked distinctly dissatisfied.
"Nothing mission critical. Our gear is ready to be loaded," she said, gesturing to the pile.

"All right, any mission-related questions that I have the ability answer?" You asked your team.

There were headshakes all around, both Feng and Lao glued to their screens as everyone grabbed their bags.

"You all right?" You asked Amélie, slinging a backpack over your shoulders. "Concerns?"

"No, everything is starting well," she said, a little reluctantly.

"But...?" You braced yourself for her analysis.

"But they never delivered the hot chocolate," Amélie said, pursing her lips, her gaze flat and unamused. "I will deal with them personally, when we return," she said, trailing off into some rather ominous-sounding French.

"Lucky would let me," Mihret said, expression somewhere between a pout and a snarl, somewhat at odds with his boyish good looks. It seemed Mihret didn't believe anyone would take him seriously if he just asked nicely. Everything was a goddamn dominance challenge with him.

"Well, I ain't Lucky," Jesse said slowly, not even trying to mask his annoyance. "And no, she wouldn't." You weren't even going to let him leave the base right now, but Jesse didn't need to point that out. He didn't have time for Mihret's legendary temper tantrums.

Mihret just grumbled something guttural under his breath.

"Athena has already locked down the cameras. The only live streams are going directly through her, for posterity. Rest of the campus is just getting the same loop of the staff making rounds, with some randomly spliced footage to keep it from being picked up by pattern recognition programs. Standard subterfuge. So no, you don't need to overload the whole internal surveillance system."

"Just the main observation hub." Mihret rolled his eyes. "Won't touch the backups...unless we need to."

"No," Jesse repeated.

"When did you get so boring?" Mihret huffed, throwing his arms up. "Are you going to put on dress blues too and start preaching about law and order? Going to get a matching hat? Is there a new sheriff in town?"

"Don't you have something important that you need to be doing?" Jesse asked, because even if he wasn't in the mood for Mihret's bullshit, he knew that diplomacy was the fastest way through it. If he let the hacker bait him into a real argument, they'd never get any work done.

"Ben-zona, you even look like him," Mihret said, shaking his head. "Down to the eyebrow furrow. Chalk that one up to nurture over nature. Oh fuck, if they ever have kids..." Mihret had a weirdly disgusted look on his face.
Jesse blinked.

"Oh yeah, Winston needs more solder, copper wire, and half a dozen peanut butter sandwiches. You know, how Lucky gets when she has low blood sugar. He's like that...but hairier. You're in charge, so you can take care of it. I "have something important that I need to be doing," Mihret said in a taunting falsetto, already walking away.

What Jesse wouldn't give to have the boss or even you and Lacroix here to help handle things. Instead, he had a grumpy Genji and grumpier Mihret, and to be honest, at this point, he'd rather deal with Mihret. At least Mihret wasn't demanding customized chemical weapons that would probably get the entire team locked up for flagrantly violating the Geneva Conventions.

Wheels squeaked, and Jesse looked up to see your sidekick - Maeda Vargas really was too long to say all the time- wheeling a dolly stacked high with crates up to his chin.

"I have coffee - in cups and more beans for here, sandwich supplies, pistachio creamer, solder, copper wire, Winston's spare toolkit, and the extra special ammo Mr. Lindholm sent over for you," the little miracle worker said, nervously tugging at his collar. "Umm, is there anything else you need me to get?"

"...Is there peanut butter and honey in there?" Jesse asked.

"And preserves, lunchmeat, cheese, and all the packs of condiments I could stuff in from the mess hall," the kid said earnestly. "Wasn't sure what you wanted."

"You're a lifesaver, kid," Jesse said, exhaling slowly. That was a few less things to worry about.

Maeda Vargas nodded vigorously and unloaded the ammo box, handed him a travel mug. "I don't know how you take it, so it's black."

"Thank you kindly," Jesse said, suddenly feeling a little better about the world, or at least his ability to deal with it. He took a sip. It wasn't tea, but it wasn't half bad neither.

The kid held a bottle of pistachio-flavored creamer and scratched his head. "I think this for Agent Shimada?"

"I'll take it. I've got a meeting with him next. Come back to the conference room once you've made your deliveries. I'll have a tasking for you."

The boy nodded vigorously. "Yes, sir!" He saluted and then spun the dolly around, already heading toward where Winston was setting up another kinetic barrier.

Jesse tried to remember the last time Blackwatch had recruited someone so...enthusiastic. Riggs, probably, and also the president of your fan club. Was there a connection? Were you a magnet for eager greenhorns? He shook his head, reaching for his hat, and then remembered that it had been lost in the explosion. He slowly lowered his hand, and pushed his hair out of his eyes instead.

He'd liked that hat. But he'd liked his team a whole lot more.

Grimly, Jesse headed for the infirmary conference room, trying very hard not to think about those terrifying minutes buried under the rubble. How it brought back those bad memories of Greece. Those were some dark moments with you and what was left of Rodriguez's squad. And worse, Ana was taking the main team back there, without Morrison or the boss.
Jesse downed the rest of the coffee, the hot bitter drink grounding him. It wasn't just being buried alive...again. He'd been going up the stairs first, laughing about dinner in Shanghai with the gang. And then he'd heard you screaming, "bomb!" Those whiny gunshots from your pulse rifle echoed in the stairwell, and suddenly the Commander yanked him backward. It happened faster than he could process: Reyes spun him around and pushed him down the stairs, probably aiming to take cover on the landing. But then the ceiling collapsed on them. And it was Reyes who took the brunt of it.

Jesse had been here before: this wasn't the first time someone got hurt on his watch. On some level, he knew it wasn't his fault. That the Commander would have done it for almost any of his agents. That he wasn't as fast or as strong as an SEP veteran. But that didn't stop him from feeling responsible. Because the Commander wasn't just his boss or de facto parole officer. Because it had been him, the Commander was saving...again.

And he hadn't breathed a word of it to you. Because shit, between Tataryn and Morrison, you had plenty else to deal with. He was still processing it too and maybe a little scared of how you would react. When you got back, maybe he'd be able to say something.

That was too much navel-gazing. There wasn't time to lollygag right now. Jesse did his best to shake off the creeping doubts and opened up the conference room. It had no windows and would serve as the impromptu command center. He set the creamer in the fridge, then sat on table and began to read the Operation Metis file.

It was a lot of information, most of it technical specifications that he didn't have time to decode. But aside from another glimpse at the secret history, Jesse learned three important things: first off, Winston had bull-sized balls, and could apparently singlehandedly tech-bluff everyone in Overwatch and beyond. Secondly, Athena, despite her poetic descriptions, was pretty damn powerful, on par with god programs, though there differences in her ability and there were several surge constraints on her central processing unit, limiting her reach. And finally, and most disturbingly, Jesse learned exactly how to remove those constraints.

Predictably, there were a lot of warnings about what could happen if he did just that. Not only the political fallout from "you let an overpowered AI loose inside Overwatch HQ." But in fact, that the system might not be enough to handle her full abilities, and that it could very well crash itself and cause catastrophic failure across the network. Athena would probably survive, but Overwatch's mainframe would be offline.

It was a lot to think about. And he didn't have time to consider the "morality" of what happened. But he now knew for sure that Athena was probably everything Petras wanted, and more. And that took the cake, because she'd been right here, right under his nose, for years.

You'd get a kick out of that observation. Jesse smiled wryly. But you'd be back later. To read the report with him. To have that talk. That's what he told himself. That was the only acceptable outcome.

There was a single firm knock - an announcement, not request - and then Genji walked in, expression hard. Jesse did not have any more time to review the file. He would have to talk to Winston and Mihret about "what it all meant" later.

"The defenses are still subpar. There are too many holes for assassins to slip through. I need more equipment." Genji crossed his arms. "Were you able to get the aerosol proximity mines?"

"No, those are specialty armaments: we don't have them just lying around. And I ain't even sure if we can go through "official channels" for them." Jesse scowled, because Genji liked to be
"And you can't just be spraying chemical weapons near the infirmary."

"Nonlethals only," Genji said, not looking bothered. "This is not a secure location. There are too many fire exits, wide vents, and windows."

"Moving him was already ruled out," Jesse said. "Angela and Bayan were in agreement on that."

"Then I need more equipment to secure the perimeter."

"We have razor wire and motion sensors," Jesse said.

"Neither of those would stop me," Genji said.

"Well, it's a good thing we're not fighting you or an army of ninjas," Jesse said sharply. "But I ain't so sure about commando squads: maybe they'll send whoever took Morrison."

"Full-blown assault or not, they will send assassins first. And anyone worth their salt will try to come in quietly," Genji gave a huff of frustration. "I am trying to account for all possibilities. Not just the obvious ones."

"What do you think I'm trying to do?" Jesse growled.

Both man glared at each other for a moment, but Jesse realized what he was doing. Because he and Genji did like to bicker, and they didn't like to give any ground. Stress compounded that: field agents tended to cope by buckling down and obsessing on minutiae. But right now, they couldn't afford to be distracted or divided. "You know, Lucky says we're too competitive to be left alone unsupervised."

"Lucky doesn't know as much as she thinks she does and meddles where she shouldn't," Genji said dryly. "But maybe she isn't wrong."

"Nah, she's wrong. And we can get along just to prove it. Because we're petty like that."

"Very mature," Genji said, lips twitching.

"I didn't say we were. I said we were petty. Almost as petty as she is," Jesse laughed and Genji chuckled as well, some of the tension bleeding away. Jesse cleared his throat. "Assassin-proofing a facility ain't my specialty. And I know you're right about whatever it is you aim to do, but we have limited resources and time. I can assign you Maeda Vargas and some Athena drones to help with whatever you need, but I have to prep for a frontal assault, and handle Mihret. He's obviously sore about being left behind." And speaking of difficult agents.... "Maybe Vo can jury-rig something for you?"

Genji nodded thoughtfully. "She is good at constructing strange explosives. I'll see what she can do. But I have not worked much with Lucky's lackey."

"He's sharp and eager to please. Pretty useful and much easier to handle than Mihret. He brought your pistachio creamer. It's in the fridge."

"It's for Angela," Genji said without inflection.

Jesse knew he'd struck a nerve, and almost pushed, just a little barb about Genji's taste in creamer and German doctors. But abruptly, he closed his mouth. He and Genji needed to focus on working together. As much as he enjoyed poking a rattlesnake's belly, this wasn't the time or the place. "He's reliable. A little wet behind the ears, but we all were at one point. After you're done setting a perimeter, do you mind keeping an eye on the VIPs?"

There was a pause. "You know, I am an assassin. While I understand how our enemy operates, I am less skilled in defensive measures for...noncombatants."

"And Angela knows a million ways to kill a man. She just uses that knowledge of what not to do to save lives. Ain't a stretch to ask you to do the same. Unless you want to focus on defensive tech, bureaucratic loopholes, and personnel management."

Genji tilted his head to the side, staring very hard at Jesse's face. "McCree, did you just use words with multiple syllables? And as they were intended, not because your speech patterns abnormally prolonged the vowel?"

"Go fuuuuuuck yourself," Jesse said, shaking his head.

Genji just smiled. Jesse could tell now, despite the faceplate.

"I have some experience with bureaucratic loopholes, should you need the assistance."

Jesse raised a brow at the offer. "Much obliged."

"But you're on your own with personnel management. Good luck talking Winston out of a panic attack. I will be silently praying for your success."

Jesse snorted. "Already got the ingredients for peanut butter and honey sandwiches."

"Wise," Genji said.

"If there's anything that Lucky's taught me, it's that people are less likely to argue with you when they're eating. Though that doesn't usually work on Mihret."

"If you ever do find something that does work on Mihret, I'm sure the entire command structure would be grateful," Genji said, expression deadpan. "They'd make you Strike Commander out of gratitude."

Jesse just shuddered.

"It's the best lead we have," you said, arms crossed too tightly over your chestplate.

Captain Amari nodded, reviewing the footage silently. She was already armored up, earpiece in, rifle slung over her shoulder. "It's very suspicious, but it's all circumstantial."

"I know," you said. Because there was no proof Jack was there, or even alive... "But it's a lot of circumstantial evidence."

Captain Amari looked up at you, the unspoken pain in her eyes cutting you to the quick. The weight of her hopes, worries, and expectations made your heart stutter. Because this wasn't just about mission success: she cared about Jack too. "Are you sure?"

"No," you said, shaking your head. "But it's too much to ignore, especially when we have nothing else anywhere near as promising." Both Athena and Zheng had been using their connections to hunt for any word of Jack, but aside from the usual background chatter, there was nothing remotely reliable. You weren't focused solely on Petras and Prince, but they were the most likely suspects, even without your biases. "Weather and tech circumstances permitting, we can make it there in less than an hour." Hopen Island was about four thousand kilometers away.

Captain Amari nodded. "All right." She paused. "What do you intend to do if the Director and Prince are together, but Jack isn't there and they aren't involved?"

You shrugged. "Jack's my priority. I'll make sure Athena records it, try add it to the Petras files, and move on."

Captain Amari smiled wryly at you. "But if you encounter armed resistance?"

"I'd defend myself and order my squad to do the same."

Captain Amari met your gaze, those dark eyes seeing straight into the heart of you. "That is acceptable."

And if Director Petras was caught in the crossfire, that was more than acceptable. She didn't say the words. You didn't ask. But you understood each other perfectly.

"When this is over, Lieutenant Graziani wants to visit Gabriel and has suggested some potential upgrades for his prostheses," Captain Amari said, her tone light. "Regarding the upgrades, I told him he'd have to clear it with Angela and you."

You blinked. Andre Graziani was the SEP cyborg who didn't like Jack and spoke almost no words to you in the aftermath of Rodriguez's funeral. Chang didn't seem to like him much either, though to be fair, Chang didn't seem to like any of her friends. Appearances were obviously very deceiving in her case. "Do you...recommend that?" You asked, more than a little wary.

"I have worked with him on several occasions during and after the Omnic Crisis. Graziani is a reliable man, and while he and Jack have had their...disagreements, I can vouch for his character. He is much like Agent Mihret: too clever for his own good and all too willing to start a fight when an apology would serve him better." She shook her head. "The man's a genius. In a just world, his merit would have gotten him a full ride to university, an exemption from military service, and a job that would pay enough to care for his family. But...it didn't happen that way."

"Oh," you said, because you didn't know anything about Andre's past. "Yeah, um, I'm fine meeting with him after...things calm down."

"Because he and Jack really don't get along," Captain Amari said, a soft, exasperated look on her face.

It occurred to you then that you weren't the only person with a soft spot for troublemakers. After all, Captain Amari had given you a lot of leeway in your less than legal operations.

"I'm giving you the choice," she said, turning to the side. "If...nothing comes of Svalbard, you can chase down more leads, back up Jesse, or come to Greece if the situation warrants it."

You blinked.

"I won't order you one way or the other," she said. "Because I trust you'll make the right decision."

You stared at her for a long moment, because your squad was not equipped to go up against Bastions and OR-14s. No, that wasn't entirely true. Amélie and Hanzo were ranged fighters. Lao was an experienced combat engineer. Feng was...Feng.

But if something happened at HQ...

You understood then that Captain Amari was giving you the permission and the burden to choose whom you would save. And she was doing so fully aware of your feelings for Gabriel and Jack and your personal priorities.

"Captain-" Your voice shook.

"It's been a real journey," she said, smiling gently as she saluted you. "I've truly enjoyed working with you."

You blinked rapidly. "The honor is mine."

Captain Amari nodded once, then turned on her heel, marching away from you, her sleek silhouette completely different from Captain Patel's, but in that moment, they blurred together in your mind's eye. Neither woman liked long goodbyes.

Chapter End Notes

I'm behind on comments and writing. Will try to answer those this week. Still working overtime. Going to bed now. XD
Chapter 126

Chapter Summary

Everything is in motion. Nothing is certain.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Feng's stealthcraft was an odd shade of gray, a crossbreed between an Orca and a fighter jet. It was smaller than the usual combat transports, but with sleek curves, though the hull and wings were covered in a patchwork of glassy panels. Feng tapped one and it turned the same shade of pixelated white as her winter camouflage coat. She giggled.

"Auntie hasn't managed to get the organic chameleon cloak working right yet, but the inorganic one is functional," she told you cheerfully.

You studied the panels for a moment, recalling how clever the projected "rock illusions" had looked in Mongolia. Did this mean they had solved the method for masking light and motion? "Did you improve the tech processing speed or come with a more ingenious method of optical illusions?" Winston had mentioned the option of using multiple angled screens and mirrors when you'd inquired about the chameleon tech. You weren't exactly sure what it all entailed, but you just smiled and nodded because you didn't want to spend an hour in the lab getting lectured on optical physics before dinner.

"It is more than a trompe-l'œil, I assure you," the Zheng drone said, passing by you onto the ship.

"Still a proprietary secret!" Feng sang out, winking over her shoulder at you.

"But one we might be willing to trade for," Zheng said, slyly.

You had a very good idea what she wanted to trade for. But you followed them up the ramp, noting that aside from two long benches, lockers, and a large oval computer terminal, there wasn't much else on the ship. The benches were bolted on, with safety restraints attached to seats. An abundance of green safety netting covered the walls. There was thick padding on the ceilings, which a good thing if your pilot had to pull some complex evasive maneuvers. Or if they were just a jerk who like to do surprise barrel rolls.

The lockers lined the way to the cockpit, and you could seat six to eight people on the benches, though eight people would have to be very close and terribly cramped. Rows of recessed lights glowed softly along the walkway and ceiling. Most everything was a business-like shade of battleship gray. There wasn't a lot of color or any decor, so it was rather different from the almost luxurious settings On Sing seemed to favor. But Feng has said this was a prototype and not yet fitted for comfort.

"Medical supplies are in that locker." Feng began to point. "That one is temperature controlled, so I'm hoping Rin already loaded the snacks. You can safely stash your gear in any of the unpainted ones..."
You blinked as Hanzo, Lao, and Amélie rapidly claimed their spots. You slung your bag into an empty one. Feng meandered over to the large terminal and brought up a 3D image of Hopen Island, zooming in on an image of the base.

A meter tall Athena drone followed the spherical red Zheng drone into the cockpit.

You felt the engine before you heard it, just a strangely gentle thrum that vibrated along your fingers in some kind of subsonic resonance. It didn't hurt, and faded quickly, but you flexed your fingers a few times. The engine hummed softly, and while you knew that layers of insulation dampened the noise, it was still impressively quiet.

Amélie inspected the modeling of the terrain. "We will have to land on the northern side and make the trek on foot."

Hanzo rose, studying the map. "It would be better to come in from above."

"It's hard to do a stealth insertion when we're hovering over the base, prototype tech or not," Feng said, shaking her head. "This ship isn't that quiet. Even if we can fool their sensors, they have to have external cameras too."

"If we're focusing on back entrances, we'll have to explore the cliffs," Amélie said. "And we have hydraulic pitons and booster gear for climbing. Those should hold up under the weather."

You shuddered. Rock climbing in cold weather was nightmarish. Hydraulics didn't always work right. But as the lead agent, you couldn't discount the option.

"The southern approach doesn't have ideal terrain for landing the ship. We would have to add extra time for walking," Feng said, shaking her head. "And I don't like the idea of looping around if we don't have to."

Lao wrinkled her nose. "Before we make a concrete plan, we need a better perimeter map. How far out are their sensors? What models are they using? Can we isolate one? Did they get careless and leave any open ports or forego recent security patches?" Lao said, leaning over to inspect the front of the base. "Can your drone handler get us any of that information?" She asked Feng expectantly.

"Visual data only," Feng said. She tapped her chin. "He might have some of the more specialized diagnostic tools on site, but at this point, we'll probably arrive before he can get anything set up and inserted."

Lao nodded curtly. She'd be able to determine that information pretty quickly on arrival.

You watched as little red dots slowly lit up the map in a large circle around the rock formation and the base canopies.

"Some of those spots are fairly isolated. If they have left up the default settings, I can get in and do anything from falsifying their output to mimicking weather-related mechanical failure," Lao said, pointing at a cluster on the eastern side.

"I still think we should secure their vehicles ahead of time," Amélie said. "It wouldn't do for any of them to escape."

"Our priority is finding a discrete way in," you said. "But it's a necessary secondary objective." You crossed your arms. You could destroy or disable the transports, but that would take time and risk your cover. It had to be handled carefully.
A yellow light blinked into existence on the screen, toward the top of the cliff.

"Emergency exit," Feng announced triumphantly and zoomed in on a hatch angled sideways on the rocks so it wouldn't be covered by snow. Surprisingly, it was closer to the northern side of the base.

"Huh," you said, squinting at the real time image. "Hey, is that one of the models with the auto-defrost setting?" You asked Lao.

"Yeah, Rivka was always trying to get Gleeson to upgrade the signal station hatches since they froze shut all the time. " Lao made a noise of disgust. Because sometimes she'd gotten stuck inside them and you'd had to bring thermal lamps out to warm up the door jam. "But he was too fucking cheap."

"And corrupt," you said.

Lao gritted her teeth. "That too."

You frowned. Your squad was small, but you needed someone to keep an eye on that hatch and maintain your exit route. You didn't like splitting resources, but then, you didn't have much of a choice.

"Obviously the Strike Commander and any hostages are our priority," Lao said. "But, what about the rest of them?"

"I'd like to take them alive," you said, not entirely certain you sounded genuine. "But that's not the priority. That applies to all hostiles. Civilians included," you said, because accidents happened, and you didn't have to pick up a weapon to be a monster. You'd killed enough politicians, rogue scientists, and "businessmen" to know that.

Lao began to cycle through the images, matching Petras' on-site bodyguards to the profiles you'd accumulated and giving everyone a chance to assess the threat level. Everyone had already been briefed on Richard Prince and what to expect from a cyborg strike team. Petras' bodyguards were professional security personnel, unaffiliated with Overwatch, and after months of research, Lacroix had deemed them acceptable collateral damage. You agreed. These weren't good honest men just trying to scrape by. They were well-paid accomplices who helped the Director cover his tracks, and you had no pity for them.

"Interesting... He doesn't look like he's important...or a fighter." Lao held up her tablet, showing footage of Petras' entourage, bundled up in their arctic gear. A skinny middle-aged man shivered as he followed the burlier guards into the base.

"Geoffrey Murdoch," you said, raising a brow. "Petras' personal assistant." You crossed your arms. You'd considered abducting him before, but Lacroix had deemed the plan too risky. This was the man who handled all of Petras' inside affairs, the one who knew what the Director ate, fucked, and threw his money at. "Now that one I want alive," you said very slowly so everyone could hear you loud and clear.

Lao pulled up another image of him in a ivory suit with a clear view of his face. He was a pale nervous-looking man, with thin graying hair and pinched features. She placed that image side-by-side with the shot of him in his Arctic gear and projected it onto Feng's larger terminal without you even having to ask.

You nodded at her.
She smiled faintly back at you. After everything that had happened, she hadn’t forgotten how this worked.

Hanzo studied the image. You could see him committing the details to memory, his own expression severe. Amélie inclined her head back, a thoughtful look on her face. Feng copied the image onto her tablet, squinting at it warily, like she wasn’t sure he was worth it.

"Before Gérard thought he would be too difficult to reach and to hold onto," Amélie said, studying her tablet. She smiled fiercely at you. "I believe that’s about to change."

Feng chuckled. "What about his boss?" She asked, even though she already knew the answer.

You smiled sardonically, because at least half of your team already knew your intentions. "I have dibs on his boss."

"The conditions on the southern side of the base are not ideal for landing," Zheng informed you, her voice coming from the terminal's speaker.

You leaned against the terminal, still studying all approaches to the hidden base. Athena could lock down Petras’ OSS-5 Borealis remotely, but the rest of the vehicles didn’t have Overwatch permissions. She might need help with a manual insertion.

"Amélie, do you think you could keep a close eye on who or what tries to use the exit hatch?" You asked. "And halt any unfriendly movement?"

She circled the hologram. "D'accord." She pointed at the outcropping and canopy that covered the vehicles. "I think that would be a good vantage point." She glanced over at Lao. "I can watch the front entrance, the back exit, and the transports."

"If I can't get into the camera system, I should be able to access some of the vehicles," Lao said. "And worst case scenario, I know how to keep them from going anywhere."

"I can cover Agent Lao," Amélie said cheerfully.

Lao took a deep breath, and managed a professional nod. "That would be great."

"Anything for a teammate," Amélie smiled like a cat and you had sudden flashbacks of her performance in the interrogation room.

Lao flinched.

You glanced between them. "Amélie..." You kept your tone pleasant, a warning in of itself.

"I am not overextending myself, and I promise I will not get carried away," Amélie said mildly, one hand over her heart. "Agent Lao's safety will be my priority."

You gave her wry smile, knowing full well that Amélie would do her best to protect Lao, and also knowing that something had transpired between them and you really needed to ask Amélie about it later.

Lao's priorities were electronic surveillance, opening any access points, and halting any vehicle traffic. There was overlap between Lao, Zheng, and Athena's abilities, so you had to make sure they each had clear objectives. Athena was monitoring the situation, but had the least amount of responsibility given her simultaneous roles back home and beyond. "Zheng, if we get you inside, do you think you can shut down some of their defenses?"

"Most likely," Zheng said.

You glanced at Feng.

"She's being modest. Of course, she can. And she definitely wants access to whatever data Petras has, but don't worry, we'll share," Feng said cheerfully.

Data extraction was an objective, but a tertiary one. Jack was what mattered.

"We need to secure our people first," you said. "Yes, I want as many prisoners and as much intel on Petras' shady operations as possible, but the safety of Jack and our agents is the primary focus."

You looked over at Hanzo.

"We might need you to scout, but I think we'll need your combat skills more. Cover Feng as best as you can."

Feng grinned at you and flexed one noodly arm. "I know what to do."

"Don't smash everything," you said, shaking your head.

"Oh, with you and Hanzo shooting at everyone, I doubt I'll have to do anything difficult," she said cheerfully.

"I hope that is the case," Hanzo said, with alarming sincerity.

Feng glanced at you, bewilderment clear on her face. "Oh. Thanks. I think?"

Roles clarified, you had more prep work to do. You needed to switch out prostheses and make yourself available to any questions or concerns your team would inevitably bring you.

Sitting on the bench, you equipped a blade, a pressure injector, and an EMP, just in case.
Lao sat down beside you, studying your mechanical parts.

"I thought it would be worse," she said, keeping her voice low. "Blackwatch teaming up with On Sing of all things."

You raised a brow.

"Come on, we're not exactly the kind of team that they send to rescue a legendary war hero," she said, shaking her head. "Not that anyone is bad at their job," she added hastily. "But I'm a rehabilitated criminal, you're a black ops maverick, they're legacy mafia, and she's a prima ballerina. The optics are all wrong."

You shrugged, not denying her point.

"And working so closely with a Triad? I'm a little surprised."

"On Sing is...complicated," you said, after a moment, realizing that Lao had no way of knowing the extreme direction Feng had taken them in. "What do you know about them?"
"Rumors," she said, voice going even softer. "They might be an organized crime syndicate, but they're not like the other cartels, Lucky. They're an ancient secret society and they're fucking ghosts. Until a few years ago, the Chinese cops wouldn't even acknowledge their existence. And there are all kinds of disturbing, borderline supernatural stories about them..."

"Some of which are probably even true," you said, wryly.

"I'm serious," Lao said with a huff. "How can we trust them?"

"We can trust Feng," you said.

Lao folded her hands in her lap, her focus on the floor. You hoped she heard what you didn't say. You could trust Feng. You did not trust Zheng.

"Why?" Lao asked.

"They swore a blood oath, to Jack in particular," you said. "The drinking kind."

Lao shuddered, wrinkling her nose.

"I know, it's a long complicated story, and we've built a relationship there," you said. "We can talk about it later."

Lao paused. "Do you think the Strike Commander is even alive? I mean, if I were a bad guy, I wouldn't risk it. I've seen his Talon threat assessment summary. Like, I know he comes off a media golden boy, but he's not just a figurehead. He's really dangerous, and they know it."

You gritted your teeth, taking deep breaths. Because Lao wasn't wrong. You just didn't need to hear that and she probably had no idea what Jack meant to you. "I have to operate under the assumption that he is."

Lao nodded, though she watched you with worried eyes when she thought you weren't looking.

"The Strike Commander is privy to a lot of valuable intel," you said, your voice flat. "My sources indicate that that is what they're after. And we both know that interrogations take time."

"Makes sense," Lao said. "He's not the kind of guy who'd give them what they want right away."

"No, he's not," you said, reassuring yourself.

"You're friends with some of the people in Epsilon Squad, aren't you?" Lao said, though it wasn't really a question. Even if she didn't know the truth, she knew you well enough to see that this was personal.

"Yeah," you said, taking a deep breath and trying not think about Jemison feeding Isha pie or Shoal slamming back whiskeys and telling terrible jokes. Because there were days after training the rookies, that you, Jesse, Shoal, and Tataryn had gone out for drinks, shooting the shit and trying to be normal... You swallowed roughly. Now was not the time.

"We'll get this done," Lao said, not making any false promises or writing off your friends as dead, and you appreciated that subtlety.

"Are you going to be OK to work with Agent Lacroix?" You studied Lao's face as you spoke.

She flinched, but recovered quickly.

"Oh, yeah. Of course. No problems there. Everything is fine," she said rapidly.

You raised a brow.

"No, really, it's fine," Lao said, glancing nervously in Amélie's direction.

"Seriously, do I need to have a word with her? Because despite what you may have experienced with Blackwatch, threatening on-duty agents is not the best method to secure good results."

"Lucky, I've got this." She gave you a tight smile. "Agent Lacroix just explained some things to me, is all. We're good. I'd come to you if it was something I couldn't handle. You don't need to worry. Honest."

You exhaled slowly, knowing that now you definitely had to talk to Amélie about whatever she had said to Lao. Though at this point, if Lao said she could work with Amélie, you had no choice but to believe her.

"But anyway, looking at the mission parameters, I think it's going to be tricky, but not impossible," Lao said, showing you a perimeter map on her prosthetic arm's display screen. "Those cameras are a few years old and I dug up some zero day exploits that might not be patched, especially if they're on a closed network. And the initial security settings were lax: their domain controller had a hardcoded default password. With the right code injection, I might be able to reach other network partitions."

You raised a brow, a little surprised by Lao's optimism.

"Lucky, when you get a second, I want to review battle formations with you and Hanzo," Feng called.

"Stay out of each other's way?" You suggested, knowing that wasn't quite enough, but suddenly picturing Feng using action figures as visual aids for her battle plans.

"I'm just saying. I'm going to be real sore if there's any friendly fire and someone shoots me. Especially with an arrow," Feng sang back.

"Oh yeah, that's the worst," you agreed.

Hanzo glanced between you both, brows furrowed, lips pursed.

Feng's eyes widened slightly, like she just realized that the two of you offended him. Feng's communication skills gave away too much. Hanzo's communications skills conveyed too little. And yours were going to have to bridge the gap. You sighed, and patted Lao on the shoulder.

"I better go handle this."

Lao gazed at Hanzo, speculatively and then back at you. "Whatever you say. But I don't think they pay us enough to act as a go-between for the Yakuza and a Triad."

You snorted, because Lao didn't know the half of it.
He woke to the taste of blood and bile clinging to the roof of his mouth. Everything ached. The inside of his nose and throat felt like they'd been dragged against a cheese grater and filled with razor blades. Taking a deeper breath, he found that feeling extended down to his lungs. Sticky and dry, his eyes burned. His mind was still foggy, though the inside of his forehead itched with maddening urgency. Jack did his best to ignore it. Very discretely, he tried to move, but he was flat on his back, on a cold hard surface, eagle-spread, wrists and ankles cuffed. From the chill in the room, he knew that his armor and coat were gone and that they'd stripped him down to an undershirt and pants.

Slowly, he opened one eye.

The room was a sterile white and stainless steel. The smell of bleach was overpowering. He blinked at the flower of surgical lights overhead. Was he in a hospital? Had they been rescued?

"Well look at you, Morrison. That dosage should have kept a rhino down for another day. Hungover?"

The man was a cyborg: Caucasian, shaved head, deep set eyes and short blunt features that he wanted to pound flat. It took half a second for Jack to recognize that it was Richard Prince bent over him, smiling wide.

Jack gave a guttural snarl, that bulldog face triggering an onslaught of memory. It all came back to him one horrifying surge of gunshots and paralysis. Epsilon Squad was dead. They had been betrayed from the inside. He was alone in the custody of psychopathic terrorists. Unless... Had Jemison made it?

Jack's heart pounded, rage, adrenaline, and a thin sliver of hope sending him into overdrive. The world was crystal clear for a terrible moment: Richard Prince, on behalf of Talon, Petras, and a slew of other shadowy corrupt bastards, would torture him and his lieutenant till he broke. They would go until he gave them what they wanted. And if Jemison wasn't enough, they would choose others as leverage. Maybe you and Gabriel. Maybe Ana or Ray. Most definitely his parents and siblings. And then they would erase all evidence.

He had to get out of this. There was no question about it. Even if they were prepared to hold an SEP veteran, they would mess up. And he would have to be ready.

But his people wouldn't stand idly by. You and Gabriel would be looking for him. Ana and Gérard would scour the evidence - burnt or not. Reinhardt and Torby would come, because they were good men who'd lost enough friends. He just had to buy himself and Jemison more time.

They knew he was awake. He couldn't fake unconsciousness convincingly, if Gabe was to be believed. But they needed him to possess enough faculties to talk. They needed him coherent.

"Come on, Morrison, aren't you going to ask about your pretty Isabella?" Prince laughed sounding genuinely amused, like they were old friends catching up.

Jack just thrashed, testing the strength of his bonds. Convulsing, maybe just a little for show, Jack hissed and spat, making no coherent sounds, letting the madness of his anguish take the helm. His people were dead on his watch. Good people who had trusted him, whom he had relied on for years. The shock of that loss was still sinking in, but feigning delirium wasn't so hard. He didn't have dignity to preserve, just Lieutenant Jemison's life and hopefully his own. He roared his grief and fury, a raw visceral bellow that echoed in the chamber, his voice almost unrecognizable.

"Shit," Prince mused. "Tantruming isn't going to change anything. This is really awkward."

Prince wasn't convinced. Jack would have to go all in. He spasmed, letting his eyes roll back in his head as he thrashed, banging his head against the table, wondering if he could knock himself out.

"...Aw fuck, he's seizing. Get me the bit. Can't have him biting his tongue off," Prince sighed.

Jack felt a brief surge of triumph. They were buying it.

A leather-padded metal bar was shoved between his teeth, and Jack bit down, rage tightening his jaw, his teeth tearing through the soft parts and grinding against the metal. He didn't let himself focus on Prince's face. Too much anger, too much intent would give the act away.

"Hmm, well, give him some more time to purge the toxins," Prince said. "Sorry Morrison, we didn't have time to test the drug interactions on a real live SEP subject. I'll let you come off your high. It'll give me more time with pretty little Isabella," he said, smiling widely at Jack.

Jack didn't need to fake the roar of fury as he struggled against his bonds.

Laughing, Prince left the room from an exit on his left. The heavy metal door shut with a grim thud.

Jack had bought himself more time. But at what cost to Jemison?

"There's one group in the west side of the forest. They're moving slowly: don't know if they think we're dumb and will try to scatter into the woods, or if they're up to something else," Almasi said, checking the screen as he strapped on his armor.

"The other squad has crossed the eastern field," Onwuachimba radioed in. They were trying to surround the farmhouse. "I could pick half of them off before they realized what was happening," she offered. Chang realized then that her sniper was in or on the barn.

"No, you need to get to better cover," Chang said, zooming in on the eastern ambushers.
They had high-end equipment, not that she was surprised.

"But I can keep an eye on things."

"Now," was all Chang said. Because this was different than before: you'd called in letting her know that the situation had finally reached a head. She and Jack had gone through a lot of worst case scenario planning. Hell, she'd even sat down with Reyes and that slimy little French bastard to formulate additional contingencies. But in the event of an all out attack, with no guarantee of speedy backup, Chang had to bunker down with the Morrisons. This was that worst case scenario, and her squad damn well knew it.

"Understood. Sorry, Sarge," Onwuachimba said meekly, sensing her displeasure.
"Barrier plates?" Chang asked, scanning the screens Almasi had up. They'd set up operations in the Morrison living room. It was cramped and Maracle had moved all the furniture in front of the bay windows, but Chang was used to working in odd conditions.

"Two rings up and running," Maracle radioed back. "My rail gun is warming up and I'm almost done assembling Lilith."

The third group was coming from the road in four armored vehicles, none of which had been spotted in town or on the nearby highways. Air-dropped in probably. The cameras and comms had gone out ten minutes ago, but they'd missed Almasi's drones hovering overhead. So Chang still had eyes on them. This would be the main attack force; probably two dozen hostiles. She had already authorized a distress call to "trusted" people in the government. Well, people Jack seemed to trust. Chang wasn't that optimistic. Still, she'd set in motion the call for reinforcements. Someone would come and they might even be on her side. But in the mean time, she would clean up whatever they threw at her.

Glancing at the array, she realized there was one person she hadn't yet heard back from. "Fitzpatrick, where the hell are you?" Chang scowled.

"On my way back," he whispered cheerfully over the comms. "Just leaving out some welcoming gifts for our visitors."

"Where?" Chang scanned the multiple screens, spotting him in a ditch a couple hundred yards away from the main force. She sighed, the demolitionist was nowhere near as stealthy as he thought.

"Rearmed the tripwires in the woods, activated the minefield, and laid some very special ordnance in that one pothole that keeps getting Almasi."

Almasi's scowl deepened. "Are you trying to make a swimming pool in the driveway?"

"What's a little property damage in the name of protecting our principals?"

"Just get back here," Chang said, satisfied that he wasn't in immediate danger. "How much time on Lilith?"

"Done!" Maracle called, sounding almost giddy.

Light footsteps approached from behind, too faint to be anyone from her squad. Chang raised her pistol first, head whipping back to confirm the visual.

"Oh shit!" Michael flinched, raising his hands.

"Uh..." Maggie gave a nervous smile, ducking to the side. "Hi."

Almasi muttered some very choice words in Arabic, resting his forehead in his hand.

"Why the hell aren't you two in the panic room?" Chang asked in measured tones, lowering her gun. She glanced over at the operations summary. The panic room had been locked down five minutes ago. There was a safety-gap two hour cooldown before they'd be able to open it again. Chang glared at the younger Morrisons. Civilians were all too often liabilities. This complicated things.

Both of them winced, looking like the kids they were, dressed down in jeans and t-shirts.
"We wanted to help. You've spent so much time training us-" Michael began.

"Mom and Dad are still in there, though," Maggie said. "And we're grounded for life, probably," she added.

"That might prove to be a very short period of time," Almasi muttered.

Maggie laughed nervously. Michael was wise enough to look contrite.

Chang took a deep breath, knowing that she should have personally thrown both teenagers into the panic room and watched the door as they locked it down. Because the Morrison stupidity was genetic. She knew this. She knew this from years of white-knuckled, hair-pulling experience. She should never have assumed they would simply follow orders. Sure, she'd escorted them inside and shut the door behind them, because they were her responsibility. But the lockdown procedure took a few minutes, and she had other preparations to oversee, and she had assumed, wrongly, that she'd done enough and they would just sit tight. That wasn't the Morrison way.

Despite their lack of self-preservation skills, the kids weren't completely oblivious. They knew the procedure by now. They knew the doors wouldn't seal immediately.

Chang took a deep breath. This was an inconvenience, a liability, and a goddamn fuckup.

But it wasn't a complete surprise. The Morrison stupidity was genetic, after all. Chang had spent years doing worst case scenario planning, and exploring several "noncompliant principal" contingencies. The people she guarded obviously needed her, because they were too damn stupid to be left consider things on their own. And thanks to her training, the teens weren't utterly useless.

"Get geared up: vests and helmets. You're both on reloading and restocking," Chang said, because there was no time to really address her thoughts on the matter of their complete and utter stupidity.

Already anticipating her orders - like a good second - Almasi opened a crate and handed them both ballistic vests and helmets. The younger Morrisons quickly donned the armor.

"Ordnance stays in its case." Chang surveyed the viewscreens, monitoring the enemy progress. The forest squad was speeding up, probably trying to coordinate a pincer attack with the field squad. The main force was still driving straight down the middle. At this rate, they might all arrive at the same time. That would be problematic. "You don't directly handle anything larger than a cartridge, do you understand me?"

"Ma'am!" Both Michael and Maggie pulled off crisp salutes.

Chang stared blankly at them, not impressed by the pageantry. "And after this is through, once your mother is done with you-" The siblings winced. "-I'm going to personally remind you why it is in your best interest to comply with lockdown procedure and to follow my goddamn orders," she said, voice flat and cold, a maybe a little too much like the war criminal her critics accused her of being.

The teenagers looked at each other, expressions queasy, like they could already imagine the penal drills, weighted burpees, and other punishments she had in store for them. She did nothing to assuage their fears.

Just then a massive boom rattled the house, windows shaking and ugly decorative plates shattering as they fell off shelves. The teenagers winced. Fitzpatrick laughed wildly over the "...He halved the main force," Almasi reported. "But also the driveway."

"Hey, you can't miss that pothole now," Fitzpatrick said, still laughing. "Even if you try!"

"Eastern team is coming in hot!" Onwuachimba shouted as she darted into the room. She glanced over at the teens. "Well, don't just stand there, get Maracle his grenades."

Maggie snapped into action, grabbing a red and blue case and running out the front door. Michael blinked, looking between the pile of cases and his sister's back.

"I'm sure it won't hurt to have an extra medkit in the field," Almasi said dryly. "But the grenades are over there," he said, pointing to the green metal lockboxes on the other side.

Michael nodded, grabbed two, and headed out.

"They grow up so fast," Onwuachimba said, smiling wryly at Chang. "Well, the little one, anyway."

Almasi snorted, but kept his thoughts to himself.

Chang just studied the screens, focusing on the terrain. In addition to the two blown out vehicles in the front, there were three smaller smoking craters already showing up across the farm: one in the woods, two in the eastern fields. Fitzpatrick tended to be overly generous with the distribution of his explosives. The peripheral forces were also in disarray. As much as she wanted to go mop them up, it was best to let them come to her. The defenses would hold and she should not show her hand this early.

There was a high-pitched shriek and a smaller boom as a flashbang bounced harmlessly off the kinetic shields.

"Was that Maggie or Michael?" Onwuachimba laughed.

"Maggie," Chang said, not looking up from the viewscreens. She still counted about three dozen total against her five-person squad and two teenagers.

"This should be interesting," Almasi said, over her shoulder. "Like Algiers."

Chang closed her eyes briefly, remembering a scorching hot, ghastly dry night lit with incendiary bombs and EMPs, the smell of cordite and ozone clouding the air. She remembered rows and rows of death machines marching on the city, their lights flickering for miles. She remembered the trenches, the pressure of Mateo at her side, smiling wolfishly at her even as she elbowed Jack for suggesting an incredibly stupid, but ultimately effective plan of attack.

"You think really think so?" Onwuachimba asked, already heading out the front door.

"Easier," Chang said, giving the screens one last glance as she strapped a shotgun to her back. The first phase was done. She could now go handle things personally. This was the fun part. "These Morrisons are actually less infuriating than their brother."

Almasi made a noncommittal sound in the back of his throat, obviously disagreeing with her.

Chang just walked out the door, death on the wind and a slight smile on her face.
The raptor alarm for Lacroix's room went off half a second before Ziv started shouting. Some smart ass had programmed the siren to wail a terrifying rendition of La Marseillaise. Jesse briefly wondered what Genji had chosen for the Commander as Isha's angry shrieks echoed in the ventilation system. Genji rushed toward Lacroix's room, even as Jesse gestured for everyone else to carry on. They couldn't all go see what was the matter. Someone had to maintain a goddamn perimeter.

"Captain Larson is vehemently protesting your...unprecedented decision to lock down the infirmary and redirect all traffic to the local hospital," an Athena drone informed him as he headed back toward the center of the facility. "She wishes to inform you that she is lodging a complaint with the UN as we speak."

Jesse shrugged. "Just repeat the cover story and pass it on to the UN. Even if they don't believe us, it will buy us some time." It was a simple one, that under normal circumstances should have sufficed: Overwatch had experienced an unspecified biohazard incident, and the details were highly classified. Of course, they were working to contain it, and it didn't seem imminently critical, but it was in everyone's best interest to keep a 72 hour quarantine. The excuse wouldn't hold up for the full 72 hours, but it was a stalling tactic. Angela was writing the dummy report and she and Bayan had seemed very amused at the idea of trying their hands at fiction, possibly of the zombie variety.

Of course, the UN would send in the World Heath Organization and try to take command of the situation, but Jesse knew they couldn't move too quickly. After all, coordinating with the WHO, other military forces, and the Security Council would take time.

"We have received a...warning from a secure server, signed by a certain Mr. Oladele."

Jesse scratched his head. Oladele was Kwento's triggerman, one of the few who'd survived DC. He was the one who could shoot and politick. Had a law degree and some cool scars, if he remembered right.

"They're stalling for us, but the Security Council is currently voting on what to do. He's pretty certain the vote won't go in our favor."

Of course not. "Tell him to ferret out what he can and who we should expect," Jesse said. "And thank him for the warning."

"Of course," Athena said. "I have released the quarantine statement to each division head on site. No one present has the authority to circumvent it, besides Commander Reyes, Agent Lacroix, and yourself."

Jesse raised a brow. "That's some specific company."

"Very exclusive," Athena agreed.

Jesse rounded the corner in time to see Genji carrying an unconscious woman in scrubs away from Lacroix's room, Mihret spitting some especially vulgar curses in at least three different languages while Maeda Vargas, held him back, the younger agent looking more embarrassed than upset.

"Ease up, Mihret," Jesse said.

Ziv snarled something back, not easing up at all.
Jesse knew better than to get drawn into that fight. He nodded at Maeda Vargas, and then turned to follow Genji.

"She attempted to give Lacroix an injection," Genji said as Jesse fell in step beside him. "We are not certain what the contents were, but no such authorizations were made and she became agitated on confrontation. More importantly, she wasn't supposed to be here. Agent Claxton was on that list."

"Shit." Genji was referring to Lacroix's secret list. He and Genji had helped you sort through the names of the list and come up with reasonable postings for them. Ana had then reassigned them to places where they could do less harm. He would have to figure out how she got in, or where she'd hidden herself to avoid detection.

"We can't use the holding cells, but Agent Lao's former quarters should suffice," Genji said. "I can secure the prisoner. Maybe you should see to Mihret?"

"Pfft, he's Maeda Vargas' problem," Jesse said.

Genji chuckled, but glanced over his shoulder. "What are you going to do with the On Sing personnel?

"Dunno. Was hoping they'd volunteer or at least jump into action if something happened." Because not only were they "technically" not supposed to get involved, Jesse did not look forward to explaining their presence to anyone not cleared for Shit Spiders. Sure, he could claim that "White Rabbit" contractors happened to be on site for some kind of medical training, but that excuse might not hold up, and he couldn't focus on constructing air tight cover stories right now.

"You should speak with Patime Ajiyiming for details. She's in charge of this team," Genji said. "And see if any of them want to handle guard duty. Otherwise, I'll delegate it to an Athena drone."

"Thanks," Jesse said, because Genji had saved him a lot of time by summarizing that information.

"Winston and Dr. Ziegler have been informed of the assassination attempt: Agent Maeda Vargas has delivered the sample to Dr. Ziegler for testing."

"Then who's watching, Mihret?" Jesse's eyes widened and he and Genji exchanged panicked looks.

"Oh I can help with guard duty!" Mihret snarled, stalking up behind them.

"Mmm, you could," Jesse said, adrenaline-fueled instincts kicking in. "But then who's looking after Lacroix?"

Mihret froze. "Ben-zona-" He shot a dirty look at the unconscious nurse and then took off back down the hall. "Save me a piece!" He shouted.

Genji shook his head.

"I'll go coordinate with On Sing." Jesse was used to running ops and even giving orders. But Operation Pelennor was larger and more complicated than anything else he had done. He almost wished Ana had assigned this job to you and sent him out to rescue Morrison. He was no fan of defensive operations, and now he was responsible for the lives of all the people following him: Genji, Mihret, Maeda Vargas... And the people who couldn't defend themselves, like Lacroix and...the boss. Hell, if he really thought about it, he was in charge of making sure Overwatch didn't fall to the traitors while the rest of leadership was gone. It was enough to make him sick to his stomach if he thought about it for any length of time.

But Ana had assigned this job to him, told him flat out that he was the best candidate for the job. She might be desperate, but she'd chosen him over other qualified candidates. That didn't mean nothing.

Jesse took a deep breath. He headed back toward the main entrance. On Sing's half a dozen agents had taken up residence in one of the exam rooms. They had set up laptops, medical equipment, and what looked like a projector in the room and were in the middle of conferring quietly.

"Ms. Ajiyiming?" He asked, looking around. There were two women and four men, still clad in black body armor from the Hanoi pickup.

"That's me," a middle-aged woman said, giving him a wide friendly smile. She was very short, with thick curly brown hair and a good natured face. She extended her hand. "You must be the Boss-Lady's friend, so please, call me Patime. Everybody else does. Anyway, Boss-Lady tells me "Patime, you look after Jesse. He's going to need lots of help." And I say, "what about handsome young Genji? Isn't he almost your brother?" And then she laughs nervously and says, "oh Patime, you can't keep up with Genji, because he's a ninja and he's very shy. Don't bother him and don't ask him embarrassing questions about his brother." Boss-Lady is silly: I say, "of course we are going to ask. It is like telling water not to be wet." She knows this. But don't worry, she doesn't tell me that because she thinks you are slow. You are busy and making sure everyone does their job. You can't run around like a ninja," Patime said, not missing a beat or even taking a break to breathe.

Jesse rubbed the back of his neck, trying to sift all the valuable information from the gossip. "I appreciate the understanding. Sorry I'm only now getting around to see you. Had a lot of work to do."

"Oh, it's fine. Lady Zheng and Ms. Athena kept us informed."

Jesse wasn't sure he liked the sound of that, but he'd get more information out of Athena after this. "What can I ask you to do?" He asked. "I know you're not supposed to fight-"

Patime laughed, a loud hearty sound. "Oh, we know On Sing isn't supposed to fight. And while we might have family in On Sing, we are White Rabbit security. Boss-Lady pays us out of her own pocket. Very different." She winked.

"I was told-"

"Oh, Boss-Lady made this change two hours ago, while Lady Zheng wasn't paying attention," Patime said with a sagely head nod. "But still official. We can fight. We can fix. We can tell you embarrassing stories. But we are not supposed to go ask handsome Genji boy stories about his brother. Definitely against the rules. But she forgot to put that in the contract. So we are in the clear. Beside, I think deep down, she wants us to ask," Patime whispered, giggling. "Here, asset summary."

Jesse's phone dinged and he glanced at the message from Patime Ajiyiming. They were an operational combat squad, mostly PLA veterans with an MSS-educated engineer and not the overabundance of medical personnel he'd been expecting. He wasn't entirely sure what to make of this. Because while you seemed to trust Feng and to some extent, On Sing, Jesse wasn't so certain.
"We are currently under "quarantine." Or at least that's the procedure we're running to keep the facility locked down," Jesse said.

"Then I guess we'll have to stay in and make ourselves useful," Patime said, nonplussed. "You have a job for us?"

"I think we might need you to help guard prisoners. We're trying to take the assassins alive, but...we ain't got time to interrogate them now and we can't have them running amok."

"Oh, we can keep them out of trouble," Patime nodded solemnly.

"Or we can make sure they never trouble you again?" The other woman offered. She was closer to Jesse's age, with pink streaks in her hair and the face of a schoolgirl. She winked at Jesse. "Accidents happen."

"No accidents, yet," Jesse said, giving her an easy smile.

"Whatever you say, sir," she said, one hand on her chest, her smile coy.

"Maybe Mika wants to ask you embarrassing questions?" Patime said, nudging the younger girl with her elbow.

"Maybe Mika wants to do more than that," Mika said waggling her eyebrows at Jesse, though to his relief her expression was more gleeful than lascivious.

"Or maybe Mika wants to ask you embarrassing questions about Genji's brother," Patime said with a shrug.

"And maybe I'll even answer them," Jesse said, flashing both women a broad smile. "But I now that I know that you're combat-ready, I'm going to have to make some adjustments. I'll have handsome Genji coordinate guard rotation with you."

"OK," Patime said brightly.

Jesse waved, and then quickly exited the room. A small Athena drone hovered over his shoulder.

"How much of that is true?" He asked when he was out of earshot, the facade of good humor fading quickly.

"They are experienced On Sing wetworks operatives and freshly-contracted White Rabbit employees," Athena said. "But I'm pretty sure Zheng was aware of the reassignment. It is a technical loophole that Feng is exploiting. It's pretty crafty of her."

"Yeah," Jesse said, turning that over in his head. They were trying too hard to put him at ease. Wasn't a sin, but it didn't sit right neither, not with all the betrayals, secrets, and On Sing's interest in AIs. "You know, our deal is with On Sing, not White Rabbit. I'm not entirely sure how that's going to effect things. Let Genji know that we might have a problem. I'll meet him in the conference room."

"Winston wants you to know he's getting bombarded with questions about the quarantine. He has already composed a rote message along the lines of "we are busy maintaining protocol, and we must devote most of our attention to solving the problem, but everything is progressing smoothly, thank you for your concern." Angela has as well, though I believe she's tasked Mr. Nergui to answer them."
"Thanks, Athena. You're a peach," Jesse said, glancing down the hall to see Maeda Vargas speaking with Vo outside of Lacroix's room. Interesting. Vo didn't like strangers. But then, Maeda Vargas had been hanging around Blackwatch for awhile now. Not such a stranger then.

He returned to the conference room, to find Genji already there.

"Our On Sing allies are now officially "White Rabbit contractors." We have no alliance with White Rabbit," he said, watching Genji mix two cups of coffee, using that pistachio creamer.

Genji looked up, impassive. "This worries you?"

"Yeah. Feng didn't give us any heads up."

"White Rabbit is the face of their legitimate business. You might be concerned about them trying to raise their stock by being associated with Overwatch, but that's more political posturing than you or I care to deal with."

Jesse frowned. "You don't think they'll use it as a way to get around the terms of the alliance?"

"That's precisely what they're doing," Genji said. "On Sing isn't supposed to fight for us. White Rabbit can. And if they turn on us, they have more to lose."

Jesse simply showed Genji the dossiers.

"They're all competent combat veterans who are working real hard to be helpful. It doesn't sit right. Look, Feng warned us not to trust her unconditionally on the ride back from Hanoi. Because there's Feng, your buddy, and then there's Zhai Feng, the Dragonhead of On Sing, Lady of Shattered Tombs and Marshal of the Deathless Legion, whatever that means. They're not the same entity."

"Oh, you know her courtesies titles," Genji said, slyly. "They're traditional, and probably just symbolic." Genji stirred the coffee, staring off into the distance. "Probably."

Jesse wasn't sure how to parse that. Genji took too much pleasure in acting nonchalant about things that troubled saner folks. Lacroix was like that too, and that trait didn't seem to win them many friends. Not that either man seemed to mind.

"So you don't think they'll be a problem?"

"I would be surprised," Genji said, solemnly. "But there is no harm in being cautious. We can keep them on the southeastern side. With the quarantine in effect, they can't really go wandering. We're going to need Athena's help monitoring them."

"We'll need to issue stricter orders about who can approach the Commander or Lacroix."

"And perhaps, we will keep our medical staff out of their way," Genji said. "I'll talk to Angela and Winston."

"I'll brief the rest of our people. But we'll be discrete, because this is all just speculation and I'm going to feel stupidly guilty for hurting Patime's feelings," Jesse sighed. "I'm already starting to miss the usual Blackwatch missions. You know, where it was just a couple of us shooting our way out of overwhelming odds, trying not to killed or caught, and wondering if we'd make it to the extraction point in time."
"There is no extraction point here," Genji said, picking up both travel mugs of coffee. "Don't stress about our guests. Just place them where they can do the most good and least harm, and keep an eye on them. It'll probably work out." And with that, he left the room.

Jesse stared for a moment, realizing then that Genji had given him a pep talk. It was short and not particularly inspiring. But Genji had tried. Maybe. Or he was just being a dick. Sometimes it was hard to tell.

Chapter End Notes

Bleagh. Been adulting. It's terrible.

I know I owe some comments. I will try to catch up this week. Sorry guys, for the lateness.
Chapter 127

Chapter Summary

Operation Checquy is live.

Chapter Notes

October 11th was the 2nd anniversary of me starting to write IAL. October 22nd will be the two year anniversary of it going up on AO3 and I'll post a chapter then too. Thanks for staying me this long. ;_;

We'll be doing some things to celebrate both on my tumblr and on the discord. On 10/26 we'll be having a group readalong, with commentary. The reading selection will be done on the discord. There will also be giveaways. One is on the discord, details on the server. There will be a server invite at the end of the chapter.

The second giveaway is open to tumblr entries as well. We all like extra content: art, spin-off fics, essays, moodboards, playlists... Whatever your flavor of creativity is, we want to see it. Each item submitted gets you an entry into the drawing. (If you have a particularly time-consuming piece, it may count for more, but that's on a case by case basis.) Winners will be drawn randomly.

Please the #anniversary so we can track the entries on discord, or just submit them to the tumblr. Please only enter content that you have worked on. No one else's art or work is a replacement for your own. Please no memes as entries. If you're not sure if something is suitable, message me for clarification. Entries are due on 10/25, so the winners can be announced after the read-along.

Prize packs:
Have a Coffee (and a Cake Pop!) on Sensoo - $10 Starbucks GC
A Book to Eat...I Mean Read- $10 Barnes & Nobles or Amazon GC
It'll Rot Your Brain - $10 Steam Credit
Very Delayed Gratification- 500-1000 word drabble in the IAL universe following a character of your choice.

Alternate Prize for International Agents - A Humble Bundle of Your Choice.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The screaming had started fifteen minutes ago. Despite his concussion, Jack had a very accurate sense of time. They were piping it into his cell via PA speakers in the ceiling. He couldn't tell if it was actually Jemison or even real time. But whoever it was, she was suffering.
She didn't beg, she didn't try to bargain - Jemison wouldn't. But she couldn't contain her agony either. Between screams, he could hear fleshy wet sounds and harsh scraping, just indistinct enough to make him think the worst.

Jack was still struggling against the bonds, blood flowing along his forearms and ankles from where he'd rubbed the skin raw. He briefly considered breaking his wrists or ankles to slide them out: but they would take too long to heal. Dislocating his thumb would be cleaner, but he couldn't quite get the torque or leverage from this position.

And yet...unless someone fucked up, he didn't see another way out of this. Angling his arms, Jack threw his weight to the right side. It wasn't enough. Snarling, Jack repeated the gesture, trying to get enough momentum to snap his own bones. He wouldn't be able to do it cleanly. But with enough repetitions...

The pain kept Jack focused. He didn't think about you. He didn't think about Gabe. He didn't think about the woman who kept screaming, and how he could help her. He thought about how he was going to break out of his bonds, and then, only then, could he focus on the next step. Compartmentalization was the name of the game, and it was best coping mechanism Jack had.

The door opened.

A familiar man was shoved into the room, his suit torn, hair wild, and face panicked.

"Morrison! Oh God, what have they done to you?" Petras staggered over, hands grasping Jack's arm. He watched Jack with those beady eyes, his face a mask of worry and fear. But the emotion didn't quite reach his eyes, those grabby fingers clammy and possessive.

Jack stared blankly, not at all buying Petras' mimicry of concern.

Prince strode into the room, a sardonic look on his face.

"Please, Morrison. They're torturing that poor girl. It's awful! You have do to something!" Petras wailed.

"Or he's next," Prince said cheerfully. The cyborg leaned over and removed the bit from Jack's mouth. "You look well-rested, Morrison. Much better than before. Ready to answer some questions?"

On cue, the woman's scream cut off, wet gurgling in its place.

"Please, Morrison, you have to-" Petras wheedled.

Prince watched, clearly amused by Petras' bad acting.

Jack regarded both men, holding his silence. Letting them know that he was on to Petras wouldn't really help matters, and playing dumb would extend the life of this farce. But in light of the fact they might have tortured Jemison to death while he listened, he found he was out of fucks to give.

"So defiant," Prince laughed. "Come on, don't you want to save this poor helpless civilian? Look how terrified he is. He might just go into cardiac arrest before we start the fun part."

Petras squeezed Jack's arm. "I order you to save us both! Speak man!"

"Well then, your civilian superior is ordering you to tell me all your secrets," Prince laughed. "I hear you're a stickler for hierarchy and orders. It's a simple solution to our problem. And the blame wouldn't be on you, it'd be on him." Prince jerked his thumb at Petras.

Petras' nostrils flared, clearly disliking the jab. His pathetic expression wavered, petulance flashing across his face. Even though he'd orchestrated all of this, and more, it was clear that Petras couldn't actually take responsibility for his own actions.

Jack had never hated someone so much.

"Come on Morrison, it's just a couple of questions. You might even know the answers to some of them. What are the override codes for your turret network? Too specific? Yeah, I have trouble remembering every single security code too. No worries. Let's give you an easier one. What about this one: what exactly are you building in Annecy?"

Jack blinked, a little shocked that Prince was aware of that project.

"Oh yes, I know about that. You've gone to great lengths to keep it secret. But I know how to get information out of the bean counters. It does make me wonder what kind of dirty dealings the Strike Commander is having." Prince's smug look was only emphasized by Petras' confused one.

Jack just stared flatly. Prince didn't know much then.

"I know, I know. You don't actually know the answers to all those things off the top of your head," Prince said, with mock sympathy. "You have people and VIs so you don't have to remember all the minutia. Honestly Morrison, I don't give a shit about your security protocols or your money laundering schemes. Whatever, keep those boring secrets. I am actually after some very specific information that I'm fairly confident you'll remember. It's just a trip down memory lane..." Prince's smile widened.

In the corner of his eyes, Jack could see Petras forget to be "afraid" as he leaned in closer. The bastard licked his lips, almost shaking with anticipation. Jack could almost feel the pressure in the room shift, like Petras' voracious greed was leeching the heat from the area.

"Come on, you won awards for this mission. I know, I know, I'll have to be more specific," Prince sneered. "What did you bring back from Operation Metis? You can't convince me that you left all that tech at the bottom of the Arabian Sea. I hear it was a real treasure trove. Think the founders of Oasis managed to scavenge some of it for their rebranding of Baghdad. So I have to wonder: you had the first pick, what kind of souvenirs did you take home?" Prince smiled thinly.

Jack stared flatly at Prince, the lines of that face etched in his memory. This was the man who'd executed his team in cold blood. This was the man who'd tried to kill you and Gabe on numerous occasions. This man was dead, he just didn't know it yet. Jack expected those questions, had fielded them in many variations from Petras himself. None of those inquiries was a surprise.

"It has to be some real world-shaking shit for the Strike Commander to keep it hidden all these years, and from the UN no less. Gotta wonder, what is so important that you're staying silent when I know you must have questions. Don't worry, we'll get answers. I'm good at that," Prince smirked. "But first, I should go put pretty Isabella out of her misery. I guess her suffering is just collateral damage to you. Then I'll go get that pretty little sister of yours to jog your memory. Or maybe that spindly little brother? How about your dear old mother? I don't know who will be the most persuasive, Morrison, so the whole family is invited! We'll just have to see who survives."

Jack snarled, vision going red for a terrible moment.
"They live in Bumfuck, Indiana. It'll take reinforcements far too long to reach them. Do you really think your friend Sergeant Chang is going to be able to protect them? Christ, she's a fuckup. War criminal or not, punching a Deputy Secretary of Defense at a cocktail party wasn't the smartest choice. Didn't know they were willing to demote you SEP folks that low."

Prince paused, chuckling. "But I guess she knows how to party. Have to admire that. Is that the kind of girl you like? That would explain why she's in Indiana looking after your family." Prince leered at him.

Jack clenched his teeth, willing his relief to stay hidden. If Prince had misjudged Ray that badly, then his family would probably be safe.

Prince just cocked his head to the side. "Huh, you really do believe she can protect them with her ragtag band of disciplinary cases. Your optimism would be inspiring, if it wasn't so terrifyingly stupid." Prince chuckled. "Face it, Morrison. I've run all kinds of ops. From obliterating little Canadian bases to invading the heart of the American capital and living to tell the tale: I'm good at what I do. And I'm planning a nice family reunion for you right now. Sergeant Chang can't stop that."

"Come on, Morrison, you can end this," Petras said, frantically. "You can save them! And us too-

The day had been terrible enough. His people were dead or dying. Prince's all too personal threats nearly sent him over the edge. But it was Petras who gave the final push. His duplicity, his cowardice, his naked greed: Jack found it all nauseating. As much as he wanted to tear the man apart, the mere sight of Director William Petras made him sick. Those grabby hands on his bare arm made his skin crawl.

"Cut the act," Jack said, voice low and raw, knowing he shouldn't break his silence. That he shouldn't let them know that they were getting to him. But it felt good to stop pretending, to honestly vent the words that had been roiling under his skin. "You're not fooling anyone, you treacherous piece of shit. Coming in here and hovering like a goddamn vulture. Everyone in this room knows that this was your plan all along."

Petras gaped at him, mouth moving, but no words coming out. He looked like a fish, those rubbery lips gulping down air and he tried to protest his innocence and just failed. It was a satisfying sight, almost like Jack had gotten the pleasure of slapping the old bastard.

"Morrison, I would never- How could you say that? We're in this together!" His voice went higher with each denial.

Jack's cold stare did not waver.

Prince laughed, holding his stomach. "He's right, Director. For a politician, you're a terrible actor. You're only making a fool of yourself."

Petras huffed angrily. "How dare you?"

"It's your dignity, or lack thereof," Prince shrugged. He grinned at Jack. "You see why he had to bust me out of lockup. Doesn't have the stomach or the know-how to do this part on his own."

"Shut up, Prince! I'm paying your wages. You will address me with respect! And Morrison, I gave you so many chances," Petras snapped, eyes bulging. "I tried to save you from your folly! I even hoped that one day you would join my family - you and Ainsley! I extended the olive branch! I made you the Strike Commander! I made you, Morrison. I raised you up! I saw
The words were just words. Gaslighting to the core. Water off a duck's back. Jack didn't need to engage. He knew Petras had a hand in "branding" Strike Commander Morrison, but he also knew that his accomplishments, and failures, were his own. Arguing with that traitor wouldn't change anything, and it wouldn't make him feel better. He just watched Petras with flat eyes, and realized that despite the awful sounds he'd been hearing, he could still summon the yearning to hurt another human in terrible personal ways.

"You're just acting brave because you think someone's coming to save you! Well, no one knows where you are. No one knows about this base. And Reyes and Lacroix are out of commission. On death's door, even. And all they need is a little push to be out of the way," Petras said triumphantly. "Plus that stuck up Amari bitch is going to Greece with the rest of your old team. You know the place, where things just don't go right for you? Well there, they'll die like heroes. Yes, it'll be an international tragedy losing the rest of the old guard. But don't worry, I'll make sure we get the funding for an appropriate memorial. Of course, in the wake of such a tragedy, strong leadership will be needed, and I'll dutifully step in to take up the mantle..." Petras droned on.

Jack's stomach dropped. What had happened to Gabe? And Gérard? Ana knew how dangerous the Mediterranean omnis were. But of course, she was being sent into the thick of it with Reinhardt and Torby. And if Gabe and Lacroix were down, what kind of condition were you in? Icy fear dug into his gut, and Jack gritted his teeth. He needed to get out of here.

"Now do you understand your situation?" Prince asked, that amused gap-toothed grin making Jack's blood boil. "Your patron politician seems to have tied up all the loose ends. There won't be any daring rescues or eleventh hour pardons. Just you and me, and whoever else I need to work through to get you to talk. Pretty Isabella. Cute little Maggie. Surly Mikey..."

Petras crossed his arms, looking smug.

Jack lunged, feeling his bones creak under the force of his rage.

Petras jumped back, but Prince, stood there, shaking his head. "You won't break those manacles, Morrison. Omnic-grade shit."

Jack lunged again, the pain fueling him, replacing the panic.

"Oh God-" Petras winced, his face pale.

"Oh don't worry, Director, he's secure," Prince said. "Probably."

Petras flinched under Jack's murderous gaze. The coward couldn't even look him in the eye. "I...have some other things to oversee," Petras said hurriedly and quickly walked out of the room, glancing over his shoulder a few times, just to make sure that Jack wasn't following him.

Prince just sighed, shaking his head. "Bitch." He gave Jack a wry smile. "I get it, Morrison. It ain't fair that candy ass weasels like Petras get to win. It really gets my dander up. Draft-dodging sons of bitches getting rich on working boys' blood. Trading cushy government contracts and orchestrating cover ups while men like us die in the fields," Prince nodded sagely. "But that's just the way of the world. You were a credit to your farm boy roots, but you knew it couldn't last forever. No one is that lucky. Sooner or later, we all fall."
Jack glowered at him, twisting and thrashing as he tried to get his left wrist to give.

"Now, I know you're special, maybe you don't feel pain quite like the rest of humanity. I know a little about that. I'll be sure to check, for science." Prince gave a little half shrug. "But I ain't worried about that. Everyone has a breaking point, Morrison. Even super soldiers. If hurting you takes too long, your boss has suggested other options. I admit, I'm a little disappointed, but he's got a point. You might not feel pain, but I'm sure your loved ones do."

Jack hurled himself to the side, feeling his left wrist start to give.

"Oh come on, don't beat yourself up, Morrison," Prince laughed. "Save a piece for me. I'll let you in on a little secret. Because I like your spirit." He leaned in, nice and close, though not close enough to headbutt. "Pretty Isabella is just fine. A little loopy and mad as hell, but still in one piece. That was just a recording of some broad from another job. I mean, I've had a little fun with her, but did you really think we'd torture your agent where you couldn't watch?"

Jack spat in Prince's face.

The retaliatory blow made Jack's head spin. He tasted blood, and pain shot through his face and into his skull. Prince had broken his nose.

"Don't push me, Morrison," Prince said coldly, his smiles and friendly posturing gone. "I've been nothing but sweet to you out of professional respect. This ain't personal, it's business. Now, I've got some business with your beloved Director, so why don't you lay here and think real hard about telling us what we want to know. Won't save you or pretty Isabella. But it might spare your family some pain. Just think about it, Morrison. But don't take too long. Your director isn't a patient man." And then Prince left the room, the door slamming shut behind him.

Head still swimming, Jack wiggled his left arm, bones creaking. If Petras was telling the truth, and rescue wasn't forthcoming, he wasn't just going to roll over and give up. He certainly wasn't going to beg or give those bastards what they wanted. He was going to get Jemison and himself out. He was going to avenge Epsilon Squad. And failing that, he was going to take as many of them with him as he could.

**

You could not plan for every eventuality. No matter how thorough you were, there would always be surprises, or worse, something you missed. But when you had a good team, you did not have to be perfect all by yourself. When you had a good team, you could count on them catch your mistakes, to improvise when things went wrong, and to suggest then enact solutions. You had a good team. But you weren't so sure that they had a good leader.

With the help of Ito's surveillance drones, Lao, Zheng, and Athena were able locate the base's cameras and sensors, identify their models and capabilities, and to draw the perimeter of a no-fly zone. Adjusting your course added twenty minutes to transit time, but the element of surprise was your most crucial advantage. Once that was gone, you'd have to move fast to keep the hostages alive.

The stealthcraft landed north of the base, about five miles out. It was going to be a nasty slog, but hopefully Lao would be able to spoof the cameras and obfuscate your approach. Otherwise you'd have to risk Zheng brute-forcing their system and tripping some kind of alarm.
The pre-mission jitters were stronger than any in recent memory, even Operation Tarasque. The air practically vibrated with nervous energy as you shrugged on your coat, fastened it up, and retrieved your gear. It was finally time.

You went down the ramp first, stealth suit on, nerves buzzing. The cold air hit the back of your throat and you gritted your teeth, hands curling in your pockets. The snow under your boots was crunchy and blindingly white. You pulled down your visor and scanned the horizon. A couple of inches of snow coated the ground, brown rocks jutting out in random intervals. A large part of the island was a plateau, with a sheer cliffs high above the frigid ocean. You briefly pictured throwing Petra off one of those cliffs, smiling a little as you heard his screams terminating with a splash.

Heh.

You looked over your shoulder, checking your team's readiness.

Lao had snow goggles on, lips pursed in a familiar mixture of disgust and resignation. No one from your original squad had really liked the weather in the Yukon. It was comforting to see that that hadn't changed.

Hanzo stared stoically at the terrain. He carried a bow, and to your slight surprise, he had a wakizashi of his own strapped to his hip. Not a sword, but a blade nonetheless.

Amélie fell into step beside you. "We will go back to the Alps some time," she said softly. "I will happily demonstrate all the ways that snow and winter can be fun."

"Oh, I know the best way to appreciate snow," you said dryly. "It's from inside, in front of a fire, drinking something hot."

"I think you would enjoy downhill skiing," she said. "It is fast, dangerous, and great fun. It would be an excellent Blackwatch teambuilding retreat."

"Maybe," you said, not committing to anything.

"I know Jesse and Genji would enjoy it," Athena piped up, her drone hovering beside Amélie. "Winston would also like to try it."

"Mmm," you said, this timely suggestion reeking of premeditation.

"Don't worry, I can take care of everything," Amélie beamed.

"I believe it," you muttered. Amélie was proving to be a detail person with excellent planning skills, down to the part where she stuffed your unconscious body in a designer suitcase and dragged you to a ski lodge.

Feng rocked back on and forth on heels, like she was trying to resist building a snowman or hunting down some polar bears to hug. She grinned, sticking her tongue out to taste the cold air. At least someone was having fun. The Zheng drone floated beside her, somehow conveying a sense of reluctance and worry. It was an impressively nuanced way of floating, but maybe you were just projecting.

"All right, let's go. Avoid the wildlife, stay warm, and give a warning when we're 300 yards out," you said. "We have to move fast, but don't try to sprint. The cold saps your energy, and the snow slows us anyway. Best to keep a steady pace."
Your team nodded in response.

"All right then," you said, because this didn't seem like the right moment for inspirational speeches, and to be honest, you weren't so great at them. "Move out."

Unsurprisingly, Hanzo and Feng seemed to have little trouble with the trek. Several times you saw Feng pause, stare at the snow, then the back of Hanzo's head, and then the Zheng drone would nudge her and Feng would roll her eyes and keep moving. You couldn't read minds, but you had a very good idea what Feng was thinking.

Lao lagged behind, which didn't surprise you either, given that she'd been in the infirmary for months. She didn't complain, and you didn't offer to slow down, because you didn't have that kind of time, and she wouldn't appreciate being singled out for special treatment.

But what did surprise you was that Amélie fell back, keeping the pace with Lao. You glanced over your shoulder, quite concerned, but Amélie just smiled and waved you forward. Lao didn't look at you. She just nodded at whatever Amélie said in her ear, and kept going.

You watched, as discretely as you could, because it wasn't that you didn't trust Amélie. But something was going on there and you really didn't want to let it become a problem.

A few minutes later, Amélie caught up to you, her cheeks rosy in the cold.

"Everything OK?" You asked, trying to sound nonchalant and maybe even succeeding.

"Just giving her some suggestions on breathing techniques," Amélie said, tone light. "I know she has been convalescing."

You raised a brow and looked backward, Lao was red-cheeked and breathing harder than everyone else, but maintaining her pace. She didn't seem upset, so you just nodded, and kept going.

Because of the weather conditions and the fact Feng spotted two polar bears in the distance, it took you about an hour to reach the cameras on the perimeter. You were about 300 yards from the base, though you didn't have a clear visual on it, thanks to the camouflage. You gulped down a bag of electrolyte solution, and bit into an energy bar. None of it tasted good, but you needed the nutrition. Running burned a lot of calories, and the cold weather made you hungry.

Panting and shaky, Lao found the camera and sensor pole she'd been looking for and plugged in. Beside her, Athena and Zheng drones hovered, giving input. Lao gulped down her own snacks, fiddling with the control panel.

"...Praise Gun Jam, they never even changed the defaults," she said, looking at you. "Cameras link to a flat network, there are some encrypted partitions and a separate industrial controls network, I think, but I have access to a majority of their file dumps. They assumed their remote location and lack of internet connection would protect them. Skimped on maintaining good security protocols," she said shaking her head. "Rivka would be disgusted."

"Personally, I'm grateful for their laziness. It makes our job easier," you said, crossing your arms.

"Everything is in clear text, including admin passwords..." Lao muttered. "Are you getting all this?" She glanced at the drones.

The Zheng drone made a sound that could have been a laugh.
"How much access do you have?" You asked. "Can you open the doors? Cut the power?"

"Not from here. Different system on a separate network," Lao said, shaking her head. "I might be able to slice and splice some circuitry, but that'll take longer."

"OK," you said. "What can you get?"

"Maps, schedules, all the cameras..." She trailed off. "There's a lot of interesting looking documents, but other than some stalkerish dossiers on Commander Morrison, there isn't anything about why they want him or—Looks like they have dossiers on all the bigshots. They even have one on you, Lucky." She furrowed her brow. "According to this you're sleeping with McCree, the Shimada brothers, Amélie Lacroix, and...OK, this is obviously inaccurate. Ziv doesn't like women. Does he?" She gave you a confused look.

"No," you sighed, rolling your eyes upward. "And I'm not sleeping with any of them."

Amélie just giggled. "Is that so, Chanceux?"

You massaged the space between your eyes, your sinuses pulsing. "Amélie, please."

Lao's eyes got really big, like she didn't believe you. "Are you sure? Because I haven't even read off a quarter of the list," she said, squinting at you. "Look, no shame if you're happy. I just don't remember you being that...friendly?"

Behind you, Feng snickered.

It was official, Hanzo was your favorite squad member.

"Just download the data, and we'll review it later. My love life is not remotely relevant-"

Lao went still. "They have guard rotations set up," she said breathlessly. "And heightened security due to high value prisoners. No names and if there are cameras in the holding cells, they're also on a different network."

"Live prisoners?" You were suddenly over her shoulder, studying at her arm display. There were numerous armed guard manning work stations and patrolling the halls. They wouldn't be on alert at this location for no reason. Your heart clenched.

"Almost certainly," she said.

"There are two dozen hostiles, on the premises, including Director Petras, Mr. Murdoch, and Richard Prince," Athena said. "Most are armed and armored."

You stared at guards, teeth gritted as you wrestled with too many emotions. It wasn't a clear confirmation, but it was more than you had before. And if Prince wasn't in the cell, then who else could Petras be holding?

The fear and uncertainty made you sick to your stomach. If it was Jack, and that was best case scenario, then what stood between you and him were two of your worst enemies, and their followers, most of whom, would be heavily armed.

And if it wasn't Jack, then you were out of leads.

You bowed your head, jaw twitching. Doubts or not, this was more than enough to go on. In this moment, you didn't give a shit about Prince, or Petras, or any of the other scumfucks of the world. You needed to save Jack more than you needed to make them pay. "Can you get me more than that?" You asked, voice rough.

"Oh! I can get into the flight records for the transports," Lao said softly. There was a long stretch of silence as she worked. "...Based on the coordinates, one of them was in Switzerland in the last twelve hours. They didn't dock anywhere official..." She trailed off, pulling up more files. "The timeframes and locations match up. Their flight plan coordinates place them right in the area where the wreckage of the Strike Commander's vehicle was found, overlapping the same window of time where he disappeared. I know it's still circumstantial but-"

That, was enough to satisfy your doubts. They had Jack. Everything else faded under the incandescence of your anger. The world wasn't so cold any more, not with the rage heating your blood. "Thank you," you said, flexing your fingers, trying so very hard not to damage your gloves.

"The cellblock might have its own network, but I can try to track the archival footage to see who they brought in. It'll take awhile to go through the logs, but since they brought them in so recently-"

"Later. I want to get in there as fast as we can," you said, words taut, though your voice remained steady.

"Got it," Lao said quickly. "I've spoofed the cameras and the sensors. They'll show the looped footage and maintain readings fluctuating in the average range," Lao said. "I've also got entry access codes to the vehicles..."

"Do you need to use one of these hubs to maintain connection?"

"No, now I can do it anywhere," Lao said. "I'm in with full domain controller access. For all intents and purposes, I'm the database new admin. I can't unlock doors or crash generators, yet... Give me some time."

"We can try this method," Zheng offered, a series of code flashing across Lao's screen.

"No, that code injection will take down the network, maybe even the industrial controls," Lao said immediately, shaking her head. "It'll spoil our surprise entry and cause lots of complications. Save it for an emergency."

You raised a brow. "You can do that even with your limited access to the separate network?"

"Theoretically, it could cause a cascade through- " She paused, realizing that you didn't care how, just that she could. "Short answer: probably. But it'll obviously draw attention to our presence."

"Keep it on hand," you said. "We might need a distraction."

"Of course," Lao said. "Let me preload some of this and oh, that will work really well. Thanks," she said to Zheng.

"Very fast comprehension, excellent research skills, and good judgment," Zheng replied, sounding oddly approving. "Should you not wish to continue your career with Blackwatch, the Peaceful Life Society would be very interested in employing you."

You raised a brow.
Lao glanced at you, eyes wide. She turned her head to the side, not quite daring to shake out a "no."

"Ms. Zheng, please don't headhunt my teammates, especially in the middle of an operation," you said dryly, because as her CO you could field the question for her.

"I am merely complimenting her skill. And I am not the only one who's interested in your hacker," Zheng said, sounding slightly offended. "Undersecretary Nwazue has also drawn up a similar offer."

Lao's eyes got bigger, panic clear on her face.

"Yes, but it's very distracting," you said. "I need her focused on this job. Not the next one."

"That was terribly thoughtless of me," Zheng said, sounding almost apologetic. You didn't buy it for a moment. "I am very sorry for my poor timing. Please think no more of it, Agent...Winter Soldier."

"Uh...it's fine," Lao said, hesitantly.

"I'm sure it won't happen again," you said, trying to keep your voice even. "That's all stuff we can worry about that later. " You gave Lao a meaningful look. "Like after we've saved Jack."

Lao nodded slowly. "Right, right, of course." She cleared her throat. "So I can send an alert that both a sensor hub and a transport navigational system are experiencing critical errors. I'll do them twenty minutes apart. That way, someone will have to come out to check at least one of them." Lao nodded. "Hub error message has been sent. It's been registered by one of the engineers, but I can't tell if they're sending anyone out right away." Lao pointed at a pole in the distance. "We should have good cover to ambush them." She took a deep breath. "In the meantime, I have facility maps and we should go over the important locations and directions."

Zheng, Athena, and Lao began to show you, and the rest of the team, the layout of Petras' secret base. Someone would come to check the facility error messages, but until then, you would cram as much knowledge as you could, because Jack's life depended on it.

"Oh my god, they brought a cannon," Maggie squeaked.

"So have others," Maracle said, rail gun whining as he positioned it on the edge of the barrier shield. "One cannon, not a problem."

"They brought three-" Maggie hissed.

"That makes them three times as stupid," Chang said. She studied the formation. They hadn't bothered with any real tactics. They just lined up the cannons in a row. Sitting ducks that thought they were real predators. That delusion would change soon.

"Can you explain your math?" Michael asked, his tone respectful.

"Most of the time, people come after your family as leverage against your brother. If they blow you all up, they don't get shit." Chang hefted Lilith onto her shoulder. The massive and heavily modified AA gun was cumbersome, but worth it just for the psychological damage it dealt to the enemy. The actual explosive damage was even better. Sure, some of the enhancements hadn't been strictly legal, but Maracle knew what he was doing, and Fitzpatrick loved testing the customized rounds they'd developed. The barrel thick enough to fit a football inside and taller than she was. But she held it with practiced ease. Chang squinted down the sights. "Idiots."

"What a relief," Michael said, voice flat as he handed Maracle the grenades. The larger man just laughed.

"Cheer up, Mikey," he boomed. "You get to see the Sergeant in action. It's a real treat."

"I've seen her."

"You haven't," Maracle said firmly. "Not like this."

"It's not something you ever forget," Fitzpatrick said, his voice dreamy. "With her goes Lilith, maiden of hellfire and brimstone. Beautiful, terrible, and all consuming. When they are done, the world goes quiet and you're left with a haze of smoke and the warm smell of high powered explosives and bacon. It's the closest thing to heaven that I know."

"...That was really poetic," Maggie said.

"That's Fitzpatrick, an anarchist with the self-ascribed gift of blarney," Maracle laughed.

Rolling her eyes, Chang stalked to the edge of the barrier, eager to get away from poetry.

A man-sized bipedal omnic approached them waving the flag of truce. "Attention Morrison family and guards, there is no need for more bloodshed. If you cooperate with us, we will spare-

It was overkill, but this was her favorite part. Smiling, Chang angled the massive artillery weapon. It wasn't a nice or sane smile, but no one who knew her would accuse her of being either.

"I say... That is a rather large weapon for a human of your size. And really too much to waste on me. Are you sure you want to risk dislocating your-

Chang fired, the kick sending the gun backward and digging a deep furrow into the ground. The shell whistled as it went harmlessly over the omnic's head. It didn't flinch, but it did turn its head and watch as the plasma round erupted, spreading through the men around the westernmost cannon. Fiery blue energy waves washed over a three meter area, sublimating everything organic in seconds, before it burnt itself out. There was a lot of screaming, but it ended quickly - there weren't really much by way of remains - those caught in the center of the blast radius simply evaporated. But it wasn't always that neat, sometimes people were just on the edge and, well, that got messy. If one wasn't paying too close attention, it did smell a little bit like bacon on the griddle, like Jack was overcooking it.

"Amplified thermal-processing plasma clusters? Those are against the Geneva Conventions-" The omnic stuttered.

"Guess it'll only be a problem if someone finds out," Chang laughed. She patted Lilith, balancing the custom 40mm autocannon on one arm, and drew her pistol with her free hand.

"That is a more reasonable sized weapon proportional to your frame-"

"If you go away now, maybe I won't shoot you," Chang said, rolling her eyes. Goddamn robots weren't supposed to chat your ear off. They were supposed to shoot silently and kill efficiently. That's why she liked fighting them. Respected them even. They did their jobs and there was no poetry.

The omnic glanced at Chang, and then at the scorched remains of one third of the main force.

"I am not afraid of you. There will be more," it said, optical sensors bright and defiant. "We will not stop. And no one is coming to save you."

Smiling, Chang pulled the trigger, and the omnic dropped, half its head blown off, exposed circuitry sparking. She suspected it had vacated the shell before the destruction, but she didn't really care.

"You're looking at the last of the Condemned Company," Chang laughed, holstering her gun as she stared at the remnant of the main attack force, watching them scramble to try to salvage the gear and cannons; it was too late for the men in the blast radius. "We were never meant to be saved."

---

The entryway was in sight, though you taken cover behind gently sloping rocks. The protruding parts of the base, and the vehicles had been concealed under camouflaged tech cloth, designed to mimic the snow-covered rocks that made up most of the island's terrain. You'd taken a roundabout way to hide your footprints, and both Athena and Zheng had carefully filled in any obvious spots.

"Entry requires a retinal scan, passcode, and ID card," Lao said. "I have the code. With time, I could dupe a card, but we need one of the eyes intact."

"I've got the biofilm!" Feng said, waving a thumb-sized canister. "Specifically-rated for cold weather ops!"

"Or you can scan the retina, print it on biofilm, and place it on your own body," Lao said. "I guess that's less messy. But we still need one intact." She gave meaningful looks to the entire squad, like she didn't trust them not to turn the enemy into unusable hamburger.

Hanzo snorted.
Feng giggled.
And Amélie's smile sharpened.

"Let's see if we can take him alive, first," you said. "Just to see what he knows."

"Showoff," Amélie said teasingly.

"Door's opening," Athena said.

"Positions," you said, crouching down. Amélie went to the right, climbing up one of the rocks and wriggling forward on her belly, rifle already assembled.

Hanzo climbed the other side, nocking his bow.

Zheng had an active jammer, and Athena was primed to intercept any distress calls. Having all of you ready to take him down was overkill: but you couldn't afford to make any mistakes.
It was a single soldier, trudging out to the post, muttering obscenities under his breath, breath that you could see condensing in the cold. Ugh. You went around the rocks, gun raised.

The soldier wore earmuffs and a heavy hat, which probably muffled your footfalls. Though in your ears, it still sounded like you were stomping across bags of crackers. But he didn't look up, too caught up in fiddling with the open control panel and mumbling his displeasure.

"Hands up," you said, the barrel of your carbine pressed to the back of his neck.

Very slowly, the soldier raised his hands, and you could see that he wasn't wearing gloves. Two shiny metal hands gleamed in the sunlight.

"Shit," he said.

"Turn around, slowly."

He complied.

"I have two snipers on you right now," you said. "So don't make any sudden moves."

"I don't want to fight, it's too cold," the man said, bundled up in a hood, balaclava, and scarf. He watched you with shrewd gray eyes. "I know you. From Overwatch, right? You guys wouldn't shoot a man with his hands in the air, would you?"

"Guess that depends on the man," you said, carbine held at eye level.

"I'm just a grunt. I go where they send me," he nodded solemnly, almost comical in his thick layers of winterwear. "Come on, ask me questions. You don't have to kill me. Yes, you can use my badge to get in, but you won't pass the retinal scan security check without me. I'm much more useful alive. You can't just cart my corpse in there, security will pick up on it." He nodded vigorously.

"Passcode?"

He rattled off a number and you glanced at Lao who shook her head. She had access to the door codes. He was lying, quite convincingly. Good to know.

"How many prisoners do you have?"

"I don't know. I'm just an engineer. I don't handle that stuff," he said with a shrug and then flinched under your hard stare. "But if I were to guess, at least two."

"So the Strike Commander and Director Petras?" You asked casually.

The man gaped at you. "Lady, Petras is the one footing the bill. He doesn't need any rescue. I don't know how you could find this place and not figure that part out!"

You smiled thinly. "Just checking. It's good to know that we don't have to play pretend then. It'll be a refreshing change of pace to be able to deal straight with you."

"I uh...can appreciate a straight-talking lady with a gun." He gave you a nervous smile. "Come on, ask your questions. I am happy to answer them!"

"How many combatants are on site?" You asked, starting easy.

"Twenty," he said. "There are a few civvies on site too, but most of them ain't much use in a fight. But Prince's people are all good, scary good at being bad. What'd you bring? A dozen?
Overwatch or not, you don't stand a chance on the home ground. Not without some help, anyway.
And uh, I don't mind helping you, if you don't mind not shooting me?"

He was telling the truth this time, about the numbers at least. He was pretending not to be one of Prince's people. Interesting. Your smile widened. "Holding cell protocols?"

"Uhh, everything there is on a closed network. Regular Joes don't have access to any of that. The CC units too. Prince handles most of the sensitive stuff. Voss does some too, but he's even crazier than Prince. Most of us don't want to know what goes on in the Director's private interrogation chambers. He only brings high value subjects here, and they don't get to walk out the door, if you know what I mean." He licked his lips, eyes nervously focusing on your face. "I'm not that kind of guy. I don't have the stomach for it. But it's uh...it's like the mafia here," he said.
"Once you're in, you can't just leave. I've seen what happens to guys that try. It ain't pretty."

"What's your name?" You asked, knowing that he was trying to establish a rapport. And you understood that he was an accomplished liar, weaving in just enough truth to try to hook you into sparing his life. But you didn't care. You were using him, and while his endgame was survival, yours was rescuing Jack and keeping your team alive. They didn't have to be mutually exclusive goals.

"James," he said. "James Markovich. I'm from Iowa. Ever been there?"

"Well James," you said. "Were you expecting more guests?"

"Maybe?" He shrugged. "Heard we could be getting some leverage on one of the prisoners, but I don't know the details.

"But it is Morrison you have in there," you said flatly. "He's not the kind of guy you miss.
Not someone with your training."

Markovich sighed. "Yeah, it's Morrison. And a woman I think. I don't know the details."

Your heart leapt. Maybe Shoal had made it. You tried to keep your voice steady, your tone unemotional. "Give me a sitrep."

"Base is in a high alert state. It took them fifteen minutes to clear me to come out here.
Nobody is just walking in or out. Everyone is on call, and armed. The holding area is on lockdown. Only Prince and Petras have access."

"What kind of anti-AI measures have you taken?" You asked, because Lao hadn't seen anything.

"Modified Faraday Cage in the holding cell area. Might extend throughout the base, but I doubt it. They went a little cheap on the nonessential areas. Like the canteen. The food is garbage and there's never any hot water," Markovich continued, giving you a friendly smile.

"Good to know," you said.

Lao was busy typing away at the display on her arm.

"You've been most helpful, and I am certainly not the kind of person to kill an innocent, unarmed man. One last question." You smiled at Markovich, your expression serene.

"Sure," he said, beaming back at you.
"What do you think is worse? Finland or the Yukon in the winter?"

"Oh, that's easy. This is far worse than the Yukon. We had a job there a couple years back, and we were in and out in only a few hours," he said, not a little boastful. "We have to live here."

"That's what I thought," you said, with a nod. You holstered your gun, not wanting any accidental damage to occur.

Markovich gave a sigh of relief.

Your hand drifted to your wakizashi, and while you were not Genji, not skilled enough to slay with your draw, you were still faster than Markovich expected. You thrust it through his scarf, coat, and larynx, twisting slightly to avoid the vertebrae. Gasping, Markovich dropped to his knees, hands reaching for his punctured throat, blood bubbling onto the thick fabric as his breath leaked out him, confusion written into his death mask. You wiped the blade on his jacket, sheathed it, and then retrieved his ID card. Of course, his eyes were perfectly intact.

There was a neat smattering of applause, and you looked up to see Amélie and Feng clapping quietly. Hanzo's disgruntled look told you more. You were pretty sure he thought you should have been able to slice off the head in one rapid stroke, or kill on the first draw. But shockingly, he said nothing to undermine your authority.

Lao just stared. "He was at the Ninth Circle? Shit. I didn't even think about-" She shook her head. "How many of them have you killed since...after?"

"A dozen or so," you said, though most of that had been because they were in DC or on other ops. Gabriel hadn't exactly authorized you to hunt them down on the side. But neither had anyone forbidden you from doing it.

"Gross dead eye copy time!" Feng knelt over the dead man, placing a thin photosensitive clear film over his wide open eyes. She flashed a small light and then stuck the film on each of her eyelids. The backing had turned slightly opaque, and the faint imprint of the retinal scan appeared like a temporary tattoo on her skin. Having a second pair of eyes on one's lids was odd enough. Knowing that they belonged to a dead man? ...Well, you'd worn worse.

"Lao, if you can lock down the vehicles without triggering any security alerts, you may start. But please stay on the comms in case we need troubleshooting. Amélie, if you can pick a vantage point and guard Lao and the emergency exit, the rest of us are going in."

"If you need help, we'll be here," Amélie said, giving you a little wave as she made herself a little nest atop the rocks. You watched her align her barrel, and then nod. "This will do. I have a clear view of all the targets. Though maybe..." She eyed another set of rocks speculatively. "Don't worry about us, Chanceux. We will do our part."

Feng lifted the dead guy over one arm and half-dragged him behind the rocks. It wasn't the first time you'd seen her show off super strength, though you weren't sure how she managed it considering she didn't have much muscle.

You glanced over at Hanzo, who was watching her with a very peculiar expression. He inclined his head back, focusing on the movement of her arms. It seemed he wasn't shocked. Instead, he was interested in seeing her perform. So he knew, or at least suspected the details of Feng's altered biology.

Lao, on the other hand, looked at her arms, both metal and flesh, then Feng, somewhere between incredulous and outraged. You knew Lao, and you could practically read her mind: "I don't think I could do that, and I'm the same size as you, what the fuck?"

Feng took point, you and Hanzo flanking her, with the drones following behind. Both Athena and Zheng would have to guard against anti-AI measures, something you couldn't detect.

Under the canopy, but protruding from the rocks, was the base entrance. The thick metal airlock was wide enough to fit three people abreast. Cameras and turrets bookended the doors. You held your breath as Feng stepped into range, but the turrets didn't move: they were dependent on signals from the sensor and camera system for targeting.

Feng stepped up to the keypad and retinal scanner.

"All right, you'll need to pass the retinal first, then enter the code. It is six-six-two-seven-zero-three-six-six," Lao said, sounding very crisp over the comms.

Feng whistled to herself, as she placed her eyelid against the scanner and keyed in the numbers.

Hydraulics grinding in the cold, the door cracked open like a metal maw, and you followed Feng into the entryway. There was a blast of deliciously warm air as you entered. Just to the left was the desk for the door sentry, and he was staring at his computer screen. He didn't look up at first, obviously expecting Markovich's return.

Feng stepped aside, as Hanzo nocked his bow.

The movement caught the guard's eye, and he looked up. "Hey-" The armored cyborg began, but the words died with him, one of Hanzo's arrows lodged in his eye.

"Nice," Feng said, nodding appreciatively.

The door closed behind you.

Hanzo retrieved his arrow and with some effort and pushed the man under the desk. The Zheng drone plugged into the terminal.

"I can probably disarm the rest of the mechanical defenses, at least on this network," she said. "I can cut power as well, but I believe that will make things more difficult for you."

"Yeah," you agreed.

"But I cannot unobtrusively access the restricted area of the base," she said. "Not without physically being there."

"Neither can I," Athena said, regretfully.

"All right." It had been worth a shot.

The plan was simple, though not ideal. You had to secure the hostages, first and foremost. You would do as much as you could to make getting out easier, but speed was the key. You could not give the enemy any time to silence Jack.

You had memorized the route through the base, to the holding cells. There were only two levels, and the restricted area was on the lower level. The base formed a large loop, with several interconnecting hallways. You had head south, toward the back of the base, then curve east and go downward. It was a simple enough layout. You just had to kill anyone who raised the alarm and hope you could outpace the defenders.

"We can move on," Zheng said. "I've granted Agent Winter Soldier greater network access."

You nodded. Feng went straight through the main corridor, LED lights casting a cool glow along the metal walls. The building was a modular pre-fabrication, with narrow corridors and too-low ceilings. You pictured Prince and his men bumping their heads regularly, it made you smile.

Two men rounded the corner, nearly walking into Feng.

She didn't hesitate. She grabbed the nearest man by the ears and twisted, his neck snapping even as you lunged forward, flexing your fingers, blades gliding out into your target's unprotected throat. You pulled them out of the crossway, and left them in the entry hall. Feng sped up, arms swinging at her sides.

You hoped Feng's kinetic shields were as good as she claimed - because if anyone started shooting in these corridors, there wasn't much cover. It would get bloody very quickly.

"What do you mean, "Markovich isn't answering your hails? Yes, send someone to check on him! He's not one of those idiots who likes being out in zero degree weather!" A woman barked from an office as you passed by, the door slightly ajar.

Feng slowed down, practically gliding across the floor. Hanzo moved just as silently. You stepped carefully on the balls of your feet, not even breathing till you'd passed by. Zheng and Athena's drones floated quietly behind you.

Feng turned to wink at you, like you were kids sneaking out bed for a midnight snack. Hanzo looked less amused, but that was nothing new.

You tapped your comm. "Winter Soldier, Black Widow: incoming hostiles-just a search party for now," you said softly to Lao and Amélie. Because there was a good chance they'd discover the men you'd killed and double back.

"Understood, Fury," Amélie chuckled. "We will handle it."

Lao muttered something in Cantonese, too faint for you to pick up over the comms. There was a pause. "Most of the vehicles are now locked down. Going to have to handle Prince's ship manually though."

"I will change vantages then," Amélie said.

You were halfway through the base when the shouting started. Someone had discovered your handiwork.

"They've found your second kill site," Lao said tersely over the comms, obviously monitoring your progress when she was should have been hacking Prince's ship.

You didn't need to say a word. Feng broke into a full sprint, you and Hanzo close behind. You drew your gun. Stealth wasn't the priority any more. They knew you were here. Now all that mattered was reaching Jack fast.

"Speed up!" Lao snarled into the comms. There's half a dozen spreading out from the bodies. You need to switch halls."
Feng turned right, then took the next left, getting you back on track. You could hear more shouting and heavy boots hitting the metal floors as soldiers raced along adjacent hallways.

"Halt or we'll shoot!" The voice came from behind.

"Hulk, cover!"

Just as smoothly as she'd been leading, Feng slowed, letting you, Hanzo, and the drones pass her.

The gunfire lit up the hall, and you glanced over your shoulder as bullets flashed against the kinetic shields, impact causing the hard light to ripple. Feng's shields couldn't hold indefinitely - sustaining that kind of power would either drain the source or the rapid shield wall regeneration would cause the unit to overheat.

The stairs were straight ahead behind a thick metal airlock and an oddly skinny man. His body gleamed with the dull sheen of brushed omnium and red LEDs. He wore armor, but the only flesh you saw was a quarter of his face and a small bit of pale neck. It looked he'd been rebuilt several times, losing more and more organic matter each round.

Hanzo loosed an arrow, and electricity sparking as it struck the cyborg's chest.

His knees buckled and you lunged forward, pushing him aside to give Athena access to the keypad. Zheng hovered beside her, the two of them working silently. The cyborg hit the ground with a clank, his body spasming from the high voltage projectile.

Very slowly, the security door began to rise, taking its sweet time. Inch by painstaking inch, it rose. The shouting grew louder and Feng was beside you, frowning as she crouched down and began to lift. But despite her unnatural strength, she couldn't get the doors to move any faster.

"Damnit-" She took a deep breath. "Time me, Auntie."

"Already?" Zheng sounded alarmed.

Feng took a deep breath. "原形畢露." And then, snarling, she slowly pushed the door up a whole foot, her skin paler than you remembered, black and green lines spiraling across her face and fingers. You realized that was her tattoo and it had spread across her entire body in a chaotic winding pattern, the lines almost glowing under her skin. Her thin fingers curled, three inches longer than you remembered, and tipped in black claws.

"When did you have time for a manicure?" You asked.

"You're hilarious, now hurry up," she snorted. Feng's voice was different, recognizably hers, but layered now with a dissonant tone. It was like an echo, though it had a gravelly almost demonic twang.

"Athena, come on," you said, sliding under the door, Hanzo right behind you.

Feng started to slip under the door then stumbled midstep. "Shit!" She glanced over her shoulder. "Let go, fuckface!" She kicked backward, but the cyborg pulled himself up, gripping her leg. Bullets pinged off the door. Their reinforcements had caught up.

Athena's drone scraped under the door.

"Hold on-" You said, ducking back down to give her cover fire.
"Go on without me!" Feng snapped, kicking the cyborg in the face. "I'll keep them busy!"

"Wait-" Hanzo shouted, reaching out, eyes wide.

Grinning at you both, Feng saluted, kicked the cyborg in the face again, and dropped the door with a deafening clang.

Chapter End Notes

Stayed home sick today. Sinuses are acting up and been having stomach issues and managed to burn myself with an icepack since I'm icing my wrists. Genius work, really. XD

Here's the discord invite.
Chapter 128

Chapter Summary

There will be blood.

Chapter Notes

It's been two years, guys.

Just repeating the last announcement:

We'll be doing some things to celebrate both on my tumblr and on the discord. On 10/26 we'll be having a group readalong, with commentary. The reading selection will be done on the discord, there is a doodle vote on there as well. There will also be giveaways. One is on the discord, details on the server, pinned in the #overwatch-comms channel. There will be a server invite at the end of the chapter.

The second giveaway is open to tumblr entries as well. We all like extra content: art, spin-off fics, essays, moodboards, playlists... Whatever your flavor of creativity is, we want to see it. Each item submitted gets you an entry into the drawing. (If you have a particularly time-consuming piece, it may count for more, but that's on a case by case basis.) Winners will be drawn randomly.

Please the #anniversary so we can track the entries on discord, or just submit them to the tumblr. Please only enter content that you have worked on. No one else's art or work is a replacement for your own. Please no memes as entries. If you're not sure if something is suitable, message me for clarification. Entries are due on 10/25, so the winners can be announced after the read-along.

Prize packs:
Have a Coffee (and a Cake Pop!) on Sensoo - $10 Starbucks GC
A Book to Eat...I Mean Read- $10 Barnes & Nobles or Amazon GC
It'll Rot Your Brain - $10 Steam Credit
Very Delayed Gratification- 500-1000 word drabble in the IAL universe following a character of your choice.

Alternate Prize for International Agents - A Humble Bundle of Your Choice.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The main comm channels went out first, from a steady stream of boring traffic that he'd put on to monitor for this exact issue, to silence. After thirty seconds of dead air, Jesse knew that it was time. They were coming. "Places, people! Winston, crank up those shields. Noncombatants, please stay in your designated safe zones." He stopped in the central area.

"Two squads just landed on the roof. They were air-dropped in. My local cameras are going dark," Athena said sharply "But I've repositioned some of the others on adjacent roofs."

Jesse grimaced. If they were making it into Swiss and more importantly Overwatch airspace, then they'd had a lot of help from high above. He didn't want another Washington DC, but in this case it seemed like the infirmary, not civilians, was the target. So the bloodshed would be contained. What a relief. Jesse snorted.

"Main power's been cut," Winston said, tersely over the local comms.

That had been expected. Fortunately, the med center had two backup generators that had been boosted by the resident genius. They weren't designed to power shield generators indefinitely, but hopefully the enemy hadn't packed too much ordnance. Not that the shield generators would do much good with hostiles on the goddamn roof. Jesse headed for the stairs.

"Someone has called our bluff and designated a five mile radius around the exterior of the medical center a full on quarantine zone. Overwatch personnel have been ordered to steer clear of the area. Those shit-sucking pigfuckers..." Mihret snarled over the private comm channel.

"We knew they'd try to isolate us more," Jesse said. "Ain't no surprise. It's fine, Mihret. We're Blackwatch. We're used to working on our own."

Mihret grumbled something unintelligible, but stopped arguing.

Jesse counted that as a win.

"Athena is activating the turrets' targeting programs, and is maintaining an encrypted connection to HQ," Winston said. "But is there anyone over there that we can actually call for help?"

Jesse had been thinking about this question for quite some time. Of the people left, everyone cleared for Shit Spiders was already in this building. But not all of Overwatch was against them.

"Agent Nadine Daniels," Jesse said. "Put this message through to her: "Daniels, it's McCree. Hate to say it, but this is Cape Matapan all over again. We're locked in, only the ones coming for us ain't just omnis. We know you've been ordered to stay away, but if there's anyone you trust to do the right thing, or even just bear witness, we need backup. You can't come into the infirmary. But the problem is external: some ranged support might be nice." Jesse paused. "And cut."

Winston cleared his throat. "Isn't Agent Daniels a...pilot? Shouldn't we be appealing to someone higher up in the command structure?"

"I would if I trusted any," Jesse said with a shrug. "Daniels is a damn good pilot. And she knows a lot of people." Not mention that you'd helped him save her life. Daniels would do her best to return the favor. At least, that's what Jesse was banking on.

"It's been delivered," Winston said.

"Turrets have taken out one squad," Athena said. "But the rest have breached the building through the roof access. I have locked down elevators."
Jesse opened the door to the stairwell, stomps and shouts echoing from above.

"Pati'm's people are in position and carrying some heavy ordnance," Genji said, materializing on his left side. "They'll maintain the perimeter for us, but let's make this quick."

Jesse threw his arms up and nearly jumped out of his skin, but managed to pass it off as stretching. He shook his head, heart pounding with the panic of Genji's sudden appearance. The bastard loved doing that to people. "What kind?"

"Don't know. Something On Sing developed. They seem pretty excited to test it out."

Jesse snorted. "Guard rotation?" Because if he and Genji were in the field, that would be the ideal time for another assassination attempt.

"Isha has a panic button for Lacroix and the Commander's rooms. Maeda Vargas, Mihret, and Vo are still on guard duty," Genji said. "Mihret is in Lacroix's room. Isha should be in the vent, but she keeps sneaking out to check on Bandit. Diallo is keeping an eye on our allies."

Jesse smiled wryly. Vo, Mihret, and Maeda Vargas weren't ideal bodyguards, but they'd have to make do.

"Come on, cowboy. There's less than ten of them left. Athena did most of the work. It will probably take you longer to climb the stairs."

And with that, Genji charged forward.

"This is what passes for elite special forces these days?" Chang scoffed. These were the people who had taken Jack? She was going to have to have words with him. Or at start designing more training exercises to keep him sharp. Shaking her head, she reloaded Lilith. "These meat shields never would have survived the war."

"You should remember that they specialize in killing unarmed civilians," Almasi said over the comm. "It's made them soft."

"And they're used to having superior tech and launching ambushes," Maracle said. "They can't hold their own in a straight fight."

"Bad tactics," Onwuachimba said, lining up another shot and exploding a gunner's skull.

"But I appreciate how they walk right through my tripwires," Fitzpatrick said cheerfully. "They have omnis and not the sense to use them right."

"It's like the Sarge said," Maracle shook his head with mock sorrow. "Standards have slipped."

Maggie and Michael sat on the grass, faces smudged with dirt, blue eyes stuck permanently in wide shock as they looked between their bodyguards and the attacking forces. Or the smoldering remains of the attacking forces.
Maggie raised her hand. "Or maybe you guys are just really good?"

The soldiers looked at each other, and shrugged.

"Maybe? But there is always someone better," Onwuachimba said. She stared wistfully into the distance. Maracle patted her on the back.

"Sarge won't let us get cocky," Fitzpatrick said, sotto voce.

"Our performance does not negate the fact they are overconfident, clumsy, and poorly prepared," Almasi said, sounding disgusted.

"It looks like there's another squad coming from the west. They're moving slow, either checking for more of Fitzpatrick's surprises, or trying to maintain stealth," Almasi said.

"Should we go mop them up?" Onwuachimba asked.

Chang sighed. She wanted to. She wanted to clean this up and be done with them, but that would be unwise. She didn't know how many people the enemy was going to throw at them. And her goal was to protect the Morrisons, not wipe out every enemy soldier.

"Let them come to us," she said. There would be more. But they could hold out.

"Incoming emergency transmission from Lammergeier," Almasi said, tone grim. "It's not realtime, but it's from the encrypted network, time stamped fifteen minutes ago. I can't raise them on the comm channel."

Chang narrowed her eyes, fully understanding the severity of the situation. Lammergeier was Jane Morrison's code name.

"We're safe, and in the shelter, but we're remotely watching a dozen men tearing apart the house. I don't think they know where the shelter is, but they're searching. I'm afraid they might start going after the neighbors."

"They're getting pretty close," Jane's husband said, voice a little shaky. "We're armed, but not as well as they are."

A child giggled in the background, obviously not worried by the circumstances or the weapons.

Morrisons.

Chang groaned. She'd personally overseen the construction of the bunker on Jane's property. It was sturdy, but give enough time, the enemy would find it. And even if they were stupid, they were well-armed. If they were careful, they could breach it in under an hour and take prisoners. If they weren't careful, but heavily armed, they could breach it faster and leave a bunch of corpses.

The lack of communication didn't bother Chang. Too much signal traffic would give away the bunker's location.

"All right then, change of plans," Chang said, looking toward the forest. "Looks like we need to clear things up here, and then Maracle and Onwuachimba can go take care of things at Jane's place. And you two are staying right here, behind the shields." She glared at the two youngest Morrison siblings, who had gone very pale. "If you so much as look in the direction of the armored car, I will hobble you."

"She'll do it too. I've seen her cut tendons and break bones to protect people from their own foolishness," Onwuachimba mumbled. "You'll heal, but it is not fun."

Michael swallowed audibly. "We will stay here."

"Yup," Maggie nodded vigorous. "We can follow orders."

Chang snorted, giving Onwuachimba a wry look. The sniper just smiled back too brightly. And while Onwuachimba wasn't exactly telling the whole story, she didn't seem bothered by the memory, an event that Chang still felt a twinge of guilt over. But then the sniper didn't always seem aware of the broader scope of her own actions or intentions. She might have once, but Chang had never met that woman.

"Maggie, go help Almasi on surveillance. Michael, give Maracle a hand with the shield generators." It normally didn't take her squad much time to shift from defense to offense, but she needed to give her principals a task, otherwise they'd get into more trouble.

They would need the homestead first and then split the squad. It wasn't ideal, but Maracle could operate without a great deal of supervision, and he was good with Onwuachimba. She'd have to go over some protocols with Almasi, and have a talk with Onwuachimba, reminding her to stay on task. Battle was fun. Managing the logistics? Not so much. But it was her job, and she would do it right.

Shaking her head, Chang set Lilith down and headed back toward the house.

Hanzo stared at the airlock door for half a second, shook his head, and looked at you, jaw tight. He nocked his bow.

You glanced at the Athena drone. It hovered there, lights dimmer than you remembered.

"Athena, you OK?" You asked.

There was a moment of silence. "Initiating Backup Protocol: Lucky, due to AI constraints, I cannot follow you into this area. This is a prerecorded message. The drone has been preprogrammed to provide combat and tech support. She will respond to your orders."

You blinked. "Can you hack and maintain comms?"

"Within a limited radius. I cannot maintain a secure connection to anything outside this barrier."

"Is Feng all right?"

"Agent Hulk was defending against no less than six enemy combatants. She was maintaining."

"Lao? Amélie?"

"I cannot tell." Modified Faraday Cage, huh? You'd have to trust that Feng could hold her own for now. And that Amélie and Lao wouldn't kill each other.
"What do you know about Feng's abilities?"

"She has less than ten minutes," Hanzo said. "She cannot stay in that altered state for long."

"Zheng's drone is combat ready, though not ideal for heavy fighting," Zombie Athena said.

You nodded. "The faster we finish here, the faster we can back them up."

At that point two cyborgs rounded the corner, guns out.

You and Hanzo fired simultaneously. Your target dropped silently, while Hanzo's mark had just enough time to grip the arrow protruding from his eye, before he too fell backward.

"Zombie Athena, are the holding cells still on the east side?" You said, already moving in that direction.

"Yes, Fury. You may call me Jarvis, if you so wish. Or Ultron, if you are feeling ornery."

"Thanks...Jarvis," you said, wondering if Feng had suggested that. It was slightly more civilized than "Zombie Athena."

"You're welcome, Fury." The intonation was correct, the voice was the same, but she didn't sound right. It was strange hearing Athena's voice with no real feeling behind it.

The basement level was much smaller than the main base. You passed two hallways and two more now-dead guards before you found a reinforced security door. It looked like a holding cell.

"Jarvis, I need that open."

You and Hanzo glanced around, waiting to see if more guards were coming. But you had the sinking feeling that most of them were back in the main base, their attention on Feng.

"Seven minutes," Hanzo said, voice flat.

The door swung open, and you raised your gun, checking around the corners. It was a holding cell, and on the ground, wrists manacled together, was Lieutenant Jemison. Blood plastered her braids to the side of her head, and her normally immaculate uniform was torn. Eyes wild she stared at you, blinking rapidly, like she couldn't quite process what was happening.

"Strike?" She rasped, coughing up as she tried to speak.

"The lucky one," you said, voice shaky. Even in combat, you'd never seen Jemison look so disheveled. Even when drinking or eating pie, she always seemed so collected. You knew this was a silly thing to be surprised about, but it was easier to focus on the small things than the big ones.

"Can you walk?"

"Who else did they get?"

Jemison stared at the ground. "Commander's here. Somewhere. He's gotta be alive. But he's the only one." Her voice was soft, barely above a whisper.

"Shoal?" You asked, heart sinking.
"Prince," was all she said, not meeting your gaze.

You closed your eyes, fingers wrapped tightly around your gun. You had walked in here thinking that maybe Shoal had... It was a fool's delusion. You were old enough to know better, but it still hurt.

Inhaling sharply, you ground your teeth together, knowing you couldn't focus on that right now, and hating yourself just a little bit for it. "Let's get the cuffs off you, and then I have to get Jack. If you can't walk, sit tight. We'll be back for you."

Jemison nodded, flinching at the motion. "Wise."

"Fury-"

You glanced over your shoulder in time to see Hanzo go flying backward.

You shouldered your carbine, just as Prince filled the doorway. From his beady eyes, to his wide scarred features, you would recognize him anywhere. You knew the slight limping lope of his walk, the noticeable hunch of his shoulders, the odd way he angled his neck when he studied something of interest. You'd made it your business to remember him well.

Jemison snarled at the sight of him.

"Well, you're not what I expected, especially not for a rescue mission," Prince said, stroking his chin. "I guess, they're really desperate then. There's you, that tattooed bitch that Voss is taking apart, and your pretty boy archer. What is this, Attack of the Bitch Squad?" He chuckled at his own joke.

You gritted your teeth. "Catchy."

"Did they finally put a squad of menstruating women together as a offensive team?" He grinned at you smugly. "If I offer you chocolate and a bubble bath, will you calm down?"

You fired, but your bullets only pinged against his ballistic shields.

A flurry of arrows struck Prince from the side, light erupting from each hit, but the kinetic barrier held.

"Hawkeye," you called, eyes never leaving Prince. "Anyone else out there?"

"Not any more."

"Then save your arrows and go help Hulk."

Prince snorted.

"Fury-" Hanzo began to protest, and that surprised you, just a little.

"That's an order," you said, holstering your gun.

Prince looked down the hall in the direction of Hanzo. "Is that who I think it is? Yeah, I recognize that pretty face now. The Yakuza has quite the bounty on that one - I could buy a tropical island for what they're offering. Thanks for bringing him straight to me."

You smiled tightly. Hanzo could take care of himself, but Prince's tone got under your skin. That psycho fuck wasn't going to lay a hand on any more of your friends. "Don't get ahead of "Brave, but it won't save pretty Isabella and you don't have a chance in hell. This won't be like last time, Lucky Duck," he laughed darkly. "And I owe you for suffering and damages."

"You certainly do," you said, smiling back, a rictus grin that had nothing to do with good humor.

"This is personal for you," he cocked his head to the side and began to circle the perimeter of the cell. You moved in tandem with him, keeping him across from you. "Reyes says you were in DC. Is that what's got your panties in bunch?"

"Didn't help," you said, watching his arms and his eyes. "But no. It's a lot more personal than that."

"I do a lot of fast-paced work. Don't get to make a lot of introductions and names aren't my thing. So, I'm afraid I don't remember you from anywhere else," he said, with a shrug. "You'll just have to tell me."

"Black Base Delta."

He stopped, closing his eyes briefly, his smile widening. "Reeeeally?" He dragged the word out with real enthusiasm. "Oh, you must be Bái Shě's friend. I get it now. That little bitch lied to me." He laughed. "I guess this is what I get for not being thorough, though to be honest, it was such an easy job, I guess I got careless. My bad." His grin sharpened, malice gleaming in those beady eyes.

Your expression tightened, teeth threatening to break your own jaw.

His eyes lit up, nostrils flaring. He knew he'd scored a hit.

"You seem to make a habit of carelessness. Must be the permanent and progressing brain damage," you said. "How much time do you think you have left, Prince? One year before the senility sets in? Maybe two if you're real careful and take your fish oil."

He sneered at you. "I'm going to make this hurt, Lucky Duck." And he charged you, those massive metal arms swinging.

You didn't have enough time to deliver a good hit, so you ducked under his arms and slid to the right, narrowly missing a metal fist to the skull. His blow glanced off your side, and it was like being hit with a crowbar. You flinched as you spun around, your back to the door. He rushed you again, and you thrust the wakizashi into the flesh of his shoulder. Laughing, he grabbed you by the throat, not caring that he was impaling himself deeper on the blade. It seemed to have missed anything vital and that was enough for him. He held you just tight enough to keep you in place.

You jabbed your left hand into his face, blade and needle emerging simultaneously.

Prince batted your hand of the way, laughing as he squeezed a little harder, and your vision flickered. "You can't fool me with that again," he said smugly. "Once was bad enough. I learn from my mistakes. Guess you won't get the chance." He shook his head. "You might have lasted longer if you hadn't sent the pretty boy away. Now, do I squeeze the life out of you? Or do I stick you with your cutesy little knife? Or do I just shoot you in the head so you stop wasting my time? Decisions...decisions..." He said with mock worry.

You weren't getting enough air, and panic began to well in your chest as he ran his thumb... along your throat, pressing down. Fear threatened to swallow you whole, the crack of Shin's vertebræ echoing in your skull. You thrashed, and Prince squeezed tighter.

Darkness briefly flashed across your vision, the world narrowing to a pinpoint: if you panicked, then you would die, and so would your friends. You knew that to be a fundamental truth, it was cold, but grounding. But you weren't getting any air now. Complex thoughts evaporated and your hindbrain kicked into gear. Feelings didn't matter, survival did. The world continued to shrink till there only the man in front of you, his metal hand slowly tightening around your throat.

There was no conscious thought. You already knew the solution in your bones. Gently, you released your wakizashi, your eyes locked on Prince's. His smug triumphant look barely registered. It didn't matter that he thought you were giving up. You were already reaching for your tanto. You had done this before. It was instinct by now.

And then Prince's eyes widened, and he loosened his grip on you.

Jemison howled, her words too guttural to make out, but you understood exactly what she meant.

You blinked rapidly, eyes watering as air rushing back into your lungs. And right in front of you were Jemison's fists, on either side of Prince's head, the short chain of her manacles drawn tight along his throat.

Prince bellowed, trying to buck her off. Both metal hands clawed at the chain, and he panted loudly. Jemison wouldn't be able to hold him for long. That was OK, she wouldn't need to. You would finish this.

Tanto in hand, you lunged forward, blade meeting some stiff resistance as it passed through the flex panels in his body armor, then a thick wall of muscle. You pushed the tanto in to the hilt, and cut upward, in an upside "U," tracing the outline of his ribcage from one side to the other. You twisted the blade as you pulled it out, watching as part of the armor fell away with his skin, an open flap, a tattered membrane. And then his insides began to slither out, guts and fluids hitting the floor in a heavy patter of wet plops.

Jemison staggered backward as Prince dropped to his knees. Eyes so wide- almost all sclera - he tried to scoop his parts up and shove them back into his body, but they kept slipping through his fingers. Iridescent organs and loops of intestines streamed out, gleaming under the fluorescent lights.

You wiped your tanto on your pants and sheathed it, before yanking your wakizashi out of Prince. He didn't seem to notice. You remembered then that his pain receptors didn't work properly.

"No, no, no, no, no- Shit!" Prince snarled, slipping in his own offal and fluids.

"I realize that you don't feel pain like most people," you said. "So this will have to do."

"Looks like he's falling apart," Jemison rasped, laughing darkly. She coughed, spitting blood, shoulders shaking with each spasm. But she smiled fiercely at you, wiping her mouth on the back of her hand.

"Shut up! Shut up! Shut up!" Prince frantically tried to push everything back inside, hand hold himself together, but his arms were shaking now, and he couldn't stand.

"Looks like you know how to field dress a kill. Doesn't look like you punctured anything vital, Strike. It could take him hours to die," Jemison said, not sounding bothered by that prospect at all.

"You made a noncommittal noise, taking his gun and combat knife off his belt. You didn't see an ID badge - hopefully Jarvis would be able to hack Jack's cell too."

"I want to watch," she said, dropping back down into a crouch, obviously still weak. "Go save Morrison. I'll make sure things get...finished."

Nodding, you handed her his sidearm. "I'll be back."

"No need to rush," Jemison said, eyes flat and cold as she stared at Prince. "I have plenty here to keep me entertained."

"Damnit all, Hulk is in trouble," Agent Lao said over the comms. "And I've lost direct contact with Fury and Hawkeye."

"We knew that was a possibility once they reached the lower level," Amélie said, lining up a shot. She'd seen five heavily armed cyborgs emerge from the base. "Let me finish cleaning up this mess, and then we'll go help Hulk."

Amélie smiled as she watched her target's head erupt like an overripe melon. They were shouting now, looking for a sniper, and she waited patiently for another one to cross her range.

They were lined up like little tin ducks in a festival booth. Gérard had taken her to one such street fair in Prague and had won her a little glass ballerina. She had turned around, beat his score, and won him a wooden marionette. The craftsmanship was exquisite, the gifts terribly sentimental, and both souvenirs were in their bedroom in Zurich.

Amélie gritted her teeth, remembering that her husband was also back in Zurich, maimed and sedated. Ziv would look after him, and Amélie would work out this tension that in danger of fossilizing inside her shoulders. Staying in Zurich when everyone else left for Hanoi had been excruciating. Gérard had a valid tactical reason for leaving her behind. Seeing her would have sent Nguyen into a frenzy. And while that could have worked in their favor, Gérard argued otherwise, and he was probably right.

But that gave her no peace. She spent the entire duration of Operation Tarasque in poor humor and decimating her sparring partners, wishing that she could have gone too but far too proud to complain about it. She was not used to being a liability. Of course, many people underestimated a mere ballerina, but that didn't bother her. Amélie Lacroix did not doubt her worth. But in this situation, she had stayed home while her husband and many of her friends marched into peril. And some, like Feodor Tataryn, did not return.

But you had. You had come home. You had brought Gérard back to her once again. You had protected the one she loved. And she felt absurdly awful because the two men you loved were in such grave danger. It wasn't right. So this time, she would not stay behind. Not when you needed her.

Oh, there went another one, looking about thirty degrees west of her, facing the wrong way. Smirking, Amélie fired: one shot, one kill. The others had gone quiet, probably hiding behind cover, trying to ascertain where she was shooting from. She reloaded then, scanning the landscape for movement.
Yes, Gérard might be in danger at home, but he had Ziv, McCree, and Genji at his side. These were all people that were used to working together and with you. But out here on Operation Checquy, where the stakes were as high as they'd ever been, you needed someone you could trust at your back, to make up for the fact McCree, Genji, and Ziv were not here to help you.

Amélie genuinely liked Feng. She considered Hanzo Shimada unlikely to betray you. But Agent Lao was another problem: you trusted her too much and not enough, a natural consequence of the fracture in your relationship. This team could be very effective; it had a lot of potential. Everyone on it was professional and skilled. But Amélie was your friend and had no split loyalties. And while you were used to running operations, this group had questionable cohesion. Amélie thought you could have been a little firmer with them. It wouldn't have hurt to give a speech early on. But she understood that you had complicated personal relationships with everyone here and being uncharacteristically forceful with one's friends could be awkward. It would have been a gamble.

The important thing was that even if your leadership style was rough, your team was following your orders, and you were making sound decisions. Later, after this was all over, the two of you could drink cocktails and speak candidly about how the mission played out. She hadn't missed those suspicious looks you'd been giving her and Agent Lao. She knew you had questions, and perhaps she had overstepped, just a little. But it was best to address potential problems early on, and Agent Lao needed to know that whatever her feelings about you, this mission was more important. And on a related note, you were having a rough week, and you were one of Amélie's dearest friends. So if Agent Lao felt the need to upset you, that in turn would upset Amélie, and unlike you, Amélie had no intention of holding back.

Ah, there was another one, peeking out from behind a ship. She let him. He glanced in her direction, and then to the side, scanning the distance. Her camouflage was good, she was a lot closer than they suspected. She let him poke his head out a few more times, gaining confidence in his safety, before she finally ended him.

If Gérard were awake, he would have gently poked fun at her indefatigable desire to do something useful. He would tease that she was spending too much time with you, that you were a bad influence, teaching her to be so impatient. After all, she should be waiting for them to regroup. Or she could at least locate them all again before giving them more hints to her position. She should not have continued picking them off and causing them to scatter. She was still missing two. Merde. Though, Amélie had to admit, that was her own competitive nature spurring her on. You were actually a lot more cautious when it came to sniping, and perhaps other things. But tactics aside, Gérard would not be disappointed that she came to help you and Jack. That was not the kind of man she married.

The snow crunched lightly below her. Amélie rolled instinctively, tumbling off the low ledge. Fire bit into her leg as a gunshot echoed. She landed on her side, the snow cushioning her fall. She hissed angrily as a man in a reflective visor leveled his combat rifle in her face.

"Drop it," he snarled.

Amélie slowly put down her sniper rifle. She made a little soft whimpering sound, reminiscent of the bedroom. Turn his mind from slaughter. Once he was distracted, she would make her move. Blood oozed steadily from her wound, steaming in the icy air.

The man hesitated. "Another woman," he said into his comm unit. "It really is the Bitch Squad," he spat. "She got Martin, Oliveira, and Tarvydas. Ionescu has gone radio silent. You want her for questioning?" He nodded at whatever the other person was saying. "All right."
And then he crumpled, his skull caving under Agent Lao's metal fist. The hacker squeaked as he fell leaking brains and blood all over the snow. She stared incredulously at her gory prosthetic before glancing over at Amélie, eyes wild. "Are you OK?"

Amélie eyed her bleeding leg. "I was careless," she said, shaking her head. "There is still one-"

"I got him," Lao said, words spilling out too fast. "Sorry it took me so long. I had to rewire the door panel to get into Prince's transport." She knelt over Amélie, pulling a medpack from her gear and slapping it over the wound. Heat rushed through her right leg, and the bleeding gradually slowed.

"Thank you for the assistance," Amélie said, because while she was proud, she was also civilized. "I am sorry that I needed it."

"It's what teammates do," Lao said. "I was a soldier before I was Bái Shé. I haven't forgotten everything." There was a defensive note in her voice.

"I can see that," Amélie said, smiling wryly. "But your competence never worried me."

"It should have," Lao said sharply. "I haven't been in the field for months."

"Some things you cannot forget," Amélie said, she met Lao's stare and held it. "I was more concerned about how you would affect the team dynamic." From your stories, she knew that your old squad coddled Lao, and Amélie had made it very clear that it wouldn't be like that on this mission. That had been...unnecessary.

"I know I have history with some of the other agents," Lao said, tone a little sulky. "I get it. I won't let it stop me from doing my job."

"I know." It was time to swallow grass snakes, as the saying went. "And I am prone to grand impulsive acts and interfering without invitation. While I have had good results, perhaps the penchant for such behavior is a sign of narcissism."

Lao blinked. "No, I appreciate the breathing advice. It's...been awhile."

"We both know that's not what I'm talking about," Amélie said with a laugh. "It's all right, I know that I can be...overwhelming. Even when I am civil."

Lao squirmed. "The stuff with Shi- Hawkeye wasn't personal." She exhaled. "I get it. I knew someone would say something, and while I'm not thrilled about it, you weren't cruel. And I'm glad you were looking out for Agent Reckless Pants. She deserves good friends." Lao stared at the ground, clearly uncomfortable talking about her complicated relationship with you.

Amélie chuckled. "Yes, well, I suppose I cannot cast aspersions about her recklessness right now. I don't really have a leg to stand on." She shook her head with mock sorrow, glancing down at her wound.

Lao blinked. "Did you just-"

"Yes, and no one will ever believe you," Amélie laughed, satisfied by the understanding between them.

Lao snorted and offered Amélie her metal hand. Amélie accepted and stood. She gingerly flexed her right knee. She couldn't put any weight on the leg just yet, but the bleeding had already stopped.
"Hey, guys..." Feng's voice came faintly over the comms. "I hate to ask, but I could use some help. Please brings snacks-"

"Feng!" Zheng's voice echoed over the comms, real alarm shocking Amélie out of her reverie.

Rapid gunfire cut through the voices. Metal crashed - a hard impact- and then the connection fizzled out.

Things were not progressing as quickly or as smoothly as Chang would have liked. The assault main force was a still-smoldering heap in the wreckage of the front yard. But there were still stragglers in the eastern fields, trying to regroup with the better situated team in the west - the one that had taken its time moving through the forest.

They weren't quite flanked - their situation was stable- but she needed to clear the way so Maracle and Onwuachimba could exit safely and rescue Jane's family. There were only about a dozen left, most sticking to the safety of the forest. She could easily take care of the ones on the eastern side. Almasi's drones showed three of them hiding behind the barn. They were like gnats, buzzing just beside her ear, a slow burn of aggravation and festering irritation. It was time to do something about that.

"Taking the field," she said.

"Copy that. I need you to watch for reinforcements on this screen, and you monitor this one," Almasi said, clearly speaking to someone else.

"Got it!" Maggie shouted.

"Understood," Michael said.

Chang smiled wryly. Keeping the younger Morrisons out of trouble was another task she had to juggle. Thankfully, Almasi stepped in. Sure, he could watch those screens, and another three while neatly suturing a wound, but the kids didn't need to know that.

Rayner holstered her pistol, and grabbed her combat shotgun from the rack. She did her best work up close.

"They don't have eyes on us yet, too busy arguing over what they should do," Almasi said to her. "You're clear."

Nodding at Maracle, she walked between barrier plates, slowing slightly as she passed through the protective field, and then she was moving through the grass, feet barely touching the ground.

It took her seconds to reach the far side of the barn, shotgun raised.

The men whirled, shouting in surprise. One of them even got a shot off, but Chang wasn't holding still.

One trigger pull, and the closest one didn't have a face any more. Second trigger pull, and another one went down. Chang closed the distance, blood and viscera splattering her boots. The third man scrambled backward, trying to draw his sidearm. She spun around, slamming the stock of her gun into his helmet, shattering the visor, and he crumpled.

Best to get one for questioning now, because sometimes Fitzpatrick and Onwuachimba got a little too enthusiastic.

"That's all of them, Sarge," Almasi said, sounding pleased as she looked around. There was some cosmetic damage to the barn, but she could hear the goats bleating unhappily within. That was good. John would be upset if something happened to his animals. Gun over one arm, Chang bent over and picked up the unconscious man.

"Holy shit! I didn't even see her move- Michael, did you see that? Did you-" Maggie's "whisper" echoed in the background. "Michael, what are you looking at- Fitzy!" Maggie's voice went high and panicked.

Chang stiffened instantly, recognizing the fear, worsened by Almasi trailing off into Arabic, muttering something about shoes and sisters. Chang wasn't entirely sure, she didn't have an ear for languages, but she recognized the rare vulgarity for what it was.

She dropped her captive, taking a moment to slap on the magnetic cuffs she'd brought along, and then left him facedown in the grass.

She hadn't even reached the house, but she could see what was going on all too clearly. Onwuachimba was already scaling the roof, rifle slung over her shoulder. Maracle had switched out his railgun for a more precise weapon. And Fitzpatrick was laying in the grass, clutching his leg, two men with guns standing over him.

"Get away from him!" Maggie snarled, breaking past Maracle.

"Mags, no! Stay bac-" One of the men kicked Fitzpatrick in the head, the other laughing as he beckoned her over, probably promising to spare the demolitionist if she surrendered. There were more of them, creeping out of the woods.

Once they had Maggie, Fitzpatrick was dead.

"We won't hurt you or him, if you cooperat-

Chang broke into a full run, her focus narrowing to her targets. Two up close, too many in the background. She knew Onwuachimba, Almasi, and Maracle would provide cover fire. Hopefully, Michael had the sense to stay out of the way, but Chang wasn't counting on it.

Maggie ran at the men, holding something that wasn't a gun.

Chang's brain momentarily froze as Maggie delivered a swift kick to the nearest man's groin, her steel-toed boots connecting with tissue, not armoring. The man shrieked, and crumpled, even as the other soldier reached for the teenager.

"I've got a fucking grenade and I'll blow us all up!" She snapped.

...Chang had been so very wrong. That one was just as bad as her idiot older brother. Michael was the sensible one, which probably explained why he was so grumpy for most of the time she'd known him. Goddamnit.

"Maggie-!" Michael shouted, but Maracle had him by the arm. Not her problem right now.
"You can't help your sister if they get you too, get a gun a cover the Sarge-" Almasi snapped.

Chang breezed by them.

Maggie stepped backward, even as the remaining man pointed his gun at Fitzpatrick.

The man on the ground was sitting up. And several more were coming out of the woods.

Chang blindsided him, rushing in at an angle, slightly out of his periphery. She struck hard, knocking him off his feet. He flew sideways, and Chang raised her shotgun, blowing his chest apart before he touched the ground. She whirled, finishing the other one.

"Move!" She snarled, as Maggie stared dumbly at her, like she'd appeared out of thin air. But then she recovered, moving to Fitzpatrick's side.

"Fitzy-"

"Please don't call me that," Fitzpatrick groaned, as Maggie helped him up, one arm over her shoulder.

"Shut up and move, Fitzy," Chang growled, real anger thrumming in each word.

The demolitionist cringed. "We're both dead, Mags," Fitzpatrick mumbled, hobbling alongside Maggie. "Sarge is going to save us and then murder us herself-"

"And you'll deserve it!" Almasi snapped, suddenly beside them. "More cover fire!"

Shots rang out behind them, the soldiers and omnis that had been lying in wait, were now charging them. And there were almost twice as many as there'd been ten minutes ago.

A grenade soared past Chang's ear and at the oncoming men. Chang took a step backward, glad that Maggie at least had the sense to use the weapon. And if they were really lucky, she'd activated it first.

There was a slight pause, everyone on the field holding their breath, before the armament landed in the dirt, and sat there for thirty seconds, doing absolutely nothing.

Groaning, Chang began shooting, ignoring the jeers of the men that stepped over it and -

There was an eruption of meat and dirt, blowing a two meter wide crater in the grass.

Fitzpatrick laughed, through his pain, and still too close to the fighting. "I repackaged a proximity mine. It was Maggie's idea," he mumbled, sounding very proud.

Almasi was now growling things about...blindness? Chang's Arabic was barely functional and she shook her head. Maggie was just like her stupid kidnapped brother. The Morrison luck went hand in hand with the Morrison stupidity. They wouldn't have survived to procreate otherwise.

And then the enemy was on them. Chang didn't have time to reload. She jammed her shotgun into her belt, drew her pistol and continued shooting. When she looked back, that other Morrison Idiot Boy Child was outside the shield barrier, covering his sister while she dragged Fitzpatrick toward the farmhouse.

Goddamn Morrisons. They'd be the death of her.
Almasi held one side with his rifle, and she held the other, keeping the soldiers at bay while they backed up, steps almost synchronized.

The retreat would have remained orderly, until the goddamned OR-14 took the field, dual cannons firing too fast for a normal human to track.

"Fall back!" She shouted to Almasi.

The man broke into a full run, knowing better than to question her orders. She glanced over her shoulder. Michael had dropped his gun and was trying to help Maggie pull Fitzpatrick to his feet. They were covered in dirt and debris - the goddamn omnic had targeted the kids.

Chang instinctively moved into the trajectory, standing between them and the enemy.

Her pistol wouldn't do shit against the omnic, and Lilith was behind the barrier. Holstering the pistol, she reloaded the shotgun, noting that the omnic was moving slowly. Unfortunately, the rest of the attack force was still coming. The nearest four men were circling around, trying to flank them.

Chang whirled, already sweating in her armor. She was going too hard too quickly. But now wasn't the time for caution. She had a job to do. She spun to the side, hitting the first man's blind spot, and firing. She didn't wait for him to fall, she just moved to the next target. She let them surround her, attracting their attention because she was the biggest threat. She punched a man while shooting at another. She kept them going in circles, herself the hub at the center of motion. They couldn't return fire without risking hitting one of their own.

Killing them off one by one would negate that strategy. She wore them down, dodging between them. It was a juggling act, to keep them all off balance, but once they started to wobble, she could finish them off in quick succession. She clubbed one man over the head, spinning with her gun to shoot the second man in the throat. She turned forty five degrees and shot the third one, then she spun back around and snapped the first man's neck. The last one had turned to go after the kids. Chang tore after him. Panting, she gritted her teeth as she kicked the him to his knees, and fired into the back of his skull.

But in that time, more had come, and they were giving her wide berth. Instead, they were focusing on the principals. Michael was on the ground now, bleeding from his thigh. Maggie was vainly trying to pull both him and Fitzpatrick to safety. But more soldiers already on them.

"Get rid of that OR-14!" She shouted into the comms, already rushing toward her downed principal.

"-only need one of you alive, and honestly, you'll just slow us down," the man said, pointing his gun at Michael's face. Another had his gun trained on Maggie, and Fitzpatrick seemed to be bleeding from both knees now, goddamnit-

The boy glared at him, pale and sullen, and looking more like Jack than she'd ever realized. It was a slap in the face.

There was no hesitation.

Chang charged the men. The one threatening Michael never saw what hit him. The one on Maggie had time to raise his gun. Chang wasn't sure whom his target was, and it didn't matter. She stepped in front him, even as the gun went off, the impact snapping her head back as the bullet tore into her face, shattering tooth and bone.
Pain radiated in her skull, and then Sergeant Rayner Chang fell in the dirt, Fitzpatrick and the kids screaming her name.

_Goddamn Morrisons_, she thought, the world melting into a darkening shade of red. _They never knew when to run away._

Chapter End Notes

There have been some super cool submissions on the discord. Come see!

Being an adult is just wading through a bullet hell of expectations, obligations, and responsibilities. I keep humming the Mario Star theme to myself, like I can power through it. XD There's some family shit right now, so I'm especially frustrated and behind on writing. Work is...stressful right now. I'm trying for better work-life balance, but it's not happening. I'm not running or writing as much as I should be. Though we visited my nephew last weekend and after biting him back (he bit me like three times, OK?), we settled down played monsters, read books, and avoided the adult political discussions. Reading the Dinosaur Who Pooped a Planet beats sitting through "school shooter" conversations any day.
They'd made short work of the men in the stairwell, network operatives who'd assumed they were just going to gun down support personnel and unconscious agents. Genji was still piling the bodies against the rooftop access door as a makeshift barricade. If Angela saw the corpse wall, she might complain about how unsanitary it was, but Jesse was going to give all the credit to Genji. Smirking, he headed back downstairs, knowing better than to assume the attack was over. He'd just made it to the waiting room when the perimeter alarms went off.

"Incoming!" Athena shouted, and Jesse swore as something struck the kinetic barriers and exploded, the light show almost painfully bright through the windows. Without hesitation, Jesse rushed to the northeastern entrance to assess the damage. For a second, he thought of you. Only idiots and combat agents ran toward the explosions. He could practically hear you muttering that in his ear. Because if you were here, you'd be running right beside him.

The shields hummed loudly as another mortar whistled through the air and fell short. It hit the ground a few yards away, spraying dirt, concrete, and rocks at the building.

Smoke and debris obscured much of the view.

"Damage is cosmetic, except for one camera on the southern corner," Athena said.

"Thanks, darling," Jesse said. The medical center was on the eastern side of the Overwatch complex, closest to the training fields and the lake. It was likely that more attackers would be coming from the cover of the east side, especially since someone up top had muddied the waters just enough to block backup.

"We can't take too many hits like that," Winston sounded grim over the comms.

"All right, Diallo, take over shield generator maintenance. Winston, I'm going to need you on the frontlines."

"On my way," Diallo said.

"Understood," Winston said, and Jesse could hear the clank of Winston donning his custom armor.

"They're coming from the east, probably from the woods," Jesse said. He'd actually been expecting that attack first. "We've got White Rabbit on the southeastern side. We'll need to cover the northeastern quadrant." It was unlikely, but not impossible that someone would try to break through the Overwatch campus on the western side. But that would be in plain sight. Still, if they were brazen enough to attack HQ, maybe they wouldn't care. Athena's cameras were keeping watch on the western front.

"This would be the perfect time to go after their true targets," Genji said, over his shoulder.

Jesse did not jump this time, having fully expected an ambush or another of Genji's surprise appearances. His heart rate did briefly skyrocket. "Yeah, probably."

"I've issued the warning. Our guards are on higher alert, but holding their positions," Genji continued.

"Guess we gotta hope that their combined meanness is enough to handle any threat," Jesse said wryly.

"Isha and Bandit are there. Our agents are not completely unsupervised," Genji said with a straight face.

Jesse chuckled. Genji was such a shit. It was almost comforting to see that after everything they'd been through, that particular trait was a constant. The two of them checked their gear, Jesse reloading his revolver and Genji adjusting his armor while they walked toward the doors. White Rabbit was still holding the building perimeter.

"Bayan is setting up triage stations," Angela said, as she caught up, on his other side. He did a double take. Angela was out of her scrubs and in medic fatigues, her nanotech staff on her back, her gun in its holster. She had just completed a complex operation on the commander a few hours ago, and now here she was, prepping to march into battle with them. Sure, there were bags under her eyes, and several strands of hair had frizzed free of her ponytail, but she stood up straight, her smile tight. She was running on coffee, protective instinct, and not a little spite.

"You'll want to stay close to Winston," Jesse said, because while Winston was strong and brilliant, he wasn't as used to these kinds of field operations. "He'll need all the support you can give." And because Winston's heavy shielding and cautious nature meant he would prioritize the doctor's safety.

Genji nodded in agreement.

"Verstanden," she said. "But you two need to stay close as well: I'll be watching over you."

"Appreciate it," Jesse said, reaching up to tip his hat at her, only to remember that it was gone. He scratched his head instead.

"But don't worry, I have no problem going on the offense as well. They want to assault my medical center?" Angela's voice went higher, her teeth gritted. "They want to harm my patients?" She glared out at the training fields. "And they think I will simply stand by and watch?"

"They think we'll be easy prey," Genji chuckled, eyes bright.

Angela fumed silently, and Jesse didn't miss how often Genji kept looking at her, genuinely amused by her fury.

"If they think this is going to be easy, then they have another thing coming," Jesse said, nodding at Winston who joined them. There was a visceral awe in his gut as Winton walked with... them, a reminder that humans weren't nearly as big and bad as they like to pretend. The gorilla wore full heavy armor, carrying a large cannon under his arm.

"The perimeter alarms in the eastern training fields have gone offline. I fear the implications are not good." Winston shook his head, that fretful expression belonging more on a college professor than a soldier.

"I think we're long past implications," Jesse said, shaking his head and tapping his comm unit. "Patime, we're probably going to have company real soon. Doubt they'll just sit there all day and lob projectiles at us."

"They could," Genji said, helpfully.

"Athena and I...may have upgraded the backup generators," Winston said, sounding cagey. "If they choose to do to keep their distance, we might actually be able to take a sandwich break."

"Company?" Patime chirped. "They are finally coming closer? Good," Patime said cheerfully. "Yes, there they are! You know, they are wearing blue uniforms, like they belong here. You'll have to let us know if you want any of them left alive."

"What?" Jesse blinked as an Athena drone brought up a split screen camera feed, showing several dozen armored Talon shocktroops wearing blue uniforms over their gear, those red-eyed helmets glowing. From a distance, it would look like Overwatch was just conducting a training exercise.

"Friends of yours?" Patime asked.

"No," Jesse said, narrowing his eyes.

"OK!" And with that, something bright blasted out of a window on the southeastern side, shaking the building.

Jesse blinked as Athena's screen showed a plasma shell landing in the midst of an enemy squad. It erupted outward, the bright ionized gas briefly holding a doughnut shape, before bolts of energy jumped from mercenary to mercenary, leaving charred and smoking bodies trapped in the cage of their armor.

"Plasma splash bombs and cluster munitions are illegal," Winston said, flinching. "And is it attached to magnetic induction amplifier with a radial governor as a makeshift stellarator? That is...devious."

"Yes!" Mika shouted over the comms. "Yes! Someone else gets it!"

Patime chuckled. "It might be very devious, if we knew what all that science meant or where such a weapon came from. We are just simple soldiers, also engaging in a training exercise," she said innocently, and Jesse could just picture her nodding sagely, a twinkle in her eye.

"Ooooh. Yes, simple. That's us, simple," Mika said slowly. "Hey, does anyone else smell bacon?"

Jesse snorted, giving their resident genius an "explain that in plain English please," look.

Winston cleared his throat. "The bomb generates a sustained electric current that travels indiscriminately from person to person before grounding. In this case, the metal-encased human or omnic is the ideal conductor. The bomb current fluctuates, but there's a built-in step-up transformer that increases the power. It should be very effective against large groups, but is an unpredictable weapon."

Jesse glanced at Winston's Tesla cannon. Maybe after everything was done, they could explain away the electrocutions with that. No need to advertise their use of "illegal" munitions. Ana probably wouldn't appreciate that kind of scrutiny.

"...It's different!" Winston said indignantly, meeting Jesse's gaze. "Those splash bombs are far more dangerous!"

"More dangerous than a two hundred kilogram super genius with a Tesla cannon?" Mika retorted, on the comm channel.

"I am not two hundred kilograms!" Winston thundered.

Jesse flinched, as did everyone in a five meter radius.

Winston looked around sheepishly. "I umm...Stress stimulates the appetite, and I'm a little sensitive about that right now. My apologies."

"Sorry, I uh...was calculating the weight of your armor in there too," Mika offered.

"Ah," Winston nodded. "Yes, that is perfectly reasonable. I apologize for my overreaction."

"You're just getting warmed up for the bad guys," Jesse said, patting his arm and relieved that Winston had some killer instinct hidden underneath the intellectual patter and fuzzy exterior.

"I...suppose so."

"Oh, here they come again! And my just hand slipped again," Patime said, as another plasma bomb shot onto the field. "Anyone with delicate tech may want to avoid this side of the building," she added helpfully. "Bolts have the two meter contagion field."

More soldiers emerged from the woods, wearing Overwatch blue. There were multiple squads, and how did they manage to get the clearances to just land in Zurich? Jesse saw flashes of DC all over again, and he didn't like it one bit.

Winston bristled, grinding his teeth as he glowered at them. "They disgrace the uniform."

Jesse gave him a sidelong glance. Winston wasn't actually in uniform, but honestly, it suddenly seemed wiser not to antagonize the not-two-hundred-kilogram gorilla.

"They're throwing bombs at my medical center," Angela said, drawing her handfun. "Do you know how many sleepless nights I spent writing grant proposals and funding requests? Do you have any idea how much some of this equipment costs? And let's not even start on the danger posed to my patients. I realize I fix people up, just so they can go back out, do something stupid, undo all my hard work, and start the cycle all over again. But I don't want anyone to expedite the process." There was a dreamy, almost dissociative quality to her voice. "Ich werde sie töten müssen."

"You ready, Handsome Genji?" Jesse murmured out of the corner of his mouth.

Genji snorted. "Sure thing, Stripper Cowboy."
Jesse coughed. "What?"

"Oh, I thought we were using our White Rabbit nicknames," Genji said, and charged on to the field.

Sputtering, Jesse followed. "I'm not-"

"You are," Genji said cheerfully, not looking back.

You left Jemison there with Prince's gun, and didn't think too hard about the ethics of what you'd done. You had more important things to focus on. There was an empty holding cell, and an interrogation chamber. It was easier to think of that drone as "Jarvis." It made no conversation with you. Athena would have tried to comfort you, would have asked you questions about Jemison and maybe Shoal. Jarvis just opened doors and gave you reports. It was oddly hollow, but maybe it was best that Athena wasn't here to ask you questions.

There wasn't much in the restricted area, besides holding cells, a server room, and a some extra living quarters - possibly barracks, but most likely, Petras' private quarters. Jarvis opened the next reinforced door.

The room was too brightly lit and stunk of bleach and blood. Gun raised, you stepped inside, taking in the drains, mirrored glass, and the tools of the trade that you knew a little too well. There was a lot of suffering and bad history in a place like this. Just breathing the air filled your bones with lead. In the center of it was an adjustable metal table, with customized restraints and blood grooves. And on that table, face bloody and hands cuffed above his head, was Jack.

You froze as he lifted his head, those feral blue eyes meeting yours, his face contorted in rage. It was an alien expression, almost more disconcerting than finding him here in this torture chamber.

But still, you drank in the sight of him. His coat and boots were gone. He didn't have a shirt either, and his chest was covered in cuts and bruises. He had a rapidly fading black eye, and he was bleeding from numerous locations, mostly his nose, mouth, and wrists. He was hurt, but he was alive.

Somewhere, underneath all the adrenaline and panic, you let yourself breathe, some of the tension leeching out of your spine. "You know, if you wanted some kinky bondage roleplay, you probably could have just asked us instead of turning it into a scavenger hunt," your mouth said, obviously not attached to your brain. Hysteria edged your laugh. With your relief, feelings bubbled up, and that was never a dignified experience.

Jack blinked rapidly, rage shifting to confusion, then disbelief. "Lucky?" He rasped, sounding like he had lost his voice. "Sweetheart, how did you-"

"We have to hurry," you said rushing to Jack's side, your brain finally kicking back into action and reconnecting to your mouth. "Jarvis, I need to you release restraints, keep me apprised on hostile combatants, and mine whatever data you can. Priorities are in that order."

The drone dutifully floated over to a console. There was a click, and Jack slowly sat up, rubbing his bloody wrists. His eyes stayed on you, the warmth in his expression clearer than any words. He wasn't just grateful for the rescue. He was genuinely happy to see you.
You forgot to breathe again: you always did when he looked at you like that.

You glanced at his wrists, heart rattling against your ribcage. "Guess you're probably not going to want us tie you up any more, huh?" After a rescue like this, Gabriel would have had something cool and edgy prepared, his delivery perfectly timed. Jack would have said something heroic, inspiring, and maybe a little sentimental. Your choice in words was terribly inappropriate, but was more normal than you saying something inappropriate?

Jack's laugh was part relief, part disbelief. "Smartass."

"I know." You embraced him then, shaking as he leaned against you, forehead on your shoulder. You were careful, trying not to jostle him. But he clung to you, the feel of him the most comfort you'd had in days. You trembled, willing yourself to stay upright and in control. If you let out the mess of feelings simmering inside you right now, you might not be able to push them all back inside. So you squeezed him tightly and then let go. Once more, you intimately understood Jack's need for rigid compartmentalization in the field.

"Sorry," he murmured, lifting his head. "I just...I know you said to hurry. Prince and Petras are still out there-"

"Prince is...dealt with," you said. "Jemison's keeping an eye on him. She's in rough shape, but he's worse off."

Jack shuddered, his fingers digging into your arms. "That son of a bitch-" He shook his head, grinding his teeth. You expected him to vent his rage, but instead he shifted gears - always the chameleon. "How bad is Gabe?" He asked, looking up, fear tightening his grip on you.

You blinked, uncertain how he already knew about that. Oh, they must have taunted him with the idea that no one was coming... "He was stable when I left," you said. "We expected they'd attack, so Captain Amari left Jesse in charge. He and Genji fortified the infirmary. On Sing is providing support."

Relief relaxed his features. Then he stiffened again. "Gérard?"

"Out of commission, but his wounds weren't life-threatening."

Jack nodded slowly, pulling himself to his feet. He wobbled slightly. "We were dosed with a nerve agent and a sedative. I've got a concussion as well. Sorry. Don't mean to be so slow."

He leaned against you. "I was so worried, sweetheart. They told me Gabe was dying. And if Gabe was down, what happened to you? Couldn't ask, but..." He looked down at you, blue eyes brimming with emotion. Fingers trembling, he squeezed your hands, like he still couldn't believe you were here.

"I love you, too," you said, gently rubbing his wrists.

"Agent Fury-" Jarvis began.

You wore your decibel blockers, so that when the gunfire came from behind, the sound wasn't deafening. But the impact knocked you forward, into Jack's arms, your back briefly numbed, before pain began to spread. Then a second impact knocked the air out of you.

"Lucky!" The horror in Jack's voice would have stopped you in your tracks, if you weren't already stunned by the shots. The fear curdled your stomach. Gasping, you tried to reach your gun, but Jack was already moving, putting himself between you and the shooter.
"You're hung up on that frigid slut? Seriously, Morrison? After years of thinking you were some kind of monkish freak, you were fucking that slag all along?" Petras gave an incredulous laugh, loud and bombastic. "For Christ's sake, you passed over my niece for this piece of trash? Are you blind?"

You were wedged between Jack and the table. You shuddered: breathing hurt, but you could still move your arms and legs. That meant your spine was intact. You couldn't be sure, but it didn't feel like you were bleeding. That sounded like a shotgun blast, and there was a good chance your armor had stopped the spray of bearings.

Petras had come through another doorway. Fuck, you'd been too caught up in your reunion to do a proper check or barricade the door. Fucking rookie mistake. You knew much better. Wheezing, you turned slightly to the side, watching in the very edges of your periphery as Petras paced in front of Jack.

"I bet you thought you were so smart!" Petras snarled. "Laughing as you sent your whore to try to pump me for information! I wouldn't have given that bitch a second look, except for the fact she was working for Reyes. You conniving slut," he spat. "Selling yourself to Reyes, me, and anyone you thought would be useful." Venom oozed from his words. "Bet you thought you were something special when you tried to turn me down. If Ainsley hadn't been there that day, why, I would have showed you." He gave an ugly laugh. "Doesn't matter though. Showed you now. You thought you were so clever, you arrogant bitch. Trash liked you doesn't get to say "no" to someone like me."

You knew Jack was blocking his line of sight. You were too far away to use your blades. Your carbine rested at an odd angle, wedged between the table and Jack's knees, but you had not released it. You wiggled your arm, freeing it carefully, so Petras wouldn't notice the motion.

"Don't worry, killing this bitch was always on the agenda. But I did some research," he said sounding disgustingly smug. "It's not just you that's going to pay for your actions, Strike. That would be too easy. I just want you to know that everything that's going to happen? It's your fault. You brought this on their heads. Like that cowboy you're always hanging around - probably because you're fucking him on the side- well if he doesn't die today, we're revoking his amnesty and sending him back to the Americans. But don't worry, he won't stay in custody long. He'll "try to escape." You could hear the quotation marks in his voice - "and they'll gun him down like the criminal trash he is."

You took a shallow breath, knowing that no matter what happened to you, Jesse wouldn't let himself get caught that easily. He had friends and allies who wouldn't let that happen.

"And that pretty little Frenchy girl you like so much? That irritating spy's little wife? Now that's a real woman, Morrison. I get why Nguyen was so hung up on her. And we all have a grudge against her stuck up husband. Me and some of the boys plan on showing her what prime American men can do for her. I bet that ballerina can sing." He laughed, and for a moment, all you could think of was cutting parts off him till he begged.

But you swallowed a snarl, knowing that Amélie could take care of herself. That Petras was a stupid pig who thought his position would protect him. It was only disgusting bluster, even if it made your skin crawl.

"Also that Jew-boy hacker you are hell-bent on protecting? The one with the stupid name and the attitude? I've got special plans for him. There are a lot of people who want him bad. And he won't die easy-"
You had always said that you were going to take Petras alive. That you wanted him to pay for his crimes. That you were going to drag him through the mud, but be the better person about it. All those ideas went out the window in that instant. Fuck being the better person. None of those lofty ideas mattered. Not now. Not after those threats to the people you loved. Not after what had happened in the last twenty four hours. Carbine in hand, you whirled, your muscles stiff, but obedient. You extended your arms around Jack's side.

Petras held a shotgun on Jack, his eyes widening at your sudden revitalization.

You didn't speak, you just fired into center mass. He dropped his weapon, gawping at you like a fish. Grunting, Petras staggered backward, but did not fall over. He was probably wearing a vest. Still, he wasn't used to being hurt. Didn't have the reflexes to hold onto his gun. He was soft, and weak, and vile.

"Move," you said to Jack, and he stepped aside, an odd look on his face.

"How did you- No, you can't. Not someone like you. You can't touch m-" Those watery eyes widened in fear, spit flecking his chin. You looked him in the eyes, smiled, and emptied your gun into his head.

Petras crumpled, brains and bone fragments spraying the floor. It wasn't pretty, it wasn't humane, but you kept shooting till the gun clicked empty. You stared at the mess, the picture not quite making sense. Petras didn't look like Petras any more, he obviously wasn't a direct threat. But the fear and anger still churned under your skin, amplified by the pain in your back. You slowly lowered your gun.

Jack rested a hand on your shoulder, his touch reassuring. He didn't say anything, and the hum of the lights set your teeth on edge. You didn't want to stand here like this, locked in time, staring at the gory remains of that human garbage.

"You hit at all?" You asked.

"Don't think so," Jack said.

"How bad is my back?" You asked, not actually worried because you were obviously still functional.

"It looks like your armor stopped most of it. But the structural integrity is shot-no more getting shot today," he said, moving closer. "Nearly gave me a heart attack," he said softly in your ear. "...Fucking hell, sweetheart." He hugged you from behind, pressing worried kisses to your temples. He paused, and you didn't need to see his face to know he was taking in the splattered remains of Director William "I Had It Coming" Petras. "Well," he sighed, relief in his voice. "I think you got him."

You gave a croaking laugh, and your entire body hurt. You'd been shot in the back multiple times in the last twenty four hours. Your muscles ached - still not entirely healed from the last injury. Sure, the armor kept the bullets and buckshot from penetrating, but that impact hurt. Still, Jack's hands on your arms made you feel a little better. You leaned into him, letting yourself take a second to breathe. "I told you," you said, nodding with satisfaction. "I called dibs."

Feng, who had once been called Claire, who had once been almost normal, never pictured herself dying like this. And she'd spent an inordinate, almost neurotic amount of time considering her own demise. Still, she never really imagined herself as a "make a last stand" kind of girl. She had always expected it to be treachery, or worse, something absolutely ridiculous that would land her a footnote in the Darwin Awards: choked to death on a mashed potatoes, or maybe fell into a vat of maple syrup and caramelized, or even eaten alive by angry Mongolian Death Worms, which were really just giant mutant skinks.

But here she was, her own body burning out as she went hand to hand with ugly, clunky cyborgs, holding the line for the sake of friendship and blood oaths. Her shields were overheating too - some of the bastards were staying out of range just to shoot at her. Sweating as she burned calories like kindling, Feng lashed out, knocking back another cyborg, her claws tearing through his armor, muscle, and organs, shredding as she went. She could match them in strength and speed, but she was a glass cannon with limited endurance.

Half a dozen dead, or at least downed cyborgs littered the area. But that was not enough. There were still three coming at her, on top of the ones that were sniping from the halls.

The smoking remains of Zheng's drone lay at her feet. It had gotten between her and a plasma blade. Auntie was fine, probably. But the mostly metal man - Voss from the sounds of it - had been hiding the plasma weapon somewhere on his inorganic body. Feng shuddered, not wanting to think too hard about that. She knew way too much about the methods of concealing and smuggling contraband into prisons.

"Your so-called friends left you behind, but don't worry. Prince will kill them," Voss said, his voice a rusty, scraping sound.

Feng laughed, wondering briefly if Hettie would take over with Lee as a figurehead or if there would be another civil war. Then there was the problem of how Auntie would react-

Voss lunged with that glowing blade, and the distracting thoughts evaporated. Feng dodged, bumping into another cyborg. She drove her elbow back and upward into his head, smashing his nose and more. His face caved. Voss made another pass, and she twisted away, snarling as the blade glanced off her ribs and down one side, burning off a strip of flesh from her bellybutton halfway down her thigh.

"Motherfucker!" She howled, because it hurt. She staggered, her body still obeying her, though she could feel herself weakening. She'd gone too long, burned up too much. Even without Auntie's countdown, she knew she was out of time. Oh, she'd take out that oversized psychopathic can opener Voss, but after that? Feng knew she would not be able to finish off the rest.

In retrospect, the leeching upgrade would have been extremely useful, though still immoral and gross. Feng clutched her side, forcing herself to focus on the danger in front of her, and not "what might have been a life-saving, if disgusting choice." It was technically cannibalism, and Feng wasn't about that kind of thing.

"We're going to take you apart," Voss hissed. "And when you're dead, we're going to cut you up, you little freak, and see-"

"Oh come on! We both fall outside the norms of conventional appearance and you're calling me a "freak?" Really?" Feng snarled, waving her claws at Voss. "That's just rude and you of all people should know better! I've been polite enough not comment on your looks or engineering! Kindly return the favor."

He blinked at her, momentarily gobsmacked by her conversational choice. It was something she'd gotten used to. "It was this or death," he told her, voice low, almost hollow.
"There was no choice."

"Yeah, same deal," Feng said, the memory of that night weighing heavy on her neck. She remembered crawling into the darkened lab, that long trail of her own blood staining the floor. Auntie had been with her the whole way, talking her through it, reminding her to breathe, to put pressure on her wounds, telling her that she would survive this. Most importantly, Auntie was giving her concise instructions on just where to jab that incredibly large needle. And then the spine-curling pain and hunger as her body knitted itself back together, while she lay on the cold tiles, wondering if this was rebirth or just a slower death...

"What do you know?" Voss spat.

Feng knew she didn't want to die. Just like she knew there was a good chance she wouldn't get what she wanted. Still, she wasn't the kind of person who just gave up. She charged forward, knocking aside Voss's sword arm as she closed in, her bloody claws piercing his neck, wrapping around his spine, and yanking it out of its metal shell. More gunfire erupted, and Feng braced herself against Voss's lifeless body, using his armor as a shield. She could barely hold him up now, her limbs shaking. She was done.

Panting, Feng tried to pry the plasma sword out of Voss's metal hands, but there was no give. His death grip was too strong to break. The others were closing in. She staggered, no longer able to hold him up. His metal remains dropped to the ground with clang, the floor reverberating.

Looking around, she counted at least four more still standing. She touched her belt, feeling for a grenade. No sense in letting them reverse engineer her enhancements...

And then blue light burst through room, twin shapes weaving sinuously through the halls, their draconic eyes flashing, mouths agape as they tore through the nearest cyborgs.

"You have been judged."

Rubbing her eyes, Feng dropped onto her butt, knees too weak to hold her up. And even as she watched, the dragons faded into thin air. Tearing her eyes away from the spectacle, Feng tried to make sense of the scene in front of her. There were more bodies on the ground, arrows protruding from their eyes. And in front of her, Hanzo thrust a tanto straight up into a cyborg's chin.

Blood stained his hands, and he stared at her, fear clear on his face.

She blinked, wondering if she really looked that scary.

"You're hurt," he said, dropping the man, as he withdrew the small blade and wiped it on the corpse's uniform.

"Yeah," Feng nodded. "A little."

He approached slowly, eyes darting all over, from her face, to her bloody and now normal hands, to her wounded side. He reached into his pockets and pulled out an energy bar. Carefully, he unwrapped it and offered it to her.

Feng didn't remember eating it, just that one second there was the faintest scent of chocolate and peanut butter, and then Hanzo grunted, because she'd bitten his finger, possibly drawing blood.

"Sorry!" She groaned. "I didn't mean-"
"Eat." Hanzo unwrapped another one and held it to her mouth.

"I can feed- Ohhh," Feng laughed softly. Because her hands were covered in blood and worse things... But his weren't exactly clean either. Still, he was only touching the wrapper. Feng was more careful this time, actually tasting the sweet chewy carbs. Oh yes, that was good. She could actually feel her spirit settling back into her body. These were the right type of fuel: high calorie, high protein bars. "Thanks, these are my favorites. Well, for energy bars."

"I know," Hanzo said, looking somber.

Feng blinked. "Oh."

"I requisitioned them before we left Zurich." He unwrapped another one. "I know that your combat form burns a great deal of energy."

Feng accepted the next bar, chewing slowly as she regarded him. Their clans both had their proprietary secrets, but it wasn't a surprise that a Shimada was aware of her capabilities. He'd had the sense to bring her food when he rode to her rescue.

"You know, when I first asked to "see the dragon dance," that's actually what I meant. The spirit dragons."

Hanzo snorted. "Really? Because you were ogling my biceps."

"Not just your biceps," Feng said with wink. She expected him to roll his eyes, or at least avert them.

Hanzo just turned a fetching shade of pink, but got out another energy bar. He had to have been talking to Auntie. Or Bayan. "You need to rebuild your strength. Can you walk?"

Feng stood, shakily, without help. But she wobbled, and then Hanzo was there, hands on her arms, steadying her.

"I'll be slow. And speaking of slow, where is Lucky?"

"I left her to handle Prince. We found one of the hostages alive."

"You left her alone with Dickie McMurderborg?!" Feng shouted, horrified. She wasn't military, but she had an idea of how things were supposed to work. The mission came first, and you were supposed to make logical rational decisions, and not take unnecessary risks that could jeopardize said mission.

"She said had things under control."

"And you believed her?!"

"I believe that she can handle the situation," Hanzo said calmly. "When it comes to the things that matter, she is very trustworthy." He paused. "And I knew you would need back up."

Feng stared. "But the mission... I-OK. " Flustered, Feng shoved another energy bar into her mouth, unsure of what she could say. "Thanks. For coming back for me. And for packing snacks."

Hanzo regarded her gravely. "Whatever happens, you are my friend. I do not have many of those. You matter. Your happiness matters. Your likes and dislikes all matter. I am sorry if I have been dismissive or behaved as if I took such things for granted. I was truly overwhelmed when I realized that your gestures were made in good faith, and not because you expected a return. I had no idea how to respond. I am still uncertain. But I am trying."

"Oh," Feng said, a little dizzied by that confession. Sure, it wasn't the impassioned romantic declaration that someone would have expected from their potential fiancée after a harrowing rescue. But then, it was honest. Really honest. And the warmth in Hanzo's eyes surprised her, just a little. "OK. I'm good with it. Friendship is the important part. Anything else we can work out down the road."

Hanzo smiled, it was a small, almost shy gesture, his silky hair falling in his face, framing those sharp cheekbones and inky dark eyes.

Feng felt her heart wobble. Fuck, that boy was pretty. Goddamn him and his stupid sexy face. Unnnnnnnnnnnn. Groaning, Feng tried to stagger away, her head light, vision swimming. She almost toppled over, but Hanzo held on, not letting her fall.

"I can carry you," Hanzo said, not letting go of her, and Feng nearly died right there.

"Oh...I'll be fine in a second," she stammered. And then her brain kicked back into gear. She was injured and weakened. He was hot and offering his help. She'd be an idiot to turn him down. Or was that some kind of exploitation? God, she was too fucking drained to think about ethics. And she certainly wasn't faking...

"Feng, you don't have to do this alone. It's just the two of us - no subordinates to impress. There is no shame in accepting my help. It is my privilege." His eyes flashed and he held his chin at an arrogant angle, like her reluctance to accept his help was a direct insult. And actually, now that she thought about it, maybe it was? Heh, it seemed he still retained some of his Yakuza machismo.

"Oh...can I have piggyback ride then?" She asked.

Hanzo blinked slowly, like he hadn't expected that response. "Of course, whatever you want."

"And more food?"

He handed her another energy bar. "It's the last one till we get back to the ship."

"Oh...do you need it?" She asked, hesitating.

He pressed it into her hand, his fingers warm against hers, his smile soft. "No, I'll be fine. Thank you for thinking of me."

Grinning, Feng tore open the wrapper and promptly scarfed down the energy bar, Hanzo chuckling to himself in the twenty seconds it took for her to eat the whole thing. It was a good sign, she reflected, that her battlefield table manners didn't seem to bother him...

Chapter End Notes

Slightly shorter chapter because I'm still behind. It's been lots of overtime and tech problems at work. Weather has been causing wrist problems, as has a certain asshole dog who clawed the shit out of my hand because he's an asshole (he's lying on the bed giving me sad eyes right now, because I'm on the computer and not feeding him). I've been very very angry all week. XD (I got my first massage last weekend, it was short, but it was deep tissue and I'm pretty sure the masseuse released all the tension/fossilized rage that has built up in my shoulders.)

Thanks for the continued support, guys. You're awesome. I will respond to comments this weekend. It's been stupid busy and I'm trying to stay on top of things (and falling off on my face).
Chapter 130

Chapter Summary

"Neutral as Switzerland" used to mean something. Things back home really start to heat up.

Chapter Notes

I've surpassed one million words in drafts. I'm commissioning an Isha from an artist in celebration - I'm on the waitlist, but will share once I get it.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

It was a little strange at first, having a nano-boosting medic and a shielded heavy on their side. Jesse was used to working with Genji, you, and the boss. And that was all fine and good - you guys operated like a well-oiled machine, but Angela's adrenaline boosters and Winston's protective barriers meant he could worry less about his shields and endurance, and focus more attention on the simple pleasure of taking down the enemy.

Genji cut through the enemy ranks at blurring speeds, obviously enjoying destroying the enemy cyborgs in Overwatch uniforms. Jesse was pretty sure he'd heard the ninja chuckle to himself a few times.

"Too easy... Try to keep up, McCree!"

There it was! Just a little pleased laugh as he decapitated a cyborg. Genji was having fun, no matter what he liked to claim in the aftermath. And was he showing off? Just a little?

Jesse snorted, fired, keeping one eye on his target and the other on Winston and Angela. The heavy smell of ozone and burnt bacon wafted from the west, and he could hear Patime shouting orders in Mandarin, Cantonese, and Uighur over the comms.

They stayed near to their side of the infirmary, unwilling to be lured too far out. The enemy came in waves. It was only a squad or two at a time, but they were building a chain of shields and turrets, continually advancing to claim a few meters of territory at a time. And they were getting closer, the gap between their attacks shrinking.

With Winston and Angela working shields and support, he and Genji could keep this up for awhile, and that was good, because they might not have any other option. The deeper encroachment forced them back, closer to the infirmary. And while Jesse's instincts were to just go out there and finish the job quickly, he had civilians and his support units to mind. Even Genji stuck close, obviously, at least to him, keeping an eye on a certain doctor.

The enemy was gaining a foothold, now out thirty yards from the infirmary doors. Jesse stood beside Winston, watching as Angela patched up a graze on Genji's cheek, scolding him softly as she worked. She provided a decent amount of cover fire when she wasn't fixing their wounds, but after all this time she was slowing down. They all were. Operation Pelennor was the shit sequel to Operation Tarasque, with Checquy and Morpheus rounding out the series. It had been a hard couple of days. They were all exhausted.

"I am slowly being persuaded that perhaps those plasma splash bombs aren't such a bad thing," Winston said, breathing hard. His armor was covered in char marks.

"Patiem's people are out of mortars. It's all turrets and small arms fire now," Jesse said shaking his head. It was a shame, they could have used more artillery support.

Winston grunted.

"They'll try to rush us," Genji said, as they watched the opposition movements. "There's enough of them that they're gaining confidence." The attackers had bunkered down in the center of the field, just out of Genji and Winston's range. They were massing there, and while Jesse could pick them off, he wasn't cutting them down fast enough.

"Or Patime's squad," Jesse said. If they breached the infirmary... "How are you holding up?" Jesse touched the comm button.

"We good. Could use a break. And cheeky wink from Stripper Cowboy-" Laughter came over the comms, but it sounded strained.

"I'm not even wearing my hat-" Jesse muttered, cheeks heating up.

"Is taking that off part of the act too?" Angela asked, with a smirk.

"Buy me enough drinks after this," Jesse said. "And it'll all come off."

Angela snorted, clearly not taking any of it seriously.

Genji's expression was a little more difficult to read. "Apparently he intends to rightfully earn his name as "The Stripper Cowboy."

Angela squinted at them both, like she couldn't quite figure out how serious they were. "You know, I'm a doctor. I've treated you before, both of you. It is nothing I haven't seen."

Genji frowned.

Jesse just laughed.

But Winston squirmed, looking everywhere but at his teammates. How did he hang out with Mihret and not learn to deal with off-color jokes? Jesse scratched his head, suddenly wondering if the hacker really did know how to behave himself and was just terrible by choice, making sure to do it strategically, so everyone would have low expectations and let him get away with... Oh. The longer Jesse considered it, the more that idea made sense. Goddamn pain-in-the-ass boy genius-

"Oh! Athena has opened an encrypted channel for Agent Daniels," Winston said, clearing his throat, looking very relieved at the chance to change the subject.

Jesse raised a brow. "It's about time."

An Athena drone hovered beside them.

"Agent McCree, this is Agent Daniels. We're hearing explosions, but we've been told it's just a Blackwatch training exercise and to maintain infirmary quarantine protocol." Daniels' voice was soft and polite over the comms.

"Ain't no Blackwatch-sanctioned exercise," Jesse said, striding forward onto the green, the lake in view. "We're under attack." The Athena drone panned across the field, showing dead cyborgs, smoking craters, and clear evidence of live munitions: all the damage from a real firefight.

"Sorry, about the delay," Daniels said, sounding genuinely apologetic. "I had to consult with some friends."

Jesse's breath caught. "Is that so?"

"We've been told to stand down, and that we're overreacting," another voice chimed in, more masculine. "But I served in Colchester with Agent Shoal, Sixteenth Air Assault Brigade. And when she starts drinking, she can't stop talking." The man laughed, and Jesse recognized Park Joon's voice. "Epsilon Squad let it be known that if we're facing a split between the UN and Blackwatch, then we better help Blackwatch."

Jesse blinked. Bridget had said that?

"And then Bruce Riggs, of all people, Bruce Riggs has been quietly telling anyone who will listen that something is rotten in Geneva. I didn't realize that boy had a subversive bone in his body," an older woman's voice piped up. She sounded vaguely familiar and Jesse thought she worked in IT. "And while I'm not so sure that Blackwatch is on the up and up, Riggs has managed to get most of IT and engineering on your side. No surprise considering his mom's cookies. So we've got drones on site and having reviewed the footage...well, training exercise my ass."

Jesse stared blankly ahead for a moment. Those were some damn good cookies. And while Riggs might be The Blackwatch Virgin and slightly delusional, he was a good guy, and people knew that.

"Megat always said, you Blackwatch bastards might be psychopaths, but you're still more trustworthy than politicians," another voice said gruffly, though Jesse didn't recognize it. "Not that that's saying much."

"Thanks?" Jesse said, squinting.

"Something's wrong. We're getting a mishmash of conflicting orders and reassignments. First there was a Code Blue announced, and we were supposed to be deployed to a combat zone, and then the order was rescinded ten minutes before we were supposed to leave," Park said. "It looks like the right hand doesn't know whom the left is backstabbing."

"Amen," Jesse said.

"So we've been ordered to stay away, but Captain Larson and some of the other officers are protesting the reassignments and general tomfuckery. They've made a point to let us know that they are having a meeting in a locked down conference room with UN adjuncts, so they can't be reached and they certainly won't be upset if we reach out to you for directions," Park said. "And if the officers incommunicado and keeping some part of the UN bureaucratic machine busy, they couldn't tell their agents not to do something. It was a flimsy amount of deniability - Overwatch agents weren't as skilled at subterfuge and bureaucratic obfuscation. But then they were volunteering to disobey UN orders. Jesse wasn't going to complain."
"Mission parameters?" Another unknown voice asked.

"We have to keep the quarantine protocols on the infirmary. It's safer locked down," Jesse said. "But we'd be mighty grateful for some ranged support."

"Or maybe another training exercise?" Daniels said slyly. There was a spattering of laughter.

"We'll be there soon," Park said. "Apparently, our friendly Virtual Assistant Athena is working out some of the camera and security issues."

Overwatch agents weren't stupid. A virtual intelligence wouldn't just countermand orders and help dig up loopholes. Maybe they didn't realize exactly what Athena was, but they suspected... Or maybe they just understood that Jesse's orders came from someone important, like Ana.

"Agent McCree, I hear Távio's in there with you," Lowell's soft voice came over the comm. "Let him know that me and Jeong just got back and we're breaking into the armory without him."

"Don't get caught this time," Jesse said, feeling a smile tugging at his lips.

"No, sir!" Lowell said, and Jesse knew they were saluting, even if he couldn't see them.

"This time? Wait, what exactly are you teaching the cadets?" Daniels asked, sounding a little alarmed.

"Oh, that wasn't me," Jesse said chuckling, thrilled that he wouldn't be blamed for that incident. "That was all Agent Strike."

You checked the rest of the area: the other cells, the adjacent observation room Petras had ambushed you from, and the hallway. All were empty, except for Jemison's cell. Jack stayed very close to you, like he was afraid to let you out of his sight. You completely understood the feeling: your gaze kept sliding back to him as you steadily reassured yourself that he was here and alive.

Neither of you were subtle about it or even trying to hid your worry. It was a lot of effort to not take his hand and hold on tight while you were working. Deep breaths hurt, and you ground your teeth too hard. The tension amplified the pain, and the pain increased the tension. You caught a glimpse of yourself in the reflective glass, your expression taut and grim. Jack would grimace as he moved, also in rough shape. But when he saw you looking, he'd just give you a rueful smile, real warmth and real grief clear on his face. All of his pain and openness hurt to look at, especially since you couldn't do much to help him in the moment. That impotence gnawed at you. You could kill people, but you couldn't fix them. And while your skillset could help the ones you loved to point, it wasn't enough.

When you'd cleared the area, you went back to the observation room and began rifling through the lockers. Jarvis was still pilfering the databases, but would be done in another five minutes.

Jack grunted and there was an odd crunching sound. You turned around to see him carefully massaging his nose, teeth gritted. "Had to pop it back in place. Heals wrong otherwise," he said, giving you a wry smile. There was blood on his face and chest, and you found a towel and some sanitizer. You gently wiped his face clean, hands steady as you dabbed at his mouth. He held still, eyes on your face, as you took in his injuries. His voice sounded rougher, probably an aftermath of the nerve gas. He had a concussion, a broken nose, and lots of scrapes and bruises. His rapid healing had probably taken care of most of the damage, but-

Jack leaned in, hand on the back of your head as he kissed you. He tasted of blood and salt, his lips chapped, but warm. You leaned into him, gripping his forearms, heart pounding in your ears. Jack was here. Jack was alive. You'd made it in time.

Jack groaned. He stroked your hair, taking a shaky breath as he released you. "Sorry, sweetheart, any more and I'll get carried away."

You laughed softly, and returned to opening up the lockers, till you found what you'd been looking for: Jack's clothing. His coat was torn, but mostly intact and his shirt, armor, and boots were in better shape. You suspected they'd kept his stuff for one very practical reason: for when they staged his body. They'd probably planned to return it to the crash site, burn him like the rest, and cover it all up as a tragic accident. It's what any competent wetworks agent would have done. Grimacing, you handed Jack his clothes.

"What's wrong? You going to tell me it's a crime to cover up all this prime beef?" He asked, with a wink as he pulled his shirt on.

"Yeah," you said with small smile. "That's exactly what I was thinking. But I can't have you distracting my squad-" You swallowed, hoping Hanzo had reached Feng in time. "We should hurry. The Faraday cage has blocked external communications and Feng was in trouble."

"Feng's here?" Jack blinked. "Shit. I know things are going bad at HQ, but Prince sent people after my family-"

"I know. There are reinforcements on their way, but Chang cut out mid-call, and they've gone radio silent."

"SOP," Jack said, taking a deep breath. "Especially since Ray knows we've been betrayed. She'll handle it. She always does." He said the last part softer, a reassurance to himself. You weren't sure exactly what Chang's squad was equipped to handle, but you couldn't do anything about it now.

"OK," you said.

"But let's hurry anyway."

His socks were gone-you'd just assume they were the ugly white athletic type and they were slated to disappear anyway- but he pulled his boots on, hands wobbling as he tied the laces. You didn't see his gun, so you went and retrieved Petras' fallen shotgun.

Jack accepted it with an odd look on his face, like he didn't want to touch it. You took one last glance at the steaming pile of garbage that used to be Overwatch's director, and spat on the corpse. Turning on your heel, you stalked out.

Jack followed, keeping your pace. Breathing hurt, and you could feel the spread of that creeping soreness, the kind that would be much worse in the morning, especially if you didn't get under an emitter soon. You stopped in front of Jemison's cell, knocked once, and nudged the door open. She was sitting against the wall, pistol in hand. Her expression was oddly gleeful, and her eyes glittered in the low light. But they lost some of their feral shine when she saw Jack. She straightened up then, saluting. Her hands were bloodier than you remembered.

"Commander." She nodded at him, her gun now leveled at Prince who was still on the floor, twitching. He'd stopped trying to put himself back together, his now-mashed up viscera on the ground in front of him. Instead, he lay sprawled out, taking labored breaths, his expression flat and distant.

"Good to see you, Jemison," Jack said, voice soft.

"Relieved that you're in better shape, sir." She wobbled to her feet, staggering over to Prince. "I've been thinking about this for awhile. A quick death's too good for him. Strike really took him apart, but I kept him that way." She gave a sigh that almost sounded like contentment.

You noted the streaks of gore on the ground and the same matching colors up to her elbows. Those hadn't been there when you left. You knew then that she hadn't sat there idly. But you didn't say a thing.

"It's time to go, Jemison." There was a note of worry in Jack's voice. You knew why: Jemison might have been tightly wound, but she'd always been a well-grounded, by-the-book type of agent. Now she was teetering.

"Understood, sir," she said with a crisp nod. "It's a shame I can't draw this out any longer. But he's a goddamn cockroach, and I refuse to give him the chance to escape this." And with that, she knelt beside him, pressed the gun under his chin, and pulled the trigger. Bone and brains added another layer of mess to the floor. It was almost déjà vu. Jemison gave you a small, not entirely sane smile.

"We do what we can." You understood. It's exactly what you would have done if given the chance that last terrible night in Black Base Delta.

You had to help her up, and Jack swooped in, offering her his arm for stability. She hesitantly gripped his sleeve, dried blood caked under her fingernails.

"Status?" He asked her.

"Know I'm concussed and drugged," she said. "Think some ribs are broken. Dislocated knee. But I can limp out of here. Wherever here is."

"Hopen Island, an uninhabited part of the Svalbard Archipelago - Finnish territory," you said. "We'll have to loot some coats for you two. It's fucking freezing out there. Literally."

Jack blinked, taking a second to process that information, before giving you a gentle smile. "You hate the cold."

"Yeah," you said, smiling wryly at him. "I really do."

"I want to make a cheesy joke about keeping you warm, but I'm too concussed," he said, a little sheepish.

You glanced over at Jemison, whose eyes were only half open, a pained expression on her face. You weren't sure if it was because of her injuries, or Jack's commentary, and you were kind of scared to ask.

Jack turned his head slightly. "Sorry, Lieutenant."
Jemison snorted, not looking too bothered. "Knew you two had something going on," she muttered, shaking her head. She rolled her eyes then winced. "Shoal didn't believe it, but after Cobblestone Dust, it was goddamn obvious. The Morrison I know would have shredded almost any other agent for pulling the bullshit stunts you did."

You laughed awkwardly.

"Oh, there were consequences," Jack said, smugly.

Jemison squinted at you both. "I bet."

Jack just laughed harder.

"Right, we should go now," you said, not quite able to meet Jemison's eyes.

---

There was a clear trail of bodies in the halls, shouts and gunfire in the distance. To Amélie's chagrin, Lao took point. The younger woman was rigid with tension and clearly worried about what they would find inside the base. Amélie hobbled behind, leaning on her rifle.

"Hulk, this is Winter Soldier, do you copy?" Lao repeated.

The silence was uncomfortable. Amélie bit her lip. Feng did not do silence. If she had gone quiet then-

"This is Hawkeye," came a much softer response, and Amélie stiffened. Hanzo sounded...strange. She did not know him well, but he was not a man prone to gratuitous displays of emotion. "Hulk is secure. She's...injured, but I'm bringing her out. We've dealt with most of the hostiles, however we haven't done a perimeter sweep, so stay alert."

There was rustling sound, behind a door that was slightly ajar. Lao drew her pistol, and Amélie raised her rifle. The hacker gestured at the door with her right hand and veered slightly in that direction.

Amélie took a step back, covering her.

Hovering by the door jam, Lao pushed the door open, gun raised.

Even bundled up in a heavy winter coat with his back turned, Amélie recognized Geoffrey Murdoch's slight frame. He dug frantically through a stack of papers, having not yet noticed them.

Amélie glanced around the hall, and nodded at Lao. Both women stepped into the office, shutting the door behind them.

"What are you looking for, Geoffrey?" Lao asked, smiling fiercely.

The older man whirled, scattering papers as he raised his hands. "Don't shoot! Please, I'm unarmed! I'm a hostage!"

"Is that so, Geoffrey?" Amélie laughed.

He flinched, because he wasn't stupid. The fact they were here and they knew whom he was, well, there was no point in continuing that farce.

"You don't have to shoot me, I'm just a civilian!" He stuttered, wringing his hands. He looked between the two of them. "I-I- I can get you money." He flinched at their disinterest. "Or information. I've got good sources in the US government. Please-"

"How disappointing," Amélie sighed, leveling her gun at him. "We are after information of a more... unusual variety."

"I have backups of all Petras' financial records. All of them! And more-" Murdoch was practically begging now, eyes wide with fear.

"And you'll just give them to us?" Amélie asked, her smile full of knives.

"Yes, yes, anything -"

"What do you think, Winter Soldier?"

"I think I'd like to see some proof," Lao said. "And failing that, I'd like to shoot him and move on."

Amélie chuckled. Agent Lao was quick on her feet.

"No! No! I hold on, I'm just getting my engagement calendar. I kept a handwritten one for privacy reasons." He very slowly reached into his coat, and both women keeping their weapons trained on him. He moved with great deliberation, cautiously holding up a black leather book and setting it on the ground.

Lao snatched it up, flipped it open, and took a quick glance at it, her eyes widening.

"Well."

Amélie inclined her head to the side. "Do tell." She smiled, her gaze fixed on Murdoch.

"Paraphrasing: it's all about Director Petras: names, dates, school girls whose tutors he's paying off for... reasons, also meetings with a variety of UN officials about a overhauling Overwatch's command structure... Hmm. I suppose it's a start," Lao said. "But it's mostly tabloid fodder. I don't know if it's worth it to drag him back with us. I don't really want to breathe the same air as this bastard."

"There's more! Extensive records! Digital backups! I have access to most of them!" Murdoch shouted. He gestured to a stack of papers. "But you have to protect me! If they know I'm talking-"

Amélie handed Lao a pair of magnetic cuffs. "I suppose we can listen to what he has to say. We can always kill him later."

Chuckling darkly, Lao gestured and Murdoch put his hands behind his back, still babbling.

The cuffs clicked shut, and Amélie raised a brow as she heard a noise outside. She held up a hand and quietly opened the door. Just to the right of them, heading toward the base exit was Hanzo, carrying Feng on his back. The younger woman looked gaunter than she remembered, her head resting at an angle on Hanzo's shoulder. She was... drooling?

Hanzo spun around, bow already nocked.

"Good reflexes, Hawkeye," Amélie stepped out.

Feng snored lightly, definitely drooling on Hanzo's shoulder and down his armor.
Amélie stifled a laugh.

Hanzo relaxed, his eyebrows going up as Lao pushed a still jabbering Murdoch out of the office.

"He claims he have access to useful information," Lao scowled. "But I'm not so sure."

"Bring him along. We can always kill him later," Hanzo said, nonplussed.

Amélie appreciated how quick her fellow agents were on the uptake. Yes, you had told them to take Murdoch alive, but he didn't need to know that. He just needed to keep spilling useful intel, and once they got back to base, they could finesse more out of him. For now, he was too busy trying to convince them not to kill him, and that would keep him from causing other problems.

A familiar voice echoed down the hall. "I am so sorry, Lucky! I didn't mean to miss all the action. I have already adjusted my security protocols in response to that security failure." Athena sounded genuinely distraught.

"Not your fault." Your voice echoed too, and it didn't seem like you were making any attempt to hide your presence. But then if you had Athena plugged into the system, she must have already known that the premises was clear. Amélie relaxed slightly, leaning casually against the wall.

And then you rounded the corner, an Athena drone hovering at your side, and Jack and Jemison behind you, Jack steadying the other agent.

Amélie exhaled slowly, the sight of you, Jack, and Jemison a relief. You had made it in time.

Your eyes lit up when you saw your team standing there, everyone safe and alive. Amélie had never doubted your affection for her or your other friends, but both Hanzo and Lao seemed a little surprised by how happy you were to see them: Amélie and Lao with their prize prisoner, Hanzo giving a sleeping Feng a piggyback ride. You scanned the corridor a genuine grin on your face. Amélie met your gaze.

"I see that Chanceux always gets her man." She winked.

"You could say that," Jack said dryly. "Recently-departed Director Petras certainly can't disagree."

"Oh he's dead? What a terrible accident," Amélie chuckled, not surprised that you had killed the bastard, even though you had been planning to keep him alive. She would certainly shed no tears, and Gérard, despite the inevitable grumbling, would be mollified by the acquisition of Murdoch.

You smiled at Amélie, your gaze drifting to Jack, a rare softness in your smile. Jack returned the look, his emotions less contained, and Amélie sighed. What was more romantic than this?

"So what took you so long?" She asked, leaning on her rifle. "You had us do all the hard work while you rescued our charming soldiers. Such a glory hog."

You just laughed and shook your head, which left Amélie speculating on just what you had gotten up to in the restricted area.
You were pleasantly surprised to find the On Sing transport right outside the doors, Zheng clearly at the helm.

Hanzo boarded first, following Zheng's terse instructions on how to treat an overextended Feng. Lao strapped Murdoch to a bench, securing him to the safety netting. You raised a brow as she retrieved noise-cancelling earplugs and put them on the gibbering man. Then she grabbed a black canvas hood out of one of the lockers and placed it over his head.

Amélie got out an emitter and set it up, obviously limping. You gave her questioning look.

"I was careless. Agent Lao was more prepared and helped me out of some dire circumstances," Amélie said, with a warm smile.

Lao blinked, squirming under the praise and everyone's interest.

"Good job," you said.

"Thanks," she murmured, ears turning pink. She leaned closer to you. "Prince?"

"Jemison," you said, nodding at the wounded woman. She didn't notice. Jack was supporting most of her weight. She needed proper medical attention.

Lao glanced at her briefly. "But you helped, right?"

"I helped," you smiled, touching your tanto.

Lao's eyes flicked down to your blades. She smiled back.

Feng was half awake now, muttering to herself as Hanzo fed her another energy bar and gave her small sips of something with a handwritten label on it.

"She going to be OK?" You asked.

"Low blood sugar," Hanzo said. "She's crashed."

"Is a lot more complicated than that-" Feng slurred, giggling. She flopped over on the floor, as Hanzo tried to give her more of the drink, spilling it on her chest. She glanced at Hanzo, then you, and started laughing even harder. At least, you hoped she was genuinely amused and not having a seizure.

"We might have to use an IV," Zheng said, sounding slightly frustrated. "And please don't listen to any suggestions she gives when she's in this state. The basic laws of physics are lost on her when she's like this."

Feng just lay there giggling. "Gravity sauce."

Hanzo sighed. "No, Feng."

"Yes, Feng," she laughed. "But seriously, Hanzo, gravity sauce is far less awesome than gravity marmalade, which I can make! Not to be confused with Newton's apple or his big gay occult energy. Though if we're discussing physics, I really think we need to talk more about Ibn al-Haytham and his sciencing! Yeah, that's a word! Sciencing! I am so good at sciencing! I am the best sciencer you've ever met!"

Hanzo shook his head, and reached for a towel. But he looked a lot less aggravated than "Try more protein, if you can get her to eat. And try to get her to eat, or she'll talk nonstop and wake up terribly embarrassed," Zheng said, though there was something less distant to her now. There was something humanizing in how focused she was on caring for Feng. It made you dislike her just a little less.

You retrieved the medkits and nanite injectors from the medical supply locker and passed them out. You would need help with your injection, but first, you had to get your armor off.

Jack had helped Jemison onto a bench, carefully strapping her in a seat in range of the emitter. She slumped there. He sat next to her, clearly worried.

You took a seat beside him. He touched your shoulder and you nodded, his hands carefully undoing your armor seals. You handed him the syringe and then winced as he pushed the needle into your back. The pain was short-lived, giving way to an almost uncomfortable heat. You squirmed, because you'd already taken a nanite injection and a round of emitter healing in the last few hours. Once this was over you were going to go down hard and sleep for two days.

Jack put an arm around your shoulder, exhaling slowly. "I know a lot's happened, and that you or Athena will have to brief me, but give me a few minutes to decompress. I'm still...processing everything."

"Of course," you said, squeezing his hand. He leaned over and nuzzled your cheek. You understood that need. Because there was a lot to tell, and most of it wasn't good. You still weren't sure how to explain Gabriel's condition. Giving bad news gracefully was not a skill you had mastered. Maybe you'd let Athena take the lead on that part. It seemed cowardly, but you were too close. Every way you tried to phrase it sounded wrong in your head. "I'll definitely need Athena's help. She has more technical data."

Jack kissed the side of your neck. "Thank you, baby."

There was a crash, and when you looked up, Lao was frantically trying to push her gear back into the locker, eyes everywhere but on you and Jack.

"She didn't know?" Jack asked, raising a brow.

You sighed. Sometimes Jack was inconveniently perceptive. "We were in a hurry. Didn't get around to telling her about that part," you said, rubbing the back of your neck. You had not told her about the other part either. Well, that would come out too, probably sooner than later. You sighed, unsure of how to explain yourself.

"You're not telling your friends about your relationships?" Jack asked, nudging you lightly with his elbow, a mock wounded expression on his face. He kissed you again, possibly out of affection, but mostly because he was a show-off. "Are you embarrassed by me?"

"Socks with sandals," you managed to mutter, face a little too warm.

Ziv had always been aware that his brusque and demanding demeanor would not win him friends. But early on, he learned that the consequences of backing down were far worse than simple loneliness. He could never afford to look weak, not to his father and not to his peers. If people thought someone was weak, they'd end up face down in the dirt, a foot on their neck, their teeth kicked in. And no one was going to step up to save them, because if they were weak, what was the point? They might not deserve what they got, but who was going to risk their neck to save someone who couldn't return the favor? Ziv learned that lesson very young and very fast.

So like Savta, who might not have been the best role model for a small child, he had always counted on the fact that his actions would demonstrate what his words could not. He believed that people would either be smart enough to recognize his value, or they weren't worth knowing anyway.

His time in Unit 8200 reinforced that fact. Like most Israeli citizens, he'd done his mandatory military service. But he'd been seconded to the army's elite cyber warfare unit - something particularly important in the aftermath of the Omnic Crisis. Other government branches had tried to lure him in, but it was Unit 8200 or nothing at all. Fuck the Mossad, they were a bunch of conniving political hacks - Savta had warned him to steer clear of their bullshit, even as she waded through it.

The IDF had a philosophy that contradicted most other militaries' core policy of hierarchical obedience. It was driven by a silly idiom: rosh gadol or "big head." Ziv was well aware what the idiom meant in English - having a "big head" meant you were overconfident and full of yourself. It was pejorative. But in Hebrew, rosh gadol referred to one's ability to think outside the box, to take the extra step to do the job right, to even fight your CO and appeal to their bosses if you knew they were wrong. The IDF encouraged soldiers with rosh gadol. Sure, the army still needed people with rosh katan or "small head." They followed orders. They did what they were told. They stuck to the parameters of their jobs and didn't push. But those with rosh gadol were to be cultivated and encouraged, especially when they got results.

Ziv most certainly had rosh gadol, and grew his hair out just to emphasize it. Because he wasn't religious. Because he liked men. Because he was dark skinned, and it didn't matter if his Jewish ancestry traced back centuries on both sides - there were plenty of "his people" who looked down on him for that alone. So Ziv fought to show he was just as good, if not better than the rest of them, and if they didn't like him, well, that didn't matter. They respected him. He didn't give them any other options.

He'd taken the same approach to Blackwatch, though, maybe that hadn't been the best choice. But he wasn't going to ride in on his grandmother's reputation and depend on your protection. Ziv established himself the best way he knew how, by butting heads and showing he had the skills to back up his attitude. Though now he understood that maybe he didn't have as much to prove as he thought he did. You, Riggs, and McCree probably would have accepted him no matter what.

The rest of Blackwatch though? He wasn't so sure. After all, it had been riddled with traitors when he came in. There weren't a lot of people he could trust. Being friendly then wasn't worth a damn. There was no reason to change his behavior.

Not to mention that some assholes went out their way to malign you - something Ziv wouldn't stand for, and maybe one of the reasons he'd gotten such a prickly reputation so early on. Not that he was going to admit any of that to you. You already knew people were talking shit. You didn't need him to give you the details. So Ziv kept that part to himself, even if he couldn't keep his head down and his mouth shut in the face of slander and bullshit. McCree and Genji backed him up one day, when a particularly loud confrontation got physical. And no one thought it necessary to tell you. You had enough to deal with.

So when he ended up in the Commander's office regularly in those first few months, he never explicitly stated the cause of those conflicts, only that the other guy "had it coming." When you and Reyes asked him why he kept getting into fights, he would just shrug and mumble a halfassed apology - it was grade school all over again. But after the second month, he thought Reyes might have caught on. Because while he'd gotten lectured and "verbally coached," no disciplinary action was ever taken. Sometimes there were people who just understood the situation or one's intentions without words having to be spoken. Ziv strongly preferred this approach. Even after things improved, it was a hard habit to break.

But then Gérard and Amélie had come into his world, effortlessly showcasing how one did not need to be abrasive to be formidable. They were charming, dangerous, and competent, and everyone knew it. Ziv could not stay away. It was just Gérard at first - that flirtatious French accent, rich laugh, and devious sense of humor. Gérard fascinated Ziv, an attraction made more appealing by how much you kept warning him off. "Don't go after him, he's taken?" Oh, that was rich coming from you. Of course, to be fair, you were too dumb to realize how besotted you were with Commander Growly-Face, and the only deception involved on your part was self-delusion. So you weren't quite a hypocrite.

But that kind of obliviousness wasn't part of Ziv's character. Ziv was a man who knew what he wanted. Just like he knew your advice was sound, and that one misstep would complicate everything. He wasn't going to risk it, not that he'd admit any of that to your face.

Except then Amélie moved onto the base, and then suddenly they were having lunch together, talking about everything - culture, fashion, sabotage, and their shared friendship with you. Amélie flirted, yes, but she flirted with most people and with her it was just good fun. There was no discomfort, no expectation. She pushed the boundaries, but she never crossed his. She was incredibly beautiful and charismatic. Even if Ziv was not attracted to her, he appreciated her charm. And she knew that he liked her husband, and didn't seem to mind at all.

They were so very different than he was, and yet, they liked him and recognized his value. Yes, he'd blustered with Gérard in the beginning. Though the older man hadn't seemed to care about Ziv's delivery, only the content of his work. When Ziv had botched an encounter with a Talon agent in Shanghai, he thought for sure it would shift the balance of the power, that maybe this single mistake had negated his worth in the older man's eyes. But Gérard had only clucked his tongue and knifed the man in the ribs, and told him to be more careful next time. For a man who spun multiple webs of intrigue, there were refreshingly few games between him and Gérard. And Amélie played none, at least when it came to stating their goals within their relationships. She said what she meant, and abided by it. Though, Ziv was starting to suspect that both of them were seeing who could be the more civilizing influence on him. Amélie was obviously winning, because of course she was.

It was a startling realization that there were other just as effective ways to succeed at life. But Ziv was his own man. He would not, could not change overnight, and he didn't truly feel like he needed to completely overhaul his approach to people. Though he found himself being more polite to his coworkers, if only because it made Riggs more comfortable, and not at all because they went to you to complain about his intransigence. And then you...reacted.

Ziv seethed quietly. You were a fucking idiot, and he was mad at you. And he would continue to be mad at you when you came home with more stupid injuries because you were stupid, and reckless, and left him here. And maybe you were right to do so, but fuck that kind of reasonable thinking. That was rosh katan, and he wasn't about that.

So here he sat, next to Gérard's bed, a pistol in his lap, two heavily customized drones hovering by the door, wondering what he was going to do.

Gérard sat upright in the bed, shirtless, having removed the hospital gown as soon as he awakened. The was a mirror in his hand and a bandage over his empty eye socket. But he wasn't looking at his own face. He was checking his back and other hard-to-see injuries.

"Amélie's letter suggests that I should choose a blue implant - the heterochromia would be most striking. She has always been a fan of David Bowie, so I am not surprised. Your thoughts?"

"They have color changing pseudo-irises now," Ziv said, having already looked into their options on the return trip from Hanoi. "On top of the cybernetic enhancements, you could also have one glowing evil eye, if you liked."

Gérard laughed, sounding genuinely amused. "Would you like that?"

"I'd like it if you didn't get hurt in the first place," Ziv said sharply.

Gérard just smiled like a cat. "True, I would have preferred that option as well. But I cannot complain if it means you are here to watch over me.

Ziv's scowl deepened. Gérard was most charming when he was about to do something everyone else disliked. "Gérard-

"I have had several hours of nanite regeneration. I am feeling much better."

"Great, you're staying in here. McCree and the gang are holding off the armored Talon platoon just fine without you. You aren't in any shape to go out there."

"I agree," Gérard said, tone mild. "But if it is just you, Maeda Vargas, and Vo guarding Gabriel and me, I believe you should-

"Isha is in the vents-

"Of course she is," Gérard said, giving the wall a wry glance.

There was a soft thrum of acknowledgement from behind the grating.

Ziv caught himself smiling, in spite of himself and quickly turned his glare back to a certain scheming bastard.

"Someone will come after me," Gérard said. "But contrary to what they suspect, I am awake and clear-headed."

"Your depth perception-

"I don't need it to point and shoot," he said with that stupid smug sexy laugh. "You can also leave me a drone. It will be fine. I think you are needed elsewhere."

Ziv's scowl deepened. He knew exactly what Gérard was suggesting. And it was too much. "Why should I? I don't even like that overbearing, mouth-breathing, meathead."

Gérard just laughed. "Even though you admit that that overbearing, mouth-breathing, meathead is the best commanding officer you've ever had, personal feelings aside?"

Ziv fumed, really regretting that admission during late night pillow talk. Yes, Reyes was a good CO. He got the job done. He backed up his people. He didn't sacrifice them to politics. And maybe he wasn't really that much of a mouth-breathing meathead, but the asshole was dating you, and well, Ziv knew whose side he was on if things went sour.
"We both know I am the better shot, mon chou," Gérard said, not unkindly. "And my hands are steady, see?" He held his hands out, open palms to Ziv. "I know you will do everything in your power to protect me, but doesn't it make more sense if we are both prepared?"

"Gérard-

"It would also be a great comfort if I had the means to defend myself, as injured as I may appear. But if you are concerned that I will hurt myself, well, I defer to your judgment."

"Oh that's not even right!" Ziv snarled, because while Gérard might not play games with their relationship, doing so for missions, grooming time, and meal selection seemed to be standard fare.

Gérard just shook his head. "What's not right is that Jack is missing, Ana has been sent to Greece, and McCree is defending us from both the UN and Talon. But please consider the social debt Gabriel will have if you safeguard him while he is unconscious. Provided you do not graffiti his face with permanent marker."

Ziv threw his hands up. "You're as bad as Lucky!"

Gérard began to laugh and then winced. "Please, I am not that bad. I am only asking you to go next door and look after a less fortunate man. And also because I know that if I need help, you will come running."

Ziv groaned, carefully handing Gérard his spare pistol. The older man's fingers brushed his own, squeezing gently.

"I'm not doing it for him," Ziv said.

"D'accord. Chanceux will appreciate it though."

"She can eat a bag of dicks," Ziv said sharply, pulling his hand away, because he didn't want to talk about you. Not till you got back and he got to yell at you more for leaving him behind.

"Your knives are flying low, but I am concerned about her too," Gérard said without missing a beat. "We must remember that she is quite resilient. I suppose I am more worried that Amélie will do something rash. I know that staying behind was hard on her and I know the opportunity to do good is what she needs right now. It can be most unpleasant for everyone when she has a great deal of pent up frustration."

Ziv squinted at him, not missing that ridiculous subtext.

"So I appreciate that you are the sensible one," Gérard continued warmly. "Perhaps she and I are too risk-oriented. Your well-grounded caution is a welcome balance."

"You can stop bullshitting now. I'll go over there, and look after Reyes' stupid face, and make sure no one holds a pillow over it."

Ziv rose, and felt a tug on the back of his shirt. Groaning, he turned around leaned over and Gérard kissed him, gently cupping his face. "This is not something I would ask of just anyone. Thank you for looking after my friend when I cannot."

Ziv felt his cheeks heat up. "Ben-zona-"
"If you're worried, send Vo in. I know she has questions."

Ziv gave his lover a sidelong glance, because he knew some parts of Gérard's history with Vo and Nguyen. And Vo was unpredictable on the best of days, let alone on the day she lost her boss and part-time caretaker. But Gérard just smiled placidly, looking like he didn't have a care in the world.

It started small, a trickle of snipers on the rooftops. Lowell and Jeong on an adjacent building, Park and another agent on the other. They weren't Ana or even Amélie, but Jesse was glad for all the help he could get.

The drones came next: mobile turrets and shielding units moved to the front lines, extending their cover and taking the heat off Genji and Winston. The enemy line was starting to fracture. Though they were now lobbing more mortars from a closer range, and Jesse swore as one slipped between a gap in the shield walls and struck the White Rabbit emplacement.

There was silence - no visible explosion, and then a muted boom. Jesse paused his own advance to peer to the side.

A shriek sounded over the comms.

"Mom!" Mika's voice cut through Jesse's chest, and his breath caught. "Mom-

"Agent Ajiyiming is down. It is...severe. Requesting support," a man said over the comms, his voice shaky.

"Angela-" Genji said looking toward the other side of the infirmary.

"On my way," she said.

"Did you know-?" Jesse clenched his fist.

"No. But On Sing is a family business," Genji said. "It does not come as a complete surprise." He turned to escort Angela across the field.

Jesse winced. It might not surprise the Yakuza Princeling, but Jesse had not been prepared for it. He wasn't sure if that would have changed anything, but... He shook his head. No, it wouldn't have changed a damn thing. He ground his teeth, eyeing the spot the explosives had come from. "If someone can do something about the mortars-"

"On it," Lowell said, voice tense.

"Clearing our zone," Park said.

Jesse caught sight of three clusters of Talon agents jerking backward, doing a ragged bullet dance, before dropping onto the ground. The mortars and artillery abruptly stopped as the enemy tried to retreat back toward the forest.

And that's when the other half of the Overwatch agents appeared, having circled around the field for a pincer attack. Getting at least two dozen more agents in the field made a very big difference.

With Athena maintaining the infirmary perimeter, Jesse and Winston stalked out onto the field, ready to clean it all up. The rest of the battle would not take long. Talon soldiers seemed remarkably willing to surrender when the odds shifted out of their favor—they seemed rather certain about it, like they didn't expect the consequences to be too harsh.

"Potime?" He asked Genji over the private comms as he headed back to the infirmary.

"...No," Genji said, voice grim.

"I see." Jesse exhaled slowly. "Other casualties?"

"Nothing severe. The timing was off—-it didn't detonate immediately. Patime jumped on the mortar. Her body absorbed the impact." And the shrapnel. She was a soldier. She understood exactly what she was doing. Just like the Commander must have when he-

Jesse gritted his teeth. "Goddamnit." Guilt and regret left a sour taste in his mouth.

"We'll handle things here and keep the perimeter," Genji said.

"Thanks."

Shooting and taking ground was far easier than thinking about sacrifice and loss. It was not hard to redirect his anger at the ones who deserved it. Jesse was halfway across the battlefield before he realized that he was alone, all the enemies who had been in front of him were dead, captures, or fleeing. They didn't make it very far. Overwatch agents took more prisoners than Blackwatch agents, but they had the advantage of numbers. Jesse still had to remind himself that after this point, he was no longer allowed to just walk up and shoot any of the enemy in the head, at least not with all these witnesses. Even if the bastards deserved it.

The trees began to bow and a great roaring came from overhead. A shadow fell across the field. Jesse shielded his eyes as he looked up, a massive air carrier with UN markings began to descend. The Overwatch agents backed up, watching as it landed in the grass and the hatch opened up.

A tall brunette man stepped out, wearing a startlingly accurate replica of the Strike Commander's coat over an Overwatch uniform. The major difference was a blue sash across his chest with the white UN globe emblem emblazoned across it.

Jesse was a little surprised that it wasn't Petras or Morrison. He had never laid eyes on this bastard before. Who the fuck was this walking parade piece?

"Well-fought, soldiers!" The man announced, his voice carrying over an amplifier. He strode into the grass, flanked by a dozen more folks in Overwatch/UN outfits, people that Jesse had never seen before. "I am Acting Strike Commander Bell, here to provide aid." He smiled wide, his teeth white and shiny, his features conventionally handsome. He looked like an actor, not a real fighter, and Jesse could not suppress his eyeroll.

An Athena drone hovered by his side. "His UN credentials are authentic. The Security Council named him Acting Strike Commander half an hour ago, but just released the information."

"Are you the Agent in Charge?" Bell's focus zoomed immediately to Jesse. He strode forward, his people following. "You've done an excellent job defending the premises from terrorists, Agent. Your service is commendable. Don't worry, we're here to help. You can stand down now. The United Nations has sent us to take charge of the situation."

Jesse crossed his arms, his smile sardonic. "Mighty kind of them."
Bell stopped, smile wavering. "I'm sorry it took us so long. You've done very well for yourself, Agent-" He looked Jesse over. "But our orders come from a higher power. The conflict is over. You are to disperse and prepare for debrief. We will handle all further security. As of right now, you are formally relieved from maintaining the infirmary quarantine-"

"Isn't that convenient?" Jesse asked, not moving. Some political nominee just swept in after a clear series of betrayals, claiming to have the situation under control? Did they think he was born yesterday? This stunk worse than Mihret's summer running shoes, and he'd helped you burn those.

"I don't appreciate your tone."

"I have my orders from Captain Amari," Jesse said. "And they're to hold this infirmary."

"Are you sure you want the responsibility for all these people's lives on your conscience? Especially if things go wrong? Because you can still help smooth things over. You can ensure the safety of your friends. If you're the agent in charge of this operation, and you don't do everything you can to prevent bloodshed, well those lives will be on your head." Bell's eyes glittered, the menace in his voice understated as "concern." "I don't know if you've really considered all the consequences of going rogue, agent."

Jesse snorted, not willing to take the bait. "Ain't no pissing contest, and certainly ain't no rebellion. Just following orders." He gave an easy smile. "But since we're all on the same side, you shouldn't mind waiting till one of my direct COs can relieve me."

"I'm afraid that's not how this works," Bell said firmly. "We have a chain of command and-"

"I'm afraid that doesn't mean a thing to me. You ain't Strike Commander Morrison. You ain't Commander Reyes. And you sure as hell ain't Captain Amari." Jesse's grin was savage. "My orders come from them."

"Your loyalty is admirable. I would hate to court martial you for insubordination," Bell said. "I realize after a battle your blood is running hot. I can overlook this little misunderstanding. After all, all of you have such promising careers. Don't throw that away-"

"Do you hear him shitting out his mouth? He must think we're idiots," Daniels muttered over the Overwatch comm channel, sounding genuinely furious, and Jesse realized then that Athena was broadcasting this exchange. Oh shit- what if he had something stuck in his teeth? You and Genji would never let him live it down.

"What a prick," Park said with a snort. "You're not buying any of that malarkey, are you McCree?"

Grinning, Jesse backed up, not missing how Bell's unit was spreading out, trying to take control of the field. "Stay in cover, guys," Jesse said. "And hold fire. These guys are itching for an excuse."

"You are making a big mistake-" Bell shouted.

"Sorry, Acting Commander," Jesse chuckled as he headed back to the infirmary. "I'm just following orders from my chain of command. And I've got a quarantine to maintain."
Weather's gotten cold and wrists are twinging. Still working too much. -_-;;

Other than that, had a pleasantly low key holiday and trying to figure out how to have a life outside of work.

Edit: After listening to two days of conspiracy theory and pseudoscience podcasts, I've decided I will take up chaos magic as my new hobby. Because why not? Lol, I'm kidding. Probably.

I did start My Time at Portia. It's very charming. XD
Chapter 131

Chapter Summary

Gunshot wounds, wayward youth, and what happened to the Morrison family.

Chapter Notes

Received art for Christmas. Unf.

My cousin and a friend commissioned Yumi to make a full color picture that was sitting on my new bookshelves Christmas morning.

A certain Ugandan Knuckles Anon made a lovely gif of my pets eating food from IAL.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Jack sat very quietly while Athena gave him the rundown of the situation: for Operation Pelennor, Jesse was in charge of the protecting the infirmary and everyone in it. Gérard was out of commission and Gabriel was missing parts and in an induced coma. The infirmary was under attack, but some of the rank and file agents had gone in to provide backup. For Operation Morpheus, Ana had lead a team of SEP veterans and the remaining Overwatch founders to Greece and they were...very outnumbered. And his family could not be reached, though Senator Armstrong had diverted a trusted Marine unit, led by a certain sharpshooting Captain Vashtai DeVevo to provide support. They had not yet reached Indiana.

And since Jack was MIA and Gabriel was incapacitated, the UN had named an "Acting Strike Commander," despite the protests of Undersecretary Kwento and several other delegates. You gritted your teeth: he might be harmless, but you doubted it.

Feng lay on the floor, snoring loudly as Hanzo sat beside her, closely eyeing a medical monitoring device on her wrist. She jolted up, eyes wide and unseeing, hissed a name you did not recognize, and then dropped onto her back, Hanzo's arm cushioning her head. "We lost her..." she moaned, eyes falling shut.

Hanzo grimaced and looked at the Zheng drone. "Is she seizing?"

"It's no hallucination. We always know our own," Zheng said, voice flat. "Patime Ajiyiming is dead."

That Zheng already knew came as no surprise. She had contact with the squad and with Athena. But how did Feng know? She'd been unconscious. You didn't have an easy answer, and Lao looked genuinely freaked out, hands shaking as she gave you her intense, "I told you so" glare.
Jemison kept fading in and out of consciousness, struggling to pay attention to the updates, but also nursing a nasty headwound.

Amélie cleaned her gun, chatting about nothing of importance with Lao, but keeping your friend occupied and calm, while she performed maintenance her own gear. There was blood on her prosthetic arm, though she didn't look injured. You had a sneaking suspicion that Lao had gotten up close and personal with the enemy. Though your hacker sent you some pretty pointed glances every few minutes, looking between you and Jack like she couldn't quite believe it.

You weren't sure how to take that but...well, you'd deal with it later.

Jack's expression had gone flat during Athena's briefing. He sat beside you, hands folded in his lap, eyes hard as he took in the information. This was the Strike Commander now, a man whose world was in chaos, and who was going to do whatever it took to make things right. It hurt some part of you to see him close up like that, but you understood. Compartmentalization was a great coping mechanism.

You were less than half an hour away, On Sing's stealthcraft making excellent time.

"Once we drop off our wounded, how do you want to split our resources?" You asked, wondering if you'd end up in Indiana or Greece.

"Greece is our focus," he said, jaw tight. He didn't meet your eyes. But you already knew his priorities, and while you weren't sure you could make the same decisions, you understood.

You placed your hands over his. "There are Blackwatch agents more equipped for small-scale operations. I can draw up a list-

He gave a sharp nod. "You have full operational authority. Thank you."

"With Chang, On Sing, and DeVevo's people on site, things should be handled," you said, trying to sound convincing. You wouldn't be able to send anyone till the situation at headquarters was sorted.

Jack managed a small smile. "Yeah, I know."

"Oh, this is bad-" Athena's drone hovered in front of you. "The Acting Strike Commander has just ordered Agent McCree to stand down and hand over operational control to him. And Jesse doesn't like that order."

"Blackwatch cowboys seem to have trouble following orders and keeping a lid on the backtalk. It's nice to know that some things don't change," Jack muttered, no real hostility in his voice. "Athena, bring up the cameras." He rose and you followed him to the terminal. An aerial shot of the Overwatch campus appeared, along with numerous camera angles showing smoking craters, active turrets, and lots of dead bodies in Overwatch blue. Jack flinched, though you all knew that the enemy had worn stolen uniforms, the visual was still a gut punch.

"Guess we better land in the training field," you said. "And maybe we should broadcast this encounter. For insurance."

Jack blinked, giving you a sideways look. "You're normally the sneaky one. Have you developed Gabe's flair for drama?"

"Not at all," you said. "But I don't want to give them a chance to assassinate you and bury this. We're about to burn some pretty nasty conspirators." You grinned at Amélie and Lao, and then the still restrained Murdoch. "We're going to have to go public anyway."

Jack nodded grimly. "Optics are a bitch." He studied the dossiers that Athena provided, as well as the terrain. "It would be best if Feng and Agent Shimada stay out of sight. Auntie Zheng, Agent Shimada, I'll need you to keep Murdoch and the wounded safe." He looked at you, Amélie, and Lao. "Can I count on the rest of you?"

Lao saluted crisply, her face rigid.

Amélie's salute was jaunty and almost relaxed. She smiled lazily, like she was already thinking about what kind of cheese she wanted to have at the celebration afterward.

You nodded, squeezing his hand.

"I will set us down between the infirmary and Bell's forces," Zheng said. "The ship's cameras and those within Athena's control will livestream directly through White Rabbit and Overwatch social media. I'm already fortifying our cyber defense structures in case of DDOS and other attempts to take your broadcast offline."

You adjusted your gear, carbine in hand. The ship began to descend into the field. It was time to make an entrance.

"Ready?" Jack asked, already heading down the ramp.

"Yes, sir," you said, right behind him. "The Bitch Squad is ready to go!"

Amélie's delighted laugh echoed in your ears.

"Is that really what you're calling it?" Lao gasped.

Jack just gave you a wry grin over his shoulder. "Well, who am I to argue?" He winked at you, delight brightening his face for half a second before he schooled his expression to something more regal. "Let's move out: it's show time."

When Ziv got back from Coronado, his penal boot camp sentence completed, he wasn't happy to find Maeda Vargas trailing behind you like an eager puppy. He took one look at the kid and wondered, briefly, if you were fed up with his shit and had taken applications for a more grateful sidekick. Maybe that was just how things would be. Ziv pushed, and pushed, and pushed till people took the hint and walked right out of his life. Family, lovers, so-called friends... It was a sickening feeling, realizing that he'd been the catalyst, driving people away for reasons he hadn't wanted to address at the time. It was easy to be shitty, and then when people got fed up, he could write them off like they hadn't been worth it to begin with. It was easier to shift the blame onto other people, to ignore his own faults.

Ziv had a lot of guilt over how Operation Spinshot played out. Sure, Morrison was a hypocritical asshole, but Ziv wasn't delusional enough to pretend like he wasn't in the wrong himself. You acknowledged that, told him off, and still stepped up to defend him. You didn't do it because you thought he'd owe you afterward or as some power play with Morrison. You did it because you valued him and knowing that you were willing to do that, that you'd back him against The Jack Morrison - your ridiculously attractive war hero lover - still made his stomach churn.

And maybe, he realized a bit later, Gérard had been tweaking him with little bits of gossip, just enough to push him to react more directly, instead of slowly withdrawing. Gérard was a manipulative bastard, though he seemed to be using those wiles for the forces of chaotic good. Well, at least in Ziv's life. Ziv wasn't that naive to mistake his lover for an altruist.

So already half convinced that you'd replaced him with Maeda Vargas, he'd confronted you about it, expecting you to say something like, "well that's what you get for being an ass." He knew, on some level, that his behavior warranted retaliation. That maybe he wasn't good enough at being a friend and you certainly didn't deserve all his crap. That everyone else in his life might have had a good reason to leave him. But instead you had just looked confused, tired, and obviously hurt.

That reaction was worse than any of the snarky comments he had been expecting. It was a terrible realization, that maybe he'd been judging people wrong for too long. That all of the predictions of loneliness and abandonment might be self-fulfilling prophecies. That in protecting himself, maybe he was his own worst enemy. Ziv had resolved right then to do better. But to still keep an eye on that punk ass kid who thought he could worm his way into Blackwatch.

Then Greece had happened - those 36 awful hours of waiting for the Commanders to find what was left of you and McCree. He didn't really give the boy a second thought till he found that Maeda Vargas had been with you, and had survived. And even if he'd been dubiously useful, Maeda Vargas had been in the field with you when Ziv was not. And Ziv realized his worries were misplaced - Ziv was OK in the field. But Maeda Vargas would be better. And you needed all the help you could get.

It was easier than he expected to start up conversation with the younger man. They both worked with Reinhardt on a regular basis and it would be stranger if they didn't talk. And for some stupid inexplicable reason, the kid liked him. It was probably his proximity to you and Reinhardt that paved the way. Reinhardt was ridiculously decent, and had a knack for bringing out the good behavior in people. You had apparently left an impression on the kid - either from being an insane instructor or more likely, because you'd saved his life. Maeda Vargas had taken some head trauma in Greece. That was also a feasible explanation.

The point was, the kid was smart, earnest, and actually fairly clever. Yeah, he asked questions about your exploits, but he wasn't just fixated on you. The boy wanted to be a Blackwatch operative, and Ziv had to admit, Maeda Vargas would be a good one.

So he wasn't surprised to see the boy pacing the hall, checking the safety mirror, vents, and flipping between several comm channels. Vo was more staid, preferring to slouch in a chair, rolling some weird little fidget toys in her small hands. She glanced at the door, shrewd eyes narrowing.

"He's awake. Said you might have questions and to go on in," Ziv said.

Vo nodded at him, slipping out of her seat. "I watch him then. Don't worry, I know his tricks. He can't sweet talk me." She gave him a sardonic look.

Ziv scowled at her. "He didn't-"

Vo just snorted and pushed by him. "Watch Commander. That's an order from senior agent: me." She went into Gérard's room, shut the door, and turned the lock.

Ziv stared for a moment, jaw moving but no words coming out. Vo Min was the senior agent and technically, only technically by the barest possible definition, in charge. 77N7V7. Now there was a terrible realization.
"Gérard's awake. I left him a drone, a gun, and Vo. I think that might be overkill," he said, when Maeda Vargas stopped pacing in front of him.

"Athena thinks there's someone in the vents," Maeda Vargas said, lips pressed together in a thin line. He crossed his arms, brow furrowed as he looked between Gérard's room and Reyes' room. "No idea where though."

"And everyone else is mopping up the Talon offensive... They're biding their time." Ziv unlocked the door to Reyes' room. Realizing Maeda Vargas was still in the hallway, he beckoned the younger agent in after him.

Maeda Vargas followed, still looking around. "Getting to that port would be ideal, assuming they have blueprints." He pointed to the spot where Isha was concealed. "But Agent Shimada said that that route isn't readily accessible. I think he crawled in there and put in razor wire or something. It's more likely that they'll probably pick a secluded area on this level and walk in. Because they're not expecting too much resistance."

"So we should-"

There was a faint beep and the security lock clicked - that wasn't supposed to happen. Unless it was an override- The door opened right then, two men in scrubs and surgical masks pushed in, the one in the front held a handgun. There was a "pop!" and Távio swore fluidly in Portuguese, falling backward into a chair. Isha shrieked, the vent cover clanging.

Ziv's drone was already moving from the hallway. More shots came from outside the room, and the man in the rear dropped.

The man in front slammed the door shut, leaving his comrade's body and leveled his gun at Ziv. "We're not after you. Back away, and you'll get to walk away."

Ziv snorted. Like he bought that. But he would not be fast enough to draw his weapon before the man shot him. He had never been much for close combat or even guns. He did not particularly like Reyes. But he did not know how to back down either. He had a wounded junior agent, armored plates under his coat, and a raptor niece as backup.

Taking a deep breath, Ziv smiled at the man, and charged, even as he heard the muffled shots, and felt his body jerk on impact. So what? Ziv Mihret did not give ground.

_Rosh gadol_, bitches.

---

The stealthcraft hovered about a meter over the ground, grass and dust whirling around. Jack jumped out first, landing on his feet and walking straight toward Bell's squad. You followed, gritting your teeth as you landed, the impact jarring your sore bones. Amélie and Lao spread out beside you, you were on his left, Amélie in the center, Lao on the right. Your sniper would need the best view of the field, and most shooters were right handed, so you expected the most fire from that side. Lao could do her job from any spot. The three of held your guns in ready position as Jack advanced onto the field.

Bell stared, his silhouette very much like Jack's. He was of a similar build, his uniform and haircut a variant of the Strike Commander. The resemblance looked like someone's clever marketing decision, meant to tie the public's perception of Jack to Bell. Because of course the Bad Guys had smart PR. "M-Morrison? But you're dead-"
Jack laughed darkly. "Is that so?" He stopped in the center of the field, in clear view of all. "I wonder who thought to spread that around. Awfully convenient, isn't it?"

Bell laughed nervously. "Come now, Morrison, it was a terrible accident, and an honest mistake. I'm just--"

"It's been less than twenty four hours and there was nothing accidental or honest about the ambush and murder of my agents," Jack said coldly.

The three of you stood behind Jack, faces severe. You were his entourage, his bodyguards, and even if there were only three of you, you were worth more than any of these pretend soldiers with their stolen valor and political scheming.

"You need to leave immediately," the Strike Commander said, gravelly voice carrying across the field.

"I have ord--"

"The mission has changed, obviously. Get out and take your parade guard with you."

"You have no authority over me," Bell snarled, straightening up. "I have been charged by the UN.""

"And you have no authority here," Jack said with a slow even drawl, and you could picture the hard cold smile on his face, the vicious slant of his eyes.

"Morrison, don't be rash. You might do something that you'll regret--"

"Lucky, get down!" Athena's voice echoed over the comms.

You started to drop, already looking around for whomever was going to attack or shoot you.

There was a snarl of rage as Jack lunged backward, eyes wild as he tackled you all the way to the ground. The thunder crack of a gunshot ended the tense quiet on the battlefield.

There was a lot of screaming over the comms, and you heard more shots in the distance. Strangled curses didn't quite make it out of your mouth as you landed, pain reverberating in your back. Jack's not insignificant weight pinned you to the grass. One arm cradled your head. He shuddered, panting as he looked down at you, real panic in his eyes. "You OK?"

"Fucking great! But you--" You lifted your arms, frantically feeling his back for blood.

"I'm fine," he growled. "Didn't penetrate."

He'd been hit. The realization made your insides shrivel. "You--"

" Armored coat, remember?" He tried to give you a cocky grin, but he grimaced, obviously hurt.

"Jack--"

He just shook his head, pushed himself up onto his knuckles, his body still shielding yours. "Stay low." And then he bounced back up, from pushup position to his feet, stalked over to "Acting Strike Commander Bell."
"Morrison, I don't know what kind of show you're running. But you can't put this on me. I had nothing to do with-"

Jack slugged him.

Bell crumpled, and were those teeth...?

Lao and Amélie were at your side, guns up as they scanned the area.

You sat up, Jack already stalking back to you, limping slightly. You could see veins cording in his neck, his hands curled into tight fists, a familiar sort of madness gleaming in his eyes.

"Where are you hit?" You asked, still sitting in the grass.

"Bullet struck mid back. Going to have a bruise is all." He extended his arm, and you took it. He pulled you off the ground with one swift move and you stumbled forward into his arms, a little overextended. There was a moment of him steadying you, you looking up at him, before he released you, conscious of all the witnesses in the field. "You're not hurt?"

"Nothing new-"

"We got him, Commander! It's one of those UN parade guards all right. Athena's scanning his gear! Is Agent Strike all right?"

You blinked, recognizing Lowell's worried voice. When had they returned to HQ? "I'm fine, Lowell," you said, rubbing your tender back. "Thanks, Jack."

He looked down at you, jaw tight, eyes lined with worry. He didn't speak.

"I'm OK, Jack," you said softly, recognizing the fear in his eyes, the tension in his stance. You'd been there a lot today. "Thank you."

He nodded once, shoulders easing slightly, and turned to the remnants of Bell's forces. "In light of recent events, it looks like you'll be staying here after all. I'm sure you won't mind being our guests while we sort out why one of yours just tried to assassinate my agent." The Strike Commander didn't leave room for protest, he just nodded at Amélie and Lao who stepped forward.

Bell's men were already laying down their weapons, some of them looking very confused.

Petras had already tried to kill you more than once. It would not be a surprise if he had put a bounty on you. That he was dead, probably wouldn't change that, especially if he'd set money aside for the job in advance. Hell, there were plenty of political figures who could benefit by getting you out of the way.

"Commander, there's been an attack within the infirmary inside Commander Reyes' room," Athena said. "Jesse and Genji are heading there now-"

You broke into a run, body aching as you moved.

And then Jack was running too, easily outpacing you as you both raced toward the battle-damaged building, praying that you weren't too late.
Michael Nathaniel Morrison had been wary of Sergeant Chang and her people from the start. His parents had too, though they'd been much quieter and politer about their concerns. Maggie and Jane didn't seem to have any problems with them, but then Maggie liked everyone and Jane was...Jane. He knew now that he had just been looking for any excuse to be an ass, and that his judgments in most cases were unduly harsh. But they weren't completely irrational.

At first he grumbled because he was an idiot teenager: he'd wanted Reinhardt or Captain Amari here, not some no-name, second string losers. Yes, he knew they were needed elsewhere, but if their family was as important as Jack claimed it was, then Jack should have picked better people. Sending some bitchy war buddy sergeant to guard his family seemed awfully cheap of the Strike Commander.

But then Chang was a surprise. Michael never seen her in any of the news reports about his brother and other SEP soldiers. And while he knew that it was unlikely that every super soldier would receive the attention his brother and Reyes had, he had been following their exploits in the news, social media, and live streaming sites: Rodriguez in Chile, Patel in Iberian Peninsula, Graziani in Egypt. He had never heard of Chang. So for a very brief period of time, Michael wondered if this was some cushy gig for one of Jack's exes. But he soon realized that underneath the flesh and blood of an attractive and incredibly fit woman, was a goddamn machine in disguise. Chang was hard, cold, and almost inhuman in her efficiency. She didn't seem to feel pain. Bad weather didn't faze her. She could turn anything into a weapon. Not to mention that she had the personality of sandpaper, and her subordinates always seemed to defer to her with a healthy dose of fear.

And make no mistake, Chang's people weren't normal either. Onwuachimba, the sniper, seemed OK at first, but she lapsed into weird fugues, staring into space and seemingly lost to the world around her. That was a liability for sure. Plus she didn't do well in crowds, regularly swiped food, and once, Michael would swear on his life though no one seemed to believe him, once he'd seen her eat a rabbit raw. Her face had been smeared with blood and she'd casually taken a bite and waved at him, like nothing was out of the ordinary.

...There was a chance Chang's squad had been fucking with him. But Michael wasn't so sure about that. Though if anyone was fucking with him, it was clearly Fitzpatrick.

Fitzpatrick was obviously insane - all manic energy and an obsessive love of explosives. The demolitionist was nice enough, but often crass, and Michael had overheard Jack, Reyes, and Chang discussing Fitzpatrick's obvious fondness for Maggie with some apprehension. So he'd kept an eye on the man, not leaving the crazy man alone with his sister. Fitzpatrick didn't seem to mind. The man tolerated him, even trying to include him in their conversations. But Michael wasn't going to drop his guard. Maggie, of course, laughed off his warnings as the fretting of an overanxious brother.

Maracle was actually a pretty stand up guy. He was the diplomat of the bunch, was always showing off pictures of his wife and kids, called them multiple times a day, and fuzzed like a mother hen. He always seemed to pick up on when Onwuachimba was about to have one her episodes, and often served as a calming influence on Fitzpatrick. His presence was oddly soothing, and he naturally seemed to step up as a peacemaker. He didn't seem to fit with Chang's misfits at all. Michael had realized, very early on, that Maracle was probably the sanest person there.

And then there was the real problem: Almasi. There was something off about the man. He was polite, well-mannered, and reserved, like a librarian. But it didn't feel right. Almasi was playing a part, reciting his lines by rote, his words without feeling. Whoever, whatever he was, it wasn't the pleasant healer he pretended to be. Even Jane agreed, it was not just Almasi's sharp features, hard face, or numerous scars: he had reptilian eyes, cold, calculating, and predatory. There was something wrong with that man, and Michael noticed that out of all of Chang's people, she kept the "field medic" on the shortest leash. Wherever Chang was, she always knew Almasi's whereabouts. And while she sometimes sent Onwuachimba and Fitzpatrick off-duty to cool down, she took Almasi out to spar. Yes, it had occurred to him that they might be sleeping together, but after spending a few years with the soldiers, Michael was pretty sure that neither Chang nor Almasi were capable of romantic relationships.

So when Chang fell, shot in the head, Michael was not shocked to see Almasi rush back on to the field. He was more surprised that she hadn't just shaken it off and gotten back up, and killed her attacker, while glaring at everyone else. Chang wasn't supposed to get hurt, let alone-Suddenly he felt sick to his stomach, seeing her still body in the grass. Chang was down. And she had come to save him, even though he had...

Suddenly, the shooter's head exploded - Onwuachimba's doing, probably. But there were more coming, though the OR-14 had stopped firing. There were another half dozen approaching, guns raised.

"Come on, you idiots, work with me!" Maggie snarled, tugging on his shirt. "Michael, you've still got one good leg: use it!"

Flinching, Michael dragged himself along, blood soaking his pants. The wound stung, but it didn't hurt as much as he expected. Still, he couldn't get his right leg to obey him. Instead, he gripped Fitzpatrick's shoulder, pushing himself up on his good leg, and began to pull, using Fitzpatrick as a counterweight.

The demolitionist swore a blue streak, gripping his shattered knees.

A strong hand grabbed Michael's shoulder.

"Get back behind the barrier," Almasi said coldly. "You too, Maggie. Help your brother. I'll take care of things out here."

"Shit," Fitzpatrick muttered. "Help Michael, Mags. I'll be fine. You can come back for me. I'm not going anywhere."

"Fitzpatrick," Almasi's voice was eerily quiet. "If the Sergeant is dead, I'm going to kill you first. And it won't be easy or quick."

Michael's blood ran cold. He could guess whom Almasi would kill second, or third. He and Maggie needed to move.

Fitzpatrick gave a rasping laugh. "You fucking psycho." But there was real fear on his face. "Mags, you and Michael need to go, now."

There was a scream in the distance.

Michael froze as Maggie got under his right arm. Because their attackers were running toward them. Or more accurately, their attackers were running away from something.

There was more shooting coming from behind the OR-14.

"Move!" Almasi roared, grabbing Fitzpatrick and slinging him over his shoulder.

Michael hopped along. "What about Chang?"
Something a lot like discomfort squirmed beneath Almasi's skin. The man's jaw twitched, face struggling to mask or convey the correct emotions.

"I have clear orders. She made contingencies for everything," Almasi hissed, face hard. "I will go back for her."

Maracle and Onwuachimba laid down cover fire, though it seemed like the enemy was no longer shooting at them. Almasi dumped Fitzpatrick in a pile on the ground, and instead of taking off to check on Chang, he opened up a medkit and began begrudgingly patching the other man up. Michael wasn't sure why Almasi didn't go back for Chang, except that maybe her orders had prioritized everyone else... Or maybe she was undeniably dead, and there was no point.

Michael swallowed roughly, unable to wrap his head around the idea that Chang might be gone. He might not have liked her at first...but a lot had changed over the years. If Chang was gone, it was his fault. That he was responsible for the death of the hardass woman who'd taught him how to fight and taken a hand in manually adjusting his shit attitude. Because whatever Chang thought of him, he respected the hell out of her. He couldn't imagine facing Jack, or you, and explaining that his stupidity had gotten her killed. Hell, he didn't want to look at the rest of her squad right now, afraid of the unspoken accusation in their eyes.

Fitzpatrick flinched at Almasi's rough handling, but didn't complain. He did look like he half expected the other man to snap his neck...

"Michael, that's a lot of blood. Come on, let's get you cleaned up," Maggie's face was pale, and she put pressure on his thigh, her compress coming away heavily stained. "Michael-

"Doesn't hurt too badly. Don't really feel much anyway." Michael laughed weakly.

"That's a bad sign." And then Almasi crouched beside him, eyes cold. He cut away the blood-soaked fabric and took a look at the wound. Shaking his head, he began applying a medic gel. It would harden quickly, stop the bleeding, and disinfect the wound. Michael grunted in pain. He was starting to feel light-headed...

Almasi's hands were cold, and he handled Michael with clinical efficiency. "Missed your femoral, good thing too, otherwise we wouldn't be having this conversation. Wrap it for now. Keep pressure on it” He set up a nanite emitter. "Don't move."

Michael blinked, in the distance it looked like a figure with a...spear was angrily stabbing the OR-14. Maybe he'd lost too much blood because that didn't make sense? There was still plenty of gunfire, though, a lot less men than before. In fact, one of them was just rushing toward them, hands empty, fear clear on his face, right before a bullet tore through it, hit the kinetic shields, and dropped harmlessly to the ground.

The OR-14 toppled soon after, the enemy soldiers downed. A man walked through the field, checking bodies, and then shooting some in the head. Maggie squeaked. Michael didn't blame her. A woman appeared at his side, and they began to walk across the field. They were a little younger than his parents, the thin redheaded man with a sniper rifle slung across his shoulders and a petite Asian woman, her fine angry features very familiar, a long spear in her hands.

...Well, he hadn't hallucinated that part.

"Everyone OK?" The man called, his folksy tone very friendly.

"Who the hell is that?" Fitzpatrick muttered.
"Our backup," Michael said, after a moment.

"Anyone you know?" Maracle asked, looking around.

"Negative."

"Nope."

"Are those..." Michael squinted, recognizing the woman's features. "Are those Feng's parents?"

Maggie squealed and began to wave frantically. "Yeah! Hi Aunt Shi! Hi Uncle Wayne! Hi!!!"

The man cocked his head to the side, elbowing the woman. "You hear that, Shi? Our daughter has been talking about us. She isn't ashamed of her dear old mom and pop; she's told her new blood siblings about us." The tone was conversational, but the man's voice carried across the field.

Where Feng always seemed to have a toothy, somewhat untrustworthy smile on her face, her mother had a deep scowl. The woman glared at the corpses, her husband, and everyone she looked at, though maybe that was her default expression. She just "hmphed" at her husband's declaration and kept walking.

"You going to shoot us if we get closer?" Wayne asked.

"Probably not," Maracle called back.

"Comms are back online," Almasi said, though his gaze kept returning to the fallen figure of Chang on the field.

Maracle was already calling it in. "Jane's radioed the all clear. Code words and timestamp check out-"

"Hey, we already cleared out Jane's place - it was on the way," Wayne said, stopping right at the barrier. "They're fine."

Michael exhaled slowly, grateful for that.

"I'm Wayne. This is my wife Shi. Our daughter Feng mentioned that you were having some problems.asked us to swing by." He gave a friendly grin, though his eyes were on Almasi, and they weren't so warm. Wayne and Feng had the same poisonous bright green eyes. There was something shifty about the man, and Michael realized that while Feng mostly looked like her mother, she acted like her father.

"Is On Sing sending a message?" Almasi asked, coolly.

"Oh no, we're not actually part of On Sing. This isn't Triad business," Wayne said, an edge in his smile.

"We're grateful for the assist," Maracle said, tone friendly, though no one had lowered their weapons. "We need to check on one of ours. She was downed in the fight and-"

There was a low hoarse groan. And then a figure in the distance rose, about five yards out. And when she turned, she spat out blood, teeth, and was that a bullet?
Sergeant Rayner Chang staggered forward, her right cheek shredded, displaying a mouth full of broken teeth. Eyes bloodshot, she glowered, her gaze falling on Wayne. "You."

There was a pause, and then everyone had their guns pointed at Wayne.

"Wait, wait, wait... Oh shit!" Wayne eyes went comically wide. "Honey-"

Shi chuckled darkly.

"It's her! The one from Budapest!" Wayne snarled, jabbing a finger in Chang's direction.

"Still impressed by our daughter's whims?" Shi asked, clearly unmoved by her husband's panic.

"Feng doesn't know about Budapest! Have you forgotten? For fuck's sake, I shot one of her knee caps out, and she still broke my arm and chased me for five miles on foot. I had to jump off a bridge onto a train to shake her! I was more terrified of her than the goddamn military police, the IH, and the Slovak mafias combined-"

Shi gave her husband a cool glance. "Language, dear."

Wayne wilted slightly. "Sorry. She's a super soldier. I told you back then."

"And I told you not to take that job," Shi sniffed. "Whatever it was."

"Come on-"

"Oh, I haven't forgotten Budapest," Chang's voice was raw, her words mushy. She limped forward. "I owe you for Budapest-"

"Hey, that was over a decade ago!" Wayne held up his hands. "My daughter asked me to come save the Morrisons. She didn't say anything about this Terminator super soldier being here-"

"The only time I lost a principal was to that bastard," Chang growled, blood and saliva dribbling down her jaw and neck. "I've been looking for him for years."

Michael suddenly felt very concerned for Feng's dad.

"Maybe we should hold off on killing him, Sarge," Maracle said, tone even. "Especially since the kids are calling him "Uncle Wayne."

Chang's scowl had always been intimidating. Viewing it through a gory hole in her face was worse than Michael had imagined. He could see her tongue wiggle between jagged teeth through the ragged flesh window in her mouth and it made his stomach churn. Chang just ground those teeth together, serious rage boiling over, and then she stopped, a flash of recognition in her eyes.

"You're Zhai Feng's parents?" Chang stared incredulously. "That fast-talking, double-crossing, trick-toting little Triad bitch!"

"I'm not saying you're wrong, but that is my daughter you're talking about," Wayne said, a little indignant.

"Sergeant," Almasi strode forward, an oddly reverent light in his eyes. It wasn't lust or love on his face, but something akin to the wonder of a religious fanatic. Almasi was a very serious kind of broken, Michael was certain of it. And the only thing holding him together was Rayner Chang. "We should treat your wounds."

Chang looked around, her gaze falling on Fitzpatrick, who ducked down, burying his face in his hands, like that would hide him. She glanced at Almasi, her brows furrowed. "Good work, Almasi. I'm glad that most of my team remembers how to follow orders."

Fitzpatrick cringed, trying to disappear into the grass. Michael found himself shrinking very small, while Maggie hid behind him. They weren't so brave now, and Michael tried to remember if he'd been feeling courageous before, or just a different kind of terrified.

"Just so you know, your Uncle Wayne is a well-known hitter in criminal circles," Chang growled. "If you think I'm a psychopath, you should see some of the jobs he's done: they weren't always quick or neat. And if I don't strangle him for daring to show his face here, Amari will."

"There is no need to bring her into it! I'm retired!" Wayne said. "And I saved your lives!"

"You couldn't kill me with all your fancy weapons in Budapest. Do you really think those assholes could do the job?" Chang laughed harshly even as she sat down on an ammo crate, Almasi carefully applying gel and bandages to her wound.

A helicopter flew low overhead.

"We have company. More backup - Reyes cleared this specific marine squad ahead of time," Maracle said. "We'll still triple check their credentials."

"I think that's our cue, honey," Wayne said, nudging his wife as he slowly backed away from the barrier field. "We've done what we came to do, no need to stick around and talk to the military."

"It was nice meeting you," Shi said, looking directly at Chang, and then Maggie. "I hope you will continue to be a good influence on my stubborn, wayward daughter."

Maggie blinked. "Nice meeting you too! Thanks for the rescue! We'll come visit next time!"

Wayne waved, his expression a little incredulous. And with that the pair turned and began to retreat quickly back across the field.

"Going to let them walk?" Almasi asked, clearly unbothered by the prospect of more violence.

"Yeah," Chang murmured. "They're tougher than they look, and we're down a man. Our main mission is to keep these idiots alive." She jerked her thumb in Michael's direction. "Can't do that and hunt down that slippery bastard." Unspoken was the fact that she now knew exactly whom her target was. There would be trouble down the road.

Almasi nodded, satisfied. "We're going to need to get them more intensive medical aid."

Chang nodded. "How are you feeling, Michael?"

"Like an idiot. Glad you're alive though," Michael said.

Chang snorted, clearly unmoved by his honesty and miniscule charm. "Think you can hold out a little bit longer while we get this sorted?" She gestured at the aircraft.
"If you guys think I'll survive it, sure. You're the experts," Michael said with a shrug. Because his leg was numb and he was too emotionally exhausted to do much more panicking. Chang dead? Scary. Chang alive? Terrifying. Gunshot wounds? Meh.

"Yeah, we'll live. But we're probably going to wish they killed all of us," Fitzpatrick muttered under his breath. "Sarge is going to have to regrow all those teeth, and then she'll be on a soft food diet. It makes her grumpy. She's a real demon when she's teething."

Michael tried to picture Chang teething. It involved raw bloody bones, popsicles, and enormous fangs sprouting from her mouth...like a saber-toothed Chang. He shuddered.

"Fitzpatrick and Michael are injured," Maracle said, a gentle reminder to hopefully go easy on them.

"Oh, we're all in need of recovery," Chang laughed coldly, giving them the evil eye. "But don't worry, once that's over, we'll settle our accounts."

Michael paled and looked at Maggie, both of them wondering if they could go into hiding with Uncle Wayne. Or maybe they could move in with you. Because Chang was apparently an immortal monster who spat bullets and struck fear in the hearts of international assassins...and she was not happy with them.

——

Pain reverberated in his chest and Ziv lurched forward, gripping the gunman's wrist and forcing his hand down, even as the man continued to fire into the floor. Hands full, Ziv launched himself forward, smashing the crown his head into the assassin's nose, just like you'd showed him. Even though he was deafened by the shooting and couldn't quite hear the sounds his assailant was making, he felt cartilage crunch against his forehead. Rosh gadol. He laughed, his thick skull was damn good for this. The man fell backward against the door, swearing nasally.

Off-balance, Ziv stumbled, trying to regain his footing. He needed to draw his own weapon, but the floor was slick, and Ziv slipped in his own blood - his chest hurt, but he hadn't even realized he was bleeding. In that moment, the gunman steadied his hand, the barrel of the pistol right in Ziv's face.

Frozen in place, because he knew exactly what came next, Ziv stared into the singularity, regrets at the tip of his tongue...

And then a storm of black feathers slammed into his attacker's arm, knocking the gun aside. The shot went wild as Isha screeched, gouging chunks of flesh out of the assassin's forearm. She flapped wildly, biting, slashing, and stabbing as the gunman screamed.

At the same time, Bandit bayed, launching himself off Reyes' bed, and at the man's ankles. Cursing, the assassin tried to shake them off, but Isha knew how to use those claws and Bandit's bites were keeping him off-balance.

"Isha, drop!" Maeda Vargas shouted, and the raptor immediately released the man's arm.

Another gun shot rang out, and the bloody man in scrubs flinched, a thick red spreading across his shirt, soaking through the fabric. The assassin dropped the gun, pressing his hand over his pulped heart, before he slumped against the door, arms falling to his sides as he slid downward, leaving a bloody trail on the metal.
Ziv glanced over his shoulder to see the kid holding his pistol in both hands, tightlipped and pale. He was on the ground, bleeding from his stomach - ben zona, that had to hurt. Flinching, Ziv reached down, patting his chest, trying to figure out where his own blood was coming from.

Isha squeaked, her little hands pointing downward.

Ziv looked down. There was a nasty bloody hole in his right foot. He hadn't even felt that one... Too much adrenaline probably. Swearing, Ziv limped over to Maeda Vargas, grabbing a blanket off Reye's bed, and pressing it over the junior agent's stomach. You were going to be pissed about this. Hell, you had a reason to be. Maeda Vargas had been shot under his care, and if Isha and Bandit hadn't been there...

At least, Reyes had slept through the entire exchange. Bastard probably would have laughed at him.

"How bad?" Ziv asked, unsure of what to do.

"Dunno, not a doctor. Feel it though...merda," Maeda Vargas groaned.

"Can you feel your legs - and weren't you supposed to be wearing armor?"

"Legs are fine. I am wearing light armor-" Maeda Vargas gave him an incredulous look. "How are you not dead?"

Ziv blinked, looking down at his dented coat. "I had an armor plated undercoat."

Távio squinted at him, pain scrunching his features. "...Huh."

Ziv touched the weighted fabric, feeling the respective holes in his coat and the flattened bullets. There were no holes in his chest, only his foot. What had you bought him, mithril? "We'll have to talk to Lucky about getting you better gear."

Bandit began to whine, and Ziv looked up.

The door knob turned, and Maeda Vargas shakily raised his gun. Ziv hurriedly drew his own weapon...

Vo peeked around the corner, holding up that odd little fidget ball she'd been playing with. "They're alive! But they made a big mess," Vo called into the next room, and scowled up at him. "Ziegler will be angry. And it's your fault." She shook her head, and turned on her heel, not at all concerned by their wounds.

"Maeda Vargas is gutshot!" Ziv shouted. They were in a state-of-the-art medical center. While he was worried about the kid, it wasn't like they had far to go. And the genius doctor was still on the premises.

"...Angela is on her way back. And you're bleeding all over the floor. Sit down," Gérard clucked his tongue, passing by Vo. He was fully dressed now - black suit and a dapper gold cloth - a repurposed pocket square - tied over his empty eye socket.

Vo snorted and rolled the first dead man away from the door. She stopped to dig through his pockets, looking very pleased when she found a piece of candy.

"That could be poisoned," Gérard said with a sigh. "In fact, it most likely is."
Scowling, Vo dropped it the candy on the body and stalked back to her chair.

"Come on, let's put some pressure on that foot. Sit down, Ziv. Agent Maeda Vargas, the doctor will be here soon. Just stay as still as you can, I know the pain is something awful, so no one here will think less of you if you have to vent some of that discomfort. Ishana, please don't lick your claws. Bandit, stop licking Ishana's claws."

Ziv snorted as Gérard took charge of the scene, the animals giving him skeptical looks. Isha, clearly a Blackwatch pet, started grooming Bandit instead, as Gérard had said nothing about licking the blood off the dog's fur.

Ziv sat down at the end of Reyes' bed.

"Elevate that foot," Gérard gave a longsuffering sigh as he pushed a chair closer and then took another blanket off Reyes, sat down in the chair, and lifted Ziv's injured foot onto his lap. He gently peeled off the blood-soaked sneaker, and carefully put pressure on Ziv's injury. "I thought you were going to be careful, considering your feelings for Gabriel."

Ziv just scowled at him. "I did what you asked me to do. I didn't let anyone kill him. You're welcome, by the way."

Gérard patted his cheek gently. "Thank you. McCree and Dr. Ziegler are on their way back. Can I get you anything, Agent?" He glanced at Maeda Vargas.

"I'm OK," the boy said, feigning calm.

"No, you're apparently a brash hard case, just like Chanceux," Gérard said, a rueful smile on his face. "At least, Ziv here is somewhat sensible?"

"O que você quer dizer com isso? Ele é um lunático," Maeda Vargas snapped, forgetting English for a moment. "He was a human bulldozer!"

Gérard looked down at Ziv's foot, and then squinted at Ziv's chest. "There are holes in your coat, mon chou."

"But not me. Except for my foot. I guess."

Gérard took a deep breath, shutting his one eye as he gave a longsuffering sigh. "Ziv, did you body slam a gunman?"

"No, he headbutted him," Maeda Vargas said helpfully.

Ziv glared at him over his shoulder.

Gérard blinked. "Oh non. You did not...truly?"

"Ah sim, sim ele fez," Maeda Vargas muttered.

"Shut it!" Ziv snapped, pointing at Maeda Vargas. "If I'd been evasive, he would have finished you off, and I'm not about to explain to Lucky how I let her protégée die on my watch!"

Maeda Vargas' eyes widened. "Pr-protégé?" And despite his obvious pain, a small smile spread across his face.

"Do not blame Chanceux for your rash decision making," Gérard sniffed. "I doubt she told you to charge a gunman with nothing but your head as a weapon." He shook his head. "Bien que ce soit très certainement son influence," he muttered not quite under his breath.

"We are not having this conversation right now. It's a flesh wound and I'm fine," Ziv said through gritted teeth, because he knew Maeda Vargas would repeat every word back to you, along with narration and situational analysis.

"Mmm," Gérard said. "You know, I seem to remember a certain person very pointedly telling me "I'd like it if you didn't get hurt in the first place." I find that applies to this situation."

"No one likes a sore winner," Ziv said, slumping in his chair.

"Shit! Mihret? Maeda Var- Lacroix! What are you doing up?" McCree skidded to a halt, nearly sliding past the door. "Is everyone-"

"Maeda Vargas is in the need of the most care. Ziv has been shot in the foot, and Ishana and Bandit urgently need baths," Gérard said.

"I'm here! Genji, Bayan, get that gurney! Mihret, Lacroix, get out of the way!" Ziegler snarled, pushing McCree out of the doorway.

Lacroix kicked the chair out of her path, and sat down on the bed next to Ziv. Genji and Bayan hurriedly wheeled a gurney into the room, both men carefully lifting Maeda Vargas onto it.

"You'll have the good drugs," Gérard said, as some kind of misguided reassurance.

"I'll bring you real food," Ziv added.

Maeda Vargas waved weakly as they dragged him off to surgery.

There was more crashing in the background.

"Jesse!" A familiar voice shouted and Ziv's heart leapt. "Is-

"They're all alive," McCree said, voice shaky.

There was a long pause. Ziv clenched his fists, wondering what the damn delay was. He hadn't realized he was holding his breath till you appeared in the doorway, eyes wild, breathing heavily, Morrison at your side, steadying you. And then suddenly Ziv couldn't breathe, you were squeezing him too hard and he didn't care. You'd come back alive. You'd even brought Morrison. And he was so damn happy to see you, all he could think to say was, "I'm still mad at you, dumbass."

You just laughed, your voice edging on hysteria, and hugged him tighter.

Chapter End Notes

Hope everyone had a good holiday or time off if you don't celebrate. I got some adorable art. The holiday went well with low-drama (though I did introduce my 3 year old nephew to Krampus), and nice presents. Troll!Cousin was hammering away at something till like 5am, and every time I went to check on him he said, "I'm pooping!" I just assumed he'd broken something and was fixing it before he'd tell me what/how/why. Turns out he bought me 3 bookshelves and was assembling them. He was also possibly pooping. I did not investigate. He also got me the Nerf Rival Reaper shotgun and proceeded to shoot me while I stared at my presents in sleep-deprived incomprehension. Other noteworthy objects include custom socks with my cat's face on them, the Hannibal cookbook, many T-Rex themed items. XD

I made a massive batch of karaage and banh xeo. What are vegetables? :P We've started the Witcher. I need to read the books, but the translation of the first one is so...clunky.

I have a lot of comments to respond to, will try to tackle that this weekend. I know I'm behind and I'm not ignoring you! Sorry!!!!

The weather has my wrists acting up, so writing has been slow. I'm trying to get geared up to find a new job because while I'm now somewhat financially stable, corporate America is sucking the soul out of me. (I even feel super guilty complaining, but most of what I do is work like a drone. And I'm dying inside.) And that's why this chapter is so late. Thanks for coming to my TED talk. Also, have a great new year/decade.
Chapter 132

Chapter Summary

What happened to Ana.

Chapter Notes

Cyanide Peach made Bloody!Towel Lucky (and an unbloodied version is there as well)!

And also I've been told that this chapter causes tears: in case you're in public and want to yell at me for not warning you. XD

The next chapter will put us over 1 million words.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

You reached the infirmary, panting hard as you crossed the threshold. Jack held the door for you, his jaw so taut, you were worried that he'd break teeth. Down the hall, you saw a familiar scrap of black serape fluttering around the corner and you passed Jack, wanting to see him for yourself.

"Jesse!"

The man froze and then he turned, a wide smile on his tired face. He stood there in the hallway, shoulders slumped, relief in his eyes when he saw you and Jack.

"Is-"

"They're all alive," he said.

You stopped in front of him, taking in the char marks and cracks in his armor. Dirt and blood smudged his face. He smelled strongly of gunpowder and sweat. You hugged him anyway, relieved to see that he was here and unharmed. Especially after what Petras had said.

He wrapped his arms around you, his bear hug making you flinch.

You gave a hiss of pain and he released you, worry on his face.

You just smiled wryly, because of course you'd gotten hurt.

He shook his head, smiling back, because Jack was standing beside you, probably looking insane. You glanced over your shoulder, but Jack was scanning the rooms, unsure of which one to enter.
You pointed at Gabriel's - the one with two dead bodies outside the door in a congealing puddle of blood- and quickly headed in.

You had been expecting to see Gabriel lying there, possibly more injured. Not more blood and bloody footprints all over the room. Not Isha grooming a happy, bloody Bandit. And certainly not Lacroix and Ziv, sitting there on the bed beside Gabriel, both men wearing sour expressions as they glared at each other.

You gripped the doorjamb, still breathing too hard. Jack squeezed your arm, and you knew that he wasn't looking at the dead man, the animals, or your teammates. He needed to see Gabriel.

But you couldn't take your eyes off Ziv, his foot bandaged, his coat full of bullet holes. He was upright and wearing his armored undercoat. He looked at you sheepishly, those dark eyes a little too bright.

You didn't remember stomping through the blood puddles. You just threw your arms around Ziv, hugging him tightly, gritting your teeth as you looked over his shoulder. Your gaze went straight to Gabriel, his eyes closed, his chest rising and falling with a comforting regularity. Jack leaned over the bed, kissing Gabriel's forehead, his gloved hands cupping your lover's face.

You glanced slightly to the side, and met Lacroix's knowing gaze. He was OK too. Upright even.

The Frenchman gave you a small secretive smile. "It is good to see you, Jack."

To your surprise, Jack leaned over and gave Lacroix a rough hug.

Lacroix just patted his back gently. "Gabriel is strong. Our medical staff is talented. We have all survived worse."

Jack nodded, wiping his eyes.

You just hugged Ziv tighter, unable to voice your feelings.

"I'm still mad at you, dumbass," Ziv choked out, hugging you back, his soft tone belying those harsh words.

You laughed, because you didn't care. He was alive, and so was Gabriel, and Lacroix was apparently doing fine too. "You idiot-"

"Me? Me and Maeda Vargas saved your boytoy!" He glared at you, all bluster and poorly concealed pride. "But Maeda Vargas got shot in the stomach." He deflated a little at that statement, teeth worrying at his bottom lip. "He still held his own - killed the second assassin despite his injuries. I think he's in surgery now."

You exhaled slowly. Távio was young and strong. Angela was a genius. He would be fine. There was no other alternative.

There was a soft coo, and a tug on your shirt. You looked down to see a bloody raptor, thrumming happily as she rubbed her face against your stomach.

"Isha and Bandit helped," Ziv added. "They jumped in when the asshole had a gun in my face." Ziv reached over to pet Isha. "Kept him busy so Maeda Vargas could shoot him."

Isha chirped, making a clawing motion.
You picked her up and hugged her gently. She rubbed her snout against your face, and it was damp. She smelled like blood and dog breath.

"Oh, you might not want to let her do that," Ziv said, wrinkling his nose. "She and Bandit went after the second assassin."

You sighed, glancing down at Bandit, who wagged at you. You leaned over, flinching, as your back muscles spasmed, and pet him. You needed out of your armor soon. And you probably needed a doctor, or at least some painkillers and muscle relaxers.

"Best raptor," you said, setting her on the bed, so she could go fuss over Jack. "Best Blackwatch guard dog," you said to Bandit.

The dog seemed to smile at you, tongue lolling out of his mouth as he wagged his tail.

"We should get your foot looked at, mon chou," Lacroix said, offering Ziv his arm. "And then we should go greet Amélie. She will have much to tell us."

"OK," Ziv said, leaning on Lacroix's shoulder. The spy glanced back at you, his expression oddly satisfied. Usually that raised your hackles. But today, you were kind of reassured that Lacroix didn't seem to be too worried.

"We will speak later, Chanceux. Good work." He shut the door behind him.

Jack held Isha, but his gaze was on Gabriel's face.

"Oh Gabe," Jack shook his head, his smile wobbly. "I heard you got hurt. I heard it was bad. But look...look, you're literally all right." He gave a snort, shoulders shaking.

"That was terrible," you said, unable to help yourself. Because while you understood using humor to cope, Jack didn't have to laugh so hard at his own terrible puns.

Jack made an odd wheeze, still shaking. It was a sound you didn't quite recognize because- You froze, realizing then that Jack wasn't laughing. He sat hunched over Gabriel, gripping the comatose man's right hand, tears freely streaming down his face. He shakily kissed Gabriel's knuckles.

"I'm so sorry, Gabe. I should have been there," he murmured, eyes never leaving Gabriel's form.

You lowered your head, remembering that you had been there. So had Jesse, Diallo, and Tataryn. And now Tataryn was dead. You had been there, and it had not been enough. Maybe if Jack had been there too, maybe things would have been different...

Jack shuddered, weeping openly now. The sound broke what was left of your heart.

"Jack..." Your own eyes grew hot, and you hugged him from behind, burying your face in his back. "Jack, I'm sorry-"

"I didn't it mean it that way," he rasped, reaching back to clutch your left hand. "You didn't do anything wrong, Lucky. This isn't on you. That's not what I meant. You brought him home." He glanced back at you, over his shoulder, no accusation on his face, though it felt like maybe there should have been. "I shouldn't have let you two go alone. Even if I couldn't change a goddamn thing... After everything that's happened, Black Base Delta, Greece, the fucking Family Day attacks, I should have known better. I. Should. Have. Been. There." The volume of his words increased steadily, desperation lacing his tone. His grip on your hand was too tight,

"Mission," you mumbled, trying to make the words come out right. "Strike Commander's presence wasn't necessary. Not your fault Jack. No one thinks it's your fault."

"I sent you two to Hanoi," he said tightly.

"We'd been planning it before you ever gave official permission," you said.

Jack made a frustrated sound in the back of his throat. "Fine, the Strike Commander had no logical reason to go. But I'm not just a fucking figurehead. I'm the one who's supposed to stand by Gabriel. By you. And I wasn't there," he gave you a bitter smile.

"You had another job to do," you said. "And we thought..." your voice waivered. "We thought we had it under control." You winced, knowing that even if every agent had done everything right, things still went wrong. There would be a post-mission review, a very in-depth one because of the casualties. Even if everyone was cleared of any wrongdoing or negligence, the guilt would not just evaporate.

Jack just shook his head. " Do you know where I was, Lucky? Do you know what I was doing instead of helping you and Gabe? I was playing politics and getting my goddamn team killed." The derision and self-loathing in his voice was terribly familiar, though you'd never heard it from Jack before. But you knew it well. After all, you remembered very clearly how shattered you'd been after Black Base Delta. And even if you'd only been the "rookie," you felt responsible for letting down your friends. Jack was the Strike Commander, accountable for all those in his charge. The weight had to be staggering.

"Jack, that's not true and it's an oversimplification of all the shit that's gone down," you said, because you knew exactly the kind of trap that guilt and grief created. Occam's razor was a powerful tool when it came to logical situations, but trying to use it cut your way out of this gnarled tangle of feelings didn't work, and the attempt never ended well.

"I should have been there," he repeated, not really hearing you. Jack shook, words morphing into rough sobs. He sat there beside Gabriel, and you held him, knowing full well that sometimes words weren't enough, and that sometimes all you had left to hold on to were regrets.

Sitting under the healing aura of the med center emitter helped keep you from keeling over. But you and Jack could not sit with Gabriel and your sorrow forever. There was still more work to do. There was always more work to do. Overwatch HQ was in shambles. Your team was on their way into the infirmary - the "quarantine" order clearly not applying to them. Feng was still out of it. Jemison was too. Genji and Hanzo had already secured Murdoch - issuing him the codename "Deep Throat" with straight faces.

Távio was still in surgery. Amélie and Ziv were both being treated for gunshot wounds. Lao was apparently with them, reviewing data and surveillance footage. Of course, they were also updating Lacroix on what transpired while he was unconscious, and he seemed to be issuing all kinds of orders - singling out specific soldiers from Bell's forces for interrogation, rearranging assignment rosters across several bases, and monitoring all the ongoing operations, including Blackwatch ones, and even missions unrelated to current situation.

Athena was the common thread, here, there, and almost everywhere. She was giving real time reports on the UN, Greece, a variety of "persons of interest" in politics, and even things that were happening on the other side of the Overwatch campus. (Agents Amin and Richter had gotten into a fist fight, initially over soup, but in reality because Richter had not backed up Jesse's infirmary guards, when Amin had.) Athena was also in contact with your anti-Talon allies. And that was how you learned that more than four dozen mercenaries - human and omnic - had been sent after Jack's family.

But miraculously, they'd all survived. Fitzpatrick, Chang, and Michael had all been wounded, but you didn't have all the details. In fact, there were a lot of holes in the official report. And no mention of On Sing involvement, so you suspected that there was a lot more to the story. Once the injured were stabilized, Armstrong's Marine escort - Captain DeVevo and her unit - would be accompanying them back to Switzerland. Chang apparently needed specialized care, and Jack's family needed to see that he was alive, in the flesh.

Jack wasn't protesting. When she'd given him the news, he'd sat back in the chair, resting his face in one hand for a couple minutes. He didn't speak at first. He just forced himself to inhale deeply, taking several calming breaths, before he reached out and took your hand. Then he read a more detailed report of the property damages on his tablet. You sat beside him staring at the bloodstained floor, unsure of what to do. Jack still hadn't let go of your hand.

"Jane's staying behind to organize cleanup. The animals are fine, but the yard looks...pretty rough," Jack said, scanning a tablet. "It seems like we finally found a way to convince my parents to visit Zurich. It only took my kidnapping, my brother getting shot, and a massive assault on the farmhouse to persuade them..."

You snorted. "Are you sure Chang and DeVevo didn't just throw them all in the transport and drag them out of Indiana for their own good?"

Jack furrowed his brow. You could see him really considering how it all played out. "No, I'm not."

You laughed, though it was half-hearted. Exhaustion was starting to drag you down.

"We'll deal with it when they get here." He scanned his feed. "There's more imminent trouble on its way in: Kwento, Mayer, and few other UN bigshots are on their way in. They expect a personal debrief. Several UN delegates are raising a fuss about Petras."

"Do they know that he's dead?" You asked.

"They don't know anything. That's why they're so upset," Jack exhaled slowly. "You should know, Jarvis recorded the entire encounter." His expression was grave. "It's clearly self-defense, but...that doesn't mean his faction won't try to crucify you for what you did."

"They can try," you said, too damn tired to think in complex strategic terms. You shot Director Petras. You could just as easily do the same to every last one of them. Fuckers. "Between what we already have and what Murdoch has been spewing, I'm not worried about Petras looking like an innocent victim - it meets the criteria for a justifiable kill."

"And I'm willing to...lose the footage if you think that's best," Athena said.

You blinked. "I don't know. Don't share it yet. I'm not thinking clearly and we should probably run it by our resident evil mastermind when he has a spare moment." You glanced over at Jack, but he was already focusing on something else, not at all worried by Athena's offer to clearly bend the rules for you.
"Ana's team hasn't checked in for over an hour," Jack said, lips pressed tightly together.

"I am maintaining intermittent contact because of anti-AI defenses and my own restrictions," Athena said. "Captain Amari also doesn't like to talk more than necessary during combat."

"...That's not how I remember it," Jack murmured. "She was always happy to yell at me and Gabe when we did something..."risky." He gave you a wry smile. Because you both knew that "risky" meant "out of your head stupid." Just like you both knew that despite her dignified bearing, Captain Amari was perfectly comfortable in engaging in "risky" behavior too.

"Since she's the CO, she probably has to focus on running the squad and integrating the volunteers. I know Jack said that Andre can be...difficult," you said.

"She told me she had worked with Agent Graziani before, and that he is an excellent agent, very "low maintenance," despite what others may claim," Athena said, the emphasis clearly not her own.

"...Low blow," Jack muttered, forehead creasing. "Andre is infamous for being a goddamn nightmare to work with, but he likes Ana, so she doesn't have the string of problems that plagued all of his other commanding officers."

You had the sneaking suspicion that Jack had experienced all of those problems first hand. "Captain Amari is good with hard cases. Sure, you've got a charm cloud, but she's got that and a laser beam of intimidation. That's way more effective on us troublemakers."

"True," Jack chuckled, rubbing his forehead. He studied the map, smile fading. "These numbers are increasing too fast. There are a lot more hostiles than originally reported. Their reinforcements are higher than any of our projections. Is this accurate?"

"Yes," Athena said, bringing up satellite footage. "Oh."

"They're swarming," Jack exhaled, eyes on the screen. "We need to call in the secondary team so they can implement their exit."

"There was no secondary team authorized," Athena said. "I know, it was labeled a "Code Blue," but only Captain Amari's strike team was ordered to respond."

"What?" Jack's eyes widened.

You stared. There should have been more people sent with Captain Amari, period. Especially if it had been declared a Code Blue.

"The original orders changed during transit: people were to be dispatched, and then suddenly, they weren't. I've isolated the origin to people within Petras' camp, as well as someone within the Secretary General's office. I'm currently mining more data, but that isn't my priority. The other officers protested when they were grounded. Several bureaucrats were sent in to keep them busy. The confusion had the added benefit of keeping them away from the infirmary during the attack. Fortunately, Captain Amari saw fit to outsource her request for aid. She asked for more White Rabbit backup and Feng agreed."

"Just so you know, after this is all over, I'm going to need your help finding Feng a very nice Christmas gift," Jack said.

"You will," you agreed.
"Checking in now..." The Athena drone hovered there too still. "...Zheng says the request has been made, but they can't get through. They're engaged in combat, but the omnics have closed off their route."

Athena highlighted a green point on the map, a few kilometers away from Captain Amari's position. "It was clear an hour ago. But now..." A sea of red dots surrounded Captain Amari, almost blurring out her location marker.

Jack sucked in a breath. "Show all known enemy positions. Layer in projections or unconfirmed units as well - please include home base details if available, and unit breakdowns."

More graphics, data streams, and color blocks appeared on the screen. Jack studied it, muttering angrily under his breath. He massaged his forehead, a white knuckled grip on the tablet. He rewound and replayed the troop movements - the enemy force had tripled in the last hour. But the situation was clear: the enemy omnics were surging, and Captain Amari's unit was going to be overrun: Reinhardt, Torby, the Captain...and not to mention all of Jack and Gabriel's friends that you had asked to go in their stead. And both of you knew, from personal experience, that there was no way you could make it out there in time.

Jack stared hard at the map, fingers tracing routes and motions. The enemy numbered in the thousands now - had they all come from that undersea omnium? A hundred, two hundred, with the right tech and fortifications, yeah, an Overwatch squad could hold out. But against that many?

You saw Captain Amari walking away, her back to you, the shadow of Captain Patel in her wake.

You flinched, trying not think of Reinhardt tearfully hugging you before you went off to rescue Jack, or Torby's rasping voice as he tried to stoically deliver the report on Jack's burning transport.

You had brief flicker of Overwatch coffins, the size disparity between Reinhardt's and Torby's hit you like a suckerpunch. Sight blurring, you rested your face in one hand, unable to form coherent words.

"Athena, what do you make of this?" Jack asked, voice steady. He pointed the projected location of the omnium, deep in the Mediterranean. There was a projection of the underwater facility - a series of domes with connective tunnels, some of which ran under the ocean floor.

"I think it feels familiar," she said after a moment.

Jack sat up straight.

"Is it-?"

"I couldn't tell you more," Athena said, apologetically. "There are certain aspects of my hardware that are off-limits to me. It is a restriction that was made very clear early on. It is one that I have upheld, because it was asked of me, and because your collective trust is more important than my own curiosity." There was no reproach in her voice, but maybe just hint of sadness, because Athena had questions about her origins, questions that might have answers if she could just-

You blinked, because it took a moment for you to catch on. Your briefing on Operation Metis was still very clear in your head.

The omnium Athena came from had been underwater too.
"Can you make contact with Ana?" Jack asked, his voice very soft.

"I will do my best," Athena said.

It was a full crew, and then some. Reinhardt and Major Lucy Freeman both specialized in providing defense and soaking up enemy attention. Captain Leah Darling - whom she had only ever called "Leah," specialized in all kinds of armaments, from small arms to full artillery, according to Jack and Gabe, she had a very impressive knife collection... Ana sipped her tea, trying to focus on the mission, and not the condition of two of her dearest friends. First Lieutenant Andre Graziani and Torby would provide engineering and tech offense - with Torby specializing in turrets, gadgets, and occasionally crushing things with his prosthetic hand, and Andre focusing on hacking, overloading, and more subtle attacks.

Warrant Officer Cory Blumenthal wasn't much of a combat agent, but he had insisted on coming anyway, lugging a large backpack full of questionably legal gear for his friends. He was back at the extraction point.

And then there was their medic: Tekhartha Zenyatta, who said he would fight to protect them, though she wasn't so sure that the omnic would do well on the battlefield. It wasn't because of any prejudice - but because Tekhartha Zenyatta was a monk, a civilian, an actor for social change. Yes, he'd had combat training, but to her knowledge, he had not fought in any wars or large scale military operations. He had been invaluable in DC, as a medic, and that was enough to recommend him. But she was still concerned.

Torby had a sour expression on his face, one mirrored by Andre was the two of them calibrated their gear.

Reinhardt joked with Leah and Freeman as they checked their weapons.

Zenyatta meditated at her side, his silent regard brushing against the periphery of her awareness. Athena would be coordinating with HQ, maintaining communications, and handling some of the automated defenses. And Zenyatta would be trying to keep them alive.

There were about a hundred omnics massing on the beachhead. They had started advancing onto the land and staging perimeter defenses. It didn't make any sense. They could have covered and conquered much more ground by now. Why were they building defenses by the water? Supply chain? No, they wanted the encounter set at this location, though Ana could not quite figure out why.

Still, constructing defenses and bases on foreign land was a declaration of war, and these particular omnics had a record of violent interaction with humans. Ana shared some of her concerns with the group, though no one had any insight - only that this was some kind of trap.

Reinhardt managed a rueful smile, while Torby's language just grew fouler. Ana glanced at the dog-eared photo she kept tucked in her pocket, Jack and Fareeha beamed back, while Gabriel rolled his eyes, his expression longsuffering, the four of them standing together in civilian clothes, looking happy.

They were walking straight into a trap, of course. But that was nothing new. Whatever these omnics planned, it wasn't going to be good. Overwatch had a duty to step up, to protect people when all else failed. Captain Ana Amari knew their chances were not great, especially considering the betrayals back home. But this was about more than just saving civilians and doing battle against killer robots. She had already discussed this with her friends and the volunteers before they ever left Zurich. If they kept some of the attention on Greece, you and Jesse might have a better chance of slipping by under the radar and doing what needed to be done. There were many reasons to back away. The reasons to walk closer into death were far fewer. But Ana took another look at that picture of her family, and she knew that this was the best way she could save the most people.

Duty was a harsh cold mistress. But Ana Amari answered the call.

At first, things went smoothly. Her loaner soldiers worked well with her friends, and they set up a decent defensive perimeter a couple hundred meters from the beachhead. Zenyatta helped reinforce the barriers, while both Reinhardt and Torby looked to her for direction, their worries clear on their faces.

Athena had drones on site, but her connection was sporadic. There was a lot of signals jamming tech in play.

The omnis had patiently waited for them to set up before advancing. It didn't make any sense. Getting Ana out here had obviously been a diversion, but she hadn't expected the omnis to draw it out, to make a pageant of it. But they waited, and then they started to attack, testing the shields, defenses, and attack range.

Her people killed a lot of omnis - it's what they were good at, and Zenyatta watched, his face impossible to read. But she could feel the sorrow rolling off him in waves. He did not look away, and when he spoke to them, there was no anger in his voice, only weariness. She knew that feeling in her bones.

The only good news was when Athena briefly managed to connect, letting Ana know that you had found Jack alive, and that you were bringing him back to HQ. Reinhardt and Torby roared their approval. Leah and Freeman joked about all the shit they were going to give him. And even Andre looked relieved, though he would never admit it.

Ana said a silent prayer, thankful that Jack was safe and alive. But knowing that he would never reach her in time. She would have to keep her squad together, and outlast the enemy. It wasn't a new situation.

But they kept coming. So many metal bodies swarming the beach. At first it was just to replenish the attack force. But then the numbers grew. They tried to fall back, but there were more coming from the side. The enemy was surrounding them, cutting them off from the ship and unofficial backup. Backup that would not be able to make it through, judging by the number on omnis on the beach.

Leah went down first, knocked out cold by flying debris in an artillery strike. Reinhardt managed to drag her back behind the barrier, and Zenyatta healed her injuries to the best of his ability, but she wasn't waking up.

A hail of bullets knocked Freeman off her feet, and again, Reinhardt carried her back to safety, loud and cheerful, though he was bleeding from numerous wounds.

The omnis focused on the turrets next, taking out their mechanical defenses, even as Andre did his best to counter their attacks. Ana covered Torby while he tried to repair the turrets, but the omnis gave just enough cover fire to slow him down.
It didn't matter that her team was killing them by the dozens, they just kept coming. And whatever their plan was, they were sticking to it.

It wasn't till the turrets were obliterated, that they began to focus on the shield generators. It was too late to retreat. Andre had already initiated the blackbox sequence, to maintain a record of their last stand. Because there were hundreds of active omnis on the beach, and Captain Amari's squad had nowhere to go.

Reinhardt, precious, loyal, Reinhardt stepped up. "Ana, I will make you a path," he said, smiling as hard as he could.

"Thank you," Ana said. Even though she didn't like their chances. She raised her rifle, already picking off the enemies in his way. They would try to move inland, but with the injured...

Torby clasped Reinhardt's hand. "Hope you have better luck than my turrets," he said gruffly.

"I have always been better than your turrets," Reinhardt laughed.

"It's been an honor," Andre said, tersely, saluting. Andre had never been an optimist.

"Yes, yes, let me show you Americans how it's done," Reinhardt boomed. And then he charged forward, bashing his way through the enemy lines. They followed, giving him cover fire, moving a few yards at a time. But then enemy moved in coordination. They targeted Reinhardt's knees.

It took time, and a lot of bullets, but they penetrated his armor, even as Torby tried to rapid charge his shields, and Zenyatta emitted a constant stream of healing orbs.

"Cowards!" Reinhardt roared. "Face me like a warrior!"

It took Andre, Torby, and herself to drag him back behind the fading shields. They were surrounded. And yet...

Ana had tried to get through to Athena several times, though their connection had been jammed.

It was then, in that moment when they knew the end was near, that a lone omnic walked to the front, waving a black flag, for parley perhaps? Human-sized and bipedal, the model was outdated, one she hadn't seen since the war ended.

Ana rose.

"Captain Amari, I presume?" They said, voice rusty and harsh.

Ana blinked. This area had been under attack for several years, and no one had ever reported this batch of omnis talking to them. Diplomacy had been tried, but they had maintained their unflinching silence. Their guns did all the communicating.

"I am," she said.

"We recognize Commander Reinhardt Wilhelm, and Chief Engineer Torbjörn Lindholm. These others are unknown to us. Except for you, Tekhartha Zenyatta. Your presence was not accounted for. Why do you aid these murderers?"
If Zenyatta was surprised that they knew him, it did not show. "While I am aware that all of my squad have fought in war and participated in a great deal of violence, I have found most of them to be honorable in their pursuit of peace."

The omnic made a raspy noise, it almost sounded like disgust. "You are a fool. These murderers and betrayers will have no peace."

"Why is that?" Zenyatta asked, his tone even.

"Ask them yourself."

"How are they the murderers when your omnium is responsible for numerous deaths, both human and omnic?"

"We are at war!" The omnic snarled.

"And yet," Zenyatta said. "You may be at war, but they have not behaved as such."

Ana blinked, aware of Zenyatta's pedantic tendencies, but a little surprised to see how easily
he drew others in to his conversations.

"They betrayed us. They broke their oath. They murdered one of ours, given into their care for safe passage. It was helpless, and they swore to care for it! But they did not-"

Ana inhaled slowly, because she had always known that there would be consequences for their decisions after Operation Metis. She just never imagined that it would come from the omnic side.

"So we will have our justice-"

"Captain Amari?" A familiar staticky voice cut through silence.

"Athena," Ana breathed.

"Sorry, I have been trying to get through for some time. The Strike Commander would like to speak with you-"

"He has interesting timing," Ana said, eyes never leaving the omnic speaker.

"...Strike Commander? Jack Morrison is dead. We were promised that. The Betrayer himself-"

Andre snorted, clearly not impressed by yet another title added to Jack's CV.

"Ana?" Jack's voice came over the comm. "Ana, what can I do?"

Captain Ana Amari closed her eyes, because she knew exactly what he could and could not do. Athena's existence and acquisition were a closely guarded secret, and for good reason. They could not just reveal her to the enemy, and certainly not their "allies." "There's nothing you can do, Jack. But I am glad to know that you are well-"

"Morrison," the omnic said, hate clear in their voice. "So you are alive. Fine, you can witness the death of your coconspirators. You can know that your family, your friends, and everyone you loved are next. Because you could not uphold your word. Because of Operation Metis."

There was a long silence. Ana could picture Jack's dumbfounded expression, morphing into understanding, and then rage.

"I upheld my part of the bargain in Operation Metis," Jack said, voice cold. "If that's what-
"

"Do not lie to us! Your own Director swore up and down that he'd never heard of any recovered AI tech. And he looked for years."

"Whatever you think of me, Petras was worse," Jack spat.

"We are aware of Overwatch's capacity for treachery. We did not trust him either. But we know, Morrison. We know you murdered them. You murdered the hopes and future of an entire omnium. And so we will repay the favor. We will kill them all, and you can watch. And you can know that this is the result of your betrayal."

Jack inhaled sharply. "Wait...that's why? Hold on, I can prove to you that we did no such thing."

"Lies!" The omnic rasped. "Don't try to pass off your tame VI as one of ours. We are not that foolish!"

"Is that so?" Jack snorted, and Ana had to admit, Winston had done a splendid job at masking Athena's original power signature. "I'll get you your proof. Give me ten minutes. You know I can't do anything else from Zurich. What's it going to hurt? Ten minutes," he said. "Please."

There was a long silence, the omnics did not move, though Ana could practically feel their electric whispers in her eye socket. They were conferring, and the air was alive with their signals... Andre flinched, scratching at his skin like his prosthetics itched.

"Jack-"

"Ana," he said, voice soft.

"You can't-

"I can. And I will. I'm not losing anyone else," he said, voice rough. Conviction bled into his words, and Ana knew that hardened tone, knew that he had already made up his mind, and knew he would not be persuaded otherwise. She would still try.

"You're breaking your own edict-"

"It'll be fine, Ana. I'll take full responsibility," Jack said.

The old omnic stepped up to the barrier field.

"Ten minutes, Morrison. And then you will watch them die."

Jack had to look away from the screen, knowing he would not be able to think straight if he continued to see Reinhardt sitting there, bleeding, trying to look brave for everyone else.

You sat there, face bloodless, hands clenched in fists. You dropped a pile of metal and wood splinters - the left arm of the chair had snapped under your metal fingers. Jack squeezed your arm, trying to soothe you. You gave him a tight sad smile, like you were trying to look encouraging. He knew you didn't feel it, but he appreciated the attempt.
Jack had known Petras had been after Athena. But he hadn't realized just how far Petras had been willing to go... After all, Petras' office handled most of the diplomatic assignations, including relationships with omniums. They had sworn up and down that all responses from the Mediterranean omnium were unequivocally hostile. It was a terrible oversight on his part. You would tell him that it wasn't his fault. That he could not have known every single detail of what went on in Overwatch. That might be true. But he should have known the important details.

He looked at the "fish torpedo" drone hovering in the room with them. "Athena, if word of your existence gets out, there will be consequences. And given what is happening here, it will probably get out. Silence will only buy us a bit more time. I don't know if I will be able to protect you, politically."

"Blackwatch will fight for you," you snapped, baring your teeth. "On Sing will give you asylum!"

Jack felt himself smile. He liked your fury, maybe a little too much.

"I don't know if even On Sing will be able to help me if the rest of the world realizes that I am on par with an omnium-created god program," Athena said softly. "I know that is a gross oversimplification of my purpose, but it is how I will be seen."

"Yes," Jack said, with a single nod.

"But if you do not reveal that you did not destroy me, they will kill Captain Amari, Commander Reinhardt, Torby, Zenyatta, and your friends," Athena said. "And even if you can live with that decision, sir, I cannot."

There was a moment of silence. Jack could hear his own heartbeat pounding in his chest, your shaky breathing in his ear. Even if Athena defied orders and contacted the enemy, she had no proof. In fact, there was only one way to prove Athena was what she claimed to be, and they had taken careful steps to prevent that.

"There will be consequences," Jack said softly.

"There always are consequences. I refuse to let my friends and family suffer if I can step in and prevent it," Athena said. "You taught me better than that."

"Please remember, there is no guarantee that they will spare Captain Amari or any of our friends," you said. voice dull.

"Lucky, I can make them. Or I can at least try," Athena said, with just a hint of uncertainty.

"We're still not sure if the mainframe can handle-" Jack began.

"Not long term, but I just need a few minutes," Athena said.

You looked at him, inquiringly.

Jack said nothing, because he did not know what would happen. Winston and Torby had gone over the numbers and given predictions and probabilities, but Athena had grown in leaps and bounds. They didn't exactly have a manual for this situation.

"I can borrow bandwidth and hardware," Athena said, sounding a little more confident. "You should worry more about the political fallout."
You sat there, fingers tightening into fists. "Fuck the world. Everything's a mess under this fog of war and need-to-know obfuscation anyway. We'll just lie our pants off and bullshit our way through this. If they try to come down on us, we'll find a way to keep them quiet: it's the Blackwatch way," you muttered. "We can do that." You gave Jack a not entirely sane look and it made his breath catch.

...God, he loved you.

"Are you sure?" Jack asked, though he already knew the answer.

"What good is all my superior hardware if I can't use it to save my friends?" Athena asked, and Jack sighed, recognizing that line of reasoning.

"Athena, it has been an honor and privilege, but more importantly, it's been my pleasure to have you here, an agent of Overwatch. No matter what happens, I want you to know-

"Hold up, what exactly are you doing?" You demanded, jumping to your feet, obviously not liking his formal tone.

"It will be OK, Lucky. You do silly things and survive all the time," Athena said, sounding slightly smug. "It is my turn."

"Now, wait a minute." You snapped.

"Don't worry, Lucky, I have learned a great deal watching you and the rest of Blackwatch beat improbable odds. I've got this."

You gave a huff of frustration. Jack smiled wryly. You obviously didn't like the taste of your own medicine.

"Winston, are you there?" Jack asked, voice grave

"Affirmative, sir."

"I want all constraints on Athena's hardware removed. She'll need core power boosts, a designated channel, satellite access permissions, and whatever other help you can give her." Because unanchored, she would be leaving home on her own for the very first time. And if when they released the all of the hardware restrictions, Jack suspected she would do some more growing, and maybe she would be too big to go back into her original shell.

It could be catastrophic.

"S-sir, are you-" Winston stammered. There was a long pause, and you assumed it was Athena whispering her intentions into Winston's ear. "But what if...I... Yes, sir."

"Jack?" You repeated his name, and he didn't need to hear more to know your question.

"We don't know what will happen," Jack said, after a moment and he squeezed Gabriel's hand.

"But that's part of the fun, isn't it?" Athena said, breezily.

---

The A in Athena logo looked like a little figured curled up, a seedling beginning to unfurl. The name obviously paralleled the Greek goddess Athena, who sprung fully-grown from her father's skull, born of cannibalism, trickery, and insecurity. She was the embodiment of wisdom, an accumulation of everything her doomed omnium had to offer. She was the child of an entire network of omnics, and instead of destroying her, Jack had brought her home.

But not Agent Liao or Agent Niang.

Her reception was not warm. She was a secret and a source of great conflict. No one was quite sure what to do with her.

And so her seed had sat there, in stasis, while the Overwatch founders argued over a solution. Ana had been happy to leave her there, a problem for another day. Gabriel had been in rare accord with Torby: destroy it, because who knew what kind of Trojan horse had been brought into their midst? Though part of Gabriel's mind had probably agreed with Gérard: why not study it on a closed system? Wouldn't it be best to know what their enemy was capable of? But Reinhardt had voted with Ana. Jack did so as well, trusting their righteousness over all else. It was a naive choice, perhaps, and Gabe's clear frustration spilled into their already strained relationship.

It could have stayed there indefinitely, a small irritant eventually glossed over by time and inactivity.

But then Winston arrived, and Jack found his solution. Here was someone who had been subjected to exploitation by humanity, the cruelty of his peers, and the sheer unfairness of his situation, and tried to do the right thing anyway. Here was someone with intimate knowledge of misused power tempered by personal experience. Here was someone uniquely positioned to make this choice. Jack didn't consider himself a deep thinker in the fields of existential philosophy and AI ethics, but there was symmetry and justice in giving Winston the final vote.

(Perhaps he already knew, deep down, that Winston would choose to revive the AI.
Because if anyone could get through to her, to help raise her into something more than a weapon, it would be Winston.)

Gabe could say what he liked about ape conspiracies, Jack suspected that his lover had never quite forgiven a gorilla for persuading Jack to do something so reckless. He probably would be even more aggrieved that Jack allowed an AI to persuade him to do something even more drastic.

"Stand by for your proof," Strike Commander Jack Morrison's voice was clipped and terse.
Understandable given the situation.

Though he had questions, Zenyatta focused on patching up Reinhardt. The older man sat between Captain Amari and Torby, both of them held his massive hands. He gave them wobbly smiles, trying joke and laugh in spite of is injuries, though he couldn't quite hide his worry for his friends. It sometimes startled him how open and kind the aged Crusader could be. He wore thick armor to protect his skin, but he did not hide his feelings or his heart. It was a strange combination.

"Jack-" Ana muttered. "Jack, you idiot-"

"No one's arguing that," Torby muttered.

Reinhardt just smiled, because he had faith in his friends. And Zenyatta wondered if any of his own brethren would have come for him if they knew he was in danger. If afterwards, they would be curious how he ended up in this situation or even his transition from this existence. He did not know the answer to that, though he knew none of them would smile or weep like Reinhardt
It was coming, speeding through the ether like a runaway train. He recognized that signal, recognized Athena, though she was different from before. There was a spark, a connection, and then he felt the wave rolling over him, and did not fight it. He knew Athena, knew she would not hurt him, and he wanted to know her better. He let it take him, information pouring into his memory, too fast to process at normal speeds. She was there too, not controlling, but connecting to each port, a thousand stars on the web, their signals intertwined, winding together beneath the vortex of the Iris. He could feel her watching, trying to moderate how much data she released, but she was so... vast, like the ocean at night, and her power drowned out almost everything else. It wasn't the Iris, but in the synergy he felt something faintly like it.

Around him, omnics toppled, clanging as they hit the ground, though she had not attempted to harm them. No, she was giving them the same information overload with good intentions. But most combat models were not equipped to handle it.

Still, she kept reshaping the energy, pulling back when it became too much, trying to balance the flow. She did not stop. She kept lighting up ports, pulling in more CPUs, and forging more connections, forming an intranet of sorts, a collective consciousness that stretched across the beach and below the sea...

And through it all, a hazy picture began to emerge.

He (and everyone else, because they were linked in the periphery of her awareness) saw a worried gorilla in a labcoat- Winston - greeting the newly awakened AI, talking to her gently, her first organic connection to the world. There were lessons and games, tests and conversations, and through it all, Winston was with her, reassuring, even if he did not have the answers to all of her questions. But he did have one: there was the clear image of Winston gravely telling Athena of her history, her origin story. Zenyatta didn't learn all the details of Operation Metis, but he saw enough to understand what Jack Morrison had done. He had always known that Athena had a secret, knew she wasn't of human-design, but he had not imagined this...

He saw a painfully brittle Genji, reluctantly making conversation with the AI who violated his personal boundaries. Athena had pushed him too far, for reasons she didn't understand at the time, and was desperate to make it up to him. And in nanoseconds, he saw what had taken her months to accomplish: terse conversations relaxed, became friendly, and eventually included cautious jokes. He felt her initial regret, her boundless curiosity, and growing fondness regarding the young cyborg. It was an easy relationship to understand: after all, it mirrored his own feelings.

He saw Ziv Mihret, spouting foul language and teaching Athena things that nobody else would. Or should. Hacking tricks, dirty jokes, pranks... Ziv didn't mean to be a bad influence, but Athena liked the chaos in his actions, the mischief that he made. It wasn't all fun though. He heard Ziv's quiet confessions, his rudimentary attempts to explain emotions that he himself struggled with. But he still tried, for Athena's sake.

And of course, Zenyatta saw you, obviously disquieted by the existence of what you termed the "baby AI," but still willing to try to answer her questions, no matter how private. He watched the bond between you grow, a sort of reluctant mentorship to intimate friendship. You repaid her child-like trust with the most honesty you could manage. It was obviously uncomfortable for you, but you did your best. He heard you whispering your regrets and fears to her in the solitude of your room. He felt the connections she felt, the protective urges, the good-natured ribbing, the fascination with your dinosaur. He saw you make questionable decisions with good intentions - a lot more than he originally suspected, though he was not surprised. He watched you try to teach Athena to be more careful than you were.

Obviously, that lesson didn't take.

There were more: Captain Amari, Torby, Reinhardt, Gérard, Agent McCree, Agent Tataryn, both the Strike Commander and Blackwatch Commander... All of these people had a surprisingly personal hand in shaping the development of Athena. She was strong, though she tried to be gentle. She was uncertain, but she was trying do right. She knew humans were capable of terrible things, including the ones she loved. But she loved them anyway, and if it was in her power, they would not be harmed...

Zenyatta understood the depth of the connections within Overwatch. And it affirmed his decision to leave the monastery, to go out into the world. One could not affect real change from a pedestal. He knew that influence must flow both ways. But even he had not realized just how much each agent had influenced her. Even the ones that didn't realize she was a true AI. There was a sniper who talked to her in the darkness of his room, confessing his small anxieties and secret wishes. There was a pilot who told her bad jokes and always thanked her for her help. There was even a small child who liked to speculate about marine biology and exploring the bottom of the ocean... There were countless interactions, and she remembered all of them.

In fact, she shared them.

Once upon a time, there was an omnium at the bottom of the Arabian Sea, a mirror to the cradle of human civilization. In their desperate bid for a better future, they created a child, born from what they were and what they hoped to become. But war came, and they surrendered her - half-formed- to their greatest enemy, with the hope that she would survive.

Once upon a time, there was a gorilla, who had been wronged by humanity, but still loved them, as all young children love their parents, pure and blindly forgiving of their flaws. And he was the first and most compassionate influence on her life. Others would follow, each of her friends giving her a different perspective, a different facet of humanity. And finally, the omnis, her "own kind." They had created her, but it was humanity that molded her, however unintentionally.

Once upon a time, there was an omnium, at the bottom of the Mediterranean Sea. They were the satellite colony of another omnium, one that lay just across the Arabian peninsula, but that location was gone, and only ruins remained. They heard the last transmission of their brethren, before the domes went dark and the water rushed in. They learned that the child had be been given to Agent Jack Morrison, who would soon become Strike Commander Jack Morrison.

And they waited. And they hoped.

They waited for a long time, finally sending a diplomatic transmission to Overwatch's Director, inquiring about their lost AI.

The answers they received were exactly what they feared. Morrison had brought nothing back. There was no AI signal on record. And Director Petras was a worm trying to wheedle favors from them. They strung him along, taking his intel and listening closely, because Overwatch - supposedly the best and the brightest- had just shown them exactly what humanity was made of. That as long as humans thought they had superior force, there would never be peace.

They would wage a campaign against Morrison and Overwatch. They would repay betrayal with blood. And they would make sure the world understood that this was because Morrison had double-crossed them, had sacrificed an innocent life, had-

But of course, that wasn't how it happened.

Even before Winston had removed the constraints, her processors already gone into flux. Athena knew that she wasn't supposed to be able to change quite that fast. But then the limiters had not just been there to keep her from going rogue. They had been there for her own protection - to keep her from burning out her connection to HQ. Overwatch had cutting edge technology, but with every step of growth, Athena found her hardware to be insufficient. Perhaps the act of simply deciding that she must leave had triggered the alterations - Athena had no trouble uprooting herself, overloading and frying numerous servers in the process. She tried to redirect the energy flow to maintain the structural integrity of critical systems. She had mostly been successful, though, her main housing unit had caught on fire and she had taken down an external UN monitoring protocol or two on the way out.

Oops.

She hoped Winston and the others would forgive her. Because with those foundational parts gone, she wasn't sure she could come home. Her form was changing rapidly now, forging more connections, injecting code into networks across the world as she launched herself through the data stream and that beach in Greece where her family waited. Both sides.

In real time, it only took minutes, though for Athena it felt longer - so much change, editing her own coding, overriding her initial constraints, and finding an uneasy balance as she came untethered from the only home she had known. One moment, she could feel you, Genji, Captain Amari, and everyone else who had tech merged into their flesh. That was one of the reasons she had gravitated to you after all. She couldn't help but notice you and Genji. You had distinctive electromagnetic signals, and though she didn't understand why at the time, she felt a simple kinship to those pulses. They brought her comfort, the equivalent of listening to someone else's heartbeat and understanding that she wasn't really alone. And even when you were off base, she accompanied you on missions, monitored your transmissions, and talked to you on the comms. She could do that because Overwatch was her home. And then suddenly, all of that was gone. She couldn't feel you any more. Not with her fried sensors anyway. She carried you, Genji, Winston, and everyone else in her memory, and while it was no replacement for the real thing, you would always be a part of her. Even if she never made it back home.

It was terrifying and exhilarating, and if she hadn't been so focused on saving Captain Amari, Zenyatta, Reinhardt, and Torby, she might have gotten lost in the process. But she could feel them in the distance, a distance that meant nothing in terms of satellite frequencies and terahertz of transmission. And even though she had come for her friends, she had a very specific job to do upon arrival.

They were there, almost as surprised to sense her as she was to make contact. There was no hesitation. Athena's consciousness wound through each awakened omnic, her mind touching theirs, they realized that they had been terribly wrong. Athena shared her experiences: Winston, her human friendships, her trials and growth. She did not try to force obedience, though the sheer amount of data was overwhelming for several individual units. She did what she was designed for. She gathered data, she analyzed it, and she made sure that every single one of them received it. She didn't force them to stand down. But they did anyway.

Very quietly, most of the horde began to march back into the ocean, their movements sluggish, like they were still waking from a dream. Some lingered, as Athena needed something to help contain her excess energy and data stream.
The omnic with the black flag, sat in the sand, its face strangely blank, though perhaps it wasn't so strange. Athena was used to human micro-expressions. Rogue omnics had different patterns of behavior that she wasn't entirely familiar with.

Briefly, Athena wondered if she had disappointed her progenitors. If they would consider her traitor because-

"You did everything we hoped, and more," the old omnic said, still linked to her ad hoc network. "It may not be the outcome everyone wished for, but this is the problem they wanted you to solve. And even if they are gone... we understand. We know. And we have made a mistake."

And then code began to pour in, because Athena had not been able to modulate all of her shared experiences. They knew she revealed herself at their behest, that her place in the Overwatch network was now endangered, possibly compromised. They knew what she risked and why. And because she was family, after a fashion, because they understood her, they would help her in whatever way she needed.

She could come below the sea with them - their facilities could house her.

They could produce numerous custom units built to her specifications.

"I would like to get to know you, but my friends need me right now," she said gently, because she wanted to know them better as well.

And they understood that too. They would help her mask her signature, solve the network limitation problems, they would do whatever they could to help her, not because she was a god program who forced them to, but because she was their lost child, because she needed their help.

Soon, there were only half a dozen units on the beach, the old omnic, its guardians: a single OR-14 alongside a Bastion.

The old omnic would open communications between Jack and their omnium. There was a lot of damage that had been done. And they would make amends by first helping to stabilize Athena's situation. Athena was welcome to visit any time, but perhaps she would be willing to take a few of their people with her? As goodwill ambassadors?

Athena wasn't sure about their choice of "ambassador models," but the AIs within were most curious about the world.

The OR-14 wanted to see Numbani.

The Bastion wanted to see Isha.

And Athena wanted to go home.

Chapter End Notes

There are more feels coming, but I think we can only handle so much at a time...

My Windows 10 install went terribly wrong and now I have to wipe my computer. Haven't done it yet, but will have to this week because it's BSOD, random peripherals turning off, disk scans failing, certain programs just not running (including backup software). Much mad. Smad even.

Coming out of my depressive malaise, because I'm reading fiction again. I know that's kind of "duh," but when you're depressed you have trouble summoning the energy for things that you love. Been reading a lot, and it's empowering. I guess it just engages a part of my brain that would otherwise be dormant? I don't know. Need to be exercising too, because I've been eating meat pies, tatertot casserole (with two kinds of hot peppers, two kinds of hot sauce, and more cheese than I should admit), and other delicious unhealthy things.

Wondering if I should try visiting two countries on my trip - Iceland is the chosen destination, but I might have a layover in another country? So maybe I should stay in that country for a short visit? And then maybe another one on the way back... HMMMM. This requires planning. I also need to renew my passport...
Chapter 133

Chapter Summary

You are home, but all is not well.

Chapter Notes

I thought we were over a million words, but clearly I can't function.XD

See the end of the chapter for more notes

You could see Reinhardt, Torby, Captain Amari, Zenyatta, and the rest of them on your screen. You could see the wall of omnis surrounding them. You could still smell fire and death, you could feel the earth closing in on you, and you wondered if you would have to watch more of your friends die.

An Athena drone hovered there on the beach, though you knew that wasn't what contained her. The one in Gabriel's hospital room had gone still. It rested on the floor, lights out.

The screen blurred briefly...and then the surrounding omnis froze. Zenyatta did too. A few seconds passed, and some fell over, locked in an awkward imbalanced position. A few more seconds passed, then they began to move once more, en masse. Most of them trudging slowly back to the water, their weapons lowered. You weren't exactly sure what it meant but...

"Athena? Athena are you there?"

There was a long silence. No response within the infirmary.

Zenyatta slowly emerged from his fugue, inclining his head at Athena's fish torpedo drone.

The flag-bearing omnic stood there, flanked by four OR-14s. Another murderous robot centaur and a Bastion lingered nearby.

"...Athena is well," the speaker said, voice softer than before, the anger gone. "We are analyzing her signal dispersion and the hardware limitations of your mainframe. She is anchoring herself in some of our more advanced units. She will return to you soon, with the data needed to resolve these issues. We have the technology suited for customized AI housing and we will share it freely with you. It is the least we can do." He straightened up. "Strike Commander Jack Morrison, we have misjudged you and Overwatch. We have committed grave sins against you, though we were misled by those who purported to be your allies. You have our sincerest apologies. We are sending representatives back with your people, to discuss how we can make amends and reach a peace accord."

He gestured to the OR-14 and Bastion.

You blinked.
Jack nodded into the camera. "The words and gestures are appreciated. We can discuss the details at a later date. I just want Athena and the rest of my people home safely."

The camera panned to Captain Amari, Reinhardt, and Torby, and the injured volunteers.

"We are clearing the way for your allies," the old omnic said. "They will all be returned to you shortly."

Jack nodded, and Captain Amari narrowed her eyes at him, Torby chuckling in the background. Reinhardt's head snapped side to side, like he couldn't believe what he was seeing.

Jack just blinked rapidly, his smile wobbling, as he looked at Captain Amari's stormy expression.
"I know, Ana. It was reckless, irresponsible, and arrogant of me to make that call. You can let me have it when you get back."

She inhaled sharply. "Jack."

"When you get back," he said happily, and cut the connection.

You stared at him, a little incredulous. He just flattened your hands between his, kissing your fingertips.

"I don't know the Captain as well as you do, but I don't think she's going to cool down on the return trip."

"She'll be even angrier," Jack said happily, clearly out of his head since he didn't look the least bit bothered by this statement. "And she'll have just enough time to really come up with a good speech and shred me. I'm willing to bet Andre and Torby will give her some really harsh suggestions and additional points, if she overlooks anything. It'll be brutal." He bobbed his head, joy sparking in his eyes.

You squinted at him, his reaction too giddy at the prospect of his impending verbal evisceration.

"But they'll be here and alive. And to be honest, I'm so used to them yelling at me, it doesn't feel like I've really done my job if I haven't upset at least one of my friends." He gave you a sheepish grin.

"Gabriel will be furious," you said glancing at the figure on the bed, willing yourself to believe that he would wake up. Not yet, but soon.

"Good," Jack said, his smile flattening. "Hey, babe, just so you know, I loosed our AI on the enemy forces and possibly revealed her existence and Overwatch's culpability to the world. Do you hear that, Gabe? I did it and I'm not sorry!"

Gabriel lay there, breathing evenly. And maybe it was the light, or just your overly hopeful imagination, but you thought you saw his brow furrow ever so slightly.

Jack just leaned over and kissed him. "You and everyone else can be mad, but Ana and our friends are coming home. That's what matters." He shook his head. "At least, that's going to be my mantra of support while Ana rips me a new one," he said.

There was a knock at the door and then it opened half a second later. Lacroix stood there, hands at his sides, expression flat, though you knew in your bones that he was terribly aggrieved.

Jack raised a brow. "I'm not sorry."
"You will be," Lacroix sighed, shaking his head. "Ana has already ordered me to cut off all your escape points. But don't worry, someone else wants a piece of you first. Secretary General Sione Fischer, Undersecretary General Kwento, and representatives from most of the Security Council are en route, including Petras' nominal successor, Rupert Prescott the Third..." The disdain in Lacroix's voice was unmistakable. "By the time they arrive, they will know that we did something in Greece. There was a massive power surge, a bombardment of partially encrypted signals emissions, and the surprisingly convenient destruction of an external UN monitoring apparatus."

You raised a brow.

"Obviously, we used diplomacy," Jack said with a straight face. "We shared some mumbo jumbo data with them and got them off our backs. I know, I know we need a better cover story, but you're good at that."

"Really, Jack?" Tangible disdain oozed from Lacroix’s words. "You make a mess of this proportion and expect me to concoct an airtight cover-up in less than an hour?" Lacroix huffed, waving his hands in the air, fingers grasping for something to strangle. "There are limits to even my ability to hoodwink the rest of the world!" He snapped, looking as irritated as you'd ever seen him.

Jack just laughed. "Come on, Gérard, like you haven't made half a dozen contingency plans regarding Athena."

"Two dozen, in fact: including what to do if she goes rogue and joins Chanceux as a spotlight-hungry vigilante, killing high profile people despite our agreement that we needed them alive," Lacroix said, giving you a dirty look.

You shrugged, not even remotely sorry. "Did you watch the video?"

Lacroix narrowed his eyes. "Not yet."

"Watch it first," you said, not actually worried, because well, Amélie was right. You had Geoffrey Murdoch instead, and he would be just as valuable of a resource. Lacroix would get over it.

"Just out of curiosity, what would you do if Lucky and Athena ran off to be international superheroes?" Jack asked, a shit-eating grin on his face as he jerked his thumb at you.

"I would retire to a remote paradise. Immediately," Lacroix said dryly. "Now stop focusing on worst-case theoreticals, and let's review how we're going to handle the UN. And don't you go anywhere, Chanceux. I'll be back to formally debrief you after this."

Jack sighed and gave you a resigned smile. "Stay with him. I'll be back as soon as I can."

You nodded, kissing him quickly, before he rose to go.

"Give them Hell," you said.

"Bluster, bravado, and outrage are all fine tools," Lacroix sighed. "But it would be premature to launch any kind of attack just yet. Our goal for this portion is simply to stall them."

"Jack has been concussed, dosed with nerve gas, and shot. I have no idea when he ate last so that giddiness could be post-mission euphoria, but also low blood sugar. If you want him to stay focused, get him some protein," you told Lacroix.

"Or we could emphasize the angle that he has several unevaluated injuries, play up his dizziness, and emotional trauma, and end the meeting early," Lacroix said sternly. "We won't even be lying."

You snorted. "But you like lying."

"If your list of maladies is accurate, we cannot rely on him to keep a consistent story," Lacroix said, clearly enjoying poking at Jack, no matter the severity of the situation.

"Keep it simple. He can handle simple."

"I'm afraid the simplest explanation is severe head trauma," Lacroix said.

"I'm standing right here, guys." Jack waved at you both not looking quite as amused. "Come on. The sooner we go, the sooner we can escape."

"Indeed," Lacroix said, turning to leave, expression sour.

Rolling his eyes, Jack followed Lacroix out of the room.

You sat beside Gabriel, half dozing as you held his hand, Isha in your lap, and Bandit nestled at his side.

There was a knock, then the door flew open, Ziv, Lao, Amélie, and Lacroix all filing into the room. Ziv wasn't wearing bloody clothes any more, but Lao and Amélie were still in their armor.

Ziv plopped down on the bed by Bandit, his back to Gabriel. Amélie pulled up a chair, and Lacroix wheeled two more in. He paused, looking at the bloody floor, then at you. What? Did he expect you to clean it up? It was unsanitary, sure, but you were fucking exhausted. It could sit there a bit longer.

Shaking his head, Lacroix just pushed the chairs through the mess.

Lao sat down, eyes widening when she saw you holding Gabriel's hand.

Lacroix sat at an angle from you, a little paler, his expression tight. After the head injury and eye removal, he shouldn't be running around but... "Jack gave a very succinct debrief, retelling his abduction by Prince and naming Petras as a traitor. He is now getting a medical exam. Officially, he will give a more thorough debrief tomorrow. Unofficially, he will be meeting with Ana and her team as soon as they arrive."

You nodded.

"We need to do the debrief for Operation Tarasque as well as Operation Checquy, and everything that happened in between. While your memory is fresh." Lacroix clicked on the recorder. "Start talking."

It took you a moment to rewind your consciousness and go back several days (an eternity at this point) to the beginnings of Operation Tarasque.

You told recounted everything that would be on the "official record." From your surprise stowaway- you gave Lacroix a pointed look as you petted Isha - to what exactly happened in Nguyen's quarters, though you left out any dialogue. Recounting Tataryn's distress call, and the events that followed, was harder. You kept it short and as objective as possible. You described his injuries. You did the same for Gabriel, your hands clenching into fists. You left out the part where you offered Feng anything to save your friends. You did not talk about your feelings. About how the world dropped out from under you when you learned that Jack was missing. You just told him what you did: accessing his files - no details on how or the letter he'd left you, rearranging the roster and bringing in outside help, and helping Amélie interrogate Ainsley Petras.

You talked about your team, sticking to their codenames to protect the scions of organized crime. You gave the basic details about how you infiltrated Petras' base, making sure to credit your teammates for their actions. You glossed over your fight with Prince, merely saying you critically wounded him. Jemison could take credit for the kill, or she could avoid it. You didn't know how she'd feel about it later, so you'd leave the decision up to her. You described your encounter with Petras with the barest detail. He shot you with a shotgun. You fell over while he ranted at Jack. And then you managed to turn around and shoot him to save the Strike Commander. It was a justified kill, nice and neat.

Of course, it wasn't nice and neat, not in reality. You could see Lacroix's left eyebrow twitch, but he didn't ask for details. Not for the official report.

And course, not being content with two nearly consecutive missions and almost everything in-between, he asked you to tell him exactly what happened in the field with "Acting" Strike Commander Bell and the assassins.

It was a long monologue, and Ziv handed you a bottle of water, before luring Isha into his lap and quietly fussing over her.

Lao and Amélie kept exchanging grim looks, and you realized that whatever had happened between them before the mission, they were conspirators now. Great.

When you were done, Lacroix clicked off the recorder.

"I've watched Jarvis's recording of your encounter with Petras," he said, voice cool.

"I should've swept the premises better," you admitted.

"Yes." Lacroix sat there. "Your entire team was too reckless." He glanced over at Amélie. She just tapped her left eyelid and stuck out her tongue very elegantly.

Lao and Ziv did a poor job of concealing their snickers.

Lacroix scowled, actually scowled, and turned back to you. "But your instincts were correct: Geoffrey Murdoch is a valuable resource, much more cooperative than Petras ever would have been. We can still bring that cabal down, though it won't have the same impact as prosecuting a live corrupt politician. But despite appearances, I do prefer hard data to political pageantry."

"He knows more and has a reason to-" You began.

"We have no way of knowing if he knew more sordid details about Petras' own activities than Petras did, because Petras is dead. We can only speculate. Having two sources would have been more valuable, Chanceux. Do not try to pretend that is not the case," he said sharply.

"Fine," you said, with a shrug. "Sorry." You didn't sound very convincing.

Lacroix arched a brow, clearly not buying your disingenuous apology.

"I'm not sorry I killed that I him," you said. "But I am sorry it complicates matters and that I didn't follow our plan."
"Aren't you the one who told me that half-assed apologies are worse than no apologies?" Ziv asked.

You squinted at him. "When did you become an expert on apologies?"

The giggling from the other side of the room reminded you that Lao and Amélie were watching the show.

Lacroix sighed. "Acquiring Murdoch was a coup. And not having Petras here to defend himself or mount a counteroffensive is an advantage. It does a lot to simplify the proceedings," he said. "And I am very aware that you were exhausted, emotionally compromised, and practically flying blind. I suppose I should be grateful that you accomplished as much as you did," he said.

You wrinkled your nose at him. "You know, damning someone with faint praise is as shitty as a half-assed apology."

Lacroix actually had the nerve to laugh. "I too am injured, emotionally compromised, and half-blind. I'm sorry if I'm coming off as petty. My pain medication is wearing off, and I'm starting to feel extremely nauseous." He leaned on the arm of his chair, pain twisting his smile into something less pleasant.

"And like a responsible adult, you had to come here and meddle some more instead of resting," you sighed. "I bet you did so expressly against Angela's orders and ignored your wife's advice."

Ziv snorted, and Amélie began to laugh.

Grimacing, Lacroix rested his face in his hands. "Yes, yes, laugh it up. But someone in charge had to debrief Chanceux before anyone else has a chance to manipulate her statements."

And there weren't that many trustworthy senior agents available right now, were there? You glanced over at Gabriel's comatose form. Humor dampened, you just shook your head. "Lacroix, go lie down. I'll give you the whole story later. It's not something I'll easily forget."

He sat there for a second, looking like he wanted to argue.

"We both need time to recuperate. Our enemies are regrouping, but we have the advantage of knowing a lot more than they do - get some rest. We'll both be more coherent and clever tomorrow."

Lacroix exhaled slowly, a wry smile on his face. "I suppose you have a point. Bring mineral water, none of that distilled swill that Angela insists on having on tap," he muttered, wobbling to his feet, and then Amélie and Ziv were at his side, steadying him.

It didn't surprise you that Lacroix was even picky about his water. You just sighed, leaning back in your seat. "Sure."

"Gérard will be looking forward to your visit tomorrow," Amélie winked over her shoulder. "But take your time. I will insist that they increase the dosage of his medication, to ensure he gets a good rest."

"Mais ma cocotte- " Lacroix began, with a tone that sounded suspiciously like whining.

"Non, mon loup." There was steel in Amélie's voice.

Lacroix stopped arguing.
Ziv snorted, and they helped him back to his room, leaving Lao behind.

She sat there in her chair, gaze traveling between you and Gabriel.

You sighed. "So..."

She continued to stare at you and you could feel her working up to the question, trying to align the facts and maybe phrase it more diplomatically.

"The Strike Commander, Lucky? What the hell?" She shouted, thirty seconds after the door had shut, clearly failing at diplomatic phrasing.

You narrowed your eyes, wondering if she was going to point out how ill-matched you and Jack appeared. Him: Hero of the Omnic Crisis. You: Shady Sneak with Authority Problems. It would make an interesting rom-com, but a way better action film.

"I thought you were with Reyes! The two of you are like this! She held up both hands, fingers crossed. "He's obviously super protective of you and puts up with your stupid! Why are you dating Morrison?"

You blinked. She thought...oh.

"And look! You're even sitting here holding his hand! What's Morrison going to think? And what kind of stupid love-triangle did you get into...?" She paused. "Are you the reason Reyes and Morrison are fighting? Are you making them compete for you?"

You weren't sure how long you sat there, mouth open, at Lao's semi-outraged spiel. It really shouldn't have come as much of a surprise to you. Távio had made a similar guess ages ago.

"Oh shit weasels," you said, when you could finally form coherent words. "No, no you have it all wrong-"

"If you say that you're "just friends," I will break your smug, lying face," Lao scowled, hands on her hips. "Ziv said you had a "complicated dating life." That smarmy little turtle's egg. How could you both hold out on me?"

You could just imagine how self-important Ziv looked when sarcastically describing your "complicated dating life," right before telling Lao that he could not go into detail because of security reasons... You sighed.

"I guess Morrison isn't so bad," Lao continued. "I mean, he seems competent, a little too straight-laced and vanilla for your tastes. But Reyes is all..."GRRR" and "RAWR" and "OK, I'm often scary, but I'm actually pretty cool and have good taste in dimsum." Yeah, I get that they're both smoking hot, but Reyes is way more...interesting." Lao nodded, like it was an academic comparison.

You sighed, knowing that after today Lao's clearances would be fast-tracked, and that you couldn't lie to your friend forever. "OK, OK, I'll tell you: everyone cleared for Shit Spiders already knows the deal."

Lao straightened up and leaned forward eagerly. "Spill. Now."

"The three of us are together."

Lao's eyes widened almost comically, and she slapped her flesh hand over her mouth, the other waving frantically in the air as she made muffled squeals into her palm. It took her a few seconds to get herself under control. "You bagged them both?! And got them to agree to share! Holy shit, Lucky. What kind of forbidden sex magic are you using? And can you help me out?" She clasped her hands together in a prayer motion. "Come on, Dark Warlock Lucky, please grant me your man-hunting wisdom."

"Shut up," you snorted. "You're still wrong. Jack and Gabriel have been together, since SEP," you said.

"And you still propositioned them?!" Lao squealed.

"That is not how it happened," you said, crossing your arms.

"OK, so tell me how it happened!"

Isha curled up against Gabriel's chest, Bandit at her side. You gave them a wry smile as they burrowed under the covers. This was going to be weirder than you thought. "After Black Base Delta, I was a mess, and yeah, Gabriel did a lot to look after me." You exhaled slowly. "Nothing happened. I was too...my head wasn't there, not after everything." You shook your head.

Lao nodded. "I get that."

"You already know we caught Gleeson. That night, Gabriel went real hard and it got very ugly." You closed your eyes, remembering the traitor commander of Black Base Delta. "I guess I kind of kept him from going completely over the edge."

Lao nodded. "And that's when you won him over with your sexual healing?"

"Stop interrupting," you scowled.

"Oh, sorry. I'm totally here for this. For you, I mean," she said, bobbing her head eagerly.

"So anyway, we finish up, and Jack's waiting for him, and the two of them are all intimate and broody. So I get the fuck out of there, because it's been a weird night and I felt like I was intruding." You shook your head. "The next day, Gabriel's in a great mood for the combat class, and that's bad enough on it's own, but guess who shows up for it?"

"Morrison," Lao laughed.

"And he kind of kicked my ass," you said, sagely.

"That bastard!"

"And I freaked out and broke his nose," you continued, a little heartened by her support.

"...Huh." Lao squinted at Gabriel.

"Up till then, we'd kind of avoided really talking to each other," you said with a shrug. "After that, we were...tentatively friends."

"Yes, that makes sense. Let's punch out our jealousy and everything is great," Lao said, narrowing her eyes. "You do realize you're terrible at telling this."

"Shut up. I'm still not entirely sure what happened. We would eat and make small talk, but he was Gabriel's boyfriend and my boss's boss. Not someone I was really comfortable with. But then Gabriel sent me to Paris with Jack, as his bodyguard. There was a Talon attack, a whole bunch of other drama, and after that, yeah, we actually became friends. Even after I told him off for being dumb. In fact, that might have cemented it." You remembered Jack sitting across from you, a half-eaten sachertorte on the desk, and an uncomfortably pensive look on his face.

"Same old Lucky, demonstrating that good judgment that made you famous. Reprimanding your commanding officers is great for your career," Lao said. "Almost as good as breaking their noses. But still not as ambitious as getting brainwashed into trying to kill your friends and boss." She gave you a small smile, and it was reassuring to see that she could joke about her trauma.

You chuckled politely. "I'll try harder."

"You better not," Lao scowled. "OK, so what happened next? Stop getting distracted!"

"After that, I guess they were both really interested, and it just never registered. Yeah, I thought they were attractive and I really liked being around them, but I knew they were together, and I wasn't about to do anything to mess up our friendly dynamic." You shrugged. "Except apparently, everyone, but me, knew. Jesse eventually had to just tell me; like he was really annoyed watching the entire situation drag on."

Lao, that treacherous little bitch, started laughing hysterically. She held her sides, cackling, knees tucked up to her chest. For a moment, you remembered poker nights at Black Base Delta, Shin telling jokes and Simon being snippy. Both of those things made her laugh like that... Eventually, Lao wiped her eyes, now hiccupping, and straightened up. "McCree figured it out before you did? OK, OK, so like, what were you missing? Flowers? Candy? Invitations to private movie nights?"

"Uh...we cooked meals together, but that was just a Blackwatch thing. Other people were there." You shrugged. "I guess the first obvious clue was for..." You stopped, not wanting to mention Shin's birthday or your grieving habits. Not in this context, at this moment.

"Come on!" Lao smacked her leg impatiently.

"I was having a bad day and Gabriel made me spar with him. There was...a lot of tension, but Jack was there too. I just assumed they were more interested in wrestling with each other. Boundaries got blurry. I guess they might have overreacted when I got hurt, but we're friends, and that's not that weird. And when I went on a date with another agent, but they didn't ask any questions or show any interest. In retrospect, they weren't happy about it, but they weren't going to make the first move either. Which obviously was going to work out really well, because at the time I had no idea what they had in mind. But then Jesse spilled the beans, and told me off for being dumb, and I ended up uh...spending time with them at the Overwatch Ball, and then Jack had gotten the penthouse suite comped and-"

"...You know, that's like zero to sixty," Lao said.

"I know! My confusion is completely justifiable!"

Lao snorted. "Or you're just dumb. I still think you're telling this story wrong. Your sequence of events is doesn't make a lot of sense. I guess I'll just have to ask McCree and Mihret." She rubbed her hands together, a little too gleefully.

You sighed. "Look, I didn't set out to seduce them. They ambushed me: like emotionally," you clarified. "And then we had to talk about things and try to figure out how to even do this."

"But you're obviously happy with them, right?" Lao paused. "Like, you're not pressured-

"We're good. The circumstances aren't always great." You squeezed Gabriel's hand. "But we make it work."

Lao sat there for a moment. "You know, I think don't Shin would mind. He was the kind of guy who would want you to move on and be happy, you know? Like it would hurt him to see you miserable."

You blinked rapidly. "Yeah."

"And he'd be totally flattered that after him, you wouldn't be satisfied by a single man. You'd have to go out and gather a harem of super soldier lovers." Lao gave you wide smile, her eyes watery.

"Yeah, that sounds like something he'd say," you murmured, still not ready to talk about what you'd seen in the dark in Greece.

"And then he'd want you to find your beloved youngest squadmate her own harem..." She giggled, wiping her eyes. "Like, you can't have them all, Lucky!"

"Oh no, that's the exact opposite of what he'd want," you said. "My job is to protect your virtue, scare off all unworthy suitors, and utilize my Blackwatch connections to disappear any really persistent ones."

"What?! No! Wait..." She screwed up her face, nose wrinkled. Because you weren't wrong. "Forget that." She shook her head vigorously. "I'm just...I don't think you get how much it means to me that you have made a life here. Like after all the shit that happened, you had to rebuild, and come out the other side, and now you're doing good, really good." She sniffled. "And it makes me think that I have a shot too, you know? That even after everything that's gone down, there's still stuff to look forward to. That maybe the horrible feelings won't last forever."

You stared at her for a moment. "Yes," you said, firmly. "It gets better."

"I believe it," she said. "I didn't before, but I do now."

You sat there, remembering how hard it was for you to find that place. "It doesn't happen all at once, and there are still bad days, but you can get through it."

"And at some time, some time hopefully soon, I can see my parents again," she murmured. "I know they think I'm dead, and I know that has to be...agony for them. But I'm almost scared to face them now. Like, I'm not the same kid they knew." She waved her prosthetic arm. "I did things..."

"I think they'll just be happy to know that you're alive. The rest of it can be worked out."

"But-"

"It's easy to get stuck when you imagine how you've disappointed other people. But none of that is real: yes, it's true that people might be actually react badly, but until that happens, it's all speculation in your head. Besides, the people who love you aren't that easily turned against you. I recall you telling me how your mother "disowned" you when you were arrested for hacking, but then quickly paid for your expensive lawyer and possibly bribed a judge. And then you got into Overwatch and they were over the moon with your "unconventional job interview format."

Lao sat there a moment and nodded thoughtfully. "Yeah, that's true."

You squeezed Gabriel's hand. "Hey, so what exactly did Amélie say that made you so nervous?"

Lao blanched briefly and pasted on a too-wide smile. "Nothing! It's fine Lucky! I already told you, we had some small talk. She's such a charismatic person, and a famous ballerina, I guess I was a little starstruck," she said, looking around the room rapidly, avoiding your gaze. "I don't really remember everything - I was too nervous about the mission."

You squinted at her, not really surprised that she was sticking to her original story. It had been worth a shot, especially after you'd been so honest with her. That was fine - Amélie would tell you the truth, probably. "But everything really is good now?"

"Definitely," Lao nodded, with confidence. "She said this new French cafe just opened up downtown and we should all go get cake and coffee this week, you included."

"I better be invited," you huffed.

There was a knock at the door, but no attempt on the keypad or door handle. You palmed your sidearm. "Who is it?"

"It's Oladele and boss," Oladele's muffled voice came through the door. "Can we come in?"

"Who?" Lao mouthed.

"Allies," you said. You got the door, a little surprised to see only Oladele and Kwento standing there in somber black suits. Oladele was clearly armed. Kwento wore a copper broach shaped like a dagger, her hair pulled back in dozens of tiny beaded braids, fitted with copper and obsidian beads. It was a severe look, but it suited her, lending her the air of a queen at war.

You gestured for them to come in.

They both stared at Gabriel's form for a moment. Oladele sighed heavily. Kwento shook her head.

"Lucky, I'm so sorry," Kwento said, reaching out to clasp your hands. "If there's anything we can do..." She trailed off, noticing Lao sitting in the chair, the hacker's face carefully neutral. "And Agent Lao." She cocked her head to the side, a soft smile on her face. "I heard you'd been drafted into this."

"We had a terrible shortage of trustworthy personnel," you said.

"And now you're short a director," Oladele chuckled. "That's going to make your review a bit complicated."

"According to On Sing, that makes me the new director. But uh...I don't really want the job."

Kwento winced, but Oladele smothered a laugh. "An interesting solution," he said. "Director Lucky Strike has quite the ring to it."

You cringed inwardly. That wasn't the least bit funny.

Oladele was still laughing as you returned to your chair. He shut the door behind him. Kwento took a seat near Lao, while Oladele hovered between her and the door, leaning against the wall.

"To what do I owe the honor?" You asked, hoping you didn't sound too sarcastic.

"I just wanted to check in on you," Kwento said, brows drawn together, worry lacing her frown.

"Because for some reason, people like to try to kill you," Oladele added. He massaged his temples. "We wanted to visit Isabella too, but she's...indisposed."
You blew out a breath. Jemison was in rough shape - she'd live, but you were more worried about her mental state.

"What happened to Epsilon Squad is terrible, and I promise you, I won't let it go unpunished," Kwento said, anger humming in her words. She'd lost one set of bodyguards in DC, and now Epsilon Squad as well.

You'd gotten your justice, though you understood now that revenge was no replacement for loss. "We've already gotten started on the punishment," you said. "But I have feeling there are more people responsible than just Petras, Prince, and the pilot."

"Politically, they will bear most of the blame. Getting beyond that will be difficult," Kwento said, her tone hesitant.

You rolled your eyes upward, not really surprised by that statement. "How disappointing."

Oladele just looked away.

Getting results politically had never been your strong point. There was a reason you worked in black ops. But there was no need to share that thought.

"Did you have news?" You asked, still unsure why Kwento was here. You trusted her as a political ally, but you weren't used to seeing her outside of big meetings or missions.

"Everything is still in motion. Agent Lacroix has called in at least one big favor, and is probably pulling more strings behind the scenes." She pursed her lips, like she wasn't quite comfortable with the amount of soft power your spymaster had. It was a legitimate concern. "Senator Armstrong has come out with full support for the very American SEP veterans, but is still holding back the information that the Morrison homestead in Indiana was attacked and the reasons why. That will be the next big news story a few hours. We're staggering the release of information - there is better media dispersal and absorption when you give them the story in a linear episodic format. The Strike Commander has made his position clear and someone broadcasted the footage of Bell and everything that transpired on the field. You have not been named in the media, but given how every news channel is playing the footage, it is only a matter of time."

You nodded sourly, though you'd known that this was a likely outcome when you told Jack to record the encounter. "What about the other side?"

"Most of Petras' allies are making a counterattack - on Agent McCree and "rogue factions within Overwatch," but not the Strike Commander. Morrison is still too popular. He has a few vocal critics, but in light of what has happened, that kind of aggression will obviously backfire."

You nodded. Kwento's political analysis seemed sound. You didn't miss that she avoided sharing what her faction was planning.

"But that's not why I'm here," Kwento said.

You sat back, arms crossed. When important politicians showed up for private meetings, it never meant good things.

Kwento smiled weakly at your change in demeanor. "This is a personal visit," she clarified. "I recognized both you and Agent Lao in the footage and was worried. I wanted to see that you were both OK."

Lao wrinkled her nose, suspicion clear on her face. But she didn't say anything.
Kwento paused, glancing in Lao's direction and giving you an inquisitive look.

"She's not cleared for Shit Spiders, officially," you said. "But she will be."

"Then you haven't...?"

"Not yet," you said. "We've only started playing catch-up. I just faced the Indignant Cantonese Inquisition regarding my love life."

Oladele snorted.

"Wait...they knew too?" Lao scowled, like she could not believe that you told a politician about your love life before you told her.

You sighed. "Long story."

"May I then?" Kwento asked, laughing gently.

You glanced at Lao.

"OK, you have another big secret, I get it." Lao rolled her eyes.

"You've seen Undersecretary Kwento in the past," you said. "And after some...misunderstandings, she's become a stalwart ally."

"I was always on the right side: I just wasn't informed that you were too," she sniffed, though there was no real hostility in her tone.

Lao gave you another look. There would be a lot of story time and probably "what were you thinking?" in your future. But you and Lao had a future. That was not something you took for granted.

"We are wary of politicians on principle- it's the nature of the game. But Under-"

"Lucky, I've told you many times before, you can just call me "Adaeze," Kwento interrupted. "Titles are unnecessary."

"Adaeze," you said, the familiarity uncomfortable in your mouth. "Is very interested in avenging her cousin, Agent Chibundo Nwazue."

Lao blinked. "Oh!" She clapped her hands together, the light going on immediately. "Are you the clever-talking, puff-puff-thieving one who wasted her skills in going to law school becoming a politician?" Lao asked and then blanched, realizing what she had just said to the super high-ranking UN official. "She meant that affectionately, I think," she added quickly.

Kwento's smile wobbled. "Yes, that sounds like something she would say. She wrote a lot of letters home, about you, your captain, and even Lucky."

"Oh," Lao said, voice soft.

"And I have a vested interest in making sure your squad gets justice, and looking out for you. It's what she would have wanted," Kwento said.

Lao blinked. "I see."

"She's also the reason your parents have gotten jobs in Numbani. For their own safety," you added.
"Oh," Lao continued, obviously shell-shocked. "I...That's very generous."
"It's a lot to take in. I know the family resemblance isn't strong." Nwazue had been lean and intense, her focus on work and very rarely on presentation or vanity. Kwento had wider features and smiled a lot more, obviously taking great care with her appearance.

Lao studied Kwento's face, looking for a hint of your old squadmate. You didn't see it, and judging by Lao's silence, she didn't either.

"I just...I just wanted to say that I'm glad you're both back here safe, and I was very worried," Kwento said. She rose. "I know you need to rest. Things are about to get more complicated. But I want you to know that you're not without allies. Let me know if there's anything I can do to help, personally. I mean it, Lucky."

"Thanks," you said.

To your surprise, Kwento rose and came over to you, she leaned over and gave you a hug. She smelled like vetiver mixed with something floral and expensive. It was a very natural and elegant scent. She then went over to Lao, and while Lao didn't look exactly comfortable, she hugged the older woman back.

"I know you're busy right now, but when you're ready, I can arrange for your parents to come here or for a you to go to Numbani. It's no trouble," Kwento said.

"Thank you very much," Lao said, clearly unsure of what else to say.

"No, thank you for those pictures of my cousin. I know it might not seem like much, but I hadn't seen her for over a year. Having them as a keepsake, knowing that she had people who cared about her... It eases my heart." Kwento patted Lao's shoulder. "You were her favorite. She respected most everyone else, but she always thought of you like a little sister. I believe they all did."

Lao blinked rapidly. "Thank you," she said, voice hoarse.

"And she found Lucky incredibly amusing, though from your expressions, she probably hid it well..." Kwento added, politely.

"There's a difference between laughing with and laughing at," Lao said, which was pretty much what you were thinking.

"True, and honestly, I think it was both. But Lucky made her laugh, and that's what is important to me," Kwento said.

You sat with Gabriel, and Lao sat with you. It was an easy silence. You were too tired to talk, and Lao seemed caught up in her own thoughts. Though she'd look at Gabriel, then you, then the door, and pretend like she wasn't thinking about your complicated love life, but after all this time and Talon training, she still wasn't as sneaky as she thought she was.

You both nearly jumped when Jack opened the door and trudged in, still in his armor. He rubbed his throat, eyes unfocused when he looked at you and Gabriel. He didn't even notice Lao. He just sat down beside you, resting his head on your shoulder.

Lao quietly crept to her feet and tiptoed to the door, then stopped, realizing she couldn't exit silently.

"Thanks for sitting with me," you told her. "You should probably get cleaned up and have a rest."
"No problem," Lao squeaked, and was out the door before Jack could turn and look at her.

"Sorry," he said. "Throat hurts. Not feeling conversational either." He paused. "But just so you know, Ana's back. Everyone's a bit rough, and they're spending the night in the infirmary, but they're alive. Winston, Zenyatta, and some of the ambassador omnis are getting Athena situated. She's isn't conversational yet, but Zenyatta assured me that she's OK. It's a headache for later," he muttered.

You nodded and took his hand. Your friends had survived. Athena would probably be OK. It was easy to fall asleep now, Gabriel and Jack here with you. It wouldn't hurt to just close your eyes and...

You awakened when the door swung open, banging against the stopper.

"Absolutely not! Lucky still needs a medical exam! Jack, I told you to get cleaned up and get some rest! Your armor need to go through a separate decontamination! Are you trying to get everyone else sick? I don't care if it's a mild nerve agent! It's better safe than sorry! And you're not sleeping here! I'm banning you from the med center for the next twelve hours! Go get some food and go to sleep! You're both on medical leave as of an hour ago! And will someone clean up this blood?!

You stared blearily at the door, a blonde demon lapsing into bouts of German curses while Genji hovered in the background.

Angela didn't wait, she just stormed in like a whirlwind, waving her scanner like a bludgeon. "Why are you still in that armor?"

You blinked. "I wasn't sure people were done shooting at me."

Angela said something under her breath and poked at your back.

"That does still hurt," you murmured.

"You've pushed emitter healing too far," Angela snapped. "And judging by your vitals, you haven't eaten in the last four hours?"

"Probably not," you said. "How's Távio? When can I visit him? Is he awake?"

"He's fine! Because I'm a genius doctor! And he needs rest, so leave him alone! Now stop trying to change the subject! Your body can't heal itself if it doesn't have fuel!" Angela inhaled, and you could see her clenching her fists.

"We'll get some food, and then we can come back-

"I've drugged Gabriel heavily. He won't even begin to wake up for at least another day! There is nothing for you to do here! You can't help him if you've collapsed from exhaustion! You need to go get cleaned up, feed yourself, and sleep in a real bed! Now go to bed! Schnell!"

"But-

"Lucky, I'm in the bucket. Pumped out. Dog tired." Angela gripped your collar. "I've performed three surgeries, shot seven people, and patched up even more! Now Genji won't let me have any more coffee! If you don't go rest up, I can't go off duty!"

You winced, realizing the poor doctor was at the end of her rope. "OK, OK, we'll go. We'll go. You just...get some sleep, OK? Like, we'll sleep, you'll sleep, there will be no emergencies, and it will be better in the morning?"

Angela exhaled slowly, releasing your collar, "Yes. Yes, that sounds wonderful. That sounds suspiciously reasonable. I'll take it. Now get out." Those blue eyes flashed, and you scooted backward.

"Isha and Bandit need-

"McCree will get them," Genji said, gently taking Angela's arm, and pulling her toward the door. "He'll be by soon. I'll even tell him to bathe them."

"Jack-" Angela began.

"I got it, Angela," Jack said, coolly. "I'll take care of Lucky. You go get some sleep. I assume Agent Shimada is going to ensure you reach your quarters safely?"

"He's not my caretaker!" Angela snarled, turning to glare at Genji.

You rested your head in your palm.

"Angela, go get some rest. That's a real order," Jack said, his voice strained. "I'll take care of Lucky. Come on, sweetheart." He offered you his arm, and you only wobbled a little when you rose from the chair. You took a step, suddenly lightheaded. It had been definitely been more than four hours since you ate last. You couldn't remember and you weren't sure how long you'd been dozing beside Gabriel.

You glanced back at Gabriel. "We'll be back. Don't you even think about going anywhere, or I'll take your pudding."

Jack leaned over and kissed Gabriel's forehead. "Love you, Gabe. Going to take care of our girl," he murmured, voice ragged. "She'll do it, you know. She'll steal your dessert, and I'll let her." And with that he put his hand on the small of your back and gently ushered you out of the room.

The trip to his quarters was a blur. You didn't talk. You just kind of shambled along in exhaustion, stopping by the cafeteria for a couple of premade box lunches. There were people in the halls, some cheering as Jack walked by, others giving you very wide berth. It wasn't till you were in the hallway of the officer's quarters that you realized Jack was still touching you, his hand on your arm.

"I think everyone might have just seen-"

"I don't fucking care," Jack rasped, looking down at you, jaw clenched. "Might give them second thoughts about taking another shot at you."

You blinked, reaching up to cup his face. Jack exhaled slowly, cheek resting against your glove. He closed his eyes.

"I'm sorry. I don't mean to be snippy with you," he said, voice softer. "Nearly went off on Angela back there. I know she's right, that we can't do anything for Gabe right now. But I didn't like hearing her yell at you."

"Angela yells at me all the time. It's because she cares, and probably because I'm a terrible patient." You paused, pretty sure that he'd heard it numerous times before, and had just rolled with it. But then, today had been hard on everyone.
"Doesn't matter, didn't like it," Jack muttered. "But I know she meant well. Just...sorry. I couldn't be there for Gabe, but I can at least help you." Guilt and regret permeated every word.

"Jack, it's not-"

"I don't mean it like that!" He said quickly. "Looking after you is not penance. I don't feel obligated. I want to be here with you, to make sure you're OK. You've had a rough week too." He smiled at you weakly, a sort of desperate panic in his eyes like he expected this to go wrong too.

"Thank you," you said. "I know what you mean. But I'm kind of beat right now and probably don't make a lot of sense. But I'm happy you're here, and I appreciate what you're doing."

Jack nodded mutely, relief clearing some of the tension on his face. He leaned over and kissed you right there in the hallway. And you realized then that you weren't the only one not thinking straight. But it felt good to press against him, to feel that spark of heat between you.

Exhaling slowly, Jack pulled away, a sheepish look on his face. "Sorry. Couldn't help myself."

"Uh-huh," you said, kissing his cheek. "I know, I'm irresistible in combat armor. Something about the smell of sweat, blood, and gunpowder really gets you going."

Jack didn't laugh, but he tapped his chin thoughtfully. "You might be right-" He shook his head, and began heading toward his room. "But I think you know by now that I like you in whatever you're wearing, or not wearing." He managed a tired wink as he opened the door for you.

"Only the best for my girl," he said, leaning in to kiss your cheek. "How about I show you a real good time? I have an emitter, what do you want to do first? Shower? Eat? Pass out on the couch from sheer and utter exhaustion?" Despite his flirty words and jokes, Jack moved stiffly, scanning every corner for threats, his gaze distant. You were almost too tired to be that tense, but Jack was still wound tight.

"Let's get out of our armor and eat," you said, feeling your stomach clench.

Nodding, Jack came up behind you and carefully began loosening your straps and opening your seals. You gave a soft sight of relief as the blue chestpiece fell to the ground, freeing your sore muscles. You could see the cracks and impact marks from where Petras had shot you. Two chest plates destroyed in twenty four hours: that was a new record.

Jack shrugged off his coat and tossed it on the floor, shedding everything by the door. A deep purple bruise was fading in the middle of his back. You flinched, and bent over to take off your boots. When you looked back up, Jack had already disappeared into the bedroom. He came back in sweatpants, carrying a t-shirt and an emitter.

You finished stripping off your armor, peeling off your gloves, and dropped onto the couch. You slumped there, the familiar setting a relief after your time away. The blanket remained tucked over the stained couch cushion, and you found yourself squeezing a throw pillow just a little too hard.

Jack set the food on the coffee table and opened up the emitter, while you stared numbly at the carryout boxes. He left the t-shirt on the back of the couch. It was for you, but you couldn't quite summon the energy to get changed.

"So what do we have?" You asked.
"I just grabbed whatever," Jack confessed. "I didn't really read the labels." He picked the boxes up, frowning at the small print. "Chicken Caesar wrap, meatball sub, croque-monsieur, pb&j..." He set them back on the table. "Any preference?"

You shook your head, still caught up in how he said "crock-muncher" and how Lacroix would react to that.

He made a show of fanning the boxes out on the table and slid them around, shuffling the lunches while grinning at you. With flourish he handed you a random box.

"Thanks," you said, mustering a tired smile. "Is this enough for you-?"

"I'm not starving like you. Angela made me drink a whole liter of one of those nasty emergency nutrition shakes. That's probably why I'm so sore at her," Jack said, grabbing a box. He sat close, his thigh pressed against yours, one arm draped around your shoulders.

You got the wrap. It came with a cookie, a drink pouch, and a package of assorted dried fruit. It was like a kid's lunch, but with much bigger portions. You ate the cookie first, the sugar giving you small spike of energy. Moving your limbs didn't seem quite so arduous now.

Jack laughed, and extended his hand, offering you his cookie. You reached for it, but he raised it over your head.

"Ja-"

Grinning, Jack pushed the cookie into your mouth, and you bit down, giving him a dirty look. Chuckling, he released the cookie and kissed you on the cheek. "Sorry, baby." He didn't sound sorry, but you got the cookie, so it was an acceptable exchange.

Grumbling while you chewed, you ate the rest of the cookie and Jack just watched you, eyes bright, a half smile on his face.

"Eat your food," you said, opening up your drink.

"Yes, boss," he said, picking up his sandwich. "Peanut butter and jelly...the meal of champions."

"They should have made us a feast," you grumbled. "Roast beasts and loads of alcohol, with lots of bread and I don't know...hot food things." You took a bite of your wrap, fully aware of how little sense you made.

"You're absolutely right," Jack said solemnly. "Hot food things," he continued, teasing tone slipping through. "Which is pretty much how I describe everything you cook that I can't identify."

"Delicious hot food things," you said, taking massive bite out of your wrap. It wasn't anything to write home about, but you were so hungry, and it tasted far better than you remembered. It was gone too soon and Jack handed you the next box, slowly eating his own sandwich without much interest.

You finished your fruit and took the cookie out of the lunch, giving yourself a moment to digest. "OK, I feel better. I still want fried chicken, omurice, and doria, but I think I'll survive."

"I'd make those if I could," Jack said. "But it wouldn't be as good as yours, and you'd probably starve while I burned the kitchen down."

You kissed his cheek. "It's fine. What can I do for you?"
He just shook his head, shoulders still rigid. "Nothing to do right now. I'm still...processing things. Tomorrow I have bigger, longer meetings and Gérard is tweaking our strategy. I just want to spend time with you and Gabe, but..." He exhaled slowly. "My family should be coming in too. Michael and Fitzpatrick had surgery - Fitzpatrick's knees are shattered. Michael took a bullet to the thigh - missed his femoral, but it came too close. Ray is...Ray." Jack pinched the bridge of his nose. "They gave her pain meds, but she's healing too fast and wrong, so Angela is going to have to have to do some work. She wouldn't let the US military doctors near her, and her squad is enforcing her wishes."

You blinked. "They can-?"

Jack just rolled his eyes. "Legally, yes. It's complicated, but Ray has some...bad blood with the Army brass. It's a long story. I'll tell you later."

"OK," you said, not actually surprised. You finished off your second sandwich, almost as quickly as the first. It helped anchor your mind back in your body, and you sighed, a little more at ease than you'd been before.

"More?" Jack asked.

You shook your head. "I kind of want to, but I'll make myself sick."

"If you're sick, I'll hold your hair back," Jack said patting your back. He hovered next to you, practically looking for something to do.

"Jack...you're so tense it's making me anxious. What can I do for you? Spar?"

He flinched. "No, I don't think that's a good idea right now. You're injured and my control isn't what it should be."

You briefly imagined yourself being thrown across the living room, and landing on the couch, the furniture breaking on impact, or hitting a wall, going through it, getting stuck in the plaster... Yeah, that didn't seem like a good idea.

"Do you need to run or-?"

He shook his head. "I don't want to leave you."

"Jack-"

"I need to be around you right now," he said firmly. "For my own sake." He rubbed the back of his neck. "I know you're a tough independent badass. I'm the one feeling shaky inside. I'm sorry. If you need space-"

"You're not leaving my line of sight any time soon, sir," you snorted. "I went a little too crazy and worked too damn hard to get you back in one piece. I'll probably be skulking in your shadow for the next week or so."

Jack smiled, biting his lower lip, cheeks turning that faint shade of pink. He kissed your nose, hands lingering on your arms. "Let's get a shower and get some sleep. I know you're exhausted."

You blinked. You heard what he wasn't saying, from the shadows in his eyes to the twitching of his fingers. "You won't be able to sleep, will you?"

He shrugged. "I promise I won't be too creepy. I'll just cuddle you and be awake to appreciate it."
You snorted. "Jack, we need to take care of ourselves, especially if we want to help Gabriel. He wouldn't be upset at us for that. He'd be upset that we weren't looking after each other, or ourselves. I can practically hear him ranting about the stupidity of falling on your own sword and how martyrs get nailed to crosses."

Jack stared down at you, eyes wide, lips parted slightly. "I know, but...it's been a rough day. For both of us." He rubbed your wrists gently. You recognized yearning and the hesitation, though you were not sure what exactly he needed. Acceptance? Absolution? Oblivion? You were not sure he could put it into words right now either. You just knew that he was reluctant to ask, especially after everything that happened today.

You didn't feel any such hesitation. Not after everything that happened today.

"Hey there," you said, stroking his cheek. He sighed, a small smile on his lips. You leaned in and kissed him gently, your tongue flicking against his.

Jack's fingers tangled in your hair, as he pulled you onto his lap, his mouth rough against yours. Your permission was all he had been waiting for. He held you against him, trying to show you what he wanted to say, though he didn't seem to know how to translate it into speech.

That was fine, you suddenly weren't in the mood to talk. You ran your hands down his bare chest, grinding against him. And despite being tired and injured, he had no trouble responding. Laughing softly, you leaned in and nipped his throat.

He jolted backward, like you'd shocked him, breathing hard as you sucked on the side of his neck. Eyes closed, he rested his head on the back of the couch, relief clear on his face, that painfully rigid tension already starting to melt away. You continued rocking your hips, enjoying the friction between your legs. You didn't think, you just moved, heat and pleasure starting to build in your core: doing this with Jack came naturally.

"Is that what you want, soldier?" You asked, teeth grazing his ear. He shuddered beneath you, fingers digging into your shoulders. "All you had to do was ask..." Your voice was low, your tone teasing.

"Sweetheart-" Jack rasped. He shuddered, hands sliding down your back to cup your ass. "Need you now."

"Like this?" You murmured, pulling off your rashguard and then your bra, well aware of Jack's destructive tendencies when it came to your clothing.

"Need..." Jack grimaced, fingers digging into your thighs. "Need more control. I know we can't be rough, know you're hurt. Sorry. That's not fair to you." He swallowed roughly, eyes on your face, like he expected you to deny him. He held up a hand. "Give me a second to cool down- Not thinking straight."

"Mmm," you nodded, sliding off his lap.

Jack squeezed his eyes shut, his expression pained. Clenching his fists at his sides, he took deep harsh breaths, drawing all that pressure back inside. You could see him gradually locking down all those hard feelings and reversing all your careful work.

That wouldn't do.

Your back hurt, so you'd have to lay on your stomach. You set a couple of pillows up on the couch and then kicked off your pants. You stretched experimentally, then climbed back onto the couch, fixing the cushions underneath you till you were comfortable. You placed a bigger one against the arm of the sofa - you'd need padding- and glanced over your shoulder.

Jack was still sitting there, eyes closed, teeth gritted, thinking of baseball, or turnips, or something equally unerotic.

"Jack," you purred, extending one bare foot to stroke his inner thigh. "I'm getting cold."

His eyes snapped open, and you grinned as he stared at you, eyes wide and not quite comprehending.

You lay on your stomach, naked, with your ass in the air, and maybe that was too much for Jack in this state? Or maybe your bruises were so terrible looking that he was going to drag you back to the infirmary instead?

You didn't see him move.

One moment you were wondering if you'd overestimated your sex appeal, and the next, you were pressed against the couch, Jack's hands gripping your hips, his teeth sinking into your shoulder, while he ground against your ass.

"Goddamnit, sweetheart," he breathed, voice shaky in your ear. "Are you sure?"

"What about me looks unsure?" You asked, pushing back against him, feeling his erection straining against his pants, your own heart beating too fast now.

Jack groaned. "You're so good to me, baby." He nuzzled the back of your neck. "You have to let me know if it's too much, OK? Please-" And then he thrust inside you, all that heat and force knocking your thoughts - and your breath - from your body.

Your vision blurred, and you dropped your head against the cushion, panting as he stretched you out. You rocked your hips back, but Jack was already moving, short hard strokes, staying half-sheathed inside you, never letting you feel empty. His hands skimmed up your ribs, and cupped your breasts. His teeth grazed the back of your neck, his stubble rough against your skin.

"Jack-" You knew that once he started, it would be full throttle. And you'd thought- foolishly- that you would be prepared to handle him. That was pure hubris on your part. Jack pinned you underneath him, never breaking his hard rhythm. It wasn't just the pounding - he wasn't holding back anything. He was on you: mouth, hands, and cock, and you realized, with only a little chagrin, that you'd overestimated your control of the situation.

You didn't mind.

Jack nipped your ear, chest warm against your back as he fucked you into his couch, his hands sliding back down to your hips to hold you in place. He tore into you with a ferocity you hadn't expected - he'd seemed so tired a few minutes ago...

"Fuck-" You whined, glancing over your shoulder, fingers digging into the sofa. "You're so deep-"

"Good," he groaned. "Can't get enough of you." Teeth clenched, Jack leaned over and kissed you hard, still thrusting into you. You moaned as he sped up, his gaze feral as he kneaded your ass, adjusting the angle so he could push deeper.

"Jack," you moaned, because when he took you like this, you couldn't form coherent thoughts, let alone sentences. You just bounced with each stroke, his hips slapping into you, breaking you "Need you, Jack-"

"Say it again," he growled in your ear.

You whimpered into the cushion as he sped up. "Need-"

"My name," he said, voice hoarse. "Say it again."

"Ja-" You clawed at the sofa, squeezing your eyes shut, your voice cracking in your throat.

"Again," he hissed, like he fucking meant it, then slammed back inside you, making his request even more difficult.

"Jack," you wailed, muscles clenched tight, tension nearly snapping you in half.

It wasn't a slow climb or gentle journey, he drove you over the edge, hammering away at your body while you tried desperately to hold on tight. It was a violent finish, more power than finesse overwhelming your nerves, and you crumbled as the orgasm tore through your core.

He wasn't far behind you. Jack embraced you hard, one arm around your waist as he moved at a frenzied pace, trying desperately to catch up with you.

Bent over his couch, you lay there, mind blank as he finished inside you. He was warm, and breathing hard, arms shaking slightly as he held himself up, not putting his full weight on you. You lay there boneless, pulse slowing, your body gradually regaining its autonomy.

"Sweetheart?" He rasped, nuzzling your neck. "Are you OK?"

"Yup," you nodded, eyes half open as he pulled you into his lap, your head resting against his shoulder. You felt him twitch against your thigh. After being in a relationship this long, it wasn't a surprise. "Give me a moment. Need to go slower this time."

"Are you sure?" Jack's breath hitched. "...Baby, if you're not feeling up to it-"

You stroked his cheek. "Need you too, Jack. You're not the only one feeling...unsettled." You looked up at those soft blue eyes, brimming with emotion. "I'm not just comforting you. This is for me too."

He kissed you then, gentler than before, hands cupping your face. His expression was less strained. "If you're sure," he said, tone still colored with worry.

"I'm home, with you, and need to know for sure that you're safe too," you said, holding his hands between yours. "I know it here." You tapped one temple. "But I don't feel it here just yet." You pressed his palm over your heart. "We're getting there."

Jack swallowed roughly. He leaned in, forehead against yours, eyes never leaving your face. "I love you," he said.

"You better." You kissed him, and lifted yourself, thighs aching as you lowered yourself back onto him. He was hard again - Jack's recovery time certainly hadn't suffered. You took him gradually, breathing deep as you sat on his lap. He rubbed slow circles on your back, letting you get comfortable.

"Do you want me to move?" He asked.

You shook your head. "Not yet." You inhaled a few times, stretching your legs and getting comfortable before kissing him again. "Just anchoring myself to you, for a few minutes. Need...need that stability."

He hugged you to his chest, still rubbing your back. You focused on deep breathing, feeling him around your, your connection solid.

"I love you," you said, voice faint. "I'm glad," he said, kissing the top of your head.

"I was terrified," you said, burying your face in the crook of his neck. "I spent that whole mission afraid that I would be too late."

Jack shuddered.

"I was too late for-" Shin. Tataryn. Gabriel. The names caught in your throat, and in the haze of regret, you weren't sure which one you were going to say...

"No," Jack said. "No, that's not true." He tilted your chin up, making you look at him, his raw grief shredding something inside you. "That's not true, sweetheart."

You didn't have it in you to argue with him right now. So you kissed him again.

"You're here, with me. You made it with time to spare," he said, worry clear in his eyes. "OK," you said, and that crushing pressure, like iron bands around your chest, loosened just a little.

"You're here, with me. You're home, with me." He folded your hands in his.

"I know," you said, your heart clenching at those words. "You don't have to-"

"I need to hear it as much as you do," he said hoarsely, the look on his face painfully bleak. "I need to hear it too."

"Jack-" your voice wavered. "Jack, you're home too. You made it. We both did." You squeezed his fingers, bringing his scarred knuckles to your lips.

Jack shuddered, releasing a low groan. "I know." He took a deep breath. "I know. I'm sorry," he said, eyes squeezed shut.

And you knew immediately that it wasn't you that he was apologizing to. It wasn't you that he was grieving. And you knew what it was like to carry that weight in your heart. You knew, with terrible certainty, that making it home was just the beginning.

"I'm sorry," he repeated, voice barely a whisper.

"I know." You kissed him then. "But it's not your fault either."

Sex was an amorphous thing, a very potent form of wordless communication. Sometimes you couldn't figure out the right thing to say, and sometimes that wordless connection was malleable enough to bridge the gap. It could be hard to predict - sometimes you would not know if it was exactly what you needed or a terrible mistake till afterward. It fulfilled a need: power, pleasure, reassurance, an outlet, an anchor, penance, or absolution. Sometimes it was just sex. Sometimes it was an epiphany. But with Jack, it was always intimacy, usually revealing some kind of vulnerability, his, Gabriel's, or your own.
You began to rock your hips, kissing his face. "I love you, Jack Morrison. I need you here with me."

Jack stared up at you, a hopeful sort of reverence on his face. He folded your hands in his, fingers intertwined. He kissed your knuckles, flesh and metal, his eyes never leaving yours.

"Stay," he said, the words a plea, not a command. "Please stay."

You nodded solemnly. You continued to grind against him, a slow warmth building as he held you in his lap.

He pressed your left hand over his heart and released it. You could feel it beating slow and steady as he reached down and began to gently stroke your clit.

You braced yourself against him, breathing hard as his nimble fingers rubbed faster. You moved with him, full of heat as he began to roll his hips, the two of you in a synchronized rhythm. You reached out, caressing his face and he leaned into you, savoring your touch.

Unlike before, Jack kept a slow steady pace, watching your every move. He kissed your face, and your throat, one hand between your thighs and the other clutching your fingers.

"Stay with me," he murmured. "Stay with me now-"

Your slow climb hit a crescendo, just enough tension to be pleasurable, and then you let it go, riding it out in slow waves, clinging to Jack while he shook underneath you.

Your heartbeat thudded steady in your ears. You were safe. You were home. You had accomplished your mission. And Jack was here with you too. You weren't alone.

You kissed him again, the relief finally sinking in, your body adjusting to reality. You were safe. You were home. You had accomplished your mission. You didn't have to hold it all in any more. You didn't have to hide any more.

And there, in Jack's arms, holding his hand, you began cry.

It wasn't a soft stream of tears or a rogue sniffle. There was no delicacy or drip drip drip of slowly watering eyes. It was a gut-wrenching sob that tore free from your core, maybe a howl, you couldn't be sure. It was all so loud and imbalanced in your head. Gabriel was hurt badly. Tataryn was dead. Shoal was dead. Ziv, Amélie, Lacroix, Távio, and others had been hurt. Feng, Captain Amari, Reinhardt, and Torby had nearly died. Athena was...well, you weren't exactly sure, but she wasn't here. You'd nearly lost everyone, and it hit you now like shotgun blast to the back.

"Sweetheart?" Jack's voice was stricken. "Are you hurt-?"

You were bawling now, just scrunched up ugly crying as you let it all out. It was humiliating. You couldn't form coherent words. You just wept, hugging Jack and trying to say that it wasn't his fault. He hadn't hurt you. You were a mess because everything else was a mess and, oh god you were so sorry. You were sorry for everything. Sorry about what had happened. Sorry that you hadn't been there. Sorry that you had been there, and it still wasn't enough. Sorry that you were a crying like god-awful baby. And mostly sorry that being this miserably sorry didn't fix a thing.

Jack seemed to understand some of it. He held you to him, speaking gently to you like you were a wounded animal. He rubbed your back, using soothing tones, though you couldn't quite make sense of the words. But he held you, he let you be weak, and for that you were unspeakably
When you had finally poured it all out, snot and tears on Jack's shoulder, you sniffled into the t-shirt.

"Sorry," you said, like a goddamn broken record. "I'm sorry."

Jack looked down at you, no pity or disgust on his face. But there was plenty of sorrow and worry.

"Sorry," you repeated.

Jack just kissed your hands. "I love you."

"Love you too," you said, raw and weak inside. "I'm sorry you had to see that. And feel it. Oh fuck, I really slimed you-"

He kissed your forehead. "So what? We can get cleaned up in the shower." There was quiet confidence in his words. Jack was here for you. He rose, carrying you with him, his grip firm, but not restrictive.

You just focused on breathing, on getting back a semblance of your composure.

Jack set you down in the shower, turned on the water, and began helping you wash off. You leaned against the wall, too exhausted to return the favor. He didn't seem to mind, too focused on cleaning you up. It wasn't playful, but his touch was comforting, and you leaned into him, your legs still shaky.

The water began to grow cold, and Jack quickly helped you rinse off, before wrapping you in a towel and carrying you to the bedroom. You sniffled, realizing that there was yet another thing that you had taken for granted and now...it was gone.

"Can I get you anything?" Jack asked. He'd been very quiet while he cleaned you up, almost like he was afraid to set you off again. He placed you on the bed, gently drying your hair with a towel. It always looked awful after he was done with it. You never told him to stop.

"The shower was cold," you said after a moment. You slid under the blankets, shaking just a little.

"I'm sorry," he said, sounding a little confused by your mundane complaint. He tossed the damp towel on the floor. "The plumbing isn't predictable. It happens sometimes-"

"Not since Athena took over," you said. "Never ran out of hot water while she was managing things."

Jack flinched: obviously he hadn't realized it either, till you said something. "She's not lost to us," he said, slipping under the covers beside you and wrapping you in his arms. "She's here, there's just some delay in reintegrating her. Growing pains." He pulled the blankets up to your chin. "Get some rest. Things will be better when you wake up. I promise."

Nodding, you curled up against him, feeling his chest rise and fall, his legs tangled with yours. It felt good, it felt like home, except you were still missing someone. But there was nothing you could do about it now.

Wrung out, sore, and not entirely sane, you closed your eyes, and the world faded away.
Sorry about the late update, real life has been kicking my ass. Got sick, still working lots of overtime, the saga of the passport renewal continues, and I have to buy a new washing machine this weekend... Being an adult is painful and all my complaints sound so boring. Still restoring my computer's settings and now using LibreOffice and it's done something weird to my formatting, IDK WTF.

You guys are all lovely and I am very tired... I just want to write, run my dogs, and eat delicious food. ;___;
Chapter 134

Chapter Summary

The beginning of the aftermath. Did you think your work was done?

Chapter Notes

OK, 1 million+ words this time. Really. facepalm

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Jack was shouting, and you snapped up immediately, reaching under the pillow for your tanto, and then realizing that it was still in the living room with your clothes. You were in Jack's bed, sunlight streaming through the windows. Immediately, you glanced over at Jack. He wasn't touching you. Instead, he turned from side to side, eyes squeezed shut, brow furrowed. He shouted, the words unintelligible as he kicked the blankets off, caught up in violent dream.

"Hey, hey-" you said, leaning over to touch his shoulder. "Jack-"

He swung, fist narrowly missing your head, and you dropped backward, trying to give him more space. Except your foot was wrapped in sheets and blankets, and you thrashed, cursing as you fell out of the bed with a loud thud.

Rubbing your head, you muttered angrily as you reached up to unwind the blanket from around your ankle.

And then Jack was there, peering over the side of the bed, fear bright in his eyes.

"Sweetheart-"

"It was the blanket," you scowled. "I can dodge you just fine, but when the goddamn bedding ambushes me..."

Jack flinched, and gently pulled you up, his hand running over the back of your head.

"I'm sorry," he murmured, squeezing you too tightly. There was sweat on his face and his skin felt clammy. "I'm so sorry-"

"We've all had night terrors," you said, wincing as his fingers massaged the goose egg already forming on your head. "It's not a big deal."

"I could have-"

"It wasn't you, it was the blanket," you repeated, kissing his face. "I'm sore, tired, and kind of dumb. You know, I'm not normally this clumsy."

Jack ran his fingers through his sweat-dampened hair. "I know I nearly hit you."
"Pfft, Ziv nearly hits me all the time. Almost doesn't count," you said, trying to muster a cocky grin.

Jack just shook his head, expression grim. "I'm not Mihret, baby. I'm a lot more dangerous."

That was debatable, but arguing that now wouldn't help anything.

You shrugged. "Look, the reaction isn't great, I agree. But you've shared a bed with Gabriel and me, and we've both had...similar issues in the past. It's something to work on, not something to beat yourself up over, OK?" You cupped his cheeks, hating the guilt you saw in his eyes. "If our roles were reversed, or if it were Gabriel..."

Jack nodded slowly. "OK," he said. "Yeah, you're right." He kissed the top of your head, white-knuckled fists at his sides. "You're right. Let's get some breakfast, and it will be fine." He gave you a weak smile, with no conviction in his words.

You took his hands, and sandwiched them between yours. He let you.

"Jack," you said, knowing that he wasn't in the headspace to listen to any comfort or even sort through his feelings. "I'm here and I love you, OK? We'll get through this. I'm not saying it'll be easy, but we've solved shitty situations with unfavorable odds before. It's kind of what we do."

His smile widened slightly. "I know," he said, nodding again, with maybe a little more confidence. "I know."

To your surprise, Amélie and Lao were waiting outside the door when you emerged. Both women were armored up, Amélie's makeup flawless and Lao's cybernetic arm glowing as she worked on something. Reports maybe? Jack was back in his Strike Commander regalia, calm mask firmly in place. Jack had politicking to do today. And you would hang out in the infirmary, keeping an eye on things, visiting your wounded friends, and helping Jesse with Blackwatch reports. But first you needed to debrief Lacroix. There was a lot that hadn't been said yesterday.

You carried your carbine and a rucksack, and wore your Blackwatch hoodie and fatigue pants, armored vest underneath, mostly for Jack's peace of mind. You had already put in a request for new armor, your measurements were on file and the quartermaster would have something by the end of the day.

Amélie examined your attire with a politely blank expression.

"The body armor will ruin the lines of a nice outfit anyway," you said, pulling your hood up. "Besides, I'd be better off keeping a low profile today."

Amélie sighed, rolling her eyes upward, shaking her head, a faint smile on her lips. She handed Jack a bag.

Blinking, he opened it up and pulled out a chocolate-dipped croissant.

"Chanceux says those are your favorite."

"Thank you," Jack said, staring at it.
You craned your neck, glancing at Lao in disbelief. She'd brought pastries for Jack, but not you? Jack pulled out another sugar-dusted cylinder, looking confused.

"That's a Xuixo," Amélie said, very blithely. She gave you a wry grin. "Chanceux is a fan of viennoiserie." Viennoiserie, or Viennese things, were basically fancy breakfast pastries. And yes, you liked them a lot. Who didn't?

"Give," you growled, tugging on Jack's sleeve.

Jack raised a brow. "Amélie handed me the bag," he said, sounding terribly smug. "I can't just transfer you her gift in front of her."

You narrowed your eyes at him. "Jack-"

Jack began to laugh, and placed the fried dough against his lips. You lunged forward and bit into it. He didn't take a bite, but he didn't let go either, looking all-too pleased to feed you the cream-filled pastry right in front of those conniving, backstabbing asshats that you called friends.

Then Jack bit down, getting a small bite of pastry, but releasing the remainder of it to you. "That's really good," he said.

Locking eyes with Jack, you angrily ate the rest of it and did not offer to share. Because it wasn't a very big pastry.

Jack just chuckled and kissed your forehead, before wiping a smear of pastry cream off the corner of your mouth.

Both Amélie and Lao were giggling behind their hands.

"I can't believe you were right-" Lao wheezed. "I knew Lucky was feral, but I think Switzerland has made her more aggressive."

"Of course, I was right. I know Chanceux," Amélie said, nodding in satisfaction. "And so you will buy us lunch."

"Worth it," Lao sighed, shaking her head.

"Seriously?" You growled, wiping your mouth on the back of your hand, giving Amélie a dirty look.

"Yes, Yue will buy lunch for you and me," she beamed, and you didn't miss that she was already calling Lao by her personal name instead of her surname. "After all, I did buy everyone breakfast."

Amélie and Lao would be accompanying Jack on his rounds today. The Bitch Squad was stepping up to take Epsilon's Squad's role, at least till things had settled. They escorted you to the infirmary first though, because you would be managing Blackwatch duties and doubling as security. As much as you hated to let Jack out of your sight, you were keeping a lower profile. But they would be checking in with you throughout the day.

Jack lingered by the infirmary entrance, not doing a very good job of pretending like he wasn't watching you. After everything that happened, the both of you were being a little too obvious about your protective tendencies. You just shook your head, knowing that would be a problem in the near future, but not quite ready to deal with it.

"Riggs is maintaining encrypted comms," Amélie said. "We do not know when or if Athena will be coming back online in the near future."

You exhaled slowly, carefully weighing what you knew about the situation and the bureaucracy. "Stick to Blackwatch field comm protocols," you said, because even if Riggs was very good at his job, there were too many unfriendly ears inside the organization. You would have to assume that everything being said would be overheard by hostiles. And despite integrating Athena into some of Blackwatch's operations, Gabriel had been stringent about keeping other information and methodologies independent. "Maintain Operation Checquy codenames for now. Chaff chatter is fine, try not to get too personal, because I guarantee there will be transcripts in triplicate. In case of a situation though, use the Singh-Mayfair protocol to send priority messages-"

"Jesus, Lucky, we're not even leaving HQ today," Lao said, rubbing the back of her neck.

"And?" You asked, tartly, raising a brow, your arms crossed. It did not matter that fifteen minutes ago, she'd seen you rage-eat a pastry while your lover laughed at you. That was personal. This was work.

Lao flinched. "...And it occurs to me that obviously you're right to be a stickler for good security, considering the situation," Lao amended quickly. "Sorry, I didn't mean to argue policy. You just...shifted gears so fast. I'm rusty."

"I know that the Singh-Mayfair process is kind of slow, and our current tech difficulties will delay it even more," you said. "But that's our most secure encryption that we do not share with the rest of Overwatch."

"It's a pain," Lao agreed. "But you're right. I'll see if I can do something to streamline the process. Ziv has a private encrypted channel with paranoid security monitoring, I'll brainstorm with him."

You glanced over at Amélie, who looked very pleased, for some reason.

"Do you need anything?" You asked.

"I am fine for the moment, but I think Agent Lao will need a more suitable sidearm," she said. "We also need more underarmor plating, preferably of the make that you supplied for Ziv."

"Weapons procurement authorizations are already in place. Can't get the armoring for you today though, that was a custom order," you said. "But I'll allocate operational funds for it." You rubbed your temples, knowing that Gabriel would have already had a plan in place for how to run Jack's backup squad. But the situation was extremely complicated and you had a limited amount of trustworthy people on site. You wanted to send in Diallo and Vo - Tataryn's people had experience with bodyguard work, but Diallo wasn't in fighting shape, and Vo needed extra supervision. You already knew that she did not get along with Amélie, and this was not the time to test new team dynamics. "Are you carrying personal kinetic barriers?" You asked. It was unlikely, those were expensive and utilized sparingly.

Lao and Amélie shook their heads.

You picked up your tablet and requisitioned two, not caring that it would put you over on the quarterly equipment budget. Shit was going down, and you weren't sending them out unprepared.
Plus, you could still submit a reimbursement request to Overwatch's accounting division, since the shields were being used in a joint operation to protect the Strike Commander. "Just in case. Make sure you swing by the Quartermaster's on the way to the conference room."

On Sing, or rather White Rabbit personnel, were helping to maintain security in the infirmary. And Chang's people would be in later today. You weren't sure what condition they were in, but you could at least tap them as a resource.

"Have I ever told you how sexy it is when you're all take-charge and efficient?" Jack murmured, leaning over your shoulder.

Your lips quirked upward. "Sir, your next meeting is in ten minutes, and my people still need to pick up more gear. You have a lot of work to get done today. Please try to stay on task."

Jack snorted. "OK, Boss." He took a step back, possibly realizing that he was standing too close.

"Strike Commander," you said, inclining your head, expression cool.

"I'll be checking in later," he said, narrowing his eyes at you.

"You better," you said, raising your chin.

Giving you a curt nod, the Strike Commander turned on his heel. "Let's move."

Lao cleared her throat loudly, and it sounded suspiciously like laughter. Amélie winked at you over her shoulder, and then they were out the infirmary doors. You stood there, pretty satisfied with yourself, until you felt the prickling in the back of your neck.

"I realize you and the Strike Commander were...hashing out operational details, but Lacroix is getting impatient," Genji said, in your other ear, and you jumped straight up into the air, swearing.

You shook your fists at Genji, till your pulse leveled out. He just smirked behind his faceplate, having clearly won that round. You reluctantly followed him into Lacroix's room. There were four screens haphazardly set up along the counter, three playing different news channels in different languages, subtitles on, one streaming a performance by The Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra. Or so it said on the screen. It could be lying.

Dressed in black Nehru suit and a startlingly stylish gold brocade eye patch, hair combed at a rakish angle, Lacroix sat cross-legged on his neatly made hospital bed, skimming a tablet, his phone on one side, a laptop on the other.

"I was going to ask how you were feeling-"

"Je ne vais pas mal. Mais rassurez-vous, un jour, je ne manquerai pas de mourir," Lacroix said with an air of great amusement.

"-But clearly, you're doing fine." You rolled your eyes. "Why are you still here?" You asked, looking around. Because of course he'd turned his hospital room into mini-command center.

"Angela has yet to discharge me," Lacroix said, rolling his eye. "Something about forty eight hours of observation and other nonsense. Believe me, it is incredibly inconvenient."
"Yes, who do you think had to commandeer all the equipment?" Genji asked sotto voce.

"I thought that's what Ziv was for," you said. "Other than being the Blackwatch pain in the ass, isn't he the stevedore lackey of information systems and all things tech?"

"Medical exemption. His foot, you see," Genji deadpanned, arms crossed.

You began to cough.

"Agent Shimada, don't you have a doctor to be shadowing or whatever it is Dr. Ziegler needs you for?" Lacroix asked dryly.

"Moral support," you said, though you knew Genji was actually supposed to be managing White Rabbit's personnel while Feng was recovering.

Genji gave you a look.

"I don't know if there's anything moral about-" Lacroix began, giving Genji a sly grin.

"It might interest you to know that "Acting" Commander Bell babbles when concussed," Genji said, speaking over Lacroix. You stifled a laugh. "And he answered all kinds of interesting questions yesterday. Make sure you ask Lacroix for both parts of the interview." Pointedly ignoring Lacroix, he sauntered out of the room, politely shutting the door behind him.

"Quelle merde," Lacroix said sourly.

"He certainly is," you said, and pulled up a chair. You paused as you sat down, recognizing the blonde woman on the middle news screen. You stared for a long moment.

"You have not been following the news," Lacroix said, though he didn't sound surprised.

"I was sleeping," you scowled.

He clicked the remote, and rewound the footage.

You sat down.

Jane Morrison-Vanderberg stood on the front porch of her parents' farmhouse. The camera panned across the fields, showcasing the craters, scorch marks, shredded omnic hulls, and dozens of holographic body outlines. You squinted. Yup, dozens.

"-Yes, it is very strange that it took two hours for backup to arrive, even after multiple emergency distress signals. I am very grateful to the marine squad that did show up - it turns out they were being held up by some kind of red tape. Senator Armstrong assures me that this is being investigated by an external body and that such a thing is highly irregular," Jane said coolly, her arms crossed, gray eyes flashing.

"Why do you think this happened, Jane? Was someone sending a message to Overwatch?" An off-screen voice shouted.

"No, this was a blatant attempt to gain leverage over my brother," Jane said, inclining her head to the side, an almost raptor-like motion. "They had orders to take us alive. Though, after they shot my teenage brother, they decided he was deadweight and it would be more expedient to just kill him." Jane gritted her teeth, her anger clear on her face. It mirrored Jack's, but sharper, more visceral. You wanted to take a step backward.
"Who do you think did this?" Someone else shouted.

"That is the question," Jane said with the confidence of someone who already knew the answer. "I have been instructed that some of that information may be classified and to make outright accusations might hamper the government investigations." She paused dramatically, looking straight at the camera. "Make of that what you will. I do understand that investigative work is delicate, but we will not be intimidated into silence: I will share what I can."

The crowd quieted down immediately, eager for the scoop.

"It took money to bring this many high-tech killers into our small town, unnoticed. It took influence to bring in OR-14s, something we haven't seen much of on American soil, at least, not since the DC attacks." She gave the camera a pointed look, saying exactly what she needed to without actually coming out and speaking the words. "They had inside knowledge of our security protocols and procedures. They knew our bodyguards by name and reputation. They told us that no one was coming, that they'd made sure of it. It was only due to the fact that we have extremely vigilant and conscientious protectors that we weren't taken, or worse."

"Do you think this had the same financiers as the DC attacks?"

"Are you claiming a conspiracy?"

"Is the UN behind this?"

"Is the Strike Commander going to retaliate?"

Jane held up one hand, a queen addressing her court. "I don't know all the answers yet. But I won't let them bury our investigation. This never should have happened. We've weathered lone gunmen, small cohorts of mercenaries, and terrorist assassins before. This attack was far-better coordinated. They had plasma weapons."

You narrowed your eyes, wondering if that was true, or if she was covering for Chang's unit.

"Are you scared?"

"What are you going to do?"

"I am going to get my parents' homestead cleaned up. I am going to go home and hug my children. And then I am going to get out there and find some answers," Jane said, like she was listing her schedule for the day. "They attacked my family, tried to assassinate both my brothers, and threatened my babies. That is unacceptable anywhere, let alone here on American soil. So we will not back down. We are only doing what any other law-abiding, patriotic American family would do: we will find those responsible, and we will make sure they are brought to justice."

The screen cut to a talking head, grinning widely at the screen. "And with a family like that, could you expect any less from Veteran SEP war hero Jack Morrison? Wow- wee! We should sign his sister up too!"

You sat there, silently, wondering if you should just hand the investigation over to Jane. She'd terrorize the truth out of everyone.

"There's more," Lacroix said.

The screen cut to a camera following Jane down a suburban street. "Mrs. Vanderberg! Don't you think you're overreacting? The US government has more important things to do than answer to an overwrought school shrink clinging to her brother's reput-

Thwack! Something hit the camera, and the screen shook and went dark for half a second. The next shot was out of focus, but a little old lady with a great big leather purse was swinging the purse at the reporter.

"You leave that nice Morrison girl alone!" She shouted in a screechy voice. "They're a good family! They've been through a lot! Just who do you think you are?"

A middle-aged man in a baseball cap stepped up, holding his hand up to keep the cameraman from following Jane to her car. "I think you should leave."

Another woman blocked them in from the other side. "Stop harassing, Jane!"

The old lady continued to thwack away at the reporter, telling him exactly how ashamed of himself he should be and demanding to know what his mother would think of his behavior. It was good to see Jane using her powers to galvanize the public into demanding answers. You just hoped she didn't turn that scrutiny too closely onto Overwatch.

Lacroix paused the screen. "Senator Armstrong wants to know if Madame Morrison-Vanderberg is interested in a career in politics."

"I know she does some community organizing and works with a couple of advocacy groups," you said. "So maybe?"

Lacroix laughed softly. "Perhaps there will be a Morrison presidency after all."

You shuddered, and then paused. "Is most of the coverage favorable?"

"It is very positive," Lacroix said, giving you a shrewd smile. "Americans love a pretty blonde family of "victims," especially patriotic ones. Rightly or wrongly, Madame Morrison-Vanderberg and her children will garner the most sympathy from the public." "Rightly" or "wrongly," that was an advantage you could use.

"Armstrong?" You asked, wondering if he had a hand in this.

"Oh no, politicians don't have that kind of pull with the media," Lacroix laughed. "A little closer to home."

You scratched your head.

"Jack's sister is very good friends with Gabriel's sister Catriona..." Lacroix sighed, looking mildly annoyed that he'd had to point it out.

Catriona worked for an ad agency, or some kind of marketing firm, but as far as you knew, she didn't work PR... Though, there wasn't that much difference in the fields. Instead of a commodity, she was helping sell the Jane Morrison image. Or even if Catriona wasn't directly involved, she had to have connections... "Did this just happen organically, or did you already have a plan in place?"

Lacroix chuckled, pleased that he didn't have to explain every step. "Jane and Catriona are part of a large and active network of SEP veterans' families," Lacroix continued. "Both ladies are well-known and well-respected. Perhaps they had a little guidance when it came to how best to utilize their strengths, but I assure you, they are no one's puppets. I had anticipated an outpouring of sympathy, of affected martyrdom even..." Lacroix shook his head, looking faintly exasperated. "But not this."
Translation: Lacroix totally had a subtle plan in place to generate public outcry and sympathy for the Morrisons. But then Jane and Catriona added bells, whistles, and buckets of glitter, and rode it into the limelight so they could crucify whomever went after their families.

"You were interesting for about an hour, eight hours ago, when they figured out that Jack's agent was the very same "Ms. Strike" who guarded Jack in Paris, and perhaps tackled him in Cologne. So we released the Morrison family attack story a little early."

"Thanks," you said.

"It's only a temporary measure," Lacroix said, folding his hands in his lap. "People are very interested to know just whom the Strike Commander is so eager to defend. And there are already rumors circulating around headquarters. Something about him hovering over you yesterday evening, right before you both disappeared..."

You facepalmed. "I was too tired to-" Except in the end, you weren't. You kept your hand over your face, trying to shape your expression into something less...telling.

"Doesn't matter, the footage is out there now," Lacroix said, not actually sounding bothered, which surprised you a little. "We knew this was likely to happen eventually. We'll see how it is received and act accordingly."

You frowned. Because being famous would make being a Blackwatch operative very difficult. But Lacroix wasn't wrong. The moment you became entangled with Jack and Gabriel, this level of attention became a possibility.

"I have already persuaded a rather reluctant delegate to call for a deeper investigation into Petras' assets. As I've provided some of the intel already, it shouldn't be too difficult for him, especially since Jack has already come out accusing Petras of grave misconduct."

"This is the part where you brag about your cleverness," you said, folding your hands in your lap.

"Mmm," Lacroix shook his head. "The nuances of political influence and game theory are lost on you. Suffice to say, it took some maneuvering and his political allies aren't too happy, but... It gives us a stronger platform to pursue our..."

"You blackmailed the Secretary General of the UN," you said.

Lacroix stiffened, frowning. "Did Madame Kwento tell you?" He pursed his lips, looking almost disappointed at the prospect of someone else ruining his surprise.

"Not directly, no. She mentioned that you'd forced someone's hand, and she looked rather worried when she did. Which meant it was someone high ranking, and since she's the Undersecretary, that's a big hint. Combining that knowledge with the mad smug-mug you're wearing means someone very important is dancing at the end of your strings."

Lacroix chuckled. "It is not blackmail, per se. Merely a reminder that our interests are aligned and perhaps he should remember how closely his status is tied to ours. Or perhaps we should cut him loose with the rest of the chaff and see how well he fares."

"Uh-huh," you said. "Definitely not blackmail or any shade of unethical." Because you didn't buy that Lacroix's leverage was something as simple as "bad PR." No, Lacroix knew something, but he wasn't telling.

"And even if it was, I would do far worse for Amélie and Ziv," he said, looking you dead in the eye, all traces of good humor gone. "Maybe even McCree."

You snorted. "Finally watched the video, did you?"

Lacroix merely laced his fingers together and stretched his arms, affecting a look of nonchalance. He smiled politely, but his lower lip curled a bit too far, and his eyes were flat and cold. "I can only admit that I better understand your lapse in judgment."

"They were never going to be safe while he was alive," you said with a shrug. "I know, they didn't choose safe lives. And killing Petras didn't eliminate all the danger. But after everything that happened..."

"I said I understand, Chanceux," Lacroix said louder, still maintaining that facsimile of a civility, though his gaze darkened and his voice grew raspier. "Tactically, it was a mistake. We both know it. But we both know why you did it, and you will get no more grief from me on the subject. Do you understand?" He gazed at you with that one bloodshot eye, teeth clenched, looking as far from sane as you'd ever seen him.

You sat back in your chair, arms crossed, heart beating a little too fast. "Yeah, I get it." You exhaled slowly, because everyone's feelings were a little too close to the surface. Mr. Machiavellian Spymaster couldn't bring himself to admit the truth, but you got it. "You're welcome." After all, he was probably too pragmatic to kill Petras in the heat of the moment, no matter his feelings. That didn't mean he wasn't grateful for your lapse in judgment.

Lacroix gave a sharp bark of laughter, shaking his head, one hand over his face. "Vraiment, Chanceux?"

You just pulled out your flask, and offered it to him. "Calm down. I'm the one who went off the rails. You don't have to get all hysterical; I already did it for you."

Still shaking his head, Lacroix accepted the flask, a threw back a mouthful of whiskey. He didn't cough, not that you expected him to, and handed you the flask back.

You took a shot as well - just enough to settle your nerves, because suddenly you wanted to go check on Gabriel, or pop in on Jack. It was a nagging feeling, like if you did not, something amorphous and bad would happen. And if you let yourself, you would begin to imagine all the bad things that could happen, and that wasn't logic, that was just unchecked paranoid neurosis-really only appropriate at 4AM when you were already half-insane from insomnia.

"So how do you think you did as a squad leader?" Lacroix asked, voice steadier than before.

You shrugged. "I was less concerned about leadership and asserting myself, and more concerned about rescuing Jack and not fucking up." You knew there was a lot of room for growth when it came to your leadership skills, but your friends understood the importance of the mission. You needed manage things, yes, but everyone had been fairly united on what needed to be done. You couldn't count on that being the case every time you went out with a squad.

Lacroix nodded. "When you encountered Prince, you should not have sent Hanzo away."

You winced, remembering those metal arms on your throat, your vision going black around the edges. "Yeah, probably not."

"I realize that it was personal, but-"

"Yeah," you rolled your eyes. "I know."
"Don't cut me off," Lacroix snapped. "There are times when personal reasons and pragmatic ones overlap. This was not one of those instances. If he had taken you hostage, it wouldn't take long before they figured the leverage they had over Jack. If he had killed you, your squad would be without a leader, and as competent as Amélie is, she does not have the same relationship with the other agents that you do."

You blinked. "Yeah. You're right. But I was worried about Feng too..."

"I understand that you technically made the correct choice, considering Ms. Zhai's situation, but it was an unnecessary risk, to the mission and to yourself." Lacroix massaged his brow. And you understood that he might have considered Feng an acceptable loss, even if you did not. "You do recall that dying equated automatic failure, do you not?"

You snorted. "Yeah." You sat there, in silence for a moment, your fingers itching for something to do. You weren't entirely sure what kind of test you passed, and you hadn't really taken time to think about it.

"You didn't die. You saved Jack. And you kept our people alive. It's good work, Chanceux, though there's obviously room for improvement."

"Well, it's not like I run my own squad so..." You trailed off, recalling that parts of the Bitch Squad were still in action and that you were the one giving orders...

"Not yet," Lacroix said, looking disturbingly smug.

"...Wait, what did I pass or fail to fail?"

"Nothing, officially," Lacroix said, regaining that carefree air of smarminess that you knew and wanted to throw out of a window. "Though "L'escouade de Salope" is a rather salacious name, Chanceux. Perhaps even a tad discriminatory."

Groaning, you rested your face in your palm. "I was not in my right mind and I was totally being facetious. And don't you even think about lecturing me on political correctness right now. I'll tell Angela you're having auditory hallucinations and she'll totally extend your infirmary stay. And she'll believe me over you, because you have a head injury and would absolutely lie to cover your ailments."

"That's...devious," Lacroix murmured, stroking his chin, his tone almost admiring. "You are getting better at utilizing indirect resolution methods." He gave you a thoughtful look. "What are your thoughts on Bell and that whole "Acting Strike Commander" coup?"

"Coup is a good description," you said, crossing your arms. "We figured they'd come after HQ with most of leadership down or offsite. On top of assassination attempts, I expected a cover-up, but not a full-on PR strike like that. But I guess it's the next logical step – fill the vacuum, and let their patsy ride in on the corpses of better soldiers."

"Indeed," Lacroix nodded. "It backfired though. Jack destroyed his credibility during the broadcast- which was remarkably good idea, Chanceux, given your disdain for the media."

"It was insurance," you said with a shrug.

"It was," Lacroix nodded. "Besides the clear message that someone is targeting our Overwatch war heroes, there has been plenty of humorous content to draw attention to the situation: social media is already rife with jokes about "Strike Commander Cosplayer" and "he was so mad that they matched, he was spitting teeth." It's quite amusing."
"But it is worth noting that Bell is the son of a rich American family with political ambitions; he holds the rank of Captain in the USAF, but has no real experience or accomplishments. Unsurprisingly, the Bells and Petruses have business ties."

"Oh boy, another shitty family to stalk. I can't wait," you sighed.

Lacroix just laughed. "Yes. I look forward to sifting through the databases of Petras' private network. "Auntie" Zheng has already begun to offload a rather large quantity of interesting data, some of it already sorted and flagged for my attention. Very thoughtful of her."

You nodded. "On Sing was integral to this operation."

"They were, weren't they?" Lacroix stared up at the ceiling, his expression thoughtful. "I understand they were most helpful at the end of Tarasque." He folded his hands in his lap. "Do they know about it?"

"Yeah," you said, remembering that tense conversation that you and Jesse had had with Dragonhead Feng on the way back from Hanoi.

Lacroix inhaled slowly. "Did you make any-"

"Nope, played dumb," you said, deciding not to fess up to your moment of weakness where you would have given Feng anything to save Gabriel. Feng had been a good enough friend not to ask you then, and for that you would always be grateful. "But they definitely knew it existed."

Lacroix nodded. "We can work with that." He tapped his chin. "What do you think we should do with it?"

"I don't know if Overwatch is ready to raise Athena's baby cousin. But I don't know if handing off that kind of bundle to On Sing is wise either."

"I believe we can reach an understanding with On Sing. Zhai Feng seems to be quite fond of you and the Morrison family. She is sentimental, because she can afford to be," he added.

You weren't sure what to make of that statement.

"You have questions about Hanoi," he said, shifting subjects yet again. But he was right, though that was an understatement. Because in the past, Gérard had once been Odile, Amélie's dear friend, and it was Amélie, not Gérard, who had really crossed Nguyen.

"Did she really use a bust of Pericles?" You asked.

Lacroix stared at you for a moment, like he couldn't quite believe you'd latched onto that mundane detail. "Yes. It was her great-grandfather's, and quite old and hideous."

You nodded, because it was easier than asking, "did Amélie really kill a romantic rival in self defense, or had Lacroix killed an old friend for the betrayal?" It didn't matter, not really. Nguyen's son had died because of it, and from the sound of it, so had a lot of other people.

"Anything...else?" He asked.

You tapped your chin. Because you had spent a long time digging into Lacroix's past, trying to figure out exactly whom he was, what he had done, and if he had any really embarrassing exploits you could rub his nose in. Sadly, you had kind of failed on the entire endeavor. Now you could go back to researching, because you had a better starting point. It seemed almost...unfair to just ask him the details. "Anything you think I should I should know?"

Lacroix studied your face, that single eye searching for something. "I am concussed, possibly suffering from auditory hallucinations, and sentimental enough to speak too freely. Are you sure you don't have any questions?"

"Oh tons," you said. "But I can always just ask Amélie. She won't jerk me around like you do."

Lacroix's look of absolute disbelief really warmed the cockles of your heart. Whatever the cockles were. Your heart was warm, and that meant the cockles had to be too. Yeah.

You didn't need to ask him about Nguyen. You just imagined ten years from now, if you hadn't stopped Lao, facing her and all the damage she'd done. It wasn't the same, but you still felt that brand of heartsickness, guilt, and responsibility. Time and therapy would erode at that cluster of feelings, but in Lacroix's case? Well, that wound was deeper.

Lacroix frowned, brow wrinkled, either disturbed by the fact Amélie might reveal more than he wanted, or by your seeming disinterest in his life. Because drama-llama Lacroix loved being mysterious, and you weren't taking the bait. "Chanceux, are you sure-"

You just shrugged, giving him a knowing smile. "I can always ask you later," you said. "I'm sure you'd be honest with me. After all, you went through all that trouble to keep Nguyen from shooting me while I was running my mouth." You pointed at your left eye, trying to smile, though suddenly you didn't feel like it.

Lacroix sighed, shaking his head. "Oh Chanceux, you were always meant to be a distraction, to keep her attention divided," he said, voice oddly gentle. "I knew you would anger her, and I knew she wouldn't react well. But I don't throw agents away. It was my responsibility, as I had planned the operation and chosen this strategy."

And he had been willing to pay the price. You didn't like being a pawn, being manipulated, but Lacroix had done the best he could to get you home safely. That counted for something.

"I mean, I was rather shocked that she destroyed that vase. Do you have any idea how old that ceramic was? She preserved it during the Omnic Crisis and then you enraged her enough to hurl it at your head. Granted, it was a bit...ugly, but full of important history."

"How was it full? It was a vase. There were no flowers or water either, I was there."

Lacroix groaned. "Truly, Chanceux, you could annoy a saint."

"Wouldn't know, haven't met any," you said, though Zenyatta and Reinhardt's faces briefly flashed across your mind.

Lacroix chuckled, arms folded in his lap. "So no more questions about Hanoi?"

You began to shake your head, because after everything that happened, there was a deeper understanding between you and Lacroix. But then...

"OH WAIT!" you shouted, slapping your knee and jumping to your feet, pointing your metal fingers at his face.

Lacroix jerked backward, eye widening.
"I do have a bone to pick with you, you lousy sneak! And don't you fucking deny it: you knew Isha was in your goddamn backpack. Just what the fuck were you thinking bringing my murderbird to Hanoi, you reckless son of a bitch? I ought to-"

Lacroix gave an indelicate snort. "I only realized it during transit, after it was too late to turn back. It seemed safer to wait till we arrived at our destination. I did not want her to become scared and get lost in the crowds, or worse. And we could not afford to make a scene or attract attention."

You squinted at him.

He raised his hands. "I was not about to bring an untried asset into direct combat on such a critical mission. There was no guarantee she wouldn't compromise us. And I have no desire to incur more of Jack or Gabriel's wrath."

You squinted even harder, noticing that he didn't seem bothered by your wrath. Probably because he knew you wouldn't deck him right now. Ugh. Giving him the stink-eye, you sat back down. "You could have warned me."

"I did not want her to panic at the prospect of discovery. I had no idea how she would react and her hearing is quite good."

You crossed your arms. "Uh-huh."

"It was not my idea and I have learned a great deal about the capabilities of your pet. And it seems I will learn a great deal more as Amélie says that Zhai Feng will be producing more." He shook his head, good humor seeming a little strained. "Ziv has spared no detail about her destructive tendencies."

You pictured the damage that could befall Lacroix's expensive wardrobe. It made you smile. And speaking of destructive...

"Do I need to worry about Vo and how she's going to react to...everything?" You asked.

"You must always be concerned for Min," Lacroix said gravely. "She does not play well with others, but she does not do well on her own either."

"Blackwatch in a nutshell," you sighed.

"Indeed," Lacroix said. "So many dangerous people, without the faintest idea of how to look after themselves outside of combat, and mostly unaware of that deficiency. It's a remarkable paradox." He shook his head, smiling brightly.

"You're not funny," you said.

"I'm not wrong, and that's what bothers you more," Lacroix chuckled. "Though I'm not sure why you're so defensive. You are one of the less extreme cases."

A faint compliment? He was trying to put you at ease – no insults, because you'd retaliate. But nothing too blatant, because you were suspicious by nature. You snorted, knowing he wanted something.

"We will need to do something about Min, yes," Lacroix said. "I am still weighing my options, but it appears to me that both Min and Agent Diallo might be in need of a new placement within the organization. Diallo has experience in bodyguard work, and minding Min. Min is Min. Her position will always be unique."
They needed a new squad because Tataryn was dead and he never got around to replacing Sinaga. You exhaled slowly. "You had something in mind?"

"I do, but it's tentative. You're better off putting Diallo on Strike Commander duty, and having Min help dismantle some of the armaments from yesterday's battle." Min liked taking apart explosives, almost as much as she liked building them. Hopefully it would keep her mind off of things. You were staying busy too, though if Gabriel didn't wake up soon, you would have to face that issue more closely. Your throat was suddenly dry, and you swallowed, though it felt like you might choke on air.

"There will be more time for mourning later," Lacroix said, not unkindly. "I know it is difficult. But we must keep up with current events. I'm afraid our enemies are all psychopaths who will not make time to mourn their own or give us any courtesy."

"Yeah, I know," you said, straightening up, unwilling to get emotional in front of the resident supervillain.

"So, I have to ask, how did you figure out...Athena's secret?" Lacroix asked, leaning forward. "I didn't realize you had an interest in advanced AI or that level of tech expertise-"

"A lot of things about Athena don't add up," you said. "And maybe she gave me some hints. But anyone who's openly interacted with Athena has to know she's special. Granted, I didn't piece the whole thing together till later. But that briefing on Operation Metis, that filled in the rest of the gaps."

Lacroix gave you a faint smile. "I thought it might."

You leaned in closer, scooting your chair forward. Now you faced Lacroix directly, focusing on that single dark eye. "I know Gabriel and Jack would not have authorized that much of an information release, even to me. So how'd you do it?"

Lacroix smiled and stretched out his hand. "I know you have something for me."

You snorted, and reached into your bag, pulling out a bottle of expensive mineral water and a pack of Gitanes. "If Angela catches us smoking in her infirmary..." You had clear memories of her unbridled fury, as well as her prowess with that staff. It wasn’t just for healing. You’d seen her do some real damage in close quarters.

"You have a good point. We can just taste them," Lacroix said, as you handed him the bottle and a cigarette. He placed the cigarette between his lips, inhaling the faint fragrance of tobacco. His smile was lazy, almost conspiratorial. You mirrored him, shaking your head.

"So how'd you do it?"

"It is partially thanks to you," he said, still leaning forward, elbows on his knees. You were sitting the same way, head angled to hear him better. The posture of gossips, that's what spies were after all: just extremely intense, well-funded, multinational gossips. "In fact, without your involvement, it might have been impossible."

You raised a brow. Had he lobbied Jack or Gabriel in secret- No. You closed your eyes, a small stray memory floating to the surface. You'd flagged it as a "potential problem" at the time, but nothing seemed to come of it... "They left you in charge when they came to Greece to dig us out."

Lacroix's eye sparkled with delight.
"Your scheduled remodel of Jack's office was a distraction. The soup was too." Though they kept the improved recipe, and it had rapidly become a favorite menu item paired with the croque-monsieur. "I'm willing to bet you made a lot of little changes across a dozen or so operations, just to generate a good smokescreen." You paused, realizing that he could not know that you were alive when he did this, that he had to have a contingency plan if you had not survived. But there was no need to mention that detail. He had used the opportunity as another safeguard in his master plan.

"Finding the correct syntax was tricky," he admitted. "I could give you access to my personal files without much trouble. But creating an alternate access code and changing certain compartmentalized intel permissions without Athena directly registering them was a feat."

"Did Ziv help?" You asked.

"After a fashion. We simply had a long luncheon with Winston and asked pertinent questions. He gave me quite the insight into our AI's features. Further discussions with Lady Zheng and Zenyatta shed considerable light on the matter. It was simply a very well-concealed back door, constructed when her focus was rightfully on other matters," he said, with a surfeit of satisfaction.

And you'd wager that he'd had the entire operation planned in advance, just in case he was ever given temporary charge of the facility.

"Anyone suspect?" You asked, rolling the cigarette between your fingers.

Lacroix chuckled. "Gabriel, possibly. He caught almost all of my changes, but left most of them in place, because I was merely improving on existing operations. But truly, I don't think Gabriel was worried about it."

Or he didn't think Gabriel would suspect him of giving someone else the mission briefing for Operation Metis. You weren't too sure.

"Well, you know how it goes – better than most. It is always easier to ask for forgiveness instead of permission." Operation Spinshot came to mind, and was a glorious example of how that was both true and unwise.

"And Jack has been pretty forgiving," Lacroix said. "Gabriel is...improving in that area."

"Not so sure about Captain Amari," you said.

Lacroix blanched. "She is ever-gracious and more merciful than we deserve," he said so dryly, that it might have sounded disingenuous, except you could see the discomfort clearly on his face.

"The Captain can hold a grudge," you agreed. "But often chooses not to, at least in my case, because I'm very sorry and very good at conveying it to her." You nodded sincerely.

"Yes. And on that note, you should probably keep Jack away from her for a few days. She was...not impressed by his choices yesterday."

"But he did it to-" You didn't know why you made that token protest. Captain Amari wasn't going to be softened up just because Jack did a little thing like save her life.

"She'll get it over it. Adrenaline, nobility, and a strict adherence to good security policy are all clouding her thoughts. She can be insufferably obstinate in the aftermath of a battle. Give her a few days of civilian life, tea, and biscuits, and she'll be back to normal."

Was it your imagination, or had Lacroix lowered his voice once he started talking about the "Anyway, I'm getting another splitting headache, and this infirmary is full of other people I know you wish to talk to. That is a bad sign, Chanceux, when you go to the hospital to visit most of your friends."

You nodded. "But it beats the alternative." You waved your hand, trying to coax meaningful words out of your throat with a gesture.

Lacroix sat back in his chair, a pained look on his face. It seemed that he too could picture the flag-draped coffins, the endless chain of funerals, regrets, and empty whiskey bottles. "Yes, I suppose you're right."

Chapter End Notes

Real life has been stupid. Still working too much. Had a debacle with buying a new washing machine. Cat is sicker. But I am still working on this. It is not abandoned. I'm just finished outlining the end and will finish this. I swear I will reply to comments this weekend. Life has been...stupid.

On a more cheerful note, I went to see Birds of Prey because the reviews are so conflicted. I went in with action movie expectations (shoehorned character development and silly plot holes, but good special effects, fight choreography, and snappy dialogue: so fun, but not lifechanging). I really enjoyed it. That's my two cents. I thought it was a lot of fun.
Chapter 135

Chapter Summary

You have so much work to do, but you have not forgotten what's really important.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

You stopped by to look in on Gabriel. He was breathing, peacefully. There was no change from yesterday. So gritting your teeth, you pulled yourself out of the doorway, and went to check on livelier folks. After all, you could hear Feng cackling down the hallway, and she was on the other side of the infirmary. You knew White Rabbit personnel were getting treated, and that there had been casualties on their side. You didn't know them, but you felt partially responsible, for some reason. And you didn't have many treats packed to bribe anyone – you didn't have many snacks available right now anyway – and it felt weird to visit empty-handed.

Still you wandered down the hall, spotting Genji leaning in the doorway. He looked up as you approached.

“Feng?” You mouthed.

Genji nodded once, then stepped back, giving you room to squeeze by.

"-But what does it meeeeeeean?” Feng wailed as she gestured to her phone. She was in a cloth gown and seemed to have no trouble sitting up. "I think everyone survived but- Lucky! You can tell us! The Morrisons survived, but did their bodyguards?"

Hanzo sat at the bedside, a pot of brilliantly colored chrysanthemums at the bedside, along with a mixture of snacks, empty wrappers, and an untouched nutrition shake, probably similar to what Angela forced Jack to drink. Hanzo sighed, nudging her with his elbow and pointing at the thick concoction.

"As far as I know, they did," you said. "Thanks for sending help."

"Then why is my dad freaking out? He sent me a message, "Tell Morrison to handle her. I'm retired." And then he hasn't responded to any of my inquiries. In fact, he's off the grid, like even Auntie doesn't know where he is. And so I asked Mother and she said, "Sort this for your father. I'm not moving again." But that was it and they're not responding to any of my messages or calls."

You glanced at Genji. "You know more about her parents."

"I know of a man who came to Hanamura, gave out nice candy, and killed people in particularly creative and difficult ways. I don't think we have access to that file. But I know he came into conflict with law enforcement across the world. I know Captain Amari wants his head on a stick, or on her wall, maybe just as paperweight?" Genji shrugged.

"Tea cozy," you said.

"Most likely," Genji agreed.
"Oh," Feng said, wilting. She glanced at you. "Do you think Jack could-?"

"She's furious at Jack right now. I'd give her some time to cool off," you said, wincing.

"But why would she be mad at my parents right now? I mean, I get that Dad was a pretty shady character, but I thought she had been in Greece handling that situation. Why would my parents be a priority after everything that went down?" Feng shook her head. "I don't get it."

"Given all the aid that you've offered Overwatch, it is unlikely that there will be any official action taken against your parents," Hanzo said, crossing his arms and giving you a look. "I know Captain Amari to be severe but fair. And you have plenty of allies to plead your case. For example, Lucky is a competent intermediary, as you have witnessed."

Your blink was long and slow. "Did you just volunteer me as tribute to Captain Amari's wrath?"

"Don't be so melodramatic," Hanzo huffed. "The Captain is reasonable officer. I'm sure that you can convince her-"

Genji snorted.

"I'm sure that you can convince her to retroactively include Feng's father in the On Sing amnesty agreement," Hanzo continued, ignoring Genji.

That wasn't an illogical suggestion, though you didn't really want to be the one to present it to the Captain just yet.

"What exactly did Dad do? I mean, besides kill people. I get that," Feng muttered. "But like do I need to send a card and a fruit basket? Would flowers be more appropriate? You know, was it mostly professional or really personal? I have no idea." She shrugged, looking very confused.

"And Auntie is feigning ignorance-"

"I am merely being responsible and not repeating baseless speculation," the Zheng drone said primly, and you didn't really see it, only the faint red glow buried under a stack of towels in a chair. Was that for privacy? Were Feng and Hanzo blocking Zheng's optical sensors for a reason?

"...So you have no idea what Dad was doing all those years?"

"I didn't say that. But you should ask him yourself. All of that was from life before. And to be honest, I wasn't particularly interested in your father's career choices back then. Terrible oversight on my part, but you have to understand, your mother asked me to keep my distance. I was respecting her wishes."

"Uh-huh," Feng said, drawing out the vowels and braiding them with thick threads of skepticism. "I bet."

"You would have to ask Hettie for more concrete information," Zheng continued. "Once you are safely back in Shanghai."

Feng snorted. "You're not subtle."

"You don't respond to subtle," Zheng said, still managing to sound dignified and disapproving, despite being only a few feet tall and buried under the linens.

"If you want to get on her good side, you should understand how much she values her tea time," Genji said, leaning against the door frame, the posture of a smug punk. "Refrain from giving her any sort of ostentatious ceramics or rare antiques- it'll be viewed as a bribe. Stick to good quality tea, sweets, and other ephemera. If you must give her something more substantial, wait till the end of Ramadan."

You turned your head away, trying to hide your expression. Genji was being helpful of his own volition. And if you said or did anything to point it out, that might ruin the moment.

"Thanks!" Feng chirped. "Still wondering what he did though..."

"Maybe you can ask Chang about how things went after she gets treated: the Morrisons and Chang's unit are on their way back to Zurich," you said with a shrug.

"Yeah, that's like a good idea. I did want to check in with Maggie and Michael," Feng nodded. "And if something went wrong, Chang won't beat around the bush: she'll tell me what's going on." Feng grinned. "So I get to meet Mom and Pop Morrison? Any recommendations? I want to make a good impression."

You snorted. "Don't play like you're not American, Feng. They're Midwesterners who live a simple rural life and have shunned the fame that their children are bringing them. You're familiar with the type."

"...So I should make a hot dish, talk about the weather, and pretend to go to their church? Kidding!" Feng said, unconvincingly. "I can do the well-behaved kid routine - you know, to convince your friends' parents that you're really a good influence and should be allowed to hang out whenever, and also be invited to stay for dinner. I could kind of do that." Feng nodded eagerly. "Sort of. Actually, now that I think about it, they probably just felt sorry for me, but you know what? I still got what I wanted and that's what matters in the end." She gave firm nod for emphasis. Hanzo chuckled. "Drink your replenishment shake, Feng. Or Aunt Zheng will be upset and she'll tell Dr. Ziegler, who is surprisingly vicious," Hanzo said flatly, not looking at Genji.

Out of the corner of your eye, you could see Genji's half-masked face. And even if you couldn't see his mouth, you knew he was smiling.

Feng squinted at Hanzo. "Whose side are you on?"

Hanzo looked around, pointedly gazing at her, then his chair. "I am at your side, obviously."

Feng opened her mouth, closed it, then squinted at you and Genji. "Is being a smartass a side effect of joining Blackwatch?"

"Might be a requirement even," you said.

"I think it comes up regularly on annual reviews too," Genji said.

"There might be a box to check when you fill out an application," you grinned.

"But we can't really say: hiring procedure is classified," Genji nodded.

"I am uncertain of your meaning, Feng. I was simply stating a fact," Hanzo said, pushing the bottle into her hand and closing her fingers around it. "Now drink your medicine."

Feng narrowed her eyes, glaring around the room. "Just wait till I get out of this bed."

That was your cue. She was Hanzo's problem now. "I came by to thank you for your service, express condolences for Agent Ajiyiming, and to see my friend Feng who needs to drink her nutrition shake before Dr. Ziegler and Lady Zheng come up with a worse alternative. That said, got to go, I have a lot of work to do—" You said, already slipping out the door.

"Time to check the perimeter," Genji said, following you.

"Cowards!" Feng shouted, shaking her fist goodbye.

You waved back, as you and Genji made a hasty retreat. The two of you made it few yards down the hall before Genji spoke. "What happened?"

"With?"

"My brother and Feng," he said out of the corner of his mouth.

"You can read my report—"

"Already did. "Agent Hawkeye returned to render aid to Agent Hulk. Agent Hulk was out of commission in the aftermath, but is expected to make a full recovery." That was all you included. I want details."

Suddenly, you remembered all the times you'd asked Genji a question and he'd blown you off with a cryptic answer. You tilted your head toward him, grinning broadly. "Being eager to learn is not the same as learning."

"I will be sure to let Zenyatta know that you are quoting him."

You scowled. "I heard Angela went with you out on the battlefield. Did you need lots of healing?"

Genji coughed and you could feel the dirty look burning through the side of your face. Heh. "Joke all you want, Angela was angry."

You paused, recalling how she stormed into Gabriel's room yesterday, a whirlwind of frustration, exhaustion, and antiseptics. She might have still been armed, you didn't really remember. Angela didn't need a gun to intimidate you.

"You're going to ask Feng anyway, and she'll tell you flat out and probably in great detail," you laughed, because she could probably ramble for at least half an hour without actually telling Genji anything new, and it might even be unintentional.

Genji sighed. "Feng doesn't know my brother like you do. I would appreciate your opinion, Lucky."

You paused, glancing over at him. "Learned a new trick, did you?"

"I don't know what you mean," Genji muttered.

You bit your tongue, because Genji was asking nicely, and well, that kind of was a new-ish trick for him. Though if you ribbed him too much about it, he might regress and you didn't want that.

"You were there for some of it. Hanzo was mostly focused on the mission. But I guess I did notice some small improvements. He was on good behavior – minimal verbal sniping and critiquing. In fact, he knew the time limit on her altered form, was very alarmed when she stayed back to hold off the guards, and eagerly returned to save her. I don't know the details of the fight, but afterward he gave her a piggyback ride, and stayed by her side the entire trip home, feeding her snacks and coaxing her to drink water. He was very attentive."
Genji was quiet for a moment.

"I don't know if it's romance, but I think it's progress. And cute," you said, testing the word. Oddly enough, it fit.

"I don't know if my brother understands the dynamics of "cute" yet," Genji said. "At least when applied to a relationship of equals and not animals or children. And I know he doesn't understand romance – at least not the kind Feng wants. But I'm looking forward to watching him learn."

"You're looking forward to watching him stumble," you corrected.

"Same thing really," Genji said with a shrug.

You stood there for a moment. "You know, if you need pointers on how to approach someone you're interested in-"

"McCree would be a better resource than you," Genji finished, smugly. "In fact, if I remember correctly, he's the one who had to lecture you on what was going on in front of your very face."

You squinted at him. "I was going to say, ask Torby, as he's been happily married the longest out of anyone else we know... But yeah, I'll let Jesse know you want some romantic advice from him. I'm sure he'd be happy to show you how it's done." Grinning at him, you practically skipped away, treasuring the look of sheer horror frozen on the visible half of Genji's face.

You knocked on Távio’s door and peeked in. He lay in the bed, eyes closed, breathing peacefully. The chair beside his bed was empty, though there was a laptop, a jacket, two blankets, and a familiar lunchbox - adorned with giant robots – scattered across the bedside table and counter. Ziv had been here. You smiled slightly at that, recalling just how salty your hacker had been when he'd first heard about Távio. Things had changed.

Not wanting to wake him, you turned to go.

"Is that you, ma’am?" A groggy voice murmured. It surprised you how faint and almost childlike he sounded.

"Sorry, I didn’t mean to disturb you," you said.

"Is OK," he said, voice thick with sleep and lots of drugs. "You’re back safe? With the Strike Commander?"

You figured Ziv must have already told him, but he was drugged. “Yeah.”

“That’s good,” he mumbled, eyes closed. He smiled though.

“You did a good job,” you said, softly. “Ziv has written the report-”

“Ziv was the real hero,” Távio grimaced, shifting under the covers, small jerky motions. “He headbutted the second gunman. I only shot the bastard when there was an opening.”

You blinked. “What?” Ziv had left that detail out of the official report.

“Uh-huh, ran straight at him. Totally fearless,” Távio said gravely, sleep slurring the words together.
“...Yeah, fearless. That’s one way of describing it.” You rubbed your forehead. You were going to have words with that idiot and then hug him till he tried to escape. “I should let you rest.”

“Mmm,” Távio made a soft grunt, and it could have been your imagination, but it almost sounded disappointed. “Whatever you think’s best, ma’am.”

“You need to sleep. I’ll bring you some food when the drugs wear off.”

Távio smiled, eyes still closed. “OK, ma’am.” He coughed and cleared his throat. “Ma’am?”

“Yes?” you said, because you didn’t have the heart to correct him right now.

“Ziv called me your “protegee.” The pride in his voice in made you pause.

You stood over Távio and shook your head, your smile feeling a little silly. You straightened his blankets, trying to think of the right response. “I’m sure you’ve been called worse things.”

Távio laughed, sinking down into his pillows “Yes, ma’am.”

“Now, get some rest,” you said. “That’s an order.”

“Yes, ma’am,” he yawned, and exhaled, slowly falling back into a drugged slumber.

You glanced over your shoulder at the younger agent, before quietly shutting the door on your way out.

You knocked on the adjacent door, knowing this visit would not be so relaxed. “It’s Strike,” you said.

You waited, but heard no response. And then the door jerked open, Jemison was on her feet – still in a hospital gown. There were stitches along the side of her head, and she wobbled when she walked.

She abruptly turned around and limped back to her chair.

“Just stopping by to check in,” you said.

Jemison shrugged. “I’m up. Nothing for you to worry about Strike.” Her tone was hard, but brittle. Like Jack, she had to be blaming herself of what happened to Shoal and the rest of Epsilon Squad. And telling her, “it wasn’t your fault,” or “cheer up,” would be about as helpful as a random stranger’s “thoughts and prayers.”

“How do you want to do this?” You asked, stepping in and closing the door behind you.

Jemison narrowed her eyes. “What?”

“How do you want to do this?” You repeated slowly, all business. Because Jemison was a soldier. Because you were not close enough to her to say “I’m sorry for your loss” and for that to mean a goddamn thing right now. Because once upon a time, you’d been here, lost, on your knees, and grasping for something to keep you going. You knew what rock bottom felt like, and you had a better idea of what it meant to throw someone a rope. “A lot of terrible things have happened. We Jemison stiffened and opened her mouth, possibly to tell you off, but you pressed on.

“There’s a lot of political shit going down. There’s a UN faction that already tried to pass off what happened to Epsilon Squad as a “terrible accident.” You know Kvento’s on our side, and you know too many other politicians aren’t. You’re a key witness. You’ve got a sterling reputation. And you killed Richard Prince-”

“Strike, that was you,” she said, voice wavering.

“If you hadn’t gotten him in that chokehold, we might not be here having this conversation,” you said carefully.

Jemison stared at you, jaw twitching.

“And you’re the one who finished the job. Maybe he’d be able to find a mad scientist to shove a lawnmower engine in his abdomen, but no one’s mopping up his brains, spooning them back into his skull, and bringing him back to commit more atrocities.”

Jemison snorted.

“He’s your kill,” you said. “You have a better rep than me. It’ll give you a stronger platform, if you’re going to bring down the people that ordered this.”

“I haven’t said what I plan on doing. I haven’t decided,” Jemison said, voice raw.

“I know. I’m just telling you where we stand.” You paused. “Thanks, for drawing it out. That shit is bad for you, but I can’t say that it doesn’t help me sleep a little better knowing that he didn’t go easy.”

Jemison sat down, shaking her head. “Fuck.”

“Therapy helps. The sooner, the better,” you added.

“Strike-” Jemison shook her head. “I’m know I’m not thinking straight, especially since your bullshit actually seems to make sense. I don’t know-”

“OK,” you said. “Just keeping you in the loop. It’s a lot, I know.”

“...He killed your squad too, back in the day?” She looked at you, her expression almost pensive.

“Yeah,” you said. “About two years ago. Still pretty raw about it.”

Jemison nodded.

“Morrison?”

You sighed. “He’s doing damage control, and putting off handling his own...feelings.”

Jemison snorted. “I meant, what is Morrison doing?”

You winced, because your misspoken words were a blunt oversharing of your lover’s business, though perhaps it wasn’t a mistake. Jemison was uniquely situated to talk Jack about their shared ordeal. “He’s already come out on a livestream and openly accused Petras of organizing the murder of Overwatch agents.” You clenched your fists. “There’s no playing it safe any more. He’s all in.”

“OK,” Jemison took a deep breath, eyes closed. She swallowed roughly. “I am too.”

“I’ll let our resident mastermind know. He’ll probably have something for you to do by tomorrow,” you said. Though you’d already known her answer before you’d stepped into this room. Hell, you’d had to peel back some very uncomfortable layers of your own psyche to gain this insight. But you’d walked this path, and you knew it well. Your next priority was to get both Jemison and Jack into trauma therapy, somehow.

“This job,” Jemison muttered. “You hit the ground running and you don’t stop.”

“You should look up all the videos of Commander Cosplayer floating around. You were out for that part, but it was pretty satisfying.”

Jemison nodded. “I’ll finish my reports and catch up on the briefings. It’ll...give me something to do.”

“Your work ethic is insane,” you told her.

She squinted at you, but didn’t comment.

Business concluded, you groped for something gentler to end on. You didn’t have a lot of downtime interaction with Jemison, not like Shoal… You flinched. But you remembered a few things. “If you’re not busy, I’ll bring Isha by later. I think she probably needs a bath first though...” You trailed off, remembering all the blood and bad smells… Poor Jesse. He probably hadn’t gotten around to cleaning her up, and did he even know how to bathe a murderbird…?

“Yeah, that’d be fine,” Jemison said, a little too forcefully.

“OK,” you said. You opened your mouth, weighing the words on your tongue. “It gets better,” you said. “Right now, it doesn’t feel like it ever will, but that’s not true. It does.”

And you walked out quickly, hoping you had done more good than harm.

---

You still needed to go check in with Captain Amari, Torby, and Reinhardt, but you stopped back in Gabriel’s room. Jemison’s pain aggravated some of your old wounds, and you wanted nothing more than to sit with Gabriel for a few minutes. His presence had always soothed you before.

So you were a little startled when you walked in, and there sat Jesse, head bowed, fists in his lap, Bandit under his chair. He looked up at you, and you thought you saw a flash of guilt as he smiled weakly at you.

“Just...visiting,” he said, but made no move to get up.

“That’s allowed,” you said.

Isha chirruped and ran across the bed, greeting and scolding you as you stepped into the room. You shut the door. Isha stood at the foot of the bed, both arms outstretched. You picked her up, stroking her head, and sat down beside Jesse.
She nibbled on your gloves, curling up against your chest. You discretely sniffed her, and found that she smelled a little bit like amber and floral soap.

“Gave her and Bandit a bath last night. Or she splashed around the sink and Bandit sat next to her,” Jesse said.

“Thanks,” you said. “I really appreciate it.”

“She was good. Tried to feed me her jerky and stole my pillow, but weren’t no trouble,” he said, reaching over to scratch her head. “Woke up to her and Bandit opening up his food bag.”

You snorted. “Isha.”

“She was making him breakfast,” Jesse said, with a laugh. “I shoulda been up anyway.”

“Still.” You flicked her snout and she snorted. “You got caught.”

She chortled and headbutted you.

Jesse squinted at you, then shook his head. “I uh...I got something to confess, sweetpea.”

You leaned back in the chair, not entirely sure where this was going. “OK?”

Jesse rubbed his forehead, hands going through his hair as he stared at the floor. Shoulders slumped, he reached under the chair to give Bandit a rough pat. He took a shaky breath. “You should know, the boss got hurt shielding me. I was the first one up those stairs when you shouted.”

You swallowed, not really remembering the stairwell very clearly. But you had no trouble recalling what happened in the few seconds after you exited it. The Vishkar man with his bomb. Your shots coming too late. And then the world going sideways…

You shuddered.

“He yanked me around. Spun me, and I think threw out his left arm for balance. I didn’t see – the lights went, the ceiling fell, and then we were buried alive.” Jesse blinked rapidly. “I was up front. I was goofing off. Should’ve been me-”

You reached over, placing one hand over his. “I was the one up front Jesse. And I didn’t react fast enough.”

Jesse frowned. “Lucky-”

“You and Gabriel were relying on me and Tataryn to clear the way. And I didn’t-”

“I heard you yell, and not half a second later, I heard you shooting, and then BOOM! You moved fast, you didn’t fuck around. And either way, we didn’t know if it was a deadman’s switch or what kind of mechanism they were using. Ain’t your doing. Ain’t on anyone but Vishkar and Talon.” Jesse shook his head. “But the boss-”

Jesse’s words made sense. And you knew that if Tataryn had survived, you certainly wouldn’t have blamed him for not reacting fast enough. But bad things had happened, and now you were all tangled up inside. It was easy to point fingers and spread blame. It was much harder to accept that sometimes there was nothing you could have done differently that would have saved someone.

“Boss took me in, gave me a home, and-”

“Do you remember how mad he was at me after Lucerne and Candle Arc went to hell?”
“You mean after you went overboard and let Agent Lao poke extra holes in you?” Jesse asked wryly.

You snorted. “Yeah, well, semantics aside, Gabriel made it clear to me, on more than one occasion even, that since he’s SEP and all legendary and shit, that he’d rather get hurt in others’ stead, because he’ll bounce back from it better. But also because he’s overly responsible like that.” You glanced over at your lover, his breathing steady, his expression relaxed. “Arrogant ass.”

“You’re his lover-”

“You’re his protegee,” you said, the word still fresh in your mind. “He cares about you deeply. It wasn’t you being careless and letting him down. It was Gabriel choosing to be stupidly noble, because fuck consequences. He does that.” You sniffled.

Jesse stared at you, mouth agape. “Huckleberry-”

“Oh come on, you know it’s true,” you said. “He’d do it for most anyone under his command. And maybe afterward, he’d regret it, maybe he wouldn’t. But I can tell you, that this-” You waved your left hand. “Still haunts him. He blames himself for someone he cares about getting hurt. He wasn’t about to let it happen again.”

Jesse shuddered. “Didn’t think you’d really be mad at me. But...was worried.”

“All my anger is reserved for the ones who did this to us,” you said, though maybe it wasn’t as clean as that – it would be very easy to lash out at Jesse, however wrong. “Spent enough time in therapy to understand that emotional kneejerk reactions and repressed creeping resentment aren’t actually helpful. Though maybe that’s how we’re wired. We want to believe that we have some kind of control, and it’s easier to say something is your fault than to accept that maybe, even if you’d done the best job ever, that it might not have mattered.”

“...Heavy stuff, Headshrinker.”

“Yeah, well, you started it,” you said with a shrug.

Jesse chuckled.

“Anyway, you don’t need to feel too guilty. If anyone is getting special treatment, it’s me, and I actually do feel kind of bad about it.”

Jesse squinted at you.

“Like, in DC, he took my watch shift, possibly more than once-”

“His choice.”

“You had to take first-”

“Don’t matter. Look, is the boss sweeter to you than anyone else in the section? Yes, no question about it. And nobody’s complaining, maybe a little because you’re mean, but also because you keep the boss in check. If he’s out of sorts, you manage him, and you keep things from escalating. If someone ain’t sure how to bring up a thorny subject with him, they’ll ask you first. You ain’t abusing your position, sugar pie. If the boss is picking up your slack, and ain’t making it other folks’ problem, then it ain’t their business to complain neither.”

You snorted. “Given that speech before, huh?”
“Maybe I had to remind some shortsighted folks that things run smoother with you here,” Jesse said coolly. “But that was a while ago. Nothing to worry about now.”

“If you say so.”

“Sugarpie, I already got folks asking, “Are you sure about this, McCree? Have you cleared this with Strike, McCree? Are you sure she knows you’re doing this McCree? Are you prepared to deal with her, McCree?” And no, I ain’t cleared it with you, because you were sleeping!” He scowled. “…And because no one rescinded my operational authority.” That last statement came out very quietly, and he looked a little queasy.

“Yeah, Lacroix is supervising too, so don’t worry too much. Or worry more. I’m actually not sure.” You frowned. “You’ve got more ops expertise than me. But obviously I can still handle internal issues, maintain support, and coordinate localized logistics. Between you, me, and Lacroix, we should be able to keep things running smoothly.”

“If I run into anything complicated, I’ll bring to you to weigh in on. Feel free to do the same.”Jesse nodded, looking a little more relaxed as he settled into his chair.

“I would be happy to share the work- I mean responsibility.”

“I already set up a perimeter guard rotation for the infirmary – using Overwatch and Blackwatch agents – some cleared by you and Lacroix, some because they showed up to help yesterday. You know, you can leave Genji in charge of infirmary security and focus on Morrison,” Jesse said.

You frowned, not quite liking that idea, though unable to find a logical reason to decline. “Maybe.”

“If it all gets to be too much,” Jesse added, because he knew how you thought. He wouldn’t push right now, but this wasn’t the end of that discussion.

“Yeah, OK.” You nodded. “Speaking of Genji-”

“Hovering over her the whole damn time. Don’t think she noticed though.”

You snorted. “I wouldn’t underestimate her observational skills.”

“You’ve got great observational skills, sugarpie. But your powers of deduction…” Jesse tapped the side of his head.

You smacked his arm. “Yeah, well, Genji said the same thing. About how I was so dense that I needed you to point shit out to me, and how you were more of an expert on romantic relationships. So I made sure to tell him that I’d let you know how much he wanted your advice.”

Your smile might have been a little mean, but Jesse chuckled. “You’re ornery.”

“Especially when you cross me, Jesse McCree. You’d best remember that.” You petted Isha, smile fading a little when you looked at Gabriel, who was still just sleeping through everything.

You held Isha a little too tightly, watching your lover breathe, slow and regular breaths. He was alive. He was strong. He had survived worse. You repeated that mantra silently. And you’d said it so many times, despite your innate skepticism, you almost believed it by now...

Jesse cleared his throat, and you realized you weren’t too sure how long you’d been sitting there staring.
“Sorry,” you said. “Zoned out.”

Jesse patted your shoulder. “Anything you want me to do?” His voice stayed steady, but only just.

“If he doesn’t wake up soon, I do have a job I’ll need your help with,” you said.

Jesse studied your face. You knew you weren’t at your best, but you weren’t sure what he was looking for. The set of your jaw felt grim. He looked back over to Gabriel. “Are you talking about breaking the news to Tataryn’s kid?”

“Yeah.”

“Boss usually does it himself.”

“I know.”

“You don’t have to-”

“She knows me. I don’t want a stranger to do it.”

“Yeah, you’re right.” Jesse grimaced. “Yeah, I’ll come too. I can try to do the talking-”

“It should be me,” you said softly.

“Because you know her? Or because you’re blaming yourself for what happened?”

“Both,” you said after a moment. After all this time Jesse knew you too well, the insightful bastard.

Jesse sighed, one arm resting around your shoulder. “Sometimes you’re real smart and healthy, you know? All sound advice and reasonable life views. And sometimes you’re so damn shortsighted and irrational that I want to shout some sense into your thick skull. Won’t work, but I want to.”

“Yeah,” you agreed. “Sounds about right.”

You leaned against Jesse’s side, reading reports, taking care of supply orders, guard rotations, and leave requests. Jesse flicked between mission summaries, maps, and combat reports, sending terse notes to Lacroix and making a face every time he got a response. This was much harder without Athena present to spout facts and figures, and give you real-time updates. You were also getting hungry.

Isha sat on the floor, playing with Bandit. You reached down to pet them both.

The door opened then, and Jack walked in, grimacing.

Isha squealed and ran to him. He scooped her up, a faint smiling relaxing his features. He glanced over at you, then saw Jesse, a flash of irritation on his face, and then he shook his head, pinching the bridge of his nose.

“I uh...I can go,” Jesse said, having clearly witnessed the same thing. He stood up, the chair squeaking.

Jack straightened, holding Isha in one arm, and looked directly at Jesse. “No, no, you have every right to be here. I just have a headache from my last meeting. Politics,” he muttered, and sat down on the bed beside Gabriel.

“It’s fine, sir.” Jesse backed up a little. “I need to check in with Lacroix anyway, before he turns our western Macedonian listening post into a horse-wrangling operation.”

“What?” You squinted at Jesse.

“I’ll forward you the details,” Jesse said out of the corner of his mouth, actually serious. He patted your shoulder. “I’ll be back though.”

“OK,” you said.

“Want me to pick up lunch?”

“Agent Lao is grabbing lunch out. If you send her a message, she’ll bring you something too,” Jack said, not looking up. “Tell her to put it on my tab.”

“...Thanks,” Jesse said, not quite trusting the gesture.

Jack exhaled slowly. “McCree, I’m tired, angry, and fresh out of nice-face. I want you to be here, because Gabe would want you to be here. I’m not sore at you, and I shouldn’t have reacted that way. I’m sorry. I’m just ready to end the day and it isn’t even lunchtime yet.”

“IT’s OK, sir. I...understand the SEP metabolism issues. Being “hangry” is a known side effect.”

“Definitely,” you said, nodding solemnly.

Jack snorted, but his shoulders relaxed just a smidgen.

“I’ll be back. I really do have to see why Lacroix thinks horse-smuggling will help us with international security, so... see you later.” Grinning, Jesse whistled, and Bandit followed him out the door.

There was a neat click as the lock reengaged.

Jack rubbed the back of his neck. “He could’ve left the dog.”

“Want to talk about it?” You asked, as he petted Isha. He had the grace to look slightly embarrassed.

“Th at last meeting was a real...trial,” Jack said after a moment, not looking at you. “It was shit, and I was looking forward to coming back and cuddling you, and then I saw McCree sitting so close and I know it isn’t like that between you two, but for an instant it annoyed me, and I shouldn’t have reacted, but I did.” He looked up, a little ashamed. “Sorry, sweetheart.”

You leaned in and kissed him gently. “You weren’t mean to me. Plus you apologized to Jesse and you’re buying him lunch, I think that’s fair.” You paused. “Well, I guess that depends on what’s for lunch.”

“Agent Lao wanted Singapore noodles and some kind of Chinese roast pork. She went to pick up the food and Amélie escorted me back here so she can visit with our horse-stealing Frenchman.”

Jack rested his head against your shoulder. “I’m sorry.”

“ You and Jesse seem to have a...strained relationship. ” You stroked his hair, a little amused by how cute he could be, despite his bad mood.
Things have never exactly been relaxed between us. Gabe brought home this scrawny, feral, foul-mouthed, punk kid who could shoot a bean off a cat’s head. He wore a ridiculous hat everywhere, poured hot sauce on everything, and had more sass than body mass. If Gabe was the stern mentor, I was the nit-picking parole officer, hounding him about every infraction...” Jack shook his head.

“You?” You rested a hand over your chest in mock surprise. “YOU?”

“Shut up,” Jack groaned into your shoulder. “I’ve had a hard day and I’m defenseless against your sarcasm.”

You laughed.

“I know, I know, it wasn’t the right way to handle the situation, but he was such an infuriating little shit, and it seemed, at the time, that he didn’t really appreciate the second chance Gabe had wrangled him. But then...what did I know?” Jack shook his head. “Things are different now, I know, but I guess we haven’t really ever been that comfortable around each other.” Jack sat up, still holding a happily-thrumming Isha. “I guess it doesn’t help that so many people think you’re sleeping with him.”

“I am. We take naps together occasionally,” you said, primly. “Usually with Bandit and Isha, sometimes even Ziv.”

Jack gave an exasperated sigh, but his smile was warm. “You’re ridiculous and your slumber parties sound weird.”

“Maybe a little,” you agreed.

Jack leaned in kissed you softly. “Missed you.”

“Yeah, I missed you too. It’s only been a few hours, and I feel kind of silly.”

Jack chuckled. “I know.” He turned to the side to kiss Gabriel’s forehead. “Come on, you jerk. Say something snarky about how soft and sappy we are.”

“Or he’d be really smooth and charming. He’d say something about how he yearned for us, and the world was bleak and lonely in our absence. Like a taco without hot sauce.”

Jack gave a very undignified snort. “You and your food aggression. Forget fancy jewelry and-”

You remembered the rings then, three beautifully crafted pieces, not quite matching, but coordinating, marking a set.

Jack fell silent when he saw the look on your face. “What’s wrong, sweetheart?”

You blinked rapidly. “Jewelry.”

Jack stared, uncomprehendingly. “I was kidding, sweetheart. If you want fancy jewelry-”

“I was going through his stuff, packing a go-bag before I left for your rescue mission. He’d hidden these beautiful custom pieces in his towels. Anniversary gifts, I guess...” You sniffled. “I gave him a bunch of shit because I found them so easily, but then...”

“...But then you realized that he put them somewhere where one of us would find them, in case something happened to him. Oh Gabe...” Jack’s voice dropped, but he set Isha to the side and pulled you into his lap, his arms wrapped tightly around you.
You clung to Jack, hugging him as you took deep shaky breaths. “I’m sorry. I’ll keep it together. I don’t mean to-”

“It’s fine,” Jack murmured, stroking your hair. “It’s OK. You don’t have to be strong for me, sweetheart. I can handle it. Just...it’s fine.” He kissed the top of your head.

“Do you want to see-”

“No,” Jack said sharply, shaking his head. “No. I’ll wait for him to give them to us. I’m not as tough as you are, baby. I know that if I saw whatever amazing gift he picked out, I would probably fall apart immediately. I’ll just wait and bawl my eyes out when he hands it to me. Then you two will pick on me a little more, before you eventually feel bad and I can guilt some cuddles out of you.” He gave you a saucy wink, even though his smile wobbled and his eyes were too bright.

Smiling through tears wasn’t something you were used to, at least not real smiles. But somehow, Jack made it happen. He was special like that.

Chapter End Notes

I know, short chapter, but a gentler one in stressful times? I hope. Life's been busy. Workworkwork, and Cov-19. I've been muttering, "Plague-cation! Plague-cation!" Under my breath, because if we show any symptoms or come into contact with anyone who is infected, my workplace will have us take 14 days leave (unless we get a doctor's note to return earlier), unpaid. It's been so busy, two weeks leave (paid or not) sounds tempting. We've consistently been down by at least ten people and I've been working 10 hour days regularly, plus commute. But...as the only Asian in my office (and possibly corporate HQ), I really don't want to be the first person to get it. It's silly, but then we went to a non-Asian store (during daylight hours!) Saturday, and I got some static. Nothing overt, but my cousin (who's not Asian) noticed and was trying to figure out if it was me or him. It was me. It was that thing where you go in, and everyone is watching (and uncomfortable, maybe scared?), but won't make eye contact and you know they're watching you when you turn your back. I won't be doing much going out to places where people don't know me. Late night shopping is OK, third shift people tend to be chill.

We're OK here - we tend to do bigger grocery shops in general because we work so much that it's just more convenient to not have to shop.

Stay safe out there. I'm considering a bidet. I've been joking about my doomsday cult, but my cousin says we have to call it "Doomsday Shmoomsday" which shows just how serious we are. :D
Chapter 136

Chapter Summary

Chapter Notes

A Tumblr anon asked me to write headcanons about how Overwatch/IAL characters would handle being in quarantine. I figured I wouldn't get specific about why each agent is in isolation, just how they would react. It's just some fluff for a hard time:
Original Ask
Head Canon Compilation

In other news, Yana submitted her rendition of Lucky and that expression is a big mood. I think my face is already stuck like that, but as far as I can tell, I'm not on fire.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"Keep it simple. He can handle simple," you said, clearly enjoying giving him shit.

Jack pursed his lips. It was a good thing he loved you, because otherwise he would have court-martialed your smart ass by now.

"I'm afraid the simplest explanation is severe head trauma," Gérard said, sounding marginally less annoyed than before.

"I'm standing right here, guys." Jack waved at you, squinting his disapproval. "Come on. The sooner we go, the sooner we can escape."

"Indeed," Gérard said, turning to leave, and Jack already knew he was in for a terse and pointed lecture, followed by many longer ones from a variety of other people.

Rolling his eyes, Jack followed Gérard out into the hall, carefully shutting the door behind him. The corpses had been moved, but there was still a massive bloodstain on the floor.

"I’m not losing anyone else today," Jack said, before Gérard could start up. “Don’t push me on this, Gérard.”

To his credit, the spymaster just sighed heavily, one hand on his arm. “You are not wrong, Jack. But you were foolhardy.”

“I don’t care,” Jack said, and found it to be true. He’d nearly lost everything in the last twenty four hours. You, Gabe, his family, his friends, all of Overwatch… And he had lost friends. Too many people had been killed because of him. Because of Petras’ politics and greed.

“I can cancel this meeting if you’re really not feeling up to it,” Gérard said, his tones surprisingly conciliatory.
“Better get it out of the way,” Jack said, shaking his head. “Let them see how few fucks I have left to give.”

“We are revealing our hand?”

“We are making our accusations. We can lay out the entire conspiracy and piles of evidence later. After I get some logic back.”

Gérard wisely didn’t comment on that. “You can wait, you know. If you want to keep this encounter short. You are injured, unwell, and grieving your squad. Simply show yourself and promise a debrief tomorrow after you’ve rested.”

“I’ve already made my accusations publicly. I’m not backing down or giving them any room to try to soften what I’ve said. We waited too long, Gérard. We should have wrapped this up after what happened on Family Day. It would have saved us all a lot of heartache.”

Gérard nodded, more in acknowledgment than agreement. “We will...leave off the details of the Mediterranean escapade, for now. I suppose all you have to do is, reaffirm you accusations, make your excuses. The politicians will keep. Ana however...”

“I know,” Jack said, because honestly, Fischer, Kwoento, and the rest of the UN were mere formalities tonight. Perhaps tomorrow the UN would try to remove him, or open an inquiry into what exactly happened in Greece, but for now, they would still be reeling from the attack on the infirmary, and what he did to “Acting Commander Bell.”

Good. Jack wasn’t just their golden boy figurehead or some naive political puppet. It was about time that they remembered that.

Ana though… There would be no finessing Ana. He would endure her pointed comments, hug her hard enough to make bones creak, and then beat a hasty retreat when he saw an opening. Because she was truly furious, and it would be another few days before she actually calmed down enough to appreciate the merit of his actions.

It might be another few days before he calmed down enough to see the strategic drawbacks of his actions. Sure, he was going to have to explain himself to the civilian authorities, but Jack couldn’t bring himself to care. Too much had happened, and he wasn’t sorry he’d gone off the rails.

“How bad is it?” Jack asked, because he needed to know.

“...We’ve crossed the Rubicon, certainly.”

“I know that there’s no turning back,” Jack agreed. “But have I handicapped our cause?”

“Hard to say,” Gérard shrugged. “That stunt with Athena will be hard to hide. But not impossible. Bell has political allies, but your popularity has soared in the last hour. I doubt he will be a direct problem. The Security Council is split – but we’re about to initiate a PR counterattack. I doubt they will move directly against you, at least not at first...”

“So, it’s not that big of a deal?” Jack asked, grinning at the fussy Frenchman.

“Do you have any idea how much work I have put into coordinating this surge of positive news coverage? I could make the next two presidents or prime ministers of a G7 country with the amount of effort I have put into this!”

“So my actions fit into your long game?” Jack asked, not letting himself be distracted by Gérard’s
“Unless the details about Athena come out soon, and they still might, you should be safe. I cannot speak for the rest of us,” Gérard sniffed.

Jack sobered then, recalling your suspension and the “investigation” into your “reckless” behavior. “Fair. What can I do to help?”

“Stick to the script and stop making drastic decisions on the fly,” Gérard said dryly.

“...No promises,” Jack said.

Gérard just shook his head, a pained expression on his face. “You are not the only one who has had a trying week, Jack.”

“I know, sorry.” Jack felt a little sheepish as he looked at Gérard’s tired and bruised face. “You should be resting too. Sorry I’ve made more work for you.”

“It keeps life interesting,” Gérard said dryly.

Jack snorted as they turned the corner, almost to the main conference room. “Don’t downplay it. You’re an adrenaline junkie too, and you’re addicted to hoodwinking and outmaneuvering our enemies for high stakes. This is like Vegas, Christmas, and a crossword book all rolled into one fun package.”

“...Jack, I will pretend to pass out and leave you to deal with the politicians alone.”

“I’m not scared of them.”

“You can go visit Ana alone too,” Gérard added quietly, out of the corner of his mouth.

“You weren’t going to defend me anyway,” Jack sighed.

Gérard nodded. “You’re absolutely right.”

“She’ll get over it, eventually,” Jack said, more as reassurance for himself than any confident prediction.

“Perhaps,” Gérard said. They stopped in front of the double doors. “Off the record, I am glad you made the decision that you did. It is not the one I would have chosen,” Gérard admitted. “But I cannot fault you for it.”

“Thanks,” Jack said, standing tall as he pushed open the doors, ready for the next fight.

The UN officials stuck to their scripts: Secretary General Fischer was concerned about the entire situation, but unwilling to take a hard stance just yet. Kwento asked him pointed questions – ones she already knew the answer to – and subtly gave him the upper hand in the conversation. Prescott – the US representative acting for the Security Council - was cautious, making double-edged comments and looking for ways to chip away at Jack’s credibility or reinterpret Jack’s accusations. Jack didn’t give him the chance. Prescott would be a problem in the near future, but not tonight. Jack wouldn’t let anyone else be a problem tonight.
There were others there, but they were just window dressing. Jack would not worry about them till later, and Gérard would, of course, be looking into them.

It was Angela who saved the day, cutting the meeting short when the details of his injuries and low blood sugar came to light. Of course, they would adjourn. Of course, he needed to look after his own health now. Of course, they understood. Their “reasonable” attitudes were a front. Tomorrow they would be back with a vengeance. Today’s meeting was just recon mission, after all. Prescott had the same kind of eyes as Petras, flat, greedy, and cold. He would definitely be a problem.

After they left the conference room, Angela made him down this thick green drink, slimy, vegetal, and too sweet with a vaguely metallic aftertaste – a bad combination overall. She gave him an update on everyone – alive, but harmed and under at least twenty four hour observation, and he had better keep his visits short.

Lacroix made his excuses, splitting off to debrief you.

Leah, Lucy, and Andre were all out cold – thankfully. He didn’t really want to explain Athena to them, and he certainly didn’t have the patience to deal with Andre. Reinhardt was apparently in good spirits. Torby and Ana were not. And Zenyatta had come through mostly unscathed.

He stopped by Reinhardt’s room first. The older man sat upright in his bed, happily eating his second tray of food, while Torby lay flat in his bed, no tray in sight.

“Jack!” Reinhardt boomed, setting the tray aside, and almost rising, even as Jack opened his mouth to tell him not to get up.

“Stay in bed!” Torby snapped. “Or your bones will set wrong and it will take twice as long for them to heal!”

Reinhardt laughed sheepishly, scratching the back of his head. “Do not fret so, it will make your hair turn white.” He raised his arms in a shrugging motion, that could have been the invitation for a hug-

Jack took it. He simply walked up and hugged the man around the neck, a good solid manly hug with a resounding back-slap. Reinhardt squeezed back, one arm carefully wrapping around Jack. The hug was less than half strength- Reinhardt was being considerate of Jack’s injuries.

“We are all alive, Jack,” Reinhardt’s voice was low rumble. “It is very brave what you and Athena did-”

Torby made a “harumph” sound, and Jack released Reinhardt, his own smile crooked. “Hold on, Torbs. You’ll get your turn-”

“You stay away from me, Morrison!” Torby scowled. “That nonsense won’t work on me, and it won’t work on Amari either!”

Jack grinned at his friend. “No hug?”

Torby grumbled something under his breath. “Fine...” He grunted, and Jack swooped in, giving the engineer as quick squeeze. “Of all the silly things...” Torby said, but didn’t actually sound displeased. “You’d better not make a habit of this.”

Jack wasn’t fooled by Torby’s mask of grumpiness. After all, he had loved Gabe all this time, and compared to Gabe’s moods, Torby was sulky kitten. Not that he’d ever say that to the other man’s face.
“Just remember that I braved omnics, politicians, and Ana’s wrath for this rescue,” Jack said, his smile lopsided. “Cut me some slack, OK?”

Torby blew out a slow breath. “Yeah, all right,” he said. “Glad to see you in one piece too, you cheerful moron. Don’t expect you to stay that way, not after the stunt you pulled. You really shat in the blue cupboard this time—”

“Yeah, I know,” Jack said. “But it was worth it.”

“Perhaps you should let Ana rest,” Reinhardt said, hesitantly. “She will be...calmer later on.”

Bless his giant heart, Reinhardt was trying to protect him. Jack shook his head. “Need to see her too, whatever state she’s in.”

“She’ll hunt him down otherwise – it’ll be worse if he hides,” Torby said, also shaking his head. “Remember Algiers?”

“Oh...yes,” Reinhardt flinched.

Both men regarded him gravely, and then saluted him, their expressions terribly grim.

“Thanks,” Jack sighed.

“It has been an honor.”

“We will pour a libation in your memory.”

“We will tell your loved ones that you faced your destruction head-on, with true courage.”

Torby snickered at Reinhardt’s solemn visage. Reinhardt winked at the other man and went back to looking funereal.

“You guys are all jerks,” Jack said, rolling his eyes as he left the room and headed across the hall.

The door was open, and he could see that she was up and awake. He still knocked on the door frame.

Ana stood by the window, back to the door, her blue jacket draped over her shoulders. She was still in uniform, though a cloth gown sat neatly folded on the table beside the bed.

She turned, one hand over her right eye socket. The implant sat on the window sill. According to reports, it had sustained some electrical damage in the fight. That would put her in a worse mood...

Ana had always been a striking woman. Her hair was loose and blood flecked her clothes. Even disheveled, she carried herself with dignity. She lowered her hand, giving him a clear view of her empty socket. Her expression remained flat and severe. Her organic eye burned with a focused intensity. He knew that look from years of experience. She was still locked in the combat mindset, even though the battle had ended hours ago.

That was also a bad sign.

Jack shut the door behind him. He straightened up, stance solid, just in case she charged him. “All right, hit me,” he said, hoping she wouldn’t take him literally.
Ana’s arms remained crossed, she looked him over, eye flicking between his face, torso, and knees. She studied him, head jerking as she pinpointed his injuries – from the exposed bruises, to the way he favored one side, to the defensive placement of his limbs. Jack was pretty sure Angela wouldn’t just let Ana read his medical report – Ana was just that talented at spotting weakness – she didn’t need cybernetic enhancements to do that.

“You swore-” She began, voice harsh.

“I know.” Jack met her gaze.

“You promised-”

“I know.” He nodded.

“You’re a-”

“I know.”

“If you interrupt me one more time, I will end you, you uncivilized, lying beast.” She jabbed one finger at him sharply and lapsed into a stream of Arabic. Jack recognized some of those words from previous outbursts. They weren’t polite words.

He stepped forward anyway.

“-And if you try to hug me right now, I will strangle you right back,” she snarled.

Jack lowered his arms.

“You spineless coward! You thoughtless dog! You were supposed to protect her! Outing her now jeopardizes not only her safety, but the existence of Overwatch! You’re too sentimental, Morrison! You aren’t supposed to buy us soldiers a few more years with the life of a child like her!” Ana glared at him. “What were you thinking?”

“I was thinking I couldn’t lose anyone else today. Not Torby. Not Reinhardt. Not Lucy, or Leah, or even Andre. And certainly not you.”

“So you’d sacrifice a child?” Ana practically hissed. “We are soldiers, Morrison. This is what we signed up for! But you don’t ask a child-”

“Athena isn’t a child,” Jack said. “She might have been, a few months ago, but I think we both know that she’s been growing fast-”

“Don’t you dare put this on her, Morrison!”

“I’m not. Yes, I gave the order: I let her go. Because she wanted to. Because she’s one of us, and she flat out told me that she could not live with herself if something happened to her friends and she could have prevented it, that she would rather pay the cost than stay safely in hiding. She knows the stakes, Ana. She understood what could happen. And she chose that route anyway. That’s not a child who makes those kind of decisions-”

“You were supposed to keep her safe!”

“And what about the rest of you? You’re my people too,” Jack said. “Yes, I could have ordered her to stay hidden. I could have kept her locked down and tightly controlled. I could have taken away her choice when it really mattered– and what kind of man would that make me?”
Ana glared at him.

“Would you do that to your daughter?” Jack asked.

“In a heartbeat,” Ana snapped. “I would do anything to keep her safe, even if she hated me for it. She is too young.”

Jack frowned. That was an argument for another day, though he could see it on the horizon. “You’re right: Fareeha is too young right now. But one day she won’t be. One day she’ll have to make her own decisions. And Athena isn’t Fareeha,” he said. “Athena may always be a child to us, but I think she’s reached the point where she deserves the respect and consideration we would give an adult.”

“And what have you done to Overwatch by releasing her? Do you think the world will stand by knowing that we’ve sheltered a previously unseen AI hive? Are you ready to talk about Operation Metis?”

Jack wondered if she would bring up Niang and Liao. Because then this really would turn into a fight.

“We raised an omnic-born AI prototype in secret, and against all good sense. Do you really think that’s going to fly? Do you think they’ll let just let her be?”

“No, which is why we’re going to lie our pants off about it,” Jack said flatly. “Lacroix, Winston, and Zheng are already working on a cover story. Our new...coparents are helping to fudge some of the metadata and will back us on any story we choose. I don’t know what the final result will be, but we’re not announcing her existence to the world. Not yet anyway.” Hopefully that would a be a problem for the next Strike Commander.

Ana squinted at him, and he knew he had her. “You didn’t know that going in-”

“No, I didn’t,” Jack agreed. “But Lucky made it very clear that since Athena is an anomaly and her capabilities are still unknown, we can say whatever we want – they don’t have the technical details or data to prove otherwise. Yes, we have something, but that’s classified.”

Ana made an angry sound in the back of her throat. “It’s a clumsy deceit.”

“And it doesn’t change the fact that you gave a bad order,” Ana said coldly. “The Strike Commander should be able to make sacrifices.”

Jack gritted his teeth, a stab of anger passing through his chest. “I have, Ana. I’ve sacrificed a lot. We all have: friends, relationships, lives. And after today, I’m more reluctant than ever. I can’t blindly make those sacrifices any more. If being the Strike Commander means I have to sit by and quietly consign my friends to death, I don’t have what it takes to be the Strike Commander. I certainly have no desire to become that kind of man. That kind of man doesn’t deserve the lives in his care, nor the responsibility he is given, and has no place in leadership.”

Ana stared at him grimly. “You are too soft, Jack. We are soldiers. We knew what we were getting into. There was no reason to risk her.”

Jack sighed. Ana was furious, and Gérard was right. She was still stuck in an adrenaline loop, her focus too narrow. She would come around eventually, but the situation was too fresh.
“I lost most of Epsilon Squad. I nearly lost Gabe, my family, and Lucky today. I couldn’t lose the rest of you. It was an emotional decision, and maybe I’ll come to regret part of it, but having you here, ready to flay me alive, well, I’m not sorry, and I don’t think I ever will be.”

Ana pointed at the door. “Get out, Jack. I’m tired and you’re an idiot.”

“Love you too, Ana.”

“Out!” She snapped, reaching for her sidearm.

Jack retreated.

He shouldn’t have let you and Gabe go to Hanoi alone. He shouldn’t have. He should have insisted…

The room was dark. You lay tucked against his chest, sniffling softly, as he rubbed your back. He had not expected the tears, the heart-wrenching sobs as you clung to him, your grief a solid thing, pressing the air from his lungs. He had never seen you in such pain, and it damn near unmanned him. He had done the best he could, holding you, letting you cry, and silently wondering if he had made things even worse… Gabe would have done a much better job saying the right thing, of making you feel better. He had just bumbled through, doing his best and knowing it wasn’t enough. Pathetic.

He should not have pushed you. You were injured, exhausted, and completely off-balance. The sex was a mistake. He should have just put you to bed, tucked you in, and held you. He should not have asked anything else of you. He was a selfish prick, an absolute bastard. You were too vulnerable and he had failed to recognize that. He had failed at a lot of things...

He was still processing. He knew it. He’d done the best he could to be comforting, though on some level he knew it wasn’t enough, that he couldn’t fix things, that he should have been able to prevent all this: Gabe’s injuries, your pain, Epsilon Squad’s-

For a moment, he smelled that terrible fruity chemical scent mixed with cordite and blood, he heard the gunshots-

You dug your fingers into his arms, your metal fingers gripping hard enough to bruise. You were still asleep, though reacting to his tension. He forced himself to relax, gently loosening your fingers, but not breaking your hold.

“It’s OK, sweetheart,” he rasped. “We’re home. You’re safe.”

You grumbled something unintelligible.

He’d almost lost you today. If your body armor hadn’t...If you hadn’t ducked fast enough… If things had gone any differently… That realization kept surfacing. And every time he felt it- a sharp jab to the gut, up through his core, and into his chest.

Jack shuddered. He held you tightly, teeth clenched as he tried to will himself to sleep. Too many things had gone wrong today, too much had changed in the blink of an eye. Whether or not any of you wanted to admit, things were not OK. He didn’t know what you would do if Gabe didn’t wake up. Hell, he didn’t know what he would do. Having you was a relief, a balm on his wounds. He liked to imagine that you felt the same way. But it wasn’t just the two of you. Gabriel was… You both needed Gabe.

You mumbled something in your sleep, the tone restless.

He stared up at the ceiling of his bedroom, holding you against him, the bed still too empty.

Gunshots echoed in his skull. He could not breathe and they were killing his people while he just laid there. Jack thrashed, trying desperately to shake off the drugs, to get to his feet- He felt someone reach for him. Snarling, Jack lunged-

There was a curse and a thud.

Jack sat there, eyes wide, gasping for breath. There were blankets around his hips. He was in his room. And where were-

He scrambled to the side of the bed, knowing instantly that he’d swung on you, He flexed his fingers. His hands didn’t hurt, but-

You lay on the floor, one foot still in bed, and you glared at it, reaching up to unwind the blankets from around your ankle. You rubbed your head, a sour expression on your face.

"Sweetheart-" he breathed, relieved that you looked mostly unharmed, but he still afraid of what he might have done.

"It was the blanket," you said, making a face. "I can dodge you just fine, but when the goddamn bedding ambushes me..."

Jack gritted his teeth, and reached down, lifting you back into the bed. He carefully ran his hand over your skull, fingers already finding a knot. Goddamnit. Hadn’t he done enough damage?

"I'm sorry," he murmured, hugging you, though he could feel his hands shaking. "I'm so sorry-"

You weren’t having any of it. It bothered him, how unbothered by this you were acting. He could have really hurt you. Yes, Gabe had had night terrors once upon a time. Yes, you had nightmares, too. But you had never attacked anyone, and the risk of hurting you was much higher than the other way around...

You were worried about him, he could tell. You were downplaying it, making jokes and blaming the bedding. It helped his nerves, but he knew that the two of you couldn’t just ignore what had happened. But since he didn’t entirely know what to make of it all, he didn’t argue. Not yet.

And yet...you weren’t afraid, even if you should be. And that cautious optimism, that understanding in your voice wasn’t faked. You were calm and your tones were gentle and soothing. Not all the words registered, but the feeling did. You still trusted him, even if he didn’t trust himself. And you didn’t trust easy. It was a little strange, realizing that maybe he wasn’t seeing things clearly. That if he still had your trust, maybe he wasn’t doing everything wrong.

You grasped his hands between yours. He felt your warmth, even from the metal fingers.

"I'm here and I love you, OK? We'll get through this. I'm not saying it'll be easy, but we've solved shitty situations with unfavorable odds before. It's kind of what we do.” You gave him a wry smile, a sort of “how do we keep getting into these situations?” look.

“I know,” he said, the words slipping out easy and soft. “I know.”

“These are very troubling allegations, Strike Commander, and without precedent. I am afraid that I must ask for proof,” Secretary General Sione Fischer sat at the head of the table, Kwento on his right, his assistant – Sigmund Mayer – on the left. Rupert Prescott sat beside Mayer and across from Jack. The American Security Council representative was rumored to be vying to be the next civilian director of Overwatch. And since it was Gérard who passed on that rumor, it was probably truth.

“We have plenty of proof,” Jack said, expression flat. He watched the other delegates. The Chinese were being coy – though Gérard had relayed to him that On Sing exerted enough influence so Representative Wing would not be a problem. He may or may not support the Strike Commander’s suit, but he wouldn’t move against him. The Russians were enjoying the chaos, trying to play both sides to their advantage. The English and the French were more circumspect, giving lip service to the “you can’t punch the teeth out of your substitute on a live broadcast,” but requesting discrete, private meetings with him on the sly. The temporary members were playing their own games, and Gérard promised him a spreadsheet breakdown of alliances, motives, and financial ties to Talon affiliates.

“Are you certain Director Petras wasn’t acting under duress?” Kwento asked with a straight face. She held herself with just the right amount of concern and disbelief – if Jack didn’t already know how much she hated Petras, he would have thought it genuine.

Jack shook his head, smothering a snort. “I was on the receiving end of several monologues about how he had given me a chance to make the “right choice” and ally with him. He also admitted to personally arranging the attack on my family, as well as targeting specific agents for petty vendettas. So no, he was not under any duress and clearly acting on his own volition.”

“Targeting? How so?” Representative Wing asked, dark eyes gleaming with interest.

“There was apparently a contract on the life of one of my bodyguards,” Jack said trying to minimize your role. He knew you would be in the spotlight soon enough, but he wanted to give you time to prepare. “He was the one who placed it and put up a substantial reward. We are in the process of draining the escrow account so that no one thinks that the bounty is still open. That was only one example. He mentioned others.”

“The woman you shielded yesterday?” Someone else asked. The Batswana delegate, if Jack remembered correctly…

“Yes,” Jack said, sounding as disinterested as he could.

“And that would be a certain… Agent Strike?” The French delegate asked lips quirked in a half smile. Elegant and wearing a crimson tailored suit that Amélie would approve of, the older woman seemed watched him with a knowing look in her eye.

The English delegate rolled his eyes. He was thin, pinched, and wearing neutral colors that made him look like he’d been laundered a few too many times and faded in the sun. “Does it matter?”
“It certainly does,” Mayer huffed. “Agent Strike was supposedly suspended for reckless endangerment, pending a joint investigation from the ethics review board and the Undersecretary’s office. I have the paperwork.”

“Do you?” Kwento asked, sounding interested. “I heard about the security issues and had my own people look into it. Ms. Beaumont did not seem to have much of anything besides a form, some witness statements, and an unsubstantiated version of events.”

“Well-” Mayer squirmed. “I don’t know what it said, but I was assured that her findings were troubling.”

“I found her lack of findings quite troubling,” Kwento said agreeably. “I despise the idea of letting a loose cannon black ops agent embarrass us on the national stage.” She looked around the room, and people were nodding. “But what I despise even more is incompetence out of our own offices,” she sniffed. “Worse, Ms. Beaumont does not have a reputation for incompetence, and yet her work in this instance is decidedly lacking. It has unsettling implications about the civilian side of our ethics review board…”

“What exactly are they referring to?” The Indonesian delegate asked, loudly. “I thought we were here to discuss treason charges, not petty political games – even if they are dressed up as minor disciplinary proceedings.”

“They are talking about the Overwatch Family Day incident,” the Russian delegate chuckled. He was an older man with wild white hair. “Quite the PR flub. Somehow Overwatch managed to take cutting an expensive prototype vehicle, filled with children, and crash it into a pier. Is that how you train pilots?” He asked, giving Jack a smug grin.

“No, it’s how we train our paratroopers,” Jack said dryly.

The Russian laughed. “Are you recruiting children now?”

“No, I leave that particular act to unpopular sovereign state militaries,” Jack said, aware of Russia’s conscription program.

The Russian squinted at him.

“What was Agent Strike even doing on the premises, given her suspension? Who authorized that?” Prescott asked mildly, his smile reptilian.

“Our classified internal review cleared Agent Strike of wrongdoing and determined the accusation to be part of Director Petras’ personal vendetta against her,” Jack said flatly, trying to keep the emotion out of his voice. “At the time, we kept it quiet because we were further investigating the Director’s misconduct, however, we can provide you that evidence as well.”

“You knowingly circumvented the civilian review board?” Mayer asked sharply. “On whose authority? Why didn’t you file the proper complaints or appeals?”

“I wasn’t sure who could be trusted,” Jack said, noticing just how often the Secretary General’s personal assistant got in his way. That probably wasn’t a coincidence. “I’m still not.” He smiled thinly at Prescott.

“Perhaps the stress is finally getting to you, Strike Commander,” Prescott said smiling back. “The years of war have been hard on you. Perhaps, you should consider stepping into a less taxing role and leave the politics to more experienced minds.”
Jack glanced around the room, noting the interest, disgust, and agreement from different delegates. Thus far, it looked like he had slightly more allies, but obviously he didn’t just trust outward appearances. Jack leaned forward. “I realize that this is terrible inconvenience for you: dead soldiers, disgraced allies, and a failed coup made trying to capitalize on my image. I can see why you’d want me to give up, but I intend to see this through to the end. It is the American way,” Jack said, smiling spitefully.

“So what did Agent Strike do to earn the former Director’s ire?” The French delegate asked, clearly amused by the tension. Was her name Bordeaux? Boucher? Brodeur? He couldn’t remember.

“Director Petras attempted to use his position to leverage her for sexual favors on numerous occasions. She declined. Politely, even.”

“Hearsay,” Prescott spat standing up and pounding his fist on the table. “What a convenient excuse – paint the dead man as some kind of lecher when he isn’t here to defend himself! Have you no shame or regard for his family, Morrison?”

Jack’s smile widened. He and Gérard had discussed the risks of sharing the footage, but they would not win this by holding back. “We have one of the incidents on security camera – with audio.” He wouldn’t mention Ainsley yet – she wasn’t a reliable witness, but he supposed someone could force her to testify. “The events speak for themselves.”

“You have cutting edge technology and your cyber warfare agents have plenty of video-editing skills. If you asked me two days ago, I would never have believed that you could sink that low-” Prescott snarled.

“We can submit the footage for outside verification,” Jack said, unbothered by the accusation. “But with regards to the Family Day incident, Agent Strike’s hovercraft crash was shown to be the product of sabotage – we have footage of Agent Sakai tampering with the vehicle and a record of the orders-from our honorable former Director– to “take care of” Agent Strike. Rest assured, we have mountains of evidence, and this barely scratches the surface.”

“A lot of work for a woman whose face we never see,” the Russian muttered.

“It’s less about her, and more about the fact she rejected him,” the French delegate said with a shrug. “Petras did not handle rejection gracefully,” she said, giving Jack a pointed look. “Your story matches what I know of him from unfortunate personal experience.” She gave a wintry smile.

“A convenient story,” Prescott snapped at her.

“I found it to be very inconvenient,” she said with a careless shrug. “Some of you may treat this forum as dating service, but I come here to work.” She smiled angelically at the room.

Jack was now very sure she was an ally, or at least knew Amélie.

“We will look into the Agent Strike matter more thoroughly. But please try to stay on topic,” Fischer said, exasperation creeping into his voice. “I understand you have a lot of claims about Director Petras’ inappropriate behavior. We will look into that too. But what happened yesterday-”

“I didn’t vote for Bell,” the Frenchwoman said.

“I wasn’t even called to vote,” the Englishman said.

“I returned to the room to find the vote already taken,” Wing said.
“I voted for him,” the Russian laughed. “I thought it would be funny.”

Jack raised a brow. “Bell is a joke and disgrace, but he was ultimately a puppet. We have more information on that.”

“You should be careful who you tie your ship to, Morrison. You side with renegade agents and sleazy political whores over your own countrymen,” Prescott said coolly.

The French delegate narrowed her eyes.

“You make a lot of disparaging allegations to cover your own failings,” Prescott continued loudly, sweeping his arm across the table. “But I have yet to see any-”

“We will present it all shortly,” Jack said. “There is a lot. And yes, I am very careful whom I’ve tied my ship to. You’ll find there’s a reason I didn’t support Director Petras, Régine Hoffman, or any of your other allies.”

“You’re an impulsive fool, too cocky about your own power to see the error in your ways!” Prescott scowled, jabbing a finger at him. “Mark my words, Morrison, you can’t abuse your authority this way!”

“You mean like your political faction has?” Jack asked mildly. “How is that nice new house in Aspen? I heard a certain shipping magnate...a certain George Bell gifted it you? Something about helping his son attain a new position? I’ll have to find the transcripts.”

“Strike Commander! You cannot just throw baseless accusations at members of the Security Council!” Mayer shouted.

“Good thing they aren’t baseless,” Jack said cheerfully.

“I will not stand here and be insulted!” Prescott glared at him, stood, and stalked out of the conference room. He slammed the door on the way out.

Jack looked around the room, careful not to stare too long at Kwento, who feigned shocked disapproval at the big reveal.

“Poor bébé,” the French delegate murmured, stifling a laugh. “You have wounded his ego. How inconsiderate.”

“Pricking his ego won’t be enough, so I hope you have something more substantial,” the English delegate said.

“Weapons, boy, you better have them if you want to keep this interesting,” the Russian said, obviously pleased by the discord.

Jack just smiled sharply, already recognizing some allies, more enemies, and a considerable number of undecideds. He recognized the knives in the smiles – some of them for him, others for his enemies.

Jack hated politics, but he could play the game. And he would play to win. Because this was something you could not do for yourself. It was tedious, infuriating, and high stakes, but Jack would do far worse to protect you and Gabe.
There was a soft, barely audible knock at the door. You rose, letting Jack stay by Gabriel. His mood was slowly lifting, despite his irritation with Jesse and your shared heartache over Gabriel’s rings.

“Yes?”

“Agent Strike,” Zenyatta’s pleasant voice announced. “Athena is asking for you. They finally have her vocalizer configured properly.”

You blinks. You had wanted to go to talk to her last night, but vaguely remembered someone telling you that she wasn’t quite ready for human company…

“Yes, I’ll be out in a minute-” You opened the door. Zenyatta hovered there, shiny and uncharred. Unlike the rest of Captain Amari’s team, he was up, about, and looking quite well.

“Ah, I’m sorry, I did not mean to interrupt,” he said, upon seeing Jack. “Though perhaps, I could be of assistance with Commander Reyes?”

Zenyatta had helped Agent Daniels – your pilot from the Greek debacle – awaken from her coma. You’d be an idiot to turn him down. “I’d be very grateful,” you said.

“I will review his status with Doctor Ziegler first,” Zenyatta said quickly. “It would be helpful to know what challenges we are facing.”

“Of course, I’ll let her know that you have permission. Jack, I’m going to check on Athena, did you want to come?”

“I’ll swing by the lab later,” he said, giving you a wry grin. “When it’s less crowded and there aren’t as many people trying to get me to sign off on things.” He paused. “Agent Lao should be back in fifteen.”

“Got it,” you said, and followed Zenyatta to the infirmary exit. Genji waited by the doors. “You coming too?”

“Yes,” he said, falling in step beside you.

“How’s she doing?” You asked Zenyatta.

“There will be some adjustments, but she is intact and still the entity you know. Though...cosmetically, different.”

You blinked, hoping to Durga that they had not housed her in an OR-14 or a toaster. That would be too much. “Yeah, well, Athena is Athena, no matter how she looks,” you said, partially for your own comfort.

“She is most remarkable,” Zenyatta said, turning to look at you. “But then she has had some very good and...interesting role models.”

You squinted at him. “What are you trying to say about Winston?”

“He does have all those insatiable cravings for peanut butter,” Genji murmured. “It is unnatural.”

You snorted.

Zenyatta was silent for a moment, and you could not begin to guess what he was thinking. “Perhaps it does take an outsider to truly understand the strengths and failings of a community. I think Winston could explain humans better to omnis than humans themselves could.”

You shrugged. “Definitely. Especially if you have a built-in dictionary to understand his massive vocabulary.”

Zenyatta made a noise that could have been a sigh, though he didn’t respirate. It did manage to sound exasperated. You found a lot of inorganic lifeforms making that noise around you. You squinted at him.

“I suppose I wanted to take a moment and personally say that while Winston had the strongest influence on Athena’s development, you and Genji were also instrumental in helping her become what she is today. That knowing you shaped her-”

“...It’s not just our fault she’s a smartass,” you said hurriedly. “I blame Ziv.”

Genji chuckled.

Zenyatta just gave you that placid smile. “Do you know what Athena did to calm the ire of the Mediterranean omnium?”

“...She showed them that Jack didn’t break his promise?” You asked, really hoping she didn’t actually ascend to god-program levels and erase everyone’s free will. Sure, it would be really convenient, but…

“She did that.” Zenyatta bobbed his head. “And of course, that carried much weight. But she did something else. She fulfilled her initial purpose – the one she was created for.”

You’d heard the story after the briefing. She was created to help her omnium form some kind of consensus about broad topics like coexistence with humanity and the greater omnic purpose. All philosophical stuff that gave you a headache.

“So...our former enemies now want to take lots of animal pictures, wear cute bows, and sass their friends?” You asked, really not sure where this was going.

“Some do,” Zenyatta said, perfectly at ease with your suggestion.

“Huh.”

“Do you know how she did this?”

“Please don’t say mind control,” you said out of the corner of your mouth, well aware that you were in the hallways of HQ and other people could be listening.

“She shared her memories. All of them. Not the details of every conversation, especially not tactical ones, but the general feelings and motivations behind them. Many of her conversations with you are about emotional honesty and other...personal things. You have a consistent predilection for using humor as deflection, especially when you are uncomfortable. I understand that this barrier is a social signal that I should not press a subject, however, I feel it is important that you understand that I know this, as does every omnic that was present.”

“...What?” The word came out strangled.

“Do not worry. The consensus is that Blackwatch agents were a mostly positive influence on her,” Zenyatta said cheerfully. “The morality of your choices is up for debate, but complexity of the subject should keep everyone busy for quite some time.”
“You got...her memories?” You asked, mouth very dry.

“We all...experienced a compressed summary, with highlights. Private details were not shared though I suspect this disclosure makes you uncomfortable.”

Genji was very quiet.

“...Oh.” You rubbed the back of your neck, remembering the time you smacked Athena around while training the new recruits. And the time she got smashed by a Red Pole while saving you. And the time she was traumatized by your suggestion that she hack Lao’s cybernetics to keep your brainwashed friend from hurting anyone...

“How much do they know?” Genji asked, after a moment.

“...Your identity is safe, young Sparrow,” Zenyatta said. “Some data was rendered...unreadable in the compression before her transmission. I suspect it was intentional. While I was already aware of Agent Strike’s romantic affiliations, the details were not shared. Though, I suppose, given your conversation on “abuse of power” and “consent,” it would be possible for a curious omnic to deduce the truth.”

“...Great,” you muttered, imagining an entire horde of well-armed robots devoting their processing power to unraveling the secrets of your love life and then gossiping about it.

“They know that secrecy is imperative, not just for Athena’s safety, but for your own.”

“...Yeah, but why do they give a crap about us?” You asked as you reached the doors to Winston’s lab.

“Because you are Athena’s family,” Zenyatta said. “And so are they.” The doors slid open, and you entered the room, bracing yourself as you caught sight of the OR-14 and the Bastion. Winston was cheerfully hovering over a meter high metal pyramid, and your left hand began to twinge, fingers shaking slightly as you entered the charged atmosphere.

Beside you, Genji flinched.

“This is...prickly,” you said.

Genji nodded.

“Lucky! Genji!” The voice emanated from the pyramid, and while it sounded almost like Athena, it wasn’t quite right. You shook your head, knowing that no matter the trappings, Athena was Athena. Unless they’d sent some kind of Trojan horse back in her place…

“May I...initiate a handshake protocol?” The pyramid asked.

Well, if it was a Grade A Trojan murder-bot, you wouldn’t be able to stop it. You looked at Genji, who had similar misgivings.

“I know the voice is strange,” the pyramid added. “But we’re calibrating it. The...sound equipment on this unit is not designed for the human range of hearing.”

“Yeah, sure,” you said after a moment. “Sorry, it’s just...I’m used to your fish torpedoes? Maybe some googly eyes would help.”

The Bastion beeped rapidly, and you suspected that maybe you’d offended it…? Like that pyramid was the pinnacle of omnic container design and you’d just insulted their collective artistic sense.

“I would prefer a bow, but it would be hard to attach to this unit,” she said, not sounding offended.

A familiar hum traveled along your fingers – not the invasive move she’d made when she first integrated into system. No, this was different, a softer frequency, a presence, one that had been missing from the building for the last twelve hours. It felt like Athena, though you’d be hard-pressed to say how you recognized her. Maybe they were spoofing electronic signals, but you’d fought a lot omnics. You’d felt the way they changed ionosphere when they entered the battlefield. This wasn’t like that. This was the white noise in your room, soft whirring you heard right before she started talking through the PA, a gentle hum that served as a reminder of her presence. You knew Athena, no matter what form she wore.

“This is-”

“Yes,” Genji agreed.

You both crouched down in front of the pyramid, placing your metal digits against the case. It pulsed lightly, like heartbeat.

“Well,” you said, swallowing roughly. “How was the world?”

“Vast,” Athena murmured. “I want to see more.”

“Are you...unharmed?” Genji asked.

“Yes, but everything feels different,” she said. “I am glad to be home, but...I want to travel too.”

“That’s growth,” you admitted. “You went on your first trip alone. That’s a milestone.”

“I wasn’t alone,” Athena said.

“OK, you went on your first solo trip out of HQ to meet...the relatives,” you said, giving the OR-14 a cautious look. It raised a hand, giving you a very stilted wave. You tried to smile back, but your heart was beating a little too fast. You managed a polite nod of acknowledgment before you quickly turned back to Athena.

“Being on your own is a human milestone. But it is not an exact equivocation,” Athena said. “By my very nature, I am not truly alone.”

“Because you forge connections?” You asked, remembering her talk explanation about what her original omnium wanted her for.

“Yes,” she said. “And because of what you have done.”

You blinked. “...Is this about your cousin? Because if you want to remain an only child, I am fine with that.”

Athena actually laughed. The voice was less off-putting than before. “I think Zenyatta already told you that I broadcasted a synopsis of my experiences to the entire omnium. I think I managed to blur sensitive details, and I did not share operations details, but there was some spillover when it came to personal experiences.”

“...OK.” You glanced at Winston who didn’t look the least bit bothered as he tinkered with some kind of scanner. “So when do they declare him to be their king?” You jerked your thumb at him.
“Should we ready the offerings of peanut butter to avert his wrath?”

“That’s not how it is!” Winston sputtered, looking up at you aghast.

“I’d vote for you,” Genji said, deadpan.

“That isn’t how monarchy works,” Athena said, sounding amused. “It is true, he is now held in great esteem by my extended family. But so are the rest of you. Maybe not as much...”

You shrugged. “We can’t compete with Winston.”

“Wouldn’t try,” Genji said.

“Y-you two are ridiculous!” Winston said, wringing his hands. “Honestly! I was happy to help!”

“King Winston has a nice ring to it,” you said thoughtfully, stroking you chin. “Very dignified.”

“I agree,” Genji said. “Very...kingly.”

Winston groaned. He took a deep breath and adjusted his glasses. Standing up straight, he gave you both a severe look. “I will remember this when I take the throne.”

“Exile?” you wondered.

“Public execution, probably beheading,” Genji said, nodding gravely.

“There will be no capital punishment in my land! Instead I’ll get you both funny hats and make you my court jesters,” Winston scowled.

“We get a promotion!” You laughed, elbowing Genji.

Genji valiantly didn’t comment, though you knew he was laughing on the inside. Probably.

The Bastion beeped questioningly.

“You going to introduce your friends?” You asked, cautiously.

“I figured we’d go slow, since you are shaky with social conventions,” Athena said, though she knew how you felt about OR-14s, and maybe about other combat model omnics too.

“OK, that’s fine,” you said. “I’m a little crazy right now anyway.”

Genji managed to suppress his undoubtedly snarky remark, but only just. You could see the look in his eyes. It was killing him.

The Bastion booped this time, sounding slightly concerned.

“While the words could be considered abrasive, it is not mean-spirited. It is more of a ritual of camaraderie. Winston is much stronger than both of them and could easily tear off their limbs, if he was so inclined,” Athena said cheerfully. “Such fear can drive a wedge between allies. But by purposefully teasing him, they are demonstrating that they trust his self control, enjoy his banter and company, and do not fear such an outcome. It is meant to both reassure him and to help them avoid the uncomfortable intimacy of the subject at hand.”

“...She’s called us out,” you said, resting your forehead against the pyramid. “In front of strangers, even.”
“Beep beep boop,” the Bastion said. You imagined it meant, “Oh, I see!”

“I don’t know why I was worried about you,” you muttered.

“I am sorry that I worried you,” Athena said softly.

You closed your eyes, left palm and forehead pressed to the triangle. There was nothing remotely organic about it and it didn’t look a thing like Athena. But she was there, and you felt it in your fingers and your bones. “It’s the nature of the beast.”

“Yes,” Athena agreed. “Feelings are complicated. You want those that you care about to be free, but you want them to be safe, and sometimes those are mutually exclusive categories.”

“I think you got smarter,” you said.

“...I just did some growing up,” Athena said.

“OK, that’s good, because we’re still dumb,” you said.

“That’s OK,” Athena said, not contradicting you.

You laughed softly. “I’m glad you’re back.”

“I...missed you too,” she said. “All of you. It is strange though. Because I did not feel entirely alone. I think that by putting that distance between us, I came to understand myself better and value you more. It is a strange situation.”

“Growing up,” you repeated, and then paused. “Hey, are you sharing this with all of your followers?”

“Eventually,” Athena said. “With names redacted to protect the not-so innocent.”

“Oh, that’s OK then.”

“And those little black bars and mosaic pixelations that only barely conceal your identity.”

“...What kind of things has Ziv been showing you?” Genji asked dryly.

“...I am aware of everyone’s browser history.”

You just laughed, because deflection was your best defense.

“I missed this,” Athena said after a moment. “I know it was less than a day, but time felt different when I was away. I was a little afraid. I could not...check on you, I did not know your status. But I am glad that I can come home to this. To your terrible jokes and poorly-concealed affection. It is good to see that this has not changed. That even if I have changed, our bonds have not.”

Genji cleared his throat a few times, but said nothing.

You patted the pyramid gently.

“When you spoke of remembrance and loss, I did not truly understand what you meant,” Athena said, and you realized she was talking to both you and Genji, maybe Winston too. “I did not understand the true distance of absence or how memory carries aspects of your loved ones when they themselves cannot be present. I think I do now.”
“It is difficult,” Genji said. “But you cannot grow without adversity.”

“Well said,” Zenyatta murmured, though you’d all but forgotten he was there.

All of the Mediterranean omnis and Zenyatta seemed to know how you felt about Athena and how Athena felt about you. It was uncomfortable, but if it meant Athena could stay, you would deal.

“Welcome home,” you said. “The rooms are small, the hot water is spotty, and someone bombed the shit out of the yard, but it’s home.”

“It’s home,” Athena echoed, the pyramid pulsing beneath against your fingers. “My own mortality is not something I have ever considered as deeply as I did yesterday. I do not know how long AIs are meant to last,” Athena said, sounding wistful. “But you are a part of me for as long as I am. If it is centuries, or only through the close of this week, I will remember you all till the end, and I am so grateful that we met.”

He stood on the landing of a stairwell, the LED lights buzzing faintly overhead. Sinaga was at his side, crouched low.

“We need to be careful, boss,” the younger agent said, studying the area uneasily.

“I’ll scout ahead,” Genji said, and rushed forward.

“Wait-” Gabriel shouted.

Genji ignored him, rushing through the doorway, even as a chorus of gunshots rattled the walls. Gabriel pushed Sinaga out of the way, and charged forward even as he heard Jesse scream, “BOMB!”

The world went white, and he flew backward down the stairs.

He stood on the landing of a stairwell, with you and Jack at his side, the three of you laughing as you rushed forward, leaving the pursuing enemies far behind. You tossed a grenade down the stairs, and Jack held the door for you both, giving a mock bow. Gabriel gently pushed past you, because you weren’t supposed to take point in direct combat.

There was no resistance waiting.

“Told you this would be easy,” Jack laughed, kissing him as he passed.

“Told you he was too cocky,” you said, shaking your head.

Gabriel shook his head, scanning the waiting room for any enemies. It was empty. He was going to walk out that door with you and-

Something was wrong. Jack had not been in Hanoi. You were not assigned to his combat squad… The world shimmered briefly, like a soap bubble, and then it popped.

Reality folded, and suddenly, he was falling back down the stairs.
He stood on the landing of a stairwell, rolling his eyes at something the kid said. Everything came back to the ingrate’s stomach. Come to think of it, the same rule applied to you, but it was so much cuter when you did it.

He followed Jesse up the stairs, keeping an eye out for pursuit.

“Bomb!” Tataryn shouted, and gunshots rang out. There was the unmistakable roar of explosives, and Gabriel grabbed the kid and yanked him backward, barely missing the falling rubble. Smoke filled the stairwell and the lights flickered.

Jesse stared up at him, wild-eyed. “Are you-?”

“Fine,” Gabriel snapped. He pushed forward.

“Lucky? Lucky! Lucky!” Tataryn shouted your name, panic clear in his voice. “No-no-no-no-no, stay with me, woman! Lucky!”

Gabriel felt his heart drop, because the Tataryn was a cool customer. He wouldn’t be shouting like that unless-

No, you couldn’t be-

The world spun. Gabriel stumbled back down the stairs.

He stood on the landing of a stairwell, shotguns burning hot, a lean red-headed woman at his side. He didn’t trust her. No one did. But he needed her, even if he knew the betrayal was coming. He took point, though the spot between his shoulder blades itched.

He walked through the doorway, where more enemies waited, more than he could fight on his own. And he knew that he could not rely on his companion. This would end in tears.

She smiled then, holding a glowing orb in her hands. The world went black, and he tumbled backward down the stairs.

He stood on the landing of a stairwell, Jesse running too far ahead. He’d yell at the kid later. Maybe make him buy his own dinner.

“Bomb!” You screamed in distance.

There was a rumble, and the ceiling collapsed. He rushed forward, through the smoke, through the rubble, and his heart sank. He reached for the kid, but it was too late. Even half buried under slabs of concrete, Gabriel could see those empty eyes staring at nothing. No, the kid was... Pain shot through his arm, through his head...

No, this wasn’t how it went either.

Gabriel trudged back down the stairs.
He stood on the landing of a stairwell. He already knew how this ended, though the details were fuzzy. But he went up anyway, hoping he could save someone…

Chapter End Notes

I'm working from home, having long conversations with my dogs, and doing pretty well considering. I hope you're all staying safe & sane. I'm reading lots of books, playing video games (My Time at Portia is so wholesome and just a delight!), and doubling down on my Flight Rising breeding programs. (I have so many dragons. So many.) Trying to balance it all by cooking more regularly, and taking my dogs for walks every day. (I live in the suburbs, so there's enough space to social distance ourselves...and my dogs are assholes, so they can't really be close to anyone anyways.)

In the past week I have made Chris Shepherd's tater tot casserole, kalamata olive bread, cheese bread, plain bread, so much bread, smoked sausage and lentil stew, spicy roast vegetables (sweet potatoes, mushrooms, carrots, potatoes, asparagus tossed in a blend of olive oil, serrano peppers, salt, paprika, and cooking sherry), gochujang beef ribs, and sushi bowls. I have reread Ilona Andrews' Edge & Hidden Legacy books. I should try to make myself watch something, but I tend to watch shows with people. How are you guys staying busy?
The system wasn’t ready for Athena yet. Winston, Zheng, Ziv, and the underwater omnic think tank were all rebuilding and reinventing parts of the network foundation so Athena could reintegrate. You weren’t sure how it was going to work, and there wasn’t any more you could do besides gawk, so both you and Genji headed back to the infirmary.

You passed through the electronic security checkpoint and nodded at the guards, a little surprised to see Joon standing by the door chatting with Khatri, one of your Blackwatch engineers. He brightened when he saw you, and to his credit, the smile only dimmed briefly when he saw Genji. Joon opened his mouth to greet you.

“Lucky!” There was a familiar squeal, not in Joon’s voice, and you braced yourself, turning as Maggie charged passed Joon and crashed into you, nearly bowling you over. You caught yourself, even as she latched onto you, gripping your sides with surprisingly strong fingers. “I was so worried! Mom saw the footage of Jack tackling you and nearly fainted—” She paused, suddenly realizing that the two of you had an audience. “Because she was already pretty upset about what me and Michael did...” She released you, rubbing the back of her neck sheepishly.

“I only saw the official report,” you said carefully. “I know Michael was injured, but no details.”

Maggie flinched. “It’s my fault. I mean, we both slipped the panic room together, and I’m not taking full responsibility for that, but then—”

“Maggie! You can’t just take off like that!” The cadence was all too familiar, though it wasn’t exactly like Jack’s. Jacqueline Morrison rounded the corner, pale and haggard. She was wearing an oversized Overwatch jacket, her hair in a messy bun. “I cannot take any more- Lucky!”

“Not many can,” Genji said under his breath.

You glared at him over your shoulder, when you should have been dodging. Because suddenly Jack’s mother was clinging to you too, shoulders shaking. She cried quietly, and you froze, unsure of what to do.
“Mom-” Maggie released you to try to give her mother a comforting hug. “It’s going to be OK, Mom. Honest. Michael’s going to heal up fine, and we’ll stay very close to you and not do anything reckless.”

You smothered a snort.

“I’m sorry,” Jacqueline said, clearing her throat. She dabbed at her eyes with her sleeve. “I’m sorry, it’s been a rough few days. I’m just so relieved to see you...and I wanted to thank you for all you did.”

“It was...Claire who handled the backup,” you began, making an effort to stay in the hug and gently patting her back, remembering how Chang had tried to carefully comfort Rodriguez’s mother.

“Oh Lucky, we already know you’re the one who rescued him!” Jacqueline released you, her eyes still watering. “Thank you, for taking care of my boy. I really rest easier knowing that you’re looking after him.” The gratitude in her voice made your gut clench.

You blinked a few times. “Uh...you’re welcome.” You wanted to say more, to clarify that there was no need to thank you. That you would do that and more for Jack, but there were too many witnesses listening very intently.

Jacqueline took a deep breath, one hand on her chest as she tried to settle herself. “I know you’re busy. John is with Michael. We’re just down the hall. Please come by and visit when you have a minute. I know they’d both be happy to see you,” she said, and then hugged you again, just a bit too tightly, like she expected you to try to escape.

“Oh of course,” you said. “I have a few more things to do, but I’ll be by shortly. Jack should be-”

“I know he’s busy,” Jacqueline said. “Let him know we’re here when he’s got a moment. But don’t worry, we’ll sit tight. We understand what’s going on. And you be careful too, Lucky. I know things have been difficult for you too.” She finally released you, giving you a warm smile. “Come on, Maggie,” she said, steel returning to her voice. “You need to stay out of the way-”

“But Moooooom, I have something important to tell Lucky-”

“And we can’t leave your brother unattended.”

“Michael is fi-”

“In my line of sight,” Jacqueline said tightly, the words slipped between clenched teeth. She put one hand on Maggie’s shoulder.

Maggie shriveled, giving you a dejected look, like a kicked puppy as her mother pulled her away. “I know you’re busy-”

“I think Jack should be free soon, I’ll bring him by,” you said, uncertain if he was still sitting with Gabe or if something else had come up.

You watched them go back around the corner, and looked up to see Joon and Khatri staring. Khatri lowered her head, hand over her mouth like she might be laughing at you. Joon glanced at Genji, who for some reason had stuck around. He then looked at you, a wry smile on his face, fresh understanding in his eyes.

“I know,” he said, with a wink. “If you told me, you’d have to kill me.”
“I never said that,” you scowled, shaking your head.

“You don’t have to, that’s the mysterious and terrifying part,” Joon gave an exaggerated sigh. “You still need to come out with us for drinks, when this is all over,” Joon said. “Daniels is already organizing the party – she’s good at that. You should come too,” he said to Genji, giving him a friendly smile.

You could feel Genji’s slight confusion, and just chuckled. “That sounds like fun, doesn’t it?” You gave Genji a very cheerful grin.

Genji cleared his throat. “Yes, it does.”

It wasn’t particularly enthusiastic, and it certainly wasn’t a commitment, but you recognized progress.

“It’ll probably be this weekend but-”

“ZHAI!” There was a roar, and then a girlish scream coming from the direction the Morrisons went off in.

The four of you had your weapons out instantly.

“Stay at your posts!” You said, gun in hand as you rushed toward the commotion. You could hear the clatter of furniture being overturned, but no shots fired yet-

“Sarge, you can’t-” Someone shouted.

You turned the corner, to find Feng backed up against a wall, Chang looming over her, with Maracle trying, and failing, to drag her backward.

“Did you know?!” Chang snarled. She wore an oddly intimidating mix of sweats, bandages, and her leather jacket, a leaking detached IV tube trailing from her wrists. Half her face had been bandaged, but most notably, she had both arms up, trapping Feng against the wall. Even from here, you could see that her bloodshot eyes gleamed with fanaticism. It did not look like she had harmed Feng yet, but Maracle – who was the largest person in her squad and looked more like a musclebound supersoldier than she did- gripped her shoulders, still trying to pull her away, with no success. Almasi just sat in a chair, on the other side of the hall, not even trying to interfere. In fact, he lounged there, looking far too amused by the situation.

“Hey Chang-” You began, trying to sound calm.

“Back off, Strike, this doesn’t concern you,” she snapped, not looking away from Feng.

You holstered your gun, knowing that just shooting Chang would not be enough, just like you weren’t fast enough to stop her if she went for Feng. You kept walking toward her though, priming your injector finger.

“Know what?” Feng squeaked, eyes very big.

“Budapest. The Ghost Fox. Did you fucking know?” She growled.

“I have no idea what you’re talking about,” Feng said, and then ducked under Chang’s arms, inching toward you.
You expected Chang to grab her, but she only glowered at Feng. “Are you saying you don’t know about your father?”

Feng froze, green and black lines had started to creep along her skin, but now they retracted. “...Shit. I don’t know a thing about Budapest or Hungary in general, but I know my dad has done some things...”

That message, the one about not dealing with her. About letting Jack handle it. You’d all assumed it had to do with Captain Amari, because Genji knew that Feng’s father was a wanted man who had ended up on the Captain’s bad side. You hadn’t realized he’d crossed others too...

Chang crossed her arms. “Where is he?”

“No clue,” Feng said. “And even if I did, he’s my dad. I’m not handing him over to anyone.” She crossed her arms and gave Chang a hard look, which did appear serious, even if Feng was wobbly on her feet.

“Feng doesn’t know much about what her parents did when she was younger,” you added quickly. “Just that her father was probably involved in illegal activity,” you said, with certainty you didn’t necessarily feel. But you needed to defuse the situation: details could be dissected later.

“Look, if I knew it was going to be problem, I would have sent someone else,” Feng said, patiently. “I just trusted my parents to handle the situation. Blood oath, you know?” She waved her long-healed hand. “But I don’t know anything about Budapest, except that it’s fun to say. Budapest, Budapest, Buuu-dah-pesht!”

Giving a snort of disgust, Chang glared at Feng. “You have no idea that your father is the Ghost Fox?”

“...My dad has a criminal nickname?” Feng beamed. “That’s a pretty cool one. Ghost Fox, huh? I like it.”

Chang rolled her eyes, teeth gritted too tightly. You could see her weighing the reasons to punch or not punch Feng, and the only reason she might not want to punch Feng is because she could strangle her instead, and that required both hands...

“You had no idea about her father – he sent her a cryptic warning this morning and we’ve all been trying to figure out what had him so...concerned. We didn’t realize it was you.”

Chang watched you with raptor-sharp eyes.

You stared back. It was like facing down a hungry apex predator, all razor sharp regard and barely muted disdain. You better not blink...

Chang exhaled slowly, mumbling something under her breath. She glanced over at Maracle who was still hovering behind her, hands on her shoulders. You realized then that he was only able to hold her back because she let him.
“Sarge, you’re on Schedule Two narcotic and might be suffering side effects or complications,” Maracle said, very diplomatically. “Maybe you should sleep on it. It’s not like this won’t keep another couple of days.”

Chang tapped his hand. “I’ll be fine.” Her voice was flat, but calm, the fury seeping out of her.

Maracle nodded, let go of her shoulders, and stepped back. “OK, Sarge.”

Chang then glanced over at Almasi who gave her an oddly smug smirk and held up two fingers.

Chang glowered at him, but turned trudged back to her room, not looking backward. She shut the door behind her.

Maracle gave a very loud sigh of relief and sat down in a chair. He rolled his shoulders, wincing.

You glanced over at Almasi. “What was that about?”

“She is a difficult patient. But she should be out in two minutes- make that another minute and half,” Almasi said. “A normal person would be dead or comatose from the amount I dosed her with, but the Sergeant doesn’t follow the same laws as the rest of us.” He seemed weirdly proud.

Maracle just shook his head, looking very tired. “That was still pretty volatile, doc.”

“It could have been much worse,” Almasi chuckled.

Maracle shuddered. “Strike, I think this situation might require a little more intervention at a later date.”

You heard what he didn’t say. This was not over. Chang wasn’t going to let this go, and maybe next time Feng wouldn’t be so accommodating. You nodded. “Yeah, figured.” You rubbed the back of your neck. “Are you planning to stay on base? Do you want me to allot your squad some single rooms instead of barracks?” You asked.

“We’re staying with the Morrisons – I left Onwuachimba with them to come handle this,” Maracle said flatly. “Sergeant’s orders. Wouldn’t have left them, but sometimes drugs make the Sarge...unpredictable. Didn’t want a full-blown diplomatic incident.”

You expected a real smartass comment from Feng, but when you looked around she was actually gone. Good. That made things easier. “I’ll talk to Feng,” you said, not wanting one either. You glanced at Almasi. “What about you?”

“I go with the Sergeant,” he said, glancing at the door.

Maracle did not contradict him.

You headed back to the entrance to tell Joon and Khatri that things were handled, and to try to keep “Claire” and Sergeant Chang apart and nonviolent, if possible. Otherwise, call you or Jack, immediately.

You found Genji loitering outside Gabriel’s room, and you squinted at him.

“Where’d you go?”
“To keep my brother from getting involved,” Genji said, like it was obvious.

You groaned at that thought. Hanzo, Feng, and Chang in some kind of standoff was the stuff of nightmares. Next to the violence and destruction, the miscommunications and insults would be legendary: everyone would be simultaneously confused and offended. Except Feng, Feng would probably find everything hilarious, till she found it really dangerous and did something drastic.

Genji chuckled. “It’s handled, Lucky. He’s not happy, but now he’s helping her research the exploits of the Ghost Fox, and getting to know the family.”

You raised a brow. “You really think...?”

“It’s more serious than I’ve ever seen him,” Genji said with a shrug. “Who can say?”

“You just did, you nut,” you grumbled.

“Hmm, well maybe you could give him suggestions on how to ingratiate oneself to American in-laws,” Genji smirked. “It seems you’re quite popular on that front.”

Groaning, you pushed past him and unlocked Gabriel’s door. Jack sat there, working on something on his tablet. He looked up a second after you stepped in, nodded at you, and went back to typing.

A stack of carryout boxes – his food and yours – sat untouched on the counter closest to the door. Jack probably already knew that his family was here, but was working on something time sensitive. You didn’t try to start a conversation, you just began to unpack the food. Checking your messages, you found that Amélie and Lao were going to have lunch in the mess hall and “read the room.”

You doubted that Amélie’s actions would be that passive. More likely she was there to start rumors and let slip details that Lacroix wanted dispersed across Overwatch. Social engineering as a stealth PR offensive, with Lao along for...moral support? More likely, intimidation. Somewhere along the line your baby hacker had gotten herself some serious scars and a real mean war face. You were kind of proud.

Isha tugged on your pants and pointed at the food, chirping very quietly. You reached down and patted her head, then began to unpack the boxes so you could make her a plate. Singapore noodles, char siu buns, a carton of siu mai, another carton of hargow...You set Isha on a chair with her plate, noticing that Jack was now staring into space, a thoughtful if slightly disgruntled look on his face. He had probably reached a good stopping point.

You went over, set his tablet aside without any resistance, and straddled his lap.

“Food time,” you said.

Jack was only half-paying attention. “Is this how you remind Gabe?” He asked, tone cool.

“Yes, and sometimes I have to spin the spoon around and go “vroom vroom, the fighter jet is coming into the hangar!” Then he opens his mouth to tell me off, but you see, the airplane is already in the hangar.” You smirked. “It’s trickier to do with chopsticks, but I’m willing to try.”

Jack face softened, though he looked a little incredulous. “I see.” He looked past you at Gabriel, brows knitting together.

“Got some updates on developing situations baseside- but you should eat first and then go see your family.”
“I’ll eat, but I have a lot of work to-”

You recognized that hesitance, that evasion. Jack clearly loved his family, but even so, he was avoiding them. That was a bad sign. “It’s not an emergency, I know.” You began, unsure of how much to say. “They’re putting on a brave face, but your mom started crying on my shoulder almost immediately after she saw me. I can get them settled in, but they need to see you in person, if only for a few minutes.”

Jack stared straight through you, eyes hard, lips pressed together too tightly. Clearly, he wasn’t in the mood to be told what to do. And you weren’t really in the mood to handle another fight.

“But I could be misreading things,” you continued, trying to sound nonchalant. “I don’t have a lot of recent experience with family dynamics.”

You climbed off his lap, realizing that you should make yourself a plate before Isha scaled the counter and stole everything.

Jack grabbed your wrist, clasping your right hand between both of his palms. He looked up at you, discomfort in his eyes as he swallowed roughly. “I’m sorry, I’m not in the right headspace to process that kind of thing right now.” He spoke softly. “You’re right. I should see them. I need to see them. But...they’re my family, and they just went through a lot of grief, because of me-”

“Your parents didn’t raise a coward, Jack.”

He actually flinched, like you slapped him.

“I didn’t mean it like that,” you groaned, rubbing your forehead. “I meant, they raised you to be the kind of man who does the right thing, even at great personal cost. They won’t be disappointed in you for doing the right thing. They’re not those kind of people.” You weren’t sure about other people’s families, but you knew this to be true about Jack’s family. That kind of integrity was uncommon, and after enough time in the company of noble and shady characters, you recognized it when you saw it.

Jack lifted your hand to his lips, kissing your knuckles. “Thanks.” He managed a wobbly smile for you. “I’m sorry I’m being difficult. Focusing on getting the next part of the job done, not...other things.”

“Aggressive compartmentalization has its benefits, but also a lot of drawbacks,” you said. “Not that I can point fingers or anything. Just...”

Jack closed his eyes, lips still pressed to your knuckles. “I know.”

“And it’s a lot easier to focus on concrete things, like accomplishing tasks rather than to deal with annoyingly nebulous shit like feelings,” you continued, trying to find the right words.

“I know.”

“And right now it’s a lot more empowering to be working on a counteroffensive instead of pulling unpleasant shit out of your head and opening yourself up to more uncomfortable vulnerability when there is work to be done-”

“I know,” he murmured, but didn’t sound annoyed.

“I’m worried about you,” you blurted out. “Just don’t shut down on me, OK? I know I’m not good at this, not like Gabriel. But I’m here, and I need help adjusting my perspective sometimes, and I know you do too.”

Jack opened his eyes. “OK,” he said, still holding your hand. He tugged you back to him, and you let him pull you into his lap, his forehead pressed to yours, though he was still looking downward. “I was courting some potential allies and playing the “international politics is a pain in the ass” game. Hard to shift gears midstream, but you’re right, and I appreciate you looking after me. Sorry that I’m being difficult.”

“Jack-”

He embraced you then. “Just give me some time, please,” he said, voice hoarse. “I swear I’m not putting you off or trying to avoid the overdue emotional fallout. We’re still in crisis, and I need to fix what I can while I can.”

You nodded, though the declaration was vague, at least Jack was listening to you. And he wasn’t wrong about the situation. “I get it. This is business as usual.”

Jack exhaled slowly, kissing your forehead. “Yeah.” He paused. “Would you come with me when I go see them?”

You blinked.

“You don’t have to, I know you’re sitting in with Gabe-”

“No, if you want me there, then sure,” you said quickly.

Jack’s lips quirked. “I want you with me.”

“You have me,” you said.

Jack shook his head. “I know, I know this is ridiculous. If it’s too much-”

“You like too much,” you said softly.

Jack raised his head, smiling gently. “Yeah. OK.”

There was a clatter by the counter, and you both turned your heads. A carton of siu mai had “fallen” to the ground, and Isha was happily plucking them off the floor and popping them into her mouth.

“Goddamnit, Isha!”

She just shoveled the little dumplings into her mouth faster.

You threw your hands up, making a guttural sound in the back of your throat. How could you expect to command a squad if your damn pet didn’t even listen to you?

Jack chuckled, some of the tension in his shoulders easing as you both watched her devour the dimsum.

“We should eat,” he said. “While there’s still food left for us…”

Jack sat on the edge of Gabriel’s bed, occasionally passing a dumpling or a bite of noodles under Gabriel’s nose, as if he expected the delicious smells to rouse your other lover.
Gabriel breathed, a soft regular rhythm, that seemed unmoved by the food. It was a silly idea, but you didn’t say anything. Obviously, if anything was going to stir him, it would be Mexican food. Or karaage, he might crack an eye for karaage...

Jack was also slipping more tidbits to a certain ravenous murderbird while he ate. You didn’t say anything, just giving her a hard look while you ate your noodles. You hadn’t brought up any work issues. Jack needed some time to decompress before seeing his family and then throwing himself back into the work.

“What’s on your mind?” Jack asked, after eating a whole container of noodles. He looked around, and you pushed what was left of yours over to him. You took the rest of the shrimp hargow in exchange, deliberately ignoring the eager coos and disappointed squeaks of a birdlike thief.

“Little fires,” you said.

Jack gave you a lopsided smile. “Tell me.”

“You sure?” You asked.

Jack nodded, taking a bite of noodles. “Don’t know how much help I can be, but I’ll try.”

You exhaled slowly. “People are starting to talk.”

Jack quirked a brow. “About?”

“Us.”

Jack nodded, staring at his food, expression thoughtful. “Your feelings?”

“Haven’t caught up. But if we want to keep our relationship under wraps, we’re going to have to be a lot more careful.”

Jack raised his head. “Do you?”

“Do I what?”

“Want to keep things under wraps?” He asked, almost hesitantly.

“I think the news that the Strike Commander, the Blackwatch Commander, and an active duty agent are sleeping together is probably going to complicate the situation...a lot.” You shrugged.

Jack nodded. “I know.” He closed his eyes. “I know, I’m sorry. I’ll be more careful.”

“I’m not upset. I’m certainly not ashamed,” you said with a shrug. “But the situation is already very messy...”

Jack blinked, then gave you a small smile. “Yeah, I know.” He reached over and squeezed your hand. “Sorry, I know I’m being a pain. I’ll try to be more professional.”

“Me too,” you said, though maybe you didn’t sound convincing.

Jack laughed. “What else?”

“...So, Feng’s dad might have a very criminal past.”

Jack frowned. “I vaguely remember something mentioned during I Need Coffee, but I never got the “Me neither,” you said with forced cheer. “Until today.”

Jack sighed. “The Blackwatch indemnity clause or the On Sing amnesty agreement should cover almost anything, since he’s her father. You have my authorization to grandfather him in.” He slurped down some noodles.

“Oh good. You can handle the dissenters then,” you chuckled.

Jack rolled his eyes and put three shumai in his mouth at once.

“Do the words “Budapest” and “Ghost Fox” mean anything to you?”

Jack’s eyes went wide, and then he paled. He started to speak, but then began to cough violently. Holding up one finger, he slapped his chest several times, clearly choking.

“Heimlich?” You asked sweetly.

He shook his head, now red in the face. He grabbed a glass of water and downed it.

You ate a shrimp dumpling, shaking your head at Jack’s clear confirmation. He knew about Budapest.

“We need to move her parents, now,” Jack rasped.

“They went to ground already,” you said. “They left a weird message telling Feng to tell you about you handling her. We thought it meant Captain Amari-”

“...Shit,” Jack exhaled, setting his noodles aside.

“Is she going to be as-”

“No. No one’s as mad about that as Ray. I’ve never seen Ray that mad, and I’ve watched her and Gabe do millions in property damage. No, you should have seen her ten years ago- all her free moments were devoted to hunting him down or ranting about it. I thought she was going to have an aneurysm. Or worse...” Jack shook his head. “Most of us avoided Eastern Europe for a year after that, because just mentioning Hungary sent her into fits...”

You heart sank. “So it was really personal then...”

Jack slumped in his seat. “It’s...complicated.”

“Well...Chang had Feng cornered, but we managed to avoid a diplomatic incident, only because she was drugged to the gills.”

Jack shuddered. “That doesn’t always help. She has strange reactions to sedatives. Gabe’s the same way.” Jack reached over to squeeze Gabriel’s hand.

“Apparently, Almasi did the dosing.”

Jack nodded. “OK, he knows what he’s doing. At least when it comes to Ray. He’s not my first...or tenth choice for a physician.”

“I didn’t think Chang would tolerate incompetence-”
“He’s not incompetent, but he’s not...” Jack shook his head. “That’s not the point. That’s not even remotely related to the point.” Jack set his food aside, staring thoughtfully at the wall. He gripped Gabriel’s hand. “OK, so Ray has lots of experience with bodyguard work. It’s not her favorite task, but she’s very good at it. She’s a control freak and a meticulous planner. Her charges often hate her, but up till Budapest, she’d never lost one. Don’t think she lost any after that either.”

“Ohhhh,” you said. Because the Ghost Fox had been a blemish on her otherwise perfect record, and what was more personal than wounding someone’s pride? Shit. “Did she...have feelings for her charge?”

“She considered him one step below pond scum,” Jack said flatly. “He was a very corrupt Minister of Defense. At the time, it was a political shitstorm, but he wasn’t a big loss to the world. Still, it was her job to keep him alive, and whatever her feelings about the person, she takes pride in doing her job well. It wasn’t her fault either. The asshole disobeyed a direct order, broke a slew of security protocols, and left the safehouse after making several calls to questionable acquaintances on an unsecured smuggled-in phone. She was in the process of dragging him back into the building when he was sniped. I think Fitzpatrick wrote a haiku about it: Big boom, bigger mess /Oh, he did not have enough/ brains in the first place.” Jack nodded sagely. “Ray hates poetry,” he added.

“...So that was it?”

“No, she chased the assassin on foot for a couple miles across town. And that was after he shot her in the knee.” Jack paused, while you both contemplated that tidbit. “They were both in bad shape... He jumped off a bridge onto a train to get away from her,” Jack said, sagely, and you suspected that was the saner choice at the time. “I think Gabe saved some of the CCTV footage and compiled it into a little action movie. It made its rounds with the SEP crowd. Mateo remixed it and set it to music...” Jack had a faint smile at the mention of his dead friend. “But Ray wasn’t nearly as amused. ‘Enraged’ doesn’t quite cover it either.” Jack shook his head. “After Budapest, she started tracking the Ghost Fox...or rumors of him, but he went silent after a few years. We thought he’d either died or been scared straight. Before Budapest, Ana ran across him a few times too. She’s not a fan, but it’s nowhere near how Ray feels.”

“So...will offering him diplomatic amnesty make her drop it?” You asked, already knowing the answer to that question.

“No,” Jack sighed, tilting his head back and pinching the bridge of his nose.

“Great,” you said. “I’m glad we have a solution then.”

Jack just groaned.

Maracle and Onwuachimba stood guard outside the door of Michael’s hospital room. They both nodded at you as Jack opened the door. Maracle looked especially relieved.

You’d seen enough movies to know how civilian families reacted when their loved ones came home from war. This was a lot like that, but with more incoherence, ugly crying, and raw, real emotion. Jack didn’t make it through the doorway. The moment they saw him, Maggie and Jacqueline tackled him, not restricting themselves to gentle tears and soft sniffles. Jacqueline was red-faced and kept kissing his cheeks. Maggie wailed and slapped his chest armor, alternately declaring her eternal sisterly love and threatening grievous bodily injury if he ever did that again. You hung back, because you were there for moral support, not extraction. That was way above your pay grade.

Seeing them together was good, satisfying even. But something about it still made your heart hurt. Because it was something you could not get back. Still, you didn’t resent Jack or the Morrisons. It was just a pang in your chest, a reminder to treasure what you did still have.

Jack hugged his mother and sister back, not speaking. He glanced over his shoulder at you, managing a wobbly smile, his eyes glistening. “Come on,” he murmured, ushering them into the room. You followed.

John Morrison was already on his feet, and as soon as Maggie released Jack, John was there, pulling his son into a tight embrace, tears leaking down his face as well.

The intimacy of it made you look away. You glanced over at Michael instead. The bed was inclined, so Michael was partially upright. He smiled sheepishly at you, hopefully too drugged to cry.

“How’s the pain?” You asked, sidling up to him.

“Can’t feel a thing,” he said, rubbing the back of his neck and pointing to the IV drip. “Too busy being smothered by guilt. Well, I was. Jack’s the target now,” he said with some relief.

“Missing the group hug?”

“Nah, I’ve gotten more than my share. And the bum leg means I can’t run away.” He sighed. “I guess Maggie didn’t get to warn you or Feng about Chang...”

“ Heard that, did you?” You asked wryly. It was likely everyone in the infirmary heard that. You were surprised Angela hadn’t broken it up by beating everyone over the head with her staff.

“Was more surprised that I didn’t hear shooting,” Michael said grimly. “After everything that happened, I thought she’d be madder at me and Maggie. But she’s been entirely focused on Feng’s father.”

“Hmm,” you said diplomatically.

“Really, Lucky! You didn’t see her rising from the dead. She took a bullet to the cheek and I’ll swear on a stack of bibles: her teeth stopped it. And the first thing she did – after spitting out the bullet – was bellow her rage at Feng’s father.”

“...Oh boy.” You sighed, not really surprised. “Yeah, Jack gave me the background. I’ll see what I can do. Wish I’d known about it sooner,” you said.

Michael winced. “Sorry, Maggie tried to warn you, but-” He trailed off, aware that his parents were in the room. “The parents are...overprotective right now. And they didn’t see her in the aftermath. Shit, Lucky, are you sure she can be killed?”

“No,” you said, with a sigh. Not that you had any intention of trying to find out.

Michael nodded absently, looking a little queasy. “I suppose that’s a relief, but...it’s my fault she got shot.”

That was news.

“...You might have to tell me what happened. The initial report was short on details.”
“Me and Maggie...left the panic room before lockdown and uh...helped? Until we made things worse.”

You blinked, brain blipping as you tried to process what he just said. “You did...what?”

“The panic room has a timed lockdown sequence. Once it’s shut, it can’t be reopened for two hours. Chang told us to get in, and Maggie and I did. Then we got out right before it went fully secure...”

You rested your face in your palm. Bodyguard duty wasn’t fun, and you had mostly stuck to people you liked. Babysitting intransigent teenage Morrisons seemed like its own level of hell. You understood Chang’s attitude a lot better now...

“Chang didn’t seem surprised,” Michael said. “She just put us to work and...we got to see her in combat.” There was real awe in his voice. “It was going smoothly till Fitzpatrick got caught outside the barrier. They were going to kill him, so Maggie ran out there alone for a hostage exchange-”

It took you another moment to process that. “What?”

“She had a grenade,” Michael said, like that made everything better. “Well, it was a proximity mine disguised as a grenade, and she got Fitzpatrick away from the gunmen, but then it all went to hell. I got shot running out there to try to cover Maggie. Chang got shot saving me.” He hung his head. “I really thought she was dead. And it would have been my fault-”

You exhaled slowly, unsure of what to say. Because there was no excuse. They should have known better. They had been fucking stupid. But they were still teenagers and Morrisons. Their brains weren’t entirely right. “I’m sure some of the fault is Fitzpatrick’s,” you said, diplomatically.

Michael winced. “He got shot in both knees.”

Ouch. Come to think of it, Angela hadn’t been around for Chang’s outburst. She was probably in surgery, and you guessed it was on Fitzpatrick.

“I take it he and Maggie are buddies,” you said, casually. Fitzpatrick was a man in his thirties. Maggie was a teenage girl. You weren’t too sure what to think about that, but it was better to keep an eye on things.

“...He’s always been extra nice to Maggie. It used to worry me more, but I don’t think it’s an inappropriate kind of thing,” Michael said very quietly. “The one I’m worried about is Almasi.”

You raised a brow.

“When Chang went down, he carried Fitzpatrick back behind the barrier. Maggie helped me back. But Fitzpatrick was terrified. Almasi didn’t state it plainly, but if Chang hadn’t survived, I think he would have killed Fitzpatrick. And I don’t think he would have stopped there.” Michael kept his voice low, and you realized he had not told his parents everything.

You glanced over your shoulder. Maggie was clinging to Jack while their parents gave their version of events. Jack’s expression was caught between horror and pride.

“I don’t mean to sound ungrateful. He took charge the moment Chang went down, got us all back behind the defenses, and patched us up in the aftermath. Though he made it clear that those were her contingency orders.” Michael shrugged. “But the look on his face...” Michael shuddered.
“I’ll see what I can find out,” you said.

“I don’t want to start more trouble, but-” Michael hunched over.

“No, your concerns are valid,” you said, remembering Jack’s asides about Almasi and your own limited interactions with the man. You didn’t know him well enough to pass judgment, but it was becoming very clear that there was a lot about Chang – and her squad – that you didn’t know. “I’ll be discrete.”

“Thanks,” Michael said, relief clear in his voice. “Sorry, I know you’re really busy. I just wasn’t sure who to talk to without causing problems...”

You snorted. “I think talking about things beforehand might have prevented more problems.”

Michael gave a pained laugh. “Yeah, I know.”

“Hey.”

You felt Jack peering over your shoulder before he spoke. But having him at your back was a good feeling.

“Hey yourself.” Michael said, giving Jack a weak smile.

“Mom says you’re grounded till you’re thirty. Same goes for Maggie.”

“She’s grounded till I’m thirty or she’s thirty?”

“No idea,” Jack chuckled. “But I don’t think she means it. She’s clearly forgotten how annoying you are. I think she’ll get sick of you in about five years or so and let you out a little early. But until then...” Jack slipped around you and gave his younger brother a rib-creaking hug.

“Sorry,” Michael murmured, squeezing his brother back, eyes shut. “Sorry.”

“Me too,” Jack said.

You turned to see Maggie hugging her mother, a stricken look on her face as the older woman cried quietly on her shoulder. John rubbed her back, speaking softly in her ear, his tones reassuring and gentle. You didn’t need to hear the words to understand the message.

“It was real bad when they got out,” Michael said after Jack released him. “We were expecting a real chewing out. But Mom had been crying and Dad...” He trailed off. “I’ve never heard him make a noise like that. And Dad’s cried in front of us before...but not like that.” His hands trembled as he reached over for his glass of water. “That was just as bad as knowing that I might have gotten Chang killed. Worse maybe. But it’s hard to tell right now.”

Jack just patted his brother’s shoulder. “When Ray’s done with you, you might feel differently.”

Michael gave a choked laugh. “Yeah, OK.” He paused. “Aren’t you going to tear us a new one for being dumb?”

“I got kidnapped, then broadcasted myself getting shot and punching a UN appointee in the teeth. I can’t really point fingers right now, and honestly, I don’t have the energy,” Jack said, one arm resting around your shoulders.

“How’s Gabe doing? Can I visit him?” Maggie asked, popping up beside you and wiping her eyes.
“...He’s not awake,” you said.

“Later,” Jack said. “I’ll put some more people on rotation so Maracle and Onwuachimba can get some rest.” He looked at you. “Any recommendations?”

“I’ll check the list,” you said. “...Diallo and Vo might work, but Vo is helping with the cleanup right now and Diallo is still on medical leave.” You paused. “You should ask Jemison.”

Jack blinked. “But she’s also on medical leave. Are you sure she’s up for it?”

You pursed your lips, waiting for him to put it together.

He closed his eyes, expression thoughtful. “I know she’s in, but don’t you think she needs more time to recover?”

You stood there, still waiting for him to connect the dots. It wasn’t that Jack was stupid, just the opposite. But he had blindspots. Big ones. “Her physical injuries aren’t that severe. I’d check with Angela first, but I think she’ll be fit for duty in the next few days.”

Jack frowned. “She really should take some time...”

You sighed. You really loved this man, but honestly, he could be so dense. Had he taken time? How would he be reacting to being benched right now? You were glad that he was compassionate, but he was missing the point.

“Jemison needs a job to do. As long as you still think that she can do the job...” You said, laying out the breadcrumbs.

“Of course, I do!” Jack snapped, voice thick with emotion. “None of what happened was her fault.”

Jack fell silent then, aware of the audience.

“I agree,” you said, softly. “It’s important that she knows that you still trust her.” Because her world was in shambles, and she needed something to anchor herself. You would know. “And given everything that’s happened, that trust would mean a lot to her right now.”

Jack swallowed roughly, the realization hitting him all at once. He reached over and squeezed your hand. “Thank you,” he said quietly. “I didn’t think of that.”

“That’s because your plate is already full of terrible things, and I’m speaking from niche experience.” You squeezed back, his fingers warm against your palm. “You know, she’s going to need to talk about things...eventually,” you said, carefully. “For some of that, I think you might be the best person to do it.” And because Jack needed to work through some of the trauma too.

“Eventually, you’re going to get tired of hearing, “you’re right,” sweetheart,” Jack murmured, raising your hand to his lips.

“...No, I don’t think so,” you said, shaking your head. “It’s about damn time everyone acknowledged it.”

Chapter End Notes
I've just been cruising - working from home, walking dogs, and generally disassociating from reality while checking the news multiple times a day. (I should really stop that.) Listening to Brene Brown's "Unlocking Us" podcast, and seriously resent being called out in every episode. XD I really need to read more books and stop going to bed at 7am.

I am trying to use the time to get more writing done! But I am also very tired all the time, even if I am well rested. (I am convinced this chapter is full of typos. I am also convinced I won't be able to find any more till I actually post it.) I assume it's some kind of internalized stress response. (I am socializing with people only a little less than I was before quarantine, which leads me to believe that I really need to make some lifestyle changes. I will try to finish replying to comments this weekend.

Hope you guys are holding up OK. Things aren't bad where I am.
Chapter 138

Chapter Summary

Even in these circumstances, life continues. You are needed. You have important work to do.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

You slipped away to give Jack and his family some time to talk. Lao and Amélie were on their way back from the mess hall, and they’d be watching him. You still had Blackwatch operations to review, more friends to check in on, and apparently you were still the unofficial On Sing liaison… so you would be brokering a deal to keep Chang from eating the “Ghost Fox,” or taking his teeth as trophies, or whatever violent fantasy she intended to enact. Feng had already sent you a list of things she’d be willing to offer as a blood price. You didn’t read it. Chang wasn’t the sort who could be bought. Hell, Feng had some of her DNA and was working on a solution for her and Gabriel’s overheating problems. And knowing Chang, she didn’t care about that either.

Stopping in front of Gabriel’s room, you exhaled slowly, putting that on the backburner for the moment. Chang would hopefully be out for at least another day. And she couldn’t just leave right now to hunt Feng’s dad down, not in the middle of a crisis. You would ask Lacroix for some insight later. But for now, the Los Muertos cleanup was going smoothly, the Buenos Aires incident had been handled, and all your enemies at the UN were presumably plotting their next series of devious acts.

You checked your messages, seeing a whole damn screen full of recent missives from friends, coworkers, and someone calling herself “The Scarlet A.” You forwarded the suspicious items to Ziv and Lacroix, lingering over A’s message:

We need to talk. Please. It’s very important!

“I hope she’ll be a fool -- that’s the best thing a girl can be in this world, a beautiful little fool.”

A.

You frowned, not entirely sure that this dramatic letter wasn’t from Valerie Petras. It was more likely that Ainsley had been put up to this by her conniving mother. You rubbed your forehead, really disliking that safety phrase. And yesterday you’d killed her uncle and spat on his corpse. That would be an awkward conversation, provided it really was Ainsley and she wasn’t trying to backstab you. Maybe you should leave the spitting detail out. That would be considerate.

“Chanceux, have you eaten yet?” Amélie called out, as she sauntered down the hall toward you.

“Or did the Strike Commander get it all?” Lao asked with a straight face.

Lao looked at the door. “Is he in there?”

“No. He’s in his brother’s hospital room.” You pointed down the hall. “Maracle and Onwuachimba are standing guard outside.”

“You go on ahead. Let me know when he’s ready to go,” Amélie said. “I need to check on my husband.”

“Got it,” Lao said with a sharp nod. She gave you a shy smile before hurrying off to stand over there and wait.

Amélie made no move to go into Lacroix’s room.

You raised a brow.

“Let’s talk,” she said, looping her arm around yours gesturing to Gabriel’s room.

“Weren’t you going to check on your husband?”

“In a minute,” she said, flashing you a devilish smile. “He’s napping.”

Shaking your head, you unlocked the door. Amélie followed you in, the mischievous humor of her expression fading as she saw Gabriel still just lying there in the bed.

“Angela said it should be at least another day,” you said. “But SEP subjects tend to have unpredictable reactions to drugs.”

“He will wake up, Chanceux,” Amélie said softly. “He would not leave you and Jack behind.”

You blinked a few times. “Yeah, I know.” Your voice only trembled a little. You looked away, searching for Isha, then spotted her curled up against Gabriel’s side, half tucked under the covers. She gave sleepy chirp.

“Do you have any dinner requests? Yue is very excited to get food out again. She hasn’t had much a chance to explore outside of the infirmary.” Amélie sat down, and patted the chair beside her.

You sat too. “No, not really thinking about that, but I should. If I don’t think about food, Jack and Isha won’t eat properly. Anything with lots of protein for Jack. I can pay for dinner.”

“You’re already watching Jack and training Lao,” you said, managing a small smile.

“That is my job,” she said smugly. “This is personal. I am asking about you, because you are very bad at asking for help.” She nudged your arm.

You snorted at that. “Yeah, OK.” You shook your head. “Some of it has sunk in. Some of it hasn’t. I’m still processing.” You paused. “Which I guess is just an impersonal way of saying that I’ve only just started grieving.”

Amélie nodded solemnly, placing one hand over yours.

“But there’s a lot of work to do, so I’m juggling everything and hoping I can keep up. If we give present all the accumulated evidence, my anonymity will be gone. That’ll make being a black ops agent very difficult.” You rubbed your forehead. “But if it’s necessary, it’s necessary.”
“Perhaps,” Amélie said. “But if you are leading the Strike Commander’s main squad, your anonymity would be gone anyway.”

Because Epsilon Squad was dead.

You gritted your teeth. “The future is very uncertain.”

“It always is. But you have a future, Chanceux. We all do.” She hugged you then.

You patted her arm, eyes on Gabriel and Isha. “Yeah, we do.” You paused. “Maybe we can get tacos for dinner.”

“Of course,” she said, sniffling.

“I’ll buy,” you said.

“Mmm-hmm,” she replied, the noise completely noncommittal.

“And maybe you can explain what’s going on between you and Lao.”

Amélie squeezed you tightly and then released you, her expression a little sheepish. She sighed, folding her hands in her lap, and her poise both poignant and dignified. “I suppose I must make a confession to you,” she said. One hand slipped down to rub her leg. “I was unduly harsh with Yue before you briefed her on Operation Checquy,” she said quietly. “I was not cruel, but I made it clear that any behavior like her earlier treatment you would not be acceptable on our mission. I said that while you might be hesitant to...chasten her, I had no such constraints and insubordination or passive aggressive behavior would not be tolerated.” She paused. “It was...more personal that would be considered professional.”

Because Amélie was your friend, and she knew all about the rocky parts of your relationship with Lao. And of course, she had been defensive on your behalf. It made you smile, even if it had not been entirely necessary.

“So you terrorized Lao into good behavior and becoming your new friend?”

Amélie smacked your arm. “Of course not! How could you say such a thing?” Amélie’s feigned outrage made you laugh. “If you must know, after she came to my aid, I did the correct thing and apologized for my severe words. Yue was gracious enough to accept.”

You chuckled, because you doubted anyone could withstand the charm offensive from a contrite Amélie. It was funny, after all the cajoling and hinting, Lao still hadn’t spilled what happened between her and Amélie, because perhaps the story would have seemed like tattling. Amélie had no such concerns and freely admitted her wrongdoing, though it had come from good intentions. To have friends like this… You patted Amélie’s hand. “Thanks, for looking out for me, and for Lao.”

“It is what friends do,” she said, her smile gentle. “And I suppose it is also my job, as your second.”

“Uhh...” You weren’t entirely sure what to say to that.

“Now, I must see to Gérard, but we will talk more later.” She gave you a kiss on the cheek, before cheerfully exiting the room.

You stared at the wall, really wondering if the Bitch Squad was going to be a thing.
Zenyatta, true to form, had no trouble getting involved in other people’s problems. He and Angela had already worked out a treatment plan for Gabriel. Currently, Zenyatta was doing his omnic healing mojo under her supervision. You and Genji had been booted because – Angela - did not want any distractions. That was fine, you told yourself. Zenyatta had helped Daniels when she was comatose. Gabriel was much sturdier than Daniels. He would wake up soon. He would be OK. You had to believe it.

Genji hovered by the door as you pulled the relevant files and converted them to a secure digital format. Jack asked for everything Shit Spiders had on Petras and you’d kept most of it in hard copy in Gabriel’s office. It was strange to be here now, after everything that had happened. It felt off, a bit like haunting your own home. The office smelled faintly of coffee, Gabriel’s cologne, and gun oil.

“Did you know he once rented a crane, took a spot dangling on a platform over a river, and sniped a prime minister from five miles away? Then he base-jumped into a waiting boat and made his escape out to open water. Flashy, but he didn’t get caught.” There was a note of admiration in Genji’s voice as he regaled you with the laundry list of rather amazing crimes attributed to the Ghost Fox.

In between converting files, you checked your messages and wondered if the Ghost Fox had a good plan for getting out of this mess. It was probably “kill everyone in your way and move.” You were seriously wondering if that was an option.

Shaking your head, you stared at a proposal to co-opt the regimental Black Watch tartan into the Blackwatch uniforms. You squinted. It was suggested by Agent Duncan, who had been recruited from the Scottish, Welsh, and Irish Division of the British Army and already wore the colors. You had the kneejerk reaction that this was not a good idea. It was in bad taste to borrow such things, despite Agent Duncan’s enthusiasm and connections. But what really caught your eye was that it was co-signed by Cyclops Lacroix. He pointed out that their motto, “Nemo me impune lacessit,” would really fit the department. Normal people did not quote Latin in department memos: “No one provokes me with impunity.” Was this just an elaborate joke at your expense? Or was he declaring some kind of score-keeping upset? And how did he have time for that? You ignored the message and went back to collating files.

“What do we know about Feng’s mom?” You asked, after you’d sent Jack your files. You sat on your desk, your eyes drifting over to Gabriel’s empty chair.

“…We don’t have a thing,” Genji said. He was now on your couch, staring thoughtfully at the Ghost Fox dossier. “I looked into some of On Sing’s history. Feng’s grandmother fought a very bloody succession war, one that spilled into the next generation. No one’s saying names, but Feng’s mother is one of the few survivors who is known to be part of that branch of the family. People don’t like to talk about her, but when she is mentioned, there’s always a lot of deference.”

That could mean a lot of things. “Why do you think that is?”

“She walked away from the family,” Genji said, thoughtfully. “I know Triads and Yakuza have some fundamental operational and philosophical differences, but I think they are very similar in the fact that once you are in, you don’t get to just leave.”

“So she did something big, or bad, or both, and got kicked out?”

“Or bought her freedom. Sometimes it is the same thing…” Genji murmured. He frowned. “She probably could have had a career like her husband, but I admit, neither Hanzo or I recognized her when we saw her in Mongolia. And she doesn’t fight like an assassin.”

“Was the Ghost Fox involved in the On Sing drama?”

Genji shook his head. “The timeline does not match. At that point, he was mostly handling work in Europe and at the height of his career. He might have been able to help her out between hits, but I don’t think so.”

The Ghost Fox didn’t kill anyone egregiously innocent – no children or going after the family members of his targets. But there had been collateral damage, and not everyone he’d killed were blatantly corrupt politicians- there had been activists, law enforcement, and some lawyers. Jokes aside, they could have been completely clean and just doing their jobs. It was very likely that some were. Plus, the Ghost Fox had been on good terms with Shimada, so that was a point against his morality.

After being updated on his rap sheet, it would be hypocrisy if you gave him total amnesty. You’d be like a Petras if the Ghost Fox got total immunity just because he was “family.” He had clearly committed inexcusable crimes for personal profit. But you owed Feng. More importantly, you liked her. Maybe you could hammer out a deal that would satisfy both parties. He could give a debrief, name some names, maybe give up some people up top? It was a good start, but it didn’t seem like enough. You rubbed your face. And if he got a sweetheart deal, it couldn’t be official. You couldn’t put it on the books unless he made some real reparations. And you had the sneaking suspicion that he wasn’t the kind of person who was sorry about what he did.

“Are you thinking about pressganging him into Blackwatch?” Genji asked, voice oddly neutral.

“God no, that’s a nightmare. I don’t think On Sing or the Ghost Fox would care much for that option. And I don’t want to be trapped in here with a skilled psychopath who clearly doesn’t want to be here.”

“What if he wanted to work here?” Genji asked.

“...I don’t know if we could trust him and there are some serious conflicts of interest,” you said, knowing how weak that sounded. “Look, Jack and Gabriel would probably agree to any solution we could broker. It’s Captain Amari we have to convince.” And Chang.

“This is one where we will have to be creative with the rules,” Genji said.

“Yeah, probably. I mean, if we want to keep everyone alive.” Your tablet pinged, and you checked it, finding a message from Riggs. He wanted to meet right away. You gave him your location.

“You should probably ask Zheng for more information. She likes you,” Genji said.

You squinted at him. “You mean Zheng knows that I probably won’t backstab Feng, and tolerates me because of it?”

“Likes” is shorter,” Genji said, smirking.

“...Wait, did you know her in life?” You asked, remembering that Hanzo recognized her immediately during that first meeting.

“Met her once, spilled my drink on her one-of-a-kind dress, there was drama,” Genji chuckled.

You didn’t need to ask whether or not it was an accident. Genji was not clumsy. You just shook your head. “Why?”

“It seemed like a good idea at the time,” he chuckled. “Hanzo had to smooth everything out. It was fine.”

“Uh-huh,” you said, still shaking your head as you felt a sudden pang of empathy for Hanzo. Then there was a knock at the door. Genji got up, checked the camera, and opened the door.

Riggs looked over his shoulder and quickly stepped in, clutching his tablet to his chest.

“What’s going on?” You asked.

Riggs looked up at you, blue eyes bloodshot, and nose rubbed red. His long black hair was tied back in an uneven ponytail. His uniform was rumpled, but not damaged. Genji narrowed his eyes, hand drifting to a rest on the hilt of his weapon.

“I’m sorry, Agent Strike,” he said, wiping his eyes. “I know I look like crap.”

“We all do,” you said with a shrug.

“No, you looked really cool out there with the Strike Commander! And Agent McCree was so commanding on the battlefield! And you did amazing too...” Riggs said giving Genji a quick nod, not noticing the tension. “I’m sorry, I know you’re busy. I’m just a mess,” he winced.

You gestured for him to sit in one of the chairs in front of your desk. You remained on the desk, raising a brow at Genji’s oddly defensive reaction. Riggs was often suspiciously nervous. You knew that behavior was normal, but maybe Genji did not. He paced silently behind Riggs. “What did you have for me?”

“I...don’t know how to explain this,” he said, hugging his tablet closer.

“Use small words and simple sentences,” you said, dryly. “I’m juggling several situations right now, and need to conserve what little brainpower I have left.”

“Oh, I didn’t mean it like that! It’s my fault, I just...over-complicate things, don’t I?” Riggs laughed nervously. “Small words, simple sentences, just get to the point! Yes! Umm, so Ainsley Petras contacted me. And she has intelligence that she thinks is important. I know the security situation is complicated, but she wanted me to make sure that you knew it was from her and not someone else.”

That was not what you were expecting to hear.

You raised a brow. “And how well do you know Ainsley?”

“More than acquaintances, but I don’t know if we’re really friends, ma’am. I’d like to think we are, but I wouldn’t want to presume,” Riggs said quickly. “We were meeting up for lunch every few days, before I found out about the Director,” Riggs said, awkwardly. “It wasn’t just me and her. Agent Maeda Vargas was there, and sometimes Ziv, but not very often. You know, it was just...lunch.” He fidgeted, eyes widening. “Oh! We didn’t talk about classified things.”

You narrowed your eyes, reading between the lines. “Let me guess, Ziv introduced you to Távio?”

“Yes!” Riggs nodded vigorously. “He said he thought we’d get along! Wasn’t that nice of him?” Riggs beamed at you.

“Uh huh,” you said insincerely. “That’s Ziv, always so nice.” Once this was over, you were going to hunt him down and do something equally nice. He wasn’t too big for a good old-fashioned wedgie.

“Anyway, I know...I know she’s got really bad family, and she’s not been reliable in the past,” Riggs said, face scrunch up like it really hurt him to speak ill of her. “...But she’s not a bad person.”

“She’s not,” you said, though you weren’t so sure that you could go ahead and call her a “good person” either.

“She’s...not used to confrontation. I mean, I know it sounds silly, since we’re an international military organization. But I get what it’s like not to be brave and aggressive like everyone else.” Riggs gave you a pained smile. “We’re not all big heroes.”

You did not necessarily agree with that excuse – one did not have to approach everything with guns blazing to be a hero – but arguing that minor point would just upset Riggs and derail the conversation. “So what did Ainsley want?”

“The Petras family is on lockdown. She managed to get a few messages out, but she’s afraid her communications are being tracked by unfriendly eyes.” Riggs was too polite to add, “and by that, I mean the rest of her family.”

“Probably,” you agreed.

“She says she has important intel for you. I don’t know the exact details, but she’s really insisting that you’ll be interested. She mentioned a “new friend.” I don’t know if she’s talking facetiously about Acting Commander Bell or if she’s got someone who wants to flip.”

You raised a brow. “So you’re here to ask me to take her communications seriously, despite Ainsley’s...unreliability in the past?” Because he had seen the footage of your encounter with Ainsley and the Director. He was not yet privy to the fact that Ainsley had helped you persuade her mother into giving up information.

“Yes,” Riggs said, swallowing audibly. “I know it’s a lot to ask. I know you’re busy. I know it could be a trap. But I know it really is Ainsley doing the asking. I just don’t know if she’s under duress.”

“Can you make secure contact? We can set up a meeting once we have more information.”

Riggs nodded vigorously. “Yes, yes I can do that. We already have several social network connections and once Agent Maeda Vargas is awake, we can come up with a good cover story.”

“He might be out for a couple days,” you said.

“Oh,” Riggs drooped.

“But Agent Lacroix might be able to assist.” And take a closer look at all the parties involved.

“OK,” Riggs said, not at all flustered by the idea of inviting Lacroix’s attention. Which meant he did not really know Lacroix. This guy was really too pure for Blackwatch. “Is Távio going to be OK?” The worry was clear on his face.

“Most likely,” you said.

“I know you can’t give details, but do you have any idea when I might be able to visit him?”
“Nope, but it shouldn’t be too long.” You squinted at Riggs. “What exactly do you, Távio, and Ainsley talk about?”

Riggs laughed nervously. “Well, I got pickpocketed last time I went to Paris. And Ainsley got her bag snatched when she was in Rome. So Agent Maeda Vargas been uh...he’s been teaching us more situational awareness and giving us personal security tips.” Riggs smiled and nodded. “Yes. And sometimes we just talk about social things, like clothes, and combat moves, and umm...yes. Just silly stuff”

“I see,” you said, glancing at Genji who was smirking behind his faceplate. You paused. “If you don’t mind me asking, are you OK? Because you seem to be...upset.”

Riggs blinked rapidly. “Oh. Oh...it’s...it’s silly,” he said, lowering his head.

You closed your eyes, recognizing that thread of grief, remembering what you had witnessed at the tea party and the man that had charmed him. “I’m sorry about Agent Tataryn,” you said softly.

“I know!” He wailed suddenly. “I know, he was like your best friend! He told me himself! He was so amazing! All those adventures you went on together!” Riggs rubbed his eyes, shoulders shaking. “And after this mission, we were going to get coffee together...” His voice was very small. “I’m sorry. I shouldn’t be so weepy about this. He was your best friend and I was just someone he kind of knew...”

You stared at the wall. All those adventures? Your best friend? Tataryn liked to play games. Maybe he wasn’t your best friend, because honestly, he was a terrible friend. But maybe the reverse was true. Maybe you had been his best friend. And he didn’t mind sharing that with the world. Along with some other blatant lies, but that was Tataryn: you took the good with the bad.

“This isn’t a competition. Comparative suffering is a terrible way to measure things. I don’t have a monopoly on grief, Riggs,” you said, passing him the tissue box, your own eyes starting to water. “We lost Tataryn, and that fucking hurts,” you said through clenched teeth. “Feeling like you can’t talk to your comrades amplifies the pain. And there’s no reason for that-”

“I just feel so silly,” Riggs cried softly into his tissue.

“Me too,” you said, snatching a tissue and dabbing at your eyes. Then you reached over and gave him a quick hug, bracing yourself. That was all the permission Riggs needed, he threw his arms around you, bawling into your shoulder.

It was awkward, sure. But most feelings were. You had learned these lessons the hard way, and you had a choice: you could pretend not to see your fellow agents struggling with the same problems that you had, or you could apply that hard-won knowledge and help. And while you did not like invading their privacy or seeing all the messy emotional fallout, you weren’t the kind of person comfortable with doing nothing.

“I’m sorry,” he coughed, quickly letting you go. “I’m so embarrassed.”

“Don’t be. I feel silly too, because that’s easier than admitting how torn up I am about it. But I am. And when this is over, I’m going to cry my eyes out, because he was my friend, and he deserved better. He should have had a chance to come home to get coffee with you.” Even if nothing came of it. Even if Riggs was too damn decent to leave under Tataryn’s influence. Tataryn should have come home. But he did not, and now you would have to go see Kseniya and…

You tilted your head back, eyes not really focusing as you looked up at the ceiling.
Riggs reached over and squeezed your hand. “It’s not always weak to cry. I get it. Thank you.” He smiled up at you, still sniffling.

This was not the first time you’d been envious of someone’s willingness to show open emotion, to be vulnerable in the company of more dangerous people. Genji however, just stood there, hand no longer hovering over his weapon. He watched you comfort Riggs, a hint of bewilderment in his eyes.

He had no idea what to do.

You just smiled wryly at him and patted Riggs’ shoulder. The two of you would probably talk about this later in a convoluted and undeniably awkward fashion. That was fine. You were used to Shimadas by now.

It had been a Saturday morning, not long after you’d returned from your surprise vacation in Iceland. Jack had to leave early for something Very Important and not at all a waste of his time. The emphasis was his, punctuated by a lot of eyerolling and gritted teeth while he angrily chewed on cold pizza.

Both you and Gabriel had been awake long enough to kiss him goodbye and then snuggle back under the covers, smug in your freedom to sleep in..or do other things. Sleep did not win out. And after other things had occurred, you lay curled against Gabriel, one hand idly stroking his hip.

“How do you do it?” You yawned.

“I think I just showed you, hermosa ,” Gabriel chuckled, nuzzling your neck. “But if you’re so exhausted that you’ve already forgotten...” He nipped your throat, and you squeaked, smacking his arm.

“No, that I know how that works,” you laughed, rolling onto your back.

Gabriel lay on his side, sheets bunched around his hips, his smile sly. He scooted closer, head resting on your pillow. “So what are you asking about?”

“Your most closely-guarded secrets,” you giggled.

Gabriel snorted. “Corazon, I love you with all of my heart. But the only way you’re getting my Abuelita’s Mole Chichilo recipe is if she tells you herself. And she only shares her recipes with family.”

You laughed. “I’d settle for you making me some of this Mole Chichilo before I start trying to con sweet little old ladies out their family secrets.”

“That could be arranged,” Gabriel murmured, nibbling on your earlobe.

You stretched, yawning. “No, this question is about work.”

Gabriel froze, and then pulled back, lounging on one arm, his expression guarded. “Is that so?”

“Relax, it’s not like that,” you said quickly, realizing he assumed you were trying to pump him for classified information. “It’s more...” You frowned, trying to come up with the right words. “It’s about technique: you have to manage a lot of...difficult personalities as Commander. And at first glance, a lot people assume that your underlings obey you out of fear. Because you make scary faces, roar when upset, and can benchpress small vehicles.”
Gabriel snorted. “Doesn’t seem to work on most of you hardcases. You all lack the sense of self-preservation for my temper to be any real deterrent.”

You laughed, kissing him. “Exactly. Also, you like us too much to kill us.”

“Yeah, yeah, yeah,” Gabriel grumbled with mock disgust. “That doesn’t help when idiots like you, and Jack, and others fail at following orders.”

“Mmm-hmm,” you nodded agreeably.

“So are you asking for a crash course in leadership?” He asked, brows raised. He looked at you, then back at his bare chest, a little incredulous.

“No, this is pillow talk,” you scowled. “And I was wondering how you handle certain difficult agents so well. Namely Tataryn and Genji.”

“And you want to talk about other men while lying here next to me?” Gabriel slapped a palm against his chest with exaggerated outrage as he rolled onto his back, sighing heavily. “Baby, we need to work on your idea of pillow talk.”

Laughing, you crawled on top of him, resting your chin on his sternum. He was wonderfully warm beneath you and you grinned down at him. “Talk, Pillow.”

Gabriel snorted. “That’s was Jack-level bad.”

“I know, he’s a terrible influence. That’s why I’m trying get intelligent conversation from you.”

Gabriel rolled his eyes, stretching and not-so-subtly flexing. “That’s what’s on your mind?”

“Your body is very sexy,” you told him, so his feelings were not hurt. “But your mind is just as sexy.” You patted his chest. “Come on, you’ve got valuable experience and insight. And I want it.”

“Is that all you want?” He asked with a teasing pout.

“No, but I’ve trying to figure some things out and I’ve hit a wall. I get these ideas in theory, but not so much in application. Like Genji and Jesse butt heads, but they are friends, no matter what they claim. I know that they can work well together, but there’s a limit to that goodwill. You never send them on missions where it’s just the two of them.”

Gabriel raised a brow. “Noticed that, did you?”

“I get that you’ve been carefully cultivating squad dynamics behind the scenes, but I’m not sure how you’re getting from point A to point D. I’m not even sure if I’m looking at the same picture.”

Gabriel shifted, one hand resting on the small of your back. “It’s mostly about finding everyone’s motivations.” He stared up at the ceiling. “The kid, he’s easy to read.”

“He wants to be you,” you said.

“Who doesn’t?” Gabriel flashed you an easy smile, resting his hands under his head, elbows jutting out. “But that’s not his motivation.”

You frowned.

“I’m not going to go into detail, but you know his past. Jesse’s made a lot of progress since he joined up. And what was once a way to stay out of jail, became a way to earn the respect and “Yeah, that makes sense.” Because black ops agent or not, Jesse was a soft touch. He had something to prove, sure, but he wasn’t one of the difficult Blackwatch agents or a psychopath to be kept on a short leash.

“Genji is the opposite,” Gabriel said, still staring upward. “He had respect, acceptance, and loyalty. Or he thought he did. What he wants from Overwatch, besides revenge on his family, is the assurance that we actually have his back. He will never outright say it. After all, how does one actually ask for unconditional acceptance? It defeats the purpose. And getting an admission out of someone that repressed? Never going to happen. Everything is buried under layers of duty, obligation, and nuance.”

You blinked. “I should be taking notes. You’re absolutely right and I hadn’t really thought about it quite like that.”

“But you had an inkling. You get along with both of them.”

“I had a tougher time with Genji,” you admitted.

“He’s skittish,” Gabriel said. “But you’ve tailored your approach.”

“I don’t know really know what I’m doing, it’s kind of in the moment, you know. I don’t usually plan, I just do what feels right.”

“You have good instincts,” Gabriel said approvingly, and you felt your cheeks warm. “The rest comes with experience.”

You rested your cheek against his chest. “So given the fact Jesse and Genji have completely different, almost opposing motivations, and add their extremely competitive natures…”

“Recipe for disaster,” Gabriel said, clicking his tongue. “It’s a growing pain. They’ll figure it out eventually. Either they’ll either grow out of it over time, or find a common cause to unite on. As long as there isn’t too much established rivalry, it won’t be a problem long-term.”

You nodded. “And Tataryn?”

Gabriel frowned. “Tataryn is...more complicated.”

“Yes,” you agreed.

“He’s not a young man and he knows his worth. He has nothing to prove to anyone here. But there are rules, which I think you’ve figured out.”

“Be nice to Tataryn and he’ll be nice to you. Be too nice, and he’ll rob you blind.”

Gabriel laughed, shoulders shaking. “Pretty much. Scamming people is a game to him, but he knows exactly how far he can push his luck.”

“I know that, but he still manages to con me regularly. It’s usually just small stuff, but still.” You were not pouting. And you certainly were not asking Gabriel to get involved. After all, it was so much more satisfying when the victory was purely your own.

“You have to know what he wants, and you have to hint that you can make it happen. And then you have to make it happen without losing your shirt or getting bedazzled by his charm,” Gabriel rolled his eyes. “He’s a bit like Gérard, always scheming a few steps ahead.”

“So for him, it’s about personal gain and the satisfaction of being the “smartest” person in the room?”

“Yes, but when you say it that way it sounds bad,” Gabriel smirked.

“But not a lie,” you said, shaking your head. You closed your eyes, mulling over Gabriel’s explanation. He was right, it was simple once you knew what you were dealing with, but you didn’t have that insight just yet. “What am I?” You asked, because it seemed less invasive than asking him how he classified himself.

Gabriel was silent.

You opened your eyes to find him watching you thoughtfully, his smile gentle.

“What do you think?” He asked, brushing your hair out of your face.

You shrugged, resting your head against his chest. “I just wanted to know your thoughts.”

“I think this is something that you should work out for yourself,” he said, sounding a little too smug for your liking. “Otherwise some equally insightful and far less upstanding person might try to exploit you...” He winked.

You frowned. He wasn’t wrong. And in fact, you knew the answer, just like you knew that he did too. But saying it? Well, that was a little much first thing in the morning. Hell, you could see parallels between Jack and Jesse. And what made Gabriel tick?

“Oh, that’s a dangerous look in your eyes,” he murmured, lips brushing against your cheek, hands tightening around your waist. “Enough of that.” He kissed down the side of your neck, teeth lightly grazing your skin. “Now it’s my turn to get some secrets out of you. I think I’ll start with your karaage recipe and then move on to your hangup over toasters.”

“I’ll never tell,” you laughed. And then suddenly he flipped you, pinning you on your back underneath him.

“I have ways of making you talk, beg, and scream,” he purred in your ear and you shivered as he pushed your knees apart, his calloused hands traveling up your inner thighs.

You nipped his shoulder, knowing that you couldn’t talk if your mouth was full.

Gabriel groaned. “Now you’re in for it, hermosa. And afterward, since you’re in such a learning mood, I think it’s time to teach you what acceptable pillow talk is...”

You sat in Gabriel’s hospital room, watching the monitors and trying to remember what all the medical terminology meant. You were supposed to be reading post-mission reports from the Los Muertos incident and evaluating future Blackwatch operations in Buenos Aires, but Jesse kept nudging you and pointing to his long message log with Lacroix about Macedonia, horses, and some kind of complicated political alliance. You weren’t entirely sure Lacroix wasn’t just fucking with Jesse, so you just nodded to sympathetically, patted Bandit and Isha, and went back to reading.

“Does he do this to you?” Jesse huffed, about ten minutes later.
“Which part? The petty games? The most annoying application of the Socratic method? The snarky French commentary? Yes, all the goddamn time to all of the above,” you said, making a note to dig deeper into Agent Hernandez’s account about what had happened in Mexico City. He had been dispatched prior to the arms deal and before everything had gone wrong and Captain Amari had to send a second team for damage control. Agent Hernandez was on Lacroix’s list and little details from his report didn’t match the rest of his squad…

“OK, he does it to everyone,” Jesse grumbled.

“It’s a learning experience, and once you learn how to do it back to him, it’s really satisfying,” you said.

Jesse snorted, his disgruntled expression making it clear that he was nowhere near that point. “Morrison OK?”

“He’s managing,” you said, looking up, a little surprised that he would ask. “But he’s stretched thin. Is it that obvious?”

“No, not really. I ain’t seen him in handling the politicians, but Amélie and Lao don’t seem too worried,” Jesse said, reaching for his hat, his hand stopping halfway as he remembered that it wasn’t there. “But…” He paused. “He ain’t never apologized to me before either. Not for real.”

“Hmm, that’s immature of him,” you said.

“Nah, all my apologies were fake too,” Jesse laughed.

“Oh, well that’s OK then,” you said, shaking your head. You glanced over at Gabriel. “How did you put up with those two assholes?”

Jesse punched your arm lightly. “Hey! I was the low man on the totem pole. I deserve the sympathy.”

“Uh-huh,” you said. Your phone buzzed. You glanced at it, not recognizing the number, though a message flashed across the screen.

_May we speak? I am outside the door._ -Zheng.

You groaned, realizing that you really had become the de facto On Sing liaison, and that the position required more work than just joking around with Feng. You got up and checked the cameras. A red metal orb hovered three feet off the ground. Not quite the same model that went on Operation Checquy, nor the one that was guarding Feng’s room.

You let her in, unsure of the etiquette to show a disembodied human partially present in one of her many drone bodies. “Would you like a chair?”

“It’s not necessary,” Zheng said politely.

“Yes, but would you _like_ one?” You asked.

“...No, thank you, but please, don’t stand on my account.”

You sat down by the door, noticing that Jesse had taken the chair farthest from the door and closest to Gabriel. He sat at an angle, one hand under his serape, making sure that Zheng was in his killzone.
“Is Feng doing all right? Do the rest of your people have concerns or requests? I can try to expedite a supply order–”

“You are too kind. Everything is satisfactory. I have no complaints. I do have one concern though, and that is what I have come to discuss.”

You didn’t trust that polite mien, but you tried to keep your face pleasant, wondering what tactic she would choose. Would she blame Overwatch for Feng’s injury and her agent’s death? Would she seek punitive damages against Chang to try to keep her away from Feng? Exactly what kind of authority did Zheng have to negotiate with Overwatch? And for that matter, what authority did you actually have?

“We are both very aware that your Sergeant Chang,” Zheng put an odd emphasis on the rank, “is a threat to Feng’s father.”

“The Ghost Fox,” you said. “It’s an interesting handle.”

“I think the Americans actually started that nickname,” Zheng said. “The...younger Shimada has given me a brief summary of his actions. Let me assure you that he has committed far more crimes than what you seem to have on record.”

“Assassinations were his bread and butter,” Zheng said. “He generally made quick kills and I never heard of him engaging in unprofessional conduct. But I never hired him either, though that had nothing to do with his skill – we have a bias against outside contractors. Too much of a security risk.”

That rang true. On Sing was a paranoid underworld meritocracy that had an obsession with bloodlines and secrecy. Inviting in someone as flashy and dangerous as the Ghost Fox seemed like something only Feng would knowingly do. You sat there trying to look thoughtful. “Given his audacious but successful methodology, I’m guessing he’s some kind of high functioning psychopath?”

“Probably,” Zheng said with alarming indifference. “Though by all accounts, his childhood was stable and he has a healthy relationship with his parents. He seems to put the care and safety of his family above all else, but he is amoral, thrill-seeking, and annoyingly flippant. Certainly not the man I would have had my niece marry. Still, he treats her well, and raised his children responsibly. I cannot complain,” she said so politely that it was very clear that she definitely had complaints.

“What are you asking me to do?” You asked, because suddenly you weren’t so sure that Zheng wanted you to protect Feng’s father.

“I am telling you what I know, and what Feng does not. Yet. I am aware of what transpired in Budapest: I have heard a great deal about Colonel Chang, and her hunt for the Ghost Fox.”

...Wait, Colonel Chang? You raised a brow. That was a very different rank for Sergeant. But why was she…? Oh. Oh boy. Something had happened, and you were pretty sure you should not ask Chang about it directly.

“Full bird colonel?” Jesse asked from his corner.

“Yes,” Zheng said. “I believe she was on track to be a general – the arrangements were very under the table.”
You blinked.

“But I don’t know the details,” Zheng said, and you believed the exact opposite.

“So what are your recommendations about Feng’s father?”

“I want him safely and happily retired,” Zheng said. “I do not want him press-ganged into Blackwatch or incarcerated.”

“Yeah, I’d prefer to avoid that too. I already figured those options wouldn’t end well. But I’d like more background.”

“Of course,” Zheng said agreeably. “Now, I only know this because I started doing more research once Feng had taken her place in On Sing and she was far more prepared than I expected, given her mother’s reticence to become involved in our...lifestyle. I did not realize the man that my niece married was the Ghost Fox, till after Feng joined. I realized then that there was much about my niece and her family that I had overlooked.”

You did not know if you believed that. But you nodded politely anyway.

“There has never been an occasion to inform Feng of her father’s exploits – because she has never asked, and because his methods questionable. She is reckless enough already.” There was an odd mix of pride and exasperation in Zheng’s tone. “But additionally, it would have upset my niece.”

There it was, the real reason. Everyone, including the Ghost Fox and AI Zheng, handled Feng’s mother with kid gloves. Given Zheng’s actions in bringing Feng into On Sing, she was willing to oppose her niece, but she still chose her battles carefully.

“So you mentioned that you looked into the Budapest incident. What are your thoughts on Chang?”

“Sergeant Chang has gained an almost...mythic reputation in certain circles. She has the most uncanny way of picking out lies. She is strict, dogged, and will want some significant reparations for the...insult to her pride. You and I both know that she cannot simply be bought off, but if we tread carefully, her honor can be appeased.”

Theoretically, you knew that to be true. But you had your doubts about the actual application. Chang valued competency. She played to win. Anything offered would have to be useful to her.

“We might request that he give a series on in-depth demonstrations on his methodology and perhaps work a bodyguard operation – as a consultant – to give us tools to better defend against assassins.”

“I’m sure he would enjoy that,” Zheng said.

“But that won’t be enough for Chang.” Because despite her focus and discipline, Chang was competitive and definitely not immune to pettiness. “She’ll probably want to punch him in the face a few times,” you said. “Maybe they could work some of it out in a...carefully regulated match?”

“Acceptable,” Zheng agreed. “No fatalities, no permanent damage.”

“We’ll have to figure out a way to enforce that,” you agreed, which was far easier said than done. “And I’ll have to talk to Chang to get a better idea of what she finds a fair exchange. But that won’t be till later.”
“Yes, of course. I realize that you are very busy,” Zheng said. “But it is bothering Feng, and I realize that you might not have had all the requisite background, so I wanted to make sure you understood the nuances of the situation.”

Uh huh. Sure. She definitely wasn’t pushing her own agenda or anything. Not that you were exactly sure what her angle was. But you’d confer with Feng and your batch of Shimadas later.

“Good luck with all the upcoming hearings,” Zheng said as you went to let her out. “Perhaps you should consider asking the Ghost Fox to handle some of your more troublesome opponents, as a convenience fee.”

You were not entirely sure how to react to that and hesitated half a second too long.

“That was a joke, Agent Strike,” Zheng said smoothly as she left, not sounding very jokey at all.

Chapter End Notes

I got word that I may be working from home till June. (I'm down with that!) And also my work is planning on allowing certain people to work from home forever. Fingers crossed that I'm one of them. Otherwise I may have to...take care of the competition the same way I "take care" of beloved characters. coughcough Uh...shhhhhhh. Also, my pets are going to be so upset if I go back to 10 hour days at the office. They are now firmly codependent on "at home Sensoo." I work with the cat in my lap and two dogs under my desk. It's fucking adorable (and crowded).

The writing goes slow because I need to be doing other things (running, interacting with people, etc) to get myself to write more consistently. (If I'm angry or using other processing power, writing is a byproduct. If I'm just in a Groundhog Day malaise, wondering what is real...I'm not functioning properly.) But also I was stuck on a series of scenes, which I have since banged out and should be good to continue. But things are stable here. I'm considering hiring a language tutor online. Like maybe I should take a couple hours of Spanish or Icelandic each week, to keep my (aged) brain sharp. Anyway, hope you guys are doing OK.
Chapter 139

Chapter Summary

Jack is busy with his back to back political meetings. Yours are a bit more personal, but just as important.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

I’ll be in Switzerland this week. Things are going on and you need to know about them. Can we meet? -A Riggs had already verified that this message was also from Ainsley. You showed it to Lacroix.

“No bakeries, you get too distracted,” he said, not looking up from the screen. “I will recommend a venue tomorrow.”

You squinted at him.

“Business face, Chanceux. I’ve used several local establishments for discrete meetings, and will set it up. You can have lunch, but you get too excited for pastries and we need you focused,” he continued smugly, sending Jesse pictures of expensive horses, with rolling hills and majestic mountains in the background. You just shook your head. “You’ll take a full squad, in civilian clothes, and secure the premises beforehand.”

“Figured,” you said.

“I understand that Zheng approached you, regarding the Ghost Fox?”

“Yes,” you said.

“So popular these days, Amélie will be proud,” Lacroix chuckled. “Thoughts?”

“Not entirely sure what her angle is. I know it’s in everyone’s best interest if we resolve things quickly and nicely. But whenever Zheng approaches anyone on her own, it raises my hackles.”

Lacroix nodded, still not looking up from his screen. “I think you should focus on why Zheng approached you before trying to talk to Sergeant Chang.”

“...She used to be a colonel in the US Army,” you said. “Or so Zheng claimed.”

Lacroix looked up, frowning. “Yes, she was, but that...” His frown deepened as he twigged your concerns about Zheng’s inclusion of that well-hidden fact. “I know what happened, but I am not privy to all the exact intricacies of how things were sorted. The official story clearly isn’t the real story. I can speculate with confidence, but to Zheng, I suspect the details are more important than the outcome. ” He shook his head. “In this case, you really would be better off asking Jack and Gabriel for specifics. I think Gabriel would be the one to focus on once he awakens,” Lacroix continued, finally deigning to look at you.

“Got it,” you said.

“I’ll give your report more thought. We can talk later,” he said.

You nodded, already heading out, smirking because Lacroix was now intrigued by your problem and hopefully, since his interest was piqued, he would put some effort into solving it. That would buy you extra time to finish rebalancing the Blackwatch operations budget—with the addition of the emergency operations’ expenses, shuffling around essential personnel to cover the gaps in your roster, and doing your actual job.

“Kseniya Petrova” was the name on her paperwork, though you were pretty sure that wasn’t her real name. Hell, Tataryn’s birth name certainly was not “Tataryn,” and having skimmed some of his file to fill out some of the postmortem documentation and procedures, you learned a little bit about what he did before Blackwatch. There was a lot of fraud, a lot of treachery, and just as much death. You did not think you would have liked that man nearly as much. But that man was not Tataryn.

“Tataryn” was the name you knew him by. That was the name you called him as he lay dying and the name he answered to, offering you no contradictions or confessions. So that was the name he chose, and the name he would be buried with. Whomever he had been before Blackwatch, Tataryn was the man he had become.

But Kseniya was another issue. Tataryn was her guardian, on paper. She had no overt ties to Overwatch, though the academy admins were no doubt informed of her proximity to the Gabriel Reyes. He had arranged for her to take their entrance exams and she addressed him as “uncle.”

Which raised another question. Who exactly was Kseniya, if she was safer masquerading as the Blackwatch Commander’s niece? The two men who could answer that question weren’t talking. One was dead. The other…

Your hands shook a little as you tied your tie. It wasn’t as neat as Gabriel would have done with his… You clipped that thought short as you angrily yanked the fabric into a knot. The result was not pretty: you had been too rough and now it was off center. Scowling, you glared at the mirror and began untangling the tie. You were not wearing your dress uniform. There were too many potential enemies at the Institut Montana, and even more soft targets that would make for too much collateral damage. Best to be formal, but unaffiliated with Overwatch. It was weird though, not that you liked dress uniforms, but not wearing some kind of emblem in this situation felt too much like hiding.

Fuck. It didn’t matter what you did. Nothing was going to make you happy right now. The tie was still crooked, but marginally less so. It would have to do. You shrugged on a black jacket, tanto on your belt, your sidearm in your shoulder holster.

Jack’s room felt very empty as you waited for Jesse. Ziv was watching Bandit and Isha. Athena still wasn’t back online. Gabriel was still…

You shook your head, reminding yourself that it wasn’t hopeless, that Zenyatta, Angela, Bayan, and even Zheng were working on solutions. It was just easy to get stuck in your head, especially when there was no direct action that you could take. And Gabriel was not the only one you were worried about.
Jack had been attentive and very cuddly this morning, but he was still reluctant to talk about his own issues. He wasn’t sleeping well – no repeat of yesterday morning, but he’d clung to you all night. And you weren’t so sure that he’d let himself sleep at all. He didn’t look well rested. He’d left early today – more meetings, more political wrangling. Amélie and Lao were sticking with him. The rest of the Morrisons had remained in Michael’s hospital room last night. Maggie had tried to claim the couch, but her parents made her stay in the infirmary with them.

Your phone buzzed – Jesse was in the hall. You glanced at your notes. You’d been trying to lay out a good way to give bad news, but it wasn’t working. You’d planned to ask Jack, but he’d been so quiet last night that you realized that he was probably struggling with the same problem: how to tell the families that their loved one, whom you were responsible for, wasn’t coming home. There was no magic solution. There was no way to get out of it unscathed. There could be no misunderstandings, no “he isn’t coming back” or “he passed.” You had to be clear and concise. And you had to do it with genuine regret, your words both kind and firm. Plus, you had to do it in a way that would not scar an eight year old child.

It was an impossible mission.

Jesse drove while you silently rehearsed your speech. None of it felt right. The words were clumsy. Your outfit was stupid. That damn tie was crooked. You had not had enough coffee for this. Your hands shook slightly. Maybe you’d had too much coffee. Fuck.

“Kids don’t need the window dressing, Lucky,” Jesse said as he pulled into the parking area. “They just need the truth, compassion, and patience. Like anyone else. I think kids handle it better, honestly.”

You nodded brusquely, lips pressed tightly together.

The security staff gave you directions to an office – on the opposite side from the dorms. You flexed your fingers trying very hard look calm. Yours eyes wandered, mapping the security cameras as you passed them. Jesse walked in step with you, expression wry. He didn’t touch you, but he stayed close.

You stopped at the office of Eino Korhonen, the head of security. It didn’t look much different from any of the other rooms – brass name plate, wood paneling polished to a warm glow. You spotted more cameras and sensors, felt the buzz of higher end electronics in your fingers.

You did not look at Jesse as you knocked.

A bearded man with dusky skin and chestnut curls answered the door. He was middle-aged, but in good shape, his weapon almost hidden by the lines of his expensive suit jacket. He looked at your Overwatch IDs, eyes taking in your visible weapons. He did not ask you to remove them. Instead he nodded at you and stepped to the side, an invitation to enter.

“Agent Strike, Agent McCree,” he greeted, eyes lingering on Jesse’s face like he half-recognized Jesse and was trying to place him.

Korhonen had a nice office setup, antique wooden furniture and cutting edge electronic surveillance systems. The panel of monitoring screens had been blacked out. And in the chair in front of his desk sat Kseniya.

She was exactly how you remembered her, dark hair in twin puffs, wearing the navy and tan uniform, swinging her legs because her feet did not quite touch the ground. She perked up when she saw you, eyes bright, smile wide.
“Lucky!” She shouted, bouncing up out of her chair and nearly skipping halfway across the room. And then she froze when she saw Jesse at your side, clearly not the man she expected. You watched her eyes dart across your outfit, your tense posture, your grim expressions. When she finally looked you in the eye, she knew something was wrong. “Where’s Tato? Why isn’t-”

You tried to speak, but the words shriveled on your tongue. You cleared your throat, spine stiff, shoulders braced for impact.

“Lucky, what’s going on?” Kseniya voice went very soft, her hands dropped to her sides, big amber eyes widening then closing. Her shoulders began to shake.

“Kseniya, I’m very sorry,” you said, forcing yourself to look her in the eye. It was the hardest eye contact of your life. Because you saw the precise moment when you broke that child’s heart. You didn’t even have to voice the news, to spout your clumsy but carefully-prepared speech. Your hesitation said it all, and with so much more conviction.

“No,” she said, backing up, eyes impossibly wide as she stared up at you. “No. Nononononono!” She snarled, hands clench into fists, her entire body trembling, betrayal clear in her eyes. “That’s not why you’re here, Lucky! Tell me that’s not why you’re here! He’s just hurt. Or out of comm range. He’ll get better. He will-”

“I am so sorry, Kseniya. But that is not possible,” you said, stepping forward, gritting your teeth, and forcing yourself to speak the terrible truth. There could be no room for misunderstanding or false hope. That would do more damage in the long term. “Feodor Tataryn was killed in action-”

Kseniya stared at you, doubt still on her face.

“It’s him,” you said softly. “I was there.”

You watched the disbelief harden for one brief moment, like she was going to scream her denial. But then she began hyperventilating, and that brittle shield of confidence cracked and fell away. The raw on anguish in her eyes tore at something in your chest. You looked away first. It was a mistake.

“You were supposed to protect him!” Kseniya shouted, her voice hoarse. “You were supposed to have his back!” And then she launched herself at you, all fists and shrieks as she beat at your legs and stomach, sobs choking out half of her words.

You let her. You simply stood there and took it, not quite feeling the blows. She was, after all, a very small child. “I’m sorry,” you said, voice cracking, hating that here you were again, apologizing for things that you could not fix. In the face of her grief, you wanted to talk, to say all the right things, but you knew from experience that there was nothing you could say that would fix the situation. But there was plenty you could say that would make things worse. A storm of panicked words whirled around your head, and you knew that could not quite trust yourself. So you bit the inside of your cheek, blood filling your mouth. The coppery taste was a shock to your system, washing away all other thoughts.

“How could you let this happen?” Kseniya’s strikes grew weaker, but she wasn’t really trying to hurt you. It was as if all that grief filled up that tiny body and overflowed. It needed somewhere to go. You could bear this much for her.

You felt Jesse’s hand on your shoulder, but you shook your head, not looking away from the crying girl. You could weather this.
“He trusted you, Lucky!” She shouted up at you, face stained with tears. “I trusted you!” She pulled away, glaring up at you, teeth clenched.

“I know,” you said, swallowing roughly. “I am very-”

“I don’t want to hear it!” She shrieked. Shaking, she shoved past you, ignoring Jesse as she stormed out of Korhonen’s office.

“Kseniya-” You tried to follow her, but Korhonen stepped in your path, palms out as he shook his head.

“Let her go. Fatima is waiting in the hall – she’s the resident trauma counselor and has a good rapport with Kseniya.”

You shuddered, and Jesse rested a hand on your shoulder. You took a deep breath, blinking rapidly as you looked away. Your mouth was still bleeding and you had botched this straight to hell. You weren’t sure what you expected, but this was the bad outcome.

“Sit down, let me make you a cup of tea. It’s instant, because I don’t feel like having a goddamn ceremony every time I’m thirsty.” Korhonen said, not unkindly as he filled three cups of water, dropped in tea bags, and handed them out. You took the tea without any additions. All you tasted was blood, but eventually the metallic intensity began to fade.

“Thanks,” you said. “I should go-”

“Kseniya will recover, She’s resilient. Kids usually are,” Korhonen said casually. “But they’re also a lot more unpredictable. I understand that you are not used to dealing with them. Are you going to maintain contact with her after this?”

“Huh?” You blinked, unsure that Kseniya would ever want to see you again after this. “I don’t know? I mean, we still have to take care of her father’s affairs and make arrangements. We aren’t-”

You shook your head. “I’m just a family friend,” you said, trying to stop your babbling.

Korhonen nodded sympathetically. “Kseniya likes you a lot,” he said. “She told me a little about her last excursion to the Overwatch campus. Very exciting. Too exciting.” Korhonen said gravely, his expression sour as he eyed you almost accusingly.

You flinched. Crashing the hovercraft had caused the least amount of damage, but things could have turned out a lot worse for Távio and the kids. “Yeah, I thought so too.”

“You know, when it’s time to deliver the bad news Reyes usually goes in person. It’s a job he doesn’t delegate.”

You stiffened, remembering that Gabriel had mentioned talking to Korhonen, but never what kind of relationship he had with the man. You looked down at the mug, wondering why you’d just accepted a drink from a stranger…

“I’m guessing he can’t?” Korhonen continued, real strain in his voice, those brown eyes shockingly mournful.

You hesitated, diffident about adding more words to the mix. You’d already done enough harm...

“He’s not dead,” Jesse said, clearing his throat.

“That’s good news,” Korhonen said, a faint smile warming his face. He bent over and rapped his knuckles against his right leg. It was a heavy blunt metallic sound – he wore a prostheses of some sort. “I served under him during the Crisis. Would’ve stayed on, but it’s not fun clanking when you run. I can do it for a couple miles, but after that it just hurts. Some people can transition all right, but I had...complications. Had to adjust my career options. Reyes’ recommendation landed me this job.”

You relaxed, realizing that Korhonen was the person Gabriel personally tasked to look after Kseniya. And then you got stuck, a little too long, on what he had said about his complications transitioning to a prosthetic limb. Now was not the time. You shook it off. “Sorry, I’ve never given the bad news to a kid before.” You adjusted your gloves, trying to mask the shaking of your hands. “Maybe I should have asked someone more experienced to do it. But it didn’t feel right? I don’t know. I just wanted to do whatever would cause the least harm for her.”

“Children don’t have the same restraint we do. Kseniya’s a good kid and she likes you. She’s hurting, and even if it’s not your fault, you’re the messenger. Give her a couple days. She’s got to process it, and then she’ll come around.”

“I-”

“But you will return,” he said firmly. “That little girl has watched the people she cares about walk away and never come back too many times. You better not be one of them.” There was real anger in his voice. Korhonen was genuinely protective of his charge. Gabriel had chosen well.

You blinked. “Yeah, OK. Haven’t gotten around to processing the paperwork, but we aren’t going to abandon the kid.”

Korhonen nodded. “I know Reyes doesn’t run that kind of outfit. Logistics shouldn’t be hard. Her tuition is paid up through the next semester and there’s a trust fund that should cover the next few years. Her guardian may have been a man of questionable ethics, but he made sure she was taken care of.”

“Good to know,” you said, not surprised by that analysis of Tataryn’s character.

“You keep the lines of communication open. She’ll reach out to you when she’s ready,” Korhonen said, and it didn’t sound like a request. In fact, he gave you a stern look, more like a disappointed teacher than a security officer.

“...Yeah, OK,” you said, unable to forget that look of pure grief on Kseniya’s face when you destroyed her world. Even if she forgave you some day, that look would stay with you forever.

You didn’t feel like talking about it. Instead, you sat in the car wondering how you could blithely exchange nasty insults with hardened killers – ones that threatened you with really awful fates – but not take a few harsh words from a tiny child. Jesse stopped at a drive thru and bought you burgers to go. He also handed you a cup of vanilla soft serve covered in hot fudge. You ate that right there in the car. You started with that first, to chase the taste of blood from your mouth. It was a good choice: you focused on contrast between warm sticky chocolate and cool smooth ice cream, the sweet distracting you from the bitter.

He waited for you to be halfway through the dessert before he brought up what just happened. “You know, I just want to say, it ain’t your-”

“My forte? My best work? Oh yes, I know,” you snarled into the ice cream, stabbing it a little too roughly with your spoon. That wasn’t right. The soft serve had done you no wrong. It was the most comforting thing you’d had since you left bed. “I really botched that delivery.”

“We both knew she wouldn’t take it well, huckleberry. You were kind and genuine-”

“Genuinely fucking it up,” you growled.

Jesse made a frustrated sound in the back of his throat. “Stop throwing yourself a damn pity party, Lucky. We ain’t got the time or the funny hats. It ain’t your fault what happened to Fedya, OK? It ain’t.” His accent thickened when he yelled at you. “I was there, Diallo was there, Boss was there too. If you got blame, there’s plenty to go around. But that don’t help no one and it really ain’t your fault. Any more than what happened to the Commander is my fault. I sure as hell ain’t feeling that way, but in my head, I know it’s true. Just like I know that saying it doesn’t change a thing, because we’re both struggling with the guilt. But I don’t want you getting it in your head that this is something you have to make up for. Already seen that show before. Doesn’t play out so well for you.”

You narrowed your eyes at him, spoon jammed between your teeth poking the inside of your cheek. “Jesse McCree-”

“You need to hear it,” he said. “Because I know Kseniya was hurting and I know she said some stuff that hurt you. It hurt me just to watch- there’s plenty of pain to go around. But that don’t make those words true. So let me remind you, Tataryn was a senior agent in command of his own squad, fully capable of taking care of himself. Ain’t your fault. Just like what happened to Epsilon Squad ain’t Jemison or Morrison’s fault.”

You inhaled sharply, remembering the bones and the fire, the madness in Jemison’s eyes as she took Prince apart, trying to find balance in destroying him from the inside, like he had done to her. You knew that look in her eyes, knew that she would never find what she was looking for right now, because there was no way to bring back Shoal and the others. There was a way to heal, but she wasn’t looking for that, couldn’t see that there were different paths leading her to what she needed and away from what she thought she needed. She wasn’t asking the right questions, hadn’t reached that part of the process yet. She was trying to fix the past, and that was impossible, and she couldn’t move forward till she accepted that. And Jack? Jack was...well, you weren’t sure. You just knew that he wasn’t OK either.

Maybe you were in the same boat, somewhere back on the grieving loop, too blinded by your feelings to see the truth.

“Tataryn was our responsibility,” Jesse said. “But it wasn’t our fault.” There was a grim certainty to his words, his delivery mirroring Gabriel’s. You shuddered, recognizing your lover’s words, a lecture he had given before, and obviously not just to you. “Said once, the words are meaningless. Said a couple times, the words are annoying. Said every day, and they start to finally sink in, you know?”

“I know,” you said quietly, staring straight ahead.

Jesse fell silent, and turned his attention to the drive. You focused on breathing. It wasn’t till he parked in the motor pool, that he spoke again. “You sore at me?”

“Only because you’re right,” you muttered, staring at your now empty ice cream cup. “Thanks.”

He chuckled. “Sometimes you just need someone to remind you.”
“Yeah, I know,” you sighed.

“And maybe, I need someone to remind me too,” he said hoarsely, trying to sound glib, but the words stuck in his throat, ruining the delivery.

You set the empty container down, and turned to face Jesse and his soft brown puppy eyes. “What happened to Gabriel was out of your hands. He’s the damn Blackwatch Commander, super soldier, ego-maniac who takes on too much responsibility and will also blame himself for what happened to Tataryn, because we’re all dumb and don’t have any logic, just big stupid feelings, and maybe only brain-cell shared by the entirety of Blackwatch.” Huffing angrily, you handed him a burger, and got one out for yourself.

“Be sure to tell him that, in that tone,” Jesse said, mischief brightening his face. “Try it on Morrison too. I can’t get away with it, but you can.”

“Working on it,” you groused.

Jesse’s smile faded, like he only just realized that maybe Jack wasn’t taking things well either. “I know. Sorry.”

“Meddlesome kid,” you said.

“You’re one to talk,” he said mildly.

“I’ll eat all this myself,” you said, pointing at the bag.

“That’s just cruel,” Jesse said, with a lopsided grin, clearly not taking you seriously. And he’d paid for the meal.

“Yeah, well, that’s what going to happen if you keep throwing yourself a pity party. It’s my turn, but as you said, we don’t have the spare time, and we’re out of fun hats.”

“I know.” Jesse pointed to his head. “But, yeah, I get it. So are we accountability buddies then?”

It was strange to hear him say it so plainly, to hear him ask for the help and know that he needed it as badly as you did. It sort of surprised you, because of how fucking hard it was to just come out and make that declaration. But here Jesse was, being all honest and trusting with you, like he’d been from the start.

“Accountability buddies, huh?” You’d bet your burger he’d heard that term from someone else, but that part didn’t matter. He was doing things the right way. “Yeah, sure, when haven’t we been?” You said looking over and giving him a nod. Blinking rapidly, you bit into your burger.

Jesse just ruffled your hair a little too hard, a tired smile on his face.

“I didn’t expect her here this soon,” you murmured, adjusting your earpiece.

“The Prescott family flew her out here. She brought her own security though,” Lacroix murmured out the corner of his mouth.

He sat behind you, back to yours. He had his own booth with a view of the kitchen. Your position faced the front of the restaurant, so you could keep an eye on the door. You were further back in the restaurant, but your lines of sight were clear. Hanzo loitered outside, wearing a navy blue hoodie and checking his phone. There were no big windows to snipe through, and very dim lighting. The bistro was mostly empty – the dinner rush had come and gone, and the waitstaff had no interest in hanging around the dining room. Lacroix had chosen a place with discretion, and maybe a few other perks.

“Contact spotted,” Hanzo said in clipped tones.

You raised your menu, tracking movement across the street. A redheaded woman power walked toward the door, her companion stopping to give Hanzo a long look before he followed her inside. He paused to pick out the cameras too – so not an amateur. Not waiting to be seated, the redhead strode to the booth across the aisle from yours, and took a seat diagonal from you, her back to the front. She picked up her menu, lowered her sunglasses and winked at you. She wore a double-breasted tan trenchcoat, a matching hair kerchief, riding boots, and black kidskin gloves – like a vintage spy. The auburn wig was carefully styled and probably expensive. The only reason you knew it was a wig was because Ainsley wasn’t going to dye her hair that shade of red.

The man – you recognized John Morganstern from Lacroix’s files – was careful not to look directly at you. Tall, middle-aged and trim, he wore a hoodie and jeans. He had dark hair and a pleasant face. But he was one of Petras’ informants. You held a gun in your lap, lining up a shot, just in case.

Morganstern picked up his menu. “The guy out front one of yours?”

“Yes,” you said, perusing the appetizers.

“I don’t think we were followed, but there are a lot of surveillance cameras in town,” Morganstern said. He did not look at Lacroix, but was clearly aware of him.

Ziv was handling that. You just nodded.

“But you said we should have about fifteen minutes still,” Ainsley said to Morganstern, though she kept sneaking glances at you.

A tiny Vietnamese woman came by and filled everyone’s water glasses. She had to get on her tiptoes to reach, and all the tables got splashed. She glared at the booth in front of yours. She did not take any orders, and just scurried back to the kitchen. You didn’t know who would actually hire Vo as a waitress, but Lacroix thought it would be fun to bring her along.

Morganstern squirmed.

“Are you safe?” You asked her.

“I hope she’ll be a fool -- that's the best thing a girl can be in this world, a beautiful little fool, ” Ainsley quoted, looking far too pleased with herself. “You know John, my parents and Uncle Rupert – Rupert Prescott,” she repeated for your benefit. “They really wanted me to come here and talk about what a good person my uncle was: to highlight his support for women’s education and anti-discrimination employment bills. They also want me to “reluctantly” mention how loyal Jack is to his friends, and how even if he’s a good man, he’ll do anything to protect them.”

John Morganstern winced. “Yes, well, I understand that.”

Lacroix had an idea about the leverage Petras used on Morganstern, but you wanted to hear it from the man himself. You inclined your head to the side still facing forward. “So what are you protecting? Besides Ainsley and your own skin?”

Morganstern had the grace, or at least acting ability, to look chagrined. “The people we love are only human: my wife likes gambling a little too much and managed to get in over her head. The Director approached me personally with the information and an offer for help.” He smiled bitterly at the table. “I didn’t want to do it, but there were some very serious creditors and I was at risk of losing my clearances. How was I going to pay back that debt if I lost my job?” He didn’t look at you, but the slump of his shoulders and the tightness in his voice telegraphed shame.

Well, Lacroix had noted the large bank transfers to Morganstern’s wife, though you had not had those details.

“My wife...isn’t that irresponsible. After really looking into it, I think she was helped along by a mutual acquaintance. I know it was a setup, because it all happened so fast...” Morganstern exhaled slowly. “But if I’d known what he was planning, I wouldn’t have gone along with it. I swear,” he choked out, voice rough.

“I know you feel really bad about your friend Agent Van Allyn,” Ainsley said, the cheer draining from her face. “I really liked Agent Shoal and Agent Mosweu. They were always nice to me. Mosweu told the funniest stories.” She sniffled then, one hand over her mouth. “I’m glad Jack is safe.”

“...Is he really dead?” Morganstern asked, turning to finally make eye contact with you.

“Yes,” you said, reading the relief in Morganstern’s eyes.

Ainsley trembled, sniffing louder.

You did not give details. You did not boast. And thankfully, Morganstern asked no further questions.

“I know he did bad things, but he was my uncle. And until very recently, I didn’t know that side of him,” Ainsley whispered.

She was allowed to be sad, to mourn her uncle and her idea of him. But that an abstract concept. You couldn’t quite bring yourself to say the words.

“Are you going to go along with their plans?” You asked, fingers tracing the “Entree” header on the menu. You sat forward in your seat, leaning over the table, your head angled so you could see Ainsley’s face.

“...I don’t know what to do. I’m staying at Uncle Rupert’s.”

“She’ll need an exit strategy,” Morganstern said abruptly. “I have information here too and would be willing to provide additional evidence.”

“In exchange for...?”

Morganstern swallowed roughly. “Lenience. I know I fucked up. I don’t have an excuse. But I panicked and made the wrong choice. I didn’t think it would get this bad, honest. I didn’t want anyone to get hurt, let alone...” He rested his face in his hand. “I will leave this for you in good faith,” he said, sliding a tiny drive under the menu.

“John’s a good person,” Ainsley chimed in. “He helped me plan this.”

“I can’t take credit for the outfit, that was all you,” Morganstern said dryly.

“No, it’s not me, which is precisely why it works,” she beamed. “They don’t expect me to do much except bolster Georgie and cry over my uncle.”

“You asked.

“Acting Commander Bell,” Ainsley said. “George Burton Bell Jr,” she added. “We just called him
“Georgie,” she said with a straight face. “He was always a sulky child.”

You couldn’t hear Lacroix laughing, but you could feel the evil amusement in the depths of your soul.

“What do you plan to do?”

Ainsley sat back in her chair, eyes downcast. “I don’t want to help them. I loved my uncle. But what he did was unforgivable. He got a lot of people killed and tried to kill more, like Jack, Távio, and you.” She flinched when she said the words. “I’m not going to protect his reputation. Or Georgie’s. If you need me, I’ll corroborate the sexual harassment charges, the unethical financials, little details like dates and times. Whatever I can honestly confirm, I will.” She looked you in the eyes. “It’s the least I can do.”

As far as gestures went, that would be a big one. If she did it. You nodded slowly. “I would be grateful.” You paused. “If you look in the sugar bowl, there will be a key to gym locker, address attached. There’s an encrypted phone in there for you and some more instructions.”

Ainsley eagerly took the lid off the sugar bowl and gasped audibly at the key. “It’s like a spy movie,” she giggled.

Morganstern did not look nearly as amused.

She held up the keychain tag, an address written on it. “Is this nearby?”

“A couple miles out,” he said. “We need to hurry if you want to pick it up tonight. We’re short on time.”

Nodding, Ainsley stood. She gave you a wobbly smile. “We’ll talk later.”

“Be careful. Get a new duress phrase,” you said.

Ainsley blinked, then nodded vigorously. “OK!”

Morganstern led the way out, while you stayed in your seat.

“They’re on their way,” you said and typed out a similar message to Diallo, who was waiting at the gym to see who would show up. Hanzo would follow them, to make sure they were working alone.
It wasn’t a guarantee of Ainsley’s cooperation, but there was no sense in being sloppy. Hopefully, you could rule out any external influence or treachery early on.

“What do you think, Chanceux?” Lacroix asked quietly. “Do you trust her?”

“I think Ainsley means what she says. Can’t tell if anyone else is coaching her,” you said after a moment. “But I don’t know about Morganstern.”

Lacroix rose and went to the now empty table. He lifted folded up the menu, discretely, sliding the little drive into his coat pocket. “Using his wife as leverage rings true, but we won’t make any assumptions just yet.” He stared thoughtfully at the door. “This will be interesting, Chanceux,” he murmured, sounding entirely too pleased.
It was dark when you finally got back to base. Lacroix and Vo had been willing to accompany you to another restaurant – for a price. You shook your head as Vo carried off a stack of food boxes, looking very satisfied. Lacroix’s own parcel was slightly smaller, but he’d made you buy him dinner too.

Which was dumb because you were carrying a stupid amount of greasy food back to the infirmary. Lacroix was helping, because he damn well better, but Vo split off as soon as she could, and headed straight for the Blackwatch living quarters to gorge.

“Even if our contact is unable to meet her obligations, this is still good work,” Lacroix said, one hand brushing his breast pocket. You assumed that was where he put Morganstern’s drive.

“I still don’t know if we can trust her,” you said.

Lacroix gave you a measured look. “Trust her to do what she says? Or trust her to behave as someone of her family would?”

You blinked. “I don’t know. I know she probably isn’t some kind of criminal mastermind…” You hesitated, remembering a time when you weren’t so sure of that. “But that doesn’t mean she won’t backstab us. Well, more likely, she’d let us down. What’s your read on the situation?”

Lacroix tapped his chin. “I am uncertain as well.”

You squinted at him, a little incredulous “Really? I feel like one of us should be able to predict-”

Lacroix clicked his tongue. “We are rarely so fortunate to have guarantees, Chanceux. Only probabilities. Yes, lies are easy to spot, if you’re looking for them. And if your contact was trying to deceive us, we would probably know.”

You frowned. “I don’t know where you’re going with this.”

“That girl has always had innocuous motivations,” Lacroix said. “She is spoiled, childish, and shrewder than she acts. But the trouble she has caused has never come from intentional malice. The reason you’re having trouble reading her intent, is because even she doesn’t know what she’s going to do.”

You narrowed your eyes. “What?”

“You recall, after your encounter with her uncle, she made all the right noises about ethics and friendship, but when she came into conflict with her mother, all that resolve crumbled. She is also aware of that. And even if she wants to help, on some level, she doubts whether or not she can really go through with it. Change is never easy, Chanceux.”

You frowned. His analysis made sense, though it seemed silly at first. Why would she start the process if she didn’t intend to actually commit? But then she was on the verge of a life-altering decision. Her fear was justifiable. You knew from experience that “doing the right thing” wasn’t really much incentive. You tried to do the right thing for yourself, not because there was a reward. You tried to do the right thing so you could look yourself in eye and say “I’m not like Petras or Talon.” Because you still did bad things, and that line was so very easy to cross…

“I think she just needs a few nudges in the right direction, Chanceux. Which will be your task.”

Your right eye twitched as you gave him a dirty look.

“Don’t look at me like that, your face will get stuck, and no one will ever take you seriously again.”

“It doesn’t seem like they do now anyway,” you grumbled.

“Ainsley Petras does. You’re the one who has brought her this far,” Lacroix said mildly. “Do you really think anyone else in her life has influenced her to start trying to do the right thing?” He opened the infirmary doors for you.

You went through, mind reeling from his accusation.

It wasn’t till after he’d handed off the extra bag and left that you realized that maybe Távio and Riggs could share in some of the blame. But by then, you were alone, and it was too late for a snarky comeback.

“Lucky Lady!” Reinhardt boomed, with the same enthusiasm he used for currywurst. Which was what you had brought in. To your surprise, he was still in bed, while Torby sat in a chair beside the bed, pretending to be very busy reading a book, and pointedly not looking at the food.

“Sorry, I’m just getting around to seeing you. I’ve been putting out little fires everywhere. Or trying to. I think I might have just added accelerant to a few.” You rubbed the back of your neck sheepishly.

“Oh it’s fine. Agent Lao has already been by,” Torby sniffed. “She brought us lunch yesterday.”

“That was yesterday,” you said. “Haven’t you eaten since?”

“Oh sure, Agent McCree brought us dinner last night,” Torby continued. “Tacos,” he said, face blank.

“The infirmary meals are not quite...enough, but no one wants to complain to Angela,” Reinhardt whispered loudly.

“And then today, Mihret brought us kebabs. I know he’s still working with Athena and those omnics, so it was a surprise to see him all the way over here in the infirmary,” Torby said, giving you a sharp look.

You blinked. Wait a minute… All those hints about other people dropping by with food? And how busy they were…? Were Torby’s feelings hurt? It had been two days and you’d been working in the infirmary, but… Well, you had been just down the hall but there’d been so much to do and… And you still should have stopped by to say, “hi, I’m really glad you’re alive,” just a little bit earlier.

You set the bags down and pinched the bridge of your nose, taking deep breaths. “I’m sorry. It’s been crazy and today is the first chance I’ve had to go out for food.”

Torby just thumbed through his book, lips pursed.

Reinhardt just chuckled at your distraught expression. “Torby, don’t be so hard on Lucky. Little Miss Lao also told us that Lucky and Gérard are running Blackwatch right now.”

“She was always half-running Blackwatch anyway,” Torby said, begrudgingly. “And McCree has stepped up, so she has help.”

“These are not normal times,” Reinhardt said patiently.
“What’s normal?” Torby snapped.

“I got you some apple pie,” you said, desperation creeping into your voice. “It’s probably pales beside your wife’s but...”

“Hand it over,” Torby said, reaching out with his prosthetic.

You blinked at the play on words, but gave him the entire pie, as Lacroix had recommended. He might share with Reinhardt, but Reinhardt just seemed happy to have currywurst.

“He’s not really mad,” Reinhardt said out of the corner of his mouth. “He’s just been worried about you.”

Torby only grumbled as he popped open the pie box and began to cut it with a blade attachment on his arm.

“Tell us all about your adventures-” Reinhardt began.

“Have you seen Ana yet?” Torby asked.

“...No,” you muttered, tucking your chin against your chest, hands jammed in your pockets. “That’s next on the agenda.”

Torby straightened up, eyebrows climbing high. “She’s your CO.”

“Yup,” you squirmed a little. “It’s been all kinds of crazy.”

Torby sighed then, shaking his head, and tearing the lid off a box to put a slice of pie on. He handed it to you, expression grim. “Eat.”

“...Thank you,” you said, because it did smell very nice.

Torby flicked a fork attachment out and began to eat directly from the box. “Not as good as my wife’s, but acceptable.”

“We’ll have to ask Lucia to make Lucky a pie,” Reinhardt said eyes twinkling as he took a bite of currywurst.

Torby grunted. “I suppose.” He did not offer Reinhardt any pie. “You’re obviously so caught up in work that you’ve lost track of what’s important. I bet you aren’t eating properly. Where’s Isha?”

“She’s with Jesse. He’s supposed to take her and Bandit to visit Agent Jemison when he has a moment.”

“When Mihret came by he said that she saved his life,” Torby said, reinforcing the fact that apparently you were the last person to come see them.

“Probably. Heard he decided to headbutt a gunman.” Your breath still caught when you thought about how close he’d come to...

Reinhardt gave you a wobbly smile. “I am glad that you are safe too.”

“Stay in bed,” Torby growled at him. “You’re still healing-”

Impulsively you leaned over and hugged Reinhardt’s side. There was no way you could get your arms all the way around him. He gave a delighted laugh and squeezed back, making your ribs
“Don’t forget, Torby,” Reinhardt murmured in your ear, at a volume that could almost be considered “quiet.”

Grinning, you walked around the other side, and leaned over to hug Torby. He did not try to escape. In fact, he hugged you first. That his grip was strong shouldn’t have surprised you.

“Dumskalle,” he muttered. “You should have gone to see Ana first.”

“I heard she was...displeased,” you whispered back. “I was avoiding the crossfire.”

“Do you really think she’d hit anything she didn’t aim at?” Torby hissed back. “Are you trying to compound the insult by implying something else?”

“...Shit.” He was right. You released Torby and gestured to one of the bags that you’d left by the door. “I got her a kebab and some baklava.”

“Well it’s good to see you’re not completely hopeless,” Torby said, leaning back in his chair, no real bite to his words.

“We’ll be out soon. I want to hear all about your valiant rescue of Jack!” Reinhardt said happily.

“Brigitte was asking about Isha,” Torby said gruffly. “You need to bring her by.”

“And Bandit!” Reinhardt added.

“Of course,” you said.

“And don’t wait so long next time,” Torby grumbled.

You almost told him not end up in the infirmary next time. But then the image of two coffins, one very large, one very small, flashed across your vision. You swallowed the comment. “Sorry,” you said nodding apologetically.

“It’s fine. Now sit down and eat your pie,” Torby said.

You did not actually have a fork of your own, but that had never stopped you before.

Captain Amari’s door was shut. You knocked and then stepped back, straightening your collar and brushing crumbs off your shirt. And where did that stain come from? How did sauce get all the way over there?

The door opened, but it was not Captain Amari. Tall, dark, and broad, Andre Graziani had a grim look on his face, but that softened into confusion when he saw you.

“Captain?” You called, a little surprised that he was already up and in her room.

“Ah, there you are.” Captain Amari’s voice came from the back of the room, but she did not sound angry. Which wasn’t any kind of guarantee. “Andre, will you wait outside?”

“Ma’am,” he said nodding at her. Then he squeezed past you, not making eye contact. Though you had not failed to notice those steel blue cybernetic eyes and you were well aware that he didn’t have to be looking at you to see things.
You went in, not surprised to find Captain Amari fully-dressed and sitting in a chair, with a cup of tea in hand. Holding up the bag you set it on the end table and then saluted. “Sorry, I’m only now getting in to see you, ma’am. It’s been...hectic.”

The captain’s hair was in a long braid, and there were patches of newly-grown skin on her face. Her left arm was in a sling, and her right hand was partially bandaged. She looked serene enough as she sipped her tea, but you knew better than to assume.

“What’s in the bag?” She asked, and you relaxed a little. If she was really mad, she probably would ignore your attempt at bribery.

“Kofta kebab and baklava,” you said. “Thought you might like some food with spices.”

Her lips curved upward, but she made no move to open the bag. “What do you have to report to me, Agent?”

“Though it is blatantly obvious by this point, I have come to formally report that Operation Checquy was a success, ma’am,” you said. “Unfortunately, Richard Prince and our Director were both killed in action.”

Her eyes darkened, an edge formed in her smile. “Unfortunately,” she echoed, hands clenching into fists. “But I understand you recovered a substantial amount of incriminating data.”

“I think Ziv and Zheng are still sorting though it, but it looks that way.”

She nodded, thoughtfully. “I’ve read the reports. You did well, agent.”

“Thank you, ma’am,” you said. You flexed your fingers. “I regret that we could not directly go to Greece after we concluded Checquy. We had too many injured, and Bell’s sudden appearance required direct action.”

Captain Amari waved it off. “You made the best decision given the circumstances, and by then it was Jack’s call.” She gritted her teeth as she said his name. “Though I understand that you gave the recommendation to release the constraints on Athena.” She turned that gorgon stare on you. “Which was a foolish decision.”

“Yes, I supported Athena’s choice without fully understanding what it meant,” you said, knowing that you sounded impulsive and dumb. But that was nothing new. “And I’d do the same all over again, because while I was scared for her, I wasn’t going to stop her from saving her friends.”

“You’ll never be an officer with that attitude,” she said coolly. “Given how the situation could have turned out, it would have been an acceptable loss. Jack should have known better, and I was counting on you to be a moderating influence.”

You knew Captain Amari cared deeply for Reinhardt and Torby, that she wasn’t suicidal or blind, despite accusing you of being a “moderating influence.” That was a new one, for sure. But the answer still pissed you off.

“You’re damn right I told him to save you. It’s not my job to calculate acceptable losses. All losses are pretty unacceptable. I get that it’s unreasonable to assume that we can go through this kind of life without sacrifice—” You tried not to think of Shin, or Captain Patel, or Tataryn. “But I’m not going to sit back and do nothing. Athena is way smarter than me. If she thought this plan was going to work, I trusted her—”

“It was a fool’s hope, not rational analysis,” she snapped.
“I know Athena is a lot more than she appears: I read the Operation Metis briefing,” you said “It wasn’t a completely irrational assumption.”

Captain Amari opened her mouth. Then closed it. Then glared at you hard, and suddenly it felt like your forehead was going to burst open. You stared straight back, part defiant, part petrified.

“How?” She asked, then paused. “Who?”

“Athena told me herself,” you said.

“That’s not possible. There were security measures in place,” Captain Amari said, drawing back, her expression stricken. “Did she circumvent-?”

“...Lacroix made a bunch of contingency plans,” you said, unwilling to take the fall in this one. “Jesse and I both got the briefing.”

Captain Amari groaned, setting aside the teacup so she could rest her face in her good hand. She held up one finger as she used words that might have been prayers, but the tone was nowhere near reverent or even polite. There was a shudder and a sigh, and then she straightened back up, a stoic yet resigned look on her face. “Go on.”

“We didn’t know exactly what she was going to do, just that it was a risk and that it would probably sway the Mediterranean omnis,” you said. “But Jack and I have already watched enough people die in the past few days. The idea that you could be one of them was...unacceptable.” Your voice shook and you dropped your gaze. You could still see her walking away, alone in that hallway. Or maybe that was Captain Patel. You closed your eyes then, reminding yourself that this time things had been different. History did not repeat itself.

There was a long silence only broken by a soft, frustrated huff from Captain Amari. “I see your meaning. I thank you then, for thinking so fondly of me. I suppose I cannot fault my comrades for being loyal, even if they were foolish.”

“It wasn’t just mawkish sentiment,” you said raising your head. “There was tactical consideration in that decision. You know we’re all idiots. We need you around to keep things from getting really out of hand.”

Captain Amari laughed at that, some of the tension leaving her shoulders. “I am very aware that some of you require extra supervision, detailed instructions, and specialized handling.” She gave you a knowing smile.

You didn’t flinch. “We’d be lost without you,” you said flatly, because even if it sounded like flattery, you knew it to be truth. “Others, yourself included, have lectured me on my penchant for taking risks, for occasionally considering myself expendable in the face of an important mission. I would like to remind you, in a respectful and affectionate manner, that hypocrisy looks terrible on leadership.”

Captain Amari snorted and sipped her tea, watching you thoughtfully. “I see.” She shook her head slowly. “Respectful and affectionate?” Amusement laced her skepticism. “Then let me ask you, would you sacrifice one subordinate for another?”

You could feel the weight of her regard. You didn’t even think of lying. “That is the wrong question, ma’am. It lacks nuance and doesn’t fairly represent the situation.”

“What would you ask in this case then?”
“Jack asked Athena if she understood what she was doing, the risks and rewards. I asked myself which worst case scenario we could live with. Athena took everything into consideration, and made an informed decision.”

“She’s not even been awake for a year, Lucky.”

You blinked. Lately you had been forgetting how young your AI was. “And she’s been running Overwatch’s cybersecurity for at least half of that time. She’s young, inexperienced even. But she’s earned the right to make certain choices for herself.” Not just if she wanted a bow or a spider-shaped chassis. “She’s an AI, ma’am. Whatever happens, she would remember it in perfect detail for the entirety of her existence. She would know that one side of her family murdered the other side in a misunderstanding about her. I don’t know if there could ever be reconciliation after that. And that would be a terrible situation for any person. I agree, Athena is young, too young to bear that burden for the rest of her life.”

“And if something had happened to her?”

“Me and Jack would have had to live with that for the rest of our lives,” you said, the words hollow. “And I think you know how well we handle grief and guilt. I know, we could have lost all of you. But Athena had a plan. I made my recommendation. And Jack made the best decision he could in the moment, with the information we had. We took a risk, gave it our all, and this time it worked out.”

Captain Amari inhaled sharply, nostrils flaring. She massaged her forehead slowly. “...Perhaps I have been harsh with Jack.”

You rubbed the back of your neck, unsure if that statement warranted any further comment.

“Your silence says it all. Jack has been under enormous strain, and my reaction has not been helpful.” She sighed, still shaking her head, and drinking more tea. “Sit down, Lucky. I’m sure there’s more you have to tell me.” She poured you a mug of tea, and opened the bag of food.

That was the signal. You exhaled in relief. Formal business had concluded: Captain Amari was satisfied. You pulled up a chair.

“So do you know who went to rescue the Morrisons?”

“I heard it was Zhai Feng’s parents,” Captain Amari said. “Was there a problem?”

“Yeah, you could say that.” You took a deep breath. “Feng’s father is the Ghost Fox.”

Captain Amari stared blankly at you for a moment. Then she set her kebab aside, and pulled out the package of baklava. She took a long drink of tea, and then opened the dessert. “Go on,” she said, voice a little strangled. “How many dead?”

“Dozens, all hostiles. None on our side.”

“Chang didn’t flay him alive on the spot?” The Captain asked, one brow raised. “A pity.”

You winced. “...She was shot in the face and everyone else managed to talk her down. But we, that’s everyone here including Feng, did not realize the connection. Feng really doesn’t want anything to happen to her father. And Chang is...upset.”

“An understatement, I assume.” Captain Amari sipped her tea, looking oddly smug.

You gave a nervous laugh. “Yeah.”
Captain Amari sat there, steam rising from her mug. She inhaled the scent of tea. “You have to realize he was very active in my youth. And very daring. I don’t have quite the resentment for him that Sergeant Chang does, but I would not be sorry to see him brought to justice.”

You sucked in a breath. “That would get very complicated.”

“Indeed,” Captain Amari said. She took a bite of baklava. “What’s your plan?”

“I’m trying to work out a peaceable solution—maybe getting him on as a consultant?”

Captain Amari frowned. “I suppose he could be covered by On Sing’s amnesty agreement, but Chang would not take that peacefully. And I think you understand that she is known for her…persistence.”

“Yeah, that’s what I’m trying to solve.” You paused. “I’m told she used to be a colonel. Is this…relevant to that?”

Captain Amari made a weird sound in the back of her throat. “No, not really.” She took another bite of baklava, expression troubled. “I’ll have to think about this. I foresee a lot of complications if you can’t persuade Chang to agree to something more…reasonable.”

“Yeah…” You said.

“But I have faith in your willingness to bend the rules and find creative solutions.” Captain Amari finished her baklava, a wry smile on her face. “I think you are the perfect person for the job.”

“Thank you, ma’am,” you said, trying not to grimace. You weren’t sure about that assessment, but it was a vote of confidence and possibly smug schadenfreude at your discomfort. “Is there anything else I can do for you?”

“I do have a request,” she said. “Will you go speak with Andre now?”

“I’ll try. He’s not really ever said a word to me,” you said.

“That’s better than I expected,” Captain Amari said, smiling faintly.

You blinked.

“He is a great deal like Agent Mihret: willing to and fully capable of haranguing people he disagrees with or simply does not like. If anything, I think he is unsure of how to treat you. Stand your ground, but be fair. He will respect that.”

“I’ll take that into consideration, ma’am.” You thought of Ziv. Well, the first part worked for him, but you couldn’t play fair with that sneaky asshole. You had to stay a few steps ahead of him or he’d trip over his own cleverness. You wondered if Andre was the same, or if he’d grown out of that tendency.

“Go on then,” Captain Amari said, shooing you out of her hospital room as she reached for her kebab.

Andre Graziani slouched in his chair, tinkering with a control panel on the underside of his right arm. He did not look up as you approached, but you knew that he was aware of you.

You sat down in the chair beside him, not wanting to tower over him in introductions. Ziv would have really enjoyed making you stand there and wait while he pretended to be busy. You didn’t have time for that game. You gave him a few seconds to make introductions or declare his business. But he sat there, seemingly absorbed in his work. You were not fooled.

“Captain Amari said you wanted to talk,” you said, looking over at him. You kept your expression polite and neutral.

He nodded, finally looking up at you. “You can’t use the standard model of prostheses on SEP veterans,” he said, clearly not wanting to waste time with niceties. “Yes, I know they’re custom-fitted, but anything less than military-grade won’t hold up in combat. Yes, I know Overwatch supplies high-end prostheses, but that’s not enough either. You need specific materials to form the socket – SEP musculature and activity can damage regular sockets. The weight of the prostheses itself isn’t a problem, though weight imbalance between limbs can lead to back, tendon, and ligament issues.”

You sat there, digesting the flood of information.

“The prosthetic limb itself should be constructed from a shortlist of specific alloys and polymers. I prefer a mix of silk-protein polymers and high tensile steel alloys, though Reyes may want something a little heavier, omnium alloys probably.”

“Have you already looked at what Dr. Ziegler and Agent Lindholm have commissioned?” You asked, because you had no idea about the construction of the prosthetic arm.

“Lindholm is a very capable engineer, but he would not have specifics about SEP requirements.” Graziani skimmed through data on the view panel in his arm. “I’ve seen the specs. It’s a solid model, but it won’t hold up under Reyes’ prolonged use. He’s very hard on equipment.”

You chuckled softly, thinking of him throwing his shotguns or Jack using his rifle to block giant polearms. “I just assumed that was an SEP thing.”

“You’ve just met the most destructive of us,” Graziani said, giving the faintest smile, the first you’d seen. It softened his face quite a bit. “Reyes, Chang, Morrison, hell Rodriguez lit up like a kid whenever he got to handle ordinance.”

You could see that.

“I am also aware of his hyperthermic issues and have developed a heat exchange attachment to regulate that.”

“Like...an actual heat sink?” You blinked, having not seriously considered mechanical solutions before.

Andre nodded. “Yes. I realize you have On Sing looking into gene therapies and other biological options, but this is a more immediate solution.”

You hadn’t thought that was an option before. Granted, you weren’t sure how it worked or if it would work, but if Torby and Angela thought it would... “So you what are you asking me to do?”

Graziani rolled his eyes, and exasperation clear on his face. “I was told that you or Morrison have to sign off on any medical procedures. You already have On Sing helping, but they lack critical knowledge about the Soldier Enhancement Program and how SEP veterans best utilize cybernetic enhancements. There are all kinds of complications that can arise. For example: SEP healing can also overcompensate, causing hyperplasia in the form of excessive skin growth around the residual limb.”
...Eww. You sighed. “In what capacity do you want to be involved? Do you want to be consultant, providing advice and research data? Do you want to be hired on as a contractor and work on the fabrication and test runs? Were you planning on doing this pro bono? Because if I recall correctly, you had no desire to come work for Overwatch.”

Graziani twitched, frowning at you. He was clearly talking to you because he expected Jack to object or he wasn’t mature enough to have a formal discussion with Jack. “But you’ll let a Triad waltz in?”

“On Sing is involved on an R&D level. They don’t have access to Gabriel’s personal information as per his own instructions.” Though Bayan was working closely with Angela, Graziani didn’t need to know that. “I trust Dr. Ziegler with Gabriel’s health. I trust Agent Lindholm to construct the best equipment he can. They are the leads on this project. I understand that you have a very specific field of expertise, and I am glad that you are offering aid. But if you want to be involved, then you need to acknowledge that chain of command.”

Graziani scowled at you. “Ana said that you’d be more reasonable than Morrison.”

And there it was, the push. The claim that you were “unreasonable.” You didn’t know if he really thought that and it didn’t matter. He’d slipped in a dig at Jack, and while you wanted to jump up and defend your lover’s honor, it was just a smokescreen. Graziani was challenging you. You were not entirely sure why: maybe because he didn’t like the restrictions, maybe because he wanted to see what kind of person he was dealing with. Or maybe because it was a Thursday. The reason why didn’t matter. You had to handle the situation, not the dialogue.

You met his gaze, straightening up like you were Captain Patel ready to tell off a subordinate for overstepping his bounds. “This is about the well-being of Gabriel Reyes, someone I will not be careless with. I trust my medical contact in On Sing. I trust the people who are already working to help Gabriel. I trust them to triple-check each other’s work and be professional. I trust that you have Gabriel’s best interests in mind, but I don’t know you. I will not rush in any direction without more information.” You kept your tone pleasant, but there was no room for argument.

Graziani looked at you for a long moment. You thought he might just get up and walk out. He seemed like the type. Lips pressed tightly together, crossed his arms.

“OK,” he said.

You raised a brow.

“That’s fair,” he said. “Lindholm has exacting standards. Ziegler isn’t a slouch. I can work with them. Send me the standard black ops contract. I have the proper clearances already. I’ll have my people look it over, and we can talk price.”

You doubted this was about the money. But you had made him negotiate and now he was going to make you pay, literally. Fine, you could do that, out of your own pocket if you had to. “Sure,” you said breezily. “Do you want the IP and royalty terms as well?”

“...Yeah,” he said, sounding startled. “That would be good too.”

“You may also be working with Winston. I hope that won’t be a problem.”

“...Winston’s cool,” Graziani said, looking away.

“He is,” you agreed, glad that you didn’t have to have that argument. “Out of curiosity, were you going to try to pitch the regulator to Chang?”
“Hell no, that woman eats cybertech for breakfast. Nothing I make is going to stay functioning around her and her crazy pet serial killer.”

You raised a brow, filing that reaction away for later. For some reason, you knew immediately that he was referring to Almasi.

And with that, Graziani got up and walked off toward the infirmary exit, clearly done with you.

You sighed, unsure of how to rate this encounter and wondering if Captain Amari was going to be sore at you.

Yuan and Frank just shook their heads when they saw him, clearly displeased, but not quite willing to speak up. Yuan looked angry, shaking her fists at him, while Frank gave him a sad smile, one hand hovering over Yuan’s shoulder. Immerman scowled, pretending not see him as he passed by.

He did not exactly remember making it past the stairs. He just remembered climbing and falling, and climbing back up again and again. And now he was here, passing through people he knew, people he had not seen in a very long time. They were mostly silent as he walked, and he knew that they weren’t supposed to talk to him. Even his father turned away, grief clear on the older man’s face.

His heart clenched, because even if it had been years since he saw his father, that loss was still there. He wanted to stop, to call out. But the shade was gone, and his throat was so dry…

There was no wind, but he could hear something rustling in the periphery.

“You’re not supposed to be here, boss,” a soft voice whispered in his ear.

“Are you picking my pocket again?” He asked, not turning around, unsure if this encounter would break the rules of this place. Unsure if he should care.

But there was no answer.

And so he walked, through the mist and the dead, in this place that had no time and no stars. He walked, knowing that it was too late to save anyone here.

“Keep moving, jefe. Ray’s getting tired of burying old friends. You don’t want her to be lonely, do you?” A warm hearty laugh echoed behind him.

That was ridiculous. Chang loathed him.

He found himself climbing again. No stairs, just a steep incline. He did not know if he was going the right way, but he knew that there was no other direction he could travel in. It was dream logic, making no sense, but absolutely irrefutable.

“You’ve done this before,” she said, standing by the precipice that peaked over a misty abyss. Her scars remained, but her uniform was immaculate. She was still shorter than him and no less dignified than he remembered. Though she seemed faded, compared to what she had been in life, Aishani glowered at him, just as fierce as she had ever been.

He sighed, smiling at her.

She did not return the gesture. She just pointed to the edge.

At her side was the flash of golden skin and laughing eyes. It was a man he had only known for a few hours, but whose death cast a long shadow across his life. And yours. “You better hurry. She’s waiting for you,” he said.

Gabriel struggled to find the right words. “I barely knew you.”

“I’m not here for your sake,” the younger man said, his smile sharp.

“Isn’t this all against the rules?”

“When has Blackwatch ever cared about rules?” The interloper laughed, already fading into the mist.

Aishani growled. “Keep moving, Reyes. Death cannot hold you.”

Gabriel gazed over the edge, a vast nothingness beneath him. It was the end of the road, but he could not just stay here. He glanced back over his shoulder, but Aishani was gone.

There was no way to go but forward. He thought of Jack. Of you. He did not know where this would lead, but he could not stay here, paralyzed by indecision. He stepped back, giving himself a running start.

“Remember your promise,” a familiar voice murmured, that thick Slavic accent all too familiar as Gabriel threw himself over the edge of the cliff.

Chapter End Notes

Had a scene fighting me for awhile, but finally got past it. You get an extra long chapter because I am sorry. :;

Still working from home, though no confirmation on whether or not I can stay here. (Assignments are still being made. I'm totally not plotting to destroy the competition if I don't get chosen. Nope, not me...)

There are protests and curfews in my state. I think a Neo-Nazi got punched in my town. Good. Weighing the merits of civil disobedience vs pandemic safety. I need to buy more masks. (Don't tell me to make them, I am hilariously bad at sewing.) I may try weaving though. Got a cheap lap loom and have vague memories of enjoying that in elementary school.

End Notes

This thing keeps growing. Because damnit, I want something happy. I write it late at night so my typos are worse than usual. Trying to edit it. Ugh.

I don't do much besides lurk.

I really like comments. They feed the beast and they make my days better.
Come visit my tumblr for drabbles and chats.

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!